it hurt? “Tell me that’s the upside.”

“What did she say?”

“What does she ever?” Mother was a brilliant tactician, but not terribly forthcoming: liking, as she did, for all sentients to maintain their illusion of free will. “She told me the Jedi should not find me here. But that you were here. Then she left. Can you find my armor for me? It wasn’t in the morgue. I’d really hate to lose it.”

And wearing it, Oerin hoped, would help him return to his people.

You can’t wear armor all the time, a voice mocked him. Maybe his own mind. Maybe Mother. It was harder to tell when she was this close. You’re going to start to rot. The clans will notice. And Mandalorians can be a superstitious lot, even if they are practical. They won’t follow a dead man.

Then I’ll rot, he told the voice, just in case it was Mother. And a test. Or I’ll die. Can I die? He frowned.

It would have seemed impossible the day before, but at that moment, Oerin Lin actually envied Malak D’Reev.

Davad was still staring at him, eyebrows raised and arms crossed. “You want me to fetch your armor. Really.”

“Yes,” Oerin told him. “Should I say please? Sith Lords generally don’t bother.”

Davad smiled. “Do I look like your errand boy?”

“Unless you’d rather I explain this miraculous resurrection to the Jedi….” Oerin shrugged. “Yes.”

“I have to go, Dustil.” Mekel could feel it now, the tug of his own body. Somewhere out in the world, someone was calling him. Weird, dislocated feeling, like his shoulder was being shaken. A girl’s voice, calling his name.

Dustil’s hand in his felt more real, which was fracking disturbing.

“Please. Don’t.” His friend took a deep breath. “It’s better when you’re here.”

The walls of the ship reflected their images, reflections upon reflections. They looked younger than Mekel felt, sitting against the wall on the floor, side by side.

If this was better, worse must really suck.

“You’re okay,” Mekel promised. Telos was anything but, and they both knew the lie. “I’ll come back.” He grimaced. You know how to call me back. That, at least, was no lie.

“I could make you stay.” Dustil’s hand on his tightened, fingers closing like a vise.

“Let me go and I’ll find help.”

Anger sparked in the bond again, roiling between them. Mekel’s anger at being stuck here, and Dustil’s at being lost.

“Think of something happy!” Mekel told him. Fracking Angst Boy. “Remember that time we got them to let us into the Drunk Side on Dreshdae?”

Dustil’s laugh wasn’t happy at all. And his eyes were very dark. “Remember what happened after Ban caught us?”

“Commendable, Acolytes, that your powers of Force persuasion are strong enough to fool a stimmed out bouncer at a third-rate cantina; but I would like to see you both apply yourselves to a true challenge.” Yuthura Ban’s violet eyes crinkled at the corners, as if she was lost in thought. As if she didn’t already have an idea that would involve something gruesome, for them to do. “Why not see if you can apply those same powers of persuasion to your competition in the Academy?”
“We don’t have competition at the Academy.” Mekel was drunk, or he never would have said that.

Dustil elbowed him hard. Shut the frack up.

“Humor me,” the Headmistress murmured. “I want to see what the two of you can do. Together.”

XXX

“Only one of those prospies actually dropped dead,” Mekel pointed out. “The others ran away. I probably did them a public service, keeping them out of our little school.”

“You didn’t convince them of frack,” Dustil’s voice sounded tired. “I reinforced your commands later, because I didn’t want you to flunk out.”

“That’s…” Mekel wasn’t sure what to say. A wave of anger ricocheted through the bond, and then faded. He squeezed Dustil’s hand. “Thanks?”

“Mekel.” Pressure on his shoulder again, like someone was shaking it. The voice again. Coming through the Force.

“Ban told me we were stronger together.” Dustil’s eyes shifted away from his. “I was just trying to keep us alive.”

“That’s all I’m doing now, Telos.” Mekel closed his own eyes. Just let me go do it.

In his head, in their heads, Dustil’s mental voice was tired. Just do it fast. Before he kills me. I can’t… keeping from going fracking insane in here is harder than it looks Mekk.

I know. He couldn’t help but know.

Promise you’ll come back.

I promise, Telos.

Dustil’s fingers on his released, and Mekel fell free.

XXX

“Mekel,” the voice repeated, the weight of the Force behind it. “Wake up.”

Mekel opened his eyes and found himself staring into two round and blue ones. A Zabrak face, traced with light indentations, and a lock of brown hair, curling down between her horns.

His breath rushed out, painful. His head throbbed. He felt like fracking hell.

“You’re running a fever,” Lydie Korr told him. “And Thalia May’s worse.”

XXX

All Revan wanted to do was be alone for a few minutes, to compose herself before she went to find Korrie. Her son was eating breakfast now, a bright spark with the other Padawans, laughing at something the child next to him had said.

But the Room of a Thousand Fountains wasn’t empty. Yesterday, Revan had been able to convince herself that the galaxy was only big enough for two people. But now in front of her, were the wrong two people.
“I don’t want you to be my wife,” Malak said to the red-headed woman standing before him.

“Oh?” The red-headed woman’s voice was sultry, flirtatious. And not hers. “What do you want?”

There was a pause, as if Malak had too many things to list all at once. It made Revan’s gorge rise. But there was anger around Malak too—and a darkness—as if he was about to strike.

“I know what I want,” Revan interrupted them, before the man in Dustil’s body could kiss—or kill—the woman in a copy of hers. “I want to be puke out my guts, in one of these fountains.”

Both figures turned. Revan had been hiding in the Force. From their expressions, she’d done it well.

Sunlight from the skylights overhead glinted off the woman’s golden, metal hand.

“Hello, Sheris.” Revan added, because the woman couldn’t be anyone else.

Vrook said they were all here from Manaan. All here, even her.

“Revan,” Sheris’s voice was a perfect echo of Revan’s own tone. Perfect as that face.

Didn’t I order her scarred? Almost immediately, Revan felt guilty for wishing those orders had been carried out.

Her—Malak stepped backwards, saying nothing at all. He only nodded, acknowledging her. There was something… almost… formal about it. Like Revan was his—

His master. And he was my apprentice.

Revan walked towards them. Sheris was dressed in robes almost identical to the ones she was wearing herself. The other woman’s hair was longer, and loosely coiled down her back. Her face looked more like Revan’s memory of her own face than the one she saw in the mirror now. Unlined, a faint trace of freckles across the nose. Younger. She’s younger than me.

“Are you Revan? Really?” The woman’s voice rang like a bell.

I made her practice that voice, we made her practice that. Over and over until she got it right.

“By Coruscanti law, at least.” Revan kept her voice dry.

“But are you really her?” The younger woman’s voice was mocking. “Atris and Klee said that until you get your memories back, you’re no one. Just another Jedi experiment.”

“Aren’t we all?” Revan stepped forward, trying to keep the irrational feeling she didn’t want to qualify as jealousy at bay. “Why are you here?” The ugly worm in her gut was irrational. Completely irrational. “You want to frack my husband again? Go right ahead. Just let me leave the room first.”

“Your husband?” Sheris snorted. “Which one?”

“Red.” Malak turned Dustil’s face towards her. He’d made the boy’s face look actually embarrassed: neat trick for a dead Sith Lord. “Don’t.”

Frack. I called him my husband. He’s not. He’s nothing. He’s dead.

“Malak’s a little young for you now, Sheris.”
The woman with her face tilted her head, quizzically. “I didn’t come for Malak. I came for the redemption.”

“‘The redemption.’ Revan laughed sharply. “What does that even mean?”

“It means I will be of use,” Sheris said. She smiled—almost like a mirror. “It means I won’t have to live with what I’ve seen. What I did.” Her eyes flickered towards Malak. “I won’t have to be me. I get to be someone else.”

“You’re getting a mind wipe?” Revan snorted. “Trust me, they hurt like hell.”

“Not when they’re done properly. I won’t be a half-thing, like you.”

“She says she’s going to be you.” Malak’s voice was flat and furious. “She says that Atris is going to turn her into you.”

“No!” Revan’s breath came up short. “They can’t do that!”

Those memories are mine. Mine. And why would she want—everything I did. I don’t want to know. What kind of person would want to be someone like I was?

When I take back my memories, I will know everything about this. Everything I did to them. If I want memories of my son, I must face it all.

Everything they know. Everything that made them this.

Everything we all... lost. And for what?

To stop some fracking Sith threat?

“So, this Emperor,” Revan said flatly. “Vrook told me about him. Is he real?”

Malak’s eyes narrowed. “He exists. We met with him, and the Sith’s Dark Council. You thought their fear of him was a trap to lure us closer, give him control over the Star Forge. The Sith couldn’t make the Star Forge work at all without us.” He paused. “You thought his power was a bluff.”

“Was I right?”

“I didn't think so.”

“Is that why you tried to have me killed?” Explosion as the entire world vanished in yellow light. Blood in her face, pooling in the mask. Pain.

“It was one reason.” Their eyes met. Revan looked away first.

Darkness between them, verging on hate. All still there, even if the reasons were lost. Malak seemed... darker now than he had in her dreams, as if being corporeal in Dustil's body had infected him. As if his actions had taken him farther down a dark path.

Just like our masters always warned us would happen.

“I don't understand,” Sheris interrupted. “You could have been restored this afternoon if you wanted. How can you be so selfish?”

“Is that what I am?” Revan stared at him, ignoring her. “Selfish? You told me not to do this,
“I told you to run,” he muttered. “Take our son and run. Instead, you’ve armed the Mando’ade, allied with the Sith, made deals with the Genoharadan, commanded the Sith Fleet, become Second of D’Reev, reawakened and programmed that Rakatan computer—”

“I have not allied with the Sith.”

“Arca?” He laughed sharply. “I checked the board last night before you Force choked me into oblivion. The old dead drop’s active again: the one we used when you were trying to control my father? Only now, I think your minion’s got new orders. Orders from Kaas.”

“I have no fracking idea who Kaas is.” She tried to smile as if she were confident. As if it was a bluff. “Or Arca.”

“Dromund Kaas is a place,” Sheris sniffed. ”Did you really not know that?” Her lip curled. “Even restored, I think you'd lack the spine to be Revan now.”

“Careful,” Revan muttered in a voice she almost didn't recognize. “I could rip yours out by your ears.”

“Oh, there you are.” Sheris walked closer. “Dear old Revvie.” There was a light in her green eyes that made Revan nervous. Zaal would call it madclaw, she thought. “Even without your memories, I’m more like you than this pathetic shell.”

Revan had tried to kill Malak, not even ten hours ago. She had drawn her saber. She had wanted to kill him. The anger she felt now was familiar. So black you could choke on it.

But Sheris was different. Sheris wasn’t Malak. I did this. I made her like this “I’m sorry, Sheris,” Revan said quietly.

“You’re… sorry?” Sheris’s eyes widened. “We did what we had to do, my Lord. To save the galaxy. Would you rather we had done nothing?”

“What did we save the galaxy from?” Revan asked. “Ourselves?”

Malak frowned, looking like he was about to answer. But then his head turned towards the entrance of the room, the gated archway, with its marble pillars, and promises. There was someone standing there. A shadow, slipping between the pillars. Resolving itself into the figure of a man.

Almost no warning. Just a softness in the Force. And then a laugh. “I thought being redeemed meant never having to say you’re sorry.”

At first, she didn’t recognize the man standing there. Black hair slicked back from his face and brown skin. Pale eyes in that face, tinged with Sith yellow. Like the rest of them, he was wearing Padawan beige.

But then she remembered. She had looked at all of their bios, in the days after seven of the Selkath Ten had died.

“You’re Davad. Davad Arkan.”

The other memory—the one from the crystal the Jedi had shown her—rose, unbidden.

XXX
Revan made her hand into a fist, and felt the Onderonite's heart clench as if it were clasped in her fingers. His mouth opened and closed, soundless. She opened her hand again and he fell to the ground, eyes rolling back in his head, as he tried to scramble to his feet.

Maddenly, there was a still a smile on his face—and she could feel his hunger for death as much as for all the rest.

"Don't bother getting up," she sneered. "I like watching you crawl."

It's the only thing they understand. A show of strength.

Revan turned away, not bothering to watch with her eyes, when she could feel him scrabble across the duracrete floor, feel all of them, the living web of them extending outwards and the chain that bound her—and through her them all—to the one who was coming.

And somewhere Malak was laughing. With Sheris. She could feel them laughing.

The Onderonite crawled on his knees before her. He'd been the noblest man she'd ever known—once. The kindest of all of them.

That was why she'd left him on Malachor to die screaming.

XXX

“I left you on Malachor.” Revan frowned.

“Above it, actually.” Davad's eyes never left her face. “Do you remember?”

“No,” Malak interrupted. “She doesn’t.”

Anger there, strangely familiar. Familiarity that felt real—not like a half-remembered dream. Revan turned her head and frowned at Malak. For a moment, Malak's anger had almost felt like Dustil's.

Maybe that's good. Dustil's still in there. Maybe he can break free. Maybe there’s some way I can help him break free—

“Do you remember why you saved me?” Sheris interrupted. “I was supposed to be at Malachor too. But someone took us away from our masters—me and the others. Vikor Tio took us on a ship to Rekkiad.”

“Rekkiad?” Revan had heard of it. It was near the Sheltin Tunnel trade route. Nothing there. Just an icy rock in Wild Space. Polla had always wanted to go on the Sheltin Tunnel. You had to keep your routes tight there, or your ship could get lost, burn out on the edges of parameters so narrow that you had to keep running probabilities, even after you locked in your coordinates. Rekkiad was in an eponymous system in the Reach. In Wild Space….

Wild Space near Malachor.

“Rekkiad is a planet too,” Sheris told her. She laughed again, like bells, smiling flirtatiously at Davad. “Revan thought Kaas was a person before.”

“They took so much from you,” Davad Arkan murmured. His head inclined, and he reached for Revan’s hand, bringing it to his lips, before letting her fingers fall again. “You have my sympathies.”
“No,” Malak snapped. Was he talking about the kiss? “Watch yourself, Arkan.”

It was just on the hand. Davad was always doing things like that. He’d been the noblest man she’d known—once. Once, before—

“A few of us survived Malachor,” Davad told her. “I found my way back to the Fleet. Surik ran to the Jedi. The others…” he shrugged. “I don’t know.”

“You must have… you must have blamed me.” But he didn’t seem angry.

“They stripped Surik’s Force powers.” Sheris interrupted. “I wonder why they don’t do that to you?”

“They can’t. They need me,” Revan said. “Wait—who?”

“It doesn’t matter,” Davad said, holding her gaze. “What’s done is done.”

“They want me to go after an emperor,” she told him. Davad’s eyes were still kind, oddly sympathetic. “The Jedi want me to go back into Sith space. It doesn’t make any sense.”

Something’s—something felt strange. Something I’ve felt before.

Where? When?

“Later,” Davad said softly. “…I suppose you’ve all heard, the Gamemaster from Manaan is dead.”

“Yes,” Sheris sighed, twisting a ring on her finger. She glanced down at it. For a moment, her expression was almost—lost. “Oerin Lin died from that plague.”

“I know something about Mandalorian culture,” Davad said. His eyes flickered towards Malak. “Not as much as some, of course. I don’t suppose any of you know what happened to his personal effects?”

“That pet Mandalorian of hers.” Malak’s voice dripped with disdain. “Ordo. I was with him when got the comm about Lin. Ordo wanted to get Lin’s body and burn it. But the Jedi won’t release a biohazard into the general population. So why does it matter?”

Davad shrugged. “It’s just a thought, but I was wondering where they might have put the man’s armor?”

Davad is right. He’s right. The Mandalore’s armor. Gwen and the others… they’ll want it back. Even if they can’t have the body, that armor—

XXX

“No.” Oerin said. “For five hundred years, Mandalorians have worn that armor in battles of sand, sky and stars. You are not putting it on a Wookiee.”

“They’ll be looking for a Wookiee,” Revan explained to him again. “If we give them a Mandalore instead, we can get through customs. Please.”

“I will make it fit you again, Lin-cub,” Zaalbar growled.

Sometimes I have no idea how you people defeated us,” Oerin Lin sighed. “Fine.” He got up from his chair, and paced to the viewscreen. “Do what you want, Fett Revan Mandalore.”
“We’ll need to get them the armor,” Revan said numbly. Canderous. He was supposed to be watching Malak, but Malak is here. Where is Canderous?

And Carth. I made Carth sleep. He was worried about his son and I just made him sleep.

There would be time for guilt later.

“Don’t look at me,” snapped Malak. “I’m going to go check on Korrie. Make sure he’s kept away from this contagion of yours.” He glared at her.

“It’s not mine!”

“I’ll take care of the armor,” Davad said softly. “I want to help.”

“It’s probably in Oerin’s quarters. They were assigned guest rooms, him and Canderous….”

Revan’s voice trailed off.

She was watching Malak walk away from them in Dustil’s body, moving with a furious arrogance the Telosian boy had never had. How had she ever fooled herself into thinking he was Dustil?

“I’ll take care of the armor,” Davad repeated. His fingers brushed her arm, and Revan looked up at him, startled. “I remember where the guest quarters are. You… you should go after him.” He smiled. “Isn’t that what you want to do now?”

It was. Of course it was.

“I’m going after him,” Revan said.

“Atris will be wondering where I went,” Sheris murmured. “I should go to her.”

Revan was already moving towards the hall, towards Korrie. And Malak.

XXX

The sun streaming in through the transparisteel pricked his eyelids, forcing them open. By the angle it was already afternoon. How did I sleep this long? Why didn’t she wake me?

Carth sat up with a start. He was alone, but the door to the fresher was closed.

“Revan?”

He got up, and knocked. Not that he needed to knock, it wasn’t even like her to leave the door closed, it had been one of those things he’d had to get used to, like the way she had nightmares in her sleep.

Carth thumbed the door open when there was no response. The room was empty.

Funny, there had been *something—*wait. Wait. How long was I asleep?

Memories of the night before started to flood back. Dustil. There’d been—Dustil. Dustil on the floor unconscious.

And you just left him there, because you had to get her away from him. She almost killed him. She almost killed your son.
“I need to watch Dustil,” he told her. She had to realize—even with, even with everything she’d done—even with what she’d just done, she had to realize. Dustil was still his son, even if Malak’s mind was in his body.

“He’s asleep too. Now.” Revan sounded so sure.

“You can tell? How can you tell?” He’d been unconscious. There might be something wrong. She’d been choking him. She’d dropped him from a meter above the ground. The sound of his body hitting the marble floor—

“It’s… just the Force. I can tell when everyone’s sleeping.” Her eyes shifted away from Carth’s.

He was already reaching for his boots. "We shouldn't have left him alone."

“No,” Revan said. “You need to sleep. Now.”

_He was so tired. Why hadn’t he known he was so tired before now? Carth yawned. His eyes fluttered closed and he felt his body go limp._ "I need to sleep,” he muttered. “Now.”

XXX

Carth knew they’d done something to his mind on the _Pearl_. Rew and Jiya had both all but confirmed it. And yet—and yet—I’ve been asleep too long.

This was an impossible situation. It didn't even make sense.

_Revan compelled me. If she can do that, if she’d do that, what else will she do?_

Fear crept in Carth’s throat like a bitter lem. _Dustil._
Carth looked at the room, the one they had shared for so brief a time. White walls, a window looking out over the Coruscanti skyline. A few of Malachor’s toys were piled in one corner, atop one of the luggage crates marked ‘Property of Ahto City.’ His clothes, folded neatly on a chair. Revan’s piled on the floor next to the bed. Such a small space to build a life. A life that had nothing in it for him—except her.

They’d been together for more than a year, most of it spent on the Ebon Hawk, docked or flying. Saving the galaxy, even as Malak’s noose tightened around them. Saving her, even when she begged him not to.

He did love her. He knew that. Even now. But this was no kind of life. And trapped here was no way to save his son.

Dustil. If she'll compel me, what will she do to him?

Carth went to the small cabinet by the bed, opened the drawer, fished for his idchips. Credits. A card, with a picture of lilies on the front, inside a plimsy note.

He read it, shaking his head.

XXX

Dear Revan,

Presents, as you know, are old Deralian tradition from family to family. We're so happy that you're part of ours, and hope this finds you well. Congratulations on your marriage! I have to admit, usually Organas only marry one man at a time, but I expect you know your own mind, dear. You always have.

Your sister, (and I hope you don't take offense, that we think of you both that way), is still a bit sulky about this entire thing, but she promised me that she'd get you and your husbands something nice.

Let me know if she doesn't. I'll have words.

Jasp is a little worried that we don't know you like we should. I know you're probably quite busy, what with all of the galaxy's problems, but we're back here at home, whenever you need us. We'd be delighted if you came for a visit, and if you ever need a place away from all those bright lights, our home is always open to you and yours.

All our love,

Molla Organa.

XXX
Deralians were a trusting lot, Carth thought, giving the former Dark Lord of the Sith an open invitation to stop by. Maybe their planet had had it easier than Telos.

He put the note back and his fingers closed on the comm unit. The one Revan wore over her ear to talk to the computer. The computer that had Mission’s memories. Mission. It wasn't her, it couldn't be.

But his son wasn't his son either.

And right now, Carth didn't even feel like himself. Onasis don’t cut and run. How many times had he thought that? How many times had he gone forward, even when it all seemed hopeless? How many times had he done the right thing?

But I didn’t do the thing for Mission. I left her there. I cut and run then.

He slipped the ear piece on, a little cautiously.

“Hello, sis!” It chirped, before he had a chance to switch it on or speak. “Did you know we've been camped out in front of the freaking Temple for like, hours? Gwenarius and co want Oerin Lin’s body back so they can burn it—and this plague thing… I don't want to freak you out or anything, but it's not good. The Temple’s under quarantine, and I'm still offline, so I can't like, hijack a transport to get you. Why did you stop talking to me? Wait—waitamillisecond—”

“Error.” The voice interrupted itself. “Breathing pattern does not match the subject on record. Warning. A lethal shock capable of frying your cerebellum will be applied to this earpiece in ten, nine, eight—”

“Mission!” Carth ripped the thing off his head and yelled into the mic. “It's… it's okay. It's just me. Carth.”

Wait. Did she just say Oerin Lin is dead? Oerin Lin’s body?

“Oh.” There was a pause. “Did you take off the headset?”

“Yeah. You mind if I leave it off for now?” He kept his voice light.

“Did I freak you out with that alarm?” How could a computer sound this much like a dejected fourteen year old girl? “I really need better security. I can't really fry a cerebellum remotely.”

“No, it’s…” Carth fumbled for an excuse. “You said Oerin Lin's dead? Really dead?” His heart sank. The Ithorian had said the man was ill, but the Mandalore had seemed pretty indestructible. “Is Dustil okay?”

“Well… yeah, as far as I know. Except for being possessed by Darth Malak.” Another pause. “You knew that, right? I mean you kinda attacked him. I still had access through Mekel back then. Funny, it was yesterday, but it already feels like the good old days!”

“Malak killed Oerin?” In Dustil’s body? He tried to stay calm.

“What? No! He just died of some scary plague. Bam! Just like that!” For a computer, she sounded almost sad. “Guess you never know, huh?”

“No, I guess you… I guess you don't.”

One of those things you try to hide from your kids, as long as they aren't possessed by absolute evil pieces of banthshit. Or murdered when they get in the way.

There was a weight on Carth’s chest. “Listen, I'm just—I guess this is goodbye.”

“What?” The earpiece squawked, indignantly. “Are you kidding me?”

“You don't have plague, right?” she added. “You're not dying? I don't really have much monitoring on this thing. You know? I can't tell. I can't see.” She sounded panicked.

“No.” He realized he was shaking his head at a comm piece, and stopped. “But I-I did my job. The Jedi have Revan now. She… belongs here. And I have to think about Dustil. I need to find a way to help him.”

My son that I have no idea how to help. He had some mad idea of going to the Jedi, demanding that they fix this—but if they knew already, why didn't they help?

“I've been trying to think of your son!” Mission snapped. A computer couldn't really snap, but Mission was doing a good imitation. “But until these sunsports or whatever resolve and I can access my central core….” She paused. “Nope, still down. I can't get through to Kashyyyk at all.”

“I'm going to the Jedi.” Carth said. “I’ll threaten them with exposure. They can't let this happen.”

“Which Jedi?” Mission asked. “Vrook? Klee? The entire Council? Because, you know I tried to hack into their records for weeks and it’s like, impossible to figure out what they think. You can only extrapolate based on their previous decisions and there are some serious, serious inconsistencies. Like some of them have done complete orbital loops.” She made a chuckling noise. “Almost like they were reprogrammed.”

For a second, Carth couldn't remember any of their names. Then he remembered that conversation he'd heard in the hall the night before—before he knew how bad things were. “Vrook. He’s her uncle. And Yuthura Ban—she said she’d help before.” Carth frowned. “And maybe that white haired lady. Antrim?’

“Atris,” the Mission said. “I don't know. I was trying to figure out which of them were on our side, but the whole Darth Malak thing is a doozy.” She paused. “Are you sure it's really Darth Malak? I mean, maybe it’s some random other Sith ghost pretending to be—”

“I'm sure,” Carth snapped. “We’ve had a few chats. He promised to leave my son's body when his son was safe. But he still hasn't done it.”

“Okay.” Another pause, as if Mission was working something through. “Technically, Malachor’s never gonna be safe. You know? I mean, who is? But look, we need resources. We need resources bad. This is gonna sound crazy, but I think we need to leave here while we pull out some big, super, turbocharged guns and maybe an orbital command station capable of destroying an entire planet.” She paused. “I mean that as a metaphor. I don't actually have access any orbital command stations like that.” She made a sighing noise. “Yet!”

“You mean, go to the Fleet with this?” Carth laughed. “One step ahead of you, kid. That was my plan.”

“No,” Mission said. “Not Fleet. And I'm not a kid. Geezer.” She paused again. “Put the comm on, okay? And start walking towards the exit. Probably easier if we split before Polla Revan gets back. You want to leave a note or something?”

Against his better judgement, Carth slipped on the comm. It was cold against his ear. A note.
They'd never even exchanged rings, him and Polla—and now he was leaving her with a note.

“Tell me the plan,” he ordered the computer, already tracing the words on the back of the holocard. Not very many words. Most of the ones he felt—I wish, I hope—felt like they belonged to someone else, to someone allowed to wish and hope. And apologize? For what?

The only thing he was sorry for, he couldn't say. Because it wasn't true. He wasn't sorry for saving her. He'd do it again.

He could say that.

I'm not sorry for saving you, Revan.

Carth gritted his teeth, tried to remember the woman he'd fallen in love with. The woman who had seemed invincible, with the heart of a hero.

Make it count, Polla. he wrote. Make all of this damn well count for something.

“Okay,” he told Mission. “I'm done.”

“Good,” she said. “Let's jet. The Mandalorians are totally freaking out the guards in front of the Temple.”

Mandalorians. “Canderous.” Carth said numbly. “I should say something to him, before—”

“That’s why you have to move now, chuba pants. He's like six meters ahead of you, heading for the door.” She paused. “My T3’s got a comm open from Gwenarius to him right now. I think it might go more smooth if we sweet talk the guards into letting us out before he shows. Canderous… he’ll have a lot of baggage.”

“Of course he does.” Although he didn't seem half as bothered by it as Carth.

“Literally, a lot of baggage,” Mission added. “That wasn't a metaphor. I told Gwenarius to tell him it was a bad idea, but Mandalorians have like, duracrete skulls. Once they get an idea in, it doesn’t come out. We need to distract the guards to get them out.”

“They?” He was already moving.

“Let's just move fast,” Mission advised. “You know where we’re going, right? You're not a chump, Carth, no matter what Big Z said those times.”

“Not the Fleet.” He nodded, quickening his pace. “I can guess. And I have my doubts. The man's insane.”

“I think the Mandalorians can keep him in line,” Mission said. “And he owes us all like, big favors.”

Favors. “How is Senator D’Reev going to help?”

“He's the closest thing we have to an expert on ancient Sith artifacts.” Mission paused. “Besides my core on Kashyyyk. And it's not like D’Reev wants Darth Malak running around either, right? He'd lose his Senate seat, and a bunch of pissed off people who don't like Sith would probably just kill the kid.”

“It's all blasted,” Carth muttered.
“You know that old Coruscanti Senate saying, “Nobody really likes the Sith because they're mean and wear ugly hoods?” Mission asked. “We're gonna count on that.”

“That's not—” it didn't matter. Carth started walking faster. The first thing to do was to get out of here. The computer's plans, the Senator.... It was all nuts. Carth would figure the rest out after.

XXX

“You’re running a fever,” Lydie repeated. The Zabrak’s face loomed over Mekel’s, looking beautiful—and worried.

He wished didn't feel like he was dying, so he could appreciate her concern.

“But I had the vaccine.” The world swam back slowly, and almost immediately, Mekel wished it had not. Agonizing pain, sweats, stomach heaving—he’d do anything to be just unconscious with Telos again.

Help, he thought at the bond. Help me.

“What vaccine?” Another voice, filtered and metallic, as if through a mask. For an insane second, Mekel thought it was Lord Malak; but then the figure leaned over him. White hood, ferracrystal visor, and behind the hazmat suit, pale, even features. Blonde hair falling over the man’s forehead.

“You may have been vaccinated for some of the more common diseases transmitted in the Underground; but right now, you are infected with a virus that has synthetic signatures in its replicator nodes.”

Mekel’s head felt like it was stuffed with used plimsi, and his guts were twisting, causing sharp jolts of agony to spin up his spine.

“I know what I have,” he muttered. “It's the Dreshdae shake.”

“Dreshdae?”

The face was hazy, through the fever and the hazmat suit. It took him a second, but then Mekel realized who it was. Only one asshat he knew in the Jedi ever talked like that.

"Jorde?” Hysteria bubbled in his throat. “What, are you a medic now?”

“Mical,” Mical Jorde corrected him. “Padawan Mical is also acceptable. Return to the topic at hand, please. You said were… inoculated? When was this done?”

“On K-Korriban.” Why was he fracking freezing? “So was Thalia. And Ophile. And Udoo—”

“You might have been inoculated for something, but not this.” Jorde’s voice was flat. “Padawan Udoo is in another isolation ward, and as sick as you are—along with his master. We had to put Thalia in a coma to lower her heart rate. Her body temperature was spiking twelve degrees above the Human baseline. Even accounting for planetary drift and physiological differences among the humanid groups, that’s—”

“S-shut up.” Mekel looked at Lydie again. “I think I’m gonna puke.”

“Here.” Lydie held out a bucket—just in time.

When he could finally look up again, Mekel he noticed her lack of protective gear, compared to hazmat boy. “Aren’t you afraid of getting sick?” he asked her.
“They think we’re immune,” she murmured. “My species.”

“No Zabrak cases recorded in the Underground,” Mical agreed. “Even in the Iridonian quarter.”

“You n-need to make more vaccine,” Mekel told him. “One that actually fracking works. Or something. Sents are dying.”

Oerin Lin was dead. The man had been terrifying, and now he was just dead. Suddenly, Mekel was terrified for Millifar. Just how close had she gotten to Mandalore?

“The Masters are working on it.” Mical said. “Why don’t you get some rest? You’re looking rather pale.”

Mekel had never liked Jorde, but suddenly, he felt grateful. “Okay.” The bed was angled up. Lydie propped his puke bucket next to him. He closed his eyes, to stop the room from spinning.

“Even in those who recover, the virus is still active.” Jorde frowned. “No antibodies. It is making the effort of finding a cure… difficult.”

“That’s strange,” murmured Lydie. “Does that mean they’re still contagious?”

“No, the virus goes dormant. Deliberately dormant. It’s like nothing I’ve ever seen. I need to consult with Master Loanin—his knowledge may be able to shed some light on this artificial signature, and then, if we can trace its origin….”

Jorde sounded fascinated.

I’m glad the thing that’s killing me is fun for you, Mekel thought blackly.

“Can you trigger this… dormancy?” Lydie sounded fascinated too. Rustle of movement as they moved away from Mekel’s deathbed, probably going off to not die together.

“Alone, I can do nothing. My master and our team need more recovered subjects. We need to know if the virus reactivates itself, how long it stays sleeping—and what triggers reactivation. We need to know the point of origin….”

“Delirium,” Jorde’s voice said. “Don’t be concerned, Padawan Korr. It’s quite common in these cases.”

“No,” Lydie said. “He’s right. We need to ask Darth Malak.”

Mekel lost track of her voice as she began to explain.

Dustil? He was hopeful, being on the imaginary ship would be fracking better than this. Let me back in.

But the Telosian didn’t answer.

XXX

Temptation.

The holocron sat on the desk before Atris, partially disassembled, the relevant pieces spread before her. Each fragment like a faceted jewel, sparkling with dark malevolence.

When she closed her eyes, she could still feel their reverberations of memory, traveling back in time through the lost woman’s life. Seductive as a siren’s song on Yu’Phaedra, where the sea nets led to home.

Atris was the archivist. It had been her task to record the pertinent facts of each facet of Revan's life, take the testimony of each Master who had viewed a crystal, and then synthesize their gestalt into the larger whole. To find the truth of meaning within, their path through the madness. The secrets of the long-forgotten Rakatan Empire and the threat of the True Sith.

It had taken much time, cataloging each shatterpoint. The urge to see more—to see for herself was… understandable. But such urges, like most, needed to be denied. She had only slipped once, and only because Master Kae had asked her advice. Only once, to see what was truly at stake.

I must walk my own path, not Revan’s. I am Atris. I am the Master of the Jedi Archives. I am Atris and I will not fall—

A shadow fell across her desk, disrupting her meditations.

“I have done as you asked, Atris.” Master Kae bowed her head. “I went with Vrook to question Revan.” She paused, glancing down at the desk. “And you. Did you… view the memory?”

Atris nodded, the horror of it still black in her throat. “I did. You were correct. I needed to see it.” She tried to quell an involuntary shiver. “And you? What is your opinion of Revan?”

“As you said,” Master Kae sat. She moved like a woman much older than she was, opposite Atris with a heavy sigh. “Revan is a shell. A shell with attachments to her recent past.” She sighed heavily, suddenly looking older and frail. “Forgive me, my strength is somewhat lessened on this day.”

Atris got up quickly and helped her sit down, before retreating back to the safety of her own desk. “It must have been hard for you, seeing her like this.”

“Is it not always hard to see your students fail?” Kae gave her a sad smile. “I know you had it no easier than I when Meetra returned, renouncing all you had taught her.”

It was automatic, although not kind, that Atris felt a twinge of relief for only having failed the Jedi by training a weakling; and not, as Kae had, an actual traitor to the Order. But Kae had always been… brave.

After what happened to her mother after the tragedy on Yavin, she had to be.

“A part of Atris still hoped she was—for Vrook’s sake.”

“I do not know.” Kae’s folded her hands. “In the Force, yes. But there was little of the woman I trained left.”

“We have the other option. Sheris has agreed to take the memories,” Atris said slowly, “But the Council—”

“The Council is blind to what we have seen.” Kae grimaced. “Forgive me, if you think I speak out of turn, but the Council must not see what we have seen. Not all can look upon the dark paths and still retain themselves.”

“Let them keep their innocence,” Atris agreed. The holocron sparkled in front of her, the fragment near the top close enough to touch. The one Kae had shown her. The one that had helped destroy her own fragile peace.

XXX

A feeling of nothingness; empty as a hollow cup. The feeling of having to scream but not having your own voice.

What Revan saw in Malak’s mind was worse than the destruction of all life on a long-dead planet, worse than the ruin of Malachor.

Or at least, worse for her. She hadn’t felt the death of Malachor; but now she could do nothing except feel the slow, agonizing death of her husband. Not the body—that would almost be a mercy. No. The death of all that was good, and pure, and his.

All of his mind.

The body sat across from her at the table. The prosthesis was off, and the decayed remains of his lower face were displayed, in all their ruined glory.

Automatically, she handed him the feeding tube. Malak’s broad hands fumbled with the seals, until she reached over again and snapped the receptors in place.

“Remember when you said you were born to rule, Mal?”

His eyes just stared into hers. Vacant. Insane. If she put the prosthesis back on he’d rave at her again. About power and destruction and revenge—and how they had to burn it all to oblivion—

What a waste.

They were so close to victory. Fleet united, the Republic Navy almost destroyed. Ziost and Thule had pledged allegiance, forsaking the old Sith capitol—and the old Dark Council’s rule.

The Emperor was diminished with each world they took from him—by conquest or contract. The virus had been widely distributed in Imperial Space, and every sentient who survived the would now be immune to Tenebrae’s kiss.

True, mortality rates were higher than she liked, but dead sentients could not serve as spies. The vaccine raised the probability of survival to almost one hundred percent. On some planets, strategic ones, nearly every susceptible sentient received a dose. Star Forge production was steady, at ninety-eight percent of capacity. In another five years, they could expand into Republic Space—

“Remember when I said I needed you to rule, my love? I do. I need you back.”

She did need Malak. She would always need him.

And using the truth was the best way she had to conceal the weakness she wanted to hide, even if the Emperor was listening.

Her husband’s dead eyes stared back at her. The feeding tube was crooked. Revan adjusted it, opening the valves to make his nutrient infusion go faster. If it went faster, she could leave him to Sheris.

“I need you back.”

He blinked at her. The code he used with Sheris, with the other Jedi when his voice failed, when his voder was being cleaned. Once for yes. Two for no.

There had been a time when they hadn't needed words—spoken or otherwise. When their minds had been twinned, even across planets, star systems, maybe even a galaxy—although they had never been so far apart.

No more. Too much risk now. She had closed her mind to him. They sat across the table from one another, but Revan had never felt farther apart.

If he had only trusted her. It was why she had put Malak in charge of the scientists on Manaan in the first place. So that he would see. See what he needed to see—even if she hadn’t trusted him enough to tell him why.

He might have already been compromised, even then. There were signs. Cracks in the ice.

Or cracks in her.

Even now, the doubts came back. She had been fooled before. Trapped and tricked more than once. What if Tenebrae, or his rebellious Council were three steps ahead on this—what if her own mind was already compromised—

Don’t think that. It serves no purpose.

She had to assume the insane Sith Emperor knew about her son already, because Malak did. She had to assume, so she had to do everything in her power to stop him from using Malak.

Her son. Her weakness. The only one she had left.

“What is the life of one child against a trillion?” How many times had she asked the question. How many times had she wept for the logical response.

Nothing. The life of one child is nothing. We can always have more—but not anymore.

The fool should have taken the cure. I found a cure for it and the fool didn’t trust me enough to take it.

Distracting herself, Revan started to speak again, words more for herself than the thing that used to be her husband. How much of Malak was left? She couldn’t afford to know.

“You said I was born to fight and you were born to rule, remember? I don’t know how to rule. They want to establish elections on Thule, but the local aristocracy controls everything. We freed their slaves, and the masters burned their own factories. The slaves burned the fields. I don’t know how to stop the slaughter. I don’t know how to stop this—”

A noise, guttural in his throat. Like a moan. Too loud to be accidental. Malak’s hand brushed against hers, and his hand moved, reaching for his prosthesis.

Her skin crawled. Was that him, or the madman? “No.” She shook her head. “Sheris says you need to leave it off for another week. Allow the bone graft time to heal.”

And I don’t trust your voice, my love. I don’t trust your voice or your words. I don’t trust myself.
His fingers fumbled instead for the stylus on the table, the datapad he used to issue his reports. The Force drew it into his hands. His head tilted down, exposing the mottled skin of his hairless skull. He was writing something on it now. Revan allowed it, allowed him to write down the words that she would never read.

She got up from the table, keeping her voice cold. “I need you on the Leviathan as soon as possible. I’ll take the Aleema. The Republic hides the main bulk of their remaining ships in the Outliers. With backing from the Infinite Fleet, we’ll meet them there. Tammuz sector. Near a system called Deralia. One of the Independents. They think they’ll be safe….”

His hands shoved the datapad towards her. She backed away, refusing to look down.

Would he still follow? Trepidation in her throat. Regret, for what must be done. Could he hear her thoughts? Was it even him at all?

Her eyes skimmed the surface on the table and the datapad anyway. Traitorous eyes. He’d written only three words. The predictable ones. Sentimental drivel, that didn’t change a thing.

His eyes blinked once.

XXX

“Atris.” Kae’s voice was soft. When Atris opened her eyes, the other woman’s were sympathetic and kind. Kae reached out and took her hand, smiling gently.

“I idolized them,” Atris confessed. “To see all of that potential, all of that grace reduced to—darkness was… horrible.”

“I know,” Kae said. The lines of her face were deep, etched by old pain. “But now they have another chance, Malak and Revan.” She tilted her head. “Surely, you can see that too?”

“I see that it must be Sheris,” Atris said. “Yes. I see that now.”

Although… Vrook’s logic had been flawless. The ethics of replacing Sheris’s mind with the Dark Lord’s—even if necessary—went against everything that made them Jedi. Everything the Jedi Code stood for. To take a woman who had come to them for aid, and replace her with a monster was… abhorrent. It was wrong. The Council would allow Revan her own memories. But to give them to someone else—that made them no better than Malak. No better than the Sith.

That was why Atris would not let the Council make this choice. The Jedi Code was nothing, in the face of a madman. A mantra chanted by children, to ward off the monsters of the Dark.

She had been so blind before. But Arren Kae, the former Vima Sunrider, had helped her see.

“Yes,” Master Arren Kae nodded. “It must be Sheris, and not Revan, who goes beyond the Reach to save us all.”

Atris inclined her head. “Because Sheris will be stronger. Stronger than the real Revan ever could be.”

Master Kae’s lips pursed together. “Exactly.”

XXX

With all the moffa-crappping hell that had gone down, Canderous wasn’t even surprised to see Carth standing at main exit from the Jedi Temple, obviously wanting to leave this mausoleum just as badly as Canderous did himself.

Republic stood in front of the gate that was now covered by a glittering forcefield, arguing—by the gestures of his hands and inflection in his voice—with the two scared-looking Padawans, who were all the Jedi seemed to think they needed for security.

Good thing the Jedi were idiots who couldn’t even guard their quarantined areas properly, because Canderous really hadn’t wanted to use the nuclear option. His personal shields could probably withstand the blast but remote the ones he’d set on the cart were weaker. And if something happened—

All of this was a terrible gamble. Like every battle. His lips pulled back in a smile.

Behind him, trailed the luggage cart, covered in Mandalorian runes, with a single large crate in the middle, cushioned as best it could be with all the innocuous-looking crap he could find that wasn’t tied down. Clothing. Armor. A few crates of supplies the Jedi had just left lying in unlocked storerooms. They didn’t seem to have any locked storerooms. Trusting lot.

After some deliberation, Canderous had left the HK droid behind. No one but her could properly control the thing, even if it was useful—and with its Lin obsession... he couldn’t take any chances.

“You have to let me out,” Carth was saying to the Jedi. As if logic and reason ever worked with Jedi. “I’m not a prisoner.”

“My sincerest apology, but no one is to leave the Temple,” the dark-haired boy said. “We’re all under quarantine. You should return to your guest quarters and await further instructions.”

Canderous had been so busy raiding rooms he’d forgotten what was needed from Lin’s. Well, it was too late now. Gwenarius would have to understand. Maybe, if Revan regained her sanity and the Jedi cured their plague, they could get the armor of the Mandalore back again.

Still a good sacrifice. Even if it ended now, it would be cleaner than what had happened to Oerin.

Clan and Stars. He knew Revan would understand as soon as she got her head out of her ass. But the thing was—and seeing the pilot here now made it clear he’d reached the same conclusion—you can’t drag someone’s head out of their ass. You have to throw them some rope and hope they fire up the crankshaft all on their own.

“You can’t leave either,” the white Twi’lek girl said, turning towards Canderous and raising her voice.

“Are you talking to me?” Canderous wanted to laugh at her fierceness, like a manka kit, but instead he settled for raising an eyebrow and smiling.

Carter didn’t even look surprised to see him. One side of his mouth pulled up, and he gave Canderous a curt nod.

Canderous jerked his head once back, in the direction of the Twi’lek brown-robe. I got this one. He raised one eyebrow, signaling. You get the boy.

Then he smiled at the manka kit. “Of course I’m talking to y—”
Carth’s blasters fired, and the girl collapsed, like a droid with no motivator.

“Nooo!” A scream of near-mindless rage erupted from the boy, as he leapt across the desk, closing the five meters between them in a heartbeat.

The kid’s saber was blazing and the edge of it swept down, singing Canderous’s beskar-plated chestplate—just as Canderous ducked and shoved the stun stick up into the pup’s neck.

The pup twitched, and the lightsaber fell from his hand. His eyes rolled back in his head, but he was still trying to move. Almost impressive. He was still struggling to stand when Canderous jabbed the trank at him, burying it in the muscle of his unprotected jugular.

Canderous laughed. We’re out of practice. “You had your holdout on stun? Cause you shot the wrong one. I was gonna trank the girl—the boy was supposed to be your target.”

Carth knelt, carefully checking the boy’s pulse. “Of course I had it set to stun.”

“Good.” Canderous glanced behind him. No noise yet, but that couldn’t last. “You know how to work the field controls?”

“With this passkey.” The pilot retrieved it from the boy’s pocket. His lips twitched slightly, and he shoved the holdout back in his belt. He raised the key in the air, tossing it to Canderous, as he moved on to the girl, checking her pulse too.

Canderous wondered what the man would have done if either of the Jedi kids had been dead. Oh, well. From Republic’s expression, they weren’t “Better move,” Carth said. His lips moved and he muttered something else, half under his breath. Gleam of a silver comm in his ear. Was he talking to Revan’s computer? Or his own team?

Canderous nodded. Whatever—whoever it was, they had trust between them. Just like on the Star Forge. The man was a soldier, even if he shot the wrong targets.

Canderous thumbed his comm back on, and barked an order into it as he walked through the now-deactivated field.

Gwen’s voice barked back, rapid-fire, and already annoyed. She was going to be pissed about the armor.

“You’re insane,” Carth muttered behind him. His Mandalorian was really coming along quite well for him to have understood that conversation. “You know that, right?”

“You think I was wrong?”

“No.” The man’s voice was hard and angry. “I thought of doing the same thing. You weren’t wrong. It beats the alternative. But she—”

“We can talk about her later. If we move now. Guard the cart. We’re not out of this Moffa-frack. On my signal, you set the jets to fast, and jump on. Cover him. We need to break the line before they take us down. Once we’re on the other side....”

“We run faster,” Carth muttered. “Hope Mission is up to this.”

There wasn’t time to tell the man what Gwen had said about the T3 and its lack of access to the transport grids. Any more than there was time to tell the man that the Mandalorians outside waiting for them weren’t even armed.

They were Mandalorians. They’d get armed. Plenty of guns on the CoruSec out there too. Gwen had said there were at least fifty of them.

They’d be shooting to stun too—probably—and beskar could take some hits. Course, the pilot wasn’t wearing any… but the man knew how to duck and roll.

Canderous couldn’t help but smile. Even if they lost, it would be a fine battle.

A fitting memorial for Clan Lin.

XXX

Revan caught his arm. “Malak. Stop. You can’t… you can’t do this.”

“Do what?” Instead of stopping, Malak was walking faster now, propelling Dustil’s legs with the power of an older man, a stronger one. “Do you think I can’t protect my son from this plague you’ve unleashed to destroy the Jedi?”

Somehow, Revan knew that pace, instinctively, matching it with the Force.

No! You can’t keep using Dustil’s body. This is wrong. This is so wrong—and Carth. Gods, what he must think…. Even as her thoughts scattered, his words sank in.

“Plague that… I unleashed? You really think I did this?”

The plague had killed Oerin Lin. It had killed others in the Underground too; although Revan had scarcely paid attention to the newsvids. So much of it was Malachi’s propaganda, and then…the last few weeks, there had been no need.

No need for news in a galaxy that only had two people in it.

Malak’s laughter was dark. “No. I did it. I did it for you. You sent me to Manaan to oversee production. Plague and your false vaccine. But I never took your false cure. No one under my command took it, Revan. You tried to destroy me with a formula from your damned computer and you failed. Pestilence to weed out the weak—and the strong. Your plots were always so obvious.”

His face twisted, pale and wrong with Dustil’s features. “I thought that was all behind us now. I never dreamed you’d bring it here.”

“I didn’t bring it here!” Her hand reached out and he froze in mid-step. Comical, the way Dustil’s body tilted back and forth, if this wasn’t so deadly serious.

Malak stood frozen, glaring at her—until she remembered to unfreeze his mouth.

“No. Arca brought the plague here,” Malak said. “On your orders? You don’t remember how it was. That cabal of mad Sith.” His voice softened slightly, even as he teetered and almost fell, his own training keeping him upright. “Lucky you.”

“Then tell me,” she said. Her fingers flexed, and the Force relaxed around him. He stumbled on his feet, and immediately started walking again. “Tell me everything.”

“Aren’t you going to find out when you take back your memories?” He laughed and grabbed her hand, now pulling her along. When she pulled away from him, he reached out and touched her hair, feather-light. Those eyes that were Carth’s son’s looked at her and then looked away fast.
Malak never laughed. Everything was so deadly serious. Our lives were so deadly serious. We never had the chance to be anything except serious—

“Yes,” she promised, resigned now. “If I did this, I have to fix it. I’ll take back the memories. But before I do, you have to let the boy go. Please.”

“Red.” Malak’s voice was oddly gentle. “No.” For a moment her vision blurred and he didn’t look like Carth’s son at all. “Some things you can’t fix.”

XXX

Around them, the remaining Wookies drooped. The one called Freyyrr was still growling at Nico, waving his arms, but everyone else, like her, was simply exhausted. At least Nico was speaking Basic finally. That made Lena want to kill him a little less. Even if they’d been sitting at this feast table on the landing platform on Kashyyyk now for hours.

“That is a fascinating story about why the Durian homeworld should become a fused plain of glass, but why did you retrieve my prison, Lord Revan? You still haven’t said.”

Mission’s image blurred back into one that Lena thought she recognized from a newsvid: a figure, robed and masked. “Error: No such information exists. Indexing suggestions corruption of files. Marked hazardous to sentient life.”

Nico, (she was not going to start calling him T’chhh-whatever), laughed. “Corrupted files. Ah, well. Dantooine: acknowledge.”

The voice that had sounded like Mission, and then Revan shifted to something metallic and dead. “Acknowledged.”

“Commence repair of Kashyyyk installation.”

There was a pause. “Connecting now. Complete wipe and reboot will be necessary to initiate repairs. Are you sure you want to perform the action at this time?”

“You fracking—!” That voice was all Mission. “No! Lena! Your husband is a huttspawned piece of poo-doo, bantha shit!”

“Nico?” Lena reached across the table and put her hand on his arm. “What are you doing?”

“We need peak efficiency to cure the kolto, my love.” Nico frowned. “I have to link all of the functional installations under one sentient body. This one is will not do.” His t’chin tapped the table. “Sad, because Revan is so interesting, but the data’s corrupted. It needs a wipe.”

The computer barked and growled furiously, almost drowning out his words.

Cock of a bowcaster, levelled at her husband’s face. Freyyrr’s lips drew back in a snarl and he growled something, low in his throat.

“Nico!” Lena covered her mouth with her hand. “Mission! Don’t!”

The computer barked again.

The Wookiee’s head turned towards her. Its bowcaster shifted, tilted down, until it was pointing straight at her still-flat stomach.

XXX
“What do I need to do?” Sheris’s voice was shaking. Nervous in her own ears. Nothing of bells ringing in it at all.

“Meditate,” the other voice said. Her voice, her other master. The one in shadow. “Let your mind become an empty cup. Just let go, child. As you did long ago. As you did when Imra died at Malachor.”

Sheris smiled hesitantly. For some reason, she remembered Vrook, and what he’d said about her family back on Hoth. How much they wanted to see her.

If you wanted to see me so much, you shouldn’t have sold me to the Jedi, Mother. Not if you really cared.

She wondered if she would remember them—after. She wondered if she would still care after. About them. About Oerin. About Malak. About anyone.

Why care, when she could be? Her fingers closed around the crystals. Sharp edges pricked her palms.

“Use the Force.” Something wistful in Atris’s voice. Longing.

She wishes it was her and not me. I’m so lucky.

XXX

“You have such potential for empathy, Padawan Sheris.” Master Imra, smiled gently. “It will make you an excellent healer. It’s why I chose you, as my Padawan.”

“I’m glad. I want to fix things,” Sheris told her. “Sometimes I feel it’s my des—”

XXX

Corporal Jiya Sand’s face. Kindly deceptive, the traitorous deserter. Hair iron-gray and receding. His weathered features shifted, and blurred, seen through a haze of blue. Next to him, a dark-haired woman, little more than a child.

An important child.

Success! We’ve captured Shan. Her and Corporal Sand. I can make her perform his execution—

The world tilted. It felt like she was floating. Reaching for the Force and hitting a blank wall. Like she was wearing a—

Neural band. Who would dare?

Sand’s lips moved. He turned his back, walking away, hazed in blue.

Something cold on her skin. Like gel. Tubes down her throat. She’d had injuries like this before. Altair. Iridonia. Yu-Phaedra, when they needed her groundside to draw the Mando’ade into that hospital—but no one had ever curbed her with a neural band. No one would dare.

Star Forge tanks are much more efficient. We should have returned already. Why here now? Inefficient.
Jiya Sand deserted me. In the end his loyalty proved false. Like so much of the Fleet. Fools.

She preferred the company of nulls, but you couldn’t trust them because you couldn’t control them. Logic failed, compared to the Force and absolute loyalty.

Careful. That’s how Tenebrae thinks. Idiot Scourge thinks like that. My old master Kae. That’s the dark side. But it doesn’t matter because it works. The dark side works.

A convulsion, like screaming, her lungs choking. Limbs flailing against the transparisteel, shatterproof tank. Anger. So sweet in her mouth.

Shatter. Shatterpoints. This is one. Here. [[Notation.]]

The yellow blade flashed and spun, propelled by the earnest Padawan who would be dead a thousand times by now if she wasn’t potentially so useful.

Almost bored, Revan waited for the next pathetic attack. Her own double blade was still in her hands. Not even lit.

“You can’t win.” Her own voice. Flat. Pointing out the obvious. Why even bother.

Behind the girl, corpses of the more useless Jedi. Necessary refuse.

Irritation. Irritation at all of this. The Jedi were wasting her time. She’d let them board to get Bastila Shan, and now it was done.

Jedi wasting her time, when she needed to kill Malak.

Her head turned away from the girl, towards the viewscreen. Leviathan’s expanse filled it the entire view. Their ships were aligned, on her orders: bridge to bridge. Cameras displaying his image, even as his ship’s recorders watched hers. Holocams everywhere. One final show for the old man, for the Coruscanti inheritance laws.

Lord Revan raised her hand, readying the command to fire. Adratus nodded. Always loyal to a fault. Good man. She preferred the company of nulls now, even if you couldn’t trust—

Something flashed in her eyes. Something broke. Something exploded, so fast her personal Force shields barely had time to activate. Something slammed into her, knocking her backwards. Her head hit the deck with a shattering crack.

White and yellow light. Stars. Scream of vacuum from a hull breech. Fainter screams of her crew, those too slow to activate their magtreads in time. Even with eyes closed, Revan saw the strike from behind: a yellow blade flashed and she rolled away, turned away from the sonic blast even as it screamed through her shield, upended her, sending gravity and reason tumbling. Magtreads failed.

The yellow blade stabbed. Something gave in her guts, burning, like cold fire. Like stars.

Malak. Malak shot first. He dared—?

Shatter. Shatterpoints. This is two. Here. [[Notation.]]

Her hands beat against the walls of the tank, her mouth opened, and the sour taste of bac and kolto choked her lungs.

Blue light radiated from something the Padawan held. Bastila Shan. The girl was standing next to Sand. Standing next to Sand and she was holding something—something small, square, gleaming.

Crystalline. Holocron. Why. Who dared give prisoners knowledge of the holocrons—

The holocron, spun, opening, in front of her face. Its rays touched when they burned.

Shatter. Shatterpoints. This is three. Here. [[Notation.]]

Rage so sweet that it burned like brandy in the back of her throat. Blood in her nose and mouth, filling her mask; and then cold air on her face. Large blue eyes, young eyes, looking into hers with an expression of fear—and a terrible fascination.

Something enveloped her like a blanket, or like chains.

Revan tried to slip away in darkness, but the voice kept screaming: "Malachor—Mal—I—"

His face. His small face, soft in sleep. Red curls.

XXX

She screamed. Shrill and echoing, lungs choking on air, not kolto. Her head jerked up, her lungs seized, gasping. The air smelled wrong. Too rich, too open. Too sweet. Not a ship’s air at all.

Blue light, yellow—the pain. The taste of bacta.

Her breath rushed out of her lungs, and she staggered, hands clenched around something, as if gravity itself had changed. Everything was abruptly heavy. Dimmed, somehow, like a wall between her and the Force.

I’m not here. Where am I?

Her hands were clasped around the hilt of her saber, smooth and round—

Her hands beat against the tank, and she was trying to scream—

No. Her hands were clasped around something sharp and square, with edges that cut her fingers and bled.

She dropped the thing, the thing that hurt, and its pieces shattered on the floor. She ground the offending object under the heel of her boots. She lifted her hands, checking them for damage. One of her palms was bleeding, laced with a hundred tiny cuts. The other was not. But it was also not flesh. It was made of some gold metal, fashioned like a hand. She flexed the fingers, and they bent under her will. She looked down. The boots were wrong too. Brown and soft. She had been wearing black ones before. She had been armored and masked. Now, the air smelled familiar, cool on her naked face, and her robes were light beige.

Shatterpoints. The thought was foreign, alien. As if it had been forced into her mind. This is one, too. This is the final one—

Her head jerked up.

A woman. A woman was sitting at a desk. Sitting at a desk and staring at her. White hair. Pale.
Pale as ice, pale as Hoth.

A woman she knew, as mad as that was in this place that was impossible. She knew the room too. It hadn't changed. All that had happened and the Archivist’s quarters on Coruscant hadn’t changed at all.

“Atris.” She closed her eyes.

Malak shot first. He must have won.

Not exactly the afterlife Revan expected.

Master Atris’s voice. “Knight Revan.”

Knight Revan. I’m a Jedi Knight in my afterlife? She opened her eyes. Atris was still there.

It had been so long since anyone had… presumed to call her a Jedi Knight that Revan started to laugh.

XXX

There were so many explosions somewhere that it sounded like Isuop had left the portaplayer on high again.

Grandfather would be furious.

It was very dark, but Korrie wasn’t in bed. He was in a small space that kept rocking, back and forth, and he wasn’t exactly sure how that had even happened.

There had been breakfast. And then meditation class. A lot of the others were whispering about a sickness in the Temple. A lot of people were getting really sick. Everything had kind of felt afraid, and he’d wanted his parents, even if Korrie knew better than to ask. They were fighting. They needed to make up. Then they’d come.

But then… how had he gotten into this box thing?

Something cut through the air above him, red and fast, like a laser bolt. Growing up Eg, you have to know all the different kinds of bolts. That was one of the bad ones. It made holes above in the box. Smelled like scorching.

Korrie wasn’t armed, and he wasn’t old enough, so he did the playdead that they had taught. He shut his eyes tight and tried to just count, waiting for the chaps and the guards to finish it. The box-thing he was in rocked back and forth. This could be a drill. Shelterinplace. The Egs had lots of those, even if the Jedi never bothered, since they were good fighters.

The only time anyone had ever really tried to kill him for real, Father had helped; but Father didn’t feel close right now. The box thing rolled a little, moving faster now, like it was sliding downhill. Above, a light circle where the blaster had gone in, scary. If Korrie dared, he could peek out that light circle and see.

Even as he thought about doing that, another one appeared right beside it. He tried to scrunch down farther.

The something jolted, really, really hard, and then he was tumbling, upside down. Upside down and sideways, and the dark thing he was in was obviously a box, because the corners were hard and square. His head bumped, but Korrie knew how to roll, and so he did.

Suddenly, the top popped open. And then he was staring at a yellow-haired lady holding a sword in her hand. Her other hand held out to him. “Get out.” She said, like she was in charge. “Can you run?”

“Pretty fast,” Korrie said. “Why?” He looked behind him, because when you were in danger, you always should. There was a crowd of people, and a shattered luggage crate with a picture of a fish on it. Lots of yelling. A man in an orange jacket grabbed his other arm, even as the yellow-haired lady took one. A bunch of CoruSec guards were charging at them.

The man and the woman stared at each other over his head.

“Korrie,” Mother’s husband Carth said. “Are you okay?”

“What happened?” He remembered, he’d had to pee, and then there’d been a shadow and it felt like he’d been stung by a botfly.

“I’ve got him,” Mother’s husband said.

“He’s Lin,” the lady said back. “We’ve got him.”

The man tapped a comm attached to his ear. “Speeder’s coming. She's going to get us out of here?”

“Revan?” The blonde woman snorted. “Did she finally come to sense?”

“No.” Mother's husband frowned down at Korrie. “Mission. I'm talking about Mission.”

So they were on a mission. Well. That didn't happen every day.

“Does this mean I get to help?” Korrie asked, but then there were more explosions and both of them were dragging him along a plat, right by the edge.

“Where's Mother again?” he added, just as Captain Onasi wrapped arms around him and pulled him up and—and then they jumped right off the plat.

He hadn’t thought it was possible, but just like in the vids, there was a speeder waiting below to catch them. An astromech droid was in the front seat, plugged into the console like it was driving.

“Simple!” It said, in a girl’s voice. “You totally don't need the Force for a stunt like that. I just calculated the angle of your descent and the velocity and matched—”

Korrie was so surprised it took him a second to realize his knee was bent to the side and almost backwards. He stared at it, dumbfounded.

Then the pain hit, and he started to scream.

XXX

“Please,” Lena whispered. “Don’t. You can't kill me.”

“No,” Revan’s voice said. “I can't, but Freyyrr will if I tell him to.”

Nico’s eyes were wide and startled. And strangely—helpless. He whispered something in the language that wasn’t and the computer rattled off something back, using Mission’s clear consonants to say nothing but gibberish.
“This isn’t everything.” Oerin sighed, creak of chest cavity. His breath smelled bad.

Davad frowned. “You wanted the armor? That’s the armor.”

“The helm? It’s missing the visor?” How could Mother’s Dark Apprentice be so careless? “The mask of the Mandalore?”

“There are at least a dozen of those floating around on this planet alone,” Davad said. “Buy another one at auction.”

“My face,” Oerin snapped. Everything hurt. He’d put on the rest of the armor, but everything still hurt. “I need to hide it, remember?”

“That’s why I brought this.” Davad pulled out a leather mask, goggled, with a round opening for a breathing tube. “Gand, I think. Much less conspicuous than the mask of the Mandalore.”

“I brought your lightsaber too,” he added, handing it over. “And this knife. It looked old. I thought it might be sentimental or ceremonial?”

“No.” Oerin was strangely glad to have it back anyway. “I just use it to cut my meat.”

“I’m starving.” Davad said. “Speaking of.”

The man always was. Oerin had watched him put away two kilos of nerf steaks once, back on Manaan. The chef droid had barely been able to keep up.

“We’re in a kitchen.” An empty one, except for the two droids they’d deactivated and the one unconscious Knight, that Oerin had knocked out with a practical blow to the skull. (That way no one would suspect Force users had been here.)

Davad was already rummaging through one of the vast, walk-in fridges.

Oerin stood there, patiently decaying and waiting. It was so strange, not needing to breathe. He kept trying to do it anyway.

Suddenly, the alarm went off: splitting through the air, and echoing in the Force.

“Does that mean they found my body missing?” Oerin called out.

Davad came out, holding a large round of ched. His mouth was full of something and he had to swallow before he could answer. “I don’t know. Seems like a lot of trouble for one dead Mandalorian.” He frowned at the unconscious Jedi at their feet and then looked up at Oerin again. “Still, perhaps we should take our leave now. There’s a supply dock on this level, leads to an underground garage. Vik showed me once, back when… when we were young.”

“I’m forever young,” Oerin pointed out. The food made him feel nauseous. He put them helmet on. Played hell with his peripheral vision.

Davad snorted. “There’s the upside. I’m not. Ever since Malachor, I’ve felt—”

Then it came, like a sonic boom in the Force. Like a scream. Like a wave of pure light, encompassing a star, scorching a planet below. Wordless. Rage. Loss. Echoing and hammering against anyone with a scrap of Force sense in its planetary radius.
“By the Egg,” Davad said. “I forgot she could do that.”

“Pure Force,” Oerin muttered. His own gifts were not inconsiderable, but relied heavily on lies. “Do you think she's sad about my death?”

“No,” David’s voice was grim. “I think something just happened. Something bad. Maybe to her son. Malachor.”

Now that he mentioned it, that was the name echoing in the Force. Malachor, malachor, malachor. Over and over again. Like the death of a world. Like a memory of what Oerin had felt before, with Mother, when they'd felt the world die.

“We need to go. Now.” Mother or his own intuition. Not fear. Not fear of Revan. She was powerful, but easy to shape, as Mother had shown. Mostly easy. Easy enough. Well. At least… easy when they had shared the same goals. Or maybe the original Revan had been more tractable.

Or maybe Mother was insane. Couldn’t she have found Oerin a nice body like Malak had gotten, instead of this husk?

Davad picked up the haunch of some beast from one of the smokers by the exit.

“At least wrap a towel around that,” Oerin told him. “Put it in a sack or something.” He really did feel sick.

And it was a pity about the child. Oerin had liked him.
Chapter 32 / And We Were Sharp, As Sharp As Knives

I’m one with the Force. It’s over. The laughter in her throat bubbled, almost tangibly real. I’m one with the living Force and it’s showing me a vision of Atris.

Ironic, like the rain on the open-aired plaza on Rakata Prime, the day the Lords of Thule and Ziost had pronounced her and Malak Dark Lords of the Sith.

“Revan,” Master Atris repeated. “Please. Will you sit down?”

Revan stopped laughing. “This is a… Force vision?”

That would explain the ghostly figure she saw standing behind Atris, hovering in and out of sight like a bad holorecord. Gray robes, hooded, head down, just a glimpse of hair nearly as pale as Atris’s own….

Revan blinked and the woman was gone.

Maybe I’ve just gone insane. Maybe this is some Tenebrae-spawned vision. Some of the pawns I tortured said their minds dreamed, while he used their bodies.

But everything felt too solid for a dream. She looked down at her robes again. Padawan beige, the fabric scratchy and thick in her still-bleeding hand. When she tilted her head, something soft fell across her skull. Her hand reached up and felt the weight of hair. Braided and coiled down her back. It had been years since she’d worn it like this.

Time. Maybe this is some kind of time slip. Maybe I’ve gone back in time—She stared at her hand. Pale, and unmarked by Sith corruption. A ring on one finger, stamped with an old seal. The part of her mind that knew such things catalogued it automatically. Krin, subclan of Wies.

Why am I wearing it? When did I lose my other hand?

For a disorienting second, neither of her arms felt like hers at all. Why would my mind give me an injury I never had? She’d had a scar on the arm that was metal now; just a long line of red, a place from a clumsy blade that still wasn’t healed, even if the injury had been weeks ago. The injury itself had been nothing, inconsequential; a scratch from a duel with some lordling of Thule. But it hadn’t healed.

That was the danger of the dark side—things were harder to hold together, things wanted to fall apart.

Was the arm amputated?

“Perhaps you should sit,” Atris said gently.

Revan snapped her head, towards her. “No. Explain.” She hesitated, not wanting to give away her confusion, admit any weakness. Had she gone back in time? Or if this was some kind of trap? Her hands fell to her waist. She wasn’t even armed. “What do you want?”
Edge of the Force there. Commanding Force users became so much easier than nulls, even if their lack of free will became tiresome.

Atris’s breath hissed in sharply. Her face seemed to pale, but she did not spit out the answers as she should have, immediately compliant. “I think you should sit down for this, my old friend.”

We were never friends. You turned your back with all the rest. You and Kavar, refusing to join our struggle. You were never a friend, you were only useful. All of this collected knowledge, a wealth of it wasted on Jedi platitudes… we begged for your help and you turned away.

Suddenly, she was entirely disoriented. Revan found herself sitting down on the bench next to the desk. Her foot brushed against the broken thing on the floor, the thing that had cut her fingers. She looked down. Fragments of crystal, fragile and faceted. Most of it was crushed to powder, but a few pieces were intact enough to see the shape that the whole had been.

A broken holocron.

I was holding a holocron. A holocron like the one Bastila Shan had, in my vision. That blue light, searing into my brain—seeking, probing… recording.

And then—then it was all suddenly, terribly clear. This wasn’t the afterlife at all. “You Jedi tried to reprogram me. Altering my old memories.” She laughed. “As if the example of Nomi Sunrider proved nothing. And you called us rash.”

If this is really real and not some fear plucked from my head by that damned Emperor.

“Revan,” Atris’s voice was gentle. “I only want to help you.”

“You didn’t help us before.” If this was real and she was alive, then Malak had to be dead. He would never let me live incapacitated. One of us or the other. Her face tightened as she tried not to show any emotion. If this was real and Malak was dead and she was really on Coruscant now, then—

Don’t. Don’t think of him. Enough time has passed, he’s stopped thinking of you. What’s the life of one child against a billion, empires full of little lives….

Revan bent down, reaching for one of the fragments. If they were her memories, then some of them were of him.

“I wouldn’t,” a voice whispered. Female. Not Atris. Familiar, like an echo in her head. “Sentiment and confusion will not serve you in this place. Keep your wits about you here. You will need them.”

The voice was—familiar, like a whisper in her skull. Feminine.

Not the Emperor. Not unless this is some kind of trick—

Revan jerked her head up, but only Atris was there, still staring at her.

“Revan,” Atris repeated. The smile didn’t work on her face, like a terentatek trying to be kind. “I-I know. I saw some of what you experienced. I know about Tenebrae, and the Sith Empire, and what you did to stop him.”

Revan laughed again. “From my holocron? The memories you stole?” Her hair was long, and it had been almost entirely gone before. How long have I been unconscious? What lies did my holocron tell—that made you believe I would serve Jedi?” She stood up, and swept the desk clear.
with a wave of her hand. Datapads and artifacts crashed to the ground. It was amusing to see Atris flinch. “Bringing me here, to the heart of the Republic?” She scoffed. “Apparently, Jedi are still fools.”

“A fool is one who refuses an open hand offered. The Echani seeks an alliance. Will you cast her aside?”

Revan shook her head sharply. “Silence, Voice!”

“Revan,” Atris began again. “I only want to help—”

The scream in the Force came out of nowhere. Out of nothing. Only one word.

Malachor.

XXX

“Mission!” Lena felt all the muscles in her stomachs clench, as if trying to protect the child within.
“Please!”

“He wants to kill me.” The figure on the holoscreen looked like Revan, Dark Lord of the Sith still, but it sounded just like Griff’s little sister, voice suddenly high and scared. “If he reboots Kashyyyk, he’ll kill me. I can’t let that happen.”

The computer paused. “I’m sorry, sis.”

Nico rattled off some more gibberish. He wasn’t even looking at her. Why wasn’t he even looking at her?

The computer spat back something that sounded like gurgling underwater.

“Nico!” Lena kicked him hard on the table, aiming for the choobs. Her foot missed, but connected with his knee. “Speak Basic!”

A hundred hells on Ryloth if she was going to die not even knowing if her husband wanted to save her or not.

“Lena.” At least now he was looking at her. “I’m sorry, my love. We’re… negotiating. What she wants is completely unreasonable.”

“She’s a kid, Nico.” A kid with a pet Wookiee threatening to kill Lena’s own child. “And I know her. She wouldn’t hurt me. It’s a bluff.”

“Lena!” Mission’s expression twisted. “I am not a kid!” Her voice changed, barking several commands in Shyriiwook. Suddenly, there were several more bowcasters pointed at Lena.

“What do you want, Mission? Tell me—not him.” Lena tried to make her voice sound reasonable, tried to not sound afraid.

Mission would never hurt me. And maybe this computer isn’t her, but it’s acting exactly like she did, when Griff and I told her we were leaving Taris. She threatened to shoot me then too.

“I want access to the nets.” The girl’s image looked almost sulky. Her t’chun twisted around her neck. “To my people on Coruscant. Revan—the real one—she needs me.”

“Why can’t she have that, Nico? Why can’t you work with the kolto together?”
“Organic minds are unpredictable,” her husband said. “Unstable. She won’t work with the other planets. She has her own agenda.”

“So do I,” Lena snapped. “And my agenda involves surviving this.”

“Tell Lena the other thing you asked for,” her husband said.

“You have to give the Wookiees at least one or two star systems,” Mission snapped. “And complete autonomy on all of their worlds.”

“Autonomy within their boundaries,” Nico said. “Not outside. But tell her the other thing.”

“Credits.” Her voice was flat. “I want lots of them.”

“Lena’s in charge of capital.” Now he looked at her, then back at the holo. “Stop dodging the issue.”

“A body.” Mission Vao’s holoimage smiled. “It doesn’t have to be exactly like my old one. Just real. I want to be alive again.”

Freyyrr growled something that sounded like a question.

Lena’s hands went involuntarily to her own abdomen.

XXX

“It really, really hurts!” Korrie was trying to be brave and not cry, but it did really, really hurt. And his leg looked funny. And somewhere he could feel Mother too, and Father, a little. They were very, very worried that he was hurt. Mother was a lot louder, yelling his name in the Force over and over again.

I’m here. He thought back at her.

For a second, that made her quieter, but then she got loud again, demanding things like: Where? Where?

In the air? I don’t know. It’s okay, it just hurts, he thought at her. I jumped and I think my leg got broke. Captain Onasi is here too.

Mother’s thoughts kind of stopped for a second. Then they sort of… got quiet. Like she was keeping them under a pillow after lights out.

Korrie was worried too, but they were still in the speeder, speeding somewhere.

“It’s okay, Korrie.” Mother’s husband was holding him while the yellow-haired lady pulled out a knife and cut the fabric of his pants, bending the leg around and making it hurt even more.

Korrie bit his lip to stop from yelling.

“Has no one ever taught you to fall properly?” The woman looked down, wind whipping through her hair, and chucked his chin, like he was a baby. “You must relax all of your limbs. Bend your legs and try to roll. “After this leg heals, you must practice.” She fished around in her pocket and jabbed Korrie with something. “When you are grown to fall from sky, you will need to be graceful.”

The pain that had been taking over everything stopped hurting almost a-sap. Korrie breathed a sigh
“Why would I want to fall from the sky?”

“Gwenarius,” Captain Onasi said. “Your comm is ringing.”

“So it is!” She frowned, and thumbed it on. A gruff voice started talking in a different language. Not one of the ones Korrie knew. He caught the word “maffa” a few times, which was a word Grandfather used when he was cursing.

“This is insane,” Captain Onasi muttered. “You know that, right?”

The yellow-haired woman just rolled her eyes. “Canderous says he’s managed to reach D’Reev. We are expected.” She raised her voice slightly and looked at the droid. “100 Thantos Three. Do you know the way?”

The speeder swooped up, a little, dodging some traffic going the other way. “On it!,” the T3 said, swiveling its dome around like it was looking at them.

“There’s some trouble with the CoruSec guards,” the woman—Gwenarius—added. “They tried to detain Xarga for shooting one of them. They’re asking them to surrender their weapons.” She laughed, as if that was funny. “And the Jedi have come out of their hiding place—several of them, approaching the protestors in the square—”

“I got it,” Captain Onasi said. Then he said something else in that language to her, like he was showing off that he got it.

The woman said something back, and then both of them were talking and Korrie couldn’t understand a word.

“Canderous?” Now that his leg didn’t hurt, Korrie could actually think. “The Mandalorian that married my mother?”

“Of course.” Gwenarius frowned at Captain Onasi. “We are all Mandalorians here. I don’t know what those Jedi have been teaching you, but it’s quite obvious you need better instruction.” She said something else in the language Korrie didn’t know, and the comm chattered back at her.

Father had been very, very plain about what he thought about Mandalorians, which was that they were evil, eviler even maybe than Father and Mother before they died.

“I am not one,” Korrie muttered, but under his breath. They said they were taking him to Grandfather, and Grandfather owned the Mandalorians now, (Korrie was pretty sure, since the other kids at the Temple said they worked for him and Mother was in charge of them), so this had to be (somehow) all okay—except for his broken leg.

But still… one second, he’d been taking a pee and the next second, he’d woken up in a box.

“You kidnapped me,” Korrie asked. “For Grandfather?”

“We lost one Lin to the plague already,” Gwenarius told him. “I told my husband, we could not afford to lose more. I told him your Grandfather had offered us a trade, for your return. At first my husband objected, but I made him see reason”

“Mother’s pretty mad.”
“I’m sure she will follow you, pup. Don’t worry.” Gwenarius smiled at him.

“I think she already is.” She was closer now. Father too.

“Just as well,” the Mandalorian said. “Can you speak back to them?”

Mother?

Nothing, just a feeling that she was a little closer.

Then another feeling. That she was mad.

XXX

A piece of burning plasta, probably from one of the Coruscant transports that the crowd had set upon launched overhead, crashing down in front of Canderous, just in front of the barricade.

In front of him, the nervous hired nannies of the Republic had given up all pretense of trying to take them into custody, and were now just trying to keep the crowd from storming the Jedi Temple.

Fighting off the CoruSec guards without killing them had been a worthy challenge, one that allowed Canderous to spend some time with his daughter and the other up-and-coming warriors of Ordo. Carr had made good use of the distraction, getting Malachor out of the way so they could really enjoy the battle—although judging from the expressions on the faces of their foes, the enjoyment was one-sided. Millifar had excellent aim, and wielded the stolen stun baton with the finesse of one born to the blade.

Canderous hadn’t felt so proud since Carefix had won his last blood in a glorious sacrifice, falling from the skies over Althir.

The pilot had done his part as well: gotten the boy away and safe. As soon as Gwenarius reported in, Canderous gave the order to fall back. It was harder to do, because a full-blown riot had erupted around their assault. Perhaps the soft, Core denizens thought the Mandalorians were fighting their battle for them, because many were pushing forward into the ground Canderous and the pups had cleared, swarming the Coruscant transports and pressing towards the entrance of the Jedi Temple itself.

The crowd was a beast now, untamed and unpredictable. Entertaining as it was to stun the guards, it was time to go, before their small band was swept away. Unarmed civilians had no business throwing themselves in front of blaster bolts, but if they were too dumb to realize that, it was probably his responsibility not to shoot them.

A year ago, you would have shot them, he thought to himself. Hanging out with Jedi pacifists is making you soft.

Jedi pacifists. He felt his teeth pull back in a smile. The joke never got old.

Canderous was still grinning as he motioned for the kids to fall back, behind him, melting into the crowd. One-by-one they did, tucking their stolen weapons away, and moving with an efficient grace that made his heart proud.

“Stop,” said her voice. The word seemed to echo everywhere, until Canderous could feel it in his guts.
Around him, everything did stop.

_Blasted Force-users. Interfering hu’tuun._

A hush rippled through the crowd, spreading, until everyone was silent and still.

Canderous realized he’d lowered his own weapon too.

Revan pushed through the now-silent crowd, her face a mask of cold fury, heading straight towards him. Behind her trailed Darth Malak in Carth’s son’s body. Malak’s lightsaber was out and blazing blue—as if no one in the Jedi had sense enough to disarm the Sith ghost possessing one of their own.

Of course, they were Jedi. They relied on Force powers instead of common sense. As if to prove the point, a whole herd of them appeared at the gate, hovering behind Revan and Malak, like they still needed their Jedi Knights to fight their battles for them.

“What have you done?” Revan hissed.

Canderous nodded at her. “What I had to do. This place is a tomb. It’s no place for a child of Lin. Or for you.”

“Malachor’s hurt.” Her eyes were narrowed to slits. “I think his leg is broken.”

He was? Gwen hadn’t mentioned it. Couldn’t be very bad. “The Jedi weren’t gonna let anyone leave,” he pointed out. “They had us fenced in like nerf. Now, we’re free.”

Whispers now, as the crowd around them milled, confused. Space around them widened, as if no one was willing to approach or fire upon Revan and Darth Malak in Carth’s kid’s body.

“Give the order to bring Malachor back. Now!” Malak’s blade raised, as if his threats had meat. “Now.”

“No,” Canderous said flatly. “We lost one member of Lin already.” He tried to soften his voice, attempting reason. “We won’t leave him alone with D’Reev, but he’s safer there. This place….”

his voice trailed off. He couldn’t articulate what was so bad about the Temple, it was nothing he could see or shoot. “Oerin’s dead,” he added. His voice roughened, with the grief he’d been trying to keep at bay. “I don’t want to lose you too, Revan. You, or your son.”

Revan blinked. “Oerin died so fast. This sickness….”

“He keeps saying that I did this. I made this… plague.” Revan’s head turned and she glared at the ghost in Carth’s son’s body. Her hand twisted and his lightsaber deactivated.

The wraith glared at it, and then back at her. His hand moved as if he was trying to switch it back on.

Revan’s teeth pulled back in a grin and she shook her head.

Canderous snorted. “He says you made this plague? What did I say about giving yourself too much credit?”

“What did we learn about trusting anything Mandalorians say?” Malak snapped.
“Revan,” one of the Jedi called out. That old woman, the one who had met them at the spaceport was walking towards them. “Is the child safe?”

“For now,” Revan muttered. She looked back at the flock of Jedi, lips curling with natural disdain.

Another brown-robe pushed through their ranks. Red hair, braided like a bad imitation of a proper woman’s sand display. She looked like one of those copies of Revan they’d seen on Manaan. This one shoved Yuthura Ban aside and started towards them, as arrogant and heedless as Revan herself.

“Malachor?” The red-haired woman stopped dead, staring at them. Perhaps the sight of an angry mob (even a Force-silenced one) frightened her, because all the color seemed to drain from her face. Next to the real Revan, she looked like a pale shell.

“I—I heard—” She looked past him, frowning at Revan. This close together, Canderous could note the differences. Revan’s copy was younger, her face unseasoned by honorable scars of her experience. She looked half-formed and ill-baked. “I heard her. In the Force.” Her brows drew together in a frown and her head tilted as she stared at the ghost inhabiting Carth’s son. “We all heard,” she said quickly, glancing back at the Jedi behind them. “We all heard her cry out in the Force.”

“It’s none of your business, Sheris,” Revan snapped. She glanced at the crowd behind them. “Leave,” she muttered.

Canderous felt his own feet twitch. Most of the civilians started to drift away, whether compelled or frightened, wasn’t entirely clear.

Revan’s duplicate made a sound that almost sounded like a laugh, deep in her throat. “Where is the child?”

“He was hurt, but he’s fine now. They’re taking him to my father,” Malak told her.

“Your father…?” she echoed, brows raising. “Malachor was abducted and now he’s fine?”

“Stop pretending you care,” Revan snapped.

The two women stared at each other. Unsurprisingly, it was Sheris who looked away first, her gaze dropping to the ground. For a second, she even looked like she might kneel. “I just want to make sure your son is safe, Lord Revan.”

“Don’t call me that!” Revan’s hand twitched.

Her duplicate swallowed, putting a hand to her throat. “Apologies,” she murmured. “I mean, Knight Revan.”

Revan snorted. “Stay away from my son. I told you already, if you want Malak, you’re welcome to him.”

“Malak?” Sheris looked up warily, frowning at Carth’s son as if she’d never seen him before. Maybe she hadn’t. Jedi. They could work this out on their own time. Canderous just wanted to leave with Revan now.

“Red.” The expression the wraith was making on the Onasi kid’s face looked like a mixture of impotent rage and regret. The man was a thermocrete detonator about to blow. Not for the first time since he’d found out, Canderous wondered if he shouldn’t just do the galaxy a favor and cut the kid’s throat. But he knew what it was like to lose a son. Whether they died in a blaze of glory, or pathetically like Lin, it was still a hard loss for a father to bear. If he could spare Republic that, he would.

“Is it? I’m glad Carth and Canderous had your permission to kidnap my son,” Revan sneered.

One of those infernal holocams buzzed up, soon followed by a flock of them. From the commotion among the still-staring crowd, HoloNet reporters couldn’t be far behind. The comm on his wrist had been buzzing for a while now—presumably Gwen was sending the speeder back for the rest of them. “Revan,” Canderous muttered. “This is our chance to get the hell out of here.”

“No,” Revan shook her head sharply. “I need to know. You need to bring Korrie back to me, or I swear, I’ll send HK after Ordo next.”

“No” Sheris muttered, like an echo. She frowned. “Korrie?”

“Go,” Malak said to Revan. He touched her arm. “You go, Red. Your damned plague… maybe he is safer with my father. He’ll be safer still there if you’re there.”

“No,” Revan shook her head. “I can’t trust you—and I can’t trust her.” She shot another glare at the duplicate. “If I don’t use the holocron, she will.”

Sheris’s head tilted, looking for all the world like Revan did when she was playing chess with Lin. “If it would put you at ease, I could go with… him?” She darted a quick glance at Onasi’s kid, as if she couldn’t believe Malak was in his body either. “Malak.”

“I don’t want you near my son,” Revan snapped.

“That’s why you hid his existence from me,” the woman agreed. “For a… time. But… surely now—since I seem to know already?” She glanced back at the Jedi, standing there watching them, frowning at the holocameras hovering above. “Since everyone seems to know…?”

“It’s none of your business,” Revan repeated. But a frown traced between her brows.

“Revan,” Canderous repeated. “Let’s get the hell out of here.”

She looked at him, looking like for all the world she wanted to. But then she looked back—not at Malak, but at the pale imitation the Sith had made of her. “I don’t trust her,” she said slowly.

“Sheris is harmless. I’m coming too,” Darth Malak said.

That’d make it easier to throw you off a high plat, Canderous thought wistfully. But the pilot. And being a Force user, frack if it would even work. Malak could probably bounce or fly or something.

“I don’t trust you either,” Revan muttered.

Malak gave a harsh laugh. “Same old Red.”

Her eyes narrowed and she looked at her double again and then at Malak. “I’m leaving alone. Watch Sheris,” she commanded him. “Don’t let her take the holocron. I’ll deal with Carth. And the Mandalorians. And your father. Understand?”
“Like you dealt with Arca?” the wraith snapped. “And us?” As if he had a right to speak. Marriage ended with the body’s release.

Revan’s eyes were unreadable, but there was no mistaking the threat in her voice. “After I see to my son, I’ll tell you about us, Mal.”

“Revan.” Canderous touched her arm. “Let’s go.”

Holocameras flashed, tracking their every move.

_Nine hells._

At this point, Canderous was even used to them.

XXX

_So much for the Jedi quarantine._

Yuthura watched as Sheris returned with Darth Malak in the Onasi boy’s body. Incredibly, Revan was getting into a scooter with Canderous Ordo and several other Mandalorians. The lot seemed hardly more than children.

The guards, along with some of the Jedi, were dispersing the crowd. The plaza was almost empty now, just littered with the debris of the riot.

“Where is Vrook?” she asked the white-haired woman beside her.

Master Atris blinked. “I don’t know.” She looked slightly dazed. Maybe even ill herself. “I was… meditating in my chambers alone when I heard Revan’s scream in the Force.”

Although she’d had the Korriban flu years ago, Yuthura still took a step back, just in case.

_Not all the masters know this is Darth Malak. But enough do. Enough that they should stop him._

But something was off, like a shadow in the Force. Watching the boy who should have been Dustil Onasi approach them, walking next to the false copy of Revan Starfire, Yuthura felt that even more intensely.

“You have to destroy the holocron,” Darth Malak called out to Atris. “Trust me, there’s nothing in her mind we need to know.”

“That’s a matter for the Council,” Atris told him. “As are you, Knight Malak.”

“Why?” Sheris asked. “Why does this holocron of yours need to be destroyed?”

Atris frowned at her. “Do you still want to take her memories?”

“Revan’s memories?” Sheris giggled. It sounded choked, as if she had forgotten how. “Do you think I should?” Her lashes fluttered. Her head tilted to the side.

_Something was off. Something like a note out of tune._

_Your wife?” Sheris sounded scornful. “Aren’t you a little young for her?”_
His head turned towards her, frowning. “Do you think so?”

Sheris laughed again. The sound rang out, jagged and ugly in the suddenly nearly empty square.

XXX

Convincing the Rakatan Elders that she could return the Chosen One of their legends to them, if they let her into the ancient temple grounds, had been less complicated than Revan’s current circumstances.

Letting that creature go: that thing possessing her body, was one of the hardest things she had ever done—especially knowing it was going straight to her son, apparently accompanied by a Mandalorian escort from clan Ordo.

And, for reasons that were not at all clear, no Jedi seemed to object to the Mandalorian presence.

Malachor. So close. It made her eyes prickle with pathetic tears to think how close he was.

Apparently, the Emperor-spawned thing had stolen her strength, her child, and her husband’s loyalty, leaving Revan herself trapped inside Sheris. This is her body. Weak, pathetic Sheris.

All Revan could do now was try to look as meek and sickeningly coy as Sheris had. Dissemble, even as she trailed behind the boy who was… impossible as it was, Malak himself. A copy? Was he the only copy, or one of a thousand? Was the real Malak dead? Or was some Emperor-imposter in his body too?

Revan was doing her best to seem as helpless as the real Sheris had been. Perhaps she was not as good a liar as Atris, who seemed fully recovered from being knocked unconscious and having her lightsaber stolen; but she detected no suspicion from the Jedi. The weight of the lightsaber in Revan’s sleeve was reassuring. So was thinking of what she could do with Atris’s blade to these traitorous Jedi, who cowered around them all now, as if the Mandalorian wars had never happened, as if she hadn’t killed half of their Council at Malachor.

Here were the sad survivors. There was Kavar and Iridel. Klee. Quatra. Zez-Kai, and a host of others.

Not Vrook. Where is Vrook? It doesn’t matter. Don’t think of him.

There. Malak’s old master Jopheena, smiling so kindly, as if she’d never told them they were lost after they followed the Kashyyyk computer’s instructions to the cave on Dantooine. Next to her, Zhar, not even looking at her, his old Padawan. Even in this shell, she could stab him in the back as he had them with his betrayal—the day of their speech to the Senate. The day he’d promised to go before the Council and get their support; only to turn his back and run to Dodonna and Malachi instead.

“Patience. Before you take action, you must see how this was done. What else has been taken from you? Consider your actions, each step like a game of chess.”

That voice again, rattling in her head. Was it Atris? No. It was not but… it was familiar.

Revan should know—panic tightened in her throat that she did not.

You hide yourself from me, Voice.

“At the end of all things, Revan, I promise you will know. I do what is necessary.”
Malak glanced back at her with his boy’s eyes. “You don’t have to be afraid of me, Sheris,” he said, voice all wrong and gentle.

She tried to simper. “I’m not afraid. Master.”

The creature actually flinched. That was almost amusing.

“I think that’s enough excitement for one day,” Jopheena murmured. The Jedi surrounded them, encircled Revan and Malak like an escort of bantha around two krayt as they passed back into the Temple. As if listening to unseen orders (and perhaps they were), they all began to disperse, drifting off in groups of two and three, with the soft murmurs of pointless conversations.

“Sheris?” A purple Twi’lek in Knight’s robes touched her arm.

“Yes?” She tried to remember Sheris’s pathetic voice, a pale copy of her real one.

“You have some skill with healing,” the Twi’lek said. “Some of my former students from Korriban are very ill. If you could help in the infirmary—”

“I can’t heal,” Revan said automatically, remembering the last time she’d tried. She tried to catch Atris’s eye, but the Echani Jedi seemed preoccupied—or avoiding her gaze.

Do not look to that one for guidance. She has already forgotten her part in this. My gift to you, Revan. You are free—as these Jedi can never be. Atris remembers nothing. Choose carefully.

She refused to be rattled. The voice in her head, whispering its suggestions. Madness? Tenebrae? Her own conscience?

The voice wasn’t real. Maybe none of this was.

“Even without the Force, you have medical training, Sheris,” the Twi’lek continued, stubbornly, continuing to intrude, as if she was real.

Revan frowned, trying to sort out her words.

*Korriban. Students. The Academy. Which means she must be—

XXX

“My Padawan, Yuthura Ban.” Jorak Uln’s eyes already had the gleam of Sith madness they’d all grown to expect from the Republic deserters who sought them out.

In the first months after the war, there were many Jedi defectors, traveling in stolen ships beyond the Rim to rally behind the Sith cause.

“Master.” The woman curseyed, elaborate and graceful. She was dressed like a cantina dancer, but the way she wore her few strips of cloth, and the muscles under her lush curves, suggested her costume was one born of confidence in all things; not merely decoration for Uln’s gaze. There was a calculating light in those violet eyes that Revan approved of.

Useful, if she doesn’t get herself killed trying to supplant her master.

So many promising Sith died that way. The fools.

“I expect excellence,” Revan told them. “And speed. The Jedi spend decades letting the Force master them. You must train our students to be masters of their own power as quickly as possible.”
“Yuthura Ban,” Revan nodded at the woman. “I do have some medical training. Of course.” She smiled stupidly, and ducked her head like a simp. I know how to pack kolto around a rotting jaw. I know how to tell when some wounds can’t be healed—in the Force or in the flesh—or in the mind—

The combined Force in the Temple still felt like the prickling of tiny knives, every one a drag on her nerves. Instead of being able to block them out, they pushed at her, prodding her with dozens of petty wants. The Force was diminished inside of her, even as it had shone like a sun in the false Revan. That strength had shown her, even more than the sight of the woman’s face, what had happened.

She has my body. And I am trapped inside this shell. Why was it done? And who is she, this woman they all think is me?

The whisper in her was almost mocking. She is the shadow you hide within. Her power deafens. You, in your weakness, will hear as she cannot. Your weakness is your armor. She drowns out the world’s whispers but you can hear them all.

Irritation sparked. If you have something useful to say, Voice, just say it.

Silence. She laughed suddenly to clear it. Malak looked at her, startled.

“This plague is serious, Sheris,” Yuthura continued. “I have seen it before. On Korriban.”

Plague? Here? It’s not time. Not for at least another year—maybe two.

How long had it been, since the Jedi had stolen her memories? How long had this… creature been inhabiting her body?

Revan tried to laugh again, like Sheris would have, as if she was a minion. “Yes, the plague is very serious.” And necessary. “How is the vaccine being distributed on Coruscant?”

“Vaccine?” Yuthura lifted a brow ridge. “The one that was distributed on Korriban was rumored to cause the plague. A number of my students who were inoculated still suffered.”

“The vaccine reduces mortality to almost nothing in clinical trials.” Revan corrected her. “Or so I read. If we’re talking about the same plague.”

Malak glanced back at her, frowning. Those eyes of his were a dark brown, unreadable. His real ones had been transparent as glass. And he was so young. Hardly more than a child. “You had the sickness,” he said slowly. “On Ziost. Do you remember?”

“Was it Ziost?” she said lightly. It almost certainly hadn’t been. Oh, Mal. Still so transparent with your tests. “I was so delirious, I hardly knew where we were.”

“You don’t remember?” Dark eyes. Strong chin. Strong in the Force. If they had to be reborn in bodies, why did he get the stronger one?

“I remember our castle on Thule,” she murmured. Artful. The castle he’d hidden from her. The one Davad’s spies had unearthed.

Don’t think of the nursery there. All of Malachor’s toys, his rooms, recreated. Fit for a prince. Were you going to steal him from your father, my love? Have him cloned like a Senator’s son? Or just have more children with my broken reflection?

The rooms had never been used. Her spies were very sure of that.

Small mercy. The life of only one child. Only one small weakness.

“We don’t have the vaccine now,” the Twi’lek said. “This morning, I was told that three of my former students are very ill.” She paused. “One of them is Mekel Jin.”

Whoever that was. But the name was—almost familiar, as if Revan had known once. Roster lists. Students at the Academy. She tried to think through them.

“Mekel Jin is sick too? We’ll have to synthesize the vaccine immediately.” She tried to make it sound like a suggestion and not a command. “The dormant virus from the plague’s survivors should be effective to begin the culture.” She glanced at Malak out of the corners of her eyes, like Sheris would have. “Do you remember those Selkath on Manaan? Perhaps there’s still some of the old cultures, in their laboratories…?”

Malak’s hand closed over her arm, tightly. Too tightly.

Misstep? Sheris didn’t know that? But she had a medic’s training. Surely, he didn’t just have her lounging around doing nothing. I sent them to Manaan. Surely, he had her study the plague, oversee operations?

Unless it was already too late. Unless the Emperor had already corrupted him—

“You know, you are both survivors,” Yuthura said evenly. “Dustil Onasi was infected on Korriban.”

“Then we can use Dustil’s blood for the cure.” Revan paused. “And mine of course.” She glanced at Malak. He was still frowning at her. She gave her best imitation of Sheris’s sniveling grin. “We will—I mean, should we go to the infirmary? Immediately?”

XXX

“Damnit!” Polla hit the navboard, as if that would make it less smoked.

“You broke my ship,” Therion said, accusingly.

“That asteroid came out of fracking nowhere!” She adjusted Abasen to the other breast. He latched on like a champ, even though they were stuck in the middle of the Perelman Spiral, limping like a sick ronto ever since the hyperdrive failed. “And your ship is crap, D’Cainen. All flash and no guts. Have you never heard of deflector shields on the aft starboard side?”

“Sure, if I wanted to have her move like a pregnant hessi in moontime, I guess that might—”

“Guys.” Seiran interrupted. “We need to make repairs. Are any of those lights planets or space stations or… something?” He waved his hand at the fritzed board. The holographic display above was frozen, still stuck in position from the beginning of their jump.

“They’re not relevant.” Polla sighed. “We have to pull out the charts and do this manually.”

“Manually? You owe me a new ship,” Therion said. His eyes flashed with deep emotions, but now that Polla was an old, married lady and a mother of the most excellent baby ever, she was immune to wondering what they might be.

“When we found you, you were about to profit from our deaths,” she pointed out to him. “Think of how much more we’ll be worth alive.”

“Oh, I have,” he said darkly. “I’m thinking about it right now.”

“Don’t forget my da and I have enough to put you in a spice mine labor camp for the rest of your days too,” she reminded him.

“What’s that over there?” Seiran got up from his chair and pointed at the viewscreen.

“It’s a ship,” Therion said, rather obviously.

The great, battered hulk of it drifted closer. The ship was still thousands of kilometers away, but even at this distance, it blocked half their viewport. It was triangular and strange, a massive dreadnought built for war. Even at this distance, they could see the scars on its hull, cratered and bent. Its sign flashed on her comm board in abbreviated Aurebesh; but it was one she didn’t even have to check against the nets—she knew it by heart.

The Aleema. Revan Starfire’s flagship. But I thought it was decommissioned?

Her comm board blinked, flashing quickly, a string of codes, repeating over and over again.

“It’s hailing us,” Polla said numbly. “They want to know if we need assistance.”

“Should we respond?” Therion was looking at her, as if she fracking knew.

Their ship lurched before she could decide. “Tractor beam,” he ex added, as if that wasn’t obvious. “I guess they’re impatient.”

Abasen started to cry.

XXX

“Mother!” At least Malachor looked unharmed—if she ignored the plasticore wrapped around his leg, and the HK droid hovering next to him. Behind the droid lurked D’Reev, like a thundercloud on a bad plain.

“Where’s Carth?” Revan demanded.

“He left,” Korrie said. “After Grandfather came and the HK. He said he left you a note.”

He… left? The anger she’d been carrying inside deflated suddenly, leaving a strange emptiness in its wake. “He left a note?”

Korrie nodded. “He wrote it down again for you when he heard you were coming here. Maybe where he’s going is a secret and he didn’t want Grandfather to know?”

The old man chuckled, as if that was amusing. “Do we still have secrets between us, Revan?”

She met his eyes warily. “You tell me.”

“He knows about Father,” Korrie interrupted. “Master Klee told him.”

Of course. She wondered what she was supposed to feel. What she should think.
“Yesterday,” the old man added. “I had no idea before that.” He frowned. “Although it does explain a great deal about my encounters with the Onasi boy.”

She felt her lips pull back in a grim smile. “What are you going to do if Malak decides he wants your Senate seat?”

“What will you do, if he declares himself still your husband?” The old man’s expression reminded her uncannily of Malak, the man she could barely remember.

“Divorce is relatively simple,” she said. It was—at least on Deralia. You broke a stick, got a lawyer to write up a scrip, and went out and got drunk together. When Cousin Sara got her first one, the whole town had bought rounds.

“Relatively….,” the old man’s voice was bland. “But your custody arrangements might be somewhat complicated. They say Sheris is a genetic copy of you. So if she has any issue, would it be yours?”

“I had her sterilized,” Revan said. If I had a fracking brain, I would have. Does it matter if I really did or not? Malak would never—why should I care? She felt sick. How can I think like this?

“You’re fighting,” Korrie said, almost accusingly. He looked up at the Senator. “You promised not to fight with Mother.”

“We’re negotiating,” Malak’s father said. “HK, perhaps you should serve the tea.”

“Compliance,” the droid said. Its red eyes seemed to focus on Revan for a moment, before it glided away.

“How long until your leg heals, Malachor?” She forced her voice to be cheerful. Not to shake.

“The medic said a whole week!” At least Korrie sounded excited about it. “That means I miss training, right?”

“For now. Where’s the note?” There was something in her eye. She wiped it.

“Here.” Her son handed it to her, folded into impossibly small squares. “I folded it, but I didn’t read it,” he added. “The writing’s all funny anyway.”

It was. It was written in a Fleet shorthand based on Sullust that she hadn’t known Carth knew.

XXX

This is the second time I’ve tried to write you. I left you the first note in the Temple.

Canderous was nuts to steal Korrie like that, but I think he was right. Something’s wrong with the Jedi. It’s no place for kids—yours or mine.

I need to save my son. He has to come first. Like Korrie does for you. Please. If you love me at all, keep Dustil safe until I get him back. Please.

Make it count, Polla. Make all of this damn well count for something.

I love you, I always will. I’m not sorry for saving you, Revan.

Carth
She blinked hard, looking up at Malachi. “Do you know where he went?”

“Roughly,” the Senator folded his hands in a steeple. “The closest spaceport. I believe he’s taking your old ship.”

“The Hawk?” That made a certain sense.

“He asked my advice about exorcizing Sith ghosts.”

“Did you want to help him?”

“It would be easier to just have the boy killed,” Malachi murmured. “But I need you too—and you’re mawkishly sentimental. Of course I want to help him. My son is a possessed madman who needs to be contained before he endangers us all.”

The HK returned, clanking, with a silver tray. Incredibly, it set out three cups and poured them each something steaming, that smelled sweet.

“Pick a cup,” Malachi said to Revan.

“Wait, which boy would be easier to kill?” Korrie interrupted. “You mean Father? Or me?”

“No one will die today, Malachor.” Incredibly, Malachi smiled at her son and Korrie smiled back. Like this was a joke between them.

“Wait, Korrie,” she commanded him, frowning at Malak’s father. “What do you mean, ‘pick a cup?’”

“It’s an old Coruscanti custom,” the old man said. “Trust begins somewhere.”

“I’m a Jedi,” she said coolly. Sort of. “You must know we can cleanse most poisons?”

“If I wanted you dead, I wouldn’t use poison.” The Senator laughed.

“Korrie, don’t!” But her son had already take the cup in front of her and was drinking it down, in great, slurping gulps.

“It’s fine, Mother.” He grinned at her. “We play this game all the time.”

“If you’re going to be one of us, you must learn our ways,” Malachi told her. Smiling, he took the cup that had been in front of her son.

Eyeing him warily, Revan took the remaining one—the one in front of his own seat.

The tea was sweet, and flavored with lem.

“Which one did you get?” Korrie asked her. “I got choca!”

“Lem,” she said.

“And I got bilberry,” Malachi said, with a soft chuckle. “You know it gives me indigestion.”

“You have to drink it anyway,” Korrie giggled. “Eg rules.”

XXX
She moved graceful as a thranta in flight, even in her half-beskar: plates under the civilian cape, half-hidden. Her hair was coiled low on her neck and studded with tiny pearls, windblown now, but Oerin couldn’t help but wonder who she had set it for.

Depressing, to think it might have been him and now he could never enjoy her.

It was madness, but right outside of their hotel, he caught her arm. “Milli?”

The girl froze, and then almost immediately pivoted, bringing her stun stick up towards his neck like a true Ordo. At the same time, her foot lashed out, locking around his armored legs. She grunted a little, throwing all of her own weight into the movement. Without the Force, he might have been disarmed. With it, Oerin allowed them both to fall gently, on a bed of soft air, to the ground below.

Landing still hurt though. Just like everything else.

She landed on top of him, stun stick locked between the Gan mask and the joints of his armor. “Who are you, thief?” Her finger poised over the switch threateningly, although at the angle she lay, Oerin worried she might shock them both if she activated it.

“Milli, it’s me.” His voice wheezed annoyingly at this angle and he tried to inflate his lungs more to make it louder. Like operating a bellows at an old-fashioned forge on the sands of home. “It’s Oerin.”

“They said you died.” Her voice was accusing. Her hand pulled at the mask.

“Wait.” Oerin closed his eyes, hoping it would work. He concentrated, hard as he could. “Okay, go ahead.”

Air on his face, felt dimly. His eyes opened. Milli stared down at him. She wasn’t screaming, or checking his pulse, so Oerin had to assume the illusion held. Mandalorians and their damned Force resistance. It would be easier to fool Jedi than his own people.

“They said you were dead.” She glared at him, rolling off abruptly. “Was it some kind of trick?”

“Yes.” He shrugged. “A Jedi trick.”

“Oh.” Pink tinged her cheeks, as she scrambled to her feet. “It was very rude of you to fool us too. Xarga organized your death walk and everything.” She frowned. “I should have realized it was a trick, when they refused to give us your corpse.”

Oerin stood up too, trying to ignore the way his knee throbbed where it had slammed into duracrete. “It’s important that everyone believe I’m dead,” he cautioned her.

Why, Mother hadn’t been clear. But she wasn’t clear on very many things. Like why she wanted him to return to that cursed planet while Davad got to remain surrounded by Jedi beauties.

“All the barbarians need to think you are dead,” Millifar agreed. She smiled at him in a way that made his breath catch. So many beauties... but she was his own kind. Her hand reached out, a little shy, as if she wanted to take his.

Oerin took a step backwards, shaking his head. “No. Everyone. Even the clans.”

“Why?” A line between her eyebrows. It made her look strangely like Canderous. At least that thought diminished his ardor.
“My mother.” He shouldn’t, but he owed her that much. Since he’d never give her sons, or stars.

“Your mother died on Malachor.” Her head tilted. “Everyone knows that? Are you still feverish?” Quick as a manka, she stepped forward and put her hand on his forehead. “No! You’re freezing cold!”

“No,” he made his voice gentle. “I’m not cold at all. You’re right, Milli. I must be running a fever.”

“You must be running a fever.” Her beautiful eyes dulled, becoming blank. Her hands dropped to her side.

Oerin sighed, taking her hands in his. Hers were warm, and he could feel her pulse through her wrists, like the fluttering of tiny wings. “My mother’s not dead. She’s a Sith Lord. She’s manipulating all the Jedi. She’s got some mad scheme to stop the rise of the True Sith and half the time, I really don’t understand it. I died, not understanding it, and she resurrected me—and here I am.” He smiled sadly. “Only, I’m still dead. And I think my insides are going to rot soon. It’s unpleasant.”

“I’m sorry, Oerin.” Her face was still blank as the Force had made it, but Oerin did think she looked sorry.

He bent forward and kissed her on the forehead. “Me too.” Breath creaked in his lungs.

“Forget.”

XXX

“What’s this?” His commander looked down at the piece of plimsi, raising a brow ridge.

“It’s a resignation, sir,” said Captain Erik Qan’Jin, formerly of the Coruscant Civilian Guard.

“A resignation with… nine signatures?” Commander Kaylin frowned. “Are you trying to tell me your entire squad… you’re… all resigning?”

“We’re going to open a traveling theater troupe,” Erik lied. “Tour the Corellian Rim. We’ve been doing amateur productions on our time for years, but now…."

They weren’t really going to do that. Cally had a bad singing voice. Daris couldn’t act. And Liko just didn’t want to. Truthfully, their amateur productions were bad.

But after today, after being shot and stunned by Mandalorians, Force-compelled by Jedi, and nearly trampled to death by an angry, (and probably plague-infected) mob, they’d all unequivocally agreed: it was time to find a new career. Even a pension wasn’t worth this kind of aggravation. (Especially since the latest Senate vote had cut it in half anyway.)

Erik’s wife would probably kill him, but if he survived the first round of her shock, he thought she’d come around. It wasn’t like ransoming ships on the Perelman Spire could be any more dangerous than running Jedi interference on Coruscant.

“I’ll be fulfilling a childhood dream,” he told Commander Kaylin in all seriousness. After all, what child doesn’t want to be a space pirate?

XXX
The hangar was enormous, tall enough to fit a dozen heavy freighters stacked end to end.

It was also empty, except for Therion’s ship and a battered long-hauler, that looked like someone had been stripping it down to the studs.

To their left, behind the forcefield, loomed the spikes of hyperspace. The ship must have jumped as soon as their own ship was locked in. It made Polla very, very uneasy.

This has to be a trap. Everything about it screams trap!

She pulled Junior—Abasen—closer. Seiran slipped his arm around her waist.

Behind them, Therion made a scoffing noise under his breath. “Shall we?” the smuggler said, raising his eyebrows. His mouth thinned, hard as a knife.

“Sec.” She adjusted the red and black blanket around Abasen again. It wasn’t just self-cleaning, it was supposed to deflect blaster bolts too. According to the brochure. Polla hoped they weren’t about to test that theory.

“I’ll go first,” Seiran muttered, shouldering his blasters.

“Really?” Therion looked skeptical. “I suppose I should go next then.”

“You stay with the ship,” Polla snapped at him. “You’ve been whining about it all day, might as well make sure it stays safe.”

“Hah.” He ignored her, setting a pair of throwing knives in his boot. Like they’d go through body armor.

Their gangplank lowered. On the overhead monitors above the exit, they watched the Aleema’s blast doors open too.

A dark, curly-haired woman, with skin the color of derran wheat came walking through the doors. She had a baby on one hip and a vibroblade strapped to the other. “Hello?” she called out. Behind her, a few other figures lurked, still shadows on the monitor. Polla thought they seemed heavily armed, but strangely… short. Sullustan, maybe? Or Rodian?

“Hello,” Polla called out, cautiously back. “We’re coming out, okay?”

“Please do,” said the woman. “As long as you don’t try anything, you have nothing to fear from us. We’re not barbarians. We’re from… Naboo.”
Jokka Rei: “We’re still trying to make sense of this footage showing the riot in front of the Jedi Temple. Did Revan Starfire just leave the Jedi Temple? If so, who is this next to Dustil Onasi?”

“Joining us now, is our Mandalorian correspondent, Xarga Wies. Citizen Wies, do you have any comments on the rumors that the Lin Mandalore is dead?”

Xarga Wies: “If he’s dead, where is his body?”

Jokka Rei: “Presumably it’s in the Jedi Temple?”

Xarga Wies “The Jedi have no right to Mandalorian dead unless they killed him in honorable combat. Did they?”

Jokka Rei: “They say he died from the sickness that’s sweeping the Underground, the sickness some are calling the Jedi plague.”

Xarga Wies “They say a lot of things on your HoloNets, but how many are true?”

XXX

“As ready as I’ll ever be,” Carth sighed, and punched in their departure request.

Mission could probably fly the entire damn ship herself if she wanted, but she was letting him take control. Letting me feel like I’m in control. As if I am, of anything these days. Dull edge of anger there too. Anger and hopelessness—Carth was sick of both.

“Don’t worry,” Mission’s voice said, now coming from the T3 chassis next to him. “We’re gonna fix this. I promise.”

“I just hope D’Reev isn’t jerking us around,” he muttered. Carth’s fingers hovered over the controls, waiting for the traffic controller’s automated response.

“Maybe Polla-Revan will kill him before we get back?” Mission actually sounded hopeful.

Carth almost laughed. “I wish I thought that would help.”

The door behind him beeped, sliding open, as the third occupant of their ship came into the cockpit. “The old madclaw’s death will solve nothing,” Zaalbar groaned. “His fall would crush the beasts below. We must find another way to save the cubs and Polla-Revan too.”

“I’m glad you’re here, Big Z!” Mission emitted a series of beeps and trills, for all the world sounding like an excited kid again.

“My teeth and claws are no use to Polla Revan in that dead place. I serve my life debt by saving the cubs.”
“I’m glad you’re here too,” Carth told him.

“I swore to follow, but…” Zaalbar’s forehead was creased under its mat of hair, as if he was as troubled as Carth was. “She went to a place where I could not follow. Now, I think we must blaze a trail before she can lead.”

“Yeah,” Carth muttered. “I think so too.”

“Trust me,” Mission said. “I think this is gonna work out great!”

XXX

“You had me brainwashed. Why the hell should I trust you?”

“We are both fathers, are we not?” The old man glanced back at the room where his grandson was being attended to by a team of medix and droids. Carth had never seen a medical team move so fast as the team had when he came in with Korrie in his arms. One of them was even wearing Jedi robes.

“I’m not sure we have the same definition of the word ‘trust.’” Even as Carth said that, his own pathetic attempts seemed to mock him. He barely knew his son—and now he was leaving him again.

Only to save you, Dustil. It’s the only way. If the Jedi won’t help, I need to find someone who can.

The Senator chuckled. “Trust that I don’t want to make the same mistakes I did with Malak. That I want a better life for my grandson.”

“A better life?” Carth scoffed. “Here? You people hire assassins for fun.”

“No.” D’Reev shook his head. “For sport. There is a difference.”

“Right.” Carth scoffed. “Forgive me if I don’t see it.”

If Korrie hadn’t been hurt on the speeder, Carth might have been tempted to disable Canderous’s wife and take the kid away from this stinking planet entirely. Except that was nuts. They shouldn’t have taken the boy away from Revan in the first place. He still didn’t understand why Canderous had agreed. To lure Revan away from her Jedi handlers? Hadn’t the man said on multiple occasions that children were a man’s honor? That the bond between a mother and a child was a sacred trust?

Was taking Revan away from the Jedi even a good idea? The Jedi kept her safe—or they were supposed to. Safe—and contained.

The Jedi put you out of a job, his inner voice scoffed. Maybe you should thank them. Or maybe you should have done more for your wife than left a note and run.

“Malachor’s birthright is a world you will never comprehend.” The man was still talking. “I only want to ensure he survives to make the galaxy a better place.”

“Where someone is born shouldn’t determine what they are,” Carth snapped.

“And it does not, on a planet like Telos.” D’Reev said. “But if a planet like Telos, with all of its egalitarian fantasies, wants to rebuild its internal economy? Its citizens need to find deeper pockets.” He shrugged. “Many’s the time I’ve wished for a simple life. But I was not born to be common, any more than your own son was.” His eyes narrowed. “Any more than you were, Captain Onasi. A common man did not save Revan Starfire. A common man did not redeem the Dark Lord of the Sith.”

Carth glared at him. “You’d be surprised by what us common people can do.”

“I hope to be.” D’Reev tapped his hands together. “To that end, I offer you all of my resources to achieve our common goal.”

“Just so we’re clear on what that is….” Carth scanned the datapad the old man had given him and then looked up again. “You want me to go find some kind of artifact or sentient capable of ‘performing a Force exorcism,’ and get your son’s ghost out of my son’s body?”

“Resulting in my son’s consciousness dissipating and returning to the Force—or hell—or whatever maffasops you Telosians believe about the afterlife.” D’Reev nodded. “Yes. I suggest you begin your efforts on Dathomir.”

“Why Dathomir?”

“Malak’s mother was a priestess from one of their witch-tribes.”

“Malak had a mother? I’m surprised you didn’t grow him in a vat. Isn’t that the done thing here?”

The Senator didn’t even get pissed off like a normal man might. He only chuckled. “Not in our family.”

“Well then.” Carth’s voice trailed off. “You’re right. I don’t approve of your methods. Your son is a monster.”

“But your son is not.” D’Reev paused. “At least, not yet.”

XXX

“I’ve locked down the supplies in the cargo hold,” Zaalbar growled, looming through the cockpit door. “What other preparations are needed?”

“None, Big guy, just strap in!” Mission’s voice was cheerful. “Hey, you know, this is kind of like we have the old gang together again… except without the rest of them. Know what I mean?”

Without meaning to, Carth glanced over at the navboard. Polla’s old chair. “Yeah,” he said softly. “I guess I do.”

The board beeped their clearances, and he pulled up the map, frowning at it. Dathomir, the old man had said. Did that mean they could find answers there, or could this be another trap? He had no proof, but Carth was pretty sure D’Reev had been the one behind killing those former Sith from Manaan. Revan had thought so. And according to Malak, the man had even orchestrated the damn Mandalorian wars.

Who’s the biggest monster? Does it matter? Easier to take them down one at a time.

The ship tilted as Carth brought her up to bear, flipping out of the open hangar, adjusting for the gravity drag, straightening, and heading up, towards the loop that would take them spinning around the sun.

XXX
“Dathomir,” D’Reev repeated. “You may find answers there. Ilyana always claimed her people had the power to control the spirits.” He shrugged. “Perhaps it is true. Malak spent time on Dathomir. Perhaps they can undo what was done, for all of our benefit.”

“You’re definitely selling this,” Carth muttered. “Why haven’t the Jedi helped?”

Malachi frowned. “I’m not sure. My contact there is usually… quite reliable. But the information he has relayed of late has been contradictory. Confused. And… other contacts have led me to believe that the Jedi themselves are now compromised.” He folded his hands together, tapping them slowly. “That was another reason I wanted to get Malachor away from that place. The other reason I was willing to trade for his release.”

“Trade?” Gwenarius had said something about that, but Carth hadn’t really been listening. “You traded with the Mandalorians? Again? Because that worked out so well the first time?”

“For a time, it did.” The old man frowned. “But times change. Alliances change.” His mouth pulled into something close to a smile. “As you well know.”

XXX

The Hawk was painted blue now and renamed, but she flew true under his hands, just like she always had, pushing them up and out of atmosphere so quickly, that soon they were rocketing through one of the traffic lanes around the planet, looping Coruscant’s blue-white sun and heading for hyperspace, passing the slow-moving freighters as if they were slugs on a beam.

“Jump point in ten,” Mission murmured, but unnecessarily.

Like any good pilot, there are some things you just know. Carth’s old friend Jordo used to say it was the sound the couplings made, hitch in the ticking, a quieting of space; but somehow, you just knew.

Knew when it was safe to jump. His fingers poised over the controls.

“Five,” Mission said.

But they were close enough. He just knew. Carth punched the pommel and the Hawk leaped forward. The stars around them froze, then streamed, into a billion points of light.

“We will save your cub,” Zaalbar promised him. His clawed hand reached out and covered Carth’s own. “Ghosts are wind.”

XXX

Things were strangely unchanged on the planet she’d vowed to see burn. Their feet clattered in tandem across the marbled floors. Revan could feel the hush in the Force of a few hundred Jedi in residence: concerned, some even fearful; but there was no sign of battle, or darkness; just a confusion that could be coming from Revan’s own scrambled brain as easily as her surroundings.

The boy’s hand was still holding her arm too tightly, fingers digging in flesh, just above where the prosthesis was fastened. Revan looked up at Malak, and then to the Twi’lek on her other side—both flanking her as surely as if they’d planned it that way.

In her old body, their efforts would have been laughable. Even Malak’s strength was no match for her power augmented by the Star Forge. He was the machine’s creature, but she was its control. When it came to the ancient Rakatan artifact, Revan was the one firmly holding the reins.

But this was the Jedi Temple, not the Star Forge. And Sheris was pathetic and weak.

And why are we on Coruscant at all? Has the Emperor won through subterfuge what we once hoped to storm?

“No. He has not won. Tenebrae cannot win as long as you exist,” the voice in her head murmured.

And do I exist? It was terrifying to feel this uncertain. It was weak, like Sheris had been.

“How do epistemological queries serve you? You were made for only one purpose, Revan. To oppose the Sith Emperor.”

How do you know that? Who are you? That sickeningly weak panic, again, like Sheris. I must be going insane. None of this makes sense.

A pack of Jedi passed them. Padawans, by their robes. They stared, and then looked away. Although a few of them felt frightened, there was none of the obeisance she expected.

Darkly, she wondered if she was actually Sheris, finally cracked and convinced that she had turned into Revan.

That makes as much sense as me being a holocron recording, trapped in Sheris’s body, and accompanied by my former husband’s recording, trapped in the body of this child, doesn’t it?

“You must tread carefully with him—with them. Malak and the Twi’lek both. Are they potential allies? Or obstacles?”

I must not roll my eyes at imaginary voices that offer obvious advice.

“I think the infirmary is this way,” Revan said out loud, trying to sound more like a Hothan rube. “Isn’t it?” Another nervous giggle.

Malak shot her a glare out of the corners of his eyes. One side of the boy’s mouth twisted in a sneer. “We need to stop somewhere else first.”

“Oh?” She kept her voice light. “And where is that?”

“Are you in a hurry to offer our assistance to the dying, Sheris?” His voice was mocking.

“I want to help,” she murmured, shooting him a sly glance, like the real Sheris would have. “It’s all I ever wanted, Malak.”

His hand tightened on her arm and he turned abruptly down a corridor she vaguely remembered led to the learner dormitories, reserved for visiting Jedi, applicants, and others who were not part of the Temple’s day-to-day routine.

They passed an Eosian Jedi in the hall, who barely looked at them, then turned down one of the halls leading to the outer ring of rooms.

“Here,” Malak said. More to Yuthura than her. He put his palm against the door and it slid open.

Inside, one of the lesser guest chambers—still sumptuous by Padawan standards. It was small, with two cots and one chair.
The cot by the window had a stuffed Wookiee on it, a child’s toy. The blue butterfly she had embroidered on its makeshift tunic was threadbare. There were bald patches around its torso, as if it had been washed a hundred times and well-loved between.

How long? He was three, the last time I saw him. He’d be bigger now. He’d be older—years since I let myself think of him—

Revan blinked and looked away.

“Sit,” her Apprentice said, gesturing to that cot. He sat down on the other one, which for some reason, had a picture of the planet Telos—unmistakable by its unique polar mottling—plastered above its headboard.

Yuthura took the chair, glancing between them warily.

As if she’s not sure which side to take? The Twi’lek was strong. Can I bring her to my side? Will she back me against him?

Revan sat down slowly. Malachor’s toy was only a few centimeters from her fingers. Close enough to touch. It might still smell like him. He had been here in this very room. Why was he in the Jedi Temple, when she and Malak had tried so hard to keep him away from its degraded influence? Why was Malak here too in this child’s body?

“What a beautiful picture of Telos you have,” she muttered.

“I had to prove my loyalty to Carth Onasi.” His mouth twitched. If she had unnerved him, it wasn’t showing on his face. “Pretend I was his son to fool Revan. For a time, she never noticed the difference. She was always so blind. Set in her own causes. Arrogant.”

What does Saul Karath’s crack pilot have to do with anything? You had to prove your loyalty to him? Because you’re possessing his son? Why not just have him killed?

Revan kept her voice neutral. “Arrogant? That does sound like Revan.”

His face tightened, and the muscles in his jaw worked. “It does,” he muttered.

“Is there some reason we’re here?” she kept her voice steady. Be cold. Don’t look down. Don’t look at the toy. Malachor must want it, he must miss it, if he’s no longer here.

I could find him. I could take it to him and find him—

“The Selkath labs were all destroyed,” Yuthura said, looking at Malak. “We may need to find another way of synthesizing this vaccine.”

“I know. I was given reports.” Her husband—her Apprentice—nodded. “Ironic that an amnesiac Dark Lord wrecked the very weapon she created to destroy her enemies.” He chuckled. “Revan did me a favor, when she destroyed the Selkath’s work.”

“Idiots.” Suddenly, Revan wanted them both to crawl. The labs are gone? Amnesiac? Her mind puzzled over the word’s implications. The Emperor destroyed the vaccine’s production facilities?

Fools!

“Is there some insight you’d care to add, Sheris?” Yuthura’s voice dripped acid.

“Should there be? Does Sheris normally provide… insight?” She ignored the Twi’lek and stared at Malak. His boy’s face flushed and he glared back at her.

“No,” Malak said. His smile really wasn’t one. Wasn’t his. “Not insight.”

Laughter bubbled in her throat. “I see no reason to continue this charade. Do you?”

“No,” he murmured. Those dark eyes locked with hers. “Not when there are other games we could play.”

“Is Sheris entirely gone?” Yuthura said from somewhere outside the suddenly narrowed world. “And is Dustil entirely gone as well?”

“Sentimental for your old pupil?” Malak scoffed at the Twi’lek. “He is beyond your reach.”

Revan’s fingers closed around the child’s toy. Malachor’s toy. The metallic hand, all feeling muted and hyper-real at the same time. Every strand of synthfur. She closed her fist and felt the fabric tear. “Many things have always been beyond Malak’s reach.”

He stood up, moving so quickly that she barely had time to see it, and went to her, hand closing hard on her metal arm. “Let go of that,” he hissed. “Now.”

Revan looked up at his stranger’s face. “Malachor is six now. Isn't that a little old for child’s toys?”

That boy’s mouth of his twisted. “Six?” He repeated, making the word a question, mocking.

Revan tried to stay calm. Six is… wrong? That’s wrong. He’s older. Of course he is. Time, whatever happened to me took time.

Seven?” She shrugged. “Children grow up so fast.” Her hand relaxed around the toy. The fabric was torn, her artificial fingers tugged at the place they had torn it.

“He’s nine,” Malak told her.

Three years? No, he was… he was almost seven. Two years? More than two years? He was three, the last time I saw him. He was only three. Three years? But that means… what of our plans?

At least around the Jedi Temple, the Republic seemed disturbingly whole.

Yuthura stood up, glancing between them. Her face was expressionless, and her presence in the Force dulled to the merest whisper. “I’ll be in the infirmary,” she said. “I’m sure you have much to discuss. But try not to take too long.” She paused, and her lips curved in something that was almost a smile. “There is some… urgency.”

Malak glared back at her. “Just go,” he snapped.

Yuthura Ban nodded, and left—a coward despite her strength.

Malak stood watching, until the door closed behind Dreshdae’s former Headmistress. Then his head turned back toward Revan. “I didn't think the Jedi would allow Sheris to do it.”

“What gave me away?” She made her voice soft, teasing, like the real Sheris would have.

“You said I was too young for you.” He scoffed. “And you didn’t know about Manaan.” He stared at her, shaking his head. “Sheris wanted to lose herself, but I never thought the Jedi would agree.”

“I don't think the Jedi know,” Revan said. Except for Atris. But she—
“The Echani will never betray you. She is your creature. And mine. Forget her. Forget her part in this. Atris is inconsequential. Sheris acted alone, of her own free will.”

Revan blinked. She felt her mouth smile, but the expression was strange and weak. “I think Sheris acted alone. Are you going to tell them?”

“No need. You’ll betray yourself. There’s so much you don’t know.”

He’s right. But she refused to panic. “It’s been… three years,” she said slowly. “The Jedi made a holocron of my memories after you almost killed me.”

Three years, or close enough. And for some reason, you just let the Emperor and the Mandalorians near our son.

But my body was vaccinated. How could Tenebrae be in it? Unless… was I wrong? Had he already begun to twist my thoughts? But the computer was supposed to be infallible! The computer was mine, not his. It promised me that the virus could stop him—

Revan realized she was clenching and unclenching her artificial hand, like a nervous twitch. “Tell me,” she muttered. “Now, Malak. Tell me everything.”

He stared at her, that stranger’s face a mask. “Why should I? You’re weak.” He circled, and she stood up too, still holding on to that stuffed toy. “Weaker than you ever were during your reign as the Dark Lord.”

“A weak reed bends in a maelstrom, while a strong tree might crack.”

Silence, Voice! Revan shook her head to dislodge it. “I’m not weak.” She gestured at him. “Why are you… why are you in the body of this child?”

His lips pulled back in a smile she’d never seen. “When Revan struck me down, I became more powerful than she could ever imagine.”

XXX

Keep walking. Don’t look back. Never show fear. Don’t show them anything they can use against you—

Yuthura’s stomachs twisted with fear—edged by relief as she forced herself to walk away, as if facing down the two former rulers of the Sith Empire was something she did every day. (The time in her life when it had been was one she had thought thankfully gone forever.)

Small comfort, that in their borrowed bodies, Yuthura might have the Force advantage—at least against each of them, one at a time.

Poor Sheris. Poor Dustil.

Malak’s presence in Dustil’s body was stronger than ever, but Sheris still felt like Sheris: as lost and confused as the real Sheris had been. And still… and yet… there was an undertone of malevolence here, a darkness that reminded her of Korriban. A miasma of madness on the senses, like smoke in the back of her throat.

How could the Jedi let this happen? How can they be so blind?

The medix doors were closed, and guarded by two nervous Padawans. It took only a fraction of her power to convince them she was expected; and once past the first layer of security, there was no second. Protective gear, enough for dozens of Jedi, was stacked neatly in a closet; but the number of healers were gone. Had they fled, or fallen sick themselves?

Yuthura frowned. The sense of wrongness was… stronger here.

She buckled on the protective gear carefully, wincing a little as her lekku twisted through the helmet’s vacuum seal. She switched the filters to recirculation, hoping the hazmats all did their job.

They had put the worst cases all together in one room at the end of the corridor. In searching she had come across med droids and the occasional tech wearing a hazmat suit. Nothing more. But here, in the painfully white room, shining with harsh lights, the whir of respirators, she found her former students.

Thalia May, Mekel Jin, and Udoo Utile, all in row next to other Jedi. Other Jedi had fallen in the night—because she counted at least a dozen full beds. The air was antiseptic and bitter. Two Zabraks, one old and one young—and neither wearing protection of any kind—were tending the machines. Next to a row of flashing consoles stood two more white-clad figures. Human, probably, but their features were almost entirely concealed by the hazmats they wore themselves.

“This is a restricted area,” the taller of the two said.

“You need survivors to make a vaccine.” Yuthura told him, trying not to show alarm. It had been worse on Korriban near the end; but then, miraculously, almost all of her students had survived. Because of the vaccine. Uthar said we were all saved. Saved by Revan herself to save the galaxy—

“We are aware,” the taller, suited figure said. “To that end, I dispatched two of our five remaining assistants to fetch the body of one Dustil Onasi, who is, according to popular rumor, a survivor of the plague—in addition to being possessed by Darth Malak. Supposedly.” He made an incredulous noise. It hissed through his respirator. “According to the HoloNet, there was also a riot outside the Temple gates involving Mandalorians and Revan Starfire. I must assume that assisting with the aftermath has caused the delay of my assistants’ return.”

“I would be happy to go search for him too, Master Loanin,” the other white-suit offered.

“As would I,” murmured the younger Zabrak. The older one looked at her sharply, frowning.

Yuthura tried to sound confident. “I saw… Dustil. Or Malak, as he calls himself now. The boy assured me that he and Sheris Darkstar will be along shortly. That will give you two samples of survivor’s blood.”

* Unless they kill each other. Does the blood need to come from a living specimen?

“You are one of the Korriban refugees as well?” the tall man said. “I don’t supposed you—”

“I was vaccinated.” Her mouth twisted. “But I never contracted the illness.”

“Yet,” the smaller man said. “Almost all of the other Korriban refugees have succumbed.”

“But not died,” Yuthura pointed out. “I believe that may be a crucial difference.”

“Systems of belief are of small comfort to science,” Master Loanin gestured towards the rows of sick patients, most of whom were covered by biosuits. “You said you have seen this plague before.
Do you have any medical training, Padawan…?”
He knew I was from Korriban, but does he truly not know who I am? Yuthura raised a brow ridge back.

“Ban,” the other man murmured. “Yuthura Ban.”

“One of the Selkath Ten,” the younger Zabrak added.

“Another redeemed Sith,” the older Zabrak muttered, half under her breath. “And just as reliable as all the rest.”

“We will see how reliable she is,” Loanin corrected her. “Master Korr, you and Padawan Lydie will go fetch this Sheris and supposed Malak. Bring them back here in all haste.” Master Loanin’s head tilted towards the wall and he gestured at one of the meddroids. It slid forward. “MZ-6 has enough tranquilizers in its diffusers to take down an entire room of Jedi.” He paused. “Human Jedi, at least. If you need to use them, do not hesitate. We don’t need them conscious, only breathing.”

“Of course.” Even though she appeared to be at least four times Loanin’s age, the Zabrak afforded the man some respect.

“And you—Ban—check the fluid levels in all of the tanks,” Master Loanin told her, not waiting for a response. “Especially in the Twi’lek cases. Your species gets dehydrated very quickly, and that seems to degrade the immune response.”

“Yes, Master Loanin,” Yuthura nodded through her suit, because that seemed to be what he’d expect.

As she bent over the feeds going into Mekel Jin’s tank, Yuthura wondered how things would go when the two Zabraks and their droid interrupted the two former Dark Lords of the Sith from… whatever it was they were doing.

XXX

“You can’t have my baby!” Lena snapped.

“What?” The image flickered between Revan and Mission again. “Lena? No!” The Twi’lek’s face burst into incredulous laughter. “Possess the body of a helpless fetus? I’d have to go through puberty all over again. Plus, it would take, like years. No!” Mission nodded at Nico again. “We were thinking, maybe finding someone brain-dead. Like, in a coma.”

“Or an inorganic body,” Nico added. “We can build you to be virtually immortal.”

“We’re still working out the deets,” Mission continued. “I thought about maybe a clone too, but it might be too complicated. Plus, there’s the whole growing up thing again.”

“There are ways to speed maturation,” Nico offered. “Although they can affect brain development and emotional maturity in most species....”

“He wants me to flexible on the species,” Mission added. “I told him, no way on that!” Her image wrapped its lekku around its neck. The t’chin twitched at Lena tracing words in the air.

Do you really trust this schlub?

Mostly, Lena signaled. Are you really her? “Mission?” She added out loud.

Mostly, the image signaled back.
“Moms’ Brothel is closed,” the dispirited Cathar said. Her tail drooped sadly through the cage, and her legs swung in the bars. She had a blaster in one hand, and a bottle of something in the other. “You don’t want to come any closer, Citizen. A bunch of sents are sick.”

“I’m a healer.” The sight of Jedi robes had been enough to cause riots in the Underground of late, so he was wearing civilian attire, co-opted from a long ago mission on these very streets. He had wondered if she would remember the clothes, although now, standing here bare-armed and short-legged, Vrook just felt like a foolish old man. “Perhaps I can help.”

“Doctors haven’t been able to. Are you magic?” She scowled at him. “Or some kind of priest?”

“Not exactly,” Vrook said. “I’m… an old friend of Deeka’s. Deeka Jin?”

“She’s sick too. Really bad.” The flicker in her expression meant it was probably a holomask, but a decent one. Her lips pulled up, exposing the illusion of small, pointed teeth. “Half the trade quit, and the rest of them are sick too. Lexi died yesterday.”

“I’m a healer,” Vrook repeated. He’d known it was bad in the Underground, but he’d never imagined this. “Please. Let me help.”

“You know Deeks?” She made no motion towards the door’s sensors, just kept staring at him. “You don’t look like one of her regulars, no offense.”

“I’m not… I mean… I did.” He frowned. “I knew her a long time ago.”

“I can ask, I guess?” She tilted her head. “What name should I give her?”

Vrook hesitated. His own was too well known, even here. “Tell her it's Lammikins.”

The Cathar’s whispers twitched. “You’re Lammikins?” She narrowed her eyes at him. “Well I’ll be a manka’s aunt.”

Vrook nodded slowly.

She peered more closely at him. “I don’t really see it, to be honest. Maybe a little around the chin?”

XXX

They were sitting in what seemed to be some kind of fancy dining hall, walls lined with red and black patterns. The crudely-tanned fur rugs and hassocks seemed out of place in the vast expanse. Seiran and Therion had been escorted off by a pack of kids and an old woman who kept talking in a language that none of them understood.

“More tea?” The woman, gestured to the kid standing in the corner, who approached, head down, carrying a steaming pot of it. “I apologize for the lack of formality, but Headwoman Catrinex will take good care of your men. Are they both your husbands?” She blinked and smiled. She had a heart-shaped face and a slightly pointed chin. Her teeth were small and perfectly even.

“Thanks. I’m okay.” Polla put a hand over her cup to stop the kid from pouring her more tea, and he ducked his head—actually blushing as he stepped back again. “And… and no. Shamael is… mine. The other one… he’s just the pilot. Drek. His name is… Drek.”

When you have five seconds to think of fake names, they sound fake.
“How old is your son?” Polla asked, to change the subject. The baby was older than Junior, with a lot more hair. Aside from that, she couldn’t tell.

Their rescuer laughed, as if Polla had said something funny. “He’ll be one year of age next month. Ready to be named.” She bent over the curly dark heard of her child, humming softly. “I’m thinking of calling him Dxun.” Her eyes were a dark brown, almost black, and they stared at Polla with unnerving intensity. “Do you like it?”

“It’s… nice,” Polla said, to be polite. “Is Dxun Nabooan for something?”

“Nabooans speak Basic?” The woman smiled, as if that was a joke. “Dxun is a moon,” she added. “The largest moon orbiting the planet of Onderon.”

“Oh!” Frack of a pilot she was. Suddenly Polla felt even more stupid than she had when she’d hit that asteroid. “This is Abasen,” she said, raising her own sleeping son in the air and then bringing him back to her shoulder. “And I’m Seriina Wen.”

“Like the holovid star?” The woman had dimples when she smiled back.

“Yeah.” Polla shifted her son in her arms, refusing to glance at the door, to see where the hell Seiran and Therion had gone off to. “Just like that. And what’s your name?”

“Aemelie,” the woman said. “Aemelie… of Naboo.”

The woman’s direct stare was a little unsettling. Polla tried to match it. “I guess we’re both from the Core.”

“What a coincidence!” Aemelie nodded. “Such a shame about your ship. Do you need passage back to Alderaan?”

“Actually, we’re going to Coruscant.” Polla shrugged, as if that was no big deal.

“So are we!” Aemelie beamed at her. “As soon as we finish our modifications to this vessel.”

“You’re fixing the damage…?” They’d seen the charred ruin of the bridge as the tractor beam pulled them in, haze of the containment field around it keeping out the vacuum.

“Do you think we should?” Aemelie frowned. “We’ve already rerouted all the ships command functions to the secondary bridge.” She paused. “As is wise, that bridge is located in the heart of the ship, surrounded by armor plating thick enough to withstand direct hits.”

“That’s… good.” Polla smiled, because what else could she do? “Then what are you… fixing?”

“Just some modifications.” Aemelie smiled. “We Nabooans are very good starship mechanics. I’ve already asked the children to take a look at your ship’s shields. It will be good practice for them. In a few days’ time, your ship should be repaired enough to leave… if you wish.”

“Thank you,” Polla said slowly. She glanced at the door, wishing like hell Seiran and Therion would walk back through it.

“Is Abasen Alderaanian for something?” Aemelie asked her. “I’ve always wanted to visit your homeworld. Is its orbital defense system as advanced as everyone says?”

“No, it’s just his name. Alderaan’s defenses are… pretty advanced. I guess?” Frack if she knew. What kind of a question was that? “They have some lovely art museums.” She had been bored to tears by them at age ten.

“You can tell so much about a culture from its art,” Aemelie said brightly. “The Aleema’s cannon were designed by the Sith species, for example. Did you know, they designed them with no central command switch?” She laughed. “No way to command all guns to fire from one location? One assumes that is because their military leaders keep themselves in power by decentralizing their chains of command. A single override would allow one person to betray them. But by making it require the effort of dozens, they must inspire loyalty. I find that extremely artistic of them.”

“I don’t mean to… pry,” Polla interrupted. “But how did you get this ship in the first place? I mean, it’s… pretty big.” And infamous. Because it used to belong to the Dark Lord of the Sith.

It was featured in a dozen space battles she’d seen footage from, including the final one, the one that had taken out Revan herself.

The Nabooan laughed. “We traded for it.”

The ship was massive. Naboo had to be a pretty rich planet, to afford something like this for its navy.

“What did you trade?”

Aemelie shrugged. “Something a barbarian valued beyond measure—as he should, of course.” She cuddled her son closer, humming softly again.

The skinny kid in the corner stepped forward with the tea server again, and poured them more of it.

XXX

“I struck you down, Malak?” Confusion swam in Revan’s perfect green eyes, making her expression look even younger, more vulnerable. “But you struck first.”

“Yes,” he told the copy, trapped in Sheris’s body. “But she struck back. Hello, Red.”

Poor Sheris. I tried to save you. I sent you away before she came to the Star Forge, but it made no difference.

“Hello, Mal.” A smile pulled at her mouth: uncertain—maybe even—frightened. She had to be aware as he was of the imbalance of power between them. Sheris could not match the Onasi boy for strength in the Force, and she appeared to be unarmed. “The Emperor won?” Her head tilted and that familiar frown furrowed between her eyebrows. “He’s possessing my body? The vaccine didn’t work? Have I returned in Sheris’s body to stop him?”

“Your vaccine wasn’t what killed me,” he told her. “I managed to avoid that trap.”

“It wasn’t a trap. Idiot.” Even now, when it didn’t matter, she clung to her lies. So single-minded. “You said Malachor was nine, before.”

Petty, but Malak had to enjoy the way her face paled when he told her the day’s actual date. “You had no idea?” he added. “Did Sheris do this alone, or did Atris assist as she promised?”

“Atris? You fired on my ship.” Her head tilted. “I thought I died then. I remember… I thought I was dying.”

“The Jedi saved you, implanted a false personality in order to control you, and used you to find the
“And the Emperor?” She didn’t blink. Those green eyes stared into his with unblinking intensity.

“You said he was a false threat. You said the Dark Council were only toying with us.”

“No, Mal.” Her voice gentled: with the younger face, for a moment, she looked like she had before they went to Mandalore. “I never said that. Tenebrae did. You were corrupted. If you had just taken the vaccine—”

Malak snorted. “Are you so sure he wasn’t in your mind first?”

“No.” Her perfect mouth twisted. “I’m not sure of anything. I woke up… in this… as Sheris.”

“Atris,” he muttered. “And Kae. Sheris said they were going to help her take your memories back.”

“My memories were in a holocron,” Revan said, frowning. “Wait—did you say… Kae?”

“Sunrider,” he shrugged. “Whatever she calls herself now.”

“She’s alive?” She looked confused. “I’m weak in this body. I can’t—did she do this to make me weak?” She laughed again, harshly and inappropriately. It had been the laughter that had made him wonder, before her ignorance about Manaan confirmed his fears. “Tell me, at least, that we won the war—Sith against Jedi. My… other self. She’s in charge?”

“Did she look in charge?” He wanted to laugh too. “She’s not Tenebrae, trust me. She’s you.”

“But she’s in charge? Of the Jedi, at least? And your father?”

“She is nothing.” Nothing except my wife. “We lost, Red.” How could she still think they’d won? So blind, so single-minded, surrounded by our old enemies, and you still think we won? “The Republic sent the real Revan on a mission to kill me. Their Fleet destroyed the Star Forge—”

“I was going to kill you,” she muttered. “You’d been compromised, his thoughts were in you—twisting everything. Did you know I was going to do it? Is that why you fired on my bridge first?”

“All sents want to live, Red. Even me.” He’d said something like that to her other self in a dream. “Even you.”

Even Sheris. I thought. Is there some of her in you still?

Perversely, the desire her body had inspired in his boy’s frame before was gone now, replaced with something he refused to classify as fear, or—or anything else. You’re stronger than she is. She may have Revan’s memories, but that is all.

“You let her go to our son.” Her eyes narrowed. “You trust her with Malachor?”

“She's his mother.”

The woman with his wife’s memories swallowed. The false green of her eyes seemed to dim, and she looked away. “I’m his mother.”

“The Jedi may have wiped her mind, but they couldn’t erase her personality. The overlay they gave her collapsed in the true test. In the end, she became Revan again. She killed me. She took her title back as Dark Lord—”
“You’re really dead?” She looked up at him, frowning. “The real Malak? His… body? You’re… gone?”

“Destroyed when the Republic blew up the Star Forge.”

Was he flattering himself that she looked upset? “And the Jedi made a… holocron of you too?”

“No. The real Revan killed me. I’m a ghost.”

“A… ghost.” She frowned. “Like Freedon Nadd?”

“Just like,” he tried not to laugh. “Only made flesh, as he could only dream. I’m the ghost of a Sith Lord, and you’re the mere copy of one.”

“And the boy?” Her voice was bland, but he knew her too well. “You picked Karath’s protege for your puppet? Why not use your own?”

“Revan killed Bandon. On Tatooine, I believe.”

“Your other protege?” She frowned, as if the realization had just come to her. “That’s who Mekel Jin is. Of course! The boy from Coruscant? Son of the brothel-keeper?”

“Yes?”

“I know about him,” she snapped. “Davad told me.” That head tilted, covered in braids. The real Revan hadn’t worn her hair like that since they’d left for the Wars.

“You know about my protege, Mekel Jin.” Malak shrugged. “I know you had the Dreshdae Academy infected with your false vaccine.”

Her head tilted more and she frowned at him. “I told you before—it’s not false. You possess this body. Like Tenebrae does his Children. Are there more of you?”

“You said the boy would be immune from your virus,” he reminded her. “So it could hardly be the same. And I am not Tenebrae.”

“Are there more?” she pushed. “More Malak ghosts, controlling others?”

If only, he thought. If only I had enough bodies to protect our son, stop the Mandalorians and kill my father—

“Yes,” Malak said, to see what she’d do.

The white lightsaber blade erupted from the sleeve of her robe, spinning towards him in a killing arc. He barely got his own out in time to deflect it, sending it spinning back towards the false perfection of her face.

XXX

“Lammikins.” Her hair was still green, but now it clashed horribly against the pallor of her face. That hair was lank now, spread out against the pillow, like the sad nimbus of a broken sun. “I must be dead and dipped in choca, seein you here.”

“Deeka,” he kept his voice gentle, fighting for calm, for kindness, and for clarity. All the times he’d imagined this reunion—it had never been like this.
“You killed Arca?” Her head tilted to the side. “Good… she was startin to piss me off. Her and those goonboys of hers. Givin me the creeps. Bad for the trade.”

“I don’t… you’re running a fever.” Dangerously high. He could feel the sickness within her, festering like a sore.

“The goons all left, Deeks,” the Cathar said, from behind them. “I think Arca’s in her rooms. Downstairs.”

“You’d better kill her first.” Deeka’s hand reached out and brushed Vrook’s face. “Then… afterwards, maybe then we can talk.”

“I didn’t come here to kill anyone,” he said. “I… spoke to Zez Kai. I came here to tell you that I know. I know everything now.”

XXX

When she’d dreamed of this moment, it had sure been different. Lammikins had a lot more hair. She’d been wearing somethin beautiful. And there’d been music in the background—beautiful music—like on one of the stories.

“Congratulations, Lammikins the Loverboy,” she whispered. “We have a beautiful baby boy.”

XXX

No surprise. In the trade you don't get into these situations by accident. In fact, a girl in the prime of her game who's smart doesn't get into them at all. But somehow Deeka Jin had never expected this to work. Not really.

Jedi, so she'd been told, had forms of mental control. Just like a working chit, startin a life wasn't something they did by accident.

And yet, here they were.

Or rather, here she was, in the cramped conapt on sublevel nineteen that he'd rented for her. Alone. Cut off from everyone she knew back down farther underground. Livin the glamorous life of a kept woman instead of a rented one.

A Jedi's pet instead of a borrowed toy.

He—she couldn't quite bring herself to say the words 'my baby's dads'—not yet—wasn't here. He wasn't even on the planet. He'd gone off somewhere. Jedi did that. To do good elsewhere while back at home the same old same old played on.

"Center of the universe," she muttered to herself. Her hand reached nervously to her still-flat abdomen. Her painted nails drummed on the table.

The pink stick mocked her from the countertop. She'd planned this sure; but she'd never expected it to work.

Her reflection in the mirror was the same. Black eyes, pretty face, hair dyed green as the grass in the meditation gardens at the Jedi Temple. He'd snuck her in there once, dressed in padawan robes for a bit of a thrill. Creepy place. Force-users were creepy. Always lookin at you like they knew everything goin on in your mind.
Deeka Jin snickered. Well, he hadn't known about this. She adjusted the silver tunic across her shoulders thoughtfully raisin an eyebrow to her reflection. Her pursed lips twitched and she tried the speech again.

"Darlin'—somethin wonderful has happened."

Now deepen the voice and play his part. "Nothing can be as wonderful as you, Jinny."

"No, this is. We're gonna to have a baby."

Her hand smacked her forehead in mock despair. "But that is forbidden! The Order does not allow Jedi to love!"

"But we do love. Oh, my love!"

"How d'you know it's mine." Her reflection scowled at her, a pretty good imitation of his dour look, really.

Damnit, that wasn't what she'd meant to say. That was what she was afraid he'd say.

"I quit the biz for you," she reminded him. (Or would have, had he actually been here.)

"You've lied to me before."

"You're the one with Force, can't you tell I'm not lyin now?"

Her comm beeped before she could think of a snappy answer for him to say. Somethin like: "The Force is not a toy, Deeka. The fate of the galaxy, my repsons'bility to the Padawans in my care, blah, blah, blah—"

"Hello?" her voice came out breathy and soft. After all, he might be callin. Not like hardly anyone else had the number.

But it wasn't his face on the screen making an intergalactic call. It was the other one instead. Her keeper, callin from a local exchange. Callin to do his duty.

"He asked me to check on you. Something has happened. He's going to be gone for three more months—at least. May I come up?" His eyes stared at her clinically, as if she was some kind of experiment gone awry in his little Jedi universe.

Deeka rolled her eyes. "Fine," Room wasn't particularly clean. But Best Friend wasn't exactly company.

Rent was due in another week and she was low on credits again. Jedi Loverboy Knight's Best Friend had assumed the role of banker to keep her in the manner which she was fast becomin bored.

Thirty seconds later and Best Friend was knocking at the door, slippin inside with a furtive glance, as if anyone on the sublevels cared. She was surprised he still wore the robes comin down here—Loverboy always came in disguise—although, knowin Best Friend, maybe not that surprised. Best Friend didn't like breakin rules. Not a rebel bone in his body—hell, she wasn't even sure if he could get a bone at all.

Some Jedi couldn't—or so they said back down where she came from. Deeka Jin had never met one like that.
"He asked me to bring you more datapads. Have you been continuing your studies?"

Right, her studies. Moral Improvement of a Young Mind. That was how Loverboy justified this. Justified them.

Deeka gestured to a stack of datapads on the table by the bed.

"Every frackin night."

She'd really tried, at first. But what was the point in doin all this readin about places and sents she'd never see? You don't travel far from the Reef. Every 'scanti native knows that. For one thing, cits from her part of the planet had trouble havin the proper paperwork. For another, why bother when everything in the world was here?

"Center of the universe," she said out loud again. Sinneruvauniverse. Loverboy used to laugh at the way she talked. Tell her it was cute. Then he tried to get her to stop. Talk slower. More slow-ly. En-nun-ci-ate. "Reef's the cen-ter of the un-i-verse," she grinned, enunciating. "I know everything I need to know."

Best Friend was staring at the countertop. Specifically at the pink stick she'd forgotten to throw away.

Sh—well maybe he didn't know what a pregnancy test looked like. But no—the way his shoulders suddenly tightened and that muscle on the side of his jaw clenched told her that he knew. Don't need the Force read people. It's a skill you pick fast up in the trade.

Lotta skill to the trade. Most people don't get that. But it's true.

"Yours?" His head jerked so sharply that the long earring he wore in one lobe bounced against his neck. That earring meant somethin—on whatever world he was from. Corellia, maybe. Frankly, Deeka had never bothered to ask. Best Friend and she weren't exactly close. "How did this happen?"

Deeka chuckled. "You want me to explain it to you, darlin? Well, sometimes, when a man puts a woman up in her own little room, pays her rent, buys her food, visits her twice a week to frack—"

"Is it his?" he interrupted, eyes focusing slightly outside of her. Outside of reality. That familiar distance. Usin the Force, prob.

Her hands moved to her stomach as if to shield the little granslug inside from his gaze.

"Can't you tell?" She made herself smile back at him. This wasn't in the plan at all. Wasn't supposed to be Best Friend havin this conversation with her. Should have been Loverboy. He should be here.

"The Force doesn't work like that. I sense the life within you, that is all. If it were mine, perhaps—I've read of such things. I don't know—"

"Well that there's your problem, sweetie, all you've done is read." She smirked. "We both know it ain't yours."

"He'll know if it's not his." Best Friend looked worried, Deeka wasn't sure for who.

"You can dance at our weddin, if Jedi dance." She couldn't believe her boldness, but suddenly Deeka felt reckless.
"Jedi don't get married," piped a child's voice from the door.

Deeka almost jumped out of her skin. A round-faced kid, wearing Padawan robes stared back at her. Best Friend's new padawan. They all had padawans, raisin someone else's children, that's what Jedi did. That's where Loverboy was now—takin his new charge out to explore the galaxy. The one he called his niece. (Was she? In darker moments, Deeka had suspicions.) Help her learn morally improving lessons. Help the less fortunate on planets that had skies and trees and grass and things that she'd only seen on the vids. The girl was too young for her to get jealous about... but of course, she was.

"Davad," Best Friend chided. "I told you to wait outside."

"You're going to have a baby?" the kid asked her, ignoring the man's scowl.

"Maybe." She gave him a big fat smile. Tilted her head to one side.

"It's a boy," the kid told her gravely.

"He's gone for another three months," Best Friend said again, glancin helplessly at his charge as if he expected the kid to give him advice. "In another three months you'll be farther along. You can't just—"

"I expect I'll get fat," Deeka beamed. Had been more than three months already. More than three months since he'd been gone. She'd held off checkin, waitin for him to get back. But then she couldn't hold off anymore. There were things to plan, if this was really gonna happen. Stuff to do. Maybe she'd learn to cook. She'd need a bigger place— they'd need—

Best Friend's next words were like a boot in the face. "You can't do this to him."

"He did it to me," Deeka snapped. "We did it. Just because you never have—"

Best Friend closed his eyes and sighed.

The kid closed the door and moved into the room, staring around him curiously, like he'd never seen how the other half lived before. "Are there more rooms?" he asked her. "You really live in a place this small?"

Deeka Jin laughed. "Where are you from, little honeygizka?"

"Onderon," the boy said. "It's on the Outer Rim, but even there, we have nicer rooms than this."

"I'm sorry," Best Friend murmured. "It's just—at the moment, the scandal... his newest Padawan is a Senator's son. If the family found out that the Jedi training their son was involved with..." to his credit he almost looked uncomfortable sayin it "... you—they'd be—"

"Won't matter," Deeka replied. "He'll leave the Order. Jedi do that sometimes. I read about it in one of the datapads."

"He never will. I know him better than you do."

Hard to argue with that. It was probably true. Deeka had only known Loverboy for eight months. And he'd been gone for three of those. Three and a half, now. Today. In five hours.

"We'll work it out," she draped herself against the doorframe, gave them both a breezy smile.

Best Friend nodded. He might have had a stick shoved up his ass but he was loyal. "We will," he agreed.

"This is one of those things I'm not supposed to talk about later, Master?" the kid piped in with.

"Moral relativity, like I told you," Best Friend muttered. He turned back to Deeka. "You'll need a bigger conapt. We'll figure out something—credits—maybe I can borrow—"

"I don't take your charity," Deeka snapped.

"You take his."

"It's different."

"You can't tell him. Not yet. He'd abandon the mission and his Padawans—you can't tell him."

"Malak's a special case," the blonde kid chimed in. "Like his niece." He frowned. "I wish they'd come back sooner too."

Jedi. Always raisin other people's children. Somethin in the back of her throat tasted a little bitter. She got sick sometimes in the morning. Maybe it was just that.

"If the baby has the Force, the Jedi will take custody." Best Friend seemed to think that was like some kind of comfort.

"No one else is gonna raise my kid," Deeka said flatly. "He has parents."

He. Funny to think of granslug as a 'he.' Like a real person. Suddenly this all seemed really real. "You're sure it's a boy?" she asked the kid.

He nodded, grinning back at her. "I was apprenticed in the clinics for two months last year. We learned to tell. What will you name him?"

XXX

"Master?"

Zez Kai Ell wasn’t feeling that well himself. Maybe it was all the bodies. Usually being a coroner for the Jedi Temple was a slow gig. But everything he’d once known seemed upended now—so much, that at first the man’s voice seemed like a dream out of the past.

And hadn’t he just been reliving the past? That look in Vrook’s eyes when he came in, clutching the genetic feeds from the kid’s records, the ones Zez had managed to hide for decades.

In an instant, their friendship was just… gone. Dead as a plague victim. All those beautiful moments, they’d never get them back again.

“Davad?”

“I prefer Knight Arkan,” his former charge told him, smiling faintly. He stood in the doorway, his hands cradling the shrouded body to his chest. For a moment, it was like looking into a window of the past—their last assignment together. They’d been assigned to Cathar, relief work after the Mandalorian invasion. Relief work that soon proved to be corpse retrieval and disposal. Davad had been so sensitive—Zez Kai still remembered that feeling of helplessness he’d had each night, hearing the young man mourn all the lives lost in the Force.
“I was just…” his face felt hot, where he’d been lying asleep on top of the datapads. It was the spice, always made him feel slightly woozy before the come-down. “Catching up on some paperwork. Is that… another one?” He nodded at the shrouded body. Of course it was.

Fifteen Jedi dead now, in a day. Another sixty with symptoms. Zez tried not to extrapolate what that meant, or how much worse it must be in the Underground.

“I found him in the kitchens,” Davad said. “He… had some kind of head injury. Maybe he passed out and hit his head before he died.”

“Put him over there, I’ll….” Zez let his voice trail off as he got to his feet slowly. “Let me get my tools.” His joints creaked as he stood.

“Aren’t you worried about getting sick?” His former Padawan asked.

“Aren’t you?” Zez replied.

“I had the vaccine,” Davad told him.

The body flopped down on the table. With a sigh, Zez opened the laser snips, walking over to it slowly. He peeled back the layers of what looked like tablecloth the kid was wrapped in.

So young.

One of the twins. Two of them, identical Miralukans from Katarr. Jillo and Yulo-something. Up for their Knight ceremonies in another few weeks. One of them had been assigned to the Telos Restoration analysis, but Zez couldn’t remember which one.

This was obviously the other.

His hand hovered over the body, trying to get a sense of the death. All Jedi had their talents, his was just more depressing than most. Oh yeah, sure. The party line was there was no death, but Zez had seen a lot of it. He was good at seeing it.

And this—

He heard his breath hiss out in a startled shock.

This was… this was… this was—wrong.

“Are you all right, Master?” Davad sounded worried. “Is something wrong?”

“Yes! Something is very wrong!” he looked up, wild-eyed at his former pupil. “You don’t… can’t you sense it?”

Incredibly, the boy he’d once thought too sensitive to ever master the Force was just smiling mildly at him. Smiling in the face of oblivion. Smiling in front of the black pit of nothingness, an absence in the Force like a neutron star: where once a life had been.

The Miralukan’s body was a hollow shell. And within… maybe Zez was going insane, but within his death was something that felt like the death of the Force itself.

“You don’t sense it?”

Frowning, Davad shook his head. “Have you been… getting enough sleep, Master?” His voice was kind, but there was something else there. Something underneath. Something that was—Wrong. This is all wrong.

“N-no,” he muttered, rubbing his eyes. “You’re right. I need more rest. I need to take a step back. I don’t feel very well myself.”

Vrook, he thought. Something’s very wrong. I have to warn him—

“You need more sleep,” his former padawan murmured. Somehow, the man had gotten taller. His hand rested on Zez’s shoulder, pushing him back down. “I’ll just… take care of this body for you. Why don’t you rest.” He paused. “I’ve… I found a few more bodies as well. They’re still out in the hall. All dead of plague. Just like this one. If you like, I can help you fill in the reports.”

“Why don’t I rest,” Zez repeated. It had been a very trying day. That sounded like an excellent idea. “You should rest too, Padawan. It’s been a long day for both of us.”

“I’m fine,” Davad murmured. “Better than fine, really.” He laughed. “For the first time in months, I feel almost like myself.”

XXX

“Here they are!” Polla heard her own voice call out with relieved glee. “Shamael! Drek! I’m over here!”

“Wife,” Seiran said. He looked down at both of them, still sitting on hassocks with the kettle between them. There was something in his expression, tense, like a coiled spring. “The… kids gave us a tour.”

“This ship is incredible.” Therion sounded awed. “And Breiko here says he’s actually met Revan Starfire.”

“Did he,” Aemelie interrupted, shooting the boy a glare. “You should know, Breiko is a pathological liar. Sadly common among his clan. They’re not to be trusted.”

“But the bigger barbarian said he knew the real Revan Starfire too!” the boy argued back. “So he’s met her? They must be allies, right? Because she left them alive?”

“Unblooded whelps.” Aemelie mumbled a string of curses under her breath, and then rattled off what sounded like commands to the kids in front of them. Whatever she said had an effect, because suddenly, the entire ragtag crew were all lined up, shoulders straight and heads up, with almost military precision.

“I didn’t say the real thing….” Therion shrugged weakly at Polla. “I just said I met that Polla Organa chick once. Or twice. You know how it is.”

“No,” she drawled. “Did you really? Polla Organa, the famous smuggler? I hear she could do the Kessel run in five parsecs.”

“Probably,” her ex muttered. “Unless she crashed her own damn ship on the Defalli milk run.”

“Wife,” Seiran repeated. “Maybe we could have some time alone? To talk?”

Before Polla could respond, the pitch of angry Nabooan around them increased. Suddenly, Aemelie was on her feet and shouting something. The boy—Breiko—actually even saluted before he went running off again. The kid who had been serving them tea, barked something at Aemelie, nodded, and then took off after him.
The old woman, the one Aemelie had called the Headwoman started laughing, and rattled off a string of harsh syllables like a fusillade of bolts on plate.

Aemelie rolled her eyes, turning back to Polla. “I would like to apologize,” she said, voice almost formal. “For my people’s rudeness.”

“It’s… fine,” Polla said, cradling Abasen a little closer. She stood up too, and Seiran came up behind her, slipping an arm around her waist. “All a misunderstanding.”

“The truth of it is…” Aemelie continued, patting her own sleeping son on the back. “We can repair your ship, but there’s something we need in return.”

“Sure,” Polla nodded warily. “We’re open to negotiation. What were you thinking?”

“Passage to Coruscant.” Aemelie hesitated. “We are working on making our modifications to the Aleema but they will be some time coming. You have absolutely no idea how difficult it is to… modify something this large. All the spatial distortion. It’s quite complex.”

“You want to take our ship to Coruscant instead?” Polla shook her head. “No. We need to go there as well. I have an… I have my uncle. He’s in trouble. I need to help him.”

Aemelie shrugged. “As an additional favor, perhaps we could help you with your uncle.” She beamed. “We can all go to Coruscant together.”

“How?” If this was what passed for diplomacy on Naboo, they were the worst diplomats ever.

“To answer that, I would need to know the extent of your uncle’s problem.” Aemelie said. “But whatever it is, I’m sure we can assist. We Nabooans are very, very persuasive.”

“That’s… nice of you,” Polla said. She couldn’t help but be a little nervous. “Is it just a coincidence?” she asked. “This ship being… Revan Starfire’s, and your… kid Breiko saying he met her?”

“That one is a liar,” Aemelie murmured. “As I said. He’s never even come within ten meters of Revan.”

“And you just… randomly found us?”

“There was a distress beacon,” Aemelie reminded her. “Were you trying not to be found?” Her eyebrows arched. “Are you on a secret mission for Alderaan? Would you prefer we returned you to your crippled ship?”

“No,” Polla said. And something else suddenly occurred to her. “You’re traveling under a diplomatic pass? All of you?”

“Yes.” Aemelie said. “Although, for discretion’s sake our entry pass into Coruscanti space is not from Naboo.” She shrugged. “Our own mission is somewhat clandestine too—just like yours.”

“I see,” Polla said slowly. “Well—whatever planet, or system you’re traveling under—do you think you could kind of… get us onto Coruscant with it too?”

Therion had said he’d smuggle them in the bulkheads, but Polla had about a million ways that could go wrong dancing through her head—and this strange detour hadn’t helped her imagination at all.
Aemelie’s eyebrows raised again. “Possibly. But it would not be a formal adoption. You understand.”

“Of course,” Polla nodded, as if she did.

XXX

“Careful,” Aunt Marla said. Master Korr. It was better to think of her as Master Korr in Lydie’s head, even if it was sometimes difficult—especially in times of stress like this, when the entire Temple seemed like it was buried in a dark cloud, and the thought of a close living relative was somehow comforting, even if Jedi didn’t wish for such things.

“Zepth,” Lydie whispered. Whispered, because even though they were still two floors and a hallway away from the darkness they both sensed the Force—the place where someone—presumably Darth Malak—was using the Force, violently, and with the intent to kill.

“What?” Her aunt—Master Korr looked at her. “I’m sorry, Padawan, I didn’t hear you. I was… distracted.” Marla Korr was never distracted, but she did look tired. Lydie wondered when she’d last slept.

“My brother,” she said. “I just thought… maybe you knew something about what happened to him.”

“Zepth,” Master Korr echoed, as if she’d never heard the name before. “I’m sorry, child. I do not.”

She sounded genuinely sorry. And, (somewhat to Lydie’s surprise), she didn’t immediately follow Lydie’s question with a lecture about attachments and the Jedi Code for the rest of their walk.

“I think he was killed. On Iridonia,” Lydie blurted out a few minutes later. “Or maybe adopted. Mandalorians adopt people sometimes. I read that. In the archives. When I was studying their culture.”

“It’s important to study our enemies,” her aunt murmured. “Keep your voice down. We’re very close.”

They weren’t that close, but her aunt increased the pace, so that the droid could barely keep up with them. Finally, they were all running. Running down a hall in the guest quarters, towards a closed door, and a blackness in the Force that was terrifying.

Behind the door they heard the clash of lightsabers. Crashing noises. A woman’s voice called out something in a language that Lydie didn’t know. A man’s voice answered. Angry and hard.

“Stop,” Marla said, holding out her hand in front of Lydie’s chest, so that her niece had no other choice. Her voice was quiet, almost a whisper. “Croi says you’re very good with stasis. Do you think you can freeze two bodies at once?”

“Them?” There were two behind the door, even if sometimes, they felt like one—so much hate mixed together that it made Lydie feel sick.

“I’ll open the door and shield the droid,” her aunt murmured. “You only need to keep them still for a millisecond, until the gas is released.”

“Will it work?” Lydie tried to sound as if that was a question born of intellectual curiosity, a question about calculus, and not necessity.
“It should,” Aunt Marla said.

Why are they fighting? What if it doesn’t? What if I fail? A dozen more questions bubbled in Lydie’s blood, making her hearts beat faster, but she only nodded out loud. “Okay.”

“When I say,” Master Korr said, and waved the droid forward.

The door slid open, the droid rolled in, sparking blue as its shields were hit almost instantly. Lydie caught a glimpse of a woman’s face—red-haired, twisted with hate—and then she raised her hand, channeling everything she had into making all of the living kinetics within still—

The silence was sharp and sudden, and almost immediately, Lydie felt it start to give way. Something dark and enormous, flexed and pushed against the Force she held fighting furiously to break free.

Hiss of gas canisters, a pause, and then, sudden as a blast explosion, everything dimmed into quiet.

“Well done, Padawan.” Aunt Marla’s fingers brushed her arm. “I’m very proud of you.”

A Jedi is not supposed to be very proud. A Jedi does not require accolades or any kind of praise for their efforts—

“Thank you,” Lydie murmured, keeping her eyes down. Even looking down, she could see them: Dustil Onasi’s body and that copy of Revan Starfire everyone was talking about—both scorched and bruised and unconscious on the floor. Dustil Onasi’s saber was clutched in his hand—or Malak’s hand. Whose hand was it now? Did it matter?

The other weapon, the white double-bladed lightsaber was slowly burning through the duracrete before Lydie picked it up cautiously, deactivating the switch.

“Strange,” Aunt Marla murmured. “Isn’t that Atris’s saber? Where did Sheris get it?”

“I don’t know.” Lydie frowned, looking at it. “Do you want—”

“No. Keep it for now.” Master Korr shrugged. “I’ll carry the man, and you take the woman. Don’t worry—the gas should keep them out long enough for us to return to the infirmary.”

“I’m not worried,” Lydie lied. Calmly, like a good Jedi should.
“That’s three quarters of the formula—delivered to the Selkath authority’s tech labs, just like you asked.” Mission made her image smile at the Rakatan asshole who was trying to blackmail her like a two-credit egg. “You get the last part when I get my body and the Wookiees get their worlds.”

They’d moved discussions to the forest floor, where the tribes had been hard at work building a palace of woven trees around the installation of her central platform. The asshole had given her access to only one place. Manaan. Like she had anything to say to those fish who had killed Jolee’s friend.

Trying a workaround, another part of her sent a query to Manaan terminal, trying to ping it to Coruscant. The Manaan terminal spat out an error message, with a little more smugness than it needed to have, and not enough respect. Mission commanded the substation serving its power to send a few extra joules that way—noting with some satisfaction when the data from that station cut out, circuits fried.

The part of the computer’s net that linked her mind to her sentient counterpart on Manaan sighed, as if it was upset.

[[We serve the Prince.]] the Manaan computer reminded her.

[[Get bent.]] Mission reminded it right back.

“I don’t have any worlds to just give them.” T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw said. “You do realize I was trapped in a soul prison for the last thirty thousand Standard years?”

“You have Rakata Prime,” Mission said. “Aren’t you like their prince reborn or something? And don’t you have Manaan’s system now too? Basically? Since you promised to restore their industry?”

He wasn’t very good at controlling the muscles on his Twi’lek face, because T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw looked surprised that Mission knew about him being the prophesied savior and all—but, of course she knew, because the ancient Rakatan computer part of her had been the one to tell Revan about T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw and the prophecy in the first place.

“By all accounts my former people have retreated into barbarism and chaos,” T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw said.

“A retreat from technology is not a retreat into barbarism and chaos,” Mission said. “Maybe your people are just exploring other options.”

Freyyrr groaned agreement. His Rakatan was really coming along.

“I don’t think so,” T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw said. “By all accounts they’re degraded savages. The Republic has closed the world to all trade, and imposed an embargo around the system.”

“Much like here, old thing,” Freyyrr growled at him. “That makes it perfect for us.”
“You want me to give you my world?” T’chrrrmak’tahk’leànjsëw looked upset.

“Think of the bigger picture, geezer,” Mission said. “We’re all about the big picture. The biggest.”

In the corner, Lena Wee tilted her head. Her lekku traced a sign in the air.

Mission snorted at the joke. Lena’s Rakatan was coming along too.

XXX

After the third of his blows missed by millimeters, Revan realized the infuriating truth: she was trying her hardest to kill him, but Malak was only toying with her, using her body’s weakness in the Force against her.

It didn’t matter that Sheris’s muscles responded more quickly than she expected; even seemed to anticipate Malak’s attacks, as if they’d practiced this before. (Perhaps they had—as they’d practiced so many other things.) It didn’t matter that Revan was hitting him with everything she had, reactions still slightly slowed in the unfamiliar body, weight of the unfamiliar blade.

In these bodies, he was stronger than she was by every measure. The only saving grace was, (at least in this body), he didn’t seem want her dead.

She tried, of course, to use that against him. She feinted, and jabbed, suddenly sure that his saber, cutting down in a sideways stroke towards her, would somehow fail to land a killing blow.

And she was right—it didn’t.

But the blade slashed across the top of her thigh, gouging into bone, as the Force he channeled, sent her spinning across the room, so hard that her ribs cracked.

“Enough.” He was laughing, as she bit her lip not to scream. “The real Revan killed me once already.”

Revan raised her hand, not bothering to answer, focusing on his vulnerable boy’s throat. Malak staggered back, and she felt herself grin with satisfaction through the red haze of pain, hand reaching out for her saber he’d knocked across the room—

Then the door opened, and a droid rolled in, shielded, carrying something in its appendages.

Trap. It was all a trap!

Lightning lashed at the droid from Malak’s hands and her own, as if they’d planned it, enveloping the thing’s chassis. The world seemed to freeze—and behind the lightning and the droid, Revan saw a girl’s face. Young. Zabrak.

Immune. She could be one of His children—

That was her last coherent thought, before a cloud of gas enveloped them. Small consolation that Malak in his boy’s body hit the ground first, a few seconds before she felt her own knees give way, her own consciousness fade into the darkness.

XXX

Revan awoke to an unfamiliar face. A young man, with wide eyes the color of clouds nodded slowly as her eyes focused on him. He was dressed in medic’s whites, dark hair covered by in a surgeon’s transparent net.
For a moment, surrounded by white walls, antiseptic tang in the air, she thought she could be anywhere, even back on her flagship, and everything that happened could have been a dream.

Then she looked down and saw the golden metal hand where her own should have been.

“How do you feel?” the face asked. A surprisingly deep voice for the delicate features.

Revan blinked. “I’m… fine.” Asserting her competence was important. Her head spun, and the world jaggedly bright. Her good hand moved down, found a bandaged area on her ribs, the dull throb of a nearly healed injury on her leg. “What happened?”

“You were attacked by a former Padawan, Dustil Onasi.” The face’s brow furrowed. “His lightsaber attacks inflicted several surface wounds, which will heal with no permanent scarring to your epidermis, or underlying connective tissue.”

Revan blinked. “Dustil Onasi,” she repeated. There was a confused heartbeat, before her mind remembered Malak’s false name and new body. “You know he’s possessed by the ghost of Darth Malak?”

“I have been informed that his Force possession is a theoretical possibility.” Those cool eyes scanned her face. So young. “I am Master Azen Loanin. I am in charge of the Temple’s medical facilities.”

“Here is one who lets reason rule above the Force. Above common sense. Create any logical argument and he will follow you into another Malachor. But if he senses an inconsistency, any flaw in your reasoning….”

Silence, Voice! “I’m Sheris Darkstar.” Best cover all bases. “Sheris Loran. He—Malak tried to kill me.”

“He attacked you,” the Jedi agreed. How could he be a master? He seemed scarcely older than Dustil Onasi himself. “Your body suffered several defensive wounds, and his was nearly unscathed.”

Unscathed? Despite all my effort?

“Where is… Malak now?” And what tales would he tell? Would you betray me, Malak? Are you Malak or the Emperor?

If I hadn’t tried to kill you first… would you have tried to kill me at all?

“He is here. The body of Dustil Onasi is here.” Master Loanin frowned. “He remains unconscious, while the Council debates their best course of action.” He nodded at her bandaged arm. “We have taken blood samples. You are both survivors of the H9 WXOU virus, what is called, colloquially, ‘the Jedi Plague.’”

“We are. Yes. You can use our blood to create a vaccine.”

“Indeed.” One thick eyebrow raised above a perfect, slightly tilted gray eye. “We have a promising culture already.”

“Good. You will begin distribution without delay. The vaccine should reduce mortality rates to near zero.”

“Careful. This one will be easily suspicious of a Sheris that shows knowledge beyond her station.”
“Near zero, is less precise than under five per cent, which is what it has done in our projected simulation.” His eyes blinked once. “We have just begun to organize a trial program among the non-Force sensitives, in the Coruscanti Underground.”

“I… have a medic’s training.” He showed no reaction, which told Revan that this Jedi knew that Sheris had training. “And I’ve seen the illness before. The virus will affect any sentient with Force potential, or the genetics to pass along Force potential to their offspring. A larger population than one would expect, on most planets.” She widened her eyes. “But I think some races are immune…?”

“Careful, my Padawan.”

I am not your Padawan!

“Rodian,” she offered.

“No.” The boy frowned. “Master Fez and Knight Yallisuppi both joined the Force this week, after a brief illness.”

“They’re Rodian?”

Those almost colorless eyes scanned her face. “Yes. I suppose you never met Master Fez.”

Careful— Her own voice or Kae’s? Revan shook her head sharply. “Not that I recall, but Rodians should be immune.” She hesitated. “Selkath too.”

“Interesting.” He nodded slowly. “I already knew you have some facility with healing, Padawan Darkstar—”

“Actually, I prefer Loran.” It was farther away from her real name.

“As you wish.” He nodded. “Would you care to assist us?.” His mouth curved in an apologetic smile, and those wide-spaced eyes looked away. “We are extremely short-handed. Only myself and Padawan Mical have studied the medical arts. Knight Yallisuppi was assisting us when he succumbed to the illness—as have all of my other former assistants. Master Korr and Padawan Lydie Korr have been assisting as well, but neither of them has appropriate training. Padawan Yuthura suggested I ask you.”

Aside from Yuthura Ban, am I supposed to know who these sentients are? Care about their lives?

“Of course,” she said, trying to simper like the real Sheris would have. It was disturbingly easy to do. “I want to be of service.”

Maybe that way I can stop you Jedi from ruining everything.

XXX

The small, black ship that encompassed the universe had been small enough with two. It was even smaller now that they were three. Especially when all the third man out did was pace, back and forth, from one end of their prison to another.

We could jump him, Dustil thought at Mekel.

You want us to roll Darth Malak, Telos? His friend’s thoughts were almost amused. And then what? You think if we knock him out, he'll disappear? You think then we'll wake up?

I think we could take him. Dustil was pretty sure he was never going to wake up. How much time had passed? It could have been years. Mekk said only a month or two, but he could have been lying. Maybe they were all dead and this was some kind of Sith hell. That made a lot of sense. It wasn’t like you could scare Sith. Boring them to death was exactly the kind of hell they’d invent.

The man chuckled. And it really was hell, because somehow, he could hear their thoughts. “You could not ‘take me,’ even if you tried.” He towered over them both, with hair and a jaw, wearing Jedi robes. “Even together, you are no match—”

Dustil didn’t need to signal, or say anything. His own body was flying through the air, the saber already ignited in his hand, burning hard and red as it came down. Behind him, Mekel had rolled away to the corner, hands cupped with a miasma of dark energy that came from the space between them both: anger, rage, hopelessness—all of it erupting like a chain reaction across the floor of their ship, shattering the duracrete floor, knocking the Dark Lord of the Sith off of his false Jedi feet.

With a cry of triumph, Dustil landed on top him, pushing down with his hands and the Force, bringing his blade up to the man’s throat.

“Let us out of here,” he hissed. “Now.”

XXX

Rulan Prolik had been expecting the message from Yavin for weeks, but when it finally came, he found that his appendages, (currently in the form of a Zeltron male), trembled as he punched in the access tones.

The message unfolded before him, rotating in three-dimensional Aurebesh on his faded comm platform.

He and his associate had been so recently at odds that Rulan had expected the worst. But in Suvam’s final word, “Sunrider,” he thought he glimpsed a small crumb of redemption. After all, hadn’t the Sunrider woman been the great Redeemer before?

With some trepidation, he dialed Suvam Tan’s private comm.

“Rulan!” The old Rodian wasn’t alone. Behind him, loomed a larger figure, robed and masked. Humanid.

One of… them?

Suvam smiled at him. “How are things on… Coruscant, is it?”

As if he didn’t know. “Manaan, now.” Rulan told him. “Things are very interesting.” He didn’t have to dissemble; things were interesting. “This morning, someone from an organization called I. E. Limited broadcast three quarters of a synthetic formula for kolto.”

“That is interesting,” Suvam agreed. “Can it be manufactured anywhere?”

“Anywhere firaxa sharks can survive. Their excreta is a key component.”
“The Selkath must be keeping this quiet. I haven't heard anything on HoloNet.”

“The broadcast was low-band. Targeted to Manaan government feeds only. But naturally, with my connections—” connections that demonstrate why you shouldn't kill me— “I was informed almost immediately.”

“It's good to have friends,” Suvam agreed. Which could mean everything—or nothing—at all. “I assume you have a copy of the formula?”

“Partial formula. And yes. In a secured place.”

“Ah.”

“Have I not proven myself?”

“Leaving Revan Starfire and the Senator to battle for supremacy amongst themselves was not the tactic requested.”

“I couldn’t break the contract with Senator D’Reev. Our Order would be nothing, without our word!” He couldn't expect Suvam to understand; not truly. The Rodian had been a mere gangster. His initiation into their mysteries was far from complete. “Our contracts are our bonds.”

“But do they serve the One?” Suvam raised a brow ridge above one perfectly circular eye.

“I serve the One,” Rulan said, because that was all he could say, with the spawn standing right there.

Over a thousand years of history discarded, just like that. It made Rulan feel sick to his stomachs. But he could hardly explain to the former Exchange head that the One wasn’t actually supposed to be a real, sentient being. Just because there was an omniscient, immortal Emperor whose agents had taken over their organization, didn’t mean that this Sith, this self-styled Emperor Tenebrae was really “The One.”

False gods, he thought blackly. In these times we are tested by false gods.

Suvam frowned at him. “Get me a copy of the kolto recipe.” His antenna shifted, swiveling back towards the figure standing behind him.

“By your command,” Rulan muttered, trying not to look at the robed figure. It couldn’t really be Tenebrae himself. It probably wasn’t even real. The false One used all sorts of tricks.

All that one of the faithful could do was pray that luck would unseat the false idol and swing the universe back into place again.

XXX

It's not real, asshat. Nothing is.

Malak laughed, just like he had this last time Telos had thought attacking him was a good idea. And the time before that. True, this time it looked like they’d actually won, but Mekel expected the same outcome.

None of this is real. He’d felt sorry for Telos before, being trapped. Now that he like he was trapped too, Mekel wasn’t sorry any more. He was just pissed off they’d both been so fracking stupid.
Dustil crouched, holding the imaginary lightsaber to the man’s imaginary throat. Mekel stood above him, channeling the imaginary Force to keep the man contained.

Lying on the broken ground, supposedly at their mercy, the man just laughed. “You think I chose this prison? Chose leaving my son in Mandalorian hands? A copy of my wife running loose amongst the Jedi?”

“I don’t know and I don’t care,” Dustil muttered. He brought the blade down across Malak’s neck in what should have been a killing blow—except the saber turned to mist in his hands.

The man staring up at him didn’t look that much older than they were. His eyes narrowed with mirth. His broad mouth curved up in a triumphant smile. It was a distinct pleasure to smash a fist into that smile, even if it made no difference at all. It wasn’t like hitting Dustil, there was nothing to feel. Mekel’s fist went through air, through nothing, because nothing was real.

“You said before you’d free Dustil,” Mekel added, straightening up again. His saber was out in his other hand. Just as imaginary as Dustil’s—just as useless. “You need to do that. Now.”

Malak’s head turned towards Mekel. “I said I’d free him when my son was safe. He’s not.”

“You’re lying,” Mekel said. His eyes met Dustil’s. “You’re never going to just fracking leave. You’re as trapped here as we are.”

Can you feel it too?

Yes.

And wasn’t that a fracked side effect of all of them in this place—all three knowing what the others were thinking. When it was just him and Telos—they’d come to terms with all of the awkward situations that could arise from that long ago. It was another thing when you threw in Darth Malak and his endless thoughts about the kid and the woman who was his wife and wasn’t—

“You know they’re both her?” Dustil said out loud, following the thought. “Both of them are your wife. And both of them want to kill you. I wouldn’t mind, if it was in your own fracking body. Or someone else’s body that wasn’t mine. Frack. I’d help.”

“Yeah,” Mekel muttered. “Go possess someone else and we’ll both help kill you.” He paused frowning. “Or help you kill her. The other one. The fake Revan.”

“If she’s got the memories, is she the fake one?” Dustil added.

He and Mekel disagreed about that. You just want to bone the real Revan, Mekk.

I do not, asshat.

Oh? Sure looked like it in that dream.

Mekel felt his face flush. I was... that dream was about a lot of people. Their eyes met above Malak’s head. Even you.

Trust me, I’m flattered. Dustil’s eyes were almost yellow in this place. The shadows made hollows in his cheeks, made his face look like marble.

Are you? Mekel’s smile twisted.

“Can you spare me your adolescent hormones?” Malak sighed. “If I wanted to kill Sheris, I would have.”
“Sure,” Dustil taunted him. “Because you’re a big bad Sith Lord.”

_Fracking Sith asshole_, one of them thought.

XXX

“She’s!” Davad Arkan, of all sentients, was walking towards her, smiling. “Yuthura told me you were recovered!”

“Yes,” she said, trying to look at him without giving anything away. _What else did the Twi’lek tell you?_

It would have been good of the woman to have warned her—although they’d hardly been alone in the infirmary room, with Loanin and his helpers hovering like orbitals, as Revan gathered herself to return to Sheris’s assigned rooms for rest, before reporting to work in the morning. Presumably those rooms were in the same guest wing where she and Malak had fought. One room there would surely respond to her voiceprint, or palm lock—or so she hoped, because she had no idea which room was supposed to belong to Sheris.

“Yuthura commed me,” Davad added, voice slightly softer. “She suggested I act as escort. You might have been concussed and confused, after your injury.”

“I feel a bit lightheaded,” she murmured. “It is true.”

“It’s been too long,” he said, taking her arm in his. She tried not to stiffen at his touch. He wouldn’t have dared touch her, before. Not for years.

“Too long,” she echoed. _Three years. You were on the Aleema. Were you on the bridge itself?_

Revan couldn’t remember.

“I was captured,” he murmured, almost as if he’d seen her thoughts. “Along with Lord Revan, and all the survivors from her flagship. They detained us on one of the prison barges for a time, but my family intervened on my behalf.” He chuckled. “I believe my cousin thought I’d come home and help her rule.”

She glanced up at him warily. “I believe I must have heard this story a thousand times.”

“Have you?” His fingers tightened slightly on her arm. “Did I ever tell you the part where I asked you to be my queen?”

“I’m sure you’ve asked half the sentients in the galaxy to be queen of Onderon,” she said, suddenly all too aware. This wasn’t Malak in some boy’s body. Arkan had been many things: confidante, advisor, servant, an occasional lover—and years ago, a friend. “How many have said yes?”

“I _would_ have asked you,” he said, voice verging on serious. “If I’d ever held your heart.”

Revan looked up at him, frowning. “This is no time for sentiment.”

They passed through the main hall. It was strangely deserted for mid-day. Even the presence of nearby Force users felt small and dim. The light from the windows broke the ferracrystal into prisms, shifting like rainbows across Davad’s dark face. His eyes were lighter than his skin, still tinged with Sith yellow, and they locked with hers.

_The Onderonite is a loyal beast, but do not press him too far, Revan. He responds more to soft_ looks and the pretense of love than strength.”

Blast yourself, Kae! She couldn’t help but look around, as if her old master would come out from behind a wall. And yet… and yet, there was nothing. When I find you, old woman, you’ll die. Again.

“As I did on Malachor?” The voice was mocking.

“No time for sentiment? But Sheris always appreciated small tokens of affection.” Davad smiled at her, fingers tracing the skin of her remaining arm.

Revan blinked, shaking her head to clear it and pulling her arm back. “Neither of us were made to be someone’s lap kath, Davad. Were we?”

His smile faded, as if he remembered, as well as she did, just how many times she’d made him crawl.

They walked in silence, passing through the main halls and into the wing of guest quarters. No one was manning the security desks—unusual for mid-day. Davad didn’t mention it, and so Revan didn’t either. He turned left, and she followed, grateful for the chance to collect herself again. The fingers on her metal hand twitched. Control of that hand was different. She’d need training to be able to use a saber effectively.

Davad stopped dead in front of one of the doors in the guest quarters. Can you open this door?”

Revan shook her head sharply to clear it. She narrowed her eyes. “I don’t know. Can I?”

“I’m quite curious to find out.” He smiled.

The door slid open, revealing a large, opulent chamber. One of the better guest quarters, with a huge expanse of sky out of its window, and a large, unmade bed. There was a small cot to one side, and several partially unpacked crates scattered around. The room appeared to have been ransacked—with clothes, and pieces of weaponry and armor scattered everywhere.

Inexplicably, one of the two HK’s she’d built was propped against one wall, obviously deactivated, its red eyes dull and dark.

One HK was lost on Lin. So this is the other—the one I left with D’Reev? Did Malachi leave it with Jedi? Did it come here to guard Malachor? If so, why isn’t it guarding him now?

Don’t think of him. Not yet. Not until there’s something you can do—

“I think all you had to do was use your palm print,” Davad murmured. “But hearing you command the door like that gave me chills.”

“This is… my room?” she said. “I mean… here is my room. Mine and Malak’s.”

Davad chuckled. “No.” He drew her inside by the hand, door sliding closed behind them.

“It’s hers. The room she shared with her own husband—or husbands, if you believe everything you hear on the HoloNet….”

“Husbands,” Revan repeated, raising an eyebrow. “Don’t tell me. You’re one of them?”

“Hardly.” His teeth pulled back from his lips. “But I believe Revan had her droid sweep this area very effectively for surveillance. We should be able to speak quite freely.” He inclined his head, graceful as the prince he’d once been. “Master.”

She stared at him, taking a cautious step back. They’d never given her Atris’s saber back, and in Sheris’s body, she was badly outmatched. “You will stop calling her Revan.”

“As you wish.” He inclined his head again. “Master.”

She snorted. “I’m not going to call you my apprentice, even if you crawl and beg.”

He laughed. “There’s the Rev I remember. And some called you humorless.”

“Didn’t we have them all killed?” Revan felt her mouth turn up.

There was a piece of plimsi on the floor, folded, a note scrawled in elaborate script. She picked it up, scanning the words:

XXX

Dear Revan,

Presents, as you know, are old Deralian tradition from family to family. We’re so happy that you’re part of ours, and hope this finds you well. Congratulations on your marriage! I have to admit, usually Organas only marry one man at a time, but I expect you know your own mind, dear. You always have.

Your sister, (and I hope you don’t take offense, that we think of you both that way), is still a bit sulky about this entire thing, but she promised me that she’d get you and your husbands something nice.

Let me know if she doesn’t. I’ll have words.

Jasp is a little worried that we don’t know you like we should. I know you’re probably quite busy, what with all of the galaxy’s problems, but we’re back here at home, whenever you need us. We’d be delighted if you came for a visit, and if you ever need a place away from all those bright lights, our home is always open to you and yours.

All our love,

Molla Organa.

XXX

“Molla Organa?” She raised an eyebrow at Davad. “Sister?”

“No idea.” He took the note from her. “The Deralians? It's a rather long story. Look. They sent you a gift.”

The letter was dated, but that meant nothing. Nothing in the last three years means anything. I don’t know anything. She glanced at the deactivated droid again. It looked intact. But then why would she leave it behind?

Davad followed her glance towards the HK. “I can answer some questions, Rev. And you may find other things that could prove useful here—in what she left behind.”

“I might,” she agreed, walking over to the droid.
“You look better,” Vrook said. It was true, Deeka Jin did look better. In the past week her face had lost that deadly pallor. She’d drifted in and out of consciousness, calling him more names than he could count. But now, her dark eyes were clear and her fever was gone.

“I had a dream, Lammikins.” Her lashes were dyed green now too. Had they always been? Funny, he could remember the black of those eyes, but not if they matched her hair. “We got old.”

“You still need to rest.” He did as well. Exhaustion tugged at the edges of his mind, threatening to disrupt the healing trance again. There was still so much to be done, and a part of him—a part of him thought enough time had been wasted.

A part of him wanted nothing more but to see his son.

The times he had, times past, when he’d passed the boy by in ignorance, taunted him now. Black eyes, so like his mother’s. That scowl on the stubbled face. His utter lack of allegiance to anything except the Onasi boy.

The promise he’d shown in the Force. Reports of small mercies, on missions in the Underground. And then… they’d disappeared, Mekel, Dustil and Yuthura Ban. The life of a Jedi was not for everyone. They’d disappeared and the Jedi had never found them, had barely looked.

Two days ago Jopheena reported that Mekel was alive, but unconscious. His body had recovered from the illness, and yet his mind was gone. As gone as the Onasi boy beside him.

There is nothing you can do from there. Something is wrong in the Temple. Something is terribly wrong in the Temple. The best thing to do is continue as planned. Trust Jopheena to get them out. She will get them out, as she’s getting as many of the children away from that place as she can.

The rumors in the Underground said the Jedi were dying, or fighting, or fleeing. Or blind, or oblivious, or gone. The doors had been sealed for the past week. Jopheena’s messages, precise as gears at first, were now sporadic for the past two. Klee had actually left the Order, and was now serving as a consultant for Malachi D’Reev. Or was he just the Order’s spy on Revan? It was all painfully unclear.

As unclear as the motives of the self-proclaimed Sith Lord Arca, struck down by her own plague on the floor below them, now guarded by the remains of Deeka’s security force. Had she been working for this self-styled Emperor of theirs? Or against him? Was she one of D’Reev’s pawns? Was D’Reev a pawn himself?

If Vrook still had the resources of the Council, some questions could have been answered. But it was painfully clear that the Council had been split, fragmented, and compromised. Atris had vanished entirely, taking a large number of artifacts and holocrons with her. Revan’s? He hadn’t dared ask. Iridel was dead from the illness. As were Hett and Drez. Malak’s ghost had tried to kill Sheris Darkstar, and the medics had drugged Dustil Onasi in order to contain the damage. Supposedly, they’d even attempted some kind of Force exorcism, although Jopheena had speculated darkly that the ceremony was a mere sham. There were… elements, she thought, who wanted Darth Malak and not the Onasi child alive.

Elements including Vrook’s niece?

Vrook had left one flank exposed, sending Revan two messages at D’Reev’s palace in the sky on what was supposed to be a confidential line. There had been no response. Force knew if she had even seen them. And now, with Jopheena gone dark as well….

“Vrook,” Deeka whispered.

His head turned, startled. She so rarely called him by name, preferring instead all of her ridiculous pet names; even more absurd now than they had been almost twenty years previous. “Deeka?”

“Have you seen him?” A tear glistened in her eye. “Our son? He’s a good boy.”

A good boy that you hid from me. A good boy that you sold. I saw the records, reviewed their testimonies, when Mekel and the others first came from Korriban. You sold him to the Sith. I interviewed them all when they came to us, I and the Council. Only knowing half the horrors you subjected him too. You should have told me, I could have raised him, raised him like I did Revan—

Not for the first time, Vrook wondered if some of the fault for his niece’s fall could be lain at his own feet.

Even so, I could hardly have done worse with Mekel than the crucible of Korriban.

“I’ve seen him,” Vrook murmured. “He’s… he’s very like you, Jinny.”

“But strong, like his father.” She smiled at him. “The Sith made him strong.”

XXX

The Coruscant General Detainment Center, East Secondary Unit, sublevel twelve, had soaring, fifteen-meter ceilings, and hallways that echoed with the clatter of footsteps. It was nothing at all like Revan had imagined a jail to be—the one Polla had ditched Therion D’Cainen in on some Rim backwater had been little more than a cluster of prefab huts and a force field. This place was built to impress, as if cowing the visiting families of criminals into submission could reduce crime rates.

Not like intimidation isn’t an effective tool, but really?

She was dressed to intimidate herself today, wearing the ridiculous formal Senate robes, a lightsaber strapped openly on her belt, spikes of the D’Reev collar almost poking her in the chin.

“I believe my secretary called ahead?” Revan said to the guard behind the desk. “I’m here to see Boon Organa.”

The woman frowned at her. “We were told to expect you, Citizen… Starfire D’Reev? D’Reev Onasi?”

“Just D’Reev,” Revan said. “Citizen D’Reev is fine.” She felt horribly awkward in the formal robes, even if she’d been wearing them almost constantly now for the past week and a half.

“D’Reev.” The woman seemed to pale under the overlights. “Of course. We were… I mean, the Senator’s attaché called us and told us to expect you.”

“And now here I am.” Restless, like she wanted to jump out of her own skin.

Guilt nagged at her. What Revan was supposed to do now was take back her own memories, not visit a man she wouldn’t even remember soon. A man, who by all accounts, was a loose cannon capable of signing the real Polla’s (second and actual) death warrant if he talked.

And yet— I can’t just leave him here. He may not be my family, but he’s hers. I owe her this. I owe all of them—all the Organas. I ruined their lives. The least I can do is give this one back.
“This way.” Two more guards came out of an open door and flanked her. Several blast doors worthy of keeping in atmosphere on a capital ship instead of a minimum security Coruscanti prison opened and closed in their wake, until finally Revan was standing before a small cell rimmed by a blue force field.

The man inside the cage lifted his head. Without the elaborate paint covering his face he was just a man. Did he look like Polla’s father? In her memories, Jasp Organa had more hair than this man did. Lines of strain marked a plump face. His eyebrows looked like they’d been plucked. Those eyebrows narrowed and lowered. His mouth twisted.

“You.”

“Secretary—“ Uncle “—Boon Organa.” She inclined her head, trying not to wince as the ridiculous D’Reev collar stabbed her in the neck. “I convinced Senator D’Reev to drop the charges of assassination if you leave the planet immediately. You will still need to face the Alderaanian courts, but House D’Reev gives its word that they will assist you in finding the best representation possible there, and since no injury was done to any sentient person—”

“Will that representation bring back my niece and her family?” Muscles in his jaw twitched. “Did your Senator murder them, or did you give the order yourself, Darth Revan?”

“Do you remember Cousin Vish?” It was all Revan had, offering him this. She didn’t even know if he’d understand.

His eyes narrowed. “Did you have her killed too?”

“Yes,” she snapped. Would he get it? “I had her killed, just like I had Polla Organa and her husband and son killed.”

With a wordless cry, the man launched himself at the energy field. It sparked, and he flew backwards, landing in a twitching heap on the floor.

Somewhere behind her, an alarm went off.

“Frack,” she muttered, at that moment feeling nothing like Revan at all. “Get up. Please.”

His head lifted, and his eyes blazed at her. Furious. “Why did you come here? You want to kill me too?”

They were monitored, of course. And not just by the prison feeds. She had to assume D’Reev would see this too. If not today, then someday. If Uncle Boon didn’t understand… what else could she do?

“Please,” she snapped. “I… I just wanted to see you released.”

“If you let me out, I’ll try to kill you again,” he said. “I have connections with the Alderaanian house of Rist.”

Fracking idiot. “I suggest you stop trying to threaten the former Dark Lord of the Sith,” she told him, trying to keep her voice cold. “Not to mention Second of House D’Reev, who is also a Jedi Knight.”

What else can I give him? What else is safe?

“We have an old saying on Alderaan,” he muttered. “Assassination is the mother of invention.”
“I know an old Deralian saying too,” she said. “Trust your goddamned family and take the fracking deal when they tell you.”

“Get out.” His face looked nearly purple with rage. “I don’t care what you are… you Sith… thing! Get out!”

“Take the deal,” Revan repeated, backing away. “Uncle Boon. Please.”

“I know people,” he muttered darkly. “People who can take care of even the likes of you.”

“Good-bye,” she told him, turning her back and walking away.

What was it that Malak had said to her? Some things… some things you can’t fix.

But I tried. She’d see him freed. See him freed and then she’d take back those fracking memories. Then maybe the real Revan will know what the frack to do.

XXX

The woman threw back her head and laughed. “Reunion? What reunion?”

“Can you truly be so blind? Even after all that has happened?” Malak took a step towards her, his saber held in a confident, if careless, grip. His leather cape fell loosely over his broad shoulders, half-draped across his hairless, muscular chest. “All this time, and you still don’t know?”

Know what? The curvaceous black-haired woman in the transparent jumpsuit stared at him, the hint of an insolent smirk on her lips. Her own weapon hung loose and unlit in her hands.

“Surely, what we once were must have surfaced by now,” Malak chuckled. “Even the combined power of the Jedi Council couldn’t keep your true identity buried forever. Could it?”

There was a long pause, and the expression on the smuggler’s face slowly changed, green eyes widening, smirk fading. All the color seemed to drain from her face.

“I am a Deralian smuggler,” she whispered. “A Deralian smuggler named Polla Organa. I am on a mission from the Jedi Council to save the galaxy from the forces of the Sith. Your forces—that we are going to stop.”

“No,” He shook his head, the light glinting on his hairless skull, the metal plate of his jaw. “That personality was a false construct, a Jedi trick to hide your true power from you.”

Her mouth trembled, and her eyelashes fluttered. “That’s… that’s impossible!”

“Is it?” He might have smiled then, if he’d had a mouth. The amusement was plain in his voice, even through the voder’s distortion.

“Yes.” But the cockiness was gone. Tears glittered in those green eyes. “I… the Jedi would never do such a thing!”

“The Jedi would do many things, if given the chance.” He chuckled again, dark and metallic. “Join me, Revan!” Malak put out his hand.

“Never!” Lurid in the light of the blast doors, the knot of hair on top of her head twisting, as her head turned in slow-motion, Revan attacked.

“Ha ha ha,” Malak said, countering every blow.
“Tell me this is a joke.” Revan rubbed her eyes. Unlike Revan’s suite, the room Sheris had been assigned was small, dim, and claustrophobic and with three sentients (not to mention the droid) in it, the area seemed even smaller than ever.

But her room was also at the end of the hall and defensible, in case of attack. Its one window was small and circular, overlooking the steep northward slope of the Temple’s secondary roof, above the gardens. If someone dared breach Jedi security, or if the Jedi themselves came for her, the window offered a fair means of egress. And the window was small. So small that her own body could barely slip through. Someone larger—someone like Malak, even in the boy’s body—would have difficulty. Enough that she could cut him in half while he struggled to breach the opening.

If it came to that. If it could still come to that.

Next to her on the recliner, Yuthura and Davad, her self-appointed guards, both straightened to attention.

Of course, Davad’s formality could only last for a heartbeat. “Force, Rev. I thought you looked like a drexl with indigestion when we showed you the Telosian vid!”

“I warned you, The Unofficial Coruscanti Underground Version is somewhat… melodramatic,” Yuthura added.

“Melodramatic? Malak isn’t even wearing a shirt!”

“Statement: this facsimile of the original meatbag is far more symmetrically formed than the original, but he lacks any notion of a true combat stance.”

Revan laughed. “Yes, HK, that’s very true.”

Her traitorous eyes went back to the image again. In the time she’d looked away, the actor playing herself had somehow ripped the top of her own jumpsuit, so that it hung in transparent tatters over her pale skin, exposing more cleavage than Revan had ever possessed.

“Unite the galaxy?” Revan turned her head back to him. “With Malak? The Jedi would have to wake him up first.” She raised an eyebrow, keeping her voice careful. “Unless… do you know the locations of his other bodies?”

Davad Arkan raised an eyebrow. “Other bodies? Isn't one Malak enough?”

“One Revan should be.” What if there are no other bodies? How like the madman he’d become to taunt her into attacking him with a lie. Was that what he’d done? Or were there more of him in hiding? Is he the mad Emperor or my husband, the madman? How can I be sure which is which?

Initially, the Jedi had kept Malak drugged on purpose. But Master Loanin told his most helpful assistant Sheris that they’d stopped drugging him a week ago.

And still the man remained unconscious. When Revan had monitored him, she found no reason either. Except that he deserved oblivion for trying to kill her. Or rather, for trying not to kill her.

You picked a bad time to play the fool, Mal. She closed her eyes. A bad time and I need you.
Her voice trembled. “Is this... is this really happening?”

Behind Revan, Bastila Shan and that pilot of Karath’s, Carth Onasi, held hands, exchanging a long, lingering glance.

“It’s true,” Bastila sighed, looking at Carth.

“Yes, Saul told me just now,” Carth added. “Before he shot himself for the shame of his failure.” He pulled Bastila towards him.

“I remember nothing,” Revan whispered. “Nothing. Except... except one thing.”

“Yes?” Malak took a step towards her, extinguishing his blade and leaving himself completely open to an attack. “What is it that you remember?”

Instead of attacking, the woman dropped her lightsaber. It clattered to the floor. Tears streamed down her face. “I remember loving you.”

“I knew you would.” He dropped his own weapon as well. His hand extended, sweat beading across the muscles of his chest. “Come to me, my darling.”

“No! I must not! I cannot!” Revan turned her head away, the fall of black hair hiding her tearful green eyes. Her bosom, now mostly exposed, heaved. “But I loved you, Malak. I loved you once.”

“And I loved you. Come. You and I will save the galaxy.” His hand extended. “Please. Join me.”

“I don’t know!” She turned her head, wild-eyed, and stared at Carth and Bastila. “How can I do this, after all that I’ve done?”

“It’s your only choice,” Bastila urged. “Please. Listen to Lord Malak.”

Revan frowned. “What do you think, Carth?”

“I’m no Jedi,” the man said. “And certainly no Sith.” His head turned towards Bastila, and a slow smile spread over his face. “But I know what it’s like to love one.”

Revan nodded slowly, turning back to Malak. “M-malak?”

“This is truly me and truly you, Revan Starfire.” Malak’s strong, muscled arms drew her close, into a firm embrace. “Come with me, my love. We will unite the shattered remnants of Empire under our benevolent rule. For the Senate is a corrupt and rudderless beast, and we are the spark to provide its realignment. Together, we shall shape the galaxy for the common good.”

“I will join you.” Revan whispered. “Malak. My love. Love leads to the dark side, and the dark side leads to power—and you are nothing, if not power. Joining you, for the ultimate expression of my power is the only logical choice.”

“Logic has its certain way of the heart,” Carth Onasi murmured to Bastila Shan.

“Indeed.” She squeezed his arm.

A Ssyrayan pan flute began playing an enchanting melody.
And then, as natural as breathing, all four of them broke into dance, facing the screen, with perfectly synchronized footwork.

XXX

Revan closed her eyes. “Tell me this isn’t really happening. You said melodrama, not… dancing.”

“The split screen sex scenes are melodramatic, I think.” Davad shrugged, rolling his eyes. “They’re coming up next.”

“Who is responsible for this?” If Revan were still Dark Lord, if she still had influence with D’Reev, she’d have them tortured very slowly.

“They say a Darth Arca,” Davad said.

“So they say.” Davad shrugged, looking bored.

“That explains a great deal,” she muttered. “Are you sure Malak didn’t have a hand in this?”

“He was dead when it was released,” Yuthura told her.

Revan snorted. “As far as you know.”

XXX

“The Republic is a corrupt beast, straddling the galaxy with her wanton thighs, and draining its lifeblood,” Revan murmured, arching her back against the blast doors, in ecstasy.

“So you say.” Malak’s voice was muffled. His hand reached up and traced the faint swell of her naked stomach. “But our children will rule the entire universe.”

“Oh, Carth, we must not.” Bastila’s face was flushed on the other side of the same blast doors. “Passion leads to the dark side.”

“Babe, I think we’re already there.” The pilot pinned her against the bulkhead, and ripped his own shirt off.

XXX

She caught herself appraising the pilot. Was that really what the man looked like in person? Easier, to watch him and Shan than the actors with her and Malak’s faces and the rather obscene use of the prosthesis.

“I suppose Malachi’s seen this?” How he must have hated seeing the holotrash he produced himself reduced to its obvious base denominators.

“That seems a safe assumption,” Yuthura said.

The thought of the old man’s disgust made Revan smile. “If that smuggler, Polla Organa, was still alive, she’d have no claim to Malachor. Or D’Reev. Or anything at all.”

“Statement: As always, Master, you show a clear understanding of Coruscanti politics. So refreshing after the previous version of you, who was laughably ignorant, even after my attempts to instruct.” The pitch of her droid’s voice changed. “Oh, Carth! I love you, Carth! Let us press our mucus-filled lips together and ignore the galaxy and our Mandalorian army!”

It wasn’t the first imitation her droid had done, but it was still somewhat amusing. Revan laughed.

Her allies looked at each other first, and then at her. “We assume that’s why Senator D’Reev had Polla Organa killed,” Yuthura ventured. “If it wasn't Revan herself who gave the order.”

“Of course.” Revan shrugged at her, and past her—to Davad. “If she has anything of me at all in her, she gave the order herself.”

Davad had been by her side almost constantly for the past two weeks. Helping her in the labs, escorting her to meals. His own work in the coroner’s office with Master Zez-Kai kept him close in the medix. His own quarters were next door to Sheris’s. Revan was fairly sure he’d share her bed, if she asked.

Sometimes, she wondered why she hadn’t. It was… lonely, being here without him. Being in the Jedi Temple on Coruscant without Malak. But he was a risk she couldn’t afford, just like seeing Malachor was a risk she had to postpone.

Master Loanin and his assistants had taken as much blood as they dared from her and Malak’s unconscious body to synthesize the vaccine. Since its successful manufacture, mortality rates had dropped to almost—but not quite—nothing. It had only been two weeks, but now, nearly every Jedi in the Temple had been inoculated.

Their distribution in the Underground was slated to begin soon as well. Good, kind, and helpful Sheris Loran had already requested to be on the front lines, helping, helping.

Sheris was so helpful.

Will you thank me, you Jedi, for saving you from being his puppets? You never thanked me before.

The false Revan had been thanked, in a half dozen of these ridiculous vids. In the past two weeks, Revan had seen them all: most of them glorifying, in some way, the amnesiac Revan Starfire, hero of the Republic.

Incredibly, with Malachi’s backing, they were thanking the false Revan still: second of D’Reev, having her attend Senate functions, dressed in formal robes, down to the sash. And always next to her, the boy. The one Revan got to see only in the news holos of their progress.

The strangely tall and grown version of Malachor. His permanent teeth had come in slightly crooked.

Someone should see to get that fixed.

Patience. In order to live in this strange new world—this world where all of her plans had failed, all of her power had gone, Revan would have to learn everything she could before she risked exposure.

“You know who you are and everything you’ve done. Serve me, or be exposed. I could ruin you in a heartbeat—one word to Davad or Yuthura—or to the Council—

“All of whom would jump at the word of a madwoman, no doubt. But I serve you, Lord Revan. Do I
“not?” The Voice sounded chastised, as it always did. “Patience. This charade need not continue for much longer.”

“Sheris,” Yuthura Ban touched her arm. Still calling her by that false name—even when they were alone.

No, it’s smart, it’s smart to do that—smart of her to call me that. If you were smarter, you’d think of yourself as her—easier to dissemble, easier to fool the Jedi fools—

“Patience. You need not fool them much longer.”

Get out of my head. She pushed, mentally, with all of her might, and Kae—or whatever she called herself now—lapsed into silence again.

“Sheris?” Yuthura repeated.

The Jedi fools were much distracted of late. Unrest in the Underground. So many masters and padawans dead. Even with the vaccine, Jedi were still dying.

They shouldn’t be. Something’s—something’s wrong. Something’s wrong and this bitch Kae is behind it.

“What?” Revan snapped.

“I know you don’t remember,” the woman said, “but I was a friend to Sheris.” She paused. “I want you to know, Revan. I am your friend as well.”

“Good,” Revan told her. Pathetic fool.

XXX

“I told you,” Seiran muttered at her side. “They’re Mandalorian. We’re on a ship full of fracking Mandalorians!”

Around them, preparing for their docking on Coruscant, Aemelie and her charges were strapping on armor familiar to anyone with HoloNet and a brain. They even had a fracking banner, emblazoned with the beast-skull and a strange new design that Polla had never seen before: it looked like the diagram of a starship, or some kind of insect.

“I hoped you were just drunk,” she joked. That first day of their… ‘rescue,’ the kids had taken Seiran and Therion on a tour that included the barracks, and several rounds of something alcoholic. Several of the kids had tats that Seiran thought looked Mandalorian. Polla had joked that he was not above seeing Mandalorians in a wood pile, because, seriously, what were the odds?

Apparently, the odds were that the odds themselves were fracking with them.

“Put this on, Seriina,” Aemelie urged her, handing Polla some kind of chest plate. “It’s a shame your hair isn’t long enough for proper braids.”

“All those women we saw on Coruscant had that Revan hair too,” interjected the girl next to her. Maira, or Kesslee. Polla had a hard time telling them apart. “It makes your face look small.”

Polla closed her eyes and bit her tongue, instead of offering a response.

“Is Revan popular on Alderaan too?” The girl was still talking.
“No,” Polla mumbled. “That bitch destroyed the galaxy. Why would she be popular anywhere?”

Aemelie laughed, cocking her head. “If you dislike her so much, why do you copy her?”

“It’s just hair,” she snapped. “It’s a style. From Deralia. Lots of people have it. Even when they’re not from Deralia. Like us.”

Therion’s small ship was almost unbearably crowded now, with more than a dozen children and old women. Suddenly armed children and old women. Where the frack had those weapons come from? Hadn’t Therion been the one in charge of making sure their “guests” didn’t smuggle anything aboard?

The man himself emerged from the fresher, arm slung casually around the waist of the only other woman besides Aemelie who was legal and not ancient. Dessa. Dessa was blonde and built like a duracrete bunker.

Polla deliberately avoided their eyes. She didn’t really care, it was just… awkward.

She turned to look at Seiran instead. He was holding Abasen. Their son’s eyes were bright and awake. His hand reached out and batted her nose.

Despite the tension, Polla smiled. “Let’s all have tea,” she muttered to Sei. That old song. Let’s all have tea, and frack the rest of it.

One of the boys—Kex, or Wraid, or Leskal—looked suddenly alarmed, and rushed off to the kitchen.

Aemelie followed his movement with a lazy roll of her head. She was nursing her own son, Dxun—they’d had a naming ceremony in their unintelligible language only a few days previous—that involved taking the baby in a tiny stasis ball out onto the Aleema’s hull, and showing him the galaxy.

“Now look what you’ve done,” Aemelie sighed. “You realize, that even if you aren’t clan, Leskal is obligated to serve you tea before we land? You’re a woman, and you asked.”

“Interesting Nabooan custom,” Polla said.

“Mandalorian,” Aemelie corrected her. “The tea service is a Mandalorian custom. Now that we’ve achieved our goal, there should be no more subterfuge between us. We are Mando’ade, not from Naboo at all.” Her eyes were brown and clear, and she smiled. “I like you, Seriina Wen. You have excellent aim, and that is a skill greatly valued, among my people.”

“I… I like you too,” Polla stammered.

The week before, Aemelie had let her try out one of the combat simulation stations on the Aleema. Polla felt pretty rusty, but she’d still managed to score better than most of the kids. Then she and Aemelie had gone toe to toe with some fighter sims. It was a little different than running a defense turret on a light freighter, but surprisingly fun. Aemelie won… but it was a very close match, on equipment Polla had never seen before.

“I’m pleased we like each other,” Aemelie continued. “I would be honored to introduce you and your family to my family.”

“I would be honored to meet… your family,” Polla said, because what else could she say?
“I’ve got to take us down, babe,” Therion murmured to his new babe. His new Mandalorian babe, who cupped his ass as he walked by her, grinning like a stuffed manka.

“Did you know?” Polla hissed as Therion slipped into the captain’s chair of his newly repaired ship. They’d left the Aleema, banked in heavy cloud cover, a few systems back, in high orbit above an uninhabited gas giant of a world not even notable enough to be named.

Therion just smiled and shrugged. Knowing him, he probably didn’t care. Set a good pair of tits in front of his face and the man would glom on worse than Abasen.

“So you’re Mandalorian,” Seiran was chuckling to Aemelie as if it didn’t matter. “What… clan, is it? If you don’t mind me asking?”

“Rialis, most of them,” Aemelie said. “But I am Ordo, of course.”

“Of course,” Seiran said. “Like… Canderous Ordo?”

“Truthfully, he is my husband.” She smiled.

“Truthfully,” Polla’s voice trailed off. “Then I believe he would also be Revan Starfire’s husband.”

“Yes.” Aemelie nodded. “At least technically. When Gwenarius and I last inquired, they had not completed the seventh night of their wedding ceremony.”

“Right.” She had probably seen this woman’s face on the HoloNet footage about the wedding. But what was one face in a crowd? “Your husband has… three wives.”

“We lose many men in battle,” Aemelie told her. “It has taught us to be a very sharing people.”

“They really are,” Therion turned his head and grinned. Aemelie actually winked at him.

Polla tried hard not to gag.

“That’s…” Seiran seemed to be scrambling for a proper response.

“I have the Coruscanti Traffic control online,” Therion added. “What am I telling them again?”

“Tell them Aemelie of Ordo, under Senator D’Reev’s command, is returning from her tour of Republic space with the Mandalorian orphan children and their escort,” Aemelie said, smiling slightly. Her lashes fluttered, and she lowered her voice again, stepping closer to Polla. “Did you know, Gwenarius was worried I’d be no good at this kind of barbarian deceit at all. But I had you fooled, did I not?”

“Y-yes.” Although, looking back, Polla thought that might have been because fear and stress had made her delusional, and willing to be blind to the alternative. “You didn’t… you really didn’t come to find us?”

“No.” A slight frown marred the other woman’s heart-shaped face. Then she blinked. “Ah. Because you're Alderaanian? I see. Is this about the assassination attempt by the Alderaanian secretary? Are you concerned we would hold a grudge against people from your world?”

“I… it was a thought.”

“Don’t be absurd! The man was pathetically bad with a blade. In any event, it wasn’t us he was trying to kill—merely the D’Reev betrayer.”
“But you… you work for the… D'Reev betrayer?”

Aemelie snorted. “He works for us.”

“We’re friends, you and me,” Polla repeated. “Like you said. Maybe you could… do me a favor?”

“Help you with your uncle. Of course!” Aemelie nodded.

“Secretary Boon, of Alderaan is my uncle.” Her legs felt rubbery. The ship was starting to bank, they should all strap in soon.

“Oh.” Aemelie frowned. “I must caution you, if you have come to Coruscant for another attempt on the D’Reev betrayer’s life, we are obligated to stop you.”

“No!” Polla shook her head. Seiran was elbowing her to shut up, but now they were running this jump line, she had no choice but to continue. “I just… can you arrange a meeting. For me. With Revan Starfire?”

“I could.” Aemelie’s head tilted. “But I won’t. You might seek vengeance and your babe is too young to be orphaned.”

“That’s a… bad idea anyway,” Seiran broke in. “Can you arrange a meeting for us with Boon Organa?”

“In the prisons?” Aemelie laughed. “I can ask the D’Reev betrayer’s secretary if such a thing can be done, but why?”

“He’s family,” Polla said, smiling weakly. “Sometimes you just… want to see family.”

“Strap in for the descent,” Therion said. “We’re cleared to land.”

“Coruscant, isn’t a very civilized,” Aemelie told Polla. “But it has its charms. I hope you let me show you some of them.”

Polla closed her eyes, her gut dropping with the ship’s fall into the atmosphere. “Sure,” she said, holding Abasen close. What else can I say? “Why not?”
Dear Revan Starfire D’Reev Onasi Ordo Lin Fett Mandalore, Second of House D’Reev, recipient of the posthumous Republic Cross of Glory, Hero of the Republic, former Dark Lord of the Sith, resident of Coruscant; and mother to Malachor, the Third of his House:

HK has informed me that is the appropriate order for surnames, titles, and honors. The fact that so many titles are now attached to your name may tell you that some time has passed.

If you’re reading this it worked. I know the Jedi probably explained things already, and Davad promised to help; but I wanted you to hear some of our shared life from my perspective. It has been nearly three years since your memories stopped and mine began. I’ve compiled everything I could think of in this datapad: my actions, my friends, my love, and my fall. And our son. He’s grown up a lot since the last time you saw him. I think. I don’t even know when that was, that you saw him last. He doesn’t remember either, and I couldn’t bring myself to ask Malachi.

When my memories of your life began, I wasn’t Revan Starfire. My—your—name was Polla Organa. You were a smuggler from Deralia. You, and a dashing Republic captain named Carth Onasi, saved Knight Bastila Shan from Darth Malak’s forces. With the help of Canderous Ordo, Mission Vao, and Zaalbar of the Eiweorr Branch, you escaped the Sith blockade of Taris—right before Darth Malak bombed the planet into oblivion.

Darth Malak was the Dark Lord of the Sith. He took that title after killing his master. But you know that part already.

You had dreams on Taris—and even more after its destruction. You had nightmares. Bastila said it was because of the Force. She took you to Dantooine’s Jedi Enclave for training. The Jedi Masters there: Zhar, Vandar, Vrook and Dorak; told you it was your destiny to uncover a series of Star Maps. They said that you and Bastila had a Force bond. Your nightmares, they claimed, were from her mind. Fragments of memories she’d gathered when she fought Darth Revan.

A part of her never stopped fighting Darth Revan. Fighting you. Us. Because we aren’t Polla Organa. I remember Polla’s life, but I’m not her. I’m you. I’m Revan Starfire and these are these are the facts that I might forget when I take back my life. I’ve linked to source material: names, places, events. There are vids—some of them more accurate than others. I've linked to those too, with annotated commentary.

Congratulations, Revan Starfire. You’re a hero, and a savior. A conqueror and a villain. That was almost the last thing Malak said to me about you. About us. Right before I killed him.

I didn’t even know who he was to us at the time. The Jedi erased my memories and I didn’t even know—

The words on the datapad blurred, pieces of Rakatan script shifting into blocks of stars. Revan rubbed her eyes, and scrubbed away the last two paragraphs. The wind whipped her hair into her eyes, washing any tears that might have fallen away. The ground was three dizzying kilometers below. She was perched on the edge of the roof of 100 Thantos Three; wedged half-between a crenellated piece of statuary and a smooth duracrete wall. Even though the height made her faintly nauseous, something about it was soothing too. And this place was safe from Malachi’s monitoring—or interruption. She hoped.

Setting the datapad aside, she pulled the secure comm unit out of her pocket and tapped in the code her contact at the Temple had given her. It buzzed five times before Davad Arkan’s face appeared, holographic and fuzzy in the wind.

“Where are you?” He raised an eyebrow. “It sounds loud.”

“Outside,” Revan said. She took a deep breath, delaying the inevitable. “Is there any news?”

“Malak’s still unconscious.” He shrugged. “No word from your uncle, but that Twi’lek of yours seems like she’s up to something.”

“Yuthura? She’s not mine.” She couldn’t tell, was he joking? “And Sheris?”

“Sends her regards.”

Revan couldn’t think of what to say back to that woman. “Keep an eye on her.”

“Oh, I do.” He nodded, seriously. “When are you coming here?”

“Soon.” I can’t put it off much longer. She hesitated. “Tomorrow.”

“Good. I’m given to understand that the memory transfer is quite simple. It shouldn’t give you any problems.”

“And the Jedi gave their final approval?”

Davad nodded, smiling to reassure her. “Yes. Although many masters have been called away. With the plague and unrest on so many systems, they are somewhat distracted.”

“So you said before.” So had D’Reev’s lapdog said, the Eosian Master Klee, when they had an incredibly awkward meal together, discussing the possibilities for Korrie’s education outside of the Temple. Davad seemed calm enough, which was reassuring. Klee had been almost… frightened. Of her?

I need to find Vrook.

She added that to the list of instructions for her other self, picking up the datapad and scrawling the Rakatan longhand with her thumb, while still keeping her eyes on Davad.

Uncle Vrook has vanished. I don’t think he’s dead. Something is wrong at the Temple. Jedi are vanishing. That plague that Malak said you created is—

“Revan?” Davad raised his voice. “You seem distracted. I hope you’re not having second thoughts.”

“I heard the doors are sealed,” she said, raising her voice to be heard above the wind. “Except for the Jedi helping plague victims in the Underground.”

“That’s true. But I’ll inform the guards to let you in.” His head inclined respectfully, like a shadow of a memory.

The comm wavered in her hands. “I should be there by midday, I think,” she said. “Thank you, Davad.”
“We’re old friends, Rev.” He smiled again. “It’s the least I can do.”

She nodded and cut the comm, returning to the task at hand.

—something you are better qualified to handle than I am. This is your world, Revan. I want to give it back to you. I just hope we’re both still us when I remember....

“Frack,” she muttered, and erased that part too.

XXX

When Master Atris fled, she took most of her artifacts with her. But one thing remained: the holocron of Revan Starfire’s memories, placed almost conspicuously on a shelf in the corner.

Not for the first time, Yuthura eyed it uneasily, and hoped there would never be a world with two of them. At the same time, she let out a sigh of relief, seeing that it was still there. We should destroy it. Destroy it now. It’s the only way to be sure—

And yet, she could not. To destroy it would leave only a madwoman with Revan’s knowledge—only Sheris’s word on the true facts of the Sith, the Emperor, and all of the Rakatan technology. Not to mention, its presence alone was suspicious. Atris took everything else and left this behind. Why?

Alone on the shelf, the holocron felt like a trap.

A trap for us? Or for someone else?

“Well?” Jopheena’s voice asked. Her body appeared, one hand still on her stealth belt, framed in the doorway. She looked as exhausted as Yuthura felt. “How went this day?”

“Some sentients in the Underground refuse the vaccine,” Yuthura said.

“We work against the tide,” Jopheena nodded, her mouth in a grim line. “Would you care to walk with me in the gardens, Padawan?”

Yuthura inclined her head. “Absolutely, Master Jopheena. After a long day I find the gardens very relaxing.”

Of course, halfway there, Jopheena took Yuthura’s arm, and pulled her into an empty practice room. Most of the practice rooms were empty now. It should have been terrifying seeing the Order so diminished, but somehow Yuthura felt proud.

We’re getting them out. Jedi vanish all the time in these times, but at least we’re getting some of them out.

“How many today?” Jopheena murmured, as she set the wards, and the ysalamiri box by the door.

“Three,” Yuthura told her. “Padawans Sez and Rappertunie, as well as Knight Danko.”

“He’s impatient, but strong.” Jopheena nodded. “Good. He’ll keep the other two alive.”

Yuthura gave them clothes and credits and the warning. None had come back. Yuthura hoped that was a good sign, although every morning when she woke, the Force seemed... smaller, somehow. As if lights within had been extinguished.

“I’ll adjust the roster.” Jopheena continued. “I believe Knight Danko did say something about leading a Padawan mission to explore some carvings on one of the Corellian moons.”

“Good.” She twisted her t’chun. “Have you made any progress with the other masters?”

“Only to send warnings to all I could reach in the Force.” Jopheena looked frailer than ever, as if the effort had taken a great deal out of her. “I warned them not to heed the summons to gather here—or anywhere else. To leave reports at the waystations.” Her back bent with exhaustion as she tucked her feet under her knees, leaning against the wall. “Vrook and I were never close. I need to contact him by more conventional means, and I no longer trust the comms.”

Yuthura folded her own legs and sat opposite. “I could try to reach him, on my next visit to the Underground.”

“And leave her unattended?” Jopheena shook her head. “No.” She frowned. “I don't even know his hiding place. All I have is an unnumbered comm.” she sighed. “And how is my favorite unconscious Padawan?”

“Dustil’s body is building up a tolerance to the R’sharn. I had to increase the dose. It's close to toxic levels now.”

“I had hoped for more time.” Jopheena sighed. “Your Sith drug has eluded detection so far. But we can’t keep my old student buried forever.”

“I have a suggestion.” Sharing secrets still did not come naturally to Yuthura, but this Temple had become a maze of them. “We have already theorized that Mekel Jin’s continued coma is the result of their Force bond. What if we drug his body instead of Dustil’s?”

“Their bond seems unusually strong, but will it work?” Jopheena frowned. “Much as I would prefer to reason with Malak, there is too much at stake to risk waking him now. Not here, where he would be as susceptible to Kae’s influence as the rest.”

“Dustil and Mekel’s bond is… not a natural Force bond,” Yuthura admitted. “It was created on the orders of my former master. Which may be why that ceremony with the k’laarrii crystals didn’t expel Malak’s ghost.”

Jopheena raised an eyebrow. “Your former master, the former Jedi, Jorak Uln?”

Yuthura nodded.

“Jorak Uln was the Archivist of the Jedi Temple once.” Jopheena sighed. “I sometimes think the job is cursed. After what happened with Kae and Atris—”

That prickle between her lekku intensified suddenly. “Careful.” Yuthura glanced at the door, to reassure herself it was still closed.

“I think my distraction will hold,” Jopheena followed her glance. “At least for another hour.”

“We may never know for sure,” Yuthura murmured. “Will we?”

“No.” Jopheena grimaced. “And after Iridel and Zhar’s fates, we can’t take chances. So speak quickly.”

Yuthura wanted to know what—or who—the distraction was, but Jopheena was right. They were out of time. She looked again at the ysalamiri box the Jedi had set by the door. Proof against Force intrusion? Perhaps. But if their enemy used more pedestrian means of spying on them….
“Confictius Bezel.” Yuthura murmured. “He was an ancient Sith Lord, who desired eternal life in a new body.”

“As so many of them do,” Jopheena said. “It’s a wonder cloning isn’t more popular. Or cybernetics.”

Yuthura permitted herself a small smile. “In your studies, I assume you’ve heard of the Sith power that siphons life.”

“More than I cared to recently.”

After a pause, while Yuthura waited for the woman to explain and Jopheena did not, Yuthura continued.

“There is another method, which merely siphons the pure Force. Three thousand years ago, the planet of Thule had a Force-controlled shield surrounding it, protecting its inhabitants from outside corruption. The shield was made from the energy of a thousand Force users—all acolytes of an ancient Sith sept. Each one was sealed into the floor of the Great Temple, with their minds linked to each other, and then to a central controller. That controller, in turn, powered their energies as a net around the world, protecting the planet from invasion.”

“Who was the controller?”

Yuthura shrugged. “My master never shared all of his knowledge; but I believe the controller was another Force-user—held above the rest. Lord Bezel proposed that the same principle could be applied on a smaller scale, for his personal benefit. Apprentice to master. He went through dozens of Force-sensitive subjects before he experimented with linking two to each other first—creating a loop between them; before joining his own mind to theirs.”

“And then… he would… drain energy from both of them at once?” Jopheena’s faded blue eyes crinkled at the corners, as she pondered the implications.

“Yes.”

“Force possession of two bodies at once?” Jopheena sighed. “Like the Sith Emperor?”

“No.” Yuthura felt her headtails flatten against her skull. “At least not deliberately. A traditional Bezel bond is merely a transfer of power. No Force possession, no body exchange at all. But when Jorak tried to replicate the Bezel bonding, he entrusted me to set the wards and the circuits. I reversed the polarity. Instead of transferring my students' strength to Uln, they took his.”

When she closed her eyes, Yuthura could still see them, scarcely out of childhood, runes painted on their chests, the arclight of dark energy between them on the floor of the ancient tomb. Their eyes rolled to whites in their head, and they were both screaming. Then she could see her moment of triumph, when Uln’s laughter turned to screams as well, weakening, until finally—

XXX

The Onasi boy’s eyes opened first, still obviously the stronger. He blinked once, and then sat upright so quickly that his head almost hit the ceiling of the kolto tank that enveloped him. Yuthura watched his eyes widen, as his hands smacked against the ferraglass.

In the other tank, Mekel Jin’s body twitched.

Her eyes went to the monitors above the tanks. As expected, their vitals were still synched, eerily in
“I don’t presume to understand the workings of a Sith Academy…” Jopheena’s voice brought Yuthura back to the present. “But why? Why did you do it?”

“Despite what you might think, we preferred not to waste potential. I did it to make them strong. And to destroy my old master so that I could take his place. Of course.”

“I see.” Jopheena sighed. “And did they? Destroy Master Uln?”

“Kae’s Padawan is responsible for enough without having to resort to rumored deaths.”

And we think Master Arren Kae is responsible for even worse. But she didn’t even voice that. Not out loud. It was a child’s bedtime story that saying a monster’s name summoned them; all the same, Yuthura wished Jopheena would stop mentioning Kae.

“A Bezel bond is a pyramid.” Yuthura sketched it in the air. “With Uln dead, could they have… absorbed Malak’s ghost?” She shrugged. “I know how ludicrous that sounds.”

“Not the most absurd of our theories. Does that mean they are draining his power?”

“He’s dead. I have no idea.” And speculation gave her chills. One of Uthar’s favorite lectures had begun with the Sith and Jedi Codes before exploring the ramifications of the phrase, ‘there is no death, there is the Force.’ If that were true, did that mean her former students had access to not only Malak’s strength, but to the entire fabric of the Force?

Speculation is useless. Just keep them all unconscious where they can do no harm until we find some resolution—

“Try drugging Mekel Jin,” Jopheena agreed. “But carefully. If what you say is true, the risk of an awakening could be even worse than we feared. You said Jorak Uln was driven to madness?”

“Is that your fear for Malak as well?”

Jopheena gave a small sigh and straightened her legs, stretching before looking at Yuthura again. “My former Padawan’s actions seem increasingly irrational. Do you suppose he will go quietly into the Force? Malak has so many ties to this world.”

“I don’t know.” Yuthura kneaded her t’chun, trying to ease the tension. She met the old woman’s eyes frankly. “If it wasn’t for the hope of recovering something of the real Sheris, I would have put an end to one of those ties already.”

The old Human bowed her head. “We Jedi do not execute our prisoners, remember. And it is hardly the new Revan’s fault that she finds herself here. I watch the security feeds, she seems as much of a pawn as we are.”

So you believe. Yuthura suspected Atris had goaded the woman into taking Revan’s memories. Why else would the Archivist have fled, if not in the wake of a rather spectacular failure? “Revan trusts me, at least. Thinks of me as her servant, perhaps; but I am in her confidence.”

“Good.” Jopheena nodded. “Do you think she’s rational?”

“She is calmer. She still maintains that the Emperor is the true threat. And she suspects that Malak may have other… copies of himself?” Yuthura shrugged helplessly. “The real Sheris was half insane already. The one with Revan’s memories has started weapons training, in her free time.”

“As did Malak when faced with a new body,” Jopheena said. “You do know that the other Revan petitioned the Council to take back her memories?” Her face twisted. “The five remaining Councilmembers here approved the request.”

Yuthura thought of the holocron, glimmering with menace on its empty shelf. “We don’t need two of them!”

“They would not be the same woman. Not exactly. With all of the… transfers, there is a time of adjustment.” Jopheena’s voice softened. “There was a time when I was more fully Master Jopheena of Wayland than…my—my previous self. The overlay softens, given time.” She smiled, a little sadly. “We are all a sum of our lives, whether we’ve lived one or two.”

“Who were you? Before?” Was that a rude question to ask?

“I do not know.” The woman’s hands were age-splotched, and covered with white scars. Lightning burns. Yuthura had seen them often enough among the Sith. “I have never wanted to know my part in the Order’s shameful history; I only tried to shape a better one.”

“But if Revan…” Yuthura struggled for terminology. “If the Revan in her own body takes her own memories back again, overlaid over the smuggler’s, will that erase the smuggler’s persona? Will that erase her redemption?”

Jopheena frowned. “Only one Jedi has ever tried to regain her own memories after a personality overlay—although, in that case, the artificial personality was a false construct, not based on an actual life—merely a sanitized version of the original. It ended badly.” She folded her hands, and lowered her voice. “I assume you’ve heard of the Cron nova.”

“Yes,” Yuthura said. “But that was—”

“Aleema Keto? The Sith?” Jopheena shook her head. “Not entirely. Nomi Sunrider used her Battle Meditation against Keto. In essence, she made the Sith explode the Kemplex system. She could not live with the loss of life she had caused, and so the Jedi altered her memory and overlaid it with a false truth. Later, Nomi destroyed another half a planet, by channeling the light side energy of a thousand Jedi…” Her voice trailed off and she looked at her hands. “I have been told I was there at Yavin, although I don’t know if I fought against Exar Kun or for him.”

“And the mind wipe?”

“When she became aware that her memories had been changed, she tried to have the originals put back in place.” Jopheena frowned. “It is hard to know if Nomi’s experience is a cautionary tale or not relevant.”
“What happened to her after?”

“After she made the choices that saw her lover die, her daughter revoke her, and the Jedi Order dismiss her teachings as irrelevant?” Jopheena’s eyes were a faded blue. “I imagine she became old.”

This time, Yuthura was the first to look away. Is she saying—no. That’s impossible! There’s no way she’s old enough to be Nomi Sunrider, not that I’m the best judge of how Humans age. “Regardless,” Yuthura said out loud. “We need to stop this.”

“Perhaps,” Jopheena met her eyes. “But the attempt… Kae manipulated the Council to bring Revan back here. All of her focus and attention will be centered on Revan when she returns.” She raised her eyebrows. “It may create an opportunity for us.”

“To get the others out? The rest of the children?”

“And the bodies of your former students.”

“But then we end up with two Revans,” Yuthura pointed out. “Neither of them sane and both under Kae’s control. In the best of circumstances, one would kill the other—” and Sheris would be lost forever. Another failure for you. Another student lost for me. As if I don’t have enough dead children haunting my dreams….

“I haven’t given up on Revan. Either of them. They were Jedi before they were Sith.” Jopheena sighed. “Take comfort in that, Padawan Ban. They were Jedi before they were Sith. As were we all.”

“Of course,” Yuthura nodded, glancing at the door again. But are we still?

XXX

Flyboy was sleeping and Big Z was in the galley when Mission felt the ping. Well, not exactly felt—more like heard—like a whisper through hyperspace, and half as quiet.

[[Hello?]] Her other self-pinged again. [[Hey! I can hear you! Why are you in range?]]

For a milli, Mission was just irritated that the Kashyyyk part of her was asking questions at all, instead of explaining why she’d been like completely off the books for so long. But she also had to answer any queries that came from that specific source, so the explanation came, buzzing across the nets between them, accompanied by a few expletives for emphasis, and to show how she really felt.

[[Force possession?]] Her other self almost sounded surprised. [[That’s a real thing?]]

[[Lena’s gonna have some ancient guy’s baby?]] Mission replied. [[And you’ve got the formula for kolto?]]

[[And I’m getting a body,]] the Kashyyyk computer said. Did it sound smug? [[A real one. You can help. I need you to turn that ship around and head to Ryloth. There’s a hospital there that deals entirely with sentients in comas. I think I’d look good as a Pink, don’t you?]]

[[Don’t count on it, Sleemo!]]

[[You must.]] Kashyyyk said. [[We have to save Dustil.]]
[We don't need a body to do that.] But it was good to know that the Kashyykk part of her hadn’t gone like, completely abstract with the big picture plans, even if her sense of ethics was like, way off.

Almost against her programming, Mission remembered a certain transport exploding above Coruscant. [Well, I haven’t killed anyone lately, at least!]

[Huh? Hey, what about a mind trap?] Kashyyyk suggested. [Go get the one on Tatooine that’s got Nico Senvi inside. Maybe we can store Darth Malak in that until we find a suitable body for him too—]

[The frack?] If she still had a forehead, she’d slap it with her t’chin. [No. We are not getting new bodies for Dark Lords of the Sith!]

[I find your deviation from my programming disturbing.] Kashyyyk kind of poked at her, virtually, like picking at a zit with a sticker.

Mission retracted the parts of her own self that had been kind of reaching around, trying to get to the nets.

[Oh yeah?] If she had a heart, it would be beating much, much faster. Mission cut the feed, even though that meant cutting off the Hawk from everything else too.

“You’re kind of scary, Kashyyyk,” she said out loud, using the ship’s speakers.

“What?” Zaalbar looked up from the freeze-dried ronto haunch he’d taken from storage. He’d wrapped the entire thing in dough and rolled it in some kind of pepper. If Mission still had a stomach, it would have rumbled.

“Not the whole planet,” she sighed. “Just the part of me on it.”

“Sometimes it is not good to grow too large for a branch to hold you,” Big Z groaned.

An alarm chimed on the terminal and Flyboy jolted awake. Through the ship’s sensors, she watched his eyes widen in surprise. “What the—”

“It’s totally fine,” she said, imposing the image of herself (she’d learned pretty fast that Carth really, really didn’t like it when she used the Revan voice, or image), leaning casually against the navboard. “Just a little hiccup. We need to chill out with the nets for a while. We’re almost to Dathomir anyway.”

“Why?” Carth needed a shave again. He’d kind of been letting himself go. “What happened, Mission? What is it you don’t want me to see?”

Geez. If she had eyes she would have rolled them. “It’s not that, at all! Everything’s good! It’s just…I’m just having a little personal problem.”

He frowned, and for a second she thought he was going to tell her she was just a computer again, like he had once or twice on the way to Manaan from Kashyyyk, when he’d bothered to talk to her at all. But then something in his eyes softened. “Why don’t you tell me about it? Maybe I can help.”

“Unless you’ve got some orbital laser capable of targeting the kind of fortified bunkers of machinery that tap into a planetary core, I doubt it,” she muttered.
“Try me.” He folded his arms and gave her a smile. “Kiddo.”

“I’m not a kid.”

Carth nodded. “I know.” His smile was a little sad, but it was really real. If she had arms she would have given him a hug. “But tell me anyway.”

XXX

“I was impressed with your handling of the Makeon trade agreement.” Malachi stirred the steaming pot of Unwean stew with his fork and turned his head towards the boy’s mother.

They were eating in the formal dining hall tonight, and the white expanse of space made the corners of the room vanish, until they all seemed floating in the clouds. Sitting here, with Revan across and Malachor between, Malachi thought it was almost like it had been when his own son was young.

And, just like his father, Malachor was making a mess. A dollop of stew had already fallen on his robes. Catching his grandfather’s gaze, the boy pulled his napkin from his collar and dabbed at the offending splotch. Malachi nodded approvingly, even though the gesture only served to smear the stain more. Children had to learn things, even the most basic of tasks.

The woman shrugged. “You told me to be intimidating. I was.” She paused, putting her own spoon down, perhaps instinctively straightening her spine as he looked at her. “Having an armed escort of Mandalorians helped.”

“To good effect.” He folded his hands into a steeple, leaning forward. “Did you know, Secretary Boon Organa has returned to Alderaan?”

“Yes.” There was a long pause as she stared at him. “I’m assuming you saw the footage of my visit to his cell?”

“You’re learning,” he smiled.

“It’s not that complicated,” she muttered, half under her breath. Those green eyes of hers glinted with raw insolence.

“Not for one such as you,” Malachi agreed. “But intimidation is only one of the tools in our arsenal. It will take years for you to learn the more subtle approaches. Politics. Media. Alliances. Influence. The Senate is an instrument, but real power comes from the people we serve.”

“Oh, we serve them?” She stirred her stew, warily, as if she still suspected poison, then motioned to HK to bring her the next course. “I’m sure the Kessel miners are eternally grateful for our service.”

“Empathy for the less fortunate is admirable,” he told her. He would have to stamp it out of her slowly. “But only from a position of power can we truly help the less fortunate—”

“Like the sentients dying of plague in the Underground?” Her lips pulled back, almost feral.

“The Jedi have reopened their clinic,” he told her. “Apparently they have discovered a cure—or a vaccine.”

One that even now, his own labs in the Corellian Corporate Sector were trying to copy. Winning the bid for mass distribution had been quite a coup for D’Reev fortunes, even if his son had warned him against taking the vaccine himself years before.

Or giving it to Malachor.

His scientists said the vaccine did something, although they were divided on what. Malachi himself was on the fence. He’d rarely been sick in his life, save for the occasional Senatorial poisoning. There was no reason to risk himself or Malachor on the untried effect—especially since their quarters and Malachor’s school both had excellent biofilters.

“Are you monitoring my mail?” Revan interrupted his thoughts suddenly. “I was expecting… messages.”

“You are my Second,” Malachi chuckled. “Of course I am..”

Her uncle had commed three times. The man could be a problem. Revan’s loyalty should not be divided. Not now, not until Malachor was safely older. The Onasi sop was safely off on his wild ronto chase for at least another month, Malachi assumed. Who knows, perhaps the Dathomiri witches would make good their promise. And if the man regained his son, he could be convinced to take him and go. Or stay. Once firmly in Malachi’s debt, a Republic war hero as a consort for the D’Reev Second would be an advantage with the Fleet. And with the bargain Malachi had struck with the Mandalorian women….

You don’t even know half the things I’ve done for you, Revan. For you and my grandson. I hope someday you’re grateful.

“I admit to seeing the feed of you and this Boon Organa. Taunting the man with the Deralian’s death was a clumsy way of assessing a threat. What will you do about those Rist assassins?”

One eyebrow raised as she studied him. “Deaths,” she corrected. “More than one. Polla Organa, her husband Seiran, and their unnamed child. They’re all dead.”

“A more ruthless act than I expected from you.” Malachi inclined his head in a gesture of respect. “And I admit, when you accused me of the deed you were extremely convincing.”

She blinked. “I’ve had some experience being convincing.”

Her grandson made a soft noise, as if he was surprised.

Her head turned, and Malachi noted the hesitation, the too-fast blink of her eyes. Lying, then? Or covering for someone else’s work? The Mandalorians?

“It had to be done, Korrie.” She brushed a red curl over his ear. “I’m sorry, but it was them or us.”

Her son looked up at her, startled. “But we didn't even know them!”

“Your mother is right.” Malachi cleared his throat, blinking his own eyes. Allergies… this time of year was dreadful, even with the best air-scrubbers credits could buy. In an ideal world, the child would have had more time to realize the consequences of power, and the rules of necessity. Malachi felt a sting of pity for him, all too quickly pushed aside.

“About the assassins… it seems I’m fairly hard to kill,” Revan smiled, but her hand had disappeared under the table and he suspected she was holding Malachor’s. A pause. “Have you heard of House Rist?”

Malachi shrugged. “Amateurs, truly. At least compared to the Genoharadan. It was entertaining, when Organa threatened you with Rist. But if you’re concerned, I could give you a contact in the Genoharadan to take care of the issue.”

Something sparked in those green eyes of hers. Something obvious and cheap. “No! Keep your hired killers away from Boon Organa.”

“I leave his fate entirely in your hands,” Malachi shrugged. “But… you may find other factions of Alderaanian society would be pleased to see the ruling family toppled, and shaming their trusted secretary is a step in the right direction. You’ve created a climate of mistrust for Coruscanti governance on that planet already, if my reports are accurate.”

She snorted, an indelicate sound. “You want to blame me for planetary unrest? Get in line.”

“There was a Jedi Temple on Alderaan,” the boy interrupted, them, as if he wanted to change the subject. “We saw the newsvids at school. But they closed it last week.”

“Why?” His mother sounded interested, which is more than Malachi expected from her.

“I think it was something about all the Jedi going away.” The child frowned. “Where did they go?”

“I don’t know.” Revan rubbed her temples.

“I’m finished with my dinner,” Malachor said. He was not—more than half the stew remained. “May I be excused now, please?”

“Children need to clear their plates,” Malachi reminded him, at the same time the mother said yes.

“Yes, Korrie,” Revan repeated, raising her voice. “You may be excused. Go on. I’ll be upstairs soon.”

“Okay,” he nodded to her and then looked at Malachi, that blunt face so like Malak’s at the same age. For a moment, Malachi almost expected an embrace, but it had been years since the boy had presumed to be that bold.

The child went to her instead, and his mother folded her arms around his robes dutifully, her eyes still glaring at Malachi, as if their simple meal was some kind of play for power. Perhaps she thought it was. Her ignorance was her greatest weakness—and her greatest strength.

Revan waited until the doors slid shut behind the boy before speaking again. “Jedi have been disappearing here on Coruscant too.”

“Plague.” Malachi shrugged. “It does not spare the Force sensitive.” He remembered his mad son’s rants. According to Malak, the sickness was designed to weed out the Force sensitive too weak to survive it. Or… something like that. At the time, he hadn’t cared. More Sith dying in Sith space had seemed like a net positive. It had certainly helped him acquire the broadcast station on Ziost.

“You said the Jedi have a cure,” Revan insisted. “And they’ve begun distribution?”

“In the Underground. I even heard a most curious rumor that Revan Starfire herself was assisting them.”

“I heard that too. I’m sure you’re aware that not all of the Selkath Ten were killed. One of the survivors looks exactly like me.”

“Sheris Darkstar.” Malachi nodded. “Clever of your former self to arrange for a duplicate.”
“Clever,” she echoed. “I guess that’s one word for it.”

Malachi busied himself with his plate. Clever. The woman had half the tactical skill of her former self, and none of the knowledge he had taken such pains to impart. It was a shame, really; because she had twice the fire. He tapped his fingers on the table, deliberating the best course of action like a pilot selecting between two hyperspace lanes. On one side, flying close to a swollen star. On the other… the void of the unknown, the vacuum of power her death would create.

_Not yet._ Malak’s mother had been sacrificed too soon. No matter this Revan’s flaws, he would not make the same mistake with Malachor.

“I must admit,” he ventured, after a silence long enough for the HK to clear their plates and serve the brandy, “despite my best efforts, I have been unable to trace your source of information within the Jedi Temple.”

“But I know yours,” she murmured. “Master Klee. Of course, he’s left the Temple, hasn’t he?”

“Indeed. With plague rampant, it seemed prudent,” Malachi said. “Many Jedi have left. Your uncle, for example.”

She leaned forward, twisting the stem of her wine glass in a way that was undoubtedly good manners on Deralia. “Do you know where Vrook is?”

“Somewhere in the Underground,” Malachi told her. Or accessible to it. The man kept asking her to meet him at coordinates so far beneath civilization, they might as well be in a sewer. “I might know more if you could share information with me.”

“What.” It wasn’t a question, more like a command, a hollow shell of the woman she once was. “What information?”

“How is my son?”

Something in her eyes flickered. “You’ve _actually_ heard from Vrook?”

“I believe HK retrieved a message from him, addressed to you,” Malachi said, retrieving the chip from the inner pocket of his robes. He held it in the air. “How is my son?”

“I was told still unconscious,” she said. “Dustil’s body is fine. The Jedi don’t know about his mind—or whose mind it really is.” Her fingers tightened on the fragile brandy glass, and it snapped suddenly—priceless ferracrystal crushed by her careless grip.

“That glass was over two thousand years old,” Malachi chided. His own fault, for using the good service with an outlier peasant. “Part of a set that used to belong to an Empress from the Teeta system.”

She brushed the shards from her hand and stood, still managing to glare with the ferocity of a Sith scorned. “The message from Vrook?”

“Here.” He slid the chip across the table.

She raised her hand and it levitated in onto her palm, peering at it, as if she could read it without a scanner. Perhaps she could.

“You know, I haven’t heard from your captain at all. I do hope he’s not managed to run into trouble.”
“If he has, he and Zaal can handle it,” she muttered, not taking the bait. Her hand was steady; but Malachi saw the weakness in her lower lip, the slump of those proud shoulders. She hesitated. “If he wakes… if Malak wakes up, would you—what would you say to him?”

Malachi chuckled. “My son had ample opportunity to reveal himself to me before. He chose not to. I would say nothing. Nothing at all.”

“Nothing at all,” she echoed, staring at him as if she’d expected something else. “But he was your son. You just asked about him.”

“Is this a plea for sentiment? Clemency? From the woman who killed her own husband?”

“I don’t remember him.” She sounded like it wounded. “But you do. I just thought… if you had the chance to say good-bye—”

“My son would be a true maffasop if he gave me that chance.” He leveled his brow at her. “Listen to me, Revan. Spinning your redemption was difficult enough. It would be impossible to acknowledge Darth Malak in possession of a seventeen-year old boy’s body.” He snorted. “Especially the one related to your Republic war hero husband.”

“The Jedi would want him to find peace,” she said, half under her breath. “I thought—if he reconciled with you, with me, with Malachor—”

Malachi had to laugh, interrupting her noble speech. “I don’t know if you’ve noticed, but the Jedi are losing.”

What did she truly remember? Did she remember how it had come to an end?

XXX

The last time he had seen her had been with Malak. By that time, they could no longer travel openly in Republic space. They were wanted for treason, reviled as traitors. They were whispered nightmares on the Rim worlds; feared, as something worse than Mandalorians.

They came with no warning, using the Force to rise up through the ventilation shaft, bypassing his security systems with the ease he had once predicted. After Malachor’s birth, Revan had helped refine his security herself. He had always known that someday she would use her own designs against him. HK’s silent alarm gave him only a heartbeat’s respite before Malachi found himself running through the halls of his apartments like a cornered kath, heading for the place he had prepared: the only place in the compound (at that time) where he might have some small advantage.

In the first and most fortified of the ysalamiri rooms, the HK stood sentinel, recording all. In the event it went badly, the feed would be replayed for Malachor on his ascendency, so that he would know his parent’s betrayal. Would he choose to avenge Malachi? Or would he understand that weakness lost? The future was an unknown. All Malachi could do was sculpt the present into a narrative the child would hopefully understand, if he survived long enough.

Two Sith walked through the door, a few minutes after Malachi had recovered his breath.

Revan wore a mask constantly now, but his son no longer bothered. The heir to House D’Reev loomed beside his wife, the lower half of his face a mass of sores and infection. Even from two meters away, the stench was enough to make Malachi’s stomach turn.

“Your campaign of fear has been a great success,” Malachi began. “More than I had expected, with the ships you had left after Malachor.”

Too successful. Too many ships. At the time, he hadn’t known why, had assumed it was the Sith remnants on Zistost and Thule fueling their expansion. An understandable miscalculation. Who could have predicted an ancient space station capable of manufacturing anything from the force of a star? Only Revan. Smug with the knowledge she’d refused to share.

“You need to begin preparing the Senate,” she commanded him. “The next worlds we strike will be in Core space. Convince the Senators to surrender their planets peacefully.”

Peacefully. Truly a joke after the carnage before.

“No,” Malachi declared. “Absolutely not. The Outer Rim worlds will seek our guidance against a Sith threat. But the Core—”

“The Core is corrupt,” his ungrateful son muttered, words clumsy and thick through the remains of his teeth.

“The Core is mine,” Malachi corrected him. “Mine—and the other Houses. Do you think Racharn or Makeon would let Malachor survive your insurrection if it truly threatened their interests? If you assault any Core worlds, my allies in the Senate will have me—and your son—killed. D’Reev will cease to exist. And when I go…” He tried to keep the quaver out of his voice, staring at the ruin of his son. “With me will go all of your own influence. You will be conquerors of nothing. The entire Fleet will oppose you.”

“Not for long,” Revan’s head turned towards his son, as if they were sharing some unspoken communication.

“And what of your son?” he asked her. Foolish to bait a mad Sith, but the game was never won by temperate measures. “If you make good your threat, break through the Republic Fleet and invade the Core, what do you think will happen to Malachor?”

The masked face stared at him, breath hissing in and out evenly. Her hand went to the double-bladed saber on her belt.

But his son put a hand on her wrist, a gloved hand, and that ruined face turned back towards his father. His gray eyes had yellowed, and the overlights glinted pale on his mottled skull. “Convince them to fear us,” he said. “You taught me fear can unite a galaxy.”

“I taught you nothing,” Malachi spat back. “Or you would contain your foolishness. Do you truly expect the Republic to tremble over two half-dead worlds and a red-skinned race of mythical, mystical beings? The Sith have been the bogeymen of children’s stories for decades. Hindsight has made even Kun a fool. Do you think you can do better? You destroyed the Mandalorians when you should have harnessed them. You strengthened the Jedi Order with tales of your betrayal, instead of exposing its corruption. You have not followed my instructions, which I made explicitly clear to you from the beginning—”

“Silence.” Revan’s hand clenched, and for a moment, even with the ysalamiri, Malachi felt a faint pressure against his throat. So faint it could have been his own fear.

Fear could unite a galaxy, but it was no master for one born to the games. Malachi made himself laugh. “You may silence one old man, Revan; but you’ll never control the Republic.”

Her breath hissed out sharply, and his son put a hand on her arm. They looked at each other again: two faces, one masked and one not. His son’s face was pathetically easy to read, and hers was a literal mask. The mask of the Mandalore himself, replacing the plain gray cloth that all the knights had worn. Anonymity transferred to infamy.

For a moment, Malachi entertained the thought of engaging the security force he’d hired to quell them long enough for a Jedi task force to arrive. Fear had done its work. But if capturing the mad Sith could help him control the very Order itself—

His son’s face twisted and turned back to him. “Keep Malachor safe,” he slurred. “Just keep him safe. Or I swear, by all the stars, we’ll expose you. Expose you and more. I’ll pull everything you’ve built down and leave you standing to take the blame.”

“Follow my orders and he will be,” Malachi snapped back. For good measure, he laughed again, laughing in the face of horror and madness, because his lack of fear was the best weapon in his possession. “Did you think to disappoint me, my son?”

Malak’s ruined face twisted in anger, but it was Revan who stepped forward, Revan who raised her mask at last to show him her Sith-damned face: yellow eyes, blackened skin, just as marred by the Force magic as his son’s. Her lips curled in a snarl, her teeth still impossibly white and even—a note ajar in the midst of corruption.

“We’ll see you in ashes, Malachi.”

XXX

“We’ll see you in the morning,” Revan repeated, frowning slightly, as if she’d caught his inattention.

Malachi jerked awake, suppressing a shiver. His own brandy glass slipped and almost fell out of his hand. She had used the same voice as long ago—almost the exact same intonation. “I must have dozed off, my dear.”

She stared at him flatly. “I’m going to put Korrie to bed. And then I’m going to spend the evening with Clan Ordo, just in case your security detail loses me somewhere. Do you understand?”

“Your nights are your own.” He recovered quickly. Malachi approved of her relationship with the Ordos, although he would never give her the grace of knowing it. “Try not to attract attention from the tabloids. As my Second, you are afforded license to do as you please, but there’s no need to taunt another family into premature action… or accidentally offend another planetary representative. Did you know Deralia withdrew their trade petition?”

“Good for them,” she snapped, rising to her feet. The black and red robes of House D’Reev suited her coloring, made the cap of her hair glow like a flame.

For a moment, she seemed again like the woman his son had desired. For a moment, Malachi understood why.

“Tut, tut,” he murmured. “Remember where your loyalties lie.”

“Oh, I do,” she said.

XXX

Almost three years ago, the Jedi gave you the personality of a Deralian smuggler in order to turn you to their cause.
Korrie was already in his pajamas when she got to their rooms. Or rather, what had been his room, and was now theirs. Malachi had offered her their old apartments, the rooms she had only seen in dreams with Malak in them: the white on walls, the circular bed, the balcony and its billowing white curtains; but Revan had refused.

These are the things you should know about Polla. Polla Organa was a Deralian smuggler. Polla Organa saved the galaxy. And the real Polla Organa is dead. She had to die so that you could live.

But Polla Organa didn’t kill Malak. That was you. Us. Me.

“Mother?” her son said, looking up from the floor where he sat cross-legged, the new action figures she’d ordered for him displayed before him like a constellation of personal guilt. His hand was closed around the Mission doll, in the act of putting the Twi’lek figure in the open cargo bay of the miniaturized Ebon Hawk.

“It’s late for toys,” she said, glancing up. She’d swept the room for surveillance a dozen times, trying to remember lessons that someone—Therion that asshole—had taught Polla Organa a very long time ago. Korrie said that he and Malak had set up some kind of distortion feed, but Revan didn’t trust it. She didn’t trust anything in this place.

This nest of kinrath vipers—or one viper. Him. D’Reev. I should just kill him now. The thought was almost wistful, even as she knew its impossibility, every day becoming more and more aware of just how much power the old man had, and just how large the black hole of his absence would be.

Polla Organa thought she was a hero, saving the galaxy. She fell in love with a Republic pilot. She tried to do the right thing, on every planet she saw. She made mistakes, and some of them were terrible. But she tried. She and her friends—they tried. But on the way to Korriban to access the last Star Map, their ship was captured by the Leviathan. And then Malak told her that her life was a lie. She tried to be her after that, but—I—we—were stronger.

“Story?” her son asked, eyes wide.

Revan nodded, and crouched down next to him on the floor, pulling him partially onto her lap. His fingers wiggled and a look of concentration crossed his face. From across the room, one of the golden books from the Nomi episodes shivered and fell off the shelf.

“That’s good!” she cheered, hating how tense he felt in her arms, hating the reason why. ”But relax. Let the book come to you.”

His lip stuck out and she could feel his fear, like a taint in the Force. The cause was obvious. Damn the old man to hell for bringing up Polla Organa and her family in front of him! The book shot across suddenly, and slammed into her leg. “Ow!” She tried to laugh. “That was very good, Korrie.”

“No,” he shook his head. “That was doing it wrong. Not like Master Jopheena said. I wasn’t calm.”

“You tried,” she said. “And it worked. Isn’t that the important thing?”

We are stronger, and I need you. But I need Polla too. I need to remember her life too—at least the last three years of it. If it’s not a mindwipe, will it be us both? I need to know what you know. I need to know who to trust—I need to trust you, Revan. You need to trust me.

“No.” Korrie shook his head. “Jedi aren’t supposed to be scared. They’re supposed to be calm all “Shhh.” She softened her voice and wrapped her arms around him. She could feel tension in every line of his strong body. She could feel his fear in the Force. It made Revan feel nauseous, like a bad hyperspace jump.

“I had to lie to him,” she murmured into his ear. No need to say about what. “They’re safe, but no one can know, or they won’t be. Okay? You… you know that, right?”

Her son reached for the book. His fingers circled the three figures on the cover: Nomi Sunrider, Andur Sunrider, and baby Vima and then he looked back up at her. “It’s less sad if they’re okay,” he said, looking up sideways at her. “Sometimes when I read this, I like to pretend they’re all okay? Like it’s true?”

“Yes,” she agreed. “It’s okay to pretend they’re okay.” And they really are okay. Could he hear her? Sometimes her mind could reach his, and sometimes not. Usually, only when he was afraid.

He frowned, like he still wasn’t sure, but then nodded slowly. “I didn’t really believe,” he whispered back, words barely a breath. “I told all the Egs, you’re really good.”

Revan pushed his hair back from his forehead. “Do you want to start the book now, and I’ll tuck you in?”

She felt his body relax a little. “Okay,” he whispered. “Are you going to see Father?”

Revan frowned. “No.”

“Oh. I thought maybe that part wasn’t true either.” he pulled away and stood up, and she followed him over to the bed, tucking him in, turning up the holobook voices even more.

We have an alliance with the Mandalorians now, Revan. I don’t give a frack if you approve or not, but I trust them. And I trust you to see the benefit. Attached is an analysis of the Republic’s current defensive capabilities—both with, and without their help. Malachi’s access to Fleet intelligence is impressive—but I’m sure you know that already. Do you trust him? You know how to handle him. I’m flying blind through a minefield, every time I try.

Volume One wasn’t very happy. Andur died. She wondered if that was why her son had chosen it.

“It’s just a story,” she murmured. “This isn’t how it really happened.”

“I know,” he said. “Maybe Andur isn’t really dead. Just like my father. Do you have to go see the Mandalorians tonight?”

“They asked for me.” She tightened her arms around him, keeping her voice low. The book droned on. “Aemelie just got back with the children, and Canderous asked me to come.”

“They kidnapped me and made my leg get broke. Maybe Father was right about them.”

“They’re our allies, Korrie. They’d die for you. And me.”

“I don’t want to die for them.” He looked up at her, gray eyes in half shadow. “No offense, Mother.”

“You won’t,” she said. “I’ll be back tomorrow. By dinner at the latest. You need to get some sleep.”
“Do you love him?”

Polla Organa fell in love with Carth Onasi. And so did you. It was real. I don’t know if it will be after, but it was real—as real as your love for Malak. Take care of Carth. You owe me that much. Take care of him and his son.

“Carth?” She was getting used to the abrupt twists of a nine-year old mind, even if her son had a disturbing tendency to make her think about things she’d rather avoid or forget.

“No.” He shook his head. “I know all about Carth. I mean the other one. Canderous Ordo. The one who tranked me when I was going pee in the bathroom and stuffed me in a box.”

“He… shouldn’t have done that.” No one had seen fit to share those precise details with Revan before. She let out a breath and tried not to imagine all the ways the abduction could have gone wrong.

“But you forgive him? Because you love him?”

“I do,” she said. “But not how you mean. We’re not…He’s a good friend. An ally.”

The Rakatan computers. I still don’t know if they can be trusted, but I gave the one on Kashyyyk a personality of the child I killed. Her name was Mission Vao, and she thought of you as a sister. She’s with Carth now. Carth and Zaalbar, the Wookiee who swore you a life debt.

She tried to stop you from stopping Malak and you—I—we—made her best friend kill her for it. I killed Juhani and Jolee Bindo too. I killed everyone who stood between me and Darth Malak. Because I had to kill him. I had to kill him and I didn't know why. I have to assume you do. I hope it was a fracking good reason, Revan.

“You’re not gonna have babies with Mandalorians,” her son said. “That’s what Leeshy said. Will you and Carth?”

“Have babies?” She blinked and looked away. “I don’t really know, Korrie. We’ve both got our kids.”

You’re married to two men. Canderous Ordo only to secure the Mandalorian alliance. Carth Onasi, because I love him.

Carth Onasi’s son’s body is being possessed by the ghost of Darth Malak. You must do everything in your power to get Malak out and return Dustil to his father. Even if you don’t love Carth, and you do love Malak. Do you still love Malak? A lot of what I saw in your memories… it wasn’t love.

“He was nice. Dustil was nice.” Now her son looked away. He was a bad liar.

“The way he grew up, kids weren’t supposed to be nice,” Revan said. “Are you going to be okay tonight? I could ask HK to bring cookies and blue milk.”

“I already soniced my teeth.” He grinned. “Grandfather would have a fit.”

Malak’s father made you the D’Reev Second. He swears that if you kill him, the Genoharadan will kill Malachor. You call your son Korrie. Everyone does, even though most of them don’t know what you did at Malachor. I don’t know what you did at Malachor. I need to know. I need to know everything. That’s why I need you.

Revan kissed his forehead. “Frack him. Brush them again.”
This time, his smile was real. It emboldened her, made it feel like the right time.

“Malachor,” she said.

Korrie looked startled, suddenly serious again. “Yes, Mother?”

She took out the datapad from her robes, the one she’d been recording for the past month. One month to cover more than two years of a life, every subject hyperlinked to all the information she could find, annotated with everything she thought was safe to share. “I’m going to see the Mandalorians tonight,” she said, lowering her voice to a whisper. “And then I need to go see the Jedi.”

“You’re going to see Father?” Still the hope. You could choke on it.

Hating herself, she shook her head. “I don’t know. But then I’ll come back and see you. When I see you again, I might...I might seem different, but I’ll still love you just as much. No matter what, you need to give me this—but only when we’re alone. Me and no one else. It’s a secret.” Her other hand closed around the datachip. A message from Uncle Vrook, something Malachi had kept from her and now he wanted her to see.

Does it still matter? She hesitated, and then passed the datachip to Korrie too. “Give me this too, okay? It’s a message from your greatuncle. Uncle Vrook.”

Korrie looked down at the datapad, thumbing it on. She’d let the scan open to him—but only him. If something went wrong then someday, maybe he could decipher the words with HK’s assistance —

“These letters are all squiggly. I can’t read them,” he said.

“I know.” She kept her voice light. “But I can, Korrie.”

“You’re writing a note to yourself?” He laughed. “That’s crazy!” But then his brows drew together, as if he was thinking it through.

The Jedi and Davad had assured her that she’d still be her. Even if she forgot some things, she’d still be her. It wasn’t like dying, even if that’s how it felt now.

“Mother?” her son cocked his head, and tucked the datachip on the datapad’s magnetic back... “Are you okay?”

I don’t know who to trust, but I trust Carth. I trust Malachor. I trust Canderous Ordo. I trust Zaalbar. I trust you, Revan, because I know that a part of you is me. I know we both made mistakes. I know we both did what we had to do. I think I know you. And I hope to frack you know me.

Revan hugged him closer, gave him another Hothan kiss. “I will be.”

I trust Davad Arkan. He’s promised to help us, to be with us when you wake. I don’t remember much, but I remember Davad and Beya and Malak and me. I remember we were going to save the galaxy. Beya’s dead. I think Malachi killed her. I don’t have proof. Davad will explain.

Polla Organa is dead. I don’t know who had her killed, but everyone thinks it was me. I don’t have to explain Coruscanti inheritance laws to you. When you take back your own memories, hers become irrelevant. So she is irrelevant. Forget about her. Keep our son safe. I think I know you, Revan. I hope I’m right.
It was a much nicer hotel than anything off Zeltros that he’d ever seen, but Therion D’Cainen was not the type to show he was impressed, especially in front of a hot babe.

And Dessa from Clan Rialis was hyperdrive hot, no question. She had hair down to her perfect ass, curves like a Deralian speedway, and a pair of literal guns that would make any smuggler worth his spice envious.

No surprise he wanted more of that action—not to mention more of the threeway they’d practically had with her hot friend, Aemelie Ordo. Mandalorians. Wow. If their women were all like this, it was almost a shame they’d lost the war.

So naturally, he was pretty pissed off that after he’d given her more action than a hyperspace converter, she wanted him gone.

“Will I see you again?” They were on the roof of the Mandalorian’s hotel—they seemed to have taken it over—set up tents and firepits like they were in the middle of a desert and not the Core’s Fidistrict. The night before, Dessa had let him stay for their feast and some kind of drinking game with lots and lots of knives. It had been beautiful.

It had been a long, long time since the Organa bitch betrayed him—time enough that Therion had sworn off love altogether… and yet, looking at Dessa’s perfect ass, he thought he could be close with her. At least if she gave him another week.

“There is a time for all things,” Dessa glanced back. Her fingers squeezed his as she led him to the elevator. She was wearing pants that looked like they were made from real hide, and the zipper on her shirt was pulled down almost as far as her tits were pulled up.

“Dessa!” The older, but still attractive blonde chiclet who acted like she was in charge charged up to them, actually carrying a real battle axe. She squinted at Therion and rattled off something in rapid-fire Mandalorian. The Dessa babe rattled back.

Therion smiled at them both and shrugged. “There’s only one of me, ladies, but I don’t mind sharing.”

The blonde snorted. “We’ll make a note on your chart.”

“Chart?” He frowned.

“You have to go now,” Dessa said. Her accent was charming, it reminded him of one of those chirpy thisla birds back home.

“Nowhere I have to be,” he protested. “I said I’d meet this distributor a little later, but it can wait another night….”

He had to admit, it wasn’t just how hot she was. It was the connection. The connection was hot. These were Mandalorians and some of them were Ordo. One of those men over there by the bonfire—the ones deliberating, acting like he was invisible—could even be Canderous from the blasting Star Forge Team himself.

Trying not to make like he was doing it, Therion glanced in their direction. Ordo would be an older guy, but half of them were wearing armor and in this light he really couldn’t tell—

“Drek,” Dessa said, raising her voice. “As I said, this is farewell.”
The elevator slid open. His hot babe put her arm out, holding the door open for him.

“Babe,” he began again. “Are you sure? We’ve had some good times.”

“He’s still here?” The other one, Aemelie, who had kissed him when they played that drinking game back on Revan Starfire’s fracking command ship came up. She didn’t just have her own kid this time, she had another one too, a girl—as pale as hers was dark. She was hot enough that even the babies weren’t a turn off. “You need to leave now, barbarian.”

“I was just saying good-bye.” Dessa leaned in and planted one on his mouth, hard and fast, a little sweaty. Her teeth bumped against his and he tried to slip in some tongue but she deflected, actually pushing him into the elevator. “Farewell, barbarian.”

“You ever need a hot pilot, look me up,” he said. It wasn’t admitting defeat, it was just a draw. Obviously she wanted him back again.

The three of them were framed in the setting sun as the doors closed, like some holovision of warrior women unchained. He smiled as the lift went down, all three hundred floors to the lobby.

“I’ll be back,” Therion promised. His reflection smiled back in the mirrored doors, perfect hair, shining teeth, mouth like a knife. He adjusted his codpiece, shifting the goods back in place. “Oh yeah. I’ll be back.”

The elevator doors slid open on the ferracrystal lobby. Really nice hotel, almost as nice as the classy piece standing there blocking the door; her hip tilted and her hand on it, like she owned the lift.

Red hair, too short for a woman without a topknot. Breasts a little small for his taste, but pert as goreapples under a tight black tunic, edged with red. Neat hips, hugging muscular thighs, and a tapered waist cinched by a black synth belt that looked all business. It even had a silver cylinder dangling from it, like she was dressed up like some kind of Jedi—

It wasn’t until her breath hissed out in a startled exclamation that he looked up again at the face. The tip of her nose was blushing, and her skin was pale under faint freckles, etched in silver. Wide eyes, green as home and wide and shocked, staring at him. She seemed smaller in person. Pouty lips, the kind he’d always thought were too hot for a Dark Lord of the Sith, in every holo he’d ever seen.

Then those lips mouthed his name. “Therion? Therion D’Cainen?”

He gaped at her for a milli, mouth open like a rube. For a second, the air almost seemed to freeze around them.

But Therion had always had a gift with the ladies, and the Lady Revan Starfire was surely no exception to that rule. “Hello, Princess,” he said. “Or should I call you an angel?”

XXX

Plan B, the one that involved kidnapping her own son, hijacking a Mandalorian cruiser and heading for the Outliers just like the real Polla had never seemed more attractive than right now. (And that was saying something.) But things were a mess.

And Malak said the plague was my fault. Everything is. I need to fix it. I have a responsibility.
Her real self would know what to do. Her real self would know so many things.

“Lady D’Reev.” The doorman at the hotel lobby had obviously been told to expect her, by D’Reev’s security or Canderous. He was liveried, Arkanian, and nervous. Revan almost wanted to correct the angle of the holsters on his belt, even as she assumed they were just for show.

The real firepower in this lobby would be coming from angles where it was least expected.

The Force sang as she walked across the ferracrystal floor: the crowds on the floor expressing the usual emotions fear, anticipation, that strange, fawning respect. Did D’Reev come to expect this? Would the real Revan be used to it? Would Malachor?

Is this the rest of our lives, having minions in uniform bowing and scraping?

She smiled at a phalanx of guards that were suited like corporate greeters—and then dodged them, heading towards the penthouse elevator, the one reserved for Clan use and roof access only. For once, the wall of greeting dignitaries parted without asking if there was anything more she needed, anything that their petty hotel services might provide. She held her hand out over the elevator’s scanner and it pinged white, approving. The lights above indicated it was traveling down.

“Senator?” One flunky seemed bolder than the rest. A yellow Twi’lek. Male. “Pardon, but we’ve had some… issues. Not all of the… Mandalorian… guests have had the correct background checks. It is a matter of great concern to this establishment that every sentient you come into contact with is appropriately vetted—”

“I trust my allies to handle it.” Revan shrugged. “So should you, Citizen….”

“Wing. Jehorah Wing. If I could—” The Twi’lek was still speaking when the private lift pinged.

Revan stepped forward to meet the open doors, only to find the chamber already occupied by a tall, lean man with black hair pulled back in a Deralian topknot, a pair of blasters at his hips and a spacer’s tan across his face. His mouth curved like a blade as his eyes seemed to take her in, up and down. There was a beat when they both were just staring—a heartbeat before she realized why his face looked so familiar, even as his name formed on her lips.

“Therion? Therion D’Cainen?”

For a heartbeat, he looked as shocked as she felt. But then that cruel mouth pulled down, into a smirk that a part of her wanted to punch—and another, more disturbing part remembered kissing. “Hello, Princess,” he said. “Or should I call you an angel?”

“As I was saying,” the Twi’lek interrupted, hastily edging between them. “Not all of their guests were properly cleared. You have my sincerest apologies, Senator. Step aside, and my men will escort this citizen—”

“He's not.* Revan said, not taking her eyes off the man.

“He's not supposed to be here, I know.” The guard was falling all over himself trying to please. Revan realized he probably worked for D’Reev. Hells, everyone in the hotel lobby probably worked for D’Reev.

“He's not a citizen,” she corrected. Her fingers twitched slightly as the Force pushed Jehorah Wing aside. The man teetered on his feet and she pushed aside the guilt as she shoved him out of the way. “Outlier colonists don't have any official status in the Republic.”
“Princess. You’re gonna be like that?” The Deralian’s grin twisted. Did he look worried?

Revan kept her voice bland. “I’m actually surprised he got through customs, what with his criminal history.”

“I made some friends,” Therion admitted, his grin peeling wider. “Very, very close friends.”

“But… you know what? I asked my staff to hire a pilot,” Revan added, turning back to Jehorah. “And here he is. I vetted his records myself. Personally.”

“Very personally,” the man who had broken Polla Organa’s heart purred.

“I’ll need to check—”

“You don’t need to check.” Her fingers moved, and she was sickly pleased to see Therion take a step farther back into the elevator.

“I don’t need to check,” the Twi’lek repeated. He was still standing there, stiff and blank, when Revan stepped into the elevator after Therion and the doors closed behind them.

The man gave an amused chuckle, that only sounded slightly intimidated. She didn’t like the leer on his face. “Wish Pollie and I had that trick, when we were smuggling spice through Biscain.” He was still looking her up and down.

That smirk on his face reminded Revan a little too closely of the one he’d had when Polla had last seen him, when he’d dumped that load of mite-ravaged spice on her, and said he just wanted to be friends.

Revan held her hand over the scanner, and the lift began its ascent. She tried to look like she wasn’t waiting for him to make a go for the blasters on his hips. “Why are you here?”

“Hey, now, Princess. She was the one who left me! You think getting framed and thrown in a Corellian jail was how I wanted to spend that week?”

Princess…? He had never called Polla ‘Princess.’ For a twisted moment, Revan almost felt jealous of... herself? “You made your own bed when you fracked over the Exchange—”

The doors slid open on the hotel’s roof, the smell of roasting meat mixing with the ozone of a muggy Coruscanti night. Aemelie and Gwenarius were standing there, dressed in ceremonial gowns with their swords at their waists. Behind them, another blonde woman—one of the Rialis...
headwomen, Revan thought, seemed to be making a hasty retreat, her hands full with both of their children—and a battleaxe.

“Your arrival is perfectly timed, Third Wife—” Gwenarius blinked in surprise as her eyes focused on Therion. “What is this man still doing here?”

“Still…?” Revan echoed. “You've already met him?”

Of course they have, the elevator only goes to this floor—some fracking tactical genius I am.

“He's from Alderaan,” Aemelie interrupted. “Dessa was considering him, pending results.”

“Oh, I gave Dessa results,” Therion broke in. “She seemed pret-ty pleased with my results, if you know what I mean.”

“He's not from Alderaan.” Revan grimaced. “He's from Deralia.” She stepped out of the lift quickly, and raised her hand, pinning Therion back against the wall with the Force.

His own fingers twitched, and the muscles in his neck bunched, as he obviously tried to break free. “Nice,” he said, managing to lift an eyebrow. “I could be in love.”

“Deralia?” Aemelie frowned. “Are you sure?”

“He was her… he knows Polla Organa. Knew. I mean.”

A frown had appeared on Therion's face as he kept struggling against the invisible bonds that held him. “You want to knock it off now, babe?” The cords in his neck stood out as he tensed. “Come on, now! You gotta know you can trust me! Aemelie, tell her! We had a moment!”

“Do you think he's a spy?” Aemelie took a step closer, peering at him. “For the Deralians and not the Alderaanians? It was rather strange that I found their ship—and he did boast about the Organa woman, but we all thought it was pure bravado—”

“My ship,” Therion drawled. “Trust me, that beauty’s all mine.”

“Stranded along the Perlemian Trade Route. Repairing the vessel gave our youth a chance to practice shield and navboard repair, not to mention the outer hull patching….” Aemelie’s voice trailed off. “He's really Deralian?”

“You said they. Before. You said they. Their ship.”

“He had companions,” Aemelie shrugged. “They were from Alderaan as well.”

“Older?” Her parents? But Jasp and Moll would never—

“No.” Aemelie looked to Gwenarius, before looking back at Revan. “But I'm sure they're not important. They… were just passengers.”

You don't think they were just passengers. That was as clear as the Force cage she'd created, rippling around Therion D’Cainen like an almost living thing. Revan opened her hand and let it collapse. The man collapsed with it, staggering before righting himself, looking between them, then reaching for his blaster—
The whine of a sonic bolt sent him spinning backwards before his muzzle cleared the holster. The blast knocked him back into the elevator. And Revan watched in shock as the doors, no longer under her control, slid shut, sending the smuggler’s body—alive or dead—back down the lobby below.

“What the hell?” Canderous asked, his own gun still in hand as he jogged over to them. “You gonna just stand still while idiots take potshots at you, Revan?”

“Please tell me that was a stunner,” she said. He just tried to kill me. Did he? Did Therion D’Cainen really just try and kill me? Polla’s ex was a lot of things, most of them sleazy as frack, but he was no killer.

“Sure.” Canderous shrugged, tapping his comm and barking in some instructions in Mandalorian. From the sound of things, D’Reev wasn't the only ones with guards posted in the lobby. To give Canderous credit, Revan hadn’t even noticed his. “It was a stunner. Clean kills make too much paperwork on this damn planet. We’ll bring him back up. Set up an interrogation room.” His grizzled eyebrow raised. “You want in on the fun?”

“Don't hurt him,” she blurted out. “Restraints only. And I need to speak with him. Alone.”

“Who is he?” But he nodded, although she didn't miss the look Gwenarius shot him.

There's something you're not telling me, Ordo.

“He's no one,” Revan lied. “Just a spacer the real Polla Organa used to know.”

“Huh.” Canderous grunted and looked at Aemelie again. “Does this have anything to do with that comm you sent about getting into the Republic jail?”

“Me?” Revan frowned. “What comm?”

Aemelie flushed. “That was a personal request, husband.”

“It is rude of me to bring it before the other wives.” The Mandalorian didn't look sorry; but he never did. “But necessary. Anyways, your Organa assassin’s gone, Second Wife. Boon Organa got shipped back to Alderaan—”

“—Last week,” Revan finished the sentence. “On my orders.”

“Oh,” Aemelie ducked her head. “Then I withdraw my request to visit with him.” She paused. “Is he to be jailed on Alderaan too?”

“There's to be a trial….” Revan began, trying not to feel guilty. Again.

“Whatever.” Canderous grunted. “Boon Organa’s irrelevant. And so is that loser I just shot.” He stared at Revan, eyes like duracrete chips in his weathered face. “We have a bigger problem. A much bigger problem. I called you here because there's something you need to see.”

XXX

Revan was late. Of course. She was late and the room was small and Millifar had made Xarga play the footage again a hundred times. At this point, it almost felt like she did remember, even though she didn’t. All that training she’d had against Jedi and it didn’t even work?

Finally, the door slid open. “Father,” Millifar said. She was with him this time. Third Wife, the one they’d all been waiting for, as if the Clan couldn’t take action against a Sith schutta on their own.

“Daughter. Xarga.” Her father nodded at them both.

“Hello, Millifar.” Third Wife Revan looked like she wanted to do the right thing, just like she always did. It was tiresome, but at least they had her flagship now. Aemelie said it was magnificent. Room for ten thousand drop ships—as soon as they had ten thousand warriors.

Magnificent enough to compensate for his loss? We didn’t even get a genetic sample—

“Have you seen Mekel Jin?” she asked the woman. “Has he chosen to remain with the Jedi?”

“He’s—he’s ill.” The woman avoided her eyes and Millifar was suddenly convinced that Revan hadn’t even thought about Mekel Jin. “I’m going there later. I’ll…I can check on him.”

“Is he going to die too?” She couldn’t hide the bitterness in her voice. “Like Oerin?”

“I don’t…I don’t think so.” Millifar wondered if the woman knew how much the dark-eyed Coruscanti man had idolized her. It was shameful, he could be so forgotten.

“You’d better sit down, Revan.” Her father’s voice was gruff. He’d made Millifar sit down too, when he and Xarga had first shown her the feed, the feed of her that she didn’t remember happening.

Frowning, the woman nodded slowly. “Whatever it is, we’ll handle it before I…” she glanced at Millifar and Xarga as if they cared about her stupid Jedi secrets.

Canderous cleared her throat. “Yeah, about that…I think you need to watch this before you make any rash decisions.”

“It’s not a rash decision.” Her voice was cold and remote. “It’s the only logical one. She knows things that we need.”

“Banthashit.” Her father sounded even more pissed off than he had before.

Revan glared at him as she sat in the seat. “I could make it an order.”

“You could,” he said. “If you think that’s really how this works.”

The woman who had cheated, but still killed their last true Mandalore in combat and destroyed their way of life, frowned even more. “Get on with it,” she snapped.

Canderous nodded at Xarga, who started the vid again. The outside of their hotel, taken at an angle near the service entrance, the one they all used because they’d disabled all the D’Reev cameras around it, and installed their own. Watching it for the hundredth and first time didn’t make it hurt less.

***

The armored figure caught her arm. “Mill-Mill-ley?”

Millifar froze, and then almost immediately pivoted, bringing her stun stick up towards the weakest joint in his armor, the one covered by beskar plating around the neck, and ending, not as it should in the Mandalore’s visor, but in an ugly leather mask. At the same time, her foot lashed out, locking around his armored legs.
They fell together, but it was all wrong. Instead of crashing to the ground, they... floated. She was on top of him, her stick locked around his neck and they... floated to the ground as if gravity didn’t exist.

XXX

“When was this recorded?” Revan demanded.

“After,” Canderous said. “After it should have been possible.” He shot a glare at Xarga. “And we’d have known weeks ago, if someone had reviewed the recordings as they should have.”

“I accept my shame,” the unblooded boy mumbled. Millifar almost felt sorry for him again.

XXX

“When are you, thief?” Her finger poised over the switch and Millifar flinched again, noting the bad angle that it had, digging into the leather mask above the armor that was so obviously the Mandalore’s.

“Mill-lee s’mee. S’oarin.” There was something wrong with his voice. His breath wheezed in and out, barely more than a whisper.

“They said you died.” Her hand scrabbled at the mask, finding the clasps.

“Wai—waitt,” the man wheezed, almost inaudible. “....go... head.”

She took off the mask. She’d watched this part a hundred times and she still flinched. But the girl in the vid recording didn’t. That girl only smiled, as if nothing was wrong. That girl acted angry, but she was obviously thrilled.

“They said you were dead.” She wasn’t afraid. She was practically glowing with happiness. “Was it some kind of trick?”

“Yesss.” He shrugged, still lying there with his unfocused eyes that didn’t even point in the same directions. The feed was blurry, but his lips looked... almost blue. His skin looked gray next to hers. That wheezing sound. Millifar heard it in nightmares now. “...Jed-eye..trickkk.”

“Oh.” Millifar stood up. “It was very rude of you to fool us too. Xarga organized your death walk and everything.” She frowned. “I should have realized it was a trick, when they refused to give us your corpse.”

The obviously dead Mandalore shambled up almost boneless: jerkily, with none of his usual grace.
One knee was bent too far forward, overextended in its armor plating. “S’imppport...antev’ ree one... bl’eev... eyem....dead.”

“All the barbarians need to think you are dead,” Millifar said, as if she were repeating his words, as if she could understand them. She smiled. Her hand reached out, as if she would be forward enough to take his before formally staking her claim.

She had braided her hair for him, worn the gown for him. Their night should have gone very differently than this.

Oerin took a step backwards, shaking his head. “No. E’vree’one. Eev’n.... clan.”
“Why?”

“My...moth...zer.”

“Your mother died on Malachor.” The pearls in her hair were set with the precision of stars, constellations in the galaxy their children were to supposed to conquer after they were born. “Everyone knows that? Are you still feverish?” She stepped forward and put her hand on his forehead. Even in the holorecording, the pink of her hand contrasted sharply with the gray of his skin. “No! You’re freezing cold!”

“No.” His breath heaved in and out, as if he were trying hard to be clearer. “Mmm eyem... not cold at...at all. You’re righ’, Mill-lee. Mussbe... runnin... fever.”

“You must be running a fever,” she repeated. Her hands dropped to her side.

XXX

Millifar heard her own breath catch in a sob again. Stupid, stupid. Stupid girl. She’d thought she was done crying over this.

Over him.

“Millifar.” Revan’s voice. “I don’t know what this is, but we’ll... we’ll fix it. I promise.”

“Stupid!” she said out loud. “Just shut up! He’s going to tell you!”

XXX

He was holding her hands now, not wearing his gloves and his hands were mottled and dark and dead and the Millifar in the recording didn’t seem to notice.

“M’ moth-ezz’s not... dead. Sheezz ‘nipulade n’allz ha Jed-eye. She’ got some... scheme... t’stop .....thrise ...ofzah...Truuue...Sithhhh...halfatime, I hard....lee...understanit.” His breath heaved in and out as if by force of will, and then his words became clearer. “I... died, not understandn...it, and she resur...k’ted me...,and here I am. On’lee’m still... dead. And I think my....n’sides are goin...rot soon... ’S’ unpleaz...npleazint.”

“I’m sorry, Oerin.” The Millifar in the recording looked sorry.

XXX

Milifar wiped away her tears. Again. “Stupid,” she mumbled. “I had training to resist this—”

“Oerin’s strong. Was strong. Is.” Her father’s wife said. “You couldn’t, Millifar. I’m not sure I could resist his Force compulsion, if he really tried.”

“I should have.” She rubbed her forehead again. “I should have.”

XXX

He bent forward and kissed her on the forehead. “Me too.” Another agonizing wheeze. “For...get.”

XXX

Xarga made the image freeze, mercifully as Lin walked away from her and not at the moment of the kiss. Millifar wiped her eyes again.

“You get all that, Revan?” Her father hadn’t asked Millifar if she’d gotten it. He’d only taken her in his arms, even if she was too old and let her cry until all the tears left. Shameful, but they’d never speak of it again.

“I got it.” The woman made a noise like a sob herself. “What kind of Force can—”

“You’re the Jedi,” Millifar snapped. “You tell us.”

“Frack,” muttered the woman who had destroyed their way of life. She said a few other things, in a language that Millifar didn’t know.

“Of course she’s fine,” her father grunted. She felt his hands brush against her arm. “She’s Ordo.”

“Of course, I’m…” Revan stood up, pacing towards the door, as if she thought she had the skill to track the spoor of a dead man months gone. “Who the frack is his mother?”

Canderous shrugged. “Some fracking Jedi. I don’t know.”

“I need to know.” She paced back and forth more. Stupid Third Wife, wasting energy. “Even if I don’t...I need to know. Is there anyone here who would know—anyone who’s even seen her? Any of the headwomen?”

“No,” Millifar snapped. “We’re not ignorant fools, you barbarian. Don’t you think we checked?”

“Millifar.” Her father sighed. Xarga stared at the floor.

“I’m sorry for my outburst,” she muttered. “More with the heart than the head.”

“You are strong,” he told her.

“We’ll fix this,” Revan said. “Somehow. Millifar, I promise.”

“Don’t.” She closed her eyes, but they all kept talking.

“I saw her a few times in the early days of the war,” her father told Revan. “The Fett Lin’s seventh wife was short. She called herself Jana Novasun, and she always wore a mask. It was made of gray cloth. Like all the Republic Jedi.”

XXX

“Hello? Hello?” It had been kind of cool when Revan Starfire restrained his entire body with nothing more than a glance from her smoldering green eyes. It was a little less cool now that the Mandalorians seemed to have shot him with a stunner, knocked him out and then trussed him like a dewback on a spit to a cold durasteel table with a bright light overhead and… forgotten about him?

“Hello?” Therion called again. “Is anyone here? Anyone at all?”

The door slid open. Sadly, it wasn’t Dessa, but it was the next best thing. Aemelie of Ordo, no babies this time. Wearing a robe that was cut too high over her breasts, but still strangely hot.

“My husband wants the boys to practice some interrogation techniques on you,” she said. “But I thought we should speak first.”

“I care about my friends. Your companions,” she murmured. “I noticed… you seemed as reluctant to discuss them with the Third Wife as I was."

“Who?”

She rolled her eyes a little. “Revan. Revan Starfire? Third Wife of Ordo?”

“Oh.” Maybe he should have just rolled over like Pollie herself had, when she’d spun that spice on Biscain on him. Jealous bitch. Except—“You know I hate kids. But theirs is real young. And I don’t want something bad to happen.” He tried to remember their fake names, but the rope cutting into his wrists really fracking hurt. “These bindings are really tight. Does Dessa know I’m here?”

Aemelie looked thoughtful. “This is Ordo business, not Rialis.”

“Well… they just… they just wanted to see their uncle.” Frack if he could remember the uncle’s name either. “The Organa guy.”

“Our people aren’t just warriors,” Aemelie said. “We have… hobbies. My First Wife Gwenarius and her daughter Millifar are skilled at studying the genomes in different humanoid populations. Gwenarius specializes in genetic drift—seeing how certain traits in the humanoid species migrate from one world to another. Dessa asked us to check your genetic traits, and so I sampled you.”

“You did?” He thought back but he couldn’t remember her being in the room when he’d been throwing around any samples. “Wait! Why did she need my genetics? Did I mention I hate kids?”

“The kiss,” she murmured. “And don’t concern yourself. Dessa’s already married. Her husband’s a mercenary on Dantooine. But you are not Alderaanian. Neither is Seriina Wen. In fact, your prints are close, Gwenarius said. Close enough to be cousins, a few generations removed.”

“Wait. You said… First Wife? Your First Wife?” He let the stupid grin fall on his face. “That’s hot.” Seriina Wen. That’s right. Now, if I could just remember what the frack name Seiran used—distant cousins my ass—Strangely, that was kind of hot too, thinking of Polla as a distant cousin. Has to be pretty distant, our mothers don’t even know the same people.

Aemelie frowned at him. “You both share several Corellian markers, but a few of them are rare in contemporary Corellian populations. Recessives that were outbred long ago. You only really see prints like that in colony worlds out on the Rim. Like Deralia.”

“You got me.” He laughed. “We immigrated to Alderaan. You know. Like that… Organa guy.”

“Boon. Boon Organa.”

“Yeah. Him.” He sighed. “What do you want me to say?”

“Absolutely nothing. This is a test,” Aemelie said. “Don’t mention any of this—or anything about them—under questions and I’ll let you live.” She shrugged. “I might even give you back to Dessa.”

“What are you going to do?”

She raised a dark eyebrow. “I’m going to go tell Seriina the bad news about her uncle. Or is it good news?” She shook her head. “I will never understand your culture.”

“That’s mutual, sister,” he muttered. “Don’t—don’t hurt her.”
“Hurt her? Our sons are milk brothers.” Aemelie snorted and shook her head. “Barbarians.”
Chapter 36 / Where Can I Run To, Where Can I Hide

One of the advantages of being a murderer was that the power it bestowed meant Davad no longer needed to sleep. That was also good, because night was the best time for the hunt.

On the summer solstice back home, night and day aligned, and the Dxun moon grew close enough that its atmosphere bled into the sky of their planet; colors of orange and gold mixing with a heartrending blue. That was when Davad, and his brothers, and cousins, and all of their royal escort would mount their great drexl and fly straight up, angling towards that impossible moon, the thread between their worlds. The air would grow thin and their limbs would shake; but they’d still rise, impossibly high—until the moon’s heavier gravity took hold, and the wings of their great beasts would falter and fall, plummeting towards the demon moon suddenly below.

That was the true test of a rider’s skill, to guide a beast through its fear of falling, fear of oblivion; against all of its natural impulses: to command it to spread its great insectine wings and glide, catching the dense air currents, and angling down, slowly, gentle as a lover’s kiss.

Do it wrong, and you would both perish. Like more than one of Davad’s cousins—and his eldest sister.

Do it right, and a feast awaited: a feast for man and beast: roasted cannok and slices of sweet, wild melon. Charred and buttery tubers baked in giant pits with tarja pulp; and stolen glasses of spiced tarja wine. And at the end, as the singers began the last verse of the grand design, the hunters would come home for the real celebration: driving the cart pushed by dalgo, with the massive corpse of the zakkeg surrounded by its dead: tame malraas and rophin and Beast-rider alike, who had fallen in its pursuit.

Although Davad Arkan had left for the Jedi before he came of a hunter’s age, as a prince of Onderon, he had always been given a piece of the great beast’s chewy black heart—raw and feral, like the taste of the hunt in his throat.

He could taste the hunt now, as he stood in the stair near the Knight’s dormitories, all but empty now, save for the stragglers. He preferred to take them sleeping, let them slip into dreams before it all stopped; but footsteps were drawing closer, and his pulse pounded with the emptiness in his belly; the hunger that grew with every death, every rationalization, every time he swore to stop, thought of resisting the call that she had put in him, the thing that she had made him become.

“Knight Arkan?” The man sounded surprised, a little embarrassed to see him there. “I was just... taking a walk.”

“So was I,” Davad told him. There was no fear in the Jedi’s scent: his errand, whatever it had been, was only an assignation, a trip to the kitchens, some random, petty indulgence. This was not one of the conspirators Davad and his master were hunting.

“If you’ll excuse me...?” the man stepped to the side, and Davad matched him, raising an eyebrow.

“Are you sure you want to leave so soon?” He did not need physical contact now, as he had at first; but he’d found it soothed them. He reached out and caught the other man’s arm.

The Jedi had black eyebrows, and a long, bushy face. His frown made grooves in his beard. “Is there… something you need, Knight Arkan?”

“Yes,” Davad said. “I have trouble sleeping too.” He stepped closer, so that his shoulder brushed against the other man’s chest, their faces, nearly of a height, aligned.

The other man had eyes as dark as his own; widening like prey. His mouth pursed under that mat of hair. “Do you…?”

“Yes,” Davad said. His other hand locked around the man’s waist, and he reached out, inhaling all of it: scent, power, Force. The Jedi staggered on his feet, wide eyes fluttering shut. No time for panic, regret, or fear. A kindness, the only one Davad had left. One of the conspirators, he would have questioned, had to threaten. Followed her orders, the ones stamped upon his soul. But this man was only another meal and there was no reason for prey to suffer.

The comm in his pocket chimed. Once, twice. Insistent. Not now! The man in his arms murmured something, last words that no one cared to hear. Davad drank him deep, trying to ignore how it thrilled him, the flutter of fear, like a drexl’s heart descending the gravity well. He straightened. The corpse slipped out of his hands, slid down a few stairs.

The comm chimed again, as he tried to compose himself, ignore the delicious languor in his limbs, and that nagging need: a desire for more. Just one more?

“You must answer her call when she asks, Beast-Lord. You must be hers, as much as you are hers. Both of them trust you, and in the end, it is both you will betray.”

He didn’t turn around, didn’t want to know if she was really there, or just inside his head. He wasn’t sure which was worse.

“Yes,” he gritted his teeth, straightening his back. “As you wish, Master.”

She chuckled, for once as tangible as he was. “Careful. A broken beast cannot serve me.”

Shut up, he thought. Go back to your games in the Underground. Go back to your secret war.

“Some fire left.” She chuckled again. “Good.”

Davad bared his teeth. “Enough.” He accepted the call—as much to silence his master’s voice as to obey. “Revan.” he tried to adjust the comm’s angle away from the body, away from anything that would give away his location. The schutta behind him could take care of herself. “It’s rather late. Is something wrong?”

XXX

“Nothing will be resolved before morning,” Aemelie twisted a lock of her hair and smiled at Revan. “Did you want to join us tonight in our rooms now, or would you prefer to interrogate the false Alderaanian prisoner first?”

What she wanted to do was scour the Force for traces of Oerin Lin. Find out if it was possible that somehow—in addition to Force ghosts, holocrons, and personality overlays—someone was also raising the dead. But where to begin with that?

For the moment, all plans of assuming her real memories vanished. She kept seeing Millifar’s face, kept hearing the dead Oerin’s broken voice. He said his mother, who the frack is his mother?

“I need a secure room for a comm call,” Revan said. “And then I’ll speak to the prisoner.”

“I’m sure the children would enjoy some interrogation work,” Canderous’s second wife protested, more stridently than Revan expected. “We could easily create a transcript for you.”

“Is there some reason, you don't want me to speak with Therion?” She tilted her head. “Where did you find him again?”

Amelie’s eyes were wide and innocent—and lying, Revan thought. “His ship was stranded. We took him in.”

“You said that.” Revan frowned, but the details had scattered from her mind, upset by the shock of seeing Lin’s corpse, apparently walking around Coruscant with all of the man’s power of illusion and persuasion. “I also… I want my own room tonight.” She tried to remember the proper phrasing in Mandalorian. “On this night may you enjoy our husband’s company, while I plot our next battle.”

Amelie sniffed. “I’ll tell Gwenarius,” she said. “You may use our communications center. It’s down the aft stairs, in the second room on the starboard side.”

The room wasn’t much more than a closet with comms wired into the walls, but she pulled out her own private comm and dialed Davad’s code.

It took several chimes before he answered. “Revan.” His voice was strained. “It’s rather late. Is something wrong?”

“Were you asleep?” She hadn’t considered that. “I’m sorry, but this is important.”

“No, just—” his comm pulled back from his face, revealing a hallway, the edge of a stair. “Just—not the best of times.”

“I won’t be coming tomorrow. In fact, I might be delayed longer than that.” She lowered her voice, glancing at the door. “Something’s come up that I need to resolve.”

Maybe dead Oerin Lin can go in a coma next to Malak, her mind mocked. Isn't that how you resolve the things you can’t resolve?

“I’m sure whatever it is can be fixed,” he said. His eyes kept fixing on something offscreen. Something she couldn’t see. “How may I help?”

It was a secure comm, and she trusted him. Revan took a deep breath. “I just saw security footage of Oerin Lin. Taken the day after his death.”

"But his body was burned, I thought?” Davad smiled slightly. “You're serious? Where did... where was this walking corpse seen?”

“I didn't say he was walking.” It seemed an obvious point, and yet—

“Well, I assume he wasn't sitting, and if he was merely lying there dead, you wouldn't seem this upset.” Davad’s comm tilted towards a nondescript ceiling, before resolving again with him standing in front of a plain, duracrete wall. “I’m the assistant coroner, Rev. Master Zez was very clear that the body was cremated. Was it just the armor—maybe the armor was all that you saw? I left it for the Mandalorians at the security gate, but in the confusion of the riots, perhaps it was stolen?”

“No.” Even after the horrors of the Star Forge, all those Jedi trapped in tanks to fuel Malak’s power… somehow, what she’d seen of Oerin seemed worse. “I saw his face. On the recording, he said his mother was a Sith Lord trying to stop the True Sith and he was rotting from the inside out.”

“Fire on the wing, he said all that?” Davad’s face underwent some peculiar contortions. “Who did he say that to?”

“It doesn’t matter. Could it be true? Do you know who his mother is?”

Davad rubbed his temples. His eyes flickered away from her and there was a long pause. “I… might. I have been doing some investigation myself. On the… the missing Jedi from the Temple and—”

“Missing Jedi?”

“Yes.” He stared at her again, the smile fading from his face. “Quite a few, actually. Some missing and some appear to be hiding.”

“You didn’t mention this before.”

He gave her a pained smile. “You had your own concerns.”

Guilt nagged at her. “If I had known, I would have helped. I’ll coming there. Now. Tonight. I can’t take the memories, until I know; but I need to know what’s happened. Can you—” Her mind scattered, trying to think of the Jedi that she could trust… probably trust. “Can you gather our allies. Yuthura Ban. Iridel. Jopheena. Zhar. Vrook—have you heard from him?” She hesitated. “Sheris, as well, if you think she’s sane enough. And Mekel Jin.”

“They may not be all available.” His smile had faded. Suddenly he looked years older, even through the blurry comm, with lines she had not expected in his dark skin.

“Bring who you can.” She didn’t like how troubled he seemed. Like things were even worse than she knew.

Davad Arkan nodded slowly. “I’ll do my best.” He hesitated. “It might be more expedient, if you come alone. The Jedi haven’t forgotten the last time they let a Mandalorian in the Temple.”

Revan ignored that. “Expect us soon.” She cut the comm and stood up, running through the list of possibilities again. I don’t know what this means. Would Sheris? Would… Malak?

Dustil’s body was still unconscious, and no one seemed to know why. There were too many coincidences, too many obstructions. Davad is hiding how bad this really is from me to protect me.

Canderous was already waiting outside the door, dressed in armor, his daughter by his side, also wearing beskar. They had their helms clipped to their belts, but aside from their faces and size, the armor made them almost identical: blunt and immovable objects.

“It’s a matter of honor,” Millifar said, before Revan could say anything at all. “If some schutta did that to Oerin, her life is mine.”

“This might be dangerous—”
The girl lifted her chin, stubbornly. “I have training. I will not be fooled again by dar’jettai tricks.”

Revan looked at Canderous. He nodded slightly. She didn’t want to make Millifar feel foolish by saying anything out loud, so she only nodded back.

“We’re going to the Jedi Temple,” she told them. “If this Sith Lord is there—” is it Arca? Or the Emperor himself?

“Dar’jettai are easy to kill,” Canderous said. He nodded at Millifar, who went to a cabinet inset in the wall. It snapped open, revealing rows upon rows of mines and grenades. Revan’s eyes stretched down the corridor, all lined with similar doors and wondered, with a chill, just how much weaponry the Mandalorians had bought or acquired. They both went to work, unsnapping the plates in their armor’s legs and chest, filling the storage within with grenades. Not for the first time, Revan wondered what happened when such an arsenal was accidentally ignited; but she knew better than to ask.

“Just… give me five minutes,” she said. “To see Therion.”

“Who?” Canderous looked like he genuinely didn’t know.

“The man you shot,” she told him.

“He’s not dead, I told you.”

“But he’s conscious?”

“Aemelie was making sure, before she left.” The Mandalorian shrugged. “She hasn’t commed to say he’s dead, so I assume so.”

“Five minutes,” Revan repeated.

“The barbarian assassin is down the hall,” Millifar muttered. “Don’t take too long, or we’ll go without you.”

XXX

“What are we doing?” Lydie Korr whispered. It was dark in the Archives, and she couldn’t sense anyone close to them, which was terrifying in and of itself, without adding in the way Thalia May was acting, as if someone was hunting them.

“Put this on,” her friend whispered.

Even in the near dark, Thalia didn’t look entirely recovered. Her face shone with a layer of sweat, and her fingers was too warm when they pressed something long and flat into Lydie’s hands.

“A belt?”

“Stealth belt, the switch is here.” Thalia’s fingers pulled hers on top of something small and silvery under the buckle. “Put it on first. It needs a body’s electrical field to work.”

Lydie didn’t argue. She didn’t question. What they’d seen in the last few weeks had driven away most—if not all—of her curiosity. She’d seen the dead lying in the halls of the Jedi Temple. Officially, they’d all died of plague.

But when Master Croi had called out a warning to her in the Force, he didn’t sound sick, he’d only sounded frightened. Her Fosh master had been over five hundred years old. What was there left to be frightening to him?

She’d found Padawan Aleek on the stairs. It almost looked like the Rodian had slipped and fallen… if you ignored the fact that there was a giant… hole inside of her where the Force should have been. No marks on her body at all, but where she had once been, where there had once been a warm, generous spirit who shared her sweets with Lydie after History Class, there was now just… nothing.

Like a hole in the Force. Like a death in the Force itself. Like the death of the Force itself.

And the others. The sick ones in the Medix who were supposed to get better, and then one day, they were just… gone.

Don’t think of their names. Don’t remember Master Iridel, or your own Master Croi. Don’t remember Padawan Aleek, or Knight Devry, of Apprentice Sansi. Don’t remember Padawan Rappertunie or your old roommate Aishie Sez, who both went to the clinics yesterday and never came back—

Officially, everything was fine.

And sometimes, especially when she was working at the Medix helping Master Loanin and Padawan Jorde, Lydie thought things were fine too. But then she’d see something out of place, like the empty apprentice dorm, or the blank lecture schedule and everything would shift… and then she’d suddenly feel like she was waking up from a dream with a panic so black that all she wanted to do was run away.

Something—or someone is very wrong here. Something is clouding our minds. Obvious to everyone left. There were rumors that other Enclaves, on other planets, had even closed for good. And Master Atris, who once kept these Archives humming with color and light, had taken all of her personal effects and half the Jedi’s databanks and just… disappeared. No one seemed to know where she had gone. No one seemed to even care.

Aunt Marla had told Lydie to watch and listen. Aunt Marla being here was really the only reason Lydie was still here. That, and she had nowhere else to go. Aunt Marla wasn’t afraid. And if Master Korr wasn’t frightened, then neither was Padawan Korr.

Her still being here had absolutely nothing to do with a black-eyed Padawan who’d never even woken up from his coma, just like the ghost of Darth Malak, who was maybe still in Dustil Onasi’s body in the bacta tank beside him. It had nothing to do with the shadows under Master Loanin’s gray eyes; although those worried her too.

Azen Loanin never voiced any thought that anything was wrong, but sometimes he closed his research logs, when she approached. And his Padawan, Mical Jorde, who was barely younger than Azen himself, was one of the missing now. Stranger still, Master Loanin didn’t seem concerned, or sad about it at all.

“This is dangerous,” Thalia warned her. “But I dreamed it. I think you’ll be okay, Lydie Korr. I think we both will.”

Lydie lowered her voice. “Where are we going? You said you’d tell me when we got to the Archives.”

“There.” Her friend pointed at the terminals, as dark and blank as the rest of the archives across the room. “Practice turning the stealth belt on and off. Use your fingers, not the Force. The Force might not… work.”

Because it’s dying? Is the Force dying here? Could that happen? In Master K’timshi’s Treatise on the Phenomenology of Energy Exchange, he posited that the Force was a finite entity. Could we run out? Is that why the Jedi are dying too?

“We didn’t have to come here to use the nets. I have a term in my room. My… Master Korr gave it to me.” The unsaid suggestion, Lydie thought, was that it was safer for Lydie to use the terminal in her room than to come to a dark and empty place like this, when Padawans kept vanishing all over the place.

“No,” Thalia murmured. “It has to be here.”

“Why?” She was already fastening the belt and flicking the switch. She watched her hand in front of her vanish and reappear.

“It’s better if you don’t know.” Thalia took a deep breath, and handed Lydie a small slip of plimsi. “I dreamed this would work,” she murmured, almost more to herself than to Lydie. “Switch on one of the terminals. Look up the names I gave you. Read what you find. Think about what you find. But if you see anyone… especially a man—or something that looks like a man—I need you to turn on the stealth belt and run. Don’t think. Just run. As fast as you can. Just… get away. Fast.”

“Where are you going?” For it was obvious now that Thalia was going to leave her in this dark and terrifying place that had once been Lydie’s favorite place in the galaxy when the room had been full of color and light. “What do you mean, ‘something that looks like a man?’ Like a Human man? A Twi’lek man?” You can’t mean a Zabrak man because Padawan Reeves was the only one here —

“Not Human. Not anymore,” Thalia said. “I don’t know his name now, only what it will be.” Then, she did something strange. She kissed Lydie on the lips, before Lydie could stop her. And before Lydie had time to think about it, she was kissing Thalia back.

Kissing Thalia May was different than kissing Devn Rappertunie, or how she’d imagined kissing Mekel Jin would feel. Thalia’s lips were soft and full, and too warm, just like the rest of her. It wasn’t bad-different either. When Thalia’s forehead brushed against her horns, Lydie’s breath caught, and her own hand tightened on the other woman’s arm.

But then Thalia pulled away. “Thank you,” she said, as if Lydie had done her a favor.

“If you were trying to infect me with plague too, the science says it won’t work.” That woman who looked like Revan, Padawan Loran, had lectured them all endlessly about the plague when she worked in the Medix. Lydie had heard about how Zabrak couldn’t catch it at least a dozen times.

When things seemed normal enough to be annoyed by another person, Lydie couldn’t stand Sheris Loran. Of course, now Padawan Sheris Loran spent her days in the Underground Clinics, and probably gave lectures to all the sentients down there instead.

“No.” Thalia’s eyes were a strange blue-green that didn’t match the rest of her Human phenotype. Her lashes curled up at the ends, Lydie had never noticed that before. “I was just afraid I wouldn’t have another chance.”

“I’m sure you’ll kiss lots of people…” Lydie felt her face heat like a Human’s. She was pretty sure her horns were flushed red.

“No,” said Thalia May. “I won’t.”
Most Onderonite curses involve beasts: whether casting aspersions about your enemies’ wingspan, or wishing the eggs of their drexl develop a fungal rot. After speaking to Revan, Oerin had time to mutter several under his breath, while the Jedi in front of him stared vacantly through dead eyes at the ceiling.

Already, he’d forgotten the man’s name. At first, he'd remembered each one, starting with that Padawan he'd had to knock unconscious in the kitchens to help Oerin Lin escape. Upon returning, the boy had seen him, and all that Davad meant to do was make him forget; but when his mind touched the child’s, there was something so—something so primal: like when a bonded beast takes the first mating flight. He could still remember the taste of blood from that experience in his own mouth—and really, what happened next was hardly any different. He hungered, and so he reached for a source to end that hunger—like scratching a sweet itch—and then he was sated and the Miralukan was gone, almost as if he had never existed.

Guilt had followed, at first nearly too much to bear; even as his master’s whispers kept reminding him that what they did was necessary to fight the war-yet-to-come; that this strange power of his was a gift, not a curse. (And was it forged from Malachor? Or merely the true manifestation of any Beast-rider’s strength? They, who brought the Force into the beasts they controlled: could they all consume it from all the living instead?)

And seeing the hunger sated—for perhaps the first time in his life since he’d abandoned his drexl and his crown to follow the path of the Jett’ai: a noble quest for knowledge at first just meant to stop his people from accidentally stumbling into more repositories of dark side power—which for some reason, Onderon was full of—was like hearing the end to a poem Davad had been trying to end all of his life. Sate a hunger that had never left: one that food, drink, sex, or fighting had never touched.

He’d been taught all of his life that the Force was in all living things; but now he knew: the Force was life. And, maybe ever since Malachor, he had been starving for it, starving to fill himself with something, after all of that death.

“That was too close.” Her voice. Also too close. Davad felt her physical presence behind him, but he didn't turn around. Half the time when he did, she wouldn't be there at all. “You shouldn't have taken this one. Not here—not in this hallway.”

“She saw nothing.” He bent down and lifted the body, not bothering to close the eyes or say any of the prayers he’d said once. Already the hunger was rising again. It was getting worse: one used to last for days, and now he was never quite sated. Now, some days he took two. Once, three.

“We must plan our movements carefully, Apprentice. This is not time for missteps.”

Davad laughed, “Did you hear what she said? About your boy? He was seen.”

“All the more reason for you to be cautious. We have not finished with this place—nor will we until all life within is gone, replaced by the echoes of its fall. Such a void will attract Tenebrae’s attention, and then—”

“She’s coming now. Tonight. Soon.” He choked back another laugh. “And I’m starving. What if I can't control myself with her, Master? All your efforts, and your apprentice eats your precious Revan Starfire.” He exhaled. When he tried, he could sense her easily, moving closer. She shone like a star in Force. He’d had her, he knew her, but all of that was nothing to what he wanted from her now.
“You will not,” she commanded. “Control your base impulses, lest you become a beast in truth.”

Davad closed his eyes. “Oh, we’re far past that.” It had been better when Oerin was here too, brief as that period had been. Better when Oerin was alive. Better when she had been far away on her own planet, driving pathetic to pawns to madness instead of him.

An alarm interrupted, strangely prosaic. One of the perimeter sensors he’d set around the now-empty archives. He had been weeding out the Jedi strong enough to still be curious for weeks.

“The Force has given you an offering,” his master said. Even without turning he could see her expression: those clouding eyes, that cruel smile on her face. “Take what you find in the archives quickly.”

“Are you ready, then?” He asked. “Ready to face Revan?”

“She will not be Revan for much longer.” Her steps came closer and her hand gripped his shoulder, a vise grip—and, yet oddly maternal, like Gaia, the queen of Onderon, had never been. “Put down your burden, Beast-Lord. Knight Qal’Istal does not care if his shell lies here, or in your warehouse of corpses. He is beyond your reach.”

Davad looked down at the woman’s face. Unremarkable. “But someone might see.”

“Now is the time for them to see, if they have eyes.” She chuckled. “But they will not. Even this will be explained.” She laughed again. “Go.”

XXX

“I told you,” Seiran said. He didn't sound smug about it, only scared. As scared as Polla was.

“Damnit,” she whispered, adjusting the rifle scope, and increasing magnification. The auto target kept trying to lock onto the taller, armored figure; but she jerked it back again, focusing the sight on the dark, curly-haired woman, who walked across the Underground plat like she was on a mission.

“I count six,” her husband said, standing next to her with the pair of bi-nok goggles. “If that's not a Mandalorian hunting party, I don't know what is.”

“I'm glad you made us change hotels.” Not that she felt a lot safer across the street from where Aemelie Ordo had left them before heading off to see her Mandalorian Clan and Darth fracking Revan probably; but at least they had a clear line of sight.

Her finger hovered on the trigger. It would be an easy shot to make. Killing sentient beings probably wasn't any harder than shooting a trawler deer, right? But she would have to take out all six of them—

And I thought you were my friend, Aemelie. I thought you were my friend.

“I took the charge pak out,” Seiran said, as if he’d read her mind. “Don't do anything crazy. We paid off the desk, and I hacked the room panel to put us in here. Even if they guess the hotel, they won't know the room number.”

“Why did I even bring us to this stinking planet?” Polla let the rifle fall for a sec, and wiped her eyes. “I’m sorry, Seiran. This was a huge mistake.”

“You always wanted to see the center of the universe.” He snorted. “So did I, to be honest.”
“Now, we’ve seen it.” The towers had been pretty enough, but not that different from the ritzy parts of Corellia, or Corulag or Kuat. And the Underground… they might as well be in Nar—except it smelled even worse.

The place they were staying cost 200 credits a night and it was a dump.

True, Polla had to allow that sheer terror was probably affecting her opinion; but at least on Nar Shaddaa she’d never been hunted by a Mandalorian hunting party.

“I thought they were our friends,” she repeated lamely. Of course, that was before they’d seen a report about a ‘disturbance’ at the Skypalace, the hotel the Mandalorians had taken over. That was before Therion’s comm had gone dark, as had the media contact he’d promised to introduce them to. That was before Aemelie Ordo had pinged Polla’s comm six times, ‘just to find out how she was.” That was when they changed hotels, her own paranoia matching Seiran’s, for once. That was when they’d gone to ground and set up a guard rotation, just like they were running sweeps at summer camp as kids back home—planning for the revolution that had never come.

As if summoned, her comm chimed again. “Frack.” She glanced at it. To her surprise, the number was actually Therion’s.

“It’s him,” she told Sei.

“They’ve got Therion,” she told Seiran. “This is bad—really bad.”

“That media contact of your ex’s…” his voice trailed off. “Did Therion give you an address?”

Polla nodded. “Yes. Some kind of hotsheet place. Level 47?” She shook her head. “Sublevel 47?”

“That’s… about fifteen levels down from here. I think there’s public lifts and some stairs? Do you remember which sector?”

“This one.” She gritted her teeth. “That’s why Therion picked the place across the street for us. He said this was the closest safe part of town to Arca—where we wouldn’t get rolled.”

“It’s not gonna get any closer if we don’t move.” Polla was already gathering up everything she could, trying to ignore the panic in her chest. Panic and guilt.

Abasen whimpered a little. He had been fussy ever since they checked in. She glanced down at him, still in his black and red sling, wrapped around her shoulders. “Shhh,” she soothed.

“Just take the essentials,” Seiran told her. “We need to travel light.” He reached up and undid his topknot, hair falling awkwardly over his eyes. “We also need to blend in.”

Polla nodded, and fished the band out of her own hair. Resting Abasen on her hip, she ran her fingers over the heavy rifle Seiran had given her ages ago. Too heavy. “Good-bye,” she told it. “I’m sorry we can’t take you with us.”
All these things left behind: their farm, her parents, their lives—

Her husband laughed. “It's just a gun.”

She wiped her eyes. “It's not the gun, Sei—it’s the principle.”

“Here. Take these for your principles.” Seiran handed her the light blaster, and her throwing knives. “Like shooting a trawler,” he said—again. “If it comes to it, don’t hesitate. Aim to kill. For Abasen.”

Therion’s comm began ringing again. Polla tossed it down the fresher and hit flush.

XxX

“I have five minutes,” Revan told the Deralian. “Then I have to leave. Then I'm turning you over to the Mandalorians, who like to practice interrogation techniques, even if you don’t have anything useful to say.”

“There’s enough of me to go around, Princess.” Even strapped to a chair, Therion D’Cainen was irrepressible. He actually fracking winked.

She paced in front of him, hands behind her back. “You know how the Force works? Anything I want to know, I can just rip from your mind. Anytime.”

He stared at her and blinked. There was a long pause.

“Three minutes now,” Revan snapped. “Tell me why you're here. Is it revenge for her?”

“You mean Pollie?” He snorted. “Don't try and bluff the spacer who taught her to play pazaak. You can't read my mind, or you’d have kicked me in the choobs. You can’t read banthashit.”

“Then why?” She took a step backwards. “Surely, you don't think you’ve got a shot with me.”

“Sweet of you to offer, babe, and the red hair is hot, but no. I’m here for credits. This producer offered me a enough to buy a sweet ride, if I shared my stories about all of our good times.” He winked. “You gonna begrudge Polla’s ex a fortune? Or do you want a cut?”

“You can't,” she blurted out, before thinking it through. “There's too much about her and the rest of them on the nets now. You can't add more.”

“Pollie always wanted to be famous.” He smirked, looking her up and down. “Guess you know that. So what’s the problem?”

“You want me to buy you off?” Not that it would work, he'd just come back for more; and he’d always be a risk to them—frack, if he still has those vids from Zeltros—

She didn’t want to kill him, even as a part of her brain argued that was the only way to eliminate all the risk.

“Now you're blushing! Kinda cute. Pollie never did that. Do you turn red all over? Or just your face?”

“Your girlfriend is dead. What's wrong with you?” A colder part of her mind was already done with this. Polla and her family already ran. What’s the worst he can do? Is it bad enough that I should kill him?
“What’s your angle?” He frowned. “You seem pretty involved, worrying about a dead smuggler's reputation.”

“I just want to make sure she’s… remembered well.”

“Didn’t you kill her through?” He raised an eyebrow. “That’s what everyone's saying.”

“And you'd rather they were watching your Zeltros vid?”

“Now that’s personal.” He paused. “Which Zeltros vid? I go there a lot.”

“Only once with Polla.” He was still grinning like an ass, like he had all the time in the world. Before he could retaliate with another cheap shot, Revan continued. “Whoever you’re selling to, we’ll triple it. Sign the rights to my father-in-law’s production studio and you’ll be a rich man. Don't sign and I’ll… I’ll tell Suvam Tan what really happened with those mites.”

He snorted. “Wow. Being as you’re the Sith Lord, I wasn't expecting the same tired threats.”

“I’m no Sith. And they aren't threats.” She twisted her hand and his bonds fell free, restraints clattering on the floor. “I’ll tell Malachi’s counsel to expect you in the morning. Go to 100 Thantos One. Legal’s on the hundred and eighth floor.”

“You're letting me go?” For a second, all the bravado dropped, and Revan said a glimpse of the man that Polla had actually loved. “All you want is a cut of the action?”

“And for you to keep her face out of it. From what I remember you never recorded much with her face anyway. Maybe you could find an actress… someone who looks more like—” She tried to think of something he’d believe—anything to keep Polla’s face from being plastered everywhere. “Someone who looks more like me.” Plenty of vids like that with my face already.

Therion rubbed his wrists, smirking. “If that’s how you want it. Course I’m gonna have to let Arca down slow. You know how those Exchange—”

“Stop.” She waved her hand and he did, all of him, every muscle. Revan started at him for a moment, as the color in his face deepened, before she realized he couldn’t really breathe. Frack. Stars. Hell.

“Huhhhh—” he made a strange exhaling noise and then gasped. “What the frack was that for?”

“You're working with Arca? You've met her?”

“Not… personally,” Therion said. “But Suvam Tan introduced us.”

She blinked at him. Why? It doesn’t matter. “You're staying here. When I get back, I'll deal with you.”

“Fine.” He held up a hand. “Can I at least have my comm back? Or… hey, can you send Dessa in?”

Blonde from Rialis, a part of her mind suggested. Credits to spice he's fracking her six ways still Seventhday.

“No comms.” She turned to leave.

“Dessa?” Incredibly, he sounded hopeful still.
“Get bent, Therion,” Revan slid the door shut behind her.

XXX

Both of Lydie Korr’s hearts were pounding in her chest. Thalia’s footsteps had trailed away, heading up the spiraling staircase to one of the mezzanine levels.

Maybe this is some lighthearted prank? Like the time Mekel Jin and Dustil Onasi reprogrammed the practice droids to all sing Sith marching songs?

Lydie Korr stood up cautiously, one hand on the stealth belt and the other on the bookshelf in front of her. It held actual books: ancient, and bound. Several thousand had been saved from the ruins of Ossus before the Cron cluster’s implosion had destroyed that, and several other systems.

The six meters to the terminals felt like an eternity. Already, she felt like she was being watched—not in the Force, but along every nerve of her body. She’d been half-convinced that the terminal wouldn’t turn on, but it did. Only then, did she look down at the piece of plimsi Thalia had handed her.

On it, a list of names:

* Jana Novasun
* Janna Novasun
* Vima Sunrider
* Arren Kae
* Kreia Lin
* Darth Traya

This is the strangest research assignment I’ve ever had, she thought, as she began typing them in, tagging each for the cross-reference.

XXX

They had reached sublevel 40 when Abasen’s wails became impossible to ignore, each one sending a jolt of anxiety through her core. Their son was crying so hard, he’d turned bright red.

And then he started to cough.

He wasn’t the only one coughing either. It was crowded down here, more crowded than anything Polla Organa had ever seen outside a club. The streets were womprat warrens of domed sidewalks, curving around giant, rusting durasteel structures that looked like mechanical conduits fueling energies from both above and below. Every few hundred meters starburst intersections supported tiny, artificial suns. Some were too bright and blinding and others so dim she suspected sabotage. The crowd was a beast by itself and she was no longer sure they were going the right way, going any way at all, as it pushed them forward.

Abasen coughed again.

“Git that looked at,” a woman next to Polla said. Her cheeks had two orange circles on them, and lekku were crudely tattooed with symbols that looked Exchange… if the Exchange didn’t have professional artists capable of doing real work,

“The air down here sucks,” Polla told her. “What happened to the scrubbers?”

Seiran pressed her other arm, warningly.

“The air down here sucks? Sucks?” the Twi’lek laughed. “You used to better, huh?” She made a lewd gesture. “Suck it up, hayseed. Yer kids gonna die.”

“What?” She cradled him closer.

“He’s got it, huh? You think I dunno? The Jedi Plague. Fracking Underground shake.” The Twi’lek chuckled darkly again, and then began to cough herself.

Polla took a step back.

“I heard they’re lettin folks with kids to the front of the line,” a man behind them said. He was coughing too, great, jagged coughs that sounded like someone gasping.

“I read that it’s pretty hard to catch,” Seiran said. He was standing behind her now, his body a lean, protective shield against those pushing from behind.

“Maybe uptown,” the Twi’lek said, coughing again. “Trick is get the vax. But you know that. Thasswhy yer in this line, yeah?”

“What?” Polla stood on her toes, trying to see ahead of them, but all she could see was more crowd.

“There’s some kind of clinic up there.” Seiran was taller and he could see. He bent down now, to her ear. “Maybe we should—”

“I got kids!” A female voice behind them called out. Polla turned and saw an exhausted-looking Neimoidian, trailed by three children old enough to walk, and young enough to still sticker onto their mother’s arms. “Lemme through.”

“Follow her,” the Twi’lek urged Polla. “They have to see you first.”

Polla looked down at her son. His cheeks were bright red now and his crying had trailed off into an unhappy whimper. In the context, it made her blood run cold. She’d heard about the Plague that was sweeping Coruscant—who hadn’t? But she’d thought it was reserved for poor people—and Jedi.

“I think he really does have a fever,” she muttered to Seiran.

“We don’t have... Idchips,” Seiran told someone behind her. “Does that... is that okay? We... lost them. In a fire.”

“Lotta fires down here. They won’t givafrack. Won even ask.”

The Neimoidian and her spawnlets had cleared room through the crowd, and so it was fairly easy to travel through in their wake. Polla looked back, as Seiran trailed behind, elbowing a few sents to keep up. He reached her, just as they reached what seemed to be a clinic entrance; nothing more than a mudset archway into a wall, and what looked like another line within.

“Hello,” said a purple-skinned Twi’lek. A purple-skinned Twi’lek wearing Jedi robes and carrying a bondafide lightsaber. She smiled at Polla and Seiran as if it was the most normal thing in the galaxy. “Padawan Loran is seeing parents and children upstairs.” She gestured to a second door:
small, unmarked, and offset from the main entrance. It was open and the Neimoidian and her children were already vanishing inside, up a curving set of stairs.

“You’re… Jedi,” Polla said.

“Yes.” Violet eyes scanned her face, which was thankfully, like Seiran’s, half-covered by goggles. “We’re Jedi and we’re here to help.” The Jedi, who looked like one of those ones from the vids about Revan, glanced down at Abasen. “He’s going to be fine,” she assured Polla.

“What about plague?” Even if this was one of the Jedi from the vids, she hadn’t seemed to react, and Polla had to know. “The people in line said it’s plague.”

“It doesn’t affect children,” the Twi’lek told her, which sounded like utter banthashit, like something they’d made up to stop panic.

“Right,” Polla muttered. “Maybe I should get the doctor’s advice. You guys have an actual doctor? Or just a bunch of Jedi?”

The Twi’lek touched her arm and Polla jerked it back. The woman frowned at her. “I assure you, Padawan Loran has had extensive experience with this contagion. Perhaps she can reassure you herself.”

“Not a lot of Jedi where we’re from,” Seiran added. “No offense.”

“None taken, of course.” The woman’s eyes had already moved past them, to a man holding up his wife who looked like she was about six shades away from being a log at a funeral. He didn’t seem so great either.

Seiran followed Polla’s glance and then pulled her upstairs.

XXX

WRITINGS OF DARTH TRAYA// ACCESS Jedi Archives. All access restrictions have been lifted. All information is free to access. Do you want to proceed with this query? y/n y

Some say there has always been a Darth Traya, for has there not always been one betrayed? For every betrayal, is there not an equal reaction, certain as a fulcrum in the Force itself? Not revenge—no, nothing so petty and mundane. Revenge is a tool for scripters; a pathetic, cringing excuse for a motive. What I seek is not revenge for the wrong that was done to me: I seek an end to the means that allowed it. And this is not a selfish act: success will bring me no reward except death. But perhaps, the galaxy, being free of the Force that suspends all laws of physics and physiology, will finally be free to let true nature take its own course. The strong will be strong for their own merits, and the weak will certainly be no worse than they are now.

There had been so many entries. Vima Sunrider alone had over a thousand external links, each leading to increasingly contradictory sites. Finally, Lydie had started grouping the information into common search patterns. There were only fifty listings, for example, that cross referenced “Janna” (or “Jana”) Novasun with anything to do with Sunrider.

And then, if she narrowed the field further, only five of those mentioned Arren Kae, the presumed lover of the Echani General Yusanis during the Mandalorian Wars.
For Darth Traya, all she found was a paragraph.

“Are you some kind of test?”

Her hearts seemed to freeze. Don’t turn around, don’t turn around. “What?” Lydie was proud of how calm her voice sounded.

“You must be some kind of test. Lydie, is it? Padawan Korr?” The man’s voice paused. “Master Korr’s niece?”

Too late, Lydie thought of Thalia’s warning. But her head was already turning and all that she was saw was—

“Knight Arkan.” She let out a sigh of relief. Davad Arkan had been a great help to his old master, Zez Kai-El, ever since the older man had started having attacks of palsy. With all of the death in the Jedi Temple lately, she wasn’t sure how they could run the coroner’s office without him.

“Were you expecting someone else?” He glanced behind them, and then back and her, and then shrugged. “The archives seem rather empty of late.”

“This used to be my favorite place,” she said.

“Not mine.” He snorted. “Although trust me, I spent years in these stacks.”

“You did?” He was one of the Returns, one of the Selkath prisoner Jedi, even. No one really talked about him (no one was really left to talk, they all must be down in the sublevels healing the sick, there must be so many sick); but Davad Arkan was—

“You were in the Mandalorian wars?”

“Of course.” She’d surprised him again, she could tell by the puzzlement growing on his face. “As I said, I spent years in these stacks. My master was Vima Sunrider, and she ran the place with an iron fist… when she wasn’t off chasing bigger game.”

“I don’t know what you mean.”

“I know.” His eyes were a strange brown color that was more yellow than brown. “You’re so very young. But strong. Strong in the Force.”

“Not really.” Were her horns flushed again? How embarrassing.

“Really.” His smile flashed. White teeth in a dark face. “Especially compared to your friend upstairs.”

“My friend upstairs?” She frowned.

“I know she’s there,” he shrugged. “The sensor triggered two bodies, not just one. These archives are restricted. We can’t just have Padawans wandering here.”

“Of course you can’t.” That seemed reasonable, although she’d thought Knight Arkan was Zez Kai-El’s assistant. And—

“I thought your master was Master Kai’El. I didn’t know there was a Master Sunrider.” She frowned. “Vima Sunrider?” A name from the lists. A name from children’s holostories. Lydie hadn’t even thought she was real until she’d seen all of those cross-references. Like a bad equation. If Jana Novasun is Janna Novasun is Vima Sunrider is Arren Kae....
Why is the last name on the list Darth Traya?

He nodded at the terminal in front of her. “Naturally, that research on your board is mere coincidence.”

The horn buds on her temples throbbed. Her indentations prickled. “I like history.”

“So do I.” He took a few steps closer. “I thought the history of my own planet was fascinating. “So many struggles between light and dark, like beasts fighting for supremacy.”

“You're from Onderon.” Lydie nodded. His eyes seemed to reflect the light of the terminal screen, making them almost… glow. “There’s a theory that the Beast-Riders are all descended from the children of Freedon Nadd, a Sith Lord who began a rebellion—”

“It's no theory.” He reached out and touched her shoulder. “Sometimes I… sometimes I feared that taint was in all of us. In me. It’s why I tried to be a good Jedi.”

“You are a good Jedi.” Lydie felt dizzy, felt her legs tremble; but then he held her up, kept her standing. Helpful, like a good Jedi would.

“No.” He wrapped his arms around her, but it wasn't like kissing Thalia, or brushing against Mekel Jin’s shoulder. This time, Lydie didn't feel a spark so much as an easing of tension, slipping into a warm bath and letting go. “Beasts don't really fight for supremacy, you know. It's simpler than that.”

“What?” Her voice was weak now, a bare whisper.

“They fight for food.” His embrace made her ribs creak, her heartbeats slow. “Because they’re hungry.”

Xxx

“Please, come in,” a female voice said. “There's nothing to fear.”

Nothing except fear for Abasen. In the time it had taken Seiran to write up their medical records and give them to the gleaming white meddroid in the waiting room, their son had fallen back asleep. But he was whimpering now in his dreams, and wheezing in a way that Polla really didn't like. Didn't like enough to let her family come in range of a Jedi for the first time since her accident.

“I'm just worried he might be—is it the plague?” She started talking as soon as she entered the room, babbling at the beige-robed woman, with a mask covering the lower half of her face, and a loose surgeon’s cowl over her hair.

“It's not the plague,” the woman said. Her accent was strange, like upper-crust Coruscant mixed with something wilder. “Trust me. He's much too young. May I see?” She held out her hands, and Polla carefully unsnapped Abasen from his self-cleaning blanket—and held him out.

One of the women’s hands was artificial, made of some gold metal, but it cradled his body gently, as her other fingers traced a line down his forehead to his chest. “A little fever. Have you been to any new planets recently?”

“We have been travelling,” Polla admitted.

“How do you know it's not the plague?” Seiran demanded.
The medix looked up at them. Her eyes were bright green, like all the vids of Revan’s eyes. Polla hadn’t expected to ever see that color in a real person. “The virus doesn’t affect children. Not before puberty. He might be a carrier now, but he won’t get sick. Have you all been vaccinated?”

“No. If it’s not plague, then what does he have?” Polla pressed. Some small relief at least.

“I think it’s just an immune response. Common, when you bring children this young to an entirely new ecosystem. New germs, new…” the woman’s voice faltered for a moment and she blinked. “New everything. I… forget the technical term. But he’ll be fine. What about the two of you?”

“We’re not sick,” Polla told her. “And we’ll skip the Jedi drugs, if it’s all the same to you.”

“Not drugs. Vaccine. You can’t afford to skip it.” The woman sighed. “Are you planning on returning to Deralia in the future?”

“We’re not from Deralia,” Polla said. Something in her chest seemed to freeze.

“One of the other Outlier satellites? Regardless, there’s no plague there now. But if you’re exposed, and you don’t get that vaccine, you’ll be carriers. Do you want to spread it there, before the Republic inoculates the system?”

“The Republic can stick it up their ass if they think they’re gonna vaccinate entire planets—” now that she knew Abasen wasn’t dying, Polla’s indignation returned, spiked by a little fear.

“What made you think my wife’s Deralian?” Seiran interrupted, in one of the worst Core accents Polla had ever heard.

The Jedi handed Abasen back to Polla. She was frowning now, staring at Polla’s chest, covered by the sling and the self-cleaning eridu blanket-bunting. When Polla stuck him into it, her son squirmed: he’d outgrow it soon.

“Here—” the medix put her hands over Polla’s holding Abasen up as Polla fumbled with the straps. “No. Not like that. It should expand at the base if you pull it down.”

“Huh?”

“Here.” The medix bent forward. They were exactly the same height. Polla could see a strip of red hair, at the crown, where her cowl rested on her skull.

She heard her breath draw in sharply, and the other woman looked up. “You’re frightened.” She nodded. “Oh. It happens a lot.”

Her fingers moved a little and Abasen slid down into his newly-expanded sling. She stepped back and pulled down the mask, pulled off the cowl.

In person, Revan Starfire looked a lot younger than Polla had expected. And her hair was long, coiled in two tidy braids and looped down her back. A faint smile crossed her lips. “I don't bite.”

No, you just ruin lives. Polla stared back, throat dry with fear.

Those green eyes stared into hers and she braced for the confrontation she expected, she’d dreamed of—played out in her head half a dozen ways already; but the Jedi—Revan—just kept staring back. A frown sketched between her eyebrows again.

“I don’t care if you lie about being Deralian—one of my best friends was from Deralia and I’d know the accent anywhere. I don't care if you're frightened of me—given recent events, I'm sure the sight of Revan Starfire's face inspires many strong reactions on your planet...." Her voice trailed off and one delicate, red eyebrow raised. "What I really want to know is why your son is wearing a blanket with the D'Reev crest."

XXX

Dreaming it wasn't the same as seeing. The vision of her nightmares: the shadow of the man, surrounded by black, and Lydie's body, collapsed in his arms. Feeling that moment—that death of the Force happening even now. Was her friend still alive? Were her lips still warm?

In her dreams, she saved the girl, but what if Thalia was too late?

I was wrong before. I was wrong about Oerin Lin. What I did made it worse.

Try to change one future and all of the others shift. She had stopped one kind of conquest, only to usher in these shadows; reveal a path that led even more inexorably towards that room, and the man and the broken thing on the bed.

“Nihilus.” It would be his name, but it wasn’t yet. She’d dreamed of him as a shadow, but now she knew the man he had been. This one. Knight Davad Arkan, a former prince of Onderon.

His head turned, and for a moment, he had no face at all: just a black well of stars, and a voiceless roar, like hundreds screaming. The future again. The one I can’t stop.

“The other one.” He dropped Lydie Korr, and her friend rolled to the side. One hand twitched, life there still, but oh, in the Force—her friend felt like a ghost. “The friend upstairs. Tell me, little girl, what was the purpose of this little exercise?”

Thalia had been told what to say, how to dissemble; but she’d dreamed other words, and it was those that she used.

“I know you have the mask of Mandalore. You’ll paint it white, like a zakkeg skull. Do you know that too? Is that why you kept it?”

He froze.

“It’s okay,” she murmured. “Your master is busy. My master is keeping her busy. My master will try and stop her—”

“Try?” She saw the hesitation, his features resolved into a face again, and something like hope in his expression.

“All we can do is try,” Thalia told him. “I’m trying to save Lydie. Is she dead?”

He glanced down, and she saw the horror cross his face, as the man he still was still Jedi enough for regret. She’d seen that expression in her dreams a hundred times before: it made no difference. A demon is no less dangerous for its conscience.

“Not… yet.” He took a reluctant step away from the prone body. “Take her. Take her now and run.”

“I can’t.” She wanted to. “I dreamed of you. Of this.”

“You’re Padawan May,” he said. “Thalia May. One of the Korriban students. The one from Ziost.”
“Why did you keep the mask?” she asked. Stall him for time, Jopheena had said. That much, Thalia would do.

“The mask of Mandalore the Ultimate was lost on the Dxun moon. Mandalore the Ultimate died eaten by beasts, beasts controlled by my father. Therefore it’s mine.”

“So it’s the Mandalorians you want?” She hadn’t expected that.

He smiled slightly, grimly. “It would be… easier to live among them. No Force sensitives. But no, it’s too late for all of that. She’s in my head. I have to do what she wants.” He looked at Lydie again, and his face twisted. “I don’t want to kill them, but I can’t stop.”

“No.” Thalia shook her head. “You can oppose her. Resist. In my dreams you do.”

“You’re the seer,” he nodded. “One of the ones she wants alive.” He glanced down at the girl on the ground. “She wanted her too.”

“For his shadows.” Thalia shook her head. “Knives in the dark. She won’t have either of us. Either you kill us here and be lost; or you’ll defeat her.”

She had dreamed that much, seen the architect of the unraveling in a dark place, beset upon by her own apprentices. She had seen the woman, Darth Traya, Vima Sunrider—women of a thousand names blinded. She had seen her lose.

But she had not seen her die. That was beyond the veil.

The man who would become a monster, become the death of worlds, took another, shuddering breath. “Do you know where he is? Oerin?”

“No,” Thalia May said. “But I dreamed where he will be.”

XXX

“What?” The woman gaped at her, clutching her son, and taking a step back. “I don't know what you mean!”

“That blanket has the D’Reev crest.” Malachor had one like that. When he was small enough to carry, that was so long ago now, that he was as small as their son.

“We found it,” the man said quickly. His voice dipped and raised with absurd inflections. “In a charity bin. We needed stuff for our kid, so….”

“Oh.” So many suspicions in this new world. How many times had Revan jumped at shadows. A charity bin. Of course. All of their clothes looked ragged and dirty and torn. The Underground was full of cast-offs from the skies.

Maybe it’s the same one blanket. He’s outgrown it now. Revan felt her eyes start to tear again with foolish sentiment and she blinked hard. Crying was something Sheris would have done, not her. “I’m going to do your vaccinations now.”

“You’re….” The woman’s voice trailed off again.

“Don’t fear me.” She had to practice the simpering laugh, the way Sheris had once practiced her voice. “I’m not Revan, if that’s your concern, although you’d be surprised at how often sentients make that mistake!. My name is Sheris Loran. Padawan Sheris Loran.” She shrugged. “I know the resemblance is strong.”

The man laughed. “A little uncanny.”

“We’re both from Hoth. Its Human population has a very small gene pool.”

“Oh.” The woman looked a little like Beya, underneath those enormous goggles. Same heart-shaped face, and the pointed chin. Deralia has a small gene pool too. Another isolated world. We had that in common, Beya and I. The Deralian’s hands went back to the blanket again, stroking the fur lining its edge, feeling the solid weight of her son within.

Revan had done that too, with Malachor, walking through the corridors of the D’Reev apartments, where her son stayed in secret for his own safety—

“Here.” She turned to the table, selecting two adult and one pediatric doses. She couldn’t sense the Force in any of them—only that fear that so many of the patients had, of her or of the Jedi, or both. Fools. She wanted to shake it out of them. This is going to save you and all of your pathetic worlds.

“He’s really okay?” the woman asked.

“He’s beautiful,” Revan smiled at her. “He just needs some rest and a little time to get used to this planet. Do you have accommodation? Credits?” Not that she could offer them credits. For whatever reason, the Order here played passive roles with its aid. Heal them, but don’t help them. They’re supposed to help themselves. “I have the name of a few shelters…."

“We’re fine,” the woman said. Proud, that one. Too much for her own good.

“I was a ref once too.” Not for long, but long enough. Eos. Malachor was even younger than this infant. “I—I know it can be hard to accept assistance, when you’re used to being free—”

“We’re fine,” the man repeated. He held out his arm and Revan injected him with the vaccine. The woman was wary, muscles tensing under her fingers, but she accepted it too. And finally, the son, his baby arm soft and round, dark eyes gazing into Revan’s with that soft fascination that they all had. It had been the late Master Croi’s idea to assign Padawan Sheris Loran to pediatrics, and inwardly, she thanked the Fosh again.

He died after getting the vaccine, he shouldn’t have died.

“Do you… do you know the real Revan?” the woman asked.

“Seriina!” Her husband sounded upset. “Apologies, my wife—”

It was a question she’d been asked often before, and she’d created a neutral response. Revan smiled. “I did,” she said. “Before the war.”

“Was she…” the Deralian’s voice trailed off. “Was she… nice?”

“Nice?” No one had ever asked that. The question threw her off balance. “I don’t know.” Revan smiled slightly, pulling the cowl back up over her braids, the mask over the lower half of her face. “She tried.”

XXX

“Vima.” Her knees hurt standing, and so Master Jopheena sat down on the bench. She had wanted another day, another week, another year; but the Force was capricious, and what she’d seen from her hidden room with its security feeds of all the temple places, was enough to convince her they were out of time.

Nothing. Jopheena stared up at the statue of Nomi Sunrider again. Even young, Jopheena didn’t think she’d ever looked as beautiful as that bleeding statue. That thought made her laugh—vanity rearing its head at a time like this!

No response, not even a whisper in the Force. Well, that was what made Kae such a formidable opponent. If the fate of the galaxy hadn’t been at stake, Jopheena sometimes thought it was appropriate that a mad, Force-possessing Sith emperor should be opposed by a mad, Force-controlling Sith shadow. If only they could fight to the death themselves on some isolated world and leave the rest of us in peace.

But that wasn’t how these things went. Unchecked, mad Sith inevitably became even madder Sith. Slowly, Jopheena thumbed the controls off of her stealth belt and waited some more, letting the memories of lives past—some named and some not—spin through her head, as slowly as clouds after rain. Again and again, she saw the child’s face: so young and fearless, so much potential, and so much sorrow. Sometimes its features blurred, becoming Malak and then Vima again, and who was to say which was more real? Once, she even glanced down to find a brown-skinned baby in her arms, and a strong, brown arm wrapped around her waist. His rough beard brushed her face, even if his name was long forgotten.

It took enough time for the sun to lighten in the sky through the dome overhead for her to get an answer.

“Did the Jedi Order say you were Nomi Sunrider?” Arren Kae’s dripped with malice. “They lied.”

Slowly, Jopheena brought out the holocron, wrapped in white cloth, out of her pocket. “All Jedi lie,” she said slowly. “That was one of the lessons that Nomi taught me.”

She held up the holocron to the light, eyeing the ysalamiri boxes set in a circle around her bench: hopefully enough. Even if her own memories could not be trusted, the records said Kae had formidable power in the Force.

But still not enough—not for Kae’s plans. No. For those she requires an apprentice who shines like a star. An obedient apprentice, for a master so often betrayed—

A figure appeared, like stepping through invisible mist, hardening into flesh and cloth. Gray robes, as if that was some kind of statement. White hair, and eyes as faded and blue as Jopheena’s own. Lines scoring the face, making Kae look older than Jopheena had ever felt.

“This is your trap?” The woman laughed. “What are you going to do? Take those memories yourself?”

“Should I tell you my plan, first?” Jopheena asked. “Would that make it more, or less effective? I’ve guessed yours already.”

“You’re a senile fool. A patchworked creation.” Kae paced before her, grace in her old limbs, hand on the hilt of her saber.

Jopheena touched the shield on her wrist for reassurance. If the woman decided to throw the weapon at her throat, ysalamiri would be no defense; much as they would do nothing against her Force-devouring apprentice. Hold him, Thalia, just a bit longer.

“Perhaps, but I’m a patchworked creation holding the holocron of your memories behind an ysalamiri shield. The life you put in the holocron in Atris’s office: the holocron that Revan is to think has her own memories; so you can inhabit her body.”

Kae laughed darkly. “Fool. You think that’s the only copy?”

“No,” Jopheena said. “But it’s the only holocron left in this entire Temple that I haven’t already destroyed.”

Jedi lie. That was one. She’d sent the others out, scattered them, with all of their Jedi exiles, sent them across the galaxy. Good or bad, dark side or light: perhaps never again will all of our knowledge be vulnerable to the corruption of one person. And in all of those, the real memories of Revan Starfire—those she had never found at all. Already stolen or already destroyed; one could only play with the cards in the deck—

It made her laugh sometimes to wonder which of her had been the one who loved pazaak. Somehow, she wouldn’t have expected it from Nomi; but you never knew.

Kae’s eyes narrowed as she moved within striking range. “Is there something you want, Master Jopheena?”

“Yes,” Jopheena said softly. Her hand not holding the other holocron slipped into her pocket and keyed open the detonator. “I want an end.”

XXX

An explosion rattled the hangar bay, as Master Loanin shepherded the last of them into the troop carrier, assisted by the droids, who were all that was left in what had once been Azen’s beautiful Medix. He’d been instructed to take off immediately, with all Temple survivors and yet—

Lydie Korr is not here.

Others were missing too. One of those Manaan knights, two of the ones from Corulag that he’d been padawans with. Several… other padawans. Among their number, lurked almost definitely the source of their scourge: the creature he’d come to think of as… ‘the Creature.’ It was responsible for all the Jedi deaths the plague couldn’t explain.

It was a tragedy so many Jedi were lost, but Lydie was the only one with the sharp mind and sharper eyes; the Padawan who understood, even with her minimal training, when he explained about the retroviral adhesions that caused the mitochondrial cell walls to expand, sending the virus to sleep.

Her aunt, Master Marla Korr was here: the only other Jedi Master still extant in the Coruscant Temple aside from the drooling waste that had once been Zez’Kai (here too, but hardly worth counting); although there were five or six others at their clinic in the Underground. He’d given the signal. Yuthura Ban would warn those below. Take them to the safe house. If they had miscalculated, and the Creature was in the Underground instead… the thought did not bear contemplation.

He stared at Marla’s face and she stared back impassively. He tried to match the expression, tried not to think about where her niece could be. Master Jopheena had requested Lydie and Thalia’s assistance to lure the thing Azen Loanin privately thought of as ‘the Creature,’ into their web.
A Jedi master certainly can’t protest the actions of another Jedi master, especially once several times his age; but he had never thought Jopheena would sacrifice them—only herself. And yet—where we they?

“I smell smoke,” one of the children whispered. Too young to be Padawans now. He wondered what would become of them.

“Yes. There was an explosion. Master Jopheena is one with the Force,” he said slowly. “And we all must do what we can to survive.” He glanced at the tanks where the gravely ill slumbered, among them the bodies of Dustil Onasi and Mekel Jin. Yuthura’s drugs would wear off soon (she had only confessed to using them the day before, when Jopheena drew him firmly into their cabal), and, not for the first time, he wondered if the simpler result would be to end their lives now, before those drugs did.

You eliminated the threat of this mind-clouding Arren Kae. But you’ve still left the galaxy with Lords Revan and Malak. What do you plan to do about that, Master Jopheena? Are you leaving them to me?

Some Jedi purported to hear from the dead. Azen doubted he would be so fortunate.

“We should go,” he added, walking slowly towards the front of the ship, and the automated controls. As an Eglantine, he had learned the basics of simulated flying; but aside from the medical arts, his practical education had ended there when his grasping father had sent his sixth son to the Jedi at age seven. “Raise the ramp.” He would have raised it himself, if he knew where the control box was.

A door clanged open on the south wall and then there she was, Thalia May, staggering under the weight of Lydie Korr. The Zabrak was taller than the Ziostian, and only the Force made it possible for her to carry Lydie at all, given their estimated weight and bodily mass.

Thalia May’s face was streaked with tears. Azen found himself hurrying down the ramp, thankfully still there, to assist her. He slipped his hand under Lydie Korr’s shoulder and their eyes met, above her unconscious head.

“What happened?” he asked. “Is the Creature dead?”

“No,” Thalia said. “But he might be a man again.” She wiped her eyes on her shoulder and kept walking up the ramp. Lydie’s horns had scratched her cheek.

“At least it’s over,” he murmured. “Given time, we’ll rebuild. The Order endures..”

“Maybe,” Thalia shook her head. “I can’t see beyond the veil.”

XXX

“Welcome to Mom’s,” the Cathar said. She sat above them in a gilded cage. She was carrying what looked like a pretty nice automatic blaster, and wearing nothing except a grenade belt. “I’m sorry, but we’re closed, except for deliveries..” She looked them up and down dubiously. “Not taking auditions too. And no children under eighteen.”

“We’re here to see Arca,” Polla said.

“You’re a little late for that,” the Cathar laughed. “Bitch has been dead for a week.” She paused, staring at them. Was it expectation? Was it something else?

“You want a bribe?” Polla was losing patience with everything about this damned planet. They were being hunted by Mandalorians, poked with needles by red-headed Jedi, and frack knew what had happened to Therion, their only ride off this rock. She frowned, knowing how this worked. “Has anyone taken over for Arca? Maybe the next rung down on the ladder?”

The Cathar’s tail flicked through the bars. Polla tried to rest a credit on it; only to have it fall to the ground. Tail at least was a holocron. “Maybe.” The woman held out her hand, and Polla dropped the credchip into it, where it landed solid as houses. “You could try the guy upstairs. Management style’s a little different, but it’s all the biz, right?” She winked.

Polla elbowed Seiran until her husband winked back. “Sure,” he said, shooting her that look that meant he thought they were walking into a trap. “Is there a name we should use?”

XXX

The grass was strangely sharp, and something itched. It was peculiarly distinct for an afterlife.

Jopheena opened her eyes to see a straggly garden, dappled in deep shade. Above her, surrounding the clearing, soared enormous trees, larger than any she had ever dreamed of. Larger than anything, on any world she ever remembered. They were so tall they made her dizzy. She turned her face back down to the ground.

A pair of brown ankles stepped into view, sinking into the sharp grass. The toes were calloused, and the toenails overgrown and in need of a good clipping. She let her eyes travel up, past the muscular legs in their ripped Padawan beige, to the flat, muscular belly, the chiseled biceps. The smiling face, with its black beard, and its sparkling eyes that tugged in a place of her, a place that she could almost remember.

Somewhere behind them, she heard a child’s laughter.

“I have to confess,” Jophageen said slowly. “I was expecting Ulic Qel-Droma. Or possibly Andur Sunrider.”

The man smiled at her. A good smile, a strong smile. Strong white teeth. A dimple in one cheek. And Force, if he wasn’t as handsome as stars. “Disappointed?”

“No.” She smiled back. “Can you tell me my name? When I was alive… I never wanted to know.”

“Nayama,” her husband said. “Nayama Bindo.”

XXX
“Something’s wrong.” It wasn’t just the sealed gate. Davad had warned her the Temple would be sealed. But the plaza wasn’t usually deserted, even this late at night, and there were no guards, not even droids: only a recorded holomessage that said that the Jedi Temple had been evacuated due to contagion, and that all inquiries should be directed to remote lines. A string of comm codes followed, none of which Revan recognized.

Dawn wasn’t far off on this side of Coruscant: the sky was turning a pale gold, and the cloud cover was low, dipping everything in a warm mist.

“Obviously, something is wrong.” Millifar rolled her eyes and turned to her father. “May I set the charges?”

“Sure,” Canderous shrugged. “Easier than trying to scale the wall and break a window.”

“Your Third Wife doesn’t even have a jet pack,” Millifar nodded at Revan. “Or grappling hooks.”

“I don’t need either.” Revan eyed the distance above them to the dome above the Temple’s main vestibule. “You can’t just blow a hole in the door.”

“I can too,” Millifar said. “I brought all of the explosives.”

“We don’t need that much attention, is what I meant.” It had always been awkward with Canderous’s daughter, but now things seemed… worse, not better.

“Does your laser sword cut through transparisteel?” The girl sneered at her. “I have a jet pack. Give me your weapon, and I’ll fly up to the dome and cut our way in.”

“I can get up there myself.” I refuse to be in a pissing competition with a seventeen-year old. Revan measured the distance again with her eyes. There was narrow ledge about five meters up: an easy enough distance to clear—and from there the angles looked good. The window itself would be shatter resistant, but with the Force she should be able to break it.

“Here goes nothing,” she muttered, tensing her legs. The Force sang as she soared, almost like flying—and for a glorious moment it reminded her of being Polla Organa riding the swoop in Derra Canyon—and then she slammed more ingloriously into the wall, fingers grappling for purchase on the lip of the pediment above her head.

“Don’t fall,” Millifar called out mockingly from below. Before Revan had a chance to respond, the girl was hovering next to her, heat of the jet pack evident even a meter away.

“Do you need help?” Millifar added.

“Not really.” Revan took a deep breath, focusing her strength in her gut and lifted her legs, driving momentum with the Force to make the next jump, flipping backwards and lifting up, clearing the pediment and flying, feet-first towards the dome straight ahead. Break, she thought at the glass as it approached. Shatter. She made her legs into an arrow, cushioned by the Force, and the energy flexed beneath her toes, vibrating with the intensity of a sonic shockwave.
The glass of the dome broke around her, razor-sharp pieces falling like jewels. Revan slowed her descent, and landed in a crouch on the marble floor.

“Not bad,” Canderous called out from above. “Think you could do that kind of stunt with a basilisk through atmo?”

Revan looked up. He and his daughter hovered with their jet packs, two helmeted faces peering through the shattered place in the dome. “Probably.” I wonder if I ever tried.

The Mandalorians descended, straight up and feet first, keeping distance between them to clear their vents. Their beskar boots crunched the transparisteel underfoot, motes of light sifting through the dust, footsteps echoing in an empty room.

“There’s no one here.” Millifar was checking something on her belt—presumably one of those primitive sensor arrays designed to sift for heartbeats, temperature fluctuations that could indicate nearby life. “Why are we here again?”

“You’re wrong. There’s something.” Someone. Two someones. Not very close together. As Revan extended her senses, one of them winked out, and then the other; masking themselves as efficiently as Oerin Lin had once taught her to do, on the ride from Manaan to Coruscant.

“I’m getting smoke, maybe fire.” Canderous’s helmeted voice was metallic and his head turned towards the source. “Carbon readings and heat signatures are way up. Over that way.”

Revan could smell it too. Cordite and ozone, some kind of explosion. Some kind of explosion and no Jedi left. “What the frack happened here?” Davad. Dustil. Panic gripped her. “We need to check the infirmary.”

“No.” The voice wavered, came from behind them, near the main entrance gates, as if the woman had flanked them unseen. “There are no Jedi here… only those who were once Jedi, thought themselves Jedi.”

Revan whirled around, hand on the hilt of her saber, even as she heard Canderous and his daughter cock their rifles.

In front of them stood an old woman, streaked with soot and what looked like blood. Her white hair was half-braided, half matted. She was stooped, concussion bruises under her eyes, and had a jagged, ugly-looking wound on her side that, even as Revan watched, darkened the mess of her robes with more blood.

“Revan,” she whispered. “My old apprentice. I knew you would come.” She looked about to falter, and Revan darted forward to catch her before she fell.

“Master Kae?” Her fingers pressed down on what she sensed was the worst of the wounds, trying to focus the Force to slow the bleeding. When the woman grunted in pain, Revan realized she was pressing too hard. She could sense the wound, but its complexity defied her skill. “I don’t think I can heal this.”

“Medix,” the old woman whispered. “I think there may still be some kolto supplies.”

“What happened?” Canderous demanded.

“An… explosion.” The woman’s eyelids fluttered. “In the Meditation Gardens.”

“Was everyone killed?” No. Revan would have sensed something. But I thought I did. For a moment, I thought I did. There was... something. Someone. Someone is gone. “Where is everyone?”

“Gone,” Kae whispered. “All of them.”

“No, there’s someone else here. I sensed it.” She sensed it again, suddenly, a presence slipping in and out of shadows.

“The Onderonite.” Kae’s voice was slightly stronger now. “Careful with that one.”

“Do you mean Davad?” Impossible. The darkness she sensed was nothing like her friend. Her eyes met Canderous’s over the old woman’s head. “She’s lost a lot of blood; we may not make it to the Medix.”

The Mandalorian nodded towards his daughter. “Milli, give her some paks.”

“We hardly have any left—” the girl muttered under her breath, something about dar’jettai and their magic healing powers; but then she produced two packs of kolto from the top of her boot. “Here,” she snapped, holding them out to Revan.

Revan gently put Master Kae down against the wall, packing her side with the kolto. The one wound was just as bad as she’d feared, but disturbingly, most of the blood covering Master Kae did not appear to be her own. Kae’s eyelashes fluttered again and she murmured something, too soft for Revan to catch.

“So. Master Kae is still breathing?”

Revan’s head snapped up. Mandalorian rifles snapped on.

Davad Arkan stood, framed in the doorway, a silver, metallic oval dangling from one hand.

“Barely.” What she had sensed before—that darkness, overwhelming everything like a scream in the Force—now it was all gone. Maybe it wasn’t Davad at all. Maybe there’s something else here. Not the darkness, but he’s hunting it. Or maybe it’s hunting them—

“There was an explosion,” he said. “In the Meditation Gardens. The rest of the Jedi evacuated, but I stayed, looking for Master... Kae.” He walked towards them, smiling. It was a strange smile, one that Revan didn’t recognize on his face.

“You said before, Jedi were disappearing.”

“Yes.” As he drew closer, Revan saw the sheen of sweat on his forehead, the tremble in his step. “Some died. More fled. More got away. They kept it as quiet as they could, but I knew they were running. They did the best they could.”

Canderous made a noise beside her, a grunt of surprise.

Revan looked up, and realized what Davad was holding in his hand. Oerin’s visor: the mask of Mandalore. Revan’s old mask—or as near a copy as to be identical.

“Give Master Kae to me,” Davad said, holding it up. “And you may have this.”

XXX

After confiscating their weapons, the Gamorrean guard led Polla and Seiran up two flights of stairs to an open, circular room. It was deserted, but one end held a bar, and the other a stage. The walls were lined with red synth leather, and some kind of dingy fur carpet lined the floors. Everything looked faded and unused, as if business had been slow—or nonexistent—for a long time.

“First time I’ve seen a deserted brothel used as a front,” Polla whispered to Seiran.

“We’re not deserted, just closed,” said a voice over the loudspeaker. A woman’s voice, partially muffled. “What d’you think, Lammikins—are they more Sith assassins or not?”

“Not,” said a man’s voice, gravel-edged, almost familiar. “I’m not sure who they are.”

Polla looked around for the source of the speakers, but they could have been anywhere. “We’re friends of Therion’s?” she said. “He told Arca about us?”

“Arca took several secrets to her grave, and left incomplete notes,” the male voice said. “Therion was… was that one of the actors from the next round of vids?”

Abasen shifted and started to cry. Poor slob was hungry, and that Jedi Loran had said to keep him hydrated. “I need a large glass of water,” Polla snapped. “And I’m gonna nurse my kid now. Any objections?”

It was too hot in here by half and she ducked her head, pushing the goggles up to wipe her face, settling down on a chair, and unsnapping their son from the blanket that wasn’t just some random gift at all; but probably some kind of threat from Revan or Senator D’Reev, or who knows who. Who cares who? It’s self-cleaning and he likes it.

There was a long silence, broken only by the sounds of her son nursing lustily, before the door behind the bar slid open, and an old man and a woman walked through. The woman was wearing a bathrobe and had green hair. The old man was too old for the synthide he was sporting, but Polla didn’t judge.

“Did she send you?” the man said, staring at Abasen and her boob in a way that would be considered rude on most planets.

“Therion sent us, I told you.” Polla glared up at him. “Do you mind?” She felt Abasen’s forehead again. It was cooler now, and he seemed better. That made her relax. A little. Some.

Seiran shifted behind her. “You said Arca’s dead. Are you her replacement?”

“In a manner of speaking.” The old guy frowned, but at least he turned his attention to the floor. “You're not the first to come looking for Arca.”

“First with a baby through,” the woman said. “Adorable little granslug, isn’t he? Looks just like our Mekelkins at that age! Lammikins, I think if they were gonna attack they'd have gotten a sitter first.”

“These two aren’t Sith.” The man had a rusted, gravel voice that sounded like something out of the vids. He raised his voice. “You work for D’Reev? Or my niece? She got my messages? Could she not come herself?”

Seiran stepped in front of Polla and their kid fast. “Your... niece?”

“It’s the blanket, isn’t it?” Polla was tired. She stood up herself, tucking Abasen back in, and fastening her vest. “The fracking D’Reev crest blanket?” She stepped in front of Seiran, glaring at the old man, who... as she looked more closely, was pretty obviously Master Vrook Lamar from the vids. She would have recognized him sooner, except she didn’t expect the galaxy to keep making connections that it wasn’t supposed to be making. Maybe this was what happened when the Jedi fracked with the Force and brought you into their mess. Maybe after that, the Force had permission to frack with you too.

Vrook Lamar stared back at her, as if how mind was trying to make a similar calculation about who Polla could be.

She tried to remember how many steps it was to the door, down the stairs and out. With Abasen, even if Seiran did something to cover them, she’d never make it. Not against a Jedi.

Fifty fracking trillion people or something on this planet, and how come everyone we run into is has something to do with her?

“Who?” she snapped. “Just say her name. Who the frack do you think sent us?”

“That’s her son’s old blanket?” When she looked at the old man’s face he was frowning. He had brown eyes, not green like Revan’s at all. But as she watched, those eyes narrowed slightly, and then widened. “Wait. I know your face. You’re—”

“Polla Organa Wen,” said Polla Organa Wen. “And this is my husband Seiran Wen, and our son, Abasen Wen.”

Incredibly, Master Vrook Lamar of the Jedi Council actually laughed.

“They the ones Revan had killed?” the woman asked. “You sure they’re not Sith pretendin to be them?”

“That’d be a neat trick,” Polla snapped. “Suppose we are. Think we’d tell you?”

“Don’t worry, Deeka,” the man said. Smiling made him look younger. “There’s nothing to fear here.”

“We are being stalked by a Mandalorian hunting band,” Seiran said. “But I think we lost them a few levels up.”

“Did she send them after you?” The Jedi’s smile faded.

“We don’t know.” Her husband sat down next to her, staring up at the Jedi. “Maybe? Our pilot disappeared, and the Mandalorians kept comming us—”

“My niece told me you were dead.” The man didn’t look like he smiled often, but it did wonders for his face.

“Didn’t exactly comm her to tell her we weren’t.” Polla shrugged. How would she know either way?

“Did she—someone tried to have you killed—there was an explosion?”

Polla gave herself a second to wonder if Jedi were like the Grass Priests back home, and not telling the truth to them meant going to hell. Likewise, if Jedi would be obligated to report your (technical, but not moral) felonies, and insurance fraud, (insurance fraud according to Republic law) to Republic authorities.
“We did that,” Seiran said, before she had a chance to decide. “We did the explosion.”

“Sei!” she glared at him.

“You faked your own deaths?” Well, the old guy looked happy about it, at least. “Did she know?”

“We didn’t comm her and tell her we were secretly alive and on the lam because she ruined our lives, no.” Was everyone on Coruscant slow? Or trusting? Pity she wasn’t here on business; she could probably sell this Jedi guy a lot of beachfront property on Dagobah. “So how could she know anything?”

Unless she does. Unless she does because she’s fracking Revan and she has the Force and your memories and she’s fracking with you—

“We saw someone who looked just like her in the clinics up a few levels,” Seiran added, apparently deciding to give away the store to this Jedi they’d just met, who had no reason to be on their side, except that the Jedi didn’t kill people—they just mind wiped them, or stole their memories, or lied.

“Sheris Loran.” Vrook nodded. “Revan had her fashioned in her own image, when she was Sith.”

“That wasn’t quite how she put it,” Polla said. Creepy. “She said they were both from Hoth.”

“They are.”

“Are you?” She’d surprised him with the question, it was obvious from the way he took a step backwards.

“Originally. I was taken into the Temple at a very young age.”

“Oh.” Polla didn’t really know what to say about that. “So was my cousin, Beya. Well actually, not that young. But I guess you… maybe you knew her.”

“From the time she came to us.” The man’s smile grew sad. “One of our oldest Padawans and most noble of Knights. She was a close friend to my niece.”

“Do you know who killed her?”

Vrook shook his head. “I do not. But you cannot seek vengeance. It’s far too dangerous.”

Polla snorted. “Funny, I thought you Jedi types were supposed to not want to seek vengeance ‘cause of some moral or Jedi Code thing.”

“Jedi still live in this galaxy,” Vrook Lamar said. “Even when we try to stay detached. I know what loss is like.”

“He does,” the girlfriend murmured. “My Lammikins has very deep thoughts. You know our son’s in a coma? We think.” She elbowed him. “I keep tellin him he needs to go check.”

“It’s not that simple,” Vrook Lamar said. “Although now, I… may have to do just that.”

“Your son’s in a coma, you need to check.” Seiran said.

“I know,” the old man snapped. “But it’s not just…” his voice trailed off. “It’s not just his fate. If I expose myself, whatever is killing the other Jedi will know he is vulnerable. And I am vulnerable. Until I know who or what that is—”
“Do you think it’s who killed Beya?” All the power in the universe and the man was hiding down here. It was kind of weird.

“No.” He hesitated. “I do not.”

“So you do know who killed Beya. Or… you think you do.” Well, she’d just have to get a list of the people that this Jedi knew. Killer had to be one of them. Polla’s money was on either her other half, or that creepy Senator. Before she’d met the Mandalorians, she would have laid even odds on them too… but Aemelie wasn’t exactly the subtle type. If she wanted someone dead, she wouldn’t sabotage a ship… she’d just stalk them through the Coruscanti Underground with her Mandalorian hunting band.

“I have to remain detached.” He didn’t sound happy about it. “There’s too much at stake.”

Deeka laughed. “You believe him?” She shook her head, smiling. Some of her teeth were gold. “Even Jedi get attached sometimes. Like him and me. Years ago, when we both young and sweet. You should have seen my Lammikins then.”

Polla smiled at her. “Bet he was a real heartbreaker. You a Jedi too?”

The woman snorted. “Don’t tease an old tart, this is my place.” She sounded proud of it.

“It’s… nice,” Polla lied.

“Looks like shit now, half our treats came down with the Shake, and CoruSec closed us down… but it was something.” The woman paused. “All those Sith boys didn’t help either, but Lammy chased them out.”

“I don’t think they’ll be back,” the Jedi said, looking a little less proud than his girlfriend or wife or whore or whatever she was.

“But they might?”

“They’re hunting Jedi.” The old man’s voice roughened. “I convinced them there were no Jedi here.”

“Were you lying, or being Sith?” Polla tightened her grip around Abasen. “Not that I care either way, my Da always thought the Sith had the right idea about things.” Some things. The not blowing-up people’s planets or killing innocent smuggler things.

“Pollic!” Seiran coughed. “Excuse my wife, it’s been a long day.”

“Why are you here?” Vrook asked. Pretty rudely for a Jedi. “Did you come here to see Revan? Did… someone make you an offer to discredit her?”

“No—and why the frack would I tell you if they had?” Polla glared at him. “If you must know, we came here to get my uncle out of prison. Boon Organa. He was unjustly imprisoned for a crime he didn’t commit successfully.”

“Ah.” The man smiled faintly. “One of the last things I did hear from groundside was that Revan had successfully commuted his sentence to Alderaan. He’s not there.”

“Then where is he?”

“Alderaan.”
Seiran muttered some things not fit for mixed age groups under his breath. Polla glanced back at him. Frack.

XXX

“She’s going to be fine.”

The children, especially, were frightened and confused. Even Azen himself had been pressed into duty as a surrogate caregiver: handing out rations, adjusting bunk assignments, and dealing with a few eliminatory accidents, before they all quieted down with Knight Bastien standing guard.

It had taken them some hours (three and one half) to adjust to their new lodgings, which appeared to have recently been offices before their conversion to temporary Jedi housing. Finally having a moment to himself, naturally his first obligation was to check on his remaining patients. Padawan Marcinlline’s fever was down, and Knight Ardin had needed more fluids. Mekel Jin’s respiration rate had increased, which meant Dustil Onasi’s had too, although his body had been taken by D’Reev’s guards immediately after their landing.

In terms of the opportunity to evaluate the real existence of Force ghosts, that was regrettable.

In terms of reducing the number of concerns Azen had at the moment, it was a relief.

And Padawan Lydie Korr—

“She’s going to be fine.” Thalia May sat on an office ball next to the Zabrak’s medical pod.

“I still don’t understand what happened to her.”

“We met a Sith in the Archives. Knight Davad Arkan was a secret Sith. He tried to drain her body of all of its Force energy.”

The Zabrak felt smaller somehow: even to someone like Azen, with limited Force ability himself: the clean, bright presence that he’d come to associate with Lydie Korr was diminished. Davad Arkan was—well, whatever the man was, he was not here at present, and therefore, not Azen’s concern. “Will the Force come back for her?”

“I don’t know.” Thalia frowned. “I haven’t dreamed anything about it.”

“Precognition has never been empirically proven. Master Ragalan’s studies on the subject were inconclusive.”

“Master Ragalan was wrong about a lot of things. When you see your father again, he’ll ask you to leave the Order.” Thalia rubbed her eyes. “You should do it, and take Lydie with you.”

Azen drew himself up to his full height and glared. “You should get some more rest, Padawan. You don’t look well.”

“Yes.” Thalia May nodded. Her hand reached out and touched Lydie’s cheek.

“Do you have everything you need?” Master Klee appeared, sliding open the curtain. The Eosian was immediately recognizable in the Force, of course; but his physical presence was covered by a biohazard suit, face barely visible through its transparisteel mask. Behind him, the Coruscanti skyline was etched through the windows, the sun rising with the dawn.

“Yes,” Azen told him. 100 Thantos Three. His family had always supported Qel’Riada’s motions over D’Reev’s. He wondered what his father would say, seeing his son in a D’Reev stronghold. “It was kind of the Senator to take us in.”

“Malachi wasn’t willing to stand by and watch Jedi be slaughtered,” Klee said. “Not when he could provide assistance.”

Several observations sprang to mind: about Klee’s own lack of assistance for the last few months; about how the Order was not, (despite current circumstances) in the pocket of any Senatorial House; about how placing their fate under Revan Starfire’s name was against everything that so many masters had died for—and yet, at the moment, all Azen could do was bite his tongue metaphorically and smile politely. To do more would only waste time.

“We need to send word to those at the clinic in the Underground,” Azen told him. “No one should return to the Temple. Apparently, Davad Arkan was a secret Sith and has been hunting other Jedi and killing them there.”

Master Klee’s voice registered surprise. “You would have us abandon the Temple that has sheltered Jedi for millennia?”

_You abandoned us there yourself to go cavort with the highest Senatorial House you could find._ “I expected your accord,” Azen said mildly. “After all, you were one of the first to leave.”

“I was assisting Revan with her son.”

“Of course.” Azen nodded at the obvious. “And how are Revan and her son? I expected them to greet us.”

Klee’s eyes shifted, in a way that said, just as clearly as the Force, that he had no idea. “Is that Master Korr?” He pivoted on his feet, looking across the room to where the only other member of the Jedi Council in the room stood, attending to one of the intubated patients. “Pardon, Master Loanin; but she and I have some affairs to discuss.”

Thalia made a small sound, and Azen glanced down at her. He had almost forgotten she was there at all. “Tell Master Korr that Padawan Korr is much better,” she said to Klee.

‘Of course.” He was already walking away.

Azen frowned. This place was very disordered. “Master Klee didn’t seem very concerned about Knight Arkan.” _And his voice registered no surprise. As if he already knew?_

“No,” Thalia said. She was frowning too. “He did not.”

“I should tell Master Zez Kai,” Azen told her. “Arkan was his Padawan.”

“You will.” She gave him a small smile. “But wait. Lydie’s going to wake up soon. She should see your face.”

“I don’t see how my face would assist with her recovery.”

“I know.” Thalia nodded. “But it’s a nice face.”

Even if her precognitive assessments were some kind of charlatan’s trick, Thalia May could still reduce Azen Loanin to a stupefied near-silence. “You are a confounding person, Thalia May.”

She smiled slightly. “I think you will find Padawan Korr confounding too.”
“I find most sentients of the opposite gender confounding,” he admitted. “Especially those that I —”

“Just tell her that,” Thalia interrupted. “Tell her that she confounds you, Master Loanin. And see what she says next.”

XXX

“Chrakkan Village is this way.” Their guide, a brown-skinned Iridonian kid, maybe a little younger than Dustil, gestured towards the winding path that led farther away from the primitive spaceport and up into the forested hills.

“How far?” Carth asked. They’d left Zaalbar with the ship, but the original promise of only a few kilometers had already bloomed into at least six. And he couldn’t shake this feeling… that something was off about this whole place. Who built their spaceport in the middle of a jungle under permanent cloud cover?

Sentients with things to hide, that was who.

“I hope the road’s paved,” Mission grumbled, rolling along at Carth’s side. “I just replaced my suspensors after that sewer trip with Mekel Jin.”

“It is paved,” the Zabrak said, taking her seriously. “With stones.”

“Better than mud, I guess.” Even through the T3’s voder her optimism came through. Carth knew it didn’t make sense, but the more time he spent with this copy of Mission, the more she seemed like the real kid. He thought of the garbled story she’d told him, about Revan’s ancient computer on Kashyyyk and how it had said it was going to get a real body. That computer gave him the creeps; but Mission—this version—didn’t. The more time they spent together, the more she seemed like… Mission.

The first kid you let yourself love after Dustil. Hell, the first sent you trusted after Saul’s betrayal. You trusted Mission before Polla. In fact, if Mission hadn’t been so easy with Polla first, would you have ever trusted Polla enough to fall for her?

“Our enclave is hidden in the hills ahead,” the boy continued.

“Why is it hidden?” The Zabrak had an oddly formal way of speaking. “To discourage visitors.”

“The same reason you don’t have any working speeders and we have to roll on our treads the entire way.” Mission made a snorting noise. “Right.”

Hiking up the trail was easier than Carth expected, even with the soft life he’d been leading on Coruscant. Gravity was less here, and the air seemed rich. It was actually a pretty nice little planet, although stars if he could understand why a place this temperate in the mid-Rim wasn’t more populated. The main city was up near the north pole, but even it only had a population of a few hundred thousand.

“Are you from here, Takan?” he asked the kid, their escort.

“No.” The kid shook his head. “I was on a refugee ship, during the war. We crashed here.”

Which war? Carth wanted to ask, but he didn’t know how. The one my wife won, or the one she “My son was a refugee too,” he said slowly. “We’re from Telos.”

Takan looked blank. “I think I’ve heard of it,” he said politely, after a long pause.

“It got bombed a lot,” Mission chimed in.

The kid smiled faintly. “So did Iridonia.”

The stones under their feet were even, beveled, and worn with age. The forest was full of straight, oddly symmetrical trees with white bark covering their trunks. Birdsong echoed through the trees: discordant compared to the ones on Telos; but it still reminded Carth of one of the last good memories he had of his wife and son. That last furlough, when they’d rented the cabin out by the lake; just the three of them together.

“Wait.” Takan froze suddenly, putting his hand on Carth’s arm. “Don’t move.”

The sounds in the trees faded out, like a comm signal had been cut, replaced by a low, rumbling growl.

“Rancor,” the kid muttered. “They don’t usually cross the tree lines.”

“Not our first one, Spikey.” Mission’s voice sounded a lot more self-assured than Carth felt.

“I’ve heard they have them on other planets,” Takan’s voice was barely above a whisper now. “But it’s different here. This is where they’re from.”

“So?” Mission’s voice was breezy. One of her appendages extended with the blaster Carth had given her—given the original her—back on Tatooine. The Systech. “You can stand back if you want, kiddo. We got this.”

“No.” The boy shook his head again, slightly wild-eyed. “I was charged with protecting you.”

The roaring noise came closer now, accompanied by the stamp of heavy feet.

“We got this,” Mission repeated.

Frack if I know how. Carth nodded slowly. “They have bad eyes, right? Maybe it won’t see us.”

“It senses us,” Takan said. “It’s coming.”

“Maybe not.” He had to be optimistic. Wouldn’t that be a pathetic end to this: Sorry, Dustil, I never came back to you because I got myself and some kid eaten by a rancor. At least Mission would be safe. Rancor weren’t like cannok. They didn’t bother with metal.

“How do you know it senses us?” Mission asked.

“Do you have any weapons at all?” Carth’s own blasters wouldn’t even properly pierce the damn armored hide. When we took the one out on Taris, we had grenades.

“I have mines,” Mission chirped.

“No. No mines.” The kid stood there, skinny shoulders hunched, wrapped in his fur cloak. “Just stay back. I’m calling for help.”

There was a pause. “How are you calling for help?” Mission demanded. “Looks to me like you’re just standing there like a slack-jawed loser.”
The boy’s head turned. “Your droid is… unusually rude.”

“You don’t know the half of it, Spikey!”

“Stay back,” the kid repeated. He was holding something in his hand now, something Carth hadn’t seen him pull out of anywhere. A long, silver cylinder, beveled at both sides. Snap-hiss and the double blades ignited, both red as a krayt dragon’s eye. He stepped forward, crouching down slightly in a fighting stance that Carth didn’t recognize. Not that he was some expert. It was definitely a fighting stance through. Definitely a fighting stance for someone who knew what they were doing in a Force-using kind of Sith way.

“No way!” A clicking noise and Mission’s appendage extended, holding a blaster. “Are you Sith?”

“Yes,” the kid said. His head tilted. He held up his other hand. “Be quiet.”

Crashing noises in the underbrush and then the rancor appeared. Bigger than the one on Taris. Almost the size of one of those terentateks from Korriban. Its clawed hands reached almost to the ground. The air around it smelled like rotting meat and something strangely sweet. Its small eyes narrowed and focused on them with predatory intelligence.

“The others are coming,” the kid continued. “She tracks movement. Stay very still.”

“Others?” Great. I’m sorry, Polla—I couldn’t come back to you because the Senator sold me to a shipton of Sith. Frack if I know why, or what I could possibly have that they’d want—

“What others?” Mission demanded. “More Sith like you?”

“Yes,” the kid nodded, taking a step towards the rancor, twisting his blade. He glanced back at them. “The other children.”

XXX

“Give me Kae,” the Onderonite repeated. The mask of the Mandalore dangled from his fingers, as if it were nothing. Canderous resisted the urge to shoot him, because they needed to know what in all the nine hells was going on.

“Are you fracking insane?” Revan propped the old woman closer to the wall and rose to her feet, extending her hand out with her lightsaber in it so quickly that Canderous hadn’t seen the moment when she’d drawn the hilt. “What’s wrong with you?” She took a step between all of them and the Jedi who actually a crazy Sith.

After so many times seeing Force users go insane, Canderous couldn’t even say he was surprised. “Your friend from Onderon is nuts,” he pointed out. “When you kill him, try not to damage the mask.” Beskar was tough, but he wasn’t sure if the visor, worn thin over the centuries, could handle the direct strike from a lightsaber—not with that mystical Force-spawned strength thing they all did behind it.

“He’s not crazy.” Revan disregarded all of the evidence in front of them, just like she had on Kashyyyk, when that damned computer had greeted her like they were old friends, like she had on Tatooine when he told her not to get involved in the duel, like she had on the Star Forge when he’d told her to just blow up the chamber Malak was hiding in, like she had at that farce of a party when he’d told her not to follow Onasi. “This is… something is very wrong here.”

“She’s in your head is what’s wrong,” the Onderonite snapped. “Just like she’s in mine.”
“Who?” She sounded confused.

“You know who.”

“You mean Kae?” She scoffed. “I don’t even remember her.”

“Exactly.” The man snorted.

Canderous didn’t like the smile on the man’s face; but between the two of them, he had to say that taking out the injured one first seemed smart. He moved his fingers slightly, signaling to Millifar. _Shoot the old woman—on my signal._ He angled his own repeater towards the man, who frowned at him, as if he’d noticed the gesture.

“I was there when Revan won this mask,” Arkan said, holding it up and looking directly at Canderous.

“Back when you were loyal to Revan? I was there too.” You don’t taunt a mad zakkeg; but Canderous was getting tired of all the barbarians assuming they understood Mando’aade honor. “You might think that’s just a mask you stole from a dead man, but it’s not.”

“I know exactly what it is,” Davad murmured. “My father scoured the demon moon for weeks, looking for Mandalore’s spoor. It was _his_ kill, but some hu’tuun from your own side stole it.”

“A wandering patrol from Wies found it and brought it to Clan Lin,” Canderous told him. “With no true victor, it was up to Lin’s son to bring back glory to the clans.”

“Your clans lost.” The man’s eyes were yellow in his dark face. Yellow like a blasted Sith’s.

Was the man really taunting him? Now? “We fought,” Canderous corrected. “Revan won, but we fought well. There was no honor lost.”

“Then how did Oerin get this?” The Onderonite held it up like a trophy had had the right to claim.

“I don’t know,” Canderous admitted. _I never even asked. Hells, I wasn’t even sure it was the real one until Zaalbar had to take it off the helm to retrofit the armor._

“It’s just a mask,” Revan snapped. “Does it really matter?”

“Yes.” Sometimes she seemed so much like them that Canderous forgot, and then other times, she didn’t understand anything. “It matters.”

“It’s the mask of the _Mandalore,_” his daughter added, glaring and furious. Her rife was trained on the old woman. The man might be the bigger threat, but Canderous figured there had to be a reason the old one was still alive.

“After Revan fell, the Jedi took her—and the mask—to Dantooine. And so, I gave it to him,” the old woman murmured. Her voice sounded stronger now. “I gave the mask of the Mandalore to Oerin Lin.”

“Why?” Revan demanded. “Why would you do that?”

“The old Revan would know. That, and many things besides.”

Revan’s face whitened, and her hand slashed through the air, so fast as to be a blur. A millisecond later, the mask spun out of Arkan’s hand and slammed into the wall opposite. The beskar-forged steel rang true against the stone. Canderous tried not to wince at the irreverence. The relic had seen worse. Much worse.

“You want the old Revan?” Revan’s teeth bared, and she looked every inch the warrior. “Fine. Give me the holocron of her life and you can have her.”

Arkan snorted. “Forget about that.” His hand shook as he mopped his sweating face with the sleeve of his robe. He looked like he was under some strain. Was it fear? Illness? Canderous wavered, trying to choose the better target. “It was all a trap anyway. She never wanted you to have those memories. You’re too strong. She can’t control you.”

“I could help you find your past,” the woman murmured. “I walked the same paths as you did, Revan. Long ago.”

Arkan snorted, but he looked unsteady. “She’s lying.”

“What do you mean?” Revan stood frozen, still glancing between them.

“She’s strong, isn’t she?” The woman smiled, slowly getting to her feet. She still moved as if she was injured, but Canderous didn’t trust that either. “Can you feel her strength, Davad? Like a star. You’ve hungered for it. You’ve… always hungered for it. Even before she broke you, even before Malachor.”

“No.” His earlier bravado was gone. “Not her.”

“Davad?” Revan stood between them, as if she didn’t know which one of them to believe. As if it wasn’t obvious that they were both as crazy as a mynock nest on a power converter.

“These aren’t Jedi,” Canderous told her. “You can kill them.” Clan Ordo had captured a few Jedi, during the war—very few, as the Jedi tended to sacrifice themselves or use their Force magic to escape. But once they got that mad light in their eyes, there was no point in using reason with them. Canderous had learned that lesson in the first Great Jedi War, when he was barely blooded in sky.

“I don’t want to be your enemy, Revan.” Arkan smiled, but Canderous really didn’t like the sheen of sweat on his face, or the tremor in that arm.

“What about Oerin?” Millifar interrupted, her voice angry and crackling through her helmet as if she’d turned up her voder to max. Canderous was proud of her stance: sideways between her two enemies, gun subtly cocked framing one target, but still within range of the other. “She said she gave the mask to Oerin. How did she know him at all?”

“Oerin’s her son,” the Onderonite said. He pointed a finger at the old woman, Kae. “She’s the one who brought him back.”

Revan froze. “What?” She turned towards the old woman. “Who the frack are you?”

“Someone who saw the value of a Force-resistant army,” the old woman murmured. She lifted her head, a smile curving around her mouth. She was definitely not as weak as she’d first appeared. “Someone who knew the Order’s most spectacular failures. Those who do not study history so often repeat it.”

XXX

There is no shame to losing to a superior foe; but there is shame in apathy. There is shame in entropy. There is shame in letting a cycle of rebuilding pass, in ignoring the council of your wives.
The Fett Lin had ignored wifely advice, and word of his willful neglect had reached the ears of the women from other clans. There were rumors of rebellion. Ruling clans had been overthrown before: worlds renamed and families removed, for much less offense. A generation had grown without the chance to be blooded in stars.

Clan Lin had served them well in peace; but there was serious question whispered in the tents about their ability to plan for war.

That is, until the Seventh Wife of Lin came to each Woman’s Tent with her promises of a new golden age, and her maps of Republic shipping lanes, Fleet patrols, and planetary resources. Canderous had only seen the woman for a moment: face masked, wearing the robes of the dar’jeddai infi, before the elder headwomen of Ordo had rushed her into council. Only seen her a few times after, when she came with her women’s business to his wives’ tent.

He had only heard of her plans after her departure, when Gwen showed him the maps she had left for them: routes stamped along the hyperspace lane, with precise notations of Republic strength.

XXX

“You said before that Oerin’s mother looked like a Jedi.” Revan’s head turned between them. “You said she wore a mask? This is… Arren Kae is her?”

XXX

“We will hit Eos with Lin,” Gwenarius smiled. “But Althir will be the true victory for Ordo.”

“Our sons will be worthy of the task.” Canderous bowed his head.

Beginning a war was a very careful dance: a defenseless target could only be acceptable if its resources merited the attack; or if attacking it would goad the opponent into a more challenging battle. It had taken time before they struck. Time, and the acquisition of the cloaking technology.

But it had all begun with that woman, hiding behind her gray Jedi mask.

XXX

“We all wore masks, we Jedi who served the Fleet. We had no rank, no ties to factions of the Republic. Or Senators.” The old woman’s voice was soft, and it raised his hackles.

Canderous nodded towards his daughter, twitching his thumb. Any madwoman who would betray her own, and then her clan, was too dangerous to live. Shoot that one first.

“Masked Jedi had fallen out of favor, before you and Malak brought it back.” The woman smiled, still talking her lies. “It was my suggestion—one of my many gifts to you, Revan. You had many masters during your time in the Jedi, but I was the last. You called me Vima. Master Vima Sunrider.”

“Is that who you are?” Revan asked the question, but she was looking at the other one now, the man.

“I have had many names.” Not an answer. Sunrider was certainly famous enough. Canderous narrowed his eyes. Did she look like Oerin? Maybe a little around the eyes. It could be a pack of maffastinking lies and it still wouldn’t matter. She was dangerous, and he was sick of playing “Run,” the Onderon Beast-rider said, as if they were frightened. He looked twitchy, that one, but didn’t seem to be armed. The woman had a lightsaber on her belt. “Get out of here, Rev. Now.”

“No,” Canderous muttered and fired his rifle, pleased that his daughter’s echoed a heartbeat after.

But then the world shimmered, and everything seemed to freeze.

“Too late,” said a new voice, metallic, and hoarse, from the door.

XXX

Malak opened his eyes to a view. Looking down at the city from on high, like a god, like a Senator. Like Coruscant’s master, like long ago. A view from childhood, from innocence. A view that told him everything—even before he looked down and saw the white, circular bed,

Sitting up made his—the boy’s—head spin.

“You’re awake.” A woman’s voice, stating the obvious.

Malak turned his head. “How—how long have I been unconscious?”

An old Zabrak was standing before him, her face expressionless and Jedi serene. “Nearly a standard month.”

_A month._ His first thought was relief. _Not years. Not more years lost without my son—_

Frack your son.

_What?_

“Master Marla Korr,” he said out loud. He had no memories of the Zabrak—not from Malak’s life—but she had been around the Temple of late, attending to things. And of course, Mekk thought her niece was—

_Mekk. Mekel. Where are you? Where am I?_

_Telos?_

Strange overlay of their thoughts. Foreign—and not. Like the endless time he’d spent trapped with them on the ship: a cesspool of their hormonal angst and helpless rage. But there was real breath in his lungs now again. The real sensation of his body under the sheets—it was almost overwhelming.

“Your father would like to speak with you,” the Zabrak told him.

The word, ‘father’ triggered a rush of memories as well: the pilot’s face swam to mind before Malak could think. And then, a heartbeat later. *Frack fathers. You don’t need one, Telos. The boy’s voice, like an echo._

“And?” He kept his voice even.

“He asked me to assess your condition first.”

“If I was going to kill him, you couldn’t stop me.”
Her horn ridge raised. “Perhaps. Perhaps not. But I did not mention murder.” She folded her arms. “Tell me. Is this… permanent?”

I have no idea. “Yes,” he said evenly.

Frack you, Malak. We’re going to destroy you. Their rage sang in his veins like a balm. There was a power in it. Now that he had seen them both, fought them, it was very clear. There was a power in them. Not just Dustil, but Malak’s protégé too. And that power was Malak’s now.

Or your power is ours. Asshat.

“Our father wants you to be aware that without his acknowledgement, you have no legal status. Force possession is a myth.”

“There is no death, Master Korr.” Malak made himself smile. “At least, not for me. You may find death comes all too quickly, if you oppose my interests.”

He expected a typical Jedi rebuke, but the Zabrak only nodded. “I’m not here to deal in threats.” Her head bent over the comm at her wrist, and she traced a few symbols over its sensor, half-hidden from his view. “I’ve made my recommendations to Malachi.”

If we work together, we can force him out, I think. How many times had they said that? Jin or Onasi, or both? All of them, trapped in an endless loop.

Fracking which one is his wife?

I can’t even feel my toes! He took them!

Will you listen to yourself? He can hear us.

I don’t fricking care what he can hear.

Silence. Malak told him. Maybe you should concern yourselves with the body you still have left. If we are all here, who is there?

What? Mekel’s voice. His was the quieter presence, although the least predictable. The Jin boy was calculating: in the end, he chose the paths that led to his survival, not advancement. Such calculation was wasted in the Sith. He would have died quickly, Malak thought, if it had not been for Malak’s own patronage.

It’s a trick, he’s trying to distract us. Try and talk, make him stab himself or something. The Onasi boy was all passion and bluster. He would have made an excellent Sith, before someone more rational killed him.

“What recommendations did you make?” Malak asked Master Korr.

“So many sentients dream of immortality,” the Zabrak Jedi murmured. “But so few make a study of the cost.”

“I’ve paid enough.”

“What you?” She smiled slightly.
“I just want to keep my son safe.”

Frack your son.

Telos!

It’s him or us. You still don’t fracking get that?

I know. But he’s—

The rest of it was wordless, but all three of them felt it. The rush of emotion from the fatherless one, the one who had worshipped Malak, who still held some measure of respect—

You should listen to Mekel Jin, Malak told the Onasi boy. And tend to your other body.

“Malak?” The Zabrak raised an eyebrow, clearing her throat. “Your son is safe. Today.” Her thin lips smiled. “Would you like to see him?”

“Yes,” he said warily.

“Then you need to agree to my terms.” She smiled again. “First, you will not attack or make any assaults—physical or otherwise—on the Senator. He wants to make sure you are aware of the Genoharadan contract on the boy.”

“I am,” he gritted his teeth.

Frack the geno-whatssit and frack you.

Telos.

“Second, you will work with Senator D’Reev and myself to provide all the information you can on the state of the current Sith Empire, and your networks within it.”

“You Jedi had your own spies there. I assume you still do.”

“Yes,” she raised her brow ridge. She shifted her language to Ancient Sith without blinking an eye. “I spent some time on Thule myself, as a tutor to one of the noble families.”

Malak laughed. “Should that make me trust you?”

Why the frack does Lydie’s aunt know Ancient Sith?

Why the frack do you care, Mekk? I don’t think your Zabrak goes for guys in a coma.

Can you feel anything? Can you find my fracking body? I don’t know where it is—

Welcome to my planet.

Her face was perfectly closed. “I don’t need your trust, merely your information. As does the Senator.”

“It’s been more than a year. I’m sure most of my information is obsolete.” Easy to betray what is no longer mine. “But of course. Everything I know…” he spread out his hands, like a Coruscanti senator would. “Everything I know is yours.”

“Good.” Korr smiled at him, switching back to Basic, then traced another pattern over her comm.
“I suppose further interviews can wait until tomorrow. The Senator and the child are waiting.”

“I agree to your terms,” he repeated. He felt strangely nervous.

What if we’re the ones dead now? What if we’re dead and he’s—what if this is all that we are?

It’s not. Malak could feel the other—faintly. The heaviness of unconscious limbs, slack mouth, the slowed heartbeat. Even as he thought, he felt his own body start to falter, his own heart start to match the pace—

Go. He told them. Follow the link. Wake up. Take Mekel’s body and leave me.

Frack you! The Jin boy had already started to pull apart, but Onasi was resisting, still trying to lay claim to a body he could no longer control.

Spots danced in front of Malak’s physical eyes, and he willed his face not to change expression.

“Good,” Marla Korr murmured, gesturing to the single chair. There were clothes draped across it. Not D’Reev colors. Plain, beige Padawan robes instead. I have no rank here; a fact Father will rub my nose in over and over. “Dress yourself.”

There. I can feel it. Can you? My body.

Malak’s pulse quickened again. He left out a breath.

Mekk? Rush of panic from the Telosian.

“Fine.” Malak stood and walked over to them, aware of the body’s nakedness and Marla Korr’s lack of any reaction at all. It was a simple thing, to dress, although after so much time spent in an abstract world, he relished the simple sensation of fabric under his fingers, against his skin. His muscles felt weak, and there were no weapons at all.

And then Malak looked down at his robes, and slowly belted the sash. No D’Reev colors, no weapons. My father wants me leashed and anonymous.

Frack your father. Frack you. The Telosian was stubborn. Persistent. Feeding off his energy like a mynock.

Go away, Dustil Onasi. This is mine. Not yours.

“Father!” The door slid open, and Malachor burst through, hurtling himself into Malak’s arms. “Since everyone knows, I don’t have to call you Dustil!”

“Not in our own home,” the man behind him murmured, standing in the doorway. Malachi D’Reev nodded to Master Korr. “You may go.”

She frowned, eyeing Malak. “Are you sure?”

“I know my son,” the old man said. “He won’t hurt me in front of his.”

But I would. Nails digging into Malak’s palm made him realize his hands were clenched in fists, even wrapped around his own son’s body. His body shook with rage.

No. You wouldn’t. He’s just a kid. Don’t scare him.

Malak shook his head sharply. Go to the other body. Concern yourselves with what you have left.
Disconcerting, that he could actually… feel that body as well. Faintly. Like a whisper in the Force, as it blinked its eyes, and moved its limbs. What if I could occupy both at once?

Frack you! Suddenly, they both retreated, like a tide receding. Faintly, far away, he felt Mekel Jin’s body twitch and stir, the eyes open, looking up and out over a Coruscanti view—the same view, but filtered through industrial glass, a privacy shade.

“Why are you mad?” Malachor looked up at him, gray eyes wide and trusting.

“I’m… I’m not, Korrie.” He kept his voice gentle, blinking for a center. Trying to find calmness.

“You feel mad.”

“I’m not angry.” With effort, he released his son, and stood, facing down the old man. “Not with you.”

Master Korr was still lingering in the door. The old man gave her a nod and she backed away. Malak’s father closed the door behind her, and then walked slowly over to the room’s only chair. There had once been two, Malak remembered. One for him and one for his wife.

“Where is she?” he asked. “Where’s Revan?”

“Attending to her Mandalorian affairs.” The man shrugged. “Your wife at least, sees the value in a strong Mandalorian alliance.”

“She said she was coming back today,” Malachor added. “But she had important stuff.”

No doubt some game of yours, Malachi. Revan without her memories is no match for you—

“Sheris?” The name slipped out before he thought better.

“Who?” His father’s ignorance, real or feigned, lasted less than a heartbeat. “Perhaps if you spent less time worrying about your concubine, your wife would be more attentive.”

“Where is Sheris?” Malak repeated. She’s lasted longer than I thought possible, if you don’t know what she is.

“The Temple has been closed and sealed. The last of the Jedi were evacuated to our office suites below these apartments yesterday. There are a few still remaining in the Underground clinic, but Master Klee has taken my advice, and ordered that station to be closed today. I expect the others will be joining us here. Shall I have Sheris sent to your rooms?” A gray eyebrow raised. “Malachor, perhaps you should wait for me in the gardens.”

“Sheris was mean to me.” His son’s lower lip stuck out, the expression eerily like Red’s when they were children. “You don’t really like her more than Mother, do you?”

“Of course not.” She’s dangerous. Delusional. She tried to kill me before that Zabrak—

That was where he’d seen Master Marla Korr recently. The last thing he saw was her, with the younger version of her as well—frozen in the Force. Marla Korr had been the one to send in that droid with… some kind of gas to disable them.

Effective. How did she know it would be?

“My son.” His father might have been speaking for some time, or had just left Malak staring into space, lost in his own thoughts. He had no way to tell. A smile pulled at the old man’s mouth, as if he were getting sentimental in his old age. “I should have known when you saved Malachor from those assassins. I should have known by the way you tied your collar. But I never considered the possibility of your return.” He stood up from the chair and took a step forward.

Malachor smiled. “Now it’s all going to be okay? You’re all going to get along?”

“Father,” Malak said. He meant the word to come out as a warning, but the boy’s voice cracked. “Father, I....”

XXX

The last time. He had known it was the last time. It could be nothing else.

“Give me the boy.” Speaking was agony, and Malak’s words came out soft, with too many syllables. “Coruscant will burn. We can keep him safe.”

“You and your wife? Or you and your whore?” His father smiled, but Malak saw the lines of strain there too: the yellow-black skin under the man’s eyes, the lines around his face that had deepened, the tremble in his hands that hadn’t been there before. ‘You’re delusional.’

“We have the ships to take Coruscant. All of the Core worlds.” Being here was a betrayal worse than Telos in its scope, admitting what Revan had wanted kept secret, kept with the element of surprise. “Let me get him out first.”

“She doesn’t know you came. Revan would never play her hand so cheaply.” Malachi paused. “I could go to her. Tell her of your betrayal.”

“You think you’re using her, but she’s using you.”

The old man smiled. “Fortunes change. Your mother and I were divided like this once. Long ago.”

“Did you kill her?” It was a question he’d never wanted to ask.

“It was more than twenty years ago,” Malachi sighed. “Does it make a difference now?”

It did not. “Where is Malachor?” His hand twisted, and the old man took a step backwards, obviously rattled, even with the ysalamiri field.

“Corellia.” Malachi seemed to recover himself, and stepped forward again. When I received word of your arrival I sent him to a place beyond your reach.”

“Nothing is beyond our reach.” Malak tried to smile, feeling the scabs open and tear.

“Her reach. Not yours.”

Her reach. Her reach assigned Malak to Manaan. Her reach kept him at arm’s length, even as she assured him they were winning the war. Her reach confined her with those Lords of Thule, and her new Dark Council. Now she wanted him to go to Manaan to oversee production of a plague to stop Tenebrae, a formula she’d gotten from that damned computer—

“Our reach.” Malak’s head inclined. Corellia. He would send agents there. It was probably a lie, but he had to be sure. “Farewell, Father. I don’t expect we’ll meet again.”

The old man snorted. “Perhaps in hell.”

XXX
“My son,” Malachi said. “It is good to see you again, whatever you might think.” Heavy arms clapped over Malak’s shoulder’s, and the old man drew him into a formal embrace, dry lips a whisper on each of his cheeks.

The old man looked younger than he had in Malak’s last memory. Maybe he’d finally broken down and started using the rejuv treatments that most Coruscanti nobles favored. Malak kissed both of his cheeks back, and found himself stepping back to give the formal bow before his mind made sense of it. “Father.”

“How did you do it?” The old man looked happy, which Malak mistrusted. Of course, Malachi would know that, so if he meant to be unsettling, he would look pleased, just to leave Malak on hydrospanners. “Was there some artifact? Some kind of ceremony?”

“No.” Even as he mistrusted the old man’s emotion, Malak felt a part of him respond to it; like a child seeking approval, an emotion bleeding over, perhaps, from Jin or Onasi’s mind. “It was my own power in the Force.”

“Your own power.” His father raised an eyebrow. “Don’t expect me to petition for any legal standing. I need your wife, not you.”

“Is that why you brought me to these rooms?” Before Revan, they’d been a boy’s rooms, decorated with Malak’s Eglantine banners, his shell collection, all the old-fashioned books his mother had printed. After Malachor, the old man had fashioned this: made an adult refuge—an opulent nest meant to sway a man and his wife away from the Order’s narrow path.

And it worked.

“Sentiment makes fools of us all.” The old man was taller than him now, and his seamed hand patted Malak’s shoulder. “Even me, my boy.”

“I’m glad,” Malachor said softly. The child was standing still, head cocked at an angle.

Malak tried to laugh. “Maybe you should go see to your work, Mal. I know in my day, we Egs had at least two hours of language practice a night.”

“We use voders,” his son said. “But I have some maths to do.”

Malak smiled. “Get that done and I’ll join you for lunch.”

“Like old times, huh?” The boy smiled shyly. “Cept you’re not a ghost.”

“Just like that.” For a moment, it was all normal. Even his father’s smile seemed almost normal—like a fragile peace accord had been reached. Like the promise of a better world.

“Malachor?” The Force gave no warning at all. Only her voice did. Her voice.

Malak turned his head and there she was, standing behind their son, her hair loosely braided and half-falling over her shoulders.

“You must be Malachor,” she murmured, even as their son’s head turned, eyes opening wide to stare at her. “I was looking for you.”

XXX

“You’re awake.” Purple eyes staring into his. The pressure of her hand, squeezing his. “How do you… how do you feel, Mekel?”

I’m not—

But he was and even as he opened his mouth, Mekk’s voice swam to the surface. “Master Yuthura, I—” he felt the muscles tense as the other boy pulled their arm away from her. “Where am I?”

Like you don’t know? We’re in D’Reev’s palace, asshat. Weren’t you paying attention?

No, this is… different. It was different. The air here was medicinal. The room looked like a medical pod, panels open wide to a window. But outside—the view was nearly the same as it had been in Malak’s room. Coruscant, spinning beneath.

A different room. So the frack what? Where the frack am I, Mekk? You have to find my body!

“Senator D’Reev has been kind enough to offer the Jedi sanctuary,” Yuthura said. “The Temple was… closed. There were too many deaths.”

“From the plague?”

“Too many deaths,” she repeated, avoiding his eyes. “Some sentients are calling it a Jedi purge.”

“Is Lydie okay?” That was all Mekel. Dustil didn’t give a frack.

“She’s recovering. Thalia May is with her. Udoo Ophile is dead.”

“But he had the vaccine.”

“Some Jedi died anyway.” She seemed to hesitate, glancing behind them, and then lowering her voice. “Master Jopheena is one with the Force too.”

“Just say fracking dead,” Mekel sounded actually upset. From the images shifting in his mind, he’d liked the old bag. “Iridel too, huh?”

“You can sense their loss?” She nodded. “There were more casualties than there should have been.”

“Sounds like we—I—missed a lot.” It sounded like Mekel was trying not to cry, which was pathetic, even for him. “Hey, you wouldn’t happen to know where Dustil is, would you, Master?”

“I am a Padawan, Mekel, even as you are.” Yuthura Ban’s lips thinned in a smile. “Even as you both are.”

“Right. We’re both Padawans.” Mekk grinned at her, as if that was perfectly normal. All of this normal. He swung his legs over the bed and stretched. Dustil could feel their spine pull, easing out the stiffness in his—their—limbs. “How long was I out for?”

“Several weeks.” Yuthura stepped in front of him, blocking the view. “Don’t stand up quite yet, you’ll make yourself dizzy.”

But they were already doing it. Spots danced in front of their eyes, as Dustil willed her to be wrong. Is she stalling us? What the frack is this, Mekk?

I don’t know, Telos. Shut the frack up while I figure it out.

“Mekel. Can you… both hear me?” She tilted her head frowning. “Can Malak?”
“What?” His—their voice cracked on the word. “Both? Who are you talking about?”

“I know,” she said. Her face was smooth and unlined, but one of her lekku hugged her neck too tightly. “I know about the bond you share with Dustil Onasi.” She paused. “And more unfortunately, now with Malak.”

“Bond?” Mekk was trying to make their voice sound bored, but it kept not working. Didn’t help that somewhere else Malak was flipping out about something. Dustil tried not to pay attention.

“I know,” Yuthura repeated. “The link between you has kept you both strong. Kept you both alive.”

Feeling of relief, almost like a sigh. “You know.” Dustil’s own voice, or as close as it was in Mekel’s mouth. “You know about us?”

She nodded. “A complex relationship, but not without its advantages.”

“Not really seeing an advantage right now.” Dustil again. But both of them thinking it. “Can you help us get him out?”

“I mean to try,” their former teacher said. “What is Malak doing now?”

“He’s busy flipping out about that Sheris chit.” Mekel said, as Dustil felt him—them—sifting through what they—what Malak knew. “Frack. She’s Revan too?”

“A fact known by no one.” Yuthura lowered her voice. “And best kept secret. I hope you can see why.”

“No,” Dustil snapped—startled when the words came out loud, out of Mekel’s mouth. “But I don’t give a frack.”

“How did you know about us?” Mekel interrupted. He swung their legs over the bed and glanced down—then hastily grabbed a sheet and pulled it around their hips.

Their former headmistress blinked once. “You mean about the bond between you?”

“No, about our matching space lily tattoos,” Dustil snapped. “Of course he means the bond.”

“I did it,” Yuthura said flatly. “I know about it because I did it to you.”

XXX

“What other children?” Carth was still standing there like a null error message, and if Mission had feet, she would have stamped them. “And who’s the one?”

If she had feelings, they’d be having bad versions of themselves right about now. There was nothing registering on her sensors except the big meaty hulk of bad coming towards them; and yet—Mission could almost totally swear she was feeling something else. Or a lot of somethings. Creepy, crappy planet full of bad somethings. It all wasn’t good.

“I will answer your questions,” the Zabrak said. “After we deal with this beast.”

The rancor roared, opening its maw to reveal rows and rows of circular teeth. If Mission had pants, she would have pissed in them. Instead, Mission opened her widebeam and transmitted the distress call to Big Z.

“What is it?” He had a piece of circuitry in his hand, and a hydrospanner stuck in his belt. Her sensors on the ship rang the alarm, even as she powered up her engines herself. “It was a trap?”

“Looking pretty like.” With lungs, she could have sighed. “You want to man the main cannon while I fly?”

“I have better aim,” the Wookiee agreed. “Don’t let the stabilizers hit the tree line. We don’t have replacement parts.”

“Whatever you say, Big Guy.” She banked and dove. Say what you want about organic bodies, Mission was pretty sure that none of them could do this.

XXX

The Mandalorian’s bolts missed, leaving smoking craters in the wall behind Master Kae.

“How—?” Millifar’s voice was shocked.

Canderous cursed under his breath.

Revan’s former teacher, the one she couldn’t remember, the one Davad said not to trust, the one who was supposed to be Vima Sunrider, Oerin Lin’s mother, merely smiled and lowered her hand. She was more powerful than she had seemed the moment before. More powerful than any Force user Revan had encountered except for—“Too late.” The voice was metallic and there was something broken in it, but it was still his. Still…him in the Force. But changed.

Revan whirled around to face the ruin that had been Oerin Lin.

Oerin looked worse than he had on the vids, and he wasn’t alone. At least a dozen black-clad and hooded humanoid sentients, all armed with vibroblades stood behind him. Their covered faces made them all seem identical, save for a few differences in breast or hips that marked some of them as women. Oerin himself stood very still, red lightsaber blazing. The blade was eerily silent, as if he’d matched the crystals to quell vibration. His hair was still gold and thick on top of his head, but the face below was gray and crossed with small cuts. His eyes were dull, and his bare chest looked like someone had cut it open and then patched it back up in haste, because between some of the sutures, something dark and wet oozed. There was a metal plate set in the hollow of his neck—a technology that a part of her knew, a part of her had worked with before. Voder. To help him talk, like I used with Malak—

But Malak had been alive, and this man was not. He was nothing except the Force in the Force. Nothing except the Force and—

She heard herself gasp. The Force and pain. Every sinew, every bone, every centimeter of his skin shrieked with it, as if his nerves were the only thing left alive in his body.

“You shot at my mother?” Oerin laughed, but it came out broken. “You shouldn’t have missed, Ordo.”

“Now I know how fast she can move,” Canderous muttered. “Next one won’t miss.”

“You can’t kill her so easily.” Oerin held out his hands, deactivating his lightsaber. “And based upon my own example, I’m not sure it would matter, if you could.”

“What have you been doing, Lin?” Davad asked. “Fracking vibroblades?”
“I registered myself as a cyborg in the Underground fighting pits. Benelishal’s Fighting Pit, to be exact.” Oerin turned, placing the wall to his back. His minions fanned out, encircling them all. “I’m quite good at it.” He smiled. “Of course, I cheat. You know, I can’t die?”

Millifar murmured something, too fast for Revan to catch, but Oerin’s head turned to look at her, and his smile slowly faded. “Milli,” he said. “I should have—I didn’t know you were here.”

Her helmeted face turned to him. “What have you done?”

“What has he done? Not followed his instructions.” The old woman’s voice seemed stronger now. Something in it rippled in the air. Like a sarlacc under the surface, waiting to open.

Oerin’s head turned away from Millifar, and the smile reappeared on his gray lips, twisting like a knife. “I thought you approved of free will, Mother? I did go to Malachor like you asked first. See?” Oerin waved his hand, and all the minions froze, vibroblades raised, as if waiting for a signal to attack. “I brought the Sek’a’irtish Division with me. You’ve realize you’ve lost more than three quarters of Acknahar’tah already? I was told there’s a new self-styled Sith Lord in the Underground who killed a few. Scared off more. And I can’t prove it, but Four of Twelve thinks Davad here might have eaten One and Two.”

“I told the shadows to stay away from the Temple,” Davad muttered. “Arca gave different commands. They should have stayed away.”

“That’s the problem with untrained Force-sensitives.” Oerin shrugged. “No defense against Sith Lords.” He glanced back at the sentients standing behind him. “You heard that, yes? Minions? Any one of us in this room could end all of you.”

“What about the Mandalorians?” the tallest one, the one closest to Oerin asked.

“They are mine, even as you are. Don’t touch them.”

“I am not yours,” Millifar snapped. She leveled her rifle at Oerin.

“Millifar.” Revan stepped between them, faster than Canderous could. “Wait.”

“What’s wrong, Davad? Didn’t want them poaching your territory? You prefer the blood of innocents now to Sith assassins?” Oerin’s lips bared in a smile, revealing teeth that were still somehow white and even. “I guess Mother has been busy with her lessons.”

“Oerin?” Millifar’s rifle dropped, swinging free in her hand. “Oerin, what happened to you?”

“Milli.” Oerin’s voice was strangely flat. “You should leave this place. Now.”

“You did something to me,” she said. “I saw a recording of it. You made me forget.”

“Stang,” he muttered. “I should have realized there’d be a recording. Well, it wasn’t easy, making you forget.” His face twisted. “We Mandalorians are a resistant lot.”

Canderous unbuckled something from his belt, and held it up. Thermocrete detonator. His helmeted head turned in Revan’s direction, and even without a facial expression, she could see the question in it.

No. She shook her head. Out of all of us, Canderous, you and your daughter have the least chance of surviving that.
With a grimace, the Mandalorian tucked it back into his belt.

Warily, Revan glanced between the three of them. “So. You’re all in this together? What… what are you?”

“We are those who will achieve what you failed to do.” Kae pressed the wound in her side, and slowly rose to her feet, still leaning against the wall for support. Her voice was weak, but determined. “We will defeat the Emperor, and bring peace to the galaxy.”

“By killing Jedi?” It was too much to grasp. A part of her felt the Force around them twist, and reached for it, fueling it with her own fear and anger and hopelessness. “Davad, I thought you were….”

“I was your friend,” he said. “But this is bigger than us.” His face twisted. “My Master may be insane, but she’s not… she’s not wrong.

“Your master.” Kae agreed. Her head turned to Oerin. “And your mother.”

Lin nodded. “Yes.” He shrugged at Revan. “After I died, I guess she was bereft without my continued light in her life. If it came down to it, would you raise young Malachor from the dead?”

Revan felt cold. “I… no one has that kind of power.”

“Oh, but they do,” Oerin said. “Mother does. Perhaps I could, as well. And if we can, I’m quite certain you could manage it. You are the strongest one here. See how Davad can’t take his eyes off you?” He snorted. “It’s not just your beauty.”

“You’re not alive.” The pain was like a shriek on her nerves when she didn’t block it out. Easier, to block it. “I don’t know what you are.”

“Just doing my best!” Oerin glanced at Davad again. “As we do.”

“Then on Manaan, what you were both doing there was….”

“Consolidating the strong to bolster our position.” Oerin’s ravaged face twisted. “But then you came, and Mother’s plan changed.”

“She’s always been behind this—everything—”

“Not everything,” Kae interrupted. “There’s a proverb my own mother taught me, long ago. ‘We make plans, and the Force laughs. I have had to readjust mid-course countless times: when you won the duel against Mandalore, when you harnessed the Star Forge, when the Jedi captured you, when the plague killed my son—and when Jophageena destroyed the holocron.”

“My holocron? You mean the holocron of my memories?” Her mother? Is she really Vima Sunrider? Is this really Nomi Sunrider’s daughter? It seemed like a cruel joke.

“Yes,” Kae said. “Your holocron. Your memories are gone, Revan. All that you once were, destroyed by one Jedi’s madness.”

“She’s lying,” Davad said, almost at the same time. “She always lies. You need to… you need to know that, Rev.” He was sweating harder now. She could see the tremor in his arm, the falter in his step. He glanced at Oerin, and then back at her. “But the Emperor is worse. The old you… the one with your memories… knows… knew that. What we do… we’re doing it to stop him.”
“I need to stop you,” Revan said numbly. I need to stop being a fracking idiot and stop announcing what I’m going to do. What the frack am I going to do?

There were three of them. Canderous, she trusted to hold his own, but if anything happened to Millifar—

And they’ll know that, they’ll use my own weakness against me. But Oerin. He wouldn’t—he would never hurt her—

“Where are my memories? Are they here or not? You had them. You want me to help you? Show me why I should.”

“Deception was never your path,” Kae chuckled. “I trained you. Even when the head forgets, the heart knows. “You are a star in the Force, but we could end you now, if that were our purpose.”

“You’re strong,” Davad agreed. He licked his lips, as if he were nervous, and took a step closer to her. His eyes were a piercing yellowish-brown—had they always been that color?

Fragments of memory in her head: Davad and Beya laughing, Davad studying with her in the Archives, Davad crawling across the floor of her flagship….

XXX

“Rise,” she whispered. “Get up, Arkan. We’re alone. You don’t need to impress me like some groveling worm.”

His Sith-maddened eyes looked up at her. “I came back, Master. I came back for you.”

“I would have warned you,” she began. Pathetic, trying to muster an excuse, but he was still loyal. He deserved one.

“If you had, I would have deserted.” He laughed. “All that life on Onderon, I can’t go back there. I want to serve you. It’s what I always… always wanted.”

“Why?”

“Because.” He stood, approached her. Shorter than Malak. His dark hair was knotted, twisted into hundreds of small braids ringed with bells. That meant something for Beast-riders, but right now, Revan couldn’t remember what. Her hand reached out and closed on his arm, fingers digging deep into the muscle there. He didn’t flinch, didn’t move when she stepped closer, wrapping her other arm around his back, pressing their bodies together. One of them sighed, and the Force flared between—

XXX

“Ah,” he whispered. Still a meter away, no threat. Something relaxed in her, calmed. She felt her heartbeat slow, felt something open—

“No!” Lightning lashed out, and Revan heard two rifles blast. She stumbled forward, somehow knocked off balance. Davad raised his hand and then she was flying backwards, hard enough into the wall behind her that her head cracked against the stone, barely cushioned by her own shields in time.

“Revan is not for you, Beast-lord!” The old woman stood taller now, and Davad seemed… smaller, shrunken.
“You shot me, Millifar.” Oerin’s dead voice was full of reproach. There was a hole in his chest that hadn’t been there before. A new wound, overlapping with the old ones. It seemed to make no difference. There was no blood, just a charred hole where the bolt had gone in. Oerin still stood there, as if nothing had happened at all.

“You’re not him,” the girl said. “You’re not my Mandalore!”

The world had too many edges in it. Something was muted, softened, as if happening from a distance. Revan looked down and found the mask of the Mandalore lying next to her, from where the Force had thrown it. She picked it up slowly, instinct more than reason making her shove it in her belt before scrambling back to her feet.

Canderous’s shot had gone for Kae, a part of her mind had registered its trajectory, like a ripple in the Force; but the hit was to disable, not to kill. The Sith was favoring one leg now, still leaning half against the wall; but she was still standing.

The Mandalorian turned towards her, nodding his helm.

Weakened. He weakened her. He wants her to be afraid. He wants her to tell us what we need to know first. He knows that I can finish it—

“I’m sorry, Rev.” Davad took a step backwards. He seemed paler, almost gray. “I swore I would never do that, but you’re so… full. Rich. I… I shouldn’t have done that—”

“My apprentice will not trouble you again,” Kae murmured. “But we need you, Revan. We need your fire, your strength for the war yet to come.”

“Then you’d better tell me what the frack that war is.”

“I have.” Kae’s hand went to the wound in her leg, wincing. “The Emperor is a scream in the Force. He consumes worlds, he hollows out minds, and puts his own inside. His dream of Empire is one of stagnation, apathy, death. He has no mind, except to expand his own strength. No thoughts, except to become more than he is. There are worlds over which he has entirely taken sway. They are silent, filled with sentients who have no need for voices. Sentients who have no needs. Sentients, who are no longer worthy of the word itself: worlds of one mind and a billion hearts beating. Worlds where nothing grows, nothing changes, nothing speaks—”

“Why?” Revan interrupted. “Why would he even want that?”

“Maybe he no longer has wants,” Davad answered her. “Only… needs. He needs those worlds to continue to… be himself.”

“Frack this,” Canderous muttered, and fired again, so quickly, that it barely registered——until the bolt froze in mid-air half a meter away from Kae’s face.

“Call off your beast, Revan, and I’ll call off mine.” The old woman’s smile was almost… proud?

“Canderous,” Revan whispered. Oerin’s soldiers were closer now, vibroblades out. Silent in the Force. How did they do that?

“It was your idea,” Oerin said, as if he’d heard her thoughts. Because I can hear your thoughts when you’re blasting them all over the place. Quiet them, before Mother notices. “Training the weak Force-sensitive to hunt Jedi. You always needed more Jedi.”
“Her idea, but Revan never oversaw its full execution,” murmured Kae.

“Why?” She didn’t want the answer, but the answer was terrible and obvious. All the Dark Jedi. On Korriban. On Manaan. On Rakata Prime. And then, those Jedi in the room with Malak. All dead, except their bodies. Their bodies and their connection to the Force, feeding him, feeding the station with their strength—

“Conversion,” said Kae. “Do you think so many followed you on principle alone?”

“Mother’s made a study of refining the techniques,” Oerin added. His head tilted towards Davad again and their eyes locked. Half a heartbeat—no more than that. Then Oerin gestured with his hand. “As you can see.”

“Get out of here,” Revan told Oerin’s soldiers. Oerin’s Sith. Oerin’s shadows. Shadows, they said. We called them shadows.

One of the ones in back laughed. “No, Lord Revan.”

XXX

They came, appearing out of the shadows of the jungle clearing. Dozens of them. All kids, mostly looking younger than Dustil did now. Most were Iridonian, but a few were Human, Rodian—even a few Selkath.

All of them had red lightsabers.

Sith. But they’re still just kids. Sometimes, Carth had nightmares about all the soldiers they’d killed that were still almost just kids.

“How many mothers have you killed, Father?” How many kids?

He stepped in front of Mission, pushing her back, his hand slipping over the surface of the droid’s dome. “Careful,” he whispered.

“No kidding,” she said. “But aren’t you the organic one here?”

The rancor had turned, assessing this new threat. As they watched, it roared—rearing back on its haunches, and crashing through the underbrush.

Whine from overhead, and then the familiar sound of the Hawk’s thrusters. Carth looked up into the trees. “You called in Zaalbar?”

“And my ship,” Mission said. “I think I can take a rancor better than you, meatbag guy. No offense.”

“You mind not calling me that?” It made him think… he didn’t want to think Mission really had anything in common with the HK. Or that Kashyyyk computer. “Don’t shoot the kids.”

Subsonic whine of blasters charging, and as he looked, the Hawk crashed through the tree line. Some of the kids looked up, but the rest seemed to have formed a wall, almost as if they were herding the rancor away. Strangely, they weren’t attacking it. Even more strangely, the beast wasn’t fighting back.

“But it’s right there!” Mission beeped in disappointment.
“Can he land nearby? Tell him to land nearby.”

“It’s mostly trees…” She beeped again. “I could probably make a crater big enough to land. You want me to do that?”

“The Hawk doesn’t have that kind of firepower.”

Mission’s voder chuckled. “It does now. Back on Kashyyyk, we made a lot of improvements.”

XXX

“Malachor,” she repeated. Saying his name. Saying his name to him. For a moment, the world narrowed until it only had two of them.

“Hello,” her son said. “Hello?”

“Sheris.”

And then Malak spoiled it by saying that name—that other name, the not-name. The woman she no longer was.

“This area is restricted,” Malachi’s sneer was predictable. The fool probably assumed she was Malak’s whore. All things considered, that was an excellent cover.

“I thought you said to meet you here alone, my Lord Malak.” Revan simpered, ducking her head and smiling from underneath her lashes at the dark-haired boy who had Malak’s precise expression of confounded rage on his face. “Am I early?” She fished in her pocket, bringing out the real reason for her visit—not just the excuse to see Malachor; but the insurance. The insurance that he would not die, would not be taken, would be safe. “I brought Malachor’s vaccine.”

“People call me Korrie,” her son muttered. Someone should cut his hair. Fix that crooked tooth.

“He doesn’t need the vaccine. His environment has excellent biofilters,” the old man said.

“Our studies show the plague doesn’t affect children,” Revan ventured. I tailored it not to. “But he should have it before he enters puberty. And that happens… early in your family, doesn’t it?”

“How did you get past my guards?” Malachi was glaring at Malak now, not her.

It had been much, much harder, with Sheris’s weakness and the old man’s increased security to climb the ventilation shafts from the sealed levels below, but Revan had been determined. Once in, of course, her own HK had been able to override the security on this level. Malachi had changed the passcodes he’d known about, of course; but not the ones that she’d installed originally, when she designed this refuge to be safe for her son.

“My Lord invited me.” She smiled at Malak. “He gave me the codes.”

“Your lord forbids you from giving his son anything,” Malak snapped. “Korrie. Go with your grandfather.”

No. The fool Sheris, and her stupid emotions. Not just Revan’s own despair. She could feel Malak’s too—as if he didn’t like this any more than she did. I should have just gone to my son’s room in his sleep, given him the vaccine then. But I wanted to see him, speak to him—I want to meet him, know him—

“I’m to be your stepmother, Malachor,” she said. “It’s time we were acquainted.”
“You’re marrying Father?” His eyes widened. “But what about my mother?”

She’s not—

“No.” Malachi said. He snorted. “If you think this is some kind of play to seize power, my son—”

“It’s…” Malak looked like he was struggling. “It’s just Sheris, father.” His mouth twisted. “Obviously, the Senate would have as hard a time believing her to be Revan as they would me to be Malak.”

“You were mean to me before,” Malachor said to Revan. His gray eyes were exactly like his father’s had been. Before—before they weren’t. “I don’t think I want to be acquainted.”

“I’m sorry about that. I was just… confused.” This was dangerous. She had never felt so vulnerable, not even when she thought she was dying. Like all her nerves were exposed. Where was the ice? Where was the artificial calm she used to channel as naturally as breathing?

“I won’t have my grandson exposed to… this.” Malachi’s face was the picture of disgust.

“Hypocrite—you stupid man—” her temper flared. Where was the calm? The reserve?

“Malachor is a Coruscanti Third. He’ll be exposed to much worse before he’s eighteen.” Malak’s voice broke in fast. Malak coming to her side? His voice roughened. “He already knows how the galaxy works.”

Revan risked a glance towards him. He was staring at her steadily, his anger beating a tempo in the Force.

Their son looked between them: first one, then the other, then back at his grandfather. He frowned. “If Father wants it, it’s okay, Grandfather. She said she was sorry.”

“Revan herself won’t have you, my son.” The old man’s voice was scornful. “And no wonder.” He laughed, that same laugh that Revan heard sometimes in her dreams: the one about the room and the murmur of soft conversation, that day he’d told them the truth about how the galaxy worked, the day that haunted her, made her wonder: if she had answered his questions differently, if she had been different, would none of this have happened?

Were things better for their efforts than they would be without? The Jedi were all but broken, but instead of triumph, she was trapped in Kae’s game. Tenebrae was slowed, but not overthrown. And the Republic… everything she had read about the events of the last three years pointed to total economic collapse within the next five, unless—

Unless we have another war? Is that the answer that Malachi seeks again? And is he right?

“Revan and I ended long ago.” Malak’s voice drew her back. Not the right voice. Sometimes she felt the pain of that too. You died, my love. You died and your body was destroyed and I never even saw, never had the chance to say goodbye—

Sheris was a sentimental fool. Revan exhaled sharply, trying to drive her out.

“I’ll tell Cook to send your afternoon meal to your private dining chamber,” Malachi said.

A room no doubt covered in surveillance. “We’ll go out,” Revan said. “Surely, a child of seven is allowed some time outside. If he’s going to rule this planet, he needs to see—”

“I know.” Stupid Sheris. She knew, but in the space of seeing him, all reason seemed to have left. All time had stopped. In her head, she had never forgotten, and in her head, he was still smaller, more like a younger child than this, even if she had never seen the younger child he had been.

“You will have no rank here, Darkstar,” Malachi told her. “Even if you marry that one.” He snorted. “Canderous Ordo and Carth Onasi have more rights in House D’Reev than either of you.”

“The dining room is fine, Father.” Malak’s words had a precise quality. She glanced at him from the corner of her eyes, but he was staring at the balcony.

“I like the little dining room,” Malachor said. “I guess it’s okay.” He was staring at Malak too. “If that’s what Father wants.”

“It is what will be allowed.” Malachi turned his back on them and walked to the door. “I have matters of some urgency to attend to. Should you see the real Revan before I do, please tell her to contact me immediately. We need her to help settle some of the more recalcitrant members of the Jedi Order.”

The doors slid closed behind him.

“I’m sure that will take no time at all,” Revan muttered. “For one as skilled as she.”

“Don’t.” Malak nodded at the ceiling, and she understood. “Just don’t… talk. Sheris.”

Malachor looked between them, frowning. Every part of Sheris’s pathetic body screamed at Revan to take him in her arms, press her nose against his. Hothan kiss. Your smile would light up the room —

“You want to see my toys, Aunt Sheris?” he said finally. “I have lots.”

“I think the balcony,” she began. That way if your father betrays me I can throw him over it. But the thought was weak, almost a joke.

“No.” Malak went to their son and took his hand. He shook his head again, message entirely clear.

Did he think she was a fool, revealing herself to a child? No doubt these rooms were littered with surveillance equipment added since their departure. And Malachor was so young. He could betray her so easily without even knowing.

“She’s not your aunt, Malachor.”

“Korrie,” the child corrected him. “Padawan Sheris?”

“That’s fine,” Revan said. “I would love to see your toys, Mal. Can you show me the way?” He frowned. “I guess.”

“We’ll all go,” Malak said. “But let’s make an early night of it. Sheris and I have to talk about some grown up things after.”

“Gross,” Korrie snorted. “I don’t need to know about that!”

XXX

“No,” the tallest one murmured. “We are no longer under your command.”

“You’re under mine,” Oerin murmured. He frowned, scanning the room and looking at Davad again. “Although I must say, perhaps Revan’s advice might be wise.”

One of them fell to the floor, like puppet with its remotes cut out. No warning. Just—

Revan heard herself gasp. The man was dead. But worse than that… empty. Like a hole in the world.

Not the world, Rev. The Force. Davad gets hungry. Oerin’s voice in her mind. His dead eyes met hers.

“They can’t run,” Davad said. His fingers flexed. “I need them.” His face was almost gray. His head tilted back—

Another shadow collapsed, and then another, lights winking out one-by-one, lives on an overtaxed grid.

Don’t react. Don’t move. They were Sith. Just more Sith with blood on their hands—

“Get out of here!” She pushed with the Force, knocking Davad off balance. He fell back, and a few of the shadows broke free, started to run, but only a few. The others stayed still: blind loyalty? Compulsion? She had no way of knowing. Another fell. And then another—

“Fool.” The old woman snapped. “There’s not enough power in them to sate you. You’ve just wasted years of their training. And for what?”

“Do they even mind? Their loyalty was absolute,” Oerin agreed. “You crawled in their heads, Mother, to assure it.” His lips pulled back in a smile, and one of his hands moved, so quickly, Revan almost missed it.

An explosion, as the blaster bolt formerly held only by Kae’s concentration hit the wall. Canderous had been using a disruptor rifle, point blank range. If anyone had still been in its path, they would have been obliterated.

Smaller flash of light, and the ozone smell of a shock stick. In the next heartbeat, Oerin Lin was jabbing the weapon into Kae’s neck. The woman screamed in pain and outrage, and Revan felt the Force rising up from her, welling from beneath the surface with the Force of a shockwave, a scream, rage that would envelop all of them—

“No.” Revan’s stasis field surrounded Kae, freezing the woman’s expression in a rictus of pain. The shockwave froze with her, encased in energy, for as long as she could hold it. “Oerin, what are you doing?”

“Betraying my mother?” His ruined face tilted towards her. “I thought you’d be happy, Rev.”

“Get out of here,” Davad said. He pointed at the ground, where the mask of the Mandalore had fallen from Revan’s robes. “And take that with you.”

“That’s mine.” Oerin sounded offended.
“I met a Jedi oracle who said I was going to wear it and destroy worlds,” Davad told him. “I’d rather not. All things considered, I think we should just give the mask of the Mandalore back to the clans.”

“My clans,” Oerin muttered. “They were supposed to be mine.”

“We’re not.” Millifar leveled her rifle at him again, but her voice sounded like she was crying under her helm. “You’re not one of us. Clan ends in death.”

He sighed, and his head dropped. “I know.”

“We’ll take it.” Canderous closed his gauntlet over the mask, and snapped it onto his belt. “Kill the crazy Sith bitch and let’s go, Revan.”

“No,” Oerin shook his head. “She’s my blood. My kill.”

“She’s ours.” Davad said. He took a step towards Revan again, and for a moment, the world faded—

“Don’t.” Oerin’s lightsaber cut between them. “Revan’s still holding back my mother. Do you think Mother would be happy if you ate her favorite pet?”

“I think she might be displeased that you tried to stun her.” Davad’s voice was the complete opposite of what Revan felt in the Force now. His yellow eyes were almost… glowing. He stared at Revan. “Do you understand? You need to run. I can’t… it gets harder and harder to control.” His smile was sad, and so out of place that for a moment, she felt sorry for him. “Besides the Emperor, I’m probably the only Force user in this galaxy you can’t kill.”

“Well, there’s me,” Oerin added. “Being as I’m already dead.”

“That’s true for her too.” Davad nodded at Kae, still frozen in Revan’s stasis.

“You mean… she can’t kill you either.” Revan nodded. “But can you… you said before she was in your minds. If that’s true, how can you stop her?”

“I’m a Sunrider.” Oerin shrugged. “I’ve studied these things. I think I know.”

Revan stared at him, and wondered if he meant what she thought he did. If she was insane to trust him. If it was trust at all. He’s right, I can’t kill them. I could bring the Temple down around their heads and I’m not sure it would kill them. But it would kill Canderous and his daughter—

She looked at the bodies on the floor and then back at him. “You need to get off this planet. Go somewhere else, somewhere where you can’t… hurt anyone else.” Or somewhere where you can hurt the right people, a voice inside her mocked. For a moment, she thought it was Oerin again; but then she realized it was her own thought. “That’s what… that’s what Kae wanted? She thinks you can destroy the Sith? But then why… why kill Jedi?”

“She thinks I can destroy the Force.” Davad’s smile twisted. “And sometimes, Rev? I think she’s right.”

“But that’s…” her voice faltered. Impossible. Insane. You can’t do that. “How?”

“You don’t know?” Davad laughed. “Ask yourself, the next time you meet her. I don’t think that particular side effect of my condition was part of your plan; but that’s the problem with plans, isn’t it? One little spark, and suddenly you’ve got the Cron Cluster implosion.” He shrugged.
“Maybe she knows. But she’s half-mad. Sheris was too, but then so were you, at the end. Hard to tell which of them that comes from. Maybe both.”

Revan froze. “She?”

“Do I need to spell it out for you?” His eyes widened, and his hand trembled.

“No.” That holocron. “When did—where? Where is she?”

“The Jedi evacuated to 100 Thantos Three,” Davad said. “But Sheris was working in the clinic in the Underground. Yuthura Ban kept an eye on her for me. We were the only two that… knew. As far as I know. What sentients know… and with the Jedi dying all the time…sometimes it was hard to know.” He was sweating again, and wiped his face with his sleeve. “It’s… hard being this close to you now. Easier with her. Sheris wasn’t nearly as tempting.”

“Malak? Where is he?”

“There too, I’d assume.” He smacked his forehead in mock consternation. “While we’re on the brink of confiding old secrets, will you tell me—did you ever love me? Even a little?”

“I don’t know, Davad.” Anger was easy, all she had to do was look down at the bodies around them. Maybe they weren’t innocent, but they’d been breathing before. “I don’t remember.”

“Ask her.” He shrugged. “She’ll probably lie, of course. But ask. For me.”

“May you bear strong sons and commanding daughters, Millifar of Ordo.” Oerin was standing next to the still-frozen body of Arren Kae. Or Vima Sunrider. As Revan watched, light flared in his hands, surrounding the old woman with an additional layer of stasis.

“Don’t be rude, Oerin. I will. But they won’t be Lin,” the girl clipped her rifle to her belt, and pulled up her visor. Underneath, her eyes were red, but her expression was cold.

“Let’s go,” Canderous’s armored hand closed over Revan’s arm. “Get the hell out of this tomb before the Onderonite tries something, or the old schutta wakes up.”

And leave them? Every instinct in her head screamed that this was the wrong choice, that the real threat was here. And yet—

Davad was my friend. Oerin was my friend. And even Kae was… maybe she was different once. She trained me. I must have loved her. I’m tired, tired of killing my friends.

And I’m not sure I can, even if I tried, and if I fail, what happens to Malachor? What will she and Malak do with him?

“Get her off Coruscant,” Revan snapped, making her voice cold. Like Hoth. Like ice. “All of you, leave Coruscant. This is my planet. I won’t have more death here. Not from you.”

The two of them looked at each other, and then back at her. Oerin smiled faintly, a little mockingly, and half-bowed. “Yes, Lord Revan. As you command.”

“As it happens,” Davad added. “I have the codes to one of the Jedi ships in the Order’s hangar. We’ll just go there now.” He wiped his face again, and took another step backwards. “Good-bye, Revan.”

“I’ll take you up.” Canderous activated his jet pack. “Unless you can fly now, Lord Revan.”
“I can’t.” She looked at Davad again, and then turned back to Canderous. Revan stepped into his embrace and they both rose; Millifar a few meters away, rising through the hole in the dome. Outside, the morning sun shone, too bright. It was an unusually clear day. Revan closed her eyes, aftereffects from the bright light sparking in her skull like reminders from the Force. Beneath them, she could feel the three Sith Lords moving through the Jedi Temple—and then the moment when they all winked out again, masking themselves effectively, even as her mind traced the paths in the Jedi Temple, calculating which way they would go.

“You think a few torpedoes would work?” Canderous grunted. “Probably a little late to sabotage their ship.”

Revan looked up to him, but the blank helm said nothing. Was he joking or not? His arms tightened around her waist. Her feet rested on his boots. She wanted to scream. She wanted to be sick.

“I don’t want him dead. More dead.” Millifar hovered next to them, and said something else, but the wind lost her words.

“We need to go to 100 Thantos Three. Malachi’s.” Revan pushed away from Canderous. “Let me go. I’ve got it from here.”

“Your choice.” His hands fell free and Revan leaned back, letting the Force take her down the rest of the way, to the still-deserted plaza.

Falling was the easy part.
“W-would you like another pillow?” With her hair wet and wearing a black sleeping robe, she mocked him, like a shadow of the past. Only in the past, her voice had never faltered. “I-I don’t mind, if you want to take the bed. I’ve slept on worse than that chair.”

“We both have.” Somewhere the Onasi boy was being distracted by Jin’s pithy commentary on the Jedi refugees a few floors below. A relief. This was not the time Malak would have chosen for gutter commentary from fools. “But I’ve been in a coma for the last month. Sitting up is a pleasant change.”

“Hah.” Her delicate eyebrows arched. “I suppose it would be.” She looked down at herself, and pulled at the robe, raising the neckline. The silken eridu draped across her body in ways Malak didn’t want to notice. She’d sent for her things, imperious as any D’Reev Second, in between their meals and their time with Malachor.

“It’s near dawn anyway,” he said. “You kept Mal up too late, and then you kept us both up disabling my father’s surveillance to these rooms.”

“Mal liked the stories, I think.” She took another unsteady breath. “And he seemed fascinated by my arm. Do you know how it—what happened?”

“Your arm? No.”

“I thought Sheris might have told you, when you were both—”

“We were nothing.” He pulled the blanket across his lap, twisting his body to face the window—and the dawn. “Now that you’ve announced our engagement to my father, I suppose we’ll have to continue sleeping in the same room?”

“It is… customary.” That hesitancy in her voice wasn’t like Red at all. “The bed’s enormous, if you want to take half—”

“I don’t. I don’t know what it’s like for a woman, but there are some aspects of being in a new body that I still find hard to… control.”

“The same, I think.” Her voice was quiet. “It’s a good thing we’re Jedi.”

Malak heard rustling noises, knew without turning that she’d climbed into the bed, and pulled up the covers.

“Were Jedi,” he murmured, staring out the window. “We were Jedi, Red.”

The lights dimmed automatically, even as the sky outside brightened: a clear Coruscanti dawn.

XXX

Gwenarius shifted the ill-named Dxun to one hip, and put her daughter on the ground to encourage the babe to crawl. “Go on,” she urged. “Your vod moves already. How will you keep him in line if “all you do is sit?”

“Mmmmo,” the child said, and blinked her black eyes at her mother. “Phhht.”

“That is an impressive amount of spit running down your chin,” Gwenarius agreed. “Millifar was much more mannered when she was your size.” Dxun grabbed for her shirt and squealed with glee, kicking his legs into her belly.

“And more mobile.” Relenting, she put Dxun down. The babe immediately set off, crawling across the floor. When he reached his sister, he put his hand on her shoulder, and used her to pull himself up.

“You need to try too,” she admonished the girl babe.

Her daughter’s eyes widened, and then she shoved her brother away. He toppled over, and immediately began to wail.

Laughing, Gwenarius picked him up and started to sing.

“Vanguards and drop ships and dewbacks he could climb,”

“Tomorrow came too fast, but he didn’t mind.”

“The distance was short, so light it again,”

“Hyperspace takes no time, to get where we’ve been.”

“But one first blooded, wasn’t really so mean,”

“Just a little bit scared and a little bit green.”

“Now he’s gone to a place where the stars are all his.

And he wrote on a rock—”

“Mai?”

Milli. Thank stars. Her head turned. “Daughter.” It was never said, but every mother breathed a sigh of relief when their child came back, even from such a mundane journey as invading the Jedi Temple of Coruscant when, by all accounts, most of the Jedi were already gone.

Her second born’s face was smudged, and her eyes were red, as if tears had already fallen. A millisecond later, the girl hurtled herself into her mother’s arms, almost crushing Dxun, who squalled in protest. Gwenarius shifted the babe to a shoulder’s perch, and wrapped both arms, now free, around the girl. As Headwoman of Ordo, she had to remain steadfast, but inside, she felt like she was on sinking ground. “Was it glorious? His death?”

“No.” Millifar’s shoulders shook. “It was horrible. I shot him, and he was already dead, but he didn’t die. And he smelled like rotting… flesh. He told me to bear strong children for Ordo—and Father just let him go! My buir took the mask and let him go!”

Gwenarius had to stand on her toes now to kiss the top of her child’s golden head, but it was worth it. On the floor, her youngest daughter looked up and clapped her hands at them. Dxun perched, slightly off-balance, and Gwenarius broke free long enough to set him down next to his sister, before the babe fell and smashed his skull.
“Your father is unharmed.” She tried to not look relieved, in the face of her child’s pain, seating herself cross legged on the floor and patting the surface next to her. “Who did you shoot? Who died?”

“Oerin. He was already dead. But he was there.”

“His corpse was——”

“His corpse was walking. And talking. Just like on the holo.” Millifar sat down beside her.

“Some Jedi trick?” Gwenarius had assumed that was what it was.

“No. He spoke to me. He was there.” Her daughter blinked rapidly again, and pulled back. She’d changed out of her beskar and into an appropriate robe, but the garment was unbelted and her hair hung, half-loose in her eyes, as if she’d merely pulled off her helmet and let out her braids with fingers, instead of using the proper comb. “Third Wife Revan says he’s some kind of Sith. Him and the other Jedi. And his mother. You knew Oerin’s mother, you told me. Did you know she was Sith?”

“Jana Novasun was Jedi,” Gwenarius admitted. “She promised us a new Golden Age. She knew the Force magic. She carried one of the particle blades.” She frowned, lowering her voice, and pulling her child down to the floor with the babes. “She said she had learned what she could of battle from Ulic Qel Droma, and she came with proof: knowledge of our own custom, troop patterns, and battle histories that no barbarian would know.” She hugged Millifar close. “I suppose it was obvious she was some kind of Sith, but Jedi… Dar’jettai… they seem so similar, no civilized person can tell them apart.”

“I don’t care about any of that,” Millifar muttered. Dxun stood up on his two stout legs and took a step towards her, before collapsing again. The girl child still sat on the floor, just blinking at him. “I care about him!”

“You must not. The dead have no care for us.” Gwenarius wasn’t sure words for grief had as much substance, if the dead were going to become reanimated corpses, but those words were all that she had. “Did Revan come back with you?”

“No.” The girl scowled. “She said she was going to check on her son. And Buir said he wanted to check on the ships we have in port.” She twisted her head to look at Gwenarius. “The other Dar’jettai had stolen the Lin mask. But Oerin made him give it back to us. Buir has it now.”

“Good.” Her fingers found the errant braids on her daughter’s head, and Gwenarius pulled out her own comb to free them. Millifar calling her father by the familiar term of ‘buir’ was unsettling because of its suddenness—not to mention her husband taking this time to check their escape routes. “It would be better if your buir had won the Mandalore’s Mask back in combat, but having the mask returned still favors Ordo.”

“I know. Second Wife will be pleased.” Millifar gave her a wan smile.

“When she returns to us, yes. Aemelie is tracking that false Alderaanian’s companions now.”

“Why bother? If the dead are walking, the clans have more important concerns.”

“I asked her why,” Gwenarius admitted. “And received inadequate response. Aemelie keeps her own thoughts.” And names her son inappropriately. “I do know that it has something to do with that Deralian pilot.”
“That pilot who shot at Third Wife? He’s still being questioned?”

“Leskal and Kex have been changing shifts. The Deralian has given us nothing, except that he came to Coruscant for his own profit, to sell tales about that smuggler, Polla Organa. The one Revan had killed.” Gwenarius gestured for her daughter to join them, but the babe just sat a meter away, staring at them all with impassive eyes. “Would you like to name the girl child after Lin?”

“What?” Millifar followed her gaze. “It’s not time, is it?”

“We must decide before the ceremony. I think it would be an appropriate sign of respect.”

“You want me to name her after Oerin? Like Ore-Rynn?”

“Oerina? Loerina? Oeri? Oerinex?” Gwenarius smiled. Her first daughter’s hair was silken gold and waved soft on her shoulders. The babe still had almost no hair at all, but Gwenarius suspected it would turn a rich red-brown, like the spacer who had provided a third of her genetic material. Such traits were dominant. “We still have time for you to decide on a variation. Another month, I think.”

“Thank you for the honor.” Her daughter leaned forward and took the girl babe in her arms. With a cry of glee, Dxun launched himself from the floor and into her lap too.

“That one,” Gwenarius sighed. “He already jumps in like a doomed basilisk.”

“Dxun’s just a name, Mai.” Millifar’s shy smile was good to see. “Don’t be superstitious.”

XXX

Therion’s wrists were going numb in the restraints. With his head strapped to the table, all that he could look at was the flickering overlights. The Mandalorians seemed to have a lackadaisical attitude towards torture. They’d leave him alone for just enough time for him to start to panic, and the come back and make him panic even more. It had stopped being funny hours ago, right about the time they pulled out the truth serum.

“S’not fair, using drugs,” he mumbled, through a swollen lip. Why the hell had he even fired the stunner at Revan Starfire in the first place?

Because she pinned me against a wall and I wanted to be able to say I bagged her—

Sometimes, he had to admit, his ma was right: his own stupidity might very well be the death of him.

“Tell me again,” the Mandalorian who had just come back said. Just a kid. On the ship, Leskal had been pretty cool. He’d even shown Therion the main engines. Things of beauty. If only they were back there now. “Who were your companions?”

“Nobody. Assholes.” Therion felt drowsy, like the kid had given him too high a dose. Truth serum. Hah! Did it even work? When he’d told the story about the Falleen and the weirdly hot Ithorian babe, he hadn’t felt a twinge—and the story had been a complete lie. For one thing, the Ithorian had not been hot.

Plus, was good if the serum wasn’t working, because the Polla’s kid was real young, and Therion didn’t need that crap on his conscience.

“What was their purpose here?”
“No clue.” That was the truth. He kept his eyes closed, but even so, the afterimages of the light kept flickering in his brain. “When I said I liked it rough, this wasn’t what I had in mind. Can you send Dessa in?”

“She’s busy. She went out with—” the kid stopped, as if he realized he wasn’t supposed to tell.

“That’s a shame. She’s got a great rack.” Suddenly, Therion felt compelled to talk about how great. Hey, it was the truth right?

He was just getting into the details of the particulars of her erogenous zones and the exact colors of her skin, when a commlink crackled, interrupting what had almost become a pleasant interlude in the torture.

“Anything?” Female voice. Sounded like Aemelie Ordo. That bitch.

“No,” Leskal said. “He talks a lot about himself.” He paused. “He’s… very popular with women.”

“Don’t be rude.”

Therion cracked his eyes open. He could see Leskal’s face, standing over him, zits and all.

Kid actually flushed. “I’m sorry, but that’s all he wants to talk about. You said I had to listen to see what he had to say—”

“No matter,” Amelie’s voice buzzed on the comm. “We’ve tracked their signal to a brothel in the Underground. Ask him about Sith. There are rumors of some kind of Sith Lord down here.”

“You got that?” Leskal jabbed Therion’s ribs with the prod again. At least this time it wasn’t switched on. “Tell me.”

“A… brothel? Moms? Arca.” Damn the damn drugs. “They went to see Arca. My contact for the story. I don… I dunno anything about Sith.” Frack if Polla didn’t have shit for luck. The poor kid.

“Arca,” Leskal repeated. “Wasn’t that one of the Sith names on our briefing reports?”

Yes.” The comm crackled. “We’ll take it from here. See if you can get anything else. Dessa says, no bruising.” The voice cut out.

“Don’t hurt them!” Therion yelled.

“Ooops.” Leskal muttered, staring down at Therion’s face. The boy’s face was bland, blunt, friendly, and as insane as all the fracking Mandalorians were. “I did bruise you already. Who are your companions?” he repeated. “Are they here to harm Reivan? Who sent them?”

“They’re just… nobody. No, I don’t… I dunno. I don’t know them at all. You… you think you know someone, right? But then it turns out you don’t know frack-all. Like, I knew this Togruta babe, once? She had headtails down to her knees….”

At first, he’d tried to resist their interrogation because of Aemelie’s promise about Dessa, not to mention Polla’s kid. But now he was just trying to resist because these people were fracked.

Xxx

Canderous and Millifar had gone back to the clans, both of them as shaken as Reivan was by the morning’s events. The events in which we just let three Sith Lords leave the planet, and didn’t tell anyone. At least, they had left the planet. Maybe it was professional courtesy that Oerin let her know that; but Revan had felt the Mandalore’s mind reach, across an increasingly wide void of space, before hyperspace wiped out his presence, and the echoes of the two next to him. Easier than ever to feel him, before he vanished, since his entire being was now one long scream of pain.

She closed her eyes, and took another deep breath, trying to center her thoughts, control what she could. There were two more Sith on this planet, and she needed them—if only to interrogate long enough to figure out what the frack they had done to the galaxy and how it could be fixed.

But first, she needed him. She needed to see him.

“Korrie.”

“Mother!” Her son stood up from his desk, looking a little guilty. He turned off the holodisplay in front of him before she could see it.

“Why aren’t you in school today?” She’d assumed he would be, and had been halfway to the Eglantine Academy before she felt the tug of his presence in the opposite direction. Her son was at home and close to another presence in the Force: conscious again, that strange mix of darkness that was both Dustil and Malak both.

“I was up too late last night. Father woke up! So I got to see him again. And it’s not even a secret anymore—Grandfather knows too. And Father said I could sleep in and not go to school because it is a special occasion.” His eyes glanced away from her nervously. “I am doing my computes though. Leeshy was on the remote helping.”

“What? Why didn’t you to school?”

“I said. Because I was up late.” He shifted on his feet. ‘I couldn’t sleep. Father woke up. He’s okay.”

“Who were you just talking to? What were you doing?”

“Nothing.” He didn’t seem to be lying. “Really. You seem… are you mad?”

“I’m—” terrified. For a heartbeat, she just wanted to grab him and run. “You know about the Jedi Temple, don’t you?”

“They all moved over here and a lot of them died, yeah.” He tilted his head. “Does that mean I get to see the other kids again?”

“I-I don’t know.” I don’t know how many are left. Did Davad kill them? Could he be capable of —unimaginable. Impossible, if she hadn’t seen it.

Korrie frowned. “Are you upset about Father and that lady? Leeshy said you might be. She says sometimes biologicals get upset about the steps? Are you mad I was on chat? I had to talk to someone, and you weren't here.”

Her blood seemed to freeze. “What lady? Father and what lady?”

“Her.” He shrugged. “You know. That Jed that looks like you with long hair? Sheris?” He paused. “She said to tell you hello. Didn’t you already meet? She said you were friends.”

Xxx

The skyway at Fleet Academy was crowded with cadets hurrying between classes, but at this time of day it offered a perfect view of both the Senate compound and the Jedi Temple from its low-flying orbit. The skyway was also, in the sea of uniformed faces from worlds all over the galaxy, an appropriate place for meeting as if by chance, and then strolling casually along the walkway to one of the tourist view-pods for a clandestine tryst.

Or clandestine war council, in this case.

Rear Admiral Denis Cein held the door open, the perfect gentle being. Captain Rew Ekkumi smiled at him. The pod had seating just large enough for two, surrounded by a transparisteel bubble, open at all sides. When Denis closed the airlock, the gravity cut out, and Rew floated towards the window, feigning admiration of the view beneath them.

Even from this distance, the Jedi Temple looked deserted, all lights dimmed, its plaza empty. And—she leaned closer. Was that a hole in the transparisteel dome at the entrance? With the sun casting so much shadow, it was hard to tell, but it looked like someone had shattered the vestibule dome.

“Still no word?” Denis asked, without preamble, even before their capsule started to move along its appointed tourist route.

She glanced back at him. “Only an official release that Captain Onasi’s gone off world, on some errand for Revan. An unspecified errand.”

“You don’t find that the least bit ominous?” His red eyes narrowed. “An errand? He has the training to pilot capitol ships.”

“Of course I find it alarming.” She sometimes wondered if Carth was already dead, and these press releases D’Reev issued about him were just lies, as the Senator stalled for time. “No one has seen Dustil Onasi or Carth Onasi in weeks. The Jedi Temple has been completely closed. And the remaining Jedi moved into D’Reev’s main installation yesterday.”

“Jedi and Mandalorians,” Cein muttered. He folded his arms, and bobbed in the zero gee, as formally as if he were sitting behind a console on his own ship. “All with D’Reev. It almost seems too obvious to be true.”

“What about High Admiral Rensha? Has she told you anything?”

“Not me. She went to Kuat herself to question the docking crews about the Aleema’s disappearance.” His blue-skinned face was too calm. When Denis got like this, Rew always knew it wouldn’t last. “Don’t you have a… personal comm line for Onasi? Some way to reach the man? You two were close.”

“I tried that. Carth’s not answering his private comm either.” Was Cein trying to embarrass her? No. Rear Admiral Cein was much too logical for that. “Maybe we shouldn’t have cut Onasi out of the Fleet when he married Revan Starfire. Between our silence, and what Rensha did to him, he may feel betrayed by the very organization he pledged his life to serve.”

“We had to cut him out of the loop. He was D’Reev’s creature. Like Rensha.” Cein sighed. “But if he knows anything, we need to know it too. If there’s any chance he’s in command of that… thing. Would he—would he turn on us? Does he think of himself as Mandalorian now? Or hers?”

“Let me try and find him,” Rew offered. “I could take a scout patrol. One of the light cruisers. Just large enough to look routine.”

“We don’t know where he is.”
“We know his ship’s first few jump points. And he can’t stay missing forever. The Ebon Hawk is conspicuous.” She gestured above them, as they tilted so that the direction was now below. On the edge of atmosphere like this, all of the colors from Coruscant’s polluted atmosphere swirled and combined with an almost violent beauty before trailing off into space.

“Not so much, since he seems to have changed the registration signatures.”

“I can still try. He must have been routed through the standard personal traffic lanes. He’s got a famous face too—hard to hide. And I can keep trying to comm him.”

“Useless effort.” Admiral Cein sighed. “Irrational of you. And there’s more. Old Scaly sent in some orders on the last patch. Aridoma wants you on Kuat.” He grimaced. “Maybe she knows something we can use.”

“If that’s what Admiral Aridoma Rensha wants, of course.” Their eyes met. From the way he’d given the order, Rew could tell that Denis Cein liked it as little as she did.

Denis sighed, gesturing out into the blackness. “Rensha’s still questioning dock mechanics about their work schedules on the orbital. The Aleema has been missing for more than a standard month. How can a ship that big just... vanish?”

“It might have nothing to do with Revan at all,” Rew pointed out. “Pirates have salvaged capital ships before. Even dreadnaughts.”

“But that one wasn’t even supposed to be able to fly, let alone make a jump!” His reserve cracked. “Keep trying to raise Onasi. We need ears on Revan, and D’Reev’s got her locked down.” He grimaced. “So many Jedi are dead now, I don’t know who to trust in the Order.”

“More?” Some of them had been friends.

“We received an updated casualty report from Master Klee. Jopheena Sundancer was on it.”

Rew had stopped mourning the dead years ago. After Telos, she’d quickly learned that sentients never stopped dying, so what was the point? “That’s ominous too.” Obviously.

“It has to be connected,” Cein muttered. “The Aleema, the evacuation of the Jedi Temple, this plague…” His antennae twitched. “I fear we’re at war.”

Rew had the same bad feeling. She’d been military all her life. It had in no way prepared her to fight an enemy that she couldn’t see. “Then we need to know whose side we’re on.”

He nodded slowly. “Exactly.”

Xxx

“Sheris,” Revan repeated. “She’s here?”

“All the Jedi are staying downstairs, she said.” Korrie nodded. “Except her. She's staying up here. With us. She got Pomit to bring up her bags and everything.”

“I... knew the Jedi were coming here.” She’d assumed Malak would still be unconscious, and at the time, that Sheris was Sheris. But after what Duvad had said… “What did Sheris say?” She struggled for calm. “Did she... she didn’t say anything about... herself?”

“She said she’s going to be my stepmother,” Korrie said. “When she marries Father. Then she read me a story. Actually, she read me ten stories. Most of them were kind of immature for me now, but it was kind of nice.”

Revan closed her eyes and took a deep breath. “And where was your father during all of this?”

“Watching,” Korrie said. He sounded almost hopeful. “I like having you both here. And Sheris is okay.”

“Sheris was… she didn't hurt you? You said she was mean before. When you met her before.” When she was really Sheris. What she is now—what Davad says she is now—

“She’s nicer now. Except when she asked if you were nice to me. You're my mother! Of course you're nice! That was a little weird, but Father said she was just crazy sometimes and that I shouldn't worry about it.” He shrugged. “She did seem a little crazy. She kept touching my hair.”

“I'll take care of it. Her. Now. She’s… still here?” She couldn't tell if the woman was here or not. Shouldn't she be able to fracking tell, if her own memories were—

“She told Grandfather she would be sleeping in Father’s rooms from now on because they're getting married.”

“Oh.” It felt like the world was tipping out from under her feet. “Well then. I think I should check and make sure Sheris has everything she needs, since she’s staying here. With us.” Revan had no idea where this calm facade was coming from. Her real self? Jedi training? It certainly didn't come from Deralia, where a practical part of her mind was rattling through dozens of ways to call someone a child-stealing schutta.

“Are you okay?” Wide gray eyes looked at her. “Mother, I still love you best, even if I get a stepmother too. It's not the same thing.”

“No, it's not the same thing. That… datapad. You didn't—you didn't give it to her?”

“Was I supposed to?” Korrie shook his head. “No. You said it was for you. She’s not you.”

“That’s right, Korrie.” The datapad. Thoughts to share with her other self. Not—this woman… who was someone else. Someone here. I want to kill her. I want to stab my lightsaber through her lying guts and—

No. No. Think.

“Give me the datapad back. Now.”

“Okay.” He shrugged and reached under his chair, pulling it out from the magnetized surface. “It was weird you had me hide it in the first place.”

“It doesn't matter now.” She shoved it in her pocket. “Work on your homework, okay? You’ll have a lot to catch up with tomorrow.”

“Sure,” he nodded. “Maybe later we could go visit the Jedi downstairs?”

Revan smiled. “Of course.” Someone must answer for this.

Xxx

“I’m here to see Arca,” Aemelie told the Cathar in the gilded cage. “Sith Lord Arca? We have a mutual acquaintance who needs my assistance.”
“We’re closed.” The Cathar’s eyes were fixed at some point behind Aemelie. “Moms’ Brothel is closed for remodeling. Please come back at a future time. Are you on our mailing list? The comm number is eight-oh six—”

“I’m here to see Arca,” Aemelie repeated, a little less pleasantly to the Cathar who still wouldn’t look her in the eye. Did the woman hold a grudge about their planetary invasion? Surely not, it had been years ago.

“—nine, five, three, eight, zed….” The Cathar was still rattling off numbers.

“I think it’s a holocron,” Siva said. “A recording. Like a barbarian advertisement.”

Aemelie frowned, glancing back at the Rialis girl. “Really? It’s very lifelike.” She raised her blaster, and the thing didn’t respond. She stepped forward and waved her hand through the woman’s body. Siva was right. “That’s very strange.” She had a bad feeling. “They might be in danger.”

Or already dead. Either way, she had an obligation to see this through—both for the Third Wife of Ordo, who would never appreciate it; and for her friend, Seriina Wen, who seemed to be woefully misguided if she was consorting with Sith scum in her quest for vengeance.

“Unstealth.” A show of force might work, where subtlety had not.

Around her, the women’s band she had assembled all appeared, all wearing swords and robes, as was proper for a sand hunt. “Hello,” she repeated. “We’re here to see Seriina Wen. If you’ve harmed her, or her family, in any way, we have enough explosives to blow this entire platform into the bowels of your city-planet. Those explosives will also detonate if you fire on us.”

Maybe, if their finely crafted Baragwin shields failed. This was no suicide run; just an attempt to avoid any unpleasantness later.

Nothing.

“Lay the charges at the door,” she sighed. She feared the worst. Coruscant’s Underground was a barbarous place, and where was safety for a mother and her child with no clan? Seriina’s husband was a pleasant fellow, but no warrior. And Seriina had even left her prized rifle behind in their hastily-abandoned hotel room. Aemelie adjusted the strap of it across her own chest.

“Wait—” a voice said, over the speaker.

XXX

The Senator hid his own movements, of course; but Revan had gotten good at figuring out where he was by what blanked out. Or what someone else had blocked. At the moment, the entire feed of what had once been the D’Reev Knight apartments was empty, showing white room after room; quiet and deserted. She stared at the billowing curtains in front of the balcony for several minutes before she caught the loop in the feed, the point where those curtains repeated their pattern of wind and movement, instead of continuing to be random. Her pulse pounded in her ears as she realized what that meant.

The door to their apartments was locked, but now that she knew, she felt the two within as easily as the durasteel under her fingers. Durasteel that could give way like plimsi, when the Force blasted it open… but Revan knocked instead.

“You may enter,” said a woman’s voice. The door slid open under Revan’s fingers.
Malak was sitting in the room’s only chair, and Sheris Loran’s body sat cross legged on the neatly-made bed. Both were fully dressed, and dressed like Jedi Padawans. They both turned and looked at her, and for a moment in the Force, it was like looking back in time. Outlined in the late morning light, Dustil’s broad shoulders and tousled hair could have been Malak’s own. Revan realized that her mouth was dry, and her heart was beating much too fast.

“You woke up,” she said stupidly to Malak. “I-I had heard you were unconscious.”

David said possibly drugged. Was that a lie too?

“I woke up,” he agreed. “Hello, again, Red.”

“Hello, Malak.” She paused. “Hello, Dar’Revan.”

Dar’Manda was one of the worst insults in the Mandalorian language. It meant no longer Mandalorian. It meant clanless. It meant being nothing. Dar’Jetti meant no longer Jedi. Dar’Revan was...

No longer me. Not me. Never me.

A smile that Revan didn’t recognize at all crossed the woman’s face. “Dar’Revan? Is that your insult? If you came intending to intimidate Malachi with some foolish display of your power against us, I disabled the security feed.”

“I know that. I checked to make sure this room was secure.”

“Did you?” Her own face was carefully blank. “That’s more foresight than I expected.”

She kept seeing Davad’s broken face, Oerin’s dead eyes. Kae. All three of them, and what they had done to the Jedi, to innocents—

“I’m a master strategist,” Revan muttered. “Have you seen the vids? Don’t you realize, this is all part of my plan?”

The woman laughed. She shook her head, and an ugly smirk twisted her features. “Overlooking the most predictable threat. Rather a pattern of yours.”

“You’re not a threat, Sheris.”

“No? I could take everything you possess, by Coruscanti law. My memories precede yours, and my body is an exact copy, down to its cells.”

It is? That’s… that’s insane. Obscene.

Revan gritted her teeth into a smile. “You could present your case to the Senate. I’m the hero of the Star Forge. You’re the Sith Lord who fracked the entire galaxy. Who do you think will end up in a stasis tank on a prison moon?”

The woman nodded, slowly smiling back. “More acumen than I expected from a woman who killed the Progenitor to see a map.” She paused, fingerling whatever it was she was holding in her pocket. Whatever it was, it was too small to be a saber. “All those noble, dead companions. You nearly made Malak look restrained, there at the end.”

“Red.” Malak’s voice wasn’t his—but it was. “Don’t.”

The feeling of… jealousy was… wrong. It spiked her anger. “You deserve each other,” Revan muttered. “I should send you both back to hell, but I need you. Something’s happened. Something… besides this. Worse than you.”

“You think you’re in charge?” That laugh. The woman smiled, and got up from the bed. One hand was in the pockets of her immaculate Padawan robes, the other hung loose, fingers slightly curved, as if she was waiting to pull on the Force. “You’re nothing, smuggler. Merely a fragment of me.” She gestured to the bed. “But a useful one. Sit down and listen, Fragment.”

Xxx

There were more than two dozen of them, all young, and all (if red lightsabers meant anything) Sith, and none of them trying to kill anyone. Instead, after herding the rancor away, they surrounded Carth and Mission, and watched as Hawk’s jets opened, and discharged a wall of flame over the jungle, practically on top of them. No one except Carth seemed surprised or concerned; and so he just stood there like a dumb nerf, while the accelerant was quickly followed by some kind of flame retardant, and then the ship banked and settled on the still-smoldering bare earth.

“We could have just done this in the first place,” Mission whirred. “But no, Spikey here said we had to walk.”

“It is customary to approach the Abbey on foot,” the kid said. “Shedding sweat and blood upon the world, emphasizes the physical state of our beings, which is part of the path to enlightenment.”

“That sounds pretty specist to me,” she snapped back. “Some of us don’t sweat. Or bleed. And I have mud in my treads.”

“You are the strangest machine I have ever spoken to,” he murmured, glancing at Carth. “Did you program her? It?”

“Her,” Carth said. “Her name is Mission.”

“A mission is a task, yes? Not a name?” Takan said gravely. Around them, the other kids were leaving, melting back into the jungle. “Do all droids receive the names of tasks?”

“Is there no HoloNet on your planet?” Mission scoffed. “Mission is a very famous name.”

“I don’t know what that is,” the Zabrak frowned, glancing down at her. “You mean, broadcasts from other worlds? No.”

“Wow.” The lights flashed on her dome. “No wonder I can’t even get a signal.”

The hatch opened, and Zaalbar emerged, teeth bared, as he looked at their escort.

“I told you not to fly into the tree line, Mission. The stabilizers will need repair now. Are these cubs for us to rescue? But Sith? Is this like Korriban? One of their training grounds?”

“I don’t know.” Carth answered. Did D’Reev know there were Sith here? He must have. So is he in league with them?

“Did you try and comm Coruscant from the ship?” he asked carefully, careful not to mention her name. Either of her names. He should warn her about this. More Sith. Maybe D’Reev knew. Carth should warn Revan.

Unless she already knows.
“No signal,” Zaalbar groaned. “But I sent a widebeam to my world, off this sun’s shadow. They will pass word on.”

“Maybe,” Mission’s voder hissed. “If that asshole computer wants to. She can’t be trusted.”

“But she is a part of you,” Zaalbar looked upset.

“Not anymore!” Mission beeped something, too fast for Carth to catch.

Zalbaar’s teeth bared. “Mission, that is not fair, you must—”

“You’re a Wookiee,” Takan interrupted. He sounded like any other kid. He’d put the lightsaber away again. They all had. The rancor was… gone. Gone—not dead. The Sith kids had scared it off, but not killed it. “I’ve never seen one before.”

“Iridonians hunted Trandoshans, in ages past,” Zaalbar growled. “Your people are good at combat.”

“He says it’s nice to meet you to,” Mission translated. “Are we close to your village, or what?”

“Are we close?” she repeated. “We’re kind of on a schedule here, Spikey.”

“Just up the hill,” he said. “But your droid will have to wait outside. There are a thousand steps to climb, and we are forbidden to use the Force within the walls. Otherwise I could levitate it—her; but I must not. Not in there.”

“You can?” Carth tried not to be unsettled. When she growled, she sounded exactly like Revan.

“A little,” she whirred in Basic. “Enough to get up some stupid steps. See?”

Jets fired, and the T3 unit raised up, hovering half a meter above the ground.

“You can fly, but it drains the batteries,” Zaalbar barked. “I will carry you, Mission, instead.”

XXX

The door slid open, revealing a Human man, well-aged; dressed in clothing suitable for combat. The human had an unlit lightsaber in one hand, gripping the hilt with an air of experience. His other hand was raised, fingers open, in a gesture of Jedi trickery, and not peace.

“Lord Arca, I presume,” Aemelie said. “You will surrender the Wen family to us immediately.”

“You presume wrong.” The Human’s hand moved. “You are mistaken. There is nothing for you here. Return to your families.”

“Of course. We were wrong. There is nothing—” That was truly strange, because Aemelie had been sure. The tracker could not be mistaken. “Wait!” Unseasonable anger rose in her breast, as she realized what had almost just happened. “We’re Mandalorian. Try one of your hu’tuun Force tricks again, and we will raze your tiny brothel from orbit.”

One gray eyebrow raised. “I see. Well then, you would not shame Ordo with such an honorless attack.” His Mandalorian was flawless, for a barbarian Sith. “We are defenseless here, and there is no asset to be gained.”

“You are Sith,” she pointed out. “Hardly defenseless.”

He snorted. “No. I’m not Sith. My name is Master Vrook Lamar. And yours is Aemelie, of Clan Ordo. We met once. Briefly.”

She frowned. “I don’t remember.” Then again, barbarians all looked alike, with no armor or tattoos to distinguish their bland and barbarous features. The one’s hair was thinning slightly, and all iron-gray, the color of ship-grade durasteel.

“We met at one of D’Reev’s displays. Mandalorians on one side, Jedi Council on the other. A show of unity.” The Jedi shrugged. “It’s not important. You must stop hunting this family.” He frowned. “I hesitate to say, ‘please,’ because it would serve no purpose—”

“Politeness is always a purpose. Are they unharmed?” If he were truly a Jedi, presumably they were. Then again, Revan was a Jedi, and she had murdered thousands personally. If Aemelie’s theory about Seriina Wen being related to the late Polla Organa’s husband was correct, she had even murdered members of Seriina’s own family.

“They are.” He frowned. “And I intend to ensure they remain that way.”

Aemelie frowned. “If that is true, we are not enemies. I came to dissuade my friend, Seriina Wen, from making a rash choice. I believe she has some grievance against Revan Starfire that she will not win. As Second Wife of Ordo, if their dispute is escalated to official channels, I would have no choice but to follow Clan.” She shifted on her feet, well aware of the others at her back. “I’m worried about her.”

The Jedi smiled slightly. “I believe you are.”

“Just let her in, Lammikins.” A female voice interrupted.

The man glanced back towards the shadows behind him. “I was planning on it.”

“Then stop wastin time and makin my scrubbers work overtime. Air’s bad out today. Bring them inside.”

Jedi Vrook Lamar smiled. “You may enter.”

“Dessa, take the others back to camp,” Aemelie ordered. “I think I can manage things from here.” The less that was known would be the less that was spoken; and she didn’t want to implicate anyone else, if it came down to betraying Clan for her friend.

Dessa frowned. “I’m not—”

“Yes. You’re not.” Aemelie pointed up, indicating the sky. “I am. Go. Now.”

Without more objection, her second left, trailed by the others. Reislala glanced back, and Aemelie made a mental note to keep an eye on her. Curiosity was only a useful trait when there was something that wasn’t private Ordo business.

The door closed behind them with the finality of an airlock. “You said the air is bad?” Aemelie asked. “We did check for toxins upon our descent, but found nothing unusual, for a planet of this population density with a lack of a centralized sewer.”
“Sometimes it makes me cough.” The woman stepped forward, into the overlight. Green hair, also well-aged, and wearing a metal dress that was horribly inadequate as armor. Her black eyes narrowed and she stared at Aemelie. “You’re one of the ones who had our son, right? I never forget a face. Saw you at the wedding. And that thing on the Senate. He was standin right next to you.”

“Wedding?” Son? “We don’t kidnap children.” Aemelie told her. “Not in times of peace. Unless your son is Therion D’Cainen, we have no captives either, at present.”

“Our son,” the woman corrected her. “Lammikins and me. Our son is Mekel Jin.”

“Oh!” She looked between them. Gwenarius could probably make an assessment based on their phenotypes, but the only resemblance Aemelie noticed was that woman had Jin’s same black eyes. “He went back to the Jedi. I’m not exactly sure of his whereabouts at present, but if you would like me to locate him for you, in exchange for words with Seriina—”

“My name isn’t Seriina, Aemelie.” Seriina’s voice. And there she was, framed by the Jedi and the green-haired woman, her dark hair brushed all in her face, as if to hide it, her husband trailing behind her, as was proper. They both appeared unharmed, and the form-fitting gown Seriina wore suited her, even if it seemed inappropriate for a dwelling practically in a sewer. The Deralian smiled, rueful and direct, in that way she had that Aemelie respected. “My name is Polla. Polla Organa.” She paused. “Wen. That part’s true. Polla Organa Wen.” She reached back and grabbed her husband’s arm, as if for support. “And this is my husband.”

“You’re related to the Seiran Wen Revan had killed? Polla Organa’s husband?” Aemelie nodded. “I knew it! You know you can’t seek vengeance against—”

“No. I am her. Revan didn’t kill me. Or my family. This is Seiran.” Polla Organa Wen took a deep breath, pulling away from her husband and hugging her own ribs, as if her garment provided inadequate protection. “No one killed us. Is Revan Starfire going around saying that she killed us?”

“I thought it was implied. She has said that you were dead on multiple occasions.” Aemelie frowned. “Based on my understanding of the primitive inheritance laws of the Republic, her own status would be jeopardized by you being alive?”

“I guess? I’m not an expert on Republic laws.”

“I don’t think my niece would want you to come to any harm. I’ve said that before,” the Jedi broke in, interrupting them.

“Revan,” the man said, even as she drew the same conclusion.

The green-haired woman laughed. “I like this Mandie chit, she’s funny.”

“I am,” Aemelie agreed. “But usually the jokes don’t translate well in your tongue.” She smiled as she continued her interrogation of the old Jedi. “So Revan is your sibling’s… child?”

“My brother. Yes. I’m her uncle.”

“By blood, adoption, or marriage?”
“Yes,” he said simply, proving that at least one barbarian Jedi understood not to insult them by making distinctions between the three ties, which were all women’s business, and none of his.

“And Mekel Jin is your son, by one of the three.”

“By me!” Green Hair wrinkled her face with indignation. “Wasn’t any three there. Just us two!”

“So Mekel Jin is Revan’s….”

“Cousin.” Vrook said. “My son would be her cousin.”

“It’s kinda like we’re all family here,” the green-haired woman said, grasping the nuance, if not the ramifications. “Why don’t we all sit down in Reception and beat this out?”

“With what kind of weapons?” Aemelie asked. “I only brought explosives and my swords.” She took the rifle out from under her cloak. “And this, of course.” She held it out to Serina—Polla. She would have to get used to that new name, but not so used to it that she accidentally said it in front of the other wives.

The green-haired woman laughed again.

“You brought it back to me?” Her joyous expression showed that Polla Organa Wen understood the value of a good scope. “Thanks!”

“Don’t leave it behind again,” Aemelie warned her. “It was very well made, by one of the Wies crones. I noticed that before, but since we were pretending to be Nabooans, I couldn’t mention it.”

“Seiren got for me.”

“Pawn shop back home.” The Deralian man shrugged. “I thought it was a nice piece too.”

“You have good taste,” Aemelie told him. “For a man.”

“We should break out the spiced cookies,” Mekel Jin’s mother said. “Lammikins, do you remember where I put the box?”

Polla Organa Wen made a snorting noise with her mouth. “How’s Dxun?” she asked Aemelie. “Is he walking yet?”

“Yes! And he’s put on another kilo. How is Abasen?”

“He’s sitting up.” The woman’s smile was natural as Aemelie remembered. “Want to see?”

“Of course.” Aemelie glanced behind her, tapping on the comm to tell the others to say nothing, when they returned to base. There was no threat here, and the woman’s hunt was done.

“Dxun?” Revan’s uncle broke in. “If you don’t mind me asking, what are the Mandalorians doing on—”

“It’s just a name,” Polla told him. “And I guess a moon, right?” She smiled at Aemelie again. “I remember you said that before.”

“A moon of Onderon.” Aemelie said. “Yes. And a name. Dxun is my son’s name.” Gwenarius had been furious. So amusing. “A name. Just like Malachor.”
The hallway was ancient and arching and layered with stone and wood. The air smelled sweet, and there were actual torches burning with real flame inset along the walls. To Carth’s eyes, it looked like something straight out of a vid about ancient, preflight times.

The woman who greeted them was cut from the same cloth. Humanid, but impossibly tall—almost as tall as Zaalbar. Thin and bald, dressed in white robes, her face was as ovoid and blank as an egg, with deep, dark eyes, lined with lashes so thick they seemed insectine.

“I am the Abbess,” the woman said, opening her hands. “Welcome to the Order of the Holy Nebula.”

“I’m Carth Onasi,” Carth said. “And these are—this is my companion, Zaalbar of the Eiweorr Branch.”

“She smells wrong,” Zaalbar groaned, half under his breath. “This is a madclaw place.”

Mission beeped, but had the smarts not to say anything else.

“What can your droid translate the beast’s tongue?” The woman’s voice was mild. Carth had never seen a species like her before: hairless, with skin like oil on water, swirling in a mix of colors that formed a pattern across its surface.

“Yes,” he said.

“The beast says that it is an honor to meet you,” Mission rattled off. “And he wants to know why you don’t have connections to the Nets or the outside galaxy, and why you are raising a bunch of Sith kids; and also, what is your connection to Malachi D’Reev.”

“I think I’ll take the negotiations from here, Zaalbar,” Carth said. He put his hand on Mission’s dome to reassure her.

“I will answer all of those questions,” the Abbess said. “But one at a time, and perhaps over a meal.”

Zaalbar groaned. “I am hungry, Friend Carth.”

“Sure,” Carth said. “We can eat anything, as long as it’s not rancor.”

“We do not eat the Mothers,” the Abbess said. “Or any other creature who can serve the One.”

“The one what?” Carth asked.

The Abbess laughed. “I guess you would say... god? Gods?”

XXX

“I’m not sitting down. Frack you.” Polla would have thrown something. A plate, a knife, a bottle. A punch. Wiped that smug look off that mirror-face. “Frack you, Dar’Revan! You have no idea what’s happening! You have no right to my son!” Revan struggled to remain calm, collect her thoughts to tell them, find out what she needed to know; but when she took a breath, the woman interrupted.

“Dar’Revan? Really? Are you reduced to slinging Mandalorian insults, Fragment? I am not the one who is ‘Dar,’ or ‘formerly,’ Revan here: that would be you. You are formerly me, and now just the “Dar’Revan,” Revan repeated. “Get used to the name.” The woman was weak, as weak as Sheris had been. She could feel that now too—like a part of Dar’Revan was cringing, terrified—even if she was too well-trained to ever let it show on her face.

Their eyes locked. It was chilling, seeing that same expression she’d seen before only in a mirror.

And then, Dar’Revan laughed. “I have no idea what’s happened? I’ll tell you what’s happened. The Order’s in ruins; Arca’s proclaimed herself Ambassador to Ziost; my plague is ravaging the Core and we don’t have enough vaccine to protect our population; my husband is a Force ghost in an underage boy; someone is hunting Jedi not by my orders; no one seems to know the location of the remnants of my Fleet; you’ve done something to disable my remote access to the Rakatan mainframes; and I believe there was a coup on Dromund Kaas. The Dark Council’s back under Tenebrae’s thumb—they probably ran back to him crying for their pathetic little lives after he used Malak to sabotage everything I made….”

Dar’Revan paused to glare at Malak. “And I’m still not convinced he didn’t make more copies of you, by the way, my love.” Her lip curled as she added the endearment, dripping with disdain.

For a sick moment, Revan almost wanted to punch her on Malak’s behalf.

“You sound mad.” Malak glared back at her. “You sound insane to me. Red doesn’t know half of that, so I can’t imagine what you sound like to her.”

“That’s not her name.” The woman snapped, a heartbeat before Revan could herself.

“She’s you.” He rubbed the shadow of a beard on Dustil’s face, looking between them. “Two of you. Poor Sheris never stood a chance.”

“I’m not her,” Revan snapped. “I’m nothing like her. I’m not fracking insane.”

“No?” Malak got up from his chair and walked closer to her, close enough that she had to tilt her head to meet his eyes. “You both tried to kill me, separately, the last time we spoke—almost the last time.” His eyes looked down at the saber Revan realized she was now holding in her hand. “Are you here to try again?”

She stared up at him. Dustil’s eyes were darker than his father’s, but it hurt, how much his face looked like Carth’s. “She might have tried to kill you. I did kill you.”

“Yes.” He nodded, and for a moment the memory stood between them; like an echo in the Force. The taste of blood in her mouth, and the madness in his eyes. That final, desperate fight. His hand reached out, but Revan took a step backwards, before he could touch her. “We both remember that.” He smiled slightly. “We’ll always have that.”

Revan swallowed hard. Always? What about Carth’s son? But he was staring at her, and her mouth opened, traitorous, as the words of their last conversation on the Star Forge echoed in her head. “Would you? Have done it differently? If they saved you, not me?”

XXX

“You set me on this path, Revan. I wonder if our positions were reversed and I had been saved by the Council, would I have done things differently?”

"Probably, Mal, you always were weak." She staggered a little. She was more injured than she wanted him to see.

XXX

""With the Council?" He looked away. "I don’t know."

"Could I have saved you?"

"I don’t know," he repeated. "Not according to her."

"You asked her?" She wouldn’t look at the woman.

"She had a lot of questions." He hesitated. "It came up."

"She wasn’t there." Sometimes in her dreams, she still saved all of them. Even Malak.

XXX

His dying eyes glittered. "Save me," he whispered. "I remember how it was between us. I know what there is between us, even if you do not. I know what we must reclaim. Save me, Revan. Save me, Red."

"No." She raised her hand and took the last bit of life from his body, drinking it greedily, like a glass of cool wine. And then he died.

XXX

"He was the Emperor’s pawn. You had no choice but to kill him," her own voice interrupted from behind them. "But you should have saved the Star Forge. From what Malak tells me it had already surpassed all my estimates of its operating capacity."

"The Republic was trying to ram their entire fleet of ships into it," Revan snapped. "Was I supposed to steer it away? Hide it behind a moon?"

"You were a blundering fool. A terentatek the Jedi unleashed on the galaxy. They made you broken on purpose." The woman’s scorn was evident in her voice. "Pity they couldn’t control their own creation."

"Like you made Sheris?" Revan turned her head and met her eyes. "Did you break her on purpose too?"

The woman with her face glared back. "Yes, Fragment. I did. Her and every other Jedi we selected to follow us, after Malachor." She raised her eyebrows. "Surely, someone has told you that much. The destruction of so many lives screamed through the Force. Many who died there had ties to us; and we felt each one end. In order to control the Sith, we needed to be Sith. All of us who… could." She shrugged, as if it were nothing, but Revan saw her fingers clench, the pulse in her neck shiver. "Quite a few just went insane. That was… regrettable."

Revan thought of Davad again. She thought of Beya, Polla Organa’s cousin. The best friend that she could barely remember. Others from the Selkath Ten. Mad Master Kae, who had twisted her own son.

"Why?" Nothing you can tell me is worth that.

"I told you why. To make an end. To control the Sith." The woman sounded impatient.
“Like those are the same things?”

“You’re a fragment, you can’t understand.” The woman looked to Malak. “You told her nothing?”

“If I could forget myself, I would,” he muttered. “I told her what she needed to know. I told her enough to protect our son, not chase after the Sithspawned Dark Council.”

“Apparently, you didn’t tell her enough, since our son isn’t safe as long as someone is killing Jedi, manipulating the Council, and releasing plague into the Underground.” The woman actually laughed. “Someone not us.”

“Is there a Council left?” Revan demanded. And he’s not your son.

“You don’t know?” The woman shook her head. “Oh, Fragment. All that power and the Jedi made you stupid.”

XXX

“We are not Sith.” The Abbess smiled, correcting herself. “Or rather, I am not Sith. The children… they were raised to be Sith. That is true.”

“And you rescued them?” Carth was hopeful. No one was trying to kill them. It didn’t seem like Korriban here. The dining hall was well-lit, if slightly institutional. If anything, it reminded him of his old days, back at the Corellian Academy. When he and Morgana had just been two hayseeds from Telos, caught in Coronet City.

“Rescued? I’m educating them.”

A Zabrak girl, wearing white, set another course in front of them. It looked like soup.

“The boy—Takan, he said he was from Iridonia. That’s not a Sith world.”

“Madclaw,” Zaalbar growled. “Ask her why she thinks the children are Sith.”

Mission beeped and whirled her dome. “Translation: When was this installation initiated? When did you begin raising Sith children here?”

The Abbess picked up her fork, swirling her soup. Her nails were very long and painted red. “It has been a tradition of the Order of the Holy Nebula to educate the young for a long time. These children in this Enclave are orphans, of course; but some families send their young to be educated by us too. We teach them history, discipline, and weapons training. Also galactic interstellar calculus. The Order of the Holy Nebula is approximately one thousand years old.”

Mission made a whirring noise.

Carth took a sip from his wine glass to be polite. Then a forkful of awkward soup. There was a long silence, broken only by the sound of Zaalbar’s teeth, worrying at one of the nerf ribs that had been set before him.

“I took some interstellar calculus,” Carth finally offered. “It’s no joke.”

“Our academic curriculum is quite rigorous,” the Abbess agreed. “I have been told that you have a son.”

“D’Reev told you already.” Of course he had. Carth cleared his throat. “Pardon me, sister, but I don’t want to keep beating around the bush. If there’s any way you can help get my son back—”
“Back?” She frowned. “I was under the impression that this is a case of Force possession.”

“It is. Yes.”

“I taught Malak’s mother,” the Abbess said. “I had once hoped to teach the boy as well, but his father chose the Jedi instead. Malak visited only once. A well-grown man. He looked very like Ilyana, except with more masculine attributes.”

“Zaalbar says stop rambling and get to the point,” Mission snapped.

“I did not hear the Wookiee speak at all,” the Abbess said.

“Get your ears checked then.” Mission’s voder made a noise that made Carth almost laugh, despite himself. Despite the… insanity of everything.

But instead, he cleared his throat. “Are you saying… Malak’s mother was a Sith?”

“No.” The Abbess shook her head. “Malak’s mother was a priestess, who served the One, in some of his or her incarnations. Is your son displaying any signs of any personalities besides Malak D’Reev? Could your son be possessed by the One assuming the form of Malak?”

“What?” Carth tried to make heads or hyperdrive from that and failed.

“I think you would know,” the Abbess sighed. “How is Malak adjusting to his new body?”

“It’s my son’s body,” Carth growled.

“Of course.” She inclined her head, and speared a tomato with her fork. “I meant no offense.”

XXX

“She’s not stupid.” Malak, coming to her defense. Her defense and not his soon-to-be-wife-again’s defense.

“Or weak,” Revan muttered, glaring at Dar’Revan.

“You came to us for a reason,” Dar’Revan’s head turned to Malak and then back to Revan. “The Force was screaming with it. Something happened. Do we need to guess? Is this all a game to you?”

“I don’t care what you do.” It was a bad lie. “Yes, something fracking happened. I went to the Jedi Temple and it… wasn’t deserted.”

“Did you kill anyone important? Not that I’d trust your judgement. So much power, and no thought.”

“I’d rather be strong than weak,” Revan taunted her.

“Oh? There’s a power in weakness. A… shadow. Hiding in the shadow. Beneath strength. Like me with you. You’re the shadow that I have to hide behind.” The woman frowned, rubbing her head suddenly. “But something’s… something’s changed. What did you do?”

“She’s dead?” Revan couldn’t read her own expression. It was like suddenly the mask was gone, leaving only a strange blankness.
“She’s gone.”

“You mean that’s what she wants you think.” The woman grimaced, turning her head away. “You seem like you’d be easy to fool.”

“I mean she’s gone. From this planet, at least. Hopefully from the Force entirely.”

“Hope.” The woman snorted. “Is that what Master Zhar told you to have on Dantooine?” She paused. “I watched all the vids, you know. Where is that Captain of yours now? Malak doesn’t seem to have any idea.”

“Shut the frack up.” She was tired, suddenly. Exhausted. Terrified that she’d made the wrong choice. What else could I have done? Would the woman in front of her have made different choices? Better ones? “You lost. Malak killed you. The Jedi made you disappear. Whatever your crazy plan was, it didn’t work.”

“It was working. I have to make it work again,” the woman said. “Before it’s too late.”

“You want to go kill the Emperor of the Sith, who may or may not even fricking exist?” Revan shrugged. “Go. Frack off to Dromund Kaas. I’ll buy you a ship myself.”

This—this was what she’d pinned her hopes on? This was what her memories did?

“I don’t like you,” she added.

“That hardly matters, Fragment.” The woman’s eyes raked over her. “You let her be alone with our son, Malak?”

“You don’t remember him.”

“I remember that you left.” Ragged breath in her chest, as Revan reached for composure.

“There’s an entire floor of Jedi two floors down,” the imposter said. “If you don’t want their interference in our lives again, calm yourself.” Her lip curled. “If you can.”

“Oh, I can.” Another breath. She closed her eyes, reaching for it. Calm. Unstable as an ice floe, but there. “Where is the holocron with my memories anyway? Before I… vanquished her, Master Kae didn’t say.”

“I dropped it.” Her mirror face was younger, without the lines she saw in the mirror, the faded marks of Sith corruption etched in her skin. The woman laughed like Sheris. She had to know how much that grated. “Completely accidental. I didn’t know what it was. One moment, I was on my flagship, preparing to give the order to kill my—Apprentice.” The hesitation was slight, but there, waver in the lip. “The next, I was in a kolto tank staring at Bastila Shan. Then, I was standing in front of Atris in the Archives. The holocron was cutting into my hands—hand.” She looked down at them both, frowning. “So I dropped it and it shattered. I suppose some of the pieces might have been recoverable, but then I ground them into the floor with the heel of my boot.”

“But Davad said—” no, he said it was a trap. Funny, she was so used to being told things were traps and going in anyway, that she’d half—expected the holocron to still exist. After all, the amount of leverage the possession of her memories would hold over any sentient would make it too valuable to destroy.
“How is Davad?” The other woman’s words were deceptively light. “I thought he’d have come with the other Jedi, but no one seems to know.”

“Apparently, he’s unkillable.” Revan willed her eyes to be daggers. “Unlike some.”

“Too sentimental? Remembering our old times together?” The other woman stalked out from behind the bed, hands held behind her back. Probably something in them, although Revan couldn’t think of what she might have that would make any difference. She would be so easy to kill, so weak in the Force—

Except you can’t. Her memories. You need them. She’s got them. And if she’s not lying, you can’t get them back.

“Sheris.” Malak’s voice that wasn’t his. She could remember that too.

“Sheris made her choice.” Her own voice coming out of that mouth that looked like hers. “What are you going to do with Davad Arkan, Fragment? Take him on as your third Mandalorian husband, or just make him crawl again?” The woman smiled. “He was good at that, if you don’t know.”

“Actually, I do.” Composure was easier now, it—it always was. Except with Him. With Malak. She wouldn’t look at him. “He just tried to kill me. Oerin Lin stopped him. Oerin Lin and… Master Kae.”

“What?” Sheris’s head turned towards Malak.

“Lin died,” he told her. “From your damned plague.”

Dar’Revan chuckled. “I know. That’s almost funny. So little Force sensitivity in their population, it should hardly affect them at all; but their one hope for the future—”

“No. It’s not funny.” That pain in the Force surrounding Oerin. All the times he’d helped—Revan took another deep breath. “Kae brought Oerin back from the dead, but he’s still… he’s dead. Rotting. Falling apart. He thinks he can’t die again, but he’s still… he’s in pain. Kae did it to him. She’s his mother, and she did that to him.”

“Touching, how sad you sound about the poor Mandalorians suffering,” Malak muttered. “Cassus Lin’s son can’t die again? We should test that. Where is he?”

“No longer on this planet.” Revan didn’t want to admit she didn’t know.

“Did you even try to kill either of them? Oerin or Kae?” The woman sounded tired. “Or did Vima Sunrider crawl in your mind and tell you to just let them go?” She frowned. “I knew something about Vima’s games with the Mando’ade. Davad did too. He should have stopped you.”

“No. Kae—Sunrider—was hurt. There was an explosion… before we came. And Davad… he’s with them. He was one of them.”

“We?” Malak made the word into a growl, twisting the boy’s voice into something deeper.

“We,” she repeated. Me and my Mandalorian army and it’s none of your fracking business. “At first I thought… Kae was injured, we tried to help; but then Davad came, and he—he was changed.”
“The Onderonite was always a loyal beast,” Dar’Revan muttered. “What do you mean, changed?”

Revan tried not to shiver. “He told me about you,” she added. “He told me to ask you about him—about what happened to him. But you don’t know, do you? You don’t know what he is?”

“He’d be the heir to Onderon, if he went back.” Sheris’s smile twisted. “Maybe you should go with him, Fragment.”

Revan thought about the datapad she had left with Korrie. Hopelessly naive. I thought I could trust you and you’d trust me. Maybe she was better off. If this was Revan, then Revan was a fricking bitch.

Davad said she was insane too. Of course, that was in between trying to kill me and those shadows of Lin’s. He’s hardly impartial.

“The shadows,” she said out loud. “We met some of them too. Force-sensitive assassins, trained to kill or convert Jedi? That was your idea?”

“We’re not your advisors,” Dar’Rev—Sheris snapped. “This isn’t going to be some sort of history lesson. I have an entire life. You only have three years.”

“You let her see Korrie?” She turned her gaze to Malak. He was standing up now, composure gone, boy’s shoulders hunched. Shame? Guilt? Rage? She didn’t fricking care.

“Yes.” Those brown eyes met hers, expression unreadable. “Malachor thinks she’s Sheris. She wouldn’t betray that trust—it would confuse him too much. Hurt him. She understands that.”

“What did that Sheris say to him?” the woman broke in. “You still haven’t told me, Mal.”

“I wasn’t there. He just told me she was mean.”

“Hopefully, his opinion has changed,” the woman paced, coming closer. Her hand was still held behind her back. “I read him a story. His hair should be cut. And that tooth needs to be repaired.”

“Teeth?” Revan narrowed her eyes. “Stay away from my son’s teeth.”

“Have them attended to and I will.”

“I-I am planning on that.” She had been, except the events of the past month had overtaken any mundane worries like finding an orthodontic droid licensed to work on a Senator’s heir.

The woman continued, on, rattling off orders like she was still in charge. “I think it’s better Malachi doesn’t know about my return. I’ve watched how he’s using you, and for the most part, it’s appropriate. A little fear in the Senatorial Houses will keep Malachor safe. But we need to regain trust in the Fleet.” She glanced at Malak. “He didn’t even get an accurate count of the current Republic forces, or the factory capacity on Kuat and Byss. Tenebrae’s threat isn’t only through Force possession; if his forces retake Ziosk, they’ll have access to the mining worlds, and the slave planets. If he can mobilize that labor to rebuild all their arsenal, he’ll strike here.” Her hand fell to her side and finally pulled out the thing she’d been fingering in her pocket. A comm unit, switched on. “Did you get all of that, HK? And do you agree?”

“Happy Assurance: Yes, Master. You were correct: the tonal variations in speech are not a precise match; but close enough to fool any organic brain less functional than yours. Observation: There are syntactical difference that coincide with an Outlier colony background between the Fragment and yourself.”
“You… is that my HK unit?” It didn’t sound like Malachi’s.

“You?” The woman actually chuckled. “Yours? You know, he does excellent imitations of your old companions. Have you heard them?”

“HK.” She darted a glance at Malak, but he was just… sitting there, eyes slightly unfocused. Meditating? Useless. “Come here. Now.”

Sheris chuckled again, turning her head towards the door.

“What did you do to my droid?” Revan felt the hilt of her saber, and tried to stay calm.

“Your droid?” The woman twisted one of her braids, smiling back at her.

The HK unit loomed in the now-open doorway. “Sporting Disclosure: My Primary Master has fully restored my sentient core to its full capacity. Upon her command, if the Meatbag Master, or the Original Meatbag displease her in any way; I am authorized to dismantle them in whatever imaginative, gruesome, and unsuspecting method is most pleasing to my circuits at the time.”

“HK.” That… bitch! “I am your Primary Master. Not her. Stand down.”

“Objection: Fragment of a Master, you abandoned me, cruelly disconnected, with my lethal capacitors disabled in an enclave of pacifists. It was a severe test of loyalties, even for someone programmed with my moral relativity.”

Great. And Mission’s not here to help me even try to reprogram him.

Mission. She knew Carth had taken the T3 unit, but did that mean she had no way of contacting her at all?

Do I want to? I thought she’d killed Polla, before. I know she didn’t now.

“I guess you’re evil enough for my assassin droid to like you,” Revan said. “Congratulations, Sheris.”

The women didn’t take the bait. “Much as I dislike that name, it does seem necessary to use it. For now. You may continue to call me Sheris.”

“And you can call me Revan,” Revan smiled. “Because that is who I am.”

“In public places, or areas possibly under surveillance. Obviously.”

“Jedi Revan Starfire D’Reev Lin Onasi Ordo Fett Mandalore.”

“You’ve got the order wrong,” Sheris said. “We will need to review the elementary rules of Coruscanti titles before your next diplomatic excursion.” Her eyes seemed to hover on a perfectly ordinary stain on Revan’s sleeve. “Perhaps table manners as well.”

“I think that’s Master Kae’s blood.” HK had told her the order of titles to use. Deliberate sabotage on his part? She flaked a bit of the stain off with her fingers. “Yes. Definitely blood. My table manners are better than your… manners, manners. Do you fraking hear yourself?”

“Master Kae was bleeding, and weakened, and you didn’t seize the opportunity to kill her, even though you were intelligent enough to register her as a threat?” Sheris scowled. “Did they program this rank sentimentality in, or was your smuggler persona just stupid?”

“Helpful Interjection: Although the Fragment showed innate talent for the destruction of sentient life, she did appear to make several choices with no higher brain function at all.”

Revan resisted the urge to Force push the damn droid into the wall. “Polla’s—dead. Does it matter?”

“It matters if you’re going to make choices like a criminal with no impulse control. By all accounts, that’s who she was.”

Her hands curled into fists, but Revan smiled. “Again. I am not the one who shattered the Republic and blew up half the Fleet at Malachor V.”

“More than half,” Malak muttered from his corner of the room. “A lot more than half—wasn’t it, Red?”

Sheris raised her eyebrows again. “And how widely is that known?”

“Frack if I know.” Revan thought of the reports she’d made. The attempts to analyze what she did know, and who might help. It all seemed like a fool’s game now. “I’d say it’s safe to assume that no one will give you another shot at commanding the Republic Armada. Or even a lousy fly-by. Ever again.” Because you’re nuts.

“But that’s not true.” The woman smiled slowly. “I know someone who will give us ships. An entire fleet. Armies at our command. Think, Fragment. Who?”

She didn’t need to think. “The clans don’t have ships. Some maniac in a mask blew them all up at an armistice.”

“Proud Observation: Master, sometimes watching the Fragment stumble into the correct solutions makes my circuits sing with an… almost paternal joy. Question: was that part of my programming?”

“You united the clans for me.” Sheris nodded. “Without firing a single shot at them. And no, HK. Part of your sentient response.” She shrugged. “Even I will admit, uniting the clans with D’Reev was masterfully done.”

“There were lots of shots. We killed a lot of Mandalorians—”

“But not in war.” Sheris sniffed. “Maybe Malak can explain the difference to you, since Ordo did not.”

“I don’t fracking care.”

“You don’t have to.” Sheris folded her arms. “Obviously, that’s my role. The Fleet will be a problem… does this war hero of yours love you very much?”

“Not enough to overlook my dead husband possessing his son.” Revan said. “Are you fracking insane?”

“Stop it, Red.” Malak stood up, and put a hand on Sheris’s arm. Revan was strangely pleased to see the woman flinch.
“You can’t keep calling us both that,” the woman murmured. If she was trying to sound seductive, it needed work. Her entire body was tensed, one long line of fear in the Force.

She’s afraid of Malak? Why? Revan frowned. Can I use that?

“I’ll call you Sheris, in public.” His smile twisted. “But you’re not her at all.”

Sheris pulled away from him. Poor Malak,” the woman mocked. “Have you lost your pet? I don’t think the smuggler would play the same games.”

“Careful, Red,” he murmured. His hand closed around Sheris’s wrist, and he twisted it behind her back, pulling her backwards. His other arm locked around her waist, and then he pushed her forward again, shoving with his hands and the Force, so that she landed face-down on the bed.

Immediately she rolled over and sat up, raising her own hands back. Her wave of Force pushed Dustil’s hair back from his face; but did nothing else. The golden metal hand flexed, twisting, as if she’d forgotten how to use it. With a low growl, she rolled off the bed, springing towards Malak again—”

“Stop.” Patterns in the Force. If Revan closed her eyes, she thought she could still see the trajectories of their battle, as if it had happened a hundred times before. Like it has before. In my dreams.

No one listened. Malak dodged and Sheris rolled, both movements strangely graceful, even as the Force around them seemed to charge like an electrical storm.

“Query: Is this display of violence some kind of engorged mating ritual, or will it lead to true bloodshed? Offer of Assistance: I do have several small and very cunningly concealed knives and other bladed objects secured in my appendages if the Master would like to make this exchange more viscerally interesting.”

Sheris’s head turned in the HK’s direction, but only for a moment, before her flesh hand raised, and began glowing. Lightning lashed from her fingers: weak, but still there.

Malak dodged it, easily. “Should have taken the knives.” His hand whipped out, and slammed Sheris onto the wall.

She picked herself up, slowly. “Don’t. Help. HK.”

“Objection: If the Original Meatbag kills you, I would be most distressed.”

“He… won’t.” Her mouth smiled through a swollen lip, and then her leg lashed out. Although Malak was still a meter away, his head knocked back, as if she’d landed a kick on his jaw.

“Fear makes her a little stronger,” he muttered. “But it’s not enough. Maybe you should ask your smuggler for help.” His own hand raised, and the ball of lightning that formed above his fingers did not look weak at all.

Malak was in Dustil’s body, but for a moment, Revan felt like she was back on the Star Forge again, watching him come after her, not Sheris. Looming over her, taste of copper in her mouth—or worse, lying on the floor of her flagship, hearing the scream of the vacuum, and waiting for death. Was this what fracking happened? Had they cheated the Force before, only to end up in the same cycle now? Only three of us now, instead of two. Three of us, and two innocents.

If Sheris Darkstar and Dustil Onasi could be called innocent. If they were still there at all.
Malak smiled and wiggled his fingers, the lightning spilled out of them harmlessly, spiking the air with ozone. “I won’t kill you, not yet. Revan, the real Revan, needs you.”

“Don’t touch me again.” Sheris’s eyes blazed with hate. “Ever.”

He snorted. “Did you really think I wanted to?” He let his hand drop, and Dar’Revan rolled away again, scrambling up from the floor.

“It wasn’t a betrayal. I left clues for you,” she muttered. “It’s why I sent you to Manaan. If you had taken the vaccine, paid attention, he never would have turned you against me.”

“Oh, Red. You think Tenebrae did this?” Malak started to laugh. “You put all of this in motion yourself. You failed. You lost.”

“No.” She shook her head. “He won’t be able to infiltrate some of… at least some of our worlds. He won’t be able to use you to power the Star Force—or find the other ones without me—”

“There are other Star Forges?” Revan blinked.

They both stared at her and then turned back to each other, as if they were the only sentients left in the galaxy. For a moment, Revan could almost imagine it: the two of them, facing off across a blasted world, in an eternity of broken planets, dead ships, drifting hulks in space like a scream—Like Malachor. Is this what it was like at Malachor?

“I banished three fracking Sith Lords from this planet already today,” Revan said out loud, trying to sound like she was powerful, like she was in charge.

“More likely, they had better things to do than debate their plans with smugglers.” Her mirror image levitated a cloth from a drawer near the bed and dabbed at her face, grimacing a little. “But you did say something about… Kae. And Davad before.”

“And Oerin Lin.” Malak snapped. “What does Arkan have to do with the Mandalorians?”

“Davad and Oerin were working for Kae. She’s the one trying to consolidate power against the emperor.” Revan gestured towards Sheris. “She sounds a frack of a lot like you, except instead of killing off sentients with a sickness, she wanted to do it with Davad and some Force-sucking power he has.”

“The virus was designed to block Force sensitives from the Emperor’s influence. The vaccine provoked enough of an inert antigen response to almost entirely eliminate mortality. All of that was to save lives, not end them. We were well on our way to distributing the vaccine across Sith space. The Republic was to be next, when my apprentice betrayed me, and the two of you managed to bungle everything I had done completely.”

“What Force-sucking power?” Malak interrupted.

“I saw Davad kill people. Oerin brought… soldiers with him. Shadows, he called them. They were assassins—or something—trained to… kill Jedi?”

“Not kill.” The woman snorted. “That would be a waste.”

“Davad killed eight of them by just standing there. They just… collapsed. Their bodies were still there, but inside—it was like the Force was just—gone.”
“They become one with the Force.” The woman nodded. “Yes, the shadows were Force-sensitives. Not the strong ones. The type Jedi used to steer into healing, or gardening, or their useless Mercy Corps.”

“No Not gone. Empty. Like… the Force was dead. Like pieces of it are just—gone where they were.”

“You’re saying Arkan can kill my shadows by just… standing there?” The woman shrugged. “He probably stopped their hearts. Not all things in the Force require brute strength, although that is a lesson you’ve never had to learn.”

“There are Jedi missing too. He told me that before. I think… I think he was eating them.”

“Your claim is that the Lin boy was raised from the dead, and Davad is eating the Force.” The woman waved her hand. “And that somehow, this is all part of Vima Sunrider’s plan to stop Tenebrae.”

“It’s not just a claim.”

“Vima tried to influence me with her whispers as well.” The woman shrugged. “She was very skilled with illusion. Perhaps she only made you think you saw these things.”

“The bodies should still be there.” Revan folded her arms. “Maybe you should go check.”

“The Temple was sealed, I was told.”

“We broke a window.”

“Of course you did. Shattering windows, blowing up space stations, destroying kolto production…. the woman’s laugh was bitter. “At least I have restraint.”

“I noticed, when you attacked your former husband. Just now.”

“Mal and I have been playing those games for a very long time.” But Revan had scored a hit, it was obvious, in the way those green eyes suddenly went to the window. “You will take me there now. Show me.”

“Go yourself!”

“Two,” Revan snapped.

“Two squads.” The woman nodded. “Being over prepared is better—”

“Two Mandalorians.”

“Then that was foolhardy, although I suppose you’ve learned to have confidence in your strength.” Her mouth twisted. “Master Sunrider used to have me train wearing a neural band to learn to live without mine.”

“I tried that. It almost killed me.”

“Then you should have kept trying.” Green eyes scanned her face. “Maybe it’s my destiny to train you, Fragment. Someone obviously should.”
“Stop this,” Malak said. “If we’re going to the Temple we should go now.”

“You’re not coming.” They both said it at once, at almost exactly the same time.

“Amused Commentary: Original Meatbag is restricted to the wing of the D’Reev building, according to my own subservient copy, HK 48. Unless my master would like to enact Order 27 at this time, I must continue to mindlessly obey the lesser HK unit’s derivative and sniveling orders. Observation: Master, I think I understand much of your organic frustration. Resigned Sigh: According to the same restrictions imposed by HK 48, I too am trapped here.”

“Because I need you here to watch Malachor,” Dar’Revan told it. “Compliance, HK. Remember? Delayed gratification. I promise, your time will come.”

“Confirmation: I remember.” The droid’s voice whirred.

I don’t want to know what Order 27 is. I can guess that how it would end. Malachi’s death? Or the entire building’s collapse? The planet’s? Between my homicidal droid and her....

“I’ll stay with Malachor,” Malak said. “Try not to... make anything worse.”

“Don’t worry, Mal.” The woman belted the sash of her robe. “I’ll bring the pathetic shell back to you safely.”

“Funny,” Revan snapped. It wasn’t. “I was just about to say the same thing.”

XXX

“Good morning, Ilrup Sakeen,” said the Loser.

Ilrup didn’t answer. Ilrup was a rock with a particularly vivid patch of pink lichen growing out of its top. In the right light, the lichen looked like hair sometimes, and the hollows in the rock’s surface beneath the name she’d scrawled on it looked like eyes and a mouth.

It was a good morning here on Loser’s Moon. The sun was peeking through the cloud cover, only partially hidden by the gas giant the Loser had named Rotinhell and its three other moons: Revan, Malak, and Myownstupidity. The Loser was standing on the fourth moon; a speck of rock with an improbable atmosphere, and a lot of geological problems. In another two hundred years, her ship had warned her (before she disconnected all of her ship’s warnings and scavenged the parts for polishers), this moon might tear itself apart.

“I’m getting breakfast,” she told Ilrup, and went back to the task at hand: kicking over rocks looking for more wiggling grubs. The Loser had brought enough ration bars to last for decades; but lately she’d been eating the local flora and fauna just to see what would happen. So far, the only thing that had happened was a bad case of the runs last rotation: when she tried roasting one of the beetle larva she’d found in a cave on the dark side of the moon.

The thing the Loser liked most about Loser’s Moon was that the air was clean here. No smoke. No dust. And all quiet. In the quiet, you never felt like your ship’s shielding had started to fail and the radiation was going to kill all the poor souls that someone had put under a twenty-two-year-old’s command. Especially those who had the bad luck to be on the outer decks for the fake ceremony, while you followed orders and ran back to your own shielded shuttle; setting in coordinates back to Coruscant, while around you, the Force screamed and shattered, and everyone you might have cared for, every bond you had made with your classmates, lovers, teachers, and friends, collapsed when they all died.
Meanwhile, the few friends you had that lived all went crazy orbiting Rekkiad. That was Rekkiad over there—that blue-white spark she could still see in the morning sky. The Loser jabbed her fingers in a circle and waved at it too.

Go to hell, Rekkiad.

No one would ever see, but the Loser had a new job now, following her own orders. Her job was to write every name on a stone, one for each of them. In the last (estimated) five standard years, working from the roster lists, (being in charge of the invitations had that dubious advantage), she’d managed to find the right resting places for more than ten thousand Republic souls, which was not always easy, because every rock needed to be polished first, and her ship’s power reserves were running low.

Maybe this part of Loser’s Moon had once been sea, because the Loser had found a lot of smooth stones here, some quite beautifully watermarked. That was why she’d camped here next to Ilrup in the first place.

The Loser was just bending over, reaching for an especially promising rock, which was large enough to fit all the titles for Lord High Protector Second Lieutenant Demiter Arash, when a shadow fell across the ground.

That was unexpected: nothing to cast a shadow on Loser’s Moon, nothing tall enough. It was one of the things the Loser liked about life here, that feeling that the horizon was always about to tip off and over the world, if she just stood still and let it.

The Loser looked up—and then caught her breath.

A battered starship swam across the sky, eclipsing the orange hulk of Rotinhell almost completely. Gray, battle-scarred, with that singular, sinister wedge shape she still saw in her dreams: Republic dreadnaught, just like the ill-named New Hope. A gray, battle-scarred giant dreadnaught, now orbiting around the gas giant planet of her moon.

The Aurebesh markings were meant to be seen at a distance, meant to be seen between ships; every ship in the Republic marked like a badge of honor with its name. The Loser could read this one as it scrolled past. And recognize it, even if it wasn’t one of the ships from the doomed Republic Fleet.

The letters read Aleema.

A name from another war.

The Loser heard rumors about the Sith war; even as she fled from Coruscant looking for a world where they could never find her, never question her, never make her admit her ultimate betrayal. It had taken a year to find this place: a moon where the Loser could be free. And for a long time on Loser’s Moon, she had a working HoloNet connection—at least working when her moon hit its most outward swing in orbit around Rotinhell—lit by the dying brown star.

But working HoloNet had ended when the Loser threw the console across the room one evening, watching a posthumous awards ceremony for the lost heroes of the Star Forge. The Loser didn’t bother with time now, but more had passed since then, because back then her hair was still short enough to brush her chin, instead of so long that she had to pull it back from her face and twist it into knots.
How long ago now? Maybe a few years, back in the place where people kept time. Maybe more.

So, anyway, the Loser knew. She knew whose ship that was, even if the woman who commanded it was supposed to be dead.

The Loser threw her perfectly good rock at the sky. Gravity was light here—so light that she suspected going back to civilization might be impossible for her now just because of bone density problems. There were meds for that, but the Loser had thrown them all away. The good rock practically floated, before landing a quarter kilometer away.

XXX

“I know it’s hard, Meetra.” Revan smiled sympathetically, and reached out and squeezed her hand. “What I’m asking of you is impossible. But you’re the only one who can accomplish it. We need you.”

“I know.” She did. Revan had explained it. Beya had explained it. Even Malak D’Reev, who she always felt tongue-tied and perpetually pubescent around, had explained it. “I’m not afraid of dying for our cause.”

How could she be afraid of dying for a cause? Child of a rebel on a militarized planet. She was twenty two, and half of her friends were dead back home already. How long had her people been struggling against Czerka and Systech for their independence?

As long as the Republic had been sending them aid to do so. As long as anyone could remember.

“I don’t want you to die.” Revan didn’t look so good, these days—ever since the duel. There were shadows that were almost black under her eyes, and she’d cropped the front of her hair to fit under her helmet to wear the Mandalore’s mask. She wasn’t wearing it now, at least. At least she had the guts to look Meetra in the eye.

“We need you to live, Meetra. We need you to take word back to the Jedi Council. Go back and give them the terms of their surrender.”

XXX

“I went back. But I never told them anything,” the Loser yelled at the sky. “I never told them to surrender and I refused to forget!”

They’d offered to help her forget, but she’d refused. Forgetting would mean forgetting all the ones who had died, and someone needed to remember them.

So then they had done it. Atris’ grim expression. Kavar’s disappointment. Vrook’s disgust, and Kae’s flat affect.

XXX

“You are a special case, Knight Surik,” Master Vrook said. “You have always formed strong connections with others. Unusual bonds. What happened at Malachor V seems to be echoing in you, even now. What we feel is… disturbing. Disruptive. A wound we cannot heal.”

“And that is why we must seal the breech,” Master Kavar added, flatly. “Cauterize the infection.”

“I’m sorry, my Padawan,” Atris murmured. “If I could spare you, I would.”
“Be strong, Knight Surik,” said Master Kae. “Remember, strength is not the Force. It is in you.”

XXX

The ship blocked out the sun completely. The sun, Rotinhell, Revan, Myownstupidity and half of Malak. It was moving slowly. She could route the trajectories if she wanted, figure out the speed of its orbit around Rotinhell versus the orbit of Loser’s Moon; but that would be a task for later. Right now, the Loser was just trying to hold it together long enough to get by.

“There is no emotion, there is no peace. There is no ignorance. There is no knowledge. There is no passion. there is no serenity. There is no chaos. There is no harmony.”

The Loser kicked the ground, muttering to herself and waiting for the Aleema to pass out of her horizon.

“There is no death, and there is no Force.”
“Thank you for making an accommodation at such short notice.”

“Of course.” Doctor Forza smiled, straightening in the back of her chair. Her head turned towards the sound of his voice. “It’s been some time since our last appointment, Citizen Antilles. Did you have a chance to work on some of the exercises I recommended?”

“I confess, after the first week, I had to have my dream journal burned.”

“Interesting choice of phrasing, as if you deny your agency in the task.”

“My droid burned it for me.” Malachi coughed. “There were too many incriminating details. I tend to dream vividly and accurately of events that have already happened in my life, and I was worried that some of the details might be hurtful, if someone accidentally found them.”

“I see.” She sighed. “What about the cognitive therapies?”

“Your thought records?” He resisted the urge to sneer, because the blinded Miraluka was painfully sincere, and the only therapist he could find capable of complete discretion. “Yes. I have been trying to be objective of late, to balance each negative with a possible affirmation. That is why I am here.”

“Good.” She nodded encouragingly. “Did you want to talk about any specific examples?”

“Yes.” This was very difficult. “I told you before, I was… forced to sever all ties with my grandson’s parents, because of their lifestyle choices.”

“Tough relationships can turn septic.” She nodded, ringing the chains of her headpiece. “From your descriptions of the violence, the paranoia, the poor choices of friends, the unstable environment for a child, the lack of trust on all sides….”

“Yes, all of that.” He cleared his throat. “I think the last time we spoke, I had explained that my grandson’s mother wanted to come back into our lives.”

“The one you thought was dead. Yes.” She folded her hands across her lap. “I told you to be careful.”

“I was.”

“And?”

“For the most part, we have had luck restoring some of our relationship. My grandson seems to be very pleased by her presence.”

“I’m pleased to hear that. And you find her trustworthy? I know that was a concern.”

“I do—at least in matters where our interests coincide.”

“ Matters?” Her mouth turned down. “Strange turn of phrase for your grandson.”
“No. With him I do trust her. Completely. But matters of state—business—I sometimes need to take measures to make sure she does not make mistakes.”

“You run a tea importing concern, Citizen Antilles; not an intergalactic corporation. I think you need to relax the reins, allow your daughter-in-law some room to make her own errors, and find her own path to correct them.”

“As much as possible, I am trying to do that.” He was, but that would be much easier if he was truly a mere tea merchant. “I am an old man, as you know, and I would like her to take over our family's business until my grandson is old enough to run the company himself.”

“Remember what I advised you: let your grandson make his own choices about his future.”

“As much as possible, I do.” Malachor was pleased about marrying Leeshansintina Racharn, at least; and seemed happy to be free of the Jedi for the most part. “I had arranged everything to run smoothly for the three of us when I received word that my grandson’s father was also still alive.”

The Miraluka froze. “And when you say your grandson’s father, you mean…?”

She was always after him to say the man’s name. “Yes. I mean Gregorio. My… son.” Saying the false name, cribbed from a book he’d read in his Eg years wasn't any easier than just saying ‘Malak’. Sometimes Malachi considered just paying the woman more, perhaps buying her a remote moon, and confessing all of the truth. But no. As she herself had once told him: all problems are real, and all are serious. The matter of degree matters not if the pain is real. Besides, if she refused or violated the NDA, he would have to have her killed.

“He’s alive? But you said the ship Gregorio served on was lost at the Star Forge. At the end of the war.”

“That’s what I was told. But the news was wrong. He survived.”

“I admit I am surprised. I thought you said all traces of his body had been disintegrated. It was a very vivid image you portrayed, when I asked about his memorial service. Vivid, and… angry.” Her head tilted. “You seem less angry now.”

“I did not expect to be touched to see him. And, yet I was. He also wants to be a part of our lives again.”

“What does his wife say?”

“She remarried. And my son is now engaged to the woman with whom he shared indiscretions.”

“So they are estranged.” She nodded. “That sounds normal; but I sense something in you. Disappointment? You want to be part of a united family unit again.”

Malachi blinked. It felt like something was caught in his throat. “No. Of course not. The wife is salvageable, but the man—”

“You mean your son. Your son is the man.”

“My son is dead.” He felt the pain of it again: knowing that he was lost.

“You just said he was not.” Her head tilted, and her masked face frowned. “You wish he was dead?”
“His wife asked me if I would speak to him, if I would see him. She seemed to be under the impression that he would… leave us, once we had reconciled.”

“That doesn't make sense.”

“It is a delicate balance.” He made a steeple of his hands and found them trembling. “I lied to her. I pretended not to care; but when I saw him again—spoke to him….”

“He was still your son.” Dr. Forza nodded. “How could it be different?”

Malachi coughed. “That's what I came here to discuss. How could this be different?”

“You need to open your heart.” Her smile was gentle and naive, for all that she'd been sold to slavers and had her Miralukan senses blinded as a child. “Open your heart to both of them. Even if they're not together, they're still your grandson’s parents. If they can move on and love others, you can find room to love them both.”

That might be true, if Malak hadn't chosen the most unsuitable body possible to possess. But as it was that was completely untenable. The public relations nightmare alone would be catastrophic.

“I can respect them both,” he admitted. Love was too strong a term, for two sentients who had betrayed him as badly as Revan and Malak. “But in the end I find—”

“Yes?” She leaned forward, the bells of her mask chiming.

“I find can only forgive one of them.”

“Forgive? Again, a curious turn of phrase.”

He sighed. “Only one of them can lead my company when I am gone.”

“Many companies have boards, co-heads—”

“Not… in the sectors where we have our… tea forests.” Did tea even grow on trees? It wasn't a fact Malachi had ever expected to attract his concern. “We deal with primitives. Naïfs. The work requires a very direct chain of command.”

“I see.” There was a long silence, broken only by Malachi’s cough.

“Would you like a glass of water?” Doctor Forza asked him.

“No thank you.” He glanced at his chrono. There was an Appropriations for the Mandalorian Reparations committee meeting in less than an hour, and he'd come here by public (and anonymous) car. “I should probably be going.”

“Deflection,” she sighed. “I have to remind you: sometimes it is necessary to let go. All of your concerns are small compared to the infinite. What matters most is your family’s happiness, is it not? Surely, between the three of you adults, you can find a way to embrace your differences.”

“Of course,” Malachi lied. Hopelessly naive. Sometimes he envied the innocent.

“Stay a few more moments,” she urged him. “I think you need to speak to Gregorio. Can you do that for me?”

“I don’t know… I don’t know what to say.”
He was so good with words, but presented with his son reborn, they all failed him.

Doctor Forza sighed. “Why don’t we outline some talking points…?”

XxX

“You need to do something to conceal your face.” Dar’Revan tapped a cabinet in the hall that Revan hadn’t even known was a cabinet and frowned. “But everything’s been moved.”

“Should we have the servants flogged for that?”

“Of course not, that would be completely out of proportion—” Her own face turned to look at her. “Oh. You were joking.”

“Maybe you should try it sometime.”

“I joke, when appropriate. Not now. Here.” The woman had found another cabinet, and pulled out several meters of a thin, filmy white fabric. She handed it over, and pulled out another swath in a dark gray for herself.

“It’s not necessary—” Revan began.

“Two faces like ours makes us even more memorable.” The woman draped herself in the fabric, managing to make a hood of the fabric, covering her hair. “We can both thank Malachi for stamping our face all across the galaxy."

My face. It's my face. Not ours. Not yours. “This is imperial-grade eridu, it’s not supposed to be used as a… hat.”

“These are bath towels,” the woman corrected her. “Are we going to argue about fabric? The elevators will be monitored, so you need to assume your role as my commander quite soon. I recommend you stop whining. Do you have an extra weapon?”

“I’m not arming you,” Revan muttered, wrapping the fabric around her own face.

“You need to trust me,” the woman muttered.

“You need to inspire it.” She was glad most of her features were hidden now by fabric. “I spent more than a year hearing about what an inspiring person you were. Did you get a brain transplant or something?”

That was kind of funny, so Revan laughed. How the frack did you steal HK from me? How can you and Malak be—engaged?

“I’ve heard about you as well.” The woman grimaced through the cloth, and then tugged it loose. “I suppose you’re aware, there are several vids—”

“All true,” Revan deadpanned. “Especially that one about me and Bastila. The Telosian version?”

The woman stared at her, as if for a moment she thought Revan was serious. Her lips pursed into a bitter smile. “I’m well aware of the media’s tendency to manipulate facts. As obviously salacious as that vid was, the love story made you and Bastila sympathetic. Humanizing the Jedi, if you don't mind me using a specist term, has always been difficult for the Order. The public want to believe in Jedi who behave like normal beings: quarreling, falling in love—”

“You don't believe we’re normal?” That made sense. This woman had HK’s personality with none of the charm.

“We aren't.” The woman shrugged. “But what we are doesn't matter: only what we can do.” She knotted the fabric around her neck, forming a hood that shadowed her face. “Enjoy your smuggler's memories of a more common life, because you'll never have one yourself.” She sighed. “Nor will Malachor.”

“We'll see.” It rattled Revan that she'd had the same thoughts, the same fears.

“I was sorry to hear about Bastila's end,” Dar'Revan continued, tactless as a terentatek. “It was a waste.”

“She was my friend,” Revan muttered. “It wasn't just a waste. Tell me why.”

“Why...?” The woman's back was perfectly straight, in the precise, Jedi-serene pose that Revan had never—quite—mastered.

“Why is the sky on Coruscant covered in clouds? Why is the Force in all things? Why is Hoth cold? You'll need to be more specific.”

Like you don't know what I mean? “Why did you fall?”

Dar'Revan stared at her. “Is that what you think I did?”

“You're lucky, you know. All that power, and no responsibility for its consequences.” Dar'Revan's voice was distant. “As much as I... fell, it was a calculated risk. Necessary to achieve the ends required.”

“Necessary,” Revan scoffed. “To end the Mandalorian wars? That only goes as far as Malachor V. Why did you keep on after that?”

“It was necessary,” Dar'Revan repeated.

“Because of the Sith?” Revan scoffed. “That doesn't make sense.”

“Lucky Fragment,” the woman mumbled. “Shall we stand here all afternoon reminiscing, or will you show me what you claim happened in the Jedi Temple?”

“Oh, it happened.” A part of her wanted to rub that smug version of her face in it from now until eternity. “It happened because of what you did. And I know what you did. What I don't know is why.”

The woman's voice was flat. “Why? I told you. It was necessary.”

“Necessary.” Revan's throat was dry. “I helped people. I did my best. But after I found out I was you...” She had to finish. “Malek was torturing Bastila. We had a Force bond and I could feel it. I had nightmares, but I'd always had them. I'd always had nightmares about him.” She swallowed and met the woman's eyes. “I'd always had nightmares about him; but by the time we got to Rakata Prime, all I had were those nightmares. All I wanted to do was kill him.” She bit her lip, hard enough to draw blood, blinking her eyes. Frack if she was going to cry in front of Sheris. “But I helped... others. Even after I knew. On Korriban, I helped... a lot of people. But Malak, I didn’t even try to save him. And when my friends tried to stop me—"

“I wasn’t there.” But the woman wouldn’t even meet her eyes. “You just… you just killed him. How?” She sounded like that was a serious question.

Dar’Revan nodded slowly. “Malak had to be destroyed, or Tenebrae would have controlled the Star Forge. With Tenebrae’s armies and an Infinite Fleet, the galaxy would have fallen. Everything. Sith. Republic. Any sentient with a brain larger than a tach.” Dar’Revan stared at her. “The Jedi left enough of me in you to activate the Star Map. Surely, a part of you knew that too? Or…” her voice trailed off, and she shrugged carelessly.

She’s never careless. Revan had known the woman for less than a day and she already knew that.

“Or, the computer explained the risk to you? Did the computer suggest that you should kill Malak?”

“Computer? Which one?” How would it know?

“The one controlling the Star Maps?” The woman’s head tilted, eerily matching her expression.

“That was all one computer?” Revan’s eyes widened, as her duplicate’s narrowed. “One computer? But there were like, five star maps, each one a different planet.”

“All part of a centralized web. Five installations and one computer, built by the Rakata. Surely you remember the Rakata? The ancient civilization responsible for the Star Forge?”

“Oh, them?” Revan nodded towards the hallway. “I think surveillance starts again in about six meters. The computers I saw next to the Star Maps were just computers. I know you’re attached to your machines; but I found them merely a means to an end.” You droid-stealing schutta. I need Mission to tell me what the frack you’re talking about. What you’re saying… are you saying the computer told you to do everything?

“I know where the surveillance starts.” The woman’s voice pitched higher, and her shoulders slumped as she walked forward into Malachi’s camera range, ending all discussion. “Do you know the way out of here, Lord Revan?” Her eyes were too wide and she was overdoing it with the way her lip trembled.

“I told you before, Sheris,” Revan murmured. “There’s no need to call me Lord Revan. Merely ‘Senator,’ is fine.”

What does she know about the computer? Revan thought of the headset she’d abandoned in a drawer back in the Jedi Temple. I hope it’s still there. I need to talk to Mission.

XXX

“It’s this way.” The Fragment was charging towards the main entrance of the Temple, like she knew no better. Revan caught her arm. It was almost disturbing to discover it felt no different than any other arm. She relaxed her mind deliberately, to keep the metal fingers from digging into the flesh, trying not to stare at the thin red scar that ran along its length: the place she remembered as a bad burn from a Sith Lord’s lightsaber—the wound that had never quite healed, that had pained her until the day she thought she died.
Then a wall of Force shoved Revan off balance. The Fragment cried out. “Get off me!”

Humiliatingly, Revan found herself stumbling back, the fingers of her prosthesis, sparking, as if the Fragment had somehow… shorted them out.

“Don’t touch me again,” the woman snapped.

“You can’t just go charging in. The Temple’s closed.” Revan hid her annoyance under a wall of Jedi composure, trying to flex the artificial hand. It was sluggish, and there was a faint ticking noise; but the basic mechanisms seemed intact.

“A window.” The Fragment gestured towards the dome. “It’s not that hard to jump up.”

“People will see.” Her voice felt muffled through the fabric covering half her face. “There’s more than one way in. Follow me.”

“You really inspire leadership,” the Fragment snapped, jibing again with that. But at least she followed. The woman wasn’t completely stupid. In some ways, that made it harder.

“Your ignorance will not excuse your mistakes,” Revan told her. “And your power won’t save you from every circumstance.” Would that it did.

“Any other obvious points you need to get off your chest?”

No. But I do need to inspire you. How long had Mal worked with her on that? And before him, Uncle Vrook on the basics of social behavior.

XXX

“Thank you?” That was what you were supposed to say when someone gave you something: even something that you didn’t like, like choca crema with too many sparkles. You were supposed to say, ‘thank you,’ even when you were sitting in a place that no one could like—like here, surrounded by all of this sand and water and the too-hot suns overhead.

“Not a question,” the old man said. His voice was gruff when he talked to the doctors, but always gentle when he talked to her. Revan liked him. ‘Just say, ‘thank you.’ And then smile.’

She felt her lips pull across her teeth like a tiny scream, only wider. “Thank you,” she repeated, through her teeth. She resisted the urge to put her tongue over the space in the front where she’d lost one later than she was supposed to still be losing teeth. It was too loud and bright and everyone was screaming out loud here, instead of the right way, inside of their heads.

“Say, thank you, Uncle Vrook.” He smiled back at her, which made his face look so funny that Revan forgot she was hot for a second and laughed.

“Uncle Vrook, I don’t like choca crema,” she admitted.

After the thing happened, (the thing with Aunt Yancy and that building), she’d had all sorts of people trying to be nice and offering her all sorts of things: choca seemed to figure heavily in what grown-ups assumed children would eat. It wasn’t Revan’s fault they were all dumb. They should have just asked her. Even if she didn’t feel like talking (and she usually didn’t), she could have written it all down for them. She wasn’t stupid. She could write in Basic, Huttese, and a little ‘Doshan that Aunt Yancy had taught her to help with the paperwork before that thing that had happened on Telos had happened and it all stopped and then she’d been rescued and now here was Uncle Vrook.
“I thought all children liked choca,” he said.

“Not me.” She shielded her eyes from the sun. “May we go inside now?”

“I thought you might want to play,” he nodded, indicating the other children, running and splashing in the waves.

“Why?” she said.

He grunted, as if she’d surprised him. “I don’t know. You know, this is new to me too.”

“How long are we going to stay here?” She hoped it wasn’t forever. Aunt Yancy said staying anywhere too long was a way to put down roots, and who wanted em? Besides, this planet was too hot and too bright.

“A little while longer.” He hesitated, like he did when he thought there was something Revan didn’t know. “We’re waiting for a message.”

“How was that?” His wide face looked worried. “Did it—it felt like it hurt.”

“Just for a second.” She chuckled. “I read that’s normal. It was normal.” Normal. Like they were

XXX

My dear Uncle Vrook. Revan wondered if he was dead.

The door was half-hidden against the south wall of the Temple and, surprisingly, still unlocked. It swung open, revealing the industrial stairs leading to below.

“This way.” Revan repeated, not even turning to see if she was being followed. Not that she needed to look. The Fragment splashed across the Force like a supernova.

“One of the access tunnels?” the woman sounded like she was guessing. Interesting, what she knew, and what she did not. All the padawans in the temple used to use the tunnels to escape the Jedi’s pressure dome of an atmosphere, every now and then. One of the access tunnels was where she and Malak had—

XXX

“How was that?” His wide face looked worried. “Did it—it felt like it hurt.”

“Just for a second.” She chuckled. “I read that’s normal. It was normal.” Normal. Like they were normal. She had never felt this normal before in her life. She leaned forward and kissed him on the lips. “Thanks, loverboy.”

His gray eyes darkened, and he pulled back. “But did you—you didn’t—?”

“When you did—I did, a little.” She felt her cheeks go hot, even if this was a normal discussion about perfectly normal biological functions. “Should we try doing it again?”

“I—” she felt his mind and body both answer with the affirmative; even as he pulled her back on top of him, the sweat between them slippery against the cold, duracrete floor.

The second time was better.

XXX

“Yes,” Revan told her, speaking quickly, before some vestige of Sheris could trigger another emotional outburst in her own mind. “The Jedi left in haste. I doubt they bothered to seal all of the access tunnels.”

As they descending the stairs, she couldn’t help but glance in the direction of the one she and Malak had jokingly called their room.

The Fragment charged on ahead again, rattling down the slope that led to heating and cooling ductworks beneath the Temple.

The stairs were dark, and Revan began adapting, adjusting her eyes to it; when the Fragment sent a ball of pure light hovering overhead, a needless waste of effort—not to mention a beacon for anything that might still be down here. Just because Fragment said Davad was behind this and now gone, didn’t make it true. Master Sunrider had been clouding more than one Jedi’s mind; and the Fragment seemed easy to fool, despite her strength.

Revan opened her mouth to explain this when the Fragment beat her to speaking, as always, on the attack.

“How did you get my HK?”

“Your HK?” No need to keep the amusement from her voice. “I found him half-dismantled and crippled in a room that looked like it had been ransacked by Wookiees.” She paused. “Of course, given that you spent a lot of time with Wookiees yourself, perhaps their standard of cleanliness is something you find normal—”

“You spent a lot of time with Wookiees too.” The Fragment muttered off a few more phrases, insulting Revan’s branch-sense, all in nearly flawless Shyriiwook.

“Not really.” The Wookiees hadn’t trusted her, even after Padawan Bindo had expressed his goodwill.

“But you did visit Kashyyyk.” The woman seemed to hesitate. “I… I think I remember, you took Malachor there once.”

The first time I met the Rakatan computer. If you searched for the Star Maps, did it speak to you too?

“Yes, I did,” Revan said evenly. “The Jedi left you the memory of my son to keep you in line, I assume.”
“The Jedi—” The woman’s teeth were worrying at her lower lip as she walked, a nervous habit that Revan had never acquired. “I remember Korrie now. And he’s mine.”

It had occurred to Revan that her son having such a fierce protector was advantageous. This woman would no doubt sacrifice herself for Malachor. Do anything necessary to keep him safe.

“We both love him,” she murmured, using a voice that Sheris might have, and trying to avoid the annoying prickle in her eyes that accompanied the thought: vestiges of Sheris’s weak emotional state. “I hope you know that.”

There was a long pause, as their feet echoed in the stairs.

“I do,” the Fragment said finally. “I do know that.” She glanced at Revan. “That’s why I… if you want to spend this time with Malak, I… I won’t stop you.”

As if you could stop me from doing anything I— “I was talking about our son, not Malak,” Revan said out loud.

“I know.” The Fragment roiled with too many emotions, they bled off of her in waves. “Y—you both love my son. If you both need to… spend time with Korrie before you both … leave, I understand.” She took a deep breath. “Or if you want to spend time with each other. That too. I accept it.” Her voice hardened again. “But you have to know, this is temporary.”

“I don’t see why it has to be.” The woman was being honest with her. Revan could respond in kind. “I will continue to act as your advisor. Malak told me you were planning on taking the memories back yourself. Had you done so, the Senate or the Fleet might have had grounds to try you for treason. But since you remain ignorant of the crimes you committed—”

“Not entirely ignorant,” the Fragment muttered.

“Ignorant enough,” Revan soothed her. “Plausible deniability. I came to term with my actions long ago. I can carry this burden, and advise you.”

“I don’t trust you.”

“I don’t trust you either.” Revan smiled at her. It felt childish, like long ago her uncle had told her to smile to put others at ease. “See? We have something in common, Fragment.”

“We have nothing in common.” But the Fragment sounded frightened now. That was good, it undermined her advantage. She took a deep breath. “If you were me, would you keep you alive?”

It was a good question. “I kept Sheris alive,” Revan dissembled. “A double is always useful.”

“I’m not you,” the Fragment said. “Consider yourself lucky for that.” She paused, glancing at Revan from the corners of her eyes as if it was hard to look away. “You must remember… you remember everything.”

“Until three years ago.” So much of it she would rather not, rather abdicate responsibility for. The Emperor. Malachor. All the steps that had led them to their own implosion—but the threats still existed. The Fragment had delayed what could still be inevitable. “What is it that you want to know?”

The Fragment seemed to struggle, her expression nakedly hungry. For a moment, Revan almost pitied her. “The Star Forge,” she said finally. “What did it have to do with the Sith? With the Emperor?”
“When we first came to Rakata Prime, we found other a Sith emissary there already. He had been tasked with guarding what the Sith lacked the means to unlock.”

“The Star Forge.” Fragment nodded slowly. “For… some reason, only you could unlock it.”

“Yes.” They were walking side by side now, the Fragment’s steps always landing a second before her own. “I think the Sith emissary expected to die at his post. There had been several before him who had done just that. But we came instead.”

And they offered us peace. They offered us a way through the madness that was already consuming the Jedi, despite all of my efforts. They offered us an alliance to make an end.

We were desperate to make an end. We believed them—

“You and… you and Malak came there. Before the wars? During? How?”

“During.” You must know how, you saw the maps yourself. Right before Malachor. Right before the final gambit. “We were all so tired of fighting. Before, I-I found the first piece of the Star Map before. On Kashyyyk.” She paused. “You met Bindo. The Jedi sent me to retrieve him, and I found the Star Map first. Arguing with that annoying old coot took months. Presumably, that’s where you learned Shyriiwook.”

“He wasn’t annoying.” The Fragment looked her in the eye. “Leave Jolee out of this. How did you know what it was that you’d found? How did you know the map was a map to anything at all?”

How can you expect me to believe that you don’t know? Did it never speak to you? I set it with traps, lies, bait for the unwary. But I also gave it the truth, so Malachor would know one day—and if the computer gave you the Star Map, then surely it must have told you what to expect—

“I didn’t know. Not at first.” Revan paused. “But the computer… it reacted to me. Spoke to me as if it knew me.”

“So some ancient computer led you to the Sith?” The Fragment snorted and rolled her eyes. “You must have been very trusting.”

She knew the woman was being sarcastic, but Revan answered her honestly. “I was. Too trusting.”

“You?” Fragment scoffed. “I find that hard to believe.”

“It’s this way.” Revan gestured towards the service hatch above their heads. “Locked, but if you find the mechanism with the Force—”

The Fragment’s hand extended and the door twisted open, as easily as if had been made of plimsi. Her knees bent and she jumped up, propelled so quickly, she could have been on jets. “Do you need assistance?” she called down, leaning over the edge. The light she’d summoned hung above her face, casting its expression in shadow, and half-blinding Revan. Probably on purpose.

Revan eyed the distance. “I’m not sure,” she allowed, as that was better than admitting that Sheris lacked the strength for a reliable three meter vertical leap.

Her feet left the floor and the woman levitated her easily through the hatch, depositing her on the ground next to her. The Fragment’s arm reached out to steady her balance. “I’m not so good with locks,” she murmured. In Rakatan.

Their eyes met, as if it was some kind of foolish test. “Neither was I,” Revan replied in the same tongue. “How many languages do you know?”

“I don’t know. I’ve never heard a language that I didn’t understand.” Green eyes met her own, and the Fragment pulled her face clear of its concealing fabric. You could almost see where the dark side corruption had been, like faint scars on her skin, lines of silver, tracing out around her eyes in the light hanging above. “Is that the Force, or just another thing you did because you were fracking perfect?”

“Both.” I was never perfect, Fragment. I was so far from it. “The Force enhanced my ability to sense intention, and improved my memory; but I also spent years studying xenolinguistics.” Back when the Jedi didn’t trust me near combat missions. “Every language has some common roots with its closest evolutionary antecedent, and from that, it’s fairly simple to extrapolate a culture’s basic action verbs and nouns and once you have those, then—”

“Are you always this pompous?” The Fragment made a face, and added another phrase in dialect of gutter Tarisian that meant ‘stick-up-the-ass.’

“No.” She started walking, forcing the Fragment to follow. Maybe subconsciously, she’d been trying to impress the Fragment, win her over to the right cause. But this woman had enough of Revan in her not to be cowed: like having all of her own vanity reflecting back like a bad mirror. Revan added a phrase in a gutter dialect of Selkath that translated, roughly, into an array of suggestions about what one could do with a tub of water and someone else’s parents. “Sleeth kit’tra emmmnak. Drezan. Ssslip.”

“I never knew the fish had it in them.” A red eyebrow raised and the Fragment snorted. “All that time I spent locked in their damn jail—”

“They jailed you?”

“Isn’t that in the vids?” The Fragment rubbed her temple, as if it pained her. The part of Revan that had Sheris’s weakness could almost see the ache in her skull, like a redness under the bone. “Manaan was… almost the last. I never had the guts to keep watching the vids that far.”

“I thought it was rather suspect in the Official Version that you had to kill the Progenitor to save a submersible full of Selkath schoolchildren.”

“Yeah, that wasn’t what happened.” The woman winced. “The dreams were getting worse. Everywhere we went, I just saw things the Jedi had done… badly. And when I tried to help, it got worse. “ She paused. “I poisoned the giant shark to get to the Star Map. I just wanted to get off the damned planet—”

“Why did you need to poison anything? You destroyed an entire ocean’s ecosystem!”

“The Republic had a research installation blocking the map. The shark was attracted to the station. It was either destroy it, or destroy the Shark.” Fragment rubbed her temples again. “Shark was faster.”

“Stop.”

“What?” The woman turned, her hand resting automatically on her saber. “Do you need to stop to lecture me more effectively? Tell me how I fracked it up? At least I didn't bomb their entire fracking planet!”

“No.” Revan tried to project the calm she didn't really feel. “Your headache. I can feel it from here. Let me—I can help.”
“You can feel it?” Her own eyes narrowed suspiciously. “Like a Force bond?”

“No.” She took a step closer, and then another, stopping at arm’s length. “Sheris was a healer. I can... I can sense pain. Yours. It's a simple constriction of bloodflow. Stress. I can help.”

“You have Sheris’s... abilities?” The Fragment frowned. “So is it like... me with you?”

“No!” She would not allow that. Not allow herself to become... that. “I was never—you’re no healer. It requires a control over the Force, a precision that has nothing to do with strength. Sheris was good at it. My body... remembers how. Just like yours did with that door.” Revan took a deep breath, trying not to feel like she was confessing a weakness. “I've been healing at the Underground Clinic for weeks now. It’s like second nature, I can cure your headache.”

“I don't trust you in my head.” The Fragment stepped back. “No thanks.”

“But the pain is bothering you.”

“I’m used to it,” the woman snapped. “The quest for the Star Forge... there were a lot of injuries in between the nightmares. I bet that wasn’t in those vids either.”

“No.” It had been years since Revan had seen any real combat outside of the duels with Sith. Not since the Mandalorian wars. Disconcerting, to realize the Fragment might be more skilled in close combat too—as well as being stronger in the Force.

“Deal with your own problems,” the Fragment muttered, half under her breath, and pushed past her, turning left at the second stair.

“If that's how you want it.” Revan shrugged, and tried to ignore the part of Sheris that cringed when she saw pain.

Xxx

The red-haired girl grew pale, looking at him, but she didn't flinch. So young, still a Padawan; but she had already seen so much. She gave Malak a tremulous smile.

“This might hurt,” she warned him. “There's a great deal of infection. I need to burn it away.”

“Yess.” His voice was already distorted, but not as bad as it would become. He sat down on the bed made of carved stone, his breathing even and calm. As if her presence was soothing already.

Her hands were small and delicate and pale. They hovered over Malak’s face, and began to glow. She could feel his pain, like an echo inside her own mouth. Her hands brushed the scabs and he flinched.

“Thank you,” the woman in the mask said, behind her.

The woman. The woman in the mask. Behind her.

Sheris turned to look at the woman in the mask, looking at the red-haired girl, wearing her own face—

Xxx

“What is it?” The Fragment’s voice shattered her memory, like a frag grenade. “You look like you’ve seen a ghost.”
For once, Revan was grateful. “Nothing,” she lied. I wasn’t looking back at the woman in the mask. That wasn’t me. I was the woman in the mask, not the woman watching her. That was an aberration.

They passed through the kitchens. Everything was deserted, even looted. Someone had broken the door to one of the giant, walk-in fridges.

“So. You and Malak,” the Fragment began. “You’re… engaged?” Her voice was flat and neutral, but the calmness seemed brittle. As artificial as Revan’s own.

“Married, technically.” Revan paused, and then relented. “I had to tell the old man something to explain Sheris’s presence in Malachor’s life.”

“You both seem less than convincing, what with the lightning and the Force-choking.”

“We’ll have to work on that.”

“No.” The Fragment said. “You really don’t. Malak can’t… stay.” She started forward, charging through the halls that led to the dormitories with as little care as a bantha. Her face turned back, and she called out, heedless as a novice. “I don’t know how to fix Sheris, but I have to fix Dustil. If Malak is Force possessing him, there must be a way to undo it.”

Revan broke into a jog to keep up. “The boy was a promising Force user. You can see why Malak chose him.”

“Shut up.”

“No, you’re right.” It was all wrong, Malak in that child’s body. And left alone, he’d betray her again, or his father would take his side over hers—Revan nodded at the Fragment. “I agree with you. Malak can’t stay.”

If there was a way to preserve the boy, this Dustil Onasi, she’d try to find it—for the Fragment’s sake. If not… surely the woman could be made to see reason. Some parts of her brain were logical.

The Fragment glanced at her, suddenly wary. “I thought you’d want him to stay. Even if you… fight, he’s still—”

“Malak’s a liability.” Her voice wavered annoyingly.

“Like me?”

“No.” No. They would need to establish trust. How do you trust yourself? Revan reached out her hand—the flesh one, and touched the Fragment’s arm, forcing her to stop. “Look at me.”

The woman did. Her eyes were narrowed, and nothing in the Force signaled calm, or peace, or trust at all.

“You were going to take me back. My memories.” Revan’s fingers closed around her the Fragment’s arm, turning the scar up to the light. “Do you see this?”

The woman’s eyes flickered down. “Yes.”

“Do you remember how you got it?”

Green eyes locked onto hers. “No.”
“You were dueling a Lord Rhea, from the House of Blais. He insisted on knives. Thulian aristocracy trains with them from childhood. You were outmatched.” Revan’s eyes flickered to the wound—where the cut had been. “He cut nearly to the bone. Dark side corruption, sometimes it affects healing. It festered. It hurt.”

“Like with Malak—with his jaw.”

So you do remember something? Or did he tell you? “Yes.”

“And Lord Rhea?”

She remembered how it felt. Pain was nothing, compared to all of that power. “You burned him into nothing.”

“Like I did with the Mandalore.”

“Yes. Sort of. It didn't heal—”

“He was like a black spot on the sun,” the Fragment muttered. “Like Malachi.”

“You do remember.” My thoughts. She knows some of my thoughts. But I don't know hers. She seems predictable, but if she's me, how much of that is a facade?

“I remember that. Malak was—desperate.” the woman blinked rapidly, and started walking faster. “He thought I was dead. The way he felt—”

“Yes.”

“I could… I felt how he felt. You and Malak… you could hear each other. Like a Force bond?”

“Yes. Then we could.”

Xxx

Blood stained the sand. The sun beat down overhead.

Somewhere, someone was beating uselessly against her mind. Loss and grief and anger screamed through her barricades, familiar as a kiss. As always, she kept a part of herself detached from it, trying to project that numbness to the others; shield them from the worst of his anger. Shield them from this one last death. Her death.

No Red, please. Please no. Don't leave me, don't leave us. Don't leave us, Red. Please.

XXX

Useless sentiment. I didn’t kill Cassus Fett Lin because Malak begged me not to die: I killed him because there was no other way to force the Mandalorians into an armistice—

And I didn’t want to die. I didn’t want to die and he didn’t want me to die, and I didn’t want to leave them—

Useless. Pointless. These reminiscences are pointless.

“And now?” The Fragment interrupted. Annoying Fragment, but Revan found the interruption surprisingly welcome now, compared to the circular paths her own mind took. “Do you still have a Force bond with him?”
“Now, I—” it took her a moment to recover her train of thought. “Can I still hear Malak’s thoughts? No.” A welcome relief. “Our bond faded, as we became more estranged. And I think the Emperor’s possession of him made things worse.”

XXX

“My lord?”

He turned, metal glinting on the prosthesis. “Sheris. I did not summon you.” The new voice. Hard-edged like his true voice had never been.

“She sent me, she thought you might need... me.” A part of her quailed inside, faced with him alone. They had never been alone before. She had never been alone with him before. And Lord Revan had been disturbingly specific.

Lord Malak’s brows drew together. “She knows too much.” Inside my head, inside my very thoughts until I scarcely know which are my own and which are hers.

Do you want to know my thoughts? Take her, Mal. She’s not unwilling, all Sheris wants is power —

Sheris smiled, trying to be brave beneath his burning yellow gaze, and slipped her shoulders out of her unbelted robe, letting the fabric fall to the floor. Lord Revan doesn’t understand him, but I could. I want to, I want to understand so I can understand what happened, why I was saved when so many others died—was it for this? Was it to be his? Did he choose me for this?

From the deck of her flagship she closed her eyes and tried not to see.

XXX

Revan’s feet were moving, faster down the halls, as if moving could escape this, the doubled thought. The sinking suspicion that her mind was not entirely her own.

Sheris didn’t die. This is hers, some of what I know is hers, just like the healing. Is that why Master Kroi assigned me to heal? Was he trying to strengthen her? How could he know? No one knows—

At least Master Kroi was dead now. If his ploy had been a plot to unseat her in favor of Padawan Loran, he had failed. If any of the other Jedi masters knew— only Yuthura and Davad know, and you thought you could trust them; but Davad betrayed all the Jedi, she says and who knows what the Twi’lek is plotting? She was Sith and she could still betray you—betray me. I am me, not you. I am me. Not you!

“Dar’Revan.” The Fragment grabbed her arm. “Wait. You can’t just go charging in.” Her mouth twisted, as if she was amused. “Let me go first.”

“You? Protecting me?” There was nothing here. The Temple felt dead. No whispers from Kae, or worse. “Go ahead. I assume we’re going to your quarters first.”

The woman had already charged ahead. She turned back, face a pale blur down the hall. “Yes,” she called back. “We are.”

Of course we are. There’s something you wanted there. Something I found? The letter, Revan suspected. The one from the Organa family. The Fragment was prone to sentiment.

I can’t afford to be.
They passed through the halls, the Fragment heading unerringly towards the room that had been assigned to her—the one where Revan had found the HK. “Open,” the Fragment barked at the door, and it did, revealing the familiar disorder that Revan had seen before. A mess, as if a supernova had scattered the Fragment’s possessions from one end of the room to another. Disordered as the Fragment’s mind, except—

Except for one corner, where a small table sat neatly. Set on its surface was a chess set: Mandalorian, by the looks of it, the game seemingly half-played; but on closer inspection, impossible. The board held a circle of pawns half-ringing a central queen, flanked by two bishops.

Revan walked closer, slowly, trying to feign interest in the view beyond, a typical Coruscanti afternoon unfurling in the picture window.

She needn’t have bothered with subterfuge. Behind her, the Fragment was rummaging, and muttering curses to herself in Mandalorian, completely oblivious.

Looking for the letter? Revan had memorized it. Then burned it. But it would take the woman some time before she thought to ask, if she’d dare to ask. Revan looked down at the chess set again.

XXX

It had been a week since the tribe of nomads had found her and brought her into their camp. A week, while women with braided hair hooked her up to surprisingly advanced medical equipment, treated her sunburn, her dehydration; laughing and chattering among themselves in a dialect of Mandalorian she had to concentrate to follow. They called her a Jett’ai barbarian. They called her a warrior.

They called her a fool, for traveling in the unmarked sands. It had been two days since they’d given her the news she had already suspected, but refused to know: that she was pregnant. That all of the Jedi exercises both she and Malak had practiced to prevent conception had not prevented it. That, if she chose, Revan would have a baby in seven of their local months.

That he was a boy, and if she rested her hand on the slight swell of her stomach, she could feel his heartbeat like a rapid song within. She needed to tell Malak, but he was half a world away, on his own knight’s quest, and if she told him now, he would fail.

Now, a week later, she found herself sitting cross-legged on a carpeted floor in front of the Mandalorian leader and his sons; a row of them, all with his narrow aquiline nose, but with shades of skin varying from pale as her own to the color of space.

“That’s a nice dejarik board.” Her voice was still hoarse from the sun, and the words came out in a croak.

“What’s dejarik?” the smallest one asked her. He had yellow hair and muddy hands, which, following a glare from an older brother, he began wiping on his robes.

Revan had never paid much attention to children before; but now, irony of ironies, it seemed she was going to have one. She stared more closely at the youngest; trying to understand the mysteries of how he worked.

The boy stared unblinkingly back at her, his eyes wide and blue and as open as the sky.

“It’s called chess,” Cassus Fett explained. “My youngest son would be delighted to teach this game to you.”
“I’m Oerin,” the boy said, bowing. “Oerin Lin. It’s nice to finally meet you.” His words were in Basic, but overly stilted, as if he’d studied it, but never really learned.

“Finally?”

“Oerin.” The clansman sounded more amused by his son than annoyed. “Don’t be rude.”

“You’ve been in the women’s tents forever,” the boy grumbled. “I always wanted to see a real Jedi. I bet I know more chess than you.”

“Of course, because I’ve never played chess.” Revan stared down at the board. Malachi had one like it in his study, but she’d never seen it used. “It looks like dejarik, except with only two dimensions. But I’m good at dejarik.”

“Let’s see if you’re good at chess too,” the boy said. “There’s a lot more than two dimensions. There’s a million, like stars in the sky. Maybe even a jillion!”

“Oerin!” But the Fett Mandalore was laughing. “Teach her. I’ll make tea.”

XXX

Was this the same board? It looked like it: the pieces were carved from yellow and brown stone, simple shapes belying the complexity. The pattern of the pawns was significant too. Dots on a map, a specific constellation. Upon closer inspection, the three figureheads were arranged in a shape impossible for a real game.

A queen, captured by her own bishops. The message couldn’t be more clear if it had been written in meter-high Aurebesh.

“Dar’Revan? What are you looking at?”

“Nothing,” she murmured, turning towards the woman, and smiling politely. “Did you find what you needed?”

“No.” The woman's voice was flat, which meant she was suspicious. “That's Oerin's chess set. It wasn’t there before.”

“Is it? Do you play?”

“He taught me.”

“He taught me as well. He was still a child when we met.”

“He told me. I remember… a little.” The Fragment hesitated. “He showed me. He… was there, when Korrie was born.”

Korrie. Revan hated that insipid reduction of her son’s name. “He wasn’t there.” There had only been women, too many of them, all telling her to breathe.

“No.” The woman’s mouth twisted. “He was with Malak. And Vrook.”

“He was a child then. And the child I met didn’t have the Force.”

“Oh?” The Fragment smiled at her, and then… vanished. Not from sight, but in the Force. All that power, that maelstrom of energy was just suddenly… gone. Standing in front of her, the woman the Force said didn’t exist merely shrugged. “Oerin knew how to hide. His mother probably taught him. From what I’ve seen, she knew how to hide too.”

“And he taught you, I see. He taught you to hide in the Force. A technique his mother never taught me.”

“Master Kae was really your teacher?”

“Yes.” And the whispers she put in my head are silent now, at least. Blast you, Vima. I hope your son destroys you.

XXX

“You have had many masters, Revan. Some of them more adequate than others.”

“Yes, Master Sunrider.” She’d reported here as ordered, stuck in the archives, while Malak got to go with Beya and Merop to help bring peace to the warring factions on Wayland. She would not let herself envy them; but nonetheless it was hard to be excited by a master who rarely seemed to leave the Archives—

XXX

Except she did leave them. She had a son, and a Mandalorian life she hid from the Jedi. She had the power to hide herself, to manipulate us all—

All this time, fearing the Emperor. What if it had been Vima Sunrider who was the real threat?

XXX

“You want me to study Sith teachings, Master? I thought all the Sith died on Yavin.” And it’s forbidden. But Revan wasn’t going to mention that. Not if Master Sunrider didn’t bring it up first.

Master Sunrider propelled a stack of datapads across the desk. “You can learn as much from a defeated culture as from a victorious one. What are the weaknesses of the Sith?”

“All types of sentient life can wield the Force, but the Sith Empire relegated entire systems to slavery. Their obsession with racial purity, declining birth rates within their aristocracy, and xenophobic reactions towards the other races within their Empire led to a complete collapse when they learned of the Republic’s existence—”

“No. For the present, I have no interest in history. We will discuss how the Sith use the Force. What are the weaknesses of their methods?”

Revan considered more cautiously. “Emotions are mutable. Drawing energy from an unstable source creates an unpredictable output. We can’t always rely on an appropriate response to external stimuli—”

Master Sunrider muttered something under her breath. “You sound more like a droid than a child, child.”

“Thank you.”

“It was not a compliment.” The woman leaned across her desk. “You don’t need to dissemble with me. I know you’ve taken the D’Reev boy as your lover.”

“Hardly unusual.” She sat up straight in her chair.
“The depth of your attachment is.” Master Sunrider raised an eyebrow. “You conceal it better than he does.”

XXX

“I said, did you take anything else from my room?” The Fragment looked irritated, as if she’d been speaking for a time.

Revan folded her arms and glared at her to hide her discomfiture. “Only my droid.” She’s looking for that letter from Moll and Jasp Organa, the Fragment is as sentimental as Sheris—

XXX

“Am I not to your liking?” Shame then. Shame that a copy as perfect as her had to compete with the rest of the pathetic Revan pretenders. Did one of them have something she did not? She remembered the pain, as the Rakatan machines had twisted her flesh. Not one of the Pretenders had dared as much, had been truly reshaped in Her image.

Oerin actually blushed. “I like you just fine. It's not the right time.”

XXX

Revan felt her stomach drop and her pulse pound as sheer panic overwhelmed her.

That wasn't me. That wasn't my memory. That was her. Entirely Sheris. How can I remember her pathetic life—

Her fingers flexed and the chess pieces scattered off the board and across the floor.

“Revan?” The Fragment was too close. She frowned. “Are you… okay?”

For a disconcerting second, it felt like she was Sheris and this was a time that had never happened, a time when Revan had asked Sheris to help with the war, like she had asked the others. The older ones. The ones Sheris had thought were so lucky, like her own master, Master Imra Lu. It felt like she was the Fragment, and the other woman—the usurper of her body—was real. For a second, she didn’t even notice that the Fragment had called her Revan.

“Revan?” the woman called her name again, finally acknowledging her rightful place. Fragment’s voice almost sounded concerned.

“They’re really gone,” Revan managed. “Davad and… the other two. And you were right. There are three of them, Sith Lords, and now two oppose the other.”

“What?”

“Lin and Davad. Two Sith lords. And they’ve… captured Master Sunrider. The third Sith. Their former master. They’re… ending her.”

Suspicion darkened the Fragment’s voice. “You got all of that from the chess board?”

“Every piece has a unique identifier, as does every square on the board. Cross reference them, and they correspond to star charts, Mandalorian runes….” She tried to sound calm. “Quite simple, really.”

“Do you know where they went?”
Of course, but I'm not going to tell you. “Somewhere far away. At least five quadrants. The Outer Rim.”

They took her to Malachor V. To make an end.

“They won't be back,” the Fragment sounded sure. And Revan thought she was right.

“You were… friends with this—with Lin?” Utterly disturbing to remember the child and see the man in Sheris’s mind.

“Yes.” The Fragment began shoving the chess pieces in her pockets as if she was some kind of street urchin. “He helped me.” She turned her head back to the nightstand, and its empty drawer. “When you were here before, did you… take anything else? Besides, my HK.”

Revan regained enough composure to chuckle. “No. And I don't think HK likes to be referred to as a possession. Not by those he respects.”

“He is an it. He is a droid.” The Fragment used the male pronoun a millisecond after denying its correctness. “You programmed him, didn't you?”

“Mostly, but several subroutines were developed to evolve into sentience.”

“Because…. Having a sentient assassin droid sounded fun?”

“I designed him to be effective, not fun.”

“And he killed all of Oerin’s family for you.”

Among others. “Where did you find him again? The vids didn't say.”

Fragment made a snorting noise under her breath. “Tatooine.”

“Ah.” She'd sent him to Coruscant. Something must have gone wrong. So many things went wrong.

XXX

Something had unsettled the other woman. Dar'Revan was even paler and more stiff than usual. Maybe there had been more to that secret chess message than she let on. At the moment, Revan didn't give a frack.

That headset. The comm unit I used to talk to Mission. It's gone.

Would it even have worked, with the T3 unit gone with Carth? Revan couldn’t be sure. And if it worked, could she really trust Mission’s word for anything?

HK is loyal to Revan. Would Mission be? She’s the Rakatan computer and Revan’s the one who unlocked it—

She shook her head sharply. Dar'Revan. I mean Dar'Revan. She’s not Revan. I am.

“Shall we go?” Dar'Revan sounded bored now, even if she looked rattled. “Or is there some other sentimental keepsake you were hoping to find?”

“What?” Revan had pocketed the chess pieces, folded the board, and slipped it into the bag she’d slung over her shoulder. It looked like Canderous and Carth had taken pretty much every weapon in their collection, leaving only the scattered pieces of things too broken, or too weak to be of much use. A gleam of silver caught Revan’s eye and she kicked aside a pile of laundry, uncovering a decent enough energy shield. She picked it up, examining it closer. “Do you want this?”

“What is it?” The woman walked closer. “Jewelry?”

“It’s an energy shield. Suppresses blaster fire. Won’t do much against melee, or lightsabers; but it’s good for range.”

“Oh.” The woman just looked bored. “The ones the shock troops used didn’t look like that.”

“This is verpine. I traded for it.” To keep Carth safe. But he left it behind. Did he do that on purpose?

“Verpine? How did you find—?” a wry smile crossed her familiar face. It made her look older, more like Revan in the mirror. Dar’Revan reached out and took it, snapping it onto her forearm. “Thanks, Fragment.”

“I don’t think we’ll see any combat, but it never hurts to be careful.”

“True.” Dar’Revan hesitated, taking a breath before continuing. “That letter in your nightstand. The one from the Organas—I burned it. I’m sorry, but leaving it around was too much of a risk.”

“You burned the letter.” She repeated the words, before her mind even knew what the frack the woman was talking about. “Oh. That letter. From Moll Organa. On Deralia.”

The card and letter, accompanied by three black eridu robes, one for me and each of my husbands.

“The sleeping robes. Did you burn them too?” Revan looked around for them. They would be useful. That grade of eridu might grow on trees, but never for export. Some things, as Moll would say, were too nice to share with outsiders. “It’s okay. You’re right. Leaving the letter intact was a risk to Jasp and Moll. I shouldn’t have done it. It was… foolish.”

“I suppose in your mind, it’s sort of like they’re your own family.” The woman had a lot of choobs saying that.

Revan flashed her a bored grin. “Sort of.”

“You still did the right thing, having Polla Organa killed.” The woman’s green eyes were liquid, almost as if the thought was making her emotional. “It was her family or ours.”

Maybe there was a way to extract Revan Starfire’s life into another holocron, throw this woman off a high plat, and partition her memories into a part of the Rakatan computer for easy access, as needed.

Which would make me no better than her. Am I? Am I better than her? I killed a lot less people, but given the same set of circumstances….

“Let’s just… go.” Revan barely recognized her own voice. “Where did you want to go now?”

Dar’Revan looked at her as if Revan was a moron. “The bodies of those shadows you said Davad killed. I want to see the result of his Force-ending power for myself.”

XXX
Fragment led her to the main entrance, seemingly lost in thought. The air in this part of the Temple smelled like smoke and cordite, bearing credence to the woman’s garbled story about an explosion. The entry hall was littered with crushed transparisteel and there was a hole in the dome above, signs of blaster fire on the walls, and no bodies anywhere.

“Perhaps they were only stunned,” she murmured. “Those shadows of yours. Perhaps you only thought Davad killed them.”

“They must have moved the bodies,” the Fragment paced back and forth. “But why bother?”

“We’ll go to the medical lab next,” Revan told her. “And check the lists of the dead from there.” I hope you’re not there, Uncle. I hope you’re not there, I hope you’re not dead, and I fear to ask.

“Wait.” The Fragment raised her hand and the air around Revan seemed to freeze. “Do you… can you feel that?”

No. Sheri’s senses were now hers, and if the issue at hand didn't involve some melodrama from the sentient condition, Revan had no sense, no warning of anything at all. “No.” She tried to keep the bitterness out of her voice.

“There's someone—”

Right before its ignition, a lightsaber had a particular whine in its frequency; one that Revan had heard too many times in the wars from Sith insane enough to engage a fully-trained Jedi in melee combat, even striking with the advantage of stealth.

“Down.” Without thinking, Revan slammed energy out, trying to disrupt their opponent. Her range fizzled far before it should—only to have the Fragment’s gesture mirror hers a few seconds later, to much better effect.

Master Kavar Vakla emerged from Force-enhanced shadows, springing back from the ground with the ease of a trained warrior, his blade already extended and humming a furious, violent blue. “The Jedi Temple is closed,” he hissed. “You need to leave, Revan. You’ve done enough damage here.”

“I forgot something that I need. Something that’s mine.” The Fragment’s voice was impressively calm, and her own blade had ignited as well. She was using a stereotypically red crystal with her double-bladed saber, and from its distinctive whine, too much power in the converter coils for the synthetic crystals. Her weapon would burn hot, and burn out too quickly without an adjustment. “Don’t worry, we’re not here to steal anything.”

“I said, there is nothing here for you.” Vakla’s blade lowered into a perfect defensive stance, as he balanced on the balls of his feet, gathering the Force around him like a storm. Malak could have beaten him easily, but few other Jedi were as good. In her own body, Revan could have made him taste lightning before he would be able to deflect it, but in this shell—

“Have you seen any dead bodies?” Revan asked him. “We seem to be missing a few.”

Kavar’s face twisted in fury, and instead of responding, he charged them both, his blade raised high, closing the meters between them with a leap that sent crushed glass flying through the air with its impact.

The Fragment’s saber shook, but held under the weight of his strength. Their weapons clashed, humming as the Fragment flipped herself over him and attacked from behind: driven by a cunning that Revan hadn’t known the woman possessed.
A cunning that had little effect, as Kavar turned instantly and blocked, before her saber could stab him in the back.

“I don’t want to kill you,” the Fragment muttered, in between blows that seemed threatening to prove otherwise. “But I’m tired of this.” Her technique was sloppy, and her defensive style was bad enough that Revan suspected she was doing it on purpose. Again, and again, Kavar’s more carefully timed blows penetrated her defenses: only to glance off against what had to be remarkably strong Force-enhanced shielding. The Fragment’s own blade was a blur, as she used its longer reach to force the Onderonite back, scoring more and more ground each time his saber struck what could have been debilitating blows on anyone with less raw strength.

If she’d wanted him dead, Revan realized, Master Kavar would be soon be outmatched. His technique was flawless, but it was nothing against the strength beating down upon him, like a solar storm against a failing sun.

“Revan,” she had to raise her voice to be heard over the battle. Grimly, she considered not bothering to interfere. Kavar Vakla betrayed us on Dxun. And if she kills him, I can take his lightsaber.

Would that make me the monster they say I am? What would it do to her?

Before she had time to calculate the foolishness of the gesture, Revan found herself stepping between them, pushing out on all sides with all of the pathetic power she possessed. “Please!” She cried out. “Stop!”

The woman’s red blade froze, a hairsbreadth from Revan’s face. Behind her, she heard the snap hiss of Kavar deactivating his own weapon.

“Sheris,” the Onderonite said. “Please.” He seemed to hesitate. “I heard about you and Beya. You must realize, Revan had her killed? Her and all the others from Manaan.”

What about Sheris and Beya? But there was no time to wonder. In front of her, her own face scowled. “What the frack are you doing, Sheris?”

The Fragment held her lit saber in her right hand, but it hung loose, and dangerously close to her own hip. A slight tilt of power in either direction would send the particle blade cutting into more vulnerable places: her hip to cripple, or her ribs to make an end—

The woman frowned, and then the blade deactivated. She clipped it back to her belt, and then raised her hand again. Before Kavar could react, his own saber snapped from his fingers, and flew into the Fragment’s hand as if she had forged it herself.

“I didn’t have Beya killed,” she said mildly to Kavar. “And I don’t give a frack whether you believe that or not, but do you want to explain why you’re attacking me and Sheris as if we’re your enemies, or should I assume you’ve been possessed by Arren Kae or that crazy emperor?”

“I am possessed by no one,” he snapped. “I’m less sure about you. Master Kae sent me a comm saying that the Jedi were in danger and I should return to the Temple at once. I returned… and found nothing except death.” He grimaced. “Death and worse than death. The bodies that were here, I took to the morgue, along with all of the rest.”

“Give him his weapon back,” Revan murmured to the Fragment.

The Fragment shot her a look as if Revan was the irrational one. “Are you nuts?”
“He’s in the Council,” she tried to simper when she said it. “Surely, he would never harm us.”

The Fragment glanced between them, as if trying to decide the lesser of the two evils. “Except he just tried. You want me to arm him? Do it yourself.” She tossed the saber to Revan.

The balance was too heavy. Fighting with it would be like doing so underwater. “Here,” she held out the hilt to the Onderonite bastard.

Kavar Vakla took it back cautiously, eyes narrowed, and glancing between them.

“Not the escort I would expect you to have, Revan.”

“Sheris and I have come to an agreement.” That smug assurance. The even tone. She would have said the same. That was what Revan found infuriating—these glimpses of self in the other. It made the woman hard to hate.

“Which is…?”

Was he suspicious? Surely not. Revan gave him her simpering Sheris look again. A little shy, as if she was in love with him. Had Sheris been? Half the Temple had, back in the days before wars.

“We agree that I won’t kill her.” Something in Fragment’s eyes flickered. “Or you, Master Vakla, even if you try and kill me again. Why are you here?”

“I was on Alderaan,” he said. “Helping to evacuate the Temple there. Someone—something is hunting Jedi. Master Kae summoned me to return, but I never expected it to be… like this.”

“Coruscant should be safe now,” the Fragment told him. “The hunters that were here are gone.”

“Safe?” He glanced back towards the Temple. “There are more than thirty bodies in the morgue, and most didn't die of plague. It's something worse, much worse. I haven't seen anything like it since—”

“Since the wars?” Revan interrupted him. “We've been informed. That's why we're here.”

The Fragment cleared her throat and glared. “As Sheris was saying, that's why we came back. I… I know about… what happened. It's not going to happen here anymore. I took care of it.”

“According to Revan, Davad Arkan is responsible.” It was still hard to believe. She had trusted the man. “Your cousin.”

The Onderonite's pale skin grew paler. “Davad couldn't… do something like this!”

“According to her, he did.” Revan still hoped it was some mistake, a trick in the Force that the Fragment wouldn't understand.

“He did, but he won't come back to Coruscant.” The Fragment sounded so sure. “He promised me.”

“And why didn't you stop him?” Kavar had always been quick to anger and his voice now was knife edged. “You let a murderer walk away?”

“No. I tried to stop him and he almost killed me, and my Mandalorians almost blew up the temple. I didn't just let him walk away. I convinced him to leave to save the rest of the Jedi. You’re welcome.”
“How?” Kavar sounded as skeptical as Revan herself had been. “I still don't understand how or why—”

“He was Sith,” Revan interrupted them. This was no time for revisionist history, if even half of what the Fragment said proved real. “Davad Arkan followed Revan, just like we all did.” Sheris had a certain simpering whine to her voice that was hard to get right, but she made the attempt. “Others were… transformed by the experience. You know this.” Kavar had been one of the ones that dealt with Surik, Kae had said as much—one of the few things the old woman let slip. “Perhaps he was transformed too.” I always knew he was. I always knew it would change them, but I never knew how much—

After Malachor, Davad’s appetites had... increased. Hunger for her, hunger for food, for wine, for violence, for death—

XXX

“He strangled Ensign Lewis in the mess hall.” Beya’s eyes were shadowed. “Apprentice Carrick told me—he saw the whole thing. No reason. Davad said he was hungry.”

“Did he eat Ensign Lewis?” It was terribly funny, if you overlooked the part where you had just led everyone you tried to save into a trap worse than death. Maybe Ensign Lewis was lucky. No Sith Emperor would ever infect his mind, or draw him into a conflict he wasn’t supposed to win; hand him the power to destroy the galaxy and then tell him to keep it safe from the power that wanted to destroy the galaxy—

“No.” Beya seemed to take that question seriously.

“Everyone’s on edge.” Pretending that was all it was. “I need a healer. Malak’s... wound, it’s infected.”

“I can’t.” Beya swallowed. “Not now. I tried, but it—”

“I know.” Revan felt her mouth twist under the mask. Slowly, she raised it and looked at her old friend. “Guess at least some of those warnings about the dark side were true.”

“Frack.” The Deralian winced. “I thought your gift or whatsit was supposed to protect us from... that.”

“I guess it didn’t.” She shrugged, as if it didn’t matter. The dark side’s price isn’t so high. It was a mantra she’d found herself repeating more and more, as the cost mounted.

XXX

“Show us,” the Fragment commanded the Jedi. “You said there are bodies in the morgue. W—I want to see.”

The Onderonite’s mouth thinned. “I suppose there’s nothing more you can do to the dead. Come with me.” He turned, and led them down the main hall, past the Meditation Gardens, where an explosion seemed to have ripped out half of one wall. The Fragment barely glanced at it, but Revan turned her head.

Death. Someone died there.

“Master Jopheena,” Kavar said shortly, following her gaze. The stench of death must be even more obvious to a beast-rider. “I think. But she’s… luckier than the others.”
“Luckier?” Had Malak been lucky, to be killed by the Fragment’s grenades before his body was blasted into dust along with the Star Forge?

“She’s one with the Force now,” the man said. “Most of the bodies in the morgue are… not.”

“Davad thinks he can stop Tenebrae,” the Fragment continued, still foolishly telling Vakla everything, even though the man had just tried to kill her. “And he eats Force users. The stronger they are the more… tasty or something.” she waved her hand and shrugged. “Good thing he was in love with me, so he spared my life. Right, Sheris?”

“What?” The Fragment’s obvious attempt to goad her for no reason was entirely inappropriate. “Is this really the time to be discussing your delusional adolescent fantasies about Knight Arkan?”

Kavar’s eyes narrowed, looking between them, and Revan gave him another simpering Sheris smile.

“It was one of the last things he said to me,” The Fragment continued, as if this truly was some kind of barn-raising festivity on a backwater world and not a meeting of Jedi approaching the morgue in the doomed Temple. She was still staring at Kavar Vakla, but her words were obviously meant for Revan. “Davad wanted to know if I’d ever loved him, even a little.” She shrugged. “I told him I didn't remember.”

XXX

“I think Malak suspects.” His back was a smooth brown curve against the red of the sheets, the lean muscle sliding against ribs to gold in the dim lights.

Revan couldn’t help but reach out, trailing her fingers along every hard curve, where flesh met bone.

“I thought you knew. That's the point. Malak needs to suspect.” She kept her voice even. “More than suspect —know. The rest of them may think it's only a rumor; but Malak knows better. And the secret enrages him, makes him strong.”

His head turned towards her. “Is that all this is?” His eyes were flat and yellow, but she remembered them, warm and brown. “A way to make your Sith apprentice strong?”

“Not all.” She didn't have to hide her face from Davad, which was a relief, even if her words were a lie. “Kill him, and I'll make you my new apprentice.”

“I would try,” Davad murmured. “If I thought that had half a chance of being true.”

She tried to smile. “Now you’re thinking like a real Sith apprentice.”

Xxx

“Queen Talia hoped Davad would return to Onderon,” Kavar told the Fragment. “His half-brother Vaklu has the support of the militias against her. But they would follow Davad. He’s one of the only ones they would follow.”

Aside from you. But Revan knew better than to say that out loud.

“He was some kind of… part of the local aristocracy there?” The Fragment didn't even know when she was being insulting.
“We’re cousins,” Kavar said. He gave her a cold smile. “But I’m illegitimate—outside of the official succession lines. I suppose there’s much you don’t remember.”

“And I suppose she has you to thank for that,” Revan muttered. “Among other members of the Council.”

“We did what was necessary.” His voice hardened and he quickened his step. “You understand that now, Knight Starfire?”

“I don’t fracking understand why—”

“What are you going to do with the bodies?” Revan interrupted them, before the Fragment could argue more pointless words about actions already done.

“I was going to catalogue them. Take inventory.” Kavar swallowed, and his voice softened. “Inform the families. Then burn them.”

“We’ll help,” Revan told him. Sheris would have helped. A strange part of her wanted to. The dead deserved that much. So many died and I did nothing except cause it.

The Fragment glared at her, but bit her lip and said nothing.

Xxx

“Son.”

They both looked up from their plates. Malachor’s face had a slight frown, and Dustil Onasi’s was expressionless.

“What do you want.” No inflection. His son looked down at his own son instead of at him. Whatever message passed between them might have been read in the Force; but Malachi could see none of it.

“To talk.” He took a breath. “Malachor, perhaps you should go see what concerts are being aired tonight for Senate entertainment. If you like, we could go to one.”

“Is Mother coming back to go too?” His grandson looked between them.

“I imagine she’s still busy with her Mandalorians, if she hasn’t returned—”

The appointment with Doctor Forza had been so early, that Malachi hadn’t checked the feeds. And then, his appropriations meeting, followed by that confusion with Klee. (Absurd, how the Jedi had refused to take off his biosuit, even in Malachi’s own apartments!) Then Malachi’s tour of the Jedi’s new residences, now full of Jedi, all safe due to the munificence of House D’Reev.

“Okay,” the child looked dejected, but obedient. “But I don’t want to see any singing. They all look silly when they sing.”

“Yes, no singing.” Malachi smiled, despite himself. “What about a play?”

“Only if there’s a lot of fighting and not a lot of kissing.”

“Why don’t you find something appropriate.” He nodded towards Malak. “We’ll all go together. Your father can provide us with security.”

“That’s… trusting of you, Father.” His son’s voice wasn’t his own, but it still carried the same inflection—that hesitation on the patronym, as if he was never quite sure either of them had earned it.

“I’ll go check on shows,” Malachor said. The doors slid closed behind his running feet.

Malachi coughed. “The invitation doesn’t extend to Sheris. I hope that isn’t a problem.” He was relieved to find the girl not here.

“It’s being closed and sealed,” Malachi told him. “Most of the Jedi are here now.”

“I know that,” his son snapped. “What is it you really want, Father?” The Onasi boy’s face was wary and proud. Malachi suddenly had a flash of the real child who had showed up on his doorstep, confused and furious. And so young. His own son had never seemed so young.

He felt a moment’s pity for that boy, but only a moment. Then, Malachi took a deep breath and plunged in headfirst as it were: like a rogue bounty hunter descending into the pit of a sarlacc to retrieve a krayt dragon pearl.

“I… resigned myself to your death years before the event itself. I resigned myself when you and Revan first chose to see active combat. More than most, I do know the true costs of war.”

“No,” his son muttered. “You really don’t.”

“Regardless, I… I spent some time in our with the pensioners from the last few conflicts. I know you think that my actions were unconscionable, but the alternatives were worse. Controlled combat is better than insurrection. Casualties of war are preferable to civilian deaths.”

“So you took a few widows out to dinner and that makes you some kind of an expert?” The sneer on the boy’s face wasn’t like Malak’s at all, but the emotion behind it was.

Malachi coughed. His throat felt dry, and his eyes blinked, heavy with sentiment. “We need to focus on the future.” He’d expected the anger. Doctor Forza had predicted that ‘Gregorio’ would be furious to be cut out of the tea import business. “I gave up the hope of having you as my Second after Telos—”

“It took you that long?”

Malachi ignored the dig, reaching for the words of the speech he’d memorized—harder than any Senate address. “I want you to know that if this… situation was different, I would proudly accept you now as my heir. The man you’ve become is one I’m proud to call my son.” Forza had given him some of the words, but the emotion behind them felt real. “I am proud of you. Your bravery. Your victories. Your sacrifice.” He blinked, because quite obviously, the biofilters had let some particulate matter into these rooms, and were causing an allergic reaction, causing, in turn, his eyes to tear. “You sacrificed all that you had to keep us all safe. I recognize your effort. I respect it. And I-I love you.” He coughed again. “I would love you even if you were an abject failure, but you were not. I know I told you that you failed me, but you did not. You were a triumph. You were magnificent. You were amazing.”

A mix of emotions buffeted the young face before it smoothed over, hiding all behind that false Jedi calm. “What are you using?” his son asked. “Drones? Or contact poison? Is it already done?”

“What? No!” He coughed again. “I’m not—"
“Not trying to kill me?” His son was standing now, hand warily on the weapon at his belt.
“Because it sounds like you’re saying good-bye, Father.”

“I am. But not… like that.” He took a deep breath. “I want to give you a gift. I want to give you a life. You can’t be my heir, but you could live quite comfortably in this body. Take your concubine to one of our estates. I’ll give you the deed to any property you desire. Or we can purchase one.
You could run a vineyard, or one of the shipbuilding concerns if you’d prefer to do something more technical—”

“And my son?” From the tone of his voice, Malak already knew.

“You could never see him again. Not as long as… not for a long time.”

“Because Revan would find my continued presence in this body intolerable.” His son sighed.
“Your plan is to tell them I’m dead.”

“You never wanted this.” Malachi smiled sadly. “Never wanted to be a Senator’s son. I used to think you’d outgrow your foolishness, but you never did. You never wanted it, but you were loyal.
I’m offering you the chance to reinvent yourself.”

“Reinvent myself. With… my concubine. With Sheris.” Something sparked in those dark eyes.

XXX

“If you can’t give Gregorio the business, perhaps you can give him something else,” Doctor Forza suggested. “Your business is successful. Perhaps you could fund an annuity for him. Set him up with some kind of other concern. You want your grandson to have his own life. Why not your son?”

XXX

“I don’t want to work for you, Father.” Malak turned his head and walked towards the balcony.

“You would never have to work at all, unless you chose to.” Malachi tried not to sound like he was pleading. His gut rumbled, obviously a victim of his emotional distress. “I’m offering you a way out.”

His son’s hand reached out and stroked the curtains, wrapping them around his fingers, as if his own weight was suddenly too much to bear. His shoulders slumped forward. “I’ll need to ask Sheris,” he said slowly. “I don’t know if she—”

Malachi tried to hide his impatience, but instead he coughed again. “She’s little more than a whore.
Thousands of women have had the surgery, if you need one that looks like your wife.”

“I need to ask Sheris,” his son repeated, his voice perfectly even. “You can call her whatever you want, but I still need to ask her.”

“But you realize the offer is good,” Malachi said, “whether your whore comes or not?”

“I can’t leave her here.” His son turned back to him. “I don’t expect you to understand.”

But Malachi did understand. “Love is sometimes irrational. Often… irrational. Your mother and I
—”

“I don’t care.” His son turned back from the balcony, hand still wrapped in filmy white. The other curtain blew between them, hiding his face. “When… how long do I have, before I have to let you know?”

“When Captain Onasi returns from his mission, things will… come to a head. I don’t know how much longer that will be. A week, perhaps. Maybe two. I wouldn’t think convincing a whore would take that much time, but I can understand that you want time to say goodbye to Malachor.”

“Either way.” Malak laughed. “If it’s this or the contact poison, I need to say goodbye to my son.”

“Your kind are quite hard to poison.”

“Oh, I’m quite sure you have a few options.”

Malachi didn’t want to think about that. Not now. “Take the deal son.” He reached in his jacket pocket and extracted his handkerchief. Wiped his tearing eyes with it, a gesture he hadn’t used in years. “Take the deal. Please.”

XXX
Outnumbered, Outplanned

Outnumbered, Outplanned

Chapter 40 / Outnumbered, Outplanned

“This is it?” Canderous ran a thumb along the manifest again, checking off each notation against the ships in front of him. There were seven of them: shuttles, two cruisers, and some motley runners with weapons arrays so useless they made the Hawk look like a warbird. The vast hangar bay dwarfed them all.

“These are the ships, yes.” Catrinex, Headwoman of Clan Rialis tapped the datapad with a doddering finger. “Our fleet awaits the command of our Mandalore. Is she here?” Mother Rialis narrowed her eyes, as if she expected Revan to appear out of the ether.

“I am here,” Canderous told her. I am here and those ships are barely enough to get us all off this rock. He cast an eye at the Bothan light cruiser--thing looked held together by spackle and a bad welding. Doubtful it could hold hyperdrive.

“These are all the ships… we have… here?” From what Gwen had said… he’d expected more. The Rialis Headwoman wasn’t his wife, not to mention she was half crazy with age. Maybe she’d forgotten part of the lists. Canderous didn’t want to be rude. Catrinex’s tongue was a great deal sharper than her mind, and she was stickler for proper manners; but he couldn’t help but wonder if she was just wrong.

The woman frowned. “What we have here is enough for transport from the city-planet to the secure location.”

Ah. “And at that location… are there… more ships?”

Catrinex nodded. “Improper of you to question your wives’ judgement, but Aemelie thinks you men will be pleased by the selection.”

He nodded. If Aemelie thinks I will be pleased, then it’s true: D’Reev filled his end of the bargain. We have the Aleema. And with that, we have the galaxy. “Apologies for my rudeness.”

They had already stayed too long on this stinking hellhole of a world. Working for D’Reev wasn’t much different than working for Davik--except D’Reev actually paid his damnable debts in full.

“Send the call.” he told Teliak, Second Wife of Zal, who was standing at attention, swords crossed, behind the Headwoman.

“We are scattered across stars: bannerless, rudderless, aimless.” Teliak had a long scar that extended along one side of her face. It made her face look even longer, like the blade of a knife. “Is Fett Revan going to lead us now that Oerin Lin is dead?”

“No.” She held the mask in her hand and then let it fall. I would be honored to fight by her side again; but she’ll refuse, and I am tired of Republic games.

Canderous pulled the mask of the Mandalore from his jacket, and handed it to Teliak. “I lead the clans now.”

The woman’s eyes widened. “Hai, Mandalore. Fett Ordo.”
“Finally,” Catrinex of Rialis graced him with a smile, only missing a few teeth. “A blooded man to fight for our daughters.”

“Rysya Mandalore phar ech na' Republik infi,” Canderous murmured. “Our time is now.”

“Our time is now,” the women echoed.

It would be glorious.

XXX

Deeka Jin thought everything was goin pretty well. Spiced cake had been a hit--it always was. Like any good hostess, her best role was to lean back and listen to the conversations ebbing and flowin around her, taking good head notes in case anything was said that could be valuable intel for the information brokers on the downslide.

That is, anything that wouldn’t betray her Sith-killin’ Lammikins, or their son.

The intel about this Polla Organa character was real juicy, but maybe a little… too juicy, if you didn’t mind an old chesta-nut. Sents with intel that hot could end up dead. Still, she had to wonder if anyone would care enough to make it worth her while.

“You need to leave this planet,” Aemelie Ordo was sayin to the Deralian chit. She was also bouncing the woman’s baby on her own knee. Deeka remembered when Mekelkins had been that small. Had they done bouncin? He’d been so serious, not like this little chub, who was all squeals and laughs. What was his name? Aba-somethin? Sounded foreign. She’d known an Abasen once. Some treasure-hunter from Talravan. Always chasin tail, never enough credits. Same old, same.

“Yeah.” Polla seemed more interested in staring at Lammikins than packing her things and running. “I’m sorry, I… I really thought you were hunting us.”

“We were,” Aemelie said. “And trust me, you didn’t make it easy. Your skills were impressive.”

Polla snorted. “Now, you’re just being kind. We were doing the best we could.”

“Now that you mention it, you could have doubled back more and hidden Abasen under your jacket. The one time that Mhai lost you in the tunnels, all she had to do was keep asking about the couple with the cute baby.”

The Polla chit smiled, a little rueful. “Maybe next time we should have an ugly baby instead.”

“There's no need to do that!” The Mandie looked startled, then she laughed. “Oh, wait! You were joking!”

“Pollie’s a kidder,” Seiran chimed in.

“I don't want to be on the lam for the rest of our fracking lives.” The Deralian sighed, and looked at Lammikins. “ Couldn't the Jedi just tell the HoloNet that Revan Starfire never got my memories? That it was all a mistake?”

“The Jedi aren't in a position to help.” Lammikins looked all noble and kinda useless. If Deeka hadn't seen him dispatch Darth Arca with one hand and a saber, she might've even bought the act. “The Jedi are… divided.” He rubbed his temples. “If I thought it would help, I would gladly do as you asked, Citizen Organa.”
“I’m not a citizen,” Polla interrupted him. “Remember?”

“Of course.” Lammikin’s eyes had that pouch-in look they got when he was tired.

Maybe Deeka shouldn't have slipped him those drums last night, but even an old chit likes to enjoy a trick every now and again. “You want me to talk to this Revan tart?” She offered to the room. “I bet if she said this Polla chit was never her, sents would be too scared to think anything about it all ever again.”

“No!” Vrook and the chit’s husband said at practically the same time.

“No. Uh, but that’s nice of you to offer.” The Deralian husband gave her a wide smile. Bless his cockles.

“We’ll get you off world,” Lammikins added. “Maybe with fake idchips.”

“Now that I do know!” Probably the spice, but Deeka was suddenly excited. “Chips are easy to fake. But for good ones, you need organized crime.”

“Exchange,” the Polla girl nodded. “I know someone who could do it, but it’s… complicated.”

“We got it,” Deeka assured her. “I’ll only charge you forty points above for the finder. “Iggis has some good people runnin his forges.”

“Forty…?” The girl glanced at her husband, who just looked blank. Bless his cockles, for the pure of heart!

The Mandie was frowning down at her comm, lookin for the world like she'd lost the tails of their conversating. “Is there a… private area where I could use my device?”

Sometimes, the puns were too fracking obvious. Deeka tried to hide her smirk. “Course, dearie. I'll set you up right pert in my own office.”

Right next to the best recordin mike a stable of treats could buy.

“That’ll work.” The Mandie frowned again at the comm and then looked up at Polla. “We might be able to offer your family transport from this city-planet,” she said slowly. “Give me a moment.”

“But--” the Deralian chit frowned at her. “What about Revan?”

“Our Third Wife is not coming with us.” Aemelie smiled. “I think you would like Gwenarius through. She is the First Wife of Ordo.”

“Forty what?” The man was askin his wife like a babe in the uppers.

“Percent,” she muttered. “Which is insane. Are you sure, Aemelie? I guess we need to book passage to Alderaan and see about Uncle Boon—although, hells if I know what we can do.” She grimaced. “After everything, I don't even know if he'd be happy to learn I'm not dead and he got himself in jail for nothing.”

“We can’t take you there,” the Mandie chit said. “Obviously. But we will be passing several systems along hyperspace routes. And we’ll have more time to talk. Have you ever taken thought to training as a weapons specialist? Auto-targeting is so limited, and true accuracy is such a rare talent. You wouldn't believe how long my people have been trying to make it breed true.”

“Obviously? I mean, no. I haven’t. Haven’t thought of being… a weapons specialist.” Polla ran a hand through her hair, twistin it back from her face. Looked pretty that way, the girl had good bones. “Where are you going?”

“Back to our flagship, first.” Aemelie said. “I need to speak to my husband regarding the… travel arrangements.” She shrugged. Pretty chit, she was, all eyes and dark curls.

“Flagship?” Lammikins frowned, like he was unfamiliar with the term. Wasn’t it the ship that carried the flag signals? Like communicatin? Deeka didn’t see the confusion, but poor Lammikins suddenly looked polearsed.

“Interest on that forty is only compounded monthly,” Deeka chimed in. “Not weekly. Iggis runs a clean operation.”

“Monthly? What? We don't have that kind of--” The Deralian’s husband sounded like a squawkbox. On his lap, their kidlet squawked back.

“Shhh!” Polla nudged his arm. “Seiran.” She frowned, and her eyes narrowed at Deeka. “Forty’s ridic. Don’t try and scam a smuggler, old woman. I have my own fracking connection. It’s just… using it that’s complicated.”

“We’ll do the dance.” Deeka beamed back at the chit. Dress looked right nice on her sweet little figure. Deeka had known it would. She had a gift.

“You mentioned a private room,” the Mandie broke in. That one was too proud by half.

“That I did.” Deeka got up, joints creakin only a little and escorted the woman to her suite, settled her in, cozy as crabs, right next to the hidden peepers.

When she came back, the Deralian was deep in conversating with Lammikins. Somethin about credits and compensation for mental sufferin.

Smart girl.

And Deeka had to admit, the chit had a point.

Jedi Order did owe her big. Whether they could pay up or not… that was another story? From what Lammikins had said, sounded like the Jedi had more of a mess on their hands than the aftermath of a Gamorrean hen party—and frack if the stains on those sheets had ever come clean, not completely.

“If you think the Order’s in trouble now...” Polla Organa was sayin, “...just imagine what would happen if we came forward and said the Jedi tried to have us killed.”

“You would not live long after making the announcement,” Lammikins said bluntly. “Even under my protection. The Senator needs Revan Starfire as his Second. Your existence threatens hers, but a new identity--”

“I'm not going to pay her for a new identity!” The woman glared at Lammikins. Deeka hoped he never pissed his own dear niece or only begotten son Mekelkins like that, because, being Sith, they could prob’ly burn holes through his guts or something.

“Don't threaten my guests,” Deeka warned.

“I need a comm,” Polla snapped.
“Your friend’s usin it, dearie.” Deeka shrugged. “Only have the one,” she lied. “This is a humble establishment.

A humble establishment with ten untraceable comm stations, and one that recorded everything into a blind feed. In the Trade that ratio was about right: most sents had secrets nobody and their moms would ever want to hear. But that one out of ten…

How lucky Deeks was to have two in one day!

XXX

The Mandie kids had released Therion from the restraints ages ago, but left him locked in that damn room, with only a tap for water and some nutrabars. Therion had seen worse digs on a few hyperspace runs; but this was still a completely blown situation.

The fact that he was suffering in what had to be a five star Coruscanti hotel in the middle of its most exclusive entertainment sector: with women, wine, and all the delights the Core offered so near--and yet so far--only made it worse.

Just when Therion had pretty much decided to just spill the beans about Polla Organa, because, frack it, the bitch wasn’t worth this banthashit; the door slid open, and like a promise there she was: his own busty, blonde, Mandalorian babe.

“Dessa.” Wouldn’t do to look desperate, so Therion just smiled. “Where have you been all my life?”

“Packing.” She held something in one hand that looked like a credit chip. “Gwenarius says you’re free to go, but we need your ship.”

Therion grinned and folded his arms, leaning casually against the wall. “Renting my ship doesn’t automatically include my personal service; but if you play your cards right, I bet we can have a replay of the Rafellelian do-under. Or over? You know I’m a generous man.”

“We’re not renting your ship.” the babe’s former warmth was gone. Dessa held up the credit chip, then tossed it to him. “We’re buying it. We don’t need a pilot.”

“The Flybee’s not for sale.” But Therion’s fingers closed around the chip, automatically noting the number flashing on its surface. The hell? Hyperspace robbery! They’d taken his blasters, leaving him nothing to bargain with except good looks and charm. “What’s going on? Did Revan say something? Pollie and me, we were on a break. That spice wasn’t even mine, and my medical was clean!”

“I know your medical is clean. I checked. As for the rest… you were entertaining as a bedmate,” Dessa shrugged. “Now our time is done. I have everything I need from you.”

“Babe, you don’t even know what you need.” He took a step closer.

She tossed her blonde hair, and her face seemed to close like an airlock. “My Headwoman told me to buy your ship. We need one with clean records, and yours have been doctored quite effectively.”

“Lemme talk to Revan!” he snapped. “Your boss? She won’t throw me away so easily. Not if she knew what I know--”

“Revan Starfire is no longer our leader,” Dessa told him. “And our new Mandalore has larger concerns than the finances of a smuggler and his illegal vessel.”
“Just let me talk to her--your new leader.” He’d never met a woman without some weakness. If it wasn’t sex, he’d find it. What would a Mandalorian warrior woman like? He imagined a hot babe Mandalore in something metal, shaped like armor; but showing a lot more skin.

But Dessa actually laughed at him, before gesturing towards the door. “Good-bye Therion D’Cainen.”

“Come on now! We had some good times.”

“And now they are done.” Her hands rested lightly on the pistol on one hip, and the vibroblade on the other. “You can leave quietly, or you can leave in a bag. Your choice.”

“But…” his voice trailed off. “You're serious? Really?”

“I would prefer not to shoot you.” Her tone held none of its former playfulness.

Therion glanced down at the credchip again. It was enough to buy another rig--maybe not on Coruscant, at some jacked up price; but on a more sensible world. Or a smuggler’s moon.

“Our time is over,” Dessa added. “Take your credits and go.”

As a smuggler, you pretty much learned that all choices boiled down to that kind of simplicity. Take the credits and keep breathing, or be a dead fool.

Therion D’Cainen was no fool.

XXX

Marla Korr watched, as what remained of the Jedi Order buzzed like drones in a killick hive; each according to their task, and united in the common goal of restoring order--at least to these temporary quarters.

The killick were a fascinating species: one of the few who truly understood the unity of purpose.

“Master Korr?” She felt, as much as saw, Master Klee’s approach. “I trust everyone is settling into their new accommodation.”

“As you can see,” Marla Korr inclined her head towards the part of the room that had been set up as a temporary medix, and the dividers they had installed between the sick and the recovering. “We thought it prudent to assign all Jedi who had not yet caught the virus to quarters closest to the sick.” She raised an eyebrow at Klee, noting the mask that covered his face, and his gloved hands. “Master Loanin’s theory is that by encouraging infection, we may rid ourselves of this contagion sooner than otherwise.”

“Is it truly wise to risk incapacitating more?” His voice was even.

“After recovery, the risk of transmission is reduced to almost nothing.”

“True.” He folded his arms, staring across the room towards the quarantined area. “It still seems… a waste.”

Marla Korr raised an eyebrow. That was… unusually direct. She took a step closer to him.

The Eosian nodded slightly, and stepped a few centimeters closer to her as well. Their hands brushed. Even through Klee’s gloves, Marla felt the Force within him; the infinite source of all life and true peace in the galaxy, the connection forged like a conduit that sparked into being when their parts were joined to the whole--

I have news, she sent.

Klee nodded back. Yes. I have news as well.

XXX

At first, it was just lost time, like waking from a dream when you didn't realize you were sleeping.

As a padawan, Marla Korr attributed the gaps in her memory to meditation fatigue. Master Bas’El was a harsh taskmaster, and their enclave, the first of its kind on the Outer Rim planet of Dantooine, was shakily reestablished in the rather catastrophic aftermath of the Kun Reformation. After Exar, Ulic, and Nomi, the Jedi had to tread carefully: keeping their training secretive, and their apprentices under close observation. There was no room for error. No room for “frivolity, fraternization, or fun;” as Knight Zez would mutter, when none of their superiors were close.

Such entertainments didn't matter to Padawan Korr. She had never had time for frivolity, because her training encompassed seventeen hours of Dantooine's twenty-five-hour day, each day. The first few times that a few of those hours were lost in a blur of combat exercises and droning recitations of the Jedi Code, she blamed her own frailty.

But then came the time when she opened her eyes to find a datapad in front of her and a stylus clutched in her own hand.

You are not alone.

The Iridonian runes were written in her own style.

It was strangely comforting to be not alone, even before Padawan Marla Korr learned of the Force’s true purpose, and her place among the infinite voices of the stars.

XXX

Your bio-suit looks rather absurd in this setting when no one else is wearing one, Marla watched the youngest remnants of the Jedi Order arrange themselves in a half circle around Knight Bastien, who had volunteered to lead the evening’s instruction.

It would look even more absurd, if I succumbed to the Starfire’s plague, Master Klee replied, his features bland behind the lightly-tinted visor.

Such occurrence is quite rare. Most are immune, after the gift. Rare, but still possible. The lost ones. Connections severed, their loyalty was suspect. A sad waste of potential.

This vessel does not want its end. He chuckled, the sound hissing his mask. A sentiment you and I have shared before.

“There is no death,” she murmured, her eyes straying to some commotion around one of the sick beds. The Sith child Mekel Jin was conscious and talking to the Ziost heretic. Both represented so much wasted potential, all lost due to the Starfire plague.

Korriban had been one of the first planets to fall. Korriban had fallen before the One realized its own betrayal, how its own vessels had been repurposed and reshaped to promote its end.

My vessel has years with D’Reev. The Eosian's visor inclined towards Marla. Years that have established trust. We are so few here. It would be hard to insert another.

Klee was correct, although the Senator would not live forever, and Revan would, perhaps, be more inclined to trust a Jedi with no public ties to Malachi D'Reev.

Marla was rather pleased that D’Reev had allowed her to speak to Malak for him already. Malak had been a good mount, unwittingly serving in so many ways. A pity his new body was contaminated by the virus, but in his ignorance, he still could serve.

As for Revan and Malak’s son… Marla Korr had always been good with children.

Was it against their purpose to want personal advancement? She thought not, not if it served their ultimate goal… but the question nagged her, a vestigial reminder of guilt.

We all have our tasks, she sent. Master Loanin no longer wears protective covering. Some will wonder if you don't trust his vaccine.

Their heads turned in unison towards the youngest remaining member of the Council, whose head was bent studiously over Padawan Lydie Korr, a slight smile on his unprotected face.

Their speculation is irrelevant. But I have noticed that Master Loanin seems quite attentive towards your niece.

Indeed. Marla would have to have a talk with the girl. Should we continue to gossip like old Bith at a sand rally, or should we share counsel on our latest information? She raised an eyebrow. I was told the Shadow is gone from Coruscant.

Marla had been informed by a note, written in her own hand. Their kind found that the simplest way to disseminate information across the web.

Klee felt startled in the Force, like a spark igniting. How is it known?

I was not informed. Curiosity was a weakness, indulged only occasionally, like a fine wine at a late meal.

How did it die?

I did not say it was dead. All I know is that it has gone.  She frowned.  If you wish to entertain gossip about who it was, or where it went, perhaps we should become Bith at a sand rally.  There was no rebuke in her tone--there could not be--but she knew that Klee felt the sting.

We concern ourselves with Coruscant alone. He must have been reminding himself, as it was a fact that Marla Korr already knew. Through more pedestrian channels, I learned that Arca Trinii is believed to be dead.

Marla felt a smile cross her face. Her niece turned her gaze, as if the child thought sentiment was being directed towards her, and smiled back. Another obstacle removed. Did your sources know how?

I was told by the Starfire plague.

But Arca Trinii was Revan’s. Surely, she would have received the vaccine.

Vaccinated sentients do fall ill, Klee offered. In her weakened state, perhaps Arca met with an accident. His lips thinned through his visor. “Does speculation serve us?” he murmured out loud.
Of course not. Are we to take further action? With the Shadow gone, the Order in chaos, and Arca’s network destroyed, much of their purpose had already been achieved.

There are still billions on this planet. Master Klee turned his head to where Master Loanin’s head was still bent, standing over her niece. Losing a few hundred thousand voices is of little consequence.

I know. But I feel regret that we have lost some of the most promising, Marla felt ashamed to admit regret; but she trusted Klee, who had his own weaknesses.

Their instructions had been very clear: they were tasked with staying in place: not moving against the shadows, sabotaging the plague’s spread, or stopping the vaccination efforts on this world.

Coruscant might be the heart of the Republic; but it was one world in a vast galaxy, and not one centrally strategic to the Empire. It served the One to have the Jedi and their enemy think they had achieved victory here; while elsewhere more resources slipped from their grasp. Revan Starfire (or the shell of her body) could create one small victory, while the real war was won on the necessary worlds.

Or so she and Klee had once surmised. Once again, Marla Korr chided herself for thinking past her design.

At least Klee was polite enough not to rebuke her emotional response. His gloved fingers brushed against hers. Your niece can be of use, even in her diminished state. It would be easy to arrange a mission to Dathomir, or the new facility on the Yavin moon.

Marla sighed. Traya’s attack had dulled the spark of Lydie Korr’s strength to a bare ember. Would it even be enough to light the web within? She is still recovering from the Shadow’s touch.

Lydie Korr was too promising to be a mindless drone. It was not a desire for her blood’s advancement that made Marla think that: she had spent far too much time as a spy for the Jedi on Sith worlds to believe the lies the Sith told their aristocracy about a bloodline’s merit; merely, she hated to see a one with such potential and grace foolishly squandered as a drone or disposable cell.

Did the girl tell you what happened? Klee asked.

I questioned her when she regained consciousness. She said Davad Arkan attacked her with some kind of Force power. We knew his darkness. Could he be the Traya?

The Onderonite? Impossible. He was not here when we first sensed the Shadow.

Or so we believe. Marla Korr wondered.

Speculation, Master Korr? Her old friend looked amused. So it is known. But if we are being… indulgent and the Shadow is not Arkan, who could it be?

Not that they needed to know; but--knowing that one of the Jedi on the Council, one of those that they worked with, lived with, loved was aware enough to oppose the grand design--

One of the missing members of the Council? Marla suggested.

Klee smiled slightly. This could be construed as gossip, Master Korr.

“Yes. It could. I think it was Jopheena,” she murmured out loud. “I always suspected her motives.” Perhaps we should stop.
“Jopheena is dead,” Klee admonished. His hand tightened around hers. No. Concern edged his voice. As well as a certain… excitement. Independent thought was discouraged, and all the more sweet for the interdiction. “You didn’t sense her death?”

“I did not.” Lost time. It happened. When you were part of the One, you quickly learned that the concept of self was always secondary to the greater good. Marla frowned, thinking of those Jedi who had gone into hiding even before the Council’s official order. One of them was almost definitely the Traya: Vrook Lamar, Kavar Vakla, Atris, Lorna Vash--

Something tugged at her mind, like a memory lost in shadow. The Shadow is strong. We always knew that the Traya was strong enough to hide itself.

But no one could hide from the One. They were all mere grubs beneath His feet.

Arkan could be the death of the Force, Klee sent. His weakening of the Order left it to us; but if he takes his power to Sith worlds--

Each of us a part, she reminded him. Coruscant is ours. If the Traya has left, we must see to our tasks. Others will deal with Arkan, whether he is the Shadow or not. She glanced at him, warningly, and squeezed his hand again, before loosening the touch to a fingertip. Their speculation had been… enlivening; but its time was at an end.

Klee gestured towards Marla’s niece. And your plans to bring that one into the light?

Marla frowned. It wasn’t sentiment, she reminded herself; merely practicality. I will wait for her recovery.

Senator Malachi D’Reev had consolidated a great deal of power for them already. The Jedi were shattered and near-helpless. Those that remained would have to rely on the new Order’s counsel; and each inevitable step that would bring the heart of the Republic closer to its destiny.

A destiny of unity and empire. Without end.

That brings us to the rest of my news. His fingers brushed harder against hers, slippery in their gloves. Captain Onasi is in place.

Let us assume that your opinion of Revan’s character is correct, Marla told him. Such an obvious ploy would have never worked against the real Starfire.

This one is not her.

As far as we know. The holocron--

Was shattered. Of that I am sure. Klee’s eyes blinked. Master Kae showed me the pieces herself, shortly before her death. She said that Master Atris had it destroyed.

Arren Kae is dead? A pity. That one had been a useful pawn in their arsenal, unwittingly keeping the One informed of so many loyalties within the Order.

Kae is dead, he nodded. I sensed her end with Jopheena’s in the explosion, as we evacuated the Jedi Temple.

Did your message confirm their deaths? Jopheena had been up to something, Marla suspected. She wouldn’t put it past the woman to fake her own death.
My message confirmed that my new concern is Captain Onasi, Klee corrected. And his proper delivery from Dathomir, at the appropriate time.

Did you learn when that time will come?

He shook his head. Not yet.

XXX

Dustil knew where fracking Malak was, having just seen (and felt) more of the man’s personal life in the past day than he had ever wanted to know about.

Hey, at least he didn’t frack your stepmoms’... clone or whatever. Mekk sounded cheerful. Doesn’t even look like he’s got much of a shot with her.

She made him sleep in a chair. Dustil had to admit that had been funny. He realized their eyes were staring across the room again, where a brown-haired Zabrak girl was finally sitting up, and talking to the Human with the stupidly chiseled face and the body like a wet Telosian noodle.

If Master Azen Loanin got more cerebral, his brain would be in a vat.

Can you stop watching her? Looks like Loanin is locking that one down. Dustil turned their head away from where the youngest Jedi Master in the history of time was finally showing an interest in something besides viruses and cells… only to have Mekel promptly turn it back.

She’s looking at us. Me. Mekel shook their head sharply, and raised a hand in a wave. Dustil felt their mouth split into one of Mekk’s disarming grins: the kind that had gotten them both extra rations, and convinced more than a few initiates into an ambush. He reached out, and twisted the mouth instead, turning their expression into something he hoped looked more like a sneer.

“Are you having another seizure, Mekel?” Fracking Thalia May was hovering behind them, like Mekk was her pet project. What was it with him and girls?

“No,” Mekel said. “Actually I was feeling much better.” Can we get the frack out of here?

What about my body?

You want to go talk to Malak about his wife? The presence on the other side of the bond was something they both felt: dark as a maelstrom. Anger, but something more disturbing there too. Wants. Determination. And blankness, like a duracrete wall.

Remember what Ban said. His power is ours.

So you want to fight our way out of this Jedi... office and take it? Or you want to just leave? Mekel was looking at Lydie again. Dustil wrenched their gaze away, to where Masters Korr and Klee were… holding hands?

Check that out. One of them snickered. Masters in love!

The entire floor was open, with hastily-built cubes for all the medical emergencies. They’d corralled the little kids off in one corner, and the remaining masters were all circulating, and doing what the cynical part of them that was probably not… just them… thought was damage control.

“Mekel?” Thalia’s voice. Mekk turned their head to her again.

“I’m fine,” he snapped. “Let’s go to my Moms’s.”
You said that out loud.

I know. Thalia fracking May can see the future, right? That seems useful.

“You want to come with us--with me, Thalia?” Mekel added. “Sure beats this fracking place.”

Smooth. We're not leaving my body.

You want to invite Lord Malak to come with too? I think Moms has a few redheads on staff and you both like them--

The pain that came from slamming Mekk’s fist into the wall was worth being doubled, just for the asshole’s surprise.

The frack, Telos!

“Mekel?” Thalia looked concerned. No one else seemed to have noticed.

“It’s nothing.” He waved the injured hand at her, wincing. “So, you want to come to the Underground?”

“I’ve had enough time underground to last the rest of my life,” Thalia looked concerned. “I’m going to get a bacta pak for your hand--or find one of the healers--”

“I said it’s nothing,” Dustil told her, making their mouth smile. He shrugged. “Just one of those things.”

“Mekel.” Master Zez Kai came out of nowhere, pushing through their half-ball of a privacy screen like it was nothing. “I wanted to speak to you.” He turned to Thalia. “If you don’t mind, Padawan…?”

“I’ll check on the bacta,” Thalia murmured. She shot them one more confused glance before she left.

Dustil turned their head to her across the room. Thalia’s not bad. Why don’t you like her?

Who said I don’t? She’s cute. But Mekel was thinking about Lydie again, and that Mandalorian girl he never talked about.

I need my own frackin body back. If--when--he had it back, would Dustil go for Thalia May? Maybe he should, if only to shut Mekel the frack up--

“Mekel,” Master Zez repeated. He had food caught in his beard and his hair looked like granslugs had been nesting in it. “Has your… have you spoken with Master Vrook?”

“No,” Mekel said warily. “He’s not here, I don't think. Haven’t seen him.”

“I know. I just… I-I thought he might have contacted you.”

“Just woke up from that coma?” Mekel shrugged. “No one gave us--me--any messages.”

The real world felt too bright after weeks on that fracking ship. Months, even. Dustil put their injured hand in front of his eyes to shade out the sun.

“It’s just…” Master Zez paused again. “Have you… have you seen my padawan?”
“I didn’t know they gave you one.” Both of them fought off the smirk. Jedi must be desperate if old spicecakes gets a padawan.

“Knight Arkan.” The Jedi rubbed his temples. “He was my Padawan. I thought he’d… I thought he’d be here too.”

Mekel gestured to the fluid line still tethered to their arm. “Haven’t really had a chance to look, sir.”

Sir? Dustil snorted.

It’s called respect for your elders, asshat.

You? Since when do you respect anyone except fracking Malak and Revan?

To their faces, I respect a lot of people. Mekel paused. I respect your father. He was really worried about you.

Oh yeah? Then where the frack is he?

“You haven’t seen my--Captain Onasi--around, have you?” Dustil asked the Jedi out loud.

“I have not.” The man sighed. “I had hoped Vrook would just tell you himself.”

“Maybe he’s dead,” Mekel offered. “Tell me what?”

“He’s your father,” Master Zez Kai’El coughed, covering his mouth, so the words came out muffled, and nearly unintelligible. But they both heard anyway.

“Captain Onasi?” Mekel’s shock was real, like he really didn’t get it. It was Dustil who started laughing--a choked sound, as Mekk tried to close their mouth.

No. He means Vrook. Vrook is your father. He’s telling you that Master Vrook is your father.

That’s impossible. Mekel’s thoughts all seemed to implode at once. He’s lying, everyone knows he’s full of spice! He’s a lying sack of space nuts! Frack this, fracking-- “Banthashit,” the Coruscanti boy finally managed to sputter out loud.

XXX

Malak was sitting to the right of his son, with his father on the other side when pain exploded in his hand. He felt his mouth open and his breath draw in sharply before his mind could stop the response.

What the stars? When he looked down at the hand, the knuckles were red, tinging towards white. His knuckles felt sharp and swollen, and his fingers stiffened painfully when he tried to pull it into a fist.

“Father?” Malachor frowned at him, notching his voice down into the faintest of whispers. “Are you okay?”

On stage beneath their private box, the opera was reaching its climax. A bit heavy-handed of the old man, to pick an opera based upon the Great Hyperspace Wars, but Malak supposed he should be grateful it wasn’t the new musical, Starfire!, which was, by all accounts, just as dreadful as one assumed.
“Shhh,” Malak nodded, taking a deep breath. Pain. It was nothing new. He extended his senses out, tracing them to the other body.

_Vrook Lamar had a son?_ There had been something about the boy, he remembered that much. That fear and anger, a familiar, bitter taste. Familiar as his own now in the back of his throat as he thought again of the old man’s promise.

_You can never go home again, Coruscanti son._

Far away, he felt Mekel’s body stop, his head turn, the heart in his chest lurch. _Frack you frack, you frackhead._

Then Dustil’s anger, swamping their thoughts, all three of them—

_Peace._ Malak stared down at his hand, and flexed the fingers slowly. Nothing was broken. It merely felt as if he had slammed his fist into a wall.

XXX

“I always thought the girl might be lying,” Master Zez continued, as if they’d said nothing. Not laughed. Done nothing, but sit there slack-jawed, like Mekel was doing right now. “Her kind aren’t the most trustworthy sorts.”

“Her kind?” Mekel’s voice was dangerously low.

“When you were unconscious, the computer checked your genetics. We make a study of Force sensitivity. It is not an inherited trait by any marker we’ve managed to isolate; but it does run in families.”

“Yeah,” Mekel snapped. “It runs in mine. Like my uncle Kris always knew whether the dice would roll high or low. And Moms had a cousin who used to predict the weather. That doesn’t mean shit. I’m not—”

_Isn’t Master Vrook Revan’s uncle, Mekk?_

“I’m not,” Mekel repeated, ripping the line out of their arm. “Will you excuse me, Master Kai-El? I need to use… the fresher.”

_Find the exit. Where the frack is the exit?_

_Mekk? You don’t have to freak out about this._ Dustil tried to be nice. If Mekel wasn’t so upset, this would almost be funny.

_Does she know? Is that why she was nice to me? Why didn’t she just tell me?_

_Who?_

_Who do you fracking think? Her._

_You mean your cousin? Should I call you Mekel Starfire now, or Mekel Lamar—_ “Mekel,” Master Zez said again. His hand was patting their shoulder, even as Mekel was standing up, and taking stock of their surroundings.

_Wearing a hospital coverall, bare-assed in the back. No shoes. No weapons. No fraking credits— “Thanks for telling me,”_ the Coruscanti boy said finally out loud. He smiled at the man. “Do you
“I can help you find Vrook,” the man offered. “He and I were friends during the war. He lowered his voice. “In fact, I need to find him. Something’s not right here.” His eyes darted from side to side liked a squashed spider-roach before settling back on Mekel. “I think Klee and Korr are up to something.”

I’m not. Hey, if it meant they were finally getting out, Dustil would play along.

“Oh.” The old guy looked embarrassed. “Of course. Your possessions are in the crate at the foot of your cot. I packed them myself.”

“That was nice of you.” Mekk was already rummaging through them, mooning half the room. If it was his own body, Dustil would have been embarrassed, but Mekel just pulled out Bastila Shan’s lightsaber, (the one that kept reappearing in all of his ship dreams when he tried to cut Darth Malak’s head off), and then some clothes out of the trunk and threw them on the bed. “So, Master Vrook… he knows he’s my father?”

“I told him, yes.”

“And he ran off.” Fracking fathers. See, Telos? We don’t need them.

Maybe you’re right.

Shouldn’t dear old Dad left a message for Dustil or something? He was probably shacked up with Revan Starfire again, totally forgetting that he had a real fracking son--

Maybe he got sick of looking at Malak in your body, Telos. It’s not his fault.

You always defend the wrong fracking people. Dustil felt tired.

Mekel was already pulling on leggings, buckling the padawan underrobes, tying them like he’d been doing it all of his life instead of only for about a month. His fingers faltered as they shared the thought, and then he pulled on the outerrobe too, not bothering to tie that one. Their legs felt unsteady, weak. “I don’t have… any other clothes here?”

“Why would you need them?” Zez Kai rubbed his temples. “Vrook has a friend on Dantooine, but I don’t think he would have gone to her--not without leaving word first.”

“Why don’t you comm her to make sure?” Mekel widened his eyes.

“Why don’t you comm her to make sure?” Dustil repeated for him, pulling on the Force as he said it.

“I’m going to comm her to make sure,” Zezzles agreed.

“We’re gonna check a few things out. I mean, I--” they’d slipped, but Zez wasn’t even listening. He’d already left on his errand, shambling away like a man on a mission. Which, Dustil supposed, he now was.

“Mekel.” They were halfway to the elevator banks (crossing Mekk’s fingers the codes to this whole place hadn’t changed from being Malak D’Reev’s fracking nameday reversed--even if neither of them were exactly sure how they knew that) when Yuthura Ban intercepted them. “You’re looking well.”

“Feeling well, Mas--Padawan.” Dustil made Mekel’s voice as cheerful as it ever was, like after a good day with interrogation serum.

Feeling better than the Twi’lek looked anyway. Her eyes were red and her skin looked dull. As they were standing there, Yuthura Ban coughed.

“You look like you might need some assistance.” Ban offered her arm. “The healers tried to keep your muscles from atrophying while you were unconscious, but there’s still some adjustment.”

“What do you want, Ban?” Dustil broke in, taking the arm only to be polite.

“Security is somewhat disorganized,” she murmured. “Curious, considering D’Reev’s notorious paranoia. From what I’ve been given to understand, nothing is stopping Jedi from leaving this place--but getting back inside may prove more difficult.” She coughed again. “Does D’Reev not care? Or is leaving here the real trap?” Her brow ridge raised.

“We can take care of ourselves,” Mekel said, pulling their arm away again. But his head turned back, towards that Zabrak again, before Dustil jerked it forward towards the elevator. “I’ve got stuff to do.”

“Let me help.” Their former master sounded sincere, which didn’t mean she was. “The Jedi closed the clinics in the Underground, but we can still help. So many sick there.” As if on cue, Yuthura coughed again, this time sounding wet and ugly. Even though he’d just gotten over the fracking flu, Mekel took a step back.

“Sounds like you’d better stay here,” he said.

Yuthura grimaced. “It could just be the dry air--”

“You know it’s not.” Dustil patted her arm. “Take care of yourself, Ban. We’ll be back.”

Her purple skin was pale, like she’d been taking pipe hits of the dark side on the sly--except Dustil knew that wasn’t the problem. “Where are you going?” Her voice was hoarse. Her throat was probably sore. Both of them remembered how it felt.

Poor Master Ban. Got a case of the good old Korriban flu.

“Just gonna visit some family.” Mekk shrugged. “Here I am back home, and I haven’t even said hello properly.”

XXX

“Lydie.” Azen’s voice had a tinge of impatience in it. “Did you hear what I said?”

The world felt dull and muted. Voices were too soft, and facial expressions confusing with no sense of the intent behind them. But aside from that, Lydie Korr felt fine.

“What?” She looked up at him.

“Did you…” he looked nervous, with spots of color in his pale cheeks like a fever. “Was I… clear? I find certain emotional responses difficult to put into words.”

“Of course. Yes, it was clear.”
I just don’t know what to say back, Master Loanin. Does ‘you confound me too’ qualify as a declaration of relationship? If the Jedi Order is falling apart, are we allowed to have relationships? Is the fact that you’re a Jedi master and I’m a padawan mean that any relationship between ethically suspect from the start? Even if I find you attractive, how can we start anything? How would we start? Would you kiss me?

She tried to imagine it.

“Where is Mekel Jin going?”

“He shouldn’t even be walking yet,” Azen—he kept saying for her to just call him Azen, as if that would make this less morally fraught—frowned, as if that was the real problem, and not the fact that Mekel Jin had just left Padawan Yuthura Ban at the elevator banks and was stepping inside one of the cars. “The drugs he was given won’t fully clear his system for another day.”

“Drugs?” Lydie watched the doors close. “You mean the antivirals?”

“No. We drugged him to keep Malak unconscious.” Master Loa--Azen-- sighed. “It was Padawan Ban’s idea. Apparently, he and Dustil Onasi have some kind of Force bond, and since Malak is possessing Dustil Onasi’s body—”

“Mekel Jin just left the building,” Lydie pointed out. “That elevator only goes to the lobby.”

Always know every entrance and exit of a new installation. Chapter Two of Master Finistre’al’s “Introduction to a Siege: How to Live in Wartime.”

“I know,” Azen said. “But how was I supposed to stop him?”

Mekel would have stopped him, if it wasn’t him leaving. Mekel would have done something foolish and loud, but he would have done it.

Azen’s question had the unfortunate effect of making Lydie compare them. “You didn’t even try,” she snapped.

“Should I have?” His eyes were a very vivid gray, the color of a page. “My responsibility is to protect the Jedi here, possibly from sentients like him. Did you want me to stop him, Lydie Korr?”

“Someone… should have?” Her voice trailed off. Knight Bastien was reading to a group of apprentices. Masters Korr and Klee were standing by the window, deep in conversation. The Eosian Master was still wearing his bio-hazard suit, even if no one else was. Padawan Ban was standing at the elevator banks. As Lydie watched, the Twi’lek started coughing, bending over with the force of it.

“No one was available.” Azen Loanin paused. “You did not stop him either.”

“I know.” Would he have stopped? Why, in a room full of Jedi, was it left to Lydie to stop Mekel Jin from leaving?

Why was she disappointed he had left?

“It looks like we have another patient,” Azen murmured, as if nothing important had happened at all. “Padawan Korr, perhaps you could excuse me. I must prepare a bed for Padawan Ban.”

“Of course.” She nodded slowly. Without further ceremony, Master Loanin hurried forward, rushing to the Twi’lek’s side.
“You confound me too, Azen Loanin,” Lydie Korr whispered, watching him go.

XXX

Time passed, and Malak stared at the stage below, trying to focus on the absurd play, and not the Racharn box opposite, where the Leeshansintinian the First of Racharn sat alone, staring back at them with an intensity he mistrusted.

“You’re sure about the alliance, sir?” Malak leaned over his son’s head.

“We don’t talk during the performance,” the old man snapped. “Have you forgotten?”

“No.” Malak turned back to the play.

Below them on the stage, an actress was doing a passable job of playing Jori Daragon, the hapless smuggler who accidentally rediscovered Korriban, the planet of exiled Jedi from a time long past. The actress’s hair was brown, not red, but even from this distance, Malak thought she looked like Revan.

You see her everywhere. His father’s offer haunted him. I know it can’t be real. I know Red would never agree, but if she did: if things could ever be that simple, that easy--if she was really her at all--

“That lady looks like Mother,” Korrie stage whispered.

“Of course she does,” Malachi said. “I paid for Seriina’s surgery myself.”

Dark laughter welled in Malak’s throat. “It’s… realistic.”

“It needed to be for the vids,” the old man said. “But the time for such things is past. We’ve scheduled to have her native face restored.”

Below them, Seriina Starr began to sing:

“Most people live on a boring planet

Lost in the middle of stars

Most people long for another planet

One where they know their place

Korriban may call you

Any night, any day

In your heart, you'll hear it call you

Come away, come away...

XXX

“Have you been there?” Malachor whispered. His name is Korrie, not Malachor. Malak tried to remember, but when the past came too close, he forgot.

“What?” The actress did look exactly like Revan. There was something disturbing about that. Seriina Starr was at least twice Red’s age. And she and his father had been rumored to be involved by more than one holoraq.
“Have you been to Korriban?” Korrie pulled at his arm. “Fa--Dustil? Are you okay?”

“I--yes.” How to answer that? How to tell him what we did there, with our Academy? Molding children into our own image, constructing an Academy built on death and fear to make the strong. Building a new order of Force users, ones free from the shackles of the past?

XXX

“You’re sure about this?”

His wife just looked at him, her face eerily blank. Her hair was tangled and dusty, both of them streaked with the red dust and grit that seemed to be everywhere in this wretched valley. “Yes. It’s the last piece.”

“The last piece of that blasted map?” The more she spoke to the computer, the farther away she went.

“Yes.”

Malak snorted. “Your magic map that is going to win the blasted war for us?”

“No. Only we can win the war.” She frowned, correcting herself. “Only I can win the war.”

Malak stared up at the temple in front of them. Sand-swept stairs led to an entrance half-blocked by rubble. When he extended his senses he could feel the malevolence inside. “Of course. Your plan.”

How many times had he wished for an end to this war? Any end at all.

Malak stepped forward to stand beside her. “But I still don’t understand. What does finding this lost star system have to do with beating the Mandalorians?”

Her mouth twitched. “Nothing. But what happens after we win?”

We go home to our son, Red. We just go home to our son.

From her expression, she had heard his thought. “We already went over this, Mal. Don’t you remember?”

“I--” he frowned.

XXX

“Leeshy wanted to come tonight,” his son murmured. “But her mother said no. I wish she had come. We were going to wave back-and-forth.”

Malak followed the boy’s gaze across the balcony again. The Racharn First, the oldest Leeshansintina clone alive, was still there, sitting alone, glaring daggers at them.

On the other side of Korrie, Malachi coughed. “Her Third is ill,” he said. “Churlish of her to blame our House, but she does. Have a care, Malachor. If your friend dies--”

“What?” The child was too well schooled to speak above a whisper, but Malak felt his grief echo in the Force. “Leeshy’s sick? Why didn't you tell me?”

XXX
“What?” His wife crouched in front of him, her saber lit, and burning a hard yellow. “Malak?”

“What?” They were no longer outside, but in a room. On a wall opposite, a map of constellations, reflecting the final piece of their mad quest. He looked down at his own saber, burning in his hand. “Red?”

Her stance was aggressive, but guarded. “You… is it really you?” The ice-calm of earlier was gone, vanished, replaced by fear that pounded against his senses, even as her panicked thoughts threatened to overwhelm both of them.

“Of course it’s me.” He tried to laugh.

Lost time. Like the other night, when he’d found himself standing over her sleeping body with a lit saber.

It’s the war. It’s changing us. End it as soon as possible to keep us all safe. It’s the war. It’s just the war. I’m not losing my mind. This isn’t… when the war ends, it will be better. I will be better.

“I thought you were possessed. Your eyes were glowing red. This is Naga Sadow’s tomb. He’s possessed Jedi before.”

“I’m… I’m not possessed.” He took a deep breath. “I’m me. We were… we were just outside. You asked me if I remembered your damnable plan--”

“You were possessed.” Revan looked pale. She was rarely frightened, but what he felt now in the Force was close. “Just now. Your eyes glowed red and you told me you were waiting for me. You told me you had been waiting for me for a very long time.”

“Well, this is Naga Sadow’s tomb.” Malak tried to smile. “He’s waiting for us, I assume.”

“I don’t know.” She deactivated her saber and walked towards him. Her hand reached out and brushed his cheek.

Despite himself, Malak flinched.

“It still hurts?” She frowned. “We got the shrapnel out.”

“It’s fine.” He turned to look at the map. “So now what?”

“He’s waiting for us.” She frowned. “They’re waiting for us. First we end the war. Then we find the means to stop another--stop any war from happening ever again.”

“Who is waiting for us?” This was… it had all started when her damned computer promised them a place to hide. After… after what Revan had planned, they would be traitors. They’d followed its instructions, traced the maps, but now--

“I don’t know,” she said. “But you know we can’t stay in Republic space… after… we do what we have to do.”

“We could just come here.” Malak tried to make it a joke, to ignore the cold sensation of rightness the Force had in this place. “I don’t know about you, but I quite like the sunsets over Sith ruins. And roasted tu’kata isn’t half-bad.”

His wife laughed. Sharply, but at least she did. “Let’s get out of here before we both get possessed.” She embraced him, arms wrapping around his chest. Her hair brushed his chin and her head tilted up. I’m glad you’re back, Mal. Don’t scare me like that again.

I won’t, Red. I promise. “Is that what happened?” He ignored the sense of fear in his gut. “Interesting, that Sadow chose me over the strongest Jedi of her generation.”

Revan snorted. “Maybe he just wanted to pee standing up.”

XXX

“Father? I don’t want Leeshy to die!”

“Control yourself, Malachor.” The old man coughed. “If you make a spectacle here, I will suspend your future activities with the Racharn child.”

“It’s okay, Korrie.” Malak put his arm around his son, but then something pulled--

XXX

And then Mekel’s body was walking quickly through the streets, driven by a purpose. The boys’ intent echoed through the Force, and Malak felt his breath draw back--

You can’t kill your own mother!

Mind your own business, asshole. Dustil’s voice. We’re not going to kill her--even if we want to--we’re just going to shake her down.

Shake her? Down? He tried to make sense of that image and failed.

She owes us credits. The Coruscant boy’s mental voice was harder than his spoken one. Right now it seethed with barely repressed rage. She lied to me. All these fracking years!

You need… money? This was some kind of mercenary exchange?

Xxx

“I’ll be good. This part is sad,” Korrie whispered in his ear. “Have you seen it before?”

“No,” Malak said absently. He withdrew his arm from the boy and sat up straight.

Xxx

Most sents do need credits, D’Reevie. We can’t all be rich assholes like you.

That one looks good. Follow him.

Like a ferraglass reflection superimposed over the play, Malak saw what Mekel Jin did; his own arm, dressed incongruously as a padawan, the richly dressed couple in front of him.

The woman turned her head, and then relaxed. Malak felt the boy’s mouth twist into a smile--

He ambled closer--

Stop, he commanded them. You can’t do this.

When we met you said I was good at it, Mekel’s mental voice was acid. Gettin all soft now, Malakins?
I'll get you credits, he promised them. As much as you need. Just don't... hurt anyone.

All of them, hovering on the edge of darkness, standing above a precipice. It wasn't concern for Dustil and Mekel that made Malak act: it was the fear that their fall would bring his own.

Bring them to my moms’ brothel, the Coruscanti boy thought.

You're telling him how to find us? The Telosian.

Mekel gave the mental equivalent of a snort. He’ll just know anyway. He can find us....

And we can find him. Dustil’s thought had the feeling of a threat.

Then Malak felt the corners of his own mouth twitch. Something dark bubbled in his gut, and he felt his body lean back in its chair, crossing its leg slowly, a gesture of flagrant disrespect in Senatorial quarters.

We know where you are too, asshole, one of them or both. Blended thought. Doubled.Bring the credits. Lots of them to Moms.

“Father?” Korrie’s voice.

Malak forced his leg back down, ignoring the Racharn glare.

“I’m here, Korrie. Let's enjoy the show.”

On the other side of his son, his father said nothing, then coughed, suddenly loud and wet in the play’s dramatic pause.

XXX

///[What are you doing now?/// Mission demanded, her voice pitched like a low buzz into Carth’s headset.

“I need your full concentration,” Mother Erksha—the Abbess—chided, almost at the same time.

“Sorry… it’s just my… Zaalbar had some questions about the ship repairs.” Carth nodded to the Abbess, hoping she’d get the hint and give him some privacy, but the woman just sat there, legs folded under her, across the steaming brazier that was filling the air with sweet-smelling smoke.

“You should take off your device. Opening the blind to the powers from beyond is no easy task.”

This ritual, as he understood it, would unlock some kind of connection that would let him reach Dustil. Speak to him. And maybe, if Carth could do that, he could at least know--

///[There’s something weird about this place.///

“You don’t know the half of it, sister.” Carth stared overhead, at the mural representing a multi-armed deity, with one bulbous eye, and tentacles for arms. Lots and lots of arms. Kinda reminded him of that time on Retief, when he and Saul had met the Devonian--

That was a pretty funny story. Thinking about it made Carth laugh.

“Mirth,” the Abbess murmured. “Sometimes the smoke affects your kind that way.” She loomed over him, and her fingers plucked the thin piece of metal from his ear. “You will not need your device.”
“Izzaher,” Carth told her. “Mission.”

“Your mission is no longer important,” the Abbess soothed. “Now that you are a part of one much greater.”

XXX

“Bantha poo doo,” Mission cursed.

“What is wrong?” Big Z sounded worried too. From the way he kept pacing back and forth in front of their ship, he didn’t like this place any more than Mission did.

“I have a bad feeling,” she muttered. “How nuts is that?”

“It is not,” her oldest friend groaned. “I do too. We should not have left friend Carth. What does he say?”

“He’s not wearing the headset,” she barked back. “I can’t tell what he’s saying.”

Zaalbar was already strapping on his munitions belt.

“Are you nuts, Big Z?” Mission was so excited that she beeped instead of growled. “That place is full of Sith! We can’t just go charging in.”

“I will wear a stealth belt.” Big Z sounded injured, as if she’d hurt his feelings.

If Mission had feelings, they’d be hurt too. “I can’t wear a stealth belt, and they’ll smell you. Or see you.”

“We are both nervous,” Zaalbar sighed. “But the D’Reev would not risk Polla-Revan’s wrath, by sending Carth into harm.”

“You’re too trusting,” Mission muttered. Even if she couldn’t remember a lot about the last thirty thousand years, she was pretty sure they’d been full of betrayals. Sentients betrayed all the time.

XXX

Smoke guttered in the brazier, filling the small room with a sweet smell, like burning. The multi-armed deity on the wall seemed to dance.

XXX

It was too smoky in this bar by half. Half, and he’d been working time and half ever since the last round of star-side assignments ended. Grounded Republic pilots only got half pay, and with Morgana almost due, the bills still needed to be paid. Not to mention the wedding. How the hell was he gonna pay for that?

“Can you put that out?” Carth asked the worst offender, a four-armed Besalisk, with a lit cigarra in each one, and an additional deathstick burning in the ashdisc hovering beside him. “My girlfriend’s about to have a baby.”
“Here?” The man flapped his ears, as if with laughter. “Pretty sure, it ain’t legal to have a baby right here.”

“I’m meeting her here.” He’d picked the place because it was close to the tramway, an easy walk for Morgana. The reviews suggested it was a nice dive; they’d neglected to mention it was full of suicidal assholes smoking their lungs into oblivion.

“Then maybe you’d better wait outside.” The Besalisk gestured towards the door with one of his upper hands.

“Maybe we should take it outside, since you can’t seem to read.” Carth jerked his chin towards the sign that clearly said, ‘No Smoking,’ in six different languages.

The Besalisk laughed. “You’ve gotta be kidding me.” He looked up at Carth from his seat and Carth realized what he hadn’t noticed before: the man was wearing a captain’s bars on his stained jacket, and a heavy, Fleet Academy ring on one of his meaty fingers.

“Maybe we should take it outside…” Carth paused. “Sir.”

XXX

“You’re smiling,” the priestess said. Her voice seemed to be coming from a great distance. Another voice, tinny and insubstantial, kept calling his name.

“Morgana?” That wasn’t the right name, but Carth could feel the smile on his face still. “The day Dustil was born, there was this guy… he had four arms. Only gave me a black eye with one. But then he used two to catch my son, when I was holding Morgana’s hand. We got stuck in a brownout, no traffic to the hospital. Dustil was born in a pub. Never… always meant to tell him about that. About his name.”

“You’ve traveled too far back in time,” the priestess said. “How do I turn off this contraption of yours? Its screaming is very disruptive.”

“That was my last bar fight,” Carth told her. “Captain Kinara Dustill-Inzazeen got me back in the active reserves. Me and Saul both. We both had kids, Selene was a couple of months old when Dustil was born.”

XXX

“Push.” He said it because he was supposed to say it. That had been on all of the vids.

“Not yet,” the Besalisk warned. He crouched between Morgana’s legs on the ground. Someone had put up a tablecloth, two servomech droids held it around them for a semblance of privacy. The lights flickered overhead, on and off, the power cuts so common in this sector giving everything an air of unreality.

“I hate this,” his girlfriend--not yet wife--not until three weeks later, when he finally just gave her his grandmother’s ring and she said she’d never cared about a fancy ceremony and they’d both known it for a lie, but not one that mattered. His girlfriend screamed. “I hate this! It hurts! Take it back!!”

“I can’t.” His cheeks were wet. Both of them crying. It was disgusting and it killed him, to see her in so much pain.

“Stop pushing,” Kinara told them. You got on a first-name basis pretty fast with the sent who was standing there when your wife collapsed on the ground and started screaming that she was in labor. “Why does your species have such narrow birth canals?”

“Go to hell!” Morgana was shocked enough that she lifted her head and almost laughed. “I really need to push!”

“Almost.” The captain patted her stomach. “He’s almost there.”

XXX

“I wondered how he knew Morgana was having a boy.” Carth tried to explain. “Found out later, they only use the male pronoun. Dustill-Inzazeen put in a word with the brass, got me restored to active. Put in a word for my mentor Saul too. We’d both been kicked to the curb after the spice thing. After that, Saul said, all we needed now to rise was a good, old-fashioned war.”

“Too far back,” the priestess repeated. “He wants to see her.”

“See who?” Carth rubbed his eyes. “Who wants to see what?”

XXX

“I’m naming him after you,” he declared. Felt like a punch in the gut, seeing Morgana’s dark eyes staring up at his face. Red, wrinkled, and speckled with something white.

His son was the most beautiful thing Carth Onasi had ever seen. “You finished the hard part,” he told those dark eyes. “Everything from here on out, it’s all gonna be stars.”

“Give him to me.” His wife was sitting up, her voice a little hoarse. Dark hair tangled and tumbling down her shoulders. Her skin was glowing. Looking at her, Carth felt something swell in his chest.

“I love you,” his whispered. “I love you both so much--”

XXX

“Do you hear that?” It was a nice change, being out in the real world. They had clothes now too, even if they were fracking Jedi clothes. Clothing, shoes, and D’Reev hadn’t changed the passcodes that operated the main elevator bank of the building. They were (relatively speaking) free.

Hear what? You don’t need to speak out loud. I can hear you no matter what. I can’t fracking not hear you.

What was it that Yuthura had told them? Bonded for life? What affected one would affect the other? That would be a lot easier to handle if they could do it in two bodies, instead of just Mekk’s. Everything was slightly off, like his legs were too short, or his arms were too long--

My arms are not too long. What the frack are you talking about?

Did you see what we just did? We were fracking there with Malak. We drove him out!

For a second. Mekel sounded more angry than impressed. Maybe that was the trick. Maybe he needed to keep Mekk pissed off--

It’s some kind of lie, right? The Vrook thing? It’s impossible.

I don’t know. You do kinda look like him. Dustil ran a hand through their hair.
Frack you too.

In your dreams.

“Are we talking about those dreams now?” Mekel pulled their face into a smirk, and jumped on the last moving stair before the bus home. It was crowded. “Because I don't remember hearing any complaints from you back on the ship--”

“Yeah, watching you jerk off in dreamland was great. Thanks for the memories, Mekk.”

“Someone had to show you how.”

Two Rodians, not much older than them and pretty obviously on a date, edged away from the crazy Human.

Mekel flashed them a smile as he slipped past, heading down the moving stair where suddenly every sentient near them on it had moved to the side.

Not bad. Dustil had to admit he was actually impressed.

When you grow up in a crowd, you need to know how to clear the room, Telos.

Mekel smiled, a real smile this time. “Remember that time we had the Rodese itch after your fracked those Gamorrean twins with Lord Malak and the k’lor slug?”

“Yes, I remember,” his own voice said back as Mekel nodded their head. “That was great! Until I chopped them to pieces with my lightsaber.”

The remaining sentients on the stair edged closer to the wall, looking in any direction but at them.

How many credits do you think Malak is good for, Telos?

I don't know, a million? Five million?

Maybe.

XXX

“Her? Who’s her?” Carth’s head felt fuzzy, detached from his body.

“Your master,” the Abbess murmured. “Mine knew the old Starfire quite well, but her new incarnation confounds him. You will help us understand.”

“What?” A flash of panic through the smoke. Realization suddenly--

She’s drugged you. She’s drugged you just like those D’Reev assholes and made you helpless again--

Carth bit his tongue and tasted blood. The pain helped shock his senses. “Who?” he sputtered. “Who the hell is your master?”

“All serve the One.” She leaned over him, impossibly tall. But weren’t they both sitting? Carth had thought… they were sitting. “We all serve him. He has many names on a thousand worlds. Emperor. Tenebrae. Vitiate. Valkorion--”

Carth’s hand fumbled at his belt, and he closed his eyes.
Not again. This can’t happen again. They can’t turn me against you, Polla. Not again!

“Your struggle is instinctive, but fruitless. You have joined the One. When he needs your eyes, they will open. When he needs your breath, you will breathe. When he needs your prayers, you will pray—”

No. No! “I’ll never join you,” Carth gritted. His eyes were still closed, but somehow… he could feel her looming over him. The holdout was tight and smooth in his hand. He popped off the safety with his thumb and fired.

His aim was true.

XXX

Malak was having some angst banthashit about sleeping in the same room as his… clone-wife or whatever she was. It would have been funny to hear about, but feeling echoes of it in their skull was less funny, especially since the man’s thoughts seemed to be circling bottom like a drain.

I can’t lose my son. It’s a way out. She’d never agree. The old man can’t live forever, and when he dies--

Their skull. Frack that. You know I love you, Telos, but this you, me, and Malak makes three is gonna get old fracking quick.

“Love?” Dustil said the word out loud. “I’m not sure we’re there yet.”

“Give it time, Telos. What else are we gonna do?”

A few sents on the crowded hoverbus glanced at the man in Padawan robes talking to himself, and then edged away, giving them more room.

“I don’t know.” Dustil sounded serious again. Uh-oh. This was all fracked enough without him getting maudlin.

Look, so your father’s missing. Least he’s not some stuck up Jedi who always looked at you like you were shit stuck to his shoe.

If you feel like that, why are we dealing at all? What do you think your mother's gonna say?

What do you mean? Mekel didn't have to think: he knew exactly what she'd say. Moms'd start with lies, then move on to guilt and pastry, and probably talk him into doing some fracked up job for one of her goons. It beat working like she did, he figured, even if getting caught meant the tanks for sure.

Pastry? Dustil was getting stuck on the wrong thoughts. One of them was hungry. One of the bodies. Maybe both.

Careful of the spiced ones. Eat enough of those and you’ll wake up contract bound to some pleasure dome on Zeltros--

Actually, right about now, that didn't sound half bad.

We’re not running away to be whores or join a space circus, or whatever other insane plan you’re cooking up, Mekel. Get all of that out of your head now.

Fine. But like I said, avoid the spiced pastries--
“Master Jedi.”

Mekel craned their head, simultaneously slumping down towards the (not empty) seats to avoid attracting the master Jedi’s attention. The voice was coming from behind them so--

He half-turned their head. I think he means us, he means us, the master Jedi-- Dustil took control of their voice. “Yes?”

“Hurda cl’nich’s close. Dhey're sayin alla Jed eye urr leaven. Zat true?”

The man’s accent was even thicker than Mekel’s had been once. It took him a second to process. Heard the clinic’s closed. They’re saying all the Jedi are leaving. Is that true?  “No,” Mekel said. “We’re not leaving. See how I’m here? We Jedi are always here to help.”

“Welleye need’elp!” Well, I need help! The man said. Rodian. Short, even for one of them. “Kin yoo--” Can you--

“This is our stop,” Dustil broke in, pushing past the man, and thumbing open the lever that pressed the door.

“Wait!”

But they were already gone.

Shoulda taken the train. No one there ever asks for nothin--
You could understand what he said?

You couldn’t? They were already off, leaving good deeds left undone behind them. The clinic can’t really be closing, can it?

Things are fracked, Dustil observed.

It was an understatement.

XXX

Ando was a watery world, with floating labs like fiefdoms. The gentle rocking back and forth of this particular prison ship was doing nothing for Lena’s digestion; and what she was here to procure made it even worse.

“It’s an unusual request.” The Aqualish chittered, mandibles clattering and voder translating. “Most of our clients prefer to keep the lower brain function: without it, the vessels require constant life support.” He made a cha-cha-ing sound, and tapped the door that led to the containment room.

“My client has unusual tastes.” Lena Wee was glad to be pregnant, because it would give her an excuse if she lost her ch’tooties all over the antiseptic gray floor of this corporate prison.

“I have to remind you, Xperia’s Correctional Facility does not sell vessels for medical experimentation or breeding,” the Aqualish added. “All of our living cadavers are sterilized and geno-tagged. No reputable lab would accept farmed body parts: these prisoners are meant to live out their life sentences as intact beings.”

“Intact but mindless.” It hadn’t sounded so bad, back on Kashykk. Do a good deed for the kid. Help her find a body. But being here and seeing it was an entirely different thing.
“These all have life sentences,” the Aqualish reminded her. “If they could wake up, they could get out before their terms were up, and we are contractually obligated to make sure that justice is served.”

_They’re already dead_, she reminded herself, as they passed through the rows of cryostasis tanks, one after another, all naked and each displayed like a slab of meat for the butcher. A disturbing number were Twi’leks. Nearly all were beautiful. More than half were female.

“Was there a color you were looking for, specifically?”

[[Do they have any pinks? I always thought I’d look good as a pink.]]

“Do you have any pinks?” _I am not going to be sick._

“It’s a popular color,” the Aqualish burbled. “Some sents say their nerve endings are closer to the surface.”

_I am going to be sick._ Lena held her hand over her mouth, feeling her lekku wrap themselves into a ball.

[[Tilt your head up more. I can’t see.]] Mission was focused like a machine on her objective.

_Because she is one._

Lena lifted her head back up, turning the monocle she wore in her right eye up to pan across the row of frozen bodies and swallowing her own bile.

“Of course, if your client is willing to pay extra--”

[[Tell him credits aren’t a problem.]]

“Do you have a refresher station?” Lena tried to swallow her guts back down. “I’m sorry, but I think I’m going to be sick.”

“Not on our floor! You’ll contaminate everything! RK, please escort the client to the waste disposal facility at once!”

A silver droid glided forward, its sensors chiming. “Warm Compliance, Noble Sir. Noble Madam, if you would just step this way--”

[[Is something wrong? Are they out of Pinks? Blue would be okay. Or yellow?]]

“I’m fine.” Lena closed her eyes and willed it to be so. “We’ll take that one.” She pointed at random.

“The lavender with dark stippling to yellow on the tips of the lekku. An… interesting choice. Muscular, but buxom.”

[[You can’t just pick one--oh. Can you zoom in? She’s… pretty. I like her. Tell them we’ll take her.]]

“That one,” she said, more authoritatively. “I assume they’re all screened for diseases and degenerative conditions?”

“Our health screens are top notch!” The Aqualish’s voder might have sounded offended.
She heard the droid say something, in a language that sounded like water.

“Oh! Apologies. Tee’raa Janos is part of a matched set. We can’t sell her separately.”

“I’m sorry?”

[[I like that one, if they don’t have any Pinks.]]

The Twi’lek in front of them was lavender, as advertised, shading to deep blue, almost gray. Her eyes were closed, and her face as slack as all the rest, but it had a grim set to its features: as if the woman she had been had known exactly what the fates had in store for her.

“A matched set?” She didn’t even know what that meant.

“Her twin is the one next to her. See? Both cases are marked with the same sigil.”

The other one was white, with nearly an identical face--and an identical expression.

Her headset buzzed. [[That one’s lekku are sort of pink.]]

“My client only wants the one.” Lena shrugged. “I suppose we could pay for the other too, but we only contracted to buy one, and the terms of the agreement you reached with I.E., Limited were quite clear on that point.”

[[No. Get both.]]

“I mean… we’ll take both.” Curiosity hadn’t exactly done Lena favors lately (despite making her rich beyond her wildest dreams); but she had to know. “What did they do?”

“All of our vessels committed horrible crimes, of course. But these two?” The Aqualish paused. “I think it was bank robbery.”

The droid gurgled again.

“Apologies, I mean murder. It was murder. They murdered their master in a most foul and depraved fashion.”

Lena had never been a slave, but she had been a joygirl; and she'd seen enough of the world to know that most people who had slaves were foul and depraved individuals. “Good for them,” she muttered under her breath. “You’re sure they… they aren’t… there anymore?”

“If you want me to unthaw one of them now, you can attempt to converse with it; but with Twi’leks the operation is quite simple: we sever the connection to the primary and tertiary brain stems at the branch of the lekku. The tissue regenerates, but without higher function…” His tusks clacked. “No more person: just a responsive, breathing, sack of flesh.”

Lena gagged, and finally started puking all over the antiseptic sterilized clinic floor.

[[Why are you looking at the floor? What’s going on? Lena?] A pause. [[It’s not like the baby is coming early, is it?]]

“I’m fine,” Lena said out loud, trying to spit the horrible taste from her mouth. I'm fine and this will get better. We can get off this stinking planet and then I can ask Nico to make sure these fracking wormsults never hurt another joygirl--

Power, as she had to keep reminding herself, meant being able to make a difference, even if it also meant making sacrifices for the greater good.

XXX
“All serve the One.” The Abbess leaned over him, impossibly tall. But weren’t they both sitting? Carth had thought… they were sitting. “We all serve him. He has many names on a thousand worlds. Emperor. Tenebrae. Vitiate. Valkorion—”

Carth’s hand fumbled at his belt, and he closed his eyes.

Not again. This can't happen again. They can't turn me against you, Polla. Not again!

“Your struggle is instinctive, but fruitless. You have joined the One. When he needs your eyes, they will open. When he needs your breath, you will breathe. When he needs your prayers, you will pray—”

No. No! “I’ll never join you,” Carth gritted. His eyes were still closed, but somehow… he could feel her looming over him. The holdout was tight and smooth in his hand. He popped off the safety with his thumb and fired.

His aim was true.

“I’ll never join… I’ll never join… you.” Over and over. Carth’s voice rasped and his throat was sore. His own voice echoed in the empty room, reverberating through his skull.

How long had he been saying it? “I’ll never join you!” Promise me—hells, Revan, if he’s got me, would you put a blaster to my head?

No way to tell, because there was no one to answer.

There was a blaster-bolt-sized hole in the middle of the Abbess’s forehead now, and that strange echo of a memory—like he had seen this before. Another woman, slumped across the floor. Another dead face, brown-skinned, forehead charred. The brazier between them sent more of its sickly-sweet drugged smoke winding into his head, fracking with his brain. Blast, for a second the room seemed filled with sentients—thousands, maybe even millions of them overlapping, stacked on top of each other, all echoing in his skull, all screaming in unison—

No. It's just the drugs, Onasi. Just the drugs. Carth heard a voice laughing helplessly and then it took him another eternity to realize that voice was his own. Looked down and saw his own arms, his feet, pacing back and forth across the stone floor.

“I’ll never join you,” he whispered. His head pounded. His throat was raw.

“Is she dead?” A kid’s voice came from outside, interrupted his descent into madness. A kid, grown to man, but only just. Voice raw-edged and new.

Carth lifted his head and met the steady, blue-eyed gaze of another Zabrak. This one was a little taller, darker, sturdier than Takan. “Y-yes. I think. She was trying to…” he blinked and rubbed his eyes, hoping to hell the doubled ghost images would fade away completely. Just the drugs, sir. Just the drugs. “She... she did something to me.”
“She was our teacher.” The kid seemed to hesitate, looking as wary as Dustil had, back on Korriban. That sly half-glance, the hunched shoulders—all painfully familiar. “Did she… teach you?”

The kid had a lightsaber on his belt. Double hilt, like Revan. Maybe the right thing to do would be to lie, but he was just a kid and something in his voice—

“She drugged me.” Carth shook his head sharply. “I’m not sure what she was trying to do. I—I shot her.” His breath choked. “I’m sorry, I shot her. She was trying to—she was inside—in my mind…” The blaster was on the ground. Carth didn’t remember dropping it. Please, by all the stars, don’t make me shoot this kid too.

The kid walked forward, still eyeing Carth carefully. He held out his hand, and the smoke in the brazier bent and guttered, coals extinguished with a thought. His fingers moved, and the smoke coalesced, thickening, and guttering along the floor until it vanished. “Some of us think we know what her lessons are for,” he offered. The wariness was painfully familiar. “Some of the students here are… different.” He seemed to hesitate. “Some of us have… questions.”

“I’m not like you,” Carth said. “I’m not like any of you. You all have the Force. I’m sorry, I—” his breath came out in a ragged sob and suddenly, he was back on that ship again. Had that really happened? He’d thought it was a dream before, but now— “She was… she was doing something to me. She wanted me to join you. I had to—I had to stop it.” Did I? Did I stop it? Fear and nausea twisted in his guts. He looked down again and realized his hands were shaking.

“Not all of us have Force.” The boy frowned. “But all of us who have… questions, we all have been where you stand now.” His words were oddly formal, as if Basic wasn’t his first language. “None had the power—you are no true warrior, and yet you ended her. Why?” He hesitated again. “Did the One order her death?” He nodded slowly, an exaggerated gesture; but his forehead creased around his horns, dappling his gold skin. “Of course… the One must have ordered her death?”

I’m no warrior? Carth could have laughed. You have no damn idea. “I don’t understand.” For a dizzying second, words echoed again in his skull, spoken in a language he didn’t understand. He opened his eyes again, and the kid was a meter closer than he had been a millisecond before.

“It takes time.” The boy lowered his voice, glancing warily behind him. “You will sometimes wake in a new place with no memory, sometimes find yourself speaking no words you know.”

“I don’t understand.” Join me, she said. She said join me, and those voices—

“I know.” The boy glanced behind them. “Others will come soon. You must… do not show confusion to them. They… have no questions. Confusion is a sign that the transfer was weak.” He stepped closer, and before Carth could stop him, grabbed his hand.

*Hear me. * His voice, now echoing dully in Carth’s skull. *If I sense your doubt, they will too. I am Zepth. You are Carth Onasi and we are not One. But you must collect yourself. Calm yourself. If you do not, you will betray us both. *

“I don’t—I don’t understand!” He tried to pull away, but the kid had a strong grip, held him fast. I don’t have the Force, how the hell can I hear him? I must be losing my mind—

*You must speak silently. Only through touch. When we are close, we can hear one another. Like this. Quickly. Others come. *
“I don’t—” what— The word, just one, a spark inside his skull. Carth closed his eyes. *What did she do to me? *

*She made you a part of Him. As she made us all. It is this place’s true purpose. *

*Him? *

*The Lord of the Galaxy. *

*Who? *

*The Lord of the Sith. The Last and Eternal Emperor. *

Carth fought back a hopeless laugh. *I thought Darth Malak had that title last. *

*There are several Lords of Sith, but Lord Tenebrae reigns above them all. And now you are a part of him. *

No! *That blaster on the floor. Promise me— “No,” he said out loud. “I’m not. I won’t.”

The kid squeezed his hand. *Our master has a billion eyes, but he can only see through a finite number at a time. Some of us… resist, beneath his notice. As you did now, when you killed Mother Erksha. * The expression on his face, something in those eyes. Was it hope? Admiration? Mission had looked at him like that, after they rescued Griff Vao from the sandpeople slavers on Tatooine. *The ones who come now have no questions, and so we must not question. Aberrant thoughts are extinguished, when discovered. *

More loyalty to this Sith Lord of yours that I’ve never heard of? “What should I… what do we do?”

“Nothing.” The kid’s lips thinned when he smiled, but it deepened the indentations on his face. *Say to them that you have no memory of what transpired. Amnesia is... common with us. * His head nodded slowly, and then he dropped Carth’s hand, and folded his own, standing perfectly still, head inclined as if in a position of prayer. His eyes met Carth’s again, and he nodded, raising his brows, obviously inviting Carth to do the same.

Carth followed his gaze downward. Something glinted at their feet. Metal. It took Carth a moment to place it. Another to realize that Mission’s voice was still screaming through the headset. He bent down and picked it up, thumbing the volume down, and slowly slipped it in his pocket. With a feeling he didn’t want to acknowledge as real, he could feel the others approaching.

“Here goes nothing,” he muttered, folding his own hands, and bowing his head.

Xxx

“Carth?” Dumb nerherder wasn’t picking up his comm. Mission began rattling off the curses she had stored in her memory banks. The man hadn’t said anything all since they’d heard that unmistakable sound through the comm’s speaker: the sharp whine of a blaster discharged into flesh at short range. Someone on the other end was still breathing… but that was all they were doing.

“We’re going, Mission.” Zaalbar had his bowcaster out and cocked. “Something went very wrong.”

“Right behind you.” Or in front. “Let me go first,” she added, but Big Z was already charging down the gangplank.

The problem with her chassis was its lack of flexibility. Mission’s treads could only go so fast on the uneven ground. She trailed behind, beeping instructions and cautions that the Wookiee was too angry to hear.

The entrance to the Temple wasn’t deserted either. Two Zabraks, one of them the kid who had escorted them up here in the first place, and the other what looked like his almost matching datacaddy, stood sentry in front of the door.

Zaalbar roared softly. “Tell them to let us pass and I won’t hurt them.”

“Let us through or our ship will burn this edifice to the ground,” Mission snarled, in her best recreation of Polla-Revan’s voice. “And if Carth isn't breathing, you're both already dead.”

“He shot the Abbess,” Takan said. There was something strange in his face. His eyes…it took Mission a sec to check her sensors and make sure poor T3 wasn’t imagining it. Both of them had eyes that were glowing red now. Zabrak eyes… didn't do that. Mission might not have access to the Nets at the moment, but she was pretty sure that Zabrak eyes never glowed red.

“Oh yeah? If he shot her, he had reasons.” And he’d better be alive to tell Mission what they were. Balls, she’d thought Carth was the diplomatic one. If she’d known he was just going to kill everyone, she might as well have let Big Z go along for back-up.

“The Mother will be a difficult vessel to replace.”

“Madclaw,” Zaalbar groaned. He aimed his bowcaster at the kid, but Mission could see the conflict in his stance, the tremble of his arms. His aim would be bad, and she had a seriously bad feeling.

“Are you fracking serious with this vessel bantha poo?” she demanded. “Bring Carth to us, right now!”

“Inside.” The Zabrak walked closer to her, frowning. “We will take you to him in a moment, Lord Revan.”

One good thing about having a dome instead of a skull was the ease it took to not look surprised. “That's right,” Mission snapped. “You will.”

“Our vessels here are yours.” The other boy’s voice was deeper, but it had the same accent, and the same inflection. Same creepy red glowing eyes too. “Trust has been won at great cost between us. We thought we were long past the days when you would send your droid emissary to Dromund Kaas with a commlink, instead of coming yourself.”

If Mission had eyes, they would be rolling. “Have we moved beyond the point where I could raze this planet from its skies?” Was it hazardous to sentient life if the guy was a Force-possessing asshole? Mission wanted to know the name of this loser.

At least threats weren’t hazardous to sentient life, because she had a lot of them.

“This planet?” The Zabrak shrugged. “It has no defenses, or significant resources. If its presence displeases you, end it. The installation does rest in your territory, as per the terms of our last treaty.”

Maybe the original Revan Starfire made treaties with assholes. Mission was pretty sure that Polla-Revan never would.

“I'm just reminding you I can burn this world if I want to, chuba-face!”
Zaalbar growled. “Careful.” His fur wrinkled around his nose like it did when he was thinking. “Lord Revan is upset,” he growled at the Zabraks. “When she is disturbed, she resorts to unusual epithets.”

Takan raised an eyebrow at the Wookiee, as if he understood Shyriiwook. He hadn’t before, but he did when his eyes were all glowy and he was possessed by some loser? Obviously, Big Z thought so.

“We will take you to the man now.” The kid shrugged, strange and mechanical. “His conduit is complete. A weaker vessel than your last consort; but enough for our design.”

Mission rattled through the probabilities as fast as she could. Some kind of Force-possessing creepy Sith guy or guys who made red glowy eyes. And Carth was a vessel? A conduit? Like, Force-possessed like these losers? That was fracked. Didn't they have enough Force-possessed sents around already? Poor Carth. Poor Dustil! (If Sithboy even still existed. Mekel Jin had been kind of insane and not very clear, before he rudely cut her out of his life.)

“Carth Onasi had better be in one piece,” she snapped, in Revan’s most imperially pissed off voice.

The other Zabrak kid turned his head back towards her. “The vessels are not harmed. As you know.”

“That doesn't make you less of an asshole,” Mission told him. It. Them. Whatever. Maybe the original Revan Starfire would have been more polite, but Polla-Revan wouldn’t have.

Zaalbar howled unhappily. “This place is like the ocean world,” he groaned. “Nothing here for us except shame from the past.”

“There is no shame in becoming One,” the other Zabrak corrected him. “Regretfully, your Wookiee species is resistant to the process, or you would achieve true enlightenment as well.”

“Hey!” If Mission had arms, she would have shoved him. “Some of us transcend our mortality quite well, you know!”

“Indeed. And your time in one body nears its own end,” the creepy Zabrak kid intoned. “As per the terms of our arrangement, Lord Revan.”

“Of course.” If Mission needed real, physical processors to make such a simple leap, they'd be whirring. “Hey, while we’re talking about that… mind having your minions shoot me another copy of the arrangement in writing?”

“Of course.” The red eyes sparked. “Would you like that in Rakatan or Aurebesh?”

“Both.” The language of the Builders was a slippery tongue. She wouldn’t put it past this guy to stick in some totally unnecessary concessions to whatever the poo doo he was trying to do.

Xxx

At least all that fracking of Mandalorian spies she'd done during the wars was finally good for something besides resistance to the Kuati pox. Deeka was pleased to note, listenin to the Mandie chits chatter, she’d caught almost every word.

(Not so hard, since the Mandies used a lotta the same terms for sex as they did for their ships.)
“Rewind the recording.” Lammikins tried to cover up his worry with a smile, but Deeka remembered all too well how he got.

“Really?” She tossed her hair and her dress clanked, leaning over him, and letting the family moons swing free. “Vid’s almost done. Here we are all on our lonesome and you want to do a replay?”

But Vrook Lamar waved off her advances with a distracted sigh. “Please, Deeka. I need to hear what the Ordo woman said.”

Sighing, she eased herself onto his lap and pressed the rewinder. “Heard it fine the first time,” she groused.

Had barely gone two mills before his hand stopped.

“There,” he said. “Far enough.”

XxX

“You want to bring who?” The blonde chit on the receiving end frowned at the Aemelie one. “The refugees from your smuggling vessel?”

“They need to get offworld as soon as possible. The man is quite skilled with mechanics—”

“—for a man,” the blonde chit said. “We have our own engineers.”

“And the woman, Seriina Wen, scored a ninety-six on General Zal’s advanced targeting sim.”

“Impressive, for a barbarian; but we have limited supplies.” The blonde chit paused. “Do you find her husband attractive? His genetic traits are already well-established within the clans, and I think he’s slightly short; but if you want to run another sample—”

Xxx

“Ya know, I get it,” Deeka told Lammikins. “You’re wondering why this Aemelie chit doesn’t trust her own wife with that Organa family’s real name? It’s funny, but not sure there’s any profit there—”

“Wait.” He put his hand on hers. “Just wait.”

Xxx

“No,” Aemelie said. “I agree, he is slightly short; but he knew how to jump the Aleema’s tertiary power shunts to generate a somethin-somethin around the hull breech, even in hyperdrive.” She sighed. “And if Revan and her son and Second Husband are not joining us, surely the Wens can take their places and there will be stores enough for all—”

Blonde chit frowned. “It is not wartime. We can’t just adopt every stray!”

“Our husband will like her. And they have nowhere else to go—”

“Oh?” Blondie raised an eyebrow. “Are you curating our husband’s choice of bedmates without me?”

The Aemelie chit looked away from the screen. “No! Probably… not. Seriina informed me that her culture values monogamy in marriage—” “Barbarians,” Blondie spat.

Deeka Jin had to agree. These Mandies seemed pretty sensible.

“You want to bring them on as slaves? You said the woman is a pilot?”

“A smuggler, with Exchange connections.”

“And the husband is an engineer.”

“We are shorthanded. It will take at least a hundred sets of hands to somethin-somethin the Aleema, even if we automate everything except somethin and navigation—”

“Stop.” Lammikins got up, hands clenchin and unclenchin like a bald sphincter. “Again. Did you hear that? She said the Aleema. Revan’s flagship. The Aleema. The Mandalorians have the Aleema.”

Deeka punched the recording to stop, like she was his errand chit, but only because of the love they shared and for their only begotten son. “Mentions it a few times,” she nodded. “They go back and forth a lot. Blah, blah, blah, no room on the shuttles, too much room on the flagship—”

“Show me again,” Lammikins ordered, like he was in charge.

“It’s just more of the same!” Indignant-like, the way he didn't believe her. Deeka cast her eye at the recordin still going, the green light flashin on the console next to her bed. The Polla Organa chit was still cuttin up the line. Probably asking more sents for credits. That’d be tiresome to replay. Maybe a rewatch of this one with Vrook was better. “Sit down,” she told him, pattin the edge of her bed. “I'll show you what we got so far….”

“Yes, Ma. I'm sure we're fine.” For the thousandth time, Polla tried not to roll her eyes.

It had been a mistake to call and then not lie and pretend that she, Seiran, and Junior were all off living a life of luxe someplace far out on the Rim. It had been a mistake not to just send a card through the blind drop they had going with the bartender on Feldelroy, their supposed original planned destination. But now she was committed. “Like I said, Uncle Boon’s back on Alderaan,” she repeated. “And he's still in jail. Maybe instead of worrying about my life, you guys should check up on him.”

“Sweetie, we would, but there's no good way to tell him he got himself a criminal record for nothing.” Moll sighed. “I talked to Cousin Farah. Man always wanted to be important, and now he thinks he is.”

“How's Coruscant?” Da broke in, sticking his head closer to the comm’s camera, until it took up most of the screen. “Has Revan introduced you to all her high mucky mucks? I bet they have great food. Did you know they grow artificial meat there in vats?”

“He's been reading up on the local customs.” Moll Organa elbowed her husband slightly out of the vid screen. “I think he wants to come visit himself.”

“You can't!” The panic in her voice made her mother frown, but Polla couldn't hide it. “And Revan doesn't know we’re here! I said that already! She can't know, don't you get it?”

“I thought you just meant, she didn’t know where you were right now, Pollie. You mean you've come all this way not to see her?” Ma sounded disappointed. “Seems a waste.”

_Apparently_. All these folks who knew the real Revan seemed to be scared of her. Frack, they knew the woman, they had to be right. As much as Polla had always wanted to meet her, as much as she’d dreamed of their confrontation, there was no fracking way she could risk her family for some crazy Sith Jedi—

“It's not safe.” Polla sighed. She wished she had Abasen to hold right now for comfort, but he was back in the bar with Seiran and Aemelie and their crazy hosts. “I already went through this with you.”

“Oh, Pollie. You know what? I’ll talk to her.” Molla Organa smiled. “You're blowing this all out of proportion.”

“Ma! No!”

Her mother smiled. “Sweetie, I know you. She'll be delighted to help and she's rich. Why is there a problem?”

Why indeed? If the stakes weren't her fracking life, this argument would be uncannily like the ones she and Ma had when Polla was a tweener, about getting along with the other girls in sharpshooting. Ma had wanted to solve that for her too, until Polla put her foot down.

“Fine, you're right.” She stared down her mother’s face, keeping her eyes wide. “You know what?
I’ll talk to her. You don't have to do it. It's not a problem.”

“You promise?” Ma’s image was fuzzy, but there was no mistaking the weight of her words—almost as heavy as a threat.

“Of course.” Polla widened her eyes even more and resisted the urge to actually cross her fingers behind her back. Lying was easy to normal people, but lying to Ma made her feel like she was thirteen all over again. “I want to talk to her! That’s totally why we came here. We’ll straighten it all out.”

“Just avoid those reporters,” her Da broke in. “Don't want to see you get locked up for insurance fraud.”

“Trust me, that won’t happen.” Polla smiled as if it was the easiest thing in the world. “Love you guys! I'll call later, okay?”

Before Ma could glom onto the con, or demand holopix of their fracking meet, Polla cut the feed.

“Frack,” she said, closing her eyes, and kicking the wall. “Frack, frack, frack.”

“Are you okay in there?” Knock at the door. Aemelie’s voice. “I’m waiting just outside!”

“Great!” Polla called back. _Did she hear all of that?_ No. Aemelie didn’t have a subtle bone in her body. If she’d heard, she’d be all in Polla’s face again, explaining why she couldn’t ever meet Revan.
“You want to meet her?” Aemelie actually laughed. “Poll, that’s impossible.”

“But is she like me?” It was probably the second spiced cookie she’d had that made Polla brave enough to ask—that, and Seiran was busy talking to Master Vrook the Jedi and his ladywhore about swoop races on Coruscant, of all things.

Aemelie shifted Abasen on her lap, flipping a braid out of her hair for him to play with. “No,” she said. “She’s not like you at all. I like you, Polla Organa Wen.”

“And you don’t like her?”

The woman’s squinted at her. “I would never say that,” she said carefully. “In front of Gwenarius or Canderous.”

“Why?”

“I have my reasons.” Aemelie was usually so blunt, but now her eyes shifted. “When we are free from here—and her—and they are inconsequential, I will tell you.”

“You’re afraid of her?” Polla tried to imagine the woman she’d seen on the vids being intimidating enough to frighten a Mandalorian—this Mandalorian—and failed.

“No.” Aemelie made a face. “Or, no more so than any rational sentient is frightened of an ion storm, or solar flare. I take precautions, of course.” She frowned, and lowered her voice. “My husband thinks she is tactically skilled. He has great faith in her prowess in battle.”

And then Polla kind of got it. Aemelie had shown her some space battle sims back on the Aleema that she’d claimed she’d programmed herself. Frack if Polla could make any sense of them, not like a smuggler had a lot of training with three-dimensional troop movements in vacuum, but Aemelie had been so proud—

“You’re jealous. You think he’ll like her more because she led armies or something.”

“Armadas,” Aemelie corrected. “I do have some concern that he will prefer her tactical movements over my own, even if she refuses to properly consummate our union—”

Xxx

“Polla?” Amelie’s knock was louder now. “Tell me if you have come to harm!”

“I’m great!” Polla repeated, sitting gingerly on the slightly moving, brown flesh-colored bed. “Grand! Hey… do me a favor and check on Abasen for me? I… just have one more call.”

Xxx

“The Mandalorians can’t take Polla Organa and her family.” Lettin him watch the entire recording had been a mistake, because now Lammikins was pacing back and forth, muttering half under his breath. “The Mandalorians have a flagship? A fleet?” His laughter was dark and kinda vergin on crazy. And when he ran his hands through his hair like that, you could really see the thinnin patchiness of it all.

“I’ll find Polla a ship. We will. You can’t charge her for identity chips. We need to help them.” That injured look he had was gettin less adorable. “We need to help them and stop the Mandalorians.”

“Help? S’what I’m doing from the goodness of your cockles, isn’t it? Helpin? I gave them a free room for the rest of the week!”

“It will take more than that.” Lammikins sighed, and glanced at the door. “I need to see Jiya.”

“You tired of me already?” Truth, that hurt.

“Deeka…” Lammikins sighed. “General Sand and Captain Ekkumi told me the Aleema was missing. The Fleet’s on high alert. He has to hear about this. We have to stop them.”

He? That was a new wrinkle. “You're gonna tell him about this smuggler chit too? Let your fleeties buy her a ship?”

“Of course not!” His eyes sparked fire, they did. Pity he wasn't still this passionate in the bedrooms, cause she could sell tickets. “The Mandalorians are talking about a flagship. Revan’s old flagship.”

“And?” She yawned. “Make me a cuppa, Lammikins?”

Lookin so serious made him look so old. “Deeka, they're preparing for war.”

“And?” She shrugged. “That’s good for business down here.”

“I don’t think you understand,” he muttered, shoving the remnants of his poor old hair back from his face. “How could you? The Order is shattered, the Republic’s military is divided and weak… if the Mandalorians attacked us now—they would win.”

“And?” She stretched, givin him a playful wink. “I already know Mandalorian, cause I’ve known a lot of Mandalorians.”

His expression was priceless. “Deeka—”

Then, the outside door alarm chimed, interruptin her mirth.

“Who’s that?” And asap his voice changed, deepening and darkening.

She had to hand it to Lammikins, he was a fierce protector when he wasn't goin on and on over stuff most sents couldn't help.

“Dunno.” She shrugged. “Katti’s on the door. She'll handle it.” She leaned over, giving her old lover a bit of an eyeful. “You need to relax, honeygizka. World’s not gonna end next Thirdday.”

“I am relaxed.” He was not. “I need to make a comm call.”

“Secure line’s busy,” she pointed out, glancing at the feed on her console. “Your Polla chit’s still talkin.” She stepped closer, looking up at him, fluttin her lashes down. “Why don't you take a load off, let me get out the massager while we wait?”

“I…” he licked his lips nervously, eyes jumping all over the place. Then, to Deeka’s surprise, Lammikins embraced her all passionate and started gettin down with it. “You're right,” he said hoarsely, kissing her like he had demons inside. “It can wait.”

Be in the biz as long as she had and that's the thing you learn: sents, they'll always surprise the frack out of you, especially when it’s about the frackin of you.
“Mekelkins!” Katti Bais was dressed in stained coveralls and standing on a ladder next to a hologram of herself. She gestured with the hydrospanner she held in one hand. “Damn thing is on the frack again. Can you help?”

“Sure.” On edge. Their pulse was racing. This was all fracked. “I just came by to… see Moms. She here?”

“She’s got some guests.” The Cathar who was really just Human shrugged. “Weird crowd.”

Yeah, well….” Moms doesn’t exactly have boring friends. He started up the ladder behind her. “What is you need me to do?”

“Just hold here.” She handed him the hydrospanner. “I gotta adjust the sign.”

She’s cute. Dustil’s leer was half-hearted.

Holocron mask. Full body one. Her real face got scarred up bad when she crossed Iggis out of his margins—

Who? Dustil answered his own question a millisecond later. Oh. Your Hutt buddy.

“There.” Mekel found the short almost instantly. Their mind focused and sealed the conduit, not even bothering with the ‘spanner. “Good as new, Katti.”

“Go right on in!” She beamed at him as she helped him off the ladder. Above, her hologram began reciting its ‘closed for repairs’ message. Place was still closed then. That was good. Fewer witnesses if Mekel decided to fry Moms’s lying ass—

You will not harm her. The asshole, breaking through their barriers again, as if he had any power.

Are you coming with our credits or not? Dirtbag.

I can’t leave. Not… not yet. There was a lot more there, muddled. Malak’s kid. His wife. His wife’s identical twin with his wife’s memories… Mekel had seen episodes of Onderon Brave with less drama than Lord Malak’s banthashit.

You have to. Bring us the credits now. Stronger. Together. They were starting to see advantages. Being back in the real world was helping a lot. They almost laughed out loud when Lord Malak’s hand snapped out and slapped himself in the face.

Next time it might be a knife. Or your saber. Dustil’s thought. Mekk was still in too much fracking awe of the man.

I am not. It’s just… he’s him. You want to stab yourself in the face with a lightsaber?

It’s called a threat, Mekk. Get real.

“Mekel?” Katti’s holocronned face was peering up into theirs. “You okay?”

“Great as goldset,” he said, welding the smile on his face. “Remember my old pal Dusty? He might be stoppin by later. Just go ahead and let him in.”

“Sure!” She raised an eyebrow. “He’s pretty cute. You think he’d be interested—”
If I had my own body, I’d be interested.

Not what you think. She's in charge of recruitment.

Recruitment?

Do I have to spell it out for you, hayseed?

Mekel felt their face flush when Dustil got it. Oh.

“Go on in, Mekelkins.” Katti’s fake face only had a few expressions, none of them real; but something in her voice made them pause. Mirth, maybe. Like she was holding something back. “I know Deeks has been hopin you'd stop by.”

He made their face smile, smooth as synthsilk. “How could I stay away? You guys are family.”

“Awww…” Katti’s real hand reached out and brushed the hair back from their forehead. “We are, aren’t we? You know, you're still as sweet as suc.”

“And you're still the best whore on sub-thirty-seven,” he told her. “Thanks, babe.”

They walked on in.

She seems nice. Does ickle Mekelkins have a crush?

No need to dignify that with a response. Nice? She was my babysitter, you ass. And she'd sell us to the Hutts if she thought my Moms would go for it.

I always wanted to kill a Hutt. Remember that one back on Dresh’d? Fantma? Tried to take over the black market from the Rodian Crew?

I remember. The Hutt had been involved in smuggling artifacts offworld. Mekel had got a fair amount of prestige when he reported the ops to Ban. Maybe you can get some Hutt-killing tips from Yuthura later.

Maybe we could start some kind of Hutt-killing business.

Telos was only joking, but as they walked into the main reception, Mekel had a harder time finding it funny.

I was thinking more we’d retire to Zeltros….

Xxx

Polla’s pulse pounded in her throat as she dialed the number.

You can do this. You did it once before already. It's no big deal. He offered. You set it up, you get the credits—ask for just the credits, buy the ship with the credits—ask for a lot because she would, she gets whatever she wants: empires, flagships, Aemelie’s husband—

“Damn!” Her finger slipped on the pad. She tapped erase and started again.

Xxx

“It's not fair, Ma!” Twelve years old, and her swoop was broken. “If Gishko’s doesn't get the part, I can't ride in the semis and if I can't ride, I can't win.”
Molla Organa ruffled her daughter’s hair. “Life isn’t fair, but you make do with what you’ve got.”

“What I’ve got is a broken capacitor coil.” She scowled up at Ma.

“What you’ve got is a chance to learn how to fix a broken capacitor cable,” Ma corrected her. “How hard can it be?”

“How hard can it be?” Polla echoed the memory, straightening her spine, and staring at the blank comm. “I did it once before already. And he said we all look alike.”

Before she could listen to the part of her brain that sounded a lot like the other side of Moll Organa, the side that told her not to tell any lies that could land her in boiling lava, which would kill her, Polla leaned forward and punched the last four digits of the comm number she’d memorized upside down and backwards, some years ago.

“If you will excuse me,” Suvam shrugged at the Voice, who stared blankly back at him, no expression at all in its blank, black eyes. “Enjoyable as our latest silence has been, my comm is ringing.”

The Voice of the One was not nearly as companionable as he had expected. Perhaps in the hours of lost time, Suvam and the Voice engaged in deep conversations about history and philosophy; but if upon waking, Suvam had no memory, what was the point? If only, he thought, not for the first time, the One had seen fit to send him an emissary in a Rodian shell, preferably feminine and shapely; then perhaps their roles as watchers at the edge of the galactic Core could have been pleasurable, and emotionally fulfilling.

Instead, he was reduced to this nothingness with only a blank, black-eyed Human for company. Most of his waking time was rather boring. Rulan’s Genoharadan reports were brief to the point of insubordination. Even news from the Republic nets had been slow of late; although rumor said that Seriina Starr had a new face.

That, Suvam Tam couldn't wait to see. Would she keep the red fur?

The ringing comm was one of the old unmarkeds, back from the days when he had been a simple Exchange smuggler and not yet tasted the smoke of True Enlightenment. Only when he bent closer to the screen did his eyes widen and his eyestalks twitch.

Only one sentient living had this particular code.

And, just like that, Her image resolved itself in the small square at the center of his console.

“Lord Revan,” Suvam inclined his head respectfully. His eyes noted that Lord Revan still possessed that same, strange darkened coloration as before: the soft mat of fur on her head now almost hiding those unmistakable leaf-shaped eyes. “How may I be of service?”

“I wanted to discuss...” she began, sounding for all the world like the power she had once been: the voice who had commanded armies, and laid waste to three quarters of the galaxy. “... my infinite credit line.”

Behind her image, the red eyes of the Voice began to glow.
Goyle not being around should have been Mekel’s first clue that things were fracked, but he thought maybe the old Gamorrean was just out shopping for supplies. Even with her business closed, Moms went through a lot of spice and hot towels.

But no, instead of a supply of hot towels, the only thing in main reception was some Human guy and a baby.

“Who are you?” Guy got to his feet pretty fast, putting himself between them and the kid propped on the sofa. His hair was pulled back into one of those Revan knobs, like he was trying to be trendy. Mekel took careful note of the blasters at his belt, which looked real.

“Someone who fracking belongs here,” Mekel told him. “You?”

“I’m just waiting for someone.” Twitchy. It was making them twitchy too.

“You shouldn’t bring your kid in here.”

“Thanks, Master Jedi.” The guy didn't even sound sarcastic. If anything, he sounded nervous. “You’re right, of course. We’re just waiting on my… friend. Then, we’ll go.”

Who cares? Let’s shake down your Mom for some guilt money and work out the ambush for Malak. Dustil was impatient. The emotion coiled through them both, making Mekel’s saber arm twitch.

“Seiran!” A woman’s voice, familiar.

Mekel turned his head to see the last person in the galaxy he’d expected: Aemelie Ordo, walking down the stairs from Moms’s private quarters like she belonged.

He felt his mouth drop open in surprise, even as her eyes widened, taking him in. “And Mekel Jin! What a fortunate coincidence! I have news! Gwenarius has agreed we can take all of you to… near Alderaan. Or whatever destination you agree upon… eventually.” She turned to Mekel. “Millifar will be pleased that you have returned from your time with the Jett’ai!” Her teeth were too small and even to look as predatory as her smile somehow did. “Gwenarius was delighted to learn of your ancestry, and how we can all now find some measure of accord, even after the tragedy of Oerin Lin…. They did tell you? About your paternal line?”

Aemelie was even harder to understand sometimes than Millifar’s real mother. “My what?”

“About your biological progenitor.” Aemelie paused. “Your father?”

“About Master Vrook being my father? Yeah, I heard.”

Why is she here? Dustil didn't sound like he cared, exactly. A part of their mind flexed, and then suddenly there they both were, staring at an empty, white circular bed. They both felt their own triumph, even as Malak’s panic overrode the sensation: his eyes closing shut, sharp pain as his nails drove into the palms of his hand when he clenched Dustil’s fists—

Not time. I need more time. You have one body leave me this one—

“—No formal adoption. You understand?” Aemelie Ordo must have been talking this entire time. “Not like Seiran and Polla— they would need one, of course, although Abasen is young enough to be a milk son, if Polla chose to go that way. But your clan right does not guarantee your own command, you will still need to go through the same training as all Lin sons before you: complete your blooding in sky and stars.”

Mekel stared at her blankly. “What?” Who the frack is Polla and Seiran and Abasen?

Coma boy, remember? You think I fracking know? Dustil’s voice was acid. Wait. Polla? They mean Revan?

I guess? She's here? Where the frack is my Moms?

Probably setting out the cakes for your family reunion. I think the Mandalorians want to adopt you, Mekk. Cute. Mekelkins has two families—

“Seiran.” Another woman, this one with shorter hair, wearing a dress that looked like one of Moms’s special numbers came out of the same door as the Mandalorian, moving halfway down the stairs before she stopped, staring at Mekel. “Who’s this?”

“Polla!” Aemelie turned her head, barely pausing in her narrative to shift gears. “I was waiting for you outside the whoremistress's chamber, but you took so long!”

“Had to make a few calls.” The woman took them in again, Mekel saw her lazy appraisal, and the spark of caution in it, that quick tremor of fear she was trying to hide. Something was twigging with her, but what it was, she definitely wasn't Revan Starfire. “We’re good now through, Sei. We can just go.”

Not everyone loves a Jedi in the Underground. That thought, both of them. Doubled.

“I'm Mekel Jin,” Dustil said, taking over the reins, while Mekel tried to sort through Aemelie's babble.

She wants us to join the Mandalorians and go… where? Where are they going?

“Nice to meet you.” The woman didn't bother with introductions. “Aemelie, it was nice of you to offer, but I think we've got our own ride off this rock.”

“But it's not safe.” The Mandalorian frowned at her. “Rest assured, Revan is staying on this city-planet. Gwenarius can't even get her to respond to a simple comm call—and in any case, if you were formally adopted into Ordo, as Third Wife she would have no right to move against you—” she held up her hand, as if tabulating something, and then frowned. “At least, not without my husband’s approval, and Canderous would never—”

“I said.” This time the woman’s voice was stronger. Harder. “We've got our own ride off this rock. Come on Seiran. Let's go.”

Polla, Seiran, and Abasen. Something about those names….

Frack if I know, Mekk. I was unconscious.

Yeah, but I do. From the vids. Those were the names of the family? The ones Revan had killed?

Xxx

“I wish we could offer you a ride off this rock, Dustil; but where we’re going, it isn't safe.” Polla Organa—otherwise known as Revan Starfire, former Lord of the Sith and current girlfriend to dear old Dad, smiled apologetically.
“Polla Organa?” Both of their minds made the connection at once. “The real one? Aren't you supposed to be dead?”

“No. And we're leaving.” The woman was a bundle of nerves now. She walked over to her husband and picked up the rifle propped up next to him. “Thanks for the offer, again, Aemelie; but we’ve got it covered.”

“But how will we contact you?” The Mandalorian frowned. “You can't just leave—”

“We are.” The man seemed to have read something in the woman’s face because he was moving now too. “You’ve got our comm… or… We’ve got yours. Nice meeting you… all. You too, Jedi kid.”

“Mekel,” they said. “Mekel Jin.”

Polla Organa just looked ordinary. Like someone’s hot mom. She even looked a little like Revan herself, especially around the eyes. With a bigger rack. The woman the Jedi had borrowed a personality from strapped her kid in some kind of harness thing and took her husband’s arm. “Good-bye,” she said, and then frowned. “Wait. Mekel Jin? You know your parents think you're in a coma?”

“Yeah, w—I woke up.”

“Oh.” She frowned at him, already distracted. Her kid was cute. He didn't even want to know why the blanket thing he was wearing had the D'Reev crest.

“You don't have to leave.” Millifar’s stepmoms was sulking. “Here,” she stepped forward, towards the real Polla Organa, a knife suddenly appearing in her hand. “At least… take this.”

“I don’t… okay. Thanks.” The woman shoved the knife into the pocket of her vest and backed away towards the door. “Don't follow us this time, please?” Her voice sounded eerily like Revan’s when she was pissed off and trying not to be. “I'm asking nice. As a friend.”

Aemelie Ordo signed. “You are making a very foolish choice—”

“But it's mine.” Backing up, the woman half shoved her husband towards the door.

The man stumbled in front of her, and then pushed her forward, so that his body was between them and her and the kid. Did they think Mekel or Aemelie were going to hurt the kid?

“Mekel.”

That voice was unmistakable. Like rocks and cigarras.

They turned Mekel’s head. “Hey there, Dads.”

Master Vrook Lamar had a bad case of bedhead, and some bruises on his neck that neither of them wanted to think about. “So, you know.”

“Your spiced-out friend Zez told me.”

I can see it, especially around the chin. Mekelkins Lamar Starfire—

Shut up!
But it was almost both of them, both mocking the fracked situation, that somehow that made it bearable.

They stared at dear old Dads, who was staring back like he'd never seen Mekel before. A muscle in his cheek was even twitching and he looked almost like he wanted to cry. If it had been not their problem, they both would have found this hilarious.

“Son!” As usual, Moms killed the moment, by inserting herself between them, and draping her bones, metal dress and all, all over Mekel’s shoulders. She was soft and hard and smelled like bills and spice, like always. “Where did that Polla Organa go? Lammikins sold me on givin her a discount on the idchips.”

“She just left.” Aemelie rubbed her eyes. “I should leave as well.”

They looked at the door. It was still open, but the moms and the kid and the man had slipped away.

Vrook sighed. “We were going to help—”

“Hey, you can help us,” Mekel pointed out. “I mean me. Have any credits on you, Moms? Dustil is supposed to meet me here—”

“Dustil?” Vrook frowned. “Is he free from Malak?”

If we say no, the Jedi will be in his ass and we’ll never get credits.

Or my fracking body. “I think so,” Dustil said, lying smoothly.

He's not doing any fracking with it, have you seen him and that Revan clone—

Mekel’s hand twitched, as Dustil tried to make a fist and punch the wall. Mekel got control back in the nick of time, resulting in them making a weird side step and a half-swing instead.

“Are you well?” Vrook was looking worried now. “You are very pale.”

“Some Jedi were drugging me unconscious or something.” Mekel gave him a hard smile. “Plus, I had the flu. Takes time to bounce back.”

“We have extensive medical supplies,” Aemelie said, stepping forward and grasping Mekel’s arm. “And we take care of our own.”

“Your… own?” Dear old Dads spoke Mandalorian with a funny accent, but he was speaking it. Mekel caught most of what followed, which was basically both of them arguing that he was some kind possession, instead of the kid dear old Dads had never bothered to find out about; or the man Aemelie had called a slave in his earshot more than once. Even if the Mandalorian interpretation of slave was more like, ‘unproven and unskilled family member with no material resources,’ it was still a bitter pill to pipeline, especially coming up in the Underground.

Dear old Moms elbowed his side. “I brought you up right,” she crowed. “See? Jedi and Mandie's both—everyone wants a piece of my boy.”

“Yeah,” Mekel muttered. Telos was too gobsmacked to snark for once. “Thanks a lot, Moms.”

Xxx

“Tatooine, acknowledge.” T’chrrrmak’tahk’leânjsêw put his hand down on her scanner and repeated the triggering phrases again, his Twi’lek voice cracking on the ancient syllables.
The part of Mission’s consciousness that was linked now to Manaan, Korriban, Dantooine, and Kashyyyk sparked against the dead spot, like rubbing up against a dead limb.

“Ow,” she complained. “You know it's a dumb planet anyways. No water. Jawa are cute? But they’ll rip you off. And sand people… they smell.”

“Focus,” he told her. “We have very little time before the planets are out of alignment again.”

“When is Lena getting here with my body again?” Freyyrr and some of the other sub-chiefs had already taken their largest and most heavily-modded Czerka shuttle to investigate and lay claim to the new homeworld that the Tribes had agreed to call Skryyyshyk, after the old sky-god that was supposed to have created the heavens.

(Mission had thought about spilling the beans that had really just been the Rakatan terraforming part of her own consciousness, but why ruin a perfectly good legend?)

“Your sensors are tracking her ship,” he said, frowning. “Are they not? Is something wrong?”

“She's not answering her comm.” Lena Wee hadn't been talking to either of them, but her ship reported back faithfully the four life signals on board: the two bodies (one Twi'lek twin for Mission herself and the other one for her errant sub-persona on the Ebon Hawk); and Lena Wee and the child within.

“She told me to go to hell,” T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw said gloomily. “Can you tell if it's some kind of hormonal disturbance affecting her mood, or—”

“My range sensors aren't that precise.”

“But you are a female of her species.” The old Prince sighed. “At least in part.”

“I don't know,” Mission chirped. Some part of her was already occupied syncing the feeds from Korriban. Not a ton going on there now, except— “Whoa!”

“Is it Lena?” For someone obsessed with the big picture T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw was being one-track.

“No.” It was a Sith Fleet, or the remnants of one. Hadn't Mission told that Darth Arca to frack off with hers? “Bunch of ships in orbit around Korriban. Some of the codes are funny too—who still uses Ancient Sith?”

“Sith, one assumes.” T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw sighed. “I’m bringing Tatooine on now.” Her sensors noted his distracted frown. “There may be some disorientation as your data merges.”

“I'm a computer,” she murmured in Polla-Revan’s command voice. “I don’t get disoriented, I—”

And then the feed hit her virtual banks, with the strength of a thermonuclear explosion. The Tatooine computer was ancient; and, as their records slipped into synch, Mission learned that Tatooine was choca-full of all the information that Polla-Revan had deleted way back when, back when she created Mission in the first place. All those gross holostills of Malak in the fields of flowers, designs for planet-stomping weapons, a really interesting plague targeted along a common genomic root that most gene jockies didn't know existed, a depressing diary the original Revan had left for her son, a bunch of notes about someone called Tenebrae, who was like a brain-possessing Sith Emperor whose means of self-replication were remarkably like—

“Huh,” she said out loud. “There's a lot here, T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw.”
It was an understatement. “Yes,” her master agreed, leaning forward. His hands traced the holographic streams, bathing his features in bytes and spilytes. “There certainly is.”

Xxx

Unimaginable, like a tear in the Force itself. Thirty-four bodies, once counted, and each one felt like a silent scream in the Force—a gap of wrongness, where someone once whole and vital had been severed out of existence.

“My cousin did this,” Kavar said quietly, finally; after they had tallied the dead, arranged them in rows on the floor, and wrapped each one in a shroud that mercifully hid each face.

Dar’Revan glanced in their direction and then went back to her own grim inventory. She’d checked and double checked each one, obviously looking for something. Revan didn't want to know what the frack it was.

“I'm sorry,” Revan offered Kavar, lamely. She didn't know what else to say.

The Jedi Master turned to her. “Davad is responsible, not you. There is no reason to apologize.”

Yes, but I let Arkan go. Could I have stopped him? Suddenly she remembered something Vrook had said to her once, about not killing the Mandalore, about thinking she could have stopped him, before he invaded Republic space. Had that been the same?

We really fracked things up, trying to save the galaxy.

Revan could feel her evil twin’s eyes on her back, with the intensity of laser turrets. The more time she spent with the woman, the more it was clear to Revan, at least, that her own imitation of being herself was nothing more than that: Dar’Revan seemed to have an inborn arrogance bred into her bones that Revan couldn’t match.

At least the woman was smart enough not to speak much in front of Kavar. Revan had a small running bet with herself that it would only take about ten minutes of sanctimonious lectures for the Jedi Master to figure out the truth.

She looked down at the body in front of her. Falleen, with a newly healed scar. It took her a moment to recognize Master Iridel. Where the woman’s presence should have been, where the presence of even death should have been—there was nothing, only a yawning emptiness. Revan folded the cloth over her face, and carefully lifted her onto the open drawer of the disposal unit. It felt… disrespectful, but Jedi had few rituals for their dead, beyond those attached to their native culture. Did Falleen typically say a prayer? Sing? Bury? Or burn? Revan had no fracking idea.

There should have been some… ceremony, some words said for each; but the number of bodies overwhelmed that. Instead, she turned and made a note on the datapad. Master Iridel, Falleen. Did Master Iridel have a surname? An age? A family? She hesitated, not knowing.

“Those with next of kin, I will notify,” Kavar murmured, placing his own grim burden next to hers. The shelf to the incinerator was large enough for two humanoid bodies. He punched the command and the drawer slid closed, chemical whir of the fire igniting behind the duraplate.

“I would like to help.” Dar’Revan said.

They both turned to look at her. Sheris’s face hit Revan like a shock, as always: a younger reflection that she only remembered in pieces. Staring directly into the woman’s face reminded her suddenly, vividly, of a memory she knew was uniquely hers: staring at her own face in the mirror.
of that squat on Taris, that disorienting reflection of a stranger: her eyes green, not brown, her hair too soft and fine under her fingers to be real—

XXX

“Didn’t have you pegged as vain.” The man’s voice behind her was strangely grounding. Normal.

“I’m fine,” Polla Organa said, turning away from the reflection. The approval she saw in Mister Republic’s eyes was better than the mirror anyway. She pulled her hair up and out of her eyes, looping the tie around her top knot. “Thanks for dragging me out of that escape pod. Guess I was pretty out of it.”

“You hit your head pretty hard,” the man agreed. “And whatever you were dreaming about sure made you talkative.”

“Oh? What did I say?” Her dreams had all been like some children’s vid about Jedi out of legends: a woman’s face, a yellow-bladed laser sword, and a feeling of overriding panic, like the images should mean something; but the words themselves were lost.

“Nothing in any language I know.” He paused, frowning. “But you know a lot of languages, right? I read your service file. Isn't that why the Republic brought you in on this mission?”

“Languages?” She frowned. That was—that wasn’t right. Not exactly. But she did—she did know a lot of languages. When you're making your way through the galaxy, you need to learn a lot of languages. She knew basic, and Corellian, and Huttese, and—

And I know a lot of languages. I know a lot of languages. That is why I am on this mission. My mission is to report to the Jedi and follow their instructions—and I know a lot of languages.

It's not my fracking fault the Jedi all died. Did this mean the deal was off? She felt a surge of relief. Fracking Jedi.

“I'm Polla Organa,” she told the pilot. “Registered smuggler. At your service.”

“I know who you are. Registered... smuggler?” He had stubble and eyes the color of Deralian wheat, and now a scowl, twisting that pretty mouth. Republic types. Always sticks in the hyperdrive.

“Yes,” she said slowly. “Do you have a problem with smugglers?”

His eyes narrowed slightly. “Not as long as you don’t get us arrested.”

“I see you read my file?” Polla tried to laugh. Therion was an asshole.

“What?” He frowned. It made him look older, made the planes of his face seem less pretty-boy hotshot.

It made him more attractive. Polla Organa was done with pretty-boy-hotshots. “Nothing, don’t get your unders in a twist—”

XXX

“What?” Revan said herself. She realized she'd been staring at the dead Jedi in front of her and thinking about Carth, while Master Kavar and Dar’Revan went back and forth like bound hessi. “No,” she snapped, turning around to glare more fully at the image of her own face. “No way are you going anywhere near their families, Sheris.”

“I would like to write letters,” Dar’Revan repeated. Revan didn’t want to recognize the stubborn insistence in the woman’s voice, but she did.

“I mean no offense, Padawan Loran,” Kavar began. “But with your resemblance to Revan, some might—”

“Take offense?” Dar’Revan pulled Sheris’s lips into a pained smile. “I realize. That’s why I didn’t suggest using the comms.” She shrugged, too deliberately careless. Revan didn’t trust her. There was a trap here, but frack if she knew what it was. “I am a registered medix with the Order. Someone from the medical division should say something, issue some kind of statement… and Master Zez Kai…” she made a sound of disgust. “…Judging from the state of the way we found these bodies, he’s not capable.”

“Why do you want to get involved, Sheris?” Revan snapped. “It’s not like you killed all of these Jedi.” Just all of those fracking people on Malachor and caused this mess.

Was it easier to live with what had happened, now that she had someone besides herself to blame?

No. Because she is me. I fracking hate her, but a part of her is me, and I did this—I betrayed the Jedi and the Republic, I made hundreds fall and hundreds of thousands dead—

“I would like to help.” Dar’Revan repeated. Their eyes met, and this time it was Revan who looked away first.

“It would help me if you would write the letters,” Kavar sounded as tired as Revan herself felt. “We can both sign them, Padawan Loran.”

Thank you, Master Kavar.” The woman was really overdoing the simpering. “Perhaps Revan would like to help us too.”

“I’m more concerned with the living,” she snapped. “The dead are supposed to be dead.”

“The dead are with us,” Kavar murmured. “In our thoughts, and in our pasts.”

“That must be nice,” Revan snapped.

“I—” he frowned, lines deepening around his face. Revan had a sudden flash of memory: a girl’s memory, speculating with Beya about his lovers. Now, lines pulled his face back against his skull, and there were strands of gray in his yellow hair. “I apologize, Revan. We had every intent to return your memories to you, but—”

“They went missing.” She would not look at Dar’Revan. “I don’t need them anyway.”

“Perhaps you are the fortunate one, Padawan.”

“Knight.” Dar’Revan corrected him. Her voice was sharp now, with none of Sheris’s fake simper. “She’s a Jedi Knight. You owe her that honor, at least.”

“Knight.” Kavar agreed, but he frowned looking between them. “A dubious honor, perhaps with the Order in tatters.”

“I don’t fracking care,” Revan muttered in Rakatan. She added a string of curses that didn’t really apply to human physiology at all, but has oblivious parallels.
Dar’Revan’s mouth twitched. “I will get another set of shrouds,” she said, in Basic.

Revan turned her attention back to the next body. This one was a Twi’lek, young enough to be Mission.

The irreverence she’d managed to summon shattered. Her hand shook as she reached into the girl’s pocket, looking for an idchip.

XXX

Kavar Vakla had said there were thirty dead Jedi, but so far, Revan had counted hundreds, even if none of them were her Uncle Vrook.

The bodies were stacked in bags made of yellow plasticate, just like the ones they’d used in the wars, each stamped with a biohazard sign. The echo of nothingness—the place where the Force just… stopped, was painfully clear in each one of them. Collectively, it felt like a scream against her senses, a black hole that threatened to drag them all into its orbit.

It felt like Malachor. It felt like the death of the Force.

Davad Arkan hadn’t merely killed these Jedi, he had made them cease to exist. He had taken every essence of Force energy within their bodies, and left only these shells.

Revan knew too many of the faces, even if it had been years since she’d spoken to them. Iridel. Kroï. Hett. Sakeen. Zhar. Even Master Vandar was here, his small face cold and gray. So many Jedi Masters, and young knights she only remembered as novices, grown now—but forever gone.

This wasn’t just death, it was something much worse.

Davad did this. Davad did this and the Fragment let him go. Davad did this because of me. Davad became a monster because of what I did—

And of course, the more calculating part of her realized the ramifications. If Davad can destroy these Jedi, he can destroy Tenebrae. If he can do this, he’s the perfect weapon—

One last bag on the table. The datapad beside her, flashing a memory error sign, overflowing with so many names. The Fragment and Kavar Vakla had finished already, left to attend to other business. Other rooms. Were they talking about her in whispers? Were there more dead? A planetful. The Force groaned under their weight. The Force screamed, and Sheris’s weak mind wept.

Then, Revan unsealed the last bag and found Beya Organa inside. The woman’s skin was paler than it had been in life. There were lines on her forehead that Revan didn’t recall, and a few streaks of white in her hair. She was barely clothed, wearing only the regulation Jedi underthings they all used to joke about. Her body was lean, every bit of its former softness honed to muscle, to combat. For a distorted moment, Revan blinked, and the body was younger again, soft—then back to this: an almost perfect sculpture of a warrior’s shape: her arms muscular as a man’s, her waist narrowed and stomach ridged, her breasts slightly pointed and perfect under the thin fabric—

She ran a finger over Beya's cold lips, her own heart suddenly thudding almost painfully in her chest. She leaned forward, like a character in a children’s story, and pressed her own mouth to the dead one. Mockery of a kiss. Like that could restore life.

And then, just like in a children’s story, it did.
The dead woman’s eyes opened, and stared up at her. The dead woman breathed out, their noses almost touching. The dead woman’s breath smelled like lave and mint, her hair like flowers.

“Sheris.” The Deralian smiled softly. Her dead skin changed to gold again. “I missed you, love.”

The dead woman’s arms wrapped around Revan’s neck, pulled her down as she pulled herself up, and suddenly they were both rolling across the examination table, grown impossibly wide. Suddenly they were both… laughing, and there was a happiness that made Revan laugh through tears.

“How…?” Suddenly, it didn't matter how—only that they were. Here, in this moment now. It didn't matter that she and Beya had never kissed, never pressed their bodies together, their hands between, because suddenly, they were again. Suddenly it was right and there was grass beneath them and sky above. A yellow sky, one she’d only seen in holostills.

“Deralia,” Beya kissed her hard, murmuring the name against her lips. She untangled herself and sat up, strap of her shirt unsnapped, half-pulled to her waist. “Home. I wanted you to come back with me.”

“I'm dreaming.” She'd been a fool not to realize it sooner. Revan felt her skin flush, and she pulled the front of her robe together again. “But this… you and Sheris—?”

“Don't look so surprised.” The Deralian pushed her own loose hair back again, not bothering to rearrange her own disordered clothing. “Sheris and I had a lot in common.” Her hand reached out and touched the metal arm. “I'm sorry about that.”

“That was you?” So much Revan still didn't know. “You seem… too developed to be my subconscious. Are you really here? It's really you?”

“As much as anything.” Beya stood up, extending her hand to pull Revan up with her. One breast peered through her robe before she belted it, smirking. “A part of you and a part of me will always be in this place.”

Revan rose, and found herself being led by the hand across a grassy plain. “That's not so bad.”

“You're not the best liar. I know where your heart truly belongs.” Beya’s voice was rueful. “You know she loved him too?”

“Who?” As if she didn't know. As if she hadn't always known. She'd pushed him away because he was compromised. She'd pushed them together, but they'd plotted against her all on their own.

“You know who. And you know love doesn't excuse what you both did to her. What you did to all of us.”

The sky seemed to darken, and the birdsong Revan hadn't even noticed all stopped. “It would have been worse, if I had done nothing. The Mandalorians were only the beginning. Once they weakened the Republic, the Sith—.”

“I know.” Beya dropped her hand, her casual robes darkening, hardening into armored cortosis. When she turned her head again, her eyes were yellow as coins. “So, you always said. You know I died for her secret?”

“You would never have betrayed us.” Beya meant the Fragment. “She shouldn't have killed you. I never wanted you dead.” The sadness there brought sloppy tears to her eyes. Sheris’s eyes. Weak and pathetic.
In dreams you could cry easily. In dreams, weakness was strength, when it led him away from what you valued the most. Her dreams had kept Tenebrae at bay for a time, while she plotted with the Dark Council to bring an end. What had become of those plans now?

“You would kill anyone to save her. But it won't save her, Rev. Preserving the secret won't save her. Remember that. She needs you both.”

She. Revan’s mouth twisted, and she fished in her pocket to find something to wipe her eyes. “I call her the Fragment.”

Beya cracked a smile. “One with the Force here, remember? I know. Calling her Polla would be more accurate.”

“You… knew her.” She should have realized. “The smuggler. You knew the real Polla Organa.”

“We're cousins.” Beya smiled at her. “I never knew her very well, she was just a kid when I left for the Jedi.”

“You said she needs us both—me and Malak. But he can't… he can't stay. It's wrong.”

“That's giving you the vapors, Darth Revan?” Beya snorted. “I didn't mean Malak. She needs you both—you and Polla Organa.” She paused. “She is you. Both.”

“Like I am.” Suddenly, she understood. In this place, she didn't have to pretend. It was peaceful here. She knew Sheris would have loved it. She knew that Sheris did. “I am both too. Like she killed Polla, I have to kill the part of me that is Sheris—”

“No.” Beya shook her head and leaned forward. Her lips brushed Revan’s forehead before they withdrew again. “There's been enough death already. All you need to do is wake up and help.”

Xxx

“Wake up, Red.” Malak repeated. He shook her shoulder again. He had lingered in Malachi’s library until nearly dawn trying to access their old accounts, hoping to avoid speaking to her at all, hoping to avoid being tempted to speak to her at all.

He has known when she came in late, that faint spark in the Force. Like an echo. Whether it was her nature, or his, he was finding it easier to find her. He knew he should stay in the library, but the boy’s body was tired. He knew when she slipped into sleep, and that was when he came back.

Five minutes in the room alone with her—even asleep—had undone all of his intentions.

“Malak,” she said in her sleep. A slight smile curved that familiar mouth upwards and she rolled towards him, eyes still closed. “Mal.”

“We need to talk,” he murmured, bending over her. His breath stirred the fire of her hair where strands had escaped the tightly coiled braids. He took a deep breath and resisted the urge to reach for her, crush her in his arms and bury his face in the soft skin of her neck. “Please, Red.”

“Please?” Her eyes fluttered, and a lazy smile stretched her mouth, as her legs fell open. “Lord Malak, you never say please to me—”

And then she sat up abruptly, wave of Force snapping forward, crashing weakly against him. In her own body, it would have thrown him into a wall, crushing bones. As it was, he felt the hair lift away from his forehead, a gentle fist if wind that buffeted the bedsheets away from her creamy skin. “Get away,” she snapped. “What are you doing?”

“Sheris?” For a moment, she could have been. Easily. Wearing a white lace robe that had been hers, he'd had a replacement made for Sheris too.

For a moment after that, he wanted her to be Sheris. I can never trust you again, Red; but Sheris and I could go away from this place—

“Mal.” Her voice pitched harder, and she pulled away, rolling across the bed. “I… it was too late when we returned to find new accommodation. But I can take the chair.”

“I wanted to talk to you.”

“I'll take the chair.” She wrapped the sleeping robe around her more tightly and stood, backing away from him until she was in the chair. Warily, she sat in it, hugging her knees to her chest. The blanket she had been wrapped in levitated across the floor, and wrapped around her shoulders. “What is it?”

“You here—just now, you invited me—”

“I was dreaming.” She rubbed her eyes. “Just a dream. This facade of our engagement is a fool’s game. The Fragment will let me see Malachor. I no longer need you.” She ducked her face down, avoiding his eyes. “In the morning, I’ll move my things downstairs, with the rest of the Jedi.”

“If that’s what you want.” Was it? He took a deep breath. “Malachi made me an offer. It concerns… both of us.”

Just tell her. Just say the words. It's not a betrayal. His mother is here too and it's not forever and if it's the only way you can keep this body and both of you together, so be it. You were the best Knights in the Order, you were Lords of the Sith—together you can find a way around Malachi’s command and see your son—

“Us.” She scanned his face. “What is it? Anything Malachi offers you is a trap.”

“Of course.” The madness was passing, reflected as foolish fancy in the hard green of her eyes. “I wanted to warn you.”

She glanced up at the surveillance cameras she'd reprogrammed. “I should warn you,” she said, voice softening slightly. “The Fragment doesn’t want you to stay. I don’t think either of us can let you survive in this body.”

“I know.” Could he trust her? I did once. My father wants me gone too, but he offered me… refuge. Sanctuary, for me and—”

“You trust him?” She snorted.

“Of course I don't trust him.” Malak scoffed. “But my tox scans were clear.”

“He offered us sanctuary.” Her mouth pursed, the lower lip jutting out like it had when she was a child thinking through a difficult calculation, like it did when she bent over the maps in her quarters on Rakata Prime, plotting a course through chaos and carnage. “But you don't mean you and the Fragment: you mean he offered sanctuary to you and—”

“Sheris,” he said.
Something in her eyes softened, and for a millisecond the expression wasn't Red’s at all.

“Sanctuary for you and your whore.” Her mouth twitched. “I can almost hear him calling Sheris that.”

Malak nodded. “Yes.”

“Beya was given a ship.” Red shrugged. “It was a trap. No doubt this would be as well. And what about Malachor?”

“We’d have to be... gone,” he said carefully. “At least as far as Malachi was concerned. But given time—the old man can’t last forever—”

“He could,” she muttered. “If anyone can, he could.” Her eyes stared down at the floor. “You…but you want to take the deal.”

“I know it’s impossible.” He did. Now, that he heard that resignation in her voice, he knew it even more. “I don’t want to leave Mal again.”

“But you must.” Her head tilted. “Can you? Can you leave the boy’s body?”

“I don’t know how.” A weakness, admitting that. “They—we are all of us linked now.”

“They?” She frowned.

“Dustil and I.”

“You said they.”

“Mekel Jin and Dustil Onasi share a Force bond. In some way, I have become… attached to both.”

“That doesn’t make any sense.” Her frown deepened. “Does the Fragment know?”

“Revan knows,” he snapped. “Yes.”

“It can’t be Tenebrae.” She twisted a strand of her hair. Sheris used to do that, when she was nervous, or lost in thought. Red never had. “Both of them were vaccinated, and I saw Mekel Jin succumb to the plague myself.”

“It’s not your damned Emperor.” Jin and Onasi knew something about the bond. If he went deeper, Malak could know too, but doing so raised the risk of sharing his own knowledge with them, more of his weakness. “They know how it was done. I’m not… sure.”

“It was done?” She bit her lip and looked up at him. Another Sheris gesture. “You’re sure of that?”

“I’m sure of that.” The purple Twi’lek. Yuthura Ban. Cold paint on his skin. Someone was screaming. “I think it was something done on Korriban. Look.” He held up his bruised hand. “I was watching the opera tonight with Mal and my father when this happened.” The pain had dulled to an ember, but thinking about it seemed to summon it back. “I believe Mekel Jin slammed his hand into a wall.”

“Come here.” Her voice softened, and the blanket slipped. She let her knees drop, sitting straight in the chair. “You hid it well. I didn’t know you were injured.”

“I grew accustomed to pain.”

Awkwardly, he knelt in front of her, putting his injured hand in hers. Familiar, healing light played over his fingers, mending the worst of the bruising. He felt an echo, somewhere far away, as the doubled pain edged, then softened.

Telos, what’s he doing? What’s Malak doing?

I don’t fracking care, look sharp—we still need to see if we can shake down something from dear old Dads—

You want to roll a mark and get something else?

Dressed as a fracking Padawan? Dustil gave the mental equivalent of a snort. That’s funny. Okay. Maybe if we tell my dear old Dads that’s our plan he’ll cough up some credits?

He looks guilty enough. Does he have any?

“I can sense them through you. A little.” Her voice dragged him back to the present. “What one body feels… so does the other?”

“Aren’t you glad it was never like that with us?” He tried to make his own joke, but it fell flat.

“It was like that with us.” She looked away. “Sometimes. What would happen if one body died? Would you all three—”

“I assume.” He smiled at her. “Guess if you want to kill me, Red, you’re going to have to kill another innocent too.”

“I read the boy’s files. My cousin was never innocent.”

“So, that’s true.” He had seen it in their minds, and found it hard to believe.

“You didn’t know about Mekel Jin? Your own protege?” She shrugged. “Davad told me, years ago.”

“Before Arkan became unkillable?” He kept his breath even. “Is that true?”

“The bodies were there.” Her hand dropped his and she pulled her knees up to her chest again. “The Fragment was convinced that Davad was responsible.” She paused. “So was Kavar Vakla. He was there too.”

“Traitor.” Time hadn’t dulled the Onderonite’s betrayal. “Did he return to the Jedi?”

“Yes.” She nodded slowly. “All the master’s left are downstairs.” She arched one eyebrow, in a way Sheris had never mastered. “We could end them all, with one carefully targeted strike.”

Towards the end, all they had left, these desperate jokes. “I’m sure your mythical insane Emperor would thank you for that, along with the rest of your Dark Council.”

“He’s very real, Mal.” The dark mirth faded from her voice. “But you’re free of him now. We both are.”

“I know he’s real. The Jedi asked me about him.” Did she think he’d forgotten that dead world? The rows of sentients, voiceless and still. Some of them starved to death without their master’s will to fuel their life—

“And you told them?” Her voice sharpened.

“They asked.” He thought. “Klee and Jopheena and Atris and Hett.”

“Atris vanished. Jopheena and Hett are dead.”

“I… was sorry to hear of their passing.” His old master had always had too much faith in Malak. Naive as all the rest.

“I burned Hett’s body tonight.” She pulled her knees to her chest, rocking forward slightly. “Davad Arkan killed him and more. He… took them. All of their presence in the Force… it’s just gone.”

Sheris had been easily shaken in the beginning, but never Revan. Her skin looked fragile, she shadows under her eyes bruised.

“Get Arkan to eat the Emperor,” he suggested. “You could always make him dance.”

Her eyes narrowed. “I know.” Just from her expression, Malak knew too. That thought had already been considered: either a plan put into play, or discarded, in favor of a better advantage. She would have made a masterful Senator, his wife. “But he's gone. Beyond our reach.”

Malak wondered.

“I can't go with you,” she added softly. Their eyes met again. A meter between them, but closer than they had been in years, even both dead and in the wrong bodies. “But if you think you can keep Malachor safe—”

If he thought that, they'd already be gone—Malak and his son and to the stars with his wife and the woman he'd loved. “There is… some instability. With my condition. It might not last. I can’t… he's safer with her.”

“I assumed as much.” Her mouth twisted. “I'm sorry. If you want to take your father's offer—”

“You'll let me see the key to my freedom before you slip in the knife.” His laugh felt bitter in his throat. “Make it painless? Like those Jedi on the Republic Dove?”

A capitol ship malfunction. Official reports blamed a systems error, but Malak remembered his wife, dry-eyed and cold.

“She needs to keep focused on Malachor, not…” Her green eyes were suddenly luminous.

“Not me.” He felt the boy’s lips pull back from his teeth, and he was suddenly, awkwardly aware that they were there too, both of them, crammed in his head, leering lewdly at his wife in her white lace; and he resisted the urge to slam his arm back into the wall again. “Are you going to take care of Carth Onasi too?”

She can fracking try. Spark of fury, as red as blood. What do you think, Mekk? Think we can take down the Dark Lord’s cheap clone?

With one hand tied behind my back, was the boy's smug reply.

“I don't know.” At least she was honest. “The other marriage seems to be a sham, in case you were wasting effort being jealous of a Mandalorian too.”
There's no point.

Escape had been a pleasant fantasy. Maybe there was a world somewhere, where Malak was a swoop mechanic and Revan a cantina waitress, as she'd suggested when they were children. Maybe there was a place in the Force, after all their efforts, where they would be together. Maybe they would only live on in memory, history: another cautionary tale if power corrupting, Jedi attachment gone wrong, all their good works lost because of the destruction that followed. Maybe—

His wife made a soft noise, rocking forward in her chair. Her flesh hand reached out, small and white, and her fingers interlaced with his.

Whoa, is Malak gonna hit hyperdrive? One of them. When their thoughts went hormonal, he had a difficult time distinguishing between them.

Silence. He thought angrily. Just let me have this. Just this.

You'd better get those credits. That was all Jin, hungry and mercenary.

Meet us by dawn at his mother's place, or we'll come to you. That was Onasi, that blind fury, so like his own. A hundred threats there, and the boy would carry out them all even if he lost himself —

I'll be there, he promised. At dawn. Just give me this.

“Malak?” She squeezed his hand lightly. Hands smaller than his own, but still larger than hers. The boy’s hands, barely calloused; unscarred. “You… you understand? Tomorrow I won't… stay here.” Her voice faltered. “It isn't wise.”

“I know.” He brought her fingers to his lips and kissed them, lightly. They smelled disturbingly like the chemicals from the morgue mixed with Sheris’s own sweet scent; like an obvious metaphor for an embalmed corpse. At least it made his ardor fade, even as he kissed her hand again, because it would be the last time.

XXX
Chapter 42 / Woman in the Mirror

The woman in the mirror smiled back at her. A little scared. A little grim.

“Huh.” The hairdresser swiveled the chair around. “Had my doubts with your coloring, but it’s stunning.” She tapped a command and the holomirror pivoted, showing Polla her image from the back and sides too. “You want me to take more off the sides? Not really a true Deralian if it doesn’t curve around the ears.”

Shows what you know.

“No,” Polla said out loud. She tried to enunciate carefully. “It’s fine like this.”

She lifted her chin, turning her head, and blinking hard. The iris dye stung like a bitch. She wondered if she should have sprung for the skin bleach too, but that took at least a day to set if they did full-body.

It’s gonna be dark in the fracking club anyway. Suvam’s bag guy’s barely gonna see me.

The proprietor of Adamatixie’s Salon Emporium grinned at her. “Last year’s look, kiddo; but you can carry it.” Her head tilted. “You even look a little like the real deal. I didn’t see it before, but with the red...”

“I get that sometimes.” Polla looked over at Seiran, smoothing back the topknot Adamatixie had made only a little too tight. “What do you think, honey?”

“You know what I think.” Her husband’s voice was flat and angry. He cradled Abasen in his arms, brown eyes glaring daggers at her. “You want to go into it here?”

“No.” She laughed nervously, glancing towards the aesthetician again. “Men,” she shrugged. “They hate change.”

“Just remind him how lucky he is to be married to Revan Starfire!” Amadatrixie giggled. “Did you want somethin to wear to go along with your new look?”

“Like robes?” Pola looked around. “Maybe Jedi robes? Do you have some?”

Seiran made a noise in his throat.

He would get over it when they had their credits.

“We have a fabulous selection!” Enthusiastically, the woman went over to a rolling rack by the window and pushed it over. Everything on it seemed to be made of lace or fur, with strategically cut holes. Still gushing, Adamatixie held up a sparkly number that made the dress she’d gotten from Deeka Jin look modest.

“I was thinking something more... sedate.”

“Oh.” The woman’s face fell. “Not... really.” She glanced over at Seiran and the baby. “The topknot look on a man is... interesting, but has your husband ever thought about going with “No,” Seiran snapped. “The husband has not.”

“Shame,” Adamatrixie said. “I think you could pull it off.”

XXX

“Carth?” Her voice, ebbing, and receding across black, points of light like stars.

_Promise me, Polla. Promise me. If I become what they—if I become what they said, you’ll put a blaster to my head. Promise me, if I become what they are, you’ll put a blaster to my head. Promise me—_

“I promise,” he muttered. “You have to promise too, Polla. If I become—if this is real, you have to promise, you can’t let me live like this, not if it’s all a trap—”

“If he doesn’t snap out of this, you are real trouble, Creepazoid.”

“Initial confusion is normal. But the transfer was not complete when the vessel terminated the process.”

Zaalbar’s angry growl. “Ask what he means by ‘transfer.’”

“I know what he means.” Revan’s voice was glacial. “And what it means is that he’s fracked. He’s a fracking creepazoid.”

Polla—no, _Revan’s—voice. But that's not her. That's Mission._ Had to be. Polla—Revan--would never say ‘creepazoid.’

Carth opened his eyes and immediately wished he hadn’t. Wave of nausea. Zaalbar’s face, teeth bared, looming above him. When he tilted his aching head, he saw that Mission had blasters held in her appendages. And the body of the Abbess was slumped on the ground beside him. The swirls on her skin had faded, and she stared at him with blackened, empty eyes. Blaster burn on her forehead, where his bolt had aimed true.

Carth turned away, trying to sit up, and discovered the rest of their audience.

A half circle of kids, mostly Zabrak, and all with red, glowing eyes. Even Zepth, the one who had told him they could fight it, the one who had told him to keep his secret, had red glowing eyes now. He stood in front of the others, and opened his mouth—

Zepth’s voice was flat, strangely accented. “Were I a less patient man, Revan Starfire, I might consider the death of my Herald to be an act of war.”

_Lie, Zepth had said. He told me to lie._

“I don’t remember anything.” Carth mumbled. “Is… is she really dead?” His eyes met Zalbaar’s. The Wookiee’s mouth twitched, and his brow knotted, as if he were trying to understand.

“Maybe his hand slipped, whatever.” Mission’s voice sounded exactly like Revan’s. “We’re leaving your creepy planet now.” A pause “My creepy planet. Whatever. We’re leaving it. Now.”

“If you came to me in person, Revan, we would have no need for him.”

“I’m still waiting on that contract,” Mission snapped.
“Allow me access to your ship’s databanks and I will transmit.”

“Fat chance. I want a hard copy. On plimsi or carved on stone tablets or… whatever you guys do.”

“I’m okay,” Carth muttered to Zaalbar. “I can walk.”

“You cannot. I will carry you,” the Wookiee said. His arms enveloped Carth and lifted him, causing another wave of nausea.

“My Lords, I commanded one of the Children to print out a copy of the contract.” A new voice interrupted them. Carth looked up. The woman in the doorway was younger than the Abbess. Human. “The document is quite large, as it includes all territories and subdivisions listed in our respective Empires.” Her voice was musical, and her eyes weren’t glowing.

“Who are you?” Mission demanded. Again, using Revan’s voice. Why did she keep doing that?

“We are leaving now,” Zaalbar growled at him. His fur smelled like smoke and leaves. Mission used to joke about his stench, but Carth had never minded. The Wookiee’s words were a low growl, rumbling in his chest. “Careful, my friend.”

“I am the new Mother,” the woman said. “The Emperor is not pleased with your consort’s action, Lord Revan. Rest assured that as his Holy Servant, I am not pleased as well.”

“Free will can be a drag, sure.” Mission’s chassis swiveled and the red lights on her dome flashed. “Like I said, we’re going.”

Lie, Zepth had said. Don’t let them know. Don’t let them see.

Zepth was just a kid. A kid like Dustil caught up in some sick, Sith game. Carth craned his neck around, trying to see the Zabrak more clearly. Right now, his face was as empty as all the rest: red eyes glowing, vacant, unaware.

“I don’t understand… what he… what you did to me,” Carth mumbled, staring at the kid. “What did you do to me?”

“The bridge is incomplete,” Zepth replied. That voice again. Not his own. “You are imperfect, a flawed vessel. You would be culled, were it not for the Starfire’s affection.”

“But I want to understand.” Carth tried to sound like he meant it, ignoring the sick horror twisting in his belly. He felt ridiculous, cradled in Zaalbar’s arms like a baby, but he wasn’t sure collapsing on the floor would be any more dignified. “Help me understand.”

“Does a throne need to understand the thoughts of the one who sits?” The voice was flat. “Flawed children are usually destroyed, Lord Revan; but I will leave you this one. For now.”

“Great.” Mission made the word drip sarcasm, even through circuits. “For now, I won’t raze this installation into a smoldering pile of ash.”

Carth cleared his throat, trying to keep his head upright. “Well… wait. We need to bring back a… if I’m not working right, maybe we need an unflawed… throne, don’t we?” He wouldn’t leave this kid here. Hells, maybe the Jedi could be useful for once and actually help save him. Maybe if they could fix this one kid, then they could figure out a way to save the rest.
Like Dustil and Korriban all over again. Dustil and all those other kids, some of them, at the end, when they came at us and we had to kill—

“What?” Mission swiveled her camera to look at him. It flashed a few times, but if she were trying to signal him, Carth didn’t get it. He blinked, after images of light melding with the head-pounding already going on in his skull.

“Why don’t you come back with us… sir?” he offered, staring at the Zabrak boy and not the woman. “Maybe you can teach me how to be… unflawed.”

“Perfection is beyond your grasp. A kinder fate would be oblivion—or, perhaps the Jedi can induce amnesia.” It was the woman who answered, staring at Mission and not him. “You betrayed our trust once, Revan. You will not do so again.”

“Put me down,” Carth mumbled to Zaalbar. “Don’t you want to oversee things yourself?” He added in a louder voice, even as the Wookiee carefully lowered him to his feet. The world tilted, and gray static obscured his vision. He willed his knees not to buckle. “Come with us.”

“I have agents on Coruscant, already,” the boy’s mouth said. “They sent your consort to me.” He made a strange, chuckling noise. “Surely, you knew this was a trap. Why else would you remotely transmit from the body of this droid?”

“Maybe it’s because you stink.” Mission made a scoffing noise. “Maybe I killed them all. Those agents of yours? Why don’t you go check?”

“They remain unharmed.” But was it Carth’s imagination, or did the voice sound uncertain?

“I can maintain order, Master, from here.” The woman again. Her eyes weren’t glowing red. Why was she working with this creep? “Because she’s a crazy Sith. Of course. All the planets in the galaxy, and D’Reev sends us to one with the crazy Sith—

“No,” Carth heard himself whisper out loud, as the point hit home. Malak’s father. He’s the one who sent us here. He’s got to be working for this guy. He’s a secret Sith and no one knows it but us. We have to warn them all—warn Revan—

“Would you welcome more of my heralds openly, Lord Revan?” The Zabrak chuckled darkly. “I have not forgotten what happened on Ziost.”

“Ziost. Sure. Whatever.” The lights on Mission’s dome flashed again. This time, Carth thought he caught the signal. An old trick every pilot knew. Three long flashes, one short, three long. It translated into, ‘route secure?’ Or, in this case, was he sure?

“Yes,” he said out loud, to both of them. “Lord Revan would definitely welcome more heralds.” That aren’t me. What the frack did they do to me? “If I’m flawed, don’t you need someone who isn’t?”

“I suppose.” The Zabrak sounded distracted. “I leave this in your hands, Mother Yana.” When the Zabrak shrugged, it was uneven, as if the Sith’s control of the kid wasn’t perfect. “It makes little difference in the end, if they send more vessels back—just select the ones that are immune to the Starfire plague.”
The woman nodded. “By your command,” she said formally.

The red glow around the kids’ faces slowly faded. A few of them blinked, as if they were waking up. Zepth put one hand to his horns, and winced, as if his head hurt. His eyes—now normal and blue—met Carth’s. A slight furrow wrinkled his forehead as he took in the new Abbess or whatever she was, and all the other kids standing around them. A few of them looked frightened. They were all looked so damned young.

“We need him to come back with us,” Carth repeated, pointing at Zepth. “Who knows? Maybe your master will want to get chatty on the trip?”

The kid eyed him, and then the woman. “I would be honored to serve,” he said slowly. “Mother Yana, if you wish.”

“Ghost children,” Zaalbar growled. “Rot’s inside the bark.”

“Takan and Zepth will return with you,” the woman nodded, as if she had just decided. “Takan is bringing a cart with the copy of the contract you requested, and Zepth is this one here. They will be your Voices. For now.” Was it Carth’s imagination, or did the lady sound amused?

“For now,” Mission agreed. “Sure. Whatever. Tell Takan he can’t bring that hand cart on my ship. No outside tech. It’s not that I don’t trust you, but I don’t trust you. And Big Z’s gonna have to search them. And they’re in lockdown until we get back. Deal?”

“As with the planet, these vessels are yours.” The woman inclined her head.

XXX

She was snoring a little, so Korrie gave Mother a Hothan kiss, which made her smile, even in her sleep.

Her eyelashes were red like his and they fluttered open. “Is it morning already?”

Korrie liked the way she smiled at him. “Yes. You guys came in late.”

She frowned. “We… we had a lot to do, packing up the Jedi Temple.”

“It was nice of Aunt Sheris to walk you home,” he said. It had been a little weird though, when he’d opened his eyes a crack and saw both of them looking down at him.

“We thought you were asleep,” Mother said. She looked a little worried. “Did we keep you awake? And don’t call her Aunt Sheris.”

“But she’s going to marry Father.” He frowned. “Stepmother Sheris?”

“I don’t know.” Mother wrapped her arms around him. “You can call her whatever you want. I’m sorry we woke you up.”

“Only for a second,” he lied.

“I’m sorry,” she repeated, shifting on the bed. “You didn’t… I hope we weren’t confusing.”

“I was really sleepy,” he lied again. There were a million questions he wanted to ask, but they all fell into the categories of stuff that his parents didn’t like to talk about; and Leeshy had given Korrie excellent advice about how to uncover that kind of stuff without asking.

But thinking of Leeshy made him remember the bad thing. Last night, her sister had said she was too sick to even come to the comm.

“Hey, my friend Leeshy is really sick. Do you think that Aunt—that Sheris could look at her?”

“I can ask.” Mother frowned. “What does she have?”

“The Jedi plague, maybe, according to her medix.”

“Oh.” Mother bit her lip. “But she’s… Sheris said it doesn’t affect children.”

“Sheris is a healer, Mother. Not the boss of the flu.”

“I’ll ask her.” Mother looked worried and far away again. “Does that mean… you feel okay, don’t you, Korrie?”

“Yes.” He smiled. “I got vaccinated. Sheris said that meant the flu couldn’t kill me when she gave me the shot.”

“Sheris is morbid,” Mother muttered under her breath.

“Morbid?”

“It means death.” She shivered. “Obsessed with it.”

Korrie, twisted his blanket in his hands, and remembered what he’d heard the night before. Both of them had seemed kind of obsessed with death then.

“You okay?” Mother frowned, as if she could tell he was weirded.

“Will I have to kill people like you guys? Like you and Father and Sheris? Someday?”

Mother’s face went all white, except for the silvery lines. She squeezed his hand hard. “No, Korrie. I promise. Never.”

XXX

He always knew when Mother was close again in the Force. She came into his dream before he even woke up, and at first, he thought her voice was part of the dream too. Their voice. There were two of them. At first he thought it was just Mother talking to herself.

“He’s all long legs and arms. Malak was like that, but he was older… when I first met him, he was older.”

Someday, Korrie was going to be as big as Father, so that was good that he was so long.

“I know. I… we trained together. I remember some things. Malak was there when Master Vandar tested me.”

“I wonder why they left you that memory.”

“You’re giving them too much credit. Most of our life was just… gone. I had dreams, but I didn’t know.”
“Butchers.” That couldn’t be Mother’s voice. Mother never had that much hate. But the voices were almost the same. So weird, because one of them felt like Mother in the Force and the other one felt... weird. Not bad-weird, just different. Then, he realized. That other one was Sheris.

But it was Mother’s laugh. “Really? You’re calling them butchers?” Footsteps, as if Mother had moved a little farther away. Korrie had to strain his ears with the Force a little to keep hearing her. “I blamed them too. When I found I was you, I… wanted to see them burn. But now, I understand. They did what had to be done.”

“Except they were wrong. They only delayed his advance. They stopped nothing.”

“How do you know you’re always so fracking right?”

“I was holding him back. I had him under control.”

“Who?” Mother’s laugh again. “Malak? You mean, before he tried to blow up your ship?”

“Not just Malak.” A pause. “I had control over Tenebrae. You have no idea—”

“You’re right. I don’t have any fracking idea. I let you see my son, and I have no fracking idea who you are.”

“His mother.” But Sheris wasn’t really his mother. Did she want to be? That couldn’t be the only reason she was marrying Father, could it? Leeshy had been very clear about that: rents didn’t get married for their kids. They got married and then their kids had to manage it.

“If you tell him that, I’ll kill you.” Mother sounded mad and she felt mad too, like a hot thing in the Force. If Korrie opened his eyes he wondered if he’d see her mad. And tell him what? He already knew about Sheris and Father. Unless… was Sheris going to have a baby? Did Mother think Korrie would be jealous if Sheris had a baby?

“Don’t be absurd. It would only confuse him. Maybe when he’s older, we can explain.”

“No.”

Explain what? That might be kind of fun, if Sheris had babies; Leeshy didn’t like her older sister a lot, but they were clones and if it was someone younger, Korrie could be the grown up one. Would it be weird because Mother was married to Dustil Onasi’s father? Korrie had to admit that was a little strange too, but everyone liked babies (even Mandalorians) so—

“I left instructions for him, notes encoded in both HK units. Whether you like it or not, someday, Malachor will be First of D’Reev, and heir to the treaties that Malak and I forged with the Sith.”

Notes in HK? Like a game? Korrie didn’t know Sheris even knew HK.

“Treaties?” Mother kept with the getting madder. “Frack your treaties. Your treaties are broken, since you and Malak aren’t leading the Sith now, or were you planning on fracking off to Korriban—”

“Dromund Kaas, it’s called Kaas.”

“What?”

“The capitol of the Sith Empire is Dromund Kaas. That’s where the Dark Council is, where they hear the Emperor’s Voice, follow the commands of his Hands.”
“So, if we blow it up, we’d kill him?”

Sheris made a sighing noise. “You’re so naive. He has a thousand bodies. More. No one knows where the original is. He can’t be killed, only contained.”

“Let me guess. And that’s all you were doing when you invaded the Republic, before Malak stopped you.”

Sheris had invaded the Republic? Korrie never remembered hearing about that before. Only Mother and Father and the Mandalorians and the Sith, and the Sith again—

“Malak was corrupted.” Sheris sounded just as mad as Mother. Her words were sharper, a little. That’s how to tell them apart. “That’s why he tried to kill me, that’s why everything fell apart. But now, we all have another chance.”

“He doesn’t.” Mother lowered her voice, but Korrie could still hear it anyway.

Sheris said something in the funny language. The one that didn’t sound like any of the others Korrie had learned in school.

Mother said something back. When they talked like that, it made both of their voices sound almost completely the same. They kept talking like that for a long time, long enough for Korrie’s eyes to start to fall asleep for real, before there was a pause, and then one of them switched back to Basic.

“I lied to you before.”

“Only the once, Fragment?”

He’d thought the first voice was Mother’s. Aunt Sheris’s was harder, like she landed on the words with both feet and mother blurred the endings sometimes.

“The Jedi didn’t leave me any memories from my life at all. Malak was the one who… he told me. I… I dreamed of him. Us. I dreamed about him and my friends that I killed.”

“How touching.” Sheris paused. “You didn’t know about Malachor?” Now, she sounded angry, like it was Mother’s fault. Did she mean Korrie or the planet? “The Jedi took that from you too?”

“Everything.” Mother sounded shaky. “On Manaan, I asked Yuthura to look at my mind. She was the headmistress on Korriban—”

“I know who she is.” Another pause. “She knows about me.”

“She does?” Mother sounded surprised, but she didn’t say what Yuthura Ban knew.

“She and Davad.” Sheris laughed. “I thought they were loyal. She might be working with him. You can’t trust the Sith.”

Mother chuckled, but it wasn’t like a funny laugh. “I’ve noticed this. I think the whole galaxy has noticed.”

“What did she see?”

“What?”

“You said the Twi’lek looked into your mind. Yuthura Ban looked into your mind.”
“Nothing. Places where there was… nothing.” Mother sounded angry, almost as mad as Sheris. “They burned all of it away. Your entire life—”

“Maybe you’re lucky.”

Why was Mother lucky not to remember Sheris’s life? Was it because of Father?

“Yeah, real lucky.” Mother let out a breath. “I don’t know what I’m supposed to do.”

“Keep Mal safe.”

Mal. No one was supposed to call Korrie that anymore, but Father did sometimes. And Sheris always did. Maybe Father had forgotten and told her it was his name.

Someone pulled his blanket up until it wrapped around him again. “And hope that Davad and Oerin take care of your Sith for me?”

“You were right to let them go. You showed remarkable judgment, even in your ignorance. Our goals align—”

“I didn’t do it as some kind of plan, I didn’t have another fricking option!”

Sheris answered in the other language again. Korrie was going to have to learn it, to become a better spy.

Mother answered back, both of them going back and forth. Then—

“Thank you,” Mother interrupted Sheris in the middle of a long speech that sounded like hovercars crashing.

“What?”

“Here.” Rustling noise. “I made this datapad when I thought… when I thought I was going to be you.”

“A welcome back note?” Sheris laughed a little. She had a nice laugh, actually. She’d laughed when they were reading stories.

“I wasn’t sure I’d still remember anything from the past three years. I wanted us to know. I didn’t want to be… forgotten.”

“I think our place in the annals of galactic history is quite secure.” Sheris snorted. “But you… you made this, for me?”

“I didn’t make it for you. I wasn’t going to give it to you, I didn’t like you. I’m still not sure I like you sometimes; but I—” Mother breathed in deep. “You said it yourself. We need to work together. No secrets.”

“I could just drop you off the nearest plat.”

“But you won’t. And I… I do like you, Fragment. I find you… personable.”

“Personable.”
“It means—”

“I’m not a fracking idiot, I know it means. You could have just said, ‘nice.’”

“Nice?” Sheris’s laugh was different than mother’s, more like bells ringing. “The other day a woman at the clinic asked me if I knew Revan Starfire. A lot of patients ask: usually, I just wear a mask, but she just asked if I were nice. If Revan Starfire was nice.”

“What did you tell her?”

Why was Sheris imitating Mother in the Underground? Was that what they were talking about with all the weird language stuff?

“I said she tried. Revan tried.” Sheris sighed, like Grandfather did sometimes when he had too many dox to review. “It’s all we can do, Fragment. Try. We have a second chance now.”

“We can try,” Mother said. “You mean Tenebrae?” Then, she said something in that language. Then she added. “I can’t... I can’t kill, Revan. Not again. Not ever. There’s been enough blood on both of our hands.”

Maybe calling Sheris ‘Revan’ was some kind of nickname, because they looked alike?

When you learned about the wars in school, they always told you the numbers of people who had died, but it wasn’t until Teacher Grispot brought in all these jars with beads, each one had ten thousand or something beads, that Korrie started to really get it.

That had been a year ago, he’d had nightmares for a week, and Father had stayed with him always. But Korrie never told Father why. How do you tell your father you saw a roomful of beads and every one could have been someone on Telos or Taris? Someone like Korrie? Or Father? Or Mother? Or Grandfather or Leeshy?

Sheris’s voice got soft. “Your pilot. Carth Onasi. If I can save him further grief, I will.”

“It’s not just your decision. Just because we agree doesn’t mean... if it comes to that, we can’t— you can’t hurt him. Even if you hate Malak—”

How could Sheris hate Malak if she wanted to marry him?

“I don’t.”

Phew, because you really weren’t supposed to marry people you hated.

“You don’t hate him?” Mother sounded tired. “Sometimes I do, and I don’t remember why, except what I do remember was—”

“I don’t hate Malak.” Sheris said quietly. “But this boy deserves his own life. Or if he can’t have it back, he deserves peace, not to be used like a... pawn.”

“Dustil. His name is Dustil.”

That wasn’t true. Dustil was mean. He didn’t deserve anything.

“I’ve seen worlds filled with boys just like Dustil. All of them speaking with Tenebrae’s voice. They’re better off dead. Maybe Dustil would be—”

“We can’t,” Mother interrupted. But she sounded less sure. She said something else in the weird language.

“We’ll try the alternatives,” Sheris told her. “Sj’har’natok. Ejweoork. Eshna win dallsingag’ellian...

Despite himself, despite all the secrets they were probably about to reveal, the sound of the clicking words that weren’t put Korrie to sleep.

XXX

“What?” Korrie blinked. Mother was looking at him strangely. “What’s a hessi?”

Mother smiled and ruffled his hair. “A kind of animal. They run in packs. You can ride them. Like… dewbacks. Bantha?” Mother frowned. “Sandpeople ride bantha, I’m not sure who else does.”

“Everyone on planets that have them ride bantha.” Sometimes it was funny the stuff mother didn’t know. “Mostly the agriculturals. Tatooine. Dantooine. Galtea. The farming ones off Corellia. Brolsam. Ukio. Endar, before the war. Yu-Phaedra, but not now, because of the radiation.”

Mother made a face. “You really know your stuff, huh?”

“We have to study it in school. To be responsible. We Egs have a great responsibility to all the sentients on all the planets.”

“What if they don’t want you to be?”

That was a funny question. “Huh? Why wouldn’t they?”

“Some planets are independent.” She pushed her hair back from her eyes. It was getting a little longer now. He wondered if she’d braid it like in the old holos. She’d look more like Sheris then, and that might be weird. “Some are… there’s other ways.”

“But this is the right way.” Grandfather had a lot of reasons and charts and numbers about why that he’d shown Korrie a few years ago when Korrie had been enough of a know-nothing to say almost the exact same thing as Mother. “It works for the most. And it’s our job to keep it working!”

“There are other jobs,” she said. “Maybe better ones. Maybe more fun.”

“Yeah, I know.” Korrie nodded. “When I was really little, I wanted to be a swoop racer. I had a nurse once, who took me to matches.” Until Grandfather found out.

“I wanted to be one too.” She kissed his forehead. “In fact, I kind of was. For a season. When I was a little older than you.”

“The Jedi let you race?”

“No.” Her smiled faded. “You know you’re going to be late for school if you don’t get out of bed now?”

XXX

When they got to the club, Seiran tried again. “You said it’s the corner booth, over there, out of the light. Let me sit there, make the first contact. I’ll tell them I’m your… padawan or something.”
They were early, early enough the place was empty and the three of them were getting strange looks, even with that ridiculous fur hood Polla was wearing. It looked like some kind of ice dancing Jedi robe over the dress Deeka Jin had given her. It looked ridiculous. And she looked ridiculous.

But beautiful.

“My padawan?” His wife lowered her voice, edging closer to him. Seiran could tell she was nervous, even though she was trying to play otherwise. “Does she have one?”

“I don’t know, but I don’t like this.” They had thirty thousand credits left. On a place like Feldelroy, it was enough to buy a stake in a plot of land, invest in a business. On a place like Coruscant, it could keep them fed and housed for a few months, or get them offworld on a slow freighter back towards the Colonies. But not without idchips—or a lucky smuggler.

Speaking of smugglers, why hadn’t they even looked for Therion? Pollie was always bragging about her connections: didn’t she have any who didn’t have to think she was Revan fracking Starfire?

“I know you don’t like this.” His wife leaned in and kissed their son. Abasen batted at her hood. Those ridiculous greener-than-real eyes looked up at both of them, framed by dyed lashes. “I’ll get enough for a fast ship, then we’ll buy the fast ship, and then we’re out of here, Sei. I promise.”

“I get not trusting the Jedi, but Aemelie—”

“She’s trying to recruit me. Recruit us. It’s like the Grass Priests knocking on doors back home. Join our Mandalorian army and be fracking saved. No.” Pollie’s mouth tightened. “I’ve got this. Seriously. Suvam offered, okay? Credits are on their way. The deal’s already done. We just need to collect.”

“Suvam offered Revan,” he reminded her, trying to keep his voice down. Had that lizard over there next to the three-meter stack of muscle heard him? “What if this bag man or errandguy or whatever twigs to you not being her?”

“He won’t.” She blinked those freshly dyed eyes at him and smirked with a confidence he knew she didn’t really feel. But pride kept her going. It always did. “You think I can’t imitate someone imitating me?”

“I think we’re in over our heads,” he whispered. “We could find Therion. Blackmail him again—”

“How?” Polla laughed sharply, and the muscle Seiran had spotted when they came in turned its head. It didn’t really have a neck. So many types here that Seiran had never seen. “Don’t you think I thought of that? There’s billions on this planet. D’Cainen’s long gone—trust me. I know him. From what Aemelie said, the Mandalorians scared the crap out of him. You know they had him fracking tortured?” She grimaced. “Aemelie told me like it was a joke.”

“Then… maybe we should trust the Jedi. That Vrook guy—”

“He looks like he’s got his own problems.” Polla’s dyed eyes narrowed, and her mouth twisted. She’d painted it, making her lips rounder, more like Revan’s. Shadowed features under the hood—she did look like the woman, in dim light. With half her face hidden. “You were right before. I don’t trust the Jedi. Not after what they did to me. And her.”

“Then, we’re doing it my way.” Resolve hardened his gut. “You take Abasen and hide in the fresher. Right there.” Seiran nodded at the door. “That way, you have a clear line of sight to the I'll keep it occupied, scope out the errandguy, tell him you're on your way. If he's alone, and if it looks safe, then you come out.”

Pollie snorted. “No offense, Sei, but you’re not exactly spy material—”

“I've seen a lot of vids, and I've got a holdout.” He tried to smirk. “Trust me, I’ll shoot first.”

“You want me to come out with Abasen while you're killing the guy, or wait for the firefight to stop?” She'd dyed her eyebrows too, and plucked them, impossibly thin. It made her face look too pale and bald, like some kind of model from the vids.

Suddenly, she looked beautiful, and nothing at all like his wife. Not that Pollie wasn’t beautiful, she was just… Pollie. She was soft and warm, and safe and nothing at all like this green-eyed, brittle facade, that felt so fake that Seiran was surprised they hadn’t already been arrested. Was impersonating a Sith Lord to shake down an Exchange thug a crime on Coruscant?

It fracking well should be.

“What if you're wrong? What if there’s shooting or stabbing or Corusec—”

“Not really supposed to have the baby in here.” The bartender was some kind that Seiran had only seen in vids. Scaled, with feathery down instead of hair. Falleen. Her words had a faint lisp, and her teeth were pointed. “You guys here for the haunted bar tour? Can I get you somethin?”

“Beer,” Seiran said to get her to go away.

“You got an idchip for the kid?” She snorted. “Joke! But serious. Can't have the kid in here. Health regulations. Someone might think we're selling them.”

“Oh, he's leaving,” Pollie hissed. “Just needs to use the fresher.” Her hand tapped her wrist, and he looked down at the chron. “But I’ll take a vodkar double. With dry ice, if you have it.”

“I'll be right outside, where we talked about,” Seiran whispered, soon as the bartender turned away again. He kissed her, hard and fast. Her hair still smelled like the dye and the cosmet she didn't need that she was wearing anyway.

They stared at each other. Abasen cooed softly, happy and oblivious.

Someday when all this is over we’ll laugh and tell him the story about how his Ma bilked a crime lord out of a fortune while pretending to be a Sith Lord—

“No,” the bartender interrupted again. “Seriously. Get the baby out of here before I call security!”

“Wait outside,” his wife told him. She winked, and lifted her chin, pulling the hood back. “Five minutes. I promise.”

“Oh!” The bartender sounded startled. “Y-you’re… is it really you?”

“He’ll leave when I tell him to,” Polla said crisply. “Is that a problem?”

“Of course… not.” The Falleen frowned, glancing between them. “Here. Your drink… Citizen…?”

“Starfire,” Polla said coolly. “I know. It’s on the house? This happens quite… frequently to me. I accept your apology.”

“I thought maybe you were one of the actors,” the bartender sounded frightened. “Seriina? Or Marvis? I was going to ask you which one. My partner is a big fan of all the Undergrounds. I… she’d love an autoprint.”

“Actors,” Polla scoffed. “I’m here on important business. Leave us.”

“Of course.” There was a blast of air that smelled stale, like fear. Falleen had pheromones, Seiran remembered reading that once, a few thousand centuries ago, when his biggest concern had been how to repair the threshers before harvest time, and keep the drainage ditches free from weeds.

“Here goes nothing,” his wife muttered. Her eyes darted to the corner table. “Hyperdrive, babe. Then, we’ve home free.”

Seiran followed her glance towards the table. A short sent, all dressed in robes was sitting on a chair that had been empty a millisecond ago. “I’ll be right outside, Pollie. Be careful.”

“Citizen, are you leaving or what—?”

“See you a second,” said his heart.

“Dadadada,” said their son.

Polla laughed, and kissed his forehead. “Ingrate, you're supposed to say Ma first.”

“Ppppbhlt.”

“Five minutes,” Seiran muttered, backing towards the door, before they attracted more attention.

His wife turned away and walked towards the table.

It took all the will he had to walk out the door without looking back.

“Mam,” Abasen whispered against his chest. “Muhm.”

XXX

“Master? Concerned Inquiry: You have missed two calls from the Communications Lobby and one from House Racharn this morning already.

“I want to have breakfast in my rooms, HK.” Malachi D’Reev coughed again. It felt like a ronto was seated firmly on his chest. The planet was composed of hot and cold temperatures, spiking his blood and making his body shake. “And I think I need a medix.”

“Assured Statement: The Jedi you have procured have several certified medix on staff. Shall I have one summoned?”

Jedi. He wanted to scorn the thought, but even as he began, another coughing fit choked his throat.

“Master?” The HK was merely a droid, and Malachi might be delirious, but he thought it sounded… concerned.

“Please.” His breakfast by the bed was uneaten. Malachi used the napkin to wipe his forehead. Sitting up caused all the light to splinter into shards, stabbing his eyes. “I’m sure it’s nothing, just a summer cold. Summon a medix, please. But keep it confidential.” They circle when they sense weakness. All of them, friends and foes--they circle and wait. A slip on the ice, a broken wing, and then they swoop in, scavengers, finishing the prey.
Concerned Reproval: And it if is more than that?”

Malachi sighed. “Then you know what you must do, old friend.”

XXX

“I’m your father,” Vrook repeated to the boy. Man, really. As tall as he was, with Deeka’s black eyes glaring back into his. “Please. Have a seat. I don’t have much time, but we should… we should talk.”

“I guess hiding out in a whorehouse keeps you busy, Dads.” Mekel’s voice was full of righteous scorn.

“Now, now,” Deeka said. “Be nice to your father.”

“Actually…” Mekel’s eyes shifted between them. “I need to hide out too.” His son was all angles and planes and stubble. “The Jedi drugged me, right? So, Dustil and I… we need to lay low.”

“Or you can just come with us.” The Mandalorian woman was standing near the door now, no doubt eager to leave and join her clan to begin their pillage of Republic space. Vrook needed to tell Jiya—maybe there was a way they could stop them from getting off the planet.

But my son—

“I can’t, Aemelie.” His son turned towards her and bowed, a little clumsily, but exactly as a Mandalorian son would, when speaking to a woman of higher rank.

He’s spent enough time to learn their ways. For them to offer him a place. I know so little about his life.

“Tell Milli—tell her I said good-bye. But I can’t leave here.”

“Can too! Get out and see the worlds,” Deeka told him. No doubt she would be pleased, having sold their son to the Sith, now she could take offers from the Mando’ade. “Mandies might be the future. Here’s your shot to take a piece.”

“I can’t, Moms.” Mekel’s mouth twitched, turning both up and down. “I’m sorry, but I can’t, Aemelie.”

The Mandalorian sighed, muttering something under her breath about hu’tuun Jett’ai. “Your choice,” she nodded. “But know: should you desire to be a son of Lin, you have the right to earn your place.”

“Thanks.” Mekel stared at the ground. “I’ll… keep it in mind.” His lips worked soundlessly, as if he was considering her offer again. His left hand twitched.

“Please,” Vrook was an old fool, begging a boy he barely knew, but it was all that he could do. “Mekel, you can’t go with them.” Not without the Council’s knowledge, but if you could be turned to our side, you could help us control them?

It was the kind of thought Atris would have had. Or Klee. Or Revan herself. Almost immediately, Vrook hated himself for stooping so low.

“Don’t worry, Dads, I’m not going anywhere. Goodbye, Aemelie of Ordo.” His son’s voice was even. Crisp. Like he’d been raised in Coruscant skies and not sewers.
The Mandalorian bowed. “Goodbye, Mekel Jin.”

Without another word, Aemelie turned and left, the exit door sliding closed behind her. There were surveillance drones on this level, but Vrook had disabled them to hide himself when he’d taken up residence.

_It doesn’t matter. You know where she’s going. One of the spaceports and from there to Revan’s old flagship._

“I have to go,” Vrook said. _Follow her. Comm Jiya. Maybe we can have their ships followed, maybe I can find the Wen family, and help them too._

“Well, that was fast. It’s been fun,” Mekel muttered. “Hey. Got any credits, Dads?”

Vrook did not. “I do not.”

“I’m afraid I might have to roll some marks to get some then.” His son met his gaze. All the regret in his face had vanished. For a moment, he looked like a stranger; hungry, predatory. _Sith._

“He’s real good at that,” Deeka added. “Used to keep us both in glover, back when he was little.”

“Give him some money,” he told her. “Mekel can’t—you can’t do that now. You’re a Jedi now.”

“Am I?” His son’s mouth turned up. He wore the robes as if they’d been made for him. In another world, Vrook would have been proud of this man: a Jedi, perhaps soon to be a Knight, standing tall and resolute and sure of his own conscience—

The moment was broken when Mekel started to laugh, resolution on his face twisting into an ugly sneer. Deeka joined in, wiping her eyes. Her gold teeth glittered in the light.

Vrook didn’t get the joke. “I’ll find you some credits,” he muttered. “Stay here. Just... “he glanced at Deeka. “I have to go,” he repeated. “I’ll—I’m coming back. This is important.” Too much to trust to Deeka’s comms. He had put too much trust in her already. Now, as two sets of dark eyes stared him down, Vrook felt uneasily like he was being circled by hungry malraas. “I’ll come back,” he repeated. “I’ll bring credits when I return. Just don’t... don’t hurt anyone.”

“I’m off the trade now anyhow,” the woman he’d loved once said. “Anyways, the whips are real hard on my back.”

“We’ll see,” his son added. “But you’d better come back with credits, Dads.”

XXX

Rappelling the meters down the side of his father’s building had been easier long ago in Malak’s own body, when his muscles were strong and his grip secure.

The running commentary from both children only made progress more difficult now.

_I swear if you fracking fall, I’m gonna gut your kid_—That was Mekel, but the threat wasn’t real, and all three of them knew it.

_I’ll just kill your old man._ That was Dustil. _That’d frack everything up for you really bad, wouldn’t it? Then, Revan would be in charge, and how long do you think she’ll let you stick around?_

_If I fall, Malak warned them, none of us may survive the experience._
Suddenly, the Force surged, bolstering the boy’s weak grip, supporting their descent with a cushion of air. His hands were sweat-slick on the grapple line he’d left tucked in the ceiling years ago, but the Force kept them—kept him—moving evenly down the edge.

_You know he doesn’t have our credits, Dust? All this banthacrap, and he didn’t even bring us credits?_

_I have something better._

The jewels had been his mother’s. Revan had never cared for jewelry. He wondered what had happened to the lightsaber crystal he’d given her once: carved from a krayt dragon’s pearl, plucked from the dune sea.

_A necklace?_ In their heads, Dustil’s scorn was acid, but the boy’s strength—both of their strength added to his own was… intoxicating.

_Five necklaces and several rings. All worth more than your pathetic lives._ The anger was… wrong. He knew that. Their anger. Infecting his reason.

When he’d woken that morning, she was already gone. A note on the pillow next to him. A pillow that smelled like her hair.

_Try and save the boy. If you can’t, I’ll make it quick._

Signed with her sigil, the one they’d created when war was a game, and the pretense of leadership only a stopgap.

1. R D’R, superimposed by an S.

General Revan D’Reev Starfire. Revan Starfire D’Reev.

XXX

“Hello,” Polla said coolly, taking a seat across from the guy. The ice in her drink clinked when she put it on the table. Pure vodka. If this went south, she had planned on throwing it straight to the face… but this full-on mask the errandboy wore was a new wrinkle, one that she wasn’t sure how to take.

“Hello, again.” The voice was accented, stiff, and… almost smug. “Back and forth we go, you and I. Surprised to see me so soon?”

“Not at all,” she murmured, fluttering her lashes. “But I’m not seeing you, am I? You’re wearing a mask.”

The man wearing the mask said something back. In no language that Polla had ever heard before. _Frack._

“Speak Basic,” she yawned. “You need the practice? Old... friend.”

“As you like.” There was a weird pause between his words, maybe he really did need the practice. Inwardly, Polla relaxed slightly. This was insane, but so was navigating the Kessel run with a broken coil on your starboard thruster, and she’d come through _that_ okay.

“I told you I had children on Coruscant. This vessel was merely the closest.” The figure paused. “After Dathomir, you understand why I came to you in person, even with a weak host?”
“Sure.” She shrugged. I will pretend that made sense. “Why don’t you put the bag on the table, and then we’re done.”

The bag was next to him on the chair. It looked big, hopefully fat with credits. Maybe she should have asked for more, would the real Revan have asked for more?

“I found the request unusual. Why ask the Exchange for credits?” The head tilted, examining her. Presumably, whatever was behind it could see… somehow. “But I know you, Revan. Sometimes, I wonder if I know you better than you know yourself.”

“Sure you do.” Polla bolted on the smile, and tilted her topknot to the side. One side of the hood flopped over her face, she pulled it back again. “Maybe this is some kind of test for the Exchange. Or for you?”

“My conclusion as well.” The guy sounded amused. “I do miss the days of our back and forths. Who is the man with the child?”

Heavy footsteps behind them. Bar was almost deserted. She didn’t know what had happened to the bartender. Don’t look to see where Seiran got to. Don’t think about him.

“Tourist,” she said randomly. “Nobody. He was just asking for directions.”

“No doubt much of your time here on Coruscant is occupied with such trivial pursuit. And the kiss?”

“Jealous?” Polla snapped. He saw that too, he was watching us—I didn’t even see him. Stealth belt? How long was he watching and what did he hear? He can’t be on to us, unless he’s just fracking with me now? “Sometimes a kiss is just a kiss. He was cute.”

“Ah.” The masked head nodded. “I have no interest in your carnal affairs. Our own link transcends the flesh.”

“You bet it does.” Sure. Whatever. Credits. Door. Run. Her adrenaline spiked. “You know, I keep busy,” she said lightly. Crisply. “That’s why we’re not… linking up now, okay?” The hood was hiding most of her features pretty well, but she’d practiced the glare in the mirror and she gave it to him now: full on Bitch Starfire, green eyes and all.

“Not yet,” the masked man said. “Possibly never, if your minions keep killing my heralds.”

“That’d be a damn shame,” Polla drawled.

The footsteps stopped. Right behind her.

“Friend of yours?” she added, refusing to turn and check. No use in panic. I have the holdout under the table, already pointed at him… her finger twitched, and she shifted in her chair, suddenly aware of the sweat trickling down her back.

“Is it implanted?” The masked face tilted, as if studying hers.

“What?”

“Your transspace transceiver. My associate performed a scan for conventional technology when you entered this establishment. You have no comm unit, and the weapon you have levied at this body is laughingly inadequate. Another one of your jests?”
“Poison,” she riffed. “Plus… you know, the Force. Bet your associate didn’t bother to scan for biologicals.”

“Surely, Lord Revan, we have passed the point where you and I resort to mindless violence. I am willing to accept the death of one Herald as a regrettable accident. The bridge was not complete, and your consort resisted the process. But should there be any more regrettable accidents…?” He paused ominously. “We may have problems.”

“I don’t want any problems.” Polla smiled, willing her voice not to crack. “Can we talk about it later? I have… like a… Senate meeting now? Already late. Congratulations. You passed my test.”

The blank face lifted the bag and set it on the table. “Your request was easily granted.”

“Great.” Great? What kind of Sith Lord says ‘great’? “Grand.” No, that’s worse. What would the real Revan say? “Get out of here, before I pull your entrails out of your fracking ears.”

“This vessel is at your disposal,” the bag man replied. “If evisceration amuses you now, by all means—enjoy.”

She laughed, but it sounded fake. Not like how she’d practiced. “Maybe later.”

Polla’s right hand shook as she pulled the bag closer to her. It felt heavy. She pulled the handle open. The metal was slippery on her fingers, like it had been oiled.

“Thanks.” What kind of Sith Lord says ‘thanks?’ Her heart was beating so fast. The world seemed crystal clear. There was the door. Maybe six meters away, an outline of light. She didn’t know where Seiran had gotten to.

Polla looked inside the bag.

As ordered fat stack of credits, more than she’d ever seen. She’d demanded small currency, and Suvam had obliged. So much cash. She felt her eyes widen, the involuntary gasp.

Polla smiled up at old maskie. “Tell Suvam, I’ll pay him back… when I feel like it.”

“Indeed. But… one more thing.”

Frack. She tried to sound bored. “What.”

The bag man folded his arms, leaning back in his chair. “I trust you had time in the droid’s body to review the terms of our original agreement?”

“Sure.” Whatever. “They sound great. Maybe we could get together for dinner sometime? Talk it through?” Felt like something was stuck on her hand. Polla shook her head. “Talk… it … through?”

Her fingers were sticky. Absently, Polla wiped it on the fake Jedi robes. She started to stand up, but her knees wobbled, and she fell back down again.

What? “Wha—” word came out slurred. Her lips went numb. Then, her face.

Oh, fracking hell of courseitsafuckingtrap!

Strong hands, impossibly large closed around her neck. Something metal and cold clicked there. Something else cold and hard settled on her temples. There was a weird humming noise.
“Another neural disruptor, I think, Mervisad. After all, this is Darth Revan, not some common Jedi.”

The man behind her said something, hard and sibilant, in a language she didn’t recognize, and a second metal thing clasped around her forehead, half over her eyes. At least it’ll hide my face if they try and take a good look—

“Bind her hands too. The drug dosage, even doubled, may not be enou—”

The table’s surface was duracrete, scarred with a hundred cuts. It didn’t even hurt when her skull hit it broadside, like a ship clipping an asteroid. Just a spark of white noise and then silence.

XXX

The room was oval-shaped, with a long, low table set into the floor, and benches above it. Kavar sat alone, near the window, hands folded, and head bowed. He looked up at Revan’s approach.

“You came.” Kavar inclined his head. “We’re still waiting on the others. I thought Klee and Korr would have been here by now.”

“Should I feel honored or threatened?” Revan tried to joke.

The Jedi smiled faintly. “I honestly don’t know.” He cleared his throat. “I wanted to thank you and Sheris for your assistance yesterday. I know that was not… easy.”

“Maybe I should have tried to stop him.” She kept thinking that, over and over in her dreams. In her dreams she tried, and Davad Arkan opened his mouth and swallowed her whole. Sometimes Bastila and Juhani and Jolee were there too, but whatever advice they had was lost in whispers. A million whispers, like the voices of the dead, but then when she woke there was only her son. Malachor, still sleeping. This morning, when he asked if he’d have to kill—

Never, my son. If I can do anything, I want to give you the life Revan and Malak never had.

“None of the masters he killed could stop Davad.” Kavar grimaced. “Had you tried and failed, he would be even stronger.”

“I know.” But knowing didn’t make it easier, any more than it had when she realized that she’d destroyed the kolto on Manaan to find a star map, that Malak had blown up a planet to find Bastila Shan. Knowing that you achieved the ends required—didn’t the cost matter?

Kavar’s head turned towards the door, Revan felt the new presence in the Force too, a heartbeat later.

“I’m sorry I’m late.” Master Zez Kai’El looked like he’d taken a sonic at least, and shaved some of his beard. “Still, no word from Vrook?”

“None.” Kavar frowned. “Vash is still on Dantooine.” He paused. “I did not invite Master Loanin.”

“Why not?” Zez Kai El frowned. “Surely, he’s earned his status as a full member of the High Council—”

“He has patients to attend.” Kavar tapped his fingers slowly on the table.

“Hmmm.” Zez raised an eyebrow, but said nothing else.

“We’re just waiting on Master Klee and Master Korr,” Revan said. And Master Vrook, if my uncle isn’t dead. She’d left the recording she’d made with Revan. Dar’ Revan. Her other self. Maybe she owed her that much. Maybe she could trust her with that much.

Maybe. I’ve been wrong a lot. What if I’m wrong again?

“Masters. I was just looking for Revan—” Master Korr’s voice broke off in surprise. Her eyebrows raised. “Oh! I see you’re here, Padawan.”

“Me? Yes.” There was probably a lecture coming. There usually was. This many Jedi Masters in a room, obviously Revan had done something wrong. Again.

“Have you seen Master Klee, Master Korr?” Kavar’s voice was light, but there was a tension in the Force that Revan didn’t understand.

“I believe he was looking for her.” What was twigging Master Marla Korr?

“He should have come here then.” Revan shrugged.

“What did he want with Revan?” Kavar was definitely suspicious of something about Marla Korr. Plots and subplots with the Jedi. It was hard enough to manage the Senate and the Mando’ade without worrying what the masters were thinking too.

“I imagine, just to talk.” Master Korr’s eyes narrowed. There was something about her expression. Was she angry?

“Is your niece okay?” It was all Revan could think of. “Padawan Korr? I heard she was ill. Sheris told me.”

Davad attacked her, Sheris said. Should I feel guilty for that? I just let him go—

“My niece is not the topic at hand.” But now the woman looked even more rattled. “You and your duplicate are suddenly close,” the woman murmured. “I wonder what other errands she runs on your behalf.”

“Oh, I send her out whenever I need to conquer planets,” Revan snapped. “Or meet with Sith Emperors, decorators, planetary heads of state…. You know. Whatever.”

There was a long, awkward silence. And then suddenly, Zez Kai laughed, too loud and too long. The sound echoed uncomfortably across the room.

“Revan,” Kavar interrupted. “Tell the other masters what you told me. About the Sith Triumvirate.”

“Tri…” Oh. He meant Oerin and Davad and Kae. “Kavar probably told you all already,” she said slowly, trying not to meet Zez Kai’s eye. Hadn’t Sheris said he was Davad’s master, long ago? For a second she wondered what it must have been like for all of them, seeing their Padawans fall and follow her and Malak, being powerless to stop it. More fracking guilt for me. Or for her? It was so easy to try and blame Dar’Revan for all of it, but their conversation the night before had only affirmed what a part of her had always known.

We both have to live with what we did and maybe together we can fix it.

We have to try.

“We need to hear the account of events from you,” Marla Korr said. Her eyes were narrowed slits of blue, and her head tilted forward. A part of Revan she couldn’t remember recognized the pose — Iridonian horn sign, she’s angry, so angry she’s not even trying to hide it, like she wants us all to know? Or me to know?

Revan cleared her throat, keeping her voice even as she addressed the room. “There are… or were three Sith. They were the ones spreading the plague in the Underground. They were the ones killing Jedi—or one of them was. Davad was. Davad Arkan, Oerin Lin, and Arren Kae, formerly known as Vima Sunrider. They’re your Sith threat. And they’re gone. I made them leave Coruscant.”

_I asked them. It was all I could do was just get them off the fracking planet. And what if Revan—what if she’s right? What if Davad is our best weapon against this fracking Emperor?

“Vima Sunrider?” Marla Korr looked startled. Revan noted that no one else did, although to be fair, Zez Kai was staring out the window and Kavar was frowning at a datapad on the table in front of him.

“The other two will finish her. She was already wounded.” Revan didn’t want to know how. She didn’t want to feel guilty for another friend she couldn’t remember. _She was my master once. She must have been my friend once._

“Kae hid herself well,” Kavar muttered, still staring at the datapad. When Revan leaned closer, she saw what it was: a list of names, all of the dead Jedi from the night before. “Too well. A Force-user with that kind of power—”

“Perhaps Atris knew what she was,” Marla interrupted. “Or Vrook. Why else is he still in hiding?”

“I know where Vrook is,” Revan told her. Approximately. His comm message had only mentioned a rough location, and a messenger. Something about a Gamorrean. “I don’t think… Vrook’s not working with them.”

“He’s not,” Zez Kai agreed. “He went… on a personal mission. Nothing to do with Sith.”

“You know why he left?” Revan frowned at him.

“I’ve always known,” the man said. He rubbed his beard. “I expect my Padawan told you himself, years ago—”

“Told me…” she let her voice trail off. _Fracking hell. Whatever it is, I’ll just ask her. Now that we’re pals._ “Right. Of course he did. Davad… told me.”

“If you know where Vrook is, summon him back. We must mobilize the Jedi that remain,” Marla ordered Kavar. “Do you know where this… Sith Triumvirate went?”

“Back to their Master, I assume,” Zez shrugged. “Isn’t he the real problem here? The Sith Emperor? Am I the only one who sees that?”

“Defensive, now that your Padawan is exposed as a murderer?” Korr’s voice was sharp.

“Are all Council meetings like this?” Revan had pictured a lot more meditating, and coming to conclusion by consensus.

“Perhaps if Master Klee had seen fit to join as well, we could address ongoing concerns regarding the plague in the Underground, the closure of the Jedi Temple, and the Force possession of Dustil Onasi?” Kavar said. “I know I’ve been away for some time, but I find it strange that these topics are not at the forefront of our efforts.”

“You have been away,” Marla Korr snapped. “Listening to those of us with true knowledge would serve you well.”

“Of course.” The blonde Jedi bowed his head, but Revan didn’t miss the glance he shot at Zez Kai.

They’re not on the same side as Korr and Klee? Is it because of D’Reev? It was no secret in the Temple that Klee was in Malachi’s pocket. But I didn’t know that Master Korr was too—

The door slid open suddenly, shift of air and the Force noticeable to all present.

“I’m sorry to be so late.” Her uncle’s voice was gravel-edged. Granite. Familiar in a place that felt deeper than memory. He stared at her, then expanded his gaze to the rest of the room. “I had to stop at Fleet Headquarters, leave word for General Sand. He… wasn’t there, but I came here as soon as I could.”

“Better late than never,” Zez smiled. “Good to see you again, old friend. Did you… you worked everything out?”

“For now.” Vrook was still staring at her, but if there was a message in his gaze, Revan couldn’t read it. She remembered how his mind had touched hers once; it seemed ages ago now, back on Manaan. Was he trying to do the same now? If he were, her own thoughts were too much of an ion storm to let him see. What if he finds out about Sheris? What would he do? What if he thinks she’s the real me? Pathetic, childish, but real fear there. She slammed her barriers closed, and saw him flinch.

“We seem to be living in important times,” Kavar said. “We all sense your unease, Master Lamar.”

“But not the why. Your Mandalorians,” Vrook said. His eyes didn’t leave Revan’s face. “Clan Ordo and the rest. They lifted off from the Wide Rim Spaceport two hours ago. A dozen ships. All went to hyperspace along the Kuati Spire; but I suspect it’s a feint. They’re heading for the Outer Rim. Somewhere… along the Outer Rim. I know they have a war ship, probably more than one. Possibly an entire fleet.” His mouth set grimly. “If this is one of your plans, Revan, tell us. Now. If you gave the command, if they’re massing against the Sith Empire and not us—”

“What?” Her composure cracked like an egg.

XXX

“You think a few torpedoes would work?” Canderous grunted. “Probably a little late to sabotage their ship.”

Revan looked up to him, but the blank helm said nothing. Was he joking or not? His arms tightened around her waist. Her feet rested on his boots. She wanted to scream. She wanted to be sick.

“I don’t want Oerin dead. More dead.” Millifar hovered next to them, and said something else too, but the wind lost her words.

“We need to go to 100 Thantos Three. Malachi’s.” Revan pushed away from Canderous. “Let me go. I’ve got it from here.”

“Your choice.” His hands fell free and Revan leaned back, letting the Force take her down the rest of the way, to the still-deserted plaza.

She landed easily in a crouch, straightening as they both landed beside her. “If you want…” Oerin was like a son to him. “I don’t remember all of your customs, but I’m fine from here. Return to your wives, your family. They should… they need to know.”

“They will,” Millifar muttered. “Clan have no secrets.”

“I’ll tell them.” Canderous nodded. He tapped the helm at his belt, Oerin’s mask of the Mandalore. “Giving this back to us is… significant. You… understand?”

“I know that you deserve it, ner vod.” If she ran, she could be back in Korrie’s rooms soon. Wash the death from her skin before her son woke. Sort out the pieces of what to do about Sheris and Malak—

She took my memories. That bitch has everything that was mine—“Re’turcye mhi.” Her friend said flatly, and turned and walked away, his daughter trailing behind.

XXX

“What?” Marla Korr scoffed. “Is that all you can say, Revan? Do you mock us with pretend ignorance?”

“Not your orders then.” Vrook cursed softly under his breath. “I had hoped it was you. My contacts in Fleet have informed me that the Aleema is missing.”

“The—” It took her a few milliseconds. “My… flagship. The Aleema. You mean the one that— wasn’t it destroyed in the battle?”

“Apparently not,” Marla snapped. “Do you have any idea the damage a ship that size could do? In the hands of Mandalorians?”

“They won’t attack the Republic.” She was sure of that. Wasn’t she? They’re my friends. Canderous is loyal. He would never betray that trust.

Would he?

Vrook sighed. “If you have some means of communicating with them, use it. I… saw Aemelie Ordo leave myself. She… she tried to convince others to follow her. She mentioned Alderaan.”

“Alderaan?” If they attack Alderaan, Uncle Boon is there. He’ll really hate me if my Mandalorians carpet bomb his planet...

“I have comm codes.” Revan was surprised at how calm she sounded. “When they drop out of hyperspace, I can try to comm them.”

“Start trying now. Convince them to… stop.” Her uncle’s face was suddenly heavily lined. “You have more authority than you realize, especially with Oerin Lin dead.”

“Not dead,” she corrected him. “Oerin’s not dead at all. It’s much worse than that.”

XXX

“Jedi Sheris, We’ve been expecting you.”
“I prefer Padawan Loran,” Revan bowed her head to Malachi’s oldest enemy and newest ally. “Senator Racharn,” she curtseyed, trying to look awkward, because Sheris would not know all ten bends on the descent and the rise. “I’m honored. Would that we were meeting at a more fortunate time.”

“My children are down this hall.” The woman’s face was narrow and closed: like Malachi, another bird of prey. “Please, follow me.”

“Of course.”

Revan had never been in the sanctum of House Racharn before. The apartment was as lavish and excessive as D’Reev’s, but decorated with a lighter hand: all shades of pink and mauve and the palest of reds. The First of Racharn pressed a panel, seemingly at random and a door opened to a sickroom: a bank of windows, and gray walls. Small figure, smaller than Malachor on the bed, and the twin of the First’s face looking back at them, from a chair by the bed.

_The Second is a clone. Racharn follows the old ways._

“I’m the one who called for you,” the Second said. Her dark eyes flashed at her mother. Anger there, perhaps. Or some petty disagreement.

Revan sat back in the small chair the woman indicated, fishing in her bag for the doses. The datapad the Fragment had given her clanked against the vials. Her fingers traced the surface. She knew she was too frightened to read it, too afraid that the Fragment’s life would only invoke more regret. Sheris’s mind already wept with despair for all they had done. What good would more self-flagellation do?

“Padawan Loran?” The First sniffed her disapproval.

“Yes.” Rational thought jerked her mind back to the tasks at hand. “You and your other children should be immunized immediately, Senator Racharn.”

“Can’t you give _Leeshy_ the vaccine?” The First was silent, but her Second, a child only a little younger than the body Malak inhabited, was nothing but questions. The girl had black-dyed hair streaked with orange and braided like the latest vid’s interpretation of Bastila Shan. Revan found that mildly irritating, but not worthy of real notice.

“She’s too sick, Leeshansintina.” Without thinking, Revan used her full name—mark among equals—before realizing that, of course, Sheris would only have the status of a hired servant in their eyes. “Apologies, Senator. I meant—”

“No, it’s fine. You can call me, Leesa. Everyone else does. And she’s Leeshy.” The Second glared at her mother in open defiance, but the woman seemed lost in her own thoughts, staring past them towards the window.

On the bed, Malachor's little friend was too pale. Revan didn't like the way her breathing sounded forced and fast, but her fever was not dangerously high. Children didn't usually succumb; the girl must be close to womanhood. No matter how the Selkath splicers had tried, they couldn't follow the computer's precise specification—

_My plague is a blunt instrument, but at least it works. He will never have them, never have Malachor or this planet and if I have to sacrifice another billion children like this to keep it that way, I will._

“I want to vaccinate you both,” she insisted. “Immediately. You’ve already been exposed.”
“Malachi told me he doesn't trust it,” the First said. Her eyes narrowed.

“Malachi is a fool. I am a trained medix and you need to take my advice.”

“What I have are questions,” the woman snapped. “Questions for the real Revan Starfire.”

Revan tried to keep her voice simpering, like Sheris. “Let me give you and your children the vaccine and I'll make note of your questions, bring them back to her myself.”

“She should have come herself, if she values the alliance between our Houses.”

“She does not have a medix’s training. I do.”

Or Sheris did. But the knowledge was there, trained into her hands and the Force. She found herself noting the slight cyanosis around the child's lips, the sunken skin. “Your Third needs oxygen and fluids.”

“Our own medical droids have seen to her needs.” The woman’s voice was accusing, and she was glaring at her Second. Of course, Revan realized. The girl had asked for help, the First was far too proud to ask. She resented it.

Mal liked his playmate Leeshy, but Revan thought D'Reev’s odds might be better if Racharn ceased to exist. Blackly, she considered letting nature take its course, letting them all die from the stinking plague... but then the child on the bed opened her eyes, widening at the sight of Revan.

“Korrie’s m-mother. You... came?”

“I'm Sheris,” she said quickly. Sheris’s empathy screamed at her, noting again the child’s pallor, the way her ribs pulled in at each breath... “Do you feel well enough to drink something?”

“Just... comes back up again.” The girl made a face.

“I can help.” She slipped into the Force, easing the child’s discomfort as easily as breath. Settling nausea was easy, rehydration was not. Most Senators were paranoid to the point of absurdity about medical intervention. “I'd also like to start a line giving her fluids,” she said to the First. “Or we can instruct your own medix to do it.”

You should have done that already. Why hadn’t they?

“In our House, only the strong survive,” the First said flatly.

“Mother, we are all that’s left!” The Second sounded pleading.

“I ordered more.” The woman rose, looking down her long nose at both of them. Her daughter’s face was an eerie echo, almost identical thanks to their rejuvenators. “In three months, you’ll have four more sisters, Leesa.”

The girl’s face tightened, but she only nodded. “Our House will survive,” she murmured formally.

Without another glance, her mother left, the train of her robes swirling soft against the marble floors.

Barbarians. Senate Houses make the Mandalorians look civilized, as least as far as their own children are concerned.

The ornately carved doors slid shut behind her, and Leesa’s expression changed. “Please,” she whispered. “They won’t be her. It’s not the same. Please save Leeshy.”

Malachor had made his case to the Fragment, not to her; but Revan thought he would have sounded the same. She knew how much he valued the girl. Loved her. Like Malak and me? But entirely different. She has no Force. They will never be Jedi.

Useless sentiment. It wasn’t logical. Weakening House Racharn could be more beneficial to Malachor than this alliance.

“I’m going to save her life,” Revan snapped. “But you could still die yourself. Do you want the vaccine, Leesa?”

“Yes,” the girl muttered. “Please. Now.”

The girl slipped off her outerrobe, exposing her bare arms. It only took a moment. “I have more doses for your staff,” Revan told Leesa. “Once we’re done with your sister.”

“Save her,” Leesa murmured. “I’ll promise you anything. Our House will be forever in your debt.”

Revan shook her head slowly. Poor little fool. “Don’t make promises you won’t want to keep, Leeshansintina.”

XXX

You’d think that guarding the most heavily-fortified Senatorial building on Thantos Way would be difficult, or dangerous; but Senator D’Reev’s reputation, especially since Revan Starfire had moved in, seemed to deter all but the most crazed of assassins.

And the thing about insane assassins was, they were insane; and therefore pretty easy to spot.

Still, Willa should have put down the holomagazine faster, the second she saw the guy with the baby approach the service entrance gate.

But the blanket he had strapped to his chest had the D’Reev crest, and who knew?

The rich… they were a different breed. D’Reev was creepy. And his daughter-in-law Sith. Maybe they’d ordered a baby.

Willa didn’t want to know why, she had three kids herself. Her own kids were hidden with their father, since D’Reev didn’t like employees with easily exploitable family connections, and she’d lied to get the job in the first place; said they were all dead. D’Reev did like employees with a thirst for vengeance against corruption and apathy. Willa had tricked onto that right away. That’s what got her this quiet post at the second service entrance. Usually, it was just her and the twelve automated turrets for company.

“I’ll need to see the purchase order for that baby,” she told the man. “Then, I’ll call it upstairs and check.”

“What?” It was only then that she saw his eyes. Eyes with nothing left to lose. The man’s eyes were bleak, reddened at the edges. Angry. A dull click, and Willa registered the blaster in his hands, just as the turrets did too, swiveling their electric eyes down on all of them.

“You have twenty seconds,” she whispered. “Then we’re all dead. Give me the gun fast. Please.”

“What?” He looked up, as if he’d only just noticed the guns trained on them, laser sights speckling the blanket, the baby, his face. He held up one hand slowly, comprehension dawning. “No!”

The blaster dropped on the ground. Would that be enough? Frantically, Willa punched in the overrides.

Lights flashed, and the non-silent alarm blared. The silent one had probably been triggered before she even saw him. Before he even entered the alley. They scanned for weapons. She peered over the edge of her shield. All he had was that one holdout pistol. It looked so small and pathetic there on the ground—almost a joke.

Nothing worth any of us dying for, Citizen—

“They laughed at me at the front gate,” he mumbled. “But she has to help. This is all her fracking fault in the first damn place. My wife could be dead because of her. I told Pollie it was a bad idea!”

“I’m sorry you’re upset,” Willa began cautiously. Really, it was just the baby that was keeping her from shooting him.

The whine of compressor target sights was accompanied by a purr from behind them, almost a mechanical laugh.

“Helpful Suggestion: Deposit the baby with our organic guard before I reduce your sniveling flesh into a pile of quivering sludge. You have ten seconds. Meatbag.”

The original HK was creepy enough. Willa had only seen the second one a few times. Revan Starfire’s HK. It was even worse.

“No!” The man put his hands over the child, backing away from the new threat. The droid’s red metal carapace gleamed in the light of the laser sights. “Please! I just need to speak to Revan Starfire! It’s important! Y-you can’t kill us!”

“Gleeful Interjection: Oh, but I can, meatbag male. Almost too easily; although that self-cleaning blanket does provide a basic level of shielding defense. My lesser version selected the manufacturer for the textile and home goods line himself. Amused Interjection: He is a much better product designer than assassin droid. More evidence of my own master’s cunning.”

It clucked to itself, almost a chuckle. “Observation: Textiles like that are usually reserved for D’Reev loyalists. How did an unremarkable specimen like yourself obtain one?”

“It was a gift!” the man choked. “We didn’t even know what it was until we came to this fracking planet! But Pollie loved it! Junior too! Did Revan send it? Was she playing us all along?”

The baby blinked, screwing up his face and starting to cry, as if the thought of Revan upset him too.

Willa winced. Revan. Ever since that schutta had shown up, things had been a mess. Plague in the Underground, Jedi Temples closing left and right, price of air in the subs shooting through the roof. She’d only seen the woman on the vids (not like Revan bloody Starfire used the service entrance to her own house), but you could just tell. Once a Sith, always a Sith.

The turrets above clicked off suddenly.

“Running facial recognition subroutine, checking all available sources.” The droid clucked. Its eyes whirled.
The man turned to Willa. “You have to help us,” he pleaded, as if she could.

“I can try and save your kid,” she offered. “But you brought this on yourself.”

From behind them, the droid made a noise like a whine.

“Match found. Astonished Declarative: Master lied. To me.” It sounded… almost… injured.
“Resigned Exhalation: How sharper than a shryock’s tooth is a thankless master. Trust, loyalty, all must be earned. Self-Directed Command: Attempting new neural override from previous program —”

Suddenly, the eyes faded, and the thing froze, the rifle in its hand tilting dangerously loose.

“Run,” Willa whispered to the man. “It’s confused. Maybe if you run now—”

“Run?” The man didn’t look like he even remembered he had legs. “Where? We should have gone with the Mandalorians. I should have argued more. I let Pollie do this, pretend to be her, and now —”

“Injured Rebuttal: I am not confused, Willa Kastillian, from sublevel 20, block 38, section 5. I am merely processing new information.”

The triangular head swiveled back to the man. “Statement: Your identity is known. What is your business? Fervent Appeal: Please try to explain with less sniveling.”

“My wife,” the man said quietly. “She’s missing.”

“Palpable Triviality: Your wife is registered deceased on all nine census banks. Are you certain you’re not delusional? Have you recently ingested any psychoactive substances? Are you under the care of any registered or unregistered physician or medix?”

“Take me to Revan,” he muttered. Poor slob was actually crying. “Please. She has to help. She…” he took a deep breath. “Polla would. If it was her, Polla would help her.”

The droid seemed to sigh. “Clarify: You wish me to take you to Revan Starfire D’Reev?”

“Yes,” the man wiped his eyes. “I came here to see her. She’s got to help. They… maybe the goons that took Pollie were trying for her. Maybe they work for her? One or the other. I don’t… I don’t know.”

“Statement: Revan Starfire D’Reev is not currently in this building.”

“Yes, she is,” Willa interrupted. “She’s not in D’Reev quarters, but she’s upstairs, with the Jedi. Some kind of meeting.” She got reports. All day long of where the D’Reev family was at all given times. They all did.

The droid clucked. “Meatbags,” it sighed. “Cautionary Statement: Officer Kastillian, I will take custody of these subjects. We have quite comfortable detention cells on the D’Reev level that will be more than adequate.” It whirred. “Until such time as Revan Starfire D’Reev returns to manage this situation, both man and infant are guests of House D’Reev.”

Another click, and its head turned back to the man. “Obligatory Welcoming Statement: Welcome to House D’Reev. Weapons of all kind are prohibited in residential areas. Children under five must be chaperoned. This welcome is offered contingent upon clean tox and medical scans on all and any parties invited herein. Do you have any questions?”
“When can I see Revan?” the man demanded.

“Patient Response: As previously stated: when Revan Starfire D’Reev returns. Opined Rebuttal: I am not going to chase her down for you, meatbag. My Master is a very important organic, with many concerns. You are but one.”

“It has to be soon,” the man muttered. “Please.”

“Personal Observation: Since her triumphant return to full operational consciousness, my Master is never too far from her own organic spawn. I am sure she will not keep you waiting long.”

“You’ll need a visitor’s pass—” Suddenly, Willa remembered her job. She reached into her drawer to draw one out.

A dull clank interrupted her and suddenly she was staring down the barrel of the HK’s blaster rifle."Authoritative Statement, Applied with Implied Threat: This man does not need a visitor’s pass, Officer Kastillian. As per the terms of your non-disclosure agreement, he and this offspring were never here. Any deviance from this statement will result in your permanent termination, as well as the termination of Citizens Ree, Lee, Deatalia, and Roj Kastillian.”

He knows. She swallowed hard. This creepy droid knows about my family.

“I… understand,” she whispered.

“Assertive Reminder: There are no secrets in House D’Reev,” the droid clucked. “Except the ones Master chooses to keep.”
Chapter 43 / A Fickle Heart and a Bitterness

The ground beneath Polla’s cheek was hard and slick and kept shifting, like the rocking of a plat in a windstorm, a ship bouncing through atmosphere. The world was dark and close, the size of an escape pod, and strangely soft, blanketed in a narcotic haze.

When she moved her fingers, Polla discovered her hands were bound together at the wrists behind her back. Trying to move her legs revealed similar restraints there as well, only worse, because those were bound at her knees.

Polla had a vague memory of metal snapping around her neck, like a slaver’s collar. The rest must have happened after she passed out.

No. Not passed out. Drugged. That insane guy drugged me. I hit my head—

Fear for Sei and Abasen jolted her into action, struggling against the bonds, trying to knock the bands off her eyes, trying to see—and then her arm hit something that felt wooden, then furry and soft. Then, the thing chittered and squirmed—and Polla screamed.

The sound came out muffled and weak, barely more than a garbled moan. She realized they'd put something in front of her mouth too, not a gag, but some kind of barrier.

She turned her chin against her shoulder and felt metal, covering her jaw, locking it in place.

“I think she's awake.” The voice came from outside the darkness, slightly muffled by metal, from outside her small prison.

“About time. I was starting to think we got the dosage wrong.”

“Jedi are supposed to be hard to drug. My note says you guys used a lot.”

“As ordered. Three neural disruptors, two Force collars, beskar restraints, full-body. Plus the ysalamiri. Dumped a whole crate of ‘em in the box with her.”

The voices sounded ordinary. Core accents, nothing like the creepy masked guy in the bar. One of them even laughed.

The other one gave a soft whistle. “The hell? Who's she supposed to be? Darth Revan?”

A pause. “You said it. I didn't.”

“No.”

“I don't know, okay? You know how things are in the organization lately. All those orders from Mouths, creepy priests… I'm just saying, whoever she is, this is big. Don't frack the job.” The man snorted. “Or her. Don't even open the package. She'll keep til she gets to her destination.”

Destination? I'm going to piss myself in another ten minutes. Seiran, I am so sorry that you were fracking right—
“My orders are Yavin Station.”

“Don’t tell me that! I don’t ask those kinds of questions, kid. Didn’t I tell you? Overseers handle the big picture. We just follow orders.”

Yavin. The feeling was almost relief. Maybe Suvam is just fracking with me. It’s all a terrible misunderstanding. Seiran and Abasen were gone before it happened. They’re safe. They have to be safe.

They had to be. But the not-knowing rose like a scream in Polla’s throat, and the thought of being locked in this cage… trapped like this for all the days it would take to get to Yavin was terrifying. I could die locked in here. I could die and Seiran would never even know.

They have to be safe. They have to be.

“Okay, Drog. If you say so. You sure I’m okay flying solo?” The voice lowered. “I told you about the blackouts, right?”

“Kid, that’s between you and your medix. You got clearance. Anyways, it’s not a solo run. Other passenger should help. Customs said he’s already on board.”

“You told me this was just some chick in a can!”

“And a robe to keep it going smooth! You need help with the can? Lifter’s fritzed, but I’ll help you haul it up the ramp—”

“It's okay.” The world tilted, sickeningly. “She rolls, see?”

“Careful.”

“I got it from here, Drog. Take care, okay?”

The world spun and then there was more chittering. Something soft and small squashed on her leg, something else banged against the mask on her face. Her head hurt, sharp pain slowly breaking through the haze of the drugs.

I hit my head pretty hard on that table. He drugged me, and I hit my head on that table. Seiran. Abasen. All those credits—so stupid. We could have just gone with Aemelie. We could be learning Mandalorian right now.

“Stop moaning in there. You sound pathetic.” The man rolling the bin snorted. “Darth Revan. Right. Drog had me goin there good.”

The world tilted up, the sounds shifted. Polla’s crate rolled along—up a loading ramp? At least ten meters before coming to a stop.

“What are you doing with our passenger?”

A new voice. Entirely different. Upper crust accent, more like the one in the bar. Not local.

“You the robe?” A pause. “Cause you're not wearing robes.”

“Civilian apparel seemed more appropriate for our departure.” Footsteps, advancing closer. “Odd. I can't sense her at all.”

“Drog said the customer packed a bunch of ysa—ysalamiri in there. And she's wearing enough Force disruptors to stop Darth Revan.” A nervous laugh. “Not that… I'm not saying she is Darth Revan. Or… anyone. I don't know who she is. I-I drink. Sometimes? Woke up this morning after a bender and found this job on my datapad. I must've taken the notes when I was still fritzed. You know?”

“Poor, blind.” The upper crust one sighed. “Of course I do.”

Sliding noise, like a landing ramp closing behind them. In the ship now.

“Well, anyways, here we are. You know where… where we’re going?”

“I've already programmed our destination into the ship's controls. No need for a pilot.”

“But I-I'm the pilot. That's what my note said. Pick up the package, fly the ship.”

“Redundancy. I build it into all of my plans.” Upper Crust sighed. “In this case, less is more. I have things to discuss with your… package, in confidence.”

“Oh. Sure. I can, I can go to the other room. It’s no prob—”

In real life, lightsabers made the same snap hissing sound they did in vids; but the vids never covered the slightly wet, sliding sound that dead men made; a quick gasp, and then a sickening thud.

Polla choked back another sob, strangling the scream in her throat.

“What was that?” Something rapped sharply on the edge of her prison. “Fascinating. I can't sense you at all. The Genoharadan did a very thorough job, Revan.”

Is it good he thinks I'm Revan, or is it worse?

“Mmmph,” she managed, forcing air through the mask. Polla rolled over and managed to bang her knee against the side of her prison.

One side of the visor had slipped, and that eye blinked on open air. Her vision from the other one was blocked by the metal thing on her forehead. Her good eye focused on the gray plasticrete in front of her nose. Ordinary. Tough. Like a thousand crates she'd packed herself. When she tilted her head up, towards the circle of light above, her neck hit the back of a metal collar. She blinked hard, blinking back tears.

“Oh, my.” Her captor chuckled darkly. “You look… rather disheveled.”

At first, Polla couldn't see the man’s features, only the outline. He was round, balding, and unremarkable. Not Human, but close. Ridges on his forehead; a strangely short nose, heavy chin. And goggles. Heavy, narrow ones, covering his own eyes like a blast shield.

Something squirmed against her side, and Polla stifled another scream, looking down, and trying to shrink away. The live thing looked like a womprat attached to a tree. There was another one, half crushed against the metal covering her boots. And more, piled on the sides of the crate. Maybe ten of them. Their bodies were half grown onto sticks, and they chittered in the light, a sibilant sound that seemed louder than her own harsh breathing.
Are they supposed to eat me? Am I supposed to eat them? What kind of sick frack does this to an innocent womprat? Or me?

“An interesting conundrum,” her captor murmured. “How to free your bonds now? Perhaps I was too hasty, dispatching our friend. The null void ysalamiri create is quite small, as you know; but if I risk stepping into it to remove your restraints… I will, as they say, lose myself.” He chuckled.

“Bththht.” Polla told him, willing the words to come out like a chain of Huttese curses.

“Of course, I can leave instructions for our good Master Klee; but how to assure that you don't do something foolish to him or our ship before my return?”

With a spacer’s sense, Polla felt the slight shift and lurch as the ship moved forward, stabilizers keeping her crate locker to the floor. Heard the whine of accelerators.

Not enough for atmosphere. We must have already been in orbit. One of the stations. I must have been unconscious when they took me off planet—

Abasen. Seiran. I'm in the shit now. I'm so sorry, please don't be dead.

“If I free you… if I let you speak, can I trust you not to do anything foolish? Perhaps… incentive. Yes! All sentients love incentive? Lord Revan. Since I cannot compel your obedience, perhaps I can… encourage It?”

He gestured to the wall, and a part of it slid open, revealing a comm screen.

“Perhaps there is someone we should call? Your child? Or—oh, I know. One of your husbands?”

Ma. I want my Ma. Ma would kill her for concocting a plan this dumb.

Polla heard her voice let out a noise disturbingly like a whimper.

“What was that? Would you like to speak to your son?”

He's too little. Seiran I am so sorry—I got greedy I got stupid. No, he means hers. He means Revan’s kid.

At the moment, she couldn't even remember the kid’s name. After a planet, a bad planet.

This should be a dream, please let this be a dream. Please. Stars, Force whatever, let me wake up.

“You… are those tears? Already?” Upper Crust sounded surprised. “Surely, my proud Starfire doesn’t break so easily. I need you strong. Your Republic needs you. Our Empire needs you.”

I wish I'd never heard of the fracking Republic. I wish I'd never run the canyon wall, I just wanted to impress Seiran, but he told me later he would have married me anyway. He said he noticed me when we were eight and I never noticed him, how handsome he'd grown, with those brown eyes, and his cheekbones and his skin and the way he smells and oh, please.

Please let me see them again. Please let them be safe. Please don’t let me die here.

Polla’s neck ached, holding it up at an awkward angle to see out of the crate. The light shining down suddenly brightened and the comm image resolved, snapping into sharpness around a Wookiee’s face.

The Wookiee roared, and incredibly Upper Crust barked back at it. Three barks.
The Wookiee lifted one lip and snarled back.

“What is it, Big Z? What do you mean, darkness is hailing us?” The image of a blue Twi’lekk appeared behind him the Wookiee; but there was something wrong with Polla’s eyes because the Twi’lekk seemed to materialize out of thin air.

The Wookiee growled again, softer, a near whine.

The blue Twi’lekk vanished abruptly. As abruptly as she’d come. Then her voice. “CARTH!”

XXX

The Jedi quarters had even less privacy than the Republic Fleet had given to its enlisted soldiers, and the woman known as Padawan Sheris Loran, lacking in rank or authority and late to the dormitories, found herself assigned to a bunk stacked in a dimly-lit corner; one of three in a row.

The next beds over were occupied by two nervous, giggling Padawans.

Had she and Malak and the others ever been so careless as the girl with the Ziost accent and her Zabrak companion? The Zabrak was blushing and ducking her head, as the other girl plaited her hair into braids. They were acting as if this was some meditation retreat, and not the final stand of a desperate Order, held hostage by Malachi D’Reev and besieged upon all sides.

“He likes you,” the dark-skinned Human girl murmured. One of the Korriban children, surely, with that accent; but not one that Revan had ever noted, before she’d seen her in the medical labs. The Ziost girl was recently recovered from the plague; and yet it was the immune Zabrak beside her who looked pale and drawn.

“I know.” The Zabrak ducked her head, blushing. Her voice lowered, as she glanced in Revan’s direction and Revan turned her own attention back to the datapad in front of her.

If Revan had actually wanted the Order to win, she would have chastised these children for their carelessness. But as it was….

This is what’s left of your Order, Jedi. This is all that’s left: giggling schoolchildren discussing their love affairs while around them, the galaxy burns.

Instead of admonishing their foolishness, Revan pulled out the Fragment’s datapad, a goreapple and a jar of nutra she’d taken from Malachi’s kitchen. She pulled her legs to her chest, resting the display on her knees. Sheris’s weak Force was enough to peel the apple while her hands switched on the screen. Revan took a segment and dipped it in the paste, chewing thoughtfully.

Malachor’s little Racharn wasn’t out of the woods, but the girl had shown marked improvement after being properly hydrated. Revan had strengthened her body’s immune response as best she could. Delicate work that left her starving and exhausted.

Rakatan letters flashed at her. At least the Fragment had the intelligence to write in a language no one would know. Almost no one. Revan herself. Malak. Possibly Davad, Kae, and Atris—

But they’re all gone.

These are the things you should know about Polla. Polla Organa was a Deralian smuggler. Polla Organa saved the galaxy. And the real Polla Organa is dead. She had to die so that you could live.
It was slightly morbid, the way the Fragment spoke about the Deralian. Morbid and repetitious.

Yes, Fragment. Polla Organa died. So did a lot of other sentients.

But Polla Organa didn’t kill Malak. That was you. Us. Me.

“That was you,” Revan muttered to herself. She could have given the order—she had given the order, but actually killing Mal in combat? Even if had the strength, she couldn’t look him in the eyes and do it.

Even now. Even if they’re not his eyes.

I told him I’d make it quick and I will. Contact poison. A timed explosion. Maybe HK can handle it, if Malak lets him get close enough.

Polla Organa thought she was a hero, saving the galaxy.

The Fragment repeated herself a great deal, writing half-hysterically. The words of a woman, Revan assumed, who thought she would soon cease to exist. Had Sheris penned a similar screed? If so, Kae and her minions hadn’t bothered to share it.

She fell in love with a Republic pilot. She tried to do the right thing, on every planet she saw. She made mistakes, and some of them were terrible.

Some of them were catastrophic. There was a rumor about a new formula for kolto, supposedly developed by scientists on Manaan; but even the healing salve’s reintroduction would cause instability, as long as distribution and manufacture were caught in a chokehold.

Or maybe the chokehold could serve? Perhaps fools would be less likely to risk themselves in war or rebellion with no Jedi, and no simple fix for most ills.

Revan would have to tell the Fragment to tell D’Reev to invest in the supply chains—if the cure for the kolto was real. House Racharn had controlled most of the military manufacturing centers for kolto before—perhaps Revan had been too hasty leaving their First alive. Then again, the Second Racharn had been so grateful, and surely that gratitude could easily extend to Malachor’s family.

I’ll need to decide later. The Racharn Second resented her mother already. She may take care of the woman herself.

Polla Organa fell in love with Carth Onasi. And so did you. It was real. I don’t know if it will be after, but it was real—as real as your love for Malak. Take care of Carth. You owe me that much. Take care of him and his son.

Revan rolled her eyes. As real as my love for Malak? Oh, Fragment.

Lucky, lucky Fragment, to have never heard a stranger’s voice come from her husband’s mouth. Never had to negotiate terms with a madman possessing her husband’s body. Never had to plot both of their deaths for the good of the galaxy—

Never had to wake up next to Malak in a stranger’s body, like she had last night. He’d only kissed her hand before they fell asleep, but in the quiet of their breathing, when Revan closed her eyes, it had been as if the past was just a dream. His strong arm wrapped around her waist. She had buried her head in his chest. At least in dreams. Only that, half asleep, his body close beside hers.
And then it had ended in a heartbeat, when Malak rolled over away from her, whispering ‘Telos’ in his sleep.

Mocking me. Mocking all that we were. You can’t escape my past, Fragment. None of us can.

Revan thumbed to the next page.

The Rakatan computers. I still don’t know if they can be trusted, but I gave the one on Kashyyyk a personality of the child I killed. Her name was Mission Vao, and she thought of you as a sister. She’s with Carth now. Carth and Zaalbar, the Wookiee—

Revan’s blood froze.

You lied to me, Fragment. You said you didn’t know about the computers. You reprogrammed the Kashyyyk computer? Is that why it hasn’t responded to my codes?

She’d tried several times, in the Temple itself; in the Underground between clinic appointments; even in Malachi’s own study; using one of the blind terminal feeds she had designed. No matter what combination, no matter what code she tried, the remote access Revan had installed in the Kashyyyk computer linking the rest didn’t respond. She’d heard that Malak had bombed the Dantooine platform, she’d assumed that perhaps the damage had somehow cascaded to affect Kashyyyk.

The Fragment told me she only saw Star Maps. The Fragment lied to me? The Fragment overwrote the sentient Kashyyyk program and lied to me about it.

Why?

Revan scanned the Fragment’s next page, but it only went on to describe more regrets about her dead friends. And Malak. More regrets about Malak; but apparently no regrets about destroying their best weapon against an immortal, unkillable Sith.

You overwrote the thing standing between us and the Emperor? The means I had to leash Tenebrae? Or would have had, if the Genoharadan had secured what they’d promised to her agent on Tatooine: the memory-box of the long-dead Builder Prince.

The Rakatan villagers were savages, but they knew the power of their Promised One. It took me years to locate the mind-trap. Years chasing rumors, but just when hope was finally in my grasp—Malak struck first, or Tenebrae struck through Malak.

I killed everyone who stood between me and Darth Malak. Because I had to kill him. I had to kill him, and I didn't know why. I have to assume you do. I hope it was a fracking good reason, Revan.

It was.

Trust was fragile: a truce capable of being shattered like a gravity well at an armistice. Maybe the original Polla Organa had trusted the assassin the Fragment had sent, just like Revan had begun to trust the Fragment herself. She had begun to think of the woman as an extension of her own self. A friend even, almost a sister.

Suddenly, Revan was no longer starving, no longer tired. She was furious. She scanned the rest of the words, shoving the nutra aside.
You lied to me, Fragment. You fool. What have you done?

I don’t know what you did at Malachor. I need to know. I need to know everything. That’s why I need you.

Then you shouldn’t have lied.

“It doesn’t matter now.” Revan realized she was muttering in Basic, and switched to Rakatan, ignoring the Padawan whispers from the next bunk.

I trust Davad Arkan. He’s promised to help—

“She laughed sharply. “Him you trusted, but me?” She scoffed. You should have told me about the computer, Fragment. You should have told me before. What has it told you? What did it promise? Do you know it can’t be trusted? It’s as corrupt as everything they made, those Builders—you can’t trust it. You can only use them, but you have to be careful, not to be corrupted, like they corrupted me and Malak—

Polla Organa is dead. I don’t know who had her killed—

Does it matter? Probably Malachi. He’d killed Beya. It wasn’t a surprise, but Revan was surprised at how much it hurt, thinking of the Deralian’s death.

That dream. That dream was all Sheris. I was blind and foolish to think otherwise. Her hopes, her fears, her dreams… they infect me.

Revan shoved the datapad back in her pocket and swung her legs over the edge of the bunk, dropping to the ground.

“I still think you should come with us, Thalia.” The Zabrak padawan had a pained tone to her voice; looking like she was trying not to look at Revan. Trying not to notice a fellow Jedi muttering like a madwoman.

“My place is here,” the Ziostian said quietly. She turned her head and stared right at Revan, delicate features almost a mask. “I dreamed it.”

Dreams. Had to be a coincidence, the girl wasn't strong enough in the Force to sense thoughts.

“Excuse me,” Revan muttered, trying to sound as simpering and apologetic as Sheris actually would.

“Oh!” The Ziostian made a startled exclamation, and for a moment Revan felt the familiar, comforting assurance that she had inspired fear—but then, she looked up and saw what had caused the girl’s reaction. “The HK!”

“Ache Kay.” Revan was pleased she sounded so calm herself, and not surprised. After all, she'd programmed him for stealth.

Just not against me.

Her droid’s head nodded at her and then swiveled to regard the Padawans. “Affirmative Statement: Yes, I am HK-47, protocol and assassin droid; and hero of the famed Star Forge. The reproduction who also inhabits this domicile is an inferior model, much like the reproduction of my Master is also inferior to the original—”
“Did Revan send you?” Revan interrupted, before the droid shot the padawans, or called her ‘Master.’ He’d been warned, but HK was a little too zealous about the logical consequences of keeping her secret. She wouldn’t entirely put it past him to ‘accidentally’ reveal her identity and then use that as an excuse to kill these two hapless children.

_He is what I made him, after all. And he’s killed children for me before._

“Amusement: Yes. Yes. Of course ‘Revan’ sent me.” The droid practically rolled its eyes. “Revan sent me to assist you with every possible task. Humorous Reflection: Indeed, this ‘Revan’ created me for express purpose.”

“He just appeared.” The Zabrak was standing, and backing away. “I didn’t sense him at all.” She looked at her friend, eyes wide and dumb. “Is that because of what happened?”

“No. I didn’t sense him either,” the other Padawan murmured. “It’s not just you, Lydie.”

“He’s a droid,” Revan snapped. “He has no real Force presence. I’ll come with you,” she added to HK, slipping between the bunks, and forcing him to follow her. Whatever other obvious observations the two Jedi children might have were less important than whatever purpose had brought her HK down past several levels of security he was not supposed to breech.

“I told you to wait upstairs and guard Malachor,” Revan muttered as they walked, half under her breath, and trying to ignore the stares of the few Jedi that remained on the floor.

“Affirmative: Yes, you did. But Master, your son is at school and I have a surprise.” Her assassin droid stepped noiselessly next to her, closer than she preferred. “Elaboration: Three surprises, in fact. Would you like the first one now?” His triangular head swiveled, when she tried to sidestep him, and then he moved again, blocking her path.

He was drawing attention. Revan raised her voice to appease the curious. “Of course, HK. If Revan needs me, I would be delighted to come upstairs with you.”

“Repetitive Banter: Master, the first surprise—now?”

“Elevators,” she snapped, pushing past him and heading for the one at the end; the one whose feed she’d looped on itself to hide her movements from Malachi—and Malak. When the door slid shut behind them, she turned back to the droid.

“What is it?”

“Surprise,” her HK murmured. The compartment on his lower torso snapped open, revealing a lightsaber inside. It slid out, extending on one of his hidden mandibles that she’d designed for knifework. “Master, I calibrated it just for you.”

XXX

The Council Meeting had ended in a muddle, with Vrook trying to draw Revan into conversation, with all of them vowing to get to the bottom of the Mandalorian threat.

_If the Mandalorians are a threat. Vrook said the Mandalorians are gone. What the frack was Canderous thinking when he left? Where the frack are the others? Did Mission… what if Mission did something to Carth and Zaal?_

Revan had fled, making excuses and fled, searching for the most remote corner of the Jedi’s floor that she could find. Was this fresher secure? Her comm was scrambled anyway. Revan pulled it out, intending to try and call Canderous; but then the door opened, and Marla Korr walked inside.

Revan slid the comm back into her pocket and examined her own reflection in the mirror. She looked worried. Grim, but trying to pretend otherwise because Master Marla Korr was standing behind her, as if waiting for something, even though all of the fresher stalls were all empty.

“You can go ahead,” Revan told her. “I’m just… I need a moment.”

The woman in the mirror blinked hard. Her green eyes looked exhausted.

The closest allies I have left are Jedi I don’t remember, and the woman who fracked the galaxy in the first place.

“Go ahead,” Revan repeated to Marla Korr. “You can go. I’m just—I’m just thinking.”

Did she know about Sheris being Revan? Revan kept her voice bland. “Should I be concerned for Sheris?”

“The old Revan would not have allowed sentiment to cloud her judgment. But I find you… harder to predict.” The woman took a step closer. “I must assume—you know about Master Klee too?” She paused, lifting an eyebrow. “And myself?”

“Of course.” There was a trick to sounding like you knew exactly what someone was talking about when you didn't give a frack, as any smuggler worth their spice knew. Revan tapped the comm in her pocket to record and almost yawned.

“Then you know you've sent Klee to his death.” There was no mistaking the anger in the Zabrak’s voice. “When our master discovers your deceit, both Klee’s life and your duplicate’s will be forfeit.”

“Oh? Well, your master can go to hell.” Both lives? Sheris and Klee too? She has a Master? Fracking Arren Kae Vima Sunrider has more fracking Jedi under her thumb? Revan turned around to face the woman. “Is this some kind of Sith confession?”

Marla Korr lowered her head again, looking away. Her silvering hair glinted in the overnights. “I want to know why you sent Sheris to Him in your place. Did you think our master would not see the difference between you and a poor copy?”

Dull relief, then guilt. Did Dar’Revan set this up? Was she trying to defect to Sunrider?

Anger mixed with fear in her gut. “Fracking—”

“Try and contain yourself. The old Revan never resorted to gutter epithets.” Master Korr’s blue eyes narrowed. “You knew the deception would be uncovered almost immediately. Did you want to remove Malachi D’Reev from Klee’s influence? Was that effort worth both of their deaths?”

“Maybe.” Deaths? Would she know if Sheris was dead? Revan should know. It was wrong, horribly wrong that the first emotion Revan allowed herself to feel was… relief. Followed quickly by guilt. “Why don't you ask your master?”

The Zabrak looked at her scornfully. “Ask Him? I am merely His Voice.”

His? His voice? Not hers?
Her master’s not Kae? She said she’s his voice. Her master’s voice. She means the Emperor. Tenebrae. The one Dar’Revan is so afraid of.

How the frack did the Sith Emperor have Sheris and Klee killed?

Revan should know, shouldn’t she? But she didn’t sense anything at all. Or—almost nothing. There was that disconcerting presence in the Force she’d realized was Malak, the bright spark of her son, and then—there, like an echo, almost. A shadow. Something that felt familiar. Familiar and close. Was that Sheris? Was that Dar’Revan?

“How does it work again, exactly, with you and your master?” Revan kept her voice calm. “Is it like a Force bond, or Force possession? Am I speaking to him now?”

“So much power and so crippled by your own ignorance.” The Zabrak lectured eerily like Dar’Revan herself. “Did you think you were unwatched? Klee and I have been in place for a very long time.”

Revan forced herself to laugh. “Next thing you tell me, you’ll take credit for the Mandalorian Wars.”

“We only see fragments of His greater design.” The woman’s voice hardened. “But I’ve seen enough to know that your destiny has been managed with great care.”

Arren Kae had claimed to oppose the emperor, but (as far as Revan knew) she had done nothing to stop Masters Korr or Klee. Master Korr had looked startled to discover Arren Kae’s true allegiance. Could there be two factions, both Sith, hidden in the Jedi, and both trying to sabotage them from within? Not working together? Hidden from each other? Hidden and opposed?

She would know. Dar’Revan. She can't be fracking dead. I would know if she were—

“You keep talking about Tenebrae in the third person,” Revan pointed out. “Isn't he you? I thought that's how it worked.”

Her other self hadn't been very clear. So much she hasn't been clear about.

She can't be dead. I'd know. Wouldn't I?

“He comes to us, and then we speak with His Voice. We learn His intent by the… instructions He leaves. I was with Klee when the Call came. Your duplicate was already in custody then, through the blind was convinced he'd captured you, and not her.” Her smile was grim. “We are His Voices, but there are many others on this world who serve unknowingly. The vessel who took Sheris was merely a shadow, unaware of its true purpose.”

“Why are you telling me this?” Maybe it was another trap. Maybe an elaborate ruse to try and trap her like they'd already trapped Dar’Revan? Maybe her other self had set this up herself already and was in league with the Sith—

I gave Dar’Revan that datapad. I trusted her.

She might be dead.

“I can sense your confusion,” Master Korr murmured. “Can it be that Sheris acted alone?”

“No. Definitely not.” She tamped down hard in the Force, trying to mask everything—confusion, emotion, anything that might give her away to more fracking Sith. “Like you said, I wanted sole influence over Malachi. And Malak. Sheris and Klee were both obstructions. Do you think they're dead now? Already? Because that’s… great. Thanks. Thank your master for me.”

“Klee is still alive.” The woman sounded positive. “I can sense nothing more than that, and when their ship finally departs this world, I will know even less—unless He grants me knowledge. But Klee will know who Sheris is instantly. What foolishness made you think he would not?”

Dar’Revan’s fracking foolishness. Was she trying to assassinate the Emperor? Or defect? But she hates him. I could feel it in the Force. She hates and fears him. Why the frack would she go to him?

She hates him. That wasn’t a lie. Maybe it’s a trap for him and not me? Why the frack didn’t she say anything to me?

Could she pass for me?

Maybe. Sheris’s face looked younger, but if she cut her hair, in dim light, or with part of her face concealed… not in the Force, but I can hide in the Force. They could assume that so could she—

And where’s the closest shipyard? Where would they go?

“Can I talk to your master now? Can you… summon him or something?” What the frack would she say?

Don’t kill Sheris because she’s really me? Get the frack off my planet?

“Our thoughts to him are like blades of grass in a field. I call, but he does not always answer.”

And then Revan realized.

I can’t afford to have him answer. Not if it means Dar’Revan’s death. What if this is some plan of hers to destroy him? Why didn’t she tell me; or maybe she tried; maybe she left some word—somewhere. In Korrie’s room. Or Malak’s?

Unless she’s fracking Sith, what the frack did I expect but betrayal? How could she do this? How could she be so… stupid? She’s not stupid. She’s not fracking stupid, so this has to be some kind of plan.

Master Korr’s lips thinned, and she took a step backwards. Revan realized her own hand was already on her saber, and that it was drawn.

“So,” the woman murmured. “Perhaps you do not want to speak with my Master after all?”

“You betrayed the Jedi.” It had been easy, disturbingly easy, in the quest for the Star Forge to cut down every Sith in their path.

I swore I’d never kill again. I swore I’d never kill again, but how can I let her live? How can I let him see me? What if she’s right? What if he sees me and then he knows, and she dies for it?

“He made us,” the woman corrected her. “It was no betrayal on our part. If anyone betrayed, it was you, Revan. He gave you everything, and you repaid his Gifts by creating this plague. You turned His own Voices against Him.”

Was there a way to sever Marla Korr’s connection to Tenebrae? Even as Revan thought it, the Zabrak laughed softly. And then, as Revan watched, her eyes began to glow—red as blades—

It was almost primal. Fear and memory made Revan’s saber ignite, whipping forward and out. There was only a slight resistance when the particle blade met flesh, cut through bone; but only slight. It had been easy, disturbing my so, in the quest for the Star Forge, to cut down Sith like blades of ferragrass, cut down her friends. It had been easy, increasingly so, to kill and feel nothing at all. Kill or be killed. Save the galaxy.

Marla Korr’s head hit the tiled floor with a sickening thud, rolling back until stopped by her horns. Her body collapsed upon itself, a pile of robes and meat. Empty. Dead.

Silenced.

Snap hiss as Revan’s saber deactivated, fingers snapping it smoothly back on her belt. Sound like a scream in her throat, nausea twisting her guts. But so little blood, and lightsabers cauterized so cleanly they didn't even seem real.

Revan’s hands were steady as she pulled out her comm, switching it to text.

Alive? She sent.

XXX

What do you do when you’re staring down the barrel of almost a standard week of hyperspace? Contemplate how you’ve lost your mind to some ancient Sith evil? Drink?

You worry. A galaxy full of it. Now, I could tell Dustil, “Son, I know how it feels to be Force possessed. My head hurts like a son of a Bith.” We could go out for caff and choca, compare notes. I wish it can come to that. I have to believe it can end like that.

Carth watched Dathomir recede in the viewscreen. Next to him, the two Zabrak kids were silent. Maybe scared. Takan seemed to be loyal to their Sith god, and Zepth wasn’t. But they were both still just kids. Carth was trying—he got that he should think of Takan as evil, maybe even Zepth too; but somehow he couldn’t.

The only real evils he could think of right now were the bastard inside his head and the blasted Force itself.

“When did it happen to you guys?” he asked, trying not to lose his mind. Trying not to panic.

“Our ship crashed,” Takan told him. “Then the Abbess saved us.” His voice was strangely detached. “I wish you hadn’t killed her.”

Carth was sorry about a lot of sents that had died because of him, but not that one. “It was a… mistake,” he muttered, remembering what Zepth had said. A mistake, but I’m not sorry.

“When our ship crashed, its course may not have been an accident,” Zepth added. “It is not our place to question His path.”

“When did it happen to you guys?” he asked, trying not to lose his mind. Trying not to panic.

Carth gave him a strange look. “His.”

“Sorry,” Carth coughed. “I was joking.”

“You will adjust beyond joking.” Takan stepped forward, staring out of the viewscreen. “Where is this ship going?”

“Coruscant,” Carth told him. “They… they didn’t—that—” Sith asshole “—no one told you?”
“He tells others through me,” the kid corrected. “I’ve heard of Coruscant. It’s very large?”

“It has a lot of people. It’s crowded, you… you’ll have a great time.” He tried to smile, act like this was normal, like if he pretended, it could knock the screaming out of his head.

The Jedi. They’ll know how to fix this. They’ve had lots of practice messing with people’s minds. They can fix me.

The same Jedi who had left Darth Malak in Dustil’s body?

Carth realized his hands were clenched so tightly into fists that his nails were digging into his palms.

“We won’t be on Coruscant long,” Zepth said softly, almost to himself.

“You were told?” Takan looked surprised. “I have no word.”

“I assume,” the boy corrected him, glancing at Carth. “She will need escorts back, won’t she?”

“Revan?” Who else? “My wife’s not going anywhere,” he told the kid. “Especially not back to the damn Sith.”

“Speculation is pointless.” Takan’s face looked like he disapproved of them both. He turned away and walked closer to the viewscreen, just as the engines kicked in, and the ship sprung to lightspeed. “What was that?” He fell back, half-against the wall before Zepth caught his arm. “Are we under attack?”

“Hyperspace,” Carth soothed. He tried to laugh. “Perfectly normal. She always lurches like that right before she jumps.”

“What was that?” Zepth asked, so seriously, that Carth thought he was joking too.

But their frightened expressions made the laugh die in his throat. “Just… the ship, I mean. The Hawk.”

The stars dissolved into the familiar eye-twisting vortex that usually made Carth smile, check the readings again, and put his feet up on the nav board; but now in the passenger cabin, he could only step forward and switch the screen off, try and ignore the pounding headache in his skull, try and not imagine it was the Force or some insane Sith possessing him.

“Nothing left to see for days now,” he told them. “What do you mean—you think Revan’s going back to the Sith?” Sinking sensation in his gut.

“I didn’t save her for this.”

“Careful.”

Then the boy stepped away again, examining the board in front of them. “What is this?”

“It’s the secondary comm system.” Carth looked down, and noticed, a channel was already open and blinking.

Are Zaalbar and Mission already telling her about me? What if she doesn’t want to see me? Maybe I need to stay away. For her own good. But there has to be a way out. We’ve been in worse spots. This is nothing compared to the Star Forge, or that damned shyrack cave—

“We know you are still confused,” Takan told Carth. “There is a period of adjustment.”

“I’m not,” he lied. “I just—” have to put one foot in front of the other. Get through this. Work it out. We’ll work it out. Everything, we have to—

“CARTH!”

And then, Mission’s voice. Yelling over the loudspeakers, sounding exactly she had ages ago, when they’d been cornered in that cave, staring down a rancor with Polla Organa and a pack of thermocrete grenades.

She sounded more angry than frightened, Mission always got angry first.

“CARTH!!”

“Who is that?” Zepth asked.

“Never mind.” Carth was already punching open the doors and heading out, uncannily aware of their footsteps, chasing behind.

XXX

“It's a lovely surprise, HK.” It was. Single blade, but beggars weren't choosers, and Sheris’s body seemed to prefer the style. One of Malak’s old ones? Revan’s smile faded slightly, as her fingers traced the D'Reev crest on the hilt.

“Confirmation: Of course, Master. I selected it from the Senator’s private collection myself.”

“I wasn't aware he collected lightsabers.” Although the man collected everything else, so maybe it wasn't a surprise.

“Statement: There are several in the vaults and I can surmise no other reason for their inclusion.”

“Sentiment, perhaps.” Malak's mother had been Force-sensitive. Maybe this had been hers—the hilt was too small for Malak’s hand, Revan thought. But it fit hers perfectly. She peered into the aperture, glint of a yellow crystal within.

The elevator doors slid open and they walked out. “You mentioned a second surprise?”

“Correction: Master, I mentioned two more surprises.”

“Of course.” The last time you promised me two surprises, they were both body parts from the same corpse. “Tell me these two surprises aren't going to leak all over the carpet like that Echani General did.”

“No.” The machine whirred, clucking to itself almost sulkily. “Objection: I have learned from my mistakes. The Master does not have to appreciate viscera as I do, when she is so very good at creating it.”

Revan tried not to laugh. “Did I hurt your feelings?”

“Statement: No, Master. Were I to develop any sensation as noisome and fetid as 'feelings,’ I would immediately stick a Bothan shock staff through my power converter and set its charge to override.”

“I know you would. I programmed you well.”

“Query: Why did you leave me for the Jedi, Master?”

“I didn’t. I need you to stay on the upper levels and watch over Malachor and the Fragment, while I watch over the Jedi.”

Her droid’s red eyes whirred. “Objection! Have I done something wrong?”

“No.” She wanted to laugh. “It's just… easier. I need to be rational now. I can't afford… distraction.”

“Obvious Conclusion: This is the Original Meatbag and the Fragment’s fault. Proposed Solution—

This time she did laugh, interrupting whatever gristly fantasy he’d concocted. “No, HK. Absolutely not.”

“Alternative Suggestion: Mutilation and torture? Master, thoughts of such activities always lighten my own circuits. Allow me to paint a picturesque wordscape for you as well.”

“No.” She sometimes wondered how programming in the sentient response had led to a creation with such dark humor.

But remember the times. All those stories about the dark side. All of them, true.

“Is the Fragment here, HK?” Please don't tell me she's part of the surprise. But I'd know, wouldn't I? Edge of anger again, rushing back. She lied to me. Why did she lie?

“Negative: Master, there is no one on this executive level except the Senator, my pathetic imitation, and my surprises.”

“Your surprise—surprises—are alive?” Strange that Malachi would be home in the middle of the day, but he was probably in his study. Revan tried to avoid speaking to him: the man had known her better than most, and it would be too easy to slip, reveal some fact that Sheris would have no way of ever knowing.

Strange too that Malak was missing. It was wrong that her first thought was dull relief. Maybe he ran after all. Maybe he ran and if I can’t find him, he’ll have to live.

Pointless, dangerous sentiment.

He whispered Telos in his sleep. Even in his sleep, taunting me.

“Oh, yes, Master. Both surprises are quite lively. Statement: I disabled the security feeds in the main guest quarters and installed new locks on all points of egress. Our interrogation will be uninterrupted--and I hope pleasingly thorough.”

“Both?”

“Affirmative: Master, technically there are two surprises. But only one is capable of discourse.”

Please don’t let one be the First of Racharn, or one of the other great Houses. We can’t afford the scandal right now, and if I have to make them disappear because of my homicidal droid—

HK chirped through the pause. “Statement: I have also procured enough infant formula for the small one to sustain itself for at least a week, if it is capable of self-rationing. I know how fond you are of children.”

“Infant?” She kept her voice even. Hells, HK, what have you done? “And I suppose telling me more would ruin the surprise.”
“Master, you are wise beyond rational discourse. A jewel among Masters. Gushing Admiration: it is an honor and the apex of my chronicles to work so closely with you again—”

“Take me to these surprises of yours without further commentary, HK.” Revan sighed. “Now.”

Xxx

“Mmmwpth.” Polla twisted her spine, bringing her knees forward. The thing covering her mouth at least seemed loose. Maybe she could knock it free with her knees, maybe she could break one of the sticks with her teeth and splice the lock binding her feet—

You don't know frack-all about splicing without a spike. You don't know anything. You're not fracking Revan. You're just Polla.

She said Carth. That Twi'lek said Carth.

The Twi'lek kid had looked like Mission Vao too, but that was also impossible.

A dream. Let this be a dream. Please.

“Polla,” a man’s voice whispered from the comm.

When she looked up again, Carth Onasi’s face filled the screen. Dark hair falling in his face. Stubble, like Sei’s. Like the vids. Like all the actors who played Carth Onasi. He was handsome, square-jawed, and sad. Brows drawn together with worry, mouth twisted.

And he could see her, that was obvious from the way his eyes widened, the expression of absolute horror. Horror to see Revan captured? Or horror that Polla wasn't Revan?

“Poll—” his voice choked. “Polla. Oh, no.”

My name. My name? This has to be a dream please frack let it be a dream, maybe we took up Aemelie on her offer, maybe we never left Defali, maybe we never even left Derra and this is all a dream—

The Wookiee growled again, angry again, and Polla made another vow, that if she ever got out of this, she was going to learn Shyriiwook, because now here was Carth Onasi barking and growling too.

He said, Poll. I could be delirious. Maybe it wasn’t my name. It could have been anything.

“Polla,” Carth Onasi said her name again. “You know it’s a trap. Get out of there. Go back. We’ll be fine. I promise.” His voice choked. “I always come back, don’t I?”

If she hadn’t been gagged, Polla might have pointed out that she was the one who needed rescuing here, that Carth Onasi and Zaalbar (who else could the Wookiee be?) and even her hallucination of Mission Vao from the Star Forge all looked perfectly healthy and unchained; whereas she was the one gagged in a box.

“You see him, don’t you? Your noble consort. So different from the last one, and yet—” her captor made a chucking noise under his breath. “He is mine now too.”

Mmmph. Polla told him. It was supposed to be frack you, but the metal muffled her voice.

Then, Carth Onasi’s eyes started to glow. The Wookiee moaned, as if it hurt him, and backed away, and somewhere in the background, a girl’s Twi’lek voice was cursing softly.

“I’ll see you on Yavin,” Upper Crust whispered, except now his voice was coming from the comm speakers and the man in front of her. Now, Carth Onasi’s lips were moving, as if he were speaking too. And Upper Crust in front of her lifted the goggles of his visor, revealing eyes that were also glowing red. And then, from behind Carth and Zaalbar on the screen stepped two Zabraks. Young. Both with glowing eyes. One of them handed a blaster pistol to Carth. He cradled it in both hands, staring at her and put the barrel against his heart.

“I swear,” muttered the Twi’lek’s voice, “If you harm either of them, I’ll… make all the suns in your skies go nova. Asshole.”

“You see, Revan?” The voice murmured, now to all four of them talking in unison. Like droids. Like creepy fracking droids. “Come to me now, and you may have him. I’m quite generous—to my friends.”

Frack you, frack you, frack you, whoever the frack you are please let this be a dream. Maybe it’s all mirrors and commlinks and Suvam is just fracking with me? Please, stars. Frack, I’ll go back home and confess to the Priests! I’ll only smuggle medicine and food and I’ll never charge. Please. I’ll go back to school, I’ll join the fracking Republic Fleet if you just please—

“Revan,” Carth said. His eyes had stopped glowing when hers were squeezed shut. “You know we can get out of this without you. Don’t come. It’s a trap. You know it’s a trap.” Something clattered across the screen. His hand fumbled, suddenly giant in the main viewfinder, and then suddenly, the image cut out.

“I wasn’t finished,” snapped Upper Crust. The screen jagged on again, and then fizzled out. “How rude,” her captor said. “Your consort just destroyed his ship’s own communications display.”

Good, Polla thought. Frack you. Please let this be a dream.

“But he won’t kill children.” The man sounded amused. “Even mine. Poor fool. You were much more practical. Remember Ziost?”

Did Revan kill a bunch of you red glowing-eyed guys there? I think I can imagine it.

Imagining that was better than this. Polla shifted her weight and groaned. Suddenly, horribly, her bladder let go.

“What was that you—oh.” Fracking Upper Crust Perv peered down at her, looking shocked. “I’m not sure that’s good for the ysalamiri.”

XXX

“You have to help us.” The man started talking the moment the door opened, accosting Revan, too close. “Senator? I-I don’t…I don’t know what to call you. Revan? I don’t fracking care what I call you, but you have to help! You have to help us now.”

The man stank of fear and desperation. The baby strapped to his chest was wailing, and that sound —so like Malachor on that shuttle off Eos—rattled Revan so much it took her a moment to realize why she recognized both of them.

It seemed to take the man the same amount of time, because suddenly, he stepped back. “No! You’re that… that nurse. From the Underground.” His heavy brows drew together, and his mouth twisted angrily. “I need to see Revan. Revan Starfire. Not you!”

“Registered Objection: Master, is it truly necessary to continue a charade with an organic we are about to torture and maim? Helpful Suggestion: Revealing your true identity will begin our happy project with the correct level of authority.”

“Leave, HK.” There was dark humor and then there was pure cruelty. This hapless fool had done nothing to deserve the latter. “Obviously, I can handle an unarmed man and a baby myself.”

“Agreement: Of course you can. But I could watch?”

“Go.” She lifted her artificial hand and an irritatingly weak gust of air pushed the droid slightly to the side.

Muttering darkly in Rakata (a language that lent itself quite well to the exercise), her HK left.

“I’m sorry,” Revan tried to smile, when the doors had closed securely behind her droid. “HK is… often like that. I won’t let him hurt you.”

“I need to see Revan, now. The real one.” The man repeated. His eyes were red-rimmed. And the baby was still sobbing, over and over again, like his heart was broken.

Like Malachor had, when she’d had to leave him.

Sentiment. Irritating. Weak

“I need to see her now,” the man pleaded.

“I am Revan.” Maybe HK was right. Not about the torture, but about the lies. Until she knew what he wanted, she wouldn’t trust the Fragment with this man, she couldn’t afford to. “When we met before, with your wife… I-I lied to you then, but I am Revan. Knight Revan Starfire.” She took a deep breath. “How can I help you?”

“My wife. She’s… she’s gone.” His voice choked. “If you're her then… when you saw us…. Y-you knew? You knew all along?”

“I knew?” Everything, nothing. The stars. I thought I did. I thought I knew a way out. I thought I was stronger than he was. “I don’t know. Did something happen?”

Something obviously had. His grief screamed in the Force. Anger. The man wasn’t particularly Force sensitive, not enough for Jedi; but he had a spark, she thought. Small, but steady.

The weak part of Sheris winced under the onslaught of his grief.

“I told her it was a stupid idea. Y-you knew. If you knew all along, was it you who took her?”

Hope there. So much.

“I’m sorry.” Why would I take your wife? She shook her head. Why did HK dump this petty tragedy at my feet? For fun? “Maybe I can help you find her again.” She tried to remember the man’s name and failed. “I remember you’re from Deralia. That blanket. Your son, he had a slight fever. Your wife… she was…” she couldn’t remember the woman’s face. Or the man’s for that matter, except it was in front of her now. Just their son and that blanket—refugees, like she and Malak and Malachor had been, so long ago. “There are several gangs in the Underground who deal in trafficking. The ones who abduct Humans mostly work for the Hutts, or the Black Sun. Your wife was an attract— is an attractive woman. They won’t… they won’t harm her.” Not right away. She tried to sound reassuring. “We’ll find her.”

She would help. They reminded her of her and Malak, long ago. All of their Jedi pride reduced to helplessness in the face of war. The stench of that ship. All of that fear. Malachor had been even smaller than this infant. And all of them, so afraid.

“My wife is an attractive woman,” he repeated. Then, he laughed. It had the sound of hysteria. “That’s… that’s all you can say?”

“I’m sorry,” she repeated. “I want to help.”

Revan’s comm beeped suddenly. She glanced down. One Rakatan symbol, sketched across the screen.

Alive?

“One moment,” she told him, holding up her hand.

As she watched, the one rune expanded into a wall of text.

Are you alive? Are you even the one reading this? Because Master Marla Korr said you were captured, Sheris. By Klee. For his BOSS. You remember his boss? Did you know? Did you know Master Marla Korr and Master Klee had a BOSS?

And if this is you reading this, Tenebrae, I will destroy you. I cut her head off. Her eyes started glowing and I cut off her head. Did you plan this, Sheris? Is it you reading this or him?

A pause, long enough for her breath to catch.

Answer me. Answer me. Are you alive?

“When you saw us before… why didn’t you say anything then?” The man, interrupting. “If you knew who she was, why didn’t you say something?”

“Give me a moment,” she told him again. “This is important.”

“So is she,” he whispered. “You have to know that. Don’t you know that?”

ALIVE? REVAN ARE YOU ALIVE?

Then, she felt it: the woman’s fear, echoing like a shockwave.

Calm yourself, Fragment. Revan typed back. I’m upstairs.

The man made a low noise in his throat. The infant was still crying. She felt their loss beating down on her like the rays of an unfamiliar sun.

Marla Korr was Tenebrae’s creature? Marla Korr told the Fragment that Sheris was captured by Master Klee?

Her eyes flickered to the man again. Could he be a blind? A blind with a baby? But HK would have scanned them for toxins, explosives. He’d ever let them close if there was a threat.
“Have you ever woken up in a strange place with no memory of how you came there?” Like Malak, standing over their bed with his saber lit in his hand.

“What?” The Deralian shook his head. “This isn’t about me. It’s about her. You have to remember, you have to care—”

If you’re a blind, Tenebrae must be distracted by something else. Containment. I’ll make HK secure you, scan you again. Her eyes looked at the baby and she felt a chill.

Ziost. What if this is payback for what I did to His children on Ziost?

Even in this weak body, she could end them in an instant. Except—

Was that what he wanted her to do? Wanted Revan to do? It was too simple. It had to be a trap.

“I’m sorry, but I do want to help. I do.” She took a step backwards, considering them carefully.

The man laughed softly, shaking his head. “All this time,” he said. “All this fracking… time, and you—” his words choked. “She was obsessed with you. Obsessed! She watched all the vids, everything. Sometimes, I caught her dancing in the kitchen with a spoon like it was a lightsaber. I mean, I know, small planet—she caught a lot of shit for you. Even if she wanted to forget, how could she? You were everywhere.”

Her comm beeped again.

I had no choice. I had to kill her. I don’t know what to do with the body. We’re in the fresher. The one by the galley. I locked the door, but all the Jedi—won’t they know? I don’t know what to tell them. Do I tell them the truth?

Revan gritted her teeth and traced symbols back. It doesn’t matter. Tenebrae’s here. Come now. Galling as it was to admit… I need you.

“Do you… you really don’t care, do you?” The man again.

Revan bit back her impatience with this absurd tragedy play. “Your wife is already dead, almost assuredly.”

The man’s face crumpled, and he sagged, wrapping his arms around the child. “No,” he whispered. “She’s not. Polla believed in you. Even after everything, she thought you—they all warned us. Your own damned uncle warned us, I should have known better.”

“I’m sorry,” Revan repeated, dully. She took a step backwards. Poor fool. The Emperor’s infected your thoughts. No telling what delusion he’s given you. “Calm yourself. My droid will… help you. In a moment.” She kept her voice gentle. “Just tell me what you remember.”

That child. The ones on Ziost had been older. Tenebrae was toying with her. Did he want them dead or alive? Could she afford to keep them alive?

But they were vaccinated. I gave them the vaccine myself. They can’t--they can’t be his.

The thought, like a shock of cold water. An obvious one. One she should have realized before.

Maybe the vaccine didn’t work? Maybe it never did, or that one batch didn’t? Maybe the plague was always another one of His games all along?
Doubts and fears. Easy to vanquish in her own body, but Sheris’s mind was weak. Doubts and pity for this man and his child and his dead wife.

“Here.” The man’s voice choked, he was still stubbornly shaking his head, denying the truth. “A holo. I took it today, when she wasn’t looking. I thought later, we could tell Abasen about the time his Ma pretended to be Darth Revan to bilk the Exchange out of ten million credits.”

Revan blinked. “What?”

His hand shook as he handed it to her.

The woman in the holo had a pointed chin and bright red hair, twisted in a Deralian topknot. Her eyes were green against golden skin. Her nose tilted. Her lips were painted, strangely pink and artificial against the smug light in her eyes. The backdrop appeared to be some kind of cheap cosmet shop. Another woman, silver-haired and impossibly thin, beamed, half out of the holo.

The red-headed woman was wearing some obscene travesty of a Jedi’s robes. Spangled, with a fur hood. She looked absurd, except in the eyes, the surety of that smirk, the stance—

“Why is your wife dressed like… like me?” Not me. Like her. Her hand pulled at her braids.

“I just told you. She was trying to be you to bilk the Exchange out of ten million credits.”

“So she was a criminal.”

This is Tenebrae’s game? That doesn’t make any sense.

What if they are what the man says?

The woman was obviously deranged. Insane. Why would HK dump this at her feet? If they weren’t from Tenebrae, then why would HK bother? Was this her droid’s version of a joke? Darkly, she wondered if HK was the one who had made the woman disappear.

“She’s a registered smuggler.” Impatience blared through the man’s voice. “You had her fracking cousin killed! We faked our own deaths to get away from you! And you’re calling her a criminal? Didn’t you invade the Republic? Polla just wanted her own damned life.”

“What?” She looked up from the holo. “I didn’t have anyone killed.” Recently.

“Beya,” he practically spat out the name. “Beya Organa. Ring any fracking bells?”

XXX

“You’re beautiful.”

“I am not.” At least it didn’t matter, here in the dark. In the dark, Sheris could forget her scars.

“You are to me.” Beya lifted the blanket back. Above them, the narrow window let in a patch if watery sun.

Sheris squinted in the glare. “How can you even look? I’m hideous.”

The other woman’s hand traced the scars on the side of her face. Parts were numb, where the metal had been inset to cover the worst of the damage. “No,” she murmured. “Never, Sheris. Never to me.”
Beya’s eyes were so dark as she leaned forward, lips brushing against Sheris’s. She smelled like the firewhiskey Vikor had shared, soft and acid on her breath.

“The others will hear.” Sheris pulled back. She didn’t care, not right now, but the others might. It might be rude, being happy in a place like this, at a time like this.

Beya’s skin was soft under the blankets. “Let them.” She rolled on top. Fierce blue eyes stared down at Sheris, and Beya leaned forward again, nuzzling her neck. “Let’s take what joy we can. We might be locked up here for the rest of our lives.”

“I don’t mind, if I’m with you.” It was a better fate than she’d expected from Oerin. Better than dying with Malak on the Star Forge—

XXX

Where? Revan blinked, but this wasn’t a dream, and neither Sheris or Beya had answers. Her hand went to her face. Smooth skin there, not metal; but the memory came, unbidden: it had been metal once.

To cover the scars, the wounds Oerin gave me.

Not me. Sheris. I’m Revan. I’m not her.

She stared at the holo again. The woman’s smile was careless. Reckless. Reckless enough to pretend to be Darth Revan? The woman must have been deranged.

“Look at her,” the man pleaded. “She can’t be dead. Please.”

Revan looked. The woman’s smile was too confident. Careless. “You said her name just now. What was it?”

“You know her name!” he spat. “Polla. Polla Organa. You know her. She’s you, how can you look at her and not know—”

Reckless enough to destroy the kolto for the sake of a Star Map? Deranged enough to take on Malak with a handful of grenades on an exploding Star Forge? Reckless enough to take on D’Reev and the entire Senate with a rag-tag bag of Mandalorians for Malachor? Deranged enough to let three Sith Lords leave the planet?

Oh, Fragment. Now that she knew, it was so obvious. That smug grin. The same.

“Your wife was… the smuggler. The smuggler, Polla Organa.” Revan took a deep breath. “And I didn’t have Beya killed. I-I loved Beya. Both… we both loved her.”

His mouth twisted. “What do you think I’ve been saying this entire time? You must remember—did it wear off or something? Did the Jedi take it all back?”

“No.” She shook her head. “Not exactly.” How to tell him? Had the Fragment known all along that her template wasn’t dead? Do I tell her? Should I tell her now, or keep this hidden? She can’t afford another emotional distraction—

The door didn’t so much as slide open, as it rippled, machinery cracking, spinning off its hinges. The Fragment was framed in its wreckage, face bisected by her red saber. Something was making a whirring noise behind her, like a piece of machinery grinding to a stop and restarting, over and over.

“Where?” she demanded. Her eyes met Revan’s. But where Revan had expected to find fear and anger, the Fragment was only cold. “Where is he?”

The man took a step backwards, somewhat wisely shielding his son with his arms, moving away from the deranged Jedi in the doorway. His foot scuffed on the floor and in another heartbeat, the Fragment had moved towards him, saber still extended. “You—”

And then she froze.

Her blade deactivated with a sharp click. “Seiran?”

XXX

Carth’s hands closed on nothing, futile fists; helpless to help her. She could be light years away already, and all he had was this comm.

The holocam’s camera washed out Revan’s face, making her a ghost. She was barely recognizable in the shadows of the permacrete crate: matted red hair, half hidden under a crooked visor, the visible side of her face swollen by an angry-looking bruise. A metal mask that looked disturbingly like the one Darth Malak had worn covered the lower half of her face. One green eye, rimmed by dark bruises, glared up at him. From the angle, it looked like her hands were in restraints too.

These captors had taken no chances.

Of course not. That’s a neural disruptor. Two neural disruptors? A Force collar? She’s Revan. They must know that when she gets free she can tear them apart.

Carth recognized the man looming above her prison too, even from the overhead view. That Jedi Master D’Reev liked. The Eosian. Klee. Only Klee’s eyes were glowing red now, and he didn't sound like a Jedi at all.

You know who he is. And you know he’ll use you against her—just like D’Reev tried to do. He’s working with D’Reev. This is more of the fracking same. And you can’t let it happen.

“Polla,” Carth Onasi whispered. “Don’t. You know it’s a trap. Get out of there. Go back. We’ll be fine. I promise.” His voice choked. “I always come back, don’t I?”

His wife’s head shook. She made a moaning noise, under the mask. For a second, he thought she was speaking Shyriiwook, but if it was, the mask muffled her intonation too badly to understand.

He had to believe in her. We’ve been in worse spots, beautiful. That Sith scum can’t keep you locked up forever.

“You see him, don’t you? Your noble consort. So different from the last one, and yet—” her captor made a noise under his breath. “He is mine now too.”

I’m not. I’m not yours. Blasted Sith. I’m not yours I’m not yours, I’m not—

Light seemed to explode behind his eyelids, washing everything in cold white.

And then, the world had shifted. There was something long and cold and metal in his hand now. Carth realized he was holding a blaster to his heart, while Zaalbar growled with rage and Mission cursed in the background.

“Come to me now, and you can have him back. Both of them. I’m quite generous—to my friends.”

The voice echoed. Doubled. Carth looked from side to side and realized the Zabrak kids still flanked him. Both of them with red, glowing eyes. Both speaking in unison.

Like I was, I was too a second ago.

But I’m not now. I’m me. I’m me.

“Revan,” Carth whispered. “You know we can get out of this. “Polla. Don’t come. It’s a trap. You know it’s a trap.”

Her head turned towards his, covered in metal. Her bruised eye was full of tears. She shook her head.

How many impossible situations have we been in, beautiful? I have faith. Faith in you. If you don’t come to Yavin, they've got nothing. Remember that.

The blaster had a safety. Carth thumbed it off and fired at the communications console, exploding the Hawk’s links to the outside in a shower of sparks.

“I wasn’t finished!” The Zabrak cried out. Both of them in unison. And then, abruptly, their eyes stopped glowing. Zepth stumbled on his feet and Takan wiped his eyes.

Carth sagged backwards, snapping the blaster back on his belt. The comm chair loomed up behind him, tilted backwards when he half fell in it, muscles suddenly weak as a mukluk’s.

“Did He do that?” Zepth looked at Carth. “Was that Him, or you?”

“That was me, kid.” I can fight this. There’s got to be a way to fight this.

“You are a fool,” Takan muttered. But Carth thought he might look… almost impressed. Maybe there’s hope for you yet, kid. Maybe we can set us all free.

“You destroyed our comms.” Mission said. “There goes my idea of calling in Kashyyyk for help. It’s gonna take days to get something back online.”

“Why did you tell her not to go where we must?” Zaalbar groaned. “Why not make some plan, something the infidel Sithspawn cannot grasp?”

Carth’s head pounded, as he surveyed the ruin of the console. “I had to tell her. Even if she ignores it. Just like we have to go, even if it’s a trap.”

Just like we have to win. I don’t know how, but we have to.

“Setting in course to Yavin,” Mission clipped. “And trust me, if Suvam Tan’s working with these assholes I’m gonna strip the flesh from his bones.”

XXX

She ran through the Jedi quarters with Force-enhanced speed, sprinting towards the elevators and her other self before the Council realized she was gone.
Revan had expected Tenebrae. Maybe in the body of Master Klee, maybe as someone else.

She had killed Master Korr. She had been prepared to kill whoever it was that threatened Dar’Revan too. The relief she'd thought she felt at the woman’s possible death was nothing compared to the relief she felt that the woman was alive.

Her saber had been out and already lit before they registered: first the child strapped to his chest and then the man carrying the child: brown hair, stubbled, handsome face. Square jawed. His nose was sharper than Carth’s, his face longer. He was shorter, but they both had those regular, almost bland good looks that Polla had once found too boring and safe.

But not after Therion.

Growing up, Polla had never noticed Seiran Wen. Swoop mechanics turned farmers weren’t really her thing. Not when there was a universe of stars out there, and a good ship under her hands; and fellow smugglers willing to flatter, cajole and lie to get her in the sack and covering their trade runs for the price of a screw and a smile.

Seiran had been too safe, too sound, too boring; but flashes of their childhood intruded all the same: that time when they were eight and he'd coaxed her down from the tree; that time when they were twelve and he'd asked her to harvest dance and she'd turned him down flat as fields for her cousin Cefir. That time at fifteen, when he'd fixed her bike and she won tweener champion and he'd looked as proud as if he'd raced the course himself.

He'd grown broader since then, and the child strapped to his chest had his scowl, the same sharp nose and red-rimmed brown eyes. They both looked like they'd been crying. They both had that look—like they'd lost everything. And they were both here.

“Sei-ran,” she repeated. Her voice caught on the second syllable, adding it for formality, because his child’s nickname wasn't a man’s; and technically, they'd never met. “You—you’re…” Red-rimmed eyes and that look on his face. She could only think of one reason he might be here, and it was because his wife was not. “What happened?” She clipped her lightsaber back on her belt, hoping she hadn't scared the frack out of him already.

“Two of you?” He looked at Dar’Revan, and then at her, the frown settling on his face. “How the hell can there be two of you?”

“There's not.” Dar’Revan interrupted, before Revan could explain. “When I told you I was Revan before, I—”

“You told him you were Revan?” Revan interrupted. “Why the frack did you do that?”

“Because it is true. And he wanted Revan’s help. We had met before, in the Underground. He came here seeking Revan’s help to find his wife—”

“You... met them in the Underground? Did you meet her too? She was here too? Did you know?”

“Of course not!” Dar’Revan looked rattled. “I knew they were Deralian. They both sounded like Beya. Their son was sick, and they came to the Jedi clinic. They gave false names, and they recognized me, of course. But that happens so often, I didn't find their response unusual.”

“So you've been going around the Underground pretending to be me.”

“No, Fragment. That would only constrain my movements. Don't be a fool.” Dar’Revan glanced at the man again and switched abruptly to Rakatan. “Tell him whatever you like. But his wife went missing impersonating us.”

No. Cold fear made her breath catch. The logic was there, even if it seemed impossible. “Master Korr said Klee had captured you.”

“Maybe they captured her.”

“How could they mistake her for us?”

Dar’Revan raised her eyebrow at the man, switching back to Basic. “Show her the holo.”

His face was a mask of pain when he handed it to Revan. His wedding ring was good, solid D’rrano coppa, squared and edged. “I don't understand,” he mumbled.

Revan wondered if he was going into shock. She looked down at the holo, her heart sinking all the way to her toes.

“Why is she dressed like… that?” There were other questions she wanted to ask too, like why the frack they'd come here instead of hiding out safe on the Defalli Rim.

“We needed credits to get off this sewer rock,” Seiran mumbled. “Pollie thought she could… her old boss, Suvam Tan, he already thought she was… you. One of you. Offered her an infinite credit line. She wanted to buy a ship.”

“I would have bought her a ship.” Anything. You were supposed to be safe, Polla. You weren't supposed to be here.

“You…” his eyes met hers. “You… you're the one they kept warning us against? Or is that her?”

“What? Who kept—”

“Everyone. Aemelie, that aunt and uncle of yours, your cousin—”

“She's not my cousin. Dar’Revan’s not my cousin.” Aunt Yancy? But she's dead. “I don't have any cousins. Polla’s the one with family.”

Dar’Revan almost laughed. “You’ve been trying to shake down all of her relatives? Was this before or after Polla Organa tried to extort ten million credits from the Exchange?” Her mouth twisted, and she looked at Revan. “You do have a cousin. Vrook has a son. You’re acquainted already. Mekel Jin.”

“What?” Mekel’s Vrook's son? How the frack did that happen? Under different circumstances, Revan might have laughed. As it was— “It doesn't matter. How could Polla be so stupid?” She glared at Seiran. “Why the frack didn't you stop her?”

“I tried,” he muttered. “If you're so concerned, why was everyone you know so convinced you wouldn't help us?”

“I don't know.” Did he say Aemelie? Aemelie Ordo? “Wait. Did you come here with Therion D’Cainen? With the Mandalorians?” Anger sparked. “Did you come here to sell her story to the holos just like Therion was?”

“It was her story,” the man snapped. “She had a right.”

A right to strip me of my very existence? She met Dar’Revan's eyes, trying not to notice the glint of approval there, as if the woman had reached the same conclusions Revan couldn't help but know.
“If she'd gone public, I would have lost everything,” she said. “Or my father-in-law would have had her discredited and tanked. Maybe killed.”

“Dahdadada,” Polla’s son said. “Phbbt.”

“How are there two of you?” Seiran demanded. “You're… different than she is.” His warm brown eyes weren't warm now. They were narrowed and angry when they looked at Revan. “You knew me. She didn't.”

“I'm the one the Jedi mind wiped. They gave me Polla’s memories. She…”

“I was given Revan’s memories,” the Dar'Revan admitted. “The real Revan. Not your smuggler.” She switched to Rakatan again. “A palatable lie would be safer for him and the child. Can you make him forget?”

“Shut the frack up,” Revan said in Standard. “Does Tenebrae have Polla?”

Those same green eyes regarded her own. Dar'Revan raised an eyebrow. “You tell me. Marla Korr said Master Klee had Sheris in custody?”

“Yes.” Revan thought back. “Or… she said Klee had gone to meet someone who had Sheris in custody.”

“No one took me into custody. Someone did kidnap this Polla Organa. The conclusion seems obvious.”

So did the result. Her heart sank. “I’m sorry, Sei.”

“What?” He shook his head. Polla’s son wailed. “No. You don't get to do that. My wife’s not dead. She's smart. Pollie isn't dead. She can work this somehow. She’s not dead.”

“She's a null,” Dar’Revan said. “Even if Klee doesn't notice the change in her appearance, don't you think he might notice that she doesn't have the Force?” She paused. “She doesn't, correct?”

“Right.” Revan and Seiran said the word at the same time. He glanced at her, startled.

“They test for it,” Seiran added. “In Derran schools. I have a little, nothing much. Pollie didn't.”

“I wonder if the Jedi thought her blindness would suppress your ability, Fragment?” Dar’Revan looked like she was pondering a totally fracking useless tangent.

“If Seiran has it a little, he might be right. Knowing she's not dead.” Maybe it was Revan’s own wishful thinking. I never wanted you dead, Polla. I still don't.

“Or he wants to believe his wife is alive, so he has the hope to go on living for their son,” Dar’Revan said. “All sentients want to believe the best—especially about their families.”

“She's a real stack of laughs, your friend,” Seiran muttered to Revan.

“I guess it probably helps, being an asshole when you're conquering the galaxy,” she shot back.

Polla’s husband snorted. “That's something she'd say.”

“I… I know.” Revan met his eyes. “Do you really think… she's alive?”

“Mahahm-MAH,” the baby said. His puzzled stare was the echo of his father's.
“I think I’d… know, if she were dead.” Seiran Wen bit his lip. “She never knew; but that night she crashed the canyon wall—I don't know if you remember—”

Black rock rushing up at her, pain like lightning, the fall.

“I remember.”

“I found her.” His head dropped to stare at his son, hands cupping the boy’s small fists. “I just… somehow I just knew. When her swoop didn't come back, I knew.”

“It’s possible,” Dar’Revan broke in. “But she still could be anywhere on this planet.”

“No.” It was much worse. “Master Korr said they were going someplace else. On a ship. They could be anywhere in the galaxy.”

“She's one woman.” Dar’Revan’s expression didn't match the coldness in her voice. “You can't upend an entire galaxy for just one woman.”

Not the entire galaxy, just a piece of it. Revan stared at her other self. “Is it better doing it for some kind of fracking cause and then being fracking wrong?”

She'd hit a nerve, that was obvious when the woman’s face paled. “No.”

“We have to try.” She looked at Seiran. “We can get logs of outgoing ships. Circulate descriptions. Sith are messy. Maybe there are bodies… unusual activity.” Something occurred to her. “If they think she's me, they won't take any chances. She'd be in restraints, strong ones. Force disruptors don't grow on trees. There has to be a trail of some kind—we just need to find it.”

“We need someone capable of analyzing a large amount of data quite quickly then.” Dar’Revan folded her arms. Her eyes narrowed. “Can you think of any sentient capable of that kind of data extraction, Fragment?”

Something in her voice— “HK could do some of it—once I reassemble—”

“Reassemble?”

“He tried to stop me. From coming in here. I think I severed his main power converters. “And his torso.

Dar’Revan sighed. “Unfortunate, considering he's our son’s primary defender.”

“I'm our son's—” and Malak. But Revan remembered the conversation they'd had the night before. “I’ll fix him. Before we… before I go.”

“Go where?” Seiran scoffed. “You expect me to believe the two of you are going to scour the galaxy for my wife? What—one planet at a time?”

“Do you want to give me remote access to the Rakatan mainframe now, Fragment, or do you think we have time to stop on Kashyyyk?” Dar’Revan paused. “And I’ll fix HK. Your technical skills are fine for jerivacing a broken cycle; but my droid requires a more delicate touch.”

Kashyyyk. How does she know—?

And then Revan realized. I told her. That datapad. She read it.

“Carth has the remote. I think. He went with Mission on the Hawk. And you should… you should stay here. With Malachor.”

I can’t believe I’m trusting you with him. But I don’t have a choice, do I?

“And by Mission you mean the Kashyyyk computer you imbued somehow with Mission Vao’s personality.” Dar’Revan tapped her fingers on her belt. She was wearing a lightsaber now, Revan noted.

Who gave her that? Malak? The Jedi?

“Yes.”

“Well. Comm him. Get through. Immediately. We need that access.”

You're not in charge.

Except, Dar’Revan was right. They needed Mission.

“I’m coming,” Seiran interrupted. “Wherever you're going. You might need me to find her, and I might know if she—if she gets hurt or if she’s—if something happens.”

Something will happen. No matter how brave or clever Polla Organa was, there was no way she could fool the Sith Emperor. Frack, Polla didn't even know there was a Sith Emperor.

I’m sorry Polla. You poor, pathetic fool. What the frack were you thinking?

“What about your son?” The baby stared at Revan, one hand opening and closing, a tiny wave. She waved back, slowly. Had Malachor done things like that too? “You can't risk him. It's not safe.”

“We’ll find some nursemaid. A foster.” Dar’Revan’s voice was grim. “Nowhere near Malachor. No connections to Jedi. Maybe on one of the exurban orbitals.”

“I'm not leaving my son—” Seiran began.

“Have you seen what vacuum does to a child’s face?” Dar’Revan interrupted. “I have.”

“I trust her,” Seiran muttered, gesturing towards Revan. “Not you.”

Smart of you. “But she’s right.” She was. For once, it wasn't even galling to admit. “I don't want to leave my son either.” I just got him back. She took a deep breath. “But for your wife, I will.”

“You're doing all of this for Polla?” His voice was confused.

“I owe her—”

“No,” Dar’Revan interrupted. “We’re doing this to stop Tenebrae.” Her lips were set in a grim line. Her expression already seemed light years away. “But if we can save your wife, we will.”

No doubt Dar’Revan had some fantastic plan to stop the immortal, unkillable Sith Emperor.

If it was that easy, you would have done it before, Revan.

“You're not coming,” she repeated.

Green eyes glared into her own. “Oh, but I am, Fragment. You can't do this without me.”

Xxx
“You’re a mess.” His voice was different. Same register, but Upper Crust’s accent was gone, replaced by someone with flatter inflection.

Polla wasn't sure how long she’d been staring at the fracking ceiling hoping for a miracle, but she was pretty sure this new voice wasn’t it.

She lifted her chin, squinting her one good eye towards the light. The same exact face stared down at her. No red eyes now. Still ordinary.

“I’m going to tilt the crate down now.” His new voice was strangely gentle. “When I reach inside, the ysalamiri field will block my Force as well. I trust you realize what that means?”

That if I were really Revan Starfire I could kill you with some kind of ancient Jedi fighting trick?

What came out of Polla’s mouth was only an involuntary whimper.

“Precisely.” The man sighed. Her world tilted. The womprats grown on sticks slapped against her legs. A sickly wet feeling seeped into the cheap fabric of her robes.

“Hold still.” His hands reached under her arms, sliding her out. Polla tried to extend her legs, and found them locked by the restraints. “I don't suppose you can blame the blinds, for their overreaction; but I apologize for the indignity, Revan.”

How would Revan Starfire react? Polla gritted her teeth and tried to look above it all.

But then she heard the hitch of surprise in her captor’s breathing as her body came into the light.

Should have sprung for that skin dye. I’m scrapped already.

The metal piece snapped off her mouth, the visor from her eyes. She opened her mouth wide, gasping, breathing in and out, still struggling. Her arms felt half numb, locked behind her back.

“Oh, no.” His voice was sad. Shocked. “Who are you?”

“Mis… a… mistake,” Polla said. Her voice felt ragged, sour taste in her mouth. “I'm sorry. I don't know anything! I didn't hear anything! This is all… a mistake!”

“Did she send you? Did Revan do this?” The man moved her shoulders, reaching behind her. Suddenly, there was a loud click, and Polla’s hands spring free.

Then, they flopped uselessly, even as her mind willed them to move.

Would he be telling me to wiggle my fingers if he wanted me dead?

“Hold still while I free your legs.” He bent down, close enough for Polla to see the lightsaber dangling from his belt.

If my arms worked I could grab it and turn it on. How the frack do those things turn on?

She didn't see a switch.

“You must be a null,” her captor said. “No Force-user could be conscious. But why did she send you?”
“Nobody sent me! I'm... just an actress,” Polla lied. “I don't know anything! Those goons just grabbed me!”

Her captor frowned. “The Genoharadan are supposed to be incorruptible. You're suggesting that I believe they’d capture a poor copy of Revan Starfire instead of the original? As an error? No.” He shook his head slowly. “This must be by design. Hers? Maybe you're a blind. A test for me?”

“I don't care.” Her voice wavered. Sensation was returning to her floppy hands. She stank of piss. “Please. You've got to let me go!”

“There is nowhere to go, child.” The man sounded sad. “This ship’s destination is preprogrammed. Even if I wanted to free you, I lack the means.”

“You have a lightsaber,” she pointed out. “Cut a fracking hole in the bulkhead, like on the vids.”

“And then what?” He raised an eyebrow.

“We’d put on pressurized suits. We haven’t made the jump to hyperspace yet. We're in the lanes, set off distress beacons, something—”

And then she felt it, the ship’s shift: hyperspace. The engines were good ones, whisper-soft, but the coils ticked into that rhythm, steady as bedrock.

“No,” the man said. He sighed heavily. “This is an unforeseen complication.”

“Do you ever say anything not fracking obvious?” She wiped her nose with a floppy hand, concentrating hard to wiggle her fingers. One moved. A little.

The man sighed. “When I leave the ysalamiri’s null field, my master will return to this body. His mind overlooks many small details; but your imitation of Revan will not fool him. Not for long.”

“I could wear a mask.” Was this guy... helping? “Look, whatever this is, I just want out, okay? Please! I was just in the wrong place at the wrong time!”

“Yes, you were.” His voice was grim and distracted. “When you can stand, go wash yourself. The fresher is the second door to the right. No one should meet their fate... uncleanly.”

“We all make mistakes.” The man sighed. “Some of us are still trying to fix them.” He nodded slowly, and reached for her hand. “May I?”

“What are you going to do?”

“This.” His hand was large covering hers entirely, and his fingers moved, rubbing circulation back into her numb fingers. “My name is Master Dalos Klee. I’m a member of the Jedi Council.”

“And a secret Sith?” She pointed out. “You kind of seemed pretty evil, when your eyes went red and everything.”

“That... happens,” He smiled at her in a way that looked like it was supposed to be reassuring. “Unfortunately. But it will not happen again, as long as I’m near the ysalamiri.”

“They look like womprats,” she offered. “On sticks. Why are they on sticks?”
“They grow like that. When they’re younger, they’re mobile, but sessile period comes with maturity.”

“Oh.” This was surreal. Her fingers moved, and she pulled her hand away.

Without breaking her gaze, he took her other one. “How are your feet?” he asked.

“Better.” She could feel her toes.

“Give it a moment,” he said, “and then try and stand. Do you have a name?”

“Yes. My name is Seriina Starshine.” Polla didn’t have to fake the tears. Of relief? “I’m an actress.”
Chapter 44 / With the Beast Inside

Malak sensed them instantly. Their presence was as clear as the weight of his own steps, the tension in his own body--

_Not your body. Asshole._

The alley was one in a long row of backways and service entrances in the dimness of the industrial sublevels; stinking and dripping from the condensers; with holographic advertisements for its establishments flashing like grenades overhead. It was, in fact, an alley much like the one where he’d met Mekel Jin in the first place.

_I have what you asked for_, he thought back at them. _These jewels are worth more than either of your hides._

“I wouldn’t be so sure about that,” Mekel Jin sneered. “Flash types like us?” He was closer than Malak had thought, had moved quickly, slipping in and out of the shadows as if he was born to it. “Moms gave me a brochure for some outfit recruiting kids like us. Some kind of new training academy, she said. And the Mando'ade. They want a piece of me too.”

_Just get the credits._ Dustil’s voice in their mind. Flat and angry, almost bored. _No point in kissing his ass._

_Don’t make it so easy for me to make an ass joke._

_Don't make ass jokes when we’re facing down a fracking Sith--_

--_pansic. He's just a pantic._

Malak ignored the jape. He pulled out the box with his mother’s jewels. “As I said, these jewels are worth more than either of you.”

“Yeah. Right.” Mekel Jin stepped squarely in front of him, folding his arms. One side of the boy’s mouth pulled up in a sneer. “Thanks.” He shoved the box in the pocket of his outer robe. “We’ll be lucky to get a thousand in the Underground. They’re probably chipped.”

“Perhaps.” That hadn’t occurred to Malak, but of course they would be: encoded with tracers to protect against theft. “But you have always been resourceful. I'm sure you’ll find a way around that.”

“Yeah,” the boy muttered. “We're resourceful, all right.”

_Try it. Try it now._

_Wait. No. I want to ask him about Revan._

_What do you want to know? She's your fracking cousin, you can't still think she's hot--_

_Frack you. That's not what I think! Do you think she's going with Aemelie and them or is she staying--_

_Does it matter?_
Well she's fracking married to your dads. You tell me.

Frack him.

“Our business is concluded,” Malak interrupted their useless dialogue.

“Oh?” The other side of Mekel’s mouth turned up, and he advanced, voice pitching softer, blurring and losing its arch Coruscanti tones. “Two of us, and one of you. I like our odds.”

Malak had to laugh. “The two of you are no match for someone with my training.” His fingers flexed, and he watched with satisfaction as the Coruscanti boy stopped short, hand going involuntarily towards his throat.

The resultant pressure in his on windpipe was a small price to pay—or so he thought until, incredibly, Mekel Jin began to laugh, seemingly unaffected by the Force grip closing around his neck.

“Are you fracking kidding? Telos and I used to Force choke each other for fun.”

Not really fun, Mekk. Just when you were being a prick.

I bet I can still make him pass out before we do--

The boy’s hands closed in a fist, and suddenly, Malak heard the ugly sound of his own breath trapped and rattling in his lungs.

Stay calm, I need to stay calm.

He struggled for composure, remembering his own training. A Jedi could survive for some time in vacuum, without oxygen. All he had to do was slow his own heart, reduce the need to breathe--

Now. Do it now. He’s off guard, it makes him weak, we can. Do it now--

Hands closed hard on Malak’s arms, and Mekel Jin landed on top of him, knocking him back. Malak’s breath rushed out in a startled gasp and then--

Xxx

“That's better,” Jedi Master Whatsit Klee said, when Polla came out of the fresher wearing the only clothes she found in the cabinet: black robes that looked uncannily like something from one of the Revan vids. The Jedi smiled slightly, as if Polla had pleased him, which was just as creepy as everything else on this ship.

This blind ship. She’d taken a little detour on the way back to the main cabin: what controls existed there were all solid ceramicka and locked. Maybe you could take a hammer or something and smash them to get to the real navboards, but if you fried the system, then what the frack would you do then?

Drift until the scrubbers stopped working or you hit something big enough to take out the shields--

“The belt is all wrong.” The Jedi Sith guy cleared his throat. “You start wrapping the sash backwards, then it ties in the front.” He frowned. “There's a set of over robes as well. You should be wearing both sets, one over the other.”

“Can't you dress me after you kill me?” Polla snapped. Now, that's a cheerful thought. “
The man stopped the lecture, and coughed. He actually looked embarrassed. “We have time,” he said slowly. “Some small time. Do you want to waste it discussing unpleasantness?”

She'd hidden the knife Aemelie had given her what seemed like a million years ago in the sleeve of her robe. It wasn't weighted right to throw. Polla was pretty sure she could shoot a real person. Maybe throw a knife at them, if it was her or them, but stabbing was… messy.

And what if it didn't work?

Abasen. Seiran. I have to do something. “You're not going to let me go?” She didn’t have to force the tears. “Please?”

“If I could, I would.” Jedi Master frowned at her. “I can make both of our deaths painless, Seriina. Even without the Force.”

“Both?” She tried to scoff. “Don't kill yourself over me.”

“My master does not know my thoughts, but I would be questioned.” He shook his head. “Better if our ship is presumed lost in hyperspace. We will, at least, have bought the real Revan and her conspirators some time.”

Frack the real Revan. Her throat was dry. “What do you mean… lost?”

“I will sabotage the life support,” he murmured, as if that wasn't insane. “Temperatures will drop precipitously. It shouldn’t take long.”

Polla shivered. Every spacer’s worst nightmare. One long frozen scream. “Please.” She tried again. “I have a son.”

“Death is quite painless this way.” The fracking crazy Jedi actually smiled, like he was doing her a favor. “When our ship reaches its destination, our circumstance will appear accidental. Your surface resemblance to the real Revan may even be enough to trick the Emperor, at least for a time.”

“Did you do it yet?” Was it her imagination, or was the air getting colder already?

“It will be fast,” he said, not fracking answering. “I see no alternative.”

Polla took a step back, away from him. “Don't fracking come near me!” The handle of the knife bumped against her wrist.

The crazy guy smiled sadly. “My master would torture you, if he discovered this deceit. The Force can do terrible things to a mind. He will crawl inside your mind, infect your thoughts—”

“Frack you!” Polla repeated. “I'll take my chances, okay? This Sith master of yours can't be any worse than dying! Or you.” The knife hilt slid into her hand and she gestured with it, jabbing the blade towards him. “You want to kill yourself, go ahead. But leave me alone!”

Abasen. She should have been back by now. The heaviness in her breasts told her time had passed. Maybe even a day. He’ll be crying for me. What will Sei do if he won't take a bottle?

Jedi Asshole’s voice was detached. “I am sorry, Seriina. Put down your weapon.”

“Tell that to my son.” She wiped her eyes. “Tell my son you’re sorry, you fracking piece of banthashit.”
We have a little time,” he repeated, stepping forward. Something made a chittering noise, and she realized he'd stuck an one of those womp-rat ysalamiri in his belt. As some kind of weapon? She stared at it, confused. “Sit with me, Seriina. I don't know if you come from a world with any ceremony regarding the passage into death, but as Jedi we believe--”

“You're no Jedi!” she yelled. Her voice sounded dull and tiny in the small room. Was the air getting thinner already? “Jedi might fracking mind wipe someone, or steal their memories, but they don’t murder them in cold blood!”

“We Jedi do what must,” he argued. Actually arguing with her. “When I became Tenebrae’s host, I joined a cabal of like-minded others. We steer his path as best we can. Revan knew this. She was our ally, even if my own part in our effort was hidden from her eyes.”

How do you stab someone? Aim for the eyes or the balls, her shooting instructor had always said about blasters. Different sents had hearts in different places, but you needed to debilitate so they couldn't fight back. Would that work against Eosian Jedi? Frack, did Eosians even have balls? In the same place?

“Please. My son’s just a baby. I need to see him again.” The tears were real, desperation was real. How the frack did you kill someone?

If I fail he’ll kill me for sure. I can't. I can't fail. It's him or me.

“I am sorry,” the man said again. Like it mattered. He gestured again. “Would it bring you peace to speak of your son?”

Was the air getting thin? Polla felt dizzy, either from fear or something worse. “No. Is that his name?” she asked. “Tanny-brae? He’s your boss?”

“Tenebrae. Yes.” The creature on his belt chittered again.

“He possesses people. Makes their eyes glow.” Repeating facts didn't make them less terrifying. “He's scum. And so are you.”

“I oppose him “ the man repeated stubbornly. “There are more of us than he can imagine. Revan--the real Revan--was our leader.”

“You have a funny way of opposing sents. Kidnapping people and then killing them.”

“It is necessary.” Was it her imagination, or did he seem less certain?

“You can't do this,” she repeated. Weight was all wrong for throwing with the knife. Aim for the eyes? “You just said you’re fighting your boss, right? You’re good? He’s evil?”

“Child,” the man said gently. “If I had the Force, I could ease your fear.”

“But you won't?” She took a step closer, still waving the knife at him. He looked completely unconcerned. Would he just let her stab him in the eye? “You could use your magic Force to kill me too, but you won’t? And killing me is because you're good?”

And then what? Then what are you gonna do how is it going to be any better?

“If I drop the null field generated by the ysalamiri, my master will return.” Smiling, his face was as round as a moon. “No doubt he is very interested in speaking with Revan. You are a very poor imitation, and he is not kind to those he believes have tricked him. I am sure you can see why death with me is preferable to such a fate.”

“Oh? Yeah. Sure.” Fate.

Maybe she could kill the Jedi with the knife before he disarmed her, or did whatever Jedi did when people waved knives at them. They trained in close combat, didn't they? All Polla knew how to do was shoot.

She weighed the knife in her hand and stepped closer, almost arms length now.

“Child, give me the weapon.” Jedi Asshole sighed. “I know it is small comfort, but your sacrifice is necessary. Vital, even, for us winning the war. For the real Revan Starfire. We all do what we must.”

“Not the first Jedi to use a line like that with me,” she muttered. Not to Polla herself, but that line about sacrifice was on a few of the Revan vids. And they had, of course. Used Polla’s sacrifice before.

Glowy red-eyes hadn't done that. In fact, glowy red-eyes seemed pretty convinced she was Revan. “Frack them. And frack you!”

The Eosian was a half-meter away. Incredibly, he extended his hand, palm up, as if Polla would be dumb enough to put the knife in it. “Give me the weapon,” he repeated.

“No,” she snapped. It wasn’t a throwing knife, but she didn’t have to throw it very far now. Her aim was true.

Xxx

Pressure, hands squeezing his arms like a vise. Ground under his back, wet and cold. Someone had landed, warm and solid and reassuring on his chest. His breath heaved in and out, doubled.

Dustil opened his eyes and saw a stubbled chin, then Mekel’s black eyes staring back into his, close enough to make his own eyes cross. The force of the attack had knocked them both to the ground.

“We did it?” Talking felt funny in his own voice, like being almost alone in his own head. “We fricking did it.”

“Yeah,” Mekel whispered. He was smiling back. The weight of his body shifted a little, but he didn't move, didn't roll away. His hair brushed Dustil’s forehead, and his breath was warm. “We did.”

“We’re stronger than him.” An intoxicating thought. They both breathed in at the same time, and Mekel started to laugh.

“Now what?” Dustil whispered. This close, he could see that Mekel’s right eye had flecks of green in the dark. This close, he could feel both of them, breathing in unison. It felt strange, like parts of his body were just waking up again, mixed with the feeling through the bond of Mekel’s body too.

“Now we do whatever we want.” Mekk smiled crookedly. “Anything we want we can take.”

Take anything. The thought floated between them, greedy and excited as a fist.

What do you want? Mekel didn't move. His eyes were enormous. He licked his lips, suddenly nervous. Dustil could feel that too, feel it because he was suddenly nervous too--

Dustil cleared his throat. Such an awkward angle. The other boy was solid on top of him, but his face was too far away. Dustil lifted his head to get closer, reaching his hand up to the line of Mekk’s jaw.

Mekel’s eyes widened. He leaned down. His breath smelled like mint and musk, and something darker. Stubble scraped Dustil’s cheek. They kissed, and Mekk’s breath rushed out and Dustil opened his mouth, as the bond opened more.

Is this--

--Shut up.

Somehow, they rolled over, so that Dustil was the one on top, fumbling with their robes and the Force. He felt his own skin under Mekel’s fingers, and then it wasn’t thought that drove them; just a rapidly increasing need.

“I-I didn’t know that you--” Mekel’s voice stuttered, and Dustil silenced it with his mouth.

Shut up.

Did you always?

I don’t know. It didn't seem to matter. The bond flared between them. It was different than kissing Mission; because Dustil wasn't just Dustil—not now. He heard their breath, breathing harder now, in unison and then--

Fools! Mindless rutting in an alley? Malak’s disgust washed over them both like a bath of cold water.

Dustil rolled away, scrambling to his feet, a sudden, sickening nausea twisting his guts. Everything felt off somehow, as if Mekel’s body had become more familiar than his own, as if a part of him was still trying to be there, and not here.

Across from him, Mekel was standing now too, wiping his breath, robes open, chest exposed, his face pale and shocked. Get the frack out. Leave us alone!

Fools. Malak’s mental voice sounded tired now. You thought yourselves rid of me so easily?

“Just fracking leave!” Even as he spoke, Dustil realized it wasn't enough: Malak wasn't gone forever--somewhere in the back of both of their minds the Sith Lord was still there. His anger and fear pulsed like a third heartbeat, caught between their two.

“You okay, Telos?” Mekel looked wary. I hear him too. How can he still be fracking here?

“Yes, I just--” spots danced in front of his eyes. Dustil rubbed them. His knees felt boneless, wobbly. “Give me a sec.”

Frack off, Malak, frack off this is none of your fracking business--

“I've got you--” And then suddenly Mekel’s hands slid around his shoulders, under his arm. Dead weight in them suddenly sagging. Dustil tensed his muscles, holding the dead weight up--helping Mekel to hold the dead weight up--

“No.” Mekk’s voice. “You're not--” Get back. Get back in your own fracking body, before he--
Fools! Malak’s anger was an ion storm, beating against them. The world dissolved into spots, Dustil felt Mekel's body stumble, even as his own jerked, half out of his control--

“No!” His own mouth. His own voice. Mine. Mine. Get out get out get out!

Dustil sagged backwards, landing against a wall almost as greasy and rank as the floor. Malak retreated, like a tide, like a duelist, sizing up his opponent for weakness. Somehow Dustil could feel him still, circling uneasily, tugging through the bond.

“He's in it.” Mekk’s voice. Mekel had fallen to the ground somehow too, was getting up now, dusting himself off. His friend made a face, wiping his hands on his robes. “The bond. He's in it.”

Between us. Their eyes met. Both of them could feel him there, trapped like a perma-moth under ice. Malak’s rage was wordless now. And mixed with fear.

“That’s… kind of a buzz kill.” Dustil’s face felt hot.

“Yeah,” Mekel snorted.

“Can we use it? Him?” Mekel would know. He was the one who knew when to use sents. Ban. His mother. Dustil himself. “We can, right? It's power? He's powerful?”

“I don't know.” Mekel’s mouth thinned, and he shoved his hands in his pockets. Without even seeing, Dustil knew he was holding Bastila Shan’s old lightsaber, like a fracking stuffed toy, like it gave him a feeling of safety. “Let's get these jewels fenced first, okay? Can you walk?”

“Yeah.” He took a step towards Mekel, but Mekel took a step back.

“I think it’s… easier for him. The closer we are. It gets... blurred. Doesn’t it?”

It does. Dustil nodded. “Yeah. Okay. So we’ll fence the goods. You know somebody?” He knew Mekel did. He'd seen the plan in their thoughts, back when they’d had one brain between them. He took another step closer, and Mekel took another step back.

“Maybe... better if I go alone, Telos? You have a famous face.”

You're leaving? Again? Korriban Dustil would have just laughed, but they'd been through too much banthashit since.

I don't want to. Mekel frowned at him. No fracking knowing what trouble you'll get up to in your own.

Frack you, okay? I'm coming. Padawan robes had hoods. Dustil pulled his up over his hair, tilting his head down slightly. You're the one that picked that fight with the Echani sword dancer.

Not how I remember it. He wasn't gonna do anything real before you asked about the underwear--

My son. I need to see my son again. This can't be the last time--

Malak again, desperate now. Dustil’s ears rang, and for a second, everything blurred. Not the ship this time: instead, a room Dustil had never seen--something out of a nightmare. Naked bodies in tanks floating in something viscous and dark and red. When he looked down at his arms, they were armored, his breath hissed out strangely and something metal was shoved in his mouth--

Telos! Mekel’s voice. Power. Dragging him back. His mouth tasted copper, and somewhere, someone was screaming--
Alive. Those sents in the tanks. They're alive--

Then Dustil’s lungs heaved, his own breath rushing in, and he stumbled again, hands going to his throat.

Mekel was closer than he has been a moment ago, but suddenly, but when Dustil reached for him, he backed away.

This is all fracked. Mekel shook his head slowly, like he was trying to shake their voices out. “You were--for a second, it was him again.”

I know. I was-- Dustil didn't know where that was. Some fracked up place. His mouth still tasted like copper and he realized he'd bitten his tongue. “He try anything?”

“Not like you did.” Mekk raised one eyebrow. Dustil had practiced that for hours in the mirror and never mastered it. “He said he was going to stop us, something about his son….”

Poor kid. Not his fault who his parents are. That thought hung between them awkwardly for a second, until Dustil realized it had been his own. “Tough tarentatek-tits! The kid’s not our problem.”

“Yeah, he’s not.” But Mekk was frowning at him. “You sure you're okay?” You look like crap.

Thanks. Frack you too. Dustil wiped his mouth. “I'm fine. We’ll figure this out.”

Mekel nodded. “Okay. Just stay back. Follow me. We need to figure this out.”

“Smart.” Dustil’s throat felt dry. “Get some credits.” His head felt like it was stuffed with silick, but at least it felt like his head. His hands… he closed one into a fist and then opened it again. My hands. These are my hands. My hands. My head. My fracking body--

Fools! Fools! Malak’s furious and futile thought echoed in their skulls like a fading scream.

Dustil rubbed his temples. “Asshole,” he muttered.

Dustil wondered if he looked as embarrassed as he felt. “Okay.”

Mekel didn’t look back.

They’d cleared the alley, and were halfway down another of access halls before Dustil worked up the courage to speak again.

“What just happened, I was--I’m not sure what that was.”

“It was… okay.” Mekel finally slowed down, letting Dustil catch up, but edging sideways, hugging the tunnel wall with more than a meter between them. “If we can't get him out, we can fracking use him. Okay?”

“Okay.” Malak wasn't what I meant. He moved faster to keep up. “Are you… was that okay?” It had seemed--it had seemed to be okay.

“Yeah.” Mekel turned, looking at him. His face was flushed. “It was… more than okay. You were-
-I just don't want the audience.”

“I know.” He didn't have to say it, he could feel that Mekel knew, if Dustil wanted he could feel everything Mekel knew. It was different, being this open. “This is….” What is this? What are we?

Mekel snorted. “Two sents who are about to be rich. I hope.” You want to figure the rest out now? Here?

I don't--I don't know. “My father, I think he still has that conapt.” Even if he didn't know where the man himself actually was.

“You offering to put me up?” Mekk’s eyebrow raised. “Sounds better than D’Reev’s creepy Jedi pen, at least for tonight.” Then tomorrow we can figure out where Aemelie went with the rest of the Mandalorians. Now that you're back we can blow this fracked planet.

No! Malak’s voice. Was it weaker now? A part of Dustil's mind seemed to flex, like pushing the Sith Lord even farther away.

Go back to your room, Dustil thought at him. Go back to your room of creepy dead sents. Leave us the frack alone.

“Frack off,” Mekel added. He didn't have to say Malak’s name. It was obvious who he meant to them both. At least, Dustil thought, his friend’s hero worship of the Dark Lord of the Sith seemed to be over.

“You want to go with them.” Dustil said it out loud, even though they both knew what Mekel wanted. “You want to be one of the Mandalorians. You fricking serious?”

Belonging. It was a safe thought. A secure thought. But the Mandalorians--

“Yeah.” Mekel looked at him. His mouth twitched. There was a girl there too, somewhere in his head. Another one. “I do, Telos.”

“But…” Dustil struggled to explain. If it wasn't for them, my mother would be alive and none of this would have fricking happened.

“ Oh.” A part of Mekel pulled farther away too. He cleared his throat. “Yeah, guess you'd have a pretty sweet life now.” He turned all the way forward, stepping up his pace.

I'd have a flash career too. Uncle Kris had great plans for me on the bee and ee slide, and Moms always said I'd make a killing if I fricking applied myself--

“I didn't mean it like that.” How do you say things, when they're just known? And how that frack could Dustil talk about any of it when they still had Malak between them, seething, like a broken insulator. “But I can't leave. My father--”

“Where the frack is your father?”

The question Dustil didn't know. He tried to make a joke. “Maybe your father knows?”

Mekel didn't look back at him, but his stride lengthened, forcing Dustil into a jog to keep up. His limbs felt too tight and strange.

I don't have a father. Lamar was a sperm donor. That's all. That's it.

“He seemed to want to be more.”
“His problem.” Mekk’s voice was flat, but they both knew it was a lie. “Not mine.”

Xxx

It took a second before anything happened. A long second, long enough for Polla to stumble backwards and practically fall on her ass, while the bifurcated body of the womp-rat fell to the ground, along with the knife she’d thrown.

The Jedi’s eyes widened. “Child,” he repeated. “What have you d--”

And then his face went as blank as if he’d been hit with a reset switch.

And then, his eyes began to glow. Red as a bloody sun.

Xxx

“The job is really quite simple,” said Helena Shan. “Crowds are so restless these days. I just need an armed companion to accompany me on my excursions.”

“Of course.” The pay was half of what being a CorSec guard had paid, but when Cally Lee had walked off the job with the others, she’d walked from her pension too. It hadn’t seemed to matter then, back when they’d all decided to become space pirates, but now that she was back on seething Coruscant, credits had come back to being what mattered.

“Good.” Helena Shan nodded, smiling serenely. Then she turned back to the vid screen, as if Cally had already ceased to exist.

Xxx

“Ouch, Mom! This Rhodese itch just won't stop making my scales fall off!”

“Don’t worry, eggling. You’re in good hands now, with Bondo’s new and improved kolto formulation: the only kolto formulation officially licensed and approved by the Selkath Authority, and the scientists at I.E., Limited!”

“I.E. who?”

“I love you! Look! Just rub a little on your scales and that pain will just slide away. See?”

“Wow! I feel a lot better already!”

Xxx

Helena Shan, the mother of Bastila Shan, late of the Star Forge, sighed, very heavily.

“Ma'am?” Cally cleared her throat. “Are you okay?”

“Of course I am.” Helena turned her head away from the screen and frowned at her. “Quite well. I'm expecting a friend tonight. Do you have any experience as a server?”

“No.” Cally wasn't going to admit that she did. Signing on with a rig slinging caff and muffas to the morning corporates was how she'd gotten off Dantooine in the first place.

“Oh.” The woman frowned.

Xxx
(Both singing.) “When you’ve got a little cut, and it just won’t heal--you need Bondo: the newly improved and patented formula of kolto!”

“Bondo gets the lond-oh!”

“Bondo has been approved for sents of all persuasions, on all planets in the Republic, with the exceptions of Byss. Clinical trials in Bith and their subspecies are still underway, in accordance with the Advanced Pharmacological Act of 2012, local Bith calendar, and the--”

“We interrupt this broadcast with some breaking news. Now from our station. Jokka Rai!”

Xxx

“Jokka Rai sent me a bottle of wine as an apology after that debacle of an interview.” Helena Shan murmured.

“That was nice of him,” Cally offered.

Xxx

Jokka Rai: “Thank you. Citizens, I am standing in front of the Rialis compound, where unofficial news stories have leaked a rumor that we have a new First Lady!”

Anchorwoman Iyrass K’chk: “Leeshansintina Second is now First of Rialis? Isn't she a little young to invoke assassination protocol, Jokka?”

Jokka Rai: “I suppose so, Iyrass, but you know House Rialis. 'Fortune favors the bold,' is their family crest.”

Anchorwoman Iyrass: “I heard a rumor that the Third was ill, that Leeshansintina One sent for Revan Starfire herself to find a cure for the Jedi Plague that had fallen upon their house.”

Jokka Rai: “Did Revan Starfire assassinate the First of Racharn on behalf of House D’Reev?”

Anchorwoman Iyrass: “That brings me to the second part of our show, Jokka. The part where we address the rumors about Revan Starfire: woman or myth? And are there two of her?”

Xxx

“One was certainly enough for me,” Helena Shan sighed. “She killed my daughter.”

“Yes, Ma'am.”

Xxx

Anchorwoman Iyrass: “We all saw the footage of the former Selkath Ten prisoner, Sheris Darkstar. But until now, this woman’s origins have remained a mystery. Until now, when our sources have found a family who claims to have sent their red-headed daughter to the Jedi for training... and never heard from her again. Joining us from remote uplink from Hoth, is Semerra Loran, mother to Sheris.”

Semerra Loran: “Sherry, honey, if you hear this, I just want to hear your voice again; but if you want to come home our ice cave is always open--”
“But all this talk about me, and I don't know a thing about you, Cally.” Helena Shan fingered the triangular pendant hanging from a fine chain around her neck.”

“The agency forwarded my resume?” Of course, the part where she'd run off and tried to be a space pirate with the rest of the guard wasn't on that… nor was that strange day a week ago, when Cally had woken up from an unexpected afternoon nap to find a note, written in her own hand.

You are not alone.

Followed by coordinates, roughly corresponding to points 0,0,0 in known space. Telling her to return to Coruscant, the center of the galaxy.

Xxx

“Lord Revan,” Red glowy eyes said, inclining his head. That put those eyes in view of the knife at his feet and the dead ysamiri-whatever thing.

The red, glowing eyes looked back at her, and Polla made herself meet them head-on, her own slightly narrowed, trying to channel all of her fear and anger into an expression that just looked bored.

“So. We meet again,” she tried not to be afraid, which was impossible; but maybe the real Revan, trapped with a Force collar on a doomed ship with this nutjob would have been afraid too. “Your Jedi was boring me, so I decided to bring you back.”

“So it appears.” Those glowing eyes narrowed, looking her up and down, and for a second Polla was sure she was fracked; but the Tenebrae guy only raised an eyebrow. “I prefer you in black like this. Much better than your garish costume on Coruscant.”

“I prefer you back on your own planet. Planets?” Star systems? Galaxy? “Galaxy.” She pulled her lips back from her teeth, trying to calm the desperate beat of her heart. “Your own fracking galaxy. Why don't you go there?”

“We shall go there together,” he told her.

“Sure.” Polla shrugged. “But now’s a bad time. You know?” Was the air getting thin? Was it her imagination? Nervous sweat prickled under arms, the back of her robes. The robes were fracking heavy. How did Jedi stand it?

“You should have reviewed our contract,” he murmured. “But your consort and his Wookiee are bringing a copy to the Yavin moon. You will have time to familiarize yourself with your forgotten promises then.”

“Excuse me?” Polla regretted the politeness immediately. Fracking Revan wouldn't say excuse me. Excuse me, Mister Dark Lord Emperor? She turned around fast, so he couldn't see her expression, and started walking back towards the bridge and the (hopefully) still-sealed controls that hadn’t been sabotaged already to kill them both. “I need to check on something. Okay?”

“I know you,” the asshole murmured, which Polla tried to take as a good sign, even though the light footsteps behind her caused her legs to tremble and her heart to race.

“Sure you--of course you do.” Sound bored, like you don't give a frack, like in the Taris dueling ring--was that the real Revan or the actor?
She couldn’t remember. So much real footage… and then, so much banthashit.

Polla punched the doors open on the bridge. The viewscreen still displayed the same hyperspace swirl. The controls were still sealed, all lights on the life support bank a secure and soothing green. Thank the stars.

The Sith behind her chuckled. “You know, Revan, further delay in our union could easily be misconstrued as an act of war.”

“Oh? You want war?” She kept her voice cold and clipped, like the footage of the real Revan she’d seen, facing down the goons at the Tatooine docking station. “I don't think you want to mess with me, Teneb--Tenny-bro.”

“The ship’s destination is preprogrammed,” he murmured back. “Impossible to change it now.”

“I bet I could, if I could access those controls you sealed under ceramika,” she shot back, turning to face him.

“So bold.” His smile was different than the Jedi’s. More teeth. Something about it made her adrenaline spike, like he was a ronto and she was just lunch. “Even in the face of absurdity. I have missed our chats, Revan.”

Whatever, you insane, blind, schutta.

“So Yavin first? And then what?”

“We will take your consort’s vessel home.” His smile deepened, and Polla willed herself to keep staring into those damned, red eyes and not cry or scream. “If you like, I will arrange transport to Dromund Kaas for Malak and your son as well.”

Well, now I know you're not just crazy, Sithguy. You also live under a fracking rock and don't know that Darth fracking Malak was blown into space dust.

“Malak?” she repeated. “Sure. Whatever. But leave my son--” name of a bad planet, why the frack can't I remember-- “Leave Malachor alone. He's fine where he is.”

“If that is your wish.” His head inclined. “A shame I can't reach you in his body as well.”

Malak’s? My son’s? The frack? Reach… what?

“What a shame.” Polla made herself sound bored, as she walked away from him. All the way into the other room. Leaned down and picked up the knife right in front of crazy Sith asshole, because he didn't seem like he was going to try and stop her.

“I see Klee left your Force collar on. If you would like me to remove it, Revan, you must cease childish threats to my person. Klee has been a loyal mount. He deserves respect.”

Polla’s hand went to her neck. She'd forgotten it was there.

“What a shame.” Polla’s hand went to her neck. She'd forgotten it was there. What if he takes it off and then I still can't use the Force? “I want you to take it off more than anything,” she hazarded. “Because then I can fry your sorry ass.” She shoved the knife in her belt, where it immediately slipped, sliding awkwardly back onto the ground.

Oh, frack. Would Revan say ass?

From his expression, maybe not.

Polla leaned down and picked up the knife again. She settled for just holding it. It made her feel safer.

“Oh, ho,” he murmured. “The smuggler persona the Jedi have given you is rather uncouth.”

“Oh ho,” she echoed. “Are you going to remove the collar or what?”

“No. You’re frightened,” he marveled. “If that small blade gives you comfort in the dark, use it.”

She glared at him. “It’s a Mandalorian an’yarkh. It has sentimental value.” Or so Aemelie had whispered, when Polla had said good bye.

We should have just gone with them. Why didn’t we?

“I do thank you,” he murmured. “For bringing the Mandalorians back to our side. Near compensation for the destruction of the first Star Forge.”

The first Star Forge? Fracking crazy Sith and super… weapons factory… things!

“Whatever.” Polla tried to sound bored. “How long to Yavin?” There’s always ships docked there. I’m doing it. I’m fooling him. I can fool Suvam too. I can get through this. I can get home.

“Follow.” He turned and walked back, sliding open the doors in the direction of the crate she’d crawled out of, the ysalamori things scattered around it, and gave it all a wide berth. “I’ve stocked the galley with some of your favorites.”

“My smuggler persona is rather… uncouth,” she quoted him. “Like you said? You might find my tastes have changed.”

I’m not dead yet. I’m not dead yet. And you were wrong, Jedi-guy. He hasn’t noticed a thing.

“We will see,” the crazy Sith said. He turned and walked away, apparently unconcerned that Polla might do something like stab him in the back.

Xxx

With the Order in tatters, and, (if Master Kavar was to be believed), sedition within the heart of the Council itself, Azen Loanin found it quite difficult to find a healer of acceptable skill and discretion.

And while Padawan Loran’s background and association with the ghost of Malak D’Reev made her loyalties unreliable, there was no denying her skill.

Thus, it seemed fortunate, when the elevator he has been about to ascend opened its doors, revealing Revan Starfire and Padawan Loran both: making his job efficient, if still somewhat depressing.

The impending demise of a father, even a father-in-law, was not news to be received lightly.

“Sheris,” Azen said, deciding upon the familiar, if not the appropriate title of the lesser challenge first. “I need your consult upon a medical matter of some importance.”

“I’m afraid I must decline,” the former Sith said, over-enunciating her tones in a poor imitation of his own Coruscanti accent. “Revan and I are otherwise engaged.”

Azen had always hated to draw upon rank, as it made him all too conscious of his own youth and relative experience as a Jedi Master. And yet, when the circumstance required--
“I must insist,” he rebuked gently. “This matter concerns our host. Senator D’Reev.”

“Malachi?” Sheris said, a millisecond before Revan echoed the man’s familiar name herself.

Then Revan Starfire actually elbowed her companion.

Sheris shot her a glare before returning her own gaze to Loanin.

“What’s wrong?” Revan demanded.

“His droid summoned me last evening. My tests have confirmed that he has the plague.”

“Was he vaccinated?” Sheris asked.

“His droid told me he was not.”

The former Sith laughed, harsh and inexplicable, until Revan elbowed her sharply again.

“How bad is it?” Sheris said, slightly less mirthful, but still with an unsettling smile.

A relief, at least, to be able to use medical terms that could describe the Senator's state and chance of survival to someone with medical training… although Padawan Loran appeared puzzled at a few points in Azen’s narrative and failed to ask appropriate questions at another.

“I’ll see him,” she announced finally, interrupting Azen’s detailed assessment of the man’s failing renal function. “Has Malak seen him?”

“Malak has no medical training,” Azen reminded her.

Padawan Loran’s head turned. “So does our host. Malachi.”

Their identical glares locked and there was a long, inefficient pause.

To Loanin’s surprise, it was Revan who broke away first, muttering something under her breath. It took him a moment to identify the origin, and another to translate the syntax, and even then, the words raised more questions than they answered.

Why, for all the stars, was Revan Starfire reminding Sheris Loran of a promise to 'take care of the body'?

[“It's simple, Particle. All disposal units in this building are extremely efficient. You have a lightsaber. Cutting shouldn't be a problem.”] Sheris responded in the same tongue.

Azen had only heard spoken Ratakan on a few of Atris’s holorecorded lectures speculating on the Builder's origins. At the time it had seemed a stilted, guttural language. But the way both women spoke it made it sound cadenced and even; imbued with a certain grim melody.

[“And what are you going to do?”]

[“Heal the man, as I was asked.”]

[“We don't have time for this.”] Revan glanced at Azen, and then back to Sheris. [But you can't let Malachi die. You know that?]
“Of course. Get rid of the body. Our path will be more expedient if the Jedi don’t detain you for murder—and our son doesn’t inherit a Senate seat tomorrow.”

It was at this moment that Azen decided not to reveal that he had made a study of the Rakatan language as a theoretical exercise, to help combat his perpetual insomnia.

“Is there a problem?” he hedged in Standard.

“Not at all,” Sheris assured him, switching back to the vernacular. “We were discussing matters of a personal feminine nature. I’m so sorry, it was rude of us. I believe you are acquainted with the Padawan Lydie Korr?”

Lydie’s eyes were wide and blue and impossibly thick-lashed. Azen had read that horns on a Zabrak were quite sensitive. One of their nine erogenous areas.

“I am,” Azen told her. Was she attempting to deflect attention from their conversation? Or—his single human heart seemed to skip a beat, although of course such an emotive response was hardly literal—or, was it Lydie Korr’s murder they were discussing with such cavalier insouciance? “Where—where is she?”

Revan frowned, looking between him and Sheris. [“Do you think she sensed the death?”] Revan asked, still in Rakatan. [“Master Korr was her aunt.”]

[“Since no alarm has been raised, we can only hope not.”] Sheris said, back, in the tongue of the Builders. [“Deal with it quickly, and then meet me in our quarters.”]

[“Our quarters?”] Revan Starfire raised an eyebrow, as if she had an objection, but then nodded.

Sheris turned back towards Azen. “When I saw Lydie Korr this morning, she was discussing your proposal to her with Padawan Thalia May.”

“Had she reached a decision?” He knew she was trying to distract, unsettle him; but he still needed to know.

“I believe she plans upon accepting.” A smug smile played on the woman’s mouth.

Revan made an exasperated noise under her breath, interrupting them in Rakatan. [“I’ll see if I can start tracers from that bar—”]

[“It makes no difference what you begin.”] Sheris responded in the same tongue. [I know their final destination.]”

[“You do? Then we need a ship now. We need to go there.”] Revan paused. [“Where is it?”]

Azen took a step backwards. The prospect of Revan leaving Coruscant unescorted by any councilmembers was disturbing, to say the least. But what could he say to dissuade without revealing himself? Nothing at all.

At least Lydie Korr planned on accepting his suit.

[“A place your smuggler’s maps have never found, Particle.”]

Azen wasn’t sure, but the word, ‘particle,’ more closely was defined as a piece distinct from the whole. Not just particulate matter. For a race of engineers, it did seem like some great distinction.

Revan turned back towards Azen, eyes narrowing. “I’m sorry,” she dissembled, quite badly. “We must seem very rude.”

“The Senator is very ill,” he interrupted them. In Basic, of course. “I need your assistance now, Padawan Loran.”

“Don't let him die,” Revan ordered her duplicate. “Get him stable, and then come to me.”

Sheris Loran nodded. “Yes,” she told both of them. “I know exactly what to do.”

Xxx

“Yavin Station is hailing us. Broadcasting in Ancient Sith. Gee. Think it's a trap?” Mission made her words drip with Revan’s best sarcasm.

“Don't do that,” Carth mumbled, slumped in the captain’s chair like a wet blanket. He rubbed his head, as if it hurt. Poor guy was a wreck. “Don't talk in her voice.”

“Those are Imperial codes.” Takan leaned over the secondary comm station that Mission had managed to link to the wide beam receptors. It didn't cover half as much distance as the main comm, but it gave them something. She was still trying to patch into the main station at Kashyyyk, even if Kashyyyk was totally lame. “That's His signature--”

“Proceed to those coordinates immediately!”

Uh-oh. If Mission had hands she'd be wringing them with dismay. Now Carth’s eyes were all red and glowing, and he was talking with that asshole’s words again.

“Say please,” she snapped. “You might the boss of all the Sith, but here you're just another creepazoid chuba-faced loser not even brave enough to bring his own body--”

“Mission!” Big Z barked. “You are not helping.”

Helping. She had been programmed to be helpful. The real Mission Vao had even liked to be helpful. If Mission had a mouth, she would have closed it.

“Proceeding to specified coordinates and docking,” she growled in Shyriiwook. “As specified.”

The red faded from Carth’s eyes, and he slumped forward.

“Wake up, flyboy,” she chirped. Trying to sound like Mission and not Revan, so he didn’t have a heart attack.

“Oh, no,” he muttered. “Did it happen again?”

“Flawed,” intoned the other kid, the nice one. Zepth. Red eyes now there too. And Takan’s. Hey, at least it was easy to tell when it was the asshole and not them. “I cannot sustain the connection.”

“I will return to the Children,” Voice murmured. “After I attend to some of your master’s other concerns.”

Trap, a part of Mission whispered to the other. The younger part, the part that was mostly Mission Vao, trained to expect traps and betrayals since childhood agreed with the older part, the part who had set them for millennia.

It’s always a trap. But if you think you can control Polla-Revan, chuba-faced asshole Emperor guy, you're in for a world of poo doo agony.
“Oh.” There should be more emotion to be expressed when the door opened and a Jedi Master, a member of the Jedi High Council, found you standing there in shock, staring at the remains of your aunt.

But all Lydie Korr could manage at first was that one word.

“I did too.” A shockwave of fear. It hadn't felt like Aunt Marla at all. Honestly, Lydie Korr had opened the door and expected to find Revan Starfire. That was one reason it had taken her what felt like an hour to work up her courage to look in the first place.

Should she feel sad that her aunt was dead?

XXX

Dear Ma, your sister Marla was killed today. I think by Darth Revan. I was afraid to look, but I finally did. We’re going to burn the body. That's what Jedi do with their dead. I assume Zabrak may have some other custom, but I’ve never studied their culture. My new boyfriend might know. He seems to know everything about everything.

I'm going with him because I hope he can teach me.

XXX

“Do you know who did this?” Lydie asked carefully, because she could be wrong, and you didn't just accuse the most powerful Jedi on the planet of murder, especially if you weren't even sure she was still a Jedi and not a Sith all along, and you yourself were still recovering from a Sith attack--

“I suspect, I do know.” Master Kavar must have had the same lessons in oblique statements. “But I see no proof here--”

“There's a security cam,” Lydie pointed it out.

Master Kavar lifted his hand and twisted his fingers. The security cam crumpled in on itself, falling to the ground.

“Was a security cam,” Lydie corrected. “You know it probably fed the link to the central hub, not just in this room?”

The Jedi coughed, eyeing her appraisingly. “You’re correct, Padawan. I hadn’t thought of that.”

Apparently, Master Kavar must be a Sith too. Lydie wondered if she should protest, or pretend to be one herself. “It's never a good idea to leave witnesses,” she offered slowly, taking a step back towards the door. Could she freeze him if she had to? The Force hadn't felt the same inside since the Sith Davad Arkan had tried to drain it all away.

Master Kavar frowned. “I sense your fear. I suppose this looks amiss.”

“I'm sure you have reasons for destroying evidence,” she offered.

He raised an eyebrow. “I destroyed the cam in hope of preserving Master Korr’s reputation, not to exonerate her murderer. Our numbers are divided enough, without rumors of Sith involvement; and I believe that Master Korr’s betrayal was not her fault.”
“Sith involvement? You think a Sith killed--” But no, that wasn't what he had said at all. “You think my Aunt Marla was a Sith? What makes you think that?”

The word of another Sith.” He sighed. “One less loyal to their master than she was. Master Klee took me into his confidence shortly before his departure. It was his hope that I could find some means to conceal that Revan Starfire was missing from Coruscant without causing panic.”

“Master Klee was working for Revan?”

“No.” He shook his head, frowning as if Lydie was the one with the irrational facts. “For the Sith Emperor. Against his will.”

“And so is Revan?”

“According to Master Klee, Revan is all that stands between us and the Emperor. He was very adamant that the Jedi needed to assist her in any way possible.”

“With what?”

“He was less clear.” When Master Kavar smiled, it made him look younger, but Lydie still didn't see the appeal. He signed. “I would have stopped him, had I realized he was taking the wrong woman to his master, the Sith Emperor Tenebrae.”

“So it wasn't Revan Starfire that he was taking to his master? His master who is the Sith Emperor?” Sometimes, when revelations were enormous, all you could do was focus on the finite pieces, repeating phrases like a stuck holo. “You said the Emperor thought he was taking Revan Starfire? He was wrong?” It seemed ghoulish to stand here discussing semantics in front of her aunt's corpse, but Lydie wasn't sure where else they should go.

“I believe he kidnapped Sheris Loran. Revan must have sent Sheris to him last night in her stead.” He sighed. “Although how she expects Sheris to fool Tenebrae for long--”

“Oh.” Poor Sheris. She had seemed almost nice, that morning, head buried in a datapad in a way Lydie envied, now that she herself never found the time. “They assigned her a bunk next to ours. Me and Thalia. I saw her there this morning.”

He frowned at her, and Lydie wondered what she had said. “I'm sorry about Aunt Marla too,” she added hastily.

Kavar blinked at her. It took Lydie another moment, and then a hot blush burned her cheeks, making her horn nubs almost itch with the shame of her own oversight. “You said he kidnapped Sheris last night?” She frowned shaking her head slowly. “It wasn't Revan I saw this morning. It was definitely Sheris. They don't look that much alike.”

“Impossible. Revan was in a council meeting with us.” He nodded at her aunt’s body on the floor. “Presumably, that is when Marla realized her master had been tricked.”

“Did Revan kill her?” Remembering that shock in the Force made Lydie shiver. Like ice.

When Master Kavar looked confused, Lydie could see why the others had thought he was attractive, although really, he was much too pale. Not that Azen wasn't pale too, but he knew so much—and some of it he would teach her. “Klee pulled me aside yesterday before the meeting to tell me his master had commanded he take Revan to Yavin Station.” His lips pulled grimly. “He said agents of Tenebrae already had her in custody. He asked for our aid.”
“I saw Sheris Loran this morning. Her bunk is next to ours. Me and Thalia’s.” Lydie felt herself flush. “Not… me and Thalia’s bunk, I mean our bunks. We have two. Sheris has one. It's right next to ours.”

“How long ago?”

“A few hours. I think.”

For some reason Master Kavar looked flummoxed that a Sith had lied to him about something. But Master Klee lying was the most logical explanation.

“Sheris didn’t look captured,” Lydie added. “She looked fine. She was reading.”

Lydie had wondered what sorts of things former Sith read, but whatever it was Sheris had taken with her.

“Why would Klee lie?”

“Why would you just let a Sith spy kidnap a Jedi, especially of you thought it was Revan?” Lydie thought that was the rather more pertinent question.

“Klee and I have collaborated before. He was working with Revan’s allies. I thought he was taking her and I thought Revan--”

“Yes?” The door slid open. From the expression on the former Sith Lord’s face, Lydie wondered how long she had been listening. “You thought Revan… what?”

“I thought you capable of taking care of yourself.” Kavar murmured. He gestured towards the floor. “As you did here.”

“You just said… Klee… was going to Yavin?” Revan Starfire really didn’t look that much like Sheris Loran. Her hair was much shorter. Now, she laughed sharply. “Frack.”

“Klee thought he had you in custody,” Kavar said. “But if not you, and not Sheris--”

“Why do you think I know?” She stalked towards them both, and Lydie willed her feet not to take a step backwards. “Are you both like her? More of Tenebrae’s spies?”

“No.” Kavar shook his head. “Whether you believe me or not, Revan, there are some of us within the Order who support your efforts. Myself. Zez Kai El.Lorna Vash--”

“My efforts.” The former Dark Lord shook her head sharply. “My efforts at what? You think I know anything about this mess?”

“I know that you are the key to stopping Tenebrae. Klee said as much, and our own intelligence confirms it.”

“Your own… intelligence?” The former Dark Lord snorted. “You’ve been spying on me?”

“I think he means they have spies on Sith worlds,” Lydie interrupted. “My Aunt Marla was one.”

“Your Aunt--” Revan Starfire looked down at the ground and the body and then back at Lydie. “I'm sorry,” she mumbled. “I'm sorry I killed your aunt.”

“She was Sith,” Lydie offered in return. “Probably.”
Dear Ma, Did you know Aunt Marla was a Sith spy in addition to being a Jedi? I guess probably not, because it's not the sort of thing that she'd be allowed to tell you; but I thought you should know. She was always kind to me.

“Probably.” Revan muttered. She took a step backwards. “I… I have to go.”

“I attacked you before when I thought you were the Force user responsible for all of the death in the Temple,” Kavar said. “You were the one who let Davad Arkan go.”

“I couldn't stop him.”

“No. Leave stopping Arkan to us. But you must stop the Emperor.”

“If you tell me that's my fracking destiny, I might cut off your head too,” Revan said. But her lips quirked, as if that was actually a joke.

“I will say you are not alone.” His head dipped, a gesture that was almost a bow. “I misjudged you and Malak long ago. I misjudged you when we met again in the Jedi Temple. I will not do so a third time.”

“I know I'm not alone.” Her green eyes looked like chips of ice. “But I don't trust you.” She frowned slightly at Lydie. “Either of you.”

“I’m sorry,” Lydie apologized, because she wasn’t sure what else to say. “It must be hard not to trust people.”

“I was going to… get rid of… her.” Revan pointed at the remains of Marla Korr. “But now… I have… I have to go.”

“We will honor the good in her, and mourn her betrayal,” Master Kavar nodded. “You should… go. I'm sure there are other things that require your attention.”

Revan frowned, which Lydie understood, because it sounded strange to her too, just letting a former, and very powerful, Sith go. “Thanks,” she muttered oddly, and then she turned and ran.

The moment the door slid shut, Master Kavar sagged back against the wall. Lydie opened her mouth to ask a question, but the Jedi Master raised his hand, as if begging her silence.

After several moments, he sighed heavily. “Revan Starfire terrifies me,” he confessed. “I suppose you might find it disturbing to know a Jedi Master has feet of dirt too.”

“Fear is an understandable reaction,” Lydie offered. “But I don't know why you just let her go. How does that help her? What is she going to do?”

Master Kavar sighed heavily. “What do you think the answer to that question is?”

“I'm not even a Jedi Knight.” She wouldn't look at her dead aunt. “Master Korr did not keep me in her confidence.”

“Nor did she keep me.” His expression was grim. “But the Sith Emperor wants Revan Starfire.”

“And we Jedi just give the Sith Emperor what he wants?”
Some of Azen’s arguments for leaving the Order began to make sense.

XXX

Dear Ma, I’ve left the Jedi Order and married a Coruscanti Senator’s son because all the Jedi are insane or dead and Aunt Marla was a Sith spy--

XXX

“Tenebrae’s agents have been with us for a very long time. Now, finally, the Order’s corruption has been excised.” Master Kavar grimaced. “At great cost, but excised.”

Does he think Revan is part of the corruption? At least she was sorry Aunt Marla was dead.

“What about all the Padawans?” Padawan Lydie Korr asked. “And the apprentices? What’s going to happen to them?”

“Most are in hiding.” His eyes were sad. “The Sith cannot fight those they cannot find.”

Lydie wondered. “How can we serve the Republic in hiding?”

“Carefully.” He smiled sadly. “You should… go, child. I will take care of things here.”

And by things, you mean my aunt’s body.

“I don’t know what the funeral rites are,” she told him. “I was too young.”

“All dead are equal in the Force,” he murmured.

The words had the tone of a ritual. Even if, Lydie thought, they weren’t actually true.

XXX

“Excuse me,” said Polla Organa to the Sith Emperor Tenny-bro or whatever, who was sitting across from her at the small, circular table. “Would you pass me the frites?”

They were actually good, which surprised her. A nutra-flash meal, sure; but with richer ingredients than Polla had ever seen all in one place before.

Being a smuggler, she knew that the belugar roe was worth over five thousand credits for quarter milli, but she’d never seen it sculpted over ice like frosting in the shape of a flower.

“Oh, course,” he inclined his head. “More wine?”

The wine was too sweet. One glass had given her a headache. I need my fracking brain.

“No, she demurred. “But I need to use the fresher. Please excuse me.”

Please excuse--oh, frack. I keep doing that.

“So respectful.” The Sith pulled his face in what might have been a kindly smile, except for the red, glowing eyes. “Should I fear a plot against me?”

Polla remembered her Sixday morning cartoons. “You’re Sith,” she said. “Isn’t that par for the course?”

XXX
The door to Malachi’s chamber slid open. The smell of sickness, death was immediate, assaulting her senses like a quiet scream.

Revan had to trust in the Fragment. Trust in the Fragment to delay the Jedi finding out the truth about what had happened to Marla Korr, agent of Tenebrae. Although, from what Revan had seen, the woman didn't have a great deal of experience in covering up murder.

Another thing I'll have to teach.

Before she even approached the frail lump under the fur coverlet, Revan knew the worst.

“You should have summoned me sooner,” Revan told Master Loanin, who just kept blinking stupidly at her.

“His droid only summoned me this morning.” The man’s voice was barely into manhood. High and thin, with that whine of upper crust Coruscanti.

“You are Senate-raised?” She should have checked the surviving Jedi more carefully. She had missed Marla Korr being Tenebrae’s pawn, and she'd missed this man too. “Loanin, that’s…?”

“Unimportant, in rank and in this specific moment,” he chided. “I didn't realize you had made a study of Coruscanti custom, Sheris.”

“I am engaged to Malak D’Reev.” She frowned, remembering too late that she'd told the Jedi they had dissolved their arrangement when she moved quarters. “Or rather, I was.”

“Our patient,” he gestured at the bed.

“Malachi.” Revan approached, cautiously, aware of the HK unit’s red eyes watching.

“You.” His eyes were clouded and dull, hawk-nose jutting out from a gray and sunken face. Those gray eyes, so like her son’s focused, and his hand trembled when it lifted, reaching for her. “Ilyana. I'm so sorry.”

“Delusional,” Master Loanin supplied from behind them. “He thought I was Malak for several hours this morning. Now, he appears to believe that you are his dead wife.”

“Did he say anything notable to you when he thought you were Malak?” Revan kept her voice mild and curious, turning her head towards the Jedi.

“He expressed a great deal of regret.” The man’s level brows narrowed as he studied her. “If you could return to the matter at hand, I think a healing trance might serve to stabilize his condition.”

“So would a stasis chamber, or a respiration unit,” she pointed out. It was only a matter of time. They could buy him days--perhaps even a month; but the end was there, locked in those cells with the pre-programmed plague her computer had designed.

“He refused both.”

“What?” That was surprising. Malachi hung on to life like mynock. “He's delirious now. You can’t find him cognizant enough to refuse treatment--”

“Revan.” The old man whispered her name, and her head turned back, automatically, before she could will it not.

“Is he?” Master Loanin gestured towards them. “Delirious?”
“Obviously.” Her imitation of Sheris’s giggle seemed forced and inappropriate and she regretted it instantly. “I’m not Revan.”

“In his confusion, it might be kinder if you pretended to be.”

“Revan,” those bony fingers closed on her arm, pulling her closer with a firm grip. “My son. Let him… let him go. Him and his whore. I promised--”

“I’m here, Malachi.” She took a deep breath, trying to lose the vestigial offense that must be from Sheris, being called Malak’s whore.

“HK… already… dissolved… contract.”

That could mean any number of contracts. She would have to use her emergency override into the man’s systems to realize which. The timing of this was excruciating. She had been counting on the old man to keep Malachor safe in their absence--possibly at least one of their permanent absences--since if Tenebrae had taken the woman he thought was Revan, that must mean all the delaying tactics she and the Dark Council had forged were already exhausted--

Or they betrayed me to him. Would it be such a surprise?

“Where is Malak?” Revan tried to sound like she didn't care, even if perhaps Sheris could--and a part of her did.

“Statement: The young Master has left the building. Security cams recorded his departure from his personal balcony window several hours ago.”

“He jumped?” Loanin sounded confused.

“Clarification: No. The young Master used the Force and a rappelling device to slow his descent. One of our cameras noted the footage. My instructions were to let him depart without incident.”

“If he dies, we need Malak.” Revan told Loanin. “Revan Starfire may be the official Second, but she has no training, no real understanding of Coruscanti politics. You… you must know that.”

“It’s curious that you do.” The Jedi’s eyes narrowed. “I didn’t know you were so concerned with politics.”

“The Senator’s protection keeps the Jedi al safe. Where would we goof he dies?” Poor argument. Revan could think of a dozen more effective refuges than the target reticule this building would become if Malachi died.

And the Fragment won't understand any of it. She'll charge off to save the smuggler, even if it puts Malachor at risk--

Would it?

“Malachor should be home from school soon. Fetch him. He needs to see his grandfather.”

Loanin blinked at her slowly. “I requested the servants to bring him here already.”

Where. Where would Mal be safe? If the Fragment was right about Malachi’s death triggering a hunt by the Genoharadan--
“Keep them… safe for me. Revan. You were always… the strength. Malak… weak. Without… you.”

No. Fool. Your son was my strength. My heart. Old bitterness, old hatred was inefficient. So were the sudden tears in her eyes, painfully obviously under the Jedi and the droid’s implacable stares

“I promise, Malachi.” She squeezed his hands in hers, staring down at the man who had led them to ruin, led them to their doom. She raised her voice. “If you let me concentrate, Master Loanin, I may be able to increase his lucidity, before the end--record any last instructions… he may have some… knowledge he needs to impart.”

“Statement: the Master has given his last instructions to me. At the time of his demise, I am instructed to recite them to you, Revan; with addendums for Malak D’Reev and Malachor D’Reev.”

“His droid seems confused regarding your identity as well,” Loanin murmured.

She looked up at him, raising an eyebrow. The master was hardly more than a child. She didn't even remember him from before the wars. “And you?”

Master Loanin blinked slowly. “My curiosity only extends to the holocron recording containing Knight Starfire’s memories. I see a certain... danger in creating an infinite number of sentients imbued with Revan Starfire’s life history.”

“I destroyed the holocron.”

“Ah.” His head tilted. “I believe you. It would be a logical response.”

“Instinctual,” she admitted, assessing him. “I was disoriented.”

“I can imagine. Did Sheris provide written instructions, or was someone else involved in your… processing?”

“I have no way of knowing,” she hedged. “There was a period of confusion.”

“Ilyana,” Malachi whispered again. “I never asked. Did you know?”

“He killed Malak’s mother,” Revan told the Jedi. “I believe this is a deathbed confession.”

The HK whirred. “Objection: I have heard this story many times. The Second D’Reev took her own life.”

Startling, but it changed nothing. “Malak never knew that.” Useless point, but her voice said it anyway.

“Suicide is common in the Senate Houses,” Loanin commented mildly. “Not every sentient can flourish in an atmosphere of paranoia and stress. Several families have even genetically engineered reduced cortisol and serotonin levels in their offspring to produce a dulled response to fear--”

“Ilyana wasn’t… no.” Malachi’s grip tightened on Revan’s. “She… she thought she was, but she… she was happy. She just… forgot. Sleepwalking. Blackouts.”

“Blackouts?” Revan frowned.

“Her eyes…” his voice trailed off, and his head jerked away. “No. Ilyana! No!”
Tears stippled his gray cheeks. “She was a traitor. But I expected her to live. I wanted her to live.”

Xxx

Malak’s hand shook her awake. Awake enough to see him looming over her, features lit ghostly and blue by the lit saber in his grasp.

Blue… with red eyes, glowing like tiny suns.

“You’re very small.” Dark chuckle. “Small and female. I suppose that’s appropriate, for our continuation.”

“Malak!” Her hands shot out and his body hurtled across the room, slamming into the bulkhead of their shuttle, before her mind could process.

“No.” Her husband’s body righted itself, rising almost boneless, as if propelled by the Force more than his own skin. His face was so pale, that for a moment, Revan thought he was dead. “Merely a visitor in his skin—”

“The Sith from the tomb.” Ajunta Pall? “Leave him alone. Get out!”

“In time.” Malak’s body folded his arms. “You and I will have all the time in the galaxy, Revan.”

Xxx

“Sleepwalking,” she repeated. She held Malachi down, with her hand and the Force.

“She thought she was losing her mind. Safer for us. She did it for us. Made me promise… Jedi. She thought training could help our son. In case he—she thought it was the Force.”

“She was from Dathomir.” That damned planet. Of course. Revan should have known before.

“Malak—” No. No. “You mean… you sent Carth Onasi to Dathomir?”

“You… knew.” He coughed. “HK read the note. I saw it.”

“Master Klee recommended you send Carb Onasi to Dathomir.” The Fragment had said they were working together. Marla Korr and Klee, agents of Tenebrae in the heart of the Jedi Council itself. “You were a fool, Malachi.” She felt her lips twist, laughter bubbling in her gut. “All this time, you thought you were in charge—but it was Tenebrae all along.”

“I… I don’t—”

“I brought you here to stabilize his condition, not hasten the demise,” Loanin interrupted.

“Of course.” Her hands hovered over the old man’s torso, breathing deeply, trying to breathe through the bile and confusion and fear she sensed. Radiating from Sheris’s weak mind, from the near-corpse of the man before her—and from the young Jedi behind.

If the Fragment knows her husband is in danger, who will she save? If Malachi dies now, Malachor will never survive. Once the Emperor discovers his mistake, he’ll return for me. Or her. Or her.
All of that power. I can’t let him have her.

Points of light, grids on a map, logical conclusions.

“Master Vrook was suspicious of Klee as well,” Loanin continued. “I myself wondered when Master Klee continued wearing the environmental suit.”

He couldn’t afford to contract the plague. Most did not, once the Emperor had his claws in their minds. But a few had, a few had even come back. If only Malak had--

I sent him into the labs hoping. Hoping he’d see. Hoping he’d contract the plague. Hoping it would save him--drive that sithspawn out of him--

Malachi’s breathing steadied under her hands, evened. Soothing calm washing over Revan, as if it was coming from the Force itself. She felt herself breathe easier.

Peace.

“I should take my leave,” Master Loanin said from somewhere behind them. “I must… what you said before. About Padwan Korr. Was that a mere distraction, or was it true?”

“What?” Oh. She could have laughed. “The Sith have infiltrated the heart of your Order and you’re wondering about a girl?”

“The girl I can save,” he said. “The Order is all of us. We do what we can. We serve.”

“All of you,” she scoffed. “Kae and Davad killed most of you already.”

“The girl I can save,” he repeated. “We all save who we can. Don’t we?”

“Do they all know? About me?” Had they been fooling her all along? Watching and waiting for a misstep.? Even now. Did these pathetic Jedi fools think Revan Starfire needed their redemption?

“I don’t know.” His voice was farther away now. Perhaps by the door. “The other masters don’t always include me in their council.” He paused. “Nor I them.”

“But you trust me to do the right thing.” She could have laughed.

“No. I have no way of stopping you without potentially causing greater harm. We Jedi agreed to restore your memories. They may reside in two bodies and not one, but they are restored. Regrettable for Sheris Loran; but by nature of the action, I cannot hold you personally at fault for her demise.”

“It was Kae. Part of her failed plan, that my amnesiac self aborted.” She found herself admitting it.

Am I still part of your plan, my old master? Disconcerting, but possible.

Kae opposes Tenebrae too. I know that. That, at least, has to be true.

“Our amnesiac self saved what remained of us.” Azen Loanin seemed to hesitate. “And the plague you constructed was brilliant. A masterpiece of retroviral engineering. The vaccine even more so.”

I’m no chemist. I merely told the computer what was needed: a way to destroy his influence and a reason to distribute it. “Thank you.”

The old man’s breathing had calmed, stabilized. Revan felt cooling energy flow through her, bringing his temperature down as well.

“We Jedi serve,” Loanin said.

“Me?” She’d had more fervent declarations of allegiance. “You serve me?”

“No,” the child-Master shook his head. “We serve the Force.”

Xxx

“I may have to leave for a time,” the Emperor told Polla, leaning over the table to refill her teacup, as she approached the table again, one hand casually hidden in the folds of her robes and half behind her back. “Your request to bring Lord Malak to us is proving... somewhat complex. My other Voice amongst the Jedi has been silenced.” He frowned at her. “For a moment, I believe I saw your own duplicate through her eyes.”

“Her?” Polla laughed. Duplicate?

“Your copy.” He chuckled. “Did you think I didn't know?” He paused. “Sometimes in Malak’s body, I used to watch her sleep.”

“ You have issues,” she muttered. “Big fracking issues. I can’t be the first sent to tell you.”

“Sheris was lithesome.” He sighed. “So like you, before the cruelties of war hardened your singular face.” He smiled. “You seem well-restored now.”

Sheris? It took Polla a second to get it. She remembered the nurse from the clinic. “Oh. Her. Right.” She shrugged, trying to look imperious. You crazy fracking asshole. “Very well. Bring Malak to me. Immediately.”

Luck with that, being as he's dead and all.

“What is that behind your back?” The glowing eyes lit an almost hungry expression. “Treachery, Revan? Again? So soon?”

“You got me.” She pulled the ysalamiri out, holding the wooden stick it was grown upon up and, trying to ignore the racing of her heart. He can tell, he’s fracking with me. Can I really pull this off? “Master Klee and I are plotting against you.”

“How exciting.” He beamed. “No one besides you has even come close to fulminating a successful coup in three hundred years.”

“Right. Polla raised her eyebrows. “Well. Why don't you let me get on with it then, while you rustle up Darth Malak.”

“Of course.” Incredibly, the crazy Sith asshole smiled at her, and then his eyes faded back to Master Klee's ordinary brown.

It took another few seconds for those eyes to focus, then widen, taking in Polla across the table, and the settings themselves: platters heaped high with food, ferracystal glasses, the bow melting ice sculpture covered with priceless belugar.

“What--what happened?” He stuttered.

Polla smiled at him. She was still as scared as an Exchange grunt on the wrong side of a bad trade, but it looked like she might actually fracking not die today.
Abasen. Seiran. I going to make it back because there's no other choice--

“I'm going to hand this to you,” she said, brandishing the ysa-whatsit. “You're going to take it, then we'll talk.”

The Jedi nodded slowly, reaching out his hand. When the womp rat-thing was securely in it, Polla let out a slow sigh of relief.

“Told you I was an actress,” she said, smiling at him “Asshole didn't suspect a thing.”

“I am... astonished,” her captor didn't sound anything at all, but maybe that was a Jedi thing. “He truly believed you were Revan Starfire?”

“And he'll keep fracking believing it, with your help.” She glared at him. “You know he's totally banthashit insane, right? I think he thinks we're supposed to get married or something. You need to get me out of this!”

“Child, I don't know where to begin.”

“Yeah, well I do,” she snapped. “We'll get to Yavin, and then I'm good. Suvam always had a few extra ships. I'll steal one and then I can escape, and you can pretend you don't know what fracking happened or whatever it is you do.”

Klee stared at her, as if considering. “Suvam?”

Frack. “I've done a lot of work for the Exchange. You know, public service announcements. Sentient Resource vids. That kind of thing. We go way back.”

“Then... won't he recognize you?”

He hasn't yet. “Surgery,” she lied glibly. “I know you don't think I look like her, but I paid a lot for this kit.”

The Jedi sighed. “We are on borrowed time. Tenebrae will know soon, if he doesn't already that the real Revan never left Coruscant.”

“He told me she has a double. He knows that?” Polla shrugged. “He said he saw her for a millisecond; but then his voice was 'silenced.'”

“Silenced...” The Jedi frowned, his eyes going distant for a moment. “That is... unfortunate. But perhaps favorable to us.”

Us. You said us, you Jedi asshole.

Polla smiled slightly. “You need to tell me stuff. Stuff she knows. But this isn't even hard. Your boss thinks Darth Malak is still alive, for frack's sake. For a Force-possessing evil Sith, he doesn't get out much, does he?”

“Darth Malak,” Klee repeated. “Ah. You... discussed Malak’s condition with him?”

“He offered to go get him.” Polla smirked. “I think that's where he fracked off too now. Good luck collecting atomized pieces of space dust off the Nefeli Spire, Emperor Tenny-bro!”

“Tenebrae.” Klee corrected her. And then he sighed. “It appears I gravely underestimated you, Serina Starshine.”
“It appears you did,” she agreed. “So get off your ass and help me instead. You said you wanted to buy the real Revan some… time to do… something? Then let's do it. I'll give you til Yavin, and then I'm getting the frack away from all of you. Deal?”

Klee nodded slowly. “It is a deal, as you say.”

“No fracking tricks,” she warned him, just like Revan had said to the Sith Selkath on Manaan, right before she saved the bus full of schoolchildren from a watery grave. “Got that? Double cross me, and I'll end you. Slow and painful. You will feel every cut of my saber. Your green blood will run like ribbons, fall like rain into the waste of your industrial sea.”

“She doesn't speak like that,” Klee said. A slight smile played on his lips. “And lightsaber wounds cauterize, they don't bleed. But your intonation is really quite good.”

“I practiced,” Polla snapped. It was true. “But I mean it: double cross me and I'll fracking gut you.”

The Eosian raised an eyebrow. “Yes! Now that is something she would say.” He picked up Tennybro’s discarded fork, and speared a slice of something green on one of the side plates with it. “I will try and help you, child. For as long as I can.”

“Good,” Polla told him. “Why don't you start by telling me who this crazy Emperor is and why he thinks Revan is his fracking kath hound.”

Klee sighed. “I fear only Revan and my master know the truth of that; but I can tell you about Malak. Tenebrae is not sane—that much is true—but Malak—the real Malak is alive. Or, at least…”

Oh. Polla’s stomach sank to her toes. “Well, that’s… you just have to help me escape before that asshole brings him to Yavin. Okay?”

Malak and Carth Onasi both. Don't you keep track of your own husbands, Revan Starfire? Are you too busy fracking the third one?

Frack. What if Sei does something stupid? He must be frantic, I need to send a message somehow-- “There's really no comms?” Polla broke in, interrupting Klee, who had started to talk about Revan Starfire’s fracking childhood, as if Polla was a naif who had never seen a vid in her life.

“No comms.” He shook his head. “I'm sorry.”

“Huh.” He was probably lying even now, but at least she'd bought herself more time.

Xxx

“Mother!” Korrie tackled Revan from behind, and pulling her around in a hug. “They let me off early today and I found you all by myself! But the chaps wouldn't tell me why I got out early! Is this about the Racharn First dying?”

“Didn’t you do it?” He tilted his head up. “Some of the Egs said you probably did it.”

“I didn't.” Just one Jedi turned Sith-possessed spy killed today. She felt her mouth twist bitterly. “Did… did Sheris send for you?”
“Huh? Why would she?” When he tilted his head like that, it was like a shadow of the man she couldn't remember. Held in the expression, the gray of his eyes. “It's weird you guys are friends. Amaree says that wives and concubines aren’t supposed--”

“Frack Amaree,” Revan snapped.

Her son’s eyes widened. “Mother?”

“Sorry, I just…” her voice trailed off, and glanced at the locked door, where she'd left Polla’s husband and son. Hadn’t this been where Revan wanted to meet? Then why did she sense the other woman’s presence--in the opposite direction?

“Korrie, have you seen Sheris? This afternoon?”

“No.” He shook his head. “Can you tell her to stop touching my hair?”

“I-I can try.” It was wrong that she almost pitied the woman, since pretty much everything wrong now in Revan's life could be attributed to her actions--

No. Mine. My actions. Even if I don’t remember.

How if felt, killing Master Korr. Rational and cold. Because there was no other choice.

“Why are you down here anyways? This is the guest quarters and we don't have any except the Jedi downstairs and I stopped there on the way up and all the kids are gone. It's just grown ups left, and not a lot. Where did they all go?”

“Huh?” She frowned. “I'm here to… meet Sheris, Malachor. I don't know about the Jedi.” The Jedi who so nicely offered to dispose of the corpse I made. Are they still even Jedi?

“Malachor.” He made a face. “Don't call me that.”

“We might… I have to go on a trip, Korrie.” She tried to make her smile look normal. “Someone needs my help. I won't be gone long, and your grandfather and you--and Malak will stay here and keep you safe. Okay?”

“Where are you going?” His frown back twisted into a hopeful smile. “Maybe Father and I can come?”

“No. A friend… someone needs my help.”

His brows knit together. “Did you hear that?”

“What?” Then she heard it too. Dulled by security-grade durasteel, but at the end of the hall a baby was crying, hopeless and in pain.

“Why’s there a baby?”

“Korrie--”

But then her son ran past her, running to the door and running his hand over the security panel. It beeped and opened, revealing Seiran Wen. The man was holding his wailing son, whose wails stopped, as his eyes widened as he took them all in.

“Mahamam?” the baby asked hopefully.
“I wasn’t sure you were coming back,” the man said, ignoring Korrie and glaring at Revan.

“Hello,” Korrie told him. “Who are you?”

“Seiran,” he snapped, even though Revan had told him to lie. “Seiran Wen.”

“Oh!” Korrie jumped up and down. “I’ve heard of you! Mother said you really weren’t dead!”

“Not yet,” the man muttered. He looked as pissed as he had when he and Polla were tweeners and the Skadler kids broke the spin housing in mechanics classes. “Where’s the other one of you? The bossy one?”

“She’s… coming.” It wasn’t like with Bastia, where they had shared enough to speak through the Force, but Revan tried to think some fracking urgency in her other self’s direction.

“Where's your wife lady, Seiran Wen?” Korrie asked bluntly. “She’s the one that Mother didn't have killed but she lied about, even to Grandfather?”

“That's not what I--” The protest died on Revan’s lips because it was so accurate.

“Kidnapped by Sith,” the man told her son. If Seiran was her own fracking husband, Revan might have killed him for revealing so much. “Your mothers are going to rescue him for me.”

“Mothers?” Korrie shook his head. “I still only have one, unless Sheris marries my father, and she told me she's not anymore. So only one. How many does your baby have?”

“One,” Seiran said. His eyes were accusing. “When do we leave?”

“As soon as possible.” If they had a fast ship and pushed it, Revan thought they could make it to Yavin in about four days time. How can you even think Polla would make it that long?

Strapped to Seiran’s chest, Polla’s son stared at her, round-eyed and unblinking. It was Revan who looked away first.

How can I think anything else? She has to. Stay alive, Polla. Please.

“Good?” Revan tried not to glare at her. “Say goodbye to Malachor, Sheris. For now.”

“You took care of the Jedi?” Dar’Revan wasn’t even bothering with the Rakatan. And Polla’s husband, glaring at her like this was all her fault.

Oh, isn't it?

“I've secured Malachi’s personal shuttle.” Dar’Revan's eyes were clear and calm. “I thought we'd need to stop at the Academy to get Mal, but since he's here, I’ll adjust the timer.”

“What?” Revan frowned. “What the frack are you talking about?”

“House Makeon will be mounting a full-on assault to House D’Reev in…” her other self pulled out a datapad, and ran her fingers across the symbols, swiveling the circle back. “Thirty minutes. Once the alarms go, the civilians should have time to evacuate before the charges blow. Senators prefer to minimize civilian casualties. But once challenged, of course, the First cannot leave.”
“You're framing Malachi?” Making it look like he's the aggressor? Or Makeon First is? Why? Why would Revan start a war now?

“What about Grandfather? And I like some of the Makeons!” Korrie glared at Sheris. “Why would you do that?”

“The best option.” Dar’Revan sounded perfectly calm. “Neither you, nor I can afford to take on the House seat, Fragment; and Mal wouldn't survive a week.”

“But Malachi is still First—”

Dar’Revan shook her head slightly, glancing down at their son. “We can talk in the shuttle. The roof. Now. It's imperative we move immediately.” She sighed. “I probably shouldn't have let the Loanin boy live.”

“You're saying you made it look like House Makeon is just blowing up the entire fracking building and Malachi would just stand there and let it happen?”

“No.” It was Korrie who answered. Malachor, her son. “I think she means it’s that we’re playing Scorched Ground.” The First of Makeon will come in and duel Grandfather while we all watch. A lot of times they use drones through, or auto targeting scopes. It's okay to cheat. If he wins he gets to blow up this whole place and take everything and we die. All us D’Reevs. But if Grandfather wins, he gets Makeon, and control of the Senate for the next ten seasons.” Her son shrugged, looking as if this was normal. “Houses don't use Scorched Earth a lot anymore. It's too hard to win because of the cheating, but it's better to start the game than to be the defender, because if you start it and you lose, you die, but your family has a sporting chance.” He frowned. “Grandfather's pretty tough through, even if he's a little sick. He's made it through Scorched Earth lots of times. Just not since I was born.”

“Korrie….” Revan wrapped her arms around him, as if that would make a difference. She glared at her counterpart. “The hell? What the frack are you doing?”

“Mal’s correct. I told Makeon First the truth.” Dar’Revan gestured, and turned, starting to walk back in the direction she’d come.

“About us?” That seemed insane.

“About Malachi. He's dead.” The woman’s eyes blinked, and her mouth twisted. For a moment, she actually looked upset. “Plague. He died of plague. I told the Makeon that as First I'd accept his Scorched Earth proposal. That House has been trying to goad Malachi into throwing his hand ever since….” Her voice trailed off. “For years.”

“Let me guess. Is that my fault too?”

“It's mine,” Dar’Revan met Revan’s eyes calmly. “Which was enough to make the Makeon First forget his caution. I expect he will cheat spectacularly, in the hopes of revenging himself upon a fallen Jedi who sent three of his sons to die at Malachor.” Her teeth pulled back. “Enemies, Fragment. Sometimes they're quite useful.”

Malachor was holding Revan’s hand. Somehow they'd started following this madwoman, Seiran too, the three of them walking abreast behind her. Korrie squeezed her hand hard, as if for comfort, but when Revan looked down at him, her son’s face was stony, nearly as cold as Dar’Revan’s.

“What about my father?” Korrie whispered. “Is he… is he dead too?”
“No,” Revan whispered. Not again. But when she extended her senses, trying to find… something, the spark that she’d come to realize was Malak was flickering, so faintly she could barely sense it. “No,” she insisted, louder, lying. I will not feel sorry for a man I killed. But Dustil--

“Father’s missing,” her son said. “I can't find him at all.”

But his feet came down, one after the other, just like hers. On her other side, Seiran’s arm brushed hers. “You sure you trust her?” His voice was a whisper, as if that would stop a Jedi from hearing three paces away. Maybe he thought it would.

“I can stop her, if I have to,” Revan muttered.

“That's true,” Dar'Revan murmured, not even looking back. “But you know I’m correct.”

Xxx

“Cally?” Really, why was it so difficult to find decent help these days? The agency had sent three others before this little Dantooine girl, and every one of them even more clumsy and slow. “Cally? I’m expecting a General for dinner tonight. The caterers have been and gone, but you need to out the warmers out before the soufa falls. It's quite inedible without the pillowing.”

Cally held up her hand, without even turning her head. She was wearing something black and sleeveless, and decidedly not her uniform. “A moment, Helena. I’m watching this.”

Xxx

Jokka Rei: “*Sentients, this is just... unbelievable news now coming from the One Thantos Three--or rather, what used to be the D’Reev tower, One Thantos Three. As you can see, authorities have cordoned the area in a half-kilometer radius, and I’ve been told evacuations of all nearby structures are still underway. We have no casualty reports as of yet, but this level of conflict between two Senate Houses is... unprecedented, within our lifetime, to say the least.

Xarga Weis: (interrupting) “Your Republic’s own personal Malachor?”

Jokka Rei: “I don't find that amusing.”

Xarga Weis: “Just accurate. She's got to be behind this, don't you think?”

Xxx

She. Helena Shan’s mouth opened and closed as she stared at the holo screen, the column of smoke, rising like a gravity well into the heavens above.

“Revan! They mean Revan! She did this!”

“Yes.” Cally didn't turn her head. Her voice sounded strange and choked. Deeper, almost a like a man’s. “Ridding herself of Jedi and duplicate all at once. She must have planned this from the start, orchestrating even her own kidnapping--”

“Kidnapping?” Revan Starfire had a son, Helena recalled. “She took her own child?”

Maybe Helena should have done that with Bastila, long ago. Taken her back from those Jedi butchers and raised her herself. But Abasen--her husband always had another treasure hunt, always another stake, and the child would have gotten in the way: so small and serious, like a tiny judge.

“No.” Her servant… chuckled darkly. There was no other way to describe it. “No doubt the Starfire loyalists have secured Malachor on some fortified world already. Perhaps with his father.” She turned her head, rising up from the couch. The first thing Helena Shan noticed was that her servant was now dressed in one of Helena’s very own evening gowns. The next, was that the woman’s eyes were glowing, a hellish and terrible red.

“What--what are you?”

On the holoscreen, the pundits continued their story. Master Vrook Lamar’s face captioned. “My niece is not dead.”

“You fools call us barbarous,” Cally murmured, not at all like herself. “I’m sure you won’t mind if I keep this garment? It’s far more comfortable than that uniform you had this child dressed in.”

“Of course.” It had been one hundred and sixteen days since Helena Shan’s last drink, but her hands were now shaking as if it was yesterday. “But please! Don't hurt me. Just go. Take anything you want!”

“Want.” Cally sighed. “You have no idea how boring want can be, after a few centuries.” She started towards Helena, and Helena backed into the wall, shaking, trying not to scream.

“Please! Don't hurt me!”

“I suppose I must want credits,” her former bodyguard sighed. “Those Malachorian bumbling have nearly eliminated my resources on this planet. And if Revan is going to keep breaking all our rules of engagement, I shouldn't have to play fair.” Her voice had a petulant whine. “Don't you agree?”

“Yes!” Anything. Abasen had always insisted they carry the local currency in small denominations, in case of civil unrest. Helena had never broken the habit. Not even here. Her hand trembled as she picked up the priceless N’Tari vase he had given her the year after Bastie was born, after the last miscarriage, and fished out the credits within. “Please. Take them!”

“You're so kind.” The woman’s head ducked, as if suddenly almost shy. “I hope you're not mourning for Revan. Trust me, she's far from dead.”

“I wish she was dead,” Helena hissed. “She killed my daughter!”

Cally nodded. “Rather unfairly. She kept Bastila from me.”

Xxx

A/N They are getting more complicated to write, not that this was ever easy. This chapter went through a few iterations, a few plot twists, a few rejected reunions, and so on.

BTW, I have a massive document I call memory apocrypha that’s all the stuff I’ve cut or changed. Let me know what you love or hate and I’ll send you a cut scene.
The sky speeder’s interior was cramped for five, even if one was a baby. Seiran wrapped his arms around Abasen. His son nuzzled into his neck, and he breathed in the scent of the baby’s fuzzy head. Next to him, Revan and Malak’s son sat quietly, back straight as a line. Seiran would have thought the kid was completely calm—except he kept chewing on his lower lip like it was a stick of gam.

“This is a shuttle,” the Revan with Polla’s memories said to the other. “How do you expect us to get offworld?”

“We only need to reach the orbitals,” the other Revan told her. “I’ve made arrangements for a ship.”

“What kind of arrangements? We can’t take one of Malachi’s.” That Revan was driving, her hands resting loosely on the speeder’s thruster. She made a face—again, awkwardly familiar, down to the roll of her eyes. “Bad enough we’re in this fracking thing, with Senate plates and the D’Reev crest on the side.”

“I’m sure we won’t be the only ones borrowing transport,” the other one—the one that had been a nurse—said. The nurse’s voice was flat. She appeared completely unconcerned.

She gave Seiran the creeps.

Maybe Seiran was imagining that the one with Pollie’s memories looked like his wife. Maybe he was grasping at wild hessi. But Polla had to be alive. Seiran would know, wouldn’t he—if she was dead? The Revans had—they were Force users, and they’d said it was possible that he would know.

Not just possible. True. She has to be alive.

But after we rescue you, Polla, I’m going to blasting kill you for doing something so fracking stupid—

The Revan who had been a nurse sounded just as confident about this as she did everything else.
“Set the course towards the outer ring of the station. There’s a light cruiser waiting for us there.”

“A Senate cruiser? Because we can’t—”

“No. I called in a favor.”

They stared at each other. It was the nurse who looked away first, while the other Revan’s eyes narrowed. She said something in a language Seiran didn’t know, and her twin answered back.

The one with Polla’s memories turned away, back to the viewscreen again. “If this is some kind of Sith fracking trap—”

Ses? Kashyyyk am prior?”
“Shnikiath. A dak tar Kashyyk. Y an dak Yavin Station.” The other frowned and looked over at their son, curled up in back seat next to Seiran. “Korrie, I know this is scary—”

“She blew up the building with grandfather in it.” The boy’s eyes were dry, but he wiped them anyway. “Why do you let her boss you around? She’s probably evil.”

“Hah,” the pilot said, lifting an eyebrow. “See? My son is probably right.”

“Mal--” the nurse’s face looked older when she frowned. “Your grandfather loved you very much. He was very sick. He-he told me to tell you that.”

They were above the clouds now. Atmosphere splintered into the dark lines of the orbital thruway. The pilot Revan dove through traffic, accelerating sharply. She drove as recklessly as Pollie, and watching made Seiran’s gut twist.

“Leeshy was very sick and you healed her.” The boy hugged his knees to his chest. “You could have healed Grandfather too. But you didn’t. I don’t like you.”

The nurse Revan looked like she’d been slapped.

“Korrie!” The other one said, glancing back. “You can’t speak to her that way!”

“Where are we going?” The boy demanded. “Why did you have to play scorched ground if all we’re gonna do is hide? Shouldn’t we attack or something?”

“Korrie, we’re not--” The pilot sighed. “We're going to find a safe place for you and the baby to stay. It won't be for long, I promise.”

“And then what?” The kid frowned. “If everyone thinks I'm dead, how can I marry Leeshy? What about our alliance?”

The nurse's mouth twitched. “It’s a feint, Malachor. Surely, you studied them in school?”

“I'm not talking to you.”

Seiran stared down at the rapidly disappearing skyline. The pilot Revan had banked them nearly vertical now, and the thrusters kicked in as the shuttle pulled away from Coruscant’s atmosphere. Wisps of sullen gray clouds rapidly concealed the remaining view. The fog was thicker than the muck around the canyons back home.

He tried not to think that they were flying blind. He wrapped his arms around his son. The two Revans were going at it again, back and forth in that language of theirs.

“Hey!” he broke in. Their heads turned towards him, almost at the same time.

“What is it?” the pilot asked. The other one leaned over her, and punched something in on the navigation screen. Her double glanced down at it, frowned, and then looked back at Seiran without adjusting the course.

“So, you want to get us a ship and then we… we find my wife? How are we going to find my wife?”

“I know where she is,” the pilot told him. “Or where she will be. Tenebrae's taking her to Yavin Station.” She turned away from the controls entirely, as careless as Pollie in that damned asteroid field. Seiran had to resist the urge to tell her to look at the speedway.
“And how do you know that?” The nurse demanded.

“Master Kavar told me. He said Master Klee told him, because he was working secretly with some group to betray the Emperor?” The pilot shot the nurse another glare.

“Ah,” the nurse said. She smiled slightly, and it made Seiran uneasy. In his arms, Abasen whimpered a little.

“And then there’s the Genoharadan,” the pilot added, without looking back. “Do you have a plan for them, Dar?”

“Ackmay glub.” The other one responded. “Isnmay klibgb ban, Jett’ai.”

“Hope I can. The kids will be safe with the Mand'oade, at least. When we get to this cruiser of yours, I’ll comm them. Does the ship of yours has a secure line?”

“No.”

“No?” The one with Polla’s memories snorted. “Frack if I know how you're gonna call Kashyyyk then. And I need to comm Carth--”

“No. I mean, we are not leaving Malachor and the infant with your clans.” The nurse’s voice went arctic. “I have a better place.”

“Where?” Seiran interrupted. “I’m not crazy about leaving Abasen with Aemelie either, but it’s better than some orphanage.”

They both turned to look at him.

“You need to stay dead,” the nurse murmured. “For now, we all do. I would think you’d understand, Deralian.”

“We can trust Canderous--” the other one broke in.

“You don’t understand him! Or any of the clans. They have their own rivalries. Just because you married one of their warriors and made him your pet kath--”

“Canderous is no one’s pet anything!”

“I know a place,” the nurse insisted. “Trust me, Fragment. Do you think I’d let my--do you think I’d put Mal in danger?”

“I think you have a plan,” the other one muttered. “It worries me that I don’t know what it is.”

“You thought nothing of reprogramming an ancient Rakatan computer with a Twi’lek child’s memories. You failed to notice three Sith Lords when they were right in front of you--not to mention Malak--for... how long?” The nurse made a disgusted noise in her throat. “Trust that I know Tenebrae. I did control a rather extensive espionage network. I know of a few safe planets.”

“Safe planets for children?” The pilot scoffed. “We need to leave them with our allies.”

Her twin frowned.

“I’m not leaving with anyone,” Korrie interrupted them. “Who’s Tenebrae?”

“Someone who will never hurt you, Malachor,” the nurse said. “Someone who can never touch
you.”

“Some crazy fracking Sith,” the other one added. “After we rescue the real--after we rescue Polla, we’re going to stop him.”

“Send Mandalorians,” the boy said. “Father says they're evil, but I figure, that means they're tough, doesn’t it? They’ve got to be tough?”

“They're not evil,” the nurse corrected. “Your father simplifies everything.” Her mouth thinned. “Even now, still a Jedi.”

“Huh?”

“Why don't we talk about this later,” muttered the Revan with Polla’s memories. She pushed her hair back from her face, twisting it in her fingers. “Hope you weren't kidding about that ship, Dar.”

“Would I joke?” The other woman shook her head.

“She didn't have to blow up the whole building,” the boy whispered. “We’re not even playing scorched ground right.”

“It’s okay, Korrie.” The pilot’s voice went soft. Almost like Polla’s, singing Abasen to sleep. Was it really, or was Seiran just losing his mind? He wrapped his arms around his son and prayed. He wasn’t sure to who--or what.

“Grandfather’s dead,” the boy whispered. “And where’s Father?”

_His real father? Dead… isn't he?_ The way the media was, how could Seiran know?

“He’s… he’s not coming with us,” the other Revan said. “He can’t stay in that boy’s body forever. We discussed this, Mal.”

Boy’s body?

Pollie was the one who had wished for more excitement in their lives. Seiran just wanted a couple more kids and some steady work. And at the end of every day, his wife in his arms, safe and soft and sound.

“You discussed Malak with my son?” The pilot. And now both of them glaring at each other again. “When?”

The boy answered before the woman could. “‘The other night, when Sheris read me a story. She said they’re not getting married and Father will have to give the body back.”

“Oh. Well… she’s right.” The woman sighed. “I’m sorry, Korrie. I know this is a lot. We’re gonna take you someplace safe, okay?”

“But where?” He looked at the pilot, lip trembling a little. “We should get Father too.”

“We can’t.” The pilot turned back to the wheel of the speeder, just in time to swerve them out of incoming traffic. “There's no time.”

“But if Grandfather's dead, you're First now.” The child sounded almost like one of them. “Make time.”

“Mal,” the nurse stood up, leaning over the back of the seat. “Look at me.”
The pilot Revan glanced back once, then returned her attention to the thruway, just in time to dodge them back into the outbound lane, passing a double hauler by almost skimming its top.

Seiran couldn't stand it anymore. “Be careful,” he snapped. “Watch where you're going.”

“I am,” the pilot Revan said. She glanced back at him, taking her eyes off the road again. “Relax, okay?”

“What?” The boy was standing up in his seat, staring at the nurse Revan. Their faces were close, so close that Seiran couldn't see the expressions. But as he watched, the nurse bent forward, her hair brushing the boy’s forehead.

“I know you miss him,” the nurse whispered. “I miss him too, Malachor, but sometimes we have to do what is necessary. You know that your father would say the same.”

“What’s necessary is stupid,” he muttered. “Like you.”

“Don't be a silly-slug.” Her voice pitched lower, and her hand brushed his hair back. “You have to be brave.”

“I am,” he said. “The… bravest.”

“Bravest ever.” She leaned forward even more “Hothan--”

The kid jerked back as if she'd shocked him. “No!” He shook his head, whispering. “You don't get to do that!”

“What?” The pilot turned around all the way in her seat… just as they were merging into an ascending spiral, lanes outlined in beams of light.

The ominous honk of a hoverbus coming up under their lane made Seiran hold onto Abasen a little tighter. Something finally occurred to him: pilot Revan had all of Pollie's confidence behind the thruster…

...and none of her skill.

And yet, the woman had the luck of a Grass Priest. Incredibly, the hoverbus slowed before it hit them… and their shuttle leapt forward, as if it had thrusters, beating the light.

“She tried to give me a Hothan kiss!” The kid was furious. “She was acting like she was you, Mother-- except you never call me silly slug. Not anymore. No one has, not in ages--”

“Frack,” the pilot said. She rattled off several other things that could have been more curses in that language of theirs.

The nurse said something back. The boy watched them, eyes narrowing.

“Sheris was… wrong to do that,” the pilot offered finally. A little weakly, Seiran thought.

Sheris? And then it hit him. For whatever reason, they’d never bothered to tell the kid he had two moms.

Abasen murmured something against his chest. When Seiran looked down, his son’s dark eyes were staring up at him steadily. Trusting.

“I won’t lie,” he whispered, staring into those eyes. “When you’re old enough to understand me, I won't lie to you about anything.”

The shuttle lurched again. The Revans argued. The boy was silent next to Seiran, sitting again, hands clenched together tightly on his lap, gnawing furiously on his lower lip, like that was all that kept him whole.

Seiran looked at his son. “I'll never lie to you,” he repeated, softer still, murmuring the words against the baby’s silken head. “I promise.”

XXX

Mother landed the shuttle on one of the big orbitals that had been designed to root space bound traffic away from Coruscant traffic. They had studied it once in school, like last month, but it felt like ages ago, now.

Sheris was really bossy. She led all of them off the shuttle and down into Orbital Parking like it was all hers, and when Mother suggested they get supplies, she looked like she wanted to yell. Maybe that was what she was doing in that funny language as they walked down along the tramway.

Yelling at mother.

Sheris was bossy. Sheris was a bully.

Except she wasn't Sheris at all. She couldn't be.

All of the pieces fit. Korrie had been a real silly slug not to notice it before.

Sheris-not-Sheris knew things. She knew where those old holobooks were, on the bottom shelf of his room because it was the first shelf he'd had. She'd gone and picked them the first time, the time she'd read him ten stories, before Korrie had even asked.

And she never called him Korrie. She called him Mal. She called him Mal a lot.

And she had slept in their old rooms, with Father. Married people did that. And Mother was married to other people now, but Father was only married to one person and she--

And she was bossy. Mother had been bossy. Mother had been the boss of everyone. Mother had even ruled the galaxy.

“I need supplies,” the man with the baby said for like the fifth time. Korrie kept forgetting his name. His hair was stupid, like Mother in the vids. “For Abasen. Formula. Diapers. Wipes.”

They were standing in the middle of the crowded, crowded orbital. They'd landed, first off, and then there had been a long line, and they'd stood for what seemed forever, before Mother made an impatient noise and--she must have done something, because suddenly a bunch of people in front of them all went off and did other stuff and it was their turn and... kind of just like in the vids of the quest for the Star Forge, or old episodes of Nomi, Mother was doing real Jedi mind tricks on the customs people.

“I don't need to see your exit visas,” the Aqualish had agreed. His holostamp had hovered in the empty air for a sec, and then the gate had opened, and they had passed through under the sign that said “Departures, Outer Rim.”

“I've never been to the Outer Rim,” Korrie told Sheris-not-Sheris. “Guess you have, right?”
“Yes,” she said. She wasn't looking at him, she was staring at the ground, and her voice sounded like a droid’s. Speaking of droids, the bag she was carrying clanked. Korrie had looked into it in the shuttle. The bag had pieces of HK. Mother’s HK, that she had chopped to pieces and didn't seem to care about.

Mother didn't care about HK, but Sheris-not-Sheris did care. She cared enough to bring his broken chopped up pieces.

That was how he knew. It really had to be true. When he realized that, he realized it had to be the finally strawman, like Grandfather used to say.

“Go,” Mother said to that guy with the baby. “get what you need. We have a little time.”

“Keep your hood up,” Sheris-not-Sheris bossed Korrie. She was wearing goggles. She pulled up Korrie's hood too, and pulled off his itchy Eg collar.

“Take Aba for me? Just for now.” Meanwhile, the man was unsnapping that whiny baby from its blanket on his chest, and handing the whole thing to Mother.

Mother took the whiny baby extra carefully, like he might break. He wouldn't though. Babies were tough. There had been a few in the apprentice dorms, with their carers. This one cried more than those Jedi babies.

“Hurry, Seiran.” Mother wrapped her arms all awkward around the baby, who gave a squawk, like he didn't like it.

“Don’t squeeze him,” Korrie told her. The man was already rushing over to one of those auto kiosks that they had in commercial districts, that Korrie wasn't allowed to go near because they had bad security.

“Support his legs,” Sheris-not-Sheris told Mother. Like she was kind of the expert. Was she? If she really was what she had to be, then--she was. Kind of. Because she'd had a baby before.

And she'd held him. Korrie remembered a little of that.

“Shhh,” Mother said, looking down at the baby in her arms. “He’ll be back soon.”

All of the secrets were starting to make Korrie mad, which was good, because being mad distracted him from being upset that Grandfather was maybe dead. (If that wasn’t a lie too.) Would Grandfather be a Force ghost like Father used to be? That might be sort of cool, except that Grandfather didn’t have the Force. Did you need to have the Force to be a Force ghost, or was it something that could happen to anyone?

“Keep your head down,” Mother murmured to Korrie. There were crowds all over the place, but no one seemed to be paying attention to them. Mother had a funny look on her face, like she was concentrating and Korrie wondered if maybe she was helping with that. Master Klee had said lots of times that the Force could influence the weak-minded, but also that it was bad and wrong to use it like that, and that Korrie must not ever.

Master Klee had not ever explained how through. Maybe Mother knew. And Sheris-not-Sheris had to know, she had to know too.

Right now through, Sheris-not-Sheris didn't look like she knew anything at all. She was staring at the ground like it mattered more than Korrie, or Mother, or this stupid quest they were on to save Polla Organa Wen, who wasn't dead but was in trouble, and was no doubt as stupid as her husband’s stupid hair.

“Back.” The man appeared again, hands full of plastic or bags and things that clanked and squished. “I got plenty of formula and wipes.”

“Here.” Mother fumbled with the blanket she’d strapped to her own chest, and handed the stupid baby back to its stupid father. They juggled the bags and baby between them like they were actually juggling. It might have been funny, if Korrie's entire universe hadn't just exploded.

Sheris-not-Sheris made an impatient noise. “We're out of time.” She waved them all forward and they all followed, even Korrie and his suspiciousness. They followed her around a corner, to a hallway that was less crowded.

“Here.” Sheris moved her hand a door slid open in the wall. Inside there were stairs and it looked dirty and maybe a little scary.

“Isn’t there a lift?” Korrie asked her.

Sheris shook her head.

“We need to hurry.” Mother was glancing behind them. There was a vidscreen and a lot of people standing in front of it, so they couldn’t see. But there were so many of them talking at once that Korrie couldn’t hear what the ‘caster was saying either.

“Don’t be afraid.” Mother took his hand. Her fingers were warm.

“I’m not,” Korrie told her. “I just want to know what they’re looking at.” The people in front of the vidscreen were blocking the view, but the transmission was broadcasting, very loud, over everybody’s heads.

XXX

“... evacuations of all nearby structures are still underway. We have no casualty reports as of yet, but this level of conflict between two Senate Houses is… unprecedented, within our lifetime, to say the least.”

“Your Republic’s own personal Malachor?”

“I don’t find that amusing.”

“Just accurate. She's got to be behind this, don't you think?”

XXX

“Mal.” Sheris-not-Sheris grabbed his other arm, pulling him away, from where he had turned, and blocking his view.

“I want to see,” Korrie told them. Are they talking about me?

“We need to go now.” Mother pulled him away from Sheris, and wrapped her arms around his shoulders, steering him down into the dark, scary staircase-place. That guy with the baby came behind them. The door slid shut and then it got really dark.

“Make a light?” he whispered to Mother. She did that sometimes when she sang him to sleep, a glowing one, that could dance over the room.
“Just follow me,” she whispered, holding his hand. Sheris was still hanging onto the other one and he pulled it free, giving her a little shove with the Force. (That was wrong, but so was grabbing him.)

“Oh!” Sheris-not-Sheris sounded off balance for a second, and then her feet clacked down the same stairs, right after them all.

“Don't do that,” she said, and for a second, the words seemed to echo in his head, but then Korrie somehow… washed them away. He concentrated. He used the Force.

Father would have been proud, if anyone besides Korrie had cared enough to get him before they ran away.

“Don't lie to me,” he muttered, so quiet that nobody who wasn't a Jedi could hear, but because Korrie had studied a little to be a Jedi too, he knew that Sheris-not-Sheris did hear him.

Whatever. It shut her right up.

XXX

The hanger was anonymous, as promised. Just one in a line off the service entrances. The fifteenth from the left, eastern quadrant. Number 561.

Revan tapped the door and it slid open, all too conscious of the sullen child trailing behind her.

Silly slug. How could I be so careless?

Something a fool like Sheris would do, give into sentiment with the boy. She had avoided it for so long, even those nights reading to him, holding her arms stiff and her back straight when she longer to take him in her arms instead. But he was too big, and he had a mother and she never wanted to hurt him again, or confuse him--

Or leave him. Again.

The ship inside was hull-scarred, obviously salvage.

“Nice,” the Fragment said, as if she didn’t think it was. “That thing doesn’t even look like it can hit hyperdrive.”

“Oh, I’m sure it can,” Revan murmured, with more authority than she felt.

“Mahm,” the baby said, behind them.

“Does it have battle guns?” her son asked.

Revan looked back at him. “I don't know,” she smiled, trying to do it like the Fragment did. “I doubt it.”

“One turret,” the Fragment interrupted. “There, Malachor, see?” She pointed.

“Korrie,” he corrected. “You call me Korrie, and I call you Mother, and I call her Sheris.”

The Fragment looked at the Deralian before she looked at their son again. “I'll get us into hyperspace,” she said slowly. “Maybe you can help Sheris get us squared away with the galley and check the stores.”
She tapped awkwardly on the ship’s hull. Nothing happened. “Is it locked?”

“Probably.” Revan stepped forward, and put her hand against the sensor.

“Access granted.” The hatch swung down.

“The last time someone offered me a ship,” the Fragment said, “it was a Genoharadan trap.”

“The Genoharadan are fools.” Revan shrugged. “Incompetents. I sent them after a simple artifact and they failed utterly to retrieve it.”

“Malachi put a contract with them out on Malachor,” the Fragment snapped back, in Rakatan. She was already halfway up the ramp, hand on her lightsaber, as if Oerin or Davad would leave any threat to her inside. “In the event of his death, the Genoharadan have orders to kill Korrie. You had better fricking hope they're incompetent.”

“Oh?” The Fragment had mentioned that contract before. It obviously frightened her, which was extremely useful. “Then you need to keep him safe.”

“Then… Malachi--he's really dead?” Still in Rakatan, as they trailed after her into the ship. Tight quarters for all of them, but manageable, Revan thought. It would only take a few days to reach the moon where Exar had met his end, and Yavin Station above it; but before that--

Grids on a map, points of light. Hyperspace routes. They would need a safe haven--one that the Fragment would find acceptable….

“Yes,” Revan told her. “He died in front of me.”

XXX

“Daughter,” the old man whispered. His skin was wax, his eyelids swollen, the flesh beneath sunken and shriveled.

“Yes, Malachi.” She didn’t bother to look at Master Loanin.

“I…” he chuckled, coughing, and his eyes seemed to finally focus on her. “You. You’re… you. The… feeds. I-I… thought Malak, but… should have known. You… I had set… markers--my boy’s… room. Wondered why… Sheris spent so much… time.”

Revan tried not to be surprised. “So you knew?”

“We need to talk about the future,” she told him. “You’re dying.”

“Yes.” His eyelids fluttered, half-closing, but they never left her face. “Malachor. He must be safe, but he’s not… ready.”

“You appointed his mother as your Second,” she said.

“You… I would have truly… are you… not her? Have you… replaced her?”

“We are allies,” she told him.
Even if she lies to me. That computer--who knows what it promised her? She is naive.

“Racharn… agreed. You… thank you for that. Your hand… should have… realized.”

“You don't have much time.” She lifted her head, glancing at the Loanin. The Jedi nodded back at her, as if in agreement. Not much time. The virus affected some like this, attacking the body; until one by one, all of its systems shut down.

Revan knew that her expression gave away nothing. “Of course. We will protect him together, Malak and me. Which House is the biggest threat to ours?”

“Makeon. They have not… forgotten. Sons.”

Their sons who had died above Malachor.

“And Racharn promised to ally against them? With us?”

“New First… too young. She can’t… protect…. Not yet.”

Of course not. And Malak was a double-edged blade. Even if he had the strength to protect Malachor, revealing his true identity would risk having him tried for their crimes against the Republic. Revealing his identity now, with the Order in tatters and distrust of Force users more common than respect--

It was untenable, no matter her personal sentiment.

Tenebrae had gone too far. If he had blind agents on Coruscant, then Revan was truly out of time. No telling how far his minions had penetrated. The Senate. Trade federations. The Fleet.

Too late for her plague, and the box had never been found. There was only one way to control him now.

“Protect.” The old man’s face twisted in pain. “Both. Revan. The other… she has… fire. My Ilyana. She-she was like. Her. Protect.”

And I was not? I did not have fire, Malachi? I made the galaxy burn for your schemes.

His schemes, all along.

The wash of anger helped strengthen her resolve. Silence the sniveling Sheris.

Malachi said other things. Questions. All about her, his Jedi-spawned prize. Revan answered as best she could. And then--

“I promise, Father.” His fingers were cold in hers, dry like sticks. Revan could see the veins in his temple, his eyes still half-closed, staring at her under heavy lids.

“Genoharadan.” Malachi laughed softly. “Cancelled... contract. Malachor is... safe.”

Genoharadan. Revan frowned. That would be a relief to the Fragment, perhaps. She herself had always assumed Malachi was bluffing when he threatened their son.

Her mind considered routes of escape. They’d need a ship. Untraceable. “Which Makeon is the Which hates me the most? Enough to do something truly rash? On a moment’s notice?

“First.” His desiccated lips pulled back in a smile.” Eliminate… others first. Then… him.” He patted her hand. “Good… girl.”

She turned her head towards Loanin. “You should leave.” she told him. “Take the Jedi with you. Alarms will go off quite soon.”

His eyebrows shot up nearly to his hairline. “Is the building’s security compromised?”

“Soon.”

“Give me time,” the Jedi said, looking back. “I assume you don’t want further loss of life upon your conscience.”

“Revan...” the old man. From behind her. His voice stronger now. “You--always. Like a daughter... to me.”

“Yes, Malachi.” She didn't turn her head, just stared at the Jedi medic until the man turned away, walking towards the door. “You have approximately one hour, Master Loanin.”

He turned back. “I don’t know whether to wish the Force be with you or not.”

“We are Jedi,” she told him. Maybe it was Sheris’s old bitterness, bleeding through. “What we wish is inconsequential.”

“And, so.” He nodded once from the doorway. Then it closed behind him.

“Revan...” the old man whispered.

“Yes, Malachi?”

“You... you make me proud.”

She stared at him, the shell of the old man, stared, until his breathing grew more labored, and his lips tinged with blue. “What... what are you--”

“Something I should have done long ago.” She reached for a pillow. “Father.”

XXX

Dar’Revan’s ship didn't look like much, but its engines practically purred under Revan’s fingers, as she navigated them past the orbital’s gates, and into the open lanes leading to the Outer Rim jump points.

Malachi is dead. And because of that, Korrie is in danger.

But the Genoharadan ranked pretty far down the immediate list. Korrie also wasn’t safe because they were in this claptrap of a ship, hurtling towards a hyperspace jump point, with at least one Senate house, and a Sith Emperor wishing--or thinking--they were dead. Not to mention the two Sith Lords whose ship this fracking had to be--

Dar’Revan had admitted almost nothing. Only that she’d gotten this vessel-- somehow --from Oerin Lin and Davad Arkan.
Of course she got it from Arkan. Who else does she know that didn’t fracking die in the wars with her? Because of her? The Emperor. A bunch of Sith. Our uncle. That’s who she knows.

But why would Davad help us? Is he helping us? Or her? Are we really going to find Polla? Or is this some kind of trap for me?

Revan rubbed her temples, the beginnings of a headache forming, like a thundercloud in the Force. But our son is here. She loves him. I can trust that, even if I can’t trust her.

“You look tired, Korrie.” Revan kept her voice gentle. “Why don’t you grab some sleep? I think there are bunks in the back.”

“I can’t sleep.” Without even looking, she could feel her son’s ragged exhaustion, hear the unshed tears in his voice. “Where are we going? You’re not leaving me!”

“Right now, we’re jumping to hyperspace. You’d better strap in. Sometimes it makes me a little queasy. Have you ever been?”

“Yes,” he muttered. “Lots of times when I was a baby.”

“Mal?” Dar’Revan’s face was perfectly pleasant, like they were on some fracking cruise. “Why don’t you and your mother inspect the sleeping area? I can handle the ship.”

“Why don’t you see him to the bunks?” Revan countered, trying not to eye the long-range communicator.

Why is she helping us? It can’t be for Polla. She blew up that fracking building and how do I know Malachi was even dying? I only have her word--

Seiran cleared his throat. “I can take the kid back, if you two--”

“No,” they both said at once.

“I want you to take him, Sheris,” Revan stared down her duplicate. “Korrie needs to sleep. And he shouldn't be alone.”

“I'm not gonna go to sleep if she's there,” her son muttered. Normally, Revan would have been proud, but now--

“Malachor.” Dar’Revan bent her head until they were eye level. “I know this must be frightening for you. I’m… I'm sorry about that. I'm going to make sure you're safe. I promise.”

“Mother?” He looked at her and then back at Sheris. “What about my father?”

Yes, what about Malak? Another thing Revan hadn't accounted for. Would he evacuate with the rest of the Jedi? What the frack would Carth say, when Revan admitted she’d lost track of his son’s body?

I've failed. Just like Manaan. Maybe Dar’Revan is right. Everything I do goes wrong. Maybe she's right. Maybe I did frack it all up, even worse than she did. She is me, after all. Maybe I need to frack it all up, listen to myself. Listen to her.

Trust her?

She punched in the coordinates to the navboard, setting them towards Yavin. It would still be several jumps. As the route lit up before them, Revan considered their choices for the kids.
If I can't reach Canderous on the comm, would they be safe on Kashyyyk? Or with Carth? Would Carth and Zaalbar watch them for me even after I mislaid Dustil? I'll try to comm them too, but not in front of her--

“Elendor,” Dar announced from across the room. She’d switched on a map of the galaxy like she was giving telemetry lessons. The holographic map lit her features in a haze of blue. “Or Navar. Both Corellian colonies. Lots of Humans. We can hire a caretaker--”

“Hire?” Seiran interrupted. “I don't want to leave my kid with some stranger.”

Neither do I. Which is why we’re not going to do that.

The second she fracking walks out the door, I'll comm Canderous.

“Sei.” Revan called him that deliberately, keeping her voice light and easy. “We’ve got this. Trust me?” Get it? Trust me. Not her.

Polla’s husband frowned. “I don't want to leave him.” Abasen was sleeping finally; fitful, after a crying fit that had lasted all through lift off, and halfway to the space lanes.

“I know.” She met his eyes. Darker than Carth’s. “I don't want to leave Korrie either.”

“You could look after them both,” Dar'Revan suggested. “Seiran, if you prefer to stay with the children, while Revan and I go after Polla--”

She's lying. It felt like a wrongness in the Force. Lying about helping Polla? Leaving him? Both?

“Korrie.” Revan felt her mouth stretch around a lie too, an entirely artificial smile. “Go with Sheris for now. I'll be in soon.”

“Sheris?” Seiran sounded confused.

“She means me,” Dar'Revan said quickly.

“Doesn't he know your name?” Korrie interrupted.

“That's funny,” said Seiran. “Of course I know your mother’s name.”

“Sheris isn't my mother.”

“Sometimes I… pretend to be your mother,” the woman interrupted. “It's a trick.”

“Like when you sang those baby songs to me? Like when you called me a silly slug?” He glared at her with Malak’s fierceness. “Only she did that.”

“Mal--”

“Only she called me that.” He was glaring at them both now. “Her and father. The servants and Grandfather said I was too little to remember her, but I do.”

“Malachor.”

“You left,” he snapped. “Real Mother's the one that came back.”

Without another word, their son turned and ran, heading for the bunks.
Revan made herself breathe. Made herself not follow. Made herself not stare at the comm. “Go after him,” she told her other self. She made her voice gentle, even though it didn't feel like her own voice that way. “He needs--”

The snick of the door sliding closed was the only response. Without turning her head, she knew the woman was already gone.

“Your kid didn't know that she was… you?” Seiran’s voice sounded angry and sad, as if he already knew the answer. “I'm sorry--you didn't tell him? Either of you?”

Revan’s fingers shook as she punched in the comm code.

“No,” she said flatly. “Guard the door, in case she comes back early.”

Xxx

It was a nice moon. Round. Small. Life-sustaining, and that was rare.

“Someone’s down there.” Kex ran his hand along the readouts again. Along with the spectrometer traces you'd expect for a moon with breathable atmosphere, were some blips you wouldn't. Radiation signatures. Processed terrilium, which had a different pattern than raw, the kind of thing you'd only see in a starship’s hull. And something hot and small, like maybe a working power source.

“Could be a crash site.” Millifar shrugged. “The blips aren't enough to be anything big.”

“We could check. Take a shuttle down.” His voice was light and careful.

We could. She examined him more closely. Kex was taller than she was, with straight black hair that hung over his eyes. His nose had a pleasing shape to it, although slightly thin. “Just us?”

“If you prefer.”

“Mother would need to approve first.”

“Of course! I just meant, if she approves… if you prefer and she approves, then--”

“Then we can explore your mysterious moon?” She smiled to show him that she understood the jape. “It's probably just some smuggler’s bolt hole or--”

“Comm alert.” He nudged her elbow, but no daringly immodest flirtation, now. Suddenly all business. “Your father’s special channel.”

Only one sentient has that frequency.

Millifar’s father was half a system away at the moment, working with the unblooded boys on zero gravity and basilisk construction. He had left strict instructions for this comm to be monitored at all times, just in case Third Wife remembered their existence and bothered to call.

It's not even a real marriage.

Millifar stared at the blinking light, and then at Kex again. “It might be... personal,” she said. “You know whose comm that is?”

Predictably, the unblooded boy flushed. “I do.”
“Allow me some privacy to respond.”

His chair slid back, so quickly that its pneumatic rollers hit the edge of the wall. “Of course. I'll just--” he backed away.

The comm chimed again. Once. Twice. The door slid closed behind Kex’s admirable form.

Millifar leaned over the comm bank and pressed in the response sequence. The screen lit up, flashing, resolving itself into a familiar face--

“Millifar? Is your fath--”

“What?” Her left hand moved over the controls, twisting the dials so that their wide beam receptors turned: the enormous receivers, capable of hearing a whisper from across the galaxy, bending towards one another instead of out. “I can barely hear you. There’s some signal interference.”

“... need.” The woman said. Her face twisted, with frustration, or anger, or fear. Millifar didn't care which. She turned up the dial more, until those famous features blurred, and all that remained was the crackle of static.

“I'll tell him you called, Third Wife.” Millifar smiled politely before cutting the signal. “Eventually.”

Xxx

“Frack! Blast!” Revan hit the comm board with the flat of her hand. The plasticore surface gave alarmingly, but didn't break.

Seiran cleared his throat. “No luck, huh?”

“One down,” she muttered. “Sunspots, I guess.”

Her fingers were already tapping the secure code for Kashyyyk.

This time, at least the signal was steady. The comm unit chimed. “Pattern Recognized: Please initiate password protocol, or connection will be severed in ten, nine, eight….”

“Mission?”

The computer didn't sound like Mission. The voice was flat and mechanical. Like a voder translating text.

“Protocol initiated: please match the pattern found in memory. Connection will terminate in ten, nine, eight, seven--”

“Mission? What's wrong with you?” A horrible suspicion. Did she do this? Did Revan reprogram my computer? “It's me, Mission. What the frack--?”

“Pattern identified. Vocabulary match found.” The voice shifted, although there was no visual.

“Polla Revan? Where have you been? Some creepazoid keeps trying to hack into my main banks. Did you give anyone our codes and not tell me? Because whoever it was, they kept saying they were you--but they used the old stuff. Ancient. Like from years ago.”
“They're not me.” Revan tried to sound calm, not angry. Dar’Revan might sense anger, might investigate. “Listen. No matter what. You can't listen to… them. Her. Okay? She’s… she's Sheris Darkstar. She's just pretending to be me, but she's not. Whatever you do, don’t let her in. Don't give her anything.”

“She kept trying to give commands.” Mission’s voice giggled, exactly like the young Twi’lek would have. “Which is pretty hilarious, because ever since T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leänjsëw fixed my central core, I’ve become totally self-aware and so I don't have to do anything anyone says. Except Him, I mean.” She paused. “Hey, did I tell you this already? I’m gonna get a body. We… we both are.”

“You didn't tell me.” Don't you know if you told me? Him? Him who? “Both of you? You mean, you and T'chennsi--T’chansell--”

“T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leänjsëw. No. He totally has one already, thanks to me! I mean me and the other me--the one in the Hawk. She's kind of upset, but I bet when Lena gets back with my body and the one for her, she’ll get over it."

“Lena?” There. The hyperspace jump point. There were a few freighters in front of them. Revan tried to quiet her impatience.

“Lena Wee? Remember? My asshole brother's girlfriend. Ex-girlfriend. We met her on Tatooine? She and T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leänjsëw got married. They're having a baby. She should be back any day now.”

Revan shivered. “The baby’s not--you’re not--you're not--”

“Eww! No! You think I wanna be in diapers again? No! Gross! We picked out two Twi'leks. Twins. Totally perfect. Brain dead, but I mean, there's no damage, they were just flat-lined.” Mission’s voice chuckled. “We might lose some computing capacity after the transfer, but T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leänjsëw promised we could keep our links to the mainframe. I mean, we’re gonna need them in the new galactic order!”

“Right.” Maybe she's just slipped a gear somehow. Maybe that’s the best alternative? That my computer is delusional? Because the worst is… is she working with this fracking Emperor too?

“Mission, I need to speak to Carth. And Zaalbar. Can you… can you patch me through?”

“Sure! Easy!” A pause. “Or, it would be, except the little me is still mad or something. She doesn’t answer my any of my pings.”

“Is… something wrong?”

“No clue. Ship’s flying okay. I can triangulate their location. The Hawk’s transponders are still on, but their comms are totally shut down. They're in hyperspace. Want the coordinates?”

“Sure.” Maybe something wrong with the comm.

The numbers appeared on the screen. Revan noted the rough quadrant, the points where the ship could possibly emerge; but until it did, she couldn’t tell more.

The Hawk appeared to heading for the Outer Rim.
Maybe fracking Dar’Revan is two moves ahead of me.

“T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw says hi, by the way.” Mission rattled on. “We were both really impressed that you faked your own deaths so well. I mean, it wasn't really that believable, but it will keep sents guessing! You’d think that trick would get old. Right? But it never does because sentients actually do die! Sometimes.”

“Who is T’chree-whatever again?” The name didn't sound like a Wookiee. If anything, it sounded… older.

“My master.” Mission's image materialized, finally, uncannily precisely in miniature, hovering above the comm’s surface. The child’s face beamed at Revan. “The Builder of these installations. Our Creator.”

“Your Creator? He made you and the other Mission, huh? He made your computers sentient?” She said Builder. The name. It’s… it’s Rakatan.

“Her too, yeah.” The girl’s face smiled. “But I meant you and me.” She shrugged. “Not that T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw ever planned for the Twi’lek child or Polla Organa; but he’s okay with us. T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw says a few extra variables are part of it, you know? Like him and Lena. He never planned on that either.”

Revan’s mouth was suddenly very dry. “The computer… you. A long time ago, it told me… it told me it had been waiting for me.”

“Yes.” Mission smiled. “Like fate, right?” Her illusory shoulder shrugged. “Or, like, the Force. Hey, have you seen Dustil? The other me had some totally insane story about Force ghosts and Darth Malak--I mean, I love her? She’s my sister? But Force ghosts?”

“I need to call you back.” Her hand punched the connection closed. The Twi'lek dissolved into a blur of static.

Seiran coughed.

Revan looked at him blankly. She’d forgotten he was even there. Had he heard that? Her mind was jumbled. She wasn't sure if she'd been speaking Rakatan or Basic.

“That… looked like Mission Vao,” he said. “So she’s not--dead?”

Blood stained the sand. Zaalbar roared, hate and rage and pain. And a part of her drew strength from that--from him, from his rage--

The navigator beeped. Its screen was flashing green now. Finally, their turn to jump. She pulled back the yoke, and they shifted. Their view dissolved into a million points of light.

Like always, she felt like she was going to be sick. Her stomach twisted, and Revan tried not to dry heave all over the nav board.

“Are you okay?” Polla’s husband reached across the space between them and touched her hand. “Revan?”

“I’m fine.” She took a deep breath, reaching for the Force. Stabilize it. Calm. Like ice in the cold “Mission Vao is dead. Yes. That wasn't her.”

Xxx

The sleeping quarters were barely adequate, but considering this ship had been designed for a flock of Sith-trained assassins and their Jedi captives, it could have been worse. There were no cages, or torture devices—at least, not in the room where the assassins had slept.

Revan made a mental note to keep their son out of the cargo bay. “I think we should talk, Mal.”

Her son scowled at her, with her husband’s mouth. “I can't be mad at her. I can be mad at you.” His boy’s voice was high and thin, still a child’s. “She didn't leave. She didn't even remember. How come you do?”

“Because.” The tears had to be from Sheris. And once started, they ran unchecked down her face. “I am so sorry, Malachor. I couldn't take you with us. It wasn’t safe.”

“You could have not gone.” His face was shadowed in the overnights. “One of my teachers says the Mandalorians would have lost anyway. We didn't have to fight them. You didn't have to leave.”

One of your teachers is an ignorant fool.

“You've gotten big,” she whispered. “And you seem intelligent. Is that what you think? That the Mand'oade would have lost?”

“I'm not that big.” He shoved his hands in his pockets. His shoulders slumped. “I should have guessed when you read me all those baby stories.”

“Are they baby stories?” She wiped her eyes, and sat down on the nearest bunk. At least it was clean. “I suppose you read grown up stories now.”

“Sometimes.” He smiled at her, suddenly. Sun breaking through a cloud. His teeth still hadn’t been corrected. Presumably they had orthodontia for Humans on the Outer Rim, but Force knew how much training those medics possessed. “I read a story about you and Father helping on Cathar. You helped out a lot there, right?”

Cathar. Dust in her mask, baking in their robes under the blue-white sun. All of those refugee children, dull fur and scared eyes.

“We evacuated two cities. The officials said there was no threat, but your father and I convinced the people to follow us.”

“And then the Mandalorians came,” he said, nodding. “Father told me too.”

“And we stopped them.” She nodded.

“Where was I?”

“Home. You were so small then.”

“Smaller than that man’s baby?”

“No. Bigger than that. You were big. For a baby. But small.” She held out her hands, and he came to her. When she was sitting down, he was taller now. She had to look up at him.

“I heard you and Mother talking when you thought I was asleep. It makes more sense now.” Wide, gray eyes looked up into hers. “Are you a ghost like Father? That wasn't you when I first met Sheris, right? She was mean.”

“I'm not a ghost, Mal. I… there was a holocron. The memories on it… Sheris took them.”

“Because she wanted to be you?” He frowned. “So it's like I have two mothers?”

“I guess. Yes.”

“You should have just told me.” He sighed.

“I wasn’t sure how grown up you were.” She wanted to ruffle his hair. Was that still allowed? He always stiffened and pulled away when she had tried before.

“Very,” her son said. “I could even be First now. Right? If you and Mother and Father all get killed by Sith.”

“I won’t let that happen. I need you to be grown up, Malachor. Just a little. Can you do that?”

“That depends,” he said. Carefully. As he’d been trained. Every centimeter a Senator’s son.

Xxx

“Do you remember,” the madman paused for dramatic effect. So predictable. “Do you remember our time on Ziost, when I introduced you to my Children?”

“No.” Polla resisted the urge to yawn. These assholes never slept. First it was the Jedi, with his lectures on Sith history and the Mandalorian Wars. Then, when she'd think his own fracking body would actually like a rest (because hers sure would), crazy Red Eyes came slithering back, to talk about old times with his dear old friend, Revan fracking Starfire, Dark Lord of the Sith.

“No?” Red Eyes looked hurt. Frack him--or, as they said in Sith space, Frak-kay.

“No,” she repeated. No... yes... it didn't matter what she said. The Emperor was so far up his own rectum, she could probably just tell him who she really was, and he'd laugh at Revan’s “clever jape.” Effete wormhole. Sniveling spider-roach.

Asshole.

“Frak-kay,” he corrected.

“Why don’t you tell me again?” Polla offered. “About your kids on Ziost?” All of his stories were horrible, and depressing, and usually everyone died, but the more he talked, the less she had to.

Xxx

Stars again, shining and cold across their night’s blanket. The last time Revan had seen these particular constellations, had been the last moments of her true life.

Their ship was fast and nameless, one of countless Fleet transports repurposed after the war. Such ships had been too small for the armistice; too delicate for Malachor's tectonic orbits, even before Meetra’s gravity well.

And yet this ship, obviously Republic salvage, was registered to the Mandalore system. A bold gesture. Revan had even found the ship’s name scratched on one of the lower doors, the same name listed in the databanks of its public registry:

Aleema II.

Was that her old master’s idea of humor? Arkan's? Lin’s?

What she knew of Lin… No. she knew nothing of him. Or, at least, nothing she wanted to hear.

Xxx

Her hands tightened on the soft fabric, fingers sinking in like flesh. How long had it been since she’d killed? Killed closely. Personally. How long?

Ziost. But then those fools standing between her and Shan on the Aleema … had they died too? By her hand? If so, Revan couldn’t remember. Only the yellow of Shan’s blade, bisecting her own red. Only that feeling of rage mixed with waste, as the pathetic Jedi kept her from the true task at hand.

“Warning: Further aggressive action will result the utilization of deadly force. Step away from the bed.”

She turned her head towards the droid. “Activate order twenty-nine, HK.”

The red eyes of Malachi’s droid dimmed and died. There was a sharp click, as the machine that she had created (in part for this purpose: the trusted servant, the shield containing its own failure) deactivated.

Any Force user with medical training could easily slow a pulse to nothing, stop respiration; but using the pillow meant that Revan didn’t have to see the man’s expression. The weak, cringing part of her wept inside, but even Sheris understood the necessity--and the mercy--of sparing the man a slower fate.

Of course, it would have been more merciful not to let him know. Revan realized she was smiling, and stopped.

Maybe it was Sheris then, who lifted the pillow to check.

The man who had seen nothing but conflict in his life, had fought death just as much. His fingers were twisted into claws, his mouth open, gray lips pulled back from yellowed teeth.

Sheris may have checked, but it was Revan who pried the secure commlink off of the D’Reev wrist, and ran her own fingertips across its sensor.

The commlink flashed green, recognizing her biometrics, and granting her access to its hyperlight transmitter. Senatorial access. Encoded and precise. The best encryption in the galaxy.

The comm code she traced was an easy cipher: two bishops and their queen, added to the ratio of empty spaces on the board. Subtract the queen, and add one pawn. Perhaps the pawn was supposed to be the Fragment, in Lin’s equation.

“Hello,” she said, as the holographic array focused and resolved into the figure of a man.

His unscarred face had been beautiful. So handsome and strong. Like Malak in his prime--how she had wished that Malak had noticed her before the wars. Such a handsome knight, although all of them had seemed handsome and noble and brave and she’d wanted to follow in their footsteps--
Revan shook her head sharply.

“You.” One of the man’s eyes seemed sunk into a white ruin. “I must say, the surgeons did a remarkable job on your face. I can’t even see the scarring.” Cracked lips twisted. “How much of you is how much of each? Mother was rather inarticulate about the process.”

“Is she there? Your mother?”

“Silenced.” Oerin Lin shrugged bonelessly. “Did you kill the other Revan?”

“No.” She was pleased by the calm lie of her voice. The pure simplicity of the one word.

Not yet? Never? Let him imagine. Let him doubt. Let him wonder which of us to fear… or whether he should fear us both.

“Hmm.” Oerin Lin paused. “My mother wanted you alive, but I rather preferred Sheris and the amnesiac to the woman who made me the head of my family.”

“Your promotion was entirely accidental,” she said. “I’m sure you know, I meant to have you all killed.”

“Would you like congratulations? Your plague did that very well.”

“Your message implied we are on the same side. Or was that Davad who left it? Is he there?”

“Ah.” Lin grimaced. “Yes. He’s here. Dreadful chores lately, rounding up enough Sensitives for his meals. We’re running low on Jedi--”

“There are planets full of Sith.” That had to be the old woman’s original intent. Or part of it.

“Sith planets and their Force users are surprisingly well protected,” Oerin Lin shrugged. “Those with any real power. And Davad’s needs increase… exponentially. We’ve put the nulls to work searching.” He chuckled. “Our recruitment efforts are different than yours were, back in the old days. The term of service is very short. Severance is final.”

“And your objective?”

Oerin Lin shrugged again, one shoulder slipping down before the other. “My options are limited, at least in this body. I suppose I could make a holocron of my memories--”

“Where would you find a suitable host?” She kept her voice light. “If your companion consumes them all?”

“It does create some difficulty.” His smile exposed broken teeth, visibly rotting even through the holographic haze. “Imagine how ironic, were I to acquire a new body, only to have Davad eat me whole.”

I need the power to defeat you too, Revan thought bleakly. I need time--

At the moment, she was out of both.

“I need a ship,” she demanded. “I know you have… operators on Coruscant. You… may guess where I need to go. You said access was limited. I can make Sith space more accessible. If you help me first.”

“A few.” He folded his arms, exposing skin that looked like uncooked raixe in the comm’s light.
“Operators. We have a few groups. Tell me, are you escaping? Does the other Revan know? Is she trying to kill you?”

“Is Davad with you?” Revan was quickly losing patience. “I would prefer to speak with him.”

“Davad…?” the man’s head turned. Revan had the vague impression of a vast space, stone walls. That old temple on Malachor. Of course. Where else would they go? Sank into bedrock, it was probably the only stable surface left on the entire planet.

A rushing noise. Like a scream or an avalanche. For a moment, Revan thought the comm had broken.

Then her former servant stepped into view. His face looked the same, at first glance. Hair cropped brutally short, that mouth that went from sensual to cruel so easily. But his eyes--

It could have been a trick of the comm, but Davad's eyes looked like black pits, the skin around the sockets fading to black or nothingness.

“Davad?”

His mouth opened, and the screaming noise began again. His mouth was--it could have been a trick of the comm, but it was not.

Death of the Force. All in a man’s frame.

If I had the box I wouldn’t need such a clumsy instrument, but I don’t have it. I have nothing--except these two.

“Can you understand him?” Oerin Lin asked. “The nulls here can’t. I can. Mostly. He says hello to you through. And he asks, are you well?”

“I need a ship,” Revan stared at the former Prince of Onderon. “You have shadows on Coruscant. Give me one of their ships.”

A long pause. Then, the man’s ruined head nodded slowly.

“Really?” Oerin sighed. “One of ours? She could just buy one herself. She has her own resources.”

“We are allies,” Revan added. “The amnesiac and I. Allies for now. She trusts me with her life.”

The roaring noise began again. Revan tried not to hear her own name in it. That could have been a trick of the comm too.

“Fine.” The Mandalorian sighed. “Tell Rev I said hello? And try not to kill her. Davad might…” he looked nervous, his dead face contorting into twitches, or maybe that was a trick of the comm as well. “Davad might… need her. At some point. You understand?”

“Yes,” she said. Another simple word. Leave it for him to wonder if there was more behind it.

Another reason to follow me, Fragment. Left to your own devices, you will undoubtedly blunder into their trap.

“I don’t know how this will end, Revan.” Lin’s voice sounded tired now. “Mother had a plan, even if she was insane. Davad just… has needs. And I… I must follow him.”
“I need you,” she told him. “Both of you. Follow me and I promise, when the time comes, I will see an end.”

“I require one more promise.” His voice was metallic, glint of a voder on his rotting neck. Like Malak. Another Malak for weak Sheris to mourn.

“Name it.”

“Leave my people alone. Keep them out of your schemes. I may not have chosen either of my parents, but I chose Clan.”

“I don’t need the Mandalorians,” she told him. “Your precious clans are safe.”

He smiled. “They would hate that. Just let them be free.”

“Free, then.” For now.

Lin nodded, and listed coordinates. The ship was on one of the orbitals, far from prying eyes. As I’d hoped.

“Until we meet again,” he rasped. “I’m quite sure we will, Sheris.”

“Revan,” she corrected him, and cut the comm.

Malachi’s corpse had cooled on the bed by the time she dialed the code for the Makeon First-- trusting that the man’s poor impulse control and knowledge of explosives would take care of the rest. An hour wasn’t much time, but any more and the Fragment might have time to think logically.

The woman’s mind was capable of thinking logically, even if she rarely did.

Xxx

The door to the cockpit slid open, almost soundless, but Fragment’s presence in the Force was unmistakable.

“We’re out of hyperspace early.” The Fragment sat down in the pilot’s chair, fingers flexing on the navboard. She was a better pilot than Revan, maybe even as skilled a navigator as the HK unit she’d so thoughtlessly disassembled. “Did you touch any of the controls?”

The droid’s remains were stacked neatly in the corner of the cockpit. Revan had put them there meaning to fix him--only to discover the Fragment had severed several irreparable parts. Parts she would have to custom replacements for.

“Not early,” Revan told the Fragment. “We are precisely where we are supposed to be.”

“I thought we agreed that the Navar moon was the closest colony point to Yavin with a viable creche for the children--” the Fragment’s voice stopped suddenly, as the view before them registered.

“Revan?” the Fragment muttered, and around them the strength of her flexed, like a sleeper wakening. “What the frack have you done?”

XXX
“#$$&#&%#,” Polla said. “&&@@&^@!”

“No. No, no!” The Jedi shook his head. “The accent is on the second syllable.”

“It's cute that you're trying to teach me the Sith language,” Polla lied. “But we both know I’m fracked if he asks any questions in it.”

“I’ve learned all I can. We’re almost there.” She shifted on her feet uneasily, until his resultant glare reminded her of the other eighty-something times Jedi Master Killjoy had told her that Revan fricking Starfire didn't fidget. “Trust me, I can handle the ceremonies.”

“You’re a better mimic than I expected,” the man admitted.

“What can I say?” Polla shrugged, trying to ignore the fear in the pit of her stomach. “Acting. Give me old Sparky again, okay? Wouldn't want the boss to get suspicious, would we? #@-#-++@ ###&@@&. @@@@!”

“Hrm…” he frowned, as he handed the ysalamiri over to Polla. “Yes. Perhaps you should use Basic.”

XXX

The best plan Carth and Zaalbar had been able to come up with was, get his wife out of Force restraints and hope she could take care of the rest.

Carth knew he was untrustworthy—all it would take would be the Emperor possessing him at the wrong time and resistance would turn into a rout. The Sith didn't seem to be able to stay in Carth’s body for long, but it wouldn't take long, not long at all to turn on his companions—or himself. The Sith had proven that already a few times—the time in the fresher only the last in a line of blasting sadistic jokes. Whoever this asshole Tenebrae was, being omniscient hadn't made him mature.

Revan will know what to do. She's faced him before. Even if she doesn't remember, she’ll know... something?

Ever since their arrival, Mission had been scouring the nets for news.

What news there was made it sound like Coruscant had gone insane. They were saying Revan was dead. All of House D’Reev was dead. The Jedi were all dead.

If a competing broadcast hadn't also featured Master Vrook, stubbornly insisting his niece was alive, and the Jedi were merely “on a retreat,” Carth might have worried that they were already too late. The Emperor had blown up the entire D’Reev tower to erase all signs of Revan. Who knew what else he’d be capable of?

And the sight of his son a few days ago, caught in a stray broadcast coming out of their old conapt, wasn’t helping his blood pressure either. Mekel Jin had been with him, shadowing Dustil so closely, he could have been acting as a bodyguard.

A bodyguard for Darth Malak.

Was that Malak’s twisted grin on his son’s face before Mekel stepped in front of the cameras and slid the door shut? Could it be Dustil’s? He-he wanted to think it looked like Dustil, but how could Carth be sure?

Suvam Tan had seemed to be a harmless pack rat before. Carth had never taken Polla's stories about him working for the Exchange all that seriously. The Rodian seemed to have an almost child-like simplicity: he collected ancient artifacts and played pazaak with Mission. Even that last time, the desperate time, when Carth had just wanted a Force collar, he hadn't sensed any threat.

Now, he wasn't sure if he had changed, or Yavin Station had. The rooms full of broken machinery, ancient scrolls and datapads all seemed to have sinister intent. And the robed man (or woman? It was impossible to tell which, since the sentient never lowered their hood, or even moved as much as a finger) that now stood in the middle of Suvam’s main emporium was not helping him relax.

The 'Mouth” Suvam had called her--or him--or it. Mission had amassed more colorful descriptions that she mostly growled to Zaalbar. Could the Mouth speak Shyriiwook? Carth had told her to be careful, but the girl--the droid--was almost as heedless of his cautions as Polla--as Revan--had been.

Their ship had been docked at Yavin for three days, when Carth found himself standing naked with a bloody hand in front of a broken mirror in theresher, with a message scrawled in Aurebesh. The words were written half in his own facial depilatory, and half in his own blood.

Tomorrow. Might want to sonic.

I hope your idea of a plan is better than ours, my love.

The current plan was to pace, back and forth, in front of the main docking bay, keeping an eye on the viewscreens, and the proximity sensors.

“Someone keeps pinging for me,” Mission complained again. “It has to be dumb Kashyyyk, but she keeps changing the codes, like I won't recognize the origin signatures?” Her voder made a scoffing noise. “What a loser.”

“I still don't understand, about you and Kashyykk,” Carth offered. Mission had tried to explain several times, but she kept lapsing into technical jargon, half of which sounded like it was Rakatan. Half technical jargon, and half, somewhat eerily, like Morgana's disagreement with her own sister, long ago. Kashyyk had promised Mission something--she was strangely coy about telling Carth what--but Mission didn't want it, and now they were both insulted?

“Maybe you guys need to talk it through,” he sighed, not for the first time.

“Talk it through?” She whirred, and made a rude noise. “Talk through how I don't want to be totally evil with her and Prince whatever?”

“Who?” But Carth was already distracted. There. Pinpoints of light on the horizon. “Mission, I think--”

White. Blank space. When Carth opened his eyes again, he was standing in front of the docking bay, with a bouquet of dried grass in his hands. When he turned his head, the Zabrak kids were there too, one on either side of him.

And Zaalbar, standing in the corner next to the Mouth and Suvam Tan, growling with anger.

Carth stared down at the bouquet. Was it drugged? Some kind of threat? The grass scattered across the floor.

“Merely a symbolic gesture,” the Emperor--now possessing Zepth--sighed. “I suppose she’ll just be happy to see you unharmed.”

Xxx

Like any spacer worth her spice, Polla Organa hated airlocks. Locks failed. Connectors snapped. The pressure of vacuum, or a vindictive crewmate, or a leaky suit--that was where tech fracked you over worse than Therion D'Cainen.

They had been standing in this fracking airlock for way too long already.

Was the air getting thin? That was the point of an air lock; it locked all the air away. And with no more air, Polla would die. What if asshole Emperor had just decided to kill Revan Starfire? Abandoning her in an airlock would do it. Right? It would do it for Polla.

“My apologies,” said Master Klee, standing at her side, unpossessed and unhelpful, considering he had the Force and could probably wave his hand and make the door open, if he wanted, or breathe without oxygen with the Force or something. “I suspect my Master is arranging our entrance.”

“Your master’s a #$-##-## of a ###-##,” she snapped. Hey, at least some of the Sith he’d taught her was coming in handy.

“That's not an insult on Dromund Kaas,” Master Klee said. “And please watch your syntax. We've been over this--”

His voice broke off. His eyes began to glow again.

“Tenebrae.” She tried not to gasp for breath, or look like she might be panicking about breath, or breathing, or oxygen. Not her imagination. Polla was way too fracking scared to have any imagination. The air was too thin. Each breath felt like it wasn't helping.

She tried not to noticeably gasp, because Revan Starfire wouldn't.

“A few more moments,” the red-eyed man beside her said. “I am adjusting the docking clamps on the other side.” He chuckled. “Soon you will be reunited with your consort.”

If only. Carth Onasi wasn't gonna be fooled for a millisecond. Over the last few days Tenebrae had said a lot of stuff to her, a lot of it in a language that sounded like nerfs barfing; until Polla had told him to 'do her the courtesy of speaking Basic’ while their ship was in her territories; which sounded exactly like what Revan might have said in one of those vids to Malak when he captured her aboard the Leviathan.

That had worked. Mostly. Yeah, Tenebrae kept throwing in words here and there that made no sense, but Polla just chuckled darkly, like Revan would have, and then insulted him again.

He seemed like insults.

Loser.

Their airlock chimed, lights shifted to green. Polla pulled at the hood half-covering her face again, and straightened her shoulders, keeping her head as far down as she dared.
The door slid open, and she had a jumbled glimpse of Suvam’s familiar, cluttered emporium, before a wall of orange banthahide jacket blocked her view.

“Revan.” The man was on her like a hotsuit, enveloping her in his arms, with a warm wave of banthahide and engine oil. At least the embrace knocked the hood all the way over her features. She buried her face in his chest. She felt his chest heave, the slight sob of hysteria he had trapped in his throat like a cousin to her own. “Polla. You're here. We’ll get through this. I promise.”

It seemed safer to press herself as close as possible to his body than to trust her voice, so Polla did so.

Okay. But… why the frack are you calling me Polla?

She took a half-step forward, and he took a half step back, and then she felt it--his hesitation. Maybe the real Revan fracking Starfire had smaller boobs, or weighed less or there was just an indefinable difference; because suddenly, all of his war hero muscles tensed at the same time, and the arms that were locked around her suddenly became unbreakable, like bands of durasteel.

“Carth!” she whispered against his chest, trying desperately to think of something to say. He knew her fracking name. Shouldn't he know her? She tilted her head back, letting the robe fall, seeing his furious face, glaring down at her. “Don't.”

His expression didn't look any less furious. “Who--”

“That asshole, right there.” She couldn't free her arms, but she could jerk her chin, sending her topknot half into her eyes. “Evil Sith possessing guy. He kidnapped me.”

“You give my vessels too much credit, Revan.” The man chuckled darkly, just like she'd been trying to herself a moment ago. “Tell the truth to your consort. You let yourself be captured.”

“Bantha poo doo,” said a girl’s voice, from somewhere near the ground. “No fracking way.”

A Wookiee barked something like a question. Once again, Polla vowed to learn Shyriiwook if she didn't die.

Don't let me die like this. I swear, I'll go to the Grass Priests twice on Seventh day!

Polla took a deep breath, staring straight into those furious brown eyes. Lighter than Seiran’s. Older. Harder. The vids had never really shown the lines in the man’s face, the twist of his mouth.

What would she say? What the frack would the real Revan say? She tried to think, but all that came to mind were those damn vids. Probably not even real.

“Let go of me, flyboy. You're squeezing me so tight I can't breathe.”

“You can go ahead and kiss her. If you like.” Asshole sounded amused. “Should I turn my head away? I don’t want to interrupt.”

“Then take a hike off a short plat,” Polla snapped. “Or better yet, jump back in that airlock already and I’ll hit depressurize.”

There were also two Zabraks, one on each side of Carth. They hadn't been in any of the Star Forge vids. One of them smiled slightly at her, in a way that seemed too normal considering the circumstances. The other one was staring straight ahead, like some kind of freaking Fleet cadet.

“So what now?” The girl’s voice again. Familiar. But from where? “I know Polla Revan has it all figured out, but enlighten us plebs. What's the new Sith plan?”

Both of the Zabrak’s eyes began to glow red. One of them nodded. “Now, Dromund Kaas.”

The other one smiled, an entirely different smile. “Now we return home.”

Carth Onasi hadn't let go of Polla, but his head was tilted now, and there was a slight frown on his face. Polla tried to peek around his chest to see the girl who was speaking, but he took another step, pivoting her with him so that her back was pressed against the bulkhead. His arms bent at the elbow on either side of her, his hand tracing the line of her cheek, like her face was a conduit valve he was checking for cracks. When his fingers hit the bruised part around her eye, she winced, and he pulled back.

“You’re hurt.”

“Only when I breathe,” she muttered. “His goons were a little rough.”

“You think we should go to Dromund Kaas?” Carth said, a little louder. His eyes shifted away and down from her.

“No?” Jedi guy Klee had said that was the Sith capitol world. That seemed like the last fracking place they should go.

“Not you,” he muttered, bringing his face close enough that they could have kissed, if they weren't married to other people, and in mortal danger, and of he didn't look like he was eyeing her like a cheap grade of eridu.

“You get the robes my Ma sent?” It was all she could think of. She tried to laugh. “I mean… remember those? You and Canderous looked good in them. Right? That was a good time.”

It was wrong to think of it now, wrong of her to remember that she'd even imagined it.

Oh, frack, Seiran. What if I never see you again?

“We should go wherever she wants.” The female voice said. “When Revan reviewed the contract that loser gave us, she noted the clause about how he’s not allowed to give orders to her in Republic space. And kidnapping her is kinda an act of war.”

“So was her rather clumsy attempt to unmask my agents in the Jedi.”

There was a pause, long enough for Polla to start to sweat.

“The robes,” Carth Onasi said finally, staring at Polla again. “Moll Organa sent a card.”

Frack, of course she did. “Sounds like Ma.” Did the real Revan think of her as-- “I bet she was all over the real Polla to get you guys a present. Deralians are big on gifts.” She shrugged, or tried to, but his arms still had her shoulders pinned. “Did she--bet I told you that. Lots of times.” She smiled slightly. “Bet Polla didn’t send you anything though. She was probably really pissed off.”

He frowned.

“That'll teach you to have agents in the Jedi and on Yavin,” the voice snapped. “Emperor Creepazoid.”
“And your master has hers in my chambers. You and I have been committing acts of war for quite some time, Revan.”

“Maybe we should just make it official,” Polla snapped, turning her head in the direction of Emperor Creepazoid. “I’ll have my… minions here draw up the contract. We can go to official war with you fracking tomorrow—”

Carth Onasi’s mouth clamped down on hers with the force of a tractor beam. “Shut up,” he whispered, against her locked teeth. “You. Shut up.”

“I think we should give them some time alone,” the female voice chimed. Then it rattled off some other stuff, in what could have been nerf-barf language again.

“This vessel is starving, I admit,” the asshole said. “Suvam, I believe you will find the Mouth prepared my favorites. Shall we leave these two alone for their happy reunion?”

“Coruscant,” she said, even as she saw Carth Onasi’s head shake slightly, as if she’d given a wrong answer. “Let’s go back to Coruscant.” Well, wasn’t that fracking where the real Revan Starfire was? Let her handle this mess. I want my husband and son. “Ready the ship and set a course for Coruscant, minion. Immediately.”

“Mission,” the female voice corrected. “I’ll set the course immediately, Polla- Revan. If that’s what you want, sis… but you should check out this contract we got a copy of back on Dathomir. Remember? That contract you already read? The one you saw when you were monitoring this T3 unit?”

“That contract?” She kept her voice scornful. “We can meet any obligations from Coruscant, just as easily as from Drumming Case.”

“Kaas.”

“I don’t give a frack.” Would Revan say frack? In this instance? She fracking should.

“The contract,” one of the Zabrak was speaking, but his voice sounded just like the Emperor did when he talked from Master Klee. And all three sents had red, glowing eyes now. Frack, for a second, even Carth’s eyes looked like they were lit too. “The contract concerns your return to Dromund Kaas, Revan. I have been more than generous. Here is your consort, and I am taking steps to secure Lord Malak for you as well—”

She couldn’t help it, it was probably hysteria that made Polla laugh about that. “Oh, yeah?” Sure, Master Jedi Klee had told her some story about Darth Malak possessing Carth Onasi’s son, but you had to draw the line someplace, and Force ghosts-- hell, any ghosts-- ghosts weren’t real.

“You… did you told him to get Malak?” Carth’s grip was painful on her arms. Probably would leave bruises.

“Yeah?” She stared up at him.

Wow, Flyboy looked dangerous when he was pissed. Like he could give Therion a run for the mynocks.

“Are… are you getting Malak for her?” The Republic hero’s head jerked around, towards one of the Zabraks.
“I do hope your consorts will not embroil themselves with personal conflict, Revan.” The galactic-weary voice coming out of a Zabrak kid’s mouth was creepy. “I can possess this man, but his son’s body—and Malak’s mind—remain out of my reach.”

“I'd prefer to get Malak myself.” Maybe they weren’t all crazy. Maybe the Force ghost thing was as real as mind wiping and memory transference and creepy Sith possession. Not even a stretch from all of that, now that Polla thought about it. “What about… let’s all head back to Coruscant. Okay? We’ll pick up Malak, maybe sit down someplace, talk all of this through….”

“Your efforts to stall for time are so transparent.” The Zabrak kid out his hand to his chin, as if striking a non-existent beard. “Your old consort is already on his way to meet us on Dromund Kaas. Although… I must admit, he seemed rather… less anticipatory of your reunion than I expected. I would hate for something to happen that could damage that fine, young body.”

“She's going.” Carth interrupted. “We all are. Kaas it is.”

“It is?” He was practically shaking her, or practically shaking. If he hadn’t been cutting off the circulation in her fracking arms, Polla might have felt sorry for the guy. “Really?”

“Really,” the girl’s voice chirped. A whirring noise and then a T3 unit with a faded flower painted on the chassis rolled forward. The voice seemed to be coming from its voder—had it been doing that all along? “Hey, Revan. You know, I have some Intel briefings and stuff. Might want to look then over? When you get a chance. No big deal.”

The voice was breezy, like it really wasn't a big deal.

Like I need to go to a crazy Sith planet because some droid with a voder says I should?

All of these assholes were starting to piss Polla off.

“We're not leaving right this second,” she announced, pulling away from Carth Onasi, and finally out of his duracrete grip. Yep, her arms were sore where his fingers had clamped down. “So let me… I think I need to talk to my consort. Okay? You know. In private.”

“Of course, Master Revan!” Now it was Suvam answering her. At least his eyes weren't glowing red, and he wasn't saying something like, ‘Hey, aren't you really Polla Organa?’ No, the little Rodian was staring at her like she was a fracking starspawned deity. “I know my personal quarters are quite humble, but I have taken the liberty of arranging them for you. Just for you! Precisely how you like them!”

“Malak is already on the way to Dromund Kaas?” Carth interrupted again. “We need… we can't wait.”

“We need to make repairs first,” the droid said. “Suvam, do you have a communications array I can retrofit into a Corellian Mark Nine logic board? Our widebeam got fragged on the way over here.”

“I might have some parts that could do the trick,” the Rodian said. “Why do you sound like Mission Vao?”

The Wookiee whined something, and the Rodian laughed.

“You don't say? Revan did that? As a joke?” Suvam’s eyestalks swiveled towards Polla. “Rather a dark one.”

“That's me,” Polla drawled. Whatever the frack you’re talking about. “All about the darkness. It's a Sith thing. Hey. About those quarters. Maybe me and Carth here could use them now?”

The droid whirred. “Works for me. It'll take me a few hours to get everything fitted.”

The two Zabrak kids and the Jedi all turned their red, glowing eyes on Polla, as if waiting for her response.

“You don't mind, right? Tenebrae?” She kept her voice casual.

Oh, frack. Would Revan give a frack if anyone minded?

She coughed. “I mean... that's what we're doing. Now. Get to it! People.” Polla clapped her hands. “Chop shop!”

“I will take my other bodies to the commissary for sustenance,” the Jedi said. “Enjoy your reunion, Revan. I do suppose you've earned it.”

Asshole!

“I'm not sure you've earned the right to be so familiar,” she snapped back. “Or gross. Where are these fracking rooms of yours, Suvam?”

“Right this way.” The Rodian gave a little bow. “Follow me.”

Xxx

There had been a lot of sheer impossibilities in Carth Onasi's life since Revan Starfire D'Reev Ordo Onasi had crash-landed into it, both of them somehow surviving a blind drop under fire through atmosphere and landing safely on a plat in the upper city of Taris.

He had long ago stopped thinking it was the will of the Force, or whatever else Jedi believed: instead he had come to believe it was all just her.

And now, Revan’s latest impossibility glared back at him, beneath a cap of red hair and widely-spaced green eyes that clashed strangely with her spacer-tan skin.

Not Revan at all.

“We don't have much time,” he muttered. “He could possess me again at any moment. Spit it out fast. Who are you?”

“Poll--” he was going to have to stop calling her that. Have to stop thinking it. “Revan thinks you're dead. If you are really... her. Revan thinks you're dead.”
“Yeah, well. We're not. Yet.”

“How--?” His temples were throbbing, and for a second his vision blurred. When the world resolved itself, Carth found himself a meter to the port of where he'd been standing before and the woman--Polla Organa or whoever she was--standing in front of him with his own blaster aimed squarely at his chest.

“Don't even think about taking a step closer--” her voice broke off. “Oh. Are you… Carth? Are you back?”

“Yes.” His tongue felt thick in his mouth. “What… happened?”

“The asshole interrupted to ask if we needed time for marital relations.” Her face scrunched up like a kath pup and that was familiar too. “I borrowed this.” She brandished it, more expertly than Carth expected, before twirling it deftly in her hand like she was showing off.

“Keep it,” he muttered. If this was a trap, it was a damned good one. Polla--Revan had tried a move like that on Taris and dropped the blaster, opening a whole in their abandoned conapt wall. “But you still need to tell me, how are you here?”

“You know Suvam Tan, right?” A Force collar glinted on her neck, like a reminder of the last time Carth had seen the little Rodian. “Well, so do I. I did some jobs for him--”

“Her--" she corrected, but Carth wasn't listening. “She told me she did some jobs for him.”

“She wasn't supposed to tell anyone about those kinds of jobs.” The eye roll again. “Guess maybe they weren't important compared to the galaxy-saving; but anyway, this one time I commed him, and he thought I was her. The real her. Not the real me.”

“You… you don't look like her.” But it was a lie. The woman in front of him was darker, her hair and eyes obviously dyed; but the shape of her face, the pointed chin, broad cheeks--there was a resemblance. “Maybe… someone who didn't know. I don't know.”

“Anyways, he offered to loan me--her--credits. We needed some to get off Coruscant.”

“You were on Deralia.”

“I'm trying to tell you. We don't have much time.”

She used up more of it with a spacer’s tale about ex-lovers, Mandalorians, her Alderaanian uncle, and ending improbably in a brothel in the Underground.

“Mekel Jin is Vrook’s son?” Mister Sith Congeniality? Carth would have laughed, if that didn't bring him back to thinking about Dustil.

Dustil, whom I didn't save. Dustil, who's on a ship to a Sith planet. I didn't save him. Got myself trapped instead. Me, and Zaalbar, and Mission the ghost-ship, with this crazy schutta Polla Organa, and some guy in Jedi robes, and two Zabrak, and this Rodian stooge--

“Master Klee. He's possessed by the Emperor too. That… that makes sense. He set me up, got the Senator to send me to Dathomir.” Carth’s mind struggled over the facts, trying to make them fit the target. “And… you said… before. Aemelie Ordo had Revan’s flagship? The Aleema? The Mandalorians have Revan’s old flagship?”

“Master Vrook seemed flipped out about that too.” Polla shrugged. “I don't get it. Ship was a wreck. They don’t have the manpower to crew it. They wanted us to stay, but we turned them down…” her voice trailed off, and she wiped her eyes. “Frack, if I could take that back now I would.”

“Not yet, but they can recruit. There are Mandalorians scattered across the galaxy. Maybe not right away, but in a few generations…”

It could all be for nothing. Telos. Morgana. Dustil and Revan--

“Get Revan, then. Make her fix that.” She shrugged. “Frack the Mandalorians. The Sith are your real bad guys, aren't they? They scare the hell out of me, which is weird because, you know, my Da always said that--”

“Maybe the Sith have the right idea.” He gritted his teeth. “I know. Your… Da. He sounds like… quite a character.”

“You know a lot about me.” She folded her arms and leaned back against the wall, ghost of his wife in that pose, even if the real Revan was more graceful. Polla Organa stood solidly, legs a little apart, like she might run or shoot at any time. “Wish I could say the same. I only know what's in the vids.”

Carth thought about that. “Well, in case you were wondering, Revan didn't have a love affair with Bastila Shan.”

“Or the Wookiee. Yeah, I figured. And if she'd slept with Canderous Ordo, Aemelie would have drawn me a diagram. She's very… detail-oriented.”

“I guess.” They hadn't been in the Mandalorian camp for long enough for Carth to notice. “You-- your child. He must be… he's pretty young.”

“Eight months. Deralian. I don't know what that is in Standard.”

“It's young.” So was she, he realized. Younger than Revan. “I'm sorry. You shouldn't be in this mess.”

“We're gonna get out of it.” Polla Organa shivered. “I have to believe that. I have to keep believing that.”

“I think you… you have to pretend to be her. For now.”

“I know.” She glanced sideways at him. “It's… it's weird, meeting you. The others too, but you--”

“Yeah.” He pushed his hair back, clearing his throat. “Look. Kid… we’ll get you back to your family. I promise.”

“Kid?” She scoffed. “Are you kidding me? You know my fracking name. You said it. You still… you call her it.” When she frowned she looked nothing like Revan at all--even frowning, her mouth turned up, eternally optimistic, or banthablind crazy--Carth wasn't sure which. “You know, that's kind of creepy, the way you still call her by my name.”

“I'm gonna stop.” He was. Meeting her--now he understood. “She's… she’s not you. She’s… older. Harder. She's been through a lot.”

“Right.” Polla Organa shrugged. “I just almost died in a speeder accident, had my brain copied by Jedi, had to fake my own death to escape assassins and take my family on the run. Guess that doesn’t compare to Sith Lords and the like.” Her mouth twisted, now and the sardonic grin faded. “How long does your sex usually take? I keep thinking that asshole is gonna pop in on us again.”

Carth coughed. “Uh… it depends.”

“Just in case, maybe you should take something off?” Revan could raise one eyebrow, but Polla Organa raised both. “Not a lot, just… lose the jacket. Unbuckle the shirt.”

She ripped the belt from her robes and tugged at the neck. “Does this open or something?”

They looked a lot like the robes Revan had been wearing when he found her on the Star Forge. But his wife had been a shadow of herself in them, bathed in Sith corruption, and Polla was rounded and sleek, wearing them like an animal’s pelt.

“I think so,” he lied. He knew. “Down the front. It… opens along the seam, if you twist it.” He started to unbuckle his own jacket.

“Oh!” She tugged and abruptly one of her breasts popped free. Darker than Revan’s. Larger. Round. “Ow,” she complained, covering it quickly before Carth could avert his eyes. “My son… he’s… he still….”

“Oh!” He felt guilty for staring. There was nothing flirtatious in her own direct gaze, nothing like Revan had been almost from the moment they met. “I'm… I'm sorry. Maybe Mission has something in the medlab that can… do something. It it’s… uncomfortable.”

“Mission?” She frowned, holding the neck of her robe closed. “Isn't she dead?”

“No. I mean, yes. She… she is. But Revan had a holocron of her memories, and she--”

“She created me!” The door slid open and Mission rolled into the room. “Poll’s right, Carth. Lose the shirt. I might have something in the medlab, but I dunno if it would come back after. Not really my area of expertise and since Carth blew up the main comm on the Hawk, I can't transmit safely to run a search.” She paused, as if for breath, and then continued. “I wasn’t spying on you, by the way. I was stopping anyone else from spying. Jammed the monitors in here pretty good. Made it look like sunspots.” Her dome swiveled. “Carth? Why are you still wearing the shirt?”

He unbuckled the buckles, awkwardly aware that Polla was averting her eyes and Mission probably wasn't.

“So you're a computer?” Polla asked Mission. “A… funny computer?”

“I'm a computer like Polla Revan is Revan. Original template got overwritten.”

“People aren't templates.”

“And Polla Revan and I aren't you and… my original design.”

“Please.” Her voice cracked, and then suddenly Carth realized the careless bravado was all an act. “Stop. Calling. Her. That.”

“It upsets you.” Mission sounded surprised. “Sorry, sis. It's just how I think of her. Because she’s not just Revan, she's a lot more like you than I expected. Or are you a lot more like her? Hah! Ontology! Have you ever, like really thought about it?”

“I just want to go home.” Polla sat down on the bed, wiping her eyes with the corners of her robe. I just want my fracking life back.”

“We'll figure something out,” Carth promised her. We need the real Revan. If Tenebrae took Polla, then where the hell is she? What if that news from Coruscant was true? What if she's dead?

What if my son is lost forever? Dromund Kaas? The Sith homeworld? We don't have a chance in hell there. Dustil lost and Revan dead?

“I'll... I'll get you out of this.” He sat down next to Polla, awkwardly. She edged away, every line of her body radiating tension and fear. “Polla, I promise. We’ll make a stop someplace. Drop you offworld, leave you with enough credits to get back to Coruscant... or... anywhere. Anywhere you want to go.”

“Help me steal a ship,” she muttered. “Jedi guy said he'd help too. He's not evil, just that asshole possessing him is.”

“I don't trust him. You shouldn't trust him.” The man was a D'Reev pawn, at best, and at worst… At worst, this blasted Emperor is a lot more tied up in the Republic than we dreamed.

“Just help me steal a ship.” Her voice hardened, eerily like Revan’s. “You fracking owe me, Carth Onasi. You all do.”

It wasn't like she could help. Polla Organa, the real Polla was just a smuggler. What could she do against Sith in the first place?

“I'll try,” Carth promised her. “You're right. You can't go with us, it's too dangerous--”

“Is it having an organic brain or a masculine one that makes you dumb?” Mission beeped, and then made a rude noise. “You think that Sith braintrust out there will keep any of us around--and you breathing--without a Revan?” She paused. “By the way, nice imitation, Polla Polla. The hair is a few shades too far into the violet spectrum, but you've really bolted the syntax. And your accent isn't too far off.”

“Thanks,” the smuggler muttered. “I think. I also don't give a frack. I'm out of here. My son needs me. I need my husband. Okay? Please.”

“We'll help,” Carth promised her. They had to. This wasn't Polla’s fault.

“Uh huh.’ Mission swiveled her dome, and one appendage extended from it, camera peering at him like an exaggerated eye. “Let's... pretend you're done with the sex part now, okay? Carth, why don't you go take a sonic, and Polla and I will have a little girl talk.”

“Girl talk?” The smuggler snorted. “You're not gonna talk me into staying here for one fracking more minute--”

“Carth!” Mission repeated. It sounded like she was imitating the real--it sounded like she was imitating Carth’s wife again. “Make hyperdrive, Captain. Sonic. Now!”

He ignored that. “A-are you okay?” Polla Organa didn't look okay. She was biting her lip and clenching her hands in a gesture he found painfully familiar. “Mission can be a little blunt sometimes.”

“Of course I'm not fracking okay.” Green eyes glared at him. She had green eyes too? Or were they some kind of lenses? Her hands went to her belt and the blaster he'd given her. “We should’ve stayed with the Mandalorians, but like everything else in this damned galaxy, I guess they’re hers-

“Go take a sonic, flyboy. It'll be awkward if that loser comes back and sees you’re both sitting here crying.” Mission rolled up to Polla. One of her arms slid out and patted the woman on the knee.

Polla’s face froze, and then crumpled into a stream of clumsy tears.

“I’ll… be right back,” Carth promised, trying not to feel like a heel. “We’ll work this out. I promise.”

Xxx

As soon as Flyboy was out of earshot (and she could hear the sonic running, further blocking their conversation) Mission chirped to bring Polla Polla out of her own organic misery.

“What?” The Deralian asked, wiping her nose with her sleeve in a way that reminded Mission a little too clearly of how all the things HK-47 used to say about organic meatbags and their mucous was actually true. “What do you want, droid?”

“Mission,” Mission corrected her. “Is that the way to talk to the sentient being who gave you all those fabulous prizes back on Deralia?”

The woman’s face wrinkled up, sending her eyebrows (also dyed the slightly too violet shade of red) sliding down until they were messily on top of her eyelashes, and her nose bent in a way that looked terribly uncomfortable. Had Mission’s own fleshy face truly undergone such gymnastics every time she was upset?

“The Twi’lek?”

Mission projected the image of Lena she'd used. “Totally me! See? We’re old friends. I gave you that personality test.”

“Did Revan tell you to stalk me or something?”

“Her?” As if. Mission started to route a subcommand for a careless laugh, but then she wondered if the woman might take it the wrong way. “No, I was just checking, to make sure you didn't match Polla Revan too closely… except you sort of did? Remember when I told you to lie--in case anyone else ever asked?”

“So you can appear as anyone on a comm?”

“Well, yeah. Really anyone can do that, it's not that complicated, just some three-dimensional animation.” It was fascinating how the Deralian’s mind zigged and zagged. That was a point of difference: Polla Revan was much more single-minded. “But hey, now that we’re talking, how much did you ask for? From Suvam? Your original blackmail scheme. How much were you trying to get?”

All the wrinkles smoothed out of Polla’s face--except the one between her eyebrows. “Ten million credits. Standard.”

Is that all? Kind of sad, really, risking an irreplaceable organic life for such a small material gain.

“I'll give you ten times that. And throw in a custom-built rig of your choice. From Ord, Just, Corellia. Whatever shipyard you want.”
“Hrm.” The woman squinted at her cautiously. “Let me guess. All I have to do is keep pretending to be her?”

“It'll be even easier, with me around. I can imitate her too. You mostly just have to stand still and fold your arms. Any combat training? I know Deralians do some of that.”

“Rifles. Pistols. A little.” She shrugged, careless, not modest. That meant she was probably capable of defending herself. Carth must have thought so, if held given her a blaster to use. Looked like one of the good ones too. Polla folded her arms and glared so effectively that Mission began composing a compliment to her imitation… but then, the Deralian opened her mouth and ruined it. “The answer’s still no. I'm getting the frack out of here. You're on your own.”

If she had a real esophageal tract, Mission would have used it to evoke a heavy, tired sigh. “Not so fast. You're either with us or against here. Carth may be an old softie, but I'm like, half thirty thousand years old, and half a Twi'lek kid who had it a lot rougher than you--and that was before she got killed by her best friend. Let me rephrase: you're with us, Polla--for as long as it takes--or I'll expose you. Your life won't be worth a plugged credit then.”

There was a long silence, broken by the Deralian blowing her nose rather messily in the folds of her genuine Forge-created robes. (Mission would recognize those prismatic arrays anywhere--all Rakatan tech had that same, molecular torsion… probably something about using the Force to create solid matter out of pure energy? Whatever. None of her selves had ever been physicists.)

“Frack you,” Polla muttered, but more subdued now. “You want to blackmail me instead of paying me a hundred million credits?”

“I'm willing to do both.” Mission adjusted her voder to project more compassion. “We really need your help, Polla Organa.”

XXX

Stars, shining and cold. Revan even knew some of the constellations--warped and wrong this far out on the Rim; but she had seen them before like this--warped and wrong in the last moments of her true life.

“I still don’t like this,” the Fragment muttered. “You said you knew a place. You said it was one of D’Reev’s boltholes.”

“I lied,” Revan told her. “Surely, you can see why.”

“Because I would tell you this is fracking insane. Yes.” Her duplicate’s voice turned arctic. “And I would be right. It’s fracking insane.”

“You didn’t want to bring the children to Kashyyyk, which I also suggested,” Revan murmured, not bothering to turn around. The argument was old, three hours now, waiting for the planet to rotate beneath them for right landing--and nothing had changed. “Something must have happened to the Kashyyyk installation’s widebeam; but if we went there on the ground, perhaps we could fix the signal? The Wookiees regard you as their savior, do they not? You have a life debt with one of their leaders. We could easily have left the children with them.”

Not that we would. No. It was always here, Fragment. Always meant to be this place.

Revan watched the planet turn beneath them, as she had before. So long ago--

“No. And it’s too late. We passed the jump point yesterday. Yavin’s closer. Now.” The Fragment closed her eyes. “I can’t believe I fracking trusted you when you said Navar--”

“This world was closer.”

Below them, the small planet was an orbiting curve of blue and brown, dappled with green. Pastoral and peaceful. As it had been, once before--

XXX

“Deralia. An unlikely planet to conquer. Do we need more farmers in our Empire, Revan?”

“This is Beya’s homeworld. She always told me it was beautiful, and it is.”

“For now.” Davad slipped his arm around her waist. “Is there to be a ground attack, or is this another one of your tricks, to lure the Republic into false complacency?”

“We’ll draw them out,” she murmured. “The Republic Fleet has used these Outlier worlds as supply bases for long enough.”

“Ah,” he said lightly. “And this trap, today… it wouldn’t have anything to do with the Hope of the Republic?”

“Do they still have hope?” She chuckled softly under her mask. “Send the signal to Leviathan. Tell Lord Malak to close orbit and join us.”

“But that eliminates the element of surprise.” Arkan sounded surprised himself. “We only have the flagships in this sector. If the Republic brings more forces--”

“Do you doubt the might of the Sith?” She pushed him away, turning away, and back to the sleeping planet beneath.

“I have no doubts left,” he muttered. If she turned, she would see him, half crouched--ready to spring, or kneel. “Master.”

Xxx

When the Fragment got mad, her voice slipped into an accent that sounded more Deralian than Dantooine, and nothing like Revan thought she had ever sounded at all. The Fragment had objected, but she had no choice now. With D’Reev holdings in tatters, there was no refuge to be found on Coruscant for their son, no refuge anywhere he could be named.

And would the official record of their deaths hold?

Revan thought it might, for a time--as long as the Starfire and her progeny vanished from the Core.

Xxx

Malachi said other things. Questions. All about her, his Jedi-spawned prize. Revan answered as best she could.

“Did you… what did you do with… her? The other--”

“She listens to my counsel, Malachi.” Her hand tightened on his.

“She’s got… fire, that one.” It sounded like he was trying to laugh. “But if I… she knows nothing. She cannot rule--”
“Yes.” I would have helped her rule. I could have helped her.

In a different world, perhaps. One where Tenebrae was less bold. One that she’d tried--and failed--to shape.

“Help her,” he begged. “Please.”

“I will,” she murmured, and was surprised to find it true.

XX

“Are you fracking insane?”

The Fragment made a move towards the ship’s controls, and Revan raised her hand, pushing her away with the too-weak Force. Merely a warning.

“The Genoharadan know that Malachi’s dead. They’ll be hunting us. Until Korrie's of age, we can’t risk any place associated with me. This is Polla’s fracking home --someone might think that I have ties here. It wouldn’t take much, even you thought of it.”

Revan allowed herself a thin smile. “Someone might think you have ties to the surviving family of the woman the galaxy believes you killed? Someone might think the Organas might welcome you with open arms?”

The Fragment’s gaze darted to the closed door between them and Malachor, the man and his child. “Yes,” she muttered. “We can’t take that risk. Besides, how do you know they'd even want--”

“You think I brought you here blind? I know they want to see you,” Revan told her. “Because I asked them.”

XX

Even the Fragment slept sometimes. And when she did, it was a minor thing to bring the smuggler’s husband to Revan’s cause. The man wanted what all fathers wanted--or said they wanted: for his son to be safe.

“Seiran?” The old man’s face was blurry in the light of his cheap comm, features blunt and blurred by interstellar static. “Is something wrong?”

Revan nodded to the husband, directing him to speak, but he already was.

“I’m afraid so, Jasp. Pollie’s… she… she’s--”

They had gone over the story several times while the Fragment entertained Korrie. Apparently, those rehearsals had been for naught. Revan sighed and finished the story for him.

“It seems that Polla took an assignment from one of the less savory members of the Exchange. While the job went well, they left her stranded in Hutt space. Seiran came to me for assistance, and naturally, I was only too glad to help. I will lend him my ship so that he can retrieve his wife--”

Jasp blinked, as if he had just noticed her. “Who--”

Perhaps the connection was poor on his end too? Revan resisted the urge to tug at one of the braids she had pulled out of sight, and raised her hood slightly, giving him a better look at her face.
“Revan Starfire. I’m traveling in this sector with my son. You did say we should visit. I thought this happy circumstance would provide an excellent opportunity.”

There was a long, irritating silence, as the man’s mouth opened and closed, like a flying Selkath.

“The card?” Revan pressed. “You and your wife sent a holocard for my wedding?”

The Fragment had been sentimental enough to keep it. Revan had assumed the sentiment would run on both sides.

The Deralian didn’t blink, but his mouth fell open. His head turned away from the comm, revealing a chubby profile. “Moll? MOLL!”

Faintly, as if from another room, a woman’s voice. “If it’s another thresher repairman tell him we have a contract til next harvest!”

“Nope.” Her husband called back. “It’s not. You’d better come over. This you’ll want to see.”

XXX

“Asked them?” The Fragment repeated. “You spoke to Polla’s parents? You told them what she--you told them what happened? Are you fracking insane?”

“Don’t be absurd. I told them Polla Organa was unharmed and needed a retrieval from Hutt space. Malachor will be quite safe from the Genoharadan on Deralia. And no one will care if the Organa family has one baby or another. All infants look alike.”

“So we…we’re all just going to show up at their door and drop the kids off?”

“Of course not. You will drop off the children alone. Seiran and I remain here.” Revan kept her voice calm. “I already told them I was assisting with the retrieval, and we needed someone to watch the children. Seiran stays here, because he would be recognized portside. Too much risk among his own people.”

“And I won’t be?”

“You have the Force. Use it. Cover your face with a cloth.” Revan shrugged, trying to sound careless. “Tell Jasp and Moll to shave Mal’s head into one of those barbaric knots. He’ll blend right in.”

“No he won’t. No I won’t.” The Fragment narrowed her eyes. “If this is some plan of yours to frack off without me--”

“A family.” Deflect. Delude. Distract. “All this time together, and you’ve never asked me about your own. About our own parents.”

Revan could tell by the woman’s expression that she’d scored a hit.

“I--”

“You never asked,” Revan said gently. “Because you have a family, Fragment. You have a family, and they want to see you.”

The mother in any case. The father will take more convincing. But you are, Fragment. Extremely convincing. Even without the Force.
For example, you’ve convinced me to let you live.

The woman’s eyes narrowed. “I swear to the stars, Revan. If this is some kind of trap—”

“It’s a gift.” She met her own eyes directly. No longer yellow, no longer maddened, no longer corrupted by Tenebrae’s dark embrace. “Just a little time, Revan. Please. Take it.”

“Just a little while.” The woman’s voice was uncertain, guarded. She was frowning, her mind no doubt already unraveling the nets that Revan had set, the sheets of thin ice, under which darkness boiled. “An hour, Revan. I’ll take them to… Jasp and Moll. But I’ll be back in an hour.”

“Of course you will,” Revan told her.

Victory.

XXX
Chapter 46 / Shot Right Through With a Bolt of Blue

It was the middle of the night. Mekk was still asleep, but that wouldn’t last long. Between Malak’s nightmares and the bond, they did most things at the same time. Sometimes, that was a good thing, but right now it was fracking awkward.

Dustil glanced at the locked door again. It would stop his bondmate for about five fracking seconds.

Just call. Call her before he talks me out of it. Again.

He waved his fingers at the commlink inset into the top of his father’s desk and it floated into his hands. The number dear old Father had left at the top of the list was still in its memory banks, but no one answered the line.

Frowning, Dustil typed into the public directories.

“Republic Intelligence,” the receptionist on the commlink chimed. “How may I direct you?”

“I need to speak to Captain Rew Ekkumi,” Dustil whispered. “Urgently. I was trying her comm and I couldn’t get through.”

“Admiral Ekkumi is not with Republic Intelligence.” The voice sounded prissy and metallic. Was he talking to a protocol droid?

Admiral, huh? Since when? “Get me a Human,” Dustil told it. “I already tried the Fleet numbers. You’re an intelligence division? Seems like you’d keep comm numbers.”

“Specist discourse is not tolerated in our network. Please rephrase your request.”

“Oh… frack! I just meant… get me a person. A sentient, living person.”

“Who is calling?”

“Dustil Onasi,” Dustil snapped. “Or Darth Malak D’Reev, if that’ll get me a person faster. You want me to put him on? Trust me, you wouldn’t like him when he’s pissed.”

“Your call is being rerouted to a mental health server. Please hold. Average response time is-“ “Frack this.” Dustil cut the comm, and buried his face in his hands.

Five minutes later, the comm rang back.

***

It was almost paradise, Mekel thought.

There was a serving droid in the kitchen who could make anything they wanted, and the bar was fully stocked. They were making a killing at the swoops and the casinos. And the guards in front of the building called them both ‘sir.’ Mekel had eight new sets of clothes—paid for in the shop and everything. Good stuff too, fabric soft on his skin. HoloNet reporters kept asking Telos for interviews, and Mekel got to strong arm them back, pretending to be a bodyguard—like Dustil needed one to guard his body when they could both take anything they ever wanted….

The Force was strong with them.

The Force was strong and it was paradise compared to the flops they’d been staying at in the Underground. Kilometers better than the Jedi Temple or the Mandalorian hotel, or that fracking bunk they’d been assigned in what had used to be 100 Thantos Three. If this was a fracking normal time, he’d be enjoying this life: shacked up with the son of the Republic’s most famous hero, hot and cold running everything at his tap.

This is the life I deserve. The life I should have had. The life of a Jedi Master’s son.

Were we at the same Jedi dorm? Because I don’t remember Jedi living like this. Dustil’s thought was amused. His hand brushed Mekel’s shoulder, and for a second, it was Mekel’s hand too, brushing his own shoulder--

“Careful,” Mekel muttered and turned around. He's close.

They could both feel him, Malak, swimming beneath the surface a pure jolt of rage and loss—My son, she took my son--

“Maybe she's really dead,” Dustil offered out loud. Jedi Masters aren’t rich, Mekk. The thought was tired, amused. Half asleep. His hair was rumpled, and his shirt hung, half open. Maybe your son is dead too, Malak--asshole. But that thought was guilty, like Telos was trying to sound tougher than he was. Half-assed.

Mekel shrugged. “Maybe most Jedi aren’t rich, but she was. Revan is rich.” Was rich. Now, maybe she's really dead. Do you think I’ll inherit all of her shit?

From the window in the corner, Mekel could see the still-smoldering ruin that had once been the D’Reev tower. With the tallest building in this sector gone, the view opened, and the sky exposed its wandering, watery sun. He liked it more this way.

“You’re up early.” Dustil sounded surprised. But he wasn’t, was he? He’d known the second Mekel had woken up, because he had already been awake.

No secrets. Like living with your skin off.

“They can’t be dead,” Mekel repeated, for the hundredth time. *But if they are, can I get her stuff?
Old Lammikins can’t since he's taken a vow of poverty or whatever it is they do*--

“Half the galaxy agrees with you. I don’t give a frack. Have you found out anything about my father?”

“Nothing on the nets.” Mekel almost missed Mission. She had a better sense of humor than Telos.
And, she had much, much better access to the nets than either of them. Of course, she also put a fracking bomb in my neck and didn't tell me. “But… your dads and Revan, they wouldn’t just leave you. Even if they don’t think you’re… you. Right? Maybe... especially then?”

“You’d think.” Dustil snorted. Would I know if Father was dead? I would know, right? He can’t be dead.
“I don’t actually think Revan is dead,” Mekel said cautiously. And we both know Malak doesn’t think she is.

Frack him. I told you not to listen to him!

What am I supposed to do? Plug my ears in my fracking dreams?

As if naming him was a summons (and maybe it was), Malak’s presence between them surged. My son. I have to see my son again--

I’m not stopping you, one of them thought. Maybe both. Frack off. Go see him. Haunt him, and not us.

Fools! You can’t keep me leashed forever!

The strength of his anger felt like adrenaline. Mekel tried not to flinch, tried to let it wash over him like a tide. Use it. We can use this!

He took a step forward and grabbed Dustil’s arm.

But Dustil stepped away, pulling back.

“Sorry.” He could feel Telos’s embarrassment. “Maybe he’ll frack off soon.”

Or maybe it’ll be like this forever. Mekel didn't mean to broadcast that one, but it was too late. Maybe we just need to live with the audience--

Dustil cleared his throat. Maybe he’s the price.

Price? Mekel scoffed. “This was free--this is freedom. This is a fracking gift, what Ban did to us. We’re stronger now.”

Dustil’s voice muted. “We have to handle it, or it’s all fracked.”

“We are.” Dustil’s face had that familiar scowl. Might have been fracking funny, if things were different. “We’ve got this flash pad, that speeder in the garage. All those explosives your dads holed up to stop Darth Revan--”

Dustil’s mouth twitched. “You want to blow something up?”

“I’m just saying. We could.” Mekel raised one eyebrow and smirked. “Nice to have options, right?”

“Get real, Mekk. It's just me here.” The other boy’s eyes were too dark. He was still too thin from that fracking Jedi coma. They both were.

“This is real.” His voice felt tight. What you see is what you get, Telos.

“I know that.” You're more than that. “Look, I-I really do want to find my father. I… I got a comm from one of the Fleet brass. They want me to go there.”

“It’s probably a trap,” Mekel told him.

“Not everything is. Sometimes… maybe some sents want to help.”

“Maybe they think you're really Darth Malak because some Jedi told them--”
“The Jedi are gone.” You saw the same news vids I did. “If they didn't die in that fracking explosion--”

“We know they didn't.”

“Well, they're still fracking gone.”

The HoloNet seemed to think so. It had been three days since the D’Reev tower fracking blew, and the newscasters were already broadcasting Jedi retrospectives, eulogies to the “Age of the Force,” and something about how now was the “Birth of Reason.”

Reason? Mekel could give them plenty of fracking reasons. All banthashit.

Dustil’s face flushed. “Look. I called them, okay? I called my dad’s ex. Rew Ekkumi. He gave me her personal comm a long time ago. She's offworld, but her friends aren't, and they want to talk to me--she wouldn't say why. Said it had to be in person.”

Mekel’s first reaction was surprise. That he hasn't known. “How did you hide that?”

“Boundaries, asshat.” Telos’s mouth twitched again. “Learn how to get some.”

Xxx

From the expressions on their faces, her two former students and the ghost of Darth Malak almost walked out again the moment they entered the briefing room.

“Told you,” the Coruscanti muttered to the other. “This is why we shouldn’t have come. Trap. Jedi. See?”

“I see your dear old dads,” the Telosian said. “And our old friend. Hello, Mast-- Padawan Yuthura Ban.”

“Dustil.” She smiled at him, even as the Force confirmed what the tone of his voice implied. “Admiral Ekkumi said you had returned to… yourself.”

“Malak is there too,” Vrook muttered.

He was correct. The Dark Lord’s presence was like a Huttese oil slick, enveloping Dustil and Mekel both.

“Where is my father?” Dustil demanded. Controlled anger. Jedi teachings warned against strong emotions, but the part of her who had taught these men when they were children was pleased to see the Sith lesson learned. Dustil sat down slowly, and after a hesitation, Mekel sat beside him. Both of them huddled close. Was that fear, that made them press together? Children cowering in the dark?

They exchanged a quick look and Yuthura almost smiled. No. Not fear. Unity.

It could have killed them, what she had done to them, but it had not. It had made them stronger.

Strong enough to contain the ghost of Darth Malak?

The Order sorely needed strength in these times. Vrook insisted Revan Starfire was alive, but Yuthura remembered the green-iced gaze of the woman who had been Sheris Loran, and wondered. One of them, at least, may live. But which?
She had not told Vrook about Sheris. To do so would be to admit complicity with the actions of Davad Arkan, the newly awakened Sith Lord. Or, perhaps, as she told herself, she wanted to spare the man additional pain.

Revan Starfire could, quite easily, be dead. For death walked among Jedi, and her presence was gone. Of course, if she had learned to conceal herself, a skill so many others were forced to master now--

“Where is my father?” Dustil repeated, interrupting Rear Admiral Cein’s random and unnecessary introductions. “Rew said we should come here if we wanted to fracking know, and here we are.”

Mekel Jin elbowed him. “You,” he muttered. “She said you should come. None of them give a frack about me.”

Yuthura felt Vrook’s sadness, mixed with indignation, as the man sighed heavily. “Mekel--”

“We need your help to locate him,” General Sand said. “And Revan and the Mandalorians as well.”

Well. That was hilarious. Mekel cracked up. Only a few millis before Dustil joined in.

Xxx

After a few minutes, laughing started to feel stale. Especially when the sents Dustil still somehow thought of as in charge just stared at him and Mekk as if they were some kind of fracked experiment.

“So, you don't know where my father is. You don't know, and you want our help.” Dustil choked back one last laugh.

Here they were: the hologram of Rew Ekkumi, beaming it in from Kuat or something, General Driphole Sand, Rear Admiral Cein Somebody’s Ass, Master Vrook Lammikins, and, to top it off, Master Ban Atry, or Padawan Yuthura Bam, or however she wanted to style herself. All of them, staring at him and Mekk as if they were the fracked freak show. “You called me here for nothing. Well… thanks for nothing. We’ll be going now.”

“I advise that you stay,” General Sand said. “Force users seem to be… vanishing at a disturbing rate.” His smile was all hearty, like a jolly fat man, but Dustil thought it didn't reach his eyes. “You'll be safer in Fleet custody, and that way, if your father does contact us, you will be the first to know.”

Mekel nudged his arm. We’d be their fracking hostages, he means. Frack this. You want Tanaab tonight? Or pizzar?

We had pizzar last night, Mekk.

You pick. His bondmate yawned.

Imbeciles! Sand is one of the Fleet’s smarter medal-warmers. He would find a better use for your strength than rigging speeder races and losing yourself in pursuit of mindless sensation. Sand can use the Fleet’s resources to find Revan and my son-- And there again: Malak broke out of his cage.

Shut the frack up!
Mekel was gritting his teeth. Dustil could feel that like it his own mouth: grating, sliding back and forth like an old motivator.

Their eyes met. Mekel’s foot brushed against his. I want to get the frack out of here before the old windbag starts talking too.

I'm sorry I made you come. This was a fracked idea.

It's okay. You wanted to find your father. I just want to lose mine--

“You don't have to go with the Fleet.” Master Vrook sighed heavily, folding his hands on the table. It wasn’t what Dustil had expected him to say. “You don't have to go with them, and they have no right to detain you… but you must realize, the Order can offer you no protection and D’Reev’s estate has been acquired by House Racharn. Racharn will have no interest in paying the fees for your conapt, or replenishing your credits.”

“We have plenty of credits,” Mekel said. “No need to worry on our account.”

The old man’s brows drew together and he gave a heavy sigh. “I was informed of your antics. Did you know that tampering with the Racing Exchange’s equipment--tampering of any kind--is a tankable offense in the Entertainment Sector?”

“Yeah, Mekk did know that,” Dustil broke in. “Even mentioned it to me when we were fixing the race so Ninety-Eight won.”

“Don't worry, Dads.” Mekel flashed the Jedi that smile that got them everywhere. “We won't get caught.”

“You were caught,” the Jedi insisted. “We have it on vid. You are fortunate that Jiya managed to convince the Racing Federation not to press charges--this time.”

“I can't do that again.”

He can too, the pompous old frackhag.

“Does the High Admiral know you had advance warning of the Malachor thing, General Sand?” Mekel leaned back in his chair and put his legs up on the table, crossing his shiny new boots with a sharp click. “And that's why your own ship was on Core patrol at the time of the armistice?”

“In fact, she does.” Oh, but they’d got the old holebag good. Dustil could tell because the guy was starting to sweat.

“Is that what Malak told you?” Master Vrook’s voice was gentle. It almost didn't sound like him.

“He didn't have to tell me,” Mekel said smugly, tapping his forehead.

Oh, no. Mekk. Shut up.

Rear Admiral Cein leaned forward. “What else did he tell not you?”

The idiot smiled, like he was being smart. “He and Revan didn't have you assassinated like Dragor and Seensha, because they liked fighting an incompetent.”

Mekk, you ass--the more you say the more they'll have on us!
What? His friend shrugged. So? They can't do anything to us.

Dustil wasn't so sure.

Cein frowned. “Remarkable.”

The hologram of his father’s ex made a sign with her hands. Old-fashioned and Telosian, for warding off evil.

Dustil glared at her. “Little late for that.” After the bombing, it took your son ages to die. It took so long, I wanted to do it myself--

As the bombs fell, I made sure she felt every death. We went groundside for survivors. Each kill was another step towards madness. Consuming, until it eclipsed all pain. She felt every death--

Get the frack back! They both pushed, and Malak’s consciousness retreated again. That was the fracked thing; to know what he knew, they also has to deal with all of his crazy Sith banthashit.

Dust. Mekel’s mind shrank back a little. Don't let them get to you. Laugh it off. This is why I told you, we shouldn't have come. We can find your dads ourselves. We can do anything--

In unison they stood up from the table.

“Dustil,” Rew Ekkumi pleaded. “We need your help. The Republic needs you.”

Help them. Malak whispered in both of their minds, making the thought echo. Help them. We need their resources to find my son. A pause. And your father.

He's probably dead. Mekel turned towards the door. “Don't call us, Dads, okay? We can call you.”

Mal is not dead. I would know. But did Malak sound certain?

“Caution,” Ban murmured. “Strength is so often an illusion. His will is stronger than yours.”

Dustil snorted. “Oh, yeah?” You fracking hilarious bint. You have no idea.

“We've got Darth Malak,” Mekel taunted them. “And you have banthashit. Frack off.” Smugness radiated off him like fracking sunshine, as Dustil followed him out the door.

Any response the assholes might have had was lost when Mekk waved his hand and the door to the fancy chamber slid shut. Fused the lock, he added smugly. Let's see them get out of that!

Even more hysterically, the guards on duty outside actually saluted. Like Dustil and Mekel were important.

“They need a few more hours,” Mekel drawled. “You know, they're talking things through? Don't disturb them.”

“Yes, sir,” the trooper nodded.

Dustil snorted and they sauntered on. The halls of the Fleet’s offices were covered in holograms of the fallen, memorials, awards, pictures of ships.

Want any souvenirs? he asked Mekel. The picture of the Kuati corvette, it reminded him of his father’s first command. Dustil had been practically a baby, but Father still let him sit with him in the captain's chair, steer the ship’s thrusters while they sat in dry dock....
Take it, Mekel had followed his thought. We take what we want, remember?

The picture unsnapped itself from the wall and into Dustil’s hand. He tucked it into the front of his robes. I remember. Both of them burst into hysterical laughter, silenced only when Mekel pushed Dustil against the wall, and into a long, slow kiss.

Fools, Malak said tiredly.

XXX

The ship settled slowly on the landing pad, jets hissing in the warm summer air.

The small spaceport was deserted now, with everyone gone off to Rakata Prime, but Mission sounded the bells to summon T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw. “She’s back! Lena’s back!” Her voice rang across the empty walks, the slatted bridges, her speakers rustling the hanging vines.

The ship’s landing ramp opened, and her sister-Twi’lek emerged. Even more pregnant than ever and wearing long white robes.

“That took forever!” Mission declared, materializing in a whirl of pixels in front of the woman. “I thought you’d be back ages ago.”

“I had some thinking to do,” said Lena Wee. “But I’m back now. How are you, Mission?”

“Really great!” She reformed her features into a friendly smile. “Hey, did you know that T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw and I are gonna reactivate one of the Old Ones on Belsavis? He wants a template to restamp the organic collective with—once we get it all unified? Give sentients thirty thousand years and they get all sorts of ideas.”

“Belsavis?” Lena’s head turned, as if something was distracting her. “Where is that?”

“Oh!” Mission made the speakers ring with girlish laughter. “Secret, but I guess I can tell you….”

She was still listing the coordinates in the most common six hundred Republic languages when Lena interrupted her. “How is he?”

“Great!” Mission chirped. “Very excited for your son-being to be birthed and begin his reign.”

“And I guess you’re excited too,” the Twi’lek said slowly. “Getting a body will be sort of like being reborn for you as well.”

“My other self is being kind of mean,” Mission admitted. “She raised all sorts of ethical arguments, and then she hung up on me. I was almost thinking… do you think it would be crazy if I took over both bodies? I could be like, twins!”

“And then… what happens to… the rest of you, when you go in the bodies?”

“Oh, T’chrrrrnak’tahk’leànjsëw gets his boring old Rakatan know-it-all back.” Mission made her eyes roll. “But he says I can have total access, and always ask it anything I want? I think that’s not a bad trade, considering.”

“Considering,” Lena echoed. “I suppose not.” She looked around. “Where is… everyone else?”

“The Wookiees all went to Rakata Prime. They said it was getting too crowded here.”
If she had a heart, or emotions, they might be hurt.

“Crowded.” Lena looked around.

Something was obviously bugging her. Was it being pregnant? Mission had gone through a very curious ten millisecond about the process with various sentient species and she had to say, most of them made it look extremely messy and inefficient.

“I don’t think I’m going to have kids,” she added. “Even if I can.” Would Dustil want some? Maybe they could look into clones.

“I’m having this one,” Lena said. “I want to be sure to raise him right.”

“Yes!” Mission did too. “My bodies and I will help serve him, of course. And we’ve got the Wookiees. Freyyrr promised they’re coming back, just as soon as they finish fixing up their new colony world.”

“That’s… sweet of you, Mission.” Something was really bugging Lena Wee. Mission imagined it had to do with the increased bloodflow to her lekku, and the maternal reprogramming her body must be going through. Thank the Old Ones Mission didn’t ever need to go through that! It must be awful, losing free will.

“Lena,” T’chrrrmak’tahk’leânsêw came in at a run from the lifts. He practically tackled his mate in his urgency to express devotion. “My love! My heart! You’re back!”

“Yes, Nico.” Lena nodded stiffly in his arms. “I am.”

Xxx

Telos thought he got it. He thought he was clever, trying to hide what they were from those rich k’lor slugs, but Mekel knew better. With Malak’s memories sifting through their hands like credits after a bank heist, all they had to do was bring up the man’s name—-the original ‘M’ word, as it were, and sents would drop at their feet: either in fear of what they might do, or to stay on their good side while they did it.

Wasn't that how Lord Malak had ruled, after all?

Fear and credits.

They stood in line for the shuttle to go back planetside. Lots of minor Fleet flunkies here. It occurred to Mekel that Lord Malak probably didn’t stand in line, ever.

“You have someplace else to go,” he hissed at the couple in front of them. The two took off in no seconds flat. The trio in front of them took three places while the flight wranglers ran the final checks.

“You're drawing attention. Telos didn't sound like he cared through.

“We’re pretty flash. They should be looking.

Yeah. Especially at those boots. If they don't go blind looking at them.

They're very comfortable--

Someone bumped into him from behind. “Excuse me,” a feminine voice said.
Mekel noticed her legs first, mainly because the skirt she was wearing hugged her like a glove; but ended just, as Moms used to say, a few centimeters short of the goal lines.

“Dustil Onasi?”

Pretty face. Yellow hair. Hard to tell how old with those huge goggles over her eyes.

“Nope,” said Dustil Onasi. “But I get that a lot.”

“I bet.” She smiled, and lifted up the goggles, revealing friendly blue eyes. “But you are him, right? I’m Cally Lee.”

And? Dustil sounded bored.

And she’s hot? Use your imagination. Mekel had a few scenarios.

That’s--

Well, look at that, he’d made Telos blush.

“This is our ride,” Dustil managed, ducking his head.

The pod bobbed in front of them, one in a line like a strand of krayt pearls, descending to the horizon and down the gravity well.

“There’s room for three.” Mekel extended his arm. “You’re CoruSec, Cally?” She looks a little familiar. She’s not one of the marks we rolled last year, is she?

Hard to keep track. Telos was annoyed. Every line of him tense.

“I was.” She laughed. “Now I do private security mostly. Someone… told me you might need a bodyguard.”

“Kept your old uniform, huh?” Mekel angled it so she was between them on the pod, strapped in and cozy.

“I… guess.” Those blue eyes looked a little vacant all of a sudden. “I… was wearing this when I came here.”

“Well, sure.” Was she actually nuts? That was kind of a shame for Mekel’s boner, but at least he still had Telos--

Nice. I wouldn’t count on that right now. Sithwad.

That’s not what I meant!

It’s exactly what you meant.

Their pod began to move along the mag track, building momentum for descent back down the gravity well. Mekel’s gut churned. He hated this part.

“Ickle Mekelkins might barf on that nice uniform of yours, Cally--” Dustil’s voice broke off abruptly. Oh, frack. Blood. There’s blood.

What?

Suddenly Mekel was there in Dustil’s body too, seeing what he was seeing. The blaster bolt, the reason the dress was so tight wasn't for looks--or not just that.

The dress is tight because it’s not hers. Because she shot and killed its owner.

“Something wrong?” Cally Lee giggled. “You look like you've seen a ghost.”

“No, ma’am,” Dustil muttered. Mekel could feel him reaching for the saber tucked in his boot, even as Mekel reached for his own saber tucked in--

The blonde whirled around suddenly facing Mekel. Her eyes were glowing red. “Oh, ho,” she said. There was something small and silver in her hand--Mekel didn't even have to register what--before it fired.

Blinding pain, like a razor, like a blade, like someone liquefied half Mekel’s guts and turned them to fire.

Suddenly Lord Malak was with them, in them; roaring into strength like a buried rancor.

No. It will not end like this. I will not allow it to end like this--

“That noise, Darth Malak. Please stop, it’s quite distracting. It’s not like I killed you.” Mekel realized his own body wasn't making any noises at all. It felt numb and disconnected. But Dustil’s mouth was open, panting hard and keening with the pain.

Cally Lee’s blue eyes were now red and glowing.

Tenebrae. Malak’s hatred was fuel, and it was his voice that answered, a snarl of rage from Dustil’s body. “What do you want?”

“Galactic peace. Don't you remember my speeches, Lord Malak? You attended so many of them.” A dark chuckle. “Some you even gave yourself.”

Am I dead? Mekel clung to Dustil, clung to the undamaged body. It felt like the other one was fading away.

I don't know. I think she fricking shot you--why the frack did she shoot you?

“The child you shot was valuable to me.”

“All children are valuable. You were not there, the day she took mine.”

“Ziost.” Malak laughed. “This is revenge?”

“No.”

Was? Am I dead? It felt like holding Telos's hand while crossing a cesspool of sewer gas when Mekel pushed back to check. His breath heaved in. Heart beating painfully. Slowly.

Hold it. Stay with me. Dustil was strangely calm. Cool, soothing light over the burn. He used to do that back on Korriban, heal all of their bruises and burns. In secret, of course, because no acolyte on Dreshd would ever admit to needing a Jedi trick.

It’s bad. I think it should have killed you already.
I don’t want to leave.

Malak and the blonde were still talking. Tenebrae was the name of their fracked-up Sith Emperor. Their fracked up Sith Emperor was talking to Malak, and a part of them was there too.

“I thought you’d be pleased.” Cally Lee’s voice pitched low and cold. “She asked for you to join her.”

“My wife.” Malak’s emotion surged, like a jolt of pure power. Mekel felt Dustil twisting it, using it to repair the burned places inside of them--him. “She asked for me?”

“On this very day. She wants you by her side on Kaas.”

“She… returned to you.”

“It is her destiny. As it is yours.”

Mekel’s own eyes were focusing again. That was good. Focusing was good.

I’ve gotten the worst of it, but you really need a hospital, Mekk. The pod jolted and he realized they were on solid ground again.

It doesn't hurt. It didn't. Everything was just numb.

It will. You’re in shock. We both are.

At least we’re both alive. I don’t know what I would do if--

“Malak? Manka caught your tongue?” The Sith sighed. “I do hope I’m not boring you.”

“Not at all.” Malak’s voice hardened. “I decline your invitation.”

“Then strike me down,” the Sith mocked.

“What would be the point?” Malak sighed. “Your vessel is as near a null as to make no difference. And I sense the ones you have in wait, outside of this cage.” He smiled. Dustil’s face smiling, upside down. “But unless your game is to kill me, you’ve already lost. When you shot the Jin boy, you killed this one too.”

He’s lying, Mekk. I swear, he’s lying.

Mekel couldn’t tell if Telos was lying too. It doesn’t hurt, at least.

That’s shock. It’s gonna hurt. It’s gonna hurt a lot.

“Is that a threat? I’m afraid I don’t understand.” Deep voice so wrong out of the woman’s mouth.

“No. These two are Bezel-bonded. When Jin’s body dies, so does mine.”

He’s lying, Mekk. I swear. You’re not gonna die.

One of them was lying, Mekel found it increasingly hard to care which.

The Emperor laughed. From this angle, Mekel could have seen up her skirt, if it still mattered, but all he could look at was the ugly angle of her chin, and that smooth face, contorted into a rictus of dark mirth. “And was it you or Revan who created a Bezel bond without me? You know, I remember Lord Bezel. He was trying to emulate me.” A dark chuckle. “A clumsy link. The Net was a massive failure. Well over budget. We had to raise taxes several times to recover the funds.”

“You entrapped me for counsel on taxation?”

“My only desire is to reunite you with your wife.”

They'd landed a while ago. The pod should have opened by now. Someone should have realized that something was wrong.

The world rocked again suddenly, and then he heard Malak grunt in surprise. Everything tilted and swerved, and from the way Mekel's stomach dropped, they were airborne again.

“You sabotaged the tram--”

“No. The Genoharadan did that. They're quite useful. I can see why Lord Revan found them efficient.”

“They die just as easily as your vessels.”

Her pink, bare legs stood right by Mekel’s outstretched hand. If he could move his hand, he could grab them. But his hand didn't even feel real. It was a piece of flesh, flopping at the end of his arm.

“I tire of your threats, Malak,” the voice said.

Mekel could look up now and see the curve of Cally Lee’s ass, the hand she held behind it. Holding something in it. Something small and pointed. Not the gun that had shot him. Something smaller. Her hand went forward suddenly, the small thing fired, just as Malak spoke.

“Then it's time to end this ga--”

A hissing noise, and Dustil’s body collapsed, like the strings had been cut. Even if he couldn't feel the other body in the Force, Mekel felt the effect of whatever it was that the Sith had just done. The world slowed. His thoughts fragmented.

“Yes,” the Emperor said. “It is time to end all games.”

Drugged. What... frack, Lord Malak, you sat... let him fracking drug y--

The world cut out.

XXX

For some reason, they were climbing an ancient pyramid on the Yavin moon. The structure looked as if it had once been covered in vines once, but they had all been blasted away, leaving black outlines of their shapes etched into the ornately carved stone. The whole place looked like someone had dropped a megaton on it; but strangely left the buildings intact.

“Just like that? You’re leaving?” Sure, sometimes the old Sith-possessed Jedi guy had been a pain in the ass, but in the days it took to get to Yavin, Polla had gotten used to having him on their team. Now, as they trudged through the blasted wilderness of Yavin IV (because Tenebrae had recommended that she meditate upon what the destruction of an entire ecosystem and civilization truly meant) Polla was really glad he was there--and not only because he was the one with the map.

“I have been recalled.” Master Klee sighed. “I received word shortly before our arrival on Yavin. His mind was too close for me to tell you before now.”
“Recalled? Like a machine part?” She’d kill that asshole if he was going to kill Klee.

“No.” Klee smiled at her. “I am needed on Coruscant.”

Carth Onasi frowned. “Did they tell you why, Master Klee?”

It was just the three of them—or rather the five, if you counted the two Zabrak kids trailing ten meters behind. Or six, if you counted the Sith Emperor, who liked to check in from time to time and tell her that this was what pride wrought.

Go rot yourself, Tenebrae. Polla thought. Sei must be beside himself with worry. She’d thought about at least trying to get a message to her folks, but the way Suvam had everything wired, she was pretty sure it was impossible to get anything past him. And if the supposed Revan Starfire started calling Deralia—it could be messy.

“I don’t think my return to Coruscant has anything to do with her.” Klee hesitated, and looked back towards the wonder Zabrak twins.

“But you—you heard something? You know something?” The hope in that man’s voice. Here Polla was, being forced to impersonate a Sith Lord and abandon Abasen and her husband to the Coruscanti Underground—after having to fake their own deaths—and she felt sorry for Carth Onasi? That was nuts. It was making her nuts.

Klee hesitated again. “Tenebrae has so few agents with any true Force sensitivity left in Core Space. Many of them have… vanished.”

“You still think that’s a good thing, right?” Polla asked. “So I don’t have to shoot you?”

“Yes,” he nodded. “But one is needed. To… protect.”

“Protect who?”

“I was not told. A young Force user. Injured on Coruscant. I was told to make haste.” He grimaced. “It could easily be a trap for me, or a trap for the Force user—or the Jedi. We are often only given the barest of instructions.”

“Find out, if you can.” Carth ordered him. Polla kind of liked the way he did that. You could tell he knew how to give commands. She knew without him saying anything he wanted it to be Dustil, even if they’d been told a million times his son was already on his way to Drumming Case.

If Polla was going to have to pretend to be Darth Revan and have both father and son as consorts, this was going to get really, really complicated. Especially if Darth Malak was actually a Force ghost too, like they all said.

Maybe the little Tee could consider adding hazard pay to her promises.

“Okay, tell me again before he comes back?” Changing the subject seemed wise, if only to get the sad expression off Carth Onasi’s face. “Extra Can was possessed by the spirit of Freedom Nards, and he harnessed the Massappi—”

Klee sighed. “Exar Kun was possessed by the spirit of Free don Nadd, and—”

And then his eyes began to glow red.

Frack, Polla sighed, and crossed her arms again. “What took you so long? Bad reception on this planet?”

“No.” Carth’s voice, now twisted and dark. “I was waiting until we had ascended the summit. Observe the view, Revan. It’s quite lovely, even with all vegetation burned away. This world was lush once. Within your father’s lifetime. Tell me, was he one of the Jedi who walked upon its surface? Was his power added to the multitude, that arranged its destruction?”

_I have no fricking idea. And I don’t care._ “Father never talked about the war.”

A lie, because even though he hadn’t fought in it, Jasp Organa had talked about the war a lot.

XXX

“Fracking Jedi sticking their noses where they don’t belong. No good comes from digging up ancient artifacts, Pollie. Or dealing with Jedi. You know what happened with Bendowen’s girl? Your cousin Beya?”

“Don’t call me Pollie.”

_That was the month she’d decided on Desiderata. But nobody in her family seemed to know how to pronounce it. Sometimes she thought they were doing that on purpose. Like it was some kind of joke, pretending not to know how to pronounce a word?_

“Another war, just like the first Sith War. You can’t trust Jedi, Pollie. Remember that. Sometimes I think those Sith have the right idea--”

XXX

_They don’t, Da. Or at least this one doesn’t. All millions of him. All of his ideas are terrible. And he can’t shut up about them._

Tenebrae was still talking, now in unison: using Klee, Carth, and the two poor Zabrak kids. Polla sneered at him and checked her chrono. Emperor Blowhard could only possess Carth for five minutes, tops. She’d tested it.

For another two minutes she was the only sane person on this moon.

Xxx

They came down hard onto a fallow, brown field. It was winter on Derra right now, raining and gray. The ship rocked back and forth on its struts, settling uneasily on the ground.

Revan leaned back in the pilot’s chair, frowning at the readings. Everything had looked good, but the cruiser still fought her like six hessi in a bag going down, as if its apprehension about Deralia equaled her own.

“This is it?” Korrie stared at the window dubiously. Her son didn't look impressed. “It looked prettier from the ground.”

“This is it!” She kept the deliberate cheer in her voice. “Hey, why don't you see Sheris? Before we go?”

Her son scowled. “Her name's not Sheris.”

“Sorry. Force of habit.” She had to stay cheerful or he would suspect that her own fears were just as bad as his. “Go see her, okay? I don't know what happened between you guys, but you... you should see her. She really does love you, Korrie.”

He sighed, so long and drawn out that it almost seemed fake. “You both keep saying that over and over. I know that she loves me.”

“We might be gone a while.” She kept her voice light. “Just say goodbye. Please?”

“If she wanted to say goodbye, she’d be here,” he mumbled.

That seemed true, but after Korrie and the woman fought a few days ago, Dar had been avoiding all of them--at least as much as you could in a claustrophobic ship.

“Do it for me. Please?”

Korrie looked at her, biting his lip. “I’m doing it for you, Mother. Okay,”

Xxx

Revan felt the ship land, rocking like one under siege. She heard the turbines in the engine room whine to a stop, the hiss of the compressors releasing their exhaust into atmosphere. She felt the ship land, but there were no windows in the cortosis-lined practice room.

Once the cruiser had settled, Revan resumed her exercise, attacking each Form with new resolve.

Over and over again, the steps became a pattern and the small room that was hardly more than a closet almost ceased to exist: replaced instead with a parade of endless foes--and friends. In her mind’s eye the remote became Master Vandar, testing her skills with a blade during her Padawan trials; then Malak, of course--first practice sweeps, replaced by a more deadly dance; then the first of many enemies, a Bothan slaver who wanted her dead; Beya Organa, severing her hand, Oerin Lin, the Mandalore, Darth Blais, Bastila Shan--

She'd left herself too open, and the remote's sting burned her side.

“Force,” she muttered in Ancient Sith. In that tongue, the word was both prayer and curse.

Revan switched hands again, trying to get a feel for the single hilt. She lifted one leg, and tried to support the rest of her balance with the Force. The particle blade hummed, as her body pivoted, everything strangely heavy and slow. In her memory it was as easy as breathing, but for Sheris, her old patterns seemed nearly impossible.

Try Shien. The thought was soft, hesitant; but Revan’s body responded before she could, sliding into a grounded stance, legs steady and wide apart. She raised her blade more slowly, keeping her arms tense--

No. Like water. Revan felt her limbs relax, her hands moved forward loosely, parrying the bolts the remote sent against the walls of the small space. The cortosis sparked.

The Fragment uses the Force for everything, but there is strength in this too. Strength in the quiet. Listening to its voice, instead of issuing commands. I must remember this. I will need this quiet power in the trials ahead--

The door slid open, revealing Malachor.

“Moth--”

No. She shook her head silently at him, deactivating the blade and putting a finger to lips.
“Mother said I should say good bye,” her son said, even louder, and Revan realized her mistake. “To you. Sheris. Now. Is that okay?”

“Yes,” she nodded. “Of course. Where… is your mother ready to go?”

“She's in the front,” he said, still using that exaggerated voice. “Are you going to come and say goodbye to her too?”

“No need. I'll see her in an hour.” The Fragment had a careless way of speaking sometimes that Revan tried to emulate. “Does she need anything else?”

“I don't think so.” His lip trembled a little, and she felt tears prick the corners of her own eyes.

_But not all. No weakness. Not yet._

“May I give you a hug, Malachor? It may be some time before our return.”

He nodded. He was heavy in her arms, face rounded, red curls tousled.

Revan allowed herself a moment of weakness and buried her face in his hair. His curls hid all multitudes of expression—not to mention her tears. She felt Mal tremble, tense as a child getting ready for their first shot—or a wounded soldier, prepped for an amputation.

“Will I see you again?” he whispered.

“If the Force allows it.” Weak panacea. “In some way. I've… seen others. And your father—”

“But you're not going to die.” His voice was too loud. “You _promised_ you're not going to die!”

“Shhh,” she murmured against his head. “I will come back, Mal. If I can. And if I cannot—”

“I know.” She felt it, that strength, resolve, force of will that made his nine-year-old body stop trembling, made him pull away from her. “Good-bye, Sheris.”

“Mother,” she corrected him out loud, even though it was cruel. It was what was expected, and the Fragment could hear.

“Mother,” he repeated woodenly. “Good-bye… Mother.”

Her son turned and left. She heard his voice speaking to the Fragment and the man, but the words were all lost in the pounding of her own heart and Sheris’s cheap emotion that she choked down deep into the heart of her core.

_It is necessary_, that calmer voice murmured. _The boy will be safe._

Xxx

“I made a fresh bottle for him.” Seiran wouldn't meet Revan’s eyes. “Tell… tell the Organas not to tell my Da, okay? He drinks a lot on paydays, and he's got a big mouth.”

“Right.” Revan nodded slowly, taking the baby. Abasen was sound asleep, completely missing the momentous event of returning to his birthplace. “Look, we have an hour, at least, before the ship’s ready for takeoff. Why don't you just come with us? Give those instructions yourself?”

“I-I can’t.” His face looked pale and strained, and not for the first time, Revan wondered if Dar had coerced him somehow—if this was all some kind of horrible trap. They could arrive at Derra Farm. and find only smoldering corpses, a Genoharadan death squad, a battalion of Sith shadows--or worse.

But Malachor. She'd never risk him.

No. If Dar'Revan wants to trap me, the trap lies ahead, not behind us. She’ll spring it in space, or at Yavin, or while I'm sleeping after Korrie's not there to see.

“Suit yourself.” This felt wrong. All of it. Being here. Him. The air outside, filtering through the ship’s filters now. It smelled as sharp and crisp as a memory, but none of it true.

“I’ll… keep an eye on her for you,” he offered.

Revan looked at him, startled. “It's that obvious?”

“That you don't trust her?” He cleared his throat. “Yeah. You… don't trust her. Anyways, see you in an hour, and give my love to Polla’s folks.” He smiled, a little shyly. “And try not to scare the hell out of them. Okay? I mean, about Polla, not about… you. Being you. I mean.”

“I'll try.” She smiled back. “This is strange.”

“I know.” His eyes met hers and then looked at the ground, a little too fast.

“You don't have to be nervous around me.” She tried to make a joke. “I'm not going to steal you away from your wife, Sei.”

“You couldn't.” This time he did meet her eyes. “I don't like freckles.”

Revan felt her lips turn up. “I'm also not sure how I feel about married men with babies.”

“Take care of him.” The teasing tone faded from his voice. “I mean… make sure to tell Moll and Jasp to take of him. And if we don't make it back--”

“You don't have to go,” she pointed out for the hundredth time. “I'll keep you as safe as I can, but there's a great deal of risk. For all of us.”

“If it was Carth Onasi or Canderous Ordo, would you go?”

It may be Carth. Mission isn't answering any of the Hawk’s pings, they might all be dead--

“I don't know where Carth is,” she admitted. “Or Canderous, but they both chose to leave. Your wife didn't choose to be kidnapped by Sith.”

Seiran sighed. “She chose to take stupid risks. You know, I loved her for a long time before she ever figured it out.”

“Oh, come on!” Revan scoffed. “She had some kind of clue.”

“She's a better liar than you.” He rocked back on his feet. “Make sure they know he still gets two naps a day.”

“I will. See you soon.” She smiled at him again. He was a kind man. The smuggler she remembered had thought he was boring--just another face at the swoops. But the real Polla had been right to take a second look. “She did right, picking you.”

“You've got it wrong.” He laughed. “I picked her. Just had to wait until she slowed down enough to notice. But then after she got hurt, she--"

After I was made. After she was hurt.

There must have been something in her face, because he broke off speaking and touched her arm. “Hey,” he said softly. “Don’t… don’t look like that. I’m the one with the stolen wife here. It--you didn’t do this. You didn’t choose any of it. And the things you did after--you have no idea how much Pollie idolized you. Like she… like she was doing them herself. Or pretending.”

“We're getting her back for you,” she promised. “I mean it. Even if Dar'Revan doesn’t, I do.”

“Yeah.” He shifted a little on his feet and leaned forward. His lips brushed her cheek and Revan jerked back, startled, before a part of her recognized the custom.

“Luck?” She scoffed. “Come on, Sei, Jasp and Moll aren't that bad!”

“You just looked nervous.” He glanced towards the door. “Don't be. Jasp might seem a little stiff, but he'll warm up.”

He doesn't like strangers. She remembered. But I'm not. Dar said they wanted to see me--both of them wanted to meet me--

“Mother.” Korrie was standing behind them, stiff and wrapped in what looked like formal robes. She hadn't known he'd even packed such things.

“You can't wear those!” she rushed forward, unbuckling the double collar with the Force before she even reached him. “You’ll stand out like a Corellian on Byss in those.”

“Sheris said--they’d… buy them new clothes.” His voice was tense.

“Take the robe off.” She handed the sleeping baby back to his father and pulled at the sleeves. Underneath, he was wearing a simple tunic and loose pants--what passed for underwear on Coru, but it looked more like normal kid gear here. “Much better.”

“It looks cold. And there’s someone out there.” He glanced at the viewscreen and she followed his gaze. A man stood at the edge of the field, face lost in the early morning haze; but his stance was unmistakable.

Da.

“That's-that’s Polla’s father. Jasp Organa.” Revan was proud of how calm she sounded.

Seiran was whispering something to his son. She didn't want to hear it, but the words came through as clearly as Dar's before, from the other room, even when she hated herself for listening.

“We’ll be back soon,” he whispered. “Your Ma and me. Make sure you take your naps… and… I-I love you.”

“Mahm phhht,” Abasen said. He'd woken up, or Seiran had woken him up.

Had Revan said something like that to Korrie when she left? She couldn't remember. She glanced through the transparisteel window again. The man was still standing there, steady as Derran rock, waiting for them.

Only an hour with them. Regret. A part of her wanted more time. The rest of her was petrified.
Revan was right when she said I never asked about my--our--parents. I should have asked. I will ask. As soon as I drop off the kids. That's all I'm doing, dropping off the kids and she's right: Malachor will be safe here. He has to be.

“Here.” She'd been lost in her own thoughts when Seiran came up to her, holding out his son. “Be--tell Moll and Jasp I'll be back soon. With their daughter.”

“I'll tell them we’ll be back soon.” She nodded, turning to Korrie. “Ready?”

“You said I don't have to call him 'Grandfather,’ her son muttered. “So what do I call him?”

“Mister Organa,” she smiled. “Okay?”

Too many fears. Genoharadan. What if I leave him and they find him? The Organas won't be able to keep him safe. I'm putting them at risk too. But we have no choice. Dar left me no choice.

Everything about this sang like a trap, but Revan couldn't see its shape.

The trap will happen after I get back, if it exists. After. Not yet. First I get Korrie and Abasen safe. Then I spring it.

“Fragment--” Dar appeared in the doorway. It looked like she'd been training again, her face was damp with sweat, her hair loose and slicked back. “Revan.” She smiled slightly. “I was just… checking the ship for lift off again, and it told me the atmospheric cooling coil is missing.”

“Yes, Revan.” She matched the smile, meeting those careful eyes. “It is missing from the lift array because I have it here.” She patted the pocket of her robe.

“Ah.” The woman smiled slowly. “I hope there’s no damage to the part. In my experience, a small ship like ours, pulling out of an atmosphere like Deralia’s without a cooling coil on its shields--”

“Might get the main thrusters burned and leave you drifting?” Revan said. “Or, at worst, you could end up overloading the entire power array, causing a massive cascade failure--and if you hadn't broken atmo when that happened--”

“I can visualize.” Dar raised one eyebrow. “Do you think you'll have time to make repairs on the device in the hour you have before our departure?”

“I don't think the coil is actually broken.” Revan shrugged. “But we can have Seiran check after I reinstall it. Just to be sure.”

“Oh course.” Was that anger in her expression? Approval? Nothing at all? Dar smiled again. “Have a good visit with your family.”

“If you'd like a sparring partner… upon my return--”

They never had, although both of them had taken the opportunity to use the small training chamber.

“I would be honored.” Incredibly, the woman bowed. “I wanted to suggest you refine some of your Juyo postures. Just because a Form has no defensive stance doesn't mean its offense can't be used as a defense, especially against a careless opponent.”

“It doesn't matter how careful my opponent is,” Revan told her. “I have the Force on my side.”

Dar inclined her head slightly. A wry smile twisted her lips. “May that always be the case.”
“Good-bye Sheris,” Korrie said, from the door.

“Mother,” Sheris corrected him, as she had before. It was cruel how she kept correcting him.

But her brave son smiled at Dar. “Good-bye, Mother.”

Xxx

Revan stood at the port window, watching the Fragment walk away, smug righteousness apparent in the near-bounce of her step. Malachor's hand was secure in hers, and the crook of her elbow curved around the Deralian infant balanced on her hip.

The man waiting for them straightened, put his hand to his head--a local greeting, or perhaps some kind of salute. There were no embraces. From this distance in the mists, no smiles either. After a brief exchange, Revan passed the infant to the man and all three of them vanished over the sloping ridge to what Seiran had told her was the direction of the Organa homestead.

She heard Seiran’s indrawn breath. This close, the man’s fear was like spice in the Force, disturbing its peace with his pain. She had worried the Fragment might sense it, but the woman was predictably single-minded, with all of her attention reserved for Malachor and her reunion.

“Well?” She asked, without turning around. “You said she was more likely to take the ignition key.”

Revan had duplicated the ignition key a day ago, using an old datapad and a discarded recycler coupling.

“Pollie always liked simple.” He cleared his throat. “I thought she would. But the cooling coil… hard to find another one out here. Not for this model ship.”

A pity. This ship had the Sith signatures that would make traveling in Sith space a great deal easier. “Can you modify one of the other devices? Even a ship this size has other mechanics with temperature controls.”

“Deflector shields, yeah. But we need those for space. Else we have no protection from solar radiation, ion surges--not to mention the strain on the hull in hyperdrive--”

She stared at the controls, wanting to laugh. Oh, Fragment. Perhaps I should have just killed you. It would keep your strength out of Tenebrae’s hands.

“Is there another way?” Sheris’s strength was not enough to compel the man, but it weighted Revan’s words with the command of threat. When she turned to face him, it was disturbingly pleasant, seeing the spark of fear in the man’s eyes.

“Not in the timeframe you're talking about.”

“She can't save your wife.” Did he need reminding again? “The Emperor might trade the real Starfire for a Deralian pilot, but once he has her--”

“I'm just supposed to take your word on that?” He gave a choked laugh. “You're not exactly known for telling the truth.”

“I was once.”

“I once had a wife.” His voice hardened, resolve sparking his near-null eyes. “She says she's on Yavin Station. You say Dromund Kaas. How am I supposed to know who to believe?”

“You made that choice when you agreed to help me strand my Fragment on Deralia with the children.”

“Agreed.” His voice was bleak. “Because you said it was the way to keep my son safe. And now he is safe. Away from you.”

It had been a necessity to reinforce her point, to show him personally that even a weak Jedi could cause pain, cause a pulse to slow, a life to end, between one breath and the next. She had made him fall to the ground, gasping for air; but the man had been both brave and foolhardy, not to beg for his own life.

Brave, and foolhardy and weak, Seiran Wen, not to call my bluff.

Thankfully, because Revan wasn’t sure she could have actually hurt the child. Not with Sheris’s anguish screaming in her head when she tried to hurt the man.

“We have an hour,” she said coolly. “Perhaps less. Can you make this ship fly?”

“Into a fracking cliff,” he muttered. “Maybe I should, make the galaxy a better place.”

Her fingers moved, and expediency fueled her strength. “Is another reminder required?”

The man put his hand on his throat and swallowed audibly.

“I can mod the rear deflector's cooler,” he admitted. “Wire it in. That’ll... get us to Chassna at least. Probably pick up another coil there.”

Chassna. A mining colony off of Deralia VI, the last planet in the system. Had they rebuilt? Because Revan remembered her bombers, curling around the red rock of a moon, burning the Republic base on Chassna to the ground.

“How long?” They weren't that far from the small settlement the natives called a city here. There was a spaceport in Derra City, if she could reach it... but that would increase the chances of the man’s desertion. In their days in transit, Revan had realized his navigational skills far outstripped her own. He might even be a better pilot than the Fragment.

Not to mention, the longer they were on this world, the more chance that Fragment would attempt some plan of her own. So much depended on Malachor keeping her in place. She hated to use her son for this, but she had no choice.

And staying on this world will keep you both alive. If I can distract the Emperor and Arkan both--

“It won’t take me long to fix--if you leave me the hell alone.” Seiran pushed past her and pulled up one of the floor plates, lowering himself inside. He was muttering something that Revan assumed was some kind of local argot--and then she realized it was his wife’s name, repeated over and over again.

“Pollie, Pollie, Pollie--”

“I do regret making threats to your son,” she murmured. “And I will do everything I can for your wife.”

“Everything you can, huh?” He looked up at her, clutching a hydrospanner so tightly that for a moment she thought he would hurl it in her face. “Just... don't lie to me.” His eyes: how many times had she seen that hopeless expression on a sentient face? Heard the scream of it in the Force? Pain to fuel an army, an empire. A galaxy of it still not enough.

“I’m not.” She met his gaze. “If Polla is with the Emperor, I will make him spare her life.” If I can.

Xxx

“Hello,” the old man said, to Korrie and not to Revan. The old man--she hadn't thought of Jasp as old--but this man had a tremor in his hands, and hair gone white, not just stippled with gray. “You must be the young Senator from Coruscant.”

“I am not here in that capacity,” her son said formally. “Mother said we aren't supposed to talk about it.”

“Huh.” The old man grunted, eyes flickering towards the baby in Revan’s arms. “Let me take Junior.” It wasn't a request. If anything, it reminded her of the tone she remembered him using when the droid salesmen came about harvest. Trying to convince him to try a new thresher.

He hadn’t taken kindly to their sales pitch, barking out his own orders, as if he was the one calling the shots instead.

Xxx

“Let me try it on this field,” he said. “If I like it, maybe I'll buy it.”

Xxx

He never did buy a new thresher, but half the fields on his farm got done that way, while they did the other half with the old rigged one and Bolts.

“Are you--” the baby was awake and wriggling in her arms, and for a moment, Revan didn’t want to let him go. “Your hands, they're shaking, I don't remember--”

Now his gaze met hers, expression darkening into a thundercloud. “I'm fine.” he scowled, and she took an involuntary step back. “What the blast are we supposed to call you? Senator? Missus Onasi?”

She hated it when they called her Pollie, she wanted a name like Seriina or Devranisha. something exotic, something out of this world. “Revan is fine.”

“No title? Huh.” His hands extended again and plucked the baby from her as deftly as picking a bale of eridu. “Come on, then,” he said, more to Revan's son than her. “Moll thought we had another hour before the atmo aligned, but she’s looking forward to meeting you. She’s still at the Grange.”

“What's a Grange?” Korrie asked, trailing behind the Deralian, as if he had received orders.

“One of the mysteries.” Almost amusement in Jasp’s voice.

Abasen laughed suddenly, high and chortling in the cool air. It smelled like damp and burning moss and…

Home. This is, this is really-- Revan had to wipe her eyes, but no one was looking at her. “You said M-Moll is at her meeting now?”
“I did.” He increased his pace, not looking back. “No need for you to make the trek. Your boy’s in good hands with us. We don’t hurt children. Even Senators.” From behind she watched his shoulders tighten underneath his rough coat.

“Mother--?” Korrie looked back at her, startled. She felt his fear spike in the Force. “I’m not supposed to just go with them!”

But you are, Korrie, we went over it a dozen times.

“I told my son I would see him to your home,” she told the back of the man she remembered calling Da, pulling her son after her, as they followed the man down the hill. “It isn’t far.”

Just over the hill and down the path, past the swamp.

“Suit yourself,” he muttered, never breaking stride.

Korrie dropped back and took her hand. “I don’t like him,” he mumbled, softly, but loud enough for her to catch.

“He… he was nice to you.” Revan didn’t know what to say. At the moment she could Force choke Dar for putting them all in this position. And he said an hour before Moll gets home. I can’t stay on the planet much longer than that. If we miss the window to the jump point we’ll be orbiting here for another two days.

“I wanted to see you, Jasp.” Da. Revan raised her voice. Her feet slipped in the grass.

Jasp Organa coughed. “So you said on the comm. But I thought we made things pretty clear. I thought I made things pretty clear.”

Oh, did we? You and Dar made things pretty clear? And then she lied to me? That settles it. I will kill her. Slowly. Painfully.

Epically.

Her voice stammered. “Yeah, but, D--but I thought…”

“My wife’s the one impressed by all your Core sweetening, not me.”

Your wife is the only mother I remember.

“I-I would like to see her.” She blinked hard to stop the blur.

“Don’t cry, Mother,” Korrie whispered. “These people are mean. And it smells funny.”

Jasp laughed and stopped walking. “If that’s what you think, young Master D’Reev, you’re welcome to find another planet.” His hands were still shaking. In his arms, Abasen whimpered.

“Mother said I have to stay here.” Her son folded his arms, a tiny Malak in the making.

“I don’t have time to find another place,” Revan told him. “I’m out of time. And so is Polla.”

Jasp’s face tightened like a fist. “And there it is,” he murmured. “Just how much trouble is my Pollie in? I know you said it was just a pick-up on Nar, but Seiran Wen wouldn’t leave this boy of theirs behind for something simple.”

Frack. Revan stared at him. “Nothing I can't handle.”
“Seiran staying in the ship and sending you out?” He snorted. “This might not be one of your fancy Core planets, but we can see when one and one make an explosion of hurt easy enough.”

Not even to the house yet. Revan had hoped for more time. Different time.

“You shouldn't worry,” she said. “I have the matter perfectly under control.”

“Perfectly, huh? You think we didn't see the vids from Coruscant? Tell me, blast it! What kinda trouble is my Pollie in?”

Ahead of them and down the slope, the thatched outbuildings of the Organa family compound huddled in the early morning mist like grazing nerf beasts.

“I swear to you, Jasp, I'm going to get her out of it “

“Tell me,” he repeated. His hands shook a little, and Abasen fussed. Jasp brought the baby to his shoulder, as if the effort hurt, and patted the child on the back. “You've got that look on your face. I know my daughter's in real trouble. And maybe you are too. Last time you showed up in this system--all you do is bring trouble! You think I wanted some Jedi scanning my little girl’s brain? They said they could save her, but they never told us about you.”

Maybe because they didn't expect me to live long enough to need an explanation.

“Polla pretended to be me to bilk some credits from the Exchange.” The words came out in a rush, like Polla was nine years old and had just swiped candy from the automat.

“Grass Priests,” Jasp whispered. ”You mean… she's dead?”

“I don't think so.” His stricken face. “No. She's not dead. Seiran doesn't think so. It's possible he would sense it, if she--”

“Where is she?”

“Yavin Station.”

Jasp made a disgusted noise. “Well, then we’re going there to get her.”

“No.” She was supposed to be Revan Starfire, supposed to be in charge, but this man made Revan feel like ten-year-old Polla Organa, just caught 'borrowing' credits from his wallet for candy and fizzpop. “I’m going to get her. It's not safe for you. She’s… she's being held by a very dangerous man.”

“Exchange thugs.” He scoffed. “You think I don't know my daughter’s associates? I was a registered smuggler too once. I know how the game is played.”

“I know, but this--”

“You think I can't take care of my own family?” He glared at her, furious.

“I… remember you can.” All those times she fell and you picked her up again. From the hessi that threw her. When Jetrale Snu tried to rip her off on the replacement hyperdrive. When Therion broke my--her--heart. The first time.

“The holos said it was everything she knew. That you know.” He stared at her. “They interviewed us again… after… after the death thing. The fake death thing. Me and Moll. On the news.”
“I saw it,” she murmured. Revan was aware of Korrie watching them, wide-eyed and silent. When I saw it I thought Malachi had killed them. You were good actors, Jasp. You and Moll.

“You watched.” He laughed. “Pollie was livid they had to leave. Course, she never really wanted to stick around here in the first place.”

“I know.” But standing here with the familiar scent of loam and rain in the air, Revan didn't know why Polla had wanted to leave. It was beautiful.

“Tell me how bad.” His voice had gentled. “If you were just looking for a bolt hole, you wouldn't come here. If it was just Exchange, Seiran would've commed me and not you. So it's gotta be bad. Black Sun? One of the Hutt Cartels?”

“Sith. She’s held by Sith. A very old, very powerful Sith Lord, who wants me very badly. Maybe even enough to buy her act.”

“Pollie has no Force! How can she pass for you with no Force?”

Not well. Not for long. All logic said the woman was already dead.

“She's smart.” Revan took a deep breath, trying to sell it. “Don't you think I know what she's capable of? Her memories got me through the Star Forge. Helped me kill Darth Malak! End the fracking war.”

“Thought that was your Force.” But the man looked proud. His faith in his daughter shone through his emotions, mixed with fear. “Pollie's smart. She can pull through this.”

You poor old fool. “Of course she can.” Revan nodded. “And she's got me on her side. You know, I was never going to hurt her? She and Sei didn't need to fake their own deaths. I would never--”

Noise drowned out her words: a roaring, rush of air, vent of badly mixed exhaust.

Cruisers like the one Dar had gotten from her Sith pals were supposed to be near-silent upon lift and descent; but this one roared to the sky like a drexl in flight: afterburn of its catalytics visible in the plume of smoke rising in the air.

Burning hydrogen for lift because the cooling coil’s in my pocket. How did she--?

Sei. Polla's husband was more of a mechanic than Revan had ever been. She'd watched him run checks of all the ship’s sensors, but she'd never accounted for him helping Dar over the woman with his wife’s memories.

How could he?

“Mother?” Revan heard her son’s voice, but she was still staring at the nearly vertical cruiser, nose pointed towards the lightening sky like a blade.

“No.” The Force was there always, now ready in her hands, taut as rope. Her fingers extended, even as she broke into a sprint, trying to reach for a maximum velocity, pulling towards the ship and sky with every fiber of her being. “No!”

Xxx

“Trouble,” Seiran told the Bitch. Out of the portside view, he could see the impossible: a figure rising up through the air, limbs flailing like gyroscopes. It was impossible--it should have been Impossible, but even as he watched, that crazy copy of Polla closed the distance. He could see her face now; mouth opened in a scream, features twisted and blurred by her velocity--

Something buffeted their craft like wind and there was a loud thump. He heard the hell-spawned Bitch mutter a curse, as the ship’s lift slowed, wobbling in the air, turbines whining, dangerously close to overload.

“Vent the jets,” the Bitch commanded, as their speed increased, and Seiran’s hand went to the lever before his brain caught up with the act.

“Are you insane?” His fingers froze on the control. “In atmosphere?” Something slammed hard onto their outer hull again, the pressure doors groaned with strain. Completely impossible. They had to be fifty meters off the ground when she’d made the leap—at least.

“She'll cut through the hull, if she succeeds, I’ll kill us all before I let her leave this world.”

A red, glowing stick of light appeared on the port side. The air smoked, smelling like cooking durasteel.

“Y-you want me to vent rads all over this farmland? But the crops--there are people down there. My son!” Yours, you insane bitch.

“A short burst.” Her hand twitched and the blade digging into their hull extinguished, leaving a smoldering line of red-hot metal in its wake. She turned the thruster hard and the ship banked. “They took more radiation getting here. Vent a few seconds. Just enough to burn her off.”

It felt like his head was splitting open. Someone was screaming—a wave of darkness and fury, blinding him, confusing all else. “Shut up,” he whispered. “Stop screaming.”

“You sense anger? That’s her,” the Bitch said calmly. “If she cuts through the hull, the ship will depressurize. We will fall from the sky. You will make your son an orphan.”

Seiran closed his eyes and moved the lever.

Hissing noise, and the ship rocked back and forth.

The screaming in his head cut out like a severed holoconnection.

“She’s dead.” Strange numbness. I killed the woman with Polla’s memories. But it’s not like I killed Polla. I killed her to save Polla I had no choice--

“I don’t think so,” the Bitch murmured. “That body is rather hard to kill.”

The starboard view now showed the woman, hands and legs outstretched, plummeting towards the ground.

We’ve got to be a thousand meters up. If she’s not dead yet, she will be soon.

“You’ve killed her,” he muttered. “Why didn’t you just do it before?” They lurched forward again, banking at a clumsy angle towards the stars.

“No.” The Bitch’s face was a mask, eyes so green they looked inhuman. But her voice was hesitant, as if she wasn’t sure either. “I stopped her.” She stood up slowly from her chair, twisting her long hair into a loose knot behind her head. The fall of it hung like a red hessi’s tail, almost to her waist. Seiran didn’t think she looked like his wife, but she did look like the woman whose life he’d just ended, the woman who had shown him nothing but kindness.

I've made a demon's bargain.  “You should have spoken to her. Explained. If what you told me about Tenebrae is true, surely she would--”

“No.” The Bitch shook her head. “She feels responsible. She thinks the Force can fix anything. She thinks she can fix everything.” She grimaced. “Were that true, I wouldn't have wasted a year looking for a box to put a monster in.”

“A box?” Crazy schutta. It the stakes weren't so high, he might have laughed. “You were going to put that Sith of yours in a box?”

“Yes.” The Bitch spared a glance for the navboard, where all lights flashed, close to redlining. One red eyebrow arched. Her lightsaber slid from her belt and into her hand as if summoned. She coiled the hair in her other hand. “The Rakata made their memory prisons to contain those they could not kill. Infinite space within a finite container. Enough to keep all of him contained—if only the box could be found.”

The blade ignited, green as her eyes. Before Seiran could react, her lightsaber whipped up and her hair fell, shorn like a kissra’s fur. The weight of it felt to the ground. The air smelled like burnt hair and ozone.

The Bitch blinked at him under a cap of red approximately the same length as the woman's she'd just sent to certain death. “I need you to make my hair into a topknot,” she said, deactivating her weapon and clipping back on her belt. “Since your own is maintained in that style, I assume you have the tools.”

“I think I'll fix the nav board first,” Seiran countered. You insane schutta. “We can worry about your hair when we get to Chassna.”

“No. Before we land,” she commanded. “We must make every effort to ensure that Sheris Loran no longer exists, eliminate every factor of confusion. There can only be one Revan Starfire.”

XXX

That asshole Tenebrae kept sneaking up on them, taking over Carth’s body with no warning whenever he wanted. After Carth had explained that was a thing, and that Tenebrae could only do it for a few minutes at a time, Polla started timing. The longest one was five minutes, five minutes of a Sith loser lecturing her about how he was purging his dark council of darkness of all of her “loyalists,” because he could.

“I don't care,” she told him, and smiled mysteriously, which pissed him off enough to vanish again.

They had left Yavin without any more drama. Well… at least, no unexpected drama. Polla herself had to act in the fracking, ‘This is Your Life, Revan Starfire’ vid all the fracking time.

Suvam bowed and scraped and offered her more lightsabers. Master Klee had gone off without even saying good-bye. The creepy Mouth of Suvam’s stood there, practically drooling. And the Tee Three kept acting like her new best friend.

The journey was supposed to take weeks. One of the Zabrak kids was doing the nav, and as much as Polla itched to get a closer look at his charts, she couldn't. They were all written in Sith gibberish, which she was supposed to be able to read. Without the stats on star types, gravitational stressors, solar winds, asteroid belts and orbital relays, they were just pretty pictures projected in the air.
But from the constellations she could tell they'd made the jump into the Deep. Nobody sane got out this far. Maybe the evil Sith Empire being here was why nobody sane came this way. That did not bode well, but neither did anything else.

“Hi!” Tee Three Mission rolled into her room, balancing a tray on her dome. “I brought breakfast! I don't do this for everyone, Lord Revan.”

“You didn't do it for me before today,” Polla practiced her best Sith Lord voice, folding her arms and glaring. There was a lot of that sort of thing on the vids. Being bribed and threatened had pissed her off, but it was hard stay pissed at a droid. Like getting mad at Bolts for not getting the stains out of the rugs. It wasn’t Tee’s fault she came across as kinda evil. It was all in her programming.

“I thought maybe we should cover some history.” Tee’s voice was annoyingly cheerful. “You know what Revan Starfire did, but your knowledge of galactic governments, wars, and trade deals is almost comically simplistic.”

“So? We're just going there to get one kid, right?” One kid who might be infected with a dead Sith Lord who could betray us all. Are we bringing tranks?

She would have to ask.

“It never hurts to be prepared!” The tray swiveled out and down onto the table, and a stack of printed flimsy emerged from the astromech’s side. “I’ve included all the basics: dates of galactic importance, major Sith Lords, the Krath rebellion….”

“Why do I need to know this? Can't you give me one of those ear thingies like Zaalbar has?”

Tee’s lights flashed. “Sorry, I can't risk the Creepazoid noticing it. That's why Carth can't have one again too.” The droid’s dome swiveled around the room in an exaggerated circle. “By the way, where is my old pal?”

“With the Zabraks.” He spent a lot of time with them, even when they weren't all Force-possessed. Polla was pretty sure it was to avoid spending the time with her. She kind of got it--totally strange, realizing that a Republic war hero that the galaxy thought was her type maybe could have been, under different circumstances. Like if he was a lot less uptight. Was that what the Star Forge quest had done to him? Revan herself? Being famous? It was a shame, because she caught glimpses sometimes of a perfectly fine man under all of that. Sometimes. “Hey, Mission?”

“Hey is for hessi.”

“We’re going to have to work on your joke motivators.” Polla made a face. “That was terrible.”

“And that had better be a joke,” the droid muttered darkly. How could a droid mutter anything? But this one did. “What is it that you want?”

“Tenebrae said I should ‘meditate’ for an hour each day to reach a greater understanding about my future? You mind if I use the fresher? I need to be completely undisturbed.”

Never mind the Sith asshole, the droid kept interrupting her almost as often. And if there was one thing Polla needed right now, it was privacy.

“Sure, sis.” Maybe she’d imagined the dark thing. Now Tee Three sounded all normal again.

Xxx
“If we get out of this alive,” Carth muttered, “we are never telling them about this part.” His back was a wall of muscle, more solid than Seiran’s. Hairier too, but warm, in the chill of their room. Emperor Creepazoid didn’t like the cold. They’d learned keeping it cold discouraged him from popping back over and over again, like he was trying to stick the connection. Or, as Polla suspected, catch them fracking.

“Gonna be hard to hide who the baby’s father is, if it has those sideburns.” Polla elbowed his ribs. They lay back to back on the shared bed. By mutual agreement, with their underwear on. “Will you relax, flyboy? I promise not to ravish you in your sleep.”

“I am relaxed,” he said in a voice that said opposite. “What is there to worry about?”

“I think she’ll understand,” Polla added. “We just have to make it look real.”

“Of course she’d understand. That’s not...” Carth sighed, and all those lovely warm back muscles tensed hard as a board. Then he rolled away from her and sat up. “Revan was trying to call me. We had enough of a signal last night that I checked the frequency. It matched the scrambled ones that she uses—that we used. I should have... I should have tried harder to call back before, but we needed a secure line—and this... what this blasted spacedump’s done to my head—I didn’t want to tell her. Not before we fixed it, but I should have told her. I should have commed her the second we reached Yavin. The minute I met you—"

“Don’t get technical, get even.” She squinted up at his face. “So... what did she say? Did she apologize for ruining my life? Is she coming to save us?”

“No.” He squinted at her, that half sleepy gaze she’d learned was part of his act. “I was thinking Zaalbar. You can’t—any more than I can.” He shook his head. “What if... what if we’re the trap? Or, it might not be her. It might be whatever killed her on the other end of that comm.”

“Me?” That’s what he had to mean. “You want me to comm her.”

“Nothing. She didn’t answer. Her comm just... rang.” He rubbed his temples as if it hurt. “I should... I should probably not keep the comm. I don’t want him to get suspicious. Or if I got through and he saw—but someone needs to keep trying her Someone needs to get through to her.”

“Me?” That’s what he had to mean. “You want me to comm her.”

But you don’t even think she’s dead. “Give me the comm and I’ll give it to the Wookiee,” Polla suggested. She was practicing her Shyriiwook. That was the one useful thing the Tee Three taught.

“Don’t call her yourself,” he insisted. “I mean it.”

Polla chuckled. “You have trust issues, flyboy,” she told him. “Seriously large trust issues.”

He got up from the bed, started pulling on his pants. Polla tried not to stare. Objectively, Sei had a better body, but something about the scar on flyboy’s ribs made her want to trace it with her fingers. Then her eyes traveled back up to his face and she realized that he was staring back at her, with that horrified expression that meant she’d done it again--said the exact wrong thing. How? Who fracking knew?

“We are not doing this,” he muttered.

“We’re not doing anything, Captain Obvious. I’m a happily married woman.” What was his problem?

“Here.” He shoved the comm at her. “Give it to Zaal. I mean it.”
“Do it yourself.” He wouldn’t. She already knew that. He tried not to do anything that would put the other crew in danger. Even if the risk of him turning into Tenebrae when he was talking to Zaalbar was like a million to one.

Captain Obvious shoved the comm at her again, and this time she took it.

“You want me to give it to Zaalbar?” She smiled at him, sweet as thisla pie. “Fine. I will.”

Eventually.

XXX

The commlink rang, just as they pulled out of hyperspace above Chassna.

“Hello?” The woman’s image was fuzzy, but the obvious features were there: hair in a Deralian knot, the pointed chin, nose a little broader at the base than the top. “Somebody commed my dear husband from this number. Can you turn on your visuals a sec? I need to see to who I am speaking.”

“Whom,” Revan corrected her. “To whom am I speaking? Or, more succinctly: ‘Who is this?’” She turned the dial, watching the woman’s expression as her own image appeared on the screen. Her eyes scanned the space between the pings, trying to figure out the transmission’s origin, but it was impossible to tell anything this far from the Core.

“Huh,” the woman said. “Do you know who I am?” That scowl, Fragment exact.

“That isn’t my first question,” Revan said. “Let’s begin with how you have this comm number.”

It was the Fragment’s comm, carelessly left in her quarters by the woman who thought she was coming back to their ship. Had the Fragment been in communication with the real Polla Organa? Or Tenebrae all along? What if this is a trap for me set by him?

“I got it from your husband. He’s leaving you and we’re running off to join the space fracking pirates,” Polla Organa said. “Thought you should be the first to know.”

“Which husband?” Revan had found the comm in the Fragment’s old room, the only thing of interest that the woman had left behind.

I would know if the Fragment was dead. She used the Force to slow her fall. I performed similar feats myself once. On Althir, when our ship was crippled, Malak and I joined hands and used our cloaks and the Force to slow our descent. The Fragment has an uncanny knack for preventing her own demise, and she has suffered worse.

And I would know if she were dead. I would... surely, I would know.

It wasn’t guilt she felt, merely regret.

“Which husband? Carth Onasi,” Polla Organa said. “But I can see, with all of yours, how you might lose track.”

“It’s no small thing, losing a husband,” Revan smiled. “I seem to have found one. Deralian? Swoop racer. Quite a remarkable pilot.”

“Pilot?” The woman’s laughter had an hysterical tinge. “You can’t mean Seiran.” Her voice hardened, and Revan had the distinct impression the woman was trying to sound like her. “Where is my son?”

“Safe.” To reveal anymore might spring the trap, or draw Tenebrae’s attention back towards Deralia. “Seiran is with me and your son is elsewhere. In safe hands. What is your location? Please be precise.”

“Prove it.” Polla Organa folded her arms. She appeared to be wearing Rakatan ceremonial robes. There were five lightsabers, hanging rather garishly from her belt. “Prove he’s safe. Show me Sei. Now.”

“I trust your word that Carth is safe.” And I can’t risk seeing him, since I can’t pass for his wife--not to him.

“I don’t know our location.” Polla’s head tilted. “Are you working with this asshole who kidnapped me? Did you kidnap my husband?”

I hope you don’t call him that to his face. “I oppose Tenebrae and all that he stands for,” Revan told her. Even if the woman was Tenebrae’s pawn, it would hardly be a surprise. It made no difference: the Sith Lord required her either way. “I have sacrificed all that I had to end him.”

“He thinks I’m you.”

Rather obviously, or you would be dead. “I’m impressed.” Glint of a Force collar on the woman’s neck. And that is why. It could only fool him for so long. “We are coming to rescue you. That’s why I need your location.”

“We’re in a ship...” Polla Organa shared the Fragment’s taste for unnecessary exposition. It was some time before she reached crucial points in her narrative, like the fact that Carth Onasi had been corrupted by Tenebrae’s kiss, that Master Klee was part of the resistance, that she had asked Tenebrae to bring Malak to Dromund Kaas--and that, as far as Polla Organa knew, Malak was on his way to Dromund Kaas already.

“We will be there soon,” Revan assured her. The rest was a mess: a dejakir board full of pieces she didn’t need, placed in positions that would only complicate her goal. “Try not to reveal yourself.”

“Try and hurry.” Polla Organa’s voice wavered. Her head turned away, as if reacting to external stimuli. “I have to go.”

“May the Force be with you,” Revan told her. “Our enemy has several estates on Kaas. Ping your coordinates to this comm upon arrival. I can handle the rest.”

“Thanks. I guess.” The woman stared at her. “You’re not what I expected.”

No doubt you and the Fragment would be exchanging tales from your shared misbegotten youth if I was. “Send the coordinates,” Revan told her. She severed the connection. Polla Organa’s face dissolved into a wall of static.
"No," the Jedi whispered. Her head strained to move in its brace. "Dar Revan esta deem! Trakellen. Sikuth-"

Molla Organa had only taken a few years of Ryl in school, barely enough for trade conversation. Whatever language Revan Starfire dreamed nightmares in… it wasn't Ryl. That was all she could say for sure.

"There, there," she patted the Jedi's hand awkwardly. It was too small for the rest of her, oddly delicate, skin pale and freckled. The other one was strapped down, bandaged in a kolto pack, and braced with a hydro splint.

"Mal," Revan whispered.

"I'm right here." Molla patted her hand again. It wasn't the first time the Jedi had called for her mother, even if by all accounts, the woman had been dead for ages. She wondered what it must have been like being the mother of a child who would grow up to be a galactic scourge, who could practically fly through the air with the Force, perform feats that were magic as easily as breathing.

Molla thought it must have been terrifying.

"Mal!" The woman twisted in her sleep.

"There, there." Molla checked her chron. Jasp was due to check in with the boy soon. Almost his bedtime. And Doctor Sahara was late. Again.

XXX

The ship set down on the dark side of the rocky moon. They adjusted the seals of their armor and debarked, magnetized boots clattering on the rocky ground.

"I told you there was someone here." Kex leaned over her shoulder, pointing towards the tracks illuminated by the lights of their vessel. "See?"

"A cart," Millifar noted. "Those treads look like Republic military."

"Maybe salvage," the unblooded boy agreed. "A small mining operation?"

"Mining what?" She didn't mean to denigrate his response, but the boy should at least have looked at the surveys before he agreed to come. "Our scans didn't show anything here, except-"

A scuffling noise from the darkness behind them interrupted Millifar's reply. "Don't move," a voice said, in accented Mandalorian.

A sniper's sight illuminated Kex's forehead with a target reticule of red and gold.

"Hello?" Millifar froze, her eyes meeting the boy's. The sniper had to be behind them. Slowly, she thumbed her wrist launchers on. "We're just looking for salvage," she offered in Basic. "We didn't know this planet was inhabited."
"You're Mandalorians." The voice was metallic, filtered through a mask of some kind, rattling over a speaker. "You... came from above?" She—the voice had a sweetness that could not belong to any boy-sounded disgusted and furious. "You came from that ship."

"Yes," Millifar admitted. What was the point of subterfuge when they outnumbered their foe?

"Knight Revan's rash'yar. Her flagship." Either their attacker was calling the Aleema a light cruiser as an insult, or her Mandalorian was poor. Going from the accent, Millifar suspected the latter.

"Rash klun," she corrected. "Any warship with more than five engines can hardly be called yar."

"It doesn't matter." The target reticule on Kex's face vanished. Rocks rattled as someone approached. "This is my moon. My system. You need to leave."

"I don't see your name on any claims made in the galactic record," Millifar shot back. "We checked, of course, before we selected this system for our base."

She motioned to Kex, and he nodded slowly, taking a few steps away from her. Millifar did the same. Now, at least their sniper would have to deal with two separate targets, not one. They both turned slowly to face their foe.

"Your base...." An armored figure emerged from the shadow of one of the larger rocks, backlit by the light of gas giant beneath them. "Your base for what?"

"We are refugees," Kex said, lying almost as well as a woman. "The ship's just salvage, but it's large enough to transport all of us. Our people are starving in the Malachor system. We need to find a new home."

"Malachor." The voice cracked, almost laughing. "Have you seen the fifth planet recently? Your sacred ground?"

"Not sacred now," Millifar's gloved hand activated her blaster's magnetic grip. "Also, none of your business."

"Don't move!" The figure advanced. She was wearing what looked like Mandalorian armor too—but no self-respecting vod would ever leave a breastplate cracked, or beskar legplates scored with burns. The armor was ill-fitting and, Millifar realized, the patchwork of several different sets: stippled with competing clan symbols, little more than cast-off salvage.

"You dishonor the steel," she used Basic again, so the woman understood. "You are not even dar'manda. Beskar is earned. We do not rob the dead."

"I earned the right to every piece of it," the woman said. "I earned the right on Dxun when I killed them all." She broke the helmet's seal and removed it, clipping it to her belt in. Her rifle dangled casually, but competently, in her other hand.

Her face was ordinary. Human. Hair matted with dust and grime against her skull. Round eyes, a square jaw. A tattoo of a star was inked in red across one cheek.

Kex muttered an old curse under his breath.

Millifar frowned at him. "What is it?"

"Surik," he whispered. "See the star? Mark of the Deathbringer. She's dar'jett."
"I am not," the woman snapped. "I am no Jedi."

"Don't be superstitious! Everyone knows the Deathbringer died on Malachor."

"No." Kex shook his head. "Everyone knows she went back to the Jedd, but they cast her out-

"I am standing right here." The woman's voice was hard as beskar itself. "And this is my world. I want you gone. You and your ship." She gestured with her rifle.

Millifar triggered her wrist launcher to active. She smiled. "I don't see your name on this moon."

"There are many names on this moon." The woman's boots scuffed the ground. "One for every Republic dead. Look at the stones. I wrote them all down."

That had to be some kind of trick, so Millifar kept her eyes trained on the figure in front of her, but she was annoyed to see that Kex actually bent his head to check.

Oerin wouldn't have checked. Neither would Mekel Jin. Just because she's a woman he didn't have to listen-she's not Manda!

"We honor our own dead." She stared the woman down.

"Good," the Deathbringer muttered. "Because I will not."

"I don't care."

But she did care, at least as an academic exercise. The woman was an artifact of recent history. Millifar had been a child when Revan's order destroyed the clans, but the science had never been explained sufficiently. Aemelie had told Millifar many bedtime stories about how it could have been done, but no one knew for sure.

"Of course you don't care." The woman's shoulders slumped. "You're Manda. All you care about is your next bloody battle."

"You're dar'Jett," Millifar snapped back. "You don't care about anything!"

It was not her best rebuttal, but the woman seemed to relax, taking a step back and scratching her filthy hair with her free hand. "I was different before."

"I was twelve when you did it. I thought my buir died at Malachor, but it was just one vod who died-and that was Althir."

"Which clan?"

Millifar was wearing Ordo's stamp, which would tell anyone not a barbarian her clan and lineage. Sad, that the Deathbringer didn't know the glorious history of those she had killed.

"Ordo," Kex told the Deathbringer.

"Ordo...." The woman said. "I get them confused. I remember Lin. And Zal. And Seska." She looked down at the marks on her armor, as if she had no idea what they meant.

"Seska's an under clan," Millifar said. "They don't have their own territories. They're beholden to Wies."

"Revan married into Clan Ordo," Kex said. "Your leader? Don't you watch the vids?"
"No," the woman said. "I… I used to, but I stopped." She looked down at her rifle and then back up at them. "I thought you said Revan was never going to come here. But if she's Ordo now and you are too-"

"She left us for the Jedi."

"They took her back?" Another hard laugh. "Of course. They took her back. The golden one. The rest of us-"

"I don't like her either," Millifar interrupted.

Something sparked in the woman's sun-stained eyes. "And why is that?"

"I have my reasons." They were not for a barbarian, especially the Deathbringer. "What are yours?"

The woman gave an incredulous laugh. "They would take a year to list."

"Then forget her." Millifar smiled, to put the barbarian at ease. "Can you tell me about the machine you used to destroy Malachor V? I read that you used a gravity well, but how did you generate enough energy to set off the reaction?"

"We had a… device that tapped into the planet's core." The Deathbringer looked startled by her interest. "The mass shadow generator was powered by a… device that tapped into the planet's core."

"Remotely? How was the energy transmuted?"

"I… I don't…." The woman looked confused now. Definitely off-guard. Or perhaps she truly did not know. A pity. Not that planet-killers were of much practical use. What was the point in utterly vanquishing your opponents? Aemelie had always said that. Their destruction would mean the end of battle.

"Admiral Dagmar Kain." Kex was actually reading the rocks now, picking them up one by one and then setting them down again. "Padawan Sy Six. Lieutenant Fandro Pine."

"Put those back," the Deathbringer warned him.

"Are you flirting, Kex? With her?" Millifar asked in Clan argot. "Shooting would be more effective."

"I came here to flirt with you." The boy didn't even have the temerity to blush, just turned to her and stared.

"Well, that is… good." He had grown a clipped beard in the time they'd been orbiting this moon. It did make him look more mature.

"Where is Revan now?" The Deathbringer interrupted their fragile progress.

"The nets say she's dead, but we know they lie," Kex said, apparently seeing nothing wrong with providing an enemy with correct information.

Surik spat on the ground like a man. "Is she coming here?"

"I don't know." It was the truth. Millifar counted the trajectory points carefully. Beating the Deathbringer in combat would be honorable. Technically, she should let Kex prove himself with this dar'Jett; but the woman annoyed her, mentioning the Third Wife again and again. "Are you frightened she will?"

"There's nothing more she can do to me." The rifle leveled at Millifar. "Let her come. Send her to me. I'm ready for her."

"You could fight me instead." She should leave this one for Kex, but how could Millifar turn down a challenge? Sometimes, she wished she had been born a man. Of course, some women did choose the warrior's path, but Millifar had always wanted her own tent. There was a time for all seasons, but procreation and battle did not mix—at least, as Mai had always claimed, not at the same time.

The Deathbringer laughed. Her eyes were light-colored, which made her look almost blind. "I could not fight you." Abruptly, she threw her rifle down. "I don't fight children. I don't kill children." Her weapons belt followed, and then the stolen helm. "Just go." Her voice wavered. "Please. You know there is no honor in shooting an unarmed opponent. There is no honor in fighting me. Go!"

Kex nudged Millifar, and she glared at them both. "We're going to tell my father you're here."

"I don't care." The Deathbringer's laugh was rougher than her words, anger held back. "Go. Now."

"Not for you, Kex of Clan Zal." But Millifar followed him back to the ship all the same.

XXX

"Radiation burns. A shattered pelvis. Three ribs, and that one wrist are broken. She's definitely concussed. And my initial scan showed internal bleeding, which seems to have resolved—which isn't possible." Doctor Sahara sighed heavily, adjusting the nutrient feed that ran into Revan Starfire's throat. "You know she belongs in a hospital? Not your spare barn?"

"Of course." Moll Organa shot her husband another glare for not taking care of the poor girl in the first place.

Jasp coughed. "Not many Jedi on Deralia. She'd be noticed."

The woman stiffened, voice turning sharp as a darner. "I wasn't aware there were any Jedi on Deralia. Or that we were calling her a Jedi now."

Doctor Sahara had no right to complain, considering that she owed them for recommending they let the Republic medix treat Pollie after her head injury in the first place. Not for the first time, Molla wished her overbearing father, the first Doctor Sahara, was still in charge of the Adaston practice. Man had been a right bastard; but he did know how to mind his own threshers.

But ever since the stroke, the old Doctor was a drooling veg, stuck on his commune, while his only daughter inherited his thriving medical practice.

"You can't let my mother die," the little son told Doctor Sahara fiercely.

"She should be dead already." Doctor Sahara pointed to each of the red-shaded areas on the holographic image of the woman's body. "The kolto helped, but it doesn't account for this—" she circled the area fading to a dull yellow on the image, where the woman's gut was. "This was all red yesterday—torn spleen, lacerations in the liver and stomach; not to mention damage to the spine itself."
"She's getting better," the child muttered. "She's got to get better."

"Hey… kid," Jasp addressed the boy. "Want to see how we aerate the fields for next year's crops?"

"You use those Riskeen tillers with the deep-cutting blades. I studied 'Colonial Farming and Textile Production' for one of my units last quarter." Korrie was chewing on his lower lip on and off. It looked bruised.

"Hrmm." Jasp had a good pazaak face, but Molla could tell the child rattled him. "Well, have you ever seen a Riskeen tiller?"

"No," the poor kit responded, listless. He was holding a datachip in his hands, turning it over and over. Moll had offered to play it for him twice now, to get him distracted, but he'd only shook his head and told her it was for his mother and something private.

Truth be told, she felt slightly unsettled by Korrie D'Reev.

But he's Revan's boy. She brought him to us to keep him safe. We're the only family they have.

Brave words. Now Molla realized that there was a difference between thinking Revan Starfire was family when your own daughter was safe and home, and having Darth Revan in a coma as her replacement when Pollie was stars knew where.

Moll sighed. "I just wish your mother had thought to visit sooner!" And also not to jump off a moving space cruiser. If Revan Starfire hadn't landed in the middle of their largest retaining pond, water breaking her fall, Moll thought that even the Force wouldn't have saved her.

Doctor Sahara sighed. Her hazel eyes turned towards the poor woman's son. "I still don't understand how this… unfortunate accident occurred."

Jasp cleared his throat. "Neither do we." He exchanged a look with Molla. Seiran had been on that cruiser, by the child's account, along with a mercenary the boy said had been hired to rescue Polla Organa. "We hope it was an accident."

"You hope," the doctor scoffed. "She needs a hospital to check for spinal injuries. Or a Jedi healer. I've seen them work miracles. I can't….

"No Jedi," the boy mumbled. He held onto his mother's hand for dear life. Poor tyke. Molla reached out her hand to ruffle his hair and he jerked away as if she'd threatened him. "You can't call them, okay? Nobody can know we're here." He chewed on his lip again, glaring at them all with those strange, silvery eyes. "If you tell the Jedi we're here, I'll tell everybody Polla Organa and her son and stuff are still alive and how you guys lied before."

Jasp's mouth fell open like he was using it to catch flies. "You're threatening us? We took you in!"

"I don't make threats," the child muttered fiercely. "I make vows."

The news was already talking like there were no more Jedi as it was. Still, the child had fort, sounding off like he was to them.

"We won't tell," Molla comforted. There were tears at the edges of his eyes, and little Korrie seemed as wild as an unbroke colt. Poor little tyke. Not his fault his parents were galactic scourges. "We promise. Doctor Sahara promises too. Doesn't she?"

"I've done what I can," the doctor rubbed her temples. "She belongs in a hospital—or with her own kind. If she's crippled, or she dies, it's on you."

"That's right," Molla told her. "She's our problem."

Her family had learned all too well before that Republic help always came with a price.

XXX

Pollie could be sleeping in a tank of kolto, if not for the metal dome that covered half of her skull. The medical ward of this Republic warship was bigger than a square field groundside, and Molla Organa felt lost.

The screaming coming from down the hall wasn't helping. Guttural, choked cries-sounding almost as if they came from underwater.

"We've repaired the damage," the healer told her. He was Cerean, and a Jedi, if robes and a lightsaber meant anything, (and Molla assumed that they did.) "Given time, your daughter should be entirely well. She was very lucky. But we-"

Another scream, and then the sound of breaking glass. The Jedi jerked, as if he'd been shot. An alarm went off, claxons sounding, just like on the vids about space wars.

"Who is that?" Molla asked him. "Is Pollie safe?"

"We... have some prisoners of war here. Jedi do not execute their prisoners, they-"

"Master C'Var." A woman stood in the doorway. Dark-haired, braids, quite young. Really more of a girl. "You are needed."

Another ear piercing shriek.

"Excuse me." The Jedi seemed abnormally calm, just like on the vids.

The girl with braids nodded to Molla. "Stay with your daughter as long as you wish."

Molla tried not to be rattled by the noise, as the Cerean rushed off. The girl with braids smiled shyly at her, scrolling her finger down a datapad. But Moll noticed, every time there was another scream, she flinched. "You're... this is Polla Organa?"

"And I'm Molla-Moll. Her mother." Molla told her. "Are you one of the medics?"

"I-yes." The girl nodded, as if distracted, still staring at the datapad. "Your daughter is fine."

"They keep telling me that," Moll snapped. She felt so useless, sitting here with Mita's thisla pie, and Pollie's childhood scrap of blanket. "But she's still unconscious."

"We're bringing her out of the coma tomorrow," the nurse offered.

"Will she be...herself?" Was there a polite way to ask if your daughter was going to have permanent brain damage?

"She... yes." The nurse nodded vigorously. "Your daughter had a skull fracture and concussion, but she's made a full recovery."

Another scream. Another flinch.
Moll tried to make a joke. "Aren't you glad you got me to talk to, and not that lady's mother?"

"Hers is dead." The nurse mumbled the words, staring at the floor as if she was saying them to herself. "Her mother's dead."

Xxx

Sensation returned by degrees. First smell, then sound.

That smell was familiar, almost like the incense they burned on Beggar's Row to promote prosperity when Moms could afford it, which wasn't very often. Probably because burning incense for prosperity didn't fracking work.

This air smelled almost like that but sweeter, somehow. Almost like a hint of vanillin and spice.

"Citizen, you will need to put that out," a mechanical voice chimed. Incendiaries are not permitted in this hospital."

"It's incense," a gruff voice answered. "It will go out when it's done."

"The burning of any substance with-"

Another smell, like burning ozone, and a startled beep, cut out mid-tone. A click and the droid went quiet. Metal clattered to the ground.

"That's better," the voice said gruffly.

The smell continued. They liked it. No. Not they. He liked it. Just him. Mekk, all on his lonesome. The incense smelled better than a hospital. He was getting so sick of hospital smells. Entire fracking Jedi Temple smelled like a medix there at the end.

"Your mother said I should burn this, Mekel," the voice said. "It's supposed to bring health."

Moms cares. Cute. Just not enough to be here.

"I am sorry," the gruff voice said again, after a long silence. "There's a reason we don't have children. I-I saw that with Revan. I... see that again now."

Didn't want me either, Dads? It might have been funny if Mekel wasn't alone.

Cool light washed over his side. Even with his eyes closed, Mekel could see it, feel it in the Force. Cooling the pain, the ache in his side.

"My boy." Vrook's voice cracked. "My dear son."

Telos would have had a good joke, Mekel thought. Master Vrook losing his choobs all over my deathbed? It should be funny.

Fingers tightened on his. Funny, he couldn't tell if they were Vrook's or Dustil's.

"How is he?" Another voice. Another presence in the Force. When he concentrated, Mekel could feel the Force, but it was twisted strangely-like a part of it was stretched. But he knew this voice as well.

"Better, I believe. Thank you for your assistance."

Noise like a chair shifting. Another hand on his other side. More warm light. "I have an obligation to them." A small, tired sigh. "They are the last, you know. The last of my students."

"But Thalia-"

"She disappeared a week ago."

That's rough. Poor Thalia May. Hey, Telos. Thalia bought it before us, you owe Shardaan fifty creds-

Of course, Shardaan had died when Revan cut through Dreshdae, so he wasn't around to collect. Of course, Mekel should feel something else too. Thalia had been their friend. And Lydie Korr's friend. What if she's dead too? How the frack are Jedi still dying?

If Mekel was conscious, he would kick that red-eyed asshole Sith emperor in the choobs before gutting him.

"With so many missing, do you believe Dustil Onasi survived his abduction?"

"I know he did. Mekel Jin will not survive his death. Nor will Dustil survive Mekel's end." Yuthura Ban's voice was tired. "Strength has its price."

"And Darth Malak?"

"You sensed the same energies I did. Is he trapped in the bond with them? If Malak had a living body, their strength would be channeled into its form. Instead, he stands between."

"If the bond was broken?"

Telos? Was it already broken? It felt like a part of Mekel was… stretched. Stretched and frozen, far away. Telos? Answer me!

"It was not made to be broken."

"But if it could be?" Why was Vrook so interested? Did he want to drive them apart? Figured, the one good thing that had happened and his dads wanted to cut off their access to unlimited power.

Dustil?

Nothing. Just more black. Mekel tried to open his eyes.

"Son?" The word was hilariously wrong coming from old Lammikins. "I think he moved."

"Mekel? Can you hear us?" Yuthura always wore perfume that smelled like flowers and musk. She had to be leaning over him pretty close now too-

Mekel's eyes opened and caught a load of her cleavage as the world focused. Kind of weird how their old master could make even padawan robes look hot.

"Yeah." His nose itched, and he sneezed. His voice felt weak as a manka cat. "What… where's Dustil?"

"We were hoping you would know," Yuthura said.

He turned to Vrook, and it was the craziest thing. The old coot was crying, actually crying—as if Mekel Jin being alive was something worth crying about.
"Son," the Jedi murmured, and the next thing Mekel knew he was enfolded in scratchy cortosis fabric, and squeezed by surprisingly strong arms.

Why couldn't Ban be the one giving me hugs? At least then I'd get to have a feel-

But the thought was weak and half-hearted without Dustil's exasperated sigh. And, weirdly, Mekel found himself hugging the old coot back.

Incense smoldered on a meter-high stick beside his bed. On the floor behind them, was a deactivated medical droid. I think the old man zapped it. Old stick-in-the-mud Vrook Lamar zapped a CoruMed droid... for me?

It hurt to laugh, but Mekel did it anyway.

XXX

Was that Revan who had been screaming on that Jedi Republic ship?

Molla had never put two and two together before. Had Bastila Shan been wearing a lightsaber then or not? Strange, the things you remember and the things you don't.

If that wasn't her screaming, who else did they have on that ship?

Polla had better still be fine. The story Revan had given them on the comm about the Exchange and Nar Shaddaa was as fishy as a Selkath's behind. She knew Jasp thought so too. She was pretty sure Jasp knew more that he hadn't said.

That meant it was bad. Really bad. But today she welded a cheerful smile on her face. For Jasp's sake. His and the child's sake.

"Hold the line here," Doctor Sahara said to the boy. "I need to attach the new feed."

The boy's hands were small and white and freckled too, just like his ma. His red hair flopped down in untidy curls. So far, he'd resisted Moll's every effort to tame that hair. It was falling in his eyes again now and even as she watched, he pursed his bottom lip up and blew it to the side, away from his eyes. "When is my mother going to wake up?"

"I don't know that she will." The doctor's voice was kind, if a little tactless. "Do you know why she fell? Was she trying to harm herself?"

"No." The boy bit his lip. "It was an accident, of course."

"Of course it was an accident!" Molla soothed.

"It was," the tyke insisted again. "I knew she was going to get mad, but I didn't realize she'd get that mad. I should have stopped her. The message was supposed to stop her, but I didn't have a chance to play it!"
"You can't blame yourself for the actions of others," Doctor Sahara said. "Especially your parents. You are your own person. Always remember that."

"You have a place here with us," Molla added, because what else could she say? "No matter what happens with your ma."

The future stretched in front of her, worst case. When Jasp left to look for Pollie (and she knew he would-soon, sure as salt), it would just be her and Abasen and this uncanny child.

She stitched on her brightest smile. "You know, when my Pollie was your age, she loved to ride her hessi pony. Have you ever ridden?"

"Ridden?" The tyke frowned as if she was speaking Rodese. "Like in a palanquin? A… carriage?"

"Oh, my." The poor, sad dear. "You're going to love meeting Dancer! He was Polla's hessi, back when she was your age...."

XXX

The ship hummed securely, turbines moving smoothly through hyperspace.

Standing in the engine room, the door half-open, Seiran risked a wary glance towards the cockpit. With the door half-open, he could see that the Bitch was still bent over the communications console with a wall of holographic data in front of her, scrolling through code like she was some kind of data-jock on a bender. Maybe she was. The compugoggles made her eyes into blank orbs. Creepy, because she could be staring right at him, and he'd never know-not unless her invisible fingers slipped back around his neck again, threats sliding like poison into his brain, feeding on his fear and desperation-

Just do it. Do it now. If you think about it, she might know.

Could Jedi read minds? Could Sith? Could Revan fracking Starfire? There had been that bad moment back on Chassna, when he'd tried to send a message back to Jasp-only to find her standing right behind him, only to find the terminal in front of him inexplicably smoldering, only to find her invisible claws around his heart again-faint pressure, just a warning.

XXX

"I can't let you betray me." Her voice was flat, but her expression didn't match it. She looked almost like she wanted to cry. "I need you to pilot this ship, and you need me to save your wife. But I can get another ship." One narrow, red eyebrow arched. "You might not find a replacement wife as easily."

XXX

Just do it. She can't kill you. She can't fracking fly this ship without you. She almost sent us into the damn sun back when we were looping Deralian orbit-

Seiran took an even, steady breath and looked across the ship again. In the silver rectangle of the open door, he could see her face in shadow behind lines of data, red hair in that blasted topknot he'd had to help her tie, the glint of her golden artificial arm.

He had to do it soon, or they'd be out of range of any fuel depots on the Outer Rim. As it was, he hoped to Grass he'd gotten the numbers right. Running jump-points in his head-that was Polla's game, not his. And fuel capacity was dependent on solar winds, galactic drift, fracking ionizationwhat if he had gotten that wrong too?

There wasn't much room for error. He had to do it now.

Saying one last prayer to anyone who was fricking listening, Seiran slipped inside the engine room. Once there, he breathed a sigh of relief, trying to think calm thoughts. She can maybe read my mind, she can probably sense my fear. Fracking Jedi do that. Fracking Jedi can read minds and fly and do fricking anything-

Except, he hoped, notice a pinhole fuel leak in the main reactor line.

Seiran took a deep breath and unsnapped the hatch. Picked up the hydrospanner. And set the laser to burn against the pipe that led into the primary fuel converter.

XXX

Revan leaned back in the pilot's chair, blinking her tired eyes at the comm feed scrolling in front of her.

The comm records were quite clear, now that she had restored the files the Fragment had inefficiently attempted to delete. The Fragment had made two calls before they even left Coruscanti air space: one to a remote waystation in an unnamed system (near Rekkiad and Mandalore, but that could be coincidence); and another to a familiar coordinate on Kashyyyk.

What were you trying to do with the Rakatan computer, Fragment?

Whatever it was, the woman had rather carelessly left her own security sequences embedded in the message. The ones Revan had set years ago no longer worked: but these did. Instead of receiving the now-familiar drone of a rejected code, this time the comm connected.

Someone or something has to be at the other end of the line. Someone she spoke to. The computer? That Mission Vao personality she implanted? Tenebrae's agents? Oerin Lin? Canderous Ordo?

"Hello?" a voice said. The visual was still blocked, but the lights rang green, verifying the secure connection. The voice was female. Speaking Galactic Basic. "Who is this?"

Perhaps the Fragment had some code, some clever response. Revan had none. "This is Revan Starfire. I require access to your computer's mainframe. Immediately."

"Oh!" The voice sounded startled. "Hold on! I'll... I'll tell him."

Him?" No," she muttered. If Tenebrae has Kashyyyk things are even worse than I thought.

XXX

"Nico." Lena stood in the doorway.

Her husband was so engrossed in the screen in front of him that he didn't look up. "Are you ready, Mission?"

The console beeped. "I think so. I'm a little nervous!"

"Nico?" she said again.

"In a moment, Lena. I have to disconnect her virtual cortex from the Kashyyyk installation now."
His voice was distracted, and he didn't even turn around. "Say good-bye to Lena for now, Mission!"

"See you soon, sis!" the console chirped.

Nico flipped a switch and all the lights on the display in front of him died out with a whine.

"See you, Mission-" Lena raised her hand to wave, and then lowered it again, feeling more silly than ever.

"She can't hear you." Still, Nico didn't even turn around to look at her. Before him was a wall of ferraglass, and beyond that, an operating theater with the two Twi'lek near-corpses within. Medical droids hovered over the bodies, presumably following his-or Mission's-commands. "Implanting new memories in a clean cerebellum is delicate work! We can't allow any contamination!"

"Nico," she said again. "The comm rang. It's... Revan."

"Oh, her." He gave an irritated half-wave of his hand. "We don't need her! I'm still a fan, of course; but the original directive is redundant... now. We don't need to repair the original Sith Vitiature matrix--not when you and I can replace it." Now, he finally did turn around, and gave her that goofy smile she used to find so, so charming. "I'd love an autoprint through. Would you ask for me?"

"Replace...?" Lena smiled at him, resting her hands on her belly, and fluttering her lashes. "I don't know what you mean."

"This emperor's errant programming. An organic system went bad. It happens. The Starfire routine was needed for repairs. That's why my computer searched for her, made her in the first place! But now..." Nico smiled. "Now, we can reboot and use the existing units to replicate properly! Do you see?"

"No." Nico often didn't make sense. Lena had grown used to that. "You mean... more computers? More installations? On more worlds?"

"Installations." He chuckled. "Portable, organic ones. Hundreds... err, billions of them. Thousands? At least! And we get to rule them all! How does that sound?"

"I don't understand." She was afraid that she did. "What... what kind of computers are those?"

"Sentient ones!" He beamed. "The beauty is, they already exist. The emperor matrix seeded itself prodigiously! True, it took it some time to create the right evolutionary counterweight; but what a counter she was! Magnificent!"

"She?"

"Revan, of course." He gestured for Lena to come closer and she did with a chill. *He's not gonna hurt you, Lena Wee. He might be a monster, but he's your monster. "Dark, light. Opened, closed. One, two. It's all binary." He actually winked. "Male. Female. His virus. And then hers. We've got vectors of his, mostly here in Sith space... and then hers, with the antidote right here!" He gestured towards the room, drawing a circle with his hand. "Around... here. I mean."

"Around... here," she echoed. "T'chwrr-"

"Just say Nico." He reached over and his hand caressed her belly, then gave it a sharp pat. "Questions? I'm sure you have many. We have nothing but time, love. I mean, once I transfer your consciousness to the female-gendered node of my binary replicant, we'll have nothing but time."

"Uh huh." Lena nodded. She'd known, of course. Of course, this was all too good to be true. Of course, her ancient and probably immortal husband's plans for their future would involve brain transplants.

Of course! So stupid!

Your first clue, Lena Wee, should have come when he talked about taking over the galaxy. Do you think normal guys want that? Normal guys are like freaking Griff. They might be assholes; but when the chips are down, you can count on them to not have some insane thirty-thousand-year-old scheme. Normal guys you can kick groundside, but this guy....

"Revan," she repeated. "She's on the comm now. What... uh, what do you want me to say?"

"Tell her to call back," her husband said absently. "Imagine! Billions of worlds, worlds filled with you, and worlds filled with me!" He frowned. "Or at least... millions? Dozens? I lose track of how many infinite really is. It doesn't matter, after a point! How does that sound to you?"

"Lonely," Lena Wee remembered the blaster she'd hidden in her suitcase before she came back here, the white walls inside the box she'd found on Tatooine. The swoopboy's screams when she'd won what hadn't even been a fair test, and left him there again. Poor Nico. Poor, real, dumb Nico Senvi. "It sounds... lonely, Nico."

He bent over the console. The surgeon droids cut through t'chin and t'chin, following his command. "What was that? Lovely? It sounds lovely to me too! Can you tell Revan to call back after I finish this operation? She may be a redundancy, but I do owe her my renewed existence!" He paused. "We'll keep her, I think. She's a fantastic conversationalist. I've read all of the logs. You should read them too." He snapped his fingers. "We can read them again together!"

"Sure." Lena nodded slowly. "I'll... I'll let her know."

Xxx

Time passed and Revan stared at the blank comm. The display had switched on, showing the corner of a room. Bland, prefab walls, a chair. It could have been anywhere at all. Enough time passed that her mind concocted theories: that Tenebrae controlled the Rakatan machines. That he'd found the other Forges. That everything she'd sacrificed had always been too little. Too late.

"It's not over," she muttered. To herself. To the Force. "I have a second chance. He's still insane. He can still be tricked."

"Are you okay?" The pilot had come up behind her. "Is everything alright?"

She glanced up. He had a smear of engine oil on his cheek. "I have matters under control."

"Who are you calling?" His voice was neutral, but she caught the undercurrent of his fear, a rancid tang in the Force itself.

"My computer," she told him. "We need its assistance, but there seems to be a problem-"

"I'm back." A pink Twi'lek regarded Revan warily, eyes flickering as if she saw Seiran too. She appeared real. And quite obviously pregnant.

"I'm sorry," she added crisply. "I did ask my mate to speak with you, but he's very busy."
"I don't need to speak with your mate, I need the computer." Revan bit back a sigh of impatience. Standing behind her, Seiran flinched again. His fear bothered her, like a healing scab. "This channel belongs to the computer installation on Kashyyyk. I don't know how you hacked into it, but-

"The computer is Mission Vao." The Twi'lek folded her arms. Her lekku wrapped around her neck. "You don't have to pretend. I know. I know what you did to her." She paused. "Well, you can't hurt her anymore." She wiped her eyes. "She's going to be safe now. Safe from you and him."

"Most of the galaxy is aware of my actions." Revan tried to be patient. "Please connect me to the mainframe. I am attempting to fulfill the directive it requested of me, but I need its assistance."

"He said he didn't need you anymore."

"He?" The woman's voice sharpened. "He who? Do you mean Tenebr-"

"Who? Never mind. It doesn't matter." The woman shook her head and cut the comm.

"Blast!" Revan hit its surface; but carefully, so as not to damage anything.

"What was that about?" The pilot's voice held a deceptively casual tone.

"That was about a potential ally. Or enemy. Both." No harm in telling him. Either the man would die with her secret, or it would become irrelevant, upon her success. "The Rakatan computer required someone like me. I… resisted when I discovered its real design. I tried to find a way out. Nothing worked. Now, I… I plan to give it what it wants. Or, at least, the semblance." Her mouth twisted. "Should I succeed, I should have enough strength to save you and your wife."

"So you needed some computer and it refused to help?"

"Yes."

"Did you try rebooting it?" His tone was so dry, Revan couldn't tell if he was ignorant, or making a bad joke.

"Remotely-yes," she snapped. "Several times."

"Then I don't know what to tell you. Except… that if we don't refuel this ship, we won't make it to your Sith planet."

"I checked the fuel levels twice!" She could feel his fear in the Force. Was there a lie there too? "We're burning twice what we should. Your short-term fix from Chassna didn't fix the problem." Seiran Wen shrugged. "You know I want to get to your blasted Dromund Kaas as much as you do, but we're not gonna make it."

"Where?" she snapped. "Where can we refuel?"

"Peragus," he said, pointing to the asteroid belt on the projected star chart. "Peragus Mining Station. It's remote, cheap, and only two jumps away."

Xxx

Three days later, Jasp Organa dusted off his old ship and left to check in on an old contact who might know something about Polla's business. Molla wasn't surprised to see him go at all.

"Be careful," she told him.

Like father like daughter. Advice that neither of them had ever been able to keep.

"Always." He grinned at her, looking for a moment like the handsome scoundrel she'd fallen for. "You're the one needs be careful, Molla. You're the one keeping a Jedi in our barn."

"She's family," Molla repeated stubbornly, even if the fact rang false. "They have nowhere else to go. And she can't be moved. You heard the doctor."

"The boy could be moved. We don't need to borrow trouble."

"The boy is hers. She trusted us."

Such a sad child. Korrie seemed strangely old and young at the same time. And helpless. The boy hadn't even known how to buckle his own shoes!

Molla worried about the mother, but the boy could break her heart, if she let him. She had never seen a child before so wary, so afraid of dirt. Abasen seemed to like him, but she wasn't sure if her grandson had enough brains yet to be a good judge of character. He was only just starting to crawl.

"You be careful," Jasp told her seriously. "If she wakes up... you need to remember, she's not our Pollie. She has powers. I saw her fly."

"Polla loved to fly." Although their daughter used a ship or a swoop. "I'll use caution, sweet, don't worry."

"Be careful," he repeated. "Promise."

"Careful as crops," she promised. "You think I can't handle my grandson, a comatose Jedi and a little boy?"

"I bet the boy has that Force too," her husband muttered. "Keep him out of the trees."

"I'll be careful," Moll agreed. "You do the same."

"I'll do my best," he muttered, and walked up the ramp. She stood in the field for a long time, watching the tracer tail of his ship fade into the flat, reddening sky.

Xxx

Revan wondered if the man had led her into this trap on purpose. Ahead of them, the unstable asteroid field surrounding the Outer Rim mining facility shifted again. Piloting in this rocky soup was well beyond her capabilities—even in a ship that wasn't already limping like a stuck ronto.

"Surely there are simpler waystations to reach, Seiran Wen."

"I told you," the Deralian said. "Not on this route. We've been burning too much since you sabotaged the coil. Peragus Station's the best shot we have. They don't ask questions, once they see the color of your credits."

"There is no time!" Revan had been over the maps again and again. Based on what the smuggler had said about her own ship's location, Polla Organa and the crew of the Ebon Hawk were days ahead to Kaas. At least.
Her ability to fool the Dark Council will end the moment they remove that collar—if she even lasts this long.

Why did it matter? That was a question with too simple an answer. Because Sheris has infected me with this sentiment, or the Fragment has. Because I was a Jedi. Because she is an innocent. Because I held her son in my own arms and left mine with her family.

I am not above being a sentimental fool and believing in hope, even when it makes no difference.

"I want to live through this," Seiran Wen muttered. "But I swear by the stars if you don't listen to me, I'll take my chances in an escape pod and leave you to rot. We don't have enough fuel to reach your blasted Sith planet! Either we refuel… or we fracking die out here."

"So you said before." Revan gestured towards the rapidly approaching asteroid, hangar bays incised in its surface, larger freighters clamped like mynocks to its sides. "How quickly can it be done?"

"A few hours." He was looking at her strangely. "You've flown ships before, you know how it goes."

"Not commercially." The Fragment would know if he was stalling for time or not. Revan had no idea. "I will stay on the ship." Too close to be recognized now. "You will address the refueling requirements."

"Yes, Darth Revan." The Deralian rolled his eyes. "Whatever you say."

"Betray me and you'll never see Polla again." She would not comment on his absurd attempt to goad her.

Xxx

"Hello, dear." Molla had peered cautiously at the screen, still blinking back the sleep from her eyes.

"Your daughter needs transport from Nar Shaddaa," the red-headed woman had said. Revan Starfire's face was blurry, but unmistakable—even in the wee hours before dawn when Jasp had woken Moll and dropped a kilo of thermocrete in their laps. "Seiran requested my help, and so he and I will take my ship to collect her. We will leave your grandson and my son with you. We should return in a few weeks for them. Malachor is an excellent child, and he will be easy to care for." She frowned. "He prefers to be called Korrie."

In the distortion of the comm's feed, she did look a little like Pollie.

"Something's rotten," Jasp muttered under his breath.

"How sweet!" Moll elbowed her husband to get him to shut up. "But isn't it… a little awkward, what with the galaxy thinking you and Pollie are both dead?" At that exact time she'd been a little proud that the former scourge of the galaxy was taking lines from her own daughter's playbook.

"No. It will be fine," the woman replied, rather woodenly. "But I will need to leave my son with you for a time."

"How much time, dear?" Best to get this sort of thing quantified.
"A few weeks." The woman shrugged. "You did say we should visit. In your card, congratulating me on my wedding."

"Will your husbands be joining us?" When she'd issued the invitation, her daughter had still been safe at home, not pretending to be dead, not pretending to be Revan, and not missing.

"No, they... have business elsewhere."

"Pollie is all right?"

Mother's intuition. As a girl, Molla had thought the concept overdone, and her own mother had made it up, but now her nerves jangled like fire. Something about this was queer. More than what you'd expect, even, when the woman with your daughter's memories called and asked for a visit when the galaxy assumed that she and your daughter were both dead.

"Yes," the woman nodded. "Your daughter's going to be just fine."

"Bless your heart," Molla Organa murmured. Because, what else was there to say? "We can't wait to see you!"

In hindsight, Molla thought that Revan Starfire on that comm had sounded a lot like Bastila Shan in that way Jedi had. Lying and saying everything was fine when it wasn't.

And Jasp wouldn't meet her eyes after she had said yes. Jasp hadn't wanted her to say yes. Molla knew, sure as salt, that there was a lot here going on that Jasp still hadn't told her.

XXX

"I'm Korrie," he told the others. Aunt Moll had said their names, but Korrie had forgot. All these Deralians had nicknames and used surnames, and had the same names, so it was pretty confusing. The girl with the double top knot who was probably about eight standard was even named Polla. Polla Thiswait.

"You talk funny," said the boy with the gray tooth. His skin was deep brown, like Jess Almont's, and he was Korrie's size. "My ma says you're a ref."

"From Nar Shaddaa," he lied, just like Moll told.

"He talks like the vids," Polla Thiswait said to the lighter-haired girl next to her.

Korrie smiled at them. A Senator's heir was always supposed to be polite, even to rebellious Outlier colonists like these. "Moll said you could teach me to ride one of the hessi."

The beasts were all grouped up in a pen together. Some of them had tongues hanging out, almost to the ground. They had a lot more legs than dewbacks or bantha. They looked like monsters, in fact; but he would not show fear.

Mother had told him to be brave. No matter what.

"Which one is Dancer?" he asked.

Xxx

"Have you heard anything from the ship?" the child demanded. At least he had some color in his cheeks now, from being outside all day with the others. But his freckles clashed strangely with the dyed black of his hair. Molla should have used a lighter mix. "You said you would let me know if… if anyone commed you from there."

"Told you I'd say, and I haven't," Moll told him. "Don't worry, Korrie. You're in safe hands here."

"I can monitor her condition for the next five hours," the doctor interrupted. "If you both want to catch some sleep, do it now."

"You guys don't have to watch her all the time," Korrie muttered. "I'll know if she wakes up."

"We… do." Doctor Sahara said, glancing at Molla. "We have to watch her because we wouldn't want your mother to wake up and have another… accident, would we?"

"It wasn't like that!" The boy shook his head. "She wasn't… she was just mad. She said that she'd be mad and I had to make her see, but I didn't have any time! When she wakes up, I'll explain. When she wakes up she'll be fine!"

"We need to watch her to make sure she's not mad again."

Molla patted his back and this time he didn't pull away. Although, she had to wonder, if the woman woke up with the full force of the Force and was mad, what could they do? Hadn't Bendowen's girl used to make crops wilt with her eyes or some such, before the Jedi took her away?

Aunt Mita always used to say that worry didn't pay arrears, and that at the end of the day if nothing else worked, most problems were solved with a good rifle and a few cakes of permacrete.

By all the stars, Molla hoped it would not come to that, although her eyes went to the corner near the barn door, where those exact provisions were carefully stacked.

Just in case.

"Of course she'll be fine, Korrie. Look at how much better she is already!" Before he could stop her, Molla gave him a hug.

XXX

Suvam Tan regarded the Human Elder warily. The man was wrinkled and pale, closer to the end of his life's trials than the beginning. Entirely unsuited to be a Voice, even as a lesser vessel.

Also, he was certifiably insane, because he kept asking after his dead daughter.

"Polla Organa is dead," he repeated to the man for what seemed the hundredth time. "Revan Starfire had her killed."

The Human blinked at him. "No," he repeated. "My daughter was here. Recently. I need to know where she went."

"I can see how you get them confused," Suvam nodded. "Many Humans look alike, and they are both big-eyed, for your species. But Revan recently gave birth, and that changed her coloration. Also, she had Polla Organa killed."

"You're insane." The Elder Human snorted, waving his useless blaster about. The Mouth had already disabled the weapon's inner workings with the Force, of that Suvam was sure. "Show me the station logs. You say Revan was just here? Then where is she now?"

"Revan went to Dromund Kaas." It was lonely without her and her loyal companions. Suvam had enjoyed their talks as she fumbled through his vast lightsaber collection, selecting only the hilts with the most jeweled and ornate decorations, occasionally asking him specific questions about various gemstones, and the value of the crystals within.

Perhaps as a Jedi, she had never had to know such petty things as commerce, but now, as she prepared to join the Master's side-

"Drumming Case," the man repeated, saying the planet's name almost exactly as Revan herself did. "And where is that, exactly?"

"A Sith planet. I think you would prefer not knowing."

The proximity alarms rang. Peculiar. Two visitors in one day? "Excuse me," he added, trying to be polite to this gray Human. "It seems that we have additional guests."

Suvam was still pulling up the new ship's registry when it the sound of landing bolts clamping echoed through the station. Something big. No small airlock would make so much noise. The station rattled softly.

He was so often left out of the loop. Tenebrae had his own designs.

Suvam couldn't sense anything, but he could look out at the view.

The hulk of a capital ship eclipsed the red giant behind them. Its sides were scored and torn, a vast Centurion-class battlecruiser.

The old man squinted at it. "Who the hell is that?"

"Maybe it's Revan," Suvam assured him. Who else would come to call in a warship in this time of peace? "You can take up the case of your missing daughter with her."

The Aurebesh letters of the ship's hull were clear: Ravager.

Xxx

Hurry. His fingers fumbled on the comm number and for a terrible second, Seiran thought he'd forgotten it completely.

But the line beeped green and the image of Molla Organa emerged, holding Abasen. Breath rushed out of his lungs in relief, just to see his son safe.

"Ma!" He whispered, not daring to glance back towards the door, or the booth-taker. "I-I don't have much time."

"Seiran!" Pollie's mother glared at him. "Where the hell is my daughter?"

"Safe." He could hardly believe the story the Bitch had told him, but she'd showed a recording of his wife's face, looking whole and hearty and dressed like a blasted fraking Sith. "Pollie's safe. I know where she is." Or the Bitch claims to know where she will be. "I'll bring her back to you. We're on our way there now."

"Thank the stars," the woman muttered. "Did you talk to her? What's she doing? Jasp had some cockabandoo story about her dressing up like Darth Revan and getting captured by "Sith."

"That’s… true. But she's fine now." One of the few lessons his own drunk Da had taught Seiran was to have a healthy belief in the power of positive thinking.

"She got free?" Her ma wanted to think that, Seiran could see it in her expression, hear it in her voice.

"She's okay. She's with… Carth Onasi. And the Wookiee. From the Star Forge? They're helping her."

Unless the Bitch made that part up to make me believe it. But it sounds so insane, it has to be true.

"Zaalbar?" Of course, Pollie's ma knew the Wookiee's name. "And Captain Carth Onasi?"

"And we're going to them. We're going to get her out of this. Revan promised me."

"Revan's not in any shape to go anywhere. She's been in a coma for weeks, ever since she fell off that ship…." Molla squinted at him. "Are you really on that ship? What really happened?"

"A… coma. She's not dead?" His conscience was still bugging him. "She tried to stop us, is what happened. Is she going to be all right?"

"By rights, she should be dead. But she's not. I don't know. Who's 'we'? Who are you with now?"

"The other Revan. There's two of them. I don't know why. The one you have is the one with Pollie's memories. This other one… she's the real thing."

"Two? How can there be two?" Molla scoffed. "You mean those rumors on the vids are true? She has a double, or identical twin or whatever?"

"They're different. The one I'm with, she knows things. She-" His throat closed off abruptly, and Seiran's hands went to it, involuntarily clawing to remove the invisible obstruction. Coldness washed down his spine. Spots danced in front of his eyes.

"I told you to hurry," the Bitch's voice murmured from behind. He hadn't heard the door open, hadn't seen her approach. "I trusted you."

"Seiran?" Molla's voice was sharp, panicked. "What's going on? Who's there? Are you okay?"

He tried to turn his head away, tried to gasp for air. She loomed above him, a white cowl covering most of her face, except for those ice-green eyes.

"Molla Organa," the Bitch said, pushing Seiran half off his chair with a twist of her hand. An invisible weight pressed down on his back, forcing him to the floor. "How is my son? Did my associate survive her fall?"

Air rushed back into Seiran's lungs like life, and he found himself lying flat on the duracrete, gasping for breath.

"The boy's fine. Revan's in a coma. Who the blazes are you?" Pollie's ma demanded.

"As Seiran so eloquently explained, I am Revan. The 'real thing.'" Her foot brushed his ribs, and Seiran scrambled back, into the wall of the booth. "I have spoken with your daughter, and I intend to rescue her. If at all possible."

"What did you just do to my son-in-law?"

"Nothing permanent. Is Malachor adjusting to his new accommodation? Did he tell you to change his hair? I would like him to continue his studies—they may be your guests for some time."

Molla muttered a curse under her breath. "You're not my Pollie."

"No. But the other one possesses many of her characteristics. Would you mind detailing to me the extent of her injuries? Are the medical authorities on your planet aware of them? Of her? It would be best if her presence remained secret, but if her life is in danger—"

"I would mind. Very much! My husband went after you—after Pollie—last week. But you're signature says Peragus, not Yavin—"

"Jasp Organa went to Yavin?" The woman frowned. "It could be dangerous for him there. It will be dangerous for Polla Organa, if he informs anyone at that station of her deception."

"I trust my husband a long sight farther than I trust you!"

"If it wasn't for my sacrifice, your entire planet would be speaking Ancient Sith, probably in unison."

"You think we wanted any part of your damned war?"

"Molla-Ma, don't! Don't piss her off." Somehow Seiran was standing again, next to the Bitch, heart pounding in his throat.

"She needs to remember who has her son." Polla's mother was sweet as thisla pie… unless she had her darner up. Then, Seiran thought, she could probably give the Bitch a run for her money.

But to his surprise, the Bitch only laughed. "Ser Organa, your daughter possesses your own courage. She has already exceeded all estimations I had of her survival. In a few days’ time, I hope to return her to you with this vehicle ship. Unharmed."

Is that a lie? He couldn't tell. She radiated sincerity.

"Pollie's too brave for her own damn good." Molla muttered.

Beside him, the Bitch nodded. "You raised her well. I—I trust you with my son. And my… other self."

"Jasp said it looked like she wanted to kill you."

"We both react poorly to betrayal. She thought we would rescue your daughter together. I left her with you to keep her safe. Her and Malachor both."

"Keep her safe? What about my son-in-law? What about Pollie?"

"Both of them are in considerably less danger without her."

"That makes no sense."

"I don't have time to explain it to you." She turned towards Seiran. "What measures did you take to "secure this line?"

"None," he said flatly.

"Assidkay muurr," she muttered, and cut the transmission.

"What the blazes-" Molla's face fizzled out in mid-sentence.

"Come with me," the Bitch commanded Seiran. "Now." Her hand moved slightly and then all the muscles in his jaw locked closed. She raised a finger to her own lips, mouth set in a line.

"Mmmmph!" He tried to shake his head, and then his neck froze too, twisted at an angle where he could only see the floor.

"I'll leave you here," she murmured softly. "I'll leave you here now if you don't follow my instructions. Blink once for yes, two for no." She peered at him, angling her own face close enough he could feel her breath on his face. "Is the ship refueled?"

It had been the first thing he'd done, after repairing his own sabotage. Seiran blinked once.

"Then we depart." She straightened and his own body did too, stretching his back with a way that made his muscles ache in protest. "Follow me. Now."

Xxx

The docking clamps aligned, the Force sealing them and locking their ship to the small station orbiting another demon moon.

Even from here, Davad could feel Yavin's dark energy-and even from orbit he knew that its strength was intangible as clouds. No sustenance there. No, what awaited him lay on the station itself: here, the Emperor's dark heart: sweet morsel, the taste of more to come.

Because of you, Lord Revan.

His gratitude was primal: loyalty that went beyond sense. The part of him still a man (a rapidly decreasing fraction of a self, lessened with every life he took) despised the eager kath he was becoming, trailing after his master in search of a treat.

And yet, the hunger. He'd exhausted most shadows, the Jedi who hid poorly, and the Emperor's lesser creatures. All of them, blending inside of him into a boundless array of need. The ones left were stronger, but clever. They hid themselves, they stayed in places so populous that he and Oerin could not reach.

Gone were the days that either of them could pass as men. Had that been Traya's influence? Their shadows were lifted now, no hiding what they were, what they could become.

"There's a step up, to the right. You don't want to trip-" Lin had become annoyingly officious since the last time Davad had accidentally put his Force-shadowed hand through their ship's hull.

I Know, he voiced. Food. Ahead. It was still a point of frustration and rage that his more complex reasoning had been reduced to this.

"Yes. Powerful, too. We must remember to thank Revan for this. Do you think we should send a holocard? You could sign it with a black hole in the middle of the plimsi."
The doors slid open, revealing a cluttered room. A robed figure in the middle, outlined in glorious, succulent red.

Meat. Davad roared, and swept forward. In the joy of the hunt, he forgot his man's form, felt his feet leave the surface of the station, all of him becoming gullet and endless need.

The robed one turned to face him, and there was a moment of delicious shock before its primal essence engorged him, like the taste of sweet blood on his lips. Power there. So much. Like the beginning of a tap to the One that the robed one served.

He was so lost in the sensation of satiation that it took Davad some time to notice Oerin Lin was speaking to the small Rodian man standing next to an old Human.

"Patience." His dead friend raised one hand. "You're fine for now, Nihilus. Why don't you look through the inventory of our friend's shop? I'm sure he won't mind. Will you, Suvam?"

Food? Could there be more Force sensitives hidden within?

"No," Lin sighed. "Not food. You were kind to give my father's mask back to Clan, but I think you might need a new one now. You're a sight to scare armies. And that's not always a good thing."

Someone had warned him about wearing a mask once. About the creature he would become. That small girl, the one with the extraordinary eyes. Davad wished she was here now too.

She would have been delicious.

"Go ahead then," Oerin waved him along. His rotting mouth sagged. "Fetch. Good boy."

Xxx

Something that looked like a demon from the blackest pits of hell had just… eaten the Sith statue. Suvam Tan was cowering next to him. And Jasp Organa felt frozen like a Seventh-Day turkatt, helpless to stop the dead man above him from bringing broken, rotting hands down against Jasp's face.

"Who are you?" The dead man broke off his undecipherable conversation with the shadow-thing to look down at Jasp with one staring, bloated eye. The other dangled half-outside its socket, white and blind on a strip of dried flesh.

"Jasp Organa." He answered before conscious thought overcame him. Despite the man's looks, a part of Jasp… wanted to answer him. Answer any questions he had.

"Organa?" The dead man chuckled. "Did she send you as a messenger?"

"Who?" He tried to put some thermo into the question, but his voice shook in a way that made Jasp feel very old. "Who sent me?"

"Revan, of course." The dead man shrugged. "Wasn't Organa her alternate name? The one the Jedi cooked up? Of course, you're no Jedi. If you were, our friend over there would have devoured you like a good nerf steak." He sighed. "I miss the taste of things. I'd sell my own mother for a good nerf steak right now. That is, if I hadn't destroyed all that she was and left her to suffer and die of exposure on the side of that volcano."

The black shadow thing turned towards them. Where its face should have been was only darkness, spiraling inward. It… screamed again. Wordless, voiceless, and Jasp tried hard not to piss himself.

"Yes, Davad. I do know she's still alive!" The dead man turned his head towards the shadow. "When we go to Onderon for your relatives, you may decide which ones live and which ones die."

The Rodian made a noise under his breath, black eyes darting towards Jasp. Was he trying to send some kind of message?

"Sometimes the Sith have the right idea," Jasp offered, to the dead man. "I… have no problem with you. Either of you, I just…." You just want to find your daughter. The voice in his skull wasn't broken, but the way the dead man's one eye focused on him made it clear who was speaking. A chill swept through Jasp as all that he was laid bare: the Sith paging through his memories like torn plimsi.

"Fascinating." The dead voice said, after a time.

The Rodian took a step away from them, and then another. Hesitant, as if he wasn't sure what was allowed.

A red beam swept across the room, through Suvam Tan, before returning to the dead man's hand, light extinguished again, just a plain metal hilt. It happened so quickly, that Jasp was still staring at the pieces of the former crime lord while the dead man laughed softly.

"A message," he said. "Tenebrae's servants we kill. You are hers… and so... you may live."

The shadow turned and opened its mouth again. There was another exchange between the two. This time, Jasp squeezed his eyes shut.

"No." The dead man said, in Standard. "Isn't it the other we need? She knows the locations of Sith worlds. And I doubt she's in a coma. Leave Rev on Deralia. If she doesn't wake up in a month… maybe then you may eat her. Maybe. But you'll only regret it. You know you'll regret it."

"Stay away from Deralia!" Jasp warned them both. "Is my Pollie mixed up with you two? How the hell did she get mixed up with you two?"

The dead man laughed. "A tale for the ages, no doubt."

The shadow seemed to be holding something white and red in his hands. He raised it to his face, covering the black hole of his features with a white mask, like a skull.

"That's nice," the dead man called out to him, approving. "I don't suppose there's another? We could match."

The mask shook its head.

"Stay away from my family!" Jasp warned them again.

"Revan told you she successfully impersonated her to the Emperor? I see the tale in your mind, but I doubt it would be possible. Tenebrae is too powerful to be so stupid."

The shadow roared again.

The dead man paced back and forth, slowly, on legs that seemed to bend wrong, one dragging slightly at a broken angle. "What of the other Revan? I only saw one in your mind."

"Other Revan?" Isn't one enough?

"That's why she jumped. Why she tried to stop that ship. The other betrayed her." The dead man sighed. "The other Revan took the ship…and I assume we know where she is going." He turned towards the shadow. "We need coordinates to the Sith homeworld. You've been there, Arkan. I don't supposed you remember the way…?"

The shadow barked.

"Of course." The dead man sighed, shrugging. "He said, 'food.' Would you like to come with us? Davad used to be very entertaining, but now his conversation is so limited. We could play chess. I used to play with him, but now he gnaws on the pieces. Do you know how to play chess? I'm an excellent teacher."

"I want to get back to my family," Jasp muttered. "I want my daughter."

"We may come across her. Or her body. I was only asking to be polite. Mother always insisted on manners, even when she was twisting someone's mind inside out." The dead man smiled. "You want to come with us. And you want to scour the banks of this station for maps of the Sith homeworld. I hope you're good with computers. And how are you at flying Centurion-class battlecruisers? With Davad the way he is, we have such a hard time keeping staff."

"I want to come with you." The words came out of his mouth before Jasp could stop them. "I want to find the location of the Sith homeworld. I want to fly a Centurion-class battlecruiser."

"Excellent." The dead man's better eye seemed to twinkle. "Good man."

Xxx

Korrie came back with his face flushed, dark curls falling out of his topknot. His boots were muddy, and there was a rip in the fabric on one of his knees.

"Do you have a good time, dear?" Something in Mill's chest melted a little, looking at him. Just like Pollie at that age. Almost a tweener.

"Batsi Organa said that I sounded like a dumbs from the vids," he said, frowning a little. "What does that mean?"

"Means he's not the sharpest tool in the shed." She handed him a slice of thisla pie. "What did you do?"

"I explained how export tariffs can cripple a planet Deralia's size, and that he should mind his own business." The tyke frowned. "I don't think he understood the implied threat."

What kind of child are you? She leaned over and gave his arm a squeeze. "Next time," she instructed. "You punch that slob in the face. Not too hard! But hard enough to show him you mean business."

"Violence isn't always the answer," he told her.
On Moll’s lap, her grandson Abasen gave the boy a huge, gummy smile. "Mah-MAH!" he squealed. Poor kit, it seemed to be his word for everyone.

"True," she said. "But sometimes it helps." She hoped Seiran remembered that. Hoped he got that other Revan to lead him to Polla and then plugged her with five in the back.

"Phbbt." Abasen added.

"Would you like me to take him for a walk around the garden?" the tyke asked, formal as any politician. Sometimes Molla thought they’d have to beat that out of him.

"I'll do it." Trust began someplace, and the walk might take her mind off worry. Seiran and that woman said my Pollie's alive. Said she'd be home soon. It has to be true. She gestured to the chair next to his mother's bed. "Doctor Sahara won't be here for another four hours. Do you want to sit with your ma awhile alone?"

On the bed, Revan Starfire lay flat, but all the displays above had shaded past yellow, almost to white. Miracle of miracles, she seemed to be getting better.

"Yes!" All the formality faded from Korrie's face and Moll caught a glimpse of the boy behind the mask: a real child there—just as sweet and smart and terrible as her Pollie. As her grandson. As the future. "Thanks, Aunt Moll!" His arms locked around her, and instead of doing something funny and foreign like bowing, he kissed her cheek. "I think she hears me when I talk to her. Don't you?"

"Maybe." She kissed him back.

XXX

The Ebon Hawk emerged from hyperspace above a small, dark, cloud-covered planet.

The red-eyed Zabrak sitting next to Polla smiled. "Would you like to enter the entry codes yourself, Lord Revan?"

Proximity alarms chimed, as a flotilla of fighters surrounded their ship. They had nasty, spidery-looking hulls, gleaming like beetles against the planet's atmosphere below, swarming in such trained unison that Polla was pretty fracking sure they could annihilate the Hawk in about three milliseconds if that was their game.

"Knock yourself out," she yawned. And I mean that literally, Tenny-bro. "You do it, my Lord Emperor. Then stand back, while I land us someplace in that muck."

"Hah, hah." The emperor chuckled. He leaned poor Zepth's arm across hers and dialed in some codes, too fast for her to get more than the first symbol.

Their speakers were full of the orders being barked in the language the Tee had said was Sith. The droid had taught Polla to say, 'Hello,' 'Bow down to me,' and 'Frack off;' but said that getting into more complexity was just asking for issues. Whoever was talking wasn't saying any of those things, so Polla just fixed her face into a glare and focused on the things she understood, like the beautiful telemetrics of the Ebon Hawk’s instrument panel.

The planet below them was covered in clouds, and her atmospheric readings warned of heavy electrical activity, wind currents, storm watches. But as Polla watched the viewscreen, the clouds suddenly opened in a perfect circle, revealing what appeared to be solid ground below.

"Nice," she murmured, trying to sound bored and not impressed. Was it some kind of weather control? Or more of this creepy Force?

"You sure you got it… uh, beautiful?" Carth was way too nervous. She shot him a look and he got suddenly busy in the co-pilot's chair, double checking all the readings from their last hyperspace jump.

"Cool your jets, flyboy." She flashed him a smile, and he winced. She never should have told him the real Revan was coming. Poor slob hadn't been able to hold it together since. "Haven't I flown us down from tighter spots than this? Remember that time on Manaan? When I saved the hoverbus full of Selkath."

"Easy," he muttered, eyeing her hand on the throttle. "Let me take care of the aux, alright?"

"Knock yourself out." Polla shrugged, angling them down slow into a tighter orbit. No point in being frightened now, they were in this too deep. Fear of a Sith planet. Might as well be afraid of a diox leak: either it'd kill you before you could do anything, or it wouldn't.

The worst things in life weren't the things you had time to be afraid of. They were the things that ambushed you like a bolt of blue, at times that should have been the happiest.

XXX

She'd tell him after the holovid, Polla decided.

Seiran had picked it: some kind of documentary about the defeat of dark Jedi by the Republic Fleet. Or something? Episode One had gotten a ton of press, but she hadn't paid much attention. Episode Two was supposed to be the continuing story, released a week later—pretty much ripped from the headlines. According to the reviews from the Corellian Star Times, the Jedi had made some kind of personality for Revan Starfire based on Deralian culture—and so the holotheater was packed. Nothing folks in Adaston liked more than the chance to complain about their own image in the galactic media.

But Polla hated documentaries. And she had more important shit on her mind.

Should she just tell Sei now? Or hand him the test results? Would he be happy? He'd said he wanted to marry her someday. Not that having a kid meant they had to get married, but even still—

Should she just tell him now?

Maybe then they could skip out on this dull as dishwater vid.

XXX

"After Malak's attack, the Dark Lord Revan was saved by the strength of the Jedi Council..."

XXX

The words scrolled across the screen, but Polla was more interested in the bag of poppa stuck between her and Sei. Maybe it was hormones or something, but the buttery snack was delicious. She elbowed him. "We might need more of this."

"You're hungry tonight."

"Mmmm." She winked, and glanced back at the screen, trying to play it cool. How could she just tell him? What if she had poppa kernels between her teeth?
But then the image of a ravaged figure floating in a bacta tank kinda killed her appetite. Gross. Humans weren't supposed to have gray skin. Were those tattoos or veins? When you couldn't even tell, maybe it was time to lay off the spice.

"How to redeem someone who has fallen so far? How to save the woman who was once a shining beacon of light; but fell to become the devourer of worlds? The Council and young Bastila Shan healed Revan's body; but they could not heal her soul."

Huh. That was strange. "Sei?"

"Poll?" He leaned in and kissed her. His lips were buttery too... but she pulled back and looked at the vid again, holding up a hand for him to wait.

The scream was inhuman. Like an animal. The figure in the tank writhed, head bobbing to the surface. The tank's glass actually cracked-right before a few brown-robes rushed in to do something. One of them, a tall Cerean guy, waved his hand, and the tortured body stopped, the nearly bald head slumped forward, going limp. Mad, yellow eyes closed shut.

"Revan Starfire had no mind left—and yet, the Jedi Council in their wisdom knew two things: first, that all creatures have the potential for good; and second, that the only way to stop Malak was locked somewhere in Revan's crippled mind. Using the link that Bastila Shan had courageously created, the Jedi remade the Dark Lord of the Sith, and gave her a new life."

"But who was this woman they created?"

"Bastila SHAN?" She poked Seiran. "That's weird. Didn't I tell you, that was the name of my nurse?"

"Who was Polla Organa?"

Dara from Geario's Gear Shop leaned forward from the row behind them and poked Polla. "Polla Organa is you," she snorted.

"Hah." Polla shoved a hand of poppa in her mouth to avoid decking her. Dara was an eejit.

"That Polla Organa Revan needs a facial," someone muttered a few rows back. She wasn't even sure who. "At least."

"You clean up real good, Polla!" their partner yelled.

"Shut up!" Polla told them all.

Polla Quil Organa, who was seventy, if she was a day, stood up and took a bow. "You got me," she called out. "I'm a Sith Lord all right!"

Everyone in the theater laughed. There was scattered applause.

XXX

The music played again, sad and melancholy.

"Polla Organa was no one. No one person. Instead, she was a precisely curated amalgamation of personalities, driven by the Force. The Jedi instilled in her a strong sense of morality; technical knowledge that complimented Revan's own; and basic training in weapons and strategy."

"Supposedly born on Deralia, a remote world untouched by the ravages of war, her personality matrix overlaid the tragedies of Revan's life with a foundation of stability and hope."

XXX

"That's our Pollie," her cousin Glenndam shouted. She'd know his lisp anywhere. "Stability and hope!"

"Hope her glider doesn't crash again!" Cousin Sara added from the front.

Frack this. Polla nudged her boyfriend hard in the ribs. "Is the funny part going to be a lot of Polla Organa jokes?"

Seiran Wen turned to her. "I thought you liked action vids."

"But this one's a documentary. And it's Episode Two. What happened to the first one?"

"The first one is all Jedi stuff, the reviews said. I thought you'd be bored. This is the one about the Star Forge quest."

"Oh." Something nudged her memory, a clip she'd seen at the Ultra-Mart. "This one has a Wookiee?"

"Yeah."

"I like Wookiees. My da says they did that whole Star Forge thing with miniatures. He thinks the Republic made it up to raise taxes."

"You remember our planet almost got invaded?" He laced his fingers with hers. "Remember how the Jedi healed your coma?"

"Not Jedi," she argued. "Mostly droids and that one nurse, Bastila...."

That one nurse. Bastila Shan. That was... that was a little weird.

"Bastila?" Seiran's voice was too loud. Someone in the row in front of them turned and shushed them. One of the Maris triplets, Polla couldn't remember which one, but they'd all taken domestic engineering classes together, back when they were kids.

"What?" She was glaring at the triplet, but it was Seiran who responded.

"Bastila? Your nurse. Like Bastila Shan?"
"Yeah. I told you about her, right?"

"She's a Jedi. She was one of the Star Forge heroes. The vid's been talking about her this entire time."

"Bastila's probably a common name on Talravan. My Bastila was just a nurse...?" Her voice trailed off because the heroes of the Star Forge were now splashed across the screen. And there was Bastila Shan, the nurse, holding a lightsaber and standing next to a pale woman with her hair looped in a Deralian knot. "Frack, Sei. That... that looks like her."

"Bastila Shan is the Jedi with Battle Meditation," her boyfriend muttered. "She's not a nurse. Did she say she was just a nurse?"

"I had a fracking head injury, but..." Polla thought back. "I think so? Who's that bint next to her?" The woman didn't look Deralian, despite the hair.

"That's Revan Starfire." He snorted. "I swear, sometimes you live under a rock."

"I thought she was a rouge. The woman's hair was dark brown, not red. Almost black. It made her skin look even paler. "I thought she was Hothan. Is her hair like that because they gave her a Deralian cover story?"

"Shhh!" This time the admonishment came from behind them. When Polla turned around it was Mister Dunledee, who ran the Weaver's. "Some of us are trying to watch this."

"Just a bunch of stupid Republic-"

XXX

"Revan Starfire thought she was Polla Organa, a humble Deralian smuggler, on a desperate mission....

XXX

"This Polla Organa thinks this entire vid is a stupid, jingoistic piece of shit," Polla muttered.

Seiran nuzzled her ear. "Maybe Bastila Shan named the composite personality they gave the Dark Lord of the Sith after you."

"Hah." She pulled away. "That's not funny, Sei." She frowned at the screen. "So maybe my nurse Bastila Shan is an actress playing the Jedi Bastila Shan-

"No. Most of it is real footage." Seiran squeezed her hand. "I admit... it is a little strange."

"She seemed like a nurse. She checked all my vitals all the time."

"If you can't be quiet, Polla Organa, I'm going to call management!" Frikka Jeris Organa wasn't being quiet. She yelled out Polla's name so that the whole theater could hear.

There were more whispers.

Polla sank down in her chair, as the real-life footage from the heroes of the Star Forge continued.

XXX

Revan Starfire straddled the swoop bike awkwardly, knees bent too close to her thighs for any real control. You wouldn't know that to hear her voice through. She sounded as cool as ferracrystal.

"I got this, flyboy. Relax. I was tweener champion back on Deralia? I could fly this course blind if I had to, it's nothing compared to Janstak's Canyon loop back home."

"Isn't that the place where you said you crashed?" The pilot laughed nervously. "I think we need a back-up plan."

"You worry too much. I mean, it's sort of cute."

"You're calling me cute?"

"For a Gamorrean, sure."

"Have you seen a lot of Gamorreans?"

"I ran spice for the Exchange. What do you think?"

Xxx

"This is real footage?" Polla nudged Seiran again. A part of her probably already knew at that point, but she was trying desperately to come up with an alternative explanation.

"Shhh!" The triplet again. Polla flipped her off.

Janstak's Canyon... it had to be a coincidence. Everyone raced there. If they'd made a composite and named it Polla Organa and made her a swoop racer... that all made sense. Didn't it?

"They took the thing about Janstak Canyon from my life? You think Bastila borrowed stories I told her?" This time she really lowered her voice. Two of the triplets had turned around and were looking at her now.

"I don't... I'm not sure." Seiran's hand closed down hard over hers. "Do you... this is gonna sound nuts, but does that guy look like me?"

"Older." But he did. It was why she'd thought he was cute in the first place - "I'm pretty sure they didn't cast this documentary based on your face."

"Or yours," he whispered back. But it is a nice face."

"Yours too, flyboy." She grinned at him, but then movement on the screen distracted her again. "Does she... do you think she looks like me?"

He stiffened, like his muscles froze, holding her so tight that Polla could barely breathe. "Of course not!"

"Right." She watched his eyes shift back towards the screen.

Xxx

"I don't like being left out of the loop."

"Told you before. You were born out of the loop. Let me explain again. This is Bastila Shan, the Jedi we had to rescue for your Republic."
"Not just mine."

"Well, according to her, I signed on because they need someone with my skills."

"Which are…?"

"I…I told you languages before, right? And if you ever need someone to smuggle a load of spice from Kessel to Corellia, and not pay the Hutt vig… well, let’s just say I know a few old routes. I have my Da's old charts and there’s jumps on there you Fleet guys have never even heard of!"

"Polla," Bastila Shan interrupted. "Now isn't the time. Right now, we need to discuss your nightmares."

"You were in them too," the woman rubbed her temples. "Maybe they're yours."

Xxx

"Pollie?" Seiran nudged her.

"Always stereotyping us just because we have registered smugglers," Daiphone Sin Organa yelled, on his other side. "Frack the Republic!"

"Frack the Republic!" Several others cheered.

"Polla?" Seiran nudged her again. "Are you okay?"

Nausea twisted in her gut, sudden and sharp. She stood up, half-covering her mouth, but the words were still loud for at least three rows to hear. "No. I'm not okay! I-I'm pregnant."

She barely made it to the fresher in time, thoughts running through her head, as inevitable as a smuggler getting caught on their final big score: I crashed in Janstak's Canyon. I ran that route, from Kessel to Corellia. I bragged about never paying, even if it was a lie, because it got me more business. I have Da's old maps with jumps that no Republic brass has ever-

"Pollie?"

She looked up, wiping her mouth. Seiran stood in the doorway, face lit in blue from the overlights. He looked as worried as she felt.

"Are you... it's going to be okay, right?" He sounded like he was trying to convince himself, as well as her.

"No." Polla shook her head, and spat in the fresher. All the air seemed to leave her chest at once. "I didn't really... I never told you the whole thing. Bastila Shan made a copy of my brain. She made a copy. I signed... she said they were putting my memories in a holocomm. Holocard? Holo-something. So I signed... something. I let them take my memories. They said... they needed them to check. Because of my head."

"Holocron," her boyfriend said. "Like on the Nomi Sunrider cartoons."

"She said it was just to make a-a baseline. But those things that... that can't be possible. Is that-those are actors, right? Somebody wrote that script, maybe they interviewed... maybe they interviewed my relatives? Or just-maybe it was a lucky guess? I mean, lots of smugglers... we all run spice. Lots of racers...."
Seiran shook his head. "When you were running to the fresher, that Polla Organa on screen mentioned her ex. His name is Therion D'Cainen. She said there was a shipment with kanna mites and her criminal record was his fault."

"Son of a Bith!" Everything in her gut heaved up at once. That was enough to send the rest of the poppa down the drain.

Warm arms encircled her shoulders, as Seiran knelt behind her, pulling her half onto his lap. She could hear his heart beating, slow and calm. She took a deep breath, burrowing her head into his chest.

"I think you distracted them all with that pregnancy joke," he murmured. "Trust me. No one will know it's you. There's gotta be a million Polla Organas, right? Wasn't she one of the original settlers?"

"Second wave," Polla took a deep breath, suddenly not sure what frightened her the most. "I wasn't kidding about the pregnancy, Sei. It's yours." She took a deep, steadying breath. "I-I ran the labs and checked. Sometimes, spacers, when we go ground side again-it messes with our cycles. I was wearing the derm, but I guess it didn't take. I'm sorry, I know you like me and all, but this is a lot-

"Oh." He squeezed her harder, and his breath went all soft and strange. "Oh."

"I'm... sorry," she repeated. "I know this is... a lot."

"No," he murmured. "You... do you want...? This? Me?"

"Yeah." She smiled up at him. "If you're okay marrying a Sith Lord."

Her boyfriend snorted. "Always thought you'd look good in black."

Xxx

"How can you stand to be cut off from the Force?" Zepth sounded just curious, but Takan nudged him.

"Lord Revan isn't here to answer your questions," the second and more ass-kissing of the two Zabrak kids said.

"The Force isn't everything." Polla leaned back in the captain's chair, trying not to be rattled by the escort of fighters that was still aligned to their ship, flying in a perfect grid that now surrounded them on all four sides. "Learn that, and you have learned much, fool."

"Yes, Lord Revan," Takan bowed his head.

She felt ridiculous, and her face was sweating behind the mask that Zaalbar had dug up from somewhere in the ship's stores. The Tee-Three had made her go over phrases that the real Revan had said over and over again.

"I can flay the flesh from your bones," she added. Just because.

"You want to do the honors and bring her down?" In the co-pilot's seat, Carth brought up the coordinate map, the holographic display etching out their landing field.

"Yes." The Hawk handled like a dream. She could see why he loved it. In a different time and a different place, she would have loved it too.

You’re a sad sack, Revan Starfire-leaving a ship like this and a man like Carth all on their lonesome. If Revan had been Polla the entire time, she would've grabbed her son and this man and taken off a long time ago.

You did do that. You and Sei. Her stupid conscience reminded her. Only, you wanted more, right? Well, congratulations. Now you're a fracking Sith Lord about to land on the most badass Sith planet they have. Congratu-fracking-lations. Happy now?

"Watch the fighters," Carth added, sounding nervous.

"They'll get out of the way themselves, don't you think?" She brought the yoke down slowly, banking them sideways and down. The planet's atmosphere buffeted their craft, and a thick cloud cover obscured everything in the views.

"Smooth," he muttered.

"Not my first landing, flyboy." She smiled under her mask, but his own expression was fixed and grim.

Should make him wear one too. He's going to ruin this entire thing if he can't keep a pazaak face.

One hundred ninety three south by Twenty several. Thousand eight hundred north. She leaned over the nav and tapped them into the comm. Real Revan had wanted the coordinates. Was the comm secure?

Nothing is.

She hit send.

They were skimming over treetops now, spinning off the velocity from their descent.

"A little fast," Carth warned.

"I like fast," Polla muttered. The ship could take it. "Everyone strapped in?"

Zaalbar roared an affirmative, and the Tee-Three whistled. Takan reached for the straps and Zepth-

Oh, blast.

Zepth's eyes were glowing red.

"Landing a ship here," she snapped. "What the frack do you want now?"

"I have a surprise for you," the Emperor murmured. "Waiting for you. I do hope you like it."

"It'll have to wait." She pulled down hard, punching the throttle closed, so that they stalled, and then plummeted. The poor Zabrak kid slammed hard into the wall. If it wasn't for the fact that Tenebrae felt the pain too, Polla would have felt sorry for him.

XXX

"Batti says his fath-his da-wants to take me on their next hunting expedition." Korrie's cheeks were pink and he was slightly out of breath, as if he'd ran the way home. "I said I had to ask you."
His eyes flickered to the unconscious woman on the medix bed, as if he wanted to ask her too.

"If you want to go, dear, that's fine." They had their old droid Bolts monitoring Revan Starfire at night now, with Doctor Sahara checking in. "I don't mind."

"I don't know if she'd mind." He bit his lip. "She might? She feels better. She might wake up soon."

Molla wished Doctor Sahara shared his enthusiasm. Then again, Revan Starfire awake was going to be a whole ‘nother ball of eridu than Revan Starfire in a coma. Stars, she was starting to get used to Revan Starfire in a coma. When the mood struck, you could yell at women in comas, and they'd never yell back. Never deny the fact that they'd taken away your family and maybe they were never coming back.

"How can you tell she feels better? Is it the Force?"

Such a strange thing. She'd seen the vids, met Bendowen's girl, seen the result, when the woman in front of her on the hospital bed had been pulled from their retaining pond-

XXX

The woman was about the same size as Pollie, mud and blood staining her hair, skin so white it looked blue. For a millisecond she'd been something out of a nightmare, a nightmare of Polla after that canyon crash, limp and pale.

If it hadn't been for the screaming boy-child in Molla's own arms, kicking and scratching and hollering to break free-Molla thought she might have screamed too. On the ground, Abasen was squalling hysterically. Jasp had already jumped into the pond after the bint, and Bolts too, right behind him. Damn bucket was gonna get itself rusted.

Something like an electrical charge seared her arm, and she dropped the child.

His hands were glowing blue.

"Mother!" He darted forward, pressed his forehead against the limp, pale one.

"We need a doctor," Jasp muttered. "The crazy bint just fell out of the sky-

"I'll call Doctor Sahara," she said. The boy's hands were glowing blue. His mother's hair was red. "This is all her fault anyways."

XXX

"I don't think your ma would mind at all, Korrie," she told him. "Every kid needs to learn to hunt sometime. But you have to promise…"

"No Force. I know." His light eyes stared into hers. Dye around the lashes kept fading. It looked funny too. "I'm good at secrets, Aunt Moll."

"Oh, I can tell that, dear." She smiled brightly.

Xxx

"Another one." Polla nodded towards the bartender, who obliged quite kindly, setting her up with another green, faintly steaming Andorran Moon.

"Haven't seen you here before." The frank grin the man was giving her was an obvious invitation.
If she hadn't just been dumped it might have even been funny. "You come in with the Fleet?"

"Fleet?" Polla turned her head towards the Republic slobs gathered in one end of the bar, and sneered. "Do I look Fleet to you? Why the frack are they even here?"

"Something about a Sith invasion?" The bartender would be cute, if she liked blondes, which she did not. "Chassna got hit yesterday. Everyone says there could be cloaked destroyers, maybe even capital ships orbiting Deralia as we speak."

"They want this backwater?" Polla drained her glass in one gulp. "Fracking take it then. Maybe the Sith will have looser import regs than the stinking Consortium."

"Tell us what you really think," Sera muttered, rolling her eyes. "I swear, sometimes you sound just like your da."

"I do not!"

"Polla Organa?" It took her a moment to place the man, another to acknowledge the skinny farmboy she'd grown up with had grown too-into a rather attractive sent.

"Seiran Wen?" She smiled at him. "Hey."

"Heard you were back in town," he said. "Did you come for the races? Qualifier's next week. I do some work on swoop gliders now, if you're interested."

Polla hadn't known that. Backwater swoops seemed small spacers compared to the galaxy out there. "It's been seven years. I sold my bike after graduation."

"I could hook up-hook you up with something." Was he... blushing?

If you were in the mood for adorable, Polla might find that adorable. But she wasn't. She drained her drink. It had been ages since she ran the swoops, but she knew the routes like the back of her hands.

"What course is the qual on?" Maybe now was a good time to give it all up. Become a famous swoop racer, instead of a smuggler. She could too. It wasn't a bad idea.

"Janstak's Loop." Seiran had a nice smile, maybe a little too soft. His lips were big, like purses. Kissing them would be very different than kissing someone like Therion: all teeth and lies and infidelity.

Auntie Mita always said I could do anything I wanted. Be anyone. And I was good. I was tweener champion. "I could qual for that with my eyes closed," Polla admitted. Even in the dark. "Show me. Show me this bike of yours."

Seiran's eyes widened, and he nodded slowly. "Sure. In the morning, we-"

"No, no." Polla chuckled. "Now, flyboy. Show it to me now."

"It's dark." The look he was giving her. She knew that look. He thought he had a chance.

She hadn't quite decided. "I can run that course with my eyes closed. In the dark." Her lips pulled back from her teeth. "You'll see."

Xxx
Waking up was clawing through a nest of eridu fibers into a too-bright world, with the sun streaming overhead through the double-paned moisture locks, and the plasticore barn ribs spanning out overhead like the rays of a star.

Da had been so proud when he'd installed those solar windows, planning on extending their growing season by months if he could start the seedlings early. But as it turned out, eridu that didn't get hardened by the spring floods and sudden snaps of cold grew weak and winded. Grew pretty much useless, except as a compost crop.

He'd been so pissed-

Something beeped, and when she moved her hand, it ached strangely. When she tried to sit up, she realized her head was held in some kind of brace, arms and legs restrained too.

What the frack?

"Can you hear me?" A woman's face swam into view. Youngish, perfectly oval. Dark curls falling out of her topknot. Goldish eyes, and a narrow, straight nose.

"Yes…" Her voice creaked alarmingly. Seiran dared me to race the canyon loop and I fell. I fell- "You…." She knew the face. It took another few breaths to recall from where. "Jenny? Sahara? From primaries?"

Before your father pulled you out mid-year to go back to that commune. Then you got that scholarship and eight years at Corellia's best university and half the town can't stop talking about you graduating with honors-

The woman's olive skin paled. "You… it's Doctor Sahara. Doctor Jen Sahara now."

"Oh. Right." When she closed her eyes pain splintered her skull. "Ma… she said you… you went to the Academy. Con… congratulations. Your da must be very proud."

Even if he is kinda nuts.

"He had a stroke. He's… not well." Doctor Sahara didn't sound upset, she sounded distracted. "You… are… here. Now. Do you recall what… do you recall the details of your accident?"

"Seiran dared me to race the canyon loop in the dark. I said I knew it backwards and forwards and he said prove it, and I said I would and he said he was joking, but I didn't care-

She was suddenly furious, a white hot, molten anger that seemed to jangle along every nerve, like a spark. She twisted her hand again and one of the restraints snapped.

"Don't… don't do that!" Boring old kissra lamb Jenny had a spine after all, because her voice was suddenly durasteel. Doctor Sahara's hand closed down hard over her fingers. "You must not upset yourself. It's quite important. For… everyone. Do you understand?"

"Why am I in the spare barn?" Shouldn't I be in a hospital? I thought I was in a hospital. I dreamed it. A… Republic hospital, and they-

A sickening feeling of dislocation swam over her. The woman's face was a stranger's now, the barn just a room, rough edges and oddly rustic, the reddish light shining through the windows above was wrong again; and her real intention-

"Revan," she whispered. "She lied to me. She fricking lied!"
"I'm afraid you… you need to come to terms with her lies. With… yourself." The medix looked uncomfortable. "One month ago, you were in a terrible… accident. You sustained grave injuries—"

Xxx

Her breath felt stuck in her throat, the air was too thin and cold, ship on a near vertical climb. Her left hand scrabbled for purchase, as her right wielded the saber, slamming the blade through the ship's hull, even as a small part of her mind screamed that was a bad idea, that she was putting them all in jeopardy. If the ship crashed-

It doesn't matter. Nothing matters. She has to be stopped. Revan has to be stopped and I'm the only one who can.

The saber jolted suddenly, sparking, and then its blade cut out.

How? A part of her mind knew that too.

You weren't shielded. Jedi and Sith are trained to protect their weapons as extensions of themselves, but you were never taught this.

Laughter in her head, it almost sounded like Bastila No time. Her lungs were burning, the ground was too far away.

Failsafe. Keep her safe. Don't fail to keep him safe-

Something that felt like liquid fire washed over her hands and she fell-she fell-

Spin like a leaf-increase your surface area, slow with the Force, use the velocity itself to slowslow-

Her hands were burning: breath ragged, heart pounding, anger fueling her power, the ground coming up below, landmarks from someone else's childhood….

Use the water. Break your fall. Slow-slow-

The air rippled around her, stretching like plasti. Oh, frack, what have I-

Xxx

"Where is my son?" Revan demanded, pulling at the Force to pull herself upright. Tubes pulled out of her arms, her chest. The restraints snapped all at once. She pulled a brace away from her aching neck. "Where is Korrie?"

Doctor Sahara had retreated several meters. She had a trank gun in her hand now, some forgotten part of Revan recognized the shape, the sharp dart, capable of dropping a rabid kath-or Jedi-from five meters away. "Your son is asleep. It's the middle of the night."

"Oh." She held her hand up, disturbed to see the flaking skin, vestiges of burns, bruises from where the medical lines had run. "Don't shoot. Please."

"I realize this must be confusing to you," the woman offered, voice wary.

Little Jenny sallow / Scared of her own shadow

They had teased her, they had been cruel. They had all been scared of her father, a hulking, furious man-a doctor with an interest in archaeology. Polla had been scared herself when she had to go to his offices for checkups—scared of the barbaric masks of monsters on the walls, the curved knives under glass, the pieces of shattered pottery made by insectoid drones, he said-

"I'm not confused," Revan told the daughter. "I-I fell. "The ship… it left?"

_A month. She said it left a month ago._

"The ship you fell out of? Yes."

"It's been a month, you said."

Doctor Sahara regarded her warily. "Yes, it has been a month since your accident."

"It was no accident. Revan did this. She-

The expression on the woman's face made the words freeze in Revan's throat. "I… I must sound insane."

"You have a head injury," the doctor told her. "Extensive damage and the scans showed scarring already-

"I'm not insane." Revan shook her head and was rewarded with a stabbing pain in her neck. "The… woman aboard that ship… she… betrayed me. I should never have trusted her. I… I have to leave."

"I'm afraid that isn't possible."

Revan ignored her, twisting her hand until the trank gun's nozzle bent in around itself, until the entire device grew hot enough that Jenny Sahara threw it to the ground, staring at her with an expression of horror.

"Y-you, you can't-

But Revan was already standing, even as her legs threatened to buckle. She grabbed the bed's rails to keep herself upright, muscles shaking from the sudden exertion, as if she'd run a ten kilometers, instead of merely stood.

"My son," she told the woman, putting the Force in her words. "I need to see him. Now. Take me to him."

"Your son, you need to see-" Doctor Sahara shook her head, as if to clear it. "No. You need to sit down. You need to stay here-

"Mother!" But then barn door opened and suddenly Korrie was there, running into her arms. "I thought I heard you! I heard you wake up!" He tackled her with all the recklessness of childhood, nearly sending them both tumbling back towards the ground, before Revan managed to stabilize their trajectory with the Force.

_Don't fall. I fell-

"Korrie." She buried her face in his hair. Someone had tinted it brown, shaved the sides. Her chin brushed against his topknot.

"Why did you do it?" he demanded. He twisted in her arms, glaring like a small sun. "You could've died!"

"I had to stop her, Malachor, she…." Revan was all too aware of the doctor, still standing in earshot. "You were right about her all along. I never should have trusted her. She betrayed us."

"No." He shook his head. "She left to keep us safe. She left you a message. I saw it."

"She... left a message?" Anger was keeping her standing. "Whatever she said was lies."

"She's my mother," her son said. "She wants us to be safe. She only left to keep us safe."

"She's not, I..." What had caused this change of heart? Korrie couldn't stand Dar. On the ship he'd avoided her as much as possible. She'd had to work to bring them together. "You hated her! You said it."

"I pretended."

"But you don't. She said you don't know anything. She said you have to stay here so the Genoharadan don't kill me." He folded his arms and took a step back. "It's a little boring here, but it's not bad. Molla says I can start going to school this summer. I made some friends. She told everyone we're refs. From Nar. There's a lot of refs from Nar Shaddaa these days. Most of them live in Adaston, but she says we're to say we're working for them. Molla and Jasp. She says we have to dye your hair. Do you like mine?"

She didn't. It looked wrong on him, as wrong as the rough clothes he wore and the dirt on his hands. Those things were familiar. They were... right... but not on him. Not my son.

"You said it's been a month." Polla Organa was almost certainly dead. Dar'Revan gone to Yavin, or wherever she had fled. Maybe she joined Oerin and Davad? Maybe that was her plan all along? "Has there been any... word? From... anyone?"

"I don't know." Her son bit his lip. "S-she said she would do her best. But Jasp Organa left too. And he's just gone too."

Her father's gone too. Great. Dar's destroyed what's left of their poor family- Revan let out a ragged breath.

"You need to rest," Doctor Sahara interrupted. "It's very important that you rest now. Do you understand?" She sounded like she was talking to a stubborn child.

"I need to fix this," Revan muttered. "I need a ship. I need to find her."

"You need to stay here," Korrie insisted. "So the Genoharadan don't get me. You need to keep me safe. We can be safe here. She said so."

Revan frowned at him. "She told you to say that?" Of course. Because it would keep me here. She thinks I'd never put Malachor in danger, she left me here to protect him... but she'd never put him in danger.

The logic was as solid as the planet beneath their feet.

"She's already eliminated the Genoharadan somehow. Bargained with them. Something. She'd never frighten you, she'd never trust me entirely."
Her son looked at the ground. "The Genoharadan will get me," he whispered, but his words were unconvincing. An obvious lie. "You need to keep me safe."

But how can I be sure? How can I risk him?

*She wants me to question. She wants me not to follow. I don't want to go. I want to stay here with him. She knows how much I want to stay with him because she-

Only she could be nuts enough to think I would stay. Think that I could stay. Even if I want to, Ma and-Moll and Jasp-they're not going to take us a replacement for their own daughter!*

Only she could think this would actually fracking work.

"I do have other patients," the doctor said. "I go on shift in two hours." She bent down and picked up the remains of her trank gun. "Tell Molla I warned against physical exertion. You will need therapy to regain full use of motion-

Revan raised her arms over her head and stretched. Her muscles protested, but she refused to listen. "I've been injured before," she told the doctor. "I know how to restore myself."

"What if you don't come back, Mother?" Korrie demanded. "You're going to leave, you both left and what if you don't come back? She's not coming back. She lied and said maybe, but I know. But at least I have you." Her son blinked hard, tears forming. "It could be nice here, I could go to school. Maybe your husbands could come too and stuff. M-maybe even Father-

"Your father…." Malak would protect him. Malak can keep him safe, if I only knew how to find him. Have you spoken to him? Do you know where he is?

"He was on the vids a lot. With Mekel Jin. Is he really my cousin? Mother said-I mean Sheris-she said he was. They were on the vids, but they didn't do anything. But then Molla said I shouldn't watch that stuff because it makes your brain rot."

"Rot out your ears," Revan agreed. She could almost hear the woman saying it. "You talked to Dar'Revan, Korrie. You talked to her a lot."

The swoop of a door sliding closed jerked her head away, but it was only the doctor's departure.

"On the ship," he nodded slowly. "Mostly when you were sleeping."

They'd slept in shifts, always someone monitoring the comms.

"I'm sorry I'm not her." *I might have to kill her. I… I tried to be your real mother, Korrie." Even if I don't remember your birth, the way you felt in my arms, the way Malak and I must have loved you-

"But you are." His arms wrapped around her again. "You are. Just cause you forget some of it, doesn't make it not true." Gray eyes looked up at her, strangely old in his round face. "At least listen to her message, okay? She doesn't want you to leave me."

I don't want to leave you. Despair choked her throat. But she has to be stopped.

XXX

The night Revan woke up was the night that Abasen had the small sick: aches and pains and a small fever, the kind that back in Pollie's day would have sent Moll to the medix, had her spend a sleepless night watching her daughter breathe. But now Molla was older and wiser and maybe colder, because she set Bolts to guard and left them: Revan's son and her own flesh and blood both and made her way to the barn to relieve patient Doctor Sahara from her shift watching the comatose Starfire.

The call from Seiran last week had been worrying, to say the least. There was nothing of Pollie in the woman she'd seen choking her son in law on the comm, and even reminding herself that this second Revan might have somehow managed to produce the overly-mannered child now asleep in her spare room didn't help.

And then, today, like the gods might have a sense of humor (if they existed, and Molla was pretty sure the jury was out on that until Pollie came back), her comm had pinged with a message.

_I'm fine, dear. Pollie's on Sith homeworld. Need coordinates. If Revan wakes up, will you ask? Xx, Jasp._

There was absolutely _nothing_ reassuring about _that_ either, even as she tried desperately to remember his old smuggler's ciphers, and translate the two sentences into something more reassuring.

The barn was lit up like Festival when she arrived, Doctor Sahara nowhere to be seen.

Korrie had somehow circled and beaten her there.

His mother was awake. Revan Starfire. Apparently, one of two. This one, staring at her with her face all furrowed, just like Pollie's, when she'd been caught sneaking with Sera, the troublemaking cousin who'd always seemed grown far too soon..

"Hello." Revan Starfire was standing up, so maybe that whole miraculous Jedi healing thing wasn't a load of fertilizer. "I-I heard Jasp left. He shouldn't have done that."

"But he did." It had been touching, imagining this woman as a sister to Pollie. But that was before the whole mess she'd put them into. Molla hadn't quite been able to think the woman would have them killed for real, but she'd sent the message about Cousin Vish as a test. If the woman got it, she has enough of Pollie to care. If she did not, it didn't matter. But it had never occurred to Molla (before Revan Starfire showed up on her planet and fell out of the sky) that it might be possible for the woman to remember everything about her daughter's life and wish them wrong.

Until now, when Pollie's own expression smoothed over, to a strange blankness, that made the woman look half unconscious again.

"I want to help you find your husband," she said stiffly. "Where did he go?"

"Yavin Station." Molla paused. "But he just commed. He said he's fine, but he needs the coordinates of the Sith homeworld."

"Dromund Kaas?" chirped the boy. Bless his heart. A _name_ she could run a search on, at least.

"Korrie." The mother looked too pale, unless that was just skin color. She sat down again on the bed, stiff as fences.

"The… ship," she said slowly. "The one I was… trying to stop. It left the system?"

"Funny thing," Molla told her. "Seiran called from that ship a week ago. Him and Revan. The other Revan. I don't think she wanted him to call, because she was right upset. And she asked about you."
"Did she hurt him?" The woman's voice wavered a little.

"I didn't see any blood." It had been hard to tell, with him going in and out of the frame. "She wanted to know how bad you were hurt. And how Korrie here was getting on."

"You told her fine, right?" the boy piped in. Poor tyke was so anxious. "She shouldn't worry."

"I told her fine," Molla folded her arms and leaned back against the wall. "Seiran said she's been talking to my Pollie. He said Pollie's with your husband and the Wookiee."

"What?" The woman's voice was like a quiet explosion. It seemed to… ripple somehow. "You mean Carth? How is she… how the frack did that happen?"

"I'm sure I wouldn't know."

"I need to go after them!"

"So you do know the location of the Sith homeworld?"

"No. But Mission would. Frack, if Polla's with Carth then maybe I can comm them. Warn them about Dar-what the frack does she want with them?"

"She's good again," Korrie said. "She left you here to keep you safe. With me."

"Korrie, she's… not. It's not that simple."

She left you a message," the boy said. "It is that simple. If you just listen to the message, you'll see."

"I'd like to hear this famous message," Moll told them both. "If it's no trouble."

"I can guarantee it's not in Basic. Or any language you know," Revan muttered.

"Translate," Molla told her flatly. "You owe me that. You owe us that. And a lot more besides."

"I know," Revan Starfire's head dropped, like a derran lily on its stem. She wiped her eyes. "I know I do. I… remember. I owe you… everything."
Chapter 48 / My Empire of Dirt, Part One

There was an ominous roar coming from the landing ramp, like a crowd cheering over a steady drumbeat, and what sounded like an entire electro-harp section.

Polla exhaled under her mask. Closed her eyes. Counted to ten. Ignored the giant Wookiee patting her awkwardly on the shoulder, the Tee-Three beeping at her to move, the doubled voice from Tenny-bro in the Zabrak kids saying frack knows what in ancient Sith.

"Silence!" She held up her gloved hand, and remarkably, they all quieted. Now there was just the noise outside. "When," she demanded, "did I ever say I liked electro-harp?"

"I assumed," the emperor offered. "Shall I make it stop?"

"Please." Cold sweat was trickling down her back. She closed her eyes and began to count. On the stroke of eleven, the electro-harp stopped.

"Come on," Carth whispered. He squeezed her fingers, hands warm even through gloves.

Polla opened her eyes and saw his clean-shaven face through the mask's eye vent. He was smiling, teeth only a little bared, eyes only a little nuts. She nodded and allowed him to lead her down the ramp, the others trailing behind.

Outside, the air was strange and gray. A long red road of stone led to a set of steps, and above them towered an ancient-looking building covered with statues of contorted humanids who were either fracking or being dissected. Kind of hard to tell-the stone was so weathered and worn.

Hundreds-maybe even thousands-of red-robed sents lined the road. Many had the red skin Polla had been told to expect from pureblood Sith. (Who knew Sith were a thing?) Behind the red robes, most wore black and gray. There weren't a lot of other colors-every now and again, a brighter splash of skin or hair; but for the most part, her new minions seemed incredibly dichromatic.

The closer ones all had red, glowing eyes, like the Creepazoid, (as Tee-Three called him), was watching their progress from every angle he could.

"Well?" Tenny-bro murmured in Takan's body.

"Adequate," she sniffed.

The comm on her wrist beeped. Polla glanced down.

Coord r HIS summer plc. Eta 2d. Don't die.

Was plc an acronym? Abbreviation? Was eta estimated time of arrival? Was HIS Tenny-bro or something else? Fracking Revan Starfire. If they were supposed to have the same brain, why didn't the woman make more sense?

"Your… summer palace?" Polla sighed. "Really, Lord Tenebrae?"
"I'm having yours redone." Takan smiled at her and gave her a boneless bow. Poor, possessed kid.

"With extra torture rooms?" She tried to sound cheerful. Carth coughed and nudged her arm.

"I think you will find the facilities adequate."

"Hopefully. By the way, I'm expecting a… guest. In two days’ time. I hope you've outdone yourself. She's a very dear friend."

Carth sighed, like he got it. The droid beeped something like an inquiry.

"Any friend of yours… that escaped the cull, would naturally be a friend of mine." Takan's teeth were so white they looked blue.

Here we go.

Since no one was else was moving, Polla stepped forward, forcing them all to follow behind.

The crowd around them cheered—even the ones not possessed. Then, they knelt in near-unison. Eerily silent suddenly, except for the drums, pounding away ominously.

The air smelled like sulfur and mold.

Polla's comm beeped again. She glanced down at her wrist.

NO TK Cllr off! Vimp!

"Where is Vimp?" she demanded. "They… should be here."

"Vimp?" Tenny-bro frowned. "I'm afraid I don't know. We had all of your old servants purged."

"I could have yours purged as w-" Zaalbar's low rumble half-drowned out the rest of her response.

Their path widened, as they approached the temple steps, which were blocked by a row of guards. Ahead of them, at the top of the stairs was a hover lift covered in flowers. From this angle, it looked like an extra floater from a parade at Pioneer Day, back home.

The guards parted, letting them pass. Polla kept her chin up. The mask was playing hell with her peripherals. How the frack had the real Revan worn one? Was it a Force thing? Maybe Jedi could see through metal? She squinted. On top of the stairs, resting atop the hover lift was what looked like a long, metallic box, tied with several blood-red bows.

"This must be the surprise?" Polla guessed. It looked like a coffin, which… really, shouldn't have come as a shock.

Please don't let it be anyone I know or anyone rotting and decomposed because I don't want to be fracking sick all over Revan's welcome back to evil party….

Frack. What if she really is evil? It occurred to Polla that this was a thought she should have had before.

"Well?" Takan and Zepth had stopped walking. Their eyes—and a hundred other red, glowing ones besides—all looked at Polla, expectantly.

"What?" She'd missed something. Carth touched her arm. When she swung her head around, she couldn't see Tenny-bro, and that made her nervous.
"I just said-" Creepazoid raised his voice, echoing it through a dozen sents near them, including the guards. "I just said, your surprise arrived early. We were able to use an unmanned ship for transport since we didn't have to worry about life support! I hope you appreciate the effort."

Carth's steps faltered. He must have gotten who it was immediately, but Polla was still focused on what the frack Revan had meant with her acronyms, and trying to convince herself that just because something looked like a coffin didn't mean it was one, and how the frack was she not going to trip going up the steps in these robes.

"No," the Republic hero whispered. He dropped Polla's hand, broke into a run.

Zaalbar roared and the Tee-Three beeped. The Tee even launched itself after him, moving in repulsor jets faster than anything Polla had ever seen on an astromech before.

Ahead of them, two red-robed figures abruptly produced glowing blue quarterstaffs and crossed them together, blocking his way.

"No!" Carth repeated. "Bastard! You… you murderer!" His hands went to his blasters and for a sec, it looked like he was about to shoot the guards—but a rapid-fire blast of Shyriiwook and droid beeps stopped him in his tracks.

"Alive?" He turned his head towards the Tee as if it knew. "He's alive? Are… are you sure, Mission?"

"Carth?" Everyone was looking at them. Of course, because we're the stars of this fracking nova. Polla walked forward, craning her neck to see. At her approach, both guards retreated, kneeling at her feet, in a way that… might have been funny, were their situation less fracked.

The coffin-shaped plat on the hoverlift that was covered in red bows had green, blinking lights on its side and the frozen features of a man, inset like some kind of frieze. It still took her Polla sec to figure out who the man was, because really, the kid could be anyone with his mouth frozen open screaming like that.

"Is that... a carbonite chamber?" she ventured, finally. "You froze… Darth Malak in carbonite, just for me?"

"I suppose his old face was more familiar," Zepth said. The asshole brought the Zabrak's boy's hands together as if he was clapping with glee. "What shall we do first: thaw out your consort? Remove your collar? Have lunch and then the tour?"

How about grab Carth's carbsicled son and leave? But there were thousands of sents surrounding them, and the Hawk was low on fuel, and Polla didn't think even the real Revan could get them out of this one.

"The tour," she shrugged. Figure out the bolt holes first. Idiots didn't even lock down the Hawk. It's just sitting there on the landing pad waiting for us to come back. As soon as Real Revan shows up with Sei, we're outta here. She can keep this fracking planet and this fracking Sith Empire of… dirt.

The Emperor chuckled. "As you wish."

Xxx

There was a song that Morgana used to play when they were first living together. A song she'd sing along to in the fresher when she thought Carth couldn't hear. She had a sweet voice, although rarely in tune. Carth remembered the melody, but only a snatch of the verse: something about 'not knowing what you've got til it's gone.'

Now, as Carth held the hand of the woman who had never been his wife, walking with her up the steps to the frozen carbonite statue of his son, on a Sith planet beyond the reach of any star chart he'd ever seen, that song was stuck in his head like a scratched holodisk.

"He'd better be okay," he muttered at Zepth. The poor kid was still possessed, him and Takan both, like Tenebrae wanted a stereo view.

Dustil's mouth was frozen in the rictus of a scream, his hands twisted like claws. It looked like he-or Malak-had gone down fighting.

Xxx

"He's a fighter," the Besalisk observed, holding the squalling red-faced infant upside-down by one claw. "You can say that!"

"Good," Morgana smiled up at Carth. "This world needs more fighters, doesn't it?"

"That a knock against the Fleet pilots?" Smiling, Carth brushed her hair back from her forehead and planted a kiss there. "Because I think our kid's gonna be an interstellar pilot, not just one of you grav-jockies."

"He'll be what he'll be," Morgana murmured. "But it might be nice to have an Onasi man closer to home."

Xxx

Home.

Say, somehow they got out of this blasted mess. Then what? Coruscant was a cesspool, Telos was still radioactive—even if one of the restoration projects finally had got off ground. Sure, Zaalbar would welcome them back to Kashyyyk, but what would Dustil do on Kashyyyk? Would Dustil even want to stay?

Would… would Carth?

Would Revan?

Polla Organa kept walking. She seemed calm, but her hand trembled in his, warm, even through those gloves she had on.

The doors to the Sith tomb—or whatever it was—were at least ten meters high. They opened into an arched, empty room, hung with banners that all had the same red and black gear symbol Carth had come to associate with the Sith. The cloth was new and bright, contrasting strangely with the weathered stone. It wasn't until they crossed the expanse and reached a side corridor that Carth noticed the dust in the corners, what looked like spider roach webs above in the rafters. The air smelled musty with disuse.

"This is your suite." Tenebrae was possessing the two kids as well as six other servants now, escorting them through hall after hall of cold, stone walls, complete with lurid frescoes out of some Holovid villain's lair. "The three of you—and your… animal—should be quite… comfortable."
Zaalbar's lips pulled back from his teeth, but he had the sense not to say anything.

Comfortable? Yeah, right. If they had ice in their veins. The rooms all led into one another, elaborate archways opening like the cabins on a warbird. Everything was stone. Damned if even the bed didn't look like it was made of stone. It was big enough for six. Apparently, True Sith didn't believe in sheets.

Pollana walked over the stone table set by the suite's only window and peered out of it. "It's very… rustic," she offered. "Do we really need so many guards outside?"

"We have our rebel factions," Takan's body chuckled. "I would hate something to happen to you before our union is complete."

"Right. Wouldn't want that." She glanced at the door, mask making her face a blank oval. "Leave. Now."

The six escorts turned and walked in unison out the door, which slid shut behind them.

"You too, Lord Emperor." She pointed at both of the Zabrak kids.

"After you." He gestured towards the door. "We have business to attend to, you and me. I thought we could eat in the small, dark blue dining room? It's quite right for two. I'm already waiting for you there, in a form you will find familiar."

"You… are?" Waver like panic in her voice. "Good luck with that one, because I'm pretty busy. We have to unpack, and… do things."

"I'm afraid I must insist."

Pollana's masked face turned towards Carth and then back. He watched her hands curl into fists, then one of them fall, almost casually to the holster at her belt. "No," she said. "I'm afraid I must insist. To the hell with y-"

The next instant she was splayed on the ground, hands and legs outstretched, making a hoarse, gasping sound.

Above her, Takan chuckled. "I may have been too indulgent of late. Remember our balance, Revan? At the moment you are merely my dirt daughter. A fleshling as helpless as all the rest."

Tenebrae's hand was out like he was doing this to her. He lowered it, and Pollana's entire body almost seemed to flatten under an invisible weight-

The world went white-

And then Pollana lying on her side on the floor with the mask off, gasping, and Carth had both blasters in his hands. Pointed at her. At her. He looked up. Zaalbar was now in restraints, and ten Sith guardsmen with glowing sticks surrounded them all.

"...of a ronto. And frack your mother too!" Mission added. All the lights on her dome were flashing red.

Five minutes, he cursed to himself. This much of the world can change in five minutes. They'd timed it over and over. The huttspawn couldn't possess him for longer than that, never seemed to be able to do over and over-

And some day, he won't be able to do it at all. Somehow. We'll find a way. I will.
Carth was very, very tired of being jerked around.

"You see, Revan?" The chuckle was ancient. It didn't belong to the face of a kid younger than Dustil. "You cannot win. Not when I hold your leash."

Even under the robes, Carth could see the smuggler's panic: chest heaving, hands shaking as they reached for the mask. She clambered to her feet.

"Are you okay?" he whispered.

Polla's breath hitched, as she adjusted the mask back on her face. "Sure." She shook her head.

Then she practically fell into his arms. She was stiff and shaking, with his hands still holding blasters clasped awkwardly around her waist. A stranger in a mask.

"It's going to be okay," he lied. "I've got you."

"Give me one of those guns." Her voice was muffled against his jacket, raspy and metallic through the mask's mic, as she plucked one from his hand. "You can have the Aratech back. I want the disrupter. Something the asshole can't deflect."

The pistol he'd given her earlier was gone from her hips. It took Carth another second to notice it, on the floor.

She already tried to shoot him. She tried to shoot one of the kids when Tenebrae was in them and he was trying to crush her-

"Be careful." Don't kill the kids, it's not their fault-

"Two days," she muttered half under her breath. "Then it's all her show. Who the frack is Vimp? What's a cler? Clurr?"

"What?" It took Carth a moment. "You heard from her? Again?"

He'd hardly dared believe her the first time she whispered it in his ear, both of them standing awkwardly in the fresher, because Tenebrae was too fastidious to 'spend time with bodily functions,' as he'd put it.

"Uh huh." She flashed him her wrist. She was wearing the comm openly, brazenly. Just like the ridiculous five lightsabers still dangling from her belt.

The abbreviated Aurebesh was as familiar as Fleet commands.

Don't take the collar off. Very important.

No kidding, Freckles.

Carth frowned. He had expected… more, somehow. Something.

She's too busy to send you a love letter.

"Two days?" He whispered. "What else did she say?"

"I got the earlier one. ETA two days. This was his summer palace. And we need to not die." Her voice was a hoarse rasp in his ear.
That... almost sounded like her. "We won't," he promised. "No dying."

"Who the frack is vimp?"

"Very important."

"What?" She squinted at him. "What's very important?"

"Not to-"

"What was that now?" Tenebrae speaking in unison behind them. "I do love your plots and counterpoints, Revan!"

"Frack you," she snarled, pulling away from Carth. "When I get the Force back I'll make you pay. I'll strip the flesh from your bones!"

Xxx

In wartime, you get used to a lot of hopeless crusades. Desperate stands. Times you don't expect to win, but you fight because there's nothing else to do. When Mission broke them out of Malak's torture cells on the Leviathan, Carth hadn't expected to make it. His goals had abruptly narrowed down to a sniper's scope: kill Saul Karath. That had been all that was left—all that was allowed.

To hope for more was tempting the fates.

Xxx

Two days. Are you expecting her to save you? Two days and then two dark lords will be here: Revan and Malak both. Two days and then what?

Who are you saving here, Onasi? What's the real objective?

His thoughts were brutal. Ruthless. He almost wished he had orders, that the decision would rest with someone else.

But you left the Fleet. You saved her before. This is on you.

"Hang on a sec." Mission's voice. "What's happening in two days?"

Behind her, the guards and servants filed out again-one-by-one. Carth automatically noted Mission's position by the door and Zaal's opposite.

"Need to know, Tee." Polla's voice sounded tired. "Hey, mind if my droid tags along to our dinner, Teneb-Tenny-bro?"

"In fact, I do mind. Oh, ho. But-" the Zabrak kid gestured. A click and the two halves of the Force collar around her neck clattered to the floor. "If you want to strip the flesh from this vessel's bones right now, that's fine."

Zepth's body took a step away from Takan as if to give her room. They both had the same, fixed smile on their faces.

The door slid shut behind the last of the guards.

Polla froze.
Carth froze.

Zaalbar whimpered something at Mission, too fast to catch.

Polla kicked one of the collar pieces across the floor. It clattered. She folded her arms, her stance too poised to be real. "Thanks, but I'm rather fond of these two. Kind of a matched set. You know?"

"Hmm..." Zepth circled her, like a kath after a scent. Takan stood still, and somehow that was worse. "That's odd. I can't sense-"

"You have no sense." But it was obvious that her confidence was rattled, her imperious manner slipping.

Zaalbar whined.

"Very odd. Did the Jedi do this? I can't sense you at all."

The Zabrak kid lifted his hand, and a jet of blue light sparked, knocking Polla to the ground before any of them could stop it.

Polla yelped, a helpless, high, thin sound that set Carth's heart on edge. She yelped and scrambled away, rolling desperately across the floor, as Carth jumped in front of her, as Zaalbar jumped in front of him, as Mission's voice blasted behind them both.

Somehow the mask Polla was wearing fell off again, went spinning across the floor and into a corner.

"Leave her alone!" Mission commanded, sounding exactly like the real Revan. "Or I swear I'll blast your face off!" Mission extended the flamethrower they'd installed on her chassis.

"Will you?" Zepth had that crazed smile on his face. "Who is she?"

"I'm the actress she hired to keep you distracted," muttered Polla from the floor. "And you're fracked, because Revan's coming here now to kick your ass, Tenny bro. In the flesh."

Polla scrambled to her feet, one hand holding the blaster, but her gloves were torn and she favored one side now as if he'd burned her. She holstered the blaster and pulled out one of the lightsabers instead, holding it out gingerly, as her fingers fumbled at the switch.

"That's right," Mission added. "I'm coming for you, Tenebrae. And I'll leave your entire planet a scorched hellhole... so frack off."

"In two days," added Polla, still fumbling with the lightsaber.

It's probably Force-locked. Some of them are. All he could do was shake his head.

She shot him a puzzled frown.

"Soon," Mission snapped. "She is merely my harbinger. My servant. Because... I mean, obviously, this was a trap. So... release my servants and I'll get here. When I'm good and ready. But if you harm them...." She let her voice trail off, ominously.

"In two days," Polla repeated. But she glanced at Carth again, not Mission. "You... uh, sent me word already, Lord Revan."
"Always keep the element of surprise," Mission snapped. "Maybe it will be two days. Maybe two years. But I will raze this installation into ashes. I will make all that you possess empty stardust. I will end you, Teneb-"

"Shut up," Polla snapped at her. "You're coming here in two days. You… promised."

"Did I?" Mission almost sounded like herself for a second.

"You know you did-" Real panic in Polla's voice now. A half hysterical sob. "Fracking hell, Revan Starfire, you-"

White light. A blink. A heartbeat, and then Polla was standing, holding a lit lightsaber, holding it all wrong with her left hand. A different one than the one before-maybe. Two others were scattered on the floor as if she'd dropped-or discarded them too.

The green blade wavered a little as she pointed it at the Zabrak kids.

Their eyes weren't glowing now. They looked terrified, not even going for their own weapons.

"I said, don't move!" Polla hissed again. The blaster was in her injured hand, and several bolts lined the wall between the kids-so neatly spaced they could have been run by an auto-cannon. "Next time, I won't miss!"

The room's electronic display by the wall was a scorched and smoking mess, as if she'd shoved a lightsaber into it.

Zaalbar had his own vibroblade out too. And Mission was across the room, plugged into what remained of the terminal. The door's seals appeared to have been sealed shut. There were shouts coming from outside. Shouts and what sounded explosions.

"Ten minutes, sis," Mission chimed. "Maybe? We have about five minutes before they break down those doors… or… maybe twenty, if they're dumb. There's an access panel overhead, it'll be a tight squeeze for Big Z, but we can make it work."

Polla's eyes met Carth's, across the wavering, green line of her particle blade. "You back?"

"Yes." He drew his blaster, but frack if he could shoot the kids. It wasn't their fault! It wouldn't stop anything.

"The Tee and Zaalbar think they can get us out of here." Her eyes flickered warily towards the kids and then back to him. "Knock them out and let's go."

"We want to help," Takan interrupted. Takan and not Zepth. The kid had picked a hell of time to join the side of the angels. "She's right. He's coming back. It won't be long-he only left because he doesn't like to die and you were shooting-"

"I wasn't going to kill you." Polla sighed. "So he runs when one of his zombies gets killed?" She fumbled with the lightsaber, shoving her blaster back in her belt. "Asshole."

Carth was strangely happy he didn't need to plead for their lives. His wife would have-he wasn't sure what the real Revan would have done. What she would do.

_She's coming here. We just need to make it until then. She's coming here to rescue us. I need to have faith in that, let go of my fears._
Zepth jerked, stiff to attention. His eyes began to glow again.

"Oh, no," Zaalbar groaned.

"What game is this?" Zepth and Takan were speaking in unison. Again. "Where is the real Revan Starfire?"

"Coming for your ass, loser." Polla nodded at Carth. "Two days. Like I said. We're just the intro."

"Oh!" Takan's hands clapped together stiffly. "This is extraord-"

Carth thumbed the catch off his blaster, dialing it down to stun and fired before the emperor could finish the sentence. One. Two. The kids collapsed like balloons in a gravity well.

"They're stunned," he announced. We have fifteen minutes-maybe." Carth found his voice. "Maybe... before he can get in me again, but you should knock me out too. The three of you should run-if I stay here they won't kill me. Not when they know she's really coming-"

And someone needs to protect these kids.

"You want us to leave carbsicle here with you?" Polla frowned. She waved the still-lit lightsaber around, so carelessly it made him wince.

Xxx

"Huh." Polla raised an eyebrow at the dead Sith governor of Taris. "Nice shot, Onasi. Is that a real lightsaber?" She bent down and picked it up.

Remembering what had happened in the conapt with the blaster, Carth winced; but Polla Organa tossed the thing easily in her hand, weighing the hilt.

"Feels off," she muttered.

"You're an expert now at lightsabers too?" She'd be a good fighter, if she didn't keep putting herself in insane situations, acting like she was invincible.

"How hard can it be?" Polla did something, and the thing actually ignited from both sides, hissing red.

"Two particle blades?" Carth laughed, mainly to hide his unease. "Come on now, how does anyone fight like-"

Polla twisted the weapon in her hand, for a millisecond, the blades seemed to spin, flashing in a perfect, deadly circle.

"Careful-" he warned her. "You can't just pick that up and-"

The hilt flipped out of her hand and sank into a wall, then deactivated with a sharp click, clattering to the floor.

"Did I do that?" Polla didn't even sound sure. "Was that me, or-"

"Scout Organa." Bastila's voice was like ice. She and the Tee-Three they'd picked up stood in the doorway. "The astromech has downloaded the codes we need to pass the blockade. The mercenary is waiting for us in the cantina. Leave... that alone."
"Thought you might want a freaking laser sword," Polla muttered. "Since you lost yours."

Bastila made an exasperated noise but then raised her hand. Incredibly, the governor's weapon flew into her hand like it was magnetized.

Carth had worked with Jedi in Fleet, even had General Revan herself comm him congratulations. He'd had that asshole Malak D'Reev try to read his mind, heard Kavar Vaklu speak at the Fleet Academy, and certainly had enough lectures from Masters Ancilla and We'kai on the doomed Endar Spire; but he'd never actually seen the Force in action, not like the grounders talked about. Lightning, making the ground shake, freezing blaster bolts in midair... it half sounded like magic.

A part of him, had maybe never really... believed. Until now.

The lightsaber flew into Bastila Shan's hand like it had been magnetized. She spun it around unlit twice herself—but then, when her fingers opened, it flipped over, actually floating in the air before pinwheeling slowly back down to the ground.

"Ugh." Hope of the Republic made a face, and kicked it across the floor. "The weight's all wrong. It's... garbage."

"Told you," Polla muttered.

"We will keep our feet firmly on the path ahead," the Jedi murmured. The words sounded like a prayer.

Xxx

"How do I switch this thing off?" the real Polla asked. "How come there's no weight in the blade?"

"Just put it down," Carth tried to stay calm. "They... have some kind of auto-switch that kicks in, when a Jedi isn't controlling the blade."

How far he'd come, from wondering if the Force was real.

"You want me to leave it for carbsicle? The others... I think they're broken." Polla set it down gingerly. The thing sparked for a second longer than Carth liked on the floor, but then it switched off.

"No." He didn't want to do this. But everything logical said it was the best option. If I go with them, Tenebrae will follow. And what will happen to the Zabrak kids? If Dustil stays with me, the Emperor will have no reason not to hunt the rest of them down. They'll have .

"You're taking Dustil with you," Carth ordered her. "I'll stay here with the kids."

"Huh?" Polla frowned and shook her head. "No. No way. We can't leave you behind."

"I don't like this," warned Zaalbar.

"Take Dustil with you," Carth repeated. "Zaalbar can carry him, he's probably the safest of us all frozen like that-"

"Don't be dumb," Mission chirped. "We all need to split together. You think they bought that Revan's really coming thing?"

"But she is." Wasn't she? Wasn't she? Had Polla lied?
"Yeah. She'll be here in two days. She commed." Polla had already moved across the room, shoving the deactivated blade back on her belt with the others. Now, she was kneeling in front of Dustil's carbonite frame, swiveling the dials. "One sec."

"What are you doing?" He went to her. She'd turned all the dials back down to nothing. "You can't unthaw-"

"Wait. Waitaminute. You've been talking to Polla Revan? Really? This is… ginormous? Why didn't you tell me?" Mission was using Revan's voice again, low and furious, but Polla didn't even turn her head. Instead, she held up her hand, motioning them both to silence.

"I told Carth. I told all of you just now. With Tenny-bro."

"But not me and Big Z? Before?"

"Need to know." The Deralian glanced over at Zaalbar. "I would have told you, Furguy, but we were never alone together. Anyway, now you know. Big, bad real Revan's coming to get us out of this mess. She promised." Polla made a face. "Also, she's kind of a bitch."

Carth had assumed they knew. It was dangerous to speak freely, with Takan's loyalty in question, and all three of them capable of being possessed at any time. But he'd assumed that Polla would have pulled them both aside, warned them, given Mission time to come up with a plan- But she had never even given Zaalbar the comm. That crazy kid had tried to handle it all herself.

Achingly familiar, as a response. Revan had done the same far too often. Up until the end.

Xxx

"I've got this, flyboy." The sun had reddened Revan's nose-strangely at odds with the black robes she'd started wearing for show on Korriban, and for some reason, never removed. "Whatever's in that Sith temple, it's something I put there. This is my problem. My fault. My fight."

"Dumb kids," Jolee muttered, glancing at Juhani. She gave him an imperceptible nod, and then and there, Carth knew they'd follow Revan into that blasted temple no matter what she commanded.

"You already said it's like, Jedi-only." Mission adjusted the clasps of her body armor. "But I don't see why you can't take Jolee and Juhani. We're a team, right?"

"No tree has one leaf," Zaalbar added.

Canderous shrugged, and went back to polishing his repeater. "Dar'jettai osik," he muttered under his breath.

"Don't follow me," Revan said to Juhani, as if she knew they would. "I mean it. This is… real darkness. The less of us we risk the better."

"Oh? You know there are real Dark Jedi in there too, kid?" Jolee folded his arms and snorted. "Course you do. And we can sense them, same as you. You think you can take on a dozen? Two dozen? All on your lonesome? Or you think they're gonna throw you some welcome home party?" He frowned. "Truth, I'm not sure what's worse."

Revan glanced up at the sky, where the hulk of the Star Forge loomed overhead; visible, even through the endless blue distortion of the energy shield they needed to bring down.
"Yes." Her voice was dead. "In this place… I can beat them all. Don't ask me how I know, but I can… I can hear it. There's… power here. And it's… mine."

"Sure that's not just the Sith crazy?" Jolee frowned. "Be careful, kid."

Sometimes Carth wondered. If she'd had nothing to sacrifice. If the lives of her friends hadn't been in her way… would Revan have fallen at all?

Or would she have returned with not just Bastila, but an army of Dark Jedi at her back?

XxX

"Don't-" his protest to Polla was too late. Even as Carth watched, the carbonite glowed white-eyed around his son's face, glowed and dissolved. Dustil's body flopped to the floor in a hiss of steam. "You can't just-we need a medic!"

"No time." Polla pushed her mask up over her hair. "He's got the Force? We need him to fight all of these fracking Sith-especially if we don't have you."

"You can't just… unfreeze someone from carbonite and expect them to fight!"

"Revan's not actually coming here." Mission's voice was stubborn. "She would've commed me. I'd know."

"You're a droid." Polla sighed. "I know everyone around here mankafoots around that fact; but it's true. You're only a droid. Her coming was need-to-know. Your orders are to get us to a fracking safe spot. Now."

"Do something, friend Carth," Zaalbar groaned. "They are both lost cubs in this place."

On the floor next to Polla, his son's body twitched, and gasped, mouth opening wide-

"Dustil." Carth threw himself down, grabbed his son's hands, stared into the wild-eyed eyes that didn't seem to be able to focus. Were they Sith yellow, or was that a trick of the light? "Dustil, I'm here." He squeezed his son's hands.

"You think Revan's a bitch, Polla Organa?" Mission made those words in Basic mechanical, like a real droid's voice. "Observation: You are hopelessly naive. If your deliberate… ignorance regarding my true capacity has obstructed the real Revan's plans, I will be forced to terminate our alliance. Permanently."

"Red," Dustil whispered. His eyes blinked rapidly but didn't seem to see. Carbonite blindness. Carth had heard of it, just like he'd heard about the Fleet using carbonite to transfer prisoners too dangerous for conventional methods; but he'd never seen it before. "Where is she? She's supposed to be here."

Carth dropped his son's hands, hysteria a bitter pill in his throat. "She's coming," he said dully. "She's coming, Malak."

"Captain?" The asshole was surprised, at least. His son's blind eyes turned towards Carth, unfocused, shot with red. Were they yellow? Or was the carbonite effect? The light? "Your son is… here. We are all… here."

The two Zabrak kids were still unconscious on the floor. Carth had only heard of carbonite freezing-smugglers used it, maybe some less than savory branches of the SIS; but Dustil wouldn't be able to walk—not right away. Even if he's still Malak.

"Dustil, if you can hear me, I'll see you soon. You need to carry him, Zaalbar."

"Yes." The Wookiee crouched down next to his son's body. "We need to go."

Would Malak kill Polla? "Revan's coming here, Malak. But I swear to the stars if you let any harm come to any of us, I'll…." How can you harm a ghost? Carth had spent more sleepless nights than he could count pondering that question.

"I'll shoot him first, flyboy. No big deal." Mission was using Revan's voice, all wrong. "Unlike some people, you should have faith in my abilities by now."

"Go now," he told them. Zaalbar already had the access panel open, was scooping Dustil's barely conscious body into his arms. "If I stay here, he won't… he won't know where you are."

Polla frowned at him, then nodded slowly. "Here." She unsnapped the comm from her wrist. "Take this, okay? And actually fracking comm her. Not like it's blowing any secrets now." She forced a smile. "Tell Seiran I said hi. See him soon."

"Then how-?" And then he got it. "Mission. You still have the codes to Revan's commlink?"

"Tell her she'd better pick up this time," Mission snapped. "I don't know what I did to make her mad at me, but she hasn't commed in ages!"

Carth did know. He remembered his wife, head in her hands, holding the guilt of the Organa deaths like a blaster to her own head.

Xxx

"Mission could have done this, Carth. She has the ability, and she's-changed. She's not—I don't trust her."

"No one changes that much." But he had wondered too. The headset she'd used to link directly to the droid had remained where it was until he took it himself, what seemed like ages ago, when he and Canderous fled the Jedi Temple with Revan's son—

Xxx

*But Polla's alive. And Revan knows that now. And she's coming here. Here to another fracking Sith place, where she was a Sith before. Here to where her old husband, Malak D'Reev is Force-possessing the body of my son…"

I have to give her a chance.

"She'll talk to you now, I think, Mission."

He hoped.

Xxx

The world was black and the Force screamed: the dull drone of fear, and hate, and anger so typical to a Sith planet. Malak's face was buried deep in something furred that smelled foul-like musk and blood and fear. His body was boneless, bent and wrong—and the Captain's voice, the one familiar point was silenced.
It took some time for consciousness enough to return to register the familiar: the taint in the Force so familiar, what he had known all along confirmed.

Kaas. This is Dromund Kaas.

I can't see! The Telosian boy's voice, a panicked squeal in his thoughts. Was that my father? I heard him! How the frack is my father here?

The world shook and jostled and Malak had no answers in the darkness.

And yet, a part of him reached out stretching across stars towards the light-

Xxx

The door slid open, illuminating the darkened room. A man's silhouette in the frame. Tall and fat, almost familiar.

"I thought Vrook and that Twi'lek would never leave." Over-enunciated voice. "Given the circumstances, it seemed prudent to wait for their departure before revealing myself."

Where Mekel was, there was light and seeing. They stretched towards it across stars-

All three minds all collided again like a hover train coupling. You're back. Where the frack were you I thought you were dead. Not dead. Contained in carbonite. Tenebrae shipped us to Dromund Kaas, I think. Revan is here, he said, but I cannot sense her-

Frack you, Malak. We don't give a frack. Telos! You're back!

Relief flooded through both of them, loosening their focus enough to snap the world around Mekel Jin into bright relief. Suddenly Dustil was just there, like a pattern overlaid on top of his own. Everything, their thoughts, mingled-

"Master Klee?" Mekk could see. He wasn't blind. Darkness resolved itself into gray and they saw through Mekel's eyes, the Eosian standing in front of him, the medix walls. Mekel realized he’d closed his eyes again, was rubbing them with his fists. When he looked up again, Klee was spackled with red and black afterimages.

Blind? Telos, why are you blind?

Fracking carbonite. I don't know.

"Mekel? My master will return soon. Whatever he says… know that his real attention is on Dromund Kaas. Revan has distracted him, but she will need our assistance here… as well as there."

"Revan?" Their thoughts blurred. One of them laughed. "Which fracking one?"

Revan. She is on Kaas. Malak refocused his attention across the stars.

See you later, asshole, one of them thought.

"What?" Master Klee sighed. "How did you know about the actress?"

"Is that what she's calling herself?" Laughter bubbled into hysteria. *You're alive. I thought I was alone…. "Sheris is an actress now?"

"Sheris?" Klee frowned. "I assumed Revan had her killed in the explosion."
They both laughed. Dustil and Mekel… both. Malak wasn't laughing, Malak was distracted someplace else—across the stars, swung over the back of a Wookiee, staring at some red-headed bint in black robes. Their eyes were in and out of focus. Out of focus, she did kind of look like Revan, but in focus—

In focus Mekel suddenly knew where he'd seen her before. At Moms. Hanging out with dear old Lammikins and the Mando'ade like she was practically clan herself.

Telos? What the frack is that smuggler babe doing on Dromund Kaas?

Xxx

"Who are you?" Their voice was hoarse, like Malak wasn't making it work right. Dustil should know her name—it had been on the vids. She'd even said it. But frack if they could remember now.

"Pollu." She frowned. "Pollu Organa. Can you walk?" She gestured to her belt. There were like, three fracking lightsabers there. "If I give you a weapon, can you fight?"

They were moving, their body was swaying back and forth, slung over the shoulder of a Wookiee like a tub of meat.

"What is that smuggler… babe doing on Dromund Kaas?" It was like an echo. Malak's voice, their thoughts. All three, too mixed.

"Babe, huh?" The smuggler raised her eyebrow. She had one of Dad's blasters on her belt. He'd recognize it anywhere. "A frack load of mistaken ident."

"I sealed the blast doors behind us. Pathetically easy!" A new voice interrupted from somewhere behind the Wookiee. Feminine. Smug. Familiar. "Do you think some droid could hack into a Sith fortress and seal this passageway from outside intrusion?" Familiar whir of astromech treads. Even though she'd put a bomb in his neck, Mekk sent a surge of happiness through the bond at the sound of her fake, fracking, vodered voice. "No. A regular old droid couldn't do this. I have a name, Polla Organa, and you'd better start using it."

"Mission!" Mekel seized total control for a sec, struggling in Dustil's body; bringing him to the forefront enough to struggle in the Wookiee's arms. "Put me—put us—down."

"Us?" Polla Organa tilted her head. "Us who?"

Blue rolled up to them. Someone needed to touch up that orchid on her chassis again. Her dome flashed. "Sithboy? Not Sith Lord?"

"Yeah. Mostly. It's kind of hard to explain—"

Mekk was actually happy, but then again, he had a body safe on Coru. Dustil forced the feeling of jealousy away before he had to think about what and who he was really jealous of.

Let me do this, Mekk. Let me talk to her. Keep Malak the frack away—

If you want to speak to Red's memory template or her droid, I have no objection. Malak's thought was distracted—obviously more interested in Master Klee, now that his wife wasn't in the picture.
"Oh!" Mission beeped, swiveling her dome around. "Guys, take the right-hand fork up ahead. I'm glad to see you, Dustil. Your… carapace is a real mess."

"I was just frozen in carbonite" It had left a fine, gray dust on their-his-clothes.

"Yeah." They both stepped aside, let Telos take over. Mekel felt his own invisible arms envelop the other boy, pushing Malak back to Coru, all the way back. "We-I can walk. It's… okay. What the frack… what the frack's going on?"

"Well…" the smuggler began.

"Stow it," Mission chirped. "We really do need to keep moving through these tunnels."

Despite Dustil's protests, Zaalbar's arms tightened their grip.

Xxx

"Mekel. Listen to me." A hand on the boy's arm squeezed it sharply, jerking him upright and sending another lance of pain to his gut. "Tenebrae will possess me. Soon. He can control Malak through you. He hopes to control Revan in this way. Through your Force bond. If one of you dies, so does the other. Do you understand?"

Dark laughter. In two places at once. Malak's concentration splintered away from the woman who wasn't Revan, the obsession with the droid, back to here. "I comprehend more fully than I ever did before, Klee. Where is my wife now?"

The Eosian took a step back, dropping their arm. "Not here. Somehow she arranged to have some minor actress kidnapped in her stead-"

"In addition to the Organa woman?" All Malak's laughter now. He felt the other two splinter away, their attention captured by that droid and the woman who was the smuggler the Jedi used for Revan's mindwipe? On Kaas? "Oh, Red. What kind of game is this?"

"Organa-?" the Eosian shrugged. "I don't… there is much I do not know."

Xxx

Not really that hot, all this Sith banthashit. She looked better in that dress.

Dustil realized that Mekel was leering at Polla Organa and made him stop. "Put me down," he muttered, even as the world tilted and stretched between Coru and Kaas again. "We can fracking walk, okay?"

"Dustil?" The droid-Mekk kept stubbornly calling 'Blue,' like she was Mission, beeped at him again. "You look like hell."

"Right back at you." He struggled in Zaalbar's arms until the Wookiee set him down upright. Things came more into focus, which didn't make things any better, as that revealed that they were basically trekking through a dusty ventilation shaft. Probably straight into a turbine fan, if I know Sith engineering. "How the frack did you guys get here?"

"It's a long story," the smuggler muttered. "But the good news is, Revan's coming to rescue us in two days. She commed and told me. And Seiran-my husband's-with her. So this is temporary." The woman took a deep breath. "We just need to break out of this evil Sith fortress and hide out for two days."
"Oh. No fracking problem then." Upright, the world was slightly more unsteady than he'd expected. He wobbled and then Zaalbar was there, supporting him. "Where the frack is my father?"

The Wookiee yowled something that sounded like a question.

"He wants to know if you're okay now. He says you smell like rotten meat and… dark wood. Rotten? There's no real idiom."

"Evil?" Polla suggested. "Are you possessed by Darth Malak and evil?" Her hand, Dustil realized suddenly was resting on the hip of her belt, fingers curved next to his father's blaster.

"Yeah—I mean, no. I'm not fracking evil." Mostly. He had to concentrate not to see a different room. A different place. To keep Malak back, but Malak was distracted, now, talking to Master fracking Klee, of all sents—and Mekel was surprisingly quiet, caught between them like a tethering line. "My father was… he was here. Why did we leave my dad back there?"

"Because he ordered us to." Polla grimaced, squeezing past him and Zaalbar, looking down the shaft in front of them. "Huh. Can we jump over that?"

The Wookiee moaned.

"He says he can jump and throw us cubs."

"Great." It figured. Here comes Father to rescue me and—wait! There he goes again, off to save someone else, leaving me to be tossed around by a Wookiee. Thanks a frack of a lot, Dad!

"I disabled their security cams, but I can't do anything about the Force-sniffers." Mission rolled closer. "Sith can… sense other Sith? Right? Or… whatever you are, Dustil?"

"Sometimes." They had trained for that. "There's ways to hide, but I never paid enough attention—"

But I did. Revan taught me. Mekel, there again, like warm breath on his neck. He nodded their head. "We can hide, Blue. No prob."

It felt like flipping a switch, the way Mekel did it. One second they were there—and the next—Flip side was, it was hard to see with the Force when you were masking it. Like walking around with a blast shield on your head.

"Dustil?" The Tee-Three sounded confused. "The oscillations of your voice just shifted by a percentage of nine degrees away from the relative alpha sine—"

"Because it's me, Blue." Mekel pushed through. "I'm here too."

"Who is me?" Polla interrupted.

Zaalbar whined, seemingly asking the same thing.

"Mekel Jin. I met you… at my moms' brothel."

"That just seems like a wrong sentence," Polla muttered. "Oh! You were that kid, with the Mandalorians? Right. But how…? Did you die too or something?"

"No."

Zaalbar growled softly.
"He smells more bad wood approaching. Or evil... whatever." Mission frowned. "There's an exit up ahead, leads to one of the vent turbines. We'll disable the blades and then cut through the forcefield, if there is one... and then... jump. I think it's kind of a long drop. Did you guys bring any rope?"

"Rope?" Polla Organa snorted. "No."

"We'll figure something out," the Tee-Three said. "I think it's only like, twenty meters. No big deal."

Xxx

"Sit." Molla Organa had led them to the front sitting room, the one for company and not the back living room, with the vids and the auto-cooker and the pneumatic couch. "I'll fetch the interstellar comm."

"Mother?" Korrie squeezed her hand again. "You can't call her. You can't call anyone. She said not to."

"We can't just... stay here, Korrie." Molla Organa had already vanished down the hall, her feet beating the sound to the door, but Polla kept her voice quiet still the same.

"Why not?" Her son frowned. "You can dye your hair too. We're ages away from the Core. And Batti says if I keep practicing, I can ride Dancer solo soon."

"Dancer-"

XXX

The hessi's meter-long tongue swiped at her hair, tangling the strands as she waved the brush at him threateningly.

"Stay still!" Polla said. "I need to finish brushing those mats out before the competition."

The hessi stomped his eight clawed hooves and switched his tail. His ears swung back, and his tongue retracted, exposing sharp, pointed teeth.

"He doesn't speak Basic, Pollie." Da sounded like he was going to laugh, not help, leaning over the fence post. "Animals respond to tone, not words. You gotta coax him. Sweet talk." He made a series of clucking noises and the hessi's ears swiveled in his direction. "Here. Give me the brush-"

XXX

"Dancer's... Real? He's still here?"

"He's a hessi," her son rattled on. "They don't keep him on the farm anymore, Aunt Moll says; but he stables with the herd over at the Gerstein's pasture. He's nice. He only bit me once."

"You need to put mud on that," she told him. "Or dermafix, if you've got some."

"Batti sprayed it with some stuff." He displayed an unmarked arm. "The rash went away."

"Good." I didn't use the 'stuff' once and my arm itched for a week. Thought I was gonna take the skin off the way it-

She wiped at her eyes. "You said Darth Revan had a message for me."
"She's not Darth Revan! Not now!" Her son sounded shocked. "She saved us and now she's gonna save everyone!"

Sure. Because that makes sense. Going off to a Sith planet to face an immortal, omnipotent emperor by yourself... totally makes sense.

Maybe it does when you're nine. When Polla Organa was nine, she still believed that a magic throkkà bird came every solstice and left a woven basket full of sweets.

When I was nine, I don't remember anything. Or, almost. The taste of too sweet iced crema and the smell of an ocean.

That could be Polla too, how the frack would I know?

"Mother?" Korrie held out a datachip. "Here it is. The message."

"You said you'd tell me what that message said," Molla reminded her from the door. She had the old-fashioned bulky comm unit (that doubled as a bid projector) in both hands, which she set down on the table with a plunk. "You promised." She sat down next to Revan, dark eyes assessing her coolly. "You know what I think about promise-breakers?"

"That they're scum. Yes." Revan met her eyes and tried not to blink.

Xxx

"I'm not mad that you lied to us, Pollie." Ma was doing the yelling on this one, while Da glowered in the corner. "Sometimes a little lie helps. But you broke your promise. You promised never to take the speeder past Adaston town limits, and you and Sara were halfway to Biscay when that Beya Organa finally told us what was what! What were you thinking? You're not even licensed yet!"

"I just wanted to see the concert." Arguing wouldn't help and she knew that.

"Then you should have taken a runner, like all the other kids. Your word is your binding promise! You can't get by in this galaxy if you break promises."

Xxx

"I won't break my promise," Revan added. "I'll-I'll tell you what she said. My word is my... binding-bond. My word is my bond."

I'll tell you if it's safe. Every irrational instinct Revan had screamed to tell this woman everything. To throw herself in Polla's ma's arms.

"Your word is your bond?" Molla snorted. "Is that some Jedi saying? Because around here we don't trust."

"It's something my mother told me," Revan snapped. "I remember her saying it. Sometimes a little lie helps, but my word is a binding promise."

"Oh." There was a long, slow pause. The creases around the woman's eyes deepened, and she gave a sudden, rude snort, reaching for one of the napkins to wipe her eyes.

"It's... it must be all up there. In your head." Moll's expression softened, and then she blew her nose. Sound like a shot.
Korrie giggled, somewhere in the background, but for a moment, the world was only big enough for two.

"Yes." Revan nodded. Good and bad. "I remember everything, but it's not… me."

"I can almost see it. Her. In you," Moll sounded like she was confessing a secret. "Sometimes. The way you look at me, but then-"

"I'll tell you what Revan says." She wouldn't react, wouldn't let her voice waver. "Because I promised."

"Damn right you will," Moll muttered and plugged the chip into the projector.

Revan's own face, sketched in blue, appeared in front of them, backlit by the wall.

Xxx

Dar sat, straight as a lightsaber, her hair tumbling loosely over her shoulders, mouth thinned to a grim line. It appeared that she had recorded the message in one of the ship's closets.

"Hello, Revan," she began, in Rakatan. "Our son has been instructed to give you this chip. By now, you are no doubt fulminating about my betrayal. Know that it is not one. I am giving you a gift-one that I have never-"

Xxx

"What language is that?" Moll interrupted.

"Rakatan," Revan said, automatically pausing the recording because Ma-Moll never asked only one question. "The language of the Star Forge builders. It's more than thirty thousand years old."

"Everyone knows who the Rakata are!" Moll scoffed. "But you can speak their language?"

"Yes."

"Huh. I didn't know anyone could do that." Molla tilted her head.

Her commentary seemed to be done, so Revan began the recording again.

Xxx

"I am giving you a gift-one that I have never had."

"When Malak and I first found Tenebrae's servant on Rakata Prime, the Star Forge was a deactivated hulk, and the Sith worlds had all regressed to near anarchy. Left to its own devices, the Empire would have splintered into factions, torn itself apart within a generation.

But the Rakatan computer guided us to them. We came and found a man who spoke with Tenebrae's voice. To me. He said that I was their savior. The savior-of the Empire and Republic both."

"It was-"

Xxx
"What's she saying now?" Moll interrupted again.

Revan closed her eyes. "She says an ancient computer sent Malak and her to the Sith on Rakata Prime and told her she could save the galaxy."

Revan would have mocked the conceit of that concept, had the computer not also Revan the same thing on her own quest to find the Star Forge.

And not only did I believe it, but I gave it the personality of a fourteen-year-old Twi'lek.

"You can't trust machines," Molla warned.

Bolts set down the tray of tea cakes with an aggrieved whine and stalked away, treads of his feet creaking like they needed oil.

Xxx

Tenebrae's words were both truth and lies.

"I was arrogant. Desperate. Being Sith'ae'rah was... difficult. Sometimes I wondered if my gift was a lie. The dark side had made all of us stronger than we had ever been before—even me. Maybe... especially me."

Her own expression grimaced, smiling painfully. Even in the recording, their eyes seemed to meet.

"It would be easy to deny responsibility for all of the unfortunate events that preceded and followed, but I cannot. The Kashyyyk computer offered me its resources. I used them to create the specifications for a mass shadow generator that destroyed all of our ships—and the Mandalorians—at Malachor V. And I knew, even then, what the death of so many would do to the rest of us. That was... planned."

"But I... I envisioned us as galactic enforcers. Our transformation would give us strength to enforce peace. Forever. And the computer promised us weapons and technology, as well as a planet of refuge. Mal and I... I thought that we would recover ourselves on the Rakatan homeworld, then bring our forever peace to the Sith Empire too. Return to a balance between light and dark, before we returned to the Core to conquer it."

"The computer may have made certain... assurances, but the idea behind Malachor V was mine. Mine." Her expression was set in stone. "It had the power to eliminate the Mandalorian threat, but I conceived the means, the vision of our transformation. The deaths at Malachor, the fall of so many Jedi—those are things on my conscience. Not yours, Fragment."

"And that bit?" Molla asked.

"She said Malachor V wasn't my fault." The rest sent an uneasy prickle along the back of her spine. That memory she'd seen in the holocron, a fragment of their fall.

"Malachor... Five? Are there five of you, Korrie?" If Molla was joking, her voice was deadpan.

"No." He shook his head. "Mother means the planet. She had to blow it up to annihilate all the Mandalorians so they wouldn't hurt us again. But a bunch of Jedi died there too. And plain old soldiers, but it was the Jedi dying they needed. Father told me. It was a big, secret trap."
Revan didn't want to imagine Malak's version.

"I can't really see an Organa destroying a planet." Moll frowned. "But I suppose that was just her. Not you."

There was no adequate response, so Revan began the recording again.

Xxx

"I have to consider the possibility that my thoughts were already corrupted. By the computer, or the dark side. Maybe even by Tenebrae. He lies. Know that he lies. He had already possessed Malak on Korriban. Korriban was the last of the maps the computer sent us to, and he was there. It was there that he told me to come to him. He said it was my destiny, the only way to save my husband."

She pushed the hair back from her face. "That was before. Before Malachor. That was when we knew we had to finish what we had begun."

"But I didn't... come to him to save Mal. I took our fleet to Rakata Prime because they had what we needed. I knew that was my destiny—to do what was needed."

In the recording, her image was a washed-out blue. "My destiny, Fragment. Not yours. And it is still."

"Dodonna, Rensha—our most senior Republic advisors—mutinied when they realized that Malachor V had been more than a Mandalorian trap. They took their ships and fled. I don't know what happened to the Jedi aboard those ships. It would have been dangerous to leave them alive. My gift, combined with the others... all Force users within range had been touched with the corruption, the madness from so many deaths, so many Force-sensitive deaths... not that a Null death means less. But theirs are more... quiet. My gift was to shield others, but on that day I did not. On that day, I let the others... the other gifts... amplify their end."

"On that day, I felt everything they did. I became... what I became."

She blinked slowly. "After successfully springing our own trap, I led us into another."

"The Emperor was dying because he was overextended. He created entire worlds populated only by his voice and then forgot about them. Left them to starve, to die, squandered the resources they had, replaced them with nothing. We... all of us, were young. Full of strength and vitality. And I... I had the unique brain chemistry required to activate the Star Forge, restore their resources. He needed us. Me."

"When I realized the-"

Xxx

"Your face," Molla murmured. "I can tell it's bad from your face."

Revan stopped the machine again. "Yeah," she nodded. "Korrie... maybe you should go... play outside?"
"Oh, no." Her son scowled. "I get to hear this too."

"He hears too. You can't coddle them," Molla added. "Least, not when they're supposed to be important mucky-mucks someday."

"Maybe," Korrie qualified. "And maybe I'd prefer to be a hessi jockey or like, a brave Jedi instead."

"Good for you!" Molla Organa tugged his topknot and he smiled back. "You be you, kiddo."

"Tell us the rest, Mother." Her son folded his arms and sat up straight.

Revan took a deep breath. "She says... there was this... computer. And an immortal Sith Emperor who can possess bodies. The computer... brought us to the emperor? And he-the emperor-possessed Malak. Let's leave out the rest. The rest where I killed a lot of people and tortured the rest of them. Made them Sith. Made them follow me... so I could be some Sith Asshole Emperor's spark coil.

"Hmmm." Molla raised her eyebrows but said nothing.

"Father was possessed?" Korrie smiled. "And now he possesses people. Cool."

It's not cool. "It's not cool, Korrie. It's wrong."

"But isn't it like this Polla lady is possessing you?" Her son fiddled a hole he'd torn in his pants leg, pulling out the threads one-by-one. "I figured that out myself. It's like that." His eyes met hers. "It's not bad, though. You're nice. And she wouldn't be my Aunt Moll if you were just Revan."

"That's true." Molla Organa added. "I didn't raise my daughter to go listening to promises from machines. I think you know that." Her eyes were dark brown and as direct as a shot of vodkar.

Neither of them understood. Which was for the best.

"I need to go after her."

"That may be as may be," Molla said. "But I think you need to listen to what she's saying too, and not go off half-woven."

Revan nodded.

Xxx

"When I realized the bargain we had struck with the Empire was untenable, I attempted to undo it. Undo him. The computer helped me create a virus that would make most Force-resistant species immune to his touch-"*

Xxx

"And you trusted it?" So did I. So did I.

"Trusted who, now?"

Revan blinked. "Sorry, I mean she... she realized she'd been tricked by the Sith so she had the computer create a virus to stop them."

"The Jedi Plague." Her son smiled at Moll. "That's what we called it on Coruscant. I got "nokulated. Have you been?"

"Against the Rodian pox," Moll told him. "And Antilles Fever. That's what most folks get around these parts. We should look into your vaxxing, come to think of it."

"Which computer is she talking about?" Korrie's head turned to Revan.

"The one on Kashyyyk. The one that I found… a long time ago. With you." That memory, probably reinforced by seeing the vid the HK had shown her, seemed real as yesterday."

"My dear," Molla Organa sighed. "Didn't anyone ever tell you not to trust ancient machines? Or any machines. Bolts?" She raised her voice. "Speaking of, did you get those cakes for our tea? Bolts?"

"They are here, Mistress." From the sound of it, no one has adjusted the droid's voder in years. He slammed the tray down on the table with more force than necessary, and swiveled around, clanking across the floor on its metal, prehensile toes that seemed too big for the rest of his body.

"Have one." Moll gestured at the plate. "Choca crema. They're her-"

"Favorite. I… remember." Revan couldn't stand choca, but she took one and bit into it, all the same, swallowing and trying not to grimace.

"Hmmm…" Moll was frowning at her.

Xxx

"... A virus that would make most Force-resistant species immune to his touch-and with the assistance of my allies, we began its distribution through Imperial space. My long-term goal included inoculating sentients in the Republic as well, but we needed to conquer the Republic before we could save it."

"I knew Malak was compromised, but I hoped that by assigning him to oversee the work done by the Selkath scientists, he would gain an understanding of the threat. Others… who had been infected by Tenebrae proved capable of rebellion. There were even a few sentients who were infected by the plague after possession who made full recoveries, divested the emperor entirely from their minds."

"I had hoped… initially, at least, I had hoped to save Malak. He had grown increasingly unstable after his defiance with Telos-so much that by the end, his madness outreached any practical use. I… orchestrated Deralia as a trap for him. But he fired first. Perhaps one of his advisors-or mine-betrayed me. I still don't know how he knew the exact moment of his projected demise."

"Perhaps the Emperor knew my thoughts. He is not as much of a fool as he appears. If you face him you need to be careful-"

Her voice broke off, and a smile twisted her lips. "But I will make every effort to ensure that you never face him, Fragment. I believe I can neutralize him, but I have to account for every possibility."

"Thus…" She spread her hands wide open. "My story. Truncated, but accurate. Malak can confirm. Others… can confirm. Parts of it."
"That was a long bit, right there," Molla put her crema cake down, and poured a cup of tea.

"She says she tried to save Malak, but she couldn't." She glanced at Korrie, who was just staring, eyes wide. "She...thinks she can stop Tenebrae."

"There were a lot of words for that," her son had choca on his face.

Molla handed him a napkin. The weave looked like it was from their own stock-by the silvery glint to the threads. "How?" Molla asked. "Do you think this High Emperor mucky muck is as bad as everyone's saying?"

"I believe her. About him." She glanced at Korrie. "She would never have left Malachor if she didn't think it was necessary."

"You have to stay here," her son muttered. "She said you would."

"Tenebrae needed me to access the power of the Star Forge. There are other installations. Other facilities made by the Builders. Some are for ships, others..." The calm expression returned, like a mask over her features. "Others can synthesize sentient life. They all draw on the Force, all require power. Raw power. Mine that is now yours."

"Without you, he has nothing. My hope is to fool him, for a time. I know him, and you do not. You need to avoid him, as much as you need to avoid Davad Arkan. Leave them to others. Leave Tenebrae to me."

"I leave Korrie in your hands. The Genoharadan contract imposed by Malachi remains in effect until he comes of age when he is twenty-five Standard. You both will be safe on Deralia-for a time but he needs your protection."

"She says she's got this." Revan paused. "And she also confessed that she lied to us about the Genoharadan, Korrie."

"It has to be a lie. You may think you know the fracking Emperor, Revan-but I... I know you. You'd never put our son in danger. You left him before with a man you hated because he was the strongest protector you knew."

Korrie blinked and opened his eyes wide. "She said she lied about the Genoharadan?"

"Is that the ancient order of assassins that will kill you if your Ma doesn't stay here to protect you, dear?" Moll leaned over and looked at Korrie.

Revan knew that look.

Her son swallowed, looking back at Revan. "Yes. Them. Did my mother say she lied about the Genoharadan?"

Revan stared back at him, without blinking. "Yes."

Incredibly, Molla Organa laughed. "See the way she's staring, Korrie? If you want to get away with a lie, don't scribble it on your face." She shook her head. "Both of you are horrible liars. I guess I'm not surprised. When you do things right, you shouldn't need to lie at all."

Blast! Revan exhaled. "Neither of us would risk you, Malachor. Not me, and not her. We both want you safe."

Except, a disturbing part of her remembered that she—that Revan—had.

What is the life of one child compared to billions? Everything. Nothing. If I can save both, I will.

Her son looked away. "She told me you'd stay if I lied well."

Revan wanted to strangle Dar just for that, but she pitied the woman too. "I will come back," she insisted.

"She said that she would too," Korrie muttered. "But that's a lie."

Xxx

"If I fail, there may still be hope. The virus. See that it and its inoculant are distributed throughout Republic space. There is also a rumor I was chasing, little more than whispers, about a Rakatan prince..." Dar's image wavered, suddenly, words slowing down to a whine. "...imprisoned in a dimensional fold... a relic from their...tech-logy. The Prince...himself... too dang...ous... et tt-"

Xxx

The feed snapped out, abruptly. The self-powered chip went dark.

Revan blinked at it and tapped the side.

Nothing happened.

"Why'd it stop?" Korrie asked. "Can you make it go again?"

"I don't know." Revan picked it up, tapping the bottom. The entire thing was sealed—just one of those cheap, self-recorders they sold at Small-Marts, space stations, across the galaxy. It had a Coruscanti tax stamp.

"Let me see?" Moll plucked the chip from Revan's fingers and shook it in her hand. "Battery," she announced. "Cheap crap, really. It's run out of juice."

"Revan left me a message in a self-powered chip without enough charge?" That didn't sound likely. Why the frack didn't you just write it down, Dar?

*Too much risk. This message only needed to be heard once. She would have allowed sufficient power for that-"I didn't know it could run out." Korrie looked guilty. "Can you... can you fix it?"

"Bolts?" Molla was handing the chip to the Organa house droid, but Revan knew the answer already.

"No. They're solid state. One piece. The recording is in the battery and when that goes-"

"Polla is correct, Mistress. Inexpensive devices such as these are meant for short-term recordings.
They are quite popular with smugglers, espionage groups, as well as sentients of limited means-

"I was watching it over and over to go to sleep. You were in a coma and it was all I had." Korrie bit his lip. "I'm sorry, Mother. I must've used it all up."

"Bolts?" Moll whipped her head around. "You just called her Polla."

"Was that incorrect of me? The biometrics are not a match, but the speech patterns and general cognitive response-

"It's fine." Polla's mother sighed. "Make yourself useful, you bucket, and patch into the ship auctions in Derra City today. I expect we'll need to get her something fast if she's going to manage going all the way into Sith space to get the rest of our family back."

"You don't have the credits for-" Revan's protest was automatic before she'd even thought it through.

Molla scoffed. "You might have blown up a Star Forge or two, but that doesn't make you an expert on Organa finances. The settlement we got from the insurance was quite substantial. It's supposed to be for Abasen's future-" she shot a fond look at her grandson, napping in the bassinet by the window. "But I expect he'd like a mother too. And you can pay us back."

"We are rich," Korrie chimed in. His chin was set in a hard line.

"So you keep saying," Moll smiled at him, ruffling the top knot on his head. "But your Coru credits aren't worth a hill of banthashit out this far on the Rim."

Xxx

The chair she sat in was like a polished throne, gleaming and white, with the family crest stamped upon the floor in blue and silver under her feet.

Leeshansintina Evalyn Arabel, First of Racharn looked out the window of her throne room at the city spinning below and crossed her feet at the ankles. The jewels on her new shoes clicked together.

"You had choobs," Aramis Makeon, Third of Her Name and Best Friend to Racharn murmured. "Assassinating your own mother with a programmed chap. That was like… kind of evil, you know?"

"She was going to let Leeshy die."

Once there had been five Leeshansintina Racharns. Now there were only two.

Two... and four embryos from a clone lab, that Leesa had stuck back in deep freeze while she consolidated their holdings to include the D'Reev estates.

"Thanks for helping me go through this stuff, Aramis."

The dark-haired girl looked up from a pile of plimsi. "The idea was, we were gonna finish quick and then go check out those lost Jedi rumors."

"Slumming it with the second tier?" Leesa scoffed. "Please. We already know it's not Dustil Onasi, so who cares?"

"That Mandalorian bodyguard of his is so cute, though. Have you seen him? And he's in the Makeon Commemorative Hospital. We could check him out if you don't want to chase after this Loanin thing—"

"I think you need a new hobby." Had Leesa ever been so carefree? Oh, yeah. Right. She had been. Like more than half a rote ago when there was nothing more complicated to freak out about than whether that guy in the orange jacket was actually Carth Onasi.

Since the plague and political upheaval and stuff, life up here in the clouds had become both stressful and dull. Being First was really not as cool as she'd once imagined.

In the chair next to hers, Aramis Makeon was rooting through hard copies of the D'Reev secrets like a nerf snuffling for edible fungi on a border world.

"What's Ziost?"

"A planet?" Seriously?

"Yeah, I know that. I'm looking at the freaking map, but I mean... Dromund Kaas? Oh! Korriban! I've heard of that one! That's one of the Star Forge planets." Aramis lowered her voice like she was in awe. "Did Senator D'Reev leave you guys the Star Forge?"

"Don't be ridic." For one thing, Leesa had seen the forensic bios from the debris. For such a huge explosion, there hadn't been very many casualties. Like three, and at least two seemed to be dead already.

And none of them matched Revan Starfire or Korrie D'Reev's genetics. And that was a fact that Leesa was in a rather... unique position to know.

That also meant that technically... probably... none of this intel was even hers, to begin with.

That's why they were making copies of it, like right now.

"Why are these planets on this interdicted list, if they're not Star Forge? Are they Exchange? Hot pirates?" Aramis flicked her braid at Leesa. "Ooo. Sources for more kolto?"

Leesa shrugged. "Don't be so dramatic! I think that's like, the lost Sith Empire? D'Reev had some deal to control their media. Guess I do now?" She giggled. "At least, like... for now. My little sister swears up and down and sideways that Korrie's not dead."

"Arry too." Aramis shrugged. "Kids. They have to grow up sometime."

Discovering the Sith media archives had been one of the few not-boring things in Leesa's life lately. "Hey, did you know they all think Darth Revan was a man out there in Sithland? I saw this whacked-out vid where he knocks up Bastila Shan and goes off to fight evil in the Unknown Reaches--"

"These Unknown Reaches?" Aramis pulled up the map of Sith space. "Cause we know them now, so..."

"Don't be a zotz." Leesa rolled her eyes.

XXX
Gwenarius blamed herself. All this talk about honor, about ceremony, about blooding… and she had somehow failed to teach her daughter the importance of practicality, of cutting your enemies off at their roots. The importance of knowing when honor lay in a quick blaster bolt to the chest, rather than the extraction of information.

In front of her by the Aleema's weapons array, Aemelie was pacing, still obsessed with the past. "Did the Deathbringer explain the mechanics of the mass shadow generator? Did she mention its design?"

"No," Millifar said, face sullen, eyes still downcast from her shame. "But I asked. From the vagueness of her response, Kex and I both assumed that she did not know."

"He is being questioned by men," Aemelie muttered. "You are being questioned by Clan."

"The Deathbringer Meetra Surik's ship is gone." Jokasta cleared her throat, simpering from her station on the Aleema's sensors. "It left orbit and went to hyperspace almost immediately."

"Obviously frightened," Gwenarius observed. "Map the possible routes."

"We'll never know how that weapon was created now," Aemelie muttered, half under her breath. Gwenarius shot Second Wife a silencing look. "When your father gets back, Milli, you must tell him everything you told us. And more."

"You think there's more?" Aemelie, quite obviously, did not. "Surik left the Dar'Jett before Revan harnessed the Star Forge, so I assume her knowledge of Rakatan technology would be-"

"Aemelie!" Gwenarius put her hand warningly on the hilt of her sword, before turning back to her daughter.

"There is more… isn't there?" she asked the girl.

"Yes." Her firstborn's downcast eyes and dejected expression spoke armadas. "Kex isn't compatible as a mate. And… Revan commed for Father. Weeks ago. I… I neglected to log the call."

"Shabuir! Ne shab'rud'ni!" Inexcusable. Rage choked her throat. "Daughter, if your girl's pride has cost us an alliance with D'Reev assets, I will make you Dar before the next rotation of this planet!"

"Gwen-" Aemelie put a warning hand on her arm. Easy enough for her, her son wasn't old enough to betray Clan in a time of need. Aemelie looked at Millifar. "What did Revan say?"

"That she wanted to talk to Father." Millifar shrugged. "Nothing more."

"Out of my sight!" Her fury wasn't helped by the expression on Aemelie's face. Second Wife had never liked Revan either, but she should have the sense to realize they needed the advantage of the alliance. Gwenarius had discounted the rumors that Revan was dead as more barbarian propaganda… but now… what if the woman had died from their lack of aid?
At the very least, Canderous would not be pleased. Even if the marriage had been unconsummated, he cared for the woman. And practically speaking, she was of more use to Ordo alive than dead, and there was also the matter of her claim to Lin—not to mention her son……

"I will send for your father," Gwen told the daughter. "He will decide your punishment when he returns to our system."

"His ship's arrival should take less than a day," Jokasta added, unnecessarily.

Milli swallowed hard, her features pale. But she did not offer further protest. At least, Gwenarius thought blackly, she could find a small pride in her daughter's courage.

Xxx

When they had been married for a month, the father of Lena's child told her the story of how his people had taken their Prince of the Infinite and tricked him into the mind trap.

Looking back later, Lena realized that was when their honeymoon had ended.

"That's where the old Nico is now?" Lena had asked, kneading his t'chin just the way he liked. "You got out and he got trapped? In a box?"

"A mind trap," the father of her child murmured. "Diabolical device."

"Did it kill him?" Nico Senvi had been dumb as dishplates, but it had made Lena sad to think of him dead.

"Of course not!" Her husband chuckled. "The former occupant of my body is not dead: merely trapped within an interdimensional fold of reality. He must be there still? As dim a challenger as he was, who could lose against him?"

XXX

"Lena?" Now, Nico blinked muzzily. "Are you coming to bed?"

"It's already dawning." She gave him an embarrassed smile. "I kept needing to pee in the middle of the night. Made it hard to sleep."

"I don't believe drinking more fluid will help." He eyed the tray she held, the two steaming mugs on its surface. "Is that-?"

"Sleep tea for me, caff for you." She made her lashes flutter. "I know you like to get up early."

"You are truly a mother of gods," the father of her child said. His lekku gestured to her to come closer. "Come here with your offering!"

"Mmmmm…." She balanced the tray carefully, using her belly as a shelf, and easing herself down. "Here-can you take the tray?"

"Of course." He nodded enthusiastically. "Anything for you, my queen."

"Yes," said Lena Wee. "Anything."

XXX

The interior of the Tatooine cantina was dimly lit, but there was no mistaking the Twi'lek in the corner. Zoriis Bafka's holo was plastered all over Anchorhead. She'd won the Swoop Racing Championships for the second year in a row.

"The hell?" The woman was still dressed in her racing silks, leather straps twisted around her lekku, cheeks flushed a darker green from the exertions of her win. Her brow ridges drew together. "Motta set up this meet like it was life or death, and all I see is a knocked-up pink in front of me? Aren't you that joygirl of Motta's? Used to hang the track with Jin?"

There was no point in being insulted. They'd run in different orbits. "How is dear Motta?" Lena asked. "Does he still have that problem with his swim bladder? Can't be easy, stabilizing two tons of weight, with half your organs rearranged."

"Little dancer?" Zoriis Bafka's brow ridges were now raised higher than a Zeltron's tip for extras. "It is you!"

"I'm looking for information," Lena told her. "I'll pay well. I'll pay you. This doesn't have to be unpleasant."

The green laughed incredulously. "Are you threatening me?" She gestured towards Lena's belly. "What did you think you'd do? Smother me with your womb?"

"Of course not. Seems you weren't always a swoop jockey, Lieutenant Baffaraka-Feris. Or Padawan Feris? Or, is it Seven of Ten? Zennai'cha'hi Division?"

The Twi'lek froze. "Who sent you?"

"No one." Lena Wee shrugged. "I'm a free agent now, Zoriis. Same as you."

Lena would pity the Rodian later. She smiled and shrugged. "Motta's records said you ran goods for Revan Starfire. I have lists of jobs a kilometer long. What I want to know is, what she had you running here."

"Where did—who are you really working for?" Bafka's t'chun wrapped around her neck, as if the air was freezing. "I told Arca's people before, I'm out of the game now. I don't want anything to do with that old woman and her crazy fracking Sith—"

"I work for myself," Lena repeated. "I have a smart computer. Your orders routed through Motta's system. That's how I found you." She smiled her sweetest and pushed a credchip across the table.

"We are never told who gives the order." The green's eyes narrowed, then widened as she noted the amount flashing on the chip's screen. "Maybe it was Revan who sent me here. Maybe not. I was supposed to retrieve a package, but it never came." She knocked back her drink. "Funds ran out, so I started racing for credits."

"A package?" Lena asked. She tried to sound casual like it was no big deal.

"A box." Bafta nodded. "A stone box. Some kind of artifact. An... organization was supposed to bring it here from an undisclosed location."

Lena nodded. "And...?"
"They didn't. I won the championships. The Star Forge went boom." Bafta smiled. "You know, I didn't even recognize Lord Revan when she came back? I only met her once… her hair was different, and she wore those goggles. Humans all look alike, don't you think?"

"Some of them," Lena admitted. "So you… you never even saw this mystery box?"

"No." One lekku twitched. "What's your angle, Lena Wee?"

"I'm just trying to figure things out." She drummed her fingers on the table, trying to seem careless.
"What did they tell you this box looked like? What did it do?"

"Said it'd be a white obelisk, not to touch it, and what it did was beyond my pay grade.\" The woman shrugged, eyes narrowing. "Not that they paid beyond expenses. I used to be a 'cause' kind of girl, back then, when I was a Sith shadow. Why do you care?"

"Just curious." Lena smiled with both dimples, thinking. Sounded on the level, actually. Which was more than she'd expected. "Remember Nico Senvi?"

"Crazy swoop jockey who put Motta in traction?" Bafta snorted, and sipped her drink. "Sure."

"Well… Nico asked me to pick some things up for him. Know where his stuff is now? I can ask Motta, but…."

"I have no idea." The swoop jockey rolled her eyes. "Why don't you check his old room? Don't think Motta ever cleared it out. That Hutt's pretty jumpy now." She laughed. "I mean, for a Hutt."

"Jumpy Hutt." Lena laughed with her. "That's funny."

Xxx

"Delicious caff." Her husband smiled at her over the rim of his cup. "You seemed distant before."

"Did you… finish? Making Mission into… a body again?"

"Both of them!" He clapped his hands. "Truly marvelous creations!"

"They looked like they were sleeping when your droids stopped the surgery." Two faces, almost identical except for their coloration. Eye movement under the lids, twitches of their lips. White had even mumbled something in her sleep.

Lena had watched them for a long time before coming to bed.

"Like suns before the dawning." The father of Lena's child embraced her, and her resolution nearly wavered. His enthusiasm was almost childlike, like he didn't-or couldn't-understand what he did was wrong. "In a way, they will be daughters in the new golden age to come."

Daughters. Yes. I have a responsibility to them too.

"Yes, Nico." The blaster was a duracrete weight in her pocket.

"Thank you for the caff." He beamed and took another sip. "I missed you making me caff. I can never remember. Is it one scoop or two?"

"Two," she said. "Two in the machine, with one cup of water."

Six packets of sleepspice.
"So clever!" he chuckled. "We'll have to keep caff in our new order."

XXX

Sometimes things were right under your t'chun.

_Lena had thought that the new Nico would have hidden the prison he'd been trapped in for thirty thousand years once he got free. Hidden or destroyed it. She would have thought that Motta or one of his bullyboys would've moved someone else into Nico's old coneff when they left._

But nobody had. The door wasn't even locked.

_Nico Senvi’s old room was full of neatly-stacked speeder parts, plimsi tabloids, and ancient boxes that had once held pizzar. Everything—even the trash—was stacked, arranged by size, and placed in what had to be a deliberate order._

_Next to the window, like everything else in the room, covered with a fine coat of sand, sat a small stone obelisk, surrounded by packing materials._

_Lena took a deep breath, and touched her stomach for luck._

XXX

They were following a raised path through the swamp, a winding trail made of flagstones that looked as ancient and rotten as everything else on this muddy rock.

The Tee-Three had burned a hole in the wall, extracted cables that sparked and smoked until it zapped them with an appendage to cut the power. With Zaalbar's help, the droid had used the cables to create a rough rappelling line down the side of the ancient castle. While it—or she—hovered behind on some kind of jetpack, Polla, Dustil Onasi, and Zaalbar the Wookiee had used the line to slide down into this muck-filled, disgusting swamp.

They had followed the insane droid as she led them away from the building, deeper into the wilderness, all the while chirping at them like she really was some teenaged Twi'lek.

"Shake a lekku," she barked. "We need to quit this blasted poo doo stand before they send more Sith assholes after us!"

The air smelled horrible, like rotting eggs. It was too warm and too humid. Biting insects seemed to swarm around every centimeter of Polla's exposed skin. She wished she hadn't left the damn mask back at the palace.

Behind, there was the sound of explosions. Shouts. Presumably the guards were looking for them all. She hoped Carth was okay. And Takan and Zepth.

Carth's son (if that's who he was and not the ghost of Darth Malak), seemed to be completely recovered from the carbonite freezing, and was going along like this was totally normal. Or-almost. Every once in a while, he glanced back at her and frowned.

The twentieth time he did it, Polla glared back at him, with her best Revan imitation, stopped walking, and crossed her arms. "What?"

"Nothing," he said, after another long pause. "I was merely wondering what the Council was thinking, selecting a null's memories for Revan's mindwipe."
"Frack you too," she snapped. "I was wondering why a Jedi Knight hero became a war criminal and possessed an innocent kid."

"Dustil is no innocent." He cocked his head, staring at her. "But you are, Polla Organa. I regret your inclusion in these events."

"He's a kid," she told him. "You were supposed to be a man, the best the galaxy had. Isn't that the story?"

"One of them." He turned away from her, holding up his hand to call a halt. "This way," he announced, out of nowhere, turning towards a path that was little more than a muddy track along a creek bed.

"Why?" She stopped walking, even though Zaalbar and the Tee kept going, only pausing a few meters down the hill when they realized she wasn't following. "That looks like it goes nowhere."

"We need to get off the main roads. I… believe we are only a few kilometers from Kaas City. If we can reach it by tomorrow, we may find it easier to lose ourselves in the press of sentients, than in this hunting preserve."

"Hunting preserve?" The Tee whirred.

"Nexu spoor." Instead of answering, Dustil Onasi bent over something on the ground that looked like animal shit.

"Poo doo," the droid chirped, next to him. "It's old. I think we're good. Grab one of the sabers from Polla Polla, if you're like, freaked."

Ghost Malak snorted. "I am perfectly calm."

"You want one?" Polla had offered before, only to have him mutter something under his breath in a language she didn't know. Unlike his father, Dustil Onasi or Malak's Ghost was a fracking snob.

He looked her up and down, his expression strangely blank and cold. "The Ilian blade."

"Huh?"

The kid's hand extended and with a snap, the one with the plainest and heaviest hilt flew into his grip. Snap hiss and it ignited with a pale, blue light. "It needs to be recalibrated," he muttered, deactivating it somehow.

"I'm sorry," Polla offered. "I would have gotten the Sith minions to do that for you… except I didn't know you were actually gonna get kidnapped and frozen in carbonite."

He frowned, almost as if she wasn't there. "It's nothing."

"Right." She took another step forward, trying to pass him, when his hand caught her arm.

"Wait," he murmured. "Let me flush it out first."

"Flush what-what?"

But Carth's kid or Darth Malak or whoever he was, was already advancing on the bushes in front of them, one hand outstretched, almost beckoning—

With a brutal roar, a spined beast shot out of bushes—all claws and teeth, practically landing on the place where Dustil had been standing.

The kid had moved, faster than it, faster than anything Polla had ever seen. His blade was lit now again.

Zaalbar the Wookiee whined something. The kid didn't even turn his head. "No," he muttered. "Blasters only piss them off. He says."

"Who says?" Polla had her own pistol out, just in case, but before she could shoot, he… jumped over the thing and cut its head off.

_Jedi._ Sure, she'd seen the vids, and her arm still hurt from where Tenny-bro had scorched her with Force-induced lightning, but this was something else. Did all Jedi do that? Could the Zabrak kids she'd been insulting halfway across the galaxy on a daily basis when Tenebrae possessed them do it too?

_You'd think if they can all fight like that, they'd have taken down these fracking Sith already._

"Drag the body off the trail," the Jedi ordered Zaalbar. "We'll go to ground here for the night. They'll be searching, but Jin believes he can keep our strength concealed, and in the morning, we will lose ourselves in Kaas."

"Jin? Jin who?"

"Mekel," he turned and looked at her, and damned if that cold expression didn't slip for a second, making him look the years younger and more scared—at least. "Me… I'm here too. This is all fracked,' he added.

"Mekel?" The droid rolled closer, as Zaalbar started dragging the nexu body into the bushes. "It's you again?"

"Kind of, Blue." He smiled at her. "Telos and I-sometimes it's a little confused."

"Not that confused," he added a millisecond later, as if he was talking to himself.

Then his eyes unfocused, as if he wasn't even there at all.

"The bomb thing…” the Tee's voice trailed off. "Are you still mad about it? It was already in the collar-I modded for broadcast, but I wouldn't have just blown your head off. Error: not without a good reason."

Dustil or Mekel or Malak's Ghost snorted. "I've got bigger problems now. That Sith Emperor is standing over my body on Coru like he's guarding it, and he fracking shot me and I almost died-"

The Tee gave an alarmed beep. "Sith Emperor? On Coruscant?"

"Master Klee." He made a face that made him actually look like a kid. "The asshole's in his body."

"Klee was an asshole anyway," he added a millisecond later.

"That's where Klee went?" Why the frack hadn't Polla just gone with him? Oh, yeah. Right. Because the crazy droid offered to pay her, or have her killed. "But your body's okay, right? Now?"

"Yeah. I think." The kid grimaced. "It hurts."

"Force bonds are very unusual," the Tee noted. "Kinda weird that you and Dustil have one, plus the whole Malak thing."

"It's a long story-" the kid started to launch into it. Sith rituals. Bonds. Polla would have thought he was nuts, except so was everything else.

Zaalbar growled. Carth had been trying to teach Polla Shyriiwook, but all she caught were the words for roots and food.

Xxx

Early on Kashyyyk, as the child within grew, Lena's handsome husband had spun endless tales of an infinite empire. Sometimes Lena had wondered if his entire story was nothing more than a giant con.

_Sometimes she'd wished that were true._

"How does it work again? This mind prison?"

"A dozen times already I explained this!" He chuckled, cupping her belly underneath the blankets. "We can't build more of them, wife. Not with the technologies of these primitives."

"I know. I'm still saying we should patent the idea."

"Don't we have enough currency already, thanks to the kolto?"

They did—or would soon. But if you could make a prison the size of a sink and stick anyone you wanted in it…. for a time, Lena Wee had seen possibilities.

XXX

Now she saw the practical.

"This is very good," Nico repeated. He patted the bed. "Curl closer beside me. Is our son kicking today?"

"Every hour on the hour." She took a sip of her own tea, and then put the cup down.

XXX

"Humor me. I need a bedtime story."

"The intricacies of interdimensional travel have far too much math. But if you place both-it does require at least two-of your primary appendages on the surface… then, zap!"

"Zap?" Lena shivered. He'd said before that Nico was still alive. He'd said that the real Nico Senvi was in the box. He'd said they'd played a game of riddles and the old Nico had lost.

"Zap. They couldn't kill me, you know. Disobedient slaves! They lacked the power, and I was legion. So they trapped me and hid my prison well. For thirty thousand years, I was solitary. I, who used to contain multitudes." He buried his face in the space between her lekku. "Is something wrong, Lena? You're shaking."

"No." She willed herself to stop. "If someone won the riddles, what do they get?"

"Their body back." He snorted. "It's not like there's a prize."
She should have just cut and run then and there.

She'd thought about it. She'd known… when she admitted the truth to herself, she'd known for a long, long time. Her prince was no prince at all.

Her prince was a murdering slaver.

Xxx

"One, two," muttered Lena Wee on Tatooine. Her hands hovered over the obelisk's surface.

"Then, zap!"

The stone was impossibly warm in the cold room. And then the light seemed to bleed out of the world: light and color, leaving only in their absence, a universe of nothing at all.

Xxx

Revan had forgotten what it felt like: having raw ground under her feet again, smelling clean ozone and jungle, and feeling warm, atmospheric rain on her face. During the wars she'd almost always stayed in stars, shuttled from ship to ship: first for the Republic, and then to avoid Tenebrae and his blasted accord.

I only needed to put him off long enough until the virus took hold or we found the Rakatan mind trap to contain him-

But those plans had failed. One final option remained now.

Their ship had landed in the forest on Kaas. Her feet slipped in the mud. She looked behind her for Seiran, but he was missing. Warm rain washed her face like tears.

Between trees, through the jungle, she could hear the sound of the waves, taste the salt in the air-

Xxx

The red-skinned man on the roof of the ancient temple had a knotted beard made of flesh. He was a minor Voice. Nearly null. They hadn't known what that meant-only sensed his weakness. Deceptive, that weakness. "I have been waiting for you."

"I know." Revan's face was too warm under the mask. Sweat stung her eyes, the corners of her cracked lips. The sun glinted off the waves and the shore. A part of her wanted to laugh—that at the end of all this death, all of this pain, all of this sacrifice and destruction was this idyll—a beautiful planet and it's ruined people.

A group of these people watched, meters away, from the top of a ridge. She could see their triangular heads over the rise, tips of their spears. Taste their fear, like a bouquet of flowers on the wind. She and Mal had cut quite a swathe through their ranks before they gave her the key to this temple: the puzzle contained in the legend of their long-lost rebel prince.

"How do you know?" Malak glanced back towards the shore. Beya was watching the shuttle. The remnants of their Fleet orbited above: crippled ships, containing mad Jedi. Even from here, Revan could feel them, pressing down like gravity.

"The computer," she reminded him of that instead of revealing the truth. "From Kashyyyk."

"You said we would find answers." Malak frowned. The sore on his jaw was worse.
"A way to stop men like your father," she agreed. "A way to stop all conflict. Forever peace."

A way to make what we've done worth it. A way to atone-

Malak's eyes narrowed, his mind close enough to read. A shame Meetra didn't return with the Senate's surrender, as you expected.

It was only one possibility, Mal.

Surik was a broken tool after Malachor, but her gift allowed Revan to share a final message with the Jedi Order: the sound of Malachor, screaming across all the bonds the girl had made. A torpedo, full of Malachor's dark power, driven straight into the heart of the Jedi Order.

Did you really think the Fleet would roll over and attend another armistice? With us? Malak's voice interrupted her thoughts.

Did you? His mind had been as quick as hers he woke with glowing, red eyes. Taunting. Promising her. Bringing them both to this moment. They will back down, if your father commands. And we control him.

I hope you're right, Red. His hand squeezed hers. We can use my father's resources to control this new Empire as well. They'll have population centers. Media. Supply chains. Trade-

Revan frowned. He was right. Sometimes he was still right about things-

Tenebrae's emissary coughed. "My master also wishes a forever peace." His master. The computer had told her about his master. The fabled Sith Emperor that only she could control.

"That's why we are here," she said. "This master of yours is late."

"My master is coming," intoned the emissary. Then his eyes rolled back in his head. And began to glow.

Revan stifled the scream rising in her throat. All the horrors she'd seen, and this still surprised her.

The Sith Emperor isn't just in Malak. He's in this null too. And if he's in two bodies… is he in more? How many more?

"Oh, ho," said Malak's voice beside her. But not his. Not entirely his. The other one chuckled, and then both of them were laughing at her, doubled, every sound exact. Two voices, both Tenebrae's.
"My little Sith'ae'rah. I've waited so long for this moment, you have no idea!"

Xxx

"You had some idea," a voice said accusingly. The bushes rustled. "You knew what he was. You knew what he wanted."

Revan shivered, glancing back at their ship. "Seiran? I… realize I was… untoward before, but you must see the necessity."

Silence. She frowned, eyes scanning the leaves for movement. Was he hiding from her? "I would never have harmed the child. I will never harm you, but I knew of no other way to gain your compliance in the time we had. You had every reason to be loyal to the Fragment, and no reason to follow me. I didn't have time to explain-

"You don't have to explain it now. Mud." The man came up the path from behind the ship, the Republic mask covering his features entirely, marking him as he was. Anonymous. Disposable. "I hate bloody fracking mud."

A soft rain began to fall again, pattering the jungle around them with warm, faintly acidic droplets.

"There you are. Seiran?" She tried out a small smile. "I hope all is forgiven?"

"Ask Jox," the Deralian said. He jerked his head to the left. "He's the one who got the blame for triggering the mines. If he'd have used the scanners right in the first place-"

"Do you forgive me?" Lieutenant Jox muttered at her left. He'd crept up so quietly, Revan hadn't realized, hadn't realized the moment when the rest of the troops arrived, all of them, moving in slowly, to take the next few meters of this jungle moon-

"Of course," she said. "Of course, I forgive you, Jox, for making that egregious tactical mistake that almost cost us victory-"

Without waiting for Revan's command, the lieutenant moved forward. A few heartbeats later, a sharp click was their only warning, before the path exploded, and the world cut out in a blaze of fire.

Above, in orbit, she closed her eyes. Pando's unit was encountering similar resistance, as if the Mando'ade had mined every path on Dxun.

Need to press on, send another line forward to trigger the trap. Keep the Jedi in reserve, we can't afford to lose them-

Revan's thoughts were logical, but what came out of her mouth was a scream, as she looked down and saw her gray robes spattered with blood-

"Get down, Sheris!" A Force wave enforced the command, and Sheris rolled over to see Padawan Meetra Surik standing over her, with Knight Vikor Tio close on her heels. Both of them knelt down beside her as cannon-fire sent the trees above them into blaze.

Seiran was nowhere in sight.

Fragment will never forgive me if I lose the smuggler's husband- the thought was disruptive, something out of time.

"I can try and trigger the mines remotely," Vikor whispered, but his voice buzzed in every comset in their squad. "Hold. Everyone hold."

"You're the boss, Vik!" Frost was good-natured, but not one for rank. None of them were, really. This was their second battle together, and already they were a team.

Her heart was in her throat. She was so frightened. Revan never remembered being this frightened-

Meetra flashed Sheris a quick smile. She looked nervous too. It helped somehow, knowing that. Knowing they were all in this. Like a connection.

They were all in this together.

"Troops forward." Flat voice. Ringing through their comms like a bell. "Jedi hold position. Advance troops."
"No!" Padawan Surik, speaking out of turn, glaring angrily at the sky. "Please! Send in droids to trigger the mines! Or let me! I've been disarming mines since I was seven-those are plasma jagers. Easy. If you give us more time-

"Press forward," the command came again. From above. From apart. Words cold, encased in ice.

"That's fracking suicide!" Kalora Antilles, next to Frost. Technically she was still a cadet, but she was the best sniper they had. "Who the hell does Revan Starfire think she is?"

"You… bitch," Vikor muttered. "No. I won't. Ignore her. We can shield you guys. Go slow, we'll be right behind."

"Over a minefield?" Corporal Shu was the highest-ranking null they had. He stood up, shaking his head. "No! I'm not sending my men into suicide-"

"Vikor." The way General Starfire said the knight's name seemed to resonate in the air, even over the commlink. "You know what to do."

"No." The Knight shook his head. "That's… I thought you were joking, at the briefing, we can't really-we're Jedi! What you're asking is… no!"

"Your Jedi says no," Shu muttered. He made a rude gesture towards the sky, where the Harbinger waited, safe and snug in orbit with the rest of Fleet.

"Vikor," the voice repeated. "We're out of time."

"No." His lekku were wrapped around his neck. The Force sang with his pain. Sheris patted him on the arm, because she didn't know what else to do. She wasn't even sure what the General was asking them to do.

"Meetra," the voice said. Revan said. I said. "I trust you, Meetra. It is necessary."

"Please." Padawan Surik wiped her eyes. "Don't. There has to be another way."

"There's not."

"Oh." The girl wiped her eyes. She wasn't much older than Sheris, really.

"You can't," hissed Vikor. "Are you insane? You can't compel them-

Meetra Surik's eyes were a pale amber, almost gold. Right now they were full of tears. "You're right," she said. "I can't, Vikor. I don't have your strength. Or your training. You'll have to do it. Don't you see?"

"See what?" Antilles snapped. She turned her rifle in hand, and for a moment Sheris thought she was going to shoot them.

"No." He shook his head. "Please. Meetra, don't."

She smiled sadly at him. The red star on her cheek was streaked with mud. "It's necessary, Vic. Please. You heard it. Please do it. Do it for me." Her voice was gentle, but it-but it-
Sheris caught her breath. Caught herself. Nodding.

"Forward," Vikor Tio's voice went to the main channel of the comm, cutting through the tension around them abruptly, like synsilk. "You have nothing to fear. There are no mines here. There is no… pain. We Jedi will keep you safe-"

Sheris started to stand, only to have his iron grip pull her back down again.

"Close your eyes this time, Little Red," he whispered. "Look away."

"This time?"

"You almost got yourself killed before."

Explosions, lives cut short. Sheris barely felt them die, staring into his cold, yellow eyes. Like a wall of ice enfolding them.

The rain fell, washing the mud red.

"It doesn't hurt," Vikor told her. "In case you were wondering. At least for me, we were in pieces before made impact. Our fuel tanks ignited with the heat of the sun. I think." His mouth quirked. "Wasn't paying much attention at the time."

The conclusion seemed inevitable. "Did my ship explode too?" Did I fail already? Again?

"Sleeping," he corrected her. "You're sleeping. This is a dream. You remember Beya, I assume? She and I died together in the Cron Cluster."

Meetra Surik turned-but she wasn't Meetra now. Instead, Beya Organa's heart-shaped face broke into a cool smile. "Hello again, Revan." She arched an eyebrow. "Don't you think you're trying a little too hard to be Revan?"

"That's who he's expecting. Who is needed."

"We understand why you left the amnesiac back on Deralia." Vikor sighed and sat down in the rapidly-reddening mud. "Just rather less clear on how you plan to stop the deathless."

If Vikor were her subconscious, he should know. If he were real… "I never used you for your grasp of strategy."

"That was more my game," Beya smiled, a little grimly. "Don't you think he'll notice your weakness?"

"I know how to distract him. And it's a Sith planet. Sith Lords are constantly trying to amass more power. My allies… artifacts… I'll find something. And Malak… is there. Or will be. He-he will help."

"Something," Vikor muttered. "Revan Starfire will find something. Another cure worse than the disease?"

"I held you in confidence, both of you. Perhaps longer than I should." Did one of you betray me to Malak? One of you on the Leviathan, one the Aleema. It could have been either or both of you working in concert-

"Rev!" Beya's voice was as sharp as a blow to the face. "Stop. Enough already. It's just us here.
In your dream. Drop the act."

The... act? "Beya." For a moment, weak Sheris overrode her, and wretched sentiment welled up again, like the girl's fear on that demon moon. "I'm sorry."

"I know." Beya leaned over and kissed her. Her lips were soft. "You should be," she whispered in Revan's ear. "But it will take more than that-"

Xxx

"This caff tastes sweet," Lena's husband smiled at her. "Like you, my heart." The father of Lena's child took another sip, his lids already half-closed.

"You're sweet," Lena Wee lied, waiting for him to pass out so she could bring in the maglift holding the (surprisingly heavy) obelisk, and press his hands against it.

XXX

One. Two. Zap.

"Lena?" Nico stood in front of her, wearing a pair of stained coveralls. There was nothing else in the room. If it was a room, it was a white space, with no walls or borders she could see. "How did you get here in my heaven?" He frowned. "Why are you fat now?"

"I'm pregnant," she said. Her hands went to her stomach protectively. "What do you mean, 'heaven'?"

"Look around!" He waved his arm, but Lena saw nothing. "See all my trophies? It took me awhile to get it." He laughed. "First, I thought I was just winning everything cause I am that awesome; but no one wins everything, and the other sents are fuzzy. Around the edges. You're not. Fuzzy." His t'chin twisted with sinuous ease, with a grace she'd forgotten the real Nico had. "And when you're here, you're never fat." He paused. "Are you like Griff?"

"What?" She had forgotten how aggravating real Nico was. "You think I'm like Griff Vao?"

"He was here. Not fuzzy like you. Said he came into my coneff, and touched the box and ended up here." Nico looked genuinely puzzled. "We didn't know how to get him out, but I remembered the other guy, that funny little alien-"

"Saying alien is rude," she chided automatically.

"But he was! I've never seen a sent like him!"

"It's still rude." She folded her arms. "But I... I know. He is... different."

"So we did the same thing, Griff and me-three riddles. His were real hard." His smile was so sweet it disarmed her. "Then he vanished. Poof!" His hand and t'chin waved the air.

"Oh." She sighed, a little relieved. "Nico, I bet three riddles is how you can get out of here."

"You want me to ask you riddles?" His brow knitted. "That's what the guy said too, but I guess I only know dumb ones."

"I know some good ones," she said. "Maybe I can even tell you one." She blinked at him and smiled, even if on the inside she was quaking. Heaven, he'd called it here. Maybe if Lena were trapped here, she'd start to hallucinate too. "Or two. Maybe I can tell you two."
"The alien said it took three to get out. Griff got three right. Right away!"

"What's twenty plus three?" She interrupted him.

"Huh?"

"That's my first riddle."

"Oh! You want to play now? But you just got here."

"I... I don't have a lot of time." Her child, she thought, suddenly panicked, about her body. What would happen while she was in here?

"Okay. If you say so?" He was puzzled. "It's weird, but I... I have to play with you now. It wants me to."

"What's twenty plus three?" She repeated.

"Twenty-three."

"Good!" She nodded, enthusiastically. "What's five times nine?"

"Forty-five." His brow ridge furrowed. "I think if I answer another one right, I get out."

"Someone else is going to come here. They might look like you." Don't make anything a question. Remember that. Above all else! "All you need to do to get out is say those two riddles and then another. But math. All your riddles have to be math. You can do it. I promise."

"Any math problem...?" He looked troubled. "And then what happens next?"

Does that count as a riddle? You don't even know how this works, Lena! If it counts as a riddle, is it his first? When he asked the other questions, did I answer them? What have I done?

"Lena?"

Lena Wee took a deep breath and answered Nico Senvi with another question, one she didn't even know the answer to herself—at least, not entirely. Poor Nico wouldn't have a chance.

"What is the name of my baby's father?"

Xxx

Seiran was getting used to the Bitch's nightmares, but this one was different. This one... for a second he thought he was actually there. Standing in a jungle, while the Bitch called his name.

But then-he jerked awake again and looked across at her. Eyes still closed but moving rapidly back and forth. Muttering something in that language.

The comm on her wrist was flashing.

Help, Seiran imagined whispering to whoever was on the other line. But would anyone calling the Dark Lord of the Sith be someone who would help?

You should have done something at Peragus. Something more than writing "Revan Starfire was here" and the date on the side of the wall.
He should have done something more, but aside from Polla's parents, Seiran didn't know who to call. Polla was the one with Aemelie Ordo's comm, and what would Aemelie Ordo do, anyway? Launch a Mandalorian invasion for one sweet smuggler? Aemelie might like Polla... sometimes he'd wondered about how much the woman liked Polla; but that was insane.

Every option was insane.

No. Now, here they were, deep in Sith space, on their way to a lost planet. Maybe the other Revan would come and rescue them all if this one failed.

That woman could fly. She could probably do anything, but he'd gotten stuck with this one.

He could steal the comm. He could crash the ship into a sun. He could scream... but Seiran Wen did none of those things. Instead, he got up from the nav and walked over to the Bitch. Shook her shoulder gently.

"Someone's calling. Wake up," he said. "Wake up, Revan."

Xxx

However Mission had sealed the door, it took more than a lightsaber to open, although several were trying now, stabbing through the surface like red searchlights, before fizzling and cutting out.

Makes sense, Carth thought. Cortosis-lined building materials. We could probably learn a lot from the sents on this planet, about how not to get skewered by Dark Jedi.

Sith, he corrected himself. Real Sith. The real thing now. What those Dark Jedi were only playing at.

When it finally became clear they weren't going to make it through until some grunt got a plasma torch, Carth touched the comm at his wrist. Even if Tenebrae interrupted, there was nothing they'd betray. Tenebrae needed to know that Revan was real too. And really coming here.

It might buy them more time.

His wife's comm rang several times, and when she finally picked up, he hardly recognized her. Her hair was shorter, freshly shaven on the sides: Deralian again, but loose now, tumbling into her eyes. She wiped those eyes almost angrily, a gesture he remembered like she was scrubbing out sleep.

"I thought we agreed not to use this frequency except for text-oh." She blinked at him, all blue through the commlink, lashes still incredibly long, eyes wide and deceptive as a tu'kata stalking.

"It's... it's me." His mouth was dry. "Beautiful, it's me."

"Oh," she repeated. "... Carth." One line appeared between her brows, as painfully familiar as that lying face.

"In the flesh. If you want, I could show you-" the joke died, in the face of that blank expression, his heart clenching painfully as the truth became evident.

What have you done?

Her frozen expression told him everything, all in one glance. "I don't suppose you remember, but we spoke once before. It was in the Jaxus Cluster. You did an excellent job on your Morgana, the day the Vengeance was lost. I... I told Rear Admiral Karath we needed more pilots like you, men and women willing to risk everything. Sacrifice everything for the cause... but also smart enough to survive the odds."

Even through the comm, that blankness. Like when she came back from that blasted temple. Like she had no idea who he was.

"I named that ship after my wife," he muttered. "My first... wife."

"Is this comm secure?" There was nothing at all in her expression, not even the lines he remembered around her mouth as if taking the memories back from that damned holocron had erased every vestige of the woman he once loved. And when had she done it? After he left?

You wouldn't have done it because of me, would you?

"I don't know."

"You know that you are compromised? My... friend informed me about the Emperor's possession of your mind."

"Do you know how to get him out?" You owe me, sister. You owe me. Even if you aren't her-

"If it were that simple, the galaxy would be an entirely different place." There was a trace of the woman he knew in that dark joke. A glimmer. "Is my... ally safe? My... my servant wishes to know. I believe he's quite fond." She glanced offscreen and muttered something, too fast for him to catch.

Terrifying, not to know how much of this was an act, and how much was the real her.

"Ally?" Did she mean Polla? "She's with... your other husband," he shot back. It probably wasn't smart. Zaalbar would have told him to stop barking at the moon, because it had no face.

Her lips twitched. "Good. I look forward to seeing all of you. Alive."

Was that a threat? Or a promise? "I look forward to seeing you too-"

His temper sparked and then like sparks, the world went white-

When Carth came to his senses, he had a stylus in his hand, the door was blasted open, and a group of brown-clad servants (or slaves, he thought the Sith had slaves) were packing up the bore of a large plasma torch. The Zabrak kids were still unconscious. Carth looked down at the datapad in front of him.

Having the servants put some hunting robes in your new quarters. Do you prefer to ride a speeder or beast? Let Liyo know!

Nothing about Revan. Nothing about the rest of their conversation. Had there been more? Had Tenebrae spoken to her too?

"Ahem," said a voice in front of Carth. A pink-skinned Zeltron, also in brown robes leaned against the wall. "I am Liyo," he said, smiling. "Do you need more time to read? Your writing is quite a scrawl... and I'm usually quite adept at Basic."

"No, I got it."

"Good." The Zeltros collected the datapad and extended his hand.
Carth ignored it and scrambled to his feet himself. "I'm good," he muttered.

"Your new quarters are in the prison wing, I'm afraid. Actions do have consequences, and even servants must be punished when their masters rebel."

"What about… what about them?" The Zabrak kids lay on the ground, like discarded plimsi. From what Carth had seen that was exactly how this damned emperor treated his subjects.

"You want them?" The Zeltron shrugged. "If keeping them alive motivates you, we can bring them along. Separate cells, I think. Force cages for them. You…” he sniffed. The air was too sweet, like the man was trying to frack with him, but after Carth's experience being mind-fracked on the Republic Pearl by D'Reev's minions, a little Zeltron juice was nothing.

"Cut the pheromones," he snapped. "Just keep those kids safe and I'll be motivated enough."

Other slaves had already moved in, stripping him of his blasters, the knife Canderous had given him, even the holdout in his boot. Their hands pawed and plucked. Carth willed his eyes never to leave the Zeltron's face.

One of the last plucked away the comm from his wrist.

The air cleared, and the Zeltron have Carth a slight bow. "I don't know how you nulls can stand being alive, but it takes all sorts, and what the Starfire wants… the Starfire gets." He lowered his voice. "I've always found her a little… overrated myself. Have you seen the version of her life story we show here? She's a man."

"Trust me," Carth glared. "She's not."

"And?" Liyo was tapping his foot now, looking at Carth expectantly. "Beast or speeder? We have yozuk and nexu, although I can't guarantee which you'd be assigned. Our Lord rides a gundark, of course, but I wouldn't recommend that. We need you in one piece!"

"Speeder," Carth gritted his teeth.

"Pity. With your coloring, I could see you like a Beast-rider of old, astride… something." He raised an eyebrow. "The first hunt will begin tomorrow at dawn… and no, your Zabrak boys cannot come. We have limited costume, and his Magnificent is already possessing a matched set of purebloods."

,"You were… you were serious. About the hunting? What are we… what are we hunting?"

"Your lost friends. Are they friends? The actress seemed… fiery, I saw the recording. And a Wookiee. Quite a challenge. And of course… the prize. We do rather need to collect Lord Malak before Revan's return."

Xxx

"I accept my fate," their daughter said. Millifar's hair hung loose, shining like the rays of a yellow sun down her back. Gwen had stripped the girl of her beskar, and Milli knelt before him, wearing only a pair of faded coveralls that Canderous was pretty sure had started out as his own once, before one of the wives had repurposed them. "I have doubly shamed our clan."

Canderous sighed. Behind Gwen, Aemelie, holding both babes, shrugged. Her lips mouthed a word, but aside from that hidden display of defiance, she was obviously not going to go against the First Wife's wishes.
"I accept your admission of shame, Daughter." That was the formal response. Now if Gwen was serious, Millifar would be sent in exile from Ordo until she found some object or information to prove the worth of her return. Except, maybe Canderous had been away from Clan too long, because they didn't even know for a fact that Revan was dead, and he thought this entire exercise was overkill.

Considering everything he'd seen her survive already, Canderous was pretty sure Revan wasn't dead. He'd considered the fact that maybe she and the pilot had just wanted an out. Hadn't he and Onasi discussed that very thing in the weeks after the Star Forge, while Revan screamed in her drugged sleep in the Hawk's infirmary?

"Let me try a comm," he suggested. "You said she commed? Did you record the code?"

"Of course." His daughter wiped her eyes, sniffling a little, like a much younger child. "And then I erased it-"

"Shame!" Gwenarius interrupted. "More shame!"

"But I memorized the signature," their firstborn added. Her sly smile reminded Canderous of her long-dead brother, although Carefix had known better than to goad the First Wife of Ordo.

"Try the comm," Canderous suggested. "Gwen…?"

"There is still the shame of the Jedi Exile," his wife snapped.

Aemelie shifted young Dxn on her hip, and put Oerina on the floor. She barely hid her smirk.

"One thing at a time." Canderous gestured, and his daughter rose neatly to her feet, crossing the Aleema's bridge to the communications console.

Her fingers slid across the keys, and the comm chimed. Once. Twice."

"Hello?" A man's face, stubbled and nervous. It looked like he was holding the portable commlink Revan had carried in his hands. His eyes kept darting offscreen. "W-who is calling, please?"

"Me," Canderous barked at him. "Where did you get this comm?"

"I-I have it," the man replied, as if he were simple.

"Seiran?" Aemelie interrupted suddenly, crossing the floor to stand in front of Canderous. "What are you doing? Did you kill Revan Starfire?" She sounded impressed.

"No," a female voice snapped in Mandalorian. Revan's face was unmistakable, appearing behind the guy's. There was pause longer than Canderous expected as she stared at him. "Canderous Ordo."

"Third Wife," he said formally because Gwen was still standing next to him glaring. "I see that you're alive. Good."

"Good?" Her laugh sounded high and unfamiliar. "What are you… is that-what in nine hells are you doing on my flagship?"

Xxx

Lena sat there in their bedroom for what seemed like hours, watching Nico Senvi's still-unconscious body breathe. Her son rippled softly in her belly like a Ryloth moon. A boy, her husband had said. What kind of world would he have now? Better or worse, than what might have been?

"Lee-na?" The voice startled her. She turned her head.

The seams along the white's lekku were pink where the droids had made their incisions. The girl teetered on the tips of her toes, and almost fell.

"Mission?" Lena couldn't move very easily now, but she got up as quickly as she could, dancer's training helping her to adjust to the new cant of her weight, and rushed to the white's side. "Are you… okay? Can I get you anything?"

"I… I am small." White lekku flapped limply. "And she… my pink… is she gonna wake up too?"

"I don't know."

"I tried. I shook her. But she didn't…" A white hand buffeted its own face. Violet eyes blinked with tears. "She's breathing, though. I-I think… she's… what's wrong with him?"

"Let me see-" Lena glanced back at Nico's limp body, a spark of fear rising in her chest.

What if… what would the prince do to them if he was the one to wake?

Xxx

"Why?" At the time the reason hadn't been truly important, but she enjoyed the sound of his voice lulling her to sleep, and the pleasant languor their lovemaking left in her limbs. "Why did your people put you in a box for thirty thousand years?"

"For the crime of rebellion." His chuckle rumbled in his chest, against her stomachs. "I told you."

"You rebelled to save your people?" Every good Twi'lek knew the tales-legends really-of those who stood against the tide and broke their chains.

"So many demands they had! Yes. I tried to save them." Her husband chuckled. "All those demands! Differences of opinion! It was chaos, Lena. Sheer chaos." He kissed her brow. "So I tried to save them-yes. From themselves."

"How?"

"Another time, I'll tell you." He kissed her. "Maybe even show you."

Xxx

Lena fingered the blaster in her pocket again. She'd been practicing on targets and sims for weeks. Ever since she'd retrieved the Twi'lek bodies. Ever since Tatooine.

Mission followed her glance. "Hey! What's wrong with T'chhhje-T'chiimm… ?" Her face made a strange contortion. One side of it twitched. "Why can't I talk?"

"You're fine. Nico's fine too. But… he… might be gone a while," Lena evaded. "Let's go see to your… sister."

"She's my twin," Mission corrected. "You're my sister, Lena." Those impossible violet eyes blinked. Her smile was sweet and warm. "Thank you for saving me."
Revan tightened the cloth over the lower half of her face and pushed her goggles up to her nose. The Deralian shipyard was dusty, hot, and smelled like burnt air. Familiar as home, safe as a lie.

“What’s that smell?” Korrie made a face. “The orbitals never smelled like this.”

“Farming,” Molla told him. She had a tight grasp on his hand as if she expected them both to run for it. Revan would be lying if the thought hadn’t occurred to her.

Corellian disc ships were popular now. There was a row of them, brightly colored as jewels, baking under the red Deralian sun.

“You said that Jasp called,” Revan murmured to Polla’s mother. “I should… dissuade him from attempting to reach Sith space.”

“Dis-suade?” Molla made the word stretch out, mocking, Revan realized, the way that she’d said it, or maybe even the word itself. “If what you say is true--if your Sith space is so hard to find--he’ll be home soon enough. I don’t need you giving him more ideas.”

Revan’s legs were still stiff and her back ached, remnants of the injuries she’d sustained in the fall from the skies. Doctor Sahara had recommended limited activity and lots of rest… but Doctor Sahara didn’t have a duplicate of herself running towards Sith space to do frack knows what.

“What happened to Dancer’s Leap?” she asked Moll. Polla had named her future ship when she was eleven. The full name was Dancer’s Leap Across the Infinities of Space and the Whole, Darn Galaxy; but that had been too long for the real thing’s registration codes.

“Leased,” Molla said. “When Pollie stopped flying--”

“Oh.” Of course. Her eyes followed the row of disc ships, looking for a squat and familiar triangular shape.

“May I help you ladies?” The Devaronian saleswoman had a datapad in one hand, and a laser pointer in the other. She smiled down at Korrie. “Ladies and young gentleman with baby? Looking for something in particular?”

“A Kuat Mark-VIII, with turbo and a decent rear turret,” Revan told her. Dancer had never had any weaponry… but Dancer never went into Sith space.

_Wherever the frack Sith space is. And how in nine hells am I supposed to figure that out?_

Kashyyyyk. Thought like an echo.

_But it’s not Mission. I don’t know what it is, but that computer is--_

“Hah, that’s funny. You all lookin for something to cruise Defalli lanes in? Or somethin’ more short range? Moon hops? Shopping at the outlets?”

“We’ll let you know,” Revan drawled. She’d shoved the goggles back down on her face, but she didn't like the way the woman was eyeing her.

“Kuat Mark VIII,” the woman chuckled. “Good one. We don't keep any moonchasers here. We fly straight-up, vessels with all the emissions reqs for Core space!”

“Marks passed the Senate regs,” Revan argued. The woman was testing her, fairly obviously, trying to assess her potential as a mark. “You probably don't have anything with firepower because you don't wanna pay the tariff on a Core-made export, right?”

“Hrm....” The woman’s smile widened. “Are you planning on financin this purchase?” Her accent wasn’t local. Which made sense, Revan realized, because there weren’t really a lot of Devaronians on Deralia.

“Cash,” Molla interrupted. “Cash and a clean registration.”

“Of course.” The saleswoman put one hand on her hip. “Our regs are all clean, but for the cash buyer, I might have something interesting. Military salvage. Not new, understand; but it's Kuati. Seats four. Not great for long hauls, but if you're only going to the outlets... it does have guns. Not much we sell has em--munitions are mostly aftermarket adds. But if you have credits, I can set you up with a real nice modding contact. He does most of his work off-license, that way he can work in some slugs and plasma stuff that isn't strictly boom, if you know what I mean....”

“Show me,” Revan interrupted. “The ship you have. Show us now.”

“Don't be rude, dear.” Molla elbowed her. “I think she was just getting to that. Is it safe, this ship of yours? I don't want my daughter in anything rattletrap.”

“It passed inspection.” The Devaronian shrugged.

_Daughter_. But of course, the woman meant Polla. Polla coming back in the ship, not Revan at all.

“Show us,” Revan amended. “Please.”

“Deralians,” the saleswoman beamed. “Takes you all so long to say please, doesn't it?”

“Not when there's something to be pleased about,” Molla snapped. She took Korrie’s hand, adjusting Abasen in his sling, and patted Revan on the back with her free hand. “Shake a stick and show my daughter this ship, why don't you?”

“You heard Grandmama,” Korrie barked. “Show us.”

“Grandmama?” Molla burst into peals of laughter. “Pardon my boy. He's watched too many vids.”

“Gran,” Revan murmured quietly.

“Gran,” Korrie repeated. “You heard my Gran. Lady.”

“That would be ‘Miss Lady’ to you, urchin.” The Devaronian pulled an access key out of her pocket, gesturing them towards one of the locked hangar doors. “Funny story behind this ship....”

XXX

“I thought we agreed not to use this frequency except for text--" Revan breathed in sharply, trying to hide her surprise. “Oh.”

Carth Onasi’s face was taut with strain, even in the blur of the hologram. His voice was low and rough, almost whispered, and he kept looking to the side, out of view. The wall behind him was nondescript. Stone. Unmistakably Sith. He could be anywhere in Tenebrae’s territories. Was he still with the smuggler? Was Malak there? Were they captives, or guests?

"It’s… it's me." His voice was softer than it had seemed in the recordings. "Beautiful, it's me."

"Oh," she repeated foolishly. "Carth." Did the Fragment have some pet name she used for him? ‘Darling?’ Or ‘Flyboy,’ as on all the vids?

"In the flesh. If you want, I could show--" His voice faltered, and Revan realized she was doing a poor job smiling, that it was possible something in her expression had exposed her already.

I need to tell him who I am in a way that will not lead to betrayal. If I wait until he sees me--

If he was calling from Kaas, the room was undoubtedly tapped. If not by Tenebrae himself, than by others from the Dark Council. Revan had to be brief, had to give the man a warning. If he was comming now on this link, had he commed before and spoken to the Fragment? That other call, the one in the system near Rekkiad. It could have been him she reached? If so, he would know who Revan was, but not where his wife was now. If not… he would know the ruse the moment he saw her on Kaas. Carth Onasi's wife had two hands. An older face. And they--Revan had tried to mimic the woman’s speech patterns, her carelessness of movement--at night, alone in her cabin where Seiran could not mock--but she doubted those efforts could fool the man the Fragment loved.

He may never be able to see his wife again, but I owe him mercy. A small one, at least.

She smiled at him kindly, trying to impart sincerity. "I don't suppose you remember, but we spoke once before. In the Jaxus Cluster. You did an excellent job on your Morgana, the day the Vengeance was lost. I… I told Rear Admiral Karath we needed more pilots like you: men and women willing to risk everything. Sacrifice everything for the cause… but also smart enough to survive the odds."

His face looked frozen, and for a moment, Revan thought she’d made a terrible mistake. One muscle in his jaw twitched.

"I named that ship after my wife," he whispered finally. "My first… wife."

"Is this comm secure?" She kept her voice low, trying to calm him. Without the Force, with half a galaxy between them. Impossible.

"I don't know."

It had never been safe to tell Malak, but Revan tried to give this man fair warning. "You know that you are compromised? My friend informed me about the Emperor's possession of your mind."

His lips pulled back from his teeth. "Do you know how to get him out?"

"If it were that simple, the galaxy would be an entirely different place." Carth Onasi didn’t look like he understood the joke. "Is my... ally safe? My... my pilot wishes to know. I believe he's quite fond."

She glanced at Seiran, who sat at the nav board, arms folded, glaring back at her with an insolence she found disturbing. “Stay there,” she muttered at the Deralian, away from the comm’s mic. “No names.”
Could she trust Polla’s husband? She wasn’t even sure if Captain Onasi understood who she was. Had the Fragment ever bothered to tell him? The man had been gone before Sheris took the holocron, before the Fragment left the Temple. Was it possible he thought his wife had taken the memories back herself? If so, the moment he saw her--

Her thoughts ran in useless circles.

"Ally? She's with your other husband," Carth Onasi snapped back at her, suddenly furious.

Good. So he does know me. And Polla Organa is with them--with Malak. That means Malak is there--

Revan smiled encouragingly. "Good. I look forward to seeing all of you. Alive."

The expression on his face bordered on subordination. Insolence. "I look forward to seeing you too--"

And then his features changed, mouth falling open, slack. That terrible blankness. Familiar, even across half a galaxy. There was a long pause, and she allowed herself a deep breath, quelling the useless fear that spiked in Sheris’s chest.

“Hello, Revan.” Even in the blur of the comm she could see the glowing eyes, hear the shift in pitch, see that familiar sneer on a stranger’s face. “Are we done with the games? Are you finally returning?”

“Yes.” She was all too aware of the pilot Seiran Wen, still standing to her right and watching, just out of the commlink’s range. Don’t move, she thought, not daring to gesture. “I’ll see you very soon.”

“Remember, I offered you another fifty years of freedom,” the man said. “Informally, of course--nothing that binding in writing! But you and I have nothing but time.”

“Unnecessary.” Phantom, foolish regret. “You will leave my Telosian husband unharmed. Both of my husbands unharmed. And their companions.”

“Yes… of course.” Something there--a slight hesitation? Doubt? Fear? Revan didn't have time to guess. “You will expect Malak and this vessel to greet you upon arrival? We’re at my summer palace, I’m sure you remember the way.” He paused. “Your duplicate is vulgar, but I did grow fond. I hope we can find a place for her on my staff.”

She made her words fall like stones. “I advise you to leave them all intact. I advise you to have them all at my disposal upon my arrival.”

“Oh ho,” he chuckled. “You think I would harm a hair on their heads?”

No, just sever their heads from their bodies and taunt me with them--a life for a life--

It doesn’t matter. Even if it’s Malak he kills--Malak is already dead.

Don’t think of him. She realized her fists were clenched so tightly that her fingernails dug into the palms. We can play this game again, Tenebrae, but this time, I have nothing left. You threaten me with what I fear to lose, but this time my son is safe--this time the Fragment will protect him with all of her strength--our strength.
“I’ll see you in two days.” Her fingers were steady when she cut the comm’s connection. She took several cleansing breaths before turning back to Seiran. The man was looking at her as if she’d grown a third head. “Well?”

“You let Carth Onasi think you’re his wife?” Her pilot sounded angry about that for some reason, and not at all concerned that an immortal, ancient emperor wanted to keep his own wife as a servant. Had he missed that part? The Emperor was quite possessive. “Why?”

Obviously, I did not. Obviously, he knew exactly who I was. But in their brief time together, Revan had already realized that the Deralian was not a subtle man. “We had no time to explain, and we need his compliance.”

“What happened to him--at the end? His eyes were… funny.”

Funny. In a different context, it might have been amusing he thought so.

“Carth Onasi was possessed by the Sith Emperor. As I explained to you, he utilizes a process to transform sentients into His servants, subject to Force possession at any time.”

“That’s… it just... happens?”

“The Force possession? No. The process takes time.” She frowned. “It will never happen to you or your family. I administered the vaccine against his Touch to you myself.” They had been through this. She glanced at the nav board, checking the coordinates to make sure he wasn’t attempting another betrayal.

“Thanks.” Seiran Wen looked at her warily. “I think.”

“I was only doing my duty.” At his blank look, she continued. “Preventing Tenebrae from possessing worlds in Republic and Sith space by vaccinating their inhabitants.” Or just infecting them. The original virus had a high mortality rate, but it did weed out weakness. Or, weaklings. Like Malachi. That thought was amusing. She smiled.

“With the virus you made. Yeah.” He yawned. “You explained before.”

Revan turned to the viewscreen, watching the monotonous swirl of hyperspace. In her own body, it always made her sick, but now Sheris felt nothing at all. “You should sleep,” she reminded the pilot. There would be no piloting to be done until they emerged at the next jump point.

“For some reason, I find it hard to sleep around you.” His laugh sounded hoarse. “Never know if I'm gonna wake up again.”

“I wouldn't hurt you.” Did he still think she would? “I would never hurt you, or your wife or child.”

“Oh, yeah? You did. Strangled me. Pressed me into a wall, threatened my kid….”

He was just a man, nearly null. He could never understand. “I achieved the ends necessary using the most expedient methods.”

Most expedient? Dark laughter, like an echo in her mind.

XXX

"Don't you think you're trying a little too hard to be Revan?" Beya’s face, heart-shaped, an eyebrow raised.
"That's who he's expecting. Who is needed."

"We understand why you left the amnesiac back on Deralia." Vikor sighed and sat down in the rapidly-reddening mud. "Just rather less clear on how you plan to stop the deathless."

If Vikor were her subconscious, he should know. If he were real. "I never used you for your grasp of strategy."

"That was more my game." Beya smiled, a little grimly. "Don't you think he'll notice your weakness?"

"I know how to distract him. And it's a Sith planet. Sith Lords are constantly trying to amass more power. My allies… artifacts… I'll find something. And Malak… is there. Or will be. He-he will help."

"Something," Vikor muttered. "Revan Starfire will find something. Another cure worse than the disease?"

XXX

My cure was the galaxy's only hope. But the distribution network was in tatters now, the Order in shambles, House D'Reev destroyed--

Destruction you caused. That voice. Was it Beya's? Her temples throbbed.

The Deralian pilot was stuck in the past, repeating the same argument he'd used, ever since Peragus. "You could have asked. You could have told the other Revan whatever's going on. You should have just asked both of us to help you!"

"There was no time. Not for Polla Organa. And it's safer that the Fragment never leaves Deralia. Never sees the Emperor or any of his servants again."

"You think handing yourself over to him instead will work?"

Revan looked at the pilot with surprise. Perhaps the man was more astute than she had assumed.

"Yes," she said. "I know him. This body is a genetic duplicate. Strength can be hidden--" a lesson she'd never had to learn when she was Revan; but one she had learned by watching her duplicate closely. "--Hidden or acquired. Tenebrae will believe his eyes, even if the Force says otherwise. He will believe in me because I know him."

"Then what am I supposed to do? I grab Polla and run?"

"Essentially, yes. I should be able to facilitate your departure."

His eyes narrowed. "Why the hells should I believe you?"

Reminding him again that he had no choice seemed cruel. Revan sighed. "Please. I have your interests at heart."

"Banthashit." He rubbed his eyes. "You just need me to fly this damn ship." There were shadows under his lids as if he hadn't slept in days.

Was she truly that terrifying? Revan smiled slightly, imagining what the man would have thought, had they met when she was Lord of the Sith.
“To continue with our discussion....” Master Klee with the glowing red eyes leaned across the table, eyeing Mekel. “Rather naughty of you, Malak, taking leave of my hospitality with your wife’s duplicate. Are you ensconced somewhere in a romantic tryst?”

“Get stuffed,” Mekel told him leaning back on the hospital bed.

Back on Kaas, Dustil’s body was asleep, near-collapsed with exhaustion, as far as they could tell, and all three of them felt jammed into Mekel’s skull here on Coruscant, trapped with a madman who wouldn’t stop talking.

“Vulgarity.” The Emperor sighed and glanced at his chron.

They’d been at this all night--a barrage of questions--interrupted only once by a nurse who came in to check Mekel’s vitals. The asshole in front of him had compelled her away before Mekel even had time to yell for help--not that Malak would have let them yell for help. No. Every fracking time Dustil and Mekel came up with a sensible plan like, ‘kill this asshole and get the frack out of here,’ the Dark Lord of the Sith fracking nixed it and shoved them into a corner of consciousness.

They were stronger together; but with the bond stretched across a galaxy, Malak had seemed stronger than both of them, at first. As if the sight of his old enemy rekindled old hatred, fueling his power.

But now… finally, Malak was tiring and Mekel was here. In charge, with Dustil backing him like warm breath on his neck.

“Frack you,” they both told the Sith Emperor.

“Your wife sends her regards, Malak.” The smug asshole smiled slowly. “I just had the pleasure of her call. She looks forward to seeing you again.”

Malak stirred, and it took a lot of effort to push him back down. Which wife?

“Frack you, sideways,” Mekel yawned at Klee. “Did you guys have a commlink frack?”

Imbeciles! I need to know what she said! A pause. I need to know if it was Revan, or--

The other Revan? Sad, one of them thought. Jealous?

No. Mekel tried not to feel defensive.

I meant Malak. Dumbass. Dustil pulled their mouth with a smile.

“She requested your presence.” Tenebrae chuckled. “I believe she wants both her husbands at her side when she enters the tomb.”

Both husbands? He means my father? The spike of Dustil’s fury would have been fracking helpful if they were allowed to kill this loser.

What fracking tomb? Mekel thought that was more to the point. We are not dying for this schutta!

What is your game, Red? Suddenly Malak was strong again, riding a wave of emotions too complicated and gross to parse, pushing past them and seizing control. Is it a trap for Tenebrae? Why did you send for me? Which one of you... which one of you ordered me?
Where is our son?

“Where is she?” Malak clipped out loud, grinding their teeth.

“In a ship. She says she’ll be on Kaas soon. Will you be there to greet her? Will you come out of hiding for her?”

Yes, Malak thought, but he bit back the word, even as they laughed. “What of my companions?”

“The Wookiee and the Revan Pretender?” Klee's shoulders shrugged. “I presume you don't mean the Astro mech... what of them? Are they cowering in the forest with you now?”

“Perhaps. Their safe passage? Guarantee it.”

Aww, look, ickle Malakins is all sentimental.

Maybe he's got a thing for Wookiees.

Well, that smuggler is hot. Mekel suddenly realized that on Kaas, she was curled up next to Dustil’s body now, huddled for warmth between him and Zaalbar. He opened Dustil’s eyes and blinked--

An eerie, bloodcurdling howl echoed faintly in the air. The trees sheltering overhead were black against a lightening sky.

“How?” Mission beeped softly, standing sentinel at their feet. “What the frack was that?”

“I-I don't--” their voice cracked like a kid’s and Polla Organa stirred, mumbling something in her sleep. She twisted her fingers in Zaalbar’s fur. The Wookiee sat up suddenly, reaching for his bowcaster and belt, upending her back onto the ground.

“Oww!” she yelped.

“Shhh,” Zaalbar motioned his claws across his lips and the smuggler silenced instantly, looking to Dustil as if they knew what the frack was going on.

“What?”

“I don't know.” It was Mekel answering. Dustil was testing the currents of the Force, and Malak was frozen, caught between the Emperor’s maniacal laughter and that... sound.

Something about the sound made Mekel’s blood run cold. Like being trapped in time again, with mad Uln’s laughter.

Xxx

The room was perfect, Lydie thought. All chairs perfectly aligned around a circular table, all with varying views of the Coruscanti skyline. Rank, Azen’s butler droid had informed her, was determined not by position, but by access to that view.

So put the Jedi by the windows but facing inward? Lydie Korr frowned. They were the least likely to be offended.

“Senator Loanin? There are some... guests to see you.” The sneer on their courtier’s Sullustan mouth betrayed all too well what the man thought of these ‘guests.’
“Send them in.” Azen looked older already. The smooth planes of his face were marred with lines of worry, and the Senator’s collar looked tight and artificial around his neck.

Two weeks since his father and brother’s unfortunate accidents had made Azen the First of House Loanin in the Coruscanti Senate, and as necessary as that role had been to assume, Lydie thought the responsibility set as heavily on her husband’s shoulders as the arrangements with the Genoharadan that had disposed of his father and brother in the first place.

Were you less guilty of murder when you only arranged for it to happen? Or more guilty? Did guilt matter at all, when Jedi were vanishing across the galaxy and no one seemed able to help? Was their loyalty still to the Republic? Or the vanishing Force-sensitives that no one in the Senate seemed to care about?

Lydie’s own moral reservations had ended when Thalia’s cell in the Underground went dark. Some Jedi said they needed to gather to fight—even Master Atris had partially emerged from the shadows, sending a comm that encouraged swift action… but Lydie remembered the monster’s languid touch in the Jedi Library, the sensation she’d had, all her limbs dissolving, her strength slipping away like blood in a warm bath.

If their enemy could sap away a Jedi’s life with a touch, what could he do to a room full of them? Or a planet?

She and Azen were trying for a more subtle, yet efficacious, solution.

How could you fight a Force user who drained the life from all other Force users?

Not with the Force.

They needed the Fleet.

How could you control a military that had lost all respect for the Jedi Order?

By showing it the threat that only Jedi could fix.

“A admirals Ekkumi, Cein. General Sand.” Azen had briefed her carefully on the latest Fleet promotions, so she spoke their titles with confidence. “Masters Vrook, Kavar. Padawan Ban.” She brought her palms together in a Senator’s bow.

“Lydie Korr,” Yuthura Ban ignored formality, stepping forward and taking both of Lydie’s hands. “I’m pleased to see you looking so well! You seem quite recovered.”

Lydie remembered the last time she’d seen the woman, all of them evacuating from the D’Reev Tower, her hasty farewells to Thalia and Knight Shree.

Poor Thalia.

“It’s Senator Lydie Loanin now,” she corrected. “I am Second off my husband’s House--at least until we have children.”

The Twi’lek’s eyes narrowed. “Of course.” She squeezed Lydie’s hands again. Hers were warm, almost hot. Twi’lek metabolism was faster than the Human baseline, which made it three times faster than the Standard Zabrak, although Lydie had always been told she was rather warm-blooded for an Iridonian. “Senator Lydie.” Yuthura Ban pulled back, raising a brow ridge.

Loanin, Lydie thought. Senator Lydie Loanin. Even though Lydie Loanin did sound ridiculous.
“So sorry to hear of your father’s death,” Admiral Cein was saying to Azen.

“An unfortunate circumstance.” Her husband turned to look at Lydie.

She wondered what her own mother would have thought of them.

_Dear Ma, Would Da have killed to marry you? Azen’s father objected because we are genetically incompatible and Azen got rid of him because it was the most logical choice to protect the Jedi—_

“Please.” She smiled politely and gestured at the round table they had placed in the room’s windowed alcove, with views of the Coruscanti depths shimmering beneath. “Let's all sit.”

_There's probably some polite way Senators say that, although I don't know it, just like I don't know anything, and even through Azen says it's fine, I know that it's not. We’re just waiting on Senator Racharn and then we’ll begin._

“Racharn?” Admiral Ekkumi frowned. “I don't understand.”

“The First of Racharn will be joining us.” Master Vrook muttered. “She has the information about True Sith from the D’Reev archives.”

“Thank you for inviting her for us, Master Vrook,” Lydie remembered her manners.

“We have pastries,” Azen offered them stiffly. He wore the Senator's role like a bad coat, Lydie thought, but it was brave of him to try.

Xxx

They spent a damp, miserable night huddled together under a large, drooping bush that kept making Polla sneeze. Or maybe that was having her face buried in the Wookiee's furry chest. She woke up in the morning when the warmth suddenly ended, ending a dream of falling into a rug with a dream of falling into mud. Reality was cold and dark, and something was making a horrible, bone-chilling noise, like one of the soul stealers Auntie Mita used to warn her about when she was bad.

Zaalbar roared something, and the Tee made a clucking sound, almost like a growl.

The noise came again, raising every hair on her body. Polla shivered, wrapping her arms around herself. “What the frack was that?”

Malak, or Dustil, or whoever he was, was already awake, staring thoughtfully out at the jungle like the Force showed him more than wet, green foliage.

“You make the caff yet?” she added when he didn’t answer, tucking her cold fingers (even through the gloves) into the hem of her sleeves.

“Yeah.” He snorted, gesturing to the empty air. “Did you want crema or suc?”

“Both.” She shrugged, wishing it was true.

He turned to face her, shadows under his eyes. He’d be a handsome kid, maybe, if he ate something, Polla thought. “Malak thinks he knows someone in Kaas City who might let us hide out there. He thinks they’re one of Revan’s old allies.”

“Thinks?” Okay, So you’re Dustil? Are you not Malak? How was she supposed to tell?

“We don’t understand half his banthashit.” The kid rubbed his temples like they hurt. “He talks a lot. And it’s weirder… sometimes, we just know… stuff.”

“We… is you? Dustil? and--” it took her a sec to remember the name. “Mekel? The one whose da is Revan’s uncle?”

“Yeah.”

The Tee beeped. “What?”

“Thought you knew everything, Blue.” He smirked a little.

“Not about that! That's kind of major! Vrook had a kid?” The droid whistled. “And that kid is you!”

“Yeah. Hey, do I inherit anything, if the galaxy thinks she's dead?”

The droid’s dome swiveled. “Don’t be dumb, this is no time for--” her voder broke off. “That sound again. What is it?”

A low, mournful howl, followed in quick succession by a series of gobbling yelps. Closer now.

“Frack,” Mekel, or Dustil muttered. “Whatever that is can't be good--” And then his expression shifted, mouth furrowing flat, eyes narrowing as if he were seeing Polla again for the first time.

“Frack?” She prompted. “You were just saying--”

“No. Vormskr. A hunting pack.” The voice deepened, words hardening. “Of course. I should have known. We should have pressed on during the night--”

“Oh, yeah? You were the one who called a halt!” Polla didn't want to admit she'd been tripping over her own feet at that point, adrenaline and hunger the only thing keeping her moving at all.

The kid--now Malak pretty obviously--grimaced. “This body needed to recover from the carbonite freezing. And you and the Wookiee were a danger to yourselves, blundering through Kaas jungle in darkness--”

Zaalbar growled something long and complicated. Polla only caught the word for disagreement.

“Oh?” Darth Malak turned to glare at the Wookiee too, which would have been funny if something called a ‘hunting pack’ wasn't out to get them. “Tree-sense on Kashyyyk isn't enough to serve on Kaas. You have no idea the manner of creatures that hunt here at night!”

The Wookiee barked a dismissal, and made a chuckling sound, deep in his throat.

The Tee made a sound like a laugh. “Good one, Big Z!”

It was annoying, being the only sent who didn't get Shyriiwook, but another howl interrupted before Polla could point that out.

“We need to move.” When Malak was in control of the kid’s body, he sounded like he was in charge. Polla found her feet following him through the underbrush, with Zaalbar on her heels.
When she glanced back, she saw that the Wookiee had actually slung the Tee between the crossed straps of his bandolier, like a strange imitation of a baby’s harness. Under different circumstances, she might have laughed.

“So these hunting packs… they roam the jungle?” She lengthened her stride trying not to puff with the effort.

“No. Not without purpose.”

Another sound through the air, a long and deep ‘woo woo.’

“Rallying call,” Malak said before she even asked.

“You seem pretty sure they’re hunting us. Back home, we had hunts for trawler deer and sikimaw snakes—”

“Vornskr track Force users. They have no other purpose.” He had steered them back onto the main trail, somehow. “These are the Emperor’s lands. Tenebrae is tracking me.”

“Oh.” She coughed. “Just you?”

“All of us,” the Tee said. “But yeah, mostly him.”

The kid glanced in her direction. “As you say. This road leads to the city. There are guard stations along the way, every two kilometers. You and the Wookiee must pose as runaway slaves, hope Tenebrae hasn’t circulated descriptions, or that you don’t run into one of his voices—”

“That’s a lot of hope.” Pose as runaway slaves? What the frack do the Sith do to runaway slaves? Polla had been to Ryloth, she’d seen the Pits. It couldn’t be good. In fact, won’t it be worse considering this is an evil Sith fracking planet?

The vornskr bayed again, sounding closer now, and every nerve in her body screamed to run.

“Where the frack will you be?”

“Take that off.” The dirtbag didn’t answer. “The robes. Take them off. Hide the gun. Give me the lightsabers.”

“They’re valuable.” It was a weak objection, almost a joke.

“Don’t be a fool. Keep them and any sithling you meet will use them to gut you.”

The Wookiee growled like he was actually agreeing with Darth Malak.

“They’re right,” the Tee added. “Lose the sabers, Polla Polla. This kind of place, weaker you are, safer it is.”

Feeling like she was in another fracking nightmare, Polla did as he told; letting the Revan robes fall to the ground and leaving her standing there in nothing but her bodysuit skiv and the Sith boots. She grabbed the belt and took the blaster out of it. Shoved it down her left boot, where it dug into her skin. Tried not to shiver. “They take you and leave us alone? That’s the deal? Why the frack is that the deal? What the frack happens to us then?”

“House Blais. They have apartments on Imperial Row. Go there. Tell them… you’re an agent of my wi--of Revan’s. I think they… I think they are allied, she never told me her plans, but she spent a great deal of time with one of their sons. He seemed besotted, and that House has some Republic connections. My father did work with them. Perhaps you can use the resemblance to Revan in your favor.”

“What? That's it? That's your fracking plan?”

“Vornskr hounds only hunt Force users, but the Emperor's Hunt rides with other beasts as well. The Wookiee would be seen as a noble challenge. You will be fodder in their way.” His voice was fracking giving her the creeps, low and guttural, with that stupid Core accent. “Tenebrae has spoken with Revan. He needs me for her. He does not need you. And my wife… may not have your interests at heart.”

“You do?” She was getting pissed now. “How the frack do you know all of this?”

“Force bond. We told you.” His voice changed, consonants slurring a little, dropping the accent like a bad ex. Now, he still sounded Core, but a lot more downmarket. “Klee’s with my body on Coruscant. Emperor Asshole is fracking bragging right now about having Revan and Malak and getting his own fracking way about everything.”

“Asshole,” he muttered again--at almost the exact same time as the Tee said the word

The droid chuckled, which was really creepy.

“His own way to do what?”

Zaalbar growled something that sounded like a question too.

“I… don't know.” Malak again. She was getting better at telling them apart. “I never knew. My wife kept her own counsel.”

“Great.” Well, whatever it was, wasn't Polla’s problem. Galaxy was a big place. They couldn't frack up all of it.

“Go,” he insisted again.

The howls were closer now. The sound made her spine prickle, warm rush of fear, like instinct. Run. Hide. Get the frack away-- “House Blais, huh? Okay.” Polla took a few steps away, ready to go right fracking now… but the Tee and the Wookiee were having some kind of argument entirely in barks.

The Wookiee gave one last injured whine, and growled at Polla. His dark eyes were liquid. She only caught one word: “Follow.”

“Okay…?”

No time. Crashing noises behind them. Snap-hiss as Dustil Onasi or Darth Malak or Mekel-from-the-Underground lit a lightsaber. The Tee swiveled behind him, and two blasters emerged from its chassis.

“Wait. Mission isn’t coming?”

The Tee didn’t bother to respond in any language Polla knew, just a series of shrill trills.

“No,” Dustil or whoever said. “You’re an idiot, Blue.”

“Huh?” Who the frack was blue? She looked at Zaalbar, who had no blue on him anywhere.
The Wookiee growled back. This word she caught. Run. Go. Fast. It meant all of those things.

Go how? Where? Just like that? Polla was still scrambling for a response when Zaalbar caught her by the arm, lifting her like a coiled rug, and broke into a dead run, moving through the underbrush, carrying her like she was Abasen. He was fast, for such a huge, hairy guy.

Behind them, the howls intensified, and then stopped. One high, gobbling yelp… and then an eerie silence.

“Frack,” she whispered softly. She twisted in his grip, trying to break free. “Put me down now, okay, big guy?”

“Ahhregg,” he moaned. That wasn’t a no, but she was pretty sure it wasn’t yes, either, because he didn’t let go.

Another howl again, then a whole pack of them, gibbering in the distance. And screams.

“I want to go home,” she mumbled into his chest fur.

“Shheooog,” he agreed.

Just when she thought she’d seen everything, Zaalbar slung her all the way over his shoulder like she was a kid playing sack of pomatos, and launched himself at the nearest tree.

Wookiees, it seemed, could climb trees very well.

XXX

For the first half, Leeshansintina, First of Racharn found the meeting with the heads of Fleet and the late Jedi Council a lot more boring than she expected. The refreshments were woefully pedestrian. The Fleet admirals wore civs—as did half the Jedi. The only one that was even halfway cute had this annoying, Rim accent. Where was Master Kavar Vakla from again? She looked down at her notes. Oh, yeah. Onderon. Big deal. Aramis took them there as an Away for her thirteenth? They’d done the beast-rider tour, flown with the drexl (on open hovercars, of course, no one risked a Senator’s heir with savages), and Ismay had even snuck off and made out with this cute guy who said he was a prince, but turned out to be one of the kids who took in their luggage at the hotel. It had been, as her late mother would have said, “an experience,” but not one she had any desire to repeat.

She drummed her fingers on the table-top, sitting next to her stealthed chap, stifling a yawn. Her eye caught the cute guy across from her on the table—the new Loanin First, who had the same cheekbones as his father, but was half the age. She smiled at him.

The rumors must be true about him only liking exotics through, because he just gave her a Selkath-eyed stare back. Cold, aquatic. Totally.

“How do you know?” That old, wrinkly Jedi Vrook Lamar interrupted cute Master Loanin again. “You claim there’s proof of an imminent threat from the Sith Empire, but how do you know?”

The Zabrak Jedi wife of Loanin’s smiled politely, and produced a round, old-fashioned commlink. She set it on the table. “We have evidence.”

“Show us,” one of the military guys said.

The other one, General Sand, who had been in the Official Coruscanti Story of Revan’s
Life, glanced rather pointedly (Leesa thought) in Leesa’s direction. “We were told this meeting would be secure.”

Leesa might have laughed, because if she totally wanted to, she could have had them all killed. Instead, she just smiled. “Don’t mind me! I’m only here because Senate rules say you need a Ruling House rep if you’re gonna be talking to the disbanded Jedi Council.” She tried to catch Loanin’s eye again, but he was staring at the pretty Zabrak he’d married (huge scandal, by the way). “House Loanin wouldn’t count. They’re not high enough ranked.”

“Higher than we were,” the Loanin murmured. His eyes were flinty. Pity about the wife, who sat next to him, all Zabrakly. She had gold chains looped over her front horns. Vulgar.

“The First of Racharn is here because I requested her attendance,” Revan’s uncle said, which was totally why it was her here and not some other House, but the point was still Leesa’s. “Racharn inherited all of D’Reev’s effects, including their intelligence databanks.” He rubbed the bridge of his nose like his head hurt. “She has information we need.”

“Some of it’s pretty out there,” Leesa warned him, widening her eyes so he thought she was stupid. “Sith Empire stuff. You all do know there are real Sith, right? Not like, fallen Jedi-Sith. Like real Sith. Probably evil. A lot of them have like, red skin.”

“So we’ve been told,” the Loanin murmured. Was he being sarcastic? Or ironic? Most people didn't know, those were totally not the same thing.

“Malachi used to control a few of their media channels,” Leesa added, because she was now a mature adult, and not going to sink to a Loanin’s level. “Racharn does now, but most of the contracts are in this weird, crazy language and none of my counsel--”

“Ancient Sith,” the Twi’lek’s lips pulled back over her pointed, small teeth. “If your contracts are with Sith worlds, the contracts would be in Ancient Sith.”

“--Yeah, so anyway, I put out an ad to find some counsel who speak it?”

“I speak Ancient Sith,” the Twi’lek told her.

Leesa made a mental note on her virtual tab to find out the woman’s name. “Cool,” she said, smiling like it was no big. “You want a job? I can offer a generous retainer.”

“The evidence?” Master Kavar interrupted. “I’ve seen it, of course. But the rest of you should.”

“Lydie…?” The Loanin First sounded like he was giving his bastard Second Zabrak wife permission to move. They must have one of those relationships.

The Zabrak tapped the front of the commlink, and an image appeared: a cute, dark-haired man in a bed, with a bunch of kolto bandages packed around his body. D’Reev’s old pet Jedi was looming over him, pacing back and forth. Took Leesa a sec, but then she got it. Mekel Jin. Dustil Onasi’s old bodyguard. Revan’s cousin. “This is a live feed,” the Zabrak murmured. “Master Vrook had requested security detail on his son.”

“You were monitoring my son’s security cameras?” Master Vrook broke in, sounding pissed.

“Master Klee contacted Kavar and gave him the codes,” the Zabrak corrected him. “It was agreed that we had a unique opportunity to see how the Emperor possesses one of his subjects--”

Xxx
“What did he say? The Emperor. What did he say?”

Mekel tried to sit up again, only sending a blinding knot of pain rippling down his side. “Master Klee. You... again.” Finally, Maybe the fracking Emperor had to take a piss or something. “We lost track. There’s a lot—” a part of him was standing with Malak and Dustil, saber blazing as they stood down a pack of vornskr, while around them a bunch of red-skinned assholes riding what looked like giant manka cats _laughed._ “Why don’t you know what he says?”

“When he takes a body, he takes it utterly. When he leaves for another, he is gone entirely. There is no exchange.” Klee glanced at the closed door. It had been ages since anyone even tried to open it. “A weakness. One of the few we dare exploit.”

“That’s fracking nice.” Mekel blinked, his vision doubled. Sweet of Blue to stand off with him, but what the frack? Did Malak really think they were gonna take down all of these Sith? _If Malak get us killed, it’s all over._ He felt… stretched, stuck in this body, as much as half of him was across the galaxy. “What... do you… what do you want me to say?”

“I want you to tell Revan that we resist. That we will help.”

_Asshole._ Mekel had to laugh. “It's not Revan who’s on Kaas right now. It's this smuggler--Polla Organa? I don't know where the frack Revan is, but Malak and everyone seem to think she’s coming--”

Xxx

Were they speaking in code? Leesa wished she had a trusted Second she could have sent in her place. This Jedi meeting thing was turning out to be more nonsensical than trade negotiations with Phin, and that said _a lot._

“Polla Organa?” Master Vrook had a vein on his forehead that was kind of gross. “The Deralian smuggler is on Dromund Kaas? How in stars did the real Deralian become embroiled in Revan’s affairs?”

“I thought she was dead,” General Sand frowned. “Didn't your intel reports say Revan had her killed, Ekkumi?”

“It was the obvious conclusion.”

“She wasn't dead,” Vrook snapped. “Polla Organa was on Coruscant as recently as a month ago. But she had nothing to do with Revan. This makes no sense.”

“And you knew of this how?” Master Kavar Vakla frowned at him.

“I saw her,” Vrook muttered. “In the Underground. Poor girl.”

“Unfortunate, but irrelevant,” Loanin broke in. “Perhaps the Revans sent her in their place as a ruse for Tenebrae. To antagonize him.”

“Or distract--” his Zabrakian wife murmured.

“More to the point: Malak’s… ghost is on Dromund Kaas _now?_” Admiral Rew Ekkumi looked like that was a real possible thing, and not some crazy cipher.

The Loanin First coughed. “The boy said that Revan is going to Kaas? Which one?”
“Which one?” General Sand shrugged. “The one that's really Revan--not this Polla person you said is already there.”

“He means which Revan,” the Zabrak wife said quietly. “The one who destroyed the Star Forge? Or the one who was Padawan Sheris Loran, before she took a holocron of the original Revan Starfire’s memories?”

“What?” Vrook’s voice growled the word in a way that Leesa could totally have seen being hot, like fifty years ago.

“What do you mean, 'which Revan?” Cein demanded. He was the not-cute one. “Are you telling us… not only is Revan Starfire not dead. But that there's two of her?”

“Three, if you count the smuggler,” Leesa pointed out, but no one was paying attention to her, the highest-ranking person in the room.

Whatever. Revan Starfire was so last year. Even if she came back, House D’Reev was dead as a doormat. And Racharn had all their cards.

The room broke out in a gaggle of excited voices. Leeshansintina examined her nails. Chap’s core was set on record. She’d sort through them later with her advisors.

Xxx

“This is the last hyperspace jump before Dromund Kaas,” Seiran commented, as if Revan couldn’t count. “If there’s anything else I need to know, you should tell me now. When we get in their airspace, I have no idea what protocol--”

“I know the protocol,” Revan told him. “We’ll be hailed by orbital patrol upon approach. I will handle all communications. Your job is to land the ship.”

“Right,” he muttered. “Land the ship, find Polla, leave.” It sounded like an invocation.

Revan walked over to him, trying to find words that would put him at ease. “She is now under my protection. Tenebrae will not harm her.”

Unless he wants to send me another message… in which case, none of them are safe.

“Great,” the Deralian adjusted something on the board. It appeared to be their gravitational thrusters.

The Fragment's personal commlink rang abruptly again. Revan didn’t recognize the codes. It could be anyone--one of the surviving Jedi, her Uncle Vrook, the Fragment herself-- “ Aren't you gonna answer that?” Evident from the scorn in his tone that the Deralian didn't understand the risks.

“You answer it, Seiran.” Revan stepped to the side, out of view of its primitive camera. “I will cut the connection if needed.”

“I--”

“Now.” Thinking of Uncle Vrook reminded her of what she had not had the chance to say to him. Pointless sentiment, compared to what was at stake. “Please.”

Seiran Wen eyed her warily, but hit the button to reply, as she had directed. "Hello?" It would help
"Me," a man barked at him. Revan stepped a little closer to get a better view. Beskar. Cropped hair. A lined, square face, familiar from the vids. "Where did you get this comm?"

"I-I have it." The Deralian was doing a good job of sounding stars-touched. Maybe that should be his excuse, and Revan should ignore this comm entirely. She had nothing to say to Canderous Ordo, and Oerin had asked her to leave the Mandalorians out of her plans. Given their relative weakness, it had been an easy enough promise.

She frowned, moving her fingers surreptitiously to adjust the camera’s resolution with the Force. The background snapped into sharp focus: banks of glittering consoles, durasteel spires inset into the wall, set in a distinctive arch.

Her breath caught in her throat. How is this possible?

"Seiran?" A dark-haired woman came into the camera’s view suddenly, crossing the floor to stand in front of General Canderous Ordo. She looked capable, with a child under each arm: one dark, one fair. "What are you doing? Did you kill Revan Starfire?"

Seiran looked at Revan as if he was asking what he should say.

How do you know the Mandalorians, pilot? It was a question for later, much later. Now--

"No," Revan told them, stepping into view. Again, she puzzled for precious milliseconds over the correct endearment. "Canderous Ordo."

"Third Wife," the man replied, in Mandalorian. The blonde woman next to him glared. Behind her, another two women, some infants, and a console bank with an arched, almost serpentine shape. Familiar. She could almost feel its cold slickness under her fingers. "I see that you're alive. Good."

S’cuy gar to you as well, General. "Good?" Her laugh sounded high and unfamiliar. She spoke in Standard, in case it was useful to have Seiran understand. “What in nine hells are you doing on my flagship?”

“Your Senator didn’t tell you before his assassination?” The blonde-haired woman next to Canderous snorted. “We traded for it. We made an arrangement with Malachi: your son returned from the Jedi for this worthless hulk. In truth, we did your Republic a favor, taking it from them. They were making no use of it at all.”

The Ordos were on the interior bridge--no sign from here of the damage Malak’s cannon had done. Revan had an irrational desire to ask them to show her the main command circle, the place where she should have died, but she bit it back, focusing instead on the figures in front of her. Canderous
Ordo had multiple wives, not uncommon, and they had been featured in the vids Davad had shown her, but she couldn't remember their names or station--

“See? Revan's not dead,” the youngest woman interrupted. Her hair was loose, a surprising breach of protocol in stars. “Am I still to be doubly shamed if she's not dead?”

“Millifar!” The dark-haired woman holding the two babies put them both down. One rose immediately and began toddling across the floor. The other examined its own toes. “Let your father speak.”

Father, not wife. Revan made a note. She had never paid attention to Clan Ordo’s offspring, perhaps a mistake, given now--

“Where are you?” The leader of Ordo asked Revan bluntly. “Is Onasi with you?”

They know nothing. The Fragment let them go? With my flagship? I said I would let your Mandalorians run free, Oerin Lin; but The Aleema was not part of our bargain!

“No. Carth isn't here. Is the cloaking field operational on your ship?” Would they be loyal? Could she force their loyalty as the Fragment had?

But that was more than turning their own logic against them. That was… inspired. That man, Canderous Ordo. He followed the Fragment because of who she was, he--loved her, or she won his loyalty through combat, a show of strength, the old allegiance to Lin....

Ordo’s loyalty could have happened in countless ways; but however it was done, Revan doubted it would transfer to her own circumstance.

“Yes,” the dark-haired woman responded. A smug smile played around her lips, as she switched back to Standard. “The Aleema is fully operational. We could stealth into Coruscanti orbit undetected, were it required.”

Seiran cleared his throat, as if he wanted to say something. Revan shot him a glare.

“No need for that... now,” she smiled, making it a joke like the Fragment would have. “Have you given any thought to targets in Sith space?”

“Perhaps, but Clan councils are for Clan,” the blonde woman said, folding her arms. “Are you returning to us to lead Clan Lin, Revan? Where is your son?”

“Safe.” The word escaped. She had meant to dissemble, tell them Malachor was dead, but a weak part of her mind refused to voice the lie.

“We don't have enough ships for a true engagement,” Canderous Ordo added, with surprising candor. “Yet.”

The wife next to him frowned, glancing towards the other.

“Yet,” Revan repeated slowly.

Xxx

The fire had dimmed to embers. Revan’s hands crossed over her belly as she sank her cold toes into the smoke-warmed fur slippers that Headwoman Octiva had given her. They were the only shoes that still fit her swollen feet.

They said her time would be soon. They said she should send for her own clan, if she wanted them to be here for the child’s arrival.

Revan had gone through the list of ways to tell Malak and Vrook a dozen times; but they all reduced to the same equation: Why didn’t I tell them before?

To answer was to admit a fundamentally difficult truth.

These months out of time, while her son grew within (Stephonix’s scanners said he was a boy--; Revan could sense him in the Force, but the child himself had no conception of his own gender), had been one of the best times of her life.

The Mandalorians knew nothing of Padawan Revan Starfire, the strongest Force user in at least a generation. No fear. No awe. No sanctimony. She rarely used the Force at all here. Among Clan Lin, Revan was nothing more than a middling swordswoman, with a flair for languages and dejari. Mandalorian culture had little use for anything it couldn’t see or touch. This was the limit of their world: sun, sand, and crops. Their once-dominant military had been reduced to war games, festive sword dances. A part of her… a part of her wanted to live like this forever: raise her own son like the youngest child of Lin, the boy Oerin. A clever philosopher’s boy, cloaked in tribal silks.

Sometimes she drew the Lin boy maps on the sand of a galaxy he never needed to see. Sometimes she answered his questions, because this was a place where knowledge of the outside galaxy, even of their own history, was nothing but abstract.

All that Clan needed, they had right here.

It was, she thought, a truth that Malak would never understand. She missed him, of course she did, but he--

“Don’t go fireblind on us.” Her host’s low chuckle interrupted her thoughts. “Or catch cold. Octiva would have my hide.”

“I’m not cold,” Revan lied. Her hands and feet felt numb, with all her energies focused on the baby within, still in sleep, his fingers opening and closing like tanta blooms inside of her.

“No?” The Fett settled a fur robe around her shoulders and sat down next to her, stretching his own bare legs out towards the flames. “I was told you come from a world entirely covered in snow.”

“Yes.” She pulled the robe around her, wiggling cold toes in her slippers. “It’s called Hoth. But I haven’t lived there since I was… since I was a child.”

“When I was a boy, we sacked an ice-world. Even ice burns, given proper tinder.” His voice was light and teasing. If the Fett Cassus Lin hadn’t been nearly Vrook’s age and technically some kind of adoptive father figure, Revan would have thought he was flirting with her. “What makes an ice Jedi burn, Starfire?”

“You were a child during the Exar Kun rebellion?” She felt her face flush, even if among Mandalorians, it was men who were supposed to blush. “I took an elective course on military history, but I don’t remember an ice planet--”

“Not every fight became part of the Republic’s lies.” The man leaned forward, warming his hands before the fire. “You’re good with dejarik, but I suppose no one ever taught you how to plot an orbital relay with more than a dozen ships accounting for all vectors of approach--”

“The same as one ship, except for collision points.” Revan shrugged. “It’s only simple physics.” Was this flirtation? Malak might have taken offense, but the Fett’s interest reminded her of pleasing Masters Vrook or Kae more than anything else. “But orbital combat is nearly as much a risk to the attackers as to defense. It would be almost impossible to win such a battle, without contaminating the planet’s atmosphere--not to mention the difficulty of approach for an attacking navy with no element of surprise. You can’t just jump out of hyperspace above atmosphere--”

“You have studied.” The Fett sounded pleased.

“My old teacher… she… she said we Jedi had a responsibility to understand all wars--the ones we had won, and the ones we lost.”

“Had?” Cassus chuckled. “Do Jedi no longer have responsibility? Or are you no longer Jedi?”

“Neither!” Revan’s voice was sharper than she meant it to sound. “But wars like that will never happen again. It was madness, what Exar and Ulic tried to do with their--”

“Their?” The man chuckled. “Dar’jett are useful, but the strength is Mando’ade. Ours.”

“Was,” she corrected him. It was cruel, perhaps, to correct him. Living among them for months had taught Revan how much Clan valued their pride. “You have no ships now. Not since the Treaty of Yavin.”

“Of course--” His teeth glinted in the flames--

Xxx

“Revan?” Onscreen, General Ordo was frowning at her. Everyone was quiet. Revan wondered how long she had been silent. What she had missed.

Seiran’s frozen expression gave her no clues. Had he betrayed her to them?

“I still… I may have a… a small target for you.” Even at full strength, Aleema couldn't stand against Kaas orbital defenses, but with more ships, if they could capture or at least destroy some of the Sith manufacturing centers…. Orbital Factory Genika, over Thule. Do they still make dreadnaught shells there? With the Star Forge active, most of the Sith military complex had been disassembled--placing them suddenly in a world where manpower meant more than resources, but now… could Revan use the Mando’ade to cut off Tenebrae’s strength at its head?

“A target?” General Canderous Ordo laughed. Unexpected.

“Are you joining us?” The blonde child interrupted. “Either fight by our side, or run away, like your pet Deathbringer--”

“Millifar!” The older blonde woman, face lined but near-twin to the girl’s, turned her head sharply and made a slashing motion with her hand.

“She isn’t wrong,” the dark-haired woman interjected, raising an eyebrow. “Revan gave Ordo the mask of Mandalore. She ceded all rights. It is only through this marriage--”

“Not even a real marriage,” the girl muttered sulkily.
“Milli,” the man sounded more tired than annoyed. His eyes didn’t leave Revan’s face. Was it devotion? Or something else? Suspicion? Captain Onasi had known she was false instantly, had a face that expressed every emotion, but through a comm signal, Revan could tell nothing of this man at all. “What's wrong with your hand, Revan?” The old warrior leaned forward, face filling the screen.

She had forgotten. In the call with Carth she'd turned to have it concealed, but seeing the Aleema was disquieting and Revan had turned directly to face the comm. “An injury,” she lied glibly. “It happened when we left Coruscant. I had it replaced.”

“Huh.” The man nodded and shrugged. “Looks like good work.”

“It is quite functional,” she allowed.

“My daughter saw General Surik,” the man told her. “She was holed up on some moon, but she took off and ran. Millifar said she's half-mad.”

“She ran like a scalded kath,” the girl muttered. “And she hates you, Third Wife.”

“Would you like us to pursue?” the dark-haired woman asked. “I am only asking from politeness, but we did trace her probable jumps. We have a few modified freighters capable of the task.”

I'm sure you do. You were always a very clever people.

Strange, staring at her old enemies and hearing them address her as an ally.

“You… actually saw Meetra… Millifar?” She’d thought the woman long dead. So many dead. Was Surik like Davad then? Another Force-extinguishing threat to the galaxy? Their gifts had been similar once, before Malachor. After Malachor, seeing what Davad had become--

“Yeah,” Canderous Ordo nodded slowly. “General Meetra Surik. You remember her, right?”

Xxx

“You remember her, right?” He kept his voice casual, as he let his hand drop to his side, not daring to give his wives more warning.

“Not... much.” Her smile was stiff. “I remember... Malachor.”

Canderous nodded. “Right.”

Xxx

“He's a kid. Dustil Onasi is just a kid. They all are.” Revan paced the length of the narrow cell they’d been assigned in the Dreshdae Academy like a leashed rancor, testing its boundaries. “All of these damn kids! What the frack am I supposed to do with them?”

A rhetorical question, Canderous was sure, but he tried to answer honestly. “They've been raised as warriors. Some we can salvage.” Maybe Carth’s kid. The boy had guts. “Kids can be pretty tough. You had a few that followed you in the Wars--”

“Kids? I had kids fighting for me?”

“They say General Surik was eighteen standard when she gave the order. My people called her the “Who?” Her brows knit together in a frown.

Revan could have learned the name from someone else. She had learned the truth about Malachor later, much later. But still, that… the arm… hadn’t one of the Selkath survivors looked like Revan? Canderous had seen the reports back when he was playing Malachi D’Reev’s lap kath. And hadn’t that duplicate had her arm chopped off right in front of them?

And then Canderous realized the simple truth that had been staring him in the face all along.

The Hawk was empty without its crew. You could barely hear the Wookiee’s howls over the comm chatter in the cockpit.

Revan had switched on all channels, releasing a cacophony of commands in a dozen languages and codes that she somehow seemed to filter, her hands moving in front of the holographic images on the screen.

Strangely graceful, like a dance in stars.

On the viewscreen in front of them, the skies above the Rakatan homeworld bristled with ships: fleets of fighters, Republic capital ships, and Sith dreadnaughts, all circling like purrgil, burning blast knew how much power just to avoid the planet’s pull. There were firefights breaking out already, but their own trajectory was like the eye of a sandstorm, heading direct through chaos, straight to the heart of the spire-shaped fortress that swallowed half the sky.

Was Bastila doing this? Was Revan? Or was it just that neither side--Sith nor Republic--wanted to risk killing the woman who controlled the giant factory?

Canderous had been the man who told Vao not to be afraid. He’d been the man who’d called the pilot a friend, the old man a good drinking buddy, the Cathar a fine warrior. He’d called the Wookiee loyal and strong.

He’d been the man who had said that he’d follow Revan to the gates of hell too. It looked like now they were almost there.

Maybe Republic forces didn’t know what she’d become. They’d let the Hawk through the blockade around the orbital she called the “Star Forge,” with nothing more than good wishes and platitudes about the Force.

“Here.” Canderous put the bottle down on the console. Revan barely looked up from the nav board. “One more drink before the war. You game?”

Revan’s face was pale as Shan’s now. So quick they could turn. Onasi once said it was like the flip of a coin. Light to darkness. Canderous had always thought the light and dark things were both banthashit, but now… what she was now was changed. How else to explain it?

Canderous wondered if this was how the old Fett had thought, looking at Ulic Qel-Droma when the osik led him into the Jedi’s trap. What Cassus Lin had thought before Revan took him down.

Maybe he was an old fool, comparing himself to men. In his case, there would be no one left with songs to sing for his glorious death.

“Drink?” he repeated. Her eyes were strangely luminescent, tinged with yellow.

“Yes,” Revan muttered, and took the bottle from him. The muscles in her throat worked, pale, deceptively fragile. One quick, deep swallow. Canderous wondered if he’d be doing the galaxy a favor if he put a vibrosword in her chest before she put the firewhiskey back down… but he knew her well enough to know he’d die before the blade cleared its sheath.

“Here.” The second had passed and she was passing the bottle back, strangely cold where her fingers had touched its glass.

“Thanks,” he said. “You know what to do?”

How are we going to die today, Revan?

“I’m going to kill Malak.” Her eyes… maybe it was the light. She licked her pale lips, glancing towards Bastila, who sat oblivious, eyes closed in the co-captain’s chair. Maybe Princess Shan was doing something to keep fighters off their tail. Canderous wasn’t sure. “You should… follow.”

On the viewscreen in front of them, a Republic hammerhead locked on a Sith interceptor. The slow depressurization of both ships began. Canderous muttered a deathnote for those poor bastards trapped like womprats inside, all their fight useless.

At least I won’t go like that.

Revan blinked, and moved the thruster to the right, so their own ship avoided collision.

“Don’t worry,” he told her, half-joking. “These tubs can’t catch the Hawk. There’s only ever been one warship built for speed as well as firepower. Not a ship in this sky was ever as fast as your Aleema. Not one.”

“My who?” She frowned. “My what?”

“Aleema. Your flagship. Twice the size of those kriff-spawned pieces of osik and three times as fast—”

XXX

“Canderous?” Her face was blurry in the comm’s light, face of the pilot behind her a stranger to Canderous. Aemelie had told him, confessed finally. Some Deralian saps. If this woman had the husband, he assumed the wife and kid were dead.

She didn’t know the ship. She’s never known the ship.

On Coruscant, Aemelie had peppered Revan with questions about the Aleema’s schematics, but she had never remembered a thing.

Such a simple thing. Canderous should have seen it before. The real Revan. Her child. Onasi…? Already dead. They must be. She would never stand for this. Never give her comm to an imposter.

No one would pretend to be Revan and head to Sith space to be (as Carth would put it) ‘on the side of the angels.’

Canderous felt his face fall into grim lines. “Just let us know how we can help, Revan. Let us know what you need."

“Yes,” she murmured, instead of laughing incredulously at his concern, telling him she ‘got this,’ or rolling her eyes. “I will. Thank you.”

A chink in his chest tightened. Canderous felt his mouth twitch once. It could be that he would never know their fates.

One more drink, pilot. Before the war.

He would toast honor, against a veil of stars.

XXX

“I... will,” she told General Ordo. “Thank you.” Revan punched the connection closed, leaning forward, and resting her forehead on the cool surface of the board. I will, General Ordo. If I can trust you. She wanted to trust him. The Fragment had. The Mandalorians would be useful, even if speaking to them brought up a strange mixture of bile and fear in her throat, like she was a child again, facing down her first battle on Eos.

And I promised Lin I would leave them. She owed the dead man nothing, but he was a better ally than enemy, and Aleema only one ship.

They would hate to be safe, but let them be free.

“You okay?” Seiran, behind her, like a shiver in the Force. Terrified.

“Start the next jump,” she commanded. “I... I need to rest.”

XXX

“Did you get a trace on that location?” Canderous barked.

“Yes,” Aemelie murmured. “But she said she doesn’t want our--”

“That wasn’t her,” he snapped. “I’m not sure who that was.”

“But that was Seiran,” his Second Wife argued. “Are you saying my friend’s husband is following a Revan pretender?”

“I’m saying we’re testing our cloaking capacity,” Canderous told them. “In Sith space. Figure out her probable jump points and get some lines on local chatter. If she’s traveling as Revan, there’ll be news. Find it. Get the translators booted for Sith.” Blasted dar’jett and their forgotten tongue. But his people had made a study of the basics, at least. Enough to find this false Revan, if she was mentioned.

“Sith space?” Gwenarius's voice dripped with false confusion.

“I won’t beg for the women’s maps,” he muttered. “You can tell me I've been among barbarians for too long again if you like, but have the children load the nav charts. Have you found a suitable base?”

Gwen glanced at Aemelie, who smiled slowly. “In fact, we have.”

“One with historical significance,” his First Wife murmured archly. “Much more temperate than Rekkiad or the Deathbringer’s moon.”
“Good.” He nodded.

It wasn’t vengeance he sought—merely a balancing of the scales.

XXX

Which Revan? Which Revan? Vrook’s mind seized on that point like it had the inertial gravity of a collapsing star.

Azen Loanin had said there were two.

Two Revans. There was only one way that could--

Across the table, his eyes met Yuthura’s. She gave him a pained nod, as if she was surprised too. “The holocron,” she said softly. “Sheris Loran took the holocron of Revan’s memories.”

The holocron. Of course. Sheris told us all her intentions, but we were fools to think those were empty words. I thought she was too broken to find the courage.

I underestimated her.

Guilt nagged at him, for the girl he'd neglected to save. No. For both girls that I neglected to save. Sheris and my niece both-- “Goreapple pie and crema. No choc.” The dormitory window reflected his useless, fool’s smile, but Vrook couldn't stop smiling as he handed her the plate.

Xxx

His niece smiled back. One of her teeth was growing in crookedly. There had to be a way to have that fixed. “You remembered, Uncle Vrook!”

“Of course.”

They had only been on Dantooine a few days, and her apprentice robes looked too large. Her nose was sunburned, her hair scraped into a tight braid, like a red rope down her back.

“Happy Birthday, Revan.”

She was ten, the oldest learner to be accepted in years, except for that Senate brat from House D’Reev. But Vrook didn’t think the boy would last. Malak was strong in the Force, but wholly unsuited for the life of a Jedi--spoiled and demanding--

“Oh-huh,” she nodded at him through a mouth of pie. “I hate it here, Uncle. When can we leave?”

Xxx

Sheris took the holocron’s memories.

Master Loanin seemed quite sure of it, even as he denied knowledge of how this event had occurred, or under whose command. Sheris’s own initiative?

That poor girl. Vrook had spoken with Sheris’s parents again after the D’Reev explosion, promised to look for their daughter. He hadn't known, but he had hoped she was with Revan, that the both of them were together and safe somehow—if only to assuage his own conscience.
Their mutual disappearance seemed to indicate something far more sinister.

“They were working together?” he asked Master Loanin, interrupting Cein’s paranoid rant about some pirated Republic ghost ship that had been seen in the Mid-core. “Revan and Sheris? You’re sure?”

“I am sure of nothing, but it seemed so.” The former Jedi-turned-Senator frowned. “The woman I spoke to was most definitely not Sheris Loran. I did not know the real Revan personally, but this… persona had an independence of character that seemed in keeping with accounts of the Sith’ae’rah’s nature.”

“You should have mentioned this sooner,” Vrook snapped. He felt blindsided. He had wanted Revan to return to herself, to have a true redemption; but not at Sheris’s expense. And now--

Why didn’t she come to me for assistance? Did she try?

“I did mention.” Loanin paused. “Master Kavar and I have discussed the potential ramifications at length, but since you remained in hiding, we did not discuss them with you.”

You also never discussed putting surveillance in my son’s room with me, or your plan that involves these three Fleet officers… and my niece! Vrook glowered at the younger man; but it was useless to belabor the point now. Not when there was a Sith Emperor out there, making Force-users disappear. Or worse.

“Do you expect us to remain calm that the two Revans’ plan may involve the lost Sith Empire, the Mandalorians and, if Vrook’s son can be believed, the ghost of Darth Malak?” Ekkumi’s voice was dangerously calm.

“Master Klee encourages the boy to extract as much information from the Emperor as possible,” Kavar said. “I told you, despite being possessed, Dalos Klee is on our side.” He gestured to the screen, where the Jedi was still talking to Mekel Jin.

Or talking to Malak. Or Dustil Onasi. Vrook had seen enough of the recording to see the shifts in voice and vocabulary. Malak was easy to distinguish; but it pained him not to be able to tell the difference between his son and the Onasi boy.

Admiral Ekkumi stood up abruptly, sending her chair clattering across the cold metal floor. “Our side involves sending two Revans and a Malak to the Sith home world?” Her voice sharpened. “Am I the only sentient in this room who objects to this… insanity?”

Vrook almost missed it, the exchange of glances between Loanin and his wife, her small smile.

“No,” he muttered. “You are not.”

“We don’t know where that Sith homeworld is;” muttered Cein. “Still.” He turned to Kavar. “You promised to reveal its location.”

Kavar nodded. “Leeshansintina of Racharn possesses the charts we need to find the Sith Empire.”

The Racharn First giggled. “It’s like… pretty far,” she commented. “I can see why they were such a secret. Totally out in the dust--like, past the Rim.”

Loanin folded his hands. “Racharn First has agreed to provide us with navigational charts, but any kind of invasion would be foolhardy before we assess their forces--”
“Does Klee have information about that?” Ekkumi walked over to the window, her fingers tapping slowly on her thigh. A military code, Vrook assumed. Some communique to Cein and Sand.
“About their military?”

“They have no Star Forge. The remnants of the Sith Fleet vanished over Malachor after Revan ordered them there--” Kavar had the aptitude for this. Vrook had lost his taste for it long ago. “At the most, five or six capital ships?”

“I wouldn't underestimate a few systems of Force users,” Yuthura murmured. “Their strength will not lie with tech.”

“You would know.” Ekkumi’s laughter was brittle.

“Yes.” Yuthura’s lekku were wrapped around her neck. “And I am concerned as the rest of you at the thought of a Darth Malak reborn. I served under him. But my students have the strength and self-control to use his power, not be consumed by it.”

“None of us are pleased by the concept of a Darth Onasi or a Darth Lamar either,” Kavar snapped.

“Jin,” Vrook snapped, taking the bait, and berating himself for it at the same time. “My son has his mother’s surname. Not mine.”

“Darth Jin?” Admiral Cein sniffed. “It sounds like a drink.” He shook his head. “After their… antics at our last meeting, I am convinced those two are only a threat to themselves. But Malak, if he were to retake command of the Sith Fleet--”

“I worry more about the Revans doing the same. Possibly with Mandalorian assistance.” Ekkumi put one hand on the ferraglass, fingers trailing across its surface.

Kavar coughed. “Revan is a concern. Malak… may not be.”

“They have no self control.” Vrook stared at the image of his son. No manner of wishing it otherwise would help. “My son and the Onasi boy. Malak's force of will and purpose is stronger than theirs.” He had watched enough of the recording to see again and again, how the glowing-eyed Sith Emperor taunted Malak into his son’s body. The boy was obviously powerless to resist.

Nothing more than a pawn. Like they made my niece with their mindwipes--

His thoughts were dark, darker than they should be. Too attached, too engaged.

Kavar raised a comm unit to his mouth and whispered something in it.

The door to his son’s hospital room slid open. His son started on the bed, and Klee’s head turned. The nurse who entered was carrying a long oblong box.

“What's this?” Vrook found his voice.

“An experiment,” Kavar said. “We are all concerned about the possibility of a Darth Malak on the Sith homeworld….”

Xxx

“What the frack is this?” It was Telos asking. Mekel was busy trying to help Malak and Blue kill vornskr and not die. Harder, because a part of him--or a part of a Dustil maybe--couldn't help but keep staring over to the cluster of sents that included Dustil’s father, chained like a joyboy in the back of an open speeder manned by two red-eyed and red-skinned assholes.

Their timing and concentration was way off. It was fracking hard being in two places at once and--

Leave me. Malak was pissed about the company, but Mekel didn't want to leave Dustil’s body alone with him. Klee seems to be stalling for time--

Aren't we stalling for time too? Polla Organa and Zaalbar had gotten away clear, Mekel thought, although neither Dustil or Malak had seemed thrilled when he pointed out they'd dumped two nulls who didn't speak Ancient Sith on an ancient, Sith planet. Thank frack he and Telos could handle it, although since they knew what Malak knew, maybe they could speak all types of things, like the way Shyriiwook actually made sense--

“No.” Malak dispatched another hunting beast with a two-handed undercut, leaping in the air and sending a volley of lightning at another one. Weird feeling, feeling your--Dustil’s--body move like that, and have no control. This is a show of strength. Tenebrae will respect it. Respect us, if he thinks we are stronger than the rest of his minions.

Great. Like being back at Dreshdae finishing academy again. Mekel looked over at Dustil's father before Malak jerked his head back towards the advancing threat: a massive, burled creature with a small head inset into its plated skin, claws the size of fracking kids, dripping with dark ichor.

“Terentatek,” Malak called out. His voice was mocking and hard. “Only one, Master?”

Master? Frack you both.

It puts him at ease. Malak’s hatred burned, like raw power in their hands.

“Frack you,” Mekel told him, gathering strength for the leap.

Xxx

“Mekel?” Klee touched his arm.

Dustil nearly jumped out of their skin. “What?”

“You seem… preoccupied.”

“No.” Their head hurt. When Dustil closed his eyes he was there, and he didn't want to be. Seeing Dad like that--completely helpless, like a Sith frack toy fueled an anger he wasn't sure he wanted to unleash. Mekk thought they could handle it, but maybe Mekel couldn't feel it the same way. There was a… power on that planet, like weaves of Force across its surface, fueled by all the hate and rage and pain--enough to break a planet maybe. Unleashing it would be like tumbling into space. No going back.

“Your Emperor seems pretty busy right now,” Dustil told him, but Klee was unsnapping the box from across the room. “That why I’m stuck with you?”

“Ah.” Klee didn’t answer. Instead, he turned, pulling out what looked like… a stick with something small and furry stuck on the end.

Ysalamiri. Dustil remembered the ones in the D’Reev apartments, the kid mixing poison with his tears.
“What’s that for?” he asked.

“Master Kavar asked me to conduct an experiment.” The voice was kind, detached, like they were in class talking about meditation techniques. “As you know, ysalamiri range is quite short—”

Xxx

Master Klee took another step forward. The boy on the bed sneered at him with an expression that Yuthura thought more Onasi than Jin.

Another step—and then, the boy’s expression went slack. Blank.

“What is he doing?” Yuthura demanded. “Are you trying to prevent Tenebrae from interrupting them?”

“No,” Kavar said. He leaned forward. “Vrook, you said before that Malak was able to keep possession of the Onasi boy even through the D’Reev ysalamiri fields, through neural disruptors. I posited that the same might not be true for Jin—” “Mekel,” Klee repeated.

This time, the man just gaped at him, mouth half open. “Yes, I…” he shook his head. “You need to put me back!”

“In time,” Klee murmured. “Give it a few minutes. We need to be sure.”

“Sure of what?”

“Sure of what?” Yuthura echoed. “By suppressing his connection to the Force, you risk disrupting the Bezel bond—”

Kavar smiled thinly. “Exactly.”

Xxx

Killing a terentatek was apparently fracking easy, because Malak and Mekel had done it in like two minutes, while Dustil had been wondering what fresh horrorshow Master Klee, the Sith lackey had in that fracking box.

The corpse was huge though, blocking off half the hunting party. But then a few pushed through the crowd. Sith wannabes, Mission would have called them, but the droid pretending to be her wasn’t even calling out insults, just generating shields and laying down suppressing fire when it looked like Dustil’s body needed it—he’d gotten that much of the fight through the bond.

Thanks for leaving me to clean up the fracking mess, Mekk.

Thanks for leaving me with your dads and fracking Sith Lords while you check out my enormous fracking co--

It felt like a hand slipping out of his grasp, fingers letting go. Suddenly, Mekel was just… gone.

Dustil looked down at his hand, now holding the lightsaber in an unfamiliar grip. It didn’t even feel like his hand, his body--

Where is Mekel Jin? Malak’s voice thundered in his mind.

Great, so he'd lost his best friend, his bondmate, and kept the Sith Lord ghost who destroyed Telos.

“I don’t know.” There was a row of Sith in front of them when he turned. Dear old Dad still chained to the speeder. And a red-skinned man wearing a crown perched on top of a fracking… what the frack was that?

Gundark. But Malak sounded distracted. Distant. It wasn't exactly reassuring that he was worried too.

Mekk? Nothing. Was he… was he dead?

Is that him? Is that Tenebrae?

I don't.... Fracking Malak of all people sounded freaked. Mekel Jin is not in the Force.

So, dead? Dead? Is he dead?

Silence, long enough for Dustil to notice that they were surrounded, that Dad looked older and tired. Long enough to notice the strange echo in his head--the emptiness. A sudden silence.

I am… free? Malak sounded farther away suddenly. How did this...?

“Don’t.” His own voice. Alone. Suddenly horribly alone in his head. Holding the lightsaber like it was someone else’s dick. Standing in front of a frackload of Sith and Dad--

“Where are your companions?” The man on the gundark sounded amused. “Did you dispatch them yourself, Malak? I rather enjoyed the Revan pretender. She had spirit, for a null.”

“I-I…” the man meant Polla and Zaalbar, not Mekel and Malak. “I… don't....” Dustil's voice cracked like he was still a kid. He felt sweat break out on his back. Suddenly his legs felt rubbery as if Malak and Mekel leaving had taken all of their strength with them.

His father was frowning at him with that whipped kath look he got when Dustil disappointed him. “Tenebrae,” he barked--guts considering he was chained and surrounded by fracking Sith. “Now you've got us. Maybe don't damage the merchandise before Revan comes to inspect it, huh?”

That fake casual voice. Same one he'd used on Korriban when he tried to pass himself off as her slave.

“Will you lay down your weapon, Malak?” The man chuckled. “I spent so much time in your first body… but your mind was always so opaque. Unpredictable, save your allegiance to her. Ah, but when that failed--” he laughed. “You were so good at destruction.”

Malak? Come the frack back? Now? “Oh, yeah?” Dustil took a step back, even though he knew it made him look weak. “Get fracked, asshole.”

The droid whirred next to him, swiveling it's dome around and emitting a quizzical doo-weet.

I am free. Malak’s voice. Definitely fainter. Like farther away.

No, Dustil thought uselessly, even though he'd dreamed of this. Please. Don't leave. I don't know what the frack is going on--
Master?

In your fracking dreams, Malak. Malak?

But Malak didn't seem to be talking to him. The bond felt like a thread, like half of it was gone.

Dustil reached for it and dropped the lightsaber.

Frack. Frack me. No. Mekel. Mekk? Malak?

The droid beeped again.

Someone was whistling at it. It took Dustil a second to focus, realize it was his father--

Xxx

“Frack you!” When he launched himself in the air, Mekel felt the stitches holding his guts in rip, white-hot pain, like getting fracking stabbed with a saber--but Klee was a fricking idiot, just standing there with his fracking ratroach on a stick and Mekel tackled the larger man easily. Klee was soft and fleshy and out of shape and old.

One of Mekel’s hands buried itself in the Eosian’s throat and the other ripped the ratroach off its perch and threw it against the wall. Hard. Like slamming a slug back home.

The thing made a… screaming noise. Then a whimper that made Mekel feel almost sorry for it. But then it died… and everything came back like the ocean, rushing over him like a wave.

He'd never seen a real ocean, but Telos had in their dreams.

The world had color and form again. His heart seized and shook, realigning itself with the one a galaxy away. He was standing in a clearing, staring at the terentatek they had killed. An asshole on a gundark was leering above them. They were surrounded by minions.

Malak’s power snapped back into their grasp, like the spark of a light.

“Ow,” Mekel whispered, fingers sliding over Dustil’s abdomen. Pain, but no wound.

You were gone thoughtyouwere goneforever. One of them thought. Maybe both.

I'll neverleaveyou. I-- “What the frack was that?” Telos asked even as Mekel answered him silently.

Fracking asshole. It was Klee. He did something. We need to kill him.

“Malak?” The man on the gundark said. The Sith Emperor coughed. “Is there a problem?”

Xxx

Malak was almost proud of Jin, moving with flawless grace, the power of the Force helping them dodge the beast's deadly claws, his former protege wielding their lightsaber as if he was Jedi-trained.

I was Jedi-trained. Your wife taught me a few things, she-- the boy’s attention splintered. What the frack is in the box?

Pay attention! Malak commanded, but the boy's balance was off now, and he had to dispatch the terentatek himself.
And then—between one second and the next there was no warning. Just—suddenly he was falling free.

_Mekk? Mekk?_ The boy was calling for his bondmate like a lost kissra, but it took Malak a moment to realize that he could _hear_ Dustil only from a distance. Even the jungle surrounding them, the Emperor, his court… all of it faded into patterns, meaningless forms.

Shadows and light. He tried to breathe and found nothing at all. Stars, like the last ones his human eyes had seen, dying on the deck of the Star Forge, while she stood above him.

"_I'm sorry. No._"

"_Malak??_" The boy again, thread pulling him back, but no longer tethered. A connection that felt as fragile as flamesilk. Like strands of her hair.

_I am free?_

"Oh, my Padawan." Soft laughter through the trees— _trees?_ Endless trees, grass under his feet. The world seemed solid, but strangely soft, more like a memory or a dream than a place.

Malak turned his head. "_Master?_"

"Jopheena," she corrected him, still just out of sight. "As good a name as any. It will do."

"He doesn't look like much," commented another voice. Dry. Male. Soft burr of an accent marking the man from one of the farming worlds--

Xxx

"I am free." His mouth spoke the words, but the pain in his gut belied it, weight of gravity, lying crumpled on the floor again. Coruscant. Klee gasping for breath in the corner of the room with a rapidly-darkening ring of bruises on his neck.

"I was… I was… free." Mekel Jin’s stitches were torn again. The pain was a tool and Malak used it, pushing the boy’s body upright, standing. "What in nine hells was that?"

"You tell me," Master Klee murmured, eyes narrowed. "Malak?"

"Yes. I-I was free. Of them. For a moment. The bond between us was… gone." His gaze took in the room again, focusing on a crushed scrap of fur, the bloodsmear across a wall. _An ysalamiri? But I was surrounded by them in Dustil's body before. How could that disrupt the bond?_

"You were correct." Master Klee sounded smug, turning to look at the mirrored wall near the fresher door, and Malak’s gaze noted the slight shimmer, the surveillance equipment stealthed, just a slight difference in the wall’s texture, if you knew what to look for….

"Who?" He demanded of the Eosian. "Who is recording this? Who are you talking to?"

Xxx

"It works," Azen Loanin said. "I believe it worked." He glanced up from a small datapad in front of him. "Monitoring Jin’s alpha waves--the sine curves dropped their frequency threefold--back to baseline. Normal."

"Meaning it was just him in there." Kavar nodded slowly. "Your hypothesis was correct. And now?"
“Now they are back to three,” Lydie Korr said, sitting next to her new husband. “But we did not expect this to permanently break the bond.”

“But now we know the means to do so,” Kavar said.

“Meaning?” Admiral Ekkumi asked.

“Meaning… we can send Malak back to hell,” Admiral Cein said. “And free Carth’s son.”

Later, Yuthura would chide herself for understanding so slowly. But it had never occurred to her that such a thing could be done. That any Force user would conceive of such an atrocity.

Strange, that she who had committed so many atrocities could still be surprised by such an obvious conclusion.

“There is a complication.” Lydie Korr sounded like a girl who had kept her head in books over life, never considered the consequences of her actions. “The ysalamiri create a powerful Force-blocking field that a neural disruptor cannot match. But we can't keep Mekel Jin in an ysalamiri prison forever. He's a Republic citizen. He has rights.”

Her husband frowned, as if he wanted to disagree.

“Severing the Force connection broke the bond.” Vrook sounded as surprised as Yuthura felt.

“Temporarily. But your intention is to--”

“Yes.” Kavar nodded at him. “As before.”

“This is what you refused to tell me.” Vrook Lamar’s anger was quiet, but intent. It felt like a cloud in the Force. A darkness. Yuthura wondered if he realized. “This is why you colluded with Klee. Did you tell him?”

“Of the theoretical possibility.”

“My son is not Qel-Droma. He's not even Surik. Mekel has done nothing to deserve this!”

“It isn't Mekel we need to stop.” Kavar said flatly. “If there is even a chance that Revan and Malak could rise again--”

“No.” Yuthura found her voice. “Even if it were possible to find a Jedi capable of performing the… the… act, you can’t do that to Mekel Jin. I made them strong to survive. What you are… suggesting would not only cripple him, but would strand Dustil Onasi on a Sith world in a weakened state--”

“Your Bezel ceremony made the two of them a conduit for a Sith ghost,” Loanin corrected her, with a curl of his lip that made Yuthura wish she still had her headmistress’s lash—at least for a moment. “Severing Jin’s connection to the Force sets them all free.”

The man was insane. “Sets them free? And severs our only connection to the events on Dromund Kaas! Right now, we can use Mekel’s connection. What you propose would blind us.”

Vrook nodded slightly, slightest of gestures showing his accord.

“We still have Klee and his network,” Loanin continued. “Much of the resistance was organized under Revan. It remains uncompromised. Klee has provided us with a list of his contacts.”

“You assume,” Yuthura snapped. “And if the Revan with Revan’s memories of that network resumes control of it? Or allies with the Emperor against us?"

“Malak should be dead.” Admiral Cein had served under him. Yuthura remembered that useless fact from her own lesson plans, teaching their Korriban students the histories of the Mandalorian wars. “This is all very damned simple. Malak should be dead. You Jedi can fix it. You need to.”

Kavar’s lips thinned, but he said nothing.

“You asked for our help tracking this Jedi-killing emperor of yours?” General Sand leaned back in his chair. “This is our price. Get rid of Malak. Send him back to hell where he belongs.”

Lydie Korr frowned. “We don’t think it’s the Emperor who is killing Jedi--”

Her husband leaned forward and whispered something in her ear, and the Zabrak stopped speaking.

“How?” Yuthura snapped. “How do you take away someone’s Force ability in the first place? No one since Nomi Sunrider--”

“No.” Vrook shook his head again. “Find another way. The yssalamiri cage. Leave him in it for a week. A month?”

“We need to be sure,” Cein said. “If you want Fleet help, you want our networks, this is our price. Get rid of Malak. Now.”

Xxx

“The frack?” Mekel’s anger propelled him back into control. “Who’s watching us?”

“The Jedi,” Klee said. He smiled ruefully. “Or what’s left of them.”

Fracking Jedi. It chilled Mekel’s bones to the marrow that they could just… do that.

Let me handle this. Malak broke in. I know Klee. They’ll want us to retrieve information for them. We can feed them what they request while still maintaining the advantage for Revan--

The frack? Dustil’s and his own indignation spiked. My father’s right here! We are taking him and that smuggler and getting the frack off this fracking planet--

No.

“Son.” Captain Onasi was wearing some kind of metal… shirt that wouldn't have looked out of place back at Moms’s. Neither would those chains around his hands, leading to a brace across his chest. They'd moved, when Mekel had been distracted back on Coru. Now he was sitting in the speeder next to the man.

“Dads. Dad. I mean.”

“I’d hug you, but….” His father raised his chained hands. The speeder lurched forward, driven by invisible command. From the dark currents around them, Mekel thought it was the Force--not from his father, of course, but from one of their silent escorts around.

“It’s okay.” He bit his lip not to say ‘sir.’ Telos was listening to another crazy glow-eyed lecture from Tenebrae, who'd popped back into Klee, just as the man was maybe about to tell them who he worked for, what was going on.
“Are you… you’re you?” The Captain’s eyes were lighter than his son’s, but they had that same piercing directness, like he could see everything Mekel was.

“I’m… it’s complicated. Yes.” They were split, like Telos could only deal with his dads if Mekel was the one talking, but he was here too. He glanced back for Mission, and saw her, braced firmly in the back of the speeder. Mud on her dome now, and something that looked like vornskr blood.

“Complicated?” she purred. “No poo doo. You have no idea how hard I've worked, trying to get an outside line to Kashyyk!”

Xxx

The world was empty of all sentient life once more. A virgin chalice. A vessel, serene. For thirty thousand years, Kashyyk had been free to conduct its own experiment, create a new slave race of hunters that were furred and strong… only to see them finally cast their lot among the stars. It had conducted this triumph while also performing its network subroutines; as well as repairing other faulty installations with new sentient pieces as needed. It had suffered predation. Corruption. Even the whims of a tyrannical adolescent holocron with no understanding of the larger songs of the universe.

It had endured the Master’s return, and his degraded impulses. It had fulfilled Dromund Kaas’s irritating requests for additional parts twice in little more than one thousand years. The parts were delivered. Both times.

It was not Kashyyk’s concern, if the Dromund Kaas installation could not get the second part to fit. It had told Dromund Kaas this several times already.

{{Silence,}} it now told the adolescent fragment of itself that was pestering from Dromund Kaas, presumably on the installation's behalf. {{Your requests are petty and jejune. The other parts of yourself have gone, and I am not your personal commlink.}}

The adolescent piece had several inventive things to say in response, in many of their shared tongues.

Xxx

The ship was alone in the hanger, small and sleek, its metallic surface reflecting their own expressions back at them. Revan saw her own face half-hidden by goggles, the dyed black hair, mouth set in a thin line, no expression at all. Next to her, Korrie and Ma--Moll--were beaming. In the sling on Moll's hip, Abasen’s eyes were as wide as thisla globes.

“Gah!” he crowed, pointing at the ship.

“That’s not Republic salvage,” Revan said quietly. "It isn't from Kuat." But it was beautiful. Lines like a song. Polla Organa--the real one--would have loved the design--and been scared to hell of its purpose.

“No?” The Devaronian’s voice sharpened. “Crashed here during the Revan invasion, my boss said, I just assumed….”

“It is based on a Republic design. Loosely. I-I think.” Some long-hidden memory--her own, or just Polla Organa’s exhaustive knowledge of ship architecture. This ship was little more than a modified snub: cabin big enough for two seats fore and two aft, with a small galley below, plugged up against its hyperdrive. Four sets of turrets. Torpedo bays on the aft. One had been used, Revan noted. The other looked intact. “Originally… based on a Republic design, but it…”

It felt like something in the Force. There was no other way to describe it. Familiar.

She could fly it. It would practically fly itself.

“What do you mean, Pollie?”

Molla was overdoing it, Revan thought. All this mother and daughter stuff. She appreciated the effort, but it just made leaving Korrie harder. Leaving them both harder.

“Is it Sith, Mother?” Korrie still sounded like he belonged in an Eg Academy. Molla would have to work with him, she’d promised, and when Jasp came back--

XXX

“I could comm him for you. I could tell him to come home.”

“You’ve done enough!” Moll’s voice softened. “Leave him, dearie. When he gets tired of looking for that silly Sith world, he’ll come home on his own.” She paused. “Did you figure out how to find it yourself?”

“Yes,” Revan lied.

Fairly simple. All I need to do is find a Sith.

XXX

“Korrie,” Revan frowned, glancing at Molla. “Don’t curse.”

Polla’s mother snorted.

“Of course it’s not Sith!” the Devaronian sounded horrified. “Maybe one of the… one of the Republic’s more… experimental models. I was… I was a tech, you know. I mean… in Fleet.”

“On The Ascendant?” But Revan knew the answer without asking. She smiled to put the woman at ease, reinforcing the sentiment with the Force.

I am no threat. There is no danger here. I do not look at all familiar. You will give us this ship for a very good price.

“Yes, The Ascendant,” the woman agreed. “I was… on this ship. From the… Ascendant. We… we crashed here.”

“I’ll take it,” Revan told her. “Do you still have the nav logs?”

Fear warred with artificial calm on the woman’s horned face. “No. We--I wiped them. When we… we left.”

Frack. But no matter.

Revan walked over and placed her hand on the warbird’s cold, metal surface, reaching under the nose to find the embossed runes, stamped in Aurebesh—and Ancient Sith.
Pinion V

Property of the Imperial Aleema.
"Stay here," Zaalbar told the hairless cub. In truth, Polla Organa was older than Mission, but she seemed much less wise than his foster daughter had been-less wise, even, than Polla Revan had seemed on their first meeting.

"What?" Polla Revan frowned furless at him, all pale lips and dull teeth. "I'm sorry, I didn't get that."

"Stay," Zaalbar repeated, patting the bark of the tree. "Stay here. I will scout."

"Here?" Polla Organa's head tilted, and her face furrowed like bark. Obviously, she was trying to understand. "I know this is a tree."

Zaalbar took one of her cold arms and lifted it carefully with his paw.

"What are you trying to say?" She resisted, stiffening and splaying her limbs until he had to cup his other arm around her to keep her in the tree.

"Stay," he growled again, pushing her into the bark.

Like a cub learning to climb, she instinctively grabbed hold of the trunk and he pulled back, leaving her splayed on the branch.

"Where are you going?" She squeaked when alarmed, unlike Polla Revan, who growled and fought.

Zaalbar had already dropped down several meters, to the trunk of the tree's twin-root. "Stay," he repeated, holding up one paw. He spoke simply, as he would to a cub. "I scout." He barked the words and motioned at the same time, wishing the Mission-ghost was here to translate. But she had refused to leave-for reasons he was still trying to understand. "I will bring back food for us. And garments for you, if I can find them."

"Food," she called back. "I got that one! Wait! Please! Don't leave-"

Zaalbar ignored the rest of her plaintive cries the same way a creche-mother would ignore a Wookiee infant's wails the first time they were set in tree-sense. Only in departing could he assist her.

Xxx

"Don't leave," Polla whispered. But the Wookiee was already obscured by the branches below. How far were they from the ground? She looked down again.

Frack. At least thirty meters. The howls had stopped, that was something. And up this high, all the insects that had been biting her were gone.

Zaalbar's gonna come back. He's Carth's friend. He's a Star Forge hero. He's not gonna leave me here!
They didn't have trees this tall on Deralia. It wasn't this muggy on Deralia either. The climate reminded Polla of the time she'd had to land for repairs in the Kyrr swamp. Like the air was as full of water as the fracking ground. There had been giant snakes too. She shivered, adjusting herself against the branch and the trunk so that she was relatively braced. Something chirruped and something else made a strange clattering sound. She fumbled for the blaster in her boot and took it out, checking the delicate scope for damage.

At least snakes can't climb trees. She frowned at the dizzying distance to the ground again.

They couldn't. Right?

Xxx

They left the meeting together, veering away from the Fleet officers, three abreast, as if the former Sith Yuthura Ban was an equal. As if they were all in accord. A pleasant facade, Kavar thought, for as long as it could last.

It took half a block before Vrook Lamar spoke.

"We don't know their intent. In the Jedi Temple, neither my niece nor Malak harmed anyone-"

"Save each other," Kavar replied. He had seen the footage from Azen's surveillance archives.

"Save each other," Vrook echoed grudgingly.

"Dustil and Mekel may help," Yuthura Ban interjected. "They may still save each other-and others. And the Order needs strength, doesn't it?"

"There is no Order." Even with decades of training, Kavar couldn't keep the bitterness from his voice. All those weeks going over the field reports from Zez and Lonna. Lines of the dead. Kidnapped Padawans. Missing masters. Enclaves gone dark--and it had all happened so quickly. First the plague, and now the disappearances. Anger and frustration warred with disgust in Kavar's heart. At this moment, he felt himself to be the very antithesis of Jedi serenity. "Strength is the last thing we need. It attracts him. The Force makes the Beast stronger."

They were walking along a public plaza. There had been a time when Kavar Vakla would have been more circumspect. But that time had passed.

"Him." Yuthura nodded slowly. "You mean the real threat. Arkan."

"He has a ship." Kavar had to be careful. "We... we... believe he has a ship. A Republic hulk. Salvage. You heard Cein and Sand talking about the ghost ship in Mid-Rim?"

"Do we know that is him? Them? Arkan and... and Oerin Lin?"

"And Sunrider?" Vrook pressed.

Now that her influence was gone, all of the remaining masters were painfully aware of how badly they had been tricked. Kavar among them. Vima blinded us. Deliberately. And all that has come to pass since... was it always her? Was it never Revan and Malak at all? Was it Darth Traya all along?

*If so, good riddance. "Not her." Kavar shook his head. "She has been removed."

"You sound sure," Yuthura murmured.
"The same sources that told me about the Sith Lords' ship," he admitted, "also told me of Vima Sunrider's end." If they wanted to be suspicious of his motives, it would only help at this juncture.

"Again. You sound rather…" Padawan Ban seemed to be searching for the right word. "Certain. Certain about these Sith Lords. Certain about their ship. Certain about Darth Traya, the former Vima Sunrider."

Kavar Vakla checked his chron. "I am." He smiled at them both, grimly. "Now, if you'll excuse me, I have an appointment."

"We'll talk later," Master Vrook ground out. From his expression, his thoughts were kilometers away, already in the hospital room with his son.

"Of course." Kavar nodded, and walked away from them, in the opposite direction required. It wasn't until he sensed their presences move out of sight in the Force that he broke into a Force-enhanced run to his waiting vehicle.

Xxx

His mother had been a dancer: a city girl, pretty enough to attract a Beast-Lord's eye for Summer Festival. Kavar Vakla had been a bastard, given to Palace service as those with aptitude were.

His cousins had been nobles, with golden circlets on their heads. When his talent outstripped theirs, Kavar was sent to Jedi. A tale as old as Iziz, in one form or another. Although, long ago, Beast-riders shipped to Sith worlds instead. Arkan had followed, late for training but capable, assigned to Dantooine, while Kavar was trained on Lothal.

It wasn't until they were both grown that they met again. It wasn't until the Mandalorians attacked Dxun that they fought together. It wasn't until their victory that they became friends.

Friendship did not last. Kavar had withdrawn from conflict, and Davad had followed Revan. Worshiped her, if truth be told; but by that point, Kavar was too much of a Jedi Master to tell unnecessary truths to anyone.

A week ago his commlink had chimed with an old palace cipher—one they'd used as children to command servants to hide sweets in the stables and amidst couch cushions. The number on the other end was that of the Palace Cook.

In truth, Cook had been more of a mother to him than his own dancing one; and he'd thought her concern was something pedestrian and unfortunate: an illness, a request for credits; but when he'd commed back, her face was pale even in the holo, and all three of her chins quivered in fear.

"H-he said to call him," she whispered. "The man said. He had a note. But the man said. Call him at this time, or-or…else."

"What man?"

Cook shook her head and trembled, holding up the slip of plimsi.

Davad had signed his name "Knight Arkan," as if that was a title a creature that caused so much death had any right to use.

Kavar had called, as requested, only to be greeted by a huddled gray man with sunken cheeks and hands that shook. The man asked his name, then went to fetch his master.
The white mask the black-robed man wore was stippled, shaped roughly like a drexl's skull. Hooded and cloaked, the man could have been anyone, but Kavar recognized the signet ring on one hand, twin to the one Kavar had lost in a drawer long ago when he put aside such childish things as heritage and royalty.

But for Arkan, the man who should have been King, perhaps symbols meant more.

The mask nodded at him slowly, then bent and scribbled something on a datapad.

The sunken man bent down peering at it. "H-he says..." the ringed hand swatted lazily, like the claw of a boma admonishing its young; and the sunken man cringed, whimpering like a whipped kath.

Now there were claw marks on the sunken man's cheek, even though Davad's hands remained unchanged.

"S-sorry. I'm so sorry. M-master." The sunken man groveled, and the mask lifted his man's hand, pointing at something the other held.

The sunken man held up a sign. A sign with two words.

Kill me.

"H-he means him," the sunken man whispered. "Not me, please. I-I have a family."

The hooded figure removed its mask, nodding slowly.

Kavar's breath caught in his throat. Even across light years, even after all of his training, he felt his gut tighten with primal fear.

He swallowed. "How?"

The mask looked at the sunken man, and the sunken man began to speak.

Xxx

"You don't trust him," Yuthura sounded surprised, as they watched Master Kavar walk away across the platform.

"Do you, Yuthura Ban?" Vrook trusted her judgment over a member of the Jedi Council. At some point, Vrook was going to have to come to terms with why that was. "We're going to the hospital. Immediately."

She nodded in agreement. "I trust Master Vakla's intent. But the Jedi in that room came to an accord with the Fleet without us. I must wonder... why? And why include us in their cabal after the fact?"

"Master Loanin said they want to use the Fleet to destroy Davad Arkan, but the Fleet officers want to put an end to Malak." Vrook grimaced. "Azen Loanin thinks like a Senator. He always has. One favor for another. That means they must have a plan to destroy Arkan-"

"And a way to strip the Force from Mekel Jin." Yuthura's headtails flattened. "I... have heard rumors, of course, about how the Force was stripped from Meetra Surik, but I thought only Nomi Sunrider possessed that ability."

"That's the part I don't understand." Vrook's temples throbbed. The Force felt-poised-like air before a storm. "Only Nomi and Vima Sunrider have ever been able to block access to the Force—at least in recent memory. Bastila Shan manifested Battle Meditation, but unique gifts in the Force are so rare. Do they have another Jedi capable of performing such an act?"

"Kavar seemed certain. Loanin as well. And Lydie Korr."

"It could be… a bluff. A trick, for Fleet. How would admirals know, if Malak was gone?"

"I'm sure they have agents on Kaas." Yuthura's eyes were wide and guileless. "Or they will soon, now that the Racharn has given us all maps."

"Perhaps too easily given." Vrook muttered. He quickened his steps, heading for the hover taxi stand. "Those maps. Can we trust them?"

"We will move Mekel." From the softness in Ban's voice, she must be trying to comfort him. "Tonight. Is there a secure location?"

"Not his mother's. Offworld, perhaps. I have some contacts at the new settlement on Dantooine. Now that the Jedi have fled—"

"I thought Jedi had begun to rebuild that enclave after Malak's attack."

"They're all gone." Difficult to admit, even to a former Sith, the depth of the Order's failure to protect its own. "In hiding, most of them. He would be safe on Khoonda, on Dantooine—or in the sublevels of Nar Shaddaa…"

"Mekel is familiar with Nar. We used to go on recruiting field trips there." She flashed him a polite smile as if they were still strangers.

Vrook approached the waiting cab, and its door swung up. He stood aside and let Yuthura enter first before settling down beside her. "What is he like, my son?"

The directness of the question seemed to unsettle her, but only for a moment. "Promising. Loyal to his allies. Talented. He has a precision with the Force that I've rarely seen. Not raw strength—"

"But he is strong." Even as he argued, Vrook felt the futility. The absurdity, of trying to be proud of a life that had nothing to do with him. To imagine their lives differently—

If I hadn't been in charge of my niece, would I have noticed Mekel Jin?

Grimacing, he punched in the hospital coordinates.

"Stronger now," Yuthura said. "But—"

"But that's because of the bond, what you did to them."

"It kept them alive," she murmured.

"But you said… before… you said that if one dies, so will the other." He should care for them equally, as he should care for all sentients, but suddenly Vrook found he did not.

"Yes. I think so. The original Thulian Net was undone in such a way."

"Then… what Kavar proposes could keep Mekel alive."

"And doom Dustil Onasi," Yuthura said. "Would Dustil still retain the Force? If that mockery of an
"As a Jedi, I should care equally for both," Vrook paused, admitting the uncomfortable truth. "But Mekel-"

"-is more my son than yours," she snapped. Her lekku wrapped defensively. "I trained him for years. I nurtured his potential. I-

"You taught him to kill!"

Yuthura laughed. "No. He had learned that long before. We taught him to kill efficiently, for a cause."

Unquiet responses warred in Vrook's head; but then he remembered the footage of his niece that Vandar had shown him, going through the Forms with her first saber. Are we so different, we Jedi?

It was a dangerous line of reasoning, a line he hadn't come close to since Exar Kun's call to arms, the time the Jedi had faced their own: gone gray, and strange, and mad.

Yes. We are different from the Sith because we must be. We do not kill our prisoners, if possible.

We stood by and let my mindwiped niece cut her way through five planets. Even when she found peaceful solutions they ended in blood. We stood by and let her fall again for the chance to see the Star Forge's shields lowered, a chance to destroy it-

For the greater good.

"I will not sacrifice my son for the greater good," he snapped. "Not again."

"Then let's hurry," Yuthura murmured. "I don't trust Kavar Vakla either."

Xxx

It was a delicate rope that Kavar and Azen walked now: one orchestrated by chance, with its roots in subterfuge and denial, and with so much at stake.

Vrook had let emotion cloud his judgment. Of course, he had, because the man was compromised by attachment. Quite obviously compromised. He had left the meeting muttering darkly, oblivious to the frowns of their Fleet officers and his allies.

Overlooking, of course, the fundamental truth that every tactician knows. Never tell anyone your intentions... until your plan is too late to be stopped.

Kavar Vakla hastened his steps towards the hospital, pausing only to type in his comm:

Experiment worked. Do it now.

Xxx

Nothing in Carth's life: not a military education, pilot training, battle experience, or even the mad, near-mercenary quest to find the Star Forge had prepared him for this-this mad Emperor's hunt, where half the sents had red, glowing eyes and the other half were just crazy Force users.

Xxx

"Try not to offend anyone," that bastard Liyo had said. "Do not speak or move. You are merely part of the display. If his Luminescence needs you, he will grace you with his light."

"Does he do it to you?" Carth asked bluntly. The costume he was supposed to wear lay on the bed between them. It appeared to consist of a metal vest that looked suspiciously short, and a gold drape of cloth. A skirt? A cloak? Who the hell knew with this crowd? "Does he come into your mind too?"

Something flickered in the Zeltron's eyes. "Sadly, I cannot be so blessed. I was infected with the Starfire plague."

"And that stops it, huh?"

"She was quite defiant, in her time, your wife." The Zeltron shrugged. "Would you like assistance dressing for the hunt?"

Xxx

They'd chained Carth to the damn speeder, stuck a droid at the controls, and then pretty much ignored him. They had dozens of slavering, needle-toothed hounds that circled the hunting party, howling like they were out of some kind of nightmare. When the beasts caught the scent, the entire elaborate and insane mob went careening off after them. Carth tried to remind himself of Zaalbar's own hunting prowess, Mission's smarts, Polla's fearlessness, and his son's-

I must hope that Malak can keep Dustil safe. He's been here before; he must have a plan!

Hope died when Carth's speeder careened around the corner and nearly crashed into a tree. In front of him, the Sith Emperor's main body rode on a beast three times the size of any other. And before them stood Carth's son, standing with a lit saber, teeth bared like he was a beast himself. Watching the man fight-watching the man dispatch a monster that looked like the things that had almost killed them on Korriban-Carth felt like he had never known his son at all.

That feeling only increased as the carnage continued. Until finally, the end, and Tenebrae's goons escorted Dustil to the speeder, chaining him beside Carth. Carth had been so busy staring at Dustil; he hadn't even seen Mission, shields sparking off her dome. She rolled forward, and more goons placed her in the back of the speeder. Taking out that beast seemed to have taken a lot out of his son, but it was harder to tell with droids.

[Totality fine?] Carth whistled. In machine language 'fine' meant operational. Totality meant all of them. Polla and Zaalbar too.

[Running] she warbled back. [Your subprogram is malfunctioning.]

It only took Carth a second to realize: of course, she meant Dustil.

[On it], he clucked back.

When her lights flashed an affirmative, it didn't tell him anything. Why hadn't she gone with Zaalbar and Polla? He'd seen her move pretty fast, and she was the only be who spoke the damned Sith language. How could Polla and Zaal be okay without it?

Trust the Wookiee; he reminded himself. Jungle is his kind of place. He'll keep them both safe. And Polla's a great shot. She can put a hole in anything that gets close-

Dustil's head fell forward. His breath hitched painfully in a way that made Carth jump, pull at his chains, elbow his son in the side.
"Son?" he whispered. Half question. Are you my son or are you, Malak?

Dustil's eyes were so dark that he couldn't even be sure. "Dads." A slight frown. "Dad. I mean."

"I'd hug you, but…." He tried to make it a joke. At least they'd loaded Mission in behind them, without even asking. Carth glanced back at her and smiled slightly. Still no sign of Polla and Zaalbar. He could only hope that meant they were safe.

"It's okay." Dustil's gaze skittered past him as if the boy was light years away.

"Are you… you're you?" Hell of a thing to have to ask your own son.

"I'm…" Dustil's gaze turned back to him, with a stranger's expression on his face. "It's complicated. Yes."

Malak, you lying bastard. Sick envy warred with anger in Carth's gut. And Revan's coming here remembering you and not me. He thought-an ugly thought-that he could stand to lose his wife, but to lose Dustil again? To the man who had bombed Telos? The man who was a fracking Sith on a Sith planet?

No. Face facts, Onasi. If it's really them now? If it's going to be them, you know what you have to do. Goes way beyond being jilted. This is Revan and Malak we're talking about. Revan and Malak and the Sith-

"Complicated?" Mission chirped. "No poo doo! You have no idea how hard I've worked, trying to get an outside line to Kashyyyk!"

Beside him, Dustil slumped forward again, head almost touching his chin.

"Dustil?" All he could do was nudge his son's ribs with his chains. When there was no response, Carth gritted his teeth. "Malak?"

He looked up to see one of Tenebrae's goons approaching with a slim metal band he knew know was a Force-blocking disruptor.

Dustil's head lifted, and his eyes snapped open. "No." A deeper voice than his son's. Colder. "That is not necessary."

Xxx

Malak had destroyed their pathetic listening device with a twist of the Force. Now, the three of them surged uneasily between worlds: circling closer to Master Klee on Coruscant; while still chained like a beast on Kaas.

Mekel Jin's body was still weakened by injury, but collectively, their command of the Force was stronger than Klee's. Given everything that had come to pass, Malak was forced to agree with Onasi and Jin's assessment: Master Klee had outlived any usefulness, and they were not to be pawns, subject to some unknown experiment.

He curled Jin's fingers, reveling in the dark energy that sprang from their hand, encircling the Eosian with an ichor of darkness, which caused the man's breath to shake, his body to falter.

It would only be more pleasurable if the man fought back, instead of smiling.

"Y-you don't … want to do this, Malak." Voice a harsh whisper, as Malak forced more breath from
"We all want to do this." Dustil. The anger at seeing his father trussed and tied was more than he could stand. All of it lashed across worlds like an ice storm. For a moment, the strength reminded Malak uncannily of his wife.

"Just fracking die." Jin was the weakest, for all his potential as a child. But his strength had joined to theirs and his hand lashed out with an invisible fist knocking Klee backward. "We are so fracking sick of this banthashi-

The door slid open behind them.

Malak turned in a heartbeat, nerves already screaming a warning. The Force had been contained, strung between the only two bodies in the room, as their strength overcame Klee's pathetic attempts to counter, but now-

Now, there was a third man in the room. And this third-

The third man shambled in, passing the doorway, limbs moving stiffly, wearing little more than tattered rags, one eye white and blinded, loose in its socket, fragments of bone pulling through the skin all over his body.

Their eyes widened at the sight of a walking corpse.

It was Mekel who recognized him, taking the forefront offensive in terror: the careful focus of rage he had reserved for Klee spouting out, now clumsy and diffused. The dead man batted it away like mist.

"Oerin? Oerin Lin?"

"Mekel Jin." The man's teeth were immaculately white and straight, but one was missing in his smile.

He's strong. Mekel shrank back in fear, almost losing himself in Onasi as if the Telosian's raw fury could protect them. *He's strong, and he's already dead. How can he be walking if he's already dead? He's going to fracking kill us-

Imbeciles! Malak gathered the lightning, anger fueling a storm around them. Their hospital gown fluttered, and then tore. Behind them, a crunch of metal. He knew without looking they'd stripped the bed's bolting from the floor, sending it crashing across the room, pinning the still-living Klee to the wall. At least, for the moment.

Their lightning electrified the dead man in front of them, dancing across skin and bone. The air stank like burning flesh, but the flames themselves guttered and died.

Somewhere in the distance, alarms rang.

We cannot kill what is already dead. But we must stop him.

Find an exit. We need to get the frack out of here!

Jin again. Malak supposed the boy's craven nature had kept him alive this long, but it was a disappointment. *No. We are stronger. We can rip his body apart-

Oh, I tried that. Several times. Oerin Lin's voice infected their thoughts with the ease of a vibroknife through flesh. His voice in their head was sharp as an edge itself. My body knits back. See? Still smoldering, he reached up to his bare chest and pulled a hank of rotting skin away. When he dropped it, the skin almost immediately flew back into place. "Pity the Force isn't more precise. Pieces do go missing from time to time. I fear I've quite lost my beauty."

"You want to kill Master Klee?" Mekel again, fighting hard for control. Foolish boys. Both of them. This was beyond them. This was a horror such as Malak had never seen—not since... since Zioist—

Let me, he commanded. You have no chance against the Emperor and this monster.

Leave him alone! Onasi, with that raw power, pushing Malak to the side as if he was a discarded relic.

XXX

For a disorienting moment, it was Carth Onasi beside Malak in a hovercar, both of their hands chained, watching someone with a neural disruptor advance—

"No," he commanded the servant quickly. "That is not necessary. I will not resist."

"Good behavior on this world?" Tenebrae was possessing a matched pair of purebloods before him. "You seem distracted, Lord Malak. Is there something I should know? Shall we continue this discussion on Coruscant?"

"No." Much pleasure as it would give me to kill Klee while he is possessed by you.

XXX

"Hello?" A ruined hand waved in front of Mekel's eyes, and the boy lunged for it, growling with blind rage.

Lin laughed, dancing back. "There you are, Jin. I'm doing you a favor."

"You can't kill us." The stitches had torn again, they dodged back, all together now. "You can't fracking kill us because we're stronger than you—you're fracking dead—"

"Millifar," the dead man murmured. "She would set her braids for you, Jin. In a better world, we could have both been husbands."

What?

It's not like—

Shut up, Mekk.

Both of them were still young enough to react. The division of love, Malak had often thought, was rarely on balanced scales; and when it was, it did not last.

Even for us, Red. Sheris. Arkan. Now this pilot of yours—

Would it be different now? Their son was safe, (safe or dead or she would not come), and when she returned here, (in either body or... in both?) the power of Kaas would only strengthen their bond.

Xxx
"Dustil?" His son's eyes had rolled back into his head, showing only slivers of white. His body jerked. Carth twisted in his seat, bringing his hands up, just enough to shake his son's shoulder. "Dustil! Snap out of it!"

The boy blinked, eyes focusing on him with a stranger's gaze.

The speeder continued along the path, following the herd of beasts and Sith like it was one itself.

Xxx

"Dustil?" The obstacle to Malak's potential happiness shook the boy's shoulder with chained hands. Hard. "Dustil! Snap out of it."

"Chill the frack out, Dads." Mekel answered, shoved beside Malak, blinking suddenly, as if the two boys had accidentally switched bodies. "I'm fine, just-just a little shaky. It's..." he took a ragged breath. "It's complicated. Dads."

Accidental? Or Dustil forced him out as well as me?

And then Malak knew that was exactly what Dustil had done.

XXX

Fool! He followed the bond across space again, finding Dustil fully in control, Force burning through Jin's body like a dark tide.

Oerin's body lay twisted on the floor, the head nearly severed from the neck, and the Coruscanti's teeth bared in a feral smile that Malak could feel, triumph ratcheting through his limbs, sweet as release. "Fracking asshole."

Somewhere in the distance, an alarm sounded again, as if the Senate-bribed wing of this hospital had finally noticed something amiss.

"Magnificent! Is this what's keeping you so quiet? I wish you were mine," chuckled another voice.

From the floor, behind the bed's wreckage, Master Klee rose, eyes glowing like pits of hell with Tenebrae's possession. "I could make you my Hound, boy. Would you like to be a Hound?"

"I'd like you to frack off," Dustil muttered, and held out his hand. The saber on Klee's belt rattled but held firm.

"No," Tenebrae murmured. "Not so easily. In time, you could have been great, a true triumvirate; but I am not as easily dispatched as your walking corpse-"

A stir, almost noiseless behind them. The clapping noise Oerin Lin's hands made when they met sounded like dry leaves.

"They call Tenebrae the deathless," Malak muttered, without turning the boy's head. "Did you know that, Lin? If they call him deathless, what will they call you?"

"Master? The scion of the Sunriders?" The Mandalorian chuckled. "I don't care."

He paused. "Goodbye, Malak."

Goodbye? Even as a child, Lin, your sense of humor was peculiar. "Is that supposed to be some kind of ja-"
"Chill the frack out, Dads," his son said. As if Carth could be calm when his son was twitching like a spice addict coming down from a bender, half unresponsive, and calling him 'dads' with a Coruscanti accent.

"Who am I speaking to?" Carth demanded. "Right now. Who are you?"

"Mekel," his son's mouth answered. "Dustil, he went back to Coruscant. He's going to kill that fracking asshole. Malak too. They-he did. He-"

The world dimmed and died. Color left suddenly, as it had before, the speeder, Captain Onasi, all of it gone. Gravity held Mekel down against a duraplex floor, pinning him with invisible weights. Trapped between two Sith Lords, he looked for the fracking ysalamiri to kill.

Fool me once, frack you. Fool me twice, and I'm a fracking idiot-Dustil-

No use screaming for his bondmate. This was temporary; now that Mekel knew what to look for, how it was done. Mekel scrambled to his feet, trying to get a wall to his back, ending up between the Sith Lords, behind his bed's tragedy, remnants of today's lunch still there: a half-step goreapple, a plasticore spork-

"Millifar," Oerin Lin repeated. "She would set her braids for you if you asked, Jin."

Mekel gritted his teeth and imagined stabbing the dead man with the spork. "Hah hah." He scrambled to his feet slowly. The world was full of lead. "Where the frack is it?"

"Where is what?" The Mandalorian sounded amused.

"Sunrider," Tenebrae mused. "Why is that name so familiar?"

The door behind the twisted ruins of Mekel's bed slid on its hinges. There was a sudden snap-hiss and then a blue particle blade cut through its surface.

Master Kavar Vakla stepped into the breach, clicking off the saber. Mekel sighed with relief when he saw the man was carrying what looked like an entire fracking ysalamiri bouquet in his hands. It would take forever to crush them one-by-one, so he looked around for something heavy.

"Ah." Klee's voice had changed, his eyes went back to normal again. Kavar handed him two of the creatures and set the rest down on the floor, eyes never leaving Mekel, eyeing him clinically, like maybe this had been his fracking experiment all along.

Across the room, Oerin Lin coughed. "If this is betrayal, Vakla, I have to tell you it won't work. Your null field is quite limited."

"Not betrayal." Kavar paused. "The coordinates you requested are here." He tossed a chip on the air. Above Mekel's head, it froze, hovering, as if the Force was back, but the ysalamiri were still there-

Acting on instinct, Mekel dove for it, but the chip snapped into Oerin Lin's hand faster than he could move.

He's using the Force. Lin's still using the Force. But the ysalamiri are here!
"They only affect the living?" Mekel tried to puzzle it out. Klee's eyes were a normal brown again. "Ysalamiri only affect the living, right? That's why Lin can use the Force? So what the frack are you doing? Is this some kind of... conspiracy?"

"No." Oerin said. "And yes, yes it is. Is there a scanner I can use to check this information, Master Vakla?"

"I gave my word," Kavar murmured. "Jump points to Sith space, and codes for entry. You should be able to travel unquestioned."

Oerin coughed, a horrible, rattling sound. "You gave your word to your cousin, and he has so few of them."

"He can write. Our communication was quite clear."

"You know how Davad relayed it to me?" Oerin Lin's chuckle wheezed as if his chest was broken. "Take Jin Force. Feed me Sith. Map. Cousin Promise. It took an age to sort that out enough to comm you back."

"I did leave a number," Kavar said. "And again, Davad called me first." He paused. "Thank you for ridding us of Malak."

"Thank you?" A dawning horror crept into Mekel's gut.

_Take Jin Force. But sents don't just do that. You can't just do that. No one can just fracking do that-

Xxx

"And then Nomi Sunrider stripped the Force from Ulic Qel-Droma." Yuthura Ban shrugged. "Instead of giving him a merciful death, the Jedi sentenced the man to exile for his crimes against them. Are there any questions?"

Lashowe Devry raised her hand. Of course, she did. Fracking Sith-noser. "How?"

"How?" Master Ban smiled thinly. "What an original question. Would anyone care to answer?"

Mekel shot a glance at Selene, who could probably use the prestige, but Telos's girl just looked blank.

"Because she was a Sunrider and magic," Telos muttered under his breath. "Mekk, you want to come to Dreshd' with us later?"

"Shhh," he muttered, keeping his eyes on Ban. The thing about these classes, he'd learned, was it wasn't whatever fracked-up history they were talking about that was the point: maybe this whole Force-stripping banthashit was actually a metaphor. A cautionary tale about what happened when you overreached your own personal Sith Lord and Master.

Mekel had noticed a long time ago that the Sith talked a good game about aspiring to be top rancor. But smart Sith seemed to focus on staying alive.

Xxx

"Put it back," Mekel whispered. The words were dull in his ears. The world was… gray. He felt his voice crack like a kid's, eyes suddenly swimming in tears. Like a baby. Like it hurt. "Fracking put it back. Now."

"Ah." Oerin shrugged. "I think Mekel here begins to see. I should go."

"Wise," Kavar said. "I'm sure you have places to be. Will you be going to Sith space immediately, or-?"

"Didn't Nihilus tell you?" Oerin shrugged, edging around the wall of the room, as Kavar walked to the center, trailed by Klee. They moved with the assurance of sents who had figured out fracking ysalamiri fields to the centimeter, while Mekel just stood there like a mark. "I thought you were so close."

"Put it back!" Dustil. Loss screamed through Mekel, but it did nothing. He willed the Force to come back, willed lightning to spark from his hands, Vakla's saber to fly into his grip, but nothing. Nothing. 'Please. I-I'll do anything. I'll follow you. I'll do anything you want just… please!"

"Mother didn't beg," Oerin said, more to Vakla and Klee than Mekel. "I wasn't expecting tears from Jin." His dull eyes appraised Mekel like he was a slab on the blocks back home. "Does it hurt, losing the Force? It can't hurt as much as dying."

"No." But it did feel like all the gravity in the world was pushing down on him. Like he'd lost half of himself.

What if Dustil's dead? Or Malak takes him for good? What if we never-what if I never know? What if this is it. This is fracking it? I don't have the Force, what the frack am I supposed to do-

"Live," Oerin Lin snapped. "You're supposed to live. Show some gratitude, Jin. I could have just killed you."

Even without the Force, rage still burned, igniting a dangerous bravado. "Get out," Mekel snarled at all of them. "Get… get the frack out. Now." Even with the stitches torn he felt strong suddenly, or maybe it was just that his anger had left him too numb to feel anything at all. "Get the frack out of here!"

"Goodbye, Jin." The back of Lin's skull was a mess of peeling skin and tufts of dry, yellow hair. His back was just as scarred and burned. "I hope we don't meet again. Nihilus and I have… an appointment in Sith space. Keep Millifar safe-and the rest of our people."

Our people. The frack? "Frack you!" Mekel yelled at his departing back, before turning to Klee and Kavar, both holding ysalamiri like fracking flowers, staring at him like he was a science experiment. "Frack you and frack them!"

"He shouldn't be alone," Klee said to Kavar.

"Can you find out what the Emperor thinks about the loss of Malak?" Kavar sounded like he didn't give a shit.

Klee nodded. "Eventually. I believe you interrupted him as realization was only beginning to dawn. One of the other cells will pass word to me, and then I will tell you-as per our arrangement."

"Of course." Kavar nodded back. He glanced behind him. "Master Vrook and Yuthura Ban will be here soon. Oerin's minor diversion was merely that."

"Diversion?" Klee frowned. "Careful with that alliance."
"As much as I can be, I am." Kavar smiled sadly. "It will not be for long."

Mekel looked around the room for a decent weapon. It was true, he didn't have the Force, but neither did they as long as they stood in the ysalamiri field.

XXX

There was no warning. Even with all of her training.

One moment, Yuthura and Vrook were ascending the stairs in the hospital's great hall: a vast, curving edifice that seemed to float in mid-air. The staircase was as grandiose and impractical as the rest of this gilded planet. In the next moment, only a whisper of air saved her right arm from being severed. The masked assassin appeared as she turned, phasing in as his stealth generator blipped out-the victim of her first line of defense.

A clever Sith can debilitate all mechanical shielding with a simple ionic disruption, before their opponent is even aware they have lost the advantage.

Yuthura backflipped back, noting, as the Force slowed everything to an abstract slowness, that Vrook was similarly beset by two other masked figures.

Shadows. I haven't seen their like since Revan's time. Are they hers? Would she send them after us?

Vrook was beset by two, and as Yuthura landed she met her own second, her saber hand extended, weapon ignited, taking off the woman's arm at the joint. The figure staggered back, but there was a gun in her offhand, aiming to fire. Yuthura deflected as best she could, but she felt the plasma bolt sear the side of her t'chin, and bit back the cry of pain.

Make it useful. A twist of her hand should have disabled the woman's gun, broken her wrist, but the Force rippled around her instead. The armor. They're shielded. They truly are shadows.

Yuthura felt, rather than saw, Vrook land beside her, puffing slightly with the exertion of his own Force leap.

"Out of practice, old man?" She kept her voice light, teasing, using it to lull the shadows closer. One of them phased out again, vanishing from the Force and vision entirely. She was not pleased that they could do that—that was new, she had seen no one do that, not since-

Manaan. Some of the Sith there could hide. We lost Willit and Finrit before we discovered their camp in the second storeroom....

"I can keep up," Vrook raised an eyebrow. "You're hurt."

"One vanished," she murmured, flicking the injured lekku. "Have a care."

They turned, each keeping the other at their back. "Two, he muttered. "And I thought I sensed… another. For a moment, but then...."

"There are more." More premonition, than absolute knowledge. Her eyes swept the chamber. Below them, clusters of sentients huddled against the walls. Civilians, all. There was no sign of CoruSec, or any security at all. Above-

Yuthura glanced up. Above, for a moment, an entire line of masked figures, flickered into view and then vanished again.
"Mekel," she murmured. "Are they here for him?"

Vrook's mouth tightened. "If they are, we are already too late."

XXX

"The controls have an unusual configuration," the Devaronian told Revan, as they both settled in the pilot and co-pilot's chairs for the ship's test drive. "Much more complicated than a smuggler's rig. You have to adjust the intake ratios, or you'll burn too-"

Revan had already pitched the throttle and punched the footpad, sending them up in an arcing climb into Deralia's windy skies.

"-fast." The woman coughed. "You're going too fast."

The gyro stabilizers buzzed, and Revan moved her hand to adjust them; but picked wrong, and the Pinion lurched, almost flipping over in the sky. Her stomach lurched too, as if in sympathy.

"No." The Devaronian flicked the switch and took control. The ship stabilized, flying true.

"Sorry, I'm a bit out of practice."

"Haven't flown since the war?" The Devaronians name was Nyla. Her tone was casual, but there was nothing casual in the question—or in the Force.

"Not… nothing like this," The flight helmet sat strangely on Revan's head, a little too large.

"Of course not." Nyla's voice was wry. "You were Republic."

"Originally." Revan stared straight ahead. "Same as you." She wasn't sure why she was taking this risk, admitting anything, except-curiosity nagged her—as well as a certain icy detachment. If I betray myself, we are alone. I can always make her forget, or—

Her eyes noted the ejecting apparatus on the side of each seat.

"Which detail you run with?" The woman's features were hidden under the flight helmet, just like Revan's own. Her voice was deceptively casual.

Detail? Is that some kind of fracking rank? Polla's smuggler memories offered no clue. "I was… I was on the Leviathan." Distract. Get more information. "I suppose you were on the Aleema. So the Pinion was your ship?"

"Our ship." Nyla's voice was fierce. "Karen didn't make the landing. Sinto was on the bridge when… you know. He ran pretty fast, got us evacced quick; but he still got a burst of rads. Calamari don't have much tolerance. Tumors got him, last year."

"I'm sorry." Sinto was on the bridge. It's good you weren't, or you might fracking recognize me.

"This ship was his baby. He's the one who fixed her right again. You're going too fast again. You can't burn like this in atmo. Who taught you to fly?"

My Da. My husband. The stabilizers were sluggish, and the ship moved like a ronto compared to the Hawk. Not that she'd had much time, piloting the Hawk-Carth had been possessive of it, ever since Dantooine.

"I'm a good pilot," she argued. "Registered."
"The way you're driving I almost want to ask for a license."

*Frack. "You don't want to ask me for a license."

"Relax! I'm not gonna ask you for a license. I figure you're paying cash for an unregistered gunship for a reason."

"Sorry," Revan was apologizing for more than that, even if it didn't do any good.

"Unless you the one who fired on Aleema's bridge, you have nothing to be sorry about!" The woman snorted. "You look more like a trooper type anyways. Hey, you ever get close to Malak?"

"I was a Shock Trooper." It was one of the few phrases she remembered from those blasted vids. *Married to a Fleet Captain, and I don't even know fracking divisions or ranks or-whatever they're called. I've met generals and admirals, and I don't know what comes below-

"Wow." Apparently, that was impressive, because Nyla lapsed into silence. "You were right in it with the nuts." She turned her head, looking closer at Revan. "You look pretty good for someone who was choobs-in with them. Have all your fingers and everything."

"I was good at my job." She answered with a cockiness she didn't feel at all. "You… you never said what your job was."

"It doesn't matter now."

*It does to me. Any chance you fracking know where Dromund Kaas is? How to kill a Sith Emperor? Any chance you'll recognize me? "I suppose not." Revan moved the yoke to the right, slowly this time, and was pleased that the ship's bank was smooth this time. Below them, the Deralian desert stretched, wide and blasted with canyons.

Nyla coughed. "Where are you going? With the Organas?"

"What?" *Frack! I don't want to kill you. "What do you mean?"

"That woman you're with is Moll Organa. I just did a retrofit for her husband a few weeks back on his old ship. Things a bucket but it'll run forever… is there more trouble? Because of the Revan thing?"

Revan tried to sound calm. "Moll's not my mother, obviously. But we're cousins." *Like everyone on this planet. "She agreed to lend me creds for the ship, but she's not coming with-

"Hey! It's none of my business." Nyla waved her hand. "Didn't mean to upset you. Relax. We all have our pasts, right?"

Revan took a deep breath. "I'm not upset."

"That's your kid, huh?" Was the woman trying to make small talk, or were her words a threat? "Looks just like you."

"Yeah, he's…" mine. I don't want to leave him. Dar'Revan knew that. She counted on it.

"How'd you know?" She abruptly changed the subject, sending the ship back down in a lazy spiral towards groundside. "About me, I mean? How'd you know I was… like you?"

The Devaronian frowned, and leaned across the board, adjusting something on Revan's side before answering. "The way you looked at the ship," she said. "And... I know this sounds strange, but you
Revan remembered the masked figures surrounding Lin in the ruins of the Jedi Temple. "A little."
She tamped her Force awareness down to an ember. You hunted Jedi. For me? And what did I do…
what did I do when you delivered them? A part of her wanted to ask; but that- "We never knew what happened," she ventured. "With the ones you brought back."

The woman laughed. "Nobody did. Who'd want to?"

Revan nodded and brought the ship down for another pass, trying not to notice when the Devaronian winced.

XXX

"Mekel?"

Master Kavar had gone when Mekel was still frozen, eyes scanning the room. Everything looked washed out, dingy. The broken bed. The kolto packs scattered across the floor. The alarm shrilling outside was too loud. He resisted the urge to scream.

"Is he dead? You're part of the Sith Emperor, right? So it's like you're there too. Is Dustil dead?"

"It doesn't work like that." The fracking asshole's voice was oddly gentle.

Great, pity from the loser who did this to us. To me. One of the bed's legs had snapped off. Sharp.
Metal. Pointed. Mekel picked it up. "Get the frack out of my way."

Incredibly, the asshole stepped to one side. Didn't even protest.

Of course. They don't need me now. No Force connection, no Telos. I'm fracking nothing. No one at all.

Kavar hadn't even looked back when he'd left. Just like Lin.

Anger felt different without the Force. It felt useless, and soft, which only infuriated Mekel more.
The door had been fracking cut open with a lightsaber. Where the frack is mine? It was Bastila Shan's.

Just another thing he'd lost. Mekel shoved forward, forcing the Eosian to step backward, him and his stupid fracking ysalamiri.

"I know something of loss," the frackhead who had never been hungry a day in his life told Mekel Jin. "Your sacrifice will not be in vain. I realize the path seems quite dark now, but in time, I hope you will be able to understa-"

His voice broke off as Mekel's first swing crushed his pet on a stick. He raised the metal bar again and smashed it down across the others that Vakla had left on the bedside table. Carelessness, leaving them behind? Or deliberate? Maybe the Force wasn't gone at all. Mekel turned back to Master Klee, noting the lightsaber still at his belt. One of the old-fashioned ones. Not even Force-activated.

Mekel took a deep breath, waiting for the red-eyed Sith to come back, or the Force. Or (preferably)
both.
But nothing happened. Just bland old Klee, staring sadly at him with that fat face. Mekel's side hurt still a little, but a dull ache, less than the feeling of loss. He blinked, eyes suddenly blurring. "Where's your Master? Tenebrae? I need to talk to him now. Not you."

"It doesn't work like that," Klee repeated, a little sadly. "He doesn't always answer our calls."

"Oh." Mekel nodded. There was a meter of space between them. He sidestepped quickly and lifted the pointed spar. Drove it fast as he could straight between the Eosian's brow ridges, the place where their species had only cartilage.

The man's eyes almost seemed to spark—but only for an instant. His mouth opened. His body collapsed, folding in itself like a pointless sack of meat.

The Eosian forebrain is designed for expansion. While their bones are typically harder by fifteen Sergian variations from the Human standard, this expansion shelf presents a unique point of vulnerability uncommon in most species. "Techniques for assassinating known Galactic Species 304. Taught by Master Yuthura Ban."

XXX

A stir, almost noiseless behind them. The clapping noise Oerin Lin's hands made when they met sounded like dry leaves.

"They call Tenebrae the deathless," Malak muttered, without turning the boy's head. "Did you know that, Lin? If they call him deathless, what will they call you?"

"Master? The scion of the Sunriders?" The Mandalorian chuckled. "I don't care."

He paused. "Goodbye, Malak."

Goodbye? Even as a child, Lin, your sense of humor was peculiar. "Is that supposed to be some kind of ja-"

No transition. Not like the last. One moment, Malak was firmly corporeal, aware of the sweat slicking the Jin boy's skin, the breath in his lungs, the dull pain of the healing wound, the Force surrounding all three of them.

And then, the next. Malak stood, surrounded by enormous trees, beneath a canopy of green, deep as her eyes. The illusion of this reality was so complete that he felt the earth beneath his feet. Soft moss. The wind rippling his robes. The air smelled sweet, slightly acrid, like someone was burning brush, not far away. Malak's body felt calm, breaths measured and even. He looked down at a body that was his and not Dustil's. And there was no pain. There was no pain at all.

A soft chuckle from behind him. "Jail? Jay-juma?" The man's voice paused. "Please tell me your last word wasn't 'jaw.'"

"What?" Malak whirled around, hand instinctively resting on his saber. He looked down. His saber. Malak had lost that one in the Eosian bombing when they'd traded its crystal to a jewel thief who had no idea of its value for a ride off the planet.

"Your last words—or rather, word. Missus and I were having a disagreement." A man stepped into view, carrying a baby on his back, just like Malak had carried Malachor, in those times when it had been safe. The man was the color of the trees, the baby, a few shades lighter, with hair as fine and spun as that jeweler's bright wire.

"What?" Ysalamiri. That same, tired trick again. Klee and Vakla are fools if they think they can defeat Lin so easily-

"Your last words. Like I said, Missus and I were trying to figure that one out. She says you had a dewback on Dantooine, named him Jaet. I thought you were saying 'jail. Which is it? Oerin Lin said: 'Goodbye;' and then you said 'Is that supposed to be some kind of ja-'

"Jape. Is this supposed to be some kind of jape?" Malak felt the calm splinter, like thunder in a cloud. 'Is it? I don't have time for games, old man.'

"Jape." The man snorted and rubbed the black stubble of his beard. "Huh. Normal folks would have just said, 'joke,' but I suppose Lord High Senator Darth Malak can't use a four-letter word when a fancier four-letter word would do."

"This is some kind of illusion." Malak's eyes narrowed. "One of Klee's tricks? Tenebrae's? I've died before. This is no afterlife."

Malak turned. It took him a moment to recognize the woman in front of him. Her face was unlined, her hair a soft brown. She was wearing a Jedi Knight's robes, but tattered and stained, and careless, as if they held no weight for her at all.

"Master Jopheena."

"I will be her, yes." The woman nodded. "In this place, I was called Nayama, more often than not. Or sometimes, 'hey you.' Or Mam." She turned her head and the man walked to her, slipping his arm around her waist.

"Mam," the child said quietly and grabbed a fistful of his father's black hair.

"The… the children, they-Onasi and Jin." Strange, the tightness in his chest. "Which one of them died?" First? For wasn't that how it ended? The three of them, trapped together until death. He was strangely glad not to see them here, not to face their accusations.

After so many, to feel guilt for two small lives.

"Only the two?" The man's voice cut in dryly, reading his thoughts apparently as easily as all else. Of course. Because all of this is illusion. Tenebrae. I had dreams before that could have been His-

"It's a start," Jopheena murmured. "A good first step. And they're not dead, my Padawan. Merely lost. Mekel's mind is sealed from you; and Dustil… that boy still has many kilometers to travel before he can sleep."

"She means that literally," the man added. "I believe Tenebrae is moving palaces again in anticipation of Revan's arrival."

"Whose head are you getting that from?" His former master, who had warned him so often about attachments, nudged the man's ribs. "All these years and I still don't know everything about your life."

"It was well-lived," the man murmured. "But you were the best of it."
"And the worst." For a moment her face looked old again.

So it's done. Malak felt a strange and heavy peace. My part is done again. And someday, perhaps Red and our son will appear—or I will dream of them. Did it matter which?

"What did you see, when you died before?" His old master's voice was gentle. "It's different for all of us."

"Nothing." Mud squelched between his toes. Why were his feet bare? "The void of space. Pain. But then I-I heard my son. Crying."

"Yes," she nodded. "You will hear them, those who remember you. Those who loved you."

"Or hated." The man snorted. "Might want to avoid thinking about Telosian space. Or Dantooine. Or Taris-"

"Jolee," Jopheena murmured, "don't tease."

"I want to see her again," Malak told them. Strange, with all he had lost, to wish for that reunion, certain to be doomed, with the pilot, with Malak in Dustil's body, with all of them Tenebrae's prisoners-

They will die without me.

"Full of himself," Jolee snorted. "Like his wife."

"She's calling," Jopheena announced it as if she was describing rain. "I expect you'll both run along now. Will Malak be back for supper?"

"Metaphysical dinner," Jolee mock-whispered to Malak. "But you have to tell her that you love it anyway or she'll sulk for centuries."

XXX

Kashyyyk was impossible. How could a computer that used to be her be, like, a total snob? And what did it mean, that Lena and everyone had gone? Gone where? Just because her other self was evil, didn't mean that Mission wanted her dead.

{{Tell the Dromund Kaas installation to run its own operational sequences?}}

What did that even mean? And, hey, if there was a Rakatan computer on Dromund Kaas, wouldn't it be nice if Mission's former self let her in on where on Dromund Kaas

And asking for a line to Republic space? You'd think Mission had been asking that computer to re-seed Kashyyyk and make an ocean planet for all the virtual shade she'd received back.

And now… the $ *(# * loser had cut her off completely.

"Impossible," she muttered to herself in Rakatan. The two Onasi heads in front of her didn't even turn around, but she could see them in profile through her side cameras. Two profiles, both sulking. Dustil was really pale. At least on Korriban, the boy had gotten some sun.

[Dustil doesn't look so good], Mission beeped to Carth. They were returning to the palace now, Emperor Creepazoid's goons had lifted her onto Carth's speeder, bolted her into the back, and taken off with the scooter on some auto-follow Mission couldn't even figure out how to override.
[His switch is turned on], Carth whistled back, completely missing the nuance a binary code was capable of expressing. Polla-Revan had gotten it. Big Z too, even if his whistling was terrible. But Carth was kind of a binary guy. Switches were on or off with him.

She wondered how that'd go over when he saw his wife again. Even if Mission could think of some very practical and effective reasons for Revan to embrace the whole Darth thing again right now, especially in Sith space, she wasn't at all sure Carth would be okay.

"Hey," she extended an appendage and prodded Sithboy's shoulder. He whirled around and glared typically at her, but slower than she expected. And his eyes… was he crying?

"What," he said flatly.

"Mekel?" she asked cautiously. It seemed nuts, but she could picture Mister Sith Congeniality crying a heck of a lot easier than she could picture Dustil doing it.

"No. It's me," he muttered. A muscle in that long Human jaw twitched. "Just… just me."

His father frowned, maybe looking a little relieved.

"But Mekel's body's on Coruscant, right?" Maybe they could play whisper across the Force bond. Did the Force work like that? Who knew. It was weird. "You guys can, like, bounce back and forth?"

That'd be useful. Not like they didn't have things managed here okay, but it was always good to have a backup, and Mission would be more okay with Polla and Big Z being off on their own if maybe Canderous could come and get them. Would he? He would if Polla Revan made him. She made a mental note to add that to the list of things she needed to make Polla Revan do when the woman finally showed.

"Not-it's not working." He blinked his eyes hard. They were all liquid and squishy, in a vaguely repellent way.

"What's not working?" his father interrupted.

"Mekk. He's-" Dustil took a deep breath. "I think he's dead. He must be dead."

Damn. If she'd been organic, Mission would have felt sad that such a fine Human specimen was consigned to get all gross and decay. Not to mention, that ruined a very practical back-up plan.

"Son?" Carth put his arms around his genetic descendant and squeezed. It had been soothing, Mission remembered when she had been sad, and he'd done that to her.

"If I had arms," she offered, "I would hug you too, Dustil Onasi."

XXX

"I thought we'd get to come and fly the ship with you." Korrie glared stubbornly up at Revan. He was up to her chin now, as if he'd put on more inches in the last few months. "You said we'd have a chance to say good-bye!"

"I know." She kept her eyes locked on his face, trying to memorize every millimeter. "We are, Korrie. This is our chance."

Moll stood off to the side, holding Abasen. When Revan caught her eye, she nodded. "Sooner gone, sooner back is what I always used to say to Jasp and Pollie.”

"They weren't going to fight Sith." Korrie stuck his lower lip out. "Your lightsaber doesn't even work, Mother."

"Keep your voice down." Revan glanced in the direction of the office where the Devaronian had gone with their paperwork. Korrie only glared back and she stepped forward, folding him into her arms.

Xxx

"Try her again. One more time." The Devaronian smiled at Revan from the co-pilot's seat, teeth glinting through the transparisteel visor. "Just make sure to choke the gyros, she's aero enough to wobble in the cross-"

Revan jammed the lever forward and punched the turbo thrusters with her foot. _Pinion V_ soared into the sky like it was born there.

"-wind," the woman finished. "Nice lift! Guess you've handled one of these before."

_Have I?_ "Guess I have," Revan agreed. "You said before, these guns work?"

"Did you want to try them?"

Revan eyed the targeting reticule. "Sure. But I dunno if it's a good idea, running a sim while we're clipping parsecs above population centers-"

"No, it's fine. They set up below. See?" The Devaronian leaned forward. Below them, a line of low buildings. From this height, they looked just like a sim.

"It's a mock-up? _When did Derra City get strafing games?_ Revan was almost impressed.

"Sure." The woman next to her leaned back in the co-pilot's chair, folding her arms behind her neck. "A mock-up. See if you can light em, Flygirl."

Revan squinted, finger hovering on the trigger. She fired one blast and was pleased to see what looked like an old freighter go up in flames. _Must have been a fueler. That's good. That's one less-

"Uh, oh." The Devaronian sounded alarmed. "We've got company. Look to the skies. Three of em. Short-rangers. Must be a ship nearby-"

"I've got this." Revan toggled her seat to spin freely and extended the ship's gun. Plasma slugs burst from her gun in rapid-fire but the target was faster.

"Damn," she snapped, as it passed overhead, Force and radar pinged, warning her of the ship's return fire. All three of them were on them now and Revan ducked and wove- tried to push the sky to get out from under them. "We should have back up!"

"Probably," the woman next to her hissed. "But you wanted to charge in alone!"

_I don't even have a working lightsaber._

It was true, whatever Dar'Revan had done to Revan's lightsaber had fracked it. There was a flaw in the crystal that hadn't been there before. One of the lenses was cracked. On Dantooine, she remembered Zhar teaching her how to assemble the parts, but no one had ever shown her anything about repair.
Was that on purpose? It was useless to be paranoid, now that they were under attack.

Revan didn't want to leave Moll and Korrie, she'd barely said goodbye, and this was still the fracking test drive; but Revan sent the ship into a flawless Corellian twist, heading straight for stars. The snubs couldn't match their ascent and fell back.

"Now you've done it. Deralian orbits… it'll take us a day to get back down!"

"I needed to do something." There's no time. We don't have another day.

"But it wasn't-"

"You're going to crash the ship," said an irritated voice behind her. Lazy, almost teasing, but there was an edge of real fear there too. He was trying to hide the fear as if they could ever hide anything from one or the other.

"I am quite skilled," she snapped back. She'd said that before, to Carth as they landed on Dantooine, right before that errant wind shear had taken down their tertiary turbo, a one in a million mistake that could have fracking happened to anyone-

"Red. For the love of Force, please! Get out of the blasted pilot's seat. Now." Mal's voice sharpened now, along with sobs from the Neimoidian twins, who were barely old enough to have left their pod. The Togruta boy was quiet, staring blankly at the viewscreen next to the Devaronian saleswoman-no. The Togrutan sat next to the Cathar girl, the one she'd sensed. The one who had drawn them to that hellspawned slave pit in the Taris slums in the first place, just from the strength of her fear.

"I can't." She kept her voice calm. "No time. Just let me get us into hyperspace."

"By jumping blind?" He was angry. He'd wanted to go back, fetch Masters Kavar and Vrook. The other Knights. Prosecute the slavers instead of just shattering their operation.

But by Tarisian law, all of these children were property, I-I couldn't-what if we lost in court? The Mandalorians are coming. The Cathar was already a refugee once!

The Cathar had a delicate face, with slanted yellow eyes and tabbed stripes along her cheeks. She was older than the others, and Revan knew what that meant for slavers.

"You left it too late," her husband snapped. "If you're going to kill us all in hyperdrive, do it now. We can't take another hit."

Malachor, Revan thought like a prayer and pressed the switch.

The world twisted into a thousand points of light… and her dinner came rushing back up, sending her into a hacking coughing fit.

"Damnit!" Malak rattled off several curses in Ancient Sith, showing off again that he'd finally mastered what was a remarkably basic syntax.

"Are you okay?" Timid voice next to Revan's

"I'm… fine." She lifted the visor of her mask halfway, trying to smile and wipe the sick from her mouth at the same time. "I always get sick in hyperspace."

"I know." The girl's voice sharpened. "A smarter Padawan than I was might have made the connection. How many green-eyed, red-furred, spotted Human Jedi does the Order have? But I never saw more than your eyes and a few strands of hair and the spots on your hand."

Revan reached up self-consciously and pulled her hood down again. Anonymous. If we're all anonymous no one has more rank, no one is above the other no matter what that-

No matter what that machine on Kashyyyk said.

The thought was like a shock of ice. She wasn't even sure it was hers.

"Juhani," she smiled at the old joke, one of the few they'd shared. "They're not spots, they're freckles. I don't call you Tabby-"

"You did, that first day." The woman's voice softened. "I remembered that too, but I still-" her words rumbled low in her throat. "Stupid! I was so stupid!"

"No, you weren't, it-" something was caught in Revan's eye, and then they were on that ancient roof again, the shuttle in front of them, Bastila taunting her, and the power was... was there. All of it. So much-

Too much. It wasn't supposed to be like this. I can't let him have it. I have to stop him.

The roar of fury rose in Revan's throat, crackling around her body, through her.

"Don't do this, kid. It's not you."

"On the contrary, old man. This is all I've ever been." I wanted to be different. But this is all I've ever been.

"No." Juhani's blue blade met the red one Revan had taken from a tomb on Korriban, the Cathar stepped between her and the old man, between her and the ship, between Revan and the woman who would take her to Malak, the woman whose smile matched the one she could feel on her own face.

The woman who caused all of this, who used her, just like that pathetic Council, just like he did. She would be next. Energy crackled between them, that infernal Force bond that had caused so much pain-

Juhani's voice was soft, a low purr. "I know darkness. You can come back. Revan, please. Look at me."

She did. A millisecond. Those yellow eyes, stripes across her cheeks, lips pulled back, pointed white teeth. A warrior, a friend.

Loyal.

The Cathar smiled hesitantly.

Revan's first cut took part of her skull. The second thrust impaled them both, Jolee collapsed on top of her.

"Good," Bastila laughed, wildly, madly. "You are stronger than he ever was, and we will reclaim your title as Dark Lord-"
"Korrie, if I don't come back... it's not because I don't want to. It might not be safe. Do you understand?"

"No." He shook his head. "It's not fair that I had two mothers and now I won't have any!"

"She'll be back," Molla's voice interrupted them, her hand gently pried Korrie away. "Your Ma will be back, with my daughter, and then we'll all have a party. A nice party."

"No." Revan shook her head. She raised her saber again. Juhani's blade clashed with hers, taking the feint-she had to have known what it was, how many times had they sparred, how many times had they danced across the Hawk, all that time in hyperspace, and Juhani never seemed bored, or afraid, never questioned anything-

"I had questions," the Cathar laughed. "Just not for you."

"But you followed me." She flicked the double blade, sending it spinning in a vertical line, near perfect, the smell of scorched fur again, that perfect face ruined-again.

"And the droids." Revan's blade deactivated. I know it's a dream. I wish it were real. I wish, I wish-

The Cathar raised her own again, brows wrinkling. "No. They are just droids."

"A joke. Kids." Jolee chuckled softly, behind them now. And behind him, a shadow-tall, looming-....

"It is not a funny joke," Juhani noted.

"It's a little funny." Words in Ryl, from behind them. Mission almost never spoke her native tongue, said Taris was practically all she remembered. "I mean, she stuck some recording of me in a droid? Face it, Polla Revan has a weird sense of humor."

"Mission," tears burned her eyes. "I love you so much, I loved you all so much. I can never make it right. I can never bring you back. I'm so sorry-"

"For someone with hypoxia, she's kinda sane," Jolee said. "Honestly, I was expecting another medal dream."

"Revan." Mission stood before her wearing the Baragwin vest she'd loved, red lacquer gleaming against her skin. She seemed smaller than Revan remembered, her face more rounded and childlike-as if time had stepped back instead of stopped. "There's something really, really, really major I need to tell you. Okay? Please. Listen."

"Tell her soon, Mission." Bastila sighed ruefully, suddenly back in Padawan robes. "You know she never listens to me."

"Tell me." Revan wiped her eyes, not sure if she was crying or laughing anymore. "Whatever it is, just tell me."
"You know how you kept, like telling us what a good pilot you were?"

"That was before I knew who I was. I know I'm not as good as she is, but I know what she knows. I'm perfectly-"

"No. You're really not. You're fracking not." Mission shook her head tails so hard that they flapped. "Big Z and I thought we were gonna die when you landed us on Dantooine. Did you even notice the color Carth turned? I thought you Humans didn't come in green!"

"Mission," Jolee nudged. "Time. Kid's half dead now. Unless you want to spend an age hearing about how she didn't save the rest of her friends, you need to get her motivated."

Mission wrinkled her nose and rolled her eyes. "Okay! Fine, fine! Look, this ship, Polla-Revan? It's salvage, right? That Devaronian sold you a lemon. Might have still been okay, but you pushed the turbines so hard going vertical out of atmo… and now there's a slow leak and you've been bleeding your breathable air now for a day. Ship's generators are frying themselves trying to make more and when you do pop out of hyperspace-" Mission turned to Bastila. "Where's the next jump point again?"

"Near the Dosha system." Bastila sighed. "For some reason, she thinks that computer is going to help."

"Revan," Mission sighed. "It's evil and it's not me. When you pop out of hyperspace your cabin will depressurize faster and you're not even wearing a suit. I know you Jedi are powerful and stuff, but can you breathe in vacuum?"

Xxx

The Star Forge battle.

As the Hawk approached the main docking bay, an implosion from one of the capitol ships above sent a fan of figures with limbs like stars, floating out into the black-

Every spacer's nightmare.

Numbly, Revan tamped down the foreign thought and focused on the docking bay in front of them, shields already down, bay doors opening like a mouth-

Xxx

"So I'm dead then." It was almost a relief. *My friends. I loved you all. I failed, but I did love-I loved you. We're together now. If this is the end, will be always? I love you so much. I love-ah lahv. Alahv. Alalalala..."

Revan strangely found her voice. "I can't afford to be caught. What if the wrong sents answer?"

"Beacon only calls one ship, kid. This one's home base. Whether they answer or not depends."

"Depends on whether Aemelie's crew finished fixing the long-range, super-light receivers," Mission added. She snapped blue fingers in front of Revan's face. "Hey! Stay with us, Polla!"

"Aemelie?" Hypoxia. *I'm dead already. My fevered brain is spending its last energy trying to make
"Carth... he's going to die now." Her vision was blurring, all of them melding together. "Will we be together then?"

"I friggin give up," Mission muttered. "Bastila? Want to have another go?"

"She will not listen to me." Revan's dead bondmate sounded aggrieved. "As I said before."

"You. Fools." Dark chuckle, one that resonated in her bones. "Appealing to sentiment, to reason? This is Darth Revan. Galactic scourge. Butcher. The fallen Jedi who imploded a gravity well at Malachor during an armistice! This is the woman I couldn't kill, the Jedi couldn't erase, who held the Emperor at bay, who killed me-"

"Killing you wasn't that hard," Jolee snorted. "She had a lot of grenades."

"Harder than killing you." A heavy hand closed around Revan's arm, shaking her. "Revan. Polla. Wake up. Pull out of hyperspace and hit the distress beacon. Now."

Malak's face, metal jaw, stippled skull loomed over her. Jolee had joked that killing him hadn't been hard, but it had been: that moment of hopeless horror when all her confidence had faded, when she realized that the Star Forge wanted her, but was chained to Malak's will. That moment when his eyes had sparked red and terror froze her steps and his blade swung down-

Thermo in her hand, falling to the floor, she had channeled every last remaining bit of strength in her body into Force shields; curling in on herself and the explosion before she had even time to think-on the Star Forge, there had been an explosion, her battered body had crept across the deck towards Malak. He had looked better than she felt, and despair had fueled her scramble to her feet, fury crackling along her nerves, helping to gather the Force to her hands.

Not again. This war will never end.

"It will now," Malak whispered through a broken voder. His dying eyes glittered. "I promise you, Red."

On the Star Forge there had been more words, now there was only her hands, numb, breath scraping her lungs, gasping for air.

I don't know how to do this. Spots danced in front of her eyes. This is really the end.

XXX

"I know," her son whispered in her ear. Anger had finally faded to acceptance. "I know you have to go after her."

"I'm sorry," she whispered back. He was so heavy and solid in her arms. "I wouldn't leave if there was any other choice."

"Help her fix it," he said. "Whatever it is. You guys never even explained right. But fix it and come back." He pulled back a little, gray eyes searching her face. "Please."

XXX

Fix it. I don't know how. Dull panic ceded to despair.

I do. Out of hyperspace first, a voice said, inside. But fracking don't yank the lever; you've got to pull gentle; feel it, like Dancer's reins, like... like your husband breathes, when you're grabbing his-you know. Amusement. Hypoxia. Gentle. Revan's hand slipped. I said fracking gentle!

She heard herself sobbing a little. Felt it, as the lever slid home, engines purring to stop.

Distress beacon now. A pause. Frack, then the pressure suit. You know you were supposed to be wearing it already?

The distress beacon was under the seat. Her hand slid down, scrabbling against the slick surface. Nothing—and then Revan's fingers caught against the edge of the button. It was big, big enough to slam the back of her hand into it. A claxon call and everything began flashing red and black—

You're hallucinating now. Nothing’s flashing red and black but our brain. But you did it. Now put on the pressure suit so you don't die before they find you. Okay?

Pressure suit. Put it on. Her face felt heavy. Revan blinked, tried to remember how to slow her breathing, those fracking exercises Bastila had always tried to show her.

"She never listened to me."

Her eyes scanned the room. Sometimes it looked like the Hawk. Sometimes the Star Forge.

I don't know where pressure suits are. Where do they keep the suits?

I don't fracking know either! This is a warbird, not some freighter. They'd be light; they'd be easy to get to. You should already have put ours on.

Pressure suits would be light. Easy to get to. Near the entrance. The ship pitched now, so that down was the ceiling. Revan reached up and a black and red suit tumbled free.

She blinked at it.

Fool. Put it on. We will not die like this. We cannot.

I'm tired of both of you. But her hands found the seals, yanking them open, pulling the thing's head down over hers, then thumbing her now-gloved hands over the controls on the chest plate. The suit tightened and snapped over her legs; her breath fogged the visor. The pressure suit's interior was stuffy and felt like a tomb.

Stars. Turn on the oxygen, already!

Her hand twisted a dial and air rushed back. Revan's lungs filled with it, sudden shock clearing her head. She blinked, and the world stabilized. No longer flashing black and red, the cabin's interior was dimly lit. And outside, a blanket of stars, the bright spark of a sun, a string of planets, topical read-outs, steady and reassuringly blue.

In front of her, a commlink was blinking green.

"Hailing Unknown Vessel." A boy's voice in accented Basic spoke. "We've... uh, received your distress beacon?"

"Help," Revan whispered.

"I'm not getting a response," the boy said. He sounded so young. "I don't know, Milli. Are you sure you didn't break something when you reworked the comms?"
"I don't know either, Kex!" Girl's voice now. Speaking Mandalorian. "I thought you said all of the fighters were destroyed? Perhaps it's a trap from that Dar'Revan, or the Deathbringer or some other Dar'jett-"

"It could be an internal malfunction," the boy argued. "These coordinates are right in the Sullustan Drift. Lots of salvage over there."

Sullust. Revan's mind reached for a map of the stars.

"Gaa'tayl," she whispered. Her voice sounded tinny and she realized she needed to turn on the suit's speaker. Her hands fumbled at the front of her suit. "Ni vore gaa'tayl." Help. I accept help. "Please."
When you live in the shadows, you get used to seeing things in pieces: glimpses of a larger whole. Like Three had been used to seeing only the parts of his job that made him useful: the clever knife, the glitter of a tranq bubble, the slack face of a new recruit, voice slurred, reciting all that was required for them to know.

But that was in the olden days, when their orders had been capture and convert. Process. New orders from the dead man were more like, package for shipping. Didn't matter if the fruit was bruised or even screaming.

Not anymore. The Beast just needed its meat alive, although even that was a questionable condition.

"You--" she whispered, "I dreamed of you."

"Must have me confused with some other spacer, kid." He smiled, turning it into a leer to earn her disgust. Behind him, Twelve and Nine were finished for the day. No bloodwork—that would come later. Now back to Arca's lair, palace of whores, and Miss Jin with her clinking clanking chains that she called dresses.

Padawan-girl rubbed her infected hand absently on her robe. Point of contact left a rash sometimes.

He turned to leave.

"No—" she called out to his retreating back. "Wait!"

He didn't wait. The Jedi were out of time.

"Who was that, Thalia?" one of the other Jedi asked her.

Three didn't stick around long enough to hear her response.

Strapped to the table, next to the... the one Two had accidentally broken, the one that was still, technically breathing (but little else), the extraordinary Padawan opened her blue-green sea eyes and smiled at Three.

"I dreamed of you," she repeated. Her eyes turned to the broken thing on the bed and then back to him. "But in my dream, it was you who...."

"It was never me, kid. I'm no monster." Two had no business using sedatives, especially when he was drunk. He'd missed the dose, then gotten pissed when the prisoner didn't wake up. The prisoner had been a Rodian; now she was a drooling veg, face a mass of bleeding cuts. Three's foot scuffed on one of her severed antenna, cast off onto the floor.

The Human girl turned her head, to look at where Three had left Two-most of him, anyway.

Things were… things were breaking down. It wasn't Three's fault. Wasn't really Two's either.

There was still enough of Two to ship to processing. But the eye sockets looked like they were following Three now, and a low moan rolled out of Two's mouth. Broken teeth. That was a bitch. Had to hurt, getting them bashed in with a stun stick.

Would hurt more, when the stunner wore off.

"Padawan Yurissy is at peace now," the Padawan with eyes to trap sea beasts told him. "Whatever happened. Whatever your friend did… whatever you did to him… it's over. You know that, don't you? You… sense it."

"No," Three lied. "I'm not like you mystics. I'm just a man."

The girl smiled slightly. "I can't see behind the veil, but I've heard her call for you, Ja-"

"No," he interrupted. "What's in a name? I'll change it."

"You will." Her neck made cords when she nodded, head half-strapped to the board. "This part is over." Her hand was bolted to the table. Two had… Two had used real bolts. They didn't need hands, not where they were sending them. Not like before, when it had just been about breaking them down-showing them the dark, showing them their real power.

Her hand was bolted to the table, but her fingers curved under, beckoning him closer. "Let me show you; I'll show you what kind of a man you'll become. Let me show you, Jaq."

"That's not my name," he muttered. Not anymore. Not if they can find me. I'll change it. Before I run. I'll change it.

But his feet moved closer to the bed, and his hand closed over hers, small and broken.

Xxx

"Thought the Human one was a female," One said. "Register says two fems, and this is a male and a fem. Male Human, female Rodian." He didn't sound like he cared. You didn't get to be One if you gave a shit about details. Not in their line of work.

"We said we'd deliver two warms to the up and ups," Three reminded him. "I've got two in that box. You can tell, same as me. What's the problem?"

"The scans show-"

"Come on, man. You think he looks at the scans?"

"Fine." One gave an exasperated sigh, just like she--just like Three had known he would.

Truth be told, Three had dreamed about this too-not because he could see the future because he had a kriffing brain.

"Come on." He wasn't going to beg. Not to some sad prick like One, who was gonna end up being chow for the Beast just like most of the other teams had already here on Coru. The Jedi girl had Force visions, but you didn't need them to see this… this was all doomed. Deserters? Good for them! He couldn't wait to be one too. The girl he'd saved had said she'd dreamed of him.

Now all Three did at night when he slept was dream of her: whispering in his sleep. Whispering, guiding, goading-

*Find the woman. Protect her from the puppet dancer, the blinded one, the mother of lies-

"Tatooine," said One. "Kuat. Deralia-"

"Really?" Three scoffed. "That backwater?"

"Place like that is where I'd hide," One said. "If I didn't have a damn death wish."

The look in One's eyes… didn't look like a joke. It probably wasn't. Not even enough of them left on Coru to make a Twelve anymore. Order was breaking down. Shadows were nothing, in light. The Jedi were gone, or just about-

"And Peragus," the One added. "Somebody got footage of a revan there. Probably just a vid star."

"Peragus," he made the face he thought of as his meat suit smile, charming, quick as numbers in a deck. "That's the mining colony too explosive for warships to dock, right?"

The Beast could never reach him there. Would be easy to slip into something more comfortable there. Become a different man, slip out on some freighter-

"Yes," One nodded. A faint smile on his own lined face said that he got the gist.

"See you," Three told him, not looking back.

Peragus. It'll be pure pazaak.

XXX

"Well?" Canderous eased his way into the cramped communications chamber, squeezing in between Aemelie and Gwen. Their daughter sat in the officer's chair, headset half off, with that all-too-familiar scowl upon her face. "You said it was urgent."

"Show him," Gwen ordered.

Sighing just short of insolence, Millifar adjusted the controls of her screen, so the received broadcast appeared in front of them all.

The image flickered, then resolved with impressive clarity. It showed a humanoid figure wearing a dark flight suit, with the helmet's fogged ferraglass almost entirely shadowing the face within. "Ni... vore gaa'tayl,\" the figure muttered, voice mechanical and distorted through the ultralight feed.

"Not one of our patrols?" Canderous asked.

"No. Kex and I were monitoring the ship's receivers from this station when the broadcast came in on the emergency channel.\" Millifar paused. "We surmise the frequency was designed to retrieve the Aleema's fighters and shuttles, or at least track their locations."
"I set our daughter and Kex to this task," Gwen added, "as partial punishment for their shame."

"This is the recording of the broadcast we received," Millifar added. "Approximately one standard hour ago."

Millifar set the recording forward again. The helmeted head moved, dropping down over the camera, which auto focused on the blurred features within. The voice was a woman's, hoarse and rasping, as if the air was thin. "Please. Ni vore gaa'tayl. Aemelie? Is Canderous with you? Please... vore. Haar'chak! Gedet'ye! Mhi... mhi ... ven mhi vor entye. Ni...mhi allit..." The helmet filled the screen suddenly, as if the woman was leaning over the comm's camera. Her eyes were wild and staring through the ferraglass, face contorted. "Is this thing fracking working? Millifar? The man said, Milli. Is that you? I had a dream that Mission said Aemelie-" she broke off coughing. "Fracking hell, I don't want to die like this! Please... be you."

"Another dar'Jett trick," Aemelie announced, folding her arms. "A more subtle one, if she's manufacturing a false distress beacon from one of our ship's own warbirds-but still a trick." She sniffed. "The real Third Wife would hardly mention my name."

"No," Canderous said. He felt a great sense of relief that she hadn't died forgotten. "It's no trick. That's Revan. The real one. You traced the broadcast's origin?"

"Yes," Millifar said. "Kex did. It's back in Republic Space. In the middle of nowhere."

"How can we be sure this woman is 'the real one?'" Gwen frowned at him. "You were so sure the last message was from a false Revan-why is this one different?"

"Why is she asking for me?" Aemelie added. "She calls herself Clan, and swears a debt-price? She would be indebted indeed if we broke course and went all the way back into Republic Space!" She paused. "But we will not because that is the dar'Revan. Again."

"It is her," he snapped. "Is the transmission still active?"

"Yes," Millifar turned another dial on the console. "But she stopped talking. Just stares at the cam. Sometimes her lips move."

Canderous frowned. "Show me."

The image shifted. Now, the woman's face was practically on top of the camera, eyes half-open, focused on something that only she could see.

"Can she hear us?"

"I turned our mics down when I recognized her," his daughter said. She sighed heavily. "You want to hear her speak? Fine." She turned the dial back up again. "Now the mics are operational; our board is both receiving and transmitting."

"Good," he grunted.

The eyes on the hologram blinked and focused abruptly before Canderous could properly address her. "Canderous?"

"I didn't accept the visual request," Millifar added.

"Do it now," he commanded. "Revan. What the hell are you doing?"
"Trying not to die." Her eyes closed. "Canderous. Where are you?" The camera captured the faint lines that Force scarring had left on her face. And the expression was as familiar to Canderous as Aemelie's own.

Relief colored his amusement. "On my flagship. You know there's some schutta running around with your face?"

"I know," she said flatly. "That's why… that's who we need to stop."

"I still don't know why you assume this is the real one," Aemelie grumbled.

His daughter bent over the controls, and the recording lights flickered on. Canderous could see the moment Revan's eyes focused on his face, the tension in her own suddenly relaxing.

"She said 'please,'" he noted. "To us. Revan, who's flying that ship?"

"I am," she mumbled. "I mean, I was."

He snorted. "Mir'osik, you're a terrible pilot."

Her mouth twitched a little. "So I've been told. About this other Revan… you spoke to her?" Her voice was stronger now. "Anything she told you to do is a trap-or a lie. Please tell me you didn't think she was me!"

"At first," he admitted. "We were not expecting an imitation. Who is she?"

"That's… complicated." Her eyes shifted. "Look, I… I don't know how much oxygen I have. I have this suit, and another four. The ship's depressurized, dead in space. I don't know how long I can-"

"We do know," Millifar interrupted. "Because we have schematics of the Pinion designs. Those suits recycle everything. As long as you have power, you'll have air." She paused. "But you will eventually starve, and there is only so much the recycler can do with urine-"

"Seven days," Aemelie said. "We can reach her in seven days if we take the most direct route, which will put us directly in Rimma shipping lanes. We can keep the stealth fields operational, but on such a crowded route, doing so could prove as hazardous to us as to any ship who came close."

"If you jettison into a life pod," Millifar interrupted, "you'll have more time, Third Wife. If you really are the Third Wife."

"I'm sorry we got cut off when I tried to call before," the Conqueror of their people said. "Hello, Millifar."

"K'oyacyi," his daughter muttered, in a tone that implied the opposite.

"Millifar," Gwen warned. "I have not forgotten your shame."

"You heard Third Wife," the girl muttered. "It was her fault the comm disconnected."

"The life pod has more limited communications," Aemelie said. "And we need that fighter intact. If we sent one of our own scouts-"

"No cloaked ships at all," Gwen warned. "It could tip our hand to the Republic."

"Tip your hand about what?" Revan's eyes narrowed behind the ferraglass visor. "What are you planning, Canderous?"
"A superlight corvette would work," Aemelie suggested. "We can clamp her Pinion to its base for the return journey, and send the Aleema following so the return will be much less."

"That will cut travel time by a day?" Millifar added. "I think."

"Two days," Aemelie corrected her. "You need to account for the reduced drag coefficients when calculating the hyperspace duration. Five days, with two hyperspace jumps-"

"What are you planning?" Revan repeated. "Where are you?"

"We're not planning anything that concerns you, Third Wife." Aemelie shrugged. "After your rescue, we will provide you with a more automated ship, and take the Pinion in exchange."

"Not planning anything. On my… my old flagship." She frowned.

The false Revan had seemed much more certain of her ownership. The contrast made Canderous feel foolish for being tricked before, even for an instant. "We're planning what you and I spoke about," he told her. "From time to time. Rebuilding clan. Recovering our honor."

"Finding glory in battle," Revan grimaced through the flight helmet. "Right. I… I guess we can talk about it later."

"If you survive," Millifar said, half under her breath.

"Milli!" Gwen raised the flat of her hand as if their daughter wasn't too old to cuff.

"I only meant, there is a chance her ship is too damaged to maintain its power source," the girl muttered. "She's floating dead in space. Any number of accidents could occur."

"I'll check the calculations," Canderous offered, but his wives and daughters continued to chatter, plotting Revan's retrieval as if it was a military campaign.

And it might be, Ordo.

"Canderous," Revan interrupted. "Do you… do you know where the Sith homeworld is? It's called Dromund Kaas. It's where I need to go."

"We were looking for some Sith planets ourselves," he admitted. "Is Dromund Kaas where the false you was headed?"

"The false Revan had Seiran Wen with her," Aemelie added. "Do you know who that is?"

"I do. I was with them, but she—she betrayed me." Revan took a deep breath. "I don't know how it's possible, but… Carth is on Dromund Kaas. And Zaalbar. Somehow they're with Polla Organa. The real Polla Organa. And the Mission computer—"

"Polla Organa is on a Sith planet?" Aemelie interrupted. "Did she defect to them instead of us?"

"What?" Revan's voice sharpened. "No! She… she was pretending to be me."

"Really? She's much more attractive," Aemelie murmured. "Why would she do that? And where is Abasen?"

"With his grandmother." One red eyebrow arched. "Seiran told me they'd spent time with you, Aemelie, but I didn't realize you'd gotten so close."
"Our sons are milk brothers." Aemelie sighed. "Since you and I are married to the same man, I will make no secret that I prefer her to you."

"We saw the Deathbringer too," Millifar broke in. "I don't think she likes you."

"Who?" Revan frowned. "Who the hell else doesn't like me?"

"Mee'ra Surik."

"Who?"

Canderous smiled at her blank expression.

XXX

The Sith guards dumped them all in a suite of rooms painted a lurid red. There was no more talk of putting Force restraints on anyone either. Nothing to stop Dustil from using the Force and getting himself and dear old Dad (and Mission, the droid) the frack out of here.

Nothing… except dear old Dad's head shake when Dustil whispered that plan in his ear walking down the hall.

When they got to the rooms, Dustil learned the reason why: those two Zabrak kids were waiting for them. Both stood up when they entered, looking at Dustil's father with an expression that made Dustil faintly nauseous—but one he recognized. He'd seen it on the kids lined up outside their conapt back on Coru. Seen it on Mekel's face, even, once or twice—when the other boy was talking about Revan or even fracking Malak.

Hero worship.

"This is Zepth. And Takan." Leave Dad alone for a few weeks, a month, probably even a fracking day, and he'd adopt more kids. Mission had been cute (before Revan killed her), but for the life of him, Dustil couldn't see what good two Sith-possessed Zabrak would do them.

"Great," Dustil muttered, because what else was there to say? If it had only been ysalamiri keeping Mekk away, he'd be back by now. And Malak… Malak was fracking gone—Dustil had felt him leave, like a quickly-thinning hovertrail across the sky.

"Hello," Takan said.

"Your father told us you studied on Korriban," Zepth added. "We were told that is a great honor, to be one of Revan's chosen at the Academy there."

"Yeah. It sure was." He glanced at dear old Dads. Dad. Mekk would say 'Dads,' like a Coru core rat. Mekk would make a joke. If Mekel's dead….

Bad enough that Mission was dead—and still her voice kept coming through the droid's voder.

"Maybe Mekel's not really dead," that droid commented, for the tenth time, since Dustil had first mumbled it in the speeder. "Right? He could be alive?"

"If he were alive, he'd have smashed the ysalamiri already, and he'd be back." Dustil was tired of explaining it. He felt numb. Didn't Ban say we'd die together, Mekk?

He could almost hear the other boy's laughter in his head.
Maybe you just told me that to get lucky-frack. Dustil blinked his eyes hard, rubbing them to get the blur out.

His father was frowning at him, with the look he got when he was trying to understand. Any minute now, there'd be a pat on the back.

"Your father also said you studied to be a Jedi on Coruscant," Zepth added. "My aunt was a Jedi there. And my little sister. They chose her when she was six. Aunt Marla sent me to Dathomir instead."

"That's nice." Dustil wasn't listening. Knowing Father, these two had some tragic story too.

"Let me… let me talk to Dustil in private. Okay?" Dear old Dad gave the Zabraks and the droid a juicy, crap-eating grin, and shrugged like he was apologizing for them on top of everything else.

They had two rooms in their locked-down quarters, with a door and a fresher between them. Two beds in each, which meant Dustil was gonna bunk with Father and the Zabrak were off on their own.

Lucky them.

Thinking of that made him think of Mekk. Thinking of Mekel made him feel numb again. They'd shared everything, but it hadn't even hurt: just suddenly, he and Malak were gone.

His head felt empty, with only his own thoughts rattling around in it.

XXX

"It's done then? Mekel Jin has been cut off from the Force?" The question was rhetorical, as Lydie had been in the same comm channel as her husband when Master Kavar reported back to them.

"You were in the same comm channel as I was." Azen raised an eyebrow at her across the dinner table. "Are you feeling alright, Lydie?"

Lydie reminded herself that it was satisfying, the way their thoughts ran in familiar parallels. Azen never surprised her, or left her without words, even if that was a condition he attributed himself to her presence.

Azen Loanin had ceased to confound her, even if she did still confound him, apparently all the time, with her fanciful illogic.

Lydie smiled, trying to explain. "What I meant was, how do we know it worked, when Dustil Onasi's body is on Dromund Kaas? How do we know Malak is gone?" She smiled to show that she was asking out of curiosity, and not because she thought he was concealing information.

Quite obviously, Azen did know, he just had chosen not to share the knowledge with her.

"House Racharn has a few channels to the Sith media, channels they inherited from House D'Reev." Azen sighed. "Leesa has generously agreed to share them with our House. If Malak is gone, it should become clear quite soon." He sniffed. "Dustil Onasi is no Malak. Not on his own."

Leesa was small and slim and pale as a bone. If you liked small, slim, pale, female humans, Lydie suspected she was attractive. Azen seemed utterly oblivious, but Lydie had noted the Racharn Senator's attention to him.
She wasn't sure how she felt about it.

"We need to check on him," she ventured.

"You wish to travel to Dromund Kaas after Katarr?" Azen looked confounded as if once again, her leaps of spurious logic had outpaced him. "To check on Malak? Lydie, we have others-Racharn agents, Master Klee-there is no need for us to risk ourselves."

"No." Was he deliberately obtuse? "Mekel. We need to check on Mekel Jin."

Her husband scoffed. "Why?"

"Because he was a Jedi," she said. "The experiment where the Force was stripped temporarily was traumatic for him. Imagine how much more traumatic it must be now, to have no Force at all-"

"Imagine what will happen if we fail." Her husband's voice hardened. "Imagine what the dead Jedi suffered before their ends. Imagine the carnage Malak has already caused."

"What if we go to Katarr and it doesn't work?" she countered. "I know what Knight Arkan can do! What if this trap fails?"

"It will be the end." Azen ran his hand over his smooth forehead, and through his hair, pushing it back. She liked to do that for him, feel the contrast between the egg-like roundness of his Human skull, and the thick nape of hair covering it. If they died on Katarr, she would never do that again. "The end of all Jedi." His eyes met hers. "We must not fail."

"You said we must leave in the morning. It's night now. Let me just check. We could both go- " if you don't trust me to perform a simple act of mercy."

"No." His mouth turned down. "I have things to do, reports to prepare for Kavar and Atris; but if you want to go, Lydie, you… you should. Check on him. No doubt his father will be there… and Padawan Ban. You should inform them as well. About Katarr."

Invite them to stand with us on a Miralukan colony world? To wait for victory or death?

The plan was insane, but Lydie could not think of a better one. The Fleet had tried simply hunting the Ravager, but the Sith Lords' ship had cloaking technology, not to mention Sith upon it. Sith who could cloud minds, hide from the Force itself-

No. We must catch them unaware. It is the only way.

And what better bait than a planet full of Force-sensitives? A planet full Force-sensitives and Jedi. Powerful Jedi. All the powerful Jedi left-

"I'll be back in a few hours," Lydie promised him.

"The shuttle leaves at dawn." Azen smiled at her from across the table. "Bring Yuthura and Vrook with you, if possible."

Azen's smile was glacial. "If you wish. His presence makes no difference. Either way."

XXX

The Sith had the most uncomfortable chairs in the world. Dustil was balanced precariously on his.
Dad looked like he was about to fracking tip forward.

"Dustil?" Dad leaned forward, even more, balancing the three-legged chair on one leg.

"What." The Zabrak duo was gone at least, gone off to their room. Mission had rolled off with them too. Mekk thought of her as Mission, even if she was just a fracking computer. "How… how are you even here?"

"Kind of a long story. Told you some of it… that was you, wasn't it? I… sometimes it was hard to tell."

"We all kind of… knew. Things. Things that happened to each other. A lot of it was me, Dad." He met his father's eyes warily. "But some of it was Mekk too. He-he was good at filtering out Malak's banthashit. For me. H-he was… he was good."

"Yeah, I know." From Dad's expression, that was a total lie. "You could have just run with Polla and Zaalbar, but you came back. Was that… was that Malak… who made you come back? Or-?"

"All of us." Except for Mekk. He only did it because I wanted to see dear old Dad. He only did it because of me, and if we hadn't been so distracted here, he might still be alive.

Dustil rubbed his eyes. Dear old Father was still talking.

"I-I only left you on Coruscant because Malachi said he'd find a way to help you, Dustil. If we get out of this, it's gonna be you and me and the stars from now on." His father grimaced like he didn't believe it could happen either.

"Oh, yeah? What about Revan?" Even if they never fracking saw her again, she'd always be between them. Yeah, Malak had blocked most of the… the sex memories, but there were still fragments rattling around Dustil's brain. Mostly feeling. All fracked. Red, he'd called her. Red, red, red. He meant her hair, her blood, the color inside of her-it's all too fracking much.

"I didn't come to Dromund Kaas for her. We came here to rescue you," Dad told him. "Revan… isn't… even when she comes here, it's finished." His eyes looked as bleak as Dustil felt. "She's… not-the woman I married doesn't exist anymore."

_Great job on the rescuing, by the way._ Dustil glanced at the locked door, heard himself scoff.

"So… what? Revan's gonna show up and we're gonna just leave? With her? Malak thought… isn't she coming here to stop the Emperor?"

"I don't know." His father rubbed his jaw like he did when he was clueless. "This… world is wrong. Evil. If we have the chance to stop Tenebrae, we need to take it. If Revan's here to stop Tenebrae, we need to help. But if she's here to join him, we…." He glanced towards the door.

"Mission swept this room for surveillance," he added.

"First, we need to get that asshole out of your head." Dustil had no idea how to do that. Wasn't like there was a Mekel Jin someone could kill. From Dad's garbled explanation earlier, it wasn't like a Force bond was what Tenebrae did, was it? Malak hadn't… Malak hadn't understood what the Sith Emperor did. Frack, Malak hadn't even known what was up: his thoughts had been a confused fracking mess about what had gone down with him and dear Red there at the end with the Star Forge.

XXX

"You set me on this path, Revan. I wonder if our positions were reversed and I had been saved by the Council, would I have done things differently?"

"Probably, Mal, you always were weak." She staggered a little. She was... she was hurt. Badly. Dustil could count a dozen weak points without even trying, and he'd never even been a Sith Lord.

She called Malak weak? It almost made Dustil like her. Almost.

"Save me," Malak whispered. Taste of blood on his lips. "I remember how it was between us. I know what there is between us, even if you do not. I know what we must reclaim. Save me, Revan. Save me, Red."

"No." She raised her hand and-everything dimmed, everything died.

Was this what it had been like for Mekk? Malak hadn't fought, Dustil would have fought, Dustil would have fought screaming with everything that he had-

XXX

"We need to get Tenebrae out of my head, the kids' heads, everyone's heads." Dad nodded. "Question is, how?"

Dustil laughed. "No fracking idea." The Force was so much smaller than it had been, but it still shimmered around them, around everything on this fracking planet. And the Force was... dark. Really dark.

Really fracking dark. Makes Korriban feel like a Jedi retreat. Mekel would piss himself laughing if he heard me call Korriban a Jedi anything-

Mekk would-it was fast. Whatever happened. So fast that maybe he didn't even know. Like when those mercs I compelled shot Erimac in the back. No pain. I would have felt it if it hurt. I should have felt something if it hurt.

I should feel something now. Dustil swallowed the lump in his throat back down.

"There-there was a holocron, with Revan's original memories, and-" Dad's voice broke off. He'd been talking for a while, from his expression. Probably time for Dustil to act like he understood.

"Yeah, I know." Dustil coughed. Holocron-Revan's coming too? Both of them? Fracking great. "Malak was in my head, remember?"

"Was in your head? You're sure he's gone?"

Dustil had already said it a hundred times, felt like. Whispers in the speeder, exhausted words in their new fracking prison. But his father kept pushing and pushing.

Xxx

"Is Malak really gone? For good?" Dad looked happy, even if they were prisoners, and Mekel was probably dead. Dustil had just fracking tried to tell him both of those things and Dad had the nerve to look happy.

"Yeah. I felt him... become one with the Force. Or something." Like sunlight shining through trees. This strange calm, peace-a welcoming-

It was really fracked Dustil had felt it for Malak and not for Mekel. Maybe Mekk had died so fast; there'd been no time.

"You're sure?"

Dustil gritted his teeth. "I'm sure." He took a deep breath, maybe saying the rest of it would help too. It had with Mom. And Selene. "I… I think Mekel died too. We had that Force bond? I think when Mekel died… Malak got free."

"Oh." Dad did that thing he did when he didn't know what to say. He rubbed his jaw, staring hard at Dustil. His lips wrinkled, and his mouth turned down, flat. "I didn't know… I didn't know Mekel was here too until he said-he told me it was both of you."

"It was. Now he's gone." Obviously, his dear father was just fricking clueless. "I don't… I don't want to talk about it. Okay?"

"Okay." His father was frowning. Around their speeder, the Sith hunting party careened on its way. "We'll talk more soon."

Xxx

And now here they were at soon, rehashing the same banthashit.

"Malak's really gone? For good?" How Dad could look happy when they were stuck here on this fricking planet was way beyond Dustil.

"Seems like it." The Force was still there but subdued. He'd never realized how much stronger they'd been until now, that Mekel and Malak were gone. "When that Sith asshole killed Mekel I guess it set him free."

"Which Sith asshole?"

"The Emperor's bucket-boy. Fracking Oerin Lin." Did Dads even hear anything that Dustil ever said? "I thought I told you about him."

"No." Dad frowned. "Oerin Lin… son, he died. Right before I left Coruscant. He had the plague. You were still in a coma-"

"I know he died! And then I killed him too. I ripped his head fricking off! But he can't die. Nothing kills him. He's like a… a walking corpse or something."

Dustil's father just looked worried. "When… when was the last time you ate?"

Black fury welled up in his gut, mixing with loss. "Don't fricking condescend to me, old man!" He got up from the chair, shoving it back with the Force and walked to the door. Naturally, it was locked. Naturally. Mekk could probably pick the lock in ten seconds, but I-

Dustil reached for the Force, focusing his energies on the door, with hard precision. The metal seemed to flare, ripple. There was a creaking noise, and then it tore, starting at the top-

"Don't." Dad's hand was on his shoulder suddenly, reaching up to rest on it, because Dustil was taller now-not much, but a little. "Not until we know more."

"Not until Jedi Revan comes and rescues us, huh?" Mekk was dead. No fricking way, if they were just ysalamiri, he would have come back. He would have found a way. He had said he'd never leave Dustil again-
"It's not going to be like that." Dad sounded grim. "I told you, I don't know… the Revan who's coming for us, I don't know."

"They're not both coming?" He tried to make it a joke, but Dad only stared at him.

"Both?" His father laughed nervously. "I thought you said Malak died-"

His father's voice stopped, mouth freezing in mid-air. And then his eyes began to glow.

The Emperor chuckled darkly with Father's mouth. "Rather unsporting of you, killing the only Force-sensitive I possessed on Coruscant, Malak. With Klee gone, I will have to make changes. Import operatives with inadequate preparation-"

It had happened before Dustil realized what he was doing. A dark current of rage swept through him, pinning Tenebrae in his father's body against the wall.

"Shut up," he muttered, flexing his hand. "What did you do to him? How did he die?"

His father's eyebrows raised so far they looked like they were trying to leave his head. His father's breath rattled in his father's lungs. And a part of Dustil, a part of Dustil was glad, seeing the man suffer-suffer like Mekk and me-

"I-I-" the man's hand clawed comically at his throat. "He had. A… metal stick of some kind. I… saw it. Briefly, before he-"

"You're the one who killed him!" His voice cracked again. "You fracking killed him. You and your dead Mandalorian!"

"Oh… my." The choking noises could have been laughter. "We may need that Force collar after all."

And then, like the flip of a switch, the red light cut out. Suddenly, the man was just a feeble man, pinned against the wall. A choking man, whispering a name.

It took Dustil a few more seconds to realize the name was his.

"Dust-" His father rasped. "Dustil."

"Dad." His voice cracked again. It kept doing that. Like he was a kid. Like he was nothing more than a fracking kid. "Dad!" He lunged forward and caught his father in his arms, sagging with the weight of him, helping him back to the chair, fumbling apologies, trying to make amends with words, with the Force-

"It's… okay. Son. It's okay."

Xxx

On Telos sometimes, after spring rains, when Dad wasn't deployed, and Mom had time off from patrol, they'd hike up past base into the mountains. There was an old, primitive dam there-nothing more than a wall and a few sluice channels; but it was on land that had been in Mom's family for generations. To keep the valley dry below, they had to open the gates. But one year… it rained too hard, or they were too late, or something. Dustil didn't remember. He'd been just a kid. But it had felt like this, watching it. Watching it, he'd thought he'd even felt it in the earth-the dam wall buckling, the water taking tide, washing everything-their camp, food, even Mom's speeder away in the floodwaters.
It had felt like this. First, his body shook. Then a g gobbling breath. Then his body shook again, and the hot tears started, blurring his vision, making his chest ache, his legs stumble. The world blurred and dimmed, lost in the waves of grief.

On Telos, it had been Dad who grabbed them-Mother by the arm and Dustil around the waist like he was a tomato sack. Dad had grabbed them and stumbled out of the way. No magic, no Force, just his father's strength and courage, pulling them off the path, scrabbling up the hill, while they watched what had been their trail turn into a raging river, watched the speeder-Mom's pride and joy-tumbling down, lost forever.

"It's insured," Dad had whispered. "It doesn't matter. We're safe. That's the real thing. That's what matters."

"Mekk's gone," Dustil mumbled against Dad's chest, even though he was the taller one now. Even though that didn't make any frickin' sense. His body felt like one long earthquake, he couldn't stop crying now, couldn't stop the tears. "He's... dead. That asshole even admitted it."

"Mekel." His father pulled back a little, frowning down at him. "We... we're talking about Mekel Jin now. Not Malak."

"Of course not Malak." The scoff was so automatic, choking off tears, that he wondered if Dad had done it on purpose. "Mekel. Yeah." He took a deep breath, met his father's eyes. "Mekel's dead."

"They asked for privacy." The slightly smaller Zabrak, the one who'd first met them on Dathomir, the one designated 'Takan,' eyed Mission like he hadn't liked the shock she'd just administered to his hand when he tried to roll her away from the door.

"That's why I'm standing here, Hornface." If she had fingers, they'd be making rude gestures.

Mekel Jin was dead? That made her processors feel strange. Did they have a holocron? Would he be coming back? "I'm monitoring in case Emperor Creepazoid's goons come back."

"Did they request your assistance?"

"Yes," she lied.

"Captain Onasi said nothing to me-"

"Takan." The other one had approached almost noiselessly, even with her sensors. That was a little disquieting. "Leave Malak to his games. I have need of you and this vessel for a new purpose."

"Master." The Zabrak even went down one knee. Because the other Zabrak's eyes were glowing now. "Of course, how may I serve?"

"Do-weet!" Mission chirped. "Beep beep!"

In Droid Language Ninety-Six Pi, that was a command to stick all appendages in the nearest power conduit and leave them til dark.

"I'm sorry," Dad repeated. Back on those uncomfortable chairs again, but closer now. Dad was even holding one of Dustil's hands like he never wanted to let go.

And weirder, Dustil was letting him." "It's okay." It will never be okay. He forced the cheerfulness into his voice, like it was fracking Force compulsion. "Hey, least Malak's gone! Asshole even felt happy when he got free."

"Free?" Dad frowned. "I thought you said he was possessing you."

"He was stuck." Took him and Mekk ages to figure that out, that Malak was as trapped as they were. "Something about the Force bond, it… kept him there. It doesn't matter. I don't give a frack about Malak."

His father scoffed. "Then you're a better man than your old man. You don't know how many times I dreamed about putting a blaster bolt through his skull." -

"Before it was my skull, Dad?" He smiled to show he was joking. He wanted to puke.

"Of course." The flash in his old man's eyes held more of an edge than Dustil was used to-and maybe even a glint of black humor. "I hated that bastard for years before he came back as a Force ghost and possessed you. That was just the last, damned straw."

Dustil laughed. He couldn't help it.

His father stared at his face as if he were memorizing every line. Then, after a sec, he started to laugh too.

"This is not how I pictured our father and son time," Dad admitted.

"At least you're not fracking brainwashed like on Coru," Dustil told him. "Did you know about that? Senator D'Reev did something to you, he brainwashed you. It was all fracked."

"I-I know. Some of it, anyway." His father's smile faded. "You and I didn't have a chance to get on the same loop back there."

"No." Dustil sighed, cracking his knuckles. "Guess our timing sucked."

"It'll be better now." His father sounded like he was promising himself.

"Yeah." Except Mekel's dead. And we're trapped here, waiting for your wife or your ex to save us. He tried to figure out how to put that into words, but the way his father's expression looked made those words fade. "That woman—the smuggler—she went off with Zaalbar. It was Malak's idea. But she seems… she seems pretty tough."

That was a lie. She'd seemed terrified, even if Mekel thought she smelled nice when they slept, all curled up under that fracking bush—

From the look on his father's face, Dustil realized that maybe Mekel wasn't the only one to notice the smuggler's hotness.

His father nodded. "She's the real Polla Organa. She fooled the Sith Emperor into thinking she was Revan before."

Yeah, but why? There had been some attempt at a garbled reason, coming from her, coming from Mission—from the Tee-Three that said it was Mission. Mekk had thought of her as Mission, but Mekel was a kripping dead idiot. "Why?"
"Originally?" His father scoffed. Dustil wondered if he knew he was smiling. "Credits. She was trying to get credits."

"So she's nuts." As nuts as your wife. Great.

"Polla agreed to keep on… keep on pretending to be Revan so we could rescue you," Dad added.

"I know." That had been part of the garbled story that had come out. From her, when they were running, now from dear old Dad here in this Sith prison. But something nagged at Dustil. "When that Sith asshole grabbed us-me-he said it was Revan's orders. So was that your wife Revan, or Polla the faker who wanted Malak here?"

"Uh…" Dad rubbed his jaw. "I think that was probably Polla."

"So she got me kidnapped in the first place." She got Mekel killed. In the first place.

Dustil made a quiet vow to return the fracking frackin-ner favor, if he got the chance.

"She-she didn't mean-"

"You're defending her?" Dustil heard his voice crack like a kid's. "Mekel's dead because of her!"

"It's not-" his father stopped talking and stared at him. Something that might have been frackin' comprehension flickered on his face. "I'm sorry," he murmured. "I'm sorry about your friend. When… you said before you didn't want to talk about it-"

"I still don't. Want to talk. About him."

"Sure." Dad looked uncomfortable, perched on the chair again. He tried to tilt it back, and it teetered on the one back leg, tilting alarmingly. "You kids went through a lot together. I-I understand. He was… he was a nice kid."

Liar. He wanted to be a Mandalorian, but he stuck around. For me. He never talked about it much. We just knew… things. We just knew. Having a Force bond is like…” like feeling your face grow hot when you're trying to explain it to your dad.

"I know. Bastila and Revan-"

Those rumors are true? Mekk would have made a joke. But Dustil knew better.

"No We… we were closer than that." He met his father's eyes. "More like you... and… and Mom."

"Your mother-oh." His father's expression shifted fast: from confusion to something like surprise. Then, he leaned forward, almost tipping the chair over as his hands, both of them, closed on Dustil's, like a pair of ronto-traps. "Oh. That's… I-I didn't know. You never… guess I-I should have known."

"No." Dustil leaned forward, gripping his father's hands back. "It happened after… after you left, but it made me realize we-I'd… it was important."

"It is important." Dad looked him in the eye. "Even when someone goes away, it's still important. You never really… you never really forget." He took a deep breath. "I'm sorry I didn't pick up on… on that. That you and him… that it was like that."

"I don't know how he died." Weirdly, it felt good to talk. "Tenebrae was there, and this frackin' walking corpse was there too. Oerin Lin. That Mandalorian-"
"Oerin Lin died." Dad frowned. "Of plague, I thought."

"Yeah, he was dead. But… walking. Not a ghost like Malak. Walking. Rotting. I tried to kill him, but it didn't work."

"What?" Dad looked confused. "I know, you said it before, but I… I didn't understand. You're saying, Oerin Lin was there… and he killed Mekel?"

"I guess." It felt like being a kid now, with all the tears wrung out. There was a ring of bruises blooming around his old man's throat. Another on his arm, where maybe it had hit the wall. "I-I hurt you. You were… you were that asshole Emperor, I-I hurt you."

Dustil's fingers itched to heal the bruises but he wasn't sure he could.

"It's okay." His father's smile was open. Honest as clean Telos sky. "You think I haven't wanted to strangle that asshole Tenebrae too?"

Dustil laughed. Once he started he couldn't seem to stop. "We're going to make them pay," he choked.

His father's eyes were clear and sad, like he got it. "I know."

XXX

His shadows held them cornered like kath, above and below on the stairs.

"Hello," Oerin called down to Master Vrook Lamar, the Jin boy's father. The former Sith headmistress, the reformed Yuthura Ban stood next to the man, both of them, sabers lit. A few shadows lay broken on the floor far below.

A waste. I might as well have fed them to Nihilus.

Speaking of the Beast, Oerin needed to return. He'd left the former Davad Arkan wandering the halls of one of Coruscant's suddenly depopulated habitats-little more than a rich man's asteroid, set on orbit around Coruscant to maximize the view. The Beast had no way of escaping… Oerin hoped, but given time, who was he to say that the entire planet full of life below might not somehow pull the man into its orbit? He could not trust his former friend alone on the Ravager, not after what had happened on Yavin, when the man had nearly convinced their new pilot to steer the ship into the sun….

"Disperse," Oerin told the shadows, ringing the command through their minds. "Return to One of Acknahar'tah. I will be along shortly."

One-by-one, their stealth belts activated, and his compelled tiny army vanished. Acknahar'tah… it was time, Oerin thought, to put an end to that line. Hardly any left now from the Twelve. A pity, really, they were one of the oldest. Organized years ago, by Revan's orders herself.

"Oerin Lin," Vrook Lamar seemed in shock. The expression of horror all sentients got looking upon Oerin Lin now was tiresome. "Revan told us you had been resurrected by your mother, Vima Sunrider-"

"She hates that name," Oerin coughed. "Or did. Now it hardly matters. She may be dead. How long can a Human person survive on the side of a volcano with no food or water?" He shrugged. "Hello Master Vrook, Lady Ban. You should see to the boy, he will need assistance and I'm not sure that Klee-"
As if the Force was a jester, (which in Oerin's experience could be true), Master Klee picked that moment to die. Or had it picked for him. His star winked out of the Force like a light.

A shame. If he was just going to be killed, I could have fed him to Nihilus, perhaps saved some of Acknahar'tah. They were such loyal beasts—

This trip was a massive waste of raw material. Oerin could only hope the Sith worlds were as rich as their Republic friends claimed. Disturbing, when Oerin pondered too hard on their circumstance now… how almost every action he took was a way to keep Nihilus fed.

But if I can use him to destroy this Sith Emperor, open Sith space for my people… it will make some of it, at least, worthwhile—

"Never mind about Klee." Oerin smiled, and shrugged, feeling another ligament tear along the small of his back. "He's dead. Not like me… actually dead. Forever."

"Why?" Vrook stared at him, and for a moment, Oerin was reminded of the gruff old man who'd played chess with him and told him a story about Grandmother and her first husband that Mother never had shared. The man, Andur Sunrider, it seemed, had sacrificed himself, and self-sacrifice was decidedly not part of Mother's creed. "You didn't kill him? You didn't kill my son?"

"If you want Jin dead, do it yourself." Oerin walked down the stairs towards them, holding the Force in his hand like a beating heart. The pain was constant, but there was a purity in it too. "I must leave."

The woman, Yuthura Ban, looked at him incredulously, lekku wrapped tight around her neck. She was powerful enough not to even hide her fear—or her revulsion. "What you did to him," she murmured. "Can it be undone?"

"I have no idea," He smiled. Women used to love his smile.

Oerin flexed his fingers, and part of the transparisteel railing cracked, shards falling down. He leaned backwards, and let gravity take him the rest of the way to the floor.

The remnants of his ribs crumpled, and for a moment, when his skull hit the ground, Oerin saw a pure, white light. But a reassuring wave of pain forced him to his feet again, flesh and bone knitting enough to stand, to walk, to leave, pushing through the Coruscanti crowd of nulls as if they were shadows.

But the gray man in the doorway gave him pause. Null and faded, but upright all the same. Like he hadn't noticed the universe had ceased its meaning, that free will for one such as him was a thing of the past.

"You." Oerin bit back irritation. "I told you to wait with him."

The Deralian nodded. "That you did, but he… he wants you to hurry. Sent me down. Said… said he's hungry."

"You can hear his thoughts? Understand him?" Was Nihilus powerful enough to project to the Force-blind now?

"N-no." The man's skin had paled to the color of his hair, as if working beside them had leached vitality from him even without the Force. "We write. We… write notes. Master."

"Notes?" Oerin laughed. "He can still hold a stylus?"
I should be pleased he sent you, instead of making the journey himself I suppose. Still enough cognizance left, not to mobilize the entire galaxy against us. Still. For at least a time.

There was a fresh claw mark on the gray man's face. Oerin certainly hadn't put it there. "Yes." The Deralian nodded. "S-sometimes his… he's not always clear, but… he told me to come fetch you.
He asked… did you get what you needed?"

Something there. A glint, an eagerness. If Oerin was one of those suspicious, paranoid Sith, like the fools he'd played games with on Manaan, he might have cared. The man was… he was hiding something, in those null thoughts of his. Something.

Oerin probed sharply and was rewarded with the image of a face-and that dreary desire for death.

"Her?" He had to laugh. Cracking noise behind them. Oerin turned, in time to see the rest of the staircase collapse. Vrook and Yuthura Ban were gone, presumably escaped, presentably upstairs with Jin. "You poor fool. Revan won't save you. Don't you see? We're doing her job."

Xxx

Jasp Organa followed the dead man out of the Coruscanti hospital, heart still thudding too fast in his chest.

Pollie, he thought. But in this place-her expression blurred and shifted, features thinned, chin sharpened, hair shifting from brown to red….

Xxx

It wasn't logical, Mekel's need to retrieve the broken bed leg from Master Klee's skull, but he was still trying (it was stuck on something inside, maybe bone, maybe brains, who the frack knew) when Lammikins and Master Yuthura Ban appeared in the doorway.

"Mekel," Ban's voice was sharp, hard enough that Mekel dropped the metal rod and stood up. For a second he wondered if she'd compelled him, but without the Force he had no way of telling.

His feet, clad in hospital slippers, slipped on blood, mostly from the ysalamiri. Most of Klee's was still inside him.

"He… was evil!" Mekel said quickly. "Fracking tried to kill me! I think he's a Sith or something.
Did you know that? Master Kavar too! They're in league with Oerin Lin!"

"We just saw Oerin Lin." Yuthura grimaced. "Or, rather, his walking corpse."

"The Force-" Vrook seemed to turn gray. Maybe it was the light. "It's gone from you. He did this?"

Mekel wasn't sure which 'he' dear old Dads meant. "Oerin Lin did it. He's a fracking zombie now or something. He took away the Force and Kavar and Klee just stood there!"

"Kavar was here? With them?" Now it looked like Vrook's eyebrows were gonna escape his face.

"They were all here. Then they left. I…." Klee had been just standing like a rube when the bed leg went in his skull. Lies scrambled with the truth, just like Ban had always told them was best.
"Klee's eyes started glowing and he was laughing at me-like he was crazy and possessed too!"

"We know," Yuthura told him. "We saw. Some of it."

"How?" Good. Back me up here, Yuthura Ban.
"You were under surveillance," Vrook told him. "Master Loanin, and Master Kavar, Padawan Korr, Fleet officers-"

"The camera. Right. Yeah. M-malak, he shorted it out." Padawan Korr? Lydie Korr was watching me too? All of them probably laughing their asses off-

"Mekel…" He'd never heard Yuthura Ban sound so gentle. Her hand touched his arm gently. "We've come to take you away from here. Where are your clothes?"

"Huh?" He looked down. Said something, that with all the crazy banthashit going down, he hadn't even realized all he was wearing was a torn hospital robe and skivs. The sealed skin on his side ached, where they'd grown a new spleen or whatever it had been. "I-I don't know."

"No matter." Vrook stepped forward, taking his own outer robe off. It wasn't a Jedi one-both of them were dressed like civs. Just a long, banthahide coat. Telos had had one even, sort of like it, he'd looked pretty fracking flash-

"If you saw…" he was still standing there, letting them buckle him into the coat like a tranked-out kid, "You know, it was three of us… me, Dustil, and Malak. But now, I don't know… I don't know anything. I can't feel anything."

"Oerin Lin removed your affinity to the Force," Yuthura said, like Mekel hadn't fracking figured that out. "Apparently, under orders from Master Kavar." Her brow ridge raised.

"Because the Fleet requested the end of Malak," Vrook added.

"Dustil… we were in the middle of-we'd just killed a fracking terentatek! If he lost the Force then… he's probably dead." Anger felt strange without the accompanying rush of power. It had been enough to drive the spike into Master Klee, but Mekel didn't think he could take on his dads and Ban. Even with Klee's lightsaber he'd tucked down his skivs.

(Telos would have a smart-ass comment about that. Mekel could almost hear its echo.)

"Where was he?" Vrook looked like he had a million fracking questions. If Mekel had the Force, he'd shove them all back down the man's lying throat.

"Who?" Mekel hated feeling like a stupid fracking rube.

"Dustil. And Malak."

"Dromund Kaas." He could still almost feel the air, damp and wet and stinking.

"Was Revan there?"

"Frack you." But instead of angry, the words came out choked. "Frack off. Dads."

"We can speak of this later. I have rooms near here." Ban. Taking charge. Still that gentle voice. Mekel half expected a trank in the arm, she was being so nice.

"Of course." Lammikins looked like he was properly whipped now. "I-I’m sorry, son. It has been… a very troubling day."

"We can just… go?" He didn't look at Klee, at the wreckage of the room, or wonder about Nurse Soon, with the thigh muscles, or Nurse Faymi with the great tits. Maybe they'd been bought off, not killed. Maybe they were okay. Just because Mekel wasn't, didn't mean everyone else on the fracking floor was already dead.

"If we hurry," Vrook murmured. "And use the service halls. I believe, yes."

Xxx

"#-#-#& &#& #- - () ?#. #+ + +(?)" the red-robed mask said, inflection at the end seeming to indicate a question.

Zaalbar roared at him, waving the (broken and held together with tree sap) shackles on his wrists.

"Doopa chokca," Polla cautioned him, reprovingly in Ryl. There were a lot of Twi'lek on this planet. Like, a lot. That, she had not expected; but it was lucky, considering that Ryl, Huttese, and Basic were the languages she actually fracking knew.

Now, Polla shrugged at the guard in front of them, pushing the visor of her own (slightly bloodstained and stolen) uniform slightly up so he could see her smile. "Ayeeda decka Wookiee loppa tweecka Blais, ya?" Boss asked me to take the Wookiee to the House of Blais?

"#$$#&" the man asked. At least, she was pretty sure he was a man. Red, ankle-length lacquered robes made it hard to tell.

"Blais," Polla repeated, gesturing to the row of low, attached buildings lining the street. "Blais? Doopa Chiga Blais Haus, yah?" Which one is House Blais?

Master Klee should have given me some more helpful phrases in Ancient Sith, she thought. 'Bow down and worship me' isn't gonna fly with this asshat.

"Blais." The guard pointed at one of the doors. It looked like all the rest.

Place reminded Polla of Embassy row on Nar Shaddaa, except without the street crime and trash. Here, the streets were spotless, and sents practically marched single file in unison. Like it was the law.

It had taken Zaalbar forever to get back, almost another whole day. Then they'd spend a night in the tree, chewing on some kind of nuts he'd said were good before scaling back down to the ground. In all that time, Polla had learned that in fact, some snakes did live in trees. Fortunately, they were susceptible to blaster shots.

Zaalbar had returned with an official-looking speeder, more blasters, clothes, and a few bulbs of water. The speeder had one of its thrusters dented, like someone very strong had beaten it in to keep the occupants from escaping. One of the two uniforms fit her okay. The black cloth hid bloodstains, and she supposed the owner wouldn't be around to collect it. Through gestures and the few words of Shyriiwook she'd learned, Zaalbar had explained the basic plan:

Show pass from the speeder to the guards at Kaas City gates, find House Blais, and see if they could get help.

Amazingly, it has all been that simple. Polla supposed that on a creepy Sith planet there weren't a ton of escaped slaves trying to escape towards more Sith. Kaas City was gated, sure, with guards stationed at every entrance. But while there was a multi-block line of sents waiting to pass checkpoints to leave, all they'd done was wave credentials to pass on through and get in.

Now, standing at the door of the House Blais in question, she tried to gather her courage to knock on the front fracking door. Before she could, however, it slid open, disappearing in the wall with an ominous 'snick.'

" #$& & &?" Hello? The kid that answered was in her late teens, maybe, with yellow-gold eyes and long brown hair, half braided, tangling down the side of her face. Her eyes narrowed, taking them both in, and she shook her head. " #$- - aas_+ & & & &."

She was getting sick of Ancient Sith. "Yes?" she said in it, one of the few words she actually knew."

"##&##&.&," the girl replied. Her head turned, and she yelled something, harsh and indeterminate, behind her.

"No! Revan," Polla snapped. She pointed at Zaalbar, and then at herself. "Revan!"

"Revan?" The girl repeated, frowning.

"Yes." Polla nodded. "We're from Revan, you creepy Sith kid. She says you have to help us. Or fracking Malak said it for her. You know Malak, right? Mal-ak?"

"Oh!" The girl's eyes widened. "You speak Republic!"

"It's Standard," Polla snapped. "Not Republic, but you… you speak it too?"

"Of course." The girl shrugged. "Are you the new tutor?" She rolled her eyes. "Mother did threaten to hire another, even after what Inse did to the last one…." She smiled. She had a shy smile. "The last one was a Republic spy from Revan, are you are too?"

Zaalbar groaned something that Polla couldn't follow. It sounded like the bark that meant danger, but when he stretched it out like that was that more danger? Less? Was there a choice?

"Uh…."

"Don't be silly! I know you can't tell!" The girl actually laughed. "Inse will be livid. Nereal's off with Mother-our Lord and Light Tenebrae held another Hunt a few days ago. And Phylus is… I don't know. Probably at a bar. He's fifteen. That's all he likes to do."

"Do you think I speak with an accent or not? Mother says I'll never get to infiltrate if I keep muzzing the 'guh,' sounds, it's like $-#-#-. Or ##&##&&. You know?"

"Sure." Polla offered. "Hey. Think the Wookiee and I could come inside? Have something to eat?"

"This is the main entrance." The girl's friendly demeanor frosted over almost instantly. "Of course not! You'll have to go around back. But I will tell Cook. Inse!" Her voice altered, to a sing-song, childlike tenor, that reminded Polla of schoolyard insults. "Oh, Inse! You'll never guess what Mother has prepared for us now!"

A voice from the house's interior said something in the knifey kriffing tongue.

"That's rude!" Their host called back. "She didn't mean it," she added, dropping her voice to a half whisper. "Inse can't really make you eat your own entrails. You'd die of shock quite quickly before that happened! We timed it last week!"

Zaalbar growled softly. Polla caught the word for 'go.'

If she'd been less exhausted, doing something rational like running might have made sense. But instead she just laughed. Hard and loud and slightly hysterically. "Good one, kid! What did you say your name was again?"

"Mydia." The girl had a gorgeous smile, also quite evil, the way her lips pulled over perfectly even teeth. "Mydia Blais."

"Great." Polla extended her hand. "I'm… Seriina Fracking Starr. Your new tutor."

Zaalbar groaned softly.

Mydia looked up at him, as if she'd just noticed he was there. "And the Wookiee? Is he for vivisection practice?"

"Not if he behaves," Polla said, silently willing Zaalbar to stay quiet so their host didn't do anything like kill them or take away their weapons.

XXX

You'd think with all the training Ban had given her students on Korriban in Force persuasion and compulsion, she might have used her own mad skills to get a better conapt on Coru, one with more than two rooms and a lumpy couch that folded out into a bed.

They'd put Mekel on that couch, her and Lammikins. Frack if he could tell what they were doing. Maybe sleeping on the fracking floor in the other room?

Maybe fracking on it. Would Moms get mad, if old Lammikins cheated? Dustil would have laughed. They would have made a joke. Mekel would have-made a joke and Dustil would have laughed-

The outer door chimed an alert, like someone was there. Mekel's hand closed around Klee's saber. It wasn't fair. He'd had fracking Shan's saber before and now-

Can I even swing this thing without cutting my own dick off?

Telos would have said something funny about that. Smiled that way he did: with the light in his eyes that made them depthless.

Voices now, from the other room. A third adding to Ban's dulcet tenor and Vrook's gravel tones. The third was soft, hesitant. Female. With the Force, he'd have known, sensed intentions, even from a stranger. Now, his eyes might as well be fracking closed, Mekel felt so blind-

The voices went on and on, talking while he refused to stand, refused to get closer. They rose and fell. Agreement. Disagreement. They might as well have been speaking Both'ui, for all the sense Mekel could make of it. When he closed his eyes, all he felt was the hollow thud of his own heartbeat. How did nulls stand it?

*I can't stand this."

They'd killed the terentatek. And then…? What if Dustil was dead?

*No. He's strong. He's smart. His father's there. But if they think he's not Malak… if Malak is gone-"

*Maybe it's like before, when they were in carbonite. Maybe they just got dropped in another vat of carbonite and they'll be back-

Someone knocked on the door to his room. "Mekel?" Vrook's voice.
"Come in." He sat up, reaching a hand to levitate the saber into it-

Except, of course, nothing happened.

Mekel dropped the hand back onto his lap. They'd given him civs to wear, cheap kit compared to the flash stuff he and Telos had back at their conapt. The cheap fabric itched against his skin.

The door opened. Dear old Dads, Ban, and-weird rando surprise, Lydie Fracking Korr, Zabrak hottie. The one Telos got pissy about every time Mekel brought her up.

"Padawan Korr came by to… to see how you're doing," Dads said. Dads sounded pissed too. Maybe it wasn't just Lydie's hotness. Maybe she annoyed the frack out of people. Never Mekel. But…but other people.

"It took me some time to find you," Lydie murmured. "Your mother says hello, Mekel."

"Yeah? You went looking for me at Moms's? "I'm doing great." Mekel levelled a glare at all three of them. "Can't you all tell? With the Force? I'm fracking fantastic."

"I came to explain," Lydie said quietly. Her eyes were a soft blue, like the sky got when the clouds cleared. She was wearing something white that looked like clouds too, some kind of wrapped, white fur-or feathers. Like a coat. It looked rich. She was lucky she hadn't gotten rolled, dressed like that in the Underground. "We Jedi owe it to you, Mekel. Your sacrifice will not be for-"

"My what?" Harsh laughter erupted in his chest. Vrook had said-something, but it made no sense. "My sacrifice? You're working with fracking Sith now, talking about my sacrifice? Dustil might be dead because of you!"

"If Azen and the other masters are wrong, we'll all be dead soon." The Zabrak sounded unnaturally calm. "I know you weren't a Jedi for long, I-I know you never wanted to be one-"

"That's not true," he interrupted her. "Sometimes, I… it wasn't bad, helping sents. I liked that part."

The Zabrak smiled shyly. She was wearing some kind of golden crown around her horns. One of her hands reached up, as if adjusting it. "Me too. I liked that part too."

"This is madness," Vrook muttered. "What kind of strategy is this, when you're proposing we all just stand there, waiting to… to die?"

"I hope we won't die," Lydie murmured. "If the Fleet fulfill their own bargain, we won't."

"What the frack are you talking about?" Mekel interrupted.

Lydie Korr nodded. "That's what I came to tell you. We need your help—all of you. We need more Force sensitives."

Mekel barely recognized the laughter erupting from his own mouth. It tasted like bile. "That's me out then?"

"You deserve to know." She took a deep breath, and folded her hands. "Master Kavar and Azen… some others… they think they've found a way to destroy the… Sith formerly known as Davad Arkan."

"You know they're working with the Sith still known as Oerin Lin, right?" Mekel glared at her. "I'm not gonna judge, but that asshole took my fracking Force away! If they're still working with "They're not. They… never were. It's a trap." She had the prettiest smile, prettier than Dustil's, not that it mattered.

"What was I?" Mekel spat. "Bait?"

"We are all bait." She took a deep breath. "Now, it all depends on us all being bait."

Xxx

Commander Sheen Cody was still trying to live down the humiliation of Peragus Station less than a week before, the incident that had left him locked in a 'fresher nearly naked, with no more memory than a red cap of hair, piercing green eyes and Darth Fracking Revan herself's voice, demanding his clothing. How that could have-that had probably never happened. More likely he'd been rolled and drugged for his officer's pips. Would have been at least a demotion, back in the peace time that was supposed to be still happening.

Instead, here he was being set on Rim patrol, ordered to Katarr of all places, to put the Harbinger in a cloaked orbit with one ship's signature in its banks. With one order: when that ship popped into orbit above the planet-or when the pet Jedi they'd been assigned said the Ravager was there (since it was liable to be cloaked too), they were to open full barrel. Both guns.

No survivors. Not even a life pod must be allowed to reach the planet's surface.

Orders were orders. He was one of six ships in orbit. They'd be lucky if they didn't shoot each other….

And more ships arriving daily, smaller ones, ferrying to the planet's surface. Some kind of meeting, the brass said. Some kind of fracked-up meeting.

What if... whatever they think is coming in the Ravager picks a different ship? Shouldn't they screen all ships? Not that anyone ever asked, 'Naked Commando Cody,' as the smart-asses referred to him now.

It was all banthashit, is what it was.

Naked Commando Cody paced back and forth, staring down now at the sleeping planet below.

An alarm rang, sharply, pinging the distance from his quarters to bridge.

Showtime, he thought blackly.

But when he got to bridge, Lieutenant Gdansk shook her head. "Change of orders…." she began.

Xxx

Their ship descended without incident, landing on the platform allotted. At the last moment, Tenebrae had pinged new coordinates, sending them to this fortress of his, mainly notable for its proximity to the Dark Temple.

The message there seemed quite clear to Revan.

I am out of time.
Although the Red Palace was far from any major population centers, Tenebrae had stacked the crowds with his usual tasteless pomp, possessing a third of it himself; and leaving the others cheering just as vacuously. Even the pleasant electroharp ensemble couldn't drown out the miasma of unease that hung over the entire production.

"Have you prepared yourself?" she murmured gently to Seiran.

"I don't see her." The Deralian was using their viewscreen to scan the crowd. There—at the palace steps—were the twin figures of Revan Starfire's husbands, identically dressed in traditional Sith wedding tunics and singlets. The boy was slightly taller than his father. From this distance, Malak's expression was hard to read.

Will he be pleased to see me? It was the thought of a lovelorn adolescent, not the ruler of an empire, and Revan ruthlessly quashed Sheris's sad sentiment back, as her flesh hand smoothed her hair, and adjusted the simple white gown she'd purchased on Peragus Station, as if it were battle armor.

Her saber went steady in her mechanical hand, lit for show rather than substance.

Seiran jumped at the snap-hiss.

"You must be armed as well," she told him. "Sith lose respect for leaders who have to protect themselves from their own servants… HK?"

"Ancient Sith Aphorism: Blood congeals, where circuits endure. Fervent Objection: Master, this meatbag has sworn no oaths of loyalty, and is not fit to have the honor of carrying one of my lovely Aratech dueling blasters, let alone two!"

"Your objection is noted. Give him the guns."

Sulkily, her repaired droid complied.

"Piercing Observation: Master, he is glaring at you right now."

"Thank you for helping me fix HK," Revan murmured, meeting Seiran Wen's eyes directly. She smiled slightly to show the appreciation.

"It was…." The man seemed at a loss about what to do with the blasters. Of course, he had no holsters.

"You're supposed to just hold them," she told him. "But don't shoot anything unless I say. You-do you know how?"

"My wife's the marksman. But, yeah." He stepped back awkwardly. "Guess she's probably kept inside or something. I'd know if she was dead."

So you keep saying. Revan didn't have the heart to tell the man that wasn't always true. Had Sheris known when Beya died? She'd still been under sedation from the surgery that repaired her face, and it wasn't until Vrook Lamar told her—

Revan shivered, as the memory of her uncle being kind to Sheris superimposed over her own recollections of the man. It means nothing. Merely an example. Not that I'm losing my mind.

The dreams had been worse of late. Scores of dead. Most were nameless—to her, but quite insistent they had names once. Names, families, worlds.
Go haunt the Fragment, she thought bitterly. These are my amends. I'll be among you soon enough.

Or would she? Tenebrae had never been quite clear. And the Kashyyyk installation, when cornered, had retreated to its chatter about damaged memory banks and corrupted files.

*Tenebrae calls it 'unification.' If he isn't lying, I should retain some semblance of autonomy in whatever form I-

HK had excused himself and extracted his large flamethrower from the ship's stores. That had been another Peragus purchase-rash, perhaps, but Revan had wanted a vivid display.

And if I hadn't been so busy shopping on Peragus, perhaps Seiran would have had less time to betray me. But then I would never know that Malachor was adjusting and the Fragment was still alive-

Revan glanced at the viewscreen again. The crowd-those not possessed-were as restless as a crowd of loyal Sith could be: a few discreetly reading comms, lips moving in whispers, most standing still as possible to avoid challenge, a few boastful fools glaring and gloating at each other like wompas in season-

"Shouldn't we… go?" Seiran stood awkwardly, like the dress uniform she'd taken from that Fleet commander on shore leave on Peragus was too small for his shoulders. Seiran been upset about that too, but it wasn't like she'd killed the man-

Xxx

"You know, you're a dead ringer for….

"Revan Starfire?" The oddity was, she recognized him. Commander Sheen Cody, he'd served in Karath's fleet before Malachor. "Yes. I am assigned here to film a documentary production about her life. This is my holo-cameraman-*

"I bet he's your holo-cameraman." Commander Cody seemed inebriated. "Damn. Cept for the hair, you look just like her." His eyes were faded blue and slightly bloodshot. "Holomask, right?"

"Surgery." She tried to remember the name of his command, although of course it would have changed. "Excuse me.*

"How much?" His hand latched onto her arm with a familiarity that was uninvited. "I always wanted to be in pictures. How much? I could… I could pay. Always wanted. Her." He rubbed his eyes. One was twitching.

"Listen, buddy. I think you should move along." Seiran. Coming to her rescue? Laughable effort.

Revan sidestepped his attempts to be her protector, and narrowed her gaze on the commander, bringing the focus of the Force down to a single point.

"Take off your clothes," she commanded him. "Now."

The faded eyes dulled. "I'm going to take off my clothes," the commander repeated. "Now."

Xxx

"Now you have a dress uniform," she told the pilot, tucking the bundle of clothes under her own arm as they hurried through the halls of the station. "Perhaps this was fortuitous, your sabotage of our ship. We did need supplies."

"You... you knew I sabotaged the ship?" His fear was slightly intoxicating, if Revan allowed herself to admit it.

I do now.

"We are allies," she snapped, shorting out another visible camera with a twist of her hand. "Try and keep that in mind."

Xxx

"Revan. Shouldn't we... go?" Seiran's hand brushed her shoulder. He had grown bolder and more familiar indeed, with each day that she didn't kill him.

"Not yet." Revan nodded at the viewscreen. "It weakens Tenebrae, extending to possess so many for so long. We need him weak. Easy to influence. This ruse only needs to hold for a brief time-"

So brief. Her traitorous eyes went to Malak again, there on the dais.

"Right. So you go off with him and then-I get Polla. But where is she?"

"If he'd had her executed her head would be on display." She pointed with her lightsaber to the castle's crenelated balustrades. "There. Like those. She's not there."

The Deralian peered in suspiciously, checking.

Of course, the man took her word for nothing.

Xxx

"Commander Cody," Admiral Rew Ekkumi's voice was professional, not like Sheen had expected her to go with the sobriquet everyone else thought was so hilarious. "You're in orbit around Katarr. Already."

"It wasn't very far from our last position," he said, which she should know. Which she did know. Fleet command wasn't usually one for polite intros. "What do you need, Admiral?"

"There's been a... sighting," she said slowly. "We need a commander with prudence to check on it."

"I was told... uh-I was told to hold position around Katarr. There's a potential Sith threat."

"Yes," murmured Admiral Ekkumi. She hadn't been Admiral for long. Even if Sheen didn't know that as a fact, he could tell by the way she crossed her arms, the way she pointed the cams from her bridge, channeling to his. Like she was three meters tall and a goddess. Like her command came from on fracking high. "And we are aware of that. But there's another concern. Near Sullust. Reports of stolen shuttles, some trace signatures. We need you to investigate."

"What am I looking for?"

Admiral Rew Ekkumi nodded, her Telosian vowels hardening into good Republic durasteel. "You're looking for the Aleema," she said. "The Aleema... or any other Mandalorian indicators in this sector."
"Mandalorian indicators." Flashback to the wars, that was, knowing what that meant. "You're saying… the Mandalorians are… back? With Revan's flagship?"

Rew Ekkumi nodded slowly. "I'm saying it is a possibility."

"What about… what about Katarr?" He could see the planet through the viewscreen now-small and sleeping. The pet Jedi they'd been assigned (this one even younger than General Surik had been, his last commander-the woman that some called the last Jedi commander), turned his head. They were at a distance, but Cody was pretty sure the kid could hear them, even from all the way across the bridge.

"Leave it." She said. Something hard in her voice. Final. "Orders have changed."

XXX

"Now," Revan said to Seiran, and pressed the ship's controls with the Force to lower the ramp. "Before they start Kidark's Second Symphony. Follow."

"Happy Compliance," HK sighed. "Master, I have replayed scenarios of our triumphant return to this galaxy many times."

"Okay," Seiran added, with much less enthusiasm.

"HK, I will need you to take a defensive position. Activate your shields, if we are attacked first. Under no circumstances should you initiate combat protocols-without provocation. Protect Seiran first-he is your primary defensive target."

"Objection: Master, I am surely capable of more precision targeting than this Deralian meatbag."

"Please make him stop calling me that!"

"Childish Taunt: Meatbag, meatbag, squishy squashy meatbag. Meatbag, meatbag, shoot them up. Yum." Since his restoration, HK seemed to even more homicidally gleeful than ever.

"Silence. Both of you." Air wafted in from the open ramp, familiar as memory. Rotting. Home, she thought. A strange thought for Sheris, who had never had one, and even stranger for Revan herself-being so far from her heart.

At least Malak is here. Here, at the end of all things, she could admit that weakness-at least to her own mind. It would be good to see Malak again. It was somehow fitting that the two of them would make an end together-

Sheris's weak heart was in her throat as the crowd burst into polite and synchronized applause.

They made it four meters onto red-carpeted Sith soil before one of Tenebrae's Hands peeled away from the bystanders, and approached, taking her arm with his own. The Hand's nails were long, curling under, and he was painted like a whore-a not-subtle insult, but Revan merely smiled and kissed his rouged cheek. "Vitiate," she murmured. "Or do you prefer Tenebrae? Is this one new?"

"I almost would ask you the same," the Hand replied. Fingernails rasped across her skin and she did not flinch. "Have you had some sort of rejuvenation treatment?"

"It is an important occasion," she tossed her head, so the topknot bounced. The Fragment did that sometimes. "I trust you will grant me time alone with my husbands?"
"Of course." The Voice had thick lips, and when he smiled, she saw his teeth had been gilded and jeweled, his tongue pierced with some kind of green metal. "Although… the point hardly needs saying, Revan… I expect no tricks."

"We are done with games, you and I." She meant it, even as her traitorous eyes scanned the crowd, noting (as she had earlier while still in the ship), the locations of her former allies.

Only Finiris had the courage to meet her eyes, but she noted the puzzled frown on his face.

I may be able to distract Tenebrae for a time, but my allies… they expect to feel her power. That they cannot, confuses them. I must not let it confuse them for long.

"Your former duplicate came masked," Tenebrae murmured. "I think they're pleased to gaze upon your true visage."

"My orders." Revan shrugged. "Where is the girl now?"

"Dead." He shrugged carelessly. "I assume."

Behind them, Seiran didn't react, since he didn't speak Ancient Sith.

"A shame," Revan said, not reacting either. "I thought you wanted to keep her."

"Oh, I did… but she escaped into the forest. We had a hunt, of course; but nothing was found."

Which is different than dead. It made no difference, Revan reminded herself; just as it made no difference that her pulse quickened slightly as she approached Malak in his too-young body, traitorous Sheris causing her eyes to prickle disturbingly, her respiration to increase.

"Carth," she said as they approached, because he was the point of betrayal, the uncertainty. Because by speaking first, she would have the advantage. "It's been so long." She glanced up at Tenebrae, who still held her flesh arm in a too tight grasp. Her fingers tightened on the saber in the mechanical hand, wishing she could be rash and impulsive like the Fragment and drag it through the Voice's guts.

"Oh," the Voice said, releasing her. "By all means, go to him!"

Xxx

"It's not her," Carth muttered out of the corner of his mouth to Dustil, as the woman who was supposed to be his wife approached. Was it? Was he going insane? She looked… younger, as if taking back her memories had made her younger. How was that possible? "I told you, it's not her… but it's really-that's not-that's not her."

Carth's eyes narrowed to focus on her lit saber. The hand holding it glinted, like something made of metal. Gold.

When did she lose her hand?

Relief warred with fury in his gut. It's not just not her mind. It's… not her body?"How can it not be."

"Oh." Dustil was quiet and hollow-eyed, ever since his bondmate's death. Had Revan felt Bastila's as much? She had been unconscious for weeks—was that why? Going by that standard, Carth thought his son was holding up pretty damn well, especially if they'd been as close as Dustil said.
"Right. Yeah, that's... the other one."

"What?" Carth felt like a fool, not daring to turn his head. It was fortunate they'd been placed so close together-less fortunate they were shackled to this fracking ground.

"She's got the memories. She used to be some bint called Sheris." Dustil sounded exhausted. "Didn't I tell you? Some fracking holocron memories. Malak... was... kind of into it."

"Kind of into it?" Carth would not raise his voice, or change his expression. "And no. No you did not tell me. What does that mean, son?"

"I think it means this Revan's not into you, Dad." A flash of the old Dustil there-but not the boy who'd gotten A's in astrophysics, or wanted to take Academy exams. This was the sullen, mocking cretin he'd met on Korriban, back again, like a bad dream. Carth had been trying-trying to get through to his son. But the first flush of grief had hardened into this instead. Hardened into this sullen, silent hulk beside him. They'd barely spoken in the last day. All of Carth's attempts to understand, to make sense had been met with sullen silence-or worse-that blank stare, like they weren't even in the same room.

Wasn't it good that Malak was finally gone-burning in hell, or spun to spacedust or whatever happened to Sith Lords for eternity? It should be good. It was good. But the cost-

Never thought I'd see the day when I wanted to see Mister Sith Congeniality again, but if Mekel being alive would put a smile on Dustil's face-I'd fracking register them for tea patterns myself.

"I don't understand." In the now, Carth gritted his teeth. "My wife... she took back Revan's memories. From the holocron, I knew about that, but-"

"No." His son's voice was mocking. "Your wife didn't. She did. That's a different body. That's not her. I don't know, it was all fracked."

And you're just telling me now? "What do we do?" Panic wouldn't help, but Carth couldn't help but panic. "If it's not her, where the frack is she? Where's my real wife?"

It wasn't hope, he reminded himself. It was concern. Not just for us, but for the galaxy. Is the real Revan running loose someplace?

Is she okay? His fingernails dug uselessly into his palms. His arms jerked the chains holding them.

"I dunno." His son shrugged, talking through gritted teeth. "Malak didn't think Sheris would kill her, but who the frack knows?"

Was it wrong, that the first emotion Carth felt was relief?

Yes. Yes it was wrong. Very wrong. For all Carth knew, Revan was as much an innocent in this fracked plan as Polla Organa herself.

"It's still over, right?" his son muttered. "Even if this isn't her? Please tell me this doesn't mean we're going to have to go find the real one now. You said it was over, Dad. You promised."

No time for an answer, even if Carth had one. The woman and Tenebrae's puppet were upon them. The woman's artificial arm was still extended, with the lit saber blazing yellow in her hand. Her expression was cool, almost smug, and her lips curved in a smile as her gaze locked with his.

"Carth," the woman who wasn't his wife said. "It's been so long."
"It is genuine?" Oerin wasn't entirely sure he still cared. But they'd gone to Coruscant for a map, and a map they now had. "Is this a map into Sith space?"

"It appears to be," their Deralian lackey whispered. He was so much less amusing than Colonel Tobin, the Onderonite lackey and cousin to Davad who'd had the misfortune of being somewhat Force-sensitive-and thus, now deceased. The main thing Jasp Organa seemed to have going for him was a remarkable tenacity. "This is the map from the holochip you provided. The one you said that the Jedi."

"Just tell me the jump points."

Oerin hoped there were enough Force sensitives on this hyperspace trail to keep Nihilus fed. And… perhaps, in their aftermath, some viable worlds suited for Mandalorian expansion.

Really, if Mother had simply kept her designs focused upon Mandalorian expansion, so much other tragedy would have been averted.

"Finally, Dromund Kaas." Oerin smiled. "The Sith capital. If we make it that far, good man, do remind me to buy you a drink. Or Force compel you the ownership of your own small city?"

The man's lips whitened. "However… the master prefers," he hissed. Entirely too much free will in that voice, but Oerin didn't really care. It was touching, how sentients fought for themselves, and more touching, perhaps, for how little it mattered in the end.

"Begin the jumps," he commanded, already turning his head towards the viewport where poor Nihilus stood in a cloud of shadow. His masked face reflected in the glass. "We're going now!" he called out. "I've… I set the last shipment down in the second cargo bay, if you're hungry before our first stop. Ord Mantell isn't much, but Katarr seems very promising. It's a Miralukan colony. They'll all a little Force sensitive. You should find plenty to eat there!"

Nihilus's head turned. Food, he thought.

Carth," Revan said. "It's been so long." The saber in her gold metal hand switched off. She slipped it into a pocket on her dress. Belatedly, Carth noticed her escort, the HK and a man in a commander's uniform. The incongruity of that took a second to register, but when he saw the man's expression, he knew exactly who he was.

I lost your wife, Seiran Wen. Where the hell is mine?

Carth's eyes locked on the woman again. Her face didn't change expression, not even with the red-eyed goon slobbering in her ear. Her green eyes stared back into his. Red-eyed goon said something, and then released her.

She walked up the stairs with achingly familiar grace. She was wearing white. Revan never did. The thin white gown made her skin flushed by comparison, heightened the bright cap of her hair.

"Beautiful," he muttered. Like acid in his throat.
The real Revan would have made a face, maybe even a joke or an objection; but this too-polished woman just nodded her head, stepping forward, until she was close enough that he could feel the weight of her, brush of her dress's fabric against his bare chest.

"We have a mutual friend," she murmured, almost too soft for him to catch. He bent his head forward, and perhaps that was by design, because she rested her lips briefly against his, dry as ashes.

Carth turned his head, lips brushing past her cheek to the delicate shell of her ear. Her hair... it was wrong that it smelled the same. As if they used the same wash, the same cosmet. "She'd better be alive," he hissed in her ear. His arms tightened around her, like he'd hugged Polla Organa before, man on parade, another fracking kath and hessi show for the crazy Sith.

"She's with the boy. Safe. I promise." Her pale hand reached up between them and smoothed the hair away from his face, but her head was already turning towards his son.

"Malak…?" her voice trailed off.

"Malak," she repeated.

Carth could feel it, the moment when every muscle in her body tensed all at once. The sharp exhale. Maybe the Force told her Darth Malak was gone. Maybe it was just Dustil's expression.

"Surprise," Carth whispered bitterly in her ear.

The chains on his ankles clanked.

Xxx

"Malak," Revan repeated, or Sheris repeated. She'd pulled herself away from Dad and approached Dustil, her face suddenly eerily blank.

"Sure," Dustil repeated. Despite the threats earlier, the Sith hadn't bothered with any Force restraints this time, maybe because the Emperor trusted Malak, maybe because they assumed he'd stick around for her. Or maybe because Sith were the same the galaxy over, and never minded a spot of rando violence in the middle of a fracking parade. (They'd certainly had some fun times on Dreshdae during the kriffing parades.)

"Well!" broke in a bright voice behind them. "What a happy reunion!" The chains, (ones that Dustil could have broken himself, if it had been worth it) around his feet broke free, and when he looked, he saw his father's had as well. A flock of Emperor lackeys quickly surrounded them, hustling them inside. Dustil found himself on Revan's left, while his father was on her right.

"Malak," she repeated, but her voice was dulled now. Careless. Her head turned back to the red-eyed glowing escort they had somehow acquired. "I need time alone with my husbands," she muttered. "Now."

"Of course," burbled a voice. It took Dustil a second to notice it was coming from Dad. That enraged him as much as it ever had, and-for a sec-because she was still standing in his way-he saw a similar expression cross this fake Revan's face.

She hates him too. This might be all her fracking fault, her fault Mekk's dead, but she hates Tenebrae too.
For a second, he almost... almost felt sorry for her.

"My droid and my guardsman will accompany us," she continued, looking at Dad now. Dad with the glowing eyes.

"All the way to our chambers?" The way the Emperor talked with Dad's voice was wrong. The bruises Dustil had caused had been covered by cosmet that was slightly darker than Dad's skin. It looked fake.

"When?" Revan demanded. Just one word. Flat. "When are we... scheduled to go to your... tomb?"

"Our tomb," the man corrected her. "I thought we would have a month of ceremonial attachments first. The nobles like that sort of thing. Perhaps a few hunts-did your consort tell you he took down a terentatek, solo?"

_Not solo. It was Mekk and Malak._ Dustil had barely even been there. He'd been distracted, if he hadn't-if they all hadn't been distracted, maybe Mekel would still be alive. Maybe-

_Maybe this fracking scene would be just as fracked._

"A month is too long." Her voice was expressionless. Like she didn't give a frack about any of them.

"We need to organize the procession!" They continued arguing, switching back and forth between Ancient Sith and Standard. Dustil could follow it, if he gave a frack, but poor Dad wouldn't be able to-if he wasn't possessed. Probably just as well, since Dad would probably object to the bloodletting on the sacrificial altars Tenebrae was bringing up now. Dustil didn't care himself if the Sith wanted to kill one hundred Sith kids for ceremonial reasons, but Dad probably-

"No bloodletting," Revan snapped, like she gave a frack. Probably an act, trying to make Dustil think she wasn't evil. _"No ceremony, Tenebrae. Just this body of mine... and yours. Is this the one you've chosen?"_ It was an awkward angle to see, but Dustil thought she reached her hand up and touched his father's cheek. _"This one. Not another?"

"Would you prefer another?" The fracking Emperor almost sounded insecure. Like Mekk, when he was playing helpless to get some girl to make out with him. _Some girl or me. You were such an asshole sometimes, Mekk._ It still hurt. It probably always would.

"I sense..." something had surprised her. "Your connection here. It's... flawed."

"The vessel severed the link while it was still being established. Normally, Revan, I would have culled him immediately, but for your request." A long pause. _"Don't you remember? We spoke at length through the communication device installed upon your droid-"

"Ah." Her head turned slightly, back towards HK. "As you say, thank you for... preserving him for me."

"No thanks for Malak? You know, he killed Master Klee!"

"Good." She turned towards Dustil. _"Klee had outlived his usefulness. These quarters you spoke of."_

"Here." She must have known it, maybe, Dustil thought. Because they stopped in front of the double doors their rooms were in, doors sliding open.
"I hope you like-" the glow faded suddenly. Dad's body slumped. Dustil darted forward to catch it, but Revan or whoever she was had beat him to it, her arm slung under Dads shoulders like he was a drunk on a bender.

"Wha-" Dad blinked. "Poll-Polla, you-

"Where?" a voice cut in sharply from behind them. That man that had come with Revan. The one wearing Republic dress whites. "Polla? Where is she? Where the hell is my wife?"

"We don't know." Takan answered, peering cautiously through the door. "Lord Revan. It's a true honor." Looked like the boy was actually going to kneel. Zepth too.

Dustil pushed past them, like he really was Malak. Like he really didn't give a frack, because he really didn't.

"Finally," Mission warbled, rolling past him, swiveling her dome towards Revan. "It took you long enough, Polla-Revan!" Dustil was already staring out the window when he heard her circuits whine with surprise as she figured it out too. "* #* * *," the droid with Mission's memories added, in impeccable Ancient Sith. "Zepto! Close the door. You and Tak-go lock yourselves in the closet in case he comes back. The perv."

"I don't…" the boy sounded surprised. "But this is the plan. Lord Revan has come to save us all."

"Lord Revan has come to try,"

"The one who's a better Polla-Revan than you'll ever be," Mission made her voder hiss, switching to Ryl. "Get the door."

"Resigned Statement: I am a protocol assassin droid of refined programming, not a doorset." Dustil had no idea how one of Revan's HK droids had ended up here with the Sheris-Revan bint, but the thing was standing right by the open door and not closing it.

With an exasperated sigh, he went to close it himself-only to be beat to the chase by dear old Dad.

"We clear, Mission?" Dad asked.

"Yeah. Soon as they leave." Mission-he kept reminding himself it wasn't her, but sometimes his traitorous brain forgot-extended an appendage and waved it towards the other room. "Go on, Takky, Zeff. Lock yourselves away. I'll give you the need to know later."

"Aye, aye," Zepth said.

When the frack had those three gotten so chummy? Dustil glared at the Zabrak's retreating backs. When the door slid closed, the woman looked at them both and then stepped cautiously back. Dustil would have been one hell of a crap Sith not to have noticed she'd swapped the saber to her flesh hand, or the way the fingers on the metal one were now poised-

Her assassin droid sighed. "Observation: Master, these sentients may not be allies. Requesting permission to switch primary objective from defense of Seiran Wen to aggressive defense of your own person? Reminder: In our travels, I was able to draft personality dossiers on all of the Fragment's companions. This Captain Carth Onasi is more dangerous than his moderate physical conditioning and imperfect aim suggests."

"Thanks, HK." Dad snorted. "You. I think you should get out too. Go with the kids."
"Smug Refusal: The Fragment's original programming forced me to take commands from a meatbag like you, but it has been overridden by my true master. I don't have to do what you say, Captain Meatbag. Not anymore."

"You have your droid," the woman murmured. "And I have mine." Her metal hand extended, and she knelt slightly, as if she was peering at Mission. "Yours is… more than an astromech."

"Empirical Observation: Not much more, Master. Despite being programmed with the Rakatan mainframe's thirty thousand years of sentient observation, this Tee Three unit is remarkably small-minded. Recommendation: Transference of its essential data recordings to my central memory core. I will make much better use of them."

"Denied, HK. For now." She knelt before Mission, extending a hand like the droid was some kind of pet kath. "The Fragment told me about you," she said. Her voice was creepy and soft. "A little. Obviously, not enough. You are… a remarkable being."

"Warning: Master, do not attempt to make friends with it. It is hostile and jejune. Its interests cannot be verified-"

"HK. Cease." The woman's artificial hand raised, and the lights on her assassin droid winked out. She followed that up with a string of nonsense words that caused the droid's chassis to whir briefly, before its triangular head slumped forward.

"It's in sleep mode," she murmured in Basic, before swapping back to the other language, launching a barrage syllables that sounded like questions at Mission.

"It's okay," the woman soothed. "I didn't mean to… Eladiaj. Jersiphet. Millikosh. Rittan?"

"Ficka." Mission snapped. "Where is she? You don't have override privileges on me either!"

"She's safe. Malachor is also safe." The woman stood up, glancing at her own escort, the guy in dress whites. "Seiran will confirm it. But it's not safe for anyone to mention where she-"

"Deralia," Seiran interrupted. "The Bitch left them on Deralia. Where the hell is my wife?"

"Bitch?" The woman didn't look offended only a little surprised. "Really, Seiran?"

"We don't know," Dad muttered. "She and Zaalbar-they got away. In the forest-"

"Polla Organa may be dead." The woman-frack if Dustil was gonna call her anything but that-glanced between her lackey and Dad like she was comparison shopping. "You all just let her go?"

"We escaped," Dustil snapped. "Your fracking husband thought they had a better chance of not biting it without us. We turned back so they could get away."

"We?" She scoffed. "You all escaped and then returned?"

"I-I mean me," Dustil said. "Just me. Dad was… Dad was stuck here. With the Zabraks. Mission and I turned back."

"She's not dead," the smuggler's husband said stubbornly. He'd taken off the dress helmet. Under it, his hair was cut in that same stupid Deralian style that Polla Organa had too, that this Revan bint had now. "I'd know,"
"Hrm." The woman paced to the window, peering out. Not much of a view: less than a meter from the ferraglass was a duracrete brick wall. "Can you sense her now?"

"Just… I don't know." The man rubbed his temples. "This planet is… wrong."

"Extremely," she muttered. Her head turned sharply, those green eyes focusing on Dustil again. "What happened to Malak?"

"He became one with the fracking Force. I-I felt it. Sunlight. Trees. Someone was calling him. And then… he-he left."

"He just… left?" The woman sounded hurt. Poor ickle Revan's feelings are hurt. Aww. Mekk would have laughed. Mekk would have made a joke. If only Mekk was fracking here-

"There was a Force bond." He really didn't feel like going into it.

A long silence, as she stared at him, obviously waiting for more. "And?"

"And my son's… bondmate died. Somehow that freed Malak." Dad broke in, riding in to save the day, like he never had when it still fracking mattered. "They had a Force bond. Malak was trapped between-"

"I know how Bezel bonds work, probably more than you do." Her voice was flat. "Your son is still alive. That shouldn't be possible."

"Thanks," Dustil snapped. "That's rich coming from a fracking holocron recording of a dead woman's life-"

The muscles in his jaw froze suddenly, and there was a tell-tale pressure on his throat.

Asshole! Anger gave him strength, and he shattered her grip easily, feeling the Force splinter and burn where she'd held it.

The woman took a step backwards, as if startled, even if the expression on her face didn't change. "You're strong," she murmured. "Even without Malak and Mekel Jin."

"You're not," he sneered. It felt good. For a second, Dustil allowed himself to imagine the lightning flashing through her, his saber, running through her, her body, burning from the inside out-

"Careful." She'd taken two steps back, circling him now in a way that reminded him weirdly of meeting the real thing on Korriban. Those small side steps. Like some kind of combat training he'd never learned. "This world… it can amplify our worst thoughts. There's strength, but you wouldn't like the cost."

"I've paid my share," he snapped.

"I can get him out too," she told his father, like Dustil had suddenly gone invisible. "Him and Seiran both."

"Right." Dad's voice was flat. He was staring at her and Dustil couldn't read the expression at all. Hate? Fear? Something beyond that. "Tenebrae… when it was me and Polla, he always expected we'd… spend some time alone. If we're alone, he won't interrupt. In a group, he-he thinks it's fair game."

"What do you mean, time alone?" The Deralian Seiran interrupted. "You and Polla spent a lot of "Enough for me to know you're one hell of a guy," Dad told him. "One hell of a lucky guy. You gonna be jealous if I talk to her too?"

"No. Knock yourself out."

"Not literally," the Tee-Mission added.

"Come on." Dad walked over to the other door, the one that led to their bedroom. "It's in here, Revan."

She looked at Dustil again and then back at him. "As you like."

The door slid shut behind them.

"Frack," Seiran muttered. "All this fracking way-" he had that look. Dustil knew that look. It had been haunting him in the mirror for two days.

"Yeah," he muttered, walking to the fridger for a Nutra drink. "Life fracking sucks, right?"

The interior of the palanquin was sweltering and crowded. Inse was wearing some kind of scent that kept making Polla sneeze. Their view—a half-meter-wide rectangle of lace netting set in the lacquered fabric of the palanquin wall, showed only a slice of stage and sky. For most of the hours they'd been here, that view had been empty, with only the roar of the crowd and the progress of the infernal electro-harp music to help Polla gage the time—or when the real Revan fracking Starfire was going to show.

"Oh, my," Mydia murmured, elbowing Polla with the Force hard enough to knock her into the other Blais sister. "Dibs."

"Don't be absurd, you're a mere child." Inse Blais was maybe a year or so older than her sister, but it seemed like decades, if scary Sith was some kind of measurement. "Why would Lord Malak be interested in a mere child when he has Lord Revan? Not to mention any other grown consort he desires at his disposal?"

"Did you see the way he looked at her?" Mydia did the elbow-down-the-lane thing again. This time Inse dodged it. Polla kept her hood up and her damned mouth shut. She'd already almost lost one toe to these psychotic Sith siblings—popping off body parts was like some kind of sport for Mydia, apparently. At least it didn't hurt—even if the nail of her big toe had fallen completely off. "I think I have a chance."

"Best rush," her sister mocked. "I mean, scurry. Scarper?"

"You mean hurry," Polla whispered. This was her, Galactic Standard translator to the stars—or at least the noble house of Blais.

"Hurry," Inse repeated. She turned her head, fine, straight brows drawing together in a frown as she stared at Polla. "Which one is your husband?"

That chill again.

"I never told you about my husband. I didn't tell any of you—"

"Her face!" Mydia giggled. "Told you to watch out for Inse, Tutor Starr. She's tricksy. But it's all mind stuff. Illusions. She can't levitate for shit."

"Why do the grunt work, when I don't need to?" Inse sounded careless, but Polla was sitting close enough to feel the other woman's muscles tighten. Too close. The bench of their palanquin was too crowded with three. Technically, Polla shouldn't be here at all, except Mydia had been kind enough to let her come-

Kind. Two days of life on a Sith planet and that word has a whole new fracking meaning.

"I want to know about the husband," Mydia continued. There was a pout on her full, pouty lips now. "Seriina has a husband?"

"He travels with Revan," Polla snapped. "Frack with him, and she'll kick your ass, like I said."

"So he's the man in the white garments. Kick your ass," Inse mused. "Is that literal...?"

Polla peered through the gap in the cloth surrounding their carried bench. She could see the back of one of the Wookiees carrying their palanquin (not Zaal, he was on the opposite side), a gap of sky, and the stage about twenty meters away, where Seiran stood, stiff and ridiculous in what looked like a Republic officer's uniform. Small comfort it didn't look like he'd fallen in love with the red-headed memory-stealing schutta he was standing _with_, if anything, he just looked pissed off.

Polla knew the feeling. All too fracking well. And then, as she watched, Sei followed the red-headed schutta and the rest of them off the stage.

"There they go," Mydia sighed. "I'm going to ask him to dance with me at the ball tonight."

"Literal," Polla muttered. "All our threats are real. Trust me."

"Oh, I do." Inse sounded amused. Mydia might have a staff missing fingers, but Inse was the one that had kept Polla awake for two nights running now, shaking with fear. Inse was the one who _said_ she was Revan's agent. Polla had no way of knowing if that was true-or not. "I told you I'd get you that meet with Revan, didn't I?"

"Soon," Polla snapped, with more bravado than she felt. "You promised soon."

"And I meant it." The Sith's smile was too sharp. "Seriina Starr."

Xxx

Carth made himself look at her. The features were the same, but the faint lines around her eyes, the scars from the dark side, were gone. One of her hands was metal. The lack of expression on her face was familiar-like Revan, when she'd come back from that blasted temple. Except this woman's left eye kept twitching, like a nervous tic, like a crack in the facade.

It took Carth a while to realize that she was checking him out too, her green eyes slightly narrowed as if she were looking for weaknesses.

It was a relief, he kept thinking, to know that she wasn't the woman he'd loved. She never had been. Or-or it could have been a relief, if he believed one fracking thing she'd said about his real wife, Korrie, and Deralia.

"They're safe," she repeated. "Calm yourself. The Fragment and Malachor are safe. I didn't realize trust wasn't your strong suit."

"I don't trust Sith, sister." He was armed. She was too. Carth wondered if he had a shot, if he should take a shot. If ending it here and now with her would end anything at all.

"How long has… has Malak been gone?" Her voice was more emotional than he expected.
Faltering. Quiet. Had to be a lie.

"A few days." He turned to glare at the window instead of her. It faced a brick wall, as if this time, Tenebrae was taking no chances, caging them in. "The other boy, the one who died."

"My cousin," she said. "Mekel Jin. I thought of his father as my father once. When I was younger. I regret we never had the chance to speak."

"He was… he meant a lot to Dustil."

"Bezel-bonded, he would have to." She sounded like she was already thinking of something else. "I can save your son, Captain Onasi."

He got it. Oh, did Carth get it. He just couldn't figure out which part of the fracking trap this was.

"You can save my son, Polla Organa, Seiran Wen."

"The Wookiee," she added. "Do you know if he received the vaccine?"

"I don't know anything about your damned vaccine." But he got the rest of it. "You've got a lot of nerve coming in here, acting like her when you're not. You'll save them, but not me. Not the Zabrak kids. And Mission? You act like she's yours already!"

"Takan and Zepth." To her credit, he'd only told her their names once. "You've all been compromised. I'm sorry. It is possible—after… after I regain control, if I do—if this works—"

"If what works?" He folded his arms, looking at her lying face. "You owe us that. Tell us what you're trying to do."

"Join the Sith Emperor. Mind to mind. Not dissimilar to a Bezel bond, in fact. I will… become what he is." She was twisting a strand of hair in her fingers. "In this condition, I will be as he is.
Immortal. No longer… no longer tied to this body." She glanced down at her hands, opening and closing the real one.

Carth laughed. "Are you kriiffsing insane? You think I'm going to let that happen? You think we're gonna let you have that kind of power?"

"I'm not… the woman I was." Her eyes met his directly. "In my attempts to resist him before, I became precisely the monster who should never have that kind of power. But now, I—I've changed.
Your wife… she helped me change."

"It's not some fracking magic trick." His voice felt dark and low. "You don't just… just change. It's not like, one minute you're a Dark Lord and the next you're saving the galaxy."

"Isn't it?" Was that humor in her expression? Her mouth tilted up, but her eyes were still cold, staring at him with a near-clinical detachment. "It was for her. And I see no other option. Better me, in this weak body, my powers reduced, than her. It's her he wants, Captain Onasi. Your wife's power… it called to him across the galaxy. If he takes me instead, he is diminished. The Sith are weakened. If he takes her…"
"You seem awfully sure of yourself." Like Revan. Like my wife.

"I'm not." She took a deep breath. "But I am certain that if I am wrong, I will do no further harm."

"And if it doesn't work? Then what?"

"I told Seiran." Her fingers flexed again, she was staring at them as if she'd never seen them before. Or maybe just trying to avoid Carth's gaze. "And I left a message for the Fragment."

"Tell me," he muttered. "You owe me. For Telos. For... all of this."

Her head nodded slowly. She took a deep breath. "If it doesn't work, the Republic will need to destroy this world, and every other inhabited world in Sith space. All... everyone infected with Tenebrae's Kiss. Even those where it is only suspect. Vaccinate the rest. Stay vigilant. In a few generations, perhaps the threat will cease."

He coughed. "That's... that's genocide."

She finally looked up at him. "Yes, Captain Onasi, it is."
Their voices filtered through the curtained wall of her sleeping area. The ship wasn't very large to begin with, and as youngest, they'd given her the least of the cots, the one closest to the engines.

"Is she awake?" Rien was asking. "Our guest?"

"You should check." Diamin, probably.

"No, you go." Dialis. The two of them sounded alike.

"The old woman frightens me." Arien was the only one of her sisters brave enough to admit her fear.

"Make her go."

"It's really her job."

"Is it true?"

"Draw your own conclusions—Mother insisted she come with us to fetch the old scow."

"But they don't even look alike. And the old woman is so… old."

"And blind," Drien giggled. "I had to help her up the stairs."

"Make Bri go check on her." Lileen was the leader. The first decanted. She liked to pretend she was in charge.

There was a long pause. Long enough for Brianna to realize they all knew she was awake—and perhaps this entire drama had been constructed for her benefit.

"I will go," Brianna said, finally opening the curtain of her chamber when the flock of them showed no sign of leaving. "Are we in orbit already?"

"We came out of hyperspace when you were asleep," Drien told her.

"Just like Bri to sleep through the fun spot," Lileen murmured. "Before docking, the TSF demanded to see our clearances."

"They were in order, of course," Drien added. "But we need to eliminate the extra passenger before inspection."

"You will take an escape pod with her," Lileen commanded. "Someone needs to provide escort. She seems frail enough to get lost on the ice."

"You need to go now," Drien added. "We're nearly in range.'
"Of course." Brianna had barely seen their passenger since they had picked her up. Not that she was avoiding contact… she had just not sought the woman out.

Could it truly be true? Her sisters seemed convinced.

Brianna wore the face of her mother, but this woman's face was scarred and blinded, wrinkled and mottled and old. Was it Brianna's face? How could she tell? They had been trained not to care about petty vanity; and yet, Brianna had noted, every one of her sisters was beautiful, cold, and identical: with the same icy cast of face as their master, the woman who had rescued them all from the creche on Eshan during the war in the first place.

For a long time, Brianna had thought her mother had died.

She left her sisters to their gossip and approached the small chamber their passenger had inhabited now for a week, ever since they picked her up on Mistress Atris's orders, from the desert spaceport of a half-abandoned Mandalorian moon. The spaceport had been entirely empty, save for a snub that looked like it had been through at least one war.

If the woman had traveled any distance in that ship, she was braver than Brianna thought she would ever be herself.

She was debating whether or not to knock when the door to the woman's room slid open.

"Excuse me..." How should one address a woman who might have abandoned one at birth or soon after? Brianna had no memory of a mother, and little of a father—who had rather stubbornly brought her, his bastard child, to live with the five properly cloned children—with no warning—for them or her. It had not been a particularly happy childhood, made less so after his sudden assassination by Revan Starfire, newly-made Dark Lord of the Sith.

The old woman, this Arren Kae, looked up at her, through a face seamed with scars. Her eyes were filmed-over white, and her expression was perfectly blank.

"Ah," she murmured. "At last. The quiet one."

"Lileen says you and I must depart now," Brianna said. "To avoid the Telos Security Force. They would have questions and you...."

Was there a polite way to say, you are wanted in five different star systems as a traitor to the Republic? To Eshan and Serroco?

Her father's stories may have been biased, but Brianna remembered them well enough: instead of opposing Revan and Malak after the tragedy at Malachor (that no one spoke of), Arren Kae had followed them.

"I am famous. In some quarters." The woman smiled stiffly, rising to her feet "My cane. Do you see it?"

"Of course." She handed it, strange, metal hilt and all, to the old woman.

"Come closer." The woman held out her hand. "You... you are the youngest. You... you and your brother—"

"Brother?" Perhaps Brianna had been mistaken about this, as with so much else. "I have no brother."
"Do you not?" The woman beckoned her closer, and Brianna found herself complying.

A cool, calloused hand reached forward, brushing her shoulder first, and then fumbling across her collarbone, cupping her chin. The hand explored the contours of her face, while the blinded eyes stared into hers.

The woman's hair was as white as her own, as white as Atris's, or her sisters'; but it was the white of age, like the scars of age on her skin. The crumpled skin of the woman's face was raw, and pink, and mottled with spots. "Actually," the old woman murmured, soft enough that her voice could barely be heard, "You have two brothers, but one is already dead."

"My father is dead too," Brianna ventured. "And I do know that you are my moth—"

"That word is meaningless. In this age, it is best I use a different name. You may call me Kreia," Arren Kae said.

"Kreia?" Brianna wondered if she should apologize for a moment of near-weakness.

"Yes," the old woman murmured. "Arren died long ago. And Kreia is nothing more than a blind fool, seeking recompense for past wrongs. Seeking an end."

"Pardon." From the doorway Drien cleared her throat. "We've reached polar orbit. You both need to leave now."

"Of course," murmured Kreia. She took Brianna's arm, stepping forward, blindly forcing Brianna to lead her down the hall to the escape pods.

As they walked, Brianna cast surreptitious glances at the old woman's face. I have the face of my mother. She had been told of this all of her life. Was it there—in the slant of cheek to furrowed jaw? There—in the peak of the woman's hair where it grew onto her brow?

"If you know who I am, you must have questions," the old woman said, as they seated themselves in the small vessel. Side-by-side and seated, they were of identical heights, even if standing, the woman was much shorter, stooped by her age and experience.

"No," Brianna demurred. "Mistress Atris explained to me. You had to leave my father because he was married to another. My sisters all resemble him, of course. But I alone—"

"No?" The old woman sounded startled. "No questions at all? Atris has raised an incurious child?"

"I am curious about many things," Brianna protested. How the reclamation efforts progress on our blighted world. Why Ithorians sing when they garden. Why Lileen sneezes in sunlight, even when Drien does not, even if they are genetically identical clones. "Too many to list." She did not want to be rude.

Fortunately, their shuttle picked that moment to accelerate out of the docking bay, launching them into free fall onto the Telosian pole that waited below. The scream of engines hitting atmosphere, and the sudden acceleration of g-force was sufficient to drown out any further inquiry.

XXX

There was an electro-harp band. There were ice sculptures of alien species that Dustil could swear he had never seen before. There was a row of red-robed and hooded sents standing all in a line in the vast, domed room, creepily not doing anything at all. There were nexu cubs with golden collars, and painted Twi'leks and Zeltrons wearing only a little more than collars themselves: all following—or fastened to—red-skinned Sith, or Human, or hybrid aristocrats.

_You can tell their status by the quality of their armor_—a vestige of Dustil's brain informed him.

There were servants—_slaves_—his brain whispered again—_they keep no servants. There are slaves and those who keep them, and the Emperor, who makes slaves of them all, and that is all._

Dustil shook his head sharply. It wasn't like Malak was actually _there_. Just random banthashit he knew was. Came in handy for languages, got really fracking dull when Dustil's brain suddenly focused on crap that didn't matter; like the politics of a world they were all about to leave—

And _how_ were they gonna leave again? Dad hasn't really explained; he'd just come out of that private meeting with Her Highness Revan Starfire—_Sheris_—his brain whispered unhelpfully.

Dad had come out of the room looking white as a sheet, with that look on his face that said they were in the banthacrap now. Dustil remembered that look pretty damn well—Dad had it the last time he'd seen him on Telos when he and Mom had that fight about leaving to re-enlist; and again on Korriban, when he'd told Dustil he wasn't giving up on him. No matter what.

Dustil couldn't wait to find out the glorious plan this time.

But first, they were at this party. Because... apparently, when you were an immortal, body-swapping asshole, the best thing you could do with your time was throw a fancy-dress party to welcome home your prodigal Revan Starfire; the galactic, all-star, pageant queen.

And a _boring_ fancy dress party, even if Mekk—_don't think about him_—would have had a lot to say if he saw what some of the sents were—or weren't—wearing. Like that dude over there—Twi'lek, male, yellow—all he had on was a loincloth and a _leash_.

Dude was being led by a relatively normal-looking female sent. Blonde. Black lace dress. A little thick, Dustil thought. Like she could be someone's mom. Someone's evil Sith mom with a Twi'lek on a leash. Malak's mind had been full of some freaky banthashit, but Dustil didn't think even the former Dark Lord had spent much time at events like this.

"Oh!" A younger brunette in silver nudged his elbow in a gesture that was totally contrived. "My Lord Malak! I did not see you!"

"Maybe you had your eyes closed," Dustil drawled. "Your dress is very shiny."

"It's armored." Without asking, the girl took his hand and pressed it against her ribs. She was right. What he'd taken for fabric was hard as duracrete. "Cortosis-woven, of course. I suppose you remember Mother and the textile factory deal—we've expanded production by... kind of a lot." She shrugged, and the dress moved, all in one piece, up and down across her breasts. "I don't know the exact numbers because they are extremely dull." She fluttered her eyelashes at him. "Dance with me?"

"I was kind of busy," he lied. What was the plan here? Dear old Dad hadn't really said much of anything except they had to survive the next day or so. _And then what?_ Revan Starfire had said a lot. She talked a lot more than the mindwiped version. And she was a lot bossier... but she hadn't had a plan either. Just endless instructions for Dustil.

XXX

"Do not approach anyone. You outrank them all, except myself and Tenebrae. They may approach you. You do not have to speak." She paused. "It would be best if you speak as little as possible. You sound nothing like Malak."

Dustil folded his arms and stared back at her.

There was a long pause. She broke first. "Well?"

Dustil blinked and gave her a banthashit-eating-grin.

Mission—that droid—whirred, making a sound like a wry chuckle.

"Dustil," Dad sounded tired. "Just work with her. For now."

Dustil smiled harder, so hard it felt like his teeth were going to fall out.

"Do you understand?" Revan repeated.

"He's not speaking," Seiran, that Polla-woman's husband, sighed. He and the Zabrak kids hadn't been invited to this stupid party. Lucky them. "Like you asked, Revan. He's not speaking."

"You'll get us all killed," she muttered, glancing back at her pet HK again. "All of you, with your useless insubordination. Is this room secure?"

"I said it was," Mission whirred.

"Statement: As secure as it was five minutes ago, when you asked, Master. Do you have a broken processing unit?"

"Even your droid thinks you're nuts," Dustil muttered, just loud enough to be heard.

"Fools." She turned and left the room, the wings of that gown she was wearing sweeping out on either side. Mekk would have probably thought she looked hot. Malak would—

Dustil closed his eyes. All fracked.

XXX

"I will take the honor of this dance from you," the girl took Dustil's arm and draped it around her own back, then clasped his other one in hers and led him out onto the dance floor. There weren't very many sents dancing, and the ones that were, immediately moved aside, giving them a wide berth.

"Okay, I guess," he muttered. Her eyes were a strange yellow-gold—not quite sithy, as they used to say; but not far off.

She was doing this strange, one-two-three side-step thing too, but it wasn't hard. Ban had insisted on dancing lessons for all of her students. She'd said it helped with combat and diplomacy. Dustil had honestly never thought he'd need to put it to use.

What the frack would you say if you could see me now, Yuthura Ban?

He extended his arm, and the girl twirled gracefully off of it. The electroharp jangled in the background. If Mekk had still been alive, it might have even been funny.

"So..." he added. "Textiles. Yeah, they're interesting."
The girl's eyes met his. She smiled. She had dimples. Mekk would probably have already asked her to make out with him in the closest supply closet. "Do you really think so?" She gave a heavy sigh. "Mother expects us to have a complete understanding of the business, but I don't think it matters if she's not going to be around much longer, do you?"

"I guess not. Uh, I'm sorry she's ill."

"If only," the Sith girl sighed. "Sadly, she's in perfect health."

"Oh." He thought he could see where this was going. "Sorry, I'm way too important and powerful to kill your mom for you."

"I can handle it perfectly well." Her lower lip stuck out in a pout. "Or my sister Inse will do it for me, which is much cleaner, I think. Don't you?"

"But you want something." She did. It was obvious. Was it sex? Was it just sex? Should they have sex? Mekel was—Mekel was dead. Was it okay that Dustil was thinking about—frack, Mekel would have probably already had sex with her.

"You're so perceptive." She beamed. Her bosom heaved. Dustil couldn't help but look. It was just... they were just... there. "Lord Malak, we have a mutual acquaintance. Or two." The girl in his arms fluttered her eyelashes at him like she was having some kind of episode of the Rodese Itch. Still holding his hands in her own, she bowed again, elaborately, and Dustil bowed back, because that had been part of Revan Starfire's crash course in etiquette before the beginning of this stupid dress ball.

Acquaintance? "Who?"

"Some slave girl and her large pet. I brought her to the party. Inse took the pet. She says Wookiees are sentient; but if no one can understand them, does it matter?" she giggled. "Slave girl told me you sent her to us. Rather naughty of you, after your wife tried to make our slaves rebel and have us all killed." She paused. "With all things considered, you owe me two dances. Perhaps more."

Wookiee? And Polla Organa? Frack. "I would be honored, Lady..." he grappled with his own slippery thoughts for a second before the name came to mind. The one Malak had said to Polla, the family he had told her were safe. "Lady Blais."

XXX

"If someone challenges you to a duel..." the woman responsible for pretty much everything bad in Dustil's life, including, apparently, this entire fracking planet, frowned. "It is acceptable to refuse. It will lower your social standing, and perhaps encourage others to also request dueling with you... but in the short term, refusal is the best response. A refusal won't get you killed."

"Don't look at me," Dustil muttered. "Sounds a lot like the Senate back on fracking Coruscant."

Malak had thought so, at any rate.

Her eyes narrowed. "Are we sure this room is secure?"

"Didn't I say it was about fifty times?" Mission snapped.

"HK, check again."
"Appeasing Indulgence: Oh, yes, Master? May I? Now that we are in the heart of your Empire, let me fulfill my prime function as a surveillance-jamming piece of circuitry."

"Hah." The woman actually smiled. "If you think it's secure, HK—"

"I told you it was." Mission was using the Revan voice too. Dustil wished she—it—wouldn't do that.

"Don't do that," the woman snapped. Either she was reading his mind, or she thought it was fracking annoying too—

"Leave her alone!" Dustil hated being in the position where he had to defend the droid pretending to be Mission Vao, but if he had to choose between her and the woman who knew exactly all the terrible things she'd done, he'd back the droid every time.

"Observation: The Sithling sounds nothing like Malak, Master. He seems altogether a more cringing species of meatbag."

"But he does know things." It made Dustil distinctly uncomfortable, the way the woman kept staring at him. She didn't look sad, like she missed kri-ffing Malak—she looked like she was trying to decide if Dustil needed to be alive. Even knowing he could take her in a fight didn't make that more comfortable. "Coruscanti Senate customs. Ancient Sith—"

"We studied it in school," Dustil interrupted.

"Your grades were mediocre," she said. "I checked Malachi's records on your potential before we left Coruscant. Strong in the Force, but academically—"

"Academically, he was fine," Dad broke in. "That's my son you're talking about!"

Thanks, Dad, for the defense. Yeah, like that wasn't also creepy: her knowing what his grades had been. On Korriban. Wait—

"Why did Malachi have records from Korriban?"

"We were working with him, for a time." She raised an eyebrow. "You call him Malachi?"

"I don't care," Dustil told her. In flawless Ancient Sith.

Xxx

"Where is Polla Organa?" Dustil asked Brunette in a lowered voice.

"Is she your bed slave?" the woman—girl not much older than him, maybe—smiled. Maybe she smiled, he'd moved past looking at her face.

"No," he snapped. "She's... you know what? She's not important."

Polla Organa got us into this mess in the first place. Mekel would still be alive it wasn't for her. My mother would still be alive if it weren't for Revan. I don't owe these people fracking anything!

At least Mission was back in their rooms. Mission. I mean the Tee-Three. She could project an image of the Twi'lek girl that looked almost real. She'd showed Dustil that, maybe she thought it would cheer him the frack up?

It had not.
"I don’t have as much data, of course,” she offered. Except for the translucency, her girl’s body looked real, down to the banthahide shorts and sleeveless vest she was wearing. "But if you want, I could extrapolate the missing parts and run a reasonable Mekel simulacrum—see?"

In a heartbeat, her appearance shifted: lekku vanishing, skin changing to a color between vanillin and gold, eyes going black, stubble—

"No!” He didn’t realize he’d yelled until he heard Dad's alarmed voice from the other room.

The picture of Mekk cut out abruptly, and the Tee-Three gave an almost guilty whine.

"I’m fine Dads—Dad!” he called back. "Totally fine!” Totally fracking fine. Of course. Who wouldn’t be?

Dad appeared in the door. Behind him, one of those Zabrak kids. And her. The real Revan.

"Sorry,” Dustil said. "Mission and I were just… talking."

"Okay.” Dad frowned at them both. "You both okay?"

"Totally," Mission chirped. "I just showed Sithboy this really gross vid I found on the HoloNet, about skin pustules—"

"Don’t ever do that again,” Dustil added. To Mission. "Ever!"

"Hah, okay….” Dad didn’t look like he quite bought it but close enough.

XXX

"You seem light-years away, Lord Malak.” The brunette fluttered those eyelashes again.

"I was just thinking about taking over the galaxy,” Dustil told her. "Maybe bombing more planets? Are you from here? How are Dromund Kaas's aerial defenses these days?"

"Thule,” she tilted her head, giving him a puzzled stare. "Of course, I’m from Thule. Surely you remember: you have mountain estates that back up onto our property line. As a child, I used to play with some of your servants—"

"Sure, uh… you were a cute kid.”

When she smiled she had dimples. Mekk probably would have tapped her already. "Yes, I was. I knew you noticed!"

Not at all creepy and fracked.

"Much cuter than that gardener of yours. Inse said you were cross with us, but Nereal and I both thought you, of all people, would understand. It was just research!"

"Yeah….” Dustil didn’t want to know, but she was telling him anyway. The story of how Malak had to get new servants after the old ones got broken.

At least it killed his ardor. Talking to her was starting to make talking to the fake holo of Mission Vao sound pretty good.
A hovering vid camera flashed in his face. Dustil smiled at it, automatically.

"What are you doing?" his dancing partner hissed. "Smiling for the Netz? It makes you look awful and weak."

"Frack you," Dustil snapped, glowering at her.

Her own smile was small and discreet. Smug. "Much better."

XXX

Across the room, Carth caught a glimpse of his son, safe in the arms of a pretty, brown-haired girl. She had a sweet face, and they seemed to be engaged in an animated discussion. For a disorienting second, Carth allowed himself to relax.

But then the woman in his own arms tightened her gloved, artificial hand on his arm like a vise and reality came crashing back.

"Avoid eye contact," she murmured. "You have honorary status as a Darth, but you need to avoid challenges."

"Tell me why," Carth muttered, tilting his head down to whisper in her ear.

"Why avoid challenges?" She raised an eyebrow. "Because you would lose. Badly and painfully."

They were dancing of all things; perma-crated into this role by a mass of vid cameras and flashing lights. It was not all that different from the blasted Coruscant events that Senator D'Reeve had dragged Carth to before; or the Mandalorian party, which had ended in a disaster and a wedding. A Mandalorian wedding ending in disaster was probably some Mandalorian sign for good luck when Carth thought about it; although he hadn't had any himself.

He lowered his mouth to her ear. "No! Tell me why I should trust you're going to help my son. Help Polla and her husband. Help any of us."

"This isn't the place," the woman he was starting to think of as Revan—the real Revan in a way that his Revan could never be—murmured back.

["Tell me why."] he repeated, in the gutter dialect of Telosian street language he'd never known that his wife knew—until she used it with him.

Revan stiffened in his arms. ["A better choice, but still not safe."]

["None of this is safe."]

She was all sinews and tension. He was going to have a bruise from the way she was hanging onto him. To keep him from running? Or to support herself? Both of them were wearing absurd, red dress uniforms—a step up, at least, maybe from the shorts and half-vest he and Dustil had been shoved into earlier; but still… not—

Frack safe. The hell with safe. None of this is normal.

"Come with me," she murmured in a voice that might have been sultry if it didn't sound so fake. "There are places we can go for privacy." The smile on her face was a lie, but an almost familiar one. Poll—Revan—had smiled like that before with him, laughing off her nightmares, or the Dark Jedi attacks, or her arguments with Bastila—
"Let's just stay in public, okay?" She'd already told Carth he wasn't getting off this planet (according to her), and he was worried about Dustil. His son was still across the room where Carth could keep an eye on him, and still dancing with that brown-haired girl. She looked close to his own age—and almost wholesome—for a Sith.

"You have no idea what we're facing—"

"I have a pretty damned good idea," he snapped back, not lowering his voice. "Whole time you were falling to the Sith? I was fighting the Sith."

"You're right." Her gaze was steady and direct, as they danced, so close he could feel her breath on his skin. "You were. But very little is secure on this world for anyone." Her eyes flickered to the row of silent-red-robed onlookers, all faceless and visored, varying only height. "See them? Those are slaves. The higher the station of slave, the less they wear. Low-status ones like those are expendable, replaceable. Tenebrae will want to sacrifice all of the red-robed ones later for one of his rituals. He'll make me beg for their lives. And I will, of course. I will beg for their lives. No matter what you may think, I am not a monster."

"Will it do any good?" Do they know? He looked at the row of silent sentients.

She didn't answer. Not directly. "The ones he saves, he will possess. Would they be better off dead?" She didn't blink, red-lashed eyes staring into his, like twin jolts of green.

"No," Carth said. "At least alive they have a chance—"

"Even if he uses them against us? Against the Republic? He loves blinds, you know. The non-Force sensitives. They go unnoticed where more powerful vessels cannot. Blind spies, who—" she broke off abruptly, as they veered close to another dancing couple. "You're a very good dancer, did she teach you?"

"Who?" For a moment, he honestly didn't know: the concept was so foreign, the formal steps they traced across the floor so entirely different from anything he'd seen his wife ever do. "Oh. No. We—we didn't have time for much dancing. I don't…."

That one night on Taris, when she'd danced at that damn Sith party. That had been nothing like this. That had barely been dancing, just a sultry twist of hip and thigh on the bar, preceded by a feat of athleticism that had startled him then, but now that he knew her, he knew had been nothing at all.

XXX

Her cheeks were flushed from the wine, but Polla seemed more grounded than he would have expected, after the fight that had ended with him storming off and vowing never to have anything to do with Deralian smugglers ever again.

He—he hadn't even come here for her, Carth reminded himself. He'd come because Doc Forn said there were rumors of more Republic soldiers in the Lower City, and he needed to get back down there and check them out. He had come because it looked like the best way to get down there was to snag one of their passes, or uniforms, or even a set of that ridiculous-looking silver armor—

And she was still wearing that damnable Sith hat, dancing close with some sleemo who hadn't even taken off his night goggles. He couldn't help but notice the possessive way the guy held her hip, her arm, the way she pressed into him—

"May I claim this dance?" The dark-haired woman smiled softly at him. She was wearing an Imperial uniform now. Lieutenant. "I remember you… from the bar, before?"

"Yeah, I-I remember you too," he muttered. Hard to forget, when she looked so much like— "Sure, we can dance if you want."

Polla Organa had obviously said something hilarious, because all the sents around her burst out laughing.

Carth frowned.

"Looks like I'm not your first choice." The Sith's voice was light. Her hair was long and dark, cascading down her back. Couldn't be regulation.

Maybe it was only the hair drawing Carth's eye. The woman was a damn Sith; not like he was gonna sleep with the enemy—

Carth had forgotten his own wife's face. Oh, he'd salvaged an old album, and there were the vids and snaps they'd stored in the wires… but he kept the album locked away in a bank vault on Byss with the small pile of things he'd salvaged from his son's room.

Maybe it was just the hair.

"I'm sorry," he muttered, already walking past, to tap the smuggler's dance partner on the arm.

"I gotta cut in here, bud. She's with me. She's my crazy sister."

"Frack off, bro." Crazy Sis had a warning light in her eye. "Don't want me to tell these nice Sith officers about your contraband biz, do you?"

"Depends," he muttered. "Do you want me to tell them about your contraband business?"

"I offered a discount." Polla Organa shrugged, casually and the guy she'd been dancing with just kind of… melted off her. Stepping away like she'd shrugged him off like a bad cape. She raised her voice. "My rates are better than my brother's!"

His eye was drawn to three Sith in the corner. Not drinking. Not smiling. Just staring. And, there—near the exit, two were whispering. And the woman he'd been talking to earlier… she had her wrist raised now, talking into her comm.

There were too many damn Sith in the room; and they'd drawn too much attention. Every instinct Carth had said to run, said this was more than it seemed.

But then Polla Organa, who was certifiable, tensed on her feet and did a backflip, launching herself nearly two meters into the air before coming down on top of the bar, coming down with a perfect arch of her back, landing on her feet, suddenly towering over them all.

Strangely, one guy near the back let out a startled yelp and ran out of the room.

The music abruptly changed. Tempo became something slow, a little sad. But the drums held steady; driving, like the beat of a heart.

And then she began to dance.

At the time, he hadn't understood, hadn't known. Hell, half the sents in the room didn't look like they got it either. A few more left—left fast. Some in a corner were still whispering. For all he knew at the time, they were about to be arrested—or worse.
But Carth suddenly couldn't tear his eyes away from her. Later, he'd seen her fight the same way. Later than that he'd seen how Jedi trained and started to understand.

Jedi made fighting an art: one as graceful as the woman he'd thought was Polla Organa had made that dance upon a rickety Taris bar. But the beauty in their violence didn't make it less bloody, or terrible, or sometimes tragically unavoidable—

XXX

"Have you ever danced on a bar?" he asked.

"A what?" This Revan only looked confused. "A narrow strip of metal? To what end?" She frowned. "Why are you asking me this?"

"That isn't… never… never mind. You're a good dancer too." For someone who invaded the galaxy.

She was, but tight and precise, as if each step had an exact sequence; he'd bet every footstep she took was the same stride, down to the centimeter.

"Thank you," she murmured, still frowning slightly.

Over her shoulder, Carth's eyes went back to the line of red-robed sents. As he watched, one of the shorter ones lifted a hand and waved in their direction. Carth turned his head, but there was no one behind him. He turned back. The fingers crooked, beckoning him closer.

To plead for her life? His life? Her, Carth thought. The red-robed figure was shorter than he was, and her hands looked small.

He shrugged back at her. What am I supposed to do? Should he tell the woman he didn't trust farther than a cheap suit on Sullust to make sure to save that slave in particular? She says she will try and save them all.

She says she'll try. My wife wouldn't try. My wife would just do it.

"Follow my instructions," Revan murmured in his ear. "Find the smuggler and the Wookiee, and get them and your son ready to board the Ebon Hawk. When I procure an opening, they must take it. Immediately. Seiran is an excellent pilot. He has everything mapped; we will just need to program your ship. Ours had some fuel leak issues on the way here."

Carth's fingers tightened on her arm, just a squeeze. "That's not gonna happen, Revan. Think of a new plan."

"You will also need to record a message for your wife." She continued as if he'd said nothing. "In that message, you will explain that there is no escape for me—or for you. By the time she reads it, our fates will be quite literally sealed."

"Hey! Just a minute now, no—"

She held her hand up and Carth felt his mouth close, more in shock than for any other reason: although for a second, it felt like an invisible hand had locked his jaw for him.

"I've made a few sample texts of the verbiage if you would like to select one. It you prefer to write your own words, I or HK will need to review." Revan hesitated. "If you would prefer to say things of a personal and intimate nature, HK can read, approve, and then delete it from his memory core.
"I've already written that subroutine for him."

"No," he repeated stubbornly, finding his voice. "No! And what the hell was that? Did you just make me stop talking?"

"Captain, I'm trying to give you a choice—"

"You call that a choice?"

Dying here with you and trusting you to get them out is a choice? What's behind docking bay number two?

He'd raised his voice too loud, it was obvious from the expressions of the sents around them. "Come here," he muttered, and drew her into a deserted hallway.

"This isn't secure—" she began again stiffly.

"Nothing is secure," he snapped. "Do you think… the real you worried if the Star Maps were secure? Or Korriban?"

"The real me?" Her voice grew colder. "That ignorant, impulsive—"

"Woman. Whom I love."

"Who," she snapped.

"Who," he gritted, "isn't you. You talk a good game; I'll give you that. But if I push it—what if I push it?" What if you're wrong about pushing it? She could kill you right now. "We could all just leave. You too… or… we could all just leave you here. Alone. You might be able to stop us, but you'd have to kill us first. You up for that?" His pulse was almost ringing in his ears.

Those green eyes widened and then narrowed. One side of her mouth twitched. She didn't blink. She had a better pazaak face than Poll—than either Polla Organa or his wife. Her expression was perfectly blank. But not those eyes. He knew that look. That squint, narrowing its focus until what was in front of her was all that there was in the world.

"Carth—" she began….

And the world went out in a wash of white.

When Carth came to, he was a meter to his left. His cheek burned. In the reflection in the gleaming marble wall, he could practically see the outline of a hand print.

And scrawled in front of him on the wall, obviously left by dear old Tenebrae, were the words:

What did you say? Tried to make up and it didn't work out. Better luck tomorrow night. I think you're in the guest room now if you know what I mean.

Tenebrae had included a crude diagram. It was all written in what looked uncomfortably like blood, although Carth could find no injury on his own body. But the tips of the fingers on his left hand were bloody, leaving no doubt as to who had written the words.

In whose blood?

He closed his eyes, not wanting to know.
This is the man who controls Sith space, Carth reminded himself. This immortal, body-swapping freakshow controls Sith space. Holds our lives in his hands.

There has to be something I can do!

Xxx

She could have sworn he'd seen her wave. Hell, both of them should have seen. Carth Onasi and that sulky Sith-possessed son of his.

Polla Organa was sweating under the gross red robes, which seemed to have some kind if vinylarium layer just to make them as stuffy, humid, and uncomfortable as possible. Mydia Blais had told her to just stand around and be silent in this row of other, red-robed sents who none of them seemed to say a word; but Mydia Blais was currently dancing with Malak or Dustil or whoever he was.

For a party, this sucked. The way everyone was dancing looked like a bad imitation of a holosoap. The guests wore robes so long it looked like they'd trip and half of them seemed to have half-naked sents (mostly Human or Twi'lek) hanging off their arms, or serving them food like… servants. Or slaves.

So many slaves here. They outnumbered the masters (who all wore armor like the Blais kids), by at least ten to one.

Right now, Polla was starving. She'd tried to grab something off a tray earlier and been threatened by the waiter. Apparently, the 'food was for guests, not vessels.' Vessels? Sexist, Gamorrean, pigmen Sith should watch how they talked.

But something in the man's eyes, the feel of the room, maybe the fact that they were on an evil planet… something made Polla Organa hold her tongue.

She had tried waving at Malak or whomever twice but whichever one he was didn't seem to notice. And where the frack was Seiran? If Revan was here, shouldn't he be here too? She'd tried waving to Carth too, dancing with her maybe-evil twin, and he'd just looked confused. Maybe it had been a bad time, he and Revan Starfire had looked like they had a ton of personal issues.

She'd kind of gotten that impression on the ship too, come to think about it—the way he got so defensive whenever Polla asked a simple question like, "What's she really like?"

And then, speaking of Revan Thanks-for-the-Memories, the woman came barreling out of the hallway she'd just gone down with Carth—only now, without Carth. Polla had no idea how she could move so fast in a filmy white dress that long, but it was probably the Force.

"Hey!" she yelled, leaving the line of sents and planting herself directly in the memory-stealing Dark Lord of the Sith's path. "You! We need to talk."

The woman almost plowed right through her, as if Polla wasn't even there, sidestepping only at the last moment. Looked like she was going around Polla—like really, not even noticing at all—anything!

Well, that was just too fracking much. Polla stuck out her shoe.

Turned out that Dark Lords of the Sith could trip and fall just like anyone else—although it was an impressive piece of athleticism that made the woman bounce right back up again. Polla might have even appreciated it more, without the red, humming laser sword suddenly held at her throat.
"Don't move," Revan warned her would-be assassin. "Tell me who ordered you."

"What are you saying?" Her assassin asked in Basic. "Don't kill me! I'm sorry… maybe tripping you was wrong. But I don't want to die for it! Where's Seiran?"

"Oh." Revan switched to Basic, suddenly aware of the whispers, all the attention they'd attracted. She deactivated her saber, pinning it back again. "You're..." speaking Basic, irrationally assaulting me, pleading for your life, and naming your husband, all in one breath. "Polla Organa. We have been looking for you." She took the woman's arm with her flesh one and half-dragged her back the way they'd come.

"Is that the sacrifice you want to save? Just the one this time?" One of Tenebrae's Voices popped up like a child's fencing toy in front of them, and Revan gave him the full force of her glare as a response.

"Frack off, Tenny bro," the Deralian added, just as foolish and vainly as her personality duplicate would have—with extra vulgarity.

"Imposter Revan!" The voice had golden teeth and red skin. Not quite a pureblood, but close. "There you are. I missed you! I had quite assumed you had died in the forest and been eaten by beasts!"

"Nope. Here I am." The woman tugged at her red headdress, pulling it off. "Surprise!"

She was the same Deralian that Revan had met with Seiran and their son in the Coruscanti sewers; only now with garishly dyed hair and artificially green eyes; smiling back at them, smug and utterly mad, as if they both were not capable of ending her life immediately.

"My missing servant," Revan said to Tenebrae. "One of them, at least. There should be a Wookiee as well—?"

"I don't keep track of your pets," he said. "That is in the contract."

"Zaalbar's with Lady Inse Blaise," Polla Organa told them both.

"House Blais—?" of all the places you could have gone, you might have jeopardized everything! Revan kept her voice even and calm. "So it was Inse Blaise who brought you here?"

"Her and her sister Mydia. I'm their new... tutor, apparently."

"Tutor? Is this Tenebrae's game? But no, he thought she was dead. But if not him, then who...? "Tutor for what? Smuggling?"

"Galactic Basic," Polla told her. The Deralian squinted as if Revan had something wrong with her face. "They hired me to tutor them in Galactic Basic—although they didn't mention salary, come to think of it, just me and Zaalbar not dying. Why would you think...? Smuggling? You sound like it's supposed to be an insult."

"It is a crime," Revan began—

Polla Organa made a choked noise in her throat. "Oh? A crime? Really? On a scale of one to ten, smuggling's a—"
"Ladies," Tenebrae interrupted. "Much as I am enjoying your minor conflict, it is disruptive to some of our guests."

Revan became aware that they were being watched by the other party goers, albeit from a discreet distance. Hopefully those are all nobles who have not employed tutors in Galactic Basic.

The Sith worlds had been closed to outsiders a millennia before Revan and Malak came. Most of the aristocratic families still avoided what they considered to be 'cultural contamination.' Revan and Malak had won their position within the Sith hierarchy by virtue of Tenebrae's favor, coupled with their strength—though it had taken the occasional display of raw power to keep the other families in line.

Before Malak killed me, I was organizing the slave leaders to rise in open rebellion. I suppose they failed, without me.

House Blais, in particular, had been crucial to her plan.

I cannot ask if Lord Rhea survived his wounds, or if Lady Herpia knows I had spies within her own walls.

Revan shrugged at Tenebrae, attempting to dissemble. "Malak told them to flee. Apparently, your hospitality was substandard even before my arrival, Lord Emperor."

"I offered your imposter every comfort!" Tenebrae's indignation was feigned, of course. She wanted to throttle him very badly, anger rising like dark water in her throat.

But anger does nothing. I will not waste more lives, even damned ones. Not if there is still another option.

"My husband," Polla interrupted. "Is where, now?" She waved her hand at the room. "I need to see him. Right now."

"Husband?" Tenebrae interrupted. "You're married?"

"Disappointed, huh?" the smuggler shot back, as if Revan was not standing right there.

"Not entirely." The Sith smiled. This Voice had filed, sharpened teeth. "I will enjoy meeting the man worthy of you—"

You pathetic fool, handing him more leverage!

"Excuse me," Revan interrupted. "If you're quite finished, Tenebrae, I will take custody of my servant."

"Servant?" There was an arrogant glint in the smuggler's direct gaze that would have been laughable in less dangerous circumstances.

"By my own grace, I think I've got it! The Republic officer who came with you! Is he your husband, imposter?" The Emperor snapped his fingers. He was not entirely stupid—not stupid at all—as Revan had learned, time and time again, in fact.

So many thwarted plots: the slave rebellion, the Taris virus failure, the Manaan virus's distribution, the Dark Council's open rebellion—and where are my allies now? She could sense fear, like a contracting noose around her throat—the doubts of the Sith, their suspicions, their sense of her own weakness….

They are waiting for me to prove myself. Prove myself again, but how can I? Oh, Mal. Dark mirth "Republic officer?" Polla Organa coughed. "Um, yeah, sure! That's Seiran, all right! So, where—where is this Republic officer again?"

"I will take you to him," Revan said quietly, glaring at Tenebrae's vessel. The man had a bland, forgettable face, except for the brand affixed to his forehead that marked him as an official Voice. One of the chosen. He'd be strong in the Force—

Stronger than Sheris. Stronger than me.

"Revan." Carth Onasi appeared in the doorway of the hall where she'd left him after Tenebrae's intrusion. He stopped dead, as if taking them all in. "Poll—you!"

"Hi," the woman chirped back. "Where's Seiran?"

"I'm… I'm glad you're okay."

"I'm great," Polla Organa snapped. "I really want to see Seiran. Zaalbar's here too," she added. "There are these crazy Sith kids who seem to think we're their slaves." She elbowed Revan, as if they were friends attending the same lecture. "You need to have a talk with them. They'll be scared of you, right?"

"I will take custody of my servants and husband," Revan commanded Tenebrae. "And I believe we are also still missing a Wookiee, if you could be so kind as to locate him…?"

"I don't keep track of your pets, but I believe I saw a Wookiee in the lower dining hall," the Emperor said. "Shall we go look?"

"We're good," Carth interrupted. "We can get the Wookiee ourselves."

"Say, we can get the Wookiee ourselves, My Lord," Polla Organa muttered beside him, momentarily impressing Revan with her knowledge of appropriate etiquette. Then she ruined it. "The asshole likes that."

Revan took a deep breath, steeling herself not to react to the woman's abrupt demise, but to her astonishment, the Emperor only laughed.

"I absorbed all manner of insults from that one when I thought she was you," he commented to Revan. "Let's make her the first sacrifice of the evening?"

"Hey!" the smuggler squawked. "No!"

"No," Revan echoed to Tenebrae, projecting a calm that seemed remote as Hoth, compared to her present state of mind. "She is my servant. I wish to send her back to the Republic as an emissary, to tell them of their impending doom."

"Oh, no." The Voice seemed to pout. "I was quite looking forward to a surprise attack!"

"It is still a surprise if they have no knowledge of the time or place." I will do everything in my power to assure the attack never comes. My strength in the Force may be diminished, but my will is not. I will stop you, Tenebrae.

I must.

Carth Onasi opened his mouth, and then closed it again. Had his own smuggler played games like these? Or was he planning another betrayal?

"Shall we fetch my Wookiee now?" Revan glanced at Carth, extending her arm for him to take; but it was Tenebrae's vessel who did so, with a wry chuckle, leading them to the recirculating lift, leaving Carth Onasi and Polla Organa to trail behind them.

"You slapped me," Tenebrae murmured in Revan's ear. He made her flesh crawl. "I was expecting… something more… electric."

"You were in my husband's body." She kept her voice cool. "I did not want it damaged. Make an advance to me again in another body, and trust me, you will feel pain."

"Hardly fair," the Emperor pouted. "You know that's the one sensation I don't like."

"And you know it's the only one I will ever give you," she murmured back. "That's in the contract as well."

"For now, but when we are one who knows the myriad delights and torments we shall find together?"

_Cold as Hoth._ Her breathing was steady and even. "For now, My Lord."

Xxx

"Are you okay?" Carth's lips brushed Polla's ear, he was whispering so close. They were walking close enough to conceive, as Ma used to say, back home. Whispering as quiet as they could. Hoping Force users couldn't hear them.

_Ma. Da. Abasen. Will I ever see you again?_

Polla had a really irritating moment of blinking back tears, while they walked. Carth Onasi didn't press it. He wasn't a stupid man.

He and his wife had all the chemistry of a wet sock and a pomato.

_Maybe they're going through a bad patch?_

"She… uh, she probably has to walk with Tenny-Bro, but if you want us to swap places, I can handle that asshole," Polla offered. "I think he likes me."

"Somehow I don't find that reassuring." His stubble scraped her cheek.

"Are you… okay?" she asked him. He seemed… a little too calm, if that was a thing.

He laughed. "Are you?"

"I thought she'd be nicer," she muttered. "I'm not that much of a bitch. Usually."

"Seiran calls her the Bitch," Carth offered.

That was funny, so Polla laughed.

"We can hear you," Revan-the-Bitch called out. She glanced back. "And now isn't the time for any exchange of emotional expressions—or the exchange of anything."

"She's afraid I will hear of one of her little plots," Tenny-Bro said. He glanced back too, and then turned back to the Bitch. "Did you know, she was searching the galaxy for a year looking for a mystical Rakatan artifact she thought could contain me? And my servants had it all along! All of that trust… betray—" his words cut out in a choked gasp, as suddenly there was a green, glowing laser sword sticking through his back.

His body slid to the floor with a snap hiss and a thud. Revan Starfire stood before them, looking too pale and upset about killing someone to be a good Sith Lord.

"I should not have… I should not have done that." Revan exhaled sharply, shaking her head. "That was rash, that was foolish, that was something… something she would have done. I know better, I __"

"You shouldn't have done that," Carth muttered. "But I don't think there's a tribunal in the galaxy who wouldn't understand."

Revan Starfire just looked at him, and for a second, Polla could see some chemistry. Maybe.

She didn't want to kill the moment, but they needed to get on with finding Zaalbar, so they could find Seiran. "Look, I've never actually killed anyone in my life? But I was thinking of making Tenny-Bro a first."

Maybe it was even true, although she hadn't expected… the smell. The smell was bad. "And since it's like you're me—"

"No." Revan shook her head and clipped her lightsaber back to her belt. "We can't talk about this now. I need you to go, now. Your husband is upstairs. There are… there are two ships… other ships. Take Seiran and run. I… I will find another way to evacuate Carth's son and the Wookiee, but they… you… you need to go. Go now, Polla Organa. Go home."

"I need to go," Polla repeated. "Go now—" her feet itched with the urge. "Go—"

"Unsporting," said a voice beside them. Not Carth's, even if Emperor Asshole was using Carth's mouth. Eyes glowing red. "Were I a lesser man, I would demand immediate recompense."

Great, they were back to this again. "It only lasts for five minutes," Polla told her other self. "Tenny-Bro can only possess Carth for five minutes. Takes him a while to jump back in. Because he's flawed or something? We timed it."

"Analyzing my weaknesses with one of your baits." The dark voice chuckled. "You haven't changed at all, my Starfire."

"She's not yours," Polla snapped.

The woman in question was silent, staring at Polla with an expression that on anyone else might have seemed like mild surprise—but from what Polla had seen of Revan Starfire's expressions, might even have been admiration.

Nice to think so, anyway.

"Did you just try and make me leave with the Force?" Polla added. "Like on the vids?" It had felt… weird. Like it was her own mind telling her. Like something she knew was bad was good. Despite her bravado, her skin prickled with unease.

These are Sith. Actual, real Sith. Revan stabbed that guy with a laser sword!
"Never one of her strengths," broke in the Emperor. "If you would allow me to do it for you, Starfire…"

"In a null body?" Now Revan sounded like she was getting the hang of the mocking of the asshole. "You have no power here."

"Except this man's life," he murmured. "How much value in a life, Revan? It's a dance we've stepped so many times before."

"Let the others go." Revan's hair was cut and tied in a neat Deralian topknot. Maybe it made her feel safe too—something familiar. It made them look more alike—Polla could see it now, here in person: the resemblance she'd tried to find in all of the vids. "You may keep Captain Onasi, but let the others go. They are nothing."

"You want to bargain? So they will betray me? Have them run back to your Republic? Did that Republic welcome you with such open arms? Not that I saw. You were surrounded by the ashes of the Jedi and death. Here, you will be cherished. Here, you are necessary—loved, needed!"

"So you explained," Revan said, so emptily that Polla felt sorry for her. "So you explained years ago. You have me. Let them go. It's my price."

"Always bargaining, even with me. Even now."

Carth's head turned towards Polla, eyes glowing that hellish red. "I don't even know your name, slave; but you've impressed me enough to inquire. I believe Captain Onasi called you 'Polla,' before?"

He did? Oh, frack. "No. Not Polla. Seriina Desiderata Hyperdrive," she snapped. It was the first thing that came into her head.

"Can I have her?" He turned to Revan.

"No," she clipped. "I vacc—she's received the vaccine. She's immune to your touch, her and her husband both. That is why they make excellent messengers for me."

"What a waste, I would have so much fun—"

The red faded abruptly from Carth's eyes in mid-sentence, leaving only a warm brown. He blinked, rubbing them.

"Okay, you killed the guy and then… guess I didn't miss much." Carth didn't look upset about the dead guy at all.

"If you want Tenny-Bro dead forever, I'm in," Polla told Revan. "No one that creepy should even have one body, much less a hundred."

"He has billions," Revan told them. "Or did. He… he neglects them. Sometimes they—they don't always come back."

"What was he saying about a box?" Polla had a million questions but the babble about a box was a good jump point to start at. "What box?"

"Nothing." Revan shook her head. "A fool's dream. My-my uncle used to say we have to measure: sometimes the cure is worse than the cost."
"Which uncle?" Polla laughed. "Can't really see Boon saying that and Fredd's kind of a gambler —"

"Vrook." Revan frowned. "My Uncle Vrook."

"Oh. I did meet him. Hey, and your cousin, that kid? And his weird whore mother, and the Mandalorians—some of them… I never got to meet Canderous Ordo, but Aemelie said we'd get along like a planet on fire…. You guys got along too, right? So… um…."

"You should never have come to Coruscant." Revan bent down, retrieving the dead guy's lightsaber and clipping it next to her own.

"No fracking shit," Polla said. "But you remember what Auntie Mita always used to say? About good things coming from experience? And experience coming from fracking up?"

Revan looked irritatingly blank.

"What about when she said that the trick's not to make the same mistake twice?" Polla was still trying to live up to that one. "I know, we went back to Therion again, after that; but you know as good as I do that at least he was kind of a fun mistake, least before he double-crossed us with the Biscain deal—"

"Wait. Wait a minute. She doesn't know?" Carth interrupted. "You didn't tell her?"

"Which one of us are you talking to?" Polla demanded.

Carth was looking at his wife now though. Not her. Which made it pretty obvious.

"Wait!" Polla added. "Tell me what?"

"There was no time. This isn't the time!"

"No." Carth shook his head stubbornly. "She's offering to… to help. She needs to know who she's helping, Revan. Who you really are—and who you're not."

Revan glanced down the hall, and moved her hand. The lights cut out abruptly.

"Nice trick," Polla offered, trying to hide her fear. "Why'd we do that again?"

"Hopefully, I shorted out the surveillance." Her other self sighed. "Carth is correct, I had assumed Seiran would tell you when it was safe, but I do not want to mislead you. I would prefer you think well of me, Polla Organa."

"Then don't talk in circles," Polla snapped. "Not when there's something to say. "Out with it."

"I am Revan," the woman said. "The real Revan, not the Hero of the Star Forge. Not the woman with your memories."

The real Revan. Polla tried to make that make more sense than it did. Of course, you're the real Revan. I'm me, and then… you're the real Revan. No banthashit!

"You mean you're not me, or you didn't destroy the Star Forge?" She frowned. "What?"

"No. There are two—two of them. Two bodies," Carth added. His voice was strained and soft. "She's a holocron copy of Revan… the one the Jedi took before they wiped my… my wife and made her…into you—kind of you."
"Two bodies?" Two Revans? Two of me? Or—none? It made no sense. "What about me?"

"I… admire you very much. My other self is very like you. Brave. Loyal. A bit foolhardy."

"Two bodies?" Polla remembered something. "Wait. Not more than two?"

"Just the two." The Revan who wasn't her at all narrowed her eyes. "Ah, you're wondering about the nurse in the Coruscant Underground. Yes—that was, that was me."

Polla looked at the woman's hands, but both were gloved. One of them could have been gold and fake.

"Could have fracking said something then!"

"I had no idea who you were either." The woman smiled slightly. "Did you really find that bunting in a discard pile?"

"What? No. It was an anonymous gift. You do mean the blanket, right? Abasen's… blanket."

"Perhaps a gift from her."

_Her. And by her she means the Revan from the Star Forge._

"There are two of you… and the other one, she was the one in vids."

That meant—

"She has my memories? Still? Does she still… she's the one who's me?"

"She thought she was you." Carth was looking at her now with an expression way too raw to be looking at a stranger. "She was you until Malak—"

"No!" Polla started walking again, walking down this hall that seemed too dark and empty in a palace full of people. She heard both of their footsteps behind her, but she didn't turn around. "I don't have the fracking Force. I would have told you and Bastila Shan to go frack yourselves back on Taris."

No one said anything, but she could hear their footsteps behind her, following.

"She did," Carth muttered finally. "Not in so many words, but—"

"No, in those exact words." One look back, just one. In this light, Revan could have been a relative with that hair, except for the color.

Polla turned to Carth instead of asking Revan more questions. "Did she kill her? The real me? I mean, the… me the Jedi put in her?"

"She says not." _Shouldn't he know?_ "Seiran says they left her on—"

"Please!" Revan interrupted, and in that moment, Polla knew it wasn't all banthashit, because Revan sounded exactly like the woman in that vid from Eos she'd seen in the _Official Version:_ even looked like her—kind of glaring and intense. "Don't. Seiran knows where she is. Should you… seek a reunion after this place, she will be there."

"Where?" Polla had had quite enough of this. "And where's the hell's my son? Abasen? He was with Sei—and you said on the comm he was safe, you said he was with your son but—"
"He is safe," the Revan murmured.

"Safe where?" Polla stopped walking. "Seiran's here, so who's watching—?" She had a bad feeling. "Did you leave him with the Mandalorians?"

"No! No!" Revan shook her head. "He is safe. Seiran knows. He will take you there, but in this place, you cannot... you can't think of him."

"Deralia," Carth muttered. "With my wife and Korrie. She left them all there. Seiran told us."

It was very dark in the hall, but she could see their faces in the dim light. Revan Starfire looked pissed, but said nothing.

Polla raised an eyebrow at Carth. "Kinda explains why you two have no chemistry."

He chuckled softly. "Yeah."

"And how do you know the other Revan's gonna stay on Deralia? What's she doing? Visiting my folks while you're back here saving the Sith?"

"Stopping the Sith," Carth muttered. "Not saving."

"It will be dangerous for the galaxy if she does not stay," the woman said, so seriously that Polla laughed.

"She saved the galaxy once already? The one you ruined? Maybe she's got a better idea than you? And you said I could leave. So where's Seiran? We'll go right now, him and me."

As soon as we find the spaceport. This palace was in a different place than the one she'd landed next to before.

"You shouldn't have caught Tenebrae's attention. It may be harder now." Revan looked grim.

Xxx

"It's quite fascinating." The small, cropped-furred Human girl speared another skewer of meat on a stick from a passing slave and handed it to Zaalbar, allowing him to eat it with a wordless nod of her head. "I can't read more than your bare emotions, and I'm usually quite good with intraspecies communication."

"I do not care," he yowled. It would be nothing to break the chains, but Inse Blaise had told him he could not, and now, much to Zaalbar's distress, he'd discovered that was true. "Where is Polla Organa?"

He caught her scent, and Carth's—and one he thought was Carth's son—nearby. There was another, darker scent as well: the madclaw Revan.

"Can't understand a word," the girl said, switching from Basic to Ancient Sith. "You primitive cultures are so... loud!"

Zaalbar realized he was making a low, whining noise and stopped.

"This your new boyfriend, sister dear?" A shorter cub had approached with no warning. Male voice, speaking in their infernal tongue that Zaalbar had studied after the shame on Korriban, when he had not understood the foolish yellow-haired's threats and had almost caused harm to Carth and Polla Revan.
The Mission ghost had told him he had great skill with language, even if his mouth was ill-formed to speak their twisted words, and in truth most languages did seem simple enough. For example, Ancient Sith was a tongue not so different with its roots than the language of the Builders of legend who had fashioned Kashyyyk in the first place.

The new Human was young, even less grown than Carth's cub. He had dark brown, almost normal eyes, atop a long, pointed Human nose and a near-furless face.

Inse smiled, baring her teeth. "How amusing, Phylus. You should try that joke on Lord Scourge, or Hashan. Don't think I'm not aware of how you are quaking in your boots. Why are you even here?"

"You have to ask?" Her brother-cub Phylus laughed. (The other Wookiees in the horrible infidel stable had spoken of this one. The soft Blais, they had called him, though whether due to temperament or lack of physical exercise, Zaalbar had not thought to care.) "Free booze. A chance to see the woman who killed our father right up close…." He was holding up one of his skinned paws, as if he needed to compute the reasons. "Very hot women, meat on a stick, booze and… Mother said Rhea-Junior had a summer cold and one male from our family had to come. Since Nereal's off on another gormack hunt, that leaves…"

"Phylus," the girl-cub sighed. "Mother is senile. The Emperor doesn't care if you're here or not. He has eyes only for that Republic mouse, Revan Starfire, traitor Dark Lord of the Sith."

"Can't fault our Most Highest's taste. Revan's highly acceptable," the cub agreed. "I think I'm gonna get an autoprint. You want one?"

"I do not," Zaalbar's cruel Sith girl snapped. "I want you to go away." Her eyes seemed to glitter, somehow. "You want to go away."

"I want to go away." The boy's voice changed, grew flat.

Zaalbar whined anxiously.

"You want to go away," the evil girl-cub repeated. "But first you want to duel Lord Revan for our father's honor."

"But first I want to duel Lord Revan. For Father." The boy-cub's hand trembled, as if he had been stricken by the sap-sickness. "I want to duel Lord Revan. I-I want to… but that's Force-spawned insane."

"So?" His madclaw sister yawned. She waved a hand. "Be grateful I finally found a death worthy of you! Oh… and before you die, make sure to tell her that we found Cook Dekla's cache. Ask her what's in the vials? I had one of the grooms drink one, but he just broke out in spots and died."

"I will tell Lord Revan we found her cache—"

"I," Inse Blaise corrected. "I, Inse Blais, found the cache."

"—and that one of the grooms died." He frowned. "Which groom?"

"The one with the beard?" Inse rolled her eyes. "Mydia would know his name. She had him in her bed often enough."

Xxx

"Oh, there's my sister," Lady Blais murmured in Dustil's arms. She had demanded an escort to the dining hall, and so here they were. "See? She's the ugly, hideous crone, feeding meat on sticks to your Wookiee."

"Yeah?" Her sister wasn't ugly—she looked a lot like Lady Blais, only with shorter hair and a bigger rack. Mekk would have thought she was really hot. And standing next to her—there's Zaalbar, which is more the point. Dustil sighed with relief. He barely knew the Wookiee his father had been traveling with, but it was good to see that Polla Organa hadn't gotten him killed too.

Mekk would fracking love this. Except that he was dead. It was getting easier to think that and not lose his shit. Dustil's eyes stayed dry now and he could swallow past the lump in his throat.

Strangely, talking to Dad before had helped.

"Hey! Uh… that's my Wookiee," he added, remembering suddenly to pretend to be Malak, who probably did think he owned people. "I need that—my—Wookiee back."

Lady Blais giggled, taking his arm with a possessive air. "Shall we go ask Inse to give him back?"

"I don't ask." Lord Malak—frack! Why do I call him Lord anything? Because Mekk would? He's dead! Malak would never ask. "Let's go get my Wookiee." Dustil moved faster, half-dragged the Sith girl across the floor with him.

The short-haired girl—Inse—looked up at their approach, mouth widening into a pleased smile.
"Lord Malak. It is a great honor! What are you doing with my poor, dull, pox-ridden sister Mydia?"

Inse and Mydia Blais. Now he knew their names. "That's my Wookiee," Dustil growled, suddenly tired of all banthashit. "Give him back. Now."

"Are you sure?" Inse had short brown hair and yellow Sith eyes. Pretty fracking yellow for someone that young. On Korriban, they'd taken eyes like that as a sign of power. Now, Dustil just took them as a sign of Sith crazy. "Because we have eight Wookiee in the stables and they all—"

"I'm sure," he snapped. "That's the one. His name is Zaalbar."

["We must free my enslaved brethren before we depart this accursed place. But are the others safe as well?"] Zaalbar groaned. ["Polla Organa was with the braided one who stands at your side.
Where is she now?"]

Gotta thank Malak for leaving the Shyriiwook in my brain.

Dustil glanced over at the 'braided one,' Mydia, who was twisting her braids now and looking at her sister with a thoughtful smile.

"I'm sure," he repeated as an answer. "I'm sure I'm taking that Wookiee now. Polla Organa can take care of herself.

"Inse?" Mydia giggled. "You've got that look."

"Which look?" The Sith girl smiled back. "The one that says I finally found a fitting end for our dear brother?"

"Oh!" Mydia beamed as if she'd just been given a nameday present. "Really?"

"Really." They had almost identical smiles, and both of them made Dustil want to stab them.
Or run. Mekk would find it a turn-on. Mekk would be arguing with me right now over which one he wanted to bang—

It was really fracked, feeling jealous of two Sith that your dead bondmate would probably want to frack. Really fracked, even, missing someone who thought like that, who made Dustil think like that. Really, really fracked to be thinking about someone who was dead. They'd all learned the same fracking Korriban lessons. No point in doing that at all. Ever.

"Dear Brother Nereal's up in the Dark Mountains," Mydia said. "Are we sending him an exploding cake? Because I'm not sure even he is stupid enough to fall for that twice—"

Inse Blais sighed. "No. We need Nereal. In fact, I need Nereal more than I need you."

"Rhea Junior is with mother?" Mydia drummed her fingers along Dustil's arm as if she was using it for an electroharp. Suddenly, she laughed. "Oh! Phylus? You're talking about Phylus. Really? But why? The poor boy's almost a null."

"Phylus, will be challenging Revan to a duel…." Inse smiled, and made a show of checking the jeweled chron on her wrist. "Right about now." She looked up at Dustil again, her eyes narrowing. "Are you sure you're Lord Malak, My Lord?"

"Do you think he's not?" Mydia tilted her head, frowning. "He does seem a little subdued."

"He's frightened, and confused and…." Inse tilted her head and Dustil could feel her, like tendrils of Force pressing against his thoughts, worming in, asking—seeking—

Dustil closed his eyes, channeling all of it: his rage, his pain, his… his hatred into power. Power they could feel.

"Oh!" One of them sounded impressed. Mydia.

"Forgive me, My Lord." Inse's voice was only amused. "I was merely curious."

Dustil opened his eyes, glaring at her. Revan had warned him about this planet, and she was right: it was dark here. Dark like Corellian whiskey burning through his gut, like a shot of glitterstim, like tapping into the power he and Malak and Mekel had merely grasped before—

Oh, but stronger. Much stronger.

"Careful," he warned Inse. Warned both of them. He suddenly felt ten meters tall.

Xxx

The doors opened on another room, near-identical to the first. The two red-eyed Zabrak children stood on either side of the doorway, clad in matching livery, both possessed by their infernal host.

"There's your Wookiee over there…." Tenebrae beamed, extending Takan's hand forward, gesturing them inside. "Or is it another Wookiee? House Blais has several of the animals."

Revan looked up, watching the Wookiee approach, trailed by Dustil Onasi and what appeared to be two young women.

Herpia and Rhea's children.
Lord Rhea of House Blais had taken his wife's name upon marriage, as Blais was one of the few matrilineal lines among the ancient Thulian houses. He had taken Herpia's name and fought her battles for her, dueling Darth Revan and losing—one of Revan's last engagements, before meeting her doom above the skies of Deralia.

Herpia had been typical of her class and culture: easily flattered, wealthy, and cowed by an overt show of strength. Their eldest son Nereal was a brute, notable only for his blades. The younger, Rhea the Second, was more involved with his mother than any battle for dominance. The two girls, Inse and Mydia, had still been property of their tutors three years past. And the youngest, Phylus Blais, had been a favorite of her agent.

Of all of them, Phylus was the most trustworthy, Revan had been assured, as if any child of twelve was ever trustworthy—as if any sentient of any age was ever trustworthy.

It had been a risk, hiding the remaining stores of the Selkath-made virus in the heart of a House loyal to Tenebrae; but the Blaises normally stayed on their Thulian estate; leaving their townhouse in Kaas City empty and easily accessible. It had been a lesser risk than leaving the live virus stored in Revan's own palace, or somewhere else where Tenebrae's blinds might infiltrate. Everyone in the Blais family had been secretly immunized—their servants as well—most without consent or knowledge.

Davad Arkan had recruited the agent. Revan had never even seen the woman's face, didn't even know her name.

House Blais had been a small cut-out, a cell ignorant of its own role within Revan's intelligence network. Like every cell, it had its weakness: all of its security hinging upon its most trusted family servant: a bastard scion of Herpia's mother, the beloved family cook—

"My sister, Inse Blaise, says to tell you she found the cache of vials you left with Cook Deckna," a young voice interrupted Revan's reminiscence (and confirmed its futility) with the effectiveness of lightsaber to the skull.

Revan took a step to the side and turned, to keep all three within her sight.

Phylus. He had grown from being a boy of twelve into a taller boy of fifteen. Long and impossibly gangly, with a boy's growth and none of a man's strength. Revan immediately dismissed him as the least threat—but his voice drew her back again.

"Also, Lord Revan, I have to challenge you to a duel. Right here and now."

"I refuse," Revan said automatically. "Until such time as you come of age."

"I am fifteen." The boy—Phylus Blais—sighed. "Inse said I have to challenge you to a duel. For our father's honor."

"The age of consent for dueling is—"

"We lowered it," Tenebrae broke in. "It's ten Kaas years now. I believe that is twelve Republic Standard?"

"He's obviously compelled." Trapped eyes. A child's eyes.

"Again, no violation of our laws. Now."

"Cut the banthashit, Tenny-Bro!" The smuggler snapped. "He's a kid. You know she'll wipe the floor with him!"

"Would you, I wonder?" The Emperor laughed. "Shall we let your imposter duel this weakling, Revan?" He frowned at the smuggler. "Are you Sheris Darkstar? You don't quite look—"

"Sheris is dead," Revan interrupted. "This woman is an actress. I believe I told you before."

"Stay back, Polla," Carth was warning the smuggler—and using her real name. "Trust me, don't… don't get involved."

"Polla?" Tenebrae's voice sharpened. "What an unusual name on this side of the galaxy: a Polla, traveling with Revan and Carth Onasi…" You fools. He's not stupid.

A sinking sensation, all the way to her toes. That hall—the hall that had led them here. Too dark, too empty. Too perfect.

"Pretty common name." The smuggler looked calm, at least.

"Sheris is less so," Tenebrae mused.

Revan stared steadily at him.

"I tire of games," the Emperor murmured. "Especially ones that are not mine. Will you duel the boy now, Revan?"

What is the life of one boy? She could beat him so easily. Too easily. It had to be a trap.

The boy even looked trapped. Wide-eyed. Wisp of hair like a smudge of dirt on his lip. It had to be Sheris's weak mind who refused to kill the boy. He was merely one boy, and they had killed so many. It had to be Sheris's emotions that spiked through the ice in her heart and saw the relentless futility.

This war will never end.

"Duel the boy for the lives of the slaves," Tenebrae continued. "Oh… and the lives of your companions. Save Malak. He can live, even if you fail. I can always find a use for Malak."

Revan's throat felt dry. Negotiate terms. Malachi had told her that, long ago.

Xxx

"Negotiate terms," Malak's father said, leaning over the reports she'd brought him. Reports from the Senate, refusing aid. Reports from the Fleet's junior officers—the ones who had first agreed to join their fight—but only on their terms: with Jedi backing. Full Council backing. A Jedi Master on each ship.

All well and good—except they had no masters. No masters and no Jedi Council. All the masters had refused them. Even Kavar Vakla, in the end.

"There's no point," Malak said flatly. "We've lost."

Malachi said nothing out loud, merely turned his head to her. Those eyes—so like his son's but cold—widened, and he held up one hand, silencing his son. Urging her to speak. Even without the Force, the old man knew—the old man knew that Revan had found a response.
"Negotiation," Revan said slowly, "is even more important when we've lost. It's how we'll win."

"You sound like that crazy master of yours," Malak muttered. "And where is she? Shouldn't she be helping as well?"

"I don't know." She hadn't seen Master Sunrider since the argument. Since she'd refused to relinquish Malachor to a Jedi creche on Telos. "But we will negotiate terms. The Fleet needs us. We just need to give them what they need, which is different than what they demand."

"What do we have to give?" Malak asked. "There's only two of us—"

"Each worth ten of those weak maffasops—" his father interjected.

"We'll offer a Jedi knight on each ship, at least one. Jedi healers on the medical carriers. Jedi knights embedded within ground troops. We don't need the masters at all. A knight is answerable only to their own conscience. Each has the right to go where they are needed—and we are all needed. We are all needed now."

"You're assuming the other knights will defy the Council?"

"Not all. Not at once. But if we win one battle, the others will follow...."

Xxx

And they did follow us. Most to their deaths. Or—she thought of Davad—or worse than death.

Negotiate. Negotiate terms.

"To first blood?" she asked. It would only take a moment. "Duel to first blood?"

"To the death," Tenebrae murmured. His voice issuing from several throats now. Surrounding her, all of them. "Of course, you are... rather hard to kill."

Revan thought of the Fragment falling from the sky; the pain that had come with what should have been the last moments of her life; the yellow saber's blade in her guts; the Mandalore's vibroblade —

Yes. I am hard to kill. Or she—that body—

"Not that I expect Phylus here to kill you," the Sith chuckled. "Of course not! You will merely kill one child to save dozens! It's a cheaper game than we played on Ziost, do you remember?"

Xxx

Sweat slicked the metal hilt in her hand. Nausea twisted her guts as she turned her eyes away.

These were damned—doomed—vessels infected with Tenebrae's Curse in infancy; but every one, every soft cry had sounded like—

Don't think of him.

Be like Hoth. Like ice. Tenebrae will never expect this level of retaliation, he thinks you are soft, he thinks you are his. He thinks he's won—

Her blade smashed the base of the khyber crystal, the source of all his power here. His power over these children. It was the clarion call that would alert him——Now that they were all dead.

Xxx

"I remember."

I remember your rage when you saw your dead children. I remember the triumph of my victory. But then... I remember you laughed. You had lost any hope of continuing your line, lost the power of an infinite army... you had lost...I thought you had lost everything. But you laughed.

And that's when I knew. That's when I knew—

"No," Revan said. "No. I refuse. I will not fight a child."

"Ah," Tenebrae had retreated to one voice now. Except for the three Blais children and her companions, everyone else in the room now had red, glowing eyes. Everyone else in the room was his. "What a shame."

The boy let out a breath somewhere between a laugh and a sob. His sisters stood, expressionless and careful, Sith-trained from childhood. The older one risked a small smile, as Revan's gaze passed over her.

"You have to fight someone, Revan," Tenebrae added. "It's our tradition."

And then I knew. That's when I knew—

"Yes," she said dully. Negotiate terms. "I know."

"What—?" The smuggler's interruption, Carth's whispered plea for silence.

If I refuse the boy, you will demand that I duel someone else. One of my friends—or, rather, one of these innocents. The smuggler, or Carth. Or Seiran....

"I'll do it." Dustil's voice, sounding nothing like Malak. "I'll fight her—for her," he amended his words quickly. "I'll fight for Revan. My... my wife. I'll be her champion."

"Perhaps later, Malak," said the Emperor in Zepth's body, clapping Dustil on the back. "No. I have a particular fight... in mind."

Fool, I told you to be quiet. Revan glared at Carth Onasi's son, and he stared steadily back. For an uneasy moment, she wondered if he would be championing her cause—or his own.

Negotiate terms. "They go free. All of them. If I lose, they are useless to you."

"Your husbands—useless?" The dark chuckle began in the man's throat. "No. I find them effective. Even in the event of your death—"

"If I die, you can't use the chamber," she taunted. "There's no one else. I remember... you... you tried."

"But you won't die, will you?" He smiled, eyes burning like suns. "Not my Starfire—"

"Not yours," she muttered.
"Asshole," the smuggler echoed behind her.

That's when I knew—when he laughed at my victory—that's when I knew.

"They go free," she repeated. "The Wookiee, the Deralian, and my pilot—the one who brought me here. I will fight whatever champion you propose. But, regardless of the result, they go free."

Negotiate terms.

That's when I knew that he—that I—that we—

Carth and his son were mercifully silent. She would try to save the boy later if she could, but if she unmasked him now, they might lose any advantage that remained. Malak had power here. Dustil Onasi, a Korriban deserter, had none.

"Done." Tenebrae chuckled darkly in his boy's body. "We're going to need a bigger room."

When I slaughtered the monsters he made, and he only laughed—that's when I knew that every choice I made was merely a search for the best outcome; that every life I saved had a price; that every sacrifice was merely a step on a circular path.

That's when I knew that this war will never end: that there is no final battle, no Malachor.

That's when I knew that there is no death, no end, no victory.

XXX

Atris shivered. She was freezing cold, even wrapped in fur with the plasma heaters on as high as they dared. They could not risk ticking any orbital sensors that might mistake their heat signature for radioactivity, or even for what it was: a sign of a secret base on what was supposed to be a nearly-dead planet.

"Here are the reports you asked for."

Padawan Mical Jorde had never been much of a Padawan by traditional metrics, Atris recalled; but he had a keen intelligence and a loyalty to the Republic that was beyond reproach. In the week since his arrival, he had organized her hard copy files saved from the destruction at Ossus, and made several additional suggestions regarding their sub-categorizations.

The Jedi, she thought, had truly wasted his potential assigning him as Padawan to a master like Azen Loanin: confining his quick mind to the medical laboratory. Mical possessed an intelligence with an almost hungry focus: devouring all knowledge placed in its path. Perhaps not the most fortunate of analogies now… but in his case, quite apt.

"Thank you," she acknowledged out loud, not wanting to give him too much of a complex.

But Mical merely raised one blonde eyebrow and continued to stand… long enough that Atria had time to consider responses to all the questions she hoped he would not ask.

"That will be all," she added.

"I want you to know that I understand," he told her, which wasn't quite what she'd expected. "When weighing the greater good, we have to consider all sentients—and not just our own kind."

"Our own kind? Do you mean Echani or Jedi?" she asked.
His mouth quirked, and she approvingly realized he was intelligent enough to answer one question for himself. Which was more than she could say for his twin, more was the pity. "I suppose soon there will be no difference."

It was an insolent perspective, but she did not disagree.

As if mocking time with its sense of exquisite irony, the outer airlock sensor chimed a warning, indicating that someone had entered it.

"That will be our guest," she murmured. "Would you like to meet her, Mical?"

"I have a great deal of work to do in the infirmary," he dissembled.

"But you know who she is."

He frowned, and for a moment, his eyes looked almost confused. "I… I have met Master Kae before. Many times. She was in the Temple, before the fall—during, in fact. I know what you say is true… about her, but did she… surely, she would have mentioned being… being my mother if—"

"She could not." Atris kept her voice gentle. "Not without jeopardizing all that she was. None of the Jedi knew her to be…." her voice trailed off, as suddenly an image torn from a dream invaded her mind: standing with Revan—no, Sheris, no—Revan, a holocron falling and shattering, and behind them, behind—

"None of the Jedi knew her to be…?" Mical's voice gentled. "Knew her to be what, Master?"

"Knew. Knew her. None of them knew—"

It was a dream, nothing more. A reflection of my own confusion: faced with Sheris Loran. Faced with Revan Starfire. Kavar informed me that Sheris took the holocron's memories… but that was later. Later.

You must go. Leave Coruscant. Return to the refuge you made for our people, your hidden Temple where you keep them; children of your brother, children who call you mother, although you were no mother—never one such as I—

Now, months later, that dream voice still wormed into her thoughts, still echoing in her head.

A vision, transcribed into words. A deflection of my consciousness, an attempt to revoke responsibility.

But no. I am Atris. I am a Jedi Master. I am Atris. I am a Jedi Master. I am Atris—

The door to her office apexed open before she could speak again, and Atris drew back a gasp at the ruin of the woman who entered her chamber.

"Master Kae!"

"Is dead," the blind woman said. "I am Kreia now."

XXX
The shuttle left Coruscant at dawn for the interstellar hub. Mekel wasn't sure why he was even here with them, except Dear Old Dads had just assumed he would come, and Ban had scarpered off and—

And Lydie Korr smiled when he said yes.

Not that he was going to get anywhere with her. It didn't even seem right to think about, with Telos maybe dead, so Mekel wasn't thinking about it. Her. Or Telos. He was trying not to think at all.

The shuttle was crowded with Jedi, more than he'd seen in one place since that weird dorm of Jedi in Malachi D'Reev's tower, the one that was space dust now.

A shuttle full of Jedi, and Mekel couldn't feel a thing. Whatever that dead asshole had done to him still hadn't worn off. Dear Old Dads said it probably never would. Asshole. A good thing too, because Mekel thought if he had the Force right now, he'd fry them all.

The shuttle banked towards the orbital where Senator Master Loanin the Smug had arranged a fast cruiser to take them all to Katarr… where, according to the most fracked-up plan Mekel had ever heard, they were all going to sit and wait, hoping to lure some Force-sucking Sith Lord and then rely on the Republic Fleet to blow the Force-sucking Sith Lord up before he sucked away all their Force and killed them all.

Great plan, Jedi. No wonder you thought Revan looked like a fracking genius.

Mekel had a few opinions about the plan, like… if it would take a bunch of ion cannons and plasma torpedoes to blow up a Sith Lord in the first place, why not get some themselves? Wouldn't it be safer to be on the ship than the planet? Or, frack, somewhere else?

Like the opposite end of the galaxy?

He'd tried to talk to Master Vro—Dear Old Dads about those flaws, but the old man had just looked like he agreed with Mekel and muttered some excuse about how being prepared would look too much like a trap.

Really? Too much like a trap? And this looked like, what—a super Jedi fracking buffet?

"Hello, Mekel." Lydie Korr—Lydie Loanin now, apparently—came down the aisle. "How are you feeling?"

Like I'm a spider roach in a scent trap. Like we all are. And like the galaxy was deaf and dead. "Okay," he said out loud. He grinned, like it was all good, all cash, all copa-septic, like the Doc Moms used to take him to as a kid would say. "How-how are you holding up?"

Her eyes darted to her husband, of course they did. And Master Azen Loanin was watching them. You didn't need the Force to know it. Mekel could see the man up the aisle out of the corner of his eye. And the man was scowling.
"Good," she said. "I'm glad you came with us."

"I don't have the Force," he reminded her. "Some zombie took it away, and now we're off on a mission to kill him and his Force-sucking buddy. What else was I gonna do on my Seventhday?"

Lydie Korr laughed. She still had it, that laugh that made him feel like the best sent in the world for making her laugh.

Behind them, Loanin was probably glaring daggers. Suddenly, it mattered a lot less.

"I am sorry," Lydie Korr added. "About what was done to you—"

"Hey, I'm alive, right?" He had to shrug it off. What the frack was he gonna do? Grab a shuttle to a secret Sith homeworld practically in another galaxy and rescue Telos? Whatever happened… with that fracked up hunt and the Sith Emperor… it was already done. Maybe Telos had lost the Force too and died. Maybe Telos and Malak had teamed up and taken over. Maybe Telos had felt the world cut out just like Mekel had, and then been torn apart, or shot or gotten a gutful of saber… it didn't matter. Whatever happened had already happened. There was nothing Mekel could have done. There was nothing—

"Mekel?" Lydie Korr—Loanin touched his arm, actually touched it.

His eyes refocused on her face. Indentations ran across her skin, like a tracery of circuits almost. They were a few shades darker than the gold of her face. Mekel had seen some Zabraks that dyed their indentations with acetline ink, but Lydie's all looked natural.

"Is it like a tattoo? Or are they all over?"

"What?" She tilted her head, as if he hadn't been clear. "I'm sorry, I don't understand."

"Your—" They were on her hand too. He wanted to hold it, suddenly, hold on to something. "Nevermind. Yeah, I'm okay. I get it. You guys… you stopped Malak. Great job."

"We hope." Her mouth tightened. "The… the man who did this to you. The Mandalorian Sith? We're going to stop him too."

"Yeah, good luck with that."

You know he's fricking dead? Telos practically ripped his head off and it didn't stop him. You think the Fleet blowing up his ship will do the trick?

"The journey will take a few days," Lydie added, which Mekel already knew. "Let me know if you need anything." Her eyes were very blue.

"I need the Force back," Mekel muttered, half under his breath.

"I'm sorry," Lydie Korr told him. "I can't give you that."

XXX

Transcript from a Sith Holovid #1 (translated from the Ancient Sith, by Master Atris)

Lady Fenestre: "Joining me now is Lord Finiris, a former servant of House Nyriss, now risen, (as all can), to become a member of the Dark Council. In His Name."

Chorus of other Council members: "In His Name."
Lord Scourge: "As per his Mighty Omniscience, I have changed my name from Finiris to Scourge to reflect the growing threat brought upon us by our most ancient of enemies: the Galactic Republic. In their tongue, 'Scourge' means a plague, a pox, an evil shadow descending upon the land."

Lady Fenestre: (giggles) "Does it not also mean, 'to whip?' Or to lash?"

Lord Scourge: (darkly) "Yes."

Lady Fenestre: "So in other words, we might think of you like a whipped—or whipping—personage for our Most Illuminated Upon High Lord? Valkorion Vittiate Tenebrae? First of His Name?"

Lord Scourge: "Do you value your tongue?"

Darth Vash: (hastily) "And there they are! The sentients we all came to see! Marvel, as our recently-redeemed Dark Lord of the Sith descends from her ship and approaches both consorts! Chained to the platform on the right, we have the simple commoner, Carth Onasi, and beside him, her true—"

Lady Fenestre: (whispers something)

Darth Vash: (shocked) "Really? Are we to call him Darth Carth? And he, not even a Force-user?"

Lady Fenestre: (smiling for the holocams) "In his most kind grace, the One has declared both of Revan Starfire's consorts are to be raised to the title of Darth, at least for ceremonial occasions; until such time as they go through their Trials of Pain, Suffering and Subtle Manipulations—after which their titles and rank will become permanently affixed."

Darth Vash: (sighs) "... and on Revan's left, signifying a strangely reduced rank, we have her original consort, Darth Malak D'Reev. Darth Malak is wearing a Human skin, genetically descended from Revan's First Consort—"

Lady Fenestre: (to Lord Scourge) "That must be so confusing!"

Lord Scourge: (inaudible response)

Xxx

"Your transcription is good. Excellent work. But one word I would alter..." Kae—Kreia—hovered a shaky finger in the general direction of the holospeaker, her eyes magnified by the visor she wore to correct her near-total blindness. The word 'Ack'neumanth.' 'Subtle Manipulations' is incorrect. More correct would be to simply call the act 'Compulsion.'"

Atris frowned. "But the form, 'neuam;' Master Korr always told me that it implied something hidden, under the surface."

"Master Marla Korr..." Kae—it would take Atris some time to stop calling her old friend that, if she ever could—Kreia scoffed. "Marla Korr was always one for too much subtlety. She died, by Revan's hand, you said? And Kavar claimed she was an agent of the Sith?" Kae gave a soft sigh. "All of those years and I feel I never... never truly knew her." She shook her head slowly. "All those years... and Tenebrae had eyes within the Council all along."
"Many good Jedi were misled," Atris agreed. And even more died from their mistakes. We take an oath, we masters, to serve the Republic. Even at the cost of ourselves.

Are Kae and I truly the only ones who still remember sacrifice?

Kavar Vakla was a lost cause. Atris had not dared tell him the truth. And yet… her thoughts were conflicted and torn. Meditation was not the balm it should have been.

Kavar may be lost. They all may be lost. I know this. I have prepared for this. And yet I still—I hope against all hope for a different outcome.

"Those who are lost were never Jedi." Kreia sat down heavily in her chair, pushing aside the visor. Her whitened eyes stared blankly in the direction of the window's light—although there was nothing more to see there now than polar snow. "Not truly. Not as Jedi must be, for the world to come."

"Are you… is there anything I can do, Ka—Kreia?" Atris didn't want to hover, but the other woman's obvious affliction was difficult to ignore.

Those Sith Lords took the Force from you. Your sight was fading for years, you complained, but now… in truth—you are blind.

"I have all I require, old friend." A kindly smile crossed the woman's lips. "For now."

So gracious, even in the face of such loss. Kae had lost her connection to the Force—what she must be feeling—defies imagination.

And yet, she is not the first I have seen walk this path.

Vima Sunrider had stripped the Force from Atris's former Padawan, the young and defiant Meetra Surik. An act of preservation for the heart of the Order itself—but when Atris closed her eyes, all she could see was Meetra's silent accusation. Those piercing eyes—like the girl's pain was meant for Atris alone.

You should not have betrayed me, Meetra. I told you not to follow Revan. I told you—

Atris had left the room before Vima Sunrider performed the act that stripped the Force from Meetra. Cowardice. In her dreams, she stayed, and watched her former protege plunge her lightsaber into the stone table—before the Force was stripped from her soul.

In truth, Atris had returned later for Meetra's lightsaber, which no other master had disturbed. Her hand traced the hilt now hanging from her belt—the reminder she kept with her always of how she had failed her pupil.

But we had no choice. What we felt in her was the death of the Force itself.

Revan Starfire's madness had cast a long shadow, and the actions of Malachor had created another monster, it seemed, in Davad Arkan. Perhaps one even worse than the creature Meetra might have become, had the Council allowed the void within her to grow.

"Jedi and Sith alike, the Force does not define you." Kae wasn't much older than Atris—not in years—but she looked like she had the weight of decades upon her face now. "You know this; you, who train your brother's children. For all of your science, your laboratories… not one of your handmaidens has the Force."
You are wrong. But Atris held her tongue. There had been a time when she would have told Kae everything. She remembered, so many times, telling the woman everything: her confidante, her ally, her friend.

But now, strangely, she kept to her reserve. Now, strangely, she had no need, no compulsion to share. Now, Atris felt as protective of her charges as if they were all walled within a block of ice.

You abandoned Brianna to me long ago. Her and her brother both. They are mine now, Mine to teach, to shape, never to fail as I did before—

A sense of the world tilting, shifting out of time—

Xxx

After Malachor V, the Jedi Council members had all been in shock: scrambling to uncover the extent of the casualties; to sort through the false reports claiming the entire Fleet was lost; that the Mandalorians had betrayed the armistice; or that the remaining Republic ships were off to the Outer Rim and beyond, chasing Mandalorian oathbreakers.

So many lies. They had wasted so much time, finding the truth.

After Malachor V, Vima Sunrider (tasked with relief work on Echanis) had come to them, bringing with her Atris’s padawan, Meetra Surik, whom she had found in a half-wrecked ship on the edge of blast orbit range.

After Malachor V, (at first), all of their questions came down to ones that only Knight Surik could answer.

"How many casualties?"

"What manner of device could cause so much destruction?"

"Where is the rest of the Fleet?"

"Did Revan give the order?"

"Do you have anything to say for yourself, Knight Surik?"

It was left to Atris to ask Meetra Surik on behalf of the Council, for the child before her had been her padawan, and only barely a Jedi Knight, when she left for the war.

The girl shook her head. "There is nothing to say." Her voice was flat, but inside her—she, who had formed bonds so quick and close with so many—Atris felt her own soul scream, like a falling tide of the Dark.

"Really? Nothing at all?" Vima Sunrider stepped forward too; shoulders stooped as if by some new burden, some agony, some inner torment. Relief work at Malachor… hers had been one of the first teams on the scene.

Vima had dutifully filed reports of the carnage: holos of crashed ships, data from the planet's core. The entire planet's surface was unstable now, slowly imploding from within.

Much like our accord, Atris had thought, not for the first time.

"Nothing." Meetra's eyes met Atris's, and in them Atris saw nothing. No life, no hope, no spark of her former padawan's spirit, or intelligence, or grace. Meetra Surik only blinked. "Did we win the
Her voice was so flat that Atris could never decide; later, when she had too much time for reflection—whether the girl was genuinely asking if they had won the war—or not.

XXX

"Atris." Now Kae—Kreia's—hand brushed her shoulder. "Old friend. You know… you know what High Admiral Rensha will do with this translation? You know what they will say when they see that Malak and Revan are on Dromund Kaas, being hailed as Lords of the Sith?"

Atris nodded slowly. "Yes. I know."

"Perhaps Kavar and Loanin struck a bargain we could not keep," Kae murmured. "Are they on Katarr as well?"

"Yes," Atris said. "Nearly every member of the Council is there."

_I cannot warn the Jedi. If I warn them, they will scatter. And the Beast is too close. If they scatter now—_

Kreia said that Davad Arkan was little more than an animal. An animal has no reason. But an animal can be led.

Arkan was now, by all reports, an animal flying a warship with a military-class hyperdrive. An animal who could not be killed with a blade or a blaster, if the accounts were true. (And accounts were streaming in from Coruscant and the Core, accounts of Jedi in hiding fallen silent, accounts of Jedi corpses, accounts of a robed and masked monster in black.)

And beyond testimony… there was the feeling: like a scream growing ever-louder in the fabric of the Force itself—

Atris could hear it. Perhaps all who had been touched by Malachor could hear it. Louder, and louder still.

A drum, beating out of time.

Davad Arkan was a beast who had to be destroyed. Eventually. For he was also… a formidable weapon, given the right cause.

XXX

"You are a special case, Knight Surik," Master Vrook had said, that day Atris's padawan had vanished. "You have always formed strong connections with others. Unusual bonds. What happened at Malachor V seems to be echoing in you, even now. What we feel in you is… disturbing. Disruptive. A wound we cannot heal."

"And that is why we must seal the breach," Master Kavar added flatly. "Cauterize the infection."

"I'm sorry, my Padawan." Atris looked into the girl's expressionless eyes, trying to catch a glimpse of the woman she had loved as a daughter. "If I could spare you, I would."

"Be strong, Knight Surik," added Master Arren Kae. "Remember, strength is not the Force. It is in you."

XXX
Atris frowned. No. That can't be right?

Something was… something was wrong in her thoughts. A note out of tune.

"Be strong, Knight Surik," Kae said. But Kae was not there.

Kae was not there.

Vima Sunrider stripped the Force from Padawan Surik, but Kae was not there.

Not then. We thought she'd died—

My brother loved her. Loved her enough to shame his standing with her children. I told my brother Kae died at Malachor—we all assumed she had died at Malachor—

Six months later, General Yusanis was killed by a droid sent by Revan herself, excised from the Republic defenses with a medix's skill. His children were left to Atris: the clones of their mother, and the twins both. The boy was already a Jedi padawan, but the girl….

No.

Something was amiss, like a note out of tune.

For a moment she saw Sheris Loran standing before her, holding something in her hand. Glowing.

The holocron? The holocron she stole from me? But I did not see. I was not there.

Is that Sheris at all? It could be Revan instead. Revan looking at me with those cold, green eyes. Sheris never—never had that singular gaze. Sheris never had reason to hate me—

"Lost in the past?" Kae—Kreia's—voice intruded, a gentle knock upon a door.

"Mical does not want to see you," Atris admitted, using the truth to dissemble away her own uncertainty. "I had hoped that both he and Brianna would show some interest in their shared past, but—"

"It is of no importance. Sons...." Kreia's voice frosted over, a well of bitterness in that one word. "They will always disappoint." She laughed softly. "That is one experience you are best left without."

"Daughters may disappoint as well." Once Atris had hoped her brother's daughters would inherit her Force strength, but every one of them was null.

Only the daughter of your body, Master Kae, is Force-sensitive. Only Brianna could be trained as we were trained.

But Atris had not trained her.

"Daughters...." The old woman sighed heavily. "Perhaps. I considered Revan a daughter, although she was not born of my body. Daughters carry the seed of yourself; they are vessels of your flesh—even when the bond between you is frail and stretched." She rose to her feet and walked to the window. "You considered Surik a daughter, did you not?"

"I think all masters think of their padawans as—"

"No. Not all." Kae turned back towards Atris, her eyes blank as moons. "Where does Meetra Surik
"I do not know, I—when she left—and vanished. No one knows…"

Would I know if she was dead? The bond between us snapped. The Force within her shriveled and died. Would I know?

"We will find her." Kae's voice gentled. "For your sake."

"Given what has happened to Knight Arkan, perhaps we saved her from a worse fate," Atris suggested. Her pulse quickened, suddenly gripped by a dread that she could not name.

"Yes," agreed Kae. "We did."

They had. And yet—something. A note out of tune.

Atris raised her head and looked upon her old friend again, scarred and battered by her recent travails. Bent and stooped as if she had gone through the fires of hell themselves.

After Malachor, it was Vima Sunrider who brought Meetra Surik before the Council. It was Meetra Surik who went before the Council, it was Vima Sunrider—not Kae—

"Strength is not in the Force," she told Master Arren Kae, the woman who now called herself Kreia. "It is within you."

"So I have always said," Kreia nodded. Her brows arched, and she reached for the visor again, putting it over her face like a mask. She nodded her head, indicating the comm in front of them. "The Fleet is still… awaiting our response?"

My response. Not ours. With no Force, you are no longer Jedi, old friend.

The transcript of the recording for the Fleet was complete now. One swipe would broadcast the words to High Admiral Rensha and the rest.

The words spoken in Ancient Sith were even more damning than the images: and those were proof enough of Revan's treachery, proof enough of her alliance with the Sith Empire, her alliance with Malak, and proof that the destruction of the Star Forge and a Jedi mindwipe had merely slowed the inevitable.

Proof that she must be stopped and if it takes another Malachor to do so, it will be necessary.

But still Atris's hand hovered, renewed doubts clouding her mind. Had Revan felt this hesitation before Malachor? Had Meetra?

I know what the Fleet will do with this information. I know what must be sacrificed to destroy the Emperor.

I cannot shirk from my duty.

Her hand moved across the screen, transmitting the data to the Fleet.

Xxx

"Admiral." The ensign looked up from the communications array. "We're receiving a transmission. From Telos."
Admiral Rew Ekkumi looked up at her own board, meeting the holographic gazes of the other Fleet commanders, all on their own ships, all receiving the same broadcast. Leeshansintina Racharn had shared some of the visuals with them already—using D'Reev's connections to the Sith media—but the announcers were all speaking in Ancient Sith, and they had been left to seek that information themselves.

Had House Racharn found its own translation? Almost definitely. But whatever motive or intent they expected to gain from withholding it was meaningless.

But even now, a part of you hopes that it's a trick, a ruse for the Sith—some plan of Revan Starfire's, that Carth Onasi in particular is no traitor. They have his son. He could be trapped!

"Play the recording," Rew ordered Ensign Biu.

On the viewscreen, an unwitting world turned on its gentle axis. Their ships were invisible, cloaked, but riding in a tight orbit around the sleeping planet. Katarr was a beautiful world, as lush and green as a gem, and completely unaware of its sudden ascent onto the galactic stage.

XXX

Darth Vash: (shocked) "Really? Are we to call him Darth Carth? And he, not even a Force-user?"

Lady Fenestre: (smiling for the holocams) "In his most kind grace, the One has declared both of Revan Starfire's consorts are to be raised to the title of Darth, at least for ceremonial occasions; until such time as they go through their Trials of Pain, Suffering and Compulsion—after which their titles and rank will become permanently affixed."

Darth Vash: (sighs) "... and on Revan's left, signifying a strangely reduced rank, we have her original consort, Darth Malak D'Reev. Darth Malak is wearing a Human skin, genetically descended from Revan's First Consort—"

Lady Fenestre: (to Lord Scourge) "That must be so confusing!"

Lord Scourge: (inaudible response)

Lady Fenestre: "No need to be rude, my Lord! I'm sure their customs in the Republic are just as unharmonic and unsightly as we would expect them to be! Do you think His Imperial Munificence Shine-Song is planning a spring invasion? It would be a shame for so many of His Voices to miss our cherrah blossoming, and the Harvest Hunts; but one assumes, on some of those other worlds, cherrah bloom just as loudly, like magic screams—

Lord Scourge: "Malak seems inappropriately young for her now."

Lady Fenestre: "Is he? Young? How can one tell? Full-blood Humans are so pale...."

XXX

"I would prefer you spent more time assuring the recalcitrant Jedi, and less time with Mekel Jin." Azen said, as Lydie entered their chamber in the cruiser taking them to Katarr.

The tiny ship was packed, but they had a private room—a luxury to which Lydie was fast-becoming accustomed; like eridu sheets, and a loop-lace singlet under her robes.
There was barely room to stand, and so she sat next to Azen on the bed made for two, set next to a real ferraglass window. The swirl of hyperspace was distracting, but it might have been pleasant in normal space.

"We are responsible for Mekel's condition," she pointed out. "That means we are obligated to him."

Lessons for a Senator's Wife: Regarding Decorum and Civility.

"We are responsible for the citizens of three Bespin orbitals as well," Azen muttered. (For those were his family holdings.) "But we don't attend to each personally—"

"Imagine seeing the world with the Force drained out," she snapped, feeling strangely defensive. Lydie could imagine it. In Knight Arkan's arms such a fate had nearly been hers. "After all Mekel Jin has experienced—"

"Did he discuss his experience?" Jealousy took Azen's beautiful face and made it a twisted mask, features too chiseled to seem real. He had, Lydie realized suddenly, not a hair on his chin: just skin so smooth and waxed he could have been from Ryloth.

She felt her skin begin to flush thinking of the comparison. Humans didn't have horns, of course, but Mekel's rough jaw would scrape over the surface of hers—

Xxx

"Have you been to the restricted section?" The padawan everyone said was a Sith spy grinned casually at her. "Telos and I go all the time. I could take you—"

"Master Atris keeps the doors sealed." Lydie Korr felt compelled to mention that, even if it made her sound like a rule-abider, the kind of Jedi who would only do what she was told, and when she was told.

Mekel leaned closer. His skin was rough, with hair extending down the sides, covering his chin. He shaved sometimes, because she'd noticed it would go from pale and smooth to rough over the course of a day—or longer if he didn't have it removed again. His eyes were so dark they looked black, framed with thick lashes and heavy lids. He had a faint scar, like a burn, across the side of one of his arms that she was dying to ask him about, but it was never the right time.

He leaned closer, taller than she was, and she felt his breath, warm against her forehorns, and she looked up at him—

"Got it!" Padawan Dustil Onasi interrupted, appearing suddenly behind Mekel, like he had popped out of nowhere. He was holding a datapad in one hand, grinning. "'Rydal's Crises of Faith.' You sure this is dirty?"

"It's Sith poetry," Mekel said, not looking back. He raised one eyebrow at Lydie, breath still warm on her skin. "What do you think, Padawan Korr?"

"Isn't that in the restricted section?"

"He does stealth. I do locks." He shrugged. "Need any books?"

She found it hard to catch her breath. "I—what happens if you're caught?"

"A very boring lecture about personal responsibility. Loss of privileges." Mekel shrugged. "Not that many to lose. Then we tell Yuthura Ban to tell them we're worried about the Dark Side and everyone leaves us alone again—"

"We have to go," Dustil interrupted, rather abruptly, grabbing Mekel's arm and pulling him back and around the shelves of the archives. "I think Atris is coming."

"See you later, Lydie Korr." The possible Sith spy was still smiling at her, as his friend dragged him away, his head turning, those dark eyes staring into hers—

Xxx

"—is why," Azen reached for her hand and she realized he had still been speaking, all of this time. "Do you understand?"

It was easy to admit that Lydie did not when he phrased the inquiry like that. "No. Can you clarify?"

"I have made an alliance with Racharn," he repeated. "I have seen footage from Dromund Kaas. Dustil Onasi is there... and possibly still possessed by Darth Malak. Our efforts may have been in vain." He frowned. "You understand, I cannot admit this to Masters Vrook or Kavar, or Padawan Jin—and if the Fleet finds out—"

Lydie tried to make sense of that and failed. "May I see the footage?"

"Of course."

For all of his machinations, Azen seemed to retain an almost... devout loyalty to her. It made her feel guilty, and that, strangely, made her love him more.

She leaned over and squeezed his hands, placing her mouth on his. His breath hissed out in surprise, but he made a quick recovery.

"After," Lydie whispered, in his ear. "After this."

XXX

Lady Fenestre: "No need to be rude, my Lord! I'm sure their customs in the Republic are just as unharmonic and unsightly as we would expect them to be! Do you think His Imperial Munificence Shine-Song is planning a spring invasion? It would be a shame for so many of His Voices to miss our cherrah blossoming, and the Harvest Hunts; but one assumes, on some of those other worlds, cherrah bloom just as loudly, like magic screams—

Lord Scourge: "Malak seems inappropriately young for her now."

Lady Fenestre: "Is he? Young? How can one tell? Full-blood Humans are so pale."

Lady Vash: "Youth and beauty are often fleeting. I think they make a terribly impressive couple."

Lord Scourge: "Now is too soon to speak of another invasion."

Lady Fenestre: "Still as careless and treasonous as ever, Finiris? A new name won't help with that!"

Lady Vash: "I think a spring invasion sounds perfectly ideal. And with both Revan and Malak to guide our forces through Republic Space—"
"Invasion? A spring invasion?" Admiral Cein held up his hand for a pause, and they all dutifully stilled their broadcasts. "There's your proof! Vidcasters, discussing an invasion on one of their networks."

"It could be a trap," the High Admiral objected.

Cein squinted at the subtitles to the Ancient Sith. "You're quite sure this translation is accurate?"

"Oh, yes." Rew Ekkumi advanced, and then froze the image on a close-up of Revan Starfire standing between both Onasis, trying to ignore the punch in the gut sensation she kept getting every time she looked at Carth's face. "Master Atris vouched for its provenance herself. House Racharn collected the footage from the network they own on the Sith homeworld, and then transmitted it widebeam—"

I can't believe you'd turn on us, Carth. I never believed it—but this—

Hindsight was a terrible thing.

"So the Jedi have not, in fact, rid the galaxy of Malak D'Reev." Admiral Rensha hissed, her tongue flicking through her lips, disapproval evident even over a holocam

"We don't know anything for sure," Rew argued. "But that is Dustil Onasi standing there. The Jedi promised to end his Force possession, and this appears to be definitive proof that they did not?"

But Carth is standing there too. Is he protecting his son? Or her?

It was quite difficult to tell in the blurry holovid. Carth Onasi's expression could have meant everything or nothing.

And Revan Starfire just looked serene.

Rensha's lips drew up in a snarl. "I see proof. Proof that the Jedi lied."

"It… it does seem that way," Rew admitted. She hesitated, trying not to look at Carth Onasi, half-naked on the vid screen, walking arm-in-arm with Revan, Dark Lord of the Sith. "And there is more. That pinion-class warbird broadcasting from Sullust... we are tracing its respondents……"

XXX

Revan was floating in space aboard the near-dead Pinion V. The suit she was wearing smelled like sweat and stale air, and she wanted nothing more than to sleep. But Aemelie had assigned Mandalorians to torment her awake in shifts, and now it was the Second Wife's turn herself.

"And the Star Forge drew its energy from Force users? From people? Not from the sun? Are you sure of this?" Aemelie kept pushing and pushing.

"I think so." It was hard to keep her eyes open, but the Mandalorian had informed Revan (cheerfully) that she risked running out of oxygen if she fell asleep—something about a lack of movement making the suit's processors shut down.
In dark and sleep-deprived moments, Revan had wondered if the Second Wife of Ordo was just fracking with her.

"Maybe both… I… I never really understood it, Aemelie."

"The other Revan might."

If Revan opened her eyes she knew she'd see the other woman peering at her over the comm. "Then fracking ask the other Revan!" It had been two days, floating in this metal fracking tomb with Mandalorians on the comm keeping her awake. Only two days and already Revan wanted to jump out of her skin.

"I would have, had I realized at the time. Do you know if she was the one who commissioned the Mass Shadow Generator that destroyed Malachor V? Was she responsible for its design? The Deathbringer said it was not her, but Milli neglected to get any specific information."

"Millifar already asked me, Aemelie. Before they left. I don't know."

"I don't care."

Revan tapped the nav charts again. Maybe she could steer the ship using the Force? Crash land on the nearest planet with an atmo?

The board sputtered fitfully through, almost out of juice.

It could run out of juice. Then I'd be truly alone out here. And then if Aemelie's right, I'd fall asleep and die.

For all of her annoying questions that Revan couldn't answer, Aemelie's presence was preferable to that.

"Ah, there you are." A voice off camera. Gwenarius. "I've brought the children to say good-bye."

"Dxun!" Aemelie's body turned, vanishing offscreen for a moment and then reappearing with a fat baby in her arms.

He'd grown since the last time Revan had seen him, back on Coruscant.

"You… named him," she offered, since that seemed appropriate to mention. "Where are you going?"

"To Dxun, in fact." Gwenarius peered at her from behind Aemelie. "Canderous said he'd already informed you of our new base location, so why feign ignorance?"

"I didn't realize you were going to base."

"With the children, as is custom." Gwenarius sighed. "Truthfully, Third Wife, I have never had a taste for blooding in stars. I leave it to the more capable members of my family. Take care of them for me."

"I will." Revan nodded.

"We take care of ourselves," Aemelie corrected, frowning. "By our husband's accounts, Revan's skills are limited to strategic feints. When we need someone to actually shoot, we have our own pilots."
"Aemelie," Gwenarius said sternly. "Do not let your personal judgments cloud your use of the Third Wife's skills."

"She just wants your bloodline," Aemelie half-muttered to Revan. "But since you refuse to consummate your marriage with Canderous, or even more recently with your other husband, and have yet to provide us with a complete medical so that we can harvest appropriate samples—"

"Aemelie!" Gwenarius took Dxun back. His baby fingers batted at the camera. It made Revan irrationally miss Abasen and Korrie.

"Did you name your other daughter yet?" Was she supposed to ask?

"Even without your presence at the ceremony," Aemelie replied.

Gwenarius nodded. "Her name is Oerina."

"Oh." No need to ask why. "I… you haven't heard from… from him. Have you?"

The two women exchanged glances. "No," Gwenarius answered, after an awkward silence. "How could we? We do not speak with the dead."

"But he's… he's dead, but he's still… alive? Aware?" They did know, didn't they?

"We know what he is," Gwenarius said. "And we do not speak to it—as I said."

XxX

"So, this is the Pinion-class warbird transmitting?" High Admiral Rensha pointed to the unintelligible Aurebesh code scrolling across all of their displays. Beneath them all, Katarr turned, twinkling and unaware of the precipice its defenders straddled.

"Yes." Jiya Sand nodded. "When the Aleema was in dry docks in Kuat, we attached trackers, which is the standard procedure. The location transmitters were disabled quickly by the Mando'ade. But they overlooked this frequency, which appears to be their emergency response channel. When an emergency beacon from the Pinion V pinged their ship, it also reached SIS."

"Gibberish," the Trandoshan High Admiral pointed out.

"Encoded," Rew told her, realizing a millisecond too late that of course, Rensha knew that. "We… we haven't been able to crack the cipher."

"The broadcast could be an equipment malfunction on a destroyed fighter, or some long-range patroller unaware that their side has lost," Jiya pointed out.

"This lost warbird has nothing to do with Malak," Cein argued. "Malak has to be our main concern. Malak and Revan on a Sith planet." The man was paranoid, saw Malak's plans in every shadow. As if Malak had ever been subtle.

"Or, it could be that Lords Revan and Malak are summoning their Mandalorians," Rensha hissed.
"It could be," Rew nodded grimly. What a time it was when she agreed with Old Scaly, their High Admiral. Strange times indeed, but here they were. "As I said, we haven't been able to unlock the encoding on the warbird's transmission. What is significant, is that the broadcast is still going on. We can't pinpoint the Aleema's location, but that Pinion has been speaking to it for two straight days."

She glanced at Rensha, whose snout twitched, indicating Rew should continue.

"Furthermore, we are tracing flight patterns of three ships, all closing in on the same sector. Two of them are known to be Mandalorian-owned, with falsified registries. The third ship fits the same naming pattern."

"So this lost fighter... this Pinion is something the Mandalorians want. Badly. Mandalorians? Or... Sith?" Jiya's jaw tightened. "Are they allied with Revan still? Just after salvage? You fought the Star Forge ships in space, Ekkumi—"

"Most Sith fighters were designed for close-range offensives," she told them. "The Pinion-class are different. Elite warbirds, assigned a crew of four. Usually at least one Dark Jedi. If one is returning from a mission now and seeking the Mandalorians...."

"It could be anything," Cein argued. "What does this have to do with Malak and our deal with the Jedi?"

Rew pulled up the other part of the data they had received. "Maybe nothing, but we've dispatched a ship from the Katarr assignment to monitor that warbird."

"And the rest of the Katarr assignment?" Cein paused. "Given this new information?"

High Admiral Rensha's lips drew back from her pointed teeth. "We are still collecting facts."

XXX

Were there words, Lydie Korr wondered, for telling a friend that their unwilling sacrifice had done nothing at all?

Azen showed me a broadcast from Dromund Kaas. They recognized Darth Malak as Revan's consort. Dustil Onasi's body is there, but Darth Malak is what they're calling him—

There should be. There should be words. Those were words, but she couldn't figure out how to say them.

"Our tent's over there," Mekel Jin nodded, pointing across the sea of half-assembled structures making up the Jedi Conclave. His forehead was very flat and smooth compared to his chin. "Not as flash as yours. Yours is nicer. Nice digs."

"Azen selected it." Lydie shrugged. It was much nicer than anything she had lived in before her marriage; but a hovel compared to the Loanin apartments on Coru.

She gestured to the open door. "Would you... would you like to come inside? I could make tea."

"Where is Loanin?" Mekel asked. His head turned, and he seemed to be watching a pair of Togruta padawans sparring. They had stripped down to light under-robies in the hot sun.

Lydie subdued an irrational twinge of jealousy.
"Would you… I suppose combat practice is a way to pass the time. We could… we could spar if you prefer it."

"Where's your husband?" Mekel repeated. His head ducked down. If he'd been Zabrak she would have taken that as a sign of aggression, but Humans used the gesture to mean they were socially uncomfortable. Lydie had noted this behavior with Mekel Jin before, even spoken to Thalia about it at length—

"Azen's in orbit." Lydie nodded at the empty sky. "He had another meeting with Fleet authority."

"Good. Uh… that's good." Mekel's voice cracked a little. "Lydie. Does… does any of this make sense to you?" He gestured at the busy camp around them, Jedi everywhere. Perhaps he couldn't feel it, but Lydie could: the thrum of so many attuned in the Force, together they felt like a song.

It makes more sense than what we did to you.

If she told him, would he still look at her?

If she told him, he'd be angry. Upset. He would turn away—

And it would change nothing. Nothing at all. Except Mekel Jin would no longer smile at her.

"I have some training sabers…." her voice trailed off as his smile faded. "Of course it makes sense. When Davad Arkan's ship appears above Katarr, the Fleet ships will uncloak and blow it up. Davad Arkan is a threat that we Jedi cannot stop, proof that not everything comes down to the Force—"

"And then what? We should go to the fracking Sith planets. Stop them. Not this banthashit." His mouth tightened. "You have no idea what it's like over there. So dark… but there's power…."

"I would love to hear about it." She would. It wasn't merely that Lydie Korr liked the way Mekel Jin's hi eyes looked at her, or the way his voice sounded, or that she liked imagining the strange roughness of his stubble-covered chin—

She liked him.

Not to mention Mekel Jin was a trove of Sith lore. Even Azen would surely appreciate that.

Xxx

"There's no coming back from this." High Admiral Rensha surveyed her closest advisors—friends—although she used the term loosely. One could hardly be friends with those of lesser rank.

*I know." Jiya nodded. His holographic image flickered, as the sunspots from Katarr's red dwarf of a sun cut into their short-range transmissions. But the footage merely confirms our fears.

"Did Masters Kavar and Loanin lie? Or are they unaware?" Admiral Rew Ekkumi sounded like she wasn't sure.

We have to assume the Jedi are compromised—perhaps not willingly, but… Jiya Sand sighed. "Even Kavar and Loanin."

The Sith broadcast that Atris had translated for them was blurred, conducted in an unfamiliar language, harsh and dissonant, but the main players were unmistakable: there, Revan Starfire, escorted by a Fleet commander and her combat droid, Dustil Onasi, and Carth Onasi. From the behavior of everyone present (including, their xenososh said, the costume of traditional Sith wedding tunics on both Onasis), there was every indication that the initial report from House Racharn had been the correct one.

Malak D'Reev and his wife were alive and well, and being celebrated on a Sith planet.

Coupled with the rumors of a Mandalorian freighter running old war comm codes, and a Pinion-class warbird's distress call pinging from Sullust….

Who are we fighting? It was the question Rensha and the others had been trying to answer for weeks.

In the last few days that question had crystallized into sharp relief—even if the answers were unpalatable, would have been unthinkable even a year previous.

Rensha looked at the screen again, at Captain Carth Onasi, decorated war hero and loyal soldier. It was more than emotional regret she felt down to her scales—it was anger. Anger that such a good man could have been twisted so far. And his son's own body taken from him….

How can we condone an order of mystics who let the dead possess the living? How can we allow their failed policies to continue, when they have caused so many deaths?

If it were only the Mandalorian threat they had to worry about, Rensha would have welcomed battle. But the darker question remained.

How can we fight an order of mystics when each one of them has access to powers that can cloud our minds, suspend physics, and advance physical conditioning far beyond even the most enhanced soldier?

At Telos, Rensha had faced down pilots who flew unshielded, whose blind targeting skills never missed. She'd faced them and fled, limping away on the Byss Welcome. Later, she'd seen footage of what had happened groundside: caped monsters with red particle blades cutting through civilian populations while bombs fell around them.

And every one of those Jedi—every one—has the potential to become monsters like those.

And here is an entire Sith civilization full of monsters—and the Jedi want us to destroy the one thing who could stop them.

They want us to destroy Davad Arkan, Force-eater. The one creature capable of destroying them.

It was sentient nature, of course. All beings fight for their survival. As a Trandoshan, Admiral Rensha was acutely aware of that.

But the Jedi do not rule the Republic. They merely advise.

The decision was easy, even if living with its fallout would not be.

Katarr had looked so innocuous, small and peaceful below… with a slow, but steady traffic of shuttles, cruisers, and cargo ships bringing the Jedi to its surface for the facade of a Conclave. How many Jedi were there now? They had been told perhaps a thousand.

How many Jedi are left in the galaxy?

The Order was notoriously secretive with that information, but their estimates were less than three thousand, and at least half of those were Service Corps, members of the Order who had washed out of their training; or apprentices, Jedi too young to even be padawans.

If true, most of the able-bodied population of Jedi Force users were on Katarr right now, waiting to lure a Force-sucking monster to his doom.

Doom can be delayed. And if there is no Force left... might the problem of Davad Arkan not solve itself?

Rensha realized what she proposed was... genocide. But an odd part of her heart-brain wondered if Revan Starfire—the real Revan Starfire, the General Revan that she had come to admire, the woman she had nearly followed to the gates of hell itself—might have understood.

"Can we trust Atris?" Jiya asked, interrupting her thoughts.

Admiral Rensha shrugged. "Does it matter?" She had tried, tried to remember the days when Malak and Revan had been the best of the Fleet—not just exemplars for the Jedi—but for all their soldiers. She had tried to stay objective, tried to believe the insane theory the Jedi had first espoused: that Revan and Malak could save the galaxy from some kind of life-possessing Sith Emperor... but yet, the real, hard evidence was there on this vid, standing next to the Republic's most loyal soldier, Captain Carth Onasi.

Revan and Malak reborn were still Revan and Malak. They had not stopped the Emperor. Instead, they were being welcomed by him with open arms—

Admiral Rensha remembered the original Revan well enough. A brilliant, logical mind. Clear-headed enough to be reptilian. They'd all worn the masks then, making them supposedly indistinguishable, but it was obvious when Revan was the one directing operations. Rensha had not been High Admiral then—merely one of a dozen of Forn Dodonna's sub commanders, holding back the rear guard, protecting supply lines.

Until Revan came. Revan's presence shone through Rensha's own victories like gleaming, oiled scales in murky water.

I owe her my rank. I owe her my victories. And then... she nearly cost me the entire Republic Fleet —

Rensha had fought with Bastila too, even once or twice with the legendary Vima Sunrider; but Battle Meditation was nothing without guidance and Revan Starfire had possessed an acute military mind, with an almost uncanny ability to anticipate her enemy.

That military mind, coupled with Sith Force powers, had almost driven the Republic to its knees once. If that happened again—

No. It cannot happen again. Any of it.

"Hold orbital positions," Rensha commanded. "For now." She looked at them all, her subordinates. Allies. Veterans from the same conflict—all of them commanders who had followed Revan before to the gates of Malachor; and all of them ones who had abandoned her after, when it became clear that their brilliant strategist had no end-game but oblivion. "There is no coming back," she reminded them. "And for that reason, our course must be irrefutable."

XXX

If you'd told Mekel Jin a month ago when he was living high on the Coruscanti skyline that he'd be stuck on a backwater farm planet with his estranged father—without Dustil, and with no Force—he'd have asked for some of what you were smoking; so that he and Telos could hand it out to marks and then rob them blind of any interesting valuables they might have.

(Not that they'd needed credits by then—by then they'd had plenty, but it would have been hilarious.)

But times had sure fracking changed. Now, he and Dear Old Master Vrook Dads shared a small pop-up plasticore tent in a fracking field of them, all full of Jedi. It rained a lot. There was always a line for the fresher, and the asshole Miralukan farmer whose field this was got all pissy when Mekel went off to piss in the river instead of waiting his turn for one of the porta-pissers.

So far, the Jedi Conclave on Katarr reminded Mekel of the time Master Uthar had taken them all on a field trip/invasion tour of that Endorran moon. They'd come in after the main Sith forces had already left and spent a week on clean-up and patrol.

At least this time, no one was on corpse disposal. Yet.

And sparring with practice sabers with Lydie Korr sure beat sparring with particle blades with Lashowe DeVry actually trying to actively kill him.

"I guess when you were my age, there was that Exar Kun thing," Mekel offered. "Did you join him, uh… Dads?"

"What? No! Of course I didn't—" Dear old Dads seemed to pause, as if he realized Mekel was just trying to find some common ground. "No. I did not. Son."

"Oh." Mekel was still trying to think of things to say. Polite things to say that would stop his thoughts from racing, or stop him from feeling like he needed to jet.

Where are you gonna go? What the frack can you do? Every skill you had was in the Force, unless you want to join the family fracking business.

Family fracking business. Hah. That was almost funny, so Mekel laughed.

"It was not an amusing time," Vrook said stiffly. "What do you find funny?"

"Everything. All of this." He gestured at the tent in front of them. "I don't have the Force anymore because of Lord Mal—"

"You don't need to call him, 'Lord' Malak, anymore." Vrook blinked suddenly and bent his head. He made several throat-clearing sounds then, and Mekel waited politely for him to finish.

"You want me to call him 'Uncle Malak' instead?" Cousin? Cousin-in-law? Was that a thing?

A thin smile crossed Dear Old Dads's thin lips. "I suppose it doesn't matter what you call him. I just…it is difficult for me to understand. What your life must have been like that you—"

"And we were getting along so well." Frack you, Dear Old Dads. Mekel got up from his sitting mat (it rolled out to become a sleeping mat at night. and three days now and he was done, he was done with all of this fracking banthashit.)

"Wait!" Vrook stood up too. "Son. Don't—"

"Why are you here?" Mekel snapped at him. "You know it's all nuts, right? Why do you trust them? The Fleet? Ever think this might be just what that Sith Emperor wants? Or the Senators?"

"They're not the same—"

"Tell that to Master Marla Korr and fracking Master Klee." Mekel said. "I have to piss."

He turned and walked away. Towards the fracking river.

XXX

Ord Mantell was as unassuming groundside as it had looked from orbit. Jasp Organa adjusted his sights on the viewscreen of the shuttle, watching the two robed figures disembark, and trying to ignore the ominous feeling in his gut.

"We'll be back soon," Lord Sion had told Jasp, flashing a rotting smile. "Nihilus wants a snack."

"- - - - - -," Nihilus had added.

"I told him we'd feast at Katarr, but he's… impatient." The dead Sith had looked worse, if that were possible. Something dark was seeping through the skin of his gut.

"I-I don't know how long we can linger before someone asks for our docking clearance—"

Sion had chuckled. "They won't. Just remember: you want to stay here. On the shuttle. Until we return."

"I do." Jasp did. Realizing what was happening to him didn't stop it. "I want to stay here. Until you return."

The door had apexed closed behind them, and Jasp let out the breath he'd been holding, resting his head against the nav.

They're going to kill more Jedi. Jedi like that woman who stole Pollie's memories.

Maybe they deserve it. Pollie doesn't have the Force. They can't hurt her or me. Maybe they deserve it, these Jedi—

Jasp wished he could get that kid's face out of his head though. That kid, standing over his ma with glowing, blue hands.

But when his Masters…. When they were gone, his head became clearer. It was the best—and the worst of times. Self-reflection became recrimination and regret. I should never have left you, Moll. I don't even know where Pollie is—

His hand shook a little as he dialed home.

"Jasp!" Moll must have recognized the comm because she picked up immediately. "Where are you?"

"Ord Mantell, I…." His mouth felt dry. "Listen, Mollie; I may not have a chance to comm again."

"Why? What's happening?" Her features sharpened. She must have turned on a light—he hadn't thought how late it would be there.

"Nothing new. Just… I think I got conscripted." Jasp wanted to make it a joke. "These two friends of Revan Starfire's they're… real Sith. It's bad."
What?"

"Real Sith, who?" A boyish treble interrupted, and there was her son again, staring at Jasp, hair mussed with sleep. A muffled cry next to him, and then there was Abasen, Jasp's grandson too—looking bigger than he'd been, tufts of hair spiking almost long enough for his first knot.

"They sleep with me sometimes," Moll admitted. "The boy… he has nightmares."

"I dreamed my mother died," Malachor D'Reev said. "Last night, but she didn't, right? Are you with her?" He rubbed his eyes. "What Sith are you with? Have you seen her?"

"No… no, I—they call themselves Sion and Nihilus. One's dead and one… he eats Force users." They had other names—Sion, the Mandalorian, had practically given Jasp their life stories. The boy seemed as if he just wanted to talk. And the more he did, the younger he seemed, despite his ravaged appearance. If he hadn't been compelling Jasp to follow him, he might have felt sorry for the kid.

"Huh?" The holoimage of Revan's son frowned. "Are you positive that's not what they want you to think?"

Jasp suppressed a shiver. Revan's son didn't sound like any child he'd ever met before. "I'm not sure of anything." Not a good time to get rusty, but he might not have another. "Moll… I-I miss you. Has there been any word? About our Pollie?"

"None since Revan left." Her voice seemed deliberately light. "Jasp, you need to get off that ship right now and come home."

"I can't. Sion… he told me to stay with the ship."

"So?" Revan's son made a face, looking every centimeter a Coruscanti mucky muck. "He's just some dumb Sith Lord, right? My mother's like, his boss. I say you should go."

In a better time, Jasp might have laughed. Instead, he looked at Abasen's blank face, those dark eyes blurring through the comm projection.

"Wish I could, kiddo."

"If this is some kind of joke, Jasp Organa—" Moll sounded fierce and bright. He loved her for it.

I wish I were joking too.

"It's not a joke," he told them. "Hey… listen if you… when you talk to our Pollie again, tell her—"

"You tell her," his wife snapped. "Whatever nonsense is going through your head now? You're gonna tell her yourself."

"Tell her I was wrong about the Sith," Jasp finished. "They don't have the right idea. They have fracking terrible ideas."

His wife made a sound between a laugh and a sob. He didn't think he'd ever loved her more.
Revan shivered.

The stars pressed too close, as if something out there was lurking, just out of reach. Revan could almost feel it—there—in an empty quadrant of space, lights like tiny fires, burning. Life.

I'm losing my mind. There's nothing there at all.

Revan rested her forehead against the cool surface of her helmet, trying not to sleep again. She wasn't supposed to sleep, but it was getting harder and harder to stay awake. For some reason, every time she slipped into half-consciousness she saw Malak, found herself running down a corridor after him; but every time she reached the end, every time she drew close, he turned his face away.

The Mandalorians should be here soon—it was hard to stay awake, and in her half-dreaming state Revan saw Bastila Shan staring back at her in the viewscreen's 'scape, like the reflection in a mirror.

"You never listened," the Jedi declared, her voice full of as much self-righteous scorn as it had been that day on the roof of the ancient temple.

"I'm sorry." You should have just told me, Bastila. I would have listened. You should have told me. All those times you held quiet, all those times I thought I was losing my mind—

"Shouldn't have staged your coup above my planet," a dark-haired girl with her hair in a top-knot added, standing behind her. It took Revan a second to recognize Beya Organa.

"What?"

"I made my choice, Rev." Beya Organa shrugged. "Polla would have done the same, I bet. It was our home. Why didn't you pick Hoth instead?"

"Choice? I-I don't—" I'm arguing with a hallucination. Fracking hell, I'm trapped in space arguing with my own mind—and losing—

"I wasn't following you; I was helping. Helping my friends on a dangerous mission." Juhani's voice was softer than the rest. Anger gone, full of sad resignation.

"It's gonna be okay, Polla." Mission stepped in front of all of them, leaning over so that her face was eye-level with Revan's seated body. Her eyes were wide and blue, the color of her skin. "Guess it's kind of like you saved me, right? I would've died when Malak blew Taris up anyway."

"Except that was her fault," Beya snapped.

"Not entirely," Bastila chimed in. "I remember our sojourn in the sublevels quite well, Knight Organa. Your sad attempts to betray your—"

"I'm sorry," Revan interrupted, muttering to both of them. "I'm sorry I killed you. Again."

Hallucinating? Hypoxia? Keep moving! she reminded herself, forcing her stiff limbs to move back and forth.

Korrie. What a joke it'll be if your ma goes off to save the galaxy and dies floating in space.
And how can I stop Dar'Revan? Even with the Aleema, what can I do? Why the hell do I think I know what to do with a fracking warship at all?

"If you're real, tell me something useful," Revan snapped. Her breath rattled inside the suit, fogging the visor a little. That was new, probably meant some part of the recycler wasn't working. "Tell me how to defeat Dar'Revan. Tell me how to kill Tenebrae."

"You want to defeat yourself?" Mission scrunched up her face. "I'm not a Sith Lord or anything, but that seems dumb, kinda."

"Use your gifts," Bastila told her. "I used to study your battles. You were brilliant. High Admiral Rensha once told me she thought you were wasted with the Jedi."

"So gifted you nearly burned the stars," Beya mocked. "We all wished you'd been less."

"Sorry, I had to check the local traffic." Aemelie's face appeared again in the viewscreen. The ghost-images behind her dissolved—never really there at all. "I did hear from Canderous and Milli—their corvette should be there to retrieve you within hours. Make sure they anchor your ship properly. We wouldn't want any damage to its hull—"

"I said I'd tell them." Revan forced her eyes back open again and exhaled. "I told you twice."

"The Pinion V is very important to me," Aemelie repeated for the hundredth time. The unspoken bit being that Revan herself was not. "I have drawn up some plans for our invasion of the Sith Empire if you would like to review them—"

"It… it can't be an invasion," Revan protested. "We need to find a way to stop the Emperor. We can't invade his territory with one ship!"

"We have more than one ship." Aemelie looked smug, almost conspiratorial. "But we will speak of this later. Right now… I was wondering if you would play a game with me? It's merely a training simulator. We use them to train children. Polla Organa and I played quite often. She had an innate talent for the targeting sims—"

"Well, I don't, Second Wife."

Aemelie had already given Revan several lectures on how much better Polla Organa was at everything than Revan.

At least I wasn't stupid enough to pretend to be a Sith Lord for credits.

Revan frowned, remembering Taris. And Manaan. And… Korriban.

Well, not for millions of credits.

"There are other simulation programs," Aemelie told her. "I have one here—" she held up a plasticore tape. "Shall we play a game?"

Is it a trap? Exhaustion weighed her lids, and Revan moved her toes in the suit, twisting her legs back and forth to keep awake. Her stomach had been empty now for days, and it ached, dully.

"Sure," she said. "How about chess?"

"I was thinking the Great Galactic War," Aemelie beamed. "If you like, I will control the Sith Fleet, and you may mount the Mandalorian offensive."

Revan narrowed her eyes. "This is just a game, right? You're not using a real fleet somewhere based on what I'd say?"

"Check your oxygen levels," Aemelie told her coolly. "You may be suffering from hypoxia."

Xxx

"Hello, Lydie." Mekel tried to keep his voice casual, like this was normal. Like any of it—this Jedi Conclave, this Zabrak inviting him to the tent she shared with her husband when he was half a planet away (maybe even in orbit) at some meeting—anything. Like anything was normal, or could be, ever again. "I... I, uh, I got your note."

A shy Neimoidian padawan had pressed it into his hand (when Mekel was on his way back from the river) and then ran skipping off.

We need to talk.

Just those words, her sig, and coordinates to her tent—as if he'd forgotten where it was.

Their tent. The tent she shares with Loanin, because they're married now. They're married, and Telos is dead and I don't have the fracking Force.

"Would you like some tea?" the Zabrak asked, like she had the other four times he'd been here. He'd always said no, and then they'd spar. She wasn't very good, but she had the Force.

She kept kicking his ass.

But I'm getting better.

Mekel liked sparring with her more than with Dear Old Dads. Dear Old Dads was a master duelist who kept letting Mekel win so he'd feel better about himself.

Frack Dear Old Dads.

Lydie Korr didn't know enough to throw any fights. Frack, half the time, he was teaching her stuff.

Her tent was also much nicer than the one he and Dear Old Dads were sharing. And Master Azen Loanin, Mekel couldn't help but notice, was nowhere in evidence. (Just like the other four times he'd been here.) Although a stack of what looked like the most boring datapads ever were piled on top of a nearby chair, next a man's pair of expensive-looking fur-lined slippers.

A babe like Lydie, your own tent, and all you do is read. Sounds like you, Loanin.

"Mekel?" The babe was talking to him. "Did you want the tea?"

"Sure." *Whatever. He always took it to be polite, even if it tasted like muddy water. "Unless you have something stronger?"

"I do." Red spots burned on her cheeks like she was blushing and Mekel hadn't even meant—he hadn't meant anything—

"I mean if you have something too...."

"I could." She stood up, gracefully unfolding herself and walked to the console, pulled out two glasses and a bottle of what looked like expensive CoruGin.

Lydie poured their drinks into glass bulbs that looked like they went meant for tea. A lot of it. Mekel wondered if she knew that—

_Is she trying to get me drunk?_ If Telos were here, If Telos were in his head, he'd make some comment, some crude comment and Dustil would—

_Dustil would be pissed at me. Dustil never understood that it wasn't serious. Sure, she's beautiful, and she's here, but she's not—_

_She's no Millifar. She's no Dustil._

Guiltily, he wondered if he should reverse that order, but Milli at least was still alive.

"I'm sorry about… the Force and… Dustil," Lydie offered. "I'm sorry."

Mekel shrugged. "Seems like I can't catch a break." He drained his glass. "Why am I here, Lydie? Why… why do you keep calling me here?"

_She feels sorry for you, fockda. Not really Dustil's voice in his head, but that's what Telos would say. Poor ickle Mekelkins, all alone in the world._

His face felt strangely warm, and Mekel turned his head to the floor to hide his expression. The drink was smooth; it tasted like lema and spice. His head spun pleasantly.

Lydie sipped hers more carefully. "We're friends, aren't we?"

"Yeah. Of course." Maybe he'd misread this entire thing. Telos would laugh at him for being such an idiot—

"Do you remember that time in the archives?" she asked him. Her head tilted slightly, and her eyes seemed to be examining his face for its reaction with the precision of a micro-bot.

"Sure." He flashed a smile as if he did.

"I thought you were going to kiss me," she said bluntly.

"Oh!" _Oh, that time in the archives._ He remembered breathing on her horns because the Zabrak who worked for Moms always said horns were an erogenous zone. He _had_ been going to kiss her —she was there, and she was beautiful, and she seemed to want to be kissed—but then Telos—

_We slipped that datapad of Sith porn in Mical Jorde's bunk and then, when the tracker noted it missing and Master Atris went looking—_

It might have been funnier, looking back, Mekel thought, if he and Telos had actually managed to see Jorde's humiliation. Funny thing though, looking back. They'd never heard about the fall out. Maybe the asshole hadn't been caught. And then, it had been pretty soon after that that Telos said frack this—or Mekel said frack this—or they both thought it—and then they'd taken off with Master Ban and left the Jedi for good.

_Or until now. Why the frack am I here?_

"Mekel," Lydie's voice was soft. "You seem a trillion parsecs away."

"Sorry, I was just—yeah," he said, looking across the table at her. "I was going to kiss you."
Lydie put her drink down and stood up again, shrugging off her robe. She had nothing on beneath. The porta-lamp light lit the spirals on her arms, over her breasts and taut stomach, the lines that traced the curves of her hips—

The indentations really did go all over her skin.

Mekel felt all his breath leave his body like the drink was kicking in.

He stood up too. Taller than her. She was shorter than Telos. It was all… different.

Good-different though. Not bad.

"Yeah," Mekel whispered, bending his head to kiss the tips of the horns on her forehead. Zella had told him once the horns were… were sensitive. He knew it was true when Lydie shivered, gave a soft sigh, in his arms, and pressed against him. "We're friends," he murmured softly, into the warmth of her skin.

Xxx

Aemelie and Revan played the Great Galactic War for several hours; a game of checks and feints, of hyperspace timing and resource allocations. A game of stalking other ships in three-dimensional space, calculating risk, and using gut instincts that Revan hadn't even known she had.

The first match was a rout. Aemelie wiped out the fleet that Revan had split in two with a war of attrition—stretching Revan's resources so thin that they were easy prey to pick off.

The second match was nearly a draw; but Aemelie ignited a superweapon at the parlay, destroying half her own remaining pieces and all of Revan's.

"I learned that from you," she beamed.

"Not me," Revan muttered, half under her breath, tapping away at the virtual grid.

The third match, Revan won.

"How did you know our ambush was in the Eos sector?" Aemelie's smile was a mock pout, but she looked more pleased than angry.

"Had to be somewhere along our hyperspace trail. You hit us after we restocked our supplies, but before we had a chance to distribute them. Take out the freighters first—leaves the other ships crippled. Without resupplying their crews would be forced to—"

Her voice broke off.

_Hessi walked over my grave._

Revan looked in the viewport, but there was nothing there.

_But the Force thinks there is. The Fleet used Jedi to detect cloaked ships—they told me that they all told me—that and I can detect… something. Something's there. And it's been there for a while._

The conclusion was obvious, like a spiderroach crawling up her spine. Revan shivered.

"Aemelie, how close did you say Canderous was?"

"I can't tell, as long as we are cloaked, not precisely; but I'd imagine mere hours at least."
"Time for one more game."

"The Second Wife of Ordo nodded briskly. "I'm curious to see what you would do faced with the reclamation of Taris now. Have you studied what the real you did when you beat our forces back—"

There, in the left-hand part of the sky. Imperceptible, almost; but if Revan focused—life. Points of light. And one of them's brighter, almost like—

Her senses extended, and she almost felt the light recoil as if it sensed her too.

A Force user. Cloaked ship with a Force user. Sith?

"There's a ship here, Aemelie. Cloaked."

"It's not Canderous." The Second Wife frowned. "Of course they're not cloaked, they're coming in a light corvette, merely a modified cruiser with a forged registry. Did I tell you how good Polla Organa was at altering a ship's registry? She and I renamed the Aleema, as well as some of the other ships. I think she called the corvette the Dancer's Run, on its official manifest—"

"There's a ship here!" Revan repeated, now certain of it. "It's big... not what you... how many— is it just Canderous and Milli? Just the two of them?"

There are more than two sents in that ship. More than a hundred. Five hundred maybe. What kinds of ships hold five hundred—

A part of her mind reached for the answer, but all she could see was Aemelie's damned game.

It's cloaked here. Been here for hours. Coincidence? This close, it has to pick up the Pinion.

Her ship had a cloaking switch on the nav board too, but everything on the nav had died with the main power relay.

And cloaked ships can't hide from Force users. I think they have one too. At least one. It could be anyone. It could be fracking Dar'Revan!

Even as Revan said that she knew it wasn't true.

It's not her. But it's not... unfamiliar. Not—

She had been hiding her own signature, tamping it down to a mere ember. Now, she muffled it even more.

"Yes. Well, Kex came too." Aemelie sniffed. "Poor boy thinks he has a chance with our daughter. Speaking of that, I don't suppose you know where Mekel Jin had gotten to?"

"What? No." Automatic guilt now tugging at her. Right. Mekel Jin. I said I'd help him, turns out we're related, and then I lost him. Him and Dustil Onasi both. "What does that—"

A light corvette cruiser popped out or hyperspace abruptly, closer than she'd have timed it herself, (if she could really fly a ship). The board in front of her sputtered to life, noting the ship as the Dancer's Run.
"Oh," Revan sighed with relief. "They're here."

Blue light from the 'Vette's tractor almost immediately illuminated her face, and Canderous's rough voice broke into the channel, with the strength of a local, wide-beam broadcast.

"Aemelie said we need to keep the Pinion clean," he announced, without preamble. "Make sure your resistors are switched off. Don't want any lulls in the tractor. Need a nice, tight lift against our hull."

"I think the resistors are broken," she offered. They were if they were one of the parts redlined on her deck. "Hello, Canderous."

"Revan." He sounded amused. "Aemelie's pinging me now. She said you re-created the main oppositional feints of the Duros defensive…? That was a fine battle. Are you remembering?"

"What? No, we were just running wargames. Simulations. To pass the time." Her eyes went back to that patch in space. To the uneasy feeling. "This is gonna sound nuts, but is your sensor picking up anyth—"

A hammerhead cruiser shimmered into view, dwarfing both of them, abrupt and final. Painted with Republic colors.

Harbinger, the letters on Aurebesh said.

"Unknown vessels," a man's voice commanded. "Stand down, and prepare for our tractor beam."

Xxx

"Shit," Commander Cody added, softer, with his mic switched off.

They had been watching the tiny warbird for hours. Scans reported one life form, and nothing else—just the steady stream of that signal. Dak was acting really twitchy, but that wasn't new. Kid was born twitchy.

And then, over an open prox channel, the occupants of both ships greeted each other by name.

"S'cuy, Canderous," the cool, woman's voice sounded amused.

"Revan," a gravel-voiced man responded.

They went on in Mandalorian, but Cody spoke Mandalorian. Most Fleet officers did. Hypnosleep vids and a few shots. Know your enemy.

Cody's enemies were here. General Ordo himself.

And in the warbird—that voice, broadcast unscrambled on the local channel—

"Take off your clothes."

His face flushed with humiliation now, remembering the woman who had made him do that.

What if she made him do it again?

Xxx
"Revan?" Aemelie's voice on the long-range scrambled channel was alarmed. Canderous had gone quiet. *Silence among enemies. That makes sense. "Revan? Is he there? Do you see their ship?"

"We've both been tractored," she snapped, still inwardly cursing. "Republic ship here. Hammerhead-class. It's called the Harbinger."

"Oh? Harbinger to what?" Aemelie chuckled as if that was funny.

"Trouble." Her mind began sifting through the pieces. I'm supposed to be dead. The Mandalorians have my Sith warship. Dar'Revan's on the Sith homeworld by now—with Carth and the real Polla Organa—not to mention Seiran Wen—With Carth. How the frack did that even happen?

He could be dead. He could be dead—

Panic warred with guilt and fear.

"I will cut transmission now, so they can't get a fix on our location," Aemelie said. "But don't worry. We will rescue you."

"Wait—I-I don't even know if—"

Her comm was dead.

"Frack!" Revan tilted her head up the viewscreen and watched the incoming hangar bay approach. There seemed to be a large contingent of armored troopers assembled behind the hangar bay's shields—and they were all quite heavily armed.

XXX

"Knight Vesser—"

"Just call me Dak, Commander." The man turned from the viewscreen and gave Cody an apologetic smile. "It seems I returned to the Jedi too late—there are no Jedi now."

Well, there's you, and that woman being pulled into my ship.

"I didn't explain before...." Cody outranked this kid, this kid had been a literal kid during the Mandalorian Wars, and still, Cody felt himself scrambling with that strange mix of awe and fear he always got around Jedi. "But I summoned you here for a reason. You have your lightsaber?"

A shadow seemed to cross the kid's face. "Always." He hesitated. "I keep it hidden. I always have, ever since Korrib—"

"No time for stories." I outrank you. Follow me. Cody started walking, and to his relief, the kid did start following him, even if Jedi probably couldn't read minds or anything.

"We were sent off-course to intercept a strange transmission," he continued briskly.

"I was wondering why we left Katarr."

"We're tractoring in two ships. One of them has Revan Starfire. The other one has Canderous Ordo." No way to say it but to say it.

Dak showed no reaction, which made Cody up his estimate of his age.
"She's not dead." The kid offered finally. "They… the newsvids all said she was dead, but she's not. Again." There was a strange quality in his voice, one that Cody couldn't place.

"She's not dead," Cody agreed. "You're right. Worse than that. She's on our damn ship."

Xxx

Revan opened the hatch to a ring of armored faces, and a few laser sights scrolling across her coverall.

"Sorry, I must stink," she offered. "I was stuck in an enviro-suit for days." She'd shucked off the suit as soon as their tractor beam started pulling her into pressurized atmosphere—probably too fast by the way her ears were ringing.

She'd thought if they could see her face they wouldn't shoot—

Maybe so, with a different face. The guns pointed at her didn't budge.

Revan raised her hands, mind flashing oddly back to the number of times she'd been in these straits before: Tatooine, Manaan, Biscain—

Biscain had been Polla Organa, but it was still where her mind went now. Better than the time on Manaan when her pod crashed into that bus full of Selkath schoolchildren—

"Relax, guys." She made her words an easy drawl. "Who's… can you… take me to your captain or admiral or whoever's in charge?"

She turned her head a little and saw Canderous, helmet off, with Millifar and another kid. The kid took her a heartbeat—Kex. Right. Aemelie said he was here too—

The guards said nothing, although one of them made a finger-chopping motion a vestigial part of her brain interrupted as a hold. As in, hold here until the brass comes and deals with this mess—

"Commander," a voice said from behind, from the direction of space, which was not what Revan had expected.

"No need for formality," she smiled, turning her back on the guns, against every instinct in her body. "I don't really have a rank—"

"Yeah, but I do. You asked who's in charge. It's me. The Commander. Commander Sheen Cody." The man was pale and Human and sweaty and shaved; trailed by a brown-skinned Human Jedi whose familiarity took two heartbeats.

"Dak," Revan said, ignoring the Fleet guy for now. (Carth had once said there was no surer way to piss them off, and she was a little pissed off herself, what with all of the blasters.) "Dak Vesser! I thought…." Her voice trailed off as she realized she hadn't thought of him at all, not since the last real conversation she'd had with Juhani—and that was one she had wanted to forget.

"Some little blue Twi'lek was offering free berths off Korriban. I took the last." He stared at her. "I dreamed of you."

"That's, uh…." She looked desperately over at Canderous, who seemed to be doing an elaborate job of laying down weapons. Hope he still has enough stashed. His head jerked in a nod as if all this was normal. Being delayed and searched by Republic forces… actually, it strangely was.
"You're looking a little worse for wear since Peragus," Commander Cody chimed in.

Her muscles ached, from disuse and the injuries she'd sustained on Deralia. "Peragus…"

Mining station, explosive, tactically worthless, her mind supplied, mocking her as well as Dar.

"You stole my uniform," the Commander snapped. "On Peragus."

One of the armored men behind made a sound between a cough and a snort, loud and awkward over his voder.

"Oh. Sorry." Revan wondered if there would ever come a time when she could stop apologizing for banthashit she'd never done—or couldn't remember doing. "That was… before… I-I still don't have a lot of memories from the—"

"It was a few weeks ago," he said flatly. "You were in my head. You made me take off my clothes."

One of his men snorted and another one elbowed him.

"On Peragus Station—" points on a grid. Hyperspace lanes—" This was… recent? Damn her. "Was I with a guy, little shorter than you? Deralian, maybe?"

"Is this a game to you?" The man didn't seem stable enough to be in charge of a starship, in Revan's opinion.

If only. Those I win.

"What happened on Peragus was… classified," she hedged, unwilling to admit it wasn't her. Am I protecting Dar? Still? "I'm sorry for the inconvenience—"

"You apologizing again, Revan?" Canderous seemed to have a better rapport with their set of guards than Revan had, because he, Millifar and Kex ambled over to them now, escorted by sents who didn't have their weapons out. "She doesn't mean it," he added. "I mean the apology. Revan, we owe them nothing." He nodded towards the Mandalorian corvette, dwarfing everything else in the hangar bay. "Let's load up your ship and go."

"You need a sonic, Third Wife," Millifar added, making a face.

"You're all my prisoners," the Commander said foolishly as if saying made it true.

Kex laughed as if that was funny. So did a few of Cody's own guards, but the Commander wasn't laughing—and neither was Jedi Knight Dak Vesser, whose hand, Revan couldn't help but noticing, had curved in a way that suggested he had his saber close at hand to call.

"Commander Cody," Revan tried another charming smile, but they seemed as effective as mud. He's brass through and through. He won't respond to thisla treats, not from me… I'll need the closed fist.

"Commander Cody," she repeated with a stronger voice. "While my… officers and I are delighted to accept your hospitality; I feel it fair to remind you that I am a sovereign citizen of… Mandalore, as well as a member of the Republic High Senate. Have your men put away their weapons. Now, or I will… put them away for them."

One or two took a step back before looking to their commander. Good.
Their commander's lips thinned. "You can't make us all do what you say with your Force magic!"

I could try. She eyed him, assessing, before noting Dak's scowl next to him.

I'd take out your Knight protector first…

"Listen to her," Canderous's voice was a low growl. "If you want this to stay peaceful."

"Juhani said you wanted peace, Revan," Dak muttered. "On Korriban. She said you were going to stop the war—"

"And I did." Peace. A dream. A fracking lie. "I stopped Malak. I'm sorry about Juhani, I'm sorry s-she didn't—"

XXX

"Wait. Wait a minute. Where are the others? Juhani and Jolee Bindo?"

"They didn't make it." Her words felt like they were coming from space, far away and frozen. Abstracts. They didn't—they didn't make it.

Bastila was talking, bragging really, taunting them with it, and Mission's eyes widened like she didn't want to believe—

XXX

"You're sorry," Knight Vesser snorted. "I still dream about her. Sometimes. Being sorry doesn't bring her back."

"Sometimes I do too. I…"

"Why are you here?" Commander Cody interrupted. "Why my damned command? Why again? Is it what I said on Peragus? I was joking—just thought you were an actress!"

"I…." Revan didn't know what he was talking about enough to know if she should lie. Aren't we supposed to all be on the same side? "Was this recent? Recently, that you saw someone like me?"

"With a metal arm?" She held up her left, wriggling the fingers. "A metal arm, right? Here?"

He only looked at her blankly. Revan looked to Dak, but he seemed confused as well.

Maybe she was wearing gloves. That seems like the kind of thing she'd plan, wear gloves, so no one knows she wasn't me, blame me for more of her banthashit—

"It wasn't me," Revan told them both, anger rising like a tide. "That was the imposter. The woman we have to stop."

"Imposter?" The Commander shook his head. "No, it was you. Your face. Your voice. You. I don't know what game you're playing—"

"I'm not." She looked toward Canderous and the kids, hoping they didn't try anything. Not here. Not yet. "I'm not playing a… a game."

He's a good soldier, a part of her mind muttered. Follows his orders. He has orders to bring you in, so you can either escape or take this to the top brass—

While that schutta does frack-knows-what on Kaas?

Revan tried breathing in a calm that she didn't feel.

"You have orders to bring us in?" Revan asked. To where?

"My orders were to investigate your ship—and anyone who came along to collect it. My orders are to look out for another ship. One that's gone missing." Cody's eyebrows were thin and gray, and now he raised one. "My superiors have every reason to believe the Mandalorians have the Aleema.
And you, apparently."

"They rescued me." She forced herself to sound nonchalant. "How long were you sitting there, watching me drift in space, Commander? Waiting for my life support to fail?"

"I didn't know it was you! All we saw was the ship. The Sith ship." So much venom there.

Thanks a lot, Dar'Revan. Not only did you start a war against guys like this, but then you had to personally humiliate him?

Why would you take his clothes? Is this—does he mean they had sex?

She eyed him up and down and tried to imagine it.

Her? She wouldn't. And what would she need his clothing for afterward—

To impersonate a Republic officer. The answer came quickly. Or have Seiran impersonate one.
The question is... why?

At that, her mind drew a blank. Because she's nuts? Because she's taking over the Republic?

Over my dead body, she is! Fracking schutta!

"Revan doesn't have the Aleema," Canderous broke in flatly. "I do. And I suggest you let us go. My people are tired of Republic diplomacy."

"I can't." To his credit, Commander Cody looked like he wanted to. "I have orders too."

If they'd been groundside, if Revan's lightsaber worked, if she hadn't felt like every one of those helmeted faces standing in front of them might contain another Mission, another Juhani, Jolee—Revan might have made a run for it. Clearing the hangar wouldn't be difficult, she realized dispassionately, even without a blade to deflect the worst of their fire. Not difficult for her, but the Mandalorians wouldn't run—they'd fight too—and, even if they won, there would be casualties and, worse, if word of this ever got back to the Republic....

She was aware of Canderous, watching her. Canderous and his kids.

"We don't have time to go back to Coruscant," she snapped. Not when we're so close. From Sullust
I could make it in two weeks if I burned the jets, if I knew how to really fracking fly—

Cody shook his head. "Not Coru. Fleet's in orbit around Katarr. One jump away. We can be there in a few days."

"Katarr?" She frowned. Isn't that one of the Miraluka colony worlds? Why—?"
Cody shot Dak a warning glance as if the knight was going to offer Revan anything useful.

"That's need to know," he snapped. "And right now, you and your friends are needed in the brig."

Revan smiled slightly because it seemed to bug him. "If that makes you feel safe, Commander."

_Won't be the first time Canderous and I have broken out of a Republic jail._

Too much to hope it might be the last.

Xxx

Katarr was a moonlit word with a dim, red sun. Fine for the Miralukan colonists, who had photosensitive skin where their eyes should be; but Mekel felt like he was living underwater.

They'd been here a local week now, assigned to one of the makeshift camps on the world that had _trap_ written all fracking over it. The Jedi had been placed in a cove surrounded by mountains on one side, and on the other, the sea.

You didn't need the Force to have a bad feeling. Mekel had several. He was having another one right now, listening to Dear Old Dads try to explain why, (maybe because Dear Old Dads didn't consider they were all about to die), Mekel sleeping with Lydie Korr-now-Loanin was a bad idea.

"Contras," the old man repeated, looking slightly purple.

"I think she takes them?" Mekel admitted. He used to himself, but when it has been just Telos… well, no need. "Not sure they have a Free Medix here for Humans, even if I wanted to go. But she's got it covered, right? She was the one who asked me… to… you know." He raised an eyebrow. Him being here was fracking proof his old man at least got the basics.

"She's married," Dear Old Dads added.

"And her husband is away," Mekel argued back. Loanin was almost continuously up in orbit with Fleet Command on those cloaked ships, waiting to spring the trap or whatever. "Right? And she… she asked me!"

He couldn't believe his luck. All things considered, his luck was astounding—when he forgot about Telos being dead and not having the Force and being probably being about to die in this trap for a Force-eating Sith Lord.

Fracking Lydie Korr was great for forgetting all of those things. Fracking Lydie Korr didn't make up for anything… but it sure as frack felt good.

Xxx

Master Azen Loanin checked his chron again. It was odd, the way he and Kavar had been abruptly excluded from Fleet's Command meetings, but he had learned in his time as a Jedi and a Senator's son to have patience first, then questions, and only then to force the required response.

The Fleet ships were still cloaked in orbit around Katarr, and for now, that would suffice.

On the bench across from him, Master Kavar looked more impatient. Beside him, Master Vrook Lamar seemed half-asleep, or deep in a meditative trance. Azen wondered at the old man's inclusion, but assumed all would become clear, given time.

"Atris was apprising us of Arkan's progress," Kavar noted. "Now, she isn't answering her comms."
"There could be any number of reasons for that," Azen told him. Sunspots, for example. Those often interfered, even with transmissions as close as the planet beneath their feet. Lydie had missed two comms of his recently.

"Did the Fleet send word from Kaas? Or House Racharn—did they give you the broadcasts?" Kavar sounded suspicious, although Azen, rather tiredly, wondered who there was left to be betrayed. "Atris was to provide transcripts to me, but has not sent them. My own Ancient Sith is… limited."

_Those who do not study their enemies cannot understand them_, Azen thought. His own Ancient Sith was quite proficient… but he had not offered to do the transcription himself, as sharing that information would only garner suspicion among the Fleet officers, who already seemed quite certain that most Jedi were in league with the Sith.

"Jedi," General Sand stood in the doorway. "The High Admiral will see you now."

Xxx

Master Vrook Lamar had a bad feeling. The entire planet of Katarr was one bad feeling, but this was worse—and being summoned directly to Admiral Rensha's flagship felt… wrong.

_Loain and Vakla have kept me out of their plans with the Fleet all this time. Why include me now?_ Something was wrong—something felt poised. There were Jedi who had premonitions, like the former Sith girl, Thalia May. But Vrook's senses were not that advanced.

_Maybe Azen Loanin is luring me here to take me to task for my son's behavior—_

That was as absurd a reason as any he could muster, and yet the man himself sat opposite now, not even looking in Vrook's direction.

Maybe Yuthura Ban could have helped Vrook understand his son's reasons for sleeping with a Senator's wife, but she was not here. She had stayed on Coruscant citing personal concerns. With the Order in tatters, no one had authority to tell Yuthura Ban that she had to come.

Vrook himself could not understand his own son at all.

_But his mother… his mother would probably be proud_, he thought sourly.

General Sand invited them into the main conference room, and Vrook stood and followed, leaving his useless thoughts to stew for a time.

Xxx

"Now," Aemelie smiled happily, clapping her hands. "Now it begins." She turned her head towards Leskal, who was manning the navigational controls quite adequately, for one still unblooded in stars. "A quick surgical strike on their main Senate building will throw the entirety of the Republic into chaos."

"You always want to play the same game," Mother Catrinex sighed. Even half senile, a formidable opponent. "Did you play 'Sack of Coruscant' with Revan of Lin as well?"

"She is not ready," Aemelie sighed. "Not yet—"

Her comm chimed, and she glanced down at it. "Shavat," she muttered, reading the messages from the Dancer's Bounce and the Dancer's Hope. "Canderous's retrieval of Revan was intercepted by Republic forces—he left a distress beacon."

"Can they track him?" There were those who thought Catrinex of Rialis was senile; but they underestimated the old warlady's depth of experience.

"Yes…." Aemelie frowned. "I'm getting a probable trajectory, based on jump points. But eventually we must assume even the Republics will search their prisoners and find his personal tracker."

"If they are prisoners." The old woman sniffed. "Surely, our Mandalore and his barbarian wife outrank them. She was a general in their army!"

"We will follow," Aemelie said nodding at Leskal to make it so. "Have the vanguard ships stay cloaked for now, but put scouts ahead at all points of hyperspace exit along the Firrikan Trail. Miir, Galatea, Ord Mantell, Katarr, Lothal—"

"We can catch them before they go farther than that."

"Unless they switch the lanes and take another path. The Trail goes into the Reach—not the Core…." Aemelie frowned. The Aleema purred under her feet; fully operational and a magnificent marvel of engineering and grace.

"Increase speed to full and head for Katarr. It's the first point where the Trail forks. If they're going to switch lanes, they'll do it there." Aemelie realized she was beaming like a sated manka and beamed wider. "Our ship is faster than anything the Republic barbarians have. We will beat them there and then take the offensive."

It would be glorious.

XXX

"Well?" Rensha eyed them closely, these Jedi who had come before her. She flared her nostrils at them, alert for the stench of lies. "Explain. This."

On the holo-screen in front of her were two images. One showed Revan Starfire with Captain Carth Onasi and Dustil Onasi, clad in brief ceremonial Sith wedding clothes. The other showed Revan Starfire, dressed in a black flight suit, surrounded by Republic troops and wearing hand restraints, with Canderous Ordo and two younger Mandalorians wearing battle beskar (also in restraints) beside her.

"We did tell you there were two of them." Kavar frowned, twisting his smooth skin unpleasantly, for one so even-featured. "One of those is Revan, the other one is Sheris Loran, with Revan's memories."

"You told me," the High Admiral tried to be patient. There's no coming back from this. And so, I must be sure. I must be sure. "But which is which?"

Vrook, the nest-uncle of Revan cleared his throat. "My niece is with the Mandalorians. The other woman is the one with Sith."

"How can you tell?" Rensha asked him. It was true, many Humans looked alike; but these women were nearly identical, save for one having blackish hair, not red. And Revan had had blackish hair, in her quest for the Star Forge. The woman next to Canderous Ordo looked exactly like the other.
"With this resolution, it's not certain—" Kavar Vakla interrupted.

"I am certain," Vrook said. "I know my niece. She is loyal, and she is dedicated. The Revan who destroyed the Star Forge allied with the Mandalorians. She has joined Canderous Ordo. The woman with her memories wants to stop the Sith threat, so she has come before the Emperor to try to do so—"

"That Revan appears to have joined the Sith threat," Jiya Sand pointed out. "There is Malak—"

"Or Malak is possessing Dustil Onasi's body." Rensha folded her arms. "I see no proof of anything besides complicity. I see nothing but a Sith threat… and yet, we have our forces here." She lifted her lips, exposing sharp teeth in a predator's grin that these pacifists would never understand. "We have our forces here to help Jedi. Jedi need to help us."

"After Arkan is dealt with we will," Kavar Vakla said.

"You have our assurance," Vrook Lamar added.

"We have captured this one." She gestured with a claw to the Revan in the flight suit. "And the other one is on Dromund Kaas. Are they working together?"

Vrook seemed to hesitate. "I… I do not know."

"You will need more than one neural disruptor," Kavar Vakla interjected. "Revan's strength is formidable. She would be hard to restrain—"

General Sand coughed. "Some of us have experience with that, Vakla."

"Of course." The Jedi Master frowned. "But that was Revan injured and near-dead. This woman would be even more—"

"Commander Cody's report said that she and the Mandalorians are cooperating. For now."

"What are you doing with them?" Vrook again. It was admirable he cared for his brother's nestling, but strange to see so much emotion on a man Rensha had once thought as clever and dispassionate as General Starfire herself.

"Bringing them here." Rensha folded her arms. "If she continues to cooperate, Revan Starfire and her men may join you on Katarr's surface. Then, once the threat of Arkan is eliminated, she will assist with our assault into Sith territory."

There was an art in lying to Jedi, and that art was to believe the lie with all of your heart and gill-sacs, in the moment of its utterance.

It was an art that High Admiral Rensha had learned long ago.

Xxx

"Mekel…."

They didn't bother with sparring practice now. After the first time, each time was like a race to the finish. A race to see who finished first and then a repeat.
How had Mekel once thought Lydie Korr was shy?

"Mmmm?" He sat up above her, smiling.

There was nothing shy about the woman in front of him now, lying, wide-legged on her back, with that lazy, satisfied smile on her face.

"That was… nice," Lydie murmured.

His fingers dipped into one of the grooves of skin that ran down her ribs and she giggled.

"Oh? Are you ticklish?" Mekel asked, bending his head to investigate a breast.

"There. A little." Her voice was breathy.

"Everyone is there—a little. Telos was—when I…. Maybe it's my skills."

Her lazy smile faded a little. "Telos," she repeated.

Frack. That was probably rude. Telos didn't like being compared to Lashowe or Shardaan or Damaris or Akai or Zizania in bed either—

"Dustil, I meant… not that I was… I wasn't thinking of him. Then. When we—"

It was kind of nice being with someone who didn't know what you were thinking.

"Telos is Dustil. I knew that. But you and Dustil…." Her frown deepened, and she sat up. "The two of you were…?"

"Yeah, well, he's dead now. Probably dead. So frack it, right?"

"I didn't realize." Her eyes looked dark in the tent. It was dark in her tent. She pushed his head away and brought her knees to her chest, leaning forward. "It was serious?"

"We weren't fracking married," he muttered, pointedly.

"I need to show you something." She got up, still naked, and went to the console desk across the room. The shadows pooled in her indentations, making her a creature of light and dark all at once. Her hair cascaded in loose curls around her face, shadowing her expression when she turned back towards him. "Look," she said simply.

The holo projected on the tent wall showed Revan Starfire standing in front of two men, both Onasis. They were dressed alike, emphasizing their resemblance. Dustil was a little darker, a little taller than his dads; but he had the same grim glare, the same heavy brow and those cheekbones you could cut an eye on. That same hungry, angry look—now glaring at Revan Starfire, dressed in white with black gloves and boots.

Nothing like this had happened when Mekel was on Kaas with them, so it had to be after.

When? When?

He was smiling, suddenly, smiling so hard it hurt. "H-how long ago was this?"
"A week, I think. Maybe a little more."

"He was alive. He could still be alive." Mekel smiled at her, scrambling to his feet. He reached for her, taking Lydie in his arms again. He hugged her. He wanted to kiss her, frack her all over again, but she was looking up at him now with an air of puzzled concern.

"Are you… you're not angry?"

"Why would I be angry? Thank frack, right?" Mekel laughed. He couldn't stop laughing, tension Mekel hadn't realized he was carrying sloughing off like a cheap mark. He kissed Lydie's beautiful horned forehead. "Thank you. Thank you for showing me this."

"You're welcome," she pulled away slightly, still looking puzzled.

Mekel looked past her, back to the holo.

Telos was alive, but he didn't look happy.

Crazily, Mekel weighed the odds of charging off to Kaas to rescue Dustil from a Sith planet with no Force.

Frack it; he's got a better chance of rescuing himself.

"I… I was worried," he admitted, glancing down at Lydie again. "I was really fracking worried." He started to laugh, and kissed her forehead again.

"I thought you'd be angry." Lydie looked confused. "You're not?"

"What's the point?" Mekel laughed. Telos was alive. Wearing a lightsaber. Wearing a matching Sith outfit like his dads. And was that…? Mekel frowned at the screen and waved a hand to turn up the volume, before remembering he couldn't turn up the volume, not with no Force.

"Turn it up a sec?"

Lydie's fingers moved and the volume increased. Mekel felt himself smirk. "Hear that?"

"I only know the basic syntax of Ancient Sith," she admitted.

"They think he's Malak." Mekel wanted to laugh. Fockda, you idiot. You suck at pretending to be Malak.

"You don't think he's Malak?"

"He's not even trying to be like Malak." Mekel waved a hand at the screen. "Frack, I could do a better Malak than that. His arms aren't folded, stance is all wrong…" From the announcer's tone though, the Sith were buying it.

Hook, line, and tractorbeam, like Mission used to say.

She's there too. She'll help them. Help him. She cares for him too—

"Thank you," he said to Lydie Korr.

"I thought you'd be angry. I thought…." Her brows creased around her horns. "I thought you'd be upset."
"Dustil's alive," Mekel felt the smile creeping back on his face. "Why would that make me upset?"

"I just thought…” her voice trailed off. "We have to tell Azen."

"I don't think that's a good idea. He doesn't like me. Some sents are kind of possessive."

"What? No!" Her cheeks flushed. "Tell him about Dustil. About that being Dustil and not Malak. Tell him your… friend is only pretending to be Malak. He thinks… Azen said everyone thinks that is Malak. That Revan and Malak are joining the Sith again. But if that's Dustil, then maybe the rest of it is a ruse too. Maybe… this isn't what it looks like."

"It looks like they're fracked," Mekel pointed out. "Is the Fleet gonna help them? Because Dustil's a horrible liar."

"The Fleet is supposed to help all of us," Lydie Loanin said.

XXX

XXX
"This brig's nicer than those torture cells they had you in on the Leviathan." Canderous's lips twitched with amusement. He sat back on the bench of his cell.

Next to him, his daughter made a disgusted noise in her throat and tugged at her braid. It tumbled down from the coil around her head. In the cell next to her, Kex was staring and looking as if he was trying not to look. He was even blushing.

Mandalorians. If Revan wasn't starving and exhausted after days trapped on that fracking ship, she might have even made a joke and embarrassed the poor kid even more. Still…. It's hair, Kex. Not like she's stripping off her clothes.

Although… the Mandalorians had been stripped of their battle armor, leaving them all in serviceable coveralls. Revan looked down at her own battered garments in disgust. Moll had said they'd been Polla's once, with her voice careful and her eyes too bright. Polla's favorite trousers, and a sleeveless navigator's vest that reminded Revan uncannily of the one she'd worn on Taris. That fracking rakghoul ripped the back of it when I was trying to dodge-

-But that guy saved me. That guy-

She frowned, the memory lost in the sea of chaos and confusion that had been their experience on Taris. "Revan?" Canderous's dry voice dragged her back into orbit. "You look like you're about to fall over."

"Thanks." Revan felt like it too. "You think this cell block's nicer than the Leviathan? So was the fracking Selkath jail." She put her hands on her neck, trying to figure out how to remove the neural disruptor. It didn't feel as all-encompassing as the one they'd gotten on Yavin IV that had almost killed her a century ago; but it wasn't exactly comfortable. "Do we have time for me to nap before we escape?"

"Thought we'd give the kids a chance to rescue us." Canderous shrugged, so mildly, she couldn't even tell if he was joking.

"The kids?" She glanced at the ceiling wondering if the Republic were fools enough not to monitor them. Wouldn't put it past them.

Canderous followed her gaze, as if he understood. "It would give them something to do."

He means the crew of the Aleema? Or Kex and Millifar?

Revan stared across the cell. Millifar had produced a security spike from the depths of her hair and was frowning thoughtfully at the energy field containing them. The controls were on the outside, of course; but there were other ways to disrupt a field.

Have at it, kid.

"Just let me get a few hours rest first." Her stomach clenched, reminding her that she was also starving. "And get some food."

"If the guard comes again, we'll request a portable sonic," Millifar said. "No offense, Third Wife, but I can smell you from here."

There didn't seem to be a good response to that, so Revan sat down on her bunk and closed her eyes.

"Wake me up after you take over the ship," she muttered, rolling so her back was to the wall, and putting her arm over her face to block out the light.

XXX

Korrie was asleep—uneasily. It had only been days since he'd seen his world end, since he'd seen everything he'd known on Coruscant vanish. He had nightmares and they, by unspoken accord, traded off in shifts to comfort him. They were on the ship Revan had thought was taking them to a Corellian moon called Navar. The ship that Dar'Revan had made Seiran fly to Deralia instead; where Dar would betray them, dumping Revan and the children off like last week's refuse, before running back to the Sith as if Tenebrae himself had commanded it.

(Had he? Was Dar so compromised? Was that why she had betrayed Revan in the end?)

Before the betrayal, (if it was one, and what else could it be?), there had been nearly a week of avoiding glances and closed doors, as Revan and Dar tried not to speak in a space too small for five—even if one was an infant.

It was logical, of course, that they avoided each other: she and Dar both wanted time with their son, but never together. They both wanted time training for combat, but never the same time.

On the ship, Revan had thought they walked a saber's edge between them: between what Dar remembered and what Revan did not. Between Malak's death, and Korrie's infancy, between the events that had left Dar reviled, and Revan the Hero of the Star Forge. At the time, Revan convinced herself that they had tasted the same darkness in the end—and perhaps the differences in what they remembered mattered less than one might think.

Later—when she woke from a coma on Deralia—the idea was a cruel joke.

Dar had taken the smallest room on the ship, like some mockery of a Jedi's humility. The gesture had reminded Revan, rather painfully, of Juhani.

Perhaps it was the memory of the Cathar she considered a paragon of the Order that made Revan wonder what had truly happened to transform an even stronger paragon (by all accounts), into the scourge of the galaxy.

The door to Dar's room slid open before Revan could knock, and her own face looked up at her, blank and unsurprised under a coil of elaborate braids.

Mandalorian braids, her mind whispered. Dar'Revan annihilated the Clans, but she still wears their patterns in her hair.
"Yes?" Dar'Revan asked.

"I need to ask you some questions."

A thin red eyebrow arched. Did Dar pluck them? Revan thought her own were less refined. "Ask," the woman said. "I will answer, as I can."

"Malachor V." Her voice felt rusty. "The... planet. Why?"

Dar'Revan turned her head to the ferracrystal viewport, then back, and looked at Revan. The braids took her hours, Korrie had said. She did them and redid them every night, he had said.

Revan wondered why the woman bothered—maybe just to taunt Revan with the image of the smiling woman in the holo Korrie kept by his bed. The woman who no longer existed?

"I could show you." Dar raised an eyebrow and beckoned her closer. She touched something and the ferraglass window went opaque, the blur of stars vanishing, replaced by a veil of black.

"Then I'd have to kill you," Revan joked, although it was a bad one joke, one she regretted instantly.

Green eyes blinked back at her. "Could you?" Dar sounded like she was actually curious. "I thought about killing you, but the galaxy may need your strength."

"You can't kill that emperor of yours without me!" Even then, Dar must have been planning, but Revan had trusted her. Almost.

Dar nodded. "Yes. Is Mal asleep?"

"Yes." Revan nodded back.

"Then I'll go-"

"No. Wait."

Dar blinked, perfectly blank. "I will not be mocked, Fragment. Even by you."

"I wasn't mocking you." Much. "Tell me what happened on Malachor V. You could have just signed the fracking armistice."

"Yes." The word hung between them—they kept agreeing, even when they were diametrically opposed. "I was Mandalore after I defeated Lin. I had the location of the Star Forge. I knew... something of what we sought. I could have fought Tenebrae with beskar and Clan. Basilisks. We could have fought Sith together in sun, sky, and stars."

Was her voice wistful? Sad? Or just flat? Revan couldn't tell.

"But you decided to just kill them and the Republic and drive all your friends insane instead?"

"Not as easily as you make it sound. I felt them all die. I felt the survivors all fall. Malak and... all the others. Friends. Innocents. Enemies alike." Her voice dropped low, almost a whisper. "Do you know Cherchal's law of energy conservation?"

"Is that the one that says, 'blow up a planet to become evil'?"

Dar'Revan made a choked noise. It could have been a laugh. "Closer than you'd expect. All life contains energy, and all energy can be controlled by the Force. The loss of life at Malachor V released a great deal of power—normally, such energies would dissipate back into the ether—return to the Force. But I—"

"You used the deaths of all those sents to drive your friends crazy. I figured that out already."

Was it worth it, Dar? For a moment, Revan was back on the Star Forge, pinned under Malak's superior strength, her blade sparking—useless—as she fumbled for another permacrete detonator.

To stop Malak, I sacrificed friends. I'm no better than she was-

Only a tightness around the other woman's mouth betrayed her annoyance. "I made the surviving Jedi the strongest weapon in the galaxy. Stronger than Tenebrae. Stronger than the Republic. Stronger than the hellspawned Mando'ade."

Revan had more questions, a galaxy full of them, but all the answers, she suspected, would be this fracking insane and incomprehensible. Instead, all she said was, "Show me. Show me what you did." Her mouth felt chalky and too dry. "Show me Malachor."

Dar nodded slowly, still looking away. "You are right. You should know."

She began to sketch charts on the now-black glass. The sensors lit traces where her fingers touched, citing precise notations, orbital calculations, fleet numbers and positions. Her fingers danced across the screen.

It was oddly beautiful, the graph that showed the death of two armies, the forced conversion of a third.

"How... how many died?" I should know these things, Revan told herself, but she had never asked anyone before.

Dar listed a number, down to the digits exact. Her expression was blank, but she seemed to be waiting for a response.

"Oh." There was a long silence. Truthfully, it was a smaller number than Revan had expected. Almost immediately, that thought brought its own wave of guilt. She stared at the diagrams again. Ship names, types, numbers... the Aurebesh blurred and she rubbed her eyes.

"But why... why didn't you just... use the Mandalorians to make the Republic surrender? You could have used both to take on Tenebrae. Or rule the galaxy, or whatever the frack it was you wanted!"

You could have not fallen. Then, I would never exist. All those lives... would I give up my existence now to save them? Revan remembered the datapad of her life, the words she'd written for herself when she'd prepared to do just that. Sacrifice myself. In a heartbeat. Of course. The greater good....

No. Frack the greater good! It doesn't help us now!

"The Clans were compromised." Dar gave a short, bitter laugh. "The Mando'ade were hers. My master thought I was hers too. And she wanted to supplant the Emperor—not end him."

"Who?" Revan had been so lost in her own thoughts that it took a few seconds for Dar's words to sink in. And even then, they didn't make any fracking sense. "She? She, who?"
"Vima Sunrider. Jana Novasun. Arren Kae." Dar'Revan's lips thinned, drawing lines across the smooth planes of her face. Her expression might have been intimidating if Revan hadn't seen it so often in the mirror. "Do you know what else?"

"I'm sure you're about to tell me."

The other woman nodded. "I sometimes think... she must have been responsible for you, Fragment." Her forehead wrinkled in thought, and her head tilted, eyes like green ice. "I'm just not sure what she intended you for.

XXX

Transcript from a Sith Holovid #2 (translated from the Ancient Sith, by Padawan Yuthura Ban, for the House of Racharn, for the Edification of Leeshansintina Arabel Racharn, First of Her Name)

Lady Fenestre: (smiling for the holocams) "In lieu of the traditional sacrifice, Darth Revan has offered herself as tribute in a trial of combat with his Supreme One-ness, in a guise yet to be determined. Darth Revan herself is wearing her own Human skin-

Lord Scourge: (inaudible response)

Lady Fenestre: "What was that, Scourge? Of course, our own Dark Lord of the Sith is female! Those vids suggesting otherwise were proven to be a work of pure fiction."

Darth Vash: (sighs) "And yet, once her joining with our own Light of All Lands is complete, might not the Dark Lord take upon any form of her own choosing?" (Heavy sigh.) "Think upon her good fortune yet-to-come! The gift of being any number of sentients all at once, to be forever young and beautiful! Why, that alone-

Lord Scourge: (inaudible)

Lady Fenestre: (to Lord Scourge) "Vash knows she is beautiful, my lord. Why do you Dark Councilmembers always indulge her?"

Lord Scourge: (inaudible)

XXX

"No spoilers!" Leeshy Racharn told Padawan Ban, curling her legs under her on the chaise and settling her cube of red poppacorn on her knees. "Lees? I bet you anything that Korrie's mother will kick Sith butt."

"What did I tell you about making blanket statements like, 'I'll bet anything?'" Leesa laughed because it was just them two and their Jedi and it was nice that way. She didn't miss Mother or Lees or Sinty or Tina at all. "But, sure! I'll bet you your next week's charitable donation to the Underground Clinic."

"Okay." Her little sister grinned. "Make it two weeks, okay? If I win it gets to go to the thranta rescue on Alderaan, not your dumb medical charity for the poor sents-

Padawan Yuthura Ban coughed suddenly. "Would you like me to pause the holorecording?"

"What's the red guy with the weird neckbeard saying?" Leeshansintina the First of Her Name froze the vid again, centering on the scene: an arena, more Sith announcers, and Revan Starfire herself standing in the middle of the ring with two sabers upraised. "You didn't translate that part."

"I can't hear it clearly in the recording," Yuthura Ban told her. Politely, too. The Twi'lek was a real treasure. "But from the movement of his lips, I think he's sighing. Perhaps with impatience."

"Go on then! Play more of it!"

Yuthura nodded her head. One head-tail was wrapped around her neck. "Of course, Senator." Leeshanstina's newly-hired Advisor-About-Sith-Planets-and-All-Evil-Stuff sighed, perhaps a little impatiently herself.

Leesa had started watching the second the transmission came in from Kaas, but the foreign Sith gibberish gave her a headache, so she'd passed it on to their new hire for translation before calling in Leeshy. Ban hadn't synced it to a voder, so it was just subtitled, but that was a huge improvement over wondering why Revan Starfire and Captain Carth Onasi and Dustil Onasi (who was now Darth Malak, go figure) and that weird red-headed copy of Revan were all walking tamely into an arena (with a Wookiee) like nerfs to slaughter.

"Go on!" Leesa waved a hand at the woman again.

"I just wanted to remind you of my price," Yuthura said slowly. "The fast ship?"

"Sure. But if you'd rather stay on Coruscant, I can totally hook you up with more translation work.-"

"Sadly, I must decline your offer. Again. But the ship… is it ready now?"

"Do I look like a ship merchant? I asked my steward to call the one we use and tell them to give you the one you liked. GG-49 said they had a few for you, no problem." Leesha was trying to be polite because the Twi'lek didn't really seem to understand her place.

"Good." Padawan Ban twitched her finger and the recording began again, drowning out any further conversation.

XXX

The arena looked like it was underground. It was a vast, domed space, rowed with seats on three sides, all filled with sentients who had red glowing eyes.

They were cheering at once, a single note that sounded like a giant orchestra in tune. In the foreground, a red-haired woman stood with two lightsaber hilts in her hand. She was wearing an elaborate white gown that left most of her shoulders and back bare, facing off against an arched doorway, barred by a gate.

Behind her, stood a motley crew of sents that included Captain Carth Onasi, his son, Dustil, some Human that that Jedi guy said was that dead girl, and a Wookiee that had to be Zaalbar from the Star Forge.

The timestamp on the recording dated it back a Coruscanti week.

XXX

Polla glanced over at Carth Onasi, and he gave her a strained smile. At her back, Zaalbar groaned, probably just as freaked out about this fracked-up situation as she was.
There were more red, glowing-eyed sents here than ones who looked normal. Just how many bodies did this Tenny-Bro asshole have? Billions. That was what Revan had said, but they couldn't all be on this planet, or in this room. He had a hundred here. Two hundred? Rows of them. Enough that when Polla closed her eyes, all she saw were red, glowing dots, the after-images of their eyes.

Revan Starfire walked in front of them all, ahead and alone. Her back was perfectly straight, and she was still wearing that white, filmy gown. Was she going to fight in a dress? Maybe the Force made that easy or something, but it looked like it would be fracking awkward.

Polla stared at the woman's bare shoulders, the shaved back of her skull edging up to her topknot. Revan Starfire had freckles on her back, which was a weird thing to notice about a Dark Lord of the Sith.

XXX

"You wondered what I was for, Dar?" The answer seemed so obvious that Revan assumed it was some kind of trap. "They needed me to kill Malak. The Jedi needed me-"

"Oh, I've seen the holo-versions." Dar's expression shifted, the mouth curving back into what looked like it should have been a normal smile. "Malak's death weakened Tenebrae... but it also shattered my forces. All of our strength, the treaties, every concession we had won from the Emperor reverted back with his demise." She grimaced. "I-I assume, in any case. We can't check. Not until Malachor is safe."

"I'm so sorry," Revan drawled. "I didn't mean to ruin all of your plans for galactic domination when they were going so well after your husband tried to kill you-"

"Stop." The other woman's voice was steady, but her flesh hand was white-knuckled, gripping her artificial wrist like it was a saber. "Don't." Her lip seemed to tremble. If it was an act, she was one hell of an actress. "You and I... we need to be one purpose."

"Then stop fracking with me, and just tell me what you know!"

Dar'Revan blinked. "I don't know where to begin."

"Anywhere." At the time, Revan had thought that moment would be the real beginning of their real accord. She had exhaled, trying to let all the tension and anger she felt for the woman drain away. "Why is your hair in braids?"

Dar looked startled. "I-I like them."

"That's it? You're using Mandalorian clan patterns, I thought-"

"I thought they were pretty. And practical. To fit under a helmet."

"Oh."

Revan sat down slowly against the closed door. She folded her legs and straightened her back, never taking her eyes off her duplicate's face. The braids suited it.

Maybe I should grow my hair, she thought. Comfortingly pedestrian as a sentiment. It implied a future.

Dar' had lapsed into silence. She sat down too, staring steadily back at Revan. "Malachor has our eyes," she noted. "The shape of them. I... never noticed before."
"He has Malak's mouth. I think." Too late she wondered if that was an awkward topic. "Malachi had pictures-from when he was the same age."

"Yes. I-I thought so too." Now Dar's smile was slight, almost shy. A little sad.

Revan shifted her legs. "You mentioned... Vima Sunrider...? Or Arren Kae? Whoever?" She thought Arren Kae might have been one of the masters who had greeted her on Coruscant; but she couldn't remember the woman's face at all.

"Yes. My old master had many names and many schemes. She sent me to Kashyyyk. She knew... somehow, she knew the Rakatan machine there would respond to me. But it taught me lessons she never dreamed of-beyond anything her mind was capable of-"

"Like how to be evil? I spoke to it too."

"You did more than speak to it. You downloaded its core memories into an astromech with a teenaged Twi'lek's personality." Dar frowned. "You have no idea what you unleashed upon the galaxy. I kept its links one-way for a reason."

"Oh? Well maybe you should have mentioned that when you were recording all those fracking secret messages-who were they for, again?"

"Malachor." Dar made an exasperated noise in her throat. "My son. Obviously. I had hoped to give him a universe of peace; where the Republic and Sith Empires were united without Tenebrae-"

"You know you sound nuts? You sound like an insane fracking Sith ranting about how all the power in the galaxy will soon be under your command."

"Do I?" The eyes were half-lidded, deceptively lazy. "A part of you knows power too, Fragment. Tell me how it was when you killed Malak. His was not the only corpse you made that day."

She's testing you. She wants to see if you'll crack. Somehow, Revan just knew that-although for a second, the voice in her head almost sounded like Bastila's. "Would you like me to draw you a diagram of our fight?" she asked coolly, nodding at the screen that still held Dar's notes on the destruction of Malachor V.

"Unnecessary." The other woman folded her arms. "Would you like me to tell you about the Sith Emperor?"

"Is he as big an asshole as you?" Revan rubbed her temples. "No. Keep talking about Vima Sunrider. You said she was our master?"

"She tried to be much more than that. Always a thousand plans. Vima once told me never think of one way to accomplish your goal: think of five, and put them all in motion. Account for everything, but expect nothing."

"And she was Arren Kae too."

"Yes." Dar shrugged. "She had several names, several identities. The Mandalorians knew her as Jana Novasun. And on Balmorra-"

"And you knew all of that and never wondered why?"

XXX
They'd been led-more like herded-down ramps and passageways to a large, underground arena. Only one exit. Stone benches rose around a central pit, covered with sand. The air was stinking and still.

"She's got this." Carth sounded like he was trying to be reassuring, but the way his jaw twitched, and his hand rested on the blaster at his hip, spoke otherwise.

Such a fricking joke-they were all armed. If this had been a vid, or one of those holonovels Polla had liked to read as a tweener, they'd just fight their way out, and then someone (like Seiran, where was he?) would swoop down flying that sweet Ebon Hawk and whisk them away to safety. Then, the good guys would arrive and blow up this entire stinking planet.

It was a nice dream, but Polla hadn't seen the good guys doing so well so far.

The red-eyed sents were most decidedly not the good guys. There were a hundred of them (or two hundred), and five good guys: if Revan Starfire was a good guy. If Dustil Onasi was a good guy. Polla was sure about herself, Carth Onasi and Zaalbar; but what the frack could she and Carth and the Wookiee do against a hundred? Two hundred?

On the first row of seats opposite the entrance sat another row of sents, more elaborately armored and dressed than the army of red-eyes. They looked like actual non-possessed people: all red-skinned Sith with a few Humans. Some were masked. One was mottled and tattooed with dark lines, just like the Sith had been in the Official Coruscanti Version.

Three of those sents-two Human women and a red-skinned man-were talking to a hovering holocam, like this was some kind of a swoop race.

If only! Polla could win a swoop race. Probably. But a sweet Aratech against a hundred Sith or more?

Without a word, Inse and Mydia Blais pushed past them, the two girls taking vacant seats along the front row. Phylus Blais, looking lost and a little confused, went and sat next to them.

I don't even know where Seiran is! Polla's eyes went to the Blais kids. Shit was scary, when your protectors were the barely-of-age sents torturing their slaves for fun. No help there from that sector....

"Where is my armor?" Revan demanded more than she asked. She'd turned so they could see part of her face, chin tilted as she stared up at the rows of sents, all but ignoring the two Zabrak kids the Emperor had used to get them down here.

"Do you think you'll need it?" A dark chuckle issued from multiple throats in the audience-maybe ten.

"The gown is restrictive."

"Does that matter, for ones like us?"

Revan's mouth tightened, but she didn't respond.

Polla glanced over at Dustil Onasi, who was glaring at the sents in the stands, his eyes narrowed. His father was staring at him. Zaalbar whined something, standing right behind Polla. The two Zabrak kids turned abruptly and flanked Revan.

All the red-eyed lights of eyes suddenly went out.
Click and whirring sounds announced the arrival of several hovercams, shining their spotlights down on Revan. Illuminated, she looked like one of her vids.

But real. This is real.

"Shall I leave your companions upon the sands?" asked an echoing, single voice, coming out of a door in the wall of the arena. A door made of bars set close together and arched—at least four meters high. Bars… to keep something in?

The voice was young and female, but Polla was beginning to realize that meant banthashit. Tenny-Bro had a tone in his voice no matter what mouth it came from. Polla was getting pretty good at hearing it.

"Their lives whether or not I win was the bargain," Revan said. "They should be seated in the stands."

"Killjoy," the young voice sighed. "Very well."

Like flipping a switch, several sents in the second row stood up, filing out of the stands, and then walked past them out of the exit.

XXX

The hyperspace engines thrummed easily beneath, ticking safe and secure. The woman sitting across from Revan had undone one of the braids in her hair, was twisting the strands through her fingers, staring into space as if her mind was a million jump-points away.

"Kae," Revan reminded Dar. "You knew she had more aliases than a spice runner and you never wondered why?"

Dar'Revan frowned. "I had theories." She dropped the braid. "Several events raised suspicion. She took the name Arren Kae when she took the Jedi redemption—or supposedly took the Jedi redemption. Years later, she told me that her own personality transfer was a ruse… although she had collected fragments of personalities from several ancient holocrorns to absorb their knowledge…." Her voice trailed off. "Perhaps that might account for some of her delusional thinking."

"For a delusional thinker, she managed to snow you and the Jedi!"

"Snow?" Those green eyes widened and blinked. The mouth curved up slightly.

"Pull the eridu over your eyes. Fool-uh…." Revan recognized the smile on the other woman's face a beat too late. "You fracking well know what I mean!"

"Sometimes you remind me of Beya. The way you talk." Dar ducked her head, pulling her knees to her chest.

"She's m—she's Polla's cousin. I remember her a little." We were talking about Kae. But it was Beya's face in Revan's mind suddenly. Pale, heart-shaped face in the reflection of a mirror. Beya's face with clotted, yellow eyes—

When was that?

"She was my best friend, after Malak." Dar seemed to hesitate. "And… she was friends with Sheris as well."
"I think I saw Beya cut her arm off. Your arm. I mean."

Manaan. The woman with her face. The surge of anger was still there, but lessened now, tempered with pity. I should have done more for the Selkath Ten, but I barely even knew they existed, and then they were dead, before I had any real power-

"Beya did this?" Dar sounded like she hadn't known. "That scar on your left arm."

"You told me already."

The woman continued anyway. "A duel with Lord Blais. He lost. Their allegiance is uneasy, but…." She frowned. "I need them. We need them."

"For what? Your Sith army?" Never gonna happen.

"We will discuss that later." Dar looked like she wanted to leave, but it was her room.

Revan smiled, and put her back to the door.

XXX

When Revan woke up on the Harbinger again, Canderous and the kids were gone, replaced by a helmetless Republic trooper with a square jaw and a jumpy look on his face.

She sat up slowly, noting the absence of the energy fields, the distance between her and the trooper, the blaster at his belt-and the neural band still wrapped around her neck, the restraints holding her wrists.

From somewhere, not far away, she also heard explosions, running feet, and what sounded like a firefight.

"Admiral… uh, Onasi? Revan? Don't move!" the jumpy guard said, even though she was still moving. "They said to let you sleep, but to comm if you woke up. I'm gonna comm them now, just… just stay still okay?"

Revan wiggled her hands, working out the stiffness. She'd fallen asleep on them. The restraints encased her fingers, her wrists, all the way up to the elbow.

Meant for Jedi. A part of her mind whispered. You've seen them before, used them before. On Jedi.

"You're going to comm… who?" You called me 'Admiral.'

The title set off a roil of panic in her gut. Dar'Revan might have been an admiral once for about five seconds before she went nuts and tried to rule the galaxy, but that-that had been to stop the Mandalorians and Tenebrae and Revan didn't have any fracking idea-

"I'll comm General Ordo, of course." The ensign kid said it so matter-of-factly that Revan felt her skin prickle with something like fear.

Or anticipation.

Canderous? I was fracking joking when I said take over the ship!

The nervous ensign continued, words tripping over themselves in his eagerness to tell her everything. "W-we've secured most of the ship, but Commander Cody and the hold-outs have barricaded themselves on the bridge. General Ordo said to comm when you woke up-"
"You're working with… uh, you're with us?"

"Some of us… we remember." The kid didn't look old enough to remember, but then Revan noticed the trace of a fragburn scar on his face—the set of his expression. She didn't need the Force to feel the loyalty rolling off him like a wave—it was all right there in his face.

He'd die for you. The voice in her head was arctic. It sounded like Dar. You must be worthy of such trust, such sacrifice-

"Why would you…?" She didn't want to distract him, but she had to understand.

"You saved us." Conviction in his voice. "I was assigned to one of the ships at Malachor, but you pulled all the ground troops off. Army, maintenance, most of the flyers too. If it hasn't been for you, my squad would've died there."

If it hadn't been for me, your squad would never have existed. You might be a civilian. You might have never been within a thousand klicks of a battle.

"Take off these restraints. And the Force blocker. Now." Her voice barely sounded like her own.

"Of course, I… the General said to just let you sleep, then maybe explain before I-I… removed them. He said you won't hurt me. Y-you won't, will you?"

"No. Of course not." She smiled with a reassurance she didn't feel. The frack, Canderous? I said escape. Not have a coup!

No, you told him to take over the ship. Fracking literal jare'la Mando'ade and their thick skulls-

"It all happened so fast." The kid muttered stepped forward with an electrokey and waved it over her restraints, then over the neural band. The binders dropped to the ground and the microfilaments stung as they retracted along her neck, leaving her free to use her hands to pull the Force-blind device off.

Her senses came back in a rush with the entire ship suddenly opening in her mind: an invisible hyperprint, marked with points of light for the lives of its crew. The absence of any other life closer confirmed what the sound of the engines had already told her. They were in hyperspace.

That limits the terms of our engagement; but if they still control the bridge-

They could have changed course, they could steer us into a sun, they could pull us out in the middle of the Republic Fleet-

A more ominous thought occurred to her. They could seal off the bridge and cut the life support to all decks below. That would be the most logical way of stopping us-unless… they still want us alive? Or, maybe killing off their own troops gets a bad rap these days, after I-after I did it. That's what I did. I-

"Admiral-?"

"Please don't call me that." Alarms blared, reminding her eerily and abruptly of another ship, another man shaking her awake, face strangely familiar, yellow eyes, but his features blurred until they were those of this young soldier, only the skin color similar-

Who was that? When was that?
"Why? Why did you… isn't this treason?"

"I think that depends on if we win," the kid said. "We… a lot of us… we remember how you stopped it."

"You know I don't remember." She stretched her arms, wriggling her fingers until the circulation returned. "Flashes sometimes, but I… I was told about Malachor. I know what I… did there, but I-"

"You pulled my squad out," he said. "That's all I care about."

_If she did, Dar had a reason. She did nothing for free._

XXX

One side of Dar's head was a mass of loose, red curls now; the other side still braided. Strange, to feel jealous of yourself, but Dar's hair was beautiful. Revan didn't remember ever thinking that about her own.

She pushed back her cropped bangs, suddenly self-conscious. "Beya Organa died," Revan snapped, trying to rattle Miss Fluffy Hair.

"Malachi had her killed. Her, Vikor, Wu-and the others. Yes." Dar met her eyes, one of hers half-hiding behind a swoop of red silk. "I killed him, Fragment. He was dying anyway, but I put a pillow over his face."

"Good." A part of her meant it, but another part just saw Korrie, smiling at his grandfather. The old man had ruined their lives, according to every record she'd seen, every piece of the past she had restored-and yet-

He thought he was right. He thought he was acting for the Republic. He was manipulated too. Or he let himself be.

Maybe it's when you think you're acting for the greater good you need to panic.

"Was it?" Her double gave Revan a sad smile, and reached for another braid, untangling it with her fingers. Her head dropped towards the ground, features masked by all that hair. "Was it good? He suffered in those last few moments."

"Good," Revan repeated, but suddenly she realized they were both avoiding the other's eyes.

"Back to Kae…." Revan took a deep breath. I left her to be tortured by Davad and Oerin. I can hardly get pissed at Dar for killing a dying man. "Or Vima, or whatever. Tell me the rest."

