“Bu’ wha’ is it, then?” Vi asked. “Read it out loud, our Ori.”

To: Mistresses Vi and Margr, Dale

From: Misses Petal and Daisy Berrybuckle, West Farthing, Shire

Dear Ma’ams,

We just received the Coronation issue of Vug Magazine from traders as come through, and we are all in a rage to tell you how excited we are at your Amazing Fashions!!! We have been just squealing and agog!!! Such Colors and Patterns!!!

We are now eagerly saving our coin to buy Dwarven material to make similar frocks for Enclosed, please find drawings we have done to show how such would look on hobbitish figures. We realized you are Terribly Busy with the Bearer and their Majesties, but if you find a moment, if you would please write back to tell us what you think and offer further suggestions as to different Colors, Additions or Subtractions

We Are Sincerely Yours,

Petal and Daisy Berrybuckle

PS. We think you are Fabulous!!!

PPS We are sincere and not making fun, as we are not Mean.

The sisters sat, stunned, for a moment, then fell all over each other, screaming with laughter.

Ori turned to the next page and there were, indeed, drawings of young hobbit lasses wearing Vi and Margr’s vicious blueberry costumes and all the others that had appeared in that issue of Vug.

“They must have gotten a special edition somehow,” said Ori. “There were some that were hand-colored, but they cost so much more than the regular edition.”

Vi, wiping the tears out of her eyes, but still chuckling, said, “By th’ time it go’ t’ th’ Shire, it was likely righ’ pawed over. They couldn’t ask all tha’ much, surely.”

Ori handed her the drawings.

“They’re actually well-done. They must have worked very hard on them.”

“Ooo, Vi, would yeh jus’ look a’ tha’,” said Margr. “Th’ cunnin’ wee thin’s!”

“Clever lasses,” said Vi. “They took our beard ornaments an’ turned ‘em int’ necklaces an’ such.”

“Do you want to reply to the letter?” Ori asked.

They looked at him, stunned.

“Reply?” Vi echoed. “We never wrote a letter before, or had one writ f’r us. Wha’ would we even say?”

“Probably what you just said. Thank them for writing, tell them that they’re talented artists, and compliment their cleverness with the necklaces.”

Margr turned to Vi.

“He makes it sound so easy.”
“It’s his job,” Vi replied.

“We can do it right now, if you’d like,” he offered. “I’ll ask Quartz if he’ll take it.”

“F’r serious?” Margr asked. “Wha’d’yeh thin’, our Vi?”

“Surely we’ve the coin f’r it,” said Vi. “Why no?’”

Ori smiled and shook his head.

“I’m not charging family members just for writing them a letter. We’ve practically already written it.”

“Yer a guid dwarf, our Ori,” said Margr, solemnly.

“Aye, yer sweet as… as truffles!” Vi avowed.

“Thank you,” said Ori, ducking his head. “I’m going to get some paper and ink.”

“Wha’ colors’ve ink yeh go’?” Margr asked.

Ori did a double take, then grinned.

“How about a nice bright purple?”

“Ooooono!” the sisters chorused.

While he wrote, Vi and Margr watched in fascination.

“Look how them letters jus’ come ou’ a’ his pen, our Vi. It’s li’e majick.”

“We should ge’ aroun’ t’ learnin’ one a’ these days,” Vi agreed. “Readin’ an’ writin’. Bein’ retired, an all, we’ve th’ time t’ learn. Then we don’ have t’ wait f’r our Milgr t’ read us our Shire’s.”

“And you can read and answer your mail,” Ori encouraged.

They stared at him.

“Surely, we won’ ge’ another letter,” said Vi.

“You might. I promise, if you do, I’ll read them for you until you can read your own. But, I can’t promise I won’t blush if you get marriage proposals.”

“We wouldn’t mind those,” said Margr. “Lo’ less noisy than idiots yowlin’ love songs from th’ street. Be’er f’r th’ furniture, too.”

Ori had just finished and they were squeezing the pot when the front door burst open then the sitting room door, and Dori exploded on them, overfilled cloth sack in one hand, and Rogi by the ear with the other. Dwalin moseyed in after them, obviously amused. Dori wore a severely cut purple pinstriped robe, looking very unfeminine and extremely angry.

“Margr! Vi!” Dori cried. “Good, you’re here! Look what I found in the market!”

He upended the sack on the table, loosing a landslide of shoddily-made knickers painted with a vaguely-familiar face.

Margr facepalmed.
“Rogi! What’ve yeh done?”

Vi shook her head.

“Should’ve let him in th’ coal scuttle a’ th’ pub as a pebble.”

Bilbo and Thorin, who had been lurking in the relative safety of the office, came out to see what was to-do.

“Dori?” Bilbo ventured. “Are you alright?”

“No, Professor Baggins, I am not! Look at this! Look what I found this little rock rat making and selling in the market!”

They looked. Then they looked again, aghast.

Thorin prodded the pile of underpinnings with the ornamental fireplace poker, obviously speechless.

Bilbo, however, was not.

“They’re not even well-done,” he judged.

“I’m ’n artist!” Rogi protested. “Ow! Dori! Leggo!”

Bilbo remained unimpressed.

“A cock-up artist, perhaps. Which, considering your product-“

“Professor Baggins!” Dori cried. “Please! I venture to say you’d not be making jokes if it was your face painted on these abominations!”

“What makes you think it hasn’t been?” Bilbo asked.

Dori opened his mouth, then apparently thought better of it. Instead he bellowed, “Nori!”

“Don’t look at me, our Dori,” said Nori’s voice from the kitchen. “You wouldn’t catch me workin’ a trick like this twice.”

Dori turned to Dwalin.

“Our deary! Isn’t there some reason in all this to throw Rogi in the lockup?”

Dwalin surveyed the pile.

“Bein’ a bad artist ain’t a punishable crime.”

“My face is on these knickers! It’s- it’s vandalism! And… and….”

“Slander?” Ori suggested.

“Yes! It’s base slander! Thorin! You must have the authority to order punishment!”

“If it’s supposed to fit the crime,” said Thorin, “what are my alternatives? Make him take painting lessons?”

“Let go o’ me ear!” Rogi whined. “Yer majesty, ’e’s had a gripper on it the whole way from the market! I can’t feel it no more!”

Thorin stabbed him with a cold look.

“I’d keep quiet if I were you. You’re lucky he brought you here instead of dropping you into a bottomless mine pit.”

Rogi mewed piteously.

Thorin appeared to mull over his options, then came to a conclusion.

“Our please take this down.

_I hereby proclaim that, for the length of his lifetime, Master Rogi Margrul is banned from possessing articles of dam’s underpinnings, either owning, selling or wearing them, and that all dwarrow, dwarrowdams, women or men living within the dwarven realms of Arda are forbidden from selling such articles to him, or to any of his family, friends or business associates. Anyone caught doing so will be fined no less than three thousand gold, or forfeit their beard for life._”

“Got it,” said Ori, finishing with a swirl of ink, leaving space for Thorin’s signature and rapidly adding the time, date, and place.

“Please give it to Balin to close up any loopholes I may have opened with the verbiage. I’ll sign it and we’ll have it distributed. Will that do, Dori?”

Dori was not appeased.

“What’s to stop him from simply buying underpinnings in Dale, or some other realm of men?”

“I can’t enforce an Arda-wide ban on knicker distribution,” said Thorin, then paused and raised his brows thoughtfully. “Now there’s something I never thought I’d say. Dori, I’ll write to the crowned heads of Arda, not currently present, asking them to make the same proclamation as a courtesy to me.”

“Ra shandabi!” said Dori. _And agreed._ “But what do we do with this weasel in the meantime?”

“Turn him over to his mam.”

“No!” Rogi shouted.

“Tol’ yeh wha’d happen, didn’t I,” said Dwalin unconcernedly.

“I’ll scrub th’ royal privy! I’ll stand a’ th’ night market nekked with me knickers on me head!”

Nori jeered, “It’s a punishment, not somefin’ you’d do anyways for a larf!”

Bilbo stared stonily at Rogi. “What makes you think that Thorin has only one privy?”

“King Thorin!” Rogi appealed.

“I have spoken,” Thorin pronounced ponderously.
Margr took Rogi by his other ear. Luckily, Dori let go on his side before the angry dam dragged her ne’er-do-well son back out the door, threatening him with every breath.

“Yeh’ll be muckin’ ou’ after our Glorfy’s horse f’r th’ res’ a’ yer miserable life, an’ tha’s if yer lucky!”

Ori was about to excuse himself to return to work, when Mistress Dazla’s little bird shot in as the dams were heading out, and a moment later, Mistress Dazla appeared from the kitchen.

“Beg pardon, your majesties, but King Ulfr is at the gates, come for a visit.”

Thorin and Bilbo looked at her, then each other, completely stunned.

“Great Mahal!” Dori cried. “I have to change! Nori! Clear this rubbish off the table!”

“What do you want me to do wif ‘em?”

“Send them down the chute to the forges,” said Dori. Over his shoulder he threw, “And don’t you dare keep any!”

“I didn’t get word from Ulfr,” said Thorin. “Mistress Dazla, is he coming with an entourage?”

“A very small one, your majesty, a few soldiers and his wife with him, all on ponies. There’s not even a baggage cart. They look like two bandits on the run!”

“I’ll throw on a uniform, an’ go meet ‘em,” said Dwalin, kissing Ori on top of the head.

Ori resigned himself to not working again today.

“I’ll go change, too,” he said.

“You look perfectly fine, Ori,” said Thorin. “I don’t think this is a state visit.”

Bilbo said, “We should send a bat to Arne.”

Ori groaned.

“Poor Arne. He was hoping they wouldn’t be here until after Durin’s Day.”

Not long after this, Dwalin returned and announced the visitors.

Ulfr staggered in, looking like he’d been on a long march, barefoot, through Mordor. His queen, though clearly worried, was not nearly as harried.

“Sorry abou’ this, Thorin, perfesser,” said Ulfr. He bowed and then dumped himself onto the couch, practically deflating with exhaustion. “Thank th’ valar f’r this blessed couch.”

“Something I can get you, Ulfr?” Thorin asked.

“Whiskey. Laced with cyanide.”

Thorin seemed to struggle for a reply, then gave up and turned to the queen.

“Yizaris, how are you?” Thorin asked.

“A bit fatigued, Thorin, but it’s good to see you again, and looking so well.”
She was a gorgeous barrel of a dam, a great beauty built on the lines of Erda, with masses of lucky gold hair, wrapped around the crown of her head in a neat coil of braids for travel and her beard in a plait from her chin.

“This is Professor Bilbo Baggins, my intended. Bilbo, this is Yizaris, queen of the Ironfists.”

“Your majesty.”

“Professor.”

They bowed to one another.

“You must be exhausted, Queen Yizaris,” said Bilbo. “Would you like to be shown to your rooms to freshen up? We’ll have ale and some nice roast pork brought up to you, if you’d like.”

“That sounds divine, professor. I hope you don’t mind, but I don’t think Ulfr will be moving from the couch any time soon.”

Ori wasn’t expecting Thorin to turn to him.

“Yizaris, this is Lord Ori of Fundin. Ori, this is Queen Yizaris, daughter of Yizari.”

He bowed.

“Your majesty. It’s a pleasure.”

She returned his bow.

“Lord Ori, it’s an honor to meet you.”

Ori clenched his jaw to keep it from falling open.

“Thank you, your majesty.”

She went away directly, following Miss Oquizla to the guest rooms.

Ori shook his head.

“Perhaps a disguise. Nori could help me.”

Thorin nudged him with his elbow and grinned, then went to sit beside Ulfr.

Bilbo said quietly to Ori, “If you want to go back to work until dinner, I’m sure everyone would understand.”

“I feel like I need to be here when Arne arrives.”

Bilbo blew out a breath.

“Yavanna preserve us all. That’s going to be interesting.”

“So, Ulfr,” said Thorin, “running away from home?”

“Aye.”

“Seriously? I was joking.”
“I ain’t.”

“Still upset that your family came back as elves?”

“Pissed off tha’ they came back at all! Natterin’ a’ me day an’ nigh’, fuckin’ Da thinks he’s still king, me brother an’ his husband’ve turned the royal residence int’ non-stop debauch’ry. Mam’s still tellin’ me I made a lousy marriage an’ it’ll never last.”

“You’ve been married to Yizaris for a hundred and twenty years.”

“The lot’ve ‘em ‘r drivin’ me int’ th’ bleedin’ stone.”

“So you came to Erebor?”

“I needed a break, b’fore I did somethin’ I regretted.”

“For the peace and quiet?”

“Aye.”

“Oh how nice,” Dori cried, floating in, resplendent in filmy pink silk and taffeta roses. “You and dear Yizaris can accompany us to the Gamgees for a lovely little party. Oh!” Dori turned at the sound of Mistress Dazla scolding, “Thorin dear, please get your doggies out of the kitchen!”

“Butter! Sugar!” Thorin turned toward the door. “I think their food bowls are empty.”

The wargs skittered out, looking quite mischievous as Mistress Dazla swatted them with a broom. Butter clenched a large section of pork in her jaws. Sugar tried to pry it away and the pair of them went down, snarling and growling, and still unwilling to let go of the prize, they rolled right past the couch, past Ulfr, on toward the door.

“Fuck me,” said Ulfr. “Figures.”

Thorin chuckled and went over to the tussling wargs.

“My damlings,” he said, gently. The tussling stopped immediately as both turned, panting and tails wagging.

“Give that to me,” he ordered. Butter rolled over and Sugar promptly deposited the spit-covered meat into his waiting hand. He looked at it, then both of the wargs, and using his boot knife, sliced it in half. He chucked the pieces back and they were immediately devoured.

“I’m filling their bowls,” Bilbo called from the breakfast parlor.

“Thank you, my love,” Thorin called back and, wiping his hands on his breeches, went back and seated himself near Ulfr.

“You were saying?”

“I can’ remember. Where did yeh ge’ those?”

“Ori brought them back from a raid.”

Ulfr glanced at Ori.

“Who were yeh raidin’, lad? An’ did yeh leave anythin’ f’r th’ rest a’ yer party?”
Before Ori could protest, Killer shot through from the kitchen, chasing Nori-pori and Mask, around the sofa, over the chair, taking a lap around the coffee table. The cats went scampering away, but Killer got distracted by this new dwarf, barked excitedly, jumped up on the couch and started licking Ulfr’s face ecstatically.

Dori shouted ineffectually, “No! Bad! Down!”

From under the couch, Nori said, “Ha! Didn’t work on me, neither.”

“Killer!” Ori cried. “Get off King Ulfr! You weren’t invited!”

At that moment the door to the receiving room swung open and Arne walked in.

"Da? Everything alright?" he asked gingerly.

"No, it is no’!" Ulfr barked. "I'm bein' slobbered on by Morgoth's own mutt. Ge' off, yeh daf' thin'!"

"Killer!" Dwalin commanded.

Killer paused in mid-lick and jumped down on all fours on the couch, clocking Ulfr in the face over and over with his rapidly wagging tail.

"Here," Dwalin called him.

Killer came.

"Sit."

Killer sat.

"Guid boy," Dwalin praised, scratching Killer's ears with both hands.

Killer looked desperate to jump up, prancing his front feet paw to paw, but never quite leaving the ground.

"We need t' work on yer manners," Dwalin admonished him. "Sorry, yer majesty. We're still in trainin' so as no' t' drown visitors with slobber."

Dori handed Ulfr a towel and a flagon of ale.

"I'm sorry," she cooed. "We're fresh out of cyanide. I had to use strychnine."

"If yer tryin' t' make me go with a smile on me face, it won' work, bu' thank yeh anyway."

"Da!" Arne cried.

"Oh, now stop yer fussin', lad," said Ulfr. "There's naught wrong with me tha' abdication won' fix. Tha's a joke, son."

Ori was amazed to see them touch foreheads. He thought Ulfr must be feeling quite caught off guard to do so in public. The Ironfists didn't have the greatest reputation for warmth.

"Is amad here?"

"Upstairs, takin' a nap. She'll be down soon enough. Wha 'r yeh all dressed up f'r?"
"I was at work, in the library."

"Oh, aye, tha' thin' yer doin' f'r old Brur. Yeh kin go back, now. We're set. No need t' discomfit yer master over us."

Arne didn't look like he knew where to turn. He had been so obviously dismissed.

Thorin looked over at Ori, then cut his eyes at Arne.

Ori said, "Arne, have you had lunch, yet? I was going to the kitchen for a snack and then, I have some quest notes I wanted your opinion on."

"Of course, Ori," said Arne. "I could use some of that nice egg bread Binni makes. Do we have any?"

"I think so," said Ori.

He waited until Arne had approached, then turned to Thorin, who anticipated him.

"I'll send a bat to Brur," Thorin promised.

"You know, Ori," said Bilbo, "I believe I'll join you, unless three is, indeed, a crowd."

Arne smiled.

"Please. If it's alright with Ori."

They went into the kitchen, where Ori arranged a snack for the breakfast parlor, dodging the servants and their early preparations for dinner.

The three of them sat and Arne let his forehead thud to the tabletop.

Bilbo winced and Ori sighed.

"Sorry, Arne."

"I-It's all right, Ori," Arne replied to the table. "It's j-just bl-bleeding fabulous."
The next morning after breakfast, people were moving about getting themselves prepared for the evening party at the Gamgees. Dori had said she’d been told it was just a gathering of a few friends. Bilbo had smiled and said that among hobbits that could mean any number between five and fifty guests. Dori had frowned then,

“Now, Bilbo, what does one gift a hobbit for a housewarming?”

Bilbo looked at Dori, puzzled.

“Nothing. You get presents.”

“Ooo whadawes get?” Nori asked. “I know. I know. 'Shut up, Nori’.”

Bilbo continued, “It isn’t much. Usually just mathoms.”

“What’s a mathom?” Dori asked. “How much does it eat?”

“A mathom is an ornament or little gift, pretty and generally useless. You can display it on your mantel when the giver visits. If you want to bring some wine or some cookies, that’s always appreciated.”

“What? No lichen whiskey?” Dori asked archly.

Nori’s voice came from the wall, “Tastes like dirt!”

Dori huffed and flounced off to the kitchen.

Ori gathered his scriveners satchel. He knew the party was of a casual nature and before they went the entire lot of them were traveling out to Windy Poplars farm to see the aurochs and then the Guernsias’ to visit the raphcuctus birds. It was quite something of a royal outing and the entire mountain and Dale were buzzing with gossip about the sights to be seen.

Master Hallow looked a little flustered as the royal entourage arrived. Ori reflected that they had made quite the stir. Thorin and Bilbo leading the way, mounted in Minty and Vespa. Butter and Sugar padding beside them, resplendent with Durin blue dyed leather collars about their necks held with a mithril royal insignia. Between them rode Bard and Thranduil, Bard on a horse and Thranduil on his elk.

Dwalin and Ori followed, with Killer bouncing between them. Killer sported a Fundin green dyed leather collar with the family insignia of brass on it. Dwalin was mounted on Gnasher and Ori rode Grinder. Grinder was very patient with Ori. Riding a ram was quite different from riding a pony. The saddle was nearer the shoulders and Grinder’s great horns were rather close. Ori rather thought Grinder was getting a good chuckle at his expense.

Glorfindel, Eowyn, and Boromir on horseback trotted along side as honor guard, followed by the Honored Bearer, Lord Balin, Crown Prince Fili and his betrothed, the Crown Princess of Dale, the Lord of Muffins and his loyal companion, Wee Sam, in the teacup that was festooned in gay colors, with Aragorn and Arwen on their horses on either side. A small cadre of soldiers brought up the rear.

There was a crowd waiting there and burst into cheers as they swept up before the farm. They all alit and Bard strode forward to greet Master Hallow. Master Hallow bowed over Thranduil’s hand, much to the elf’s amusement. Bard then presented Thorin and Bilbo to the all Hallows.

Master Hallow and Mistress Hallow were beyond delighted to meet the Dwarf King again. Ori watched as Thorin and Thranduil appeared to thoroughly enjoy meeting the entire family and all the hands available. The youngest girl was dressed very prettily and she handed a bouquet of flowers each to Dori, Arwen, Eowyn, Sigrid, Thranduil and Bilbo. Dori was delighted, Arwen and Eowyn gracious, Sigrid a little embarrassed, and Thranduil charmed. Bilbo was a hit with the farmer and his laborers.

Eventually, Hallow was all but bursting with pride as he led them over to a scrupulously tidy fenced barnyard. There was the auroch bull. He was beautifully tended. His coat was brushed and he looked very well fed. A few of the Dale cows stood nearby the far fences, receiving pets and love from the crowd which had moved forward to hang over the fence.

Hallow crooned at the bull, which came forward and hung its great head over the fence to sniff at the royal guests. To the delight of the crowd, Dori patted the bull’s head. The bull appreciated Dori cooing and scratching him behind the ears.

Hallow went through the barnyard gate and separated out two Dale cows and brought them over. Both were seen to be pregnant. Hallow announced they had been served by the auroch bull, and the aurochs cow, which he pointed out to them in a meadow, had been served by one of his own Dale bulls.

“They look very healthy and this bull looks remarkably pleased with himself,” Thorin observed politely, but loud enough to be heard by the crowd, who chuckled and clapped at the royal humor.

“They should be calving not long before Yule, yer majesty,” Hallow beamed.

Dori bustled into the yard to pat the cows. She gushed and blessed them while the bull snacked on her flowers.

The royal party inspected the barns and all the out buildings. Hallow’s gaggle of large gray geese followed them and passed comment occasionally. One of the barns was devoted to Master Hallow’s pigs. The back was open to a meadow where thee pigs could forage and roam. These pigs were unique in that they were a beautiful reddish brown but for a wide belt of white hair that encircled their middles. These were referred to as ‘Poplar’ pigs, well known in Dale for their docility despite their enormous size, amounts of piglets each sow could produce, and the excellent flavor of their meat. Boromir had to go into the fenced area and pat one of the pigs. Sigrid and Fili gamely followed him and scratched all ears that came to them.

Near to this stood a smaller barn that held Hallow’s special goats. These were bred for their size. They were tiny. Master Hallow had bred them for their meat to be for smaller parties where a full grown goat would be too much. The goats were adorable. They were all the colors goats came in. They had a small meadow of their own, this was decorated about with boulders and small objects for the goats to play with. The goats pranced and leapt about on their tiny hooves. They jumped on top of and around of the boulders and ran through and climbed on the various other things in the meadow.

“They’re very active,” Hallow explained. “Very friendly and easy to train, but they’ve got a bit of a tic I haven’t been able to train ‘em out of. Must be somethin’ to do with their size as no goat’s ever behaved like it.”

“A tic?” Bard questioned.

“What do they do?” asked Thorin.

Hallow moved forward and gave a sudden great shout. Every goat froze and fell over on their sides. Feet straight out like little prongs. After a moment they all got back to their feet and went back to whatever they had been doing. Everyone stared.

Hallow shrugged.

Sigrid made a ‘eep’ noise and Fili gasped. Eowyn, Arwen, and Dori stared to giggle then the rest of them dissolved into laughter. At the merriment, Sugar gave a loud bark. All the goats promptly fell over again. Thorin was about to apologize but Hallow scooped one goat up and showed it to them. It was as stiff as a board. A few moment passed and the goat was wiggling to get down.

“Strangest thing,” Hallow said again.

Thranduil looked as though he was going to suggest something but thought better of it.

They went on and Ori enjoyed looking at the sheep with coffee-colored wool and the flock of bright orange chickens which wandered about. He learned a great deal about winter feed, gathering the deep brown eggs these chickens laid, milking animals and how geese made excellent guards.

Butter and Sugar were exceptionally well-mannered around the geese. Killer hid behind Dwalin, his eyes huge.

“Yer twice th’ size a’ one a’ them,” Dwalin teased him.

Ori murmured to Dwalin, “It’s not the size, it’s what you do with it.”

He fluttered his eyelashes for effect. Dwalin gave him a look that made heat flush all through him.

Mistress Hallow invited them into the house where, in her sunny sitting room, they partook of a light luncheon. Master Hallow discussed cheese making with Bard, Thorin, and Wee Sam, while Arwen, Eowyn, Thranduil and Dori were taken off by Mistress Hallow for a tour of the rest of the house, the kitchen, pantry, and the dairy beneath the house.

Two hours later, they were back on the road returning toward Dale, giggling about the tiny goats occasionally. Bard directed them to a road that veered off to the right. This was a pleasant country lane and, at the end of it, was the Guernsias’ farm.

This was a good deal larger than Windy Poplars and all the meadows that were not growing feed were decorated with Dale cows happily grazing in the sunshine. The near perfect barnyard was bracketed with large open pens. Inside wandered many different kinds of chickens and a few other birds Ori wasn’t sure about. He picked out quail and grouse then in a very large pen that included trees, strolled the raphcactus birds.

Ori watched them. They looked out of place here as much as they had in the great throne room of Erebor. They just weren’t bird-ish.

“They are very strange,” Bilbo said at his elbow.

“I wonder which of the valar made them,” Ori replied.

“A bloody drunk one,” Dwalin replied sliding an arm about Ori’s shoulders. Ori and Bilbo chuckled.

“I do think I agree with you, Captain,” Bilbo said coyly.

Eowyn stared.

“You know,” she began slowly, “I honestly thought Theo was teasing me when he described these. Meeting Celeborn’s Kelli was just something you expect of elfin magic…”

Dwalin roared with laughter. She blushed and pushed him.

Guernsia arrived with Thorin and the others.

“They seen vey calm,” Dori observed. “I suppose it’s because they’re bigger than all the other birds.”

“They are,” Hathor agreed, then frowned. “I imagine the reason they are rather rare is that they are extremely bad parents.”

“Bad parents?” Bilbo asked as Ori scribbled.

“Very,” Hathor replied in a tone of disapproval. “There’s a hot box in the barn where we put the eggs. They’ve begun laying about once a week. The eggs are large but the birds don’t bother with nests. One or two of the fawns have to spend every morning hunting up any that might be laid overnight.”

“They prefer shady areas,” Guernsia said. “We’ve had saplings of the trees they usually like and a shipment of the fruit. Fortunately the trees are fast growing.”

“Indeed,” Hathor agreed. “We’ve weeded out a few little saplings near the main ones as they spread quickly. We’ve put those in pots and are keeping these safe against the first ones not surviving the winter.”

“You still have your touch with the trees,” Thranduil stated in a satisfied tone.

“Why, yes, King-Father,” Hathor’s eyes twinkled. “It works on many different plants.”

“I have a lovely vegetable garden and we had to rebuild my second larder into a place just for herbs,” Guernsia slipped her arm through Hathor’s as he grinned down at her. Their children had gathered as well. There were six, three boys and three girls. Ori, getting a better look at them than he had at the coronation, thought they were children of men as all were sturdily built, but their eyes showed the elfin blood and every ear was delicately pointed.
Hathor led the way to one of the barns, inside was a large area that looked as though it used to be about three stalls. In the middle was a stone structure covered by a glassed-in top about four feet high. Ori went over and looked with everyone. The stone structure was hollow. Inside the stone was a complex coiled arrangement of copper pipes. Ori could feel the heat rising from it. He looked at it the glassed in area. The middle, which had a glass cover, was getting the most heat was a pile of torn paper and rags, nestled inside were several large eggs. Everything outside this cover sat open to the air. Among hay and pans of water and grain walked raphcuctus chicks. They were ridiculously cute. They were balls of white fluff dotted all over with pink and blue spots.

“No bleedin’ wonder they’re rare,” Dwalin said, incredulously. “Any predator could spot ’em a mile away!”

“Apparently there aren’t any large predators where they occur naturally.” Guernsia told them. “The woods they like are said to be scant of game and so they flourish there.”

Hathor reach in and scooped up one of the chicks. It didn’t struggle, just looked inquiringly at him. He stroked the fluffy head and, with a smile, handed it over to Dori.

Dori cooed over it and it was passed from hand to hand as everyone wanted to pet it. The chick wasn’t the least bit bother by this and luxuriated in the attention.

“Where does the heat come from?” Thorin asked.

“We used to have a wood furnace here for the chickens, when we had too many,” Guernsia explained. “Once King Bard started on the buildings down in Dale, we requested hot and cold water pipes.” She smiled on Thorin. “Your people are wonderful. We have a constant temperature steam pipe for the hatchery.”

Thorin incline his head, regal but his eyes held a distinct twinkle.

“You and your family are gracious enough to care for my precious raphcuctous birds. Anything that will help, you know you have but to ask.”

The Aldernays giggled and led the party on to tour the rest of the farm, before treating them to a cup of tea with herb scones and pavlova with newly picked strawberries. Frodo and Sam stayed to play with the chicks under the supervision of Hathor’s brother-in-law, Alden.

Ori was intrigued to watch the interactions. Bard, Thorin, Bilbo, and Dori discussed the needs of the farm while Balin made notes. The two eldest children took Boromir, Eowyn, Sigrid and Fili over to where the quail were foraging in the extensive vegetable garden. The quail were as docile as the raphcactus chicks. They made no objection to being lifted up, cuddled and given grain. The eldest son, a mischievous youth named Thorson, teased Fili by teaching Sigrid how to hold the quail up properly, so it would take the grains she held between her lips. Thorson was discomfited as Sigrid immediately went to Fili and teach the trick to him. Thorson’s sister, Aldera snickered at him mercilessly.

The dinner hour was drawing near when Dori called them all to order. The two kings thanked the Aldernays for their hospitality and traveled on to the Gamgees for the party.

The Gamgees garden was everything Ori imagined a hobbit’s garden should be. Late in the summer, heading toward fall, the beds were filled with orange and yellow flowers in every shade.

“Asters and marigolds,” said Bilbo as they approached. “You’ll want to be up very close to draw them, especially the marigolds. The flowers are densely packed with petals.”

A stone fence surrounded the whole of the garden, with a round, wrought-iron gate at the center, depicting leafy vines. Stone pavers, perfectly flush to the ground, led up to a neat stoop with benches on either side of the round door with its center knob. The door picked out a particularly vivid yellow from the flowers, and the earthen wall grew back seamlessly into the hillside. Round windows bracketing the door reflected the late afternoon sun.

They could already hear music and laughter from the back garden, even if they couldn’t see it over the hill.

“Are stone fences usual?” Ori asked Bilbo.

“No, but there are a lot of stones here and not so many trees.”

Ori already knew how he would start the record of this evening’s events.

“In a hole in the ground lived a family of hobbits,” he mused.

Bilbo chuckled.

“I can’t think of a better way to put it myself.”

“Thank you, Professor Baggins.”

“Not at all, Lord Ori.”

They glanced at each other and giggled.

“Here we are! Here we are!” Bell called, opening the door. “Welcome!”

She wore a party dress in the hobbitish style, a soft pink scattered over with dark blue flowers and festooned with bows, her hair loose from its workday bun and rippling down her back. Lavender stood behind her in what looked to be an adapted dwarvish tunic of lemony yellow, the long sleeves removed in favor of puffed caps and the straight hem replaced with billowing ruffles.

“Mister Thorin!” Bell cried. “How good to see you! May Hamson take your mounts back to the pasture or will they eat him?”

Thorin dismounted and approached with a bow.

“Thank you for having us, Mistress Bell. If Hamson would be so good as to help with the ponies, Fili and Kili will take care of the rams. Less chance of hobbits being snacked upon that way.”

Ulfr and Yizaris arrived at that moment, riding up with Gridr and Gloin, Elrond, Lindir and the twins. Celeborn and Galadriel followed, but they lagged behind, very obviously chatting and looking into each other’s eyes as their horses bore them forth.

Thorin gestured to the visiting Ironfists.

"Of course! Good o’ ye to come and visit, King Ulfr. Not to worry. There’s carrot cake in the offing."

Ulfr grinned.
"Yeh know jus' wha' t' say, Mistress Gamgee."

"An' Queen Yizaris, come on in. Let us get ye a cold drink an' such."

"Thank you, Mistress Gamgee," said the queen. "My husband had mentioned the fine hospitality of hobbits."

"Oh, how you do go on! Such a becomin' color, that dress. Matches the face tattoos somethin' lovely."

Ulfr and Yizaris had been to see Master Mahrdin with Balin’s recommendation, having brought no finery with them from home. Clothing sold ‘ready to wear’ may have been beneath some nobles, but Ironfists were only concerned with looking tidy. Yizaris wore a pale lilac gown with a geometric trim. Ulfr wore a reddish-brown tunic and leggings with a black belt and boots. He had washed and rebraided his hair. Without travel dust, it was the same color as Yizaris’ gown.

While the party stood chatting, the wargs were already nosing about the flowers. Butter actually went as far as to open her mouth over one before Thorin cleared his throat and Butter desisted, obviously annoyed. She sighed.

“I know, I know,” said Thorin, scratching her behind the ear. “It’s a difficult thing to be a beast.”

The house ran in a straight passage from front to back, with rooms on either side. The tall ceilings were a left-over from the men who built it, and the woodwork followed the same patterns as that of Bag End East, with wainscoting and ceiling beams. However, the open doorways and central passage showed a distinctly dwarfish angularity. The rooms at the front, the parlor, dining room and kitchen, were interconnected on the left. A large, informal living room rambled open to the same length, on the right.

“Bell! Windows on both sides!” Bilbo enthused. “That’s splendid.”

“Isn’t it just, Mister Bilbo? I never seen the like in Hobbiton.”

“Here you go, Mistress Gamgee,” said Dori, presenting her with a nice bottle of berry wine. “May you be happy always in your new home.”

“Oh! Yavanna bless me! Aren’t you a sweetheart!” Bell cried, embracing her.

Ori looked over at Bilbo.

“Do hobbit holes usually only have windows on one side?”

“Yes, those are considered the best rooms,” said Bilbo. “The landscape in the Shire is different. The older smials don’t have central heating, either, so it’s better to have fewer windows. Fortunately, here it’s not a problem.”

“A blessing that is!” Bell agreed. “We’re quite spoilt here, I’m afraid.”

She pointed out the bathroom, with its large tub, round in the dwarfish fashion.

“Like havin’ your own swimmin’ hole in your house! I used to have a terrible time getting my tweens into the washtub. Now I can barely get them out.”

They passed through the open doorway into the back garden, a wide expanse of grass with tables and benches on the periphery, and a fire pit off to one side. The trees were decorated with hanging... lanterns and one of the tables sagged under the weight of more food that Ori could remember seeing short of Thorin’s coronation banquet. This was just as well, since he thought there might be at least a hundred people here to eat it.

“Comin’ through!”

They moved aside to allow Hamfast and Bain to bring out even more kegs of ale, and a great, galvanized bucket of ice, which must have come from the mountain.

The scent of roasting meat wafted from the fire where Dain was tending a huge side of beef, the spit turning by virtue of one of his clockwork machines.

“Hope yer all hungry!” he called out merrily. “I can’t eat this all by meself.”

Thorin crossed his arms, grinning.

“You’re slowing down in your old age,” he teased.

“Not a’tall,” said Dain airily. “Where d’yeh’ thin’ th’ other side a’ beef went?”

“Into th’ smoker before dawn. Don’t let me big puddin’ fool yeh,” said Sculdis over the top of her tankard.

“There yeh go, ruinin’ me fun!”

Sculdis stuck out her tongue.

“Suffer!”

“Evil dam.”

“Bilbo,” Ori asked, “how does this work? Do we eat first and then dance?”

“It’s less formal than that. The musicians play most of the evening, with breaks for snacks. Everyone else grazes around dancing and socializing.”

Ori stared.

“Did you just say ‘graze’?”

Bilbo chuckled.

“Must be all those cows we just saw. Actually, it’s similar. You simply eat whenever you like. Buffet with dinner music.”

“Wish I’d brough’ me viol,” said Dwalin.

“Uh-uh,” said Ori. “Tonight we’re dancing. I want to show you off.”

“Oh, really?” Dwalin asked, raising a brow.

“Yes, I intend to flaunt you shamelessly,” said Ori in a grand voice.

“I suppose I can survive bein’ flaunted from time t’ time.”

Ori looked over where a quintet of musicians, men and dwarrow, were taking out their instruments and tuning up. The two dwarrow and one of the men looked familiar.
“Bilbo, look.”
Bilbo looked.

“Those musicians are the band from Ulwe’s Boat!”

“Apparently,” said Bujni, arm in arm with Dipfa, “That is the name of their ensemble as well.”

Ori did a double-take.

Bujni wore a hot pink summer tunic and trousers with teal trim, and his hair bore a teal stripe. Dipfa wore a frock of rust orange with lime-colored embroidered… limes. The pair were almost painful to the eye.

“Bujni!” Ori cried. “You’re very bright!”

“My diamond is conducting an experiment in color dynamics between courting couples.”

“I see,” said Bilbo.

“An’ so does everyone else,” Dwalin muttered.

Ori nudged him with his elbow, then felt the tickle of voices in the back of his head.

“Mahumb!” Mahal swore. “Wha’ is he wearin’?”

Yavanna piped up, “He looks like a bunch of petunias next to a bowl of forget-me-nots.”

“It’s abou’ struck me blind!”

“Why are you so surprised? You did make them!”

“I’m no’ takin’ responsibility f’r tha’.”

“Isn’t that what you said about Dain?”

“Aye, well, d’yeh blame me?”

Bilbo looked like he was struggling to breathe and Ori choked.

Dwalin leaned toward him.

“Yeh alright?”

“Mahal and Yavanna are providing commentary.”

"Hullo, there, Mister Bilbo!" Hamfast called.

The farmer wore a formal, long waistcoat over his white shirt. The curls on his head and his feet had been teased off to either side, laying flat and they bursting out toward the edges in crisp curls.

"Hullo, Hamfast!" Bilbo replied.

The two embraced.

"How’re ye keepin’?" Hamfast inquired.
Bilbo chuckled.

"Settling in, are you, Ham?"

"And so're ye, if rumor's true. Lookee, there t'is. Betrothal braid, eh? Yer mum'd be thrilled."

"She is," Ori murmured.

"Come an' get yerself a cold glass a' beer. Fortify yourself for the dancin'!"

Hamfast was equally happy to see all his guests, though he did give Boromir a lingering, enigmatic look. Boromir and Lavender held hands as they walked out, Boromir leaning a little to the side, for Lavender's comfort.

Dis and Gridr had gone off with Yizaris 'to catch up'. Ori assumed this meant gossip.

Ulfr, left to his own devices, looked askance at the musicians, and made straight for the buffet.

"Feeling better, Ulfr?" Thorin asked, sidling up to him before he could even reach it.

Ori had heard Thorin and Dwalin talking about Ulfr earlier in the day. They agreed that, under no circumstances, should Ulfr be allowed to socialize in this crowd without escort.

That proved to be wise, as the next thing that Ulfr did was find himself beard to beard with Erris, the once-elf

"Er… " Ulfr didn’t seem to know where to look. He went with, “Ulfr, King a’ Ironfists, at yer service.”

"Erris," said the once-elf. “At yours and your family’s.”

When it was obvious no more was forthcoming, Ulfr said gallantly, “An’ how’re yeh keeping, lass?”

“I was keeping much better before I lost my penis.”

Ulfr winced.

“War wound, lass…er…Bearer?”

“Some elf out in the Orocarnis has it now.”

Ulfr seemed to mull this over before bowing and saying something about ale. He turned, right into the path of Dree, screamed and backed up quickly.

Dree stood his ground, though he did look startled.

“Pardon? Do I have something nasty in my beard?”

“Math!” Ulfr gasped.

“Never seem much use for it myself,” said Dree. “Unless it was for counting how many orcs I had to kill.”

Ulfr squinted.
“Yeh was an elf once, lad?”

“Yes, though I don’t remember many particulars.”

“I know who has yer old body. Me maths teacher, returned fro’ th’ dead.”

“She can have it with my blessing. Shorter is better, in my opinion.”

Dree bowed and took his leave.

Thorin grasped Ulfr gently by the elbow.

“Come on, Ulfr. Let’s sit you down and get you some ale.”

They did so.

Ulfr downed one tankard, then another, and appeared to be somewhat at peace.

“Evenin’, Lord Ori,” he said at length. “Don’t suppose yeh’ve seen me Arne abou’ t’night?”

Ori had, in fact, seen Arne, and Nodun, and Tay, but a tiny and unworthy part of his brain wanted to tell Ulfr to go look up his bum. Fortunately, he was spared as the trio approached, dressed in summery oranges, golds and reds. Ulfr looked Arne over with a raised brow.

“Bi’ over th’ top, inudoye,” Ulfr rumbled.

Arne looked to be biting the inside of his lip and simply said, “Adad, you remember Master Nodun.”

Ulfr rose and bowed to Nodun very politely.

“King Ulfr, this is an unexpected pleasure. I’m sure you don’t remember my husband Tay.”

“No’ clothed, no,” Ulfr admitted wryly and also bowed to Tay.

“Your majesty,” said Tay. “What brings you to Erebor?”

“More li’e wha’ drove me fro’ me mountain. Short ‘r tall, they’re still me relatives an’ they’re still drivin’ me mad. Add me old maths teacher, an’ it were time f’r a wee break.”

“It’s been forever since I’ve been home,” said Tay. “Do Garg and his family still sell fried dough at the gate of the rock garden near the palace?”

“Alas, old Garg returned t’ th’ stone, bu’ his lad Narg’s married an’ raisin’ his own badgers in th’ business. Yeh never go home, lad?”

“I don’t have family there anymore. My idad raised me. When he died, I went traveling and ended up here, met Nodun and married. Now I have a successful business and it’s a mighty effort to take a week off.”

“Hard work never hur’ anyone,” said Ulfr, but he said it with a bit of a twinkle.

Arne had told Ori that this old saying was drilled into Ironfist badgers from the moment they opened their eyes. It was a common stitched sampler in Ironfist homes and the first thing young scholars learned to write.

“An’ wha’ business ‘r yeh in?”

“I run a teahouse,” said Tay pleasantly.

Ori watched Ulfr’s twinkle extinguish.

“Quartz ‘r cobalt?”

“Cobalt. I did my full training under idad’s instruction and had my mastery before I left home.”

Ulfr didn’t seem to know where to look, and Ori could guess why.

Tea houses with quartz doorknobs sold tea and cakes. Tea houses with cobalt doorknobs offered other services as well.

Anyone with the baking skills and business acumen could open a quartz tea house. It wasn’t the province of any one guild, though many master bakers did own at least one. Only masters of sensual pleasures could run cobalt tea houses. The guild was among the most ancient, equally as old as that of the miners, and very well-respected. The requirements for mastery dizzyingly high.

In fact, it was a longer apprenticeship than even that of a chemical engineer.

Ori looked over at Bell Gamgee who was playing supreme hostess.

“Mistress Bell, I didn’t realize you knew Master Nodun and Master Tay.”

“Oh, such lovely people,” said Bell. "Master Tay’s tearoom is decorated finer than any in Michel Delving itself, and his tea blends are among the best I’ve tasted.”

“You went for tea?”

“We didn’t realize there was anything else on offer, not the first time we went anyway.”

“I see,” he said, grinning.

“We aren’t in the habit of spending coin on ourselves, of course. What with all these faunts, that’s where the money goes. You can only patch the rump of a pair of trousers so many times before there’s nothin’ left to patch. But it was our anniversary, you know. When I think on it, I should have known there was something more to it when we arrived and he told us he’d be happy to see to us, as he didn’t have further appointments that evening.”

“Talkin’ about our Master Tay, me dear?” Hamfast asked, cuddling up to her. “Yavanna bless me, but that dwarf has a pair a hands. He found knots in me shoulder muscles where I didn’t even know I had muscles!”

“I think,” said Ori, “that someone should warn other hobbits who might come to visit that they need to look closely at teahouse doorknobs.”

A bustle of movement caught Ori’s eye.

“Buer!” Ori cried.

The inventor edge though the doorway with a basket heaped with fresh spun sugar.
“Oi! Ori!”

“Evenin’, Mister Buer,” said Hamfast. He and Bell went over arm in arm to greet him. “What’ve ya there?”

“A treat for later,” said Buer, shrugging modestly. “I can put it anywhere you want, as long as it’s cool and dry. This stuff’s very sad when it melts.”

Hamson was summoned to bear away the basket.

Bell went to the buffet and returned with a tall, sweating glass.

“Berry soda water, am I right?” she asked, proffering it.

“You remembered! Thanks, Missus Gamgee!”

Ori looked between them.

“I didn’t realize you knew each other.”

“Buer did all the lighting in the house!” Hamfast said proudly. “All those glass-touch-lights-up things. I don’t miss candles and lanterns a whit.”

“Safer for the faunts, too,” said Bell.

When the Gamgees went off to mingle, Bujni and Dipfa swept in to greet the new arrival.

Ori excused himself when he saw Ivo looking through the crowd.

“Hullo.”

“How’re you keepin’, m’lord?”

“I’m keeping very well. Sorry about the other day.”

“What? When Lady Eowyn handed me my arse on a platter?” Ivo grinned. “Actually, that’s why I’m here. I need to apologize. I know I should do it in private, but I’m not likely to be in private with her, if she has anythin’ to say about it. Also, I only got so much time. Master Dubb’s arranged for me to go out tonight on patrol with Lord Glorfindel.”

“Really?”

“Aye, I’m supposed to learn how to handle drunks and other idjits, and also, where to look for folks as passed out in the gutter, so we can move ’em before the streets is flushed. Master Dubb says it’s a great opp-er-too-nity for me. I’m such a git, I had to ask him what that meant.”

“No, but I’m not meant to sound scholarish. I don’t know nothin’ about it, and me mates’ll be saying I’m putting on airs.”

Ori thought about this, then finally said, “Master Dubb’s not a scholar, and he still knows what it means. Do you think he’s putting on airs?”

Ivo opened his mouth, then closed it, then said, “I got to think about that before I answer.”
“You already know the answer,” said Ori with a grin.

“You’re right. I’d rather have the cram brains mad at me than Master Dubb.”

“Oi! There goes her ladyship. See you, m’lord.”

Ori looked around. Bilbo had moved in to watch over Ulfr. Thorin had been roped into a conversation with Buer, Dipfa and Bujni. Buer was beyond excited, waving his arms, which caused his hair to chime incessantly.

“King Ulfr? Wow! He’s a legend.”

“In his own mind,” Thorin murmured.

“He invented the foam that extinguishes coal seam fires! He invented sungraphics! He’s so… so, you know?”

“Yes,” said Bujni. “I know exactly what you mean. It is very difficult to express his greatness in the field of chemical engineering. Perhaps, your majesty?”

Thorin looked amused.

“Buer, would you like to be introduced to King Ulfr?”

“Really?” Buer all but squeaked like a badger.

“I think it can be arranged. Please come with me, Buer.”

Ori followed over to where Ulfr chatted, somewhat awkwardly, with Bilbo. It was obvious Ulfr found Bilbo a challenging conversationalist.

“King Ulfr, excuse the interruption.”

“Wha’cher, Thorin?”

“This young dwarf is a scientist and engineer here under the mountain and has requested an introduction.”

Ulfr chucked his chin up in ascent, and Thorin obliged.

“Buer, son of Uer, this is King Ulfr of the Ironfists.”

“Your majesty,” Buer bowed.

Ulfr looked him over, pausing for a moment at his hair. Buer was so excited, it rang in its full range of chimes.

“How’re yeh keepin’, lad?”

“Very well, your majesty.”

Thorin tried to grease the way.

“Buer was just saying he admired your work with sungraphics, among other things.”
“Do yeh, now?” said Ulfr, a bit more animated. “Produced one a’ yer own, have yeh?”

“Several, actually, King Ulfr. This is my latest.”

Buer took a notebook out of his coat pocket. The notebook was stuffed with stray sheets of paper, drawn over with diagrams. With this incidentally came a coil spring, and three small phials labeled ‘sandalwood’, ‘sulphuric acid’ and ‘bacon grease’. He managed to catch the half-eaten meat sandwich and his pen knife before they hit the ground.

“Sorry,” said Buer, reddening.

Ulfr snickered.

“We jus’ won’ tell th’ wife. Me own pockets ‘r worse. She’s always after me abou’ leavin’ paints and solutions in me pockets when th’ clothes are sent t’ th’ wash. Only, yeh migh’ wan’ t’ keep yer samich in different pocket fro’ yer chemicals.”

Ulfr looked, then looked again, gaping. Ori flickered a gaze over the print, which wasn’t even protected with glass or some blotting paper. The brilliant colors of the late sunset glowed across the surface and a flock of ravens flew by, captured in such perfect clarity that Ori could pick out the white feather in Quartz’s tail.

The Ironfist king was speechless for long moments.

Finally, he managed, “How long’ve yeh been tinkerin’ wi’ sungraphics?”

“About six months, but not constantly or anything. The first were pretty bad, not even in color.”

“Lad, in six months yeh’ve perfected wha’ took me sixty years to create.”

Buer nodded excitedly, his multicolored hair rippling like long blades of grass in the wind.

“That’s the point, right? You laid the foundation, did the trial and error, the figuring and dirty work. All I did was build on your research. That’s how it’s supposed to work!”

Ulfr shook his head.

“Even if yeh had th’ patent documents laid ou’ in fron’ t’ yeh, yeh’d still have t’ understand how it all works, and extrapolate from there. Yer a bleedin’ genius an’ I’m proud t’ know yeh.”

Buer yelped delightedly and hugged him.

Immobilized, Ulfr laughed in spite of himself while Thorin gestured away Ulfr’s bodyguards from slaughtering the young scientist.

Finally, Buer realized what he had done and was brighter red than the strands in his hair.

“Forgive me, your majesty, I’m so sorry.”

Ulfr waved it off as if he was swatting a fly.

“Wha’s yer guild, lad? Yeh’ve no bead. None I kin see, anyway.”

Buer shrugged.
“When I was of age to join a guild there was no money for me to pay my entry or dues. Just as well. I saw other dwarrow in their different guilds and I realized, I would never be able to make my choice even if I could pay. The guild system is great, if you have a very narrow focus, but I found the parameters of each to be waaay too constricting.”

“Yeh mus’ step on a lo’ a’ toes,” said Ulfr.

“Even guild members step on a lot of toes, right? Can’t be helped. If I’m going to get into a fistfight anyway, I want it to be because I did something intentionally, not because it was an ‘oops’. And my gadgets and whatnots are usually too strange for any guild to want to make a claim anyway.”

“F’r instance?”

“So, I have this patent on the machine for spun cane sugar. I designed and fabricated the machine myself, and I actually make the product and I sell it. So, that’s the engineers’ guild, the welders’ guild, the sweet makers’ guild and the merchants’ guild, and that’s just something I do for a side gig at night.”

“Gig.”

“Gig. You know, a job that you do now and then. Depends what else you’ve got going.”

“I see,” said Ulfr. “An’ how many ‘gigs’ d’ yeh have goin’ righ’ now?”

“Eleven. Twelve if I can convince Mister Wandi to let me demonstrate my new system for curling hair.”

Ulfr regarded the young dwarf in naked amazement.

“An’ yeh sleep when?”

“Sleep?” Buer asked, then laughed. “I manage. I’m not suffering.”

All the while they had been chatting, Buer never looking away, he had been sketching something on the hem of his tunic in graphite wand.

Ulfr frowned at him, calculating something by the looks of it.

“Are yeh an Ironfist, lad?”

“My adad is. Amad’s a Longbeard.”

“Uer… Uer… Son a’ Tuer, who was th’ son a Tuaris?”

“Yes!” said Buer, surprised.

“Aye, tha’ makes us cousins, lad. Me umadel an’ Tuaris was sisters.”

Bilbo looked from one to the other.

“And I thought hobbits were all related.”

Ulfr threw out, “Turns ou’ yeh an’ I ‘r related, too, perfesser. Tha’s besides th’ point. Buer lad, come over an’ have a drink wi’ me. I wan’ t’ hear abou’ yer research.”
Ori watched them go and turned to find Arne standing not three feet away. Ori sucked in a breath of horror, but the prince only looked relieved as Ulfr and Buer walked over to the keg, talking animatedly.

Arne seemed to be mouthing, “Yes, please, go.”

Nodun bit her lower lip to keep from laughing, but Tay looked between Ulfr and Arne with a little crease of worry on his forehead.

Gloin kept looking up in the direction of Dale, though they couldn’t see it over the hill.

Legolas and Gimli had not appeared.

“How are those lads?” Gloin muttered. “If they’re off canoodlin’ behind some boulder when they ought t’be here-“

“I’m sure they’re on th’ way, love,” Gridr soothed. “An’ yer own da’s wrath never stopped us from a bit a’ canoodlin’.”

Gloin grinned naughtily.

“Remember when we-“

“That’ll do,” Gridr admonished, lightly smacking his bum.

“Da! Mam! We’re here!” Gimli announced.

“Bloody finally!” Gloin cried.

He turned as Gimli and Legolas exited the house. The party plunged into shocked silence.

Legolas’ long, straight blond hair now sat in a huge halo of tight curls about his head, and Gimli’s mad rippling tresses flowed down straight as a pin, loose all the way to his knees.

“How d’ye thin’?” Gimli roared excitedly.

“Grch!” Gloin opined.

Truly shocked, the older dwarf could only gape, while almost everyone else roared with laughter.

“Yeh look like yer heads was attacked!” Dubb crowed.

Gridr, however, cocked an eyebrow at them.

“By a mad hairdresser, I’ll bet. That’ll all wash out, I hope.”

“Aww, mam!” Gimli wailed. “Yeh ruined th’ joke!”

“Better’n killin’ yer adad, yeh daft thin’!”

“But, what do you think?” Legolas asked, kneeling to embrace her.

“When I get over it, I’ll tell yeh,” said Gridr.

“No, Da,” said Gimli, bumping foreheads with him. “It’s just f’r tonight. I promise”

“Guid, ‘cause yeh look a righ’ pair a’ numpties.”

Legolas laughed, turning toward Thranduil.

“Hear that, Ada? I’m a numpty!”

“You must be very proud,” said Thanduil dryly.

Gridr cuddled up to Gloin.

“See, there are worse thin’s than canoodlin’.”

“Yer righ’, as always, mizimel.”

They heard Tilda shouting, “Legolas! I want to touch your hair. Kneel down so I can reach. Oooo, it’s solid!”

“It’s not that bad, Til,” Legolas protested, laughing.

“Smells funny!”

“You weren’t there when Wandi put it in. It smelled like shellac.”

“Legolas! Gimli! There ya’ are!” Hamfast called. “What’d ya do to your hair?”

“Look! Look!” Tilda cried.

Ori craned his neck to see. Tilda had pulled one of Legolas’ curls straight and let go. It bounced back like a spring. Tilda shrieked in delight.

“Da! Nana! Look! Legolas has boing-boing curls!”

“That’s impressive,” Hamfast allowed.

Bard shrugged.

“Naturally. My son-in-law is a genius.”

Thorin snickered.

“I don’t think there was anything natural about that.”

“I feel like an underachiever,” said Kili. “Fi and I never even thought of doing that.”

“You tried to curl your hair with hide glue as a pebble,” said Thorin.

“I don’t remember that.”

“And I can’t forget it.”

“Aaand, there’s the guilty party,” said Bofur. who had arrived with Nori from somewhere beyond the food tables.

“Mister Wandi,” said Hamfast. “And Mellon! Good a’ ye to come! How’re the plants?”
“Growing very nicely, thank you, Mister Gamgee,” said Wandi. “Your daughters do such a marvelous job, far better than I could.”

He wore a leaf green silk robe with gold braiding, and Mellon sported a matching collar.

Thranduil muttered, “I swear that dog has a bigger wardrobe than I do.”

Sigrid linked arms with him.

“But not a bigger wardrobe than Tilda, Wicked Stepmother. Funny, but I don’t recall ordering all those clothes for her that arrived this morning.”

“A princess must look the part,” said Thranduil loftily.

“She has fourteen pairs of leather boots and a pen knife that coordinates with each.”

“Seemed like a nice, round number,” said Thranduil with a sniff.

There was a great noise of flapping wings.

“We have returned,” Red Queen announced, alighting in the garden with six of her court. “The rejoicing may commence.”

The faunts sent up a mighty cheer.

“Yaaaaay!”

She nodded to graciously acknowledged them before strutting over to her hostess.

“Mistress Gamgee, we were honored by your invitation.”

Bell curtsied.

“And we’re honored by you’re acceptin’ it, your majesty. We put aside the best bones from the pulled beef just for yourselves.”

“Ehhhxcellent,” Red Queen enthused as she followed Bell to the feast heaped on a huge silver platter, borrowed from Erebor’s royal kitchen.

Haldir came through with Hansom as escort.

“Haldir? You’re dressed rather officially for a garden party,” said Thranduil.

“I wanted everyone to see my new uniform trousers, king-father.”

Ori thought Haldir especially wanted Wandi to see his new trousers, which were made snug, almost like hose, and incredibly flexible. Haldir bowed and turned to greet Eowyn.

“His new trousers?” Thranduil asked, “or what he has stuffed inside them?”

Bard arrived and handed his husband a glass of Dorwinion from the cask Thorin had provided.

“Given your favorite diaphanous robe, sweetie, perhaps it’s best not to pursue it.”

“It’s a good thing they’re both immortal,” Galadriel observed. “Long distance relationships are nothing to such.”
"I'm interested in what other changes Haldir plans on making to his uniform," Celeborn chuckled, stroking Kelli's head resting against his hip. The twins larked off to the food and the dwarf princes. Their laughter was soon heard.

"Ham," Bell called. "Perhaps it's time. Before the band get's goin'."

"Aye, me sweet. Just let me get me cap."

He went back into the house and returned, talking over his shoulder to Bain.

"They've done a beautiful job with the buildin'," said Hamfast. "An' me Bell's always made sure our home was comfortable an' welcomin'."

Hamfast approached Bard with his cap in hand and gave a bit of a bow.

"Now, King Bard, I pledge meself as a good tenant, never late with me rent, an' always ready t' give satisfaction."

Bard stared at him, wordless, for so long, the hobbit family became uneasy, looking at each other with sickened expressions.

Very, very politely, Hamfast asked, "Have I given some offense, King Bard?"

Finally, Bard roused himself.

"Of course not, Hamfast! It's just, you aren't my tenant. I'm not renting this house to you. It's yours."

Bell gasped and the older Gamgee offspring whispered among themselves, filling the air with nervous energy.

Hamfast considered and finally managed, "An' the garden around it, King Bard?"

"Yes, that, too. I'm sorry, I should have put it in writing. Ori? Will you help me?"

"Certainly. Hamfast? Would you like me to draw up the contract between you and the crown?"

Hamfast rocked back on his heels and Bell darted forward and clutched his forearm. Lavender had grasped Boromir's hand and leaned into him, while her sisters held each other about the waist and Hamson looked proud enough to burst.

"That would be mighty kind o' ye, Mister Ori. I never expected this. I never even come up with a name."

He looked to Bilbo, who grinned and said, "Well, Hamfast, it's your choice now, isn't it."

Hamfast looked to his wife and she shook her head.

"Up to you, my dear."

Ori had no idea what they were talking about. He figured it must be something sensibly hobbitish, so he held himself ready to do anything short of standing on his head in the manure pile.

Hamfast, red-faced, finally straightened his spine and said, "Gardener. The family name will be Gardener."
"Excellent choice," Bilbo encouraged.

"If I get too big for me britches, yeh'll tell me?"

"If you insist, Hamfast," said Bilbo, "but I don't think you're in any danger."

"Thank ye, Mis-… Thank ye, Bilbo."

Finally, obviously, Bard had reached his limit of curiosity.

"Thorin, do you know what's going on?"

"I think Bilbo could tell us," said Thorin.

Bilbo looked at both of them, and finally the shoe dropped.

"Oh! Of course. I'm a complete biscuit head. Bard, by granting Hamfast his own home and lands, you've have entitled him as a gentlehobbit."

"I thought he already was," said Bard.

"He is, in terms of his manners. Don't look at me like that, Hamfast. You've always had the cleanest fingernails of any guest I've ever had at my tea table. I can't even say that about all the Tooks."

Frodo nodded furiously.

"It's true! They're cleaner than mine! And he washes his face without anyone telling him, too!"

Bilbo gave Frodo a wry look before continuing.

"Bard, you've elevated Hamfast's station in life. Even if he never so much as rents some tenant an acre of land, he is now the Baggins' social equal."

"An' I'm obliged t' ye, King Bard," said Hamfast, bowing.

Bard grinned down at him.

"I'm the one who's obliged, Hamfast. We all are."

The contract was quickly drawn up, with Bilbo's input, and signed.

"Never been so glad I learnt to read an' write," said Hamfast.

He turned and kissed his wife and the guests erupted in cheers.

Thorin nudged Bard's hip.

"Sometimes it's good to be king."

“Especially now it is," Bard agreed.

But not everyone was as happy.

Sam looked at Frodo, his lower lip trembling.

“Sam?” Frodo asked. “What’s wrong?”
“This means ye ain’t me ‘Mister Frodo’ no more!”

Sam seized Frodo into a crushing hug.

“Of course I am!” Frodo protested, hugging back. “Only now, you’re my ‘Mister Samwise’, too.”

Sam hiccuped, pulled away and gazed at Frodo with his head cocked to the side as he worked this out.

“Jings!,” he said finally. “I didn’t think about it like that.”

Boromir grinned at Bilbo.

“‘Mister Frodo and Mister Samwise’ makes them sound like a couple of old men, sitting on the stoop, talking about the good old days.”

“The very thing to which most hobbits aspire, Captain,” said Bilbo. “The front porches of the Great Smials of Tuckboro are fairly chockerblock on a fine spring evening.”

“I’d like to see them someday,” said Boromir. “Is that even possible?”

“Marrying a Gamgee will certainly gain you an invite at least to tea when you’re in that part of the world. The Gamgees are well-liked by both sides of my family. Just watch your head. The ceiling are a good bit lower than you’re used to.”

“Indeed,” said Tharkun, walking over with a plate of pulled beef and tomato and cucumber salad. “I have a permanent flat spot on my forehead and a hunched back from Bag End alone.”

Rigel-chuh walked up after him and snickered.

“Your forehead is flat because you got stinking drunk one night with Tom Bombadil and the two of you pretended to be mountain goats: Baaaaaaah! Crash”

As everyone else laughed, Tharkun shot the blue wizard a look.

“Don’t you have a ritual to attend?”

“You’ll recall, my favorite ritual was always embarrassing you, Gandalf, the Great and Powerful Wizard of Arda.”

“How unfortunate that all your memory returned.”

“Yes, it’s terrible,” Rigel agreed merrily.

“Ah, there you are, Mister Rigel,” said Bell. “And you’ve got yourself a plate. Wonderful. Oh! The watermelon! The faunts will be clamoring for that. Come t’ think on it, Hamfast’ll be right up front.”

“Oooo,” said Bilbo. “Watermelon seed spitting contest!”

He gamboled off after her.

Ori smiled up at the blue wizard.

“Hullo.”
“Good evening, Ori-chuh. How are you keeping?”

Ori laughed.

“Fine, thank you! Are you still called Rigel, then?”

“I like it best of all my names, I think, so I shall keep it, along with anything else my esteemed colleague comes up with for me.”

Tharkun raised a brow and gave a ‘humph’ worthy of Master Brur.

“I think I’ll go visit Radagast for a decade or so.”

“Go on then,” said Rigel. “Ori-chuh and I will leave a candle in the window for you.”

“A white one,” Ori confirmed, “to match your robe.”

“And don’t forget to bring back some mushrooms,” Rigel completed.

Dwalin looked between them and Tharkun and chuckled.

“Yer doomed, laddie. Give it up now.”

They had been sticking with round dances, since it was a form familiar to all races of middle earth, but now the hobbits called for something different.

“Give us a ‘follow th’ leader’, if ye will,” Hamfast asked the band.

The musicians stared at him, completely asea. Which, Ori supposed, was perfectly apt in their case.

“Follow the… What kind of dance is that, Mister Hamfast?” asked one of the dwarves.

“Oo!” the man cried. “Yeh mean ‘Strip th’ Willow’.”

“I imagine so,” said Hamfast.

They played him a few bars of something springy.

“Aye! That’s it! That’ll be grand!”

As soon as Ori heard the musicians start, he turned to them, gaping.

“Seriously?”

“What is it?” Bilbo asked.

“I suppose the tune is right, but it’s an old Firebeard song. The refrain goes: ‘If I were king of pleasure, and you were queen of pain, you would love me’.”

“Oh, dear. Though, it is rather catchie, isn’t it.”

“I’m sure it’s the perfect rhythm for flogging,” said Ori. “What do we do? Is it really like strip
“Yes, you form up in two lines, partners facing each other, and do exactly what the couple before you does. Nothing simpler.”

“Do we get to ‘race the band’?”

“Now you’re being naughty,” said Bilbo.

“Aye,” said Dwalin. “He though’ he’d beat yeh t’ it this time.”

“Here we go! Here we go!” Hamfast called them. “Pick yourselves a partner an’ mind your toes!”

Ori saw firsthand what that meant as Hamfast and Bell led off, hands joined, skipping sideways down the middle of the dance, then spinning in place, skipping back up, then each skipping behind a line of dancers to take new places at the bottom of the rows. They were quite graceful, as they somehow managed to dance solely on their big toes, barely touching the ground as they twirled.

They made it look so simple, and it would have been simple, Ori supposed, if they were all hobbits, or at least near the same height. Somehow they struggled through the first round, and then grew a little more comfortable. Given the events, Ori would later say they had gotten a little too comfortable. At that moment, Ori could only giggle as he and Dwalin went up and down the dance and he could barely meet his husband’s eye, as the last time they’d done such as sprightly hopping up and down was at the inn. They had been naked, and pretending to be elves.

The real elves seemed to take this new challenge with the grim seriousness of battle, except for Glorfindel, who danced with both Margr and Vi at once and jumped with an eye to height.

“Whoop! Whoop!” he called with every leap, like a huge, blond crane.

The younger set took this up themselves, and the first time Dwalin did it, Ori lost step. Killer decided he wouldn’t be left out of the fun and ran in to jump and yip with them.

“Ah,” said Red Queen, “so it is a ritual after all. Allow us to assist.”

The bonebreakers strutted around the periphery of the dance, beating their wings and echoing every ‘whoop’ in a screeching chorus.

Ori completely lost his composure and could barely finish the round, never mind the dance, which threatened to go on and on in marathon fashion.

Dori and Balin dropped out early, as she was running to the privy. It was just as well. By the time she returned, there was something of a massacre going on, with bodies strewn across the lawn. The band hadn’t entirely stopped playing and the instruments straggled to a halt all at different times.

“I knew we were tempting fate,” said Dori with a decorous sigh. She sat on a chair the Gamgees had provided her.

Red Queen fluttered over and surveyed the wreckage with avian satisfaction.

“Excellent,” she pronounced. “Lots of bodies. There will be many bones on which to pick through in the coming year.”

Hamfast stood with his hands on his hips, surveying the damage, as Bell buried her face in his shoulder, shaking with laughter.

“Awright,” said Hamfast. “Let’s try it with two separate groups. It’s too dangerous with tall folk fallin’ every which way like trees.”

“I suppose,” said Thranduil, straightening his twigs as he climbed to his feet, “that there is a limit to all this togetherness.”

“Yeh think?” Ulfr asked, spitting strands of Elrodan’s hair out of his mouth. “Yizzie? Yeh a’righ’?”

“I’m fine,” said Queen Yizaris, brushing off her skirt, “but I’m not sure poor Master Lindir can say the same. I’m terribly sorry I fell on you, Master Lindir. I hope I didn’t do lasting damage to your skull.”

Lindir peered around in confusion as Elrond and Cemnesta helped him to sit up.

“Not at all, your majesty. Lord Glorfindel would tell you I have an extremely thick skull. Takes one to know one, I suppose.”

Butter and Sugar licked Thorin’s face as he lay sprawled on the ground, laughing too hard to move. He sputtered and tried to speak, but he just kept collapsing again.

“My dear?” Bilbo asked, crawling over to him. “Are you in danger of drowning?”

Thorin threw his hands up in the universal sign of I-have-no-idea.

“Da,” said Lavender. “Maybe we should let the band take a break.”

Ori and Dwalin sprawled in the cool grass, taking a break from the endless rounds of rowdy hobbit circle dances.

“Who’d’a’ though’ they had i’ in ‘em?” Dwalin chuckled. “They’re like machines whose springs never loosen.”

“I did warn you,” Bilbo said evilly as he and Thorin brought over cups and a pitcher of cold beer.

While their elders continued to dance, the faunts were called away to the edge of the garden to play a curious game. A streamer-festooned object hung at the end of a rope looped over a branch. It was vaguely star-shaped. The hobbit faunts chattered excitedly as Halfred brought out a big stick, similarly decorated, and Lavender waved a red kerchief which made made the chatter even louder. The man badgers and dwarflings looked mystified.

“Ah,” said Bilbo. “It’s nice to see the old traditions aren’t lost.”

“What are they doing?” Ori asked.

“Something I rather wish I could still do myself,” said Bilbo.

Boromir and Eowyn joined them with their own beer, and eagerly watched the proceedings.

Lavender drew Sam forward and covered his eyes with the kerchief, and checked to make sure he couldn’t peek. Halfred gave him the stick and went to the end of the cord looped around another branch to anchor it. This he loosened, gave a few experimental tugs, and the star-object bobbed up and down.

Sam was spun around and around like a top, then Lavender patted him on the back and he rushed forward, swinging the stick wildly in the general direction of the bobbing star.

The faunts goaded him on, and soon the others joined in.

Sam never came anywhere near the thing. Eventually, Lavender stopped him, and it was someone else’s turn.

After several faunts and man badgers tried, one of Furhnk’s nephews got a chance and whacked the thing so hard, it burst, and the faunts were showered with candy.

“Yay!” they all shouted at once, scrambling on the ground after the sweets.

Dwalin nodded.

“I kin see th’ appeal. Lo’s a bludgeonin’, followed by a snack.”

Ori could also see the appeal. He would like to give it a try himself. Perhaps such a thing could be arranged for Bilbo and Frodo’s shared birthday. The faunts could have one, and the grown-ups could have another. The prizes would vary in each. He tucked the idea away to discuss later with his husband.

Boromir watched Lavender as she helped the younglings gather their treasure, made sure the smallest got a fair share and that she got a share as well.

“Be nice, Addled One,” said Boromir. “You’re not beyond the reach of love yourself.”

“I think I may safely promise you I’ll never look at anyone the way you look at Lavender Gamgee.”

Thorin coughed, turning red.

“So, Boromir,” said Ori, “you’re going to continue to court Lavender Gamgee after you’ve returned to Gondor? I am a dwarf. Nosiness comes with the beard.”

Boromir grinned.

“I’m going to try.”

“That’s a long way to travel when you want a cuddle.”

“Only to the other side of Minas Tirith, actually. Lavender’s agreed to go with Lady Arwen, to be her lady-in-waiting.”

“She doesn’t already have one?”

“No. She has someone to wash her skivvies, of course, but she’s never been the kind to need help with her knitting.”

“But, this way Lavender has a job and a secure place to live,” Ori surmised.

“In case everything goes to Mordor, yes. Lavender’s an excellent housekeeper, learned at her mother’s knee. She’s spent her whole life a stone’s throw from Bilbo Baggins, so she’s not afraid to take chances. She’d make a proper soldier’s wife.”

“And she’s pretty as a new-polished gem,” said Ori slyly.

Boromir grin grew from ear to ear.

“Yes. Yes she is.”

“So,” said Bilbo, “how many faunts are you planning?”

Boromir choked on his beer.

“I don’t know. I was leaving it up to her.”

“So, a dozen or so?” Bilbo asked.

“I’ve just realized,” said Boromir. “I don’t know how long hobbits carry.”

“Depends on how much rain we get,” said Bilbo. “Joking! I’m joking! It’s nine months, as for men.”
Unions, Ursith, and Underhandedness.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The party winds down, but the Durins are still ready to rock n’ roll! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dawairow time, same dawairow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends.

They were all winding down. The older guests sat in the grass, the youngest danced and the set in the middle seemed to have vanished. From what Bilbo had told Ori, this was not a surprise.

Nori and Bofur approached the Gardeners and Ori was amazed that Nori thought enough to bow to them.

“We need to be gettin’ on,” said Bofur. “Thank ya f’r doin’ all this. We’re pleased to have ya here.”

“What he said,” said Nori with a grin.

As they passed, Ori rose, gave Nori a hug and murmured, “Time for Ursith to put in his appearance?”

“Have fun,” Ori teased. As he hugged Bofur, the miner clapped him fraternally on the back.

Nori grinned wickedly.

“I always do, Chick.”

The musician still played as Boromir and Lavender continued to dance with the faunts and the elves. Haldir held Wandi’s hand as they twirled. Wandi was laughing and the look in his eye was that of hunter returning from a full trapline.

Rigel and Tharkûn looked to be trying to out jig each other, much to Galadriel’s and Celeborn’s amusement.

Hamfast may not have been drunk, but the beer didn't make him less bold. He turned to Aragorn, who was lying on his stomach in the grass, attempting to teach Arwen to play a tune on grass blades.

"Boromir's yer captain?"

"Yes, Mister Hamfast.” Aragorn rolled over and grinned at Hamfast

"Ye trust him?"

"I have known him all his life, and I trust him with my own and, more importantly, with Arwen’s.”

"He much given t' wenchin'?"
Arwen choked a little but kept a serious look on her face. Aragorn smiled, but replied quite evenly.

"No. In fact, before he met your daughter, I had assumed he was what the dwarrow called 'craftwed'. He gave himself solely to the sword. I suspect his younger brother will have something choice to say on the matter."

"Has a brother, does he?"

"Faramir. A well-trained warrior. He acts as my steward when I'm from home. He has often pestered Boromir to at least consider marriage, given Boromir's advanced age."

"The way ye say it, I can see there's a joke in there somewheres."

"Boromir is only five years older than Faramir."

Hamfast chuckled.

"Sounds like brothers."

Then he sobered.

"An' that's another thing. How long can me Lavender expect her husband to live? She maybe could live another seventy years. If I'm a judge o' men, Boromir's at least middlin' forty."

"He's fifty-five."

"Remarkable well preserved," Hamfast mused.

"He's Numenorean, as am I, descended from Elros Halfelven, brother of Lord Elrond. Boromir will likely live another seventy years himself."

"Elf blood? Mis- Bilbo never told me he kept such interesting acquaintances."

"Really, Ham," said Bilbo. "It's not like I hid cannibalism or somethings equally dreadful."

"Waahl, I don't like it, o' course, Lavender bein' so far away, but I started it, ye might say, movin' us so far from the Shire. An' she's of age."

"We tol' her, give it a year. If y' ain't happy, come home. 'Course, that don't mean we won't be checkin' in from time t' time, an' she'll send us a raven, keep us up on what's doin'."

"She's a sensible girl, Hamfast," said Bell. "An' she'll be with Mis- with Bilbo's friends."

"They're still different, m'dear," said Hamfast, as Lavender and Boromir approached. "I don't want her t' go skippin' meals or such."

"Dad," said Lavender, laughing, "I can promise you I won't be skipping any meals."

"Ye always was a good girl," said Hamfast.

"Besides, Boromir likes me plump," she said, grinning evilly.

Hamfast nodded, smiling wryly.

"Aha. Go on with ye, ye little minx."
It was late when they thanked the Gardeners for their hospitality. The Gardeners promised to bring Frodo and Sam back some time the day after tomorrow, the faunts having been sent to bed a while ago. Ponies, horses, rams and the teacup were brought around and hitched up. The royal party, now swelled by the other guests of the Fundin household, made ready to leave.

They had a pleasant ride back to Dale where Bard and his family took leave of them with the promise to meet at breakfast. The Durins and their guests continued up the road to the mountain. Ori looked up. The sky was full of stars and he could hear behind him Tauriel and Legolas telling Kili and Gimli all about them. Elrond and Galadriel helped occasionally.

“Yeh have fun, love?” Dwalin asked.

“It was lovely,” said Ori tentatively.

“But?”

“Did you feel that? The rock shifting? Like Khazad-dum, except without the water.”

“Aye, happens time t’ time.”

“This is different.”

“Thorin!” Dwalin called. “Hold up a mo’.”

Ori sighed. He hadn’t meant to turn a vague concern into a circus, but he supposed it couldn’t be helped.

“Something wrong?” Thorin asked, riding back to them.

Abruptly, Minty shied and reared, and the other ponies followed. Grinder jumped and dodged. Ori was caught off-guard and nearly tumbled from the saddle. The older wargs growled and Killer bayed.

Somewhere, far below them, tons of rock buckled downward and broke. The dwarrow winced and cried out.

“What in Yavanna’s name?” Bilbo cried. “Thorin?”

“That’s was a mine collapse!” roared Thorin. “Ride!”

Bells clanged all over Erebor.

“Tha’s th’ warnin’ t’ ge’ off th’ street, give way t’ th’ sappers an’ th’ mine rescue.” Dwalin shouted to Ori as their rams thundered along in the wake of Thorin and Bilbo.

Balin took the majority of guests back to Fundin House.

“Where?” Thorin demanded as Roác wheeled beside him.

“A pit off a side tunnel near the central market. It’s been closed for decades, but there was a cadre of gleaners, working it independently.”
“Blessed Mahal,” Thorin growled. “Do we know how many?”

“No,” Roäc answered, pulling ahead of Minty. “Quartz and Garnet are up ahead finding out.”

The party raced forward toward the damage.

“What shall our people do to help?”

“Send a messenger to King Bard. Tell him his people are not in any danger. Neither is your aerie!”

Red Queen squawked to her followers and soared away.

They shot around the corner and Thorin stopped Minty short and Grinder had to hop smartly to avoid a collision. Ori clung to the new-grown wool and stayed in the saddle.

Miners sat and sprawled all over the passage. They were covered in dirt, and only their wild eyes were distinguishable. Oin and some of his healers hovered over a few, who appeared unconscious, but the others were simply wrapped in blankets, in a state of shock.

“Where did they come from?” Thorin demanded in general, leaping off Minty. Bilbo, Ori, and Dwalin followed. A glance back told Ori that Fili, Kili, Tauriel, Gimli, Legolas, and Cemnesta had followed them. Dis rode up with Jani.

Oin nudged the healer closest to him as he called for stretchers.

The healer, a young dam, swallowed, stuttered, then pulled herself together.

“They come from the mine, your majesty.”

“How did they get out?”

“They come through the wall, sire.”

“Through? Through the wall?”

“Aye, never seen the like!” Her measured tones rose in youthful bewilderment. She obviously forgot for the moment to whom she spoke. “Sappers should’ve been digging half the night just to reach ‘em!”

“It was Ursith!” A dwarf spoke up from a pallet. “He grabbed me arm an’ next thing I knew I was out here.”

“Aye,” chimed in another, sitting nearby. “I saw him dive through th’ wall. We allus knew he wasn’ natural!”

“Is there anyone left inside?” Thorin demanded.

“No, your majesty,” said the healer. “The dam we’re working on now’s the worst of ‘em.”

“Thank you. Please return to your duties.”

Cemnesta glided over to Oin, offering his services.
Bofur extracted himself from the chaos and approached, Jani went to him immediately.

“How’s it look?”

“The walls went,” said Bofur, pale beneath his dirty face. “But the floor didn’t fall, an’ that’s what saved ‘em, else they’d still be fallin’. Pit’s a total loss.”

Ori grabbed his arm, already on the verge of hyperventilating.

Nori!

“Where is he?”

“Dunno,” Bofur said under his breath. “I can’t leave here t’ look, neither. I know he’s alive, but he could be down in the mine, passed out.”

Ori tried to think where Nori would go and how fast he could move. The answers to that were: anyplace and very, very fast. But after pulling a stunt like this, he was bound to be tired, wasn’t he? Ori had no idea what kind of energy it took to do what Nori did.

Quartz winged through the passage and landed on Ori’s shoulder, addressing Bofur.

“Go home,” said the raven.

Bofur said “I can’t-“

“Go. Home.” Quartz flapped a wing. “Go on. Shoo!”

Thorin snorted.

“I believe his highness has dismissed you, m’lord.”

“But.”

Jani smacked his arm.

“I’ve got this, cram brain. Get outta here.”

“What’re ya gonna do?”

“Oh, I dunno. The mine engineers and sappers are all here. I thought I’d put in a half-bath. Lovely?”

Dis hooked her arm through Bofur’s.

“Come along, Lord Bofur. Don’t make the ravens peck you.”

“Don’t make me peck you,” Jani muttered.

Thorin looked over his shoulder at Ori.

“Dwalin,” said Thorin calmly, “please take Ori wherever he feels it’s best he go.”

“Aye, yer majesty. Arb! Yer up.”

“So are we,” Fili announced with a glance back to Kili, Tauriel, Gimli, and Legolas. The four gave sharp nods and moved forward, ready to work.
“Thorin,” Bilbo called. “Do you need me?”

“Always, ghivasha, but I think right now Ori needs you more.”

Dwalin grabbed up Bofur and Ori and Dwalin sent their rams galloping homeward, Bilbo and Dis following behind. They skidded to a stop in the courtyard and Ori leapt off as Gib jumped forward to handle Grinder.

Ori scrambled for the front door, Bofur hot on his heels.

“In yer privy, pukin’ his guts out,” Durin helped.

Ori arrived to find Balin holding towels outside the privy’s threshold. Ori heard Nori groan.

“Easy, me love,” Bofur crooned, pushing past Balin. Ori looked in. Nori was leaning over the privy, Aragorn had one hand full of Nori’s hair and the other around his waist, holding him up. Celeborn stood on the other side gingerly holding Nori’s beard.

Nori got back on his feet with Bofur’s and Aragorn’s help. Balin silently handed over a wet facecloth and Bofur took his husband in hand.

“You alright, Nori?” Ori asked.

“Ugh! ‘M doin’, Chick. Remind me never t’ do that shit that fast ‘gain. Bugger, all tha’ lovely cookin’ o’ Missus Gard’n’r.”

Ori remembered Nori returning home from three day benders, hungover, beaten up, bleeding and staggering.

He had never seen Nori look two inches from dead.

“Lead the way,” Boromir arrived and scooped Nori up.

Nori sighed.

Bofur and Aragorn assisted him in taking Nori through to the kitchen.

Bofur set the kitchen chair next to where Aragorn and Boromir stripped Nori to the waist, Ellodan started using a cloth wetted with a little rubbing alcohol and, with Galadriel’s and Arwen’s help, soon had half Nori’s face tattoos wiped away.

“’M fine,” Nori grumbled, as he finally manage to sit.

“He certainly will be,” Dori said, her house shoes pattering in from the pantry, Elrond, Bilbo, and Lindir in tow. Dori was stirring something in a glass.

“Drink this, you silly billy goat.”

Dori’s words were scolding, but her tone gentle as she held the glass to Nori’s lips and patted his back as he drank the blueish milky stuff down. Elrond laid a pale hand on Nori’s shoulder, frowning. Nori sighed then gave Dori a saucy grin.

“Not bad, our Dor,” “Tummy better?”

“Is now,“

They knocked brows gently. Elrond shrugged to Lindir, who rolled his eyes.

“Nori,” Ori interrupted quickly before Dori decided to lecture. “We’ve got to start damage control right now.”

“Why?” Nori demanded.

“You, I mean, Ursith, was seen rescuing people. He was noticed dragging someone free then disappearing back into the wall.”

“Shit,” Nori opined, then patted Bofur’s shoulder. “Hey, our Bo.”

Bofur nearly knocked him over just hugging him, then pulled back, horrified.

“What happened? You’re all… thin like.”

Granny Klak nodded, as she came through. “That’s just what I said.”

“He looks th’ same t’ me,” Dwalin noted, while he put the cleaning bowls and cloths in the sink, before filling it from the boiling water spigot.

Ori hugged Nori.

“Hey, Chick.”

“Ta,” said Nori sourly.

“An’ his eyes’re lighter!” Bofur said, clutching Nori by the shoulder.

“They are!” Ori shouted.

Nori winced.

“Chick, I’m right here.”

Ori turned to Dori and said, “Dori, you have to spill over more and put them back.”

Dori rested a hand over her belly.

“I’m a little busy right now, pet. I think most of my energy goes into these two.”

“An’ spittin’ on beads,” said Nori. “Don’t worry, Chick. I’m fine. At least, I won’t get away wifout Oin pokin’ me in all me bits.”

Granny Klak rubbed Ori’s shoulder.

“Not to worry, my love. There’s other ways to build him back up.”

Nori grinned excitedly.
“They wouldn’t involve food, would they?”

Balin and Bofur exchanged amused glances.

“Aye, he’s fine,” Balin chuckled.

They were in the sitting room and Dori was bringing through tea when Thorin and the rest arrived.

“Nori,” said Thorin.

“I’m—” Nori began, rising to his feet.

“Are you alright?” Thorin asked, coming forward.

“Huh? Oh, aye, aye, came home, barfed, gonna drink tea. All good.”

Thorin sighed then clasped Nori’s shoulders and touched his brow to Nori’s.

“Don’t you ever do that again without help.”

“Yessir, but, um, not like I had time t’ ask ’r nuffin’.”

Thorin waved for everyone to seat themselves, then took a chair wide enough for Bilbo to squirm in beside him. Thorin nodded to Ori, who dropped down on the footstool to the right of the king. Dwalin drew up Ori’s desk chair and sat behind Ori. Dori made sure everyone had tea and, at least, a biscuit before curling up on Balin’s lap in the pink chair, once more just behind and to the left of the King.

“Nori,” Thorin opened the discussion. “As Ori’s already informed you—"

“How’d you know that?” Nori asked with his mouth full.

“You’re talking about my scribe and the Scribe of Mahal, Nori.” Thorin lifted a teasing eyebrow.

“Crud,” Nori said and shoved his third biscuit into his mouth.

Ori blushed, but kept talking notes.

“We need to decide how Ursith and I are going to smooth through this,” Thorin continued.

“Nori…er…Ursith was nice to my ‘Gondorian pals’ and wants you to like him?” Ori offered.

“Nice?” Boromir laughed. “We beat his britches off.”

“I’m not Gondorian,” Eowyn put in.

“Let’s go with the current story, dears,” Dis said and shook her finger at the pair.

“Neither Eowyn nor Boromir meant to cause you difficulties,” Aragorn put in.

“I know,” said Thorin. “Nori has mentioned that it would be a good idea for Ursith to be able to report to the crown somehow.”

“A gambling incident with a Gondorian and a Rohirrim will not serve to turn such as Ursith to good works,” observed Elrond.
“Ursith wants to build his casino,” Elladan said.

“Urisith wants to go straight and have a royal casino,” Elrohir added.

Nori’s eyes glowed.

“Me casino!”

“That,” smiled Thorin, “will do nicely.”

“Aye, “ agreed Nori with a wicked grin. “Anythin’ else comes up we’ll find a way t’ blame it on th’ Bearer!”

Dori smacked him.

Ori fell back against the bed. His hand was cramped from writing and it was far past midnight. Dwalin got into the bed beside him, took Ori’s sore hand, and wrapped it in a bulky cloth. Ori sighed as the coolness from the ice chips folded into the cloth soothed the pain.

“That’s wonderful,” Ori murmured. Dwalin put an old leather glove over Ori’s hand and settled beside him. Killer snuggled up into the small of Dwalin’s back and Nori-Pori curled up on the pillows. Mask folded his furry face in half with a yawn and burrowed into the covers near Ori’s stomach.

“Yeh get yer rest, love,” Dwalin said, as he lay down, spooned against Ori’s back. “Yeh bin busier than yeh should ha’.”

Ori giggled.

“You know, I remember Nori talking about a casino when I was just a badger.”

“If he kin make it work, our nuisance’ll rule th’ underworld fra here t th’ Dale an’ beyond.”

“If anyone can do it, Nori can,” Ori stated sleepily as his husband and their ravens chuckled.
Guests gone, Goals, and Gambling dens.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Oh, Nori what are you up to this time? Nuffin’! Absolutely nuffin’! I swear! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next morning, which was the first work day, Mistress Dazla informed them over breakfast that most places of business were closed. When Ori questioned this, Dori merely laughed and said Thorin’s open court days were already the stuff of legend.

Bard arrived for breakfast promptly at the seventh bell.

Bilbo grinned up at him.

“A man after my own heart,” he said.

“I could smell the pancakes from Dale,” said Bard.

As they sat, stuffing their faces with cakes and syrup, Galadriel and Celeborn announced that they must take their leave. Dori looked as though she was going to pout.

“Now, my Dori,” said Galadriel, “we’ll be back before Durin’s Day. You know we wouldn’t miss that.”

Kelli clunked in agreement.

Dori only sighed gustily instead and asked what sweets and such would Galadriel like to take with her.

“At least fortify yourself before you blink out or zap or pop or beam or whatever elves call it,” said Dori.

“I think I’ll have at least thirds before I zap,” Galadriel promised.

“Zap,” said Celeborn, chuckling.

Aragorn and Arwen agreed it was time for them to return to Gondor as well and they would be leaving the day after tomorrow.

“I’ve promised to help Lavender pack,” said Arwen. “And we’re spending some time with Bell, too. She’s a rock, but even she’s having some trouble with her daughter going off so far away with odd strangers.”

Bilbo sneered into his tea.

“As opposed to staying here with odd strangers?” he asked, wiping his damp chin.

“You’re not joining us for Open Court?” Thorin teased.

Aragorn choked and glanced at Nori, who looked none the worse for his adventures and was eating with gusto.

“I don’t think I want to lay eyes on Ursith while he asks you for his casino,” said Aragorn. “I doubt I’d be able to remain serious. I’ve seen the wig Ursith wears and I don’t think I could be in the same room with him.”

“I know I couldn’t,” Arwen giggled. “Honestly, Nori, not to cast aspersions on your hair color, but that wig looked like the ugliest basket in all Arda. Where did you find it?”

“Made it,” Nori said proudly around a mouthful of egg.

Arwen and Aragorn looked at each other then went off into peals of laughter.

“Oi!” Nori objected.

Ulfr and Yizaris breezed in.

“Mornin’ all,” Ulfr barked.
His grin made Ori worry.
“Yizaris, Ulfr,” said Thorin, raising his cup in greeting.
“Thorin—” Ulfr began, but Dori shorted him out by greeting the queen and inviting them to seat themselves and eat.
“Er…Yes, thank yeh, Bearer,” he said, before turning back to the king. “Thorin I’ve go’ a proposition f’r yeh.”
“I’m sorry, Ulfr, but I’m betrothed to Professor Baggins.”
Ulfr choked, Yizaris snickered, then Ulfr recovered and brayed with laughter.
“Aye, an’ congratulations t’ both a’ yeh. No, no, I’ve had an idea.”
“You terrify me,” Thorin teased.
“Arsehole, listen. How would yeh feel abou’ me Arne staying with yeh a bit longer? He’s enjoyin’ th’ library an’ his work there. Me Yizaris had a long chat with him an’ Master Nodun at th’ party last night an’ he’s doin’ great work with her. Be a pity t’ take him off now.”
“Indeed it would,” Thorin agreed. “We would be delighted if he was willing to stay. Why does that engender the word proposition?”
“I’d like t’ take tha’ Buer lad back with me. Tha’ badger’s a bleedin’ genius. Mahal’s hairy balls, th’ thin’s I could start tha’ lad with. He jus’ runs with anythin’. Go’ a brain like a lit fuse, tha’ one.”
Ori hoped silently that Buer’s brain would not explode in the excitement of Ulfr’s invitation. Then he realized Ulfr’s brain was more likely to explode and Buer would find away to put him back together, so instead of having a mechanical leg like Dain, Ulfr would have a mechanical head. Ori’s own brain provided a helpful sketch of how that would look.
Thorin sat back in his chair and regarded Ulfr thoughtfully.
“That would be for young Buer to decide. If he wishes to accompany you and be your apprentice—”
“Bollocks!” Ulfr grunted. “Th’ lad’s practically a master in anythin’ he turns his hand t’. I’d be callin’ him a colleague.”
“As a colleague then,” Thorin went on, “it is still his decision.”
Roäc hopped down from Thorin’s shoulder and took the piece of bacon Thorin offered him.
“I’ll go hunt him up,” the raven said and flew off.
“Thank you,” murmured Thorin.
Ulfr watched him go.
“Thorin, I swear tha’ Roäc jus’ ain’t natural sometimes.”
“The ravens are the messenger of Mahal,” Thorin replied simply. “What is more natural than that?”
Ulfr swung round and peered at Ori.
“Yer th’ Scribe a’ Mahal, I hear. Them birds talk t’ yeh ‘bout thin’s?”
Ori turned to look at Quartz, perching on the back of his chair. Quartz winked at him. Ori winked back then looked at Ulfr.
“Every day, your majesty.”
Yizaris nudged Ulfr’s elbow.
“Maybe if you didn’t spend so much time in your lab, then come out stinking of Mahal knows what chemicals, the ravens might talk to you once in a while.”
Ulfr frowned, considering, then went back to his meal, pausing only to swing a fist as Dain and Sculdis entered and Dain patted him on the head.
Dain and Sculdis were dressed for travel.
Dain smooched Dori’s cheek.
“Sorry, me dumplin’, bu’ I’m afraid it’s time we ge’ back home, see wha’ our lads lef’ a’ me kingdom.”
Dori huffed indignantly.
“Really? You’re going, too? This is just too much!”
And she burst into tears.
“Awwwwww, now, dumplin’,” said Dain, hugging her. “We’ll be back soon. Whether me royal “I’ve never had any say in the matter,” said Thorin with a grin. “But, you’re going to miss open court, too!”

“Aye, well, Lady G’s offered t’ drop us home. An’ I seen th’ braidin’. Sides, I’ve go’ no fancy clothes t’ impress the folks a’ court. Yeh know I li’e t’ make a good showin’.”

“Oh,” said Thorin, “so that’s what you call it.”

Dori abruptly stopped crying and took charge.

“You’re not going anywhere without a good breakfast. Sit, sit, sit! I’ll see what else we have in the larder.”

She swept out.

“King Ulfr,” said Bilbo, “what did you mean when you said you and I were related?”

“Heh, well,” said Ulfr, pointedly ignoring Dain who was bent on annoying him, “it’s no’ li’e Ironfists pay a ton a’ attention t’ anythin’ neither chemistry nor engineerin’, bu’ when I go’ Thorin’s letter abou’ the Fallohides, I wen’ on a expedition through th’ archives an’, yep, there they were, lurkin’ in th’ side passages a’ th’ old family mine. Turns ou’, no’ all them hobbitish folk went wes’ to th’ Shire after all.”

“Ah-hah!” Bilbo cried. “Welcome to the family, Cousin Ulfr!”

Balin regarded them skeptically.

“These are hobbits we’re talking about, Balin,” said Bilbo. “As these things go, King Ulfr and I are practically twins. Queen Yizaris, please remind me to add you to my Yule card list.”

“Of course, Professor Baggins,” she said, inclining her head regally with a giggle.

Buer arrived and Ori watched a bizarre transformation take place.

Ulfr was at least three times as enthusiastic than he had been the night before, in fact, was nearly jumping around Buer like a happy puppy. The two of them came to an agreement instantly, and then went on to talk business.

“... lights,” Ulfr said.

“Oh, those,” said Buer. “I’ve been working on making them really, really small, like match head sized, but I think I could extrapolate and do exactly the opposite, too.”

“What’ d’ye have in mind?” Ulfr asked.

“I was thinking I’d try to replicate the brilliance of the sun.”

“A’ course yeh were,” Ulfr praised.

Ori sat with Bard and Thorin at the table as they went through the dockets of that morning’s open court.

The morning petitioning time was booked ahead, blocked, and limited, so the king could be briefed ahead of time, and because tempers were likely to flair or arguments to drone on. Afternoons were held open, petitioners arriving early to give Brur their names and a brief idea of what they wanted. Brur passed a copy to Balin. Another copy went to Arne, marked for him to do any quick research.

“Ori,” said Thorin, “you know you don’t have to do the scrivening for open court. You are working on other projects.”

“And miss being the scribe to record your betrothal announcement?” Ori raised an eyebrow.

“Seriously? I love my colleagues, Thorin, but I wouldn’t give up this assignment for all the emeralds in Arda.”

“Forgive me, m’lord,” said Thorin. “I didn’t think before I spoke.”

“Just don’t let it happen again,” Ori sniffed.

They looked at each other Ori giggled and blushed and Thorin chuckled.

“Finish your tea, Lord Ori, you have a mighty task before you.”

“Yes, your majesty,” said Ori and did so.

Ori turned to Queen Yizaris, who lingered over her own tea.

“Your majesty, may I speak with you in private?”
She gave him a mysterious smile.
“I had a feeling you would ask.  Let’s top off this excellent cuppa and I am all yours, however briefly.”

Ori’s office had become much more an office and much less a closet recently.  He was able to offer the queen a chair that matched the other chair at his work table, and didn’t even have to move supplies of ink and paper for her to sit in.

“Does Arne know, ma’am?” Ori asked.

“Yes, and I haven’t seen him this happy since he received his scrivening apprenticeship.”

“But, Ulfr is almost replacing him with Buer, even if it’s only for a little while.  I mean, Arne is the crown prince.”

Yizaris ran a light finger around the rim of her teacup.

“And he will always be a prince, Ori, forgive me for plain speaking, but, Arne will never sit on the throne of the Ironfists.  He and I both know it.  The way things are right now, his own family would eat him alive.  He’s a diplomat, a servant to warriors, but not a warrior himself.  His sister, however, I’ve been able to encourage in her natural… crustiness.  Ulfr doesn’t know it, but I have every intention of shoving Zaris and Buer together as often as possible.”

“You’re not concerned with Buer being harmed?”

“Buer is dangerously close to being a force of nature all on his own.  I think his influence on the court could only be a good thing.  And, should he get out of line, Zaris would happily smack him back into it.  It’s all conjecture right now, of course, but at any rate, Arne will be here, happy and safe.” She sipped delicately.  “Then he can get married.”

Ori eyed her.

She laughed.

“Ulfr is the clueless one, m’lord.  My Arne could do far worse than a master scribe and a master of the sensual pleasures.  His mind and body will be quite satisfied, as well as his spirit.”

“And when King Ulfr does find out?”

“He’ll do what he always does.  He’ll rage and bluster, then get over it.  It’s one of his better qualities.”

Ori swallowed as he proceeded with the royal family and their guests through a doorway to the right of the dais and into the crowded throne room.  It looked like nearly as many people had squeezed into the room as for the coronation, though they were not as formally dressed, which was not to say they dressed soberly.  Open court had become quite a social and exciting special occasion.

Dwarrow, men, elves and hobbits of all stations and from all over the mountain and Dale, mingled casually under the watch of a detail of Dwalin’s soldiers.  Standing on the lower right platform of the dais, Targ caught Ori’s eye and winked at him.

Ori grinned back and looked around.

Binni had been busy with the decorations.

There were even more couches in the galleries above and around the edge of the room and the Durin blue bunting of the coronation had given way to velvet swags of rust and red, colors picked out from the upholstery, as a nod to the waning summer.  The swamp maples out in Dale had begun to turn.

Even Ori’s desk, to the left of the throne, had not escaped a swaddling of cloth around the pedestal, and the throne itself sported new throw pillows.  Several warg-sized cushions lay on the floor around it.

The wargs sat bracketing Thorin.  They drew wary attention from the assembly, but no one outright panicked at the sight of them.  Butter and Sugar for their part sat still, their heads even with the king’s.  It would be impossible to pass them off as anything but wargs, even with their matching blue collars, but they watched the goings on placidly enough.

Thorin scratched each warg behind the ears.

“See, my damlings?  Idad Binni takes good care of you.  No cold stone for you.”
“Nice material,” said Dis.
“Namad,” Thorin chided with a grin. The tails wagged in unison. Butter bent her head to lick his hand, and a murmur flooded the crowd as Thorin idly played with one white fang.
Ori turned to Dwalin quizzically.
“Th’ curtains from Frerin’s old chambers,” said Dwalin. “Pity t’ waste ‘em.”
Dis snickered.
“There are still some left if Thranduil wants to make himself some pajamas.”
Thranduil had already arrived, Bard having said something earlier about him waiting for delivery from Dipfa. Bard was now at his side.
Ori mentally face palmed. In dressing elven nobility, Dipfa had found enthusiastic patrons.
Thranduil wore a pale blue sheath under a long-sleeved, open surcoat of overlapping alternate layers of slightly darker blue beaded fringe and silver bells. Smaller bells and chains draped his birch twig hair ornaments.
Ori thought he looked like an icicle. And how would he comfortably sit on all those bells? Unless, like Lady Galadriel, he never quite touched the ground. He wondered if Thranduil’s arse would float just above the cushion of the chair and made a mental note to ask.
Beside the king father, Bard looked positively sober. He wore what Dipfa called a frock coat of deep pine green, over a snowy white shirt and tan trousers tucked into brown leather boots. As he strolled and stood next to Thrandui, Ori thought the trousers must be rather more snug than Bard was used to. The man looked distracted by them, and so did Thranduil.
Bujni, Omi and Loli worked in the galleries, sketching and recording comments. Ori could not look directly at Bujni, who wore under his open scribe robe, a tunic, leggings and boots entirely encrusted with jet and sapphire beads, dusted with diamonds and moonstones. The entire suit must have weighed a hundred pounds. Dipfa flitted about on the main floor in a long, conical poncho of concentric circles of citrine, carnelian and yellow amber; the low hem at her ankles kept its circular shape by virtue of a hoop. Ori reflected she had a thing about looking like a bell. With her hands stuck through slits built into the front of the poncho, she wielded a sketchbook of her own. She stopped periodically, looked over some dwarf or dam in a striking outfit, and sketched madly before going on to the next unsuspecting subject. Ori realized she was making notes of various styles of clothes and hair.
Doubtless he would be seeing her handiwork in a coming issue of Vug.
“Not so much an open court as a fashion show,” said Thorin merrily. “My grandfather would blow a vein.”
“I may blow a vein,” said Ori. “Look.”
Vi and Margr entered, one on each of Glorfindel’s arms, though he was somewhat obscured by their court clothes, which appeared to be entirely made of silk ribbon, all in the form of bows. There were rings upon rings of large bows attached together to make their voluminous skirts. Slightly smaller bows edged the sweeping hems at mid-calf and girded their middles as belts. A third size of bows provided their fitted blouses, with small capes of bows over their shoulders, and the sleeves were puffed caps in the hobbitish way, ringing their brawny biceps. Hundred of tiny bows studded their upswept hair, and their beards were caught up in long braids, punctuated every inch with bow-shaped gems. Each of their diamanté-covered boots bore a black leather bow.
Vi wore primarily shades of orange and Margr shades of blue. As far as Ori could tell, no two bows were exactly the same shade and the vibrations of the warring colors seemed to cast an aura around them.
Glorfindel, perhaps seized by the spirit of the occasion, wore one large, jaunty scarlet bow around his neck. He looked like the largest, proudest lapdog who ever lived.
“Mahal wept,” Thorin gasped.
“I wouldn’t be at all surprised,” said Ori.
“Can’t, ’m bloody struck blind,” muttered the hot boom in the back of Ori’s head.
They could hear the sisters receiving compliments and replying in kind, while Dipfa practically danced with glee. It was obvious from their comments that Dipfa was the perpetrator.
Dipfa’s just founded her own atelier,” Ori said. “She’s taken her first apprentice and she’s much in demand.”

“No coal dust gathering on her,” said Thorin. “It doesn’t cut into Mahrdin’s business? Wait. What am I saying? It’s not like she attracts the same sort of customer, is it?”

“Bilbo says he can’t wait to see what she comes up with for Harvest masquerade.”

“Looks like she’s already practicing,” said Thorin, “though I don’t suppose I’m the best judge of fashion.”

Ori stared at him.

“Alright,” Thorin conceded. “I’m no judge of fashion at all. Unless East Dale assassins are suddenly fashionable.”

“I’m feeling rather drab at the moment myself,” said Ori.

“I know Vi and Margr are doing well for themselves,” said Thorin, “but I never imagined they’d invest in high fashion.”

“Nor did I. They’re still startled to have enough money to hire a scribe to read and write letters for them. I used to do both for no more than a copper, and that was if I thought the person could even afford that. Dipfa?”

The designer turned in her wandering and ran up to Ori and Thorin in rapture and bowed.

“M’lord! Your majesty! Don’t they look incredible? Of course, I had confidence in my design, but they simply bring my creations to life!”

Thorin gave her a genuine, fond smile.

“Well done, Master Dipfa. And, I understand congratulations are in order? Your own atelier is quite an achievement.”

“Oooo! Thank you, your majesty!” she piped. “I’ve been planning and saving my whole life for this.”

“Are Vi and Margr working for you?” he asked.

“Not as such. They are the best models I could wish for, though. They carry off the fashions in such a bold spirit. I lend them the prototypes to wear out in public. They come back and tell me how people react and whether I need to make adjustments to the patterns, and then they keep the test pieces if they like them.”

Ori was impressed.

“So, this isn’t commission work? You’re going forward with the ready to wear lines?”

“Yes! And I’m so, so nervous, yet so, so excited. Think how the bold and subtle colors of the clothes and the hues of nature will resonate! At the same time, the new lights invented by King Ulfr completely alter the look of the same colors! You have two different hues just between candlelight and touch lights, and a third just by going out under the sun! Mahal bless me, but it’s opened my mind to so many new possibilities that I can hardly sleep for ideas!”

A young dam with a wide, pale face and straw-colored beard and a notebook of her own, padded up shyly.

Dipfa turned and gave her a fond look.

“This is my apprentice, Miss Grk. Miss Grk, this is King Thorin, and this is Lord Ori.”

The dam’s round mouth drew up rounder into a silent ‘Oh!’

She wore a hat - Ori hoped it was a hat - of raw, pale white silk. It sat like a fat sack on her head, with a sort of twisted stalk at the top. Her dress widened out alarmingly under her breasts, and then gathered sharply just above the ankles. It was the same color and texture as the hat. Ori thought she looked like two bulbs of garlic, one slightly smaller and atop the other.

Yet, somehow, she managed a bow.

“An honor, your majesty, m’lord.”

She had a tiny, breathy voice, as if she were conveying a secret.

“The honor is ours, Miss Grk,” Thorin assured her.

“Master Dipfa,” Miss Grk urged, “I believe there is an issue with Lord Bujni’s tunic.”

“Oh!” Dipfa turned to look up at the gallery, then turned back. “We must beg leave, your majesty. My beloved Bu requires my assistance. He’s forgotten to flip the switch.”
“The switch?” Thorin asked.
“Something I was working on with Buer. He’s a genius, isn’t he?”
They bowed again and were gone.

Ori watched Dipfa zipping through the crowd, which largely gave way as she sped by, probably wondering exactly what she was. An upsidedown orange tornado, perhaps? Grk followed placidly in her wake.

Dwalin appeared at Ori’s elbow.
“D’ I wan’ t’ know how our Dipfa even climbs th’ stairs in tha’ ge’up?”
Thorin smirked at him.
“Why don’t you go and ask? Don’t worry, we’ll wait.”
“At th’ rate she talks? Yeh’ll be waitin’ ’til next res’ day.”

The Durins and their friends watched as she popped up in the gallery and somehow slipped through the crowd. Bujni turned to her, smiling, as she spoke urgently and seemed to adjust the back of his tunic beneath his scribe’s hood.

The clear gems on his clothing flickered on and off in a continuous random pattern of twinkling lights.

“Oh,” said Thorin.
It seemed to sum up everything nicely.

Elrond looked up at the couple in dismay. He seemed on the verge of speaking several times, then gave up.

“Yes,” said Thranduil, as if reading his mind. “Who needs the Two Trees when we have the sun and moon right up there.”

Legolas looked over his shoulder with a grin.
“Fitting, Adad, as you look like a stream flowing through new-fallen snow.”

Lindir muttered, “And everyone is always saying that I’m flakey.”

“Ouch!” Elladan cried.

“One for our Lindir!” Elrohir agreed.

Tilda ran up all excitement, Bain chasing her doggedly, warning her to stop and wait for him.

Under her emerald pinafore with large pockets all about the waistline, Tilda wore a fancy jumpsuit of pine green, matching Bard’s coat, and the whole of her outfit was studded with amethysts in swirling patterns, matching the color of her boots and, not so coincidentally, her boot knife. As she stopped next to Thranduil and Bard, Ori thought she looked like a bramble bush in a woodland setting.

“Adanana!” she cried up at Thranduil. “You look so pretty!”

“As do you, my Monster Child. Shall we?”

“Let us proceed.”

“Princess Tilda Bardsdatter,” she said solemnly. Carefully, she curtseyed.

“King-Father Thranduil Oropherson,” he intoned, and bowed.

“Excellent,” he said when she straightened.

“I didn’t even fall on my bum that time!” she enthused.

Thranduil continued as if he hadn’t heard, though the corner of his mouth quirked rebelliously.

“And now?” Thranduil prompted.

“Oh! That’s right!” She put her hand over her heart and bowed in the elvish way. “Mae Govannen.”

“Mae Govannen. Very nice. And now?”

She bowed in the dwarfish way and said, “Tilda, daughter of Mathilde, daughter of Skia, at your service.”

He returned her bow and said,

“Thranduil, son of Oropher, at yours and your families.”

“Did I do it right?” she asked Ori, in a quite audible aside.
“Perfect, Til,” said Ori.
“I wonder what hobbits do when they meet?” Tilda mused. “Besides hug and invite each other to tea, I mean.”
“I don’t think they do that to complete strangers, Til,” said Ori. “You’ll have to ask Professor Baggins.”
“Good idea! Where is he?”
Thorin said, “He’ll be here after the lunch break, Tilda. He’s frosting the cake he and Dori made.”
“I’ll have to remember, then. Da, don’t let me forget.”
Lindir unexpectedly turned to her.
“You don’t have your book, princess?”
“Oh! I do! Thank you, Mister Lindir!”
She pulled a smaller version of Lindir’s schedule book from her pocket and slid the tiny graphite wand from the pouch on its side, flipped open the book with practiced ease and made her note, snapped the book closed efficiently, replaced her graphite wand and the whole of it went back into her pocket.
“All sorted,” she said briskly.
Ori, nonplussed, looked over at Dwalin, who had his hand across his mouth and cultivated a pondering air.
“Ah, I see Binni arranged that prettily,” said Dori, of the throne platform as Balin escorted her up to the royal crowd at the vestibule.
Instantly, every head turned and the chatter fell silent.
The assembled witnesses and petitioners bowed,
“Well!” Dori cried. “Aren’t you sweethearts! Blessings on you!”
When they straightened again, Ori saw many of them looked dazedly happy.
Thorin took stock of the room.
“Master Brur?”
His voice carried across the silent room, to Brur at the door.
“Aye, yer majesty. Ready.”
“Then let the games begin.”
Ori would never get used to being announced, by Master Brur or anyone else.
But particularly by Master Brur.
“Lord Ori a’ th’ House a’ Fundin, Firs’ Chair a’ th’ Guild a’ Scribes.”
Happily, this wasn’t the coronation, so the list of titles was brief, and he wore court robes, but they were his own, and without the weight of the entire history of dwarrow attached. True, Dipfa had gone a little far with the cut gems and embroidery, but at least he didn’t look like a celestial body.
As he arranged his tools on the desk, Master Brur announced the guests.
“King-Father Thranduil Oropheron, late a’ Greenwood, an’ King Bard a’ Dale, accompanied by Bain, prince a’ Dale, an’ Tilda, princess a’ Dale.”
They climbed the steps and arranged themselves on Binni’s comfy furniture.
“Lady Dori, Bearer of Erebor, and Lord Balin of Fundin-“
The rest of Brur’s introduction drowned out under the cheers of the crowd.
Ori looked at Dori again. Here, on the dais, with the torches throwing light about the room, Dori looked like an allegory of Spring. The mithril hair was left long and loose but for a few pins of peridot leaves. About Dori’s shoulders bright white lace foamed like a line of clouds. From this fell innumerable pale mint green satin ribbons to the floor. Dori’s wrists and ankles were encircled with mithril bangles touched with sparks of peridot. There with mithril rings with peridot on Dori’s fingers and toes. When Dori moved, all the ribbons fluttered about his legs and hints of creamy skin showed.
Once they were comfortably seated, Brur bellowed out.
“His royal majesty, King Thorin II, and her highness Dis, princess royal.”
Everyone rose and bowed low as Thorin walked arm in arm with Dis up to the dais. Ori felt terribly proud to be a dwarf. What a magnificent king Thorin was! He was as always simply dressed, but the new crown shone in the golden light and the pommel of Orcrist sparkled at his shoulder. Dis, cultivating her own house colors now, wore a deep purple gown, edged in Durin blue, Rutile waving from her fan-like crown.

Thorin seated her among the guests. He unbuckled Orcrist and took the throne, laying the sheathed sword across his knees. Butter lay down directly, but Sugar went round back of the throne, and Ori heard water being lapped. Then Sugar returned, licking her jaws, and plumped down on the side opposite Butter, sighing contentedly.

Roac wafted down from the heights to perch on the back of the throne, preening.

And, damned if Binni hadn’t been right all along. Thorin didn’t look decadent, as Ori had feared, but rather like a portrait of himself. Ori felt electricity shoot through him. He finally had the right setting for the royal portrait! He owed Binni a batch of cookies!

Thorin held up his hand, everyone settled and silence fell. Ori felt the shiver of excitement go through everyone present. Thorin declare the Court of Erebor open to announcements and petitions.

Thorin gestured to Balin, who stepped forward.

“Lords, Ladies, Bearers an’ all youth, it’s me pleasure t’ inform yeh, as requested by our neighbors the Lord and Lady a’ th’ Golden Wood, tha’ they’re expectin’ their second…er..fawn.”

This brought a bellow of congratulations, applause, and cheers.

“The nobles of the noble couple,” said Thorin, “I thank you, and will convey your congratulations.”

“Next,” Balin said when the noise died down again. “On behalf of the Firs’ Chair Lord Ori an’ th’ Masters a’ th’ Scribe Guild, th’ Guild Hall has been renovated an’ will be dedicated on th’ next new moon. All are invited to bear witness.”

Thorin, his face flushed and exuberant, stated, “Refreshments will be served.”

“Another, much louder round of applause and noise resulted.”

Balin continued.

“On th’ second rest day a’ Second Harvest, everyone’s invited t’ join the Royal family in celebratin’ th’ birthdays a’ our Professor Baggins an’ his nephew, Frodo, lord of the muffins.”

Ori blushed and bowed to his guild heads, who beamed at him.

“The hubbub of excitement started and it didn’t quieten until Thorin called everyone to order.

“More details will be made available closer t’ th’ time,” Balin continued. “King Thorin and King
Bard announce that Captain Haldir, Princess Eowyn, the White Lady of Rohan, Captain Omosuil an’ his squad will be trainin’ an’ takin’ patrol duty with our own soldiers an’ those a’ Dale. You may seek them in their capacity as part a’ our guard.”

Someone in the gallery cried, “We’ll know where t’ find Captain Haldir righ’ enough!”

“Thank yeh,” said Balin. “Movin’ on.”

Balin then took the dockets out of one of his robe’s copious pockets and summoned the first petitioners. There were several who had been scheduled in.

“Master Sindris, daughter a’ Sindri, head a’ th’ volcanics guild,” Brur announced from the front entrance of the throne room.

Sindris was a remarkably young dam, largely Firebeard in blood, as were many in the guild.
Distantly related to Gloin through her amad’s family, she looked disconcertingly like Gimli with breasts. Her breasts were obvious because, like many in her guild, she wore very little when she wasn’t actually working with lava, and not much more when she was. As was traditional to the guild, the hair on her head and her beard were burned short, and she had very little hair on her body, so her permanently bronzed skin showed great swaths of red, orange and black tattoos, all prayers to Mahal.

She approached the foot of the dais and bowed to Thorin.

“Master Sindris, always a pleasure,” said Thorin with a grin.

“Aye, likewise. Yer majesty, it’s time t’ bleed th’ mountain again. Bin lookin’ at th’ records.
Seismic activity’s risin’, an’ tha’ mine cave-in wouldn’t even a’ happened if th’ ground wasn’t already on th’ move. If anythin’, it means push’s come t’ shove.”
“Understood, Master Sindris. I take it you already have a plan in place.”
She nodded curtly.
“We know exactly where t’ star’ th’ reaction. Thin’ is, lava exit’s under th’ hemp fields on th’ north slope. Paper makers’ guild’s given us leave t’ take th’ whole crop a’ once, bu’ they us’ally only take an acre at a time, so we’ll need help. We want it ou’ smart-li’e. This week, b’fore rest day.”
“I’m on it!” Hamfast called from the gallery.
Not to be left behind, Master Hallow and Mistress Guernsia echoed this.
Bard said, “Hamfast already has volunteers from Dale and Erebor lined up to harvest our own crops. Hamfast, do you think they’d be interested in starting a little early?”
“How many folks d’ye think ye’ll need?”
“If we have abou’ a hundred more bodies, we kin take it down in a day,” said Sindris in a raised voice. “Brin’ yer own blades if yeh go’ em.”
Thorin nodded.
“As usual, Master Sindris, you have things well in hand. Will you please coordinate with Master Hamfast?”
“Aye. Ta, yer majesty.”
She bowed and moved smartly off to meet Hamfast as he clambered down from the gallery.
Sindris had been allotted ten minutes to speak. She had arrived alone to represent her guild and was in and out in less than five.
Next came the owner of iKeyha, Master Vidag, with a dozen of his subordinates and a legal team, all of whom were rather pissed with the owner of the space which iKeyha was using for the sap furniture creations in the Night Market.
Master Vidag wanted have the shop there days as well as nights, and expand his most highly successful venture to date. The owner of the day market stall didn’t want to give way to him, and the Central Market was already cramped, with no large enough spaces left to fill.
Master Vidag’s legal team gently explained the situation and politely asked for the king’s opinion.
At the king’s gesture, the owner of the space, a Master Hocid, stepped forward and graciously explained his need for the space and added most courteously that Master Vidag was getting too bloody big for his boots.
Master Vidag pushed aside his legal team and respectfully outlined that his business was the cutting edge of furniture fashion and Master Hocid kept his brain in his socks.
Master Hocid civilly suggested the owner of iKeyha kept all his taste in his skivvies and the sap furniture was a fad and an ugly one.
Master Vidag gently suggested that Master Hocid was what was ugly and a fad and should strongly consider shoving his head where the sun didn’t shine.
These genteel exchanges were dropped for the dwarfishly sophisticated decision making-manner of a bout of fisticuffs. Thorin leaned back, crossed one leg over the other, as the combatants rolled about the floor before the dais. Dwalin watched without interest. The legal team and Master Hocid’s clerks made book with the next petitioners.
Ori took notes and noticed out of the corner of his eye that Bard was becoming edgy. Thranduil bounced Tilda on his knee while they played some sort of clapping game. Bain looked bored. Ori turned a page and did a quick sketch as Master Vidag ripped out the seat of Master Hocid’s trousers after taking a head-butt to the shoulder.
Bard stood up and hollered, “You could just take a smaller space, then open a branch in Dale!”
The dwarrow halted in mid-tussle and stared at him.
“Oi!” Master Vidag cried. “I was savin’ me best punch f’r next!”
“Sucks to be you,” snapped Bard.
The dwarf chuckled.
“Aye, it does a’ tha’.”
“Look,” said Bard. “I have more empty warehouses than I will ever need, and because they housed what the Master thought was precious, they’re in great shape. You could have your pick of any of a number.”
The dwarrow disentangled themselves, staring at Bard.
“Yeh do know how t’ take th’ fun outa thin’s, don’t yeh,” said Hocid.
“It’s my job,” Bard acknowledged.
“No one’s even go’ a bloody nose!” Hocid complained.
“So, King Bard, yeh got anythin’ close by tha’ beauty palace racket?” Master Vidag asked hopefully.
“It’s possible,” said Bard.
“Righ’. Who d’ I talk t’ an’ when?”
Tilda, with her little book, said, “Da, you can meet him tomorrow at nine bell, right after breakfast.”
Bard gaped at her, recovered and said to the dwarf,
“Nine bell, tomorrow, at Dale Hall. Only, remember, I don’t have the room for brawling that you do here.”
“Righ’, no brawlin’.”
“I mean it. I have badgers.”
“Aye,” said Master Hocid, chuckling. “I kin see tha’.”
“Don’t worry, Da,” said Tilda. “I have my boot knife. And Idad Gloin taught me how to hamstring someone.”
The petitioners all grinned at her.
“Lass after me own heart,” said one. “Reminds me a’ me mam.”
After an appearance of a great deal of thought and throat clearing, Thorin managed, “Thank you, King Bard. Your help is greatly appreciated.”
“No worries,” said Bard, and he sat down, looking a little surprised at the instant ending of the fight.
The audience gave a rousing cheer as the guild members bowed to Bard and to Thorin and took their leave. Thrandui looked amused that Bard was receiving adulations and Ori glanced at Thorin. Under the cover of the racket, Ori raised a questioning eyebrow at his king. Thorin grinned evilly.
“I know very well when to use diplomacy and when to simply let Bard yell at people.”
“Especially when it’s funny?” Ori asked.
“Of course.”
Thorin nodded to Brur.
“Next!” Brur roared.
Ori glanced at his notes; the head of the weaving guild, Master Rokju, and the head of the forging guild, Master Hipuf.
These two came forward leading a group which included young Makhad and Miss Dahkr. They all bowed and the two heads of the guilds stepped forward with the proposal for the founding of a new sub guild that would be overseen by both guilds. This would be called the Gummy Sap guild.
Durin’s voice in Ori’s brain bounced along in rhyme:
"We represent the Gummy Sap guild
The Gummy Sap guild
The Gummy Sap guild.
And in the name of the Gummy Sap guuuuuuuuil-
"You’re an arse, Durin,” Ori muttered out of the side of his mouth.
“I know,” said Durin proudly.
“We’ll experiment, combining the sap with other materials,” said Master Hipuf, “which would in turn be used to develop new products and devices to ease the life of all in Erebor and Dale.”

One by one, the rest of the small group was introduced and each gave a short summary of what they were working on. As Makhad and Dahkr stepped forward and told about the bouncing mat they had made in the Night Market, they earned a round of applause from the audience and Ori noticed they had matching betrothal braids. Thorin noticed, too, and congratulated them. Dori jumped up and scampered over to bless them. They were almost overcome and the audience charmed.

Thorin asked the guild heads for the contract. Balin went and received it then brought it to Thorin, who inspected the two-foot-long scroll then gave it back to Balin.

“Lord Balin will peruse this. If he has any questions, he will contact you. When this process is finished, I will call on you to witness my signature of approval. Congratulations on the opening of your new guild, may it prosper with the blessing of Mahal.”

Thorin smiled on the soon-to-be new guild members, who were all but jumping and squealing at the thought. Master Hipuf and Master Rokju called them to order and they all bowed and moved away.

“Th guild o’ miners, th’ jewelers guild an’ the mithril masters.” Brur roared.

Ori sighed and readied a five-foot scroll and several graphite wands. He had been worrying about this one. Master Kir was rather frail and it didn’t look like there had been any preparation for arm wrestling.

Master Eyarn, grand master of the miners’ guild, stepped forth to explained why it was necessary for the mithril masters to work under the auspices of the mining guild. The jewelry guild master, Master Goyhr, approached to expound on how the mithril masters were traditionally part of the jewelry guild here in Erebor.

The six mithril masters remained suspiciously quiet through all of this, until a cranky old voice rang out.

“R yeh two badgers finished babblin’ over thin’s yeh know naught abou’?”

Kir hobbled forward on his sticks, supported by Fili.

“Listen, yeh idiots, th’ mithril masters’ve been stuck with th’ jewelers guild ‘cos mithril’d never been struck under this mountain before. We brought every ounce with us when we fled Khazad-dûm. Also, mithril’s mined like any other metal, an’ a mithril master’s only required once mithril’s taken ou’ a th’ ground.

He gestured at Goyhr and Eyarn with a stick.

“Even cram brains li’e yeh two kin do it.”

“Ooooooo!” the observers murmured.

“Minta rolled her eyes, exasperated.

“Well, tha’s jus’ spiffy, Kir.”

Goyhr leaned in until he and Kir were nose to nose.

“Oooooooo!” the observers cried, riveted.

From there, things escalated quickly.

Ori scribbled as fast as he could and made a nice cartoon of Kir. Arguing seemed to peel al least a hundred years off him, and he had amazing lung capacity, shouting at both guild masters at once, the three of them only growing louder the closer they drew.

“Yeh striplin’ weasels!” Kir cursed.

“Yeh orc shit-eatin’ bottle fly!” Goyhr spat.

“Yer mam!” Eyarn roared.

“Yer mam’s goat!” Kir roared back.

Eyarn threw the first punch. Fili punched back, breaking Eyarn’s nose with a sickening crunch.

“Nice shot, inudoye!” Dis shouted.

Fili showed no qualms about fistfighting in front of his mother and his king. Ori recognized Dwalin’s teaching and once more glowed with pride.

He just wondered why Eyarn continued to place himself in the path of angry Durins.
Most of the audience was making book and yelling encouragement. Despite their age, the mithril masters proved extremely nimble. Ori wondered how long the six of them had been spoiling for a fight. Kir whacked guild members left and right with his two sticks. Ori rather thought he had trained himself to make them weapons as well as walking aids. Minta smashed one opponent into another, taking them both down at once.

“Go on, lassie!” Brur bellowed from the doorway. “Show ‘em how it’s done!”

The mill took up most of the floor before the dais and the noise was impressive. The combatants slipped and slid as blood smeared the floor.

Bard shot Thorin an inquiring look, but Thorin only grinned at him and did nothing.

Kir bashed Eyarn’s head with his own and knocked him cold.

Minta yelled as Master Goyhr started forward, Fili tried to get in the way but Kir shoved him aside, hunkered down, snorted and was ready to charge. Master Goyhr realized he was the last opponent of the mithril masters still standing. He seemed to think this over as Kir roared insults about his parentage and he backed down.

“All righ’ then,” said Kir, straightening with an audible popping of bones. He huffed the hair out of his eyes. “Le’ tha’ be a lesson t’ respect yer elders.”

Thorin waited for the cheering to subside before he finally spoke.

“Quite a compelling argument, masters,” said Thorin. “I’d say you’ve carried your point.”

The mithril masters roared and the crowd roared with them.

“Du bekar! Du bekar!”

“Master Kir,” Thorin continued, “you shall uphold the traditions of our people from the times of Durin and reorganize the guild of mithril. Draw up your contracts and by-laws and give them to Lord Balin. He will make sure they comply with my laws here in Erebor. Shall you be heading the guild yourself?”

“Naw, lad..er..yer majesty.” Kir bowed, remembering where he was and who he was addressing. “Our Master Minta’ll be headin’ it.”

“Aye, I bloody will, yeh ol’ boar,” snapped Minta, waving Fili to stand behind Kir, who looked like he might tip over. “No’ to worry yer majesty. I’ll be keepin’ Kir in line after this. I’ve go’ all th’ contracts righ’ here.”

She came forward and Balin received them. He brought them to Thorin, who leafed through, coughed, and handed them back to Balin. It was obvious he was trying not to laugh.

“You may make your call for apprentices next first work day, Master Minta,” Thorin announced. “Congratulations on the re-opening of your guild, may it prosper with the blessing of Mahal.”

There was more cheering and Master Goyhr and Master Eyarn came genially forward and offered their commendations. A standing group from healers guild stepped forward and escorted the damaged parties away. Master Minta and her new guild shuffled off, Master Kir now snoring as Fili gave him a piggyback away from the dais. The standing party of the mountain maintenance guild swept by clearing up any spilled blood.

“A maintenance guild at open court,” said Lindir. “Why didn’t I think of that?”

Bain eyed him.

“Elves do a lot of fist fighting at your open court, Mister Lindir?”

“Only when Glorfindel is in residence.”

Brur called the next petitioner.

This brought new cheers and Jim, Ruelis, and the Court of Miracles came forward. Thorin greeted them and ordered them to proceed.

Ruelis gave over the contract they had made with the owner of the area where the funfair sat and petitioned for permanent buildings.

Jim had been wise to step aside and let Ruelis do the presenting. She had innate knowledge on how her peoples’ systems and laws worked. Ori listened eagerly as she described the plans for a new expanded fun house, plumbing and amenities for all the stalls which would be enlarged and more built. Ori was surprised there hadn’t been an uproar over the space now taken up by the Fun Fair. Now he saw there were plans to erect stalls on the fun fair grounds for the selling of a variety of goods. It was obvious Ruelis meant to garner support by sharing the wealth.

The audience chattered and exclaimed excitedly and the heads from various guild came forward to say they had already agreed to do the work requested.

Thorin looked over the plans and contracts and nodded to Ori. Ori came over with the silver salver that lived under this desk on the dais. On this were the tools Thorin needed to sign the contracts. People craned to see their king sign into law the works to be done. Thorin smiled and looked at the Court of Miracles.

“It is done. May your venture prosper with the blessing of Mahal.”

The Court of Miracles retreated in triumph, Jim turning handsprings the length of the room.

Brur announced Master Gloin.

Gloin strode forward, nattily dressed, with his beard spiffed and newly-beaded for the occasion.

Ori remembered seeing pictures of lions in story books. He knew very well that the real thing didn’t look anything like them. However, Gloin looked like the ones in the story books, down to the purposeful stride.

“Yer majesty,” said Gloin, bowing.

“Lord Gloin. It’s been an age.”

“Aye. Righ’. Well, look, it’s abou’ them ugly buildin’s on th’ road t’ the treasury. That used t’ be th’ way t’ the financial district, b’fore it go’ so th’ minister a’ finance - which is t’ say, myself - wasn’t allowed in no more. Kin we please do away with all tha’ palaver? Give the buildin’ materials t’ someone who needs it? I’d like me office back, an’ Gridr would like me t’ stop doin’ the budgets f’r th’ mountain at th’ dinin’ room table.”

Thorin grinned.

“If you can restore it to the glory it was under King Dain I, I will happily pay for the workers to do so.”

“Well, tha’ was easy,” said Gloin. He bowed again. “Ta, ‘cous.,er…yer majesty.”

“You’re very welcome,” said Thorin with a teasing smile.

Gloin took himself off, out the door and presumably to start working the hammers and pickaxes.

Thorin gestured to Brur.

“Master Fowiv, an’ a bunch a’ gleaners,” Brur announced.

The gleaners, still looking a little rough, came forward hesitantly. The hesitation was one part awe and the rest embarrassment. Shifting volcanic ground may have pushed their mine to collapse, but it might not have done so, except for months of the gleaners digging without the proper shoring up of walls.

As Bofur had put it, “They got carried away. At least the collapse wasn’t under the market itself.”

Thorin nodded acknowledgment to the knot of nervous miners and, after some pushing one, presumably Master Fowiv, stepped forward.

“Yer majesty, gleanin’s a righ’ a’ all dwarrow, but we do apologize f’r puttin’ yer sappers an’ guards in danger.”

“Indeed it is, and I thank you for your apology.”

There was a bit more muttering and pushing. The dwarf spoke again.

“We’re jus’ a bi’ worried.”

Thorin raised a brow and nodded for the dwarf to continue.

“It jus’ tha’ Ursith migh’ wan’ sumfin’."

“I have no doubt he will,” Thorin said reassuringly to them. “So we shall wait and see if and when he decided to ask. Please do not concern yourselves further.”

The group bowed.

“And for Mahal’s sake, be more careful next time,” Thorin finished with a smile.

The group scuttled away. A door at the back banged open.

“Oi!” Brur bellowed from the door, glaring at the newcomer.

“I go’ a petition!”

Everyone turned to look. There in the doorway stood Ursith.
Aggression, Amusement, and Grand Announcement.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Oh No! It’s evil Master Ursith! Whatever shall our poor characters do? Hide the iklars! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ursith wore his usual black robes, but this time they were heavily studded with steel knobs, and his hair was as always, but adorned with a gem tied with a ribbon on the front.

Everyone gasped.
“If yer wan’ in’ t’ petition, get in line,” Brur barked.
“Wheres the line then?” Ursith growled.
Brur pointed.
The few dwarrow in line took a step back.
“Yeh first,” said a dam holding a chicken.
“Tha’s the first thin’ we’ve agreed on,” said a woman, who stared covetously at the chicken.
Brur looked up at Thorin inquiringly. This was not on the docket!
Thranduil sniffed, muttered something about bad influences, rose with Tilda in his arms and bowed slightly to Thorin, who nodded. Thranduil swept out, Bain’s shoulder firmly grasped.
Ori kept his attention ostensibly on his papers, but he slyly watched Nori having his moment. Ori was suddenly aware of a smell. It was tar mixed with mint and a heavy overlay of the scent men in Dale used when they were trying to impress or going courting, but hadn’t bothered bathing. They called it puchulay. Nori must had soaked himself and all his clothing in it.

King Thorin looked all the way down at Ursith as the crime lord bowed.
“And so, Master Ursith, you’ve finally come out of the shadows,” Thorin said pleasantly as he played with Sugar’s muzzle, tapping one of her huge fangs. Sugar’s tail swept the floor and she snorted happily, licking Thorin’s hand. “Good to see you looking so well, after your recent adventure.”
“Nothin’ t’ it, majesty. Went home, had tea, smacked around a few flunkies. Th’ usual.”
Sugar turned at the voice and stared at Ursith. Her head cocked to the side, sniffing. Butter sat up and peered at Ursith. She stood and moved around front of the throne to sit at Thorin’s feet. Thorin ruffled Sugar’s ears and slid a finger under Butter’s collar, scratching her neck.

“Tell me, Ursith,” Thorin asked, smiling at Butter. “How did you accomplish such a feat?”
“Smackin’ flunkies?”
“No, no, no, my funny friend. How did you manage to extract miners through solid rock walls?”
“Tha’s me own business, ain’t it.”
“Are you saying it’s a trade secret?”
“Tain’t sayin’ nothin’, bu’ wha’ I done, tha’s go’ t’ be worth somethin’ t’ th’ crown.” Ursith shrugged and tossed a friendly salute to Bard, who stared at him, dubiously.

“It is, in fact,” Thorin agreed nicely, “but not so much that I’m willing to give you the run of the city. Or more than you already have, at any rate. What is it you want?”

Ursith’s smile was pure hunger as he rubbed his hands with glee.

“Indeed?” Thorin asked idly. Sugar stared hard at Ursith, then questioningly up at Thorin, who continued to pat her. “What could that gain you beyond what you already have?”

“I do live quite comfortable, it’s true, bu’ I’m tired a’ th’ shadows, as yeh so nicely put it. An’ I’m bloody tired a’ tha’ overgrown billiard ball a’ yours doggin’ me every step.”

Dwalin never moved, but he did glance skyward, as though reining in his temper. Ori could tell he was trying hard not to laugh.

“You want to run an honest business?” Thorin asked with a raised brow.

“Tha’s righ’, majesty. I wan’ t’ go legit.”

Whispers of awe and incredulity ripped through the audience.

“As what?” Thorin wondered. “A tailor? Perhaps an accountant? You are good at numbers, I hear.”

“Aye, I am. I’m proposin’ th’ gamblin’ house t’ end all gamblin’ houses. We’ll be partners, sixty/forty. Bring some real high rollers int’ th’ mountain.”

“Centrally located in the Night Market, I take it.”

“Exactly. I own a fair piece a’ tha’ ground, day an’ night.” Ursith stuck his thumbs in his belt and looked pleased with himself.

“Aye, well, I’ve star’ed as I mean t’ go on,” Ursith settled his shoulders, ready for business. “I go’ ane more thin’ t’ do, while yeh think on it.”

A couple of soldiers lunged forward as he swept up the stairs. Thorin gestured them back as Ursith bounded forward and swept down on one knee at Dori’s feet. Dwalin loomed behind him in an instant, Grasper at the ready.

“M’lady?” Ursith bellowed, untying the gem from his hair. Ori could see that the fat round sunstone surrounded by rubies was set on a tungsten ring. Ursith offered it to Dori.

“Beautiful, sweet, and honored Bearer,” Ursith crooned. “Yer presence’s inspired me t’ go licit. Will yeh do me th’ very grea’ honor a’ givin’ me yer hand in marriage?”

Everyone besides the Durins gasped. Ori could see Balin frowning furiously. Anyone who didn’t know him would think him ready to knock Ursith into the next age.

“I’ve more than enough loot…er…funds t’ keep yeh in finer robe than these ‘r nuthn’, if yeh fancy it, an’ I promise yeh a pack a’ servants t’ wait on yeh r’round th’ clock! An’ I’ll feed yeh fresh cherries an’ succ-oo-lent meat every day an’ worship yeh proper every night.”

Ori thought Nori was over-doing this to his own amusement and if Dori smacked him in front of everyone here, he wouldn’t be surprised.

Dori merely extended her hand for Ursith to salute, which Ursith did, long and loudly.

“Awww,” the on-lookers cooed.

Ori bit the inside of his cheek.

Ursith looked devastated, but quickly recovered.

“Aye, well, none kin say I didn’ try me bes’.”

He saluted the Bearer’s hand one more time before returning to his feet to face the king.

Sugar barked suddenly. Ursith jumped a little.

“Here, I ain’ done nothing yer wargs can eat me f’r, yer majesty! Call ‘em off.”

Thorin laughed.
“Now, now Ursith, calm down. Sugar’s just excited, aren’t you, my damling.”
“Charmin’! Don’ be keepin’ us in suspense, King Thorin. Yeh interested or no’?”
“Careful, Ursith,” Thorin warned with royal dignity. “Legitimate business dwarf keep a civil tone with their king.”
Butter rose and looked to Thorin for orders. Thorin patted and praised her lovingly. Butter sat back down again.
“Understood, yer majesty,” said Ursith, nodding, taking a step back.
Thorin continued.
“If you draw up a comprehensive plan, Lord Balin will meet with you to discuss it. That is the protocol every dwarf has the right to and as far as I’m willing to go at the moment.”
Without preamble, or waiting for leave, Ursith made a curt bow, turned and strode out, leaving the stunned citizens of Dale and Erebor to watch him go. Sugar barked again and Ori saw Nori quicken his pace ever so slightly.
Thorin sighed as the door slammed behind Ursith.
“At this juncture, we’ll break for lunch.”
Balin made the announcement, warning the petitioners to be back on the spot in two hours.

Ori took the servants’ passage and met Nori just as his brother walked out of the larder, turkey leg in hand. Washed and changed, Nori looked his normal self once more.
“That was great!” Ori enthused.
“I dunno as it would fool anyone with any street sense, Chick.”
“What do you mean?”
“Did ya notice? The wargs didn’t growl at me.”
“You stunk so weirdly, they didn’t know what to think. Sugar barked at you, though. I thought Dwalin was going to pop if he didn’t laugh soon! A billiard ball? Wasn’t that laying it on a little thick?”
“Yah, I may’ve gone a little far with that. But done’s done. What else we got to eat?”
Thorin entered with the Company as Ori set a big platter of cold roast beef and bread on the table, while Mistress Dazla’s team laid out other viands. The wargs made directly for their freshly-filled food bowls. Sugar stopped and sniffed Nori thoroughly, then swiped his face with her tongue, making him laugh.
The king doffed his crown and hung it over the back of his chair, grinning.
“Nori! What did I tell you?”
“What? I didn’t do nuffin’ you’d hafta behead me for. Them was your exact words.” Abruptly, Nori’s voice changed accent and timber, “Nori, please don’t do anything I’d have to behead you for.”
Ori shuddered, Nori’s mimicry was uncanny. Thorin laughed.
“You enjoyed that a little too much,” the king accused.
Dwalin entered and smacked Nori smartly across the back of the head.
“Oi!” Nori cried. “That’s Dori’s trick.”
“Billiard ball? I’ll knock off yer billiard ball, nuisance.”
Mistress Dazla entered, Bilbo following, the pair of them giggling.
“Really, Nori! You’re just giving me idea after idea,” said Bilbo. “A billiard ball?”
“It’s all Dori’s fault. Give ‘im the credit,” said Nori. “This bein’ heroic an’ famous fing’s just tirin’ me out.”
“Hamfast was already at open court,” said Thorin. “When is everyone else expected?”
“They’ll be here shortly, my dear,” said Bilbo. “We did promise them lunch. I’ve set out the suit of clothes Master Mahrdin made for Frodo.”
“Have yours arrived?”
“I was thinking of borrowing something from Dori. That primrose cloud affair is simply Thorin frowned and walked around Bilbo in deep study.

“As you wish, of course, beloved, but I think Dori’s primrose would wash out your face even with those delightfully pink cheeks and adorable button nose. Perhaps Granny Klak would lend you that charming gown of citrus with all the ruffles.”

“Thorin,” Bilbo raised an eyebrow at his intended. “I was joking and I shall presume you were as well.”

“Just as you say, ghivasha,” Thorin laughed.

Bilbo tried to frown but couldn’t manage it. Thorin clasped him close and kissed the top of his head.

“So you’re going to sit down?” Bilbo asked primly when Thorin released him.

“Of course, my love.”

“Here we are!” Bell called from the next room.

Frodo ran in and straight to Bilbo and Thorin. Bilbo caught him up and tossed him, shrieking, to Thorin.

“Hi! Did you miss me?” he shouted.

Fili entered, looking happy, and weary.

“How is Master Kir?” Thorin asked, sitting Frodo on his knee and drawing Bilbo down to sit next to them.

“Out cold,” said Fili. “He has to get his own apprentice. He’s heavier than Dain.”

Ori chose not to ask how he knew that.

Dori swept in and glared at Nori.

“Marriage?” she snapped.

“Aw c’mon, our Dor. Had t’ give ‘em sumfin’ t’ fink on, ‘sides me petition. Gotta make up t’ the Bearer.”

Dori narrowed her eyes, then laughed.

“You looked ridiculous! Cherries and meat!? I’d have the runs every day! Thank Mahal, you washed that dreadful smell off. I almost couldn’t breath.”

“Butter and Sugar were rather confused by you,” Thorin chuckled.

“All f’r th’ good,” Nori said and parked himself at the table as everyone else came in.

“What did we miss?” Aragorn asked with a grin.

“A terrible smell,” reported Dori, as she greeted Arwen with a kiss then gave a cry of delight as the Gardeners and Boromir came in.

Aragorn looked quizzically at Balin and Thorin. Thorin chuckled and Balin rolled his eyes.

“Be glad yeh went elsewhere, laddie. It was a bloody performance.”

Everyone settled to a good lunch of carrot and ginger soup, breads, cold meats, cheeses, and fresh produce. While they ate, everyone helped Thorin tell the Gardeners and the Gondorians what had happened at open court, before Ursith’s arrival, which soon had them roaring with laughter.

Tilda and Bain grumbled about being taken out.

“I wanted to see the bad guy,” Tilda complained.

“Be glad yeh went elsewhere, laddie. It was a bloody performance.”

Tilda and Bain grumbled about being taken out.

“I wanted to see the bad guy.”

“Of course he does,” Dori cooed.
The merry meal continued until it was time to prepare for the afternoon session of open court.

Bilbo grabbed Ori’s hand and pulled him along to Bag End East with Thorin and Frodo and Samwise, Dwalin swaggering behind with a smirk.

Samwise was insistent that Frodo be helped into his new clothes. Thorin and Dwalin supervised, which mainly consisted of making sure neither faunt tripped or otherwise pitched over while Samwise ‘helped’.

Bilbo and Ori went off to the master bedroom. Bilbo fetched the new suit of clothes from the wardrobe.

“Aw,” teased Ori. “No primrose?”

Bilbo snorted.

“I wouldn’t wear primrose. Thorin is annoyingly right, as it makes me look as though my gall bladder was afflicted. Besides, that’s the Bearer’s color and Dori looks like a flower in it. Master Zindis was more than happy to design me something appropriately hobbitish, with a tinge of dwarfish.”

“Do the underpinnings whisper?” Ori asked with a flutter of his lashes.

“Of course,” said Bilbo, fluttered his own in return, which made them both snicker.

“You must be very proud.”

“I am a bit, yes. I’m going to get dressed. The chapter on the symbolism of the Took linens from the box is on the desk if you’d like to read it.”

“Already?” Ori yelped, practically lunging for the manuscript. His document was coming together quickly, mainly because he had so much help.

“It didn’t require a lot of extra research,” said Bilbo. “I’ve know about them my entire life. Bell also remembered a few things. There’s an awful lot of hidden naughtiness in the marriage quilt alone.”

There was indeed. In a very little time, Ori knew more about Durin’s and Sunflower’s sex life than he could ever dream. Or want, when it came right down to it.

“Bilbo, this is amazing!”

“Thank you. Your sketches will be the perfect accompaniment. What do you think?”

Ori turned.

“Oh, that’s lovely!”

Bilbo wore a white shirt under a long, cream weskit embroidered with gold leaves, and Durin blue hobbit style trousers. His neckcloth was white like his shirt, but for tiny acorns embroidered here and there. He wore only his betrothal bead for jewelry, and though it looked stunning against his hair, Ori was a little concerned that the assembled witnesses would think the hobbit half dressed. He didn’t know how to put that to Bilbo. He knew hobbits didn’t have much use for such things.

Suddenly, Ori felt something in his palm. He opened his hand. Queen Sunny’s rings sat there, winking up at him.

“Uh, Bilbo.”

“Those are very nice,” said Bilbo. “Were they a present from Dwalin? They look a little small for your hand.”

“They are nice, but I don’t think they were meant for my hand. They belong to Sunflower. I think they we’re meant for yours.”

“Ah. Well. I’ve never worn a ring. What is the protocol in this case?”

“I think it’s best Thorin puts them on you. I’m almost willing to bet they’ll fit perfectly.”

“Naturally,” said Bilbo, glancing into the ether. “I promise, You’ll get them back.”

“Ready, ghivasha?” Thorin asked, coming into the room.

He stopped short at the sight of Bilbo in such fine clothes, his grin widening.

Ori cleared his throat.

“Thorin, I think Sunflower wants Bilbo to wear these at your betrothal.” He dropped the rings into Thorin’s palm. “I’m pretty sure you know what to do with them.”

“Do we really have time for that?” asked Thorin with a wicked smile.
“You’ve nothing to boast of if they fit you there,” said Ori, with a grin and a salute. “I’m going to go find my husband. See you in the throne room!”

When open court reconvened, the throne room was full to overflowing, and jolly in a way it had not seen since the coronation.

The petitioners who awaited were surreally patient, because, of course, they weren’t just there to have the king hear their requests and grievances. The undertone of whispering voices filled every empty space like fog. Everyone expected a very important royal announcement.

“How long are you going to keep them waiting?” Ori murmured to Thorin in the doorway.

“We have a little business to take care of first,” said Thorin, “but after that, not a second longer than it takes to bring in the ale.”

From Thorin’s other side, Bilbo grinned.

“It’s not how long you wait, it’s who you’re waiting for. Ungrammatical, I know, but I beg you overlook that in favor of the sentiment.”

Ori rolled his eyes and sighed.

“I suppose. If I must.”

“There is cake to go with the ale,” Bilbo reminded him. “Do try to soldier on.”

Bilbo sat with Frodo bouncing excitedly on his knee, just out of sight in the antechamber, while Brur announced everyone else again, and included the Gardeners and Gondorians. Once Thorin was seated on the throne, he formally welcomed them to Erebor, then he declared open court in session once more.

Brur announced the first afternoon petitioner.

Ori continued to write, finding time to sketch and make notes, as most of the petitions had been common place, but at last Brur announced Mistresses Pidcu and Ugjep.

The two, one a woman the other a dam, had a hissed quarrel as they came up. A soldier walked behind them carrying a chicken.

Balin looked at the docket and stated that the dispute was over the ownership of the chicken. When asked to present their cases both immediately pointed out at volume who the chicken belonged to and whose parentage was the more shady.

After some bickering, Thorin raised his voice.

“You found this chicken wandering?”

“I did, yer majesty,” Mistress Pidcu bellowed

“Did no’!” the woman, Mistress Ugjep, cried. “Tha’ there’s mine.”

The protocol would be to let them fight it out, of course, but the chicken sat smack in the middle of bodily harm.

“Bring the chicken here,” Thorin sighed.

Balin looked horrified at his king.

Thorin’s lips twitched in amusement.

“Captain Dwalin,” he ordered, “bring me the chicken.”

“Aye, yer majesty.”

Dwalin descended with great dignity. The chicken was surrendered without incident.

“C’mon, chicky-wicky,” Dwalin crooned at it, as he carried it up the steps, stroking the feathers, the chicken perfectly placid, and placed it in Thorin’s hands.

The wargs perked up.

“No,” said Thorin.

The wargs sighed and lay back down.

Thorin looked over the bird, perhaps for some tag or dye mark, as there were some people who marked their stock that way. The chicken regarded him interestedly.

He looked down at the petitioners, who were actually very well dressed, and did not look like they tended a lot of chickens.

“Why did you need a chicken? Are there not chickens enough in the market?”

“We decided t’ start a flock, yer majesty,” said the woman. “Then, we couldn’t agree on anythin’
Ori stared at the chicken. It was a vaguely orangish-white, much like many in that part of the world. He saw a lot of chickens, every day, but there was something about the odd speckles on the side of this one’s head. He had seen it before, and he remembered, because even from a distance it looked like big toe.

That was one of Mistress Guernsia’s chickens.

He felt the prickle of energy at his ankle which told him Nori was around.

Quickly he scratched out a note and dropped it discretely on the floor behind the desk.

“Nori,” he hissed. “Bring this to Thorin.”

The note disappeared, and then reappeared under Thorin’s hand on the arm of the throne.

Thorin slid it over onto the seat and glanced at it.

He said to the women, “You say one of you found this while wandering?”

“Aye, yer majesty, I did.”

“No, I did!”

“Was all this wandering, by any chance, past Mistress Guernsia’s farm?”

The ladies’ mouths fell open.

“I’ll take that as a yes,” said Thorin. “Would someone please locate Mistress Guernsia? I believe she and Master Hathor have gone to Fundin House to look in on some Mistress Dazla’s animals.”

Mistress Guernsia was speedily summoned.

“Is this your property, mistress?” Thorin asked her.

She approached the throne with some trepidation, aware that this was a place few people were allowed.

“Yes, your majesty.”

“She can’t prove it!” the dam shouted.

“I could if someone hadn’t clipped her leg band off,” said Guernsia.

“Er… well… it didn’t have one,” the woman protested.

Thorin sighed.

“I am awarding this chicken to Mistress Guernsia. She may keep it, or she may sell it. If she sells it, I suggest it go to the highest bidder. This claim is closed.”

Thorin gestured to Brur.

“Tha’s th’ lo’, yer majesty,” said Brur. “I believe there’s one more order of business?”

Thorin smiled.

“Indeed, there is. Master Brur, if you would be so kind?”

The room buzzed with whispering, though a few dwarrow, impatient in their excitement, shouted, “Bash on with it!” and “Aye, let’s get t’ guid stuff!”

“I will if yeh’d kindly shut yer traps,” Brur barked. And when they had, he announced, “Professor Bilbo Baggins, son of Belladonna Took and Bungo Baggins, and his nephew, Frodo Baggins, late of the Shire.”

They arrived through the side door which the royal family used, and that in itself set some dwarrow off. Then Thorin rose and Bilbo and Frodo climbed the stairs and Bilbo took Thorin’s hand.

Balin waited while the shouting went on and on, then decided he was just going to jump in.

“His Majesty, King Thorin II of Erebor, announces that his overtures of marriage to Professor Bilbo Baggins have been accepted.”

The roars of congratulations and cheers all but lifted the ceiling. Balin swatted at the air, the volume lowered to catch the rest.

“The ceremony of the hobbit tradition will be this coming spring and the ceremony of dwarven tradition will take place this coming Durin’s Day and, by the will of Mahal and the traditions of the Durin line, Professor Baggins will be crowned Prince Consort of Erebor.”

Ori felt like he had to push his pen against the noise of the cheers.

Then, slowly, the crowd’s attention turned.

“What of the contracts?”
“Aye, they’ve no’ been posted!”
“Is this a hobbit thing?”
Thorin stepped forward, still holding Bilbo’s hand. The silence was immediate.
“We knew you would want to witness the signing,” said Thorin, “so we waited until today, so you could see for yourselves.”

The cheers erupted once more.

A table was brought, inkwell and pen. Balin presented three identical contracts, rolling out each one for Thorin and Bilbo to sign before moving off to the side so everyone could witness them signing. One of the contracts would be filed in the archives. Thorin and Bilbo each got one.

There would be many others, unsigned, of course, to be read aloud, then posted in public places. For the first time one would be read and posted in Dale, just outside Dale Hall, as Thorin and Bard had agreed.

The public contracts would quickly disappear as pieces were torn off for souvenirs.

When the signing was done, the table was taken away. Balin read the archival copy aloud, Ori quickly sketching, with details to be filled in later. When Balin was finished, the gold dust flew.

Thorin and Bilbo stood at the front of the dais, arms about each other smiling and waving. Frodo sat on Thorin’s shoulder and waved to everyone with both hands.

Ori blew a layer of gold dust off his scroll, happy that he wasn’t prone to blobs and blotting. He was aware he was crying, and that probably didn’t help, since it would track through the gold on his face and he’d look even sillier. His mind went to the maintenance guild who were going to be cursing by later tonight. He hoped someone had thought to give them a bonus over and above their usual pay and, oh, where was his husband because he was losing it.

People started shouting about arrangements and not much time and Dori shot to her feet and marched to the edge of the dais. Silence fell.

“What do you mean not enough time and arrangements to be made?” Dori scolded and shook her finger at the audience for good measure.

“What do you think Princess Dis and I have been doing since I came to Fundin house? Knitting? We all but arranged this entire affair. Everything is under our control and ready. All of you just need to dress suitably and attended, silly badgers!”

“Yes, Bearer,” said a majority in unison.

Yes, it was funny, and, yes, Ori was still crying.

“Will there be cake, Bearer?” a little voice asked.

“Cake for days,” Dori promised.

“Yay!”
SURPRISE! We're a day early this week. Stevie's got people-relatives and cat-relatives arrivin' imminently!

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yay! Cake! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarf time, same dwarf tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Thorin and Bilbo bowed once more. Balin waved to a far door and members of the Palace kitchen guild made their way in. They were carrying a full size banqueting tray. It took ten dwarf to carry it in.

Ori stared at the enormous cake. It was at least six feet wide and eight feet long. It towered above to almost the height of Dwalin. The guild members set it down on the banqueting table the maintenance guild brought through and covered with a Durin blue table cloth. More members of the kitchen guild arrived bearing dishes, utensils, kegs and tankards.

The cake was beautiful, whipped cream swirled all over it and at every corner was a bouquet of sugared flowers.

There were ‘ooo’s’ and ‘aaah’s’ all around. Thorin looked at Bilbo and Bilbo stepped forward.

“Dear friends, thank you all so much for your congratulations. Thorin and I are most appreciative of your kindness and good wishes. I think at this moment we shall give thanks to the royal kitchens and the mountain maintenance guild for all their hard work to make this possible. That is a beautiful tableau.”

Ori heard Margr explaining to any dwarf seated in her near vicinity that this was the hobbitish word for table.

Bilbo started the applause and the members of the aforementioned guilds bowed and smiled, receiving the accolades from everyone.

Balin and Dori escorted the royal couple forward to the cake. Butter and Sugar tailed them, then Ori followed closely, scribbling as he went.

Dori blessed the cake then Bilbo cut a slice then Thorin cut a slice and they fed each other bites, the intervening ones going into Frodo’s mouth.

The head of the kitchen guild took over and slices were passed out in earnest.

Thorin and Bilbo stood at the end of the table, and laughed and talked to any who came and congratulated them. Frodo sat on the table with Sam and fed bits of cake to the wargs.

Ori sighed and realized the formal part of his job was over, as Bujni and Omi lurked near the royal couple and took notes.

Ori sat down on the edge of the dais and added touches to his sketches.

Dwalin looked over his shoulder, then seated himself next to Ori.

“Bet our Thorin’s happy he didn’t marry th’ mountain now.”

Ori laughed up at him.

“Do you think?”

Dwalin reached and swiped at Ori’s cheek with his thumb.

“Yer tha’ happy, love.”

“I am. I know you’re on duty, but-“

Dwalin leaned in and kissed him.

“I li’e t’ think tha’s th’ bes’ par’ a’ me job,” he said. “The worst parts goin’ t’ be gettin’ all this
“I know, the official record for today’s open court is going to be permanently, festively sparkled. Between Durin’s Day and birthdays and a wedding, it’s going to be a terribly busy few weeks, isn’t it.”

“It is, bu’ we’ll make time, love. I promise.”

“Thank you,” said Ori, sagging against him. “I didn’t even like to ask.”

“Yeh know yeh never should be afraid t’ask.”

Gridr brought them each a piece of cake.

“I know there’s another waitin’ f’r us at home, but have a wee taste a’ this f’r luck.”

“We’re already married,” said Ori, taking the cake anyway. “We don’t need to find the lucky gold piece. If one of us got it, that would just be embarrassing.”

“If yeh get it,” she said, “slip it onto me Gloin’s plate. I want t’ see his face.”

A cry from across the room grabbed their attention.

Lady Eowyn was holding up something.

“What’s this? Did one of the baker’s lose a coin in the batter?”

The dwarrow rushed to congratulate her, to her confusion, and then embarrassment when she realized it meant she was next to be married. Haldir laughed until the tears ran down his cheeks.

“Oh, I’m sorry, Captain Haldir,” said Eowyn. “I think I got your slice of cake by accident.”

The coin clinked as she tossed it lightly onto his plate.

“Oh, no-no-no, my dear lady,” Haldir snickered, tossing it back on hers. “This, White Lady of Rohan, is all yours.”

“Mmmm,” said Mister Wandi, “though, I can understand the mistake.”

Haldir nudged him lightly with an elbow, but he was still grinning. Ori watched them as they drifted through the crowd laughing and chatting. When Haldir saw Ori, he came to the dais.

“Lord Ori, Captain Dwalin, how are you both keeping?”

Ori cocked his head at the elf.

“Is that why you’re staying, Captain Haldir? Are congratulations in order?”

“It’s entirely within the realm of possibility,” said Haldir, with something like coyness. “At any rate, I’ve been given a leave of absence by my lord and lady, as I hadn’t actually taken one in seven hundred years. They told me they thought it would be enriching and gratifying for me to stay in Dale for a while.”

“Well, I hope you’ll let me know when the possibility has worked out,” said Ori. “I can enter the event in the chronicles of Erebor.”

Haldir looked surprised.

“Why would you want to do that? I am not a dwarf.”

“There are a lot of people in the chronicles who aren’t, remember? Besides, you were on the quest to Khazad-dûm. I need to interview you about your experiences, if you’re willing, and also, I should sketch a portrait for the official document.”

The elf straightened his spine.

“It would be an honor, Lord Ori. I will put on my new trousers for the occasion.”

As the elves walked away, Dwalin muttered, “Then our Wandi kin take ‘em off.”

Once Thorin and Bilbo had spoken with everyone, the royal family took leave of the party.

“The consort-elect needs his tea,” said Bilbo, as they walked through the corridors.

Bilbo and Thorin walked hand in hand, Frodo on Thorin’s shoulder.

The faunt called back and forth with Samwise, who rode along on Boromir’s shoulder, the two of them obviously headed for a huge sugar crash.

“Now, ghivasha,” said Thorin to Bilbo, “you have met everyone. Again.”

“Lovely people,” said Bilbo, “each and every one of them. Did we leave enough ale, do you think?”

“There will be no running dry, this I promise,” said Thorin. “And Princess Protocol will be in effect.”
“Durin Protocol!” Dis growled, while Jani laughed, and patted her shoulder.

“As you wish, namadith,” said Thorin sweetly.

One of Dis’ beads bounced off the back of his head, neatly missing Frodo.

The faunt hopped down as Thorin darted forwarded and scooped the bead up as it fell. He looked it over.

“This is a nice one. Thank you, namad.” Thorin put the bead in his pocket.

“Hey,” Dis cried and bounded forward. “Give it back.”

She lunged for his pocket but Thorin grabbed the bead out and held it high above his head, out of her reach. Dis snarled and snatched at his arm, as he laughed and teased her. She almost had it when Thorin flicked the bead high and behind him. Ori saw Nori’s hand dart out of the wall and grab it. Ori wondered if Dis would ever see it again. Then he realized she was searching everyone.

She would probably find it on her pillow, or possibly in tomorrow’s porridge, or never at all.

The Durins and their guests gathered in the sitting room for one more cake, this only a little smaller than the last.

This was the cake Bilbo and Dori made, and it, too, would go out into the throne room, whatever might be left when the Durins got through with it.

Mistress Dazla, Miss Oquizla and several others wheeled it in.

It was glorious, decorated in such a way as to suggest the mountain itself in buttercream.

There was a gasp of awe and silence.

Then Nori burst through the top of the cake, dressed like a courtesan

“Surprise!”

Frosting flew through the air and dripped off his face.

“Get down from there! You’ve ruined the cake!” Dori bellowed.

“Nope! Not finished yet!” Nori replied. “Binni?”

The Bearer-Sib stepped forward with a hand drum and began to play.

Nori was festooned with purple and Durin blue beads which twinkled and rattled as he moved.

He wasn’t wearing very much, just a scarf of some silky gold material low on his hips, and a sort of halter top, open weave lined all around with tiny gold bells. Incorporeal, he swept through the cake and seemed to descend invisible steps to the floor, where he began to whirl.

Ori was rather impressed with the snaky movements Nori wove into his steps. His hips shimmied and shook in time with the drum.

“He’s got my bead in his navel!” Dis cried.

Bofur grinned.

“Looks darlin’, don’t it? No worries, I’m sure ya’ll get it back.”

“Er, no, he can keep it,” said Dis, grimacing.

As the whirling grew frenzied, Assault and Battery jumped from Nori’s hair, skittered down his arm and held onto each of his hands with both their tiny ones, jabbering in time with the drum.

When his spinning was fastest, he dropped through the floor, still spinning, then sprang up again, threw his arms and legs around his king, kissed his forehead and shouted, “Congrats, your Thoriness!”

Nori dropped down and grinned maniacally.

Thorin licked his own icing-smeared lips, spattered with frosting from Nori’s hair and beard.

“Mmmm,” said the king thoughtfully, “good buttercream.”

“Uncle Bilbo,” said Frodo, “don’t you get a kiss from Idad Nori?”

“No, thank you,” said Bilbo.

“Really!” Dori cried, charging forward to smack Nori with a tea towel. “Look what you’ve done!”

“Oi! Most of it’s just fine,” Nori protested. He grabbed the tea towel and started to swab down his hair and any stray smears on the ferrets.

Ori thought this might be their last outing in Nori’s hair. They were now too large to fit comfortably in Nori’s coif.
Not getting satisfaction in one corner, Dori turned next to Binni, who looked terribly amused and satisfied.

“You taught him a sacred dance?”

Binni shrugged.

“Who am I to deny the furthering of someone’s thirst for knowledge?”

“Honestly!” Dori grumbled, throwing his hands in the air hopelessly.

Meanwhile, Mistress Dazla brought the knife for the cake cutting.

“The tea’s on, m’lady.”

“Oh, thank Mahal.”

That night Ori climbed into bed next to Dwalin, who sat propped against the pillows, reading the brief speech Ori wrote for the rededication of the scribes’ hall.

“What do you think?” Ori asked.

“Masterful an’ soldierly,” said Dwalin with a teasing grin. “Say wha’ yeh have t’ say an’ ge’ out.”

“As long as they don’t expect something more than that. I just don’t want it to sound dismissive.”

Dwalin handed him back the pages.

“Sadie said yeh didn’t t have t’ write anythin’ f’r the rededication. She’d’ve bin happy t’ do it.”

“But I’ll still have to present it as the guild’s first chair. I’m sorry, but that always makes me sound like furniture.”

Ori put the pages back in the drawer of his bedside table. Nori-pori had developed a taste for ink, so much so that Ori had to recreate manuscript pages from the quest documents.

Ori leaned back against Dwalin’s chest with a musing, “Hmmm.”

“Wha’re yeh thinkin’ love?”

“You’ll laugh.”

“No promises.”

“If you were a piece of furniture, what would you be?”

Dwalin laughed.

“Told you,” said Ori.

“An’ yeh were righ’. Furniture? I’d prob’ly be an armoire, massive ‘n no’ attached t’ th’ wall, so I’d fall an’ crush someone.”

Ori sat up and stared at him.

“You would!” he cried.

“Oi! Come back here!” Dwalin drew Ori close once more. “An’ yeh?”

“I’d be a footstool, small and useful and sitting in the dark, unintentionally tripping people up so they break their ankles.”

Dwalin gave a deep, booming laugh.

“An’ then yeh’d break yer own ankle, learin’ up t’ apologize!”

“It’s true,” said Ori, nodding. He warmed to the subject. “Nori would be a backless settee. Just when you got comfortable, you’d tumble off. Dori would be an overstuffed sofa, all soft and cozy. You’d sink down into the cushions. Then, you’d realize you were trapped.”

“Oh, aye. An’ then?”

“Then a tea trolley would appear out of nowhere, laden with goodies that you had to eat or you’d never escape. What about Balin?”

“Ornate, pigeonhole desk,” said Dwalin without hesitation. “All th’ knowledge in th’ world at yer fingertips, wrapped in a package with fancy-toed slippers. Thorin?”

“Ooo,” said Ori. “Let me think. There’s the throne, of course, but that’s too easy.”

“A’ course,” Dwalin agreed.

“Smartarse. Let me think. Bilbo?”

“Kitchen stove,” said Dwalin. “Efficient, warm, dangerous if mishandled.”

“I like it!” Ori agreed.

“Come on, then. Thorin?”

“Dish cupboard.”
“Dish cupboard?”
“One of those glass-fronted ones for your best dishes, which you never use.”
“How d’ye figure?”
“Most people are afraid to do more than look at it, because it’s so important and rare, but if you want it to do its job, you have to open the door and dare to handle what’s inside.”
“Ah, well, we won’t mention that’ t’ him. Guid thin’ hobbits’ve such a light touch.”
“And a love of dishware,” said Ori.
Dwalin kissed the top of Ori’s head.
“Yer no’ worried abou’ the rededication?”
“No, not really. Not now that Master Brur stopped threatening to bring back up the coronation robes. Dipfa’s just going to redo my hood and I’ll wear it with my court robes. It’s sort of a consolation prize for not getting to alter the coronation robes to match her vision. But, I’ve warned her, there can’t be any switches or pieces that light up.”
“Sometimes, yeh have t’ pu’ yer foot down, love.”
“I know. I’m ashamed to say, I almost caved in when her lip started to quiver. Happily, she has Vi and Margr who think she’s a genius and let her dress them in just about anything. It’s amazing how they seem to be in sync like that.”
“Those two’re strong enough t’ throw anythin’ int’ relief.”
Ori sighed happily.
“This is nice. We’ve been going non-stop since we got back from the quest. You were right, you know.”
“I usually am, but wha’ was I righ’ abou’ this time?”
“We don’t have a lot of time alone together, so we make the most of it when we do.”
“I wish it could be otherwise, love. I don’ like havin’ t’ pu’ an entire kingdom before yeh.”
“I have you right now. In fact, you could have me right now.”
Ori looked up at him slyly, proud that his cheeks felt only slightly warm.
“Oh, aye?” Dwalin asked. “And how would yeh li’e t’ be had?”
“Kiss me and we’ll figure that out.”
Dwalin kissed him. It was lovely, but the position made it awkward. Ori turned and sat astride Dwalin’s lap instead, and that was perfect, pressed together, Dwalin’s hands at his waist, Ori’s hands in Dwalin’s hair, playing with the sensitive outer edges of Dwalin’s ears. Dwalin had beautifully round, large dwarf ears, the chunk out of one was a touchstone for Ori.
When they rolled over, they woke Nori-pori, who climbed to his feet in disgust and went to sleep with Mask in the basket on the floor.
“Sorry!” Ori called gaily.
“Yer no’ sorry,” Dwalin teased.
“Shh! I don’t want to hurt his little feelings.”
“He’s a cat. His li’le feelin’s’ll be hur’ if yeh breathe on ‘im wrong.”
“And ‘wrong’ changes moment to moment, I know.”
“Mind if I breathe on yeh?”
“Please.”
Dwalin kissed his neck, then rubbed his beard across it
“I like that,” Ori sighed. “Let me try it.”
Through the thick skin of a dwarf, the roughest of beards felt like a caress, like dozens of tiny caresses across the body at the same time. It was something of a kink.
Now that Ori had a beard, it was time to see how well his husband liked it.
Dwalin all but purred.
“You changed the scent of your hair oil,” Ori murmured against his neck. “It’s even more delicious.”
“Li’le somethin’ Tay suggested.”
“Mmmm, new iron and… what is that?”
“Wood smoke.”
“Rather exotic. I like it.”
“I kin tell. Yeh kin keep on with tha’.”
“Any place in particular?” Ori teased, biting Dwalin’s earlobe. He lingered there while Dwalin’s breath stuttered.
“Me dick would be very obliged. I’ll even wash yer beard f’r yeh after.”
Ori laughed.
“That sounds like a bargain to me.”
They kissed again, lingeringly. The heat of Dwalin’s body warmed Ori’s front, while the cool air from the open window swept across his arse. Both made him shiver in pleasure.
“A’right’?”
“Mmmm, yes.”
Ori slid down his body, trailing his whiskers slowly through Dwalin’s dwarf fur. Kivi suggested that, since moving slower added to the anticipation. Also, snagging whiskers in body hair, though funny, could ruin the mood.
Ori’s mouth watered as he nuzzled Dwalin’s hip, then his inner thigh. With all the patience a scribe could muster, he used his beard like another tongue, licking, sucking and rubbing at the same, careful pace as Dwalin’s pleasure quickened.
Ori’s mind wandered into new territory, as he wondered what it would be like if Bilbo was helping him. The hobbit didn’t have a beard, but he had that clever mouth. The pair of them together could soon work Dwalin into a lather. He filed that away for some nebulous later.
Dwalin writhed beneath him.
“You like that?” Ori murmured.
“Oh, aye. More, please.”
Dwalin’s breath quickened and his writhing grew ever more desperate and still Ori did not speed his touches. If Ori thought for a moment that he was tormenting Dwalin, he would have pulled back. He trusted Dwalin would tell him to stop. Though Ori and Dwalin hadn’t talked a lot about pain yet, Dwalin didn’t seem keen. Ori admitted he was rel-
Ori laughed in surprise.
“Not stopping. Promise.”
The precum oozed from the head almost like a tease.
Ori licked it up, dragged his tongue and then his beard over the sensitive opening.
Almost without thinking, he swiped some up on his finger, and then ran it over Dwalin’s arsehole.
“Oh, Mahal!” Dwalin growled. “Do tha’ again!”
Now Ori wished he had thought of the oil, but he wasn’t going to stop to get it, not when his husband was so deeply in the thrall of pleasure. Slowly, he swiped his fingers back and forth, stopping only to gather more cum, which mixed with his spit as he languidly sucked at the head of Dwalin’s dick.
Dwalin’s writhing grew to thrashing, his growls to cries, as he twisted his own nipples with their tempting rings.
Slowly, carefully, Ori dipped his finger inside the hole a bit and pulled it out, swiping circles around the edge. His own memory supplied the sensation and he hummed around the cock head, and enjoyed the feel of his balls drawing up.
Dwalin came in three mighty arches of his back, thoroughly spraying Ori’s face and beard, and finally lay panting and shivering.
“Ori, love,” he gasped.
Ori threw himself up into Dwalin’s arms, and felt the diminishing echoes of climax shiver through his husband’s body.
“Love,” said Dwalin quietly, “yeh kin do tha’ any time yeh like.”
“I’ll take you at your word, you know,” Ori warned.
He lifted himself up and crawled further forward gingerly to kiss him.
“Yeh need seein’ t’,” said Dwalin.
“My beard needs seeing to,” said Ori with a giggle. “If it dries like this…”
“Aye,” said Dwalin, kissing him again, and again. “And yer no’ even a Stiffbeard!”
“Do you think that’s where the name comes from?” Ori asked, quite seriously.

“Considerin’ how many wives Gheir has? It’s an even bet.” Dwalin rolled them both over onto their sides and rested their damp foreheads together. ‘I’m carryin’ yeh off t’ th’ bath, an’ well see t’ yer beard and yerself, no’ necessarily in tha’ order.”

“Are you going to admire my perfect pumpkins, Gonad?”
“I’m goin’ t’ worship th’ li’le fuckers.”
He strolled out of their room with Ori in his arms, neither of them wearing so much as a stitch.

Dwalin growled and leered at him, and called Ori his bonny, buxom maid and threatened to ravish him, so as to ruin him for every other dwarf, elf or man.

“Oh, my king!” Ori simpered. “Please be kind, and don’t bruise my pumpkins too terribly! If they get all squishy, how will I ever sit down?”

“Yeh won’t, me blossom. Yeh’ll recline on a couch an’ I’ll feed yeh cherries.”
“And succulent meat?”

“Yeh’ve already had yer portion for t’nigh’,” said Dwalin with a wink.
Dwalin set him down on the bathroom stool and went and filled the bathtub.

“Remember to put the sparkles and fluffy pink dessert in the water,” said Ori.

“Lucky for our Wandi th’ sparkles dissolved,” said Dwalin. He poured a small measure of bath oil into the filling tub. “An’ I though’ th’ gold dust clashed with me uniform.”

“I thought they were quite fetching,” said Ori.

“Yeh been spendin’ too much time with Bilbo,” said Dwalin, grinning.
“No such thing,” said Ori with dignity.

“I kin see knowin’ him’s guid for yeh.”

“Dori’s still not convinced of that.”

“Tha’s wha’ convinces me,” said Dwalin.

Dwalin lifted him into the tub, and Ori sighed at the lovely, warm water. Dwalin climbed in behind him.

“We jus’ go’ t’ be careful gettin’ ou’,” said Dwalin.
Ori rubbed his fingers together and saw what Dwalin meant. If nothing else, their skin would be quite soft.

He squeaked as Dwalin picked Ori up and sat him straddling Dwalin’s lap. Ori’s back pressed to Dwalin’s front. Dwalin’s hands ran up and down Ori’s front.

Oh...
Dwalin kissed his neck and whispered, “I’m goin’ t’ stroke yeh off, if it’s a’righ’ with yeh.”
Ori’s flagging erection returned quite suddenly, so suddenly that he inhaled a sharp breath, bowed out with the jolt of pleasure. Dwalin held him, licking and biting his ear while gently, insistently twisting his nipples.

“Yeh li’e tha, don’ yeh,” said Dwalin.

“Mmmm, yes,” Ori murmured. He closed his eyes and quite literally put himself in Dwalin’s hands. “Love your hands. Love all of you.”

Dwalin rubbed his beard against Ori’s neck.

“Love yeh.”
Ori soon grew restless, straining against Dwalin’s touch as if he could somehow get Dwalin’s hands on every inch of his body at once.

“When I take yeh,” Dwalin said, “it’ll be here in this tub.”

Ori knew exactly what figure of Kivi’s that Dwalin meant.

“Will you take me on my knees?”

“Oh, aye. The warm water’ll go over the sides as I pump yeh. I’ll be moppin’ it up long after yeh’ve gone t’ bed.”

“Will you tuck me in before you mop?”

“Aye, ghivashele, I’ll tend t’ yeh an’ yer pumpkins guid an’ proper.”
“Dwalin, this feels so good.”
“D’ye wan’ me hand around yer cock now?”
“Please,” Ori breathed.

One hand grasped his cock, while Dwalin held Ori steady with an arm around his middle, those fingers plenty long enough to sweep up across his nipples in leisurely counterpoint to the lovely, brisk pace down below and the insistent nibbling of Ori’s neck, the perfectly sweet, filthy promises poured into Ori’s ear.

Ori was torn between laughing and sobbing.

“Don’ worry,” Dwalin promised, “I’ll hold yeh tight when I come inside yeah, so yeh don’ shoot ou’ an’ across the room an’ concuss. Don’ wan’ old Oin t’ come save yeh with his skull hammer.”

“H-how embarrassing!” Ori agreed, giggling. “We c-could be a chapter in his next s-sex guide.”

“At least we’l know tha’ no ane’ll ever read it,” said Dwalin.

Dwalin’s prick had reawakened with the friction, rising into the slot of Ori’s splayed legs, rubbing against his sensitive skin, and randomly across his opening. It was just enough to tip Ori over the edge, and his cries echoed across the tile as he drowned in the undertow of pleasure.

He lost track of time then. He sagged against his husband, who cuddled him, murmuring loving nonsense. He might even have nodded off from exhaustion for a moment. It felt like waking up anyway, as if the dimmed lights in the bathroom had extinguished and slowly kindled again. The water felt cooler, too.

In the shower, Dwain washed his beard, as promised, and the rest of him as well, then towed him off and tucked him into bed.

“I love yeh, me wee footstool.”
“I love you, my dangerous armoire.”
Chatting, Chanting, and Xocolātl.
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. In case you were worried the old royal residence was going to be stuffed with scribes forever….
Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!
Thanks to @clinicalherbalist.tumblr.com on Tumblr who alerted us to the fact that Lobelia has another ‘common’ name (giggle)

“Hideeho me lovies,
We’re safely home and I don’t have to fight my wee Thorin to repossess my throne.
Me and my delicate jewel of a bride had quite the happy surprise when we arrived.
Like the rest of those sorry arseholes I call my fellow kings, there was a wee pressie waiting for us.
Mahal, may His Name be ever blessed and hailed, saw fit to give me a copy of my bridge.
The old drawbridge we used to have was gone and in it place is a longer, bigger and shinier
one. Mithril all the way and sound as a clock.
Work of brilliance if I do say so myself. The open way retracts into my mountain but the statues stay on, marking the way. The statues are perfect. None of this judge with big ass penis or just giant penises. A long line a statues made of rhodochrosite. Each one a twelve foot high battle boar on its hind legs. Brilliant.
The first boars face you as you step on and as you travel forward, each one is slightly more turned than the previous. When you get to the front gate they’ve turned a full circle.
I asked our wee Thorin if he got to see the work happen, but no they woke up three days after the quest was done and there the whole things was. Not even a dirty great crash to let them know what had happened.
Ah well, our wee Thorin kept things going along nicely and me and my delicate jewel of a bride are designing and planning a new throne room. Tell Binni we’re going to give him a run for his money.
Love to you all and we’ll see you at Durin’s Day!
Dain, Sculdis, Thorin and Chopper.
xoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxoxo ”
Thorin finished reading the letter aloud and passed it to Dori.
“That must be a sight,” Kili commented. “All those giant pigs. No wonder Dain sound so pleased.”
“I wonder what he’s planning for his throne room?” Dori pondered. “He didn’t say they have mithirl in the iron hills, so likely he won’t be redoing it in that.”
“Maybe it’s all rhodochrosite,” suggested Ori.
“Nah,” said Dwalin. “It’s all ready like that.”
Ori thought about this then giggled.
“Dori, our eldest brother has a pink throne room.”
“Augh!” cried Dori. “With his hair color?”
“Clash-clash-clash,” agreed Binni.
“What’s the upholstery?” demanded Dori.


“Black and gold,” answered Thorin after a sip of tea. “Jus’ li’ lookin up our Queen Kivi’s skirt,” Dwalin said.
“How?” asked Fili.
“Black hair and only wore gold,” Ori replied before he thought. “That’s enough,” Dori said, leaning to make sure Frodo and Sam were at the other end of the meadow.
“Aren’t you ready, Ori?” Bilbo asked.
“As ready as I’m going to be,” Ori murmured. “The rededication of the scribe’s guild hall is at tenth bell.”
“We’ll all be there, pet,” Dori assured him.

Ori urged Honda along toward the renovated guild building. Dwalin, with the honor guard, preceded the party. Thorin had insisted that Ori, as first chair and scribe of Mahal, should ride at the king’s right side. Bilbo, as usual, rode on Thorin’s left. Fili and Kili rode behind them with Tauriel.
Ori thought they all looked quite grand, dwarrow, elves, ponies, goats, and all.
Except, possibly, for Kili, and Ori would never say anything aloud about the prince’s latest tunic. Kili designed it himself to look like two giant leaves sewn together. Ori supposed this had been fine in theory. In practice, Kili looked like he was encased in a giant peapod.
Fili clearly didn’t feel the same need for restraint.
“It looks like you’re wearing a broad bean.”
“They’re leaves,” Kili insisted.
“How is that a problem?” Kili challenged.
“When the weather gets colder, your tunic will turn all gold and brown and fall off you.”
“Go soak your head, Fi.”
“Better you go soak your tunic, so it doesn’t wilt.”
Ori was very comfortable in his court dress of the black, shimmering with the darkest green. The red thread with garnets caught the light, as did his black boots with tassels of dark green silk and emeralds. Dipfa had seen fit to make him a black hood with a dagged edge sewn with red thread, the seams studded with garnets and emeralds. The tail of the hood ended in a tassel of seven silver stars.
He shook his head just to feel the delicate chains of his favorite ear cuffs tickle his neck. The feeling always reminded him of Dwalin, his fingers, his lips and his whiskers, and the joy he felt the first time Dwalin put the jewelry on him.
“Cut it out,” said Quartz on Ori’s shoulder. “Makes me dizzy.”
“How can you tell the difference?”
“Funny.”
Ori was eager to see the new Scribes Guild building. He hadn’t really seen it for several weeks, when it had looked as it did when he first visited. But for the last few weeks, the outside had been covered in curing cloths and scaffolding. The royal party rode up to the edge of the square courtyard. The building was still covered, but this time with a new cloth, ready to be pulled down when the rededication was over.
In front of the covered steps sat a ceremonial podium of solid slate. It was very large and covered with ritual necessities. In the middle perched the decorative ink pot ready to smoke with pleasant incense. Ancient books dedicated to scrivening were placed about, intermixed with all kinds of paper and parchments and pens and other tools. A spectrum of colored powders were cast all over the podium.
The guild chairs stood in front of this and all the scribes from every corner of the mountain and Dale were present as well as quite a few onlookers. Everyone was moving about, talking and laughing excitedly.
“They went all out,” Thorin observed to Ori.
Ori looked about. The small rock garden had been expanded and redone. Ori could see more benches and great carved urns filled with lichens and decorated with crystals. The fountain pool was now a huge octagon with sizable scroll worked basins at every angle. The fountain spurted upwards to a respectable height and each corner basin sported its own, smaller fountain. The sculpture which had once housed the Bugle of Mahal was gone. Ori wondered where the Bugle was now and hoped someone had guarded it from Ubquim.

There was a shout, and then everyone was bowing and greeting the royal party. All too soon for Ori, the chairs were welcoming them and Podvu was calling for everyone’s attention.

Ori hurried back to the teacup and Dori handed over the wrapped platters. Ori sniffed the cookies. They smelled even better now than when he had made them that morning with Dori and Bilbo’s help.

Ori went to the podium and laid each platter and uncovered it. One of snickerdoodles and two of xocolātl chip.

Loli bounced to his side apropos of helping.

“You made cookies for us?”

“They are for Mahal. I promised.”

“You promised cookies to the Grandfather of all Dwarrow?”

“Yes,” said Ori. “I was being rather demanding at the time, because of the quest. I thought it was the least I could do.”

“So you made snickerdoodles.”

“He asked for them. I guess He likes snickerdoodles.”

“With extra cinnamon,” said Mahal in Ori’s mind.

“Do you think He’d mind if I just had one?” Loli asked with large, pleading eyes.

“Naw, I kin share. Yeh kin allus make more.”

“Mahal says He’s willing to share.”

“But, now yeh mention it, Eru’d like some as well.”

“What kind?” Ori asked, silently.

“He likes oatmeal, with xocolātl instead a’ raisins.”

“Dori says raisins prompt digestion,” Ori observed, then at Loli’s surprised look, realized he had spoken aloud.

“Raisins when yer expectin’ xocolātl’s a let down.”

A different voice, sounding far away, said, “I do not eat cookies for my digestion!”

“He knows tha’, yeh numpty. Don’ ge’ yer knickers in a twist.”

“Don’t wear ‘em myself,” said a bubbling voice.

“More information than we needed, Ulwe. Ta.”

“Who are you talking to?” Loli asked around a mouthful of cookie. “Just the right amount of cinnamon, by the way.”

“Mahal.”

She stopped chewing.

“Right now? Here?”

“It’s not like He can’t come and go wherever He pleases,” Ori reasoned. “Technically, it is His house… or something.”

“I’m thinkin’ a’ puttin’ in more a’ tha’ blewed up furniture, act’lly,” said Mahal. “Think they’d make a couch big enough?”

“Yavanna will have to provide more sap,” said Ori.

A healthy portion disappeared from the platter.

Loli gasped.

“Was that the Hand of Mahal?”

“No, that was the Mouth of Yavanna.”

“Mahal!”

“No. Yavanna,” Ori teased.

“I know that! I’m just say- you’re terrible, Ori.”

Ori blinked, all innocence.
“Time to start now?” he asked pleasantly.

“Indeed,” cried Podvu. Rouho stepped forward and blew the Bugle of Mahal.

“I’m righ’ here, laddie,” Mahal chuckled.

Everyone quieted down. Thorin and the other royals stood behind the podium and the guild chairs on either side of it. Podvu went to the podium itself. She cleared her throat and began by thanking the king for his assistance in the rebuilding, and housing the scribes in the old royal residence, then politely asked Ori if he would like to make a few remarks.

Ori stepped forward and faced the crowd. For a moment he was nervous, but then he saw faces of those he knew. They all looked eager and ready, so he settled and spoke.

“Thank you all for coming. I am delighted to be here to see the rededication of this great edifice, and I am overjoyed that we are renewing our own dedication to the word and truth of Mahal. Now that the Elements of Scrivening has been rediscovered, we can read and convey that truth plainly. Khuzdul is our literature, it’s our poetry. It’s who we are. We are made by Mahal. He is proud of us and we of Him. We honor Him by using the language He created for us. We write to express the truth Mahal gave us. It’s all laid out in the decorations of this Guild Hall, the stones that stand for truth and communication. Blue topaz reminds us that the best discussions are had without the heat of anger. Labradorite tells us that the strength of our commitment will bring order out of chaos. Fulgurite remakes sand into stone and reveals beauty; the communication of Mahal to us. The shining truth of Mahal.”

Having said all this, Ori hoped that the guild had not decided to redo the whole building in slate. He was surprised by a crash of applause. Ori turned to Thorin who, along with the royal party, was also clapping.

“Excellent,” Thorin mouthed.

“Well done!” Mahal boomed.

A hand tugged on Ori’s boot. He looked down to see Nori’s hand jutting up from the ground with a ‘thumbs up’.

“Not now!” Ori hissed, blushing. He was rescued by Sadi arriving with a lit taper. She thrust it into the incense, releasing a rather attractive puff of honey colored smoke.

Ubqim began the chant for Mahal’s blessing on the building and all scribes who study there. All the scribes present joined in.

As the last notes dies away, Dori stepped forward and pulled the chords that released the drapes around the building.

The whole edifice had been redone in turquoise mosaic, highlighted with fulgurite and labradorite. New jade framed the windows and doorways. The steps had treads of sodalite and risers of blue topaz. “Mahal’s Eyes Read Our Truth” was now picked out above the front doors in mithril.

Everyone cheered and admired, and Ori was signaled to lead the way up the steps and throw open the doors.

He held is breath as the doors swung back, but there was not a checkerboard in sight.

“Hope yeh don’ mind, laddie,” said Sadi beside him. “We kept th’ ugly floorin’ fer th’ kitchen cupboards.”

“Good place for it,” Ori giggled. “Is it right, Sadi? Is it just like before?”

“Jus’ right,” Sadi approved. “With a few, necessary changes.”

They led the way in, Ori wondering the entire way, and when he turned back to the door, he saw what she meant. Master Brur’s ‘note’ from Mahal had been installed over the doors for the entire world to witness the valar’s ‘pinky swear’.

“Oh, no,” Ori cried, then laughed. “Did it really have to go there?”

“Brur insisted,” said Sadi. “He’s so shy, yeh know. He mus’ come out’ve his shell.”

“I think it’s grand,” said Brur, approaching. “Very elegant hand. Brief, t’ th’ point.”

“Jus’ like th’ one on yer head,” said Sadi with a smile.

“Aye, ju- Oi!”
Ori left them to their easy bickering as he looked eagerly at the writing samples of the masters on the walls. He turned as a familiar voice called his name. There stood Khujik, his old master.

Ori gave a shout and rushed over to throw himself on the aging dwarf, who laughed.

“Always knew yeh’d do well, lad,” he enthused, “an’ here yeh are married int’ th’ royals an’ th’ firs’ chair a’ th’ guild. Yer flying high, our Ori!”

“I was just admiring your writing sample, Master Khujik,” Ori said with a grin.

“Aye, were yeh now, ‘cause I was jus’ admirin’ yers.”

Ori cocked his head, then laughed.

“I’m too old to fall for that now, sir.”

“An’ I’m too old t’ be lyin’, as I’ve always told yeh. Take a look.”

Ori turned with a frown and looked down the row of familiar and unfamiliar handwriting, the very best the masters of the guild could offer. He had always hoped someday, when he gained mastery, his own would join them.

Apparently, he didn’t have to wait until his mastery.

“But, I’m not a master scrivener!” he exclaimed, scandalized. “And, what in Mahal’s name is that?”

Thorin peered over Ori’s shoulder.

“You don’t recognize it?”

“I recognize my own handwriting, but that’s all.”

“It’s a page from the notes you took the first time we went down into the mines.”

Ori was horrified.

“But! But! But! It’s all blotted!”

“I think it’s beautiful,” said Thorin, “and Sadi and Khujik agreed with me.”

“Aye, lad,” said Khujik. “No’ every scribe kin write ‘across’ li’e tha’, an’ no’ have it look like an orc’s breakfast.”

“Yeh did a grand job writin’,” Sadi put in, “and what yeh wrote is more important.”

Ori looked closer. He had written about Thorin’s contract with Caris, Thorin’s promise and his giving the Durin bead to her. Ori gulped. In this case Thorin was probably right to have it here for everyone to see. Ori looked back to find Thorin, Sadi and Khujik smiling fondly at him. He choked but couldn’t find words. He wanted to hug Thorin, but wasn’t sure if he should.

Thorin took the decision out of his hands by stepping forward first and embracing him. Ori did not cry. Sadi and Khujik took their turns at hugging him.

“I always knew yeh’d be th’ best a’ all me scholars,” Khujik managed, then held Ori at arm’s length, looking him over. Khujik gave a great sniff and resorted to his flag of a handkerchief. Ori choked a little and blinked hard. He though he was going to cry but the warm, strong arm of his husband slid around his shoulders.

Ori took a deep breath and smiled.

“Thank you all, so much, for having this much faith in me. It’s humbling.”

Sadi snorted.

“Please, lad. Yeh have enough humbleness for yeh an’ Brur both. Thank Mahal, or he wouldn’t have any at all. An’ it gets tirin’ fer an old dam like me t’ always be tryin’ t’ beat it int’ him.”

That made Ori giggle.

“I’m jus’ tha’ bloody proud a’ yeh,” Dwalin murmured in his ear. Ori squeezed Dwalin, then remembered his manners.

“Master Khujik, this is my husband Captain Dwalin.”

“I know, laddie,” Khujik snorted and offered his arm to Dwalin. “It was all over Dale in two days. Mind, by th’ time I heard it, the captain had broken down th’ door t’ yer house, popped Dori one, an’ carried yeh off in naught by yer skivvies.”

“I was wearing clean skivvies, at least,” Ori mused. “But the rest was a little exaggerated.”

“A wee bi’?” Khujik snickered. “I mus’ ask our Dori, then.”

Khujik melted into the chattering crowd before Ori could do anything. He turned to ask Thorin but he was busy listening to Podvu outline the running of the guild. She was in charge of the administration of the guild, while Master Rouho headed the teaching staff assisted by Ubqim. Master Sadi, Master Kacuho and Master Nodun taught, but also assisted Ori as scribes to the King.

Ori turned and looked at Dwalin.

“Did you know it was all around Dale you stole me in my skivvies?”

“Leas’ they were clean, love,” Dwalin teased and turned to signal Furh’nk to guard Thorin.

Ori cocked his head.

“Are you planning on seducing me in a coat cupboard, captain?”

“Mebbe later. I know yer wantin’ a look aroun’. See if they’re still hidin’ any checkerboards about.”

Quartz squawked regally.

“I already ‘checked’.”

“Thank you. That was terrible,” said Ori.

“Yes, my work’s done,” said Quartz. “Refreshment table’s calling.”

He flapped off.

Ori gave into his curiosity and pulled Dwalin along to explore the rooms upstairs. The main library took up most of the ground floor along with the meeting and administrative rooms, but a secondary book room sat just above the library, connected with a lift that continued all the way up to the top floor. The rest of the rooms on the second level and several levels above were classrooms. Two floors above that housed large studio rooms for figure and object drawing and painting, and a storage area with stocks of ink, paper, minerals, canvas and a thousand other things that made up the tools of a scribe’s trade.

Ori stood in this room with his eyes closed and simply breathed.

“Yeh goin’ t’ swoon, love?” Dwalin teased.

“Only if you’ll catch me.”

Dwalin did catch him up and kissed him breathless.

“Mmm,” Ori sighed into his mouth. He pulled away. “Between the art supplies and you, my body is getting ideas.”

“Prob’ly no’ a good idea righ’ now,” said Dwalin.

“No,” said Ori, with equal reluctance. “But soon.”

“Aye?”

“We wouldn’t be the first, at least according to Sadi.”

“An’ she would know, wouldn’t she.”

When they went back out into the hall, Ori heard someone calling.

“Ori! Dwalin!”

Ori looked up to see Arne hanging over a railing a dozen floors up to the chairs’ quarters, and beckoning to them. Ori rushed up the stair, Dwalin hot on his heels. Arne welcomed them with hugs, then pulled them to a door. This opened into the huge living area of a furnished corner flat. Tay’s hand was obvious everywhere. There were two enormous rectangular windows, topped with arches that had decorative stained glass circles. Both window were festooned with heavy red velvet curtains trimmed with gold tassels. Nodun’s desk and easel sat in front of the window that looked out over the front of the building. Arne’s desk and easel looked out the other toward the Royal caverns.

The floor was smooth, soft slate, and four decorative rails ringed the top of the entire room, each lined with beautiful tea sets and plates.

The furniture was also red velvet and gold, overstuffed and welcoming, but not overwhelming given the size of the room itself.

Arne showed them about the room and the lovely compact kitchen and a small bedroom which was filled with an enormous brass bed with black satin sheets. A still life of a laden tea table hung over an ornate black marble fireplace.

“Arne, I’m so happy for you,” Ori said and gave his friend another hug.

“I-I’m rather happy f-for myself,” Arne laughed. “Tay and Nodun talked me into m-moving in with them. It didn’t take m-much talking.”

“That’s what I thought,” Arne chuckled.

“I’m really sorry about your adad, Arne,” said Ori,

“Thanks, Ori, but I-I’m not.”

In fact Arne looked like he has been handed about a ton of mithril and the deed to a diamond mine.

“You don’t mind that your da has practically adopted Buer? He will take someone else back home with him?”

“I talked t-o amad last night. I’m staying in Erebor at least through the winter. You and I can work on the quest d-ocument and I’m doing projects f-full time for Master Brur.”

“That’s wonderful!” Ori hugged him impulsively.

“It is,” Arne agreed, hugging back. “Tay wants you and Dwalin t-o come for supper on second rest d-day.”

“We’d love to! I need to check Dwalin’s and Thorin’s schedule’s though.” Ori put on a lofty tone. “The crown never rests!”

Then he dissolved into giggles.

They were just in the door from the rededication, when Vi and Margr’s carriage whipped around the corner from the tunnel on two wheels and skidded to a stop at the steps.

Margr waved something over her head.

“Oi! Ori! We go’ another one!”

Ori frowned, another what? Fashion statement? Son? Husband? He looked again as they all but bounced up the steps. Margr shook a piece of paper.

“It’s another letter from th’ Shire!” Vi shouted.

“Really? That was quick,” said Ori. “Come inside. We’ll have tea.”

The letter was in a slightly different, but familiar hand.

As he read the address, Ori got a sick feeling.

It was from the Shire, all right. It was from Bag End.

“Quartz?”

“Could you please find Bilbo for me?”

“Sure.” Quartz gave a raven-ish shrug and flew off.

“What is it?” Margr asked.

“Oh! Is it bad news at last?” Vi cried.

“If it’s from who I think it’s from, it’s always bad news,” said Ori.

“Found him!” Quartz croaked as Bilbo and Thorin entered from the receiving room.

“Is that Vi and Margr’s… I guess it is,” said Bilbo. “Hullo, ladies. Ori? What’s the matter?”

Ori held up the letter.

“Lobelia.”

Vi and Margr gaped at him, then Margr ventured.

“What?”

Ori explained, “It’s from Bilbo’s cousin, Lobelia Sackville Baggins.”

“She had cruel parents,” said Vi. “Our Mar, isn’t lobelia tha’… whatchacallit?”

Margr snorted.

Thorin and Bilbo stared at them.

“I remember as me mam tol’ me once,” said Margr. “A lobelia plant, tha’s th’ fancy name fer it, bu’ plain folks call it pukeweed.”

Bilbo laughed.

He sat and laughed so hard, his feet stamped the ground in unison and he held his sides.
Vi asked. “But, what would this Pukeweed Baggins want with us?”

Thorin shrugged, sitting next to Bilbo, who went roaring off afresh.

“There’s only one way to find out. Would you mind if Bilbo and I stayed through the proceedings?”

“Course no’, our Thorin,” said Margr. “Mebbe this Pukeweed wants somethin’ hobbitish we don’ know a thin’ abou’.”

Every time someone called Lobelia ‘Pukeweed’ it set Bilbo off again, and Ori feared the hobbit would asphyxiate before he could contribute anything helpful.

Gamely, Ori slit open the envelope with his boot knife and removed the folded letter.

This paper wasn’t torn and blotted with anger like Lobelia’s last letter. Idly, he wondered if she ever managed to move that statue and its erection out of her garden.

He read:

“Dear Mistresses Vi and Margr,

Ladies, it has come to my attention that you are among the most fashionable and highly placed dams under the Mountain of Erebor. We have seen your magnificent gowns in Vug and, indeed, one can scarcely go to gatherings of any size without hearing your names. The younger generation of hobbit ladies admire you and your clothing perhaps far more than any other dwarf or dwarrowdam of which our people have ever heard.”

“How many dwarrow do you suppose that is?” Ori asked Bilbo.

“At least three,” Bilbo replied. “Please proceed.”

“My reason for writing you is to let you know that you have a great opportunity here in the Shire, one which you can scarcely afford to pass up. If you were to design clothing expressly for hobbit ladies, and import them here to the Shire, or even set up shop to have them manufactured in the Shire, your fortune would far outstrip even your fame.”

Vi turned to Margr.

“Wonder how much she wants.”

“Oh, only abou’ ninety percent, I reckon,” said Margr.

“Should I go on?” Ori asked.

Vi waved a negligent hand.

“Oh, aye.”

“I propose a two-prong plan of attack. First, as esteemed fashion icons, you should immediately feel out the situation here in the Shire and, second, find a way to publish a version of Vug magazine especially edited for the West. You could call it Vug - West Farthing! Think of how glorious it would be! Face wigs for hobbit women! Caftans for Summer - the next best thing to wearing nothing at all! As your exclusive agent here in the Shire, I would, of course, require a modest fee for doing the greatest share of establishing you here.

“If you will kindly write to affirm your interest, I will reply as expeditiously as one may, and hopefully, the missive will reach you before the snows close the mountain passes of Eriador.”

Bilbo snorted.

“It’s amazing, all you have to do is wave money under her nose and suddenly she’s a wizard at geography.”
“Well? What do we do?” Vi asked.
Ori replied, “Are you interested?”
“Sure,” said Margr. “Don’t know anythin’ abou’ business an’ th’ like, but if them lasses are keen? I don’t particularly mind. Really, it’s Dipfa she wants to talk to. We just act as her - whatehecballit, Vi?”
“Mannequins,” said Vi. “Makes us sound like wee men. Oh, here’s our Dori. Dor, yeh’ll never guess!”
“Wait,” said Thorin. “Ori, is there any more to that letter?”
“Flattery, mostly,” said Ori. “She does say it would be entirely up to Vi and Margr what sorts of fashions they wanted to present, and, of course, they would have to come up with a name for the line.”
Ori handed Dori the letter.
“Isn’t this from that horrible Shire person?” she asked.
“Which one?” Bilbo asked
“The one with a face like a rat’s arse,” said Dori.
“That’s the one,” said Bilbo.
“Well, let me think,” she said. “She does seem eager for her share, doesn’t she?”
“Her greed is predictable,” said Bilbo.
“Is it?” Dori asked pleasantly. “Is it really? I wonder… How far would she go to get her piece of this particular pie?”
Ori knew that look. He nearly squealed with glee, but contained himself. Barely.
Dori mused, “Bilbo? What do you think of this?”
“I could care less, really, but you’ll have my complete approbation if you’ll name the clothing line after me.”
Dori’s smile curled round at the edges.
“A caftan is sort of like a bag, isn’t it. Like wearing a bag. You could call it BilBags.”
The sisters shrieked, kicking and screaming with laughter.
“Dori,” said Thorin, “that’s beautiful.”
“I think so, too,” said Dori. “What do you think, Bilbo? Is your cousin greedy enough that she’s willing to put your name on her clothes?”
“I have every faith in old Pukeweed,” said Bilbo.
Dori was setting down the first basket of breakfast scones and crocks of butter when Ori arrived.

“Pet! What are you doing up so early!”

“Dwalin was on patrol with Fili last night. I never sleep well when he’s away.” Ori sat at the table, with only Thorin and Balin yet for company. It was barely dawn.

“Nerving yourself up over his safety will make you sick, pet,” Dori fussed.

“I can’t do anything about his safety,” said Ori. “I have to be ready if a soldier comes to say I’m needed.”

Balin shook his head. He grasped Dori’s fluttering hand and kissed it.

“Our wee brother’s a soldier’s husband, me dear. There’s naught f’r it.”

“There are several cups of chamomile tea for it if he keeps that up.”

Ori was beyond the point of worrying about pots of chamomile tea. He merely smiled and shrugged apologetically. For a moment Dori looked terribly disappointed, then bustled back toward the kitchen, muttering about ham.

Kili and the ham arrived at exactly the same moment.

“It’s a gift,” Thorin said to Ori.

“Morning!” Kili cried, filling his plate while still in motion.

Kili sat down at the breakfast table, then he suddenly stopped and said, “Oh. Right.” He stood half way and took a folded piece of paper out of his pocket, looked at it as if it might bite him, and thrust it at Balin.

“I wrote the treaty with us and Dale and Greenwood.”

Balin swallowed his ham, put down his utensils and accepted the sacrificial offering.

“Did yeh, lad? Well, let’s see.”

Thorin rested his elbow on the table and his chin in his hand in expectation. Of what, it was impossible to say.

“So,” said Balin as he unfolded the paper, “yeh didn’t sleep through all yer lessons after all.”

“Well, yes, I did, so I had to think about it a lot, then think a lot more, and then I thought, it’s mostly a mutual aid agreement, really. It’s to say properly what we’ve already said. So, I thought: who else has a treaty like that? Then I remembered, Gondor and Rohan do. And it’s brilliant really, the way they spell it out, but in a nice way, that they’ll come to each other’s defense, but they won’t help if the other kingdom just goes and starts trouble somewhere else. So, that’s mostly what this says.”

“Aye, nearly word f’r word,” Balin affirmed.

“Then I cobbled together the rest with things from our treaties with the under monarchs, the trades and markets and stuff, which isn’t the main point, right? So I put that at the end, and, I know I shouldn’t’ve done it, but I asked Tauriel and Sigrid to read it. Yes, I know! I know! They aren’t whadyacall ‘disinterested parties’, but I didn’t think, in this case, that was so bad, and they liked it!” Balin read the paper over again and handed it to Thorin.

“Aye, in this case, it was probably harmless, lad. It’s a good treaty, actually. Mebbe yeh were givin’ me half an ear in yer sleep, as it’s essentially wha’ I would’ve written meself. Thorin?”
“Really, Kili, this is an excellent first try,” Thorin pronounced. The prince beamed. The king continued, “Your handwriting is still atrocious.” “It’s true,” said Kili, nodding vigorously in agreement. “But we’ll clean up the language and you can present it.” “Really?” Kili yelped. “Yes, really,” said Thorin, “only, you’ll have to copy it over before Ori puts it on parchment.” “So he can read my messy handwriting. I get it. Yep.” “No, because I’m having this copy framed and hanging it on my office wall.” Kili’s jaw fell open. “Like when we were badgers and drew you stuff? That’s… an honor.” He threw himself out of his seat and glomped onto Thorin with no regard for eggs, ham or tea. “Thank you!” Thorin laughed, hugging him back. “You’re very welcome. Good job.” Tauriel arrived with Legolas and Gimli. Kili flung himself at her next, shouting, “Tauriel! They liked the treaty!” She laughed and said, “Of course they did, mel nin! Of course they did!” Then Kili ran off in the direction of the sitting room, shouting, “Mam! Mam!” Fili and Dwalin entered from the stable as Kili left through the kitchen. The pair were just in from early morning patrol. Though they’d had a wash at the barracks, they both still looked tired. “Morning,” said Fili. “Where’s Ki going? He hasn’t yelled for Mam like that since the day he ripped the arse of his trousers and his smalls at the same time.” “Your brother has written his first treaty,” said Thorin. “And it was quite a success.” “Knew it,” said Fili, as he slugged back his first cup of tea without cream or sugar and refilled his cup “I told him so.” Dwalin settled beside Ori with a kiss and a cuddle. “Mornin’, love,” he rumbled. “Good morning. Was it a quiet patrol?” “Amazin’, bu’, aye,” said Dwalin, heaping his plate with eggs. “Glorfindel’s been goin’ through th’ streets a’ Dale jus’ a’fore midnigh’, movin’ drunks out a’ th’ gutters, gettin’ folks used t’ bein’ off th’ streets f’r when th’ cleanin’ flood comes through. Makes f’r a quieter patrol.” “How are the preparations going for the street cleaning?” Thorin asked. Fili poured and drank his third cup of tea. “There was so much worthless refuse and effluent obstructing the drains, it took far longer than we first thought. Master Teilnar says the trap mechanisms for the waste water will be up today and the cleaning can begin tomorrow night. I know you’re busy, Idad, but you might want to drop in on Bard at some point. He’s still not entirely convinced cleaning the streets in Dale every night is possible. He understands how it’s supposed to work, yes, but Sigrid says he still doesn’t trust that water will come through the taps at his own house every time he opens them.” Thorin nodded, looking troubled. “It’s the least I can do, given that the Durins’ neglect has made that possible. That’s a debt I’ll never repay, but I’m going to try. Fili, not that I’d begrudge you, but that’s your fourth cup of tea. Are you alright? When will you be able to get some sleep?” “This afternoon, probably. We’re inspecting the last of the old noble residences this morning, making sure they’re ready for some Dale folk to move in, the last of the dwarrow and men who were living at Mistress Annis’ rooming house.” “Is she going to stop taking borders?” Ori asked. “She was so good to me and Dori and Nori when we had to leave our old boarding house and didn’t have anywhere else to go. It would be a shame if she wasn’t there for people any more.” “I don’t know about that. She’s going to be in charge of the meal program that Bard’s planned for the Dale schools,” said Fili. “Even if the badgers’ parents drink their pay, the badgers’ll still get one good meal a day.”
Fili grinned into his tea and continued.
“The best part is that the seed money for it is coming from the treasure Calmar was hoarding.
Eventually, Bard wants to go with Hamfast’s idea to start gardens to supply the schools directly.”
Balin chuckled.
“That’s excellent.”
Thorin got a dangerous gleam in his eye.
Dwalin smirked.
“Wha’ now, o high king a’ all dwarrow?”
“I think,” said Thorin, “that Bard has been working very hard, and he deserves a reward of sorts.”
“He wouldn’t accept one,” said Fili.
“I know,” Thorin replied. “Which is why I’m going to offer it to Thranduil. Ori, may I have your pen and paper a moment?”
“Oh course,” said Ori, and slid the items over.
They watched as Thorin scratched out a message, blotted it, then leaned back and called out the window for Roäc.

Early the next morning, Ori clambered into the cart with Bilbo, who took up the reins. Honda and Vespa were in harness and moved forward when Bilbo clicked at them. Thorin and Dwalin, on Minty and Harley, trotted on either side of the cart. Roäc perched on Thorin’s shoulder. They had swallowed a quick breakfast, much to Dori’s disgust.

In the beginnings of dawn, they made their way out of the stable and across the meadow. At the wall, Thorin took out a key. He open the small door Ori knew Legolas and Tauriel once used. Ori realized the small door was an insert in a much larger door, which Thorin opened and Bilbo drove the cart through and Dwalin followed with the ponies. Thorin shut the door and locked it.

Here was a low anteroom, opposite was another small door which led to the far side of the barrier. Thorin turned to Roäc. Roäc fluttered forward and fitted his talons against the anteroom wall on the left. Roäc inserted his beak into a niche and twitched his head.

Ori watched as another large door opened silently and revealed a substantial lift. They entered the lift with the cart and ponies. Thorin nodded to Roäc, the raven turned the mechanics again and the door slid shut, leaving them in the soft light of phosphorus.

Ori turned a quizzical eye to Thorin.
“He’ll meet us outside. These things make him jumpy.”
“How will he get down?” Bilbo asked. “You locked the door after us.”
“There’s a raven bolt hole in the ceiling,” Thorin explained.
Dwalin pulled the lever on the side of the wall and they dropped slowly and smoothly downward.
“This is amazing.” Bilbo admired.
“Old escape hatch,” Dwalin told him. “This goes down ‘a path leadin’ t’ the river.”
“Very convenient,” Bilbo agreed with a smile.
The lift slowed and Ori saw a locked grate before them. Dwalin unlocked this and pulled it aside. There were bushes and trees close by, and an enormous boulder hid it from prying eyes. Roäc peered down from a tree.
“All clear,” Roäc announced, “Bard and the elf are at the river bank.”
They exited the lift, locked the grate, and Thorin pulled a lever. The boulder lifted upward and they rode out into smooth meadow grass. Roäc fluttered back, there was the sound of the mechanism, and the boulder dropped back into place.
Ori saw the river in the distance. It was fast-moving and splashed and sang over stones. Thranduil’s elk jogged toward them. Ori would have sworn it was smiling.

Bard was all business. After explaining to Ori, Bilbo and Thranduil that they needed to be still and talk softly, he opened up the tackle boxes and instructed Thorin and Dwalin on all the pieces and parts of the contents and the poles. Bard had brought an extra one, so Dwalin joined the fishing tutorial.

In their oldest boots and breeches, Bard, Thorin, and Dwalin waded out into the stream until they were waist deep for dwarrow and Bard went further. Bard demonstrated casting.

Ori watched with interest. The flicking of the slender, bendy poles caused the ‘flies’ to dance lightly over the surface of the water. Under a huge umbrella, rather like the ones at the inn, Thranduil and Bilbo sat on folding willow chairs in the sparkling shallows, they paddled their feet and chatted idly about elves they both knew.

Ori studied the twitching lines. Bard’s fly danced and whirled, then a fish leapt out of the water and snatched the fly out of the air. Thorin and Dwalin stood ready. Bard tugged his line a few times to ‘set’ the hook as he said. Bard then wound the line in quickly. Down in the depths, the fish wasn’t having any of it and tugged back. Bard let the line run, then, when it was slack, wound it in furiously. This back and forth went on for a time until Bard was able to wind the line in fully and gestured wildly. Dwalin chucked him the hand net. Bard scooped deep in the water and the three fishermen returned to see the prize.

Bard carefully removed the hook from the fish’s mouth and put it in a large openwork basket that lay in the water, secured by a rope to a tree on the bank. Thus the fish would be fresh and alive when they finished fishing for the day. The three went back out and returned to working their poles.

The sun was high as they loafed on the bank, eating the goodies Dori had packed. Bard abruptly turned to Thorin and asked, “You didn’t know a mine collapse was imminent? I’m being nosey like a dwarf. I do have a beard, after all.”

Thorin tossed an apple core at him.

“Yes, I can see you shrinking now. Go on. Ask.”

“I thought dwarrow could feel the rock shift.”

“We can,” said Thorin, “but for most of us it’s like background noise. It’s always there. Only very gifted dwarrow can read critical stress fracturing. Like Ahkn, they tend to be mining engineers.”

“I wondered why those dwarrow got themselves trapped. What were they doing in a played out mine?”

“Gleaning,” said Thorin.

“Yes, the miner at open court said it was a right.”

“For dwarrow, it is. Once a mine’s abandoned, it becomes a sort of universal property. Anyone can work it for whatever they might find in the walls or mine tailings. But it’s dangerous, because those mines aren’t inspected or maintained.”

“You can’t order them closed off?”

“Most of them are already inaccessible for one reason or another, partially collapsed or filled in to keep badgers from getting lost in them. Early on, my ancestors tried to keep track of active and inactive mines by drawing onion-skin overlays to survey maps, but after a dozen layers of overlays, things start to get rather murky.”

“An’ they never included little side caverns where yeh migh’ find small seams a’ ore,” said Dwalin. “Those aren’ really mines.”

Dwalin lazed with his head propped up on Ori’s thigh as Ori fed him grapes. Ori watched as a squirrel bounded out of the trees, seized the apple core and ran off with it.

“There’s more to it than that, of course,” said Thorin. “You can’t keep a dwarf from mining. It’s what we do. If the average khuzd thinks there’s something shiny in that closed off mine, they’ll find a way to get to it. Best you can do is remind them, we’ll only go so far to rescue them, and we don’t recover bodies.”

“Takes ‘you break it, you bought it’ to a whole different level,” Bard mused.

Once they finished, Bard, Thorin and Dwalin returned to the river.

Ori went with his sketchbook and graphite wand and sat down on a rock, changed his mind, and he clambered over to the fish basket and studied the fish. He admired the shimmering fish that Bard called a rainbow trout, due to the color that speckled along the sides of the plump body. It explored its new home and ate any water beetles foolish enough to skate among the imprisoning strands.

Ori settled himself and carefully drew the fish from all different angles as it swam about. Bard return twice each time with a nice, sizable fish.

“How are Dwalin and Thorin doing?” Ori asked softly with a grin.

“They’re trying their best.” Bard tried not to snicker.

There was a gasp and a squeak form Bilbo. Ori looked up, as did Bard. Thorin had obviously caught something on his line. Bard hurried back to help. Thorin copied the tightening and play of the line as Bard had done. He gave a great yank and a huge fish leapt clear of the water, Thorin’s line in its mouth.

“Sweet Eru!” gasped Bard. Thorin wound in the line, holding himself solid against the fish’s struggling. Bard brought the net out and Thorin’s fish was captured.

Bard helped him bring it to the shore and lifted it out of the net. It was also a rainbow trout, but was almost as long as Thorin was tall.

“My love,” Bilbo cried and splashed out to Thorin’s side. “What an enormous fish! I’m so proud of you, and at your first try.”

Bard stared, grinning, and shaking his head.

“Beginner’s luck!” Bard managed. “That’s got to be the biggest trout I’ve ever seen outside of the lake!”

“Righ’ lads,” Dwalin said with a laugh. “Let’s be havin’ ‘em, seein’ tha’ they’re likin’ th’ bait.”

Bard caught three more, Thorin got four more, but three of them had to be freed as they were too small. Dwalin caught two good sized ones and Ori hugged him.

They stopped for tea and naps. Ori drew the river playing about the rocks. He collected some pretty flowers growing on the bank, and made a large sketch of the entire scene. Thranduil and Bard went further up the bank for a ‘little walk’ as Bard had suggested. Thorin and Bilbo napped side by side among the wood flowers. Dwalin snoozed on Ori’s back as he lay on his stomach drawing the water flowing over a boulder, the stones, and a ladybug, stuffing its face with aphids on a small plant.

The fishermen did go back out one last time as the sun was getting low but nothing was caught and the fishing devolved into a water fight. This was stopped when several ‘stray’ splashes nearly soaked Thranduil and Bilbo.

“Come along, or we’ll be late for dinner and we’re bringing it,” Bilbo called. The cart was repacked. A large wash tub was filled with water and the fish basket placed in it. Thranduil took Bilbo up behind him on the elk, while Ori drove the cart with the soaked fishermen in the back laughing, talking, and flicking water at each other.

The elk trotted happily back into Dale and they were soon at Dale Hall. Bard said he was just going in to change, but they all came in with him. The entrance hall was amazingly bright with light. There stood Gridr, looking pleased with herself, and a giggling Fili with the Bardlings were all waiting. Bard stared up at the ceiling. Ori clapped his hand over his mouth.

Hanging from the ceiling was a weird contraption with familiar large pieces of metal tubing of all shapes and sizes, each wrapped in silver, rose gold, and gold wire. The straight tubes, curlycues, and s-bends were now all fitted together. It hung form the center of the ceiling like a spreading metal flower. From nearly every curl hung familiar gleaming poisonous green, purplish pink and sulphur yellow gems. Many of Buer’s tiny lights were tucked in next to every gem. Bard stared at the light and the sparkles of colored spots of light cast all over the room.

Ori thought the light flower looked rather like the ancient crowns Bard’s people wore long ago.

“What do you think?” asked Thorin with a grin. “You’ve been working with such ardor, I thought you’d like a present and Thranduil agreed with me.”

Bard laughed so hard he dropped down into a nearby chair.

“I think you’re all arseholes,” he finally gasped, “but I love it. Thank you!”

The Bardlings pounced on him and Thranduil came over and laid a white hand on Bard’s shoulder.

“You liked it so much when it came out of the box, I had to ask Thorin about it.”
“Oh, really?” Bard cocked an eye at the King-Father.
“Indeed, fortunately for me, Mistress Gridr already knew what it was.”
“Besides,” Girdr chuckled, “while I worked on it, I found the old contract plate. It was for ordered for some man king. As near as we can sort out, one of his descendants ended up here, so we think it ought to be yours.”
“Thank you all again! It’s amazing and I’m proud to have it hanging here.”
“I like it, too,” giggled Sigrid. “Now if we’re to get any dinner, I need those fish cleaned and ready to fry.”
“You’re going to cook?” Bard asked.
“With Gridr and Fili’s help, yes. I do remember how.”
Ori followed Bard, Thorin and Dwalin out to the shed behind the kitchen. He was intrigued by the idea of Bard teaching the two to gut fish. He was disappointed as, being soldiers, both knew how to forage and deal with fish. The difference lay in the ways of doing it. Bard scraped the scales off, then sliced the belly open. Dwalin and Thorin just cut the fish on the belly, from mouth to tail. They had a huge noisy argument about which way was better as Bard said they should be cooked without the scales on for eating and Dwalin and Thorin saying that anyone who tried to eat the scales, shouldn’t be eating fish in the first place. Ori left when they started to see who could eat the most fish eyes.

He went into the kitchen. Gridr diced cucumbers fine, while Thranduil measured oil, vinegar and herbs, and chatted to Bilbo. Sigrid was making chips and dumping them into a roasting pan in the oven that kept them hot. Ori helped himself to a few to ‘make sure they were alright’.

When everyone was clean and the food ready, Thranduil conducted them all to the dining room. Ori admired the room, it was fine wood and airy white curtains and table cloths. A long walnut table seated them all comfortable and there was a merry party over the delicious fresh fish, salad and chips. Thranduil looked happily serene as he sat at the foot and Bard at the head, Thorin sat on Bard’s right and Bilbo on Thranduil’s left. Gridr explained how the light, which she said was called in Westron, a ‘chandelier’ from the older form of candelles, or many candles, was put together and how it was decorated with gems to brighten the lights, just as dwarrow did with shards of quartz or mica on theirs.

After dessert which Gridr had brought, a delicious pound cake served with raspberry syrup and frozen custard, Thranduil brought them upstairs to the sitting room.

This was obviously designed by Thranduil, with soft green walls, and the large windows curtained in filmy palest green lace. Plants grew everywhere and the lighting was lovely. Every table or stand held a wide bowl where round candles floated.

The furniture was woven willow reeds and full of cushions. The teal sofa Bard and Thranduil had bought from iKeeha held pride of place before an ornate fireplace. Once they were settled, Thranduil closed the windows against the cooling breezes off the lake. He smiled on Bard.

“We may talk freely now, my enchantments have made anyone outside unable to hear us.”

Thorin raised an eyebrow and Nori, dragging Balin after him, slid up through the floor. Balin brushed himself off.

“Our Nori, f’r all this may be easy f’r yeh, it’s no’ th’ bes’ way a’ gettin’ abou’.”

“Gotta do what a dwarf’s gotta do.” Nori shrugged then turned to Thorin. “We got papers ta show you.”

While Gridr played an odd game with Bain and Tilda, which Tilda called balrogs and basements, Ori took notes on what was discussed.

Balin and ‘Ursith’ had been very busy.

Ursith had ordered the renovation of two of the warehouses he owned in the center of the Night Market. They would be joined together and the open floor was going to be full of gaming tables, with rat races and cricket racing at the sides.

On either end would be restaurants and areas for musicians, dancing and shows. The upstairs would have meeting rooms for high stakes games which would be secretly equipped with spaces for ravens to enter unseen and listen.
The rest would be a fancy hotel attached via a bar to what had been in King Nain’s time, the old brothels. These Ursith planned to clean up, make fancy and this would become Bliss Street, which would have an entrance to the alley of Divine Bliss. Balin and Binni would hire owners and staff from the pleasure guilds and all would be in service to the king as spies. This would become a very expensive side of town, for anyone with criminal tendencies to gather there. Ursith had also offered a similar arrangement to King Bard for three warehouses near the docks in Dale.

Thranduil and Bard laughed uproariously as Nori explained all his plans. Ori glanced up from his notes and smiled to see Nori eagerly outlining everything. He had not overlooked a single thing as Thorin and Bard questioned him on how things could go wrong. Ori felt proud of Nori. Nori’s dream of being the reigning crime lord of Dale and Erebor was coming true and Nori was absolutely loyal to Thorin as the Spymaster.

It was near midnight when they finished. Ori tidied his notes and saw Gridr curled in a chair, knitting. Bain and Tilda were asleep on the floor beside her.

Thranduil bade them all good night and lifted Tilda easily. He looked about to lift Bain, but Bard laughed softly and shook his head.

“He’d never live it down,” said Bard.

He knelt and shook Bain awake.

“Time for bed, son.”

“Uh? Oh, alright.”

He nodded blearily to the company as Thranduil bore them off to their beds.

Bard escorted the company downstairs. Nori vanished off somewhere. Gridr had made sure the cart was pulled into a hidden area, so Balin lay down in the bottom of the cart with the empty baskets, covered with the picnic blanket and Gridr sat next to him with Fili. Bilbo drove the cart with Ori seated next to him and Thorin and Dwalin rode beside them through strangely silent streets. The statues of dwarf nobles and warriors that held the street signs and lamps made the place lovely and welcoming. They met the night-watch at the edge of town. Glorfindel was excited to see them and assured them the streets were cleared of people and they had just enough time to get on the mountain road.

Once they gained the road home, they stopped and looked back. There was a roar of water as the geysers from the mountain were released and flowed at high speed throughout Dale. Ori could see people hanging out of windows watching the water.

“Come,” said Thorin, “Dori will be waiting up.”

He was answered by a snore from Balin buried in the back.
Ori eats everything.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. As Dollypegs put it, “Exactly like it says on the tin.” Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Despite his late night, Ori was in his office at home in the early morning. He worked on an outline for his presentation of the Quest. His sketches were collected in their books at the corner of his desk. These had been copied by several other scribes for the library and the archives. He had a full manifest of the contents of the box complete with detailed drawings of every single item it contained.

He had the lists and descriptions of all the books Lady Galadriel had rescued and a letter from her that gave her report and opinions for the quest. She had included Celeborn’s preparations as well.

Another letter contained Dain’s and Sculdis’ reports on it along with all the diagrams Dain had left in his care.

Omi and Loli were off interviewing the mithril masters for their views on the building of the bridge.

Bujni and Dipfa were working on their own report of the events and the jumpsuits Dipfa had created for them.

Omosuil and Nomiriel had submitted their report within days of their return. Elrond and LIndir written up their observations. Eowyn had given her report and added a letter from her Uncle with his royal opinion on the contents and history revealed during his time as well as his interesting traveling arrangements. Ori had Dwalin’s, Balin’s and Gimli’s and Legolas’ reports. To his surprise, Kili and Tauriel had turned in a report as well. Dwalin had rigorously interviewed Haldir and the elf captain had also submitted a gracefullly written report. Quartz, in an act of amazing bravery, had offered to go with Balin and interview Red Queen.

He slowly began building these together with his own notes. Re-reading these, he shook his head. So much had been done and prepared and the entire adventure had taken from a new moon to full.

He sat back. He had been married in the spring and now it was the beginning of autumn. He had been married, become part of the royal family, seen the death of King Thror, Thorin’s coronation, had his own adventure, and now Thorin’s betrothal. So much had happened to him. He’d been a journeyman scribe working for coppers and now he was the scribe of the king.

“An’ mine,” the hot boom reminded him.

Ori ducked his head and smiled. He set himself to work. This was for Mahal as much as anyone else.

He was surprise by a knock on the door and Dori came in with a tray and shut the door behind him.

“Make a little room, pet.”

Ori moved a pile to the other side of his desk and Dori put down the tray, on it was a small plate of several buttered scones, a jam pot and two cups and a squat little teapot. Ori looked up at Dori with a grin.

“You saw me eat my breakfast, Ori’s Dori.”
“Elevenes,” Dori explained, pulling a chair to the side of the desk and pouring out hot, sweetened xocolātl with cream. Ori watched, waiting for Dori to tell him whatever he intended to.

Dori put jam on a scone and gave to him. Ori nibbled this gratefully.

“Pet?”

“Yes, Ori’s Dori?”

“Have you and Bilbo discussed the hobbit side of things that came out of the box?”

“Yes, but there are a couple of things I need to clear up.”

“Would you care to do so after this?”

“Certainly. Is he ready?”

“He did mention such earlier and I’d like him…well, out of the way. I have a meeting with a few people in one of the upstairs rooms.”

Ori cocked his head. That didn’t sound usual. Dori smiled.

“We’re planning Bilbo’s and Frodo’s birthday party, pet. It’s all over the mountain and Dale how auspicious it is that the consort-to-be was born right around Durin’s Day.”

“Oh!” Ori laughed. “In that case, shall I attempt to keep him as long as I can?”

“Thank you, pet. I knew I could count on you. Eat up, I remember how you are when you get deep in your studies.”

Ori took the third scone Dori offered.

Dori looked about the piles on the desk.

“Is it going well?”

“Yes,” Ori said. He was pleased with the progress he had made so far. “All the information is here, I’m organizing and weaving it together, so to speak.”

“You are always so good at that, pet. Have I told you how proud I am of you?”

“Thank you, Ori’s Dori. I’m proud of you, too. Sometimes I think you outdo Thorin in royal popularity.”

Dori waved this away.

“I’m a Bearer, we make what the king does holy and we create a sense of occasion for our people.”

“It’s more than that, Dori. If the king was Thror, I think you would have either bullied him into mending his ways or simply taken over.”

Dori blushed and shrugged.

“Taken over? Pet, really! I think I would have gently pushed Thror to abdicate and encouraged him to crown Thorin.”

“And the arkenstone?” Ori teased.

“Oh, Nori would have stolen that quite easily.”

The brothers looked at each other and laughed.

“Yes, and now he’s going to be king of the underworld as Ursith,” Ori pointed out.

“Yes,” Dori sighed. “It’s good for him to have something to keep him busy and look out for our Thorin, he’s far too clever for his own good and this is the sort of thing he likes.”

Dori rose and pour Ori another cup of xocolātl.

“You finished that up, pet, and then pop through to Bag End East.”

“Thank you, yes. Dori?”

“Yes, pet?”

“Did you ever imagine we would be where we are now?”

Dori paused, then,

“I knew you and Nori were made to do great things. Myself? I knew a Bearer would not be left doing nothing in the hind end of Dale. How it would come about I had no idea.”

Dori went out with the tray and Ori pondered what he had just learned.

A few moments later, satchel on his shoulder, he was knocking at the door behind the ogee arch.

Bilbo took a pie out of the oven and put it on a metal rack on the table. It was obviously blackberry.
“That looks really good,” said Ori.
“For dessert this evening. I’ve been canning berries all day. I just couldn’t stand to look at another glass jar. Though, if you are hungry, there’s a different one I’d like you to try.”

Bilbo went to the larder and brought out something that looked like heaps of lightly singed marshmallow on a crust.
“What kind of pie is that?” Ori asked.
“Lemon meringue.”
“Really?”
“Yes, quite exotic, I know. Deneb gave me the recipe, and I’ve been trying it out. It’s like lemon curd under a blanket of baked egg whites. I thought I would serve it when Lord Zark and his family come to dinner this week.”
“That looks amazing,” said Ori.
“I haven’t tasted it yet, I have no idea if it’s any good. Are you willing to chance it?”
“I’ll try to be brave,” said Ori.
“That’s the spirit.”

Bilbo got down plates and forks and a pie slicer and server. A cross section of the pie was even more intriguing.
They sat down with a pot of tea to taste. Three minutes later, the slices were demolished and they were cutting second helpings.

“Lord Zark and his family are coming to dinner at Bag End East?” Ori asked.
“Yes,” said Bilbo, “they have some sort of business proposal for the crown, but there’s no reason they shouldn’t get a good meal out of it as well, and the grandbadgers are just a little younger than Frodo, so they can play out in the meadow after dinner, while the grown ups talk about boring things. Bard will be there as well. Would you and Dwalin like to join us?”
“When?”
“Two nights hence.”
“I think Dwalin is on patrol, but I’d love to. Does Thorin need me to take notes?”
“No, no, no, you’ll be here as a guest. If anything needs noting, I’ll do it. I think if it were more official, or more public, they would simply have requested a business meeting and we’d be eating cold cuts and beer. Not that there’s anything wrong with them, but it makes pie seem so much less necessary.”
“That would be a sad state of affairs,” Ori agreed.
“So, has Dori finished planning my and Frodo’s birthday party yet? I take it that’s why you’re here. Keeping me busy and out of the way?”

Ori crowed out a laugh.

Bilbo chuckled.
“He’s no more subtle than my Aunt Donnamira. Whenever she invites you to someone’s surprise party, you always bring presents to give because you know it’s for you.”
“All the same, could you at least pretend to be surprised?”
“I always do,” said Bilbo. “It would be impolite not to.”

He looked down at his pie, studying it. Then he ran his finger through the meringue, and drew it across Ori’s lips.
Ori darted out his tongue to lick up the meringue, and caught the tip of Bilbo’s finger in the process.
Slowly, holding Bilbo’s gaze, he sucked the finger into his mouth and swirled his tongue around it.
He was not blushing. He was NOT.
“You’re adorable when you turn that shade,” said Bilbo.
Alright, he was blushing. He gave the finger a last lick.
“Do we have the privacy?”
“Frodo and Sam are at lessons for the afternoon. Thorin is touring the Dale schools with Bard. Also, all my doors lock from the inside. I admit, at first I thought the level of security in our quarters was a bit of overkill, but now I’m beginning to see the advantages.”

“So, what are the potential venues?” Ori asked formally.

“I have a bed the size of a small island. The bathtub is always nice, because you get dirty and clean in the same place. I often fancy the library. There’s some ridiculously large, cushy furniture in there.”

“Fooling around among the books,” Ori mused. “That sounds positively wicked! I don’t suppose you have any dictionaries?”

“A few. Why?”

“Odd quirk of mine.”

Bilbo offered his hand.

“Shall we?”

Ori took it, and knew he was grinning foolishly.

“Let’s.”

They almost ran to the library, giggling. The door slammed and locked behind them. Bilbo tore down his braces, Ori kicked off his boots and flung off his tunic and they grasped at each other, kissing and rubbing, clumsily, desperately, unfastening each other’s trousers. Still half-dressed, they dropped down onto the leather couch, and onto each other.

Ori lay on his back, with Bilbo a lovely, hot weight atop him, the two of them licking and kissing messily. Ori delved his handed down the back of Bilbo’s trousers and kneaded his arse.

“Oh, your arse it lovely. It’s like warm rolls from the oven.”

Bilbo laughed into his neck.

“Such flattery!”

“I must speak as I find,” said Ori.

He found Bilbo’s mouth again and they enjoyed each other for long minutes, snickering, sighing, and growing increasingly hot.

“Is there… anything… I shouldn’t do?” Ori panted between kisses.

“You can lick my ears, but don’t bite them.”

“Oh, Mahal!”

Bilbo sucked at his neck from jaw to collar bone, nuzzling his skin. The skin of Bilbo’s nose was actually a different texture than the rest, almost silky. Ori traced the edges of Bilbo’s ear with the very tip of his tongue and felt Bilbo shudder. Bilbo’s ear twitched and he sighed.

“Yes,” the hobbit breathed. “Just like that.”

Bilbo’s shirt was tossed to the floor. Ori’s undertunic quickly followed.

Ori rolled over so Bilbo was under him.

Bilbo laughed.

“And to think I’ve always thought this couch ridiculously large,” he said.

“You and Thorin don’t have sex on the couch?”

“He’s more of an armchair dwarf.”

Ori kissed and licked his way across Bilbo’s torso.

“Do you like your nipples played with?” Ori asked.

“Yes please.”

“Oh, they’re sweet.”

“I don’t put powdered sugar on them or anything.”

“Not that kind of sweet, silly,” said Ori, as he ran his tongue in circles around one and pinched the other.

“Mmm, yes, like that,” said Bilbo.

He thrust them up to give Ori better purchase. They were more sensitive even than Dwalin’s. Ori took his time, sucking gently on each as Bilbo’s breathing quickened and he writhed, muttering. Bilbo’s cock hardened against Ori’s thigh.

They rolled over one more and flailed in thin air and hit the rug, still tangled together.

“Ooops,” said Bilbo, happily on top.

“You feel so nice on top of me,” Ori confessed.
“As long as I don’t accidentally break your ribs falling on you.”
“Dwarrow are made of stone, remember?”
“I know at least one part of you is.”
“I need to take off my trousers.”
“Allow me. Oh, what adorable smalls.”
Ori face-palmed. They had been a gift from Dwalin. They were amethyst with little pink hearts embroidered over them.
“I’ll give you fifty gold, if you promise never to tell anyone else I own these.”
“I’m feeling compassionate right now. Wait until you see mine.”
That had to wait, however, as Bilbo unbuttoned and pulled back Ori’s smalls and his cock sprang forth.
“What an eager fellow,” Bilbo teased. “Is he friendly? Does he like to be petted?”
Ori was far too red and flustered to give a coherent answer, but it was just as well.
Bilbo took hold of his cock and ran his lips over the length, and Ori couldn’t think of anything to say at all.
He watched himself disappear by inches into Bilbo’s mouth. That clever mouth, so right for kisses, was also perfect for something else.
Ori groaned, then hissed as Bilbo swallowed.
“That’s… oh, that’s so nice,” he moaned, and let himself fall onto his back so savor it.
Bilbo smiled around him and hummed.
Ori’s muscles tightened as his pleasure rose. He twitched at every little, wet click of Bilbo’s tongue on Ori’s skin. His eyes closed almost involuntarily.
And then Bilbo was gone.
He half sat up, staring, as Bilbo kissed the head of Ori’s cock and grinned.
“You know,” said Bilbo, “if you turn around, I believe we’re the right height to do this to each other at the same time.”
Ori knew just which figure Bilbo meant. He’d often wished he could do it with Dwalin, but Ori would have ended up sucking on Dwalin’s navel. Now that he thought about that, it did have some appeal.
Even as he considered that, he shifted around.
Bilbo’s trousers were already down around his knees and his smalls...
White lawn with red and yellow embroidered flowers and green vines.
“They look curtains,” said Ori.
“I’d say they’re ready to open,” said Bilbo.
“Yes, I can see someone looking around the opening now.”
Bilbo was not anywhere near as big as Dwalin, but he was certainly plump and inviting enough.
Ori couldn’t help himself. He felt a voracious hunger that precluded subtly, as he popped the head into his mouth and sucked.
“Oh, great Yavanna!” Bilbo cried.
Ori pulled back, chagrined.
“Sorry. I’ll go slower.”
“It wasn’t a complaint, I promise,” said Bilbo.
Nonetheless, Ori set about exploring at a more leisurely pace. Bilbo’s foot hair, though sparser on his shins, grew thicker again over his knees and all the way up his crotch. It was also a different texture than dwarf fur, very soft. Ori could only wonder if this was where the idea of bunnies started, because it was just like rabbit hair.
“Soft,” he said. “And warm.”
“If you say cozy, you’re finishing this on your own,” said Bilbo with a laugh.
So they began in earnest, sprawled over each other, and Ori had no destination in mind except pleasure, drawn out as long as possible. Bilbo tasted rather like pumpkin pie, a fact which Ori was sure would make harvest dinners difficult for years to come. As his mouth worked, one of his hands took up the hobbit’s sac and rolled it around, as much because it was so pleasing to touch as because it made Bilbo’s prick shake a little harder.

When Ori felt Bilbo’s finger at his hole, he tried to relax. The slow, steady exhilaration of the mouth around his cock made it difficult. It was all he could do to keep his mind on his work, as it were. When the second finger breached him, slick with spit and precum, he stiffened and cried out, the cock falling from his lips as Bilbo steadily sucked and pumped at him.

Ori’s breath came in hard, heavy breaths, rising higher and higher into cries. He buried his face in Bilbo’s hip and rode the pleasure.

“Oh please oh please oh please oh please…”

He stretched taut, toes to eyelids, as he strained into his completion. He cried out and shuddered as he came, his cries and shudders diminishing each time until he was still.

“Was that alright?” Bilbo asked, petting his hip.

Ori chuckled.

“Yes, that was lovely. Give me a moment and I’ll… well… you know.”

Bilbo’s prick was hot and hard in his palm. He gripped it lightly and pulled, then slackened his grasp, tightened it, and did it again.

“You like that?”

“Yes,” said Bilbo, rolling onto his back. “Do go on.”

Ori turned and lay next to him, as they watched Ori stroke him off.

“Hold me,” said Bilbo.

Ori put an arm around Bilbo’s shoulders and cuddled him close. Bilbo slipped his arm around the back of Ori’s neck and kissed him.

The kisses deepened as the pace increased. Bilbo moaned into Ori’s mouth, then broke the kiss abruptly, and buried his face in Ori’s neck and moaned.

Spunk sprayed into the air and pattered down onto their skin and Ori continued pumping until, little by little, Bilbo relaxed.

They lay there, blissfully breathing, dozing off and on. Ori hadn’t realized he was so tired. Now that all his muscles were relaxed, they seemed to have no intention of being anything else.

“Sticky,” said Bilbo.

Ori laughed.

“I guess, eventually, we’ll have to move again, won’t we.”

“If not, we will waste away from lack of food,” Bilbo reminded him. “Or, maybe I’ll just eat you.”

“Too late,” said Ori with a giggle.

“I’m going to go fill the tub.”

“Which one?”

“The one in attached to our bedroom,” said Bilbo.

He didn’t move.

“Alright.”

Bilbo didn’t move.

“Bilbo?”

Bilbo snored.

Ori poked his side.

Bilbo laughed and squirmed.

“Faker!” Ori accused.

“Alright, alright, I’m going,” said Bilbo, finally sliding off and onto his feet.

He bent to pick up his clothing, very slowly and purposely.

“You’re so cute,” Ori said.

Bilbo shot him a saucy look over his shoulder.

“Cute?” He wiggled his arse. “Just cute?”

“Not just cute, but it is at the top of the list,” said Ori, nodding.

“Come along, master dwarf.”

Ori watched him go with regret, before he stood and gathered the rest of the clothing.
“Don’t go too quickly,” said Ori. “I’m not sure I’ll be able to find you on my own.”

“Funny,” Bilbo called from down the hall. “Follow the sound of the water.”

It occurred to Ori that he was walking through the king’s chambers naked.

Of course, he had also just had sex with the king’s intended.

And he felt happy. He felt satisfied. He even felt loved.

Ori had no idea why this was so easy with Bilbo, when he was so self-conscious at the idea of doing it with anyone else, other than his Dwalin.

Bilbo hummed busily as Ori followed through the bedroom and dropped his clothes next to Bilbo’s on the bench at the foot of the bed.

In the bath, he glanced over into the filling tub.

“So, the water is clear after all,” he said.

“Gandalf and Wandi can bathe in a punchbowl if they like,” said Bilbo wryly. “I prefer not to emerge blue, green or purple.”

“Did you enlarge this tub?” Ori asked. He slipped into the warm water with a sigh. “I swear it’s bigger than the last time I saw it.”

“It had to accommodate a whole house full of concubines,” Bilbo reminded him, dunking his head under the water. When he emerged, he shook his head, spraying droplets. His curls sprung out almost immediately. “Considering how many there were, this tub must have been crowded past the point of intimacy.”

“That must have been fun,” said Ori, “even to watch. They were all here voluntarily.”

“Figure 20 for days,” said Bilbo.

“I don’t think they could have done that in this tub.”

“The water would have added buoyancy,” said Bilbo.

“Now you sound like Bujini.”

“We won’t tell him,” said Bilbo.

He grabbed an enormous cake of soap and a cloth.

Ori sniffed.

“Is that coffee?” Ori asked.

“The grounds give it a nice smell and it’s quite a bracing feeling against the skin,” said Bilbo.

“So, instead of a punchbowl, this is more of a coffee pot.”

“It’s not that strong,” said Bilbo.

He began to wash Ori’s chest and shoulders. He stopped.

“Ori.”

“Not another one!” Ori wailed.

“Not another love bite?”

“What?”

“I’m sorry, I may have been a little aggressive.”

Ori laughed.

“Dwalin will tease me, but it’s alright. I’ll just add another scarf. You didn’t bit the rune for your name into my skin. Did you?”

“Not this time,” said Bilbo. “We’ll save that for later. Turn.”

He started at the shoulders, then started washing lower.

“I’m beginning to see the advantage of coffee soap,” said Ori. “Feels like someone’s scratching my back for me.”

“Relaxes and wakes you up at the same time,” said Bilbo. He traced the raven tattoo with his finger. “And you woke up with this on your back,”

“Yes. I didn’t take it well.”

“I don’t blame you. It must have been terrifying!”

“At least it didn’t hurt. Real tattoos are painful and bloody.”

“I’ve never regretted I don’t have one, but now I’m rather afraid it may be required.”

“Because of your title.”

“Yes, though Thorin has already told me I shouldn’t feel pressured. How would it look to the people if I didn’t have the appropriate marks? I can only ride so far on my hobbitness, especially with a dwarf husband who’s part hobbit himself, no matter how distantly.”

“It is. very distant,” said Ori.

“Yes, but it matters a great deal to Thorin. It angers him that someone could just cut pieces of his bloodline away, for any reason. He’s not about to grow hair on his feet, but he wants to understand who hobbits are, as a way to understand a little more about himself. And, also, because he wants to know what he’s talking about when any challenges come his way.”

“As they very well might during my quest presentation,” Ori acknowledged.

Bilbo grinned.

“It’s not going to hurt that the Honorable Bearer of Erebor can claim the same bloodline,” he reminded Ori.

“The pregnant Bearer of Erebor at that. Nori always wondered why Dori was such a stickler for good manners.”

“Anyone who can make a scone that good has to be a bit hobbitly back there somewhere,” said Bilbo. “We’ll finish up here, make some tea, and get to work on translating the quilt blocks, yes?”

“Perfect,” Ori sighed.

“Last block?” Ori said.

“Last block,” Bilbo confirmed.

At the dining table, they had re-examined each block of the marriage quilt and Bilbo interpreted the more subtle information in each and how they related to each other. Ori was stunned at the amount of detail and slightly put off by how much sheer gossip was contained within. Dwarrow wrote their history in stone, Elves wrote on living materials, and the men of Rohan sang their history. Hobbits made quilts, what brought them together in some way was tapestry and art.

“What has she to say in the end?” Ori asked.

“Not much,” Bilbo said, a note of sadness in his voice. “The Noldor are warlike and not always kind. Men wish to trade but they do not respect dwarrow or hobbits. She senses a shadow, coming over Arda.”

“And we all know what that was,” Ori sighed.

“True,” Bilbo commented, then he smiled. “And thanks to you and Roäc, we don’t have to worry about that anymore, do we?”

Ori sobered.

“Yavanna and Mahal certainly turned thing around. There was always danger outside the town and traveling was not usually thought of. People talked in whispers about what might be happening to the south.”

“Yes,” Bilbo looked thoughtful. “I wonder what’s happening down there now.”

“Gardening,” a low, feminine voice teased them.

“Now I’m curious,” Bilbo said.

“Me, too,” Ori agreed and giggled.

“One day,” the hot boom of Mahal told them.

“Oi.”

Ori and Bilbo turned to see Dwalin in the doorway, Killer dancing about him.

“Our Dori wan’s t’ know why th’ pair a yeh aren’t at th’ dinner table…Mahal’s hairy arse, love! Our Bilbo go’ a dinner table under there ’r is tha’ jus’ a pile a’ papers?”

Bilbo chuckled and Ori stuck out his tongue and gathered all his papers together.

“Lord Ori,” Bilbo said severely. “You have caused this hobbit to miss luncheon and tea! I shall faint with hunger.”

“Puir wee thin’,” Dwalin teased. “C’mon, love, let’s ge’ th’ sufferin’ creature t’ th’ table.”

Ori and Bilbo rose from the table and came to the door. Dwalin tossed Bilbo over his shoulder and took Ori’s hand.

“Put me down, you overgrown warg!” Bilbo cried. Killer barked and licked Bilbo’s feet, making the hobbit screech. They came into the breakfast parlor and Dwalin tossed Bilbo to Thorin.
“Here, this is yers.”
“Dwalin!” Thorin said and caught Bilbo gently and put him back on his feet. “Don’t turn the professor upside down like that! His knowledge might spill out and then he won’t be able to make you cake.”
“No cake for you!” Bilbo shouted around his laughter.
Frodo and Sam bounced in and squealed.
“Cake!”

They were in the middle of a marmalade glazed ham, potatoes in parsley sauce and grilled root vegetables, when a pigeon flew through the open windows and landed on the floor. Sugar picked it up in her jaws and brought it to Thorin. Thorin praised her and gave her a chunk of ham. The startled pigeon lay on its back in his hands. There was a tiny metal case fixed to one of the bird’s leg. Thorin detached this and set the bird on the table. Dori rose and went to the kitchen. Thorin unrolled the intricately folder rice paper and frowned at it. Dori returned with a saucer of water and a tiny bowl of cut oats. The pigeon recovered its wits and began to refresh itself.

“Who sends pigeon?” Yizaris asked. “They are excellent parents, but no good for much other than eggs and eating.”
“Denethor,” Thorin replied. “Namad, I believe he means this for you.”
Thorin passed it over to Dis, who took it and read it over.
“Well,” Dis looked amused. “Master Denethor wishes to send a press to Erebor and, under the supervision of his representative, train our people in the secrets of printing.”
“Secrets of printing,” Bilbo repeated incredulously. “I’ve seen color printing here. Perhaps you should send him the coronation issue of Vug!”
Thorin looked at Dis. Her gaze was far away, then an evil smile spread over her face. She blinked and looked innocently at Thorin.
“Dearest nadad, I think this is a lovely idea. How kind of dear Denethor to wish to teach us all about printing.”
Thorin, Balin and Dwalin all snickered. Bilbo stared.
“Dis?”
She grinned, making her look almost Thorin’s twin.
“Why not, nadad-to-be? Once we find out everything they know, we can either improve on it or go on with our own, knowing ours to be the better.”
“Dis is wonderful,” Yizaris giggled and scooped marmalade sauce on her veggies.
“Why, thank you, Yizi. Shall I send Beryl with my reply, nadad?”
“Please,” Thorin said, helping Sam to more potato.
“I’ll have it for you first thing in the morning,” she promised.
“Thank you, I’ll put my seal of approval on it. That should make him and Aragorn happy, should he be incline to boast of it to his king. Tell him we await his representative most eagerly,” Thorin finished. He glanced at Roäc who gave a croak, gulped down a last chunk of ham and hurtled out the open doors, heading southwest.
Dis cackled to herself and helped herself to more ham.

During dessert, Bilbo’s beautiful blackberry pie with frozen custard, Ulfr and Buer abruptly arrived, variously grey and brown-colored and smelling of chemicals and burnt cloth.
“Sorry t’ interrupt,” said Ulfr.
Yizaris looked up, surprised.
“We didn’t expect you this evening! Finished for the night?”
“Finished permanently,” said Buer, with a sheepish grin. “My landlord chucked us out. I guess I blew up the place one too many times. Although this is the first time I’ve ever blown one of my walls into the front courtyard.”
“Sounds brillian’,” said Dwalin.
“It was!” Buer cried. Then he sighed heavily. “Though, the landlord wasn’t as enthusiastic, of course.”

Ulfr shrugged.
“I paid ’im off, lad. He’s no’ sufferin’. He kin pull down th’ res’ an’ rebuild twice as big as before if he likes.”

Dori, who had watched the entire exchange with exaggerated patience, shooed them off upstairs to wash.
“If you want to eat at my table, I expect you to be clean and not smelling like an experiment gone wrong.”

Yizaris shook her head.
“If I made such a rule for my Ulfr, I’d never see him.”

“Um,” Buer started.
“Lad’s got his things out in a cart,” Ulfr butted in “D’ yeh mind, Bearer?”

“Why are his things still in a cart?” demanded Dori. “Take them upstairs and wash yourselves before you come to dinner.”

Dori bustled away to the kitchen and Mistress Dazla appeared with Miss Larit, and shooed Ulfr upstairs while Agrib, Gibi, Mokrah followed Buer out to unload the cart.

After dinner, Ori and Sigrid went to Ori’s work room for a good gossip.
“I need a favor,” said Sigrid. “But, I’m kind of ashamed to ask, you’re so busy.”

“Did you want me to build a wing onto your house?”

“No.”

“Then, everything else is on the table,” said Ori. “Ask.”

“I was wondering if you could draw me in miniature. Something simple, a gift for Fili’s name day.”

“How miniature?”

“Nothing beyond you. Not that there’s really anything beyond you, I believe.”

“I’m not picky. Just something he can carry with him,” Sigrid. “My mother had a little cloth bag with a lock of Dad’s hair in it. But I do like those little flat cases, dwarrow carry with pictures of family in them.”

Ori looked at her then had an inspiration.
“Shall we do it now?” he asked eager to start.

“Yes,” she grinned. “Where should I sit?”

“I’ll be right back,” Ori managed as he rushed out of his office. He heard Dori talking in the kitchen.

“Dori,” he called.

“Yes, pet, just a moment,”

“I just want to borrow a couple of your robes, is that alright?”

“Yes, pet, now my dear-”

Ori bounced into Dori’s and Balin’s bedroom. He ran to the dressing room. There were the robes he’d thought of. He snatched both off their stands and hurried back to Sigrid.

He burst in, saying.

“Right, let me put these down and we can move my desk a little.”

“Move…? Sure.”

Sigrid hopped up. They shoved the desk over, clearing an area of floor. Ori piled the other end of the desk with books and heavy things. Sigrid watched, intrigued. Ori grabbed the Durin blue robe, shook it out, and laid it on the clear area.

“Open up your bodice, so your shoulders are bare and just a bit of breasts, take down your hair, and lie on the floor,” Ori ordered, picking up the other robe.

“What?” Sigrid inquired with a strain of laughter in her voice.
“Just do it!” Ori was bursting with his idea. Sigrid arranged herself with Ori’s help. Ori looked down at her.

“Make you hair go all over the place,” he said with a frown. Sigrid sat up shook all her hair forward, then lay back again and let it flow where it would.

“Perfect,” Ori said. “Now lay one arm across your breasts, like you’re hiding your bits and put your other arm above your head across your hair.”

Sigrid choked on a giggle and did so. Ori laid the hem of the other robe trimmed with mithril lace and starlight gems across her arm.

“Tuck it under your arm, so it looks like that’s all you have on,” Ori ordered. Sigrid’s eyes lit up.

She grinned and rearranged herself. Ori walked around, looking down at her. He twitched the fabrics until it looked right, then adjusted a few lights.

“Good, now stay still,” he said and he went for his drawing kit. He climbed on the desk, sat on the edge and hooked his legs around the desk legs, so he all but hung over her. He started drawing.

“I suppose it doesn’t matter I’m upside down,” she teased.

“No. Now smile at me. Look directly into my eyes, that way you’ll be looking at Fili when he see the picture.”

Ori worked on the curve of her mouth then started sketching her eyes.

“Think dirty thoughts about Fili,” he ordered, looking for the right slant of the lashes. The sparkle he wanted appeared. He scribbled madly.

There was a knock at the door.

“No,” Ori cried, too busy with the muse lying on the floor below him. He vaguely registered the door opening.

“I’ll put them right back, Dori. I need them, they’re the right colors.”

“For what?” Kili’s voice asked.

“Don’t move!” Ori cried as Sigrid’s eyes flicked to the doorway. She stayed still and Ori turned, annoyed, to the door.

“What?” he demanded.

There stood Tauriel and Kili, same stance, same look of curious confusion, each head cocked to opposing sides.

“Ori, what are you doing?” Kili asked.

“Drawing Sigrid. Now, go away.”

Unfortunately, they did not go away, merely came forward to peer around him at Sigrid on the floor.

“You’re in my light,” Ori groused.

“Ooooo,” said Tauriel, peeking at his picture. “That’s pretty.”

“Oooo,” said Kili. “Ori-mate, could you do one of those of Tauriel?”

“If I say yes, will you leave?”

“Leaving!” Kili cried.

He grabbed Tauriel’s hand and they scampered out, just as Dwalin stepped in.

“Love, wha’ were - oh. Sorry. Don’ mind me.”

“Dwalin, I’m just sketching. But, now that you’re here, will you guard the door?”

“Yeh worried abou’ a protracted siege?”

“I’m worried about a certain elder brother of mine having apoplexy.”

“Guid point. I’ll be outside. Call if yeh need me.”

Dwalin went out, shutting the door behind him.

“Love you” Ori called as he scribbled maniacally, not wanting to keep Sigrid on the floor too long. In the background, he heard Dwalin talking to Dori.

“Now, our Dor’, he’s jus’ usin’ them robes a’ yers f’r th’ color. It’s no’ li’e he’s goin’ t’ wear ‘em.”

“I should hope not!” Dori replied. “They are so completely not his color!”

“Do you usually borrow Dori’s robes?” Sigrid asked.

“Not really. But he’s usually all right with it as long as I put them back on the right stand.”
“The right stand?”
“Oh, you have no idea. Dori’s closet is the size of the great library, and only the accessories are anything like stored away. Each of his outfits has its own stand and shoe tree.”
“Seriously?”
“I would never kid about Dori’s wardrobe.”
“Wicked Stepmother would be so jealous.”
Covenant, Cookies, and Coinage.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Things are gearing up for two special birthdays and Durin’s day. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori wished he had considered this sooner than one day left before Sindris and the volcanic guild bled the mountain. Honda trotted up the Dale House and, as Ori dismounted and tied Honda’s reins to the near by trough, Milgr opened the door and looked out at him.

“Good mornin’, Lord Ori. Is it King Bard yer wantin’?”

“Good morning, Mistress Milgr, thank you, no. Is Crown Princess Sigrid at home?”

Mistress Milgr chuckled.

“Aye, always f’r yeh, ‘bes’ friend’. Come away in.”

Ori stepped into the foyer, wiped his boots out of habit, and followed the housekeeper upstairs. A murmur of voices told him the king was busy with his council.

“It’s Lord Ori f’r yeh, lovey,” Mistress Milgr announced as she opened the door to the sitting room. Ori went in and Sigrid jumped up from a desk where a few books and some papers lay.

“Thank you, Mistress Milgr. Ori, I’m so glad to see you! Will you listen to me read some khuzdul?”

“Certainly, but I’ve had a thought,” said Ori as Milgr left and closed the door behind her.

“Did it hurt?” Sigrid teased.

“Almost.”

“Come sit.”

She laughed, grabbed his hand, and pulled him over to the couch where they both curled up.

“What?” Sigrid demanded.

“Well, I was thinking about the lava bleed tomorrow.”

“Oh, Idad said to Da we should keep indoors with the windows shut against the fumes. Masks have been distributed throughout in case.”

“Oh. Are you thinking Da should petition Mahal?”

“No, but I’ve found out that Eru likes oatmeal cookies with xocolātl chunks. I wondered if maybe you should petition Eru with those cookies for a good, strong southwestern wind tomorrow to keep all the fumes and such away from Dale.”

Sigrid stared at him.

“Do I want to know how you found that out?”

“I can tell you, but it’ll take a while.”

“How about you help me make the cookies and tell me?”

“Deal,” Ori grinned. “Alright if I go put Honda in the back garden?”

“Of course! Why didn’t you do that before?”

“I didn’t know if you were home.”

“I’ll meet you in the kitchen,” said Sigrid.

Ori came in through the kitchen door and took off his cloak and satchel. Sigrid had the oven heating and was getting ingredients out of the cupboards.
While she mixed things together, Ori told her all about the rededication of the guild and the cookie discussion with Mahal. Sigrid put the batter into the ice box in the back of the larder to firm up and made tea. Over this, they discussed the idea of petitioning.

Sigrid wondered whether she should petition Eru or Manwë, as Sigrid said Manwë ruled the winds and was Eru’s favorite.

“I mean I know Eru was the Father of Them All but I’ve only ever really prayed to Yavanna and that was over mother and Fili.”

“Yavanna liked the xocolātl cookies Erda taught you to make.”

“I should thank Her with some, but, oh Ori, I’m nervous about petitioning Eru. He’s such an abstract idea….”

Ori thought this over. He had a close relationship with Mahal as His scribe and, as Dori had always taught him only of Mahal and Yavanna, Ori hadn’t ever given the other valar much thought.

“I’m sure Eru’d love t’ hear fra’ her,” came the hot rumble in the back of Ori’s mind.

“Um, but you all revere Eru as the Father,” Ori pointed out.

Sigrid sighed.

“Eru is the ruler of men and the men of Dale. I suppose as the crown princess, I really should. Will you help?”

“Of course,” Ori promised. “I don’t know what men do as it was never anything we did.”

“I suppose it’s like Yule,” Sigrid mused. “It’s the shortest day, so we thank Him for a good year and promise Him we’ll cherish the new year He’s giving us. I suppose I could offer cookies and cherish the air and ask Him to ask Manwë for healing wind.”

“That sounds good,” Ori agreed. Sigrid nodded and went back to the larder and brought out the batter. Ori greased flat pans and Sigrid dropped spoonfuls of batter on them. These were put into the oven and they sat back down to wait.

“I’ll do it.” Sigrid declared. “I’m crown princess, I think it’s my job.”

“I think you’re right,” Ori encouraged.

“Let’s hope He listens.”

After Sigrid placed all the best looking cookies on a pretty plate, fetched candles, and dressed herself in white, they stole up to the top of Dale House and stepped out into the open bell tower on top. Ori had never been up here and the view was lovely.

He turned to Sigrid, who looked about, as she shut the small door flush with the platform. A ring was inset flat into the door. Ori suspected that was a dwarrow idea.

“This is nice!”

“It is, I usually come up here with Fili when we want to talk about important things. And I do mean just talk, master dwarf.”

She ducked under the big bell and Ori followed. He looked up and saw the huge clapper hung there. He stood on tiptoe and leaned back a little, then he could see the small hook fixed into the top from which the clapper was suspended.

“Just like little bells,” he murmured. “No one’s going to ring this any time soon, are they?”

“No, and I don’t intend to be up here long enough for anyone to get ideas.” Sigrid sighed and set the plate of cookies under the clapper. She set two small candles on either side, lit them, and smoothed down her dress.

“Shall I go?” Ori asked.

He moved to get out from under the bell. Sigrid grabbed him back.

“No!” she said emphatically, “I want you here in case anything happens.”

“Alright,” Ori said slowly, though he wasn’t sure what she thought might happen that he could do something about. He stood interestedly as Sigrid took a deep breath.

“Hail Great Eru, Father of all, May Your Name be ever praised. We are all grateful for the gifts You generously give us everyday. We praise You for this life we lead, no matter how rich or poor. Please hear the plea of a helpless maiden….”

Sigrid paused then continued hesitatingly.
“Um, the good children of Mahal...er...I mean Aüle are going to bleed...er... do maintenance on their mountain tomorrow and I humbly beg that You cajole Manwê, who is dearest to You and understands most clearly Your purposes, as His delight is in the winds and clouds and all the regions of the air. Send my plea to Him for a mighty wind from the southwest to protect all Your people here in Dale from the fumes, smoke and ash from the mountain. I offer this sacrifice of...um... “

Sigrid sent Ori a horrified look. Ori thought her invocation weird compared to the way he and Mahal spoke, but he didn’t think it was his business to interrupt. He made an encouraging gesture. Sigrid gulped and went on.

“Oatmeal and xocolātl chunk cookies....”
She seemed to fumble for words.
“...I hope You like them and will cajole Manwê to send us wind....”
She gasped and cried out,
“I mean fast moving air not a plague of farts! Oh no, Ori, what have I done?” she wailed and flung herself on him. Ori held his friend, he did not know what to do for her.

Suddenly the wind whispered around the bell. Sigrid raised her head, listening. Ori heard it as well, faraway deep male laughter.

Another gust of wind came and sang softly as it touched the edges of the bell. A third gust, blew out the candles and swept the cookies off the plate and out of the tower, where they promptly vanished in midair.

Ori and Sigrid sat down and stared at the empty platter.
“That seems like a good sign,” Ori said.
He helped Sigrid to her feet and fetched the platter for her.
“Thank You,” Sigrid called to the ether.
“You are most welcome, my child,” whispered a low voice from inside the bell.

Ori followed Sigrid to her room and looked out the window while she changed into her everyday clothes. Neither had said a word since Sigrid’s plea. Ori heard the sound of voices downstairs. They were rising in disagreement. Sigrid came to his side.

“Are you alright?” Ori asked.
“Yes, I just feel like I’ve been really silly.”
“You haven’t. Eru said thank you.”
“He laughed at me.”
“Only because you made a fart joke,” Ori reasoned.
“You know, if I actually had a brain, I would have asked High Priest Sven.”
“You have an excellent brain and who’s he?” Ori asked, mystified. He’d never heard of a high priest in Dale.
“He’s the spiritual leader in Dale. He’s that guy in the funny hat, who always petitions Eru on Yule, remember?”
“Oh.”
Ori did remember seeing the man at a distance waving his arms and chanting.
“Oh well,” said Sigrid. “I suppose he’ll be doing a petition anyway, so I guess what I did won’t matter.”
“Eru spoke to you, Sigrid.” Ori reminded her.

Sigrid sighed then, as the voices start to reach shouting pitch, she glanced at Ori and they hurried down. To Ori’s surprise, the council chamber door was opened and Bard was on his feet.
“Why are we still discussing this?” Bard demanded. “You have my answer.”
There was the man with the funny hat, High Priest Sven, Ori reminded himself.
“It is a possibly dangerous situation, your majesty. If we sacrifice a goat it might make the people more comfortable.”
“So you’ve said, over and over. And as I’ve said, over and over, you can always sacrifice a goat, if you wish to. You can sacrifice any goat you like, but if you want old Mistress Callin’s goat, you will ask her first, and you will recompense her for another goat that is as good as, if not better than, the goat she has now."

“But Callin’s goat is a white goat!” another man, in fine robes, insisted. “Only a white goat will work! It’s for Eru!”

“Unger Jansson, you have six white goats. Use one of yours.” Bard said coldly and stared the man into stepping back.

“I need my goats,” whined Unger.

“Mistress Callin needs her goat as it provides her with milk and cheese to supplement her food and wool for the items she makes a living with. You are a lawyer and have six goats which you do nothing with except the ram you sell for stud.”

“But-“ Unger managed.

“No sacrificing Mistress Callin’s goat.”

“We’ll all died from the lava fumes tomorrow!” wailed Unger.

“Not if you wear the masks King Thorin has distributed to every man, woman and child in Dale. Now stop being stupid and go home, Unger.”

Unger left and Bard sighed. High Priest Sven patted his shoulder.

“High Priest Sven, if you really want a goat-“ Bard started.

“Um,” Sigrid started.

High Priest Sven and Bard turned to her.

“Sigrid, Ori what brings you both here?” Bard asked.

“I-” Sigrid took a deep breath. “I’m sorry if I over-stepped, High Priest Sven, but I just petitioned Eru and offered a plate of cookies to keep us safe.”

High Priest Sven’s eyebrows went up. He stared, then blinked and smiled benignly on Sigrid and Ori. Ori felt as though the pair of them had been caught eating sweets before dinner. He expected to be patted on the head.

“That was a lovely thing to do, you highness,” High Priest Sven said, and looked down gently on them. “I’m sure Father Eru appreciates your sweetness. Well, young Bard, I must be off, you know my wife gets nervous, if I’m not on time for meals. I’ll get a kid from the market and do a quick sacrifice this evening. May Eru bless you all.”

High Priest Sven strolled off across the square.

“You did what?” Bard gaped at his daughter.

“It was my idea,” Ori interrupted.

Bard looked at him, then chuckled.

“You two never change. You’re always trying to take the blame from each other.”

“Da, if you want some cookies, I’ll make tea and Ori and I’ll tell you the whole thing.”

“I would love some tea and cookies.” Bard smiled warmly, put an arm about each, and took them to the kitchen. “You didn’t sacrifice a goat up in the bell tower, did you?”

“Da! Ew!”

Ori made it home in time to bathe and dress before he presented himself in Bag-End East for dinner. Bard arrived shortly after he did and proceeded to regale Thorin and Bilbo with the tale of Ori’s and Sigrid’s afternoon activities.

“Oh, my,” said Bilbo, snickering. “O deary me.”

Ori blessed the moment that Sugar barked at the door, announcing the rest of the guests.

Lord Zark and Lady Kadis, Master Tin and Mistress Ondr, Master Arim and a knot of badgers with freshly scrubbed faces entered and bowed.

“Dams, dwarrow, and Master Arim,” said Thorin, “a pleasure as always. Please be seated.”

“Thank you, your majesty.” Zark helped Kadis and Tin to their chairs, and herded the badgers to their seats while Thorin poured them out some ale. Zark waited as Ondr sat Arim down and said, “Now, dearie, there’s a plate in front of you, a fork to the left and a knife and spoon to the right. Just above the knife is your glass.”

“Who’m I sharing it with, love?” Arim asked.
“No one, all yours, just like at home.”
“My, I am getting spoiled,” said the old man with a grin. “Pretty soon I’ll be too high falutin’ to share with anyone.”

Bard, sitting next to Arim, asked after his health.
“I’m just fine, thank ye, your majesty. This is a comfortable room, Professor Bilbo. Feels cozy.”
“Thank you, Master Arim,” said Bilbo as he brought out the first course. “To hobbits, that’s a very high compliment, indeed.”

Bilbo had been cooking all day, and it showed.
Lord Zark looked at the bahvlo cheese with roasted tomato spread on toast. He said, uncertainly,
“This certainly looks interesting.”
Bilbo explained what it was.
One of the badgers piped, “So, it’s not bunny hearts, then?”
“No, not hearts. It’s a vegetable, but, don’t worry, there’s nothing green.”
Bilbo winked at Ori, who grinned back.
After this, Bilbo served a course of beef gravy with cave mushrooms, which Mistress Ondr exclaimed over.
“Oh! This here’s me favorite!”
Then Bilbo brought out the main course.
Ori snickered.
It was standing rib roast of goat, each rib topped with a frilly little white cover that always made Ori think of a hat.
“Why are they dressed with dolly hats?” another badger asked.
“They aren’t hats,” said Frodo, “but I’ve used them like that when one of my dolls is a cook. It’s to keep the ends from burning up, then it makes them less messy to eat. But, don’t worry, there’s still plenty of ways to get messy.”
“This certainly is a pleasure,” said Kadis. “Thorin, it’s nice to see you just to see you, and not because I have boxes of shards or once-elves in my husband’s mine. If nothing else, your reign is certainly busier than your grandfather’s ever was.”
“The excitement will keep you young,” said Thorin teasingly.
“The excitement will put me in the stone before next rest day,” she replied.
When the pie was eaten and the dishes were removed, the badgers and faunts released outside to play with the wargs, and wine poured, Thorin spoke of business for the first time.
“You had a proposal for me?”
“Yes,” said Zark. “As you know, we own an entire platform below and to the north of the central market.”
“Mithril Square,” said Thorin. He turned to Bilbo, “Because the platform is square, not because it’s on a square.”
“Oh, yes, I remember seeing it from the market.”
“We want to sell it,” said Kadis simply.
“Your ancestral home is on it,” said Thorin. “Are you planning on moving it?”
This was not as far fetched an idea as it seemed. Dwarrow would happily dismantle and move a house if the new site was more advantageous.
“We’re planning on moving out of it,” said Zark.
“We don’t need all those rooms,” Kadis explained. “It’s ridiculous.”
Bilbo asked, “Beg pardon, but how many rooms are there?”
“One hundred and forty-seven,” said Kadis.
“Ah.”
“Aye,” said Ondr, “and just try an’ find badgers who don’t want to be found at bath time! It’s like settin’ out on a quest without a map.”
Zark continued.
“We’ve purchased and decided to build on a piece of land on the waterfront in Dale. The house will be sound and spacious, and closer to the brewery and the West Dale School.”
“And the old, blind fellow is less likely to tumble into the abyss there,” said Master Arim.
“You’re really thinking of moving to the Dale waterfront?” asked Thorin. “As I recall, there’s not much out there except empty warehouses and some gambling dens.”

Bilbo frowned thoughtfully.
“I would think that a rather rough place to raise badgers.”
“That’s down the shore a bit,” said Zark, “but, yes, there are a lot of empty buildings, many of which have been marked for demolition. This means, there will be a large area to build around the brewery. We were planning a sort of beer garden attached to it in fine weather, and a snug for winter. Besides, with all the changes in Dale and rotten Ursith, may Mahal throw him in a pit, going to shove all his gambling concerns into that casino thing he’s building, it’s likely there won’t be much in the way of bad ‘uns round there much longer.”
“This sounds like something more on King Bard’s agenda than mine,” said Thorin.
“Zark and I have already settled our agenda,” Bard chuckled.
“It does involve you, your majesty,” said Zark, “since Mithril Square will sit empty. It’s the only establishment on that plateau, and it has the finest ornamental rock garden under the mountain.”
“And is your family home,” Thorin reminded him.
“My family home is where my family lives,” said Zark. “I’m not so rich and stuffy that I don’t recognize that. The point is, there is a large parcel, centrally located, in the middle of the mountain. I am giving you first right of refusal if you want to buy it.”
Without hesitation, Thorin said, “You may proceed.”
Zark slid a piece of paper across the table.
Thorin turned it over, considered the amount, thought for a moment, then said, “Do you want it in gold or gems?”
“Gold is easiest for businessdaarrow.”
Thorin nodded.
“I will meet with my council and discuss this, and give you an answer in two days, if that will suffice?”
“That is more than sufficient. Thank you, your majesty.”

As the carriage rolled out of the royal cavern, Ori said, “Thorin, I can hear you thinking from here. Are you planning on confining annoying scribes to Mithril Square when they blot their work?”
“Some would blot their work on purpose just to get a chance to sketch all the fine stone carving on one of the fireplaces. It was among the first houses in Erebor, carved out at the same time as the houses in the royal cavern.”

When they returned, the paper was still sitting on the table.
Idly, Bard turned it over, saw the figure and gasped.
“Thorin, that’s… is there even that much money in Arda?”
“There’s far more than that under this mountain,” said Thorin.
“I can’t even imagine this much.”
“For very real reasons, I wish I could say the same. I also wish I could say I was generous just because I’m a good person, but there’s a strong element of self-preservation involved. Once it’s in circulation, moving around, the gold isn’t as dangerous, but the way it is now, piled in one place, it just calls out for a dragon to come and claim it, not so coincidentally killing everyone in this mountain, and then probably everyone in Dale just for fun.”

Bard shuddered.
Thorin regarded Bard for a long minute.
“Would you like to see the treasury?”
Bard shrugged.
“I admit I’m curious. It’s true, it might put what you say in perspective. Would your ancestors strike me dead for trespassing down there?”
“You’re spending way too much time with Thranduil,” said Thorin.
“Oh, I don’t think so,” said Bard. “I know the treasury isn’t your favorite place, Thorin.”
“I can bring you,” said Ori. He had no idea why he said it. It wasn’t his favorite place, either. He waited for Thorin to ask if he was sure, but Thorin didn’t ask, merely gave him the keys.

“Roäc?” Thorin turned.

One of the iron ravens on the fireplace looked up.

“Hm?”

“Please let the guards know Lord Ori is coming with King Bard.”

“Yeah, I’m on it,” said the raven.

He flew off down the hallway. Ori could only imagine there was some raven-friendly passage Roäc might access to the treasury.

Or, like Nori, Roäc might simply pass through walls.

Ori once asked Quartz about how Erebor ravens got around so easily and received only a raucous laugh in reply.

When they got to the treasury, Bard stood in the doorway and just looked for a long time.

Ori had expected this. He went over to a sealed barrel holding who-knew-what and sat down to wait.

Roäc waded through the shifting treasure, croaking. Occasionally he kicked over a pile of coins.

Ori thought Lady Galadriel was right. Since Dori spread his energies there, the gold was still shiny, but Ori didn’t feel anything from it beyond its usual properties.

He took out a notebook and did a little sketching, but eventually he realized time was passing and Bard still hadn’t moved.

“Bard? Are you alright?”

Bard turned to him, completely speechless, and shook his head.

“I know,” said Ori. “It has that effect on people. Though, Dwalin says I’m the first to actually throw up on it.”

“Thror,” said Bard. “Thror sat on all of this.”

“While people starved around him, yes,” said Ori. “The high king of dwarrows holds the power of life and death in his hand. Thror chose death. Of course, he was insane.”

“I think I’ve seen enough,” said Bard. He looked around one last time and shook his head.

“Oh, Thorin, no wonder.”

“Would you like me to send for Thranduil?” Ori asked.

Bard looked so lost, and his ‘Please’ was tiny.

“Roäc!”

“Got it,” said the raven.

He shot through the open transom.

It was a very quiet ride back to the royal cavern.

Thorin was still at the table at Bag End East, sharing a glass of wine with his husband.

“Bard?” Bilbo asked. “Are you alright?”

Bard turned to Thorin and said, “No wonder you were so screwed up!”

Thorin raised his brow.

“Yes, thank you. That’s what Dwalin always says, too. We were emptying out our own troves as fast as we could. Still, mysteriously, the treasure grew.”

“The arkenstone,” Bard said slowly.

“Yes,” Thorin said tiredly. “It was down there for so long and Thror cared only for it. The gold grew. I’ve done a little reading up on dragon eggs. When they are placed in a treasure horde they do this. Dragons don’t brood over their nests, they just leave the egg. While some birds brood they pull feathers from their own bodies to as the saying goes ‘feather’ their nests. Dragon eggs ‘feather’ their nests with gold.”

“Why?” Bard asked before Ori could.

“Gold attracts people to dig it out, thus a ready supplying of food when it hatches and eventually another dragon, thus a mate.”

Bard slumped down in a chair and Thorin poured him some wine.

“Part of me wishes I hadn’t asked,” mumbled Bard. “No wonder you’re so eager to get rid of it.”
“I’m determined to have the treasury do what it should be doing, allowing people to live well and prosper. Fortunately, Lady Galadriel taught Balin and Dori to…er…clean it.”

“It felt completely different,” Ori confirmed quickly.

“Good, people need to be paid well for their work without having their minds poisoned.”

Bard snickered, “And they’ll think Ursith is hiding it all somewhere.”

“Yes,” said Thorin dryly. “He’s hiding it in the treasury.”

Thranduil came in at that point, patted the large warg noses thrust at him, and looked at Bard.

“Thorin, what have you done to my poor husband?”

“Thorin,” Bard replied, “graciously allowed me to have look at his treasury.”

“Did you vomit?” Thranduil asked.

“No,” said Ori quickly, “that’s my job.”

Thorin laughed.

“Yes and then Frerin wore it.”

Thranduil stared and Bard rose.

“Thank you for coming, sweetie. Thorin, Bilbo, Ori, it’s been enlightening.”

“Would you like some pie?” Bilbo asked, looking at Thranduil. Thranduil paused, then slid his arm through Bard’s.

“Thank you, Bilbo, but I think I need to get someone home.”

Bilbo hopped up, and headed to his kitchen.

“Just wait a moment then, I’ll wrap some up for you.”

“Will we see you and your family at breakfast to watch the bleed tomorrow?” Thorin asked.

“Yes, please,” said Bard. “Tilda’s been talking about it since Master Sindris mentioned it.”

Thranduil turned to Bard.

“You’re behaving oddly. That strange man you call High Priest Sven is in the square doing a weird dance. There are quite a few people watching him.”

“Who’s goat is it?”

Thranduil’s brows lifted.

“Now that you mention it, he was holding a small white goat. Not more than a year old.”

Bard nodded.

“They’re going to what?” Thranduil said bemused, as Bilbo returned with a covered plate.

“Sacrifice a goat to Eru,” Bard said, taking the plate. “Thank you, Bilbo.”

“Why do they think Eru wants them to sacrifice a goat?” Thranduil wondered.

“It’s not Eru who wants it sacrificed, as far as I know. We haven’t spoken recently. Supposedly, a goat sacrifice will bring the Dale people safely through the lava bleed tomorrow. Unger wanted to appropriate Mistress Callin’s goat to sacrifice.”

“Mistress Callin is a weaver,” said Thranduil. “She needs her goat.”

“That’s why I told Unger that he couldn’t have that goat without Mistress Callin’s permission. Sven must have got a white goat from someone else.”

“Besides,” said Thranduil, “Eru made goats. It’s not like he needs another one.”

“Mahal made goats,” Thorin teased.

“And ponies and pigs,” Ori chimed in.

“That explains Dain,” Thranduil said dryly and herded Bard out.
Early the next morning, despite the strong southwest breeze, the air wafting up from Dale still smelled faintly of incinerated goat. The royal family of Dale presented itself at Fundin house in plenty of time for breakfast.

“There you all are!” cried Dori as Mistress Dazla brought them into the breakfast parlor. “I almost thought you’d be quite blown away! What a wind we’re having today.”

“It’s all f’r th’ best, Honored Bearer,” said Master Sindris, who had also been invited to breakfast. “It’s a guid, strong wind from th’ southwest, so tha’ll push mos’ a’ th’ gas an’ dross away fra Dale an’ th’ Greenwood. It’s cloudy as well, an’ any rain’ll cool th’ spill faster an’ make th’ ground more fertile. No’ t’ mention putting’ out any stray fires.”

Ori caught Sigrid’s eye and winked, she grinned and blushed a little.

“Will the whole top the mountain pop off?” Tilda asked immediately and she and Master Sindris were off, discussing ash and gases.

“Excellent pie, professor,” said Bain to Bilbo.

“You’ve already eaten a slice, have you?” Bilbo teased.

Bard gave his son a stern look, then ruined it by ruffling his hair.

“He ate the whole thing before anyone else was awake this morning.”

“I was hungry!” Bain protested.

“We shall sort that out instantly,” promised Dori.

They all stood behind a barricade of rock that had been the viewing platform in King Thror’s young days.

“My love, have you ever watched the guild do this before?” Bilbo asked. He kept a strict eye on Frodo and Sam, who peeked over the top of the barricade.

“I did, amrâlimê, but I was very young. It was before Frerin was born. Dis?”

“I’m here.”

The Princess Royal arrived, her arm tucked in Jani’s.

“Namad, do you remember the last bleed?”

“Only vaguely, Udad put me on his shoulders and Amad always said I shrieked ’again!’ after it finished.”

Ori checked the sky. The clouds looked strangely lumpy Ori thought, almost threatening. As the wind blew stronger the lumpy clouds began to swirl in a spiral.

Ori sat on top of the barricade with his sketch book and graphite wand, quickly drawing the mountain before the bleed. Dwalin leaned against the barricade, his arm firmly about Ori’s waist for safety.

“My love, do you remember it?” Ori asked as he turned to kiss the top of Dwalin’s bald pate.

“Aye, luv. It’s a grand sight.”

The rest of the royal party arrived and they all lined up against the barricade. Tilda and Bain were almost as excited as the faunts.
“Will the lava cover the whole side of the mountain, Idad Thorin?” she demanded. “Will it made a loud noise?”

Thorin laughed and gathered the children and faunts about him.

“Now, can you all see Master Sindris?” Thorin asked. At the noises of affirmation, he went on, speaking loudly to be heard above the increasing gale.

“Master Sindris will give a signal. It will go quiet. The dwarrow you see up there will run for cover, there will be a loud shriek of the gases, ash, and fragments escaping first. It must do first, as if it came with the lava, there would be an extremely dangerous flow that would kill everything in its path and ruin the mountain side. Then you will hear the rumbling of the lava moving up the escape tubes. Watch where those dwarrow are, that is where the tubes open. Now you must all put on your masks as it’s going to happen very soon.”

Any who were not dwarrow busily fitted on their masks and the dwarrow present assisted. The wind suddenly dropped to nothing. The lumpy clouds bulged and dropped lower.

As Thorin had said, Ori kept his gaze on Master Sindris. He thought she was keeping an eye on all of them as well. Everyone was peering over the barricade.

Master Sindris waved to her crew. The lava guild members fled the scene of the opening. Ori thrilled to the feeling of lava on the move. He knew every dwarf and dam could feel the surge. The men and elves looked curious. The ground rippled near the escape tubes.

“Look! It’s happening!” shrieked Frodo from the safety of Thorin’s arms.

White hot steam and black smoke mixed with ash and flaming debris screamed upward from the escape tubes in an enormous sheet. Then, lava in all shades of red, orange and yellow burped up in a wave and poured down the mountain side, painting it all the colors of fire.

The wind suddenly howled around the mountain. In a loud explosion, a fountain of fire, rock and lava blew high and far out to the northwest. Ori scribbled and breathed in the heady scent of the blood of the mountain. The clouds drew together and the middle of the cloud took the form of a long finger, with the narrow tip churning the rock and grasses on the meadows to the east of the mountainside, away from the farm lands. The finger moved north and reached for the smoke and fire and then Ori saw the flames and debris being sucked up into it, a strange roaring tunnel of wind. The finger pulled itself slowly towards the north and dragged the still pouring lava far along the ground and took fire, gases, and rocks through the air northward.

“Should we worry about Dain?” Bard asked, he had to shout to be heard over the noise of the winds.

“No, it’s going straight north now,” Thorin called back. “In all my life, I’ve never seen a cloud like that before.”

“Nor I,” commented Thranduil loudly. “Unusual weather we’re having.”

The lava slowed and then only smoke billowed up as a second funnel of wind licked down the entire bleed route then headed north, pulling more remains after it. The wind was so strong Ori clenched Dwalin and the rest of the dwarrow held onto their guests, adding their weight to keep all safe.

A sudden cold wind blasted them and torrents of rain and hail plummeted out of the sky. The royal party scrambled for the door to the inside of the mountain. They piled through and stood about the antechamber, laughing at themselves.

They watched the storm raging outside, A few flashes of lightning blazed, closely followed by a crash of thunder.

“I’m soaked through,” Dori gasped. “We must get home and have some tea before we all catch cold!”

Dwalin opened the lift door, they all crowded in and it dropped slowly and gently down to the royal cavern.

Soon they were all back in the sitting room, dry and sipping tea, while the younger set chatted excitedly about the bleed.

Mistress Dazla hurried through to the receiving room and returned with a jubilant Master Sindris.
“How are things?” Thorin asked her.

“How are things?” She beamed at them all. “Th’ wind took everythin’ we didn’t need an’ flattened th’ lava a treat. Rain’s still comin’ down on Dale, here, an’ th’ Greenwood. I estimate King Dain may be havin’ some as well. No stray fires anywhere. I think th’ scribes can write this up as th’ mos’ successful bleed ever.”

“I’ll be sure to, Master Sindris,” Ori said with a grin to Thorin, who nodded his approval.

After a long tea of discussing everything about the bleed, Thranduil and Bard questioning Master Sindris on everything they had seen, Sigrid pulled Ori aside and muttered,

“Can we talk in your office?”

Ori led the way and closed the door when Sigrid was inside. She stood in the middle of the floor and sighed, then shuddered.

“Ori, that was the weirdest cloud I ever saw. Do you-?”

“Yes, and you should be proud and ready. Lady Galadriel said to me a while back, that once the valar find a suitable vessel they tend to use it again.”

He pushed Sigrid into a chair and sat in another next to her. He took her hand as she stared into space.

“Siggy, you are the crown princess, you owe it to your people. You said so yourself.”

Sigrid sighed.

“I know.”

They sat in silence for a long while, then Dori opened the door while knocking on it.

“Pet, Siggy dear? It’s time to come back through. Lunch will be ready soon and Thorin and the others are pulling out decorations.”

Dori waited as Sigrid and Ori looked at each other.

“Oh!” Ori gasped, “Durin’s Day decorations. Already?”

“Ooo!” Sigrid grinned. “In this case, royal decorations.”

They hurried in Dori’s wake back through to the sitting room.

Thranduil and Bard sat on the sofa, with Tilda between them. Thorin came through followed by Dwalin and Balin, all carrying boxes covered in red velvet. Gloin and his family arrived as well, all carrying similar boxes. The small stone table was moved and the boxes were dumped in front of the fireplace.

“I knew they were in th’ storeroom,” said Dwalin.

Ori leaned forward on the couch where he and Sigrid had piled in next to Bilbo, who was knitting. Dwalin opened the lid and rummaged around, huffed in triumph and removed a mask of leather, accented with metal and jewels, in the shape of a goat’s head.

“That’s beautiful!” Ori cried.

Dwalin handed it to him and he examined it carefully. The maker’s sigil was burned into the back, along with the date, which made Ori gasp.

“It came from Khazad-dûm,” said Dwalin, “bout th’ time a’ Dain I.”

“I’ve never seen one so fine,” said Ori. “We used to make ours every year out of starched buckram. I decorated them with whatever shiny bits I could find.”

“They were all very beautiful, pet,” Dori put in.

“Those were fun to make,” Sigrid agreed.

“Dori,” said Bard. “I can never thank you enough for all you did for my children.”

“Oh, tosh!” Dori replied with a faint blush. “I promised Mathilde I would see to them.”

“And,” Thranduil put in with a smile, “they were raised to be suitably royal.”

“Now Thrandy,” Dori began to scold. Ori looked into the box again.

“Th’ costumes are long gone, a’ course,” Dwalin told him.

Bilbo rose and took the mask from Ori.

“Dwarrow are usually quite careful to preserve such things,” he remarked. He held the mask up, which completely covered his face, though his curls stuck out at all angles rather convincingly.

Thorin carefully put it first on Frodo then on “Durin’s Day parties tend t’ turn rough by th’ end a’ th’ nigh’,” Dwalin went on. “Th’ costumes’re mostly meant t’ be worn once, made a’ paper or sometimes painted linen. Though, Balin’s still go’ most a’ his. Figures.”
“It’s so good to see these again,” Dis sighed, snuggling into Jani’s side. “We never celebrated much after Udad got sick.”
“Yeh’ll have t’ make up f’r it, then, love.” Jani kissed her cheek.
“Are all the masks of these three animals?” Bilbo asked, as he watched the variety being laid out.
“Forgive me, I know a bit about the legends of Durin, but the way dwarrow celebrate Durin is more obscure.”
“Ponies, goats, and boars are the most common,” said Ori, “because we believe Mahal made them especially for Durin, and so for us.”
Ori glanced at Thranduil, who winked at Ori’s grin.
“Let me guess,” said Bilbo, “Dain is always a boar.”
“Aye,” said Dwalin, “so he don’t even have t’ wear a mask.”
This made both Bard and Thranduil laugh. Balin put Tilda into a pony mask and she cantered over to Bard and Thranduil, making whinny-ing noises. They laughed and Bard helped her put the mask on Thranduil. Ori delighted at the sight of the king-father giving his youngest daughter a pony-back ride. Bard, Sigrid, and Bain shouted encouragement.
There were other things in the box, too. Long, light metal chains decorated with beads and tin silhouettes of the same three animals, as well as axes, hammers and swords. Gimli, Omi, and Loli busily showed everything to Legolas, who was delighted with all of it. Bujni held up table cloths while Dipfa examined them. Fili and Sigrid wreathed each other in the chains and danced around the room, giggling. Kili was dressing Tauriel in some as she laughed.
“Fi,” said Kili, “have you started on your Yule presents yet?”
Fili groaned.
“I haven’t had time. Amad, you’re getting one, because I finished it before everything when to Mordor. Ki, you’re getting a lump of coal, as usual.”
“Why do you always give me a lump of coat?” Kili asked. “I could never figure it out.”
“I don’t know. It just always seemed the thing.”
“Thorin,” Ori asked, “do the Durins celebrate Yule as a family?”
Thorin nodded. He pulled Sam and Frodo up, each on a knee.
“We always have,” said the king. “We sometimes exchange presents, but we don’t try to make presents for everyone every year. Just when we get inspired. And, of course, the presents have to follow the rules.”
“What are the rules?” Ori asked.
Dwalin cuddled up to him.
“There’s only three. First, th’ presents have t’ be handmade. Second, they can’t be a’ precious metal or jewels. Third, th’ recipient has t’ be able t’ lift it.”
Bilbo snickered.
“I imagine the third rule is the one where most gift ideas fall down,” he said.
“We are dwarrow, ghivasha,” said Thorin.
Ori looked up at Dwalin.
“What’s the most interesting thing you’ve ever received?”
“I go’ a lovely hair bead made a’ petrified goat poop,” said Dwalin.
“You don’t wear that!” Ori yelped. “Do you?”
“It was never meant t’ be worn. A’ least, I don’t think so. Thorin?”
“I had no intention of you ever wearing it, but we have been gifting it back and forth now for more years than you, Ori, have been alive. It even has a nice red, lacquer box with a silk inlay, for gift-giving elegance.”
Ori wrinkled his nose, looked over and realized Bilbo was wrinkling his nose, and the pair of them laughed. Ori pulled a box over to the sofa and as he looked through, he had a sudden, fabulous idea.
for Dori’s Yule present. He wondered if Thorin would be willing to help him with it.

“This is nicely done,” said Ori as he held up a tin pony silhouette.

“Aye, tha’s Gridr’s work,” said Balin and leaned over to have a look at it. “She even chased in th’ strands a’ th’ tail an’ mane. Yeh know she’s been in her shop, turnin’ these ou’ now f’r weeks.”

“For decorations?” Bilbo asked. “Does she sell them?”

“Nah, gives ‘em t’ folks t’ use as offerin’s t’ Mahal in Durin’s name.”

“Bilbo, do hobbits have anything similar?” Ori asked.

“For harvest, we make corn dollies.”

Ori had a brief image of dolls made entirely of kernels of corn, but he had no idea how such a thing would stay together.

“Corn as in grains,” said Bilbo, laughing. “We use some of the stripped stalks tied together to look like people, then we invest them with all the mistakes we made in the past year, and burn them at the last harvest bonfire.”

Dwalin nodded.

“Yeh start th’ year with a clean slate.”

“Yes. Do dwarrow do that?”

Ori and Dwalin looked at each other and laughed.

“No’ exac’ly,” said Dwalin. “We make a point t’ visit an’ apologize t’ any we feel we wronged in th’ past year, bu’ yeh kin only do so much a’ tha’. A dwarf’s ego’s a pre’y cumbersome thin’. Also, it’s tradition t’ share a drink ‘r twelve. Yeh star’ ou’ apologizin’, an’ end up brawlin’ anyways.”

They all spent a very amusing afternoon and evening decorating Fundin House, then the Groinuls’ home and the old palace. Mistress Dazla and her team all turned out to help as well and she kept everyone well supplied with hot spiced cider and ginger cookies. Dwalin and Gloin found more boxes than could ever be used, even after decorating the courtyard and entrance tunnel as well.

Anyone in the vicinity of the royal caverns saw the decorations going up and word spread through the mountain. It was close to dinner by the time they finished. Thorin had the rest of the decorations loaded on a cart and sent it away with Bard and his family after they ate.

Later, Ori worked on the sketch of Sigrid until nearly midnight. He composed a message for Nodun to send by bat in the morning. He had never worked with paint in miniature before, and he had some questions about materials. He wanted everything on hand when he started the actual portrait.

Or, maybe he was just procrastinating a bit, since he still hadn’t told Dwalin what he and Bilbo had been up to.

He wasn’t afraid Dwalin would be angry. They had that conversation already, and Ori took Dwalin at his word.

It was more about Ori’s own lingering shyness, with which he was increasingly annoyed.

By the time he had washed and made his way to the bedroom, Dwalin was already abed, propped up on the pillows, reading from Bilbo’s manuscript for the Infernal Adventures.

Ori smiled and admired his husband, naked but for his pink shorts and his dwarf fur.

“Dwalin, are you… sparkling?”

“Bloody decorations with mica paint,” Dwalin grumbled. “Stuff’s almos’ impossible t’ scrub off.”

“Do you think Mister Wandi’s bath stuff is made with ground mica?” Ori asked.

Dwalin shot him a wink.

“Probably some secret elf shit.”

Ori nodded at Bilbo’s manuscript.

“What do you think? It’s really good, isn’t it.”

“For someone who taugh’ hissel’ th’ language? It’s fuckin’ amazin’.”

“Dwalin? I went on a bit of an adventure of my own.”

His husband chuckled. He put aside the manuscript, and held out an arm to him.

Ori kicked off his slippers and climbed up onto the bed. He cuddled up against his husband.

“Did yeh have a Bilbo adventure?” Dwalin asked.
“Yes,” said Ori, ducking his head. “I though’ th’ two a’ yeh were lookin’ pre’y twinkly. Did yeh enjoy yerself?” “It wasn’t you, but it was lovely. We did Position Eight!” “I wondered. Sometimes, th’ difference in our height’s a pain in th’ arse.” “I don’t know about that. I had a thought. You know me: always thinking.” “Aye, I kin hear yeh tick. Wha’ this ‘time’ specifically?” “If we did it, I could suck and bite your belly and jerk you off with my hands.” “Tha’ sounds tasty.” Ori peered up through lowered lashes. “Would you like to try it now?” Dwalin leaned down and whispered into his ear, “Wha’ d’ yeh think?” Ori didn’t get the chance to tell him. The alarm bell sounded by the fire place. Ori groaned and laughed. Dwalin growled. “This be’er be orcs in th’ Nigh’ Market ‘r someone’s goin’ t’ die.” He kissed Ori and got up, pulling on his uniform trousers. “Sorry abou’ this, azyung.” “It happens when it happens,” said Ori with a sigh. “A’ least I warmed up th’ bed f’r yeh.” “Thanks,” Ori smiled as Dwalin went out. “Love you.” Quartz winged in, snickering. “What?” Ori asked. “Seeing the royals decorating, everyone else is, too, if they hadn’t yet. The whole inside of the mountain will be festive by tomorrow.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. So much to do! So much to do! Ori’s up to his ears being busy! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next morning, Ori, Dori and Thorin went down to Dale to inspect the new Green at the request of Bard and Thranduil. Dori insisted on the teacup. Furf’nk drove Ducati and Aprilla. Butter and Sugar gamboled along side. Bard and Thranduil met them on the outskirts and led the way to the eastern side of the city.

Ori could see now what Quartz was talking about. On the way out of the mountain, he had a taste of what the people of Erebor had been up to. There was a regular migrating herd of shiny tin ponies, goats, and boars strung on chains between every lantern and swathing the shoulders and necks of numerous heroic dwarf statues along the public ways. Nor would Dale be outdone. Wherever dwarrow lived in Dale, decorations both bought and made fluttered in the autumn breezes, and the men would not be left out of it, either.

Along with all of this, Bilbo and Frodo’s birthday preparations were in full swing as well. Dori had insisted this would be surprise party, but Dori had never been able to carry off a surprise. For a dwarf who prided himself on his ability to keep a secret, his party plans were dismayingly transparent.

And he couldn’t quite grasp the idea of getting a present for a birthday instead of giving it.

“Just think of the party as your present, Ori’s Dori,” Ori told him as they rode down in the teacup.

“But, surely, that won’t be enough,” Dori fussed.

“I’ve seen the menu you planned,” said Ori. “Not even hobbits eat that much at once sitting.”

“It is a rather nice menu, if I do say so myself,” admitted Dori.

Hamfast had worked miracles to get the Green ready. The new grass was scythed short and soft. Saplings grew, encircling the entire Green, and a pleasant stream had been cajoled down from a gently rolling hill to run across the far side of it. Large rocks banked the stream and all manner of water flowers grew alongside. Hamfast looked very pleased at Bard’s and Thorin’s praise and Ori suspected Yavanna had helped considerably.

“An yeh’d be righ’, laddie,” Mahal’s voice affirmed.

Each sapling had its own ring of flowers and delightful benches were placed here and there for any visitors needing rest.

Ori was most impressed with the large tree in the middle of the Green. It was taller than some of the buildings in Dale, its branches spread wide, throwing an extensive amount of shade beneath, and its leaves were a shiny purple brown. Butter and Sugar tore around the grass and played like pups. Thranduil and Dori went over to admire the tree.

How Hamfast had managed get it there, Ori had no idea, so he inquired. Hamfast frowned a bit.

“Well, Mister Ori, I can’t rightly say as I wasn’t there t’ see, but I’ve me suspicions.”

“And they are are?” Thorin smiled.

"See, sir, I was telling that Mister Hathor about the Green th’ other day an’ how it needed a good tree in the middle. I was admirin’ a splendid one on his farm. He calls it a copper beech. I asked him if it would damage one that size to dig it up and cart it over. He said he’d think on it. Well, blow me if I didn’t come out here yesterday an’ find it sittin’ where it is. There’s all them old tales a’ elves wakin’ up trees an’ such, so I imagine he went an’ had a chat with it, then it up an’ walked on over itself. We did have the hole all ready in case we found a suitable sapling, and there it was, sitting in it. So I spaded in some manure, then filled in all th’ earth over, planted the flowers and had tha’ nice dwarf from the plumping guild put in a pipe, so it could get a good drink durin’ dry weather. That’s all I know ‘bout it.”

“Oh,” said Bard. “I think we need to send some of those seeds that came from the box over to the Aldernay farm.”

“Jus’ wha’ I was thinkin’ meself, Mister Bard,” agreed Hamfast. “Splendid fellow that Hathor, knows plants, he does.”

“You know, Hamfast,” said Thorin, smiling over at Dori, “perhaps I can persuade the Honored Bearer to work with you to have a hobbit-stye birthday party for my consort. He has spoken about such and how they had a ‘party tree’ in the Shire.”

Hamfast grinned.

“Yer readin’ me mind, Mister Thorin. That’s what I was hopin’ t’ talk yeh ‘round to do by bringing’ yeh here.”

“Of course,” Dori fluttered, as she and the king-father had returned and overheard this. “I think it’s a beautiful idea. Dear Mister Gardener, I shall apprise dear Mistress Gardener of the food arrangements.”

Thorin laughed and Ori made notes. He sketched the Green and thought it a lovely place for a party. It was certainly large enough for people to stroll and dance and eat.

“Hamfast,” said Thorin, “I gave Bard a few boxes of Durin’s Day decorations. Perhaps with those and some decorations your family might have, this can be made ready?”

“Absolutely, Mister Thorin,” Hamfast expanded. “A few boxes, my hind foot! I seen tha’ whole wagon load you sent. Decorate the town an’ Green it will.”

Bard chuckled.

“Mister Gardener, may I leave town and Green decorating in your capable hands?”

“Aye, sir, don’t you give it a second thought. My Bell already has plans an’ I tell her you said, heave to on it.”

“Thank you Hamfast,” Bard nodded.

“Where is Mistress Bell now?” Dori asked.

“Down at the school south a’ Dale Hall, ma’am,” Hamfast reported.

“Come, Thrandy,” Dori grabbed the elf’s hand. “We must go immediately and speak with dear Bell!”

Dori towed off Thranduil to the teacup. Thranduil turned to wink at Bard, who stifled a laugh.
Thorin turned to Bard.

“Where are Thranduil’s guards? He did have four to go about with him.”

“He decided he only needed them for ceremonial occasions,” said Bard with a chuckle. “Instead, they make sure Tilda is safe and they’re teaching Bain to defend himself, which Thranduil tells me is going very well.”

“You don’t watch, do you,” said Thorin.

“Not if I can help it,” said Bard.

In moments the teacup whisked away. Dori was urging Furh’nk, who was urging the ponies and Thranduil relaxed against the cushions with his feet up.

“I suppose we shall be left on your hands until Dori finishes,” Thorin observed. “I hope you don’t mind, Bard.”

“On the contrary, I’d like to show you about.”

They had a pleasant walk into Dale. Everywhere houses had been mended and painted. Many showed new windows and doors. Shops had been cleaned, painted, and sported awnings unfurled over their fronts. People shopped, talked, and walked everywhere. They bowed to the kings but gave the wargs a wide berth.

There were so many new shops Ori marveled. He stopped dead at the corner of Steam Street.
The entire street was given over to book shops and stationary suppliers. Bard and Thorin laughed at him and threatened to drag him away.
“i must come back here!” Ori enthused. “this used to be pubs and pawn shops!”
“with Calmar’s ‘help’,” Bard snickered, “we’ve been able to do quite a bit.”
“This is wonderful Bard!” Thorin said, and looked about him. “i’ve never seen much of Dale, but I knew it was not prosperous. You’ve worked wonders.”
“I took your advice and got some councillors who actually want the city to grow. There’re a few old nobles, but they tend to toe the line, as they all know what happened to Calmar. Gloin helped me with building and finance. A lot of folk have excellent skills, but before now it was impossible to get anything done.”
Bard walked them past an open area with a single new building in it. All around the building was flagstone.
“Is this another new school?” Thorin asked. “we didn’t come here the other day.”
“This just opened,” said Bard. “there aren’t many people about until evening. Come and look.” Bard led the way in.
“stay, my damlings, stay.” Thorin told Butter and Sugar. Both wargs sat down to wait.
The vestibule was narrow, but long. Ori stared at the line of pegs in the walls. Some were at the height for dwarrow, others higher.
“For coats and boots in winter,” Bard said. He knocked on the inner door.
A pretty young lady answered it. Ori frowned, then remembered. He glanced at Thorin who nodded and mouthed “Miss Wings Aloft.”
Miss Wings Aloft, whose name was really Miss Sifian, was rather surprised, but this changed to delight as she welcomed them in.
Inside, at desks variously sized, sat grown men and women and dwarrow. They had slates before them.
They all turned and, seeing the kings, made to rise.
“Please, don’t mind us,” said Bard. “i just wanted to show King Thorin what we’re doing here.”
“We are practicing our reading at the moment,” beamed Miss Sifian. “Class, let’s go down the list again.”
She went to the front. There was an enormous piece of slate, almost covering that wall, and on it she had written a list of simple words in Westron, with corresponding runes in Khuzdul.
Miss Sifian took up a pointer and indicated the first word.
“carrot,” responded the class.
“Excellento,” said Miss Sifian. “And now the khuzdul.”
At the end of the reading of the list, Bard and Thorin applauded the work and the students looked delighted. After both Bard and Thorin had said encouraging words and lavished praise on students and teacher alike, Bard thanked them and the visitors went out.
“Bard?” Ori teased. “No uniforms for them?”
“I’m just happy they’re here,” said Bard. “People work so hard, days and nights. It’s a lot to ask of them to leave their families, even for an hour or two, to come here and work a little more. Not everyone was lucky like I was, to have parents who could teach them at home.”
Ori kept looking all round. The streets looked much better. The midnight cleanings had smoothed the ground and now there were ancient cobbles, just beginning to show.
“This street was once paved.” Thorin observed. “I never heard there were paved streets in Dale except for the wealthier areas. Ori, do you remember such?”
“No,” Ori admitted, “and I don’t remember Nori or Dori mentioning it. Bard, how…”
Bard shrugged, but there was a sparkle of pride in his eyes.
“Fili was kind enough to bring Master Kir down to see Dale. He got so excited, we had to take him to Mister Wandi’s to have his hair tied back. He calculates that the streets here were well paved with cobbles and within the inner part of the city, the streets are paved with bricks of granite so closely placed there is no need of mortar. We had to pick him up a few times as I swear he’d have crawled the length and breadth of Dale examining it all. The street cleanings, over time, Kir thinks about a year, will reveal the old roads. We were then forced to take Kir all around in a cart, so he could see everything. I’ve never seen anyone get so excited about paving and building corner stones before. Mahal certainly made sure all the street signs and lights are perfectly placed. Must be a valar thing.”

Ori pointedly ignored the snickering going on in the back of his head.
“I think it must have been the first time Kir has seen Dale since he came from Khazad-dûm,” Thorin chuckled.
“It was,” Bard said. “He questioned me thoroughly about everything he saw.”
“I hope he didn’t make a nuisance of himself.” Thorin said, quickly.
“No,” Bard grinned at Thorin. “He’s a fascinating conversationalist. He doesn’t scruple to give his opinion.”

Thorin and Ori laughed.
“As long as he doesn’t start giving you orders,” Thorin said with a smile. “Sometimes I worry I’m pushing you.”
“You’re not,” Bard said firmly. “As I’ve always said, I was raised to sail a barge and be a fisherman, being a king is completely new to me. I worry I’m dumping my responsibilities on you.”
The two looked at each other.
“Shall I leave you alone?” Ori teased.
“At least, you don’t have a sassy scribe,” Thorin grumped with a terrible frown but his eyes laughed.
“No, ” Bard grinned. “I have a bossy daughter, who’s best friends with the sassy scribe.”
Ori blushed and pretended to admire a shop.
“That, and,” Bard added, his cheeks coloring a little, “I’m married to a king-father, who’s very good about teaching me diplomacy.”
“Oh?” Thorin asked with a grin. “And what constitutes ‘diplomacy’ in Thranduil’s world?”
“Not just punching the first idiot you can reach.”
“No?”
“No, you have to wait until at least the seventh or eighth.”

They walked through the main square and headed towards the docks. Bard pointed out improvements. They came upon a tall clapboard fence that framed a gathering of warehouses. This, Bard told them, would soon be Ursith’s Dale casino. There was a gate that was low enough for them to see the activity.

Ursith was there. Ori stared. Ursith was decking himself out as an ‘honest’ business dwarrow. He had forgone his blacks for robes of Durin blue of the shiniest material Ori had ever seen. These, from collar to boots, were liberally drowned in diamonds and Ursith was wearing a hat. The hat was Durin blue velvet. It had a flat brim that curled slightly at the edges. There was a broad band of black satin, then the crown rose like a stove pipe. In the band, Ursith had stuck a single peacock feather that waved languidly in the air. The hat sat on top of the huge mass of hair under it. Ori wondered for a moment if Nori had glued it on.

The work seemed to be going apace. Dwarrow and men toiled away. Ursith held a large piece of paper, obviously plans, and talked with a couple of foremen. One looked up and saw the two kings and gulped. Ursith spun, glaring, then his expression expertly melted to delighted avarice.

Thorin ordered the wargs to lie down at the gate and the kings and the scribe went forward to meet Ursith.
“Yer majesties!” Ursith bawled out and strutted over to them. He gave a great formal bow and swept off his hat.
“Yer majesties, as yeh see I’m keepin’ me vow t’ go straight! Lookee here a’ all me workers buzzin’ alon’ like bees! I’m payin’ ‘em well, too! I pay in gold, don’t I, laddie?” This to a foreman.
“He does pay in gold,” one foreman answered. “A good wage, too.”
All the workers who had seen them stopped to watch and listen.
Thorin smiled and raised his voice a little, so those all around could hear.
“Well done, Master Ursith. You are doing excellent work. Please remember that the harvest is imminent and King Bard will need workers. Dale must have food for the winter."

"Ab-sol-lootly, yer majesty!" bawled Ursith, bubbling over with good will. "I shall, this very minute ask King Bard here. King Bard, if yeh’d most kindly let me know when th’ harvestin’s t’ be done, I vow I shall close down all th’ work here, so th’ guid people o’ Dale may harvest their crops. I’ll even trot out there myself t’ lend a hand! I want t’ see prosperity!"

"We all do, Master Ursith," said Bard flatly. "I’ll be checking with Mister Gardener, it’s likely to start next week."

"Wonderful!" burbled Ursith. "Here, yer majesty, think I’d’ve better luck purrrposin’ t’ me bee-oo-tiful bearer while there’s lots a’ food bein’ brough’ in f’r folk? I’ll show me hands kin get good an’ dirty!"

Ori wanted to hit Nori. Nori was enjoying himself as ‘good’ Ursith a little too much. Thorin smiled again, quite pleasantly.

"Well, Master Ursith, there really is only one way to find out."

They bade the workers and Ursith farewell and headed to the lake side.

"Fuck my life," muttered Bard, when they were out of sight and hearing.

"Thranduil’s job," Thorin replied.

They looked at each other then burst out laughing. Ori looked around quickly and, seeing no one about, said in a low voice.

"Dipfa would have murdered him for torturing clothing like that."

Thorin and Bard laughed harder.

Thorin dropped down on a pile of old lumber and went on laughing. Butter and Sugar came over to see and Sugar licked his face.

"I swear he’s determined to make me laugh at him," Thorin finally managed. "Little shit."

Ori shrugged and grinned.

"That’s him."

Bard sat down beside Thorin and pointed out to the cleared land running from the main docks southward.

"A-hem," Bard managed to control his voice. "That’s going to be another sort of green but there will be high-end goods for sale, coffee shops, and a couple of restaurants. Mister Wandi suggested that it would work well if there was a wide road leading from the main square down to here. It would show off his palace and all the oldest buildings which are being done up and be true to the old city. Down here would be another place for parties and, as dear Master Ursith says, genteel frolics."

"That is wonderful, Bard," Thorin said, looking out at the lake. "This is a beautiful place for a city."

"And safe," Bard chuckled. "Nothing like having a huge mountain full of dwarrow, all ready to come rampaging down on any who threaten."

"Of course," Thorin teased. "Not to mention rampaging down when there’s a party going on."

The two kings laughed again. Ori felt the warmth of his love for these two important people in his life. A movement off to the mountain road caught his eye. In the distance he saw the elk trotting back to Dale and the teacup racing away to the mountain.

"Um," Ori began.

"Wonderful," said Thorin and rose, "I suppose you and I have a long walk before us, Ori."

"I can’t believe Dori would forget us!" Ori groused.

"I can lend you a couple of ponies," said Bard and got to his feet. "Unless you intend to ride the wargs back."

Sugar gave a delighted bark, rushed over behind Thorin, shoved her head between his legs and lifted.

"Mahal!" bayed Thorin as he tumbled over onto her back and grabbed hold her fur to stop himself falling off. Sugar bent a little and he slid forward.

"Oh, now you want me off?" he demanded. Sugar shook herself and Thorin ended up sitting on her shoulders. She turned her head and panted happily at him. Butter came over and nosed at Thorin’s legs, pushing them to lie against Sugar’s ribs. Butter then nosed one of Thorin’s hands and shoved it into Sugar’s ruff. Thorin took tight hold of the fur. Sugar walked about in front of Bard, tail wagging, and looked terribly pleased with herself. Thorin looked at Bard and Ori from his slightly crouched position on Sugar’s back.

“It appears we’re riding wargs home. Butter, my damling, get Ori.”

Butter pranced over and bent down on the elbows of her forelegs. Ori took a breath and mounted. Butter raised herself and Ori got himself placed as Thorin was on Sugar.

“Bard,” said Thorin, “thank you for the tour and remember, if you need anything—”

“I know where to find you,” Bard laughed. “Good luck!”

Butter and Sugar trotted serenely as they cleared the rocky area. Ori clutched Butter’s neck ruff for dear life. This wasn’t like a pony or a goat. Sugar gave a whuff noise and both wargs lit out for the mountain. Ori gasped as the mountain road jiggled towards him at high speed between Butter’s ears. Riding a warg was brilliant!

He laughed as Butter bolted up the mountain road. He looked over at Thorin, who was grinning maniacally. Thorin raised himself a little and called to the guards at the gate. Ori saw Dwalin come out to watch them.

The wargs bounded through the gateway and Sugar gave a leap, then skittered her claws on the polished stone, spinning around twice, before she stopped. Butter sat down and zoomed in on her rear. Thorin gave a triumphant shout and Ori couldn’t suppress a whoop.

Then Dwalin was lifting him off, Ori turned and hugged hm.

“Dwalin! You have to try it!”

“Liked tha’, did yeh?” Dwlin chuckled, hugging him close.

“Looks like yeh go’ th’ trick a’ ridin’ ‘em, majesty,” Arb said admiringly as Thorin dropped off and gave Sugar a hug.

“Lovely, my damling. Such a good damling.”

Thorin finished rubbing his face in Sugar’s ruff and turned to Arb with a grin.

“It’s between a pony and a goat. You feel the body run but without that hopping trot a goat has. Too bad Dwalin and I didn’t know how wonderful wargs are. We could have stolen a couple of packs by now.”

“Considerin’ how good we treat ‘em.” Dwalin commented, “I’m surprised we don’t have ‘em beggin’ at th’ doors t’ be adopted.”

The guards all had a good laugh, then Thorin mounted Sugar again.

“Come along Lord Ori. Time to go home.”

Ori was impressed with the speed they gained the royal cavern. Butter and Sugar made a game of leaping over things and people to the point that some dwarrow thought it would be fun to stand in front of the wargs just so they could be jumped over.

When they got to Fundin House, Thorin led the way through the stable and they got off in the meadow.

“Lord Ori?”

“Yes, your majesty?”

“See if you can adopt more wargs.”

Ori stared.

“From where?”

“Wherever you go,” Thorin teased.

“Are you going to have one for Bilbo?”

“Exactly.”

“I hope he takes to it as I did,” Ori mused. “When I first was on, I thought I was going to soil myself.”

“Just don’t wear the purple underwear with the pink hearts on it.”

Ori gasped, then smarted back,

“Better tell Bilbo not to wear the ones with orange and yellow flowers.”

Ori clapped his hand over his mouth, horrified.
Thorin just laughed.
“T’im rather fond of his black ones embroidered with little anvils.”
“Did Bilbo tell you?”
Thorin gave him a look.
“I was with Dwalin when he bought them.”
“You…” Ori hunted for words but couldn’t find any.  “You don’t mind?”
“Why would I mind your husband buying you pretty skivvies?” Thorin said gravely.
“You know what I mean!” Ori cried.
“Of course,” Thorin smiled warmly at him.  “He did tell me what the pair of you did and it sounded lovely.  I’m sorry Dwalin and I weren’t there to watch and, not to mention, help.”
Ori didn’t know what to do, so he hugged Thorin.  Thorin’s chest shook and the rumble of his laughter made Ori feel warm and safe.
Ori looked up.
“You’re almost as wonderful to hug as Dwalin!”
Thorin squeezed him.
“Good to know I still have room for improvement.”
“You know what I meant!” Ori scolded.  Thorin released him but kept an arm about Ori’s shoulders and drew him to the patio.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yup, it’s time to have a Baggins’ birthday party. If you have a cake, eat it now. Yes, the whole thing. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori was awake before dawn, he couldn’t go back to sleep and decided not to wake Dwalin. He dressed silently, tiptoed out and went to his study. He sat down and stared at the materials and sketch for Sigrid’s miniature.

He decided he needed a cup of tea first.

Thorin was the only one at the breakfast table, though Ori heard Dori and Balin in the kitchen.

Ori sat.

Thorin pushed a cup of tea in front of him.

“I’m sorry, I don’t have any medicinal brandy on me,” said Thorin.

Ori sipped and waved an idle hand.

Thorin waited. The cup was drained. Thorin refilled it.

“Better?” the king asked.

“I’m awake. Good morning.”

“And good morning to you. You’re being awake is the important thing,” said Thorin. “I know you’re busy, but I want to run something by you.”

“Of course, Thorin. What do you need?”

“I have a rather far-fetched idea for Mithril Square.”

Ori raised a brow and Thorin laughed.

“I know. Far-fetched compared to what? Inviting an entire troupe of acrobats and their oliphaunt to winter under an active volcano?”

“Now that you mention it,” Ori teased.

“This is what I want to do. I want to turn that house into a center of learning for all the peoples of Middle Earth.”

Ori gasped.

“Thorin! That’s an amazing idea!”

“One of Nori’s better suggestions, I thought,” said Thorin.

Now Ori really was agog.

“Nori? Nori suggested that?”

“More like he inspired it. He was teasing me about how many ‘bad eggs’ his casinos will bring into Dale and Erebor. Even if they will be under surveillance night and day. He said I was going to have to invite a lot of people who didn’t gamble professionally just to balance them out.”

“I notice he didn’t say ‘nice people’,” said Ori. “So, scholars, then?”

“I didn’t miss the implications, either. It’s just a wild idea I had, but why couldn’t we? Why not just open up the whole mountain? Why not use the money to benefit as many people as possible? Not just published scholars, either. Anybody who wants to come here and learn?”

Ori smiled over the rim of his third cup of tea.

“Does Master Brur know you’re going to let ‘a bunch a’ yahoos run amok’ in his library?”

“I’m aware the path is fraught with peril,” Thorin admitted. “I’ve only discussed it with you and Bilbo so far, but this is what I would like. I’m also open to other suggestions for the property.”
“Something besides a casino?” Ori surmised.
“Yes, we will have plenty of those already. No matter what, I want to be able to discuss the purchase here at breakfast tomorrow.”
“I’ll definitely support your initial idea,” said Ori. “If I don’t, I’ll never get to see those fireplace surrounds you talked about.”
Thorin smiled.
“Thank you. Bujni, besides being determined to fly, is working on how to get the core of the ancient library of Khazad-dûm out of…er…Misty Lake. He and Buer are alike in their schemes, except Bujni plans carefully before he builds anything and Buer…”
“Blows things up,” Ori giggled. “I must ask Bujni how his apparatus is coming along. He’s been helping me with my presentation as well, and so has everyone else involved. I admit I’m curious as to how he’s going to get it to fly.”
Thorin refilled their cups.
“I have assured him that when he’s ready, a royal catapult will be at his disposal. Thank you for your support, Ori. Do excuse me. I’m just go and make sure the birthday celebrants are ready.”

About an hour later, everyone from the Fundin and Groinul households was at the breakfast table, ready to celebrate Bilbo’s and Frodo’s birthday. Thorin brought them through for their second breakfast. A cheer went up as they walked in and everyone had to have a turn at hugging the consort and Lord Muffin.

When they were all seated and Dori was ready to dish up the fried eggs and potato, tomato, and onion hash, Frodo stood on his chair and distributed the presents he had for all of them. Dori gushed over the pretty lawn handkerchief and Balin was delighted with a hand sewn pouch of Old Toby.
Ori was pleased with the new quill Frodo sharpened for him, and Dwalin hugged Frodo for the picture Frodo drew of him mounted on Gnasher. Ori didn’t recall Gnasher or Dwalin ever having fangs, but they did look suitably fierce.
Legolas and Gimli laughed over Frodo’s picture of themselves holding hands. Gridr got crocheted tool holders and an apron for when she was working and declared it was just what she needed. Gloin roared with laughter at his own gift. Frodo’s portrait of Gloin sported the most impressive beard Ori had ever seen.
“Where’re me eyes, lad?” Gloin asked.
“You’re looking through a pair of curls,” Frodo explained.
“Oh, so, the usual,” said Gloin, nodding.
Oin received set of small glass jars filled with herbs, and Binni, a slender belt of crocheted orange silk threads. Bujni and Dipfa solemnly accepted with great decorum, flower bulbs, held upright by tiny colored glass balls, planted in a glass dish. Bilbo told them they were grape hyacinths and would bloom at Yule. Ori was assailed by the vision of tiny bunches of grapes popping out of the bulbs.
Dis and Jani got a framed picture of a spray of flowers. They examined it and Bilbo explained he and Frodo had made it with thin strips of colored paper, curled into shapes, and that hobbits called such a craft, quilling. Fili received a packet of soft leather rags and a pot of polish for his weapons and Tauriel and Kili were delighted with their gift of a fat glass jar filled with dried rosebuds and the scent filled the room, when the lid was taken off.
Frodo, after admitting that Bilbo had helped, gave Thorin a baking of banana muffins with xocolātl chunks in them.
“Oh!” Thorin grinned and sniffed eagerly. “Shall we eat these now?”
“It would probably be for the best,” Frodo advised. “They were baked last night.”
“You can have them after you have your hash and eggs,” Dori put in. “And then you two have presents to open.”
Frodo looked up from Thorin’s shoulder, clearly upset.
“They want to give me presents!”
“Birthdays are just done differently here, akunith,” said Thorin. “You remember me telling you
“But don’t they like the ones I made for them?”

“Yes, they do. But they also want you to like the ones they give you. I’m afraid the best you can hope for is an even exchange.”

“Oh.”

“Is that better?”

Frodo frowned.

“I… guess. They’re as happy to give presents as I am to give presents?”

“I couldn’t put it better myself.”

“That’s alright, then. It’s still weird, though.”

“I’m not disagreeing with you,” Thorin promised.

Ulfr and Yizaris had each received a ginger cookie larger than their head as a present from Frodo. Yizaris hugged him and kissed his cheek. Ulfr wasn’t exactly an affectionate dwarf, but he did thank Frodo and attempt to make conversation.

“Where’s yer friend Wee Sam this mornin’?” Ulfr asked.

“He’s with his parents today. I think they were starting to miss him a little.”

“Yeh seem like guid friends an’ boon companions,” said Ulfr.

“He’s my One,” said Frodo.

“Beg pardon?”

“Only, he doesn’t know it yet, because he’s too young.”

“Oh, really. I see.” Ulfr shot a look of horror over Frodo’s head. Bilbo smiled serenely. Ulfr went on, “Well, plenty a’ time f’r tha’.”

“That’s just what I think,” said Frodo, nodding wisely.

“I’m glad we agree,” said Ulfr. “An’, may I ask, how old’re yeh?”

“Eleven today.”

Ulfr glanced at Thorin.

“About twenty for a dwarfin’,” Thorin supplied.

Ulfr’s eyebrows flew up in surprise.

“Bit precocious, aren’t yeh,” he said to Frodo.

“Yep,” said Frodo.

Thorin snickered.

Ulfr shot him a look.

“Yeh were a hundred times worse, as I recall. Cheeky brat.”

“I wasn’t that bad,” Thorin protested.

“No? I remember comin’ t’ see yer udad when I was on me honeymoon. Yeh followed me an’ Yizaris everywhere, making ‘kissin’ noises. Yer mam had t’ drag yeh away because all yer udad would do was laugh.”

Fili and Kili stared at Thorin, then at each other.

Fili ventured, “Idad had an evil twin. Someone we don’t know about.”

“That’s the only reasonable explanation,” said Kili.

Thorin looked gleeful.

“I was washing dishes for weeks, but it was worth it.”

“I daresay yeh wouldn’t want me followin’ yeh an’ th’ perfesser about, doin’ th’a’,” Ulfr admonished.

“Ulfr, I would pay gold to see that.”

After breakfast and presents, which Frodo enjoyed despite the weirdness, the rest of the morning saw Thorin and Bilbo with Frodo on his lap as they rode Minty and Vespa, followed by Dori and Balin in the teacup, and everyone else in the royal family riding behind, touring around the mountain, allowing everyone to give birthday greetings to the consort-to-be and Lord Muffin. The teacup was slowly loaded with gifts and Bilbo and Frodo gave out cupcakes to all.

Ori and Dwalin rode alongside, Dwalin on alert and Ori scribbling notes of gift givers, what they gave, and drawing places and people. They made it back to Fundin house in time for a very late lunch. Bilbo had provided Frodo with snacks to tide him over during the tour.

Dori took charge of the presents, laying them out on the great table in the receiving room and discussing them with Bilbo and Mistress Dazla. As usual, Dori kept a few that were made by crafters who needed their work shown and the rest were sorted into bundles to be dispersed to people who truly needed clothing and foodstuffs. Jewelry was inspected to be either auctioned off or broken down to supply gems and findings at low cost to guild apprentices. Dori and Bilbo spent the time teaching Frodo about this practice and soon the faunt busily sorted any toys with the same focused energy, until he was sent through to Bag End East for a nap.

Ori noted where each item was sent and where. By the time this was finished, Dori declared with rather overdone innocence, that they now had to get ready as dear Bard and Thranduil had invited them to Dale Hall for a cup of tea and to wish Bilbo and Frodo many happy returns of the day. Ori sneaked a peek at Bilbo, who winked at him. Dori and Mistress Dazla bustled back to the living area of the house while Ori and Bilbo walked slowly after them.

“I take it there are more than just the royal family of Dale at this ‘tea’?” Bilbo asked.
Ori fluttered his eyelashes and Bilbo chuckled.
“That explains the several wagons that were smuggled out of here this morning.”
“Oh?” Ori asked naively “And what else did your hobbit ears hear?”
“Well, I do have sensitive ears,” Bilbo said, slipping his hand into Ori’s.
“Very. Remember you promised to act surprised.” Ori squeezed Bilbo’s hand.
“Why would I be surprised?” Bilbo asked, raising his eyebrows. “Dori just informed us, we are going for tea.”
Ori giggled and Bilbo kissed him.
“Tha’ looks tasty.”
Dwalin stood at the receiving room door, grinning at them.
“It was, captain,” Bilbo grinned. “What a pity you’re too late for the party.”
“Party ain’t star’ed yet, me nug.”
Dwalin spanked both Ori and Bilbo as they went into the sitting room, making both squeak.
Ori swung round and pounced on his husband.
“I’ll get you!” he cried.
“Anytime, me love,” Dwalin said ferally, “anytime.”
“Go and get ready, both of you!” Bilbo ordered. “Hurry up! I’ve got a king and a faunt to get dressed.”
“We hear an’ obey, yer highness.”
Dwalin swept Bilbo a grand bow. Bilbo huffed a laugh and raced off to Bag End East. Ori led the way to the bedroom, hand in hand with Dwalin.
“Bilbo is so cute,” Ori said as he closed the bedroom door behind them.
“Th’ pair a’ yeh’re sweet as mead an’ twice as heady,” Dwalin replied, took Ori in his arms, and dropped them down on the bed.
Ori wrapped his arms about Dwalin and kissed him. He was just thinking about putting his hands further southward when Dori called,
“Pet, Dearie, it’s time!”
Dwalin and Ori sighed in unison, then laid their brows together.
“La’er, love?”
“Later.”

The teacup bowled along merrily between Ori and Dwalin as they followed Thorin with Frodo on Minty and Bilbo on Vespa. The wargs gamboled alongside. The rest of the Fundin Household followed.

They were almost at Dale, when Dori cried out,
“Oh! Thorin, dear. I’ve just had a thought. We are a bit early. Why don’t we just have a quick run over to that lovely new Green dear Mister Gardener showed us yesterday! You know how our Bilbo talks about such things in the Shire.”
Thorin turned, looked at Dori, then turned to Bilbo.

“Ghivasha, would you like to see the Green?”

“I would love to see the Green, Thorin. How kind of you to think of it, Dori.”

Dori settled in the tea cup, looking pleased. Ori did his best to control his face as Dwalin winked at him. The entourage turned and circumnavigated the outskirts of Dale and headed for the Green. Ori sat up a little in his saddle. The Green was festooned with colored lights, paper lanterns, bunting, and ribbons. It was full of people as well as tents.

Bilbo turned in his saddle to look merrily back at Dori.

“The Green looks as though it’s a trifle full, Dori. Are you sure we won’t be bothering anyone by stopping by?”

“Oh, goodness no!” Dori replied airily.

They drew up to the edge of the Green and the cheers and shouts of “Happy Birthday” were all about. Thorin and Bilbo rode forward and dismounted with Frodo. Bilbo gave Ori a look. Ori hurried over and Bilbo shoved a wrapped narrow square box to him.

“Thorin’s gift,” Bilbo hissed and turned to talk to Bard, Thranduil and the Bardlings, who had arrived to welcome them. Hamfast and Bell with Sam, who rushed forward to hug Frodo and tell him everything that had happened since he had seen Frodo two days ago. Helping hands parked the teacup and turned the ponies loose to graze.

Gloin and Oin and their family arrived with a wheeled cart holding the presents Bilbo and Frodo had made to give people. Ori watched as Thorin and Bilbo and Frodo worked their way through the crowd of well wishers.

A wagon from the Court of Miracles arrived with Tharkûn sitting next to Jim. Soon there were performers working the crowd. Various little tents all around the Green held people baking, and cooking, and serving drinks. Some held party favors and others were from the Night Market, selling more family-oriented wares.

Ori almost giggled as Bilbo and Frodo passed out cupcakes to everyone who greeted them. They had made their slow progress to the single copper beech, which Wee Sam loudly declared was now to be The East Party Tree as the one in the Shire was in the West. Bard swung Sam to his shoulder and made the announcement. This was met with cheers and raised drinks to the tree. There was a festooned table with a bench and a step behind. Thorin gave Bilbo a hand to stand up on the table and lifted Frodo up beside his uncle. Everyone quieted.

“My dear men, dwarrow, and elves,” began Bilbo. “I am almost overcome by your kindness and, more importantly, your welcome to Frodo and myself. Neither words nor presents can express how happy Frodo and I are to be living among you. I don’t know half of you was well as I should like and all of you are essential to the happiness of this city and this mountain, and to the happiness of your kings. As you have all learned, hobbits give presents on their birthdays and I would like to give presents to your rulers. King Bard?”

Bard came forward and embraced Bilbo.

“Happy birthday, Professor Baggins, Master Baggins, may you both celebrate many more among us.”

“You are too kind, Bard.” Bilbo handed Bard a shallow box, prettily wrapped in red paper.

“Frodo and I made this for you.”

Bard looked amused and turned, so everyone could see him open it. Inside was a fine linen shirt, exquisitely embroidered with yellow silk threads and amber beads in designs of sun discs. The crowd exclaimed. Bard handed the box to Bain and took off the shirt he was wearing and put on Bilbo’s gift. The shirt fitted him perfectly and the amber caught the lights all around and the sunset, and shimmered as he moved. This brought another cheer.

Bilbo and Frodo had made lemon curd tarts for each of the Bardlings, and Thranduil received an apple completely studded with cloves. From where he stood, Ori could smell the delicious scent.

“It’s for your dining room,” Bilbo told him. “They keep for ages and the scent whets appetites.”

“It’s perfect, Bilbo, thank you,” said the king-father with bow and his hand over his heart. “My only regret is I can’t eat it.”
Frodo gave Bard and Thranduil a baking of apple muffins, one of which Bard promptly ate, then kissed the top of Frodo’s head.

Sigrid and Bain received pictures of themselves Frodo had drawn. Frodo gave Tilda a carved wooden boar.

“Mister Bifur carved it for me to give you,” Frodo explained.

Tilda squealed, hugged Frodo, and announced the boar’s name was ‘Choppy’.

“Thorin,” said Bilbo with a grin.

“Yes, ghivasha?”

Thorin climbed up on the table. Ori sidled up to Bilbo and Bilbo grinned as Ori handed up the box he’d been guarding in his satchel. Bilbo nodded and Ori put it into Frodo’s eager hands.

“Thorin, my love and my king, I hope you will like the gift Frodo and I have made for you. It’s a traditional gift among betrothed couples at festivals and is in keeping with the season.”

Thorin lifted Frodo to sit on his shoulders and took the box with a kiss from Bilbo. He opened it and stared at the contents. Thorin looked at Bilbo then at Dwalin. Dwalin looked evilly pleased with events. Thorin cleared his throat and said,

“Amrâlimê, my irakashat by betrothal, I would like you to know the captain of the royal military of Erebor is a conniving ass.” Thorin glared at Dwalin but failed with the grin on his face. “Captain, the gift I entrusted to you?”

“Righ’ here, yer majesty,” Dwalin barked and handed a similar box to Thorin with precision. The box was wrapped in the same paper as Bilbo and Frodo’s gift. Dwalin lifted Frodo off Thorin and Bilbo and Frodo opened their present from Thorin. Frodo squealed in delight and Bilbo looked blankly at Thorin, then turned to Dwalin.

“Captain Dwalin, you are conniving, but you’re also a darling.”

“’S true,” Dwalin agreed, and went to Ori’s side, and put an arm around Ori’s shoulders.

The crowd murmured with curiosity. Thorin took from the box Bilbo had given him, a beautiful circlet of autumn leaves and berries. Bilbo giggled and took out Thorin’s presents to himself and Frodo: two matching circlets of leaves made of copper and gold wire, set with ruby berries. The crowd went mad and Dori bust into tears.

“So sweet!” Dori cried.

“Shall we practice for Durin’s Day, ghivasha, my hobbit nephew?” Thorin laughed.

Bilbo grinned, but there were tears in his eyes.

Before everyone, Thorin crowned Bilbo and Frodo, then Bilbo and Frodo put their crown on Thorin. Wild cheering, applause, and tears greeted this. Thorin, Bilbo, and Frodo turned to the audience and Bard called out for the feasting to begin.

The tables of food were fallen upon.

Ori knew what Dori had planned for the menu, but he obviously hadn’t counted on what hobbits considered proper party food. Even the sumptuous spread at the housewarming party had only hinted at the feast before him. It covered ten long tables set end to end at one side of the green.

Binni’s cream cheese sandwiches alone ran to four varieties. Ori counted:

Slices of brown bread, each with half a fresh plum the middle.

Sunflower seed bread with cucumber slices and watercress.

Oatmeal bread with marmalade, raisins and chopped nuts, or with grated orange rind and chopped pecans.

Binni looked tired, but happy.

Other sandwiches from the Fundin’s kitchen held deviled eggs blended with crisp bacon bits, tomato slices and lettuce, or sliced chicken, paper-thin slices of onion and lettuce. There was even a hobbit ‘pub’ favorite: a cheddar and beer spread on dark bread, the platter of which already had to be refilled twice because the dwarrow immediately decimated them.

Omi and Loli had assisted Dori in baking popovers, seed cakes and cardamom rolls, herbed bread and brown molasses bread.

Dori made exquisite glazed pear tarts, and all the apple, blackberry, gooseberry, cherry and peach pies herself, then needed to go have a long nap.
Vi and Margr used that time and the Fundin’s kitchen to produce tarts of mincemeat and treacle, pound cake, and gingerbread.

The royal kitchen baked upside down cakes with pineapples, spiced layer cakes, and dark and light fruit cakes as well as producing several slabs of perfectly tender roast beef.

The elves raved about the grilled cave mushrooms, and the cob corn roasted in the husks and potatoes in their jackets, both cooked on hot coals.

They had brought venison, rabbit, duck and squirrel from the forests, but also prepared dishes they themselves enjoyed, including a salad of cooked beans, peas, potatoes, carrots, onions. Lindir himself presented a pile of fresh lettuce leaves stuffed with chopped apples, peanuts, and raisins. Both these recipes included a sweet/savory dressing.

Legolas and Gimli sat on the ground near the stream. The mountain of barbecued spareribs sitting between them did not stand a chance.

Bombur and Erda had arrived from the inn a few days before with their younger badgers and a cartload of ingredients. From their base of operations in the kitchen of the Oakenshield Inn, they turned out artichokes with melted butter, luscious, sticky plantains and rice, brown beans with baked onions and tomatoes, and oven dishes filled with strange, hollow curved noodles covered in a thick, pale yellow cheese sauce, spiked with crushed peppercorns. Nutmeg dappled their rich, creamy pumpkin soup.

Another of their covered dishes held something called tuna noodle casserole.

Ori has no idea what that was. It seems to be noodles and fish, celery, onions, and cheese, and he found it surprisingly delicious.

Pitchers of Erda’s zingria joined bottles of Bell’s finest homemade ginger beer in buckets of ice. Hard apple cider and ale in their casks joined apple juice and fizzy fruit water in six varieties.

In addition to broiled or baked fish, the men of Dale happily contributed their feast foods, many of which had not been seen in years: roast turkey, glazed carrots, corn pudding and a thick, dark purple soup of beets with sour cream.

Other Dale dishes had been modified to include foods previously unknown to them. Plantains added new texture to the roasted porcupine with red currant jelly. Regular peppers were replaced with hot chiles in the fish pie with hard boiled eggs, onion, tomatoes, and potatoes. Sigrid shyly added her pigeon pie with bacon and mushrooms to the offerings. Fili looked like he would burst with pride.

Not to be outdone, Haldir and Mister Wandi brought tray upon tray of tomatoes stuffed with ham, cheese, mushrooms and parsley.

“I got the recipe from one of my customers,” said Wandi.

Thranduil was obviously impressed.

“How did you manage this, my fawn?” he asked as Mellon ran in circles around his feet. “I never knew you to do much as heat water for tea.”

“Apparently, adad, I have unplumbed depths,” Wandi replied.

Thranduil raised his eyebrow at the blushing Haldir.

“Not for much longer, I’m willing to bet.”

“Sweetie,” said Bard with a smile. “Adults, remember?”

“Must you have such a good memory, my love?” Thranduil asked. “It’s positively-“ “Mortifying?” Bard asked.

“Not the word I was going for,” said Thranduil, “but it will do.”

Rigel, Ara and the Easterlings approached, looking startled for a moment by the enthusiasm of their reception.

Ori thought the dozen and dozens of mahml and nataj they brought must add to the crowd’s enthusiasm.

“Master Hamfast,” he called to the passing hobbit.

“Aye, Mister Ori?”

“This is incredible. Do hobbit birthday parties usually include such a variety of foods?”

Hamfast rubbed the back of his neck with his free hand. He held a tankard in the other.
“This much food, but not such an assortment, naturally. We may’ve gone a bit ‘round the bend here, but it’s for Mis- for Bilbo, ain’t it. He’s got friends from all over, an’ everyone wanted to help. Bell just had to get ‘em all lined up, make sure we didn’t have too much of any one thing.”

“That must have been a lot of work in itself,” said Ori.

“Well, Bilbo’s allus bin so good t’ us. She was happy t’ do it.”

When a majority of the party-goers seemed to be of an elegant sufficiency, the musicians struck up. Bilbo and Thorin danced with Frodo first, then with Bard and Thranduil, then pretty much everyone else. Frodo and Sam went off to play with the other children and badgers, supervised by the wargs.

Ori sat on one of the high tables which had held dishes, and drew the party, the dancing, the eating and drinking and the merry-making. Thorin and Jani danced a jig while Bilbo and Dis twirled near them, laughing. Bard and Thranduil led a round dance as Bain and Gimli bounded after them. Dori sat on her inflatable sap chair, rested, and told people to go and eat. Sigrid, Tauriel, and Eowyn swung each other around, shrieking. Mister Wandi and Haldir canoodled behind the Party Tree East.

The dancing and drinking went on for a bit. Ori drew the paper-covered stars that had been brought out again. This time they were not just for the children and badgers to break and gather candy. There were stars for adults, too. Dwalin broke one so hard the contents spray over most of the Green.

The stars for adults contained candy, but other things as well, like gold coins, tiny carved ornaments, or charms for prosperity, luck or love, or little canteens of spirits and potions. None of these canteens were marked, so any picking them up, drank and guessed at the contents, sometimes with embarrassing results. Fili drank one and sneezed fourteen times in a row. Kili tried another and it turned his tongue bright green and he immediately set on Haldir and threatened to lick him, making Mister Wandi giggle hysterically.

Ori watched Tharkûn and Jim exit a far tent and tie the door flap carefully. The tent’s edges were pegged tightly to the ground and the top was held high by four tall, sturdy poles. Ori’s curiosity got the better of him and, after stowing his satchel carefully beneath the bench, casually wandered toward the stream with his sketch book and graphite wand, pretending to draw. Tharkûn and Jim were soon mingling with the crowd and Ori saw Mistress Bell drag Tharkûn out to dance.

Ori walked slowly amongst a few tents and, once behind them all, he made a beeline for Tharkûn’s tent.

Suddenly, he heard familiar voices. He paused then, recognizing them, hurried over.

“Why, what strong arms you have, Captain Dwalin,” Bilbo teased in dulcet tones. “How well you can carry this poor, tired hobbit.”

Ori came around the tent corner to see Dwalin leaning against one of the tall posts, Bilbo lifted up against his waist.

“May I draw you?” Ori asked.

“Certainly,” Bilbo said with a grin. He looked as though he had been thoroughly kissed. Knowing what it was like to be thoroughly kissed by Dwalin, Ori felt himself warming.

“Dwalin, my love,” Ori asked in his most innocent tone, “is dear Bilbo so full of drink, you had to carry him to the privy?”

“Ori, dear,” teased Bilbo in his turn, pointing at the tent, “that’s not the privy, that’s Tharkûn’s tent.”

Ori grinned at his husband.

“How nice! Dwalin likes Tharkûn’s tents.”

“Does he?” Bilbo cooed. “Well, do let’s have a look at this one.”

“Guid idea, love. C’mon, wee nug.”

Dwalin hoisted Bilbo higher and grabbed Ori’s beard with a feral look. Ori realized why Dwalin like it so much when he tugged on Dwalin’s beard. He snatched Dwalin’s hand and towed them to the edge of the tent. He dropped to his knees, pulled out two of the pegs, and crawled under the canvas. In the vague glow from the party lights outside, Ori could see the tent was full of boxes piled with brightly colored pointy things, but Ori wasn’t that interested.

He got to his feet, turned, and lifted the canvas. Bilbo and Dwalin rolled under, open-mouthed kissing. Ori knew he was going to draw that. It was wonderful! Dwalin got to his feet, still carrying Bilbo. Bilbo alit from the heights, drew away and patted Dwalin’s beard.

“Such a lovely beard. Very different from Thorin’s. All wild and fluffy.”

“Heartsa’, me love? I’ve go’ a wild, fluffy beard.”

“And he can do wild things with it,” Ori informed Bilbo.

Bilbo’s grin was predatory.

“Can he now? How very interesting. I’m sure you know what to do with it, Ori. I’d like to inspect another part of his anatomy.”

“Shall I help you with his belt?” Ori asked. “Warriors have complicated belts.”

“Fuck,” Dwalin groaned.

“Oh, not so complicated as all that,” Bilbo teased.

Ori giggled as he saw Dwalin’s cock straining against his breeches.

“W-weren’ yeh goin’ t’ draw, me wee scribe?”

“I can draw from memory,” said Ori, fluttering his lashes.

He knelt down in front of Dwalin and nuzzled him through his clothes.

“Yeh only ge’ one warnin’,” said Dwalin.

Ori looked over at Bilbo and licked his lips.

“We only get one warning,” said Ori.

“I can heed warnings,” said Bilbo and knelt down beside him.

Four clever hands navigated the ‘complicated’ belt with fascinating speed. Ori pulled the trousers down a little and pulled Dwalin’s cock through the gap.

“Great Yavanna!” Bilbo cried. “Dwalin! You’re an inspiration!”

“Oh, aye? Wha’ d’ I inspire?”

“Lustful abandon,” said Bilbo. He turned to Ori. “Would you say lustful abandon, Lord Ori?”

“Yes, Professor Baggins, I would say lustful abandon is the precise term.”

“Thank you, Lord Ori.”

“You’re most welcome, professor.”

“Enough wi’ th’ niceties!” Dwalin scraped. “Me cock is lonely!”

Bilbo and Ori exchanged evil smiles - and kissed each other.

“Oi!”

They drew apart, giggling.

“Shall we?” Bilbo asked.

“Oh, yes,” said Ori.

The two of them feasted on Dwalin’s cock, and it was just as Ori had imagined.

Their mouths roamed up and down his length, over his sack, stopping only to kiss each other.

Dwalin’s legs shook, gave out and he dropped down to his knees. The two of them never stopped.

Ori curled on his side and licked the slit gently, all the while holding Dwalin’s gaze. Dwalin’s eyes were mostly pupil as he gazed back, panting around a heart-stopping smile.

Ori reached up, and tugged his beard.

“Ooooh, Mahal. Yer both killin’ me. In a good way.”

“He’s still talking,” said Bilbo.

“We’re doing this wrong,” said Ori. “Will you see what you can do?”

“I’d be delighted.”

Bilbo stood and opened his trousers. Ori wiggled out of the way but never moved his tongue away from his husband’s cock. Bilbo straddled Dwalin’s thighs and, as he was at the appropriate height, popped his cock into Dwalin’s mouth.

“Will that do, m’lord?” Bilbo asked.

“You hobbits are so practical!” managed Ori around a mouthful.

“Mm-hm,” Dwalin agreed.

Soon, however, there was no more talking. When Bilbo started to waver, Dwalin grasped him by the hips and held him up. A thrill shot up Ori’s spine at the casual display of strength. He remembered those hands on his own hips as Dwalin ground into him from behind and moaned.

“I thought I’d find you three here.”

Ori jerked up.

Thorin was just coming under the flap with a grin on his face. Dwalin was gagged and Bilbo busy, so Ori rolled over a little and held out his hand. With remarkable speed, Thorin scooped low over him and slotted his mouth into Ori’s.

Ori squeaked for about half a second, then he melted.

Ohh, Mahal. Was this what he was afraid of? Thorin was just as good a kisser as he was a hugger. He wasn’t solid like Dwalin, but his limbs were strong and supple and his hands were long and he wrapped Ori up and pulled him close. Ori twined his arms around Thorin’s neck and kissed back for all he was worth.

“Mmmm,” said Thorin. He pulled back just far enough to grin wickedly, and licked Ori’s lips.

“Dwalin said you had quite a knack and he was right.”

“Isn’t he always?” Ori asked.

“Of course. Just ask him,” Thorin murmured in that deep, smooth voice. “Is this alright?”

Ori shivered down his spine, around the curve of his arse and the length of his cock.

“It’s lovely,” he said.

“Good, because I’ve wanted to kiss you for ages.”

And he did again.

They tangled together on the ground, vying for the top, though, admittedly, Ori didn’t vie very hard, content to grind up against Thorin while the high king of dwarrow nuzzled and licked at his neck.

While Ori writhed and panted, Thorin pulled the lacings from Ori’s tunic and kissed down his chest. They could hear Bilbo strangling the moans of his climax.

In the near-dark, Ori saw Bilbo shuddering in Dwalin’s grasp.

“That’s… you’re… oh, my dear…”

And then a strangled scream.

Dwalin grunted and hissed, “Told yeh, yeh only ge’ one warning.”

“Lesson, learned.” Bilbo sighed.

Thorin had just pushed aside Ori’s tunic, when Dwalin cursed and grabbed all three of them to him.

“Dwalin!” Thorin protested.

“Shut it,” Dwalin muttered and held them all still. Thorin hissed in annoyance, then Ori heard Tharkûn’s voice and froze. Tharkûn was nearby but he was talking to Jim and Bard.

“Scram,” Dwalin ordered low.

“Where’s the flap?” Bilbo whispered.

“I’ll check,” Ori muttered and pulled out his flint box. He struck and the tiny light flared. He seized the loose canvas under which they’d got in.

“Put that out!” Bilbo squeaked, slapping the ember out of Ori’s hands.

“Shit!” hissed Dwalin.

“Did one catch?” Thorin asked urgently.

“One what?” Ori asked and Thorin and Dwalin pushed him to the flap.

Ori rolled out, pulling Thorin with him. Bilbo was shoved out at them and Thorin and Ori got Bilbo to his feet.

“Go!” Thorin ordered and pushed Bilbo and Ori to the darkness behind the tent.

“Dwalin!” Ori gasped.

Thorin held up the canvas as Dwalin rolled free. Ori saw he was carrying two brightly colored items, one small, and one large and mounted on a stick. Horrified, Ori recognized a burning fuse at the end of both.

Dwalin slammed the stick of the larger one deep in the ground and flung the smaller off in the direction of the stream.
“Run!” Dwalin growled.
They fled away from the party, colliding as they fell into what Ori decided was a leftover haystack. He sat up and turned at a loud splash. A bright greenizzle of sparks hissed upward from the stream. The large one blew skyward with a loud shriek, trailed by a streak of sparks. It exploded into a beautiful shower of pink lights, high above the party, then took the shape of a flower.

They heard the crowd cheer and the distant sound of Tharkûn swearing colorfully.

Dwalin fell back and started to snicker.

“Fuck it, Dwalin!” Thorin choked. “I thought we’d finished stealing Tharkûn’s stuff when we were seventy!”

“Fireworks?” asked Ori, moving around, until he got his hands on his husband. “Those were fireworks? I’ve never seen them so close and unlit.”

Dwalin yanked him into a hug, stifling his own mirth.

“Tha’ tent were full a’ ‘em, love.”

“I can’t believe I struck a light!” Ori moaned and dropped his head in his hands.

Thorin and Bilbo muffled their laughter in each others hair.

“I rescued our crowns,” Bilbo said, still giggling.

They all got to their feet and brushed each other off.

“To the stream,” Thorin said, decidedly. “We were strolling together and went to see what made the splash.”

“Guid,” Dwalin agreed.

“Wait,” said Bilbo. He stopped in his tracks.

“What’s the matter, ghivasha?” Thorin put his arm about Bilbo.

“I seem to be missing my trousers,” Bilbo stated with a laugh in his voice.

Ori gasped, looked down and, in the low light from the party, he saw Bilbo’s pale legs.

“Here,” said Dwalin and pulled out the item from the back of his belt. “Though’ it were love’s thin’s.”

“Yavanna bless you.” Bilbo sighed in relief.

He took them from Dwalin and shook them out. Ori brushed them helpfully and held them steady for Bilbo to hop into. Dwalin and Thorin belted their own breeches and straightened their tunics.

They were about to start out again, when Bilbo said, “No. Stop.”

“No’ yer britches, nug?” Dwalin asked.

“Mine, but on back to front,” Bilbo stated, giggling. Ori started to giggle, too and went to help as Bilbo dropped them and turned around. Ori and Bilbo snickered so hard, they couldn’t do much other than knock into each other. Thorin and Dwalin started to chuckle as well but they quickly took ahold of the pair and Bilbo was dressed and Ori helped to tie his tunic lacings.

“Hurry,” Thorin said and took Bilbo’s hand and started running toward the stream. Dwalin grabbed Ori’s hand and they tore after the king and consort. They ran in a curve, then down the hill towards the party. Bard came to them.

“Everyone alright, Bard?” Thorin asked with suitable gravity.

Bard laughed. “Someone got into Tharkûn’s fireworks tent and nicked a couple. Tharkûn’s mad, because he wanted them to be a surprise.”

“Oh, well,” said Bilbo comfortingly. “It was still a surprise and for Gandalf as well.”

Thranduil looked them over then with a teasing smile said,

“I shan’t ask what you four were doing up by the stream.”

“Best not to,” Bilbo replied.

He tucked his arm into Thorin’s, and they walked back to the party, while putting their crowns back on. Dwalin and Ori followed meekly behind, until Dwalin started whistling.

Glorfindel and Eowyn busily herded people to sit on the bank of the hill. Frodo and Sam rushed up to Bilbo and Thorin.

“Uncle! Idad! Gandalf brought whizz-bangs!”

Tharkûn stomped after them.

“It was supposed to be a surprise for your birthdays.”
“I’m both surprised and delighted, Gandalf,” Bilbo assured the grumpy wizard. Tharkûn cocked an eyebrow at the four of them then shook his head. Bilbo and Frodo were urged to the middle of the crowd. Gloin and Gridr called to them from a few blankets on the hillside. There they joined the rest of the royals.

“Where have the four of you been?” Dori demanded. “We were looking for you!”

“We went for a walk, Dori,” Thorin replied soothingly. “Bilbo wanted to see more of the Green and the stream.”

This pacified Dori, but Balin winked at them. Dis and Jani lay on their backs and looked up at the sky, as Tauriel and Kili pointed out stars. Sigrid lay on her back between Fili’s knees, her head on his chest, as they occasionally teased Kili and Tauriel. Oin and Bujni sat together, muttering about chemical formulas while Binni and Dipfa sat near them, arms entwined. Thorin settled down with Bilbo, and Sam and Frodo crawled into their laps. Legolas, Gimli, and the wargs crowded in and stepped on family members who pushed at them to make room. Dwalin drew Ori down and Ori arranged them, so they mimicked Fili and Sigrid, as Ori thought Sigrid looked very comfortable. He pillowed his head into Dwalin’s chest.

“Sorry I lit my tinder,” he whispered.

Dwalin squeezed him.

“Yeh kin ligh’ me tinder anytime, love.”

Tharkûn had set out his fireworks and soon Bard and Jim came to join the company on the hillside.

“Ready?” Tharkûn shouted.

There was an answering cheer and Tharkûn set off three rockets that shot up and out towards the lake and burst in fountains of brightly colored sparks.

There were ‘oooh’s and ‘ahhhh’s. Another one went up and blew into several fireballs that became goats running across the sky.

This was followed by an elven ship in red and yellow sparkles.

Animals and trees and warriors of various races followed. An orange dragon with green wings and a long, wavy tail swooped out and raced off southward.

Ori settled for just watching and not trying to draw the details, he merely noted the shapes and colors.

The ending was a long series of brightly-colored explosions of all kinds of things, then a final group that exploded to spell out ‘Happy Birthday’ first in westron, then sindarin, then khuzdul. There was a huge cheer and applause. The top of Tharkûn’s staff glowed and lit the entire Green as the royal family of Dale, several noble dwarrow and the Groinuls rolled out a cart with a huge cake on it. There were eleven candles in the top tier and a circle of candles on each tier beneath.

As at the betrothal, Bilbo helped Frodo cut the first piece and then Thranduil lifted Frodo, so he could blow out the candles on top. Children and badgers were lifted to blow out the rest. The cake was brought to an empty table where Dis and Sigrid led a team of people to cut and hand out slices. Ori almost drooled when he realized it was carrot cake with cream cheese icing.

Dancing began again and Ori and Dwalin enjoyed themselves. They stopped for a breather and Dwalin got into a discussion with Haldir, Eowyn, and Glorfindel.

Ori watched as Thorin and Bilbo, hands clasped, danced the figures of a country dance.

“Lord Ori.”

Ori turned.

“Nugget! How good to see you again!” Ori hugged her.

She hugged back, laughing.

“Are you standing aloof and being lordly?” Nugget teased.

“No, I was dancing with my husband but he’s been dragged into a business discussion.”

“The guard is always prepared.” Nugget smiled. “Dance with me?”

“Yes, please!”

Ori caught her hand and they rushed into the next set forming.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. What a lovely party! Now we need time to recover….or something. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori opened his eyes when raven feet landed on his face.
“Quartz?”
“Wake up,” rasped Quartz. “Garnet and I are hungry.”
“What time is it?” Ori mumbled.
“Time to feed the ravens.”
“Bugger,” growled Dwalin. Ori sat up as Dwalin rolled over. Ori heard the ninth volley and sighed. He caught the scent of bacon and his tummy made an interested noise.
“How can I be hungry?“ Ori said. “After the amount I ate last night, then cake…”
“Bloody brillian’ cake,” Dwalin commented and grinned at Ori.
Ori grinned back and leaned on Dwalin’s chest.
“Anything besides the cake?” he teased.
Dwalin pulled him onto his chest and kissed him.
“Bloody Tharkûn spoilin’ thin’s f’r us.”
Ori laughed.
“I never dreamed I’d kiss Thorin while you and Bilbo fiddled each other.”
“Yeh like it?” Dwalin asked.
Ori answered by leaning forward again to kiss his husband thoroughly.
“Ow!” Dwalin barked as Garnet tweaked his torn ear.
“Stop slobbering in each other’s mouths and feed us,” Garnet demanded.
Killer woke up and bounded up from the foot of the bed and started licking Dwalin’s face.
Ori sat up on Dwalin’s waist, patted Killer’s back, and frowned at the two birds.
“Stop slobbering in each other’s mouths and feed us,” Garnet demanded.
“Dori is frying bacon in maple syrup. We want some,” Quartz explained in a tone that conveyed he was being very patient with a couple of complete shaleheads. Ori and Dwalin looked at each other over Killer’s nose.
“We better get there before Nori does,” Ori said and they struggled out of bed at speed.
Killer barked, bounced off the bed, then the cats yowled as the warg grabbed their basket in his teeth and shook it. Kihshassa opened one eye, then closed it again.
They arrived at the table in ten minutes. Killer proudly trotted ahead with two ravens and two cats on his back. Kihshassa clung to Ori.
“Good morning,” Bilbo greeted them as he stood pouring tea into Thorin’s cup.
“Thank you, ghiyasha. Please sit down and eat.”
Bilbo kissed Thorin’s temple, went to the patio window, and called Sam and Frodo in.
Thorin poured tea for Ori and Dwalin and passed these over. The ravens fluttered to the table.
Nori-Pori and Mask gamboled outside, shadowed by Kihshassa before she winged off to glean the last fruit from the berry bushes.
Dwalin sent Killer off to the food bowls.
Dori whisked though with a large platter piled with bacon as the faunts bounded in and climbed into their seats on either side of Bilbo and Thorin.

Balin came in and kissed Dori.

“Good mornin’, all,” he greeted them. “Thank great Mahal, it’s a rest day. Tha’ was quite th’ party las’ night.”

“It was fun!” Frodo cried. “I didn’t get to bed until midnight!”

“Midnight,” Sam affirmed.

“Good thin’ we don’t have lessons then, wee laddies,” Balin teased and ruffled both Frodo’s and Sam’s hair as he went to his seat.

“Rinis and Rinid,” said Dori to Balin.

Balin shook his head.

“We’ve left th namin’ a’ th’ pebbles t’ our Dain, me dear.”

“And he hasn’t come up with a thing, has he,” Dori replied. “What is he waiting for? Their coming of age party?”

Ori finished his cup of tea as Dori busily filled plates and passed them.

The room began to fill with people. Ori remembered then that Thorin had something to put forward to the council.

Thorin’s concept of ‘council’ morphed from situation to situation, though it always included those who stood with him at the Scouring of Dale. Now Bilbo was here, and very often Bard and Thranduil came up from Dale if they could spare the time. Ori thought it was a tribute to Dori’s cooking how often they did make the time.

This morning, extra leaves had been fitted in the table. The breakfast parlor was large, but a few more councillors and they would be eating breakfast in the dining area of the sitting room, possibly some of them with plates on their laps.

Omi busily took notes, while Loli attempted to ‘help’, mostly by looking over Omi’s shoulder and making suggestions.

“Bugger off, Lo,” Omi muttered. “I know what I’m about.”

Thranduil, Bard, and the Bardlings arrived, though Bard looked rather peaked.

Thorin rose to pour Bard’s tea himself.

“Thank you for coming to breakfast,” said Thorin. “It wasn’t exactly an early night, I know.”

Bard waved his hand in universal signal of ‘whatever’, drained his cup, and held it out to be filled again. Thorin laughed, went and retrieved a tankard from the sideboard. As he filled it, he called out to the kitchen for more tea.

When they all sat, Thorin looked around him, and Ori saw how proud and happy he was. Ori vowed to himself that he would work to keep that look on Thorin’s face as much as possible. Thorin cleared his throat. Everyone looked up at him, though still chewing.

“I have an idea that I would like to run by all of you. You may know that Mithril Square, Lady Kadis’ ancestral home, is up for sale. The family will be building in Dale, closer to the brewery.”

Gloin grunted.

“Auwful nice piece of real estate to be sitting empty in the middle of Erebor.”

“That’s what I thought when Zark and Kadis offered to sell it to me.”

Balín’s eyes twinkled.

“When do we move in, laddie?”

“We aren’t moving the royal residence,” Thorin promised, “but that doesn’t mean I don’t think it would be of use. I will buy the property, yes, if only to keep that terrible Ursith from getting his filthy mitts on it.”

Nori saluted Thorin from his place beside Bofur.

“And you will do what with it?” Thranduil asked, getting to the point.

“I propose, an institute of learning.”

“What kind of learning?” Ulfr asked, raising a brow.

“Primarily about dwarrow and our culture, but also about, and open to, all the people of Middle Earth.”

Ulfr sucked in a horrified breath, but Yizaris looked perfectly calm and Buer exclaimed, “That “would be so neat!”
The Ironfist king frowned at him.
“It would be?”

“Sure! Think of how much we have to give to the world! Think of how much we could gain in return! Look at just what Mister Hamfast has given all of us. Farming is hard, and it’s risky, but it beats starving if our trade routes are cut off. We’d never be as successful at it just struggling along on our own.”

Ulfr’s eyebrows climbed his forehead, he seemed to consider it, then he nodded.

“I see yer point.”

Ori wondered if the world had been abruptly remade for a second time. Arne was going to laugh himself sick when he heard this.

“Thorin,” said Ori. “Given how much of our knowledge is archived and where, does Master Brur know you’re proposing to open his library to a bunch of yahoos?”

Brur, at the door, said, “He does.”

The old dwarf escorted Sadi in and calls of greeting went up.

“F’r wha’ it’s worth,” said Sadi, “Brur an’ I agree with Thorin. Though, mind, it took a moment or two f’r we both t’ realize it.”

Brur eyed her sourly, and she smiled back at him like a poison apple.

“I like to think,” said Thorin, “that we do have a lot to offer, not just in mining, engineering, and warfare, but in our other arts, and our literature, and that, possibly, it might be of interest to more than ourselves.”

“I think,” said Thranduil, “that it’s an excellent idea. We have a varied experience just amongst our close acquaintance. My only question is, Thorin, when will you sleep?”

“When you’re teaching about regional wines,” teased Thorin.

“Good point,” Thranduil chuckled. “I might sleep through it as well, except for the tasting part.”

“The purpose,” said Thorin, “is not just a set curriculum. Yes, it would be important to teach khuzdul.” Ulfr choked on his bacon. Thorin ignored him and continued. “But, if we could offer a variety of subjects, we could draw a variety of scholars. Also, I’d like a place for our young who don’t apprentice in a craft to explore other options.”

“Wish I’d had that,” said Buer. “It’s tough trying to teach yourself everything from the bottom of the shaft up. I spent way too much time reinventing the cog. Then learning how to set it on fire.”

“I could lecture about finance,” said Gloin, “if yeh don’ think I’d put ‘em all t’ sleep.”

Dori and Binni exchanged glances.

“Court dancing or interior decorating?” Binni asked dryly.

Bofur said, “Combine ‘em. Ye’d have all them dancers flittin’ about the place like faeries, an’ when they was done, yer sittin’ room’d be up to its arse in chintz an’ lace.”

Dwalin snorted.

“In tha’ case, they ain’t dancin’ in me office.”

“The heart of the matter is,” said Thorin, “it’s something to work on over the winter. While we’re out and about, we could talk to the people, see if anyone has any suggestions.”

Dori turned Balin.

“Speaking of which, you don’t like ‘Balis’ for a damling?”

“Sounds too much li’e ‘ballast’, beloved.”

“True.”

“Doris?” Balin ventured.

“Sounds like someone who’s already two hundred years old.”

“Aye,” he agreed.

“Still trying to come up with names for the pebbles?” Bard asked.

“Yes,” said Dori with a sigh. “At this rate, we’re going to call them ‘Hey’ and ‘You’.”

“High an’ Low?” Bofur suggested.

“Here an’ There?” asked Jani. “That way, if ye have another, ye can call it ‘Neither’.”

“Frick and Frack,” Dis mused. “I wanted that for our pebbles, but Vili didn’t like the idea.”
"But whyever not?" Jani teased.
"He didn’t mind them for names as such, but what if we only had one? All Frick and no Frack?
Leaves you rather nowhere, doesn’t it."

Tauriel, sitting beside Kili, said, "You know, I think I would really like to teach sindarin. It’s not as though I wouldn’t have time for it. Legolas doesn’t need me much, now that he has his own attack dwarf."

"Am I your attack dwarf?" Kili asked.
"You’re my snuggle dwarf," she replied warmly. "At any rate, I’ll have to have something to take up my attention for the next six to eighteen months."

They all look at each other, confused.

Thorin asked, "What are you doing for the next six to eighteen m…"

Thorin and Dis roared in unison.

Dis lunged at Kili, seized him by the shoulders and shook him.

"What have you done?" Dis shouted.

"Made my wife pregnant?" Kili tried.

Dori cried out and Balin seized her.

"Beloved? Is it time? Are th’ badgers comin’?"

"No! That’s another cake I didn’t get to make!"

Tauriel ventured, "It won’t be due for quite some time, Lady Dori."

Everyone froze, and turned to her. She blushed prettily and it occurred to Ori that they had forgotten something, namely, Kili’s wife.

"Carrot, perhaps?" Tauriel suggested.

Bilbo bravely jumped in.

"Certainly, my dear. Dori and I can work on it together."

Abruptly, Dori beamed.

"That’s a wonderful suggestion!" she cried.

And all was well because Dori was happy again.

Dis dropped Kili into his chair and threw herself at Tauriel. Ori half expected Dis to find a way to shake her, too, but the princess embraced her tenderly and awkwardly, and wept.

"N-nathith! This is w-wonderful!"

"Thank you, amad. I was afraid you would be angry."

Dis pulled back and smiled through her tears.

"Don’t worry, I spent it all on my rotten, irresponsible son."

Kili cringed as Thorin approached.

"Sorry, Idad?"

"Stand up," ordered Thorin.

Kili stood, Thorin embraced him.

"Congratulations," said Thorin, "this is wonderful."

Kili nearly collapsed against Thorin.

"Thank you."

The Company took this as permission to congratulate the pair in-herd. Fili and Kili knocked heads hard enough that the crack echoed off the walls.

Ori mused, "A dwelf. A dwelf in Erebor."

A voice like doom from the bottom of a well asked, "Are you certain, Tauriel?"

All eyes turned to Thranduil, drumming his long fingers against the table.

"Oh, yes, king-father," said Tauriel.

"You glowed?"

"Briefly, but yes."

"And the… other things?"

"Yes, but don’t worry, I put out the fire immediately."

"Fire?" Thorin asked, visibly alarmed.

"It was confined to a very small area," said Tauriel. "I’m afraid I’m not as quick or controlled as Lady Galadriel. The covers did get a little singed.”
“Scared the shit out of me,” Kili confessed.

Tauriel winced.
“I will, of course, replace the bedding.”
Thorin didn’t look upset. He snorted and shook his head.
“I’m going to be an idadel. I think I can spot you some sheets. It can’t be any worse than the time Kili used his to try to make himself some new clothes.”
“They were comfy!” Kili protested.

Tilda turned to Thranduil.
“Are you excited? You’re going to be an grandadananananana. Or something.”
“Too many ‘na’s,’ ” said Bain.
Tilda frowned at Thranduil.
“Were they supposed to ask permission or something?”
Bard elbowed Thranduil.
“Well, were they, grandadanana?”
Thranduil rolled his eyes and sighed.
“You take all the fun out of it! I wanted to see if Kili would squirm a little more. Of course I’m excited!”

He swept up from his seat, startling just about everyone, snatched Tauriel up into his arms and whirled her around.
“King-father?” she giggled.
“Hush, child, I’m being royally ebullient.”

Sigrid ventured, “Da?”
Bard turned to her, white faced.
“I’m not pregnant,” she assured him.

Bard rubbed his face with his hand as Fili dissolved into laughter beside her.
“But I’d like to be,” said Sigrid, “so Fili and I would like to be married. Soon!”
“I’m not busy this afternoon,” said Thorin. “Are you busy this afternoon, Bard?”
“No!” Dori forbade. “Yule! You will be married at Yule. That will do very well. We can have everything ready by then.”

Fili looked at Sigrid.
“We’re getting married at Yule,” he said.
“It will do very well,” said Sigrid.
They turned to the Bearer, simpering and chorused, “Yes, Dori.”

“Why am I not pregnant?” Legolas asked Gimli.
“Because yer supposed t’ be knockin’ me up,” Gimli replied. “I though’ yeh were workin’ on tha’.”

“Ah, well, at least we have Romy.”
Kili turned to Ori.
“Hey, Ori-mate, aren’t you going to get pregnant, too?”
“I have a warg, three cats, a bat and a raven. I’m booked,” said Ori.

“More bacon?” Quartz asked.
Ori sighed and cut up the rest of the rasher on his plate for Quartz, who stared at it, then at him.
“What? It’s already got syrup on it,” Ori said.

“Not enough!” Quartz protested. “I’m a growing bird.”
“Oh! I beg your highness’ pardon!”
He grabbed up the syrup and poured it over the bacon pieces.
“Really,” Ori muttered. “Who needs to reproduce?”
Mistress Dazla bobbed in, raised her eyebrows at Dori, who giggled and nodded. Ori heard Mistress Dazla’s heels as she went through to the receiving room.
“And who else might we be expecting?” Thorin asked.
“Mornin’ lovey!” Margr’s voiced caroled from the front door.
“That answers that,” said Bilbo merrily.
“F*ck,” Dwalin commented.
“Badgers, our dearie!” Dori scolded.
“Don’t say ‘f*ck’ ’til yer o’ age.” Dwalin told the faunts.
“Huh?” Frodo looked up from his discussion with Sam.
“Exactly,” Dwalin said and drank back his tea.
“Frodo, we say ‘pardon’,” Bilbo sighed.
“Pardon, Idad Dwalin?”
“Guid lad.”
“Here we are!” Vi burst in and rushed to embrace Dori. “Ooo, look, our Mar! Plump as a puddin’, our Dori. I’m laying’ gold on ‘em bein’ girlies!”

The sisters were greeted, seated, and provided with breakfast.

Dori eyed Tauriel and Kili, who were once more hand in hand. Dori flicked her fingers in the sisters’ direction.

“Go on, take your medicine,” she teased.

“Wha’s up, me muffins?” Vi asked.

“We’re expecting a badger,” said Kili.

“What!” Margr leapt to her feet and poked Kili in the breastbone with a hard finger. “You wasn’t savin’ yersel’ for me? Th’ crust!”

Then she hugged them off their feet, with one arm each, and Vi had to have her turn, and to kiss each of their foreheads for luck.

“When d’ yeh pop, lovey?” Vi asked.

Tauriel looked like she was using all her military training not to laugh.

“I don’t know, Mistress Vi. Dwarrow take six months, elves take eighteen.”

Margr smacked Vi lightly on the shoulder.

“Eh, call it a twelve-month. Give us time t’ knit up a blankie r’ two.”

“What bring you ladies here today?” Thorin asked. “You have news I take it?”

“Oooo, our Thorin!” Margr cried. “Wha’ with all th’ preggers ladies about, we nearly forgot!

Didn’t we, Vi?”

“Aye, an’ we got such news, we-”

Roäc blew in the open patio doors.

“I’ve had it!” Roäc squalled as he landed on the table with more noise than usual for a bird that weighed five pounds, fifteen and three-fifths ounces and dropped a small envelope. Thorin broke up a few rashers of bacon on a saucer, and put them in front of his enraged raven.

There was another flutter of wings, much larger this time. Ori looked up and Red Queen landed on the patio and strutted in. She was greeted and a chair pulled up and a dish of bacon put in front of her. She took a mouthful then gazed at Roäc.

“Roäc, you look ruffled.”

Roäc glared.

“I just flew in from the Shire, of course I’m ruffled. Give a bird a chance to preen, why don’t you!”

“We meant,” Red Queen said in a quieter tone, “emotionally.”

Thranduil accidentally choked on his tea and Bard patted his back helpfully.

“Our Roäc was delivering’ a letter f’r us,” Vi explained.

“Ever so good of him,” Margr agreed and passed a saucer of toast generously slathered in jam and cut into small pieces to give the raven.

“Did you encounter rough weather?” Thorin asked. He stroked Roäc’s back as Bilbo put down another saucer for Roäc, this one with tea in it.

“It’s not the weather,” Roäc grumbled. “I like deliverin’ letters to old Pukeweek. She screams an’ dances about. It’s funny. I’m just sick of her chasing me off with that bloody broom.”

“Broom?” Dori asked.

“Ol’ bog gas keeps trying to swat me with it,” Roäc complained, washing down the last of the toast and jam with gulps of tea.

“That’s disgraceful!” Red Queen cried. “We will take the next letter!”

“What do you want?” Roäc asked suspiciously.

“Nothing. We’re just being neighborly. Besides, this Pukeweed creature intrigues us. We want to go and see her for ourselves.”

Roäc squawked out a laugh.

“I’m tempted to go along just to watch.”

“If you don’t mind, King Thorin?” Red Queen turned to him.

“Of course not,” said Thorin. “It’s very good of you to take the trouble.”

“Is that her reply?” Bilbo asked.

He nodded at the envelope, which lay untouched on the table.

Roäc made a disgusted noise and poked it with his beak. Bilbo took it up and looked at the sisters.

“May I?”

“Aye, sure, lovey,” said Vi. “We ain’t had a chance to get t’ them readin’ an’ writin’ classes in th’ Dale yet.”

Bilbo opened it and removed a letter written very blackly on pale yellow notepaper.

“Oh my dear ladies, you have screwed her to the wall most professionally. She’s sugar sweet but her tone is quite poisonous.”

The sisters cackled and knocked foreheads.

“My,” Bilbo went on, rereading the letter. “Remind me never to barter with you two. You’re taking her for about eighty-five percent of the profits. She writes that she wants to renegotiate before the end of next week or she won’t go with it. What will you do?”

“Nothin’,” Margr giggled. “We had a nice long chat with tha’ Master Dipfa. She’s ever such a smart lass. We’ll just le’ ol’ Pukeweeds stew. She’ll either give in or our Dipfa will organize a party for the next trade caravan out that way and she’ll sell to the Hobbits long distance. Tha’ll leave Pukeweeds out in th’ cold.”

“How very pragmatic of Master Dipfa,” Thorin commented and smiled into his tea around a sip.

“How will the hobbit dams know what Dipfa can do?” Ori asked.

“Ooo, our Ori,” Vi brayed. “That Dipfa’s ever so clever. She’s made up a whole magazine of color pic’res a’ all sorts a’ styles of stuff. She even named some a’th styles a’ dress after them wee lasses that wrote us firs’.” “Aye, an’ printed th’ lasses’ pi’tures. Calls ‘em concept drawin’s, an’ gave ‘em credit by name,” Margr added.

“An’ there’re all th’ colors an’ fabrics t’ choose fr’em,” Vi continued. “She’s callin’ it a fashion catalog!”

“Bu’ no’ t’ worry,” Margr broke in. “Ol’ Pukeweeds’ll give in. She’ll have nuthin’ to do but show th’ catalog off. If we find ou’ them lasses an’ all their friends ain’ seen it soon, we’ll send out a copy t’ em.”

Bilbo smirked.

“If you like, I’ll send one to my grandmother.”

Vi waved her napkin at him like a pennant.

“Oh, our Bilbo, we knew yer th’ righ’ one t’ talk t’. Yer that smart.”

“Excellent,” Dori approved. “Now that’s all straightened out. The wedding.”

Bilbo and Thorin looked at each other.

“Please, Dori,” said Bilbo. “How about we keep it simple?”

“Keep what simple?” Dis asked.

“Our wedding,” Thorin told her.

“No,” Dis and Dori chorused.

“Every ruler from Arda will be here,” Dori went on. “It will be wonderful.”

Bilbo’s teacup clattered to the saucer and Thorin groaned.

“Who invited….silly me.” Bilbo gulped and summoned a smile. “Will it be like your coronation all over again, my love?”

“Pretty much,” Thorin smiled. “Except Dain won’t pledge his loyalty and, with any luck, Pukeweed won’t show up. Dis, Dori?”

“No, they haven’t been invited,” Dis confirmed as she tucked into another buttered roll full of bacon.

“But you have all the Durin’s Day preparations to arrange,” Bilbo tried.

Dis snorted and Dori giggled.

“Bilbo, dear, as we told everyone, Dis and I have been planning this since you two met at the inn. After the coronation, we just had to keep everyone informed as to when the date would be. All you two need to do is decide on your wedding clothes and be there.”

“And do we have wedding clothes ready?” Thorin teased.

“You’re going to be dressed as you were for coronation,” Dis decreed. “The only difference is we think it would be a nice touch if you wore that butterfly cloak Thranduil made you. Bilbo needs to decide on what he and Frodo would like to wear.”

Bilbo smiled and his face softened.

“I’ll go through that old trunk of my parents’. My father’s wedding shirt and braces are there. I’m not sure his buckskin trousers are still good, but they are very nice.”

“I’ll call for Zindis,” said Thorin. “When you’ve found them, she can have look and give them any care needed.”

“Thank you,” Bilbo nodded. “And Frodo will need a white shirt, brown braces, and dark blue trousers. I’m sure Durin blue would be perfect.”

Thorin reached over and kissed his hand.

“What about Sam?” Frodo asked. “What will Sam and I do?”

“Sam will be dressed just like you. Each of you will be carrying a small box,” Dis told them.

“Dwarrow exchange rings at weddings. Dori shot Bofur and Nori a withering look.

“At least they do when the wedding is planned properly ahead of time,” she said.

“Frodo,” Dis continued, “you will carry Bilbo’s ring and Sam will carry Thorin’s. Would you both like that?”

“Yes!” The faunts cried and wiggled excitedly.

“The food is all taken care of,” Dori went on. “The royal guests will arrive the few days before the wedding and Durin’s Day.” Dori looked at Bilbo a little apologetically. “I hope you don’t mind, Bilbo, dear, but I took the liberty of writing to your grandparents. It’s too late in the year for them to come but they promised to visit you in the summer. They’re very interested in meeting your betrothed.”

“Perhaps that’s for best, Dori,” Bilbo chuckled “took weddings tend towards the rowdy and Brandybuck ones take forever.”

“What about Baggins’ ones?” Ori asked.

“Very proper and every step and word has been the same for generations.”

“I rely on you telling me what you would like included. I will see that it is done,” Thorin said with finality.

“Well, of course!” Dori put in. “The royal kitchens and Mistress Dazla are ready to make sure you and Frodo have your favorite dishes.”

Bilbo suddenly laughed.

“Pity Nori’s not here any more to make book.”

Ori looked about. Nori had indeed gone.

“Make book on what?”

Everyone looked up as Nori’s head appeared through the ceiling.

“How soon Dain will arrive, of course,” Bilbo teased.

Nori chuckled and disappeared.
Harvest, Hugs, and Harried Scribes.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The harvest is on and Ori is preoccupied! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement!
Same darrow time, same darrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Hamfast arrived just as the breakfast/council meeting finished and he announced that the main harvest was ready to begin in earnest. The ravens flew out as a flock and whirled everywhere in the mountain, summoning all darrow, who could to come. Thorin and the entire royal household rode out to Dale and the fields. Everyone dressed down for work.

In addition to the people of Dale and the darrow of Erebor, the fields were graced with the muscle of four kings, princes, princesses, lords and ladies, and a bunch of dwarven engineers, who studied the back-breaking labor involved and immediately began to design a machine that might, at very least, aid the process. Ursith strolled about occasionally picking up a potato or a carrot and loudly encouraging everyone else. He went so far as offering Dori a bouquet of carrots, still covered in dirt. Dori politely told him that since they were not his carrots, he couldn’t use them for proposing and they belonged in the wagon. Ursith bowed deeply and turned away. Balin accidentally smacked his ass with a shovel.

With the crops planted and Hamfast’s teachings and seeds and plants, the harvest yielded nearly three times the amount of produce Dale usually managed. The darrow, used to digging in rock rather than soil, were quickly instructed by the Gardeners, then threw themselves into the work with traditional vigor to the point that it turned into a competition as to who could fill the waiting wagons first. Hamfast had to race around telling the darrow not to dig too deep and not to damage any root vegetables.

High Priest Sven walked around all the fields, singing praises to Eru. Hamfast ordered grain stalks to be put out in the sun to dry.

Frodo and Sam, under Butter and Sugar’s watchful eyes, roamed through the surrounding trees, copses, and hedgerows, gathering mushrooms, nuts, and late berries with herds of children and badgers. Beryl and a small flock of ravens followed them to keep a lookout.

Hamson took a team of young lads down to the bee hives and, after soothing the queens and their armies, loaded the hives in the wagons and brought them home to shelter the winter in sheds of the Gardener’s, Aldernay’s and Hallow’s.

Halfred took another group out to pick up the fallen fruit which was taken to the Aldernay farm to be pressed into cider.

Fishermen went out with great nets and their haul was gutted, salted, and laid out in the autumn sun to dry.

Red Queen and some of her flock went out to the East with a group of hunters and culled deer, rabbits, and other game.

Dain’s improved plow was taken aside by Ulfr, Buer and Bujni, who quickly adapted it into a mower and it ticked at high speed across the meadows, eight razor-sharp blades slashing around wickedly, followed at a safe distance by farmers, who raked up the grasses, and put them up in huge hay stacks for the wagons to come and take them back to any who needed feed for their animals over the winter.

Snowdrop and a mob of Dale elders roamed the lands for the last of the simples and roots for
A great deal of the food was taken to the royal kitchen in Erebor and ‘put up’ under Bell Gardener’s direction, ready to be redistributed throughout Dale. Bard all but wept at the amount harvested.

Loli and Omi had an idea, which Ori heartily approved.

They gathered a small pack of apprentice scribes and they all went with their notebooks and sketchpads to the fields, to the barns, to the ovens and hobs of the kitchens, drawing everything and anything. They listened to and transcribed all the Gardeners said about growing and preserving food, asked questions, and were happily answered. Ori rather thought that the Gardeners were used to questions from their own faunts, and seemed to look upon the inquisitive scribes as more of the same.

In addition to what women and dwarrow knew about raising and preparing food, and along with sketches that Ori and others had made of the plowing, the planting, Hamfast tending the seedlings and irrigating the fields, they had a complete record of the local growing season.

“This is great!” Ori praised the blushing sisters.

Omi shrugged shyly and Loli said, “It’s not as glamorous as a quest, but it can’t hurt to have a sort of instruction book for this sort of thing, can it? I mean, we could keep adding to it as we learn more.”

“It may not be ‘glamorous’,” said Ori, “but it’s just as important. Well done!”

He wasn’t the only one who was pleased.

Brur, of all people, nodded with satisfaction.

“Yeh young scribes’ve th’ righ’ a’ it. There ought t’ be more t’ scrivenin’ than copyin’ ou’ some dead lord’s catalogue a’ his wargs’ tooth collection.”

“Does that actually exist?” Ori asked.

Arne looked up from his research and snickered.

“Yes! Unf-fortunately.”

“Firebeards,” said Brur with a snort.

With everyone there and working, within five days, the fields were bare, but for still growing winter cabbage, kale and huge pumpkins. Dori, dressed in bright orange, walked barefoot through all the fields, singing and blessing them.

Hamfast said the rest would hold until Last Harvest. Jim grinned evilly and said that there would be a festival to celebrate. Bell nodded and murmured something about pumpkin pie.

On the first rest day, Ori worked on his presentation until mid-morning then went to see if Thorin had come back from his meetings. He knocked on the office door which stood ajar and peeked in. Thorin looked up from his desk.

“Come in, Ori.”

Ori slipped in and closed the door and leaned against it.

“Thorin, I need a favor, but please don’t feel you have to oblige me.”

Thorin rose, came around the desk, and crossed to Ori. With a wicked smile, he took Ori in his arms and kissed him.

“Yes,” said Thorin.

Ori got his breath back and giggled.

“Thank you, but there’s another thing, too.”

Thorin laughed, nodded to a chair, and took the one next to it.

“What do you need?”

Ori clambered into the other chair.

“I’ve had an idea for Dori’s Yule present.”

A good ten minutes later, when Thorin had finished laughing helplessly, he agreed, and Ori bounced to his own office in triumph. He was back to his work, when he heard Quartz caw to him from the bedroom.

Ori hurried through, wondering at the raven’s call. He went in and looked at the stand which was Ori!
He turned to see Quartz perched on the sill, looking rather frosted.
“Quartz? Are you alright? Did you ice up?”
He went the window and Quartz hopped onto his arm.
“Not ice. Flour. Need a favor.”
“Of course.”
Quartz heaved a sigh.
“Need a bath.”
Ori carried him to the bathroom, placed a shallow pan on the floor of the shower, and filled it full with warm water.
“Door locked?” Quartz asked.
“Yes.”
“Good. Embarrassing.”
Quartz hopped into the pan and rolled around, splashing violently. He sprayed water everywhere.
“Back feathers?” he croaked. “Can’t reach ‘em all to preen.”
Ori carefully separated the feathers and gently poured water from a cup across Quartz’s skin. He painstakingly cleaned away the flour.
“Ahhh! Better!”
“You couldn’t find a puddle or something on your way back?”
“Songbirds do that. Stupid. Unguarded. Dangerous. I tried to avoid clouds, though. Flour plus water equals grounded bird.”
“So, what happened?”
“Hee hee hee. Dry me off. I’ll tell you.”
Ori wrapped Quartz on a nest of towels and smuggled him back to the bedroom, put the fire on, and sat on the rug with him. Ori took out his notebook. Quartz rolled around in the towels.
“Well? How did you end up covered in flour?”
“Oh, so worth it! That Lumpy Suck bile person—“
“Lumpy—? Oh! Lobelia Sackville Baggins.”
“Whatever.”
“Do you kiss your mother with that mouth?”
“How? No lips!”
“It was a rhetorical question. Please go on.”
“Sneaking around after Da and Red Queenie in that Sickville house. Pie sitting, cooling on the kitchen counter.”
“Which you just had to taste, right?”
“Apple! So, yes! Snackbutt chased them out. Then, right back to the kitchen!”
“So you tried to hide.”
“In the flour bucket! She put the lid on!”
“You were trapped in the flour bucket?” Ori cried as he wrote as fast as he could.
“Panicked! Bashed my beak on the sides! Squawked! Beat my wings! Coughed! Off goes the lid! Shot up, out - bang! Right into a wall!”
“Oh, Quartz!”
“Not hurt! Well, my pride. Then, worse - bang! Right into Glumpy! Flew around the house half-blind, flour everywhere. Bumpy screamed about her new carpet - wish I’d pooped on it. Half-wit son came home. Pecked him on the head. Can she bleat!”
“But, you got away!”
“Heh! Half-wit son left the door open. You alright?”
Ori nodded, shaking with laughter as he patted Quartz’s back dry with the towel.
“My hero!” Ori cried and gathered Quartz up in a hug.
“Eh, you, too. Watch the feathers.”
Ori cradled Quartz on his back as Quartz preened his belly feathers. There was a knock at the “Come in,” Ori called, thinking it was probably Dori.
“What’s happened?” Thorin asked.

Ori looked up as he turned Quartz over and put him down to dry his back feathers. Ori held the wings up as he knew the raven was tired. He grinned at Thorin and gestured with his chin to his notebook.

“Quartz had an adventure.”
Thorin came and sat down beside them, picked up the notebook, and read through. He started to snicker, then choked on laughter.

“Quartz, you’re terrible.”
Quartz just cackled.

“Roäc and Red Queen have informed me,” Thorin said, “Lob…Pukeweed is capitulating to Vi and Margr’s terms. Red Queen also brought me a lovely map of the Shire. She said Lobelia wished me to have it for Bilbo. Bilbo recognized it right away as something she had pinched shortly after his parents died. Somehow neither of us think Lobelia ‘gave’ it at all.”
Quartz cackled again.

“Heard Queenie tear it off the wall. Heard Da knocking stuff around.”

“How much of the pie did you eat?” Thorin asked, so gravely Ori giggled.

“Not much. Just the middle. Best bit.”
Thorin sighed and lay back on the rug.

“Bilbo is still laughing about the map.”

“Good,” Ori approved. “Old Pukeweed is a nasty hobbit. Why, she gives hobbits a bad name.”
Thorin chuckled. Ori let go of Quartz’s wings as the raven hopped backwards then bent forward and splayed out his tail feathers to dry his butt. Ori turned to look at Thorin. Thorin winked at him.

“What have you been doing?” Ori asked.

“Reading over a proposal from the pleasure guild to re-open the guild of court dancers. Udad’s father shut it down in keeping with Nali’s reforms. The pleasure guild wants it back and Binni wants to teach.”

“Are bearers usually involved with it?” Ori asked.

“They invented the dances, so yes.”

“Dori’s backing Binni?”

“Naturally.”

“Nugget from the Night Market will be excited.”
Thorin looked to be thinking.

“She was that dam you spoke to when we were there, yes?”
Ori nodded then, “Nugget is just her Night Market name. I don’t know her family name.”

“If she’s who I think she is, her amad is the grand master of the pleasure guild.”

“That’s even better,” Ori enthused. “Nugget invented the Roscabal hop.”
Thorin chuckled and held out his hand to Ori. Ori glanced back and saw that Quartz was now sound asleep on the rug.

Ori grinned, curled around, and leaned on Thorin’s chest.

“What can I do for you, my king?”
Thorin eyed him.

“Why are you addressing me like that in this situation?”
Ori looked teasingly at Thorin.

“I think it’s funny.”

“Do you?”

“Yes.”

“Your king would like a kiss.”

“I can do that.”

A moment later the door opened and Dwalin came in.

“Now tha’s a temptin’ sigh’.”
Ori and Thorin sat up, amused. Dwalin offered them each a hand and pulled them to their feet.

Dwalin kissed Ori then swiftly bit at Thorin’s neck, making Thorin laugh.

Ori giggled at this. Dwalin and Thorin looked at him, then at each other and drew together, trapping Ori between them, two tall and handsome monoliths looming over him. Ori squeaked as Thorin chuckled and Dwalin growled in Ori’s ear.

“Looks like yer in some trouble, me wee scribe.”

Ori squeaked again despite himself. Thorin pulled Dwalin closer.

“Indeed, Master Scribe, you appear to be in peril.”

Ori felt himself heat up between the bodies of his king and his husband as they pressed in on him from either side. Dwalin’s hands slid around Ori’s front to cup Ori’s balls through his breeches as Thorin kissed him. Ori moaned into Thorin’s mouth.

“Dwalin,” Thorin purred, “he sounds needy.”

“Aye,” Dwalin growled, “lemme get these britches open.”

Dwalin’s hand quickly loosened Ori’s belt and Thorin dropped to his knees and drew out Ori’s prick.

“This is very nice, Ori,” Thorin murmured in his deep velvet voice.

“Tasty, too,” Dwalin told him, as he held Ori against his chest. Ori was grateful because he doubted he could stand on his own.

“Really?” Thorin asked of Ori, who was panting. “Shall I?”

“Meep,” Ori managed.

“Looks li’ we go’ ourselves a wee scribe san’wich,” Dwalin said as he nuzzled around Ori’s neck.

“Yes, I’m having the sausage,” Thorin replied and Ori gulped as he felt his cock in Thorin’s mouth. Ori thought he was going to pass out when he was slammed into reality by the sound of Dori’s voice caroling through the door, calling them to lunch.

Ori gasped and choked out, “We’ll be there in a few minutes, Dori-Eeeee!”

His face burned as Dori huffed loudly on the other side of the door. Dwalin snickered and Thorin looked up and winked at Ori.

“Fine!” Dori shouted and stomped off. “You had better wash your hands before you come to my table.”

“Ain’t using ‘em” Dwalin shouted back.

Ori had a tenth of a second to worry about the trouble this would cause, before Thorin swirled his tongue around the head of Ori’s cock. Ori groaned, torn between closing his eyes in pleasure and keeping them open to watch. He tilted his head to the side while Dwalin licked and nipped him from ear to collarbone.

“Yeh li’e tha’, love?” Dwalin purred. “Yeh li’e Thorin’s mouth around yer cock?”

“Oh, yes,” Ori moaned.

“He’s talented, is our Thorin,” Dwalin whispered. “He only ever had t’ beg a moment f’r me t’ allow him t’ suck mine.”

One of Thorin’s hands shot up in a rude gesture.

Ori giggled.

“I w-want to watch that,” he admitted. “But, not right now.”

“Righ’ now,” said Dwalin, “it’s all abou’ yeh.”

Dwalin’s fingers had inched back toward Ori’s arse, but stopped just short. He drew his finger in circles under Ori’s balls and Ori gasped and writhed so that Thorin had to hold him still.

“Found it,” Dwalin growled in Ori’s ear.

“Found what?”

“Sweet spot.”

Ori had only a vague idea of what Dwalin meant. Between the wet, tight heat of Thorin’s relentless mouth, and Dwalin’s busy fingers, Ori didn’t have a vague idea about anything beyond his own pleasure.

He was amazed to find his hands tangled in Thorin’s hair, to realize they must have been there this whole time. Ori massaged Thorin’s scalp. An appreciative sound rose through Thorin’s chest, and out of his mouth, and surrounded Ori’s cock in echoing vibrations.

“Mahal,” Ori murmured, “that’s so good.”

“You want more?” Dwalin asked.

“Yessss - Oh!”

Dwalin’s touch firmed up and the pressure shot through the ‘sweet spot’, and right up Ori’s spine. He swore he grew three inches taller, and his cock at least that much longer. Thorin’s grip held him immobile and prevented Ori from ramming down his throat.

The cries started small, barely a whimper, but soon Ori couldn’t control them and he would be shouting loud enough to give the entire lunch table an earful. He turned his head and bit on the sleeve of Dwalin’s tunic. Thorin’s tongue lapped relentlessly and Ori was this far from begging Dwalin to take him right there, when his muscles locked and he came and came.

The intensity forced a scream through the material of Dwalin’s sleeve and then total euphoria flashed through him.

When his brain regained its proper weight, Ori lay sprawled on the rug in Dwalin’s arms and Thorin knelt between his legs, smiling.

“Oh,” said Ori. “I’m sorry about your beard.”

Thorin fell over onto his back and laughed.

“Ori, you sweet talker!”

“Tha’s me love, a master with words.”

Ori looked up at Dwalin, upside down, and said, “I’m an idiot.”

“Yer adorable.”

Dwalin pulled Ori up to sit on his knees and kissed him.

“Love yeh, azyung.”

“Love you, too, my buffalo. Thank you, Thorin…. You’re wonderful.”

Thorin rose and bowed to them. Dwalin released Ori and lifted them both to their feet. Ori sighed. He was still shaking and had to lean against Dwalin as his husband closed and belted his breeches for him. Ori wondered if his cock would ever recover. He had now stopped shaking, but there was still a tingle that ran through his body. He looked up and there was Thorin, who offered him a glass of water. Ori stared at it.

“I’ll have to undo my belt again, but I really don’t think sticking my cock in glass of water will help much.”

He looked up. Thorin regarded him with a raised eyebrows and Dwalin shook with laughter.

“What?” Ori asked, confused.

Thorin smiled.

“I thought we’d each like a drink, but if you want to stick your cock in it, that’s your business.”

“Oh!” cried Ori then blushed. “Sorry! I was… never mind!” He snatched the glass from Thorin and drank hastily, choked, and shoved the glass at Dwalin. Dwalin took it and kissed Ori firmly.

“Yer brilliant, love.”

Ori turned and buried his face in Dwalin’s tunic.

“I’m confused.”

“You are lovely, Ori,” said Thorin. Ori looked up. Thorin was at the wash basin. His beard was still damp as Thorin rubbed it with a towel. He turned and leaned against the dresser as he combed out his beard.

“Are we ready for lunch?” the king asked with a merry look at his captain and scribe. Dwalin went and put the glass on the dresser and kissed Thorin, who patted Dwalin’s butt. Ori walked slowly towards the dresser and looked at himself in the mirror. He was relieved to see he only looked a little flushed.

“I can walk and I’m not too… er… debauched looking.” Ori grinned at Thorin, then turned and saw Quartz now flat on the rug but tail still aimed at the fireplace.

“Quartz?” Ori said gently.

“I was asleep,” Quartz stated, rising and shaking himself out. “Ori, is there anything to eat?”
“C’mon,” Dwalin said and scooped up Quartz. “Th’ raven’s peckish an’ we all know what they’re like when they ge’ tha’ way.”

They went through to the breakfast parlor. Dori looked daggers at them.

“Sorry, we’re la’e,” Dwalin said cheerily, “jus’ had t’ finish a chat.”

“Oh?” Bilbo asked. “Should I have joined you? I’m afraid when there’s food involved, hobbits prioritize food.”

“Of course, my love,” Thorin said and sat next to Bilbo and kissed his cheek. “I shall fill you in after lunch.”

Dori’s frown turned to puzzlement, and then Dori dished out potato and leek soup for the late-comers.

After lunch, Dori and Binni went off to a meeting and Thorin took Frodo down to the Durins’ forge. Ori returned to his work. Some time later he tidied his papers and went through them slowly. He sighed and sat back. His first draft was finished. He didn’t think he could edit it any more without the critical eye of another. He decided it was time to ask Brur to read it. He scratched a note to the Head Librarian and got up. He went back to the bedroom. Quartz was sprawled on Ori’s pillow on the bed. Kihshassa opened her eyes from where she clung upside down on the stand and dropped down. Ori went to her and she climbed into his arms. He gave her the note and carried her to the front door and tossed her up. She swooped off down the passage.

He went through to Thorin’s office where Bilbo sat writing at his desk.

“Bilbo?”
The hobbit looked up at him with a smile, which faded into concern.

“Ori? Are you alright?”

“I just finished my first draft and sent a note off to Brur.”

“Ah.”

Bilbo set down his quill and capped his ink bottle.

“And now you’re about to hyperventilate?”

“Something like that.”

“Would a cuddle stave that off, do you think?”

“I don’t think it would hurt,” said Ori.

“How about a nice cuddle, and then we’ll go through and make some tea, and we can talk about it in the sitting room?”

Ori sighed in relief.

“Yes, please.”

Bilbo cuddled expertly. Ori clung to him and thought that this must be some innate hobbit thing. They looked cuddly, therefore they were cuddly. Except for Lumpy Sackbutt.

He giggled to himself.

He had a journal entry Bilbo needed to read. Bilbo headed to the kitchen while Ori excused himself to grab his notebook.

He arrived in the sitting room to find Bilbo coming from the kitchen.

“Kettle’s on. Here’s everything else.”

Bilbo set the tray down on the granite table and bustled back to the kitchen. He returned shortly with the teapot.

“That was quick,” Ori said, as he made a space for the teapot and shrouded it in a cozy. They sat down on the couch and Ori passed the notebook to Bilbo. Bilbo read through and they giggled over it.

“Poor Quartz,” Bilbo said when he could speak. “Lumpy Snackbutt! I’m torn in two trying to decide whether I want to call her that or Pukeweed!”

“Why can’t they be interchangeable?” Ori offered.

“Why not, indeed,” Bilbo snickered, “how clever you are, Ori. I’m so pleased with how the Bilbags line is going. Lobelia is no match for Margr and Vi. It’s quite delightful to see them cut her down like a scythe.”
“Is the map Red Queen got you still intact?”
“Very much so.” Bilbo leaned forward and poured out tea for them both. “Thorin said he would measure it and send a note to Bifur to have a new frame made. As much as I love my parents, the original frame was quite hideous.”

Bilbo passed the cup to Ori.
“Thanks,” Ori grinned. “A little too first age for you?”
“Naughty,” Bilbo laughed and settled back.

Mistress Dazla’s bird whisked through and disappeared into the kitchen. Mistress Dazla hurried out and went through to the receiving room. She returned with young Miss Konul.

“Lord Ori,” said Mistress Dazla. Ori got to his feet.
“Thank you, Mistress Dazla. Hello, Miss Konul. What may I do for you?”

Miss Konul stared around the room, open-mouthed, but she recalled herself and curtseyed.

“Master Brur sent me here to pick up a package of papers. He said you had something for him to read?”

Ori looked at Bilbo, who nodded encouragingly.
“Yes, I do,” Ori said and willed himself calm. “Please come with me.”

He led the way back to his office and went in, Miss Konul trotting after him. He gathered up the draft and forced his hands not to shake. It was just a first draft. It was supposed to come back to him covered in notes, passages crossed out and whole sections removed. Master Bur was going to help him make this presentable. He wrapped the papers firmly in a leather bag and handed to Miss Konul.

“Here it is,” he said with a cheery smile. “Thank you for coming for it.”
“Certainly, Lord Ori. It’s so exciting to see you again.”

“Here it is,” he said with a cheery smile. “Thank you for coming for it.”
“A little too first age for you?”

He flopped down next to Bilbo and put his head on Bilbo’s shoulder.

“It’s done. I just have to wait until Master Brur to tear it all apart and tell me to start over.”

Bilbo patted his hair.

“Don’t be silly. I’ve read it, remember? I thought it was rather good, your spelling and grammar are immaculate.”

Ori snickered and Kihshassa climbed into his lap.

They were squeezing the pot for last cups, when there was the sound of the front door, then Frodo talking excitedly and Thorin’s voice. The pair came into the sitting room.

“Uncle Bilbo! Idad Ori! Look!”

Frodo ran in holding up something flat and shiny, not much bigger than his own small hand.

“Let’s see, my boy,” said Bilbo.

He happily took the proffered object.

It was a battleboar of tin.

“That’s lovely, Frodo,” Ori encouraged.

“That’s lovely, Frodo,” Ori encouraged.

“Very nice,” Bilbo praised. He glanced up at Thorin, who stood behind Frodo with a slightly calmer demeanor. “Everything went well, I see. Frodo, you did exactly what Idad Thorin told you?”

The question was not actually directed at his nephew.

“I had to,” said Frodo. “I couldn’t hold up the tin shears by myself.”

Thorin leaned in to kiss Bilbo.

“The gloves are a little large for him,” said the king.
“I could have used one in a sack race,” said Frodo, nodding.
“I did the edge grinding myself,” Thorin promised.
“I could put my whole foot in idad’s glove!”
“And what will you do with this?” Bilbo asked.
“I have to leave it as a votive offering, so now I have to find a place to votive.”
“I think you mean you have to find a place to leave the votive offering.”
“Yes. That. Idad Thorin, do you think Lord Mahal will like it?”
“I’m sure He’ll be very happy to receive such a fine gift,” said Thorin. “Unlike my first offering, He’ll be able to tell what animal this is.”
“I could tell wha’ it was,” said Mahal to Ori. “I remember every single one. Th’ wife had t’ help me figure ou’ Dain’s though. I’m assumin’ it was a boar. Might’ve been a chicken.”
“We made something for Sam, too,” said Frodo. “He was really sad he couldn’t come down to the workshop with us ‘cause he’s still too little.”
“We made him a pony,” said Thorin. “Hopefully, it will make him feel better. By next year he’ll probably be old enough the come with us.”
Thorin, Bilbo and Frodo went back to Bag End East for some family time.
Ori carried the tea thing through to the kitchen to wash up but Mistress Dazla took them and shooed him out. He decided he needed to work on Sigrid’s portrait. He couldn’t put that off forever, and it was time he dwarfed-up and tackled it.
He reread Nodun’s letter, with all her advice. He felt equally assured and intimidated.
He double-checked all his materials and plunged in.
Happily, it only went wrong about eight hundred times and when he finally decided he had enough for that day, it didn’t look half bad. Another six months or so and it would be perfect.

Ori emerged from his office to find Binni, Dori and Nugget sitting at the dining room table, talking about court dancing.
“Well, I’m off,” said Nugget. She rose and turned to him. “Walk me out, Lord Ori?”
“Of course,” he said.
As they stepped out the front door, just to be polite, Ori asked, “Are you going to the night market?”
“No, just home. You want to come with me?”
“That’s kind of you, Nugget,” said Ori, “but I believe Dori’s already planning on me being home for dinner.”
“I could have you for dinner,” she said with a smile. “Or maybe, just for dessert?”
Ori thought.
“I might be able to cut out early. That would be lovely. What will we be having?”
She giggled.
“Each other.”
“Pardon? Oh. Ohhhhh!” said Ori, feeling like a complete idiot. “I’m sorry, I misunderstood.”
“You’re adorable,” said Nugget. “The offer still stands. Unless you don’t fancy dams at all?”
Ori wasn’t really in the way to know if he did or not. He didn’t think so, but it was very hard to focus on that just then.
“I’ll have to pass for now, but thank you,” he said. “It’s very flattering.”
“All right,” she said good-naturedly, “but if you change your mind, my flat’s at the old Vors place. Third floor, east corner. Send me a bat.”
She kissed his cheek and sauntered off.
For the life of him, Ori had no idea what just happened.
When he returned, Binni smiled, gathering the tea things.
“You’re not going along with Miss Nugget?”
“What? How did you know about that?” Ori asked.
Dori laughed and held out her open palm to Binni.
“Ahem.”
“Oh, all right,” giggled Binni, placing a coin in it.
“Dori!” Ori cried. “Were you making book that I was going to… go home with Nugget?”
She patted his cheek.
“I knew you wouldn’t, pet. Sit down and let me get you some sherry. If you turn any redder, your nose will bleed.”
Ori sighed. Was it worse that he hadn’t known what Nugget was about, or that Dori and Binni did?
Dwalin came in.
“There you are, dearie,” cooed Dori. “It’s good you’re home, I think your husband needs a lap and some cuddle time.”
As Dwalin reached for Ori, they heard a rumbling behind the wall.
“Halt, Chopper!” Dain brayed. “I’ve go’ t’ open th’ bloody door!”

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And thus spake Zar…. No not really, but the guest for the wedding are starting to arrive. Just when you thought things were going to settle down again! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“Siblin’s!” Dain hollered as Chopper tromped up the hallway of Bag-End East.
“They’re heee-re,” Kili sing-songed as he came through into the sitting room. Ori grabbed Dwalin anyway.
“Wha’s happened, love?” Dwalin asked low.
“I got propositioned by Nugget and I didn’t realize it until she started plain speaking. I came back and Dori and Binni were making book on whether or not I’d go with her.”
“Yeh tell ‘em yer too busy wi’ yer husband, king, and consort?”
“Shhh!” Ori gasped. “I’m not ready to dig that vein yet!”
“Aye, me neither,” Dwalin muttered.
Dain exploded into the sitting room and snatched up Dori. Stonehelm and Sculdis burst in after him, Sculdís shouted greetings. Stonehelm grinned and looked around for his co-conspirators. Thorin opened the ogee arch and Frodo and Sam rushed out, shrieking for Dain. Bilbo followed with Thorin, hand-in-hand. Chopper oinked at the wargs, who padded through to sniff their old friend and lick his nose. Baluchistan swooped unsteadily in.
“Hic. I’m here, me lads and lassies! Th’ par’y kin star’! Roäc! Brother! Me ol’ fruit an’ nut! How yeh keepin’?”
“You started partying before you got here! As usual!” Roäc squawked.
“Where’s me ligh’ o’ love?” Baluchistan demanded.
“Idad Stan!” Quartz shouted.
“Eh? Oi, yeh ain’t her!” Quartz turned to Ori.
“Why am I not a girl?”
“Because you’re a boy?” Ori tried, not prepared for this discussion.
Gimli and Legolas bounced through from the door to their home, Romy on their heels. Family members arrived from all directions as it was close to suppertime. The Iron Hills royals were greeted and welcomed. All too soon Dori hustled Dain and family up to ‘their’ rooms and came scuttling back down to see what Mistress Dazla had put on for dinner.
Ori and Dwalin went through to their bedroom. Ori turned and hugged his husband tight.
“How was your day, my buffalo?”
“Well an’ guid, me love. Ivo’s training’ wi’ our Glorfy now an’ gettin’ be’er. Yeh work on yer presentation?”
“Yes, I finished the first draft and Miss Konul came and took it to Master Brur to read.”
“Tha’s wonderful, love.”
“I know, but I’m nervous about what he’ll think.”
“He’ll think i’s brilliant’,” Dwalin told him firmly.
They stood together for a moment then Quartz zoomed in from the window.
“Stop making kissy faces. Someone’s approaching from the North Road.”
“Aye, we’re comin’.”
Dwalin and Ori looked at each other then chuckled.
“Back t’ th’ chaos f’r us, love.”
“True,” Ori reflected. “But most of the time it’s fun.”

Then they arrived in the sitting room, Roäc and Red Queen whisked through from the breakfast parlor.
“Royal parade’s starting!” Roäc said.
“There’s a carriage!” Red Queen cried. “The very strangest carriage! Come, there’s such a sight to be seen!”
Ori, Bilbo, Dwalin, and Thorin made their way down the passage to the balcony over the front gate.

A curiously cobbled together carriage approached Erebor on the main road, pulled by two stout and shaggy ponies. Its odd appearance was only rendered odder by the curiously liveried outriders.
“Ah, Chat’s here,” said Thorin, spyglass raised to his eye.
“How can you tell?” Ori asked,
“The soldiers are wearing his house device.”

He handed Ori the glass. Ori peered through, wondering. Chat’s flag at the coronation had been one of his under tunics, which was unbleached linen with tiny crossed pickaxes. He’d forgotten to bring along anything more official.

Now Ori saw the pickaxes again, across the soldiers’ chests, this time much larger and, since they hadn’t been laundered hundreds of times, much brighter. The silver and brown pickaxes sat on a sea-blue field. A gold circlet rested around the head of one of the axes, as if someone had casually tossed it there. A single star topped all of it.

“Oh,” said Ori. “Are those curtains in the carriage windows?”
“He likes plaid,” said Thorin.
“Quite a lot of it,” said Ori.

“He’ll be at our front door in a few,” Dwalin commented. “Be’er go back up an’ see wha’s t’ do.”

Bilbo joined them at the front steps, Frodo and Samwise each clinging to a hand, as they watched the carriage enter the cavern.

Chat, up on the driver’s box, pulled back on the reins.
“Whoa, Winni! Whoa, Baygo!” Chat called.
The ponies shambled a few more paces, then stopped.
Two little heads popped through the curtains of the carriage.
“Idad Thorin! We’re here!”
Thorin waved.
“I see you!”

“Have you met them before?” Ori asked.
Thorin chuckled.
“No, but I’m pretty sure the crown gives me away.”

A raspy voice from within the carriage admonished them to mind out and the little heads popped back inside.

“Mornin’, Thorin! Mornin’, perfesser!” Chat called, climbing down from the box as Gib took charge of the ponies and the outriders dismounted.
They were all Blacklocks, by the looks of them.
“Good morning, Chat,” Thorin replied.
“Happy Durin’s Day,” Bilbo added.
Chat clasped wrists with all of them, but they also hugged. Chat lifted Frodo right off his feet.
“Happy Durin’s Day, Idad Chat!” cried Frodo around a mouthful of beard.

“Hullo, me wee scamp!”
When Chat put him down, Frodo drew Samwise forward.
“This is Samwise Gardener. Sam, this is King Snur of the Broadbeams. We call him Idad Chat.”
Sam beamed and bowed as he’d been taught.
“Happy Durin’s Day, yer majesty.”
“Happy Durin’s Day, laddie!” He threw Bilbo a quizzical look as he patted Sam’s head.
“Another nephew?”
“The son of my friends who are living in Dale now,” said Bilbo.
“Reg’lar hobbit invasion,” said Chat, chuckling. “Does Ulfr know about this?”
“Yes,” said Bilbo, “but we keep the carrot cake coming, so he doesn’t have time to think on it.”
“That’d have me own attention, right enough. Ready t’ meet me family?”
“As ready as we’ll ever be,” said Thorin, “but, Chat, what exactly is this thing you’re driving?”
“Camp on wheels,” said Chat proudly. “Built it meself, sleeps four, five if ya squash up.”
He went to the door, opened it, and flipped down a step. He handed down a wicked looking dam, whose flame red hair stood straight out from her head, and her beard was plaited into hundreds of tiny braids, gathered together at her chin in an iron band. Her mustache curled up and around at the ends, over and over, nearly reaching the height of her black eyes. This was Givris, the former bandit queen, also known as Elrond’s nemesis. She grinned when she saw them, and Ori felt his innards retreating toward his spine.
“Here we are, me mizimel,” said Chat. Then he turned and lifted down a pair of giggling miniatures of himself. “And here’s the cargo. Let’s go an’ say howdy t’ yer idads an’ yer cousins.”
Givris put her hand on Chat’s arm and he drew her forward, looking proud enough to combust. The badgers clung to her tunic, eyes huge. They were actually even younger than Ori had expected.
“Thorin, Bilbo, an’ company, this here’s Givris, Queen o’ the Broadbeams. Givi, m’love, this is King Thorin, an’ his soon to be husband Perfesser Baggins, an’ young Frodo, that everyone thinks is their love child.”
She stopped in mid-bow to look at him and shake her head.
Chat continued blithely, “An’ this here’s wee Samwise Gardener.”
“Yer majesty,” she rasped, “perfesser, lads an’ lassies, I’m pleased t’ meetcher.”
“An’ this here’s me damlin’ Snis an’ me dwarflin’ Sni.” Chat looked as proud as a dwarf adad could be. “Say howdy, yeh lot.”
They bowed.
“At yer service,” they said, more or less in unison.
Thorin and company also bowed.
“At yours and your family’s,” said Thorin.
While introductions were made, the soldiers had formed up behind, each in control of a pony.
“You got some soldiers, I see,” said Thorin.
“Aye, borrowed ’em from Arivett fer the trip. Impressive, ain’t they? Now what do I do with ’em?”
“The stable crew will take care of their horses. Mistress Dazla will show them where to billet.”
“Oh, right.”
He looked like he was about to go into the house, leaving the soldiers staring straight ahead, being the well-trained, disciplined troops they so obviously were.
“Chat, dear?” Givris patted his arm.
“Aye, m’love?”
“Ya should give ’em orders an’ dismiss ’em.”
“Oh, right, otherwise, they’ll still be standin’ here at midnight.” He turned to the soldiers. “Yer dismissed ’til I call for ya. Go have fun. Don’t get into no trouble or me wife’ll have yer hides.”
One soldier stepped forward, and shouted orders to the rest. They bowed to the kings and nobles, and followed Gib over to the stable of the Oakenshield Inn, presumably to take care of their ponies.
“They’re oblin’ enough,” said Chat, “but a frownier-faced bunch I never seen.”
“They work f’r Arivett, dear,” said Givris. “Smilin’s a no-no.”
“Where is Arivett?” Thorin asked. “Weren’t you traveling together?”
“We were,” said Givris, “but she was a little what-cher call indisposed this mornin’, so she sent us ahead. We the first t’ arrive?”

“Dain arrived a couple of hours ago,” Bilbo smiled.

“Yes,” Thorin gave Chat a look. “Ulfr’s here been here for a few weeks.”

“I’m perishin’ from excitement. Fleecin’ his dead relatives bein’ elves now?”

“Exactly. Don’t tease, he’s almost enjoying himself. Speaking of which,” said Thorin, “where is Frerin right now?”

“He begged off. Said somethin’ about havin’ to cut his toenails.”

“You left him alone with your kingdom?”

“Locked ‘im in his chambers. What? I’m lazy, not stupid. Best to put him somewheres with food an’ such, an’ his wife and impending pebble. Actually, that seems to be enough to keep him happy-ish.”

They reached the sitting room where Ulfr and Yizaris took tea with the Imladris elves under Dori’s supervision.

“Rhonda! Linda!” Chat cried. “Now ain’t this a nice surprise.”

It was for Lindir, anyway, Ori reflected. Lindir instantly knelt to hug him. Meanwhile, Lord Elrond took meeting with Givris again with grave restraint.

“You look quite well, Givris,” he said noncommittally.

“Ah, now don’t be standoffish, our Rhonda,” Chat coaxed. “How could Givris resist yer charms? Yer the prettiest dam who ain’t a dam who’s an elf I ever saw.”

He smacked Elrond across the arse lightly and went to greet the Ironfists.

“Oi, our Ulfr! Ya ain’t blowed up yet!” Chat cried.

“I’ll blow yeh up, yeh knot head,” Ulfr threatened, smiling. When he turned to Chat’s wife, his smile narrowed. “Ah, Givris. There yeh are again.”

“Ulfr,” they exchanged bows.

Ulfr turned to his own wife.

“Yizzie, yeh remember Queen Givris.”

Unlike Ulfr, Yizaris was more than happy to see her.

“Ah, Givi! It’s been an age,” said Yizaris, rising to greet her. They embraced a little more warmly than was comfortable, at least for Ulfr. Chat knocked heads with Yizaris.

“An’ here’s me little sprogs,” said Chat, drawing them forward. “This here’s yer Imad Yizaris. Say ‘how’d’ya do.”

They giggled, but did as they were told.

“I’d put ‘em down fer naps, but they’d just bounce back up again,” said Givris.

“Not sleepy, mam,” said Snis.

“No kiddin’?”

“Perhaps,” Bilbo said, “they’d like to go and play in the meadow while Miss Oqizla shows you your rooms and you settle in? They can have their tea when they’ve burned off some energy and might sit still for three minutes together.”

“Bless ya, perfesser, I think that’s a world-class idea,” Givris said.

“Frodo, Sam,” Bilbo turned to the faunts. “Why don’t you take your cousins out to the meadow to play.”

“Yes!” Frodo cried and grabbed Snis’ hand “Come on! We’ve got wargs!”

“Oooo!” Snis squealed and the faunts and dwarflings scampered out into the meadow.

“There goes a dangerous alliance,” said Kili. “Do you suppose Erebor will survive the visit?”

Thorin swung around and looked at him askance.

“It survived you and your brother, though just barely. I’d say we’re good for the next age at least.”

Yizaris rose and took Givris’ arm.

“I’ll help you unpack, dear,” she said.

“Obliged as always, our Yizzie,” said Givris.

They paused at the door to the receiving room, where Miss Oqizla stood waiting.

“Chat, me love,” said Givris, with a wicked smile. “Aren’t ya goin’ t’come unpack, too?”
“Beg pardon, all,” said Chat, and he scurried to follow them. Within seconds of their leaving the sitting room, there was bellowing from the receiving room. Obviously Dain and his family had met Chat’s. The shouting died down and Dain crashed into the sitting room.

“Oi Ulf! When yeh git here?” Dain demanded.

“Long a’for yeh, yeh great lump,” Ulfr greeted him as they knocked heads.

“Whossis?” Dain asked. He chucked his chin at Buer.

Ulfr was more than happy to introduce the young dwarf and in moments, they were perched in a corner discussing mechanical things. Ori hoped they would only blow things up outside of Fundin House. Dori popped back into the kitchen.

Elrond came to his side

“Ori, how is your work coming along?”

“Well, thank you,” Ori sighed. “I’ve sent it to Master Brur to tear apart.”

Elrond chuckled. “I’m sure he won’t destroy it over much. I saw some of your presentation and it read perfectly.”

“I hope so, I only see mistakes.”

“Come, my young friend, you are too hard on yourself.”

Ori shrugged then, “Have you heard anything from your scribes back in Rivendell?”

“The weavers’ guild minutes have rendered some excellent ancient insults, my favorite being ‘just because you wear the boots, doesn’t mean the cock matches the feet’.”

Ori choked.

“Yes,” Elrond smiled, “although I’m somewhat mystified on the reference.”

“Oh,” Ori said. “It used to be said you could judge the size of a male dwarf’s cock by the size of the feet. Big boots, big cock. Men sometimes use it to mean the same, although I have heard the men’s ears are sometimes used in place of feet.”

Elrond snickered and winced at the same time.

“As a healer, you have no idea how odd that sounds.”

“ Anything else?” Ori asked and gestured to the sofa, they sat and Ori scooted around to face the elf.

“Yes, an extremely strange little volume written by a dwarf healer named Baraselzus. He lived during early second age.”

Ori frowned. “I’ve come across a few medical texts that mention him. He styled himself as a healer. He was a bit crazy. He was not in any medical guild. It was said his mastery was in hat making.”

“I’m not surprised he was crazy,” Elrond sighed. “He seemed to think the best topical ointment was a cream made of tallow, pipeweed ash, oil from the three leafed ivy, and quicksilver.”

“Ouch!” Ori grimaced at the thought.

“That was my opinion as well. He tested it on himself and, I quote, found it ‘invigorating’.”

“He must have been crazy,” Ori said, and shook his head.

“Quicksilver is extremely poisonous,” Elrond observed. “Madness is a side effect.”

“Three leafed ivy stings worse than nettles,” Ori agreed, “and you can’t make soup out of it.”

Elrond stared at him.

“Nettles are a soup ingredient among dwarrow?”

Ori nodded,

“Nettles are a soup ingredient among dwarrow?”

Ori nodded,

“Yes, it’s easily gathered and plentiful, so you don’t need to spend any money. Dori used it as a tea for purifying the blood and in soup as he said it was good for us.”

“That’s pee-pee tonic,” Nori added as he and Bofur leaned over the back of the sofa.

“Ah, yes,” Elrond agreed. “It is an excellent diuretic.”

Ori squirmed round and knelt up, grabbing for Nori’s nose.

“Gitoff, ya liddle mole!” Nori bellowed. “Dor, th’ badger’s tryin’ t’ pull me snoot again!”

Dori came merrily back through.

“Pet, what did you do?”
Ori giggled then frowned,
“Nori said a bad word in front of Lord Elrond.”
“Pet, I’m sure Lord Elrond—”
“And he maligned your nettle tea.”
“Nori!”
Ori was aware of Ulfr and Buer staring at them. The two had never seen the Brothers Ri ‘at it’ before.

“I didn’t mainline anyfin’!” Nori blustered, getting into the act. “That tea’s a medicament f’r makin’ ya piss.”

“In company,” Dori pronounced loudly, “you will say urinate.”
“In my arse I will!” Nori shouted.
“No, my duck,” Dori cooed, “that’s called flatulance.”
“Nori farts!” Ori shouted and fell back on the sofa giggling.

Nori reached for him and Dori grabbed Nori.
“Behave or I’ll spank you both!” Dori scolded around laughter. “Stop talking about rude things this instant!”

“Lemme go!” Nori yelled. “Oi, our Bo!”
“Between brothers, me lad.” Bofur laughed.
“Oi Dain!” Nori tried.
Dain bounded to his feet and scooped up Nori.
“I’ll spank this one iff’n yer wan’in’ t’ spank t’other, me dumplin’,” Dain offered cheerily. Dori tittered in delight and Nori rained insults from his prison on Dain’s shoulder. Ori fell off the sofa and lay on Elrond’s feet, giggling.

Balin leaned over him.
“Alrigh’, wee brother?”
“He’s fine.” Elrond peered down at Ori. “He has been misbehaving in the most shocking manner.”

“Aye, tha’s our laddie,” Balin hefted Ori to his feet.

“Dinner,” Dori caroled to the room and the herd followed her into the breakfast parlor.

Dinner was chunks of rabbit and cherry tomatoes or cavern mushroom and parsnip, both dishes skewered and roasted and served with cauliflower smothered in cheese sauce, lightly fried crayfish, and bowls of finely-chopped, pickled horseradish, cucumber and onions. Snis and Sni decimated the cauliflower and cheese. Their parents admired these sudden inroads on the once reviled vegetable.

“Aye,” Givris chuckled. “I’ll have t’ try it on them brussely cabbages.”
“Sprouts?” Bilbo said. “Never boil them.”
“How else ‘m I t’ get ‘em cooked?” Givris demanded.
“Slice them fine and fry with pepper and onions and plenty of butter,” Bilbo told her.
“Aye, I ‘member them from one a th’ dinners when I was here f’r our Thorin’s coronation!” Chat butted in. “Bloody brilliant. I’d a’ telt ya ‘bout it, me love, if I’d know that’s what they was!”

“Bit odd, eatin’ somethin’ so green,” Ulfr added, “green’s usually f’r elves.”
“Actually, your majesty.” Bujni interposed, “up until the last two centuries, it was thought that elves only ate green plants because green plants live on air and that’s why elves are so light in weight.”
“Makes sense,” Ulfr allowed.
“Since Mister Gardener arrived, I have interviewed him on several occasions and have discovered the true purpose of plant roots.”
“Holds ‘em in the ground,” Ulfr replied with finality.

Buer and Yizaris nodded.
“That’s what I’ve always heard,” Chat agreed.

Every elf and man at the table froze and stared at the dwarrow. The Durins remained silent. Ori was rather embarrassed for his people.

“The truth,” Bujni explained slowly and clearly, “is that plants have roots to take in nourishment and water from the soil.”

“Plants eat dirt?” scoffed Ulfr. “Pull th’ other leg, laddie, it’s go’ bells on!”

“I am most assuredly not teasing you, your majesty,” Bujni raised a disapproving eyebrow. “At Mister Gardener’s advice, I planted seeds, each in some soil pressed between two panes of glass and observed the seeds grow. Without light or water the seed does not grow. Without light, the roots grow but the seed does not sprout and then seed dies. With water and light, the seed grown properly and it takes nutrients and water from the soil. Thus in order for a seed to grow it must take nutrients. I measure the acids and alkalis in all. There was a change in the acidity level with water and with water and light. Soil is required. After all, there are plants that grown underwater.”

Bujni finished and once more applied himself to his dinner. Buer looked admiringly at Bujni while Ulfr and Chat were dumbfounded.

“Well,” Givris said awed. “Who’d’a thunk it! That’s real clever of ya, laddie.”

“Aye, well” Ulfr said, not quite convinced. “Yeh still got yer testin’ equipment?”

“I do, your majesty,” Bujni said and turned to fix his gaze on Ulfr. “I will happily repeat the experiment or furnish you with the necessary equipment and instructions to conduct it yourself.”

“Yeh think I could?” Ulfr chuckled.

“If you follow my instructions explicitly, yes,” Bujni replied.

“Well, Master Oin,” Ulfr turned to the healer.

“Eh?” Oin cocked a look at the Ironfist king.

“Yeh think I could replicate yer lad’s plant experiment?”

“Yer a chemist,” Oin griped, “yeh’d fuck it up in two minutes.”

Everyone laughed, including Ulfr.

“Me lad’s a genius,” Oin said, looking proudly on Bujni. “Engineerin’ an’ anythin’ else he turns his hand t’. Hands o’ a healer, th’ lightest touch.”

Bujni blushed as Binni and Oin beamed at him.

“Have you other experiments going?” Buer asked.

“Several,” Bujni replied.

“Tell us, lad,” Ulfr invited.

Bujni looked narrowly at Ulfr, then smiled.

“I don’t sell my ideas cheaply, your majesty!”

“Woooo!” Buer and Yizaris hooted in unison.

“So when kin we expect to see ‘em workin’?” Ulfr pressed.

“I shall be presenting my main project this spring,” Bujni revealed. “It is to be my mastery.”

“How exciting, dear Bujni!” Dori enthused. “Just when Lord Balin and I shall be married.”

Bujni rose and bowed to Dori and Balin.

“It will be a privilege to do so on the occasion of your wedding, Honored Bearer, Lord Balin.”

“We shall all look forward to it, Bujni,” Thorin said with a smile.

“Is your craft t do with plants or engineering?” Buer asked, curious.

“I’m a scribe, training in librarianship.”

“You get to see all the master theses!” Buer sighed in awe. “Lucky you.”

“Master Brur says learning’s for all,” Ori put in.

“For which I am most grateful,” Lord Elrond added. “I have been enjoying the historical stacks and between my library in Rivendell and Elessar’s library in Gondor, we could created a comprehensive history of Arda. I hope to speak with Rigel for the history of the Easterlings as well.”

“Tell me,” Thorin asked, “did anyone get access to the library in Isengard?”

“We did,” Thranduil replied. “Saruman gave the tower into the keeping of Gondor when he left.”

“Good,” Thorin approved. “Elrond, this information included in your comprehensive history will allow scholars to study the patterns of how evil rose to power. This will allow all of us to recognize the patterns and advise further generations.”
“Wise o’ ya, our Thorin,” Givris said slowly. She stared at Thorin, the respect in her face obvious.

“Spill all th’ secrets?” Ulfr growled.

“We cannot have evil rise in Mordor again, my love,” Yizaris advised. “If we had knowledge of Dol Guldor, Khazad-dûm may not have fallen.”

“Tha’ was one a’ them maiar,” Ulfr said.

“Which is why I feel Rigel and Ara need to be involved,” Thorin said.

“Why?” Ulfr asked.

Ori almost growled at Ulfr.

“It was in the last release of the royal notices, your majesty,” Ori said in a flat tone.

“Rigel,” Thorin said, “is the blue wizard formally known as Pallando and Ara is the other blue wizard formally known as Alatar. I wish to work with them, as trying to get information out of Tharkûn is like sitting next to a bucket of water and hoping for fish.”

That made everyone laugh and Mistress Dazla arrived with dessert, a steamed gingerbread pudding decorated with sugared ginger and served with frozen vanilla custard.

She laid the platter on the table, then stood with a frown.

Out of the corner of his eye, Ori saw the little bird winging through.

“Seems a bit late,” she murmured to herself. She turned to Thorin. “Your majesty, a party of travelers has just entered the royal cavern.”

“Someone’s arriving rather late in the day,” said Thorin.

He and Bilbo rose and went to the door.

Soon, Ori heard a booming laugh, echoed by a second, only slightly higher pitched.

The door burst open, and there stood Bombur and Erda.

“Look, my heart,” said Bombur. “We’re just in time for dessert!”

Bofur shouted and Jani shrieked, and flung themselves forward to both hug Bombur and Erda at once.

Then the crowd descended upon them, in a gale of greetings and hugs. Along with Bifur, the Urs had brought Poli, Buri and Wili.

“You planned this, didn’t you,” Thorin accused Bombur playfully.

“Guilty,” said Bombur, wicked and cheerful at once. “What’s for pudding?”

Bifur bowed to his king.

“Your majesty,” said Bifur in ancient khuzdul, “t’is time to chow down.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And here comes everyone! Again! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“Wake up, laddie.”
Ori sat up in bed. He could see from the window, it was barely dawn. Dwalin’s eyes flew open.
“Wha’ yeh need me t’ do, love?”
“I don’t know yet. Durin woke me.”
Dwalin was on his feet and, at the window, Garnet winged in and landed on his arm, croaking.
“Gheir,” she reported.
“An’ his usual folk?”
“No, just two soldiers.”
Dwalin frowned and turned back to Ori.
“Love, I’ve go’ t’ go meet ‘im. It ain’t like ‘im t’ travel tha’ ligh’.”
“I’ll go make some food,” Ori said. He climbed out of bed and began pulling on his clothes.
Dwalin got into his uniform and strapped on his weapons, while he and Ori came together in a kiss.
“Good morning,” Ori whispered. “I love you,”
“Love yeh, too, me mizmel. I’ll send Garnet t’ yeh t’ warn Thorin, if there’s trouble brewin’.
Back in a bit.”
Dwalin hurried out the chimney door, Killer on his heels, and Ori went to the kitchen.
He had the kettle on and was busily poaching eggs, while frying small rounds of blood sausage, when Mistress Dazla whirled in.
“Lord Ori?”
“King Gheir has been sighted in the distance. Dwalin’s gone to meet them,” Ori explained. The housekeeper nodded business-like, lit the ovens, and disappeared into the pantry for the bread dough that had been rising overnight.
“I’ll finish here, Lord Ori,” she said, “if you would care to wake the king?”
“Certainly,” Ori said before he thought.
He paused, before trying the door to Bag-End East. The ogee arch slid aside and the handle of the green door turned easily. He opened it and Sugar’s nose thrust through at his eye level.
“It’s just me,” Ori said and patted her head. Sugar licked his cheek and backed away to allow him to enter. She walked, glued to his side, as he padded quietly through to the bedroom. Butter peered out at him from Frodo’s room. He went to the master bedroom door. It stood ajar and Ori tapped on it, then peeked around it. Thorin, bare-chested, sat up and looked at him.
“What?” Thorin asked in Iglishmëk. Ori could see a lump of furs that was Bilbo, at Thorin’s waist.
“Gheir, alone but for two soldiers.” Ori signed in reply. “Dwalin’s gone to meet him.”
Thorin slid out of bed and Bilbo lifted his head, curls tousled from sleep.
“What’s going on?”
“Gheir’s coming,” Thorin told him with a kiss.
Bilbo turned over and saw Ori.
“Good morning, Ori. Why the stealthiness?”
“Gheir’s alone.” Ori explained.
“How very odd.” Bilbo frowned, then sat up and hopped out of bed. “I’ll come with you, Thorin dear.”
“Thank you, amrâlimê.”
Thorin went to a dresser, removed something, and handed it to Ori. It was Thorin’s spyglass.
Ori went back to the kitchen. Mistress Dazla nodded to him and returned to readying breakfast with Miss Larit and Miss Oqizla assisting her.
Ori slipped out of the house and ran down the small passage to peer over the parapet. He lifted the spyglass. Beyond Dale proper, he saw the Stiffbeard king. Ori focused the magnifiers. Gheir looked considerably run down and glum. He showed no sign of warfare, neither did his guards.
Dwalin on Harley bounded into view with Killer at Harley’s side. Ori watched as Dwalin and Gheir talked. Dwalin threw back his head in laughter, patted Gheir’s shoulder, and turned Harley to escort Gheir to the Mountain.
He saw Eowyn on Windfola meet them at the south end of Dale proper and, with Dwalin, she rode escort to the Stiffbeard king.
Ori put the glass in his pocket and hurried back to the house. He gained the sitting room, saw the door to Bag-End East was still closed rather than open for the day, and hurried through the passage. He knocked this time. He heard an odd noise as though Sugar was breathing heavily at the door. The knob turned and the door opened slightly. Sugar thrust her head through the crack and nosed the door further open. Her tail was going and she panted happily at Ori. Thorin entered the room and stared.
“Ori, did Sugar just open the door for you?”
“Yes,” Ori chuckled and patted Sugar. Sugar pranced over to Thorin and sat down in front of him. Her tail swept the floor vigorously.
Ori had a chance to look at Sugar and Thorin together. Sugar had filled out splendidly. Her muscles were defined and she was now half a head taller than Thorin. Her fur had grown in, thick, silky, and beautifully cared for. Ori thought she was the ultimate example of a warg. Except for her fuller face and huge jaws, she had almost returned to the images of mountain wolves of the northern wastes of legend.
“Did you see anything of note?” Thorin asked, bringing Ori out of his revery.
“Gheir just looks tired and grumpy. Dwalin met up with them on the outskirts of Dale and whatever he said made Dwalin laugh and commiserate with him. Eowyn met them at the city limit.”
Thorin considered as he tousled Sugar’s face and ruff, then grinned.
“I wonder, as all his wives are pregnant, if they may have become fed up with his ways and, ahem, cajoled him to go to Erebor.”
Ori giggled as Sugar flopped down and rolled over for a belly rub. Thorin beamed down at the huge beast on his polished floor.
“You are such a sweet damling,” Thorin cooed and dropped to his knees and buried his face in the warg’s tummy.
Frodo and Sam burst through, squealed to see Thorin thus occupied, and immediately set about helping.
Bilbo, shadowed by Butter, entered and smiled at Ori.
“Does Dwalin behave like this with Killer?”
“Yes, but I do, too.” Ori admitted, then he and Bilbo laughed.
“Come along,” Bilbo said, and adjusted one of Sam’s braces. “We’re having first breakfast in Fundin House.”
“Yay!” shouted the faunts and rushed out the still open door. Butter bounded after them. Thorin rose, as did Sugar. She licked Thorin’s face and followed Butter at a sedate pace.
Thorin came to Bilbo and put an arm about the hobbit’s waist and the other about Ori’s. He kissed their cheeks, one after another.
“Good morning, sweet scribes of the valar.”
Bilbo blinked at Ori.
“Your lordship, we share a title.”
“Indeed we do, your highness,” Ori agreed.
“May I felicitate you, your lordship?” Bilbo teased.
“Only if I may pay you tribute in return, your highness.”
“Why, thank you, your lordship.”
“It’s my pleasure, your highness.”
Thorin stood aside and bowed to them.
“Scribe of Mahal, you may kiss the scribe of Yavanna. Scribe of Yavanna you may kiss the scribe of Mahal.”
Ori wrapped Bilbo in his arms and kissed him thoroughly.
Bilbo laughed, then turned to Thorin.
“And now, your majesty, you may kiss the scribes of the valar.”
Thorin put an arm around both again and kissed Bilbo, then Ori, making both giggle.
“Uncle! Idad!” came Frodo’s call from the Fundin sitting room.
Thorn released his scribes and offered each of them an arm. They went through and Balin arrived with Dori.
“This is a bit early, lad,” Balin observed.
“Indeed,” Thorin replied, amused. “Gheir is in Dale and looking glum. We must cheer him up with breakfast.”
“Fifty gold says his wives chucked him out,” Dori said merrily. “I shall go and see to his old rooms.”
“I shan’t take that bet, Bearer,” Thorin chuckled, “as I think you’re right.”
Dori tittered and pattered out. Balin sighed and bowed his king towards the breakfast parlor.
They had time for one cup of tea before Dwalin strode in.
“King Gheir, yer majesty.”
“Welcome, Gheir.” Thorin smiled as Gheir bowed low, then rose. They knocked heads, and Thorn embraced the Stiffbeard king. “To what do we owe this solitary pleasure?”
“Don’t ask,” mumbled Gheir.
“Ah, with all the Mavi expecting you are somewhat in the way?” Thorin suggested gently.
“Yeah.” Gheir brushed at his tunic, dusty from the road.
Dori arrived. Gheir bowed to the Honored Bearer. Dori curtseyed prettily and pounced on him.
“King Gheir! You are shockingly travel stained. Your room is ready. You shall bathe and change before you sit at the king’s table. Come along!”
Gheir was removed at speed. Dwalin kissed Ori and sat down.
“Did Eowyn not accompany you?” Thorin asked.
“Nah, she’s headed off duty an’ t’ bed. Told her t’ tell Haldir an’ Glorfy there’d be more soon enough.”
“Excellent,” said Thorin as Bilbo poured out a cup of tea for the captain.
Bujni and Dipfa arrived, they bowed deeply in unison and took their places.
“Good morning your majesty,” said Bujni, “your highness, lords and ladies, I understand we just missed the king of the Stiffbeards. Do the Stiffbeard queens need the assistance of my precious diamond?”
“They didn’t come,” Frodo said solemnly, while everyone else stifled laughter.
“Ah,” said Dipfa. “You see, my beloved boo, it is as I expected. Being full of expectancy, it is too rigorous a duty for the queens to travel.”
Bujni lifted her hand to his lips.
“You are very wise, my precious diamond.”
“Shall we link up, my boo?”
“Indeed. Prepare to link, my diamond.”
Just for a moment, Ori looked wildly around the table, and noticed everyone else doing the same, extcept for Bujni and Dipfa, who each lifted what looked like a sash they wore at the waist. The sashes ended in a metal coupling, which they fastened, and joined their clothes together.
“We only do it when we’re sitting down,” said Dipfa. “I designed it as an expression of togetherness, but we don’t want to get caught up in something while we’re moving. That would just look silly.”

Miss Oqizla came through with large pan piled with poached eggs and Mistress Dazla followed with a platter of blood sausage.

Everyone tucked in. Miss Larit came through and Floris and Mavey bounced in after her, before they could be announced.

“Oh, your majesty!” Floris cried.

“We came to see Master Dipfa,” Mavey finished.

“Please sit down and eat first,” Thorin said.

The two sat and filled their plates, and chattered about the circus being open after the wedding. Both had come for their new costumes from Dipfa. Floris was going to be doing her warg act and Mavey and Fanny had made up a new dance.

Dori returned. Thorin caught her eye and raised his chin toward Mavey.

“Mavey, dear,” said Dori, “you should know that King Gheir has arrived this morning.”

“Oh!” said Mavey startled. “I was just going to put a letter in the caravan for the day after tomorrow. I guess I can give it to him sooner. I’ve been very good. I’ve written every two weeks and told him everything I’d learnt.”

She frowned a little, then,

“He hasn’t written to me, so I suppose it was either too hard to know where to send the letters or maybe he’s glad I’m not chattering at him.”

She giggled. There was the sound of footsteps and Gheir came in. He was dressed casually and looked a good deal more cheerful.

“Blood sausage! Bearer, I-” He stopped when he saw Mavey and stared at her.

“Surprise!” Mavey squealed.

“Mavey?” he gasped.

“Yes, it’s me!” She jumped up. “Are you surprised? Say you’re surprised!”

She hopped to his side and he enfolded her in his arms.

“Yes, my dear, and what a lovely surprise it is!”

He held her away from him and looked her over.

“You look beautiful, dear. Are you happy?”

“Oh, yes!” Mavey cried. “Did you get my letters?”

“Indeed I did. Very informative. I must admit I was never sure where I might safely write to you. I hope you didn’t think I was neglecting you?”

“Oh no, I thought it was because I was traveling! You remember Floris?” Mavey tugged Gheir to the table and sat him between herself and Floris and they went through everything they told the company already.

Ori smiled to Thorin, who nodded slightly. Gheir was much better in the role of a fond uncle, bent on spoiling the young ladies talking his ears off. He ate seven patties of blood sausage and listened intently to the babbling going on either side of him. He saw Thorin looking at him and smiled. When he’d finished, the two dragged him along with them to go with Dipfa and see their new costumes.

“Shall we unlink, my boo?” Dipfa asked.

“Preparing to unlink, my precious diamond.”

Bujni remained, but the females carried Gheir away on a tide of excited noise. Ori thought Gheir looked perfectly happy.

Oin and Gloin came in with their families.

“I hear Gheir’s here an’ alone,” Gloin said immediately.

“Yes,” Thorin chuckled as he helped Frodo and Sam out of their chairs, so the faunts could bounce out to the meadow.

“Booted him ou’, did they?” Oin said, sat down by his son and patted him on the head.

“Yes, and now he’s off spoiling Mavey and Floris,” Dori said as she filled plates. “No doubt he’ll overpay Dipfa and buy them any frippery thing they take a fancy to.”
“Good,” said Binni, “he’ll be as avuncular as he likes without any responsibility. Jim can always use any jewelry to sell when they travel if he needs.”
“Considering how popular the circus is,” Thorin chuckled, “I doubt he’d ever need to.”
“Where’re Ulfr and Buer?” asked Gridr. “I’m sure Arne and his loves will be here soon enough. They will want to hear about the wedding.”
“Mistress Dazla?” Dori asked as the housekeeper bustled in with more food.
“King Ulfr and that young Buer woke and went straight to the old lab down in the Oakenshield Inn, marm. I hope to Mahal they don’t blow it up.”
“If they do, they’ll redesign and build a new one,” said Thorin comfortingly.
“If he does,” said Bombur as he came in with Erda and their badgers, “perhaps I can assist him with the kitchen.”
Jani and Randibur arrived with Dis.
“Mam! Da!” Randibur cried as he leapt into the pile of dwarrow, excited as a toddler despite his grown-up attire.
“Oooo, just look at you!” Erda crooned as she hugged him. “Doesn’t he look dashing, just like his adad.”
Randi blushed as he embraced Bombur.
“I’d need to put on a lot of flesh, and I still wouldn’t compare.”
Bombur bumped foreheads with him.
“Dis is teaching you all manner of sweet-talk, isn’t she.”
“Da!”
Elrond and Lindir arrived, looking brave in the face of all that blood sausage.
Thorin laughed at them.
“Don’t worry, we won’t insist. There’s eggs, and porridge, and fried plantains, and fresh-baked bread and jam.”
Elrond bowed.
“As always, you are too good.”
They were finishing their tea when Roäc winged in.
“Swells approaching from the northwest. And the south. And the west.”
Thorin sighed.
“When should we expect each party?”
“All at once. D’uh!”
“Oh, Mahal!” Dori cried. “Mistress Dazla! Mistress Dazla!”
“Roäc,” said Thorin, “please go get Jim.”
“Because he’s used to running circuses.”
The housekeeper swept in and she and Dori hurried out.
There was the sound of galloping hooves from above and Grinder hopped down into the meadow, with Frodo and Sam clinging to the back wool.
“The standard of Gondor is coming on a boat,” Frodo cried, “and I can see another flag really far away coming from the south!”
“Thank you, irakdashat,” said Thorin and rose. “Dori,” he called through the kitchen door, “prepare for a home invasion.”
They all heard Dori giggle.

Ori and Dwalin rode Gnasher up, following Frodo and Sam on Grinder. The Ur and Blue Mountain badgers watched in delight from the meadow. Ori looked through the spyglass and saw not only the standard of Gondor on the ship, but also the standards of Rohan and Lothlórien.
A large party approached on the road to the south of the mountain. Ori picked out the standards of Hild and Ahkn. Ori turned to the northwest and saw another party. He didn’t know the standard but he was sure it was what Arivett and Eomer had decided on: a green field with a tower crossed by a spear and an axe.
Ori watched as the ship moved to the great pier of Dale. Movement caught his eye and he turned the glass to Dale house. Bard and Thranduil, on horse and elk, rode towards the docks.

Ori gave the glass to Frodo and helped him look through it. After a couple of squeals of excitement, Frodo carefully gave the glass to Sam and helped him look through it.

“Th’ nevies’re so bleedin’ cute,” Dwalin murmured in Ori’s ear. Ori stifled a giggle and Frodo meticulously gave the glass back into Ori’s keeping. The goats hopped merrily down the banks and leapt into the meadow. The four made their way to the breakfast parlor.

“Rohan and Gondor’re landin’ at th’ docks. Bard an’ his lot’re meetin’ ‘em,” Dwalin reported. “Let’s hope someone’s told Eowyn her family’s here,” Bilbo replied as he pulled the cleared tablecloth to him in a mound, then went outside to shake it in the meadow. Several wrens and couple of bluebirds fluttered down to feast on the crumbs.

Ori looked down at himself.

“You and our deary have just enough time to change and wash,” Dori ordered. “Change an’ wash then come t’ th’ guest all nakkie, our Dori?” Dwalin teased then backed away laughing as Dori launched at him armed with the large tea towel.

“Stop being difficult, our deary! Go with Pet and do as you’re told.” Dwalin grabbed Ori’s hand and pulled him out.

“And no debauchery!” Dori shouted after them.

Ori and Dwalin snickered and went to the bathroom.

“I ain’t go’ much time, love,” Dwalin grumbled. “I know.” Ori grinned up at his husband. “But we have time to wash each other’s backs.”

Ori watched as Frodo, Sam, Snis and Sni, and the young Urs played a game called hopscotch in the Fundin front formal paths. The huge metal gates had been unhasped from the hobbit gate to stand wide and welcoming. The hobbit gate was swathed in flowers.

Thorin and Bilbo stood in the center, ready to greet their friends.

In the distance they heard the cheers of the dwarrow and the trumpets blared, announcing the arrivals. The sounds of many hooves crashed and echoed as the horses entered the royal tunnel, then the line of Bard, Thranduil, Aragorn, Arwen, Boromir, Lavender, Galadriel and Celeborn, Theoden, and Theodred rode in.

Thorin and Bilbo came forward, calling welcome, and the all riders alit, everyone shouted and welcomed all over. Ori grinned as Theoden embraced Dori, Aragorn fast in the grip of Dain and Sculdís. Fili, Kili and Theodred all talked at once. Bilbo and Thorin held Arwen as she knelt on one knee to hug them. Galadriel hugged Gridr and Gloin both at once and Oin and Celeborn talked excitedly at each other as Kelli hopped and squawked happily. The wargs and the cats ran through and around everyone.

Sigrid and Tilda pounced on Ori and Dwalin then rushed off to greet Galadriel.

“Hello, Scribe Ori!” Boromir bumped into him. Ori laughed at the sight of Boromir. The First March Warden had two faunts under one arm and two dwarflings under the other.

“I’d give you a hug,” said the man with a grin, “but these vicious beasts I’ve just captured might escape.”

“I’d eat ‘em now, while they’re still fresh, laddie,” Dwalin teased with a growl at the squealing little ones.

“Excellent notion!” Boromir cried and hefted his load around. “Hmm, how many minutes to the pound do you think, captain?”

“Aw, they’re jus’ wee,” Dwalin drawled. “Crunch ‘em up raw! It’s naugh’ bu’ a snack anyway. Probably hold yeh ’til dinner!”

Boromir curled an arm up and pretended to take bites out of Sni’s tummy. All the youngsters shrieked.

“Oi, our Gladdy! Our Cele!” shouted Chat, hurrying up with Givris in tow. “Come meet me family.”

“Oh, Chat!” cried Galadriel, “how lovely to see you again. Is this your queen? I’m charmed to make your acquaintance, your majesty.”
“Aye,” Chat beamed. “Me love, this’s th’ Lórien lot I told ya ‘bout.”
“Queen Givris,” Celeborn laid a hand on his heart then swept down to embrace her.
“Howdido, Cele,” Givris greeted him, and bussed his cheek noisily.
Chat and Galadriel hugged then as the lady rose, Chat bellowed for his badgers.
“Oi, ya lot, leave off throttlin’ that feller an’ come say howdy-do to these folks.”
Boromir released the badgers, who started to trot up. They slowed to a walk as they approached the Loriens, then halted a few feet away, with their mouths hanging open and their heads cocked all the way back.
“This here’s Snis,” said Givris. “And this is Sni. They’re usually a bit more chipper’n this.”
Galadriel giggled and knelt.
“Is this better, my dears?” she asked.
Snis and Sni rolled their eyes toward their parents.
Chat laughed.
“They’re elves, silly badgers, just like our Linda and Rhonda. This here’s Lady Galadriel, and this is her hubby, Lord Celeborn.”
Snis, apparently the braver of the two, turned to Galadriel and bowed.
Galadriel bowed her head civilly.
“How are you keeping, my dear?” she asked.
Snis edged forward, and darted out a hand to pat Galadriel’s cheek.
“No beard? It’s alright. Still pretty.”
Galadriel laughed and Snis giggled and ran and hid behind her mother.
Lavender came up, Sam was riding piggy-back.
“Look, Idad Ori!” he shouted.
“Hello Lavender,” Ori greeted her. “How was your trip?”
“Hello, Ori,” she said, giving his cheek a kiss. “We had ever such good weather and we stopped over in Rohan for a couple of nights and then in Lórien. So many lovely places!”
“Lucky you,” Ori grinned. “Lórien is amazing, isn’t it.”
Ori turned at see Mistress Dazla herding the royal visitors into the house followed by her team and the servants from the other lands coming through with baggage. Soldiers followed Gib, Legolas and Gimli off to the Oakenshield Inn to stable their cattle and settle in.
Ori linked arms with Lavender and brought her into the amazing noise in the receiving room.
Dori and Mistress Dazla shoed guests up the stairs to ‘their rooms’. Sigrid tried to rein in Tilda, who was determine to hug everyone. Dain talked to everybody at once, and Fili and Kili attempted to organize a training ring where they and Stonehelm, Theodred, and Bain could try their mettle.
Lavender shook her head and went to extract Arwen from Lindir and her father to go upstairs and change her traveling clothes to something more comfortable.
Roäc flew off to the outskirts of Dale, and quickly returned, announcing that the Gardeners would soon be upon them.
Ori hoped this would mean Eowyn as well. He was right.
Eowyn breezed into the sitting room some twenty minutes later, followed by the Gardeners and the Sisters.
“You look well,” Ori approved as Eowyn tossed back her cloak to reveal her armor and the uniform of Dale, all black tabard but for the single brilliant white arrow on her breast.
“I think so,” she teased in return. “I hear my uncle has arrived with the people of Gondor, Rohan and Lórien.”
Glorfindel as the Protector was similarly dressed, but the colors reversed. Ori wondered if he ordered his foes not to bleed on his long white tabard, unadorned but for the sparkling black arrow of jet beads. His white boots were immaculate “Ooo, our Ori!” shrieked Vi. “Such a to-do! Our Thorin and Bilbo gettin’ proper hitched after all this time!”
“Aye,” agreed Margr. “An’ t’ think th’ pair o’ ‘em shaccin’ up an’ in fron’ o’ our Dori. Where’s “Upstairs sorting out guests,” Lavender replied as she came in. “Mam! Da!”

Lavender was swooped upon and hugged until she was breathless.

King Theoden arrived, shadowed by the smallest horse Ori had ever seen. It appeared to be a stallion, all black, even smaller than Wee Mac. It also appeared to be swaggering.

Eowyn bounced forward. Theoden stared as though he’d never seen her before.

“I know your face,” he said in a breathless voice, as if waking from a dream.

“Uncle!” Eowyn cried.

“Eowyn,” he said and smiled fondly.

“Uncle,” she said again with laughter in her voice.

Theoden chuckled and snatched her close. After a long hug, he held her out to look her over.

“Dale colors?”

“Yes, Uncle.”

“Married yet?”

“Uncle!”

“Betrothed?”

“Uncle!”

“Met any nice fellows?”

“Uncle!” the tone bordered on the dangerous.

Theoden turned and gestured to Haldir.

“What about him?”

“He’s misbehaving with Mister Wandi.”

Theoden sighed. “At this rate young lady, I swear I’ll go and have a chat with that Beorn fellow.”

“Who told you about Beorn?” Eowyn demanded.

“Nothing,” Eowyn gasped. “Isn’t it wonderful to visit Erebor again, Uncle! And I’ve so much to tell you!”

Theodred came in at this point and shouted at his cousin in greeting. Ori smothered a smile at the relief on Eowyn’s face when she saw Theodred. He caught the looks of sly humor exchanged by Haldir and Glorfindel. Eowyn had left a very wide flank open and there was no doubt in his mind that the two elves would attack it as often as possible.

Bell released he daughter and appraised her.

“Oh, my sweet child, you look so lovely and in the Gondorian style of long sleeves.”

“That Boromir treatin’ you right?” Hamfast wanted to know.

Lavender laughed merrily.

“Da! He treats me as though I was the queen and not dear Arwen.”

“Well, that’s alright then.”

Amused, Ori went through to the breakfast parlor again to find Bilbo and Dori laying out dishes and cutlery while Gimli, Legolas and Bujni put out seats on the patio. Ori grinned to himself. Once more Fundin house would burst at the seams with people and, best of all, they were his friends. Out in the meadow, Frodo and Sam, now in cahoots with all the badgers, the other faunts, and Tilda, attacked Fili, Kili and Boromir with gusto. The ponies frisked around them and Fanny hooted her amusement.

There was a trumpet blast from Dale and Ori knew that Hild and Ahkn were marching through. The group of warriors ignored it. The others had disappeared. Ori went back in and found both the breakfast parlor and the sitting room empty. He went to the receiving room and skidded to a stop as boots thundered along the top passage and Arwen and Aragorn raced Sculdis and Dain. They barreled out to the stair. Dain and Aragorn bounded down as Arwen and Sculdis whisked passed them, seated on the bannister. Sculdis thumbed her nose at the males as they flew down.

“Why didn’t we think of that?” Aragorn asked Dain.

“‘Cose they’re our delicate jewels of brides!” Dain roared and leapt to his wife’s side to kiss her hand then noisily kiss all the way up her arm to plant a great smacking kiss on Sculdis’ cheek.
“Git awa’ wi’ yeh!” she shouted. “Wicked dwarf!”

Aragorn offered his arm to Arwen.

“May I escort you, my delicate jewel of a bride-to-be?”
“I’d be offended if you didn’t!” she laughed. “Coming with us, Ori?”

Before Ori could answer, Dain seized him and drew him out to the courtyard.

The soldiers arrived and Hild rode forward with Ahkn on one side and Aris on the other. Calls of welcome began and soon the hugging and greeting and shrieks of news began all over again. Once Hild had greeted Thorin, she gushed over Bilbo, then demanded to know where her daughter was.

Thorin was able to assure Hild that she had arrived before Arivett.

“Wonderful!” Hild cried. “Aris make a note. My daughter is late.”

“Noted, yer majesty,” Aris said evenly but obviously trying not to laugh.

“Where’s-?” Hild didn’t get a chance to finish before Theoden took his life in his hands, came forward and caught her by the waist, and swung her high with a joyous shout of “Sister! I’ve been counting the days to see you again!”

“Aaaak!” Hild cried. “Yes, dear brother Theoden, I’m transported to see you as well. Put me down before I vomit!”

Theoden did so, with a chuckle.

“Too high?”

“Too pregnant!” she responded.

“Congratulations, Captain Aris,” Theoden saluted her.

“It wasn’t her, you great plonker!” Hild fussed. “It was Ahkn, you know, Arivett’s father.”

“May I felicitate you?” Theoden teased.

“If you like,” Ahkn chuckled. “Didn’t know I still had it in me.”

“Neither did I,” Hild said. “Oh Mahal! I need to go inside.”

“Feelin’ sick, love?” Aris asked.

“No, badger’s sitting on my bladder again.”

Theoden looked around and called out,

“Bearer Dori, Hild needs your assistance.”

Dori bustled over and took Hild’s hand, and stopped short.

“That’s the smallest horse I’ve ever seen,” she said.

“This is Master Eorl,” said Theoden. “Master Eorl, this is Bearer Dori. Kindly greet her properly.”

Master Eorl nodded, then stretched out a hoof and bowed over it.

“That is adorable,” said Dori. “Is he-?”

“Housebroken, yes.”

“Perfect.”

“Dori!” Hild cried.

“Oh, my dear! I’m sorry, come along!”

Theoden turned his attention back to Ahkn.

“And how have you been keeping, brother king?”

“Sick as a dog every bleeding morning.”

“I’ve been fine!” said Aris with a toothy grin.

“I’ll take being ill over being in your shoes,” Ahkn taunted.

Another trumpet blast warned them Arrivett was on her way up.

“Ready to meet you new niece?” Bilbo asked Theoden.

“As ready as I’ll ever be,” Theoden replied jauntily as Ahkn and Aris hooted at him.

“Steady, man!” Aragorn dropped his hands on Theoden’s shoulders and massaged them. “Deep breaths. Think calming thoughts.”

“Piss off!” Theoden laughed.

“Have you prepared a speech?” Celeborn asked gravely, but with a twinkle in his eyes.

“You piss off, too.” Theoden replied.
“Stop flirting,” Lady Galadriel teased.
“King Theoden can’t resist grand-ada’s charms,” Arwen chimed in.
“Well, I am very charming,” Celeborn reflected.
“Grand-ada?” Galadriel asked.
“Grand-ada,” Thranduil snickered and Bard elbowed him.

The Blue Mountain entourage came from the tunnel with four horses in the lead. Ori saw Elladan and Elrohir on the right and a blond man and a dwarrowdam on the left. The man wore the helm of Rohan and the dwarrowdam had a helm like Hild’s. Ori bit his lip. They looked exactly as they had in his dream about their wedding.

Eowyn gave a shriek and bounded forward. Eomer swung off his horse and they slammed together, yelling and laughing and smacking at each other like badgers. Theoden strode forward and offered his hand up to Arivett.

“Well met, my new niece,” he said with a soft smile. “Shall I help you off that enormous animal my fool of a nephew has perched you on?”

Arivett had been sitting up straight and looking formal, but she smiled under this paternal attention and slid gratefully off her saddle into Theoden’s arms. He put her tenderly on the ground and brushed off her skirts.

“Nephew,” Theoden bellowed. “Where are your manners? Come, tend to your wife.”

“Uncle!” Eomer shouted and crashed into Theoden then turned him to Arivett.

“There she is, uncle!” Eomer’s eyes were shining. “My powerful, beautiful queen! Isn’t she the most beautiful lady you’ve ever seen?”

“Arivett, my dear. It is wonderful to meet you at last. Please excuse my nephew’s ill bred behaviors.”

Arivett laughed merrily.

“He may be ill-mannered, but he has all your charm and more, dear uncle. I’m so happy to meet you at last.”

She slipped her hand into Eomer’s as Eowyn bounced over.

“Sister!” Eowyn laughed.

“Sister!” Arivett agreed and Eowyn, now well used to the difficulties with height, dropped to her knees and threw her arms about Arivett.

“You made it!” Eowyn enthused. “I was ready to believe the Eomer would never bring you and hog you all to himself.”

This made Arivett giggle and, hand-in-hand they went forward to meet Thorin. Eomer followed, half-hugging his uncle, who ruffled his hair and told him he was a dunderhead.

“Cousin.” Arivett bowed to the High King, who smiled and took her in his arms.

“Arivett,” Thorin said. “It’s so good to see you again. Congratulations on both of your conquests.”

“If you wish to scold, I shall stand for it,” she offered.

Thorin laughed.

“Nonsense, now here is your new cousin. Ghivashel, my little cousin, Arivett.”

Arivett and Bilbo embraced. Arivett looked Bilbo over then turned to Thorin again.

“He’s perfect for you.”

“Thank you,” Bilbo teased. “I rather think so myself.”

There was a shriek from the front door and Hild shot out of it as though from a catapult.

“Arivett!” she screamed.

“Mam!” Arivett screamed and rushed at her mother. The two collided like armored boulders in the middle of the courtyard. Aris turned to Eomer.

“So, yer him, are yeh?”

Eomer turned, eyebrow raised, with a smile almost a broad as Glorfindel’s.

“General Aris,” he boomed and swept her a grand bow. “It is a great honor to finally meet you! Arivett has told me of your exploits and I am humbled.”

“Yer full a’ shit,” Aris spat and reached up, grabbed the neckline of his breast plate and dragged him down to thunk brows. She released him and nodded.

“Yeh’ll do.”

Eomer turned to his guards, who were politely exchanging greetings with Eowyn, and shouted, “Hear that, lads? I’ll do.”

They all laughed and cat-called him.

“Aye, milord, every chance you get!”

“Eomer,” Theoden chided and turned his nephew to the High King of Dwarrow.

“Brother Thorin, may I present my nephew Eomer to you and Professor Baggins.”

Thorin offered his arm to Eomer, who took it and bowed over it as well.

“King Thorin,” Eomer grinned. “An honor to finally meet you, your majesty.”

“Eomer,” Thorin smiled. “How are you, my cousin? We have long awaited meeting you. Come and be welcome.”

“Mam.”

They all turned, Arivett was leading her mother by the hand to Eomer.

“This is my Eomer. Ghivasha, this is my mother, Queen Hild of the Blacklocks.”

Eomer cast his helm on the ground, drew his sword, fell to his knees, laid it at Hild’s feet, and kissed both Hild’s hands.

“Your majesty, Honored Madame, I cannot begin to thank you for this gift of the valar you have blessed my life with. To love and serve her is the greatest privilege I could ever hope to imagine.”

Hild stared at Eomer, then looked at Aris. She withdrew her hands.

“Young man, you are full of shit.” She smiled and patted his cheek. “You’ll do nicely.”

Ori saw Arivett give a happy little hop and she squeaked in delight and grabbed her husband. Elladan and Elrohir stepped away from greeting their father and Lindir, and arrived on either side of Arivett.

“Your majesty,” said Elladan, “Some water?”

“Your majesty,” said Elrohir, “A shawl?”

“Your majesty,” they said in unison, “A piss?”

“I’m going to kill both of you!” Arivett shouted. She turned to her mother. “They’ve been like this ever since they joined our party at the top of the Greenwood. Every bloody half an hour!”

“We are merely being solicitous of your health, your majesty,” Elladan said.

“Your majesty’s health is very important,” said Elrohir.

“Stop doing that!” Arivett yelled.

The two elves looked at one another and then back at her, opposing eyebrow raised.

“Stop what?” they chorused.

“That…that thing you do! That freaky same twin thing.”

“Identical twin,” corrected Elladan.

“Not same twin,” corrected Elrohir.

“That thing!” Arivett squalled, pointing at them.

“Not to worry, dear Arivett,” said Elrond. He came forward and laid a hand on a shoulder of each twin. “I shall attempt to control my freaky twins.”

“Elrond!” Hild cried. “How charming to meet you again! When did you arrive?”

“He never left,” said Elladan.

“He lives here now,” said Elrohir.

“He’s doing freaky elf things with Lindir,” they chorused.

“And we’re going inside now,” said Elrond.

“Yes, we are,” said Lindir.

Elrond and Lindir looked at the twins, then looked at each other.

“Inside,” they chorused.

“Freaky,” the twins said in unison.

The Rivendell elves went in. Hild and Arivett stared at each other, almost appalled.

“I believe that’s an elf thing,” Bilbo said.

“I believe it is,” Thorin added.
Bilbo turned and gave Thorin a naughty look.
“Stop it.”
Unpleasant Ulfr Unleashed.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The gang’s reunited…and it feels so good! Reunited, ‘cause they understood…reunited…. OK, that’s enough of Stevie singing old 70’s hits. On with this long, tangly tale! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori lay with his stomach on the grass and his elbows on the patio, drawing everyone. Lady Galadriel, Dori, Hild, Arivett, and Tauriel sat in the long deck chairs with their bare feet in the sunshine. Lady Galadriel looked as though she was absorbing the sunlight into her skin. Dori snored softly. Hild seemed to be listing the contents of her larder and Arivett kept mumbling the question “Where’s my axe?” Tauriel watched her companions with fascination.

Fanny lay on her side, her head near Ori, her side covered in napping faunts, badgers, and Tilda. Fili, Kili and the younger set, which had expanded to include the twins, Buer, Eomer, and Boromir, sprawled on the grass with the wargs and cats, talking amicably together. The dwarrow kings sat in a group, reminiscing about their parents and relatives, and the rest of the family was gathered in chairs on the patio discussing this and that. Cemnesta had arrive just as they were finishing lunch and happily took his ease with his father and older brother.

Binni and Oin began explaining the traditions. Ori went back to drawing, but he didn’t miss the fearsome glare Ulfr sent Oin’s way.

Then Binni said, ”You’ll see tonight, when we go to the crypts.”

Ulfr turned and shot Thorin a look.

“Th’ she elf’s comin’ with us?” he hissed.

“Lady Arwen is coming with us to the ceremony, as are all our other friends. They were invited,” said Thorin. “Why do you think they are here?”

“Because yer gettin’ married?” Ulfr replied.

“Yes, that too,” said Thorin. “Ulfr, go get something to drink.”

Mistress Dazla came out and gently woke Dori. The youngsters traipsed in after Frodo to ‘play with his toys’. Fili and the older ones followed the kings indoors. Dori, Binni, Bombur, and Gridr went to the kitchen to consult with Mistress Dazla. In the sitting room, the kings settled. Ori perched himself at the dining table to sketch. He was busy with a charming drawing of Tauriel and Kili sitting together whispering. Kili had his hand resting on her belly. Frodo and Sam bounced through to the kitchen, plainly in search of treats.

Mistress Dazla entered, followed by Tay, Nodun and Arne. Shouts of welcome sounded and Ori noticed Arne was proudly wearing the apprentice bead of the pleasure Guild. Ulfr noticed it, also.

“What’s this?” Ulfr demanded, crossing to his son and peering at him.

“I’ve taken a second craft, father,” Arne grinned.

Ulfr’s eyelid twitched.

“That’s the pleasure guild apprentice bead,” Ulfr growled.

“Yes. Tay has agreed to train me. It’s not all that unusual.”

“Aye? An’ wha’ are yeh learnin’, may I ask?”
“At the moment, how to bake scones and make tea.”
Tay approached.
“That’s how you start, your majesty,” said Tay. “It’s how the son of King Urz started.”
Ulfr’s eyes darted about.
It was a sore point with him, Ori knew. The pleasure guild was as old as the miners and smiths guilds, with traditions handed down by the second son the Ironfist king, Urz, brother king to Durin.
As a staunch traditionalist, Ulfr couldn’t protest, even though as a father, he was clearly incensed by the idea.
“As long as it stays quartz an’ no’ go t’ cobalt,” he warned.
Arne bowed to his father, but said nothing, and he went to sit with Ori, while Tay and Nodun walked off to talk to Thranduil leaving Ulfr to seethe quietly.
Ori met Dwalin’s glance and raised his chin toward Ulfr. Dwalin nodded in acknowledgment and subtly began to follow Ulfr about the room.

Ori looked up at Ulfr’s bark of “It ain’t right! Durin’s Day’s f’r dwarrow! An’ only dwarrow! His queen or no’, she wasn’t a dwarrowdam an’ we can’t be addin’ her in ceremonies as haven’t changed in over a thousand years!”
“I get what you’re saying, Ulfr,” said Gheir, “but we know her name now. She was Durin’s queen. It would be idiocy to go on pretending she didn’t exist just because her feet were large and fuzzy.”
“Much as it pains me,” said Hild, “I agree with Gheir. Other races think dwarrow thick-witted enough, let’s not ignore what is obvious.”
“No’ t’ mention,” said Dain, “if we knew abou’ her, an’ jus’ rejected her out a’ hand, it’d question
th’ legitimacy of every Longbeard line. We should have learned tha’ lesson from Nali.”
“An’ yeh, Chat,” said Ulfr as Chat refilled his tankard. “Yeh’ll just stand by an’ watch this travesty?”
“Ulfr, don’t make me sit on ya,” said Chat.
“Don’t make me sit on you, either,” said Bombur.
Ulfr eyed him, and, not surprisingly, backed down a little.
“Thank you,” said Bombur. “Here, have a tart.”
“Ulfr,” said Thorin, “let’s talk about this. What do you think is going to happen?”
“Our heritage is precious!” Ulfr said around a full mouth. “Th’ outsiders don’ understand wha’ it means. They don’t understand wha’ we’ve suffered an’ died f’r!”
“Because we’ve never told them,” said Thorin.
“Besides tha’!” Ulfr insisted, as he took another bite. “Bombur, these’re grea’.”
“It’s Bilbo’s recipe,” said Bombur gravely. “Pray do not complain about the outsiders with your mouth full of their cooking.” “Oh, well. Thank ‘im f’r me.” He licked his fingers. “Thorin, they can’ understand wha’ it means t’ be dwarrow. No amount a’ showin’ or tellin’ kin explain it. They think they kin jus’ worship Mahal withou’ understandin’ who Mahal is. They can’t even stand in th’ gasses ’r heat.”
Thorin turned and called, “Bard, may we have a moment?”
“Right here, Thorin,” said Bard.
“See wha’ I mean!” Ulfr shouted. “This is exactly wha’ I mean!”
“What do you mean?” Thorin asked.
Ulfr shook his hand toward Bard.
“That!”
“Do I have something in my whiskers?” Bard asked dryly. “Or am I just being blatantly manning?”
“Do yeh sacrifice t’ Mahal?” Ulfr demanded.
Bard rubbed the top of his chest, just below his throat, and Ori realized he was actually rubbing the anvil on its chain beneath his shirt.
“Yes,” said Bard. “Along with Eru, and Yavanna. I hate to break this to you, but a lot of other men in Dale do as well. We just don’t do it in front of High Priest Sven.”

Ulfr tried to stare Bard down, which would have been a good trick, even if Ulfr had been standing up.

“Consider yerself a dwarf now, do yeh?”

“No, for one thing, I’m not nearly sarcastic enough, though I am working on it. “

Ulfr let this pass.

“Why d’ yeh sacrifice t’ Mahal? Wha’ d’ yeh think it’ll get yeh?”

“It’s not that I think it will ‘get’ me anything,” said Bard. “It’s more that I should at least thank Him. He brought me the Durins. The Durins are the reason we’re free.”

“Bu’ th’ Durins’re also th’ reason yeh suffered f’r so long,” said Ulfr.

“Maybe later on,” said Bard, “but they didn’t start this mess. That wasn’t all about the Durins.

Our peoples have never been particularly close. Things might have been different if my father didn’t die before my grandfather, if my grandfather hadn’t been so sick and I hadn’t still been a boy when Calmar made his play for power. It’s a nasty storm of wha-ifs, and I can’t change any of it. I can’t erase old hurts, but men don’t live long enough to profit from holding grudges.

“And even though I don’t consider myself a dwarf, my grandchildren will consider themselves both. Sigrid and Fili are betrothed. They will marry. My family and Thorin’s family are now the same. Whether you approve or not, King Ulfr, it will happen.”

Kili and Tauriel looked at each other, then Kili declared, “My and Tauriel’s children will consider themselves both.”

That tore it. Ulfr leapt to his feet.

“Men and elves! Will there be no more true dwarrow in the line of Durin?”

Ulfr looked like he might lunge at Kili and Tauriel. Dwalin grabbed his shoulders from behind and slammed Ulfr back in his chair. Arne sat on one knee, Buer on the other, effectively immobilizing him.

“Ge’ off me, yeh young shits!” Ulfr bellowed.

“N-nope,” said Arne.

“Nossir,” said Buer. “If you go after any of the Durins, the people of Erebor will send you off down the chasm, to follow King Thror.”

“And- and y-you won’t en-enjoy it!”

“Yizaris!” Ulfr bellowed.

“Oh, for love of Mahal, Ulfr, the world has changed. Grow up or shut up.”

Ulfr stared at her.

“What?” she challenged. “As if I haven’t got a thought of my own or a brain in my head? Really! How long have we been married?”

“But wha’ if they betray us again?” Ulfr shouted.

“That’s the risk you take isn’t it?” Buer mused. His voice sounded wistful and his eyes looked far away. “Sometimes the ledge holds you and sometimes it crumbles under your feet.”

“But we’re dwarrow,” Arne said with a nod. “W-what dwarf could ever r-resist stepping out on a ledge?”

They smiled at one another in what looked to Ori like perfect understanding.

He could tell Ulfr saw it, too. He looked from one young dwarf to the other, his face a picture of bewilderment.

“Ulfr,” said Thorin.

The tone of his voice plunged the room into ice.

Thorin was on his feet, and he looked more coldly furious than Ori had ever seen. Ori wondered how Thorin could still speak.

“Ulfr, remember your oath,” said Thorin. “Will you abandon your loyalty to the Line Durin?”

“I… tha’ is… Your grandfather-”

“Ulfr, please come with me,” said Thorin.

It was worded as a request, but the underlying steel was not missed on anyone.

Buer and Arne slid off Ulfr’s lap, Ulfr stood and Thorin linked arms with him.
“Where are we going?” Ulfr asked.
“Treasury.”
An audible buzz rose in the room.
“Oh, fuck me,” Fili muttered.
“Twice,” Kili agreed.
Frodo tucked one hand into Bilbo’s and put the other in his own mouth. Sam crowded closer to them.
Dwalin stood at attention.
Hild and Gheir exchanged looks.
“Thorin,” said Gheir, “would you like the rest of the dwarf monarchs to come along?”
“If you wish,” said Thorin curtly. “Fili, you are in charge until I return.”
“Of course, Idad.”
The fact that Thorin reinforced the succession did nothing to soothe Ori’s fears. He glanced back and forth between his husband and Thorin.
Thorin looked to be struggling to keep his voice soft.
“Ori, will you please stay here with Bilbo and Fili?”
“Yes, your majesty,” said Ori.
He tried to put all the comfort he could into those words and he hoped Thorin heard it.

When they had gone, Ori looked about him, somewhat at a loss. Bilbo seemed to be straightening and re-straightening the silverware on the table, but not really seeing it.
“Are you alright, Bilbo? Where are Frodo and Sam?”
“They’re playing on the floor in the kitchen with Bombur’s and Chat’s broods. Sam is a little afraid, but Frodo is angry at Ulfr. He knows what it’s like when people are against you for what you are.”
“And at his age. What about you?”
“Oh, I’m ready to shove one of the fireplace andirons up Ulfr’s arse, though I’m pretty sure it’s worthless against such a tight fit. I have a good mind to put him in one of my books as a villain, but he’s not really that interesting.”
Ori smiled and put an arm around Bilbo and hugged him.
“I’m fine, Ori,” Bilbo said tiredly, “but I may need your and Dwalin’s help with Thorin later on.”
“We’re here if you need us, and we’ll be out of the way, if you don’t,” Ori promised.
“Thank you so much,” said Bilbo. “I think I’ll see if Dori needs any last minute help.”
Bilbo went into the kitchen and Ori drifted toward the younger set gathered at the fireplace. None of them looked particularly merry, but Buer looked stunned and sad.
“Is he really always like that?” Buer asked Arne. “Because, I don’t know if I can go back with him if he is. Yes, he’s been kind to me, but he’s so shut out from people who aren’t just like him. I mean, I have lots of friends who aren’t dwarf. And the Durins… without them, my family would still be slinking around in the back alleys, scrounging for food.”
“I-I shouldn’t say s-so about Adad,” Arne said, “b-but, he’s n-not the b-best d-dwarf in Arda. I d-don’t think he’s b-bad, just very l-limited. If it h-helps, b-being with you h-has really i-improved him.”
“That doesn’t sound encouraging,” said Buer.
“I-I’m more enc-couraged b-because of you than I- I’ve ever been.”
Buer laughed a little, and shook his head.
Ori frowned to himself. Arne’s westron had been steadily improving. To hear him stutter on nearly every second word, meant Arne was more upset than he was letting on.
Time dragged, Galadriel and Sigrid pressed Dori to go and rest on her bed. Dori capitulated when Balin took her arm and led her out.
Gridr, Binni, Margr and Vi vanished into the kitchen. Ori went out to the patio again and hugged Fanny’s left leg. The oliphaunt laid her trunk about his shoulders and made comforting noises.
“I know Thorin could throw Ulfr’s head off the mountain, but I’d rather Ulfr learned something and then he’d be a better king.”

Fanny snuffled and patted his head.

“Exactly. Ulfr needs to actually think about what he’s doing. He needs to think like a king. He’s just acting like people are after his chemical formulas. Aragorn doesn’t want his chemical things. He wants to be on amicable terms with Ulfr, so both their peoples can prosper. If Ulfr used his chemical knowledge to create something that would alert people to a secret threat, then it should be used to protect everyone. Aragorn would just thank Ulfr.”

Fanny rumbled thoughtfully, then moved and lowered her head to look at Ori. Ori looked deep into her wise eye. He sighed.

“I’m over-thinking things again, aren’t I?” Ori mumbled. Fanny made a noise that sounded like a chuckle. Ori hugged her trunk and went back inside.

“Ori,” Cemnesta met him in the breakfast parlor. “Are you alright?”

Ori grinned up at the elf. “I’m fine. I just had a talk with Fanny.”

Cemnesta’s eyebrows flew upward.

“And what did Fanny advise?”

“I’m over-thinking everything again.”

“Fanny is very wise.” Cemnesta chuckled and escorted Ori back to the sitting room. Here Galadriel and Celeborn were laying out a tea service on the dining table with Mr. Wandi’s help. Gridr and Vi brought out food. Ori didn’t feel too hungry, but he did need a cup of tea.

When the monarchs returned, Dori admonished them from the kitchen door.

“You have ten minutes to compose yourselves before I start dishing up.”

They gathered in the sitting area, steeped in heavy silence.

The tension was broken by Hild, who said, “Thorin, that’s not a treasury. That’s dragon bait.”

“It’s horrible,” Arivett added, her arms clenched around one of Eomer’s. The man looked to Bard, who closed his eyes and shook his head, taking Thranduil’s hand.

“Tha’ was insane,” said Ulfr, clearly shaken. “Tha’s no’ righ’. Wha’ was he thinkin’?”

“He wasn’t,” Thorin said. “He worshipped a dragon’s egg, not Mahal. He shut out everything, shut out the world, and kept himself hidden in a vault with all his gold and jewels, and he would not part with a single coin. Meanwhile, there were dwarrow under this mountain starving.”

Ori murmured, “Things weren’t so great in Dale, either.”

“Aye,” said Dwalin, “Thror was so insular, so stuck in himself, it’s amazin’ his head didn’t come ou’ his arse.”

Thorin grimaced.

“Yes, thank you for that image, Dwalin.”

“Anytime.”

Ulfr glared at his own hands as if they offended him.

“An’ I suppose Mahal come down Himself t’ have tea with yeh an’ tell yeh all this?”

“Now that you mention it, yes,” said Thorin.

Kili nodded, “He liked the cake. He ate almost a whole one Himself.”

“My tummy hurt,” said Ori.

Ulfr stared at him.

“If Mahal ate th’ cake, why would yer belly ache?”

“Because He was using my body at the time,” said Ori. “Forgive me for saying so, your majesty, but you really need to read the dispatches King Thorin sends you, not just skim them. The world is remade. Dwarrow are part of the second music.”

“Fine! Bu’ wha’ does tha’ mean?”

“It means,” said Thorin, “that we shall take our place as equals to all the other races in the world, but to do so, we must be part of that world.”

Ori turned back to Ulfr.

“Your majesty,” he asked, “why did Mahal send your relations back as elves?”
“T’ torment me?”
“Besides that.”
“’Cause He though’ it was funny?”
“I’ll give you that one, too. But, besides that? Perhaps,” Ori said gently, “it was so you could start to understand that things have changed?”

Ulfr shifted his gaze to Buer, who sat off in the corner with Arne, the two of them happily demolishing a leftover cake from tea all on their own.

“Yeh may be ont’ somethin’ there,” Ulfr acknowledged.

“Finally!” Dori cried. “Dinner is ready! It’s time to eat something besides cake.”

“Yeh’ve certainly never taken advantage a’ tha’.”
“I’m not that kind of dwarf, your majesty,” said Buer. “Rather make my own way, though, I thank you for the opportunities you’ve given me.”

Ulfr stared, then grimaced.

“Aye, well, fuck all this, then. Go an’ eat. I’ll just wash up, an’ I’ll be down in a minute.”

Ulfr regarded Buer.

“Ulfr-speak meaning he needs to go away for a while and think about it.”

Everyone was still seating themselves when Ulfr came back. He was still frowning. Ori took his seat, then a thrill of something went through him. He looked across the table. Durin was seated beside Ulfr and, on Ulfr’s other side, sat Sunny. Sunny wore a fashionable hobbit gown of pink and Durin was in Durin blue. Ori shot a swift look at Thorin and Dori. Thorin looked amused, and Dori, serene. Bilbo’s eyes twinkled with delight and Balin was non-committal. Ori took his husband’s hand and Dwalin’s fingers closed comfortingly around Ori’s.

“Shall I dish up?” Dori asked Sunny primly.

“Oh, please do!” Sunny cried. “I’m so looking forward to tasting the lamb. I never thought to put Dinner was served. Dori, as usual, had cooked cavern mushrooms the same way as the meat and the elves were delighted. The lamb was served with roasted new potatoes, mashed yams, runner beans cooked in butter and sprinkled with almonds, and there were carrots baked in maple syrup.

Durin shoveled in a loaded fork and closed his eyes while chewing.

“Our Dori, yer a genius,” Durin rumbled around his mouthful.

Ulfur look a bit startled at the amount of food on Durin’s plate, then up at Durin again.

“No wonder yer such a size, lad."

Durin grinned.

“Ulfur, me lad, it’s time yeh an’ me have a wee chat.”

Ulfur looked annoyed until Durin pushed up his sleeves and thudded his forearms on the table, one right next to Ulfur. The mark of Durin, the reddish anvil, almost seemed to glow on Durin’s skin.

That mark had appeared every time Durin was reborn, the mark every newborn was checked for. Ulfur looked angry until his eyes fell on the mark, then Ulfur was as white as Thranduil’s hair. “What sort of chat did you have in mind, your majesty?” Ulfur managed to choke out.

“Bit of a guessin’ game. Let’s see how brigh’ yeh really are.”

Ulfur nodded. He looked a bit like a dwarfling who is in big trouble, can’t figure out why, exactly, and wonders what sort of hammer will fall.

“First off,” Durin said easily, “I don’ believe yeh’ve meet me lovely wife.”

Durin’s arm shot dangerously close to Ulfur’s head as Durin gestured to Sunny. Ulfur regarded Sunny like a scared rabbit.

“Hello,” Sunny greeted him, cheerily. “You should eat something before your dinner gets cold. You should never waste food, dear.”

Ulfur gulped and his eyes traveled back to Durin.

“Um….”

“So…laddie,” Durin said with emphasis. “What di’ yeh say makes a true dwarf? A beard?”

“Yes, and no,” said Ulfur, giving it some serious thought. “Other peoples have beards, it’s true. Though none take as much pride as we do in ours.”

Durin stroked his own beard, which put even Gloin’s to shame.

“So, th’ beard’s no’ th’ only thin’, eh?”

“No, no, though, it’s important, a’ course, ‘r Mahal wouldn’t’ve made sure we all had one, more’r less.”

Kili snorted.

“Yer no’ sorry, yeh wee shit,” said Durin. “Eat yer lamb. G’ on, Ulfur. Wha’ else make a dwarf?”

“There’s courage, fortitude, standin’ firm when all others turn back. There’s inventiveness, stubbornness. Good stomach f’r drink.” Ulfur looked a little ill. “Keepin’ yer oaths.”

“An’ no one else in Arda kin say they’re th’ same?”

“No one else kin say they’re built a’ mountains, yer majesty.”

“Aye, tha’s true,” Durin conceded. “Bu’ many kin say they’ve heads made a’ such. Now, courage. Our Bard there stood firm an’ fought f’r his folk under what’s-’is-ass an’ ended up in th’ lock up f’r it, bu’ he kept on fightin’. That’s courageous. Our Glorfy there took on a few a’ em bad maiar balrog thingies. Can’t say he ain’t go’ fortitude an’ standin’ firmness. Wee Tilda there, she’s willful ‘r our Brur’d never star’ed trainin’ her up. An’ she’s jus’ a wee lass. There’s yer stubbornness. Our Bilbo there, taugh’ himself t’ read khuzdul, an’ our Frodo there, kin hold his own wi’ our scholars an’ his khuzdul’s all bu’ fluent. There’s yer inventiveness. We all know our Thranduil there kin hold his drink, an’ be’er than his own folk when it comes t’ th’ lichen whisky, even if it’s only jus’.”

Thranduil had the grace to blush, but he looked amused. Wandi, Cemnesta, and Legolas stifled snickers. Galadriel and Celeborn had their napkins pressed to their mouths, Durin pinned Ulfr with a fiery gaze.
“An’ our Thorin keeps his oaths.”
Ulfr shrank back.
Durin leaned a little closer. “Now gettin’ t’ th’ beards. Does our Bilbo have a beard?”
“N-no, your majesty.”
“Do our Rhonda and our Linda have beards?”
Elrond and Lindir looked resigned at their dwarf nicknames. Ulfr was beyond commenting other than,
“No, your majesty.”
“Does our Thrany have a beard? Beggin’ yer pardon, our Thranduil. ‘Thrany’s’ jus’ f’r our Dori.”
Thranduil raised his wine glass in salute.
Durin looked all the way down on Ulfr.
“Does he?”
“No, yer majesty.”
“Our Bard has a beard,” put in Sunny. “Ooo, it’s rather nice, isn’t it. I want to touch it, if you don’t mind, Bard?”
It didn’t signify either way, apparently, because she was out of her seat and fondling his whiskers before he could reply.
“Oooo, that’s lovely,” said Sunny. “It’s a different texture, so smooth, but quite nice. No wonder your husband’s always running his fingers through it during… running his fingers through it.”
“Thank you, Queen Sunny,” said Bard, red-faced as his children giggled.
“Yeh should grow it out a bit more, our Bard,” Durin advised. “Suits yeh.”
“Thank you, your majesty,” said Bard. Now he was tomato-colored and growing darker.
“And the hair, too,” added Sunny as she sat down again, nodding. Thranduil smiled in agreement, but his cheeks had a pink glow.
“Aye,” Durin agreed. “Back t’ th’ topic at hand, our Ulfr. Sigrid don’t have a beard. Who cares? Our Dori raised her and she knows our ways as any dam could. She’s as bonnie a lass as yeh’ll ever see. Our Tauriel don’t have a beard, an’ she’s bonnie, too, an’ as fine a soldier as any dwarrow. Our wee Ki, our Tauri, congratulations.”
“Thank you, Udadel,” said Kili, beaming.
“Thank you, your majesty,” said Tauriel. She bowed as well as she was able sitting down.
“None a’ tha’, lass, yer supposed t’ be eaten f’r two. Bash on with it. So, wha’ is it gonna be?”
“Ori says it’s going to be a dwelf,” said Kili.
A twinkle lit Durin’s eyes.
“No’ a dwentflin’?”
“Neither of us wants to have sex with a tree, Udadel,” said Kili.
“No matter what anyone says about tree shaggers,” Tauriel added with a snicker.
“Wise decision,” said Durin. “Splinters.”
Sunny threw in, “He still won’t tell me how he knows that.”
“Our Buer,” Durin called.
Buer, who was just now understanding who shared this table, swallowed and stammered, “Y-your majesty?”
“Yer beard’s just as good as our Ulfr’s, yeh ken? Jus’ as singed at th’ edge. Mebbe yeh could help ’im keep it tha’ way, if yeh would. As a favor.”
“A very great favor,” said Sunny. She nodded as she put more food on Ulfr’s plate. She looked up at Buer with a wink. “There’s xocolātl and ginger cookies in it for you, if you do.”
“Those are my favorites!” he exclaimed, then clapped his hand over his mouth and blushed as red as Bard.
“Yes,” said Sunny with a giggle. “I know. You really have to stop eating them in bed, dear. You’ll get ants.”
“Yes, your majesty.”
“Oh, call me Sunny, everybody does. Love the sock thing, by the way, even though I don’t wear them myself.”

Buer seemed to reflect, then looked over at Ulfr, then said slowly, “Sir, I have friends all over this mountain and Dale, dwarrow, men, and elves and now hobbits. They have all been very good to me. If it wasn’t for them and King Thorin’s family, I wouldn’t be able to do all I’ve done. Mostly, what they do is feed me, otherwise, I’d have probably starved. Maybe history has it that men and elves are mean to dwarrow, but I’ve never found them so. I’ve only found good people.”

“That’s because you help everyone with your inventions,” Ori told him.

Durin looked down at Ulfr and shook his head. Ulfr seemed to stop breathing for a moment. Durin sighed.

“Be kind, our Ulfr. If yer a guid lad, I’ll see wha’ Da kin do about yer dumb-arse relations. Oi, yer Zaris’s an inch from knockin’ ‘em all brainless, an’ she’s a lass who kin do it, too.”

“Elves are always cruel t’ dwarrow with no reason,” Ulfr grumped.

“Laddie,” Durin said. “I think th’ sack a’ Doriath’s a damn good reason. An’ Thror cheated our Thranduil here.”

“King Durin, Doriath was long ago,” Thranduil said, gravely. “And King Thorin delivered the goods ordered by me in Thror’s time. I bear no malice toward any dwarrow.” Thranduil gave a self-deprecating smile. “Indeed, King Thorin and his family assisted me in…taking the stick out of my ass months ago. I am indebted to them for my new, lovely family.” Thranduil took Bard’s hand and raised it to his lips. Legolas, his brothers, Tauriel and the Bardlings all giggled.

“An’ yer Legs, an’ ours, is makin’ our wee Gimmers ever so happy,” Gridr chimed in. Gloon expanded with pride and reached up to pat Legolas on the head.

“He’s a good lad.”

“Thank you, Da,” Legolas said with a blush.

“Sigrid will be our High Queen, Ulfr,” Fili struck in with a glare worthy of his grandmother. “If you choose to withhold your oath of loyalty at my coronation, keep in mind what happened to Prince Frerin.”

“Our current king looks healthy enough, yer highness,” Ulfr sulked. “I’ll likely be dead a’fore yer king.” “Be careful what you ask for, Ulfr,” said Thorin idly, as he helped Frodo to more yams.

“The universe has a way of giving it to you.”

Ulfr gulped and glanced sideways first at Durin, then at Sunny.

“I ain’t got anythin’ ’gainst hobbits.”

Bilbo raised a brow at Ulfr.

“This hobbit is tired of you brow-beating his husband and upsetting his faunts.”

Ulfr folded his arms and sat back in his chair. Ori was reminded of a badger badly in need of a nap.

“I’m feelin’ mighty attacked righ’ now,” Ulfr snapped.

Sunny patted his forearm.

“That’s because you’ve been rude and naughty and you’re being spanked for it. You can sulk all you want, pet, but the plain truth is you’re wrong, you know it, and things will be just fine after you own it and behave yourself like a proper dwarf should.”

Ulfr stayed silent. Mistress Dazla came in with a large, empty tray. The younger set rose and piled up plates and serving dishes on the tray. Ori watched as Ulfr observed the group of youngsters, dwarrow, elves, and men, assisted by two very young hobbits clear the table and help Mistress Dazla through with the dishes.

Miss Larit entered with a tray of dessert bowls which were placed at Dori’s elbow and the younger set put out several dishes, piled high with hard sauce, on the table. Mistress Dazla came in, beaming at them all over a big pudding so thick with fruit it was almost black and set in a pool of grain whisky.

“Ooo,” cried Frodo. “Plum pudding!”

“It’s getting to that time of year, wee one,” Mistress Dazla laughed.
“It’s not on fire,” Wee Sam observed. Durin chuckled and snapped his fingers at the pudding. Blue flames danced over the pudding making the younger set cheer.

Ori grinned as his piece was handed to him. A tiny blue flame still wavered on it. He doused it with a hearty serving of hard sauce on top.

Thranduil looked quizzically at the dessert,

“Won’t the flames make it too hot to eat?”

Tilda climbed into Thranduil’s lap and added a huge lump of hard sauce, then fed her adanana a spoonful.

“Isn’t it good?” she enthused. Thranduil looked surprised, then his expression melted into avarice.

“Yes, my monster child, excellent. Now go and eat your own as I have no intention of sharing!”

The dessert was devoured. Frodo and Sam leaned over their chairs and fed lumps of hard sauce to the wargs. Dwalin held his bowl out to Killer, who licked it with enthusiasm.

The ravens gathered in the middle of the table, squabbling over the leftover bits of fruit in the serving dish. Ori had Kihshassa in his lap as she ate bits of fruit from his fingers. Legolas and Gimli had moved over and Gloin perched one on each knee. Gridr and Galadriel teased them. Bard had his arm across the back of Thranduil’s chair and talked to Fili. Kili sat on Tauriel’s lap and chattered with Bain, Cemnesta, and Ahkn. Hild and Aris talked with Tilda as she leaned against Hild, who played with her hair with Mr. Wandi’s assistance. Arivett and Eowyn giggled together while Boromir and Gheir sympathized with Eomer. Dori looked perfectly pleased with the dinner and Balin surveyed the company with a calculated look.

Ulfr picked at his dessert. Ori noticed Frodo watching the Ironfist king intently.

“King Ulfr?” the faunt piped up.

Ulfr turned,

“Aye, yeh gonna scold me, too, wee one?”

Ori saw Bilbo take a breath but Frodo was in no need of assistance.

“No, I’m just feeling very sorry for you.”

“Yes,” Ulfr replied.

“Maybe you should pray to Mahal.”

“I don’t stop folk scoldin’?”

“No, to fix your eyes,” Frodo replied with perfect gravity. Everyone fell silent. Ulfr stared at Frodo.

“Wha’s wrong with me eyes, laddie?”

“When you sit here with us, all you see are separate races, who shouldn’t talk to or help each other. While everyone else here sees family.”

Ulfr looked around the table.

Durin sat back with a grin.

“So, King Ulfr, wha’s d’ yer dwarf eyes see now?”

Ulfr sunk into himself. He looked utterly defeated and sad.

“I see tha’ Mahal needs t’ fix me eyes.”

“Yes,” said Frodo. He nodded wisely. “See, you’re not such a bad fellow, and if you could see, you wouldn’t be such a dumdemel.”

Thorin groaned and Bilbo bit his lip. Ori giggled. The other monarchs just looked mystified.

“Lad, wha’s a dumdemel?” Ulfr asked. “Is it a hobbit thin’?”

“No, it’s khuzdul,” said Frodo. “Sort of. It means ‘dumdum of all dumdums’.”

Ulfr snorted, then he laughed and snorted some more.

Chat raised his tankard to Frodo, and Snis and Sni did the same.

“That’s brilliant, me lad,” said Chat.

“Brilliant,” Snis and Sni echoed.

Wee Sam looked proud.

“’Course it is!”

Durin rose and gave Sunny his hand.

“Well, me laddies and lassies, it’s bein’ a pleasure sittin’ wi’ yeh all. Our Dori, Mistress Dazla!”
Durin’s voice rose and the housekeeper came to the kitchen door and all of her team peeked out around her.

“Mos’ delicious meal we’ve had in Arda f’r ages, ain’t tha’ righ’, me sunshine?”

“Oh wonderful!” Sunny enthused. “Dear Dazla, it’s so nice you’ve inherited my touch with pastry. Just lovely! Thank all of you. You’ve all done very well!” She turned to the people at the table. “Now, off you go to your beds! The party starts at midnight and I’ve things to do! Off you go!”

Sunny flapped her hands at them all. She smiled at her husband. “Dearest, would you please?”

Durin chuckled, bussed her cheek, and clapped his hands like thunder.

Durin and Sunny were gone.

The table was cleared and its wood shone.

Mistress Dazla gasped and her team turned and squeals and shouts of delight sounded. Mistress Dazla burst out laughing.

“Ooo!” Miss Larit poked her head through again. “He’s washed all the dishes, put them away, and all the leftovers are packed up in the larder!”

Thorin smiled then bowed low.

“Udadel, Umadel, thank you both so much. It has been our honor to host you in our home!”

“For thank you,” everyone echoed and bowed. The men and elves looked at each other, realized what they’d done and giggled.

“You all heard, Umadel,” said Thorin and looked at the youngsters. “Off to bed. We begin again in the crypts at midnight.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And now… Party time! Get some drinks and snacks this is a good long chapter. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel!
Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

They started down to the crypts to make sure they were ready by the dot of midnight. Which was to say, they went much earlier, because Thorin had expressly invited everybody, every dwarf in Dale as well as under the mountain, and he wanted to be there to greet them as they arrived.

The dancers of the pleasure guild dressed in filmy robes, their hair and beards hung loose, unbraided, with only a few strands of mithril mixed in, sparkling as they whisked and pranced about the crypts.

Thorin dressed as Durin, in the traditional battle dress uniform. His kilt had been embellished with sapphires and slender mithril chains that caught the light whenever he moved. His hair and beard were loose and flowed down his back and chest. His eyelids had been lined in dark blue charcoal and he was merry. Orcrist sat across his back, and the gems on his crown caught the light and flashed like stars. Ori stared. He could almost believe that this was the first dwarf of Mahal’s Hands. Thorin was king and he loved his people. All his people, he did not care if they weren’t Longbeards. Durin was the first, but he wasn’t the only dwarf to come from Mahal’s anvil.

The badgers, especially, were welcomed. Most wore their school uniforms, as these were their best clothes, and they were nearly as excited to be up in the middle of the night as they were to be here under the mountain. They clustered about the king, chattering and squealing as he laughed, ruffled their hair, and knelt for any who wanted hugs.

“Lots a’ badgers were afraid t’ come here at first,” Caris confided in Thorin, “They’re scared a’ ghosts and all tha’, but it’s not like we have to come down here two at a time by ourselves. With all these dwarrow, the ghosts are probably more scared than us!”

“And with better reason,” Thorin agreed with a laugh. “Remember, they were just like us once. If anything, they’re probably very happy to see us.”

Ori had plenty of time to roam through the passageways between the tombs, teased by the dancers as he wielded his graphite wand and notebook.

He glanced over at Freris’ tomb and was brought up short by Teyan. She made making a funny face at him from among the statues.

He stuck out his own tongue for good measure, and she ran off giggling.

As midnight approached, Thorin boosted himself up onto the great anvil, a feat in itself.

Ori wondered how Thror had managed it as he aged. He was weakened by the arkenstone, for one thing, and an aged dwarf wasn’t quite ‘bendy’ enough to climb it. Dwalin told him that Durin’s Day had not been observed in this manner for decades.

Bilbo looked up at Thorin and laughed. Bilbo wore the leaf crown Thorin had given him on his birthday. Zindis had cunningly dressed Bilbo in copper-colored trousers, a cream shirt embroidered with gold thread, and his braces were copper and gold mesh, studded with rubies.

Dwalin leaned down at the anvil’s base and cupped his hands. Bilbo put his foot there, and Dwalin tossed him up into Thorin’s arms.

They all heard Bilbo quite clearly when he grumbled, “Have dwarrow never heard of ladders?”
Thorin laughed as he set Bilbo on the edge of the anvil and sat down beside him.

“At least you didn’t choose to wear a gown, ghivasha.”

“Certainly not! At this height, the entire kingdom would be looking up at my bloomers!”

Ori thought it was obvious that the entire kingdom had just looked up Thorin’s kilt.

Even down in the crypt, they heard all the bells of the mountain erupt to announce midnight.

“Happy Durin’s Day!” they roared over and over, bashed foreheads, and wished each other well.

Then, as the last of peals faded, an expectant silence rolled over the crowd, and the dwarrow turned to the anvil.

“I am Durin!” Thorin announced at battle pitch, “Mahal made me from His forge on this day!”

The assembled dwarrow shouted, “All Hail Mahal, and his Seven Stars Shining Bright!”

A great cheer rose up. When it faded, Thorin continued.

“Let my brothers step forth and give me their oaths!”

Thorin raised a beckoning hand.

The musicians commenced a familiar tune.

Dwarrow standing for the six other original ‘kings’ of dwarrow appeared at the far end of the passage, each carrying a keg on one shoulder and a war axe on the other. Only the nimblest soldiers were allowed to do this because they had to dance over the axes, as Dwalin had done at the old royal residence all those months ago.

They marched forward, each in the traditional battledress of their clan.

Ori recognized Aris, Chat, Floris, Mavey, Tay, and after him, in the tartan of the Firebeards, marched Givris.

That most elves present didn’t look offended, spoke to the general ignorance of the dwarves’ traditions outside the dwarven world. Thranduil obviously recognized it, and kept his face so blank, Ori thought Nori would be proud. Celeborn and Galadriel went off a little ways to examine some sculpture. Elrond looked everywhere but at Givris, though Ori suspected that had to do with their disastrous history. The younger elves merely looked curious.

One at a time, as the ‘king’ dancers approached the anvil, they bowed to Thorin and placed their axes on the floor, so that all six together made a star. Then, in a show of daring, all six ‘kings’ danced over the axes at once.

They still bore the kegs on their shoulders.

Durin appeared sitting next to Ori on the balcony.

“How tha’s rich,” said Durin.

“What is?” Ori asked. He never took his eyes off the dance.

“Tha’ didn’t start out as a dance.”

“No?”

“No, tha’ was me gettin’ roarin’ drunk, slammin’ a full keg a’ Sunny’s best over me head. Go’ me head good an’ stuck, so I had t’ drink mesel’ blind so as no’ t’ drown, an’ staggered around, bumpin’ int’ everythin’, trippin’ over me own weapons an’ finally passin’ out. Oi, she was angry. I slep’ on me worktable in me forge f’r two weeks. Them hobbits kin hold a grudge.”

“She was angry because you wasted ale?”

“No’ a drop went t’ waste. She was mad ‘cause I didn’t share.”

Ori stopped then, and turned to him.

“Is that why, when you’ve wronged someone, you go to their house on Durin’s Day and have a drink with them?”

“Aye, bu’ drinkin’ wi’ hobbits don’ usually devolve int’ brawls.”

Sunny appeared on Ori’s other side, munching a gingersnap, with a plate of them in her lap. She wore a buttercup spattered dress of cream, girdled with a copper velvet sash and there were red ribbons in her curls.

“Have a gingersnap, our Ori. Can’t draw on an empty stomach. You’ll be doodling pictures of food in your margins.”

“Oh, thank you. How are you keeping, Sunny?”

“Very well, thanks. And you?”
“I’m very happy to be here.”

“Oi,” said Durin over Ori’s head, “yeh didn’t ask me how I was keepin’?”

“You had ten gingersnaps before we left the Halls,” said Sunny primly. “I can see you’re in perfect health.”

As the dance wound toward the end, one by one the dwarf kings picked up their axe, struck the haft on the ground and held it up to the high king in salute. Thorin-as-Durin acknowledged each with a smile and a nod, until finally the floor was cleared.

Under Miss Sifian’s direction, a chorus of young students from Dale and under the mountain stepped forth and bowed to ‘Durin’ and his queen. Then they sang the Hymn to Mahal, in khuzdul. Hathor’s fawns, much taller than the rest, stood in the back row, with faunts and badgerlings in the front.

Sunny giggled.

“As long as he keeps his mouth shut,” said Ori. “Oh! He’s remembered and is nodding in time.”

Durin snickered.

“Half a’ me wishes he’d finish gettin’ his head out a’ his arse, th’ other half jus’ finds him fun t’ watch.”

“Maybe Buer will help him…er, speed up,” said Ori.

Durin cleared his throat and Sunny cackled maniacally.

“I don’t know, darling,” said Sunny. She batted her eyelashes. “What do you think?”

Ori looked back and forth between them.

“That was what Mahal designed Buer for, wasn’t it,” he said.

“No fair guessin’,;” said Mahal.

Ori giggled and elbowed Durin.

“Thank you for showing up at dinner earlier, I mean, last night. Ulfr needed a talking to and Thorin needed some encouragement.”

“We did get dinner ou’ a’ it,” Durin pointed out. “Love, why didn’t we think a’ lightin’ th’ puddin’ on fire?”

“Don’t ask me,” said Sunny. “When I lit the raisins on fire, you looked at me like I’d tossed my foot fuzz.”

“Why would you light raisins on fire?” Ori asked.

“Ask Bilbo,” she said coyly.

“So yeh didn’t mind I invited mesel’ t’ dinner?” Durin asked Ori.

“No, you’re always welcome.”

“Aye? Really? I would’ve though’ yeh’d be happy t’ see th’ back a’ me.”

“Well, you are a pain in the arse, but you’re my favorite pain in the arse.”

“Aw, didn’t know yeh cared.”

Sunny said, “Ori, you’ll have to tell him he’s a pain more often. We want him to feel needed.” Something occurred to Ori then, something that made his heart sink.

“Wait. Durin, the Last Battle happened.”

“Aye.”

“Aren’t you supposed to be king?”

“No need righ’ now, lad. Look a’ Thorin down there, happy as Dain in pig shit. Cleans up nice, too. Bloody shithed looks prettier than me! I go’ centuries before I go’ t’ worry abou’ tha’.”

“Really?”

“Unless he does somethin’ stupid, li’e gettin’ all tense an’ paranoid again. Yeh’ve all spent th’ past months trainin’ him out’va tha’. Me da made Thorin t’ be jus’ li’e he is now. Jus’ li’e he made yeh t’ be a sassy li’le sprat.”

“A sassy little sprat?” Ori echoed, then frowned. “What’s a sprat?”

Sunny shot her husband a look.

“What?” Ori squawked. “Durin!”
“Still don’ wan’ me goin’ away?” Durin teased.
“I’d tell you to go to Mordor, but I don’t know how you feel about gardening.”
Sunny nodded.
“They’ll have to come up with a new name for that patch of ground. It’s quite green now, and not just because it’s covered in orc snot.”
Ori groaned.
“That’s an image I’ll never get out of my head.”
As the last dulcet tones drifted into silence, the floor before the anvil was emptied. Stone and machinery moved beneath the middle of the floor and then, from pinpoints of light, Durin’s vision at Kheled-zaram burst forth as a giant crown and stars.
Ori blinked in amazement. He hadn’t expected this, nor had Dwalin mentioned it when he explained to Ori how the ceremony went. Ori found his husband in the crowd, still at his post at the foot of the anvil.
The big so-and-so grinned up at him in triumph.
Ori blew him a kiss, even as he blinked the spots from his eyes.
Thorin leapt to the floor and held out his arms. The crowd gasped as Bilbo laughed in delight, and sprang from the anvil. Thorin caught him, though Dwalin and Arb were there to make sure of it.
A slightly different tune struck up, less solemn and more sprightly, and in the empty circle of the floor, Thorin and Bilbo danced. In a moment, others joined in and soon the floor was covered in movement.
“Nice,” said Durin.
“Go on, our Ori,” Sunny encouraged. “You should be down there dancing, even if your buffalo is standing guard.”
“Aye,” said Durin as Ori bowed and headed for the stairs. “Mebbe yeh kin do the roscobal hop.”
At the end of the dance, they all cheered once more. New music started soft and far more solemn than the last.
Thorin stood at the foot of the anvil with Bilbo on his arm, and signaled.
Machinery hummed and the anvil slowly moved backward to reveal a round passage into the earth, spiraling down and down the steep walls. As Ori took his place with the family, he saw endless rows of phosphorous lamps swirling to barely-there dots of light in the gloom.
There was a lift, accessed through a false-crypt to the side of the anvil, but that was for the elders, the youngest badgers, the expecting, and the infirm, with room for a few pleasure guild dancers to accompany them. Everyone else walked. It was a wide enough path down, though without rails. Dancers twirled about the opening. Above and below the main path were smaller ledges where the dancers hopped in time with the music.
Thorin led the way. He kept Bilbo, Frodo and Wee Sam between himself and the wall, and for good reason. Ori noticed that the men among them looked nervous, and so did many of the elves, though they were used playing in the branches of tall trees.
Ori glanced about. Arivett had Eomer well in hand. The young horse lord’s face told of his discomfort. Ori saw Eowyn and Theoden attempting to be brave, so he went back to them.
“Here, I’ll walk on the outside,” he offered.
“Thank you,” said Theoden. “How embarrassing. I’m a king, for Eorl’s sake!”
“Yes,” said Ori, “but you aren’t a dwarf.”
“How do you handle this?”
“Handle what?”
“The possibility of falling to your death!”
“We all end up in the stone eventually. At least this way, I would be falling into the stone’s embrace.”
It was a long journey down to Durin’s Forge, an ancient lava tube sealed behind two iron blast doors five feet thick and twenty feet square. Durin’s crown and anvil and his seven stars were chased in endless, interlocking patterns across the surface. The rune of Durin sat in raised mithril letters in the middle of each door.
“You don’t think those doors will actually contain erupting lava?” Elrond asked as he approached.
“No,” said Thorin, “but the racket they make as they fly up the passage will certainly let us know there’s a problem.”
“Oh,” said Elrond.
“Better reseal your mask,” said Thorin.
“Yes, of course.”
The blast doors did sport handles, but they were purely ornamental and ten feet from the ground.
The dancers gathered and took up the drums piled off to the side and began a solemn beat, like the echo of a heart beat, the heart beat of the mountain and earth.
Thorin gave the order, Sindris worked the lever and hidden machinery popped and clanged in the walls. Slowly, the doors parted. Beyond stood a great face of rock, empty, but for a vast, rough opening. This was the tube down to the lava.
The men and elves stepped back a pace as the heat slammed into them.
To dwarrow, the heat was soothing, but it was punishing for the others, even though the tube went on for many miles before it reached the blood of the mountain. Ori saw that tube descended quickly into the depths. He could feel the churning lava, but he couldn’t even see a glow from it.
The dancers ran forward, spinning and laughing. Dori led the way as they flitted about the room.
A phalanx of soldiers brought forward a large, ornate box and Thorin opened it, lifted out his votive offering to Mahal.
The king’s offering differed from all others. Ori had heard Thorin and Fili discussing it, and he knew they had worked together, forging an ornate gold and mithril crown. Kili chased in the designs and Dis bejeweled it.
“In the name of Durin,” Thorin shouted, so everyone could hear him, “our first and eternal king.”
He dropped the crown into the tube and it instantly vanished from sight. The dancers sang out Durin’s name and tossed gold dust on each who made an offering.
Bilbo came forward, wearing a breathing mask and holding up a circle of gold with an irregular surface, dotted with jet.
Thorin called out, “In the name of Sunflower, our first and eternal queen.”
As Bilbo dropped the circle into the tube, Ori realized it represented a xocolātl chunk cookie. The dancers called to the queen.
Bilbo retreated back up the passage and the king beckoned Frodo.
“Quickly, mizimith.”
He picked up Frodo, who muttered out the offering prayer under his breathing mask as he tossed his tin animal into Durin’s Forge. Then Thorin sent him back up the passage with Fuhr’nk. He did the same with Sam and Tilda, keeping their time near the heat as brief as possible.
Dori broke away from the dancers and went to Balin’s side and together they stepped forward.
They each held a tiny gold circle with a small bump near one end.
Ori realized they actually represented babies, though he hoped the men and elves didn’t get the wrong idea.
“For Durin and Sunny when they return,” said Dori. “May their union be fruitful.”
Sigrid gave her offering alongside Fili, and Tauriel with Kili. So all the Longbeards and their partners followed about the opening and did the same: Dis with Jani, Oin with Binni, Bujni with Dipfa, Gloin with Gridr, Gimli with Legolas, who looked nervous approaching the open tube, as if he was unsure that Durin might not be offended and decide Legolas was part of the offering, too.
Ori heard Durin mutter in his head, “An’ wha’ th’ fuck would Da do with an elf, I ask yeh?”
Ori sealed his mouth absolutely shut. He was afraid if he opened it, he’d burst into the most profound case of giggles Arda had ever seen. Besides, he hadn’t given his offering yet.
Dwalin caught his eye and winked, holding up their joint offering in invitation.
Ori quickly put away his sketchbook and graphite wand and stepped forward with Dwalin.
“All for the glory of Durin,” they said in unison.
Down went the manacles that had bound Balin to his desk. Down went the sword Ori had used to smack Balin across the arse. Dwalin had done a great job polishing and sharpening that.

Ori heard the laughter of the king and queen echo up the tube.

They stepped back and Bofur stepped forward to offer his pick-shaped pieces of tin. Ori saw a few gold coins flash after them and was happy Nori chose to participate, even if he couldn’t be seen. Bombur and Erda, with their children, gave tin votives shaped like pots and pans, and Bifur a fully jointed and painted toy horse.

Vi and Margr brought forth a pie.
“Here Yeh go, Dearie,” Vi shouted down the tube as they released it.
“It’s a nice meat pie, in case Yeh feel peckish,” Margr added.

Thorin raised a brow at them, though he looked quite pleased.
“Aye, well,” said Vi, “it’s th ‘mouth’ a’ th’ lava tube, ain’t it.”
“And it is an excellent pie,” Glorfindel remarked through his mask.

Thranduil and Bard approached. Ori glanced over at the crowd to see if he could spy Ulfr, but the Ironfist king was conspicuously absent.

Thranduil dropped in a bottle of fine Dorwinion wine. Bard sent a packet of papers. Ori thought it looked like a letter. He made a note to be nosy about that when they returned to Fundin House.

Once the king’s extended household had given their tokens, a long line of dwarves from Erebor and Dale, their guests, family and friends, stepped forward to give theirs, some alone, some in family groups. Those who lacked an offering of their own took one from the huge basket of tin shapes Gridr had worked with the help of Bujni, Dis, and anyone else among the Durins who had a moment to pitch in. Zark and Kadis and their grown children gave medallions of mithril. Tin and Ondr came forward with their grand badgers and old Master Arim and dropped in a fine pewter tankard.

Nadaris and her family gave rosettes worked from red silk cord, since Nadaris had joined the trimmings division of the tailors’ guild. Nadaris watched the items go, and gave a satisfied nod.

Soon there were crowds all around the opening casting in offerings. Out of the corner of his eye, Ori saw Wandi and Cemnesta go to the edge and bow, but he couldn’t hear what they said. Galadriel and Celeborn did as well, and Galadriel stretched her hands out and Ori saw a flicker of blue light.

It was many hours until everyone who had wished to give an offering did so. Ori didn’t realize until they started back up the passage, the last to leave, that he was exhausted. He was incredibly hungry as well.

Dori, at least, rode in a chair borne by Dwalin’s soldiers. If Ori was this tired, he worried that Dori must be infinitely more so. His answer came back in the form of soft snoring from the chair. The soldiers moved far more quietly than usual as they hurried towards the lift. A dwarf warrior on tiptoe was an amazing sight.

Dawn dyed the sky above Erebor bright pink. The glass at the top of the mountain had been opened and the mirror caught the light and poured it down through the city and on the people as they reveled in the streets, wishing each other Happy Durin’s Day.

Ori saw Mistress Dazla and her daughters near the park and waved to them as the royal family made its way back to Fundin house.

Once home, Dwalin, Thorin, Aragorn, and Gimli took care of the ponies. Dori ordered everyone else inside and to get into sleepwear, then come for breakfast in the parlor.

The Durin family meals for the day had been planned and assembled the day before, since the staff of the royal residence had Durin’s Day off.

The royal kitchen would present the wedding feast tonight, and those chefs were hard at work. Breakfast smelled delicious, Ori thought as he came through in an old night shirt left over from Dwalin’s fatal attempt at the wash. He smoothed the soft faded pink shirt and his rumpled old cardigan, the one he had worn to his wedding. It was pilled with age but still plush, and cozy.

People slowly arrived in sleeping clothes, as Kili fried up the traditional turnovers made of ground goat, onions, and spices, along with turnovers stuffed with mushrooms and cheese, accompanied by pots of sour cream mixed with dill, and pots of hot sauce. Pitchers of apple juice and ale went to the table to wash it down. Thick porridge studded with dried fruits had been cogitating on the hob all night, and now Randibur and Bombur carried the huge pot into the breakfast parlor where awaited piles of bowls and spoons. Omi and Loli set out ewers of cream, pots of jellies and jams, and salt cellars while Erda and Binni made urns of tea.

Thorin and Bilbo arrived, Thorin in pale blue cotton trousers and Bilbo swathed in his wildly colored dressing gown.

“Where are the faunts?” Erda asked.

“We shoved some bread and jam into them and they fell asleep while we got them ready for bed.”

Bilbo chuckled. “I need more than that.”

Bofur came through in a night shirt of dark green tartan with tiny yellow stripes, with little pickaxes scattered over.

“Looks like a pajama party,” said Nori, who followed after.

He had stripped to his boxers, even though he had never put on finery that night to begin with. Thranduil, arrayed in his cotton pajamas with delicate blue lines, looked askance at the pattern of ferrets chasing one another across the mint green cloth.

“I’m not sure those count as ‘festive’,” said the king-father.

“I like ‘em,” said Nori. “We can’t all be wearin’ mattresses.”

Theoden and Theodred wandered in wearing plain white nightshirts and slippers. Theodred yawned.

“Thorin,” said Theoden, “I have a question regarding your battle dress down in the crypts.”

“Yes?” Thorin asked smoothly, with a glint in his eye. He poured out ale for the horse king and his son.

“Do dwarrow actually wear that little on the battlefield?”

“Not anymore,” said Thorin. “We generally wear armor now. We’ve grown rather attached to our bits.”

“So, at one time, dwarrow fought only in cloth?”

“No, of course not,” said Thorin. “We stripped down to nothing and fought.”

Theoden’s eyebrow shot up.

“Really?”

“Yes,” said Thorin. “If nothing else, the enemy got a good laugh before they were slaughtered.”

Balin chuckled.

“There’s more to it than tha’, laddie. Tell ‘im th’ rest.”

“It was a scare tactic, if it was an enemy we hadn’t met before,” said Thorin. “Imagine looking up the hill, expecting to see the usual soldiers charging down at you, and instead you’re beset by a horde of hairy, screaming boulders.”

Theoden laughed.

Arwen, in a sleeveless cream silk gown, and Aragorn in matching trousers and a sleeveless open shirt. He sat down while Arwen stuck her head into the kitchen and asked if they need their assistance. Gridr shooed her out.

Bard and the Bardlings dragged in, Bard clad only in cotton trousers of pale green with silver ferns scatter over them. Sigrid wore a long, opaque. Durin blue gown, with no sleeves, and Bard could say nothing, because Thranduil had commissioned it for her from Dipfa. Tilda cuddled in her Da’s arms in a orange cotton jumpsuit with feet. Bain tagged after, yawning cavernously. The buttons on the placket of his blue night shirt did not all sit in the correct holes.

Thranduil looked amused and prepared a large mug of tea for Bard. Bard plumped down, and kissed Thranduil’s cheek. Thranduil took Tilda and put the mug in front of Bard who moaned and took it gratefully.

Shrieks of delight erupted as Dwalin strolled in clad in nothing but his old pink drawers.

Theoden whistled wolfishly.

“Dwalin, you look wonderful in pink!” Bilbo praised. He turned to Thorin. “You’re coloring is close to Dwalin’s, you could wear pink.”

“Pink,” announced Dori as she swept through in a cloud of purple, “is not a Durin color, or so I have been informed.”
Thorin smirked at Dori.
“Well, if my husband likes it…”
“Fickle wretch,” Dori spat.

Celeborn, Galadriel and the Rivendell elves arrived dressed alike in long, white sleepwear.
Glorfindel followed the Sisters, all clad in matching sleepwear of bright blue and large white spots.

Dis and Jani came in shortly after. Dis wore what Ori thought was a brief cotton nightshirt, cream colored and covered in pink and red lip prints, until Jani followed her, clad in only the matching trousers.

“These are nice,” Gridr admired.
Dis grinned at Jani.
“They were a present. But someone can’t resist sharing.”
Jani fluttered her lashes.

Ori glanced over at the men. Bard and Theoden still looked everywhere but at the dams, while Theodred and Bain called out a greeting to the princess and her lover, as they came in, then shrugged and applied themselves to their breakfasts. Gimli, Legolas and the rest of the Groinuls wore variations of the same tartan pajamas. Legolas had adorned Romy with a tartan bow about the neck. Thus far the young warg had not eaten it.

Oin wore a long nightshirt with matching slippers and Binni wore a robe. Gloin’s suit featured attached feet of the same material.

Tilda and Gloin pointed at each other and shouted “Feet!”
Bujni looked down at his sleep clothing, then scribbled in his notebook, then looked down at his clothes again.
Ori had a feeling something vaguely scientific was in the offing. Thorin laughed, and Ori turned to see Frodo and Sam enter with Butter and Sugar, each warg adorned with a frilly mob cap with ribbons tied under their jowls.

“No so sleepy after all I see,” Thorin chuckled as Bilbo provided Frodo and Sam with turnovers. “Come here, my damlings,” Thorin beckoned them. Once the wargs sat beside him, Thorin used his pocket knife to cut slits in the caps for the wargs’ ears to stick out.

The faunts ate seven turnovers each. Tilda dragged Gloin off to slide down the long corridor in their slippery ‘foot’ pajamas. The younger set began making plans for sparring over the next few days.

“Bard,” said Ori quietly, “what did you sacrifice last night?”
“A letter to Mahal.”
“A letter?”
“Like I used to write to Father Frost when I was a kid.”
“You wrote to Father Frost to bring you toys,” Ori recalled.
“This was more of a ‘thank You’ note.” Bard looked around. “To tell the truth? I sometimes think of Father Frost and Mahal as the same…. person, being, thing. Big guy, big beard, big, booming laugh.”
“That makes sense,” said Ori. “You never do see the two of Them in the same place at the same time.”
“Besides, Father Frost makes toys in His workshop. It’s not that big a leap.”
“Did you ask for a toy boat?”
Bard biffed him lightly across the head.
“No. Besides, He already brought me one.”

All together, the company consumed every last bit of food, then everyone slept until at least ten bell.

Ori was just taking the last of the ginger cookies out of the oven when Dori came in, looking a little puffed as she had been out with the dancers again. Dain followed at her heels.

“He didn’t like ‘Balis’?” Dain asked.
“He said it sounded too much like ‘Ballast’.”
“Oh, aye, he migh’ve a point. Wha’ abou’ ‘Doris’?”
They heard a great crash, a squawk and a thud from the breakfast parlor and the three of them ran in to find Red Queen standing on the table. She shook her head, flinging shards everywhere, and she held Baluchistan to the surface of the table by a large talon on his neck.
Ori traced the shards back to the mica panes in the double doors.
“What in Mahal’s blessed name?” Dori demanded.
“This… this bezonian swooped and dove at us in a pathetic mating display!” Red Queen shrieked.
“M’ no’ bezonian, darlin’,” Baluchistan warbled. “I’m hun’rd percent pure raven love.”
“If we had not stopped you, the two of us would now be flattened against the side of this nest!”
Dain slapped his hand on his forehead.
“Blu! Yeh maniac!”
“We apologize for the destruction, Bearer,” said Red Queen, “but it was either the mica window or the solid door.”
“Should’ve gone f’r th’ door, sugar-baby, I li’e it rough,” Baluchistan burbled dreamily.
“We could peck you in the head,” she hissed, “but all that would happen is an escape of hot air.”
“Tha’s righ’, love! Threaten me wi’ a guid time.”
Red Queen looked up at Dain.
“He is quite mad. We have no idea what to do with him.”
Dain sighed.
“Let’s have ‘im.”
Red Queen stepped off Baluchistan’s neck and Dain gingerly picked him up.
“Blu, ‘re yeh hurt, lad?”
“Wounded! Wounded by th’ rejection a’ me melancholy birdie!”
“C’mon, yeh lovesick dope. We’ll check yeh over f’r broken wha’ ever.”
“Nothin’s broken bu’ me heart!”
Red Queen shook herself off and nodded to the assembled dwarrow.
“Excuse us, we need to go and clean all those black feathers out of our aerie.”
“Think a’ me as yeh pluck each one!” Baluchistan bleated as Dain carried him out.
Dori opened the remains of the door. Red Queen stalked forward and stopped to tap her beak against Dori’s cheek.
“Are you keeping up with your clenching exercises?”
“Of course,” said Dori with a bright smile and Red Queen flew away.
Ori fetched the broom and the dustpan, and they began to clean up.
“Oh, well,” said Dori. “The workers are coming soon to put in winter panes.”
“How will the ravens get around?”
“They’ll use inside passages,” said Dori. “Once it starts to snow, the ravens won’t be doing as much flying outside until the spring, beyond important deliveries.”
She considered the growing pile of debris.
“Shard? Splinter? Oh, I do hope Dain comes up with names soon. I know there’s time, but I’d like this settled.”
Ori cuddled up to Dori.
“Why don’t you let me finish this?” Ori asked. “Those cookies just came out and you could have some with tea.”
“With all these guests in the house, pet? I can’t justify that!”
“Dori, you’re pregnant and you’re the Bearer. I think you can justify a pot of tea. Or do I have to get my attack dwarf in here to sit on you?”
Dori giggled.
“Oh, all right. You’ve talked me into it. Shall I put out a cup for you as well?”
“You have to ask?”
“It’s a matter of form, pet.”
“Yes,” said Ori wryly, “form must be observed.”
Bilbo came in and looked at the shards then at Dori and Ori.
“I shan’t ask as I heard Red Queen and saw Dain with Blu. Ori, will you come with us?”
“Of course, Bilbo. Where are we going?”
“Back to the crypts for a few minutes. Thorin didn’t want to leave marriage offerings with the Durin’s Day ones. I think this is far more private to him.”
“Of course,” Ori replied immediately. He followed Dori through to the kitchen where he disposed of the rubbish, broom and pan.
“I’ll have tea for you when you get back, pet,” Dori called after him as he ran to join the group headed towards the front door.

Ori found the quiet of the crypts startling after he’d seen the cavern so filled with people. Of course, it was still filled with people, and though they were quiet here, no doubt they were partying it up in the Halls. Durin had promised Ori he would make sure they knew that today was the day.

The worshippers went first to the tomb of Freris. The usual figures of alabaster ringed the sepulcher, though the lid was snowflake obsidian, which Dwalin said had been her favorite. A bowl made of this stone already sat on the offering tray, but not a wreath. Ori looked up into the carved face of the dead princess and then swallowed and looked away.

On the rare occasions when Ori was a badger and did something egregiously naughty, he had dreaded that sharp expression on Dori’s face. What was it like for Thorin and Dis, whose amad apparently looked that way all the time? If they were truly being naughty, did Freris grow bloody fangs or something?

Fili handed Thorin the offering wreath. Ori recalled Fili had acted slightly flustered when presenting the wreath he made months before for Thrain’s tomb. Now he looked truly anxious.

“Careful,” Fili said to Thorin, “this one’s mithril, and it’s a lot sharper than the other.”

“How appropriate,” Thorin chuckled as he accepted it. “Another triumph, Fili. Thank you, it’s beautiful.”

“You’re welcome, Idad.”

This wreath combined a circle of swords alternating with wolf-heads, Freris’ personal device, and one Kili had adopted as his own. The device of the king’s line of Durin was the raven, though Fili’s would be the lion. Balin always looked askance at this notion, but Thorin said it was perfect that Fili broke with tradition - as long as the crown prince didn’t decide to use one as his messenger.

Bilbo lit the charcoal in the bowl and added the copal.

The hobbit said, in khuzdul, “Your highness, Princess Freris, I pledge my sword to the house of Durin, and on my honor to serve the hand and heart of your son.”

Thorin placed the wreath around the bowl and added, “Amad, I pledge my sword to the house of Durin, and on my honor to serve the hand and heart of my consort.”

They bowed in unison, then straightened and the party moved on to Thrain’s tomb.

Ori kept looking back at Freris’ tomb as they crossed the aisle. He felt like a foolish badger, afraid of the dark. He had already met Freris, and really, the thing he probably had most to fear from her was that she’d offer to arm wrestle him.

As they returned to Fundin House, Bilbo poked Thorin in the side.

“Enough of that, you silly dwarf. No brooding on Durin’s Day.”

“I still wish your beads could have come from my hand,” said Thorin.

“Your sister is the jewel-smith, not you,” said Bilbo. He ran his fingers down his own braid. “I’m quite fine with the ones you chose for me from the bead room. In fact, I’m glad you did, because I don’t think I could have focussed my eyes long enough on any one thing in that room to choose my own.”

“The first time Master Brur brought me down there, I wanted to lick every bead I saw,” said Ori.

Fili piped up, “The first time amad brought Ki and I down there, she spent the whole time taking beads out of his mouth. She didn’t even notice how many I put in mine!”
Dwalin smirked.
“No one’s surprised, lad. I though’ yer amad would die a’ pride when she seen all the beads yeh managed t’ steal on tha’ trip.”

Thorin hugged Fili’s shoulders with one arm.
“We even got most of them back.”
“Most of them?” Ori asked.
“I did swallow a few by accident,” said Fili. “I offered to retrieve them, but everyone said not to bother.”

They chuckled over this as Fili waxed eloquent about his and Kili’s adventure in the bead room.
Bilbo surreptitiously squeezed Ori’s hand as they returned to Fundin House.
“Get ready and come through to Bag-End,” Bilbo murmured.
“I’ll be quick,” Ori promised in a low tone.

Ori hurried to his bedroom to find his half-dressed husband watching Dipfa unpack a huge garment bag on the bed.
“Yeh’ve go’ a new dashin’ outfit f’r th’ weddin’, love,” Dwalin told him as Ori came over for a kiss and a hug.

He buried his face in Dwalin’s beard and took a deep breath. His Dwalin was washed and dressed and smelled delicious. It was fun having the house full of friends but it also meant the pair of them never had much time alone.

“Lord Ori,” Dipfa called his attention to the bed.

Dipfa beamed over a replica of his coronation robe, remade in his favorite shade of lavender, with touches of Dwalin’s green. Emerald buttons, green laces for his boots and the hood tip was tied off with the seven diamond stars, each with an emerald highlight.

“Dipfa! It’s wonderful!” Ori cried in delight.

“C’mon, love, let’s getcha int’ it. Can’t wait t’ see yeh.”

Ori struggled out of the breeches and tunic he’d thrown on for comfort and had a wash. Dwalin helped while Dipfa fussied over the robes on the bed. Once Dwalin finished with Ori’s hair, he and Dipfa helped Ori into the new robes.

“There,” Dipfa decreed.

Ori looked at himself in the mirror. He decided this was his favorite. He looked good. His hair glowed with Dwalin’s care. His earcuffs and beads sparkled and his beard was getting thicker, with a glossy sheen. He turned and grinned at Dwalin. Dwalin’s eyes shone as Thorin’s had when Thorin had looked at Bilbo on his birthday, but this look was for him. Ori gulped and blushed.
“I look pretty good,” Ori pointed out.

“Yeh look bloody beautiful, amrâlimê,” Dwalin said with a tremor in his voice. “I can hardly believe yer mine.”

Ori flung himself at Dwalin.
“Yours!” he said and kissed him.

Ori trotted back into the sitting room where the guests were busily congratulating the couple and hurrying away to get dressed themselves.

Arne greeted Ori with a hug and they went to Bilbo.
“Arne, there you are, my lad,” said Bilbo.
“What can I d-do for you, Professor?”
“You can call me Bilbo, as we discussed,” Bilbo chided playfully.
“Yes, Bilbo,” Arne sing-singed.
“Cheeky brat. I was wondering, will you do me the honor of walking down the aisle with me as one of my family members?”

Arne drew a startled breath, then threw his arms around Bilbo’s shoulders.
“Of course! I’m the one wh-who is honored!”

The room slowly emptied and finally Thorin, Bilbo and Ori were able to retire to Bag-End East.
In the sitting room, Balin entertained Frodo and Sam, reading to them from a large book. He spoke in khuzdul then westron.

“Ah,” Balin said as he saw them enter. “There yeh are. All set, laddie?”

“Yes, Balin,” Thorin smiled, “all is ready.”

“Better start gettin’ yerself togged up then. I’ll call Zindis t’ yeh.”

Balin glanced over at his charges.

Frodo and Sam whispered to one another, looking as grave as a miniature hobbit could do. Balin closed the book.

“What’s troublin’ yeh, lads?”

Frodo said, “Idad Balin, we thought Idad Thorin and Uncle Bilbo were already married.”

“Ah. Well, I’ll tell yeh a wee secret, lads. By tradition, they were married when they braided each other’s hair. By law, they were married when they signed their contracts.”

“Then, what’s this for?” Sam asked.

“Remember wha’ else happens when a dwarf king marries?”

“Ah!” Frodo said. “Uncle Bilbo has to be made into the consort!”

“Aye, an’ folk wan’ t’ see tha’. So, when yeh go down th’ aisle with yer Uncle Bilbo, yer idad’ll be on th’ dais with th’ wargies, an’ yeh’ll go up th’ steps t’ meet ‘im.”

“Will you and Imad Dori be there?” Frodo asked.

“A’ course! We’re performin’ th’ ceremony.”

They gaped at him.

“Oh,” said Sam.

“Oh?” Balin teased.

Frodo said, “We thought Lord Mahal did it.”

“He’s a bit busy. He told us t’ go on without ‘im.”

“Oh, well,” Frodo climbed off of the sofa, Sam followed. “I guess that’s alright then.”

“Excellent, my boy,” Bilbo said as Frodo rushed over and hugged him. “Now I need you and Wee Sam to go over to your Imad Gridr. She’s going to get you both ready. Off you go.”

Frodo and Sam scampered out, tailed by Butter. Thorin smiled slowly at Bilbo. Ori felt his heart bounce at the look of love in Thorin’s eyes as he gently placed his hands on Bilbo’s shoulders.

Balin rose and patted Thorin shoulder as he headed to the door.

“Come along now, our Thorin. Yer clothing’s laid out in yer old quarters a’ Oakenshield Inn.”

“Seems rather far to march,” said Bilbo. “Will you back in time for the ceremony?”

Thorin kissed him.

“My own ghivasha, when we next meet we shall be King and Consort.”

Bilbo’s face twitched. He smiled, sniffed and looked up at Thorin from under his brows. He snatched ahold of Thorin and hugged him tight. Thorin’s arms went about Bilbo and he rested his head on Bilbo’s curls.

“My dearest dwarf,” Bilbo murmured, then drew himself up and resorted to his handkerchief.

Thorin drew away, slid his hand into Bilbo’s hair and touched his brow to Bilbo’s. They smiled at each other.

“I will see you soon, azyungel.”

“Soon, my dear,” Bilbo promised him.

Thorin turned, smiled, and touched Ori’s cheek, then went out.

Bilbo watched him go, then turned to Ori.

“Is it bad luck for dwarrow to see each other before the wedding?”

“No, it’s back luck if Dori finds out you saw each other in your wedding outfits before the wedding.”

“I see. Not taking any chances, are we.”

“Not a one.”

They immediately heard Dori.

“Thorin Oakenshield what are you doing in this house?”

“I live here,” Thorin reply came back to them, tinged with laughter.

“You are not allowed to see your betrothed dressed for marriage. Shoo!”
“Dori,” Thorin protested in a teasing tone, “why are you going to all this trouble of sending me to the old residence? I’m sure I’ll not see Bilbo and his wedding clothes if I dress in Dwalin and Ori’s room.”

“Zindis is waiting for you in the old residence. Scat!”

Bilbo and Ori heard Dori’s house shoes scamper and Thorin’s laughter told them he was being forcibly ejected from the house. Ori turned to Bilbo, grinning like a fool. Bilbo gave a delighted noise and they hugged each other tight.

“It’s happening!” Ori cried as they parted.

“Yes,” Bilbo said and drew a breath. “Yes, and I need to get dressed. My, you do look fine. Is that new?”

“Yes, Dipfa insisted.”

“That’s sounds like Dipfa,” Bilbo chuckled then grabbed Ori’s hand. “Come with me.”

Ori sat on the bench at the foot of Thorin and Bilbo’s bed as Bilbo dressed.

“Silk drawers?” Ori teased.

“I wanted Thorin to hear them whisper,” said Bilbo with a naughty grin. He pulled a white linen shirt from his closet.

“Is that your father’s?” Ori asked.

“Yes, it appears to be flat white, but if you look closely.”

Bilbo brought it over and Ori did so.

“Oh! There’s a flower pattern woven into the fabric in the same thread.”

Ori got up and helped Bilbo on with his shirt. The metal buttons at the wrists and placket were the same flower as in the weave of the material.

And Ori thought only dwarrow achieved that level of obsessive detail.

“I’m so happy Zindis could save these,” said Bilbo.

He pulled the buckskin trousers out of the box.

“May I?” Ori asked. “I promise, I don’t have any ink on my hands.”

“I believe you,” said Bilbo solemnly.

Ori ran his fingers over the material.

“That’s amazing. That’s like wearing something that’s wearing you back.”

Bilbo blinked.

“Too weird?” Ori asked, as he handed Bilbo the braces.

“I’ll think about it later,” said Bilbo. He buttoned the braces onto the trousers and pulled them on. He tucked in his shirt tails and fastened his trousers. He pulled his braces up. They were silver, with flowers woven in representing happiness and new beginnings.

“Well, I’m not quite the hobbit my father was,” he mused, “but that’s my own fault for scampering about the countryside, missing elevenses.”

Ori watched as Bilbo wound a blue silk cloth around his neck, over the upturned collar of the snowy shirt, and tied it precisely into place, then folded the collar over it. Over his shirt, Bilbo buttoned a matching weskit, then fastened his sword belt and tugged his weskit into place. Thorin had polished Sting for Bilbo and left it on the dresser. Ori handed the sword to Bilbo, who looked at the shining blade, shook his head and chuckled.

“That dwarf spoils me rotten,” said Bilbo as he sheathed his sword. He went to the wardrobe and drew from it a Durin blue velvet copy of his beloved red coat, which Dipfa had made as a wedding present. Bilbo pulled it on, buttoned it just above the waist, and tucked a handkerchief of the same blue silk cloth into his breast pocket, over his heart.

Bilbo turned to face Ori.

“Will I do?”

Ori kissed his cheek.

“You’re lovely. Are you ready?”

“As I am going to be,” said Bilbo.

Ori hesitated.

“Bilbo, you haven’t written Thorin a poem, have you?”
“Not one that can be read in public.”
Ori nodded in relief.
“Good.”
“Why do you ask?”
“I’ll explain later.” Ori chuckled.
Frodo and Sam bounced through from their room, washed and dressed.
“How do we look, Uncle?” Frodo asked proudly.
Bilbo and Ori looked the faunts over. They had done excellent work in preparing themselves.
Butter came in looking disgusted, with brushes and combs in her teeth. Bilbo laughed and took these from the warg, wiped the handles on his discarded shirt and directed the faunts to brush their foot hair. This done, Bilbo took on Frodo’s curls and Ori applied himself to Sam’s. Ori remembered to be careful as hobbit hair was a good deal like Sigrid’s or Tilda’s. Ori forced himself not giggle as the ruddy blond curls bounced back.

Bilbo declare both to be ready.

“Have we both been to the lav?” Bilbo asked.
“Yes,” grumbled the faunts.

“Well, it’s a long ceremony, are we sure? Why don’t you both go and try again, just in case.”
Frodo and Sam looked at each other, rolled their eyes, and went away. Bilbo scampered off to the main bathroom.

“I’m after you,” Ori called.

Finally the four walked out into the Fundin sitting room, where an excited crowd waited. Hobbits did not approach the marriage altar alone, but in family groups, as from the oldest days, even before the Wandering.

Arne and his loves were joined by the Gardeners, the Urs, the Sisters, arrayed in the most startling shade of orange, Glorfindel in Dale uniform, and the Rivendell elves. Dori gave Ori and Bilbo a once over, kissed their cheeks and hurried out.

Bell hugged Bilbo, then held him at arms length, obvious admiring.

“Oh dearest Bilbo!” she said, sniffing a little. “You make a perfect hobbit groom!”

“Aye, you look well indeed,” Hamfast praised and got his hug in as well. Then everyone else clustered around to exclaim over and congratulate Bilbo.

Bilbo, rather pink in the cheeks, finally got his entourage out to the main cavern and into the highly decorated coaches waiting for them.

Randi hopped up to drive the coach with Bilbo, Ori, the faunts and the Gardeners crowded in.
The rest of the group rode on horse or pony back. They drove sedately down through the deserted streets to the throne room.

“The place seems empty,” Bilbo said, low.

Ori nodded. It was almost spooky without anyone around.

“Everyone’s in the throne room,” Elladan informed them with a laugh. “All eager for the wedding.”

“Gracious me!” Bilbo mumbled, a little pale.

The coach arrived and Hamfast hopped out, handed out Bell, the faunts, then Ori, who hid his amusement, and then Bilbo, though Bell went to Bilbo’s other side. The group reformed outside the throne room door. Brur came forward, grinning like a fool.

“Last chance t’ be free an’ single, laddie,” he teased Bilbo.

“Oh, hush, you!” Bilbo forgot his nerves and laughed.

Tay and Nodun kissed Bilbo’s cheek and hurried in, Tay to the pleasure guild and Nodun to her scribe duties. Brur went to the door and looked in. Ori saw him wink and thought that was likely the signal. Quartz winged in and perched on Ori’s shoulder.

“Wow! All the swells!” Quartz cried.

Hamfast and Bell stood with Bilbo between them, then Frodo and Samwise on either side of Ori, with the rings on little Durin blue velvet pillows for all to admire as they went by. Frodo looked gleeful and Sam determined.
Balin came through and looked the party over while Bombur and Erda, Arne, the Sisters, Glorfindel, Eldron, Lindir and the twins grouped together behind.

“Wait!  Wait for me!” Tharkun called as he alit from Shadowfax and rushed forward, his staff bound around with miraculously flowering vines.

Bilbo raised an eyebrow at the wizard.

“So, in this case, a wizard being right on time delays my wedding for however long it takes him to arrive.”

“Exactly,” Tharkun affirmed.  He shook his shining white robes into place as Lindir distractedly brushed him off. “Just be thankful I’m not Radagast.  I think he’s still back at the carrock, watering the rabbits.”

“No bunnies for dinner for us,” Quartz muttered to Ori.

“You couldn’t eat a whole rosacabol rabbit yourself anyway.” Ori whispered back.

“We’ll save him some cake,” Balin promised.  “Now, the weddin’ cloths.”

They were called ‘cloths’ in khuzdul, and so they were called that in westron, but the word Balin used meant specifically the banners of finely woven mithril, decorated with white gems, fire opal beads and gold bells that shimmered and chimed as they struck together, the ancestral marriage banners of the Durin kings.

Carried aloft on long poles, they reached toward the ceiling and swept the ground, and completely obscured Bilbo and his party from everyone in front of them.  Glorfindel, with his helm in one arm, drawn sword in the other held to his breast, placed himself in front of the cloths to lead.

The hobbits and the elves looked a bit confused.  Brur and Balin threw open the throne room doors.

“There’s no’ bed curtains, lad,” said Balin, “an’ everyone in th’ throne room kin hear yeh, remember?”

“Oops,” said Frodo.

Balin waved the Protector of Dale and the cloth bearers forward and the party started to walk up the aisle.

“Why all these banners?” Ori heard Bilbo say. “I don’t remember this from Balin’s description.  If these are bed curtains, should I not also have a bed?”

“They’re no’ bed curtains, lad,” said Balin, “an’ everyone in th’ throne room kin hear yeh, remember?”

Thorin called, “They’ve screened me off, too, ghivasha.  It’s so we can’t see each other before the wedding ceremony.”

“Considering we’ve been living together since your coronation?” Vi encouraged, “Jus’ go wi’ it, chuck.  It’s worth it f’r the looksee t’ come.”

“Oops,” said Brur.

Half way along, harps and fiddles joined them, and proceeded Bilbo and his billowing entourage, as they walked the rest of the length of the room.  Well wishers called out and tossed gold dust over him from each side as he walked past.

Ori slipped out of the procession.  He caught a glimpse of Beorn in his bear form, lounging among the children as he had at the coronation.  Chopper sprawled on the other side, being similarly fawned over.

Ori glanced up and saw that the entire ceiling was covered in ravens.  On the larger clefs of rock, perched every member of the Red Queen’s flock.  At the far back Jim and the circus members stood with Fanny.

Quartz drew in a sharp breath.

“What?” Ori whispered.

“Udadel Carc’s here.”
“All the way from the Halls?”
“He gets around,” Quartz replied.
“Any other dead people I should know about?”
“Keep you posted.”

Ori chuckled to himself and was in place on the dais when Bilbo’s party mounted the steps and went on the left side in front of the throne, stopped, and all cloths were swept aside.

Rather than Thorin alone with his wargs at the throne, Thorin stood on the right side in front of the throne with his entire extended family, as any good hobbit would do. Roäc perched on the throne, preening idly. Thorin was crowned and in his coronation robes. From his shoulders, the amazing butterfly cloak flowed down and pooled behind him. Sugar sat on his right and Butter on his left. Romy watched from between Gimli and Legolas. Killer lolled at Dwalin’s feet at the edge of the stair up to the dais.

The room fell silent while the grooms got their first look at one another in wedding clothes.

Bilbo’s breath caught at the sight before him, and if Bilbo had any doubt that he himself was lovely, the look on Thorin’s face should have erased it.

Ori saw Thorin as struck as he had first been with Bilbo and more.

Ori found himself humming cheerily in his mind as he quickly caught that look for posterity.

Hamfast and Bell stepped forward.

Dis and Dain met them mid-way and they bowed and curtsied.

Hamfast produced a pouch of Old Toby, and each filled their pipes and smoked together. They exchanged pleasantries and talked about how the weather was perfect for a wedding. Bilbo had told Ori this was always mentioned, even if a howling gale prevailed outside.

When they had finished their pipes, each of them said, “Welcome, brother. Welcome, sister.” and embraced. Only then were the grooms allowed to step forward.

“Oh, now don’t you look nice, your majesty,” said Bell. She rose on tiptoe to kiss his cheek.

“Aye, cleans up almost as good as me,” Hamfast added with a grin.

He also stood on tiptoe to kiss Thorin’s cheek.

Dain and Dis stepped back, as did Bell and Hamfast. Balin and Dori stood before the throne and gave the king and soon-to-be-crowned consort another moment to enjoy the sight of each other.

Balin and Dori stepped forward.

“Welcome t’ all our dear guests.” Balin smiled and nodded to the audience staring eagerly at the couple of the dais. “We have invited all a’ yeh here t’ witness this momentous event. Please attend t’ th’ ceremony a’ th’ exchange a’ rings.”

“Bring forth the ring bearers,” intoned Tharkûn.

Sam and Frodo stepped forward, beaming and blushing all at once from the attention.

Balin, with a quick glare at the wizard for stealing his line, beckoned to Frodo. Frodo, despite his excitement, walked sedately forward and offered his pillow to Balin. Balin smiled and took the pillow and Dori fluttered her hands over it, murmuring blessing. Balin then waved Thorin and Bilbo to come near. Balin offered the pillow to Bilbo. Bilbo took up the ring and offered it to Thorin and said in khuzdul,

“As Mahal and Yavanna have designed us for each other, let us seek to make each other happy. Let us forge a new family and a new life together, as did our ancestors.”

Thorin gave Bilbo his hand and Bilbo slid the ring on his finger. There was cooing and sniffles from the audience.

Balin nodded to Sam who offered his pillow to Balin, who held it before Dori, who blessed it and Balin presented the pillow to Thorin. Thorin took the ring up and Bilbo offered his hand.

“We and our families have come together to celebrate our love. May Yavanna bless our love every season and year as She blesses the trees and plants,” said Thorin. Then he repeated it in the language of the hobbits.

Dori danced around the couple, scattered gold dust and flower petals and fluttered invocations over them as they turned and bowed to the assembled.

Balin and Dori began the ancient song of blessing, Dis and Dain added their voices, then all the rest of the dwarrow.

The dwarrow were startled when every elf in the place began an independent treble melody above the melody, though everyone kept singing.

The chorus consisted of vocalables, not so much words as a cascade of rhyming syllables. The men and hobbits joined in for this, from Eowyn’s clear alto to Theoden’s booming base, and soon the entire room echoed with the blessing song. When it finished, the throne room nearly exploded with the cheers.

“Yes!” Kili shouted and pumped his fist in the air.

Ori thought, Second Music, indeed!

Balin held up his hand and people slowly quieted down. Dis stepped forward with Fili and Kili on either side of her. Dis carried a silver salver.

Bilbo had been less than enthusiastic about the idea of a formal crown, as most dwarven crowns were derived from helmets, and weighed a good deal more than the circlet Thorin gave Bilbo on his birthday, which Bilbo elected to wear for every day meetings and such.

Knowing this, and happily wearing something much lighter himself, Thorin designed a special crown for his consort: a circle of mithril flowers, each different, and each bearing in the center a precious stone to match the raven eyes of Thorin’s own crown. The king and the rest of the Durins worked this new crown together, at the same time as the votive meant for the Durin’s Day, and Bilbo had bade them take care which they fed to the lava.

“I could wear the other one as a belt.”

Dori blessed the new crown on its salver.

“Don’t worry,” Dori murmurred, “I didn’t lick it.”

“Thank you, Dori,” said Thorin.

“I licked the rings earlier instead.”

“Thank you, Dori,” said Bilbo. He wrinkled his nose and deliberately wiped his hand against his coat.

Balin took the crown from its salver and offered it to Thorin.

Bilbo knelt and Thorin carefully placed the crown upon his head. The king took his time. It was obvious he was savoring this moment.

“Professor Bilbo Baggins of the Shire, I, Thorin Oakenshield of the House of Durin in Erebor, High King of all Dwarrow, crown you Bilbo, Prince Consort of Erebor. Rise, my ghivashel, and stand with me.”

“Yay!” Frodo cried, then slapped his hand over his mouth. From between his fingers he mumbled, “Sorry.”

Bilbo rose, smiling through tears as Thorin beamed at him. They kissed, to the delight of the room. Frodo squealed

There was a crash of drums and a glorious blast of trumpets. Balin stepped forward on the dais.

“All hail the high king and his prince consort of all dwarrow!” Balin roared. Every dwarrow bowed, elves, men, and hobbits saluted the pair according to their traditions. There was a second of silence. Then the cheers, applause, and shouts of delight threatened to raise the mountain off its roots.

The rulers from all corners of Arda moved forward to embrace and congratulate the royal couple. Ori could hardly hear what was said through the happy racket all around.

Elrond and Lindir gave their congratulations and when they stepped back, Ori murmured to Lindir, “Descant? That song doesn’t even have a descant.”

“We’re elves. We can’t help ourselves,” said Lindir with a wink.
Partying, Partying, and More Partying.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And one hundred chapters after meeting, they’re finally married! No, we didn’t plan on it taking this long, but these Durins are just so dang busy!! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Finally Thorin took Bilbo’s hand and placed it on his arm. They led the party down the steps from the dais and made their way slowly down the aisle, smiling and thanking those who pressed forward to congratulate them, to the doorway where Fruhn’k had the teacup waiting.

Minty and Vespa were hitched to the coach, the ponies and the coach all swathed in Durin blue and diamonds. Each pony sported a single long, spiral horn of mithril and pearl, topped with a white gem.

Bilbo and Thorin stared. Rigel and Ara grinned.
“Just a little something to amuse you both,” Ara said lightly.
“Aww,” Dwalin snickered, “yeh’ve go’ horned horsies.”
“Hush,” Thorin said. “We don’t want Nori to start singing.”

From somewhere above them, Nori’s voice echoed down,

“I’m a horned horsey,
I used to wonder what kind of hay,
I'd eat at night. I'm a horned horsey,
Until the goats shared their pasture grass with me!”

“Now you’ve done it!” Ori sighed.

Bilbo stared.
“What in all of Arda?”
“I’ll explain in a moment,” Thorin said and helped Bilbo into the teacup, while Butter and Sugar ranged themselves on either side of it.

Dwalin called to Ori, who ran to climb on Gnasher’s back and sit before his husband. Dwalin curled an arm about his waist and Ori was free to scribble the scenes before them as they trotted forward, Killer beside them.

The rest of the royal guests climbed into their equipages as the populace streamed out and all around them, shouted joyously and tossed gold dust. Brur climbed up to drive the teacup and hollered at everyone trying to crowd around the coach.

Tay and the pleasure guild swooped around and danced the royals up the roads. Their twirls and gyrations kept the crowds from under the hooves, but encouraged everyone to dance along side.

“I didn’t realize our Tay was in th’ dancin’ guild,” said Dwalin.
“He’s not,” said Ori, “I think he just can’t help himself right now.”

Slowly the massive crowd moved up to the largest platform in the middle of the mountain. People rushed about, lighting lanterns and strings of Buer’s twinkling lights. This place was larger than the throne room and great dining room used for the coronation. Tables and benches lay spread out along the nearest edge, with the circus set up at the far end, and the middle open for dancing. Shops and grand mansions lined the edges, all with every window lit. In front of each store and house, stalls were ready to sell things once the feast waned.

The royals got down and soon mixed with the crowd, talked, and laughed. The wagons from the kitchens arrived and everyone went to bring out the food and dishes and the great barrels of wine, ale, and cider.

Thorin and Bilbo were called to take their seats at the royal table. They went unhurriedly, still talking and greeting people, Bilbo, sweet-smiling and welcoming, Thorin, powerful and benevolent. Their wargs trailed after, tails away. Several members of the family followed, but most continued to circulate among the hordes of people. Dwalin had been convinced by Arb and Furh’nk to eat first before taking guard duty, and so he joined his husband and the newlyweds at the table.

“Bring forth the scalding soup!” Dis called.

This caught almost everyone’s attention and triggered shouts and yells of encouragement. Hijil brought the steaming kettle forward and Dain followed with a plinth to set it on.

Hild turned to Aris with a delighted cackle. Ori had a moment to take in the Blackfoot Queen’s celebratory fashion. Hild’s gown fell from high on the neck to the floor in open weave of moss green, adorned at each joining with a sapphire, in honor of the Durins. She wore a gold armlet upon each arm, which cascaded in ropes of precious stones, caught up at a matching cuff at each wrist. She wore her hair in her customary halo, wound round her head, with a tiara meant to represent a circle of jeweled knife hilts. Ori scribbled hastily and made notes on the colors and gems. He was definitely going to color this one. He rapidly turned his attention back to the traditional newlywed soup custom.

People crowded around to watch, but let Ori through to the royal couple’s side.

Wonderful!” Bilbo enthused. “I’ve been dying to try it.”

“Dis,” said Thorin wryly, “I don’t think it’s going to help us produce healthy dwarflings.” “Of course not,” said Dis. “I just want to watch your face when you try to swallow it.”

“You’re never going to forgive me for laughing at you at your wedding.”

“Dams have long memories, nadadel,” said Dis with an evil smile.

More shouts announced the arrival of Mistress Dazla, who brought forth a golden bowl and one golden spoon.

Mistress Dazla, this is your day off!” Thorin chided.

“If you’ll pardon me, your majesty, you’ll hush. I’ve been waiting a long time for this.”

In the end, Dis wasn’t the only one laughing at Thorin. Dwalin seemed almost ready to pour the contents of the bowl down Thorin’s throat. Thorin raised an eyebrow.

“One more spoonful,” Dwalin muttered.

Thorin, beetroot, with tears streaming down his face, did so. Dwalin turned to Chat.

“Righ’, tell tha’ no good coward, our Thorin sucked down twice th’ amoun’ tha’ he sputtered over.”

Chat and Givris snickered in delight.

“Excellent,” Thorin grumbled. “I’m finished now.”

“Really, my dear?” asked Bilbo. “I could happily eat this all night. Where is your dwarven fortitude?”

Ori had bent closer to draw the proceedings, and so he heard it clearly when Thorin leaned forward and whispered, “Still sheathed, because we’re in public.”

“Ask a silly question,” said Bilbo.

Balin brought Thorin a bowl of cold water, a cloth and several handkerchiefs.

“Thank you, Balin.”

“A good retainer’s always prepared,” said Balin, snickering.

“Keep laughing, Balin,” said Thorin, as he washed his face and sniffed thickly. “You aren’t married yet.”

Dwalin gave a shout and patted the top of Balin’s head. Balin smacked at him. The crowd cheered as Bilbo upended the bowl and swallowed down the rest.
From a distance, Ori heard Torq wail, “No wonder he drank me under th’ table!”

As if to make the soldier feel all-the-worse, Frodo swept a forefinger inside the bowl and licked it off.

“Yummy!” the faunt squealed.

Sigrid turned to Fili.

“What’s in the soup?”

“What’s not in the soup?” he replied, rolling his eyes. “Think of every single food that contains spice and heat, grind it to powder and boil it down to a paste.”

Sigrid gulped.

“We’d better start eating every spice we know to prepare.”

They hugged each other, giggling.

Once the soup tradition was dispensed, the kitchen staff set out the dishes and the feasting began. People found seats and Ori was happy to see the main dish of roasted young goats were served in slices, with root vegetables, and not cooked whole and set back up as if they were alive.

Unfortunately, this meant there was no need for the couple to cut out the heart together, but it was served to them on a platter.

Balin explained to Theoden, “Th’ goat’s an animal a’ fortitude. Eatin’ th’ heart together’ll make th’ union strong.”

“I’ve always found it rather tasty myself,” said Theoden.

“Aye, tha’, too,” said Balin.

Some elves ate a version of the dish without the goat. Instead, Nomirliel had introduced the royal chefs to cubes made of bean curd with the same texture as the tenderest meat.

“It doesn’t really have a lot of taste on its own,” she said to Sculdis, who dared to try it. “It’s very good at picking up the flavor of whatever is cooked alongside it.”

“Good for when there’s no meat, I take it,” said Sculdis, “but perfectly edible. Needs salt.”

“I’ve always thought so, too,” the elf replied, as she reached for the salt cellar.

Drums sounded out a marching beat as the chefs paraded out the gravy course in the royal tureens. Most held venison gravy, with cavern mushrooms, but a few were strictly mushroom, for Beorn and for elves who preferred to confine themselves to vegetables.

The dwarven favorites were all there, including the dreaded sausages wrapped in fried scallion pancakes. Bain and Stonehelm ate them along with the rest, but could not look at each other without snorting.

Other foods made their first appearance at the king’s marriage table. Deneb had supervised the creation of spicy groundnut stew, and a cadre of Dale women brought huge pots of dry salted fish, which they reconstituted and cooked with peppers, potatoes and onions. The Rohirrim supplied their special fortified marriage mead, which tasted of wild honey and berries and kicked like wild horses.

The pastries were mainly of Gondorian variety, including iklars with differently flavored creams: vanilla, xocolātl, and coffee, and dozens of little cakes, moist with crushed, sweet almonds, and sugar, smothered in a glaze of cherry liqueur. Bowls formed of lacy, hardened sugar held mounds of frozen custard and whipped cream and a dusting of cinnamon. Ori was relieved to see there was no tiered and molded white gelatin among the desserts.

“This is amazing!” Aragorn cried, looking out over the sugary largesse. “This didn’t all come from that one bakery?”

Thorin said, “I understand the same baker now owns three bakeries across Dale.”

“Three?” Arwen exclaimed. “What is it that Margr and Vi say? He must be worked to a thread?”

Bilbo nodded into the crowd at the tables below.

“Actually, he appears remarkably well.”

Apparently, Bilbo had caught the eye of the baker, who looked startled when Bilbo beckoned to him.

The baker came forth and stopped in front of the happy couple and bowed. Ori hadn’t met him before, but noticed right away that there was something different about him. Though stout and solid, the dwarf stood on the tall side, and his beard was sparser than Kili’s. His ears looked oddly small in his moon-round face. Ori thought he must be part mannish.

Before Thorin could greet him, Vi leapt over the table and seized the baker.

“It’s yeh!” she shrieked up at him.

Margr, right on her heels, seconded, “Aye, yer th’ wee shit as used t’ sit at our table as a pebble.”
“An’ yeh never wrote!” Vi added.

“Yeh couldn’t read, imad,” said the baker politely. “An’ when I came back, yeh didn’ recognize me anyway.”

“Yeh all looked alike!” Margr cried.

The dams hugged him suddenly, and tightly, to the point where Ori was afraid his eyes would pop out of his head.

“Where yeh been then?” Vi demanded.

Thorin glanced over at Ori.

“I’d say Gondor.”

Ori nodded. He wondered how they could politely detach the baker from Vi and Margr long enough to introduce him, but the sisters took the guess work out of it by turning the baker toward them and Vi brayed,

“This is him!”

“Ah, yes. I’m Thorin, son of Thrain, and this is my husband, Prince Consort Bilbo Baggins.”

Thorin looked fit to burst with pride as he said this. “I’m afraid we didn’t catch your name.”

“Orlo, son of Irlo, yer majesty, yer highness.”

Margr and Vi looked at one another.

“Who, in Mahal’s name’s, Irlo?” the sisters asked each other.

“You and your pastries are very welcome in Erebor,” Thorn said quickly. “Even if we have butchered the name of one of them.”

Orlo shrugged and grinned.

“Don’t matter wha’ yeh call ’em, majesty. They taste th’ same.”

“Here, let me introduce you to King Elessar and Lady Arwen, his betrothed.”

“By all means, King Thorin,” said Aragorn.

“Yes, we want to place an order of iklars for our own wedding,” said Arwen. “Can you do a version with elderberry flavoring?”

“Any flavor yeh fancy, m’lady, though, th’ delivery migh’ be a bit tricky.”

Lady Galadriel smiled over the rim of her wine cup.

“No need to worry. I’ll deliver them myself.”

Vi squealed excitedly, and Margr dragged him forward to chat with the Gondorians.

“Alas,” said Dis, “poor Orlo will likely not get another word in edgewise.”

Ori looked at Dis, then looked a little closer. She wore a gown of the same Longbeard battle dress plaid as Thorin had that morning. Now it sported a bright ornament at the shoulder, pinning closed her shawl. Ori wondered if it was not Easterling make, since it was far more abstract than the usual dwarven ornament, a sort of black velvet carving, edged in orange, atop a small red pelt.

“Is that a new type of brooch?” he asked.

“No, it’s Rutile,” she replied. Rutile waved her front two legs at him and chirped. “It’s her costume. She’s Durin.”

Ori laughed in delight.

“I didn’t recognize her at first on all that red fluff.”

“That’s Durin’s beard,” said Dis.

“I recognized it righ’ off,” said Mahal in Ori’s head. “Resemblance’s uncanny.”

“Oi!” Durin protested. “Da!”

“No bickering in my brain,” Ori hissed. “It’s busy enough in there as it is.”

Ori and Dwalin actually got to dance together for a little while, before Dwalin went on duty. Ori continued on, dancing with Arne, with Sigrid, even with Killer, as the warg would not be left out. When Ori decided to take a break, he sat down by Bard and Thorin, Ori with his ale and Killer with a bucket of water, which he slobbered and sprayed over everything in the vicinity with each shake of his head. Ori and Bard watched as Thranduil and Sigrid wagged together, purposely trying to put each other out of step and laughing at every try.

Ori thought Bard looked like a lovesick pup.

Thorin must have thought so, too.

“Will you marry in the way of men?” Thorin asked Bard.

“I’d like to,” said Bard. “The problem with the wedding ceremony, at least among the Dale men, is that they’ve always been about fertility of the most direct and bodily kind. Doesn’t really cover two males or two females or - heh - multiple mixed parties.”

“What about people who remarry, or marry late?” Thorin asked.

“There isn’t a ceremony, because the assumption is that there are either already children on one side or the other, or that it’s too late to have any. Then it’s strictly a civil contract, assuming that one or both of them will die sooner rather than later, and that their near relatives will battle over the spoils.”

“It doesn’t seem fair that you don’t get a ceremony if you want one,” reflected Thorin.

“Ceremonies involve feasting, and no dwarf worth their beard would miss that.”

Bard smiled into his tankard.

“Men aren’t so different. Just because there isn’t a ceremony, doesn’t mean there isn’t plenty of ale. I’ve read the dwarven contract. For a people who marry for love, it does seem to be on the obsessive side regarding possessions.”

“That’s because when dwarrow battle over spoils, it involves actual battle,” said Thorin.

“Ah.”

“Specialized contracts are something of a preemptive strike.”

It occurred to Ori that he had never read his marriage contract. Not that he had to, as he already knew what it said. As a ‘standard’ agreement, it said that he and Dwalin would make sure each of them and any badgers had food, shelter and clothing, a very general definition of a family. As to material goods, it said: what you have now is yours, what I have now is mine, but we’ll share what we come into from now on.

Put simply, it meant the less well-off partner couldn’t be coerced into anything just to make sure they had a full belly.

He and Dwalin hadn’t had much of a ceremony, and they were just as married as any other dwarf couple. Still, it must be different for kings.

“Maybe,” said Ori, “you could combine a marriage ceremony in with your coronation.”

Bard groaned.

“Don’t say that word. Sven is pushing to crown me on the spring equinox, strictly by tradition. I’ll have to have a great argument in place before I approach him with any changes to that. I’m sure he’s worried that Eru will strike him dead.”

Sigrid went to dance with Fili. Thranduil turned to Bard with a smile and a crooked finger. Bard abandoned them without another word, as laughter followed him all the way to his husband.

Ori looked over at Dwalin, who finally got a chance to sit down, having been relieved in his guard duty by Arb.

Dwalin caught his eye, gave him a wicked grin and a wink and patted his lap.

Oin and Gloin laughed and raised their tankards to Ori as he squeaked and darted over to take his rightful seat.

In a little while, Dwalin and Ori went and danced with Bilbo, and with Tilda, though she always insisted on leading.

Ori knew something was afoot when they returned just as Eomer and Theoden approached the table and sat on either side of Beorn. Master Eorl trotted up with them and munchied from a small pouch of oats Theoden placed on the floor at his feet.

“Have you a moment, Mister Beorn?” Theoden asked.

“I have many,” Beorn rumbled. He had spiffed up his clothing for the occasion, and was clad in a sleeveless tunic woven of linen threads dyed green and blue over a pair of dark green woolen trousers and his boots. He was in a merry mood and ready to tease the men of Rohan. “Which would you choose?"
   "We would like a word concerning my niece, Eowyn."

The conversation at the table lessened considerably. The dwarrow and their guests didn’t even disguise it when they all leaned forward to hear. Ori himself looked around for Eowyn, for she was not on duty tonight.

"Ah, yes," said Beorn. "The White Lady. The fiery shield maiden. Rarely have I have had such thrilling company."
   "That’s my sister," said Eomer pointedly.
   "Yes, you have the same look about you, though you are not as comely as herself." Beorn grinned into his tankard.
   "Really?" Theoden said archly. "Find her comely, do you?"
   "Who would not?" Beorn challenged him. "It’s a lucky male who catches the eye of the White Lady."

Eowyn swooped down on them with Arivett at her heels.
   "Uncle! Eomer! What are you doing?"

Theoden remained stoic, but Eomer winced, and his shoulders shot up around his ears.

Arivett sing-songed under her breath, "Eomer’s in trouble, Eomer’s in trouble."
   "Sister," Eomer greeted her.

   "Don’t you ‘sister’ me, you mangy field mouse. You two are here to give Beorn a shovel-talk, and there’s nothing to be shoveled but your horse dung!"

Beorn laughed.
   "We were speaking of your beauty, lady, and how your brother, alas, can’t compare."
   "Really?" She arched a brow. "Chatting up Beorn, Eomer? I didn’t think he was your type."

Beorn whickered at Eorl and the tiny horse neighed in reply, and rolled his eyes as Eowyn insinuated herself between Eomer and the shapechanger.

   "Well, he is strong," said Beorn, "or Queen Arivett wouldn’t have him. He has that to his advantage."
   "Right you are," Arivett murmured.

Theoden looked like he wanted to say something. Ori imagined it was to stop this conversation before it started. Alas, it was too late for that.
   "Perhaps," said Eowyn slyly, "we could talk about what you like, Beorn. Shall we go into detail of our adventures and compare?"
   "No!" Theoden shouted. Then he cleared his throat and lowered his voice. "There’s no need, my dear. We were just joking with Beorn, in a friendly manner."

   "That’s too kind of you," said Eowyn. She grinned at Ori, then took a deep breath and squared her shoulders. "Beorn is a great, good man and I like to think that I was raised as a sound judge of character."

Ori snickered to himself. Raised. Past tense.
   "Besides," she continued, "I couldn’t marry Beorn, lovely though he is."
   "Yes," said Beorn. "She would have eaten my animals."

He raised his tankard to her in salute.

Theoden continued around Beorn’s elbow, "We just want someone who is good enough for you, who will honor you."

Beorn swallowed, licked his lips, and slapped Theoden on the shoulder.
   "My thanks, your majesty. I would wish that for you as well."
   "I was talking about my niece," said Theoden.
   "Why?" Beorn challenged. "We all know you’ll never see anyone as good enough for her."
   "Ooooooo!" said the dwarrow around them in delight.

Theoden merely nodded and Eorl whinnied and nodded as well.
   "It’s true," said Theoden.
   "It is," Eomer affirmed.
   "Happily for me, I get to pick out who is good enough," said Eowyn, "and not either of you."
Ori felt sorry for Glorfindel and Haldir. Eowyn had effectively taken the sting from their jibes before they ever got to use them.

Bilbo popped the final bite of an iklar into his mouth and leaned over to Thorin.

“Do you suppose it will be safe for us to go and explore the rest of the platform now, and leave Eowyn’s kin to her tender mercy?”

“They are warriors,” said Thorin. “They can take care of themselves.”

Theoden huffed. “Thank you, Thorin! It’s nice to know someone has that much faith in me.”

“I didn’t say you’d prevail, brother king,” Thorin continued, “just that you’d put up a good fight.”

“I see. Very nice,” said Theoden with a smirk.

“Coming along, Ori?” Bilbo asked.

“Oh, yes!” Ori cried. “I want to see what the vendors are offering.”

“I want to see if my face has been plastered over skivvies,” said Bilbo. “If it isn’t a good likeness, I’ll be most put out.”

“Arivett and I will come, too,” said Eowyn, “since our business here is finished.”

In the end, the Durins and their guests wandered forth in a herd, eager to see what delights awaited.

Dori and Balin sauntered close just as Ori heard Lady Kadis and Mistress Ondr cackling, then Granny Klak said something and the cackling only rose.

He glanced up at Dori, who sighed.

“I wash my hands of all of them,” said Dori. “Take a look.”

Ori looked over at the table in front and slightly to the side of the high table. Judging by the number of empty drinking vessels on and around that table, things had taken their usual course.

“You’re a cad and a bounder,” said Red Queen to Baluchistan, “and we have no opinion of you.”

“I go’ me opinions a’ yeh. Yer bloody bootiful. I could jus’ tuck mesel’ under one a’ them wings f’ever.”

“We could eat you without a second thought,” the bone breaker scoffed.

“Aye,” he warbled. “Tha’s th’ bes’ par’.”

Dwalin and Ori exchanged glances, snickered. Dwalin had to go back on duty. They kissed and Ori continued to wander with his friends. Whether this fowl courtship ended badly or well, he didn’t want to witness either.

The circus at the other end of the dancing area was not the full fair, but they had managed to bring Castle Bounce and several of the game booths along with the acts. A crowd of gamesters had gather about a table run by Fior and Jim. Ori could just see that the table was set up for the rats to race. Fanny with Mavey were giving rides around the whole square. Hordes of youngsters lined up for turns.

Stalls, stores, barrels, and vendors opened and offered mementoes of the wedding. Some of the clay figures set out were still wet with paint. In other stalls, cloth figures were being hastily dressed. There were plates, tankards, tea sets, all manner of dishware emblazoned with the date and names. There were dishcloths, aprons, and handkerchiefs, one stall had even made commemorative clothing.

Ori wandered about sketching in the company of Eowyn, Arivett, and Cemnesta, taking in the sights and sounds of the celebration. Arivett’s dress was as stunning as her mother’s. Arivett, heavily pregnant, showed it to best advantage in a sheer rust gown, studded with rubies in horizontal stripes running down the left side. The skirt clung about her belly, then it opened upward, covering her right arm, but leaving most of the left of her torso bare. Her body hair was swirled in spirals of gold and deep red paint, studded with more rubies, carnelians, and amethysts. Her hair fell in loose braids at the back, but gathered up over her ears to show off gold ear hoops and cuffs trailing chains with fire opal dangles, each carved as a desert rose.

Tonight, Eowyn had traded her Dale uniform for a gown of scarlet silk that bared her shoulders, and a necklace and earrings of gold and moonstones, which Thorin had gifted her. Cemnesta was not to be outdone in robes of burgundy velvet swirling with gold embroidered leaves. In his lavender robes, Ori felt they made a rather fetching group. Of course, everyone was in their best clothes and admiring themselves and each other.

Talk drifted to Ori from all around.

“He is a kind dwarf, good king,” said Deneb. She nodded decisively.

“He is,” said Nadaris. “Weren’ sure a’ him at first, bu’ he go’ us outa tha’ mine, an’ he’s been ever so guid t’ me Caris.”

“Which one is Caris?”

“Th’ damlin’ with th’ dwarflin’ in a headlock.”

“Ah, very strong. It is good.”

“Aye, it is.”

Among the commemorative clothing stall, Ori found a pair of soft cotton black sleeping trousers with ‘King & Consort Security’ embroidered on the seat in white westron letters. Ori, after giggling himself almost sick, showed them to his companions, who shrieked in delight, and at their encouragement, he bought a pair in Dwalin’s size. Eowyn found a white pair with ‘Dale Guard’ in blue letters and Arivett found red silk pair with ‘Queen’ on the bottom and Cemnesta, a green cotton pair with ‘King’. The proprietor winked and promised to have them sent to Fundin House.

They moved on and met Master Vobwi, who walked about pushing a large barrow. Inside were several small cages containing a selection of animals and birds. Eowyn and Arivett exclaimed over these. Cemnesta was entranced by a baby skunk.

“Look at it,” he gushed. “All black and white with such a sweet, tiny pink nose!”

“Aye,” Master Vobwi agreed and unhasped the cage. He put his hand in, scooped the little creature out and handed it over to the elf king. Cemnesta cooed over the skunk, which snuffled at him and was very happy to be fondled lovingly.

“Nice wee boy,” Master Vobwi stated. “Was found abandoned near a road an’ I’ve had his glands removed, so he can’t stink up th’ place. Friendly li’le critter, very affectionate.”

“How much?” Cemnesta murmured as the little skunk had made itself comfortable against his collar bone.

“One gold, yer majesty.”

Cemnesta paused, then handed over a single gold coin. Arivett got herself a very weird looking lizard which Master Vobwi said was called a chameleon and needed to be kept warm. Arivett placed it on her shoulder and squeaked when its mottled skin seemed to waver then turn a few shades of red in places to match her gown.

“They do that t’ hide themselves in trees an’ such t’ catch their prey.” Master Vobwi informed them. They eats flying bugs an’ such.”

Arivett happily handed over ten gold for the chameleon. Eowyn was still looking at the cages.

“Anythin’ f’r yeh, lass?” Master Vobwi asked her.

“Any miniature oliphaunts?” she teased.

Master Vobwi chuckled. “Sorry, lass, don’t think they’ve managed to make those yet.”

“She wants a warg,” Arivett giggled.

“Better see the king about that,” advised Master Vobwi.

They bade Master Vobwi goodbye and wandered on.

Ori frowned, then looked again. There was Buer’s stall. They made their way over. Inside Buer’s stall, Omosuil busily cooked something in oil, and talked to customers, moving constantly as a young man stood behind him spinning sugar floss onto cones of paper.

Instead of simply the plain stall with lights, there was now a sign across the top on all four sides. The signs read:

\begin{center}
\textit{Master Almost’s Fried Lembas - Puts Hair On Your Chest: 5 Coppers}
\textit{With or w/out cheese.}
\textit{Bacon optional, as well.}
\end{center}

Another sign, just below counter height, read:
The ‘blueberry’ was printed on a placard which hung from two hooks and could easily be changed out.

As they approached the stall, they saw Kili and Tauriel waiting in line. Kili waved to them. An odd, but nicely fragrant and familiar smell wafted from the stall.

“What’s Omosuil doing in Buer’s candy floss stand?” Ori asked. “Who’s Master Alm—Oh! Isn’t that what Vi and Margr called him?”

Kili nodded,

“Omosuil bought out the place from Buer. He had some dwarrow stone masons make plinths for the machine and fryer, so he doesn’t have to bend so far to reach them.”

“He bought the stand?” Ori echoed then glanced up at the woodland king. “What about his position in your guard?”

“He’s resigned his commission and runs this place instead.” Cemnesta looked amused.

“Really? He’s staying in Erebor?”

“Yes, and he seems very happy, doesn’t he?”

“He does. Can he make a living this way?” Ori turned to Kili

“Between this and his pension, he can,” the younger prince smiled.

“It does seem wildly popular. Is he using your recipe?”

“I gave it to him with my blessing,” said Kili. “It’s not like I’m going to go into the fried lembas business.”

“Who’s in there with him?” Eowyn asked.

“No idea,” Kili said. He craned his neck for a better look at the assistant. “I’m guessing he has a helper, because it’s hard to make candy floss and fry lembas at the same time.”

There was a roar and the people in line turned to see the First March Warden of Gondor, red cloak flapping, chasing a squealing group of badgers, faunts, children and a couple of the Aldernay fawns. Bilbo and Thorin strolled up, greeting folk and accepting good wishes. They paused to allow the Wild Hunt to tear across their path. Butter and Sugar barked encouragement.

“‘Scuse us!” Boromir shouted gleefully and careened after his prey.

“That’s quite a group,” Thorin commented as they arrived.

“Which raises an interesting question,” Bilbo mused. “Dwarf young are called ‘badgers’, elves are ‘fawns,’ hobbits call theirs ‘faunts’ and men call them ‘children’. What does one call a mixed group like that?”

“A racket,” Kili suggested, making his wife giggle.

“True,” Arivett said, “you two are having a dwelf and Eomer and I’m having a… Hmmm, what will it be called?”

Ori chuckled. “If I remember correctly, the choice was a ‘morf’, a ‘dwan’ or a ‘marf’.”

Bilbo and Cemnesta snickered.

“Yes,” Eowyn agreed. “I like marf, too. But what would one call a group?”

Thorin watched Boromir’s quarries bounding around in delight.

“Seeing as how in groups, they act like baby goats, I say we call them ‘kids’.”

“Kids,” Bilbo echoed, “yes, I think that will do nicely.”

The line ahead had been served and they greeted Omosuil. The retired elf captain refused payment for their order as he explained, it was with their help, he had found a wonderful new craft. He tried out his khuzdul on Kili and Thorin, who encouraged him. Ori got some blueberry spun sugar and found it delicious. Arivett, Cemnesta, and Eowyn tried the fried lembas with cheese and bacon, and approved of them highly. Thorin and Bilbo shared a cone of spun sugar and Kili and Tauriel had a cheese lembas.
They took leave of Omosuil and continued to wander. More and more people were now dressed in costumes and dancing in the open square. Goats, ponies, and pigs romped past. There were a few sheep, several Durins, and any number of ‘rocks’ and ‘gems’ doing the wag. Ori waved to Fanny and Mavey strolling by.

Two dwarrow in a horse costume trotted up.
“Hullo, our Ori!” it cried.
Ori stared at the horse.
“Mistress Vi?”
“Aye, it’s us. Say, our Mar, our Ori’s here.”
“Happy Durin’s Day, our Ori!” Margr brayed.
“Happy Durin’s Day, Mistress Margr,” said Ori politely. “I like your costume.”
“Ta, chuck,” said Vi. “It’s our Glorfy’s horse, Assfelloff. Wha’ d’ yeh think?”
“It’s an exact likeness,” said Ori.
“Aye, we figured, we’re allus ridin’ him, so why shouldn’t we be somethin’ he’s allus ridin’?”
“An excellent point,” said Ori.
Margr said, “Oi! Our Vi! Yeh’ve go’ ever so wide a bum. Why ain’t yeh th’ back a’ this thin’?”
“Hush yeh, b’f’r I fart on yeh,” said Vi.
The two took their leave and trotted off.
“Fuckin’ eh!” said Durin in Ori’s head

As piss, laddie. As piss.

“You should be,” said Ori, “they defeated a balrog.”
“Aye, they dowsed it in water an’ trod on it. I like dams who show initiative.”

After they finished their treats, Arivett dragged Eowyn, Cemnesta, Kili, and Tauriel off to the square, and joined the revelers doing the roscobal hop. Ori wondered at the stamina of dwarrowdams. He was in awe that Arivett, heavily pregnant, could prance around the place, and keep up with her companions. Ori saw Vi and Margr, still in costume, hopping gamely along with them.

Thorin, Bilbo and Ori meandered back to the feasting tables. Bard was parked on a table, one booted foot on the ground, the other on a bench. He looked feral. Unger, in front of him, looked mulish.

“Unger,” said Bard, “I’m afraid I’m not serving you well enough, not seeing to your particular needs.”
“I would never say such a thing, sire!” Unger assured him.
Bard winced at ‘sire’, but he continued on.
“Nonetheless, to make sure you get the attention you deserve, I’m designating one person to hear you out whenever you feel you have something vital to add or request of the crown.”

Unger looked like he’d been handed a box of iklars.
“And who would that be, sire?”
“That would be me,” said Thranduil.
The king-father swept around in a cloud of deep gold silk and organza, with a tiara of colorful autumn leaves.

Unger’s jaw bounced. Really, Ori felt he heard it.
Thranduil loomed over the stunned man.
“You will let me know if you need anything, won’t you?” Thranduil purred.

Unger babbled something of being at Thranduil’s service, bowed, and got out of there as quickly as was feasible.
Ori raised a brow in Bard’s direction.
“You’ve been taking kinging lessons.”
“I’ve only learned from the best,” said Bard gleefully. He slid an arm about the king-father’s waist and winked at Thorin, who laughed at them.

“You look wonderful in autumnal colors, Thranduil,” Bilbo commented as he looked the king-father over critically.

“As you do in Durin blue,” Thranduil complimented in his turn.

“Thranduil,” Thorin said, smiling in admiration at his husband, “I can honestly say I agree with you entirely.”

“I like it,” Bard said with a laugh in his voice. “Bilbo matches you and my sweetie looks all warm and cozy. Makes you want to curl up in front of a good fire with a mug of spiced cider.”

Thranduil’s eyes slid over and his cheeks flushed slightly. Ori quietly sketched the scene and made notes, valiantly trying not to laugh as he did.

“How very cuddly sounding,” Thorin teased.

“He is,” Bard grinned.

“Is he?” Thorin added. He clearly enjoyed the king-father’s still reddening face. “I had not heard he had such a talent.”

“I have many talents of which you know nothing, Oakenshield,” Thranduil quipped.

“How intriguing,” Thorin went on. “Do tell, or should we ask Bard?”

“Well, let me tell you, Thorin- ” Bard started, but Bilbo hushed Thorin and Thranduil gave Bard a shove with his hip.

A shout from the left made the five turn.

Mr. Wandi and Haldir rode astride Fanny’s neck and waved to them. They waved back. Ori hurriedly caught this for posterity. Mavey walked beside Fanny, patting her trunk, and Beorn walked on the other side, seeming to talk to both Mavey and Fanny.

Ori craned his neck and saw the crowd of ‘kids’ waiting for a turn in Castle Bounce. Boromir and Eomer, stripped to tunics, breeches and socks, were there, making sure the kids got the bouncing of their lives. Arivett and Lavender seemed to have cleaned out a candy vendor somewhere and were passing out sweets to every group that exited the castle.

Near some game stalls, Ori saw Ursith, clad in his hat and Durin blue. Ursith wandered about, handed out gold coins to all the kids, and patted them on the head. The parents seemed a bit leery of the infamous underworld boss as Ursith handed out bit of paper to the parents. Ori closed the distance to hear Ursith burble, “Openin’ soon! Lots a’ prizes an’ low stakes games! I’m havin’ a big music show. Bring th’ whole family!”

Ori realized he was talking about the Dale casino, but what kind of a musical show he meant, Ori had no idea. He wondered who would be there and if he would be sent to take notes. Thorin had certainly spoken privately with Nori many times.

Ori finished off a sketch of Ursith with his hat askew and his mouth wide open, when he was bumped into.

“Howdy-do, wee feller!” Ursith spouted genially. He promptly handed Ori a gold coin and patted him soundly on the head. Ori looked about, saw no one was watching and kicked Ursith’s shin.

“Fuck off, ya liddle mole,” Nori’s voice hissed. “Gimme back me coin.”

Ori stuck out his tongue.

“No. I’m going to use it to pick my teeth.”

“Long’s yeh don’t shove it up yer hubby’s bum,” Ursith snapped.

“If I do, that’s when you’ll get it back.”

“Wee shit.”

“Oh, go propose to Dori.”

“Oooo!” Ursith brightened up. “Now there’s a big, fat idea. ’Scuse me, youngster.”

Ori snickered to himself as Ursith pranced away, stopping only to buy an extremely ugly table lamp as an offering.

Ori walked further along and came across a small area of iKeyha inflatable furniture. Here Bombur and Erda sat on one end of a couch, and Dain and Sculdis on the other. Then the Urs stood, then sat down hard. Dain and Sculdis bounced high. Then Dain and Sculdis stood and sat down hard, sending the Urs aloft. They continued to take turns, both couples intent on seeing how high they could bounce each other.
After visiting every shop, stall and vendor, they all made their way back to the high table. Finally, Bilbo had leaned forward to talk to a happy, but weary, Dori, then sat upright and gestured to Hijil, who bowed and went off to the last of the kitchen’s wagons.

“Well, my dear,” said Bilbo.

Thorin turned to him and followed his gaze to the next seat over, where Sam and Frodo cuddled together, asleep, with Dis’ shawl over them.

“Well, ghivasha,” said Thorin. “I think it’s time.”

With Thorin’s leave, Balin and Dori stood. Sculdís smacked Dain’s arm as the two of them arrived with the Urs in tow. To Ori’s amusement, everything stopped.

Dori waved cheerily.

“Oh, we’re just retiring for the night. Please continue to enjoy yourselves - and make sure you eat something to go with all that ale!”

The crowd chanted, “Yes, Bearer.”

“Such cheek!” Dori tut-tutted.

Hamfast and Bell rose as well. Thorin and Bilbo went and embraced them as the tween Gardeners collected Frodo and their sleepy younger siblings. Thorin and Bilbo kissed each of them on the top of the head.

“Bell, Hamfast, thank you for taking care of Frodo,” said Bilbo. “I know he’s a handful.”

“I’m a handful,” Frodo mumbled.

Hamfast snorted.

“Right, you’re a little terror. Not to worry, Bilbo, we’ll bring him back in time for his lessons next week.”

“How are you getting home?” Thorin asked.

“Hamson’s takin’ us in the cart,” said Bell, “then he’s off with his brother and Snowdrop to the fun fair for the Durin’s Day party. I suppose you two will give it a miss this year for a private party of your own.”

Bilbo sputtered and Thorin reddened.

“How is it,” Thorin asked, “that you’ve made me blush at my age, Mistress Bell? Are you receiving oracular messages from my mother?”

“Just practicin’ for me daughter’s wedding,” she replied, and patted his cheek. “You blush, but I’m aimin’ to make Boromir’s head pop clean off.”

“Practice makes perfect,” Thorin agreed, and kissed her forehead.

Thorin gestured for Arb to escort them out.

Rather than sit back down, Thorin grinned at Bilbo.

Bilbo gave him the eye, but turned to speak to the revelers by waving a hand to the musicians, who quieted right away. Everyone turned to look.

“My friends,” Bilbo called out. “It’s also time for us to retire for the evening, but we have one more duty to perform before we go.”

Hijil and his staff wheeled out an enormous platter of ginger-spiced cakes from the final wagon.

Thorin took Bilbo’s hand and walked to the platter, as did every unmarried person, followed by quite a few who were already married, but just wanted a cake from the hands of the newlyweds.

Ori thought this was a graceful way for the royal couple to accept the congratulations of their people and still be able to retire before dawn.

Dwalin looked over Ori’s shoulder as Ori sketched the royal couple and their well-wishers.

“Stay’r go?” Dwalin asked.

“If we go,” Ori mused, still drawing, “maybe we can spend a few moments alone in each other’s company before we either fall asleep or someone attempts to slaughter someone else or the rest of the Misty Mountains explode.”

“Never realized yeh were such a strategist,” Dwalin teased.

“I’ve learned from the best,” Ori teased back.
Dwalin lifted Ori onto Gnasher’s saddle, then swung up behind him. Ori smiled at the memory of when he had first ridden the goat. He looked back at Dwalin, who grinned and ran two fingers along Ori’s marriage braid.

“I have no idea how I managed it,” Ori mused, “but I love you so much more now, than I did then.”

“I’m jus’ too bleedin’ charmin’ f’r yeh t’ resist,” Dwalin teased.

“You are,” Ori agreed. Dwalin turned beetroot and hugged him close for a moment.

Ori looked about as they waited. Balin and Thorin boosted an exhausted Dori into the teacup with Bilbo already inside, pulling Dori in. Ori was a little aghast to realize just how large Dori had become carrying the two badgers. Despite that, Dori had spent most of the day dancing and fussing over arrangements. Ori smiled. Even being twice his usual size and heavy with badgers, Dori was still the strongest dwarf Ori had ever met. He wondered if he would ever be able to match Dori’s fortitude, then decided he didn’t want to.

He looked around, the party was still going on. Musicians switched out with each other. Dancers whirled around the space. Ori saw Uristh with Yizaris on one arm, Granny Klak on the other, doing a dance that involved a lot of high kicks. He made a quick sketch.

The circus was full of blinking colored lights and mobs of people. The entire platform was filled with merrymakers, most in costume. The feasting benches had been left and were now populated with drinkers, alongside the benches, more barrels of ale and wine still waited to be rolled out. Two huge, festooned wagons arrive. There was a sign on either side proclaiming, ‘Moo & Cluck in Motion’. Haldir and Mr. Wandi headed toward the wagons at a dead run.

“I suppose it’s official, now,” Ori commented. Dwalin chuckled.

“More like givin’ in t’ the masses.”

Slowly, the teacup and Grinder moved through the crowd, as people shouted good wishes and lewd comments. Ori thought that Butter and Sugar looked ready to be away from the noise and crowds. Killer padded next to Grinder. It took some time, but they managed to make it to the end of the platform and were able to pick up speed.

The royal cavern was silent and only marked by the sounds of their movement and muted glow of the stones showing the way along the road. Fundin House was in a low glow with the phosphorous lamps over the front door and the stable.

Balin drove the teacup into the yard and Thorin and Dwalin unhitched and took the animals through to the stable. Bilbo and Ori steadied Dori up and into the house. There was a single lamp in the receiving room for returning guests. Beside it, on the table, were many candelabras for people to light and find their way to their rooms.

Bilbo and Ori helped a yawning Dori into the sitting room and through to the master bedroom. Bilbo came from the stable, thanked them and took Dori in and closed the door.

“I want a cup of plain ordinary tea,” Bilbo said, tiredly. “What about you?”

“That sounds wonderful,” Ori said, brightening up at the thought.

Bilbo took Ori’s hand and led the way through to the kitchen of Bag-End East.
Bilbo had the kettle on and Ori was placing mugs, milk and sugar on a tray when they heard Thorin and Dwalin laughing. The two came in, Dwalin had Durin’s keg on his shoulder.

“Tea first,” Bilbo instructed as Thorin came through, kissed Bilbo, and fetched out a tap and a stand for the keg.

Ori brought the tray and Bilbo followed with the teapot. The sitting room fire was on and shadows of ravens danced over the walls and ceiling. Dwalin lay on the floor, his hands clasped behind his head, eyes closed. Ori saw that his husband had changed into his pink drawers and had chucked aside his boots and weaponry. Thorin was nowhere to be seen.

Bilbo set the pot on the nearby table and poked Dwalin’s shoulder with his toe.

“Do you intend to bed down there for the night?”

Dwalin chuckled and, in a swift movement, grabbed Bilbo’s foot and shook it lightly.

“Nah, wee nug. Let th’ tea seep an’ go git outta them glad rags. Yeh look starched in ‘em.

Bonny, bu’ starched.”

“A good notion,” Bilbo said, “I agree.”

The hobbit headed off to change. Ori went to Dwalin as his husband sat up.

“Here,” Dwalin handed him a folded cloth. Ori shook it out. It was the old pink night shirt and Ori’s cardigan. Ori gave a sigh of relief and, with Dwalin’s help, got into nightwear. They folded and carefully laid Dipfa’s creation over the arm of a chair and Ori plopped down on the rug.

Thorin and Bilbo wandered in hand in hand, Thorin wearing thin cotton breeches and Bilbo, the matching nightshirt.

Dwalin frowned at Thorin.

“B’fore thin’s get cozy, I’ll fuckin’ kill Ulfr for wha’ he said. Say th’ word an’ he dies.”

Bilbo looked shocked, but Thorin merely shrugged.

“I have too much respect for Yizaris to do that. However, I will speak to her before they leave. If she wants him gone, it will happen. I am willing to see if Buer can reform him as Durin directed.”

Dwalin grunted assent, saying, “Then I’m done wi’ i’.”

Bilbo poured out tea and passed the mugs out. Dwalin sprawled on his side with Ori leaning against him. Ori watched as Thorin dropped down on his stomach and lay still on the rug, face down for a moment.

“My love?” Bilbo giggled. “Are you asleep?”

“No,” Thorin’s voice sidled out of the rug. “I’m just being dead for a minute.”

“It’s good to be king, but a bit tiring?” Ori guessed.

“Yes,” mumbled Thorin, and rolled over. “Thror was never as social as I’ve been on the best days of his life. Months would go by before any of the common people of the mountain saw him. People see me everyday.” Thorin smiled and sipped his tea. “I wouldn’t have it any other way. The best way for me to know what’s going on, is to talk to people.”

“You do it very well,” Bilbo praised and sat crosslegged against Thorin. Bilbo leaned nearer, licked his thumb and rubbed the corner of Thorin’s eye.

“Eh?” Thorin asked.

“You missed some of the charcoal.”

“Ah, thank you, beloved.”

“You looked amazing, Thorin,” Ori told him.

“Did you get some good drawings?” Bilbo asked eagerly. Ori hopped up and fetched his sketchbook.

They all lay on the floor together, going through the pictures before the fire.

“There we all are.”

“That cloak is wonderful, my dear!”

“Here we are exchanging rings. Ori, this is lovely.”

“Look, Amrâlimê. The crown looks perfect on you.”

“Here’s everyone singing.”

“Here’s Red Queen and Blu being drunk.”

“I don’t want to know. If they somehow produce an egg, I’ll have to send Roäc to the healer for mental help.”
“There’s yeh eatin’ spicy soup.”
“It was delicious. I must get the recipe.”
“That reminds me, you and Ori never got that.”
“Don’t miss it, we go’ three cats, a bat, an’ a warg. We’re full up.”
“ Completely full.”
“Wha’ th’ fuck’s tha’ thin’ on Arivett’s shoulder?”
“Master Vobwi says it’s called a chameleon. It eats flying bugs.”
“Is that Beorn and Mavey?”
“Beorn seems to like talking to Mavey and Fanny.”
“Imagine those two as a couple.”
“Don’t think Beorn’s int’ olipahunts, love.”
“Beorn’s too old for Mavey.”
“He’s too big for her. I heard Eowyn say he was too big for her and she’s a woman.”
“Poor Beorn, too big for Eowyn and too old for Fanny.”
“I’m not going to think about either of those things!”
“Great Mahal, is that Ursith dancing with Yizaris and Granny Klak?!”
Ori blinked. The images on the pages wavered and doubled as the other three went back and forth through the book.

Ori opened an eye. His head was pillowed on one of Bilbo’s and Thorin’s sofa cushions. Dwalin snored behind him. Bilbo’s curls were before him and Thorin breathed quietly into them, fluffing the curls into Ori’s face. Ori could see that Butter and Sugar had lain down either side of Thorin and Dwalin and Killer lay across their feet.

Ori felt very warm. Bilbo stirred and opened his eyes. Ori blinked at him.
“Good night,” Bilbo murmured and kissed Ori.
“Night,” Ori mumbled and closed his eyes.

When Ori opened his eyes again he could just see dawn peeping over the wall that enclosed the meadow through an unfamiliar window. He was still sandwiched with Bilbo between Dwalin and Thorin, now both snoring. The floor was amazingly soft and the fireplace wasn’t there. He stared for a long time at the pinkish stone beyond his head. Rhodochrosite, his brain informed him.

“Rhodochrosite,” Ori muttered.
“Not in pie,” Bilbo murmured.
“Too hard on the teeth,” Ori agreed as he wondered why they would be making rock pies. Maybe they would be like mud pies, but would have rocks and gems in them to represent fruit. Would these be sacrificed? Would Mahal like rock pies? “Would we sacrifice them to Mahal?” he asked himself.

“For tea,” Bilbo mumbled.
“Mahal’s coming to tea,” Ori decided.
“Tea’s at four o’clock,” Bilbo replied.
“Four o’clock,” Ori affirmed.
“I want a cup of tea,” Bilbo said.
“It’s not four o’clock, Ori pointed out.
“Botheration,” Bilbo griped. Ori was aware of stifled sounds on either side of himself and Bilbo. He frowned then blinked. Dwalin and Thorin were desperately trying not to laugh. Ori looked at Bilbo, who blinked and shook his head, then sat up.

“We’re in bed,” Bilbo informed Ori.
Ori thought this over while he stared at an unfamiliar ceiling.
“Whose bed?” he asked.
“No, what,” Bilbo corrected.
“What?” Ori asked.
“No one I know is named bed,” Bilbo frowned.
“Why would anyone name their child ‘bed’?” Ori asked frowning. He sat up, too. Dwalin and Thorin were face down in the pillows, each shaking with stifled laughter.
“Oh, stop laughing, you silly dwarf,” Bilbo ordered rubbing the sleep from his eyes. “Ori and I were just a little confused.”
Thorin rolled over and roared with laughter as Dwalin remained helpless on his face.
“Hmmm,” said Bilbo. “First breakfast or bath? For a hobbit, I’m curiously undecided.”
“How about toast and tea, then a bath?” Ori suggested. “Then you can have first and a half breakfast if you’re still really hungry?”
“Genius, my dear Ori, sheer genius!” Bilbo proclaimed.
“I knew tha’,” said Dwalin as he rolled over with a grin and a wink for his husband.
“I feel rather bad that we interrupted your wedding night,” said Ori. “Aren’t you supposed to consummate or something?”

Bilbo tugged on his dressing gown.
“Sounds like Vi and Margr: Ain’t yeh supposed t’ contemplate ‘r somethin’ , our Bilbo? Or it ain’t official? Aye, our Vi, our Lady. Yavanna might be righ’ miffed, make dandelions grow in their crotch hairs.”
“We’ve been ‘contemplatin’ for almost a sixmonth, ghivasha. I believe our crotch hairs are safe.”
Thorin squawked abruptly, and shot forward, squishing them all together.
“Thorin? Are you alright?” Bilbo asked.
“Yes, fine, just a cold, wet warg nose at the small of my back.”
Ori half sat up and peered over Thorin. Sugar sat at the side of the bed, and Ori would swear she was smiling. Butter lay on her back, all paws in the air, tongue lolling out nearly to her ear, looking cute.
“They need to go out,” said Thorin with a sigh. He stood. “You know, my damlings, if you really cared about your king’s beauty sleep, you’d learn to unlatch the doors yourselves.”

“Toast,” said Bilbo.
“Yes,” said Ori. He nodded. “It’s an idea whose time has come.”
They bundled up a little, more for sleepy comfort than any real cold, though Ori felt the draft as Thorin let the wargs out, and he knew summer was over. In the kitchen, Bilbo turned up the oven as Ori collected the abandoned tea things from the sitting room and rinsed them out.
Ori had rarely eaten more satisfying toast. Somehow, Bilbo managed to toast the bread on both sides, not just one, and he laid out pots of six different kinds of jams, and clotted cream as well as butter, because it was dwarven bread, and was up to the challenge of carrying it without falling apart.
“You could sell this toast from a market stall,” said Ori.
He sat on Dwalin’s lap at the kitchen table. He held his teacup in one hand, With the other, he played with the bead in Dwalin’s beard.
“Alas,” Bilbo replied, “I’m going to be a little busy ‘consorting’. Perhaps Omosuil would be interested. He’d have to widen out his stall.”
“While he widens ou’ our waistlines,” Dwalin noted as he fed Ori toast slathered with butter and blackberry preserves.
“Mmmm,” Ori hummed as he licked off Dwalin’s fingers. He held Dwalin’s gaze and gave him a little smile. “Tasty.”
Thorin chuckled.
“Shall we leave the two of you alone with the toast?”
“Did yeh say somethin’, our Thorin?” Dwalin asked. He leaned forward and licked the smear of jam off Ori’s lips.

“Nothing important,” said Thorin.

Ori kissed Dwalin, Dwalin kissed Ori. Ori put down the teacup. When they came up for air, Thorin and Bilbo were gone.

“Gone t’ ‘bathe’,” said Dwalin with a chuckle.

“Shall we join them?” Ori asked.

Dwalin’s grin turned naughty.

“Yeh know, tha’s a really deep tub. An’ a really waterproof bathroom.”

“You wouldn’t,” said Ori with a grin of his own.

“A’ course I would,” said Dwalin.

Ori scampered after Dwalin as the warrior ran through the house, hopped out of his pink drawers, and roared like a warg. The actual wargs, now sprawled at the fireplace, opened an eye each to watch him, then went back to their nap. Ori reached the bathroom doorway just in time to see Dwalin leap, tuck his knees to his chest and fly right over Thorin and Bilbo to land like a boulder in a puddle, right in the middle of the tub.

The tidal wave was magnificent.

“And now, the floor show,” said Thorin dryly.

Bilbo stood with this hand on his hip, only about knee deep in water even for him, as the excess water flowed down drains in the bathroom floor.

“Dwalin!” he cried in exasperation as he gestured to his impressive erection. “You’re holding up progress!”

Dwalin grinned up at Bilbo.

“An’ wha’ d’yeh wan’ me t’ do abou’ tha’, our nug?”

“The least you could do is hold up progress!”

“Ah. I kin do tha’,” said Dwalin.

Thorin chuckled and went to turn on the taps again while Ori tossed his cardi and nightshirt back onto the bench in the bedroom.

He turned to step down into the tub, and Thorin held out a hand to help him.

“They’re incorrigible,” said Ori. “Ooo, the water is nice.”

“There should be more of it shortly,” said Thorin.

He sat. Ori sat in his lap.

“Hullo,” said Ori cheekily.

“Hello and welcome, milord scholar. I hope the seat is to your liking.”

“Best seat to watch the floor show from, your majesty.”

They laughed and rested their foreheads together for a moment.

“I’m so happy for you, Thorin.”

“Thank you, Ori. Shall we?”

“Mmm, what do you have in mind?”

“I was thinking I’d turn you to face the current debauchery, fiddle with your bits and, hopefully, enjoy your backside sliding against my bits. We could even add a little oil to the proceedings, now that the tide is coming back in.”

“Sounds lovely,” Ori murmured, and kissed him.

How was kissing Thorin different from kissing Dwalin, or Bilbo, for that matter? Ori had no idea there were as many styles of kissing as there were styles of handwriting.

Dwalin’s kiss just curled his toes, his beard, sometimes his earlobes, it was so all-consuming, and Ori was quite eager to be consumed. Ori’s Song rose in power and volume the longer it went on.

Bilbo’s kiss was soft, but strong, seductive, but with potential behind it that hinted at what was to follow.

Thorin kissed with pure joy in the act. Every kiss came through as a smile, as if he were giving and receiving a present.

Ori giggled to himself. It wasn’t a goat-poop hair bead, either.

Dwalin had once told Ori that Crown Prince Thorin was required to be publicly grim, and even harsh, over so many years, that his tender aspects erupted like lava in private. He was the sweetest ‘bottom’ Dwalin had ever loved.

“Not me?” Ori cringed to remember the tiny squeak of his voice.

Dwalin had held Ori’s face in his hands and gave him a wink.

“Yeh ain’t a bottom, love. Yer a snow bear in trainin’.”

It was true that Ori insisted on playing ‘Gonad’ to Dwalin’s ‘maiden’. Couldn’t let those perfect pumpkins go to waste.

Thorin had a nice grip on Ori’s own pumpkins right then, and his mouth on Ori’s neck.

“Oh, mark me,” Ori breathed.

Thorin’s prick shook between Ori’s legs.

“Are you sure?”

“Yes, I have all these scarves, I should put some of them to use.”

“Do you still have the one with little representations of Dwalin’s bottom all over it?”

“I only wear that one for special occasions.”

Meanwhile, across the tub, Bilbo said to Dwalin, “Shall I ride you?”

“Aye, tha’d be grand,” said Dwalin. “Do yeh have some oil?”

“Yes,” Bilbo said, wryly, “Mr Wandi makes sure we have a constant supply.”

It sounded like Bilbo was rummaging in a shelf built into the wall by the tub, just above the high tide mark.

“Here we go. This ought to make everything quite slippery. I may have to latch on to your chest hair to keep my place.”

“I go’ somethin’ tha’ll keep yeh in place, our nug.”

“I look forward to a demonstration. After all this fuss, I’m looking for something unfussy. Bet you thought you’d never hear a hobbit say that.”

Thorin turned Ori in his lap to face their companions, but did not abandon his work at Ori’s neck, merely shifted toward the nape, still sucking and licking, riling up the scribe and soothing him by turns.

Ori gasped in tearing breath at what he saw.

Bilbo stood with his back to them, straddling Dwalin’s legs. He leaned forward, hands on Dwalin’s shoulders as they kissed.

Dwalin had his own cock in a his left hand, and the thick, oiled forefinger of his right hand up the hobbit’s bum. As Ori watched, a second joined it.

Bilbo groaned.

“Dwarven fingers are are my favorite fingers in all of Arda. Oh. Remind me to write that down. I can use that.”

Thorin chuckled into Ori’s skin.

“Stop writing, ghivasha.”

“Our Thorin’s righ’,” Dwalin enforced. “Yeh need t’ focus.”

Ori watched, fascinated, as the muscles of Bilbo’s bottom flexed under all that velvet flesh.

“Oli!” Dwalin cried. “I ain’t half finished yet!”

“Sorry, just focussing,” said Bilbo.

“Some hobbits,” Dwalin grumbled, but kissed Bilbo anyway.
“Wee bi’ more oil?” Dwalin asked.
“Yes please, then I believe I’m ready.”
Dwalin complied. The light scent of the fresh oil tickled Ori’s memory.
“My dear?” Bilbo called.
Thorin looked up and Bilbo tossed him the closed flask, which Thorin caught with one hand.
“Would you care to sample the vintage, Ori?”
Ori took the oil, opened it and sniffed. It smelled divine. It smelled seductive. It smelled like…
“Is there tea in this oil?” Ori asked.
“Yes,” said Bilbo, “what better to perk us up? And the tannins are soothing to one’s skin.”
“Aye, thank bleedin’ Mahal f’r tha’,” said Dwalin. “Yeh know I worry abou’ me complexion.”
Ori handed back the flask to Thorin
“Stand up a little.”
Ori did so.
Thorin poured the oil down the small of his back. Ori shivered as it trickled down between his arse cheeks, followed by the carress of Thorin’s hand. Gently, Thorin drew Ori back against him once more. Ori hummed as Thorin’s ever-stiffening cock grazed his crack.
A film of oil coated the top of the hot water. The tiny voice in Ori’s brain wondered if they would slip and crack their skulls open as they tried to get out. Ori took that voice, gagged it, bound it, stuffed it in a trunk, secured the trunk with chains and tossed it with a five hundred pound weight into the Bay of Forochel.
The water had all but covered Dwalin’s dwarfhood. By the time Thorin closed the taps, there was just tease of it sticking up through the surface, like the tip of a boulder in a pond. Bilbo slid through Dwalin’s hands and neatly encased just the part exposed to the air. With great control, or sheer hobbit stubbornness, Bilbo pulled up a bit, then dropped a little further in the same, slow, powerful manner.
“Look at him,” said Ori.
He heard Thorin swallow.
“I am looking, I promise you.”
While he nibbled Ori’s ear, his fingers played in the slickness of Ori’s chest fur, found his nipple and circled the nub, before he drew the whole length of his forefinger across it, then back and forth again, and again, so slow and so gentle. Ori shivered and mewed. He leaned a little harder into Thorin, and trapped his prick between them. He used what purchase he could find to rub his back against Thorin’s front.
Thorin kissed his shoulder lingeringly, and let his hand drift down Ori’s belly.
“You want to jerk me off?” Ori asked.
“Only if you’ll play with your nipples for me. I want to watch you.”
“What about yours?”
“Between your back and my nipple rings, you’re taking care of it already.”
“How efficient we are,” said Ori.
“It is the dwarven way,” Thorin reminded him.
Across the tub, Bilbo sunk down extra hard and Dwalin let his head drop back and he moaned. Warm water splashed and heaved around them.
“Oh,” Ori breathed.
“What do you think?” Thorin asked.
“So beautiful,” said Ori.
His prick surged in Thorin’s hand.
“You’re beautiful,” Thorin purred.
Ori felt Thorin’s mouth on his neck, right above his pulse. Ori couldn’t understand how he felt so aroused and yet, so languid all at once. A little more of this and Ori could easily slip beneath the oil and never notice.
Luckily, with one of Thorin’s arms around his waist, Ori was in no danger of drowning in anything but pleasure. Thorin’s arm tightened and Thorin leaned into him harder.
“This is just too good,” Thorin groaned. Already he seemed to be growing restless, breathing heavier.
“Can you keep hold of my waist?” Ori asked.
“Huh?” Thorin asked distractedly.
“So we stay, you know, connected and I don’t slide off into the water?”
“I would need both hands.”
“That’s fine.”
Thorin linked his hands around Ori’s waist. Ori leaned his shoulders forward and pushed his bum back hard, which squeezed Thorin’s erection in a hot, slippery grip against his lower belly. Thorin gasped out a violent groan.
“You’ll have to help me,” Ori said.
“I can do that,” said Thorin tightly.
He adjusted his hold and pulled. Ori slid back over Thorin’s thighs and right into his pelvis. Ori thought he might look slightly ridiculous, but it felt so nice to him, and he could tell it felt blissful to Thorin, who started to mutter obscenities under his breath and only grew louder from there.
Across the tub, Bilbo and Dwalin appeared to be in a competition, plunging down and bowing up with increasing force. Dwalin hands slid up and down Bilbo’s sides with every pump.
“Oh, yes, oh yes, right there, you lovely thing,” Bilbo praised.
Dwalin chuckled and muttered something about hobbit endurance and, “Kin I grab yer cock, our nug?”
“Not without me tumbling over. I don’t think I need it anyway. This is… mmm, yes.”
Then Ori lost track of time, and his surroundings, as Thorin shuddered beneath him, not so much an eruptive climax, but a slow, achingly fine ride to trembling, then shivers, and finally Thorin dropped his forehead onto Ori’s shoulder.
“Great, bloody Mahal,” Thorin gasped. He sat back, drawing Ori with him. “Talk to me, Ori. Tell me what you want.”
Ori felt like the emperor of sex at that moment, and he only shook a little, from excitement, as he said, grandly, “Your hand on my cock is all I want … right now.”
“My, you are spending a lot of time with my husband,” said Thorin.
Ori felt Thorin’s smile against his skin, even as Thorin reached to grip him once more.
Ori squirmed. He was quite a bit more aroused now, and the rising cries across the tub did nothing to calm that. It was as though Bilbo and Dwalin were racing to make each other climax first, and Ori was out in front of both of them.
He watched through lowered lashes as Dwalin pounded Bilbo’s arse, then he closed his eye and let Thorin pull him down, moaning and thrashing, into the whirlpool.
Dwalin shouted, Bilbo shrieked and Ori’s eyes flew open.
Thorin’s deep voice laughed in his ear.
“You’re awake just in time for the grand finale.”
The heat flew up in Ori’s cheeks and he groaned. He remembered falling through the chasm of his completion. Apparently he had also fallen asleep.
No way he would be able to sleep through all of this.
Dwalin howled and Bilbo thrashed like was clawing his way out of his own skin. They had managed to climax, violently at nearly the same time. Ori knew that rarely happened. Though, the two of them were so competitive, Ori wasn’t really surprised.
He was impressed, though. Bilbo lifted on last time and Dwalin’s bright purple cock would not have looked tiny on Beorn.
What did Bilbo do to Dwalin that could cause something like that?
And would Bilbo teach him?
Bilbo slammed down. Dwalin roared. His pelvis heaved Bilbo up in the air, but Bilbo locked his ankles together behind
Dwalin’s back and rode out the whole of Dwalin’s storm and his own, firmly attached.
The pair of them collapsed into the bath, water and oil sloshed all around the tub.
“Fuck me,” Dwalin gasped.
“Maybe later,” said Bilbo.
Ori and Thorin must have tripped some form of unspoken communication between them, because they erupted into cheers, whistles and clapping all at one.
“Here here!” Thorin called.
“Author! Author!” Ori cried.
“Ta’,” said Dwalin. “Hope yeh don’ mind if we don’ bow righ’ now.”
“We’d fall on our heads,” Bilbo agreed.
He kissed Dwalin’s chest and slumped against him.
“Well, good night, folks.”
“It’s mornin’,” said Dwalin with a nudge.
“Hush, you, I’m trying to sleep.”
“I don’t believe I actually fell asleep,” said Ori.
Thorin hugged him.
“You’re exhausted, Ori. Go easy on yourself.”
Ori winced.
“Was I snoring?”
“You were snoring,” Thorin affirmed. “It was cute.”
Great, he’d gone from emperor of sex to stable boy in the matter of a few moment. The world was, indeed, a fickle place.
At least Thorin thought he was a cute stable boy, even if he did snore.
Eventually, Bilbo did sit up with a groan.
“Ori, my dear, come kiss your husband, I’ll kiss mine, and we can go in search of second breakfast.”
Ori splashed across the tub toward Dwalin, who grinned at him and opened his arms. Ori fell into them and into a kiss.
“Did yeh enjoy yerself, love?”
“Yes! We need to do this more often! That is, if it’s not impossible to clean out the tub afterward.”
“Superheated water from th’ geysers’ll take care a’ it, love, jus’ li’e th’ dishes.”
“I think we’ll have to seal up the chamber and simply rinse down the whole room,” said Thorin.
He held Bilbo in the curve of one arm and rubbed their slippery noses together. Dwalin fetched out towels and soap. The four went to the smaller shower area and scrubbed the oil off themselves.

“Good thing that bathroom seemed to be made for such,” Bilbo snickered as he dried off and put on a fresh nightshirt. “Bloody have t’ burn tha’ water,” Dwalin commented. Ori dried off and pulled his pink night shirt back on as Dwalin and Thorin followed looking like drowned rats. Thorin had a large towel over his head and water dripped from his hair onto the rug.

The four of them wandered out to Fundin House sitting room. Ori carried his satchel and Dwalin had Ori’s formal robes tossed over his shoulder. The house was silent. They went towards the kitchen just as Balin and Dori came through from their bedroom.

Balin greeted them cheerily. Dori stopped dead in her tracks and gaped at them. Ori wondered if his hair had done something it shouldn’t. To everyone’s surprise, Dori stamped up to Thorin in a towering rage.

“How dare you debauch my baby brother!”
Thorin looked at Dori in great surprise.
“I did not debauch your baby brother, Honored Bearer.”
“Oh,” Dori stopped short. “Well-”
“I debauched Dwalin’s husband,” Thorin said quietly and firmly.
“Oh!” Dori huffed. “I-”
“Dori!” Ori cried out.
“Pet I’m only-”
Ori did something he’d never dared or even thought to do. He growled at Dori.
Dori’s eyes flew wide and both Thorin and Dwalin looked impressed and stepped away from between the brothers.

“Pet!” Dori scolded. Ori frowned and stood his ground.
“Dori, no,” said Ori sharply.
The Bearer inhaled sharply and her bottom lip trembled.
Balin swallowed, looked at his brother and his king, looked at Ori then took Dori’s arm.
“Come along, me beloved. How abou’ a nice cuppa tea?”
“With biscuits?” Dori asked in a tearful voice.
“Aye, me hear’, with biscuits, an’ I think there’re still some lovely scones from earlier.”
Balin escorted Dori out. Ori sighed.
“I shouldn’t have growled.”
Thorin considered, and said, “Dori would have growled. Dori would probably have bitten.”
Dwalin came and put his arms about Ori.
“Yer fine, love. Yeh go’ t’ draw th’ line somewhere’s. Ore’s outta th’ mine.”
“Perhaps another cup of tea with us,” Bilbo said quickly and drew Ori back to Bag End East. Dwalin and Thorin went off into the depth of Fundin House and once more Ori was sitting in Bilbo’s kitchen.

Bilbo poured him a fresh cup. Ori knew he had been right but…

“Bilbo, did you have to go through this with your parents?”
Bilbo sat down next to Ori.

“Not really. Bungo was a Baggins through and through. I had excellent manners. Belladonna was the adventurer and both encouraged me to challenge myself. The difference is that you and your brothers, especially your brothers, lived desperate lives. Their first and natural instinct is to protect you.”

Thorin and Dwalin came back in. Dwalin was dressed and he carried a bundle of familiar looking material and Ori’s boots. Ori smiled and took them from Dwalin with a kiss.

“You’re right, Bilbo,” Ori sighed. “I just wish they would…not stop caring but…”

“Remember yeh’ve grown up?” Dwalin suggested.
“Yes,” Ori said as Bilbo poured out mugs of tea for Thorin and Dwalin. “I wish they could realize I’m not in danger from you and Thorin. Or Dwalin, for that matter. Dori is getting better about that.”

“Don’t worry too much, Ori,” said Thorin gently. “When the badgers are born, I think Dori’s protective instinct will switch to them and be more easygoing with you.”

Ori giggled. “You think? He followed me on the quest, remember? I do hope you’re right, though.”

“Speaking of which,” Thorin smiled. “Have you heard back from Master Brur?”

Ori shivered. “Not yet. I keep thinking he’s tearing my presentation down to about three pages.”

“No’ bloody likely,” Dwalin scoffed. “Yeh always underestima’e yerser’, love.”

Ori climbed into Dwalin’s lap and they chatted about the ceremony and party yesterday.

Ori decided a decent interval had passed and went through to the kitchen first. Dori as taking sweet bread buns stuffed with apple and cinnamon out of the oven. Ori’s mouth watered as Dori placed them on the table. They faced each other.

“Ori’s Dori?” “Dori’s Ori?”

They smiled and giggled half-heartedly.

“Pet,” said Dori. “I’m sorry, I shouldn’t have meddled. You’re grown up and I’m having new badgers to raise. It’s just I forget, and you’re my-“

Ori took Dori in his arms and they cuddled for a moment.

“I shouldn’t have growled at you, Dori. That was very wrong.”

“It brought me to my senses, so perhaps it was for the best,” Dori sighed. They sat at the table in silence together for a few minutes then,

“Dori’s Ori?”

“We don’t.”

“I just worry about you. Thorin is the king and Bilbo his consort. I’m worried you might feel obligated to be with them.” “Ori’s Dori, I didn’t have to go into the mine, I didn’t have to go into the treasury. Mahal, I didn’t have to go on the Quest. I chose to do those things. Just as I’ve chosen...

to...be with Thorin, and Bilbo.”

“Pet, as long as you’re happy-“

“I am happy, Ori’s Dori.”

“As long as they don’t do anything you don’t like, I mean after all…”

Ori giggled and put his nose to Dori’s.

“Dori, if you ask me one more time, I’ll tell you everything we did. In complete detail. Every lick-“

“Hush!” Dori squealed and pushed him away, laughing.

“Besides, would you tell me what you and Balin get up to? No, never mind I’ve heard it often enough.” Ori teased.

“Pet!” Dori giggled.

Ori tried to sit on Dori’s lap, but being so pregnant, Dori didn’t have much lap left.

“Pet, there isn’t room!”

“Spread your legs, oh that’s right, you only do that for Balin.”

“I’ll spank you!”

“You’ll have to catch me.”

“Pet!”

Dori rose and they embraced.

“Now,” said Dori as they sat back down, “have a bun.”

“Won’t it spoil my second breakfast?” Ori asked, the picture of innocence.

“Second breakfast, is it? Yes, it might, but with your mouth full, you can’t give me any more of your sauce.”

Bilbo and Thorin came in, sniffing, followed by sniffing wargs. Ori waved his bun at them. He was too busy to even try to speak around his mouthful.

Dori rose and went to Thorin.
“Your majesty, I am sorry-“

“Now, now, Dori.”  Thorin hugged the Bearer.  “You’re a parent.  I know.  Sometimes I have to catch myself from telling Kili to be careful when he’s using a fork at meals.”

“What kind of buns, Dori?” Bilbo asked, far more interested in the baking.

“Apple cinnamon sweet buns,” Dori announced.  “Do have some.”

Ori swallowed, “Even if it spoils your second breakfast.”

“On the side of the practical,” said Thorin as he bit into a bun.  “Dori, these are wonderful.  Are these going to be breakfast for our guests?”

“Thank you.  Yes, these and there is porridge with nuts and fruit. and coffee or tea,” Dori said with a smile.  “After all the romping last night I imagine something light is in order.”  Dori went back to the oven and removed another large tray of more buns.  Bilbo and Ori bustled to make tea and brew coffee.  Dwalin and Thorin took themselves to the breakfast parlor and began setting the table, which involved a great deal of juggling and throwing crockery and flatware.  The lock of the meadow doors rattled as they were thrown open and Ori heard Butter, Sugar and Killer barking and playing outside.

“I refuse to watch,” Dori muttered, filling platters with the buns and pouring threads of thin icing over the buns as decoration.  As Ori hefted the porridge pot into the warmer on the sideboard, he realized he had to have another bun, so he could taste the icing.

With everything set out and ready for when the guests decided to appear, Balin arrived fully dressed and sat down with them.  Beorn came in from the meadow, still wearing his party clothes, but rather rumpled.  Three happy wargs followed him and went to the full feeding bowls on the floor.

“I smell apples,” he said by way of a greeting.

Dori poured him a flagon of tea, piled a few buns on a plate and invited him to sit.  Beorn folded himself into a chair and began eating.  Dori placed a large bowl of steaming porridge at his elbow.

“Last time we saw you,” Thorin said, “you were talking with Mavey and Fanny.”

“She and I brought Fanny safely home,” Beorn drained his tea.  “Nice girl, Mavey.”

“She’s too young for you,” Dori told him, refilling his tea.

Balin and Dwalin snorted and Thorin rolled his eyes.  Beorn looked at Dori.

“Bearer, I assure you, I didn’t come seeking assistance to take a wife.”

“If you want one,” Ori put in, “Dori would love to help you.  Lady Galadriel, too.  And I’m sure Mistresses Margr and Vi would have lots of advice.”

Beorn grunted.  “You make me wish to flee, Ori.”

“Don’t do that,” Thorin laughed.  “We’ve hardly seen you.  Unless you are concerned for your animals.”

“No, the elf queen sent soldiers to watch over my lands while I’m away.  I have a few days to explore your mountain again.  I want to walk the land where the lava spilled down.”  Beorn finished the buns on his plate and began on his porridge.

“Please do,” Thorin invited.  “It was a very successful bleed and I value your opinion.  Hamfast Gardener is in charge of farming.  I’m sure he would like to hear as well.”

“Good morning,” Theoden breezed in.

“Welcome, Theoden brother,” Thorin said around a chorus of greetings.  “There is tea and coffee, but there is also a tapped barrel over there.”

“You know me so well,” Theoden chuckled and took a tankard from the sideboard and filled it.

“What have we here?”

“Apple buns,” Bilbo said.  “Dori made them this morning.”

“Delicious,” agreed Beorn around a mouthful.

“Whose buns?” Kili demanded as he and Tauriel walked in.

“We don’t know, Kili,” Bilbo said dryly.  “We haven’t met anyone named ‘buns’.”

“Aye, no’ even any named ‘bed’,” Dwalin said to no one in particular, making Ori and Thorin snicker and Bilbo wrinkle his nose.  Kili and Tauriel helped themselves to coffee and buns and praised the buns highly. Ori watched as Dwalin fed Killer a bun then patted the warg as it scooched under the table to lie on their feet.

The younger set arrived in a herd and swarmed over the food. Soon after, all the other guests came down and found places and demolished the rest of the buns and most of the porridge. They were all sitting about talking and laughing over the day before when a terrible screech tore through the open meadow door.

Baluchistan whirled through tail first, bounced off three of the walls, and disappeared into Dain’s hairdo, nearly knocking the Iron Hills monarch into his tea. The last sight of Baluchistan was his beak disappearing as he slid down the inside of Dain’s tunic. Dain blinked and twitched a little, but went back to his tea. Ori imagined it must have tickled. Sugar and Butter’s ears were perked interestingly.

Everyone glanced at each other. Ori realized he hadn’t seen Quartz since yesterday. Red Queen landed on the patio and strutted in. Tharkûn and Celeborn made room, while Arne swung another chair around for her. She perched on it, inspected the table, and Dori brought her a small bowl of coffee.

“Thank you, Honored Bearer. We would remark on the lateness of this meal but we are only just risen ourselves.”

The rest of the royal raven family led by Roäc winged in, landed on the table and went to their respective dwarrow to be fed bun crusts and fruit and nuts. Roäc strutted across the table to Thorin.

“Quite the rumpus, wasn’t it?”

“Should I ask?” Bilbo questioned.

“Heh. Her majesty thought she’d laid an egg.”

Red Queen raised her head from her coffee and rolled her eyes.

“We should have reconsidered how much ale we consumed last night.” She turned and bobbed her head to Thorin and Bilbo. “A delightful party. Will you be having another egg? Your current nestling is a lovely one.”

“Thank you,” Thorin replied gravely over a few snickers. “Bilbo and I are very proud of Frodo.”

“You should be. We are pleased we did not disturb any one. Our awakening was rather startling.”

“Did yeh have ’n egg, then?” Sculdis asked.

“No,” Red Queen paused to peer under the table then came back up to look around. “We dreamt we had, and woke and stood to look, but instead of an egg, there was that-“

“It was warm,” Baluchistan protested from somewhere in Dain’s clothing. “It was startling,” Red Queen repeated. “When we look under our feathers expecting to see an egg, we do not expect a pile of feathers to stare back at us.”

“I could see how that could be startling,” Dis commiserated.

“Indeed,” Lady Galadriel agreed.

Rather a lot of people were trying desperately trying not to laugh. Red Queen drew herself up then shook out her feathers and made a cackling noise.

“Yes, we agree, it was certainly a humorous situation. We are amused.”

“Mean I kin come ou’?” Baluchistan asked, still muffled.

“Aye,” Dain said and pulled his collar out and peered down his tunic.

“Blu, where yeh be?” Dain demanded.

“Donno! It’s dark!”

“Mahu! Blu, ge’ oot!”

“I canna see which way oot is!”

“Up!”

“It’s bloody dark an’ hairy in here! Which way’s up?”

“Fuck it!”

Dain leapt to his feet and started jumping up and down violently. “Quit jumpin’!” Blu howled. “’M gettin’ seasick.”

“Yer ain’t never bin t’ sea. Aaaaugh!! Yer in me britches! Ow! Yeh put yer talons on me jewels ‘gain an’ I’ll roas’ an’ eat yeh!’
“T’m slidin’ t’ me death!” Blu screamed.
Ori saw a lump wiggling inside Dain’s breeches on the left thigh. By now even Red Queen was helpless with laughter. The ravens crowded around to shout encouragement and the younger set helped. Dain gave a roar and kicked off his left boot. Baluchistan rolled out on the floor, squawking up a storm. Dain jumped some more to shake the feathers out of his trouser leg.
“Mam!” screamed Blu flapping and climbing into Sculdis’ lap. “Save me. Da said he’s gonna eat me!”
“Oh hush, yeh daft birdie!”
Everyone settled down again, still giggling a little.
Yizaris came through at that moment, frowning.
“Thorin?”
“Yizaris? What’s happened?”
“Have you seen Ulfr? He didn’t come to bed last night, and I can’t find him with the others on the floor around the feasting tables.”
“He may be curled up in a niche or something. I’ll send out a detail to search the usual places,” said Thorin. “He hasn’t said a word since your wedding,” said Yizaris. “I’m getting a little worried. He’s usually quiet when he’s got an idea going, but not like this.”
Roäc left and returned with Arb, who wasn’t exactly perky this morning, but he certainly looked alert.
“Your majesty.” Arb bowed.
“Yes, Arb, would you please take a small detachment and search in the vicinity of last night’s party for King Ulfr. He seems to have wandered off.”
“At once, your majesty.”
As Arb turned to go, Ulfr walked in.
“Found him!” Roäc announced.
“Thank you, Roäc,” said Thorin.
“Hey, anytime.”
Ulfr still wore last night’s clothing, as if he had never gone to bed at all. Ori didn’t think he was hungover, but that wasn’t to say Ulfr was well. Yizaris hurried over to him. She embraced him, and he returned the gesture listlessly.
“All right, Ulfr?” Thorin asked.
Ulfr seemed to ponder for a moment, then he just said, “No.”
Thorin rose and approached. “Would you like to go to the office and talk about it in private?”
“Talkin’s useless a’ this point. Now I need t’ act.”
He stepped away from Yizaris and drew his knife.
Bruised, Contused, and Confused.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. We do humbly apologize, but we have to post this early as Friday is Yule and we shall be celebrating like Margr and Vi (without the horse costume). Happy whatever holiday(s) you celebrate to you and yours. Hugs, kisses and cookies all ’round and please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Thorin didn’t move.
Every other person in the room drew their own weapon or seized something nearby to use.
Yells and shrieks sounded.
Chairs were knocked to the floor.
Sugar and Butter bounded forward in full roar.
The table lurched dangerously as Killer burst out from under it.
The ravens rose in a shrieking cloud.
Red Queen leapt on the table, screaming, her wings spread out. Beorn morphed into a bear.
Dwalin charged around the table with both axes up.
Balin and Fili had their short swords out.
Sigrid grabbed Tilda’s boot knife and wielded it, covering her sister.
Yizaris cried out in horror.
Arne bellowed, “No! Adad!”
It took Nodun and Tay to hold him back.
Buer was shocked into stillness.
Dori seized the teapot and hefted it up to throw.
Every dwarf took a war stance.
Bard, Bain, Aragorn and Boromir were ready with fists.
Arwen had her knife out.
Thranduil and his elfin family leapt up.
“Mahumb!” Tauriel hissed. “Why didn’t I bring my bow to table?”
The Rivendell elves were ready.
The three wizards had their staffs pointed and glowing.
Lady Galadriel’s hands sparkled with blue energy.
“Stop!” Thorin ordered at battle pitch.
Every person and animal stopped, Dwalin so abruptly that his shoulders shot out at a sharp angle before he righted himself, growling.
“Sit!” Thorin commanded.
The wargs sat. So did Legolas.
Silence.
Ulfr sighed and shook his head.
“I’m no’ commitin’ regicide, yeh numpites.”
Thorin asked, “What are you doing, Ulfr?”
“Blowin’ mesel’ up with me knife!” Ulfr huffed. “Honestly! I should think it’d be fairly obvious.”
He grasped his own beard with one hand and cut it off at his chin.
“Ho-lee shite!” Baluchistan squawked and fell beak-first into the porridge pot. Ori fished him out, along with seven stray feathers. Roäc smacked Baluchistan with a wing.

“Your timing’s impeccable, as usual.” Ulfr offered his knife hilt-first to Buer.

“Hold this f’r me f’r a mo’. Ta.” Buer came and took it, though he looked about as comfortable with a knife as Bujni had.

Ulfr dropped to his knees and offered his severed beard to Thorin. He said, in khuzdul, “I have acted dishonorably and called into question my sacred oath to my king. I also pissed off Durin the Deathless, which has to be some sort of crazy. I offer you my life, to dispose of or restore to me as you see fit.” Thorin took the offering and looked at it for long minutes. It lay across his hands like an animal pelt, as it had been growing for centuries.

No one moved or spoke, except for Baluchistan, who had to fend off the wargs trying to lick the porridge off him. “Ge’ off, yeh grea’ dumb beasties!”

“Ulfr,” said Thorin, “I can’t think of a single punishment that would be worse than this. It’s bad enough that you’ll have to walk around shorn. Most dwarrow would rather die. I consider the debt paid. Please, stand up.” Perhaps he didn’t need it, but Arne came forward and he and Buer helped Ulfr to his feet.

“I’m sorry, Arne, Buer.”

“Thank you, father,” said Arne, sobbing.

“That was really amazing! I mean, I never saw- It was really- I mean, wow!” Yizaris sat, limp with relief. The youths went to comfort her. Meanwhile Thorin was stuck with handfuls of lavender-streaked beard.

“You’ve really had a change of heart, Ulfr.” The Ironfist king chuckled.

“Call it a change a’ sight. Even if I wasn’t changed, yeh were righ’. This is yer kingdom, an’ I’ve behaved disgracefully be’r th’ family. This bein’ Durin’s Day, or close on it, I beg everyane’s pardon. An’ now, breakfast’ r no, I think I could use a drink.”

Thorin looked over at Kili, and held out the beard helplessly.

“I’ve got it, idad,” said Kili.

As Kili passed Ori on his way out, Ori asked quietly, “What are you going to do with it?”

“Put it away, I guess, until Uncle Thorin says otherwise. Who knows? Maybe he thinks Ulfr should glue it back on before he returns to his nasty relatives.”

“Please,” said Thorin, “let’s all return to the table and eat. We’ll say no more about this. The matter is closed.”

As he returned to his seat, he grinned up at Theoden, who had relaxed and placed his knife back on the table with his spoon.

“Theoden brother, thank you for your willingness to butter someone for me.”

“It’s an honor,” said Theoden.

Dori replaced the teapot and spooned out healthy servings of porridge for Yizaris and Ulfr. Two more chairs were added to the table and Bombur and Erda went to the kitchen and returned with two more platters of buns.

Yizaris sat with her arm about her husband, a mix of relief and exasperation. Arne was sober and Buer still startled. Conversation started again as Dain and Scudis scolded Blu and then took him to the kitchen. A moment later everyone heard Blu screaming that Dain wasn’t giving him a bath, but trying to drown him.

After breakfast, Ulfr and Yizaris retired to their room.

Thorin went out into the meadow with the wargs for a while and he was granted his privacy by his family and friends.

“Are you alright?” Ori asked Bilbo as they lingered over tea, and watched the high king of dwarf roll around in the grass with massive animals who obviously still thought of themselves as twelve pound puppies.

“I am now,” said Bilbo. “It’s gratifying that everyone was so willing to defend Thorin. It’s good to have such loyal companions.”

After the events at breakfast, Ori would have thought sparring with the last thing anyone wanted to do. He expected at least Lindir would want to go shopping or something. The Durin’s Day celebrations would continue for several more days, and would do even if the dwarf didn’t also have a new prince consort to celebrate.

Instead, the Durins and their company decided to adjourn to the practice ring. Bilbo decided he wanted to spend some time writing.

“Please go on,” he said to Thorin, with a kiss. “I have to work on your Yule present while you’re distracted, and you’re not distracting me.”

“I? A distraction?” Thorin asked him cheekily.

“Of the best kind, I assure you. Now, shoo!”

After the king had gone, Ori lingered.

“Yule present?”

“And something else that just occurred to me,” said Bilbo. “Would you mind terribly if I kept a secret from you, just for a few hours?”

“Mmmmaybe,” said Ori.

He grinned and kissed Bilbo’s cheek.

“I’ll be at the arena with my sketchbook, if you need me.”

Ori went to the balcony above the practice ring and took out his drawing materials.

Bard stood at the railing beside him, and looked down on the ring with an occasional flinch. Ori followed his gaze to a pair of men facing off with swords. Even heavily armored, they were tall and gangly, as though they hadn’t grown into their limbs yet. One struck with power and control, the other blocked, with more enthusiasm than skill. Thorin stood to the side, dispensing instruction, praise and criticism in the same, even tone.

“I know Bain has to learn,” said Bard. “He needs to be able to defend himself. He can’t just be a scrapper like me.”

“Is he facing Theodred?”

“Yes, and Theodred is good. He’s very good. But he could slip, Bain could slip. Either of them could be killed at any moment.”

“Theo’s been doing this all his life,” said Ori. “I don’t think Thorin would let Bain spar with him if Thorin didn’t think he was careful.”

“How can Theoden stand to watch this every day?”

Theoden sat on the bench at the edge of the ring, armored up himself, with Eowyn on one side of him and Aragorn on the other, also dressed for combat.

Ori could see there were several times Theoden wanted to say something, but visibly restrained himself. That Rohan allowed his only child to spar under Thorin’s tutelage spoke of Theoden’s trust, but Ori knew this wasn’t easy for him, either.

“I think he’s just had longer to resign himself to it,” said Ori. “And, Rohan is a warrior society.
Eowyn says all the Rohirrim learn to fight, even if they’re going to train to be a weaver or a cook.
Though, a cook should be able to handle their knife just as well as a warrior wields their sword, shouldn’t they.”

“Have you seen Bilbo practicing with his sword?”

Ori stared at him.

“I know he carries a sword. When I asked, he said he was much more likely to accidentally open a letter with it than defend himself.”

“I think he’s being mischievous, as usual,” said Bard. “It didn’t look to me like he opened much mail with it, but possibly quite a few bellies.”

“We’ve always suspected there is more to him than he lets on. I don’t know why we should be surprised, though, considering his mother.”
“You all talk about her, but I don’t know anything about her. I suppose she was before my time.”
Ori gaped at him.
“You don’t know about Belladonna Took? But, why would you,” Ori mused. “Bilbo likes to say she was an oddity, even for a Took, like a hobbit of old. I wonder.”
Ori felt the grin forming even as it occurred to him.
Bilbo said most hobbits loved a good scandal, provided they weren’t involved in it. How scandalous would it be if all Arda knew of the exploits of Belladonna Took? There were plenty of stories just in Master Sadie’s private archives. Ori hadn’t been surprised that Sadie kept private accounts of what she saw and heard in Erebor. They proved a treasure trove. For one thing, they reinforced the idea that Belladonna never met Thror. She seemed to have avoided him neatly. But Ori’s favorite story so far was the day Belladonna told old, disapproving Sikar to kiss her patoot.
Ori needed to talk to Bilbo. They were meeting after dinner to go over the hobbit’s translation of the Infernal Adventures of Durin the Deathless. Even now, preliminary illustrations for that book sat in Ori’s office. Ori had done a few, though Arne provided most of them, while Omi and Loli created illuminated lettering for the chapter heads, and Buj the decoration for the cover.
If everyone was amenable, there was no reason they couldn’t produce a new book over the long winter.
Gold to produce the Infernal Adventures in the usual volume, and in paper covers, came from Thorin’s personal trove. If Ori was careful, he could probably pay to have the exploits of Belladonna printed himself.
If Bilbo was interested.
“Yer wool-gatherin’, love.”
Ori jumped, startled, and turned right into Dwalin’s arms. Impulsively, he stood on tiptoe and kissed him.
“Hullo. Yes, I was. In fact, by now I could knit sweaters for everyone in the family.”
Bard gently prodded Ori’s shoulder.
“I’d like mine to be green.”
“Like what to be green?” Ori asked. He never looked away from Dwalin. “Oh! Right! Wool-gathering, sweaters, green. Uh-huh.”
Bard chuckled.
“It looks like they’re done bruising each other down there. I’m off to collect my son. Have fun, you two.”
“Are you off-duty now?” Ori asked Dwalin.
“Aye, all yers.”
“I need to run an idea by you.”
Lunch time came later than usual, and they all gathered, either still a little damp from the bath, or nursing some bruise or other.
Every time Bain winced, Bard winced, but said nothing.
When everyone had finished their cold cuts, cheeses, deep brown onion soup, breads, and various salads, and wandered away, the inventors of the company cleared the table in the breakfast parlor, and Bujni spread out what looked like schematics on the table.
Buer, Ahkn, Dain and Ulfr poured over it.
Ori stared fascinated. Engineering wasn’t one of his strong points but the diagrams were so intricate they sparked the artist in him. Yizaris continued to sit beside her husband, sipping her tea and having the occasional cake from the plate on the sideboard. She didn’t seem to have any intention of letting him out of her sight.
Ahkn looked up from the plans, and stroked his beard.
“Lad, I can honestly say this is nothing I would have thought of doing myself, but your planning is impressive, and your calculations moreso.”
Bujni bowed to him.
“Thank you, your majesty. I can say without self-flattery that I have devoted many hours to this.”

“He was working on it when I first met him, months ago,” said Ori.

Ulfr frowned and cocked his head. He started to speak several times, but hesitated.

“King Ulfr,” said Bujni politely, “I would be glad to have your input.”

“How’re ye gettin’ home after ye land?”

Bujni gasped and wobbled a little. Buer and Ori rushed to support him.

“Mahal’s brazen beard!” Bujni cried. “How could I have overlooked such a detail?”

“We all do it,” Buer assured him.

“Have you ever had to walk back across Middle Earth after an experiment?” Bujni challenged him.

“No, but sometimes, after I’ve blown myself up, it feels like I climbed Erebor on my knees.”

“Hm, yes, I see your point,” said Bujni.

“All’s no’ lost, our Bujni,” said Dain. “Lot’s ve folks’ll be willin’ t’ follow yer fligh’, an’ track yeh down.”

“They would?” Bujni asked. Clearly this idea astonished him.

“I’m not terribly happy with myself right now,” said the Stonefoot king. “Ulfr’s only my best and oldest friend, but I didn’t notice he was going around the bend.”

“You’re a little distracted by impending fatherhood, and grandfatherhood,” Ori pointed out. “And Ulfr is a grown dwarf. He knows where to turn when he’s unhappy.”

“He’s also the stubbornest cuss in Middle Earth. I’m sure he thought he didn’t want to ‘bother’ me with his problems. Or, maybe he thought, given my daughter married a man, not a dwarf, that I’d lost my sense of loyalty. Which is utter shit, of course, but unless he’s brewing something useful or poisonous, or usefully poisonous, he always thinks in straight lines.”

“Maybe this has put some curve into his thoughts,” Ori suggested.

“Sure.”

Thorin and Bilbo came in, followed by Thranduil and Bard. Bilbo looked around and went right over to Ulfr, who was busy devouring the piece of cake Yizaris had put in front of him.

“I have something for you, Ulfr,” said Bilbo.

He handed Ulfr a bundle. At first, Ori thought it was an animal, then when Ulfr unrolled it, he realized it was Ulfr’s beard, the length wrapped in three thin, dark strands.

Ulfr cocked his head.

“I don’ ge’ it.”

“The dark strands are locks of Thorin’s hair. The whole keeps its shape because it’s bound by the king. The strands stand out because they’re supported by beard. Now do you see?”

“Aye. I git i’ now,” said Ulfr. He nodded solemnly.

“That’s brilliant!” Buer exclaimed.

“Indeed,” said Thranduil, who seemed deeply affected by it.

“Bu’, Perfesser,” Ulfr asked, “wha’ this a’ th’ end?”

“That’s a lock of my hair.”

“Wha’ does tha’ represent?”

“It’s adorable,” said Bilbo. He fluttered his lashes.

“So, it’s th’ carrot cake, is it?” Ulfr asked.
“Yes, I’m the carrot cake to Thorin’s plum pudding.”
“An’ wha’ makes th’ hard sauce?” Ulfr asked slyly.
“Butter and Sugar, of course.”
Ulfr laughed so hard, he tipped his chair over and went down. Yizaris rescued his dessert then, seeing he was in no shape to finish it, shrugged and ate it herself.
Thorin unfanked Ulfr from the chair and helped him up.
Ulfr muttered something, and Thorin hugged him.
“You’re an ass, Ulfr, but I do love you.”
“Me king,” Ulfr acknowledged, gripping Thorin tight.
Mistress Dazla came in, looked at the wreckage of Ulfr and turned to Ori.
“Lord Ori, there’s a clothier here to see you.”
Ori wondered what Dipfa had done to annoy Mistress Dalza as he followed her out to the receiving room. It wasn’t Dipfa, but, instead, a dwarf Ori didn’t immediately recognize.
“Lord Ori,” said the dwarf with a bow. “Your order from the market last night.”
“Oh! Of course! Trousers!”
“Indeed,” said the dwarf. He grinned. It was obvious he loved this part of his work.
Ori said, “Will you excuse me a moment? I’ll be right back.”
He ran back inside, and then burst back out with the squealing Arivette, Cemnesta, and Eowyn at his heels.
They tipped the clothier well, then Ori ran back inside, grabbed Dwalin’s hand and bodily pulled him along.
“Come with me!” Ori cried.
Balin laughed at them.
“Where’re yeh goin’?” Balin asked Dwalin.
“Where’re we goin’?” Dwalin asked Ori.
“Bedroom.”
“Oh, aye? Really?”
“I’ll give him right back, Bujni,” Ori called behind them.
Ori shut the bedroom door behind them.
“I have a surprise for you!” He held out the wrapped package shyly, hoping at the last minute the clothier hadn’t mixed up the packages.
He hadn’t.
Dwalin held up the pants.
“These’re grand, love.”
“That’s not the whole thing,” said Ori. “Turn them around.”
Dwalin did so, and tilted his head back and laughed.
“Try them on!” Ori ordered
Yeh jus’ wan me t’ take me britches off!” Dwalin teased.
“Well, yes, but I also want to make sure they fit.”
Circumstances had moved a ways beyond high fashion when a knock came at the door and it opened.
“Ah, there you are Captain Dwalin,” said Bujni.
Bujni came in, drew a chair to the side of the bed, and opened his note book. For one horrible moment, Ori thought Bujni was going to draw them.
“You were telling me, captain,” Bujni said gravely, “that, depending on the wind, you would have to send out groups of roughly several persons. Would you advise they be on foot or on goats?”
Dwalin looked at Ori then tuned to Bujni.
“Sorry, laddie, but I canna be thinkin’ on tha’ right now.”
Bujni’s eyebrow flew to his hair.
“Is there a problem, captain?”
“No, but I’ve go’ me hand on me husband’s balls, so-.”
Bujni rose, peered across them, then folded his notebook away with a snap.
“Ah. I shall await you in the sitting room,” he informed them, put the chair back in its place and shut the door as he went out.

“Now,” said Dwalin, “where were we?”

“Pet,” Dori called, “you have a visitor in the kitchen.”

Ori groaned and Dwalin laughed. Ori pulled his britches back up, tidied his hair a little and went out.

“Why are they in the kitchen?” he asked Dori.

“It is where the food is,” Dori reasoned.

Ori walked into the kitchen. Master Brur sat at the table, arms crossed, very obviously waiting for him, which was not to say Brur had been without sustenance. A wedge the size of Ori’s head had disappeared from the xocolatl cake on the table and a great blob of frosting and jam now decorated Brur’s orange tunic.

Really, Ori thought Dipfa should see the current state of Brur’s tunic, since the amalgamation of stains nearly formed a pattern.

“Master Brur?”

“Siddown.”

Ori did so.

“Is the quest document really that bad?” Ori cringed.

“No, it’s tha’ good,” said Brur. “In fact, it’s so bloody good, I had t’ put a few commas out’ve place, jus’ t’ have somethin’ t’ fix. Fuckin’ sickenin’. There’s jus’ one thin’ tha’ bothers me.”

“Yessir?”

“This was yer quest?”

“Yessir.”

“Why ain’t yeh in this report? Yeh mention heroics, talkin’ trees, balrogs gettin’ liquified, elves eatin’ fried lembas an’ everythin’ tha’ come out’ve tha’ box. Nowheres can I find wha’ actually happened t’ yeh. Yer personal experiences. Yer though’s on th’ matter.”

“Ah, well, you see, I did add all that, then I took it out because, a historian isn’t supposed to draw attention to themselves.”

“Pu’ it all back.”

“Pardon?”

“Pu’ it all back, yeh silly badger. It’s yer story, yer allowed t’ tell it. Mahal wrote yeh a fuckin’ excuse note. Yeh don’t ge’ more’ve a hand-engraved invitation than tha’. Besides I want t’ move a few more commas around. Make me feel better abou’ meself.”

“I do have the original manuscript.”

“Aye, le’s have it.”

“Now?”

“Aye, go on. I’m agin’ here.”

Brur waved him away. Ori scampered to his office, opened the secret compartment Gloin and Gridr had installed in his desk, and took out the original manuscript. He felt sick and thrilled and, as scribes went, terribly naughty.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And now back to our regularly scheduled…. Oh wait, we don’t have one of those! Tee-Hee! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

All too soon, the company of Ori’s bullies were present at the table in the breakfast parlor, along with everyone else who had worked with him on the Quest. They all lightly scolded him for leaving himself out of his own story. Brur read aloud the presentation, with all Ori’s old edits put back in. Elrond and Dwalin looked very proud and Dori beamed from her chair on the patio, in the sunshine, but close enough to hear everything. When all was finished and approved of, Ori thought of one last thing.

“Do I need to make any changes to the abstract, Master Brur?”

“Nah. Can no’ do it anyhow. I sen’ th’ summary out t’ all th’ scribe guilds a’ Arda when we discussed this a few weeks back.”

“What?” Ori didn’t quite scream.

“Yeh’ll be presentin’ this on th’ firs’ work day.”

“That’s in five days!” Ori stared horrified.

“How can we fit them all in the presentation hall of the Scribes Guild here?” Ori demanded.

“Ach, laddie,” Brur grinned evilly at him. “They ain’t gonna fi’. I already go’ our Thorin t’ lend us th’ throne room.”

“I’m going to present this in the throne room?” Ori gasped. He felt a little dizzy at the thought.

“ ‘Course,” Dain boomed. “Bes’ place f’r it.”

Thorin smiled down the table at Ori.

“As strange as it may seem, Ori, Dain is right, which doesn’t happen that often.”

“You will have to have on display all the preliminary work that was done, maps, Floviq’s dictation, and everything from the box.”

“Oh.” Ori hadn’t thought that far.

“I wan’ extra security f’r me hat!” Dain barked.

Sculdis snorted a laugh.

“Luv, ain’t no ane wan’ t’ touch tha’ thin’.”

“It’s th’ carapace of a bleedin’ evil spider!” Brur grumped.

“It’s me bes’ hat!” Dain argued.

“And therefore must be on display with all the other objects,” Thorin said, “and they will all have a security detail. Dwalin?”

“ ‘Course,” Dwalin agreed.

“I wonder how we’re going to explain ents,” Kili commented.

Galadriel smiled sweetly at him.

“I’m sure you’ll think of something.”

Dori came in from the patio.

“Tea,” She announced.
Tea was served the sitting room, as the breakfast parlor table was still covered in papers. Hild and Aris arrived with Eomer and Arivett in tow.

“And when is the presentation to be?” Hild asked.

“In five days,” Thorin informed her.

“Excellent.” she replied. “Make a note, Aris, we will leave the day after.”

“Noted, yer majesty,” Aris intoned.

“Aye, same here,” Chat agreed. “I want t’ hear eve’ythin’.”

“I believe I’ll stay, too,” Gheir added. Mavey and Floris made delighted noises.

“I’m glad you didn’t take Fanny and she was safe with us,” Mavey told Ori. Ori was glad, too.

The idea of Fanny going on the Quest was not a good one.

It came to pass that pretty much everyone was going to stay for Ori’s presentation. He was pleased with the idea of so much support, but equally worried that every monarch in Arda would be there.

He was still pondering this when Chat and Givris sat down near him.

“Here, our Ori, ” Chat began. “I saw ya doin’ yer scribblin’ at the weddin’. Any chance ya could polish up a couple o’ them drawin’s fer me t’ take back and show around? Can’t have liddle Frerin missin’ out on all this fun.”

Ori felt his heart blossom and he grinned.

“Of course, your majesty. I have some nice ones and I’ll make one of the whole family for you.”

“Good lad,” snickered Givris.

Tay and Arne came from the kitchen and set out a platter of scones, they were each perfectly round, deliciously browned and studded with currants. Dori passed these around to be sampled.

“Oh, these are lovely,” said Yizaris. “Did these come the foreign bakery?”

Ori bit his tongue, since several such ‘foreigners’ sat at the table with them.

“No,” said Dori, refilling Yizaris’ teacup. “They were made by a very talented young dwarf I know. He blended the tea as well.”

“Is baking his craft? It would be a shame if he wasn’t apprenticed somewhere.”

“He is,” said Dori. “I believe he has a master and is just beginning.”

Ori rolled his eyes in Bilbo’s direction and tried one of Arne’s scones. They were wonderful. Ori looked up, caught Arne’s eye and winked. Arne grinned at him. Ulfr caught the grin as he reached for his third scone and stared at Arne.

“Arne, lad, did yeh make these?”

“He did,” Tay confirmed.

Yizaris leapt up, mouth still full, and grabbed Arne into a hug. Ulfr looked gobsmacked.

“These’re th’ bes’ bleedin’ scones I ever tasted!” Ulfr gasped. “Yeh definitely found yer craft, nidoye.”

“They are wonderful, my pet!” Yizaris cooed over her son.

“Any more?” Ulfr demanded.

“I imagine there could be,” Tay said and leaned to whisper something to Arne. Arne chuckled and hurried back to the kitchen.

“Now I wish I’d taken him down to the kitchen years ago,” Yizaris lamented. “I never thought to, as I’m not much of a cook myself.”

“I wish we’d done tha’ instead a’ tryin’ t’ teach ‘im th’ sword,” said Ulfr.

Arne winced as he came back with another plate of scones, this time with xocolātl chips.

“Sorry, Da. I was r-rubbish at it.”

Ulfr grinned.

“Should’ve givin’ yeh a kitchen knife.”

“Were you wounded in sword training?” Fili asked with great concern.

“I never got that f-far,” said Arne. He grew red in the face.

“He sat on ‘is sword while gettin’ ready,” said Ulfr.

Tay yelped, “Is that where that scar came from?”
Arne buried his head in his arms.
“Ye’s,” he squeaked.
“Nearly cut ‘is bum off,” said Ulfr. “Aye, a nice set a’ kitchen knives. Once yeh ge’ him trained up, our Tay, th’ lad could be a chef!”
Yizaris giggled, “Or have a tea house of his own with a cobalt door knob.”
“No cobalt!” Ulfr frowned. He seemed to do some thinking as his wife fixed him with a raised brow. “Fine. Bu’ I don’ wanna hear ‘bout it.”
“My love,” Yizaris shared the last scone with Givris, “I hardly think he’s going to write home about such things in detail to us.”
“‘Less he becomes a master o’ Position 20,” Givris added which sent both dams into peals of laughter.

At the mystified looks passing between the guests, who were elves and men, Brur went back to the parlor and returned with the Book of Glittering Diamonds. He leafed through and passed the open book to Theoden. Theoden looked, then his eyes bulged. He opened the folded leaf and choked.
“That’s asking for a broken neck!”
He was suddenly surrounded by elves and other menfolk.
“Great Eru!”
“How is that possible?”
“Five people!”
Bard looked at Tay.
“Is this something all who have cobalt door knobs have to know?”
“Unfortunately,” Tay said with a smile, “up until the box was opened and we found this original book, Position 20 was considered almost impossible.”
“Aye,” Oin agreed, “the Healers Guild has a book for all the entries a’ folk who’ve tried it an ended up in th’ infirmary.”
Eowyn and Arivett shrieked with laughter.
“You dwarrow are engineers in all your crafts,” Thranduil teased.
“I don’t think I could bend that way as man or as a bear,” Beorn said with a worried look on his face.
Elrond took the book away from Theoden and examined it.
“Is this a well known book, then?”
“Oh yes,” Dis told him. “It’s usually given as a traditional wedding gift. However, many parents - and uncles - when their badgers become of age, will use it to explain sex to them when they themselves lack the words.”
She and Thorin exchanged dirty looks.
“That’s very useful!” exclaimed Galadriel.
“Her majesty’s prose is…interesting,” Lindir commented as he read over Elrond’s shoulder.
“And,” Elrond said delightedly, “there’s an entire chapter on sex between races!”
Bard blushed, then,
“Thorin, perhaps you would consider having this translated?”
Thorin laughed and raised an eyebrow at Ori, who grinned.
“Laddie,” Master Brur said with a wink, “it’s our Ori’s next project.”
Everyone looked at Ori, who felt himself blush.
“I have several projects going right now, but I thought it would be a good idea.”
“It is,” Celeborn said. “It’s an excellent idea.”
Bard took the book and looked it over. He was beetroot but serene.
“If you would, Ori. My khuzdul isn’t that good, but I can see she is very detailed and to the point. There is no disrespect to anyone. I trust your translations and I would much rather Bain and Tilda learned from Queen Kivi than how things usually go in Dale.” He looked up at Sigrid before he continued.
“I take it Fili was able to…er…discuss her majesty’s book with you.”
“Yes, Da,” Sigrid came and gave her father a hug.
“How do you learn in Dale?” Elrond questioned, the researcher in him ready.
“Um…” Bard swallowed. “I don’t know what girls are told. Dori instructed Sigrid. As a boy, it’s mostly that when your father considers you ready, he takes you to one of the bawdy houses by the docks and hands you over to a woman he can afford.”
“Is that what happened to you?” Thranduil gasped.
Bard nodded.
Bain gagged.
“Da! No!”
Bard waved his hand.
“No worries, my son.”
“Thank you,” said Bain with a sigh.
“It just complicated things in the long run,” said Bard. “It took some time for my wife and I to… um… figure out what we liked. Which is probably why we were married three years before we had Sigrid.”
“That’s terrible,” Sculdis cried.
Bard turned red again when he saw all the dwarrow monarchs looking at him with sorrow in their eyes.
“It was the way things were. We didn’t know any different. You dwarrow are so open, but Dale and many different groups of men don’t consider sex as something to be discussed. It’s expected you will have children, but you just don’t talk about it.”
“It’s thought of as shameful among some,” Dori added.
“It’s not shameful among elves,” Cemnesta said thoughtfully, “just something private and not open for group discussion. We are immortal, thus one child is considered enough.”
“We just think about poetry and singing afterwards,” Thranduil remarked acidly.
“Mahal’s blue balls, lad!” Ulfr grinned at Buer. “Yeh were bleedin’ righ’, we dwarrow’ve go’ plenty t’ offer an’ teach other cultures.”
“Yes,” Buer agreed, still a little wide-eyed over what man and elves lacked. “Ori, you really do need to get this book translated.”
“Let th’ lad present the Quest, then he kin get started on it.” Brur growled.
“I promise,” Ori turned to Dwalin with a wicked smile. “If you don’t mind, of course.”
“Happy t’ help, love,” Dwalin smirked at the company. “Gotta be there is case yeh need anythin’ extensively annotated.”
Everyone laughed.
“And I,” said Dori grandly, “will write the preface to the new edition.”

The next few days were a blur for Ori. He spent them arranging things on the tables in the library and writing out cards of what they were and where in the box they had been found. Brur wrangled with the printers guild and brought the first one hundred copies down to the workroom. Ori was amazed as he looked one over. His work in print.
As he paged through it, he was amazed to see the exquisite printing job, the words and diagrams and other illustrations somehow falling perfectly into place. He turned to the last page and ran his finger down the lines of signatures that attested to the truth of what they had set down: his name, Dwalin’s, Kili’s, Tauriel’s, and dozens of others. Vi and Margr had learned to sign their names just for this purpose.

The scholars from outside Erebor began to arrive almost immediately, and were brought in very small groups into the workroom, escorted by details of Dwalin’s soldiers and members of the scribes’ guild. The library open stacks were overrun by dwarrow, elves and even men, checking facts and making notes and squabbling over who got access to what next.
Ori was willing to bet Master Brur didn’t sleep that whole time, as the old librarian ran rampant among the scholars, smacking their knuckles with a ruler if he caught them doing anything they shouldn’t, such as trying to tear incriminating evidence from documents. Teyan went wherever Brur couldn’t be, invisibly snapping books shut on guilty fingers and pushing volumes out into guilty noses.

Ori witnessed her work on several occasions and found it very hard not laugh.

In the midst of all this, the printers’ galleys came back for the text of the Infernal Adventures, and Ori found it a relief to go over someone else’s work for a change. He felt jealous of Bilbo, who faced the prospect of another publication with complete calm.

“You’ve already told me it’s perfect, Ori-mate,” Bilbo teased him, as the project group took tea at Bag-End East. “I have every confidence in you. We’ll make sure the printers haven’t put any semicolons where they should not be, and by the time your presentation is done, it will be time to look at the printers’ proofs of the illustrations.”

“Then we c-can be anxious,” said Arne, while Omi and Loli nodded.

Bujni cocked his head in surprise.

“Are you actually anxious?” Bujni asked.

“Aren’t you?” Loli asked, wide-eyed. “It’s your cover design.”

“No,” said Bujni. “My precious diamond assures me that the balance of decorative elements and meaningful empty spaces is perfect, and that the colors I chose balance or cast them into relief to produce a harmonious whole.”

“Oh,” said Loli, rolling her eyes. “That’s what I thought.”

Bilbo refilled Bujni’s cup.

“In that case, you’re the perfect dwarf to accompany Ori, Dis, and I to the printers’ guild meeting next week.”

Everyone except Ori and Bilbo looked surprised.

“What’s happened?” Arne asked.

Bilbo hummed.

“Apparently, we’re pushing their current resource to the limit with our output. They’ve gone from printing copies of royal pronouncements, guild meeting minutes, and the regular issue of Vug and Better Caves and Caverns, to full scale printed book production, something for which they were not prepared. We seem to have sprung their cogs, as it were.”

“They want to know exactly how many more works we’re going to inundate them with this winter,” said Ori, “so they can take on more apprentices, and put paper and ink suppliers on notice.”

“Not to mention negotiating with book distributors,” said Bilbo, “of which in Erebor there is currently one. By spring, the distributor wants to expand out of Eriador, east and west. We’ve created a lot of work with our works.”

Arne shook his head.

“We’re naughty scribes,” he said. “We should be ash-ashamed.”

Omi draped her wrist across her forehead.

“Oh, woe!”

“What’s this going to mean for your publisher in Gondor?” Ori asked.

“Nothing yet,” said Bilbo. “I have a contract to produce seven books for him as Shire, but nothing in our agreement keeps me from working with other publishers and distributing under my own name. There’s no ‘noncompetition’ clause.”

“But,” said Ori, “that’s because there’s never been any competition before.”

“Something neither I nor Mister Denethor had foreseen as a problem,” said Bilbo.

“How does the lending library in Dale get its couple of copies?” Ori pondered aloud.

“I had ‘em done wi’ our Bilbo here’s permission,” Brur told him. “There’re two of each f’r our library an’ a couple a’ copies f’r th’ Dale.”

When Ori got back home, he went to the bedroom and found Dwalin, lounging on the bed, stroking Garnet. The raven was snuggled down on the covers against his chest.

“Is Garnet alright?” Ori asked. He came over and dropped his satchel.

“Aye, she’s fine. Feelin’ broody. She feels be’er when I keep her close an’ rub her back.”

“I can understand that!” Ori said with a grin. He sat and leaned over and ran a finger over “Just that time, Garnet, or are you baking an egg in there?” he asked softly.
Garnet cracked open and eye, reached and tapped his nose with her beak.
“Egg,” she croaked. “Gettin’ heavy.”
“Do you want us to make you a nest in here?”
“No. Quartz is building one in the aerie. Better up there.”
“If you’re sure,” Ori murmured.
Quartz winged in and landed on the bed. He hopped over to Garnet and checked her over.
“Nest’s ready. Can make it bigger. Can get more fluff, too.”
Garnet turned and looked at Quartz.
“Got a view of Queenie?”
Quartz snickered. “One ledge up. In front. Perfect view.”
“Then I like it.” Garnet stated. She rubbed her beak against Dwalin’s hand and rose up. She fluttered her feathers and shook.
“Why yeh wantin’ t’ spy on Red Queen?” Dwalin asked the question Ori wanted to, but wasn’t sure he should.
The two ravens looked at each other and laughed.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Time for Ori to defend in front of Mahal and everyone, but his nerves of steel have turned into nerves of nerves! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori stood before the bedroom mirror in his coronation robes, which Thorin, Brur, and Sadi insisted he wear for his presentation. He had spent the morning with all who had been involved with the quest, preparing the throne room, laying out the contents of the box, labeling everything. Bard had brought the old book of his people to be shown with the badgers’ primer. All notes and sketches were laid out. The box itself took pride of place in front of the dais.

Everything was ready. He was ready, on the outside anyway. Dwalin had put in all his braids and beads, then gone to be with the guard detail in the throne room.

“I don’t know if I can do this,” Ori muttered to himself. He turned to Killer, who sprawled on the bed, his tail thumping. “What am I going to do, Killer?”

“I dunno, Ori.” Killer turned on his back, paws in the air. “Rub me tummy an’ we’ll figure it ou’.”

“Lord Mahal?” Ori asked cautiously.

“Aye, yeh think yer warg suddenly talks?”
“At this point, I wouldn’t discount anything.”
“He was so nice an’ obligin’ abou’ it, he a’ leas’ should git a tummy rub out’ve it.”

Ori rubbed Killer’s tummy. Killer’s back leg squiggled spasmodically.

“Ohooo, nice! Gi’e me some more. Tha’s th’ spot!”

“Lord Mahal, what can I do for you?” Ori asked distractedly.

“Havin’ a li’le faith in yer creator’d be nice. I pu’ some guid stuff in yeh.”

“Look, when Dori makes a cake, does th’ cake say: Ooooo! I dunno if I’ll taste guid enough. I only have eggs, an’ xocolātl, an’ sugar, an’ Dori’s only ane th’ bes’ cooks in Erebor! Wha’ever shall I dooooooo?”

Ori barely choked down a snicker.

“Point taken, M’lord.”

“Bloody finally. Go on. They’re waitin’. I’m waitin’, an I go’ importan’ valar stuff t’ do.”

“All right. I don’t want to put You behind schedule. Come on, Killer.”

Ori turned, then turned back and leaned to look into the warg’s eyes.

“You’re the only one in there, right, Killer?”

“Laddie,” said Mahal, “ge’ a grip. I’m in yer head.”

Killer licked his nose.

“An’ I don’t lick just anybody’s nose,” Mahal finished.

Ori giggled to himself and went out with Killer at his heels.

Ori waited in the anteroom behind Sadi. Up on the throne, Thorin seemed to be reading one of the abstracts that were freely available at the door. Bilbo sat at his left, leaning a little to peer at the parchment as he patted Butter, who leaned against the throne. Like Sugar on Thorin’s other side, she looked about, ears on the prick. Both wargs were resplendent with their Durin blue collars about their necks with the mithril royal insignia.

Dwalin stood in his usual place at the top of the steps to the dais, Killer now lay at his feet as he surveyed the room. Dwalin had put Killer's new official guard collar on the warg. It was a wide, black leather affair, gilded all around with short, steel studs.

Dori and Balin and all their royal guests sat comfortably on couches on the dais. The right side between the throne and the edge of the dais was empty but for the podium where Ori would speak.
He could just see his notes sitting there, ready. The room was filled with people. Men, dwarrow, and a few elves floated around, conversing quietly. People crowded the tables, stood in groups talking, picked out seats and gathered to sit together. Every single one of them would be watching him. He swallowed.

Sadi snorted.

"He has his nerve, showin' up here."

"Who?" Ori asked and peeked over her shoulder.

"Master Trig."

She chucked her chin at a square, grey-beard dwarf sitting dead in the center of the first row of chairs. A traditionally attired and decorated Stiffbeard, he wore tiny spectacles perched on the end of his nose and carried a copy of the quest extract under his arm, bright red slips of paper sticking out between practically every other page. He looked like he was ready for a brawl.

Ori groaned.

"Isn't he the one who believes elves don't exist? That they're all a product of mass hysteria?"

"Tha's him, th' li'le weasel. I don' like t' say all Stiffbeard males're smug in their own superiority, bu' he's smug in his own superiority."

"How nice of him to join us," said Ori. "I don't suppose we could get rid of him? Tell him his favorite inkwell was stolen or something?"

"Nooooo," said Sadie, with a slow, wicked smile, "we'll no' be rid a' him, bu' we kin make thin's a wee bi' more interestin' while he's here."

Sadi took out her notebook and a graphite wand and scribbled a note, then beckoned one of the apprentice scribes. The damling's robes hung on her still small frame, so it was impossible to see her boots as she scurried over in a whirlwind of cloth. She took the paper Sadie offered and listened carefully to the old master's whispered directions before she bowed and scurried away again.

"Sadi, what have you done?" Ori asked with a grin of suspicion.

"Watch, young scribe, an' learn."

Soon Lindir arrived with his own copy of the excerpts and sat right next to Trig.

"Good afternoon," said Lindir pleasantly.

Trig looked at him, then quickly through him, then turned back to face front.

Glorfindel arrived and plunked down on Trig's other side.

"Hullo!" Glorfindel bellowed. "I understand you're the one who thinks I don't exist."

Trig had jumped a bit when Glorfindel sat, but stolidly returned to pretending he was alone.

Lindir said to Glorfindel, "M'lord, do you suppose, if someone were to come and ask Master Trig if these seats were taken, he'd say 'no'?"

"Seeing as we're just mass hysteria, he'd have to, wouldn't he," said Glorfindel. "Let me try an experiment."

He poked Trig in the side, and Trig jumped and squirmed.

Glorfindel grinned.

"Shall we see if he's ticklish, Mister Lindir?"

"That's an excellent idea, Lord Glorfindel. Let us proceed."

The pair of them mercilessly poked and ticked Master Trig's sides, trying to force a reaction of any kind.

The dwarf seemed to be holding his own for a moment, but leapt to his feet all at once, grasped the arm of a passing fellow scholar, and asked directions to the privy.

As he hurried away, Glorfindel called after him, "Don't worry, my friend! When you come back, these seats will still be empty!”

“Sadi,” said Ori, “that was beautiful.”
“I’ve still go’ it,” she said with a nod.

Glorfindel and Lindir had returned to the dais and the guest couches arranged for tall people. Elrond sat with his hand proudly entwined with Lindir’s and Vi and Margr, dressed in their jumpsuits like all the rest of Ori’s Bullies, perched one on each of Glorfindel’s knees.

When Trig returned, the seats had been taken by other dwarrow. Trig was forced to sit back a few rows.

He didn’t look terribly upset about it.

“Alas, it won’ shut ‘im up,” said Sadi. “Bu’ a’ least he won’ be sittin’ righ’ before yeh like an orc on a chamber pot.”

Ori peered around Sadi again. More people were seating themselves, a few stragglers walked around the room looking at all the treasures from the box. Dwalin had a couple of guards at each table. A copy of Bard’s chandelier was there as well. Ori’s gaze traveled to the back and he frowned. Someone had seen fit to put a massive mock-up of a tree in the back. He wondered if Ulfr and Buer had thought to make one to represent what an ent looked like. It seemed like something Buer would think of, then do just to see if he could. Ori schooled himself not to jump out of his skin when it lit up or wagged a branch like one of Dain’s mechanisms.

Master Brur pushed his way into the antechamber, looked Ori over, smirked, and ruffled his hair. Ori hissed and Sadi snatched Brur to her side.

“Bash on with it, whippersnapper.”

Brur grinned, went to the door the antechamber, and loudly cleared his throat. Anyone not in their seat rushed to sit down. Thorin inclined his head.

“Master Jansad,” bellowed Brur, “Second Chair of the Scribes Guild, Majesty!”

There was a round of applause, while Brur assisted Master Sadi to hobble to the dais and up the steps. Dwalin took her arm from there and brought her to stand before Thorin, Killer following. Sadi bowed creakily and Thorin inclined his head.

“Welcome, Master Sadi, it is always good to see you. Please proceed.”

Sadi turned and started to hobble back to the edge of the dais. Dwalin offered his arm, but she swatted at him with her stick. Dwalin chuckled and a ripple of giggles went through the audience. Killer wagged his tail. Dwalin snapped his fingers and Killer went and lay down once more and gazed worshipfully up at Dwalin, who returned to his place and slipped Killer a treat.

Sadi straightened, and then her voice rang out strongly.

“Yer Majesty, Consort, Blessed Bearer, lords, ladies an’ all peoples. I have come t’ present Lord Ori a’ Fundin House, First Chair a’ th’ Scribes’ Guild a’ Erebor. He has prepared f’r yeh a presentation a’ his recent quest. I call Lord Ori a’ Fundin.”

“Lord Ori a’ Fundin,” bawled Brur.

Ori took a deep breath and walked out towards the dais. He was shocked by a sudden roar of applause. He could hear the voices of friends and old neighbors shouting encouragement. He felt his face turn beetroot. He walked to the steps, turned and bowed to the audience then turned again toward the podium.

“There’s me love,” Dwalin murmured as Ori looked up at him.

“Love you,” Ori whispered and went forward to bow to Thorin. Thorin smiled down on him and nodded. Bilbo looked eager for him. Ori turned and bowed to the royal guests, who all whispered animatedly.

Ori went to the podium, his notes seemed to smile up at him. Quartz landed on the edge of the podium and winked. Ori breathed out and smiled at those before him.

“I thank you all for coming. Before I begin, I would like to acknowledge and offer my deepest thanks to the following people.”

Ori read through the long list of names of all who had assisted him, elves, men, dwarrow, Beorn, ents, and ravens.

“And finally to King Thorin II Oakenshield for his full support.” Ori paused then smiled, “and his unending patience with me.”

As he hoped, another ripple of laughter went through the throng.

Trig jumped to his feet.

“I heard enough! You’ve made up names for a bunch of people you call elves who do not exist.

Mahal is the Valar and only He and the dwarrow, His children, exist!”

Ori had not expected Trig to start arguing before he had barely begun, so his mouth didn’t wait for his brain.

“A world of only dwarrow, Master Trig? What a lonely life you must lead!”

Trig sat down more in shock than true subjection.

Ori began with recounting the familiar event of discovering mithril in the old zinc mine, which had quickly led to the finding of the ostrakai in Zark’s mine, and then the realization of what they had to do with King Nali.

Master Trig bounced up again.

“King Nali was a legal regent and a famous reformer! Nali was legally king and regent until Nain was of age!”

“I’m aware of that, Master Trig-“ Ori began.

“Nain was a true descendent of Durin the Deathless!”

“Shut up! Pay attention!” Quartz barked. “Want me to fly over there? Peck you?”

Ori reached around and yanked Quartz back and stuffed him into his satchel.

“Hey!”

“There are snacks in there,” Ori said.

“Oh. All righty, then. Oooo! Bacon!”

“Why do you carry bacon in your satchel?” the old dwarf demanded.

“To buy off my loud-mouthed bird,” said Ori.

“D’uh!” Quartz’ voice echoed from the depths of the bag, and since this was the throne room, it was perfectly clear all the way to the back.

“Wait,” said the old dwarf. “That’s your raven?”

“And I’m his dwarf,” said Ori simply.

“But, he was chosen to be your particular companion?”

From the back of the throne, Roãc squawked, exasperated.

“Are you really that dense, Trig?”

“Tell ‘im, Da!” said Quartz around a beakful of bacon.

“He is in the account of the quest,” said Ori. “You did read the account?”

“I recall reading that you were guided through the Halls by a raven, but I had assumed that was all a delusion.”

Quartz popped back up onto the lectern.

“Delude this!” he cried, and turned and wiggled his rear at Master Trig.

A chorus of riotous laughter and caws echoed off the walls. Ori had no idea where they came from, but the walls and ceiling were suddenly covered in ravens.

“Trig,” said Sadi. “I realize yer no’ one t’ take advice, bu’, fer th’ love a’ Mahal, shut up.”

Mica said, “Aw, let him keep talking! I want an excuse to poop on his head.”

In this she was encouraged by many vocal ravens and quite a few vocal dwarrow.

A dwarf up in the gallery said, “I’d pay good money to see that.”

“Now, now,” said Thorin. “Let’s not be nasty. Or messy. I’m sure we’re all ready to settle down and listen to Lord Ori read from his text.”

Sugar ‘woofed’ for emphasis.

Ori took this as a signal for him to continue.

He got to the point where he had offered to check the hallway as their escape route.

“Nooo, laddie, yeh didn’t!” Dub wailed.

“He did.” Dwalin rumbled.

“What yeh see when yeh came t’ yer senses?” someone shouted.

Ori sighed and recounted his time in the Halls.
People listened eagerly to hear about the past royals. They chuckled over how it sounded just like those they knew.

Ori told of the escape and the rescue by the ents, then the ruin of the three mountains. He faithfully related the words of the valar Who had spoken, then Lady Galadriel putting him to sleep.

There was a stunned silence. Ori went on, telling how elves had come from the ground and remembered nothing since they had been captured and forced to become orcs. How King Cemnesta had to leave Lothlórien to deal with the same problem. There were noises of sympathy and shock.

“And that’s another thing!” Trig shouted. “You keep referring to these people who don’t exist, rising from the ground at Dimrill Dale, our most holy site!”

“Because they did,” said Ori.

“You can’t prove that!”

“Did Durin the Deathless awake in Mount Gundabad?” Ori asked.

“Of course!”

“Can you prove it?”

Trig opened his mouth, then closed it.

“That’s not the point! You’re making spurious assertions about sacred ground.”

Ori thought, just you wait until I talk about the hobbits.

“People that don’t exist aren’t going to start popping out of sacred ground and existing!” yelled Trig.

Glorfindel rose.

“Must I come down there and sit beside you again?”

Laughter rippled through the crowd.

“Oh, wait a moment, and I’ll join you,” said Lindir. He stood and brushed down his robe.

Master Trig turned pale.

“There’s no need, milords. I am willing to concede things I have experienced as empirical proof. Some elves do exist.”

“Bloody finally!” someone shouted from the gallery.

“Though, I still maintain they must have been an experimental model of dwarrow, designed by Mahal, Who is the only Valar.”

The audience groaned.

“He is so goin’ t’ ge’ struck by lightnin’,” said Durin in Ori’s head.

“It won’t be a moment too soon,” Ori murmured.

“Still think Mica shouldn’t poop on him?” Quartz asked.

“Hush,” said Ori. “There’s one of Dori’s apple cakes in my pouch.”

“Ooooh!”

“Dear Master Trig,” Lady Galadriel cooed from the dais, “please do tell me if I exist.”

“I am a skeptic of the first water, milady,” said Trig, “but I’m not that skeptical. Or that suicidal.”

“Ah, so you are willing to acknowledge me, but not my Maker? Scrupulous scholarship, indeed! I shall leave you to your research.”

“Though,” said Trig, as if turning the idea around in his head, “if you are as powerful as all that, why did you not simply zap you and your companions to safety when the cavern collapsed?”

“I am not a valar, Master Trig,” said Galadriel. “Even I have limits. I might have taken two or three with me to safety at a time. Given that I did not know how long I had to make such trips, which of my companions would you have had me choose?”

Trig looked conflicted, then said, “All right, that’s one for you.”

“Do I have leave to continue?” Ori asked politely.

Thorin and Galadriel waved a permitting hand in unison. The crowd tittered.

“About that stuff you shoved in a box,” Trig had a look of triumph. “You can’t prove any of that.”

“Where, in Yavanna’s name, would he o’ found all them seeds?” Hamfast bellowed as he leapt up from his seat.

Ori rolled his eyes and they alit on the table bearing all the books. Queen Kivi’s original book sat in the middle, the gems catching to light. Ori turned and grinned at Trig.

“Master Trig, have you heard of Queen Kivi?”

Laughter rocked the room and Trig grinned in returned.

“Aye, Lord Ori, and as a happily married dwarf, I’m very familiar with her book. Every chapter.”

“You then agree she was a queen of dwarrow and wrote her masterwork, ‘Queen Kivi’s Book of Glittering Diamonds’?”

“Every chapter, milord and what a queen she was.” Trig stuck his thumbs in his belt and looked about proudly.

“Then,” Ori asked politely, “how is position 20 possible with only two people?”

The look on Trig’s face was a delight to Ori.

“Well, you do have to stretch first,” said Trig.

“You’ll never stretch enough to cover the roles of three other people,” said Ori. “You’ll end up in the infirmary.”

“Aye,” said someone in the crowd, “makin’ up stories a’ how yeh’ pu’ yer back out while th’ healer smirks at yeh.”

“The voice of experience!” someone else cried, to the delight of the crowd.

“You’ve seen samples of Queen Kivi’s handwriting,” said Ori to Trig. “You’ve examined the book from the box. As an expert on Queen Kivi, are you willing to challenge that this is not her own work?”

“Well, I-” Trig began.

“If,” Ori felt wicked, “Position 20 is possible for two people, would you kindly give us a demonstration?” Howls of laughter cut him off.

“I didn’t bring me wife!” Trig barked, his posh accent dropped away in his shock. “An’ I ain’t gettin’ all nakkie here in fron’ a’ Mahal an’ everyone!”

“You don’t have to be,” Ori replied chirpily. “Just stand up in the aisle and I’m sure someone will kindly volunteer to help.”

Thorin asked, “Would anyone care to assist Master Trig in this endeavor?”

“No!” the crowd chorused.

Ori shot a smile up to Thorin, who winked and casually lit his pipe.

Then Glorfindel, Vi and Margr stood.

“We’re up for it,” said Glorfindel, “if you can find a fifth.”

“That won’t be necessary,” said Trig. “I am also willing to concede this point, if only to help the proceedings move along.”

“Aw,” said Vi.

“Spoilsport,” Margr agreed.

Ori had a moment of confusion, for he had thought to speak more of the quest, and now they were on to the contents of the box. There was only one place left to go.

He spoke of the items of hobbit history in the book and told of meeting Bilbo Baggins, scion of two of the three oldest hobbit houses, and the revelation that hobbitts were not descended from men.

“I thought they was rabbits,” someone said in the crowd. They sounded genuinely confused.

“You think you attended the wedding of your king and a rabbit?” Ori challenged.

“We was willin’ t’ overlook tha’,” said the voice. “He’s a pretty good lookin’ feller.”

“They are not rabbits,” Ori promised. “They don’t have fluffy little tails.”

“I can demonstrate if you’d like,” said Bilbo cheekily.

“I’ll help ya,” said Hamfast.

“And me, too,” Bell agreed. “Of all the silly ideas.”

“They are their own people,” said Ori, “created by Lady Yavanna, wife of Mahal. One of Prince Consort Bilbo’s own ancestors was the wife of Durin the Deathless. On that table,” Ori pointed it out, “we have documents torn from dozens of historical sources, gathered and hidden by the scribes of Khazad-dûm, to prove this.”

Trig, apparently momentarily cowed, now shot to his feet again. Everyone around him groaned, but he didn’t take the hint.
“I read the assertion that they grew from the ground - again our most sacred, bloodstained ground - at Azanulbizar. This is not only a fabrication, but a vicious lie, and an insult to all who died and were burned there.”

The main entrance doors to the throne room boomed open. Everyone turned.

In the doorway stood Bifur, at the head of a squadron of about two hundred other grizzled dwarrow, all armored.

“Trig!” Bifur barked. “I did fight at your side at Azanulbizar, and you wert a fool then, and be an e’en bigger shit-head now.”

“Lord Bifur,” said Thorin. “You are most welcome.”

“Apolgies for our lateness, mine king. It doth take a bit for such a number of us to march at speed these days.”

Ori was very glad to see Bifur, and his fellow veterans. Things were already way out of hand. And, worse than that, it was his job to rein it all back in. He wished he knew how.

“Wait,” said Mahal.

Bifur’s cronies bowed and were provided seats in and around the room.

Bifur himself stood in the center of the aisle and said in general, “I hath known the hobbit, Prince Consort Bilbo Baggins, many years now. I can give assurance to all present that he and his people doth exist. I was not begun when they did emerged from the ground, which was e’er long before Azanulbizar, but I hath the word of one who canst say he was there when it happened.”

“Not another elf!” Trig cried.

“No,” said Bifur flatly.

A ripple of talk went through the crowd, and then the ground shook, and shook again. Ori turned and stared at the tree in the back. Familiar eyes opened and the head turned to look about.

“A-hoom!” rumbled Treebeard, moving forward from the back of the throne room. His upper branches brushed the ceiling. “Much… has… been… done… here…. A-hoom! Nice… colors…”

“Treebeard!” Ori shrieked in excitement, forgetting himself entirely.

The room collapsed into hysteria, which completely escaped Treebeard’s notice.

“Ah… Lord… Ori… my… friend! Yavanna’s… blessed… branches! How… good… to… see…you…so… soon.”

“That’s an ent,” announced Kili, nodding with great satisfaction.

Treebeard approached and bent to Thorin, who rose and bowed in return.

“I… am… called… Treebeard… of… Fangorn…”

“Thorin, son of Thrain,” said Thorin. “It’s a pleasure to finally meet you.”

“You… think… so? Hasty… decision…”

“But, is it the right decision, m’lord?” Thorin asked with a smile.

“Well… yes…” Treebeard actually shrugged. “My… kind… were… there… ah-hoom… when… the… hobbits… the… other… children… of… Yavanna…, may… Her… leaves… never… wither…, emerged… from… the… fertile… ground… at… Caradhras…, but… HOOM…perhaps… my… word… is… not… enough.”

Thorin looked over into the audience.

“Seeing that Master Trig has fainted, I’d say your word is perfectly accepted. Thank you for believing in the existence of my husband.”

Treebeard leaned all the way down. A lengthy branch reached out and gently patted Bilbo’s curls.

“I… remember… you…, sapling. You… climbed… my… branches… more… than… once.”

“And it was an honor, Lord Treebeard,” said Bilbo with a grin. “Thank you. Will you stay for a while? We could bring you some water, if you’d like.”

“That… would… be… refreshing… thank… you.”

After that, the rest seemed to pass in a dream for Ori. People stared at Treebeard, then at Ori, then at Treebeard.

Ori heard his old nemesis Lor, up in the balcony.

“A tree. He’s pals with a tree.”
Ori back tracked to the skipped part about staying with Beorn. Upon hearing his name, the bear in question rose and turned into a very naked skinchanger. Ori stopped, swallowed, and did not squeak. Thorin thanked Beorn for attending, and nodded to Ori to continue. Beorn returned to bear form and Ori did so, telling of everything else what had been found in the box.

As per the decision of Thorin’s council and the Bullies, the silmarils were not mentioned. Ori smiled as he got to his ending.

“All hail Queen Sunflower, first queen of all dwarrow.” he said and bowed in the stillness. He gulped, then everyone was on their feet cheering and stamping, others wept as they cheered. A chant began,

“All hail Queen Sunflower, first queen of all dwarrow! All hail Queen Sunflower, first queen of all dwarrow! All hail Queen Sunflower, first queen of all dwarrow!”

A shimmer appeared at the top of the stairs of the dais. It grew and glowed. Ori did squeak then. To his delight, Durin the Deathless appeared hand in hand with Queen Sunflower. The cheering all but pushed Ori over. The rowdiest got rowdier. Others fell to their knees or just stood staring. The first rulers bowed to their people, turned to acknowledge the current royals, and then smiled and bowed to Ori.

Trig, who had just come-to again, passed out once more.

No one noticed except Ori.

“Thanks, laddie,” Durin rumbled. They smiled around again and vanished. Thorin blinked and had to borrow Bilbo’s handkerchief. He then rose, came forward, and raised his hands to quieten the room.

“My beloved people, we are all part of the Second Music. It is now a time of great rejoicing. The darkness is vanquished and we dwarrow shall be regarded as equal among men, elves and hobbits. We are all good neighbors. May we all live together in peace.”

There was more cheering but Thorin raised his hand again after a few moments.

“Master Sadi?” Thorin said.

The master rose from her chair, and when she got to Thorin’s side, she held her hand out to the king. Ori watched as Thorin placed a bead in Master Sadi’s palm. She took it and hobbled over to him. Ori willed himself not to faint.

“Master Sadi? What are you doing?”

“Silly badger. Bleedin’ Durin himself jus’ approved yer presentation. I’d say tha’s enough f’r a mastery.”

She turned and shot a look at Dwalin.

“Ge’ over here. Yer goin’ t’ be doin’ this from now on.”

“Yes, Master Sadi,” said Dwalin in singsong.

He walked over with a huge, proud smile. Killer gamboled after, panting.

Dori burst into messy tears.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. To paraphrase Ursith, we mean Nori; Ori’s a here! Ori’s a hero Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Urns of coffee, kegs of ale, and dozens and dozens of varieties of cookies, cakes and other small snacks were brought forth for the reception and celebration. They were celebrating more than Master Ori of Fundin had anticipated. He accepted hundreds of congratulations, not just from his beloved kin, but from scribes, historians, and librarians of all different levels, almost none of whom he had ever met and more of whom he had only read.

They all wanted to argue and discuss some obscure point or other, and inevitably looked startled if Ori said quite frankly that he wasn’t familiar with their sources, but eagerly wrote the information down in his notebook to follow up.

It was even more taxing than the presentation.

The king and consort stood nearby, insuring that Ori’s buffalo would have to hover at Ori’s elbow, which was just where Ori needed him to be.

Loli and Omi cried excited tears all over him. Bujini bowed to him solemnly and embraced him. Ori and Arne held each other tightly for a long minute.

“I am s-so proud of you,” Arne murmured to him.

That nearly set Ori off on a crying jag of his own. Luckily, at that moment, Elrond had finally gotten around to reviving Master Trig with smelling salts, which attracted everyone’s attention.

Trig started to protest, but Elrond cut him off.

“Kindly give up this pretense, Trig. You and I have been corresponding long enough for you to know very well that elves exist.”

“I didn’t realize you were an elf!”

“Indeed? Pray tell, whom do you think lives in Imladris? Broadbeams?”

“I though you were a visiting scholar!”

“A dwarf at Imladris as a visiting scholar? Dwelling at the Last Homely House as a visiting scholar for thirty years? Do you think, for one moment, that I am going to believe that?”

Trig fell into the sulks but had enough decency to blush.

King Gheir approached and loomed over Trig.

“Your Majesty,” Trig struggled to his feet.

Gheir grasped his arm and helped him up.

“I’m already the biggest blowhard they’ve ever seen, Trig,” said Gheir. “Don’t help me.”

Ori saw Ulfr bearing down on Trig, cheek by jowl with Dree and Eriss, and fled the scene, giggling.

People, scholars and non, stood about talking or wandering to the tables again. High Priest Sven poured over the book of the Dale ancestors, exclaiming every now and then. Thranduil stood beside him, and agreed that Dale could certainly aspire to the beauty of its ancestral buildings. Teilnar, on Sven’s other side, took notes a speed. The open copy book sat beside it.

Mr. Wandi and Hamfast presided over a very long, tiered structure which held the urns from the House of Beauty and Healing. All the plants were growing vigorously. Some already showed flowers of rich colors. Treebeard appeared to be in deep discussion with a hibiscus.
Durin’s axe lay on a table all on its own. Warriors gathered there. Furh’nk allowed each a chance to lift and admire the balance of it. Master Dubb actually teared up, though he said it must just be all the book dust. He absently wiped his face with the tail of Ivo’s tunic. Ivo merely rolled his eyes as if he was used to this by now.

When Ivo held the axe, his face cycled through even more expressions.
“It pulls on different muscles than the sword. I wonder how long it takes to master the axe?”
The crowns, flower and mithril, were on show under their large crystal cloches, as no one was allowed to touch them due to the fragility of the flowers.
Around each item were the labels and explanations Brur had ordered from the printers. Ori thought he saw several people from that guild, and not just because they were mystified by what they had been printing.
“Lad!”
Ori turned at the shout and saw the source was Master Khujik hurrying toward him as fast as the elderly dwarf could. Ori embraced his old teacher.
“First Chair an’ now a Master. I’m tha’ proud a’ yeh, laddie. Out-rankin’ me in less than a year!”
“Never in experience, sir.”
Khujik swung round when Dori approached and clasped her hands.
“Blessed Bearer, I’ve jus’ bin tellin’ young Master Ori here how proud I am a’ him.”
Dori smiled mistily
“My badger has done great things, Master Khujik.”
“He has indeed, Bearer. Yeh are t’ be commended f’r yer raisin’ a’ him.”
Dori put an arm about Ori’s waist and hugged him.
“My dearest badger.”
“You trained me well, Master Khujik. I thank you with my whole heart,” Ori said and bowed to Khujik. Khujik returned the bow and excused himself to examine Durin’s axe.
Dori smiled at the master’s retreating back.
“I am very proud of you, Dori’s Ori, very proud.”
Ori wrapped his arms about Dori and hugged.
“This is all your fault, Ori’s Dori.”
“Thank you, pet. I’m sure Master Khujik thinks so, too. Now, go and circulate, so people can tell you you’re wonderful.”
Dori patted Ori’s butt to shoo him away.
Master Vobwi bounced into him and volubly admired his skill in his negotiations with the bone breakers. Such fascinating birds!
Arivett and Eomer poured over one of the tables that held the items from the box. Eowyn seized Ori and brought him over. Arivett had tears running down her face as she hugged him hard.
“This is amazing! I’m even more proud to be a dwarrowdam, if that were possible. You are a hero!”
Eomer nodded.
“I never dreamed so many things existed before. Just look at that child’s, I mean badger’s, toy pig. It’s on springs! It’s very old, though, I suppose it’s just for show now.”
Ori laughed and looked about. He spotted Wee Sam and beckoned him over.
“Sam, would you mind showing Queen Arivett, and Prince Consort Eomer how the pig works?”
Sam nodded eagerly and mounted the saddle expertly. Ori and Eowyn pushed down on it behind the saddle and Sam bounced. The pig rocked back and forth at a gallop. Several onlookers burst into applause.
“I want one of those for our marf!” Arivett cried.
“I want one of those for me,” said Eomer.
“Entirely feasible,” said Dain as he approached.
“Don’t tease,” said Eomer, and he stuck out his lower lip.
“I ain’t teasin’,” said Dain. “We’ll call it a late weddin’ present. Also, yer no’ as good with tha’ lip thin’ as me Chopper, so yeh’d best pack it in.”
Chopper oinked smugly.

“Dain!” Ahkn shouted, and stumped over to them.

Dain turned to him.

“Yeh bellowed?”

“This bridge! This bloody bridge!” Ahkn gestured to the diagrams of the ill-fated mithril bridge mounted on large boards behind another table.

“Aye, wha’ abou’ it?”

“It’s a work of genius, and I’m that pissed I didn’t think of it, and I’m an inch from calling you out into the courtyard and bashing in your head over it.”

“Hmmm,” said Dain, “jealousy’s makin’ th’ old dwarf feisty. Yeh sure yeh don’ jus’ wan’ me t’ buy yeh a drink ’re somethin’?”

Ahkn thought about it, shrugged and said, “Yep, that’ll do.”

Ulfr, apparently having finished with Trig, had cornered Bilbo by the marriage quilt, the latest in a hoard of scholars and others gathered there to pepper him with questions.

“An’ this means a son?”

“Yes.”

“An’ what’s this?”

“I’d say someone won a prize for ale brewing, though it wasn’t without controversy.”

“Yeh kin honestly read that in all this?”

“Yes.”

“This ain’t a quilt, our Bilbo, it’s a gossip tapestry.”

“The lace along this piece is exquisite,” said Yizaris. “I’ve never seen this pattern, and I have a hand for tatting.”

“Those are chamomile flowers,” said Bilbo. “They’re restful, like the tea.”

Bilbo sent a look of distress toward Bell, who took his place at the quilt, answering questions, while Bilbo went to get his own cup of tea, presumably not chamomile, and likely laced medicinally.

The pleasure guild was packed around the table which held the items from the box of Durin’s and Sunny’s sex toys, and the seven volumes of the Book of Bearers. Nearby, Nugget and her cohorts demonstrated a dance bearers might do on feast days, to please the king. The Master of the Guild explained how they had been told that on Durin’s Day, the name of Durin’s wife was Sunflower, but not why she had such a name.

Tay brightly and explicitly explained each and every toy with a pleasant smile on his face.

“Oh, that would take some doing,” Tay replied to an elven scholar. “It’s not for beginners or the faint of heart, but I can refer you to an artisan, if you’re interested in a reproduction.”

Bujni stayed by the table which held the Dale books, and the ‘History of Men’. If asked, Bujni would read from this to the great amusement of the Dale folk.

“’Men: fascinated. Elves: Horrified.’” echoed Mistress Callin with a cackle. “I think that there says it all.”

“I know,” Miss Sifian giggled. “I feel I should rush home and check to see if my body hair is in the appropriate pattern!”

Elves swarmed over the table with the musical instruments and the one with Sunny’s hair ornaments and her jewelry.

The jewelry crafters among them sketched rapidly. One elf lady pulled a comb from her own hair and showed Dis that it bore the same hallmark as a comb on the table. It was not Durin’s work, but an elven piece acquired for Sunny.

“That’s amazing,” said Dis. “Do you know anything about the artisan who created them?”

“I am the artisan who created them.”

Anyone interested in cooking and baking crowded around the tables with these tools. The mithril masters closely patrolled the table with the mithril tools of Durin. Ori honestly wondered if they would bite anyone who tried to handle Durin’s tools.

Roäc perched on the back of a low stool between the two tables of books. The Book of Ravens lay open on the stool before him, turned to face the onlookers. The floor around the stool was knee deep in other ravens. People and a couple of bone breakers craned their necks to see as Roäc held forth on the glories of his line.

One Dale matron, who perhaps should have known better, asked how old he was.

“Only my hairdresser knows for sure,” said Roäc, to the confusion of just about everybody.

“I beg your pardon?” the matron asked.

“There he is, tall elf feller, looks pleased with himself, carrying a fat dog. Just ask him.”

The matron turned, observed Mr. Wandi then nodded. She made a little bow to Roäc.

“Thank you very much, sir,” she said politely.

In the midst of this, Ori felt an itch on his right hip and was afraid it meant he had a new tattoo coming in. It peeved him to think how long it would be before he got a look at it.

He turned and saw Master Nodun as she hurried to his side.

“Master Scribe?” she teased.

Ori hugged her.

She soon let go, laughing.

“Now that you are a proper master, along with being the First Chair, I must tell you about some wonderful news.”

“Yes, please,” Ori said excitedly.

“There is going to be a contest to create the new royal portrait. Usually it is just for members of the artistic guild, but King Thorin insisted it be open to all.”

Ori stared at Nodun, “Really there’s a contest for painting it?”

“Yes,” she replied. “I haven’t seen your work yet and the first chair usually puts one in.”

“I’ve just started with oils. I’m more proficient with graphite pen.”

“According to Master Bombur, you’re quite proficient with oils as well.”

Ori cursed inwardly. He’d been ratted out.

“How is the miniature coming?” she asked.

“I’m ready to bash my head against the wall,” he admitted.

“Don’t do that,” she said. “It’s very hard to get blood and brains out of the plaster. I could take a look if you’d like?”

“I would love the help,” he said.

“If you agree to put in an entry for the new royal portrait.”

Ori cocked an eyebrow at her.

“You drive a hard bargain, Master Nodun.

Nodun pursed her lips, then broke out in a laugh.

“Just think. You are a very new master and I’m sure it will give others am eager notion of competition. I’ll show you the hall of royal portraits tomorrow. About tenth volley?”

“Certainly!” Ori enthused. “I’ll meet you-?”

“At the door over there,” she pointed. “It leads to smaller meeting rooms but the hallway is impressive.”

Nodun went off and Ori started thinking about painting. He then remembered he had to think about the translation Queen Kivi’s book, talk to Bilbo about writing the exploits of Belladonna Took, go through his notes about the questions scholars had asked him that he needed to read up on, make Dori’s Yule present with Thorin’s help….

“I’m booked,” he said to no one in particular.

The afternoon was almost done by the time the reception started to simmer down. The guards watched over the crating up of the items from the box to send back to the library. Ori tried to help, but Sadi shooed him away. Bilbo slid his arm through Ori’s.

“Time to go home for a cup of tea?”

“Tea sounds like a wonderful idea!”

Brur came over and handed Ori a cream-colored leather-bound volume. Ori took it and there, on the cover, burned into the leather, was his sigil. Ori hugged his masterwork to him. His work in print and professionally bound in the workshop of the royal printers of Erebor.

“I did it!” Ori squeaked to the ether. “Thank you!”
Next thing he knew was being enveloped by Dori.
“I’m so proud of you, Dori’s Ori.”
“I didn’t imagine it, Ori’s Dori! I did it! I got my mastery!”
“You did, my pet.”
“Ori’s Dori?”
“Yes, pet?”
“Now that I’ve got my mastery, should I think about getting married?”
Dori giggled delightedly.
“I suppose so, pet. Did you have someone in mind you’d like to walk out with?”
Yes!” Ori cried. He turned to Dwalin.
“Captain Dwalin, would you please walk out with me?”
“I’d walk anywheres wi’ yeh, Master Ori.”
“See,” Dori said as they walked off arm in arm. “That is the proper way to begin courting as dwarrow.”

They got in the front door and the household staff descended on Ori, shouting congratulations. Ori grinned like a fool and thanked them all. Mistress Dazla ordered everyone through to take tea.
Ori turned and Nori erupted through the floor, grabbed him, whirled him around and chanted.
“He’s a hero again!”
Tea tasted lovely. Ori sipped happily, curled next to Dwalin on a sofa, Dwalin’s hand on his knee and Killer at their feet. Everyone who had not attended the original opening of the box discussed all they had seen and heard.
Ori finished his cup and looked at Dwalin, then put his cup down.
“I need to get out of these fancy robes before I smear anything on them.”
“You are perfectly sober, Lord Ori,” Dipfa said seriously. “I trust you completely with them at the moment. Do you require assistance?”
“I’ll help ‘im,” Dwalin said as he rose and took Ori’s hand.
When they went through to their bedroom, Killer trotted along. Ori shut the door behind all of them and leaned on it.
“Dwalin?”
“Love?”
“You need to rip my clothes off right this second.”
“If I rip ‘em, our Dipfa’ll murder me.”
“You’re right. You need to gently remove my clothes right this second.”
“Oh, aye. I kin do tha’.”
It wasn’t quite as quick as all that, of course.
Dwalin had to unbutton and unbuckle, and the other seemingly dozens of things necessary to remove dwarf clothing. Dwalin tickled and fondled his husband, and drew out the suspense.
“Do you suppose,” Ori asked, as Dwalin nuzzled his neck, “that our ancestors came up with all this clothing as a tease?”
Dwalin deftly unlaced the front of his tunic, kissing, nipping and licking as he went.
“I thin’… mmm, yeh smell li’e cookies… tha’ it were more a contest t’ see who could bury themselves in th’ most ornaments. Bastards.”
Ori laughed as Dwalin lifted the tunic over his head.
They maneuvered over to the bed, still kissing. Dwalin sat on the edge and Ori climbed onto his thighs.
“Kneel up a bit,” Dwalin directed.
When Ori did, Dwalin slid his hands beneath Ori’s undertunic and pulled him into a deep kiss. Ori sighed happily, safe and loved, surrounded by gentle power.
“Love you.”
“Love yeh, too. Yer me perfec’ armful.”
The under tunic came off and joined Ori’s tunic on the floor. Ori’s belt followed after, and his trousers gaped open.

Dwalin fell back on the bed, and Ori tumbled after with a squawk, then a hum as Dwalin’s big hands latched onto his bum and squeezed. Ori had a mind to crawl up his husband and kiss him, but Dwalin seemed to have other ideas. He rolled Ori over, still cradling his arse, and rubbed his beard against Ori’s furry torso.

“Lift,” said Dwalin.
Ori lifted his legs and trousers slid off to join the tunics on the floor.
Dwalin stopped and laughed.

“Wha’re those?”

“My new smalls. You don’t like them?”

“Those look li’e the’ scarf yeh go’ in Dale, with th’ upside down hearts.”

“They are not hearts,” Ori said with a lofty sniff. “They are representations of your adorable bottom, embroidered in red silk thread upon pink lawn.”

“Oh, is tha’ all?” Dwalin asked.

“Of course that’s not ‘all’,” said Ori with a playful poke in the belly. “They remind me of you!”

“Tha’s flatterin’. D’ yeh mind if I take ‘em off?”

“At your leisure,” said Ori. “But not too much leisure.”

Ori felt like a pastry spilled out onto a plate, especially when Dwalin commenced to nibble on his tenderest bits.

Ori was so blissed out, it took him a moment to realize Dwalin had stopped nibbling, and now peered down on Ori, or at least at Ori’s hip.

Of course! The tattoo! Between the euphoria of his mastery and the mental challenge of all those scholars, Ori had forgotten all about it.

“What is it?” Ori asked. He twisted about, and tried to get a look at it.
Dwalin cocked his head, frowned, and pulled back a little.

“I think it’s a cake,” he said.

“A cake?”

“Aye, li’e one a’ Dori’s.”

Ori cried out into the ether, "A tattoo of a cake? Really?"

Mahal replied, "Yer as guid as any one a’ Dori’s. I don’ wan’ yeh t’ frget. ’Sides, I’m sure yer Dwalin finds yeh jus’ as yummy."

"Oh, Mahal's bloody... er, sorry," said Ori.
Ori heard chuckling, and he turned to Dwalin.

"I need to explain. It’s about something Killer said."
Dwalin cocked an eyebrow.

"No, really, Mahal said it, but through Killer," Ori babbled.
Killer, on the rug by the fireplace, thumped his tail, rolled over with his paws up and his tongue out.

"Don’ listen t’ him," said Killer. "I'm a talented pup. Han'some, too."

"Alrhgh', tha's jus' disturbin'," said Dwalin.

Ori wrapped his legs around Dwalin’s waist and yanked his husband down on top of him.

“Oof! I keep frgettin’ how strong yeh are, love.”

Ori kissed the tip of his nose.

“Give me a minute, and I’ll remind you.”
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Whew! What a busy day our Ori’s had. Now, onward to dinner. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwararrow time, same dwararrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

We thank all of our readers for your outpouring of love to us for our recent loss. You are all very kind. If we could, we would hug each and everyone of you. Please considered yourselves thoroughly squeezed tight by both of us.

And a shout-out to #Blistering Typhoons for the mac and cheese recipe!

Ori blinked awake and looked up into Bilbo’s smile.

Thorin appeared beside him.

“Wake up, Master Scribe, Captain of the King’s Guard,” Thorin teased. “You have twenty minutes to be properly clean and dressed for dinner.”

“Dinner?” Ori repeated as his stomach agreed.

“Yes,” Thorin said as he sat beside Bilbo on the bed. “Aragorn has insisted on making us a traditional Rangers’ dish to go with the roast turkey.”

“Th’ fuck?” Dwalin managed.

“Yes,” Thorin said as he sat beside Bilbo on the bed. “Aragorn has insisted on making us a traditional Rangers’ dish to go with the roast turkey.”

“Th’ fuck?” Dwalin managed.

“He wouldn’t tell us,” Bilbo chimed in, “other than it can be a main course or a dish instead of potatoes. That, and I over heard him telling Mistress Dazla, he was going to use noodles instead of boiled bulgar wheat or rice.”

Thorin and Bilbo left them to wash in the bathroom. Ori and Dwalin happy dressed in comfortable old clothes and arranged each others hair. They entered the sitting room just as Dori was calling everyone to table.

Seated and talking, the guests and family partook of potato salad mixed with cooked chopped carrots, peas, chopped onion, chopped pickles, and chunks of apple, all dressed in a light creamy dressing. There was a dish filled with chunks of ham to add in for those who wished meat. This was a dish popular among the Stiffbeards. Gheir was delighted to introduce it to them all. The elves praised it highly and Mavey hugged Gheir’s arm.

“Isn’t it good?” she squeaked.

“You can carry a tin pail of it in your saddle bag for lunch,” Gheir instructed. “Just keep it cold. We refer to it as rushing salad as you can throw it together quite quickly.”

Then the main course of roast turkeys was set out, there were a few large salads and vegetable dishes, and Aragorn’s offering.

“Rangers make it when they’re in the Shire in the spring,” he told them all. “We buy the ingredients from the hobbits. It has a sauce of pint of milk, half a dozen eggs, a chopped ball of cheese, and a good sized jar of pickled tomato puree. I put noodles in, as we usually use bulgar or rice. You put in some sauce, then some noodles, then some cheese, and keep layering until the pan is full or you used all the ingredients. Then you bake it in the fire a good while.”

“It looks like a cheese bake!” Kili said and sat up to lean over the table. “Smells great!”

Dori spooned out helpings for everyone and it was tried.

“I like this,” Beorn rumbled. “I will ask you again for the recipe.”

Dinner, Dainties, and Dubious Males.
“Mam, Da,” Snis piped up. “You’ll learn, too?”
Chat and Givris exchanged looks and Givris ruffled Snis’ hair
“Aye, me pebble, I’ll make sure yeh kin have it again.”
“Why not use fresh tomatoes?” Erda asked as she looked up from where she and Bombur has taken a small piece aside and were diligently parsing it all out, to taste individual flavors.
“It’s usually too early for fresh tomatoes,” Aragorn chuckled. “The tomato puree is so smooth, it mixes well for the sauce and you do get the flavor of all the spices the hobbits add in when they put it up in the fall.”
“It’s one of my favorites,” Arwen smiled up at her betrothed.
“With your permission,” Erda said with an exchange of nods with Bombur, “we’d like to offer this dish at the Inn.”
“Certainly.” Aragorn looked pleased. “You’ll have to come up with a name for it.”
“What do the rangers call it?” Bombur asked.
“Shire grub,” Aragorn said and everyone laughed.
“That doesn’t sound good,” Frodo opined.
“Shire bake?” Randi suggested.
“We don’t make it,” Bilbo said.
“Ranger bake,” Theoden said. “And, if you serve it with plenty of ale, you’ll have baked ranger.” Arwen poked Eowyn and she gave her uncle a shove for Arwen, making everyone laugh.
“Ranger noodles,” Erda decided.
“We can serve it as a lunch dish in the pub,” Bombur said thoughtfully. “We’ll put a side salad with it. It can be a dinner dish for any not wanting meat.”

The next morning Ori was ready and waiting at the throne room side door when Nodun arrived. She opened the door and they went through to the hall of royal paintings.
Ori thought that they would be formal portraits, like what he had seen in the archives, but the paintings in the enormous hallway were quite different.
“You see,” Nodun said, “for each king there are one or more allegorical paintings.”
Ori stared up at the angry dwarf king violently killing the king of Firebeards for their sack of Doriath. In another picture, Thror showed the arkenstone to the people. It glittered above a swirl of bodies and people gesturing wildly.
“Notice that the Stonefists are in great joy, but the Blacklocks do not agree,” said Nodun. “Thror is holding the arkenstone to Mahal and the scribes are bent over their books.”
“Because only Thror gives the laws,” Ori gathered.
“Yes,” said Nodun as she glared at it.
The next portrait showed Thrain leading a charge at Khazad-dûm.
“We have one of Thrain, even although he was not crowned.” She smiled and patted Ori’s shoulder. “We need one of Thorin now. See what you can do.”
They walked back to Fundin House in companionable silence.
Ori’s head was full. Thorin wasn’t his grandfather, under the thrall of a dragon in the form of an evil gem. He wasn’t Thrain, obedient and doomed. Yes, Thorin was a warrior, but he understood the pain and suffering war brought. Ori felt that Thror had possibly never experienced war as Thorin had. Ori spent his walk back to Fundin house mulling over the paintings he’d seen. Thorin was different. Thorin only wanted his people happy and prosperous.

They arrived at the house to a flurry of activity. Dori was determined to get in one of her famous tea parties before any of the monarchs left. Most of the younger set and the males had been shooed away to do something else.
Hild and Arivett sat with Aris, who did double duty, taking notes from the left and right. Granny Klak and Givris were in cahoots, laughing filthily over something, and they beckoned Nodun over. The sisters, Dori, Dis, Galadriel, Yizaris, Arwen, Sigrid, and Eowyn sat at table with them all and chatted. Ori glanced at Yizaris. The queen was obviously thoroughly enjoying the sisters’ gossip and Arwen and Eowyn watched them fascinated. Red Queen, on a cushioned chair, took tea from one bowl and baked goodies from another, while she discussed something with Master Sadi and Master Podvuh. Ruelis and Zendi chattered with Gridr, Binni, and Garnet. Beryl and Mica perched on the table both for cake and their share in the conversation. Rutile had taken on the duty of passing the butter dish to any who needed it.

“Ooo, our Gladdy, it’s jus’ bin tha’ lovely havin’ yeh here f’r such a nice long stay,” Margr cooed. “Now yeh’ll be comin’ back soon, we do hope.”

“Oh, yes,” Galadriel’s eyes glowed. “Dearest Dori and I are going to be propping up each other during our pregnancies.”

“Very wise,” Vi approved. “Always best t’ go though it wi’ someone who knows.”

Ori sat on the chair opposite Thorin in front of the fireplace, a little apart from the fascination.

“If you don’t mind, Ori,” said Thorin, “I could use your help going through the papers.”

Thorin could have just sat in his office with the door open, Ori supposed, but for whatever reason, Thorin had insisted on going over papers in the sitting room.

“Forgive us, ladies,” said Thorin. “We hope our presence wouldn’t disturb your party.”

“Oooooo, no’ t’ worry our majesty,” said Vi as she demolished her second iklar.

“We’re jus’ tha’ thrilled to watch yeh do yer king-ish thin’s,” Margr added. “Bu’ yeh’ll have some tea, surely, an’ a little somethin’?”

“Yes, Thorin,” said Dis, “you must take sustenance while you’re so busy, and please don’t work too hard.”

Thorin drank tea, and nibbled from a plate full of treats at his elbow while he frowned at the same piece of paper he’d sat down with. Ori sketched under the guise of looking busy.

“You go’ nuthin’ t’ worry ‘bout, our Hild,” Givris said, “Ol’ Mam Diyfris moved t’ Beleghost some few years back t’ stay wi’ her daughter’s family. She’s th’ bes’ birthin’ dam about.”

“Make a note, Aris–” Hild started.

“Mam, I rule Beleghost,” Arivett interrupted. “I’ll send for her when I get back.”

“Oh that’s right,” Hild giggled. “Make a note, Aris, Arivett is going to contact the birthing dam when she returns. I’m going to have a bath when I return home.”

“I thought you had hot springs?” Dis inquired, holding out a syrupy berry for Rutile to stuff herself with.

“We do, but a group of tile workers, all dams, arrived and offered to show off their skill by retiling my bathroom.”

“More Stiffbeards, mam?” Arivett giggled and helped herself to a slice of apple pie redolent with cinnamon. “You’ll be ruling both clans, soon!”

“Yes, I shall.” Hild’s smile was pure avarice, then she and Arivett shrieked with laughter. Ori caught Thorin’s eye and noted this down.

“Hild, yer a menace,” Margr called down the table.

“True,” Hild smiled around a sip of iced green tea.

“Make a note, Aris!” teased Tauriel.

“Don’ have t’, ma’am,” Aris grinned. “Story a’ me life.”

“I suppose,” Granny Klak said as she helped herself to a slice of iced ginger bread still warm and plump with dates, “you could do it quite seamlessly by simply marrying Gheir.”

Aris choked on her tea and Hild fell back in her chair and screamed with laughter.

“I can’t imagine anything worse!” she managed to gasp out.

“I dunno, luv,” Aris recovered herself and looked at her queen with sparkling eyes. “Jus’ thin’ a’ all them lovely Mavises,” “Ooo, there is that,” Hild sat up and giggled. She turned in her chair and looked at Thorin. “What is your opinion, my High King?”

Thorin glanced up and smirked.

“It’s your funeral, Hild.”

“Why, whatever do you mean?”
Thorin put the paper down.

“Hild, if you marry Gheir there’s going to be a war, not just because it’s your wedding day. The legalities of combining yours and Gheir’s kingdoms would be argued for the next several ages. And that’s not taking into account both yours and Gheir’s funeral arrangements either.”

“Good point,” Hild agreed. “As queen I must be put to the stone in my own mountain. Gheir’s people just park their queens about the king.” Hild grimaced then brightened. “Arivett can steal all the Mavisés.”

“Mam!” Arivett cried. “I don’t want dams in my bed and Eomer would die of exhaustion within the year!”

“Tha’s true, too, luv;” Aris agreed.

“Nonsense,” Hild announced. “If Gheir can do it, I’m sure Eomer could handle twice as many at least! I wonder how Gheir managed the extension to his royal nurseries. If he keeps this up, he’s going to have to add an extension to his mountain.”

“Men can’t build nests properly,” Beryl mused.

“We have noticed,” Red Queen put in after she swallowed down an entire pork bun, “males tend to be easily beguiled by flattery and frequent mountings. They tend to die out quickly with an excess of such. Once the dominant male is out of the way, one can easily rule his flocks.”

“Is that how you became queen of such a large flock?” Eowyn asked around a mouthful of xocolātl cake filled with red currant jelly and dusted with powdered sugar.

“Of course, nestling.”

“Red Queen,” said Thorin.

“Yes, High King of All Dwarrow?”

“Don’t help.”

In the ensuing shrieks and giggles, Dori brought Thorin another plate of goodies and poured him more tea.

“Now, dear Thorin, we’re all just being silly. Pay us no mind. We would never dream of interrupting your work.”

“Thank you, Dori.”

Garnet winged over to Ori and settled on his shoulder, Ori stroked her back as he’d seen Dwalin do.

“I have to go to the nest,” Garnet said to him quietly.

“Time for eggs?” Ori asked, a little excited.

“I think so. Tonight or tomorrow. I’ll have to sit for about three weeks.”

“Will you be warm enough?” Ori asked. “It’s late in the year.”

“I’ll be fine. All the other nests are up there and the warmth of the flock will make it cozy enough. Tell Dwalin for me?”

“Of course. Shall I tell Quartz to go up with you?”

“He’ll be busy bringing me food.” Garnet stretched and fluffed her feathers.

“What should I send him with?” Garnet looked surprised at his question, then rubbed her beak against his cheek.

“You’re such a sweet little mate to my Dwalin. I’ll need meat.”

“Raw, cooked or er…old?” Ori couldn’t bring himself to offer rotten meat.

Garnet cackled.

“I don’t mind.”

“Do you want to fly or shall I carry you up?”

Garnet rubbed her head into his hair.

“Such a good dwarf. No, I can fly.”

“I’ll take you to the meadow,” Ori said and rose.

There was a definite chill to the sunshine outside. The ponies frisked and nickered at each other, and looked up from time to time at the enormous new tree which had appeared in their midst. Ori thought Treebeard looked like he was asleep, but perhaps he was just enjoying the sun.

Ori went around past the windows of Bag-End East and lifted his arms up, so Garnet could get a good start. He watched her flight, up and round the corner to the aerie. Quartz whirled by, tapped Ori on the head with a wing tip, and hurtled after Garnet.

Once back inside, Ori went through to the larder and, in a handkerchief, placed several choice pieces of different meats. Mistress Dazla came in and started a little to find him there.

“What in all Arda are you doing, Lord Ori? Are you hungry for something other than the dainties? I’ll make you something.”

“No, thank you, Mistress Dazla,” Ori explained. “Garnet’s gone to the nest to lay eggs and I was getting her something.”

“That’s very sweet of you, but ravens are capable of getting themselves food.”

“I know, but Quartz is the father and since he’s with me I feel like I should help.”

“Oh, you sweet thing,” cooed Mistress Dazla, and accompanied him out of the larder. She found Ori a small leather carrying basket and they popped in the meat. Ori went back out to the meadow and called Quartz.

Quartz whisks down, a little agitated, to land on his forearm.

“Important message?”

“No, meat for Garnet.”

“My work.”

“I know but you work with me, so I thought you might like some help.”

Quartz stared, then hopped forward, grabbed the front of Ori’s tunic with his talons and shoved his head under Ori’s chin, wings open and about Ori. After a moment, Quartz took the little basket and flew back to the aerie.

Ori went back in and took his seat once more. Sadi was talking.

“Mister Denethor’s sendin’ his representative with some a’ his own presses, t’ set up shop here under th’ mountain. He’s rented th’ space an’ is t’ take on guild apprentices, per agreement, at better than scale pay. They’re goin’ t’ publish th’ last a’ th’ Shire septet f’r which Bilbo’s been contracted, an’ set up t’ distribute them east from here.”

“Apparently he thinks dwarrow don’t understand printing,” Dis said waspishly. “When we opened our written negotiations, he sent a long ridiculous letter explaining the printing process to me as if I was a badger. Patronizing git.”

“He always was,” Arwen agreed.

“Huh,” muttered Jani as she spooned marmalade onto the pork bun she had split open. “One a’ those men who think men invent everything a’ use and elves an’ dwarrow just hang about, lookin’ at flowers ’r digging holes.”

“And thinks females are good for nothing, except housework and making babies,” Eowyn agreed with a frown.

“I’ve had the misfortune of meeting him while visiting Gondor,” Lady Galadriel told them as she ate away at a saucer of pears cooked in dorwinian wine then baked in soft new cheese. “He’s a perfect cad. It’s amazing Boromir turned out so well. The way Denethor treats his second son, Faramir, is a disgrace.”

“I remember Faramir,” said Eowyn. “Serious sort. Quiet, but nice. He wrapped up my hand once when I was sparring with Boromir. I missed Boromir’s head and punched the stable door jamb. He was very good about it.”

“He’s grown into a very level-headed and studious young man,” Arwen said with a smile, taking a little cake from the plate as it was passed round. “Yet, he is also an accomplished warrior. He does duty as a ranger quite often as well, and he has a very naughty, very dry sense of humor.”

“Faramir is lovely,” Lavender said. She turned to her mother. “He was so welcoming when I got there. When Boromir is away overnight on guard duty, he always checks on me. I’ll be sitting with dear Arwen in the drawing room and he will stop by and see if we wish any messages sent to Boromir or dear Aragorn.”

“Does Denethor treat you well?” Dis asked.

Lavender snorted. Bell put five plump triangles of buttered bread filled with thinly sliced cucumbers on her daughter’s plate then took some herself.
Thorin looked up.
“Lavender?”
Lavender laughed.
“Oh, not to worry, your majesty. He’s still a bit pissy over Boromir and I. When I first arrived, he continued to introduce Boromir to ladies Boromir’d known forever but who didn’t interest him, or he them. Finally, Boromir said Denethor needed to stop, as he was going to marry me and had the blessing of his king to do so. So, then Denethor tried to speak down to me, told me I was forgetting my place and should leave his son alone.”
Vi tutted and helped herself to a pillowy scoop of whipped cream and dolloped it on her slice of berry tart.
“Bet yeh didn’t stand f’r tha’, our Lavender.”
“No! I cut him off in the middle. I told him he either behaved himself properly or I’d swat his silly head with a frying pan. He laughed at me and said he’d like to see me try.”
“Eru!” gasped Sigrid, all but dropping her lemon handpie. “What a dumdeumel! What did you do?”
Arwen sipped her tea.
“Aragorn and I told him to behave. But would he listen?”
“Idiot!” Beryl and Mica chorused.
“I went to the kitchen,” Lavender continued with a shrug, “got a big frying pan, went back, found him in the meeting room with dear Aragorn and his counselors and swatted him over the head. When he came to, I told him if he was rude to me or my Boromir again, he could expect another.”
“Well done,” Sculdis praised.
“It was,” Lavender giggled. “He is civil, but keeps away from me and I have ever so much respect from all the counselors. I have quite a lot of friends among their wives.”
The table erupted in mirth once again.
“Ooo, lovelies!” Margr cried, “me an’ our Vi f’rgo’ t’ tell yeh all abou’ our Rogi!”
“Tha’s righ’!” Vi squealed.
“Oh no, what has he done now?” Galadriel groaned.
“And whose underpinnings is he vandalizing now?” Dori inquired scornfully as Binni passed the gooseberry tarts.
“Our Rogi’s go’ hissef’ a’ sweethear’!” Vi told them.
“No!” Gridr cried.
“Ew!” Sigrid put in.
The sisters cackled and had more cake.
“Tell us about her, chook,” Granny Klak ordered, giving Rutile a piece of cheese.
“Well,” Margr leaned forward. “Turns ou’ our Rogi takes after us a bit.”
“Meaning,” Yizaris pushed.
“He likes ‘em tall!” Vi shouted.
“What?” Dori and Arwen said together.
“Oh dear!” Galadriel began to giggle.
“Aye,” Vi grinned. “He’s walking’ ou’ wi’ tha’ lovely Miss Sifian!”
“Or, rather, she walks an’ he scampers t’ keep up!” Margr added.
Ori’s graphite wand accidentally tore his paper. Thorin dropped a biscuit in his lap but rescued it quickly.
“Miss Sifian?” Sigrid asked. “Isn’t she a teacher?”
“Aye, love,” Margr went on. “She come round t’ teach us t’ write our names in our Ori’s book. We had lessons an’ practice. Rogi were jus’ leavin’ th’ firs’ time she stopped by. Didn’t he make sure he was round th’ nex’ two times she called.”
“An’ he’s go’ a proper job now an’ everythin’,” Vi added. “Works down a’ th’ school, so’s t’ be close t’ his sweetie.”
“How can Sifian bear that?” Sigrid said with a look of distaste. “He’s kind of… creepy with the young ladies.”
“Oh, he gets tha’ from ‘is da,” said Margr. “No’ much a’ looker, no’ much personality, but’ a good, big dick.”

Ori had a mouthful of tea and he could neither swallow it or spit it out.

There was more laughter at Rogi’s expense.

Red Queen ruffled her feathers and burped.

“This is very strange. We do not usually eat so much in one sitting. We don’t remember eating like this since-“ The bone breaker stopped. Ori thought something had crossed her mind. She never usually stopped in the middle of a sentence.

Galadriel looked at Red Queen. Dori put the last pork bun on Red Queen’s bowl.

“Well, dear, you used to live on rodents and dead orcs. Perhaps you’re filling out and becoming more healthy.”

“Filling out…” repeated Red Queen.

“Dead orcs don’t sound like food that’s in any way healthy,” Ruelis added.

Red Queen perched as though struck. She stared into the distance, her beak clicked a few times then her eyes blazed.

“Oh, of all the-“ Red Queen gasped, then quite obviously began to curse and swear in the shrieks and squawks of avian language. Beryl and Mica looked at her, intrigued. The other guests waited for Red Queen to recover enough to tell them what was going on. They didn’t need to wait long.

“Agh!” Red Queen raged. “Do any you know how boring it is to have to sit on a twiggy nest forever? And all there is to do is to wait for whatever stupid male it was to bring dinner!”

“Oh!” cried Podvuh. “You’re going to lay an egg?”

“One or two,” muttered Red Queen darkly. “Brooding takes two months, then we fly ourselves ragged getting food.”

“If you tell us which male, we can make him bring you food,” Dori said soothingly. “If you’d prefer, we can always send someone to the aerie with supplies.

“Tell a male?” Red Queen was startled out of her sulk by the suggestion. “They’re only good for eggs and fighting.”

Ori didn’t dare to look Thorin in the eyes as he seemed to be shaking slightly and desperately trying not to laugh.

“Send him down and we’ll all have a talk with him,” Hild commanded helpfully. Yizaris nodded, frowning.

“Send who?” Red Queen asked and gulped down the bun.

“The male responsible?” Gridr suggested.

Red Queen made a disgusted noise. “We can’t remember. It’s better to be discreet about these things. If they all think it was them, then they all bring food and you get more to eat.”

“You can’t remember?” Galadriel raised an eyebrow.

Red Queen fluffed her feathers, but didn’t answer.

Thorin and Ori looked at each other.

“Red Queen,” Thorin said, “we are very proud you are laying eggs here in Erebor. They will be the first bone-breaker eggs the mountain has ever hosted.”

“That’s true,” Red Queen said thoughtfully. “Yes, we are pleased after all. We are the first female to lay on this mountain.”

“How excitin’!” Vi enthused. “Imagine havin’ a wee princess ‘r prince eggy righ’ here in Erebor. Our Dori,” nodding her head at Red Queen, “we ought’ t’ have a bit of a do.”

“A wonderful idea!” Dori praised. “Dear Thorin, perhaps a public announcement?”

“I will see to it,” Thorin promised with a slight smile and laughter in his eyes.

“Yer foundin’ yer own line!” Sculdis said.

“We will be the first to lay outside of the southern Misty Mountains,” Red Queen stated with a touch of pride.

“An yer chick’ll grow up righ’ along side th’ Durin’s an’ Mahal’s speakin’ ravens!” Vi added.

“Aye, our Vi,” Margr added eagerly. “Th’ firs’ alliance a’ ravens an’ bone-breakers! If tha’ don’ scare th’ britches off any bad ‘uns, nuthin’ can!”
Red Queen cocked her head. “Perhaps we should suggest to our brother king Roäc, that it is not too late in the season for egg-laying.”

Thorin inclined his head to Red Queen. Ori felt he should tell the news. “Roäc’s offspring, Quartz is…er…nesting with Garnet.”

Red Queen looks straight at him. “Quartz, he assists you, doesn’t he?”

“Yes, he does.”

“We shall give him our felicitations when we see him. Perhaps he will bring us to visit Garnet while she broods.” Red Queen turned to her fellow tea drinkers. “We are not aware of the customs concerning visiting while brooding among your various peoples. Among our kind, one must request a visitation.”

“Ah,” said Dori, catching up quickly. “We don’t…er…brood as such but the birth, or as you would say ‘hatching’, is private to family. Then, when the mother is feeling recovered enough, there is usually an afternoon when people are told they may drop by and see the new badger. There are usually refreshments and such conducted in another room by the father and the rest of both families.”

“Aye,” Vi said. “We call ‘em visitin’ days.”

“Ah,” Red Queen nodded solemnly. “We are glad you have told us. This is good information. We shall inform our flock.”

“Dori’s brooding right now,” Ori piped up naughtily.

“Pet!” Dori cried with a pretense of shock. The party guests all giggled, but Red Queen looked upset by the revelation.

“Brooding? You should be on your nest, resting and keeping the egg warm!”

“We don’t lay eggs, dear Red Queen,” Dori explained. “I’m currently carrying two badgers.” She patted her belly. “Around Yule I will give birth to them. They won’t have shells and will be very small and helpless like your hatchlings.”

“Much like rabbits, then,” Red Queen nodded wisely, but raised her head high when Bell and Lavender giggled.

“People always compare hobbits to rabbits,” Gridr explained and poured Red Queen more tea. “It’s the feet.”

“Is yer nursery ready?” Givris wanted to know.

“Oh yes,” Dori all but purred. “Please, all of you come and see.”

A herd followed Dori through to the master bedroom. Ori realized he hadn’t seen the nursery either and padded after.

Ori gaped. The room was no longer sumptuous jewel tones and gold and mirrors, but awash in pastel colors. White lace festooned the walls and ceiling. Phosphorous stones had been set behind these, making a pleasant glow. Great swathes of pastel silk looped all over the walls. The bed was similarly festooned with silks and pillows. Huge bows tied and folded into flowers and gems garlanded the room.

The crib next to the bed was amazing, all carved wood, stained dark, with ravens carved on the legs which sat on tiny casters. Two carved trees at either end held the cradle, which was also carved and the panels painted with images of Erebor, flecked with gold. Inside was lined with pale blue silk and there was room for two. The head was sheltered by a half cover of carved raven wings. It was beautiful. Ori wiggled through the crowd and drew the cradle, while everyone else gushed and complimented the cradle and room.

“This is beautiful, Dori,” Galadriel admired. “All the lace and pillows everywhere makes it so cozy and soft.”

“Ooo, our Dor, it’s like a wee fairyland!” Margr cooed. Vi sniffed into her hankie. Arwen and Sigrid wore longing looks on their faces. Eowyn seemed a little uncomfortable. Ori rather doubted there was anything this foofy in Rohan. Red Queen stepped forward with a soft, grunting noise. She went to Dori and put her beak into Dori’s hands. When she drew away everyone could see that Dori’s hands were full of soft delicate, white fluff.
“That will help keep the hatchlings warm,” Red Queen pronounced. “Down from your own breast,” Dori sniffed. Gridr lifted the bottom sheet up and Dori spread the down. Mica and Beryl added a little of their own and Gridr tucked the sheet back down and Dori burst into tears all over Red Queen.

Ori felt rather uncomfortable and he slipped out, Eowyn behind him.

Thorin looked up from his seat.

“How much pastel is there?” he asked with a twinkle in his eye.

“It’s everywhere! And pillows! It’s like being inside a quilt. And the lace-” Eowyn shuddered. Thorin pointed his teaspoon at her.

“No lace, Lady Eowyn, I beg of you.”

“It’s very,” Ori searched for something nice to say, “fluffy in there.”

The door burst open and Fili and Kili barged in.

“We’re here!” Kili announced. “Any leftovers?”

Tauriel and Sigrid came out of Dori’s room and rolled their eyes. The rest of the party emerged chattering and laughing. Dori poured the princes’ tea and sent them off to the fireplace with their uncle and plates piled with dainties.

Soon the rest of the royal guests and family members arrived back. Mistress Dazla and her team bought out more food and everyone enjoyed tea and dainties.

Theoden and Thranduil had been touring the library archives with Brur, Ahkn, and Celeborn. They returned and Ahkn’s eyes were like saucers.

“I’ve never even dreamt that so many books existed. And two hundred something floors to store ‘em. Good thing I got all that ointment from Oin. My knees wouldn’t have survived.”

Balin had conducted Ulfr, Glorfindel, and Aragorn through the armory and its museum of ancient armor and war machines. Ulfr looked like his head was going to burst with ideas, Aragorn was obviously impressed, and Glorfindel jealous.

Floris and Mavey had dragged Gheir through the markets. They had purchased a large wheeled basket which was piled high with packages, each stamped with the names of clothiers, jewelers or beauty product makers.

Chat, Bilbo, and Dwalin had gone to the Moo and Cluck for a pint or two. Bilbo and Dwalin were both fine and Dwalin carried Chat slung over a shoulder.

“He’ll never learn,” said Givris fondly.

Elrond and Lindir went with Mr. Wandi and Hamfast to return the plants to the Palace of Healing and Beauty. Hamfast was very proud and Elrond delighted. Mr. Wandi was as satisfied as the proverbial cat who’d got into and finished the contents of a cream pot.

Boromir and Eomer were last to return. They had been at the circus with the faunts and the rest of the younger set. Boromir carried Frodo and Sam while Eomer carried Snis and Sni. All four kids were sound asleep. Gimli, Legolas, Bain, and Stonehelm lugged in cloth bags stuffed full of prizes and candy.

“Well done, lads,” Bilbo chuckled as he motioned Boromir to follow him back into Bag-End East. “I take it they were well-behaved and minded you.”

Boromir and Eomer exchanged looks and laughed.

“Yes,” said Boromir. “And we minded them.”

“Though, I can’t say we were as well-behaved,” said Eomer.

Givris led Eomer and Dwalin to her rooms to put Snis, Sni, and Chat to bed.

By dinner time, the kids and Chat had recovered and come down to dinner. Tay and Arne had joined Nodun and the sitting room was full. Ori could hear Dori and Mistress Dazla discussing the fact that over the winter the breakfast parlor would have to be enlarged, while they laid the table for the meal.

They began with a thick rich soup of purple beets served with sour cream. Dinner was brought by Bard, who had hunted up eight brace of ducks. These Mistress Dazla had roasted, the cavities filled with oranges and a sweet orange syrup basted the crackling skin. Alongside the ducks, she served white mounds of rice cooked with dill and dishes of roasted sweet potatoes and carrots swimming in maple syrup with cranberries and apricots. For dessert, there were platters of soft, white frozen vanilla custard eaten with long pieces of xocolātl. They lingered at the table over tea and coffee.

Gheir sat back in his chair and belched contentedly.

“Bearer, never in Thror’s reign did the royal guests eat like this. In fact, I don’t think I’ve ever had such meals. The true hospitality of dwarrow has returned with you. And I never in my life sat down so often with so many different kinds of folk. This Second Music is amazing.”

“At the risk of being a bringer of gloom,” Elrond said, “are there any problems that linger, we should discuss while we are all together?”

Thorin became serious.

“That is an excellent point, Elrond. Is there any business to discuss?”

To Ori’s surprise, Ulfr and Yizaris smiled and nodded encouragingly to Arne. With a slight blush, Arne retrieved a paper from his pocket and rose. He bowed to all present and read from his paper.

“His Majesty, Thorin II, High King of Dwarrow,

Hail,

I, Arne, do hereby renounce my claim to the th-throne as the first born of King Ulfr and Queen Yizaris.

I relinquish my title as crown prince of the Ironfists.

I surrender all those who have given th-themselves into my care as my personal servants to the good keeping of my sister, Princess Zaris of the Ironfists.

To all my former s-subjects under my father’s care, I thank you all and bid you a fond farewell from my new home in Erebor.

All hail King Thorin II, H-high King of All Dwarrow.

Arne, Scribe to Master Brur, First Librarian of Erebor.”

“You’re staying for good!” Ori cried in delight.

Omi and Loli jumped up and ran to hug Arne, while the rest of the younger set cheered and applauded.

“This is brilliant, Arne!” Fili shouted.

“How wonderful!” Tauriel enthused.

Thorin held out his hand for the letter. Arne handed it to him, along with a quill and ink. Thorin wrote his acceptance of the announcement and signed it. Bujni tipped a candle to drop some wax onto the paper and Thorin then pressed his seal ring into it.

Yizaris hugged Arne and Ulfr clapped him on the back.

“Well, me lad, an’ yeh’ll always bloody be me lad, yeh seem t’ have found yer proper home an’ craft here. If this wha’ yeh truly want then stay wi’ me an’ yer mam’s love an’ blessin’.”

“Thank you, Da.” Arne grinned. Tay and Nodun pulled Arne into a hug and Ulfr ruffled Arne’s hair.

Thorin passed the letter to Balin, who took it.

“Thankee, our Thorin, I’ll have this copied up an’ sen’ throughou’ all Arda.”

The hubbub died down and everyone settled in their chairs.

“Now,” Thorin nodded to Arne, then, “any further business?”

Everyone glanced about, then Vi nudged Glorfindel and he stared, then obviously recalled something.

“There is one thing, and unfortunately not as joyful as Arne’s remaining with us here in Erebor. We hear that rangers do occasionally encounter orcs and bandits.”

“Why are there still orcs?” Buer asked. “I thought that...er…” he stopped and glanced around at the elves, then went on, “I thought they were...er... coming back healed.”

“The original orcs were elves tortured, twisted, and mutated into orcs,” Celeborn replied. “There are others with with no original elf blood in them. These are fewer without their dread lord defeated
“And gone.”
“So they just need to be cleared out.” Hild said.
“Um,” Ori began. All eyes turned to him. Ori straightened. “Drum isn’t evil. We need to make sure he’s safe.”

Glorfindel chuckled.
“He’s in good hands with Ecthelion and his White City Bang Crash.”
“Ori does have a point,” Thorin said slowly. “If there are others like Drum, they should be protected and allowed to live as they choose. They are harmless, friendly, and assist in bringing joy to all people. If they need, they must be safeguarded against those who would ill treat them or force them to harm others.”

Oin wiped his mustache and set his tea cup down.
“Me an’ Elrond wrote a summary of Drum’s features, physical an’ mental. We’ll have it printed up with copies f’r all a’ ye an’ yer healers. Orcs won’t know wha’ yer lookin’ f’r, so if yeh find any that fit Drum’s points, look after ‘em. If yeh ain’t sure, put ‘em aside until our Elrond ‘r I kin have a look at ‘em.”

“Drum ain’t a warrior. Check f’r a servant or porter,” Dwalin added. “I’m thinkin’ any like Drum’d act fearful.”

“Drum eats grass,” Frodo put in.
“Eating grass is not always a sign of docility, nestling,” Red Queen told him gently. “A moose eats grass.”

“Moose is perfectly docile,” Thranduil frowned.
“Like yer elk?” Dain teased.
“Moose is my elk,” Thranduil said, glancing at him with raised brows.
“You named your elk, Moose?” Bilbo shrieked in delight.
“Yes, she’s the biggest elk ever seen. She is bigger than the largest bull moose I’ve ever seen. It seemed appropriate and she likes it.”

“Moose is a girl?” Bain demanded.
“Of course Moose is a girl,” Thranduil said. “Beyond what she obviously lacks, she doesn’t shed her antlers every year like bull elk do.”

“‘Splains why me Chopper’s always flirtin’,” Dain commented to Sculdis, who snickered.
“No,” said Thranduil with finality.
“But Adanana,” Tilda broke in. “You can’t stand in the way of true love and we’d have a poose!”
Hild, Boromir, and the twins burst out laughing.
“You mean a mig!” Elladan suggested.
Or a pelk!” Elrohir added.
“Dearest Thranduil,” Hild hiccuped, “if your elk has a poose, we would pay you handsomely for it.”

“No,” repeated Thranduil. “There will be no poose, pelks or migs or moars. It’s odd enough that Dain’s bird is attempting courtship with Red Queen.”

Red Queen made a sound like she was hacking up a lung and Frodo and Sam looked worried.
“I thought you were going to brood?” Yizaris said to the bone breaker.
“Tomorrow,” Red Queen muttered.
“Someone cannot bear to be absent from the council,” Givris teased.
“We are part of brother king Thorin’s council,” Red Queen said loftily, then looked pleadingly at Thorin.

“Indeed you are, sister queen,” Thorin said with a gravity that told Ori he was a hair’s breadth from laughing. “Perhaps after your laying is finished, we could find some other members of your flock to brood for you while you attend to royal business.”

“We cannot leave brooding to another,” Red Queen grumped. “Brooding is very individual.”
“I know!” shouted Dain. “I’ll work yeh up a contraption yeh kin strap t’ yeh butt, so yeh kin brin’ ‘em wi’ yeh!”
“You!” Red Queen glared, “are not strapping anything to any part of us!”
“Aw, c’mon, luv,” Dain entreated. “It’d be an engineerin’ masterpiece.”
“How would we fly?” Red Queen demanded.
“I’ll work tha’ ou’!” Dain promised.
“Very well,” Thorin managed. “Back to the original subject.”
“Blu’s tryin’ t’ romance Queen,” Sculdis put in.
“I’m wha’?” Baluchistan’s voice sounded from Dain’s hood. There was an explosion of feathers from said hood and Baluchistan rolled out onto the table, leaving the usual trail of black feathers in his wake.
“Evenin’, all me lovies, wha’s t’ do?”
Roäc whizzed through and landed on Thorin’s shoulder and clicked and muttered in Thorin’s ear. Thorin’s smile glowed and he reached over and ruffled Fili’s hair. Roäc hopped down and landed right in front of Fili. Fili automatically fed Roäc a cookie.
Roäc swallowed the cookie, then cleared his throat and pulled back his shoulders importantly.
“We have been to a convocation of our kind. We have decided that the Crown Prince Fili of Durin should be granted the honor of our company. Prince Quartzite of my line is now brooding with Garnet. Prince Fili, we have decided the first hatchling will be your raven.”
Fili gasped, then put his brow down to Roäc’s head. They stayed that way a moment. Then Fili raised his head, his eyes shone.
“Roäc, King of Ravens, I am deeply honored by your choice and those of your folk. I promise to keep trust with the raven you have chosen to work with me. Thank you.”
“It’s time you had the assistance of one of my people.” Roäc hopped forward and butted his head into Fili’s midriff. “You will be an excellent king when your time comes. And you’re not half as mouthy as Thorin.”
“Thank you, Roäc,” Thorin said dryly.
The guests and members of the household all applauded and cheered.
“Garnet’s and Quartz’ first egg!” Ori squeaked and turned to hug Dwalin.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. According to the Dwarf Telenovela Central’s timeline (which is remarkably elastic in all directions) it’s getting through what we’d call October, which means that we have Last Harvest at the end. You can probably guess what Last Harvest is in European and North American places. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori woke with the sound of wings. Quartz landed on Ori’s butt with a squawk of triumph.
“Four eggs!”
Ori sat up and held out his arms. Quartz flapped inelegantly into them. Ori hugged him carefully and turned to Dwalin, who was rubbing his eyes.
“Dwalin, my love, four eggs for Garnet and Quartz.”
Dwalin sat up with a grin and ruffled the feathers on Quartz’ head.
“How’s me girl?”
“Fine. Had a good sleep. Wants breakfast.”
“Clever lad t’ come an’ see us ‘bout tha’!”
Ori and Dwalin looked at each other and laughed.
“I fancy we kin help yeh find somethin’,” Dwalin added as he tapped Quartz’ beak.
Quartz fluttered around and teased Killer. Ori and Dwalin kissed good morning then got out of bed, dressed and went through to the kitchen, followed by Killer, Mask and Nori-Pori, and Kihshassa clinging to Dwalin’s back. They entered to find Balin making tea for himself and Dori.
“Mornin’, brother, wee brother, wha’s bringin’ th’ pair a’ yeh here a’ this hour?”
“Morning, Balin! Quartz needs meat for Garnet,” Ori told him.
“Me Garnet’s go’ four eggs,” Dwalin added with a touch of pride in his voice.
“Congratulations, laddie,” Balin chuckled and ran a finger over Quartz’ head.
Ori saw that Quartz had dropped off the little basket Ori had given him with last night. Ori caught it up and padded through to the larder, as Quartz fluttered to his shoulder. They picked out some choice pieces of chicken, a few strips of raw bacon and a knot of butter.
“How do we get water to her?” Ori asked.
“I sit. She goes,” Quartz told him. Ori came back into the kitchen and opened the window.
Quartz flew off with the basket in his beak. Balin had disappeared, but Dwalin was pouring the rest of the boiling water from the kettle into his old yellow teapot. Ori saw there was a tray with cups for them.
“How do we get water to her?” Ori asked.
“I sit. She goes,” Quartz told him. Ori came back into the kitchen and opened the window.
Quartz flew off with the basket in his beak. Balin had disappeared, but Dwalin was pouring the rest of the boiling water from the kettle into his old yellow teapot. Ori saw there was a tray with cups for them.
“Bed or th’ parlor?” Dwalin asked.
“Let’s sit in the parlor,” Ori said. “It’ll be the first time we’ve sat there alone.”
Dwalin chuckled and followed Ori through, carrying the tray. Dwalin opened the door and let Killer out. The cats hissed at the cold and Kihshassa got on the table and lay there preening. Dwalin went back in the kitchen then returned with a bowl of chicken pieces for the cats and a bunch of grapes for Kihshassa.
Ori prepared the cups with honey and milk, then poured out for them. Dwalin put chow in the wargs’ bowls and refilled the basin with fresh water. He came and sat next to Ori, taking his mug when Ori passed it to him. They each sipped and sighed contentedly.
The first few fingers of dawn were creeping towards the far edges of the meadow. Ori craned his head. The edges of the meadow were showing bits of frost. Treebeard was still in the middle and a huge bear was curled in a high crook of his branches. Ori looked at Dwalin, who nodded.

“No’ t worry, love. Fanny’s safe wi’ th’ ponies. Our Bofur’s done a grand job a’ bossin’ th’ group workin’ on expandin’ th’ stable. Mind, she may no’ like t’ go ou’ in th’ cold th’ way th’ ponies an’ goats do. Treebeard lives outside an’ our Beorn’s furry.”

“I wonder if Fanny’s ever seen snow?” Ori commented idly then grinned to himself. He and Dwalin were getting closer to finishing each other sentences like an old married couple.

Dwalin chuckled.

“Yeh’ll have t’ knit her a coat, love.”

“Shit,” Ori said.

“What?”

“I need to finish your green tunic. I’ll be right back.”

Ori hurried through and fetched out the fat knitting basket from its corner and returned. Dwalin was pouring them a second cup. Ori settled back in his chair and busied himself, while Dwalin lighted his pipe.

They sat in comparable silence for a while. Killer bounced up to the door and butted his head against it. Dwalin rose and opened it for him. The warg trotted in and shoved his muzzle into the food dish. Dwalin patted the munching head and came back to Ori’s side. He kissed the top of Ori’s head, pulled his own chair nearer and sat back down. Ori grinned at him.

“How’s me hero this mornin’?” Dwalin asked as he lifted Ori’s legs to rest on his lap.

Ori giggled and put down his knitting.

“I’m tired. Working on it was one thing, but speaking in front of all those people…I don’t know how Thorin does it.”

“He’s older an’ was raised up t’ do it.”

Ori paused then,

“If your adad hadn’t pushed you to be a warrior, what craft would you have chosen?”

Dwalin snickered.

“He didn’ have much pushin’ t’ do. I was a wee bruiser. Mind, I did consider otherwise a couple a’ times.”

“Poet?” Ori teased.

“Smartarse. I did think a’ th’ scribin’ crafts, music technicals an’ his’ory mos’ly, bu’ ol’ Brur said me writin’ looked like a drunk chicken dancin’.”

“I’ve seen your writing, it’s not that bad,” Ori laughed.

“I’m a dab hand a’ farrier work an’ I’m no’ a bad jeweler, but no’ good enow f’r either a’ th’ guilds. Did think a’ th’ pleasure guild once.”

“Really?” Ori gasped.

“Aye. Me an’ Thorin’d bin mucking’ abou’ an’ he said I should be one a’ them sorts who take care a’ them tha’ like people t’ tie ‘em up an’ spank ‘em. He said I should dress up li’ a dungeon master ‘r wha’ever.”

Ori stared then burst out laughing.

“I suppose you could, but then you like it when I play Gonad and you play the maiden.”

“Can’ let me perfect pumpkins go t’ waste, love.”

Ori giggled, rose, and held up his knitting.

“Please stand up, my buffalo. I need to measure.”

Dwalin rose. Ori patted the new material against him. He drew it back and smiled.

“Thank you. That’s the main part of the front and back done. I just have to put on the fancy bits for the hem, arm holes, and the collar.”

“Yeh knit faster than me mam ever could. I feel li’ I migh’ see sparks comin’ off yer needles.”

Ori laughed.

“Do you like it?”

“Looks grand, love!”

They sat down again and Ori began on one of the arm holes.
“Good morning.”

Ori and Dwalin looked up as Thorin and Bilbo arrived, trailed by Frodo and Sam riding Sugar and Butter respectively, supervised by Posey. Ori heard Mistress Dazla and her team starting work in the kitchen.

Bilbo and Thorin got the faunts settled and Bilbo went through to the kitchen.

“Wha’s on f’r t’day, me king?” Dwalin teased, as he lifted Kihshassa off the table and placed her on the sideboard. Thorin opened the door for the wargs and Killer raced out after Butter and Sugar. Posey hopped up on the sideboard and settled next to Kihshassa.

“Mostly leave taking of the kings,” Thorin said. “Ulfr, Yizaris, and Buer are heading out after breakfast. I believe Ahkn and HIlld will be either going with them or shortly after. Gheir will be with them. Chat will wander off whenever Givris declares them ready. I imagine the Rivendell group will accompany them for a little way. Dain and his family will head west there as well.”

“Aye, was good seein’ Chat,” Dwalin chuckled. “Never could hold his ale, bu’ he’s a fine dwarf an’ a good king t’ his people.”

“He is,” Thorin grinned. “I was a bit worried when he married Givris, but they’ve prospered together and rule their people well.”

“Snis and Sni are adorable.” Ori put in. “Frodo and Sam took to them right away. I hope they can see each other more somehow.”

“Well,” Thorin turned as Bilbo came back in with a large teapot. “Bilbo and I have been talking and it is traditional that the new high king travels to each of his fellow kingdoms. So we think this summer, we’ll take the ‘Royal Tour’.”

Ori felt a flash of delight and looked at Dwalin, who grinned.

“Sounds good.” Dwalin said. “We’ll be righ’ there wi’ yeh.”

“Both of you certainly will,” Ori squeaked before he could stop himself and blushed as Mistress Dazla and her team came in. The table was quickly set and more tea put down. Behind, in the kitchen, Ori heard Chat teasing the kitchen crew. From what Ori could hear, he thought Chat was going to make mullis for them.

“We get to go, too?” Frodo piped up.

“We’ll see how things are going and what the roads look like, my boy,” said Bilbo, “and we have to discuss things with Hamfast and Bell first.”

“What we discussin’?” Ulfr asked as he came in dressed for travel. Yizaris had an arm about Arne, and Buer, in a new travel suit, came in behind.

“The logistics of a royal tour,” Thorin told them.

“Sounds good,” Ulfr replied jovially. “Send a raven when yeh know when yeh’ll be in me lands an’ we’ll give yeh a grand time!”

Mistress Dazla whisked through with Larit and Oqizla following. They set down several covered platters. Thorin leaned forward to see what was under one.

“Oh no you don’t, your majesty,” Mistress Dazla scolded. “Those are for eating with mullis.”

“But Mistress Dazla,” Thorin protested, “as king, I ought to make sure everything is tasty before I offer it to my subjects!”

Mistress Dazla shoved her fists into his hips and glared at him.

“Is your majesty suggestin’ there might be something amiss with my cooking skills?”

“Never, Mistress Da-”

“Then you just keep your fingers out of those platters!” she ordered and vanished back to the kitchen. Frodo and Sam giggled at Thorin, who pulled a disappointed face. Dwalin snorted and reached over to the platter.

“Captain Dwalin!” Mistress Dazla’s voice rang out from the kitchen. “Whatever you’re doing, stop it!”

Thorin roared with laughter as Dwalin stared at the kitchen door, incensed and demanded.

“Mahal’s hairy balls! How in all Arda does she know?”

“She’s an amad,” said Dis as she breezed in with Jani. “Mahal gave us mysterious powers to predict dwarfling mischief. Or else, you and Thorin are simply woefully predictable.”
Dwalin turned to Ori, who tried vainly to look sympathetic.
“And,” Dis went on, “to her advantage, Mistress Dazla has known you and Thorin since you were badgers.
“Aye,” Dwalin leaned back in his seat. “She was a nursery maid back then, chasin’ all us bloody Durins ‘round th’ place.”
They all heard the shout, laughter and talk coming from the receiving room. Ori guessed that almost all the guests were up and coming to breakfast. The door burst open and Dain fought against Gheir, Glorfindel, Kili, Hamfast, and Bell to get in first. Bell and Hamfast sandwiched themselves in the doorway and planted their feet to the jambs Gheir and Dain tried to push past the giggling hobbits to no avail. Glorfindel tried to step over all of them but Dain stood up sharply, mid-bellow, and slammed his head into the poor elf’s crotch. Glorfindel bellowed. Kili leapt neatly through and shouted.
“I win!”
“Bugger!” Gheir grumbled as Bell and Hamfast stumbled away laughing.
“May the rest of us come in now?” Lady Galadriel inquired. Gheir grouched at the elfin lady. She leaned down, scooped him up under the arm pits, and whisked him neatly into the room.
“Oh!” Gheir shouted, legs kicking to no avail. “That’s cheating!”
“You were in the way!” she teased and made her way to the table and sat down gracefully.
Mavey and Floris bounded in and pulled Gheir away to sit with them. Jim and Celeborn came in talking, and Ruelis, Hild, and Arwen followed. Soon everyone else appeared and the table was full. Chat bounced in, rumpled, hair on end, and carrying a huge platter piled high with mullis. Everyone cheered and dug in. The ravens flocked in the middle of the table and savaged two mullis among them all. Red Queen flapped in and Tauriel pulled a chair out for her. Baluchistan snatched up a mulli and brought it to her.
“Yer lookin’ finer than fresh meat this mornin’, me lovely parsnip. Have one a’ these an’ I’ll fetch yeh some a’ tha’ ham.”
“Thank you,” Red Queen sighed and caught up the mulli in one of her talons and began to feast. Baluchistan returned, dragging the largest slice of ham across the table to her. Ori was glad Mistress Dazla had given them mats for their plates instead of using a table cloth, as Baluchistan had left a greasy trail punctuated with feathers across the table. Once he deposited this on Red Queen’s plate, he hopped over to Dain and Sculdis and stood in front of them.
“I’m stayin’ here,” he announced.
“Yer no’ serious, lad?” Dain bellowed, incredulous.
“A’ course I’m serious! Ooo, never though’ I’d say tha’. Bu’ tha’s beside th’ point. Whoever th’ da is, they’re no’ comin’ forward t’ take care a’ Queenie. So I’m doin’ it. I’m no’ th’ only raven in th’ Hills, jus’ th’ best. If yeh need help, ask Oink ‘r Grunt, tell ‘em I’ll kick their tail feathers if they don’ lend yeh a wing.”
“Yer sure?”
“Duh!”
“A’righ’, if yeh insist. Remember they’ll no’ cosset yeh li’e we do in th’ Hills.”
Baluchistan made a ravenish snort.
“I go’ no time f’r cossetin’!”
“Sleep when yer dead, will yeh?” Dain teased.
“I kin do withou’ sleep.”
Now Dain snorted.
“Yeh sleep twenny hours a day, lad.”
“I don’t need t’ sleep twenny hours, I jus’ do it, ’cause I’m lazy. Same reason yeh do it.”
“Oi!”
Sculdis reached over, picked up Baluchistan, and hugged him close. The raven nuzzled her and she placed him on the table again.
“Yer a fine raven, our Baluchistan,” she said.
“Ta, our Mam.”
With that, Baluchistan went back to drag more ham to Red Queen. Celeborn and Aris passed the plate of ham up the table, so Baluchistan could stay in one place and simply put ham on Red Queen’s plate. Bilbo, with a look at Dori, went through to the kitchen. In a short time, Miss Larit came through and replenished the ham plate.

“Ta, luv,” Baluchistan crowed and, after having a small piece himself, went back to his chosen duty.

Galadriel and Thranduil bickered over the pots of elderberry preserves. Frodo called Posey over and he and Sam fed her bits of muli. Theodred and Gloin argued some point of trade law. Arivett and Eomer stuffed mullis into themselves as fast as they could. Eomer made sure Arivett was supplied with fried black pudding to eat with hers. Arne, Hild, and Elrond discuss some first age poet. People pushed the platters around to top their mullis with different things. Bard spooned thick xocolātl, flavored with hazelnut oil, over his mullis and refused to share it with Arwen. Aragorn and Lindir were talking crops with Hamfast as Lavender, Bell and Ruelis argued hotly with Mister Wandi about the ingredients for the best skin cream.

Ori looked at Thorin. Bilbo leaned against Thorin’s shoulder as they drank their tea. Thorin was looking around the table and smiling on all his guests. Ori knew exactly what he was going to paint as the royal portrait.

By mid morning all the guest were ready to head out. There were still last minute points people were shouting to each other, while kissing and hugging other people farewell. Hild cried all over Thorin and Bilbo, telling how proud she was of them. Gheir wasn’t far behind in the sentiment. Ulfr hugged Bilbo very tight then, with Yizaris, went to every elf, man, and hobbit to bid them a fond farewell and told them to have ‘a pint to his new eyes’. He and Yizaris were warmly invited to travel and visit everywhere. Yizaris had tears in her eyes and Arne and Buer looked proud enough to burst.

Everyone congratulated Ori again and told him how much they had enjoyed his presentation. Thorin had gifted all the kingdoms with a leather bound copy of Ori’s book and everyone wanted him to sign it in his own hand. At a grin from Thorin, one of Ori’s spider quills was brought and a bottle of gold. Ori thought he was going to burst into flames, his face felt so red.

With much waving and more shouting, the caravans went off down the royal tunnels to the main city. The household hurried to the tunnel to the balcony over the main gate, where the once-elves had already gathered to shout and wave farewells. Ori counted. There were only four once-elves on the balcony.

“Where are Dree and Erris?” he asked Dwalin.
“Goin’ with Ulfr an’ his lot back t’ Ironfist territory.”
“Seriously? The two of them? They’ll bicker the entire time!”
“Aye, they’ll fit in perfect in Ulfr’s kingdom.”
“They didn’t say goodbye!”
“I don’ think they knew they was goin’ themselves until abou’ an hour ago. I knew Erris didn’t.”
“Wait. Did I miss something?”
Dwalin gave a wicked grin.
“Ulfr mentioned he’d miss them this mornin’ when he took leave. Dree saw tha’ as an invite, an’ then she turned t’ Erris an’ said: Ge’ a wiggle on, yeh sour old elf. Yer goin’, too.”
Ori gaped.
“Are they married or something?”
“Siblin’s, it turns out.”
“Ulfr’s relatives are in for a bit of a shock.”
“Guid f’r ’em. Keep ’em on their toes.”

Outside, on the ramparts, the sky was now gray and overcast. There was a chill wind blowing that hadn’t been there in the early morning.

In a few moments, the entourage came out to the cheers of the inhabitants of the mountain. Everyone was waving and calling greetings. The guests came out to the courtyard and the Durins shouted farewells to them. Flags were raised. Armor glittered. Ravens and Bonebreakers swooped and sailed over them all.

Bard and Thranduil led the way down to Dale where another crowd waited to cheer and gawk at the royal visitors. All too soon the huge combined caravan was heading south to the Oracanis, another to the ship waiting in the dock of Dale. Dain and his family headed to the northwest. The final caravan headed up to the great north road.

Ori and Dwalin lingered back with Thorin, Bilbo and the faunts as the Durins slowly returned to Fundin House.

“Look!” Frodo cried. A fat flake of snow floated down to them, followed by others. Sam and Frodo put out their tongues, trying to catch the flakes as they fell.

Thorin frowned at the Great North Road in the distance.

“Chat will be fine,” Bilbo said and tucked his arm into Thorin’s. “I’m sure if it storms, Elrond will take them in at Rivendell, then see them safely along until they reach the Shire. The rangers will be around as well.”

“You are right as always, ghivashel,” Thorin agreed.

A huge bear climbed and lumbered down the mountainside. It stopped at the sight of them, rose up on hind legs, and waved a paw. They waved back and called their farewells.

Ori looked up to the rocks guarding the meadow and royal residences then gaped. Treebeard was ‘walking’ down the mountainside. Instead of using his great roots at his base to walk as he had before, Treebeard used all his thousands of tiny roots. They inches forward and tucked themselves into minuscule cracks and crannies in the rock. The bulk of Treebeard above stayed calmly still, as he moved bit by bit down the almost straight wall. They went to the edge of the balcony and he slowly rippled past them.

“I… like…this…place…Hoom!”

“You are always welcome among us, Treebeard,” returned Thorin with a bow.

“My…thanks. I…shall…visit…with…, ahoom,…the…trees…in…the…, hoom, …valley… now.”

“There’s a lovely copper beech on the big green there,” Ori told him. “Hamfast thinks it may have walked over.”

“Hoom! I…shall… go…there…immediately…Hoomhoom.”

They watched him gain the paved main entrance. The guards there bowed politely. The crowd that had gathered to see off the guest also bade him farewell. This took some time as many badgers rushed up to talk and pat the ‘magic’ tree. Finally Treebeard was able to pull all his roots up under him and stride off, walking on two very large thick roots.

“What an amazing time,” Ori enthused as Bilbo tucked an arm about him.

“Bloody brillian’,” Dwalin agreed.

You really are a legendary king, Thorin,” Ori turned to Thorin. “Every time we have a great gathering, it’s better than the last time.”

“Thank you, Ori,” Thorin chuckled. “I think it seems so, as we’re all getting to know one another better.”

“But it is,” Ori insisted.

Dwalin knocked his brow into Thorin’s.

“Don’ yeh go lettin’ me wee scribe’s words git’ yer head now.”

“Your wee scribe is the scribe of Mahal,” Thorin teased. “He must be right.”

“Don’ go gettin’ all fancy an’ puffed up. I’ll ’ave t’ smack yeh.”

“Don’t threaten me with a good time, Dwalin,” Thorin quipped.

Ori and Bilbo looked at each other and burst into giggles.

They came through the door into the tunnel. Bilbo climbed ahead of Ori. It was then Ori noticed that Bilbo’s and both faunts’ foot hair seemed thicker. He was about to open his mouth but decided to wait until he could ask in private. It might be something that happened when hobbits were settled and happy or something Bilbo added to the food to make the hair fashionable by other hobbit standards.
They got back to the house to see the wagon for the royal laundry piled high with guest bedding. The last load was being brought out of the Oakenshield Inn. Fili and Sigrid were talking with the supervisor and Tauriel and Kili were helping to get the load settled while they laughed and chatted with the workers.

Thorin went forward and the supervisor of the group bowed. Thorin reached into his pocket and handed the dam a bag.

Ori heard the chink of coins and smiled. Thorin was determined to get his treasure trove down to only a respectable dwarrow hoard. When people had money and lived comfortably with a roof over their heads, good food, clean water, and free access to healers and education, they prospered and the kingdom became rich as a whole. Following this, other lands would trade and travel as the lands were now becoming safer. Everyone in Arda would be happy.

The wagon pulled out of the cavern and they all went inside.

Dori was fussing around the sitting room and Mistress Dazla, Dis and Gridr were in attendance, “Thorin, dear!” Dori caroled. “We simply must get the meadow facing doors and windows ready for the winter. And as we’re going to be continuing to have so many guests that parlor is going to have to be enlarged, it’s already snowing, and Dain and Sculdis broke their bed.”

“Where’s Balin?” Thorin asked.
“Here, laddie.” Balin came through from the office.
“Send a bat to Master Najedh, it’s time for winter shutters. Advise him they also need to repair the bed in the emerald room in the upstairs diplomatic chambers. Tell Bofur we’ve another job for his group, who expanded the stable for our oliphaunt.”

“I’m on it, me king,”
Thorin grinned at Dori.
“Send Roäc to speak to Mahal and Yavanna about the snow.”
“Thorin!” scolded Dori as Thorin, with Bilbo on his arm, headed to the office, chuckling.
Ori gave Dwalin a kiss and turned to follow Thorin.
Bain came in the sitting room door with a cheery hello for everyone.

“Thanks, Dori, but da sent me with a note for Thorin.”
“Well, when you’ve finished there, come and see me,” Dori ordered and disappeared into the kitchen.

Ori and Bain went into the office.
“Bain.” Thorin greeted the lad, who grinned and handed him Bard’s note. Thorin nodded to a chair near the desk and Bain flopped into it.

“Yeh came by pony, I hope, lad,” said Balin as he and Thorin seated themselves behind their desks. Ori parked on a chair between Thorin and Bilbo, who perched on his stool on his own desk.

“Yes, I put her in the meadow.”
Thorin unfolded the note and frowned. Bilbo hopped off his stool, crossed to Thorin and read over his shoulder.

“Bilbo, ghivasha, do the hobbits do something similar to what Bard is proposing for the Last Harvest celebration?”

“Yes,” said Bilbo.
Ori expected him to elaborate, but instead Bilbo sat and smiled benevolently.
They all looked to him, waiting, but soon it was apparent he had finished speaking.

Bain leaned forward.

“Er, Uncle Bilbo? What do hobbits do for Last Harvest?”
“I can’t talk about it now, my boy. Not until after the first hard frost.”

“Is it bad luck or something?”

“Let’s just say, it’s not at all a good idea,” said Bilbo. “Rest assured, I will speak of it at great lengths afterward. Unlike the men in the west, your people and mine seem to have many of the same ideas.”

“Oh,” said Bain. “So, when is the first hard frost?”
“Day after tomorrow,” said Bilbo.
“Really?”
“I have no idea, actually,” said Bilbo. “It’s when Yavanna wills.”
“Can’t you just ask Her?”
Ori heard a giggle at the back of his mind.
“That’s cheating!” Yavanna called gaily. “Spoilsport!”
The next morning they woke to a hard frost.
Frodo and Sam jumped around excitedly, though they kept stubbornly mum as to why.
Bilbo was more cautious. He merely hummed cheerily to himself until he received Hamfast’s note from the Dale.
“Time to make the snickerdoodles, my lads,” he announced to the faunts.
“Yay!” they chorused.
They joined hands with Bilbo and the three of them skipped in a circle and chanted in the hobbits’ tongue over and over until they were dizzy with the circling, and fell over and onto the couches and rug, helpless with laughter.
Thorin waited until Bilbo caught his breath, then brought Bilbo his tea.
“Is it quite safe to approach the celebrating hobbits?” Thorin asked with a smile.
“It’s Last Harvest, Idad!” Frodo cried.
He and Sam began to explain, over and under one another, without stopping for breath, just what this meant.
Ori got the idea that it involved a large bonfire and the corn dollies, which he had heard of, and the dead walking abroad, which he had not.
“Bilbo?” Ori asked.
“Oh, the veil between this world and the next is at its thinnest at Last Harvest. Sometimes, if the bonfire is built with the right intent and the offerings to Yavanna and to the dead are tasty enough, our blessed dead come back for the night just to say hello. And eat the offerings, of course.”
“Of course,” said Ori. “Though, if it’s only for hobbits, you’ll be going to Hamfast’s and Bell’s house, right?”
“I thought we were,” said Bilbo, “but the Dale men believe something similar, in ways that other men haven’t in a long time. High Priest Sven isn’t keen, but Bard wants to have the bonfire on the square in front of Dale Hall, and celebrate properly, or as properly as they can without actually burning a live man at the stake as an offering to Yavanna.”
Ori and Dwalin exchanged alarmed glances.
“Th’ thin’s yeh learn abou’ yer neighbors,” said Dwalin.
“We aren’t supposed to dance and sing like that, or make specific plans for the celebration, until after the first hard frost,” said Bilbo. “That’s an invitation, and you don’t send endless invitations every single day. No one has the time to reply to all that, and it’s not polite to ignore an invite. The last thing you want is irritated, dead relatives at your bonfire.”
“They’re really party poopers,” said Frodo and Sam nodded.

On the next restday eve, the kitchen of Bag-End East was crowded with hobbits, men, dwarrow, and elves, all in a merry mood.
They sat at the big table with heaps of stripped grain stalks before them and industriously turned them into corn dollies.
Bilbo, Frodo and the Gardeners showed the others how it was done. Bilbo and Bell especially made corn dolls wonderfully quick, and the tiny figures stayed in one piece, even without being lashed together. Everyone else used string. Bilbo also provided various colored threads and bits of cloth, so they could personalize their figures.

Ori had already made several with red hair and beards.

Bard proved a quick learner.

“How did you do that so quickly, Da?” Tilda asked. She sat on his knee and examined the tiny figure with its black beard.

“My hands must still remember,” said Bard. “I haven’t done this since I was a boy, younger than you.”

The heads of Legolas’ kept popping off.

“That’s discouraging,” he said to the room in general.

“Yer thinkin’ too much,” Gimli teased.

“What are you making?” Legolas asked. “Aren’t they supposed to look like you?”

Gimli held up what amounted to a square bundle of stalks with bright red threads tied to it.

“I think it’s an exact likeness,” said the dwarf.

A pot of mulled cider sat on the hob, and filled the air with a delicious scent. They drank it in large mugs, and ate snickerdoodles by the plateful to keep up their strength.

“Shouldn’t we sing?” Bilbo teased Hamfast.

“As if I could carry a tune in a wheelbarrow,” Hamfast replied. “Bell, my dear, you sing. Y’ have such a pleasin’ voice.”

Bell stuffed a whole cookie in her mouth and shook her head, and shrugged helplessly.

“I’ll sing,” Frodo volunteered.

“Me, too,” said Sam.

Thorin smiled at them.

“And what will you sing?”

“We have to be careful about that,” said Frodo, and Sam nodded in agreement.

“Why?” Ori asked.

“There are words you don’t say or sing out loud at harvest time,” said Sam.

“Because?” Ori asked.

Frodo frowned.

“I’m not sure, but it has something to do with things drooling under your bed.”

“Yeh bin talkin’ t’ Vi and Margr, lad?” Dwalin asked.

Frodo shook his head.

“About what?”

“Never mind, go on. Sing any song yeh kin ge’ away with.”

“Pie!” Sam said abruptly.

“Pie!” said Frodo. “Pie.”

Before anyone could inquire, the young hobbits began to sing in unison, and then Sam’s older sibling joined in.

“If all at once the sun goes down, and fog rolls in the dah-ark
    Whistle a tune, and sing to the moon and you’ll think it’s all a lah-ark.
If you get lost, and the ground’s afrost,
    Follow your nose when the cold wind blows.
All peach and pear and pumpkin there.
    Hot from the oven,
Oh boy, I’m lovin’ that tasty, tasty pie
TastytastytastytastyTASTY PIE!”

Everyone clapped and cheered.

“Tha’s th’ hobbityest song I ever heard,” said Dwalin. “Sing it again, an’ we’ll sing along.”
And so they did.
Ori made sure he got all the words down before he joined in and they all sang it through several times at the tops of their lungs.

Butter and Sugar lay in front of the stove with their chins on their paws and peered up at them dubiously.

Romy howled.

“Uncle Bilbo, am I old enough to mask this year?” Frodo asked.
“I believe so.”
Frodo looked excited, then less so.
“No,” he said. “Sam isn’t, so I won’t do it either.”
Samwise patted his arm.
“You go on, Frodo. You’ll look a treat in those curls.”
“Really?” Frodo asked. “Then you can walk out as my beau! And Idad Thorin can walk out as Uncle Bilbo’s!”

Bard looked from one to the other, then at Thorin, who shrugged.
“I have no idea. Ghivasha?”
“Masking,” said Bilbo. “It’s an old Shire tradition, usually only practiced by Tooks and Brandybucks nowadays. We dress up in costume for Last Harvest, any way we choose, though usually as the opposite sex.”

“Oooo! I want to do that!” Tilda cried. “Da, may I please? Please!”
“You want to dress as a boy for Last Harvest?” Bard asked.
“No, I want to dress up as an elf. Then Wicked Stepmother can dress as a dwarf!”

Thranduil choked on his cider.

Bard looked at Thranduil and a slow grin crossed his face.
“Til, that idea has merit.”

“Til, that idea has merit.”
Thranduil hissed.
“I’ll have Bob for company.”
“Til, that idea has merit.”

Bard looked at Thranduil and a slow grin crossed his face.
“You’re sleeping on the bouncy couch,” Thranduil hissed.
“Til, that idea has merit.”

“Til, that idea has merit.”

Thranduil choked on his cider.

Bard looked at Thranduil and a slow grin crossed his face.
“You know, Til, that idea has merit.”

“Til, that idea has merit.”
Thranduil hissed.
“I’ll have Bob for company.”
“Til, that idea has merit.”

Thranduil peered down at Tilda, who all but hopped in her seat with excitement.

“Til, that idea has merit.”

Thranduil nodded at Tilda, who all but hopped in her seat with excitement.

Thorin stepped up beside them.
“The ponies all happily lined up to go to their stalls without any coaxing,” said Thorin.
“And the goats could care less,” said Ori.
“I wouldn’t say that,” said Thorin. “I can see by the way they’re standing, they’re keyed up as if for a battle. Even I can feel it. There have been Last Harvest celebrations within my lifetime, but I don’t recall feeling such strong energy before. Dwalin?”

The warrior shook his head, and scowled out over the meadow.

Ori sent a silent question into the ether, but instead of words, he received images of doors and gates opening. He thought he recognized the doors of the Halls, and he could guess where the white picket gate under the rose-covered trellis led, but he also saw another gate, wrought iron, black and tall, and beyond it, a wide way of broken cobbles that wandered into a mountain pass.

“Mandos,” said Mahal.

“Are you ready?” Bilbo called from the bedroom.
“As we will ever be, ghivasha,” said Thorin.

Bilbo skipped into the sitting room, a vision of puffed sleeves, lace and ribbons. Ori slapped his hand over his mouth and Dwalin’s jaw creaked open.

“Omi leant me one of her darling West Farthing frocks,” said Bilbo. “I just had to make a few adjustments.”

The frock, pink with enormous green and yellow cabbage roses, sported a voluminous bow in the back and layer upon layer of crinolines under the skirt, so much so that it flowed out in tulle all around and the skirt itself sat upon them almost like a tablecloth.

“That’s amazing,” said Ori.

“Isn’t it though,” said Bilbo. “I’ve always wanted to be wider than I was tall. It’s a good thing dwarven doorways are so big.”

Thorin went to him, kissed him and peered closely at his hat, which perched atop and to the front of his head, tied down beneath a wig of undyed wool ringlets that cascaded behind him to the floor.

“Is that Lobelia’s hat?” Thorin asked.

“Yes, she wasn’t using it and, I do wear it better if I do say so,” said Bilbo. “Oh, and I have another surprise. You should probably sit for this.”

“You preggers?” Nori asked from the fireplace chimney.
“No, Nori,” said Bilbo, “and don’t be rude or I’ll tattle to your brother.”

“Got it,” said Nori.

When they had all settled, Bilbo called, “Alright, Frodo. You can come out now.”

And so Frodo did, in an exact replica of Bilbo’s outfit, right down to a miniature copy of Lobelia’s ugly hat.

Frodo skipped lightly to the middle of the room, pointed his toe, did a pirouette and curtsied.

Then he rose and fluttered his lashes.

Everyone clapped.

“Lovely, akunith,” said Thorin.

“Lovely,” Sam echoed, and nodded eagerly as he followed Frodo out.

“But, Idad,” said Frodo, “where is your costume?”

“I wore mine at Durin’s Day,” said Thorin. “I think it’s time I let you and your uncle have all the attention.”

The square before Dale Hall had been blocked to traffic, lined with stalls for selling food and trinkets, or featured games of chance. Hamfast and his sons and dwarven apprentices had chosen the oddest shaped pumpkins from the harvest, emptied them out, and carved spooky and funny faced into them. Some had lit candles inside them, and glowed merrily.

At the very center, a man tended a huge bonfire, and the cold night air smelled of woodsmoke, and under that the scents of cooking food, and ale, and mulled wine.

A large band had set up on the steps of Dale Hall and was already playing, but it was a tune Ori had only ever heard hummed or crooned by the men in Dale. It had never sounded like this, lilting and haunting. Nor had Ori ever seen anyone dance in quite this way.

The men and women, and some elves, all masked, danced in couples, whirling around each other, and at the same time, the entire mass of dancers whirled round the bonfire. They wore masks, some mere strips of cloth with holes for eyes, but others of fancy materials, trimmed in beads and feathers. Some wore costumes, and all wore sashes of orange, gold or brown that trailed and fluttered as they moved.

“They’re leaves,” said Ori.
“Eh?” Dwalin asked.
“They’re swirling like fallen leaves in the wind,” said Ori.

As he watched, the square seemed to fill with even more dancers. Not all of them were men, some were elves, and quite a few were hobbits. Few of these newcomers looked solid.

“Oh,” said Ori.
“Awrigh’, love?” Dwalin asked.
“The dead are here.”
“Brillian’,” said Dwalin. “As long’s they don’ make nuisances a’ themselves. Nothin’ like havin’ t’ chuck some man’s dead udad in th’ lockup f’r bein’ drunk an’ disorderly.”

“Hullooo, our Ori!” Queen Sunflower called as she and Durin flashed by.

“Hello, Queen Sunflower!”

They were masked, of course, but there was no mistaking them. They, at least, were quite solid.

They danced gracefully together despite their disparate heights. Ori thought it was because they plenty of time to practice now they were in the Halls.

Looking closely, Ori picked out a few people he knew. Nor was he alone.
He felt Thorin’s hand on his shoulder, and knew the moment the king recognized his own parents among the dancers.

Ori said, “Your mam seems … um… to be leading.”
“I’m sure they arm wrestled for it,” said Thorin, his voice thick with emotion. “Do you think… will they talk to me?”

The ghostly royals exited the dance by a pretzel stand a little ways over, and Freris huffed impatiently, and gestured to him.

“Come along, yeh wee, slow numpty,” she barked, but there was a laugh under her words.
Thorin looked down at Bilbo, obviously uncertain.

“Go on, my dear,” said Bilbo. “I’ll save you a dance.”
Ori turned away, already feeling tears spill over. He looked around, and breathed deeply.

“Oh, Hamfast, and Bell, and the faunts are here,” he said.
Then he looked again.
Hamfast and Bell wore each other’s clothes.
She wore fawn breeches, a white shirt, white neck cloth, and a gold embroidered weskit under a sky blue coat. She had bound her long tresses up behind her in a bun, leaving the hair closest to her head to ripple and curl loosely in a masculine style.

Hamfast wore a party frock of pink with vertical green stripes, his cap sleeves and skirt hem embroidered with floral bands of pink and yellow carnations. Matching ribbons in huge bows punctuated his ‘updo’ wool wig with its wide, straw porkpie hat with fake fruit perched atop. As his head moved, a price tag fell out of the hat and dangled from the brim by its thread.

“Sister!” Bilbo cried.

“Sister!” Hamfast replied rapturously. “How-DEE!”

They slammed together in a fond embrace, their crinolines flying up in the back to reveal bloomers trimmed all down their bums with foofy lace to match their frocks.

Ori glanced over the crowd and his eyes alighted on Miss Sifian. She had had her hair done up. The ‘wings’ still framed her face becomingly, but the rest of her hair was curled up in such a way that it appeared the top of her head was layered with bows. Her dress was long sleeved and simply styled in russet wool which she had covered with a charmingly laced sable tunic. She sat primly on a wooden bench watching the dancing. Next to her was Rogi.
Rogi was bald around the crown, with just a poof of hair standing upright like a bare sapling straight from his head. His mustache and beard were long enough to braid together and back around each side of his face to join the long braid that fell down his back. Little metal dagger charms fringed the mustache/beard braids along the bottom edge all the way to the nape. They tinkled together whenever he moved his head.

Bilbo winced.

“Oh, my. Not so much a stud as a dud.”

Dwalin grinned wickedly.

“I’m keepin’ tha’.”

“With my compliments,” Bilbo assured him.

Sifian watched the dancers with studied interest. Rogi scooched closer. He watched her a moment, then carefully laid his hand on hers, folded in her lap.

Miss Sifian jumped.

“Mister Rogi!” she cried out. “Touching!”

Rogi snatched his hand back. Miss Sifian pointed to a spot further along the bench away from her.

“Stay on your side.” she commanded.

Dwalin winced. Bilbo and Ori looked at each other.

“Heh!” Margr came up to them, while watching Rogi. “He’ll need a big hammer t’ crack tha’ nut!”

“He’s go’ a big hammer,” Vi added. “Trouble is she ain’t wantin’ t’ git nailed.”

The sisters cackled maniacally at the expense of both sweethearts. Dwalin snickered rudely while Bilbo and Ori pulled faces at each other.

All around them, Ori saw people he knew. Most of the mountain had come to see and enjoy their neighbors’ festivities. The carts bearing the logo of the ‘Moo and Cluck in Motion’ had set up as well. Orras was shouting out his menu. The circus was there, too. Ori hurried over as he saw Fanny. Fanny trumpeted to see him and wound her truck around him and lifted him.

“How do you like Fanny’s coat?” Mavey squealed as Ori hugged some of Fanny’s head. He drew away and looked at his friend. Fanny was wearing an enormous woolen blanket. It draped from her neck down to lower than her tail. The sides shrouded her down to her knees. It was a creamy color with beautiful Durin blue runes for oliphaunt scattered over. Each of her legs was wrapped to her feet in matching enormous hose. A hood hung over her head and both ears. Most of her trunk was also cozily wrapped.

Fanny put Ori on his feet and he looked her over.

“Are you warm enough, Fanny?” Ori asked solicitously. Fanny patted his shoulder with her trunk and gave a nod.

“Are you and Fanny doing an act?” Ori turned to Mavey. “Oh no,” she giggled then squeaked as Floris arrived juggling several apples. Biscuit, in her wake, with his front paws on her shoulders, walked on his hind legs. He had a bright purple cone-shaped hat tied on his head. “We’re just showing Fanny off and letting people pat and feed her.”

Floris grinned and continued to juggle as Fanny helped herself to apples spinning in the air, much to the delight of the crowd of little kids watching her. They ran underneath her and reached to see who could touch her tummy. Others were satisfied just to stand close and cling tight to one of her huge legs. Biscuit stood on his front paws and waved his tail and back legs in the air.

Ori hugged as the trunk slid around him again.

“I’m so glad you’re happy here with all of us, Fanny,” he murmured and Fanny lifted him to her head again. She put him down and Ori waved to Floris and Mavey as more people came and crowded around to see Fanny.

Kib and Granny Klak went by, Kib eating fire and Granny juggling knives. She caught them all at once and came and hugged Ori.

“How is my darling youngest great grandchild?”

“I’m well, Granny. Is your new craft juggling?”
She laughed.
“Not exactly, my pet. I have a stall over there. Come and see me later. I have a wonderful new toy Dain and Buer made for me.”
“I will, Granny,” Ori giggled and watched them stroll off.
Master Ubqim floated by in her gray green weedy robes, now garlanded with felt leaves of brown and orange. She was singing to herself and dancing to her own music. Ori watched interestedly as she wove by, oblivious to the crowd.
Arne, Tay, and Nodun danced by and waved to him.
He saw Kacuho and Rouho at one of the many taverns’ outside bars. He went over and greeted them and had a pint. They introduced him to Pahvu, Podvu’s brother, so Ori was finally able to thank him for keeping all the guild hall’s original materials safe.
Sadi and Brur joined them briefly before dancing off again. Ori walked on, watching the dancers.
Hathor and Guernsia whirled by laughing, chased by Master Hallow and Pohvu who were attempting grace while getting used to dancing with extreme height differences. Pohvu, Ori realized, was leading.
Poczoh was dressed to the nines and offered free fried fish sandwiches to everyone. There were no takers except for goats, dogs and wargs. Posey tried one and spat it out in a drain.
“What wrong with the fish sandwiches other than they’re er…sandwiches?” Ori asked Master
Axsin, who was strolling around with Tukkaj who was already extremely drunk.
“Remember, lad, Poczoh is the second best fish monger in Steam Alley.”
“And there are only two,” Ori recalled. “Ew.”
“Indeed.”
A ruckus started up among the band members on the steps of Dale Hall. They paused in their playing, parted from in front of the door, and Thranduil strode out with Tilda by the hand. Tilda looked proud enough to burst in a fine green velvet elven gown sized to fit her. In fact, it was so fine that Ori suspected it had come from the Greenwood itself. She wore an elven tiara, and a string of pearl-sized starlight gems. Her hair flowed down loose around her shoulders.
Thranduil looked the soul of dignity.
Ori locked his jaws shut and realized that Master Axsin was thunderstruck.
“Lad,” said Master Axsin, “that’s just about the strangest thing I’ve ever seen, and I deal in strange every day.”
Ori could only nod.
It looked like someone had taken Lord Bofur’s ‘best’ clothes and stretched them to fit an elf.
Thranduil even wore a replica of Bofur’s hat, complete with two stuffed toy ferrets perched jauntily atop. Instead of carrying his pickaxe on his shoulder, he held the iron head in his hand and used the tool as a sort of walking stick.
All assembled gaped for a moment, then everyone burst into applause, whistling and cheering and calling out.
“Oi! Suits yeh, me lad!”
“Isn’t Princess Tilda adorable!”
“Blessed Mahal, she’s wearing a king’s ransom around her neck.”
Thranduil nodded regally to acknowledge them all, and Tilda preened and copied Thranduil’s nod.
They approached and Ori unstuck his jaw.
“King father! Tilda! You look great!”
“Many thanks, Lord Ori,” said Thranduil. “Alas, I feel a great need to scratch and belch.”
“They do say clothes do make the dwarf,” said Ori.
Master Axsin bowed grandly.
“Princess Tilda, you’re a vision.”
Tilda cocked her head.
“Of what?”
Thranduil looked to the sky, obviously gathering patience.
“He means, you look lovely, my Tilda.”
“Oh, thank you, Master Axsin!” She put her free hand to her heart and bowed to him. When she straightened, Ori noticed that her pointed ears were actually attached to her tiara, which kept the whole cleverly in place.

“You do look lovely, Til,” said Ori, “even without your boot knife.”
Tilda smiled naughtily and hitched up the hem of her gown a little. Her sleek elven boots included a knife sheath, and the knife hilt was decorated all over with leaves made of emeralds.
Ori gaped at them, then at Thranduil, who winked.

“Where’re Bard and your brother and sister?” Ori asked Tilda.

“Oh,” Tilda said, “Da and Bain went off to do something ceremoniou-sh.” She frowned at her inability to manage the word then she grinned up at him. “Sig’s off with her FeeFee!”

“She does not call him that!” Ori gasped. “Does she?”

“That’s what I call him when she’s being all moon-eyed over him. I mean, he’s sort of cute, in a Bob-ish way, but boys are still icky and I think she must have fallen and hit her head.”

Thranduil gave a cough that sounded suspiciously like a choke of laughter.

“Come along, my fawn, we need to mingle,” he said in a slightly unsteady voice.

“Yes, adanana!”
Ori left them to ‘mingle’ and proceeded around, sight seeing and sketching.

A dam dressed as a queen drifted by, and Ori did a doubletake, since she was solid and her crown looked terribly familiar. As he watched, she surveyed the crowd with an air of superior amusement, and, seeing a pretty young dwarf couple dance by, fixed her eyes on them and slowly licked her bottom lip.

Oh, sweet, blessed Mahal. Ori couldn’t quite believe what he saw.

He approached her warily, as one might a strange dog, and cleared his throat.

“Yes, dear?” she asked melodiously, turning to him while still watching the beauty on display.

“Queen Kivi?”

“I am.” Her head turned languorously to catch up with the rest of her body and her enormous green eyes locked onto his and he couldn’t look away. He swallowed then bowed deeply.

“Ori of Fundin, at your service, your majesty.”

“Oh, aren’t you a Sweetheart,” she said. She drifted a little closer and put her hand against his chest. “What do you Desire, my Dear?”

If he did desire anything, the list would have gone right out of his head. All dwarrow ran warm, it was true, but this dam exuded heat even from a distance, and his body responded to it.

“I… wanted to ask you about Position 20.”

She rolled her eyes, all trace of languor vanished.

“Mahal’s hairy blue Balls!” she cried in obvious frustration. “It was a Joke! No one with a Spine was ever Meant to do that, not even with Ten participants. How would I know that idiot printer would Push the galleys through after I died and I never got a Chance to Correct him!”

“No wonder the directions didn’t make any sense!”

“And it’s Too Late to Correct it now,” she lamented.

“Actually, I’m translating your work into westron. I could correct it. Or, at least put a warning on it: Don’t try this at home.”

“Don’t try this Anywhere!” she replied. “No matter how Well you Stretch first.”

“Understood, your majesty. Then, I have your blessing?”

“Of course, my Dear.” Now she was warm again, and a little closer than Ori felt comfortable. “I would be Honored.”

“Thank you,” he said.

His eyes shifted around, looking for an escape before his nether regions perked up again.

Then Glorfindel strode by. He had Rogi by the collar. Rogi was bleeding profusely from the nose and Glorfindel bellowed admiringly about Miss Sifian’s right hook, and Queen Kivi’s attention was captured and held.

Rogi, seemingly oblivious to his smashed nose, caroled to any nearby about his beautiful, powerful woman.
Ori bowed quickly and got out of there.
He wasn’t really paying attention to his path, which was now quite choked with dancers and other revelers. He had to navigate it with all the nimbleness he possessed.

“Excuse me. Sorry. I beg your pardon.”
He finally reached an empty spot under a footbridge.
A laughing voice teased him.
“It’s dangerous out there. You could be hopped or wagged.”
Ori turned.
“Sigrid? What are you doing here?”
She blushed and adjusted her dwarven tunic.
“Fili was called away to help Master Kir get ready. We were just… saying goodbye for now.”
“I see,” said Ori. “At least you don’t have any love bites.”
“Not where you can see them,” said Sigrid with an evil grin. “There are some advantages to height difference.”
“Naughty! I love it!” said Ori, and they hugged, squealing.
“Where are you off to?” asked Sigrid, pointing to his kit.
“Bard gave me permission to sketch from the bell tower while Dwalin is on duty.”
“That’s going to be some view,” she agreed. She looked out over the dancers with a smile.

“Have fun!”

“You, too, Sig.”
“Ori?”
The sudden waver in her voice made him stop and turn back to her.
“Sig? What is it?”
“I think I just saw my mother.”
“Oh.”
She cut her eyes at him, and her breath gasped suddenly uneven.
“I didn’t imagine that, did I.”
“Probably not. This is the night when the veil between the worlds is thinnest. Thorin’s already seen his parents.”
“He has? That’s… Of course, he would, but, I’m not…. Until tonight, I thought that was just a story.”
“You were there when Durin and Sunflower first appeared,” Ori reminded her.
“But they’re dwarrow, well, a hobbit and a dwarf. You’re magical beings. Men aren’t.”
Ori looked out over the square, which had grown steadily fuller as the moon rose. Durin danced by with Mathilde. They waved.
He waved back.
“I wouldn’t bet on that, Sig.”
Sigrid whimpered. He turned to find she had leaned into the wall with her arms clasped about herself.

“Great Eru,” she gasped.
“Yes, child?”
The familiar voice came on the wind.
Now Sigrid really cowered and edged back down the passage.
“Oh, mahumb,” Ori swore. “Sigrid, hold on a moment.”
Ori looked around wildly. He had no idea what to do. Eru wasn’t Mahal, and Ori had no real idea how to address Him. It was so much more formal and specific than talking to Mahal.
Truthfully, Ori had been amazed that Eru could be satisfied with the sacrifice of a plate of cookies. He had expected there to be a little blood involved.
Mahal’s voice raised the temperature around them by at least thirty degrees.

“Hold on, our Siggie,” he boomed. “Oi, Da, I think ‘Great Eru’ means, er, gi’e me strength’r some such.”
“But, I created her with all she needed,” said Eru, sounding genuinely puzzled.

“Lord Eru, sir,” Ori squeaked, “we aren’t mighty like valar and, occasionally we just need to be reminded. Please. Sorry.”

“Ah. I see.” A mighty throat clearing followed. “Sigrid, child, I gave you strength enough to handle this.”

Mahal huffed impatiently.

“Aye, well, ta f’r tha’. Say ‘r do somethin’ useful, ‘r comfortin’!”

Abruptly, Sigrid disappeared.
“What the fuck?” Ori cried.
“Wha’ th’ fuck?” Mahal cried.
“I set her aside to speak with her mother for a moment. Do you suppose that will suffice?”
“Is Sigrid dead?” Ori asked, swallowing.
“Of course not! She has things to do. This is the expedient way to show her that men are magical beings, that she has strength, and that her mother loves her. There. All sorted.”
“Aye, li’e th’ time yeh dropped Ulwe in th’ deep end a’ th’ ocean t’ teach ‘im t’ swim. Da, remember when we talked about’ yer parentin’ skills?”
“You’re still in one piece,” said Eru.
“I ain’t delicate.”
“Neither is Sigrid.”
The valar seemed to withdraw, leaving Ori alone in the rapidly cooling passage.
Ori heard a familiar caw and Quartz landed on his shoulder.
“No worries,” said Quartz, pecking lightly at Ori’s beads. “Siggie’s safe.”
“Does she know that?” Ori asked.
“She does now.”
“Will she come back? Is it alright for me to leave here?”
“Sure. Now, about my empty stomach.”
“What about Garnet?”
“Told me to push off for a while. Driving her nuts hovering.”
“Oh, in that case, chips?”
“Yes, please!”
“With cheese, I suppose, and gravy.”
“What do you think?”
“I think you’ll make yourself sick again.”
“Eh! Probably. Let’s go!”

They were munching their way through gravy-covered delirium when High Priest Sven walked by, did a double-take, and grinned. He lifted his own container of chips, cheese and gravy in salute and they ate for several minutes in companionable silence, except for occasional sounds of culinary bliss.
Ori caught Quartz eyeing the priest’s portion and hissed, “Behave.”
“I am behaving, like a raven,” said Quartz, with the avian equivalent of a pout.
A drum pounded from someplace in the outer streets, a low, insistent bass beat.
“What is that?” Ori asked.
“I know,” said Quartz.
“Well?” Ori prompted.
“Sorry, sworn to silence.”
As the drum grew louder, closer, the musicians in the square stopped playing, and the crowd turned expectantly, the chatter faded to silence.

High Priest Sven polished off his last mouthful and cleared his throat.

“Yes, well. I’ll just nip over to the side for a pint. Excuse me, and Eru bless you!”

He hurried off. Ori frowned and shivered.

The dancers stepped back, and made an avenue to the bonfire.

A masked figure shouted. Ori was not surprised to recognize him as Bard, who leapt up on the steps of Dale Hall and held up his arms. In one hand he carried a nine tethered whip with which he randomly smacked the steps.

“My people, we have defeated our enemies. We are whole once more. We traveled as one people from the frozen wastes long ago and became the people of ancient Esgaroth. We had good neighbors in the dwarrow of the great mountain that sheltered us. We lived in peace and prosperity. Then fell times came upon us and our ancient city in the attacks of the malignant valar Morgoth and his evil servant Sauron. They destroyed so much of our beloved Arda, murdering our families and our good neighbors the elves and the dwarrow. Together, men, dwarrow and elves defeated him!”

Cheers rose from the crowd. People of the three races toasted each other, slapped backs, shook hands, and hugged.

Ori was impressed with Bard’s oratory but wondered at his appearance. Then he realized Bard was dressed as an old fashioned executioner. He began to worry what was in the wind.

“Easy, lad.” Mahal’s hot boom echoed in his head.

Bard’s whip punished the step again and everyone hushed and listened.

“All during this time, we did not know but a depraved monster of that evil had come among us. We, in our helpless state, were ground down to naught but beggars and thieves, forced to eke out a sad existence in our once beautiful land. Our good neighbors the dwarrow suffered under a tyrant of their own. With the lifting of the shadow that covered Arda, the dwarrow freed themselves and aided us to overthrow the despicable villain who held us in thrall. All hail our people and their good friends!”

Cheers started again. Bard held up a black gloved hand.

“Now, my people, we have once more found our kindness and friendship with the lands and waters about us. The hobbits came among us and taught us to care for our lands once more. We have called on the valar of old to assist us. They have smiled upon us. All hail our precious goddess Enina, called by the dwarrow and hobbits ‘Yavanna’.”

There was a clear note of a flute. Ori turned and saw that Deneb, Mistress Guernsia and the Dale matron with the beehive hairdo stood with Tilda, still in her elf costume. They sang a line of soft throbbing notes, then lowered their voices to a hum. Women from every walk of life in Dale came forward. They carried a great carved wooden platter the size of a table top. It was covered in fruits, grains, meats and many prepared foods, all set up to look as though they were pouring from a large, beautiful curved horn of woven straw. This was carried into the square and placed on a table hastily brought out and set in front of the steps of Dale Hall. People cheered and wept and several came forward and knelt before the table.

Bard struck the whip again against the step.

“We have overcome and we live free and in friendship and prosperity with our fellow peoples of Arda. No longer do we huddle in huts and starve. All hail Enina, Mother Goddess of us all.”

Bard waited this time for the joyful noise of the throng to simmer down on its own.

“We have a final duty, my people.” Bard shouted and whirled the whip above his head. “It is time to bring the tyrant to justice before Blessed Enina. Bring forth the prisoner and let him face those he has wronged.”

Bard saluted the crowd then bounded off the steps and back down the cleared avenue.

A shiver went through the crowd then a yell of “Justice!” came from the back, and many others took it up.

In another moment Ori heard the solemn drum beat. The crowd strained to look as the drum grew louder, and finally a lone drummer, black-garbed and cloaked, entered the square. Ori recognized Ivo, his face set and solemn.

Behind him, identically dressed, Bain carried a long pole, at the top of which hung the skull of a cow, draped in red banners.

Finally, after him, the dark, masked figure of Bard led a horse and tumbrel into the square.

On the driver’s box sat Master Arim, dressed in blinding yellow, with a bejeweled golden crown on his brow and a scepter capped with a blood ruby gem in his hand. Beside him was Mistress Callin, robed in green, with a crown of leaves and berries on her head. Ori recognized this as one of Thranduil’s tiaras.

In the tumbrel, propped up, stood a straw figure in ostentatious robes and a carved pumpkin for a head.

Ori recognized the robes of Master Calmar.

Shouts started and grew to a roar as accusations, Poczo’s fish sandwiches, and stones were hurled at the ‘prisoner’.

“You stole my father’s living and left us starving!”
“You dishonored my daughter!”
“You killed my husband!”
“You slaughtered all my farm animals!”
“You burned up all my families boats!”

Glorfindel, Eowyn, and the rest of the city guard were on hand to keep the citizens from surging forward to attack the tumbrel. Occasionally Glorfindel caught and corrected the aim of flying stones or fish sandwiches, so only the ‘prisoner’ was struck.

The tumbrel rolled to a stop at the bonfire. The shouting, insults, and jeering faded as Mistress Callin made a calming gesture.

Hamfast and Hamson separated from the crowd, and bowed to Master Arim.

“My king, by your leave,” they chorused.

Arim nodded regally.

The two hobbits ran around behind the tumbrel.

Thranduil appeared in his dwarf garb to hold the horse’s head as the executioner joined the hobbits in removing the straw effigy from the wagon. They dragged it before Master Arim.

“Here is the prisoner, my king,” the executioner shouted. “What is your will?”

Master Arim, who seemed to be holding in a snicker, bellowed, “Let him feed the flames, let his bones sweeten the ground, and let his blood tempt the return of the Sun, the Lover of Great Enina and maker of metals, who taught our smiths to make tools.”

The drum began again, and the crowd began to stamp in time with it.

Mistress Callin was tenderly lifted down and she waved to the executioner to bring the ‘prisoner’ to her at the edge of the bonfire. There was another hail of raging incriminations, fish sandwiches, and stones as they threw in the figure and everyone cheered and yelled judgement on it as it was consumed by the flames.

Master Arim pounded the butt of his scepter three times on the box of the wagon.

“Justice is done!” The old man announced, then sighed and deflated with a chuckle. “Now someone get me down from here and get me a blessed pint.”

After that, the musicians started up again, and the people, one by one and in groups, threw their corn dollies and their old mistakes and regrets into the flames with the vanquished tyrant.

Mistress Callin was lifted up and carried on the shoulders of strong men to a chair beside the table of offerings. The chair was draped in green velvet with gold leaves. Ori suspected this had also come from the Greenwood.

One by one, the citizens of Dale approached her and knelt or bowed and she offered them something from the table.

Bard had removed his mask and helped Master Arim to the ground. Master Tin and Lord Zark arrived to take him to sit and have a pint.

Ori peered at the old man’s ‘Crown Jewels’.

“Oh, they’re paste,” said Ori.
“Of course they’re paste,” said Bard with a laugh. “I don’t think Arim would have been able to hold up his head beneath the real thing.”

“Well done, my husband,” said Thranduil.

“Was I a convincing lord high executioner?” Bard asked with a laugh. “That’s the closest I ever want to come to being the real thing. I’m going back to the stable and put on less ominous clothing. Boys? You want a ride?”

Ivo and Bain climbed into the tumbrel.

Bain said, “Da, you don’t have another bonfire waiting when we get there, do you?”

“Hmmm, maybe. Let’s find out,” said Bard.

Ori, who had been sketching feverishly, sat beside Master Arim and his pint.

“That was incredible,” said Ori.

Arim raised his tankard.

“Thank you, and to your very good health, m’lord.”

“But, I thought the men tempted the Sun to return at Yule,” Ori said.

Arim laughed and Zark and Tin sat down with them.

“That’s usually how it goes,” said Zark. “But it sounds as though Yule will be rather busy this year, as men, hobbits and dwarrow all celebrate it differently. Not to mention, we’ll celebrate King Thorin’s birthday and a royal wedding right in the middle of it.”

“Aye, havin’ more t’ celebrate’s a good thin’,” said Tin, “bu’ it does ma’e f’r a hectic schedule.”

Apparently, this was a popular table, for they were soon joined by Thranduil, and Bard back from the stable.

“Bard!” Ori cried. “Excellent speech!”

The king of Dale coughed and said, “Yes, my husband has a flair for the dramatic.”

“I wrote the words, but you delivered them perfectly,” Thranduil insisted. “You just needed a little coaching to convey the proper spirit.”

“And a whip, apparently,” said Bard.

“A whip does lend a certain air. Where there’s a whip, there’s a way.”

“Yes, well, how you know that I’ll leave alone.”

Thranduil gave him a sweet, dangerous smile.

“Let’s just say that the orc who said that to me no longer has his head. Or his whip.”

“I suppose,” Bard said wryly, “you have the definitive collection.”

“Now, my love,” Thranduil cooed. “we all have our little secrets.”

“Fine.” Bard looked sidelong at him. “That collection will stay very far away from our bedroom.”

“Spoilsport!” Thranduil giggled.

Bilbo approached, closely followed by Glorfindel. The hobbit carried forth a bowl of something they couldn’t see, though the smell of alcohol wafted through the air. Ori looked around and realized that Hamfast, Bell, and several of their faunts, likewise bore bowls to the drinking tables.

Bilbo put the bowl on their table, and Ori peered in on a heap of raisins and almonds. They sat like pebbles at the bottom of a small pond of brandy.

“What are we supposed to do with this?” Bard asked.

“Drink it?” Thranduil suggested.

“I am in favor of that,” said Glorfindel.

“No no!” Bilbo cried. “It’s not ready yet.”

“What’s missing?” Ori asked. “Whipped cream?”

“Hardly, my dear,” said Bilbo.

He took a flint from his purse, and struck sparks into the brandy, which bloomed into a crown of blue and yellow flames.

“Now it’s ready,” said Bilbo.

They looked at the bowl. They looked at him. They looked at the bowl.

“Ready for what?” Thranduil asked archly.

“Ooo! Snapdragon!” Wee Sam cried.
He and Frodo ran up and knelt on the bench. Sam reached right into the center of the bowl, snatched out a raisin and popped it, still aflame, into his mouth. Frodo copied him, just as casually.

“Sam,” Bell called, “remember, that’s brandy, so you only get to eat one.”

“Yes, Mama,” said Sam as he licked his fingers and he and Frodo walked away.

Bard and Thranduil grinned at each other, and braved the flames.

Ori climbed the steps to the bell tower of Dale Hall and onto the platform. The wind was stiff enough here that the bell swayed a bit, though not enough for the bell to toll. He pulled his scarf up a little around his neck and looked out over the party below. The details of faces, masks, costumes blurred, but the colors by lamp and torchlight stood out brilliantly, and he was glad he had some colored inks with him, because he didn’t want to miss noting that. He had a mind to paint this scene in oils at some point. It would be rather abstract, but he thought the many colors together might be made to show the movement of the crowd.

He unfolded the portable desk and clipped his paper down, grateful to Gridr for her obsessive attention to detail in designing the contraption. Ori thought the only improvement to the desk might be a small chamber for embers, not enough to set everything on fire, just warm enough to keep the inks from freezing in the winter while he worked. He wanted to paint the various tones of snow on the mountain before spring thaw. For a long while, Ori leaned over the desk, sketching, trying this color and that. As he glanced up from the page, a snowflake landed on his nose.

He looked up at the slow flurry as it sparkled in the lamplight, and settled in hair and beards, only adding to the festive air. It was not cold enough for the snow to accumulate yet, just a reminder that winter came to Erebor, then Dale, far sooner in the season than it would to the south and west.

As he watched the celebration, he saw a large wagon approaching the center of Dale from the great road. By the light of the lanterns on either side of the driver, Ori could see a man wrapped in a forest green cloak seated alone on the box. Two stout draft horses pulled the wagon. A third, smaller horse walked behind on a lead.

Ori assumed the wagon was headed to the mountain. This would, of course, take it right through the main square, which had been blocked off against anything but emergency traffic.

“Dwalin!” he hollered.

But Dwalin couldn’t hear him, of course.

He quickly packed up his gear and hurried down the tower steps to the street. He arrived just as the soldiers surrounded the wagon. The driver, wisely, held up his hands to show he held no weapon, and promptly complied when ordered to climb down. He removed his dark green hood to reveal fair-hair and light-skin. Ori thought he looked vaguely familiar.

Just as Dwalin stepped forward, being official, he was cut off by a loud, booming voice.

“Oi! Faramir! Yer early, lad!”

The music stopped.

Everything stopped as the entire square turned and looked right at the stranger.

Before the soldiers could make a further move, Sunny and Durin were upon them. The couple still wore masks, but there was no disguising that Durin stood wider and taller than any other dwarf here. The man’s eyes grew larger than a hobbit’s as Durin rushed forward like an overfull mine cart and slapped him companionably on the back.

“Guid t’ have yeh!”

“He, sweetie, have a cookie.” Sunny produced the plate out of thin air and offered it. “It’s an awful long road from Gondor just on hardtack.”

“Ma’am?” he asked, though he was smart enough to take a cookie nonetheless. Ori thought they were jam-filled. “How did you know I only-“

“Thorin,” Sunny called, “come and meet Mister Faramir. And make sure he eats!”

“Yesssss, Umadel,” Thorin sing-songed as he approached.

“Fresh!” she accused.

She stuck Thorin with the plate as the band struck up again and she dragged her husband off to dance.
“Mister Faramir? I’m Thorin, son of Thrain.”
“Your majesty.” Faramir bowed, and Thorin returned it.
“And, I believe you know my husband.”
“Bilbo!”
“Faramir!” Bilbo cried.
The man knelt and hugged him.
“It’s so good to see you again!” Faramir said.
“Likewise, my boy, likewise. Here. Better have another cookie.”
Thorin offered the plate and added, “Once the badgers, faunts and children see them, they’ll disappear as fast as they arrived.”
“Oh, thank you,” said Faramir. He climbed to his feet. “King Thorin, I’m here as Mister Denethor’s representative and have brought the printing presses by agreement with Princess Dis. I’m afraid I’ve come at a bad time. Or, a good time, at least for the folks here.”
“It’s the Last Harvest festival,” said Bilbo.
“You’re welcome, of course,” said Thorin, “but we didn’t expect you before tomorrow night at least. Where is the rest of your company? You weren’t attacked on the road?”
“No,” said the man. He looked very uncomfortable.
Sunny whirled by with Durin.
“Those orcs’ hind ends ditched him at the border of Gondor,” she shot.
“Thank you, Umadel,” said Thorin.
“How did she know that?” Faramir asked, obviously perplexed.
“She makes it her business to know everything,” said Thorin. “Here is Captain Dwalin, my personal guard.”
“Captain,” said Faramir, bowing. Then he turned and looked down at Ori and he smiled. “You must be Lord Ori. My brother Boromir speaks of you all with great fondness, and he bade me seek you out in particular as soon as I could. Apparently, you protect the wayward and the confused.”
Ori thought this was because it took one to know one.
“Mister Faramir,” said Ori, bowing. “So, that’s the press then?”
“Yes. It’s-“
“Thorin, for the love of Yavanna, get the man a drink,” said Sunny as she danced by again.
“Yes Umadel,” said Thorin, now snickering.
“Is Mistress Umadel your majesty’s aunt?” Faramir asked.
“Her name is actually Sunny,” said Thorin. “Umadel means Grandmother of Grandmothers.”
“So, those are relatives of yours.”
“You could say that,” said Bilbo.
“Mister Faramir,” said Thorin, “when was the last time you spoke to your brother?”
“Actually it’s been quite a while. I wasn’t home the last time he and Mistress Lavender returned from visiting you all, then he was off riding the borders with Prince Eomer and his new wife, who, I take it, is the most terrifying person one could imagine.”
Ori said absently, “Wait until you meet her mother.”
“He did write me about the goings on in Erebor,” Faramir continued, “but I can see he left out a few important things. But ‘Sunny’ sounds familiar. I’ve heard it somewhere before.”
“You have,” Thorin assured him.
“How did she do the trick with the cookies?”
“She’s dead.”
“Oh! Haha. You’re joking.”
“No, I’m not,” said Thorin.
“No, he’s not,” said Bard, approaching. “Queen Sunflower and King Durin are dead, and they’re his first, direct-line ancestors.”
Faramir appeared to struggle with the concept, and finally came out with, “Her feet seem awfully large and furry for a dwarf’s.”
“Dwarrowdam’s,” Ori corrected automatically.
“She’s a hobbit,” said Bard.
“She’s that Sunny?” Faramir yelped. “And that’s…. I get it n-. No, I actually don’t get any of it.”
“Neither do I,” said Bard. “Welcome to my life.”
It seemed to strike Faramir that they hadn’t been introduced.
“Faramir of Gondor, at your service,” he said with a bow.
“Bard, King of Dale,” said Bard.
“Your majesty!”
“Never mind that. Come on, I’ll buy you a drink.”
“What about my horses?”
“Bein’ stabled at th’ royal residence under th’ mountain,” said Dwalin.
“My gear?”
“Yer gear’s on it’s way t’ yer room,” said Dwalin. “Wagon an’ press’ll be stored securely nearby.”
Faramir turned, found his wagon and horses gone and groaned.
“They move quickly here,” said Bard.
“Should I be worried?”
“No point in it. Better to let them go and hope for the best. We just have to be off the streets by three bell.”
“What happens at three bell?”
“They flood the streets with boiling water.”
“Beg pardon?”
“I know. It’s late tonight because of the party. Don’t worry, if you’re dead drunk in the gutter, a huge elf will pick you up and at least move you to the sidewalk.”
“Seriously?”
“Glorfindel? Rarely.”
Hamfast climbed to the top of the steps of Dale Hall as the band sloped off on their break.
“Alright! Time for th’ Gandalf - er, Tharkûn - look alike contest!”
“Oooo, Adanana, we should have entered that,” Tilda cried.
“Next year, perhaps,” said Thranduil serenely.
Bard grinned at him.
“She won’t forget that, you know.”
“Of course she will!” Thranduil protested. “Legolas always did.”
“Tilda isn’t Legolas.”
“Nope,” said Tilda, with her mouth set in a dangerously stubborn line.
Before Thranduil had a moment to protest, Bard took Faramir in tow, Faramir talking in hushed, urgent tones. Bard laughed, paid a street vendor for a tankard and handed it to him.
Ori, Dwalin, Bilbo, and Thorin watched them go.
“Well,” said Dwalin, “tha’ wen’ about’ as well as I expected.”
Thorin shrugged.
“Bard will make sure he gets to Erebor in one piece. Eventually.”
The contest was not run on scientific lines, as Bujni was quick to point out. Bilbo, Tauriel, Kili were official judges, but their decision was necessarily swayed by the volume of the applause and shouts of the crowd for the individual contestants, of which there were eleven. These included Tharkûn himself, Rigel, one of Nadaris’ young sons in a paper wig, and Dipfa, who sylphed across the stage in a long white beard wrapped round and round herself and nothing else.
Dipfa seemed to be the favorite until a call went up from the crowd and a last contestant hurried up the steps.
Ori thought it looked rather like Master Kir in a long white robe, with his hair pulled back, but there was something off about his proportions. For one thing, Kir wasn’t nine feet tall.
“You’re late, pardon me sayin’ so,” Hamfast chided lightly.
“No, I ain’t!” Yes, definitely Master Kir. “A wizard’s always righ’ on time.”
This brought a laugh and a cheer.
Master Kir smacked the base of his stick on the step.
“Now, all a’ yeh hush, ’r I’ll turn yeh int’ handkerchief rabbits! Hold up! Hold up!”
He reached into a pocked in his robe, pulled out a bottle labelled ‘red wine’, glugged from it, and put the bottle back.
“A’righ’, le’s bash on wi’ it.”
There was no competing with this turn.
Master Kir carried all before him, and received the standard Shire prize of a jug of blackberry wine. He accepted this gratefully, but insisted Hamfast hold onto it for him.
“I’m gettin’ th’ vertigo up here!” Kir barked. “Tha’s enough a tha’.”
A swarm of mithril apprentices climbed the stairs and plucked Master Kir from the heights, revealing Fili, on whose shoulders he had stood.
Tharkûn saw this and roared, “Foul! Foul! That’s grounds for disqualification!”
But no one listened to him.
Master Kir was set down at the drinking tables to gather his prize and congratulations.
Fili, who wore only an old white shift, probably Dis’, accepted a pint of his own. He wiped the sweat from his brow and, smiling, looked around.
Then turned to Ori.
“Have you seen Sigrid, Ori-mate?”
“She’s with her mother,” Ori blurted.
“What?”
Suddenly Fili loomed right over Ori, and Ori got a clear picture of how much Fili and Thorin were alike.
“I mean, she’s with Eru!”
“Ori!”
“Sigrid saw her mother dancing and she - that is, Sigrid - asked Eru for strength and He tried to tell her she had strength and she didn’t believe Him or understand Him or something and He sent her to talk to her mother but she’s not dead - that is, Sigrid’s not dead but her mother is - I promise!”
Fili stared at him, looked to be processing what Ori said, started to say something, then finally went with, “Ori, tell Eru I want Sigrid back right now.”
A pop sounded beside them and Sigrid appeared.
“I didn’t do that!” Ori wailed.
Fili turned and flung himself into Sigrid’s arms.
Bilbo, who had apparently witnessed the entire scene, linked his arm through Ori’s and steered him toward the drinking tables.
“I think you could use a pint,” said Bilbo.
“I think I could use a keg,” Ori replied.
Ori had to admit, he was feeling better after he sat with Bilbo for a while and his heart slowed from a gallop. One pint was plenty to restore him to good humor.
It didn’t hurt that he suspected Mahal was patting him on the back, spiritually speaking.
He and Bilbo got to talking about all of Belladonna’s hijinks from her years on the road, then Belladonna appeared across the table and told them a few Bilbo had never even heard, and Bungo appeared beside her and called her out when her exaggerations ran to outright lies.
Old Bullroarer Took wandered past with his horse, called Trouble, because it followed him everywhere, and soon Ori was writing so fast and laughing so hard that he didn’t have time to worry or brood.
Meanwhile, at the opposite end of the table, Tharkûn was extremely drunk, and extremely cranky.
“How does one lose a contest where the point is to look like one’s self?” he demanded for the fourteenth time.
“Maybe you just didn’t look meddlesome enough,” said Bilbo.
Rigel waxed philosophical over his tankard.
“Good thing there wasn’t a handkerchief folding contest. I’m absolutely rubbish at it, you know.”
“Exactly!” Tharkûn cried. He slammed the butt of his staff on the ground for emphasis and suddenly all the dwarf statues around the square wore copies of Jani’s bathing costume from the inn. “The fix was in! It was rigged.”

Rigel gently loosened Tharkûn’s hold on the staff and leant it against Tharkûn’s chair.

“I think you’ve had more than enough.”

“I’m just getting started!” Tharkûn shouted.

“That’s what I’m afraid of,” said Rigel. “A little more drink, and Erebor will be under water as well.”

Bilbo sighed.

“At least the statues will be dressed for it.”

“I don’t see how the contest could possibly be fixed,” said Ori. “Nori wasn’t even involved.”

Abruptly, Ursith towered over him, listing dangerously, and with a sloshing tankard locked in his left hand.

“Oh! Master S-scribbly! I’ll no’ hear a word again’ Master Nori! H-He’s me fav-o-ri’e high-placed flunky, I’ll have yeh know.”

A dwarf at the next table muttered, “Bastard still owes me twenny gold.”

Ursith spun on him and Ori and Bilbo passed the time chatting, eating chips, and watching Nori terrorize the populace.

“That’s it,” said Rigel. He called to his wife. “Ara, Tharkûn and I are off like a herd of lizards in a cloud of goo.”

“That sounds like fun,” Ara replied. “Don’t forget to write from wherever you two end up.”

She, and Vi, and Margr, and Dis cackled over their drinks as Rigel hoisted Tharkûn to his unsteady feet.

While Rigel carted Tharkûn off to wherever drunk wizards go, Ori stared at Bilbo in amazement.

“You mean to say, Tharkûn enters the contest every year in the Shire and he always loses? How?”

Bilbo drained his tankard neatly and put in on top of the pyramid of ‘empties’ at his end of the table.

“Probably because we all made a pact to never vote for him.”

Ori went through his sketches, making notes and filling in some sections in color. When he looked up again, most of the band had wandered over to the Moo and Cluck in Motion and only a few remained, jamming, up on the steps of Dale Hall. The families with young children had gone home and the bonfire had burned down to embers. Dori and Balin had retired earlier, taking the dozing Frodo and Wee Sam with them.

Ori yawned prodigiously and Thorin laughed at him.

“Time t’ head home, yer majesty?” Dwalin asked.

“I think so,” Thorin agreed. He turned to Bilbo. “Ghivasha?”

“Yes,” said Bilbo. “The party is definitely winding down. Excellent turn out for Last Harvest, though. Ended the way they always do.”

Ori looked around at the staggering drunk, the snoring and the odd couple snogging, rolling around in the street.

“Is Hobbiton usually littered in bodies like this?”

Bilbo linked arms with Ori as they strolled toward their waiting mounts. Thorin and Dwalin followed and, though they spoke in low voices, Ori knew they were talking about his arse and Bilbo’s. He gave his a little extra wiggle and smiled at their chuckling.

“The bodies in Hobbiton are usually more active,” said Bilbo. “Hobbits can hold their drink, remember. And about nine months later, the midwives are running from smial to smial, cursing the day they were born themselves.”

When they reached the sitting room, Ori found Sigrid and Fili, clad in nightwear, sharing a pot of tea with Dori by the fireplace. Ori immediately fixed on Sigrid, mainly because it hurt to look directly at Dori. In a high collared, highly ruffled and entirely pink dressing gown, pillowing around her full belly, and wearing a bejeweled, pink satin turban, Dori looked like nothing so much as a big, foofy, blushing ball.

“Sigrid!” Ori shouted.
He ran to her and leaped across the back of the couch to hug her.
“Ori! You wouldn’t believe where I’ve been!”
A quick look told Ori that she was not only in one piece, but pink-cheeked and happy. By her eyes, he could tell she had been crying, but not from sorrow or pain.

“Lord Eru said he sent you to talk to your mam!”
“He did! It was wonderful! I so owe Him cookies!”
“I’ll help you make them,” said Fili.
She raised a brow at him.
“Provided we save you some?”
“I shall be your humble taster!” the prince teased.

Bard and Faramir arrived, comically wavering on their feet. In proper lighting, Ori could see the young man was not only drunk but still dressed in his stained traveling clothes, his blond hair askew. Faramir blinked owlishly at everything and Ori realized this was all new to him and sympathized. It had once been all new and very strange to him, too, and he was sober at the time.

Dori rose at the appearance of their new houseguest.
Bard slurred, “Faramir, this’s Dori, the Bleshed Bearer of Erebor. Dori, this’s Faramir Gondor.”
“M’lady,” Faramir managed, bowing, slightly unsteady.
“Mister Faramir!” Dori cried. “You come in and get yourself warm by the fire this instant!
Mistress Dazla! Do we have a blanket for Mister Faramir?”

“Of course, Bearer,” said Mistress Dazla, entering from the hallway with the item.
“Thank you, dear,” said Dori. She took the blanket and wafted it around to drape him like a cape.

“Now, sir, will you kindly tell me why are you scampering about the countryside with only two changes of clothing?”

Bard navigated the edge of the couch and sat on Sigrid’s other side, kissing the top of her head along the way. He blearily stared Fili down.
“Sigrid? Where’d you disappear to tonight?”
“Da! Not where you think!”

Apparently, Faramir was on his own with Dori.
“I-I didn’t know how long I’d be staying, m’lady.”
“We’re sending you right around to Marhdin in the morning. He’ll outfit you properly. Are you hungry? Would you like a cookie?”
“I think I’m rather too drunk to decide,” said Faramir, considering it deeply.
“We can take care of that right off,” said Dori. “Come into the kitchen. Come along.”
“Given his state, Dori,” said Thorin coming in from Bag-End East, “perhaps some hot soup and a little bread are in order.”

“Of course, Thorin dear. Now, Mistress Dazla, does Mister Faramir, have a nightshirt?”
“He does, m’lady. I checked.”
Faramir gaped at her.
“Unless, Mister Faramir, you prefer to go without?” Dori asked.
Thorin smiled and shook his head.
“Dori.”
“Oh, I suppose it can all wait until we’ve sobered him up a little.”
As Dori hustled Faramir into the kitchen, Ori heard Faramir ask, “Sober me up with what, m’lady?”

“Hot coals in your drawers. What do you think, silly man?”
Thorin slid his gaze over to Ori.
“Do you think he’s safe alone with Dori?”
“Perfectly,” said Ori. “Provided he’s a good boy and does what Dori says.”
“Ah. Just like everyone else.”
Meanwhile, Bard was digesting Sigrid’s account of that evening’s adventures.
“Is your mother alright? Is she happy?” Bard asked, clasping Sigrid by the shoulder.
“Da! She’s fine! She said she’s very happy to see you found someone with… er… such a cute behind.”

Thranduil, now in his everyday robes, swaggered through in time to hear the last of this, and asked, “Who thinks I have a cute behind? Not that it isn’t true.”
“My late wife!” Bard cried.
“Oh. Well, in that case.” Thranduil addressed the ether. “Thank you, ma’am. I promise I’ll take good care of him, and I’m sure he’ll take care of it.”
“But…” Bard was quickly losing his composure. Ori thought Bard being drunk didn’t help.
Thranduil neatly skirted the end of the couch to kneel down before his husband.
“My dear? What’s troubling you?”
Bard swallowed.
“She must think I don’t love her anymore.”
“Da! That’s not true!” Sigrid cried.
“How do you know that, Sig?” Bard asked.
“Because she said you were agonizing over it for no reason. The details of how it works are a little vague, but you will see her again and you’ll be happy together. Most likely, all three of you.” “Really?” Bard looked like he’d been handed the moon. “Really? We’ll…Wait. All three of us?”
“As I said, the details are a little vague.”
“Let’s hope she likes tall blonds,” Thranduil mused.
Bard looked back and forth between Sigrid and Thranduil.
“I need to ask more questions, but I can’t decide in what order,” he said. “Also, I think I might cry like a little girl at some point.”
“I did,” Sigrid confessed.
“So did I,” Fili added.
Thranduil chuckled and gathered his husband up.
“Come along, husband. We have time to check on Bain and the Monster Child, then, I think we’re late for bed.”
“You’re not going anywhere else tonight, are you?” Bard asked.
“Not unless you’re going, too.”
“Good. Good. G’nacht.” He bent and kissed the top of Sigrid’s head again, and Fili’s for good measure, then let himself be led out to the receiving room, bound for the guest rooms upstairs.

Ori did an internal check and decided it was time for more food. He went through the kitchen to grab a snack and say goodnight. As he entered from one door, the hall door opened, and Furh’nk and Eowyn entered in uniform, cackling evilly. Haldir followed, rather more soberly.
“I knew yeh had it in yeh, our Wynni,” said Furh’nk.
“He had it coming. I just hurried it along. Oh. Hello.”
Faramir, who was sitting at the table, froze with the soup spoon half way to his mouth and a look of amazement on his face.
“Eowyn! Our Furh’nk! Our Dirty!” Dori cried. She placed a glass of restorative at Faramir’s elbow as the young man managed not to drop his spoon back in the soup. “Look who’s arrived early with the presses!”

Faramir rose and bowed, still draped in his blanket.
“Faramir of Gondor at your service!”

Furh’nk and Haldir returned his bow.
Eowyn cried, “You’re Boromir’s little brother!”

Faramir cringed.
“Yes, I-“
“You grew!”
“Yes, I did,” said Faramir. “I’m sorry.”
Her eyes flew open and she laughed delightedly.
Furhn’k said to Dori, “We have presented ourselves as you commanded, Bearer.”
“Yes, and right on time,” said Dori. She waved an imperious hand. “Sitsitsitsit.”
They sat across from Faramir and were presented with their own bowls of soup.
“You look terrible,” said Haldir to Faramir.
“I feel terrible,” said Faramir.
Eowyn winced.
“You didn’t eat one of Poczoh’s fish sandwiches, did you?”
“No, but I think that’s about the only thing that’s gone right since I left home.”
“Good,” she took more bread. “I mean, good that you didn’t eat one. I saw a raphcuctus bird spit one out.”
“What?”
“You didn’t like the party?”
“I don’t remember most of it. What’s a raphcuctus bird?”
“They cannot fly,” said Haldir. “My Lord Celeborn has one as a companion. Has better manners than Glorfindel, but then, who doesn’t.”
Faramir blinked and gave his head a little shake.
“What?”
Dori interrupted.
“Mister Faramir, drink this and eat.”
Faramir obeyed.
“A raphcuctus is a bird,” Haldir clarified as Faramir pulled a face and did his best not to choke. “It is round, and fat and has a beak like an spear.”
“Pet?” Dori turned to Ori and pursed her lips. She nodded toward the table.
This wasn’t a request, and Ori knew it.
He sat next to Faramir, who looked almost embarrassingly grateful for the seeming show of solidarity.
“How are things going out in the city?” Ori asked the soldiers.
“Very well, m’lord,” said Frhn’k. “We’re jus’ warmin’ up, then we have t’ go back an’ help Lord Glorfy move th’ bodies.”
Ori leaned toward Faramir.
“Drunk, not dead,” he offered, reaching for the bread.
A squawk and a storm of black feathers hailed Baluchistan’s arrival. He tumbled from one of the small passages above the cabinets and onto the table to land with three short hops on his rump.
“Oi, Lady Dori, Queenie’s a bit peckish an’ wantin’ somethin’ nice an’ dead.”
“What are…?” Faramir stared at the raven, scattering black fluff all over the table.
“Pardon me, m’lord,” said Baluchistan. “Won’t be a mo. Er, Baluchistan, late a’ th’ Iron Hills, at yer service.”
The raven bowed.
“Faramir of Gondor, at yours… sir.”
“Gondor, eh? How’s our Sandy doin’? Say, lad, yer three sheets t’ th’ wind. Our Lady Dori, he looks more rumpled than me. Ain’t he had th’ cure yet?”
“Not all of it, the naughty man! I try, Mahal knows I try!”
Faramir obediently took up the glass again.
“Down it in one,” Ori advised. “I know it tastes horrible.”
Faramir did so and immediate resorted to his ale.
Eowyn inhaled the steam wafting from her bowl with a smile.
“Mint soup! My favorite!”
“I thought the chicken soup was your favorite,” said Dori.
“That one, too!”
She raised a full spoon to her lips, blew on it, then swallowed it with a little moan of appreciation, and licked her lips.
“Faramir, you have got to have a taste of this,” she insisted. He took to this suggestion immediately. He applied himself to his soup and didn’t look up from it.

“Better have a piece, before Frhn’k takes it all,” said Eowyn.

Faramir stared at her, mystified, then looked down and realized she was offering him the bread board.

“Oh, sorry,” she said. “You can’t eat one of those without a little spread.”

Faramir shot to his feet.

“Excuse me!”

He disappeared back through the door to the living room.

Ori stared after him, then turned to Dori, who waved him to follow, which Ori did.

Faramir, however, had not gone far.

He leaned on the wall just outside the door with his face in his hands.

“Mister Faramir?”

“I - I can’t talk to her right now! I can barely talk as it is.”

“Well, you are pretty drunk. I don’t think she expects you to compose a sonnet.”

“She’s so… oh, Eru, did she grow up! And she must think I’m a total dolt!”

Ori experienced the strange feeling of having done this before.

“Maybe when you’re sober, it will be easier,” Ori soothed.

Faramir raised a brow.

“You’re right,” said Ori. “Sober just makes what you said or did drunk so much worse.”

“How much worse than that could it get?”

“I once got drunk and agonized about balancing my work at the library with giving birth to a dozen badgers. In front of my entire family.”

Faramir cocked his head.

“I’m male,” said Ori.

Faramir sucked in a horrified breath.

Dori stuck her head around the door frame.

“Mister Faramir? You’re soup is growing cold.”

“We’ll be right there, Dori,” said Ori.

“I’m just having a crisis,” said Faramir. “It was bad enough when we were children and she was cute. Those freckles! Now I’m beautiful and she’s an idiot.”

“What?” Ori asked.

Faramir looked to be trying to concentrate, and finally came up with, “Other way ‘round.”

“Hmm,” said Dori. She looked him up and down. “You’ll do nicely.”

She returned to the kitchen.

Faramir looked down at Ori.

“What just happened?”

“Ride-by-Dori-ing. You’re doomed.”

“I knew that.”
Ori and Faramir re-entered just as the three soldiers rose.
“There you are,” Eowyn sang out.  She crossed to his side and peered up at him.  “You weren’t sick, were you?”

“N-no, ma’am,” Faramir said thickly.

“Good,” she patted his arm then twinkled.  “What’s this ma’am business?  Thank you for not calling me ‘Addled One’, like Bored Mouse does.”

“It’s very rude of him,” Faramir said, trying to convey solemnity and failing.

“Oh, come here, you!  We all but grew up together!”

With that Eowyn hugged him.  Faramir looked stunned then delighted and hugged her back.  Haldir and Furh’nk exchanged mischievous looks and Dori smiled a very satisfied smile.

“Now,” Eowyn released Faramir.

“I sorry, I’m grubby with travel,” Faramir said quickly.

“My advice to you,” said Eowyn, poking him in the stomach, “is to let dear Dori feed you some more, then have a bath, and be sent to bed.  Around here, your best bet is just to do everything Dori tells you.”

Dori murmured darkly, “Your only bet is to do what I tell you.”

Eowyn turned to Haldir and Furh’nk,  “Right, we’re off like a harlot’s dress, come on, you two.”

The three soldiers exited, leaving Faramir staring after her.

“Eru’s sweet world!” Faramir moaned.

“Mister Faramir, dear?” Dori cooed.  “Are you of an elegant sufficiency?”

“I couldn’t be that elegant if I tried,” Faramir mumbled, then, “Huh?”

“You need a bath, deary,” Dori decided.

“And so was she,” Dori giggled.  “And for a brief moment you were filthy together, weren’t you?”

“Yes, ma’am,” Faramir breathed.

“Agrib, dear!” caroled Dori.  Agrib appeared and bowed.

“Yes, Blessed Bearer?”

“Mister Faramir is in dire need of a bath, then to be put to bed.  Would you please assist him?  He’s still recovering.”

“Yes, Blessed Bearer,” Agrib bowed again.

Dori made a shooing motion.

“Off you go, Faramir, dear.  You follow our own Agrib and he will assist you.  You can discuss your underclothing with him without embarrassment.  Tomorrow you will wait upon Master Mahrdin after breakfast.”

“Is Master Mahrdin the head of the printers’ guild?” Faramir asked.

“No, darling, he’s a tailor.”

“Why-“
“Because you are not having any pubic meetings in any of that clothing you brought.”
“Why—”
“It won’t do, darling. Run along now, you need a bath.”
“But—”
“Agrib.”
“Yes, Blessed Bearer.”
Ori watched as Agrib all but forcibly removed Faramir from the room. Ori called after him.
“Do you need my presence, Mister Faramir?”
“No, thank you. I shall be brave.”
“Excellent,” Agrib agreed.
Ori considered, then called out.
“Would you like me to accompany you to Master Mahrdin’s tomorrow?”
“Yes!”
“Happy, Dori?” Ori asked, looking sidelong at his beaming brother.
“Oh, yes, yes, completely! He’s perfect.”
“I refused to ask you what he’s perfect for,” Ori teased.
“Good,” Dori laughed, “for I shan’t tell you anything!”
“I’m going to bed,” Ori said with a yawn.
“Off you go, pet. You wash up and pop under the covers. I’ll tell our deary when he comes in.”
With that, Dori kissed Ori’s cheek and hustled him out of the kitchen.

In the morning, Ori kissed Dwalin and slipped noiselessly out of bed. He padded through to the kitchen where Balin was making tea. Dori sat at the table, silver hair spilling loose, in a dressing gown of powder blue, while Mistress Dazla fussed over her.
“Dori?” Ori said as he gave Balin a hug.
“I’m fine, pet. It’s just getting a little hard to sleep. The badgers are active and I’m the size of a cavern.”
“Is Faramir up?” Ori asked.
“Not that I know of, pet.” Dori turned as Agrib arrived carrying a large jug.
“Agrib, dear, do we know anything about our new guest?”
“I just checked on him, Blessed Bearer,” Agrib reported. “He seems ready to wake. I’m going to take him some water to wash his face.
“Thank you,” Dori smiled. Agrib filled the jug from the hot spigot and went out.
“His clothing is dreadful, dearest Bearer!” Mistress Dazla put in.
“He’s going to Master Mahrdin straight after breakfast,” Dori told her. “I’ve had a bat from Mahrdin saying he’s ready to attend to Master Faramir. I had Agrib send his poor excuses for clothing over to Mahrdin earlier, so there would be some things ready for him to wear.
Ori looked askance at Dori.
“What will he wear to breakfast and to go to Master Mahrdin’s?”
“Jim leant me some clothing.”
“I don’t think they enjoy the same sense of style,” said Ori. He had visions of Faramir skulking down the back alleys of Erebor in tights and sequins.
“They’re about the same size, pet. I’m sure Ruelis will make sure the clothes provide adequate coverage. He’ll have to wear his own boots, however. Theoden just had to have the fringed ones Jim leant him. And rather fetching they looked, too.”
“Who would have thought the king of Rohan liked fringe,” said Ori into his tea. Dwalin pushed into the kitchen and wrapped his arms around Ori, kissing the nape of his neck through his hair. Ori giggled and petted Killer, who enthusiastically licked his face.
“Faramir fancies Eowyn,” he whispered.
“Drunk ’r sober?” Dwalin mumbled.
“Eowyn wasn’t drunk and I think both for Faramir,” Ori teased.
“Smar’arse,” Dwalin chuckled and helped himself to Ori’s tea.
Mistress Dazla shooed them all through to the breakfast parlor. Bilbo and Thorin breezed in with the faunts and Tilda, followed by the wargs.

“Is Faramir awake?” Bilbo asked.

“Agrib is tending to him,” Dori replied and poured tea for them. Ori was just digging into the freshly baked ham rolls when Thranduil and Bard entered. Thranduil was amused and Bard looked extremely hung over. Dori made a scolding noise and whisked out to the kitchen. Fili and Sigrid entered, followed by the younger set all talking and laughing. Eowyn was with them and patted Bard’s shoulder.

“Clean up was finished before second hour after midnight,” she told him cheerily. “The flush went through without a problem and your streets are pristine.”

“Mshdfgh,” Bard managed.

“He says ‘thank you’,” Thranduil cooed.

“This way, if you please, sir.” Ori head Agribs voice.

Faramir entered the room, dressed in his boots, a pair of black trousers and a long white tunic with white embroidery. He did a double take at the number of people in the room. A chorus of greeting showered him and he bowed and returned them. Dori came back in, put a cup of restorative in front of Bard and pulled Faramir over to sit near her, conveniently next to Eowyn.

As they ate, Thorin glanced at Fili.

“Master Kir is up and taking nourishment, according to Master Minta ,” said Fili.

“Good to know he survived to savor his victory,” said Bilbo.

Tharkûn appeared.

“Bloody cheek.”

Rigel appeared.

“Stop whining,” he admonished the other wizard.

Ara appeared.

“He’ll stop whining when you stop whining, which is never,” she said, and her teacup filled itself.

Thorin nodded to them and a call of greeting went around the table.

“And?” Thorin prompted Fili.

“I’m off with Bofur to inspect the shoring for the new lifts to the zinc mine. I’m sure Lady Kadis will be happy to have us out of her beard. Then I have a…er… project I’m working on in the forges.”

He cut his eyes toward Sigrid, who politely pretended not to notice.

“Excellent,” said Thorin. “Kili?”

“Riding with the guard this morning,” Kili reported. “Then, after lunch, I’m taking target practice with a new crop of archers. Faramir?”

“Your highness?”

Kili chuckled.

“At the breakfast table I’m only Kili. It’s hard to be all royal when you’re spilling eggs and bacon down the front of your tunic. Anyhow, Eowyn says you shoot as well as wield the sword and javelin. Would you like to come with us?”

“Oh, go on, Mister Faramir,” Dori encouraged. “Dear Eowyn is going as well, aren’t you, my dear?”

This looked like news to Eowyn, but she had been around long enough to know a command when she heard one.

“Sounds good, if you don’t mind the company, Tauri?”

Tauriel blinked.

“Not at all. Husband, don’t forget we have to go over the rough draft of the presentation.”

Kili winced, but nodded.

“You’re going to find every one of my spelling errors aren’t you.”

“I am determined,” she warned. “Even if it kills us both.”

“Brave girl,” said Dis. “Thorin, Randibur has a trade proposal he’d like to go over with you, but the envoy from the Blacklocks is being a dumdumel and keeps changing her mind about the terms.”
“Where is Randi this morning?” Thorin asked.
“He said they were taking a breakfast meeting over it. Don’t be surprised if he arrives with a split lip. The envoy has quite a sucker punch.”
“You warned him, I take it.”
“Of course,” said Dis airily.
“Of course,” Thorin echoed and she wrinkled her nose at him. He turned to Dori.
“Bearer?”
“I have plans of my own to accomplish,” said Dori with a dangerous air of mystery.
There wasn’t any mystery, however. Ori’s birthday was in two days.
Dori continued, “Ori will escort dear Faramir to Master Mahrdin’s after breakfast.”
“Why?” Eowyn looked at Faramir.
“The Blessed Bearer and Mistress Dazla don’t like my clothes,” Faramir told her with a grin.
“The clothes you have on are perfectly fine,” she said. “Though, they do look familiar.”
“They’re on loan from the circus,” he said.
“Oh.”
“Master Faramir,” Bujni addressed the man in formal tones. “In most circumstances, I should suggest that you visit the show rooms of my precious diamond, but I believe that in your case, the Blessed Bearer is very wise in sending you to Master Mahrdin’s. His assistant Pika will serve your tastes admirably. In due course, should you wish to become more daring in your statements of fashion, I shall alert my precious diamond.”
Faramir nodded and said “Thank you, Lord Bujni.”
“We don’t dislike your clothes, dear Faramir,” Dori interrupted. “They are simply not suite to your station here in Erebor.”
Faramir stared.
“Ma’am…Blessed Bearer, I-”
“Dori,” Dori corrected.
“Dori, I-,” Faramir tried again.
“You may call me ‘Auntie’,” Dori cooed.
“You’re in now,” Eowyn giggled.
“Er…Auntie… I work with the presses. I get covered in ink.”
“Well, my own dearest badger is the king’s scribe, and I can’t tell you how many times I’ve had to scrub ink off his nose.”
Brandy raised her head out from Balin lap and snorted. Faramir’s eyes widened.
“We’re no’ talkin’ about ye, wee one,” Balin patted her. Brandy disappeared from sight again.
Ori looked at Faramir, whose eyebrow were almost at his hairline. The man made a move to look until the table.
“Don’t,” Bard said around a mouthful of fried apples and onions. “There are wargs, cats, and probably birds under there.”
Baluchistan and Quartz arrived together with the other household ravens and swarmed over the platter of chopped ham Miss Oqizla carried in. She put down two small baskets and nodded to Quartz and Blu.
“Breakfast for your mates.”
“Ta, love!” Blu bellowed in a small explosion of feathers.
Faramir sat up again and gazed at the flock of bickering ravens on the table. Ori thought he should help.
“Faramir, Dori calls me his badger because I’m the youngest. And I’ve been scrubbing my own nose since I was forty.”
Faramir thought for a moment, and finally he asked, “Who scrubs the nose of the actual badger?”
“Ah, she’s a well-grown lass,” said Balin. He chucked a fried egg under the table. Chewing sounds ensued. “She kin take care a’ herself.”
“Brandy’s very clever,” Eowyn told him and helped herself and Faramir to more ham rolls.
Thranduil lifted the crock of elderberry jam up to his face and peered in, before industriously digging out the leftovers with the jam spoon. Bard watched him then sighed. “Just stick your finger in and get the rest.”

“Are you referring to the jam or something else?” Thranduil asked.

“Badgers’re present!” Kili called out.

“It’s just jam, Kili,” Tilda objected.

Faramir mused, half to himself, “And I don’t think the actual badger thinks of jam one way or the other.”

“Aye, she does,” Balin put in helpfully. “Gooseberry’s her favorite.”

“Gooseberry jam,” Frodo sighed, enraptured.

“Perhaps, if yeh pay particular attention in yer lessons, I’ll take yeh an’ our Sam away this afternoon for a gooseberry tart,” said Balin with a wink.

Frodo sat bolt upright and turned his ‘please, oh please’ puppy dog eyes on his Uncle Bilbo.

“I’m the gatekeeper of the treats, apparently,” Bilbo mused. “Like putting Nori in charge of the henhouse.”

“I ain’t done that since Chicken!” Nori protested from somewhere under the door sill.

Faramir looked terribly excited.

“I’m pleased to make your acquaintance, Master Nori!”

“Aye, they all say that, ’til they get to know me,” Nori warned.

“It’s true,” said Dori. “Nori, are you planning on joining us at table, or do you intend to stick your head up through at some point and take a bite off my plate?”

“If you insist, our Dori.”

“I do not, horrid weasel. Come and say a proper hello to Mister Faramir.”

“Oi! Don’t you malign me ferrets! They’re refined young ladies, all proper manners an’ such.”

“Cos’ I’m too slippery,” said Nori as he rose through the table and swept Faramir a low bow.

“Hullo, our Dori’s latest project. Me advice is: run away quick as you can, ’fore it’s too late.”

“I call her ‘Auntie’,” said Faramir.

Nori shook his head.

“We’ve lost another one. That ham roll?”

“What are the majick words?” Dori prompted.

“Dori, I’m hungry.”

“That will do. Sit.”

“Woof,” said Nori obediently, though he did as he was told.

He snatched the last two ham rolls out from under the ravens’ talons.

They rounded on him and cursed him out at volume.

“Bloody dwarf!” Beryl groused. “Swipe an egg right out of my arse, why don’t you?”

Faramir finished his tea and set it down with a shake of his head.

“Bard, what was in that ale last night? I think it made me hallucinate.”

“Ale,” Bard answered with a raised eyebrow.

“Why? What did you think you saw?” Dis leaned forward in amusement.

“I thought I saw wargs all brushed and clean like household dogs, wearing collars with medallions on them. Ridiculous, I know.”

Faramir looked surprised when everyone chuckled.

Thorin lifted the table cloth beside him.

“Come, my damlings.”

Butter and Sugar slithered out from under the table and, tails wagging and tongues out, panting, sat beside Thorin.

Thorin smiled benignly at the Gondorian as Frodo grabbed Sugar in a hug.

“Faramir, welcome to Erebor.”

Faramir grinned.

“Thank you, your majesty. I think I’m going to like it here.”
“And we don’t use titles at home.” Thorin added.
“Thank you,…Thorin.”

Shortly thereafter, he and Ori were shooed out of Fundin House, bound for the tailor. Eowyn rode with them a little ways.

“Is it always like this in the king’s house?” Faramir asked.
As they passed into the tunnel out of the cavern, Eowyn waved to the guards on duty.
“Oh, no, it’s very quiet at the moment.”
“Yes,” said Ori. “Wait until all the dwarven under monarchs are here, along with the elves from Greenwood, Imladris and Lorien. And, then there’s Mister Wandi.”

“And Mellon,” Eowyn reminded him with a chuckle.

“Mister Wandi is King Thranduil’s son, am I right?” Faramir asked. “The haiderresser?”
“Stylist,” she corrected loftily. “Don’t let him get his hands on your hair, you’ll end up with a miniature of the citadel of Minas Tirith on your head.”

“Tell me that’s an exaggeration,” he pleaded, laughing.
Eowyn and Ori looked at each other then giggled.
“Never,” they chorused.

A screech cut the air that sent Faramir’s hand for his sword.

“Oh, Mahal’s bloody teeth,” Ori groaned. “Brace yourself.”

“We’re under attack?” Faramir asked.

“Not exactly,” said Ori.
Vi and Margr must have been purposely loitering in the square down from the entrance of the royal cavern. That was the best Ori could guess. He saw their carriage parked sideways in the middle of the road and the twin dwarrowdam juggernauts were upon them, each dressed in bright orange and gold ruffles which billowed and snapped around their substantial forms. Ori had an awful feeling that they were dressed like piles of dead leaves.

“What in Eru’s name?” Faramir asked in a hiss.

“Repeat after me,” Ori warned. “We have an appointment with Mahrdin. Dori set it up. We can’t be late.”

“No,” Faramir agreed. “We can’t be late.”
Eowyn nudge him.

“Tell them they look wonderful.”

“What are they?” Faramir asked, a grin plastered painfully across his face.

“Your worst nightmare in matching outfits,” said Ori. “Dori’s ladies in waiting.”

“Oooooooo, our Vi!” Margr bawled. “There he is! Ain’t he a handsome feller?”

“He is! He is!” Vi gushed.

Faramir had the sense to dismount his horse, Elboron, and go to meet them, as Elboron looked ready to shy and bolt. Eowyn called her greetings from Windfola’s back with her hand on Elboron’s halter.

Ori felt it was his duty to go as Faramir’s second. Happily, Honda was never anything but amused by the sisters.

Faramir was introduced, bowed gallantly upon introductions, suffered to be kissed on the cheek by each, and then to have their orange lipstick wiped off his cheeks with spit on matching handkerchiefs.

Like Boromir, Faramir was a gentlemanlike soldier, and he answered their rather personal questions as honestly, and as briefly, as he could.

“Yeh’ll grow yer beard now yer here, our Faramir,” said Vi as she reached up and patted his cheek. “This stubble will never do in Erebor.”

“He’s got them strong features, our Vi,” said Margr. “He mebbe kin get away with it, unlike our poor Kill, bless his heart.”

“Ooo, an’ a dimple on yer chin, laddie,” said Vi, tapping the item with a saucy forefinger. “Yeh know wha’ they say: A dimple on th’ chin means Morgoth’s within.”
Ori clenched his teeth under his smile. As pleasant as Faramir was, Ori doubted he relished being compared to the ultimate evil, even in the form of a flirty comment.

“Ma’am?” Faramir asked.

“It means, we’re bettin’ yer a bit naughty under them nice manners,” said Margr. “Our Wynni, best look after yourself an’ th’ other lads an’ lassies, an’ le’ us know if he’s no’ a complete gentleman. Yeh don’ have a sweetie back west, our Faramir?”

Faramir coughed off to the side and apologized. Ori thought the shake of his shoulders had more to do with self-control than sickness. The man recovered himself admirably.

“No, m’ladies, I do not.”

Vi said, “We’ll take care a’ tha’. Here, our Mar, who do we know needs a feller?”

Ori cut in, “I’m sorry, ladies, but Dori has set us an appointment with Master Mahrdin. We can’t keep him waiting.”

“Bes’ shoo, then, chook,” said Margr. “We’re on our way t’ see if our Dori needs anythin’, an’ we was goin’ t’ bring a dozen ikars, but, it’s more like a half dozen now.”

The carriage was righted, the ladies climbed aboard and went on their way.

“Sorry about that,” Ori murmured as the three of them waved to the sisters.

“I like them,” said Faramir.

Eowyn stared at him.

“You like them?”

“They’re like my old nanny, from when I was a boy. Except, you know, moreso.”

“Eru, you are a sick pup.” Eowyn bent over Windfola’s neck laughing. “Don’t you think so, Ori?”

“He hasn’t met Red Queen, yet.” Ori teased in his turn.

“Do I want to know who Red Queen is and what she is actually queen of?” Faramir glanced back and forth between them, obviously ready to play the game. “Should I make an appointment to pay my respects or swear my fealty?”

“Don’t swear your fealty,” Eowyn told him. “She’ll make you bring her food.”

“Bring her food,” Faramir repeated.

“Bones,” Ori added.

“She eats bones.” Faramir grinned. “I think you’re both making this up.”

Ori and Eowyn laughed.

“Not really,” Eowyn said. “Red Queen is what she calls herself and she is the matriarch of a huge flock of bone breakers, you know, some people call them eagle vultures.”

“Great Eru!” Faramir gasped. “I’ve seen such birds flying. They’re about as tall as a dwarf when perched.”

“The flock moved here when…” Ori searched for a good word.

“When Ori and his bullies blew up three of the Misty Mountains.” Eowyn finished.

“Now that I read about!” Faramir turned to Ori. “Is it true you brought back the west doors created by Celebrimbor and Narvi?”

“Yes,” Eowyn went on, “and Ori cleverly suggested the Red Queen offer them to Thorin as a gift.”

“Ori,” Faramir laughed. “What was the original name for the members of your quest? Surely calling them bullies was a joke.”

Eowyn and Ori gleefully related how they came to be called bullies.

“And you joined them in Lórien?” Faramir said to Eowyn.

“Of course!” she cried. “I refused to be left behind. We had a glorious time and Auntie Gladdy let me wear the jumpsuit she didn’t want.”

“Auntie Gladdy!” Faramir threw back his head in laughter. “I have heard many names for the White Witch of the Golden Wood but never Auntie Gladdy. Had I been among you, I would have joined your ‘bullies’, too, Ori.”

“I would have been glad to have you, Faramir,” Ori told him.

“He couldn’t come,” Eowyn stated with a glint a mirth in her eyes.
“And why not, m’lady?” Faramir demanded.
“There wasn’t a jumpsuit for you!”
“Alas.” Faramir sighed deeply.
“I’m sure Lady Galadriel would have insisted the elves make you one,” said Ori, “but, Dipfa wouldn’t approve. She made the others, you know, and the ‘replacement’ the Lorien elves made for me was not up to her exacting standards.”
“The uniform you lost to the orcs?” Faramir teased.
“You make it sound like I lost it in a card game,” Ori teased.
Eowyn said, “Oops, I’ve gone farther with you than I intended. Faramir, I’ll see you this afternoon. Ori, see you at dinner!”
She rode off and Ori glanced up at Faramir and coughed.
“That’s a lovely shade of red you’ve turned, Mister Faramir. It’s nice to know I’m not the only one who does that.”
“Pardon?” Faramir asked, turning to him.
Ori rolled his eyes.
“Come on, or we’ll really be late, and that is not only rude, but punishable by death.”
“Really?”
“Do you want to find out?”
“No, not particularly. Lead on.”

Pika met them at the door.
“Lord Ori, Mister Faramir, welcome, and please brace yourselves.”
Pika closed and locked the door after them and nodded to Ori to seat himself. Ori sat in the chair Dwalin had occupied when he had brought Ori there ages ago. Ori squirmed. He and Dwalin hadn’t had much time together even with the kings gone. He wanted a day to have Dwalin to himself and spoil him.
Ori heard quick, heavy steps and turned to find Master Mahrdin bearing down on them with blood in his eyes.
“Mister Faramir!” the tailor cried, holding out Faramir’s trousers. “These are patched!”
“Er… yes? I thought I did a rath-“
“A gentledw- gentleman in your position should be far more carefully attired! That is why you pay a tailor!”
“I don’t actually have a tailor, Master Mahrdin.”
“I can see that!”
The dwarf took a deep breath and got hold of himself with great effort. He bowed stiffly and said in a voice closer to normal, “Mahrdin, son of Greeneld, at your service.”
Faramir bowed.
“Faramir of Gondor, at yours and your family’s.”
“You see,” said Mahrdin, “you are a gentleman, and, with your indulgence, we will attire you as one.”
“Thank you, Master Mahrdin. I did try to explain to Auntie that I am a printer and am likely to be covered in ink. Also, I apologize if I’m being rude but, I don’t know your terms for service.”
Pika started at him, incredulous, and Mahrdin waved a careless hand.
“The Blessed Bearer has authorized me to charge it to the Fundins’ account. Pray, climb down from that towering rage before you even begin. Do you want to argue with Bearer Dori over a gift? I thought not. You have excellent survival instincts. Now, strip.”
Faramir did so, obediently. Ori was relieved to see his under pinnings were not patched and were obviously of good quality.
Master Mahrdin called for his step stool and went to work, calling out measurements for Pika to record, then sending Pika for linens and cottons and another apprentice to the back of the storeroom for sturdy canvas, all black or dark blue.
“I envision several sets of work clothes and, of course, a few sets of casual clothing, and two finer sets, for meetings and slightly more formal settings, such as dinner at the king’s table.”

“Master Mahrdin, I appreciate your forethought,” said Faramir, “but I am not sure I’ll be here very l-

“Pika, the Gondor book.”

“Yes, Master Mahrdin.”

Pika scampered off and returned with a thick volume of fashions as worn by the men in Minas Tirth.
Robes, Regalia, and a Repast.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Dori’s fussing is almost at a fever pitch! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The assistants reappeared with armfuls of things. Faramir was shown to the curtained room to change into new underthings, then he was brought out again with a very nice pair of tan trousers and a matching pale tawny shirt. Pika disappeared into the back and carried forth a leaf green, padded over-tunic embroidered with the tree of Gondor in gold thread. Faramir was fitted with an intricately stamped pale green belt with a gold buckle.

He was led to a large mirror to approve.

Ori wondered if he had looked as surprised as Faramir did when he had first seen himself dressed at Mahrdin’s. “As you see, sir,” Mahdrin commented as he walked around Faramir, inspecting the man. “We have kept the basic design currently popular in Gondor but added length to the tunic, and the belt is in keeping with the fashions here in Erebor.”

“It’s very stylish.” Faramir turned and twisted to see himself from the back. “Do I wear this to royal occasions?”

Mahdrin looked horrified, then quickly schooled his face before Faramir noticed.

“No, sir, this is an everyday suit.”

“Good thing I have a big work apron,” Faramir murmured.

“You are pleased with it?” Mahdrin asked politely.

“Very, I—”

“I’m having several of these made up,” Mahdrin informed him. “Pika, the formal robes!”

Pika disappeared and returned moments later with two assistants, Ori didn’t know.

“You see, sir,” Mahdrin explained. “I had not yet seen you and did not know how the colors would sit with your features. The design is the same, but we have a selection of colors for you to try.”

The upper tunic part of the robe was much like what Aragorn and Elrond wore with the high, round neck and long sleeves, but the material was heavily embroidered with gems. The tunic did not end at the knees but reached the floor. It was split on either side just below the hips. Under this were matching trousers and boots in the dwarrow style with silver caps.

The robe was entirely black with silver embroidery.

“It’s impressive,” Faramir said gazing at himself in the mirror. “I don’t usually wear black.”

“Indeed,” Mahdrin agreed. “You look positively ill in it, sir. Pika, the bright one.”

Faramir put this one on and took one look at himself and said with finality.

“No.”

Ori suppressed a giggle. The robe was the same as the black one, but Ori thought Mahdrin had taken inspiration from hobbits. The robe was white with broad stripes of bouquets of flowers and ribbons embroidered and set with small round pearls.

“Springtime?” Mahdrin suggested delicately.

“No.”

“Pika!”

The final robe Ori like immediately and Faramir’s face lit up.
“This is perfect,” Faramir said with a grin.

Again the robe was in the same style but shimmered with all the hues of red and orange. There was no embroidery, but for around the neck and the cuffs of the sleeves, a thin line of copper ribbon with copper beads sewn in squares. Mahdrin nodded and Pika brought out a pair of boots dyed scarlet with copper toes. Faramir was all the colors of fall, and tall like a maple tree.

“Do you think I offended Master Mahdrin?” Faramir asked as they stepped out of the shop.

“I think you just shocked him,” said Ori. “I did, too, when he first met me. I didn’t have a tailor, either.”

“I would think, as a lord—”

“I’ve only been a lord for about eight months. Before that I was a back alley scribe in Dale.”

“Really? You seem to fit in so well.”

“That’s what Dwalin says. It didn’t hurt that the Durins took to me quickly.”

“They took to me rather quickly as well. It probably doesn’t hurt that my brother is so popular.” Ori smiled at him.

“My brother is the Bearer of Erebor. Don’t worry, you’ll soon come into your own.”

“I thought the Bearer was female.”

“Dori’s both.”

Faramir was quiet for so long, Ori looked at him with raised brows.

“Are you shocked? I know not all men are all right with that.”

“I’m used to being able to tell the difference.”

“Um… Sorry?”

They mounted up and rode slowly towards the royal cavern. Faramir looked about him, taking in the sights of dwarrow busy at all manner of crafts, the pale light shining in from the very top of the mountain, the red glow from the depths where the forges lay. The inside levels criss-crossed with great streets that met in open markets and shops and others filled with residential areas carved out of the mountain through the ages that the dwarrow had lived there. Ori watched the man as a slow smile came to Faramir’s face. The man paid little attention to his horse as he tried to see everything at once. He finally looked back at Ori, who grinned.

“It’s a lot to take in, isn’t it?” Ori suggested.

“I was born and raised in the White City, which is great among men, but here it seems but a village and I an uncouth yokel.”

Ori laughed.

“Cities are cities. I’m sure you have forges and markets in Minas Tirith. Lots of places to eat and shops to buy things.”

“We do, but this is amazing! How is there light coming from above? Is there some sort of immense light source?”

“Yes,” Ori said breezily. “We call it the sun.”

“Oh, stop teasing and tell me,” Faramir chuckled.

“I was as surprise as you when I first saw it,” Ori confided. “As I told you, I grew up in a back slum of Dale. The first time I ever saw the inside of the mountain was when Dwalin brought me home. Dwalin told me all about the small opening at the very top of the mountain. They can only open it when it’s not storming outside. They refract the light with mirrors and crystals, so everything gets daylight on good days.”

“That is amazing,” Faramir said, a little breathless. “I have heard and read much of your people’s feats of engineering but never dreamed of such. Mithrandir seems to have left out a great deal when I was an occasional pupil of his.”

“Oh,” Ori was instantly curious. “Are you training to be a wizard?”

“Me?” Faramir gasped around laughter. “No, but wizardry isn’t the only thing he knows. Some of it’s even useful.”

“You don’t let him know that, I hope!”

“Certainly not!” Faramir cried, drawing himself up loftily. Then he collapsed into chuckles.
“Bilbo always warns me not to encourage him. The two of them have an incredible mutual irritation society.”

They rode on for a ways. Ori pointed out this and that as they meandered a bit through the mountain.

Finally, Ori asked, “What did you study with Thark- um, Mithrandir? I can’t imagine he’s a patient teacher. He never stays in one place for more than a minute.”

“It wasn’t anything he planned, or I planned, or that my father was privy to, of course. It was my secret, feeble bit of defiance.”

“I can’t imagine he’s a favorite with Mister Denethor.”

Faramir grinned.

“When I was a boy, every time Mithrandir visited the city, my father would growl about it, and warn me not to trust him. Then, as soon as Father’s back was turned I ran off to find Mithrandir and followed him around like a puppy. I discovered, if I asked questions, I only got the standard elven yes and no answer, but if I just kept quiet, and waited, he’d start muttering to himself and then he’d start muttering in my general direction. Bilbo says it’s because Mithrandir can’t resist having an audience.”

Ori burst out laughing.

“Yes, that’s something I’ve noticed, too.”

When they got back to Fundin House, they went to the sitting room.
Ori grabbed a throw pillow off the couch and tossed it to Faramir.

“What’s this for?” Faramir asked.

“To scream into. I figured you needed it.”

“You are too kind, Lord Ori,” Faramir chuckled and threw it back. Nori-Pori leapt on the pillow in mid-air, dropped with it to the floor and tussled with it. Faramir went over and scooped Nori-Pori up, then cradled him like a baby. Ori’s ears were assailed by loud purring.

“Beautiful cat,” Faramir said, nuzzling between the ears.

“They’re the three kittens my cat, Sassy, had. Dwalin rescued them during the scouring of Dale but Sassy was gone.”

“Sassy is a good name for a cat,” Faramir grinned. “What’s this one’s name?”

“That’s Nori-Pori. His fur matches Noris hair.”

“An excellent match. How does Nori the dwarf cope?”

“He ignores it.”

“Sensible.”

“That’s Mask coming through.” Ori pointed as the purring calico wandered into the room, tail high.
Faramir took in Mask who trotted over and sniffed his boots.

“Animals with bisected faces like the are said to be magical.” Faramir tucked Nori-Pori into one arm and reached down and picked up Mask with the other. Mask happily climber onto his shoulder while Nori-Proi industriously licked the man’s nose.

“Thank you, my friend,” Faramir chuckled. “I take it, my morning ablutions were not to your standards?”

Dori bustled in, Powder trailing after.

“Oh, there you are, Fari dear. Pet, did everything go well with Master Mahdrin?”

“Faramir has a brilliant royal robe,” Ori said happily.

“Auntie, I’d like to thank you,” Faramir began.

“Oh pish-tosh!” Dori interrupted. “You need proper clothing while you’re in Erebor. I can’t understand how your father let you go with what you had. It will never do. He must have gone positively silly when he advised you on what you needed.”

“I thought I’d be working with the guild, Auntie, not staying in the royal residence.”

“Where else would you have gone, dear? Now, no more nonsense. You both have just time for a little lunch, then Fari dear is off to play archery with the boys. Off you got to the breakfast parlor.
Where’s Eowyn?”
“We haven’t seen her since before we went to Mahdrin,” Ori explained.
“I’m back!” Eowyn called from the receiving room.
“Oh!” Dori rushed out.
Faramir and Ori looks at each other.
“It’s wonderful,” Faramir said and followed Ori to the parlor. Faramir still carried the cats and rubbed their ears, speaking softly to them. Ori came in to see Fanny, in her coat, peeking in from the window. He grabbed the bowl of fruit from the sideboard and opened the door. Fanny’s trunk snaked around him.
“Ori, why is there an oliphaunt hugging you?” Faramir sounded confused.
Fanny released Ori and she hunkered down further to see into the parlor.
“This is Fanny,” Ori stated proudly. “She works with the circus and lives in our stable. She’s a dear friend of mine. Fanny, this is Faramir. He’s visiting from Gondor.”
Faramir came forward. Nori-Pori leapt from his arms and ran up Fanny’s trunk. Fanny looked Faramir over then patted him on the head with her trunk. Faramir offered his arm and, wrapping her trunk around it, Fanny clasped it for a moment.
“Well met, ma’am,” Faramir said with a bow. “You are the first oliphaunt I have ever been privileged to meet.”
Fanny huffed politely and release him.
“You didn’t see her at Last Harvest?”
“When you’re that drunk, you tend to dismiss enormous oliphaunts, pink or not.”
“Pink?” Ori muttered to himself.
“Pet,” Dori cried coming into the room. “Close that door immediately! There’s a howling gale going in!”
“It’s barely a breeze, Dori, or they would have shut the great window at the top of the mountain.”
“Breeze, my beard! The dwarf who controls that thing is most fickle and taken to strong drink. Fanny! You go back to the stable right now, young lady! You’ll catch a chill and then what am I going to tell Jim and Ruelis?”
Fanny snorted in amusement, the tip of her trunk tugged gently on Ori’s hair. Fanny got to her feet, trumpeted, and trotted away to the stable, the bowl of fruit tucked against her.
“Pet!” Dori scolded, closing and latching the door. “That fruit was for later!”
“Fanny needed a snack,” Ori teased.
“Oh, did she now? I suppose she told you that?”
“It’s cold outside, you don’t want Fanny to take a chill!” Ori cooed innocently.
“Pet, you sit right down, and you, too, Fari dear. Eowyn?”
“Coming, Auntie.”
Eowyn came in. She had changed out of her uniform and wore a plain blue tunic with a brown bodice, over a pair of puffed blue breeches tucked into her brown boot. She dropped a pile of weaponry and leather on a chair nearby and sat down opposite Ori and Faramir.
“Where’s your coat?” Dori demanded.
Eowyn chucked her chin at the pile.
“Quilted leather jacket,” she said, and grinned up at Mistress Dazla as the housekeeper ladled out a bowl of thick, rich stew and passed it to her.
“Thank you, Mistress Dazla,”
“You be sure to wear it, too, young lady,” Mistress Dalza reminded her. Eowyn giggled.
Mistress Dalza turned her eagle eyes of Faramir when she handed him his bowl.
“Thank you, ma’am,” he said politely.
“Blessed Bearer,” Mistress Dalza said.
Dori rounded on Faramir.
“What you have on is fine, Fari dear,”
“Thank you, Auntie.”
“Where is your coat?”
“Upstairs, Auntie.”
“Humph,” Dori glared. “Eat and then go and get it. I must know if it is fit for our mountain air.”
“Air is air, Dori,” Ori protested on Faramir’s behalf.
“Mountain air is colder,” Dori frowned. “You eat up, pet.”
Mistress Dazla and Dori flounced out. Ori looked at Eowyn and Faramir who were both vainly trying to stifle laughter and the three of them ate their lunch.
Ori reflected that Dori had best give birth soon, or the lot of them would be wandering the sitting room, muffled to the ears.

Ori spent the beginning of the afternoon in his work room. He had finished the preliminary sketches and the cartoon on his prepared canvas for his painting and now he went about laying down the basic shades to fill in the shapes of the figures and principle objects around them. After working on a miniature of Sigrid, it came as something of a relief to have what felt like miles of room to depict gigantic people. The canvas was nearly as tall as himself and twice as wide, to suit the monumental nature of such a thing.
He soon found himself dancing from one side of the canvas to another, building up paint. He had to go to the opposite end of the room from time to time, to see what he had done.
He took a cup of tea, with Dori’s long-suffering indulgence, then decided he would go and see all those new shops in Steam Alley, and perhaps search out the shade of blue paint for Thorin’s eyes. He was unhappy with what he’d mixed so far himself. Having been that close to said eyes, he felt the need to capture them on canvas exactly.
Ori missed Dwalin, who had been working what felt like constantly for the past few weeks. Just sleeping beside Dwalin was no longer enough for Ori. He knew he was being greedy, he knew this was the nature of Dwalin’s craft, but he wanted more time with this husband when they were both awake, Dwalin was not subduing idiots, and Ori was not the very self-conscious center of attention.
There was a new public stable in East Dale, very well-kept and well-run. Ori had asked Nori about it before he even considered leaving Honda there. Ori had not been at all surprised to discovered that the stable belonged to a dwarf named Tareet. This was another of Nori’s aliases.
Perhaps it was for the best that Nori never slept more than a few hours at a time.
Ori had dressed in casual clothes, hoping to blend in a little, and now he pulled up his hood as he walked into the street, which bustled with people of all descriptions.

The square in front of Vi and Margr’s house had undergone quite a transformation in itself. The air, for one thing, smelled noticeably cleaner, probably because there was no sewage flowing in the gutters, or coal smoke belching from the chimneys. The flats that fronted on the square had been freshly painted, some had window boxes, though nothing grew in them right now. Every house had glass windows, with sturdy shutters to protect them at night or in case of storm. The one or two shacks that had huddled against the tenements were gone, replaced with small, tidy cottages with little, fenced-in yards.

Ori worried for a moment about the people who had lived in those shacks. He wondered where they had gone.

“Purty, ain’t it.”

Ori turned to face a dam with a pickaxe on her shoulder. She had obviously just come from the mines.

“It is,” said Ori.

“King Bard ordered all th’ houses shored up ‘r replaced, an’ th’ rubbish taken away, an’ th’ sisters paid t’ have it all prettified.”

“The sis- Mistress Vi and Mistress Margr?”

“Aye. Now tha’ they’re heroes, an’ famous f’r their fashions, an’ in with th’ swells, folk come t’ th’ neighborhood jus’ t’ look at their house. Then th’ gawkers go on t’ Steam Alley, t’ th’ pastry shop. Mistress Vi says it gives th’ quality somethin’ nice t’ look at. Or it may’ve been Mistress Margr. Can’t rightly tell one from another.”

“It is a challenge,” Ori admitted.

A window in one of the flats swung open on a hinge and a dam with a pebble in her arms called out, “Are yeh comin’ in, love, ‘r goin’ t’ have yer tea on th’ sidewalk?”

“I’m on me way, me precious gem.”

The dam at the window snorted and shut the window.

“I’ll let you get to it,” said Ori. He grinned as he headed up Steam Alley.

Nor could he believe what he saw there. The flats still rose above the shops on both sides, but instead of pawn shops and rag and bone establishments, now those shops sold books, or stationary and art supplies. iKeyha had a shop, and the Gondorian bakery had taken over the vacant lot next to their building, and Ori saw they had flagged it, and there were benches around a fire pit, cheerily ablaze, where dwarrow, elves and men socialized and sipped steaming hot drinks.

The pub on the corner remained, but even this seemed to have come up in the world.

He stopped when he realized that iKroth had opened a branch here, and went in, completely agog.

The moment he stepped inside, the luscious scents of ink and paper flowed over him, with under notes of pigments and graphite.

And it was busy. It looked like every scribe and apprentice in Dale had decided to descend on the shop at once. They seemed mainly centered around the inks, at the far end of the shop. The sounds and smells told him someone was mixing custom colors, and it impressed him that they had an ink specialist in-house.

He made a note to go back there himself when it was a little less fraught.

Someone had built a winding staircase through the middle of the ceiling, and he looked up into what were once flats, but the walls were gone, and instead he saw sheets upon sheets of handmade paper, hanging on long racks. He recognized these as the sort bookbinders used for end pages. Quickly he climbed to the next floor. At the desk, a manager haggled with a customer over a large order, and shop assistants ran back and forth, assembling the goods. Others waited on customers. A young dam crouched at a lower shelf, apparently restocking pots of glue.

She turned and looked up at him with a smile. By her dress and her hairstyle, Ori guessed she was an unmarried dam of the Stiffbeard clan.

“What may I do for you, good sir?” she asked.

“Nothing at the moment, thank you,” he said. “This is my first time in. It’s quite something. Is it always this busy?”

“Yes, and good thing for me. I just got to Dale, and I needed this job. A pack of us Stiffbeard girls travelled here together, and got a place above the old pub in Steam Alley Track.”

“Welcome,” he said. “And you live here now? In Steam Alley, I mean?”

“Yes, a lot of young dwarrow have moved here.”

“I grew up in Steam Alley,” he said. “I don’t remember it as a neighborhood people wanted to move into, never mind enough people to support a place like this.”

“Oh, there’s a school here now, and Lord Ori, the king’s scribe, grew up here, too. Did you know him?”

“Yes, a little. But I’ve been gone, living under the mountain for quite awhile.”

“It’s considered good luck for journeyman scribes to buy the supplies for their master pieces here,” she said. “Then, they go and put a pretty stone near the gate of the house where he grew up. The dam who lives there now with her badgers, she collects up the nicest ones and she’s put in a path of them through her garden. You should take a look.”

He thanked her, and soon found himself walking down the alley, eaten up with curiosity.

For one thing, he had no idea that Dori had sold the house, never mind to a dam with badgers. For another, he couldn’t imagine calling the muddy track in front of the door and around the sides of the house a garden.

Ori did a double take when he reached the shack where Dam Rittl lived. It had never been much, just a sagging old box in a lot surrounded by riotously growing herbs and other plants. The plants were still there, but the shack was now a tiny house. As he passed, Dam Rittl herself came to the door to admit another dam, who seemed distressed. Dam Rittl looked well-fed, her braids and beard tidy and her tunic clean. Ori had been used to thinking of her as elderly, but now he could see that she wasn’t much older than Dori.

She saw him and called out her greeting as he passed. He smiled at her and waved in return as she ushered the other dam inside.

He heard the badgers before he saw them.

They were playing football in the street in front of his old house, running and screaming, and having a grand time.

The house itself had been done up, much as the rest of the houses. The steps were immaculately clean.

The ball skittered across the ground toward him and he put out his foot and stopped it. The damling chasing after it slowed when she saw him, then smiled.

“Lord Ori!”

“Miss Caris, how are you keeping?”

“I’m keepin’ well, thank yeh. Have yeh come t’ see th’ garden?”

“Yes, actually, I was told all about it at the shop down the road.”

She kicked the ball back to her playmates, grabbed his hand and pulled him along to a neat little stone wall with a gate set in it. Beyond the gate, a mosaic of wonderful colors filled every inch of open ground. The sharp, angled shapes mimicked the ribbon patterns stitched into the hems of tunics, one pattern flowing seamlessly into the next, changing colors as it changed shape.

Ori gasped.
“Oh, bu’ there’s more,” said Caris.
She led him through the gate and around the side of the house where the mosaic continued. Now there were variations in the patterns to allow for the crested wave design commonly called the raven’s head. Around the back of the house, the design slowly dissolved for lack of stones.

“Caris, this is wonderful!”
“Me brother did it. Well, he’s me brother now tha’ Ma’s took him in. He’s dead clever with colors an’ shapes an’ thin’s.”
“So, you live here now.”
“Aye, it’s ever so much be’er than th’ rooms f’r rent place we lived in. We damlings have our bed in own room, an’ Mam has a room an’ a bed t’ herself an’ everythin’! It’s quite posh!”
“You know,” said Ori in a conspiring whisper, “there was a loose floor board in my room, and I used to keep my most secret things in the space underneath.”
“Oooo!” said Caris. “Which was your room?”
“To the right of the top of the steps.”
“Tha’s me room!” Caris gasped.
“Just remember, if you’re going to use it, you have to put things in a metal box so the mice won’t eat them.”

Her eyes narrowed and her expression turned sly.
“I can find a metal box,” she said, and nodded to herself. “Thanks!”
Nori used to sleep.”
“That’s me brothers’ room!” she cried. Then she grinned. “Don’ think I’ll be tellin’ ‘em abou’ it, though.”
“I wouldn’t either,” he agreed conspiratorially.
They walked back around to the front of the house.
“How is your mam?” he asked.
“She’s grand, bu’ she’s workin’ on an order a’ frogs f’r Master Dipfa righ’ now, so she tol’ us no’t come in unless it’s t’ pee or ‘cos we’re bleedin’ t’ death.” “Frogs?” Ori asked. “I thought she was in the trim guild. And why does Dipfa want frogs?
Although, if she could find a way to work them into an outfit, I wouldn’t be surprised, but it would be hard to get dressed with your clothes jumping all over the place. Why are you laughing?”
“Frogs’re sor’ a’ fancywork buttons an’ button holes, made a’ sturdy cord. They don’ hop abou’ on their own!”
Ori took his leave and went back to the Gondorian bakery for an iklar and coffee. It was Gondorian coffee, and thick with more cream and sugar than even dwarrow usually took. Ori couldn’t quite stand a spoon in it, but it was a very near thing.

Then he went to a narrow second hand bookshop, wedged between blocks of flats, and he did restrain himself. Really, he did.
He only bought about a quarter of the store instead of half.
At least, that’s probably what Dwalin would say to tease him.
He carried his favorite five or six back in his satchel, and paid to have the rest delivered to Fundin House.
The dam behind the counter called in her mam from somewhere back of the stacks. The older dam introduced herself, told him it was an honor, and made sure he had her card.
At last he made his way back to the stables, where Honda eyed him and his bulging book bag and snorted.
“It’s not that heavy,” he told her, as he heaved the bag up and tied it to his saddle.
Honda listed almost imperceptibly to that side.
“Oh, knock it off!” he admonished her.
As they left the stable, Ori patted the bag of books.
The dam had promised delivery tomorrow.
He was going to need to put a new bookshelf in his study.
Maybe two.

Ori arrived home to a herd gathered for tea. Kili bounced about the middle of the room.
“It was brilliant, Dori! I’ve never seen a javelin thrown like that”
“It was a javelin throw, Kili!!” Faramir protested. “That’s how I was taught. You make it sound like I fired it out of my ass.”
“I’d by tickets to see that!” Sigrid giggled. Eowyn laughed so hard, she tumbled from her chair.
“It’s not that funny,” Tauriel reproved.
Eowyn calmed down and Faramir offered her a hand. She pulled herself up into her chair and said,
“Far, you remember that time we came to Gondor and Mithrandir was there with his little fire pops as he called them?”
It was Faramir’s turn to roar with laughter.
“Now you have to tell us,” Fili ordered.
Arne moved over, so Ori could sit with him on the sofa. Dori handed Ori a cup of tea followed by a plate of cookies.
“Eomer and I were teenagers,” Eowyn enthused. “Eomer was always trying to be tough and soldierly like Boromir.”
“Mithrandir couldn’t resist giving the four of us something to play with,” Faramir put in.
“He thought we’d be scared,” Eowyn said loftily. “We weren’t.”
“It was right after lunch,” Faramir told them.
“We’d had bean soup.”
“Augh!!” Fili moaned.
“Go on!” Kili interrupted.
“You know there’s going to be a fart involved!” Fili shoved his brother.
“But was it on fire?” Kili demanded.
Faramir choked out, “Worse!”
“Exactly!” Eowyn cried. “My dimwit of a brother dared Boromir to light one of the pops-“
“What are pops e-exactly?” Arne butted in.
“They’re like little fireworks but tiny,” Eowyn explained. “They’re red with a fuse and about this long.”
Eowyn used two fingers to show about a inch. Ori had a feeling something very stupid was about to be revealed.
“Mithrandir always told us,” Eowyn went on, “that once a fuse is lit, it can’t be put out. Eomer said he had a monster fart coming on and he bet Boromir that his fart would put it out.”
“He lit a firework near his bum?” Tauriel demanded.
“If only,” Faramir groaned.
“Both he and Boromir pulled their breeches down and stuck the lit pops in their bums.” Eowyn finished.
“And farted?” Kili asked.
“Yes,” Faramir and Eowyn chorused.
“And?” Sigrid asked a mix of horror and mirth on her face.
“We all made an important scientific discovery,” Eowyn said.
“Indeed?” cried Bujni. “What did you discover?”
“Farts are flammable.” Eowyn giggled.
Everyone fell into laughter.
Thorin, Balin and Dwalin entered the sitting room.
“Idad,” Kili shouted, “guess what?”
"You tried to eat your boots?" Thorin teased. Balin and Dwalin chuckled.
"Idad!" Kili frowned at Thorin. "I haven’t done that since before I was twenty and then, only once."
"The results of flatulence are flammable!" Bujni roared.
That stopped the three in their tracks. Thorin stared at Kili. Dwalin gave the room an eyeball inspection. Balin raised an eyebrow and said gently,
"I hope yeh laddies did yer experiments outside."
"No, no," Fili put in. "Eomer and Boromir found it out, when Eomer was a teen."
"They dropped a cinder down the privy when they farted?" Thorin guessed.
"Tha’ works," Dwalin put in.
"That burns the hair off your arse," Thorin argued.
"I told yeh, yeh had t’ be careful."
Fili and Kili stared at their uncle with huge eyes.
"No, they used a tiny firework Tharkûn gave them," Tauriel explained.
Dwalin and Thorin turned to her.
"Why in all Arda would Tharkûn do that?" Thorin demanded.
"He thought it would scare us," Eowyn said around a scone.
"Eomer dared Boromir to stick a lit one in his ass and fart." Faramir elucidated.
Balin squeezed the bridge of his nose, sighing, as Thorin and Dwalin bellowed with laughter.
"Flatulence aside," Dori said loudly ending all discussion in that vein, "There are decisions to be made."
Dori served tea to the king, the advisor and the captain.
"Which decisions are yeh referrin’ t’, me heart’s delight?" Balin asked, taking his cup as Dori planted a kiss on his brow.
"Tomorrow is our dearest Ori’s birthday."
Dori glowed at Ori, who felt himself redden, he looked at Dori.
"I don’t know what kind of decisions we can make to stop it being my birthday, Dori."
"Now, pet!" Dori gave him an aloof look. "The decisions are what you would like to have for cake, firstly, then what you want for a dinner party and then we need to think about presents."
Ori glanced at Dwalin who grinned.
"I took th’ day off."
"Ori’s Dori," Ori widened his eyes to Dori and tried to look like he was a badger wanting candy.
"Fine!" cried Dori, "Don’t look at me like that. You always get what you want when you have that look. And don’t give that look to Nori either."
As Dori finished, the spymaster strolled in via the mantelpiece.
"Is he givin’ that puppy look?"
"Of course!" Dori proclaimed. "Just as you taught him!"
Nori snickered.
"Proudest moment o’ me life so far."
"Yes, I’m sure it is," Dori huffed. "What is it that you want, pet?"
"May I have a birthday lunch instead of dinner?"
"Of course!" Dori said.
"That sounds lovely, Ori." Thorin smiled at him. "Are you and Dwalin going to the night market?"
"No," said Ori and took refuge in his teacup. "I was hoping for some time to read poetry."
"O course, me love," Dwalin promised.
"Poetry?" teased Faramir. "Is that what it’s called in Erebor?"
"No," giggled Sigrid. "We call it reading the memoirs of Queen Kivi."
"Do I want to know who Queen Kivi is?" Faramir asked.
"I wear her crown," Thorn said loftily.
"She’d a bloody big head f’r a dam," Dwalin added. Thorin kicked Dwalin’s boot. Dwalin kicked back.
“Queen Kivi wrote that racy book,” Kili explained. “The Book of Glittering Diamonds!”

“Is it full of equally racy poetry?” Faramir grinned.

“No, it’s a sex manual,” Arne told him.

Faramir gaped.

“A sex manual? Dwarrow need a manual? Isn’t it just…er… instinctive?”

“No, lad.” Balin smiled. “It’s more o’ a book abou’ possibilities.”

“And advice,” said Dori, “about making sure to stretch one’s limbs properly before proceeding.”

“There is that part,” Oin rumbled, from his seat next to Bujni, “but it’s also very useful when badgers, children as you would say, come of age and become interested in close relationships with others. Queen Kivi is very practical and completely unbiased in any way.”

Faramir looked nonplussed.

“I suppose this is another way of suggesting reading material for me?”

“No, no, Fari dear,” Doi soothed. “Besides, it’s in khuzdul.”

“I’m going to translate it into westron,” Ori said before thinking.

Dori froze.

Ori realized what he’d said and froze as well.

Nori cackled at them.

“Ooo, cat’s outta that bag, now. Better start runnin’, liddle mole,” “Shut up, Nori,” Dori and Ori said together without thinking.

Dori turned to Ori.

“Pet, does Master Brur approve of this project?”

“Yes, Dori,” Ori gulped. “I discussed it with him. We both think it’s important.”

“Important?” Dori gasped.

“Yes, Dori.” Ori put down his cup. “It’s the Second Music, we are a part of the world. Queen Kivi did extensive research on physical relations and not just among dwarrows, but men and elves as well.”

“Oh,” Dori thought this over. “Yes, we do seem to be mixing happily amongst each other.” Dori took a deep breath. “Well, then you are quite right, pet, it is very important. I’m sure your translation will help many people.”

“Thank you, Dori.”

“Yessss. It’s quite important, isn’t it. Perhaps…. Even so, I shall write the preface in the westron translation as well. What do you want for your birthday lunch?” Dori nearly gave the company whiplash with the subject change.

Ori giggled and grinned at Dori.

Dori widened her eyes and laughed.

“Beside chips, you naughty thing!”

“Buttered rolls!” Ori teased.

“Oh! Fine. But mark my words, pet. There’ll be more than just chips.”

“Yes, Dori.”

“And your cake, Dori’s Ori?”

Ori squeezed his eyes shut; images his favorite things ran top speed through his head.

“Xocolātl cake with raspberry jam and…sweetened whipped cream filling,” he decided. There was a chorus of ‘oo’o’s’ and ‘ahhh’s’.

“Very nice, pet. And what do you want on top?”

“Dwalin!” Fili, Sigrid, Kili, and Tauriel shouted.

Ori rounded on them.

“The xocolātl cake is to share with you lot. Dwalin is my personal cake, thank you very much!” Delighted shrieks met this sally.

“Tha’s righ’,” Dwalin added with a silly grin on his face.

Dori giggled.

“Well done, pet. Now what would you like?” Ori squirmed, then,
“That lovely stuff we had with mullis. That xocolātl with hazelnut cream.”

“After cake, please,” Ori decided.

“Excellent,” Thorin agreed.

“Ori,” Bilbo said. “I hope you don’t mind, but I fully intend on helping Dori with your cake.”

Ori grinned, but before he could answer, Agrib came from the receiving room carrying a large crate.

“What’s this, Agrib?” Thorin asked.

Dwalin rose and relieved the dwarf of his burden.

“Came on a wagon train from the Iron Hills, your majesty. The label read that it’s to be delivered to you as there are instructions, but it’s for her majesty…Red Queen.”

Thorin groaned.

“Dain, why can you never just let an idea stay in your head for once?”

Dwalin pulled the lid off the crate and there was a letter in Dain’s crabbed hand, a rolled sheaf of papers, and what looked like a pile of buckles lying on a bed of straw.

Ori remembered.

“Thorin, is it the harness to hold Red Queen’s eggs while she flies?”

Thorin was reading Dain’s letter.

“It is exactly that, Ori. Included are the instructions.” Thorin nodded his head at the sheaf of papers. Balin removed the roll and spread out several sheets. Bujni hurried over and peered around Balin’s shoulder.

“This migh’ actually work, lad,” Balin said slowly.

“His Majesty, King Dain’s directions are most exhaustive,” Bujni murmured.

“Roäc?” called Thorin. “Are you about?”

The raven flitted over from the kitchen, a piece of cookie in his beak. Roäc swallowed this and cocked an eye at Thorin.

“‘S’up?”

“Dain has sent a gift for Red Queen, but as brooding requires an invitation among bone breakers, would you ask her if we might see her?”

“What he send?” Roäc asked and hopped onto the side of the crate. “Brilliant! Restraints! Blu’s gonna get kinky!”

“No, you sheep’s ass,” Thorin growled.

“Baaaaaa!” Roäc cackled and flew off.

Thorin read over the letter again and Dis, Jani and Bofur arrived home and Gloin, Gridr, Dipfa, and Binni came through the other sitting room door from their home.

“What’s to do?” asked Gridr.

Gloin and Binni came to where Bujni was studying the instructions and carefully taking the pieces out and examining them before he placed them out to fit together. Ori frowned over the assemblage. With the pieces laid out like this, he could see how they would form a harness on Red Queen’s body. Dain had thought things through. The buckles could fit loosely or be tightened. Faramir and Eowyn came over and sat on the floor. Neither could read the instructions, but Dain’s diagrams were exact.

Bujni looked over the bits of leather and tiny chains and began to giggle.

“Bujni, my beloved son, as much as Oin and I love you, you are too big for us to carry you in a harness.”

Bujni released Dipfa and laughed.

“Beloved Da, this is a gift from Dain.”

“We are not carrying Dain around either,” Binni replied. Oin swore. Bujni went back to the pieces he had laid on the floor.

“This is for Red Queen,” Thorin told them.

Ori rose and went to where Bujni was studying the instructions and carefully taking the pieces out and examining them before he placed them out to fit together. Ori frowned over the assemblage.
“I think this will work,” Eowyn said thoughtfully. “The chains are mithril and so won’t weigh her down.”

Dori inspected the pieces.
“It was very clever of my brother to use the pale brown for the leather. It will match dear Red Queen’s feathers nicely.”
“Pays to accessorize,” said Nori.
Butter and Sugar perked their ears. Romy barked and Sugar gamboled off to the breakfast parlor.
They heard Miss Larit speaking to someone and the meadow door open and close.
Roäc flapped in and Red Queen strutted in, followed by the wargs.
“Sister Queen,” Thorin greeted her. “Your eggs?”
“One of our daughters is sitting and Baluchistan is supervising her,” Red Queen said airily. “We understand Brother King Dain has sent something?”
“Yes,” Thorin said and moved to her side. “He included a letter for you as well.”
Thorin held up a small sealed paper. Red Queen took this in her beak and, with a talon, broke the seal. She held the paper in his talon and looked at it, before stating,
“Brother King, please assist us. We do not know your written language.”
“Of course.” Thorin took the letter she held out to him and read aloud, running his finger under the runes as he read, Red Queen following along as he did.

Salutations Sister Queen,
As discussed, I have made an egg/nestling carrying pouch for you. If it doesn’t please you, pay it no mind as it is an Experiment.
Best,
Dain. ooxx

“What are those circles and diagonal crosses?” she demanded.
“Circles are hugs and the crosses are kisses,” Thorin said gravely.
“Oh, how nice. Hmmm,” Red Queen paused then shook her feathers. “As Brother King Dain has been so kind as to attempt such, we shall try his experiment.”
She regally strolled over to the pieces laid out.
“How does this experiment work?”

Dipfa, after reading over the instructions, and with Bujni’s assistance, carefully put the harness together and dressed Red Queen in it. Ori had to admit to himself it was very clever. The straps did not hinder any movement and yet fitted snugly enough to Red Queen’s body. Once in the harness, Red Queen flapped and paraded about, examining it. Sigrid and Mistress Dazla came in with a long mirror from Dori’s and Balin’s room. They held it while Red Queen inspected herself from all sides. Dipfa hovered and made minute adjustments.
“That’s amazing,” Kili admired.
“Is it comfortable?” Tauriel asked.
“Yes, we hardly know we are wearing it,” Red Queen replied, appraising herself.
“Here’s the pouch,” Dis said, lifting the item from the crate. “And look here, it’s been padded and there’s other note.”
Dis read aloud,

This pouch has been padded warmly with down from the ravens of the Iron Hills in honor of the friendship between ravens and bone breakers.

Dis opened the top flap and looked in, touching gently.
“This is lovely, Red Queen, look.”
Red Queen went to Dis and looked in.
“Such lovely down. So soft. We are deeply touched by the kindness of the ravens of the Iron Hills. Ori?”
“Would you like me to write to them for you, ma’am?”
“Please. Perhaps a plate of your…your…ink, yes, ink, so we may put our talon mark upon it.”
“Certainly, ma’am.”

Ori put his satchel on the dining table and dug out a page of cream parchment and black ink. He sat down and turned to Red Queen.

“I’m ready.”
Red Queen a-hemmed and began.

“To the generous and honored ravens of the Iron Hills.
We have received your gift with delight and are deeply touched by your kindness.
All hail the mighty friendship of all bone breakers and ravens.”

“Excellent,” Gloin approved.
“Yes,” Thorin agreed.

Fili fetched out a platter and Ori set out a selection of inks.
“What color would you like, ma’am?” he asked as solemnly as he could.

Red Queen inspected the tiny bottles and decided on the red. She hopped up on the table. Ori poured ink into the platter. Fili and Ori carefully helped Red Queen to place her foot in the ink, then raise it. Fili blotted the drops and Red Queen triumphantly placed her foot where Ori directed. After a moment, she lifted it at his instruction and the print was perfect. Dori and Jani washed off the remaining ink with a soapy cloth.

“We thank you,” she acknowledged with a slight, regal bow of her head. “And perhaps a second, brief note to Brother King Dain?”

“Of course, your majesty,” said Ori.

“Write it in the purple ink. It seems to us he will like that.”

Ori got down to business right away, all the while wondering if Red Queen understood the meaning of ‘purple prose’.

“Oi, our Red Queen!” Jani called. “Come have a looksee. Our Dain put in sumthin’ fra’ that Ulfr.”

Ori glanced over to where Jani was holding a large, flat metal box. It was open and he could see many small parcels of leather.

“What are these?” Red Queen inquired cocking an eye at them.

‘Cordin’ t’ th’ note. Yeh bend ’em an’ they give off heat.” Jani said. She did so, then shouted.

“Mahal’s balls, they do! Ulfr’s a bloody genius, but I ain’t tellin’ him!”

“He knows,” Balin commented.

“Here.” Jani tuned back to Red Queen. “Yeh tuck one a’ them in yer pouch when yer flyin’ an’ yer eggies won’t get cold.

“An excellent notion,” Red Queen admired. She took the leather parcel in her beak and tucked it into the bag of down at her breast. “Master Dipfa, if you would accompany us to our nest, we shall place our eggs in this pouch.”

“I’ll take you up,” Fili offered. “There a door to the aeries from the courtyard.”

Fili led Dipfa out and Red Queen, after approving of Ori’s letter to Dain and adding her talon mark, exited through the breakfast parlor. Sigrid went with her to close the door.

Dori turned to Dis.

“Now, Dis dear, I know you’re taking our Fari to meet with the heads of the printing guild tomorrow. Will you all be back for lunch?”

“Oh yes,” Dis assured.

Faramir looked surprised.

“But, your high- Dis, surely I will be too busy with the printing work to return.”

Everyone turned and stared at the young man.

“Faramir,” Thorin said quietly, “here in Erebor, it is written into all guild laws that time must be given for meals. You may work all you wish, but you are allowed time to go home and have a meal.”
Faramir paused, then nodded.
“Of course, I was forgetting. Your work is not governed by daylight.”
“It’s takes a little to get used to,” Eowyn said lightly.  “The dwarrow may work all hours of the day as they wish. Being soldiers, you and I know a bit about that, but things here are not dependent on light.”
“Then I am delighted to be able to attend your birthday lunch, Ori,” Faramir grinned.
“Good!” Ori said warmly.
Sugar bounded out to the receiving room, Kili ran after her. The sound of the door was heard. Roäc flew in and landed on the tea table. He seized the last half cookie as Mistress Dale removed the plate.
“Here we are!” Red Queen swaggered in. The pouch on her breast was bulgy and Baluchistan fluttered about her. Dipfa followed proudly.
“Sister Queen,” Thorin greeted her. “Is the gift a success?”
“Indeed it is, Brother King,” Red Queen cooed. “The little sacks have made the pouch as warm as my nest.”
She went straight to Dori.
“Would you like to see them?”
Dori squeaked delightedly as Red Queen flipped back the cover and allowed Dori to peer in.
“Oh, how pretty!” Dori enthused. “Like clotted cream with little red speckles all over!” Red Queen nodded and Dori moved away, so everyone could crowd around to see.
“Your majesty,” Gridr asked, “may I keep any large pieces of shell at hatching?”
“Of course, we have no use for them.”
“Thank you.”
Ori took his turn with Dwalin. He saw three eggs, a little larger than goose eggs, nestled in the black fluff. Dori was right, the eggs were very pretty.
“Do you know yet if they will be male or female or both?” Ori asked politely.
“We do not,” Red Queen said happily. “It is our special surprise.”
“They’ll be loved!” Baluchistan caroled.
Bilbo and the faunts came in. Bilbo was carrying a basket.
“Red Queen!” Bilbo said, surprised. “Have your eggs hatched already?”
“No, Consort. Brother King Dain has gifted us with this delightful egg carrier.”
Frodo and Sam rushed over to admire and Red Queen leaned forward, so they could see inside.
“Ooo,” Sam enthused. “You made big eggs!”
Thank you, nestling.” Red Queen gently ruffled both faunts’ hair with her beak.
“Will you be joining us for dinner?” Bilbo asked.
“Oh yes,” Dori cooed.
“If Brother King Thorin is agreeable to catching us up on the news of the Kingdoms?” Red Queen looked over at Thorin.
“Naturally, Sister Queen.”
Ori shooed everyone away to wash up for dinner.

Ori went into the bedroom and Dwalin closed the door behind them. He took Ori in his arms.
“Miss yeh, love,” Dwalin murmured, kissing Ori’s hair. Ori hugged tight.
“I miss you, too! It seems like forever since we had a conversation.”
“I’m more than pleased yeh decided t’ take tomorrow afternoon. I’ve a pressie f r yeh.”
Ori giggled, “Don’t tell me things like that, I’ll go looking for it!”
“Yeh won’t find it as it’s no’ here yet. Yeh’ll jus’ have t’ wonder, me love.”
“My buffalo,” Ori laughed and stepped away to dump his satchel on the bed, before flopping on it himself.
Dwalin followed and leaned down and pulled off Ori’s boots. He sat nearby and began to massage Ori’s feet. Ori groaned happily. Nori-Pori and Mask climbed up and sat on Ori’s chest. Killer bounced up on the bed, followed by Kihshassa.
“The only ones we’re missing are Garnet and Quartz,” Ori mused.
“Aye, too bad they din’ fancy havin’ their nes’ here, eh?”
“It would be cute and we could talk to them,” Ori said idly, “but they probably prefer having the rest of the flock around them.” Ori nudged Dwalin with his toe.
“I can’t wait to see their babies.”
Dwalin chuckled at him, “Didn’t think yeh liked babies much.”
“These are feathery babies.”
“An tha’ makes a difference, eh?”
“Yes,” Ori cried and hugged the cats, who objected around purring. “We have furry babies and soon feathery ones!”
“Bes’ kind,” Dwalin agreed firmly.
“I’m glad Dori’s having the babies. I couldn’t cope.”
“Me, neither. Mindin’ Fili an’ Kili was more than enough.”
Ori laughed.
“They didn’t change much, did they?”
“Only go’ bloody bigger.”
Ori ruffled the fur of both cats the wrong way and they got off him, indignant. He sat up.
“Here, it’s your turn.”
Dwalin kicked off his boots and shifted further up the bed. Ori began massaging his right foot.
Dwalin fell back on the bed with a grunt of appreciation.
“Better?”
“Aye, tha’s wonderful, love.”
Ori’s birthday!

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Guests? Check! Presents? Check! Cake? Checkcheckandcheck! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same darrow time, same darrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori opened his eyes as he heard Dwalin say, “Aye, tha’s grand, brother.” Ori sat up as Dwalin settled the tea tray on the bedside table. Balin looked pleased. “There yeh are, wee brother, an’ many happy returns a’ th’ day.” “Thank you Balin. You brought us tea.” “Aye, well, yer havin’ yer special day an’ our Dori wants t’ play in th’ kitchen over yer breakfast, so take yer own time.”

Balin pattered out, taking Killer and the cats with him. As the door clicked shut, Ori giggled. “I’m almost afraid of what Dori might be doing.” “Oh aye?” Dwalin said and leaned over him. Ori put his arms about Dwalin’s neck and kissed him long and lingeringly. When they released each other Dwalin sat up and poured out two cups of tea. Ori sat up and rearranged the pillows for them. Dwalin handed Ori his mug and leaned back with his arm across the pillow tops. Ori snuggled under Dwalin’s arm. “Happy birthday, me love.” “Thank you.” Ori cocked a teasing eye up at his husband. “Is my present here yet?” Dwalin slewed a look at him. “Yeh thin’ I’d tell yeh if it was?” Ori swallowed his tea and made to get up. Dwalin grabbed him with his free arm and pulled him in for a tight hug. “No, yeh don’, me wee scribe.” “Is it still in the receiving room?” Ori teased. “Donno, love.” Ori knelt up, his arms akimbo. “You don’t know if it’s here yet, do you?” Dwalin just chuckled and sipped his tea. Ori sighed and crawled back and snuggled up to him. “Fine.” “Uh-oh, ‘M in trouble now. He’s usin’ th’ ‘F’ word.” “Yes, you are,” Ori told him, attempting to look fierce and failing, then he remembered. “My buffalo, I should warn you.” “Oh aye?” “Dori gets really maternal on my birthday.” “More so than usual?” “Very maternal. Don’t be surprised if I’m reduced to a pebble.” “So a wee bi’ more than usual?” “If Dori does what he always does. Then Dori and Nori do this thing they do.” “Tha’ a lo’ a’ detail, me love.”
“If I know my Dori, he’ll wait until everyone’s there.”
“Even be’er.”
“I’ll sit righ’ nex’ t’ yeh as usual.”
“You’re not going to defend me?”
“‘Gainst our Dori? Tha’d be asking’ f’r death.”
“Dwalin!”
“Wha’s he gonna do? Push yer face int’ yer food?”
“No, he makes a special birthday breakfast!”
“Nuthin’ wrong wi’ tha’.”
“You haven’t seen it,” Ori groaned.

They had a second cup of tea in companionable silence until Kihshassa woke and crawled up and into their laps for love and skritchels. They both got up, washed and dressed and Ori dragged his feet as they went to the breakfast parlor. Ori could hear the voices of pretty much everyone. Dori had obviously made sure of an audience. Ori stopped before the doorway, gave Dwalin a look, and heaved a sigh. They went in “There’s the birthday boy!” Nori roared and leapt to his feet.

Choruses of good wishes from around the table. Dori had invited Bard and his family to witness. Of course he had.

He closed his eyed tight.
Nori seize ahold of Ori, ripped up his tunic and blew a giant raspberry on Ori’s exposed belly.
“Nori!”
Nori grabbed him into a hug and began forcing him to jump the number of Ori’s years. Dwalin laughed helplessly and everyone else enjoyed counting with Nori.

“Sebenitee-four!” Nori bellowed.
“May I sit down now?” Ori tried to put up a cold, indignant front, but blew it when he giggled.
Nori pushed him over to his chair.
“There you go, me liddle moley-poo. Dor!”
Dori stuck her head out of the kitchen, saw Ori and squealed.
“My little badgerling!”
Dori rushed out, embraced Ori, and covered his face with seventy four kisses. Everyone helped count. Dori finished, then planted an extra big kiss on Ori’s nose.

“And one to grow on!” Dori cried. “Your breakfast is just about ready, pet, and then I’m going to spank you.”

Dori bounced back into the kitchen. Ori slumped in his chair.

“Doreeee! Why? You haven’t spanked me since I was forty. I’m too old to be spanked!”

Dwalin was face down on the table laughing. Ori looked at Sigrid. She was grinning maniacally.

She turned to Eowyn.

“Just wait. It gets better.”
“No it doesn’t!” Ori grumped. He glared at her. “Traitor!”

“Happy birthday, Ori,” said Thorin from the head of the table. “And many happy returns of the day.”

“Thank you, Thorin. And thank you for being polite about it.”

Thorin snickered as Bilbo and the faunts fell into giggles.

Thranduil looked at Bard. Ori could almost see the question mark above the king-father’s head.

“Birthday traditions in our families,” Bard elucidated. “Dori always make the breakfast for the lucky one.”

Bard grinned at Ori who made a face at him.

“Come now, Ori,” Bard chuckled. “It’s been a while since Dori could celebrate like this.”

“Couldn’t he wait for Tilda’s?” Ori suggested.

“Mine’s not until late spring,” Tilda reminded him. “That’s too long to wait.”

“Not to me it’s not,” Ori muttered.
Someone knocked at the meadow door. Dori had had the builders in install the winter doors, and they and the windows were covered in new curtains of thick green velvet with gold embroidery. Fili, Frodo, and Sam rushed over to let Red Queen in while keeping the curtains covering the door. Baluchistan escorted her, and Roäc breezed in after.

“Birthday lad!” Roäc greeted Ori and landed on Ori’s shoulder and tweaked his ear. “That’s from our Quartz an’ our Garnet.”

“Tell them thank you,” Ori laughed and laid his hand gently on the raven and pressed the bird to his cheek. “That’s from me to Quartz and Garnet.”

“We have arrived to wish you another successful year of life,” Red Queen announced and tapped Kili’s cheek with her beak and he readied a chair for her.

“Well done, laddie,” Baluchistan echoed.

“Here you go, pet!” Dori caroled form the kitchen and swept in with a plate. Dori placed it lovingly before Ori.

Ori wanted to crawl under the table. On the plate lay the usual pancake shaped like a dwarf. This time, instead of raisins, the dwarf had blueberry eyes and a smile made of blueberries and he had raspberry buttons down his front. He lay in a pool of melted butter and hot maple syrup. Dori had cut a sausage to look like an axe and a strip of bacon for a pick.

“Ori!” shouted Nori. “He’s dead fierce lookin’! Bedder sort him out quick, our pebble!”

Ori started to giggle in spite of himself.

“Remember, you have to leave the head for last!” Bain shouted.

Ori stuck out his tongue, then eyed Nori. Nori waggled his eyebrows. All was ready for a command performance.

Ori put on a fierce grimace and, with his fork, chopped half a leg off.

“Auuuugh!” Nori threw his voice to the pancake. “Me leg! Yeh rotten brat! I’ll get yeh!”

The Bardlings cheered and Bard and Dori burst out laughing. The Durins, the king-father and Faramir and Eowyn stared.

Ori chewed the leg up. Dori’s pancake was delicious. He looked the pancake over and then ate the head of the axe off.

“Me axe!” Nori shouted from the pancake. “Ooo, I’m goin’ t’ smack yeh wi’ me handle when I ge’ a chance!”

Ori enjoyed the sausage axe head and went for the arm holding the sausage handle.

“Mahal’s balls! I’ll kick th’ handle a’ yeh! I still go’ me other arm!”

Ori saw from the corner of his eye that everyone at the table was now thoroughly enjoying the spectacle, Dwalin all but crying with laughter. Ori ate the bottom half of the other leg. Nori as the pancake bellowed with rage. Ori disposed of the rest of the axe and the rest of both legs. The pancake yowled and threatened to whack Ori with his remaining arm. Ori considered his options, then ate the other arm and the bacon pick. As the pancake cursed him, Ori gave Nori a sly look and viciously chopped off the very bottom of the torso. Nori screamed.

“Me family jewels!” Nori’s voice rose by two octaves. “Yer worse than ’n orc!”

Everyone shouted and laughed.

Ori disposed of the body and watched Nori as he flipped the head over. The pancake’s voice became muffled but no less vulgar. Ori used his knife and fork to leave only the berry face on the plate and ate the head. Nori’s voice flew impossibly higher. Ori turned to Dwalin.

“Would you hold my beard, please, my love?”

Dwalin snickered and complied. Ori leaned over the plate. Dori realized what he was going to do and shrieked. Ori sucked all the berries and most of the butter and syrup off the plate in one go.

Bain, Tilda, Fili, Kili, and Gimli cheered.

“Pet!” Dori cried. “I never taught you such dreadful manners! And in front of the king! Three kings!”

“I’m not a king anymore, Dori,” Thranduil reminded.

“Don’t help!” Dori scolded.

Dis and Jani leaned on each other, while Bilbo wiped tears of laughter from his eyes.
“And you, our deary, shouldn’t have allowed it!” Dori was grasping a straws by appealing to Dwalin.

“Had t’,” Dwalin teased. “Don’ wan’ t’ be wastin’ th’ day combin’ syrup outa his hair.” Dori huffed and poured more tea for Balin.

Red Queen ruffled her feathers, accepted the sausages Baluchistan brought over for her, and observed,

“It is pleasant to see that on the yearly anniversary of your hatching, you keep the tradition of allowing your prey to put up a good fight before disposing of it.”

“See Ori’s Dori,” Ori said. “I was honoring the pancake you made me.”

“Eat some bacon, pet.”

“Yes, Dori.”

“Humph,” Dori said, then a light came into her eyes.

“Are you finished, pet?”

Ori swallowed the last piece of slice of bacon he’d grabbed.

“Yes. Oh! No, Dori!”

Dori swanned around the table.

“Up you get, you naughty badger!”

“I’ll hold ‘im for you, Dor!” Nori walked right through the table and grabbed Ori out of his chair.

Ori groaned and made a terrible face at Nori who laughed at him. Dori lifted the back of Ori’s tunic and carefully spanked him once for each year and one very large spank to grow on. They didn’t hurt, of course, but everyone at the table shouted and laughed and help Dori count.

“There!” said Dori proudly. “That’s all the naughtiness spanked out of you for the year!”

“I haven’t been that naughty!” Ori complained.

“Yes, you have!” Tilda shouted. “You ran away with Dwalin!”

“Exactly!” Dori agreed.

Thorin leaned over to Bilbo.

“Remind me not to turn my back on Dori on my birthday. At my age, it would take all day.”

“No one spansk you on your birthday,” Bilbo agreed. He added, “Except me.”

After breakfast, Faramir and Dis rose to leave for their meeting with the printing guild. Faramir grinned at Ori.

“Will Nori be vocalizing your lunch?”

“Ha!” Nori shouted.

Dori smacked Faramir’s bottom with a tea towel.

“Now you hold your tongue, our Fari! You are not to encourage Nori and Ori to misbehave!”

Faramir snickered.

“You hurry up, Fari dear. Dis is waiting,” Dori added for effect.

Faramir looked at Dis, who was busily employed in kissing Jani for the morning.

“Of course, we’re in a hurry,” he quipped.

Eowyn pushed him.

“Don’t you start.” He laughed and playfully pushed back. They tussled in a pushing contest.

“Headbutt!” Gimli shouted in Khuzdul.

“No!” Thorin and Dwalin shouted together.

Eowyn did it anyway. She wasn’t tall enough and they reeled apart.

“Idiot!” Dwalin scolded her.

She held a hand to her forehead, giggling and complaining that it hurt. Faramir pressed his hand over his mouth. Thorin pried it away and inspected him. Fortunately, Eowyn’s head had done no damage to the young man’s face.

“Eowyn?” Faramir asked worriedly. “Are you hurt?”

She took her hand away, laughing. There was a tiny cut in her forehead.
“What’s that from?” he demanded.
“Your tooth!”
“I’m sorry-” he started.
“Don’t be!” she said merrily. “If anyone asks, I’ll just tell them you tried to bite my head off.”
“Eowyn!” he cried, then started to laugh. “No one will believe you!”
Red Queen ruffled her feathers into order.
“This is the oddest mating ritual we have ever seen.”
Glorfindel breezed in to talk to Dwalin.
“What happened to your head, our Winnie?”
Eowyn glanced at Faramir and said,
“Faramir tried to bite my head off.”
Glorfindel looked at the mark, now bleeding slightly, then at Faramir.
“You missed.”
“It was an accident,” Faramir explained, then shot a look at Eowyn. “I’ll do better next time.”
“Don’t,” Glorfindel advised. “You’ll dislocate your jaw getting around a head that big.”
Eowyn kicked Glorfindel on the right greave.
“That bit’s armored, you know.” The tall elf regarded her.
“Don’t worry,” she cooed. “I’ll aim higher next time.”
“Badgers!” Dori cried.
“Captain Dwalin,” Glorfindel greeted Dwalin.
“Faramir, come on,” Dis called, heading for the door.
“Balin,” Thorin said. “We’re due at winter stores inspection.”
“Aye, lad, I’m with yeh.”

Ori smiled at the now empty room. He sat down in the comfy chair to the right of the fire and curled his legs under him. It was his birthday and he could do anything he wanted. Dwalin wouldn’t be long with Glorfindel, as Dwalin had the day off. Ori thought back on all his projects. He had the royal portrait for the contest, for one. Translating Queen Kivi’s book need to be done as well. He was nearly finished with the miniature of Sigrid. He hadn’t even started on the diary of Lady Galadriel’s mother. He frowned, then popped up and went through to his office.

He unlocked his desk drawer and unwrapped the tissue paper he’d wound around the book for safe keeping. It wasn’t a very big book, especially for someone who had lived for thousands of years. He had kept his own journal since he’d started as Thorin’s scribe, and he had already filled several books. He tentatively opened the diary. The inside cover bore an inscription.

I, Lady Eärwen of Olwë, the Teleri of Aman, aged one hundred and three years, have decided to keep this book to record my inner most reflections.

Each page after held an entry.

Dear Diary, my half brother-in-law Fëanor is an ass.
Dear Diary, Father says we are not going on holiday to Beriland after all.
Dear Diary, I have neglected you dreadfully. Tomorrow I wed my true love, Farafin. He is very beautiful and kind and brave. I am very excited. He wooed me delightfully. He sang many songs to me and we danced together at a party thrown by his brother, Findis. We shall settle in Aman and I hope to bear him children.

After this, Eärwen became far more interesting, the entries much longer and the handwriting extremely small. She was particular in her history of the elves from the First Age, and very particular about her children and their offspring. Ori giggled over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen lamented over how Eärwen admitted that Galadriel would be an excellent queen, as she grew wise and powerful, but wished for her to stay in Aman. Ori read on about Fëanor and his wrong doings. He frowned over the descriptions of Morgoth and Sauron, and Sauron’s forging of the rings to trick the peoples of Middle Earth. She told of the sack of Dorithath by the Firebeards, who Thingol had refused to pay for the necklace. Then she got on to meatier stuff.

Dear Diary, we visited Doriath today and met two young males. One is named Celeborn and the other, Oropher, Celeborn’s cousin. Celeborn is handsome, full of quiet wisdom, and Oropher is also handsome, but restless and inclined to combat. Oropher has established himself deep in a forest on the far side of the Misty Mountains. He is wedded to a Noldor lady whose name I do not recall. He longs to challenge the great worms of the northern wastes of Middle Earth. Oropher, despite his physical strength, is rather clumsy and pays little attention to his dress. At luncheon, Oropher ate with his fork in his right hand and a large spoon in the other. He uses the spoon to leverage food to his mouth. I wonder if perhaps he has trouble with his vision. He missed his mouth often. I pity those who are charged with laundering his clothing. When he rose and left the table with his cousin, he forgot to removed the serviette from where he had tucked it into the belt of his robe. Celeborn is somewhat enamored of a young soldier named Haldir.

Ori choked and had to reread that sentence several times. It couldn’t be, he thought. There must be several soldier elves named Haldir. Musn’t there?

...enamored of a young soldier named Haldir, which my Galadriel finds excessively amusing. Celeborn is of a retiring nature, and not at all adept in his attempts at wooing Haldir. Haldir has yet to notice he is being wooed.

Oropher has brought his first born with him. I believe the child is called Thaniu? Barduil? No, that can’t be right. At any rate, the child can toddler quite respectably and is in constant motion, but has yet to comprehend the idea of walls. He seems to think that if he continually walks into them they will, at some point, simply disappear. Oropher doesn’t explain things, merely goes to the child turns him in another direction and off he toddles again until he hits another wall. It is quite like watching one of those funny clockwork toys that are created by dwarfs.

Ori had to close the book at that point, he was laughing so hard. There was a knock on his office door. “Coming,” he called and hurriedly rewrapped the book, stowed it back in the drawer and locked it. He went to the door, unlocked it, then opened it to find Mistress Dazla waiting. “Lord Ori,” she greeted him with a raised eyebrow. “I need this door to remain unlocked so my staff may clean it.”

Ori’s heart sank. He kept the door locked as he didn’t want anyone to see his work in progress. “Oh, don’t worry, Mistress Dazla,” he chirped. “I keep it clean myself. I don’t want to give you or your staff any more work.”

“You clean it yourself?” Mistress Dazla repeated in a flat tone. “Yes.” Ori grasped at the nearest straw. “I do know how. I was raised by Dori.”

Mistress Dazla looked him over for a moment. “Let me see, Lord Ori.”

“Um…”

Mistress Dazla made a shooing motion. Ori sigh and backed up to let her in. “Please don’t look at what I’m working on, ” he pleaded.

“My only interest, Lord Ori is that this house be in top order.”

She moved around, looked over the chairs, inspected the properly plumped cushions, and ran her finger along a shelf. Ori was relieved he’d dusted it the other day, after he’d cleared up his painting tools.

Mistress Dalza turned.
“I shall provide you with a supply of old sheets, Lori Ori. You will use them to cover your work. You may keep the door locked, as I will obtain and hold another key to this room and I will see that nothing you are busy with is looked at or in anyway disturbed. Will that suit?”

Ori let out the breath he had been holding.
“Thank you, Mistress Dazla. I’m sorry it bothered you.”
Mistress Dazla beamed at him.
“You are never a bother, dear Lord Ori. Now, you have just another hour before everyone has to gather for your birthday lunch. It will not do to have the birthday dwarf being late.”
“No ma’am.” Ori grinned. “I promise.”
She patted his cheek and went out, murmuring about what a lovely young gentledwarf he was. Even though he was alone, Ori blushed. Now knowing he didn’t have much time, he settled for checking on Sigrid’s miniature. It had dried completely. All it needed was a coat of clear finish for protection, then he could fit it into the locket she had given him. He looked at the painting critically. There was really nothing he could fix. He was rather pleased with how he had capture the light in her eyes. He put it down and decided he would show it to her that afternoon. If there was something she didn’t like then he wold change it. He turned just as the door opened again. It was Miss Oqizla. She was carrying several folded sheets and had her eyes tightly closed.
“Coverings for your work, Lord Ori,” she piped.
Ori hurried to her side.
“Thank you, it’s alright, you can’t see anything from here,”
“Mistress said we’re not to peek until you’ve got it all covered,” she informed him.
Ori suppressed a giggle and thanked her. She whisked out. Ori put the pile under his desk, keeping out four. With two, he was able to completely cover the painting for the contest. The other works in progress only needed a sheet each. He smiled and went out. leaving the door ajar so the staff would know the room was ready. Really, he reflected he should have asked Mistress Dazla in the first place.

He went through to his room and found Dwalin changing his shirt.
“Is Glorfindel happy with the arrangements?” he asked and came to Dwalin’s side. He put his arms about Dwalin bare midriff and hugged him, sighing as Dwalin’s arms slid about him.
“Aye, he was jus’ talkin’ abou’ th’ up comin’ festivals. Gotta have room f’r folk t’ muck abou’ an’ keep safe. Keep th’ badgers away fr’m any wantin’ t’ drink an’ figh’.” Dwalin buried his face in Ori’s face. “How’s me birthday lad?”
“Galadriel wasn’t joking when she said her mother’s diary would have dirt on Oropher.”
Dwalin pulled back and peered at him, a twinkle in his eyes.
“Wha?”
Ori ginned.
“Apparently Oropher was somewhat clumsy.”
“Somewha’?”
“He used to miss his mouth a lot, when he was eating.”
Dwalin roared with laughter then shook his head.
“Yeh be’er keep tha’ diary locked up, me love. If Thranduil finds out-“
“Finds out what? as a toddler, he ran into walls constantly?”
“What?”
Ori giggled,
“Oh yessss. Thranduil was a toddler in constant motion. When he ran into walls, he just kept on banging into them until someone came and turned him in another direction.”
Dwalin fell back on the bed, roaring. Ori felt very pleased with himself and clambered on the bed and sat astride his husband.
“No leaking information, captain.”
Dwalin tried look serious but couldn’t manage it.
“So, me wee scribe terror, where were they when this was in th’ works?”
“Doriath. After the Firebeards got pissed off with King Thingol, but before the second sacking by Fëanor. She and her husband Farafin, were visiting and having a lunch party with her friend Elwing. Galadriel was with them and they were introduced to Oropher and Celeborn at that time.”

“Mahal’s balls, tha’ were during’ th’ Firs’ Age!”

“Yes, apparently Haldir was there, too.”

“Shit, tha’s one old book.”

“I know. The pages are very thin and delicate. I’m so excited!” Ori enthused.

They heard Dori calling for them and went through to the sitting room.

Mistress Dazla set the table, and Tilda hopped around in front of Brur, who fired addition problems at her. She shouted the answers back.

Bilbo came through and hugged Ori.

“Are you ready for your chips, m’lord?”

“Yes! What are the rest of you having?”

Bilbo laughed and kissed his cheek.

“You have to share this time, but don’t worry, there’s plenty!”

“Ori!” bellowed Brur. “Th’ housekeeper says yeh were laughin’ like ‘n idiot earlier, wha’ were so funny?”

“Lady Eärwen’s diary,” Ori told him.

“Lady who?” Brur demanded.

“Lady Eärwen, Lady Galadriel’s mother.”

“Oh, aye. Tha’ll be fun t’ publish.”

“I can only copy it,” Ori reminded him. “We can’t publish without Galadriel’s permission. Unless Lady Eärwen is still alive. If she is, we’d have to ask her permission.”

“Anythin’ good in it?” Brur asked.

Ori gave him a sly look, then turned as shouting came from the receiving room. Fili, Kili, Sigrid and Tauriel bounced in, followed by Arne, Bujni, Dípfa, and Bain, and the faunts. They had obviously been outside judging by their rosy cheeks.

“When’s lunch?” Kili asked.

“Soon,” Bilbo told him. “Frodo, you and Sam go and get washed up. If your Uncle Thorin is there, tell him it’s almost time.”

The faunts tore off and Bilbo turned to the younger set.

“That goes for you lot, too.”

“Yes, Auntie!” Kili crowed and skipped neatly out of the way as Bilbo made to spank him.

Ori heard the receiving room door again. Dis, Randibur, and Faramir strolled in, followed by the Dale royal family with Mister Wandi and Haldir. A moment later, Glorfindel burst in, Margr and Vi on either side.

“Oooo, our Ori!” the sisters shrieked in unison.

Ori went to be fussed over and hugged.

The Groinuls arrived with Romy and Legolas, as well as Omi and Loli, who were helping Master Sadi along.

Dori bounced in from the kitchen, saw the the sitting room was full, and bade everyone to sit down. Thorin set Bilbo on his left and Ori on his right.

The sitting room door opened again and Celeborn and Galadriel breezed in.

Shouts of greeting went up.

Ori jumped to his feet, excited, and rushed to meet them. Galadriel knelt to hug him and kissed his cheek.

“Happy birthday, my dear,” she said.

“What a wonderful surprise! Thank you for coming!”

“Our Dori sent a raven, and we knew we couldn’t miss it.”

“Happy birthday, Ori,” Celeborn said with a smile. He followed his lady to kiss Ori’s cheek.

“You look well, sir,” Ori said.

Celeborn had put on some weight and was getting almost as buff as Glorfindel.

Ori led them back to the table and they seated themselves. Mistress Dazla and her team brought out platters of smoking hot chips, baskets of floury rolls and crocks of fresh butter. Ori made a happy noise and he buttered two split rolls lavishly, then filled each with hot, salty chips. He took a big bite. The butter had melted against the chips. He savored the hot chips. He felt melted butter run into his beard. He was so happy.

There were other things on the table besides chips and rolls. He vaguely noticed rushing salad, a plate of jellied beetroot, and a platter deep fried black pudding, but he stayed with his chips and rolls. When he reached for his fifth roll, Dori said,

“Save room for cake, pet. Bilbo and I exerted ourselves quite famously!”

“Ooo, cake!” enthused Galadriel.

When everyone had eaten their fill, the table was cleared and Dori and Bilbo came out bearing a huge platter between them. It was a beautiful cake, two round thick layers, with raspberry jam and whipped cream filling oozing out of the middle, and a swirly cloud of xocolātl decorated with raspberries on top. Everyone oo-ed and ah-ed at the sight of it.

“It’s beautiful!” Ori cried. “Thank you both so much!”

“Now, pet,” Dori said, as she laid the cake before Ori. “You cut yourself the first slice and make a wish. And no wishing for more adventures!” Dori finished sternly.

Everyone laughed.

“If I’m to have more adventures,” Ori chuckled, “may they be silly and have happy finishes for me and all my friends!” He stood and cut himself a plump triangle. He put it on his plate and Frodo and Sam shooed him to the chair by the fire. Everyone else was served cake by Bilbo and joined him over. Ori stared at the enormous something covered in a cloth on the small stone table. Frodo, Sam and Tilda hovered excitedly about it. When everyone was seated with their cake Bilbo told them to remove the cloth. They did with gusto and Ori gaped. There were all kinds of parcels wrapped in gaily colored tissue paper.

“Time to open your presents!” Dori sang out.

“This is all for me?” Ori managed. “Where do I start?”

He was aghast. He’d never had so many presents at one time.

“Pick one for Ori, Til,” said Bard.

Tilda frowned with great consideration, then took up a red one. Gridr and Gloin were delighted.

Ori removed the paper and saw a small wrought iron box with hooks and straps to attach it.

“I took your idea and there it is,” Gridr said proudly. “You can put some cinders in and it will fit right next to your inks in your waist kit, so they won’t freeze.”

“This is wonderful!” Ori marvelled. “Thank you both so much!”

Tilda was now occupied with her piece of cake, so Ori selected a small parcel wrapped in green.

“Good lad!” Bofur praised. Ori grinned at him and careful opened it. The pasteboard box inside held six silver buttons shaped like ink pots. Ori laughed delightedly.

“Thank you, Bofur.”

Ori turned to Dipfa and handed the box to her. “I’ll let you decide which of my working tunics these should go on.”

“I shall design one especially, Lord Ori,” Dipfa promised faithfully.

Ori looked at the pile and chose a long flat-ish one. Eowyn giggled. Ori looked up at her.

“Is there horse manure in it?”

“No,” she laughed.

“Is there a mouse in it?”

“Hmmmm,” she teased

“Or some crushed snails?” he tried.

“Mmmmmaybe. So hurry up and open it.”

Ori did so and was amazed at the beautiful pair of vambraces tucked up in the tissue. They were thick leather and tooled with the horse of Rohan.

“I was watching the badgers in Dale using their slingshot, and I saw how their wrists got welted by the band when they released the stones. You need your wrists intact, Master Scribe.”

“These are amazing, Eowyn, thank you!”
Ori worked his way through the pile. Dis and Jani gave him a tooled leather belt with a buckle decorated with rose gold. Oin’s and Binni’s box held a sketch book bound with metal loops to flip the paper easily. Bujni and Dipfa gifted him with a new buttery leather satchel. Cemnesta had sent over a box full of spider quills. There were two bottles of the finest Dorwinian wine from Thranduil. Bard handed Ori a box with a wink. Ori squealed to see it contained a baking of Dam Rittl’s best currant buns. Nori’s gift was an etch bottle of ink. Dwalin smacked Nori and Ori realized the ink was in one of the bottles Dwalin had commissioned for him.

When Ori held it up to the light, the ink within glinted a luscious blue-green.

“How could I ruin something so perfect?” Ori asked.

“By walkin’ into the iKroth while I was havin’ the dam mix it!”

“All that excitement was about you?”

“Always is,” said Nori, preening.

Frodo and Sam gave Ori the tiniest easel he had ever seen. He thank them both profusely as it was the perfect size for painting miniatures. Thorin laughed and brought out from behind the door to Bag End East a large package. Ori unwrapped this and gasped at the easel. It was cunningly made so that it could be raised or lowered and could stretch to hold any canvas. Ori wouldn’t have to precariously balance his largest work on a too-small easel again.

Ori hugged Thorin as he thanked him.

Faramir’s parcel was very small and Ori was surprised Faramir had seen fit to give him a present.

“I saw it while Dis and I were at the Print Guild. I thought you needed it,” Faramir chuckled.

Ori opened it to find a small carved stamp. The design was of a quill in an ink bottle.

“It’s perfect!” Ori crowed.

Baluchistan, Red Queen and the other ravens stopped fighting over he cake crumbs to present Ori with feathers; one from Red Queen, one from Baluchistan and they handed over one from Garnet and a white one from Quartz.

“He pulled his single white feather out?” Ori gasped horrified.

“No, no,” Beryl assured him.

“He’s got another coming in,” Sapphire explained. “He likes only having one.”

“Oh,” Ori sighed with relief. “please tell them thank you for me.”

Galadriel rose, as did Celeborn.

“Ori,’ said Galadriel. “You seem inclined to have adventures and Celeborn and I have decided you need one of these.”

Between them, she and Celeborn shook out a cloak. Ori recognized it as identical to the kind Tauriel and Legolas had worn when they had first climbed up the meadow wall all those months ago, before the Scouring of Dale.

“As you know, this will keep you hidden,” said Celeborn with a smile, “but it will also protect you from cold and harsh sunlight.”

Ori put the cloak about his shoulders. It was almost weightless.

“I can still see you,” said Tilda.

“It doesn’t make me invisible, Til,” said Ori.

“Oh.” She looked terribly disappointed.

Ori bowed to the elves.

“Thank you, I’m honored to receive such a gift.”

Dipfa all but pounced on him, her eye an inch from the weave of the cloak.

Ori smiled at her.

“Would you like to try it on, Dipfa?”

“Oh, no, Lord Ori, I couldn’t - yes, please.”

“Are you ready for your present from us?” Fili and Kili shouted as Tauriel, Sigrid, and Bain bounced up. Arne, Legolas, and Gimli got up, too, grinning like idiots.

“Wait just a moment, please,” Ori said. “I have something to do first.”

Now aware of how the hobbits did things, Ori made sure he had presents for ‘his’ hobbits.
Ori gave Bilbo a Durin blue scarf, and Frodo the same, but with long, fringed tassels. Sam also received the fringed version, but in jaunty purple.

"Thank you, Ori, these are lovely," said Bilbo.

He eyed the faunts, who immediately chorused, “Thank you, Idad Ori!”

“You’re very welcome. Winter is here on the mountain,” said Ori. “I’ll make you mittens, too, in another few weeks.”

“Yep,” said Nori. “He can make them fings with fingers, too, believe it’re not.”

Ori squinted at the prince consort.

“Bilbo, pardon me for asking something so personal, but are your feet getting… furrier?”

The hobbit grinned at him slyly.

“Are you taking notes, Master Scribe?”

“If it’s at all appropriate.”

“By all means,” said Bilbo, “if it moves more silly books on hobbits into the folklore section.”

Ori took that as permission enough, and he took dictation of the following.

“Yes. Winter, as you say, is here, after all. We grow fur between our toes and up our ankles and the fur on top comes in thicker.”

“Like a lynx,” said Thorin.

“Very like a lynx, actually,” said Bilbo, “though it does make a terrible mess when we shed in the spring. Oh, well, just in time for spring cleaning anyway.”

Thorin drew Bilbo closer to his side.

“I know the skin on the bottom of hobbit feet is very thick, ghivasha, but can it protect you from the cold? Not all the areas of Erebor have heated floors.”

“If the cold is extreme, we may take to wearing thick leather pads lashed to our feet, especially if we venture outside, but it’s very uncomfortable. We stay inside as much as possible, but sometimes we have to go out to chop firewood, or replenish food supplies after being snowed in for a few weeks. We don’t like to do that, of course, because there’s no open market in winter or early spring. There are a few shops in Hobbiton, but if you want any variety, you have to take a pony to Bywater, and then you are usually obliged to stay the night at an inn, buy your supplies the next morning and leave for home immediately thereafter.

“And, of course, it’s very expensive. There are quite a few hobbit families who simply get by on tea and toast, supplemented by whatever foodstuffs they’ve put by.”

“That canning method is ingenious,” said Bujni. “When the jar is opened, the food taste like it should, not like salt.”

Bujni had not looked up from his notebook the entire time he spoke. His face wore that intense look that Ori feared boded something scientific, and possibly silly.

“What are you working on, Bujni?” Ori asked.

“I recalled your account of the incident of the cats at the inn, how they thundered in a herd and made a noise far larger than their size should allow. Thus, I set out to find a scientific reason for it.”

“There was a badger, too,” said Ori.

“Yes, I have factored that into my calculations. I made a field trip to the site of the incident, interviewed witnesses, ascertained the temperature and humidity at that time of year in proximity to the lake, and adjusted the average weight per cat to reflect their relative ages at the time.”

“So, did you find the answer?”

“Yes,” said Bujni. “I have concluded that cats are supernatural beings who laugh in the face of physics.”
Still Ori’s birthday.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yes we are having too much fun with Ori’s birthday. This part, however, does have rather a lot of sexy bits in it, so if you don’t particularly care for that sort of thing, you can skip the bit after Dori starts bossing Nori around about his hair down to where Ori and Dwalin talk about the moon. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

As though on cue, Nori-Pori uncurled himself from his nest in Romy’s fur. The cat stood, stretched, and looked at Romy. The back hunched, the fur went on end, Nori-Pori squalled, hippity-hopped sideways away and shot off into the hallway, yowling. Romy stared after the cat, looking extremely confused.

“As I just stated,” Bujni said with great dignity.

“When he starts walking though walls like his namesake, I’ll worry,” Dori replied placidly.

“My dear Lord Ori,” Mister Wandi smiled. “After discussing it with Haldir, we have decided you and Dwalin shall be gifted a day at my spa. You shall have steam, massages, skin treatments, and a special bath.”

“Will it have sparkly pink shit in it?” Dwalin asked.

“Of course,” Mister Wandi giggled. “Pink sparkly shit is very good for your skin.”

“That sounds wonderful, Mister Wandi,” Ori said quickly. “When should we come?”

“Oh, whenever you like,” Wandi said, airily. “I shall write it in my book.”

“Thank you.” Ori grinned, then Kili bounded up and grabbed Ori’s arm.

“C’mon!” he shouted.

Ori was seized and jostled toward the breakfast parlor. Bain clapped his hands over Ori’s eyes and Sigrid and Arne shoved Ori along. Ori was finally pulled up short and held still.

“May I look yet?”

“Hang about!” Sigrid teased. Ori heard the sounds of the curtains being pulled aside, then shouts of laughter from everyone all around him.

“Ready?” Fili said in his ear as he spun Ori around.

“Should I be afraid?”

“Terrified!” Arne said.

Bain took his hands away and Ori looked at the table. It was empty.

“And here’s what me, Kili, Sigrid, Tauriel, Arne, Legolas, and Gimli made you,” Fili chortled and turned Ori around to look out to the meadow.

Right at the edge of the patio stood a snow figure of a dwarf. Specifically a snow Ori. The figure’s hair and beard were made of dried leaves and grasses, Ori’s old knitted winter hat was on its head and it also sported his old coat and scarf. In one of its snow arms, it held a snow book and the other a twig pen. Next to snow Ori, a small snow Fanny wound her trunk around snow Ori’s shoulders.

Ori squealed.

“That’s brilliant! You’ve all made Fanny look so real! Where did you get my old clothes? Dori!”

“Well, pet, it’s not like they fit you anymore,” Dori said lightly.

“Sorry we couldn’t make Fanny full sized,” Sigrid offered.

“Weren’t enough snow,” Gimli added.
“That,” said Faramir admiringly, “is very well done.”

“Indeed,” Celeborn agreed. “Who would have thought to make sculptures of snow? Have you coated them with something so they won’t melt?”

Kili stared at Celeborn.

“Why, Uncle Other Elf?”

“Even if there was such a coating,” Arne put in quickly, “it would never withstand the winds around the mountain.”

Ori giggled.

“Arne, are you saying at some point there will be a gale and my old clothes will blow away and end up Mahal knows where?”

“Imagine that!” Bilbo laughed. “Somewhere in the West Farthing a knitted purple hat and scarf will end up on someone’s back doorstop!”

“And the coat will be found on the shores of the Sea of Belealas.” Thorin helped.

“Let’s hope it’s not wearing any of my old skivvies,” Ori murmured, then busied himself with hugging everyone and thanking them for their gifts. People started to leave to attend their afternoon duties. Ori grabbed Sigrid’s hand and turned to Lady Galadriel.

“Galadriel, are you in a hurry to leave?”

“Certainly not!” Dori interrupted. “Our dearest Gladdy and I are having tea with Margr and Vi this afternoon.”

“Oh, aye, we are,” said Margr.

“Yeh’ll never get rid a’ us now,” said Vi.

“No, Ori, I’m not in any hurry,” Galadriel agreed.

“Good!” Ori said. “I have to show Sigrid something, then I want your…er…input on something else.”

“Certainly,” the Lady smiled. “I am quite at leisure.”

Ori pulled Sigrid after him.

“Did you find something I should see in Queen Kivi?” Sigrid asked as Ori unlocked his office door.

“No, I want to know what you think.”

He pulled her into the room and shut the door before going to the table and uncovering the miniature.

“There,” he said.

Sigrid came over and looked. She gasped and caught the little portrait in her hand. “Ori! This is amazing! It’s almost like one of Buer’s crazy sun graphics! It’s perfect! Would you help me get it in the locket?”

“I have to put a clear coat on it to protect it first, but yes. Are you sure you like it? Do you want me to make any changes?”

Sigrid gazed down at the painting, then looked at him with a quizzical eye.

“You want me to complain you’ve made me too pretty?”

“You are pretty, Sigrid. That’s what you look like,” Ori told her.

Sigrid put down the painting and turned and hugged Ori.

“Thank you so much!”

Ori hugged back.

“I’m sorry it took so long. I used to think I was busy back in Steam Alley, but life is certainly crazy now.”

“And you love it,” Sigrid said with a grin.

“I do,” Ori admitted. “I’ll let you know when the finish is dry and then we can set it in the locket together.”

“Sounds good to me,” Sigrid said.

They went back to the sitting room.

“Is it my turn now?” asked Galadriel, rising.

“Yes,” Sigrid said and hugged Galadriel as she crossed the room to sit with Fili. Galadriel came to Ori’s side and together they went to his office.
“What have you found?” she asked.
Ori retrieved Eärwen’s diary.
“Did you get a chance to read any of it?” he asked, handing it to her.
“No, I recognized her handwriting. Are you having difficulty reading it?”
Ori pulled up a chair for the Lady and then sat opposite her.
“Read where I put the ribbon marker.”

Galadriel opened the little book where Ori had marked the luncheon at Doriath. He watched her read. Her eyes widened, she choked, dropped the book in her lap, fell against the chair, her head back, and shrieked with laughter. Ori grinned, he had hoped she would find it as funny as he had.
“Did that really happen?” he asked when Galadriel had recovered herself a little. “Oh yes,” she managed and wiped her eyes. “I admit I wasn’t paying that much attention to Thranduil. I missed him walking into walls. Oh, Ori, thank you for showing me this.”
“I only started reading today,” Ori admitted. “Eärwen is….” he paused, not sure how to say that the mother of the Lady of the Golden Wood was an utter ninny. “She’s very…”
“Simple.” Galadriel smiled. “She is wise in her way, but has no ambition beyond her home. She did not even follow my father when he was banished for a time. She loves her home.”
“So she’s still alive?” Ori checked.
“Oh yes. We do write occasionally. She inevitably asks when I shall grow up and stop my adventuring ways. She does not see that Lothlórien is my home. For her, only Aman is home to elves.”
“On that, why did she write in Sindarin?”
“Oh, Mithrandir taught it to her. Father had no interest. I knew she had a journal but never gave it much thought. Keeping a daily record was believed to be a good exercise in organizing your thoughts on what you had learned that day. I can only suppose she used it as her practice in keeping the language and, of course, no one else in the household knew it.”
“Do you think she’ll be alright with having her diary copied?” Ori finally got the question out.

Galadriel looked at him.
“She’s never mentioned that she had lost it, so I imagine it no longer matters to her. Once you have made a copy for the library as Brur insists, I do want it back.”
“Brur wants to publish it,” Ori told her.
“Brur will have to speak to my mother about it, then, won’t he?” Galadriel’s eyes danced.
“I want to be there if he does,” said Ori.
“So do I,” she admitted.
Ori hid the book away again and they returned to the sitting room. Ori went right to Dwalin.
“We’re turning in,” said Ori, grabbing Dwalin’s offered hand. “’Night.”
Dori raised a brow.
“You’re not seriously going to sleep now, pet?”
“Not sleeping. Reading,” Ori said.
“Readin’? Me fine fanny,” said Nori. “Now I’ll spend all night being sick.”
“No, you won’t,” said Dori archly. “Go find something constructive to do.”
“Bo’s in th’ mines.”
“You could brush your hair and rebrand your eyebrows. The one on the right is hanging in your face.”
“Bo does that. You do it for me instead.”
Dori sighed.
“Go on, then. Bring me your brush. And it had better not be one you stole!”
Ori thought this was one he owed Nori, in a sick, strange way. Dori would be occupied a good, long while tonight.

“Queen Kivi?” Sigrid asked archly as Ori let himself be led away.
“Queen Kivi didn’t write poetry,” say Ori, and blew her a raspberry.
On their way past, Dwalin snatched a bottle of Dorwinian and handed it to Ori, then picked up the box of scones.
  "Snacks!" Ori cried. "Good idea!"
  "You need wine glasses!" Dori fretted after them.
  "Nope," said Ori. "Night, everyone! And thank you!"
Raucous laughter and calls of "Good night, lovebats!" and "Sleep well - if you sleep at all!"
followed them to the bedroom door.
  As Dwalin opened it, he smiled down at Ori.
  "Ready fer yer present?"
  "Yes, please!"
Ori walked in and saw it instantly.
  Before the fireplace sat one of the iKeyha inflatable couches, in Fundin green, trimmed all around in lavender. Cushions piled over it in every shade of purple jewel, as well as several of Binni’s special ‘bacon’ pillows. It was hideous, and perfect. Close by stood a low, wrought iron reading
  "Dwalin! I love it!" Ori turned and threw himself into Dwalin’s arms. "Thank you!"
  "Happy birthday, wee darlin'."
Killer had followed them in, ready to take advantage of the new accommodations. He didn’t look happy when Dwalin told him to go lay down on the rug, but he wasn’t too upset to accept the new, huge rawhide bone Dwalin had stashed in the bottom of a wardrobe.
  "Bribery?" Ori asked as Killer went diligently to work on it.
  "It’s yer birthday. I’m pretendin’ he’s a hobbit."
  "Ah."
They stripped down to their skivvies. Then Ori put his cardigan back on and Dwalin laughed as Ori sat in his lap.
  "It’s cozy," said Ori shyly.
  "I would never stand between a dwarf an’ his cardi."
  "What shall we read?"
  "In a minute. Tell me a bit a’ wha’ yeh found in Galadriel’s mam’s diary?"
  "Ooo! I’ve been wanting to translate more of that. Later, you can help me with my research!"
  "I’d be pleased an’ proud, love," said Dwalin. "Especially if we kin find a real juicy bit."
Ori laughed. "Yes, then I’ve got a small book of Yhon Khytz’s sonnets."
  "Khytz! No Rh’berd Hrik?"
  "Mmmmaybe. If you’re extra good," Ori teased.

Several hours later, Ori yawned and stretched luxuriantly, then he relaxed and turned. Dwalin smiled down on him. Between reading and cuddling, pee breaks, drinking wine and eating scones, several hours had passed, and Ori was amazed to find it was growing late.
  They kissed and Dwalin playfully tapped Ori’s nose.
  "Yer wantin’ yer rest, wee scribe?"
Ori shook his head.
He heard himself say, "No, I want you inside me."
Dwalin’s eyes flew open comically, but now that Ori had said it, he realized it was true.
He ran his hands through Dwalin’s beard.
  "I miss you so much. I miss your kisses and your beautiful, furry body against mine."
  "Ah, love. Wha’ yeh do t’ me."
Ori laughed and said, "And what I’d like you to do to me."
Which was not to say Ori wasn’t still a little nervous. He had simply reached the point that he wanted more than he feared.
  "Yeh wan’ t’ bring your Kivi with yeh?" Dwalin offered.
  "No, I have that chapter memorized," Ori admitted.
  How many times he had stroked himself off thinking about it after he read about it, Ori kept that to himself.
They rose to their feet, still kissing.
Up on the bed, Killer watched them, tail wagging, and jumped down to follow them out the door.
Dwalin shooed him back.
“Go lie down, numpty. Unless yeh wan’ another bath.”
Killer’s tail abruptly stopped wagging. He sighed and hopped back up onto the bed.

Ori was so happy to find Dori and Balin had retired for the night, and the living room lights were low. Unless someone was canoodling before the fire, Ori and Dwalin would have their privacy. Actually, now that Ori thought about it, they would have their privacy anyway. Who would want to stop canoodling just to tattle on them? And to whom? And what would they tattle? Oooo, we had to stop messing around ‘cos we heard Ori and his husband messing around, and then-

And then he told his brain to knock it off.
Ori took Dwalin’s hand and lead the way to the bath chamber.

As Dwalin filled the tub, Ori slipped off his cardigan and looked down at it with a laugh. “Not exactly seductive, is it,” he said.
“I li’e it,” said Dwalin. He grinned over his shoulder as he poured oil into the hot running water. “Sides, tha’s th’ one yeh were wearin’ when we met.”
“Is it odd to be sentimental over knitwear?” Ori wondered aloud. “I’m sentimental about your pink drawers, so I guess I’m the wrong one to judge.”
Dwalin came to him and kissed him.
“Love yeh.”
“I love you, too.”
They took their time, peeling each other out of their skivvies. Ori let his fingers, then his mouth, trace each of Dwalin’s scars and tattoos, his every mark of beauty. Ori loved how the lighter-colored scars mapped his husband’s ruddy skin, the raised ridges and carved valleys, half-hidden under the rich growth of his fur. He loved Dwalin’s notched ear and bisected eyebrow, the inky battlecries and khuzdul prayers for the dead over his pate.
Every moment, Ori gave in a little more to his own longings. How he had missed this.
“A’righ’, love?”
“Missed you so much.”
Their mouths met and the kisses shot bolts of desire between Ori’s lips and his crotch. Dwalin took Ori’s hand from his cheek, and pressed his mouth to the pulse point of Ori’s wrist, and kissed up his arm until he reached and nuzzled and sucked Ori’s neck.
Ori purred.
“Ready?” Dwalin whispered into his skin.
Ori shivered.
“Oh, yes.” Ori made to step into the tub, but Dwalin swept him off his feet and lowered him into the heat. The steam carried a soft, faint smell of the oil. Ori let himself slip under to his chin. His muscles surrendered all traces of strain, and a moan traveled up his throat.
When Ori finally sat up again, Dwalin boosted himself in and scooped Ori into his lap.
“Give us a kiss, azyung,” he rumbled.
Ori slid his arms around Dwalin’s neck and they kissed. Their tongues played, their hands roamed, and the erection that ripened against Ori’s thigh was twin to his own.
Gripped with restlessness, Ori twisted around until he straddled Dwalin’s thighs. He remembered the first time he’d attempted seduction in this tub.
As he recalled, that ended rather well.
Now the oil in the hot water worked majick on their skin, and their pricks slid against each other deliciously, no matter how hard they pressed.
And they pressed hard.
Dwalin murmured into Ori’s mouth. One big hand roamed to Ori’s belly and down.
Ori thought Dwalin meant to jerk him off and, though that wasn’t the plan, he wouldn’t complain if Dwalin did so.
But Dwalin had other ideas.
“Sit up a bit, love,” he said.
Ori raised himself and Dwalin’s hand slipped under to cradle Ori’s sack in his big palm, while his blunt, strong fingers pressed between and a little behind Ori’s stones.
Ori flinched as Dwalin pressed a certain spot, and Dwalin grinned mischievously and went to work, rubbing it over and over.
Ori felt it twice, at Dwalin’s touch and deep inside. He put his hands on Dwalin’s shoulders for leverage and kneeled up a bit more. His eyes closed and his mouth opened.
“That’s it,” he said.
“Yeh tell me when.”
“Oh, now would be just fine.”
A second hand grazed Ori’s bottom, a slick finger teased his opening,
Then a mouth closed over his nipple and sucked.
Ori jumped and gasped.
Dwalin pulled back.
“Too much all a’ once?”
“A little,” Ori breathed. “That’s… that’s just fine the way it is now.”
The finger breached him and drew slowly in and out. Ori shivered because he knew that finger was long enough to-“Ooooh!” he cried.
The finger pulled back.
“Sorry,” Ori whispered.
“F’r wha’?”
“Nothing. I think it’s just me default state.”
They both laughed at that.
“Yeh ready f’r me t’ stretch yeh a li’le more?”
Ori almost asked, Stretch what? But he held his tongue at the last moment.
“Yes, please,” he said politely, then he giggled.
Dwalin eased back into him, watching Ori’s face as he added a second finger. Ori bit down on a gasp. It wasn’t burning, and it didn’t hurt. He didn’t want Dwalin to think it did and stop. Dwalin went on, deep and twisting. Ori had learned a bit about control recently, but he didn’t think he’d be able to hold back much longer.
“Dwalin…..”
Ori bounced. He let the water buoy him as he impaled himself on Dwalin’s fingers.
The climax took him abruptly, without the usual build up, and he couldn’t stifle the shout as his muscles seized.
Dwalin withdrew.
Panting, Ori leaned his forehead on Dwalin’s shoulder as his husband nuzzled him and whispered endearments.
“Tha’s th’ way, me gem a’ gems. Rest a mo’.”
Ori was shocked to find his own prick was still hard.
“Dwalin, should I still have an erection? I mean, is that natural?”
“Aye, though I thin’ our Kivi may’ve lef’ tha’ out.”
“That’s odd. I’ll have to put that in the footnotes. So, it’s natural.”
“Love, it’s all natural unless yer cock turns green an’ falls off.”
Ori rolled his eyes.
“That’s a relief. I think I’m going to need more oil.”
“Aye. Go’ a drum stashed aside jus’ f’r yeh.”

“Smartarse.”

Dwalin chuckled.

Ori said, “I should turn around, shouldn’t I.”

“If yer ready, aye.”

Ori felt so uncertain then. He kept reminding himself to relax. He didn’t want a repeat of the first time Dwalin tried to teach him to swim, even if he was less likely to drown in the tub.

He turned and got up on his knees, his hand clutched to the edge of the tub. The water lapped at the tops of his thighs.

“Bottle’s bin sittin’ in hot water, ought t’ be nice an’ warm f’r yeh.”

Ori counted one finger, two… then he felt a third, and that did burn a little, but not enough to complain of, until Dwalin’s hand started moving.

That felt weird.

Even with Dwalin’s other hand still at work on his sac, Ori’s body didn’t quite know what to do.

Ori thought about it, then he didn’t think, just let his brain go slack, felt the warm water, listened to Dwalin’s breathing. That got Ori going again, because he knew the sounds of Dwalin’s growing excitement.

Dwalin was aroused by doing this to him.

A flutter started at his gut and spilled warmly into his groin.

Oh.

Oh, that did it.

He moved into Dwalin’s touch experimentally, and felt Dwalin jump a little in surprise.

“A’righ’?”

“Mmmm. That’s… Are you ready? Could we try…?”

“I’m ready, bu’ yer in charge. I’m jus’ followin’ orders.”

Well, that’s terrifying, Ori thought.

But he had been in terrifying situations before, and had much less control over them.

He took a deep breath.

“Please?” he asked.

“There yeh go, bein’ poli’e again.”

Dwalin withdrew. He splashed a little water on Ori’s back.

“What was that for?” Ori asked over his shoulder.

“Luck.”

“Really?”

“Naw, jus’ teasin’ yeh. Spread ou’ a li’le more. Tha’s it.”

One hand curved around Ori’s hip, then something that wasn’t Dwalin’s hand slid between his arse cheeks and pressed against his opening. Ori breathed out deeply, and Dwalin pushed, past the ring of muscle, but no further.

Dwalin swore under his breath.

“What’s wrong?” Ori asked.

“Absolutely nothin’, love. How’re yeh feeling?”

Ori snickered.

“Stuck.”

“Does it feel good, yeh rascal?”

“I don’t know. It’s different.”

Dwalin’s free hand traveled around his waist and down. Ori felt the rough fingers and palm wrap his length and tug.

Ori drew in a sharp breath.

“I can feel that twice! I mean, in front and back!”

Dwalin hummed.

“Aye.”

“Will you move? Just a little!”
Dwalin moved gently in and out, and when Ori felt confident, he said, “Maybe a little more?”

“Wait!”
“A’righ’.”
“Don’t move!”
“This is me no’ movin’.”
“I’m really messing this up, aren’t I?”
“Actually, yer doin’ well. Are yeh hurtin’?”
“No! Just the opposite! It was just… do that again?”

Dwalin did so, pulled out and pushed back slowly, and Ori rested his forehead on the edge of the tub between his hands.

“Feels nice from here, too,” Dwalin assured him.

“It does?”

Dwalin paused, kissed him between the shoulder blades, and continued.

“Aye. We’re doin’ this t’gether, remember?”

Ori didn’t know what to say that wouldn’t sound foolish. He had feared Dwalin would only get so much enjoyment out of this, teaching his inexperienced husband what would, to Dwalin, be such a simple thing.

Like swimming.

The plain truth laid bare to Ori was that Dwalin, his wonderful, patient husband, would happily teach him anything.

He lifted his head and arched his back. The sound of cracking as his spine released its tension echoed off the walls.

“Tha’ was impressive,” said Dwalin.

“You’re impressive. More?”

Dwalin pushed himself in a little farther, and when Ori was used to that, a little more, until Dwalin was finally seated all the way in and rested, waiting, while Ori got over his astonishment. Dwalin’s pelvis was up against his arse.

“It fit!” Ori exclaimed.

“A’ course it fit,” Dwalin replied. “It ain’t an axe handle.”

“Hm, but still made of wood,” Ori mused.

“Funny. Yeh want to try movin’ agin?”

In lieu of an answer, Ori consulted his arse muscles. They were fairly well stretched out, but with a little effort he could still clench them.

Dwalin huffed out a breath and bowed forward.

Pushed toward the side of the tub, Ori giggled nervously.

“Sorry, I should have warned you. I wasn’t sure you’d even feel anything.”

“I fel’ tha’ a’righ’,’,” said Dwalin. “’No fair skippin’ ahead in th’ chapter.”

“Yes, Captain Dwalin,” Ori simpered. “I’ll be good.”

“Rigggggghh’. Shall we go on?”

They went on, slowly increasing in speed, as the bathwater cooled and their gasps and then groans filled the room.

Ori knew he would be sore tomorrow, but he didn’t care, as he pushed back into Dwalin’s thrusts. Dwalin had him tight by both hips the first time he hit Ori’s sweet spot, and Ori cried out and nearly leapt off.

“Ohh! More!” Ori cried.

Not every thrust hit home, but increasingly, they did. Eventually, Ori realized that Dwalin was learning his body, but that was the last realization he had before physical pleasure took over completely, and he pushed back and back, happily impaled, knuckles white with the strain, legs burning from effort. He was enjoying himself so much, his climax took him by surprise, ripping its way back to front as he came heedlessly in the water, up his own chest, even a few drops on his throat.

It must have taken Dwalin by surprise, too.

“Mahal’s hairy arse! Look a’ yeh!” he crowed.

“What? Huh?” Ori asked distractedly, his body still pumping against Dwalin’s of its own accord, while the tingling travelled up his spine, inside his skull, and made a puddle of his brain.

“Love, tha’ w-“

The blood roared in his ears, and when he could hear again, it became the roaring of his husband, who had reached the tipping point and seemed intent on warning the entire mountain.

Ori thought that was adorable, and wanted to say so, but he was out of breath, his throat sore from gasping and moaning, and lack of water.

Dwalin pulled Ori back up and against his chest with both arms as they knelt. Dwalin’s head rested on Ori’s shoulder, while they waited to catch their breath.

Ori giggled.

“What’s so funny, scribe?” Dwalin growled in his ear.

“I must look like your teddy bear like this.”

Dwalin laughed and cuddled him even closer.

“Go’ yeh jus’ where I wan’ yeh.”

“That’s good, because I don’t think I could move right now.”

In a while, Ori stirred.

“We should wash,” he murmured. “And do something about the tub.”

“Aye, an take care a’ yer arse, ‘r yeh’ll be hurtin’ t’morrah.”

“I didn’t think that was avoidable.”

“No’ entirely, bu’ a’ leas’ yeh’ll be able t’ sit down.”

“Oh. Yes, that could be really embarrassing. Nori’s going to tease me enough as it is.”

“He’s no’ t’ talk. His nadadel still brushes his hair f’r ‘im.”

“Dori’s precious ba-dger!” Ori sing-songed.

Washed clean and toweled dry, Ori lay on the bed while Dwalin slathered his opening with vaguely medicinal-smelling ointment that he couldn’t place.

Dwalin crawled into bed, and pulled Ori to lay on top of him, Ori’s cheek on his chest.

“Thank you, my love,” said Ori.

“Anythin’ f’r yeh, me own wee scribe.”

They lay quietly for a time. All the lamps were covered, but the furniture in the room was silhouetted in the light of the moon, now risen full.

“The moonlight is so beautiful,” Ori said, rolling off and snuggling down against Dwalin, where he could see the moon properly. “Dwalin, do you ever wonder if there’s someone on the moon, looking down at Arda? Do you think they see Arda as beautiful?”

“Eh? I dunno, love. I suppose, when I was a badger, I always though’ th’ moon was a flat disc. Bu’, now yeh mention it, Arda would look fla’ from th’ moon, too, wouldn’t it.”

“And there’s the man who came down from the moon in the Merry Old Inn song.”

“Considerin’ tha’ song was made up by drunks, I don’t think tha’s been though’ out.”

“Enough that someone thought he used the moon as a reading lamp. And if the man in the moon came down to Arda, what would happen if we went to the moon?”

“Le’s no’ discuss tha’ with our Bujni. He’ll drive himself mad figurin’ how t’ get there.”

“It must be possible. That’s how the Silmaril got up there. The one not in Durin’s sock drawer, anyway. Imagine the man on the moon, mooning us.”

Dwalin muttered, then his breath evened out, and Ori realized he was asleep.

But Ori’s brain was still working:

Everyone thinks the moon is romantic, dwarrow, men, elves, hobbits … Do orcs think the moon is romantic? Do orcs have any concept of romance?

Do courting orcs sit in the moonlight, and murmur sweet, orc nothings?

How do orcs reproduce?
Dwalin always says they just shit where they stand. That can’t be terribly romantic. You’re standing there, and the orc of your dreams walks by and you say ‘Hello, we should breed.’ Then, pffftt, right there on the ground. That can’t be at all conducive to-

“Ori.”
“Yer scarin’ everyane in th’ Halls. Go t’ sleep.”

Ori winced.
“Sorry!”
“Tha’s a ’righ’,.”

“While You’re here, may I ask a question?”

“Is it abou’ orcs?”

“No!”

“Then, go ahead. One question.”

“Did You make goats, or did Eru?”

“It was more’ve a group effort. Hard t’ recall. We were all pretty drunk.”

“You made an animal when You were drunk?”

“More ’n one. Still don’ know where tha’ platypus come from.”

“What’ s a platypus?”

“Yeh’ll find out. Tha’ s three questions.”

“Oh, right. So, I owe You two. You can ask anything!”

“Ori, go th’ fuck t’ sleep.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Ori and his family and friends have a lot of projects to get done, so off we go! There will be food! So, bring snacks! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dvarrow time, same dvarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next day, Ori rolled over and realized he had to go - right now.
The oil from last night was responsible, he knew as he hurried to the bathroom, and he had expected it. Nor was it anywhere near as bad as he had feared. He supposed this was the positive side of being able to imagine anything up to and including the end of the world. The reality was almost never as bad as his fears.
“Except for ‘coming to’ sitting in orc guts,” he muttered.
That was pretty bad, though he hadn’t exactly been lucid enough to realize how bad.
“You know,” he continued, “you’re talking to yourself in an empty room, and your husband is probably wondering if you fell in.”
When he had washed and returned to the bedroom, Dwalin raised the furs and Ori tucked himself into his husband’s arms.
“How’re yeh feeling this mornin’?” Dwalin rumbled, and kissed his neck. “Yeh sore?”
“Not really,” said Ori. He stretched back into Dwalin with shameless abandon. “Though, whenever I move, I am reminded of a certain someone.”
“Anyane I know?”
“Mmmmmaybe. You’re wonderful, you know. You’re amazingly patient.”
“So’re yeh,” said Dwalin. “It’s no’ easy bein’ a warrior’s husband, ‘r wife, f’r tha’ matter. We never seem t’ be home when yeh need us.”
“If I found it easy, that would mean I didn’t love you as much as I do.”
They cuddled for a little while, and then the cuddling got somewhat out of hand. Ori was about to suggest Queen Kivi, when Dori knocked on the door.
“Enough of that, now, pet, dearie. It’s time for breakfast. I’m sure the pair of you have worked up an appetite!”

Dwalin nearly fell over laughing when he observed a breakfast spread of blackberry pancakes, with blackberry muffins on the side, blackberry juice and blackberry leaf tea.
“Yeh seem t’ve worked ou’ a theme, our Dori.”
Dori gave an impatient huff.
“Bilbo and I were just helping!” Dori snapped.
Ori caught Bilbo’s glance and Bilbo rolled his eyes sympathetically.
“An’ we appreciate i’, our Dori,” Dwalin managed. “We jus’ used th’ oil, we didn’ drink i’.”
“Oil is an enema!” Dori shouted.
“Language!” chorused Nori and Kili.
“I do not need an enema!” Oin roared. “Me bowels moved just fine this mornin’!”
“Not you, Dwalin and Ori!” Dori insisted.
“Oh now Bearer,” Oin went on in a soothing tone. “if you’re worried yer wee Ori’s got all bound up with the butter and cream, I’m sure the oil our Dwalin used while he was pluggin’ him last night will have sorted all that out.”
Everyone at the table snorted and a few had to mop up tea. Ori felt his face flame and wondered if there was any point in crawling under the table. Dwalin just put an arm about him and grinned.

“Gross!” Nori grumbled. “I’m done wif brekkie. I’m all nauseous now.”

“Bugger off, nuisance!” Dwalin drawled without heat.

Ori was horrified that everyone at the table knew more about his sex life than he did of any of theirs. At the same time, he was bursting with pride that he had the best husband in all Arda and likely the world.

Ori looked up as the raven fluttered into the breakfast parlor. He had decided to read there as he had a few other history books he’d asked Brur if he could borrow. They were extremely old and dealt with the Firebeards. He was trying to sort out the timelines between Lady Éärwen’s diary and dwarrow history. The table in the parlor was bigger than the desk in his office.

The raven wasn’t one he knew and it looked as though it had come a long way. It landed on the table and sighed. Ori got up.

“Please rest a moment, I’ll get you food and water.”

The raven all but flopped down and Ori went to the kitchen. Dori was slicing up raw mutton. Ori got a small bowl of water and proffered another to Dori.

“Raven, pet?”

“Yes. It looks tired, so I’m going to give it something before finding whomever the letter is for.”

“Good badger,” Dori murmured and chopped up a slice and popped it into the bowl. Ori went back through and put both bowls down near the raven. The raven drank gratefully, then offered its leg.

“Who is it for?” Ori asked politely before removing it.

“Yer Ori, righ’?” the raven asked.

“I am.”

“I’s f’r yeh. King said t’ tell yeh, yeh go’ all his an’ Queen Givi’s an’ th’ pebbles’ love.”

“Thank you, er?”

“Shelly,” said raven.

“Thank you, Shelly.”

Ori carefully removed the letter. “That’s so kind of them. Please take your time and rest.”

“Ta,” said the raven around a beak full of meat.

Ori opened the intricately folded paper.

“Our Ori,

We’re safe home. We had a good trip spending a couple of day’s with Rhonda and Linda. Rivendell’s a real pretty place. All flowers, bendy trees and elves singing all over everywhere. I swear there must be something to the old tale that elves eat leaves and bark. Most of them had nothing on their dinner plates but leafy stuff. They call it arugula and purslane. Looked like weeds to us. Not to worry, Rhonda knows how to feed dwarrow and we had proper stick to your ribs meals. The pebbles had a grand time as all the elves wanted to play with them. Worked well as they are quick on their feet and ran Sni and Sni all over the place. Pebbles slept every night like logs. Much as we love the little shits, it was nice to just put up our feet for a while.

Our Sni’s got so he sings that Tra-la-lallying thing wherever he goes. We’re hoping to get him singing some dwarf songs soon, just for balance, and so we don’t lose what’s left of our minds.

We got back last evening in time for dinner. I got the pebbles fed and into their beds, then Chat and I went down to the hall for our welcome back dinner. Our steward brought Frerin and T’dillah down for it. Steward says Frerin’s behaving, as T’dillah’s overdue beyond a week. She tells us she’s working on a book of poetry, wants to have it published. Mahal forbid, though Frerin seems excited about it. Chat was in a good mood and gave Frerin leave to have the manuscript sent to a Gondor press Frerin knows about.

They seemed in a good enough mood to stay after dinner to hear about our visit. Everyone - well, almost everyone - was real excited about the wedding and all those sweet pictures you drew got passed around, and most impressed seeing all the crowned heads of Arda, as your Margr and Vi like to say. It was a fun thing when Frerin got his look at them pictures of yours. Me and Chat really liked the way you showed how much of that spicy soup our Thorin swallowed and the ones of the whole family were grand.

T’dillah looked like she was wanting to say something nice, but Frerin looked so black-afronted that she said she was feeling poorly and the pair of them went off to bed. Guard came down later and told us all that Frerin had been raging for two hours about those pictures. Apparently, Frerin thinks Thorin had been practicing as no one could eat that amount of soup! Practicing!

And he’s dead sure that our Bilbo couldn’t have swallowed a bit at all, and that the picture of him drinking from the bowl was just made up.

Mahal’s balls, I swear that lad’s got more than just a beehive rammed up his arse.

Much love to you and everyone still hanging about Fundin House, Givris.

Ori chuckled as he folded the letter but he sobered as he thought of T’dillah. An overdue pebble was not a good thing. He sat thinking for a moment, then patted the raven and went to find Thorin. He went through to the sitting room and saw a piece of paper on the floor. He thought from the size and color of the paper, it must have dropped from the packet in Faramir’s pocket.

He meant to pick it up and, still folded, put it in his bag to return later. Then he realized, he’d better make sure it really was Faramir’s, and not Dori’s list for ‘surprise’ Yule gifts or reveal the names of the badgers.

He only meant to check the hand-writing, look for a name or something. At least, that was what Ori told himself. He read:

“Dear Father,

We have arrived safe and the equipment is safe. You were right about the outriders you hired to accompany me. They are entirely competent and saw me safely to Erebor.

Mr. Baggins is in fine health and writing like a fiend. You’ll be happy to read that his marriage to King Thorin was, indeed, a love match, so any romantic aspects you care to attach to publicity will ring quite correct.

The dwarrow (that is the correct plural for dwarf, as I’ve been told innumerable times since our arrival) are a very warm and generous people, not greedy at all, and Mr Baggins and his nephew are very well-liked. I have been treated with great courtesy, even though it is obvious that to the pressdwarrow neither our craftsmanship nor our work ethic is quite up to snuff.

If I may be delicate, other things we heard about the Durin line are true. The king is quite eccentric. Plainly put, his family is nuts. Oh, it’s nothing that will keep them from properly running the kingdom. They are a dead-clever lot, and they are every one of them bent on Erebor prospering….”

Ori folded the letter, rather angry at himself for reading so far down. It was none of his business, was it. If Faramir thought them all mad, that was none of his business either.

He heard a ruckus in the kitchen and Nori singing loudly, and off-key:
Ohhhhh-ho, I got ferrets in me pants.
Ohhhhh-ho, they’re gonna have a dance.

Then again, perhaps Faramir wasn’t all that far off the mark.
He picked up his books from the table in the parlor and retired to his work room, out of the way of any, and continued his reading.
It was only after that stupid little song ran through Ori’s head for the next three hours that he added a new descriptor to Faramir’s list. Murderous. He was going to kill Nori and stuff the ferrets down his throat.
If only Nori-Pori didn’t get on so well with little Assault and Battery, or as Dwalin called them, Assbat.

Ori didn’t say much at lunch. He was concerned it might be noticed, as family drifted in and out, all on schedules of their own. Fortunately, Dori seemed to talk enough for all of them. Between Yule preparations and the impending badgers, Dori had an awful lot to say.
Ori dawdled over his food. Faramir had come in from his meeting with the printers’ guild chairs, ate heartily and went to change into work clothes. As the man was leaving, and there wasn’t anyone else around, Ori approached him.

“Faramir?”
The man turned.
“Ori?”
Ori held out the page of the letter.
“You dropped this in the sitting room.”
“Thank you,” said Faramir, peering at him closely. “You read it.”
Ori looked at his toes.
“Yes, and I’m quite ashamed of myself. It was wrong of me, and I apologize…”
“But?”
“But, don’t you like it here in Erebor? Do you really think so little of us?”
“Of course I like it here in Erebor! And I think you’re family is wonderful!”
“But, your letter!”
Faramir sighed and ran his free hand through his hair.
“That letter is meant for my father, Ori. It doesn’t do to let him think I’m too happy or comfortable. I’d be on the first caravan back to Gondor, new printing contract or not.”
“He’d could really do that? I mean, I know it’s not my business, I really do, but you’re of age.”
“But if I want to work the press, I’m bound to him. He’s made sure no one else in Gondor will hire me, and the only other great presses in Arda reside here in Erebor, where the dwarven guild is closed to outsiders. Truthfully, I think that’s the real reason he even let me out of his sight.”
“He doesn’t treat Captain Boromir like this, does he?”
“Boromir is the eldest son, the march warden of Gondor, and the king’s closest friend and comrade. Also, Boromir didn’t cost our mother her life.”
Ori winced.
“Moreover, Father doesn’t see Boromir as a threat to his power or position. Father never had ambitions as a warrior.”
“He sounds like… not a very nice man.”
“He’s not. But, at the moment, he’s half a world away, and that’s where I want him to stay.”
Ori drew himself up.
“I hope I am still trusted by you?”
Faramir dropped to one knee and embraced Ori. Ori hugged back.
“Ori, I shall always consider you my friend here, and I know that your concern for me outweighs your natural dwarven nosiness. I’m also deeply grateful it was you who found this letter, and not Auntie Dori.”
That made Ori laugh.
“Dori would be screaming at Thorin to write to Aragorn to have your father beheaded.”
“Yes,” Faramir chuckled. “Most awkward.”
They parted ways, Faramir to the presses and Ori to his office.

Some hours later, Ori found an excuse to walk down to to Dwalin’s office in the army headquarters. This took some time when he got there, as most of the soldiers came to chat and wish him many happy returns of the day for yesterday. The guard outside the hallway to the offices gave him a smile as Ori went by. Dwalin’s office door was open. Ori looked in. Dwalin was writing. Several ravens, a few bats and a couple of thrushes perched on the large stand. A pile of unopened letters sat on the left hand side of Dwalin’s desk and the right, a larger pile of replies. Ori watched his husband for a few moments, enjoying the sight of this fine specimen of a dwarf working. His dwarf. Ori grinned in spite of himself and at that moment Dwalin looked up.

“Now here’s a sigh f’r sore eyes.”
Dwalin rose and came to Ori. Ori bounced forward and wrapped his arms about Dwalin.
Dwalin kissed the top of his head and gave his butt a squeeze.

“What bring’s yeh here, me love?”
“Nothing really, though I did tell myself it was to ask about old historical army documents.”
“Them I kin help yeh with. Wha’ war maneuvers’re yeh wantin’ t’ check on?”
“Firebeard’s sacking of Doriath?”
Dwalin looked faraway over Ori’s head.

“Well, now, tha’ sor’ a’ thin’s kept wi’ th’ weaponry used ‘round tha’ time. Lemme think.”
Dwalin released Ori and went to the maps covering the walls of his office. There was a smaller one near the fireplace. Ori followed Dwalin to look. Ori went right up to the map in delight. There was Beriland drawn out in detail, as it looked before it sunk beneath the waves. Ori saw the city of Doriath marked and various other settlements.

“Annex three,” Dwalin muttered then smiled at Ori. “C’mon, we’ve a bit of a trek.”
They went to the door as Dwalin whistled a dismissal to the messengers. They came out the door and Dwalin locked it behind him.

“Captain!”
Ori turned as did Dwalin.

“What’s bothering yeh lad?”
Targ looked apologetic.

“Captain? Tha’ Master Faramir, he was involved in a fight, down in th’ presses.”
“What, Mahal’s hairy balls. Is he still alive?”
“Ooh, aye. He won. Yeh think he’d look happier about it.” He turned to Ori. “He’s askin’ f’r yeh, Lord Ori.”

“Me? Why?” Ori asked, even as he pulled on his cape.
Targ said, “I think ‘cause yer th’ nearest thing he’s go’ t’ a friend.”
Dwalin and Ori exited the headquarters as Furhnk arrived with Gnasher saddled and ready.

Dwalin swung up, and grasping Ori’s hand, pulled him up behind. They galloped after Targ to the printing guild houses.

They went into the anteroom. Through the doorway to the printing floor, they saw printers and apprentices collecting bits and pieces of equipment and parts from a huge pile on the floor, along with what looked like the shattered remains of wooden crates.

“Wha’ happened?” Dwalin asked.

“It were a real buster,” said the shop foredwarf. “Yeh know wha’ Y’gar’s li’e? Can’t leave th’ new guy alone, always pickin’. Turns ou’, tha’ Faramir weren’ th’ easy pickin’s we though’.”
Dwalin groaned.

“Tha’ explains it, then. We all though’ he’d be bitin’ stone floor when Y’gar jumped upon a bench, took a swing at ‘im, an’ caught him by th’ nose. Instead, tha’ Faramir tried t’ push a full crate a’ lead type between ‘em. Tha’ never moved, bu’ then he fell against a stack a’ six other crates an’ accidentally knocked ‘em over. Right’ on top a’ Y’gar.”

“Where is Y’gar now?”
“Still bein’ dug out.”
“Anyone called th’ healer?” Dwalin rumbled
“Aye, we imagine th’ healer’ll be along. We’d be more worried if Y’gar stopped laughin’.
Can’t move a muscle right’ now.”
“Where’s Faramir?” Ori asked. “Is he hurt?”
“No’ as such. Don’ even think his nose is broken. He’s out back. Can’t miss ‘im. Tall feller, with a bloody rag t’ his face.”

They found the man right where they looked, sitting on a crate in the supply room, with his head back. He seemed somewhat glum, in fact, more than any dwarf who won a similar fight.

“Is Y’gar alright?” Faramir asked tiredly.
“Just fine,” said Ori.
“Nothin’ a skull hammer won’ fix,” said Dwalin.
“Oh, Eru’s blessed blue b-. Er, that is…”
Dwalin laughed.
“I hope Iluvatar takes yer usin’ th’ name a’ his stones as well as Mahal takes it from us.”
“If I’m suddenly struck by lightning, you’ll know,” said Faramir. “He’s really going to be alright?”

“Aye, bu’ yeh’ll call Y’gar ‘her’, if yeh know wha’s guid f’r yeh.”
“I hit a woman?” Faramir yelped.
“A dam,” Ori reminded him.
“But - but that’s so ungentlemanly!”
Dwalin said, “She hit yeh first. C’mon. I think yer done f’r th’ day.”
“I can’t.”
“He can’t, Dwalin,” said Ori. “It’s like the soldiers. He has to go right back to work if he wants to keep the respect he earned.”
“I learned respect?” Faramir asked, clearly dubious.
Dwalin nodded, “Me Ori’s righ’. If yeh kin do it, yeh should go an’ help pull Y’gar ou’. She’ll offer t’ treat yeh t’ a tankard a’ th’ Moo an’ Cluck. Yeh should say ‘Aye, sure’.”
“Wait. Isn’t that a food cart?”

“I un’erstan’ it’s gonna be time f’r Kili’s and Tauriel’s presentation in a couple a’ days,” Dwalin rumbled.
Ori took his hand as they walked back into the street.
“How can you tell?” Ori snarked. “Is it the non-existent plans for the not-party that Dori is, of course, not planning for them?”
Dwalin snickered.
“Our Dori’s a gem among gems. Hard t’ believe there’s times he makes me look subtle.”
Between one step and the next, Dwalin disappeared.
Erebor disappeared.
Ori stood at the threshold of a large dining room in The Halls. Miraculous sunlight, warm wind, and the scent of flowers poured in from open windows on all sides, and trays of still-steaming gingerbread filled the air with mouth-watering promise. Sunny presided over the teapot at the head of the table, and Bilbo grinned up at him from her right hand.

“Hullo, Ori,” Bilbo piped. “Nice of you to join us.”
“Hullo, Bilbo. Hullo, Sunny, how are you keeping?”
“Keeping just fine, but you’d best take a seat, lovey, we’re not all here yet. Sit next to Bilbo. You can kick each other under the table if you like.”
“Really, Sunny,” said Bilbo. “I haven’t done that since I was a naughty faunt.”
“You’re all faunts to me,” said Sunny, “so feel free.”
There were suddenly two other hobbits at the table, across from Ori and Bilbo. One was obviously a hobbit version of Yavanna herself, with saw whet owls perched sleepily on the leafy branches of her hair. Upon closer inspection, one of the owls was devouring a vole.

Ori and Bilbo leapt to their feet and bowed.

The other hobbit, a rosy-cheeked, red-headed male, reached out a forefinger and lit all the candles on the table, one by one, without a match.

“Show-off,” said Yavanna.

“Lord Mahal?” Ori asked, agog.

Bilbo, apparently, had never met Him, and swallowed, and bowed very low.

Mahal laughed.

“Aye, tha’s me. Jus’ tryin’ it on f’r ‘size’.” Then he laughed again at his own, terrible joke.

“Sit down, laddies. Our Sunny’ll have th’ vapors if her tea gets cold.”

“Da, you’re incorrigible,” said Sunny fondly, and poured out.

There was whipped cream for the gingerbread, and also platters of crustless sandwiches, some filled with a soft, yellow cheese and slices of cucumber, some with butter and cress. A plate piled high with shortbread triangles sat at Sunny’s elbow and, before Yavanna, a bowl of what looked like candied flowers.

One of Yavanna’s owls dropped down onto the cloth and stuck his beak in. She reached and offered him a few from her palm and the owl shot her a look.

“Oh, I beg your pardon,” said Yavanna with a delicate snort. A shallow dish of of dead mice appeared.

The owl was not appeased, but Yavanna was firm.

“It will have to do. It’s very hard to converse and have our meal while you chase your meal all over the table.”

The owl sighed and dug in.

Ori did not watch.

Mahal looked around.

“Where’s th’ lad?”

“He was meeting up with some people,” said Sunny. “Something about our Kili’s and Tauri’s presentation. He said to go on without him and he’ll catch up.”

Ori wondered if Durin meant to appear at their presentation as he had at Ori’s, then Ori silently scolded himself for his presumption, and Durin chuckled in his head and said, “Well, it ain’t gonna be me, silly dwarf.”

One of the seemingly-sleeping owls in Yavanna’s hair roused and started to cough.

“No!” Yavanna cried. “Absolutely not! No pellets on the table!”

Ori could have sworn the owl was grumbling as it took wing and flew out the open window.

“Now,” said Sunny, in a business-like tone. “We need to do something about this Denethor person.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Uh-oh, sounds like trouble’s brewing. Or maybe it’s just tea. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“What has that lunkhead done now?” Bilbo asked, most concerned. Mahal said, “If it was only jus’ him.” “It started harmlessly enough,” said Yavanna. “Lady T’dillah submitted a manuscript of her poetry to Mister Denethor for consideration.” Ori coughed on a gingerbread crumb and Bilbo yelped, “Her poetry?” “Yes,” said Yavanna. Mahal grumbled, “Tol’ yeh her poems’re anythin’ bu’ harmless.” “It’s not really about the poems themselves,” Yavanna insisted. “Me love, they could set dwarven literature back a’ leas’ ‘n age.” “They aren’t that ba- alright, they are that bad, but she is sincere in her efforts. She has a natural inclination to create something, as does any other dwarf.” “If only she had talent,” said Mahal. Yavanna elbowed Him hard in the ribs. “Oi!” “Eat your sandwich,” She ordered. “At any rate, T’dillah isn’t vicious or scheming.” “No,” said Ori. “That’s Frerin.” “Yes,” said Yavanna. A small raincloud appeared above her head, flashed lightning, and spattered the leaves on the branches with a brief shower. The owls looked unimpressed. “And that is where the trouble begins. Frerin encouraged her, in fact he offered to help her.” “Ohhhh,” said Ori. “He’s a lousy poet, too?” Bilbo asked. “I have no idea,” said Ori. “But he was raised by Thror at Thror’s maddest, and he may know a great many secrets about Erebor, maybe things not even Thorin knows.” “Very good,” said Yavanna. “Frerin is clever. And he could teach our Legolas a thing or two about epigrams.” “He could use the poems in T’dillah’s book to send code to his allies,” said Bilbo. “If he could place saboteurs under the mountain, he could do all kind of mischief right under Thorin’s nose, without so much as sending a raven.” “Givris said Chat gave his permission for it to be sent. Surely, it would never get as far as outright sedition,” said Ori. “Would it?” Bilbo shook his head. “I don’t see how. Ursith is the one in charge of sedition and he works for Thorin. This is bad, yes, but we can warn Thorin. His rule and his alliances are strong. Though we are more than grateful for the warning, the whole affair doesn’t seem like something the valar would even regard enough to involve Themselves in.” Mahal and Yavanna each seemed to look anywhere but at them. “You’re meddling!” Ori exclaimed. “No, no, no,” said Mahal. “Well, aye, we are, jus’ a wee bi’. We’re no’ Eru, sittin’ ou’ in th’ ether, contemplatin’ who knows wha’. We’re more- er?”
“Hands on,” said Yavanna dryly.
“Aye, hands on.”
“But, knowing that Thorin could take care of this, what’s really the matter? What are we missing?” Bilbo asked.

“Faramir,” said Sunny. “This isn’t just an internal matter among the dwarrows. Part of the reason Denethor sent Faramir to Erebor is that Faramir might cotton onto what Denethor is doing. He thinks little of Faramir as a grown man, but he knows Faramir isn’t stupid, and he’s aware that the king confides in his younger son as well as his elder.”

“But, what could Denethor gain from helping Frerin?” Ori asked. “It’s not like he has military ambitions. Unless, Faramir was wrong about that.”

“Faramir’s half wrong about that,” said Sunny. “Though not military, Denethor does have ambitions, and he could use a sympathetic patron to achieve them. If Frerin causes chaos in Erebor, leverages power there, Frerin could cede him some valuable spoils.”

“Frerin gains political power, Denethor gets control of the printing industry in Erebor,” said Ori. “Access to new markets in the east of Arda. It would be like Nali all over again!”

Bilbo struggled for a moment.
“This all seems a bit farfetched,” he said finally. “Frerin, stuck in a tower in Chat’s fortress, manipulating the king of Erebor?”

“Farfetched, p’raps,” said Mahal, “P’raps no’. Th’ point is, we haven’t come all this way t’ risk Thorin, nor Faramir.”

“Thorin is the lynchpin that holds together all the new alliances of Middle Earth,” said Yavanna. “Middle Earth is secure, because Erebor is secure.”

“Mother,” Bilbo said to Yavanna, “please help me understand this. A book of T’dillah’s poetry, if published, could devastate the kingdoms of Middle Earth.”

“So it would seem,” She said.

Ori asked, very quietly, “Does this mean we have to go get Denethor, or Frerin, or both of them, and kill them to get the book?”

“No,” said Yavanna, “neither of them has it. The manuscript is missing and Denethor is tearing Gondor apart looking for it.”

“We have to get to him before he finds it!” Bilbo cried. “And what does Faramir have to do with it?”

“Ol’ Den won’ fin’ it,” said Mahal, as He shoved a huge spoon of whipped cream into His mouth. “Tha’s where our Fari comes in. He don’ realize it, bu’ he accidentally brough’ it with him t’ Erebor. Tha’s th’ good news.”

“What’s the bad news?” Ori asked, cringing.

“He lost it somewhere in Fundin house when he was drunk, an’ we’ve gone abou’ as far with the meddlin’ as we dare.”

“So You won’t tell us where it is?” Bilbo groaned.

“Agrib must have seen it!” Ori cried.

“Er.” Mahal swiped an errant blob of cream off the side of His cheek with a thick hand, then licked it off. “I kin tell yeh this. It was in the shoulder bag our Fari carried abou’ with him a’ th’ Las’ Harves’ party, an’ he tol’ Agrib he could unpack tha’ himsel’. ”

“We need to get back!” said Bilbo.

“Finish your tea first, dear,” said Sunny. “Oh, you haven’t eaten much at all. Wait and I’ll make you a plate to take with you!”

Sunny rose and began piling goodies on a large platter. Ori noticed it was Dori’s favorite. Sunny caught his eye and winked.

“You’re going to trust us with it, ma’am?” Ori asked teasingly.

“Oh, of course,” she beamed at him. “If either of you break it, it’s not my fault.”

Bilbo and Ori looked at one another.

“Of course,” they chorused.

Yavanna and Mahal vanished in the traditional puff of smoke scented with violets and hot iron.
Sunny shoved the platter to Bilbo, and then Bilbo and Ori stood together in the sitting room in Fundin House.

“He were walkin’ righ’ beside me,” Dwalin insisted.

“Bilbo is missing, too,” Thorin said as Dori bustled through from the kitchen.

“Alright,” she demanded, “who has stolen my favorite platter this time?”

“We’re back,” Ori said as chirpily as he could.

“We brought leftovers from tea,” Bilbo added helpfully.

Everyone turned and stared at them.

“With whom were you having tea?” Dori demanded.

“Mother Yavanna, Father Mahal and Sunny,” Bilbo informed them and passed the platter to Dori.

“Oh, so Sunny was borrowing it,” Dori cooed, suddenly in raptures. “That’s alright then. She knows how to care for fine porcelain. What a lovely sandwich.”

Dori balanced the platter on her enormous belly and trotted back to the kitchen, clearing the patter of its bounty.

Ori stared after Dori.

“Dori’s getting really big,” he said, mostly to himself. “I hope the badgers come soon, he looks like he’s going to pop.”

“Balin’s problem,” Dwalin told him with a fond kiss.

“Thorin, my dear,” Bilbo said, “might we go somewhere private? Ori and I were summoned for a somewhat unpleasant reason.”

Thorin put an arm around him, and led the way to his office. They seated themselves and Bilbo related what had been said at the valars’ tea table. Thorin closed his eyes and Ori thought he looked like he had a headache. Dwalin swore colorfully. Thorin sighed.

“I can hear my mother in my head saying ‘This is what comes of being merciful, you should know better.’ ”

“Yer no’ yer mam, Thorin,” said Dwalin.

“No, more’s the pity. If I were, this problem would be easily solved. I’ll admit no one would have faulted me here or in the Halls, if I had seen fit to have him beheaded, but killing kin is not something I want to make a habit of, nor do I want my own younger brother’s blood on my hands.”

“I’m not issuing orders either.” Thorin replied.

“Ain’t takin’ yer orders. I’m goin’ ou’ there on me own steam an’ filletin’ him like a fuckin’ fish.”

“No, you’re not,” Thorin said tiredly. “What we need to do first is find this thrice cursed book. Nori?”

“I’ll take a look,” Nori replied from the wall behind the curtain.

“I’ll help you,” Ori volunteered. “Seeing as how I’m staying here rather than going with Dwalin to kill Frerin.”

“Yeh’d come along?” Dwalin grinned.

“Of course,” Ori said loftily. “I’m the king’s scribe. I have to document such matters.”

“Goin’ upstairs,” said Nori. “Race you!”

“Ain’t takin’ yer orders. I’m goin’ ou’ there on me own steam an’ filletin’ him like a fuckin’ fish.”

“No, you’re not,” Thorin said tiredly. “What we need to do first is find this thrice cursed book. Nori?”

“Found it!” Nori cried.

“You found the book!” Ori cheered.
“Naw, Bofur’s old tit ring. Fings was gettin’ rough one night an-“ “Shut up, Nori.”
“Shuttin’ up now. Oi! Ain’t this the lamp Master Ursif brought our Dori as a courtin’ gift?”
“Yes,” said Ori as he peered under the bed. No book. Not even dust bunnies. Mistress Dazla was ick’s worst nightmare.
“What’s it doin’ in Gheir’s bedroom?” Nori demanded
“Dori put it there to scare Gheir when he came to visit.”
“What’s scary about it? It’s beautiful!”
“Naw!”
“Really, Nori? A painted plaster warg dressed as a court dancer with a clock in its stomach and a lime green, frilly shade?”
“Yer right, it’s hideous. Hope it makes ‘im pee his pants.”

Ori could hear the preparations for dinner going on in the kitchen below when the five regrouped in the hallway outside Faramir’s room.
“This is insane,” Thorin rumbled. “That book must be here. Agrib came back hours ago to tell us he’d found nothing.”
“There’s no damage t’ any a’ th’ ceiling’s either,” Dwalin muttered. “He can’t’ve made a hole an’ stuck i’ in.”
“Is it in any of the walls, Nori?” Thorin asked.
“Nope. Looked all through.”
Bilbo twitched his nose at them.
“I think Faramir might have been a little drunk to execute such a plan with any finesse.”
There was a firm tread at the entrance to the hallway and they all turned to see Faramir. The man looked happy, tousled, and his work apron liberally doused with ink, grease, and all manner of smears. He opened his mouth to greet them, stopped, then said,
“May I help you?”
“Faramir,” Thorin went forward, “we are very glad you’re back. I understand you brought a book with you from Gondor?”
“I brought several,” Faramir replied, looking mystified. “Is there a particular one you need?”
“Yes,” Thorin said, “the one that was sent to your father from Frerin. It was a book of Frerin’s wife’s poetry.”
“Father has that.”
“No, Faramir,” Thorin told him. “Ori and Bilbo have had word from Lord Mahal and Lady Yavanna that the book was in your satchel.”
Faramir’s eyes widened. He removed the satchel from his shoulder and handed it to Thorin, then he opened the door to his room and went in.
“All the books I brought are on the nightstand,” he said.
Thorin gave the satchel to Nori, who passed his hand all though it.
“Nuffink,” Nori grumped.
Dwalin rechecked the books on the stand, looking through them as well.
Faramir frowned. “I grabbed nine. I remember debating how many would fit.”
The man went to the stand and rifled through the pile. He dropped to his knees and peered under the bed. Dwalin politely lifted the foot, so Faramir could see better. With Faramir, they went through the entire room again, moving furniture this time. They found nothing but an old courtesan’s hair bead, a recipe for lubricant and a mouse, which Nori-Pori chased out of the room.
Ori gave the room a final distracted look over and saw the bathroom door was open. Binni had been busy since summer, redecorating every guest bedroom and bath in the house. So far, Ori hadn’t seen anything worse than throw pillows covered in raspberry sequins and towels embroidered with the runes for: his, hers and up-for-grabs. He wandered in, naturally curious.
This wasn’t so bad, he thought. Alright, the tile was pink marble - floor, walls and ceiling, but it wasn’t a bilious pink. The tub and sink were all obsidian, as was the lavatory behind an open door. A chair to hold the bather’s clothing sat beside the tub. A borrowed bathrobe hung over the back of it. Ori frowned at the chair. It was decidedly off balance. Dwalin and Thorin came over to him.

“Faramir?” Ori called. “What happened to the bathroom chair?”

“What?” Faramir said, coming over. “Oh, when I arrived and went to sit on it, I found it was off kilter, so I fixed it.”

“It’s still extremely off kilter,” Ori said pointing. Everyone looked.

“Eru’s breath,” Faramir murmured. “I must have been more drunk than I thought I was.”

“Repair’ble,” Dwalin said and crossed the room with Ori at his heels. Ori looked at the chair legs. One was propped on a book. Ori meeped and pounced. It was a handwritten notebook with the Rikanta family crest embossed in the cover and T’dillah’s name in ink across the top.

“Tha’s me love,” Dwalin praised. “Nothin’ wrong wi’ this chair now, our Fari.”

“Thank you, Dwalin,” Faramir chuckled. He looked at the book. “That is definitely not the Lay of Luthien.”

“Yes, he weren’t a book. They called him Beren,” Nori said knowledgeably

“What?” Faramir stared at Nori

“Her lay,” Nori said slowly and loudly. Then he added, “They got married later ‘r sumfin’, right?”

“Lay as in a song, Nori!” Ori shouted. “Not lay as in fuck!”

“Oi, language, you liddle mole!”

“It translates as the Song of Luthien!” Ori insisted.

The song was considered one of the finest works in Gondor, and Ori felt himself honor-bound to defend it. He turned and saw that Dwalin and Thorin went standing, arms folded, looking at Faramir, who had fallen back on the bed, where he lay shaking silently.

“Oi, you alright our Fari?” Nori bellowed.

Faramir let loose a howl of laughter. Ori clutched the book to himself. Life was good, for now.

“All we have to do is figure out what to do with this,” said Ori. “Do we burn it?”

“No, I think it can still be of use,” said Thorin. “Let me see that, Ori.”

Ori surrendered it. Bilbo read over Thorin’s arm as the king flipped through the pages. The khuzdul covered the lefthand page, and the westron translation was transcribed on the right.

“Silver ink on black paper?” Bilbo asked. “Really?”

“Call it her hallmark, ghivasha. You know, this isn’t her handwriting.”

“It’s not?” Ori yelped.

“No, and I’ve read her handwriting, as you recall. This is Frerin’s. In fact, it’s very like any other Durin’s, as we’re all taught to write the same way, simply and with clarity, to avoid our letters and orders being misread.”

“Then, how can you tell this is his?”

“Frerin’s diacritic marks always have a bit of a wave to them. He must have ‘volunteered’ to write her poems out clean for her before the manuscript was sent to Denethor. He was taking no chances with his code. Nori, do you think you could decipher this?”

Thorin held out the book.

Nori took it, read from it, snorted, and said, “When I was a pebble. The poetry itself’s like a warg’s brekkie. The westron don’t scan a’ tall.”

Thorin cut his eyes at Ori.

“Perhaps you and Nori could improve upon it.”

“But, that would change the co—oh,” said Ori. “If we know the code, we can rewrite Frerin’s orders to Denethor.”

“And the results,” said Thorin with a grin, “will be a pleasure to watch.”
Faramir, who had listened to this with obvious and increasing confusion, stood and looked down at the handwritten pages.

“What’s wrong?” he asked. “Well, besides the fact that it’s horrible verse.”

Ori swallowed.

They had forgotten something.

Before anyone else could do so, Ori stepped forward and said, “Your father and Thorin’s brother are working together to try to discredit Thorin and seize power in Erebor.”

“What?” Faramir cried. “My father is doing what?”

“The westron translations in the manuscript are coded orders to your father from Frerin.”

Faramir groaned and sank down on the bed.

“Oh, Thorin, I am so sorry. Please believe me, I had no idea what my father was up to. I would certainly never knowingly help him hurt the Durins.”

Thorin put a hand on Faramir’s shoulder, which he could do, because Faramir was sitting down.

“I know that,” said the king. “As it is, you’ve unwittingly helped defend us from him. Ori and Bilbo tell us, your father is tearing Gondor apart, looking for something you’ve been using to prop up a bathroom chair.”

Nori clasped his hands under his chin, cocked his head, fluttering his eyelashes at Faramir, cooing, “Our hero!”

Faramir hit him over the head with a pillow.

While Nori went to translate the code, and redo his hair, Dwalin took Ori by the hand and led him back down to their bedroom. Dwalin sat on the new sofa and lifted Ori onto his lap. They rested their foreheads together for a moment and Dwalin sighed.

Ori felt terrible.

“I’m sorry, Dwalin. I know it worries you when I just pop out like that.”

“Naught yeh kin do abou’ it, love, I know. It’s no’ li’e Mahal sends a raven an’ tells yeh t’ meet Him a’ th’ Moo an’ Cluck f’r a pint, half a cow, an’ a chat.”

Ori reflected that this would certainly add something new and different to the Night Market.

“I guess, you have your duty, and I have mine,” said Ori.

“Aye, an’ I need t’ talk t’ yeh abou’ tha’.”

Ori drew back. That didn’t sound good at all.

“Are you going on maneuvers or something?” he asked.

“No, love, I’m no’ goin’ anywheres. Bu’, I need yeh t’ do somethin’ f’r me.”

“If I can.”

“Yeh know our Gimli’s ridin’ with th’ patrol now, an’ helpin’ train th’ badgers.”

Ori grinned.

“I understand he’s very good with them.”

“Aye, he is. Mentally, I think they’re all th’ same age. Usually, I wouldn’ push a new warrior t’ take on more responsibilities righ’ off. No’ fair t’ them, no’ when we’re no’ a’ war. Gimli’s different. He’s a Durin.”

“The others will expect him to lead whether he’s ready or not.”

Dwalin looked pleased.

“Yeh ge’ it. I knew yeh would.”

“But, what does that have to do with me?”

“I wan’ our Gimmers t’ star’ trainin’ older dwarrow, bu’ he’ll need t’ work up t’ tha’.”

Ori went very still.

“You want him to train me.”

“Aye, t’ use th’ axe. If he kin do tha’, he’ll be a ways t’ward trainin’ others.”

“Dwalin, I can’t use Durin’s Axe! It nearly snapped me in half once before.”

“No’ Durin’s axe. Yeh kin use the one I trained on as a badger. Yer abou’ th’ same height I was, an’ yer stronger than I am now. An’ th’ live edges’re blunted.”
“I’d love to help you, you know I would, but when would I have the time?”
“I’m no’ askin’ yeh t’ become a warrior, ‘r ride patrol. If yeh kin gi’e our Gimmers an hour mos’ days, it’ll still be more’n he’s go’ now.”
Ori put his hands on Dwalin’s cheeks and looked him right in the eyes.
“This is about more than Gimli, Dwalin.”
The warrior sighed.
“Aye. I don’ li’e t’ think on it, bu’ th’ more thin’s yeh do f’r Lord Mahal, th’ more He’s likely t’ ask a’ yeh. Yer slingsho’ migh’ no’ always serve.”
Ori was afraid this was true. Nor was it something that he hadn’t thought of himself. He was a dwarf. Even happy, silly dwarf adventures tended to include sharp objects.
“Alright,” said Ori, “but you’ll have to make Gimli’s schedule around mine. I still have the guild to consider, my work for Thorin, the painting projects, the Queen Kivi translation and, oh yes, I miraculously still have a job at the library, to which someday I’ll have to return.”
“I’m sorry, love,”
Ori bit his lip.
“And, most importantly, I have a husband who needs seeing to more often than once fortnightly, or alternate birthdays, whichever comes last.”
“Hmm,” said Dwalin. “Yeh know, we may have a wee bi’ a’ time righ’ now.”
“Do we?” Ori asked.
“Aye. I’m think-”
“I’ll go lock the door.”
Ori jumped up and scampered over, with the sound of Dwalin’s laughter in his ears.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Nori is a useful pest, T’dillah is oddly inspirational, and Ori has a poetic moment. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel!
Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori and Dwalin had been having the most wonderful time, but….
“Get out of here, Nori!” Ori screamed, enraged. Nori bounded off the bed and away, laughing. Dwalin snarled and leapt after him. He managed to grab Nori’s belt before the redheaded thief became intangible and vanished through the wall. “Bloody nuisance,” Dwalin hissed. Ori sat on the bed, puffing in anger and embarrassment. “I can’t believe he just dropped on us while we were….in the middle…about to…. Dwalin snorted a chuckle and came back to the bedside. “Aye, guid thin’ I didn’ have yer gems in me mouth. Goin’ t’ see wha’s crawled up his arse?” “No,” said Ori with an evil smile. “We’re not finished.”

A good time later, and after a wash and change of clothing, Ori and Dwalin strolled into the sitting room where Dori, Gridr, and Mistress Dazla were fluttering about, preparing for tea. Nori sprawled in a chair. He snickered when he saw them. “Aww It’s the lovebirdies! Did I wake you?” “Nori, I swear-“ Ori flung himself at his brother, Nori leapt out of the way. Ori snatched at him, but his hand went through Nori. Ori growled. “Ha! Can’t catch me!” Nori teased, capering around. Gridr came through and carefully placed Dori’s favorite platter, piled high with cookies redolent with banana and xocolātl. on the small granite table. Mistress Dazla followed with a stone tray of tiny buns, some pork, others basil with cheese, or lamb. She had arranged a cloth to keep the stone, thus the buns, hot. Dori, carrying a plate of ginger biscuits, took hold of Nori’s ear and propelled him forward. “Stop being annoying,” Dori ordered, releasing him. “Oi!” Nori shouted, then stood stock still and stared at Dori. “How come you kin grab me?” Dori smiled like a serpent. “No doubt, the same way I can keep you out of rooms I don’t want you in,” Dori cooed and turned to go back to the kitchen. “Behave,” Gridr ordered the room in general. “Anything on this table knocked about ’r missing, I’ll cut yer ears off.” Nori and Ori watched first Dori then Gridr and the housekeeper return to the kitchen, then looked at each other. “How?” Nori demanded. “Either he won’t tell you,” Ori replied, “or he doesn’t know. Same as always.” “Bat shit,” Nori huffed and threw himself back in his chair. “What did you want earlier, or were you just being a jerk?” Ori asked. Dwalin muttered, “Courtin’ death.” “Huh?” Nori looked at Ori, then grunted, “Oh! I gone an’ done the translatin’ o’ the code in that book. Bloody lousy poetry. Made me wanna vomit.”

“Bad as all tha’?” Dwalin asked and sat next to Ori on the sofa, then leaned forward to admire a plump cake dripping with blueberry preserve and whipped cream oozing from the center.

“Bleedin’ sickenin’,” Nori grumbled. “She’s a dunce.”

Dori returned, put down a plate of scones, lush with orange glaze, pushed Nori’s feet off the table, licked her finger and scrubbed something off Ori’s face, then seated herself ponderously in her inflated chair.

“Now, where is everyone?”

Fortunately for Ori and Nori, who exchanged horrified glances, the sitting room door opened and the rest of the Groinuls came in. The door from the receiving room opened and Balin came in. Then Thorin and Bilbo came in from Bag End East followed by the faunts, trailed by the wargs and Posey.

Soon the room was filled with people. Faramir arrived slightly tipsy and his front smeared with the Moo and Cluck’s special sauce, and began telling Bujni about the press. Eowyn breezed in a few moments later and she and Faramir were sent by Dori upstairs to tidy up.

“I’m not that bad, Auntie,” Eowyn said cheerily. “Our Fari’s a right mess, though.”

“Oh aye, ma’am?” Faramir asked, unholy glee in his eyes. “It’s delightful to see you safe and well. May I give you a celebratory hug?”

“No fear!” Eowyn laughed.

Faramir left Bujni and began to stalk toward her. She took a step back.

“Piss off!”

Faramir grinned. Eowyn laughed and sidled over to Dori,

“I mean it! Piss off, you arsehole!” she cried. “Auntie, do something.”

“Language, darling,” Dori said absently. “Both of you go upstairs and tidy up. You have ten minutes.”

Faramir lunged forward. Eowyn gave a battle cry, vaulted over Nori, and bounded out of the door to the receiving room, slamming the door after her. Faramir, in hot pursuit, collided into the closed door, swore, wrenched it open, and lit out after the laughing shield maiden.

Fili, Kili, Sigrid, and Tauriel came in, looking wonderingly after the two.

“What’s going on, Dori?” Sigrid asked, coming over and kissing Dori’s cheek.

“Oh, there you are. Nothing, they’re just being silly men children. Ready for tea?”

They crowded around to join Gimli, Legolas, and Romy on the rug.

Bard and his family arrived and were greeted and the gossip of Dale dispensed.

When there was finally a pause, Frodo shot over to Dori.

“Please Imad Dori,” piped Frodo. “I have to show everyone something!”

“Do, sweetling?” Dori cooed. “Well, everyone is here now,” as Bofur, Dis, and Jani arrived with Eowyn and Faramir in their wake. “Come in, dears. Frodo has something to show all of us!”

Everyone sat and looking expectantly at Frodo.

The faunt and Posey stood before the coffee table, where everyone could see them.

Frodo said, “I taught Posey a trick. Ready Posey?”

Posey clunked, apparently in the affirmative

Frodo placed a ginger biscuit on her closed beak.

“Wait for it,” he told her. “Wait for it. Now!”

With the flick of the beak, the ginger biscuit hopped into the air, Posey’s head snapped up and she snatched the biscuit in flight and swallowed it.

“Tah-dah!” Frodo cried.

The audience showed its appreciation.

Frodo bowed and Posey watched this, as if fascinated, and copied it.

Ori wondered how long it would be before Posey started teaching Frodo tricks.

Mistress Dalza came in with a platter piled high with hot buttered toast and Miss Oqizla followed with the teapot

Over tea, Thorin had Nori produce the poetry book and Bilbo and Ori told of their visit with the valar. Nori took his turn and reported on Frerin’s plans to undermine Thorin. Thorin was the only one who managed to control his anger throughout, which Ori thought was for the best, though he could just imagine what Thorin’s office looked like.

Frerin’s plans began with the spread of rumors throughout every kingdom of dwarf, man and elf. Not only had Thorin gone mad just like Thror, but was conspiring with the Fundins, using hospitality to learn the weaknesses and undermine the leaders of elves and men. The slim volume only contained thirty three poems, but each contained a nugget of deadly poison.

Balin took the book from Nori and put a magnifier in his left eye.

“Mmmm, th’ khuzdul is harmless, th’ coded westron is where he’s put th’ dangerous words.”

Balin put the magnifier down. “Me heart, where’s yer granny?”

“Granny Klack?” Dori glanced up from passing a slice of cake to Jani.

“Aye, I think we need t’ pick her brain a bit.”

Sapphire hopped forward on the table, swallowing a scone chunk.

“Want me to get her, our Thorin?”

“Please, Sapphire.

The raven flew off. The assembled went on with tea. Roäc blew in.

“Queenie an’ Blu’re at th’ door,” he announced. Omi ran through to the breakfast parlor to let them in. Dori and Tauriel prepared a plate for Red Queen and Miss Oqizla hurried to the kitchen for a bowl.

Everyone called greetings as the avian pair entered. Red Queen proudly wore her harness, which was admired again. Baluchistan echoed every compliment, and strutted proudly like a bird six times his size.

Thorin nodded to Balin, who quickly caught the raven and bone breaker up on the latest problem. Red Queen was incensed on Thorin’s behalf.

“Brother king, only say the word and we and our entire flock will fly to the blue mountains, there to tear Prince Asshat apart!”

Baluchistan seconded this colorfully and at length. Roäc hissed, and at Thorin’s behest, flew off to fetch Brur and Sadi.

Sapphire breezed in and Granny Klack arrived to be greeted, hugged, and welcomed. Brur and Sadi arrived a moment after with Roäc. When they were all settled and provided with tea and goodies, Thorin questioned Granny Klak as Balin handed over the book to her, open at random.

“Oh!” Granny Klack cried, “these are far worse than any she’s ever produced! They’re so terrible, there’s a kind of grandeur to them.”

“Granny,” Thorin said gently, “Are these in her usual style, so to speak?”

Granny turned few pages, made a disgusted face and passed the book to Brur. He and Sadi bent over it.

“If,” Granny grunted, “you could call it such, it is exactly in the way her rhymes go on. And on and on.”

“Could there be anything in the paper or the ink or the spacing?” Ori asked quickly.

Granny shook her head.

“T’dillah is not clever enough for such. All I can see is that Frerin has taken extreme liberties with the translation. No doubt he will say it’s for secrecy sake as outsiders shouldn’t learn kuhdzul. Vile creature.”

“Is T’dillah able to write or speak in Westron?” Thorin asked.

Granny shook her head.

“Th’ question remains, then, laddie,” Balin turned to Thorin. “What’s t’ be done?”

Everyone sobered and thought it over. Ori fidgeted. If the book wasn’t published, Frerin would find another way. He had put a code for Denethor. If the code-

“We should do as you originally suggested, Thorin. We should change the code,” Ori said aloud. “We could rewrite the translation, so the code makes sense, but the orders would be so scrambled, Frerin’s allies would do strange things instead and all the monarchs in Arda would hear of it and immediately know the conspirators.”

“Aye,” snickered Sadi. “I’ll take it in hand t’ send ‘our’ translation t’ th’ press, an’ then th’ original kin have a wee accident.”
“Ori,” asked Thorin, “can you, so to speak, retranslate these verses to do such?”
“I can try,” said Ori.

The herd moved through to the breakfast parlor and Ori went for his satchel.
He returned to find his place by Dwalin was open for him and everyone sat around the table. The tea things had been brought in as well.

“T’dillah is a nice enough lass,” Granny was saying. “But she lacks sense. She really is the silliest thing.”

Silly. Ori giggled with delight at a flash of an idea and ran to the kitchen.

Mistess Dazla stared.

“Are you wishing for more tea or food, Lord Ori?” she asked.

“No, ma’am.” Ori grinned. “I need a tumbler and a bottle of summer berry wine.” “For the king-father?”

“No, for me. I have to write some poetry!”

“Although,” Thranduil called through, “I wouldn’t say no to one.”

“Or five?” Thorin teased.

“Don’t be gauche,” Thranduil admonished with a sniff. “Not before sundown, anyway.”

Thorin raised brow.

Thranduil sighed.

“I’m not a party-crazed tween, Oakenshield.”

“Well, you’re not a tween, anyway,” said Thorin.

Bard snickered and opened his mouth.

“You’ll be sleeping on the couch for a month,” Thranduil warned. “Without Bob.”

Ori returned to the table with the open bottle and, in front of everyone, poured himself a glass and drank it back. He bounced into his seat, grabbed a graphite wand, looked at the first poem and read aloud.

“I bear my child
It kicks
I am a tool of a warrior”

Everyone groaned. Ori felt the wine tickle his brain and wrote. Dwalin leaned over him and read out to all:

“I have a child
It spits
I am a rabbit of a warrior”

Snickers went around the table.

“I see the sea,
It’s dark and deep
I think to drown
I’ll go all the way down
I see the bottom.”

Ori pondered then,

“I drink the sea
It’s brown and salt
I think and frown
I travel down
I think I feel my bottom.”

Faramir and Gloin both lost a mouthful of tea and Kili gazed at Ori with respect. Nori cackled. Brur kept track of Frerin’s coded orders, so they could set a watch on the areas he sent to. Eowyn wrote to her uncle and Faramir to Aragorn. Balin composed a letter to be copied to all the dwarf undermonarchs. Thranduil undertook the messages to Imladris and Lothlórien.

“Though, I’m sure Lady Galadriel already knows, with her ‘mysterious and mystic powers’,” he said with a snicker.

“My heart is sore
Soon my babe will roar
It will see the sun
I am undone”

Ori sniggered. He fancied he could hear the laughter of valar in the back of his head.

My insides are sore
Soon my tummy will roar
I can’t see the sun
It’s going out my bum.

Ori drank back another glass. By this time everyone was laughing, shouting, and throwing out suggestions for rhymes. Nori was advising the use of other code words to further scramble anyone seeking Frerin’s orders.

“I grieve for the light of the morning
I am large and still I am unborning
I long to give birth
As land touches surf
So I work at the gown I’m adoring."

I heave out of bed in the morning
I’m like a barge and still I am charming
I want to put out
To that ungrateful lout
So I dress in a way that is disarming.

Ori’s handwriting grew more than a bit messy, but Sadi assured him it was still legible enough for the typesetter, and, she vowed, she would write a pretty introduction for this adorable little book. Another round of tea and dainties and two more glasses of wine got him through all the verses. “Finished” Ori crowed and fell out of his chair.

Ori woke groggily. He was sideways. He stared out at the fireplace in his and Dwalin’s room. Bits and pieces came back to him. He had retranslated T’dillah’s poetry by getting drunk. He’d passed out at the table. He cringed. He was such a lightweight for a dwarf when it came to wine. It would have taken about twelve ales which was still rather lightweight.

He sat up and sighed. At least that was what he intended to do. He sighed anyway and clambered up from the floor.

The door opened and Dwalin came in. He saw Ori, crossed the room, and wrapped his arms about the smaller dwarf. Ori leaned contentedly against his husband.

“Now what?” he murmured.

“Our Granny Klak brought a spare notebook with the Rikanta crest, and our Nuisance has copied the originals an’ yer brilliant translations out clean in Frerin’s hand. Go’ t’ give it t’ him, he’s a master a’ forgin’ handwritin’. Denethor’d never know the difference. Sadi’s writin’ her introduction t’ th’ book an’ takin’ th’ whole show wi’ her t’ th’ presses t’morrow. All th’ letters’re sent t’ all th’ kings with Brur’s notes on any who migh’ be organizin’ agains’ Thorin.”

“Perfect.” Mahal’s hot boom chuckled in Ori’s head.

“Perfect,” Ori echoed, then yawned and noticed the window showed nothing but stars. “What time is it?”

“Ten. Yeh wan’ a bi’ a’ dinner?”

“Yes, please!” Ori realized he was starving.

They went through to the kitchen. Mistress Dazla was checking to see everything was in order for the night. She raised an eyebrow at the sight of Ori.

“Does Lord Ori require the Blessed Bearer’s restorative?” she asked Dwalin.

“No,” said Ori. “I require a side of beef and a pot of tea. Is that a possibility, Mistress Dazla?”

She scoffed.

“We’re dwarrow, after all, m’lord. And your beef dinner is in the oven keeping warm.”

“You’re wonderful,” Ori said simply and hugged her. She laughed, tut-tutted, and went out. Ori turned as Dwalin pulled the covered platter out of the oven and put it on the table. It was a beautiful chunk of steak, smothered in spicy sauce and roasted onions. Hearty chunks of chips cozied up to it and there was a other dish of brussels sprouts steaming in butter, garlic and tidbits of bacon. Dwalin poured them both mugs of tea and they sat down together.
Past, Present, and Poof.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And welcome to the third anniversary of our story! We are delighted all of you stuck with us and we have thoroughly enjoyed entertaining you. We have lots more to tell so… Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori slept well after his late dinner and woke with a pop. It was still dark, but Ori knew that the days had grown short and the mantle clock declared it to be morning. After a long kiss, he and Dwalin rose, washed, and dressed. Dwalin took Killer out the stable door and Ori went through for breakfast. The parlor was bright with candle light and the curtains still drawn over the dark. Surprisingly, Kili was there, as was Tauriel. Kili looked manic and Tauriel serene.

“We have the notes?” Kili muttered, shoving food into his face and staring at a list.
“Notes are here.” Tauriel patted the bundle of papers on her right.
“We have the original manuscript pieces torn out of books?”
“We have the torn pieces.”
“We have the writing samples to verify the writers of the manuscripts?”
“We have all the writing samples.”
“We have the notes?”
“Dear, did I not just s-. Pest!”
Kili grinned up at her.
“We’re ready!”
Tauriel smiled back and nudged his shoulder with her elbow.
“And we have Teyan’s master work.”
“The what? Oh, yes. Yes, we need that” Kili chuckled. He glowed at Ori. “Are you and Dwalin coming to our presentation?”
“Aye, Ki,” Dwalin nodded, coming in with Killer at his heels. Ori filled his cup with tea. “We’ll be there.”
“You, too?” Kili asked as Dori bustled in with another platter of steaming sausages.
“Of course, darling, we’ll all be there to support you and our dearest Tauri.”
“Good!” Kili enthused as Tauriel hugged Dori and turned to greet Thorin and his family coming in.
“We’re all ready, Idad!” Kili crowed.
Thorin looked Kili over, then raised a brow at Dori.
“You’re not yet dressed,” Dori put in.
“You must be properly dressed, both of you,” Dis added as she hurried in. She kissed Dori’s cheek and filled a mug with tea. Dori buttered two rolls, filled them with sausage then wrapped them in a napkin. Dis took this, nodded to everyone and hurried out to a meeting.
“What’s wrong with what we’ve got on, Idad?” Kili wanted to know.
“Your breakfast’s on your front,” Fili put in as he arrived with Bard and his family.
“Kili!” Bilbo sighed.
“Oops,” Kili replied and pulled a face at his tunic’s front.
“Don’t you worry, your highness,” Mistress Dazla said as she put down another teapot. “Your mother, the Blessed Bearer, and I have taken care of your clothing. It’s ready for you, so you must both bathe and change before you go.”

Thorin looked pleased with this. Mistress Dazla’s bird whisked through and, with a frown, the housekeeper went out of the parlor. She returned shortly with Red Queen.

“Red Queen!” Sigrid said in surprise. “Won’t the egg sack let you through the window?”

Red Queen gave the crackling hiss that passed for her laugh. “Have you looked out your window, man-child? Ah, no. We see that the cloth coverings are still in place.”

Tilda bounced out of her seat and pulled one of the curtains. It was solid darkness. Balin chuckled and brought a candle over to her. With the glass lit, everyone could see the white wall outside.

“It snowed!” Frodo shrieked in delight.

“Yes, Frodo,” Thorin chuckled. “And now you know why I took the wargs out with me earlier.”

Frodo turned with a slight frown. Thorin went on.

“Agrib, Gibi, and I went to the stable and shoveled a path, so they could get out to the meadow.”

“Did they like the snow?” Sam asked.

“Very much. They all bounded around like puppies.”

“How’s Fanny?” Ori said, with a flash of concern for his friend.

“Asleep an’ snorin’,” Dwalin told him.

“Good,” Ori smiled to himself. “I’ll take her some fruit before we go.”

Meanwhile, Kili and Tauriel were speaking urgently between themselves.

“We have plenty enough material, dear,” Tauriel soothed. “It may not have any bearing on our topic. Even if it does, this is a mystery for another day. Perhaps my Aunt Galadriel can help us.”

“What’s wrong?” Bilbo asked.

Kili shook his head.

“Nothing’s ‘wrong’ exactly. We’ve just spent a lot of time reading over the scraps. Some of the scribes had really weird handwriting, not easy to read like Ori’s. I think they all talked like Bifur, too. I guess they wrote and talked the same way.”

“What’s wrong?” Bilbo asked.

Kili shook his head.

“Nothing’s ‘wrong’ exactly. We’ve just spent a lot of time reading over the scraps. Some of the scribes had really weird handwriting, not easy to read like Ori’s. I think they all talked like Bifur, too. I guess they wrote and talked the same way.”

“Kili?”

“Uncle Bilbo?”

“What’s wrong?”

“Oh, so, there’s a problem with Durin VI.”

“No’ me fault,” Durin grumbled in Ori’s head.

“Only, not so much a problem as something’s missing. A bunch of somethings.”

“Hello?” Galadriel called from the sitting room. “We’ve arrived!”

Thorin rose, all they while looking to Dori, who shrugged.

“I had no idea they were planning to attend,” said Dori. “Oh, I must speak with Mistress Dazla and make sure there are enough towels.”

Galadriel burst in without ceremony, and with her Celeborn, Elrond, Lindir, and the twins. The calls of greeting went up and hugs and kisses were exchanged.

Dori made sure the guests were seated, and provisioned, and that Elrohir was sent up to the guest room to put on his trousers, since it seemed his grandmother had seized him and whisked him away from Imladris when he was only half dressed.

“Has it happened yet?” Galadriel asked.

Her eyes sparkled with excitement. Her tea stirred itself while the pot of elderberry jam slid from in front of Thranduil and down the table to rest at her elbow.

“Excuse me!” Thranduil groused. “I was not finished with that.”

She pointedly ignored him while Bard scraped some jam off his own toast and on to Thranduil’s.

“We aren’t giving the presentation for a while, milady,” said Kili.

“No, the other thing. I saw it in my mirror!”

Thorin slid his eyes to Celeborn, who shrugged apologetically and helped Kelli up into his seat.

“What did you see, m’lady?” Thorin asked.

“Well, if it hasn’t happened yet, I can’t properly tell you, because that would be cheating. What are we talking about?”
Bilbo passed the sausages down the table toward her.
“Kili and Tauriel found some curious discrepancies in their research.”
“There are references to an ugly incident at the time of Durin VI,” said Tauriel, “but no real explanation of what that might have been.”
Thorin wiped Sam’s chin.
“Getting eaten by a balrog can pale the rest of the details of one’s life,” said Thorin.
“Not quite that ugly,” said Tauriel, “but not much better, we think. We’re fairly sure we’re missing documents that might be more explicit.”
Ori was horrified.
“Why didn’t you say something? You could have asked Teyan!”
“If we thought it would make or break our defense, we would have,” said Tauriel.
Mistress Dazla entered with a second pot of elderberry jam, which she placed before Thranduil, who put his hand to his heart and bowed to her.
“My saving grace,” he murmured. “I thank you.”
On her way back up the room, Dazla dug in her apron and pulled out a packet of well-worn paper. She put it on the table in front of Tauriel.
“I think this is what you’re wantin’, m’lady.”
Then she curtsied and went out.
In the silence, Tauriel wiped her hands and untied the ribbon that bound the brittle pages. Kili began pouring through them.
“My love?” Tauriel prompted.
Kili looked. His eyes swept over the pages, then grew very large.
“Oh, mahumb,” he said finally. “Idad? You need to read this.”
“What is it?” Thorin asked, as Kili passed him the pages.
“Just, please, read this.”
Thorin read, the rest of the table at rapt attention as Thorin’s eyebrows rose higher and higher, and finally he fell back in his chair.
“Oh, mahumb,” he growled. “To Mordor and back.”
“What is it, Thorin?” asked Bilbo. “You’re scaring the faunts.”
“Read this! Please!” Thorin urged.
He took Sam and Frodo each on one of his knees.
“I’ll give it a try,” said Bilbo. “Happily, I’m quite comfortable with the archaic script.”
Mistress Dazla returned with a plate of muffins.
Thorin eyed her.
“Were you ever planning to tell us?” he asked her.
“If the need arose,” said Mistress Dazla, completely calm. “I could wait. I had time.”
“Oi!” Thranduil shouted. Then he clapped his elegant hand over his mouth in horror.
Legolas pointed and laughed.
Thranduil hissed between his fingers, “Why does everyone keep stealing my line? No one has more time than an elf!”
Frodo looked at Thorin and then at Mistress Dazla.
“Tell us what, Idad?” Frodo asked. “What did Mistress Dazla tell us?”
“That she’s Eldura, the daughter of Durin VI, and a Noldor elf. In fact, her mother is Elwing, which makes her—“
Lindir shrieked in delight and Elrond gaped.
“My dear!” Lindir cried. “You have a sister!”
Galadriel giggled.
“See, isn’t the surprise more fun?”
“Well, a half-sister, at any rate,” said Dazla with a smile.
She went to Elrond, patted him on the shoulder and refilled his teacup.
“Sister?” Elrond asked weakly.
“Oh, Mahal, yes,” she said with a smile.
“And you’ve been alive since the time of Durin VI?” Elrond continued.

Bilbo looked up from the pages.

“Apparently, yes. But, where have you been this whole time?”

“Here, of course,” said the housekeeper. “Helping raise Durins.”

Thorin said, “That only accounts for my lifetime.”

“And your father’s, and Thrór’s, though he vexed me to the point where I wanted to empty a chamberpot over his head and I nearly gave the whole thing up. In fact, I’ve been here almost since the founding. Every few generations I went away, did a little adventuring, tended to my kin in the Orocarnis, then returned.”

“As your own daughter,” said Thorin, “Because your position is passed down in your family. Except, it was really passing from yourself to yourself. No wonder you always look the same. Adad used to say to you never changed.”

“Your adad was a dear, sweet dwarf. I did change, a little, but it’s only glamour.”

She seemed to let it slip for a moment, and instead of Dazla as they knew her, she was nearly as young-looking as Kili - though she had a better beard - and her large, dwarf ears tapered to gentle points.

Frodo said, “You look like a hobbit with a beard!”

Tauriel laughed.

“The shape of things to come?”

“Perhaps,” said Dazla, as she reverted to the dwarrowdam they knew. “Now, don’t look at me like that, Captain Dwalin. I’ve not been half the trouble to you as you younger Durins have been to me. And you, the worst of the lot.”

“Me? Wha’ did I ever do?” Dwalin demanded.

“Dressing your hair and beard with your porridge comes to mind.”

Balin snickered.

Dazla turned to him.

“Don’t get me started on you, Lord Paints-His-Bum-Red-and-Walks-Naked-Through-His-Mam’s-Teaparty.”

“Oh, dear,” said Dori, who hid her smile behind Balin’s shoulder as Balin sputtered and Dwalin grinned and muttered about filing that story away for later.

“Sister?” Elrond asked once more. He couldn’t seem to grasp the entire concept. “Why did he-? Was Elwing Durin’s One?”

“No, but he did want to marry her, and he wasn’t allowed to,” Dazla said. “He told me time and again, he would have if he’d been able, but he wasn’t Deathless, and he was a good king, but he wasn’t Thorin’s equal, either. But we did live in his house and he did call me daughter. At least until he went out and got himself eaten by a balrog.”

“Then Nali cast you out,” Elrond surmised.

Dazla clicked her tongue.

“Nali tried to have me killed, but I was raised in the king’s house, and I can fight far better than those dumdumels of Nali’s, thank you very much. It was I who removed myself from the chronicles in Khazlad Dum.” She nodded at the papers still in front of Bilbo. “I went to the Orocarnis and supported Queen Nild in establishing the matriarchy of the Blacklocks, and when their children were grown, I followed the Longbeards to Erebor.”

“And instead of Eldura, unacknowledged princess of the Durins,” said Thorin, “you became Mistress Dazla, and kept the Durins’ house.”

“And I still do,” said Dazla.

“I would be happy to acknowledge your line,” said Thorin. “You and your kin should take your places at this table.”

“Thank you, but no, your majesty, I am the housekeeper and I am keeping the house, and I always will, unless Oqizla decides she will remain forever, then I may leave it to her to carry on, and I will go back to the Blacklocks.”

Kili said, “There are a lot of choices at this table.”
Fili pointed out, “Two isn’t a lot.”
“But three is,” said Kili. “She chose to tell us now. Is it still a secret, Mistress Dazla?”
“No, you may use these papers as you please. Oh, wait, I need this one for a moment. It’s got Queen Nild’s spiced meat pie recipe on the back.”
Thorin looked thoughtful.
“It is up to you, of course, but don’t you wish the matter to remain private?”
“It’s just pie, Idad,” said Kili.
“No, not the p- you little rockrat! I’m talking about Mistress Dazla’s parentage.”
“My king,” said Dazla, “you can print it as an announcement and have it read in the central market, if you like. No more secrets. Is that not what you want?”
“Yes, but this isn’t my secret to tell,” said Thorin.
“Then I’ll give it to you as a present and Kili and Tauriel can finish their reading with it. And if someone still has a problem with dwarrow and elves marryin’, send them to me and I’ll explain.”
“I just don’t want you hurt,” he said. “Whether you sit at this table or not, you are still family. You are loved and you are valued … and you know this kingdom doesn’t run without you.”
“You run the kingdom,” said Dazla.
“And you run me.”
“Oh, now you’re exaggerating. King Bard, please remove your elbows from the table, you’re setting a bad example for Tilda. Oh, and that reminds me, King Thorin, if you and Prince Consort Bilbo would clear out that final storage room in Bag End East. It’s full of concubinage, it hasn’t been cleaned since who knows what age, and you wouldn’t want the faunts playing in all that.”
Bilbo shot her a saucy eye.
“Shouldn’t Brur look through it first?”
“Certainly not, your highness. For one thing, we’d never get him out of there, and for another, I wouldn’t want to stumble upon him tryin’ anything on.”
“I’m related to the Durins!” Elrond shouted, then cleared his throat. “I beg your pardon for speaking out of turn.”
Kili snorted and Fili laughed. Thorin, also, looked amused.
“Yes, brother Elrond,” said Thorin, “I’m sorry to say your manners will suffer, but at least your appetite won’t.”
“Mistress Dazla?” Elrond ventured.
She smiled at him.
“Under the circumstances,” she said, “I think you can simply call me by my name. I intend to call you by yours, at least within the family.”
“Dazla,” he started again, “I realize you’re busy, but might you spare me a few minutes during my visit? I would very much like to hear about your life.”
“And we want gossip about our grandmother Elwing!” Elrohir cried.
“Oh, I can see you’re going to be my weak spot,” said Dazla. She squeezed Elrohir’s shoulder and clouted him lightly about the head with her tea towel before she turned back to Elrond.
“Brother, I will happily make time for you.”
Elrohir and Elladan jumped up and lifted Dazla between them like a war hero.
“Imad Dazla!” they cried in unison. “Hip Hip Hooray!”
“Put me down, you naughty fawns!”
But everyone at the table had already joined in and cried out, “Imad Dazla! Hip Hip Hooray!”
“There’ll be no pudding for any of you if my feet do not touch ground this instant!” she cried.
“Really?” Elladan asked, wide-eyed.
She sighed.
“Of course not, but it’s always worth a try,”
They dutifully replaced her, she straightened her apron, curtsied and swished out.
They heard a great deal of delighted squealing from Dazla’s team in the kitchen.
Thorin looked around with suspicious eyes.

“And now, would anyone else like to reveal deep, dark secrets? Anyone else secretly a long-lost relation? Anyone married in the past few days we should know about? No? Very well, it’s time to finish up. Open Court today. And all that that entails.”

Ori was worried Fanny wouldn’t like the snow, but she couldn’t spend all the long Ereborian winter in the stable, no matter how roomy it had been made for her comfort.

He dressed up warmly, wrapping himself in the scarf with little versions of Dwalin’s bottom all over it, and went out with a basket of apples. One apple was no longer even a tea cake for the rapidly growing oliphaunt.

He met Bilbo with the faunts at the stable door and they went through. Both Sam and Frodo rushed out the meadow door and shrieked as the cold wind hit them.

“Here th’ pair a’ yeh,” Dwalin said and swung each onto the back of a ram. “Hang on tigh’ now, hear?”

“Yes, Idad!” they crowed,

“Fanny!” Ori cried as Agrib, Gibi and Dwalin opened wide the meadow doors, the battle rams shoving to get out.

Fanny trumpeted her greeting as he approached and sniffled him all over with her trunk.

“I brought you a treat,” said Ori as he hugged her. He thought her skin felt scratchy, and wondered if she didn’t need some balm to keep her hide from drying out. He would ask Oin.

“Then, you can go out into the meadow, but don’t think you have to if you don’t like it. It’s full of snow and Jim says you only ever saw snow on the mountain tops as you travelled.”

Fanny eyed the white world beyond the stable as she munched a few apples, then threw her trunk in the air, and gave a warning, and thundered out the door into the snow.

She galumphed, and bounded, trumpeted, and galumphed some more. She rolled in the snow like a warg, and when she stood she sprayed her back with a blast of snow and was off again.

“Mahal!” Ori gasped and fumbled for his sketchbook.

Dwalin walked up to stand behind him and laughed.

“I t’ae it tha’s an ’aye’,” he said.

Ori nodded and furiously sketched.

“I hope she doesn’t catch a chill,” he fretted.

The rams bounded about, but never once dropped their tiny burdens. The wargs tore around, leaping, rolling, and burrowing into the drifts that covered the meadow. All the ponies were let out to play. They whinnied and squealed and romped in the drifts and galloped in trodden down parts.

Thorin and Dwalin went to help out the stable crew clearing old hay, laying down fresh and refilling mangers and water troughs.

Bilbo stood close to Ori and watched him draw as well as keeping an eye on the faunts.

Fili and all the younger set, minus Kili and Tauriel, arrived dressed for snowy fun and ran out in the trails the animals had made, shouting and throwing snowballs.

In the middle of the melee, Hamfast arrived with his wagon to take away the dirty hay. When Dwalin raised an eyebrow, he explained it was for the fields. He had organized a team of wagon drivers to do this once a week.

“I’ve had the first snow plowed into the soil, an’ this lot will be put on at the first show o’ spring. The fields’ll yield twice more at least this coming year.”

“Thank you so much, Hamfast,” said Thorin warmly as Bilbo and Ori came to greet Hamfast.

“You’re a wonder. The work you did when you arrived is going to keep us all fed over winter. We are all most grateful to you and all who assisted you.”

Hamfast blushed a little and chuckled.

“Well, our Thorin, it’s no easy task, but I have enjoyed myself. Been quite the challenge, as you dwararrow would say. My Bell’s is rare pleased with the house and there’s plenty f’r all the faunts t’ do.”

“Please give my best to Mistress Bell,” Thorin smiled.
“To be sure I will,” Hamfast nodded, then grabbed Wee Sam as the faunt tore through to jump into his father’s arms.

“Da, we’re ridin’ rams and winnin’ snowball fights.”

“So you are, so you are, me boy. And I expected nuthin’ less. Good lad!”

Hamfast took himself off and Thorin went back to the meadow to call the younger set in to prepare for open court.

Ori stood on the dais, resplendent in his black green court clothes, his papers and ink at the ready for notes.

The throne room was packed as usual, filled to the brim with the peoples of Erebor and Dale, since it served both kings to have all the citizenry together. Ori wondered if this was because the people knew open court was for everyone, or because there was inevitably some weird happening. Of course, it might be for the coffee party afterwards.

Dori and Balin took their places, Balin in his red court robe and Dori, a floating cloud of pale orange and yellow swirls, bejeweled with rubies. Dis, in a fine silk gown of Durin blue and adorned in obsidian, sat with Dori on the couch, Margr and Vi stood stalwartly behind them, dressed in matching caftans of blood red, almost hog-tied in ropes of amber beads.

Brur roared from the royal entrance. Fili and Sigrid paraded to the dais with Bain and Tilda, Tilda skipping along, holding Fili’s hand.

Then everyone rose as Brur announced the four monarchs and their party. Dwalin, with Killer at his heels, and Glorfindel followed by Eowyn, led them in. Red Queen strutted down the carpet first, with Baluchistan hopping solicitorously next to her. They were followed by Thorin and Bilbo, and Bard with Thranduil. Roäc fluttered over their heads, and the two wargs strolled after. There was wild cheering, clapping bowing and curtsying as they made their way up to the dais.

Red Queen leapt up to her stand, which was wide enough for Baluchistan to perch beside her. Roäc winged over to the throne. Thorin, Bard and their consorts bowed their thanks to the audience. Thorin and Bilbo sat on the throne and Bard and Thranduil sat on the sumptuous couch on Thorin’s right. Sugar and Butter lolled before the throne and Dwalin stood at the foot of the dais steps, opposite Glorfindel. Killer sat attentive slightly behind Dwalin.

Eowyn tucked herself next to Ori, with her hand on her sword. The pair of them had made a pact never to look at each other in this instance, for fear they would both dissolve into giggles.

Balin rose, bowed to Thorin, and went to the edge of the dais where he cleared his throat.

“May the glory of Mahal and Yavanna bless this court and all present. Here only the truth shall be spoken. By the wills of his Majesty High King Thorin II of All Dwarrow, and his Majesty King Bard of Dale, this court is now open. Attend to the word of the kings.”

Balin bowed and stepped back to his place. Ori wrote busily as Thorin spoke.

“Thank you, Lord Balin. Good morning everyone.” Thorin paused and shouts of ‘Good morning’ and other greetings were called out. Thorin smiled and nodded.

“As most of you know, we have a special presentation today, so let us take care of business matters first. All wishing to speak may rise and come forward to make their address.”

Bofur reported for the miners guild that a second chunk of mithril, ten feet by thirty-five feet by fifteen, had been successfully removed from the vein and now sat on the main work floor.

Mister Wandi came forward to announce that three new steam rooms were now operating and the tropical plants were flowering.

Hamfast and Bell informed the court that now that the stock was in for the winter, manure wagons would be going around both Dale and the mountain twice a week so please be sure your stable was cleaned by the tenth bell. Also, Bell would be teaching flax spinning in the great room in Dale Hall starting the first of the week.

Then Master Jojuk, head of the printers’ guild, came forward and announced that Lord Faramir had been bonded into the guild with the honorary rank of master printer, and bade the court to note that this was the first time the guild had accepted a non-dwarf, as Lord Faramir had quickly proven his worth to the guild members, and they had voted him in within days of his arrival.

“Besides, he kin hold his drink,” the guild head finished.

Many dwarrow present nodded over this important fact.

“Aye, an’ he laid me ou’ guid an’ proper!” Y’gar attested.

Thorin looked out over the audience.

“Master Faramir, please rise.”

Faramir, who was trying and failing not to blush, rose as bid. Thorin started the applause and, when it eventually died down along with the shouts of ‘well done, laddie’ and ‘guid on yeh’, looked at Faramir again.

“That guild braid suits you.”

“Thank you, your majesty,” Faramir replied with a grin. “It only took me three times to learn how to do it after it was put in.”

“Told yeh he was clever!” the guild head bellowed affectionately.

Ori looked around. The guild head had been the last of the petitioners that morning, and it was clear everyone was waiting for the presentation.

Thorin nodded to Balin, who came to the edge of the dais once more.

“The following presentation has been made possible by His Royal Highness Prince Kili of Erebor and Captain Tauriel of Erys Lasgalen,” Balin said with all due aplomb. He bowed once more and called to the royal entry doors.

“His Royal Highness Prince Kili of Erebor and Captain Tauriel of Erys Lasgalen:”

Ori looked over and smiled with true pleasure. The pair looked lovely. Tauriel was dressed in an elven-style long silk gown of the Durin tartan and a cloak of Erys Lasgalen green. Ori recognized the white gems that sparkled on her neck as those Thorin had given Thranduil, in thanks for Tauriel and Legolas’ service.

Kili was dapper in tunic and trousers of Erys Lasgalen green, trimmed with silver with matching boots, and his cloak was of the Durin tartan. Hand in hand they nodded and smiled at the applause and came up the steps of the dais to bow to the rulers and take their places at the front where Balin and Bain had moved a table with a lectern for their papers.

Kili and Tauriel turned to the rulers again. Thorin nodded and said, “Carry on.”

The pair bowed again and turned to an audience all but wriggling with impatience. Tauriel bowed again and Kili waved.

“Morning all!” he said cheerily, then, “You first, my love.”

“Thank you,” Tauriel replied gravely, but was unable to keep the giggle out of her voice.

“Your majesties, and all peoples here at the open court of the kings, we are here today to present to you and defend research in the thesis of Teyan, daughter of Eyan, journeyman scribe of Khazad-dûm who was killed in the massacre there. She left us her masterwork and we offer it in her name for the title of master of scrivening. Her research was of a subject close to Prince Kili and me, as it defies the histories of the utter separation of the races of Arda. She spent much of her adult life collecting hidden scraps of documents that show how interracial marriage, though publicly frowned upon officially through time, was common and, from what she gathered, very happy and successful.”

This brought a round of applause and a few catcalls to Guenia and Hathor, both of whom shouted out their agreement.

Ori wrote steadily as Kili and Tauriel got to the meat of the thesis. The union of Narvi and Celebrimbor had people shouting that they had always thought the famous pair had done more than ‘just’ work on doors together. Kili and Tauriel presented proof that other high-placed nobles, later reported to have left Khazad-dûm and sought other lands, had never actually left that kingdom at all, but had been bound in mixed marriages, all mention of which had later been stricken from the records.

As their identities and their fates were revealed, many who recognized family names chuckled over this, and at least one dam cried, “Wait, you mean my great great umadel was an elf? No wonder I’m so bleeding tall!”
To which an elf in attendance muttered, “No wonder I’m so short!”
The two stood and stared at each other, and burst out laughing.

As a merry uproar rose, some remarked on other unusually tall or short children that had been born. Where ancient drawings had been handed down in families, some dwarrow remarked on how someone’s udadel or imadel always wore their hair over their ears, or had be know to ‘have trouble’ growing beards. Most of those had traditionally claimed that they were excellent archers, and didn’t mind their beardlessness so much, as they were less likely to get their beards caught in the bow string.

At that, the merriment died down, and the crowd turned curious eyes on Prince Kili.
Kili visibly blanched, and said, “Unfortunately, as far as I know, I don’t have elven blood.”
A mutter of scandal shivered through the crowd at the implications for the fate of Kili’s beard.
Kili took a breath to continue the presentation, but Dubb shot to his feet.

“Yeh don’t, laddie!” Tell me, yeh don’t!”
Kili opened his mouth, then closed it, and Tauriel choked on laughter.

“No,” Kili elucidated. He turned back to look at his family.
Thorin regarded him with amused eye, while Fili turned away, his shoulders betraying his mirth.

“Yeh don’t, he does,” said Dis, “and both the king and I gave our permission. The scabbing from a torn beard is dreadful, as we all know. Please sit down before you faint. Pray continue, inudoy.”
“Mahal wept,” moaned Dubb, and he dropped into his chair.
“No, I bloody didn’t,” came the hot boom in Ori’s mind.
“No, He didn’t,” Ori said clearly before he thought.

When the gales of laughter died down and Dubb had yelled at the ceiling that “It’s jus’ n expression!” To Kili he shouted, “If yer goin’ t’ do it, lad, kin yeh no’ ma’e it look less li’e a warg’s breakfast?”

Butter raised her head with an outraged look, while Sugar woofed.

“To continue,” said Tauriel in her ‘captain giving orders’ voice.
Kili gazed up at her with naked gratitude.

Silence blanketed the room as the spectators looked around themselves, perhaps trying to pick out these undiscovered Durins.
Kili took a breath and a sip of water and set on the lectorum the packet of notes Mistress Dazla had give them over breakfast. Ori was impressed at how neatly and concisely Kili explained the secret love affair of the king and Lady Elwing of the Noldor.

“So,” he concluded, “we’ve been blessed with the presence of Imadel Eldura, daughter of Durin VI, this whole time, and we didn’t even know it. We’ve always called her by the name and title she prefers: Mistress Dazla, head housekeeper to the Durin kings.”

He finished and turned to bow at Mistress Dazla, who had joined Marga and Vi behind the sofa at the start of the presentation. Dressed in her best uniform, and bearing the keys to the house, she smiled and nodded proudly to him.

“Any questions?” Kili piped up.
No one said a word. Kili and Tauriel glanced worriedly at each other. They both looked at the kings. Thranduil raised an eyebrow. Thorin shrugged. The royal party looked out over the audience, most of whom sat staring at Kili and Tauriel with their mouths open.
Thorin allowed the silence to extend for a few moments more, then spoke with a little more volume.

“Are there questions for the defense of this thesis, or is it accepted?
People looked around at each other, and there were a few mutters, but no one said anything.
He turned to Ori.
“First chair?”
Ori nodded.

“Then the thesis has been accepted.” Thorin rose and stood before his throne. “The title of master is thus conveyed upon Teyan, daughter of Eyan, late of Khazad-dûm.” Thorin paused. “We must convey the bead of mastery to Master Teyan.”

“Here I am!” Teyan poofed into view, almost running to the throne.
Ori saw the air shimmer nearer to Kili and Tauriel, and two other dwarrow appeared on the dais, dressed in the antique robes of scribes.

He turned and caught Sadi’s eye.
She mouthed, “S’tuk and Whilf!”
“Seriously?” he mouthed back.
“Yes!” she replied soundlessly, and waved her fingers to urge him to action.

“Be’er do yer first chair thing, laddie,” Mahal’s hot boom came from the back of Ori’s head.
Ori nodded to Balin, who rose and took Ori’s place at the scribe’s stand, while Ori approached the two strange dwarrow and bowed.

“Masters, I am Lord Ori of Fundin House and First Chair of the Guild of Scribes. I welcome you to Erebor, seat of the high king of all dwarrow.”

Both bowed in return, each wreath in smiles. Ori turned to Thorin.

“Your majesty, prince consort, may I present to you Masters S’tuks, son of Dutuk and Whilf, daughter of Nililf, founders of the guild of scribes under Durin the Deathless.”

Thorin smiled benignly at the pair of ghosts. Bilbo seemed amused. Ori turned back to them.

“Masters S’tuk and Whilf, His Majesty King Thorn II, known as Oakenshield, and his consort, Professor Bilbo Baggins.”

The legendary scribes bowed deeply to Thorin and Bilbo on the throne. Ori continued indicating to the Dale first family

“His Majesty King Bard of the City of Dale and his consort, King-Father Thranduil, late of Erys Lasgalen.”

The dead masters bowed again and the Dale royals nodded and smiled politely.

Ori looked at Roäc on his perch on Thorin’s right shoulder.

“Roäc, King of Ravens,” Ori said and then turned to Red Queen on her intricate iron stand inlaid with rubies.

“Her Majesty The Red Queen of All Bone Breakers, and, um, Baluchistan.”

Both birds were allotted bows and looks of wonder from the founding scribes. Baluchistan shouted, “Howdy!”

Ori beckoned to the chairs of the scribes guild and presented them. He looked out over the throne room.

“All scribes, guilded and free, of all races residing in Erebor and Dale, please rise,” Ori said.

There was a scuffling and all the scribes popped up to their feet, mostly dwarrow, but several the race of men and a couple of elves also rose. The masters and the throng bowed amiably to each other.

Ori bowed again to the masters, giving them the floor to perform the braiding of mastery for Teyan. Fortunately, the master had brought the beads with them, and they did the ceremony with all due pomp and circumstance, and then brought Teyan to the front of the dais.

“Master Teyan!” the pair announced together.

Teyan bowed. Everyone rose as one and burst into loud applause. Teyan looked about, then a grin crossed her face and she crowed,

“You like me! You really like me!” And she flung herself on both masters in an encompassing hug.

They patted her, amused, and murmured. She released them quickly and bounced over to Tauriel and Kili who stood by, beaming at her.

“Thank you both so much,” she squealed and, unable to hug them, settled for hopping up and down in front of them.
“Thank you for writing about something so important to my wife and I,” Kili said with surprising formality. The three bowed to each other.

Thorin rose and delivered a speech about the importance of history and standing together as united before the valar as the people of Arda.
The masters and Teyan gave a final bow.
“You’ve all done very well!” Master Whilf called out.
“Don’t forget the proper use of the Orocarni comma,” adjured S’tuk.
“You and you bloody Orocarni comma,” Whilf grunted.
S’tuk rounded on her.
“You can have my Orocarni comma when you can pry it from my cold, dead hands!” he barked.
“We’re both already dead, you idiot,” Whilf sighed.
“Well, come get it,” S’tuk challenged as they faded from sight.
“Bye!” shrieked Tayen to all assembled and she, too, vanished.
Everyone gave a round of applause once more.

Then, instead of nodding to Balin to adjourn open court, Thorin and Bilbo stepped down from the throne and came to Kili and Tauriel. Dis and Dori rose and joined them as did Bard and Thranduil. Fili approached to stand next to his brother, and Sigrid stood by Tauriel. Their presentation table and materials were moved aside.

Ori returned to his post and watched over Thorin’s shoulder as Kili and Tauriel, obviously confused, were turned to face the Durin King.

“What are you doing, Idad?” Kili asked, low, though secrecy was impossible in a chamber where he could be heard at a whisper from two hundred feet away.
“I’m performing your marriage ceremony,” Thorin replied.
Every scribe in the room cried out and fumbled for their paper and graphite wands.
“Shit!” Omi hissed. “Ooops, sorry.”
“Marriage ceremony?” Kili asked weakly. He turned to Tauriel, who looked just as startled as Kili.
“A dwarf prince needs a dwarven marriage,” said Thorin. “Seems like an excellent day for it.”
“So, that’s why we had to dress like this!” Kili cried.
“Of course it is, inudoy,” said Dis. “Do you think I’d put you in your good tunic for anything less?”
“I did think you were taking a terrible risk,” Kili admitted.
Thorin cleared his throat.
“Shall we begin? Assuming neither of you objects?”
“Of course not!” Kili said, his voice on the edge of breaking with nerves.
“Please, continue, your majesty,” said Tauriel, with a soldier’s composure.
Thorin sang the first verse of the old khuzdul blessing song, and everyone joined in.
Then the elves present sang the sindarin blessing song, and Ori realized that Thorin sang it with them, his voice notably deeper than any elves, but blending pleasingly, at least to Ori’s ears.
The last of notes echoed around them.
“Kili, Tauriel, join hands,” said Thorin. “Now, repeat your vows after me.”
He spoke at a regular pace for Kili, but more slowly and carefully for Tauriel:
“As Mahal has forged us for each other, let us seek to make each other happy. Let us forge a new family and a new life together, as did all our ancestors.”
Nor did Ori miss that ‘all’, and everything it meant.
When Thorin called for the beads, Fili took them from one of his pouches, and dropped them into Dori’s hand for the blessing.
As she offered them to the couple, Kili cried, “Fi! You did it! They look great!”
“Thank you,” said Fili dryly. “Pay attention, cram brain.”
Tauriel tilted her head.
Kili blushed.
“I designed these with the hope of making and giving them to you one day. I didn’t realize Fili would beat me to it. On the other hand, I didn’t think we were getting married today, either. Do you… you like ‘em, right?”

“Yes, melleth nin, I like them very much.”

At this juncture, Frodo rode across the floor and up the steps on the back of Posey, whose saddle had gained gay ribbons for the occasion. In his long, Durin blue waistcoat, Frodo dismounted and strode across to them, carrying a covered tray. He presented this to Thorin.

“Thank you, Lord Muffin,” said the king.

Frodo bowed and took his place next to Bilbo.

Thorin lifted the cloth to reveal, not Gridr’s silver brushes, but the hair brushes of Bilbo and Frodo.

“I hope you don’t mind if we bully our way into the ceremony, my dears,” said Bilbo. “If one of you were mine, it would be traditional for you to use my brush to tidy your hair for your wedding.”

A stool was brought forth for Tauriel to sit while Kili did her braid.

“Well done,” said Thorin as he admired Kili’s handiwork.

“Thank you, idad,” said Kili.

“Why can’t you do that to your own hair this well?” Thorin asked.

“I could, but I’m trying to maintain my carefree, whimsical appearance,” said Kili.

Thorin actually laughed in surprise and delight.

Kili took the bead from his hand and clapped it into Tauriel’s hair.

Then Kili stood on the stool and Tauriel braided and clasped his hair.

He turned before she could pull back, and gave her a smack of a kiss.

Thorin growled, “No leaping ahead in the ceremony.”

“Sorry,” said Kili. “I couldn’t pass up the opportunity.”

“Down,” said Thorin, though he couldn’t hide his grin.

Kili leapt down and Dwalin pulled away the stool. As the warrior turned again, he caught Ori’s eye and winked at him.

Thranduil handed Thorin an embroidered ribbon.

“Thank you, brother king,” said Thorin.

Thranduil inclined his head graciously.

Thorin went to wind the ribbon around their clasped hands, then hesitated.

“Dis?”

He held out the ribbon.

She took it with a smile and did the honors herself.

“May Mahal and Eru bless this union,” she said. “May Yavanna make it fruitful. May you walk into eternity together.”

Under the cheers of all assembled, Dis touched brows with her newly-married children.

Thranduil kissed Tauriel’s forehead, murmuring in Sindarin,

“Be happy, my daughter.”

“Thank you, Ada, I believe I will be.”

The table was brought back, and the contracts rolled out to be signed.

Instead of a coffee hour, ale and wine were served, a band quickly assembled and the doors flung open to the world.

Ori heard the heralds of Erebor calling out the news of the new marriage. The door to the kitchens opened and refreshments brought in, so the party began.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The family is swelling and more than previously expected! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

When they finally reached the gates of Fundin House, Bard climbed off his horse, then stretched and yawned. Tilda was drooping a little. She had spent the party romping with all her school friends as well as all her friends among the scribes guild and the library staff. Ori shook his head. Both he and Sigrid had lost track of what Tilda ate, and Ori thought it was likely too sweet and too much. Everyone alit and the stable hands rushed out and laughed with delight as Thorin looked them over, then greeted them without emotion, “Brats of Durin VI.”

The guards dismounted and formed up, awaiting orders.

“At ease,” Dwalin barked.

Most of the soldiers relaxed with grateful sighs. Haldir still stood at attention, his uniform, overlaid with the tabard of the city guard, immaculate as usual.

Ori reflected that elf soldiers never seemed to stand ‘at ease’, except for Glorfindel, who never did anything else.

Dwalin looked to Thorin with a questioning brow.

“I think the guards can stand down for the rest of the day,” said Thorin. “I doubt any of us will be going out again.”

Dwalin gave them a look over, and signaled Furh’nk to dismiss them, which he did.

Eowyn grabbed Haldir’s collar and pulled it down, to reveal a love bite of truly wondrous proportions.

“Mister Wandi got you last night!”

“Get off!” he barked, trying in vain to detach her.

“Faramir! Come look at this!”

The Gondorian sighed and laughed.

“Eowyn! Give him back his collar! Terribly sorry, sir. I’m Faramir of Gondor and she’s a pest.”

“I’m Haldir and I am besieged. We have met before, by the way.”

“We have? I’m so sorry, I don’t remember.”

“You were spectacularly drunk,” said Haldir as he batted absently at Eowyn, who would not leave the elf’s collar alone.

“Oh! Lothlorien, right?” Faramir recalled. “You’re the captain of Lady Galadriel’s guard.”

“At your service. The daughters of men can be very rude and… pushy.”

“That’s what we like about them,” Faramir replied.

“We’re not any pushier than Mister Wan-deeee,” Eowyn sang.

Finally, she released him.

“Yes, well,” said Haldir, as he restored his collar. “That’s what I like about him.”

Eowyn turned to Faramir.

“I’m a pest, am I?”

“Aren’t you?” Faramir challenged with a smile.

“That’s not to the point,” said Eowyn. “Oh, look, there’s Tauri trying to rescue her hubby from his new father-in-law.”
She moved around him to go to her friend, but not before pinching Faramir’s arse. Faramir squawked and the soldiers laughed uproariously.

Targ patted Faramir’s arm.

“Lad, yer screwed.”

Haldir smirked.

“I hardly think he minds.” He turned to Faramir and said, “Wandi and I live in apartments above the Palace of Health and Beauty. We are at home to visitors in the mornings after third rest day. If your schedule allows, please come for tea.”

“So Mister Wandi can interrogate me?” Faramir asked.

“I should think that was obvious,” said Haldir.

Ori chuckled and began to unhitch Honda from the teacup, but Gibi pushed in front of him with a grin.

“Sorry, Lord Ori, this is a job for a Brat of Durin VI.”

Ori gave him a look.

“How long have you been in service to Mistress Dazla, Gib?”

“That would be telling, milord.”

“I’m a scribe, I’m supposed to tell”

“I’m not.”

Ori went into the house through the stable door and headed to his room. Dwalin was there, pulling off his uniform for more comfortable clothes.

“Hey, me love.”

Ori walked over and buried his face in Dwalin’s chest fur.

“I love you,” he said. “You’re such a normal Durin.”

Dwalin threw back his head and roared with laughter.

“Yeh go’ a real strange sense a’ normal, me love.”

“You know, last spring I never imagined I would know so much about them, or anything else, as I do now.”

“Aye, secret Durins, secret hobbits, meltin’ balrogs. All a days work now, ain’t it?”

“The melting balrog took two weeks.”

“Picky, ain’t yeh.”

“Yes, which is why I married you.”

“An’ here I was thinkin’ it were jus’ f’r me cute arse.” “I’m very picky about which arses I think are cute.”

Ori grinned up at his husband, who narrowed his eyes then kissed him. Ori kissed back, thinking this was an excellent way to spend the rest of the day, but Dori’s voice caroled down the hallway.

“Pet! Our Deary! It’s tea time!”

Ori and Dwalin looked at each other, then at the timepiece on the bedside table.

“It’s too bloody early f’r tea,” Dwalin growled.

“We only had party treats for elevenses and lunch,” Ori sighed. “Dori’s probably worried about our constitutions.”

“Oh aye, I’m jus’ fadin’ away righ’ now.”

“Yes, “ Ori giggled, “we’re both just worn to threads.”

“C’mon, yeh wee rascal. Ge’ yersel’ outa them glad rags, b’fore our Dori has a conniption.”

“Or worse,” said Ori, “comes looking for us.”

They all assembled once more in the sitting room in Fundin House. Dori bustled about with with Mistress Dazla, Gridr, and Binni, the four of them giggling about how successful the wedding had been.

Dis pretended to grouse as Kili and Tauriel sat themselves in her lap.

“Nana!” Tauriel cried and hugged Dis hard. No one knew what Dis replied, as she was buried in silk and elf hair.

Thranduil looked over the pile on Dis with amusement.

“Why, Dis, is that you under these fawns?”

Dis seized Tauriel and Kili around the waists and heaved them off her as she rose. They rolled giggling onto the couch. Dis shook out her skirts, then fixed Thranduil with the pin of her eye.

“Thranduil,” she said, levelly.

“Dis,” Thranduil replied, ready to be amused. To his surprise, Dis stepped forward and hugged him. Thranduil gave an audible gasp of surprise, recovered his composure, and gently wrapped his arms about her. Dis withdrew and cocked an eye at him.

“Welcome to the family…. Brother.”

Dis’ grin was pure evil mirth.

Thranduil blinked, then replied calmly.

“Sister.”

Dis smiled, sweetly.

“And all that that entails.”

Then Jani walked in and Kili and Tauriel leapt up and surrounded her, shouting rapturously, “Mam! Mam!”

Jani batted at them.

“Get outa here, ya loonies! If I was yer mam, I’d’ve sent ya back where ya come from!”

“But, Nana, aren’t you going to give your blessing?” Tauriel cooed.

Dis tried to extract her lover from their embrace, but was laughing too hard to be much use.

“Does she truly mean that?” Thranduil asked Ori aside.

“Oh, yes. Jani would definitely send them back.”

“Not Jani, as you well know.”

Ori smiled.

“How long have you known dwarrow? Besides long enough to see the worst of us? Family means everything. If Dis calls you her brother, then you’re her brother. Of course, that makes you Thorin’s brother, too.”

“I was afraid you’d say that.”

Ori snickered.

“You adore Thorin. But don’t worry, your secret is safe with me.”

“You are very good,” said Thranduil, “though, I suppose not good enough to avoid the temptation of using that fact as leverage whenever I’m being… naughty?”

“You show the wisdom of your centuries, king-father.”

“You’re a brat.”

“Takes one to know one.”

“True. Dorwinian?” Thranduil gestured with the bottle.

“Yes, please.”

Throrin and Bilbo returned from Bag-End East, far less formally dressed, and minus two faunts and one warg.

“Napping,” said Bilbo, to Dori’s unspoken question as the couple flopped down on the couch.

“Tilda’s tucked into a spare bed and Sugar is with them.”

Elrond entered from the kitchen, still talking over his shoulder, and now carrying a tray of blackberry tarts. Ori heard Mistress Dazla laughing.

Elrond put down the tray on the table, and caught Thorin grinning at him.

“I’m eminently trainable, as you see,” said Elrond.

“I can vouch for that,” said Lindir as he reached around for a tart.

Elrond sat next to Thorin, his expression suddenly much more sober.

“I received your letter about your sister-in-law’s poetry. I had just enough time to read it before Lady Galadriel appeared and we found ourselves in your sitting room. I am sorry to hear that your brother still plagues you, all of you.”

Thorin sighed. Bilbo held his hand and Thorin squeezed it.
“Thank you,” said Thorin. “Really, I never believed I would be entirely rid of him. Durins are nothing if not stubborn, and Frerin never met a grudge he couldn’t hold. He knew just where to attack me, of course.”

“Your overtures to other races,” Elrond surmised.

“Yes,” said Thorin. “It’s hard to overstate what a giant risk it was for the Durins to reach out to other dwarf clans, never mind people of other races. Conventional wisdom says we are generally despised, seen as greedy and conniving.”

Elrond shook his head.

“I think, in his anger and paranoia, he sees your alliances as far more fragile than they are. No one who has met your people, never mind your family, would ever believe such things of you.”

“Thank you,” said Thorin. “I think I needed to hear that. Perhaps that isn’t a weakness a king should admit, but the trust goes both ways.”

“Thank you, as well,” said Elrond as he chose a tart.

“Yes,” said Bilbo, “family should stick together. Really, Thorin, and I thought I was related to half the world.”

Dwalin set Ori on his lap and took a sip of Ori’s wine.

“Durins don’ have a family tree, s’ much as a family thicket,” he said.

Ori helped himself to another tart and Miss Oqizla came out of the kitchen with a large laundry basket, full of blankets. She brought it to Red Queen, who perched by the fire.

“Here we are, ma’am. Mister Agrib is off to the aerie to get another warming pack. He should be back in a shake of a lamb’s tail, but I’ve buried a hot brick among the blankets with your eggs. Housekeeping’s giving your egg bag a wash and it’ll be dry and ready soon enough.”

“Oh, how nice,” Red Queen approved as she inspected the basket. “And quite the right temperature as well. You have our gratitude.”

Oqizla curtseyed and went out. Baluchistan hopped up on the basket and sat right down on his butt and spread his wings.

“Righ’, me wee apple puddin’, all under control here. Yeh ge’ some treats an’ th’ gossip an’ enjoy yerself!”

Ori tried vainly not to choke on his mouthful.

“Papa Baluchistan’s on th’ job,” Dwalin hissed in his ear. Ori elbowed him.

Roäc winged in, but instead of going to Thorin, he landed on Fili’s knee.

“It’s time!” he intoned.

“Time for what?” Fili asked, rather mystified.

“Garnet’s and Quartz’s clutch with your raven is hatching,” Roäc informed him. “You must come to the aerie and bond with the hatchling. Hurry up.”

“Oh!” Fili rose as Roäc fluttered upwards. Sigrid got up as well.

“I’m comin’ t’ be with me lass,” Dwalin said.

He stood, with Ori in his arms.

“Fili! Roäc!” Ori cried. “Am I allowed to document the event?”

Roäc gave his hissing laugh and Sigrid turned dancing eyes on him.

“Sounds like you’re in. Come on.”

Ori and Dwalin followed the pair out to the royal cavern.

“Are you planning on putting me down any time soon?” Ori asked.

“Spoil me fun,” Dwalin pretended to grumble, but did let him stand on his own.

Roäc led them up the steps to where they had watched the lava bleed. Half way up the stairs there was a sharp turn and a tunnel off to the left. Roäc went through a bolt hole above a door, which Fili opened.

Ori was expecting a cold wind from outside to hit them, but there was only warmth, the smell of feathers, and the noises of the roosting ravens. Thousands of ravens.

Ori stepped in and looked about in astonishment. He had never given much thought to where the ravens of Erebor lived. To his embarrassment, he realized he’d had a vague idea of something on the order of a largish hen house.
Now that he took a moment to reflect, he realized that King Roäc would never live any place less than grand.

“Imagine what Binni could do with all this,” said Ori.

“I try no’ t’,” said Dwalin.

The ravens lived in one, enormous cavern pocketed inside the mountain, bathed in the glow of natural phosphorous. Nests were tucked in every open space and wedged in rocky crags. All manner of trinkets, gems, and oddities that the ravens had taken a fancy to lay in a thick blanket around each nest.

Ori had a sudden thought that it might be interesting to catalog which ravens had taken what and from whom over the generations of ravens that had dwelt in the mountain during the course of dwarf history.

Sigrid stared around in wonder.

“This is amazing! I was sort of expecting something like a hen house.”

Ori sealed his mouth shut and Roäc snorted disgustedly.

“Do you shit where you sleep? Silly manchild, we’re Birds, not birds.” “Of course,” Sigrid said quickly. “I never really thought about what might ravens do.”

With another snort for good measure, Roäc guided them to a rocky outcrop and stopped next to a nest slightly apart and above the others. Bits of gold, and silver, and cut and polished gems surrounded this nest like a crown on the head of a king. The outcrop overlooked a far deeper crag than the others, nearly a cavern all its own. Ori peeked down, onto the huge nests of the Bonebreakers far below.

Dwalin leveled himself behind the royal nest and ran a finger down Garnet’s back.

“Doin’ alright’, me lass?”

Garnet arched into his touch.

“Rub between my wings,” she creaked.

Quartz promptly flew into Ori face and nibbled at his ears and beard.

“Ori! I’m about to be an adad! I’m thrilled! Worried! So much work!”

“I’m sure you’ll be a wonderful adad,” Ori soothed, stroking down the ruffled feathers and pressing the black body against his cheek. “You have instincts and Garnet’s done this before.”

“True,” Quartz agreed. Then he narrowed his eyes in suspicion. “Other ravens of the household helping you?”

“Yes, thank you, they are,” Ori assured him then grinned and whispered, “But it’s not the same.”

Quartz pressed his head against Ori’s as Sigrid and Fili sat down next to Garnet on her nest.

Garnet blinked as Dwalin’s finger made tiny circles between her wings, then her eyes flew open and she rose. They all looked in eagerly, Ori taking notes and sketching. Three of the eggs had cracks across them. Both Sigrid and Ori squeaked as a little beak poked out. Two more beaks popped out and the babies struggled free. Ori looked closely at the tiny creatures, naked and eyes tightly closed. Ori glanced over at a shocked noise from Garnet. The fourth egg did not have any cracks, but it was slowly rolling around the nest. Dwalin frowned and steered the egg away from running over its nest mates.

In the quiet, they all heard it. A tiny voice.

“Help!”

Then,

“Get me out of here!”

Then,

“Why’s it so bloody dark?”

Fili, Sigrid and Ori all stared at each other. Quartz and Garnet stared at the egg. Dwalin muttered, “Wha’ th’ fuck?”

There was a loud crack and a head came out, the shell rolled, and the rest of the hatching fell out. This one didn’t fall instantly down to rest. It stood up and looked about it, eyes wide open.

The cavern erupted in caws and cheers for the new heir of King Roäc, but Roäc himself looked at the nestling with narrowed eyes.

“Where in Mahal’s name am I?” the chick cried.
Fili leaned forward excitedly.
“Your eyes are open. Hello, little one.”
The raven turned, looked all the way up at Fili, squawked, and fell over.
“What the fuck? Where am I? Why’re you so bloody tall?”
The raven waved its tiny wings, then looked at its wings.
“What the fuck? I have wings? Fuck! I’m naked.”
The tiny raven dove for a shell then stopped looking up at Garnet.
Garnet looked down at her chick. Ori was sure if she had them, one of Garnet’s eyebrows would be raised.

“Oi! This....” The chick looked about again, then hopped in delight. “Wheee, I’m a raven! Ha ha! I’ll be able to fly! This is just grand!”

It turned back and cocked its head at Fili.
“I remember you! You’re Fili! You’re my - ha! - my great grand chick!”
Fili cocked his head to the side.
“I’m your what?”
“My chick’s chick’s chick! Dis’ lad!”
Fili’s mouth dropped open.
“Udad Thror?”
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Heaven’s to Betsy! Is that really Thror? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori stared as his pen scribbled wildly, recording everything. Sigrid looked horrified. Dwalin looked ready to pounce, and Fili’s face was expressionless and set like stone.

The little raven hopped about, getting used to its new legs, then stared up at Fili again. “What’s the matter, my lad?”

“I’m not ‘your lad’,” Fili said, steel in his voice. “Are you Thror returned from the Halls as a raven?”

“Er….” The raven took a step back, then ruffled its nonexistent feathers and stepped forward again.

“I am. Mahal gave me leave to come back and try again. I don’t remember much, but I learned I did terrible things and failed as a king and a dwarf. I asked to try again.”

Fili regarded the raven for a long time.

“If you given me your word that you are going to better yourself, then I will accept you as my raven. Understand, Thorin is the High King of all dwarrow. I am his heir and my loyalty to him is complete.”

“Aye, I accept,” the chick chirped. “Now-”

“How is it that you remember me?” Fili demanded.

“I learned of you in the Halls. I asked the Maker if I could help you.”

“I see. Beside me is Sigrid Bardsdatter. Bard is the King of Dale and our ally. Sigrid and I will be married at Yule.”

The raven chick stared at Sigrid, then blinked and flapped its little, naked wings.

“Is this a political union?” it asked.

“No!” Sigrid cried, startled into speech. “We love each other!”

“Oh!” The chick looked from one to the other then bowed. “I wish you both very happy! Then I’ll be raven to both of you.”

“You will swear an oath of loyalty to Thorin as your king,” Fili said sternly.

“Or,” Dwalin growled, “Yer f’r th’ cook pot an’ I’ll eat yeh f’r breakfast.”

The hatchling hopped ‘round and looked up.

“Fundinson! Dwalin! What the fuck happened to your hair? You’re as bald as an elf’s arse!”

Dwalin turned to Fili.

“I’m eatin’ him anyway.”

Fili unbent enough to laugh. He rose and addressed the chick.

“For now, I think you’d best let Garnet sit on you and get you food and I’ll discuss it with Thorin.”

Ori looked at Garnet and Quartz, who honestly looked as horrified as ravens could look.

The chick glanced at the two ravens and said,

“No offense meant…er…parents.” The chick looked up and flapped its tiny wings harder. “Ah, come on, take me with you. I want to see everything again. Not that I can really see much of anything. Why is everything so blurry?”
Roäc scoffed, “You were just hatched, dumdumel.”
“Roäc?” the chick said wonderingly.
“Hush or I’ll eat you,” Roäc replied genially.
Fili paused, then exchanged looks with Sigrid. Sigrid smiled naughtily and took out her handkerchief. She leaned close and scooped the hatchling into it and covered the chick with her hand.
“Oh, this is nice and warm,” the muffled voice said.
“Bloody weird,” Quartz managed as Garnet settled down on her three remaining hatchings.
“Bloody fuckin’ weird,” Roäc added. He ruffled his feathers. “I had word, but I never thought his brain would come through that fast.”
“Yeh alrigh’, me Garnet?” Dwalin asked as he regained the stone path.
“Yes,” she croaked. “But my Quartz has it right, that was weird. The chick will need food soon, and a great deal of it. Keep it warm.” Garnet adjured Fili and Sigrid. Sigrid raised her hand to her ear.
“He’s snoring,” she reported, making all of them chuckle.
Ori held Dwalin’s hand as they followed Sigrid and Fili back down to the royal cavern. Fili and Sigrid were talking quietly, so they wouldn’t wake the chick, despite the fact Sigrid had bestowed it in her pocket.
“I don’t know what idad’s going to say,” Fili sighed.
“He’s reasonable, and if Thror gives an oath of loyalty and in front of the family, this will probably work out. Don’t worry too much, my love, when he isn’t with you I’ll keep him close. Also, we’re both forgetting Roäc as well as the other ravens. They are loyal to Thorin, as they’ve often demonstrated. I don’t think Roäc will let Thror take the tiniest hop out of line.”
“I meant what I said. I’ll eat him before Dwalin, if he does,” Roäc promised
“Yes,” Fili agreed. “But I’m going to insist he take an oath of loyalty to Thorin and in front of our allies as well. He’ll need to go by a raven name though. We don’t want to confuse people.”
“True.”
Ori gave voice to his worry.
“Wait,” he said and stopped. The others also stopped and looked at him.
“What’s up, Ori-mate?”
“Fili, we can’t let Frerin find out about Thror.”
Fili smiled grimly.
“I’ve already thought about that. It’s going to be explained to him and included in his vow of loyalty.”
“Sensible, lad,” Dwalin praised and hugged Ori close to his side. Ori wrapped his arms around his husband.
“Sorry, I should have realized-
“Oi,” Dwalin teased, “wha’ I tell yeh ‘bou’ apologizin’ when yeh need t’ say somethin’?”
Ori cocked a naughty eye at Dwalin.
“So, that’s not just for the bedroom?”
Dwalin dropped his head in Ori’s hair and stifled his laughter. Fili and Sigrid giggled.
“Too much information, Ori-mate,” Fili joked.
“Seems like Ori really does talk all the time,” Sigrid added with a wicked grin.
“Oräc,” Roäc said. “The chick’s name is Oräc.
“Oräc,” Ori repeated and wrote it down.
“Little Oräc,” Sigrid cooed, her hand in her pocket, warming it. “You know, Sig,” Ori said with a grin, “it’s going to be very useful if every time you put him under your hand or in your pocket, he goes to sleep.”
Fili chuckled again.
“We’ll definitely be putting that to use.”
They entered the house and Dwalin stopped them all in the receiving room, except for Roäc, who flew through the raven bolthole above the door and into the sitting room.

“Fili, lad, I’m thinkin’ yeh should go b’fore us an’ drop th’ news. Tha’ way they kin all ge’ their shoutin’ outa themselves an’ it’ll keep th’ chick asleep. If yeh don’t fancy it, I’ll do it.”

“Instead of that,” Sigrid said, “I’ll stay here and you all go in. That way, Fili, you have back up with Ori and Dwalin.”

Fili kissed her gratefully and escorted her to one of the armchairs at the far end of the receiving room. He came back and Ori and Dwalin followed him into the sitting room.

Roäc was perched on the stone table before the hearth and everyone turned to look at Fili.

“Fili,” Thorin rose. “Roäc is being unnecessarily obtuse. Is something wrong?”

“No, not exactly,” Fili said, slowly.

“Is it healthy?” Dis asked. “You look worried, my son. Come and sit down.”

Fili went over to the fireplace but remained standing.

“The chick is healthy and hearty. It can both stand and speak, and its eyes are fully open.”

“How very unusual,” Red Queen said.

“Very,” Thorin agreed.

“Mahal granted the request of someone from the Halls to live again. To try again to live life honorably and to the precepts of Mahal and Yavanna. Mahal granted this request.”

“Oooo,” Vi squealed. “Is it someone we know?”

“Yes,” Fili allowed.

Thorin came to Fili’s side and place his hand on Fili’s shoulder.

“Out with it, Fili. Who has retuned to us?”

“Thror.”

Dis screamed.

Ori watched Thorin’s expression hardened. The room echoed with jabbering on all sides. Jani, Balin, and Dori restrained Dis, helped by Margr and Vi.

“Where is he?” Dis growled. “I’ll kill him!”

“Silence!”

Everyone looked at Thorin.

“Is this true, Fili? Are you certain?”

“Yes, he said so himself and Roäc knows him.”

“I do,” Roäc affirmed.

“Fuckin’ eh!” Baluchistan croaked, still spayed out over the basket of blankets. “Again?”

“Who is Thror?” Red Queen asked. “We must know all the facts.”

Balin gave Red Queen a brief rundown of the events of Thror’s life. Ori didn’t think she looked impressed.

“Brother King,” Red Queen turned to Thorin, “if it is your wish, we shall eat this annoying hatching.”

Thorin glanced about the room.

“Have we all vented our anger?”

Most people nodded.

“No,” Dis growled.

Thorin sighed.

“Is it at least under control?”

“I’ll never forgive him.”

“I’ll take that as a ‘yes’. As this would work best with everyone seated and able to speak and hear, I suggest we move to the breakfast parlor and convene as a council.” Thorin looked at Fili.

“Where is the chick? With Garnet?”

“No,” Fili grinned. “Asleep in Sigrid’s pocket.”

A ripple of laughter went around the room.

“Is he being civil to her?” Dis demanded.

“Yes, Amad.” Fili went to his mother and kissed her cheek. “He asked if it was a political union, and when Sigrid informed him ours was a love match, he congratulated us and offered to be raven to both of us. The best part seems to be that once he is in Sigrid’s hand he falls instantly asleep.”

“How very amicable of him,” Elrond chuckled.

Everyone filed through to the breakfast parlor and seated themselves in what Ori now thought of as their seats. Ori prepared his paper and inks for the council notes. Mistress Dazla and her team removed the tea things from the sitting room and set out ale and wine on the sideboard in the breakfast parlor. People helped themselves. Miss Oqizla came out of the kitchen with a saucer of chopped, uncooked bacon which she set at Sigrid’s empty seat. Mistress Dazla brought out platters of fruit.

“So you don’t spoil your dinners,” she admonished them.

“Fili,” Thorin sighed again. “Please ask Sigrid to come in.”

Fili disappeared out the door and, a moment later, walked back in with Sigrid. She smiled at Thorin and went to him. Her hands were folded over in front of her. She opened them under Thorin’s gaze. Ori could see the chick curled up in her handkerchief. In the silence, everyone could hear the tiny snores. Ori quickly drew Sigrid and Fili holding the chick for Thorin to look at, her hands lowered so Frodo and Sam could see. Tilda stared. Red Queen, once more attired in her harness with her eggs cozy inside, perched on her chair and Baluchistan, Sapphire and Beryl settled on the table with Roäc.

Thorin nodded to Sigrid. She sat down and removed the handkerchief and the chick blinked.

“Eh? Oh aye, Sigrid, right? Fili’s betrothed. What’s to do, lass?”

“It’s time for you to take your oath to Thorin II, High King of All Dwarrow,” Sigrid told him.

“Oh! Right you are, lass.” The chick stood up, yawned hugely and looked up at her. “I’m ready.”

The chick turned looked up at Fili beside her. “I’m doing things right this time ’round.”

“Good,” said Fili and gestured to the side.

The chick turned and looked at Thorin.

Ori hadn’t thought what to expect, but it wasn’t the chick gasping and then crying out in a choked voice.

“Thorin! Our Thrain’s first! Wee one!”

The chick hopped out of Sigrid’s hand and fell on Thorin’s sleeve.

“Look at you! All grown up. I remember rolling you around the floor on your belly. You were a wee round ball of giggles!”

Thranduil snorted into his wine and Fili and Kili gulped, but managed not to comment. Thorin colored a little, then looked sternly at the chick now standing on the table next to his hand.

“Fili, Sigrid, and Roäc tell me that you are Thror retuned from the Halls as a raven.”

The chick straightened itself.

“I am. And I’m to be Crown Prince Fili’s and Sigrid, the Lady…er…” The chick looked wildly at Sigrid

“Yes, I remember that! I’m ready to take my oath to you, Thorin II, The Oakenshield, High King of All Dwarrow.” Ori noted that the chick seemed to enjoy rattling off all Thorin’s titles.

Thorin regarded the chick.

“You said you wanted to try again. What do you remember of your reign?”

The chick shifted, then made a loud peep and its mouth flew open and stayed that way. The chick hopped nervously.

“Shove some food in the beak,” Sapphire instructed. “It may be Thror, but a chick needs food and sleep.”

Sigrid took up some bits on bacon, and with the practiced ease of dealing with chickens, put a piece in, and pushed it down the craning neck. Four more followed until the chick was able to close its mouth on its own.

“I don’t remember much. I remember Frerin as a wee….”

The chick dropped on the table and fell asleep. Sigrid put her hand over it to keep it warm.
“This could take a while,” Kili commented.
Thranduil started to giggle and soon everyone was quietly laughing.
“This is rich,” Elrond said.
“I don’t trust him,” Dis hissed.
Roäc hopped over to her.
“He’ll behave. He’s in my line now and will behave or else. My flock will watch him, as will all of you.” Roäc turned to the men and elves at the table. “The slightest hint of anything, and I want to know.”
“Of course,” Bard said. “We remember his reign. I suppose when he wakes up, we’ll find out what he remembers.”
“Thorin as a little naked raven chick.” Thranduil, Ori reflected, was enjoying this.
“Adananna,” Tilda piped up, “I’ve got some doll clothes that might fit him.”
Both Thorin and Dis choked over this. Roäc ruffled his feathers.
“The down will grow in in a day or so, then feathers. I don’t think doll clothes will serve, nestling.”
Tilda cocked her head.
“You’re right, I don’t think we’d be able to stick his wings in the sleeves.”
Faramir and Eowyn looked at each other then, both stifled laughter.
“Perhaps not,” Eowyn said carefully, “but it might be fun to try. Should we, at least, ask the chick?”
Lady Galadriel dropped her face into her arms on the table. Celeborn glanced down at his wife and snickered.
“Perhaps the sleeve holes could be adjusted?”
“Why do you want to play dolls with a baby raven?” Bain asked.
“You do not approve, Incorrigible Stepson?” Thranduil purred.
“Well,” Balin added, “it does seem a bit daft. But I can understand, tha’ poor wee chick’s awful nakkie at th’ moment.”
Baluchistan strutted across the table and peered around at the snoring chick under Sigrid’s hand. Ori thought he might be sniffing at it.
Baluchistan straightened up, cackled, and went back to Red Queen, pausing on his way back to spear a banana through the center, and cart it over to her.
“Here yeh are, me cherry biscuit. Gotta keep yer strength up.”
Red Queen examined the banana, then looked inquiringly at Legolas. Gimli picked it up and peeled it for her.
“Now what?” Red Queen asked.
“Stick in in yer gob,” Gimli instructed.
Red Queen swallowed it, then seemed to suck her beak in toward the back of her head.
“No more mush,” she told Baluchistan. “Crunch.”
Baluchistan looked at the fruit on the table and Tauriel reached over and passed him an apple. He rolled this to Red Queen, who liked it much better.
The chick stirred, raised its head, and stood up.
“Sorry, lost my path of thought there. I remember Frerin as a wee badger. You were already grown and…” The chick stopped and peered at Thorin. “Eeee, lad, you’ve gone gray.”
“Yes,” said Thorin, “and I hold you largely responsible.”
“How long have I been gone?”
“About seven months,” Balin said.
“Not long enough,” Dis growled.
The chick hopped over to her, and then a little closer, though Ori thought that was far from wise. Then it hopped even closer, and Ori realized, the chick’s eyes might be open, but its vision was still as blurry as before.
“Dis! Oh, I’m so sorry lass, I-”
“I’m not talking to you.” she snarled.
“Right,” the chick said, nodding. “Fair enough. I accept that.”
“Go away,” she ordered.
“Perhaps you should come back over here,” Thorin suggested.
The chick hopped a little, but was obviously wearing down.
Thorin scooped the chick up carefully, placed him and Sigrid’s handkerchief into the empty butter dish, and pulled it toward him.

“Now,” said Thorin. “Tell us, how did you come to be in an egg?”
“I told Udadel Mahal I wanted to come back and make it up to you, my lad. He said he’d send me back as a dwarfling, but I wanted to come back quicker than that, as something that grows faster.” Bilbo said over the top of his wine glass, “Good thing you didn’t ask Lady Yavanna. She might have sent you back as one of my flowers. Can you imagine? ‘Thorin, something is decidedly off about this begonia.’”
The nestling peered up at him.
“What’s a beg- begin- whatever that thing is? Do I know you? You wouldn’t happen to be Bilbo Baggins, would you?”
“I would, actually,” said Bilbo with an evil little smile.
The chick gave a miniature caw of excitement.
Then promptly fell asleep again.
After a short while, it woke, was fed, and continued.
“You’re the bravest little hobbit of them all!”
Bilbo choked on his wine.
As the hobbit wiped his face, he sputtered, “Where did you- Oh, Mother! Really! Must you go telling that to every being you meet?”
Kili gigged.
“The bravest little hobbit of them all? That would make a great song.”
Bilbo leapt to his feet and shook a forbidding finger at Kili.
“No, no, and no. You hush, or I’ll cut all your bow strings while you’re asleep.”
“Hmmm,” said the chick, “Vicious. Good Durin spouse material.” Then it craned its neck in Frodo’s direction. “And who’s this youngling? Thorin, you go off and have a fling with a hobbit lass while I was all doolally?”
Thorin appeared to consider, his face not entirely as stern, despite his anger.
“No. He’s Bilbo’s nephew, Frodo. And this his friend and companion, Samwise Gardener.
Samwise’s parents are the agricultural ministers to King Bard of Dale.”
Thorin pushed the butter dish across the table, where Bard was returning from refilling his cup, and the chick did a wobbly bow.
Bard nodded.
“You look just like Girion,” it said. “Gave me quite a turn. Thorin, just how many hobbits’ve you got out here? And, more importantly, do any of them bake?”
“Mama bakes!” Sam piped. “She learned from Missus Belladonna.”
“Ahhh, nothing beats Bella’s cakes,” the chick sighed with remembered pleasure. “So, I did hear from others in the Halls that I did terrible things. I made Dis’ lads miserable, and for nothing! I heard from our Idris that they were good-natured pebbles. Where is Dis’ other lad?”
“Right here,” said Fili scooting the butter dish back toward Thorin as he nodded to Kili, who watched the chick from Dis’ side. “My younger brother, Kili,”
The chick looked over at Kili.
“Ah, jus like your amad, well done.” The chick turned back to Thorin
“The arkenstone. It was a dragons egg, yes?”
“Yes,” Thorin said.
“It drove me mad. I don’t remember much of anything, except that it was shiny and it told me how amazing the kingdom would be. I’d have more gold than any ruler and we, all dwarrow, would rule, take our place and be respected in the world.”
Ori remembered his own experience.
“It offered me lots of things it thought I would desire when I took it from the treasury. I was lucky.” Ori grinned at his husband, then his family all about him. “I had everything I always wanted.”

“Oi! Ori lad!” the chick cawed. “They’re missing you in the Halls. Thrain actually talks about you, and to other people besides Freris.”

Ori glowed with happiness and didn’t care that he was blushing.

“Listen, Thorin.” the chick said anxiously. “I’ve got to tell you, to warn you-“

“Warn me?” Thorin’s brows shot upward.

“It’s terrible and I’m telling you right now as he ain’t here. You’ve got to be wary of Frerin! I know he’s your brother, but he used to come with me to the treasury! He touched the arkenstone and he wears a ring I gave him that was given to the dwarrow by ol’ flame eye! It’s terrible. It’s all my fault-“

“I’m aware of that, udad.”

Thorin stopped talking as the chick’s beak opened again and it hopped around in frustration until Sigrid shoved more bacon in.

“You know?” the chick demanded. “How could-“

Thorin sighed as the chick fell asleep in the butter dish.

Mistress Dazla came in and removed the scattered remains of fruit. She spared a glance at the snoring chick in butter dish as she went out.

“Balin,” said Thorin. “When he wakes up again would you update him?”

“Aye, lad. They do say brevity is th’ soul a’ wit but I’m afraid this ain’t likely t’ be short ‘r funny.”

“I though’ brevity was th’ soul a’ pretty underpinnin’s,” Jani offered.

“That, too, lass” Balin agreed.

Ori sketched Thror in the butter dish and added to his notes. Dori rushed out to the bathroom and returned as the chick woke up again.

Balin gave a brief but concise run down of Frerin’s career. The chick stared, then finally,

“Arivett…Arivett… Hild’s daughter?”

“The very one,” Balin said. “And now the Queen of Belegost.”

“She was always one for a tussle,” the chick reflected. “Just like her mam, then?”

“Aye, an’ she’s married t’ King Theoden’s nephew Eomer.”

“Theoden?” the chick repeated.

“King of Rohan,” Balin supploded.

“Folcwine’s lad?”

“Folcwine’s great grandson.”

“Great grandson?”

“Theoden, son of Thengel, son of Fengel, son of Folcwine. Eomer is the son of Theoden’s sister, Thedwyn.”

Ah,” the chick paused then. “Might be an idea to warn this Theoden and Eomer about Frerin. We ain’t much for talking to men and elves, but-“

“Thror,” Thorin said with a slight smile. “They and all rulers of Arda are well aware of Frerin and his doings.”

“You wrote and introduced yourself, canny, lad, very canny. Maybe a meeting?” “We have all met already. Once at my coronation and again at Bilbo’s and my wedding.”

“Fuck!” The chick had to sit down in the butter dish to absorb that information, then looked wonderingly up at Thorin. “You’re a great king, Thorin.”

“I do my best,” Thorin replied dryly. “But I would have never achieved it without the help of my family, friends, and allies.” Thorin smiled at everyone at the table. He turned as Mistress Dazla came in. “And none of us would have done it without the help of our household.”

“Now don’t start that.” the housekeeper scolded.

“You look just like your mam,” the chick said peering up at her. “You are a daughter or granddaughter of Mistress Dazla, aren’t you?”
Mistress Dazla shook her head at Thorin. “I think that should keep until he’s brought up to snuff, your majesty.”

“Indeed,” Thorin agreed. “This is extraordinary, even for Durins,” said Thranduil. The council members helpfully scooted the butter dish back down the table. The chick suddenly stood up a little straighter, and ever so slowly turned to face Thranduil. “Hello, King Thror,” said Thranduil pleasantly. The chick screamed and fainted.

Or fell asleep, Ori thought. Most people who faint don’t snore. The chick was quickly brought around by the smell of bacon waved under its beak. “Ooooh, Mahal, what a nightmare!” it muttered. The chick straightened looked around, saw Thranduil, then Elrond, then Galadriel, and whispered hoarsely.

“Thorin! Thorin!”

“Yes?”

“There’s elves at the table.”

“Yes. They’re welcome here.”

“What, even Thranduil?”

“We are friends and allies.”

“That’s sick!” Thror cried.

“You just congratulated me on being a great king for knowing all the rulers of Arda,” Thorin protested.

“But Thranduil? Really?” The chick pointed a naked, shaking wingtip up at the king-father. “He was, at the time of your death, King of the Greenwood.”

“He’s only being your friend because he wants those white gems.”

“I gave him the white gems as a thank you gift when his son, Legolas, and his captain, Tauriel, brought me warning of the slave trade between Calmar and Mordor.”

“Captain Tauriel?” the chick repeated. “Thranduil’s adopted daughter? You’ve seen her? She isn’t allowed near dwarrow.”

“What?” Kili asked.

“Oh yes, ol’ twighead there, got a prophecy that she would fall for a dwarf.”

“What?” Kili and Tauriel said together. Thranduil waved an impatient hand.

“That was long ago. I have recovered and Cemnesta is King of the Greenwood.”

“You ain’t king?” the chick demanded.

“No, I am now King-Father Thranduil and Bard’s consort.”

“Well, that’s- Fuck-“ the chick managed to get out as his beak flew open again. With a sharp hand, Thranduil shot the butter dish back to Sigrid and she put more bacon into the once king. “You’re brilliant, lass,” the chick said when its beak worked again. “I’ll be proud to be yours and-“

It fell asleep again. Mistress Dazla came in again and laid her hand on Thorin’s shoulder.

“Shall I serve dinner as a whole or just courses as you progress through this?”

“What’s easiest for you and your staff,” Thorin replied. “We may be here for a while.” She patted him, nodded to Dori, and went back through.

“That’s something no one told me.” The chick woke up again. “Thorin, I think Frerin might be going as mad as I was. He’s going cause even more trouble with his secret codes and whatnot.”

“The book of his wife’s poetry will be published in a week,” Thorin said. “Chat has been informed and we’ll be sending him a copy.”

“As if any of us would entertain even the thought of listening to some one so silly as the Asshat,” Lady Galadriel observed to Gridr.

“You an’ I know that, lass. But there still folk like Calmar an’ Sikar about. Ori noted the look of utter mischief in Fili’s eyes as he scooted the butter dish over to Gimli, who pushed it down to his mother. Galadriel and Gridr watched as the butter dish stopped in front of them.

“Our Gridr,” the chick began then looked up at Galadriel.

“Eep!” it managed.

“Quite so,” Galadriel replied. “I also am aware of Frerin and any further foolishness I see in my mirror, I shall immediately tell Thorin.”

“You would?” The chick seemed to brighten. “Well, by Mahal’s and my own hairy balls, this is beyond anything I could have dreamed possible! Thorin!” The chick started to climb out of the butter dish, but found it was being scooted by various hands back up the table. The dish got to Balin and the chick looked up at Dori, then toppled over on its bare bottom.

“Mahal’s hairy arse, aren’t you a looker,” the chick chirped.

“My, aren’t you a little flirt,” said Dori archly.

“And who might you be, my dear?” the raven cooed.

Balin growled, “Dori is me betrothed an’ th’ Blessed Bearer of Erebor.”

“Excellent. Well, our Balin’s a prosy old windbag for all he’s the best advisor any could wish for. But if he keeps yeh happy in the bottom bits, my dear, I’ve nothing to say on the matter. I look forward to our continuing acquaintance, presuming we’ve already met.”

“We have,” said Dori. “In fact, I was presented to you at court, I danced, and you dropped dead.”

“But what a way to go.” said the chick with a sigh.

Frodo turned to Thorin and hissed, “Why is this raven chick making goo-goo eyes at Imad Dori?”

“Because some things never change,” Thorn replied dryly. “Congratulations, Udad, you’ve just put to rest any doubts I might have that you’re Thror returned.”

“And now,” said Fili, “you will take your oath of loyalty to our King before this council of his allies.”

The chick clambered out of the butter dish and, with and some flapping, stood up before Thorin, bowed and began the recitation of the oath. Ori noted down that Thror did not use the oath taken by the under monarchs of dwarrow, but the one of lifelong service as Dwalin, Bujni, and Dipfa had taken, adding in loyalty to Fili and Sigrid as the heirs.

Thorin listened, then paused. He looked around the table.

“Is this acceptable to all rulers and councilors present?”

All nodded except for Dis. She glared at the chick. Thorin waited. She made her decision.

“I accept it, but I don’t trust him.”

“Noted.” Thorin turned to the chick and rose. “You are accepted as a raven of the House of Durin. You will carry out the will of Mahal, Yavanna, Roäc, and myself. You will render service to our allies and treat them with respect.”

“I will,” the chick said.

“You are a raven and, according to raven custom, King Roäc will name you. Roäc?”

“Oräc,” Roäc said.

The chick bowed to Thorin and then at the rest of the table.

“I am Oräc of the House of Durin. I serve King Thorin II, the High King of All Dwarrow and his allies.”

The chick turned back to Thorin.

“What a day!” it cawed. “I’m a raven and a happy lad.” Baluchistan and the other ravens snorted and cackled. Baluchistan hopped over, leaving his usual trail of feathers, and patted the chick on the head with a wing, almost but not quite squashing it.

“Sorry, Oräc, bu’ yer no’ a lad.”

“I’m a raven lad then.”

“No, our Oräc, yer a raven lass.”

Ori honestly broke his pen nib over that. Even Dis laughed. Oräc looked confused, then tried to shove her head under herself to check and fell on her butt.

“How can you tell?” she demanded.

“I kin smell yeh, yer a lass.”

“I’ll take your word for it.” Oräc sighed and got up. “Right, no one tells Umad about this.”
“She’s on th’ floor a’ th’ mead hall screamin’ with laughter.” Durin told Ori
“She know already,” Ori giggled.
“Ah well,” Oräc huffed, “she always did have the prettiest laugh. Glad she’s getting to put it to use.” Oräc’s beak popped open again. Bilbo loaded Oräc back into the butter dish and Sigrid commenced pushing bacon into Oräc.

Quartz winged in and landed on Ori’s shoulder to rub his beak on Ori’s cheek.
“Oräc being good?”
“Yes, thank you.”
“Gotta fly. Other chicks’re hungry.”
Quartz disappeared and Ori sat back in his chair. The household staff was passing out large mugs of delicate fish chowder and there were boards of breads, butter and various spreads being settled on the table. Balin winked at him.
“Our Quartz’ a busy lad now.”
“I’m going to have to do without Quartz for a while,” said Ori to Thorin. “He’s busy bringing food for the nestling and, no doubt, losing his mind.”
Balin chuckled.
“Puir thin’. I kin imagine him runnin’ abou’ with his head cut off, takin’ care a’ the hatchlin’s an’ drivin’ his mate nuts.”
Dori put her hand on her belly.
“You won’t have to imagine for very long, my love. I’m in labor.”
Badgers, Bearers, and Brouhaha!

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Baby Time!! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Balin stared at Dori, his mouth falling open to an eloquent, “Grch!”
Ori shrieked, leaped out of his chair, and rushed around to hug Dori. Thorin called out his congratulations, everyone around the table cheered and chattered while Balin continued to sputter.
“I’m not crossing my legs for two weeks just to make Oin happy. My bladder has had it with these little acrobats.”
“Quite right, my love,” Binni sniffed.
“Indeed, honorable adad,” Bujni agreed, entering with Dipfa from their night out. “What’s to-do?”

Gimli said, “Dori’s havin’ th’ pebbles, an’ Balin’s havin’ kittens.”
“I shall go and organized clothing for the noble dwarflings,” Dipfa announced before leaving the room.
Balin seemed to finally motivate himself to move from his chair. He all but knocked Ori over, grasping Dori by the shoulders.

“Shouldn’t yeh be lyin’ down? D’yeh feel faint? Should I make yeh some tea?”
“I’m not ready for anything in particular, dear. It will be quite awhile before -Ha!- push comes to shove.”
“Bu’ yer havin’ th’ badgers!” Balin cried.
“Not right at this moment. They do take their time. It’s a pity we’re short on ravens at the moment. I should send word to nadadel.”

“The raven hopped over with a knot of cold beef in her mouth, swallowed the entire knot in one amazing go and said, “Yes, o king?”
“Dain needs to know Dori’s in labor. Please fly to Iron Hills and-“
He never got to finish. She was already out the door.
Ori said, “Do you suppose Dain will outrun Chopper to get here this time?”
“Oh, I have so much to do,” said Dori. “Pet, will you let Mistress Dazla know I’ll be indis-”
Delighted shrieks shot from the kitchen.
“I’d say she knows,” said Ori.
“Well, she’ll need help getting the rest of dinner for everyone,” Dori continued without missing a beat. “Oin, have you need of assistants to help you? Nori-“
Nori dropped through the ceiling with a screech.

“Oi! Balin! You’re supposed to be ready to catch the liddle moles!”
Dori grasped Nori by the ear and pulled.

“Nori, I have a job for you.”
“What’s that?”
“Be kind, be helpful, and stop screeching or I’ll thrash you.”
“I can do that.”
“Excellent.”
Mistress Dazla came in.
“Your bedroom is all prepared, Bearer.”
“I’ll go ge’ me birthin’ bag.” Oin levered himself to his feet with a groan and went out, Elrond in tow.

Thorin nodded to Gloin and called Agrib to attend him in the office.
Galadriel, Gridr, Dis, Binni, and Mistress Dazla escorted the Bearer out, Margr and Vi followed behind them, with Red Queen and Sugar bringing up the rear.

“And someone should tell Grandmamma!” Dori instructed over her shoulder.
“That’s me,” said Roäc as he flew off.
“Clench and relax!” was heard before the bedroom door was shut.
“What’s going on?” Oräc cried.

Sigrid scooped up Oräc, butter dish and all, and grabbed the rest of the bacon. She put the chick, dish, and bacon in Fili’s hands, kissed him, and followed Dori through.

“The Bearer is in labor,” Fili explained.
“Just how long have I been asleep?” Oräc cried.

Everyone adjourned to the sitting room to wait.
Miss Oqizla and the rest of the kitchen staff brought through platters of sandwiches and a tapped keg.

Ori threw himself at Dwalin.
“We’re going to be uncles!”
“Aye, we are. Gonna ma’e th’ wee ones their firs’ axes. Gotta ge’ ‘em off on th’ righ’ foot.”
Killer gamboled around them.

Thorin and Gloin came back in, Butter at their heels, and Brur and Sadi arrived.
“Suppose yeh want me t’ go an’ yell th’ news in th’ main square,” Brur said to his king.
“Please, here’s the proclamation,” Thorin handed Brur a hastily written document. “I’ve sent bats and ravens out all over Erebor and Dale to announce as soon as you do. Bells and horn volley right after. Gibi?” Thorin called.
Gibi popped his head out of the kitchen.

“Please saddle Grinder for Master Brur and meet him in the courtyard. Take one of the ponies for yourself as his escort.”
“Aye, majesty.”
“Thank you, Gibi.”
“Righ’, I’m off,” Brur said. He bowed to Thorin and swaggered out. Thorin escorted Sadi to a chair.

“If Dain is coming,” Bilbo mused. “I think I’ll go and open ‘his’ door at the end of the corridor. He almost went clean through it the last time he arrived.”

Ori curled into Dwalin’s lap on the couch. Bilbo returned perched on Thorin’s knee. Thorin rubbed his back, and Bilbo leaned in and kissed him.

Kili, Tauriel, and Bain took it upon themselves to play with Frodo, Sam, and Tilda. They organized a rousing game of Balrogs and Basements on the floor near the dining table now folded against the wall. The game required Legolas, Gimli and Nori to join in as well.

“You’re not going?” Faramir asked Eowyn and nodded to the closed bedroom door. She shuddered.

“No, I prefer to admire other people’s babies. You can hold them, tell them they’re cute, and then give them back. I’m not really good with children. I am looking forward to seeing Eomer’s and Arivett’s children. I think I’ll be an excellent aunt.”

Faramir nodded.
“I think I’m uncle material myself. I have no problem training children and youth, but the idea of chubby little faces lisping at my knees isn’t for me. Boromir loves babies. He plays with every child in his vicinity and willingly changes their nappies.”

“They do!” Tilda called out in agreement. “I’m not getting married. I’m going to drink The Tea every day and just flirt outrageously.”

“Tilda!” Bard cried, horrified.

Sadi burst out laughing.

“Where did you learn about tea and flirting?” Thranduil asked calmly.

“Everyone talks about it. Doesn’t matter if you’re in Erebor or Dale.” Tilda frowned, then said darkly, “People are obsessed.”

“Til,” Kili said and poked her. “It’s your turn. Pay attention.”

Bard fell back against his chair and moaned. Thranduil giggled into his wine.

“Thank you, Kili.” Thorin said quietly.

All the bells in Erebor rang, then the horn volley followed. Ori swore he could hear people cheering. There was the faint echo of bells from Dale and Ori thought he could hear the cheering there as well.

Gloin poured out flagons of ale for everyone and passed them out.

“Bes’ relax an’ pu’ yer feet up, lads,” Gloin said jovially, “we may be in f’r a long wait. Mind, me gem popped ou’ our Gimli, there, li’e he was a stone from a catapult.”

“Da!” Gimli yelled from the floor, where the game was noisily progressing.

“You’re going to fight an orc, Gimmers,” Bain ordered. “Roll for initiative.”

“Righ’. One! Mahal’s beard an’ toes, wha’ kin I do with a one?”

“You caress the orc’s cheek.”

“Bugger!”

Romy barked in agreement and the cats snaked round the players. The other three of Sugar’s pups were being well behaved. The deep brown male, graced with the name Forn, lay across Kili and Tauriel’s laps. The other female, Roberta, yellow like Butter but striped with dark brown, snuggled against Fili and guarded the well-wrapped butter dish holding Oräc fast asleep, between her paws.

The last one, a male, sat nearby watching.

Ori sat up, remembering. He turned to Sadi.

“Sadi, you said Mistress Dazla was your great grand niece. Did you know about Dazla?”

“Of course.” The old master scribe grinned at him. “It makes for a better story. I’m Dazla’s great grand niece but I wasn’t cut out for household work. I wanted scholarship. I kept the secret and, eventually, we just switched our roles of niece and aunt.”

Ori laughed.

“That’s wonderful. I’m glad you were able to follow your dreams,”

“Oh, Auntie has no illusions about people. She keeps all family close, but only those who work for her know all the secrets.”

“Are there any more secrets we should know?” Bilbo asked.

Sadi chuckled and drained her ale. “Ask Auntie.”

Bilbo twitched his nose at her and she winked.

Ori doodled in his notebook, while Thorin, Bilbo and Dwalin talked idly. Gloin, Elrond, Bard, and Thranduil exchanged fatherhood stories.

“Legolas was convinced my crown grew out of my head, rather like Monster Child and Sam,” said Thranduil. “He was upset he couldn’t seem to grow his own, so he glued twigs onto his head.”

“I remember that,” said Elrond.

Gloin winced.

“Yeh have t’ shave ‘is head?”

“Oh, yes,” said Thranduil. “He was such a disaster, I’m amazed he didn’t end up bald.”

Granny Klak came in with Roäc, and she went to the kitchen with Lindir to see if there was any soup left.

Roäc, Beryl, and Garnet finished off a stray sandwich. Baluchistan lay on the small stone table on his back, snoring among the dishes. He had gathered his own nest of feathers while he slept.

Mistress Dazla came out of the bedroom.
“Everyfing going alright?” Nori exploded to his feet.
“Everything is fine, Master Nori.”
“Dor clenchin’ an’ relaxin’ like he’s supposed to?”
“Master Nori, “ Mistress Dazla sighed painfully. “Your knowledge of act of giving birth is woefully inadequate.”
“Well, whadyou expect?” Nori demanded. “I’m not the one who pops out sprogs.”
Mistress Dalza hit him over the head with the wet towel she was carrying and went muttering into the kitchen.
Nori looked puzzled, then horrified.
“Oi, what was on that towel? It’s wet an’ smells funny!”
Mistress Dazla leaned out of the kitchen with an evil grin.
“I used it to sop up when the Bearer’s water broke!”
Nori screamed and fled the room, yelling for bath water.
Eowyn bounced to the kitchen door and looked in.
“You didn’t?” she giggled.
They all heard Mistress Dazla laugh.
“I mopped the Bearer’s brow with it.”
The room erupted in laughter.
Mistress Dazla reappeared with a pile of folded white cloths and whisk back into the bedroom.
“Should we tell Nori?” Faramir asked.
“No,” Ori said, drawing Nori’s face. “Washing himself and all his hair will give him something to do and will take a chunk of time.”
“How long is Nori’s hair?” Eowyn asked.
“It’s probably why Dori kept mine short.” Ori said idly. “It takes ages to get Nori’s all washed and dried.”
“Who’s going to play for Nori?” Bain asked.
“I’ll do it,” Haldir said and rose from his seat by the fire.
“This could take all night,” Thranduil said to the soldier gently.
“I sent a bat to Wandi. If it gets to midnight, he’ll come and join us.”
“The game players will be going to bed before that,” Bard told him.
“I’m counting on it.” Haldir flashed a smile over his shoulder before seating himself on the floor in Nori’s vacated place.
An hour passed and Nori reappeared with Granny Klak. She was fussing over him. His hair was still damp and he’d left it loose. Eowyn got out of her seat to go and admire it. She put her hands resolutely behind her back, making Nori laugh at her.
“You just wanna play wif it, doncha?”
“Yes, it’s amazing!”
Bofur came in, he had obviously washed up at the guild commons. Nori bounded to him. Granny Klak went back to the kitchen. Eowyn went and curled up with another ale which Faramir provided her.
“Dori’s poppin’!” Nori bellowed and grabbed Bofur. Bofur wrapped him in his arms and patted his back.
“That’s good news, ducky.”
“I’m nervous!”
“I’m sure Oin’s got everythin’ under control.”
“How can you be so calm?” Nori demanded.
“Me brother’s wife’s popped out a baker’s dozen, an’ she’s goin’ for the record. Who’s with our Dori?”
Bofur steered his husband to a sofa and Gloin poured out two ales and brought them over.
“Ta, Glo,” Bofur said and refreshed himself with a gulp.
“At las’ check,” Gloin expanded, “along with me brother, there was Lady Galadriel, me gem, Dis, Jani, Binni an’ Dazla. Oh, an’ Sigrid, Margr an’ Vi, th’ bird queen, an’ Sugar.”

Baluchistan snorted and raised his head.

“Me wee pot a’ bramble jelly’ll take care a’ Dori.”

The raven fell back to sleep.

Ori felt the familiar tickle at the back of his brain.

“About twenty minutes,” Yavanna cooed.

Ori looked at Bilbo who grinned, he had heard as well.

“About twenty minutes,” they chorused.

Thorin leaned over the back of the couch to address the gamers.

“You have about ten minutes to finish up.”

“That’s fine,” Kili called, “I’m the walking dead, Gimmers is engaged to an orc, Fili and Haldir are trapped in a barrel of fish, and Tauri and Sig have been changed into angry moths. We have to hope Frodo, Sam and Tilda can rescue us”

“Sam and I are going to make a potion to turn them back,” Frodo reported. “Tilda gave us her magic tea cup”.

“Excellent, my boy,” Bilbo approved.

“Oi,” Nori said. “You lot write me out of the game?”

“No, I’m playing your character,” Haldir replied.

“I was a chunky prostitute wif a wooden leg. How do I fight?” Nori demanded.

“I bought a magic knife from a shady peddler and sharpened my leg.”

“Sensible,” Nori nodded. “I was just flashin’ me boobies.”

“At orcs and ogres?” Haldir asked.

“You flashed your boobies while children were playing?” Bard managed.

“I told ‘em they had t’ close their eyes.”

“Nori,” Bilbo sighed, “you are a pest.”

“Nuisance,” Dwalin added.

“They was just imaginary boobies,” Nori pointed out. “Fee-oh-retical.”

“I got the potion and I’m throwing it in the air!” Frodo cried. “Sam, roll for the potion to work on Kili, Gimli, Tauri, and Captain Haldir!”

They all heard the die bounce on the floor.

“Twenty?” Fili gasped.

“Your potion,” announced Bain, “kills the five orcs and the evil ogre wizard, and cures everyone. Which means you’ve won.”

“Yay!” shouted the faunts.

Bilbo sighed as he rose.

“And not a moment too soon.” He went out to the kitchen.

“An excellent campaign,” Haldir approved.

“Has Haldir grown a new leg?” Tauriel asked.

“Sure, why not.” Bain laughed.

The group picked up and put away their game pieces and rejoined the rest at the fireside. Bilbo returned with a platter of toast covered in melted cheese.

They heard a crash in the far distance and a terrible screeching noise which grew louder and louder.

“Th’ fuck?” Dwalin hollered, leaping to his feet.

Chopper bounded into the room, harnessed with two large battle rams. They pulled a sleigh, the metal runners screaming along the stone floor.

“Hullooooo!” shouted Sculdis.

“Me sib!” Dain roared and almost fell out of the sleigh. He seized Dwalin by the tunic.

“Where’s me wee dumplin’?” Dain screamed in his face.

“Why’d yeh bring a bloody great sleigh in th’ house?” Dwalin yelled back.

Dain pushed away from Dwalin and bounded to the bedroom door. He flung it open.
“Me dumplin’?”
“Get out!” Dori screamed.
Dain leapt back as fluffy pink pillow sailed past his head.
“Sorry, dumplin’.”
“Send Sculdis!”
“Righty-o.”
Dain carefully shut the door and looked pleadingly at Sculdis, who was busy kissing everyone hello.
“Me delicate jewel of a bride?”
“I’m going, yeh great lump,” she laughed, giving Ori an extra squeeze. She trotted over, kissed Dain noisily, slapped his butt, went in and closed the door behind her. There was a gale of feminine squealing and a great deal of talk.
Dain came over, butted heads with Thorin, and crashed into a chair.
“Mahal’s hairy arse, what a trip.”
“Dain,” Elrond came forward.
“Howdy-do, our Rhonda! “Dain leaned up and offered his arm, which Elrond grasped. “An’ here’s Linda, an there’s me almos’ son-in-law Diry. All keepin’ well?”
“Very well, thank you,” said Elrond with a grin.
“Dain, good to see you,” Bard reached out his hand to the Iron Hills King.
“Bard!” Dain bellowed. “How yeh keepin’?”
“Well enough.”
“Hullo there, Sprite.”
“Greetings, Rockhead, had you a good journey?” Thranduil responded easily and inclined his head with a smile. Dain chuckled.
“Where’s Sapphire?” Thorin demanded.
“Eh? Oh, probably still snoozin’ in the sleigh.”
Ori and Gloin hurried over to the sleigh, where Sapphire nestled among the furs. The raven popped awake and shook herself.
“Nice ride.”
“Excellent,” said Thorin. “May we please get this sleigh and the goats out of the sitting room before Mistress Dazla sees them and murders all of us?”
Faramir and Eowyn took charge of the goats. Bain, Haldir and Bilbo removed the furs and luggage while Thorin, Dwalin, Bard, Fili, and Kili took the sleigh apart under Dain’s instructions. Thranduil and Sadi watched in great amusement.
“Why are there no bells on this side, Idad Dain?” Fili asked.
“It’s a narrow squeak comin’ along tha’ hallway in th’ sled,” Dain said. “No’ t’ worry, our Bilbo, I’ll remove ‘em in a mo. Caught ‘em on th’ handle on th’ door a’ Bag End East. I’ll knock out any scratches I made.” “I’m keeping the bells,” Bilbo told him, making both Thorin and Dwalin laugh.
“There’s an idea,” Dain grinned. “I’ll attach ‘em t’ th’ door side, so yer company kin ring ‘stead a knockin’.”
In a few moments, the goats and sleigh were stowed in the stable. Agrib and Larit took the Iron Hills Monarchs’ luggage to their rooms upstairs.
They all gathered in the sitting room to gobble up the cheese on toast.
Granny Klak returned from the kitchen with a jam tart.
Dain grinned at her.
“Evenin’, Auntie.”
“I am not your aunt, silly dwarf, though I suppose it’s better than ‘Evenin’, yeh old bat.’”
“Yer no’,” Dain protested. “Well, yer no’ a bat.”
Granny Klak flicked a bit of jam filling into his beard.
He hummed with pleasure as he fished it out and ate it, then regaled them with the doings in the Iron Hills.
“How is Stonehelm?” Bain asked diffidently.
“Oh, aye, almō’ f’rgo’. Bin carryin’ this aroun’. Now me dumplin’s saved our ravens th’ trip.”
He handed Bain a much creased and folded letter.
“Thank you, Idad!” Bain cried, and went off to the corner to read it.
Ori leaned over to speak to Granny Klak.
“Umad, you aren’t going in to help Dori?”
The old dam grimaced.
“I won’t be much help while I’m being violently sick all over the room. Terrible thing to try to remove from lace.”
“You get ill? What happened when you had your own pebble?”
“That’s different. Unless you have a mirror, you can’t exactly see what’s going on, and even if you could, you’re too preoccupied to care.”

Thorin went and patted the last warg pup which had followed the players over, and brought it to Dain.
“Dain, have a warg. He’ll keep Chopper company.”
The warg woofed, leaned over to sniff at Dain’s offered hand, then sat down on Dain’s foot.
“Chopper!” Dain called.

Chopper nosed through from the kitchen where he’d been bothering Larit for snacks, then seeing someone new on ‘his’ dwarf, trotted over to inspect the pup. They had a good sniff at each other, then curled up together on the hearth rug.
“That’s settled,” Dain commented, grabbed at Thorin’s neck, pulled him down, and thunked his brow against Thorin’s. “Thankee kindly, cuz.”
“You’ll have to come up with a name,” Thorin reminded Dain as he seated himself next to Bilbo again.
Dain looked over the dark gray brindled warg.
“Haggis,” he announced.
“Haggis?” Thranduil echoed.
“Aye,” said Dain. “Plump an’ full a’ whate’er.”
“I thought that was you,” said Thranduil.
“A’righ’,” said Dain amiably, “tha’s one f’r th’ twig head.”

Dain leaned over toward the warg.
“Haggis? Who’s a guid lad? Who’s a guid wee ball a’ suet?”
The warg thumped his tail and panted happily.
Dain nodded in satisfaction.
“Aye. Smart lad. I’ll have ‘im trained up by spring.”
Thorin stretched and tapped Dwalin on the shoulder.
“Better get the instruments ready. Balin will want this done traditionally.”
“Aye,” Dwalin agreed. He rose and brought Ori with him, through to their bedroom.
“What did Thorin mean?” Ori asked.
“When a Durin badger’s born, bearers an’ dams help th’ mother an’ th’ males play and sing.”
“Oh! I’ll get my flute.” Ori hurried to the dresser and unwrapped his flute from its nest in the bottom drawer. He joined Dwalin who was carrying his viol.

They rejoined the party in the sitting room. Dain held a pair of small drums that were joined together by a chunk of wood. One drum head was slightly smaller than the other and Dain was tapping and tuning them. Fili and Kili had their fiddles and Thorin his harp. Nori had his own flute and Bofur had his double flute. Faramir produced an instrument of men called a lute. Lindir carried a small elvish harp.

Eowyn grinned at the those without musical instruments.
“I gather we are to sing?”
“Oh if yer voice don’ carry,” Gloin commented, making Bard chuckle.
“Am I late?”

Mr. Wandi bustled in, deposited Mellon next to Chopper, and scampered into Haldir’s arms. Miss Dazla came out of the bedroom.
“It’s time,” she crowed and dodged as the population of the sitting room thundered her way.

Ori wiggled in and up to the huge bed. Balin sat with an arm about Dori. He had stripped down to his under tunic and had still sweat through it. He had pulled his hair and beard back and secured them out of the way, which made him look like he was wearing a white wool scarf around his neck. He eyed the herd invading his private sanctum and muttered about having to knock in a wall.

In the middle of the bed, lightly covered with a crocheted sheet, Dori looked ridiculously serene, almost immaculate, especially for one in the throes of giving birth. The Bearer was propped up with pillows. Ori thought there must be a thousand of them. Lady Galadriel sat at the head of the bed, curled on her side, her hands resting on Dori’s shoulders. The blue glow around Dori told Ori that Galadriel was largely responsible for Dori’s surreal state. He wondered how elves gave birth, and if they even noticed that the baby had arrived.

The rest of the bed was covered by lounging females. Margr and Vi sat on the foot, the end of the sheet over their heads as they busily watched whatever was going on with Dori’s nether regions. Sigrid and Red Queen curled on either side of Dori, gently rubbing her hips. Sigrid used her hands and Red Queen, her head. Sculdis, Mistress Dazla, and Dis folded cloths, prepared things, and talked with Oin. Gridr gave Dori’s free hand a manicure. Mister Wandi hurried over to help. Ori came over and Dori beamed at him.

“There you are, pet. Give me a kiss.”

Ori leaned down and did so. “Are you in much pain, Ori’s Dori?”

“No, no, dearest Gladdy is taking care of that.”

Dain, after kissing Sculdis, leaned over and noisily bussed Dori’s cheek. He gave her swollen belly a pat. “Now yeh badgers come along. No keepin’ yer cousins up pas’ their bedtimes.”

Nori crowded in as well. “Drop any bits yet?”

“Bits?” Balin echoed confused.

Dori narrowed her eyes as she studied Nori. It was obvious that Nori was not quite losing his mind over this. “Nori, dear,” Dori said soothingly, “the dwarflings arrive whole, not in bits. No assembly is required.”

“Oh righ’. I knew that.” Nori grabbed Bofur, who had just leaned in to salute Dori’s cheek. “Ya look just grand, namad,” said Bofur.

“Thank you, nadad. Please take Nori away and help him play.”

“Aye, ’m on it!” Bofur grinned and hustled Nori off to the side of the room where the sofa and chair with more stools had been gathered.

Thorin sat in the middle with his harp and plucked a low note, they all joined in playing soft and low. The dams around the bed began singing songs of welcome and the blessings of Mahal and Yavanna. The ravens perched on the top of the waiting cradle. Ori watched as he sat with Dwalin, his low piping blending with the notes from his husband’s viol.

Margr bobbed out from under the sheet and gave Oin a nod. He came over and lifted the sheet to rest on Dori’s knees. Apparently, things had progressed to his satisfaction. “Righ’ our Dori, push.”

Ori noted that the musicians and others were seated where they would not be looking straight up Dori’s privates, as Oin cast the sheet over Dori’s chest and leaned forward. Dori’s face strained. The blue glow increased slightly. Balin petted and cooed into Dori’s ear. “Steady now, beloved,” Balin murmured.

Thorin led the music to accent the time whenever Dori pushed. “Yer crownin’, lovey!” Vi called out. “Keep goin’. ”

“Well, an’ yeh are juicy, ain’t yeh,” said Margr.

A thump made Ori turn and Bofur, still playing, looked down at Nori flopped on the floor. Dain and Bofur shrugged at each other and continued the tune.
Tilda sat beside Faramir, watching intently as his fingers drifted over the strings. Ori thought it was a very nice instrument. He thought a lot of things, in order not to watch what was going on too hard. Dori was decidedly sweaty and very red.

He glanced over at the faunts, who didn’t seem at all bothered or distracted by the birth.

“Here we are!” Oin shouted.

A wail of a newborn filled the room.

A cheer went up.

Dori gave a gasp and a squeak.

Another wail joined the first.

Balin was hustled to the end of the bed to cut the birthing cords. He stared down at the badgers and tipped over.

“Bugger!” Oin groused.

“Is that my Balin out again?” Dori managed.

“Aye, love,” Dis laughed.

Oin hrmphed.

“How kin a healer work with all these bodies fallin’ abou’?”

Red Queen hopped down and began to fan Balin vigorously with her wings. Dwalin and Ori came round and hefted Balin to his feet and steered him over to plump back down beside Dori. Ori scuttled around to the other side to give Dori a hug.

Dis and Gridr wiped the babies down and brought them up to Dori, who gave a cry of delight as she cuddled them.

“Balin! Look!”

He looked, smiling hugely as tears ran down his cheeks.

“First twins born into the dwarrow race,” Oin announced. He knocked back another drink. “Both bearers.”

Everyone began to clap and cheer and chatter. Dori had to be kissed by all, though Ori remained firmly by her side and looked down at his nephlings, pink and wrinkly on Dori’s chest. They were beautiful, even though to his eyes they looked like little potatoes.

“Such a fascinating procedure,” Red Queen commented as she strutted up the bed to look at the twin with one eye then the other. “They already have some down on them. When do their eyes open?”

“Soon enough,” Balin smiled, petting one twin then the other.

“Dain,” Dori demanded over the hubbub. “Names.”

Dain expanded proudly and put his arm about Sculdis.

“Well, I was inclined to like Haggis an’ Pie—“

“No one will find your body, dearest nadad”

“I thought as much,” Dain grinned. “Rillias and Rillin.”

Dori squealed delightedly and Balin nodded.

“Rillias and Rillin they are.”

After a few moments, everyone was chased out of the room by Mistress Dazla.

“Those pebbles and their parents need to rest. Margr, Vi and I will care for them. The rest of you - shoo!”

Brur came back in, smelling like a pub.

“Brur,” Thorin greeted him. “Please go back out and announce twins, both Bearers! Their names are Rillias and Rillin.”

“Fuck my life,” Brur groused and went out again.
You Say Tomato, and I Say…

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Well, now the nephlings are here we can get on with things as usual in Fundin House. As usual, this means chaos. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwaarrow time, same dwaarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The herd made its way back to the sitting room, all talking at once.
“So cute!” Bilbo exclaimed.
“So tiny,” Bard added.
Frodo yawned, and regarded the man with a frown.
“They aren’t small! They’re the biggest fauntlings in Middle Earth! They’re already bigger than our Sam’s little sister!”
Bilbo took Frodo by his left hand, and Sam by his right.
“Not fauntlings, Frodo, dwarflings. Remember? Even newborn mountains start as foothills.”
Sam piped, “I think they look like poh-tay-toes.”
“Best not to say so in front of your Imad Dori,” said Bilbo.
“Why not?” asked Sam. He looked perplexed. “Those’re almost me very favorite things in the world!”
“I promise, I’m not casting aspersions on potatoes,” said Bilbo. “They are fine tubers with many virtues. It’s just a little late to explain cultural differences tonight. There are two faunts I know who are far overdue for bed.”
For once, it seemed they were too tired to contradict him.
Thorin made to go with them, but Bilbo shook his head.
“I’ll be back in a while, my dear. Enjoy your company.”
“Thank you, ghivashel,” said Thorin, and kissed him.
Bain and Tilda also went off to bed without an argument.
Everyone else availed themselves to refreshments, and raised their cups and glasses to the Blessed Bearer, her consort, and their offspring.
Ori hugged Dwalin and released him. Dwalin took his viol and Ori’s flute then started off in the direction of the bedroom. Ori turned as the sitting room door opened, and Elrond’s twins burst in, dragging Brur in between them - backwards. Brur sang off key and the words were rather slurred. Something about calves and lambs and baby goats, complete with attendant animal noises. Celeborn followed them, a trifle pink in the cheeks. Glorfindel brought up the rear, slightly more sober, and far more amused.
The twins set Brur on his feet and he roared a congratulations to them all. Thorin and Dain took him in hand, parked him in a chair beside Sadi and Sculdis went off to the kitchen, calling back that she meant to make Dori’s restorative. Ori hoped she knew how.
He looked back at the elven twins, who were chattering at their father. Elrond went to the bedroom door and tapped lightly. Mistress Dazla peeked out frowning. She grudgingly opened the door for the twins, Celeborn and Glorfindel. They went in quietly and in moment returned. Celeborn went to Galadriel who had plopped herself down beside Ori.
“Tired?” he asked, as he caressed her hair.
“A little,” she smiled. “Dori has promise to be with me when our new fawn comes. We still have over a year to decide on the details and prepare to host the party.”
“We can bring things,” Ori offered immediately.
“It would be wonderful if you brought your instruments,” said Galadriel. “I would love the music to be the first thing my fawn hears.”

Mistress Dazla came out of the bedroom, crossed into the sitting room, stopped and stared at the deep scratches and long, black streaks that marred the floor. Her floor.
“Dain,” she said, low and dangerous.
“Oh aye?” Dain turned from toasting his nephlings for the third time.
“What happened to my floor?”
“Oh…”
“I don’t want to know what you did, but I know you did it. Tomorrow morning you are going to render this floor to its former pristine state!”

Dain tried to look contrite, but it wasn’t his best effort.
“I’ll be seein’ t’ it before dawn, our Dazla. Yeh have me word. An’ yeh know me word’s guid.”
“Yes, which is why I let you live,” she replied.
Elrond came though and gave Mistress Dazla a glass of wine.
“New and old siblings, my nésa.”
They clicked glasses. Dain stared at them.
“Eh?”
“Oh,” Mistress Dazla turned back to Dain with a sparkling look. “Didn’t you know Lord Elrond is my younger half brother?”
“Huh?”
“It’s true,” said Elrond. “I just found out about it myself.”
Dain’s eyes shifted from one to the other.
“No’ much of a family resemblance,” he muttered.
“I’ve been told I more closely favor my father’s side of the family,” she said primly.
Thorin refilled Dain’s tankerd, and herded him off with an arm about his shoulders. “Come on, Dain,” said Thorin. “I’ll fill you in.”
“See wha’ I get comin’ late t’ th’ party?”
“The fawns are so tiny!” said Elladan.
“And so identical!” said Elrohir.
“We must teach them all our tricks!”
“All of them!”
Glorfindel chuckled.
“You have time to plot. They can’t even lift their own heads yet.”
“Don’t encourage them, Glorfindel,” said Lindir. “You know plotting is just what they’ll do.
Fortunately, Thorin has time to twin-proof the kingdom.”
Mistress Dazla approached Lady Galadriel with a curtsy, and dug a slip of paper from her apron.
“While you are here, milady, I believe I’ve long promised you this.”
Galadriel took the paper and her eyes lit up.
“Klakuna’s ginger cake recipe! But is this not a great secret?”
Granny Klak waved a grand, negligent hand full of rings.
“I gave my blessing. I refuse to stand between anyone and a good cake.”

Ori and Dwalin went in to see Dori and the new twins once more before retiring for the night.
Nori was already there. He stood over the cradle and gazed at the dwarflings with a raised eyebrow.
“Out with it, Nori,” said Dori from her pillow nest on the bed. She looked proud and tired, and seemed to glow even as she stared her younger brother down.
“Don’t mind me, our Dor,” said Nori. “I’m just tryin’ to figure out which ‘em’s the evil twin.”
A silver satin pillow bounced off the back of his head.
“Oi! Good fing I ain’t put up me hair yet!” Nori cried.
“Nori,” said Balin at Dori’s side, “if I hear yeh’ve made book on which a’ me dwarflin’s is th’ evil twin, yeh’ll never have t’ worry abou’ yer hair again.”

“Wouldn’t dream of it, brother,” said Nori. “Besides, I got no time. I got a casino to decorate.”

“You’re going to decorate the casino?” Ori hooted.

“Well, not me in particular. I hired Binni to do it. I’m just, whatchacall, supervisin’.”

Ori and Dwalin exchanged looks of horror.

Binni? Binni given free rein to decorate someplace far less formal than the throne room?

“No worries,” said Nori. “I already told him, no chintz.”

“There’s a relief,” said Dwalin. “Have yeh warned ‘im off abou’ bacon, too?”

“Why? Ain’t no one doesn’t like bacon,” Nori sniffed.

Ori went to kiss Dori’s cheek.

He whispered, “I’m very proud of you, Ori’s Dori. I love you.”

“Oh, pet, I love you, too,” said Dori, as she bit her lip, but it did no good, and she stared to cry. Ori panicked.

“Please don’t cry, Dori! I didn’t mean to upset you!”

“You haven’t, pet,” Dori assured, drawing Ori down to rest their foreheads together. “I’m just all over the place after giving birth. Great Mahal! I gave birth! Twice! I am good!”

“Yes, you are,” Ori assured him.

“Get some sleep, pet. Midnight’s already come and gone! Wait! Have yeh eaten? Make sure you eat!”

“I’ll make sure, our Dori,” Dwalin said and leaned over to plant a kiss on Dori’s cheek.

“Oh, our deary, you’re so good to my little pet. Thank you.”

Ori went to say good night to the twins. They were asleep, wriggling, breathing, and already snoring like good, healthy little badgers. The identical platinum colored hair on their heads and chins sat pin straight.

“Good night, my little potatoes,” Ori whispered.

He looked up, and found Balin favoring him with a smirk.

“Oh! I didn’t mean - they’re really cute, it’s just - I should probably shut up now, shouldn’t I.”

Balin dissolved into chuckles.

“I was thinkin’ they looked like th’ caps a’ white cave mushrooms meself.”

“Balin!” Dori cried. “They are your own dwarflings!”

“Aye, an’ considerin’ Fundin’s line usually comes screamin’ int’ th’ world lookin’ like frogs, I’d say they go’ off easy.”

“Oh, that is lucky,” said Dori.

Ori looked up at Dwalin.

“Balin looked li’ a frog,” Dwalin told him. “Mam used t’ say I was a ball a’ hair and growls.”

“And now I have all the hair,” Balin teased him in turn, shooing them out of the room. Ori waved to Dori and went out. They met Margr and Vi bringing in trays of piles of somethings, Ori wasn’t sure what.

“Righ’, loves,” Margr cooed. “Off th’ pair a’ yeh go t’ yer beds!”

“Aye,” Vi agreed. “No’ t’ worry, me an’ our Marg’re in charge.”

Dwalin and Ori bade the party in the sitting room good night and went to their bed.

Ori popped awake and wondered how soon he could go and check on his new nephlings. The room was dark but for the phosphorous stones around the door. The window was buried in snow. He craned his neck and squinted at the time piece on the bedside table. He could see by the glow of the clock face, also made of phosphorous, that it was just five in the morning.

Killer lay across his and Dwalin’s waists. Nori-Pori was stretched across the top of the pillow, and he could just see Mask curled on Killer’s shoulders.

He snuggled back down in Dwalin’s arms and closed his eyes. His mind buzzed.

His miniature for Sigrid just needed to be set in the locket. His portrait for the painting contest was coming along well. He pondered Eärwen’s diary, After Doriath had been lost below the waves, she often put in comments as to things happening Arda and the workings of Sauron. Ori frowned. If he wanted the full picture, he was going to have to see what both Mistress Dazla and Elrond had to say about what went on.

Dwalin stirred and tightened his grip around Ori. Ori snickered to himself. Dwalin echoed it and gave his ear a whiskery kiss.

“I kin hear yer brain goin’.”

“I believe you. I can’t get it to shut up. I need to pick Elrond’s brain then Mistress Dazla’s.”

Dwalin cleared his throat, a little more awake now.

“Elrond?”

“Things Eärwen alludes to.”

“Ah.”

“She speaks a little of what Arda was like when the elves and others were fighting with Sauron.”

“Guid thin’ our Rhonda an’ whass’s arse, Aragorn’s ancestor, chucked his ring int’ th’ lava.”

“Yes, I don’t want to think what our world would be like if Isildur hadn’t done it.”

“Rhonda would’ve punched him in th’ snoot,”

Ori giggled over the thought. His stomach growled.

Dwalin snicker,

“Guess we’re getting’ up, love?”

“If Killer lets us,” said Ori.

Washed and dressed, they took Killer, Kihshassa and the cats to the stable. Dwalin opened the meadow door for them to romp out. Killer ran out, barking at everything and nothing, but the cats only went a short way, lifting each paw in turn in disgust before retreating back inside. Ori went to see Fanny. The Oliphaunt lay drowsing on her side in a huge nest of straw. She cracked an eye open and her trunk snaked over and pulled Ori to her. Ori hugged her, then drew back in surprise.

“Fanny!” he cried. “You’ve grown a fur coat!”

Fanny made a snuffling noise and rose to her feet. Ori looked her over. Her entire body now had about a inch growth of fur. It was lovely, being a mix of a rich red and gold.

“Fanny, you’re even more beautiful than ever!” Ori enthused. “Dwalin! Look! She’s gilded!”

Dwalin shut the door, as Killer and the cats frisked in the straw and Kihshassa clung to his back.

Dwalin came over and had a look at Fanny.

“Well, lass, yeh look grand, an’ yeh’ll be good an’ warm over winter. The circus folk’ll like yer new look.”

Fanny patted both their heads and lowered herself back in her hay nest.

Ori hugged her head.

“As soon as Dori lets me, I’m going to bring our new nephlings out to visit you. I’ll tell Floris and Mavey to come and see your coat, too!”

They left Fanny to sleep, patted Harley and Honda, gave Gnasher a good scratch behind the ears, and went back in the house.

In the breakfast parlor, Miss Oqizla was in charge of things and Margr and Vi were finishing breakfast with Glorfindel before going off to bed.

Thorin and Bilbo were there with most of the rest of the herd. Dain was noticeably missing, but Ori could hear him singing in the sitting room. He must have been giving a scold as he was not singing terribly loudly.

Bilbo dished up fried cornmeal cakes with maple syrup and bacon.

“What’s Dain doing?” Ori asked, as he received his plate.

“Fixing the floor,” Thorin replied. “Strangely enough, he seems rather happy about it.”

“Oi, Ori,” Gimli hailed him. “After breakfast, wha’ say yeh an’ me go down t’ th’ armory practice ring an’ have a start a’ trainin’?” Ori’s heart leapt then sank.

“Certainly,” he heard himself say.

After spending a little time with the newest inmates of Fundin House, Ori, Gimli and Dwalin made their way to the armory.
Gimli was kind enough to find a training circle away from the main arena. It turned out to be a sort of private space that young Durins used when they were just starting out, to save the family any loose talk about whether Prince or Princess Such-and-Such would be a lousy warrior. Ori knew the feeling. He wouldn’t want his first efforts in verse read aloud in the Central Market, either.

The practice axe Ori used had been balanced for a strong dwarfling, about his own height. Ori suspected he found it far lighter than Dwalin had as a pebble. He would have liked to say something about that, but he had no idea if it mattered. That was the trouble, wasn’t it. He had no idea about anything.

The first day, Gimli dressed him in light armor and himself in extremely heavy armor.
“I thought you were supposed to teach me to defend myself,” said Ori.
“Aye, an’ I will. Firs’, yer goin’ t’ take yer bes’ crack a’ me.”
“With what?”
Gimli raised a magnificent eyebrow.
“Yer axe?”
“I can’t just hit you with this!”
“Listen, it’s been blunted, I’m wearin’ enough steel an’ leather t’ fill an armory, an’ I go’ skin like rawhide. Yeh ain’t goin’ t’ hurt me. See?”
Gimli stepped back a few paces and raised his arms from his sides, about chest height.
“I jus’ wan’ yeh t’ ge’ a feel f’r it. Go on.”
“Are you sure?”
“Aye, go on. B’fore I’m old enough t’ collec’ me pension.”
“Oh, alright.”
Ori took a deep breath, hefted the axe as he’d seen warrior’s do, and let it fly.
Gimli flew, too.
The blow knocked him off his feet and through the air several yards to land with a graceless thump in a cloud of sawdust and sand. He lay there, unmoving. Then his muscles started to twitch.
“Oh, Mahal, I’ve killed him!” Ori cried.
Suddenly Dwalin was there. He sped past Ori and leaned over Gimli for a brief, tense second.
Then Dwalin scowled, and nudged Gimli with the toe of his boot.
“Knock it off, our Gimmers. It’s no’ tha’ funny!”
Gimli twitches grew to shudders, then shakes, then he opened his mouth and howled with laughter.
It was just as well Dwalin had already turned to make his way back, as Ori slid to the ground. Dwalin caught him, or maybe a little time had gone by, but Ori was in Dwalin’s arms when he came-to. Dwalin sat on the ground with Ori in his lap.
“Oh, Mahal… what did I do?” Ori cried.
Gimli leaned over him.
“Yeh’ve convinced me tha’ if yeh ever wan’ t’ go int’ th’ guard, yeh need t’ try th’ war hammer instead a’ th’ axe,” said the young dwarf. “Yeh could knock some orc’s noggin back int’ th’ last Age.”
“That wasn’t that long ago,” Ori protested.
“No, th’ Age b’fore tha’.”
“Dwalin, I think I need to go lie down.”
“Aye, we’re goin’.”
“I can come back tomorrow, right?”
Dwalin did a double take.
“D’yeh wan’ t’ come back tamarrah?”
“If Gimli has the time. You’re right. I need to learn this.”
Gimli laughed.
“I’ll make time, our Ori.”
“So, you’re not really hurt?”
“Oh, aye. I’ll be one big bruise come th’ mornin’. Won’t be th’ firs’ ‘r las’ time. As long’s me beard still looks guid.”

His beard did, in fact, look good, though the rest of him moved like a dwarf about to return to stone.

He handed Ori the same axe, which Ori took, though he was now sure it would bite.

“Now,” said Gimli, “I’m goin’ t’ tell yeh wha’ Da told me a long time ago.” “Is it a secret?”

“No, it’s th’ truth. Whether yer jus’ defendin’ yerself, ‘r yer off t’ collect some heads, th’ axe makes its own demands.”

“What does that mean?”

“It knows when yer afraid a’ it.”

“Shouldn’t I be?”

“If yer afraid, it’ll betray yeh. Let’s call it havin’ a healthy respect. In tha’ way, every weapon is th’ same.”

“Even the slingshot?”

Gimli opened his mouth, then closed it and chuckled.

“I’ll no be catty abou’ slingshots. Yeh could still take me eye ou’ with it.”

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Everyone wants to meet Dori’s and Balin’s badgers - absolutely everyone. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

After four days, Ori was more comfortable with training and Dori felt less physically stretched. Over breakfast of eggs cooked in cream and dill and a huge platter of roasted cavern mushrooms and tomatoes, Thorin said there would be a special open court that day so that Dori, Balin and their new badgers could be presented to the populace. This announcement set everyone chattering.

“Oh, how nice that will be!” Dori cried.
“Aye,” Balin agreed as he cradled the twins in his arms. “An’ they’re such good wee badgers, aren’ yeh, me darlin’s?” Balin cooed down at the matching pair of Durin blue eyes staring up at him. “Me precious bundles a’ love. Yer adad jus’ tha’ proud a’ yeh both. An’ yer uncles’re proud a’ yeh, too. Yer idad Dwalin’s so jealous a’ all tha’ lovely hair!”

He rocked them, and hummed softly, then began to sing,

There’s wee Dwalin in his wee wee boots,
Stompity stompity stomp stomp stomp,
He canna find Thorin, so they’re no’ in cahoots,
Stompity stompity stomp stomp stomp,
Is it a growl or is it a fart,
We can’t tell, so bless his wee heart,
Stompity stompity stomp stomp stomp!

Everyone burst out laughing and the badgers squeaked happily. Thranduil and Elrond had to wipe their fronts.

“Thanks, brother,” Dwalin rumbled, frowning, but it was obvious he was pleased. Ori hurriedly committed the song to history as he scribbled it into his pocket notebook. While he was at it, he sketched a little cartoon of how he imagined ‘wee Dwalin’ stomping around Erebor in his nappy and boots.

“Stompity stomp,” he murmured to himself, and giggled.
“Ah,” observed Red Queen, resplendent in her harness bulging with eggs. “You sing funny little songs to your young as well. We are pleased to know this.”
“Oh yes,” agreed Thranduil. “There is nothing like a new little sapling to turn a parent’s brain to porridge.”
“Mm,” said Dis, gazing pointedly at Kili as he babbled at Tauriel’s belly. “Some of us are more porridgy than others. Runs in families.”
Randibur looked to her with bulging eyes.
“Imad? I can’t imagine you being all… gooey over a badger.”
“I wasn’t,” said Dis. “Thorin was.”
Thorin could probably have defended himself, if he wasn’t caught in the act of making funny faces at the twins.

He cleared his throat and attempted to look majestic.
“You sing to your young, sister queen?” he asked Red Queen.

“Indeed, we have a great tradition of serenading our nestlings. It strengthens the familial bonds. We shall be quite delighted to attend this introduction of the Blessed Bearer’s young to your people.”

Ori thought that perhaps the bone breakers really didn’t need much ruling, as Red Queen spent a great deal of time in Fundin House ‘assisting’ Thorin or Dori or whomever she thought would need it. Of course, Ori reflected, there really hadn’t been much in the way of ease and comfort in Khazad-dûm, fighting for food and survival with the orcs. No one could really blame Red Queen for eagerly spending time socializing with her peers. Ori refused to laugh but he did catch Dwalin’s eye. Dwalin smirked and put an arm about his shoulders.

Just then, Roäc blew into the room and landed on the table, closely followed by Great of Heart. The bird of Rohan strutted up to Thorin and held out a leg.

“Ah, thank you, Great of Heart,” Thorin said as he untied a roll of parchment and opened it. Miss Oqizla came in with a chicken carcass and put it in front of Great of Heart. Roäc helped himself to bacon.

“What news, o king?” Roäc asked around a mouthful.

Thorin read the note then threw back his head and roared with laughter. This was met with demands to know what was going on and who had written. Thorin slid down in his chair and managed to give the note to Bilbo.

Bilbo frowned and read aloud.

Brother King,

My Theodred was out riding this morning and saw two ravens flying toward Meduseld from opposite directions, at such great speed, that they collided head on and fell to the ground.

Theodred rescued both and brought them to me. The ravens said they each carried a birth announcement of mother Hild and daughter Arivett to each other. They were both full of the news and very anxious that these messages be delivered, so I sent two of my best falcons to complete the deliveries.

The raven are recovering in my hall. I thought you might get some amusement out of this, as well as the satisfaction of knowing that your kingdoms have continued to increase apace.

Love to you all,

Theoden

Postscript: I received your raven two days ago, a fine specimen, and would like to send my warmest congratulations to Lord Balin and the Blessed Bearer. I shall be sending the traditional gift of my people to them.

Secondary postscript: I would not for a moment entertain the thought of pondering anything the Asshat had to say.

“What are they? What are they?” Dori cried

“Badgers, I imagine,” Bilbo teased.

“Do not antagonize the Blessed Bearer!” she commanded.

Nori stuck his head up through the table.

“I’m not even goin’ to lay odds,” he said. “But I’m willin’ to bet they’re both girlies.”

Roäc hopped up to Great of Heart and croaked at the falcon. Great of Heart removed his head from the carcass and shrieked back.

Roäc cackled evilly.

“And you’d be half right,” he said.

“Arivett had a dwarfling?” Dis cried.

“No,” said Roäc, and he hissed then crowed. “Hild.”
“Oooooooooo!” the company chorused. Dis raised a brow. “Depend on it. She’ll trade him for a sword with the next caravan that passes by her fortress.” “No,” said Roäc. “He’s being introduced as the heir of Ahkn, Crown Prince Lahkn of the Stonefoots!” “Thank Mahal,” said Thorin as he struggled to sit up and wiped his eyes. “We were all worried the crown would have to pass to Ahkn’s brother, and Prince Jahkn is a good, kind soul, but I’d rather put my wargs on the throne of the Stonefoots then see him on it.” “He’s incompetent?” Thranduil asked. “Not so much incompetent as vague. Unless he’s at his spinning wheel or his loom, he doesn’t have an attention span.” “Arivett and Eomer have a daughter,” said Bilbo to Eowyn. “You are officially an aunt.” “Excellent,” she said. “Hopefully they’ll have a dozen or so, and no one will ask me when I’m next.” “So,” Bilbo asked, “what is this traditional gift that your uncle is sending to Dori and Balin?” Eowyn was suddenly very busy drinking her ale. She mumbled something and Faramir, beside her, began to laugh. “Of course!” he cried. Thorin turned to the Rohan woman. “Eowyn?” “Uncle’s going to send two of the best foals born closest to the time of the birth.” “How lovely!” Dori crowed. “But does your dear uncle know that badgers take a while to grow? They won’t be riding on their own for quite a few years?” “I don’t know,” Eowyn admitted. “I think it’s more that he gets to send them.” “It is a very kind gesture of him,” Dori mused. “We shall cherish them as such.” “Can room be made in th’ stable?” Balin inquired. “Aye, I’ll see t’ it.” Dwalin promised. “Eowyn?” Thorin turned back to her. “Would it be offensive if any but the badgers rode them?” “No, our horses need care, training, and to be ridden. I’ll help you with them.” “Thank you. Bard, do you think Sigrid and Bain will have use for them?” Bard grinned. “I’m sure they will, but Frodo and Sam?” “We can share!” Frodo urged. “Very well,” Thorin approved. “Not to worry, my love,” he said at Bilbo’s concerned look. “Saddles can be made for them. As, no doubt, we shall visit Rohan and they will be able to ride there.” Frodo and Sam fell into a quiet discussion about the horses and riding. Great of Heart finished his repast and looked at Thorin, who said, “Rest my friend, a letter shall be composed for you to return home with when you are ready.” Another raven arrived and landed in front of Thorin. “Shelly!” Ori recognized Chat’s raven. “Hello, Shelly,” Thorin greeted the raven. “Hullo, our Thorin! From me Chat,” Shelly announced, holding out her leg. Thorin removed the roll and read, while Bilbo filled a saucer with bits of toast and bacon. Thorin growled in exasperation. “What is it, my dear?” Bilbo asked. “He’s offering me his beard for having ‘failed me’, in that he didn’t detect Frerin’s plot. Idiot. Ori, please take this down.” “Of course, Thorin.”

“Dear Chat,
I don’t blame you for anything. if you send me your beard,
"I will bring it back there myself and glue it to your arse.

Love,

Thorin."

"Got it," said Ori.

"Not that anyone would be able to tell there was more hair on his arse," said Thorin. "He’s been mistaken for a bear cub in the public baths by his own subjects."

"True," Gloin agreed. "'No' abou’ Chat’s arse, I mean, but about Frerin. Pity Dain an’ Sculdís left us th’ other day. Did yeh ge’ a chance t’ discuss th’ matter with Dain?"

"I did. He’s now eager to see what possible actions might be taken so, as he put it, he could weed out his court. I seriously doubt there are any loyal to Frerin in the Iron Hills. Frerin and Dain always disliked each other."

"Not to put a damper on things," Bard said, "but are you aware of any here who might move against you?"

Thorin chuckled. "Only a few, and they have irrevocably bound themselves to that terrible crime lord, Master Ursith."

"Wrapped nice an’ tight ’round me liddle pinky finger," Nori cackled.

"Such a good boy!" Granny Klak praised.

"Truth," Nori agreed, toasting himself with his tea cup.

"Granny’s precious ba-dger," Ori singsonged quietly.

"How is th’ casino comin’ along?" Gloin asked.

"Brilliant. I’ve go’ every streetwalker and bawd in Dale bound to the Pleasure Guild an’ trainin’ nicely. Lovely lot a’ harlots every one a’ ‘em. Guild’s cleaning’ ‘em up an’ got all kinds a’ medical help f’r ‘em. The young ones’er all bein’ sent t’ the guild schools and brought up proper. Them that don’t want to go on puttin’ out ‘re being trained in cards an’ dice and listening t’ everytfing. There was lots that wanted t’ wait tables an’ cook, too. Like the money. Ten times be’er than anyfing they got on their own. Got their pimps under me thumb as staff, too. All’re happy as pigs in a mud puddle bein’ me bodyguards an’ security f’r t’ place. Knew ‘em all as Nori, so Master Ursith knew jus’ where t’ tickle ‘em, so they slapped down quicker than a wink."

"You’re a genius, Nori," Bard said. "Thank you for taking in all those women and boys, who had no way of making a living, but with their bodies. You, I mean Master Ursith, are a true guardian to them all."

"Aye, well don’ go spillin’ it about. Ursith is a mean ol’ crime lord. Only likes his money. Savin’ them miners got him a finger on the King, so watch out f’r ‘im, our Thorin."

"I shall indeed," Thorin replied gravely, but with a twinkle in his eyes. "Ursith is a desperate villain and I shall ever trust my spymaster to keep him under surveillance."

"It really is a delightful outcome," Galadriel put in. "Perhaps Ursith’s wicked reputation shall draw in the other such criminally minded persons."

"Well, our Gladdy," Nori replied, "the only way they can stay is if they bind to Master Ursith."

"Speaking of Dale," Dori said suddenly, drawing all eyes to her. "My dears, it really is time we solidified our plans for Yule."

Thranduil and Bard exchanged grins, then Thranduil turned to Dori. "Indeed, Blessed Bearer. Bard and I, with the Bardlings’ help, have at least a workable storytelling revel that will include most of the main streets and the finale in the town center before Dale Hall."

"Indeed?" Thorin said interestedly. "I am a little familiar with the Yule story told in Dale. There are always the central characters of the Snow Maiden, Grandfather Frost and a malignant creature of some sort."

"Correct," Bard said. The terrible Ice Fiend know as Supmark and his band of Nekushdies, who try to prevent the Snow Maiden and Grandfather Frost bringing Yule gifts and the promise of Spring to the people."

"We have," Thranduil put in, "embellished the story a little."

"Wicked Stepmother rewrote it." Sigrid explained as she and Fili began to laugh.
“We do need your help in taking the parts of a few…er…characters,” Thranduil continued. Everyone around the table looked at each other.

“If,” Thranduil’s smile was very dangerous, but his tone was one of diplomatic delicacy, “the good Captain Dwalin would be so kind?”

“As long as it means I’m Supmark, I’m in,” Dwalin replied. “Mebbe ge’ some off-duty soldiers interested in playin’ nekushdies. Targ’s pretty dramatic, ‘specially when he’s had a few.”

Bard turned and smirked at Thranduil. “Told you he’d do it.”

“Excellent,” Bilbo enthused. “do you have a script so to speak?”

“I shall finish preparing it and bring it to you, Dori and…” Thranduil trailed off looking about. Thorin glanced at Bilbo.

“My love, Dori, and Dwalin and, I suppose, anyone else who wishes to be a part of it.”

An excited clamoring rose and Ori hugged Dwalin’s arm. He knew that Dwalin would make every attempt to surpass his role as the elderly princess in the tower.

“Oh dear!” Dori cried.

“What is it, beloved?” Balin asked, as the room fell silent.

“Whatever am I going to wear to open court?”

Ori sat at his desk in the catalogers hall in the library. He had finished some busy work from Brur earlier and was now following up on some of his own research. He had been busy comparing the history the library contained with the events described by Galadriel’s mother. They were in agreement in most things except the account of why the sack of Doriath had occurred and where orcs came from.

“Yeh really want t’ know?” Mahal’s hot boom was in the back of his head.

Ori considered, then.

“If it will help any other orcs who are like Drum, yes.”

“Drum an’ his kin didn’ star’ ou’ like tha’. They were around long before then. Morgoth used them t’ star’ orcs before he mixed ’em up with elves an’ men, turnin’ all t’ evil. Torture an’ mutatin’ ’em all t’ yeh kin bare recognize ’em. They’re what yer folk called ’mine knackers’.”

Ori stared into the middle distance. Mine knackers were only faintly remembered legends. When the dwarrow mined into the mountains there were stories, mostly referred to as dwarrow fairy tales of magical creatures who would warn the miners if there was danger underground. They would tap out their warnings in the stone. They were usually described in stories as the size of a badger. No one had a good description of how they looked but the legend occasionally raised its head among the dwarrow.

A whomp of a book on the desk in front of him brought him back to himself.

He peered up at Lolibur, who didn’t look best pleased, though he couldn’t think of anything he’d done.

“Sorry, our Ori,” she said. “I didn’t mean to put it down quite that hard.”

“What’s the matter?”

“My parents are making a big deal of my getting married too soon. As if! I made the mistake of mentioning in a letter that we wanted to announce our engagement in the spring and suddenly I was a just a damling, barely ready to make my own way in the world.”

“Your parents wrote that?”

“It’s not like we plan to elope, although you and Dwalin did and look how happy you are!”

“But you were already in love with him, and he with you!”

“I was, but I didn’t know he was. I went into it not sure if I wasn’t getting something worse than what I escaped.”

She opened her mouth, but he cut her off. My, but he had grown daring recently.

“I’m not saying your parents think that about Furh’nk. Have they even been formally introduced to him? You know dwarf parents want to cross examine your intended within an inch of their life. Even if they don’t really have any say over whether and when you marry.”
“They don’t! Which is why I don’t understand the fuss! I was thinking we’d be engaged a respectable amount of time, a decade or so.”
“Did you tell them that?”
“I wrote ‘a long engagement’! That’s a decade. Everyone knows that.”
Ori was beginning to think it was a good thing that a large, snow-bound valley sat between Loli and the inn.
“I need to move out of my imad’s and idad’s house, get my own flat. I can afford it now that I’ve finished my formal lessons. Maybe if they see I’m alright on my own, they won’t fuss so much.”
“You wouldn’t move in with Furh’nk?”
“No, that would be too much like getting married right away, and I want to make it on my own for a while. Maybe I should write and tell them that.”
“You think?” Ori teased gently.
“Then I can invite them to see my flat in the spring, and they can interrogate Furh’nk then. Maybe it’ll distract them from noticing Pika has been combing Omi’s hair. Thanks, Ori!” She leaned in and pressed their foreheads together. “You give such great advice!”

As he watched her skip away, he felt like he’d really accomplished something. What that was, he had no idea.

Brur exploded into the room and roared.
“Ori! Court.”
“Shit,” Ori muttered, threw in things into his satchel and fled home to dress.

This court appearance was rather different than previous. The crowd gathered outside while the King and court settled themselves. Thorin and Balin had thought it best that the family was in place, and the Blessed Bearer was seated comfortably, before the excitement began. Ori glanced around from his scribe’s stand. The only real difference was that instead of Dori and Balin’s usual couch, Dori would be seated on a marvelous daybed: a square canopy above and, Ori thought idly, several thousand cushions, all trimmed with deep folds of white lace. The material covering all was the same stuff that Mahdrin and Dipfa had produced for Dori’s presentation robe. It spilled all around, set every now and then with beads of gold or sapphire.

Dori arrived in the teacup and was tenderly escorted to the daybed by Balin, the sisters, and Galadriel. Dori glittered in her presentation robe with an over robe of fine open work gold net set with sapphires. Dori was help to relax on the seat, while her entourage heaped cushions around her and the twins were laid in her lap.

Margr and Vi stood on either side with their polished mattocks and dressed in silk gowns of Balin’s Fundin red. Everyone else went to their usual places and Thorin nodded to Brur at the entry doors. The guards just managed to scramble out of the way as the crowd surged forward, almost filling the room instantly.

“All hail King Thorin II!” roared Brur. “His majesty presents the first children of the Blessed Bearer of Erebor!”

Cheers rang.

Thorin rose and held out his arms to them.
“Come my people. Come forward with our good friends and allies from Dale. Come and meet the Children of the Blessed Bearer and Lord Balin.”

The guards just managed to scramble out of the way as the crowd surged forward, almost filling the room instantly.

“Ou’ a me way, peasants! Oi! I’m ‘ere t’ see th’ Blessed Bearer an’ her tots!” The crowd parted for Master Ursith, who had obviously dressed down for this event. This meant that instead of his traditional black, everything he wore, including his jewels and nail decorations, was pink. The torchlight bounced off of him and Ori found he couldn’t look directly at the criminal mastermind without spots dancing in his vision and the need to sit down until the wooziness went away.

Balin raised a brow, Margr and Vi raised their mattocks protectively.
But the Blessed Bearer merely nodded and said, “I’m sure there’s no cause for alarm. Everyone is allowed to greet me and my... tots."

“Aye, an’ I brung them a pressie each!” Ursith chortled. “Somethin’ useful!"

He clapped his hands and a matched set of flunkies scampered up the aisle, each carrying something exceedingly heavy, draped in pink velvet cloth. They laid the objects at the Bearer’s feet and quickly scampered away. Ursith bowed.

“With yer permission, a’ course, Blessed Bearer.”

“Kindly bash on with it, Master Ursith.”

He grasped the velvet covers one in each hand, and whipped them off with a flourish. “Ta-dah!”

Everyone leaned forward to see. Then they leaned forward a little more. Ori looked and saw two smallish... vases? Chamber pots? Coal skuttles? Butter and Sugar’s hackles rose and Thorin had to soothe them.

“Very nice,” said Dori. “What are they, and what are they for?”

“These’re solid gold nappies! One f’r each!”

Balin said, “Happy thought, indeed.”

“Master Ursith,” said Dori, “I thank you, but, how would I put these on the pebbles?”

“Eh?”

“You do know how nappies work, don’t you?”

“Yeh slap ‘em on their bums,” said Ursith jovially.

“Yeeeesss,” said Dori. “Do you not see a problem with their design? Perhaps they’re a little too solid, and you seem to have neglected leg holes.”

“I figured they’d jus’ sit in ‘em. Easier t’ clean than cloth nappies, righ’? When they done their wee business, jus’ give these a swish a water, an out int’ th’ gutter with th’ dross.”

Vi muttered, “Wish it was really tha’ easy.”

“Thank you, dear Ursith. We’ll be sure to put them to good use.”

He bowed again and said, “Under th’ circumstances, I’m thinkin’ yeh prob’ly won’ be considerin’ me proposal.”

“Alas, I am sensible of the honor, but I fear I must decline. But take heart, I am sure Mahal has placed your One somewhere in Middle Earth. Perhaps you should take a protracted journey to go and find them.”

“I li’e th’ adventurin’ sort,” he replied. “I’m hopin’ they come t’ me.”

“I’m sure you’ll get just what you’ve got coming to you,” Dori said pleasantly. “Good day, and thank you again.”

Ursith bowed for a final time, then turned and strutted back up the aisle, whistling.

Ori couldn’t decide if he wanted to go home after this.

The scene played out much as he imagined. When they arrived at Fundin House, Nori was already there, lounging smugly in the sitting room.

Dori didn’t even stop to change clothes. She marched across the sitting room smacked Nori across the head with a fresh nappy.

“Nori! You creep!”

Nori took flight, and Dori went right after him, across the room and around furniture. Dori was amazingly spry for someone who had recently birthed twins.

“Oi, our Dori! Enjoyed it, did yeh?” Nori asked with a grin as he ducked the nappy.

“Enjoyed it? I hope you have said your prayers to Mahal, because I’m sending you to Him.”

“No way,” said Mahal in Ori’s head. “No one’s Halls’re Nori-proof. Give us a millenium ‘r so.”

Ori said, “Dori, Lord Mahal says you have to give Him a millennium to secure the halls against Nori.”

“Well!” Dori huffed.

Mahal went on, “I knew he was trouble. I hadn’t even finished puttin’ im t’gether an’ he was stuffin’ everythin’ int’ his mouth an’ screamin’, “Mine!”

As Dori had always insisted this was Nori’s first word, Ori wasn’t all that surprised.
“Did you really design Nori this way?” Ori murmured to the ether.
“I may’ve gotten his plans mixed up with th’ schematics f’r some minin’ equipment. An’ I was badger-sitting one a’ th’ Wife’s fly trap plants at th’ same time.”
“So that explains his hair?”
“I ain’ takin’ th’ blame f’r tha’.”

Finally, Dori had Nori cornered, and Nori could have easily escaped through the wall, but he simply stood and let Dori beat him with the nappy to his content before the Blessed Bearer gave it up and marched back to the bed chambers in a huff.
“Well, duck,” said Bofur. “Now ya’ve done it. Fifty lashes with a fresh nappy!”
“Naw, if our Dori was really angry he’d’ve used a dirty one.”
Enchanted, Excited, and Exhausted

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. We’re getting ready for Yule. The fact it’s going to be mid-summer here in a few weeks makes it entirely…weird. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Please note: Red Queen’s song is all @Blistering_Typhoons’ fault!

Two days later, Ori had a quick dawn breakfast with Dwalin, then fled to the library for a couple of hours. He had a lot to do there, and not a lot of time to do it, since Nodun told Master Brur that Ori was painting for the king’s portrait contest. Brur told Ori he was limited to mornings for his library work.

“Don’ make me send yeh home on th’ end a’ me boot, laddie.”
Sadi had looked askance at Brur.
“As if yeh kin raise yer boot withou’ fallin’ over.”
That Dori expected him home for second breakfast further cut into his time.
As he worked at his desk, Sapphire landed in front of him with a note from Gimli asking him to meet at the training grounds for something he called ‘endurance training’.
He thought that sounded grim.
Sapphire cleared her throat.
“Oh, sorry.”
He pulled some snacks from his bag, and her particular bowl, and put them out for her while he pondered his fate.

He arrived home in time for second breakfast to find the sitting room was full. Dori lounged resplendent in her inflated chair feeding the twins, while Gridr, Margr, Vi, Mistress Dazla and some of her staff busily worked through the mound of baby things. The presents continued to pour in from all the dwarf kingdoms of Arda without an end in sight. Mistress Dazla gloated over the amount of cloths sent for nappies, Margr and Vi sorted through clothing, and Gridr inspected toys.

“Dori,” Gridr said in a pleased tone, “there’s more than enough here to send to the badger care guild. You’ll supply every care center in the mountain, with plenty over for the Dale places.”
“Aye,” Vi agreed, “an’ these badgers’ togs’s too small f’r man babies, but there’s more than enough f’r any dwarf badger that needs.”
Ori ate enough to satisfy Dori, who despite being occupied, could still watch him.
After second breakfast, Bilbo and Thorin went back into Bag End East and returned dressed formally.
Thorin shrugged into his coat.
“We’ve been invited to read to the badgers at the East Dale School this morning,” he explained to Ori.
“You both look quite dapper,” said Ori.
“Thank you,” said Bilbo as he adjusted his handkerchief in the breast pocket of his Durin blue jacket. “I’ve been studying Vug, and taking my hints from that fashion plate scribe they’re always on about.”
“So, what you’re saying is, you’re socks don’t match,” Ori put in slyly.
“Alas, I don’t wear them myself,” said Bilbo, as Thorin settled his cape over his shoulders. “So I’ve had to go with underpinnings in screaming royal blue silk.”

Dwalin looked them over.
“Targ’s ou’ front with th’ security detail. Be guid f’r yer bullies.”
“Yes, Mam,” Thorin sassed him.
Dwalin shot him an obscene gesture.

‘Endurance training’ was more complicated it sounded.
Ori had imagined it meant running in a circle until he wore the surface of the stone to the height of his ears.

“No! Nononono!” said Gimli with a grin as they stood in the sparring ring. “Mahal made us to run for centuries. Nothin’ t’ teach there. This’s abou’ keepin’ yer arms in tune with yer brain, so yeh kin figh’ f’r days if need be.”
“I haven’t got days,” said Ori. “I’m supposed to meet with the scribe chairs at lunch.”
“A’righ’, t’day yeh’ll train so yeh kin figh’ f’r two hours.”
“Jolly.”

This meant axe drills. This meant not only swinging the axe for power, but stopping the swing instantly, whenever Gimli said ‘Stop’.

He said this with such frequency, Ori understood why dwarf axe-wielders moved up the military ranks so quickly. They wanted to be the ones who said ‘Stop’, not the ones who had to stop. After an hour of this, Ori wondered if he would ever raise his hands over his head again. His shoulders seemed to have seized.

Still, he was surprised when Gimli called a halt a half hour early.

Ori blinked the sweat out of his eyes and had just the presence of mind to lower his ax slowly to the ground, as respect required.

Over the past ninety minutes, Ori could have sworn that axe gained a hundred pounds.

“Are you sure, Gimmers?” he panted. “I don’t think I’ve dislocated anything yet.”

“Recovery’s par’ a’ trainin’,” said Gimli. “Yer hubby’s here t’ make sure yeh do it, too.”

Ori followed his gaze to Dwalin, who leaned against the wall, arms crossed, with a big grin on his face.

Inwardly, Ori groaned and wondered how long Dwalin had been there, watching him flail about.

“Come ge’ ‘im,” Gimli called to Dwalin. “He’ll need unfanklin’.”

“I still have to clean my axe!” Ori protested.

“I’ll do it as a fav’r, this once,” said Gimli with a wink as he took the weapon. “Go on.”

The bath attached to the Durin’s private training circle was as simple as the fighting ring. They had it to themselves, and while Ori appreciated the lack of soldiers snapping towels at one another, boasting, and telling bad jokes, it felt a little eerie as well. Condensation dripped water from the shadowy roof of the cave, and the murmur of the sluice flowing into and out of the natural pool felt soft and distant. It was so empty and quiet, their breathing echoed back on them.

Ori sat on Dwalin’s lap, facing forward, up to his chin in steaming water. The medicinal herbs and rubbing oils Dwalin used smelt of lavender, and the vapor rose around them in a calming cloud. Ori imagined this was it was like to sit in a cup of herbal tea. It certainly beat the scent of any lineament Oin prescribed.

Dwalin worked Ori’s shoulders and arms down to the fingertips and back, each side, then again, and again. The warrior found aching mountains of muscle under his shoulder blades and worked them into at least foot hills. Then he did the same for the angry flesh down the sides of Ori’s spine and over his hips.

Ori had drawn the dwarven anatomy his entire life. He knew how all the muscles worked together, and how they should look. He had never had those connections driven home quite so forcefully.
He wondered if all this muscle pain wouldn’t lead him to draw anatomy more accurately.
“I kin hear yeh thinkin’, love,” said Dwalin. “Wha’s on yer mind?”
“Nothing warrior-like,” Ori assured him. “I’m not strategizing on how I could better swing the axe without looking like a dope.”
Dwalin chuckled.
“F’r wha’ it’s worth, yeh don’ look li’e a dope. Our Gimmers’s goin’ t’ have t’ train yeh t’ keep yer tongue in yer mouth, though.”
“I stick it out automatically when I’m concentrat’ing,” said Ori, and he whimpered as Dwalin found a particularly complicated knot at the top of his arse.
“Sorry, love, I’ll try t’ make it quick,” said Dwalin. “Aye, well, yer no’ as likely t’ bite yer tongue off when yer drawin’.”
Ori sucked in a harsh breath that had as much to do with the realities of fighting as it did Dwalin’s ministrations.
Firmly, he reminded himself that he was not training to be a warrior. He was not going into any pitched battles, or riding the streets on patrol, though the part where the soldiers helped people they met while on patrol appealed to him.
No.
All he had to do in a bad situation was fight long enough and skillfully enough to cut an exit for himself and run as fast as his Mahal-given legs could carry him.
He had feared orcs the most, until Gimli explained that orcs were the least of Ori’s problems. Though they travelled in packs, and they were mighty, they were also few in number, and slow without their wargs, and they didn’t have enough brain power to plan ahead. It was easy to outpace them, and usually simple to find an unguarded spot in their scant armor to target. And their weapons sucked slug slime.
Men and elves were far worse. The cleverest and quickest could jump around like well-armed frogs, bludgeoning and stabbing all the while. But men were quick to tire, and they and elves tended to underestimate a dwarf’s skills. It took longer for a dwarf warrior to find an opening to finish them, but a dwarf was nothing if not patient.
“Yeh’ve drifted off agin, love,” said Dwalin.
“Oh? Oh, sorry. How long have we been in here? At this rate, I won’t have time to eat or change before I have to be at the scribes’ hall.”
“I had yer robes an’ satchel brought here, an’ Bilbo’s arranged f’r th’ royal kitchens t’ serve lunch at th’ meetin’, an’ also push it back an hour.”
“We can’t do that! Think of all the schedules it will throw off!”
Dwalin kissed the top of his head.
“Love, they all know wha’ yer up t’ here. When it comes t’ th’ firs’ chair, they don’ expec’ military timin’.”
Ori knew he had truly changed when he didn’t feel the need to protest further.
“Now all I have to do is stay awake for the meeting,” he said.

Amazingly, he did not nod off as he feared. Instead, he felt a surge of energy that carried him through the meeting, and even let him spend a little time with Arne in the apartment afterward.
Arne looked at him askance as Ori chuckled at the lavender tea before him.
“Sorry, I just have this thing about lavender,” said Ori.
Yes, he was forever going to associate it with Dwalin’s hands on his sore muscles, but Arne didn’t need to know that.
Arne placed the plate of cookies between them on the little table and they proceeded to demolish them.
Ori had a whisper of guilt over this, as he had just eaten an entire meal, and one put together at the direction of a hobbit, at that. Lately, he just couldn’t stop eating. Perhaps it was because it was winter now. Perhaps it was because in winters past he and his brothers had far less to eat. Perhaps it was the extra physical training.
Really, it was probably because they were Arne’s best cinnamon and xocolātl chunk cookies and Ori was nobody’s fool.

“I got a letter from Buer,” said Arne with a grin. He pulled it from the pocket of his tunic and waved it.

“Really! What does he say!” Ori cried, before he remembered it wasn’t any of his business.

“I don’t know,” said Arne. “It just arrived. But we’re going to find out.”

“Are you sure?” Ori asked.

“I don’t think he’s going to write: Ori is a shale-head, but don’t tell him I said so.”

“It’s always a possibility,” said Ori. He shrugged, then winced at the twinge.

_Dear Arne,_

_I’ve settled in. The chambers and workshop I’ve been given are both ridiculously large and I was taken seriously, unfortunately, when I said the only thing my bedroom needed was a coat of burnt umber paint._

_The Ironfists are nothing if not literal._

Arne groaned.

“I should have warned him.”

_Your sister is beautiful and terrifying, and looks at me like something she scraped off her boot._

“I need to warn him about that, too,” said Arne.

“Is he going to need to be scraped off her boot?” Ori asked.

“If she even noticed he’s there, it’s either very good or very bad.

_Your mother hasn’t thrown me out of the kingdom yet but yesterday was a near thing. Ulfr and I have been developing a clockwork gadget to help with cooking and baking._

_We made a machine that mixes dough, sauce, frosting and such. Yizaris agreed to try it out._

_Shortly thereafter, she came back through covered in xocolātl frosting. It was smeared all over her face, in her hair and beard, and across the front of her apron. She looked like she had lost a fight to a vengeful pastry chef._

_Apparently, not only does our prototype ‘mixer’ spin very fast, but if you neglect to put the blades down all the way into the batter before you turn it on, you will instantly become aware of it._

_We didn’t blow her up, but it did look like she wanted to burn us down._

_Then Ulfr said something, and Yizaris giggled, and I decided I should clean up the kitchen, then go recalibrate something for a while._

_Providing your own amusement seems to be the thing here, as is looking after yourself._

_No one comes to check on you if you didn’t make it to dinner. On the other hand, no one has a breakdown if you’re rummaging through the larder in search of a cold chicken leg at two bell in only your skivvies._

_Food here is plentiful, but I’ve become spoiled by the variety at Dori’s table. It’s not that I mind meat and ale at every meal. I am a dwarf, after all, and I’m grateful to have it, but it’s roasted to within an inch of charcoal, and no one here has ever heard of barbecue sauce._

_Vegetables are generally looked on with suspicion, except for the usual carrots, taters and onion, but those are for stew._

_I have discovered, though, that the Ironfists have given into one particular vice._

_“Really?” Arne said. “Astonish me, Buer.”_
muster with Mistress Gamgee. Someone decided they would branch out and concocted a broccoli cake, but that was a total bust, so they did what Ironfists always do with food that’s unappealing: they deep-fried it and smothered it in melted cheese.

It wasn’t half bad, but I swear before I leave here I am teaching these dwarrow about azip.
Dree and Erris amuse themselves by following their old bodies around and harassing the once-dwarrow now wearing them. Dree is particularly nasty to Ulfr’s old math tutor, who got his/her body and stalks around the place like an ill-tempered ferret.

“Oi! Stop frowning so much! That body was meant to be pretty for eternity, you git. You’re going it all wrinkled.”

Ulfr’s relatives are really the worst. I didn’t like the way Ulfr’s brother and his brother’s husband were eyeing some of my equipment when I first arrived, so I put a booby trap on my workshop door.
The green paint on their faces will likely fade in a few weeks, but their totally bald pates are a lot harder to hide. Ever see a bald elf? Really, it’s kind of sad.

I’m amazed Yizaris puts up with the once-dwarrow, even if they are Ulfr’s family. If this were Erebor, kin returned from the dead or not, I’m pretty sure Thorin would have their heads out on pikes in a trice, and given the wargs their ankles to gnaw. Instead, the royals just ignore these people, as if hoping they’ll go away.

Alright, not all of them. Zaris always seems to be doodling torture instruments on her tunic sleeve, usually when one of them is looking at her. Then she mutters out of the side of her mouth to Yizaris, who just says, ‘Not yet, dear.’.

Right, I’m off back to my workroom as the shellac should be dry.
Tell Ori ‘Hullo’ for me and check for love bites from Dwalin, so I can tease him. And give Nodun and Tay a hug.

Ori made it back to Fundin House in time to change just before dinner. He bounced into his bedroom to see Dwalin pull off his shirt. He dropped his things on the floor, ran headlong into his husband, and hugged him tight.

“There’s me love,” Dwalin chuckled, wrapping his arms about Ori who was busy trying to bury his entire head in Dwalin’s chest fur. “How’d th’ day go f’r yeh?”

“Lunch meetings are nice, Brur only wants me to work in the mornings and Arne got a letter from Buer.”

“No, but he smeared it in xocolātl frosting! What about you?”

“After yeh left, I got a couple a’ them elves who’re dwarrow now, and ran ‘em around in their greaves t’ get ‘em used t’ soldierin’ again. They’re gettin’ be’er a’ handlin’ their weapons. Poor sods keep f’rgettin’ they ain’t go’ th’ reach they once had an’ fall on their faces every now an’ then. How’re yer muscles?”

Ori slowly let go, doing an internal check. “I feel fine. You’re such a good healer to me.” He stood on tiptoe and kissed the end of his husband’s nose.

They arrived in the breakfast parlor to find they were the last to the table. Bard and his family were there along with Margr, Vi and Glorfindel.

Oräc had graduated from the butter dish to an old woven doll basket with wheels that once belonged to Sigrid and Tilda. It contained a small poofy cushion and several handkerchiefs to keep her warm. She had been placed between Sigrid and Tilda. Tilda was very involved with Oräc and the little heap of doll’s clothes at her elbow. She was trying out different doll hats on Oräc. who finally protested.

“I can hardly hold my head up as it is! Why a hat?”
“You’re a raven princess! You have to look pretty.”
“Oh mahumb. Fine. Gimme that purple one.”

Thranduil, at the far end of the table, was a trying and miserably failing not to laugh. Bard and Faramir appeared to be able to control themselves while the rest of the diners watched in amusement.

“Oi,” Oräc shouted at the king-father. “You can’t talk. You’ve got twigs stuck in your head.”

“In my hair, not my head,” said Thranduil. “Rumors to the contrary not withstanding. I would much rather wear my twigs then whatever that is on your head.”

“At least I’ve got a proper hat. You’re just jealous because purple isn’t your color.”

“Purple is one of my colors,” Thranduil replied calmly. “just not that shade.”

“Come on, just admit I’m pretty,” Oräc snapped. “Our wee Princess Tilda says so.”

Tilda had found another hat she seemed to like better. This one a rather fetching bright green with croched lace and ribbons of the same purple as before. She removed the purple hat and placed the bonnet on Oräc head, turning the basket around to tied the ribbons under Oräc’s chin.

“There,” she announced, pleased.

“Will I do, lass?” Oräc asked.

“Yes, it’s perfect.”

“Should I be wearing a hat to meals? Seems a bit rude.”

“You don’t fit any of the doll clothes, and it would be much ruder to come to dinner naked,” Tilda said with finality.

Oräc shrugged her now down covered tiny wings. “Right you are, lass.”

Ori glanced over and noticed that Dis was trying very hard not to laugh.

The other ravens watched Tilda’s efforts with benign disinterest and Red Queen with extreme fascination.

“Not a red hat, nestling?” she inquired of Tilda. The little girl shook her head vehemently.

“No. She’s Prince Fili’s raven. You’re a bone breaker queen and it would be rude if she appeared wearing a red crest.”

Red Queen cackled with delight and Mistress Dazla and her team informed the Blessed Bearer she was served.

Dinner was a spicy green cress and chicken soup with new bread followed by a platter of lake cat fish, provided by Bain who blushed hotly at the praise he was lavished with. The fish was smothered in a creamy sauce of onions and dill, served with roasted twirls of mashed potatoes and carrots roasted with orange slices.

Ori ate away his large portions with gusto and pitied Buer who was missing the variety of flavors. He grinned at the sight of dessert which was poached bananas enrobed in a hot, rich caramel sauce and topped with frozen vanilla custard.

After, they adjourned to the sitting room. The fire burned bright and cozy. Ori with his knitting curled on the couch next to Dwalin. Thorin and Bilbo lazed next to them. Frodo and the younger set sat on the floor before the fire, playing a complex game centered on building a trap out of a variety of metal objects.

Dori was ensconced in her inflated chair with the sleeping twins, her ladies-in-waiting, Sigrid, and Tauriel around her, all but worshipping the badgers.

The general talk was mostly about Yule preparations when suddenly Red Queen gasped.

“Me wee turnip!” Baluchistan yelled.

“Our eggs!” Red Queen screeched. “Our eggs are hatching!”
The room briefly devolved into panic, then Dori called to Mistress Dazla. A large laundry basket stuffed with blankets was brought through and the eggs carefully transferred to the basket along with the fluff from the harness.

Thorin rose and hurried through to Bag End East and returned with his harp. Mistress Dazla and her team hovered and brought tea and snacks.

“How very kind of you, Brother King Thorin,” Red Queen cooed as she perched on the basket, peering down at her three eggs, each of which shuddered slightly. A few other people scattered and returned with instruments. Thorin led them in a soft melody, so the cracking of the eggs could be heard.

“Me lovely gooseberry,” bawled out Baluchistan, perched on the basket across from her. “Are yeh dilated more’n six inches?”

“Six inches?” cried Gridr. “Who dilates that much?”

“We do not dilate at the moment,” Red Queen announced. “We have already laid the eggs.”

“Oh aye, aye, righ’ yeh are, me wee potato.”

“Do you wish to be private, dear?” Dori asked quickly.

“Naw, darlin’,” said Baluchistan. “If everybody just -Poof!- disappeared righ’ now, it’d be weird.”

“I was speaking to the queen,” said Dori.

“Abou’ wha?” the raven asked distractedly, his eyes still on the eggs.

“Not at all,” said Red Queen to Dori. “We are delighted that you are all here to attend our royal hatching.”

Red Queen rose up over the basket and looked down, everyone crowded around and seated themselves on the floor to watch.

“A’right,” said Nori. “I give ten to one odds on that first one hatchin’ first, thirty to one on the second hatchin’ first, fifty to one on the third hatchin’ first. Likewise, if you guess the trifecta, I’ll frow in a dinner at the Moo an’ Cluck. Who’s in?”

Dwalin shot him a look.

“How much is it jus’ t’ get yeh t’ shu’ up, Nuisance?”

“Ya can’t afford it,” said Nori.

“Really, we have done this before,” Red Queen said dryly. “This is hardly our first clutch.”

Kili seemed to give this a deep thought.

“So, this wouldn’t be a crown princess or prince or birdess or whatever.”

“No, we keep our own council and choose our heir upon our death nest.”

“What if you die before you name an heir?” Kili asked.

“All royal progeny engage in The Contest, to show which of them can bring the largest bone from the longest distance. That was how our sister won.”

“Why isn’t she queen, then?” Kili asked.

“We pecked her to death,” said Red Queen. “Oh, look, this one is quite ambitious! See how it’s determined to break the shell around the whole circumference.”

Kili turned to Tauriel,

“I really did not need to know that.”

Tauriel wrapped an arm about him.

“Just call it research, melleth nin, and now its done, you don’t have to think about it any more.”

Kili sighed, “I have the wisest wife in the world.”

Ori leaned in, sketching as fast as he could. The egg nearest shook and a tiny beak poked out. Everyone cheered. The beak gnawed and pecked harder. The egg rolled on its side. The nestling crawled out and gave a tiny screech. Red Queen screeched back in delight.

“Here she is!” Baluchistan shouted. “Well done, me clever wee lassie! Yeh cuddle up t’ yer mummy an’ have a rest. Yer out in th’ world now!”

“She has a little red crest!” Frodo shouted, as he peeked over the rim of the laundry hamper. Red Queen stared, then swelled with pride.

“The first ever bone breaker to hatch with the royal red crest! It’s is a sign of Divine Royalty!”
“Da’s wee princess! Mahal loves yeh, me darlin’!” Baluchistan hollered, and leaned in to stroke the little one gently with his wingtip.

Another beak cracked out of a shell eliciting more cheers. This beak was black and very pointed.

“That’s a raven’s beak!” screamed Roäc. “I knew it! Brother, you’re insane and you’re an adad!” Baluchistan stared, his eyes rolled back up into his head, and he fell off the hamper to the floor.

“I was right!” screamed Beryl, hopping madly among the coffee cups. Oräc jumped up and down in her basket in Fili’s lap.

“How the fuck did that happen?” Oräc asked Sigrid.

Thranduil raised a brow at the nestling.

“You mean to admit you don’t know?”

“Oh, push off, our Thranduil. You know what I mean.” Oräc stood deathly still for a moment.

“Did I just call him ‘our’ Thranduil?”

“You may have,” said Sigrid with a twinkle.

“Never mind,” said Oräc. She tried to wave a wing in dismissal and nearly overset onto her fanny feathers. “So, how did it happen?”

“Baluchistan got lucky with Red Queen, of course.” Sigrid told him, and patted Oräc’s head. “Lucky?” Oräc demanded.

“As in, lucky she didn’t just eat him for supper,” Fili said sarcastically.

The newest little raven broke free and gave a squawk. Baluchistan’s eyes flew open and he hopped back onto the rim of the hamper with Frodo and Sam’s help.

“There’s me wee laddie!” he bawled out. “Lookin’ finer than a gem!”

This chick was not naked like other birds when first hatched, this one, despite obviously being a raven chick, was covered in fluffy golden down. It looked up at Baluchistan. Baluchistan croaked and ruffled his feathers. The tiny raven watched as the usual poof of feathers floated down to the floor. The tiny raven struggled to his feet and ruffled his down, golden wisps floated off. It croaked at Baluchistan.

“Me boy!” Baluchistan screamed and fell off the hamper again. Red Queen’s eyes were the size of scones. Garnet and Beryl screeched and laughed.

“A golden raven!” Thorin said wonderingly. “That’s new.”

The last egg rolled over and exploded. There, sitting on its rump in the nest with its large feet sticking out, was a hatchling. Its bright red beak, hooked at the end, took up most of the skull. It was naked except for a few scattered bit of golden fluff with a poof for tail feathers. It was twice the size of its siblings. The red beak open wide.

“Aaaaaaughk!”

“It’s a raphcuctus bird!” Ori and Dwalin shouted together.

Red Queen fainted this time, to the shout of Baluchistan yelling that he and his Queenie were avian geniuses.

“How did you make a raphcuctus bird from a bone breaker and a raven?” Kili asked, agog. Baluchistan fanned his wings over Red Queen’s beak. Ori thought he was probably trying to circulate some fresh air over her, but he was in danger of smothering her in loose feathers instead.

“Where’d yeh think raphcuctus birds came from?” Baluchistan asked.

“Other raphcuctus birds?” Kili ventured.

“Sure, now. Bu’ they had t’ come from someplace t’ begin with.”

Red Queen stirred and groaned.

“We had the most terrible nightmare! We dreamed we had reproduced with the mad, molting raven.”

“No’ a nightmare, me rare pickled beet,” Baluchistan crooned. “A dream come true.”

And he began to sing:

“I flew wi’ her once upon a dreaaaaaaaam!”

Red Queen peered up at Thorin.

“Brother king, you have your knife?”

“Yes, bu-"
“Good, kindly cut our throat with it.”

“Nonsense,” Bilbo assure the avian queen. “This is a delightful outcome, and the pair of you are extremely well suited.” Red Queen gave the Hobbit a dark look, which he ignored. She peered down at the newly hatched trio, already worn out and asleep in the basket.

“We have brought a raphcuctus bird,” she said, then rose proudly and hopped back on her impromptu nest. “Blu!”

“Me darlin’ bulb o’ fennel!”

“We are pleased,” said Red Queen in a flat manner that led Ori to wonder how she meant that.

“Apparently, this clutch was quite a mixed lot. See, a true bone breaker, the first ever to be born red-crested. And there, already covered in fluff, and already shedding—”

“It’s gold!” Dis reminded her.

“You were crafting while You were drunk?” Ori murmured.

“Aye, but it’s Baluchistan’s chick, so it’s no’ like any’s goin’ t’ be surprised.”

“We are still speaking!” Red Queen warned. Her tone was obviously lost on Baluchistan. She sighed and continued. “We are truly blessed by the valar…and by our union with Bluekisstan.”

In Ori’s head he heard Mahal say, “Don’t tell ‘er, but it was an accident. I was drunk an’ I dipped it in th’ wrong pigments.”

“You were crafting while You were drunk?” Ori murmured.

“Baluchistan’s chick, so it’s no’ like any’s goin’ t’ be surprised.”

“And we have produced a raphcuctus bird,” Red Queen continued. “No bone breaker has ever done such a thing.”

“It’s usually th’ raven who does th’ honors,” said Baluchistan.

“We are still speaking!” Red Queen warned. Her tone was obviously lost on Baluchistan. She sighed and continued. “We are truly blessed by the valar…and by our union with Bluekisstan.”

“Closer enough f’r me, “ Baluchistan said lovingly as she settled down over the chicks. He then fluffed his wings and snuggled up to her, putting one wing over part of her neck.

“But, we still may decide to kill and eat you.”

Sapphire hopped up.

“Shall I inform your flock?”

“Please do, sister raven. Tell them we require our royal quartet.”

Sapphire cocked her head but flew off.

Thorin brought out a few bottles of dorwinian and Mistress Dazla brought out wine glasses and the health of the new nestlings was dutifully drunk.

Thorin began dictating a letter to Dain to Ori, when Mistress Dazla hurried away then returned with four large male bone breakers. They bowed to the company then went and bowed to their Queen.

“We shall now sing to our new chicks.” she announced.

Ranged in a line, the royal quartet began to hum and sway in harmony, then began to vocalize, each in a different octave.

“Aaaah!” Red Queen caroled.

Our aerie
past compare these feathers
Golden we wear
Aaah!
Our aerie
Tell all
We ever are
The … Queen!

And the quartet echoed, “The…. Queeeeeeooooooooeen!”

Everyone gave a round of applause and the twins giggled and squealed.
Ori leaned into Dwalin.
“I didn’t realized any of the other bone breakers could talk.”
“Mebbe they jus’ can’t ge’ a word in edgewise.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Things are going apace for our Ori and Yule is not far away. Ori has a lot to do! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The days tumbled along, one after another.

Outside the mountain, winter deepened. Bard visited the half dozen houses on the edge of the lake, apart from the city itself. These, too, were his subjects, and though they were an independent lot, they were not so proud as to refuse fuel for their fires, blankets for their children, or varied provisions to go along with their daily meals of fish. Bard had also extracted a promise that these villagers would come into town for Yule.

Glorfindel took on assistants to help gather up the drunk or bewildered left on the streets of the city after dark. It was too easy for even the sober to misjudge the bite of the winter cold at the foot of the mountain. In previous times, it had not been uncommon for Ori to trip over men frozen dead on the sidewalk outside the corner bar after a particularly rowdy night.

“Yeh finished gatherin’ all tha’ wool, love?”

Ori looked up from his now-cool cup of tea. It wasn’t particularly late, but he had the sitting room at Fundin House to himself. In the quiet he had lost himself in thinking about nothing.

He smiled up at Dwalin, who was kitted out for night patrol.

“Absolutely,” Ori said, “I was just going to take it down to the mill.”

“Make sure yeh ge’ a guid price f’r it,” Dwalin rumbled.

He leaned down and Ori stretched up and kissed him.

“Sleep well, love,” said Dwalin. “I’ll be back f’r first breakfast.”

“I’ll be here,” Ori promised as he opened his knitting basket.

Dwalin went off. Kili greet him in the kitchen, already chattering as the two went out the stable door, Killer and Forn at their heels.

Ori measured out a length of the green yarn he’d bought recently. It wasn’t the same green as Dwalin’s jumper. Ori had long determined that particular shade of green was Dwalin’s alone. Instead, Bard would get a sleeveless jumper the color of moss. It would not be as detailed as Dwalin’s, but the heavier wool would knit up quicker and bulkier, and give the man another layer of warmth under his coat this winter. If it ran a bit big in the chest and belly, well, loose layers were better for trapping the heat. That’s what Sigrid said anyway.

Really, it was amazing men had survived this long. They suffered the cold so terribly. Dwarrow grew warmer automatically, the colder it got. That was what saved Ori and his brothers in the rooming house. Their room was cheaper than the others, because it was furthest from the kitchen stove.

He hummed to himself, going over his Yule present preparations as he fell into the pattern of knitting.

Sigrid’s miniature was set, wrapped and hidden in her underpinnings drawer in Dale Hall.

Dori’s present… Ori smirked to himself. He had finished it yesterday. It wasn’t an oil painting, but pen and ink with washes of brilliant color. Though Dori would exclaim over anything Ori made, Ori himself was rather proud of the results.

Let’s see, who else, he thought.
The mismatched pair of socks for Dwalin were finished last night. Mahal and Yavanna were getting a big batch of snickerdoodles. Ori had ordered extra cinnamon from the spice merchant for that.

Already Ori had cast on, counting stitches under his breath while his mind sped along. It was so quiet in the house. Winter hush, Dwalin called it.

“Enjoy it, love,” Dwalin had warned him with a laugh. “It don’t often last with th’ Durins.”

Ori never remembered later when his consciousness flew apart from his body. It no longer seemed strange to him that he had been in the living room at Fundin House a moment ago, and now he was at the private training ring where Gimli spent long hours teaching him.

Someone was using the ring right now, a lone figure with a sword, going over the figures every swordsman learned as a badger, and continued to use through mastery and beyond. This was a master, but he was being careless.

As his eye drew closer, Ori saw it was Thorin wielding Orcrist.

The king’s hair was braided back. Sweat soaked his tunic. His face twisted in anger and his movements were vicious. Ori heard Frerin’s name and wasn’t surprised. It had seemed to him that the king took this latest betrayal a little too well. Ori saw that it burned Thorin from the inside out, because he had kept it contained and hidden.

Since Thorin shared an office with Balin now, he wasn’t going to take his rage out on the furniture.

Thorin would never subject Bilbo and the faunts to his temper.

Ori thought Thorin should have gone to Dwalin with this, but, of course, the great, royal numpty was trying to deal with it on his own.

Thorin ended the form, went to the water fountain at the edge of the ring and dowsed his head, and drank his fill.

Then he went right back out and started again.

Ori watched the scene retreat from his eye, but then found himself in Dale, sinking through the ceiling of Dale Hall, through the room where Tilda slept in a bed the size and shape of an elven row boat. Her pink cheeks were barely visible in the mound of silk and snowbear fur. He sensed this was not Bard’s decorating scheme.

Down in the family room, Bard sat on a stool before the fire with his hair bound back and an old rag draped over his shoulders. A bowl of melting ice sat on a table nearby and Sigrid stood over her father with a needle and waxed threat, looking from one of his ears to the other.

“What are ya doing?” Hamfast asked. He sat on the hearth seat and puffed at his pipe. Then he passed it to Bell beside him. “I mean, besides the obvious?”

Bard sighed.

“The kings of our line have both ears pierced. We’ve lost a lot of our culture, but that’s not something that’s been forgotten. I figured I’d better - Ouch!”

“Da! I haven’t done anything yet!”

“I figured I’d better do it now, so it’ll be healed by the early spring.”

“Is that when your coronation’ll be?” Bell asked.

“Yes, supposedly before the ewes lamb.”

“Er, which ewes an’ lambs would these be?” Hamfast asked.

“Ones that went to their Maker a long, long time ago,” said Bard. “I guess to the ancestors, it meant things were going to get really busy, and the people wouldn’t have time for this nonsense.”

“Oh, now, our Bard, it’s not nonsense if it makes people happy,” said Bell.

Bard looked to be struggling.

“She’s right, Da,” said Sigrid. “You owe this to the people.”

Bard glanced Thranduil’s way. Thranduil blatantly ignored him and continued to leaf through the latest issue of Vug.
“Big help you are,” Bard muttered.
“I attempted to assist in the design of your coronation robes, but you got all snippy with me.”
“Pink isn’t my color, or Thorin’s, for that matter.”
Thranduil gave a long-suffering sigh.
“If you won’t work with me, there’s nothing I can do.”
Bard hissed as the needle went through his earlobe, and a few drops of blood dripped onto the cloth around his shoulders.

“There,” said Sigrid. She tied a knot in the loop of the waxed thread. “All we have to do now is keep it clean, and move the thread through it once or twice a day.”

“Thank you, Sig. If I’d had it done as a baby, it would have spared you a lot of trouble. You did talk to Fili about that, didn’t you?”

“Yes, and he’s perfectly fine with it. Pierced ears don’t have a particular meaning for dwarrow, so there’s no chance of cultural collision. I imagine he’s designing earrings for the theoretical badger right now.”

Thranduil said, idly, “I understand you’ve been to speak with Fili about your crown. Wouldn’t take my advice about that, either.”

“Thranduil…”
The king father tossed aside his magazine.
“Really, my love, you can’t tell yet when I’m teasing?”
Bard huffed out a laugh.
“No.”

Then the room faded to black, but blue sparks in the distance drew Ori forward into a long, narrow stone room.

He recognized the implements of the forge, the rolling mills, the tongs, the plans on the table.
But there was no fire.
Instead, the air was thick with anticipation, and on it rode a wave of chanting.
Ori had never been to the mithril workshop. As far as he knew, no one who wasn’t a guild member was allowed in.

Now he saw why.
A fat chunk of mithril sat on a blue stone bench. Fili and Master Minta stood on either side of it, stripped to their skivvies, pouring with sweat, as they stared at the metal. And as the words fell out, the mithril sagged, and melted into a flat sheet.

Without stopping, Minta nodded to Fili, who reached over and folded it in on itself.
The dwarf prince winced in pain, though his hand wasn’t burned, as far as Ori could see, and he never stopped chanting.

The master smiled at him, and shook her head, reached for the reflattened sheet, and folded it over again without so much as a flinch. Fili raised an eyebrow at her, but he grinned, too.

They took turns folding the metal over, and over, and over until it was a tall, narrow stack, and when it was no more than a finger’s width, each dwarf grabbed an end and pulled.

Sparks flew and metal shrieked as they drew further and further apart. Minta grasped a round, thin, steel bar from the table as she passed, and when she reached the wall, the chant had changed in tone. They no longer spoke in unison, but their words chased one another in a circle as she wound the now wire-thin metal around and around the bar.

Fili having reached the other side of the room, dropped his end, and came back wielding a knife with a pearlescent blade. He looked worried, but she merely nodded at him brusquely, and he chanted something new, in a sharp, crying voice, and ran the blade down the length of the coils, which she let dropped to the floor in clattering rings. She continued to wind, and he to cut.

Ori realized, they were making rings for chainmail. Then Ori drew away into the darkness again, and somewhere in the distance, Dori exclaimed angrily, “Why is this pebble’s foot marked with a rune?”

He slid briefly through Dori and Balin’s bed chambers, Dori gestured to the gurgling infant on the changing table.
Balin looked up from rocking the sibling.
“I did it so I kin tell ‘em apar’, beloved.”
“Seriously? You, their father, can’t tell them apart?”
“Me eyes ain’t wha’ they used t’ be, me jewel.”
“So you painted a rune on this one’s foot. A rune that won’t come off!”
“It won’ hur’ them,” said Balin. “An’ it’s no’ permanent. If it was, I’d still be wearin’ it all over me forehead.”
Dori raised a brow.
“Dwalin?” she guessed.
“Aye, though a’ least he was still too young t’ write anythin’ obscene. Yellow an’ purple. I looked like a Durin’s Day decoration.”
Ori slid through the wall on the echo of Dori’s delighted laughter, but instead of the next room, or a closet or a larder, he found himself in another forge, this one very tall and familiar.
The forge of Mahal burned bright and hot. At the anvil, the valar and Durin hammered steel and sparks flew with every blow. Plans for several different projects littered the work table, along with empty ale cups and a half-eaten fried lembas.
The metal went into the fire once more. Durin worked the bellows, the flames swelling and roaring with each gust of air.
“Yeh ever goin’ t’ tell me wha’ this is, Da?” Durin asked over the noise.
“No, I am no’,” said Mahal. “It’s a surprise f’r Yule, which is why I’m finishin’ it by meself.”
Durin turned to Ori and said, “He’s always like this a’ Yule.”
“Hold yer wisht,” said Mahal. “r yer surprise’ll be yeh won’ ge’ one.”
And then, Ori was back in the sitting room with Thorin kneeling before him with a startled expression.
“How may I help you, Scribe of Mahal?” Thorin asked.
Ori blinked.
“What? Why do you ask?”
Thorin grinned wryly.
“When your eyes are on fire, I assume something’s afoot.”
“Oh! Um… I’m sorry, I was just watching Mahal and Durin at the forge.” Ori blinked several times. He had no idea if this changed anything, but short of dowsing them with water, he didn’t think anything else would. “Better?”
“Yes,” said Thorin. He held Ori by the nape and drew their foreheads together. “Back to those beautiful brown eyes.”
Ori blushed as Thorin pulled back.
“What’s this?” Thorin asked, gesturing to the work in Ori’s hands.
Ori groaned, fearing that he would have to start Bard’s jumper anew, but when he held it up, he realized it was finished. Since it would have taken more than one evening without miscellaneous mental side-trips, Ori suspected he’d had help.
“Oh, it’s for Bard for Yule, but I only started it tonight, and I think I owe Yavanna cookies.”
“At least,” Thorin agreed.
Ori put aside the jumper.
“Thorin, are you alright?”
The king’s eyebrows shot up.
“Yes, of course, why wouldn’t I be?”
“You weren’t fine out in the training circle tonight. I was afraid you were going to cut your own head off.”
“When were you at… Oh. You have been busy.”
Ori slid his hands onto Thorin’s shoulders. Even warm from the bath, they sat like rock. Ori rubbed them, feeling ineffectual.
“You poor thing.”
Thorin chuckled.
“Not something one usually hears in connection with a king.”
“I’m not talking to a king. I’m talking to Thorin Oakenshield, my husband’s shield brother and my dear friend.”

Thorin drew him down from the couch and held him. Or, they held each other. Thorin rested his forehead on Ori’s shoulder, which thanks to all that axe training, could easily accommodate him. Thorin raised his head with a sigh, and Ori kissed him.

It startled them both for a moment, Ori could tell. He hadn’t intended to do it, and Thorin obviously hadn’t expected it.

But then they were kissing again, harder, and Ori’s arms slid around Thorin and Thorin’s breath hitched as he pulled Ori against him in a delirium of kisses.

When Ori found himself on the rug, it occurred to him they were still in the middle of the sitting room.

Dori had become more accepting of Ori’s independence, but Ori didn’t want Dori to find him with his trousers around his ankles, either.

“Bedroom?” he gasped.

“Bedroom,” Thorin agreed. He turned and made a cawing noise.
Roäc stuck his head out of the raven bolt hole by the fireplace.

“How’d you even know I was here?” the raven groused.

“I could hear you laughing at us. Will you please tell Bilbo-“

“That you’re safe and sound and haven’t abandoned him?”

“Tell him I’m with Ori. That’s enough. No editing my words to your own satisfaction.”

“Spoil my fun.”
Roäc disappeared.

Ori looked at Thorin. Thorin looked at Ori.

Ori had just enough presence of mind to tuck his knitting back in its basket before he grabbed Thorin’s hand and they ran, holding in snorts and laughter.

The bedroom door closed and locked behind them. The bed was covered in animals.

“Oh, mahumb,” Ori growled.

Nori-Pori yawned and flicked an ear. Mask stretched to cover more of the bed than was physically possible. Brandy grunted at him smugly, and Assault and Battery chittered in their sleep. Apparently, Ori’s cats were having a slumber party.

“Hearthrug?” Thorin suggested.

They tumbled onto it, kissing once more.

Ori made sure he landed on top.

“Oof!” Thorin gasped out in surprise. “You’ve grown into quite the armful.”

“Have I? All I know is that Dipfa is going to murder me if I go through the shoulders of one more tunic.”

Thorin laughed.

“Zindis is going to murder me if she has to let out my trousers one more time.”

They grinned at one another, and then the room suffered a blizzard of clothing as they appreciated what time, training and good food had done to their bodies.

“You are gorgeous,” Thorin said as ran his hands down Ori’s arms and across his broad chest.

No longer waif-like, Ori was closer to Dori now in shape. Dwalin often told Ori that he was beautiful this way, but to hear Thorin say it for the first time made his innards flip.

“You’re the gorgeous one,” said Ori, as he ran his face and hands through Thorin’s chest fur.

No longer rawboned, the king had expanded into a miniature of the mountain he ruled, round, strong and hard as the rock on which he stood.

Ori reached in for the nipple held in the raven’s beak and flicked out his tongue to taste and tease. Thorin pulled Ori’s hair aside to watch as Ori’s lips closed around the ring and tugged, then took the whole nipple in his mouth and flooded it, and sucked just hard enough.

“Love your mouth,” Thorin murmured.

Ori trailed his lips up over Thorin’s collar bone, sucked at the sensitive skin beneath his beard and then nuzzled the side of Thorin’s neck before he moved on to trace the tip of his tongue over the edge of Thorin’s ear.

Thorin shuddered beneath him, so Ori did it to the other ear as well.

“You smell edible,” Ori said

Dwalin wasn’t only one who had changed his hair oil. Thorin smelled cinnamon spicy, citrusy and... like coffee cake.

“Thank you, Bilbo thinks so, too.”

“His idea?”

“Mine. Molten steel was a bit austere for him, I could tell. He finds this more appealing.”

“Jumps on you the minute you close the bedroom door?”

“And has me for dessert.”

They kissed again, harder. Ori felt Thorin’s hands slide down to cup his arse. It was giving Ori’s body ideas, several of which he wanted to develop, but right now he had a plan for Thorin, and he voiced it before his traitorous brain could get a thought in edgewise. He nuzzled Thorin’s neck and said, “You know, I’m going suck your royal cock until you scream.”

Thorin pulled back and stared at him.

“That’s not a quote from Queen Kivi.”

“I was, you know, paraphrasing, but I’m still going to do it, with your permission, of course.”

“Kiss me a little more first,” said Thorin. “Your beard is lovely.”

“I’m glad you like it, because I’m going to rub it all over you.”

Where was this coming from? Ori had no idea. Firmly, he slowed down, and glided his mouth and his beard down Thorin’s body.

Thorin leaned up on his elbows, watching.

“You know,” said Ori, “it would be a lot easier to tease you this way if you ever wore your drawers.”

“I apologize,” said Thorin primly.

“Mmhmm.”

Thorin’s cock was narrower than Dwalin’s, but that had its merits, too. The plump head fit nicely into Ori’s mouth, and that, Bilbo had told him, was chiefly what Thorin liked toyed with.

“If you can keep a nice, tight hand around the shaft,” Bilbo said casually over scones one afternoon, “another kneading his stones, and your mouth working the head, that will eventually, happily make him lose his mind.”

It did take time, and care, but Ori had endless amounts of both. The longer he applied himself, the fatter the head grew, and the king of Erebor lay flat on the furs, writhing, and soon panting. Sometimes Ori licked it, imagining it like an iklar, so that he had to stifle giggles. Then the shaft shuddered and pulsed in his hand and it was brought home quite clearly that this was a cock, the king’s cock, and it was in Ori’s mouth.

Ori rubbed himself against the fur rug, holding in little cries of his own as he grew harder and hotter by degrees.

He felt the fur tug beneath him, and saw that Thorin had it in double fistfuls, pulling against the inevitable. Thorin’s mouth gaped open as he gasped for breath, lost to the world. He snapped up to this elbows again as he muscles seized and Ori held his eye as he let Thorin’s cum bathe his lips and beard.

Thorin’s eyes flew comically wide, and he groaned and fell back hard, shuddering.

“You are going to kill me, Ori, and I am going to die a happy dwarf.”

Abruptly he sat up, seized Ori and pulled him down into the furs, tickling and nipping at him until Ori shrieked with laughter, struggled hopelessly and almost couldn’t breath. They kissed again, licking each other’s lips. Ori found himself in Thorin’s lap, his arm around Thorin’s neck as Thorin pumped his cock in a hard fist and Ori came, twisting, moaning in his grip.

Panting and sweating, they eased down into the furs. Thorin lay face up, and Ori curled into him with his back to the fire.

They dozed off and on, and kissed, and dozed some more.
Finally Ori eased away to pour out a glass of water for each of them.

“Don’t worry” said Ori, “I didn’t put my dick in it.”
Thorin saluted him with his cup.

“Please tell me that made you feel a little better,” said Ori.
Thorin tilted his head and put on a vacant look.

“About what?”
Ori poked him in the belly.

“You are a very dangerous dwarf,” Thorin acknowledged. “I do feel better, a part of me feels a lot better.”

“Seriously. Why are you still dragging yourself and everyone else through this? I mean, I’m not eager for blood, but Frerin’s putting people in danger.”

Thorin sighed.

“Yes, Nori and I had a long talk about Frerin. The short answer is, he’s still useful.”

“Because you can weed out the troublemakers through him.”

“Yes. Beyond that, there’s the welfare of his One and his pebble to consider. T’dillah may enjoy the fruits of all Frerin’s plotting, but I believe that’s the limit of her involvement. I could be wrong. She could be the greatest actress in Arda, and the mastermind behind this whole plot.”

Ori raised an eyebrow and Thorin chuckled.

“I said I could be wrong, but I don’t think I am.”

“She is more than a little unbelievable,” said Ori.

“As a younger dwarf, I thought no one could really be that pudding-headed. Lesson learned.”
Then they settled down again, Ori curled up with his head on Thorin’s chest. The heartbeat actually startled him. He never thought about anyone else’s besides Dwalin’s and his own.

Idly, Ori traced the edge of the raven tattoo through Thorin’s chest fur.

“I love you, Ori.”

“I love you, too, Thorin.”

Ori woke to the sound of familiar laughter. He cracked open an eye at Dwalin, standing over them in the fire light.

“Thorin, me lad, it’s past dawn, an’ yeh got to wash, eat an’ be ready t’ discuss the annual guild grants in half an hour.”

“Oh, Mahumb,” Thorin swore.

Killer licked the king’s face with gusto as Thorin hastily gathered up his scattered clothing, kissed Ori, and ran to throw open to bedroom door… to find it was still dark in the hallway.

Dwalin laughed, Ori giggled in surprise, and Thorin turned to Dwalin with a smirk.

“Arsehole.”
Boxes, Books, and Benedictions

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Winter is here, it’s cold outside, Yule’s coming and our Ori is learning lots! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

As Yule approached, there was much merriment, and visiting, and great quantities of food. It has been many years since Erebor had seen a Yule so cheerful, or Dale had seen one so bountiful.

The royal houses of Durin and Bowman met at Dale Hall for a pre-Yule party, to flesh out Thranduil’s plans for the day of days, and to wait for something else long-anticipated.

Bard stood at the blazing hearth, mead cup in hand, and sang:

“Winter is coming
The geese are getting fat
Time to put a fish
In the old goat’s hat.”

Thorin stared at Bard.
“Did you just make that up?”
“Of course not! It’s the winter rhyme. You don’t recognize it?”
“No,” said Thorin. “The imagery is bizarre.”
“The point is, the old goat won’t go hungry,” said Bard.
“Not today, at least,” Thorin replied. “Would it not be more effective to teach the old goat to fish?”
“Get a grip, Thorin. It’s a nursery rhyme.”
“And I already know how to fish,” said Tharkûn.

He appeared abruptly on Bard’s other side, already supplied with drink, and blowing shapes of swimming fish and frolicking goats with his pipe smoke. For good measure, he also made a ‘hat’.

The antechamber door opened and Arne and Faramir entered, pink-cheeked from the cold, and each carried a large box.

“They’re ready!” Arne announced.

Everyone gathered around them as they placed the boxes on a side table.
Omi and Loli jumped up and down like excited badgers, and Ori and Bilbo exchanged grins.
Arne pulled the top off the first box, then turned to the hobbit.

“Bilbo? Would you do the honors?”
The consort beamed.
“I don’t mind if I do.”

He reached in and pulled out a book bound in deep blue leather, smiled down at it a moment, then turned and handed it to Thorin.

“I think it’s only right that you should have the first copy, my dear.”

“The Infernal Adventures at last,” said Thorin. He leaned in and kissed Bilbo, then opened the book to the beautiful end papers. The frontispiece showed Durin, in mithril armor, hefting his axe as though to smote his enemies. “Arne,” said Thorin, “this is amazing.”

The prince ducked his head.
“I-I wasn’t sure, idad.”
“Then I think you were very silly to doubt yourself,” Thorin chided gently, and with a warm smile.

Ori had provided spot pen and ink illustrations, but the full page illustrations were all Arne’s.
The title page listed Bilbo as the translator, Ori as the editor, and all the names of all the dwarrow who had provided the designs and illustrations therein.

Ori knew when Thorin reached the dedication page, because first the king swallowed, then he laughed.

For King Thorin II, Oakenshield, who strives to follow in Durin’s footsteps.

and

For Lord Elrond of Imladris, who made this translation possible.

“I love it! I’m sure Elrond will, too.” He turned to Faramir. “They’ll be distributed as we discussed?”
“Yes, every school inside and outside the mountain will get their copies, courtesy of the crown.”
“And the library’s copies?” Thorin asked.

Ori snickered.

“Master Brur is pouting, because Sadi told him he had to wait until you had yours.”

Faramir shook his head. “For someone who’s only four feet tall, he did an amazing job of breathing down my neck at the press. Finally, the boss had to call Master Jansad to drag him away by the ear, so we could print in peace. I’m still in awe of that full-color press. The quality is amazing.”

“And the paper copies?” Thorin asked.

“They go on sale tomorrow, and we already have enough orders for a second printing.”

The door opened again and Eowyn rushed in, breathless, with Haldir not far behind, and not out of breath at all.

Ori imagined elves would find it vulgar to pant. Except, perhaps in the throes of passion. He wondered what it was like to have sex with an elf. He made a list in his head of people who might know, and of these, which would be most likely to gossip about it.

Hmmmmm. Wandi…

“Sorry we’re late, boss,” said Eowyn to Dwalin.

Dwalin chuckled.

“This ain’t a military parade, our Wynny, it’s strictly f’r fun.”

“So, what your saying is, Glorfy’s not here yet, either.”

“A’ course no’. Git yerselves some grub.”

Haldir raised a brow.

“Did you leave any for us?”

“A few crumbs. Have a lembas if yer peckish.”

“Only if it’s fried and filled with blueberry preserves,” said Haldir.

Sigrid heard this as she exited the kitchen with Milgr, each carrying a tray, which they put down on the long table in the middle of the room.

“Funny you should mention that,” she said.

She gestured to the food on her tray.

Haldir’s eyes about rolled out of his skull, to everyone’s delight.

“How in Eru’s name did you do that?” he demanded.

Milgr snickered, and turned back to the kitchen door.

“Oh, yer highness! Yer biggest fan’s here.”

Kili stuck his head around the kitchen door and winked at Haldir.

“I posted Tauri as a lookout in the bell tower. She signaled me you were coming. Happy Yule, even if it is a little early.”

“Wh-I… Thank you!”
Tauriel descended the stairs into the room and laughed at Haldir.
“Kili, mel nin! It worked!”
“We’re geniuses,” Kili replied with a shrug.
Dis topped off her cup and said to Bard, “You’re ready for tomorrow night?”
Bard chuckled.
“As long as you don’t expect us all to wear matching pajamas, I’ll be happy to spend Yule Eve with the Durins.”
“Vi and Margr and Glorfindel will be there as well. I hope you don’t mind, but I’ve asked Milgr if she’d like to join us.”
“Of course I don’t mind. I can’t expect her to sit here with Bob while everyone else is out having fun. Unlike Bob, who thinks it’s the most fun when we’re quiet and somewhere else so he can sleep.”
“And are you sure you’re ready for Yule itself?”
Bard laughed ruefully.
“You mean, am I ready for my daughter to get married? No, I don’t think I’ll ever be. What about you?”
“I am more than happy to have another daughter,” said Dis. “I have been outnumbered by Durin males for far too long.”
Dis said this so blithely, but Ori had seen how much work Dis, Dori and Thranduil put in to planning just a simple ceremony. They seemed to thrive on it. No wonder Dori wanted people to ask his permission. It gave him time to map things out like an invasion plan.

The next morning, Ori and Dwalin rode into Dale with Gnasher and Grinder pulling a cart. It was snowing, and fat flakes fell on the heavy tarp that hid all kinds of Yule surprises for the following day. They saw Sigrid walking toward Dale Hall with a basket over her arm and gave her a ride the rest of the way home.
Dwalin pulled the cart around the back of the house, hidden from the street, and they began to carry in what seemed like the contents of a jumble sale.
“Sigrid!” Bard called excitedly from the great room.
“Da, what’s happened?”
Bard stood at the table with the book of his ancestors open in front of him.
“I think I found it, or more of it than I thought there was!”
“To what?” Sigrid asked, taking off her hat.
“To the song. Remember, my grandmother’s song about the yellow stars leading the way?”
“Really?” Sigrid enthused.
“Yes, and since I can now translate some of the old book, I know what Grandmother meant when she said, we only sang it when the sun returned!”
“Because it’s about the return of the sun,” Sigrid surmised.
“Yes! Now if I could only remember the way the words sounded originally. I may have them on a printed page, but I can’t pronounce them. Westron may be my only hope. Ori, would you please take a look at it?”
“Of course, Bard. This is important. Besides, it’s about a book. It’s not like you could stop me.”
Once again, Bard brought forth the book of his ancestors. It was always disorienting for dwarf at first, reading lines from left to right, and not the usual way. Unlike the runes, which even singly conveyed entire ideas, westron words were spelled out in symbols that represented sounds, and the sound together made the word that had to be read in context with other words to form ideas. Ori though this was rather taking the long way around.
“Where is it?” Ori asked.
“In the section with the sun people.”
These were brilliantly-colored, androgynous figures, their heads stylized as suns with almond-shaped eyes and neat, small rows of dots down their cheeks, like tears. They danced in pairs around the borders of facing pages, and the text was laid out as though in verse. As it turned out, they were verse.

On a scrap of paper, Bard had written out the words he could translate. It didn’t hurt that many of the lines began with the same word.

“Is it a song, or a prayer?” Ori asked.
“Tt think it’s both,” said Bard.
“A chant?”
“That makes sense. To me it always sounded like people walking slowly in step.”
“Do you remember the tune?”
“Some of it.”
Bard crooned, Da dadada Da Da Da. Da dadada Da Da Da.
Ori thought about this a moment.
“We might never get it translated perfectly, but we could have enough clues to convey the meaning. I’m going to copy it out and show it to Bilbo. He’s spent a lot of time studying that badger’s copy book.”
He took down Bard’s notes, too.
“Do you think he might have time to look at it after Yule?” Bard asked. “I know the dwarrow don’t slow down in deep winter like men.”
“For this, I think he’ll make time,” said Ori.

Not that he had any intention of waiting until after Yule to find out.
“What do you think?” Ori asked.
“It’s a benediction,” said Bilbo.
They sat at a table in Bilbo’s library, paper scattered across the surface, much written over, with lots of crossouts and notations.
“This combination of symbols?” Bilbo tapped his finger on the page. “I think it’s a word that means 'bless’.”
“Blessings for the new year?”
“Something like that. On one hand, it warns you to be humble, on the other hand, it says, be resolute and you will find fortune. It’s rather melancholy, in a way.”
“What’s puzzling you?” Ori asked with a smile.
“How can you tell I’m puzzled?”
“Your nose keeps twitching.”
Bilbo laughed.
“I’m rubbish at keeping that a secret, apparently. I can’t help thinking I’ve read this somewhere before, and not in westron.”
“Maybe in Elrond’s library?”
“No, though I do need to take you to Rivendell some day and let you run wild in his library.
You’d love it. Where… Oh.”
“Oh?”
“Oh!”
Bilbo dragged a step ladder to a far corner of the bookshelf and started to root around in a familiar selection of books which were hand-lettered along their spines. He selected three and brought them back to the table.
These were Belladonna’s travel diaries.
Ori found her handwriting difficult to read, not because it was messy, or blotted, but because it zigged and zagged like lightning, with very little in the way or loops or serifs. Ori thought it the spare, economical style of a person who doesn’t have time to waste, or at least who doesn’t waste time.

Bilbo paged quickly through the first, then about halfway through the second, he seemed to find what he was looking for.

“Bless day and night
Bless the sun.”
Follow yellow stars.
Do not stray.

“What is that?” Ori asked.

“Loosely translated, it’s a fragment of an easterling blessing song.”

“An easterling song? Then, how did it get into Bard’s book?”

“We could guess that the person who made Bard’s book simply heard the song someplace and liked it. Or, we could go with the suspicion that Bard’s people were once related, at least in part, to the easterlings.”

“Really?”

“It’s just a theory, but, look at the faces of the dancing figures. Don’t the marks remind you of something?”

“They’re like the scarifications on Deneb’s face!”

“Yes, and the same sort of motif shows up in the architecture of some of the buildings in Bard’s book. It’s not everywhere, and the people in Bard’s illustrations don’t look like that, but it could be that long before they lived in that city, Bard’s people and Deneb’s people at the very least worshipped the same gods.”

“They may have worshipped the sun,” Ori supposed.

“They seem to be quite diverse, actually. This word means ‘night’, and this means ‘rain’.”

“Bard is in for quite a shock,” said Ori.

“I think he’ll be more surprised than shocked. I don’t think he’ll mind, at any rate. You said he had a tune for this song?”

“Yes.” Ori crooned it for him as best he could recall. “Bard said it always reminded him of people walking slowly in step.”

“Oh, I like that,” said Bilbo. “Yes, we can definitely work with that.”

Bilbo hummed the tune to himself, and paced back and forth in the library. After a few minutes, Bilbo sang,

“Bless the daytime, bless the night
Bless the sun which gives us light.”

“Bilbo!” Ori cried. “That’s fantastic!”

Bilbo chuckled and gave a bow with a flourish.

“Thank you, you’re too kind. I doubt the rest will be quite as easy. I think I need to talk to Rigel-chuh and Ara-chuh, and especially Deneb-tsari.”

“Deneb-tsari?”

“It means The Learned Deneb. Apparently, she was once a scholar.”

Ori sat up straight.

“No! Bilbo! Have you been keeping secrets?”

Bilbo chuckled.

“I only found out last night, Ori-mate. Before her family broke with Morgoth, she was tutor to the princesses of her tribe, a position akin to Balin’s, but Ara-chuh says it pains Deneb to remember that. This is the first time Deneb has even spoken of it since they started west.”

Ori nodded.

“I won’t say anything unless she brings it up.”

“You’re very good. We’ve been working terribly hard. I think, if we pause here, we might just be in time for elevenses.”

The room shook, the shelves shook, a terrifying roar echoed through the halls, along with high-pitched shrieks and rolls of thunder.

“Ah,” said Bilbo. “Dain is early.”
Preparations, A Party, and Pressies.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yule is here. Time for a party! How very unusual! There are hardly any parties in this tale!! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori and Bilbo hurried out the door of Bag End East, over the sleigh blocking the passage into the sitting room, to find not only Dain and his family, but also the royals from Dale and those of the ravens and bonebreakers.

“Da!” Baluchistan cawed. He flew up and smacked into Dain, claws tangled in his tunic. “Da! They hatched! Yer an udad!”

“Wha’? Queenie’s eggs?”

“They’re mine, Da!”

“Yers? I don’ wan’ t’ know how ‘r where, bu’ I’m so fuckin’ proud a’ yeh! Wait’ll yer mam hears!”

“Hears abou’ wha’, yeh big puddin’?” Sculdis asked, turning from exchanging hugs with Dis. “Queenie’s eggs’re our Blu’s! Yer an umad!”

“Oh, Mahal wept,” said Sculdis and Dis laughed.

“Me beautiful toasted cashew!” Blu hollered and fluttered to Red Queen who was strutting about. She wore her egg bag, but it was now open so the nestlings could look about them. Red Queen paraded over.

“Brother King Dain and dear sister Queen Sculdis. As you see, we have had a great use for this charming bag you so kindly sent us. Allow us to present our hatchlings; The Scarlet Princess, Cawnickcawnack and our interesting-

“Pork!” Baluchistan announced proudly. He fluffed his feathers and leaned in to whisper like a trumpet in Dain’s ear. “I got t’ name tha’ one!”

“Capital, capital!” Dain thundered. “Let’s have seat an’-

Mistress Dazla appeared out of the kitchen with her pack of minions. She looked at the luggage trail Dain and Sculdis had left from the hallway to Bag End East, through the open door and into the sitting room. She raised a brow at Dain.

Chopper, released from harness, hid behind Sculdis.

“I didn’t bring me sleigh int’ th’ room, mistress!” Dain cried in self-defense.

“Thank Mahal for small favors,” said Dazla dryly.

Agrib, Gimli, and Bard helped gather the acres of baggage. and she escorted the Iron Hills couple out to the receiving room and up the stair to their rooms. Ori wondered how long his eldest brother would stay and hoped it was for a while. He also wondered how they would get the sleigh out of the hallway. Probably the same as last time, they’d take it apart.

He looked around for Stonehelm and found him, as Bilbo would say, having a quiet word with Bain.

“I’ll bloody kill yeh if yeh do somethin’ li’e that again!” Stonehelm all but lifted Bain off his feet in a hug. “Goin’ after orcs all untrained like a kitten lickin’ a rabid goat!”

“That was ages ago, Stone, I’ve been good since then!” Bain laughed as he bent to hug the dwarf around the head.

“Good, eh? I’ll jus’ bet.”
They drew apart and looked each other over.
“Bugger, yer growin’,” “You’re bigger, too. Wider.”
“Bin trainin’.”
“And you sound a lot more like your da.”
“Trainin’ an’ yellin’ at soldiers. Probably star’ talkin’ more elegantly, hangin’ abou’ with yeh, me youthful prince.”

Bain snorted then grinned at Stonehelm.
“Hungry?”
“If he was roasted up, I’d eat me boar brother.”

The two made their way to the kitchen. Ori heard Miss Oqizla scold, then male laughter, then shouts of ‘Oi!’, and the two came back through, each holding an ear with one hand, and a cookie with the other.

This was followed by cries of welcome for the King of the Greenwood, and the Lórien and Imladris folk with a ‘pop’, bearing gifts and bottles of mead. Celeborn and Thranduil greeted each other warmly in the spirit of the season, and Kelli fawned over Pork and clicked and clucked at him.

Lady Galadriel looked about her, then turned to Bilbo.
“Deneb and her family aren’t here?”
“They’re in prayer tonight,” said Bilbo, “but they will be joining us tomorrow. I have several questions I need to ask her.”
“You do not ask me?”
“I would if it were a yes-or-no questions,” teased Bilbo.

He was saved from her reply by the arrival of Dori and Balin from their quarters with the pebbles.
Ori looked to Dwalin, who was good at looking for strays.
“Are we all here yet?”
“Still waitin’ f’r Bell an’ Hamfast an’ their lot. Hope they get here soon, th’ smell a’ food’s abou’ done me in.”

It had finally happened that they had outgrown the breakfast parlor when the entire herd arrived for a sit down meal.

The sleigh was dismantled piece by piece and put in storage, and all the doors between Fundin House and Bag End East were thrown open to the great room of Bag End. A short passage between the Fundin kitchen’s and Bilbo’s kitchen had been quickly installed at the end of autumn and both kitchens were employed to prepare the Yule Eve feast. Tables were brought in, and chairs, and sofa. Cushions covered most of the rest of the open floor.

They shared a sumptuous dinner of roasted duck stuffed with plums and flavored with cinnamon, orange oil, curry powder, and brandy, cooked while heaped with small potatoes, onions, asparagus, and sunroots. Hamfast had brought mature asparagus plants from the Shire and kept them growing in one of his greenhouses. This was followed by a dozen marvelous peach preserve upside down cakes.

Everyone settled in the sitting room in Bag End East. Ori sat on the rug next to the fire, Dwalin stretched out next to him, his head in Ori’s lap. Killer and the cats gathered around them. Red Queen took pride of place in the middle of the rug and the nestlings were let out to look around.
Frodo, Sam and Tilda were fascinated by Pork, who despite being a little clumsy was very curious about his surroundings and the three kids, Posie, and Kelli supervised him as he explored the room.
Scarlet Princess preened as her udad and umad petted and cooed over her and Cawnickcawnack practiced fluffing his down with his adad and idad Roäc.

The wargs snoozed in a heap off to the side. Dazla and Elrond chattered nineteen to the dozen with Lindir and Cemnesta. Dori was ensconced in her inflatable chair, gossiping with Vi and Margr while Dori gently rocked the ‘traveling’ cradle with her foot.
“Our Rogi’s quite given up his criminal ways now,” said Margr.
“Aye, he’s reformed f’r th’ love a’ Miss Sifian,” said Vi. “Perhaps some day he’ll get t’ hold her
“She’s very proper, is Miss Sifian,” said Margr, “though she’s polite enough when she comes f’r tea, yeh kin tell she’s not used t’ dwarfy manners. Goes a bit grey abou’ th’ mouth when our Glorfy takes us on his knee.”

“Should I invite her to my next tea party?” Dori asked. “Or do you think it would be too much for her?”

“Go on,” said Vi. “We’ll have her broken in proper by then.”

Yes, Ori thought, provided the ceiling doesn’t fall in, or King Father Thranduil isn’t there pretending his iklar is his husband’s penis. Perhaps Balin should attend, to distract her with conversation about the education of the young.

Bilbo served mulled cider and curled next to Thorin on the sofa.

“Really, my dear, it will be a trial never to celebrate your birthday on your birthday. Oh, well, I’ll just have to make you a cake on each day and one for every day in between.”

Kili nodded

“And we’ll help you eat them, idad.”

“How self-sacrificing you are sister-son.”

“It’s true,” Kili agreed.

Bard looked up from the card game he was losing to Fili.

“Is this a dwarf thing? Or something I should pay attention to as well?”

“It’s a dwarf king thing,” said Thorin with a smile. “The king’s birthday is quite a big day, an extra rest day for those who want it. It’s not really about the king, but about service to his people. At his discretion, prisoners might be pardoned, debts paid, a new public space beautified and dedicated.”

“So, pie for everybody,” Bard surmised.

“A choice of several, actual,” said Thorin. “Not everyone likes the same thing.”

“Still,” said Bilbo, cuddling closer, “It’s nice that this first one that you’re king actually falls on the proper date.”

“Moves around, does it?” Bard asked.

Thorin prompted his other sister son,

“Fili, would you like to elaborate, or will you continue to annihilate your father-in-law without mercy?”

“I can do both,” said Fili, frowning at his cards. “The king’s public birthday is always the day after the last normal rest day of the year. Idad was actually born on a Mid-Winter’s Day, you would say Yule. This year, the days coincide.”

“But, Mid-Winter Day’s not always on the same calendar day either,” said Bard.

“Doesn’t matter,” said Thorin. “If a dwarf or dam were born on Mid-Winter Day, or on Mid-Summer Day, that is always their birthday, no matter what the calendar says.”

“I wouldn’t think the movements of the sun and stars would matter to dwarrow one way or another.”

“The sun is important,” said Fili, “because, at least symbolically, it’s Mahal’s Forge. Twice a year we rededicate our forges to Mahal, the shortest day and the longest. Thrones, Dominions,” he announced, and spread his cards on the table.

Bard sighed.

“And with that, I am finished,” said Bard. “You’ll have to find someone else to demolish.”

“Oh, I’m a lousy card player, said Fili. “You’re the only one I ever beat.”

Dwalin chuckled and said the Ori, “Yeh comin’ along? Time t’ pu’ th’ crew through its paces.”

“This I have to see,” said Ori. Though, truthfully, he would have preferred to sit here with Dwalin’s head in his lap for the rest of the night. Tomorrow would be too busy for them to get any time alone.

He followed Dwalin into one of the extra rooms, traile by Eowyn, Faramir, Haldir and a few others.

Thranduil arrived a moment later with a thick sheaf of paper.
“Captain? Are we prepared?” Thranduil asked.
“We’re ‘bout set,” said Dwalin. “Jus’ makin’ sure they’re tuned up. Let’s hear the growl, our Diry.”
Haldir cleared his throat, and gave a squeak a little louder than that of a mouse.
Dwalin blinked.
“Aye, tha’s terrifyin’. I jus’ peed me britches.”
“I’m getting warmed up,” said Haldir with dignity. “Such things do not come naturally to an elf.”
Thranduil snorted, but kept his eyes on his pages.
“A’righ’,” said Dwalin, “try again.”
This continued for some time, though Haldir never seemed to be able to do worse than belch.
Even Arne delivered a perfectly respectable growl.
Finally, Dwalin sighed.
“No worries, our Diry. We’ll just pretend yer a mute.” He turned to Eowyn. “Yeh wan’ t’ show im how it’s done, our Wynny?”
Eowyn gave a growl to put a warg to shame. Haldir looked embarrassed, Dwalin satisfied, and Faramir impressed.
“Did you practice that?” he asked her.
She waved a negligent hand.
“It’s a gift.”

Back in the big room, the kids were caught between overexcitement and exhaustion. Dori’s pebbles fussed to be fed, and Bain and Stonehelm leaned against each other in the corner and loudly snored.
“Bed?” Ori asked Dwalin.
“Aye, best get there now. As I recall, Yule mornin’ with th’ Durin’s starts in abou’, oh, four hours. ‘Course, tha’ was when th’ princes were badgers. With their Ones aroun’, they may no’ be so keen t’ face th’ day.”
“While the faunts and Tilda will be out of bed and excited at the arse-crack of dawn.”
Dwalin put his arm around Ori’s shoulders as they walked back up the hallway to Fundin House. Ori put an arm around Dwalin’s waist and leaned into him.
“I wasn’t any different,” said Ori. “Even when we had nothing, Dori always had a piece of candy and a new scarf or mitts for me.”
“We were spoiled rotten at Yule, even by Fundin,” said Dwalin. “Me folks gave us any sweets we wanted, an’ took us down t’ play in th’ family treasure trove and decorate th’ forge. I’d f’rgotten abou’ tha’, ’til jus’ now. An’ it were never abou’ greed, we didn’t want t’ keep any of it, bu’ it were all pretty t’ look at, all glittery in th’ torchlightl. Bu’ all tha’ beauty, tha’ were nothin’ compared t’ yeh.”
Ori blinked at the stinging in his eyes. He stopped and when Dwalin stopped, Ori turned and buried his face in Dwalin’s beard. Dwalin stroked his hair and kissed the top of his head.
“Love you so much,” Ori said, though talking into the beard, with his voice rough, he was afraid it sounded like ‘Muffins, glue and such’.
Dwalin lifted Ori’s chin and kissed him.
“Oops!” Nori walked out of the kitchen, saw them and turned back around, right through the door. Over his shoulder he tossed, “Sorry.”
“His timin’s lousy, as usual,” said Dwalin. Abruptly, he picked up Ori, and tossed him over his shoulder, squeaking and giggling.
“G’night, Nori!” Ori called.
“Night, Chick.”

It was a little later than dawn by the time everyone assembled back at Bag End East, where a first breakfast of hot coffee or xocolātl with cinnamon, sweet pastries glazed in honey, and hot blueberry and cloudberry dipping sauces awaited.
“Simple and to the point,” said Bilbo. “We’ll have something more substantial once all the presents are opened. For, I doubt we’ll have a moment’s peace until then.”

Everyone wished Thorin a happy birthday, and gave him presents, and he gave presents to all the hobbits as well.

To Bell he gave a paperboard box wrapped with a pretty pink bow.
“What’s this?” she asked as she untied the ribbon. She lifted away the top of the box to an intoxicating cloud of xocolātl. “Fudge with dried bramble berries and walnuts! Thorin! Where in Yavanna’s name did you find this?”
“I made it,” said Thorin. “Though, Frodo thinks teaching me to make muffins was quite simple in comparison.”
“This is wonderful! Happy Birthday. Ham, if you put your fingers in this without me permission, I’ll cut them off.”
“Yes, my dear,” said Hamfast, pouting outrageously.
“Never fear, Hamfast” said Thorin, “I’m looking after you as well.”
Hamfast’s eyes lit up when Thorin handed him a box similar to Bell’s. Hamfast thanked Thorin heartily and opened it. The scent of cardamon and pistachios issued forth.
“Well, bless me!” Hamfast gasped. “If it don’t beat all. Thorin, I ain’t even going to ask you how you made green fudge.”
“Best not to,” Thorin advised with an amused look at Bilbo, who wrinkled his nose in reply.
“Let’s see your hands!” Dis and Kili cried together.
Thorin held out his hands and waggled his fingers making Frodo and Sam giggle.
“Aw!” Kili cried, obviously disappointed. “He washed them!”
“You should have seen the bowl!” Frodo crowed, making everyone laugh.
Dori went through to Fundin kitchen and returned with a small silver salver. On it perched a little cup and saucer, with a thread of steam rising from it. Dori brought it to Bard and placed it in front of him.
“Happy Yule, Bard, dear. It fits all the requirements,” said Dori. “It’s handmade, not of precious stones or metals, and I made it myself.”
“This is-” Bard fell silent. His face displayed one emotion after another: surprise, happiness and sorrow. “Dori, this isn’t…”
“Da?” Sigrid asked. “Are you all right?”
“This is-” He took a deep, shuddering breath and pulled his shoulders back. “Sigrid, you remember I told you about Girion’s mother.”
“Her parents came from the northeast later than the rest of our people.”
“Yes, they wandered longer than most, and they brought what they could carry. What was the one thing her mother would never leave behind or sell?”
“The toolkuh! The brewing vessel, for the spiced coffee. Is this that coffee?”
“Yes, this is what it looks like, what it smells like.” He closed his hands around the cup on the table. Then he raised the cup to his lips and sipped.
Dori, who had been hanging back, waiting to see if he had succeeded, finally reached the limit of suspense.
“And?” he prompted.
Bard beamed up at him.
“And it’s perfect, Dori.”
Dori darted forward and hugged him. Bard carefully released the mug and hugged back.
“I’m almost afraid to ask how you did it.”
“My dear,” said Dori, “the Easterlings still use them. True, I didn’t make the toolkuh itself, and Deneb looked at me strangely when I told her what spices I wanted to put in it, but I don’t follow silly rules that get in my way, and the current Easterling recipe sounds rather more bitter than spicy.”
“They have a toolkuh,” said Bard.
“Yes, and now you have one, too.”
Mistress Dazla entered with the freshly cleaned item, a small metal vessel on the end of a short wooden handle, the metal bowl chased with images of the sun.

“Da?” Sigrid asked. She touched his shoulder, which brought him back from his bewilderment.

“Have a sip, Sig,” Bard encouraged. “You, and Bain and Tilda should all try it.”

Tilda peered over the edge of the cup with a frown.

“What’s in it?”

“Coffee and spices, and honey and milk,” said Bard. “The taste and smell of this is my earliest memory, my great grandmother at the stove, brewing this.”

“You drank this when you were a little boy?” Tilda asked.

“Only once. It was the last time she brewed it before she died, and the toolkuh was sold for the price of the metal. Then it was impossible to get the spices, and no money even if you could get them. Dori, how did you manage this?”

“Dis made a few discrete inquiries with our new trading partners,” said Dori, “the ones who provide the xocolātl for zinc.”

Ori said, “It’s amazing, the good that came from that awful mine.”

“This is yummy,” said Sigrid. “Bain, try this.”

Bain looked askance, but he wasn’t old enough to be routinely offered tea, never mind coffee, and he wasn’t going to pass this up.

Tilda tried some, seemed to consider critically, “Needs more honey.”

“Of course it does,” said Bard as he kissed the top of her head.

She offered the cup to Thranduil.

“What do you think, Adanana?”

Thranduil sipped, considered, and said with great dignity, “I think it tastes like more.”

“My present next!” Tilda cried.

She ran up to Thorin, and thrust a gaily wrapped packet at him, about six inches square. Ori nearly swallowed his tongue when he recognized the same packing paper that Dipfa had used as a dress at Thorin’s coronation.

“Happy Birthday and Happy Yule!” Tilda said. “Open it!”

Thorin laughed.

“I’m very happy to obey, Tilda,” he said.

The paper was wrapped around and around.

“Sorry,” said Tilda. “I couldn’t find my scissors, and Idad Gloin told me never to cut paper with my boot knife or I’d blunt it, so I just used the whole sheet.”

“Nothing wrong with that,” said Thorin, as he un unravelled the gift.

It was a light blue, cotton sack, folded in quarters, and when Thorin opened it out, he found that three edges had been blanket-stitched with black cord, and the open edges bound with dark ribbon. The rune of his name had been painted carefully on one side.

“Tilda! Thank you! This is amazing work!”

“It’s a cozy,” she offered. “Like for teapots, but this one is for your raven crown, so it won’t get mussed when you aren’t wearing it.”

He opened his mouth, but she kept up her nervous chatter.

“I nearly didn’t finish it on time,” she said. “I started it a long time ago, so by the time it was nearly finished, the start of it looked like a little kid did it.”

Thorin smiled at the sight of her hopeful face.

“I’m honored, Tilda, not only because you crafted this for me, but also because I am the only dwarf king in Arda who can say they have one.”

“Really?”

“Really.”

She hugged him, then she pulled back.

“Do you like the rune? Master Brur suggested it. I was going to just paint it on the side, but he told me it would bleed through the way I was going to do it, and he made sure there was a blotter inside the sack to soak up the excess when I painted.”

“Master Brur has many good ideas,” said Thorin.
Bilbo approached Thorin next, bowed to him, and held out a book.
“My latest and greatest work, your majesty. An edition of one, just for you.”
Thorin took it and opened the cover.
“These Old Shards, by Notathain A. Shire.”
He raised his brow to Bilbo.
“Is this safe for general consumption, your highness?”
Bilbo rocked back on his heels, and up on his considerable toes, and looked smug.
“The first few pages at least.”
Thorin read the first line out loud.
“In the days of Good King Thomas, a mountain of a man…” He groaned. “Bilbo, what have you done?”
Fili and Kili snickered.
Thorin fixed them with a look.
“Don’t laugh, badgers. You didn’t escape, either: and Crown Princess Philippa, the king’s niece and heir, and her mischievous and adorable baby sister Princess Kaylee.”
The brothers squawked. Tauriel and Sigrid exchanged gleeful looks and Dwalin coughed as if he had something in his throat.
“Oh, and look,” Thorin continued. “Someone has provided an illustration of this illustrious line.”
“Really?” Ori asked. He blinked innocently and winked at Arne who, with Nodun and Tay, had joined the guests at the royal residence.
Kili yelped, “Ori! I do not wear pigtails!”
Roäc and the other ravens cackled.
Bilbo smiled.
“Thorin, dear, this is not the end of my gift-giving,” Bilbo warned.
He presented Thorin with a painted box, about a foot square, but only an inch or so high.
“In case you ever feel the need for them,” said Bilbo, blinking saucily.
With obvious trepidation, Thorin eased open the edge of the box and looked inside, then rolled his eyes and laughed.
“Should I keep them on me at all times, in case I split my trousers?”
“At your discretion, King Morsel.”
Ori raised a questioning brow. Everyone else stared in blatant curiosity.
“C’mon lad!” Oräc called from her basket. “Don’t keep us in suspense!”
Thorin heaved a sigh.
“Durin blue silk shorts. Thank you, ghivasha. You won’t escape so easily, you know. It is my birthday, and you are a hobbit.”
“Do your worst!” Bilbo challenged.
“My worst requires privacy. We’ll save it for later. In the meantime, I believe you have something for Elrond.”
The elf lord looked up from the couch where he and Lindir were examining the toolkuh.
“For me? I’m honored, Thorin.”
“The honor is all ours, Elrond.”
Bilbo presented Elrond with his copy of the Infernal Adventures.
Elrond gasped, read the dedication, gasped more, then shouted a very loud, “Hurrah!”, grasped Bilbo around the waist, lifted him and proceeded to try and hug the stuffing out of him. Ori realized where the twins had got it from.
“I take it this meets our approval, m’lord,” Bilbo teased.
“This is wonderful! And new illustrations! Thank you!” Elrond cried.
Ori turned to Dori and shyly offered his flat, rectangular package.
“My! For me, pet? You know you shouldn’t have!” said Dori, in the same tone he had used from the first offering Ori had made him in earliest pebblehood.
“It’s from Thorin and I,” said Ori, as he and Thorin shared a grin.
Dori carefully unwrapped the paper, so as not to tear it, and placed it aside, an old habit from the lean times, when any paper could be reused, if not for another gift, then by Ori to practice his calligraphy.

Dori surveyed the beauty before him, and shrieked so loud, he woke both pebbles and even Oin winced.

Balin peered over Dori’s shoulder.
“What is it, beloved?”
“It’s Thorin, wearing pink, with a foaming white lace jabot,” said Dori, clearly delighted. “Thank you pet, our Thorin, it shall adorn my boudoir, to remind me every time I see it that I was right.”
Balin looked dubious.
“Yer boudoir? Seriously?”
“Yes, it shall be kept forever as an heirloom of my house.”
Dis glanced over at it, then at Thorin, and choked.
“Really, nadad?”
“What? Do I not look every inch a king?” Thorin challenged archly.
“I can honestly say, I never thought you would pose so… majestically!”
Meanwhile, Dwalin handed Thorin a familiar box, which the king opened, laughing.
“A hair bead made of goat poop! Dwalin, you shouldn’t have!”

After all the presents had been opened and people were still playing with, admiring, eating, or trying things on, Bilbo went off and soon they all enjoyed second breakfast of small sausages baked in crescents of sweet dough and fluffy omelettes with new floury rolls. After this, materials were gathered, gas masks distributed to elves and men, and everyone ferried down to the royal forges.

Ori recognized the side hall that opened to the Fundin troves. Thorin led the way purposefully down to where the royal family kept it’s private trove. It was nothing to the treasure room Thror had kept and had been ensorcelled by the dragons egg, but quite impressive enough, and filled with many strange, wonderful objects, most of which Ori didn’t recognize.

The forges were silent but warm. Ori nudged Thorin when he noticed than even little Tilda’s brow had sweat beading on it. The men and elves couldn’t remain down here for too long. Thorin gave a nod.

Dain opened something he’d been carrying, He set it up and gave it a good winding. The blades of steel set in a circle were soon whirling and cooling the area.

Thorin went to the far wall of the trove and tapped the side. A massive oblong drawer popped out, lined with matte black silk. The entire surface, but for the silk between each stone, was covered in starlight gems. They were all cut and polished to the highest standard. Thorin turned to the elves with a smile and said,
“Help yourselves.”
Thranduil, Celeborn, and Galadriel all gasped. Elrond looked stunned and Cemnesta, his brothers and the twins all turned pale. Galadriel got herself together and went forward to look. She drew out a single gem, a perfectly smooth teardrop shape. She held it out to Dis.
“If you would be so kind as to make this into a necklace for me, please.”
Dis took the gem, held it up to the torch light, and frowned.
“Just the stone on a chain of mithril, I think. Unless you wanted something specific?”
“No, I think you’re right,” said Galadriel. “The stone itself is ornament enough.”
“Where would you like the stone to sit?”
“At the throat?”
“Easily done.”
Celeborn went forward.
“I would like a match to my lady’s gem, if I may, Princess Dis.”
“Nothing would make me happier, Lord Celeborn,” and she smiled at his formality.

Thranduil stood carefully examining the gems. Ori wondering what he was planning. All about the forges were being cleaned and put in order. The younger set played with the faunts and Tilda, which mostly consisted of climbing the mounds of treasure and sliding or rolling down them shrieking with laughter. As they raced between the troves of the Durins, the Fundins and the Groinuls, Dain stood in the middle and smacked the last butt to pass him.
“Got yeh in th’ heart!” he bellowed as whomever was tagged squealed delightedly. The wargs, cats, birds, and others were left at Fundin House for their own good.

Balin, carrying the twins, led the way to the Fundin forge, with Dori, Ori, Dwalin, Nori and Bofur in their wake. Dwalin shut the door after them. Once inside, they took out their gifts and set them on the anvil. Ori had made several dozen snickerdoodles doused in cinnamon for Yavanna and Mahal. He had knitted a pair of Durin blue socks for Durin. He hoped they were large enough.

Nori put a burlap sack on the anvil, It seemed to be holding something heavy and round. it certainly sounded solid.
“Do I want t’ know, Ducky?” Bofur asked.
“Nope,” Nori said.
“Nori!” Dori turned to the spy master. “Is that something you stole when you were off somewhere while my Ori was on his quest?”
“I didn’t steal it.” Nori barked. “I found it.”

Dori huffed and set the twins on the anvil for Balin to bless when the lava entered the room. Dwalin opened the hatch and the lava poured in. They all breathed the hot scent in. The twins wiggled and cooed.
They all bowed. Dori and Balin each took a badger and brought them to the edge of the lava trough. Holding the badgers against their chests they leaned over and murmured blessings to Mahal. Ori thought the twins were enjoying themselves.

They all drew back behind the anvil once more and Dori sang an ancient hymn. They bowed again. Dwalin closed the lava hatch and they went out, securing the door, so the fumes would not caused distress to the men, hobbits, and elves.

They found the younger set bouncing around as both the Durins and the Groinuls came out of their forges. Ori noticed that Bilbo, Frodo, Sam and Tauriel were being helped out of their masks. Legolas was holding his and raking his fingers through his hair, now soaked with sweat. Wandi went to him and helped Gimli dry it.

They left the troves in a chattering group. Ori grinned at Arne and Sigrid.
“And now lunch then Yule in Dale!”
Thorin’s birthday lunch was an amazing affair. Dori and Dis had put together every favorite dish of Thorin’s, and Fili and Kili chased Bilbo around, trying to get him to curl up on a platter. “I am not lunch!” Bilbo scolded. “I am a mysterious creature of Yavanna, and I will not be served on a plate!”

“It’s a big platter!” Kili protested.

“Go away or no dessert for either of you!” Bilbo threatened.

Mistress Dazla fetched the two away to the kitchen, then they reappeared and brought the main meat dish in together, snickering. “Is that what I think it is?” Thorin asked in a reverent tone.

“Yes,” Fili laughed as they put it in front of him. “And why Kili and I went off the other day.”

Ori stared. He had heard about and seen pictures of deep water cavern crayfish, but seeing them in front of him was another thing. They were three times the size of the crayfish he had seen at the inn. Unlike those, the cavern crayfish had no shell and, when found, were completely transparent. Cooked, they became shades of delicate pinks, greens and blues, meaty flesh, all swimming in melted butter. There were ‘ooo’s’ and ‘aaaah’s’, then Thranduil looked up the table to Thorin and said with a distinct pout but merry laughter in his eyes, “Thorin, you have gone too far. You have married my daughter to your nephew, you have destroyed the arkenstone, you have turned Legolas into a dwarf. All that I could forgive. But Thorin… pastels?”

Everyone was laughing as Thorin looked up, his mouth full, and butter running down his beard.

“Hush up, buttercup. Someone feed him a crayfish.”

“Adanana, is a mighty oak, not a buttercup,” Tilda pointed out, but the mighty oak was now too busy eating a crayfish, and moaning with greed at the deliciousness, to comment further.

“Fili,” Dis asked, “I thought these were rare.”

“So did we,” Fili admitted. “When we went down to the old deep lake, we hoped to get Idad at least one, but the lake is full of them. We used the old royal mithril net and it took both of us to haul it in. We kept what was needed for all of us, and gave the rest over to the meat market guild with instructions for the guild masters to assess the crayfish situation. These crayfish must really like mithril.”

“Bofur?” Thorin said.

“Aye, I’ll look int’ it,” the miner replied. “I’ve heard old tales tha’ the crayfish eat the minerals next t’ mithril. We’ll make sure they’ve enough, an’ see that the miners don’t break through t’ the lake.”

“Your majesty,” Dipfa declared. “I shall design fo you a court robe dedicated to these marvelous crayfish.”

“I shall be honored, Dipfa,” Thorin said gravely.

“Passstellls,” Thranduil murmured in a sing-song voice, while Ori was assailed by the vision of Thorin dressed as a crayfish. He shook his head to rid himself of it, before he slid under the table giggling.

“Yes,” Arne put in. “With the Second Music, it seems like all the ancient creatures of Arda are returning. What’s next do you think? Mine knackers?”

“I though’ mine knackers were fairy tales,” Gimli said around his third crayfish.

“Fairy tales come from somewhere,” Oin said. “It’s figurin’ out where.”

Ori stopped eating. Mahal had told him.

“Um,” Ori started. Everyone looked at him.

“You know something, Scribe of Mahal?” Thorin asked.

“Well, there was one time when I couldn’t get to sleep and I was wondering about moonlight and how everyone, men, dwarrow, elves, and hobbits all like it and I was wondering if orcs liked it and if orcs found it romantic and then I wondered if orcs could be romantic and how could they be as Dwalin told me they shit where they stand and that isn’t very conducive to romance and Mahal told me I was scaring everyone in the Halls and I asked him about orcs like Drum and where those orcs came from and he told me all the original ones were mine knackers, who had been captured and mutated by Morgoth,” Ori finished in a rush.

Silence.

“Our sweet, wee mine knackers!” Gridr yelled.

“That bloody-” Jani was cut off mid-yell by Thorin raising his hands.

“Ori, thank you for telling us. I will contact every monarch in Arda to tell them that this is a possibility, and they are to keep a watch for such.”

Jani gave a sigh of delight.

“Our Bo, jus’ imagine us workin’ with knackers, just like in all th’ old tales! It’d be real magic.”

Bofur shook his head in amazement.

“Idad,” Frodo piped up. “Do orcs really just go to the bathroom in their trousers?”

Sam added, “Do orcs wear trousers?”

“Fili ‘ Ori hastened to changed the subject. “I hope you plan on being good to my Sig when you’re married!”

Fili, mouth full, stared at him.

“Ori,” said Sigrid, “are you giving Fili the ‘shovel talk’?”

“Yes, yes I am,” said Ori. “Though, I guess, from me it would be more of a pen nib talk.”

Fili nodded and swallowed, “Either way, I understand. I wouldn’t want a nib in the eye any more than a shovel to the head.”

“We’re dwarrow,” said Dwalin. “Th’ shovel really won’ have much effect.”

“It will if I shove it up his jacksies,” Ori teased.

Balin chuckled. “Better watch yersel’, me lad. Our Ori kin be fierce when he starts threatenin’ yer jacksies.”

“What’s jacksies?” Sam asked.

Kili and a few others snickered but Fili rose and came around the table to hug Ori.

“I promise I will be very good to her. I’m forever grateful to you for introducing us.”

Ori sputtered and blushed as Fili squeezed him and Sigrid giggled.

The cake was a magnificent affair of xocolātl crumb, with butter cream frosting, and a middle layer of cherries soaked in cordial, which all the hobbits insisted on bearing to the table and placing in front of Thorin while they sang him a traditional hobbit birthday song, though with a twist on the traditional lines:

“We wish you a happy birthday,
And many more a birthday,
And cake on your birthday,
You old person you.”

“Old person?” Thorin asked with a grin and a raised brow.

“Count your blessings, my dear,” said Bilbo. He handed Thorin the knife with which to make the ‘wishing’ slice. “These usually have one lit candle upon them for every year. Bad enough with hobbits, for dwarrow it would constitute an inferno.”

“Aye,” said Hamfast. “It’s gotten so, my birthday’s held outside, even though it’s the dead o’ winter.”

“Icing is flammable,” said Bell with a nod.

Ori made a quick sketch of the scene to detail later, then he consumed one cake slice while sketching the other, fascinated with the contrasting textures.

Finally satisfied, he ate his second piece of cake, and turned to offer Dwalin another, and discovered Dwalin wasn’t there.

In fact, the table seemed oddly empty.

Dwalin was missing, and Eowyn, and Faramir, Arne, and Bain.

Thranduil caught his eye and winked at him.

When the cake was finished down to the last crumb and blob of frosting, a yowl and holler split the air and the room was filled with fearsome creatures, most of them growling, and one of them trying to growl but only managing a belch. They were covered in furs, some of animals, some their own, and streaked with soot, and girded round with belts of rusty old bells that thunked and clanged. The largest of the beasts, the Supmark, whipped his fearsome horned head from side to side, then pointed to Fili and shouted, “Aha! Get ‘im!”

And the group grabbed up Fili and bore him wailing from the room, though Supmark did stop to kiss the top of Ori’s head on the way out.

Silence descended, and in the distance the fussing of the twins and Marigold waking hungry from their naps.

“Well,” said Dori. He knocked back the contents of his teacup, and stood. “I’d say it’s time for us to go and get ready.”

Sigrid swallowed, and reached out to grasp Bard’s hand. She was smiling, but her smile looked rather like terror around the edge.

The Dale group took their leave, back into town.

Ori stood behind Thorin atop the highest platform in the center of the Erebor’s Central Market. Bilbo stood to one side of Thorin, and Frodo stood on the other, holding Thorin’s hand. In Frodo’s other hand, he clutched the toy Sugar Bofur had carved for him. Sam, off with his parents and siblings, had the warg toy that looked like Butter.

The real Sugar and Butter lolled on the platform, sniffing curiously. Butter dangled her tail off the edge of the platform, periodically draping it over Arb’s helmet and in front of his face, possibly knowing that, standing at attention, the dwarf couldn’t do anything about it.

Dori sat on his inflatable chair, and Balin stood proudly beside it. Each wore a sling in which they carried the pebbles, and the teacup was stocked with extra nappies.

It seemed as though every dwarf in the mountain had turned out to wish the king many happy returns of the day, which was best, since he had an important announcement to make. The platform looked like an island in an ocean of beards, all gussied up in gold beads, citrines and carnelians, as befit the day.

Thorin raised his free hand high, and the crowd fell silent.

Ori felt a shiver go up his back.

“Thank you,” said Thorin. “And thank you all for coming out to wish me a happy birthday. In times past, the Durin kings chose this day to do good works for their people, and I intend to keep this tradition.”

There was no reason to state that it had not been kept for many years.

“The crown has purchased the property known as Mithril Square, with the intention of establishing a free academy of learning for all the peoples of Arda, a place to share knowledge, and a neutral ground on which to meet and understand one another better.”

As Mithril Square loomed, impressive and glorious over Thorin’s shoulder, it was not hard to underline the importance of such a gift on the people of Erebor.

“This plan, still in its early stages, is many-fold. Chieflly, it is to gift the world with dwarven culture, our arts, our industries, and our language. Secondly, it is place to offer a broad education to the youth of Erebor, Dale and beyond, who have finished primary education, but who do not have a craft, or are still awaiting the chance for an apprenticeship. In conclusion, it is a place for us to learn about the larger world, the men, hobbits, and elves, and all they have to offer.

“To this end, I am open to suggestions from the people of Erebor and Dale. This will be your academy. Where do you want to take it? Under the mountain, ideas may be submitted through Master Brur at the Great Library, through any guild scribe, or through Master Orris at the Moo and Cluck, as takes your fancy.”

A great cheer rose up, but quickly subsided.

“In Dale, where I will also make this announcement, ideas may be submitted through the head teachers at any of the Dale schools, through Princess Sigrid at Dale Hall, or at any tea house, quartz or cobalt.”

Another cheer went up, and some laughter.

“Please remember,” Thorin added, “I will consider each suggestions, no matter who makes it, or how modest or grand it may be. Try to keep the cursing to a minimum. Thank you. And now, to Dale and Yule.”

The cheering started and followed them as they rode out on ponies with Dori and the elves in the teacup carriage. Ori patted Honda’s neck as the crowd, some walking, others riding, and more catching rides on carts and carriages, followed their king out of the mountain.

They rode out into the crisp, cold afternoon. A few flakes floated in the air, the sun shone and a little breeze teased beards and hair.

The great cavalcade traveled down the road and entered Dale to cheering as people moved toward the center of town and Dale Hall.

Soon the royals were welcomed into Dale Hall by Milgr, who was all a-flutter with excitement.
Bard and Bain were nowhere to be seen, but Tilda was beautifully dressed in a white fur coat and blue boots with curled toes, each capped with silver. Thranduil was also missing.

Thorin sent the wargs through to the kitchen to keep Bob company for the duration.

“Here we are,” caroled Mistress Dazla from the top of the stair. She made a shooing motion and Sigrid came into view and started down the stairs. She was the perfect Snow Maiden. She wore the traditional highly stylized dress of her people; it was all sky blue silk and white fur heavily embroidered with silver snowflakes. On her head, she wore an elaborate kokochnik, trimmed with tall, white feathers and blue and white designs of snowflakes

Everyone present cheered and praised her.

Sigrid turned bright pink and hugged Dori who had burst into tears at the sight of her. Dis kissed Sigrid’s cheek and sniffed, looking her over with a sigh of pleasure. Sigrid turned to Lady Galadriel, who was clad in one of her flowing white gowns, but for a sprinkling of tiny diamonds on her bodice, suggesting a snowflake.

“Ooh, Lady Galadriel. You look so perfect. You really should be the Snow Maiden. But don’t you have a cloak or something to wear outside?”

Galadriel laughed and embraced the girl, saying,

“Oh now, my child, I couldn’t take the role from you! It would hardly fit with your dear fathers’ plans! I assure you, I am most happy to let it go, and the cold never bothers me anyway.”

“Ready?” Thorin asked, and Sigrid hugged the dwarf king and consort at the same time.

Sigrid laughed and looked at Dain and Sculdis, who grinned. She turned to all of them.

“Let’s do this bastard!”

Ori watched eagerly as Sigrid burst out of the door of Dale Hall. The Durins and their party guests poured out after her.

“Help me!” she cried to the populace. “The Prince of Spring has been lost and Grandfather Frost cannot come, if the prince is not here!”

“How did this happen?” called Mistress Callin, in her role as the crone.

“I don’t know.” Sigrid cried and wrung her white fur gauntlets extravagantly.

“Harharharharhar!” came a roar from a roof top.
Ori looked up in delight. There lurked Supmark and his minions.

Now that Ori had a chance to get a good look at Supmark, he thought his Dwalin was amazing and ridiculous in this get up. He wore a jumpsuit of brushed out sheepskins, his face now obscured by a hideous wooden mask, painted and carved so that his eyes stood out and his forked tongue twisted out nearly a foot from his face. From his head rose impressive antlers that Moose must have cast before she reached adulthood. Instead of sweeping out to the side, they were fixed to stand straight up from Supmark’s head. Supmark shook his fist in the air and waved his long willow bough switch. The rest of the Nekushdies were similarly attired, but for differences in horns and sheepskin colors and varieties of switches and chains. They hollered and jumped up and down, making all the rusty sleigh bells adorning their belts ring out.

“It’s that evil Supmark and his minions, the Nekushdies!” Sigrid cried, pointing anyway despite everyone was already looking at them and cheering and shrieking in laughter and pretend fright.

“Why are you here?” Sigrid cried. “You belong in the freezing northern wastes!”

“We’re hungry!” shouted Supmark. “Th’ Prince o’ Spring challenged us an’ didn’ bring us anythin’ t’ eat, so we captured ‘im! We’ve locked him in a trunk an’ hidden it ’til we get food! So there, Snow Princess!”

All the Nekushdies shouted and jumped again, making a cacophony with their bells.

“Stop! Bring back my Prince!” Sigrid shrieked in return.

The Nekushdies did stop, except for Supmark, who made a show of shaking his hips at them.

“Stop that noise!” Sigrid scolded.

“I’ve go’ th biggest bells t’ make th’ most noise!” chortled Supmark

“Release my Prince and we shall share the feast we made for our beloved Grandfather Frost.”

Supmark shook his head and bells.

“No! He only brings sweets!”

“What’s wrong with sweets?” demanded Tilda. Most of the children shouted along with her.

“Stop yellin’, yeh brats!” Supmark bellowed, making them all giggle delightedly. “Sweets’re bad f’r yer teeth!”

“How do yeh know?” Caris shouted.

“Because all ours fell out!” yelled a Nekushdie, who sounded suspiciously like Faramir. All the Nekushdies and Supmark wagged their masks, the jaws fell open and lots of horrid looking black pegs could be seen.

“Ewww!” shouted the kids.

“Quick everyone!” cried the Snow Princess. “We must search for the Prince! Supmark and his Nekushdies don’t have a sleigh, so the trunk must be hidden here in town!”

“No!” shouted Supmark, but the kids of Dale and Erebor were already ganged together and breaking into smaller groups to rush around town, searching. Supmark slid off the roof and leapt to the ground, his Nekushdies following. They each picked a group of kids to chase and went yelling, and waving their switches of tied together twigs.

Chaos reigned as the parents and others called out suggestions for places the trunk might be.

“No, look under there! Righ’ there!”

“Mam, it’s th’ size of a bread box!”

“Yeh never know, the Prince migh’ be jus’ a wee thin’!”

“No’ tha’ wee!”

Some kids rushed madly around hunting, while others pelted the Nekushdies with snowballs. Supmark roared and snarled and occasionally grabbed some child and gently tossed them into a snowdrift. Nekushdie Arne and Nekushdie Bain helped with gusto.

Ori scribbled wildly, catching Haldir as a Nekushdie dodging snowballs and when he could, using his switch to hit them, making snow fly everywhere. The Faramir and Eowyn Nekushdies madly chased kids up and down streets, howling, but never quite caught them.

Supmark leaped about from foot to foot, shouting orders, and waving his switch, his bells all clashing like miniature thunder. Ori swore he could hear more than just two valar laughing helplessly in the back of his head.
Ori caught sight of Caris peeking around a corner, then waving to someone behind. A group of about ten badgers and children, with Caris and Tilda helping, hauled a very suspicious looking trunk out from an alley. It was wrapped in enormous chains, which Ori knew to be made of stuffed paper, and painted with large westron letters reading ‘Private’, ‘Do Not Touch’, and ‘Supmark’s Super Secret Trunk’.

A shout went up and people rushed forward to help haul the trunk into the middle of the square. “Hurray!” people shouted and cheered as they welcomed their intrepid kids back into their arms. The Snow Princess, on the Dale Hall porch, made ready to join them. Supmark noticed and he and all his Nekushdies made a dash for the trunk.

“Stop!” the Snow Princess commanded, descended the steps, and strode up to Supmark. “Tha’ was mine!” Supmark raged. “An’ it still would be, if it weren’ f’r them rotten kids!”

“You said you locked the Prince of Spring in a trunk and we’ve found a trunk, so we’re going to open it!”

“No yeh won’t!”

“Yes, I shall!”

Sigrid turned and went to the trunk
“Don’ open it!” yelled Supmark.

“Why not?” demanded the Snow Princess.

“Er… Go’ me drawers in there.”

“Well, if it’s only your drawers, why can’t I open it and see?” the Snow Princess laughed.

“‘Cose yeh ain’ married t’ me!” Supmark bellowed. “It’s improper an’ I’ll.…”

“You’ll what?” she challenged.

“Er…Tell yer granda!”

“He can’t come until the Prince of Spring is here, so if you’re going to do that, the Prince must be in the trunk.”

“Bugger!” yelled Supmark, kicking some snow, while the Nekushdies face-palmed in unison.

“Foil’d again!”

The Snow Princess went to the trunk and tore the chains away. The lid flew open and the royal golden horns of Erebor sounded.

From the trunk rose a figure covered in a snowy white sheepskin. It was cast aside in a flourish and there stood Fili in his role of the Prince of Spring. The crowd roared its triumph.

Ori goggled at him. Fili was dressed like an elf. He was completely clad in poofy silk, pale green trousers, a pink tunic and a bright red cape. Every part of his clothing was embroidered with gold new leaves and flowers, even his lilac boots. He stepped out of the trunk and waved, tossing his hair. Ori choked. Mister Wandi had done Fili’s hair and beard in perfect pin curls.

“Yavanna help me,” said Bilbo, “he looks like a dandelion.”

The Prince of Spring and The Snow Maiden clasped hands and rubbed noses while everyone cheered. Together they went up the steps of Dale Hall.

“My friends,” the Prince of Spring called out. “Listen! I hear the silvery bells of the sleigh of Grandfather Frost and his loyal friend, the King of Ice Pixies!”

“All kids of Dale,” The Snow Princess called out. “Sing the song of welcome for Grandfather Frost, so he knows to come to us!”

Miss Sifian cleared her throat, as the youngsters clustered together in front of her. She raised her arms and all the children sang,

“Here comes Granpa Frost, here comes Granpa Frost, right down to Dale Hall
He’s got a big sleigh and it’s filled with gifts for one and all,
Hear those sleigh bells jingle jingle, oh what a lovely sight,
So jump and cheer and sing out loud, ’cause Granpa Frost comes right now!”

“Louder!” Dain and Celeborn shouted. “He can’t hear you above the sleigh bells.”

The kids all screamed the song at the tops of their lungs and Miss Sifian glared at the laughing dwarf and elf.

Up from the south road came the ringing of sleigh bells. Kids of all races shrieked and shouted in delight. A huge sleigh pulled by an enormous elk glided into the square. Inside sat the driver. His head was of a normal size but his body was a vast bulge of dark blue velvet festooned with white fur. From behind him the graceful figure of Thranduil leapt out. The King-Father twirled around, casting aside his pale blue cloak, to reveal a skin-tight jumpsuit of silver cloth, dappled with diamonds. He struck a dramatic pose and cried out, “Younglings of Dale! It is I, the King of Ice Pixies, bringing to you your beloved Grandfather Frost.”

Ori nearly swallowed his tongue. Thranduil, his eye full of wicked delight, was posing directly at Dain. Dain’s mouth fell open, then the mighty king of the Iron Hills toppled off the steps of Dale Hall into a pile of snow and lay there, roaring with laughter.

Grandfather Frost rose, turned and faced everyone. He was absolutely round. He was so amazingly large, his stomach bulged at the top of the sleigh and his huge white beard followed suit.

“How! Ho-Ho-Ho! Come along, all you kids!” Grandfather Frost shouted, his voice remarkably like Bard’s. The kids all came forward eagerly.

“I see the Supmark and his Nekushdies!” said Grandfather Frost. “What? No one was carried off or given the switch?”

“No!” the kids chorused.

The Nekushdies grumbled and the Supmark kicked at the snow again, as if terribly disappointed.

The kids all cheered and the King of Ice Pixies pirouetted back to the sleigh and opened the entire side of the vehicle, dozens of brightly colored packets flew out and into the square via the coat of Grandfather Frost.

“How good you’ve all been!” Bard cried. “The bounty of winter!”

The youngsters squealed and rushed to snatch up the packets. Each contained a little sack of fruit candy, a pair of knit mittens and a hat with a tassel, all in bright colors, courtesy of the knitting guild.
The mittens and hats had clever draw strings to make them as small as the wearer needed, then the apparel would ‘grow’ along with them.

“It’s no’ fair!” cried Supmark. “We’re still hungry!”

Grandfather Frost looked the Nekushdies over.

“Tell you what,” Grandfather Frost said jovially. “If you can find a child who has been so naughty this year that you can smell it, you and your Nekushdies can eat them.”

Supmark and the Nekushdies cheered and went from kid to shrieking, giggling kid, sniffing at them, then complaining loudly that they didn’t smell bad enough.

As the riot of picking up presents ensued, Grandfather Frost climbed down from the sleigh and helped the King of Ice Pixies unharness Moose. Once it was certain every single kid had a gift, Grandfather Frost, with his ‘friend’, the King of Ice Pixies, scaled the steps of Dale Hall and turned to the assembly of men, dwarrow, hobbits, and elves.

“My friends!” Grandfather Frost cried. “The sun has returned to us. The days will now be longer. It is a time of great rejoicing!”

Everyone cheered, and as the cheering faded, Ori heard chanting from the street beyond the square. The words were strange, but the tempo familiar.

He and Bilbo exchanged looks of amazement, as the crowd parted and the Easterlings arrived.
Bard gaped at Thranduil.

“Did you-?” Bard started.

“Happy Yule, my love,” said Thranduil, and kissed him.

Ori turned to a new page in his book and began to sketch the Easterlings like mad with his graphite wand. He could only hope he remembered the myriad of colors later on. The Easterlings walked to the steps of Dale Hall in single file, and Ara led them with her staff, and Rigel followed at the very end, carrying the toddler. Each member of the party was dressed in an open cape of deep blue-black, but under these, they wore shifts the colors of the sun.

They fanned out, facing the royals as they sang, and as the last notes faded, Ara pointed her staff at a brazier on one side of the steps, then a second across from it. Flames kindled and then leapt ice blue, then true gold, and a breeze like springtime swept the square.

Deneb climbed the steps, hands held out to Bard, who had abandoned his ‘big’ coat and beard, and he met her half way and they embraced.

“Thank you for this,” Bard said to her. Then he looked down at the rest of the Easterlings.

“Thank you. You’ve helped make this the happiest Yule I’ve ever had.”

Ori noted that in midst of all this, High Priest Sven had climbed up on the center fountain, now boxed in for the winter, and was singing and chanting on his own, his hands upraised and waving.

“Who’s tha’?” Dain asked, who had finally recovered enough to be pulled out of the snow by his delicate jewel of a bride and his heir.

“Who?” asked Sigrid.

“Him,” Dain gestured with his chin.

“High Priest Sven,” said Sigrid

She stood arm-in-arm with Fili, who shook out his hair as they watched the high priest going through his invocations.

“High priest, eh? Tha’ explains th’ hat, I s’ppose.”

Dori eyed him.

“Says the dwarf who wears a giant spider carapace on his head.”

“Wha’ he doin’?” Dain asked, waving his arms in imitation.

“He’s worshiping Eru for us,” said Sigrid.

“Worshippin’ f’r yeh? I didn’t realize yeh could farm tha’ work out.”

“We all worship Eru, of course,” Sigrid clarified. “But he does the sacrifices and public worship and things.”

“An’ he’s fun t’ watch,” said Dain.

“That, too,” Sigrid agreed with a grin.

Unfortunately, Sven finished and saw Dain waving his arms. He smiled broadly, got down, and approached.

“Oh, Mahal,” said Dori. “He’s coming over. Smile, dears, smile.”

Ori wondered if Dori’d lost his mind.

“Why?”

“A bunch of smiling dwarrow usually scares people off,” said Dori.

Alas, it did not work.

High Priest Sven approached Dain and, without preamble, said loudly and slowly, “Very good! It pleases Eru when his adopted children worship him, too!”

Dain stared at him, then he brayed, “Are yeh deaf?”

Sven drew back, obviously mortified.

“Er, no. Eru bless you all!” he cried, then hurried off.

“Oh, aye,” said Dain. “I see it now. Puir lad’s a halfwit, so th’ men gave ‘im a job anyane could do. Mighty kind a’ them, actu’lly.”

Dori patted Dain’s arm.

“He means well.”

“Then, I suppose there’s no harm in ‘im.”

“Da says the last high priest was very different.” Sigrid shuddered. “Da told us that he wanted to publicly punish everyone if they didn’t do what he said. In the name of Eru, of course.”

“Sounds li’e he was defective’r somethin’. Wha’ happened? Eru called ‘im home?”

Sigrid looked uneasy. She glanced back at her father, who was deep in conversation with Deneb and Thranduil, while Ara and Rigel supervised the Easterling kids as they opened their presents.

“Da told us the story. It was before Calmar’s time, so Da took him out in the boat,” Sigrid replied softly. “Da says he dropped him off on the other shore of the lake. The priest said something about praying in the wilds, converting any wandering heathens. I like to believe Da wouldn’t lie.”

“So, where’d this ‘un come from?” Dain asked.

“Unger Janser’s father complained to the priest’s order that the priest had abandoned Dale, so the mother house in Gondor sent a new one.”
“Convenient,” said Dain with a shrug.
“Yes, they don’t have many dwarrow in Gondor. Sven had never met one. Suddenly he was surrounded by a lot of short people with beards. Come to think of it, they probably didn’t help matters by pretending not to understand a word he said.”

The bell at the top of Dale Hall rang.
Fili and Sigrid smiled at each other, clutching hands.
Everyone cheered, though few of them knew why.
Bard turned from his husband and friend and addressed the crowd.
“Now that the prince and princess are both here, King Thorin and I have agreed with our heirs that this is the perfect day.”

People chattered and whispered, looking at their grinning monarchs.
Bard went on,
“King Thorin and I call upon all of you to join us in witnessing the marriage of Sigrid, my daughter, Crown Princess of Dale to her beloved, Fili, Crown Prince of Erebor, nephew of King Thorin, son of Princess Dis.”
The cheers were deafening.

High Priest Sven scampered up the steps and stood opposite the pair. He cleared his throat and projected his voice, which was actually quite melodious.

“Now we stand in the presence of Eru, and beg He will give His blessing to the union of Fili and Sigrid. Let us honor Him, the Author of this sacred rite.”
Ori heard Someone coughing in the back of his head.
“Da,” said Mahal. “Yeh promised Yeh’d behave.”
“Yes, of course. Just something in my throat.”

Luckily, Sven didn’t know he was being heckled by his Creator.
“Who gives this woman?” Sven asked serenely.
Ori thought it was pretty obvious she gave herself, but kept his mouth shut and kept drawing.
“She does,” said Bard.
Sven turned his head and gaped at Bard, then said, “Oh, yes, quite. And who give this m- Well, let’s just skip ahead a little.”
Bain, still wearing the bottom half of his Nekushdie costume, muttered, “Good idea.”
In fact, High Priest Sven was obliged to skip quite a few things. Ori knew there was a whole bit where Sigrid was supposed to say she’d obey her husband. Ori snorted to himself. No dam in Arda would vow something like that, and a good many young women had begun to say they would not either, and went to the mountain with their brides and grooms to sign contracts in the dwarven way instead. Such marriages were legal under the mountain and outside of it. If Sven had chosen to be stubborn about it before, he certainly wasn’t going to try it with the future queen of Dale and Erebor.
Sven looked nervously around, probably most happy to yield the next part of the ceremony to someone else.
Thorin bowed to him, stepped up and sang the first verse of the old khuzdul blessing song, and everyone joined in.
Then the elves present sang the sindarin blessing song. Then Mistress Callin sang the bridal blessing with all the married women of Dale.
The last of notes echoed around them.
“Fili, Sigrid join hands,” said Thorin. “Now, repeat your vows after me.”
“As Mahal has forged us for each other, let us seek to make each other happy. Let us forge a new family and a new life together, as did all our ancestors.”

When Thorin called for the beads, Kili took them from one of his pouches, and dropped them into Dori’s hand for the Bearer’s blessing.
As he offered them to the couple, Fili said, “I made these for us. Do you like them?”
“They’re beautiful,” Sigrid said in a shaky voice, her eyes full of happy tears.
At this juncture, Bain offered a covered tray. He presented this to Thorin.
“Thank you,” said the king.
Thorin offered it to Bard, who lifted the cloth to reveal Dis’ silver brushes.
Sigrid went down a step of Dale Hall while Fili did her braid. He took the bead from Kili’s hand and clasped it into Sigrid’s hair. She came back up to braid and clasped a bead in his hair.
Thranduil handed Thorin an embroidered ribbon.
“Thank you, brother king,” said Thorin.
Thranduil inclined his head graciously.
“Dis?”
He held out the ribbon.
She took it with a smile and did the honors herself.
“May Mahal and Eru bless this union,” she said. “May Yavanna make it fruitful. May you walk into eternity together.”
Dis stepped back and everyone looked at High Priest Sven.
“Er…” he began as first Kili then Bain handed him a ring.
“Ah, yes, thank you.” High Priest Sven cleared his throat and intoned,
“Are you, Crown Prince Fili, son of Dis, and heir to Thorin Oakenshield, High King of all Dwarrow, free to lawfully to marry Crown Princess Sigrid, daughter of King Bard of Dale?”
“I am,” Fili stated clearly.
“And are you, Crown Princess Sigrid, daughter of King Bard of Dale, free to lawfully to marry Crown Prince Fili, son of Dis, and heir to Thorin Oakenshield, High King of all Dwarrow?”
“I am,” she said.
“Then repeat after me,” said Sven smiling at Sigrid. “I, Crown Princess Sigrid, take you, Crown Prince Fili, to be my husband. I promise to be true to you in good times and in bad, in sickness and in health. I will love you and honor you all the days of my life.”
Sigrid repeated the vow, and slid the ring onto Fili’s finger.
Sven turned to Fili and said, “Please, repeat after me. “I, Crown Prince Fili, take you, Crown Princess Sigrid, to be my wife. I promise to be true to you in good times and in bad, in sickness and in health. I will love you and honor you all the days of my life.”
Fili did and when he put the ring on Sigrid’s finger, the crowd gave out a roar of pure happiness.
“Now,” said Fili to Sigrid, “we’re promised twice.”
Sven sighed with pleasure before calling out to the crowd,
“You have declared your consent before me, Eru’s representative here in Dale. May the Iluvatar in His goodness strengthen your consent and fill you both with His blessings. What Eru has joined, men, er, elves, hobbits, and dwarf…dwarrow must not divide.“
Fili and Sigrid kissed and everyone cheered again.
Bard and Thorin clasped arms, and Bard embraced his daughter, and then Fili. Then Bard hugged Dis, who wept happily.
Thranduil swept through and embraced everyone in his path.
Margr and Vi shrieked and rushed out as Orlo opened his cart.
“Iklars for everyone!” the sisters bellowed. “Happy weddin’! An’ Yule! An’ everythin’ else!”
Tables were brought out, more great braziers were lit to warm the revelers, doors of pubs who had offered their kitchens for feast cooking were thrown open.
As the proud parents, Thranduil, Bard, Thorin, Bilbo, Dis and Jani sat together, and Celeborn served the mead he had supervised the warming of, though Hathor teased him that he might have forgotten how. The parents approved of the mead and began the tradition of toasting the newly wed couple. Once more the foods from all over Arda were served up and the serious eating, drinking, and dancing began.
The kings lingered long after the kids were taken off home and put to bed. The bridal couple had been sung and teased as they went off in a small sleigh Mistress Callin called a troika. People from the Dale and the mountain had lavishly decorated it with ribbons, pine boughs, strings of nuts and popped corn as well as a boots and shoes so old they were beyond repair.

The troika headed toward the mountain, where the couple would spend their wedding night in the old king’s suit in the former Royal Residence.

The party continued without them. Dain had all but adopted Thranduil.

"Tha’ were brilliant, laddie! I still think I mus’ a’ bin dreamin’! Yeh was bloody amazin’! An’ twirlin’!” Dain enthused. “I’d a’ fallen on me head!”

“Well, you do have a habit of addressing me as pixie. How could I resist?”

“I bloody couldn’t,” Dain agreed. “Here lemme pour yeh another.”

Ori blinked, a little muzzy-headed, and looked about. Lady Galadriel’s mead had done it’s work. There were only a few people left in the square, and most were talking and clearing up. Bard slept with his head on the table. The guard was on patrol through the city. Thorin sang the hobbit birthday song to himself and occasionally giggled, while Bilbo sat cuddled in his lap, sober, but bemused, and played with the celebratory beads in Thorin’s beard. Ori contemplated painting a picture in oils across the mountainside. He’d call it: Still Life With Chips.

This revery was broken by Dwalin, who rushed up with Haldir and Arb, all wearing armor, and deadly serious expressions.

“Thorin!” Dwalin barked.

“Hm?” Thorin swung his face around and squinted at Dwalin. “Yes?”

“Thorin, we caugh’ four orcs on th’ western slope, millin’ abou’. Three were carryin’ rabbits, one was dressed as a rabbit.”

“You mean, dressed in rabbit skins.”

“No, dressed as a rabbit.”

Thorin paused, and finally asked, “Lop-earred or cottontail?”

“How’d yeh even know th’ difference?”

“When you’ve had this much mead, suddenly you can tell the difference,” said Thorin. “And, has anyone questioned these rabbits?”

“Th’ three with th’ rabbits bit int’ th’ rabbits, which mus’ve bin poisoned, ‘cause they fell over dead.”

“The rabbits?”

“Th’ orcs. Pay attention, yeh souse. Th’ wee one, ‘bout Drum-sized, dressed li’e a rabbit, spilled ‘is guts.”

“Did you mop them up?”

“What?”

“We don’t want anyone to trip.”

“Thorin.”

“I’m sorry, Dwalin, it’s just that I know how they got here, and so do you. What did the bunny orc say? Were they expecting reinforcements?”

“No, they followed ‘Frerin’s’ directions t’ th’ letter, though I don’ recall anythin’ abou’ dressin’ li’e a rabbit.”

“Must have been garbled in translation. So, what have you done with the remaining orc?”

“Up t’ yeh. He’s askin’ f’r asylum.”

“Seriously?”

“Aye. An’ I don’ recall tha’ in ‘Frerin’s’ directions, either.”

“Where is this orc?”

“Our Winnie’s taken him t’ th’ dungeons up home.”

“Tell me,” cried Bilbo, sitting up in Thorin’s lap. “Was she still in costume?”

“Oh! I get it!” Ori cried. “Nekushdies! Nekush means ‘bad’ in khuzudl! They’re baddies!”

And he laughed so hard, he fell off the bench.
A hiatus for this week - sorry

Chapter Summary

Everything is fine. As most of you have probably figured out long ago, we’re in the US and this is the week of the 4th of July. We are going to be the central hub of family parties. From today(Monday) until Sunday, we are going to look like the kitchen at Fundin House getting ready for Durin’s Day. Wish us luck and ch. 171 will appear on the 12th! Thank you all muchly in advance -Dolly and Stevie.

Chapter 171 due out on 20191712!

End Notes

Notes:
- The name of the Master of Dale I found at The tolkiengateway.net/wiki/The_Hobbit_(2003_video_game). He really doesn’t seem to have a book canon given name. However if anyone know what it really is, please tell me!!
- All gemstone have been randomly chosen for color from the Gem Select site. All gems and precious metals mentioned are mined in the Lonely Mountain which in real life would be geologically impossible.
- The height of Lonely mountain is from Tolkien Gateway site.
- I have played fast and loose with aging, Khuzdul, and the politics of men, elves, and dwarrow.
- I have place jokes and/or respectful nods to authors, movies, songs and more in each chapter. I’ll put in a hint at the beginning of each chapter and whomever guesses first will receive a picture of one of my four cats as a reward in the answer box. You may request Iduna, Po, Luna, or Mortimer. Your 1st hint is Georgette Heyer’s "These Old Shades".
- Darth Maul will not make an appearance!
