Bard came in next, followed by Bain and Tilda. Bard looked about, saw Sigrid sitting next to Fili and gave her a filthy look. She deigned to notice, but tossed her hair and went on eating, refilling Fili’s coffee cup as she did. Bain was in wide-eyed curiosity, as he had never seen such defiance in his sister or such impotent rage in his father. Tilda was gleefully unconscious of all enmity. Bard greeted everyone politely and shook Thorin’s hand, offering congratulations. Bain followed suit and Tilda happily hugged Thorin, then everyone else.

Bard seated himself next to Thranduil and muttered darkly. Thranduil twitched his face away from amusement to gentle concern.

The meal progressed and Ori glanced around.

“It’s so quiet with just the family at table!” Ori said, watching as Kili cut the yolks out of two eggs and looked through the whites at Tauriel, making her chuckle.

Thorin looked about the table. “Yes, but not really surprising since your eldest brother hasn’t arrived yet.”

The sitting room door crashed and they all heard Dain bellowing ‘good mornings’ to Mistress Dazla and her minions.

“Well, you can kiss your quiet away now, Ori,” Sigrid giggled.

Ori snickered.

“Not to worry. It was so fleeting, I doubt I’ll miss it.”

This amused the table and Thranduil cocked his head at Ori.

“Are we being complimented or maligned? I shall remain silent while presented with such uncertain ground.”

Dain exploded in and launched himself on Thorin, nearly knocking the pair of them sprawling across the table top.

“Yer king t’day, laddie. Yer gonna be th’ bloody High King a’ Dwarrow. This’s bloody brilliant!" Dain enthused. Once he released Thorin, Sculdis took her turn, hugging Thorin so hard, she nearly lifted him off his feet.

Thorin laughed, turned and greeted Stonehelm with a hug as well. Dori told Dain to sit and eat. Whereupon Dain plowed over to Dori, picked them up out of their chair and treated them to a bear hug with a good deal of shaking involved. Dori squawked and, having no other weapon handy, began ineffectually smacking Dain’s head with a teaspoon.

Dori oversaw the Iron Hills family settled and eating, then rose as Mistress Dazla arrived with a tray loaded with a teapot, a cup, a tankard of new milk, a serving bowl filled with hot porridge, a bowl of cream, and a platter of toasted bread with pots of honey and plum jam on the side. Dori withdrew to the meadow, delighting in wishing good morning to Beorn, who sat up, blinking, and inviting the skin-changer to breakfast. On seeing Dori, Beorn smiled and shambled over to sit on the patio paving stones.

Ori sighed. It was amazing that, in his element, Dori swept dwarrows, men, elves, and skin changers off their feet. With perfect grace, Dori seated themselves down on the brightly colored cloth Mistress Dazla placed over the paving stones and set the tray by Dori. Dori chatted pleasantly while Beorn ate, listening happily.

Ori, now of an elegant sufficiency, as Dori called it, looked about and allowed his brain to move towards practicalities of the day.

“When should we start getting ready, do you think?” Ori asked Thorin, who had also finished except for enjoying a cup of tea. “I have to meet with the other scribes before the ceremony, but only for a moment.”

“We have time,” said Thorin. “I have to go to the tombs after breakfast to leave the offerings, but that won’t take very long either.”

“We’ll go get dressed,” said Dwalin.

It was a very small party of mourners. Unlike a king's funeral, this was a more personal devotion, and far less formal. In the end, only Dwalin, Ori, Fili and Kili accompanied Thorin to the tombs, the guard detail following at a discreet distance.

"Are you expecting trouble?" Ori asked.

"Just a precaution," said Dwalin. “I know wha’ Garnet said, bu’ beloved king or no', if anyone wanted t' make a statement, killin' Thorin on his coronation day'd do it.”

Ori shivered.

The monuments lay deep in the mountain, below the forges, close to the mourning chamber. The party rode to the central lifts, then left their ponies with a guard. Once again Ori felt his stomach rise to his throat with the speed of their descent.

He had never been to the royal tombs, though he understood the layout was an orderly wheel of monuments, radiating in spokes from a great, central anvil and hammer of obsidian. He expected a dim, damp and rather sinister dungeon, with giant warrior statues, weapons at the ready, looming out of the shadows.

When the doors opened he realized he had read too many novels.

These were dwarrows, after all.

Every tomb was carved from a single block of alabaster marble. Each massive, oblong sepulcher differed in decoration, but each sat atop a bier surrounded by statues of armed warriors on permanent honor detail. Only the lids of the sepulchers were individual, some of different stone, or inlaid with mica and polished pyrite so they shone in the copious light that made the miraculous, long journey from the surface.

As they passed each tomb, Ori had to force himself not to stop and sketch it.

The only unnerving thing about the place was the ready stares of the stone warriors guarding each bier, perfect down to the folds of cloth and buckles on the armor.

"Each is carved from th' likeness of a guard who was servin' a' th' time, or o' family members," said Dwalin.

"Are you in here?"
Dwalin gave a soft laugh.
"Six times at last count. Yeh kin tell th' age a' th' tomb by how much hair I have left."

Thror's tomb, the most recent, was ringed with people Ori knew: Targ and Furh’nk among them. Even Frerin was represented.

"Tha's me mam an' da on either side o' Frerin," said Dwalin. "Thror asked 'em t' be there, since me da was his personal guard. They grew up t'gether."

"How did they manage all this since he died? This is unbelievably detailed," Ori asked.

"Th' figures're 'sketched in' when th' tombs being carved. Somethin' like this takes years. They've been workin' on Thorin's f'r a good fifty years already."

Thror's tomb was empty, Ori knew, except for the late king's second best armor and sword, the best having gone with him into the chasm.

But they didn't stop at Thror's tomb, as would have been traditional, but went to Thrain's instead. This tomb was empty as well, save for Thrain's second best armor and the pieces of his shattered sword, the only thing that Thorin had been able to carry back from Dimrill Dale. The warriors were all people Ori knew. He saw Dwalin immediately, as he must have looked before Ori was born, painfully young, with a great coxcomb of hair on his head. Ori bit his lip and turned his face into the real Dwalin's beard.

Dwalin stroked his hair.
"It's a'right, love."

"It's so sad."

"It's just hair, love."

Ori pulled back and stared at him. Dwalin winked.
"I know," said the warrior. "I'm a shithead."

"My shithead," Ori murmured, smiling up at him.

As they walked around the end of the tomb, they came to the figure of Thrain himself, not armed, but holding out a large tray. The tray was darkened in spots, with soot, and held offerings of polished stones to denote visitors. Kili brought a stone bowl filled with copal chunks, the incense the dwarrow had favored since it first came from the east about two hundred years before. He placed it on the stone and lit the incense, saying the offering prayer under his breath. Fili opened the box he had been carrying and pulled out a stunning metal wreath.

"That's beautiful," Ori breathed. "Thorin, did you make this?"

"Fili made it," said Thorin with a proud smile for his heir. "And I can't imagine anything finer."

Fili dipped his head, abashed.
"Thank you, Idad."

Every offering wreath was different. This one was quite eclectic, with a central open circle of interlocking, multi-rayed stars, radiating out to a ring of ravens, and each ravens held in its beak a small, many-spiked twig. Ori vaguely recalled seeing that twig shape somewhere, but couldn't place it. The whole wreath was fabricated out of varying tones of gold, and every flat surface was chased with geometric designs. It was quite substantial, though it was only about fifteen inches across.

"What are those bits in the raven's mouths?" Ori asked.

"Sprigs of rosemary, dipped in liquid gold," Fili replied. "Bilbo told me rosemary means 'remembrance'. When hobbits go back into the ground, mourners drop rosemary into the grave before it's filled in. It sounded like such a pretty custom, so I just 'dwarrowfied' it to make the sprigs permanent."

He handed the wreath to Thorin, who placed it so the incense-filled bowl sat in the middle of the opening. The smoke would eventually stop, the fire burn itself out, but the bowl and wreath would stay and the bowl be used again, whenever someone visited.

Thorin stood a moment longer, then laid his hand on the tomb and whispered something, then he stood back and turned to them, smiling.

"Let's go. It's time to put on funny clothes and act royal."

Ori and Dwalin bathed together and washed each other's hair. Ori sighed and reflected they could have had quite a lovely time if they weren’t on a schedule and both their heads weren’t full of duties. Dwalin chuckled him under the chin.

“Soon, love.”

“I know. How busy it is, being royal.”

Dwalin laughed.

“Aye, c’mon, I’ve got t’ get me soldiers in place an’ yer hair needs doin’.”

In the bedroom, both still naked, Dwalin lovingly put Ori’s hair in order and wove in all his braids with the bead and cuff boxes laid out on the dresser. Ori returned the favor and they took a moment to admire each other.

There was a knock and Dwalin sighed.

“Ready?”

“Yes. I love you.”

“Love yeh, too.” Dwalin smiled, kissed him, and headed to the bed to put his underwear on, calling, “C’mon in.”

Dipfa and Agrib entered. Agrib went forward and assisted Dwalin into his dress uniform. Dipfa looked Ori’s hair over, sighed rapturously, and went to the other side of the bed which had layers of white dust cloths on it. Under the first were the screaming blue underpinnings.

Ori walked gingerly out to the sitting room. Dipfa had shown him all the pockets in the scribe’s robe and helped him organize his tools, so they would be ready. Gridr had made him his own little waist desk as well. It was the same model as hers but she added in the things Ori had told her about. His desk was of a pale birch wood and the metals were of silver and decorated with emeralds. Ori admired it, as he strapped it into place, but he was nervous.

Omi and Loli came in and squealed with delight at the sight of him. They were in the scribe robes of the same cut as Ori’s except, where his had a plum hood, theirs were gray and had only one sliver strand ending in a star.

Mistress Dazla ushered into the sitting room Master Sadi, Master Kacuho, Master Nodun, and Miss Pafwi, who was substituting for Buj. Master Sadi crossed to Ori’s side. She bowed and smiled mistily at him.

“You look perfect, First Chair.”

“Thank you. I know we’ve discussed this at length and planned everything, but I’m still nervous.” Master Sadi laughed.

“Honestly, so am I. I was only an apprentice at Thror’s coronation and instructed not to dare put anything to paper as I was too untrained to notice such.”

Ori felt his brain focus.

“It is not to be that way this time. This is Thorin’s coronation. Any scribe may make notes or drawings and submit them.”

Master Sadi turned and flashed a look at Master Nodun and Master Kacuho. Both spoke to their ravens, who were gone immediately.

“Podvu will see to it,” Master Sadi assured Ori.

“Thank you,” said Ori. “This is a sight for all of us and the more eyes focused on it, the better the historical record.”

Loli, Omi and Pafwi beamed at him. Master Nodun was delighted and Master Kacuho had to apply his handkerchief to his eyes.

“I knew you were the right choice for First Chair,” Master Sadi grinned. “Shall we be on own way, First Chair?”

Despite feeling like he had transformed into a piece of furniture every time Master Sadi addressed him, Ori nodded and all headed out to the courtyard where Gibi held their ponies ready.

The main gate was wide to the day and banners for the coronation hung everywhere. Durin blue and silver bunting festooned the walls and statues. Ori entered the throne room and gaped. It was already packed with almost every dwarf and resident of Dale and the mountain. The furniture Binni had lovingly created was covered with elders and any with pains. There were several stools in the front for those who were hard of hearing and every dwarving and manchild was seated on the floor in the front so they would be able to see.

Ori caught sight of Mistress Dazla and her team hurrying about. He decided she must know a secret passage there, as she had been in the house when he and the scribes left it.

In the vestibule, Master Podvu handed out boxes of pens, bottles of ink, graphite pens, and notebooks to every scribe in the guild and sent them all over to watch, take notes and sketch. Ori went and thanked her. She grinned hugely at him and continued her frantic work. It was obvious she was loving every minute of it.

Master Sadi came to him.
“Ready, First Chair?”

“As I’ll ever be,” he replied. His heart was pounding, his nerves had vanished, and he only felt pure excitement. It was happening. Thorin was going to be crowned High King of All Dwarrow. It was happening right now.

He turned and nodded to his group. They formed up behind him as they had practiced. Master Sadi followed Ori. Behind her were Kacuho and Pafwi, then Omi, Loli and Nodun.

Master Brur stood at the entry way to do the announcements. Ori blinked. Brur looked very bright as he was dressed in silk orange robes with citrine.

“Master Brur, you look… well,” Ori greeted him.

Brur snorted.

“It’s all Sadi’s fault.”

Master Sadi turned to him with a cool, dubious look.

“A’right,” said Brur, “it’s me own fault. Happy?”

“We’ll see,” said Master Sadi.

“What happened?” Ori asked.

“I promised t’ wear clean robes with no ink on ‘em an’ she promised t’ f’rgive me no’ tellin’ her I still had copies a’ th’ scribes’ guide.”

“Eventually,” said Sadi.

Ori looked around once more and there, in the back corner, sitting on her haunches, was Fanny.
She wore a jaunty cap on her head that sported three tall, bright pink feathers on the top and tied with pink ribbons under her chin. Ori giggled in spite of himself. Thorin would be crowned with an oliphaunt present. Fanny was looking all about. She was quite intrigued by the cavern and all the goings on around her. She turned her head and saw Ori. Ori instinctively waved to her. Fanny, good oliphaunt that she was, didn’t move. She did however widen her eyes in joy and open her mouth. Her trunk raised, straightened, and the most impressive trumpet blast Ori had ever heard came out of her. The room was dead silent in an instant.

Ori blinked and after a quick glance behind him and seeing Master Sadi’s nod, Ori led the way to the dais. It was a very long way to the dais, Ori felt. His velvets whispered around him and his boots were deliciously comfortable. He enjoyed the feel of his heavy beads and braids, and the gems from his ear cuffs sparkled in the corner of his eyes, the chains swinging with every step. He felt the reassuring weight of the tassel of his hood, which was down around his shoulders. All the other scribes wore their hoods up, but there were privileges as well as burdens to his position. He giggled to himself. Apparently, showing off his ear jewelry was a perk of his job.

People turned and craned all around to look at the party of royal scribes arriving.

Ori processed to the dais, very glad they had worked out their placement ahead of time. The main level, three feet above the floor, stretched from one side of the hall to the other at the back, but narrowed to the center front to about half that width, with steps at every angle, flowing up from the floor and sometimes converging along their edges. The front edges of the dais were bejeweled facing the audience. Facing the throne, they were covered in angled mirrors. This gave Ori and Sadi
- and the king when enthroned - a chance to easily watch all the events form both sides. Where the stairs met, about halfway up the side of the dais, the meeting places created miniature platforms where Dwalin posted guards, handy and secure, but also out of the line of officials climbing and descending the dais. Even with a second platform for the throne, two feet above this, it left a lot of territory for the scribes to cover.

Nodun stopped about ten feet from the main dais and signaled to someone in the gallery. The artist’s chair was winched down on its sturdy chain to land gracefully before her. Nodun detached the desk from the seat, seated herself, fastened the lap belt and attached the desk to the arms. She waved again and was winched upward for the perfect overhead view.

Loli and Omi stayed on the ground floor, at the front and center of the dais, to either edge of the red carpet which ran the length of the hall.

Kacuho went to the front furthest side of the main dais on the left and Pafwi opposite him on the right.

Ori and Master Sadi stood beside the steps to the throne itself, Sadi standing to the left, while Ori went to the right, giving them raven’s eye views of all that happened from the throne all the way back to the door and along each side of the hall and into the galleries.

He had been concerned about Master Sadi climbing all those steps with her cane, and he even asked if she wouldn't prefer to be in the artist’s chair and let Kacuho or Pafwi take the left of the throne. Master Sadi stared him down like a hawk over a field mouse and he never mentioned it again.

When he was finally settled, he looked down and each scribe gave him a smile to signal their readiness. He saw Master Podvu had also posted at least two scribes in every gallery. He was so pleased. He knew she would know exactly where to place them. Ori saw many other scribes scattered through the crowd, marked by their distinctive hoods.

The trumpets played their volley.

Theoden, Theodred and three of their guard, entered the main gate on horseback. They dismounted at the entrance to the main hall. Brur standing at the doorway, bellowed their entry.

“All hail Theoden, King of Rohan, and his son and heir Theodred, Prince of Rohan.”

The crowd applauded and stared at them with great interest. Theoden nodded, smiled, and waved, every inch the seasoned, well-liked king as they processed up to the dais. They were followed by eight guards, the first of whom carried the standard of Rohan, which was a simple field of dark green with a stylized white horse.

All the children and badgers gaped at them. Theoden had a wonderful time waving to a few and patting the heads of those closest. His guards seemed to find the whole thing hilarious, their lips quivering as they climbed to the main dais and took their place upon the far left side of it, just short of Kacuho and a bit to the rear of him.

Theoden had looked a little askance at the arrangement, until Thorin explained that Kacuho needed to draw the front of them, not their backs.

Master Dubb brought the standard of Rohan up to stand behind the throne.

A moment or two passed then the trumpets sounded again and Brur’s voice boomed.

“All hail King Elessar of Gondor and his bride-to-be the Lady Arwen Undómiel, Daughter of Lord Elrond of Imladris, and they are accompanied by Captain Boromir, Royal Guard of Gondor.”

Aragorn rested one hand on Andúril, the other arm slightly extended for Arwen to place her hand as they paraded up the aisle.

Aragorn was dressed in light armor with a red velvet cloak swinging from his shoulders. The crown was a wrought plain band of gold with tall stylized feathers and the white tree at the front. Like Theoden, he had the air of a good, friendly king.

Arwen was in the palest green gown like the newest leaves on a birch. Her sleeves were pale green gauze tight to the elbows, then falling to great bells. The neck was a wide scoop with a tiny thread of glittering silver bordering it. Her hair was loose and waved. On her brow was the emblem of the star of the evening held with strands of silver about her head. Many long silver threads fell from it, weaving into her dark hair. Ori realized that her title of ‘The Evenstar’ was appropriate.

Captain Boromir followed them. He was also in light, golden armor, the great horn about his neck, his red velvet cloak matching his king’s and he was grinning from ear to ear. In his other hand, he carried the standard of Gondor, a great black flag with the silver of the White Tree of Minas Tirith.
shining on it. As they drew near, Arwen glanced up. She obviously saw Nodun’s chair but other than a brief look of confusion she continued to process with Aragorn.

They arrived at the dais and took their place upon the right side of it, nearest Pafwi and opposite Theoden. Ori glanced over at Arwen. Aragorn and Boromir were leaning slightly, probably listening to whatever she was telling them as Boromir handed off their standard to Dubb. Arwen glanced upward again. Both men glanced up discreetly as well. Arwen spoke quietly to Master Dubb, who grinned and Ori saw him mouth the word ‘scribe’.

Ori looked up and nodded to Nodun. Covered by his desk, he signed to Nodun in iglishmêk to show her sketch pad to the Gondorians. Nodun looked amused and peered over at the confused royals. All three looked up at her. She turned her large pad which had the beginnings of a sketch of the dais.

Ori tried not to giggle as the realization came to the three and then they nodded to each other, seeming impressed with the idea. Aragorn caught Theoden’s eye and nodded upward. The king of the horse nation tried to turn and glance up subtly, but his eyes widened as Nodun once more showed her sketch pad. Ori could tell she was giggling by now.

The trumpets sounded again and Fanny joined in.

“All hail Lord Elrond Peredhil of Imladris, his sons, Elladan and Elrohir, Master Lindir, and Lord Glorfindel,” bawled Brur.

Ori watched as Lord Elrond walked forward, looking pleased and a little amused. He wore long robe of purple on purple brocade with matching trousers beneath and black boots, over all was a long sleeveless gold vest. On his brow was a band made of twisted gold strands and at his throat was a similar gold brooch, the strands forming the emblem of the River Bruinen.

Elladan and Elrohir were dressed similarly to their father, but their robes were plain silver except for where the cuffs of the long sleeves folded back and showed silvery blue patterned linings. They were thoroughly enjoying themselves and looking around with great interest. Lindir, dressed in burgundy velvets, followed his lords, serenely bearing the standard of Rivendell, a blue field with the emblem of the evening star. Glorfindel swaggered after, clad in gold armor with a great sky blue cloak, his ornate golden helmet in his left arm. He grinned at everyone and waved to any and all.

When they reached the dais, Glorfindel stopped, looking up.

“Madame?” he called in a booming voice. “What are you doing up there?”

“Sketching the ceremony,” Nodun shouted back.

“Excellent!” Glorfindel approved loudly and followed Elrond, now looking tired, to their place beside Theoden who nudged Elrond and snickered. Elladan and Elrohir were intrigue by the sight of the highly placed artist.

Lindir attempted to hand Dubb his standard, but Glorfindel took it and told Dubb not to worry about it. Glorfindel held the pole of the standard point-first like a spear and it sailed over the throne to thunk perfectly in place in its stand.

Vi and Margr cheered, Elrohir and Elladan cheered. Lindir looked sick and Elrond closed his eyes tightly and sighed.

The trumpets and Fanny sounded.

“All hail Lady Galadriel of Lorien,” roared Brur. “And her husband Lord Celeborn.”

Ori stared. Lady Galadriel had forgone her usual white for a wreath of red roses in her hair and a long trailing gown of diaphanous blue with red roses on the bodice. She shifted up the aisle, smiling graciously on all. Celeborn was in white as usual and looked a trifle flummoxed by the sight of the oliphaunt sitting in the far corner. Haldir followed them carrying the flag of Lorien, a field of spring green scattered with golden leaves.

They went to stand beside the Gondorians.

Haldir held out his standard to Dubb, who muttered, "O' course, m'lord, unless yeh'd like t' try tossin' it?"

"I'll pass, thank you," said Haldir dryly.

The trumpets gave a double blast with Fanny’s help and Brur bellowed.

“All hail His Majesty, King Bard of the Dale, his daughter, Crown Princess Sigrid, his son, Prince Bain and his daughter, Princess Tilda. With them, His Majesty, King Thranduil of Erys Lasgalen, his sons, Prince Aewandinen and Prince Legolas, accompanied by Lady Tauriel, captain of King Thranduil’s guard.”

Bard and Thranduil appeared together, each followed by their offspring.

Bard wore a long, buckskin coat with brass buttons and a green suede collar and cuffs, and boots to match. Even his facial hair was spiffed up for the occasion, but Ori thought that, except for his gold earring, he was otherwise unadorned. Then the light caught the flash of metal on Bard’s finger.

When Thranduil appeared, the other elves all stared with huge eyes before quickly reassembling their usual calm expressions. Thranduil’s crown was plain enough, his raiment simple and understated, all the better to show off the necklace of starlight gems that fell down from his throat and over his shoulders and chest like a shiny collar. It seemed to Ori that Thranduil had altered his eye color to match.

Sigrid was radiant in a Durin blue floor-length underdress with elbow-length sleeves trimmed with gold and a rounded neckline, also trimmed with gold, and a sleeveless gold overdress that was open on top and closed just under the breasts. The overdress was trimmed brown silk cord and opened to flair out over her underdress. Her shoes were gold with tiny bows.

Bain, dressed like his father, was clean, his hair brushed, and his face told everyone he wanted to be somewhere else. He certainly didn’t seem to enjoy the attention as his father’s standard bearer. It was a very simple design, just a black arrow on a white field with a black border. Bain appeared to be hiding behind it, to no avail.

Tilda appeared in a golden brown dress with an orange pinafore and deep plum boots with her boot knife. Tilda’s braids, far more ornate than the two she generally wore, were threaded with ribbons of plum and threads of gold. She swanned down the aisle with her chin up, very much aware she was being watched by everyone in two cities and liking it.

Aewandinen, in silver, looked as though he’d rather be back in the forest. Legolas and Tauriel wore their uniforms. Tauriel carried the flag of the Greenwood, a field of spring green with a circle of silver leaves above a silver stag.

Margr and Vi, standing in a prime spot, on the aisle behind the children, squealed and clapped. “Ooooo, it’s jus’ like a weddin’!” Margr cried.

“Ooooo, and King Thranduil all in white! An’ them twigs and sparkles! Yeh cleaned up well, dear!”

Thranduil smiled sweetly and bowed. “Thank you, my dears, as did you!”

Margr and Vi roared with laughter and elbowed each other. “Such cheek!” Margr gasped.

“You both look lovely,” Thranduil asserted, his eye alight with humor.

“Don’t encourage them,” said Bard wearily.

“Oh, and King Bard! Very nice! Very smart, indeed.”

Brur, at the door, cleared his throat as if he were coughing up a lung.

“To continue,” he boomed.

Thranduil chuckled and he and Bard stepped up on the dais, Bard and his family just to the right of the steps and Thranduil and his sons just to the left of them. Bain looked very happy to surrender his burden to Master Dubb.

“All hail the House of In and the House of Ur,” Brur boomed

Oin came first with Binni on his arm. Ori was impressed. Binni was barefoot and wore a diaphanous scarlet robe, with nothing underneath. Clusters of rubies ostensibly obscured his bosom and crotch, but actually highlighted them. His hair was pulled back into one long, loose coil that spilled to the ground, the mithril tresses dotted with rubies. His finger and toenails were encrusted with opals surrounding solitaire rubies. Oin, in black velvet with rubies, matched Binni. Ori was quite sure that no one minded that they couldn’t see through Oin’s outfit. On Binni’s other side marched Bifur in his old armor and his great boar spear decorated with pennant of Durin blue with the seven stars.

Gloin followed with Gird on his arm. They were dressed in scarlet and gold. Gloin’s great axe hung on his back and Gridr’s gown trailed at least three feet behind her. Beside them were Bombur and Erda. Bombur looked amazing in a suit of copper colored velvet embroidered with golden branches and trimmed with rubbed leather. Erda was in a cloud of lace that looked as though it was made entirely of golden leaves.

Bofur and Jani followed, both with their mattocks strapped to their backs. Granny Klak walked between them, in a very conservative, deep blue gown that covered her from neck to wrists to shoes, her beard and hair severely rolled and a blue lace cap on her head. She carried a large, blue velvet fan tipped with feathers. Bofur wore his wedding clothes and Jani was in black with copper trim. Gimli and Randibur brought up the rear. Gimli somehow looking finer than he had at the dinner party. He also had a magnificent axe at his back. Randi looked a little nervous but he was well dressed in his family colors and his apprentice braid to the diplomatic trade guild was new in his hair, making Ori grin.

The two houses, joined by their relations with the House of Fundin and Durin, came forward and took their places on the left side of the throne, between Elrond’s party and Bard’s.

Ori saw Beorn come to the entrance, look around, then start to walk toward the dais.

Brur bellowed from slightly behind him,
“All hail Beorn, Lord of the Carrock!”

Beorn, not expecting this, reacted as though attacked. His shoulders hunched and the biggest bear ever seen in Arda stood on hind legs, snarling horribly.

“I told yeh, yeh had t’ be announced,” Brur argued.

The bear huffed with ursine exasperation, then dropped to all fours and moved up the aisle to the dais. Arriving there, he was instantly invited by every child and badger to sit beside them. The bear settled on the right side on the aisle and stretched out, allowing a large amount of young things to sit next to and on him.

The trumpets gave a great blast and Brur shouted.
“All hail Bearer Dori and Lord Balin of the House of Fundin, Advisor and Chief Diplomat to the High King of Dwarrow in Erebor.”

A cheer went up. Ori stared. He had never seen Dori or Balin look so fine as they did now, smiling and escorting each other up the great aisle.

Dori shimmered in a diaphanous white robe striped with tiny gems of every color possible. Their mithril hair was loose and full of tiny gems. A rainbow of gems decorated the fingers, wrists and arms, with mithril threads connecting them. Dori was barefoot with mithril anklets with bells. Ori almost giggled when he realized that Dori’s under-robe had been dampened to show off.

Balin, beaming with pride, was resplendent in his plum robes, hair and beard dressed with all colors of gems to match Dori. They processed up to the dais, smiling and greeting friends as they came forward. They went to the right of the throne and nodded around at everyone.

The drums began, a low rumble sounded beneath the buzzing of the crowd. The trumpets gave a fanfare this time.

Master Brur looked outside the room, made an extremely strange noise, and roared out.
“Representing the King of Beleghost and Head of Clan Rikanta. All hail Lord Buj and his betrothed, Mistress Dipfa of the House of Fa, Journeyman to Master Greneeld.”

Ori was expectant. Dipfa had told him that she had designed and made Buj’s coronation robes as well as her own. She had proudly told him hers would be a tribute to the woodland elves and their forest for the materials traded to the tailoring guilds.

Ori and everyone else stared.

Buj was arrayed in the royal colors of black and gold. There any resemblance to history and tradition ended.

Buj’s suit was all one piece, gold silk and velvet top to bottom, with black velvet trim. Over this he wore a short gold cape with a huge, long collar, the cape edged and fastened around his shoulders with thick gold braiding. His breeches were gold and tight-fitting to his knees where they sported side inserts of black satin so they belled out over his pointy-toed, gold boots. The hems of his breeches were trimmed with tiny hematite bells.
Around his stomach sat an enormous black belt with a huge gold buckle, studded with diamonds. His hair was blacked as usual but had been brushed into a high, rounded single curl that bowed way out from his forehead and the end curl bouncing on the back of his head.

Ori had barely recovered from this vision when he was assailed by the sight of Dipfa at his side. She was dressed entirely in paper. The paper was cream, embedded with leaves, flower petals, and grasses. The main dress was a large cone, all trimmed with dried flowers from the mountain, with sleeves of gold gauze with hematite carved bells. Her beard was a pyramid of rosettes in paper. Her hair was caught up in a tall paper spiral the top of which has one large gold paper rosette.

Ori glanced around the dais. The royal guests gaped at one another, openly stunned, the Ins and the Urs rumbled and elbowed one another, obviously pleased, and everyone else in the great hall sat and stood in a confusion of awe and disbelief.

Buj held his arm out straight from his shoulder and opened his hand. Dipfa laid her hand in his palm and they paraded forward with deep solemnity.

People stared and then began to cheer and clap. Whenever any complimented the pair, Buj answered in a loud clear voice of great depth.

“Thank you, thank very much”
“What is she wearing?” Bard hissed across the aisle.
“She’s wearing paper,” Thranduil hissed back. “She wearing the paper we use to pack fabric.”

The elf king’s eye slewed back at Ori.
“Did you know of this?”
Ori shrugged and whispered.
“She only said hers would be a tribute to you and your people.”
“Then it would depend on whatever color she thought would throw the burlap into symmetrical relief.” Ori didn’t giggle but he really wanted to. He thought she looked like the clapper in a bell, the wide hem swinging side to side. He had no idea how she would sit down in that thing. She’d crease terribly, and he didn’t even want to think about the paper cuts.

The fascinating pair arrived upon the dais and stood politely on the right side, by Balin and Dori, bowing in greeting to all. Tilda snuck away from her father and across the carpet to go and touch Dipfa’s dress. Dipfa was delighted and Buj nodded profoundly.

At the entry, Ori heard Dain’s voice.

The fanfare went off and Brur opened his mouth. Dain beat him to it, clad in gold armor with his huge gold helm on his head, striding in grandly with Sculdis on his arm.

“Good af’ernoon all! I’m Dain. I’m here from th’ Iron Hills with me delicate jewel of a bride, me Queen Sculdis!”

Sculdis dressed in brown furs, and velvets of gold and pink, her formal boar’s head hair-do topped with a crown of gold and rhodochrosite. She waved to everyone and shouted, “Hulllllloooooo!!”

“Aye,” Dain agreed at volume. “An’ we brought our wee Prince Thorin Stonehelm, yer Princes Fili’s an’ Kili’s own cousin!” Stonehelm, with a coronet of gold on his brow, looked resigned and amused.

“Come along now, our Chopper!” called Dain and they marched up the aisle. Chopper trotted after, oinking in delighted, his tail flapping happily. Attached to Chopper’s back was a contraption that fixed a tall pole, topped by the pennant of the Iron Hills, a brown field with a boar’s head on it, all sides edged in pink and gold striping.

Ori peered closely, then remembered.

The boar’s head stood out from the brown field in three dimensions. Ori had learned the head was salvaged from a hooked yarn rug that once graced Stonehelm’s crib as a blanket.

Dain took the opportunity to play politician, nodding and greeting everyone the length of the aisle. Queen Sculdis waved and called out to friends.

“Afternoon. Aye, I see yeh. Tonis, keepin’ well as usual.”
“Oi, King Dain!”
“Z’at yeh, our Gorr? I ain’t seen yeh in a raven’s age. Yeh look terrible!”
“So d’ yeh, yeh great puddin’!”
“I know! Ask me wife!”
They reached the dais and went up the steps.
“Bard, yeh clean up well,” Dain announced and patted all the Bardlings on the head though he did rather have to stretch with Bain.

“King Dain,” Bard managed, but everyone could hear the barely suppressed laughter in his voice.

“Woodland sprite,” Dain greeted Thranduil.

“Ugly goblin,” Thranduil replied with a teasing smile.

Dain roared with laughter and clapped the elf king on the elbow. Dain insisted on going ‘round and greeting all the people on the dais. He ended by springing up to the throne platform, bowed to Master Sadi, then ruffled Ori’s hair, but only a little, and planted a loud kiss on the top of Ori’s head.

“Yeh look a treat, wee brother.”

“Thank you,” Ori snickered.

Dain went to his place with his family. The standard was placed against the wall behind the throne and Chopper went down to the side opposite of Beorn the bear and received due tribute in petting and attention from the little ones.

The fanfare clarioned.

Brur called out,

“All hail King Gheir of the Stiffbeards and his Queens, Mavis I, Mavis II, Mavis III, Mavis IV and Mavis XV.”

King Gheir, resplendent in shades of turquoise and silver, marched forward, followed by his queens in a line of five followed by five soldiers, the middle one bearing the standard of the Stiffbeards which was a turquoise field with a silver hammer on it.

They were half way up, when there was a horrid noise then shouts of mingled disgust, rage, and laughter.

“Fuckin’ eh!” someone yelled in annoyance. “Some ane tell th’ bleedin’ oliphaunt no’ t’ fart in ‘ere!”

A brief look of rage crossed Gheir’s features, but he schooled himself quickly and smiled and nodded at the welcoming clapping going on.

Ori wanted to sink through the floor and laugh hysterically. He glanced around and saw that most people on the dais shared his problem. Galadriel had a hand over her mouth as her eyes danced in delight. Ori wondered if he should accuse her of talking Fanny into it.

The fanfare went off again and this time it was King Ahkn. He shouted greetings and rude remarks to all and gamely tottered up to the dais, where Thranduil solicitely gave him a hand up the steps.

The next trumpet blast announced King Ulfr and Prince Arne. Ulfr was pleased with the welcome but annoyed with the appreciative noises and offers of marriage made by several single maidens and dams towards Arne. Arne looked pleased and a little pink.

Snur was next and there was a cheer from the crowd for this popular king who waved, applauded his audience, and called greetings. Many of the Broadbeams in attendance had once left the Ered Luin in search of work and never gone back. They were delighted to welcome their king.

The trumpets sounded and Brur announced,

“All hail Queen Hild of the Blacklocks.”

Hild wore jewels, only jewels, all strung on a net of mithril silver, in the shape of a caftan from her bare shoulders to floor, cinched at the waist with the scabbard of the Black Tooth, the curving, obsidian ceremonial blade of the Blacklocks.

Ori knew from descriptions that the gown was an heirloom of her house, a mosaic of opals, moonstones, jet, and from her hips, front and back, a constellation of tiny black, blue-green, and turquoise stones, with a river of diamonds flowing through. Her braids had been plaited into one great braid that wrapped around her head like a crown in itself, moonstones and diamonds placed
A dam on the aisle turned to her friend and said, “Our Thorin gettin’ crowned or her?”

Aris followed in black armor covered in silver eternal knots. She came bare-headed, hair pulled back and up in topknot, which was a Blacklock warriors’ usual and only concession to the fact that this wasn’t intended to be bloodbath. She wore a great axe at her back, her helm clipped to her belt, and she carried the standard of the Blacklocks, the scarlet, orange and black.

They processed in great state up to the dais and took their places. This accomplished, everyone on the dais took five steps back.

Ori felt the entire room take a breath. Everyone was silent waiting, waiting.

Ori saw Tharkûn pat Brur on the shoulder, then scuttle off to stand beside Fanny. Ori had a feeling the old wizard was up to something but it must be something good. Perhaps he had invited some of his wizard friends to come and give their blessings on Thorin.

Ori grinned in delight as Princess Dis stepped forward and stood in the center of the entryway. She was radiant in a Durin blue tight sheath dress covered with a diaphanous black filmy material embroidered all over with mithril spiders and set with diamonds. The traditional black crown rose from her gathered hair like an open-work fan, draped with strings of diamonds, Rutile perched among them, likewise bejeweled, waving shamelessly with as many legs as she could spare without falling right off.

Dis was smiling, but tears sparkled in her eyes.

Ori peeped over and found Jani was smiling, too, but probably for a completely different reason.

Kili followed Dis, dressed in Durin blue and a green leaf trim which suited him very well. His bow and quiver rested on his back. On his brow he wore the crown of the second heir, a circlet of gold with emeralds. He grinned and held himself proudly.

Behind him came Fili, also in Durin blue with gold trim. His hair was loose but for the braids of the heir, and Thorin’s old crown of the mithril circlet with sapphires was on his head. He wore it now as Thorin had worn it the night before.

The trumpets sounded three times and,

“All hail to Dis, Princess Royal, and Prince Kili and Crown Prince Fili, the heirs of Durin!” thundered Brur. Cheers rang through the cavern and echoed off the walls.

Fanny trumpeted in delight, making them laugh as they processed up the aisle. They took their places beside the throne and Ori felt his heart jump as the trumpets began the Call to Kingship.

Above this clarion call, Brur roared,

“All hail to Thorin II, son of Thrain, direct in the line of Durin unbroken. All hail to High King Presumptive of All Dwarrow. All hail!”

“All hail!” roared the crowd and the cheering began anew. The noise was so loud this time, it drowned out the trumpets and Fanny.

Thorin walked forward. He wore a Durin blue velvet tunic and leggings under a metallic blue breastplate decorated with the anvil and seven stars. Over all this he wore a generously cut black coat. The coat was his prerogative, instead of a cloak, since he was a sword wielder and preferred to keep his arms free. His sword, in its sheath, hung at his hip. His tunic collar and hem and his coat cuffs and tails were embroidered with mithril threads into stylized spider webs. He was bare-headed, his hair hung loose and unbraided. He wore no jewelry, but for a single iron ring, and not even his signet. Ori had learned the iron ring was one of Fili’s earliest efforts in the forge.

Dwalin followed, carrying the standard of all dwarrow, his eyes flicking all about the room, alert to everything.

The noise was so loud, Ori half wondered if Thorin had to push against it to reach them. Thorin smiled and nodded to all. As he came to the dais, he stopped and bowed to all the children on one side then the other. Ori heard him say, “For all of you are also all our heirs. I salute you.” He greeted each of his royal guests and turned to stand a few feet before the throne. Dwalin planted the standard of Erebor in its stand carved into the floor before the throne. Dwalin then stood before it, both axes drawn as the protector of the throne of Erebor.

The cheering was still going on. There were appreciative yells, shouts of blessings and many dwarrow had broken into songs of the greatness of the line of Durin. Balin finally stepped forward and waved his arms to quieten everyone down. As the noise petered out, Thorin said, “Thank you all.”

Someone called, “Very nice, our Thorin, suits yeh.”

Thorin chuckled and called out, “Thank you.”

Thorin turned to Balin. “Are we ready?”

Balin nodded and-

There was the most terrible screeching noise at the entrance of the mountain and everyone turned.

The noise was a sledge, careening up the entryway toward the throne room and pulled by the largest rabbits Ori had ever seen. It slewed to the cavern’s entrance and scraped to the stop.

The tiniest man Ori had ever seen jumped from the sledge, dressed in a mix of brown clothing and bits of tree, waving a staff of miraculously leafy oak with a crystal atop.

Before the guards could react, Tharkûn hopped over to the entryway with a shout of “Radagast, my old friend, you made it!”

“Of course, of course! Why do you always doubt me?”

“Because you’d forget your own head if it wasn’t sewn on.”

“True, yes,” called Radagast. “Now, where was I? Oh, yes. King Thorin!”

“Master Wizard?” Thorin asked for all to hear, a little uncertainly.

“Oh, don’t look at me like that! I’ve brought you a present.”

He reached into the sledge and pulled out a wriggling package of red and green, lifting it high into the air.

“Idad Thorin!” Frodo shrieked from Radagast’s arms and waved to them. In a dream, Thorin waved back, his face alit with joy.

Radagast popped Frodo on his feet as Tharkûn helped Bilbo out of the sledge.

Brur looked them over and grinned wider than Ori had ever seen him do.

“Professor Baggins?”

Bilbo pulled straw from his hair.

“Yes, you have the advantage of me, sir.”

“Brur, Librarian a’ Erebor.”

“Well! I never! It’s an honor, Master Brur.” He bowed.

“Honor’s mine. Please, allow me t’ announce yeh.”

“By all means, Master Brur. Very kind.”

Brur turned and roared out,

“Tharkûn the Gray, Radagast the Brown, Professor Bilbo Baggins, late a’ th’ Shire, an’ his nephew, Frodo Baggins.”

They came forward followed by all Radagast’s rabbits.

“An’ a butt load a’ bunnies,” Brur finished.

At the name ‘Baggins’ the crowd gasped and whisperings became buzzing and Margr’s and Vi’s voices could be heard. People started casting gold dust over them as they walked. Someone called out “Hobbits like flowers!” Flowers came unbound from hair and hats and flew through the air to land – mostly – at the hobbits’ feet. A few weeds and things sail over them occasionally.

“Wow, this is a really long room!” Frodo said, looking about.

“Eh?” Radagast asked. “Hold up.”

He picked Frodo up and plopped him on the back of the nearest rabbit.

“Now, hold tight.”

Bilbo said, “Radagast, what are you-“

“Giddyap!” Radagast shouted and smacked the rabbit on the rump. The rabbit, and Frodo on its back, bounced off toward the dais.

“That can’t be safe!” Bilbo cried. “He’ll fall and break his head!”

“These are Roscobal Rabbits. Would never happen!”

“Never?”

“Maybe, on occasion.”
Fortunately for Bilbo, as the rabbit skittered to a halt at the top step of the dais, Thorin swept forward and rescued Frodo from his bunnyback ride. Frodo shouted his delight at seeing Thorin again and Ori knew it was pure reflex that Thorin laughed and swung the faunt high over his head before bringing him to his shoulder.

Bilbo came running up the rest of the aisle, a shower of gold flying out behind him like a cape while yet more gold dust cascaded over him. He was quite speedy, Ori realized. Of course, those feet weren’t just for show. Bilbo skidded to a halt before Thorin and looked up at him, slightly out of breath from running and from relief. Thorin automatically extended his hand to welcome Bilbo up on the dais.

“Bilbo.”

“Hullo, Thorin,” said Bilbo. “You’re awfully shiny.”

“Welcome to my coronation. I see you’ve been er…blessed.”

“Yes. Peculiar custom you Erebores have. Do this to everyone, do you?”

Vi’s voice sung out over the crowd.

“Only f’r th’ future consort!”

The assembled crowd began to cheer again and shout about the ‘Consort of Erebor’. Bilbo stared up at Thorin and hissed, ‘What?’

“Not my fault.” Thorin whispered desperately. “I didn’t say anything to them.”

“Then where did they get the idea?”

A caw swept over them and Roäc landed on Thorin’s other shoulder.

“So kiss already,” said Roäc, rolling his eyes.

Frodo stared at the raven.

“Uncle Bilbo, it talked!”

Thorin closed his eyes tightly.

“The trick is getting him to Shut. Up.”

“Now, be nice,” said Roäc. “I am a king, too.”

“King of pain, yes. Bilbo, Frodo, this is Roäc, King of the Ravens of Erebor. Roäc, Bilbo and Frodo Baggins, not your next victims.”

“May I pet you?” Frodo asked, already half reaching for the raven.

Roäc craned his neck to look over the faunt and seemed to shrug.

“Cute nestling. Go ahead. Don’t muss any feathers.”

“You’re beautiful,” said Frodo.

Roäc preened.

“Thank you for saying so, I rarely get noticed.”

Thorin coughed in surprise and disbelief. Bilbo chuckled.

Fili said, loudly, “Roäc does have a good point.”

“Yeah,” agreed Kili at volume, “kiss already.”

“Kiss,” shouted Glorfindel in chorus with Margr and Vi.

The crowd took up the shout, which turned into a chant.

“Kiss! Kiss! Kiss!”

Thorin looked horrified.

Bilbo started to giggle.

“I didn’t mean this to happen,” Thorin said helplessly under the shouting.

“Well, there’s only one way to get them to stop,” said Bilbo.

“Sudden elopement?”

“Nothing that neat, I’m afraid. You’re a little shiny to just sneak away. You’ll just have to kiss me.”

Thorin bent his head, Bilbo leaned up and they did so. Frodo cheered and the crowd followed suit.

Radagast said to Tharkûn, “This is the most entertaining coronation I’ve ever attended. Will there be jugglers next?”

“I believe they’re scheduled for dinner,” said Tharkûn.
“Oh, good. I do like jugglers!”
Bard said, “I’m glad I don’t have to kiss anyone at my coronation.”
Thranduil smiled sweetly. “Wait.”
Bard turned pale.
Ori swore as he broke yet another pen nib and grabbed up his fourth. He signaled Omi to find him a new box of nibs. She grinned and hauled one out of her satchel, waving it triumphantly, before chucking it to him. He caught it and fixed the new nib in place and continued to write.
Thorin held Bilbo a little away from him and smiled, “I thought you would miss this day. I have never been so wrong.”
The cheers rose anew. Balin waved his arms again, almost flapping in his impatience. Dis took Frodo on her hip and Dori put an arm about Bilbo and drew the hobbit to stand with the family, all the while whispering, “Plenty of time to snog later, dear.”
Balin stood at the front of the dais and beckoned Thorin forward. Thorin stood and faced his people. Balin placed his hand on Thorin’s shoulder and Thorin sank to his knees before all assembled.
“Thorin, son of Thrain, Second Thorin of the line of Durin unbroken,” intoned Balin, “you place yourself before us to be crowned High King of Dwarrow. By the unbroken line of Durin and Mahal, our maker, and his beloved wife, Yavanna, do you swear to uphold the honor of your people?”
“I so swear.” Thorin answered clearly.
“Do you swear to follow the ways laid down by the first Durin, Durin the Deathless, given to him by Mahal, and lead your people in them?”
“I so swear.”
“Do you swear that all children of Mahal shall be precious to you and be under your protection as their king?”
“I so swear.”
Balin nodded to Dori. Dori stepped forward, carrying the new crown. Dori stopped beside Thorin, opposite Balin, and touched the crown all over and murmured over it, casting the Blessings of the Bearer, Ori decided. Dori paused, looked at Thorin then back at Bilbo then fixing their eyes on Thorin’s, leaned over the crown again, where only those on the dais could see, licked, then put the entire fire opal into their mouth. Balin colored a little as did Thorin. Pleased with this effect, Dori, with a fluttering of eye lashes, held the crown above Thorin’s head and, with Balin, placed it on Thorin’s head.
Silence punctuated by soft cries and gasps as, slowly, Balin and Dori raised Thorin to his feet. Everyone stared round eyed and stunned at their new king.
“Thorin II of Erebor, High King of All Dwarrow,” announced Balin.
Thorin smiled and bowed to all.
“I salute you, my people. I am forever at you service.”
There was a roar of cheers, weeping, and shouts of “Long Live The King!” and “Long Live King Thorin III!”
Ori couldn’t stop himself from cheering, too, as he scribbled maniacally. Dori and Balin braided Thorin’s hair into the two braids of the high king. Dis stood by, holding the bead box; she was laughing and crying. Thorin beamed at her and leaned over to kiss her cheek. Fili and Kili stood next to her, grinning and wiping their eyes on their sleeves.
Ori noted that the visiting rulers were also very touched by the ceremony. Theoden King blew his nose like a foghorn and Bard seemed to have something in his eye. Aragorn and Arwen embraced each other, her head against his cheek, both their face’s tear-stained. Dain and Snur cried like badgers, leaning on Sculdis, who was sniffing a great deal. Hild looked like she was melting into a happy puddle. Gheir was mopping his face with a handkerchief and all the Mavi were in tears. Ahkn and Ulfr and Arn were singing an old khuzdul prayer. Elrond, Thranduil and Lady Galadriel seemed to be shimmering.
Everyone by the throne stepped back and Ori felt the vague hum and vibration from under the floor as a block of tiles separated from the rest, sunk and slid aside and the first anvil of Durin, called the Great Forge of Durin, rose on a plinth of pinkish sandstone. The plinth was about a foot high, three feet across, and inscribed upon the surface was the single rune mark ‘Durin’.

This was the original first ‘door’ carved into Erebor to begin the mining.

Thorin, now before the throne in the center of the dais, drew his sword and laid the point upon the anvil before him. He spoke the ancient words.

“I hereby swear upon this forge, my oath to serve and protect the children of Mahal. Those who would stand with me and hail me their king come forward and give me your oath of loyalty.”

Kili was neatly lifted out of the way and aside and Fili more or less run over as Dain bounded forward first.

“Outa me way! I been waitin’ me whole life f’r this, an’ I ain’t playin’ nice!” He hefted up his great axe and brayed, “I, Dain, son o’Nain, o’ th’ unbroken line o’ Durin, hearby swear upon His forge, me oath o’ loyalty t’ Thorin II, High King o’ Erebor an’ All Dwarrow. An’, laddie, I give yeh me personal oath o’ friendship an’ loyalty as yer kin.”

The blade of his great axe rested on the anvil.

“Thank you, Dain, son of Nain,” said Thorin with a twinkle. “Your oath is accepted, and your loyalty is as treasured as your friendship is annoying.”

“Aye, then me duty here’s done,” Dais remarked genially.

Snur was next in line, though he looked like he wasn’t sure he dared cut ahead of Hild.

“Ladies first?” he asked.

“Oh, just move your arse, Chatty,” Hild sighed with exasperation. “You’re holding up progress.”

“If ya insist, and I know ya do.” He stepped forward his mattock at the ready. Even from where he stood, Ori could see it was a real and well-used tool, polished for the occasion.

“I, Snur, son of Orur, King o’ Broadbeams, hearby swear me oath ta serve an’ protect all o’ Mahal upon Durin’s forge. I give ya me oath o’ loyalty, Thorin II, High King o’ Erebor an’ All Dwarrow.”

Snur rested the point of his mattock on the anvil.

“Thank you, Snur, son of Orur, your oath is accepted, and your loyalty treasured.”

“What, I’m not as annoyin’ as Dain?” Snur teased.

“Practice makes perfect,” said Thorin without missing a beat.

“I, Gheir, son of Jheir, King of Stiffbeards, hearby swear my oath to serve and protect all of Mahal upon Durin’s forge. I give you my oath of loyalty, Thorin II, High King of Erebor and All Dwarrow.”

Gheir rested the point of his sword on the anvil and Thorin accepted his oath.

“I, Ahkn, son of Dohkn, King of Stonefoots, hearby swear my oath to serve and protect all of Mahal upon Durin’s forge. I give you my oath of loyalty, Thorin II, High King of Erebor and All Dwarrow.”

Ahkn rested the point of his warhammer on the anvil.

“I, Ulfr, son of Mofr, King o’ Ironfists, hearby swear my oath to serve and protect all of Mahal upon Durin’s forge. I give you my oath of loyalty, Thorin II, High King of Erebor and All Dwarrow.”

Ulfr rested the blade of his fighting axe on the anvil.

“I, Hild, Daughter of Zild, Queen of Blacklocks, hearby swear my oath to serve and protect all of Mahal upon Durin’s forge. I give you my oath of loyalty, Thorin II, High King of Erebor and All
Dwarrow.”

The point of her curving obsidian blade rested on the anvil and, as with all the others, her oath was accepted.

Buj stepped forward and then seemed to realize, along wth everyone else, that he did not have a weapon. With unshaken calm, Dipfa stepped forward. Digging in her matching paper satchel, she fished out the dagger Dain had presented to Buj on their first meeting. Somewhere along the way it had gained a crocheted leather thong sheath with a foot-long, multicolored chain tassel at the tip. Buj thanked her solemnly and she stepped back, Buj took the dagger and laid the silver tip on the anvil.
“I, Buj, representing the King of Belegost and Head of Clan Rikanta of the unbroken line of Durin, hereby swear my oath to serve and protect all of Mahal upon Durin’s forge. I give you my oath of loyalty, Thorin II, High King of Erebor and All Dwarrow.”

The cheering started again as the oath-takers all bowed deeply to Thorin then smiled at each other, clearly enjoying this moment. The cheer stopped abruptly as Aragorn stepped up to the ring of dwarrow monarchs. He drew his sword and saluted Thorin with a bow.

“I, Elessar, King of Gondor salute you Thorin, High King of Dwarrow. May our people always come together in friendship and give one another help and succor when needed. You have my sword, my friend.”

Thorin’s eye lit up and he bowed to Aragorn, even as the people murmured in amazement. No one had heard such words as these under this mountain.

“I, Thorin, High King of Dwarrow, salute you, Elessar, King of Gondor. May our people always come together in friendship and give one another help and succor when needed. Your war cries will be followed with the sound of Du Bekâr, my friend!”

Theoden King bounded forward next with a bow and a raised shield

“I, Theoden, King of Rohan salute you, Thorin, High King of Dwarrow. May our people always come together in friendship and give one another help and succor when needed. You have my shield, my friend.”

Thorin was grinning now.

“I, Thorin High King of Dwarrow, salute you, Theoden, King of Rohan. May our people always come together in friendship and give one another help and succor when needed. Your war cries will be followed with the sound of Du Bekâr, my friend.”

Thranduil stepped up on the dais, smiling. The undercurrent of murmuring from the crowd rose to a wave.

“I Thranduil Oropherion, King of the Sylvan Elves of Erys Lasgalen salute you, Thorin, High King of Dwarrow. May our people always come together in friendship and give one another help and succor when needed. You have my bow, my friend.”

“I knew he’d choose the bow,” Kili cried in the background.

Thranduil grinned and bowed,

“I, Thorin High King of Dwarrow, salute you, Thranduil, King of Sylvan in the Greenwood. May our people always come together in friendship and give one another help and succor when needed. Your war cries will be followed with the sound of Du Bekâr, my friend.”

Lady Galadriel came forward and smiled on Thorin

“I, Galadriel, Lady of the Golden Wood salute you, Thorin, High King of Dwarrow. May our people always come together in friendship and give one another help and succor when needed. You have my wisdom, my friend.”

Thorin bowed to the Lady. “I, Thorin High King of Dwarrow, salute you, Galadriel, Lady of the Golden Wood. May our people always come together in friendship and give one another help and succor when needed. Your war cries will be followed with the sound of Du Bekâr, my friend.”

Bard was the only one left. He cleared his throat as he stepped forward and bowed.

“I salute you, King Thorin, as Bard, King of the Dale. You’ve already saved our skins more than once and are being more than kind to us. Most monarchs I’ve ever heard of would have just taken over, but you didn’t. We thank you for this and hope that we will always be the best of friends and neighbors. If you need anything, well, you know where we are.”

Thorin smiled,

“King Bard, your words mean a great deal to me. We are good friends and neighbors and, I think, border on family. And, Brother King, if you need anything, you know where we are.”

Beorn rose carefully from his place on the floor, so as not to dislodge any of the badgers. He bellowed and grunted sincerely to Thorin, nodded, and lay back down.

Thorin bowed.

“Thank you, Beorn, I will strive to be worthy of your faith.”

Ori realized every royal guest who was not dwarrow had pledged friendship to them. This was huge. This was the greatest thing that had ever happened anywhere. He had just seen all the major rulers of Arda come together and declare friendship and assistance to the high king of dwarrow. He was almost panting as he wrote.

“Hurray,” shouted Frodo and this set off the cheering again and the shouting and the singing. On the dais, there was a great deal of hugging, clasping of arms, bowing, and hand shaking. Dwalin knelt before Thorn and gave his oath as the king’s protector. His gruff voice choked a little over the words. Thorin clasped his shoulders, raised and embraced him. Ori took a moment from his notes to descend the steps and clench Bilbo in a warm hug.

“It’s so good to see you again, Bilbo!” Ori cried. “I’ve so much to tell you and loads of things I want to ask you!”

Bilbo laughed. “And I’ve got plenty to ask and tell you, too!”

Thorin finally freed Dwalin, nodded to Ori and reached for Bilbo and swung Frodo onto his back, where Dis helpfully used a scarf from one of the scribes to form a little sling seat, so the faunt would be comfortable. Dwalin slid his arm about Ori. Ori, still writing on the lap desk, stood on tip-toe to kiss his husband’s cheek. They exchanged a look of love then Balin called out.

“All those who wish to pledge their loyalty may now do so.”

Protocol dictated that Thorin turn and ascend to the throne, to sit and hear the oaths from the people at the foot of the dais.

Ori gasped.

Instead of ascending, Thorin, with Bilbo at his side, stepped down from the dais to greet anyone who wanted to approach him on the same level. Dwalin swore under his breath and in a trice was behind Thorin with Targ and Furh’nk. They didn’t hold people away, just made sure Bilbo and Thorin were not crushed by the enthusiasm shown them. Ori realized his place, leapt from the dais, slithered under Dwalin’s arm to stand next to Bilbo, pen at the ready, taking down names of loyalties pledgers and watching Bilbo’s face as he was slyly referred to as ‘Consort’.

Someone wormed their way up to Thorin, someone obviously so small that Ori couldn’t see who it might be. He could follow their progress by the jostling and laughter of the older dwarrow in their path. Thorin paused and waited for the figure to arrive.

There stood a dwarf badger, a dam. Ori thought she looked familiar. Unlike everyone else she was not dressed to the nines, she was in the uniform of the new primary school that had opened in Dale. She looked up very seriously at Thorin. Ori drew in a tearing breath as he realized who she was. Thorin looked her over then smiled.

“Greetings, Caris daughter of Nadaris. Thank you for attending my coronation.”

Caris nodded and held out her hand. Thorin offered his own, open palmed. Into this, Caris dropped the mithril bead Thorin had given into her keeping as his promise to her people back in the mines.

“You kept your word,” she said simply, then looked up, her eyes full of tears. “Thank you. Mam isn’t hungry and hurting anymore.”

She began to sob, Thorin dropped to one knee and embraced the badger.

“It is my life work to see that none of you are hungry and hurting any more, Caris. Ever though you have decided our bargain is done, I will never stop working on this. Thank you for reminding me of who I am.” He patted the badger and rose. Bilbo applied a hankie to her face, murmuring gentle nothings. Thorin bowed deeply to Caris. “I am always at your service.”

Caris smiled.

“What is this you’re wearing? Bilbo asked. “I do like this shade of blue.”

“It’s my school uniform, sir.” Caris gave a toothy grin. “I’m the best speller in my class.”

“Spelling is very important,” Bilbo acknowledge gravely. “Well done!”

Caris grinned again, became suddenly shy, giggled, and plunged back into the crowd. Thorin really didn’t have to move much as the crowd had sorted itself into orderly lines on both side of the aisle and, after they spoke to Thorin, moved off to admire and, if they felt up to it, greet the other rulers.

Ori was thoroughly enjoying this when suddenly a horrid, scraping female voice screeched, “Let me in! I demand to see him!”
Frodo screamed and tried to clench his arms about Thorin’s throat. Thorin whisked him to his front and held him close to his chest as Bilbo clutched Thorin’s left arm in cold fear. Thorin drew his sword.
There, in the opening of the great doors, stood a tiny, hideously dressed figure, face like a storm. “Lobelia Sackville-Baggins, what are you doing here?” Bilbo shouted. She laughed in nasty triumph. “I was invited!”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yay, Thorin’s king and Bilbo’s here and what in Mahal’s name is Lobelia doing here? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“Great Mahal!” Binni cried. “What is she wearing?”
“Lake gull vomit,” called Nori’s voice from somewhere behind the throne.
“Clash, clash, clash!” Binni raged.

The ravens descended on her in a mass.

Ori remembered what happened to Frerin, and was surprised when, far from smashing the hobbit to the ground, they seized her in their talons and swept her, screaming, up into the air.

It was quite a spectacle. The ravens did swoops and banks and loop-the-loops under the high ceiling of the throne room, flying in an amazingly tight formation and quite oblivious to what Lobelia was calling their mothers.

A strange male hobbit bumbled through the doorway and ran about under them, waving his finger at them ineffectually, demanding they stop this instant and put his wife down or he would be forced to become quite cross.

The assembled dwarrow and men clapped and cheered. Every elf had their eyebrows at their hairlines. This was something they simply were not prepared to deal with no matter how many thousands of years old they might be.

One dam turned to another and said, “First the Bearer dances an’ ol’ Thror drops dead, then there’s an animal act at the funeral and the king goes careening down into the ground to his reward, an’ now ‘n oliphaunt an’ flyin’ hobbits!”

“The Durins put on th’ best shows!” her friend agreed.

Ori thought he was going to pass out. Bilbo arriving suddenly was delightful but this mess was going to throw everything out of kilter and off schedule.

Fili and Kili jumped up and down, cheering along with the other young royals, while the older dwarrow royalty looked as though they were developing headaches. Thorin, sword still at the ready, held Bilbo, who clutched Frodo, who was trying to see what was happening. Dwalin and his guards stood ready, all arms at point but unflustered as the ravens seemed to have things well in claw.

While Lobelia was tumbling end over end, something fell out of her mouth and plummeted to the ground. A black, blockish thing landed like a hunched spider. It was about the size of a gold ingot, with dozens of little tentacles, none of which seem to help propel it in any direction. The crowds drew back, disgusted by whatever it was but Tharkûn hurried over and squished it flat with his staff. It dissolved with a squeak like a leaky wineskin.

Silence.

Thorin, still with his sword at the ready, came over with Bilbo and Frodo, the guards shadowing them.

“What is that thing?” Bilbo asked, grimacing

“That was a barrowwight,” said Tharkûn.

“What? That?” Bilbo leaned over it, obviously not convinced. “It looks like a sad little oil slick. Barrow-wights are huge monsters in flowing, tattered cloaks.”

“No, those are just costumes.”
“Costumes? Really?”
“Costumes, Tharkûn?” Thorin had an eyebrow raised in disbelief.
“Of course!” Tharkûn snapped, annoyed at the lack of trust in his dictum. “How frightening would they be if everyone knew that they really looked like melted xocolatl bars?”
“Xocolatl bars look good,” Kili protested, arriving on the scene with the other royals. “Who’d pick up that and eat it?”
Tauriel tried and failed to maintain her soldierly decorum. She gave it up in a fit of giggles.
The ravens circled once more then swooped low to drop Lobelia unceremoniously on the floor, a little away from Thorin and Bilbo. Ori saw Loli and another scribe leap forward and immediately sketch the unconscious hobbit female.
Oin blustered forward.
“Is it safe to touch?” he growled.
“Oh, yes,” Tharkûn said. “Just fainted for now.”
The wizard leaned over the small mess on the floor, and touched it with the point of his staff. It burst into a puff of flames and vanished away.
Oin stamped over to Lobelia, followed by Granny Klak, who, intrigued, proffered her vinaigrette.
Oin stuck this roughly under Lobelia’s nose. The hobbit lady squawked, then slowly came to as Dori and Galadriel hurried forward, giggling, and sprinkled drops of water on her face as Granny Klak fanned her vigorously. Lobelia made a disgusted noise and rolled over on her side.
“She’s alright,” Oin said and went away, no longer interested.
Lobelia sat up, staring at Galadriel then Granny Klak then Dori and looked utterly confused. She turned her head and saw Bilbo.
“Oh, cousin! The last thing I - Oh!”
“Ohh!” cried her husband, and he ran behind a thick curtain of bunting and was audibly ill.
“I beg your pardon, Bilbo,” Lobelia said, rather muddled. “I have no idea where I am.”
She was assisted to her feet by Lady Klak, who told Dori in no uncertain terms that a Bearer shouldn’t touch it.
“I canoodled with a barrow-wight!” the husband groaned, staggering back to them.
“Oh! What are you talking about? I don’t spank you that hard.”
“Mrs. Sackville-Baggins, what is the last thing you remember?” Tharkûn asked.
“Scolding Lotho - that’s my son - for wandering off with his friends. Delinquents! Every last one of them! They were gone for days. I was frantic. Then they came skipping back, bold as you please, tracking all that dirt into my smial and he still wouldn’t tell me where he went. He just smirked and bent all my teaspoons!”
“My teaspoons,” Bilbo muttered dangerously.
“And then he dumped out the sugar bowl on the floor and told me my tea tasted like dirty washing-up water!”
Bilbo winced.
Frodo, owl-eyed, gasped, “That’s so naughty!”
“And when I scolded him he opened his mouth impossibly wide and that’s the last thing I remember.”
“Your mouth was open?” Tharkûn asked.
“Of course it was,” Bilbo said, aside.
“Where did you say we are?” Lobelia asked, looking around in distaste.
“Erebor, the Kingdom of the Dwarrow,” Tharkûn said, “in the north of Rhovanian.”
“Never heard of it,” she sniffed. “And you are?”
“I’m called by many names, some of them rather impolite. Here, I am called Tharkûn.”
“Are you a lord or something?”
“I’m a wizard.”
Lobelia drew back a little. Never taking her eyes off Tharkûn she asked, “Otho, where is Lotho?”
“Perfectly safe, my flower. I left him with his Grandmother Bracegirdle.”
Lobelia and Bilbo shuddered simultaneously.
“I wouldn’t call spending time with my mother ‘safe’,” said Lobelia. “How did we get here? Did we hire a carriage? Do you suppose we’ll be home by tea time?”

Otho patted her hand.
“Best not to inquire too closely about how we traveled, dearest. I doubt your delicate constitution would bear it. Mine certainly hasn’t.”

“But,” she ordered, “straighten your weskit and go brush your teeth.”

Bilbo said, “So, Gandalf, am I to infer that all this misery was caused because Lobelia was possessed by a barrow-wight? One that had first possessed her son and then, vacated the premises, so to speak, when a better situation – er - opened up?”

Lobelia threw him a filthy look, apparently taking exception to being described like a furnished room.

Tharkûn shrugged.
“It happens. I suppose I’ll be off to the Shire shortly to sort the rest of them out. I don’t know if there’s more than one of those creatures. They don’t tend to travel in packs or anything. I like to think there’s a reason for the rest of the hobbits to go along with her insanity other than being pathetic sheep.”

“Do you think there is?” Bilbo asked skeptically.

“Would any hobbit in their right mind skip tea to march on their neighbors with torches and pitchforks?”

“I see your point,” mused Bilbo. “Besides, the torches would make their weskit’s all sooty.”

Galadriel smiled sweetly at Tharkûn.
“I’ll go with you, Mithrandir.”

“Very good of you, my lady,” said Tharkûn.

“Yes,” said Celeborn dryly. “Her goodness is unbelievable.”

“But not before we’ve finished here.” Lady Galadriel beamed at Thorin and Bilbo.

“Righty-oh,” Tharkûn agreed, then “Radagast, old fellow, once the hobbits have finished visiting, would you see them home?”

“Eh? Absolutely. Plenty of room in the sled.”

Lobelia said, “A sled? In this weather?”

“It’s a bunny sled,” said Frodo, still partly hiding behind Thorin’s beard.
“Two sleds pulled by rabbits?” gasped Lobelia.
“I’m allergic to rabbits,” Otho whined.

Radagast looked amused at the two out-of-place hobbits and wandered off, singing under his breath

“Dashing through the grass,
In the bunny sleigh.
O’er the fields he rides,
Sneezing all the way!”

Tongue in cheek, Ori wrote this down.

Bilbo quickly introduced Lobelia and Otho to Thorin, who, after slowly and deliberately sheathing his sword, was polite in words, but completely threatening in manner. Otho, in all but in total fear for his life, managed,

“We really were invited. See.” Otho took a battered invitation out of his weskit pocket. “We had no idea what it said, the… er… courier read it to us.”

Balin took the invitation, fished out his magnifier and looked at the invitation closely.

He nodded.

“Real enough, laddie,” he said to Thorin. “Just one problem. It’s not for them. It’s for Frerin.”

Thorin stared at his chief advisor.

“But he got his invitation.”

“This isn’t the first one we sent him, it’s the second one, insisting he attend.”

“I thought it was quite decorative, really,” said Otho. “The designs on the front are very nice.”
Thorin took the envelope and examined it.
“Those aren’t designs. That is khuzdul; dwarven writing. In fact, it’s my brother’s name. How…?” Thorin’s face went very, very blank and pale before he turned back toward the throne and bellowed,
“Ro-äc!”
Frodo jumped at his shoulder.
“Sorry,” Thorin apologized immediately, and patted the faunt’s cheek.
If ravens could be said to fly in a leisurely manner, Roäc practically sauntered down to land on Thorin’s other shoulder, perhaps counting on the fact that Thorin did have his hands full.
“Yes, O King of Erebor?” he inquired politely.
Ori would have sworn if Roäc had large eyelashes, he would have fluttered them.
“Yes,” said Otho, “that’s it… him… the courier.”
“What have you done now?” Thorin asked Roäc wearily.
“You said to deliver the invitation. You didn’t say to whom.”
Frodo giggled.
“He’s a smart raven.”
“He’s a smart something,” said Thorin.
“It’s not like you wanted him here anyway,” said Roäc.
“And you thought Lobelia Sackville-Baggins was an improvement?”
“Things had to be done.”
“And they had to be done on my coronation day?”
“At least it’ll be memorable.”
“Thank you,” said Thorin dryly. “And they had to be done on my coronation day? Lobelia stopped staring at Thorin for a moment and frowned up at Frodo. “Bilbo, why is your nephew’s here? Is he going to attend a dwarf school? Keep him out of my tomatoes.”
“We aren’t in the Shire,” Bilbo reminded her.
“Then keep them out of other people’s tomatoes. He’s quite naughty that way, but otherwise a perfectly decent faunt.”
Frodo looked to Bilbo and asked, “Did the ravens drop her on her head where we couldn’t see?”
“No, she was possessed by a barrowwight. It made her very mean. But the wight’s gone now, and she’s just plain, fussy, grumpy Lobelia,” said Bilbo.
“Oh. Does that mean I have to kiss her?”
“Absolutely not,” said Bilbo.
Thorin whispered to Frodo, “You never know what you’ll catch.”
Frodo giggled and Ori snickered from his place behind Thorin and added that to the record. Gridr arrived with a glass of water for Lobelia, who drank it gratefully while Otho told her what had happened.
“You mean I was up there, flying around?” She sighed. “Good thing I’m wearing clean bloomers. I’ve absolutely misplaced my hat.”
“Don’t worry, if anyone finds it, they won’t touch it,” Dwalin drawled as he fitted Grasper and Keeper back in their harnesses.
Ori folded his mouth. At the far side of the dais, he saw Thranduil pick up the hat, examine it at arm’s length, and plop it on his own head at a coquettish angle, posing for Bard. Even at this distance he could hear Bard’s roar of laughter.
“You mean I was up there, flying around?” Lobelia asked.
“What oliphaunt?” Tharkun asked.
“Cousin,” she addressed Bilbo, “may I have a word? Please?”
Thorin obviously didn’t want Bilbo going further than an arm’s length away from him, but Bilbo merely murmured something to the king and patted his shoulder before going off to consult with Lobelia.
Bilbo’s face made an interesting and mobile study. Ori was sure he’d hear what she said sooner or later, so he chafed in silence.

Finally, Bilbo dropped his face in his hands and gave a groan of pain.

“No, Lobelia, they will not,” he said. “I can't imagine that would taste at all pleasant. Sleep well.”

Bilbo turned and strode back to Thorin, shaking his head.

Mistress Dazla appeared, seemingly out of the floor like the furnishings and curtsied to the Sackville-Baggins’.

“Ma’am, sir, if you’ll kindly follow me. We’ll take you to a place of quiet where you may refresh yourselves.”

Lobelia stared at the dam’s beard and swallowed, but followed Mistress Dazla’s lead.

Thorin looked up toward the ceiling and tilted his chin in the direction of the retreating hobbits. Ori could have sworn he heard Nori’s snicker from all the way down here. Thorin was taking no chances.

“Where are they going?” Ori asked Dwalin.

“Old royal residence, prob’ly,” said Dwalin. “Dazla’ll make sure they’re settled and there’s guards enough on duty t’ attend their needs.”

“So, the Sackville-Baggins won’t have to lift a finger,” said Ori thoughtfully. “Or leave their rooms.”

“Exactly.”

“What did Lobelia say to you?” Thorin asked Bilbo.

“She wanted to know if you were going to roast them and eat them at your barbarian feast. Hold up a mo’. I need to write that one down. I can use that.”

“Got it,” said Ori.

Bilbo grinned at him.

“Ori! You know, now that I’m having a proper look at you, you’re finer than a blazing plum pudding at a Yuletide feast!”

“Um… thank you?” Ori asked.

Bilbo laughed and embraced him as carefully as scribe finery and accoutrements allowed.

“It’s so good to see you again,” said Bilbo.

“Everything’s well in Master Denethor’s world?” Ori asked.

“Yes, which means Arda can sleep soundly tonight.”

Thorin and Bilbo settled themselves to go back to their greetings and hearing oaths. Dwalin and his guard arranged themselves and Ori stepped up to Thorin’s side. He looked carefully at Thorin’s coat front.

“Are those silver acorns?” Ori murmured up at Thorin as Bilbo turned to speak to Dis.

Thorin just grinned.

“I suppose,” Ori teased, “Dori thought the silk underwear wasn’t quite loud enough. Didn’t Bilbo have silver acorns on his waistcoat?”

“Hush,” said Thorin, his grin widening into a smile.

“So apparently Bilbo would be represented at the coronation whether he was actually here or not?”

Thorin turned to Dwalin.

“Call him off, why don’t you,”

“Can’t. He’s the one who calls me off.”

“I’ve never called you ‘off’, I always call you, Dwalin.” Ori giggled, then squeaked as Thorin and Dwalin poked him from either side.

“Thank Mahal, Thorin’s beard’s grown out,” said Dis, averting Ori’s imminent doom by calling attention to Thorin’s appearance. “But, all the silver in it! See what happens when you cut your beard!”

Thorin leaned close to his sister then smiled.

“Look, namad, we match now."
“That’s different!” she barked. “I got those from your nephews, you’re just old.”

Dwalin stifled a laugh.

“I’d better take your arm, dear Thorin,” Bilbo commented, naughtily. “In case your extreme old age causes you to stumble.”

“I’m not too old to deal with you, master hobbit.”

“How very grumpy you are,” Bilbo cooed. “Is your rheumatism acting up?”

Dis shrieked with laughter and left them to continue their greetings.

Ori was amazed that Thorin stood and talked with every single dwarrow who wanted a word. He went to the seats for those who were hard of hearing and greeted each of them then proceeded up the stairs to all the galleries. Every single dwarrow there and any people of Dale had a chance to speak to him. Ori had to signal Podvu five times to send other scribes to bring him more paper, pens, nibs and ink during the progression. And for them to take away his work to deliver it to Podvu then to be given to Balin.

When the greetings were finished, Ori followed the royal party down to the main level again via some stairs at the far end of the upper most gallery. As they emerged on the floor there had been quite the re-arrangement of furniture.

The throne and dais had disappeared into the floor and a great table was there instead. Before this table, a huge space was left, ringed with tables and benches. The audiences from the galleries filed down by either lifts or stairs and their seating had been removed from the galleries and brought down to the main cavern floor. The kitchen staff were back on duty and rolling huge hogsheads into the chamber. A table against the wall held piles and piles of tankards stacked high.

Hijl stood before the great table, grinning at Thorin as he approached. She bowed deeply and Thorin took her place and smiled around at his subjects and guests.

“Everyone, please fill your tankards and make merry. Let the celebrations begin!”

Renewed cheers answered him and Dain broached the first barrel with his axe. Tankards were lofted into the gush of ale and shouts and laughter abounded. People filled their vessels and passed the rest around overflowing until all had one and the hogshead was almost empty.

“T’ Thorin! ‘R King!” Dain roared raising his tankard high. Everyone shouted this and drank. For a moment the only sound was the guzzling of ale as every one knocked back the first tankard in one go.

Dain threw his tankard high and belched.

“All Hail to Mahal and to the Seven Stars of Durin-” before he ran out of breath and caught the tankard easily.

Every dwarf gave it their best. Most of the dwarf monarchs got to ‘Durin’ and Hild made it to “Stars’. Everyone cheered as Tauriel managed “All hail-” and Legolas got to “All Hail to-“ before he choked. Lady Galadriel gamely tried but only managed to give herself a terrible case of the hiccups which was only made worse by a bad bout of giggling. Aragorn got to ‘Mahal’ and Theoden did also. Bard stuck to what he knew worked and recited the weston alphabet through to ‘L’ before he ran out and laughed.

Beorn still in his bear form also took a tankard but only gave the great belch of a large predator which did ring to the walls and everyone cheered for him.

The new king smiled around at his audience, gave Frodo to Bilbo, then drank back the contents of his tankard. Everyone almost held their breath.

“All Hail to Mahal and to the Seven Stars of Durin Shining Bright!” Thorin belched.

The cheering turned to a roar of triumph and the party began.

Brur stepped forward and shouted,

“The Kings of Dwarrow now present their gifts to their High King. An’ ‘is Consort.” Brur added winking at Bilbo, who blushed.

There was rather a lot of scuffling as the monarchs had their gifts, several of which were very large but obscured by cloths, and tried to be first.

Snur bounced out first and pushed two largish items into the center. Thorin came forward wth Bilbo and, at Snur’s nod, pulled the enshrouding canvas off the items. They were a desk and chair. The desk was large and wide, the main part of it a strange looking gray stone. The legs and sides were encrusted with shells that had been lacquered so they shone softly in the light of the cavern. Frodo went close and carefully touched the shells. There was a matching chair upholstered in gray leather to match. On top of the back of the chair were two huge rounded shells. Thorin looked up at these.

“What are those, Chat?”

“They call ’em nautilus. They really are that big. An’ rare. Took me years a’ walkin’ the beach every day t’ find two.”

“This is amazing” Thorin said. He went and sat in the chair. “And comfortable.” He rose and let Bilbo try it. Bilbo scooted it up to the desk then frowned, leaned forward and sniffed the desk. Ori and Loli and three other scribes hovered around taking all of it in.

“Smell it,” Bilbo told Thorin with a huge grin.

A little non-plussed Thorin did so and looked puzzled. “What is that scent?”

“The great sea,” Bilbo told him.

Thorin stared at Snur.

“How did you…?”

“The stone’s a piece of onyx,” Snur happily explained. “When we were working the stone to make the deep water port, we removed quite a bit. This came away in one piece. Yeh kin see by the color it’s been under water for a number of ages. Soft as a pebble’s bum.”

Snur reached over and pulled open top of the three drawers on the left side. He lifted out a strange looking contraption that looked like a lot of shells strung together.

“Yeh hang this in yer window, an’ let the wind catch ’em” Snur said. “The shells make a noise like the wind on the sea and these strips o’ metal here,” He indicated some long twisted strands of a silvery metal. “Sound like the surf against the shore.”

Thorin went and clasped Snur’s arm, then embraced him.

“It’s beautiful, my friend, I shall treasure it, and make good use of it, too!”

Snur grinned and he stood aside with Thorin and Bilbo as a group of guards and Mistress Dazla’s team came forward and took the items to the far side of the room where everyone could examine and admire it.

Ulfr came forward and waved his guards to bring out a large flatbed on many small wheels. The canvas cover was whipped off and there lay piles and piles of glass circles, in varying sizes across from the size of a hand to several feet, but all about an inch thick. Thorin and Bilbo came to examine this. Ulfr grinned maniacally. Several scribes crowded around to draw and detail what was there.

“Me latest invention,” he crowed. “Free standin’ light which isn’t phosphorous.”

Frodo craned to see the circles better. Ulfr picked a small circle off one of the piles and handed it to Frodo.

Frodo held it and looked it over with a slight frown.

“Tap it against yer hand, laddie.” Ulfr urged.

Frodo did so and the circle immediately lit up with the most beautiful clear blue light. The faunt and the crowds gasped in delight.

“Ulfr?” Thorin asked, taking the circle and looking it over. “It’s cool to the touch.”

“Aye,” Ulfr bragged. “Each is filled with a couple a’ gasses I found. When sealed in th’ glass an’ bumped together they glow different colors. Knock ’em gently again an’ they go off. Last almos’ f’rever.”

Bilbo picked up a circle and tapped it against his palm. It burst into a brilliant orange glow.

“Well,” Bilbo said, “These will be wonderful.”

“Aye, There’s a number a’ white light ones f’r explorin’ r minin’ an’ loads a’ colors t’ decorate with.”

“How delicate are they?” Thorin asked.

Ulfr snorted.

“How delicate are we? Th’ glass’s tempered, suitable f’r handlin’ by oafs.”
“Ulfr, you are a true genius, my friend” Thorin praised. He clasped Ulfr’s arm and pulled the chemist into a hug. “Thank you.”

Arne offered Thorin a covered something. Ori guessed it was a painting of some kind as it was on an easel.

Ulfr chuckled, “I’m thinkin’ th’ lad painted yerself as he’s been’ botherin’ me f’r brown a lot.”

Arne blushed hotly and Thorin pulled off the cover.

It was indeed a painting.

“It’s Minty!” Thorin shouted in delight.

The painting was a gorgeously rendered portrait of Thorin’s pony. Ori was very impressed. The brown paint had horse hair mixed into it, both short and long, as well as ground tourmaline, and caught the light beautifully. The pony’s eyes were perfectly smooth curves of tourmaline and settled into the paint to shine. It was very lifelike.

“Arne!” Thorin turned with an open smile. “This is wonderful. It looks just like her and so real! How did you know?”

Roäc winged a bit to land on Arne’s shoulder.

“So, I got it right?” Arne asked.

“Perfect!” Roäc acknowledged before flying to perch on Thorin’s shoulder again.

“It’s fuzzy!” Frodo cried.

“May we touch it?” Bilbo asked intrigued.

Arne nodded and Frodo stroked the mane.

“It feels just like a pony’s mane, Idad Thorin,” the faunt cried in delight.

“This a masterpiece, Arne,” Thorin told the prince. “I shall hang this in the sitting room for all guests to see. Thank you from my heart.”

Thorin embraced the young prince, who looked as though he might burst with both pride and embarrassment. Ulfr looked proud and a little nonplussed as it wasn’t what he’d thought it was and was much more personal to Thorin than his own gift. Ori thought this was going to give Ulfr quite a different perspective of his son.

Again the group of guards and Mistress Dazla’s team came forward and moved the items to the far side of the room next to Snur’s gifts for all to see.

Ahkn came forward next with three enormous wagons, two piled high with great vats and the last with sacks.

“I’ve heard that the Inn on the Lake treated you to many different flavors during your stay there. These two,” Ahkn indicated the vats, “hold oils. There’s coconut oil, orange oil, lemon oil, olive oil, peanut oil, sesame oil and quite a few others. The sacks’re of spices; pepper, nutmeg, cinnamon, allspice, cardamon, turmeric, za’atar and, you name it, spices of all kinds!”

Thorin looked over the bounty on the wagons.

“Ahnk,” he said, “excuse me if I start drooling all over your boots. Mahal, I can smell them even through those well packed sacks.”

Frodo shamelessly stood tiptoes on a wheel with his face buried against a sack that bore the title ‘cinnamon’.

“Sensible lad,” Thorin mused and put his arm across Ahkn’s shoulders. Bilbo was busily looking at the oil vats.

Ori thought he could hear the recipes jostling for position in the hobbit’s head as he watched another scribe drawing Bilbo’s portrait with the thoughtful look on his face. The smell of the spices was making Ori almost drool, too! He automatically wiped his mouth on his sleeve and continued to write as these gifts were put to the side in readiness for more.

Gheir and the Mavi came forward, Gheir beaming. Each Mavis bore a large porcelain jar with a lid. Ori recognized these as ones used for keeping incense. Mavis I gave Thorin hers, it contained copal resin, redolent and refreshing. Mavis II offered frankincense. Mavis III gave myrrh. Mavis IV offered something she called cedar. Ori found it a very soothing smell. Mavis XV gave one called nag champa, which was pleasant and light. Thus finished, the Mavi stepped back and Gheir strutted forward with a wave to his guards and servants.
They brought forth twelve covered items which to Ori looked like rather large cages. As they neared, Ori heard very strange sounds, somewhere between the guttural sounds of a grouse and a raven clacking its beak.

Gheir’s chest swelled and he rocked on his boots, seeming to taking pains to present Kacuho with his best side.

“My king, never mind your hens, geese, turkeys, and other nesting birds. In my kingdom, we have developed the ultimate egg-laying and feasting bird. I give you a beginning flock.”

Gheir waved his arm again and the covers were pulled off. Ori stared.

Inside the cages were the most extraordinary creatures. He could see the nearest in full. At first look, it was twice as big as a turkey and enormously fat. Its legs were short-ish but extremely powerful looking. It was covered in all colors of gray down. On the tips of the almost negligible wings were little puffs of curly white feathers and the tail was a pouf of large similar puffs of curly feathers. Its face seemed to be made up of its huge beak. Large round bright yellow eyes peeked about and the beak stuck straight out about a foot, a wide tube with quite a vicious little hook at the end. It scratched the floor of its cage with its three toed feet and, Ori saw, an equally large back claw.

Everyone stared.

“What is it?” Bilbo asked.

Gheir looked very pleased

“We call it a raphcuctus bird, like the noises it makes. They flock in the wilds near my kingdom and we found them to be most useful.”

Thorin turned to Ori.

“Lord Ori, what was the name of the gentledwarf from who you brought Kihshassa, Brandy, and Nori’s ferrets?”

“Master Vobwi,” Ori supplied.

Thorin looked about the hall and called out, “Master Vobwi?”

Master Vobwi hurried towards them from where Ori guessed he would be - with Fanny - and bowed deeply to Thorin.

“Your majesty, consort. Congratulations on your coronation.”

Thorin thanked him with polite amusement and Bilbo looked as though he was getting used to it.

“Master Vobwi, Lord Ori tells me you deal in exotic pets, particularly birds, and take orders for flocks.”

“I do indeed, your majesty,” Vobwi agreed and bowed again.

“Who in Erebor or Dale would you say would be the best person to care for the bountiful gift of… er…raphcuctus birds?”

Master Vobwi went close to the nearest cage and stroked his beard in contemplation then said.

“Bring it out, let’s have a proper look.”

One of Gheir’s guards unhasped the cage. The raphcuctus stepped out and looked around. It continued to make the weird noises Ori had heard. It tapped the floor with its beak loudly and scratched at the stone. It looked about, pulled its head back and the tail flashed out into a defiant display of pink and blue feathers.

“Here,” said Vi, “I got married once in a dress looked jus’ like tha’. It could be me frs’ born.”

“Never mind, hen, yeh wouldn’t want t’ try breastfeedin’ it,” said Margr.

Master Vobwi went over and examined the bird. The raphcuctus stood up straight, staring back at him, and gave the impression it was rather offended at being looked over.

“Male or dam?” Vobwi asked.

Gheir looked confused and Mavis I stepped forward.

“His majesty has brought a manual for their care. It is often very difficult to tell the sexes apart.”

Queen Mavis gave the book to Thorin and he and Bilbo looked through it.

“Here we are,” said Bilbo. “It reads ‘Females are identified by their blue tongues.’ A blue tongue, how unusual.”

“Do they eat a lot of blueberries?” asked Frodo. “That’s how I turn my tongue blue.”
“So do I,” Thorin agreed.
Master Vobwi gamely opened the beak and looked in.
“This one’s male. Tongue’s pink,” he announced then roared in a mix of anger and pain as the annoyed bird rapped him sharply on the top on his head with its beak.
“Bugger yerself, numpty of a fowl!”

The raphcuctus made a loud noise between a honk, a quack and a caw. Having said its piece, it went over to Thorin and eyed him with a speculative air.
From Thorin’s shoulder, Roäc suddenly puffed up all his feathers and shouted, “Back off, ugly! He’s mine!”

The raphcuctus pulled its head back and looked up at Roäc, then snorted and walked around to look at Dwalin. Dwalin regarded the bird without much interest and the bird walked away. It inspected Aragorn and Elrond. It went towards Lady Galadriel but continued past her to Celeborn, who was talking quietly with Haldir.

The raphcuctus stopped and examined Celeborn, first with one eye, then the other. It took a beakful of the elf lord’s hair and very gently tugged. Celeborn swung round annoyed, then looked down. The raphcuctus looked up and cooed at him like a pigeon. Celeborn’s eyebrows hit his hairline. The raphcuctus waddled forward and laid its head happily against Celeborns’s stomach where it stayed, cooing comfortably.

Master Vobwi, rubbing his head, turned and looked at the raphcuctus who’s head was now glued to Celebom’s belly.

“Well, I think that one now belongs to that elf, there. Lord Kelbr?”
“Yes,” Thorin agreed exchanging a wink with Lady Galadriel, who was delighted with the bird’s devotion to her husband. Thorin continued. “I agree, that one is quite taken with Lord Celeborn and it would be a great pity to part them. What about these?”

Thorin gestured to the other eleven cages, each with two or three mumbling raphcuctus birds.
Master Vobwi peered at each then returned to Thorin.

“If his majesty would allow, I would recommend Mistress Guernsia of the old Aldernay Farm.
Her ancestor, Guernsia Aldernay, who bred the original Dale cow, specialized in animal husbandry, the current Mistress Guensia works with egg-laying and meat birds. I get my flocks from her.”

“Thank you, Master Vobwi,” Thorin nodded to him then raised his voice once again.

“Mistress Guernsia of the Aldernay Farm?”

There was a delighted shriek and a plump woman with a riot of brown curls about her face and a beribboned cap hurried forward and curtsied to Thorin.

“Your majesty,” she grinned eagerly.

Thorin chuckled and offered his hand in the style of men.

“You would like to care for this wonderful gift of King Gheir, madam? I can send you help, if you require.”

“Oh, your majesty, I would love to look after your royal raphcuctus. I have my husband and children to help, and with my younger sister and her husband, we’ll be plenty to care for them.”

“Excellent,” said Thorin kindly. “Are they with you?”

“Oh yes!” She turned and beckoned with a flapping hand. Immediately her family came forth.
Thorin and Bilbo were introduced to her six children, her sister, and brother-in-law, and their four children. Ori thought Mistress Guernsia’s children were pale skinned and very tall compared to their cousins.

“Your husband?” Thorin asked.

She took a breath and straightened then turned and gestured again. From the crowd a male elf stepped forward and came to take his wife’s hand. He bowed to Thorin.

“Here’s my Hathor,” Mistress Guernsia said.

“Thank you, your majesty,” Hathor said, quietly. “We are honored that you trust us with this care.”

“Halir?” Thranduil asked, approaching.
The elf sighed and bowed to Thranduil.
“Your majesty.”
“I knew you’d gone wandering an age ago. We had thought you lost. I had no idea you had returned so close to the wood.”

The elf turned to his wife and smiled at her.
“I found someone worthy of settling with and took up a man’s name of Hathor.”

Thranduil looked on Mistress Guernsia and the children gathered close around their parents. He smiled.
“Perhaps while we are here you would consider regaling some of us with the tales of your travels. Naturally, if you prefer to write and send them to us, that, too is acceptable. Remember that the Wood will always be open to you and your kin.”

Hathor looked amazed, didn’t quite let his mouth drop open, and bowed.
“Thank you, your majesty. You are most kind.”

Then with ease of professional bird handlers, the family with the help of the servants and guards gently moved the crates and their feathery contents to the side. Mistress Guernsia and Hathor were already pouring over the manual and directing their family to set up a low barrier and gather food and water for the now freed raphcactus.

Lord Celeborn’s new friend, however, would not be separated from him.
“It’s all right, my dear,” said Lady Galadriel. “Our Kelli can come sit with us.”
“Our what?” Celeborn replied. “Your Kelli, you mean.”
“Mm-hmm, whatever you say, my dear, though he does take after your side of the family.”
“It’s the nose,” said Thranduil, nodding sagely.

Celeborn shot him a filthy look.

Queen Hild came forward and favored Thorin with an amused smile.
“I am afraid I am not so generous and nice as my brother monarchs. However, I do know well that here in Erebor you have the greatest variety of different trades and guilds. Because of this, I have brought you a substance that is used by the men in our area. They use it to seal their roofs, but it seems to me much more could be done with it. Also, with your connections with the elves, they may know many things about it, as the substance is the sap of a tree.”

A great dray was rolled forward, covered with many metal barrels and also baskets of different sizes, holding trees in various states of maturity. A couple of vats were unloaded and the lids removed. Ori peeked in.
“As you see, it can be dyed many colors.” Hild went on.
Ori stared at the weird, shiny stuff in a beautiful shade of orange. Bifur came forward and examined it. He then turned to Bombur.
“Giveth me a little of thy oil, cousin.”

Bombur raised an eyebrow but drew a small vial out of his pocket and uncorked it. Bifur held out his gloved hands and Bombur pour a small puddle of oil into Bifur’s palm. Bifur rubbed the oil all over his gloves and reached into the orange and withdrew a handful. He rolled this into a ball and blew on it.
“It dries very quickly,” Hild told him. He nodded then grinned at them. Suddenly he raised his arm and threw down the ball hard against the floor. The ball smacked the floor and bounced straight up three times higher than the crowd. Shrieks of delight came all over. The ball came down and bounced again. Someone caught it and threw it again against the floor. The orange ball bounced all over the room. People caught it, bounced it, threw it to each other.
Bifur took a small copper pipe out of his pocket and coated the end with more oil. He scooped up another, larger glob, of bright green this time. He shoved one end of the pipe into the glob and held out the clean end to Bombur, who took a huge breath and blew into it. The glob inflated like a bladder into an enormous, green ball. Bifur stopped Bombur when the ball was as tall as Thorin and gave it a quick twist to tie it off from the pipe. Bifur gave the ball a quick rub of oil and tossed it up lightly, then smacked it with the palm of his hand. The huge ball sailed over the crowd. More shrieks of delight burst forth as the guests tossed the ball about the room with great enthusiasm.
“Well,” Thorin turn to Hild who was watching with a bemused look on her face, “I’m delighted to announced that as well as sealing the roofs of men, this makes wonderful bouncing balls and likely other toys. I will let you know if we discover anything else, but you may have to send more.”

Hild burst out laughing and gave an extravagant bow.

“My king.”

“My turn,” Dain bellowed as the dray was moved to the side with the other presents. Bifur and Bombur went with it, providing more giant balls for the crowd.

Dain bellowed to a few of the staff who, with Chopper pulling, guided a long wide cart out to the middle of the room. On the back were four hogsheads of the Iron Hills’ famous broom flower ale.

“Dain this is most generous,” Thorin thanked him. “I know you only make a few of these a year.”

“I ain’t done, cuz,” Dain sniggered. He yanked a cover off whatever else was on the cart.

The whatever turned out to be an enormous rhodochrosite bed set with fire opals.

Thorin face-palmed and groaned. Bilbo composed his face but his eyes were dancing with amusement. Almost everyone was laughing and cheering and the dwarrow made occasional lewd remarks.

Snur sighed.

“Imagine sleepin’ in bacon.”

“Is that the same stone as Dori… caressed?” Bilbo asked.

“Yes,” said Thorin. “Fire opals.”

“Meaning?”

“I’ll tell you later.”

Bilbo chuckled.

“Never mind. I’m not that dense.”

Ori walked around the huge piece of furniture. The stone was cunningly incised and sculpted. The head and footboards with their large posts at each end were carved with runes of restful sleep and happiness and many other calming and relaxation runes. The huge slab on the inside to hold the mattress was covered in the most lewd and naughty phrases in runes from poetry and quotations from Queen Kivi’s book.

“How in Mahal’s name are we going to get this-” began Thorin and Dori pounced. “Now, don’t you worry about a thing, dear. It’ll all get sorted tomorrow or so.”

Thorin raised an eyebrow.

“And how long have you know about this, Bearer?”

Dori fluttered winsomely,

“Oh, you know, it’s just one of those adorable little Bearer things, dear.”

Dori turned and Margr and Vi were there to second the remarks with wise nods.

Ori finally had a chance to get a good look at the sisters. He was horrified.

They really had clad themselves completely in Durin blue, from their brightly dyed, elaborately teased globed hair to their beribboned shoes. Their Durin blue satin dresses sported high collars and puffed long sleeves and wrapped their impressive figures down to their ankles, generously padded to perfect roundness.

Bilbo stared at them in something that bordered on alarm.

“Are those really daggers in your hair?” he asked.

The sisters grinned in delight,

“We’re vicious, heavily-armed blueberries - get it?!”

“How did they find out about that?” Thorin asked.

“I didn’t tell them!” Ori wailed as beside him, Dwalin started to laugh. Dori fluttered his eyelashes coquettishly and Thorin groaned. Balin had the good manners to blush a little but he was grinning.

“King Theoden!” Margr cried as the king came alongside to admire the amazingly carved bedstead.

Theoden bowed, obviously at sea as to who they were.

“It’s us!” Vi added, helpfully. “Remember? We was all at our Dori’s last night?”

“Aye,” Marg added, “an’ th’ other night yeh slipped away before we could call ‘heads’ or ‘tails’, naughty thing!”
“Ahhhhh, Mistress Vi and Mistress Margr?” he asked, still unconvinced and properly horrified. Margr laughed and smacked his arm.

“Bad man! A’ course! We’re still willin’ t’ have a go.”

“If you’re ‘up’ f’r it,” Vi added slyly. “We kin get our Glorfy to come along, too, if yeh fancy.” The two of them dissolved into cackles.

“Hello,” Lord Glorfindel helped as he arrived and put an arm about both sisters.

“Why is your hair blue?” Theoden asked, obviously too shocked to process what ‘our Glorfy’ might have to do with anything.

“T’ go with our outfits, a’ course!” said Margr.

“We wanted t’ do our faces, too,” said Vi, “but we ran out a’ time.”

There was no escape for Theoden now. The sisters each threaded an arm through his and steered him toward the ale with a proprietary air.

“Come along now, chuck,” said Margr.

“Aye, plenty a’ ale t’ be had over there” Vi added.

Lord Glorfindel bowed and winked at the royal party as he followed in the sisters’ wake.

“That was weird,” Frodo observed.

“Aye, well, welcome t’ Erebor, wee ‘n,” Dwalin said as the bed was taken to the side.

Elrond approached with Lindir and the twins. Elrond carried something long, wrapped in fine silver silk.

“Hail, Thorin, High King of All Dwarrow,” the elf lord said formally, then smiled. “As you are a sword wielder, we have brought you a gift we hope will serve you well.”

Lindir unwrapped the silk coverings and Elrond held out a great sword to Thorin.

“We bring you Orcrist, the goblin cleaver, forged in lost Gondolin, and wielded by heroes of our race.”

Thorin’s eyes lit up as he came forward and graciously accepted the sword.

The scabbard was jeweled, though not overly-so, suiting a weapon meant to be used, not merely seen. It was larger than his current sword, forged to be worn at the back.

To the delight of the warriors present, he immediately drew the blade and held it aloft. Ori was impressed, despite being forged by elves the weapon was high by even dwarf standards. The shining blade was long, swelled to an impressive width and curved wickedly at the perfect point, and with the hilt in the shape of a dragon’s tooth Thorin handled it with the expertise of long experience. In his hand the blade flashed and whirled with deadly speed. Thorin turned back to Elrond with a grin of pure enjoyment.

“The balance is perfect! I shall be proud to bear this, Lord Elrond.”

Elrond bowed and looked rather pleased with himself.

Thorin sheathed the sword, handed it to Dwalin and immediately unbuckled the sword he wore.

“Fili,” he called.

Fili and Kili came forward eagerly to inspect the new weapon. Thorin held out his own sword to the crown prince.

“Crown Prince Fili, you will now bear the sword of your Great, Great Grandmother Theris. Use it well.”

Fili bowed low, grinning, and took the sword. Kili helped his brother attach the sword to his right hip and moved the old one to rest over the crown prince’s shoulder.

Thorin removed his sword belt and adjusted the straps and Dwalin buckled it across the King’s back and settled Orcrist there. Everyone cheered.

Thorin bowed to Elrond again and then grinned at Dwalin.

“We try it out tomorrow, I think.”

Elrond stepped away leaving the area open for Aragorn and Arwen to come forward followed by Captain Boromir and three others carrying a covered flat something that was the size of the kitchen table top at Fundin House.

It was set on edge and Arwen stood beside it.
“King Thorin,” Aragorn smiled. “My lady has made you a gift in honor of this great occasion and we both hope you will enjoy it.”

“Lady Arwen,” Thorin said with a bow.

The item was uncovered to reveal a beautifully woven tapestry of Erebor seen from a distance. The colors sang together as there the Lonely Mountain stood in all its grandeur against a blue sunny sky. The tapestry edge was bordered by Durin blue with the dwarven rune and elven script for the word friendship. There were gasped and ‘ooo’s and ‘aaaah’s’ from all around.

“This is wonderful, you ladyship.” Thorin praised in obvious delight. “Such detail. When have you seen our home before?”

Arwen laughed and blushed a little.

“I fully admit, your majesty, until I arrived here, I have never laid eyes on your lovely home. I used an ancient painting for reference. I realize now neither do it justice as I never dreamed how wonderful it was until I visited.”

“You have done it justice, my lady,” Thorin corrected her. “This is magnificent. Would the ancient painting be the one done by Celebrimbor in his youth?”

“Yes,” Arwen cried in delight. “You know of it?”

“I do. He is said to have painted a smaller twin of it and gifted it to Narvi at the beginning of their friendship before they forged the doors of Moria.”

Elrond and his family were immediately on the alert,

“Is this so?” Elrond asked. “The original painted was lost along ago and only copies are seen in rare books. There is another?”

“There is, “ Balin confirmed. “Unfortunately the second, too, was lost with that great kingdom.”

“But it is brought back to all of us by Lady Arwen,” said Thorin and went to the elf lady, bowed over her hand and kissed it.

“Thank you, madame. You have given us a great gift. It will hang here in this room so all may remember the friendship of our dear ancestors Celebrimbor and Narvi.”

The cheering commenced again and it took some time to calm everyone down again. The tapestry, Thorin ordered to be set against the wall before all the standards of the visiting monarchs.

The area opened for Theoden King to come forward. The horse king looked rather amused.

“Congratulations, Thorin High King of All Dwarrow. It has been an honor and a joy to be witness here to these festivities. I do assure you that when I decided upon my gift to you, I had no notion it would be something I would be in trade talks with you and King Bard about almost immediately.”

“Oh?” Thorin asked

Four of Theoden’s soldiers came forward, leading a pair of the largest, most pure white cattle. They were easily the biggest bull and cow Ori had ever seen. From each animal’s head rose horns of a great size and sharpness.

“I give you a cow and bull of our own cattle. We call them aurochs. Do let me know how any interbreeding with the famous Dale cattle goes.”

Thorin grinned.

“King Bard, your thoughts?”

Bard came and stroked the bull’s forehead and scratched it on the poll between the horns. The bull closed its eyes in happiness and rumbled. Bard turned and called out,

“Mistress Guernsia, who would you recommend?”

Mistress Guensia looked up from where she was stroking two raphcactus birds.

“Old Master Hallow from the Windy Poplars farm, King Bard.”

“I’m here!”

There was a shout from near Fanny and a middle-aged man hurried forward. Ori noted that though he was brushed and formally dressed, his face and arms were dark and lined with the sun and his hands when they reached to touch the beautiful cattle were rough with callouses.

“King Thorin, I would be honored to care for these beautiful creatures. Theoden King, when does the cow need milking?”
“Not now,” the horse king said with the easy familiarity of a man well-versed in caring for animals. “She’ll need to be served later this month.”

Master Hallow nodded and with a hand on the head of each animal led them over to a new enclosure Mistress Guensia’s family was setting up.

There was a murmuring through the crowd as King Thranduil swaggered forward. He was followed by his sons and Captain Tauriel.

“King Thorin.”

“King Thranduil,” Throin replied with a smile.

“Congratulations and thank you for inviting us to attend this most charming ceremony.”

“As charming as the gravy course?” Thorin teased.

Thranduil smirked.

“This is charming, a gravy course is incomparable.”

“Sounds delicious,” Bilbo commented, intrigued.

“There’ll be one at the feast,” Thorin promised.

Thranduil bowed his head slightly to Mistress Dazla, who blushed and curtsied. Thranduil turned back and raised his voice to all could hear.

“In the Greenwood in the tops of the trees there lives this lovely creature. They do not live long and, when their wings drop to the forest floor, they are much prized by my people.”

The elf king opened his hand. There in the palm was a large butterfly. Ori was amazed. The butterfly was the exact shade of Durin blue. It fluttered away from the elf king’s hand and floated around, eliciting gasps of amazement from dwarrow and men alike.

Legolas and Tauriel came forward at Thranduil’s nod.

“I know you are a sword-wielder, King Thorin, but perhaps for formal occasions you will consider wearing this cloak I have had made.”

Thranduil turned and, as Tauriel and Legolas carefully lifted away the silk, Thranduil took up a Durin blue cloak that was iridescent. Ori gasped along with several others. The cloak was long enough to trail behind Thorin and it was made entirely of butterfly wings. Thranduil came forward. Bilbo helped Thorin out of his long coat and Thranduil placed the amazing cloak about Thorin’s shoulders. Everyone murmured and sighed as Thorin moved away slightly and the cloak shimmered in the light. Half a dozen scribes honed in and began sketching madly.

Thorin turned and smiled at Thranduil.

“This is magnificent, my friend, I shall wear it proudly. Thank you.”

Thorin stepped back, laid his hand over his heart, and bowed his head to the elf king. Thranduil was visibly touched by this gesture and mirrored it. Thranduil nodded to Tauriel and Legolas who came to Thorin’s assistance and the cloak was taken to the side with the other gifts. Mistress Dazla had at a frame set up and the cloak was immediately displayed over it. People crowded around to look over the beautiful item.

Thranduil smiled at Bard.

“Your turn, I think.”

Bard came forward to Thorin, looking a little embarrassed.

“Congratulations Thorin. Kingship suits you much better than it does me.”

There were shouts from both dwarrow and men form the Dale vehemently suggesting otherwise.

“I don’t have anything magnificent to offer you….”

“King Bard,” Thorin interrupted. “My Brother King, please know that I value your friendship far more than any gift that could be offered me.”

“Yes, well,” Bard went on. “I decided that since we will be spending a great deal of time together in the assistance of our peoples, I thought something personal that we could do together might be acceptable.”

Thorin looked interested.

“Do?”

Bard flushed slightly.

“I don’t often have time since my youth but there was one sport that I much enjoyed and, I hope, you will as well. It could be something we might take time to do together.”

Bain came up to his father with a grin. He was carrying a long thin, pole of willow, Ori decided, and a small, stout box with a handle, and a hand net. Bard offered the pole to Thorin, who gamely took it and examined it. Thorin grinned up at Bard.

“You, my friend, are going to teach me to fish with a pole.”

Bard nodded.

Thorin laughed, “I have read many tales of how this activity leads to long thoughts and mighty ponderings. Are we going to consider our kingly duties while we fish off the dock or you boat? Do we royally dig worms first or shall I bring some cavern ones when we go?”

Bard laughed.

“You, my friend, are going to teach me to fish with a pole.”

“Actually, neither. This is a very specialized rod and it only used a fly as bait.”

“We shall royally capture flies?” Thorn teased, making people laugh.

“I’ve have already made our flies, most royal ars…friend of mine,” Bard corrected himself. He gestured the box which Bilbo held while Frodo reach up and opened the lid.

Inside were many tiny compartments and in each were fishing hooks of different sizes decorated with brightly colored threads and metal beads. Some were made in such a way as to look like dragonflies.

Thorin picked one out.

“You made this, Bard?” he demanded, staring at the tiny artifact.

“Yes, the making is called ‘tying flies’.” Bard explained. Ori sensed a seed of pride in the man.

Thorin looked up at Bard.

“I am amazed you’re not blind, my friend. These are beautiful and most cunningly wrought. They could double as jewelry.”

Bard colored a little then looked hopefully at Thorin.

“So you would like to come fly-fishing with me?”

“I most certainly would!” Thorn said immediately. He passed the gear to Balin and Binni standing near and went immediately to Bard, holding out his hand. “I shall be honored to be your pupil in this sport of men.”

They shook hands and Bard leaned over a little awkwardly as Thorin pulled him down to knock foreheads as a brother.

The dwarrow nodded and muttered their approval as the menfolk all began to applaud again.

As Bard’s gifts were settled beside Thranduil’s, Thorin thanked and embraced each of Bard’s children, taking a special moment to gently bump foreheads with Bain and clasp his shoulder in the way of a fond idad. Bain blushed and looked pleased as the crowd vociferated its support.

Lady Galadriel glided over to Thorin and the room hushed to silence to witness the giving of the final coronation gift.

The lady looked solemn and in her hands she held a little box of plain gray wood, unadorned save for a single silver rune upon the lid.

“The contents of this, I once foresaw I would give at a time when a quest stood upon a knife’s edge and that it would be held in trust by one who knew and deeply valued the elements within. It relieves me that this time did not and will not come to pass. You are not the one who will care for what is within, but I know you have about you those who will, thus you will come to know the value of it. I have walked about your mountain and the lands surrounding it. It is good and shall bring forth what will be placed in its keeping.”

Thorin bowed slightly and everyone else looked at each other in puzzlement as it was clear no one present had any idea what the Lady of Lorien meant.

She opened the box. Ori looked in and saw what appeared to be dust and three silver nuts.

Thorin and Bilbo peered at the contents and wonder came over Bilbo’s face.

“Lady Galadriel, is this…?”

“There is soil from my own orchards that will help yours and King Bard’s lands. The silver seeds are of the mallorn trees of Lothlorien. May they bless your Kingdoms with their beauty.”
Bard came and looked at the soil and nuts doubtfully, but he bowed with Thorin in thanks.

“Finally,” said Galadriel in greater seriousness. “I give you this,” she handed Thorin a small crystal phial: it glittered as she moved it and rays of white light sprang from her hand. “In this phial,” she said, “is caught the light of Eärendil’s star, set amid the waters of my fountain. It will shine still brighter when night is about you. If you ever need, may it be a light for you in dark places, when all other lights go out.”

Thorin received the phial and frowned slightly.

“My Lady Galadriel, I have said my duty and wishes are to see my people restored and in happiness and plenty. I have no plans to go back to recover the kingdom of Khazad-dûm.”

“So you have stated,” she replied. “And you speak the truth. But should you need this phial it is yours.”

Thorin bowed again, thanked her and kissed her hand.

Everyone burst into applause as Thorin made a gracious speech of thanks for all the gifts once more. People had more ale, talked and admired the gifts.

There was a shout and Jim waved his arms for everyone to clear out of the middle of the room. He and several of his troupe brought a huge wagon so long it had eight wheels, into the chamber. It was covered by an unknown material which, when pulled off the wagon, resolved itself to be a huge black tub, at least thirty feet across. It had tall sides of about three feet. Around this the troupe placed great stanchions to hold the round shape. Ori looked in. The blackness was shining. Ori touched it and his hand came away with a slick of grease. He sniffed, big bean oil. The entire inside had been oiled! Ori looked up. Jim directed the huge wagon alongside the container. The members of the troop used a winch to upend the wagon, dumping its contents into the black container. Ori stared. It was mud.

Another shout from Jim brought a huge pipe from a far wall which, when it reached the container, was opened and warm water gushed out, filling the container to about half a foot. The mud and water swished around and gurgled. The pipe was withdrawn and Jim hopped upon a platform held by two stanchions.

“Greetings everyone!” Jim shouted. “And a wonderful Coronation Day to all. Now we have a game of chance for you all to participate in!”

The crowd cheered.

“We have here,” Jim took from Ruelis something covered in a cloth and unwrapped it. Ori was confused. Held high in Jim’s hands was a very sweet-looking pale pink piglet.

“The prize has been donated from King Dain! And is a lovely little farrowing piglet! She’s three months old and will be a beautiful addition to any herd or a wonderful starter for a new one! And once started, imagine the delicious pigs you will be able to live off of!”

The crowd cheered and came forward to gather about the container.

“There’s just one hitch,” Jim grinned at all of them. “You have to catch her.”

Everyone present laughed. Bilbo looked at Thorin.

“Pigs are hard to catch, but what’s the mud for?”

Thorin shook his head and Jim barked out again.

“For the price of one copper, you get a chance to catch this lovely little princess of a pig! Who’s up for it? Come on, you’re not all afraid of getting a little mud on you, are you? Take off your boots and have a go. One copper!!”

At that, men and dwarrow started taking off their boots. Several dwarrow just shouted and stripped down to their combinations. The men started stripping off as well. Old women and dams came forward in nothing but their shifts. Ruelis held a box for the coppers to be dropped in. Jim showed the pig to any who passed him and from his platform the players hopped down and slogged through the mud.

“Up against the sides of the pit, ladies and gents,” Jim called. “Everyone’s getting a fair chance.”

Ori started to giggle as he saw Bain and Stonehelm encouraging Theodred. Margr and Vi were already in their petticoats and Glorfindel, down to his tightie-whities, marched over and gave their coppers. Thorin and Bilbo were invited to stand on the platform with Jim, where they wished good luck to all who were getting into the pit. The dwarf monarchs and the visiting royals were at the pit sides all eager to watch. Ori got a glimpse of Nori and Bofur working the crowd, making book. Fanny was behind the crowd, but could see over all.

Dain was on the floor near the platform with his arm slung around Sculdis, who was cheering the players. Chopper stood on his hind legs, the front ones hooked on the side the pit. Ori quickly boosted himself onto the platform and sat on the edge for a good view. Dwalin came over and stood behind him.

Bard leaned on the pit side and chuckled as Thranduil stood beside him. At a sudden cheer from Bain, Arne, and Stonehelm, Theodred cursed and threw off his garments and handed the bundle to his father before hopping up. Theoden face palmed and Aragorn gave him a sympathetic pat on the shoulder.

“Anyone else?” Jim called. The sides of the pit were all but completely obscured by people.

“Any one at all?”

“Legolas!” squawked Thranduil as the young prince shoved his clothing at Gimli and leapt up lightly to deposit his copper in the box and take his place in the pit. There was a cheer from the younger set and Elrond and Lindir attempted to stifle their laughter, until Elladan and Elrohir leapt after him. Elrond came to Thranduil and Bard’s side.

“How does this ‘game’ work?” Elrond asked.

Bard lit his pipe and snickered.

“Wait and see.”

“Right,” Jim shouted. “Everyone ready?”

Shouts came form the pit and the players flexed their knees and hopped a little.

“Are we ready to win this lovely piggie?” Jim teased, stirring the crowd.

Cheers answered him.

“Then let’s get this little piggy-wig ready,” Jim called.

Fior and Floris held out a large bucket to him. Jim dipped the piglet into the bucket and lifted it high. Ori stared, the piggy was squealing with delight and shining from her quick bath in big bean oil.

“On three!” Jim ordered loudly as he leaned down and lightly popped the pig down into the mud.

“One!” shouted Jim.

She hopped around and scampered a little, her tail wagging madly.

“Two!” Jim intoned. The crowd surged a little, eager to see what was going to happen.

“Three!” roared Jim. “Catch her and hold her to win her! Catch the ‘Greased Pig’!”

The players rushed forward. The piglet squealed, as running was a game she obviously loved, and took off at full speed. The mud and water mixed with the oil on the bottom of the pit had half the players skidding into a huge pile of bodies in a few moments.

“Stars!” Thranduil cried in horror as the wave of bodies rushed by his side of the pit and skidded again as the piglet doubled back and ran under their legs, collapsing them all into another heap.

Glorfindel gave a battle cry and leaped forward landed on his chest and grasped the piglet. Oily as she was, she slid out of his hands like a loose bar of soap in a bath. She rushed forward then stopped, looked at the mud covered elf, oinked in joy and ran off again. The roars of encouragement and cheering from the crowd all but lifted the ceiling.

Ori was now laughing so hard he couldn’t hold his pen very well to sketch the roiling mess in the pit. The players were themselves laughing which hindered their efforts as well. The little piglet was so quick and so slick, none could hold her. Margr and Vi attempted to corner her by holding out their petticoats to corner her but the piggy just oinked and ran under their legs. Legolas and the twins attempted team work but even their speed and dexterity was no match for the little grease ball.

Chopper oinked and bellowed at the piglet. She looked up, oinked back and sped to the wall of the pit and the players bounded after her. They missed gloriously as the piggy, using her speed, managed to run along the side of the wall, zooming past those trying to trap her. This game went on for quite some time until there was a huge crashing of bodies in the middle and everything stopped. The players got up. There was no sign of the piglet. The players stepped away, looking around.
“We have a winner,” shouted Jim, pointing. Ori saw a young Dale lass, sitting in the middle of the puddle, her arms and legs around the piglet which was oinking happily and nuzzling her face.

Everyone cheered and the lass was lifted as she was, holding the pig, and carried to the platform. Thorin and Bilbo congratulated her as her parents came forward and Jim helped the lass put the piglet, now looking like it was ready for a nap, into a loosely made rush basket with a cover.

Mistress Dazla, her minions and some guards escorted the besmirched combatants to the far side of the room where the pipe had entered. They were instructed to stand still as warm water was poured over them and flowed into the grate below their feet. Assorted family members stood by, holding the bathers’ clothes and the minions distributed towels and spare underthings.

While people relaxed and dried, Thorin called once more for their attention, “My dear friends, when you are back in your grandeur, please join me in a feast!”

A great cheer rose.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Time for drinking toasts, eating, drinking, singing, drinking, dancing, drinking. It’s a dwarrow party and dwarrow are getting plowed. Ori learns all kinds of things and so do you. Get you gossiping ears on and here we go! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Every musician in Erebor and Dale gathered at the entrance and began to play, some solos, some groups, and sometimes all together.

Meanwhile, Mistress Dazla’s army of minions, the mountain maintenance guild, and the royal kitchens’ staff swept through, setting tables, replacing empty hogsheads, helping haul the pig arena outside and turning the gift animals out in the grassy area by the main gates to graze and otherwise hobnob. Groups took turns playing shepherd.

As the tables were prepared, the guests filled them. At the high table, the royals sorted themselves into companionable clusters. Someone had replaced Thorin’s chair with a noticeably wider model, suitable for hobbit perching, but not so wide that someone couldn’t rest his hand on someone else’s thigh with impunity. Frodo sat on Thorin’s knee. Apparently, they were going to share a plate.

Ori couldn’t wait to see how this worked out. As he recalled, Frodo often missed his mouth. Of course, Dis had told him that Kili had also shared a plate with Thorin at that age. He couldn’t find his mouth either. Ori reflected that Kili really hadn’t improved that much, though he seemed to have turned it into amusement for his fellow diners, especially Tauriel. Eventually he did eat everything, even if it meant sucking gravy out of his tunic.

Ori glanced about from where he was standing with Fili, Sigrid, and Tilda. He supposed they ought to go and claim their places soon. Sigrid suddenly huffed then growled and unfastened her outer golden dress.

“I have to get out of this thing. It’s quilted and I’m roasting in it.”

Fili helped as she shrugged out of it, catching it so it didn’t hit the floor. Underneath, the bodice of her Durin blue dress left nothing of her shape to the imagination. Bard gaped at her, his head whipped around at all the appreciative noises and even low whistles, and he tore off his coat and draped it over her front.

“Da! What are you doing?”
“Sigrid! You can’t.”
“What? My dress has sleeves,” Sigrid grouched, pulling the coat off.
“Yes, it does. It also looks like you could serve breakfast balancing the tray on your…” he gestured to her person in general, rather red in the face.
“My breasts?” she asked pointedly, blinking at him.
“My breasts?” she asked pointedly, blinking at him.
“You need to put those away!”
“Da, I can’t send them around back.”
“Are you sure you can’t flatten them a little?”
“No! They don’t deflate.”
“Where did you even get such a dress?”
Dori materialized beside them.
“Oh, yes, that did turn out well, my Sig,” said Dori. “Very striking. Yes, lovely.”
“Thank you, Dori, I love my name day present!” said Sigrid, stooping a little to kiss Dori’s cheek. Bard opened his mouth, closed it and bowed slightly.

“Yes, thank you, Dori. It was kind of you.”

“Binni designed it,” Sigrid told him brightly.

Bard swallowed.

“Binni? That’s amazingly restrained for the same dwarf who decorated the throne room.”

“D’you like me braids, Ori?” Tilda demanded.

“They are very nice. Did Dori put them in for you?”

“No, she was dressing Sigrid’s hair. Queen Hild did me braids herself!”

Ori gaped, but recovered quickly and said, “That must have been quite an honor.”

Tilda thought about it.

“D’you think she was honored? She must handle quite a lot of braids. An’ I made sure my new boots had a sheath for me knife!”

“Tilda,” muttered Bard, “you aren’t a dwarf warrior. You don’t need to go everywhere armed.”

“Scribes never know when they’ll need t’ sharpen a nib, Da,” said Tilda.

Bard groaned and went away.

“Your father is wearing a ring?” Ori finally remembered to ask Sigrid about the flash of gold he’d spotted from the dais.

“He wasn’t going to, but I bullied him into it,” said Sigrid. “Calmar took that ring off my grandfather’s finger on the night he died, and that was sheer spite, because it isn’t of great value.”

Ori hissed in sympathy.

“Did Bard find it in one of the statues?”

Sigrid nodded.

“It’s not much, but it means everything to Da.”

“Yes,” concurred Dori. “As Sigrid said, it belonged to dear Girion. Very plain ring, just a gold band with an oval cut carnelian stone, I believe, Sig dear, your great grandfather got it from his cousin, who had sailed the great sea. But I doubt our Bard would wear anything flashier.”

“Dale males tend to be pretty plainly turned out,” Ori observed, half to himself.

Dori made a moue, looking after Bard.

“I’ve always told Bard he could do better with himself. His facial hair is quite respectable, his nose isn’t too small. He wouldn’t disgrace a diamond or two.”

“Maybe he’s just letting Thranduil be the diamond for the moment.”

Dori looked down at him and grinned.

“Clever, pet. Very good.”

Sigrid giggled.

“If it’s any consolation, Dori, when he’s actually crowned he’ll have to have his other ear pierced. It’s traditional.”

Dori sighed.

“Plain gold hoops, I suppose. Still, we have to start somewhere.”

Ori could only imagine what Bard would look like if Dori had his way. Bard would be so dripping with jewels and spangles that he might as well be a heroine in a Shire novel. Ori suppressed a giggle, imagining Bard and Thranduil trying to outdance each other in filmy costumes.

Ori and his small group went up to find their seats at the high table. Ori noticed that Lady Galadriel sat on the other side of Thorin. As Ori passed, Galadriel peered at Thorin’s crown and her face was swept with a soft look of nostalgia.

“Ah, dear Queen Kivi. I remember her with great fondness.”

“You were acquainted?” Thorin asked.

“We used to get drunk together on occasion.”

“Milady, I simply can’t imagine that,” Thorin teased.

“I remember when she was doing research for her famed book. She was quite thorough, and slightly esoteric. You know, even I can’t do Illustration 20, and I’ve been alive for a very long time. Do you know how long Elrond spent with the healers after he tried Illustration 20? Or was it Celeborn?

“Or was it Tharkûn?” Bilbo asked with perfect complacency.

She shrieked with laughter.

“Oh, Master Bilbo, you’re terrible!”

“Yes,” Tharkûn agreed dryly, sitting on Bilbo’s other side. “Though, now that I’m here, perhaps I’ll find friendlier company with the oliphaunt.”

“Oh, stop sulking,” said Bilbo. “You’ll miss dinner. You’re as likely to skip a meal as I am.”

Fili sat with Sigrid just beyond Tharkûn and Ori sat next to them. He saw Dwalin heading his way and patted the seat next to him. Dwalin arrived and sat, kissing the top of Ori’s head as he did.

The food began to arrive. Dain saw this, cut off his conversation with Gheir, and leapt nimbly up onto the head table.

“Th’ food’s arrived!” Dain shouted. “Let’s sing it in properly!”

“Sit down!” Dori cried, smacking his real leg, to no effect. “You’re treading dirt into the nice table linens!”

“Here we go!” bellowed Dain. “A rousin’ chorus ’r twelve o’ ‘Me Zeydis’.”

All the dwarrow cheered, except for Thorin, who groaned.

“You don’t even have an excuse, Dain. You aren’t drunk yet!”

“Jus’ yeh wait!” Dain promised him, then called, “I’ll star’ out, an’ mind yer cues!”

Aewandínæn, shot up from his chair to storm off. Gloin grabbed him by the arm and yanked him back down without even looking or putting down his ale. Ori smothered a smile. If Gloin was getting bossy with Aewandínæn, it meant he was serious and approving of Gimli and Legolas’ relationship and was already planning their wedding.

Dain waved a hand at the dwarrow musicians, who gave him a starting bang on the drums then got a steady dance beat going - Tap-t’tapTap, Tap-t’tapTap!

“Oh! Me Zey-dis!” bawled Dais at the top of his lungs. “Me Zey-dis!

Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.

“Once again now!” Dain called to the assembled.

Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

Dain howled out the next verse,

“My Zey-dis found her Fancy One when I broke the belt across my tum.

Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.

“Everybody!” Dain called.

“Me Zey-dis!” A few of the Dale residents had picked up the chorus and gave it their all. “Me Zey-dis!”

Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

“Sing along with Jim now!” called Dain.

Jim hopped up on another table and led the chorus while waving his arms for emphasis.
“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

“It’s all most too sad to tell to you,” sang Dain.
“She took seven boxes of emeralds, too.
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.

“Everybody!” shouted Dain.

“Me Zey-dis!” Almost everyone was singing and Glorfindel’s, Legolas’, and the twins’ beautiful voices sailed over the top of the general noise. “Me Zey-dis!
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

“Once again now!” Dain called.

“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

Dain bawled out, “That tailor he really hurt my heart he made my drawers smell like a fart.
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.

“Everybody!” shouted Dain

“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!” Everyone at the head table sang, except Aewandínén. Or, they sang if they could around their laughter.
“Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

“Once again now!” roared Dain.

“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

“Members of the plumbing guild!” Dain yelled. A large group filling two tables immediately drank back their ale and gargled through it.
“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

“Everybody!” Dain shouted.

“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!” The hall rang with the music, the people bringing in the food had joined in and were dancing as they brought in their burdens.
“Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”
“Oh, why did she have t’ go away?” Dain sang,
“I ain’t see her since Durin’s Day.
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe an’ ran wi’ th’ tailor.

“Everybody!” Dain shouted

“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

“Everybody!” Dain hissed

All the voices dropped to a hiss.
“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe
an’ ran wi’ the’ tailor.”

“EVERYBODY!” Dain bellowed for the finale and everyone roared at the top of their lungs.

“Me Zey-dis! Me Zey-dis!
Me Zey-dis! She hocked me pickaxe an’ ran wi’ the’ tailorrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrrr
“Ladies, gentlemen, bearers, children of all ages! I, your master of ceremonies, present for your pleasure, excitement, wonder, and thrills, the Court of Miracles!”

Everyone cheered.

“And now,” Jim cried with great flair, “mind your plates, petticoats, and beards as we perform for your delight, The Drama of the Lady Warg-Slayer!”

Everyone cheered again and leaned forward eagerly as there was a great crash of drums.

Kib stalked into the room, brandishing a torch in one hand and a sword in the other. He was painted entirely green with lurid red and orange stripes, he wore a bright pink breech clout, and a single spiked horn jutted from his forehead. From somewhere among the musicians, there was a jangling like falling metal and the deep, ominous beat of a drum.

Abruptly Kib turned to the right and seemed to bring the torch to his lips, breathing out a tongue of flame over the shrieking audience and chuckling evilly. He breathed fire to the left, brandished his sword and stopped, screamed, and Biscuit charged out to stand beside him, hunkering down almost on his chest, growling and snarling, his fur all combed on end and his mouth slathering with what looked rather like the syrup they used to make blackberry fruit soda water. The warg rolled his eyes and thrust his head to the sky and gave a chilling yowl.

Together they charged one side of the audience, roaring and gibbering, stopping just close enough to make the audience flinch and the youngest squeak and hide behind their elders, then giggle nervously. Then he did it to the other side and Kib blew fire high into the air and screamed something about eating their livers.

Their savior arrived in the form of Floris, dressed in sparkling armor, shouting her challenge to this apparently hungry evildoer and his pet.

Kib threw back his head and laughed, ordering the warg to attack.

Biscuit snarled and leapt, knocking Floris to the ground where the two of them rolled in apparent struggle for life and death.

The audience was shrieking and cheering, swept away by the spectacle.

But the warg would not prevail!

Floris leapt to her feet and thrust her sword at it, seemingly piercing the creature through the chest.

"I slay you!" she cried.

Biscuit staggered back, as if mortally wounded, though Ori saw there was no blood on the sword, which he had on good authority was a collapsible prop.

The warg milked this death for all he was worth, listing off to one side, then another, stumbling, rolling his eyes, lolling his tongue and finally falling to the ground, flopping onto his back and sticking his legs straight in the air before collapsing in a heap.

Everyone watching cheered. Kib cried out in rage, smashing the sword and the torch together with a resounding metallic clang. His sword was real.

He lunged at the young hero, breathing fire and thrusting and slashing his blade as she danced and dodged, even darting around him and tumbling over his back to box his ears. He dropped the sword and torch, which immediately extinguished, and clapped his hands over his wounded head. She grabbed the sword, he spun, leaning forward, opened his maw to scream, and she shoved the sword right down his throat, then yanked it away.

Everyone in the room screamed, including Ori.

He had never seen them even rehearse such a thing.

Kib gave a dying performance to put Biscuit's to shame, falling to his knees, staggering to his feet, falling and rising, and finally giving a rattling moan and falling on his face at her boots.

Floris planted a foot on his fallen form and raised her sword with a shout of triumph, then Biscuit leapt up, Kib leapt up and the three of them bowed to the audience who went from stunned to frenzy in an instant.

Under the noise Ori overhead Ulfr saying to Thorin, "I know tha' Jim knows his business, but should a badger tha' age be doing tha'?"

"Shoving swords down people's throats?" Thorin asked.

"An' allowing a warg t' attack her, no matter how well it's trained!"
"She raised that warg from a pup," said Thorin. "And she's not a badger. Relatively speaking, she's a little younger than Gimli."

"Hard t' tell with blood that mixed. Don't even know how it was done."

"Exactly the way your adad told you it was done, Ulfr. When the adad and the amad love each other very much-"

"Fuck yeh, Thorin," Ulfr said, laughing. "Yeh know what I mean. Even if a live pebble comes from such a mix, I was always told th' halfbreeds were sickly an' wan."

"No offense, Ulfr, but I think if you accused Floris of being sickly and wan, she'd let Biscuit eat you."

Ulfr shook his head.

"A warg named Biscuit."

"Azog's warg was named Creampot."

"He didn' name his warg, 'Creampo'!"

"No, but the warg answered to it."

Ulfr sighed.

"I don' know Thorin. Aye, she's obviously a fine little dam, certainly strong enough, bu' does she consider herself of dwarrow or of men?"

"Does it matter?"

"It does matter. Who made her? Mahal or Eru? Did th' valar have t' collaborate?"

"She's a person, not piecework," said Thorin.

"An' tha'as another thin'. Practically speakin', is her loyalty t' men or t' dwarrow?"

"I've never asked," said Thorin. "It doesn't seem that important."

"Yeh'll think better o' tha' if yeh ever have a mountain full a' half-dwarrow an' a few thousand angry, armed men on yer doorstep."

"Are you really giving it this much thought, Ulfr, or is this just your gut talking?"

Ulfr's sighed.

"I'm too old f'r all this change, Thorin."

"Now you sound like Ahkn."

"No call t' be nasty. So yeh approve a' tha' Princess Sigrid an' yer Fili, then? An' yeh think yeh'll get a living heir out a' it?"

"Sigrid is a fine woman and she'll be a great queen. She's strong and stubborn, just like any dam. I don't see why not."

"What can she know of our ways?"

"Her mother died when her sister Tilda was born. Dori helped raise all of Bard's badgers."

"Ah."

"Dale is an interesting place. A few good things did come out of Thror's neglect. I doubt Sigrid would be so confident among the dwarrow if she wasn't raised by one."

"Certainly, she's a snappy dresser." Ulfr considered. "I still don' know, Thorin. It's fine f'r th' Longbeards, I suppose, an' if it's a command, well, yeh are me king."

Thorin shook his head.

"I'm not ordering anyone to marry or mix with anyone else. You make your own decisions about what's right for the Ironfists. Do what your heart tells you. Fili and Kili are happy, and I think it's because they're following their hearts."

"And Kili's flirtin' with tha' elf. Tha' the next thin' we'll be digestin'?"

"Possibly. She does find him hilarious."

"We all do, Thorin, f'r various reasons. He'll be a good second f'r Fili, certainly better than th' Asshat was f'r yeh."

He said that with a twinkle in his eye.

"So," said Thorin, "no commentary about my consorting with hobbits?"

"I'm no' worried about hobbits takin' over yer bloody mountain. Actually, I hear th' cake is really good."

The musicians started a tune which was mysterious and slightly menacing. Someone tossed a smoke bag and when the purple fog cleared there stood The Great Woudini.

He wore a very shiny deep blue robe spangled with astronomical symbols and a matching tall conical hat with a rolled brim.

He bowed to all and came to the head table. He was carrying something under his arm. By the shape, Ori knew it was the blue crystal ball under a black cloth. Woudini stopped before the table and bowed very deeply to Thorin.

“Greetings, Most High King of All Dwarrow. I felt the shimmering of your coronation in the great ether and have come to prophesi,” he intoned in an altered voice. “And now I, the Great Woudini, shall peer into the magic Crystal and reveal your royal fortune.”

He pulled the black cloth off the blue glass ball and the crowd oooo-ed’ and ‘ahhhh-ed’ at the sight of it.

Thorin sat forward and gave Frodo a wide-eyed gaze with an amused twinkle. Frodo was completely intrigued.

“He’s going to tell you the future, Idad Thorin!” the faunt piped in amazement.

“Indeed,” Thorin agreed gravely. “We had best pay heed to his wise and mysterious words.”

Woudini didn’t bat an eyelash at this and waved his hand about in what Ori supposed to be esoteric and magical passes. “Now close your eyes a moment,” Woudini ordered in a sing-song voice, “and let your third eye open. Now let us gaze into the Crystal and inquire of the spectral powers of the ether.”

Frodo promptly clapped both hands over his eyes and Thorin, fighting a grin, closed his briefly as well. The crowd murmured and whispered, delighting in this new show.

The Great Woudini waved his hands over the glass ball and chanted.

‘Wum-zigga-wum-zigga… Great Crystal tell us the fortune of this mighty dwarf king…Wum-wum-wum. EenyMeenyGelateeny, the spirits are about to speak!”

The great Woudini leaned over and stared into the glass ball.

“Mmmmm, fascinating. So very regal,” The Great Woudini commented, then bent over his glass ball again, this time he made several more whooo-ing noises and mumblings to the spectres of the ether.

“Great dwarf, yours shall be a rule of bounty and happiness. Your people will adore you, as you will be a king who is gentle, powerful, amusing and the stuff of legend. Your royal household shall be one of joy and noise and joyful noise. Your love is as devoted to you as you are to your love. And finally and, as before, in your future I see you both happily together surrounded by your seven children!”

“Seven children?” Bilbo squawked. Thorin laughed delightedly and rose, standing Frodo on the table.

“O Great Woudini, thank you for your deeply spiritual words. You are the only wizard I know who is capable of speaking with such clarity!”

Tharkûn made a rude noise, which Thorin ignored, and continued,

“I shall heed them and endeavor to live this ethereal truth you have shared. I only asked that my people assist me in this.”

There was a resounding cheer from all around and people began toasting the Great Woudini for his prophecy and Thorin as already being a gentle, powerful, amusing and stuff of legend kind of king.

The Great Woudini covered his crystal and bowed deeply to Thorin who return the bow and reached out his hand. The Great Woudini came forward and shook it. Frodo put out his hand, too. The Great Woudini shook it, bowed again, rose and tossed little glittering clouds over Thorin Bilbo and Frodo three times.

“Do I want to know?” Bilbo inquired.

The Great Woudini winked.

“Fairy dust, Master Baggins. Doesn’t it run in your family?’

“Oh, sod off!” Bilbo snapped, red as a beet.

Thorin laughed and Frodo examined the glitter now all over himself. The Great Woudini bowed to all and headed for the exit amid cheers.
He was almost out the door when Kili shot to his feet and yelled.
“Wait! You have to tell me!! What’s an ent?”
A lot of people laughed and chatted. Galadriel frowned and looked at Kili.
“Child, why do you ask such a question?”
Kili looked at Tauriel then explained.
“The Great Woudini said I was going to marry one by the end of the year. But now that I’ve met Tauriel, I don’t want to.”
Celeborn choked and dropped his wine, getting dark red stains down his front and on the table. He recovered, threw back his head and roared with laughter. Galadriel looked at him with wide-eyed delight. Ori wondered if this was why Galadriel had married him. Wreathed in laughter and joy, Celeborn was not a haughty elf lord but more like Glorfindel, handsome and openly friendly.
Celeborn regained his composure and turned to Kili; he was smiling and his eyes twinkled.
“My dear dwarfling. You think you’re going to marry an…” Celeborn swallowed carefully, “an ent?”
“It’s what the Great Woudini said the first time we met him,” Kili related truthfully.
“And you don’t know what an ent is?”
“No, sir.”
“Oh dear,” Celeborn began to chuckle again.
“What’s an ent?” Kili demanded.
From behind Kili, Dis shook her head vehemently at the elf lord. Celeborn drew himself together and tried to look severely at Kili. Ori didn’t think it was a very good attempt.
“My dear dwarf prince,” Celebron explained solemnly. “Ents are ancient beings. I lack the words to initiate your intellect to fully comprehend their beguiling fascination. I believe the only way for you to come to appreciate them, as they are strangely natural yet cryptic in their almost omniscience, would be to meet one.”
“Oh,” said Kili, who, with the ale he’d drunk, was having a little trouble with such a mound of adjectives. He sat down again, his face full of confusion. Tauriel returned with two full tankards, put them on the table in front of Kili and climbed into his lap. Kili grinned and hugged her, all thoughts of natural yet cryptic omniscience forgotten.
Fanfare blared and Ruelis ran to the center of the room, opened her arms wide and exclaimed, "Now yeh'll see th' strength of a dam!"
She had braided her beard into a single plait and bound in a loop of thick leather strap at the end. Slowly, she turned in place, then gained speed, faster and faster until she was only a sparkling blur. With a shout, Fior raced in from the entry way, grasped the leather strap as it whipped past and jumped.
The crowd gasped and the dwarrow roared as Ruelis spun Fior round and round by her beard, and when they thought she could go no faster, she put on a burst of speed and Fior abruptly let go of the harness. She spun to a stop, but he flew through the air in somersaults, hit the floor with a handspring, turned another and another. Jim appeared in Fior's path and cupped his hands. Fior turned one more handspring, landed with his foot dead in the center of Jim's palms and Jim tossed him high in the air, where he turned another somersault and landed solidly on Jim's two upstretched hands.
"Ready?” Jim shouted, though it seemed more for the audience than for his grinning son.
"Ready!”
Jim tossed, Fior leapt, seemed to fold in half in the air and landed upside down, his hands in Jim's, balanced there.
Slowly, Fior shifted his weight to one side, then another, then withdrew his left hand until he was balanced upside-down on his right.
Jim hunkered slightly, then sprang up, tossed Fior into another flip, and caught the dwarfling as he landed on a single foot in Jim's palm.
They did this again and again until Jim shouted, "Going to puke yet?”
"Dunno! Let's see!" Fior replied.
"Yah, I've had plenty of that, thanks," said Jim.
Fior gracefully tumbled to the ground and they bowed to the cheering crowds.
Jim and Fior ran off to the side as Ruelis and Zendi entered, juggling hatchets, tossing them back and forth.
"Finally!" Radagast cried. "I love jugglers!"
"Oi!" Ruelis cried. "I got an itch!"
While she ostentatiously scratched her own arse she continued to toss the hatchets back and forth with her free hand.
Zendi shouted, "I know what you mean! We must have fleas!"
And she started to scratch her back with the handle of each hatchet before tossing it off, a complicated pattern of catching, twisting her wrist to shove the handle end down her back, and twisting it again to toss it away.
Ori swallowed. If she mixed up the ends she would slice herself open, and everyone in the room knew it.
Floris popped in, carrying a great axe, and seemed to throw it carelessly into the mix. Then she joined them, the three of them tossing the hatchets and one great axe to each other, dedicating one hand to the partner to their left, the other to the partner to their right.
Floris yawned.
"Tired, love?" Ruelis cried. "Why don't yeh take a nap?"
"Good idea." Floris replied, and closed her eyes, and dropped her head to the side, continuing to juggle.
One by one the hatchets were retired and Zendi and Floris slipped away until it was just Ruelis, holding the great axe tenderly.
"Alone a' last," she cooed to it.
Jim and Fior returned with drums and started a slow, steady beat. Ruelis held the great axe aloft, bowing to King Ahkn, who gave her a nod and a smile that was all ferocious teeth. The drums grew louder, the beat faster, and Ruelis danced.
Every dwarf and dam in the room roared at once, causing nearly everyone else some alarm.
"What is she going to do?" Bilbo asked.
Ori grinned, turning to a fresh sketching page and grabbing up a new graphite wand.
"Stonefoot Axe Dance! I've always wanted to sketch it."
"Should she be - " Bilbo sucked in a breath. "Should she be swinging that around like - Yavanna preserve me!"
"It's a very ancient dance," Ori said, having to shout above the now chanting dwarrow. "It came from our ancestors acting out how they chopped off the heads of orcs, one after another."
"Ah, I see," said Bilbo, looking around nervously, obviously for Frodo.
Frodo sat on Thorin's knee, the two of them watching the dance in fascination with mouths identically hung open.
The warrior dwarrow in the crowd commenced to stomp in time with the drums. Many of their warrior guests were caught up in the excitement, and Glorfindel bellowed his approval.
Dain shot to his feet with a whoop. "Spin it, lassie!"
Sculdis, at his elbow, yelled, "Make tha' axe sing!"
Ruelis tossed the spinning axe in the air, caught it in and tossed it again and again.
The guards around the room moved to the edge of the performance floor, facing the crowd, their own weapons drawn.
"Are they afraid the dwarrow will attack her?" Bilbo gasped.
"Sometimes the dance makes dwarrow a little excitable," said Ori, rapidly turning to a new page, "and the younger ones can be a little rash. This dance is usually done outside."
By Ruelis' bow many of the dwarrow tweens were bashing foreheads, burning off their nervous energy, and more than one dwarf was heard to shout, "Now there's a dam worth killin' f'r!"
Thorin finally sat Frodo on the table, stood and held up his hands.
"No dying tonight, my friends! There's still dancing to be had!"

As the entertainers cleaned up, a far more sedate group took their place, with flutes and viols to calm the highly charged air. Thranduil had been fascinated, though in a less excitable state than the dwarrow. Lindir had to be brought outside for fresh air.

Galadriel enthused, "That's the best axe dance I've seen in centuries!"

When Jim's performers had rested, washed and changed, they returned to the room to great applause. Thorin thanked them profusely and sat them at the royal table with the Durins.

After they had eaten, the musicians went for an ale break and Elrond nodded to Lindir, who was apparently sufficiently refreshed. Lindir stood and a small group of visiting elves gathered and formed up in a line behind him. They went to the middle of the performance area and faced the head table. As one, they bowed to Thorin.

"Your majesty," said Lindir, "we present to you this token of our esteem and we hope that you enjoy it."

Lindir stood back in line with the others and cleared his throat. The elves nodded to him each in turn to signal their readiness and Lindir sang out in a high, warbling note and held it. He was joined by another elf with an equally lofty note, and then another and another until Lindir's tone shot up perilously high and he called out,

"Yo-de LAY hee HOOOOOOOOOOOO!"

And one at a time, the rest followed suit.

There were no actual words, not that Ori recognized anyway, only increasingly higher and lower pitches of those tremulous notes in intricate harmonies that swooped around one another in perfectly beautiful, startling sounds, faster and slower and faster still.

Ori sighed. Dori sighed. Even Oin sighed.

Bard fell out of his chair, laughing and choking.

Thranduil regarded him cooly.

"Do no laugh so hastily. We adapted this from the specialized songs of your own ancestors."

"My ancestors were calling cattle!" Bard cried.

When the elves had done, they all heard a chorus of bovine lowing from the meadows outside.

"Still works," said Balin, nodding.

"Oh, do get up," said Thranduil to Bard, who sat on the floor with his knees drawn up, supporting his forehead. He was laughing so hard, tears rolled down his cheeks.

The dwarrow, on the other hand, were moved to genuine emotion.

"I've never heard anythin' so beautiful," said Sculdis. "Oh, sing it again!"

The rest of the dwarrow all called out for more. Bard used this uproar to excuse himself. Chopper went with him.

When the next rest came, any leftover food was moved to tables off to the side and replenished with cakes, sweets, cookies, and desserts of all kinds. The remaining tables occupied by guests were likewise moved to make a larger floor for dancing.

People were full of food. They were also full of drink, and getting fuller.

Dain and Theoden had been matching each other drink for drink for at least a half hour, and though Theoden was getting the worst of it, it certainly didn't dim his jovial mood.

Theoden wove over to the table followed by Dain, who looked ready to be amused, as Bard returned. Theoden elbowed Bard with what Ori imagined was supposed to be a friendly nudge.

"Your daughter, is she marriageable?" he asked, considerably louder than he would sober, Ori decided.

Bard cut his eyes at Theoden.

"Pardon?"

"Your Sigrid. She's quite a fine chunk of woman flesh. I'm free m'self."

Ori wasn't sure what, if anything, he should do. Dain was trying not to laugh.

Bard ground out to Theoden, "Excuse me."

He stalked over to Sigrid where she now sat with Fili, Thorin, Dori and Dis and announced, "I “Da?” Sigrid asked.
“I approve. Of your—” He violently waved his hand between Sigrid and Fili.
Dis swallowed and carefully placed her glass on the table.
“Bard? Are you all—”
“I approved of your engagement to Kili - I mean Fili!” Bard shouted with more vigor than necessary.

The room grew silent and everyone turned to watch.
Fili ventured, “Thank you?”
“The sooner you marry, the better!” Bard barked. The crowd cheered and toasts were now drunk to the suddenly betrothed couple.
“Da,” said Sigrid, “what happened?”
“King Theoden called you a fine chunk of woman flesh!”
Dori stood, absolutely incensed.
“Of course she’s a fine chunk of woman flesh! I did an excellent job.”
All the dwarrows within earshot agreed that, yes, this was so.
“Aye,” Balin said. “Yeh did an’ she is.”
“Da!” Tilda said plaintively from his side where she had appeared from under the table with Roäc, “do I get to be a fine chunk of woman flesh when I grown up?”
“No, you don’t and no, you won’t. Grow up, that is. Unless you become a scribe, and then you’ll be boarding in the library.”
“How long?” Tilda asked, bewildered.
“Until you’re forty or I’m dead, whichever comes first.”
“Pretty strict,” Roäc opined.
Sigrid sighed and stood.
“Da, if that bulging vein in your head is anything to go by, I’d say the ‘dead’ part could happen at any moment.”

Thranduil swept over from across the room and caught Bard up to sweep him back toward the door.
“Come along, my dear. It’s a lovely night. We’ll watch the stars. The air is cool. You can stand on the hill and survey your kingdom and reflect on your accomplishments.”

Dwalin muttered into his drink, “Try t’ keep th’ hickeys where he kin hide ‘em, laddie.”

Theoden shrugged.
“Time fer another drink. Dain?”
“Aye, try an’ stop me. Will yeh join us, Bilbo lad?”
“A drink?”
“Of beer. I know yeh hobbity fellers have tha’.”
“I may have sampled some a time or two, yes.”
“Grand! Care t’ make a bit o’ a wager?”
“Well, I don’t know…”
Ori groaned and hid his face in his hand.
Bilbo, you are my friend, he thought, but you can be a true arsehole.
The dwarf, the man and the hobbit headed to a newly arrived hogshead and Dain began pouring out for them. Ori turned back and went to the table where Thorin lounged in his chair with Frodo out cold against his coat.
“Your Bilbo,” Ori accused, “is off to drink Theoden King and Dain under the table, the chair, and possibly the floor.”

“Is he?” Thorin sat up. “Excellent. Let’s watch.”
Sigrid sat back down with an annoyed sigh.
Fili put an arm about her shoulders and said, “I don’t understand how people can mix up Kili and I. I’m blond, he’s dark. We don’t even look that much alike! My beard is excellent.”
““I heard that!” Kili cried.
“You were meant to, shalehead,” said Fili.
“I knew that.”
“Don’t worry,” said Sigrid with a smile. “I’ll never accidentally call you ‘Kili’ in bed.”
Fili did a spit take.
“Promise?”
“Pinky swear.”

As this was all taking place, dwarrow from the mountain maintenance guild began to set up some kind of structure at the far end of the room. Ori watched and realized it was a stage. He frowned, turned to Thorin, who winked, and Ori remembered.

Frodo was wakened from his nap and told he needed to be ready.
“For what?” he asked.
“Anything,” said Thorin mysteriously.
“Oh. All right.”

Thorin stood. Immediately he had everyone’s attention. Ori thought that might be a useful skill to have, then he realized he’d probably die of mortification on the spot.

“My dear friends,” said Thorin, “first I’d like to thank all our musicians for sharing their art with us. Now, I know many of you young people have different standards for music, unlike us old fogies, so I have researched this topic, and I understand you enjoy something called the… wag?”

The youngsters in the room screamed and cheered.
“I guess I said that right,” Thorin mused. “Then, I looked into it a little more closely and found that the name of the… er… band? Band?”
“Yep,” said Frodo helpfully.
“Thank you. The band who developed this new form of music was called the… White Castle?
White City! That’s it. The White City Bang Crash.”
Screams of delight affirmed this was so.

Thorin smiled.
“This is my coronation. My friends, The White City Bang Crash.”
Thorin gestured as the band mounted the stage.

The band tuned their instruments and attempted to thank the audience numerous times, but it was a while before they could make themselves heard.

Dipfa swooned.
“Oh, look at their costumes!”

Except for the drummer, who was dressed in black with a black hood, they wore identical white jumpsuits with the wide legs tucked into bright orange, calf-high boots with stacked heels. They were all young women and men, except for an elf with a base guitar.

Glorfindel gaped.
“Elbereth! It can’t be!”
“Can’t be?” Ori prompted.

Ecthelion spotted him immediately.
“You didn’t!” he shouted back. “What in Arda are you doing here?”
“I made too much noise, they sent me back!”

“Hah! I’ll give you noise, my friend!”

The elf turned to the drummer and waved.
“Drum!” hollered the drummer and slammed his sticks down for the beginning of ‘Ghostriders through Anórín’.

The first chord blew hair back across the room.
Everyone, young and old, began to pack the floor and they wagged!
"Queen Mavey!" Floris cried. "Come dance with us!"
Mavey turned to Gheir, all excitement.
"Let's go and dance, husband!"
Mavis II barked a laugh, which turned into a cough.
Mavis I said, "By all means, husband, let's!"
Gheir looked like he would really rather not, but since even Ahkn had decided to attempt it, the younger king really couldn't refuse.
"Why not?" Gheir asked, rising. "Perhaps all my beloved wives will join in?"
Mavey practically jumped up and down.
"Oh, yes! All my sisters should try it! This is going to be so great!"
She grabbed Gheir's hand and, in a very unqueenly fit of giggles, yanked him into the thick of the crowd where he proved to be quite adept at wagging and shoogling.
Ori thought it must be all that practice.
Mavey threw herself into the dance with all the spring of youth, looking happier than Ori had ever seen her. When the song ended, Gheir and the two eldest Mavi returned to their table, but the others kept dancing. Mavey danced with Floris, with Bilbo, even with Galadriel. Gheir looked on benevolently, until she started dancing with Arne.
Suddenly Gheir didn't look so indulgent, or at all happy. He watched with unease as Mavey danced with Theodred, with Tauriel, then with Ellodan. Then she started to dance with Hild.
Gheir shot up and stormed the dance floor, grasping Mavey by the elbow in mid-gyration.
It didn't look like a punishing grip, but it was enough to stop her.
He hissed something.
Mavey looked confused and Hild exasperated.
Mavey shook her head at him, protesting, but he led her firmly back to the table, seating her between himself and Mavis I with grim finality.
Mavey looked stunned.
Mavis I shrugged. Ori overheard her saying, "You're Gheir's queen now, dear. You can't just go frolicking with anyone, particularly anyone named Hild."
Mavey turned to Gheir who continued to glare obstinately forward.
The young queen sat, bewildered and miserable.
Dori, who had witnessed the whole thing, approached their Stiffbeard majesties and said, "Queen Mavis XV? You look rather fatigued, my dear. Perhaps you would care to take a turn about the courtyard?"
"If my husband permits it, Honored Bearer," said Mavey. "Though I know he wouldn't want me to flaunt myself with you."
Gheir drew his head back, enraged. Dori rested a quelling hand on his arm.
"I'm sure he realizes you are perfectly safe with me. Don't you, your majesty?"
Not even Gheir could hold that particular gaze for more than a moment.
"Of course, Bearer. You do us honor. Go along now, Mavis. We'll send a page if you are needed."
The celebrants wagged and drank and partied far into the night, until even Glorfindel seemed to sag with it. Ori did his share of dancing, but he was still very wound up when the Bang Crash took their first break, and he realized he was hungry once more.
Ori went to get himself a snack, and as he passed the table where Glorfindel, Bofur and Nori were sprawled, he heard Glorfindel say, "Not as much fun being reborn as you'd think."
"Really?" Ori asked. "May I please write all this down?"
"Suit y'self," said Glorfindel.
Ori sat and took out his notebook and a graphite wand. He wasn't even going to attempt ink in this state.
"So, what was so bad about coming back?"
"They buried what was left of me after the Balrog got through with me. I wouldn't'a minded, but they buried my sword, too, and all my other gear. On top of a mountain! Took me forever to dig my "Awkward," said Bofur.self up."
Nori took a deep swallow of beer.
“How were y’ lookin’?”
“Not so good,” said Glorfindel. “In fact, mighty crispy.”

“Aye,” said Glorindel with a sigh.
“Time for another round,” said Nori, scouting for the closest barrel. He spied one, wove to his feet, grabbed for his mug and missed the first two times.

Glorfindel swept up every cup on the table in one hand and said, “I’ll go with you.”
“Aye, me too,” said Bofur.
“Suit yerselves,” said Nori. Obviously, he was bent on the direct route to the barrel. Of course, there was a pillar between him and that barrel.

Ori followed along, hoping against hope for more facts about being dead from Glorfindel.
Nori walked through the pillar.
Glorindel didn’t.

The sound of face smacking stone made Ori queasy, but that was nothing to watching all seven feet and two inches of Glorfindel fall back and hit the ground like an elm tree.

Ori thought, Great, he’s dead again.
But then Glorfindel groaned and sat up, rubbing his face.

“What hit me?”

Bofur leaned over him.
“You damaged the pillar!”
“I damaged my face!”
“Well, you’ve paid each other off, then. C’mon, up ye get. Don’t know why y’ wanna walk into pillars anyway.”

Nori turned to watch, and turned back again and was nearly face to face with Radagast the Brown, who had to be among the shortest non-dwarrow he’d ever seen.

“Well then,” said Radagast, “and who are these fine ladies?”

Nori stared at him, looked down at himself, back up at Radagast and said, “One word, mate: spectacles.”

“Oh, not you, silly dwarf! Come to Uncle now!”

Assault and Battery leapt out of Nori’s hair and landed, clinging, to the front of Radagast’s shirt, chittering with excitement.

“Oi!” Nori cried, enraged. “You leave my girls alone, daughter-thief!”

“Lot of that going around,” said Bard who had apparently aired himself out to his own satisfaction.

“Who’re good girls, then? Who are good girls?” Radagast crooned as the ferrets went through his pockets. “No, no, dear, not that one. You’ll wake Arthur and he’s in a grumpy mood. Here you go, have some treats.”

Bofur whacked Nori’s arm and, pulling Glorfindel along, went to the barrel. Dain was there with Theoden and Bilbo. Dain greeted them with loud joviality then went to the nearest table and climbed up on it.

“T’ me cousin, Th’rin!” he roared raising his tankard to Thorin, back at the table.

Everyone looked his way and cheered.

“I ‘ave a third pressieswessie f’r ya, me ol’ cuz, me ol’ pain-in-th’-arse, me ol’ fruit an’ nut!”

“Bring out the third present!” came the shouts from around the room.

“I’ve written a song f’r yeh,” Dain bellowed. “An’ I’m gonna sing it!”

“Sing the song!” the crowd roared back.

Dain opened his mouth,

“O me luve f’r Thorin’s like th’ red, red nose
Tha’s newly sprung fra ale;
O me luve f’r Thorin’s like th’ sneeze
Tha’s sweetly comes fra a hay bale.
So drunk are me, me elder cuz,
So deep me cups am I;
An’ I will luve yeh still, me cuz,
’Til a’ th’ ale barrels go dry.
’Til a’ th’ barrels go dry, my cuz,
An’ ‘r heeds melt wi’ th’ booze,
I will love yeh still, me cuz,
While th’ beer o’ life make us wooze.
An’ raise yer cup, me fav’rite cuz!
An raise yer cup, as king!
An’ I’ll drink wi’ yeh again, me cuz,
As it helps us all t’ sing!!!”

Dain bowed deeply, almost fell off the table, then raised his tankard again. Cheers and laughter greeted him. Thorn raised his cup in appreciation.

“Touching, Dain. Truly.”
“Yeh wan’t t’ hear it again?”
“No.”

Ori realized he wasn’t going to get anything remotely sensible out of any of them and, after having a couple of ales with them, weaved his way back to the head table.

When he got there Dori was talking to Thorin with the sincerity of the truly plastered.

“Thorin, dear, now your beard’s grown back in so nice, I don’t suppose you’ll do something different with it? That single knot hanging from your chin won’t do.”

“It’s perfectly serviceable,” said Thorin.
“It’s too plain. A single knot! You can do better.”
Kili chirped up, “A double knot?”
Dori wouldn’t even dignify that, but Thorin said, “There you go, Dori, the perfect solution.”

“I’m not listening!” Dori cried.

“Then how did you know what Idad said?” asked Kili.

“Actually,” said Thorin, “I was thinking I’d leave it loose and undecorated. Udad Thror had all those gold bars decorating his beard, but he had a strong enough face to carry it.”

“Not to mention a strong enough beard,” said Dis.
“I think my hair and beard collide nicely,” said Thorin. “I rather like how it looks.”
“I’m rather fond it myself,” said Bilbo, returning from the ale barrel.
He leaned over Frodo and looked up at Thorin.

“Someone needs to be put to bed,” said Bilbo.

“The king got to his feet with Frodo in his arms. The room fell into bleary silence.

“My friends,” said Thorin, “I’m retiring for the night, but please stay and enjoy our hospitality for as long as you like. Thank you all for joining us today.”

He bowed and a cheer rose, followed by several very loud and not so discrete well-wishes.

Five minutes later, Bard didn't seem all that concerned when the first ale cup flew over his head. When the first full ale cup sailed past a minute later, he turned to Bain.

"Son, Tilda's out cold. Would you please bring her up to the rooms and put her to bed?"
Bain said, "Yes, Da.’” immediately, though he looked mortified.

Ori could guess why. None of the other kings seemed to even notice the dwarrow were growing increasingly rowdy. The other princes were not being sent away for their own safety.

Abruptly Stonehelm stood and turned to his mother.
"Mam, I think I'll go with 'em, if yeh don't mind? I'm startin' t' feel less than chipper."
Sculdis nodded and squeezed his shoulder.
"Aye, go an' get some sleep. T'morrah yeh'll be well-rested when th' rest a' us are no doubt followin' princess protocol."
"Durin protocol!" Dis barked from the other side of the table, rolling her eyes.
Bain shot Stonehelm a grateful look, kissed Bard, picked up his sister and the three of them left.
"I feel like a total hypocrite doing that," said Bard. "When I was his age I was drinking and fighting alongside grown men."
"But that's not what you want for him," said Ori. "Is it hypocrisy or just knowing better?"
"Dunno. Maybe sometimes it's the same thing."
Ori pondered this and refilled his tankard. He drank and stared at the contents, then chuckled at himself. He’d filled it with wine not ale. He wanted more ale but he had to get rid of the wine first. He shrugged and drank the wine. A keg was rolled across the table and he happily refilled his mug with ale. He stared down the table and there was Aewandín, not drinking, eating, or having any fun. He just sat there, like a sack of potatoes, except, Ori knew from his wide experience of them that potatoes were delicious, so it had to be a sack of something else as he was quite sure Aewandín was not in anyway delicious.
Ori drank back his ale and marched over to his husband.
“Husband.”
Dwalin grinned at him.
“Aye, love. Yeh drunk?”
“Very and I’m not going to throw up.”
“Good t’ know, love Wha’ yeh goin’ t’ do instead?”
“I’m going to have talk with that silly, grumpy owl.”
“Oh, aye?”
“Yes, I am. I wanted you to know in case he decided to throw me out the upper window.”
“I’ll keep a watch he don’t, love.”
“Thank you,” Ori said gravely and marched away. He stopped and thought that, since Dwalin was his husband, he ought to have kissed him. He went back, grabbed Dwalin by the beard, yanked him down, kissed him thoroughly, and turned to march away again.
Aewandín was seated next to his father, looking disgusted, at the other end of the long table. Ori climbed onto a chair, up onto the table, and walked down the length of it. He politely greeted his friends as he passed. They were all laughing and smiling. It was quite proper for them to do so, as this was a party. He reached Aewandín, King Thranduil and the older Durins sitting near to him. Ori crossed his arms and looked frowningly down at the eldest elf prince.
“Listen, you silly, grumpy owl, you and I are going to have a little chat.”
“Oh, are we?” Aewandín curled his lip at Ori.
Ori sat down on the prince’s empty plate, hooked his feet under the arms of the chair and wrenched the chair and prince forward.
Aewandín gasped and glanced at Thranduil. Thranduil looked rather intrigued, as did all the Durins.
“You,” Ori said sharply and pointed his finger very close to the prince’s nose, “are acting like Thorin’s younger brother Frerin. Do you know what happened to him?”
Aewandín looked bored and sighed.
“Yes, I heard. He wasn’t able to attend the coronation so that funny fellow, Buj, stood for him. What of it?”
“Yes,” Ori agreed a little louder than he intended. “Do you know what everyone calls him?”
“Frerin, King of Belegost?” Aewandín replied sarcastically.
“Maybe, but most dwarrow and men and elves refer to him as King Asshat.”
“Asshat?” Aewandín stared at him, utterly confused. “Asshat? What does that mean?”
“Exactly what it is - Ass-Hat.”
Such a thing is as stupid as it is senseless. There is no use for such an item. Why is—"
Aewandínén trailed off as Ori nodded at him.
Real anger flashed in Aewandínén’s eyes.
“How dare you! Do you know who I am?”
“Yes, “ Ori said slowly, “but you seem to have forgotten.”
“Pardon?”
“You are the eldest son of the king of the Greenwood and sindarin and sylvan elves. Should you conduct yourself as you have been?”
“What?”
“You represent your people. You want all the people here, from all over Arda, feeling sorry for your father because he, Legolas and Tauriel are the only ones of your family who aren’t asshats?”
“I am my father’s heir, and the sanctity of—“ “Sanctity—shmanctity,” Ori said with some difficulty. “You are your father’s heir. Your father is immortal. Sauron is gone and in the hands of the valar to be judged for his behavior. Your father is well able to deal with any orc packs. Unless he plans to go to Khazad-dûm and wake up the Balrog again or go north to hunt whatever dragons might be left, he’s not going to die.”
Aewandínén stared at Ori.
“What do you like?” Ori changed tactics as he was suddenly interested.
“Like?”
“Yes. What do you think of when you open your eyes in the morning?”
“I don’t know. That’s a strange question and—”
“Well, what do you think if you’re standing in your father’s throne room looking at your people?”
Aewandínén snorted
“That there are several who could have spent more time on their hair,” he said petulantly.
“There,” Ori rejoiced. “You like hair.”
“Of course I like hair,” Aewandínén snapped. “I’m an elf, part of our beauty is our hair and how we arrange it.”
“Beautiful hair?”
“Yes, dwarf.”
“You like arranging hair and making it beautiful? Then, why don’t you do that?”
Aewandínén stared at him, completely at sea.
Ori turned and looked around. His eyes lit on Dis, who was watching his exchange with Aewandínén with great interest.
“There,” Ori pointed at Dis. “Princess Dis has lovely hair. What would you do to make it more beautiful?”
Aewandínén stared at Dis, who blinked in surprise.
“I… Well, I suppose I would pomade it, then cut the front and curl it so she had curls framing her face and ringlets down lower and put a few in her beard.”
Dis touched the wisps on her forehead and looked thoughtful.
“I would also take hair at the crown of her head and gather it into a top knot and let the rest fall free. It would be high and show about her coronet with more curls.”
Ori nodded, enjoying the movement of his skull. His eye lit on a very elderly Dale man.
“What about that man over there?”
Aewandínén leaned his chin on his elbow, studying the elder.
“I would first tidy his beard, then divided it in two and have each part set to braids. Perhaps with a ribbon threaded through. His hair must be washed thoroughly to bring out the white. He is balding, but has a great deal at the nape of his neck. This should be braided to hang neatly down his back.
Perhaps a cap of some kind if he works outside to protect his skin from the sun.”
Ori found another person and gestured. Once again Aewandínén suggested improvements.
Ori pushed Aewandínén’s chair back a little and unhooked his feet. He slid his bottom off Aewandínén’s plate and crossed his legs and tucked them up.
“Tell me, Aewandínén, do you know how bad the infestation of head lice is in the poorer parts of “What?” cried Aewandín, clearly horrified. “They must be treated immediately. I know exactly what solution should be prepared. The lice will make their heads itch and they will scratch them and the children doubly so and the scratches may get infected!”

“That’s already happening,” Ori told him.

Aewandín stood quickly. “I must find King Bard and speak to him immediately!”

“Yep, I’m over here,” said Bard from the other side of the table.

Aewandín ran up to him and started talking at speed.

Bard raised an eyebrow and interrupted.

“I’m rather drunk. Do you want to have this talk now, or when I’ll remember it?”

“We’ll have it twice!”

“Rapture,” said Bard.

Ori uncurled his legs. He felt very pleased with Aewandín. He looked over at Thranduil. The king smiled tenderly and laid his hand upon his breast and bowed his head.

“Thank you, Ori.”

“You’re welcome,” Ori chirped.

Ori was tired. He curled himself around and lay on his side with his head on a pile of napkins and closed his eyes. He only just heard Dori saying,

“Ahhh, he’s just like a little rump roast.”

Ori woke when Dwalin got out of bed and went to the fireplace door. It opened a little, there was a brief conversation, then Dwalin sighed and returned and started to pull on his trousers. It was still dark, Ori noticed, with just a phosphorous lamp for light.

“What is it?” Ori asked muzzily.

“Mavis XV has defected t’ th’ Blacklocks.”
Brawls, Beans Spilled, and Breakfast

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Stiffbeards, Blacklocks and bickering! Oh my! What a shocking development! And where in all of Arda did Aewandín disappear off to? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori sat bolt upright, causing the room to heave and swirl around him.
“So… so… that means-” Ori’s brain fumbled itself into some kind of order.
“Aye, Gheir’s tryin’ t’ lay siege t’ Hild’s quarters wi’ a squad o’ soldiers, and Hild’s defendin’ her quarters wi’ a squad o’ her own.”
Ori groaned.
“Blessed Mahal. In Fundin House. Where practically every head of state in Arda is in harm’s way.”
“Aye, tha’s about it.”
Ori took a deep breath, grit his teeth, and threw back the covers. As he swung his legs over the side of the bed, he willed himself to function. That went well, so he thought he’d try standing up.
Oh, alright. He could stand. He could see one of everything. He could see his husband suddenly right in front of him, grasping both of Ori’s shoulders in worry.
“Where’re yeh goin’, love?”
“With you. There has to be a scribe present.”
“No” really, love. I kin always tell yeh lat-” Abruptly, Dwalin stopped talking. “Yer goin’, ain’t ye.”
“Yes. I don’t feel like throwing up right at the moment, so now is my chance.”
“Yer goin’ t’ stay behind me, righ’?”
“Pinky swear.”
Ori copied Dwalin and pulled his breeches up over his night shirt, put on his boots, grabbed his scribe’s kit, and followed Dwalin into the hall.
Dori appeared in a dainty dressing gown of blue and silver patchwork.
“What’s happened?” Dori immediately demanded. “Should I make tea?”
Dwalin snorted.
“Laced medicinally.”
Balin poked his head out around the door jamb.
“I suppose yeh need me t’ be diplomatic?”
“Yeh might say tha’, aye,” Dwalin groused. “Gheir an’ Hild’re abou’ t’ turn th’ upstairs hall int’ a battlefield.”
“Oh, dear,” sighed Dori, sounding more exasperated than worried. “It’s Mavey, I suppose. Of course it is. I’ll get dressed.”

The din could be heard long before Dwalin, Ori and Balin reached the particular hallway where the royal guests were quartered. It was a long hallway, and Dori had purposely put Gheir and Hild and their parties at the far end of it. In the lamplight hunkered a dozen heavily-armed and pointy dwarrow, weapons drawn, and their royal majesties almost nose to nose in the midst of them.
Aris stood behind Hild with Ahkn. Mavis I stood behind Gheir. Neither Aris nor Mavis I looked particularly angry. Ahkn wore his nightshirt, and otherwise looked like a dwarf who was involved peripherally, if not accidentally.

Snur, Dain and Ulfr lounged in the hallway itself, obviously still drunk, while puzzled men and elves stuck their heads into the hall at random moments. Bard had come out and leaned against the wall behind the dwarf kings. It was obvious he was also still drunk and having trouble focussing his eyes. Stonehelm appeared and yawned at his father, who patted his head.

“Yer scheming she-orc!” Gheir shouted. “Dancing wasn’t enough! You had to have all of her!” “She is safe in a private room in my quarters of her own free will,” Hild barked. “Where, no doubt, you and Aris will go because you want someone to watch!” “Neither Aris nor I have not touched Mavis, nor will we, you filth-minded goblin. She is under my protection.” “She’ll need protection from you!” yelled Gheir. Hild sneered deliciously. “She asked for protection from you.” “That is a lie!” “She’s afraid of you, you three-legged worm.” “I have done nothing to make her afraid,” he scoffed. “That is a lie!” she mocked.

Gheir drew back, a crack in his fury widening into fear. “Where is she? I want to talk to her.” “But she doesn’t want to talk to you. She has cast her lot with the Blacklocks. I will protect her as one of my own.” “She is not yours.” “She’s certainly not yours, Gheir. With all those wives, I’m amazed you noticed she was missing.” “You couldn’t handle the same number of wives as I do!” “I don’t need to. I have Aris, she is my One and she is enough. Whereas, you simply can’t make up your tiny mind.”

Dwalin strode past Dain, scattering the visiting royal guards with a snarl then, drawing his hammer and Grasper, smiled at the two combatants, who looked at him, growled, and turned back to each other. “Evening, yer majesties,” said Dwalin with a bow, but never taking his eyes from them. He returned to his full height, which was half a head above both. Dwalin leaned on his hammer, swinging Grasper in a menacing manner. Dwalin motioned with his chin as Balin arrived and bowed to the two angry monarchs with his best palliating smile. “Pardon us interruptin’, yer majesties, but it’s me duty t’ remind yeh tha’ Fundin House is full o’ innocent, intoxicated royal guests. Yeh kin draw yer swords, bu’ only on each other. Otherwise, all a’ yer heads’ll be decoratin’ pikes in his majesty’s courtyard. I trust I’m bein’ clear on that.” Gheir snorted, Hild gave a curt nod. “Very good. Carry on, then,” said Balin, who gave another gracious bow and drifted back to stand back by Ori.

Gheir drew his weapon. Ori thought, Oh, he prefers the sword. It occurred to him this was the dwarfiest thought he could possibly have in this situation. Hild smirked at Gheir and didn’t even bother drawing her own.

“What d’ya reckon?” Snur asked Dain. "One a’ us should jump in," said Dain. "How drunk're yeh?" "Not drunk enough to want Hild mad at me." "Righ’. Stay here, then. If she chops me balls off, save ’em f’r Sculdis. She’ll have ’em bronzed.” "Got it."
Dain strode over to stand beside Gheir, who grunted and nodded in acknowledgement. "What is he doing?" Bard hissed to Ori, who was busy noting down who was present and which loyalties had been honored.

"Dain’s just evening up the sides," said Ori, still writing a a furious pace. "Ahkn has to stand with Hild. They have a pact, and Ahkn is Arivett's father. Besides, Ulfr won't fight Ahkn because they're best mates. That only leaves Dain or Snur to stand with Gheir."

"Couldn't they just opt out of the whole thing and leave Gheir and Hild to sort it between themselves?" Bard asked.

Ori glanced up at him in surprise.

Bard rolled his eyes.

"Of course not," the man muttered. "Think like a dwarf, bowman."

Boromir came out into the hall, sword in hand, naked, and bleary-eyed.

"What's going on?" he grumbled.

"Gheir's youngest wife defected to the Blacklocks," Bard explained. "She's in Queen Hild's quarters. Gheir swears Hild seduced or kidnapped her. Either way, he wants her back."

"Should I consider calling in troops?" Boromir asked.

"Mahal's hairy arse, nah," chuckled Dwalin, gracing the Gondorian captain with a wink. "It's goin' t' be a tight fit in here as it is. If thin's get messy, there's a wall panel in yer sittin' room t' th' right a' th' fireplace. Slide it t' th' left. There's a passage down t' th' kitchen."

"And from there?"

"Yeh could have yerself a snack," Dwalin suggested.

"Thanks, but I think I would just explode."

Boromir smirked and went back into his chambers.

"So," Bard continued. "They really have to do this now? When everyone's still muzzy from drink?"

"An old dwarven tradition," said Thorin as he appeared at the turn of the hall to the royal chambers. He was clad in trousers, boots and a tunic he'd pulled from the laundry pile inside out, but he was happily carrying Orcrist and the blade shimmered in the candlelight.

He peered at Dwalin in amusement.

"Everything under control?"

"Aye," said Dwalin, sounding bored. "I got a squad on either end a' th' hall. There mebbe some blood shed, but I'll make sure it's only dwarf blood."

"I have complete faith in you. Just keep the warcries to a minimum. I have a faunt who needs his sleep."

"An' a full-grown hobbit yer tryin' t' keep awake," Dwalin teased.

Thorin grinned and sighed.

"He's awake. I, however, have finally hit a battlement. Just as well. Frodo's sleeping at the foot of the bed."

Thorin turned and headed back to his rooms.

Bard asked, "Doesn't he want to know what's going on?"

Ori said, "He already knows. Roäc's been and gone."

"And he's not concerned?"

"Of course he's concerned, but Dwalin and the other soldiers know how to do their jobs. Besides, Thorin can't choose sides."

"Because that would be showing favoritism," said Bard.

"See," Ori chirped brightly, "you're getting it."

"Lucky me," said Bard. "I'm going back to bed. Unless there's a secret panel in my rooms I should know about?"

Dwalin said, "Fourth wall panel in the washroom, behind the tub."

"Does it lead to the kitchen?"

"Leads t' King Thranduil's quarters," Dwalin replied dryly.

"Does he know that?"
Dwalin lifted an eyebrow.

"Go ask 'im."

"Right, better not," said Bard. He turned, froze, turned back to Ori. "Did you say Ahkn was Arivett's father?"

"Somebody has to be," Ori replied, his eyes and ears mostly focused on the two combatants.

"Hild's good, but she's not that good."

Bard returned to his room, but a sweep of cloth from down the hallway told Ori that an elf was approaching.

"This is charming entertainment." Thranduil delivered his opinion. "Shall I fetch Mistress Dazla and her bucket of ice water?"

Balin looked up in amusement.

"With those two, yer majesty?" he said. "I'm afraid th' water'd jus' turn t' steam."

Thranduil shrugged and remained where he was, playing the part of an indifferent observer. Ori wondered if he had seen Thorin leave and decided to step in for him.

Meanwhile, Gheir and Hild were still in full volley.

"What was I supposed to do?" Hild challenged. "Leave the poor thing crying out in the hallway?"

"Why would she come to you before her own people? You seduced her away!"

"Unlike you, Gheir, I know a dwarving when I see one."

He opened his mouth, closed it, and then said, rather defensively, "She was three years above majority when we married. She was perfectly ready."

Behind him, Mavis I rolled her eyes.

Gheir said, more strongly now, "Her parents groomed her to be a good wife."

Hild smirked.

"Maybe she could have used a little more grooming before she had to say yes."

"She had a choice!"

"Did she?"

"I did not pressure her!"

"I wasn't thinking of you. What else could her parents have done with her? What other choices do young Stiffbeard dams have? Did you give them money?"

"Of course I gave them money! It would help with the loss of a-"

"You bought yourself a wife, Gheir!" Hild looked disgusted. "You've turned your dams into chattel!"

Gheir gaped at her.

Snur said, "Oops."

"No' th' best o' moves," Ulfr agreed. "Oi, Gheir, mebbe yeh ought t' have thought this through."

Faced with censure on all sides, burning red to his ears, Gheir huffed and spun back to Hild.

"What have y-"

She held up her hand to cut him off. She didn't even look at him before she said, "This conversation is now over."

Hild turned on her heel and swept majestically back into her chambers, Aris after her, the door shutting with a click of finality.

"So that's what that looks like," Thranduil mused.

Ori had a feeling the conversation was more postponed than really over. Mavey was still in Queen Hild's rooms. Gheir and the oldest queen still stood outside them, Gheir looking increasingly dismayed.

In a few minutes the door opened again and Aris stood there, bemused. She looked around, then spotted Dori, serenely arriving and carrying a loaded tea tray.

"Honored Bearer?"

"General Aris," Dori smiled placidly. "How may I assist you?"

"Queen Mavis XV would like to speak with you. If you would be so kind as to follow me."

"Of course, dear."

Ori watched Gheir's expression go from anger to surprise to wariness, as Aris stood aside and Dori floated through the doorway with the same brazen confidence as Lady Galadriel herself. Balin followed with a merry smile and a nod to Aris.

Ori shrugged, leaned his back against the wall, and slid down to sit on the floor. He began sketching as well as noting any muttered conversations he heard. He drew Gheir in full roar, Hild with her dismissing hand in Gheir’s face, Snur standing asleep against the wall with his eyes open. A good forty minutes passed.

Boromir came back out, this time in a nightshirt, and Bard reappeared and they chatted idly with Ulfr and Thranduil. A few minutes later, Arwen arrived yawning. Boromir and Thranduil explained the situation. The Evenstar rolled her eyes and left, throwing her hands in the air and Ori heard her mutter, “Dwarrow. Go raise dwarrow. I swear it’s all our Lady Yavanna’s fault.”

Boromir shrugged again and said he was going back to bed. Bard and Thranduil looked at each other. Bard blushed hotly. Thranduil smiled like a cat and Bard disappeared into his own chambers. Thranduil bowed slightly to the group of dwarrow and wandered back to his own chambers. Ori rather thought his whistling the refrain of ‘My Zeydis’ tasteless considering the circumstances. Ori began rendering the departure of the Evenstar.

The Broadbeam king had begun to snore loudly when Dori and Balin reemerged, both looking thoughtful. Balin turned to King Gheir and Queen Mavis I and said, “If yer majesties’d accompany us down t’ th’ kitchen?”

"Of course, Lord Balin, Bearer,” agreed Gheir. “What has happened? Is she all right?”

For a moment Ori thought he was asking about Hild, then his brain set itself to rights. “She is not in any danger,” Dori said soothingly. “Pet, will you lend me a piece of paper and your pen?”

Ori got to his feet and did so. Dori wrote a hasty note, folded it shut, wrote on the outside. “Our Furh’nk?”

"Yes, Bearer?” The soldier emerged from the squad closest.

"All the pages are abed. Would you please carry this to Durin House for me? Apologize for waking them. I would not do so if the need weren’t so dire."

"Yes, Bearer." Furh’nk went off to fulfill his commission.

"What can I do to help, Dori?” Ori asked.

"I’ll make the tea, if you’ll make the toast. I think I may have a solution for Mavey."

After three cups of tea and a very enlightening conversation, Ori followed Dori, Balin, and the Stiffbeard rulers back up to the hallway and watched as Dori was once more admitted to the Blacklock chambers.

Shortly thereafter, Mavey emerged, followed by Dori, Hild, and Aris. Ori felt quite sorry for the young dam as her face was streaked with tears, her nose very pink and her eyes downcast. She shuffled over and stopped before Gheir, who looked neither angry nor afraid, merely resigned.

“I am so sorry, my king,” Mavey whimpered. “I’ve disgraced you and I’ve disgraced my family and I wish I was dead.”

Gheir, horrified, grasped her gently by the shoulders.

“Dearest, don’t say such things. If anyone is in the wrong here, it’s me. I took you from your parents.”

“Oh, I wasn’t really happy there, either. I can’t go back after what I’ve done. I’m your wife!” Mavey started sobbing wetly.

“You are,” Gheir attempted to speak in a comforting way, “but it doesn’t follow that you have to come right home and be my wife.”

“It doesn’t?” Mavey sniffed loudly and raised her face to look at him. “What do you mean?”

“Are you with child?”

“No, my king.”
He breathed out. Ori thought it sounded like relief. Mavis I passed Mavey a handkerchief.

“Master Jim and Mistress Ruelis, Bearer Dori, Lord Balin, and I were talking, and we wondered if you might be willing to join the circus caravan for a few seasons.”

Mavey looked startled, then intrigued.

“To… what end, your majesty?”

Gheir cleared his throat and schooled himself to look royally thoughtful.

“I find the Borjeval people fascinating, and I’d like to learn more about them, but running the kingdom and playing with the dwarflings leaves me little time for study.”

“You want me to gather information for you?” Mavey asked slowly. “I’m not a scholar, my king.”

“But you can read and write,” Gheir’s tone was encouraging. “Don’t most dams your age keep a diary?”

“So… so it would be like that? Like keeping a diary of what I learn?”

“Yes, exactly like that!” Gheir praised.

“For how long, my king?”

“For as long as you like.” Gheir waved his hand grandly. “Your board is paid and you’ll continue to receive pin money. You can send me updates if you think of it, and,” he paused then took a deep breath. “And if you decide not to come back at all, I will understand.”

She cried out and hugged him. He held her and smiled a true, gentle smile.

“Go and get some sleep now, my dear,” he said gently and rubbed her back. “We’ll talk more of it tomorrow.”

She stood up on tip-toe to kiss his cheek and scampered back down the hall to her rooms in obvious excitement. He watched her go.

Mavis I sidled up behind him.

“Lesson learned?” she asked, meaningfully.

“Lesson learned, my love,” said Gheir with a sigh.

“Good, now come to bed. You’re looking more like Grandfather Stiffbeard by the moment.”

“Damn,” said Aris.

“Indeed,” said Hild. She almost sounded impressed.

Ori honestly thought this was the end of it. He watched his husband dismiss Furh’nk, who sent his squad to escort the visiting soldiers back to their quarters. Ahkn tried to wake Snur, couldn’t, shrugged, hoisted the Broadbeam king over his shoulder and carried him off to put him to bed. Dain yawned cavernously and followed. Ori went over and took Dwalin’s hand, ready to return to their room, when Ulfr looked around and asked, “Has anyone seen Arne?”

Stonehelm, making to follow his father, stretched and said,

“He left the feast with Master Nodun a few hours back. He said-”

Ulfr froze and whirled on Dain’s son, his face so red, his tattoos actually disappeared.

“Where did they go?” Ulfr yelled.

Stonehelm was not intimidated by Ulfr, but Ori thought it was possible Stonehelm didn’t understand Ulfr’s level of paranoia when it came to his son or, like his own father, didn’t care.

“They planned to go to Master Nodun’s temporary quarters to-”

Ulfr’s boots barely touched the ground as he shot down the hall, headed for the stairs.

“Dwalin,” Ori sighed.

“Righ’. On it.”

Dwalin took Furh’nk in tow and Ori moved hard on their heels. Ulfr was already out of their sight, but it wasn’t hard to follow him, as not only did his boots slam against stone but he bellowed like an enraged bahvlo. He was headed for the old royal residence. It was obvious he knew they followed him, for he threw over his shoulder, “What floor is it?”

However, he didn’t wait for a reply, nor answer when Dwalin demanded, “Come back here, yeh idiot!”

They crossed the courtyard and slammed open the front door.

They ran down a random hall, Ulfr shouting for Arne.
Dwalin muttered to himself, drawing both Grasper and Keeper this time.
Ori feared Mistress Dazla would be scrubbing Ulfr’s brains from the hall floor tomorrow, but Ulfr and his pursuers were brought to a skidding halt. A door up ahead had opened, and a young serving dam was, in a word, fleeing.

They heard Otho Sackville-Baggins whining, “Please, dearest! Please spank me harder!”
“You know the rules. Bark like a dog!” said Lobelia.
“Arf! Arf!” Otho obliged.
Ori shuddered.
Ulfr shook himself, seized the dam by her shoulders, and demanded directions to Nodun’s chambers.

“Leave her be,” Dwalin growled. “Or I’ll toss yeh in lockup meself. The rooms’re righ’ up here.”
They went to the bend in the hall, Dwalin made to knock, but Ulfr turned the handle and went in.
The front room was deserted, but behind the door to an antechamber, they heard Nodun’s voice.

“Oh, that is sooo good,” she moaned. “You have the perfect touch.”

“Thank you,” said Arne in khuzdul, “I don’t often hear that.”

“You should, that’s positively delicious.”
Ulfr roared and battered the door open with a shoulder.

“A’righ’, wha’d’yeh think yer up t’?”
There sat Nodun and Arne… at a table, surrounded by paper, nibs and bottles of colored inks, blinking up at him.

“Da?” Arne asked. “What the fu- what are you doing?”

“You… er… weren’t in yer rooms. An’ yeh shouldn’t be here in a dam’s chambers alone. Wha’ o’ her husband?”

“Her husband is right here, trying to get some sleep,” said a naked, bedraggled dwarf at the door.

“Kindly remove yourselves, and, for the love of Mahal, shut up!”

He turned and left. They heard another door open and slam shut.

Arne said to Ori, “If I thought Da was going to toss his scree like this, I would at least have drawn some nudes.”

“You’ve no cause t’ be fresh,” Ulfr scolded. “No’ even tellin’ me where yeh were goin’.”

“You were busy drinking,” said Arne. “Besides, I left a note on your bedside table. I told Theodred and Stonehelm where I was going, in case you asked. Should I have sent a raven?”

“Er… no… that’s probably no’ necessary. I’ll be turnin’ in now. Mind yer in bed by dawn.”

“Yes, Da.”

“An’ mind yer company.”

“Yes, Da. Goodnight.”

Ulfr retreated out and Dwalin and Ori followed him. Ulfr looked at them. Ori stifled a yawn and Dwalin put away his axes and grunted,

“Happy?”

Ulfr swore at them and strode off back to Fundin House.

Ori looked up at Dwalin.

“Can we please go back to bed now?”

His legs felt weighted.

“Yeh seemed t’ have sobered up quite a bit,” Dwalin teased.

“Yes, which is odd, considering that I should be face-down on the carpet by now. I’m not looking forward to rereading my notes, though. I have a feeling they look like Fanny took them.”

“We’ll get yeh some water, an’ tuck yeh back up, love. Worry about th’ notes t’morrah. I’ll help yeh decipher ‘em. I’ve always been good with codes.”

As they entered the receiving room at home, they saw Ulfr mounting the stairs to his rooms.

Dwalin and Ori exchanged a smile and returned to their own.

The sunlight woke Ori along with the scents of breakfast. He blinked and there was Garnet perching six inches from his face, looking at him intently.
“Is anyone dead?” Ori asked, as it was the first thing that came to his head.
Dwalin, spooned behind him, grunted,
“If there is, tell Roäc he’s go’ me permission t’ eat ‘em.”
Garnet gave the raven equivalent of a laugh. Ori giggled and said,
“As long as it’s those Sackville-Baggins. I don’t care.”
“Arf-arf-arf,” Dwalin muttered in her ear. Ori laughed and pushed away from his husband.
“Don’t, it’s just icky.”
“Ickier than canoodlin’ wi’ a barrow-wigh’?”
“I’ll barrow-wight you!” Ori threatened, rolling over.
Dwalin laughed,
“Hop in,” and opened his mouth wide. Ori stuck in a finger and ran it up the roof of Dwalin’s mouth making the warrior gasp, pull away, and sneeze. Kihshassa came winging over from the window and landed on Dwalin and peered up into his face, making querulous squeaking noises. Ori laughed, kissed Dwalin thoroughly and pranced off to the privy.
He came out into the hall feeling more awake and happy in himself as he didn’t feel in the least bit hung over. Bain came from the sitting room and saw him.
“Good morning,” Ori greeted him, only to be seized by the arm and pulled over to a corner. Bain glanced around then muttered at him,
“So, y’know, don’t say anything to Da, but I kissed Stonehelm last night.”
Ori smiled at Bain and said quietly,
“I won’t say anything.”
“Thanks, you know he’d just pop a major vein.”
“He has been getting cozy with King Thranduil,” Ori pointed out.
“But, that’s him, not his kids. He’s really protective of us, especially now, when people might take advantage. I don’t think Stonehelm counts, but Da may think he does.”
“So, what did you think of kissing Stonehelm?” Ori couldn’t stop himself teasing.
Bain shot him a wary eyebrow.
“Not for the historical record,” Ori promised.
Bain let out a breath.
“I kinda liked it, but I think I’d like to kiss Floris, too, so what does that make me?”
“A curious adolescent?”
“Aye, I think that’s about right,” said Bain. “Eru, I hope Stonehelm doesn’t tell his da. Then everybody in Arda will know.”
“Stonehelm isn’t famous for getting a word in edgewise. Really, he doesn’t talk much at all.”
“He talked last night,” said Bain, grinning. “He’s really got a filthy mouth when he wants.”
“It’s always the quiet ones, isn’t it.” said Ori, lofting his brows.
Bain gave him a sly look.
“That’s what Dori said when he found out you’d run off with Captain Dwalin.”
“We didn’t ‘run off’,” Ori protested.
“Uh-huh,” Bain snickered. “Sure, you didn’t. As if half of Dale didn’t notice that the pair of you fancied the pants off each other for ages.”
“We didn’t, and I didn’t know he liked me then.”
Bain snorted before heading to the breakfast parlor.
“For a scholar, you’re dense some times.”
“I never had to be forcibly put in the tub to make me bathe when I smelled like week old dead fish,” Ori retorted.
Bain flung back a rude gesture and disappeared. Ori snickered to himself and turned. Dwalin came out of the privy.
“What were tha’ all ‘bou’.”
“Bain is growing up.”
Dwalin snorted.
“Did somethin’ t’ drop ‘is balls las’ nigh’?”
“I am a most silent confidante,” Ori avowed.

Dwalin opened the door of their room and closed it after them. He grinned at Ori. Ori sprang forward and grabbed Dwalin around the waist.

“If I wasn’t so starving, I’d push you back into bed!” Ori groaned.

Dwalin threw back his head in laughter.

“Me poor, wee starvin’ scribe. No’ t’ worry, when all this bloody official nonsense is over, we’re gonna be spendin’ a day ‘r two on our own, pref’rably in here.”

Ori held Dwalin tight and looked up, resting his chin on Dwalin’s chest, smiling.

“I’d like that. We do have serious research to conduct.”

“Aye, under th’ tutel’ge a’ our Queen Kivi.”

“That right.” Ori affirmed, then, “Are you hungry?”

“Aye, an’ I wan’ yeh f’r desser’!”

Suitably attired, Dwalin and Ori exited their bedroom and it was at that moment that Arne approached, looking shy.

"May I talk to you for moment, Ori?"

"Of course," said Ori. He grinned at Dwalin. “I’ll catch you up. Keep me a seat.”

“If I don’t, yeh kin sit in me lap, love.”

Ori stuck out his tongue and turned back to Arne.

"In private?" the young dwarf asked, a little pink.

"Certainly."

There had been a dressing room on the far side of Ori’s old bedroom that had long ago gone for storage. Ori staked his claim on it to use for ‘official business' that shouldn’t be discussed in the sitting room, though, so far, nothing had come up. At the moment, the room was outfitted with a few old chairs and a table dragged in from who knew where, though Ori had plans for turning it into his private library/study/painting room.

He ushered Arne in and closed the door behind him.

"Have a seat," he offered. Arne sat and Ori sat facing him, asking gently in Khuzdul for Arne’s ease, "What's happened? Are you all right?"

"I think so," said Arne. “Last night, when I was in Master Nodun's room, after you three left? Master Nodun and her husband went to bed and I ... went with them.”

Ori forced his face to remain passive.

"Ah," he said. "I take it this was the first time you’ve done that."

"With two people at once? Yes. I didn't even stay around after that. I washed, and crept back to my room like a thief. Da was snoring like a raven with a head cold. He didn't even wake up when I got dressed to come down. Mind, he'd probably just give me some vague warning about minding my company, so no one gets the wrong idea."

The two dwarrow blinked at one another, then snickered.

"Are you planning on telling him?" Ori asked.

"Uri's bloody temper! No! I'm of age, so that's not an issue. It's just that I don't know whether he'll try to throw me out of the house or, worse, congratulate me and give me a lecture about making him a premature grandfather. I might tell Mam some day."

"She doesn't get terribly upset?"

"Someone has to balance my father," Arne heaved a big sigh. "Thanks for listening to me, Ori. I feel better now that I've spilled my guts."

"As long as you don't want any advice," said Ori. "I'm afraid my experience is rather limited. I've only ever been with my husband."

"Really?" Arne looked surprised.

"I was very sheltered up until my marriage. Not as sheltered as poor Mavey, but enough that tunic rippers and drawing naughty pictures were my guiltiest thrills."

"I thought you were, at least, having sex with King Thorin as well."

Ori tightened his jaw to keep it from falling open and, that managed, spoke in what he hoped was a reasonable tone.

"No, our relationship isn't like that, though I know he is very fond of me, for which I'm grateful."

"Being his shield brother's husband would be difficult if he wasn't fond of you," said Arne.

"It would be impossible," said Ori. "Sometimes I think I have the opposite problem. He holds me in such high esteem, he's bound to be disappointed when I inevitably fail him."

"No one is perfect, he must know that," said Arne. "He's the high king and still his expectations seem a lot more reasonable than...some people's. I suppose if nothing is expected of you, it takes the pressure off. I'm not sure I'd survive being Lord Gloin's son. It sounds exhausting, being that amazing."

"Yet, Gimli struggles through so valiantly," Ori agreed with a grin.

"The most amazing thing about Gimli is that he doesn't have an ego bigger than Erebor. He's so... normal. You all are."

Ori laughed.

"You're seeing us on our best behavior. Though, Dori says the Durins aren't like other noble families."

"I don't know a lot about other families," said Arne. "Father kept me shielded from a lot as I was growing up. Not as bad as poor Mavey, but I don't think the stakes for her were so high. The courtiers back home aren't quite as well... controlled as they are in Erebor."

"The worst went to Beleghost with King Frerin," Ori said, reflectively, "Thorin made it very clear he wouldn't tolerate the sorts of things Thror tolerated."

"Father isn't quite as particular, but he doesn't much deal with courtiers anyway. That's my mother's job. She was the one who persuaded father to let me train as a scribe, that way I'm learning how to be king, but I'm very much in the background. I could never do what you do. You talk all the time. King Thorin seems to expect it of you."

"Most of the things I say are just good for a laugh," said Ori.

"I think you're wonderful."

Ori blushed and stammered, "I'm a dolt, a very lucky dolt. If I served a stricter king, I hardly would have reached my present position so painlessly. I probably wouldn't have reached it at all."

"I know why you reached it. I read the dispatches King Thorin sent Father about the coup. You missed nothing. They're so precise, yet they read like novels. The descriptions from Princess Dis' tea party had me craving blackberry jam for days."

"It wasn't hard to write about that, believe me," said Ori. "I ate ten of those rolled cakes at one sitting. I'm amazed I didn't burst. What I can't believe is that King Thorin wanted me to send those dispatches instead of simpler bulletins. It took four ravens to carry each one, dividing the pages between them. I had only intended that level of detail for the Ereboorean archives. No one but scholars read those."

"Maybe there's always been a reason only scholars read them."

"They are rather dry, aren't they? It's frustrating. They say everything but what actually happened."

"I suppose it's all about the face the king wants to show the world, the appearance, not the substance. King Thorin seems to simply tell the people everything."

"Not everything," said Ori. "For a long time Erebor had two armies: the acknowledged army under King Thror's command and Thorin's private army, loyal to him, only it was called the City Guard of Dale. If Thror had lived much longer, Thorin would have had to use his army to try and force Thror out."

"Civil war?"

"Civil war."

"What changed?" Arne asked. Ori shrugged.

"According to Oin's readings of the signs; Dori."

"So really it was you. By marrying Captain Dwalin and bringing Dori into Fundin House?"

"Well," Ori said, idly, "if you want to pursue that line of thinking, then it's all Nori's fault."

Arne laughed.
Together Arne and Ori went to the breakfast parlor. The table was still being set out and loaded by Dori and Mistress Dazla’s team, with Bilbo breezily helping and chatting to everyone. Ori thought that the table had been lengthened considerably. Buj and Dipfa were there looking bright-eyed, and Bain was stuffing his face.

Dori fussed over Balin, who looked rather rough and sleepy, but pleased with being cajoled to food and tea. Thorin was enjoying his own tea while Frodo slept against his arm.

“He slept through being dressing and washed?” Ori asked.

Thorin chuckled.

“No,” Bilbo supplied. “He woke us at dawn and got everything and everyone started and as soon as we sat down, he was out like a light. But we’ve both got breakfast out of it.”

“Fortunately,” Thorin added.

Gloin and his family barged in and settled themselves near where Dipfa and Buj sat whispering. Dwalin had empty seats on either side him and Ori and Arne had just sat down when Oin and Binni arrived. Oin went immediately to Buj and patted his head. Binni leaned down and kissed his cheek.

“Did you get some sleep, my little researcher?”

Buj grinned up at both of them.

“Yes, I did. Thank you. My precious diamond and I are patiently waiting for Master Brur and Master Jansad to bring the rough copies from the coronation.”

“Indeed,” Binni smiled and kissed Dipfa’s cheek, also. “Good morning, dear. Did you get any sleep?”

“Oh, yes, Bearer. It is as my beloved Boo says. I am so looking forward to see the fashions captured.”

Binni went down the table to the seat Oin had pulled out for him. It was next to Ori. Ori thought Binni looked more serene than usual.

Ori asked in a low voice,

“You two seem to have adopted Buj rather Gloin and Gridr doing so.”

Binni chuckled.

“Yes, Oin dotes on him. He’s quiet and studious and we don’t have to change any nappies. His dietary requirements are somewhat odd, but we understand he’s doing an experiment, so that’s fine and he likes snacks, as long as they’re ‘light’. He seems to be quite the child Oin and I would naturally have had if I had been able bear him one.”

“I’m happy for all three of you. Buj is a good deal less…er..frown-y now that he’s with you both.”

“Yes,” Binni grimaced a little. “The dwarving was quite aware he was not what his parents wanted in a child. From what I knew of them, it was quite incredible that either of them could create such an intelligent creature as our Buj. His mother didn’t have a thought in her head and his father was worse.”

The elves arrived together with Aragorn, Arwen, and Boromir. Ori realized that this was why the table had grown. They all seated themselves and exchanged greetings with everyone. Dori immediately brought out two large crocks of elderberry jam and put one beside Galadriel and one beside Thranduil.

“No fighting,” Dori teased.

“Hers is fatter than mine,” Thranduil replied, pouting his lip.

“You must hear a lot of that,” Galadriel snarked back at him.

“But yours is taller, now hush both of you,” Dori ordered in a parental tone and stalked off, leaving the elves to giggle amongst themselves.

Sculdis breezed in, almost singing greetings, Stonehelm trailing her, and a few moments later, Dain crawled into the breakfast parlor and scalped the side of the chair to sit.

Bilbo bustled about, filling cups and chattering and, perhaps to turn the knife, began to whistle.

Dain opened one, horrifically bloodshot eye and croaked.

“Yer ’n arsehole. ‘R yeh immune t’ grain alcohol ‘r somethin’?”
Bilbo pretended to give this serious contemplation.

"Hmmm. Could be."

Suddenly Dain sat upright, his face cracking open in a huge smile.

"Tha’s brilliant! We need t’ travel t’gether. Think o’ th’ money we’ll make."

"No," chorused Sculdis and Thorin, neither raising their eyes, one from her breakfast and the other from his tea.

"Alas," Bilbo chuckled. "Nori’s ahead of you. Should I ever decide to embark on a life of iniquity, he’s got first refusal as my companion."

Dain peered around the table and his eyes lit on Buj and Dipfa.

Buj was in his usual black but Dipfa wore poofy green trousers with a bright pink tunic and yellow boots with orange laces.

Dain groaned and looked away.

Bilbo said, brightly, "My gracious, Miss Dipfa. How well you look! That is an ensemble that would do any hobbit lass proud."

"Have some more breakfast, my dears," said Dori. "With the reviewing of the rough notes you’re going to need your strength. Besides, you’re in shape to stomach, unlike some people."

Dain stuck out his tongue.

Dipfa said, "Oh, no, thank you, Lady Dori. I believe both my beloved Boo and I are of an elegant sufficiency. However, I do need to pop in and check for any work that needs to be done on the royal scribe’s robes before they’re sent back to the archive."

She curtseyed in Ori’s direction and skipped off down the hall, singing to herself.

Ori had a vague memory of Dwalin helping him take them off and maybe Dwalin had hung them over the chair? He didn’t think Dwalin had just dumped them in a heap on the floor.

In the distance, Dipfa screamed.

Everyone at the table jumped up and sped to Ori and Dwalin’s room where the artist knelt on the floor, wailing and clutching a wad of varied-colored velvets.

"My precious diamond!" Buj cried, rushing to kneel by her side and rubbing her back. "What has occurred to cause you such woe?"

"Food stains!" she howled. "Lord Ori, you got food stains on the scribe’s coronation robes! How will I ever remove them?"

She buried her face in the cloth and sobbed.

"Oh Mahal," Ori groaned. "How did I get food stains on those?"

"Yeh did sit in our Wandi’s dinner plate, love," said Dwalin.

All right, that Ori remembered.

"I thought it was empty!"

"Technically it was, as he’d just finished dinner. Then yeh passed out across th’ half-empty tray a’ roasted oxen an’ a plate a’ butter."

"Oh Dipfa! I’m so sorry!" Ori cried, kneeling on the other side of the inconsolable dam. Awkwardly he patted her shoulder.

She sat up abruptly, her face suddenly stoic and determined.

"I will find away, Lord Ori. I will bend my entire will to the cleansing of these garments!" She turned to Buj. "We have vital work to do, my Boo. We must find the solution that will overthrow these stains and restore these garments to their true glory."

"You could ask King Ulfr," Ori suggested. "He’s a chemical engineer."

Buj jumped up.

"I shall fetch him immediately!"

"Buj." Thorin stopped the young scribe gently. "You may want to wait until at least this afternoon."

"But, your majesty, this is a matter of state!"

"I can guarantee Ulfr’s state is ‘hungover’. Unless you want to try to get blood stains off the tapestries, it’ll have to wait."
Leaving Dipfa and Buj to minutely discuss fabric cleaning, the rest of the party returned to breakfast. They had just seated themselves again when Fili, Kili, Tauriel, and Sigrid arrived. Kili looked as though the sun had risen in his eyes and Tauriel seemed rather pleased with herself. Fili looked happy but sleepy. Sigrid was pink and happy, but peered about the gathering furtively. She relaxed, but Bain grinned maniacally and spouted out,

“Siggy, I was going to call you to come to breakfast but you weren’t—”

Thranduil caught ahold of the lad’s face and inserted his napkin into the young man’s mouth. Sigrid and Fili both blushed. Dori and everyone else greeted them and offered food and tea. Kili looked at all the food on the table, but his gaze didn’t seem to rest anywhere, and kept coming back to Tauriel, who serenely stirred her tea.

Thorin raised an eyebrow at his nephew and Kili blinked saucily.

Ori heard Thorin mutter about Kili being lucky his mother was sleeping it off under a feasting table.

Buj and Dipfa walked back in, Dipfa fully recovered from her woe. They heard Master Sadie’s voice in the hall.

“Mind out, deary. I told yeh t’ leave all tha’ haulin’ t’ th’ young, springy types.”

“Just a flesh wound, love,” said Brur, his voice particularly gravelly this morning.

Ori thought it was probably a combination of announcing and then downing copious amounts of ale.

“We’ve brought th’ coronation materials from th’ scribes’ guild,” announced Sadie as she entered. A dozen young apprentices followed, each towing a cart with an enormous box.

Ori stood up, agog.

“That’s not everything just from yesterday,” he said.

“Every last scrap an’ scribble,” said Brur at the door. Once again he was dressed in ink-stained robes, and he could have carried shelves full of books in the bags under his eyes. “Except th’ lot bein’ horded by the king’s scribe.”

“Mee-ow,” said Nori, swaggering past Brur, Bofur in tow.

Neither Bofur nor Nori looked much worse for their busy night. Ori wondered if Nori had somehow glommed on to Dori’s anti-hangover recipe, ‘glommed on to’ meaning stolen, of course.

The moment Nori and Bofur sat, Assault and Battery flew down from Nori’s hair and face-planted into the marmalade.

“Nori!” Dori screamed. “Get those rodents off my breakfast table this instant!”

“What? Yer nieces are growin’ girls.”

“Then get them a bowl, you scapegrace, and they are not my nieces.”

“Oh!” Nori objected “Don’t ya go hurtin’ their feelin’s!”

“Oi!” Nori objected “Don’t ya go hurtin’ their feelin’s!”

“Or, aren’t they sweet!” Lady Galadriel cooed.

Assault and Battery heard her dulcette voice and immediately scampered down the table to attach themselves to her ladyship. They sat in her lap and she fed them toast and elderberry jam.

“Fickle,” Nori pronounced.

“Don’t knock it, duck,” said Bofur. “Good sitters’re hard t’ get.”

Brur and Sadie sat and ate heartily, and the apprentice scribes were herded into the sitting room with the promise of tea and scones. When it looked as though no one else would be arriving before noon, the breakfast things were removed and the cloth taken up, the table wiped and dried thoroughly and the coronation materials were unpacked. Ori went and retrieved his own, amazed to find how much more he had collected since he’s gone to sleep the first time last night. Most of it was even legible.

He looked at the pile of paper on the table and despaired.

“This is an awful lot of material to go through, Sadie,” said Ori.

“This is just what we call the ‘roughs’,” Sadie told him.

“How old will we be before it’s smooth?” he asked.

“Oh, aren’t they sweet!” Lady Galadriel cooed.

“Once it’s in some sort of time order it’ll go quickly,” said Sadie, bracingly. “All the materials will have to go into the archives, o’ course, but we can be more selective with the bound official
“We jus’ though’ yeh’d like to see th’ damage,” Brur explained with a wink. “I figured tha’ lot through in th’ other room could sort out th’ written notes an’ yeh lot could go over th’ pictures.”

Ori grinned and the well-fed scribes, who had been joined by three of Balin’s secretaries, were called back in. They removed the written notes and the table was soon awash with pictures; some simple sketches, many portraits, and others fully rendered and in color. These were passed about and there was much admiration and a good deal of laughter.

“Here’s Thranduil helping Ahkn up to the dais,” announced Arwen.

Thranduil reached for it only to have Celeborn snatch it away.

“Cousin, how can you be so generous in manner and yet keep your nose in the air?” Celeborn asked with failed gravity.

“At least, I have manners,” Thranduil replied coolly and plucked the paper out of Celeborn’s hand, and looked it over.

“Good one, idad elf!” Kili shouted.

Thranduil gave him a gracious nod, then,

“This is quite good. My robes are perfectly drawn.”

“You’re screaming at Legs in this one,” Kili informed him, waving a paper in the air.

Thranduil raised an eyebrow.

“He’s jumping into the pig ring,” Kili went on.

Celeborn craned his neck.

“Yes, a perfect likeness.”

Thranduil snorted and picked up another piece of paper.

Thorin drew Bilbo to him and smiled. Ori craned his neck and saw it was a beautiful picture of Frodo riding bunny-back.

Gloin was grinning as he and his son happily pawed through the pictures. Gloin drew one out and passed it to Brur.

“Oi, king o’ Gondor, take a look,” Brur passed the paper to Aragorn and Arwen. As it went by, Ori saw someone had used colored inks for a fine portrait of the betrothed couple.

Aragorn leaned forward to look down the table.

“Thorin, my friend, may we either keep this one or -”

Thorin grinned,

“We’ll see what’s here. There may be another you like better. If not, the scribe mark will identify who did it, if you’d like to offer them a commission.”

“Thank you. I think I might.” Aragorn smiled lovingly at Arwen, who blushed a little.

Dwalin snickered and nudged Ori. Ori looked. Someone had sketched Dain in full roar singing while standing on the head table. They had added a verse from ‘Me Zeydis’ and added musical symbols around the words. Ori rose and passed the paper to Sculdis, who shrieked with laughter.

“This one needs t’ be framed!”

Dain had a look.

“Aye, a’ course, my gem. Whatever yeh fancy.”

Stonehelm took it and snickered.

Here one of your pig,” Legolas stated and passed it to Dain, who almost melted in paternal pride.

“What a great lot of pictures of Lobelia laid out in the throne room,” Bilbo commented. “Perhaps we should save one and have it framed to give her for Yule.”

“This one is awfully nice,” said Buj, passing it over. “It looks as though she’s just taking a nap. You wouldn’t want one of these here. They’re from her backside and all you can see of her is - well - her backside.”

“It’s also her best side,” said Bilbo.

Kili said, “Here’s one of her hubby, running around, scolding and wagging his finger. What’s he saying?”

Ori said, “Perhaps he’s barking.”

Dwalin laughed. Everyone else at the table looked a-sea.
“Never mind,” said Ori, reddening.

Leafing through the piles, Ori found a picture of himself seated on Aewandínén’s plate. He had a vague memory of doing this, but little to nothing else about it. He was shocked at how snarky and superior he looked, even compared to the elf.

“What’s all this about?” Ori asked.

Thorin said, “That’s when you told Aewandínén off.”

“I told Aewandínén off?” Ori gaped at his king.

Everyone in the room roared with laughter.

“Oh, aye,” said Brur. “Yeh gave him what’s fer.”

Ori gaped at him.

“What in Mahal’s hairy arse did I say to him?”

Buj looked up from a very nice picture of Dipfa and said, “I do have the full transcript of the conversation.”

He took a black notebook out of his black pocket and flipped through.

“Ah, here it is,” said Buj, handing Ori the book. Ori read, his stomach turning.

“I did not say… oh, I didn’t! Oh, King Thranduil, I’m so sorry.”

“I’m not,” said Thranduil. “Now he has a mission, and who knew he would be obsessed by so simple a thing?’

“Where is he?”

I think he is still down in Dale,” said Thranduil.

“When did he go to Dale?” asked Ori.

“At dawn. After you told him off so thoroughly he went into a storm of activity. He scampered down the mountain to delouse the populous. He’s working his way through the scalps of Dale. He’s already sent to the Greenwood for reinforcements.”

“Reinforcements?”

“The elves who formulate and supply him with haircare products. I find, Lord Ori, that I am in your debt.”

Thranduil rose and bowed to him.

“Uh… you’re welcome, your majesty.” Ori looked at Dwalin. “You don’t think Aewandínén’s going to get himself hurt or anything?”

Ori was actually thinking the word ‘murdered’ would be more accurate, but probably disturb the new-found peace between the elf king and Thorin.

“I asked Master Dubb to keep an eye on him,” said Thorin.

“I hope he’s good with elflings,” Thranduil murmured.

Bilbo murmured about second breakfast and the papers were moved away from the center of the table and coffee and a couple of platters of scones filled with bacon, egg and cheese or cheese and chives.

Everyone was careful not to dirty the pictures as they continued to look and discuss them.

The door flung open and in darted Aewandínén, already talking at speed. His hair was tied back, braided tightly. His tunic was soaked and plastered to his front, the sleeves were rolled up past his elbows and the rest of his clothing quite disheveled. Ori was amazed to note it was the clothing he had worn to the coronation ceremony.

The other elves stared at him. Ori had never heard anyone talk so fast and yet enunciate every word perfectly.

“Would you care for some breakfast, your highness?” Dori asked.

Thranduil asked, “My son, how much tea and coffee have you consumed since you left for Dale?”
“I can’t recall exactly. Every time I was admitted to a house I was offered it of course and since I was about to discuss someone’s personal scalp infestation I thought it would be a show of good faith to accept. I’ve only done the south side of Dale though and I’ll have to go back after breakfast and begin on the east side.”

“How many homes did you go to, my son?”

“I don’t know Ada. I lost count. Fifty?”

“Fifty. Perhaps accept only glasses of water after this, my son.”

“That is lovely idea, thank you Ada.”

Dori brought out a plate of veggie breakfast bake with a side of fried tomatoes and another plate of buttered toast and put them down in front of the prince, making sure there were no pictures anywhere near him.

“Your highness,” Dori cooed. Aewandínen immediately thanked Dori and started tucking in with gusto. Ori stared. The once haughty prince was stuffing his face in a manner worthy of Fili and Kili. The elf prince looked up the table at Thorin and said, a little more slowly, “I hope I didn’t overstep, your majesty, but I have a supply of hair preparation coming up from Erys Lasgalen via a large flock of ravens, whom I found quite obliging. They should be arriving this afternoon and have planned to alight on the patio.”

Thorin wiped his mouth with his napkin. Ori thought this was to give himself a moment to swallow a laugh. Then the dwarf king said, “Of course, Prince Aewandínen. If it’s to help the people of Dale, I see no reason why they shouldn’t.”

“Thank you. You know, I was feeling somewhat fatigued, but all this exercise has certainly reenergized me. This veggie bake is delicious, Bearer.” Aewandínen’s eyes sparkled with excitement and his smile was constant.

“I’m glad you enjoyed it,” said Dori with a twinkle. “Another serving?”

“Yes, please!”

Dori went out and Aewandínen finished the plate of toast with liberal helpings of marmalade. Dori returned and refilled the prince’s plate and Mistress Dazla followed with another plate piled high with toast.

Noises in the hall heralded the arrival of some extremely amused people. They burst in.

“What do you think?” Glorfindel asked, filling the doorway.

Everyone stared at the elf. Margr and Vi stood behind him, laughing and hanging on each other, hysterical.

Glorfindel’s hair was in ringlets. All of it.

“I’m thinking of keeping it,” announced Glorfindel.

Aewandínen looked up, mouth full and narrowed his eyes. He swallowed, rose and crossed to Glorfindel’s side, a slice of marmalade loaded toast in one hand and his teacup in the other. He regarded the new hairdo from every possible angle and nodded approvingly.

“We will call it the ‘Ulwe,'” he pronounced, licking any remaining marmalade off his fingers. “Since it’s a mass of waves.”

“Thank you,” Glorfindel declared, buoyantly. “I’m suddenly seized with the need to become a pirate. In fact, I think I’ll start right now.”

He whirled, snatched Margr and Vi up, one over each shoulder, and strode away.

Margr shrieked, “Oi! Vi, here we go t’ have our ships scuttled again!”

“Glorfy! You naughty thing!” Vi cried. “We ain’t even had our tea!”

Dain, leaning on his hand, muttered, “I don’t suppose yeh could have it in yer room. Nah, I’d prob’ly still hear yeh.”

“You think?” Bilbo teased.

“A’ this point I could hear ‘em in me sleep. I swear, righ’ now I kin hear light”

Ori had finished eating and, in a playful mood, shot forward to his eldest brother’s side, notebook at the ready.

“Can you describe it for me?”

“I don’t think so, wee brother.”
“Can you make something up?”
“Ori!” Dori scolded.
“I’m just kidding, Dori,” said Ori, laughing. “Hearing light sounds like something Buj studies.”
“What am I studying?” Buj asked abruptly, from deep in conversation with Dipfa.
Dwalin said, “He must’ve heard his name.”
Mistress Dazla was heard talking and she entered.
“Honored Bearer?”
Dori rose and went to her.
“Oh, there we are. Wonderful! Do come and join us, deary. You must be desperate for your breakfast.”
Dori went to the door and drew Mavey into the room. The older Durins greeted her placidly and the rest followed suit. Dori placed Mavey next to her and helped the young dam to tea and food.
The conversation around the table went on. Ori was too busy, torn between listening to all the gossip and committing it to memory as he couldn’t really take notes at the informal party, and taking in all the pictures.
After about twenty minutes, Jim and his family strolled into the breakfast parlor and greeted everyone. Floris rushed up to Mavey with Biscuit at her heels, warg and damling equally excited.
"Mavey! Is it true? Yer coming on the road with us?"
"Yes," said Mavey brightly.
Floris all but squealed and Biscuit started to bark which almost put Dain under the table.
"I have a million things t’ show you!” Floris gabbed. “Can ya juggle? Never mind, I’ll teach ya!”
Floris grabbed two bacon filled scones and she and Mavey went off into the meadow arm in arm, chattering like birds.
Dori looked up at Jim.
"Thank you for doing this, Ruelis, Jim. I’m aware I may have upset your mine cart."
"Nah,” said Jim, waving dismissal. "It was getting too quiet. You need new blood to keep things fresh. Not to mention an oliphaunt."
Ruelis snorted, though she gave her husband a fond look.
"No’ t’ mention savin’ me from havin’ t’ squeeze out more badgers. Twin daughters? Yeh an’ yer predictions!"
Dori conducted the pair to seats and filled their plates and cups. Fior parked himself next to Arne and helped himself to everything within his reach.
Theoden King, Theodred, and Bard came in. Theodred was fine, Theoden and Bard looked like death warmed over. Balin helped them to their seats and Dori arrived on the scene with three cups of his restorative. Mistress Dazla brought more scones and a keg which Thorin immediately tapped and filled three tankards. Theoden drank the restorative, made a disgusted noise and took the tankard of ale Celeborn passed him. Theoden drank this back, too and sighed, thanked Celeborn and looked around the table with a smile.
"Honored Bearer, I would pay you in our finest horses for that potion.”
Dori fluttered and said, “nonsense” and passed the plate of cold beef Agirb brought in.
Bard sat staring at the cup. He sniffed it and grimaced.
“Drink it, dear,” Dori encouraged. “You’ll feel much better.”
Dori gave the final cup to Dain who swallowed it in one and sighed in happiness. Bard observed this, groaned and downed the mix then sucked down a cup of tea.
“Oi, brother,” said Dain, “have yeh had tha’ this whole time an’ made me sit here, prayin’ t’ die anyway?”
“I was attempting to teach you a lesson,” Dori said, imperiously.
Thorin barked out a laugh.
“Sorry, Dori, you’re at least a century too late.”
“Besides,” said Dori, “it takes time to make these things.”
“How much time?” Dain asked suspiciously.
“However long I feel like it,” replied Dori airily. “Then it has to cool.”
“Yeh can’t make it up ahead o’ time?”

“Oh, you know, I never thought of that,” said Dori, placing a finger to her cheek.

Aewandínen wiped his mouth and offered to ‘fix’ Gimli’s hair for Legolas, which Legolas politely demurred while Gimli turned purple. The young dwarf was only restrained in his seat by Legolas half-sitting in his lap.

Aewandínen whisked out. Gimli glared after him, red as a beet as Gloin and Gridr tried to stifle their mirth.

“Think tha’ barrow thing jumped in his mouth an’, him bein’ an elf, made him all kinds a’ nice?” Gimli demanded.

Legolas cringed and shot his father a guilty look, then requested Gimli to join him in a walk in the meadow.

Galadriel, Elrond and Celeborn all burst into giggles and Thranduil tried to frown but couldn’t quite manage it.

“If only I had realized earlier what the poor thing needed was a quest,” said Tharnduil. “But this sort of quest would never have occurred to me.”

“Ah well, lad,” Gloin said gruffly, but kindly. “Yeh do yer best, but sometimes yeh jus’ have t’ let th’ badgers find their own way.”

“Thank you,” Tharnduil said quite gravely, but his eyes twinkled at Gloin, who chuckled.

Frodo woke up and looked around.

“What’s going on?” he asked. “Oh look! Floris brought her warg!” The faunt was off and out to the meadow before anyone could speak.

At that minute, Dubb arrived, huffing for breath and with sweat running down into his beard.

“Yer majesty,” he bawled out and stomped over to Thorin, “with all due respect, I am retired, an’ fuck yeh, yeh fuckin’ arsehole!”

Thorin laughed so hard, he fell out of his chair.

“It’s no’ funny!” Dubb wheezed. “I haven’t run so much since I had t’ do fuckin’ calisthenics, an’ now I’m running’ abou’ after tha’ nutter o’ an elf, poppin’ in an’ outa people’s houses whether they’re awake an’ takin’ nourishment an’ offerin’ tea or still drunk asleep, it don’ matter t’ him. He goes over an’ jus’ yanks some poor sod’s heed over th’ edge o’ the bed an’ starts washin’ his hair, and then as he’s runnin’ out th’ door giving ‘im a lecture abou’ cleanliness and he’s off t’ th’ next, an’, oh, did I mention before? I am retired!”

Thorin very obviously could not breathe.

Dwalin stretched and said, “Let th’ prince go, Dubb. He seems jus’ fine on his own.”

“Yeh think? Yeh always were a bright spark. Pair o’ prize idjits, th’ both a’ yeh.”

Dori swept up,

“Oh, you poor thing! Dear Master Dubb, do come and have something to eat. You must be famished. I’ll get you some tea.”

“Don’ mind if I do.”

Dubb, having caught his breath, looked around the table, realized he was surrounded by the crowned heads of Arda, bowed curtly, sat in Aewandínen’s abandoned chair and proceeded to chow down.

Moments later, Legolas came in from the meadow with Gimli.

“King Thorin? Why are you on the ground? Are you alright?”

Legolas bent and, with Gimli, helped the new high king up and Legolas started again.

“King Thorin-”

Thorin’s eyebrow shot up.

“King Thorin? My nephews address your father as ‘Idad Elf’ and I’m King Thorin?”

“Idad Dwarf?” Legolas asked.

“Better. Yes, my nephew?”

Legolas grinned.

“Are you expecting a wagon train?”
Everyone went out to the meadow. Thorin took the spyglass Dwalin handed him.
“They’re on the old north road,” Legolas informed him. Thorin nodded thanks and, standing on one of the benches, put the spyglass to his eye and trained it out to the north.
“Looks like the soldiers we sent with Frerin,” Thorin said meditatively. “I don’t see any banners, so he’s not coming to my coronation. They appear to have a lot of wagons, so, likely traders came with them. They won’t be here until late this afternoon at the pace they’re going.”
Thorin dropped lightly down and handed Dwalin the spyglass.
“Why would traders come with your soldiers?” Frodo asked.
“It would keep them safe from bandits or orcs,” Thorin smiled down at the faunt.
“Oh,” Frodo considered. “Uncle Bilbo and I were very safe with Radagast and his rabbits.”
“Yes, you were,” Thorin agreed, then grinned. “That reminds me.”
The king went indoors.
“Where’s Idad Thorin going?” asked Kili coming out and brushing the crumbs off his front.
“He didn’t say,” Bilbo replied, watching Frodo, who was studying a butterfly which had just landed on a forget-me-knot nearby.
Thorin returned, carrying Orcrist in its scabbard. He looked amused and was followed out by everyone else.
“Gather around, please,” Thorin requested in a formal tone.
Everyone exchanged glances and did as they were asked.
Thorin gestured Frodo to come forward. Frodo went to stand in front of Thorin, looking rather puzzled. Bilbo stood behind the faunt.
“Young Master Frodo Baggins,” Thorin said, gravely. “Do you recall the discussion you and I had before I left the inn?”
“Yes,” Frodo said, also grave. “You told me that it was now my duty to look after Uncle Bilbo and make sure we were safe in Erebor by the first snowfall.” The faunt brightened. “And we’re both fine and we got here early! I did take care of you, didn’t I, Uncle Bilbo?”
Frodo looked up and back at a rather amused Bilbo.
“Indeed, you did, my lad. You took very good care of me and certainly followed King Thorin’s orders perfectly.”
Frodo looked back at Thorin, who nodded wisely.
“Indeed you have.”
Thorin drew Orcrist and beckoned Frodo forward again.
“Kneel before me, Frodo Baggins.” Thorin intoned.
Ori didn’t know how Thorin was keeping a straight face, as he was having difficulty not giggling. Frodo looked puzzled but did as he was told.
“Frodo Baggins,” Thorin stated in a ringing tone, “for the brave discharge of the task I set you, and for your diligent and patient baking lesson, I dub you a lord of Erebor.” He carefully touched Frodo’s right shoulder with the flat of the blade then the left shoulder. “Arise, Frodo, Lord of the Muffins.”
Everyone cheered and applauded.
Frodo, still kneeling, hissed to Thorin, “May I stand up now?”
“Yes. That’s what ‘arise’ means.”
“Oh.” Frodo hopped to his feet and turned to Bilbo. “Uncle Bilbo! I’m a dwarf lord!”
Bilbo hugged him and said, “Yes, I can already see your beard’s growing in.”
“Is it?” Frodo cried excitedly and ran his hand over his smooth jaw. “I think you’re right!”
The party heard squawking and rattling and turned to witness a raphcuctus bird bouncing gracelessly down the roof from the mountain side. Gnasher stood at the roofline, watching, and Ori could swear he was laughing. The bird rolled to a stop in the grass near the patio, shook itself thoroughly, then hopped up on its feet, seeming a little dizzy.
“Oh, poor Kelli landed on his head!” cried Galadriel.
“Yes,” said Thranduil smoothly, cutting his eyes at Celeborn. “Rather like-”
“Stop,” Celeborn warned through his teeth.
Thranduil clicked his tongue.
“You never were any fun…, laddie.”
Gloin snorted.
“What did you just call me?” Celeborn asked in astonishment.
Gloin nudged Thranduil’s hip.
“Now, don’t tease.” Gloin went up to Celeborn. “Just think, laddie, if yeh get tired o’ th’ great, oisy bird, yeh can always roast him. I’m sure he’s good eatin’.”
“I can’t roast him,” Celeborn all but purred. “He’s my cousin, and Legolas would be most put out.”
Gloin brayed with laughter and all the other dwarrows said, “Oooo!”
Sculdis nodded, “Good one, our Cel.”
Kelli spotted Celeborn, instantly exploded into clicks, honks, and squawks, and came bounding over, legs in a blur of movement. For a moment Celeborn looked to be in fear of his life, but as the raphcuctus bird drew near, it was obvious the bird was cooing.
“Oh, Elbereth,” Celeborn sighed in exasperation as the bird rubbed its cheek against his belly.
He patted the bird’s head reluctantly. It seemed he was an elf who recognized when the situation was hopeless.
Grinder leapt down with yet another raphcuctus bird on his back. This one waited until the goat slowed a little and slid off neatly, though bouncing several times anyway.
Thorin said, “Ori, please send a raven to Mistress Guernsia and say her birds have staged a breakout.”
Balin ran a hand down his beard and looked up where the goats had come through.
“I think tha’ may be th’ lot, Thorin, but best t’ let her know anyways tha’ she’ll come up short on her head count.”
“I’ll tell her.” Garnet called and flew off.
The new raphcuctus bird very casually waddled over, looking about the meadow with interest.
This one was not quite as tall as Kelli, but quite a substantial specimen.
Since no one seemed inclined to stop its progress, the bird walked right up to them and surveyed them curiously.
“Pretty bird!” said Frodo.
The raphcuctus swung its head around and approached Frodo. Ori could swear it had cocked an eyebrow as it looked down on the faunt.
“Keep your fingers away from its head, my boy,” Bilbo instructed.
But the bird was not snappish, only extended its beak over Frodo’s shoulder and gently drew him forward against its huge feathered breast and clucked fondly.
Gimli sighed.
“One less bird f’r th’ pot.”
“It likes me!” Frodo cried, someone muffled, his face still in the feathers. He announced, “It’s
“It would seem you have gained an attachment,” said Bilbo.
Frodo pulled back and looked at him with a frown.
“I thought it was called a raphcuctus?”
“So did I,” said Kili.
Bilbo shot Kill a look and turned back to Frodo with a smile.
“What are you going to call it, Frodo?”
“Posey.”
“Why?”
“Look at the tail! It’s a bunch of posies.”
They turned to go back into the house, except for Dwalin. Gnasher had bashed him across the rump in a playful manner and it was obvious that, for the dwarf warrior, there was no escape.
“I’ll be inside in a bit!” Dwalin called behind him, laughing and pitting his strength against the goat’s, arms against horns.
“Don’t get flattened!” Ori called back.
“I won’t. We been doin’ this since he were a kid!”
At the doorway Ori glanced back once more to see that Dwalin had flipped the goat onto its back and was giving Gnasher a tummy rub with both hands and his face. Gnasher waved his legs and bleated happily.
Grinder grazed nearby, apparently above such things.

The rest of the party returned to the table, which was still covered in pictures. Some time was spent helping Jansad and Brur decide what order they should go in and with what. They were finishing, when Mistress Dazla entered and said,
“You majesty, the… er… Bang Crash… request an audience.”
“Excellent. Please bring them in.” Thorin looked amused, while the younger set traded looks of utter glee and excitement.
Ecthelion entered in black leather, the same midnight color as his hair. The rest of the band traipsed in behind him, dressed in the bright colors of traveling balladeers, except for the shortish fellow who entered last, wearing a black hood that covered his features and carrying the drum sticks at the ready, in case the need came up to drum something.
Thorin bowed his head in greeting.
“Ecthelion, you and your… band… are very welcome. Would you care for some breakfast?”
“Second breakfast,” Bilbo suggested helpfully.
“Elevenses!” Frodo corrected.
“Aauk!” said Posey.
The elven lead singer glanced at Posey, raised an eyebrow, and thanked Thorin.
“We’ve eaten and are shortly to be on our way. We came to take our leave.”
All the younger set made disappointed noises.
“When are you coming back?” asked Omi.
“Can you come back soon?” Loli added.
“We are quite at King Thorin’s leisure,” said Ecthelion graciously. “We don’t often get fed quite this well. Or this much. Or garner such a big crowd.”
“You’re welcome anytime you’re passing through the area,” said Thorin.
The band members looked at each other.
“Yes, well, we thought you should understand there are unique circumstances before you invite us again.”
“Circumstances?” Thorin asked. “Do you need to meet with me privately?”
“Oh, no… well… “
“Drum!” shouted the drummer, startling the raphcuctus and everyone else. “Drum! Drum!
Druuuuuuuuuuuuuuu!”
Thorin looked at the drummer and back at Ecthelion.
“Your circumstance, I presume.”
“Er, yes. Drum, come here.”
“Drum!”

“Yes, come here,” Ecthelion encouraged, his voice gentle and soothing. “It’s alright, Drum.”
Thorin turned his chair and gestured for his guests to make a little room. They did so and Ecthelion steered the drummer forward by the shoulder to stand before Thorin. Ecthelion muttered something, the drummer gasped and started to breathe heavily. Suddenly Ori had a feeling this wasn’t just a very shy musician with a drum fixation.
Ecthelion drew back Drum’s hood and Ori, for the first time, saw an honest to Mahal orc.
“Fuck me,” barked Dain, as every warrior reached for their weapons, half rising.
Thorin raised his hand.
“Stop! Everyone calm down. Ecthelion, explain.”

“Stop! Everyone calm down. Ecthelion, explain.”
“He’s harmless,” the elf started. “May I tell you the story?”
“Please,” said Thorin. The king nodded to Mistress Dazla and more chairs were brought.
Thorin cleared his throat and gestured for the band to sit as well. The breakfast party slowly settled back down, though no one looked particularly relaxed.
Ecthelion remained standing before Thorin, with his arm around Drum’s shoulders and began.
“About two years ago we came across a slain party of orcs on the road. From the spears, we thought they must have been done in by soldiers from Rohan. We didn’t think much of it, since there didn’t seem to be a threat, but for the next three days we got the feeling we were being watched. We presumed it might be a Rohan scout. On the fourth morning after that we woke to find one of our drums and a set of sticks were missing.
“We looked around, but we didn’t see anything, but then, in the distance, we heard the drum being played. It was the backbeat to the new song we had just begun working on the night before. So we followed the noise and found… him. He was obviously terrified, backed right away from us and the instrument, but the whole time he kept saying ‘Drum-Drum-Drum’.
“He was such a pitiful fellow, we weren’t afraid of him or worried about being attacked. We just took the drum back and moved on, but once we’d settled down and started practicing that night, there was a rustle in the bushes and we heard him out in the dark saying ‘Drum-Drum-Drum’.
“Well, I confess we had been drinking, so we started talking about it and we figured: Why not?
He was there anyway. We invited him join us and offered him the drum. We went on practicing and he played for us. When we stopped for dinner, he refused all offers of food or drink. When we woke the next morning we found him eating the grass around camp. Over time, we realized grass is the only thing he ever eats. His upkeep is practically nil."
“Oh,” said Galadriel.
“We were concerned at first, going into towns and villages with him, but he’s never harmed anyone, nor does he steal,” Ecthelion went on, “Still, it’s better to keep him cloaked, so he doesn’t frighten anyone off. Or tempt someone to kill him. He’s the best drummer we ever had.”
“Oh,” said Celeborn.
Dwalin came in, looked around, took in everyone’s stunned expression, took in Drum, and turned to his king.
“Oi, Thorin, did yeh know there’s an orc in yer breakfast parlor?”
Balin sighed.
“Aye, brother. Thank yeh.”
“You’re not afraid of him?” Frodo asked Dwalin.
“Him? Why would I be afraid of a porter?” Dwalin asked.
“A porter?” Balin asked.
“A porter, a lackey, someone who gets kicked a lot. Look, he’s just a bitty thin’. An orcs ain’t inclined t’ cringe this much, especially when they feel threatened.”
“That’s quite true,” said Thorin. He rose and approached Drum, looking him over. Drum backed into Ecthelion, staring fearfully at Thorin.
“Look at all the old scars on his head,” Thorin said, quietly. “Those aren’t from bladed weapons.
Those are blunt force. His skull is more dented than any orc’s I’ve seen, and I’ve seen quite a few. Orcs crave meat. When has an orc ever eaten any kind of vegetation? This one, as you said, only eats grass.”

One of the females in the band asked sadly, “You think he’s been knocked about?”

Thorin answered with a question, “Has he ever said anything more than ‘drum’? Has he spoken black speech or any other language?”

The band members all shook their heads.

“If he’s reduced t’ eaten grass,” Dwalin observed, “he’s been knocked t’ th’ point he don’t have black speech, ’r much else.”

Drum said, “Hmmm” then grinned. He didn’t have any teeth, either.

“Yes,” said Thorin.

“Poor Drum,” said Frodo.

“Never thought I’d feel sorry f’r an orc,” said Dain.

“Indeed,” said Thranduil. “He’s lucky he ran away, as any survivors from that raid in the Riddemark you saw, would have eaten him.”

“Ew!” chorused the younger set.

“Icky, indeed,” Thranduil agreed.

Thorin sighed, turned to Lord Elrond and asked, “Is he in any pain?”

Elrond approached and rather gingerly touched the orc on the forehead. There was a flicker of bluish light. Drum giggled. Elrond’s eyebrow flew up.

“I could relieve a little cranial pressure. Other than that, he’s survived in reasonable shape. His aura is also calmer than those of most of my relatives.”

“Elrond, really!” Galadriel cried in mock sternness.

“What’s in his head?” Dwalin asked. “Nuthin’ ‘bout goin’ back t’ his masters?”

“Drum drum drum drum drum grass drum,” Elrond intoned.

“Really?” Thorin’s brows rose.

“It’s not subtle,” Elrond seemed rather surprised. “He has banished all thought and memory of his old life. He’s completely in the moment. He has no thoughts beyond drumming and eating grass. Actually, he’s remarkably content. He’s no danger to anyone or anything beyond people’s lawns.”

Elrond cocked his head a moment then, “He doesn’t like flies.”

“I wondered,” said Ecthelion. “But why?”

“The buzzing throws off his timing,” said Elrond.

The dwarrow and the men and the elves all looked at each other then began to laugh.

“Would Drum like some refreshment?” asked Dori as Mistress Dazla returned with a loaded tray covered with a very large coffee carafe and a platter of xocolātl chip biscuits.

Ecthelion grinned and, folding Drum’s cloak over a chair, pointed out to the patio.

“Drum? Eat?” he said with a smile.

“Drum!” shouted Drum, rushed outside, and was soon gazing happily with the ponies and goats.

Everyone sat in silence for a moment, watching the tiny orc sitting on his haunches, tearing off the tops of the grasses and stuffing them in his mouth.

“Aauck,” remarked Posey.

“Indeed,” responded Thorin, seating himself once more. Dori poured out coffee for everyone.

Brur and Sadi gathered up the carefully sorted pictures, discussing the order. Ori was finishing a sketch of Drum, when there was a racket from the sitting room.

Glorfindel bounced through the doorway and flung himself on Ecthelion.

“My friend,” Glorfindel shouted. He released Ecthelion, now choking for breath around laughing.

“King Thorin,” Glorfindel said in an off-hand manner. “Why is there a tiny orc eating your meadow?”

“He’s hungry,” stated Thorin, casually.

“He only eats grass,” added Dain in the same tone.

Glorfindel looked at them all, one eyebrow raised. Thranduil shrugged.
“He pays the drums. He need all the nourishment he can get.”
This serene discussion was spoiled by all the younger set bursting into giggles.
Elrond looked a trifle embarrassed for a moment.
“I wish you had let us know you lived, Ecthelion,”
The old hero shrugged disinterestedly.
“As far as I could tell, I didn’t die. The fountain waters merely held me in sleep until about five years ago. I woke, swam to the surface and climbed out only to find myself in the ruins of Gondolion. There was a broken down stone that read that I had died here. I gathered what I could find and set out for where I thought Lorien lay. It was a few days later when I fell in with this band of wayward wanderers.”
The band members all grinned at him and he at them.
“Needless to say,” Ecthelion went on, “they filled me in on all that had happened since my supposed ‘death’. I thought perhaps I would make a new life for myself in this future Arda as a musician. I’m good at singing and not bad at the flute.”
This made all the elves laugh.
Ecthelion turned and grinned at Thorin.
“Take good care of Orcrist for me. It’s a fine sword.”
Ori gave himself a mental slap. How could he have forgotten?
“I beg your pardon, Lord Ecthelion,” said Thorin, visibly mortified. “Your sword!”
“Keep it with my blessing, and may it serve you well.”
“Thank you, Ecthelion. I will keep it as my own and it shall continue in the Line of Durin.”
“I like that, Ecthelion chuckled. “I have no more kith or kin. Orcrist should be a family sword.
Thank you, King Thorin!”
“Excellent!” Glorfindel concurred.
The band took coffee and biscuits, and told exciting and hair-raising tales of their travels until they head Drum belch long and loud, shout ‘drum’, and rush back in to join his fellow band members.
Drum butted his head against each band members’ knees, yipping “drum, drum”. They all chuckled and rubbed Drum’s head, making Drum jump up and down.
The horn player laughed and played with Drum’s ears, making the orc giggle like a pebble, the man looked up at the party, saying,
“He thinks he’s people,”
When Drum snatched up his sticks and began tapping out a rollicking beat on the table, Ecthelion rose and the band took their leave of the High King and his family and guests. Glorfindel went out with them, still talking to Ecthelion.
“That was bloody fuckin’ weird,” Brur commented idly.
“Yes,” Sadi agreed and regarded Thorin, speculatively.
“I think the Great Woudini was more than correct in his prediction that you, King Thorin, will make your rule the stuff of legend.”
Thorin snickered,
“At the rate I’m going, Master Jansad, it will be legend, as no one in their right mind would believe any of it.”
“You do have extraordinary things happen about you,” Lady Arwen added.
“When one’s household is blessed by the presence of an instrument of Mahal,” Thorin said with overly-dignified pomposity, “One learns to deal.”
Ori blushed and Dwalin slid his arm over Ori’s shoulders, kissing his hair.
“What do you have planned for this first day of official kingship?” Celeborn asked, draining his coffee cup. “Will you be touring your kingdom?”
Thorin snorted.
“The first thing I have to do is put things away.”
“What things?” asked Thranduil.
“All those presents,” replied Thorin. “Balin, Ori, will you take memos and make things happen?”
“Aye.”
“Certainly.”
“I would like to have a household portion of the incense taken out of those jars from the Mavi and the rest sent to the burial chambers for the free use of any who visit. All those spices and oils Gheir brought need to be dispensed fairly about Erebor and, Bard, with your permission, the Dale also.”
Bard stared. “You’re very generous, Thorin, thank you.”
“And,” Thorin inclined his head to Bard and went on, “divide that …er…goop Hild brought between all the guilds and tell them to see what use they may find for it and to let me know, if they do.”
Balin chuckled and Ori wrote busily, reflecting that Thorin was very clever to send his gifts to his subjects.

“Next, lad?” Balin asked with a smile. Thorin grinned and lifted Frodo back into his lap.
“We have already dispensed with all the livestock,” Thorin reflected. “What those birds will be useful for, Mahal only knows, but I’m sure Mistress Aldernay will make extra money with people coming to look at them. Bilbo and I did a little perusing of their care manual before we sent it courier to Mistress Aldernay. They only lay one egg a week. It will be over a year before anything in the way of trade or commerce can be done with them. So, for now they can be a local attraction and, I suppose, if Bard and I, or any one in the family, go and inspect them occasionally, it will keep people interested. Master Hallow will, not doubt, be consulting Mistress Aldernay on the cross breeding of those amazing aurochs you gifted us with, Theoden. I will ask her for updates as they see results and let you know.”
“I’d be most interested, Thorin,” Theoden nodded. Thorin turned and nodded to the elves.

“The cloak, Orcrist and mallorn seeds are already taken care of, and I shall take the greatest care of the light of Eärendil’s star, I assure you, Lady Galadriel. Do you advise that it should be locked away or kept close by?”
The lady looked far away for a moment then said, quietly, “Keep it hidden. Keep it safe. It will be needed within the year.”
“So, stick it in an envelope and keep it up on the mantle?” asked Bilbo.
“You foresee a danger to Erebor, milady?” Thorin asked.
She turned to the party and her smile glowed. “It will be a glorious purpose, King Thorin. Do not fear for your people.”
A cold shiver went up Ori’s spine, for a flash of a moment, the room shifted and he stood in a huge cavern holding the shimmering light of Eärendil high. The image vanished and he gasped slightly. The room was busy with talk and Thorin considering matters.
Thorin then nodded and smiled at Arne.

“Next, I need that lovely painting of my Minty hung up in my office.”
Arne blushed and smiled.
“I’m glad you like it, your majesty.”
“You majesty?” Thorin said with a raised brow. Arne grinned.
“Idad Thorin?”
“Better.”
“Snur’s gift needs to replace my current desk which I shall relinquish with pleasure. Bilbo, if you’d like to try it and see if it meets your needs for the time being.”
“Certainly,” Bilbo called back on his way to the kitchen
“Ulfr’s lights…hmmmm… The white ones need to go to the miners. Will you see to that, Lord Bofur?”
Bofur choked then chuckled,
“Aye, will do.”
“The pretty colored ones should be strung up in the streets over any night market areas. Make it even more festive for future traders to disport themselves at. The Gondorian Tapestry does need to be in the throne room. I think it should hang behind the throne but high enough for all to see.”
Thorin nodded to Aragorn and Arwen, who looked pleased.
Ori scribbled the orders down, half his brain still with the sudden image and the other half working on Thorin’s decisions.

Thorin winked at Bard.
“I shall keep my fly-fishing tools-”
“Tackle,” corrected Bard.
“Tackle,” Thorin repeated then grinned at Bard. “You know that means something different among dwarves.”
“I do know. Shut up,” Bard grumbled, a stripe of color on his cheeks. Bain and Sigrid giggled.
“I shall keep it near to hand, in case we find some time to begin my training.”
“Here I am!” Tilda burst into the room.
“Where have you been young lady?” Bard demanded, lifting his daughter onto his knee.
“Nowhere,” Tilda replied and took a biscuit. Bard rolled his eyes and sighed.
“And,” Dain rumbled at Thorin from down the table.
Thorin looked teasingly down at him.
“ ‘And’? What could you possibly be referring to, dear cousin?”
Dain growled and pretended to sulk.
“Thorin, dear,” Dori rescued her elder brother deftly, “when would you like to use the new bed?
I’m sure it will be much more comfortable now that you have company.”
“Terribly discreet of you, considering our guests are sitting right here,” said Thorin.
“Oh, tosh! It’s not a secret. I’m sure all our friends wish you a good night’s sleep… and other things.”
“I don’t even know how I’m going to fit that in my room, seeing as it’s the same size as my room.”
“That shiny, baconish thing?” Bilbo asked. “Bit to take in all at once, isn’t it.”
“Not t’ worry,” said Dain. “I designed it t’ be disassembled and set back up anywheres.”
“Besides,” Dori informed them all, “it’s not going upstairs.”
“I knew it,” said Thorin. “You’re planning on making me sleep in the meadow.”
“Hardly! Besides, the weather would do dreadful things to the linens! You, at least, are waterproof.”
“That makes me sound like an oilskin cloak,” said Thorin.
“Hush, dear, I’m trying to give you your coronation present from Balin and I. The bed isn’t going upstairs. It’s going into a suite of rooms on the main floor of Fundin House.”
Thorin and Bilbo looked at each other, then back at Dori.
“Were you two planning on moving out?” Thorin asked.
“No, you silly thing, there’s a whole other suite of rooms on the far side of the kitchen larders that hasn’t been used in at least an age. We think they may have been used by… er… concubines.”
Bilbo face-palmed.
Thorin sighed.
“As long as they didn’t leave their personal effects,” said Thorin.
“They’re very nice, actually,” said Dori. “The rooms, dear, not the concubines. I’m not as old as that.”
Nori coughed and Dori shot him a look before smoothing her features once more.
“The rooms face onto the meadow, but can’t be seen from the outside unless one is right on top of them. The windows were covered over, but they are actually glass. Mistress Dazla and her people are still scouring out the entire suite.”
“To be filled with what?” Thorin asked. “I have a bed, a chair and a dresser.”
“And a new desk,” Balin put in.
“No, that’s going in my office. The old desk, then. And how are we to get to these rooms? Is there still a passage?”
“The suite used to connect to the rest of the house through the door in the sitting room. It simply has to be uncovered.”
“You mean Dain’s favorite secret passage?” Thorin asked.
“You do have to cross that passage to get to those rooms, yes. Alas, I’m afraid Dain’s secret will have to be sacrificed in favor of a real hallway and door.”

“Bollocks,” Dain grumbled.

Dori turned and peered through the door to the kitchen. She waved and Mistress Dazla swept through, smiling.

“Dear Bearer, is his majesty wishing to see the new suite?”

“Well?” Dori smiled on Bilbo and Thorin. The two exchanged glances and Bilbo laughed.

“Oh, why not. If we’re going to be living there we’d best make sure they’re tolerable.”

Thorin said very deliberately to Bilbo, “You still don’t have to share rooms with me if you don’t wish it. Everyone seems to have determined we’re already married, but I don’t harbor any illusions.”

“Let’s see how this works out,” said Bilbo. “We’re both terribly involved in our own work. We’ll likely spend most of our free time with the family. I don’t think either of us is in danger of feeling suffocated.” Bilbo grinned and ran a hand down Thorin’s arm. “Besides, I like sleeping next to you.”

“Considering the size of the bed, I don’t think we’ll feel suffocated there, either. We’ll be lucky if we can find each other by beacon.”

Thorin and Bilbo rose and so did everyone at the table. They followed Mistress Dazla and trooped through to the sitting room. Brur and Jansad took the pictures to the table still full of scribes, sorting, collating, and eating snacks. Brur waved Ori on to follow the king.

The doorway that had been almost invisible in the sitting room was fully opened. A sill and lintels had been put in to exactly match any other door in the house. The biggest differences were that the jamb was silver and the door itself paneled in lapis of perfect Durin blue.

Bilbo gaped.

“That wasn’t there when we went out to the meadow,” he said.

“Dwarf work very quickly,” Dori told them loftily.

“Especially when they’re being utterly sneaky,” Thorin remarked.

“Stealthy, dear, stealthy,” said Dori.

The handle was silver. Thorin nodded to Frodo who reached up and opened the door. Beyond there was a pleasant, airy passage. Half way along was door to the left and another painted dark brown door at the far end.

“See, Dain, they gave you your own door,” Thorin called to his cousin.

“Good to know, good to know,” the Ironhills ruler commented. “I’ll be sure t’ tell our Chopper when t’ stop, so I kin open it f’r ‘im.”

“Your majesty. Shall we panel this hallway with wood?” Mistress Dale asked. “The honored Bearer suggested we consult you before putting on the finishing touches.”

“We’ll think it over,” Thorin promised.

Frodo shrieked and laughed.

“Uncle Bilbo! Idad Thorin! Come look at the giant funny door!” the faunt cried. He was jumping up and down beside the huge left side door.

Ori admired it. He had only read of such doors as they were difficult to make and had fallen out of fashion several hundred years ago.

“Look at that,” Bilbo admired. “I never thought I would ever see such a door.”

“Frodo,” Thorin said, smiling down on the faunt, “this sort of doorway is called an ogee arch.”

“Ogee arch,” repeated Frodo, committing it to memory. The faunt grabbed the handle and pushed.

“It’s locked.” Frodo was crestfallen.

“No, no, akunith, like this.” Thorin took Frodo’s hands and placed them on the brass handle shaped like two clasped hands and drew them apart. The doors slid into the wall, sunshine appeared from the window on the other side.

“They go into the wall!” Frodo squeaked excitedly.

“We call them pocket doors,” Thorin told him. “Very useful, easy to hide, and a rather graceful way to enter a room.”

“But impossible t’ slam,” said Dain sorrowfully.
Frodo hopped in and Thorin stood back for Bilbo to enter. Ori followed after, his hand tucked in Dwalin’s. Dori, Balin and Mistress Dazla came after. The rest of the party traipsed in behind and looked around.

They had entered a large, high ceilinged room. Despite the wall being rounded, it was wainscoted with birch to the domed ceiling which was painted as a beautiful blue sky dotted with cottony clouds. Song birds flew through the firmament, some obviously singing and others carrying flowers in their beaks.

Sunshine poured through the far wall which was entirely paned with glass formed in the lava chambers deep in the mountain. The glass was re-enforced with silvered lattice which wound across the edges as flowering, fruit bearing vines.

The wall opposite the windows held an ornate fireplace shaped as a half moon. It was so large Ori could have stood inside it. The mouth, like a half moon on its side, was trimmed in cast iron feathers, and the plain mantle was surrounded by an entire population of ravens in the same material.

Thorin went to the far windows and threw them open. Ori observed that they were like the Fundin House breakfast parlor windows being doors that opened out to the meadow. Both Frodo and Posey trotted out. About six feet out, Frodo called back.

“I can see the patio!”
Thorin turned and smiled on Bilbo.

“It seems we will have some privacy and Frodo won’t get lost.”

Bilbo chuckled and crossed to an open door to the left. Though it was a square opening, the top lintels were decorated with a silver filigree of leaves and flowers making an arched entryway.

“That is the kitchen, Professor Baggins,” explained Mistress Dazla. “You can see there are plenty of cupboards and counter space. We’ve had the carpenters in to install kickboards around all the counters and the sinks.”

Bilbo raised his eyes in question. Mistress Dazla hurried forward and tapped her toe to the strip of wood beneath a cupboard. It popped out, making a comfortably sized step. Bilbo stood on it and the counter was now at the perfect height for him to work. Bilbo smiled and shook his head.

“You dwarf are amazing. This is wonderful.”

“Aye, we’re all bloody geniuses,” Dain agreed. Gloin chuckled and nudged Thranduil, who went and looked out the beautiful half moon window over the deep double sinks.

Ori turned and saw through the rounded archway at the opposite end, where there looked to be a pantry and, at least, four larders. Bilbo and Dori were in deep conversation. The kitchen was painted a pale blue and accented by white tile and with beautiful, pure white marble counters.

Bilbo glanced at Thorin. Frodo was holding Thorin’s hands and jumping up and down on Thorin’s boots. Frodo stopped a moment, giggling, then Thorin lifted his foot and took a step. Frodo squeaked and Thorin raised his other foot much higher and took a larger step. Frodo laughed and hung on. Fili and Kili watched, delighted with the sight of their uncle playing with someone so young.

The two princes looked at each other then rushed out of the room, seizing their aunt as they went. Gridr squalled and swore at them, but was borne away.

Bilbo returned to the first room and looked about.

“Well, I’m sure we can curtain off the back part for bedrooms—”

“This way, dear.” Dori took Bilbo’s arm and headed toward the fireplace. It was when Dori turned right that Ori realized the fireplace hid a curve in the wall which was a hallway. Following them, he saw this opened out to a small room.

“This can be used as a meeting room or whatever you like.”

Bilbo took in the velvety rose-pink walls with their turquoise accents and domed ceiling tiled with rose quartz and lined with still more chips of turquoise. Bilbo raised his brows.

“What would you suggest?” Bilbo asked as Thorin smirked.

“This looks like the big bathroom up at Buck Hall,” Frodo said.

“We can repaint,” Dori said, quickly. “As said, these were the concubines rooms and quite the love nest. We removed all the…er…suggestive decorations.”
Bilbo looked at Thorin, who was trying and failing not to chuckle. "I hope they were saved," Bilbo said in a mock serious tone. "I imagine Master Brur would be quite annoyed if such historically important items were destroyed."

Dori snorted. "They've been put away for the moment." Dori then looked down his nose at the royal couple. "If you'd both like to go through them later to decorated your own room, I shall have them held at the ready. Come along."

Dori led the through the far arched doorway. This was a plain anteroom, empty like the other rooms. This had one doorway on the right which contained only a large empty room made entirely of maroon marble with a domed ceiling of rusty orange tile lined with rubies. "It is a rather ugly color scheme," Dori mused, "but you can have it redone."

"Obviously where they put the naughty concubines to punish them," Bilbo murmured. "There's only one door in or out."

Thorin shook his head ponderously. "There was no escape."

They exited and went on to large passageway tiled in pale green jade and through another arched doorway was a antechamber tiled in white marble with black and gold filaments thread through. This room had two doors. One room was an office space, done in blue lace agate and birch wainscoting with graceful built-in bookshelves.

Ori watched Dori's mouth widen into a secretive smile which he knew from long experience meant there was a truly wonderful surprise in store. She threw open the second door revealing a large oval room paneled in black oak with four doors. On the left was a large, airy room. As Dori opened this door she said, "Bilbo, I believe we may have to send guards in to pry you from this room at tea time."

"Really, Dori?" Bilbo scoffed. "You do know I'm a hobbit?"

"Entirely, my dear," said Dori, stepping out of the way.

All the walls were covered in ornately carved black oak bookcases. This room's domed ceiling was pure white marble set with tourmaline tree branches and emerald leaves, and a myriad tiny points of real sunlight filtered down among them from pipes on the mountainside.

Bilbo wandered inside looking around with his mouth hanging open. "This is amazing," he said. "If I were to design my own library, it would still be nothing to this."

Beside this room was doorway which held a bathroom, decorated in all shades of pale blue tiny glass tile work. The floor was also pale blue tiles but was inlaid with colored stones to make a mosaic of underwater animals. Frodo delighted in the huge turtle that 'swam' in the middle of the floor.

At the far door opposite the bath was a little room with large windows looking out at the sitting room’s windows and the meadow.

The last door was once more an ogee arch and contained a large rounded room with a stripe of windows along two thirds of the room. This room was amazing in that the floor was enamled to look like grass, dotted with occasional wild flowers, the walls were iron wood panels minutely carved with muntins, cartouches, pilasters, and bosses. The domed ceiling was a cream color that the accented the ironwood timbers carved with flowers and fruit to the midpoint of the ceiling. This was crowned with an upside-down fruit that Ori recognized as a pineapple.

"Oh Bilbo, I do like this bathroom," Lady Galadriel sighed.

Ori glanced over and saw that the Lady had gone to the far side of the room and was peering into another. Ori went in and saw the large round, domed bathroom was entirely tiled to look as though it was underwater. Plants waved in a supposed current and brightly colored, bejeweled fish swam about. In a small alcove was the privy. Most of the room floor was taken up with a huge pool, large enough to swim in. Ori could see tile fish and plants in it, most hiding little pipe openings, so the bath could have sprays of hot spring water burst through.

The elves were left to stare in avarice, while the rest of the party returned to the main bedroom. In the middle of the room stood the huge shiny, bacon-ish thing, as Bilbo had called it. It was not made up yet but still piled high with mattresses and pillows. Frodo gave a shout of delight and rushed forward. He nimbly climbed the footboard, turned around, flailed his arms and cried out, “Wheeeeee!”

He fell back onto the feather mattress with a resounding ‘poof’, the down lofting up all around him like whipped cream.

This had the effect of Tilda, Bain, Gimli, and Legolas throwing themselves onto the bed, laughing and shrieking. It quickly devolved into a pillow fight which was broken up by Bilbo and Dori scolding and Dwalin, Dain, and Thranduil dragging the antagonists off. Frodo struggled up to sitting position.

“Uncle Bilbo!”
“Yes, my boy?”

Frodo clambered to the edge where Dwalin grabbed him by the seat of his trousers, hefted him off, and put back on his feet.

“Do I get one of these, too?” Frodo asked.

Bilbo shot Thorin a look of mischief.

“I don’t know, my boy. It may be that in Erebor the younglings sleep out on the front steps.”

“I didn’t last night.”

“That was a special occasion.”

“Idad Thorin?” Frodo tried.

Thorin nodded judiciously, “I’ll have Dwalin check the dungeons for something suitable.”

This made Bilbo snort and Frodo frowned at both of them and folded his little arms.

“I’m telling…” Frodo paused and tried to think of a suitable person to threaten his uncles with.

“Imad Dis,” the faunt decided.

“Good luck findin’ her,” Dwalin said, ruffling the faunt’s hair. “She ain’t back yet.”

“Oh,” Frodo looked discouraged. Dori pushed Dwalin out of the way and scooped the faunt into her arms.

“Nonsense, my little pet. You shall have a lovely bed of your own. We just need a bit of time to find it. Don’t you worry.”

There was some crashing noises and the din of Fili and Kili’s voices cursing each other. It sounded as though something was bumping every wall along the hallways.

Everyone turned to see as they arrived loudly in the open area before the bedrooms. The elves came through attracted, no doubt, by the racket. Ori stared at the piece of furniture the two princes had been half rolling, half dragging. It appeared to be a huge bowl made of cast iron rods braided and matted together like basketry. The princes turned it over and Ori realized it was an enormous nest.

“Frodo’s bed!” announced Fili.

“Imad, Mokrah, and Oqizla are bringing the bedding,” Kili told them.

Everyone came over and to admire and exclaim.

“It’s a nest!” Bilbo said in delight. “That’s adorable!”

“Every Durin royal child’s first proper bed,” Thorin stated with a sentimental tone.

“Were you hatched?” Frodo asked.

“No,” Thorin said. “I promise.”

“Only Kili,” said Fili, earning himself a smack.

“Little Durins sleeping in raven’s nests,” mused Thranduil. “I had no idea you dwarrow made such captivating things for your offspring.”

“You have no idea,” muttered Stonehelm as Dain barked a laugh and grabbed his son’s face to plant a loud kiss on it.

Many willing hands up ended the ‘nest’ again, and rolled it into Frodo’s room. It was put near a window. Gridr, Oqizla and Mokrah arrived and the mattresses and bedding were made up. Frodo laughed and jumped into the middle of it. Like the down mattress on the other bed, he sank into it and shrieked, flailing his legs in the air.

Thorin smiled, laying a hand on Bilbo’s shoulder.
“It’ll last him a good long time as he’s smaller than I when I was given it. It’ll be easy enough to attach a small pipe from the forges. The iron is solid except for small oil reservoirs all through, so it can be kept nice and warm for the winter months.”

“That is the cutest bed I’ve every seen,” said Bilbo, shaking his head in wonder and leaning back against Thorin.

“Idad Thorin,” Fili said, “Should Kill and I look out the rest of the stuff?”

“Stuff?” Bilbo repeated.

“What kind of stuff?” Frodo asked.

“I’ll need to discuss it with Bilbo first, then talk to your amad,” Thorin told his nephews.

“Well,” said Dori now arm in arm with Balin. “Do you like your present?”

Thorin laughed and Bilbo went and hugged Dori then Balin.

“We love it. Thank you both so much.”

Balin chuckled. “We jus’ need t’ find yeh both some suitable furniture. P’haps the’ pair a’ yeh kin make us up a list.”

“Oh my!” Bilbo said looked a little a-sea. “I’ll have to think it through. Frodo and I have spent the last six months sitting on other people furniture or doing without. I have to admit that kitchen is all I can think about at the moment.”

Dis arrived, looking rather well for someone who had slept on a throne room floor.

She carried a box into the room, looking around, she saw Frodo and smiled.

“Come, akunith, I have something for you.”

Frodo sidled over and peered inside, squeaked and started to pull out toys.

“Hey,” said Kili, “that’s my mechanical Dwalin!”

“What?” Ori cried, running over.

Indeed, it was a miniature version of his husband, seated atop Gnasher, both wearing identical scowls.

“You’ll love this, Ori-mate,” said Kili. “Watch!”

He wound a key on the side of the goat, under Dwalin’s boot, and set the contraption down. The goat trotted a half dozen paces, stopped, and bleeted. Dwalin shook his head and grunted.

Ori thought he would lose it right there.

Dwalin didn’t do himself any favors when he came to peer over Ori’s shoulder, spotted the trotting goat and rider, shook his head and grunted.

“The likeness is amazing,” Ori teased.

“Fuckin’ Dain,” said Dwalin. “It’ll only be funny till he makes one a’ yeh.”

“Here’s my toy raven,” said Fili. “I wondered where that went. I looked all over the place for it.”

“You couldn’t find it because you actually put it away,” said Dis.

“I can play with these? Really?” Frodo asked, eyes huge and grin wide.

“As much as you like, Frodo,” said Dis. “I know you didn’t bring anything with you except Gorgo.”

“Gorgo will like his new friends,” said Frodo, sounding quite positive.

“I have no doubt,” said Dis, ruffling his curls.

“And, much as I would like to stay and play as well,” said Thorin, “Miss Oqizla tells me that the undermonarchs have finally stirred from their lairs and are up and taking nourishment.”

“Dori took pity on them,” said Dis.

“Dori took pity on me,” said Thorin. “It’s impossible to try meeting with six people in various stages of wanting to die. And since they’re going to be meeting with you, dear sister, tomorrow, then Gheir’s leaving, then the shopping trip—”

“Shopping trip?”

“With Dori and Binni. Ahkn and Hild already have the route planned out. They’ll be out of your hair for a while if you want to take care of any pressing business.”

“Bollocks,” said Dis, “I’m going with them!”

The party went back out to the empty sitting room where Mistress Dazla was talking with a team of servants, armed with all kinds of cleaning equipment. Thorin and Bilbo went and thanked them
Once back in the sitting room, they found that the scribes had finished and were packing things away carefully. Brur looked pleased and Sadi was all but salivating.

“My king,” she addressed Thorin, “Everything is in order and will be given a loose bind, then be sent back to you for review. The pictures you have already approved will be inserted with the full name of the scribe who rendered it.”

“Thorin-” Aragorn began.

“Yes. The portrait.” Thorin remembered. “Master Sadi, the color portrait of the Gondorian royal couple. Would you please find the scribe responsible and request them to attend his majesty of Gondor.”

“At once, my king.” Sadi promised.

The scribes took themselves and their paper booty out.

Ori heard voices in the receiving room and in came Miss Larit with King Ulfr in tow.

“Ulfr, are you conscious?” Thorin greeted the monarch.

“Aye I’ll do,” the dwarf stretched and yawned then spotted his son.

“Arne, what you bin up to?”

“Looking at all the images drawn at the coronation, adad. You missed a treat. Someone got a lovely sketch of you dancing on the table with Ahkn.”

“I’m keeping it,” Thorin grinned. “I’ll have it framed and sent to you for Yule,“ “Fuck yerself,” Ulfr chuckled.

Dipfa was suddenly at Thorin’s side, looking up at him, urgency burning in her eyes.

“Ah,” said Thorin. “King Ulfr, I present to you, young Miss Dipfa. She is Lord Ori’s dresser and fashion designer.”

“Miss Dipfa,” Ulfr nodded.

“Miss Dipfa is in great need of your chemical knowledge,” Thorin elaborated.

“Oh, aye?” Ulfr cocked his head, a grin starting. “Somethin’ to do with Lord Ori in the royal scribe robes sleeping table top in the leftovers?”

“Yes!” cried Dipfa, “Would you please give me the benefit of your advice, your majesty?”

Dipfa led the way and Buj followed closely, notebook at the ready.

Hild and Aris came in, greeted everyone, and looked around.

“This is a most pleasant room,” Hild observed. Tilda spotted the queen and rushed over for a hug.

“Everyone thought my braids were great,” Tilda informed the Blacklock queen.

Hild laughed and patted the child’s cheek.

“I’m glad, pebble.”

Hild turn to Dori, “Any chance of tea or are we too late?”

Dori took the queen’s arm and led her out to the kitchen, Tilda in tow. Aris sighed and Dwalin gestured with his thumb to a chair and Aris dropped thankfully into it.

“Yeh get some sleep after all tha’ malarky wi’ Mavey?”

“Some. I’ve never been more grateful our Arivett was born with a functioning brain.”

Dwalin laughed. Ori came forward, saying,

“Mavey and Floris are out in the meadow now. They seem to have become sisters. When I last looked Floris was teaching her to juggle.”

“Good,” Aris sighed. “I’m too old to raise any more bloody badgers.”

“Dwalin and I are sticking with kittens,” Ori said with a smile as Dwalin slid an arm about his waist. Aris looked up at them and snickered.

“Yeh look a right love-sick pup, our Dwalin.”

“Aye. Ge’ used t’ it. I ain’t changin’ any time soon.” Dwalin gave Ori a squeeze.

Ahkn and Gheir strolled in, talking.

Gheir saw Aris and raised an eyebrow.

“‘Cording to our Ori, she’s out in th’ meadow learnin’ t’ juggle.”
“I wish her luck,” was all Gheir had to say on the matter.
Ulfr entered with a radiant Dipfa and a scribbling Buj.
“T’m telling’ yeh, lass. Two parts a’ th’ lightest gas an’ two parts purified air mixed with a bit o’ liquid soap and a good dash a’ salt mixed with a three part carbon as a paste. Rub it on an’ anythin’ll pop right out. No damage t’ cloth. Just’ clean ’em an’ press ’em as usual an’ yer all set.”
“That was wonderful, your majesty and so easy,” Dipfa gushed. “I know my beloved Boo has the formula you taught us and will mix as much as I shall ever require. If I have any other questions, may I...?”
“Send me a raven, lass. You, too, laddie,” to Buj. “Yer a clever pair. It’s good t’ chat with other’s who like th’ sort’a work I do.”
Both Dipfa and Buj smiled eagerly at their new hero and Ulfr looked quite well-satisfied to find new acolytes to his chemical genius.

In Thorin and Balin’s office, Ori watched, amazed, as the housekeeping staff removed great swaths of one stone wall and assembled the pieces into a long, rectangular table in the middle of the room. Chairs were carried in and set up, Thorin's chair, at the head of the table, faced the door, with a second, rather non-descript door behind him. This opened onto an antechamber with a variety of boltholes and passages that ultimately led outside the mountain. Dwalin had told him the deepest passages had been built for wholesale escape of the royal family if necessary, but nowadays were mainly used for wine cellars and cheese caves.
In the office, the porters from the royal kitchens set out a keg of beer and platters of cheese, breads and coldcuts on a side table. The fire in the grate was encouraged just enough to make the room cozy, but not enough that several large dwarven bodies would turn it into a forge.
It seemed to Ori that putting at least Gheir and Hild in the same room would be incendiary enough.
Perhaps the meadow would have been a better choice of venue.
Thorin entered and watched the proceedings over Ori's shoulder.
"Just a nice, informal chat with the undermonarchs," said Thorin.
"But you still need a scribe."
"Oh yes. This is the first time in eighty years I've been in the same room alone with all these lunatics at once. If we start calling each other names it should be recorded for posterity. It's also possible someone in this room may come up with something brilliant in the next two hours, and I can actually read your handwriting."
"I think I'm going with the first possibility," said Ori dryly.
"If weapons are actually drawn, Dwalin's going to be standing right behind me at the antechamber door. No heroic measures, just scoot out and let him take care of it. No more jumping between me and danger, right?"
"Yes, Thorin," he said primly.
The two of them snickered.
Fili entered, straightening the cuffs of a formal tunic and looking around, bewildered.
"The horde hasn't arrived yet?" he asked. "I thought at least Chat would be here early for the beer."
A voice bellowed from the outer hall.
"Is that barrel tapped yet?"
"I swear he heard me say 'beer',' said Fili.
Dain, Chopper at his heels, swaggered in with Snur, followed by Ulfr and Ahkn with Arne bringing up the rear.
They could chart Gheir and Hild’s approach by the volume of their still venomous bickering. Ahkn sighed and lowered himself into a chair.
Ulfr took the one beside him and said,
“Do yeh suppose they’ll let us sit at th’ same table with them, an’ bask in their royal glow?”
“Really, it’s getting tiresome,” said Ahkn. If they didn’t have dwarflings, I’d tell them to fight to the death and be done with it."

He looked back down the hall and barked, "You two, I'd appreciate it if you'd either kiss or kill sometime in the next decade. I'd like this to be over by the time I die."

"Fat chance," said Snur.

He turned his own chair at the table backward and sat.

Then Hild and Gheir spent a good three minutes insisting the other proceed them into the room, and finally entered at once.

During this entertainment, Thorin simply sipped his beer and looked quite prepared to wait. Eventually, everyone had food and drink and settled.

"So," said Ahkn said to Thorin, "are you going to tell us what happened to your grandfather?"

"You decided to jump in with both boots," commented Thorin.

"I'm too old to beat around the boulder. We got your reports that he died at the Bearers' presentation, after the Bearer danced."

"He did. I assure you it was a timely death, and not of my own planning."

Ahkn shook his head wearily.

"Bloody Durins. Personally, I thought the account was a little too much like the plot of a Shire novel, but now that I've met Bearer Dori, it doesn't seem so strange."

Hild asked, "I recall Thror as a bahvlo of a dwarf, certainly not one to be overthrown by a dance, no matter how mystical. Had he been weakened by sickness?"

The energy in the room shifted. Ori could have sworn all the undermonarchs leaned toward Thorin to hear his answer.

Thorin said, clearly and directly, "Thror was mad, and at the time of his death I was on the brink of having to depose him."

Snur nodded.

"Just what we thought, then. Ya coulda axed for help, Thorin. We had all pretty much agreed to liberate Erebor if the asshat became king."

"You did?" Thorin asked, startled.

"Well, we don't spend all our time diddlin' ourselves when we ain't here."

"Good to know," said Thorin. "Dain did bring me a nice army, but, happily, I didn't need it."

"Was it the gold-sickness that got him?" Ulfr asked.

"No, the arkenstone."

The undermonarchs gaped and gasped and Snur said, "Well, clean my ears with a pickaxe!"

"Please don't," said Hild dryly.

"Thror found the arkenstone?" Gheir asked. "It exists? You're sure that's what it was?"

Thorin sipped his beer, considering.

"Yes, we're sure. For what it's worth, it was a dragon egg, and Tharkûn assures me it was ready to hatch."

Arne swallowed a cry and everyone else sat in stunned silence until Ulfr found his voice.

"How'd yeh get rid a' the bleedin' thin'?"

"Ori found it and gave it to Roäc, Roäc dumped it in Mount Doom, Mordor exploded. You know, the usual discretion and subtlety of the Durins."

The dwarrow all looked at Ori. He wanted to sink through the floor, but he just gave them a weak smile and shrugged.

Hild looked him over anew.

"You Ri are full of surprises."

"Mostly we surprise ourselves, Queen Hild," Ori said quietly.

He hoped talk would turn to something innocuous, if only to take attention off himself, but this was not the crowd for small talk.

Ulfr said, "Oi, Thorin, I seen at th' coronation yeh had men as well as dwarrow takin' oaths a' loyalty t' yeh. Slipped me mind while I was drunk off me arse, but now I'm recallin'. Yeh holdin' 'em t' tha'?"

"Insofar as we're joined with the Kingdom of Dale, yes," said Thorin. "In the city, men and dwarrow have lived side by side for over a century. Now there are men living under the mountain as well."

"Yer serious about this alliance, then. Have yeh considered what it means fer th' blood o' th' Durins? Are yeh no' worried yeh might be makin' a mistake?"

Ori thought Fili showed remarkable restraint by not leaping across the table for Ulfr's throat. Had it been Kili sitting there, Ulfr would likely be suffering a face full of angry dwarf right now. Instead, Fili kept silent, though he and Arne exchanged looks that might have devolved into eye-rolling anywhere else.

"The men are more fertile than we've ever been," said Thorin.

"Aye, an' they die off like mayflies," said Ulfr. "Yeh might make better men with this mad scheme, Thorin, bu' yeh may just end up with inferior dwarrow."

Hild fixed Ulfr with wicked smile. "Are you saying we'd be better off intermarrying with the elves?"

Ulfr sputtered and Dain snerked into his beer. Hild continued, "At least if we intermarry with the elves we can't possibly get more arrogant than we already are. You seem rather warmer to the idea of interbreeding than you were when last we met, Thorin."

"The last time we met I was only eighty years old," said Thorin with a grin. "I might be forgiven a little youthful arrogance myself."

"I dunno, Thorin," said Ulfr. "I don't care if there's outsiders in Erebor, a' course, or dwarrow in Dale. Yeh can call 'em all yer subjects if yeh want. It's yer perogative. I got a mountain full a' traders an' craftpeople meself, from places in Arda we don't even have on a map. But I don' put 'em on th' same footin' as dwarrow."

"So, if they marry dwarrow, do you put their offspring on a half-footing?" Thorin asked. Ulfr stared at him, then brayed out a laugh.

"I never thought o' that! I'll have t' take that under advisement! Arne, write that down."

"Yes, addad."

"I used to be against all of it," said Snur jovially. "I didn't even want anyone but dwarrow in Ered Luin. I thought dwarrow should keep with dwarrow and that our kingdoms should be isolated, for outsiders' good as well as ours. Let's face it, I'm a Firebeard as well as a Broadbeam and those Firebeards are real stinkers. An' I married one."

Dain chuckled and nodded. "It's true."

Snur continued, "But if we hadn't opened our port to the Borjeval traders we'd have starved a long time ago. The mines o' Ered Luin are played out. Ya can't eat rock. The only thing we got goin' for us is a deep water port. After we figured that out, I suddenly found outsiders a sight more tol'rable."

"But would you want one marrying your daughter?" Ahkn challenged.

"Wrong questions," said Snurr. "We both got daughters, Ahkn. We don't even want 'em marryin' dwarrow, now do we?"

Ahkn chuckled and nodded. "No one will ever be good enough."

Gheir leaned back and crossed his arms.

"I still say the answer is increasing the birthrate among dwarrow."

"Unlike you, Thorin has a point," said Hild. "If we were more fertile we wouldn't be in danger of dying out,"

Gheir made a rude noise.

"It can't just be a matter of fertility. If our dams were properly wed and stayed home with their pebbles, out of danger, they'd have more time to devote to raising families. None of this craftwed business and running around."

"And all your dams are happy this way?" Thorin asked quietly.

"I admit, marrying Mavey was a mistake. She was far too young, but there are plenty of fully grown dwarrow dams who are-"Running to the Orocarnis as refugees as fast as we can take them in," said Hild. "If they were happy, then they wouldn't be on my doorstep and you wouldn't have to hire out for competent crafts-dwarrows."

"That's a lie. Just because you don't see our dams on the street."

"How would you know? When was the last time you left your bedchamber?"

"I leave my bedchamber!"

"Only so you can do it on the kitchen table! I'm offering them good lives, which is better than you do, you over-sexed orc," Hild shot back.

"I'm over-sexed?" Gheir snarled. "I'll be Aris uses that little book to keep your bedmates straight."

"I've never had any complaints, especially not from Stiffbeards," she shot.

"It'll be your fault if we die out," Gheir snarled. "You're bleeding us dry."

Gheir lunged. Hild lunged.

Their armor crashed and clattered as they tossed each other around the meeting room, the air full of their shouted insults.

Snur sighed, but otherwise the dwarf monarchs continued as if two, heavily-armed warriors weren't attempting to slaughter each other not ten feet away.

Ori glanced at Thorin, hoping to convey his concern over the impending mutual regicide.

Thorin gave him a small, encouraging smile.

Ori was not all that encouraged.

When Ahkn and Ulfr joined in the mayhem, apparently because they could, Thorin did start to look a little concerned.

A chair flew across the room.

The chair was made of marble.

Still Thorin waited.

Only when Dain made to get up did Thorin react. He glared at his cousin and said, "Don't. You. Dare."

"Aw, yeh never let me have any fun," Dain grumped. Chopper heaved a great breath of agreement and grunted.

Ori wrote like a mad dwarf until he heard something at the corner of his attention which was not violence.

"Psst! Psst!"

Ori turned to the door from the antechamber behind Thorin's chair. The door was now ajar and Frodo peeped in around it, hissing in an odd manner Ori supposed was a hobbit's way of gaining someone's attention if a polite throat-clearing couldn't be heard over the din.

A harassed looking Targ stood just behind him, shrugging apologetically when Frodo held up what looked suspiciously like a toy horse.

Frodo didn't even give the brawling dwarrow a second glance.

Thorin, who couldn't see Frodo behind him, frowned a silent question to Ori who mouthed 'Frodo' and gestured to the pebble with his chin.

Thorin peered around the back of his chair.

Targ bowed to Thorin and was about to herd Frodo back out when Thorin said very clearly and loudly, "It's all right, Targ, let him come in."

Dain slammed his empty tankard down on the table and bellowed to the battling monarchs.

"Knock it off, yeh ijits. There's a pebble in th' room!"

Instantly everything was quiet and calm. The four dwarrow on the floor sat up. All eyes were on Frodo and the monarchs wore goofy, welcoming smiles. Frodo bowed to them, which made even Hild chuckle, and then he went right to Thorin.

"I'm sorry to interrupt, idad, but you said I should if it was important, and this is really, really important."

Frodo held up a mechanical horse, one leg of which was clearly bent the wrong way at the torso.

"Ah," said Thorin calmly. "How did she sustain this injury?"

"Lord Glorfindel sat on her," said Frodo. "It was an accident. I didn't even tell him because I didn't want him to feel bad."
"Very good of you," said Thorin, taking the horse.  He held it up to Dain.  "What do you think?"
"Lemme see," grunted Dain.  He held the tiny toy in his huge hand and turned it this way and that.
"Good design f'r a badger to play with, nice, clean lines, screws countersunk.  Where did it come from, cuz?"
"You don't recognize it?" Thorin asked, amused.  "You made it for Kili about seventy years ago."
"No wonder it's such a fine piece o' work," said Dain.  "I'm a genius."
He pulled a miniature screwdriver from somewhere behind his ear and opened the body of the horse, which came apart in four equal portions, each of which concerned one of the legs.  Then he carefully unfastened springs which attached the head and tail to the movements of the limbs.
Ori thought it was quite beautifully made, the workings dizzyingly complicated and elegant.
"It's no' so bad, laddie," Dain assured Frodo.  "It's just this pin bent, yeh see, an' some bits of metal bowed out along th' joinin'.  Easy t' fix.  I just need a ratchet pin."
"I've got some," said Gheir, pulling a handful from his belt pouch with one hand while staunching his bloody nose with the other.  "Take a look, they're all different sizes."
Bilbo arrived, slightly out of breath, with Jim in tow.  Both of them looked dumbfounded by what they saw, and even more so when Dain got up to take the offered pins and sat on the floor with the others.
"Ta," said Dain.
Bilbo looked at Thorin.
"What exactly-?"
Thorin put a finger to his own lips and winked at Bilbo.
"Watch," he said quietly.
Dain sorted through until he found a pin to his liking and started bending the metal back by way of experiment.  "That's a sharp flange.  Goin' t' need t' work tha' back in place first."  He showed the offending item to Frodo, who frowned and studied the piece in Dain’s hand.
"Give the pieces to me," said Hild.
They made a circuit, hand to hand until they reached her, Frodo following them.
"I've got a box kit of small gauge hammers and pliers," said Gheir, "but I don't have a jeweler's anvil with me to work the curves on."
"You don't carry it around with you anymore?" Hild asked.
"No, I carried it in my pocket one too many times and smashed myself in the crotch.  Stop laughing!"
"I'm not laughing!  I'll laugh later."  She cast around her.  "Ah, never mind, the table has a bull-noise edge."
To Ori's amazement, the queen did not walk back over to the table, but rose up and scooted over on her knees.  Frodo went with her, entranced by the goings on.  She skillfully worked the dents out of the damaged parts and repaired the fold that had opened into the sharp edge.  She surveyed her handiwork critically, fitting the leg and quarter together several times and making small adjustments.
"This will do," she pronounced, showing it to Frodo.  "Nice, eh, pet?"  She shuffled back.  "But the lacquer along the damaged portions will need to be sanded and painted before it's reassembled."
"I go' it," said Ulfr.
"You carry lacquer in your pocket?" Hild asked.
"It's in bottles, Hild," said Ulfr.  "It's no' sloshin' around loose in there."
Ahkn said, "If you do that now it'll take forever to dry."
"Ah, but there's where yer wrong," said Ulfr.
Ahkn drew back his shoulders, clearly offended.
"Are you saying you perfected it and you didn't even tell me?"
"Ha!  I waited f'r th' guild patent t' come through before I told anyone, especially yeh."
"Some friend you are."
"Aw, stop before I bust out cryin'.  Chat, gimme a drop o' tha' beer."
Snur raised his brow.
"Y' are jokin', mate?"
Dain rolled his eyes.
"Like yeh don't have yer own keg up in yer room," said Dain.
"Oh, all right," said Snur. He grabbed up some bread and cheese, brought over the pitcher and plunked it down in front of Ulfr, then sat with a thump beside the others to watch. He sat Frodo on his knee and fed him the bread and cheese, which Frodo ate willingly.

Ulfr took bottle after tiny bottle from his pockets. Still chewing avidly, Frodo leaned in to watch. It was like a magic trick, as if there was somehow more room in the pockets than was physically possible.
"Nah... nah... Mebbe... with this."
"It's supposed to be brown, cram brain," said Ahkn, "Not green."
"Who's th' chemist here?" Ulfr grumbled. "Color blind mine engineers!"
Ahkn snorted.
“What’s so amusin’?” Ulfr growled.
“Weren’t you the same dwarfling who was sent to scrub the throne room floor as a punishment and accidentally blew up the Great Throne of the Ironfists?”
“There wasn’t any one sittin’ in it! And, in me own defense, water and nitroglycerin are both clear liquids. Here, make yerself useful with th' sandpaper. Course grit first, then-.
"Fine grit second. I know. I know."
In a tiny bowl from yet a different pocket Ulfr mixed powdered colors, then a few drops of beer, then a rusty-colored liquid which Ori could smell the moment the stopper was removed. Frodo made a face but stared eagerly at the tiny bottles.
“What’s that?” Frodo asked.
“It’s paint, me pebble. Now pay attention and I’ll show yeh.”
A paintbrush appeared by slight of hand and the paint was applied with a flourish. It did look green, for about three seconds, before fading to a perfect match with the rest of the paint.
"There, tha’ s better," said Ulfr, offering the pieces back to Dain. Frodo followed the toy to Dain.
"How long before it's dry?" Dain asked.
“It looks like new!” Frodo marveled.
Dain did so.
"Mahal's bloody boots, yer almost as big a genius as me!"
Dain fit the pin, reattached the springs, gave a few experimental prods at the limbs and handed it back to Frodo.
"Here, try it out."
Frodo took it and set the horse down on all fours in the middle of the group, pushed it from the top until its belly touched stone, then released it. The horse suddenly trotted to life, head bobbing and tail swishing with every step as it crossed the floor toward Gheir.
Frodo cheered.
"Thank you, Cousin Dain!"
"Great Yavanna!" Bilbo cried. "Frodo, that's hardly respectful!"
Dain laughed and said, "Cousin’s fine. We're practically family already."
"Oh," said Frodo. "Really?"
He got to his feet, went to Dain and rubbed his tiny nose against Dain's enormous one.
“That's better, then,” said Frodo, giggling. “You're really fuzzy!”
"Fuzzy, am I!" Dain cried.
He seized Frodo by the waist, picked him up and blew burfles into his belly. Frodo shrieked with laughter.
"An' there's fer yeh, wee scamp. Go on with yeh now. We still got borin', grown up stuff t' talk about."
Snur sighed and fell back to lie prone on the floor.
"Do we have to? Can't we just stay like this for a while? This rug is really comfortable."
"That's the tail of my coat," said Ahkn.
"Well, surely you're not goin' anywheres just yet?"
Frodo went to Hild and gave her a thank you and hug. The queen beamed and wrapped him up in an embrace and chuckled.

“Sweet badger,” she murmured and Frodo went to King Ulfr and hugged him, too. “Thank you.” Frodo said. Ulfr laughed and ruffled the faunt’s hair. Frodo gave Ahkn, Gheir, and Snur hugs, too and thanked them. The kings were obviously delighted by the faunt. Ori wondered if it was to Frodo’s size. He was so small compared to badgers his age. Ori glanced up.

Bilbo shook his head.
"Thorin, does this always happen when they're all together?"
"What? They quarrel like badgers?"
The smile on Thorin's face slowly faded into bewilderment.
"What's wrong?" Bilbo asked.
"One...two... three... Oh, Mahal's hairy arse!" Thorin hissed. " With Frodo, I have seven children!"
Thorin looked about wildly.
"Jim!"
"Oops," laughed Jim. "I think I hear my wife calling me. Seeya at dinner!"
Ori wrote furiously.
Dori swept in and looked about.
"Is this mighty meeting finished?" she demanded. “It’s tea time and I don’t fancy having my buns get cold.”
Dori swept out, leaving the monarch gasping.
"They’re going to be really good buns,” Frodo told them. “They’re puff pastry with apples and lots of cinnamon and brown sugar. Dori’s going to put icing on as soon as they come out of the oven, so it’s all melty. I helped make them.”
“I’m going to tea,” announced Thorin and pushed his chair back.
“Race yeh, cuz,” Dain was on his tail, Chopper grunting excitedly. Hild rolled to her feet, leapt over Ulfr and followed. Ulfr shouted and raced after her. Gheir shot forward to land on his face as Ahkn had him by the tunic and Snur was sitting on Ahkn’s coat tails. Gheir swore, got to his feet, and moved forward like an over-weighted plow horse. Fili and Ori followed watching as Gheir sweated and roared while Ahkn and Snur shouted with laughter and occasionally yelled things like 'giddy-up’. They burst into song, calling “Pull for the shore, Ulwe, Pull for the shore, Waaay-haaay, pull for the shore!”
Gheir gained the sitting room, used the jamb to propel himself in, and bawled out “Get these idiots off me and gimme my fuckin’ buns!”
The Mavi rose, Mavis I looked him over, glanced at the other three and turned to her husband.
“Any particular fucking buns, your majesty, or shall we flip a coin?” Gheir looked horrified.
“I would never say such to any of my dearest wives!”
Snur and Ahkn pressed their advantage and pushed past him to find seating and get to the goodies on the offering.
Bombur, Erda and Bifur had arrived and were busy to-ing and fro-ing from the kitchen.
Mavis I took Gheir’s arm and conducted him to the couch where the other three Mavi were seated. They moved and Gheir sat down, sandwiched between two wives on either side. Ori thought he looked like a recalcitrant little badger made to sit with his elders until he could behave. Ori curled up on a far chair observing and scribbling. Aragorn and Arwen were deep in conversation with Thranduil, Bard and Dain. Hild, Aris and Theoden had their heads together with Binni and Dori playing moderators. Ori felt a prick of an idea that the possibility of Eomer and Arivett’s lives were being discussed. Oin, Thorin, and Elrond chuckled as Ulfr told the infamous tale of Ori’s robes.
There were sudden noises of entry in the receiving room and the two wizards rushed in.
“Good afternoon,” said Tharkûn.
"What?" Radagast asked then, "Ah yes, I remember. I’ve come to take my leave of you, King Thorin."

Radagast doffed his cap in respect. The hedgehog on Radagast’s head also nodded civilly.

"Thank you for coming and bringing my… presents," Thorin teased.

"Eh, they weren’t any trouble. Hardly weigh anything at all. Besides I’ve always wanted to assist an elopement. This is the closest I’ve ever got."

"Tea, Master Radagast?" Dori offered.

"Er, I’m going to be ferrying Professor Baggins’ cousins home. I was hoping for something slightly more bracing."

"Is that safe?" Dori asked.

"It’s safer than me trying to do it without the encouragement," said Radagast. "So many ditches, so many opportunities."

"Ah, yes," said Dori. "I’ll get you some ale."

"Much obliged."

Mistress Dazla appeared at the door, looking far more beleaguered than Ori had ever seen.

"Er, Professor Baggins? Your cousins have arrived to take leave. Should I show them i-"

"No!" the room shouted as one.

"Good choice," approved the housekeeper. "Shall I tell them you’ll be with them shortly? Or, better still, you’ll meet them at the front gates?"

"Yes, please and thank you, Mistress Dazla," said Bilbo.

She gave a curtsey and a grin of wry amusement then went out.

Bilbo sighed.

"I suppose there’s nothing for it."

"I’ll go with you," Thorin promised.

Little Frodo squared his shoulders.

"I’ll go, too, Uncle Bilbo."

"Thank you, my boy, that’s very brave of you."

Ori followed them out into the courtyard and down the lift to the viewing balcony, then down the steps to the main gates of Erebor where the rabbit sledge sat waiting. One of the grooms held the head of the lead bunny, though it was obvious the animal was humoring the dwarf.

Lobelia and Otho stood by, ready to take their leave. Their clothing had been cleaned and mended, the couple had been fed and cosseted and given every comfort.

Ori reflected that at least one of them had barked like a dog.

What else could they ask for?

"I never did find my hat," Lobelia announced.

"If we find it, we’ll send it along," said Bilbo.

Privately, Bilbo had told Ori that they would burn it, provided they could pry it out of Thranduil’s grasp, as he seemed to have taken a shine to it.

"Oh, well, that Mistress Dazla had us perfectly adequate one sent to our rooms," said Lobelia, adjusting what Ori immediately recognized as the one from Fili’s bathing costume. The tiny fruit danced merrily in the breeze. "It will keep me from freckling up until we get home."

Otho looked at the bunnies, who looked back and were less than impressed with him.

"It does seem a little late in the day to be starting out, my dear," said the hobbit nervously.

"It’s a perfectly good time to be starting out," said Lobelia. "We’ll be home after dark, and no one will see us pull up to the smial in this… conveyance. Mind, if we were in a proper cart or walking I would insist on slowing down in front of number 26. I want her to see my hat."

"Of course, my dear," said Otho, though he looked as though he’d much rather walk.

"Cousin," said Lobelia, blowing Bilbo a kiss.

"Cousin," said Bilbo, not returning it.

Otho helped Lobelia aboard, then jumped in himself and promptly sneezed. Radagast came scurrying through the gates, gulping down the last of his ale. A call of farewell went up from the viewing platform, where the royal household and guests had gathered to watch them depart.
Radagast threw over his shoulder to Tharkûn, "Wonderful time, thanks for the invite!", thrust the empty tankard at Ori, jumped up to take the reins and with a 'giddyap' the sledge bounded away. They heard Otho sneezing continuously and Lobelia scolding Radagast not to speed so. Suppose the sledge should be upset?

They passed the first large wagon of the incoming caravan like traders traveling together, swerved dangerously around it, and got nothing from the driver but a polite raising of his hat.

The party on the balcony came down to watch the caravan arrive

“I swear, if they’re bringing Frerin back,” Thorin muttered, “his head’s going up on the courtyard pike.”

Dwalin, Dain, and Snur took the hoods off their axes and offered then in perfect tandem.

Balin considered.

“I suppose, since Hild thinks so highly o’ her, yeh could put tha’ girl o’ her’s in as governor o’ Belegost. She’d whip em int’ shape.”

“She’d just whip them,” said Thorin.

Bilbo frowned, watching the lead wagon as it lumbered toward them, weighed down under any number of large items, all under tarps. There was at least one person up front with the driver.

“Bilbo?” Ori asked. “Are you alright?”

“I just had a feeling I’d seen this before.”

“The wagons?”

“This particular wag-“

Bilbo’s jaw dropped open and he shook his head. Thorin put a hand on his shoulder.

“Bilbo?”

“Thorin, what do we have for leftovers?”

“Breakfasts, lunch, or tea?”

“All. Those are hobbits. In fact, that’s-”

“Sam!” Frodo shrieked.

“Sam?” Ori asked.

“Wee Sam Gamgee,” said Bilbo. “Not driving, of course. Not yet, anyway. That would be Hamfast Gamgee. And his entire family!”

Thorin turned to Ori.

“They really liked your card.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Haha, we’re early this week as Stevie has company over the weekend and Dolly has to help bake!! The Gamgees have arrived. The big questions are why are they here and what did they bring? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori said, “But, the whole family? Did they get an invitation, too?”

“Not unless Roäc has learned to write,” said Thorin, “which I wouldn’t put past him.”

As they watched, outriders pulled up alongside the front wagon, wearing familiar armor with blue surcoats.

Dwalin said, “Those’re th’ soldiers who escorted Frerin’s lot. Wha’re they doin’ wi’ all this stuff?”

Tharkûn said, “Frerin decided they weren’t loyal enough, so he hired his own army and sent these back.”

“By way of the Shire?” Bilbo asked.

“I requested a bit of a favor, my friend. I’m sure you won’t mind.”

“Would you care if I did mind?”

“Not particularly.”

Dori sent ravens to warn Mistress Dazla that more guests had arrived, then bustled back inside with Binni to supervise the construction of a mighty brunch.

“Hullo, Mister Bilbo!” called the hobbit driving the front wagon, waving his hat.

“Hamfast Gamgee! Hello! What, in Yavanna’s name, are you doing here?” Bilbo called.

The wagon pulled up, even more massive than it had seemed in the distance, creaking to a halt.

Ulfr looked past Thorin.

“Remember when I said I wasn’t worried about bein’ overrun by hobbits?”

“It’s fine,” said Thorin, “I’m sure they brought cake.”

“Oh, Mister Bilbo, I’ve brought yer favorite cake!” cried the lady beside Hamfast. “Carrot!”

Thorin and Ulfr looked at each other and exchanged satisfied nods.

“Thank you, Bell,” said Bilbo, visibly overwhelmed.

It occurred to Ori that Bilbo had never expected to see these people again.

The moment Hamfast set foot on the ground, Bilbo seized him and they slapped backs and pretended they weren’t both tearing up.

Dwalin stepped away to speak to a guard at the gate, who hurried off, and all the soldiers arrived and dismounted.

“Lieutenant Arb,” Thorin stated loud enough for his voice to carry to the other soldiers, now lined up for inspection behind Lieutenant Arb. “You and your fellow soldiers have done excellent work. I thank you for the service you have done for Erebor. You are all dismissed to your homes and families. Rest, eat, and you are to report back in three days time.”

There was a cheer. Lieutenant Arb gave the order to march and the ranks filed in, past their king, who greeted each of them. As they went in, another detail came out and, with an order from Dwalin, took charge of the wagons.

Hamfast was telling him in great detail about the carrot crops. In quick order, Bilbo introduced Hamfast, his wife Bell, the two older Misses Gamgee, Lavender and Snowdrop, the two oldest Masters Gamgee, Hamson, and Halfred, two tween girls, Daisy and May, and babe in arms named Marigold and finally Samwise. Wee Sam, who Ori thought looked like a small boulder with curls, was very involved with checking Frodo over and demanding a full account of his health.

"Hamfast," Bilbo managed to get away from family names and carrots, "it's not that I'm not overjoyed to see you, all of you, and looking so well, but what are you doing here?"

"Waahll, Mister Bilbo, it's like this. That night you and wee Frodo disappeared, Bell, she woke up an' saw you two leavin'."

"So much for my stealth," said Bilbo.

"Bein' a mother, she can hear a faunt steal a biscuit from six smials away. She woke me, and me and Hamson, an' our lot saddled up and rode like mad things over t' the Great Smials. Halfred and Lavender went t' Brandy Hall. Me an' Hamson roused the Tooks and told 'em what was up. Well, Old Gerontius Took and Gorbadoc Brandybuck were at the mayor o' Hobbiton’s house at the bang a' dawn.

"Told that mayor, you was off on a walking holiday, as folk were bein' so rude, an' Bag-End was under their care 'til you came back. Them Sackville-Baggins weren’t best pleased, I tell you. So, the house was locked up. Them Tooks and Brandybucks'v been bickerin' over it with them Sackville-Baggins ever since. Well, until she got an invite a' some sort and flounced off.

"Mister Gandalf showed up with all them dwarf soldiers. They told us you’d moved here to git married - and I do give you the felicitations of me and me family, Mister Bilbo, time you was married at any rate, so my Bell says.

"Well, them soldiers were very nice, very nice indeed, very obligin’. And since it seems the Gamgees aren't welcome in the Shire no more - being o' service to you and yours all this time, we thought we'd see if we could be o' service to you here. If his majesty don't mind us hangin' about?"

Thorin looked startled for all of three seconds before saying, "On the contrary, Master Gamgee, you and your family are very welcome to Erebor."

"Thank'ee kindly, your majesty," said Hamfast, tugging his forelock.

"But, Hamfast, what will you do?" Bilbo asked.

"I've brought me plow an' livestock an' such, Mister Bilbo. I imagine I'll just carry on here as I did in Hobbiton."

"I don't actually have a garden, Ham," said Bilbo gently.

"It seems to me you might have if you want it, sir. There's lots o' field that could be under cultivation around the mountain. Though, you'll pardon my sayin' so, th' couple I do see, well, I can practically smell the soil needs amendin'."

"That's not my soil, Ham," Bilbo explained. "It's not even Thorin's soil. That belongs to the people of Dale, which is the city down there."

"What? With all them roads and such? They might as well be livin' in the middle o' Bree." Bard cleared his throat.

"Excuse me, Master… Gamgee?"

"Aye, that's me," said Hamfast, turning to Bard.

"I'm Bard, the king of… all them roads and such."

"Oh! Not to cast 'spersions on your arrangements, your majesty, but how long've your folk been farmin'?"

"No offense taken, I'm just trying to get this straight. We need to do what to the soil?"

"That answer's that question," said Hamfast. "Yavanna bless you."

Bard was engaged with Bilbo and Hamfast. Thorin had gone to the first wagon, where he and Arb were in conversation with Bell Gamgee. She was certainly having her say, but Ori could not hear what she was telling the two dwarrow. Thorin’s and Arb’s expressions were becoming increasingly sly.

"Send it all up to the royal cavern, Arb," said Thorn, grinning. "You know the way."

"Aye, yer majesty!"

"Few of us are actually farmers," Bard went on. "Most of us make our living from the lake or the river, or via trade that comes along the road to Erebor. Many of us farm to supplement what we can’t buy. Food is expensive."

Meanwhile, Ori noticed that Dain, Ahkn, and some particularly bold dwarrow were peeking under a tarp on one wagon.

"Wha’d’yeh think?" one asked.
"How does it go? Steam?" another conjectured.
Bell looked down from her seat in the wagon and said, “The plow? Cows pull it, o’ course."
"We kin certainly improve on tha’, lass,” said Dain and Ahkn nodded.

Ori followed Bilbo and Thorin as they exited the lift out to the courtyard. Thorin, with an arm about Bilbo, waited by the open front gate of Fundin House. Ori saw Mistress Dazla making sure the receiving room doors were thrown wide. All the royal guests were milling around, intrigued by the goings on. Eight of the over-filled wagons rolled into the royal cavern and drew up before the house. Gib and Mokrah came out and helped Hamson, and Halfred led Hamfast’s livestock out through the stable to the meadow.

Lieutenant Arb, who Dwalin introduced to a bewildered Bilbo, shouted to his men and the wagons were uncovered. The first wagon had a rather large green object at the front.

“You brought my front door!” Bilbo cried in disbelief.

The other wagons contained piles of furniture and household goods. Frodo squealed from atop the Gamgee wagon, which he had ridden up to the cavern. Wee Sam had his arm about Frodo and, jumping down, insisted on helping his ‘Mister Frodo’.

Bilbo went from wagon to wagon, staring at his entire household piled high but securely wrapped and held.

“You brought all this? How?” Bilbo asked Arb, his voice full of wonder.

“All th’ ravens were chattin’ ‘bout th’ king findin’ his One an’ that wizard told us yeh’d left yer thin’s an’ could we brin’ ‘em along. Them Gamgees were real helpful.”

“You brought my window boxes…?” Bilbo’s speech wavered. “Aye, an’ yer plants, yer mailbox, yer gate an’ the floorboards and the winder glass. We can go back f’r the tree if yeh’d like.”

“No, no, no,” Bilbo cried. “This is already as much kindness as I can take without weeping. Thank you! Thank you, so very much!”

And he flung his arms around the startled lieutenant, who patted his back nervously, glancing sideways at his very amused king and captain.

Frodo assured Arb, “He’s like that.”

“It was our pleasure, Pr’fessor Baggins,” growled Arb, bracingly. “We particularly enjoyed widenin’ the front doorway t’ get yer cookstove out.”

“You took the stove?”

“Aye, it’s around here somewheres. Nah, no’ tha’ one, tha’s where we put th’ bathtubs.”

“Bathtubs?” Bilbo was beyond dazed.

“Aye, an’ all tha’ nice copper pipin’.”

“The plumbing…”

“The wainscotin’ an’ th’ mouldin’.”

“Did you leave the hole in the ground?” Bilbo asked.

“Oh aye, an’ we did leave ‘em some firewood, as we don’t use it here. That lovely Missus Gamgee took all th’ food from the larders that could travel. We left th’ rest. That nice gentlehobbit Gerontius Took—“ “That’s my grandfather,” said Bilbo weakly.

“Aye? Splendid feller. Told us we’d done a grand job an’ he was goin’ by th’ mayor’s office t’ tell ‘im tha’ th’ place was all ready for some bitch’r other t’ move in. Oh, an’ them pictures a’ yer parents, Missus Gamgee said they were yer parents, ’re packed on me pony. Fine lookin’ pair. Yer amad looks like she got dwarf blood in her.”

“Belladonna Took,” Kili informed them. “You know, the great adventurer!”
“Oh, she was a rare one!” a soldier commented in passing.

“So, there’s nothing left but rotten food and a pile of firewood?” Bilbo stared at Arb. The dwarf grinned. Bilbo turned and looked at Hamfast and Bell, who were trying in vain not to laugh.

Ori reflected that Lobelia was in for a very rude homecoming, but at least she’d be warm.

Arb cleared his throat and blushed a little. “Me soldiers did relieve yeh a’ th’ candy yeh had about th’ place.”

“I certainly hope they did and you got some, too,” Bilbo stated.

Arb winked.

“Oh, aye I got me share, Pr’fessor Baggins.” Arb suddenly frowned and dug in his pockets.

“That reminds me. That Tharkûn went off while we was packin’ up, and when he come back he handed me these, told me t’ hang on t’ em an’ t’ make sure there’s always twenty-four of ‘em.”

The soldier withdrew a leather bag and from this extracted a cloth packet, which he handed to Bilbo. The hobbit took it with a confused frown and unwrapped the cloth. Bilbo burst out laughing.

“My silver teaspoons! Gandalf! Did you pillage the Sackville-Baggins house?”

“Just long enough to retrieve your property, dear fellow. I did have to ‘repair’ them, of course. Master Otho did, as the faunts say, quite a number on them.”

Mistress Dazla started giving orders and Dori hustled Bilbo inside to oversee the moving of his household into his new quarters.

Loli and Omi came out of the house, trailed by Buj and Dipfa. At Dori’s request, they immediately became welcoming hosts and escorted the Gamgees to rooms in Fundin house and helped a couple of servants with the Gamgees’ overnight bags. Ori overhead the promises of baths and naps, and, when they wanted, refreshments in the parlor. Bell sent her family on their way and, with Marigold on her hip, marched in after Mistress Dazla.

Ori idly sketched the piles and the army of servants and the guests carrying things in. A metallic clank made him look up at the courtyard gates. Aris, Dwalin, Aragorn, and Dain were up to something as Hild, Arwen, and Mavis I egged them on. Ori went over as the group stood back to admire. Ori giggled. They had attached Bilbo’s mailbox to the pillar of the gate.

Thorin and Balin were discussing the contents piled in one wagon. To Ori, it looked like a huge heap of very nicely turned and polished wood. The first chair of the carpentry guild roared in on a goat at the gallop, followed by a couple of dozen workers. They left their goats to wander and were all soon peering in and examining the wood. Thorin went in then came back out with Bilbo.

Ori watched happily as Thorin, smiling down on the hobbit, discussed the wood. Bilbo was all but crying with happiness. Thorin gave orders to the guild and they each took an armful and marched in. Curious, Ori followed. Around the doorway to Bilbo and Thorin’s new quarters was a hive of activity. The wainscoting from the Shire was being installed in the passage. Ori admired how well it looked there.

Ori wormed his way along, careful of the carpenters working like a swarm of bees. Gheir and Balin were looking things over with the carpentry guild’s first chair. Ori rather thought this project would be finished before nightfall. The ogee door neatly covered Bilbo’s round green front door, with its shiny brass handle exactly in the middle.

“That way,” said Kili, “you can open the ogee doors, but if you’re visiting you still have to knock on the round door.”

Ori went through to find Dori, Elrohir, and Thranduil organizing the setting up of Bilbo’s furniture in the sitting room. Fili and Sigrid sat on a couch, cooing over little Marigold as Lindir supervised. Zendi was talking to the betrothed pair.

He followed Bilbo into the kitchen where Bell Gamgee, Dori, Sculdis and Bomber were all hard at work. Up close, Ori saw Snur on his back under Bilbo’s cook stove, rearranging and installing things, while Sculdis worked on the pipes from the forge coming out of the wall. Mavis II, Margr, and Ruelis were unpacking dishes and cookware and putting them away. Jim, Fior and Boromir rolled in with the ale and wine casks from Bilbo’s old cellar, making the hobbit laugh.

Ori continued through the house, watching everyone help Bilbo settle in. The library was also full of people. Elrond and Celeborn were placing Bilbo’s books carefully on the shelves as Larit, Vi, and Glorfindel organized the furniture.

Celeborn said, “Really, Elrond, you can’t put the erotica next to the books on second age mill technology.”

“They are all about grinding,” said Elrond slyly.

“You’ve been spending too much time with Glorfindel,” said Celeborn.

“There’s no such thing,” said Glorfindel.

The turquoise and pink room was now the dining room. Binni, Gridr, Elledan, and Mavis IV were unpacking fine china dishware and crystal glasses and putting them into the side boards as they were bought in by teams of soldiers and servants.

The office had gained Thorin’s old desk and chair from Fundin house and what Ori supposed to be all Bilbo’s paperwork and such.

The maroon room had become a cozy parlor under the auspices of Gloin, Erda, and Ulfr. Bilbo’s furniture clashed with the walls, but seemed to be winning the fight. Ori went through to Frodo’s room. Frodo and Wee Sam watched and squealed from their place on Frodo’s bed in a pool of faunt and badger toys as Kili, Tauriel, Gimli, Stonehelm, Bain, and Theodred set up furniture and hung pictures.

Ori was amused to see that, although they were mixed together on the wall, he could easily tell which had come from the Shire and which ones were from the princes’ badgerhoods. There was a beautiful, bright green chest of drawers that, instead of plain drawer pulls, had different animal heads gaily painted and quite life-like. In the main bedroom, Ori found Thorin and Mistress Dazla supervising the placement of the furnishings while Miss Oqizla, Galadriel, and Agirb unpacked and put away clothing. Tharkûn and Aewandînen argued loudly over the arrangements in the master bathroom. Aewandînen only had a quarter of the population of Dale left to treat and had stopped in for a snack. According to Agirb, the people in Dale were already referring to him as Mister Wandi, to which the elf prince rejoiced.

Ori trotted over to see what a bathroom could possible give Aewandînen and Tharkûn anything to argue about.

“Blue is restful,” Tharkûn insisted. “The water should be blue.”

“Green is traditional for hobbits,” said Aewandînen. Tharkûn stood at his full height glaring at the Prince of Erys Lasgalen.

“With all due respect, your highness, you wouldn’t know hobbit tradition from a coal scuttle.”

“What’s a coal scuttle?”

“Exactly! And witness your choice of scented candles.”

“What’s wrong with my choice of scent?”

“The candles need to give the feeling of comfort. The scent needs to be floral, like lily-of-the-valley or rose.”

Aewandînen frowned, shaking his head.

“This is Erebor and this is a new life for Bilbo. I’m thinking with the marble, glass and the colors, the candle scents need to be an even mix of broom flower, that sandalwood those Mavi brought, and a touch of cinnamon. There should probably be an anchor scent of bergamot.”

“Aewandînen snorted and tossed his hair exactly like his father.

“This is a big bathroom, honey. They’ll be wagging more than washcloths!”

“Young you have a p- Honey?!” Tharkûn looked aghast

“Rather more respectful than ‘toots’,” Aewandînen cooed.

Ori decided to take himself away just then. He didn’t want to be here to see how this would turn out, though, at least the room was washable.

He went back to Fundin House proper in search of his friends, and found them making sandwiches in the kitchen and setting up for tea in the breakfast parlor.

Ori went out to the patio to organize his notes and finish some drawings. It had already been a far more eventful day than he could have imagined. At this time yesterday, Thorin was just being crowned.

He heard a muffled call, then the doors to the stable opened and Fanny ducked through into the meadow.

“Fanny!” he cried.

She trumpeted her greeting and Ori ran and hugged her. He pulled his chair to the edge of the patio and she lay down in the grass next to him and they had a companionable chat. Ori read her his notes, which she approved, then he set about sketching her in more detail than before. She posed for him quite patiently.

Eventually, Ori heard the chatter of small voices from the breakfast parlor and realized Frodo and Wee Sam had come through, which heralded the arrival of the rest of the Gamgees. Wee Sam glanced out at the meadow, his mouth falling open.

“Mister Frodo! Mister Frodo! Look! We didn’t bring that!”

“That’s Fanny. She’s an oliphaunt.”

Frodo said this so casually, as if he had seen an oliphaunt a day his entire life, but Sam was quite agog.

“Mam! Mam! It’s an oliphaunt!”

“Now, Sam, what have I told you about fib- Oh, that’s an oliphaunt.” Bell’s tone was neutral but her eyes widened quite a bit.

Wee Sam crept out the door and approached Ori, never looking away from Fanny.

“Mister Ori, sir? Can we pet the oliphaunt?”

“Please,” Bell prompted.

“Please?” Sam repeated, looking longingly at Fanny.

“I’ll ask her,” said Ori. He turned to Fanny. “What do you think? Would you like to have the Gamgees pet you?”

Ori could swear she shrugged.

“She says it’s all right,” Ori translated. “Just don’t pull her ears or anything.”

Despite his not being anywhere near the eldest, Sam gamely tip-toed forward and patted Fanny’s trunk, then giggled and darted back behind Frodo.

The rest of the Gamgee faunts tried to head out to play with Fanny, but their mother called them to order, and they sat down to table for tea.

Three platters of sandwiches and two entire sugared hams, a chocolate cake, the carrot cake, buttered toast, marmalade, blackberry preserves and six kegs of ale later, Bell approved of all the children seeing Fanny again. Fanny stayed lying down until Ori had boosted all seven with Frodo at the front at Fanny’s head. She rose slowly and carefully to her feet and calmly walked the length of the meadow and back. Her burdens squealing with delight.

“And they all petted her,” Frodo reported to Bilbo, “but Sam did it first, because he’s the bravest.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yes here’s another round of chewing, confusions and confustications. The visiting dwarrow are confused, Jim’s out to bemuse, and Ori is amused. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori went to his room to dress for dinner. Agrib had already been through, and his and Dwalin’s clothes were laid out and their bead boxes stood at the ready. Ori plumped down at the end of the bed and sat blankly for a few moments. He felt as though he had been running at high speed for the last few days. Mask clambered into his lap for attention. Ori idly stroked the kitten. He flopped back onto the bed.

Masked jumped away and swatted at Ori’s hair beads.

Ori wished everyone would go away, so it could just be himself and his family. Of course, his family was the Durins, which meant the Groinuls and the Urs as well now. He sighed. He would never want to be away from them. He loved them all so much. He wanted…

Dwalin opened the door and came in.

“Alrigh’, love?”

Ori sat up, ready to demure but held out his arms to his husband. Dwalin was at his side in a moment, gathering him close. Ori knew this was everything he wanted right now and sighed into his husband’s beard.

“I’m fine. I just… I miss you,”

“Mahal, love, an’ I miss yeh, too. Too many bloody guests in th’ place f’r too bleedin’ long. I told Thorin I was ready t’ chuck th’ lot a’ ‘em out.”

Ori giggled.

“Did you? What did he say?”

“He offered t’ help an’ Bilbo gave him a scold.”

They looked at each other then laughed. Dwalin gave a particular whistle and Garnet floated in.

“I suppose you want me to tell you when you have to get yourselves together?”

“Aye, me fav’rite.”

Garnet reached forward and plucked at Dwalin’s beard.

“Good thing I like you. Take care of your pretty mate. I’ll be back.”

Garnet floated out the window and Dwalin smiled.

“Well, love?”

Ori pulled Dwalin back to lie on the bed with him. They lay looking at each other for a while, then Ori pushed Dwalin over onto his back and kissed him. He felt Dwalin’s body relax completely beneath him.

“I love you,” Ori whispered and nuzzled Dwalin’s neck.

“Me ghivashel,” was the rumbling response.

“I wish we could just steal some leftovers from the kitchen and stay here tonight. I know, it’s not a thought worthy of the king’s scribe.”

“Th’ king’s personal guard was thinkin’ th’ same thin’, so we’ll be in disgrace t’gether.”

Ori rubbed his face in Dwalin chest fur and sighed, then froze.
“Wait.”
“Am I hurtin’ yeh, love?”
“No, Mask is standing on my arse. Get off there, you! Ow! Bad kitty! No claws!”
Dwalin snerked and carefully removed the protesting cat, who was desperate to remain anchored.
“He’s gettin’ big,” Dwalin observed. “If I put ’im down on th’ floor, he’ll just climb back up.”
“Then we’d best be wriggling around when he does, so he doesn’t have such an easy place to settle.”
“Yeh’ve become quite th’ strategist.”
“These are desperate times.”
Dwalin detached Mask’s teeth from his thumb and gently put him on the floor. When the warrior looked up again he was decidedly pink in the face.
“Glad t’ know I’m no’ th’ only one who’s desperate,” he muttered.
“Should we? We only have an hour before dinner.”
“A lot kin happen in an hour.” Dwalin’s eyes twinkled wickedly as he reached for Ori.
There was something about Dwalin’s hands sliding down Ori’s back and then up under his tunic and down his trousers. It was always so slow and deliberate and there was no mistaking what his husband was doing. Dwalin grasped his butt cheeks and boosted him up so they were eye to eye, Ori giggling as they lay their foreheads together.
Ori kissed Dwalin on the nose, and then they slotted their mouths together.
As often as Ori had fantasized about doing this with Dwalin - With anyone! - before he was married, the reality was so much finer, and the erection far more intense. He felt how much he had missed this, and in only a few days.
He let his legs drop to Dwalin’s sides, his knees resting on the mattress, giving him leverage to rub against Dwalin’s belly.
“Please, hold me tighter,” he whispered.
The heat from Dwalin’s palms and fingers lent a lovely edge. As the long fingers curled into his arse crack, Ori jolted with the intense sensation.
“Mmmm, do that again.”
Dwalin readily obliged.
Ori buried his face in the crook of Dwalin’s neck as Dwalin rubbed gently against his opening.
“Alrigh’, love?” Dwalin murmured.
“Uh-huh.”
“I won’ go further than tha’ righ’ now.”
“Just don’t s-stop.”
“Ooo, yer likin’ this. I kin feel yer prick like an iron poker against me belly.”
Ori groaned, rubbing his face, his mouth against Dwalin’s neck. Dwalin’s lips were right at Ori’s ear, the breath hot and moist.
“If yeh like this, wait ’til I get some oil on tha’.”
“Mmmmm.” Ori skipped a breath.
He ground against his husband, desperate for more.
Ori could only imagine he looked like a mad dwarf, contorted with pleasure. He didn’t care.
Dwalin thought he was beautiful.
“I wan’ t’ cum all over yeh, then lick yeh clean.”
Ori buried his cries in Dwalin’s beard, pushing his face harder as the cries rose, as he came, fully clothed and sobbed because he wanted these spasms to go on forever.
“D-dwalin?”
“Aye, love?”
“Rub yourself off on me.”
“I want yeh under me, on yer belly.”
“Oh, that sounds wonderful.”
Even as the words left his mouth, he thought they sounded silly, but he was feeling rather dazed and silly. As Dwalin shifted him over onto the bed, onto his stomach, he hooked his thumbs into the waist band of his own trousers and pulled them down, offering his bare bottom to his husband.

“Oh, Mahal,” Dwalin breathed.
Ori shook his behind and giggled.
“Yer a nut,” said Dwalin, laughing.
“You love it,” Ori snickered.

Then Dwalin was on top of him, his very hard and very naked prick slotted and rutting in Ori’s crack.

Ori breathed in sharply, then sharper still as Dwalin craned down to suck hard on his neck. The bed rattled under them. Ori had a brief, horrible thought about Nori walking in through the fireplace and vomiting on the rug, but Dwalin’s first moan swept everything away, everything but his very large, very turned on husband, pushing on his arse.

His brain went everywhere at once, from the ecstasy of his nerves, his muscles stretched taut, to Dwalin’s increasingly loud and incoherent cries, to the poor slob who would have to wash these sheets.

He told his brain not to think about housekeeping at a time like this. This was-
This was his husband coming hot and hard all over him.
This was Ori coming a second time with a yip like a startled pup, then the pair of them lying still, gulping for air, Dwalin a lovely blanket of muscle and fur all over him.

Ori felt Dwalin’s mouth on his shoulders, a long line of kisses from one side to the other.

“Mahal, I just want more an’ more o’yeh,” said Dwalin. After a moment, the warrior pulled away, getting up from the bed.

“Where are you going?” Ori asked.

“Get some water an’ a cloth t’ wash yeh down. Not enough time t’ take a whole bath. I like yeh this way, but I’m not sure Dori’d approve of such obvious debauchery at his table. No’ in fron’ o’ th’ ‘quality’, anyway.”

Ori laughed, then hissed as the cloth touched his back.

“Sorry, love, it’s a little cold.”

“S’alright.”

Ori stretched languidly as Dwalin worked, then rolled over and onto his elbow to watch Dwalin tend to himself.

“I want to say horrid things about our guests,” said Ori
Dwalin burst out laughing.

“Oh, aye. Go on then. Get it ou’ a’ yer system.”

“Gheir’s an ass.”

“Certainly is.”

Ori grinned at Dwalin’s agreement and was encouraged.

“Ulfr need Oin to perform an emergency surgical removal of the big stick in his ass.” Dwalin choked at that.

“Hild need to calm the fuck down.” Ori decided. “Whether she likes it or not, she is not, and cannot be, the next Queen Kivi. Kivi was and is one of a kind.”

Dwalin frowned and thought this over for a moment.

“Yeh know, love, I ne’er though’ a’ it like tha’. Wonder if she really does fancy hersel’ as Kivi?”

Ori considered a moment. He shook his head.

“No, if she was Kivi she would have charmed Gheir to bed, broken his spine, neck and mind with illustration 20, and she’d have done it years ago along with taking over his kingdom and his wives.”

“Good point,” Dwalin agreed in all seriousness. He rang out the cloth, swabbed himself down with a towel and climbed back into bed, pulling Ori against his chest. “Go’ an idea, if yer up for it.”

“What did you have in mind?”

“Yeh’ve ne’er bin t’ th’ nigh’ market, have yeh?”

Ori nearly jumped with glee.

“The night market? Really? May we go?”
Dwalin chuckled.
"Yeh kin go anytime yeh want, love, remember?"
"But it’s different if you come with me. It’ll be like walking out together!"
"Tha’ makes us sound li’ naughty tweens, sneakin’ ou’ after hours."
"That might be fun, actually," said Ori with a grin.
"Too bad we live on th’ ground floor,” said Dwalin. “No’ much call fer throwin’ pebbles at th’ bedroom winder, ‘r haulin’ escape ladders about."
"This will be like going out courting together for the first time."
"It will, won’ it. I always though’ it’d be nice t’ go walkin’ out wi’ yeh. Didn’t realize we’d have t’ be married firs’."
"Does it really matter in what order we do it? Dipfa would encourage us to be trend setters!"
"Dipfa’d encourage us t’ wear lantern shades on ‘r heads."
"As long as they threw us into sufficient relief. But, Dwalin, I just thought of something else.
Can we both get the time off to go out at once? What if Thorin needs one of us?"
"I have i’ on good authority tha’ Thorin intends t’ take Bilbo ou’ there as soon as possible. Dori an’ Balin’ve promised t’ badger-sit."
"Won’t Thorin need you to guard him?"
"Arb’s already volunteered. Says he feels it’s th’ least he kin do f’r Belladonna Took’s son. I think he’s go’ a wee crush on hobbits in general. Him an’ tha’ Boromir."
"So, when will we go?" Ori asked, thinking he sounded rather like Frodo, excited squeak and all.
Dwalin laughed.
"When most’ve the guests’ve left. Gheir an’ th’ Mavi, an’ Jim an’ Ruelis’ lot leave t’morrah. Ulfr an’ Ahkn’ll probably be gone th’ day after, though, Thorin tells me our Arne’ll stay on for a while."
"Really? How did Ulfr agree to that?"
"Ulfr’s wife agreed t’it. Apparently, our Dori sent a raven."
"The sneak!"
"Aye, all boiled down t’ doin’ special projects in th’ library fer Brur, an’ bein’ o’ service t’ his king an’ th’ crown prince."
"Cow shit, in other words."
"Oh, I dunno as I’d say it’s all cow shit. Th’ way Arne’s droolin’ over th’ library, he’ll need t’ go abou’ with a bib."
"So, that will leave Chat and Hild and the men."
Dwalin chuckled.
"Yer no’ plotting’ t’ put ‘em all in a mine cart an’ drive ‘em off a cliff?"
"No! Not subtle enough!” said Ori. “Joking! Just joking! Anyway, we’re not likely to see much of Hild. She’ll be out shopping and have sex."
"An workin’ out trade with our Dis."
"So,” said Ori, businesslike once more. “We’ll go to the night market on the next first rest day?”
"I believe it’s possible,” Dwalin teased.
"Can you rearrange an entire army by then?"
"It’s no’ like I need t’ pick each one up an’ move ‘em abou’. Even a’ attention, they’re far too wiggly."

Hand in hand, Dwalin and Ori wandered through to the receiving room. Several people were already there. Ori looked over at the far fireplace and saw that the Bardlings, the Durin princes, Arne, Gimli and Legolas were already there.
"G’wan," Dwalin murmured. "Yeh need t’ catch up on th’ goin’ s’ on."
Ori grinned, they kissed, Dwalin gave his butt a pat, and Ori went off to the younger set.
"There you are, Ori!” Sigrid said eagerly. “Guess what?’"
Ori sat down beside her.
“Tell me.”
“It’s the best!” Kili added.

“Shut up, Kili,” Sigrid continued. “Note that neither Floris nor Mavey are here.”

“So where are they?” Ori asked, he had a sneaking suspicion they might be involved in some evening entertainment he had overhear Dori and Binni talking about in the kitchen. “Jim and Ruelis said they had a special performance for us. I bet it’s something to do with that comedy they told us about. And Mavey and Floris said earlier they had lines to learn!”

Ori grinned, remembering,

“If it’s the one Jim told us about I wonder who he’s got to play the pigs?”

There was a snort and Ori glanced up. Gimli, Kili, Legolas and Bain were all trying hard and failing to not laugh. Tilda had both hands clamped over her mouth.

“You sneaks!” raged Sigrid.

Tauriel came over and folded herself into Kili’s lap.

“Did you know Kili was being a pig?” demanded Sigrid.

Tauriel looked at her swain and tried not to smile. “I’m not always a pig!” Kili laughed and kissed her collar bone.

“Yes, I know,” Tauriel admitted, “Theodred and Stonehelm are going to be in it, too.”

“Those elf ears of yours are going to end us all,” groaned Fili then he cocked an eye at Tauriel.

“Who else?”

“What else do your elf ears hear?” Sigrid teased.

Tauriel pulled a face. “I didn’t hear that part. I only know there’re going to be thirteen princes who die in the briars and thirteen pigs.”

“That’s right!” Tilda cried and was promptly shushed by Legolas and Bain.

“I’ve written a few lines for various players and edited others,” Arne put in. “I know my limits and would pass out if I had to be onstage.”

Kili nodded.

“We don’t have too many lines, so that’s good. I told Jim I wasn’t very good at acting but he just laughed and told me to go as over the top as I liked. I haven’t even seen the costumes yet. Did any of you?”

Bain, Legolas, and Gimli shook their heads.

“No,” Bain said. “We were just told to throw ourselves into the parts.” Bain grinned evilly.

“Legolas has to practice oinking really loud.”

“I’m not accustomed to oinking,” Legolas replied, thoughtfully.

Ori turned as he saw Theodred and Stonehelm coming toward them from the stairs.

“Perhaps those two know more,” Ori alerted the others to the coming presences.

The two princes inveigled themselves into the group and sat down. Bain immediately demanded information.

“Other than us,” Stonehelm revealed, “we don’t know. There’s seven of us, so Jim has to have got six others.”

Ori wondered idly. Tilda was picked for the fun of it, he was sure. Gimli, Legolas, Bain and the others were picked for their willingness to overact and strength to climb on each other as a pile. Jim needed six others who were as able bodied and also with an inclination to act the fool. Ori sighed, that could be anyone from Thorin to Bilbo to Galadriel to Aragorn. He would just have to wait and see like the others.

The front door opened and in came Master Brur. Ori’s heart leaped to his mouth. If all the heads of the scribes’ guild were going to be here, it was going to be extremely embarrassing. Fortunately, Brur only brought Sadi and a rather annoyed looking Granny Klak.

Knowing his duty, Ori rose and went forward to greet them. Brur was all amusement as usual and ready to have a good dinner. Sadi grinned malevolently at him and asked in he’d any more notes she should see. Ori laughed and made some vague excuse. She pretended to glare at him. Ori kissed Granny Klak’s cheek.

“I haven’t seen you in ages, Granny. Where have you been?” Ori asked, expecting to hear that she’d ruined several noble houses by getting them to gamble away all their fortunes.
Granny slewed a look at him and tapped his nose.
“You’ll just have to wonder, my little nestling. Where is my other great grandson?”
“The good grandson or the naughty grandson?” Ori asked primly, earning himself a spank.
“My most recently married one, bratty dwarfling.”
“Yes, ma’am. I have no idea. Probably upstairs being recently married with his husband.”
“Sensible lad,” Granny approved and went forward to greet a delighted Dori.

As soon as everyone slowly gathered, Miss Oqizla circulated with glasses of a light wine. Gheir and the four Mavi were present and Ori looked up to see Hamfast and Bell coming downstairs with their faunts trailing after. Halfway down, Sam raced the rest of the steps and hurried over to where Bilbo and Thorin were seated with Frodo on Thorin’s knee. Posey roosted at the fireside, with Chopper, and the kittens and Brandy played on the rug.

Bell looked very pretty and calm in a pink flowered dress with puffed sleeves and edged with tiny ribbons of white lace, while Hamfast fidgeted in a smart red leather weskit and a green silk kerchief about his neck. The faunts were all happily brought over to where Dori and Balin sat in state with Thorin and Dis. Bilbo welcomed the Gamgees and made formal introductions. Thorin talked easily with all the faunts and then encouraged Frodo to introduce them to Posey and the other animals. Snowdrop was instantly taken with Chopper, sat down beside him and wrapped her arms about the huge battle boar. Chopper didn’t mind this loving attention in the least.

The Gamgees were settled on another couch. Ori noticed Sigrid and Fili baring down on them. Bell saw them, too, and smiled to herself. When they arrived and greeted the Gamgees, she immediately spoke to them,

“Oh there you are, princess, dear. May I impose on you to take Marigold for a few minutes? She is gettin’ heavy.”

Wreathed in grins, the betrothed pair happily took the baby. Fili laughed and lifted Marigold high above his head making the baby crow with delight. Sigrid made fishy faces and played peek-a-boo as Fili cuddled her.

Ori looked back at Dis. She was smiling with damp eyes. Bell patted her hand.
“When is the weddin’?”
Dis turned her attention to the hobbit lady and blinked.
“Oh, they were just officially betrothed the other day. They have been dear friends ever since they met.”
Ori reflected that the pair had been in love ever since they were introduced, having admired each other long before that.
“We might look at a last harvest or a mid-winter wedding,” Dis considered.
“Both ideas’re lovely,” Bell agreed. “I’m sure it’ll be a wonderful affair. They certainly look as though they’ll be very happy. Men are a good deal like hobbits in that babies often come quickly after the weddin’. I know one lady who had her baby full and ready to be born only two to three months after her weddin’. All the rest take, at least, nine months.”
Dis and Bell looked at each other and giggled.
“Yes, I’ve heard that, too.” Dis agreed. “Mistress Zendi is Master Jim’s sister. She is married to a dwarf and was telling them such can happen.”
Bell nodded wisely.
“Good for ’em to have someone to talk to who knows. The worst thing is to go in all unknowin’. Everythin’ gives a fright. Now, at least, Prince Fili can have nerves for the both of ’em.”
She and Dis exchanged twinkling grins.
“Asters,” said Hamfast.
“Oh, Ham,” said Bell, “I don’t know if they’ll still have flowers way up here by then.”
“Flowers?” Dis asked.
“For the weddin’ crowns,” said Bell. “When is last harvest?”
“The leaves turn first,” said Dis, “and it will be several months at least. Not even the damp trees “Damp trees?” Hamfast asked.
“Don’t know what they’re called in westron.”
“Maples, dear,” said Dori. “Remember, I used the sap the elves brought us to make the pie and the iced custard.”
Dis’ face lit up in glee.
“Oh, yes! That was lovely.”
A small knot of faunts ran by in a noisy herd, being chased by Boromir pretending to be some monster or other, making Thorin laugh.
From his seat near the fire Ori sketched and scribbled notes. He was rather pleased with his quick drawing of all the faunts scampering away from a fierce captain. Frodo was mounted on Posey who, despite the short legs, was capable of a good deal of speed. The herd rushed by again and Thorin asked,
“Captain Boromir, what in all Arda are you supposed to be?”
Boromir stood up, grinning madly.
“I’ve got the ends of my cloak as you see. I’m being Roäc!” He turned, flapped, and called after the faunts. “Awk, awk! I’m going to eat you!”
Shrieks of terrified delight were all his reply. Thorin raised and eyebrow.
“You’re not vicious enough, Boromir.”
Boromir laughed and ‘swooped’ off to chase the faults again. Thorin smirked then scowled as Roäc, who had been perching on the back of Thorin’s chair, tweaked his ear. Thorin frowned and Roäc glared back. Thorin returned his attention to Aragorn as the western king sighed and smiled.
“I’m sorry, my captain loves children and turns into one as soon as any are present.”
“I feel you pain,” Thorin nodded. “My captain is in love.”
Thorin turned to his captain standing nearby.
“Dwaaaaalin?”
Ori felt his cheeks color and he peeked under his lashes to meet Dwalin’s steady gaze. His husband winked.
“Dwaaaaalin?” Thorin’s voice came again. Ori watched as Dwalin turned “Eh?”
Thorin sighed,
“As said, Aragorn, I truly feel your pain.”
This made the Gondorian pair chuckle.
Thorin idly watched the chase around the room and smiled.
“So small. You know, we dwarrow are used to being the smallest people in the room.”
“Mister Bilbo told us faunts… er, dwarflings’re quite rare,” said Bell, her face all sympathy.
“They are,” said Thorin, “but dwarflings are larger and more solid than faunts. Though, I’d say your Wee Sam would make quite a respectable dwarfling.”
“He should,” said Bell wryly. “Birthin’ him was like birthin’ a cobble. He got the Goodchild skull. Bald as an egg, big as a boulder.”
Dis winced in sympathy.
“Kili was like that. We couldn’t even get his head through the neck of the traditional name-day shirt, and mithril silver stretches! Something I should warn Tauriel about.”
“Not straw flowers,” decided Hamfast. “Not pretty enough.”
“Calla Proudfoot had them, remember?” Bell reflected. “She decorated ‘em with crystals to look like ice drops and put in some dried red roses.”
Hamfast shook his head.
“Don’t see why they didn’t marry in the spring, or even early summer. Lots of flowers to choose from then.”
“Because the fauntling was due just after Yule, dear. She wanted to wear her gown before she looked like a set tea table.”
Hamfast grunted and nodded.
“Yer right, m’dear, o’ course.”
The elves arrived and greeted the Gamgees with great affability. They were soon followed by Theoden, Bard, Akhn and Snur all talking. Ulfr came through from the sitting room where he’d been deep in discussion with Dipfa, Buj and Oin, who were soon joined by Elrond.

Binni floated in with all the rest of the descendants of Groin, who had Nori and the Urs in their midst.

Hild and Aris swept in from the meadow with the Ironhills monarchs, Sculdis and Hild in laughing conversation. Dain, with an arm clamped across Aris’ shoulders, roared and joked, while Aris couldn’t get a word in edgeways.

Ori rather thought Aris was used to this.

Mistress Dazla came through and informed Dori and Dis that dinner was served.

Ori was relieved to see this was very much more of a casual affair that the previous dinner there. People wore everyday clothes and sat wherever they pleased.

Hamfast was soon pulled into a discussion with Bard, Akhn, Mavis I and Celeborn about farming and orchards.

Bell, Dis, Buelis, Bombur, Mavis IV, Difa, and Gridr chatted with Fili and Sigrid, who traded Marigold back and forth.

“Oh, she’s wet,” said Fili.

“Give her her,” Bell ordered quickly, “I’ve go a spare nappie.”

“That’s alright,” Sigrid laughed. “I’ve changed a brother and a sister. We’ll take care of it.”

Bell snickered.

“Be my guest. You young people’ve gone right round the bend and I don’t mind a’tall.”

Granny Klak and Elladan played moderator as Hild and Theoden spoke urgently, heads together again.

Aris argued with Dwalin, Dain, Arwen, and Aragorn about armaments and strategy. Aewandinen, Gheir, Elrohir, Sculdis, and Bofur discussed jewelry and the making of such. Lindr spoke quite amicably with Binni, Bifur, Mavis II and Mavis III, Jani, and Erda. Thorin and Bilbo had Galadriel, Snur, Dori, Thranduil, Buj, Arne, Balin, and Brur near them and as best as Ori could surmise they were discussing history and traveling.

Nori with Gloin, Elladan, Sadi, and Tharkûn, were in discussion over the possibilities of something Nori was calling a casino.

Kili, Tauriel, Boromir, and the younger set sat at their end of the table with their cohorts, helping entertain the Gamgee faunts and Frodo, while Posey, Kelli, Chopper, and the other beasts ran around the room, playing. Ori reflected it was the weirdest herd he’d ever seen.

Dinner was excellent, starting with fish chowder, followed by Celeborn’s favorite bread, tomatoes roasted with melted balvo cheese. The main dish was the goat stew which Dori had given Dain on his first visit. Dain roared his approval at this, then looked stunned as the exact same dish made with cavern mushrooms instead of meat was brought out for the elves’ delectation. There was also a side of noodles in butter and parsley sauce.

This was swiftly eaten and Ori chuckled at the eldest elf prince, who was taking two helpings of everything.

Next was a choice of beef patties mixed with minced onions and other seasonings or grilled morels and all served with green bean casserole and great platters of corn, tomatoes, yams, new potatoes, new beans, new carrots, onions, and apples all roasted together.

Gheir finally turned from his conversation about jewelry to smile benevolently on Bilbo.

“You must be very relieved to be here at last with Thorin,” observed Stiffbeard king. “What a terrible time you’ve had of it. I’m sure you will be delighted to be able to drop this uncle business and be safe at home with your badger and your husband. I dare say you will be delighted to don your gowns again.”

“My what?” Bilbo asked. “Pardon?”

“Your gowns.”

Bilbo, taken aback, said, “Never worn one myself.”
“Oh, I beg your pardon. With Mistress Gamgee present, I simply assumed it was the way of all hobbit dams.”
“It is,” said Bilbo. “But, I’m not a dam.”
“Come now, Professor, you have no further need for pretense. It’s obvious Frodo is Thorin’s son.”
Bilbo’s face slid into slyness which Ori was beginning to know quite well.
“There is a remarkable resemblance, isn’t there,” said the hobbit, leaning on his elbow.
Ulfr nodded.
“Aye, th’ spittin’ image. No mistakin’ th’ Durin eyes.”
Ahkn added, “Very good of you to acknowledge him, Thorin. Will the succession stay with Fili?”
Bilbo turned to Thorin, who had been following the conversation in complete bewilderment.
“I don’t know. Thorin, what did we decide? Shall Fili still be king after you, or will we chuck him out?”
“Ahkn,” said Thorin, “Bilbo and I only met a month ago, at Bombur and Erda’s inn.”
“A month!” Gheir exclaimed. “Your son is only a month old? I heard hobbits were fertile, but this must be unprecedented!”
Hild cocked an eyebrow at Gheir, then glanced at Frodo, who didn’t look any more clued in than Thorin.
“And, apparently, they mature quite quickly. A month old, eh, my badgerling?”
Frodo frowned.
“I’m ten years old!”
Thorin turned to Bilbo and, in a tone of measured wisdom, said, “I believe Fili should be regent if necessary until Frodo is of-age, then, of course, Fili will be prince consort of Dale under Queen Sigrid. Dale is a matriarchy, you know.”
“It is?” Bard asked.
“Well, you are a woman,” said Thorin.
“I’m a what?”
“Thranduil told me.”
The woodland king patted Bard’s hand.
“Now, my dear, we can have no more secrets among family and friends.”
Fili piped up, “It’s all been settled. Except, Sigrid’s agreed to chain me to the front of the throne, not the back, as is traditional.”
Bard coughed.
“Very good of her.”
Kili added, “Then, Tauriel and I are going to run off to find a nice ent and have lots of dwentflings.”
Gheir looked around at them and said, “I have a feeling you’re not being entirely serious.”
Mavis I rolled her eyes.
“Do you think so, dear?”
“Gheir,” said Thorin, “Frodo is not my son, though the resemblance is lovely. He’s not even Bilbo’s son. Bilbo is a male hobbit. Frodo is the orphaned son of Bilbo’s cousin, Drogo Baggins and Drogo’s wife, Primula Brandybuck. Bilbo is Frodo’s guardian.”
“Of course he is!” Gheir blustered. “I was just having you lot on. It’s not my fault you can’t tell a joke when you see one.”
“Better than you know,” said Hild dryly.
Thranduil turned to Tauriel.
“So, I shouldn’t expect any… dwentflings… to add to my kingdom?”
“My profound apologies, my king,” said Tauriel, bowing her head.
Thranduil sighed.
“I suppose I shall bear the disappointment, now that Bard and I are expecting a little blessing of our own.”
“Which of us gets to wear the gown?” Bard asked archly.
“I have several in which you’ll look fetching, my dear.”
Bard muttered darkly to himself and shook his head.
Snur turned to Dwalin.
“So, when’re ya due?”
Dwalin’ eyes got really big.
“Shite!  It’s comin’ now!”
And he slid under the table.  When he climbed back up again he was holding Mask in his arms.
“Oi, tha’ was quite easy.  Look, he’s already go’ a beard.”
“Yes,” said Ori, “all over his body.”
“I’m good,” said Dwalin with a grin.
Elrond said to his steward, “Do we have anything to add to that, Linda?”
“No, Rhonda, I believe we’ve all said enough.”
Mistress Dazla appeared in the doorway.
“Dessert?”
Dessert was a chantilly cake with berry tarts, and syrup sponge.  Ori licked his spoon clean of syrup and looked about. Boromir had his hands full wiping faunt chins as all had elected to eat as much dessert as they could without their mother’s eye on them. There was a knocking at the front door and Mistress Dazla swept up and opened it. She giggled then turned to the table where everyone was looking at her in curiosity.
“Your majesty, the Court of Miracles would like to come in and prepare for this evening’s entertainment.”
Mistress Dalza was obviously holding back a laugh.
Thorin rose.  “Of course, please, let them come in.  Should we all excuse ourselves to the meadow?”
Jim ambled in and waved a welcome.
“No, no my king.  We’re just going to commandeer this side of the room.  All we ask is that you pay no attention to what goes on behind the curtains.”
The guests all laughed and rose. Some followed Thorin and Dis to the sideboard for sweet wine and others followed Dori and Binni to the fireplace for tea and coffee. The Court of Miracles immediately set up free-standing railing taller than even Glorfindel and hung great swathes of green velvet curtains trimmed in gold fringe.
The younger set sat on the floor, having been ousted from the far fireplace and played slap-cards with the older faunts. Despite being amused by their game, they all keep turning their heads to look at the curtains which swirled and waved as people moved about behind them. There was a good deal of noise coming from there. Dain and Akhn had to be chased away twice from trying to peek.
Elrond, Celeborn, and Galadriel now had Hamfast in conversation, which from what Ori could pick up was about the benefits of honey and the careful handling of its makers.
“I brought Shire bees,” announced Hamfast.  “Proper queens.”
Dori murmured, “As if we’d run out.”
“The hives would best be set up at the base of the mountain,” Lady Galadriel said, thoughtfully.
“The River Running is there and the flowers and trees are quite wild.  There will be plenty for them.”
Ori smiled at his sketches. He thought he had very good ones of everyone present and in very relaxed looking poses. Hild and Theoden King seemed to still be locked in discussion. Ori wondered what they could be talking about so much. Surely just arranging a meeting between a daughter and a nephew, no matter how royal, couldn’t take this long. Ori wondered if they’d gone past this and were planning the wedding, the lives, the number, and the education of all offspring. He hadn’t seen Aris, so it couldn’t be that they were considering joining their kingdoms via the three of them.
Ori looked around. Aris didn’t appear to be in the room. As he did a quick head count, he found that not only was Aris missing but so was Dain, Mavis IV, Aris, Elladan, Glorfindel, and… Dwalin.
At that moment, Jim came around the curtain and winked at Kili, who immediately leapt up and was followed by Theodred, Stonehelm, Legolas, Gimli, Bain, and Tilda. Ori gulped. Was Dwalin involved with this play? Ori thought Dwalin would make an excellent prince…. Ori swallowed a shriek of mirth. Dwalin as a pig?

Jim came back out a few moment later. He was dressed in his Great Woudini robe but the hat and other accouterments were not there. He went to the center of the curtained area, cleared his throat to catch everyone's attention then bowed deeply.

"Your Majesties, Lords, Ladies, Bearers, Gentlemen and Children of all ages. We, the Court of Miracles, wish to entertain you this fine evening with a tale that is supposedly based on an event of a maiden who fell in love with a handsome but wicked prince and what happened to her. It is my very great pleasure to be your Narrator. So please bring your seats forward, let the little ones sit on the floor, and enjoy our dramatic reproduction of this charming tale of anguish, greed, sorrow, bravery, a stalwart heart, and the triumph of true love over all, with our presentation of The Tale of the Heartbroken Princess and the Brave Pig Herder."

All the sofas and chairs were pushed forward to where Jim directed them. Cushions were popped on the floor in front for the remaining younger set, the faunts, and animals. Ori watched, amused, as the guests and family had mixed themselves together. There was no awkwardness as dwarrow, elves and men all sat together in groups. Amused whisperings and chuckling about what this play might be about were all around. Ori overheard heard Hamfast tell Celeborn this was his and the wife’s first ever time at a the-ayter.

Mistress Dalza and her cohorts placed a screen before the fireplace and snuffed all the lights except for those near the curtains.

Ori had placed himself on a front couch next to Aragorn and held his pens and paper at the ready. There were lights lit behind the curtain and they slowly got brighter. There was a lovely trill of a pipe. Jim as The Narrator stood to one side with a very long scroll in his hand that rolled down to the floor. He cleared his throat again. Everyone clapped and he bowed then began.

"Once upon a time, a long, long time ago and in a land far, far away, there lived the most beautiful Princess ever known."

The curtains slid back to reveal Mavey dressed in a sky-blue satin gown with impressive décolletage, a flaxen wig and a tall conical hat with a ribbon floating down from the top. She strolled slowly across the stage area. She stopped and picked up a flower, sniffed it, and went on.

"She was very happy and her life was perfect," The Narrator told them.

Mavey heaved a huge sigh, smiled at them all and said with clasped hands and great feeling,

"My life is perfect."

Gheir and the Mavi applauded and cheered loudly. Mavey blushed and dropped a tiny curtsey. The curtains closed, there was a flurry of moving things.

"She was now of marriageable age and was sent to the court of the local ruler," The Narrator continued.

The curtains slid back to reveal Mavey dressed in a sky-blue satin gown with impressive décolletage, a flaxen wig and a tall conical hat with a ribbon floating down from the top. She strolled slowly across the stage area. She stopped and picked up a flower, sniffed it, and went on.

"She was very happy and her life was perfect," The Narrator told them.

Mavey heaved a huge sigh, smiled at them all and said with clasped hands and great feeling,

"My life is perfect."

Gheir and the Mavi applauded and cheered loudly. Mavey blushed and dropped a tiny curtsey. The curtains closed, there was a flurry of moving things.

"She was now of marriageable age and was sent to the court of the local ruler," The Narrator continued.

The curtains slid back to reveal Mavey dressed in a sky-blue satin gown with impressive décolletage, a flaxen wig and a tall conical hat with a ribbon floating down from the top. She strolled slowly across the stage area. She stopped and picked up a flower, sniffed it, and went on.

"She was very happy and her life was perfect," The Narrator told them.

Mavey heaved a huge sigh, smiled at them all and said with clasped hands and great feeling,

"My life is perfect."

Gheir and the Mavi applauded and cheered loudly. Mavey blushed and dropped a tiny curtsey. The curtains closed, there was a flurry of moving things.

"She was now of marriageable age and was sent to the court of the local ruler," The Narrator continued.

The curtains slid back to reveal Mavey dressed in a sky-blue satin gown with impressive décolletage, a flaxen wig and a tall conical hat with a ribbon floating down from the top. She strolled slowly across the stage area. She stopped and picked up a flower, sniffed it, and went on.

"She was very happy and her life was perfect," The Narrator told them.

Mavey heaved a huge sigh, smiled at them all and said with clasped hands and great feeling,

"My life is perfect."

Gheir and the Mavi applauded and cheered loudly. Mavey blushed and dropped a tiny curtsey. The curtains closed, there was a flurry of moving things.

"She was now of marriageable age and was sent to the court of the local ruler," The Narrator continued.

The curtains slid back to reveal Mavey dressed in a sky-blue satin gown with impressive décolletage, a flaxen wig and a tall conical hat with a ribbon floating down from the top. She strolled slowly across the stage area. She stopped and picked up a flower, sniffed it, and went on.

"She was very happy and her life was perfect," The Narrator told them.

Mavey heaved a huge sigh, smiled at them all and said with clasped hands and great feeling,

"My life is perfect."

Gheir and the Mavi applauded and cheered loudly. Mavey blushed and dropped a tiny curtsey. The curtains closed, there was a flurry of moving things.

"She was now of marriageable age and was sent to the court of the local ruler," The Narrator continued.

The curtains slid back to reveal Mavey dressed in a sky-blue satin gown with impressive décolletage, a flaxen wig and a tall conical hat with a ribbon floating down from the top. She strolled slowly across the stage area. She stopped and picked up a flower, sniffed it, and went on.

"She was very happy and her life was perfect," The Narrator told them.

Mavey heaved a huge sigh, smiled at them all and said with clasped hands and great feeling,

"My life is perfect."

Gheir and the Mavi applauded and cheered loudly. Mavey blushed and dropped a tiny curtsey. The curtains closed, there was a flurry of moving things.

"She was now of marriageable age and was sent to the court of the local ruler," The Narrator continued.

The curtains slid back to reveal Mavey dressed in a sky-blue satin gown with impressive décolletage, a flaxen wig and a tall conical hat with a ribbon floating down from the top. She strolled slowly across the stage area. She stopped and picked up a flower, sniffed it, and went on.

"She was very happy and her life was perfect," The Narrator told them.

Mavey heaved a huge sigh, smiled at them all and said with clasped hands and great feeling,

"My life is perfect."

Gheir and the Mavi applauded and cheered loudly. Mavey blushed and dropped a tiny curtsey. The curtains closed, there was a flurry of moving things.

"She was now of marriageable age and was sent to the court of the local ruler," The Narrator continued.

The curtains slid back to reveal Mavey dressed in a sky-blue satin gown with impressive décolletage, a flaxen wig and a tall conical hat with a ribbon floating down from the top. She strolled slowly across the stage area. She stopped and picked up a flower, sniffed it, and went on.

"She was very happy and her life was perfect," The Narrator told them.

Mavey heaved a huge sigh, smiled at them all and said with clasped hands and great feeling,

"My life is perfect."

Gheir and the Mavi applauded and cheered loudly. Mavey blushed and dropped a tiny curtsey. The curtains closed, there was a flurry of moving things.

"She was now of marriageable age and was sent to the court of the local ruler," The Narrator continued.
“The Princess fell completely in love with the Prince.”
Mavey clasped her hands to her décolletage, sighed gustily and fluttered her eyelashes at the Prince.
“Oh come on, love, you can do better!” shouted Theoden King, making Hild and several others shriek with laughter.
“But the Prince was wicked, and liked to toy with the affections of princesses,” The Narrator told them.
The Prince lofted his eyebrows and snickered evilly.
“Mean ol’ prince!” cried Frodo, quite swept away by the story. Many in the audience agreed and there were shouts of “Booo!” and much hissing.
“Moo-ha-ha-ha-ha!” taunted the Prince and twirled his mustache at them mockingly.
“The Prince held a fine ball.” The Narrator told them.
Golden pillars swagged with more red and gold velvet slid onto the stage and courtiers wandered on, all finely dressed. Ori recognized Glorfindel, Elladan, and Legolas by their height but the rest were completely obscured by fine clothing, piles of hair, hats, and beards.
“It was the ball where the Prince would announce his engagement,” The Narrator intoned.
The Prince stood on a step and beckoned the Princess forward.
“This is the ball where I announce my engagement,” said the Prince, loudly. All the courtiers clapped and cheered. The Prince showed the Princess to everyone. Then the Prince said,
“Moo-ha-ha-ha, dearest Princess, I am in love with you. Do you love me?”
“Oh yes, yes, yes!” cried the Princess.
“I’ll take that as a ‘yes’,” said the Prince.
“Don’t do it, Princess!” Sigrid cried, making Bilbo snort and calling up a chorus of warnings from the audience.
“Shut up, you lot!” snarled the Prince.
“No maligning the audience,” ordered The Narrator.
“They maligned me first,” the Prince snapped.
“Yours is the next line, wicked Prince.” The Narrator scolded.
“Oh, yes. Righty-o!” The Prince got back into character and leered at the princess. “I love you, too. And I’m going to ask you to marry me.”
The Prince winked very rudely at his courtiers, who all winked back.
“My life is perfect!” cried the Princess, hands clasped in ecstasy. “I can’t wait to be your beloved bride!”
The Prince winked around at his courtiers again and they all winked back.
The Prince smiled at the Princess.
“Well, you can’t, you little fool! For, nay, I love another!” shouted the Prince.
The Princess and the audience shrieked.
“Myself!” cried the Prince. “I’m prettier, and I’m a snappier dresser.”
“O, thou hast slain me!” she wailed, and with that she clutched her heart, staggered backward, lurched to the left, and gracefully swooned. “My heart is broken!!”
The Princess fell to the floor and began to sob wildly and very loudly.
“Boo-hoo-hoo-hoo!”
The Prince and his courtiers laughed rudely and pointed their fingers at her.
“Chock up another broken heart for me!” shouted the Prince.
“Boooooo!” yelled the audience.
“The poor Princess,” The Narrator said sadly.
“Poor me!” wailed the Princess from the floor.
“She did the only thing she could,” The Narrator sighed.
“What was that?” The Princess sat up and looked expectantly at The Narrator.
“She ran away.”
“Oh, that’s right.”
“Off you go,” said The Narrator.
He nodded to the Princess who hopped up and rushed off stage, the curtains closing as she did, there was a whisking about of props and the curtain opened again. The Princess ran back on stage, where the ball room had turned into large trees surrounded by several strange looking bushes made of wildly varying shades of green.
“The Princess ran far, far away and into a dark, dark forest.”
“What a dark forest,” the Princess observed as the lights plunged into darkness. “Not that dark!” The lights came up again, to a suitable dimness.
“Sorry,” said a voice offstage.
The Narrator continued, “And in the dark, dark forest there was a dark, dark path.”
“What a dark path in this dark forest,” noted the Princess. “I am in the depth of despair, so I shall follow it.”
“And at the end of the dark, dark path was a dark, dark tower,” The Narrator said as some trees politely moved aside to reveal a tower construct.
“The Princess decided to spend the rest of her life in the dark, dark tower, at the end of the dark, dark path in the middle of the dark, dark forest.”
The Princess turned to the audience and flung out her hand.
“I shall spend the rest of my life in that dark tower, weeping my heartbreak,” she vowed. “I hope the larder is full.”
She went to the tower and slipped behind it. A moment later she appeared in the large window at the top and pretended to weep and pouted her lower lip out.
“Her distress was so great, she cut off all her hair and threw it out of the tower’s one window.”
The Princess threw the hat out first and then the flaxen wig. Under it, she wore a scarf that matched her skin. She went back to weeping, this time in a large handkerchief.
“The briars that grew about the tower, heard her grief, and felt sorry for her.”
The cloth bushes shuffled closer to the tower. Ori gave a little gasp as he realized these were people in bush costumes. He scribbled hurriedly. This was better than any play or puppet show he’d ever seen in the Dale.
“The hair and brambles were watered by her tears,” The Narrator said, sorrowfully as the Princess wrung out her hankie like a sodden mop, “and grew into a huge bramble forest.”
Prop brambles were handed in from the wings, and the brambles held these up around the tower.
“Years pass,” said The Narrator. “Over time, many handsome young swains tried to find and rescue her from her tower but they all got caught in the briars and died.”
The Princess had disappeared from the window, but her voice was heard from off stage, singing, “Aroma, Aroma,
Where is the aroma of the sweet briars?
They are beautiful!
They feed me by the fruitful!
If you rescue me, please dooooooo,
Tell me of love trueuuuuuuuuuuuuuuu.
The thorns will slay all liiiiiiars.”
And the brambles sing-songed,
“Liars, liars, liiiiiiiiaarrrrs!”
“The First Prince approached,” The Narrator announced, looking expectantly off-stage, for the prince to enter. Nothing happened.
Voices off stage were heard to bicker,
“I’m going to die the best!”
“No, I am!”
“No, me!”
The Narrator cleared his throat.
“Ahem! The First Prince approached. It says in the story ‘approached’, not ‘bickered’.”
“Hold off a mo’,” said a voice, sounding like Dain. “Me sword fell apart.”
Another voice - Aris - said, “Are you arguing with The Narrator?”
“I still say I’ll die the best,” said the first voice.
“Fine!” The Narrator growled. “We’ll bring in a special guest judge.”
“Special Guest Judge, please!” hollered The Narrator.
Thranduil abruptly stood up from the audience, a large sheaf a papers in his hands and sang:

```
Now, we shall see who dies the beeeeeeeest!
```

“I shall!” The First Prince cried. “I shall die the beeeeeeest!”

Tilda, as the First Prince, ran on hard at the ‘plants’, bounced off, coughed, choked, lost hold of his sword, put his clasped hands over his heart and dropped.

```
Not hard-leeeeee!
```

Thranduil sang, scornfully and checking through the paper pile.

```
I could do better as a faun!
Yes, I could do better as a faun!
```

The dead prince sat up, arms crossed and stuck out his tongue, then dropped back again. People dressed in gray with a stretcher ran on to lift him and carry him off ‘in state’.
“Next!” Thranduil cued.
Elladan, the Second Prince, ran forward and slid onto his knees, singing,

```
Ah me! Ah my!
This is the day
That I shall die!
```

```
The day you die?” Thranduil scoffed.
“Let us seeeeeee!
```

The Second Prince leapt up and attacked the plants, which grabbed his sword and ran him through with it.

```
Ack! Blech! Ouch!” the Second Prince cried, and fell on his face on the floor.
```

Thranduil gave a ridiculously exaggerated yawn.

```
I confess!
I’m unimpressed!
I see no way it’s you who dies the bessssst!
Next!
```

The Third Prince - Glorfindel - jumped forth with a gigantic axe.

Thranduil sang,

```
No, but no!
you are disqualified.
```

“But why?” demanded the Third Prince.

```
You have already died professionally. Next!
```

The actors ran on to carry off the Third Prince and he threw his hands in the air

```
Fine! I’m dead! I’ll go take a nap!
```

He climbed on the stretcher and was borne away.

Hamfast said, “You know, I’ve really been missing somethin’ never goin’ t’ the the-ayter!”

Bilbo laughed.

```
I doubt this is what you’d find on the stage in Bree.”
Things tottered on in this vein for the next nine princes, one of whom - Kili - didn’t even get as far as the vines. He tripped upon entering and fell on his own sword. Two of the princes, approaching in tandem, accidentally ran each other through. The giggling corpses revealed themselves as Stonehelm and Theodred.

As they were carted off, Theoden called sternly from the audience,

```
“We’re going to talk about this, Theo!”
```

```
“Yes, Da!” the dead prince replied, quite cheerily as he was carried off.
```
Finally, the Thirteenth Prince - Dwalin - arrived on the scene, looking like a metal hedgehog, with tall spikes all over his armor.

The brambles tried to grab him, but leaped back, stabbed by the spikes.

“Oi!” cried one of the brambles. “That’s cheatin’, that is!”

Ori sat up as he recognized Nori, dressed in green, made up green and with his hair standing on end in tendrils, slicked with a greenish gunk. He looked otherworldly, rather nasty, and was probably playing the role of a lifetime.

Bofur was going to have fun washing all that out of his hair.

“Nyah!” The Thirteenth Prince stuck out his tongue, and started to climb, the vines pulling him back down, only to have to release him at the bottom. “Taste o’ yer own medicine, yeh green numpties!”

Finally, Nori-the-plant stamped on the Thirteenth Prince’s foot.

The prince howled in pain, staggered across the stage one way, then another, clutching his own head, then his stomach, then fell to the floor on his back, warbling off-key, “I’m dyin’!

Oh I’m dyin’!
Oh I’m dyyyyyyyyyyin’!”

He shook a leg and let it fall with a clunk.

He lay still for a long moment, and just when they though he was dead, one arm shot up and flailed.

“I’m dyyyyyyyyyyyyin’!”

Then the leg again
“I’m dyyyyyy- ack!”

And he lay absolutely still, except the hand over his heart twitched and red liquid gushed everywhere.

Ori realized it was a tomato.

The vines sang,

“We’re impressssssssssssed!”

Thranduil rifled through his papers in annoyance before finally singing:

“What a mess! You horrid pest!
I suppose it’s you who dies the beeeeeeeest”

And he threw his papers in the air to rain down on the audience.

Instead of an honor guard to arrive and carry him away, Aris entered, sighing in annoyance, and grabbed the Thirteenth Prince by the ankle, starting to drag him off.

“Oi!” cried the Thirteenth Prince, “where is everybody?”

“Down th’ pub,” Aris growled. “Jings, yer heavy! No more xocolatl puddin’ for yeh!”

“Aw, yer jus’ pullin’ me leg,” said the Thirteenth Prince.

“Tryin’ t, anyway.” Aris shot The Narrator a look. “Gives us a hand, laddie.”

“Oh, I suppose,” said The Narrator.

The two of them dragged the dead prince off-stage while he waved to the audience and the faunts all waved back shouting “Bye!”, and The Narrator returned to his duties, drinking out of a pint glass and holding a ham sandwich, which he perched on his own shoulder and picked up the scroll one more.

“Where were we? Ah, yes. So, this went on for many years, so much so that the neighbors complained because all those skeletons piling up on the lawn looked most untidy and the Princess never washed her front stoop. Finally, everyone decided the forest was haunted and moved away.”

A group of people carrying sacks walked across the stage and one stopped to put down a sign.

They went off stage and the sign read 'Haunted Forest! Beware! (it smells!)

“Then, one day, a Handsome Young Pig-herder happened by, driving his pigs to market.”

The Narrator peered down at the faunts.

“That’s your cue to call the pigs.”

They all began to call ‘Suuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuu! SUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUU!”
The Thirteen Princes had become the Thirteen Piggies, complete with ears, snouts and curly tails, and what looked like pink, padded long combinations and crawling on hands and knees. Ori peered at them all but didn’t see Dwalin. Where had Dwalin gone?

Three of these pigs, played by Legolas, Theodred, Elladan, and Glorfindel, looked like they had far outgrown their pink ‘skin’, which ended at their elbows and knees.

“Where did you four come from?” The Narrator asked them.

“Our Mam was an elk,” said the first large pig.

“And our Da was ambitious,” said the second.

The third oinked and oinked for all he was worth, finally hissing out at the audience, “Was that a good one?”

“That’ll do, pig,” said Thorin.

“Thanks! I’ve been practicing.”

“Yooohooo!” a high voice cried from the tower. The Princess was unseen, but a lace hanky the size of a table cloth was fluttered out the window to attract the Handsome Young Pig-herder.

“Don’t worry, Princess! We’ll save you!”

The pigs attacked the vines, gobbling and oinking and throwing bits of green cloth everywhere until most of the vines lay sprawled, vanquished. The Nori vine tried to sneak off the stage on tip toe, but the pigs seized him and piled atop, eating and eating, and when they stood, wiping their snouts with their hooves, Nori was gone. Ori had a feeling he was strolling through the stone under the stage on his way to the kitchen for a snack, still dressed as a plant.

Reaching the Princess proved quite a different problem to solve. The pigs lined up on hands and knees, shoulder to shoulder at the base of the tower, but they were wildly different sizes, and the pigs who tried to line up atop them toppled like skittle pins all over the stage.

Even when they managed to make a respectable triangle, the Handsome Young Pig-herder proved a less than proficient climber, though quite springy, tumbling over and bouncing to his feet again and again.

In his attempts, the Handsome Young Pig-herder stepped on thick skulls and at least one pig bit his ankle.

“Watch where yer goin’, lummox,” said the Gimli pig. “’R go where yer watchin’.”

The Narrator said, “Yes, get a move on, would you? We only have the room for another hour.”

“I’m tryin’!” shouted the Handsome Young Pig-herder.

Tharkûn called out, ponderously, “Do, or do not. There is no ‘try’.”

Finally the Handsome Young Pig-herder reached to top of the tower, grasped the end of the fluttering hankie and pulled - the Princess tripped gracelessly through the window in a storm of innumerable petticoats, each a different pattern, and a very large, frilly pair of boomers. Still connected to the herd by the handkerchief, she fell down the pigs and upset the pyramid, which collapsed in all directions. She rolled on the floor, sprang up and called, in perilous falsetto, “Here I am, dearie!”

It was Dwalin.

It was Dwalin wearing a hideous, tall white wig and one of Vi or Margr’s gowns. The bosom nearly reached the audience.

Thorin choked.

“Great, blessed Mahal,” he whispered.

“Ther’e is!” shouted Vi. “Yeh look lovely! That pink nightie a’ mine suits yeh!”

The audience howled. Ori sat stunned for a moment, then immediately scooted down to sit with the faunts, drawing pad and pen at the ready. It was rough going, sketching this, since once he started giggling, he honestly thought he would pee himself.

The Princess scowled at their laughter, jamming her fists to her well-padded hips.

“Don’t yeh laugh, dearies! None of yeh’l ever be half th’ woman I am! If yer lucky!”

There was a scream as Sculdis roll off her seat and lay on the floor laughing. Galadriel was wiping tears from her eyes and Elrond was holding his sides. Bard was curled forward choking and Sigrid uselessly tried to pat his back.
“My eyes, my eyes!” wailed Fili.
“We wouldn’t dare try, ma’am,” Aragorn called out.
The Handsome Young Pig-herder, still sprawled on his arse on the stage, looked aghast.
“You’re really, really old!” he blurted.
“Well!” The Princess delicately placed her huge hand on her huge bosom in a posture of scandal that would do Dori proud. “Did yer Mam raise yeh t’ be so rude, young man!”
Kib the Handsome Young Pig-herder, winced.
“Sorry…. miss… didn’t meant t’ say that out lou- I didn’t mean t’ say that! Er… nice day, ain’t it.”
“It’s hotter’n in a forge an’ I ain’t had a pint in fifty years. Gather up th’ piggies, an’ let’s find a nice, rowdy pub.”
“Oh, that sounds good, actually.”
“I’m in,” said the Glorfindel pig.
They and the vines all trooped from the stage, each green thing carrying away a piece of the tower and other scenery.
As they went out one side of the stage and, after a very brief pause, entered from the other, the vines now dressed as farmers and herders. They carried in scenery, which they set up in an instant town. The Handsome Young Pig-herder, the Princess, and Mavey-as-farmwife entered after them, Mavey and the Pig-herder arm in arm followed by all the pigs, now with a shiny medals on ribbons adorning their necks.
The Narrator concluded,
“The Handsome Young Pig-herder went home, where he told everyone in his village that the Princess was his long lost aunt. He married and had a family. The Princess….aunt wrote poetry about the brave pigs and they all lived quite happily ever after.”
The pigs and The Handsome Young Pig-herder, the Princess, and The Handsome Young Pig-herder’s wife linked arms and sang:

“Oink! Oink! Oink, brave pigs
Eating every vine!
Chew! Grunt! Chew! Grunt!
These piggies are sublime!”

Everyone on the stage turned to the audience and intoned solemnly:
“SuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuIEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEE!”
And bowed.
The curtain closed and the audience shrieked and clapped and gave ovations.
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. People are starting to go home but that doesn’t make things any less busy for the Durins or Ori. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Quick shout out to #TheQueeninMourningHasASecret for correctly guessing the interaction between Frodo and Posey.

Ori was still giggling as he seated himself at the table in the breakfast parlor. He’d brought his sketches from last night through. Dwalin parked beside him and gave him a nudge, which set Ori off again. Dori looked reprovingly at Dwalin.

“I am deeply mortified.”

“Yer ’n inspiration, our Dori.”

“Hmph!” was all Dori was going to say on the subject.

Dwalin nudged Ori again and Ori nearly dropped his teacup.

“For what, Dori?”

The Bearer held up the Coronation Issue of Vug Magazine.

Ori took it, admittedly curious. The lead article covered the various fashions of the royals and their entourages, examined in minute detail, with sketches provided by the tailors’ guild or by Master Nodun herself. He turned the pages idly, reflecting that he had no idea there were so many kinds of lace. There was an extensive joint interview with Vi and Margr about their ‘new, whirlwind lives among the royals’, and their westron had never been so precise. Ori wondered if the magazine had hired a translator.

Then Ori turned the page and found… himself.

Young and Noble, Fundin House’s Fashion Forward Style Icon

Alright, perhaps he should have been expecting at least one picture in among the royals. The coronation costume of the king’s scribe was so rarely on display, people did deserve to see it.

He didn’t expect an entire article about himself, featuring a picture of each new outfit he had worn since his marriage and including the wedding clothes of the Fundins. Thank Mahal for small mercies.

He turned pages this way and that, amazed to find the pictures were all the work of a single, familiar hand, though no artist was credited.

These weren’t Dipfa’s or Nodun’s sketches. Dipfa sketched everyone stretched out to look like an elf. Nodun’s drawings were always finished and mechanically precise.

These were quite nice, actually, though it gave him a creepy feeling to think someone had studied him so closely.

On one hand, he had about a dozen notebooks full of pictures of Dwalin, all drawn before they had ever met - unless he counted the times he had to go bail Nori out of the lockup.

On the other hand, he’d been in love with Dwalin, and these didn’t look like the handiwork of a lover, though certainly by someone of great talent who was inclined to make Ori much better looking than he actually was.
Omi or Loli?
No, their work on lettering was quite fine, but they stuck with illuminating borders.
Buj wouldn’t be able to resist diagraming Ori and making tiny, precise notes over every inch.
He considered Master Brur for an instant before actually laughing out loud.
No, this had to be someone he had known at least that long, someone who knew his naked figure and the drape of cloth…

“Dori, why did Pika draw me?”

“Because, whether you realize it or not, pet,” Dori told him, “you are a fashionable young public figure who wears his clothes well. Also, under Thror, the guilds didn’t often mix with each other.
You talk to everyone and have made friends among the library, the clothiers’ and the scribes’ guilds.
Dwalin’s soldiers always speak well of you, as do all the miners, many of whom knew us in Steam Alley. Besides, I think Pika has a bit of a puppy crush on you, though nothing to threaten his grand passion for Omi.”

Ori looked at the pictures in despair. They had been hand-colored. He couldn’t imagine the effort or the expense.
“I don’t suppose there’s time to go out and buy every copy they printed?” Ori asked.
“Balin seems to be on that mission. You’ll note that I am in there, too. Really, that dwarf will be the death of me.”

“At least you’ll die happy,” Ori commented idly.
He sighed. This had all happened so fast. When he ran out of the house in Steam Alley all those months ago in his ratty cardigan, it was not with the intention of becoming a fashion model.
“Yeh look grand, love, an’ our Dori’s righ’ yeh know.”

Ori briefly leaned his head on Dwalin’s shoulder before going back to flipping through the pages.
Dori’s picture in their coronation day robe was printed large over a single page, with text and an inset image of the presentation gown on the facing one.
“You do look very glamorous, Dori,” he said.
“Mahrdin knows how to design for the lighting in that room,” Dori shrugged casually.
Thorin entered, talking, with Bilbo and Frodo glued to his sides. Dis followed with Randibur at her heels, in well-cut, understated new clothes. Dis had commissioned them from Mahrdin, and insisted on paying for them herself as a name day present.
Thorin peered, grinning at Ori.
“So, what’s it like to be a style icon?” Thorin teased.
“Like someone made my combinations ten times too small,” said Ori making Dwalin and Bilbo laugh.
“Ask Dori,” said Thorn. “Someone as pretty as you has to get used to it.”
“I don’t wear combinations,” said Dori, affronted. “They do nothing for my figure.”
“I’d like to be known for my works as a scribe,” Ori mumbled, plaintively.
“I believe you’re justifiably famous for that already,” Bilbo told him, and thanked Dori for the cup of tea.
Dori made Frodo a bowl of hot porridge and poured honey and cream on it, before placing it in front of the faunt. Frodo lit up at the cream and honey and thanked Dori politely. Dori made another and placed it in front of Randi, who thanked him profusely, then tucked his napkin under his chin.
“I suppose,” Thorin looked playfully at Ori, “I shouldn’t tell you what Nori heard on the street this morning.”
“What? What did you hear? Are you or Bilbo in danger?”
“Ori, calm down. No one is in any danger, except of dying of mortification. The badgers in Dale have a new game of make believe. They pretend they’re us.”

Bilbo, Dori and Dwalin chuckled.
“Oh, do tell, my dear,” Bilbo encouraged.
“Us as in you and Dwalin and Dis?” Ori asked Thorin.
“Us as in the entire family, including someone who has to play Chopper when someone else plays Dain."
"Thankless job, being a pig," Dori mused.
Ori raised an eyebrow.

All right, he could imagine someone wanting to pretend to be Thorin, the dashing king, or Dwalin, the mighty warrior, or Dis, powerful, gracious, yet terrifying, an ideal to which young dams aspired.
But, a scribe? Did they even know what that was?
"What does the poor badger have to do who gets stuck playing me?" Ori asked.

Thorin leaned over from his seat with a wicked smile.
"Don’t you realize that you are my wizard?"
"I think that escaped me. Has this happened since sunrise?"
"From what Nori understands, I cast spells to ‘fix things’, but the spells don’t have any power until you dip your pen in your magic, glowing blood and write them down."

Ori gaped at him.
"What’s in the well water in that part of town?"
‘I admit, I was rather flummoxed when Nori told me. Then I started to think about it. There were badgers in Vors’ zinc mine, and it was so dark, even you needed to keep your waist desk open to see where you were going."

"The phosphorescent panels," Ori realized. "Every time I opened my desk, they glowed."
"And you dipped your pen in the inkwell, which was in the desk."
"Great Mahal! My bellybutton has become a magic, glowing inkpot!"
"Shocking, isn’t it?" Thorin asked, though it was obvious he was far more gleeful than shocked.
"I can’t believe this," Ori groaned and gave the magazine to Bilbo, who had his hand out for it.
"You’ll cope fine, wee brother," Balin assured him, walking in with a stack of Vugs. He placed them on the table for all to grab as they wished.

Ori groaned again and reached for whatever Dori was passing to him.
Bilbo was already deep in Vug and snickering.
"What’s on today?" Ori asked, digging into his plateful of eggs, bacon, and fried tomatoes.
"Binni and the sons of Groin have a special request," Thorin told them. "Buj has asked them if they would consider adopting him officially. He, Binni, and Oin have quite fallen in family love with each other. Oin and Binni are delighted to the point of tears with the honor, as they called it."
"That’s wonderful!" Ori managed, mouth full.
"How lovely!" Dori sighed. "Dear little Buj desperately needs a family to love him like he ought to be loved."
"Indeed," Thorin agreed. "I have told them to come and see me at any time convenient."

Beorn walked into the room.
"There you are, dear Beorn!" Dori cried, leaping up and embracing the skin-changer around the waist. "I haven’t seen you since the coronation. Tharkûn said you were busy and you missed two dinner parties, you naughty thing!"

Beorn roared with laughter and swung Dori high then settled them at his shoulder.
"Little Bearer. I’m not much for all the silly charades of the various peoples of Arda. I have been exploring the heights of your mountain."

Thorin looked up.
"Inside or out?"
"Outside." Beorn nodded to him. "I admit, it is something I had always wanted to do, but I was too busy with my own lands. This mountain is excellent and very strange."
"Strange?" repeated Dori, who was wiggling about. Beorn put them down and Dori handed the bear man a tankard of milk.
"Yes," Beorn commented after a good swig. "It grows many different plants which should not grow here, and the earth is scented with many minerals which should not form together. I also smell lava."
"Yes," Thorin gestured for Beorn to seat himself. "That is the primary reason we are here and why this is the seat of the high kings of dwarrow."
“Your people thought it would be a good idea to live in a volcano?” Beorn’s eyebrow lifted, but he looked amused. “You do like to live dangerously.”
Thorin laughed.
“Well, we are dwarrow and lava is in our blood, so it’s said. But, honestly, we’ve always known how the lava works and when to allow it to pour forth from the mountain. You have, no doubt, seen the eastern side where there are many old flows.”
“I did. I like the way you seem to have controlled the flow. I do not normally approve of such meddling with the works of the earth, but yours appear to be in perfect tandem.”
“And the warmth of those old flows does encourage the growth of some strange plants rarely seen up in this climate.” Thorin went on.
“Really?” Bilbo asked, suddenly very interested. “I must go and look.”
“I shall take you tomorrow,” Thorin promised.
“Thank you,” Bilbo smiled and Frodo bounced in his chair.
“Beorn,” Thorin looked back at his large guest, “despite our strange ways, I hope you have enjoyed your time with us.”
Beorn grinned.
“I have. I had thought dwarrow odd, greedy folk, but you, King Thorin, have changed my mind. You are good to your people and care for their prosperity. Your only wish is for their happiness. I like you.” “Thank you, Beorn,” Thorin inclined his head at this tribute. “I hope we shall, one day, go beyond formality and simply call one another friend. I have already instructed any of my folk traveling the roads to respect your boundaries, unless you choose otherwise.”
Beorn chuckled.
“That, I appreciate. Though sometimes I do like guests, to hear their tales of the world outside my home.” Beorn rose and stretched, his hands patted the ceiling.
“Good, solid stone. I must take my leave of you.”
“So soon?” Dori lamented. “May we not convince you to stay and see more of our city?”
“No, Bearer,” Beorn smiled and leaned over to return the Bearer’s embrace. “I have been too long already from my lands.”
“May we convince you to accept any leaving taking gifts?” Thorin asked. Dis added, “Would you like a raphcactus bird of your every own?”
“Dis!” scolded Dori. Dwalin and Balin ruined the moment by falling into chuckles. Ori tried hard not to giggle as Dori swept him a passing glare.
Beorn side-eyed Dis, who looked blandly back.
“No, princess. I care for all living things like ravens and my own animals but those birds are…” Beorn considered, then, “those birds are too weird to live with my creatures. I thank you, no.” He shook himself and nodded round to them all.
“Farewell, Durins. If you ever travel my way, you are welcome to bed and board.”
Thorin rose and offered his hand, which was immediately engulfed in the skin-changer’s.
“And you are always welcome here among us, Beorn.”
The man shivered away and the bear bobbed its head and went back out. Roäc and a few of his flock flew down as escort.
“I’ve finished, Uncle Bilbo,” said Frodo. “May I please get down?”
“You’ve finished your milk?”
“Yes.”
Thorin asked, “And what are your plans for the morning, akunith?”
“I can see Posey jumping up and down in the meadow,” said Frodo. “Go on then,” said Bilbo, pushing Frodo’s chair back. The faunt hopped down and ran off into the meadow, squealing.
“And mind you’re neat and tidy when I call you for second breakfast,” Bilbo called after. “The Gamgees will be coming to table.”
“I will!”
Dori sat down with a plump on his chair and looked ready to pout.
“I hate leave-takings.” Dori flicked a shining nail against the handle of their tea cup.
“Never mind, me beloved,” Balin said comfortingly. “Besides, as much as I’ve enjoyed ‘r time wi’ our visitors, it’ll be lovely just t’ have th’ family again.”
“Yes.” Dori smiled immediately “At home with the family, nice and cozy.”
“Dori, you sound like a hobbit,” Bilbo teased
“Well, you do have several sensible ideas,” Dori approved. “I suppose we shall just enjoy our guests while we have them.”

A moment later, Elrond, Lindir, and the twins entered. Immediately, Dori invited them to have breakfast.

Thorin pulled out a chair beside him for Elrond to seat himself.
“I regret, Thorin,” Elrond began and took the cup of tea Dori gave him, “that we must be leaving you today.”

Dori made a moue of discontent. The Lord of Rivendell smiled.
“Indeed, Bearer. We would like to have stayed some time longer but duty calls us home.”
“Of course,” said Thorin. “We hope you have enjoyed yourselves.”

The twins burst out laughing and the elf lord and his steward smirked at each other.
“Well,” Elrond’s eyes twinkled merrily, “my wife Linda and I have been most amused.”
“And where is Lord Glorfindel this morning?” asked Dori archly.

“With Margr and Vi, where else?” said Elladan. He and Elrohir exchanged mischievous looks.
Lindir smiled into his teacup.
“You won’t be missing him, will you.”
“He’s a little hard t’ miss,” Dwalin put in. “Big target.”
“No, I mean, you’ll be seeing him again very soon,” said Lindir. “He’s escorting us back to Rivendell to tidy up a few details and he’ll be returning within the month. To Dale, not to worry. You won’t have him at your table every night.”

Bilbo said, “Better to ask: Doing who?”
Elrohir and Elladan groaned.
“Aw, Professor Baggins,” said one.
“You stole our joke,” added the other.

“Which,” said Elrond, “is not as much of a joke as it could be. You should be hearing from King Bard shortly. Since Glorfindel will be in town anyway, he’s volunteered to help keep the peace in Dale, or at least in Steam Alley.”

“Keepin’ th’ peace ‘r disturbin’ it?” Dwalin asked with a grin.
Thorin frowned.
“Does Bard seem pleased with his presence, or does he feel he needs to accept the help because of who Glorfindel is?” He shook his head. “Sometimes I fear I push my influence on Bard too much myself.”

Dori sniffed.
“Don’t trouble yourself too much over our Bard, Thorin. I know he’s happy for your help, and he’s a grown man, he’ll tell you if you’ve overstepped. Of course, overstepping seems to be Glorfindel’s hobby.”

Bilbo said, “But he has every reason to take his role as protector seriously. He has family there now. Oh, I say, Ori, that velvet outfit does look dashing.”

“I like it,” said Dwalin, putting an arm around Ori. He leaned in close and whispered, “Bu’ I like wha’s underneath better.”

Ori turned his face into Dwalin’s beard, resting for a moment, hoping to get his equilibrium back before he burst into flame.

Mistress Dazla came through.

“Your highness, the kings are ready.”

Dis put down her cup with a look of absolute avarice on her face. She rose, shook out her skirts and composed herself. Randi swallowed the last of his porridge, wiped his mouth, caught Ori’s eye and pointed to his beard.

“All clear,” said Ori

“Thanks, Ori-mate,” said Randi.

“Don’t eat them, namad,” Thorin teased.

“Nadad, you’re no fun a’tall.” Dis sassed and swished out, Randi in hot pursuit.

“Are they going to be in the receiving room?” Ori asked. “Should I be there?”

Thorin snickered.

“You could, but it would spoil all Master Jansad’s fun. They’ll all be closeted upstairs in some rather fine meeting rooms.”

“I wouldn’t dream of that.” Ori replied and leaned back against Dwalin’s arm.

At loose ends, Ori gathered his notes and took them out to the patio. Fanny had reclaimed her spot, lying down on the very edge of the grass, as if she waited for him. Binni and Oin had claimed two of the lounges nearby, Binni having thrown off his boots and rucked up his robe and tunic to above his knees, wriggling his toes in the warmth of the sun. Oin lay with his healer’s hood over his face, his barrel chest rising and falling in even, peaceful motions.

"Hullo," Ori greeted him.

"Hello." Binni looked up from Vug Magazine with a smile.

Fanny gave a little cry of delight and her trunk sniffled Ori’s head and shoulders the moment he got into range.

Ori giggled and plunked down beside her.

"Meetings all done for the moment?” Binni teased.

Ori rolled his eyes.

“For the moment. I was going to just look through my notes. Why do dwarrow always talk all at once?”

"Because each of them knows no one could have anything as important to say as they do. Would you like some tea?”

"That sounds wonderful!” Ori took the glass Binni handed him and looked at the contents.

"What's this?”

"Just an experiment of sorts. It's iced, and extremely refreshing.”

"Oh, in that case, hold on.”

Ori ran to the kitchen came back outside with a large pan of fruit for Fanny and a tin of biscuits for Binni and himself.

"Ooo, what are these?” Binni asked, exchanging the glass for the tin. He lifted the lid. "Xocolatl crinkles!”

"It's my private stash," said Ori. "Dori always puts aside a tin just for me and a tin just for Nori, though my tin is bigger, of course.”

"Of course! Dori's pre-cious badg-er!” Binni sing-songed.

"Without a doubt.” Ori sipped his tea. Mmm, that was good. He nabbed a few of the blackberries Fanny hadn’t sucked up and put them in his mouth, chewed and took a swig of tea. That was even better.

“Thank you, actually, I’m making a list.”

Ori looked all around. "It's so quiet!”

"Now, you hush if you want it to stay that way," Binni warned, giggling.

"It's just so strange. It feels like we've been entertaining guests for the coronation for months!”

"In a way, we have been. All that ball fringe! I'm seeing it in my sleep. It all turned out gloriously, though, the usual Durin insanity and all.”

Ori looked to see Binni had folded the magazine to show Dori's coronation robes. In graphite wand, he was making notes in the margin and there were arrows and sketches of patterns.

"What's this? I didn't know you designed clothes as your craft.”

"It's a bit of a sideline. I'm certainly not in Dipfa's class, but Dori looks gorgeous in practically anything."
    Binni beamed at him.
    "You're proud of Dori, aren't you," said Ori.

    "They're certainly everything a Bearer should be. They picked everything up so quickly, so easily. The confidence of coming to it as a grown dwarf, I suppose, along with tons of natural talent. For myself, I find I'm much better as a Bearer-Sib than I was as an actual Bearer."

    "What's a Bearer-Sib?"
    "When there were more of us, young Bearers learned tradition and display from older Bearers, called Bearer-Sibs. There was once a great deal expected of us at court, seeing to the needs of the king's guests, entertaining at banquets, keeping the feuds among the concubines from spilling out into public. Among men, the queen does all that, but long ago, dwarrowdam queens were always warriors first."

    "I never realized there was so much to it," said Ori.
    Binni looked wistful.

    "A great deal has fallen by the way. There are so few of us anyway, and, of course, the center of our culture was lost with Khazad-dûm. I still remember how beautiful it was, the sweep of the silk dancing robes, the pearl and opal floor inlays in the entertainment chambers."  Binni considered a xocolatl crinkle with an expert eye.

    "You know," said Ori gently, "we don't have to talk about Khazad-dûm if it upsets you."

    "You're a dear," Binni sighed. "But I don't mind talking about it now. The fall of the Dwarrowdelf was all a very long time ago, and, truthfully, my life in Erebor has been very, very happy."

    "I get the feeling, as beautiful as it was, that life in Khazad-dûm was…"
    "Less than blissful?" Binni gave a laugh that had nothing to do with humor. "As hard as Dori's life has been, they were fortunate they didn't present as a Bearer until after they'd been reunited with their One. I come from a line of Bearers going back to the founding of Khazad-dûm. I was getting marriage proposals before I was even born."

    "Was there a lot of pressure on your parents to marry you off young?" Ori asked.

    "Yes, luckily they were quite honorable people and wouldn't sell their dwarfling no matter the price. Beyond that, well, growing up I certainly did take to the Bearer culture eagerly. Who wouldn't want to wear beautiful clothes and move with exquisite grace and slit someone's throat in perfect silence?"
    Ori stared at him.
    "Really? Assassination?"

    "Well, we were still dwarrow, and a knife is a lot easier to hide in your bodice than an axe."
    "Point taken."

    "Thank you. Yes, it did have its advantages. There was only one problem. I didn't want to have dwarflings of my own."

    "Oh, that would put a crimer in things," said Ori.
    "Rather. But the choice was taken out of my hands. When I fled Khazad-dûm with my parents, I took a wound to the belly. Not deep enough to spill my innards, but the blade was filthy and there was no one to treat the wound. By the time we arrived at Erebor, I was delirious with fever. The only way to save my life was to remove my inner-forge."
    Ori blinked.
    "Healers can do that? Really?"
    Oin snorted from under his hood and pulled it aside.

    "They can an' do. Up until then, however, th' rate a' fatalities from th' surgery alone was ninety percent, an' th' rest died from infection tha' set in afterward. Surgery was quite primitive, an' traditional wisdom said it didn' matter if th' healer's hands were filthy. As dwarrow, if we were so weak as t' fall down dead from thin's tha' killed men, well, mebbe it was best we died, rather than pass on weak blood t' th' next generation."

    "That sounds … extreme," said Ori. "I'm beginning to see why there are so few of us."
Binni said, "Fortunately for me, I was treated by a healer with radical notions about things like cleanliness. Her name was Tiris, and she was part of a rebellious little cabal of journeymen healers who were long overdue for mastery, but were constantly being denied because their methods ran afoul of the orthodoxy of their guild."

"Aye," said Oin. "We couldn't so much as change a bandage without our master t' supervise. When dwarrow started pourin' in from Khazad-dûm, there weren't enough master healers t' go around. Th' guild chairs went on insistin' they alone should do th' cuttin' an' splicin'. Old Thror really tossed his scree tha' day. I kin still hear him: 'A' course yer journeymen are goin' t' operate, yeh dumb fucks! We're arse-deep in wounded an' they're bleedin' all over th' rugs!""

Binni blinked at Ori. "Can you tell that's his favorite story? Tiris saved my life and we became good friends. Then one day she introduced me to Oin. He was my heartsong right enough, but I dreaded telling him who I was, or had been at any rate."

Ori turned to Oin. "What did you say when Binni told you?"

"Aw, now tha's Binni's favorite story."

Binni made a face at Oin. "When I said I was a Bearer he got this 'standing in the path of an oncoming mine cart' look, then he sighed and asked, 'Well, how many badgers d'yeh want, then?' and I said, 'None, and it doesn't matter anyway since I can't pop any out.' And he sort of deflated in relief. It was horribly comical."

"It would have been more awkward if he'd been your healer, I suppose," said Ori.

"Mm, yes. Not very romantic to walk out with someone whose entrails you'd recently stuffed back into their belly."

"Now, there's an image," said Ori.

Binni laughed at him.

"So," said Ori, "your parents survived as well?"

"Yes, and lived to ripe old age. My father was quite deaf at the end of his life. He and Oin would chat and I'd get whiplash trying to follow the conversations. I say conversations because there always ended up being twelve or so at once. Oops, now we're back to dwarrow talking over one another again aren't we."

"That's all right. Have another biscuit."

Oin sat up with amazing spryness.

"There's biscuits?"

Ori was deep in his thoughts when Dwalin’s hand slid onto his shoulder and was followed by a whiskery kiss on each side of Ori’s neck. Ori sighed with pleasure and turned to look up at him. "Yeh wantin’ lunch?" Dwalin asked with a grin.

Ori opened his mouth to answer but his stomach rumbled a reply for him, echoing Fanny’s snore. Hand in hand, they went in and through to the receiving room. Ori saw that it was once more set up as a buffet. There were piles of food of all kinds. There was nothing too fancy, just comfort food for each race. Jim and his entourage were present as well. As he ate, Ori observed everyone. There was no longer any stiffness between the races. Everyone was chatting and laughing. Mavis I had one arm about Mavey the other about Floris and was talking to them seriously. Both young dams were nodding enthusiastically. Jim and Ruelis were chatting with Gheir and the other three Mavi, making them all laugh.

Aewandínen was busy with Hild and Galadriel and Sigrid. Hild had let the elf prince examine one of her braids and Aewandínen was taking full advantage of studying the components of the braid and the texture of her hair.

Hamfast, Snur, Celeborn and Elrond were deep in discussion again.

Thranduil was doing an elf circle dance with Tilda, Boromir, Frodo, and the Gamgee faunts.

Aragorn, Arwen, Scudis and Dain went around the buffet table for the third time.

Thorin and Bilbo moved among their guests with smiles and conversation. Ori loved seeing Thorin like this. He was regal as always and looked his usual majestic self, but he was surrounded by an aura of happiness.

Lunch closed and Gheir sighed, then cleared his throat.

“Forgive me, my king, but we must take our leave of all of you.”

“You know, Gheir,” Dis said, with an arm about Mavis IV in an assuring hug as there was were several disappointed noises from around the room. “You don’t have to rush home right now,” Dis went on. “You are welcome to stay another night, that way you can all leave at first light.”

“Thank you, Dis,” stated Gheir, nodding around at those who had wished the Stiffbeards to stay longer, “but I’m anxious to get back to my daughter. I’ve had a raven that all is well, but I do worry about her.”

“She’s a strong lass,” Mavis II said in an encouraging tone. “She’ll bear this one same as she bore the others, but, aye, I miss her, too.”

Gheir looked glum.

“I miss all the badgers,” he went on dolefully. “They grow and change so quickly. I remember how surprised I was to find that each had their own little personality. Before I had my own pebbles, I assumed all badgers were pretty much the same.”

Dis looked at Fili, then Kili.

“But, there are often frightening similarities,” she commented, eliciting chuckles form Gridr, Bell, Aris, and Elrond.

The Stiffbeards made ready to go, bidding all other guests farewell. They stepped out to their wagons, which had been repacked and stood ready for the southward journey. Mokrah brought a pony out, pulling a cart. In the cart sat two largish wooden crates.

“What’s this?” Gheir asked.

Thorin grinned.

“This bigger one is a box of toys and games for your badgers,” Thorin’s tone was of great solemnity.

“And the smaller?”

“A box of toys and games for you and your wives,” said Bilbo slyly. “Don’t mix them up.”

Gheir chuckled.

“I won’t. I promise. Permission to take leave, your majesty?”

“Only if you promise to come visit soon,” said Thorin. “I shall.” He bowed and the Mavi followed suit.

When he straightened again, Thorin embraced him.

“You are always welcome to Erebor,” said Thorin. “Just try to keep the bloodshed to a minimum.”

Everyone came out to the courtyard and waved as the Stiffbeard entourage moved slowly out of the royal cavern.

Thorin and the rest of the Ereboran royalty went out onto the platform to wave the Stiffbeards on their way. Ori noticed that, not only had a great number of the mountain’s population followed the Stiffbeards out, but their shouts of farewell and general cheering had caught the notice of nearby people of Dale.

Thus there was quite a crowd through Dale to wave and cheer the Stiffbeards off. Ori wondered idly what Gheir and the Mavi made of being cheered and wished good journey by a city of men. Bells in the city were rung and the parade was seen on its way.

The royals and the remaining guests returned to find that the wagons for the Court of Miracles were now gathered in the courtyard. Ori sighed. He had enjoyed the travelers’ company very much and they had certainly added a great deal to the coronation and all the parties. He felt sorry that they had to go, and worse that Fanny would be leaving as well, but he fully realized that, as much as he loved Fanny, she would be much happier traveling with the Court of Miracles. She would be loved and cared for, and would see many lands and other wonderful things. Dis had told him that oliphaunts didn’t forget people and the Court would be back to visit and he would see Fanny again.

Thorin signaled to a team of Mistress Dazla’s minions and they steered three more large wagons hitched up to be drawn by four ponies each.
Jim looked these over and grinned at Ruelis, before turning to Thorin.

“Dare we asked, your majesty?”

Thorin laughed and looked around at all the members of the troupe.

“My dear friends, you have done so much to make this coronation one of great joy and, no doubt, of legend. You have our thanks and a permanent open invitation to come and stay with us as long as you wish. Should any of you ever tire of your travels, there will always be a place in Erebor for you to live out your days.

“Since you provided us with such magnificent amusement, we have decided to return your kindness in our own poor way by gifting you with a few …er.. props and costume possibilities.”

The troupe went to the wagons and the cover was lifted from the first.

“Where did all this come from?” Ruelis asked and pulled out something sparkly and rather sheer.

“Those are all the clothes from the old concubines’ quarters,” Dori explained. “Also, when Frerin and his court left, they abandoned other such clothing and furniture, so we’ve popped it all in. You’re so good at making your props, we thought you would make the best use of all this.”

Jim drew out a blue velvet suit, which Ori recognized as Frerin’s best.

“The holes are rather different,” Jim commented.

“Frerin annoyed the ravens when he last wore that,” said Dis.

Her comment was loud enough for all to hear and giggles rippled through crowd.

The troupe just had to peek at a few of the things packed in the wagons and flew into gales of laughter over what was in them.

Ori glanced about and noticed that Granny Klak was standing with Kib and she had her hands on her hips.

“So, will I be seeing you again?”

“Oh, of course, my darling, I will always return to your blessed arms.”

“You honey-tongued bastard!”

“You’ve met my parents then?” The man laughed.

“Don’t change the subject. I’m making sure you’ll come back. You’re a lovely roll in the sheets, you naughty young man, you.”

Kib laughed again, dropped to his knees and wrapped Granny Klack into his arms.

“And you are a deliciously evil dwarrowdam with hips like a vice. I’ll always be back for you.”

“Fine.” Granny snapped, obviously elated by this description of her charms. “Be off with you then. The sooner you go, then sooner you’ll be back.”

She attempted to pull away but Kib hugged her tighter and rolled them down to the stone, kissing her noisily. Granny squawked and tried not very hard to beat him off. She was giggling so much, it wasn’t much of an effort. Ori felt himself blush at this display by his great grandmother. There was no doubt in his mind whatsoever that this was definitely Dori’s bloodline.

Of course, her noise made everyone turn and look at them.

“Kib!” yelled Ruelis. “Get off the ground!”

“Granny!” shrieked Dori. “Is that horrid young man trying to divest you of your virtue?”

“What virtue?” Granny squalled with delight. Kib was trying to get a hand up her many voluminous skirts.

“Yeh go, girly! There’s a lass!” shouted Vi.

“Aye, our Klaky!” concurred Margr at volume. “Ge’ ‘em when they’re hot, I always say!”

“Good technique,” Glorfindel murmured admiringly.

“Granny!” cried Dori and rushed over to beat at Kib with an ancient concubine’s brassiere.

“Bad, bad, wicked man! Stop debauching my innocent great grandmother this instant!” Pink feathers of great age broke off and puffed about the rolling pair as Dori attempted a rescue.

“Jus’ sit on ‘im, our Dor!” yelled Nori without much interest.

“Don’t help,” Bofur chided.

Dori sat on the lovers, making Granny employ some rather interesting language and Kib moan for help.

Jim went over and hauled Kib up. Kib staggered a little, bent double.
“Ruelis, my darling,” Jim sang out. “Be a love an’ bring our Kib a cloak. He’s gone and made himself unpresentable again.”
Ruelis rolled her eyes.
“Oh, just pick him up and throw him in a wagon.”
“Yes, dear.”
Dori helped Granny Klak to her feet, the old dwarrowdam giggling foolishly. Dori applied a vinaigrette to her nose, making her swear.
Thorin cleared his throat and Jim and Ruelis came back to him, grinning.
“We thank you very much, you majesty,” Ruelis said sweetly.
“And,” said Thorin, “this,” he indicated a rather large chest Dwalin and Bifur placed into the front wagon, “is for Ori’s own little Fanny’s upkeep and a small something for your work here.”
Jim cocked his head. Ruelis peeped in. Ori saw the gleam of gold.
Jim and Ruelis looked a bit taken aback by the amount and both bowed soberly.
Thorin raised them and embraced both.
“Thank you all again. Return whenever you wish.”
The troupe was embraced by everyone and invited to every kingdom in Arda represented.
Kib, now recovered, came through from the stable, bringing Fanny. Ori hurried over and embraced her knee. Fanny’s trunk wound around his waist and they held each other. Ori looked up. He knew he had tears in his eyes and he knew he was silly but he didn’t care.
“Don’t worry, Fanny. I’ll be here when you come back and you can tell me all your wonderful adventures!” he promised. Fanny made her loving hoo-hoo noise.
“Want to ride her down?” Ruelis asked.
“May I?” Ori gasped.
Ruelis giggled and Jim came over.
“Ready to ride, Fanny,” Jim chirped and patted the trunk about Ori.
Ori felt the trunk tighten and he was gently lifted up. Fanny easily placed him, straddling her neck. Ori leaned over and hugged her head, then sat up. Dwalin was looking up at him and at Fanny, arms folded.
“No runnin’ off wi’ him, now,” he told Fanny. “We’re each other’s One.”
Ori giggled and whispered to Fanny.
“You!” Dwalin yelped as the trunk snaked around him, he was lifted easily and settled behind Ori.
The faunts cheered. The Court boarded their wagons. The younger set shouted and called to Fior, Floris, and Mavey, who sat on the roof of the first wagon with a madly barking Biscuit held between them. Chopper squealed a farewell as Biscuit gave a last howl. Thorin yelled that whichever scribe was present had better be drawing this. Dwalin flipped off his king as Fanny happily followed the wagons out of the royal cavern.
“Yeh told her t’ grab me didn’t yeh?” Dwalin hissed into Ori’s neck, then kissed it.
“You wouldn’t have missed this for the world, admit it,” Ori giggled and leaned against Dwalin. He felt his husband chuckle.
“Aye, love. Wave t’ th’ library folk, now.”
Ori waved to his fellow scribes, making whomever was outside shout and wave back. This continued as the Court of Miracles entourage made its way slowly through the mountain to the main gate. There were a few acts on the wagon roofs while others in the troupe played music and people came out to shout and cheer. Fanny waved her head about and stepped in time with the tune. Ori felt terribly proud of her.
They finally came out into the courtyard and Fanny lifted down Ori, then Dwalin. Ori embraced her again and she held him tight with her trunk. She hugged Dwalin, too, and made several snuffling noises to him. Dwalin chuckled.
“No, t’ worry, lass. I’ll take good care a’ him.”
The Court of Miracles moved off south to the festivals only delayed by a week. Ori and Dwalin waved along with everyone who had followed them out. Ori looked up and saw the platform was full of royals waving and calling farewells.
Ori sighed and found his face was wet with tears. Dwalin put an arm about him and turned to look at the stair to the platform, which the Rivendell elves were descending.

Their horses galloped over from their grazing down near the river, and trotted about the courtyard, whinnying and greeting their riders. Many of the other royals followed, and several of Mistress Dazla’s team brought their luggage.

The elves of Imadris were helped to saddle up their horses by the dwarrow, which the elves seemed to find both fascinating and charming.

Ori wiped his eyes just as Elrond came and laid a long hand on his shoulder.

“Farewell, Ori of Fundin. I do not have Lady Galadriel’s prescience, but I know you will have many things come before you that will require all your skills. If, at any time, you wish my council, please do not hesitate to contact me.”

“Um, thank you…I think…” Ori said warily. The elf lord smiled.

“I did not say such to cause you worry. If nothing else, perhaps you can influence Miss Dipfa to some gentler colors. Thus we shall not all be horrified this coming spring when we join you for the royal holidays at the Inn.”

Ori twinkled at Elrond. “I can try, my lord, but you must remember. Dipfa is a genius.”

“Good try,” Lindir murmured beside Ori, making Dwalin snicker. Elrond shrugged.

“Laugh while you can, my dear, just don’t blame me if she outfits you in pink lace.” Elrond turned. As he moved away, Dwalin nudged Lindir and hissed.

“If she does, lad, just switch the parcels.”

Lindir’s eyes lit up and he stifled a giggle.

Ori looked about to see that all the horses were ready, but Vi and Margr and Glorfindel snogged conspicuously off to the side, finally forced to unlock lips when Elrond and the rest of the party took the horses’ reins, beginning to mount up.

Glorfindel’s great white horse came forward, the bells on its headstall jingling, and nuzzled the tall elf.

“Here yeh are, love,” Vi cried, shoving something at the elf. “Some snacks f’r th’ road.”

Something was a hamper about the size of a pony.

“Thank you, my dears!” Glorfindel boomed.

“And carrots for th’ horsey,” said Margr. “Oh, now pull in tha’ lip. I’m sure Arsefellow won’t mind if yeh take one ‘r two f’r yerself.”

He embraced each of them again, the sisters rather teary eyed.

“I’ll be back before the trees turn, this I vow,” said Glorfindel. “And when I return, I’ll bring some quite excellent wine.”

Lindir muttered, “Oh, will you now.”

Glorfindel swung onto his horse, the snacks secured to the saddle behind him, as Margr and Vi started waving handkerchiefs in farewell, even though no one had gone anywhere yet.

Fili and Kili stood, talking quietly with the twins. Kili offered a long, flat box, and Elladan took it, opened it, and shouted with delight.

“How did you get these?” Elrohir asked.

“They shed them constantly,” said Kili. “They were happy to let me take them when I told them what I was planning to do.”

Elrohir lifted a long, perfect raven feather from the box.

“These will make excellent arrow fletchings! Thank you!”

The box was closed again, and the young nobles bowed to one another, then laughed and embraced.

Thorin and Bilbo bowed to Elrond and Bilbo proffered a package, carefully wrapped in paper for the journey.

“What is this?” Elrond asked.

“It’s a translation of the ‘Infernal Adventures of Durin the Deathless’,” said Thorin.

“It’s soon to be quite famous across Middle Earth,” Bilbo announced grandly. “Now, you can say you had it first.”
Elrond was stunned, then he smiled broadly.
"Thank you! I shall treasure this, especially since I can now read it. Thank you for having it translated for me, Thorin."

Thorin snickered.
"Well, that's not quite how it happened. Bilbo translated it in Imladris. He taught himself khuzdul to do it, too."

Elrond was obviously mortified.
"Thorin! I can only offer my sincerest apologies! I should have realized what would happen if I left it in the general library."

Bilbo snorted.
"You could have predicted a nosy hobbit would come along and ruthlessly translate it? I don't think so, Elrond."

"There is no harm done," said Thorin. "In fact, it is an excellent translation and I'm very proud to offer it to you."

"You're still sleeping on the floor for a week for telling," Bilbo hissed at Thorin.
"I'd best get used to it," said Thorin philosophically. "I'm going to be sleeping there a lot."

As the rest of Elrond party mounted their horses, Aris ran down the steps.
"Oi! Master Lindir! Hold up!"

Lindir turned, taking his foot out of the stirrup, and stood, smiling.
"General Aris! Have you come to see us off?"
"Go' somethin' f'r yeh. Somethin' tha'll come in handy."

She handed Lindir a small wooden box which closed with an elaborate hasp. He frowned, opened it, saw the contents and laughed.
"General Aris! This is brilliant!"

"Use it in good health," said Aris.

Lindir leaned down and embraced her, the two of them chuckling. When they separated they bowed formally to each other, but still snickering.

"Until next time, general."

"Until next time."

Lindir swung up.
Elrond, frowning, asked, "What have you there? Is that a watch?"
"Never you mind that now," said Lindir with a grin.

Elladan and Elrohir looked shocked. Lindir was never quite so forward with Elrond. He barely even spoke to them.

They moved out, trotting down the road from Erebor, but the wind carried Elrond’s and Lindir’s voices.
"It’s one of those timing devices!" Elrond cried. "I hope you’re not using that thing on me!"
"Oh, do be sensible," Lindir replied. "I certainly wouldn’t time you, in court or anywhere else."
"Then, when will you use it?"
"Whenever Haldir comes to give presentations in Imladris."
"Oh Mahal, yes! Excellent idea."

They could just hear the twins laughing and Elrond crying out in horror "What did I just say?"
"Not to worry, Ada."
"Yes, Eru can only strike you dead once."

People shouted farewells and once more they could hear the bells in Dale striking up. The Imladris party headed through town to the docks where one of Thranduil’s great sailboats was waiting to carry them across to the Greenwood and the road back to Rivendell.

They finally got back to the house and Mistress Dazla raised her eyebrows to Dori, code for asking if she should serve tea. From the talk Ori overheard, it seemed that most of the guests were planning on spending the evening out and about, exploring the sights, sounds and food offerings available in the great city of Erebor.
In the end, the only people who sat down for dinner in the breakfast parlor were the Durins, the Fundins, Boromir, the younger set and the faunts. Gridr and Gloin took the Gamgees, Bard, and Thranduil out to a ‘special’ place. Aragorn and Arwen were invited by Margr and Vi to somewhere they claimed the pair would ‘love’. Ori hoped they had more for dinner than pastry, and were offered something for dessert besides Margr and Vi.

Fili and Sigrid kept Marigold with them at all times and took turns eating their dinners. Kili, Tauriel, and Boromir amused the faunts.

The adults had quite the time with Dis, who was reporting back on her trade talks with the kings “Thorin,” said Dis, looking like a very pleased cat, “I’ve been talking to the Blacklocks about a possible Xocolatl supply and Hild was insistent that it would be cost prohibitive - for us - unless we could give them what they want.”

“Which is?”

“Zinc.”

Thorin grinned.

“We can get them zinc.”

“Yes, yes we can. Since Lord Vors isn’t sending the richest vein under Erebor to Mordor we have plenty. The Blacklocks can get us xocolatl, a steady supply of coffee, cinnamon, vanilla and a different kind of sugar made of a cane plant. They say it will make the xocolatl taste more traditional.”

“Then, I’d say, it’s just a matter of how much how often,” said Thorin.

“Mmm, rather like sex,” said Dis.

Nori’s voice wafted from the ceiling, “What’s like sex?”

“Where are you?” Dis called.

She got up and wandered about the room, looking.

All she got in reply was a fading chuckle. Just now Nori was sensible enough to get out of her way, especially when she wore that bright-eyed, predatory look on her face.

Dis finally came back to her seat and Dori served dessert.

After dinner they went through to the receiving room as the younger set cajoled Omi, Loli, and Randi to bring out the music box. This done, they taught the faunts to wag. Then they played shimmy and spent the rest of the time running races and chasing the remaining animals around, much to the animals’ amusement.

Marigold finally wailed that it was her bedtime. Frodo looked at her from his seat on Thorin’s knee.

“Why does she do that?” he asked.

Before Bilbo or anyone else could answer, Wee Sam snorted and growled, “She’s a baby. Babies are silly like that.”

“Why, Wee Sam,” Dori cooed, drawing the faunt close and giving him a cookie, “do you really think babies are silly?”

Wee Sam squirmed, then shook his head.

“She’s silly.”

“What happened that makes you think she’s silly?” Dori inquired gently.

Wee Sam frowned terribly then muttered, “She ate my card.”

“Deary me,” commiserated Dori. “Was it your very favorite?”

“Yes,” Wee Sam said defiantly. “It was th’ special card I got f’rm King Thorin! An’ she et it!!”

“Oh, Sam,” Frodo looked sorrowful and he reach out, took Sam’s hand and squeezed it as he’d seen the dwarrow do.

“It was special.” Sam’s lip pouted out and he looked ready to cry.

Thorin scooped Sam up and placed him on his other knee.

“Now, Sam. I fully understand that it was special to you and you’re very upset that it is gone. You do realize that Marigold is far too young to understand that.”
“I know,” mumbled Sam.
“And you really don’t think your little sister is silly, do you?”
“No,” mumbled Sam again and a tear dribbled down his cheek.
Thorin hugged the faunt close and wiped the tear away.
“Well, since your card suffered such a terrible accident, how about we ask Ori, who drew the card for you, to draw you another? A very special card this time.”
Sam whirled to look at Thorin.
“Really?”
“Oh course.”
Thorin smiled up at Ori, who shifted forward in his own seat next to Dwalin.
“Oh course, Sam,” Ori smiled at the faunt. “Do you want the same picture or a different one?”
“You can make a different one?” Wee Sam’s eyes were about to fall out of his head.
“Certainly. I can put anything you want in it. Do you want it to be bigger?”
“Bigger?” Wee Sam’s voice was almost a squeak.
Thorin laughed and settled back both faunts in his lap.
“There you are, Wee Sam. Why don’t you think it over and you can tell Ori what you would like tomorrow. How about that?”
Both faunts cheered and hugged Thorin.
“Alright!” Bilbo called out. “It’s time for a story before all good faunts are in bed.”
There was a rousing cheer from the other side of the room and all games were abandoned. The younger set picked up the playthings and put them away while the faunts crowded about Thorin and Bilbo, ready for a story.
Bilbo entertained everyone with a fascinating account of Bullroarer Took and his accidental invention of the game of golf. Thorin told of the time Durin the Deathless had a battle with a dragon, defeated the dragon then forced the dragon to serve him tea and cakes. Durin and the dragon had such an excellent conversation over tea, that they made a pact that dragons would never come to Erebor unless it was for tea.
Ori had never heard this one and it was obvious by the smirks on Fili, Kili and Gimli’s faces they hadn’t heard it either. Boromir told of the great journey that founded the City of Minas Tirth. Legolas recited a poem for elflings about wrens and flowers.
Ori noted all stories down in detail. He pondered the idea of a small book of childrens’ stories from all over Arda and put it away to think about later.
Dori told Fili and Sigrid to put Marigold in her basket by the sofa as she was fast asleep. Fili, Kili, Sigrid and Tauriel herded the faunts upstairs to bed. Gimli yawned, said good night and pulled Legolas off with him. And the rest of the younger set scattered to their beds.
Boromir woke himself with a snort and blushed, apologized and took himself off. Soon only Balin, Dori, Thorin, Bilbo, Ori, and Dwalin were sitting before the fire. Ori had brought out his knitting and Dwalin played the viol for them. Occasionally, Thorin would sing, sometimes alone and other times they all joined in.
The front door opened and the remaining dwarf kings and those they had gone out with returned. There was some talk, mostly about the sights and the food consumed. Mistress Dazla brought in mead. Aragorn, Arwen, and the sisters returned laughing, followed shortly by the Groinuls and the Gamgees. Dori reported on what the faunts had been up to all evening, then Hamfast and Bell took Marigold upstairs with them. This began a slow train of people yawning, finishing their wine and stories, then going off to bed.
Dori, Balin, Thorin, and Bilbo finally filed out, leaving only Dwalin and Ori. Ori looked about to check all was tidied away as Dwalin went and bolted the front door. Dwalin came back to where Ori stood at the fireplace. Ori looked up at his husband, smiled, and reached to tuck a stray lock back from his face.
Luridness, Letters, and Locks Let Loose

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Um… Aewandínén’s in this one. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Notathain A. Shire
Excerpt from: ‘Gonad, Savage Champion of the Ice Fields of the Frozen North.’

Champion Gonad glared fiercely into the flames of the longhouse fire. His frown pulled his frighteningly handsome features into a magnificent scowl.

He pondered the tantalizing tale of the undead wizard, who had appeared in his left boot at the inn.

A dragon! A dragon in the north! the non-breathing thing had gibbered.

Gonad lazily drew his magnificent sword, Old Swinger, and held it, admiring the perfect gleam from the thorough polishings he gave it every night.

The shining blade reflected the sublime form of the sultry damsel, who had brought him a cup of wine.

Gonad the Champion sheathed Old Swinger deep into his scabbard and turned to gaze upon the maid.

His flaming, magnificent eyes took in the flimsy garments that clasped her bosom like satiny hands and the two perfect pumpkins of her bum.

“O most magnificent warrior,” she stammered flirtatiously. “I have brought this cup of finest wine for you to sip upon. Please seat yourself and I shall cast myself at your magnificent feet and rub your travel-worn toes.”

“Crumb,” intoned the magnificent paragon, invoking his mysterious and ancient god, taking the cup from her pale, dainty hands which trembled with need.

“Wench, I crave no wine, nor rubbing of toes. I and mine magnificent cock do prefer baser pleasures from thee.”

The maiden gave a great cry of delight and swooned in joy. Her nubile form fell daintily at the magnificent champion’s feet.

“Crumb!” the nonpareil gave a magnificent growl of great yet gentle ferocity. He did then cast the cup of finest southern spiced wine into the fire which flared in delicious heat from the alcohol and rare spices.

This immediately blossomed, turning the room into a bower of romance and tinged the air with sultry scents of lust.

Gonad knelt in a magnificent manner and tenderly swept the maiden into his arms.
“Wake thou now, o plump and pert princess of my chamber. Wake, so that I may tenderly ravish thee with magnificent perfection.”

“Oh, excuse us!” Thorin took a step back and Bilbo plowed into him.

Ori turned, furious; he had barely gotten to the other rug and misstepped, dropping Dwalin, who he had just managed to get into his arms.

“Seriously?” Ori demanded.

“Thorin, go fuck yerself.” Dwalin ordered, as annoyed as Ori that their game of acting out the story was now spoiled by the intrusion.

“Since when do you play the maiden?” retorted Thorin. “You’re taller than Ori and me, you ought to be Gonad.”

“Yeh always had me play Gonad,” Dwalin grumbled. He sat on the floor with his arms crossed, chin stubborn and lip petulant. “As yeh always wanted t’ be carried about!”

“You’d have been ridiculous as the maiden!” objected Thorin.

“I’m a fine maiden!” Dwalin barked. “An’ Ori’s a brilliant Gonad. Ain’t our fault yeh ain’t got much of ’n imagination.”

“I’ve plenty! But I’m also practical, you’re better as Gonad.”

“All I’m sayin’ ’s I got two perfectly good pumpkins o’ an arse goin’ t’ waste!” Ori blushed as he saw Bilbo watching this exchange, obviously trying desperately not to laugh.

“I’m sorry, Bilbo. We thought everyone was asleep. With all the arrangements for the coronation, Dwalin and I haven’t—”

Bilbo snorted and linked his arm with Ori’s.

“I can’t believe I just witnessed those two arguing over who would play such a dimwit as Gonad.”

“Well,” Ori reflected with a blush, “he’s a rather magnificent dimwit.”

“They usually are,” Bilbo agreed.

“Would you like a cup of tea?” Ori offered.

Bilbo beamed at him.

“I would love one, Ori, thank you. I take it you’re going to show me the secrets of the kitchen that I missed while helping this morning.”

“Certainly,” Ori said brightly.

He led Bilbo through from the receiving room.

“This is the sitting room. We usually relax here in the evenings. It’s much cozier than the receiving room.”

Bilbo looked about in appreciation.

“I certainly agree with you. This looks to be a most comfortable room.”

“I hope you and Thorin may join us sometimes,” Ori suggested.

“Oh gracious yes,” Bilbo squeezed Ori’s arm. “Thorin and I discussed it and both of us think family time is very important. We think it will help Frodo adjust quicker. He’s having a wonderful time exploring the house with Fili and Kili.”

“They’re so funny with him,” Ori chuckled, bringing Bilbo into the quiet kitchen. “Have you and Thorin set up all your things in your suite?”

Bilbo sat at the table and gave a happy sigh.

“For the most part. Thorin wants me to have my work desk in his and Balin’s office. I’m hoping there will be room for my parents’ chairs in the sitting room. I’ve a habit of sitting in my father’s chair in the evenings.”

“Having all your things here must be helping Frodo adjust well, too.” Ori commented as he filled the kettle and popped it over the flame.

“Very much so. He’s very happy to have his own bedroom furniture and his toys restored to him. His room remained perfect for about twenty minutes before it was covered in his toys. I think Fili and Kill helped in that also. Do you want me to help you?”

“No, thank you, though,” Ori smiled and put down four mugs and found a plate.

“We keep biscuits on this shelf. Ginger, oatmeal with xocolātl chips, or pink sugar?”
Bilbo considered then grinned.
“Isn’t there a saying about variety being the spice of life?”
Ori took down the three large porcelain jars and put a handful of each kind on the plate before returning the jars to their places.
“I never realized you were so strong, Ori,” said Bilbo.
“Dori and I both are,” said Ori.
“I’m amazed at least Dori didn’t become a warrior.”
Ori imagined Dori, late for drill, running around the house, frantic, muttering, “Where’s my sword? Where’s my sword? Nori, you’d best not have hidden my sword again!”
He shrugged.
“We were from Dale, and I’m not cut out for it. Really, I only found it useful for moving heavy things to sweep under them.”
The kettle whistled and Ori made black tea. He was just setting the fat teapot down and Bilbo was putting out the big sugar bowl and a small jug of milk when Thorin and Dwalin came in.
“Here you are,” Thorin said and seated himself next to Bilbo, who was fitting the cozy over the teapot.
“Have a biscuit?” Bilbo offered.
“Thanks,” said Dwalin taking three and seating himself next to Ori.
“Did you finish your argument?” Bilbo inquired.
“What argument?” Thorin asked.
Bilbo and Ori looked at each other and giggled.

That morning, breakfast for all was made especially by Snur. He explained it was a traditional breakfast of Ered Luin Ori surmised as he ate that it was wads of very eggy bread dough, deep fried and topped with whatever you happened to want.
Jani’s eyes lit up the moment she entered the room.
“Are those mullis?”
Snur grinned.
“Smells like home, don’t it.”
Bifur entered after her, speaking animatedly in inglishmek, “Tell me we have granulated honey!”
Dori sniffed, placing a large bowl of fruit salad on the table.
“Of course we do! What do you take us for? Orcs?”
Ori topped his first piece with bacon and maple syrup. He thought, as he finished this one and reach for another, that his decision had been excellent. This time he was going to have marmalade and the fruit salad.
Fili, Kili, Sigrid, and Tauriel were silently filing their faces. The Groinuls were not far behind.
“I haven’t had this since I was a badger,” said Nori, grinning. He grabbed up a piece, tore tiny shreds from it and held it up for Assault and Battery to take.
“That’s fresh out of the oil!” Dori protested.
“S’all right,” Nori said, “it’ll keep their fur shiny.”
“It’s not their fur I’m talking about! It’s yours!”
Frodo piped up, “Do dwarrow really have fur?”
Fili looked philosophically at the faunt, “Some of us do have more hair than most black bears.”
“That makes sense,” said Frodo, nodding. “It must take you forever to brush it every morning.”
Thorin said, “No, we put it up in pincurls every night before we go to bed.”
“Nuh-uh!” Frodo protested.
Bofur scooped half a pot of cloudberry jelly on his mulli.
“He’s just kiddin’, but sometimes I think it’d be a good idea.”
Ulfr and Arne arrived, Ulfr dressed for travel.
The Ironfist king said, “Mullis? Yeh’ve been cookin’ then, Chat.”
“Me last hurrah,” said Snur. “I even packed up last night so’s I’d have time this mornin’ t’ make the dough.”
“You’ll both be missed,” said Thorin.
“Ah, we’ll be back t’ visit,” said Snur. “Ya’ll get sick a’ lookin’ at us by next Durin’s Day.”
The elves, the Gondorian monarchs and the Rohan royals came in, and fell on the mullis like wolves.
“These are so good!” Aragorn enthused. “I’m never going to fit in my armor if I keep eating like a dwarf.”
Bombur entered with Erda, and he chuckled.
“There are advantages to that, you know, at least for dwarrow.”
“I get new armor?” Aragorn teased.
“No. Well, yep,” said Nori, “but ya also get t’ look like Lord Sexy Dwarf here. Good thing he got married. He nearly dropped from havin’ all those young dwarrow an’ dams chasin’ him all the time.”
Bofur sighed.
“He got Da’s great personality and Mam’s good looks. Lucky chap.”
Bombur smirked at him.
“You managed quite well, nadad mine. You got Mam’s hard head for drinking. Two pints of ale and I could light my way home by the glow of my nose.”
Bofur said, “An’ Jani didn’t do too badly, either. She coulda ended up skinny like Da’. Stead, she’s a great, strappin’ wench.”
“I’ll wench you, stonehead,” said Jani, smacking him with her fork.
Arwen tilted her head.
“You know, I feel like I missed something. I think I knew you were all family, but I didn’t see the resemblance before.”
Dis laughed. “That’s because we were all running around like headless chickens. No offense, Nori.”
“That’s alright, if I find any, I’ll just feed ‘em to me girls. They need plumpin’ up.”
Mistress Dazla came through with another large platter of mullis.
“Thank yeh for the recipe, King Snur. Our lot will just make these vanish.”
They had a merry party, but all too soon it was time for Ulfr and Snur to leave. They reluctantly left the table and went out to the courtyard where Snur’s luggage and that of the Ironfist king sat waiting to be loaded.
“Got a swan,” began Snur.
“For dinner?” asked Kili.
“Only if I wanna sleep on the front porch for the rest o’ me life. It was from Givris, askin’ when I was comin’ home.”
“You can always bribe your lovely bride with all this,” said Dis.
A cart pulled up, loaded with sacks, packages, boxes, and animals roped behind. A second wagon was piled equally high.
“What’s all this?” Snur asked. “Did your spring cleaning, eh?”
Thorin snorted.
“I don’t usually keep livestock at the back of my dresser drawer, Chat.”
Dori elbowed Thorin and took over.
“Now, Snur, dear, we know your people need things, and Thror was not… helpful. So, we have long-lasting foodstuffs, warm cloth for clothing, a male goat, several female goats, a bull and four Dale cows.”
Snur turned to Bard, who was just coming out of the house with Tilda, who had jam on her face.
“These cows your doin’, Bard?”
“Never hurts to have milk for the badgers,” said Bard. “And their cream’s the best in Arda.”
“Thank ya kindly, Bard, Thorin, Bearer and everybody else inside the bloody mountain an’ out.”
Aragorn looked around.
“Where are you warriors, Chat?”
“Eh? Don’t have any. Got t’ get around to that someday. Not such great plannin’, I think. Don’t know how I’m gonna get all that home though, mind, I’m leavin’ t’day ‘cause there’s a caravan goin’ back t’ Ered Luin. I wouldn’t look too out o’ place.”

Thorin gestured to the drivers of the carts, “Mrat and Bils are going with you, Chat, if you don’t mind. They have family to visit in Ered Luin.”

“Home grown, eh? Happy t’ have ‘em,” said Snur, nodding to the dwarrow.

They bowed their heads in respect.

Frodo ran up impulsively and hugged Snur leg.

“Bye, Idad Chat! Come back soon!”

Snur laughed and picked him up.

“I will, that’s a promise,” laughed Snur.

Ulfr’s warriors materialized from their billet in the old royal residence. They went to the stable and came out leading their ponies. Gib and Mokrah had saddled Ulfr’s pony. Ori saw Gib sneak her an apple.

Arne was quite calm and looked happy. Ulfr was a mess of nerves.

“I dunno, lad,” said the Ironfist king. “I’m thinkin’ it’s best I stay behind with yeh. Wha’ if yeh get int’ a fix an’ need help an’ I’m not there?”

Ori bit back an emphatic no. Arne did not look ruffled at all.

“Da,” he said, “I had no idea you were interested in scholarship. Did you want to come to work with me in the library? I’m sure you’ll love to while away the hours with the books and scrolls.”

Ulfr opened his mouth, closed it, and said, “Mebbe not. Yer among fast friends here. Just promise me yeh’ll mind yer company.”

“I will, Da,” Arne promised, embracing him, to Ulfr’s startlement. “Tell Mam I’ll be home by the first snowfall.”

“Er…. righ’.”

Thorin hugged Ulfr as well.

“Thank you for coming all this way.”

“Wouldn’t t’ missed it.”

Bilbo came forward, offering the first of two boxes.

“This is for your queen,” said Bilbo, “with our compliments.”

Ulfr opened the box, which revealed a dazzling assortment of jewelry, mainly emeralds in gold.

Ori was aware from speaking to Arne that stones for actual ornament were rare in Ulfr’s kingdom. Minerals had to work, just like everything else.

“Mahal’s hairy behind!” Ulfr cried. “Aw, she’ll like this. Thank yeh!”

Thorin handed him the second box, which he opened to reveal… rocks.

Ulfr’s eyes got very big.

“What are these?”

“We don’t actually know,” said Thorin. “We think they may be a byproduct of mining, or they may just be something so rare we’ve never seen them before. We figured you’d enjoy finding out.”

The gleam in Ulfr’s eye was nearly incandescent. Ori honestly thought Ulfr was going to put them in his mouth, he looked that ravenous. Then Ulfr seemed to come back to his senses, his eyes shooting around at the men and elves.

“Thank yeh, me king! I will send a full assay when I’ve figured ‘em out!”

They watched Ulfr ride off with his soldiers and Snur.

Thorin said, “Well done, Arne.”

Arne heave a huge sigh of relief and grinned.

“Thank y-y-you, idad.”

“Of course, he doesn’t realize he’s carrying something quite incendiary,” said Thorin.

“Dori’s and Lady Klakuna’s letters to your mother.”

“Ooo,” said Arne, grinning.

“There’s cake, too,” said Bilbo. “At least, he’ll have something to eat in exile.”

“Wh-what’s in those l-letters?” Arne asked.
Dori said, “This and that. Our compliments. Telling her how proud she should be of you, and about Thorin letting people who aren’t darrow live under the mountain and marry his sister-sons. Not to mention the hobbit.”

“Last, but certainly not least,” said Bilbo. “I put in the cake recipe, too.”

Once back in the house, Balin turned to Thorin with a twinkle in his eye.
“Yer Majesty, His Highness, Prince Aewandínen has requested a formal audience with yeh.”

“With me?” Thorin responded. Bard and Thranduil exchanged glances like an old married couple, much to Ori’s amusement.

“Balin, has my son offended?” Thranduil’s tone had quickened in concern.
Balin chuckled, “Nah, laddie. He’s very serious an’ wants t’ put forth a pr’posal.”
The three kings all looked at each other.

“When?” Thorin asked.
“He’s waitin’ in th’ throne room corridor, lad.”
Thorin shrugged and went through the sitting room door and into what Kili and Fili referred to as Bag-End East. Everyone overheard the faint conversation.

“Bilbo! Ghivashel, where’s my crown?”
“You’re wearing it, dear.”
“No, the fancy one.”
“On your dresser, dear.”
“I’m looking, it’s not there.”
There was a patter of feet, then,
“Oh, you great silly dwarf, that’s my dresser. Yours is on the other side, remember?”
“Sorry, my ghivashel.”
“Off you go and be kingly.”
Thorin reappeared, putting the raven circlet on his head. He looked up as Bard and Thranduil regarded him with matching grins.

“What?”
“Shall I go and be kingly with you?” Bard asked, lightly. Thranduil made a noise suspiciously like a suppressed snort.

“That or go bugger yourselves.”
Thorin, Dwalin in his wake, swept out, calling for Balin and Ori to accompany him.

“Well, here’s my first kingly quandary,” said Thorin.
He looked up at the throne, the only thing on the dais besides Ori’s desk.

“Maybe we should both stand?” Bard suggested.
“Considering how long he’ll probably talk? Remember, Thranduil is his father.”
“Take it easy, sit down and shove over.”
“And where am I to sit?” asked Thranduil archly. “I may be the father of the petitioner, but as a king, I deserve a place of decent vantage.”

“Shall we get you some popped corn to eat while you watch?” Thorin teased.
“Go on, then,” snarked Thranduil. His eyes lit up at whatever was going on in his head, then,
“Oh, and never mind a chair.”
He perched on Bard’s knee. Bard ‘eeped’, but otherwise said nothing.
Thranduil blinked down at Bard and Bard turned to Thorin.

“Maybe not my best decision.”
“Too late to back out now. Good thing the throne’s made of granite.”
Ori went to his desk and readied his pens and paper. He glanced at Dwalin, who winked then rolled his eyes. Ori smiled. His husband looked very fine, standing at relaxed attention leaning on his war hammer, Grasper and Keeper on his back but the hoods removed. The axes sparkled in the light drifting down.
The door at the entryway were opened by the two guards there.
Balin escorted Aewandínen in and up the aisle, followed by a small but very assorted group of men of different sexes, ages and sizes, and a dwarrow, but all wearing white cloths over their heads.

“Oh, dear,” said Ori at a whisper.

“Eru help me,” Bard breathed. “It’s not masquerade season yet!”

“I think they look quite well,” murmured Thranduil serenely.

Thorin nodded regally and beckoned the elf prince onto the dais.

“Prince Aewandínen, you are most welcome. Please let us hear your proposal.”

“King Thorin, King Bard, Ada.” Aewandínen bowed low then continued. “As you know, I have been treating the sad infestation that has swept through the heads of Dale.”

Ori thought this made it sound like each citizen had a small windstorm blowing through their skull. He ruthlessly quashed this thought, because now he was desperate to draw it.

“In light of this situation, I propose a long-term solution and an opportunity which may benefit not only the city, but the mountain and also prove lucrative in bringing outsiders to our valley. I propose to build a Palace of Beauty and Healing in the center of Dale.”

He paused, apparently waiting for either wild cheering or censure, but since neither was forthcoming, he continued.

“I understand there will soon be hot and cold running water in the city, and that there are natural mineral springs long covered over as well. Since the building which covered the springs are now rubble, and the largest spring is in the vicinity of the house of King Bard, this would be the ideal location for my proposed palace.”

Bard frowned.

“You’re already researched all of this? Since you ran off the other day to soak heads?”

“I find I have a great deal of energy all of a sudden. I have met and spoken to almost everyone in town while treating them. This included quite elderly men and dwarrow.”

Thorin leaned forward.

“Prince Aewandínen, I meant to ask you about that. You actually went into dwarrow homes and touched people’s hair and beards? If this is so, I’m not sure why you’re still alive.”

“Oh, I explained why I was there before I touched the hair on their heads, and only with permission, your majesty,” said Aewandínen. “For the beards, I simply left some product for them to delouse themselves. I am a bit of an… airhead at times, but I do have some sense of self-preservation. The men have far less scruples, and were dealt with rapidly, whether they were conscious or not.”

Bard sighed.

“You’re still lucky you weren’t killed. They aren’t as picky, but you still broke into their houses.”

“Most of them were still drunk or very hungover,” Aewandínen mused. “Either way, they weren’t moving at any speed, and to the ones who were conscious and mentally present, I explained myself to in short, rapid sentences. By the end, I had my explanation down to about ten seconds in length.

“But cultural taboos are, in fact, a reason I’ve asked for this audience.”

Thorin said, “You want to be exempt from the hair and beard taboo? That’s not something I can grant you.”

“Well, no, actually I doubt a dwarf who strictly held to tradition would so much as grunt in my direction. I’m assuming someone who voluntarily submits their hair to my ministrations is less observant and less likely to gut me at first sight.”

Thranduil coughed.

“My son, to whom have you been speaking?”

“Master Dubb, who was so kind as to escort me from house to house. He kept shouting miscellaneous facts and advice, as well as obscenities, at me as we ran about. Very good sort, I was sorry to lose his company.”

“Ah,” said Thranduil. “Please go on.”

Ori peeked at Dwalin who was frowning, but Ori knew he was trying not to laugh.

“Dwarrow hair is quite different from the hair of men and elves. It lends itself to all kinds of styling, as you know. Some of this styling does include braids that do not have social or spiritual consequence. Queen Hild herself often sports a style of braids that, while particular to the Blacklocks, is worn simply because their hair texture allows for it.

“Also, I know there is a guild for such things, so putting in common and cosmetic braids isn’t always restricted to family members. I can offer employment to guild members, if they are interested, and then it would be dwarrow doing dwarrow braiding. Would you care to see some of my work?”

“Please,” said Thorin.

“Ah, yes.” Aewandínen turned to a fine looking Dale matron. Aewandínen nodded, She stepped forward and removed the cloth covering her head. Ori could only describe the look of her lovely auburn hair as a tall dome.

“Here we have what I have decided to name the ‘beehive,’” Aewandínen stated proudly. “It is an updo and understated as fitting to her station but still shows her beautiful hair to advantage and is tightly wrapped to allow for hair jewelry.”

The lady smiled and turned politely around to display a fetchingly tied bow that matched her dress.
She then walked back to her place. A young man child bounced up, grinning.

Aewandínen smiled and lifted a finger to stop the child snatching his cloth off.

“This poor innocent was badly infested on both sides of his head, thus he had to have that hair shaved and I have treated it with a healing lotion. The remaining hair was dyed for his amusement, while his scalp heals.” Aewandínen nodded and the lad tore off the cloth and looked delightedly at the three kings. Ori swallowed carefully. The lad had obvious sores that were healing, but there was a strip of hair from his forehead to the nape of his neck. Aewandínen had dyed this in sections all different colors, then teased and pomaded the hair to stand on end.

“I call this the ‘pony-crest’ cut.”

Ori risked a look at the kings. Thranduil was biting his lower lip. Thorin sat frowning with a hand clamped thoughtfully to his mouth. Bard made a noise that he turned into a clearing of his throat.

“You like it?” he asked the child.

“It’s great,” the lad agree loudly and ruffled it, mixing all the colors. “Am I done?” he asked Aewandínen. The prince nodded and the lad bounced back to his spot.

A young lady stepped forward. Ori remembered seeing her. She had been teased by young swains for not having lovely hair, as hers was very thin and lank. Aewandínen beckoned her forward and she skipped up with a blush and removed the cloth.

Ori stared. Her hair had been somehow brushed out, teased and the ends about her face cut short, so it feathered back from her face.

“I call this the ‘wings aloft’. Her hair was very thin but, as you see form the washing and the cut, it is now full of body and bounce.”

The maiden giggled, blushed and murmured, “Thank you so much, Mister Wandi.”

She spun lightly round to regain her place. Ori clenched his teeth, forcing himself not to make a sound. The feathering ended at the back of her head made a perfect part….making the back of her head look like a butt.

The next person on show was another, slightly older, Dale lad. He had also been afflicted but only had two hanks of hair on in the top of his head and the other between the nape of his neck and his left ear. Aewandínen had treated his scalp and dyed both hanks raven black before twisting them out into points.

“This points up and down, thus earth to the sky. I call it the ‘astral’.”

This was admired and once again Bard asked the child if he liked it

“You bet,” the lad piped up. “Mr. Wandi glopped some stiffening stuff on them I poked my brother in the tummy! He yelled. It was great!”

Dwalin grunted and bowed his head to scratch his nose. Bard twitched, Thranduil had to check on something behind the throne for a moment, and Thorin had a small fit of coughing. The lad went back to his place and Aewandínen excitedly gestured to the last person. This was an elderly dwarf fellow. His cloth looked to be almost the size of a tablecloth. He marched up perfectly stone-faced, but his eyes were twinkling with humor.

“And now,” cried Aewandínén. “My masterpiece! This dear dwarf had no affliction but was happy for me to experiment with his hair.”

Ori saw Dwalin give the elderly fellow a grin. The dwarf nodded.

“Nardix, son a’ Fardix at yer service,” rumbled Nardix. “Rope makin’ is me craft, I’ve always had me beard an’ hair braided up. Now I’m a pensioner, I figured, with a new king, might as well do sumfin’ differen’.”

“Thank you,” Thorin said rather dryly but he was obviously quite intrigued. Aewandínén pulled off the cloth with a flourish.

“I give you, the Wire Sphere!”

The dwarf’s salt and pepper, red-streaked hair stood completely loose and brushed on-end; it was now as long as he was tall. Master Nardix had the perfect dwarf hair: thick and coarse, and Ori saw the decades of wearing braids had rendered it ridged from scalp to end. His beard was also brushed out, resting on his stomach, leveling upward and outward, making a neat shelf of about three feet long from his chin.

“Fuck” admired Dwalin.

“That,” said Thorin, “is amazing. In fact, I’m quite envious. The direct line of Durin can claim occasional waves, even curls, but that is every dwarf’s dream.”

The rope maker bowed, his hair bobbing all around him like a gale tossing the leafy branches of trees.

“Thank yeh, yer majesty. Only thing I got t’ watch fer now is no’ torchin’ it in th’ pub lanterns.”

“So you see,” said Aewandínén, “there is the fashion side of the styling and cutting of hair and the medicinal side of my work with hair. The different cuts for the people afflicted compliment their faces and this way their scalps can heal, and I have lotions for that.

“In addition, I have also seen that not every house in Dale has a bath, and I wish to offer that as well, for a few coppers for simple cleanliness, up to a gold piece for perfumed and salted waters and a scalp massage.

“The hands, and particularly feet, I have seen in Dale are not in good conditions. I have found a disturbing array of er… vegetation between many sets of toes. Feet are important. How does one carry oneself day after day? Not on one’s hands, but on one’s feet.

“The three kings looked at each other. Bard gave Thorin a nod.

“Aye, yer majesty,” Balin replied smoothly. Aewandínén beamed and his helpers cheered excitedly.

“I assume,” said Thorin, “that you can work out the planning details with King Bard?”

“Yes, King Thorin. I would be quite honored to work with King Bard.”

Bard looked surprised and glanced around as if though might be someone else there named Bard to whom the prince referred.

“Oh, aye. Mister Wandi gave me a special kind a’ brush t’ use on it. Th’ hair wants t’ stick out anyway. This just keeps th’ tangles out. I still got me braids.” He lifted his hair to show them hanging behind his ear. “They’re just hidin’ out.”

The rope maker bowed, his hair bobbing all around him like a gale tossing the leafy branches of trees.

“Thank yeh, yer majesty. Only thing I got t’ watch fer now is no’ torchin’ it in th’ pub lanterns.”

“And, this is a style you can maintain?”

“Thank you,” Thorin said rather dryly but he was obviously quite intrigued. Aewandínén pulled off the cloth with a flourish.

“I give you, the Wire Sphere!”

The dwarf’s salt and pepper, red-streaked hair stood completely loose and brushed on-end; it was now as long as he was tall. Master Nardix had the perfect dwarf hair: thick and coarse, and Ori saw the decades of wearing braids had rendered it ridged from scalp to end. His beard was also brushed out, resting on his stomach, leveling upward and outward, making a neat shelf of about three feet long from his chin.

“Fuck” admired Dwalin.

“That,” said Thorin, “is amazing. In fact, I’m quite envious. The direct line of Durin can claim occasional waves, even curls, but that is every dwarf’s dream.”

The rope maker bowed, his hair bobbing all around him like a gale tossing the leafy branches of trees.

“Thank yeh, yer majesty. Only thing I got t’ watch fer now is no’ torchin’ it in th’ pub lanterns.”

“And, this is a style you can maintain?”

“Oh, aye. Mister Wandi gave me a special kind a’ brush t’ use on it. Th’ hair wants t’ stick out anyway. This just keeps th’ tangles out. I still got me braids.” He lifted his hair to show them hanging behind his ear. “They’re just hidin’ out.”

The dwarf marched back to his place.

“So you see,” said Aewandínén, “there is the fashion side of the styling and cutting of hair and the medicinal side of my work with hair. The different cuts for the people afflicted compliment their faces and this way their scalps can heal, and I have lotions for that.

“In addition, I have also seen that not every house in Dale has a bath, and I wish to offer that as well, for a few coppers for simple cleanliness, up to a gold piece for perfumed and salted waters and a scalp massage.

“The hands, and particularly feet, I have seen in Dale are not in good conditions. I have found a disturbing array of er… vegetation between many sets of toes. Feet are important. How does one carry oneself day after day? Not on one’s hands, but on one’s feet.

“The three kings looked at each other. Bard gave Thorin a nod.

“Aye, yer majesty,” Balin replied smoothly. Aewandínén beamed and his helpers cheered excitedly.

“I assume,” said Thorin, “that you can work out the planning details with King Bard?”

“Yes, King Thorin. I would be quite honored to work with King Bard.”

Bard looked surprised and glanced around as if though might be someone else there named Bard to whom the prince referred.

“Uh, yes,” said Bard. “I look forward to it. Thank you.”

“There’s just one more thing,” said Aewandínén. “Ada, have you seen my brother?”

“Why? asked Thranduil.

“I need to apologize to him.”

“For what?”

“Everthing.”
“Your very existence?”
“Yes. Ada, this entire visit has been an uplifting, eye-opening… existential experience for me. I am a new elf! Thank you for bringing me, Ada. Thank you!”

He rushed up the stairs, grasped his father, and sobbed all over him, startling Thranduil and squashing Bard. Amazed, Thorin glanced over at Ori. Ori shrugged helplessly and continued to write at speed.

“There now, my son,” said Thranduil, patting his back. “Am I to take it that, like your ada, you’ve come into your own since you removed that stick from your arse?”

“Yeeh-eeh-eehs,” sobbed the prince.

A moment later Aewandínen arose and stared about him in an aura of pleasure.

“Forgive me, Ada,” he said, “but I must do this.”

Thranduil merely smiled and waited for whatever explosion his eldest would bring forth next.

“King Thorin! King Bard! To prove my earnest desire to change to both of you, your peoples, and all of mine, I hereby renounce the name of Prince Aewandínen and all claims to the Woodlands of my father. I am now a mere peasant, who shall heal and beautify all who come to me. I shall be known only as Mister Wandi.”

Mister Wandi’s helpers cheered again and gave him a round of applause.

“If you aren’t a prince, where are you going to get the money to do all this?” Bard asked.

Thranduil said, “His renounced inheritance will go toward it. I think such broad thinking deserves a little largesse.”

The elf king rose and looked down at his son.

“You may have renounced your title, but I am still proud of you… Wandi.”

Mister Wandi looked startled. He recalled himself a moment later and added.

“I must speak to Master Gimli as well!”

“Must you?”

“Yes! I want him to find me a dog! I will call it ‘Friend’!” He giggled. “Then I shall never be melancholy again!”

“Is ‘e drunk, yeh think?” Balin asked.

Thranduil said, “I think it’s from inhaling hair care product.”
Acquirements, Applications of training, and Adoption

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Well, we get to some friendly interactions between the rulers still in Erebor and Ori has an adventure…of a sort. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori stepped down from the dais, his notes in his satchel. Dwalin came to his side and put an arm about his shoulders.

“That was …weird,” Ori decided as he watched Aewan- Mister Wandi traipsing out with his helpers, all congratulating him.

“T’ say th’ leas’. Yeh wan’ t’ come with us t’ th’ armory practice ring after lunch?”

“Yes!” Ori replied eagerly. “Are you going to demonstrate with your little badger warriors?” Dwalin laughed.

“Temptin’, bu’ Thorin, Aragorn an’ Arwen’re spoiling t’ try each other’s mettle. Theoden an’ Dain talked abou’ taggin’ along.”

“I’ll bring my sketching books,” Ori decided.

After a lunch of cold meats, cheeses, breads, and ale, a small group consisting of Ori, Dwalin, Thorin, Dain, Aragorn, Arwen, Sculdis and Theoden headed to the practice ring.

Ori and Dwalin looked down into the ring, which was empty, save for two armed and armored figures, one about two feet taller than the other.

"Yeh got all tha’ reach, lad! Use it!"

"But, Master Dubb," said Ivo, "you'll just duck under it and smack me again."

"Aye, bu’ yeh needn't make it easy f'r me," Master Dubb barked. "Try it again."

Ivo had filled out a bit since Ori last saw him, gingerly guarding the entrance to the King of Dale’s new residence.

His pointed stick had given way to a sword as he crouched in ready stance and faced off the dwarf warrior with his axe.

"This looks painfully familiar," said Aragorn, stopping at the railing beside Ori. "Except, I was the shorter one. Is this standard dwarf training?"

"Nah, we usually train in squads," said Dwalin, as Ori sketched rapidly. "Master Dubb picked Ivo out a' th' soldier volunteers from Dale. Bard's a scrapper, but doesn't have a real weapon, except th' bow, which is tough t' use f'r close fightin'."

"So, this youngster is training to guard Bard's back," said Aragorn.

"Aye. Ouch! There 'e goes, knocked on 'is arse again."

"Happens a lot, does it?"

"He's gettin' be'er. He used t' be knocked down th' second 'e lifted 'is sword. A' leas’ now it takes a few minutes."

Thorin arrived at Aragorn’s side and looked down as Dubb told Ivo loudly and precisely everything the lad had done wrong this time.

"Nice to see some things don't change," said Thorin. "Though, I think Dubb might be mellowing."

"Aye," said Dwalin. "He ain't called th' lad a shalehead once."

Dwalin and Thorin chuckled.
"I get the impression," said Arwen, "that the two of you are familiar with Master Dubb's teaching methods."
"You could say that," said Thorin. "He used to be the captain of the city guard of Erebor."
"I still got scars with Dubb's name on 'em," Dwalin agreed.
Arwen said, "I thought he made rather free to abuse you at the breakfast table the other day."
Thorin shook his head.
"Dubb is nothing but loyal, and what he said was pretty typical of older warriors dressing down younger. Besides, he knew me when I was in nappies, dragging around a wooden sword which, in fact, he gave me."
Aragorn shot Thorin a wicked smile.
"There's a portrait of you so-armed somewhere in this mountain, isn't there."
"Of course there is."
"I seen it!," Dain crowed. "Aye, it's a treat."
Thorin made a face at his cousin before turning back to Aragorn. "You sound like you speak from experience."
"Alas, I've never been able to pry it out of Lord Elrond's possession."
Arwen said, "Of course not, my love. He's saving it to display at our wedding."
"Another reason to elope," Aragorn sighed.
Down in the ring, Dubb had finished brow-beating his charge and sent Ivo off to the baths. Dubb took the smoothing plane to the sand.
"Awright," he growled up at them, "yeh kin quit gigglin' like a pack a' school damlin's an' commence with th' proper mayhem."
Dwalin and Thorin chorused, "Thank you, Master Dubb."
Dubb shot them a rude gesture and took himself off, presumably to wash.
Ori and Dwalin followed the royals down to the ring. Dwalin sat beside Ori on a bench. Scudlis and Dain sat on the next one with Theoden between them.
"You're not going to spar?" Ori asked his husband.
"Nah, I got patrol t'night, so I figured I'd spend some time loafin' about with me ghivashel. 'Less I'm encroachin' on yer artistic pursuits?"
Ori nudged him in the rib with an elbow.
"No critiquing the artist at work, but I'd rather you were here, too." Dwalin leaned down and kissed him before hunkering forward, forearms resting on his knees, intent on watching the matches.
Ori turned to a fresh page and honed his graphite wand on his sandpaper block to freshen the point.
This was a very different match from Ivo's and Dubb's, though the height proportions were the same.
The two kings circled each other, looking for an opening.
Aragorn feinted right and struck left, which Thorin easily blocked. They went back to circling.
Thorin swung overhead abruptly, Aragorn parried, but even Ori could see he looked surprised.
Then, Thorin and Aragorn grinned identical, ravenous grins and the two of them attacked each other at full roar.
Their first clash nearly jarred Ori off the bench.
Dwalin chuckled.
"So, it's goin' t' be like tha', is it."
Ori focused on capturing movement. He knew there was no way to catch details. The two kings moved far too fast, Aragorn pressing his reach, his amazing speed and agility, Thorin his dwarven strength and greater experience, as they ranged across the whole of the practice ring.
Dwalin rose and barked a hold. Both combatants stopped and looked at him in inquiry.
Dwalin crossed to Thorin, Arwen in tow, and set his king in a battle stance then went to Aragorn.
"On yer knees, lad."
Aragorn blinked then, after a glance at his betrothed, knelt. Dwalin arranged him then pointed at
Thorin.
“Now lad, battle stance.”
“Like this?” Aragorn asked, his voice bordering on laughter.
“I like this stance,” Arwen giggled.
“Look,” Dwalin ordered, his inner trainer not bothering with the humor in the situation.
Aragorn looked at Thorin. He frowned then took time to look Thorin carefully over. At Dwalin’s nod, Thorin made a couple of feints.
“Elbereth,” the Gondorian king said slowly and sat back on his heels, staring at Thorin.
“Now yeh see,” Dwalin grunted. “Easier t’ understand when yer a’ our level.”
“And you’re trained to not only fight with each other but an enemy taller than you.” Aragorn rose slowly, a grin spreading across his features. “That’s why you know how our reach works.”
“Smart lad,” Dwalin allowed. “Back t’ work….yeh shaleheads!”
To Ori’s great amusement, both kings looked at Dwalin and threw him the same obscene gesture.
Dwalin made his way back to Ori. Arwen gave a shout and the two kings leapt back at each other in the fierce joy of battle.
Theoden cheered along with the Ironhills monarchs, then turned to Sculdis.
“Watching your people battle is fascinating. Captain Dwalin instructing our friend Gondor, by placing him on his knees to practice, was something I would never have thought of.”
“Like our Dwalin said, it gives him a chance t’ see thin’s an’ understand our way. Yeh men’re so tall.”
Theoden snorted.
Sculdis laughed.
“An’ orcs taller still. Make yeh men look like hobbits.”
Ori wiped the sweat out of his eyes with the back of his hand, but it kept flowing down, stinging. His eyesight blurred. He blinked, frustrated. He could hear the fighting, but he couldn’t see it to draw it. He began to lose track of time. It felt like the sun was going down, which was impossible, and then it was nearing dawn, and he felt the weight of the sword in his hand as he crouched with the others, waiting. He was terrified, and angry. Out in the fog, warriors clashed. He heard the shouts.
“Du bekar! Du bekar!”
But he knew it was hopeless. They were all going to die.
And for what?

"Ori! Ori!"
"Huh?"
Ori looked up to find Dwalin kneeling before him, hands on Ori’s shoulders.
“What is it?” Ori asked mussily. His drawing hand felt cramped. "Did I fall asleep?"
The moment he said it, he knew it was wrong. Thorin stood behind Dwalin with Aragorn and Arwen, all of them sweating, filthy and looking terribly concerned. Dain, Sculis and Theoden stood nearby, peering at him.
Thorin held Ori’s sketchpad.
Ori groaned.
"What did I draw this time? Is anybody naked?"
Aragorn and Arwen traded puzzled looks.
"No," said Thorin, handing the sketchpad over Dwalin’s shoulder.
Ori turned the page to look and froze.
There was this… thing, armed with a rough mace, bearing down in full howl, saliva flying, blood pouring down from its wounded scalp. The bared teeth looked like rows of daggers, some with points jagged and broken off.
Ori flinched. The smell of something horrid lingered in his nose and throat.
"What is this?" Ori gasped.
"That," said Thorin, "is the first orc I ever killed."
Ori didn't know what to say. Really, what could he say? I'm really glad you killed it? I'm sorry I somehow crawled into your memory and drew it?
Wait.
"This is a memory?" Ori asked.
Thorin nodded.
"I've never done that before," Ori whispered.
His mouth kept working, but no more sound came out. He felt a tear run down his cheek, and he was mortified.
Thorin sat beside him, his shoulder against Ori's.
"Don't despair," said Thorin. "It wasn't the only thing you drew."
Ori braced himself and turned back a page. He looked. Then he looked again, frowning.
"What is this?" he asked, turning the page this way and that.
"My sister as a pebble," said Thorin, "looking up King Thranduil's robes."
"That's terrible!" Ori cried.
"Not really," said Thorin. "I was thinking of having it framed and hanging it in a guest room for when he comes to visit."

Completely drained, Ori found himself carried to the bedroom, and laid down on the bed fully clothed. Dwalin took off his boots for him and then Ori felt a cool, wet cloth sweeping over his face and neck.
At least it wasn't smelling salts.
"I'm sorry, Dwalin," he murmured.
"Wha're yeh sorry f'r, love?"
"I ruined the match."
"Nah, yeh didn't. They'd finished. Tha's when we noticed yeh'd stopped drawin' an' yeh was looking' out over nothin'."
"Who won?"
"Arwen." Dwalin snickered. "Thorin knocked Aragorn on 'is arse, then Arwen knocked Thorin on 'is."
"Really?"
"When yeh think about it, she's only got a couple a' thousand years experience on 'em."
"That makes sense. Did I draw them at all? I can't remember."
"Yeh drew up a storm."
"Why did I draw Thorin's memories? Why that memory?"
Dwalin lay down beside him and gathered Ori into his arms.
"Did yeh see somethin'?"
"Yes," said Ori. "I think… I think it was Azanulbizar."
Dwalin flinched, and muttered angrily. Ori heard, "Wha’ th’ fuck, Mahal?"
"If it was Mahal's doing, what does that mean?"
"Dunno, love. We're assumin' Mahal's go' plans, but, yeh know, he's no' real chatty."
A horrible thought crossed Ori's mind and he shivered.
"Love?" Dwalin asked.
"I think… I think it was an experiment."
"T' see if yeh could do it?"
"More like making sure you prime a pump before you use it, like it was something I already had and didn't know it."
"D'ye think yeh could do it a' will?"
"No, It's not about my will at all. But, why Thorin? Why not your memories or Dori's? There's something going on here, something important, and I feel like this is just the beginning of it. Oh, Dwalin! That orc! This could be terrible."
"Mebbe, but considerin' wha' else yeh drew? Somethin' tells me th' fate a' middle earth don't rest on wha's hidin' under Thranduil's robe. Thranduil might thin' it does, a' course."
"Like, maybe Mahal was telling me it would be all right?"
This seemed correct, soothing, so Ori clung to that until he fell asleep in Dwalin's arms.

He slept until Dwalin nudged him awake, Nori-Pori curled up on Ori's stomach.
"Time f'r tea, love."
Ori's stomach growled. His last meal felt like a million years ago.
Nori-Pori registered a meow of complaint as his heated nest tilted and gently dumped him to the mattress.
Ori padded over to the wash stand and splashed water on his face. He looked up into the mirror.
He didn't look quite as out-of-it as he felt, though his hair stuck up at alarming angles. He changed his clothes and Dwalin brushed, braided and rebeaded his hair.
"There yeh go, me darlin'," said Dwalin, kissing Ori's neck.
"Mmm. Thank you. Dwalin, does everyone know what happened?"
"Nah. Thorin, t' others, an' me agreed we should keep it t' ourselves. 'Course, tha' means Dori thin's yeh fainted from overwork an' all-but- threatened Thorin's life over it, an' Thorin couldn't say a word."
Ori sighed.
Little did Dori know, it was likely Dori's own 'overflowing' that was at least partly to blame.
"Listen, love, I need t' go out on patrol after Buj's ceremony. Will yeh stick close t' Bilbo an' Thorin 'til I get back? I'll be home around midnight."
"All right, but you'll be careful, won't you?"
"Aye, an' yeh'll stay way from th' fruit wine, right?"
"Hmmm, maybe," said Ori.
They made their way to the sitting room and food. Theoden and the Ironhills monarchs were talking. That is to say, Dain was on the sofa snoring his head off, Sculdís, in his lap, with her feet on Theoden’s knee, was chatting with the horse king.
Thorin came through with Bilbo, telling him about the practice.
"Arwen knocked me on my arse!" Thorin crowed. "It was excellent! Arwen, you must show me how you did that!"
The elf woman laughed delightedly and gave her promise.
Mistress Dazla came through and headed for the receiving room. They all heard the door open.
"The shopping trip is back," Bilbo announced, chuckling. "Shall we see if the contents of every merchants store is in your receiving room?"
They headed through.
Theoden rose and Sculdís scrambled off her husband. She nudged him. Dain grunted.
"Come see th’ shopping’?" she suggested.
Dain grunted again then mumbled,
"Wake me f'r tea, me gem."
Ori and Dwalin walked through with Theoden and Sculdís.
"I don’t wish to offend, ma’am-" Theoden began.
"Sculdis, Theoden dear. We’ve sung, feasted, witnessed battle, an’ wagged. I think first names’re long overdue."
Theoden laughed and stopped to look down at her. He bowed.
"Then I shall call you ‘sister’ and, in the way of my people, I would like to offer you my arm."
"Nah, I’ve already got two," Sculdís teased, but she reached up and tucked her hand in his elbow.
Ori stifled a giggle and they walked on.
"You were saying?" Sculdís reminded Theoden.
"Your people are deadly. Perhaps, sister, you and your husband king, or you, Lo- Ori, and your husband, if Thorin might spare him, would ever care to visit my home? I would consider it a great honor if some of my soldiers could be trained. It is not such a problem now that Mordor has fallen, but there are still evil things that roam our world."
"An’ yer folk can teach us t’ ride yer great big ‘orses,” Sculdís teased.
"If you like,” Theoden smiled.
“I have talked with Theodred about your home,” Ori mused. “He described the great rolling plains and the rocky outcrops. It sounds a beautiful place.”

Theoden growled

“Too us, it is. The land will be seen as rough and wild by your people, but the steppes with the great sky above… At night, you can lie on your back and see the stars hang so close. As a child, I would often try and reach up to pluck one.” The king chuckled. “Even now, if I sleep out on the plain during travel, I still feel the urge to do so.”

With Ori’s and Sculdis’ encouragement, Theoden described his home to them. They entered the receiving room to several piles of…things and watched the shoppers come in and start talking. Mistress Dazla’s staff helped them bring in even more.

Dori and Binni looking proudly around the piles, watching the elves and Hild and Akhn.

Galdriel was in transports over something in a large box as she showed it off to Thranduil. Akhn waved an object under Celeborn’s nose, talking volubly about it. Hild stood in the middle of swaths of cloth, holding one up to herself as Dis studied it. Aris pretend to study it, too, as she lit her pipe.

Ori went to Dori and embraced them.

“I see you had a successful shopping trip?” Ori teased.

“Hello, pet. I prefer to think our merchants had a very successful day.” Dori cocked their head at Hild. “I swear that dam bought Mahrdin out of all the silk in his warehouse. I thought he was going to break into song.”

“Was Dipfa there?”

“Yes, pet, she sang but only under her breath. She requested me to send you her compliments and let you know she has had a new idea.”

Ori shuddered visibly, making Dori giggle. Sculdis joined Hild and Dis with the material and Theoden went to keep Celeborn company and stare at the weird objects Akhn kept showing them.

“Celeborn,” Dori went on, “visited every bookstall in sight. Larit had a cart to carry all the books, but had to send to the house for another and now there’s a wagon full of them. There’s another wagon for Galdriel. Deliveries have been filling both all afternoon. What you see here was what we carried back with the help of the rest of dear Mistress Dazla’s staff.”

“Mahal,” Ori intoned in a whisper.

“Akhn bought three anvils bigger than himself. And cleared out the largest metal-working tool warehouse. He was like you, pet, at your first candy stall.”

Ori giggled.

“I am wordless,” Dori continued, “over what they all did in the jewelry and gemstone merchants. Thrandy was a perfect pig over the cut clear gems.”

“Oh, Dori,” Ori choked, “What a wonderful time you must have had.”

“Binni and I made sure they didn’t miss a thing.”

“Shall I go and ask about tea?” Ori offered.

“Please do, pet, I swear I’m ready to drop.”

Ori went through to find the kitchen table was covered in trays of cups and plates, and the great kettles were heating on the stove. Larit and Oqizla were slicing cakes and Agrib was piling cut sandwiches onto platters.

Mistress Dalza entered the kitchen and smiled on Ori,

“Take it our dear Bearer is ready?”

“Yes, Mistress,” Ori grinned, sniffing appreciatively. Mistress Dazla gave him a look and passed him a small bun off one of the platters. Ori thanked her and went out, eating. The bun was still warm and the custard inside creamy and delicious. Dwalin came through to find him. Ori put the last bite of the bun into his husband’s mouth. Dwalin growled, swallowed, and grabbed Ori.

“I want t’ be yer maiden - an’ yer Gonad - soon.”

Ori snickered and kissed him.

“Since you’re here, you might as well sit down,” Mistress Dazla told them. “I’m telling our dear Bearer, tea is ready when they’re ready.”

Ori pointed at a large easy chair in the sitting room. Dwalin went and secured it, while Ori fetched his knitting. They were happily ensconced when everyone was called to tea.

The remains of the younger set, enlarged by faunts, put themselves on the rug before the fire. The animals joined them and people perched on sofas and other chairs provided. It was a little crowded, but comfortable. Ori and Dwalin were near enough to listen or take part with the younger sets’ conversations.

Bain sat close to Stonehelm with Theodred on his other side. Arne and Sigrid were talking, practicing their westron and khuzdul. Ori thought Arne was doing much better without his father’s eagle eyes on him. Sigrid tried valiantly to wrap her mouth around the harsh R’s and hard K’s of the language, patiently coached by Fili. Kili translated for Tauriel and Legolas, who were listening in and concentrating. Gimli leaned against Legolas’ back and ate treats.

Dori and Bilbo ran the conversations among the adults. This was mostly retelling of shopping adventures. Theoden and Hild spoke idly about their homes to each other. Aris asked minutely about the running of Rohan.

Ori glanced at Theodred, who was telling of a note his cousin Eowyn had sent along with an update to Theoden. Ori felt a crinkle go up his spine. Theo was obviously amused by what she had written, but there was something he wasn’t telling.

When the last cup was drunk, Thorin rose and smiled on Binni and Oin.

“Here? Or would you prefer somewhere formal or private?”

Oin got out of his chair with a grunt then offered his hand to Binni, who rose gracefully, saying,

“Here is fine, as long as no one minds,”

“I’m sure they won’t.” Thorin grinned around at his guests and asked for a little room in the middle of the group. Intrigued, everyone shuffled their seating about and waited to see what happened.

“Oin Groinul, healer of Erebor,” began Thorin. “Binni, dearest Bearer-Sib, you have been married many years and have served your king with the greatest loyalty.”

Ori thought this was quite a nice note, as it didn’t question their honor, but everyone knew they were loyal to Thorin before Thror. Thorin continued.

“You have requested that I recognize and formalize your hearts’ child as your son and heir. I am delighted and privileged. Please present him.”

Binni reached as Buj, red to his ears, rose and came forward to stand with them. Binni slid an arm about Buj’s waist and Oin dropped a large hand on Buj’s shoulder.

Thorin smiled on Buj, who was happy but somewhat embarrassed by being in front of everyone at a family gathering.

“Lord Buj,” Thorin addressed him, “Head of the Clan Rikanta and representative of the King of Beleghost in Erebor, is it my understanding that you wish to be adopted as the hearts’ child of Oin and Binni?”

“Yes, your majesty.”

“Oin, Binni hold out your clasped hands.” Thorin instructed. They did so. Thorin turned the hands upward and opened them slightly. He took Buj’s hand and placed it within their clasp.

“Lord Buj, do you honor Oin and Binni as your heart’s parents?”

“Yes, your majesty. And to show to all I do so, I shall happily bear the name Bujni in their honor.”

“I hereby recognize you, Bujni, son of Oin and Binni. You are a family of the heart and none can sunder this.”

Thorin nodded to Dori who came forward, laid his hands over the three clasped ones and murmured blessings on them.

Thorin turned to the gathering.

“My family, my friends, Oin and Binni present to you their hearts’ son, Bujni of the house of Oin and Gloin.”

The new family bowed to the assembled who clapped, cheered and offered congratulations. Dipfa blew her nose in a bright fuchsia handkerchief, obviously overcome with joy. Balin took the new little family to the table at the far end to sign the contract and all the copies.
As this delight went on, Thorin turned to Ori.
“Lord Ori, take a letter.”
Ori was about to rise to get paper but Loli passed him his waist desk. In an instant Ori had pen and paper ready.
Thorin cleared his throat and the room fell silent.
From the High King of all Dwarrow to the King of Beleghost.” Thorin announced. The room immediately fixed their attention on him.

“Frerin,
We could not oblige your request for a postponement as the bread for the feast was rising, thus we were committed. Do not allow this to cause you worry, for you were well-represented.
Please find enclosed the royal scribe’s official account of the proceedings, and also the portrait of your representative in his coronation-day finery. These are now in the hands of every dwarf monarch and courtesy copies have gone to all the known monarchs of Arda.
Also enclosed, find the document of adoption, signed today, three days after the coronation, pronouncing Lord Buj royal representative of Beleghost as the new-made scion of Lord Oin Groinul and the Bearer Binni, late of Khazad-dûm. Lord Buj has taken the name of Bujni in honor of his new parents.
Regards to your dear T’dillah.
Thorin.”

Thorin finished and, after a collective astounded gasp, the laughter started around the room.
“Cousin! You are positively shocking,” Hild crowed when she could manage speech.
“Very canny, laddie, very canny,” Ahkn agreed.
“Will he recognize this?” Arwen asked gravely.
“It doesn’t matter if he recognizes it or not. He has tried to usurp me,” Thorin told her, coolly.
“He didn’t come to the coronation to swear his loyalty. He must accept this or suffer the attendant consequences.”
Arwen nodded in agreement, as did Aragorn.
“If he does not, will you order his head?” Theoden asked as a matter of course. For an instant, Ori wondered if the horse king was considering overthrowing Frerin as a polite favor to Thorin.
“No, but if he is conquered and his head delivered to me as a sign of loyalty I will accept the new ruler.”
Ori felt a shiver go up his spine as he copied Thorin’s letter out onto the formal paper. He wondered what, if anything, Frerin would do. Rumors were flying with the ravens and they said the people of Beleghost were all but ignoring their new king and going on as they always did. There was also talk of strife in the new court.
Ori handed the letter to Thorin who re-read it, signed, then sealed it with his ring pressed hard into the prepared wax.
“Imagine if the hobbits take Beleghost from him,” Celebrom commented.
Bilbo snorted, “Really, Celebrom, hobbits aren’t interested in conquering places. It would make them late for dinner.”
Galadriel exchanged a look with Thranduil.
“If there were any Stoors left, they might have done it.”
“Maybe,” Bilbo conceded, “but unless he tries to bother the Shire, it’s likely they will ignore him. If he does try it, he will be chased away under a hail of sharp stones, and cast iron cooking utensils.”
Ori wanted to draw that, but instead looked about for Roäc. The king of the ravens swooped in and landed on Thorin’s shoulder.
“Want me to see to that letter?” The raven was all but salivating. Thorin grinned.
“I shall send you later this evening, if you like,” Galadriel offered. “You will be back before breakfast tomorrow.”
Roäc laughed and Thorin grinned.
“I do like how you think, ma’am,” Thorin told her.
“Let’s have a party!” Loli cried from where she and Omi were still hugging Bujni whether he liked it or not.  Randi, Stonehelm and Gimli were slapping his shoulders with gusto and occasionally knocking heads with him.
Bombur and Erda rose as Mistress Dazla entered.
“Azzip and fruit soda water, mistress,” Bombur announced.  “It seems we are going to have a party.”
“Oh, excellent!” Mistress Dazla looked pleased.  “I’ve wanted to experiment with that recipe and the possible toppings.  I’ll prepare th’ receiving room for a nice little supper party for you all.”
She curtsied to Dis and Dori.
“With your permissions, you shall dine in two hours.”
Bombur, Erda and Bifur went to the kitchen.
“C’mon,” Fili ordered.  The younger set and the faunts immediately carried away the tea things and tidied up.  Hild and Ahkn stared after them.  As the noise of washing up started, Dori smiled at Dis and they giggled.
“You know, it’s rather lovely that they all go off together and help.” Hild said slowly.  “I’m not sure I would trust Arivett with the dishes.  She is capable of delicacy, but such work would make her annoyed.”
Thorin seated himself once more next to Bilbo.
“It was Dis’ and my idea that the boys should learn never ask any to do something they were not prepared to do themselves.  Thror was not the finest example.  Without Mistress Dazla and her staff, the house and maybe the kingdom would grind to a halt.  Fili and Kili have had this drilled into their heads from an early age, no matter what Thror or Frerin said.”
“Now they look on it as their duty,” Dis reflected.
“And the others follow their lead,” Theoden nodded.  “And they don’t break the plates?”
“Only when they juggle them,” said Dis with a laugh.
“And who taught them to juggle?” Celeborn cocked his eye at Thorin, who shook his head and turned to stare at the Fundin brothers.  Balin attempted wide-eyed innocence, but Dwalin chuckled.
“Aye, we’re both t’ blame,” Dwalin commented.  “Our mam taught us.”
“No!” cried Dori looking admiringly at Balin.  “Did she really?”
“She liked t’ throw Fundin’s weapon’s about,” Balin related.  “He had a thing abou’ droppin’ weapons.  She’d stand there wi’ his best knives, whetstones, an’ whatever else she could find, an’ chat t’ him with them all spinnin’ abou’ in th’ air.”
Balin was encouraged to tell more stories of his and Dwalin’s youth, and a comfortable while was spent before it was time to change for dinner.  Dori assured everyone it would be quite informal.
Ori bit into a slice of azzip covered in tomato sauce, farm curds, sliced sausages, chunks of onion, and mushrooms.  Stonehelm sprawled on the sofa beside him, deep in his ale, his feet on the table, while Bain nearly matched the Ironhills prince slice for slice Dain and Sculdis sat opposite, Sculdis talking with Arwen and Galadriel.  Arwen and Sculdis spoke while Galadriel put away at least one slice of every kind available.
Ori was trying to decide which he liked best.  The hobbits were delighted with the azzip.
“Slivers o’ garlic, bell pepper, an’ goat cheese,” reflected Hamfast dreamily.
“Black and green olives,” said Bilbo.
“Nah,” said Hamfast.  “Ya need somethin’ t’ balance ‘em.”
“Perhaps more garlic in the sauce itself,” declared Bombur.  “I do have a sauce I mix with chiles.”
“What are chiles?” Bell asked.
Frodo enthused, “It’s like being on fire inside!  From your tongue all the way down to your belly!”
The younger Gamgee looked very excited, while Hamfast and Bell didn’t seem quite as inspired.
“Yes, well, ahem,” said Hamfast.  “Mebbe a little at a time.”
“Dried tomatoes and bahvlo cheese,” said Bilbo.  “With a sprinkling of basil and paprika on the “Oooooo,” said the faunts. “Yes, please!”

The elves were treated to their favorite of cheese and caramelized onions along with a basil leaf and cheese with a white sauce and another smothered in slices of fresh tomatoes and mushrooms. The hobbits enjoyed all the kinds and Theoden and Dain all but fought over the one with strips of beef, and bacon.

In the middle the fun, the front door burst open and Aewandínén - Mister Wandi, Ori corrected his brain - bounced into the room. He looked about and spotted Legolas sitting with Gimli, the Durin princes, and the rest of the younger set on the floor. To Ori’s shock, Mister Wandi flung himself across the room and enveloped his younger brother. Legolas was trapped sitting, and his confused face was on Mister Wandi’s shoulder as he was tightly clenched. The most anyone could see of Mister Wandi was his rear end as he knelt embracing his brother, yammering and sobbing on him. Gimli looked at Legolas with an unspoken question. By Legolas’ look of utter bafflement, they were equal in not having the least idea of what was going on.

Legolas finally managed to maneuver Mister Wandi to sit beside him. Ori was faintly annoyed that they conversed in Quenya, and when Legolas turned to translate to Gimli, he spoke too low for Ori to hear. Then Mister Wandi burst out in westron,

“Can you do this for me, dear Gimli? Surely you don’t want me to be melancholy!”

Gimli opened his mouth to say something cutting, but looking at the elf, the young dwarf’s face melted and Gimli grinned, showing all his teeth.

“Aye, sure, laddie. I kin get yeh a dog. In fact, I know a litter tha’s ready now. Be righ’ back.”

At that, Gimli darted out, leaving Legolas, Mister Wandi, and Thranduil staring after him. Conversation and play returned, but people kept glancing up at the door for Gimli’s return. Bard poo-pooed this, saying he had every faith in his Gimli.

About half an hour later, Gimli came back in, with his left arm tucked against his chest. He looked terribly pleased with himself.

“Here yeh are, laddie,” Gimli announced, as he crossed the room.

Mister Wandi and Legolas rose and looked down to see what Gimli was carrying. Gimli pulled Mister Wandi’s hands out and laid something small in them. Ori rose and went to see.

Mister Wandi stared down at a tiny, squarely built pup. Its body was covered in short, cream-colored fur, with its tail coiled tightly above its rump. Its black eyes glittered in its wide, flat, dark brown face. It yipped a little and licked Mister Wandi’s hands.

“Oh!” said Ori. “It’s a Dog of Dale.”

Mister Wandi cried out, transported, and buried his face in the puppy’s fur.

“My little mellon!”
Ori woke early. Dwalin was still snoring. He smiled. He vaguely remembered Dwalin sliding into bed last night and spooning against him. Ori decided to let his husband sleep as he slipped out to go and wash.

Ori arrived at the breakfast table, dressed for work. The table had a folded cloth and dishes piled on it. He could hear food being prepared in the kitchen. Larit came through.

“Good morning, sir. Tea?”

“Good morning, Miss Larit, yes, please, if it’s no trouble.”

She smiled and bobbed back into the kitchen. A moment later, Mistress Dazla arrived with a large, steaming mug.

“Good morning, young sir. If you’d like to step out on the patio, I’ll send someone through to set the table.”

Ori grinned at her.

“I can do it for you. How many places?”

She eyed him.

“We’ll do it together.”

In no time the table was done, Mistress Dazla thanked him and left him to sit down and put his face in his tea. He sat back, enjoying the line of heat as the tea threaded down and warmed his belly. He pulled out his sketch book and went through the pictures from the past few days. Looking critically at them, he noted his style was improving. Miss Oqizla came in and smiled.

“Good morning, sir.”

“Good morning, Miss Oqizla.”

“We shall be serving once our Honored Bearer comes through.”

“That’s fine,” Ori grinned. “I may open the doors to the patio. It looks like it’s going to be a beautiful day.”

“It does look that way, sir,” she agreed, opening them before he could stir. “Sip, your pony’s coming to see you.”

“Oh,” Ori got up quickly. “I’ll go and tend to her. I don’t think I’d be popular with Mistress Dazla or Dori, if she trotted in here.”

He went out, taking his tea, and grabbing an apple from a bowl of fruit on the sideboard, leaving Miss Oqizla to giggle and return to the kitchen.

Honda nickered happily, her hooves sounding on the patio stone as they met. Ori held the apple for her and nuzzled her neck as she ate.

“I’m sorry you must stay out here. I know how you like trotting through hallways. Maybe one day, when everyone’s out, I’ll bring you in to see.”

He looked around and counted the windows. With his hand on her mane, Ori went down the walls and peeped in at a far one. He saw Dwalin still asleep on their bed.

He patted the window sill. Honda thrust her head through and snuffled.

“That’s where I sleep,” Ori told her. She withdrew her head and nodded wisely. Garnet flew out and landed on Ori's shoulder. She tweaked his ear.

"Want me to wake him?" she asked.

Ori shook his head, "No, he was up late."

He made his way back to the patio, his boots shining with dew. A thunder of hooves came from the far end of the meadow. Harley and Minty were having a race. Honda's ears perked and, with another nudge to Ori, she galloped off to play.

Ori re-entered the breakfast parlor just as Dori swished through the door, immaculately dressed in light brown embroidered with gold.

"Pet, how early you are! What were you doing outside?"

Ori crossed the room and gave Dori a kiss on the cheek.

"Talking to Honda. I have work today and people are leaving, too. I wanted to be up early enough to say goodbye."

"Well, seeing as it will be the Blacklocks, the Lorien peoples, the Gondorian party and the Rohan, I think you’ve certainly over estimated their early-rising abilities."

Dori went to her usually chair and drew Ori to sit beside her.

"Where's our deary?"

"Still asleep. He was in Dale until late on patrol."

Seated against his husband's shoulder, watching Frodo and the Gamgees partake of breakfast, Ori had expected it would only be immediate family when Roäc returned, but just as Roäc arrived, in triumph, Lady Galadriel glided in. She kissed Arwen's cheek and patted Aragorn's shoulder.

"Ah, there you are, King Roäc," Galadriel looked up, smiling as the raven alit on Thorin's shoulder. "I hope all went well with King Ass—er... I mean, King Frerin?"

"I gave him the note," said Roäc, looking as pleased with himself as a raven could and taking the bacon Thorin offered. "He read it, turned purple, yelled at me. I called him an asshat and flew away. It was fun!"

This brought snickering from the Durins, the Groinuls, the Urs and the Gondorians.

"Excellent!" Galadriel cried. "Is that bacon?"

"My dear," said Celeborn, entering the room, not nearly as awake as his wife, "every day you become a little more... dwarfy."

"Thank you, dear!" said Galadriel. "I've been long and skinny for too many ages. I wish to be stout and sexy like dear Dori, or Margr and Vi. They have so much fun!"

Arwen swallowed a squeak and Aragorn stared fixedly at the tea pot, his mouth clamped shut. Celeborn smiled a crooked smile as he sat and said, half to himself, "There'd be more of you to love."

Bell cocked a look at the elf lady as though she would take on the challenge of making Galadriel fat.

"I was just thinking that," remarked Tharkûn, seating himself. Ori wondered where in Arda he had popped up from.

Celeborn helped himself to a roll and threw it at Tharkûn, knocking off the wizard's hat.

Fili and Kili cheered.

Frodo said, "Wow! He's a good shot!"

The faunts all 'hurrah'd' for good measure.

"Oh, yes he is," sighed Galadriel, gazing lovingly on her husband, whose expression was a mix of horror and pride.

Tharkûn picked up his hat, put it back on his head and growled, "Not in front of the dwarrow."

Kili yelled, "Hurray for Idad... Other-Elf!"

"Hurray!" cried Frodo and Fili.

Celeborn stared at his teacup, muttering, "Idad Other-Elf?"

He looked up at the young princes and said, "I suppose it's too late to get you to call me by my name?"

"Yep," said Frodo.
“Yep,” echoed Sam in frowning agreement.
Kili said, “Wait! What are we going to call Lord Elrond?”
“Yeh kin take a page from Chat’s book an’ call him Uncle Rhonda,” Balin suggested.
“Brilliant!” Fili shouted.
Thorin looked at Bilbo and said, “One dwarf’s family.”
Celeborn mused, “I suppose it’s better than ‘Uncle Kelli’.”
“Why would we call your raphcuctus bird ‘uncle’?” Kili asked.
Celeborn sighed.
“I’m going to stop talking now.”
Galadriel put her head on Celeborn shoulder and giggled.
“Try some bacon,” she said. “It’ll put hair on your chest.”
His eyes twinkled.
“Trying to fatten me up, too.”
“Imagine,” said Galadriel, “at whatever age we decide to go back to the Undying Lands, we’ll be the only fat elves in the entire world. And you might have a beard! And so might I!”
“Celebrian will be startled.”
“And envious, I’m sure,” Galadriel smiled and buttered a roll for her husband as he helped himself to bacon.
Balin gazed at Galadriel appraisingly. “Sapphires an’ starlight gems.”
“For what, Lord Balin?” she asked.
“Yer beard.”
Celeborn turned and looked his wife over with a teasing smile.
“You are quite right, Lord Balin, “ he agreed. “Starlight and sapphires would be perfect.”
Hild and Aris arrived at the table with Ahkn in tow.
“Any bacon left?” Aris asked.
“Just bringing more out, your generalship,” announced Mistress Dazla bringing a loaded platter.
“Lord Celeborn’s taken the last off the plate.”
Aris clapped Celeborn on the shoulder in passing.
“Good lad, put hair on yer chest.”
Celeborn looked up at her, but, unfortunately for him, his mouth was full.
Galadriel asked Aris, “Were you listening at the door?”
“No, milady. Why d’yeh ask?”
“Just wondering.”
“Well, Bearer,” said Hild, “we’re sorry to be leaving you and your wonderful table, but we can’t leave Arivett in charge forever. She might get to liking it far too much, and I still have most of my arms and armor in the store room.”
“We’d make yeh some more,” Aris commented, helping herself to bacon.
“I’d pout, and you hate it when I pout.” Hild’s lower lip plumped but her eyes twinkled merrily at her wife.
“Th’ poutin’, not so much,” Aris said, her eyes on her plate. “Th’ gettin’ stuff chucked at me head I could do without.”
“I never aim,” Hild replied with great dignity.
“No? I got a dozen dents in me skull tha’ say yer a lucky shot, then.”
“That’s why I live in my own kingdom,” Ahkn observed to Balin. “Please pass the cloudberry jam.”
“He never gets involved when we bicker,” Hild explained to Arwen and Gridr, who giggled.
“I’m far too old and far too wise for that shit,” reflected Ahkn.
“Your judgement is excellent,” said Celeborn.
“Thank you. It wasn’t achieved without a great deal of suffering.”
Hild stuck her tongue out at Ahkn. Ori sat up in surprise. He would have to draw that as soon as possible or he’d never believe she’d done it.
The Blacklock queen turned to Thorin.
“We are very sorry to take our leave, Thorin. I won’t ask if you’re sorry we’re taking our leave as I like to believe you’ll be just desolated without us.”
“II will,” stated Thorin. “But, no doubt Margr and Vi will come by for tea soon and soothe my pain and loneliness. Not to mention make sure I’m not oppressed with the silence.”
“Ouch!” laughed Bilbo. “Don’t you like the Steam Alley sisters?”
Thorin chuckled.
“I love them, as a matter of fact, but a little love goes a long way.”
“You’re going to love living with hobbits, then,” said Bilbo dryly.
“What’s not to love?” Thorin asked.
“Show up at my tea table with dirty fingernails and you’ll find out.”
As Celeborn finished his second bacon-filled, buttered roll, Galadriel smiled sadly and said, “Alas, we must also be on our way. I do feel we’ll all be together again soon, though. That’s not a premonition, by the way, that’s a threat.”
“Excellent!” said Gloin. “I never mind bein’ threatened by a pretty dam… er… elf.”
Oin turned to Binni.
“How does she want us to fret?”
“Hush, you. Drink your tea.”
Theoden and Theodred came in, dressed for travel.
“Oh, everyone’s here,” Theoden looked around. “Have we missed anything?”
“Roäc called my brother Frerin an asshat,” Thorin reported, idly buttering a slice of toast.
“Celeborn attacked Tharkûn’s hat with a roll. My sister sons now refer to Lord Celeborn as ‘Idad Other-Elf’ and we know more about the origins of the dents on Aris’ skull than we could ever wish.”
Theoden looked impressed.
“I apologize for my lateness. Theo, take that as a lesson in being prompt.”
“Yes, Da.”
Theoden turned and looked at his son, surprised.
“What did you just call me?”
“Da. Short for adad. You told me I should get to know the culture.”
Theoden rolled his eyes and sat, while Dori poured his tea.
“We love sharing,” Dori soothed, patting Theoden’s arm. “Have some breakfast.”
“Oh, yes,” Thorin went on, around a bite. “Lady Galadriel and Lord Celeborn have announced their new ambition. They are going to become fat and bearded like dwarrow.”
Theoden looked at the two elves while controlling his features.
“My felicitations,” he said, bowing with great solemnity.
Kili and Fili insisted Theodred sit between them for one last meal. The trio looked quite glum, Ori thought. Really, they had all known each other less than a week, but had grown very used to having one another around. Writing letters probably wouldn’t be enough.
Eggr flew in from the doors and landed in front of Ori.
“Hello,” Ori greeted the raven. “Is Master Brur ready for me to be at work?”
“No,” Eggr replied, pecking at the bacon rind Ori put in front of him. “He says take another two days, he’s getting a project ready for you.”
“Ah.” Ori wondered what this project could be. A shiver of excitement went up his spine.
Dis and Jani entered, with Thranduil not far behind. Ori noticed, to his amusement, Thranduil’s swagger had acquired a dwarfish edge - and Thranduil himself had acquired Bard, whose pace was slightly less harried as he followed, eyes on Thranduil’s swaying hips.
They sat. Dori poured tea. Jani, Bard and Thranduil chatted amiably with the others at table.
Dis frowned at her bacon.
Roäc peered at her, then the bacon, then back at her.
“You gonna eat that?”
Dis looked up at Kili with a dangerous expression.
“When were you going to tell me you were married?”
Kili, with his mouth full, stared back at his mother with bulging eyes.
Thorin sighed.
“Namad, your timing is impeccable.”

Celeborn and Galadriel exchanged glances of dismay.

Kili took his time swallowing, then replied with a succinct and pithy, “Huh?”
“I presume,” Dis said, coldly, “that since you’re sleeping with Captain Tauriel, you must know you are now married to her.”

“Only in the way of the elves,” said Kili, nodding and refilling his mouth.

“Did you even speak about what this means, O Prince of Erebor?” Dis asked.

Jani glanced at her, began to talk, then erred on the side of breakfast.

Kili said around a mouthful of eggs, “It means a lot of things, actually.”

“You mean, you actually gave this some thought?”

Kili sighed and put down his fork. He and Tauriel exchanged looks.

“It means, Amad, that we have a formal relationship with the greenwood. Tauriel is King Thranduil’s foster daughter. It also means she’s given up her immortality for me. Also, if we have badgers, they’ll probably look like hobbits.”

Thorin muttered to himself, “Not a bad thing.”

Bilbo raised his eyes from his tea, “I had no idea Yavanna had such a sense of humor.”

Dis gaped at her younger son.

“You actually gave this some thought?” She was blatantly shocked.

“Yes,” Kili went on. “Besides, she’s my One. It’s not like I’m going against the will of Mahal.”

Celeborn cleared his throat.

“However, it doesn’t follow that you will be together forever. Dwarrow go to Mahal. Elves, should they die, dwell in the house of Eru. Look at Beren and Luthien, parted forever.”

Ori felt an irritation at the back of his mind, and suddenly the irritation said, “Tha’s a load o’ pony shit. Dead people ain’t filed away in boxes accordin’ t’ type. We ain’t gradin’ marble here.”

“Er…”

He looked at Dwalin in distress.

“Wha’s happened, love?”

“I need to say it word for word, but I may die of embarrassment.”

Mahal snorted.

“I’ll wait supper f’r yeh.”

Ori sighed.

He looked at Celeborn directly and spoke Mahal’s truth word for word, minus the warrior accent because, honestly, that would just be too weird.

Celeborn looked stricken, while Galadriel snickered into her hand and finally said,

“My dear Ori, you have just overthrown a major tenet of the spiritual life of middle earth.”

“Yer welcome,” said Mahal grumpily.

“Mahal says you’re welcome,” piped Ori.

Theoden wiped his mouth and said, “Do you actually talk to Mahal?”

Thorin shrugged.

“We all talk to Mahal. It so happens Mahal talks to Ori. It’s not always clear information. We don’t want people consulting Ori about what color tunic Mahal says they should wear today.”

Theoden nodded.

“Understood.”

This decided, Kili continued detailing his case to Dis.

“I figured we could do the fancy dwarf marriage thing later, since elves are - y’know - really - informal about this sort of thing.”

“That does not excuse the fact that you didn’t ask for permission to marry,” said Dis.

“Neither did you,” Thorin reminded his sister, with a look of pure mischief.

“That was different!” Dis growled. “Udad would never permit me to marry a blacksmith, even if he was my One!”

“So, you would give me permission because Tauriel isn’t a blacksmith?” Kili asked.
“Yes - I mean, no!” Dis replied.
Fili practically levitated from his seat with excitement.
“Brother!  You confused Amad!  I’m so proud!”
He lunged for his brother, knocking himself, Kili and Theodred to the floor in a heap, shouting and laughing.
Tauriel observed this serenely and turned to Dis.
“I am very well aware our marriage will present certain… challenges, Princess Dis.  Some of them will even involve our species.”
“An elf and a dwarf,” mused Dis, shaking her head.
Thranduil peered over at Tauriel.
“You didn’t ask for permission, either.”
“It’s not usually required, my king.”
“I know,” said Thranduil, “I’m just trying on parental menace for size.”
Ori noticed that Sigrid and Bain were whispering to Tilda, whose eyes were the size of saucers.
They exchanged grins and Bain turned to his father.
“Da?”
“Hmmmmm?” Bard was drinking his tea.
“Does this mean you and King Thranduil are married?”
Bard’s eyes popped open and he clapped a hand over his mouth.  Thranduil cackled.  Sigrid leapt up, rushed over and embraced Thranduil from behind.
“Then the Great Woudini was right!  Welcome to the family, Wicked Stepmother!”
“Yaaaay!” shouted Bain and Tilda.  “We have a wicked stepmother!”
The entire table erupted in laughter.  Bard managed to worry his mouthful of tea down and roared out.
“That’s not!  I mean… Stop laughing!”
Bain and Tilda ran and hugged Thranduil.  Tilda climbed into his lap.
“I love you, Wicked Stepmother!”
“I love you, too, Monster Child.”
Bard’s forehead clunked to the table.
Legolas and Gimli entered at that moment.
Bain turned to Legolas and shouted, “Brother!”
Legolas took a giant step back, toppled over Gimli and knocked them both to the floor.  Gimli roared with indignation and Legolas sat up and said, “Huh?”
Thranduil frowned at his son.
“How many times must I tell you, my little leaf, not to make that noise?”
Bain offered Legolas a hand up, grinning hugely, while Bard sputtered and tried to come up with some sort of protest, but apparently couldn’t.
“It’s all right, Da,” Bain crowed.  “You don’t have to say anything, ‘cause it’s an elf thing, right?”
Sigrid loudly kissed the top of Thranduil’s head and proclaimed, “Dearest Wicked Stepmother!”
Thranduil patted her arm and said, “Dearest Ungrateful Daughter.  I hope you and Monster Child and Incorrigible Stepson will not live to regret your father’s… decision.”
“Ada,” said Legolas, grinning.  “What have you done?”
Celeborn snerked into his tea and Galadriel smacked his shoulder.
“Be nice.  He actually didn’t say a mean thing to you for the first fifteen minutes we were married.”
“His time’s about up,” said Celeborn evilly.
“What were we talking about?” Dis asked.
“You were upset because Tauriel and I didn’t ask for permission to marry,” said Kili helpfully.
Dis sighed.
“Never mind.  You can get married later.  Tauriel, welcome to the family.”
Tauriel rose and bowed, hand over her heart.
“I am honored to be so welcome, Princess Dis.” She turned to Thorin.  “Is the permission of the
“For many weeks now, I have thought it a foregone conclusion, Tauriel, and you are very welcome. However, have you given any thought to where you will live? And, you are still your king’s captain of the guard and your prince’s personal guard.”

Thranduil snorted while Tilda tried to braid strands of his hair, but the strands would not stay.

“That might be problematic if Legolas were not also here most of the time. We will retire Tauriel as captain of our guard, retain her as Legolas’ personal guard and assume we will continue to live in one another’s arrow quivers as before.”

Thorin nodded.

“Sounds about right.”

Legolas, disentangling himself from Bain’s sloppy but heartfelt embrace, went to Bard and got down on one knee beside him.

Bard actually raised his head from the table.

“What can I do for you, Prince Legolas?” he asked wearily.

“You can call me Legolas, first off,” said the elf, smiling, “and allow me to congratulate you. This is a happy occasion. Isn’t it?”

Bard looked at Legolas, then at Thranduil, with Tilda still braiding diligently, and ran a hand through Legolas’ hair.

“It is, a very happy occasion. Thank you, Legolas.”

“A toast,” Thorin said, rising from his chair. “To the King of Dale and the King of the Greenwood, may their nuptials be blessed by all the valar and any other ethereal beings who know them.”

Everyone promptly raised their teacup and congratulated the pair.

Dwalin leaned back in his chair, his arm across the back of Ori’s.

“Looks like we’ve started a trend, love.”

Ori giggled. “Who would have guessed?”

“You know,” commented Theoden in a teasing tone, to his son, “I might just have to get married to keep up.”

Theodred snickered.

Sigrid said, loftily, “You may marry whomever you fancy, Theoden King, except me.”

Theoden sat back in surprise.

“Princess Sigrid! I don’t recall even broaching the matter with you or your royal father!”

Everyone at the table looked feral, except for Tilda, who was still playing with Thranduil’s hair.

Bard pinned Theoden with his eye and asked menacingly, “You don’t recall referring to my daughter, Sigrid, as a ‘nice chunk of woman flesh’?”

Theoden paled and sputtered.

“I never would!”

“You did,” said Bard, licking his lips in a way that would make Thranduil proud.

Theoden looked at Aragorn.

“You were drunk, Rohan,” said Aragorn. “I don’t think it’s binding.”

“You were extremely drunk,” Arwen assisted.

“My sincerest apologies, your highness,” Theoden offered Sigrid.

“Accepted, but it’s all right. It was flattering.”

Tilda piped up, “Then Da said I couldn’t become a nice chunk of woman flesh. I had to stay trapped in the library forever, or until he died, and Sig said judging by the vein throbbing in his head it’d be sooner rather than later.”

Bard said, “I don’t remember saying I would…”

He paused, then grabbed Thranduil by the shoulders, as if suddenly seized by a horrible realization.

“You’re going to die!” Bard shouted in the elf king’s face.

“Yes,” said Thranduil.
“But… but, you’re going to die!”
“Yes,” said Thranduil, “and so are you.”
“But your son is a hairdresser!”
“I have more than one, my love.”
“Legolas is becoming a dwarf!”
“I thought I felt rather short,” said Legolas, scooting back toward Gimli on his knees.
“I have a third son, remember, my love?” Thanduil asked. “Cemnesta is more than capable of watching the leaves turn colors in the fall and stalking around as if he owns the place. Which, he will.”
“Oh,” said Bard. “What’s his name again?”
“Cemnesta. He’s a healer. Right now he’s studying in the Undying Lands, but he’ll be back by the end of the decade. I shall send him a note.”
“So, what will happen to you when you die?” Bard asked.
“I’ll spend eternity mocking the populous of Eru’s halls and, according to Ori, you will spend eternity helping me do it.”
Bard thought a moment.
“I can live with that. Or not, as the case may be.”
“Are we all calm now?”
“I hope so,” grumbled Tilda. “You’re both squishing me!”
Celeborn turned to Galadriel.
“Really, who has to say anything?”
Farewells, Farming, and A Friendly Scheme.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Sigh, most of our dear guests are leaving but there are still a few surprises, and they are mostly Dain’s fault. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

After the momentous breakfast, the party went out to the courtyard. It was full of wagons, horses and ponies all hitched up or saddled and packed for travel. There were handshakes, hugs, kisses, and many promises of visiting to all parts of Arda. Thorin stood, proudly watching his guests and family. Bilbo stood next to him, their arms about each other and Frodo in front, standing on the toes of Thorin’s boots.

Ori reflected that all this camaraderie had happened because of Thorin’s coronation. Thorin had very simply introduced and forged relations with all the major crowned heads of Arda and secured bonds of friendship between them.

Theoden knelt to embrace the Blacklock Queen. Galadriel embraced Theodred. Aragorn and Dain and Sculdis exchanged hearty hugs and promises to stay in touch and visit. Ahkn and Bard and Thranduil chatted companionably.

Arwen was on her knees in Dori’s arms, Balin patting her back. Aris walked slowly with Fili and Kili, her arms slung about their shoulders, telling them something that had both princes shouting with laughter. Dis was hugging Celeborn fondly.

Dori swept up to Hild and bowed.

“I’m sorry Balin and I couldn’t accept your generous offer, dear Hild,” said Dori, “but perhaps this will soothe any fractured feelings.”

Dori handed Hild a folded piece of paper, which Hild opened. She shrieked and hugged Dori.

“Bearer! Thank you!”

“What do you suppose it is?” Ori asked Dwalin.

“Dunno, mebbe our Dori wrote ‘em a dirty story.”

But all such hopes were dashed when Hild turned to Aris and said, “Look! It’s the mushroom gravy recipe!”

“Tha’s champion,” Aris agreed. “Where’re we goin’ t’ get th’ mushrooms? They only grow in Erebor.”

“But they dry perfectly nicely,” Dori assured her. “We’ve included several bushels of the dried ones in your going-away present. Just remember to cook them in the same wine or stock in which they’re reconstituted to get full flavor.”

The Blacklocks went to the head of their wagons, and mounted their ponies, ready to go.

Ori turned and looked around for his husband. He saw Dwalin over by the Gondorian couple and went to them.

Dwalin said, “If yeh don’t mind, King Aragorn, Lady Arwen, Gnasher an’ Grinder an’ their friends wan’ed t’ give yeh a present.”

Arwen tilted her head.

“That’s very kind of them, Captain Dwalin. Aren’t they… goats?”

“Aye, but it don’t follow they got no manners,” teased Dwalin, nodding to Gibi.

“But of course not,” Aragorn agreed. “We’d be happy to accept a present from them.”

“They know yeh travel light,” said Dwalin, “but yeh’ll need a cart f’r this.”
“For the present?” Arwen asked as a packed cart pulled up. “What is it?”
“It’s wool rovin’.”
“Kazhmeer wool!” Arwen cried, suddenly very excited.
“That’s all wool?” Aragorn asked, agog.
“An’ there’s a lunch in there somewhere, too,” said Dwalin. “Mistress Dazla didn’t want any a’ yeh goin’ hungry.”
“Mistress Dazla made lunch?” Boromir asked, eyes bright.
“For all of us, Boromir,” said Arwen. “You have to share.”
Boromir put on a crestfallen look and simpered, “Yes, m’lady.”
“An’ don’t f’rget yer hats on th’ way,” said Dwalin.
“Hats?” Aragorn asked, one eyebrow raised.
“I’m sure th’ beaver dam is still there,” said Dwalin helpfully.
“Oh!” said Aragorn. “Of course. If we’re successful, shall we send you one?”
“Ah!” said Aragorn. “Of course. If we’re successful, shall we send you one?”
“Mistress Dazla didn’t want any a’ yeh goin’ hungry.”
“Yeh want a hat, too?” Dwalin asked.
“Sorry, we don’t have any left.” Dwalin said.
“Will you visit us?” Frodo asked, sniffling.
“I think, since our kings are friends, we’ll be visiting each other now and then.”
Rather than freeing the warrior, this just made the faunts cling tighter, until Boromir was sending looks of distress to his king, who could distract at least Frodo for a moment. Dain and Sculdis went over to assist.
Ori turned and saw Dori with the Lorien folks.
“Here you go,” said Dori to Galadriel. A large number of barrels had been loaded onto a cart for her ladyship. “Three of the barrels are cloudberry, but the rest are elderberry. Those things covered by the blanket are elderberry bushes for your orchard and here is the recipe for our Celeborn’s egg bread, and a few loaves to keep him happy on the journey.”
“You are so good to us, Dori,” said Galadriel.
“Well, you’re a sweet lass,” said Dori. “It’s not a chore to be good to you.”
Galadriel giggled and bowed to kiss Dori’s cheek.
Dori said in a stage whisper, “And that egg bread is quite fattening!”

“Excellent!” Galadriel cried.

Celeborn arrived, leading their white horses. A raphcactus bird perched prominently on the rump of one. The horse looked back at it continually with a sour eye, but had not bucked the bird off yet. Ori saw that Kelli had buried his claws into the saddle blanket. The bird’s body moved with the horse, but its head stayed maddeningly still.

“My dear, look what our Dori has gifted us!” called Galadriel, indicating the cart “It’s fattening!”

The lord slewed his eyes at Dain and said, “Capital! Capital!”

Haldir turned grey, but bowed politely to the assembled. Ori found himself wishing Vi and Margr were there to sneak up behind him and scream ‘Boo!’.

Bard and Thranduil arrived to exchange goodbyes with the Lorien. Thranduil looked from the bird to his cousin and grinned.

“Enjoy your fat bird,” said Thranduil merrily.

Celeborn turned to Bard and said, “I wish you the same.”

Galadriel smacked her husband’s arm.

“Behave, my lord,” she admonished.

“I am behaving,” said Celeborn. “I’m just doing it badly.”

Thorin and Bilbo exchanged bows with Celeborn and Galadriel, and Frodo jumped from Aragorn’s arms to Galadriel’s to hug and kiss her.

“Bye, Granny Glad!”

“Goodbye, Frodo dear. Now, remember to behave. Or, at least, don’t get caught. I’m sure your new cousins will be a great help with that.”

Dori went to the Rohan king and showed him the contents of the wagon packed for him. Ori was amused to learn most of it was a huge supply of xocolātl and recipes. There was a quantity of spices and also recipes for whipping up dwarrow mustard, which made the horse king roar with laughter. A lone box contained Theodred’s gifts of books: several histories of dwarrow along with music and poetry. Three Dale cows, a bull, and several goats stood tethered to the wagon.

Theoden thanked Dori and took his leave of the high king of all dwarrow. Ori stepped forward at Thorin’s nod.

“Theoden King.”

Rohan turned and smiled at Ori.

“Good of you to come and see us off,” he said.

“I would have in any case,” said Ori, “but I’ve been specially charged by King Thorin to put this in your hands.”

‘This’ was a book. It was written in khuzdul, but as it was an instruction manual for the arming up and saddling of battle rams, it was mainly diagrams anyway.

Theoden took it, turning the pages in obvious amazement.

“I’ve made notations in the margins in westron,” said Ori, “so some of the finer points aren’t lost.”

“This is for me?”

“Theodred assured me you can read. I know that’s not common in Rohan, since the spoken word is considered more important. Er… I hope you like it.”

Theoden got down on his knees and hugged him.

Ori thought Theoden was a very good hugger, just as Theodred had been.

“Thank you so much,” said Theoden. “You’ve helped make this one of the most important journeys of my life.”

Ori was stunned, but he managed a tolerable “Thank you.” into Theoden’s shoulder before he was released.

He smiled as Theoden rose to his feet and they bowed to each other.

Blushing, Ori glanced to where Kili and Fili were talking with Theodred. Fili handed the horse prince a long, loosely wrapped package.

“We had to do a little reforging,” said Fili, “but I think I finally have the length and balance right.
Kili made the scabbard.

Theodred gave out a startled breath as he drew the sword from the intricately tooled leather scabbard. It was a graceful, deadly thing, in the dwarven style, meaning it was double-edged, perfectly balanced, and heavier than it looked.

“I’ll have to work up to being able to wield this,” said Theodred.

“You’d better work at it,” said Kili with a grin. “You have until the spring to learn to knock us on our arses.”

Theodred admired the sword and thanked and embraced both the dwarf princes. Stonehelm, Bain, Sigrid, and Tilda came up for hugs, too. Bard and Rohan embraced over a hand shake. Sculdis pulled the horse king down for a hug via his belt and Dain slapped the man’s back heartily.

Ahkn bade farewell to the Rohan and the royal party of Durin, to Gloin and Gridr. Then Binni and Oin stepped up to the Stonefoot king and Oin thrust a small, milk-white bottle at him.

“Remember, rub this ointment int’ yer joints every night before bed,” Oin instructed Ahkn. “No skippin’ a night here an’ there, an’ don’t scrimp. I’ve already started another batch t’ send yeh. Keep usin’ it regularly an’ th’ next mornin’ yeh’ll be spry as a colt.”

Ahkn took the bottle, looking more than a little skeptical.

He opened his mouth, but Oin merely said a gruff ‘Yer welcome,’ before clapping him on the shoulder and stomping away.

“What Lord Warmth means to say,” said Binni, “is: Please take care of yourself. We’ll miss you.”

“Really?” Ahkn asked.

“It’s a loose translation. The ointment really does work, though. Oin uses it himself.”

“So, I’ll be spry, but I’ll become hard of hearing.”

“Only selectively.”

“Huh, not a bad idea, actually.”

Lined up behind his soldiers, Ahkn’s wagons fairly bulged with the goods he’d purchased, at least two of them carrying fashionable textiles, and a flock of goats were tethered behind.

The guests all mounted up and readied themselves. The Erebor royals stood back and, at a bellow from Aris, the whole the wagon train moved out of the royal caverns. There were shouts and waves, until the last wagon disappeared down the tunnel.

“Well, by all the blessings of Yavanna,” Bell said. “What a sight to be seen!”

Thorin chuckled. “Indeed, Mistress Bell, I can’t remember ever having so many visitors in the royal cavern or even in Erebor itself.”

“I’m glad it wasn’t just me, then,” Bard commented idly. “How we managed to keep them all entertained for so long is amazing.”

“Food and shopping, Bard, dear.” Dori replied. “Now, Bilbo, is it time for hobbits’ second breakfast?”

“It is indeed,” Bilbo concurred.

Once back in the house, Dori went into the kitchen. Bofur and Jani stood talking in front of the fireplace in the sitting room.

Judging by the amount of soot on Bofur’s nose, he had been down in the mines.

He looked up as Thorin entered.

“Zinc mine’s ready t’ reopen,” Bofur announced without preamble, “but the miners want the Bearer t’ bless it before they go to work.”

Balin did not look best pleased.

“It’s no place f’r me Dori in a zinc mine.”

Dwalin nodded. “Can’t say I disagree. Even properly braced, it’s dangerous, and there could be lots a’ yahoos in th’ dark. I’ll have t’ set up a security detail.”

“You will not,” said Dori in the doorway. “The idea! Wasting the warriors’ time on such a thing!”

“Yeh have a better idea, our Dori?” Dwalin asked.

“Of course I do, deary. Thorin, I’m going to borrow Ori after lunch. We’re going on a visit.”
Thorin laughed.
“I won’t be the one to stand in your way. Say hello for me.”
Ori looked between Thorin and Dori, frowning.
Thorin nodded to Balin, who went out.
Everyone else adjourned to the breakfast parlor where Bard, Thranduil, and Hamfast had seated themselves and were occupied in watching their children once more feeding their faces.
Ori had another cup of tea and a scone. Thorin had tea also.
After a short time, Thorin wiped his mustache.
“If you are both finished?” Thorin regarded the fathers with amusement. “Master Hamfast, King Bard and I would like your advice on agricultural matters.”
“Certainly, certainly,” Hamfast wiped his mouth again and got up from the table. Bard followed with a stretch.
“Are you coming along, Thranduil?” Thorin asked with a grin.
“Oh course,” said Thranduil, rising with a pat on Bain’s shoulder. “You require more supervision than our offspring.”
Bain and Legolas exchanged grins. Bain called after them,
“Bye, Wicked Stepmother.”
“Bye, Da!” Legolas added.
Ori and Bilbo fell into step as they followed through to Balin and Thorin’s office, where Balin had cleared Thorin’s desk. Ori arranged his tools on a side table, recording the meeting for both kings.
“Here’s a map of the outside of the mountain, Dale and the surrounds,” Thorin said as Balin unfurled a large scroll across the desk.
Hamfast looked over the map intently. He frowned and tilted his head.
“East is at the top,” Bilbo helped.
“As it should be,” said Thorin.
“As on all dwarven maps,” Bilbo added, poking the king with his elbow.
“Good to know, good to know.” Hamfast nodded.
“The lines are of elevation,” Thorin explained. “The Lake is listed at zero, features of the terrain ascend from that, thus we know the locations of the hills and valleys and their heights and depths.”
“There ain’t much land bein’ used,” Hamfast noted. “Looks like we’ve just got them few farms to the, er, south.”
“Yes,” Bard agreed. “This is the biggest, it belongs to Mistress Guernsia and is known as ‘Old Alderney Farm’ and deals in animals for the most part. This one is also quite large. It’s owned by Mister Hallow and is known as ‘Windy Poplars Farm’.”
Silence fell as Hamfast concentrated, muttered to himself occasionally, and finally judged, “Looks t’ me your best bet would be here betwixt th’ mountain an’ these here ruins. It’s rollin’ meadows and in th’ lee of th’ north and west winds. The eastern ones’er usually warm and the land rises after so that’ll protect crops, too. The fields should be south-facin’ and I’m seein’ plenty a’ streams and th’ like f’r irrigation.”
“So, my people should start digging there?” Bard asked.
Ori could tell by his voice, Bard was completely at sea when it came to farming. Hamfast chuckled.
“Nah, I’ll get me plow out an’ get started. We’ll need t’ ask the farms f’r manure f’r the fields and then plow that all in. We kin use all a them fish guts from th’ docks, too. Prime fertilizer, fish guts. ’R so I’ve heard. We kin probably get a couple a late crops in an’ growin’ before winter sets in.”
“Really?” Bard was intrigued.
“What can you grow in that time which could be used as winter food for the area?” Thorin asked.
Hamfast stroked his chin.
“Definitely taters. Beans is fast growin’, we kin get squash an’ gourds, too. Mebbe onions. Too late f’r carrots, though. Neeps’ll go in, too.”
“Neeps?” Bard managed.
“Turnips,” Bilbo translated.
“Kale,” Hamfast commented. “Winter cabbages’ll do as well. Good thing I brought most a’ me crops with me. Go’ plenty a seed as well. With all that fish waste an’ such we kin probably get some good crops a’ mushrooms as well. We kin get the rest a’ th’ fields plowed an’ ready f’r next year an’ then we kin talk grains and th’ like.”

“You think we can grow grain here?” Bard demanded.

“Oh, aye. Mister Thorin, er... his majesty-”

“Thorin will do,” Thorin smiled.

“Mister Thorin tells me this here mountain has lava in it an’ that makes f’r grand soil t’ grow all kinds a’ things.”

Bard gazed at the hobbit for a moment.

“Mister Gamgee, would you and your family like a house in the Dale?”

“Aye, that’d be grand. I’ll have t’ talk t’ Bell about it. Bein’ in a mountain’s a bit strange f’r us. It’s a bit like a smial but th’ rock’s odd.”

“There’s a place near town that has land around it, if you like,” Bard offered. “It was an old fashioned dug out with a few rooms built on the front. My folk aren’t used to being underground, so it’s been empty for a number of years. I can get a few of my people to work on it.”

Thorin nodded and put in, “I can send a couple of craftsdwarrow down to make sure the underground parts are sound.”

“I’ll talk t’ Bell an’ see if she fancies it,” Hamfast agreed.

“Frodo will be rather put-off not to have wee Sam within arm’s length,” said Bilbo with a gentle smile. “But they’ll see each other often, and it’s certainly better than having the entirety of Arda between them.”

“Oh, I dunno, Mister Bilbo. I was thinkin’ it was best wee Sam an’ some of my tweens went t’ school. Mister Bard says there’s schools in Dale now, an’ Sam’s just old enough now to start.”

Balin, Bilbo and Thorin exchanged looks. Thorin nodded.

Balin said, “Actually, Master Gamgee, Thorin an’ Bilbo an’ I were thinkin’, if yeh don’t mind, tha’ I’d teach wee Sam here alongside our Frodo.”

Hamfast pulled back his shoulders, apparently in surprise.

“Ye want him t’ learn along with Frodo? To what ends?”

Bilbo said, “I believe Balin thinks he should start as he means to go on. Sam and Frodo will likely be spending a great deal of their lives in each other’s company.”

Hamfast nodded.

“Aye, I figured that. Our Sam was quite pinin’ for his Mister Frodo back in the Shire. Bell and I thought Yavanna must’ve meant somethin’ by it, since he’s the youngest son an’ not our eldest.”

Bilbo shot Balin a sly look.

“Of course, teaching those two magpies anything while they’re together will be quite the challenge of Balin’s life.”

Balin sighed.

“I thought a’ tha’. In terms of attention span, they could make Fili an’ Kili look like Ori, but I’m willin’ t’ work at it’

Dain blustered in with a sly look on his face, wiping his mouth on his sleeve.

“Right, laddies. Yeh decided on where yer wantin’ t’ start plowin’?”

“Aye, Mister Dain,” Hamfast nodded. “Me plows still on the wagon. I’ll get me coos.”

“Wagon’s ready,” Dain told him. “Yeh won’t be needing’ th’ coos. I bin tinkerin’ wi’ yer plow an’ made some improvements.”

“Oh aye?” Hamfast cocked a look at the Ironhills king, who was grinning maniacally.

The group went out to the cavern, where Mokrah and Gibi waited with saddled ponies. Thranduil went through the stable to the meadow. Ori swung up on Honda. Dwalin got on Harley. Thorin went to a soft grey pony Ori hadn’t seen before and brought him over to Bilbo.

“Ghivashel, this is Vespa. He’s a very gentle creature and will carry you safely.”

Bilbo’s eyes lit up and he reach into his pocket and gave Vespa an apple. Vespa was delighted to eat this.
“Hello, Vespa,” Bilbo cooed, patting Vespa’s neck and stroking the nose. “I do hope we shall get on well.”

Bilbo turned back to Thorin.

“Thank you so much, my dear. My old pony, Myrtle, is retired now at Bombur and Erda’s inn. She has carried me all over Arda, lastly with Frodo. I was talking to the Urs and we agreed she has earned her right to spend the rest of her life in green fields and a warm stable.”

Thranduil came out of the stable, leading his elk.

“Ah,” said Dain. “I wondered where yeh were keepin’ yer deer-tree thing.”

“It’s an elk, King Dain,” said Thranduil. “As well you know.”

He leapt lightly to the elk’s back.

Dain snickered and did a little prance before bouncing onto Chopper.

Thorin held Vespa’s head while Bilbo swung himself into the saddle. Thorin mounted on Minty, Queen of All Ponies, and they all rode out.

They made their way, Hamfast driving the wagon with the plow covered in a large canvas tarp, out of the mountain and down to the area Hamfast had chosen on the map. Bard called to a few strong men lounging and they followed the party out of town.

It was a beautiful open area with only a slight rise as it extended toward the mountain.

Hamfast let down the wagon back hatch and removed the board skids he kept there. These in place, the plow, still covered, was rolled down to the ground.

At that moment, Mistress Guernsia and Mister Hallow rode up, both on horse back.

“Is this where the new plow is going to be tried out?” Mistress Guernsia called excitedly, dismounting in a hurry. Ori saw that her breeches were wide and flared, so it appeared she was wearing a long skirt as was traditional for Dale women. Mister Hallow rode toward them at speed. Dain grinned at the newcomers.

“Aye, here it is!”

Dain yanked off the tarp and there was the plow. Ori had see drawings of such. Hamfast’s was much larger. Ori looked it over.

On the ground was a steel square made up of four long steel shafts, each studded with rows of curved steel teeth. They were attached to a steel frame work that rose to a seat high in the middle with a large steel box in front. Off the box, and also attached to the steel frame, came great metal poles jointed and sitting on the ground making the whole thing look rather like a spider.

At the moment, it stood on four metal wheels on all four sides. Ori noted that the wheels were on pivots, which allowed them to turn anyway necessary.

“Where yeh wantin’ th’ field t’be?” Dain asked

“Startin’ here.” Hamfast reached down and yanked out a tuft of long grass. With the help of all the men, the plow was rolled over. The plow was set with the front teeth above the hole Hamfast had made.

“Now what?” Hamfast asked. “This here’s the weirdest thin’ I ever did lay eyes on, Mister Dain.”

“Up yeh get,” was Dain’s reply. Eyebrows raised, Hamfast clambered up and sat in the seat. He looked at Dain.

“See that’ handle in front a’ yeh? Give it fifty turns.”

There was a lovely metal handle, the end wrapped in wood, which stuck out the seat side of the box. Hamfast complied then waited.

“Now,” Dain went on, “see that lever next t’ it. Up, is to have it move; down, t’ stop it.”

Hamfast threw the lever. A loud ticking noise started and the plow’s spider legs ‘walked’ forward. The teeth dug into the ground and turned the earth into a furrow. The teeth behind turned it and again as did the third and fourth sets. The ‘legs’ drew the plow along.

The plow, once started, ticked along merrily. In fact, it began to pick up speed.

“This’s grand!” shouted Hamfast.

The assembled spectators cheered, Mistress Aldernay crowed in delight and Hallow grinned like a maniac.
“It’s a clockwork plow!” said Ori. He turned to Dain and hugged him. The ticking plow sped merrily away off toward the top of the meadow. The ticking slowed and the plow stopped.

There was a whoop from Hamfast. He turned back in his seat, looking at them.

“Oi, Mister Dain! How d’ yeh turn this contraption around?”

“Ooo,” Dain frowned. “Knew I’d forgotten sumthin’."

Thorin narrowed his eyes.

“You need a crank attached to the wheel frame.”

“Aye, cuz, I’ll put one on t’night.” Dain turned to the crowd. “Right, lads, who wan’s go down an’ turn our Hamfast ‘round?”

This brought a good deal of laughter and a few of the men jogged down the field and turned the plow. Hamfast could be seen cranking the handle at speed and, by the time he was set next to his first row, he threw the lever again and came ticking madly towards them.

“Champion, Mister Dain!” the hobbit roared. “Champion!”

The group of men who had turned him stayed where they were and shouted back to the rest to turn Hamfast when he got to them. After two more rows, Dain went up to the plow.

“Right, lad. Yeh got t’ hang a’ it?”

“Aye, I do, Mister Dain. I’ll have this field done before the afternoon’s half gone.”

“Well, we’ve got business an’ ‘re gonna leave yeh to it. Bring it back t’ the house when yer done and I’ll get somethin’ on so yeh kin turn on yer own.”

“Will do!” Hamfast nodded, threw the lever up and was ticking away from them once more.

Bard turned to Thorin.

“He’s mine, you know.”

Thorin laughed as the Dale king turned back to the rapidly appearing plowed ground.

“Coming?” Thorin asked Bard, who was now watching the plow fixedly.

“I’m going to stay and … supervise.” The man never took his eyes from the ticking plow.

“We’ll see you later then,” Thorin promised.

“Uh-huh,” was all they could get out of the Dale king.

“I’ll bring him back when he’s ready for a nap,” said Thranduil.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. We’re back to the business of the mountain and Dori has things to do. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

They arrived back at Fundin house. Dain and Thorin were still discussing how a steering mechanism could be attached while Bilbo and Ori chuckled over Hamfast and his new wind-up toy.

As they approached, they saw that the gates to the front walk had been propped open, funneling visitors to a smaller, rather familiar gate, whose posts kept the original gates stationary. No one could gain entry without passing through the hobbit’s little gate. The sign for the house had been changed to read in khuzdul ‘Royal Residence’ and beneath, in the Shire lettering, ‘Bag-End East’.

Ori and Bilbo laughed outright. Thorin rolled his eyes and shook his head. Dain looked pleased. “Capital, capital,” he approved. “Seem yer all moved in, lad.”

“So it appears.” Bilbo managed, his eyes twinkling with amusement.

“Then I suppose I shall accustom myself. It’s a sweet gesture.”

Gibi, grinning, opened the little gate to let them through.

“Master Gibi,” Thorin greeted the young stable hand. “Fili and Kili I presume?”

“No, sir,” Gibi was trying hard not to laugh. “The Fundin brothers.”

“Arseholes,” Thorin muttered around chuckles.

They came into the house and walked through to the sitting room where Dori greeted them and ordered them into the breakfast parlor for lunch. Dori was fabulous in their golden robe and loose hair dressed with clips of gold butterflies.

Soup, bread, cold meats and cheeses melted away. Company was thin as it was Dori, Balin and the Bardings, ‘Figrid’ and ‘Kiliel’ as Gimli started calling the four, with great pride, as both females automatically smacked him every time he did. After some whispering, Fili and Kili decided that Legolas and Gimli would be known as ‘Gigolas’, Gimli roared and Legolas laughed delightedly.

“Where’s Arne?” Ori asked. “I haven’t seen him in…in ages, it seems.”

Sigrid waved a hand. “He’s off after Master Brur. “You’ll need a chisel to part them.”

After lunch, Ori stretched and said, “I think I need a nap.”

“You only have a few hours, pet,” said Dori. “Best put them to good use. I’ll call you when I’m ready.”

Ori went to the bedroom and settled himself on the bed. He upended his satchel and went through the papers and drawings in it. He sorted these and copied a few out fair on his lap desk.

He finished and flopped back on the bed. It was late in the afternoon and he was really looking forward to going back to work tomorrow afternoon after the blessing of the mine. He wasn’t looking forward to tomorrow as Dain and his family were leaving. Ori stared thoughtfully at the ceiling. He was going to miss them terribly. Back in the spring, all he had were Dori and Nori. Now he didn’t have enough fingers and toes to count all his family on. He was part of the Fundins, who were related to the Durins and the Groinuls, and now to the Urs by marriage.

Bard and his little family had always been close to them, but since Fili and Sigrid were betrothed, the family cords were tightening. Hild was a cousin of Thorin’s and her daughter Arivett was Ahkn’s daughter. It sounded as though Hild, Aris, and Theoden were hoping Arivett would wed Theoden’s nephew Eomer. Ori wondered about Eomer and Arivett. Would they like each other? He closed his eyes for a moment.

On the vast steppe, a handsome young man in a tall silver helm on a white horse watched the faraway forests and hills. Behind him, a small army of other men milled about on horseback. They, like the young man, were armored and carrying long spears.

Out of the far away forest, a squad of what looked like dwarrow approached on ponies. It was another small army, and in the lead a chariot driven by a dwarf warrior in magnificent armor. The dwarrow raced towards the horsemen. The young man gave a shout and his men rapidly formed up and galloped down the long hillside to met the dwarrow army. There was a great cry. The two armies stopped opposite each other. The young man swung off his horse with a grin. He strode across the intervening grass and the dwarf warrior stepped down from the chariot and came forward. They met and stood looking one another over. The young man pulled off his helm and tossed his long blond hair free. He was blue-eyed and his beard was respectable for a man. He spoke, laughed, and bowed deeply with a flourish.

The dwarf cocked their head and removed their helm to reveal a stunningly beautiful dwarrowdam. She was dark skinned, her beard wrapped in many cords of gold, her hair plaited into one great braid that wrapped around her head like a crown in itself, gold and sapphires twisted all throughout it. Her smile was feral as she bowed in return and offered her hand. The young man kissed it and looked up into her face as he did. She giggled.

The young man kept ahold of her hand as he called to his men. A few came forward. The dwarrowdam signaled to some of her followers, three came forward. The men brought a bejeweled drinking horn encircled with silver and, with it, a flask. The dwarrow brought a scroll, writing implements, and a stand. The dwarrowdam and the young man went over what was written on the scroll. They both signed it. The man turned and his second poured from the flask into the horn. The man knelt and spoke to the dwarrowdam. He raised the horn to her and drank then passed it to her. She laughed merrily and spoke, smiling at the young man. She toasted him and his men and drank the rest of the contents of the horn. The men and dwarrow armies cheered and the young man and dwarrowdam embraced and kissed hotly.

Tents were pitched and a great feast began. The couple reigned over the merrymaking.

Ori yawned and sat up. He heard the door open and Dwalin came in.

“Nappin’, love?”

“Just a little. Is it time for something?”

“Aye, Dori’s got tea goin’. Gonna be weird wi’ jus’ us.”

Ori giggled, “Just you, you mean. Dori’s said he and I are taking tea… out.”

“Aye, us being the Fundins, the Durins, and the Groinuls It’ll seem thin after wha’ we’ve go’ used t’ over th’ las’ few days.”

Ori led the way to the sitting room. While Dori fussed over Balin, making sure his plate and cup were full, Ori perched on the arm of Dwalin’s chair.

Ori considered that since Oin was present, he should mention his dream and said, “I had a dream about a dwarrowdam marrying a man from Rohan. Do you think it was prophetic?”

Everything in the room stopped.

Thorin, Dwalin, Dori and Oin all exchanged glances.

Oin leaned forward and said, “Tell me about this dream.”

Ori did so in exact detail.

“If it is in anyway prophetic,” said Ori, reflectively, “I think it’s about men and dwarrow getting along better, represented by the plans of Hild and Theoden.”

Dwalin coughed.
“Sounds like some of ’em’ll get along, anyways.”
Fili said, “Idad, when Theo got that letter from his female cousin, Eowyn…”
Thorin looked terribly amused.

“Either Hild is in for a surprise when she gets home or… I wonder what direction they rode off in after the, er, honeymoon.”
“If they were just getting married,” Kili asked, “why did they need armies?”
“Maybe they were all gettin’ married,” said Gimli with a grin.
“They’re going to need a bigger tent,” said Ori.
“Come along, pet,” said Dori. “We don’t want to be late for tea.”
“Where are we going, Dori?”
“You’ll find out soon enough, pet,” said Dori with a mysterious grin.

In Steam Alley, a carnival atmosphere prevailed, most of it centering on the house where Vi and Margr used to take rooms, and now had taken every room.
“I hope this isn’t all for us,” Ori whispered to Dori.
“I don’t think so, pet.”

As they approached the doorstep, they heard a shrill voice, raised in either pain or song, and then they saw a block of a dwarf, his long white hair and beard unbound in supplication and his hood in his hands, clutched to his chest. He rested on one knee as he gave forth what Ori construed was some sort of love ballad.
When he finished, the windows above opened and the contents of a large scrap bucket cascaded down and over him. The crowd leapt back, screaming with laughter and Margr’s voice trumpeted over them.
“I said ‘no’, yeh great creep. I don’t want yeh back an’ I ain’t taken yeh back.”
“No, nor am I!” Vi’s indignant voice came tumbling out right after.
The shutters slammed shut.
“So,” said the besmirched balladeer, “I’ll take that as a solid ‘mebbe’ then?”
The shutters flew open again to reveal something very large and rather gaudily printed. At first Ori was concerned it was one or the other of the sister’s rear ends, but it soon became apparent it was the sofa.
“Oh, great Mahal,” Dori breathed. She flew forward, neatly skipping the vegetable peelings and knocking at the door with dainty insistence. She called out gaily, “Margr! Vi! We’re here!”
The sofa halted in its passage and a gravelly female voice spat, “Oh, bugger! We’ve no place else f’r them t’ sit.”

Back inside went the sofa.
Dori turned to the balladeer.
“I’d run a strategic retreat, my lad,” she hissed. “And for pity’s sake, go take a bath.”
Ori nodded and grinned at the dwarf apologetically, all the while edging around the refuse and up to Dori’s side.
The city patrol, rather belatedly, dispersed the crowd.
“Awright, awright, nothin’ t’ see here. Move along.”
Ori heard the customary half dozen locks open and bolts shoot aside and the door opened to reveal the sisters, smiles wide and effusive in greeting and Ori realized they must have gotten a deal on the sofa covering.
The sisters hustled them up the narrow stair and into their apartment. Dori looked about as though she had been tenderly escorted into the palace of the White City.
“My, but you have done the place up. It looks lovely!”
“Our pensions’ve come through at last,” said Margr.
“And Rogi’s back in th’ lockup, so he ain’t here t’ eat us out a’ house an’ home,” said Vi.
“What’s he done this time?” Ori asked, appalled.
“What don’t he do?” Vi replied, leading them to the table where the teapot stood fast by the tiny kettle stove, used when the regular stove would turn the whole flat into an oven by itself. “He’s always fancied himself the next Nori, yeh know, except f’r he’s never been a bit a’ good at stealin’.”

“That rather puts a damper on things,” Dori agreed.

Margr snorted.

“Day before yesterday he tried t’ pickpocket Lord Zark, missed an’ put his hand’s down Zark’s trousers.”

Vi laughed raucously.

“An’ so Zark says. Remember what he said, Mar?”

“Oh, aye. He’s standin’ there with Rogi’s arm in a grip an’ he says, ’Not those family jewels, yeh idjit! Th’ one’s in th’ house!’”

And they fell all over each other, all the while serving tea.

“Hope yeh don’t mind it’s a bought cake,” Margr said. “It’s not so bad now, but yesterday it was so bleedin’ hot I thought me tits’d run clean off an’ slide down me legs.”

The cake was strawberry, with pink icing.

“Is this from the Gondorian bakery?” Ori asked. “It’s really good.”

“Aye, we’re runnin’ up quite th’ account there,” said Vi.

“And if we keep it up, we’ll soon be running one with th’ cloth merchant, widenin’ our tunics,” said Margr.

They ate and drank and gossiped, and as time went on Dori said,

“Well, as we’ve always been good neighbors, I have a favor to ask.”

Vi and Margr looked at one another and swallowed, then Margr leaned over confidentially and brayed, “Yeh ain’t run short on coin?”

“Oh, no, no, but you know the zinc mine is set to open again and I’ve been asked to bless it tomorrow morning, if you can imagine such a thing. I mean, really, what does one wear?”

Vi poured Dori another cuppa.

“Yeh want t’ borrow some of our clothes? Dori, yeh’ll look like yeh wrapped yerself in th’ curtains. Yer far too slight fer tha’.”

“Oh, no, but thank you,” said Dori. “My tailor would be most affronted if I didn’t go with one of his designs. No, I was wondering if you both wouldn’t like to accompany me as my ladies-in-waiting?”

The shrieks of joy set dogs baying all over the neighborhood.

“Ladies in waitin’!” Margr cried.

“How well tha’ sounds!” Vi added.

They turned to each other, still shrieking and violently butted heads in delight.

“I take it that’s a ‘yes’?” said Dori.

“What’ll we wear?” Margr wondered abruptly.

“Should we have clothes made t’ match yer presentation robe, dear?” asked Vi.

“No!” Ori yelped, then said in a calmer tone, “I hardly think it’s necessary, do you, Dori? Think of the time involved. Master Mahrdin had to weave like a mad dwarf just to produce enough for you.”

“I will likely be wearing Balin’s Fundin red,” said Dori, “with a cloak edged in Durin blue. Bound to be rather chilly in the mine, after all. I do have a bit of a surprise for you ladies.”

“Yeh aren’t ever goin’ t’ make us guess!” Vi cried.

“I wouldn’t tease about something of this import,” said Dori loftily. “I’ve consulted with Miss Dipfa, my tailor’s apprentice, and she has been working on designs for you ever since you first met her. I believe, if you pop round to their shop in about an hour, you’ll find her ready to fit you.”

These shrieks put the last to shame.

“Oh,” said Vi. “Wait a mo’, Mar. How could we afford them designer things?”

Dori said, “I’ve asked Mahrdin to send me the bill.”

They pounced on her, still shrieking.
Ori was now seriously alarmed.
“Yer good as gold, our Dori,” said Margr, “aye, an’ better.”
In the carriage on the way home, Ori said, “Dori, don’t take this the wrong way, but have you lost your mind?”
“I can’t have a few friends at my back to support me? Besides, your dearie is threatening to send me out with bodyguards.”
“True,” Ori admitted.
“The ladies are less... official. Given what Margr did to the thief, I think I need have no worries.
Besides, Balin is fretting over me going into the mines at all. Too dangerous, he says. Silly dear dwarf. As if I haven’t lived in a crime-infested shit hole most of my life.”
The driver choked but said nothing.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Dain has to get going and we’re off to bless the zinc mine, as everyone wants more xocolatl. And who could blame them! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori sighed as they got back to Fundin house. Nori was there to tell them Bofur and Jani would be back later. Dori thanked the stable hands and promptly told Nori, who was polite enough to hand Dori out of the coach, about Rogi’s latest exploit.

“Oh? Wha’d’he get?” Nori demanded.
“The actual family jewels, as he missed and put his hand down Lord Zark’s trousers.”
Nori groaned and rolled his eyes.
“It already has a bad name!” Ori pointed out as they entered the house.
“An’ no wonder, wif all these grease-fingered numbskulls about. What’s the world coming’ t’ is what I’d like t’ know?”
Nori huffed in annoyance and the subject was dropped as Dori led the way to the sitting room.

They went in to find Balin reading before the fire and Dwalin, with his feet up on the low table, sharpening Grasper. He glanced up with a grin for Ori.

“Yeh get th’ sisters t’ agree?”
“Oh yes,” Dori cooed leaning down to give Balin a kiss. “We shall take them up in my coach, I’ve decided on the teacup, tomorrow morning and we should be at the mine by sunrise.”

Balin sighed, “Very well, m’ beloved. If yeh insist, an’ I know yeh do. I admit I feel less worried with th’ sisters as yer guards. There’s no nonsense about ‘em, when it comes t’ takin’ care a’ yeh.”
Dori laughed and patted his One’s arm and fluttered away to the kitchen. Ori went and climbed into Dwalin’s lap. Dwalin gave a grunt of approval and tucked Ori close.

“How was th’ tea?”
“Margr and Vi are being courted by some poor sod,” Ori related with a grin. “He left when we arrived, after they dumped the scrap bucket over his head. He can’t sing.”

“With ‘r without’ th’ bucket?”
“I don’t think it would have mattered or been any improvement. The sofa was next, but Dori called up to them. They pulled it back in the window, when they realized we’d have to sit on the floor if they dropped it.” “Then I feel even better,” Balin reflected with a smile. “If they were willing t’ chuck a sofa, they’re exactly th’ sort t’ protect me Dori.”

The sitting room door to Bag-End East opened. Thorin and Bilbo came in, Frodo and Sam romping behind them.

“Ah, you’re back,” Bilbo smiled to Ori. “And how were the ladies?”
“Dwalin’s referring to the fact that when we arrived, they tossed out a bucket of scraps over their suitor’s head and were about to push the sofa out the window on him.”
“The sofa?” Bilbo asked, brows rising in alarm. “They were going to throw a sofa at a suitor? I must remember that.”
“Oh yes?” Thorin inquired. “Shall we be seeing the Mighty Gonad throwing sofas at his enemies?”
Bilbo gave Thorin a dirty look and poured them both cups of tea.
Dori came back through, giggling.
“I see my dear brother and sister-in-law are cooking for us again, tonight.”
“Aye,” Dwalin commented. “He said he’s gonna have somethin’ special an’ spicy.”
“Spicy?” Frodo was beside the chair in an instant. Ori grinned and Dwalin patted the faunt’s head.
“Aye, wee one, so yeh better leave a bit f’r us t’ eat.”
Frodo cocked his head, thinking. “Well, maybe.”
“Now, dearest Frodo,” Dori cooed and gathered both Frodo and Sam to sit with them on the couch. “I’m sure your idad Dain shall make plenty for all.”

Ori seated himself in the chair Dwalin pulled out for him. The table groaned under a plethora of covered dishes and many small bowls with different sauces and other condiments. As everyone got themselves seated, Dain and Sculdis came out with an enormous covered deep dish. They set this before Dori and whisked off the cover. The scent of the spices alone made Ori’s mouth water. The dish brimmed with little packages of filled fried dough.
“This is a Firebeard recipe we’ve kept up,” Sculdis explained. “They call ‘em samo’s, ‘cause after yeh have one, yeh gotta have some more.”
“Really?” asked Wee Sam.
Ori bit into the packet and moaned with delight. The spices burst on his tongue and warmed him through.
Hamfast and Bell exclaimed over the flavors and the faunts tucked in voraciously.
Bombur and Erda split open their packets, examined the contents, and guessed the ingredients, making both Dain and Sculdis laugh, and promise them the recipe.
Bofur and Jani sighed in unison at the sight of all the food. Nori patted Bofur’s back.
“Get yer chops ‘round that, love, ‘r the rest a’ these folk’ll leave yeh nuffin.”
“More in kitchen,” Dain mumbled comfortingly around a mouthful.
“Aye, an’ there’ll be more, once we don’ have yeh chuckin’ it all down, big bruv,” Nori teased.
“Yer as bad as tha’ hobbit, ‘r my granny.”
Dori and Nori stopped eating. Ori looked around the table. Granny wasn’t present. Ori tried to remember the last time he’d seen Granny Klak.
“Where is Granny?” he asked.
“Think she’s mopin’ over that Kib?” Nori asked. Dori frowned, pushed back from the table, and hurried away. Ori thought over the last time he’d seen his granny. She had been sorry to have Kib leave, but she hadn’t looked despondent. He frowned. He couldn’t remember seeing her since then. Had she shut herself in her room to hide her sorrow? It didn’t seem like her at all.
Everyone else around the table agreed the last time they saw her was when the Court of Miracles left.
They all heard a noise like an angry cat from upstairs. Dori stamped at high speed from the upstairs hall, down the back kitchen stairs, and out the pantry. Dori burst into the room.
“That ungrateful crabapple! After all we’ve done!”
“What’s happened?” Thorin demanded, on his feet in a moment. Balin caught the enraged Dori in his arms. Dori plumped down in his chair and threw a balled up piece of paper at the high king.
“Read that!” Dori stormed. “Just read that! Of all the nerve!”
Thorin opened the maltreated paper while Balin petted and stroked his mate. Bard and Thranduil poured wine and murmured soothing things.
“Whatever’s happened, brother?” urged Dis. Thorin blinked at the paper then sat down. He cleared his throat and read out loud.
“Dearest great grandchildren,
Your granny has decided to have a little adventure.
Don’t worry. I’m sure I shall be very safe in young Kib’s arms.
Back sometime.
Love to you all,
Granny Klak”

There was a collective gasp, then the giggles began. Ori choked and tried desperately not to laugh. Granny had run off with the circus!
The giggling grew into hearty laughter. Dori slowly unbent enough to simply look huffy.
“Of all the silly, badger-ish trick! Really, why couldn’t she have just told us? No one has any manners any more! Thrandy!’’
Thranduil swallowed his amusement and became stern. “I fully agree with you, dear Bearer. My own youngest son and my captain. No one asks permission any more. Courtesy has died an ignominious death. It is very sad.”
“Hey!” cried Sigrid indignantly. “You didn’t asked permission or tell anyone before you…” Sigrid searched for an appropriate word. “Before you deflowered our father.”
This made the amusement worse.
Bard found his tongue after gaping at his eldest and snapped.
“Your mother and I…deflowered each other many years ago, thank you very much.”
“Fine,” Sigrid frowned. “Then, re-deflowering our father!”
“Re-deflowering?” Thranduil looked delighted. “You mean I replaced his …er…flower? When shall we expect his flower to bloom?”
“He was bloody bloomin’ this morning,” Nori pointed out around a mouthful. Thorin and Bilbo coughed over their tea and Dori giggled.
“Shut up, Nori,” Sigrid scolded. “My sweet, innocent father has been besmirched.”
“Besmirched!” Bain echoed loudly.
“Totally besmirched!” Tilda piped up and went back to eating, utterly oblivious to what was going on.
“Really, Evil Stepmother!” Sigrid tried to look severe, but couldn’t quite manage it, while she wagged a finger at Thranduil.
“Ada!” Legolas gasped, eyes wide with mirth. “I never thought I’d live to see the day where you went about besmirching!”
“Legolas, don’t help!” Bard pleaded.
“Yes, Da.” Legolas cast down his eyes, demurely.
“Well,” Dori settled and served herself more stuffed grape leaves filled with rice, beef and spices.
“I suppose after living with that clan for so long, our granny needed an adventure.”
“Honored Bearer,” Bujni said solemnly, “as the new head of Clan Rikanta, I shall try and make things more exciting among us.”
“Thank you, Bujni dear,” Dori smiled sweetly at him. Legolas and Sigrid began to argue over who had been besmirched. Fili and Kili and Bain helpfully prolonged the argument.
Ori wondered when Granny would come back. She hadn’t been their granny for long. She had adopted Dori right at Dori’s presentation which had been a mere… Ori frowned at his thoughts. How long had he and Dwalin been married now? It was hard to think of life without his One, but it wasn’t that long.
“What’s go’ yeh frownin’?” Dwalin murmured, helping himself and Ori to something hot and wrapped in what Ori thought must be cabbage leaves.
“I’m sorry, Dwalin, I was trying to figure out how long we’ve been married and I can’t.”
Dwalin roared with laughter.
“We’ve been so busy,” Ori excused himself lamely. Dwalin gave his knee a squeeze.
“Jus’ glad I ain’t th’ only one who can’t figure it out.”
This made Ori giggle and Thorin raise an eyebrow at them.
“Me an’ Ori’re tryin’ t’ figure out how long we’ve been wed,” Dwalin explained. There were various murmurs around the table.

“Don’t look at me, “ Dori said imperiously. “I wasn’t there.”
“Me, neither,” Dain took the same tone.
“I wasn’t either,” Thranduil chimed in.
“I think I was out fishing,” Bard put in his two coppers.
“I hadn’t been introduced to any of you then,” Bilbo helped.

Everyone took their turn pointing out that they had not been there until Gloin offered to go and check the date on the contract. He believed he had filed it, but Balin told him it was in the office as Dwalin was of royal birth. Thorin laughed and smiled down on Ori.

“Ori, you and Dwalin are each other’s One, thus you have always been married in the eyes of Mahal.”

“I like that answer,” Ori snuggled his head into Dwalin’s shoulder.
“Aye, works f’r me.”

“Thou can say thou didst wed in the spring.” Bifur decided.

“Yes, but if we don’t know any dates, how are we to have any parties?” Dori complained. Balin patted his betrothed’s hand.

“Beloved, yeh kin have any amount a’ parties yeh like as they’re always a great success.”
A toast was drunk to Dori’s ability to host wonderful parties.

“And a toast to Ori and Dwalin,” Thorin said, rising. “May your wedded lives be merry!”

Everyone cheered and toasted them. Ori blushed and glanced at Dwalin, who was staring back at him with the look that always made Ori’s muscles tighten pleasurably. He grinned, with all the guests gone and this business with the mine done, things should go back to their accustomed grooves and he would be able to spend this days in research and his nights with his beloved husband. It was a good thought.

The rest of the evening was concentrated on the Ironhills family as they were to leave after the blessing of the mine first thing tomorrow.

Breakfast was before dawn and a hurried affair.

Dori looked perfect and mysterious in a red on red brocade velvet gown that bared her shoulders and floated down to her feet, bare but for several slender mithril anklets. Her hair flowed down and only a few tendrils of mithril threads on ruby hairpins dressed it. She wore a few mithril bracelets and the late Lady Fundin’s sigil ring. Ori was dressed up in Dwalin’s green. Thorin was in his usual blue. Balin helped Dori into the gaily festooned teacup. Balin insisted on armored and armed Furh’nk driving and Balin’s own pony, Ducati was hitched up together with Dori’s new pony, Aprilia, a sweet, dappled gray creature with very hairy fetlocks that covered her hooves.

“Have you decided on why you will say?” Thorin asked the Bearer. Dori giggled delightedly, “No, I rely upon the divine to inspire me.”

Practically, there was no reason for Dori and Ori to ride to Steam Alley to pick up the sisters just to bring them back into the mountain.

“But it will make people happy to see it,” said Dori. “Besides, I want someone besides us to see this outfit in the daylight. Mahrdin worked hard on it and I think I look terribly well.”

The day, thankfully, had dawned cool and breezy. Along the way, Dori fanned herself lazily anyway, with a silk red folding fan on silver ribs. As they rode along, the streets grew increasingly full. Apparently word travelled faster than even Dori’s teacup. Dori nodded graciously at everyone who called to her. Had she been queen, Ori doubted she would be enjoying this more.

“You’re such a ham,” he murmured.

“Oink. Oink,” said Dori pleasantly, smacking him lightly on the arm with the folded up fan.

When they arrived in Steam Alley, a huge crowd had gathered to see them off. While they waited for the sisters, they chatted with their former neighbors. Ori was glad to see so many of them looking healthier and better fed than previously, even those who had taken refuge with Mistress Annis, who was known to take it the poorest of the poor just to ensure they had a safe place to sleep. Mistress Annis gave them the pleasing news that the numbers seeking her protection were decreasing as work to rebuild Dale and pensions were coming through apace.

The door to the sisters’ house opened and Vi and Margr strode out on the stoop and stood side by side, opposite arms out to display their finery. The crowd oo’d and ah’d.

“Wha’d’yeh think, our Dori?” Vi asked.

“Ain’t it a treat?” Margr added.

They were dressed in loose caftans with whimsical, diagonally streaking lines of greens, blues, reds and purples across a gold ground, the cloth so cleverly cut that when they stood side by each like this, it looked like the lines started on one caftan and continued on the other. Their hair and beards had been likewise streaked and gathered up and stiffened to stand up in the same direction as the rushing colors of their caftans. It looked like someone had thrown cans of paint at them in a wind storm.

“That is amazing,’’ said Dori, in what Ori took as total honesty.

“Tha’ Dipfa lass’s a genius,’’ said Margr, as Furh’nk handed her in. “She knew exactly wha t’ do, didn’t she, our Vi?’’

“Aye, she said there was no point in close-fittin’ togs as caftans suited us. It’s like wearin’ air, ain’t it, yet all yer bits’s still covered. Most comfy tunic I ever wore. We’re gonna wear ‘em ’til they fall apart, says I.’’

“Betcherarse,’’ said Margr, waving to their guards, then, “Master Furh’nk! Good t’ see yer awake!’’

“What did Dipfa say the design represented?” asked Ori, because he knew it must mean something.

“She said we’re t’ represent th’ swirls o’ mystical energies o’ th’ universe as channeled by th’ Bearer, though made visible, or somethin’,’’ said Vi, poofing down on the carriage cushion with a giggle. “Oh, an’ we’ve had a note from our Glorfy, an’ he’s bringin’ us a bigger bed!’’

“It ain’t exactly comfy f’r him,’’ said Margr, “sleepin’ with his legs hangin’ over th’ edge o’th’ mattress from th’ knees down.’’

“Mind,’’ said Vi, as the carriage moved on and they all waved to the gathered crowd, “we’ll be takin’ over our Rogi’s room. It’s th’ only room that’ll fit such a big bed.’’

“You’re still allowing Rogi to live with you?” Dori asked.

“Aye, downstairs. Why? Yeh allow Nori t’ live with yeh,’’ said Margr with a shrug.

“With Nori, I’m not sure there’s any ‘letting’ allowed,’’ said Dori with a sigh. “If he can walk through walls, there’s really no use in locking him out.’’

“Oh aye,’’ said Vi. “Truth t’ tell, we was thinkin’ it were time f’r Rogi t’ get a place o’ his own, but there’s no point if he’s just in an’ out a’ th’ lockup anyway. Whenever he was out, he’d just be clutterin’ up th’ street ’til he was in again.’’

“We told him he could stay in th’ rooms downstairs, an’ as long as he don’t annoy Master Glorfy,’’ said Margr.

The sisters exchanged looks and giggled evilly.

“So, our Dori,’’ said Vi as they rode into the mountain. “Are yeh wantin’ us t’ do anythin’ in particular in the mine?’’

“Besides look imposin’, so yer hubby ain’t worried s’ much?’’ Margr asked.

Dori shook his head.

“That dwarf. I could have the entire army of Erebor guarding me, it wouldn’t make a difference.’’

Ori steeled himself as they prepared to enter to the mine lift. True, it wasn’t the same lift as he’d descended before, but they were ultimately going to the same mine, and the memory of the smells and sounds, the feel of the bowed and straining walls, had never really left him.

He glanced up at Thorin, who turned his head to give him a small grin of encouragement. Ori could do this. He had done it before.

The lift slid to a stop, and Ori was amazed at how quickly they had descended, and how smoothly. But this was the way it was supposed to be, wasn’t it. The Emerald Mine was the oldest and best-equipped in Erebor.

The gate opened onto a large, well-lit antechamber, now filled with miners. Beyond the crowd, straight ahead, lay the adit to Zark’s mine. The temporary excavated passage to the zinc mine gaped open to their right.

Bofur walked out into the antechamber ahead of them and called out, “Bearer’s in the mine!” before turning right and leading them down the passage.

The nobles fell in behind him, Dori at the head with Ori beside her, and the sisters at their backs. They quickly reached the temporary antechamber to the zinc mine, with the adit ahead of them.

Bofur continued through without pause, Jani now beside him as they called out into the still-empty passages, “Bearer’s in the mine! Bearer’s in the mine!”

They weren’t only telling the other dwarrow, Ori knew, but also telling the ground itself.

Dori gathered her robes around her.

“Well, shall we proceed?” she asked, gesturing to the mine itself.

“How can ye no’ give th’ blessin’ from here?” Balin asked softly.

“Do you want me to bless the adit and sorting room, or the entire mine? Really, Balin, if the miners are to have any faith in the place, I should at least go where they’ll actually be working.”

She swept on with Ori in tow, Vi and Margr close in their wake. Ori glanced over his shoulder at them. The sisters looked like gold-clad warg versions of dwarrowdams.

Ori thought it was a good look for them, actually.

For all of Dwalin’s concerns about ‘yahoos in th’ dark’, it was quite bright in the mine. Ulfr’s glowing white discs had been strung along the tunnel, the floor of which was leveled, and widened to accommodate walking space as well as mine tracks. It was dry here, the walls well-shored, the smells that of stone and soil and nothing more. The thrum of well-made and well-kept machinery underlay everything.

About a hundred feet down the tunnel, at a large, open space where several tunnels would eventually meet, Dori stopped. The crowd continued to file in behind her, the miners all looking over each other’s shoulders to see, and no one made a sound. They simply waited.

Abruptly, the air in the tunnel thickened and charged.

Everyone except Dori, who turned to the right, walked across the tracks and put both hands flat on the rock wall. Ori scrambled to keep up, though the air was suddenly thick as suet. He moved as close to Dori as he dared, but could only get within about five feet of the Bearer, his pen moving across the page almost independently as his attention was caught and held fast.

Margr and Vi, as though drawn, went to bracket Dori and each put a hand on her shoulder.

A breeze Ori could not feel swirled around Dori, sweeping hair, beard and gown in an invisible storm.

So low he could barely hear, Dori started to chant. The words were in old khuzdul, such as Bifur spoke, but Bifur’s speech likely never had such an effect. The reds of Dori’s robe pulsed bright and dull, and then all the red drained out of the fabric in a rush, up through Dori’s arms and out her hands into the rock, infusing it and spreading along the walls as the chanting grew louder. Ori had never heard these words, but he found himself chanting as well, and Margr and Vi, then Balin and Dwalin, Thorin and the company, the soldiers and the miners.

Ulfr’s glowing discs shone red and beat like hearts to the chanting, which echoed through the tunnel.

Then, at once the tide flowed back through the walls, into Dori’s hands, down her arms and back into her gown, scarlet on red once more. As the last notes of the chant faded, the air began to lift. Through the air drifted a word they had not chanted. A deep, masculine voice breathed,

“Mizimel.”
Mizimel. Jewel of jewels.
Dori’s shoulders relaxed.
Margr and Vi’s hands went to their sides.
Dori’s hands went to her sides.
She shook herself, as if waking, and turned back to them all with a grin.
“Well, that's done,” said Dori, as if she had just washed the dishes. “I do believe it's time for tea.”

But first there was an unpleasant duty to fulfill. When they returned to the royal cavern, Dain and Sculdis had packed up and were ready to leave for the Iron Hills.

“Are you sure you can’t at least stay for tea?” Dori asked Dain, sticking out a lower lip.
Dain chuckled and patted her cheek.
“Yer cute as pie, me dumplin’, bu’ if we don’t go now, we may never go a’tall.”
Dori’s face suddenly brightened and Dain’s laughter boomed out.
“None a’ tha’, now. We’ll see yeh again at Durin’s Day.”
Dori sighed.
“I was afraid you would insist, so I’ve taken care to pack what we’ll be having for elevenses, lunch, and tea in baskets for each of you,” she said.
“I’d never expect anythin’ less.”
Sculdis, Gridr and Dis stood nearby over an open box on the tailgate of Sculdis’ wagon. The Ironhills queen shrieked excitedly.
“Oh, what beauties! Gridr, Dis, thank you!”
Dain turned to smile at his wife.
“Wha’ have yeh there, me nugget?”
“Chisels, files, pliers an’ hammers, all engraved with me name!” Sculdis cried.
Dain sighed.
“I suppose me borrowin’ one every now an’ then’s out’ve th’ question.”
“Try it an’ I’ll chop yer fingers off,” Sculdis promised happily, blowing him a kiss.
Chopper nudged Dori with his snout, looking hopeful.
“Yes, we have a gift for you, too, so don’t give me those piglet eyes. There are four barrels of yams and a demijohn of maple syrup for you, besides.”

Ori could have sworn Chopper smiled as Dori fondly patted the huge battle boar. Ori looked around for Dain’s other son and saw Stonehelm off in the corner, talking to Bain as they looked through a crate containing books on Sindarin, and Gondorian language and philosophy and one on the history of the people of the Riddermark, all by Professor Bilbo Baggins, the first cowritten with Lord Elrond of Imladris.

Bilbo had looked so proud when Thorin asked him to contribute these as Stonehelm’s going away present, especially when he heard that the young prince had his own, growing library. Dain’s personal library consisted entirely of technical manuals and treatises on engineering and mechanics. Sculdis’ was devoted to armaments. Stonehelm’s tastes were more eclectic.

Right now, the young princes looked grim. They spoke too low to be heard, but for once Stonehelm was more agitated than his friend.

It was none of Ori’s business, was it. Of course not!
“Th-they’ll m-miss each oth-ther.”
Ori spun around, heart beating furiously.
“Mahal’s bloody boots, Arne! You startled me!”
The Ironfist prince laughed as they embraced.
“Th-that’s w-what you g-et for-for drifting off.”
“You’ve been taking Master Brur’s example,” Ori accused. He stood back and pretended to survey Arne critically. “He doesn’t seem to have taken too many bites out of you.”
“H-he’s no w-worse than-tha Da,” said Arne. “And he d-doesn’t crowd m-me.”
“There is a lot to be said for someone letting you just bash on with your work,” Ori agreed. “Did you see Theodred before he left?”
Arne nodded.
“I- I made s-sure he g-got th-th b-books we t-talked about.”

“Thank you. I was being pulled in six different directions.”

Arne grinned evilly.
“Y-yes. I see y-you’re fam-famous n-n-now.”

“That’s right,” said Bain, approaching with Stonehelm. “Our Ori’s a fashion icon!”

Ori dropped his face into his hands and groaned.
“I wish I’d run out of the house that morning barefoot.”

Bain waved that off.

“Then all the cobbler’s in Dale and under the mountain would be after you for putting them out of business.”

Stonehelm added dolefully, “It’s very sad when cobbler’s riot.”

“Y-you’ll ju-just have t-to c-c-cope,” said Arne in a consoling tone.

The three of them shook their heads and looked mournful.

Ori rolled his eyes.

“You’re a pack of shitheads.”

The three of them pounced on Ori, hugging him and laughing.

“Aw, I’m goin’ t’ miss yeh, idadith,” said Stonehelm.

“Keep calling me ‘little uncle’ and neither I nor my slingshot will miss you!” Ori protested.

“Besides, we’ll see you at Durin’s Day, won’t we?”

“Whether you like it or not,” said Kili as he approached with Fili, Sigrid, and Tauriel. Fili asked,

“So, what has Imad Dori got in store for the Iron Hills contingent?”

“It’s a big secret,” said Ori. “Dori’s getting terribly melodramatic these days. I know what Thorin planned, which is why there are those hard-sided wagons, and four ponies pulling each.

The whole family drew in closer to say their goodbyes, just in time to hear Dain say to Thorin, “I already go’ as much pig shit as I kin handle, cuz.”

“Then it’s a good thing the wagons aren’t full of pig shit, isn’t it,” said Thorin. “There’s one wagon each of copper, silver, and gold.”

Dain’s jaw nearly hit the ground.

“Tha’s very generous,” said Dain, obviously overwhelmed. “Thank yeh.”

“You’ve earned every ounce of it,” said Thorin, embracing him. Bard nodded. He approached, extending his hand to shake.

“The mechanical spider plow alone is worth a wagon of gold. All of Dale thanks you, as well.”

“Aw! Tha’ was nothin’! Tha’ was fun!” said Dain.

He grasped Bard’s hand and yanked him down into an embrace.

“Please do not break my husband,” said Thranduil loftily. “I just got him.”

Dain released Bard, laughing.

“Just givin’ ‘im a taste o’ married life with yeh, then,” Dain snarked, bowing to Thranduil, who deigned to incline his head in acknowledgment, while ostentatiously dusting Bard off. Sculdis bounced over to the elf king. Thranduil leant down with a smile and embraced her.

There were hugs and farewells all around.

Dain turned to call Chopper from where he was snuggling with Tilda.

“Cho-PPER!” he called.

“There’s just one more thing before you go, nadadel,” said Dori as Balin stood beside her, holding her hand. “Balin and I gift you the right to name our first born.”

Dain stood stunned, opened his mouth, closed it, and burst into tears. He grabbed Dori and hugged her off her feet.

Sculdis darted forward.

“When’re yeh due?”

Dori smiled and said, a little breathlessly, “I’m not expecting yet.”

“We thought we’d give our Dain a little time t’ think it over,” said Balin. “There’s only one rule.”

Dain opened his mouth again, Dori tapped his nose and cut him off.
“You can’t name the badgerling after Chopper, or any other pig you’ve ever owned.”
Dain stuck out his bottom lip, then laughed.
“If yeh insist, wee sib. I’ll set meself t’ thinkin’ immediately. Thank yeh, a million times over.”
Dori laughed and hugged him.
“You’re entirely welcome.”
“Bring th’ pig shit next time, Mister Dain,” Hamfast called out. “I’ll be needed it f’r next years crops!”

Elevenses in the breakfast parlor was custard tarts and blackberry jelly buns, buttered toast, and fresh strawberries with cream, washed down with hot, black tea, or some of the green tea Bombur had brought and Binni brewed and poured over ice. The Durins all exclaimed over this, remembering it from the inn. The conversation was relaxed, so much so that the crash sent even Bilbo reaching for his sword.

The idea of Bilbo with a sword sat rather odd, but the thought was swept from Ori's mind by what happened next.
Roäc had smashed himself against the closed windows.
Thorin leapt for the door and threw it open. Roäc smacked into his chest in a storm of feathers.
"Roäc! What is it?"
The raven shot out a barrage of squawks, croaks and clicks.
"Slow down!” Thorin cried. "It's terrible when you stutter!"
Roäc took a deep breath, and started off yet again, though, apparently Thorin and Dis at least could understand him, because they gaped in amazement.
"Are they sure?” Thorin demanded.
Roäc gave a muffled scream, probably of frustration, and winged backward with one of Thorin's braids in his beak, as if he could pull the much heavier dwarf along with strength alone.
"Stop that!” Thorin ordered. "Go and tell Bofur I'm on my way.”
Roäc gave him a final, rather vicious, tug before flying back out.
Thorin turned to Ori.
"Will you-
"I'll get my kit,” said Ori, already moving. "What's happened?"
"The zinc miners have struck mithril,” said Thorin.
"My,” said Dori, "I am good."
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Dori is good and apparently quite talented, but Dori would have told you that anyway. Off we go with our Ori. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Word traveled faster than their ponies. Hundreds of dwarrows had gathered at the lifts to the Emerald Mine. Dwalin’s troops had to carve Thorin and Ori a path. Ori was glad the rest of the company had chosen to stay at home. Thranduil and Bard had immediately offered their help with anything that needed doing. Thranduil actually followed them out to their ponies and adjured Thorin several times to send Roäc if there was anything they wanted seen to.

Just the sight of the high king riding up on Minty seemed to set off the curious and the bewildered and the din of chatter rose to a roar.

Bofur met them at the lifts, worrying his hat mercilessly in his restless hands. Thorin was talking before he even alit from his pony.

"Bofur! Are you alright?"

The miner was the color of milk.

"I - I - I never seen the like!" Bofur cried, falling in step with Thorin as they walked to the lifts, Ori on their heels and already writing like mad. "We started scentin’ mithril right after Dori left. Jani got the idea we should dig where Dori touched and there was the vein, right below the surface!"

The lifts were speedy, but it seemed to take forever to descend.

"There’s no chance it’s been there this whole time?" Thorin asked.

"No, no chance," said Bofur. "We’d know."

"And you’re sure it’s in the zinc mine, not the Emerald Mine?"

"In the zinc mine. Remember, our Dori insisted on walkin’ nearly a hundred feet from the adit and Balin about tossed his scree with worry."

"He’s about to toss it for another reason entirely," said Thorin. "You said Jani found it?"

"Aye, but she’s already sayin’ she don’t want the finder’s fee."

Since this was five percent of the price brought by the entire seam, Ori thought her generosity worthy of the valar.

After their visit in the spring, Ori had never imagined he’d enter this mine again. Now he’d been here twice in one day and it was starting to look familiar.

As they walked from the lift, the scent hit his nose and palate, making him gasp.

Thorin stopped walking abruptly and rested his hand against the wall. Ori saw him struggle to keep his expression neutral. Ori had no idea how he could do. The smell and the energy of the mithril fired every nerve in his body, bouncing off and vibrating against the Durin bead in his hair, knocking against his spine.

"Blessed Mahal," Thorin breathed.

"Take a few breaths," said Bofur. "The miners’re waitin’ down there."

"You’re right," said Thorin.

He stood upright, and seemed to draw back into himself, with his face the mask of calm holding everything in place.

As often as Ori had seen Thorin do this, he still wondered how the king managed to keep the top of his head from blowing off.
Thorin turned to him.
"All right?"
Ori nodded, trying to convey more confidence than he felt.
The miners stood, absolutely silent, eyes huge.
Jani, closest to the wall, turned and stared at them.
She shook her head.
"At least she’s still standin’," Bofur said, "the fella who was with her when she struck it had t’ be carried out an’ up to the miners’ commons to recover."
Even in Ori’s limited experience, raw ore and precious stone looked nothing like what they would become once they were extracted and processed.
Mithril, however, looked like mithril, that same matte silver, in a continuous flowing seam like water, unmixed with other minerals. It was so hard, the entire seam had to be excavated as a piece. This had previously not been a problem, since it was so rare, and the seams so small, they never reached deeper into the rock than a single dwarf couldn’t excavate in a few hours.
"How far does the seam extend?" asked Thorin.
"Er… we ain’t found the far end of what’s just below the surface yet," said Bofur. "And we don’t know how deep it is, neither. It’s gonna take all of us t’dig it out," said Bofur. "We might even have to divert magma t’ break it right here. It’ll never fit in the ore lift."
"Do we have the infrastructure in place to do that?" Thorin asked.
"Actually? Yah, we do," said Bofur. "I… er… may’ve gone a little nuts makin’ sure everythin’ was shored up good an’ proper."
"Good thing you did," said Thorin. "Can you manage this? What do you need from me?"
"I can manage it, providin’ I can wake everybody up," said Bofur. He looked back over at the assembled miners, who seemed pretty much stuck in place. "We’ll need security. We’ll need t’ make sure folk aren’t followed home at the end o’ their shifts as if they got bulging pockets. Raw mithril don’t break into handy chunks like that anyway, but some folks don’t know that and they’ll be expectin’ miners t’ be carryin’ it around with ‘em."
"Yeh’ll want t’ take th’ old ‘escape’ lift behind th’ textile market, then a side passage t’ Fundin House," said Dwalin, approaching from the access tunnel. "Folk’re stormin’ th’ main tunnel t’ th’ royal residence, demandin’ t’ see th’ Bearer. They’re sayin’ it’s a miracle."
Nori’s head and torso popped down through the ceiling and he snorted.
"As if our Dori ain’t snooty enough already."
"Nori," said Thorin, "get Dori to the parapet over the main gate, make sure she’s guarded."
"Is that safe, Thorin?" Ori asked.
"Safer than her staying inside the house. If the crowd thinks we’re hiding her, there’ll be a riot."
"And not the good kind," said Nori, vanishing back through the rock.
Ori looked up at Thorin.
"This is insane," he said.
"I’m not disagreeing with you," Thorin replied.

So, Dori once more put on the blessing robe, and went to the parapet where the vast population of two kingdoms gathered. There was cheering, screaming, singing and crying. Through it all, Dori smiled serenely and waved. Mistress Dazla brought her a cup of tea, which she drank, which caused more cheering.
Eventually the sun went down, but the crowd was still there.
"You know," said Dori, though she had to shout to be heard over the roar, "I believe I’m growing rather fatigued. I can’t stay here all night."
Thorin stood in the doorway to the staircase and said, "Here, give me your cloak."
Dori did so.
Thorin gestured to have a weapon rack wheeled forward and draped the cloak over it. Then it was pushed to the parapet.
Ori got it immediately, but he wasn’t sure how many in the crowd would get it. It was such an old-fashioned notion, and one that generally only applied to dwarf kings. The cloak was accepted as a temporary stand-in for the real thing. Even kings had to eat, sleep, and pee.

“Will it work?” Ori asked.
“I hope so,” said Thorin.

They all returned to the sitting room of Fundin house where Vi and Margr were lounging, drinking tea, and playing with the faunts.

"Well," said Vi, "here's a t-do."
"How're yeh keepin', our Dori?" Margr asked.
"I'm perfectly fine," said Dori. "Oin has given Balin a sedative and put him to bed. I'm going to check on him and put on something slightly less ceremonial."

She went down the hall toward the private rooms.

Thorin threw himself in a chair, with a groan. Bilbo brought him tea and sat on the arm of his chair. Ori spared a thought for his husband, who was coordinating security efforts on at least three fronts and would likely continue to do so for the duration.

Nori walked in through the fireplace and stood in front of Thorin. Nori looked worried, which did nothing for Ori’s confidence.

"Er… boss?"
"Yes, Nori?" Thorin asked wearily.
"We got another problem."
"Go on, tell me."
"There's a rumor started that you're Durin the Deathless Returned."
"Oh, fuck me," Thorin muttered. "Really?"
"Yep."

Thorin turned to Ori.
"Do you suppose Oin has more of that sedative?"
"So, Thorin," said Nori, strangely unsettled. "Are ya?"
Thorin laughed tiredly.
"I am not."
"That's aright, then," said Nori. "I take it my next task is to disabuse the populace o' their unfortunate misconception?"

"Just be gentle with them, Nori."
"Sure, sure." Nori vanished out through the wall.

"Durin… they think I'm… Oh, bloody Mahal," muttered Thorin.
Margr shook her head.

"Nah, no way yer Deathless," she said.
Vi added, “Durin’d’ve offed Thror an' Frerin years ago.”
“Happy thought, indeed,” Dori called from down the hall, making the elf king snicker from his seat on the sofa.

“There is nothing wrong with Dori’s hearing,” he noted.
“Dori’s ears go around corners,” Ori explained.

Bard sat beside Thranduil, holding the elf king’s hand. Tilda was happily in Thranduil’s lap, cuddling Mask.

“I miss Chopper,” she complained. Bard rolled his eyes.
“I don’t,” Thranduil answered her.
“Chopper’s nice,” she insisted.
“Chopper is a pig,” Thranduil reminded her.
“He’s a nice pig.”
Bard sighed, “Tilda, I’m sure you’ll see Chopper again soon enough. In the meantime you may not have a spider, or a goat or a pig or an oliphaunt.”

“Ori has an oliphaunt.”

Thranduil seemed to think he was helping when he said, “Ori’s oliphaunt is with a traveling circus and, therefore, not at home much.”
She opened her mouth. Bard cut her off.
“No, Tilda you may not have a traveling oliphaunt either. Besides, Bob will be jealous.”
“Bob’s yours,” Tilda argued.
“Bob?” Thorin asked.
“My dog,” Bard explained.
“Why did you call your dog, Bob?” Thranduil inquired. Bard grinned, but Tilda interrupted before he could get a word out.
“’Cose Da got him as a puppy,” Tilda explained. “He fell in the cistern and couldn’t swim and just floated there bobbing up and down so, Da said his name was Bob.”
Thranduil stared at Bard, who looked terribly pleased with himself, as all the dwarrow groaned.
“You, beloved husband, are extremely weird.”
“I suppose,” said Bard, “we’ll have to risk toddling home and being weird in Dale. Tilda has lessons with Master Brur tomorrow.”
Ori groaned.
“I was supposed to go to work today! Master Brur is going to fire me!”
Thranduil said, “No, I don’t think so, Ori. I think ‘act of valar’ is a reasonable excuse.”
“I should have sent a note!”
Bilbo said, “I sent one for you, while you were off blessing the mine.”
“How did you know I wouldn’t be able to go back to work?” Ori asked.
“You’re a Durin. I made a wild leap of faith,” said Bilbo. “Bard, we know we’re asking you to be terribly forbearing, but we would like you all to stay for supper.”
Bard grinned.
“Feed me and I’ll follow you anywhere.”
The door to the receiving room opened and Mistress Dazla announced, “Master Mahrdin, Mistress - er - Dipsy, Master Fa, Miss Dipfa and, well, you all know Lord Bujni.”
The quintet entered, looking harried, and all bowed to the king, who had only just managed to pry himself from his chair.
Mistress Dipsy said, “Well, those lovely folk out by the tunnel are quite rabid, though several of them are extremely well-dressed.”
“Mm,” Master Fa agreed. “Good that so many of our people know how to put together a well-balanced outfit.”
Dipfa’s parents were shiny. That was the best word Ori could come up with for them. They were ridiculously beautiful, with their beards ornamented to give even King Thror competition. Ori wondered how they didn’t just pitch over on their faces when they bowed.
Dwarrow were nothing if not sturdy, but these two were pushing the edge.
Dori reappeared and they bowed to her as well. She had changed into a batiked caftan, light blue figures on an orange ground. The whole thing seemed to vibrate. Then they exclaimed over the caftan and, Ori thought, bowed to it as well.
“Very good of you to brave the crowds,” said Dori, as if they had weathered a sale on dry goods.
“She’s just pulling the garlic bread out of the oven. Dinner will be served in a moment.”
“Do you need me to set the table, Dori?” Ori asked.
“No, pet, it’s all set up in the breakfast parlor. It’s such a nice evening. Alas, I’m afraid poor Balin will have to give it a miss. He’s still asleep.”
The visitors were introduced to King Thranduil, and bowed a third - or perhaps a fourth - time.
He acknowledged them with a regal nod, which Tilda imitated, and they were transported.
They tried to bow to Bard, but he just waved them off.
“No need,” he said. “That’s enough exercise for one night, especially before dinner.”
The meal itself took on the air of theater. It was obvious Dipfa’s parents were absorbing every word and gesture with delight. The Durins were not exactly shy dwarrow, and Thranduil amped up his royal attitude for the occasion. They all went so far over the top, Ori was on the lookout for nosebleeds.
“Ah,” said Thranduil. “Dori, I see you’ve acquired a noodle maker such as Bombur has at the Dipsy and Fa’s eyes grew larger and larger as they viewed this exotic fare, surreptitiously glancing from under their eyelashes at the other diners to learn how such a thing was eaten. Ori had a sneaking suspicion that noodles were about to become the most ‘in’ of all the ‘in’ things under the mountain.

“So, these ain’t just really long dumplin’s?” Vi asked.

“Actually, very like really long dumplings,” said Dori, “but they hold the tomato sauce so perfectly.”

As a concession to King Thranduil, the sauce contained a medley of mushrooms, chunks of garlic and tomato, dotted with dried flakes of basil and oregano, but the tidbits of meat were presented in large basins so the others could serve themselves at will.

Finally, coffee was served with pots of fluffy, ginger-flavored cream, alongside platters of fresh fruit.

“Thranduil, you seem rather serious and a bit pouty this evening,” Thorin teased.

“I’m pouting because I didn’t get any elderberry jam,” said Thranduil. “Really, Thorin, it’s too bad of you to give the entire supply to Lady Galadriel and not save me a drop.”

“It’s not elderberry jam, but we do have a present for you,” said Thorin.

Thranduil raised an eyebrow and Thorin laughed.

“We promise, it’s not a copy of my bathing costume.”

“Well, in that case,” said Thranduil, with a perfectly blank expression, “I am delighted.”

They moved to the sitting room where Thranduil resumed his royal perch on the couch and gave a regal gesture.

“Let us permit the gift-giving to proceed.”

Bard rolled his eyes, but he was still smiling.

Dipfa brought forth a paper packet, about a foot square. Ori was amused to recognize the elven fabric-wrapping paper, perhaps left over from Dipfa’s coronation costume. Dipfa smiled at Thranduil, though the smile was a little nervous around the edges.

“Your majesty,” she began, “we hope you will accept this gift as a token of our friendship and respect.”

Thranduil’s features softened a little as he took the present.

“Thank you, Miss Dipfa, I’m honored.”

He unwrapped the parcel, the paper fell away, revealing yards of filmy cloth, like water flowing through his hands.

Ori gasped along with everyone else. It was the same material as Dori’s presentation outfit, but far more of it, and it fell open into a magnificent robe with a round neckline, notched at the throat, bell sleeves, and material gathered and pleated at the back into a train.

Just for a moment, Thranduil was speechless.

This, of course, wouldn’t last.

“This is incredible work. Master Mahrdin, you have outdone yourself.”

“You created this?” Thranduil asked the dam.

She colored violently, though it threw her into marvelous relief with her own outfit.

“Yes, your majesty,” said Dipfa. “I wove the cloth, designed the robe, and stitched it together.”

“I congratulate you,” said the elf king.

She curtseyed, whispering, “Your servant, King Thranduil.”

When she straightened she turned to Mahrdin, biting her lip.

He smiled at her fondly and said, “I believe this will do nicely…. Master Dipfa.”

She squealed and threw her arms around him, nearly knocking him to the ground with her excitement.

Then she ran from person to person, hugging them and receiving congratulations on her mastery, though she returned to Bujni every few hugs.
“My precious diamond, you are magnificent,” said Bujni, or he tried to, as she kissed him repeatedly, planting violet cosmetic kisses all over his face.

Dipfa’s parents look fit to bust with pride and her father blotted his eye with a tie-dyed handkerchief of aquamarine and lime, the same colors and pattern as the enameled beads in his hair and beard.

Thranduil turned to Dori with a look.
“You knew about this.”
“Of course, Thrandy dear. I approximated your measurements, but Dipfa did all the work. You’ll look divine in it, I’m sure. Won’t he, Bard?”

Bard looked up as if he’d been caught stealing apples from a cart. He’d been trying to congratulate Dipfa without actually looking at the robe.

Thranduil smiled crookedly.
“Dori, I must try this on. May I borrow your dressing room?”
“Certainly, Thrandy, dear. Right through here.”

They walked toward the private quarters, but Thranduil stopped at the doorway and looked back at the king of Dale.
“ Aren’t you coming to help me?”
Bard leaned down to kiss Dipfa’s cheek, and walked after Thranduil as quickly as dignity allowed.

Nori stuck his head out of the coal scuttle. “He’s gonna be comin’ t’ sumfin’.”
“Hush,” giggled Ori. Then something occurred to him and he thought he’d better ask now, lest he forget. “ Thorin?”
“ Ori?” the king replied in obvious amusement.
“ Why is it so terrible when Roäc stutters?”
Thorin snickered.
“ When Arne stutters in westron, you simply wait and what he says is clear. The raven language is made of repetitive clicks, caws and squawks.”
“ Oh,” said Ori. “ So if you change the number of caws or clicks…”
“ Yes, he was originally saying he’d found an elf in his drawers.”

Bard and Thranduil emerged some time later, Thranduil composed and perfect, with the robe wrapped back up, the packet under his arm. Bard looked rumpled and a little pink.

“ Well?” Dori asked slyly.
“ Did it fit, your majesty?” Dipfa jumped in. “ Do you need me to make any adjustments?”
“ No, Miss Dipfa, it’s wonderful,” Thranduil purred. “ Isn’t it, Bard?”
“ Yes,” said Thranduil. “ Bard and I both appreciate it.”
“ We… should be getting back home now,” said Bard.

Thorin chuckled.
“ One more thing before you go, Bard.”

Figríd, Kíliel and Gigolas had joined them, Kíli polishing off any leftover desserts. Fíli approached Bard and bowed, holding out a small lacquered box with metal edges, a tiny, perfect piece of art.

“ We hope you will accept this humble gift as a token of our thanks and esteem - not to mention a tribute to your bravery in the face of all our Durin chaos.”
Bard took it, lifted the clasp and opened the box. He smiled.

Thranduil looked over his shoulder and Tilda hopped up and down attempting to see for herself.
“ What is it, Da?”
Bard drew out a length of braided gold chain, finished with a pendant, a small hammer and anvil carved out of rich, deep orange stone.
“ Ooooo,” said Tilda. “ It’s a necklace!”
Bard looked it over carefully, obviously surprised and pleased.
“This isn’t just a pretty ornament, is it,” he said.

“It’s the protective amulet traditionally worn by dwarf kings,” said Thorin. “Carnelian is thought to cool the blood, something you may need when you’re dealing with less than cooperative subjects.”

“Or less than cooperative offspring?” Bard asked, with a smirk. “Do you wear one?”

“On open court days I’ve always worn two,” said Thorin. “Now that I’m actually king I’m thinking of having the throne remade it in.”

Bard asked, “Won’t that clash?”

“I’m hoping it will throw the rest of the throne room into considerable relief,” replied Thorin.

“Ah. Well, thank you very, very much for this,” said Bard.

Dis said, “You’re welcome, but we’re not finished. Fili?”

The prince smiled and said, “When you are ready to think about coronation, I would be honored if you will allow me to forge your crown. We will work together on the design, of course.”

“We promise,” Thorin added gravely, “no chandeliers.”

Bard laughed and hugged Fili.

“I would be honored if you forged my crown. Thank you.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Things are moving apace as they do among these Durins! And amazingly enough, Ori gets to go back to work in the library! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Early the next morning, Ori went off to work, even though the crowds gathered at the tunnel to the royal quarters showed no sign of abatement.

“Are you sure this will work, Nori?” Ori asked.

“Works for th’ ferrets,” said Nori. “Just hold me hand, don’t let go, an’ don’t open yer eyes.”

“Believe me, I have no intention of opening them.”

The passage through the walls was cold, and Ori imagined this was what it would be like to slog through old porridge.

Soon Nori said, “Right, chick. Ya can open ‘em again.”

They stood in the passage outside Master Brur’s office.

“Will you have to pick me up, do you think?” Ori asked.

“I’ll send a raven, if I hafta. Yer buffalo’s wranglin’ the crowd right enough.”

In fact, Dwalin had never come home last night and Ori was worried, even though Dwalin knew his job. What was one dwarf against a mob that wanted what lay behind him?

Nori smacked the back of his head lightly.

“Here, none o’ that foolishness. I’ll see t’ the buffalo. You see t’… whatever it is ya see t’.

Words, I suppose.”

And he turned and walked back through the wall.

Ori took a deep breath, straightened his tunic, and went to Brur’s office door. It was open, and Brur was giving Tilda dictation, the object of which was to increase a scribe’s speed and accuracy. Of course, most scribes were a lot older than Tilda. Nor were scribes usually treated to recitations of Brur’s misspent youth, dipping damlings’ braids in their inkwells at school.

“Oi, there yeh are, Ori,” said Brur briskly, rising and heading to the door. He barked over his shoulder, “Keep writin’. Make somethin’ up while I’m gone.”

“Aye, Master Brur,” said Tilda, eyes still to her paper.

“Be’er be interestin’.” Master Brur had the last word.

They took the lift down into the archives, then traveled on foot to a room Ori had not seen before. It was left as a rough cavern and it was lined with built-in trays, but the main feature was an enormous table. The end of the table was well lighted. There, on a stool, sat Arne, leaning over dozens of fragments of broken pottery that were covered in ancient dwarven writing, back to the First Age at the very least. Arne twiddled his pen between two fingers.

“Arne!”

The prince look up and waved, grinning.

“C-care to h-help m-me wi’ a j-jigs-saw p-puzzle?”

“Ostrakai!” cried Ori. “Is this the new project, Master Brur?”

“Thought yeh might like a challenge,” said Brur. “I got Omi up on the reference desk, an’ Loli followin’ Thorin around.”

“It’s so quiet down here!” said Ori.

“T-too quiet,” said Arne.
In the distance, from out in the shadows, came slow, hissing breaths, the rearrangement of furniture and the tinkling of glass or pottery.

“S-scary s-sons of b-basalts,” said Arne with a shiver.

“The archivists?” Ori whispered, then wondered why he was whispering.

“I-I hope s-so,” said Arne.

“Well, I’ll leave ye h t’ it, then,” said Brur, cheerfully whistling as he strolled back to the lift.

They watched him go and turned to one another.

“So,” said Ori, “shall we concentrate on our work, that way we’ll be caught unawares when they emerge to feast on our souls?”

“L-let’s b-bash on wi-with it,” said Arne with a nod and a shrug.

Time passed very quickly, and the archivists were quite forgotten as, side by side, Arne and Ori delved into the mysteries of their remote ancestry. It was apparent they had the scattered bits of several different handwritings, all fragmentary, though quite distinguishable. Arne owned that the one who wrote in silver in on black pottery shards what his favorite.

“M-makes m-me f-f-feel in-inadequate,” he muttered wryly.

As predicted, the majority of the shards contained marketing and ‘to do’ lists. One of them, in a tiny hand, seemed to be questioning: Silver? Copper? Opals?

The cirth for opals was underlined three times and followed by six question marks.

These shards were duly grouped, translated, and catalogued, then put aside to be researched for similarities with any possible matching handwriting in the vast collection.

The three remaining groups of shards were far meatier.

The largest group contained tantalizing excerpts of dirty poems or songs, mainly of the author praising the size of his own cock.

Arne and Ori referred to this mysterious balladeer as ‘Master Little Dick’.

The second group was harder to translate, the hand eccentric, the shards written over and crossed out and many chipped and broken in the middle of words, as if they had been hurled with great force.

As near as they could tell, these were the jumbled drafts of a love letter. Ori wondered if this person ever made progress, or was even now in the Halls of the Dwarven Ancestors, surrounded by broken pottery and piles of snapped nibs.

They referred to this writer as ‘The Lover’.

The group they saved for last was far older even than the others, the cirths more rune-like, though the hand was that of a gifted scribe.

It seemed to be a story about a king, though which king, or even if it was a dwarf king, were all unknowns.

Oddest of all, they kept finding a symbol like a stylized corona of the sun.

“Have you ever seen this before?” Ori asked.

“No, I-I h-hoped y-you had.”

“I’ve never heard of a dwarf king named after the sun, or about a king on a quest for the sun.”

Nor did it help that Someone lurked at the back of Ori’s mind, snickering.

“M-maybe it-it’s Eru?” Arne ventured.

The snickering rose to open guffaws.

“Something tells me it’s not Eru,” said Ori.

Arne looked over the shards as they had arranged them on the table, shifted a few tentatively and said, “I-I did pr-prel-prel- Oh, Mahal!” he snapped in Khuzdul. “I did preliminary work on these for Master Brur. The handwriting on all the other pieces matched bits we had catalogued before, at least superficially. These pieces don’t match anything and I. Hate. Stuttering!”

“You know I don’t care if you stutter, right?” Ori asked, squeezing his hand.

“But I care! Now that I have someone worth talking to, I just want to talk!” Arne winced and let out a deep breath. “Sorry.”

“Better out than in,” said Ori. “Master Brur will be really angry if you explode and smear yourself all over his stuff.”
Arne blinked at him.
“T-that’s r-really gross.”
“Yes, but probably accurate.”

From the dark echoed faint, hollow chuckling. It seemed to come from everywhere at once.
“A-and th-that’s r-r-really cr-creepy.”
“Lunch?” Ori suggested.
“R-race y-yeh t-to th-the l-lift!”
Ori felt better the minute the lift started moving.

When the lift doors opened again, Ori stepped out and fell backward as a large, black blur shot right across his face.
“Whoa!” Arne cried, catching him.

They watched the raven bank the corner and disappear.
“Someone’s in a hurry,” Ori said.
“Wh-where’s h-h-he g-going?”
“MAHAL’S BLESSED, BLURRY, BLUE BALLS!”
“Master Brur’s office,” said Ori dryly.
Brur himself thundered back around the corner toward them, Tilda at his heels.
“You an’ you, come with me!” he shouted at them as he whipped by.
“No lunch for us,” said Ori. “Come on!”
He had no idea where they were going, but they exited the library to cadres of soldiers and a sizable cart, which Brur heaved himself into and Tilda leapt after him like a spring kid, leaving Ori and Arne no choice but to follow.
“Afternoon, Lord Ori, Prince Arne,” said Arb at the reins. “Everybody hold on tight!”
They zipped through a gap in the crowd still congregating at the entrance to the royal quarters.
“Where are we going?” Ori asked.
“Emerald Mine,” said Arb.
“Did they strike mithril, too?”
Arb laughed.
“Dunno, but whate’er it is, it knocked Lord Zark on his arse so hard he still ain’t got up!”

The crowds had largely left the area around the mine, and so it was a work of the moment to get to the lifts and plunge down into the earth. When the lift stopped and they stepped out, they saw miners milling about the adit to the Emerald Mine and it wasn’t many steps beyond that they heard Lord Zark, voice strained with shock.
“… just knocking in the wall for the new lift shaft! It fell right out at our feet!”
Brur stopped abruptly in the open passageway. Tilda nipped around him, but Arne and Ori could see over his shoulders.
An enormous iron crate lay on its side on the ground, the hasp broken, the top leaning open and, over the floor in a massive spill…
“Those are ostrakai,” said Ori.
Zark whipped around to face him.
“They were buried in the wall! Do you know how long they’ve been here? This passage hasn’t been used since they stabilized the throne room floor!”
“That’s… a while ago,” Ori allowed.
“And you know what these things are?” Zark demanded.
“Ostrakai. Pottery shards once commonly used as scratch paper.”
Zark raised a brow.
“Why would you write on pottery shards? Paper fits better in your pockets.”
“If the pieces are as old as we think, they predate rag paper. Parchment was too dear to use for things like market lists. Even now, paper is common, but few working people can afford it. You have to pay for it. Pottery shards are still free.”
Zark shifted his neck and said, rather more quietly,
“I had no idea. My apologies, Lord Ori. It still doesn’t explain why someone hid a crate big eough to hold a goat, and stuffed it full of ancient market lists, in my mine.”

Ori edged closer and bent over the pile. The pieces were mostly cream colored or very light brick red. On one side the textures were pebbled, too rough to take ink or graphite or chalk. The other side, which would have been inside whatever these were, was glazed and covered in runes.

“L-look at a-all th-th-p-pieces that m-match,” said Arne.
“I know,” said Ori. “There’s enough here for at least three whole pots. They were probably the big vessels used to store cooking oil. The handwriting is classical. This is at least one massive text, possibly more.”

Zark said, “Why do I get the feeling you’re going to tell me these weren’t broken accidentally?”
“If you wanted to hide what you were writing,” said Ori, “pottery shards are lowly and common.
No one would give them a second glance.”

“But why are they hidden here? And why are they coming to light now?”
“I think we’ll have to read them to find out,” said Ori.
“Can you read these?”
“A little, and there are many master scribes who could likely read a lot more.”

A fuss behind them in the tunnel produced Dwalin in full uniform, his eyebrows in a ‘v’ of consternation.

“Ori? Yeh a’righ’?”
Ori lifted his hand to gesture Dwalin forward.
Dwalin frowned at the pottery shards on the floor.
“Someone’s gonna get a spankin’,” he said.
“We have to get these out of here,” said Ori, “but carefully.”
“We kin lay ‘em out on th’ tables in one o’ th’ empty meetin’ rooms at th’ library,” said Brur.
He had skirted the trunk and was using a small torch to inspect the now-empty hole in the wall.
“When can we start digging again?” asked Zark.
“Hold yer wargs, laddie,” said Brur. “I’m no’ missin’ a blessed thing.”
Tilda peered in after him. Dwalin caught sight of her and sighed.
“Til, yer da’s gonna explode when he hears yeh’ve been down in a mine.”
She looked back at him and tilted her head.

“Why?”
“It’s a long list,” he replied dryly.
Brur glanced over at her and swore under his breath.
“Keep f’rgettin’ she’s no’ a badger.”
“How are we getting these to the library?” Ori asked. “We can’t rattle along in the cart with them loose. I’m sure we lost pieces just from the crate hitting the ground.”

“Wr-wrap-ped in w-w-ool,” said Arne.
“Good idea,” said Ori. “I know we have a whole storage room of wool roving back at Fundin house. If we’re quick and careful we can get them to the library with minimal damage. Arb?”

“M’lord?”
“Will you please take the cart and have it filled with roving?”
“Aye, a’course.”
He saluted, turned on his heel.
It was then Ori realized he’d forgotten something. He wasn’t in charge.
Sheepishly, he turned to Brur.
“If that’s alright with you, Master Brur?”

“Why, yer so fierce, I don’ dare disagree,” said Brur with a snort, but he was smirking the whole time. “If yeh lot will make quick work a’ th’ pottery, I’ll finish inspectin’ where it fell from. I don’ think there’s any more surprises waitin’ back there, but I didn’t know abou’ this one, neither.”

“Yeh want me t’ send f’r more scribes t’ help yeh, love?” Dwalin asked.
“Please,” said Ori. “Loli and Bujni, if you can get ahold of them. Bilbo, if he can spare the time.
I want these some place secure and comforting as soon as possible. They’re setting my teeth on edge.”

“They didn’t appear by accident, I’m presumin’.”

“No,” said Ori.

“Aye, I was afraid yeh’d say that.”

They had to bring in lights and more tables to lay the pieces out. They were jumbled, and apparently all inscribed by the same hand. The only thing that gave Ori hope was that the pots had been different shades.

“I think,” said Bilbo, “this is a single, massive text.”

Ori reached and carefully touched one piece dominated by the same round corona with narrow triangular rays all around it.

“This,” he said, “is not a dwarf symbol. It’s like the bits in the archive, but slightly larger.”

“It’s a sunflower,” said Bilbo.

“Don’t all flowers grow in the sun?” Loli asked.

“More or less. There are some that prefer shade or partial shade, but I shan’t go into that. There is a flower that is called a sunflower. I recognize this pattern because it’s the same pattern hobbits still sew on their clothes and linens.”

“Do you think they come from the time of the hobbits in Dimrill Dale?” Ori asked.

Arne stared at him.

“Hobbits aren’t descended from men,” Ori explained. “They grew out of the ground at Dimrill Dale, the land between Khazad-dûm and Lothlorien. Unless you really were just having us on, Bilbo?”

“Often, but not in this case,” said Bilbo. “Even though each race wasn’t prone to dealing with other races, it’s entirely possible that hobbits and dwarrow would have come into contact at least once or twice. The world was wilder then, filled with dragons and other beasts. And hobbits were made of much sterner stuff than they are now.”

“Y-you s-eem st-sturdy en-enough, Pr-pr-professor.”

“I manage,” said Bilbo with a smile.

Fourth bell tolled in the distance.

“You have to go,” said Ori.

“Much as I’d like to stay,” said Bilbo. “I have to rescue Master Targ from the twin terrors of Frodo and Samwise. He took them to watch the badgers training in the practice yard. Ah, and I believe you’re about to be carried off as well, Ori.”

Ori looked up and Dwalin leaned in the doorway, tired, but smiling.

“Care f’r a ride home, Lord Ori?”

“Um.” Ori glanced over at Arne, who laughed and shook his head.

“G-go on, th-they’ll b-b-be l-locked in o-overnight.”

“But you’re going to go and have supper, too, aren’t you?” Ori asked. Alright, perhaps it was more of a suggestion than a query. Come to think of it, Ori realized it was bordering on a veiled threat. That was rather rich, coming from him; he knew that, if Dwalin did not come to take him home, he would have been in danger of working here on the puzzle far into the night, going without supper and not even realizing it.

“G-going t-to eat wi-with M-Master Nodun and-and her h-husband,” said Arne. He blinked.

“Ah,” said Ori. “Say hello for me.”

Bilbo left directly, but Ori and Dwalin took their time, strolling down the halls hand in hand. If they found an alcove or two in which to kiss, no one passing by said a word. Eventually they made it to the library steps. The tunnel to the royal quarters was actually quiet, almost empty.

“You must be so tired,” said Ori as Dwalin helped him into the saddle. Gnasher sniffed at him a little, then seemed satisfied that Ori was the genuine article.

“I’m just enjoyn’ th’ quiet f’r now,” said Dwalin. “Anythin’ short a’ th’ remakin’ a’ th’ world’s Furh’n’k’s lookout t’night.”
Ori and Dwalin walked into the sitting room to find Dori setting the table, giggling and laughing to herself and occasionally dancing a little jig.

“Mebbe she’s got int’ th’ cordial,” Dwalin guessed.

Then Ori noticed Nori sitting by the fireplace with Bofur, Nori’s expression murderous and Bofur trying to tease and distract him to no avail.

“T’ain’t funny!” Nori barked at Dori, which only set her off in further storms of laughter.

“What’s happened?” Ori asked. “Nori, did you fall out of the ceiling again?”

Bofur chuckled.

“Nori found a grey hair.”

“No!” Ori cried, delighted and horrified. “Already? Let me see!”

He rushed up to Nori and started pawing his hair. Assault and Battery, who had been snoozing there, fell out with indignant squeaks and Bofur snatched them up as Nori starting smacking Ori’s hands away.

“Shove off!”

“Oooo, here it is! I’m saving it for posterity!”

“Oi! Don’t pull it out, it’ll just grow in more! - OW!”

“Got it! We’ll save it in the archives!”

Nori lunged for him but Ori had anticipated and whirled away with a jovial shriek.

“Gimme that!” Nori roared.

Ori did the sensible thing first and hid behind Dori, but Nori was in no mood for self preservation and chased him out and around the room and over furniture. Nori made a flying leap to tackle him but Dwalin was there to intercept and Ori jumped up and down on the couch, prize waving over his head.

“I’ve got your hay-er! Nananananah!”

“Ahem.”

Ori stopped and turned to the sitting room doorway where Thorin and Bilbo stood, the entire tableau on view. Thorin looked like he was trying to maintain his dignity and Bilbo wasn’t even making the attempt. Dwalin put Nori on his feet, still grumpy.

“Bilbo, welcome to my life,” said Thorin. “What’s happened?”

Bofur touched noses with Assault.

“Aw, Nori’s havin’ the fits ‘cause he found his first grey hair.”

“An’ me rat of a little brother took it an’ won’t give it back!” Nori snapped, still enraged

He swung at Ori, who held his prize out of the way.

“Uh-uh! Mine!” Ori cried and stuck out his tongue.

Dori giggled maniacally once more and muttered about what a beautiful day it was.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. A quiet evening with the Durins. Ha! Yeah, right! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same darrow time, same darrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Nori hopped aside as Mistress Dazla’s bird whipped through to the kitchen and the housekeeper came tearing out after it. Ori heard her open the receiving room door and start to scold and fuss. Fili sloshed through the door from the receiving room, water squidding from the tops of his boots, his tunic and breeches plastered to him, his teeth chattering.

Before Ori could even move from the couch, Dori sped through the door to the bedroom hallway and re-emerged with an enormous fluffy pink towel.

“Fili! What in Mahal’s name happened?” she cried.

The prince grinned and took the towel, swiping at his dripping mustache before wrapping the towel around him like a cloak.

“Thank you, Dori. I was inspecting the floodgates at the head of the River Running, just below the glacier. They’re the only things that keeps us from drowning in the spring and they hadn’t been inspected in decades.”

Dori didn’t look so much impressed as grudgingly happy the prince hadn’t drowned.

“Right into the bathroom with you, strip off and into a hot tub.”

Instead of being allowed to bring himself upstairs to his own chambers, Dori grasped him by the soggy scruff and all but carried him down the hall into the main bathroom.

Ori shoved the proof of Nori’s advanced age into his pocket and, while he helped Fili peel off layers of sopping cloth, Dori drew the bath.

Ori knew the water would be tepid at first, to allow Fili to warm up slowly. Dwarf he was, but even darrow weren’t impervious to glacial melt.

While Dori hustled Fili into the tub, Ori dumped the contents of the prince’s boots over the shower drain.

“Good thing these aren’t your dress pair,” said Ori.

“I tried to pick the ones with the least metal on them,” said Fili, “but, I admit, I wasn’t expecting a swim. At least the gatekeeper’s assistants got a laugh out of it.”

“What about the gatekeeper?”

“He died of old age when we were badgers and was never replaced. Luckily, his ‘assistants’ knew their work.”

Thorin put his head around the doorjamb, grinning at his heir as Dori upended a rather foofy looking bottle of bath soap into the water. It bubbled around Fili in glossy shades of blue, pink and purple.

“Do we need to promote one of the assistants?” Thorin asked, as his nephew was obscured in fluff.

“No, they work really well together,” said Fili. “What they need is money. They’ve been making repairs out of their own pockets and it’s come down to pine sap and wire.”

“That bad?”

“No, it’s just hit a critical place. They need materials to keep it going.”

“And, did you find the state of the floodgates to your satisfaction?” Thorin asked.
Fili snorted a bubble from under his nose and said, “Yes, I can say with great authority that there isn’t a crack in them. Anywhere.”

“Good lad, thank you. I’ll send Gloin up there to talk to them,” Thorin said as he disappeared out of the doorway.

Leaving Fili to be cared and fussed over by Dori and Mistress Dazla, Ori returned to the sitting room. Bujni and Dipfa bounced out of the kitchen.

“There you are, Ori!” Bujni looked relieved. “I require your assistance, my friend.”

“Certainly,” Ori smiled. “If you would be so kind, my friend. I have spent the latter part of this afternoon with my dear adad, Oin, in the processing rooms in the forges.”

“Oh.” Ori felt obligated to make some sort of a response.

“Indeed,” Bujni nodded. “After assessing my bodily weight both with and without clothing, we came back here and my precious diamond measured every inch of my person both with and without clothing. My dearest parent, Binni, chaperoning us, of course.”

“Of course.” Ori hoped either Bofur or Jani had seen the reactions of the population of the processing room to this venture. Then he wondered why he was being told all this. “With what do you need my assistance?”

“If you would kindly ask King Roäc if he is at leisure to allow me the honor of weighing and measuring his personage… er…ravenage?”

Ori smiled and headed back to check Thorin’s office.

The door was ajar, but Ori tapped on it anyway.

“Come,” Thorin’s voice invited.

Ori came in. Thorin was busy at his desk and Balin was sorting papers with him. Bilbo sat at his small, ornate desk near the window, writing. They all looked up when Ori came in.

“Ah, yer back, wee brother,” Balin greeted him. “Productive day at work?”

“Yes, we’ve isolated a repeating pattern of symbols that we’re currently investigating. They are quite unknown. Master Brur had Arne do the preliminary work.”

“Curiouser an’ curiouser,” Balin commented, obviously intrigued.

“Exactly,” Ori agreed. “If you’ve time after supper, I’d like to show you my sketches of it.”

“I’d love to see them, Ori,” said Thorin. “Bilbo’s been telling me about them.”

“Thank you, Thorin,” Ori went on. “In the meantime, Bujni wishes to know if Roäc is available.”

Thorin turned and looked at his chair back, where the raven perched, supervising.

“Well, Roäc?”

“What does that funny nestling want?” Roäc demanded. Ori swallowed and said as solemnly as possible,

“Bujni wishes to know if King Roäc is at leisure to allow Bujni the honor of weighing and measuring King Roäc’s personage… er…ravenage?”

Roäc cackled loudly and fluttered to Ori’s shoulder. “Why not?”

Ori came back through, the raven riding along, and saw that the group had moved to the kitchen.

Ori entered, and there were Bujni and Dipfa, who had been joined by Sigrid, Kiliel, and Gigolas. Ori shook his head, wondering what Bujni and Dipfa would become… BuFa? Dipni? FaBu?

“Ah,” Bujni cried in delight and bowed. “Thank you for joining us, King Roäc.”

“What do you want, nestling?” Roäc sounded rather amused as he hopped down on the table, where the others were sharing a plate of ginger biscuits and mugs of fruit soda water.

“Biscuit, Roäc?” Sigrid offered.

“Thanks, break it up for me, nestling.”

Sigrid laughed and crumbled one for him on a saucer. Bunji was fussing with the kitchen flour scales and Dipfa was preparing notes and her measuring tapes. Ori leaned over to see what was being written.

Roäc hopped over to Bujni.

“Well?”

“Yes, your majesty. If you would be so kind as to stand or sit in this dish.”
Bujni held one dish of the scale to the tabletop. Roäc gamely climbed into the golden bowl and remained still. Slowly and carefully, Bujni added the weights to the other side. Roäc waited patiently, watching as he rose gently in the air. At exactly five pounds, fifteen and three fifths ounces, Bujni declared the weight precise. Roäc hopped off, clattering the other dish to the table. Kili immediately started piling biscuits on Roäc’s vacated dish. Legolas and Gimli got down the other jars of biscuits to add to Kili’s pile.

“Hey, Roäc,” Kili said brightly. “You’re equal in weight to seventy-two biscuits!”

“Crumble ‘em up,” Roäc ordered. “Lemme see if I can eat ‘em in one sitting!” Sigrid, Kili, Gimli, and Legolas cheered and began breaking up the biscuits at speed.

“Roäc will be sick!” Tauriel objected.

“If you please, your majesty,” Bujni pleaded. Roäc turned around, gulping down a beakful, hopped over to the dwarf. Dipfa curtsied to the raven and, with great care, measured him from beak end to tail feathers, the size of each wing, the total wing span and girth of waist and chest. Every now and then, Roäc hopped away to eat more biscuits.

Fili came in wrapped in a thick cotton robe and rubbing his head with a towel.

“What’s going on?” he demanded.

“Bujni and Dipfa are measuring Roäc,” Sigrid explained, pushing her betrothed to a chair and giving him a drink and biscuit.

“May I inquire, your majesty,” Bujni asked, scribbling madly in his notebook, “how many feathers you have on your person?”

“Lots.”

“May I count them, your majesty?”

“We’ll be here until next week.” Roäc was, as always, blunt.

“Make an estimate,” Fili suggested.

“How?” Bujni asked.

“Take a square inch of his body and count those feathers inside the inch, then use the measurements you took.”

“An excellent notion!”

Dipfa carefully measured a square on top of Roäc’s head and marked the feathers with tailors’ chalk and Tauriel’s slender fingers quickly made the count.

Dipfa realized she hadn’t measured Roäc’s wings from the top, and requested the raven to stretch his wings out once more.

“What’s all this for?” Roäc asked, crouching down, holding his wings outstretched.

“I am attempting,” Bujni explained with grandeur, “to perfect my design of an apparatus that will allow me to fly.”

Roäc rose and fluttered his wings back to their folded position as Dipfa thanked him. The raven hopped over and looked Bujni over carefully.

“Try measuring a bat,” Roäc said, finally.

“A bat?” Bujni’s eyebrows rose to his hairline. “Why a bat, your majesty?”

“You don’t have feathers, nestling, and they would be almost impossible to make.”

Bujni frowned. “I thought I would gather up all the ones you and your people shed…”

Roäc shook his head.

“No, those’re for our bodies. The making of our bodies is very different from the making of yours.”

Bujni pondered deeply.

“Perhaps a bat would be easier to build,” Ori said thoughtfully. Roäc was right, Ori decided, the feathers would be almost impossible to make, as Roäc had said. How would one attach them in a way that they would not fall off?

Bujni, after putting the scale and weights away, slewed his eyes over to the elves, who had gone back to eating biscuits with the others, while watching the raven king attempt to eat his weight.

Bujni walked right up to Legolas and poked him aggressively and inquisitively in the side.

“You eat like us? Why aren’t you putting on weight?” He glared at Legolas accusingly. “Are you getting taller?"
  “I don’t think so,” said Legolas, eyes sparkling with laughter.
  “Hmmm…”
Kili said helpfully, “Bujni has a theory.”
Bujni waved this away like so many gnats.
  “It was just a theory. I shall have to approach this scientifically, though I must leave in place the idea that hobbits are impervious to flatulence and diarrhea.”
  “I’m sure they would be happy to hear that,” said Legolas.
Bujni leaned down and examined Legolas’ feet.
  “Is it true you can walk on snow? Or do you merely wear shoes with extremely tall heels and soles to place yourselves above it?”
Hiding a smile, Legolas replied, “No, we are very light.”
In the throes of scientific discovery, Bujni seized the elf prince around the thighs and lifted. Legolas fought to remain upright as he was hefted off his chair.
  “Oi!” Gimli shouted around a messy mouthful of biscuits.
Tauriel stifled a noise between a shriek and a choke.
Bujni place the prince on his feet and glanced at Tauriel.
  “Are you alright?” he enquired solicitously.
  “Fine, thank you,” she replied in a strangled tone.
Bujni removed his notebook and scribbled silently for a moment.
  “Hmph,” he opined. “I shall have to fine-tune my ideas.”
He shut the notebook with a snap and cocked an eye up at Legolas.
  “Thank you,” he said, brusquely. “Though I may need you for further study.”
He collected his notes while Dipfa sketched wildly in her notebook.
  “Beloved Boo,” she began as they wandered out to the sitting room.
Kili huffed in annoyance and moved closer to Tauriel.
  “Well, he’s not going to study you,” he muttered vehemently.
  Tauriel giggled.
Mistress Dazla came in and shooed them all out of the kitchen as she said she had dinner to finish. She refused their offers of help as it was all but ready.
Ori traipsed through to his bedroom to put on comfortable clothes. Dwalin was seated in one of the chairs before the fire, going through duty rosters. He grinned as Ori came in and shut the door.
  “What’s goin’ on, love? Did our Bujni measure tha’ raven?”
  “Yes, then Bujni told Legolas he may need him for further research because elves are so light.”
Dwalin snorted. He rose, went to Ori and kissed his temple.
  “Then our Legs has me sympathy. It’s a wonder our Gimmers didn’t toss our Bujni on his arse.”
Ori snickered, “He was too busy with the biscuits. Roäc was trying to see if he could eat his weight, which is, for your information, Captain, exactly five pounds, fifteen and three fifths ounces!”
Dwalin laughed, “I’ll let th’ king know.”
Ori grinned and stood before the mirror while Dwalin put his hair in order for him. Dwalin paused and looked at Ori in the mirror.
  “‘R should I tell ‘im, ‘even pounds, fifteen an’ one fifth ounces?”
Ori snorted. “I wonder how long it would be before Roäc can fly again?”
They left the room, chuckling.

Dinner, served in the breakfast parlor, consisted of onion soup flavored with lemon, mint, cinnamon, and pepper, followed by ground lamb seasoned with nutmeg, onion and pepper with chopped plums, buttered rice and roasted tomatoes.
Ori helped himself to more rice and listened idly to the conversation.
Bujni was telling Thorin about Roäc’s measurements. Thorin and Bilbo were amused and Frodo fascinated.
Bofur looked up from his third helping of lamb and addressed Bujni.
“What were all the fuss down in th’ sortin’ room? Friend a’ mine said they saw yeh with O- yer da, fiddlin’ about with th’ scales. Said yeh got yerself all nakie.”

Ori watched the brows of the Durins rise alarmingly. He was delighted Bofur had heard about it.

“Aye,” Jani put in with a grin of pure mischief. “Me pal Elrah said she’d seen th’ sight a yeh, laddie. ‘Perantly yeh strip t’ admiration.’

Bujni, Lord of the Rikanta Clan, blushed to his neck while his precious diamond smothered a giggle.

“My dearest adad,” Bujni said carefully, with an eye to his parents, who continued eating placidly, “was assisting me in my research. A vital part of that is ascertaining my exact body weight.”

“Why worry about clothes?” Jani asked around a mouthful of tomatoes. “I kin well understand yeh kicking off yer boots, but yer clothes-”

“I must have exact information. It is necessary to have absolute exactitude.”

“Every ounce is important?” Bofur asked, with a twinkle in his eye. Ori sensed trouble.

“Yes,” said Bujni eagerly. “It’s vital! If I am to succeed in my research in developing a means to fly.”

“Didja take a piss before ya were weighed?”

Bujni opened his mouth to reply, and froze.

“Bugger!” he muttered, scribbling ferociously in his notebook. No one dared to laugh. Oin did, however, look rather amused and Binni folded his lips and drank a large amount of tea.

“Adad,” Bujni turned to Oin with a look of utter determination, “I would like to re-weigh first thing tomorrow morning.”

“Aye,laddie,” Oin nodded.

“And tonight, I’m going to need an enema.”

No one dared to breathe.

“Bilbo?” Legolas asked quickly, “from his research, Bujni theorizes that you hobbits are impervious to flatulence and diarrhea. Is this indeed a fact?”

Thorin choked over his tea and Bilbo helpfully patted him on the back.

“Not quite. But I fully understand your wish to fly, Bujni. I do miss it.”

Unable to look anywhere, Ori settled for glaring at Dwalin, who opened his eyes to their widest but said nothing.

“Fly, Professor Baggins?” Bujni’s voice trembled. “Do…Can hobbits fly?”

“Oh, indeed,” Bilbo said lightly, as though they were discussing the weather. No one could look at any one else but the fidgeting was blatant. Legolas looked a little confused, as he had not expected the discussion to head off in this direction.

“You…you miss it?” Bujni was on point, notebook and graphite wand at the ready. “How did your people do this?”

“You mean fly?” Bilbo asked, brows raised in surprise. “Oh, we’re born with the ability. Surely you’ve noticed that our feet are extremely large?”

“In-indeed, I have.” Bujni scribbled maniacally.

“Well, once we grow to adulthood, our bodies become too large and heavy.”

“For flight?” Bujni breathed. “How… Is flight achieved by …er…flapping as the birds do?”

“Oh, no-no,” Bilbo chuckled benevolently. “Frodo, my boy, have you a moment to assist me?”

Frodo swallowed the last mouthful of rice and nodded. His attention had clearly waned in the midst of the discussion. Bilbo rose and helped the faunt out of his chair. Wee Sam hopped down, too, a look of suspicion on his face. Thorin watched Bilbo like an amused bird of prey.

Bilbo drew Frodo around the table and Bujni leapt out of his chair to meet them. Everyone at the table craned to watch.

“Observe,” Bilbo said in his teaching voice. “The size of Frodo’s feet compared to his body.”

Frodo looked up at his uncle incredulously. Sam folded his arms and watch Bilbo with lowered brows. Bujni flung himself to his hands and knees, examining Frodo’s feet with the joy of learning.

“Yes, yesssss,” Bujni murmured, “they are considerably large for his body in comparison to “Exactly,” Bilbo praised. “Thus, when we grow up, the ankles lock and we lose the ability. Faunts cannot run and hide as quickly as adults, so it is believed this was an escape mechanism.”

“Of course,” Bujni breathed. “Yavanna is divine in her wisdom.”

Ori frowned at the snicker in the back of his head.

Bujni leaned up on his knees. “So, flapping…?”

“No, lad,” Bilbo shook his head dolefully. “Spinning.”

“Your feet spin?” Bujni almost shouted.

“Indeed,” Bilbo bowed slightly.

Bofur laughed, “So yeh teach yer babies when danger threatens, t’ jump on their hands an’ their feet spin an’ they’re carried out a’ danger?”

“Quite so,” Bilbo gazed loftily at the miner. “And once they can run and hide as adults, they stop doing it. Thus the pivots in the ankles lock up and we lose the ability.”

“Is Frodo now too old to fly?” Bujni asked, still slightly hopeful for a demonstration.

“Frodo was never able to fly,” Bilbo informed him, sadly.

“Why not?” Thorin demanded. Bilbo allowed his gaze to wander to his mate and smiled.

“My dear, surely you must have realized, it’s because Frodo is a Brandybuck.”

Thorin cocked his head and smiled.

“Of course. How foolish of me not to remember!”

“Quite understandable, dear,” Bilbo said gently.

Bujni turned to Wee Sam, but Dori rose before he could open his mouth.

“I think its time for dessert,” Dori announced.

Ori shook his head and looked at Dwalin again. Dwalin had his arms folded and was looking at the ceiling. He swoled his eyes at Ori and winked. Ori nudged him.

Tea and dessert were brought out. Dessert was many-leaved pastry filled with a sweet mixture of finely chopped almonds, cardamon, butter, and rose water. It was still warm from the oven and they all tucked in happily.

“Yer majesty,” said Jani, to Thorin, “yer a sneak.”

“Oh?” asked Thorin, in a overly surprised tone. “In what way?”

“Th’ way in which ya made sure I took th’ finder’s fee for all that mithril, even though I said I didn’t want it.”

“I don’t recall signing an order for that. Ori? Did I sign an order for that?”

“No, Thorin,” said Ori. “You signed it all over to Bombur and Erda instead.”

“Sneak,” Jani accused, though she didn’t sound upset at all. Bombur and Erda exchanged glances and smiled sweetly at their sister.

Balin sat back with a smile. “We had t’ send th’ proceeds out from somewhere, lass. It’s bad enough t’ have tha’ much mithril under th’ mountain. It could attract dragons. We can’t send mithril, so we estimated the price in gold.”

“Given tha’ mithril is no’ quite as priceless as previously, we had t’ make adjustments in th’ estimated worth o’ th’ seam,” said Gloin. “As Vi an’ Margr would say, we’ve go’ mithril comin’ out’ve our arses.

Bilbo murmured, “That sounds terribly painful.”

“Besides,” said Thorin, “Bombur and Erda plan to use it to expand the inn, and we are mainly responsible for them having to expand it, given that they’re expecting a herd of Durins and most of the crowned heads of Arda next spring. They had to get a jump on the construction before winter. They can use the rest to set up their badgers with quite nice establishments when they marry.”

“Like crowned heads theirselves,” said Jani. She stood and went to him and rested their foreheads together. “Pardon me bein’ so forward, Thorin. Yer a darlin’ sneak.”

“Thank you, Jani. It was a pleasure.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Oh, look, the post has arrived. Let’s see who got married, got buried or got theirs. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarf time, same dwarf tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next day dawned bright and clear, and far too early for a dwarf who had been missing his husband.

Ori groaned at the sound of Dori’s light rapping at the door.
"Pet, deary, time for breakfast."
Ori muttered, "Breakfast had better be fucking incredible."
"It will be," said Dori, "and mind your language, pet."
Ori pulled the pillow over his head. Beside him, Dwalin shook with silent laughter.
"It's not funny," Ori protested. "Why didn't I get ears like that?"
Dwalin kissed him and threw off the bedclothes.
"Yeh didn't raise a badger."
Nori's head popped up through the mattress between them.
"The buffalo's right. I can hear Assault an' Battery stealin' a biscuit from three rooms away."
"Go away, Nori," said Ori, whumping the pillow down and through his brother's insubstantial head.
"Yah never was a mornin' person," Nori groused in muffled tones.

Ori and Dwalin arrived at the breakfast table amid chatter, freshly baked rolls stuffed with jam or xocolātl, and a swarm of various birds from all over Arda.
Binni said to Bombur, "You're sure you can't stay a few more days?"
Erda laughed.
"We've already stayed so long, me Bombur's broken out in hives from th' panic."
"Not quite that bad," Bombur protested mildly, "but I'm afraid I do have to go and see how much of my inn is still standing."
Dori patted Bombur lightly on the arm in passing.
"I'm sure your Kali has things well in hand."
Dori had dressed in a tunic and breeches of grey on grey pinstripes, the cut of which told Ori his older brother was feeling masculine at the moment. It was a far distance from the foaming and flowing robes of the past few weeks.
Fili and Kili arrived, looking bereft, as Tauriel and Sigrid had decamped to Dale the night before. Fili perked up the moment he saw Dori's clothes. Kili perked up the moment he saw food.
"Dori, that is a beautiful suit," Fili enthused.
"Master Mahrdin had it tailored for when I was feeling like a lord, not a lady. Excellent choice, though I'm afraid it does make me look like the director of the royal tombs. I was hoping to do a little shopping in the central market this morning."
Thorin laughed as he entered with Bilbo by the hand and Frodo on his shoulders, the Gamgees in a train behind.
"In other words, you're in disguise," said the king. "I'm afraid it's going to take more than a new set of clothes for you to go about unnoticed."
Dori sighed. "Yes, well, being a public figure is a lot of fuss and bother, but I find I do enjoy the notoriety. And before you say anything, Thorin, Vi and Margr are coming with me, along with that cadre of professional bullies our deary insists I need."

"You'll be well-protected, then," said Thorin, lifting Frodo up over his head and lowering him into a chair.

"Are you Idad Dori right now?" Frodo asked.

"Yes, tiny pet."

"I like your other clothes better."

Dori chuckled and patted the faunt on the head, but Bilbo looked like he might have a migraine coming on.

"Frodo, my lad, do you remember the talk we had about the difference between being honest and being rude?"

"Yes, Uncle Bilbo," said Frodo, and then he proceeded to drink his milk.

"Perhaps a different approach," said Bilbo, shaking his head.

A raven Ori didn't know dropped a letter on Bilbo's empty plate.

"What's this?" Bilbo asked, then he read the direction and his eyes lit up. "Grandfather Took's handwriting!"

He slit under the seal with his butter knife and scanned the contents, his grin only growing.

"Is it terribly private, ghivasha?" Thorin asked, pouring Bilbo's tea.

"Oh, no, no. In fact, I think at least some of it should be shared," he said, and he proceeded to read aloud:

Dear Grandson -

I hope this finds you happy, healthy and well-fed. I also hope this raven is well-fed, or my letter may not find you at all. Awfully hard to read a letter in a bird's stomach, at least as I reckon it.

Life goes on here as usual.
The rain falls, the crops grow, Lobelia complains.
That, principally, is what I write to tell you. Now, before you think this is hearsay, or fourth hand, we got it straight from Otho Sackville-Baggins' mouth, as he had decided to go on a strategic walking tour of Tuckborough when his darling bride saw what your dwaarrow did to Bag End.

"Yer dwaarrow, eh, laddie?" Balin asked Bilbo with a twinkle in his eye.
"As opposed to the dwaarrow my grandfather keeps in a bin in his baking pantry," Bilbo said drily. "The letter goes on."

Apparently, their first conversation upon returning home ran something like:
Lobelia: "Where is the gate?"
Otho: "Ummm... dearest, I believe someone's taken the tub."
Lobelia: "Those rotten Gamgees, I'll wager! Well, we can get another tub."

Ori snickered as all the Gamgee faunts gave themselves a rousing cheer, Bell shook her head, and Hamfast stuck his thumbs under his braces and expanded proudly. Bilbo continued.

Otho: "Yes, but we'll also need to get more pipes."
Lobelia: "Oh! The nerve! This is giving me a headache! Dear, go into the kitchen and make me some tea."
Otho: "Er... well... about the kitchen..."
I haven't see it myself, but apparently that Master Arb fellow is nothing short of thorough.
And speaking of dwarf fellows...

And speaking of dwarf fellows, what's this about you taking up with the king of Erebor? Not that we mind you being married to a king if he treats you kindly and doesn't lock you in a windowless tower or a dungeon or something. Just remember, we want to meet him and welcome him to the Took family in the proper manner.

"Run for your life, my dear," said Bilbo to Thorin.
"I'm perfectly safe," said Thorin. "I haven't locked you in a dungeon."
"Or a windowless tower," Kili added around a mouthful of pastry.
"The letter goes on about crop yields," said Bilbo, "which I save for you, Hamfast."
The letter was passed around the table until Hamfast got it. He gave it to Bell, who frowned over it, while the baby nursed and she drank her tea.
"I'd say it was nice your family approved of me," observed Thorin, "but I'm not sure from the letter if they do."
"Just make sure by the time we do see them that I'm nice and pink and fat." "Oh, that will be no problem at all," Dori assured them in a comforting manner.
Another bird, this one a large red-tailed hawk, arrived, alit on the table, looked around at all the beards, seemed to shrug and stalked over to stand imperiously before Kili, holding a letter in its beak.
The bird had a ring around one leg identifying it as 'Great of Heart' in the script of Rohan.
Kili took the letter very carefully.
"Where in Rohan did you come from?" he asked the bird, though it couldn't reply to him. "Who do we know who sends their letters via hawk? And what do we feed him? Or is it a her?"
"There's a chicken in the larder that we've been picking over," said Dori.
"I'll get it," said Binni.
"Thank you."
"Kili, don't open that letter until I get back!" Binni cried.
Binni was back so fast, Ori wondered if Mistress Dazla wasn't waiting behind the kitchen door with a tray to hand it over.
The chicken carcass was put down in front of the hawk with great ceremony. Binni plopped down next to Oin, hands folded, and said, "Go on!"
Kili slit open the letter. What he read surprised him into sitting up straight.
"What is it, inudoy?" Dis asked.
"It's from Theodred. Um... Arivett eloped with Theodred's cousin Eomer."
Everyone stopped eating. Even the birds stared at Kili.
Bofur whistled appreciatively.
Ori felt a little sick, and it wasn't just that he'd 'seen' it. Watching the hawk eat, Ori thought he would never complain about a raven's table manners again.
"Go on, Kili," Thorin broke the startled silence.
"He says, or wrote, or whatever, that Queen Hild sent Arivett a letter the night she and Aris arrived at Erebor, to tell Arivett that we were all either too young or already engaged, but that King Theoden of Rohan had a nephew, a great warrior among the Rohirrim who was... er... available. Hild, Aris, and Theoden intended to introduce them, but Arivett didn't wait for that. She wrote to Eomer that very day. She sent him a long letter and a nude. A nude what?"
"Picture of her pony, cram brain," said Fili, "go on."

"Eowyn told me Eomer got Arivett's letter when they were in the stables and he opened it and out fell a picture Arivett naked! With axes! Eomer had to go up to the hayloft for a while, and Eowyn stood at the bottom of the ladder calling up to him: Brother? Are you alright? Is something turning blue? What are you doing?
He screamed and swore at her.
She hasn’t stopped laughing since.
I’m sorry I missed it, but I did have a lot of fun with you and the younger set in Erebor. I doubt any coronation I ever go to will top Idad Thorin’s. We’re still talking about it! I think Father misses all of you more than he’ll let on.
Anyway, I guess Eomer liked what he saw, because he immediately rode out with an entire squad of eorlingas to meet up with Arivett and her army. Eomer said something to Eowyn about ‘joint maneuvers’.

That brought a laugh to everyone but Frodo, who had obviously lost interest in all but breakfast. Dwalin chuckled.
"Wha? They're goin' t' canoodle in front a' a large audience?"
"Kinky," said Nori.
Kili frowned.
"Um… they didn't tell anyone what they planned to do after they met up, but Eomer said they were going northwest."
Dis gave Thorin a slightly more sober look.
"Nadad, where were they going?"
"Given how far the ponies can travel in a day?" He swore under his breath. "No."
That was when Roäc arrived, looking rather smug, and dropped a narrow folded letter into Thorin's lap. Roäc appeared to be… singing to himself.
Thorin tore open the seal. He read the contents of the letter, his breath suddenly coming faster.
"Oh, Mahal. She really did it."
Dis took the letter as he sagged back into his chair. Bilbo had him by the hand in an instant.
The princess read:

To King Thorin II Oakenshield, High King of All Dwarrow.

Hail!

This is to inform you that Prince Consort Eomer and I have claimed the throne of Beleghost. You will be gratified to learn there were no casualties. There wasn’t even a siege. The populace opened the city gates and welcomed us, since the mercenary army of King Frerin fled at our approach. We intend to affirm ties to the Blacklocks as well as to Rohan, and I will offer my allegiance to your majesty on paper or in person, at your pleasure.
May your beard grow ever longer!
Arivett, Queen of Beleghost.

A second, far less formal, note arrived attached to the official one:

Cousin, We found your blot of a brother and his dimwit wife hiding in an armoire. She's with dwarfling, so I merely exiled them, even if it was against my better judgement. I believe they are running off to Idad Chat to beg his help in reclaiming Beleghost. Fat chance, as Chat would say. Amad will be livid over the elopement, but Eomer is far too much temptation for one, poor dwarrowdam.
Love, Arivett.

The silence was shattered by the slamming open of the house doors, then the sitting room door. They heard Furh’nk call, "Yer majesty, it's - er -"
"Too late, laddie; take a deep breath," said a familiar voice.
Suddenly Hild was in the breakfast room, filthy from the road and wild-eyed. Aris walked in behind her, far more calm, and civilly shut the door behind them as Hild rushed to Thorin, who got himself out of his chair before she grasped him by the shoulders and cried,

"My damling has run off and overthrown a kingdom! I'm so proud!"

She threw her arms around him and burst into tears.

Thorin embraced her, rubbing her back, trying not to chuckle and failing.

Aris bowed to Thorin.

"We didn't even get all th' way home. Th' raven caugh' us on th' road. We've sent mos' a' our guard on t' th' Orocarnis."

Dwalin said, "I take it tha' Voundis is still steward?"

"Aye," said Aris. "Arivett wouldn't've left anyone else in charge. Thank blessed Mahal."

Hild pulled back and said, "Thorin, you must make them abandon this elopement nonsense and make sure they have a proper wedding!"

"Would you have waited to get married if I insisted?" asked Thorin. "Arivett is more like you than you could have dreamed, and, apparently, her craft is showing initiative. Sorry, cousin, you're a day late and a barrel of ale short."

"Oh, well," she said, practically giddy, smiling and nodding to everyone at the table who called greetings to her and Aris. Then she turned to Thorin with a brief grave expression, waved a hand impatiently and said, "Sorry about Frerin."

"These things happen," said Thorin.

Bujni stood from the table and cleared his throat.

"Did you need me to attempt to liberate Belegost, your majesty?" he asked. He made it sound as if he'd offered to pour more tea. "Technically, I am next in line after King Frerin."

"Thank you, Bujni, but I need you here," said Thorin.

"As you wish, your majesty," said Bujni with a bow, and sat back down.

Thorin looked over at Bilbo with a smile.

"We're planning on our making a royal tour next summer which will include the Shire. We'll be staying with Chat at any rate. If Arivett is inclined to pledge loyalty to me, I'll happily go to Belegost and see her."

"You will acknowledge her?" Hild asked, though Ori thought it sounded like more of a command.

"If," Thorin enunciated, his gaze piercing both Aris and Hild, "she intends to rule fairly and take care of the people then, yes, I'll gladly acknowledge her."

Dori rose and asked Miss Oqizla to bring two more place settings and more tea.

"Would you like some breakfast, your majesty? General Aris?"

"Oh, that would be lovely," said Hild, taking the chair Aris pulled out for her. "Thank you, Lord Dori."

Ori turned to Dwalin.

"What should we get them as a wedding present?" he asked.

"Somethin' sharp," Dwalin replied.

Hild mused, "I wonder what surcoat Arivett wore for the invasion."

"Um, maybe it's not the best time to mention it," said Ori to the table in general, "but I got a letter, too. I don't recognize the handwriting."

"Better open it now," said Thorin. "With the way things are going, it's probably from Mahal."

Ori broke the seal, opened the letter, blushed bright red and crushed it to his chest.

"Not unless Mahal's a dam," he squeaked.

"Wha' is it, love?" Dwalin asked.

"It's a love letter and it includes a nude, wearing mismatched socks."

"Oh," said Kili. "Fan mail. I get that, too, but I've never gotten a nude with socks. Lucky!"

"If you like, you can have mine," said Ori, wanting to cast the thing in the fire but feeling it would be rude. Dwalin took it and looked the picture over, made a considering noise, then turned it upside down.

"Not bad," he teased. Ori tried to snatch it back but Dwalin held it out of his reach. "I kin tuck this under yer pillow, if yeh like, love.’”
“No! Don’t be gross!” Ori griped.
“I dunno, love. Them’s some fancy socks. If yeh wore a pair a’ those, I’d be ready t’ peel ‘em off yeh.”
“Dwalin!”
“Mmmm, that gold’d bring out yer eyes.”
“I’ll make you wear them!”
“Them tiny thin’s? S’pose I could put one on me prick- Mmmph!”
Ori climbed from his chair, onto Dwalin, and clamped both hands over his husband’s laugh.

Burying himself in work that day was almost a relief, except for Bard tearing through to try to murder Master Brur in his own office. Ori had thought Tilda was absent, but he didn’t realize the reason until Bard was shouting down at Brur, and Brur looked torn between wincing and defending his turf. Master Sadie arrived after about ten minutes. Ori suspected someone had sent her a bat or a raven, asking her to come sort this out. The upshot was, Tilda could remain Brur’s student, as long as she didn’t take anymore unauthorized field trips into the mines or to any other dangerous place. Sadie also offered to bash Brur over the head with her cane if he even tried such a stunt again. Bard surveyed the beat-up condition of Sadie’s stone cane and said he thought there was no need, but thanked her anyway.

Back home, after dinner, Bilbo brought the Gamgees and Frodo back to Bag End East, then returned to Fundin House. Mistress Dazla’s minions cleared the dinner table and brought out wine and coffee. There the company held an impromptu council meeting. Ori thought, as he arranged his scribe’s tools, that it quite apt that Bujni now sat at the table with them.

Thorin brought out a small stack of missives he had received and Ori discovered there was much more to the tale than there had been this morning.

“Dear Thorin,
Hope all's well. You're not going to believe this, but Frerin and T'dillah have showed up on my doorstep, begging for sanctuary. Don't know what I'm supposed to do with them, though I am in need of a good accountant. Can he account?
Best,
Chat

"Ori," said Thorin, "please take down this reply."

Dear Chat,
Sorry for the mess and the mess's wife. Frerin can, indeed, account. Business management appears to be his craft. If he gives you an ounce of trouble, please write and tell me. Pebble or not, you can ship him to Erebor in chains.

"Would you behead him?" Ori asked, amazed at his own casual tone.
"No, he would have an accident on the Great North Road. He's defied me and even tried to depose me, but I'm still not eager to throw my own brother's body to the mob."
"What about T'dillah?"
"That's the other thing I need to mention in this letter."

Should it come down to it, please be so kind as to keep an eye on T'dillah and the pebble for me. I will send gold for their upkeep.
The last thing Arda needs is T'dillah loose in the world with some vague idea of revenge.

Best,
Thorin

“Writin’ bad poetry at every poor slob she meets,” Dwalin commented reflectively. “Terrible way t’ die.”
“Not that she's likely to outlive her One for very long,” Thorin said grimly. "Theoden also sent me a letter."

Dear Brother King,

I find myself in a quandary over dwarfish custom. Hild and I were planning to introduce Eomer and Arivett anyhow, but what is the correct thing to do in the case of their elopement? I have taken Theodred to task - apparently he knew - but he remains unrepentant. My niece, Eowyn, is no help either. She can't stop laughing. I find myself down one nephew, fifty horses and their riders and, as King Bard would say, an entire clue. Please write.

Yours truly,
Theoden

Ori wrote as Thorin dictated his reply:

Dear Theoden Brother,

In this case, I would consider the assignment of the horses and riders as a wedding present and begin negotiations with the new Queen of Beleghost. I will acknowledge her oath of loyalty.

Best,
Thorin

PS: The ravens haven't stopped laughing, either.

“Then, we have Ahkn’s letter,” said Thorin.

Dear Thorin, Durins in general and everyone else cluttering Fundin House right now:

I suppose you must have heard our Arivett's all grown up and overthrowing kingdoms, which sounds positively exhausting. I'm glad I simply inherited mine.

I was wondering about all those nobles Frerin took with him to Beleghost. I figured Arivett would have their heads lining the battlements before lunch, but there weren't any nobles left by the time she got there.

Apparently, they've been offing each other at a respectable rate ever since they arrived in Beleghost. The only one who seems to have escaped the slaughter was a fellow by the name of Wobr. He decamped pretty quickly, though, to parts unknown.

Yours,
Ahkn

Ori said to Bujni, "I'm so sorry about your parents."
Bujni said with perfect composure, "My parents are right here."
"Roäc?"
"Thorin?"
"I have a very difficult assignment for you."
"Feats of danger and daring-do?"
"No, delivering a message and actually keeping your beak shut."
"Awww."
"I know," said Thorin, "I'm no fun, but neither is this."
Thorin took a scrap of paper, wrote on it, drew his dagger and cut his thumb. He pressed his bloody thumb to the paper.
Just before he folded it, Ori caught a glimpse of the message, just two khuzdul runes:

Last Chance.

"Greeeeat," said Roäc. "Now I'm going to drool the whole way there."
"You're not carrying this thing in your beak."
"I can still smell it if you tie it to my leg."
"If you can keep from eating it, there's a whole, dead rabbit waiting just for you when you get back."
Roäc cocked his head.
"Rotting?"
"If you insist," said Thorin dryly.
"And you know I do." Roac held out his leg. "Bung it on, then."
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. We’ve mentioned the night market a few times, so now it’s time to go and do a little shopping! Plus have a few adventures, of course, but little ones. And you’ll find out why the night market is only for grownups. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Dwalin was gone when Ori awoke on the morning of first rest day. That was the price of being a soldier, Ori knew. Rest days were few and oddly spaced. Dwalin had elected to ride with the city patrol on the day shift to have tonight free for their… Ori almost squeaked to himself, lying there alone in bed. They were walking out at the night market tonight!

In the meantime, Ori had the whole morning and afternoon to do whatever he wanted. That is, if Master Brur or Thorin or someone didn't need his help. In which case -

"In which case," he admonished himself, "you will stop thinking about working, you shalehead."

At any rate, breakfast was calling and Sigrid had arranged to come and sit while he put the finishing touches on her portrait.

"You'll have to tell me what the night market is like," she said, sitting out on the grass in the sun in her holiday dress as Ori painted from his seat on the patio.

"I'm sure you'll see for yourself soon enough," Ori replied with a smile. "Fili's bound to take you sooner or later, especially if you insist."

She laughed and shook her head.

"Every time I mention it he turns red and stammers about something my father said. Something about the night market and a shovel and Fili's head. My dearest Da is interfering again."

"But what does Wicked Step Mother say about it?"

"You mean my secret ally in debauchery? He keeps prodding Da about how Da doesn't have to protect my virtue anymore, all the while carefully skipping over the fact that I don't have a lot of virtue left."

"I think you're quite virtuous," said Ori. "I think you're patient to a fault."

Sigrid gave an unprincesslike snort and said, "You wouldn't have thought so the other night. If Da had gone to the kitchen sink and turned the hot water on and off one more time I was going to dunk him under it. Poor thing. He just can't believe we have hot and cold running water, that everyone has! Only the richest ever had that. Like you, we only had a spigot and you had to boil it before drinking it."

"Well, obviously, no one's announced the drowning of the king of Dale, so you must have found a solution."

"I sent Tilda over to him with a demand for a bedtime story. She hasn't asked him in ages. He seized his chance while he had one."

"That's the sort of creativity and foresight that wins battles, your highness," he teased.

"No fair quoting Balin at me."

"Not to mention, underhanded enough to make Nori proud."

"Much better," she said with a sniff.
Finally, it was time for Ori to bathe and dress to go out. As he walked through the sitting room, the door to Bag End East opened.

"Ah, Ori, there you are."

Ori turned to see Bilbo’s smiling face, which quickly became Bilbo’s laughing face.

"No fears, my friend," said Bilbo, "I'm not Master Brur, here to drag you back to the grindstone on your first rest day in… well, ever, I'm beginning to suspect."

Ori breathed out in a great, relieved sigh.

"Isn't it awful? I love my job! But I'm beginning to dream of huge chunks of pottery on little legs, chasing me through the halls of Erebor!"

"Time for a break, then," said Bilbo. "And I have just the thing to start it out on the right…. foot."

Ori winced.

"That was terrible!"

"I'm so ashamed!" Bilbo proclaimed.

"That's pigshit."

"Yes, I'm afraid it is, and it's going to become worse. Here, I think this should, er…, throw tonight's outfit into considerable relief."

Bilbo handed him a bundle of knitting, soft and thick, in a violent range of colors. The knitting unrolled into-

"Socks!" Ori cried.

Oh, they were hideous. One sock sported diagonal rust and green zigzags and the other blue and yellow horizontal stripes.

"These are great, Bilbo! Thank you!" Ori cried, hugging him impulsively. "You must have gone to a great deal of trouble."

"No, no, it was no trouble," Bilbo assured him, hugging back. "Dwarrow have such little feet, they hardly took any time or yarn at all. Besides, with all those dwarflings at the inn, I've had lots of practice."

"They don't go with any clothes I own!"

"Given that Dipfa is your tailor, I find that astonishing."

"Are you and Thorin going tonight as well?"

"Yes, Dori and Balin have agreed to faunt-sit, and Sam will stay over. Frodo will be kept well-occupied. I'm hoping he won't even notice I'm not there."

"He gets anxious when you go out without him," Ori guessed.

"The suggestion of it usually sets him to chewing on his fingers, but we can't exactly carry him around the night market. I understand it's not a place for faunts."

"So I hear," said Ori. "This will be my first time, too."

"Then, we shall both discover what delights await! Who knows, maybe I'll write a story where Gonad romps through the night market."

Ori snickered.

"That's one I want to read."

Dori practically pouted when he heard the four of them would not be home for supper.

"You need to fortify yourselves before you go out and carouse and eat junk!" he admonished them.

"Dori," said Thorin, placatingly, "we're not setting off on a twenty mile hike. One night of bad food choices won't set us up for anemia."

"Not you grown dwarrow, perhaps, but my Ori-"

To his credit, Dori didn't finish that sentence. Instead he went with, "Well, I'll go and see about the roast," and stalked out.

"Tha' was close," said Dwalin, winking at Ori.

"Let's go before Dori regresses again," said Ori.

They rode their ponies in tandem, trailed by Master Arb and his security detail, intending to go their separate ways once they reached the market. The number of soldiers on duty there had been increased in advance of Thorin's visit, though they were all in plain clothes, the better to mix with the crowds.

The night market occupied the western quarter of the central market in the very center of Erebor, a vast city within a city accessible by many bridges from residential neighborhoods, the counting houses of the ministry of finance, the main miners' commons, and a dozen other places. In the earliest days of the settlement, it was the only place in Erebor where foreign dwarrow could trade, and time, different cultures and a multitude of uses had left their mark on the open stalls and narrow shops that lined hundreds of winding alleyways. Dwarrow thrived on planning, order, symmetry, everything the central market was not. Yet, the chaos worked.

The night market was far more crowded than the day market. Many of the night merchants paid a small fee to use stalls left empty when the day merchants left, but it cost nothing to spread a blanket or a carpet on the ground in a niche. For some, it was a way to supplement a meager income, for others a place to show off a secondary craft which might not be acceptable to their guild. Even in the worst times of Thror's greed, such lowly merchants paid little in the way of taxes.

They stabled their horses in the repurposed warehouses that used to cordon off the market. Here, Thorin and Bilbo went on, intent immediately on the Alley of Ephemeral Things. Ori and Dwalin wandered the outskirts of the market, where Ori recognized a few of the scribe apprentices hunkered down on a garish rug which was littered with piles of tiny booklets, no more than strips of paper folded in half and sewn with a knot along the fold.

Ori knew these on sight. They contained explicit little graphic stories, the longest no more than sixteen pages. Ori recalled Nori had a stack of them hidden away that Ori was not allowed to touch. "Did you ever read those?" Ori asked Dwalin.

"Oh, aye. They were great fun 'til I found meself an' Thorin rollin' aroun' t'gether 'n one. I donno who they write these thin's f'r, bu' even I know I don' 'ave a dick th' size o' a halberd. Fr'm wha' I understand, they're still producin' 'em."

Even a few days ago, Ori would have rested safe in the knowledge that he would never appear in one of those booklets. A few days ago, he hadn't been a fashion icon, either.

He tried not to let his brain dwell on it too much. Instead, he went with, "Doesn't it bother you or Thorin to be shown like that to anyone with two coppers to spend?"

"Nah. When they start showin' us bein' beheaded an' thrown t' th' mob, then I'll worry. Yeh never were tempted t' try yer hand at one?"

"Not for anyone else to look at. Even if we had the money, Dori would have never let me go to the night market, much less let me sell my work here."

They went along the edge, admiring the various things in stalls. There were the usual staples but now, at night, these had become more varied and with more interesting ingredients. There was an entire stall devoted to baked goods made with all different kinds of 'vision' mushrooms.

Another sold pipes made for smoking pipe weed, water pipes for smoking unusual mosses, charcoal burners for inhaling incense of divine inspiration, among other things. Ori was rather attracted to a small pipe carved of a single rose quartz. The proprietor told him it was for adventurous single dwarrow to smoke and dream of their Ones. Ori and Dwalin looked at each other, grinned, and the proprietor laughed and told them they didn’t need it. He did, however, have a new shipment of Old Toby pipe weed, which both Ori and Dwalin liked. He measured out a pouchful each, telling them the soldiers escorting the Gamgees had brought a shipment back with them.

"I'm hearin' that Mister Hamfast's doin' wonders down in the Dale farms. Any luck an' we'll be grown' our own weed here."

"Tha'd be grand," Dwalin agreed.

Another stall featured small runs of liquor made from things like parsley, beetroot, maple leaves, and lichens. Dwalin was impressed with the parsley wine but muttered to Ori that the lichen whiskey tasted too much like dirt.

Nearby stood a small stall with an elderly dwarrowdam seated in a rocking chair. She was knitting, to Ori’s delight, until he looked about and realized everything, from hats and gloves to blankets and coats, was made with pictures of cats on them.

Further down from this they heard distant music and saw a large barrow in the middle of the street. A delicious smell wafted from it. Ori realized the dwarf running the barrow had a huge caldron in it and was making chips. A counter on one side of the barrow held large containers of salt, different vinegars, pickled tomato puree, several kinds of mustards, cheese curds, and a heated pan of rich brown gravy.

“Ohhh,” Ori groaned.

Dwalin chuckled. “I’ll get yeh some, love. Hang abou’.”

Ori looked around as Dwalin went on his mission. There were many, many dwarrow busy about the market but there were men and a few women, too. Ori notice a small group of young dwarrow had stopped to get chips. As a group they wandered his way.

The young dwarf at the front of this gaggle looked at him, then did a double-take.

"You!" he said, grinning. His hair was a wild shock of frizzy pink, which wobbled and mysteriously chimed when he moved his head.

"Pardon?" Ori asked.

"You're you!" the dwarf enthused.

"Um… yes?"

The stranger laughed and shook his head.

"I saw you in Vug. You're the king’s scribe."

The gaggle called out enthusiastically in greeting and began to talk excitedly among themselves.

"Ori of Fundin, at your service," he said, bowing.

"Hi! Buer, son of Uer, at yours and your families. Wow! This is so incredible! You're the one who turned me on to the whole sock thing!"

Ori looked down. Yes, the young dwarf’s boots were laced very wide apart, with the tongue removed, the better to show off the wildly paisleyed blue-pink-purple-green sock on his right foot, and the orange sock with chartreuse circles on his left.

"Those are nice," said Ori in spite of himself.

"Not as nice as yours," said Buer.

"These are new. My friend Bilbo just made them for me. Where did you get yours?"

"Second hand clothing stall," said Buer. "Some swell wears a pair of socks or a belt once and tosses them out. The maid fishes 'em out of the trash and sells them to the second hand merchant. This belt buckle supposedly belonged to Lord Zark."

"It did," said Ori. "He wore it to King Thror's funeral, though it had marcasites in it then."

"I traded the marcasites for lapis and moonstone Durin stones are really ‘in’ right now. Hey, a bunch of us are going down to the square to do the wag. You want to come along?"

"I'm with my husband," said Ori.

"Bring him!"

“Aye, bring ‘im,” the gaggle enthused.

"Where're yeh bringin' me?" Dwalin asked, handing Ori a cone of chips.

"We've been invited to wag in the square. Buer, this is my husband, Captain Dwalin Fundinul. Dwalin, this is Buer, son of Uer."

Rather than being intimidated, as Ori expected, Buer looked up at Dwalin with a huge grin and bowed.

"A pleasure, captain."

"Aye, same here. Did yeh want t' wag then, love?"

"Only if you wag with me," said Ori, peeking from beneath his lashes. "And only after I finish my chips."

They followed the chattering group slowly toward the beat of drums to an open square around a large fountain. Young dwarrow gyrated and wagged with joyful abandon. Around the perimeter, glass lights similar to the ones King Ulfr gifted Thorin, pulsed and swirled in rainbow colors, echoing back the sounds of the drums, the whole creating a kaleidoscope of color and sound across the square.

Ori asked Buer, “Where did these lights come from? I’ve only ever seen them in solid colors and they certainly didn’t echo!”

Buer grinned.

“I don’t like to admit it, with the captain of the city guard right here, but I nicked one of Ulfr’s lights from a string in the Alley of Incredible Things and analyzed it. It was simple to improve on the colors, just a matter of adding different elements, though I did blow up my workshop more than once in the attempt. The echoing is my little secret. Oh, and Captain, I put back the original. I’m pitifully honest.”

“Guid lad,” Dwalin commented, around the chip Ori had just fed him.

The gaggle ran forward and threw themselves into the crowd, everyone screaming happy greetings to everyone else.

Dwalin raised a brow and turned to Ori.

“I got hangnails older than these badgers. Sure yeh want t’ be seen with me?”

“Oh, come on,” Ori cried, grabbing his hand. “Show them how it’s done!”

The young dwarrow were not content to wag the way they had back in the spring at the coronation. That was so First Age, and far too tame for the night market.

They danced in every combination, moving acrobatically, or gliding and swaying. One new trend was to dance tight to the back of a partner of similar height. This looked to Ori exactly what they intended: sex, fully clothed, in the street.

The more daring wagged this way in chains of three or more.

Dwalin whispered to Ori, “Our Kivi’d be proud.”

Ori gleefully noticed he was very politely not invited to participate and thought his huge, scarred dwarf warrior might have something to do with that.

After dancing for more than half an hour, Ori pulled Dwalin to the side, panting and laughing.

“I think I’ve had enough wagging right now.”

“Yeh want a fruit soda water ’r somethin’?”

“Yes, please.”

They waved goodbye to Buer and his friends and were answered with calls for them to come back any time.

“That was wild!” Ori enthused, “though, I’m not sure I want to dance with our beards braided together like Buer’s friends.”

“Nah?” Dwalin asked, grinning, as they strolled to a soda stand. “Tha’s shockin’, tha’ is.”

Dwalin bought them each a mixed berry soda and they continued along.

“You’d look great,” said Ori, “but my beard is so short that my feet wouldn’t touch the ground. I’d look like a mouse, desperately clinging to your beard as you capered about.”

Dwalin snerked, then laughed outright.

“Caperin’? Me?”

“You’ve capered,” Ori reminded him. “At the inn, remember? The hills were alive and I was pretending to be an elf and you didn’t break any important bits from all that jumping around. You even checked!”

“Aye,” said Dwalin with a leer. “Then later on, yeh checked.”

They walked on, then Dwalin took his hand.

“C’mon,” he grinned down at Ori. “There’s plenty t’ see down here.”

“Where’s ‘here’?” Ori asked eagerly.

“Th’ Alley a’ Miraculous Feats,” Dwalin said with a glint in his eye.

Ori was, indeed, impressed.

The first stand displayed an enormous boulder. Stuck deep within it, with only the handle showing, was a sword.

“Why the sword?” Ori asked the proud owner.
“This ‘ere’s th’ Stone a’ Destiny,” the proprietor expanded. “Found at th’ bottom a’ a lake way up in th’ north. There was a broken lake dam and the lake drained. Brought it back, me late udad did. Legend says if yeh kin pull the sword fra’ th’ stone, yer th’ rightful king o’ Gondolin.”

“Really?” Ori asked. “I suppose that’s amazing, but Gondolin’s gone.”

“Aye. Grea’ mystery tha’. S’pose th’ rightful king kin make it reappear. Fancy takin’ a chance, laddie? Three coppers for a pull. And one silver f’r five tries.”

Ori giggled but shook his head. He looked up at Dwalin, who snickered.

“Tried years ago, love. I ain’t th’ king.”

Amused, they went on. Ori saw a dwarf who looked quite normal. However, it turned out that for one copper he would lift up his hair, scalp, and the top of his skull to reveal his brain. He had survived an orc attack and scalping.

“Aye, had ’em put a nice gold hinge on me skull.”

“Your brain is so pink!” Ori squeaked.

“That’s ’cos every night I feed it strawberry jam.”

“I didn’t know brains liked strawberry jam!”

“Best thing for ’em. I started out giving it peach jam first, but it just made it dizzy.”

“I’ll keep that in ‘mind’,” said Ori, blinking.

The dwarf roared and handed him back his copper.

“That’s one I never heard before, and, laddie, I’ve heard ’em all!”

Next was Vi and Margr’s younger brother, Poczoh, who was taking out his fake eye, swallowing it, bringing it back up and putting it back in for a copper. Ori produced the copper necessary for Dwalin to see the trick and politely asked after Poczoh’s sisters.

“Our Margr’s invested some a’ her pension in the bakery, so now she gets her pastries once a week f’r free,” Poczoh told him as he gulped down his eyeball.

Both Ori and Dwalin laughed.

“Does she get anythin’ besides iklars?” Dwalin asked.

Poczoh burped loudly and produced the eyeball, slick and wet from his insides.

“Not always. Our Vi’s been pillagin’ the material warehouses, says they’re doin’ up th’ place f’r their elf.”

“Your brain is so pink!” Ori squeaked.

“That’s ’cos every night I feed it strawberry jam.”

“I didn’t know brains liked strawberry jam!”

“Best thing for ’em. I started out giving it peach jam first, but it just made it dizzy.”

“I’ll keep that in ‘mind’,” said Ori, blinking.

The dwarf roared and handed him back his copper.

“That’s one I never heard before, and, laddie, I’ve heard ’em all!”

Next was Vi and Margr’s younger brother, Poczoh, who was taking out his fake eye, swallowing it, bringing it back up and putting it back in for a copper. Ori produced the copper necessary for Dwalin to see the trick and politely asked after Poczoh’s sisters.

“Our Margr’s invested some a’ her pension in the bakery, so now she gets her pastries once a week f’r free,” Poczoh told him as he gulped down his eyeball.

Both Ori and Dwalin laughed.

“Does she get anythin’ besides iklars?” Dwalin asked.

Poczoh burped loudly and produced the eyeball, slick and wet from his insides.

“Not always. Our Vi’s been pillagin’ the material warehouses, says they’re doin’ up th’ place f’r their elf.”

“Yes,” Ori agreed. “I heard he’s bringing back a bigger bed.”

“Aye, well,” Poczoh put his eyeball back in the socket with an audible squelch. “He’s a nice enough fellow. Mebbe Rogi’ll learn a few manners from ‘im.”

Ori and Dwalin thanked him for the eyeball trick, sent their regards to the sisters and moved off.

Further on, they met a dwarf who could lift great weights with his teeth. Another booth featured two young daughters of men, who were twins and were described as double-jointed. They could contort themselves into the strangest shapes and fold their legs behind their heads.

Another display was quite noisy as a large dwarf exhibited his strength by lifting your pony in the air for four coppers.

Dwalin greeted him by name and introduced him to Ori as Tukkaj. Tukkaj was retired from the military but was too bored at home, so did this for fun. Ori decided no to remind Tukkaj about the time Tukkaj had flirted a little much with Dori. Dori had picked him up, one handed, and flung him off the dock.

"Yeh seen Ib lately?" Dwalin asked Tukkaj. "Last I heard, he was eatin' a siege engine."

"Aye, he still is. He's managed t' eat th' whole thin' down to th' axles."

"Really? He’s persistent, I’ll give ‘im tha’!"

"Aye, though he almost quit halfway through. Couldn't take any more teasin' about how he should just swallow th' batterin' ram whole."

"Go’ his goat, did it?"

"Nah, made him horny f’r his husband. Had trouble keepin' his mind on th' job."

"Typical Ironfist," said Arne, approaching with Nodun and her husband, Tay, whom Ori almost did not recognize dressed.

"Arne!" Ori cried. "You escaped from the archivists!"
"As you see," said Arne, sketching a ridiculous, jaunty bow. He had abandoned his brown attire and wore a fashionable crimson tunic with black cuffs and banded collar, with gold buttons on the placket to match the cuffs on his ears.

Tay was given a more formal introduction, then Dwalin said to Arne, "Wha' did yeh mean, yer highness, when yeh said 'typical Ironfist'? I known lotsa Ironfists. Ib's th' only one I know who eats large wood an' metal weaponry."

Arne grinned at Tay, who laughed and draped an arm over Arne's shoulder. He had a very deep, pleasant laugh that Ori found quite appealing. He was nothing to Dwalin, of course, but he was quite decorative, his face tattoos shimmering in the brilliant colors of his people.

"It's because our Ib's a romantic," said Tay. "Ironfists in love go to the ends of Arda to prove themselves."

"You didn't eat a siege engine for me," said Nodun said, poking him in the shoulder.

"You know I'm on a low-seige engine diet," said Tay.

"Ah, forgive me, kurdu, I forgot."

"So," said Ori. "Master Ib is trying to prove himself to his husband?"

"Nah," Tay replied, "Ib's just weird."

"Oh. What?"

"I'm only teasing," said Tay. "It always surprises people when they see an Ironfist with their nose off their grindstone. They think we only do that when we have an axe to sharpen."

They said their goodbyes and wandered on, down alleys of tattoo artists and milliners and crafters of mourning jewelry. They explored rounded closes ringed in long, narrow shops in the Blacklock style. Tiny, colorful tiles coated these shopfronts in the complex, interlocking geometric designs Blacklocks favored. The shops specialized in the goods brought in from the eastern kingdoms. At a stand of exotic fresh and dried fruits, Dwalin bought a pinkish red sphere with a little jagged knob and handed it to Ori.

"What's this?" Ori asked.

"Tha'," said Dwalin, "is a pomegranate."

Ori cried out and hugged him.

Ori, caught up in the colors and noise, tried to look in all directions at once. It was like the market in Dale at Durin's Day, multiplied a hundred times.

He must have squeezed Dwalin's hand a little harder than he intended.

"Bit much, love?" Dwalin asked.

"Maybe a little," Ori admitted reluctantly.

"Let's turn down this way. We'll see if th' Moo an' Cluck's still open."

"The what?" Ori yipped with a delighted giggle.

"Place tha' does ale an' barbecue. If it ain't disappeared, it's open day an' night."

"But 'The Moo and Cluck'? Really? That's its name?"

Dwalin chuckled.

"I don' know, t' tell yeh th' truth. There's no sign outside. Tha' jus' wha' we've always called it."

They turned right down an alley wider than most, lined with actual shops, many shuttered for the night. The crowd thinned out and they turned right again into a much narrower way between two shops and down a flight of steps into a large, natural cavern filled with people, long tables, long benches, and the intoxicating scent of roasting meat.

Ori had to swallow to keep from drooling.

The tables and benches were communal. Ori recognized several of Dwalin's soldiers in the crowd, He and Dwalin stopped again and again on their way to the counter to greet friends, including Furh'nk with his arm around Loli, and Targ with his husband and wife.

A portly Blacklock waiter sliced through the crowd toward them, bearing a huge tray of beer glasses over his head.

"Orras!" Dwalin called to him. "Yer lookin' stout!"

"Thank yeh kindly, Captain Dwalin," said Orras. He set the tray down on the table beside them and expertly slid glass after glass down the surface toward a group of rowdy journeyman smiths, who seemed to have an entire cow's worth of stripped bones littering the table where they sat. "Yer lookin' like one very lucky dwarf."

He winked at Ori, who grinned and ducked his head.

"King's out back with his new hubby," Orras went on. "Said if yeh showed up, t' send yeh along."

"We ain't even ordered yet," said Dwalin.

"I'd say no' t' worry, there's enough food on tha' table fer all four a' yeh, but th' way tha' hobbit feller eats, I'm no' so sure."

They made their way around the right edge of the long counter, down a passage guarded by a small knot of soldiers, several of whom Ori remembered from the inn and was able to greet by name. Then they came to a doorway guarded by Arb himself.

"All quiet?" Dwalin asked, bumping shoulders with Arb as he passed.

"Naught, but th' sound a' gnawin', Captain Dwalin."

'Out back' was a small side cavern with its own fireplace and a few small tables and chairs, no fancier than the bigger room, but noticeably quieter. Thorin and Bilbo had it to themselves.

For a moment before they entered, Ori saw them sitting at a far table, Bilbo in Thorin's lap, Thorin's head on Bilbo's shoulder, looking far happier and more content than Ori could ever recall seeing him before.

"Evenin!'" Dwalin barked. "Hope we ain't interruptin'... anythin'."

"Fuck you, Dwalin," said Thorin affably.

"No need, looks like our Bilbo's got yeh well in hand."

"No fair guessing," Bilbo muttered, then giggled. "Ori, you must come and have some of this beef rib. I'm all but swooning over the sauce."

"Whereas our Thorin's jus' swoonin'," Dwalin snickered.

He thumped down on a chair at the table and settled Ori on his knee, well within reach of the partially demolished platter of barbecue.

"Be nice," Ori admonished him gently, and fed him a rib. "Bilbo, have you and Thorin been shopping?"

"Shamelessly," said Bilbo. "And the great, royal lump is no help. He won't even tell me what half of it is, though I did get necklaces of pressed sugar and fruit roundels threaded on cord for Frodo and Sam."

"Are they for eating or wearing?"

"Both, conveniently enough. Oh, and you must go to the Alley of Ephemeral Things. When I'm not covered in sauce I'll show you what I got. Within three stalls, I had enough material to plot a new novel."

"Should I guess?" Ori asked slyly.

"Oh, go on, but you never will!"

Dwalin and Thorin exchanged looks of trepidation.

"We could nip out t' th' fron' room an' ge' a pint 'r five an' be back 'fore they noticed we were gone."

Ori turned to him and blinked saucily.

"I'm sorry? Are you still here? I hadn't noticed I was sitting on your knee!"

"See," said Dwalin. "There's yer proof."

Bilbo's haul from the Alley of Ephemeral Things included half a page of a partly burnt love letter written in Sindarin script, a handbill announcing the production of a long forgotten play and a merchant's receipt listing the purchased items: one box scented talcum powder; two ribbons: grosgrain, red; and a pair of manacles, size large.

"Mahal!" Ori exclaimed. "Bilbo! You're really going to make up a story with all that?"

"I don't see how I could be expected to resist," said Bilbo. "Care to join me?"

"Thank you, but I think I'd rather be surprised."

"Ah, well, the offer stands, should you ever wish to take me up on it. I can scarcely imagine the mayhem we might conjure up together."
After they left Bilbo and Thorin, they wandered hand in hand, through the Alley of Lanterns, and down the Alley of Spinning Wheels, where Ori got a serious case of the 'wants', passing stall after stall filled with wool roving and spun yarns in every color. There were knitting needles capped with sapphires and buttons of cast silver and gold, crocheted blankets with fibers a half inch thick and woven blankets of white silk upon which Ori didn't quite dare breathe.

At the Crossroads, at the meeting of the Alley of Lost Coin and Alley of Dares, Dwalin stopped and sniffed the air like a hound.

This was the gambling district in the night market. During the day the stalls were mostly coffee shops where old dwarrow pensioners played cards or diced for small change. At night, the coffee shops closed and reopened as serious gambling establishments, and possibly homes to unsavory goings on related to the exchange of enormous sums of money. The city guard of Erebor kept a close eye on these stalls. While gambling was legal, large numbers of shady characters offing each other was not.

They had to stop as the crowds had parted to allow the approach of an ominous looking dwarf, all in black, on a black pony. A shiver went through the crowd, though the dwarf on the pony looked neither right nor left, instead stopping at a very large open stall on the corner where hard-faced dwarrow bet money on a little ball that circled a wheel of fortune, waiting for it to land on black or red, and then which number.

An attendant trotted out of the stall to hold the pony, as the dwarf dismounted, and then took the pony, presumably to stable it. The dwarf stalked into the gambling parlor as if he owned it, which, in fact, he did.

Nori knew all the gaming bosses of Dale and Erebor, and so did Ori, at least by hearsay. Among the more horrifying were Marnik, son of Narnik, who wore an iron nose because an angry associate bit off his real one, and 'Lord' Taen, said associate, who was though to be the illegitimate son of Lord Sikar. That Sikar refused to acknowledge him only fueled Taen's considerable temper.

As terrible as they were, they were still afraid of this dwarf all in black, Master Ursith, who was colder than the waters of the Bay of Forochel from which he was said to hail. A quiet, intense, sneaky fellow, he had skulked on the periphery of the demimonde in Dale until the night of the Master's fall, then rushed in to fill the vacancy as the boss of all gambling with precision born of long biding and planning.

He wore his red hair in one long queue, wrapped round his head, so it resembled a ball of twine. Black tattoos of script fell down his face and neck and into his collar. On the back of his left hand he bore the rune for 'hate' and on his right the rune for 'death'. His grin, when he did grin, opened like a slit throat, with nothing humorous about it.

They said he was richer than the Durins, but his only adornment was a diamond ring on his right thumb, with its stone the size of a peach pit and the iron band in which it was set had grown flat on one side from years of him tapping it on the arms of his hard, wooden chair as he listened to some fool talk themselves deeper and deeper into a hole.

"I been tryin' t'get th' goods on 'im f'r decades," Dwalin muttered. "Slippery son of basalt."

"Come on," said Ori, tugging him along. "You're not working right now, remember?"

Dwalin turned to him and smiled.

"Aye, righ' yeh are, love. No workin' t'night. In fact, I go' somethin' fun t' show yeh."

The Alley of Divine Bliss smelled of perfumes, oils, and xocolātl. The air felt heavy and soft, which was odd, since it wasn’t that far from the Moo and Cluck. All the stalls along it were swathed in satin, all shades of pastel colors. Even the street was roofed with billowing gauzy cloth. Throw pillows were scattered everywhere. Ori felt like he was walking through a mattress. A large shop front was shrouded in black satin printed with red lips. Dwalin lifted the curtain and Ori went in.

Row upon graduated row of fake pricks in every shape and size and material from carved marble to glass to wood.

The glass items, on the very top row, were backlit to show off their swirling colors or the glass shapes or gems encased within them. Some were carved like dams or dwarrow or fantastical “I’ll never look at corn on the cob the same way again,” said Ori.
Dwalin chuckled.
“Best yeh’ve been exposed t’ em gradually,” he said.
“This one had two ends? Why would…. Oh!”
“Dams just wanna have fun,” said Dwalin.
“That’s terribly clever!”
“Thank yeh.”
“I mean the prick.”
Dwalin’s grin deepened.
“Thank yeh.”
“Some dwarrows’ husbands!” said Ori, rolling his eyes. “So… are we here shopping for someone in particular? Or are you just threatening me with vegetables?”
“Nah, just wanted t’ see yer face when yeh saw ‘em.” “And, did I meet your expectations?”
“Always, love. Always.”
There was some jewelry under glass, which seemed to represent genitals. Ori couldn’t imagine wanting to wear a penis on a chain around his neck. What he thought was really interesting were the pieces that seemed to have both penis and vulva combined, either in coitus or just as if they were on the same person.
He wouldn’t wear those either, but he began to plot how he could get down here to buy one for Dwalin’s nameday.
Fili would know where he could get it engraved.

In the Alley of Charms and Mysteries they passed stalls filled with different stones, carved into runes for the drawing of luck, love, money, everything up to and including passing mastery critiques. In another stall, for a fee, you could pour molten lead into cold water and the seer would interpret the shapes it took.
This caught Ori’s curiosity. He pulled Dwalin over.
“Let’s try!”
Dwalin chuckled,
“Ain’t yeh chattin’ t’ Mahal already?”
“I want to know what she sees.”
“Fair enough.”
“You first,” Ori instructed.
The dam regarded them, expressionless. Dwalin put down the two silver and, as directed by the dam, put the small steel spoon into the lead and dropped the contents into the water. Ori leaned in, watching it bubble and spin for a moment.
The dam lifted it out and peered at it.
“Hmmm, it has the definite shape of a large bird, which I’ve never seen before. I do feel that it is exactly this. You will go on a journey where a large bird or a large number of birds will befriend and aid you.”
She passed him the lead item.
“Keep it with you as a talisman.”
Dwalin looked it over with Ori.
“I’m in luck,” Dwalin commented. “Don’t look anythin’ like them raphcuctus birds. So, we ain’t goin’ off t’ become keepers a’ tha’ sort.”
They all laughed, then Ori took his turn.
The lead was hissing as he lifted it and dropped the spoonful in. The water boiled wildly, so much so, they couldn’t see what shape the lead was taking for a moment. The dam rose, startled, and peered in as they did.
The water stilled. At the bottom of the glass container was a perfect sphere of shiny silver lead. Ori gamely pulled up his sleeve, reached in, pulled it out, and laid it before the dam, looked at her interestedly.
The dam stared at it. She backed away slightly, then glared at them.
“Get out of my stall. Take your money and that…thing and go. I’ve never seen you. You’ve never seen me. This never happened.”

Shocked, Ori backed into Dwalin, the tiny ball of lead in his hand. Dwalin pulled him away, chuckling.
“C’mon, love. I think Mahal’s been’ pretty straight forward with that.”
Ori looked down at the lead in his hand.
“What could this mean?” he asked. Dwalin took up the tiny ball and waved it under Ori’s nose, laughing.
“It means Mahal says ‘No peekin’!, love.”
Ori giggled and they went on.

One entire alley, as wide as a street, was given over to a permanent night market institution.

Master Axsin’s Cabinet of Curiosities! Rare Wonders of the World! Strange Beings and Tricks of Nature!
The metallic gold letters topped graceful stone arches and wrought iron gates at each end of the street. Just beyond each gate, a dwarfsdam sat in a brightly painted booth, selling tickets for general admission.
Ori paid out two coppers for each of them and they started down the alley.
“Strange beings and tricks of nature,” Ori murmured, unsure as to what this meant. How strange could they be?
As it turned out, the first being they met was Master Vobwi, and he really wasn’t any stranger than the Durins.
“Master Vobwi!” Ori called.
“Eh? Oh, hullo there, Lord Ori, Captain Dwalin.”
The merchant stood in front of a largish stall which held a dozen mesh cages filled with spiders of varying size, but all in brilliant colors.
“Those are pretty,” said Ori.
“An’ deadly as a pike through th’ eye,” said Master Vobwi cheerfully.
“Really?” Ori asked. “Do you sell them?”
“Oh, no, no, no. Though, mind, before King Frerin went off wi’ his entourage, I was fairly swamped wi’ offers. No, I bring these down t’ show off in th’ night market every now an’ again, an’
Master Axsin treats me t’ a few rounds at th’ Moo and Cluck. He says me little darlin’s lend an air a’ danger t’ th’ proceedings.”
Ori looked around, wide-eyed.
“Is Kthulluh here, too?”
“Oh, I sent Kthulluh off wi’ a sailor, a while back, t’ put back in th’ sea where it belongs. Thin’ was beginnin’ t’ creep me out.”
“It didn’t seem terribly friendly,” said Ori.
“Friendly? That’s th’ least a’ it. I come in late one night, turned on th’ lamps, it was crawlin’ out’ve its tank. It crossed th’ floor, crawled int’ another tank, ate all th’ fish an’ crawled back, an’ I swear it was givin’ me th’ eye like I was next. If it did tha’, wha’ else could it do?
“I thought: Fuck it. If it locks th’ doors an’ starts doin’ th’ accounts, I’m out.”
“I would think that would be a good thing,” Ori reasoned.
“I’d have t’ pay it! An’ it had a beak.”
“A beak? Where?”
“Underneath.”
“Under…”
“Imaging havin’ a beak in yer arse,” Dwalin said, idly.
“IT eats wi’ th’ beak,” retorted Vobwi.
“That would make dinner parties awkward,” said Ori.
They bade goodbye to Master Vobwi and continued down the row. They saw a live three-headed
A snake, and the mummified remains of a half-man/half-fish, a vast collection of skulls, many of which were of strange beasts which may or may not have existed long ago, a taxidermied hare which had antlers and was said to roam the fields of Haradwaith, a pair of extremely ornate, bejeweled shoes with pointed toes said to be cursed to turn the wearer into a strange animal every full moon, a mound of a dried, jelly-like substance with long, trailing tentacles said to carry venom enough to kill any being caught by it in the high seas, a glass bottle the size of a small shed which contained the pickled remains of what was described as the largest flower in the world, a mummified man’s forearm that had a steel hook where the hand should be and was claimed to have belonged to a notorious corsair named Short Tom Gold, and something that looked like the front ends of two taxidermied horses sewn together at the torso.

Ori refrained from asking how the animal relieved itself. Such mysteries were not for him to know.

At the end of the row they came to Axsin’s Cabinet of Curiosities.

In fact, it was a large cabinet with double doors, closed and secured with a ridiculously enormous ornate padlock. It sat back a little from the walkway, tucked into a niche covered in ceramic tiles with mottoes printed on them in ancient Khuzdul writing.

Ori leaned forward and squinted at one motto.

“It says: Remember to wash your face.” He looked at Dwalin, his head cocked. “I’m open to ideas.”

“It was th’ surround t’ an old wall fountain from Queen Hild’s last palace renovation,” said Dwalin.

“Let me guess,” said Ori. “It came with the palace and she hated it and couldn’t wait to get rid of it.”

“Right in one,” said an ancient dwarf, whose white beard braid swept the ground as he hobbled forward. He had bright green eyes and his eyebrows seemed to overflow his face, sweeping off to the sides where he had curled them in on themselves and used wax to keep them that way. The ends bounced whenever he moved his head. “Imagine! Queen Hild was just going to throw this out! Shocking! She let me have it provided I hauled it as far away from her as possible.”

“What’s in the cabinet?” Ori asked. “Is it something that’s going to spring out at us?”

Axsin’s eyebrows bobbed dangerously as his eyes widened.

“That’s something I never thought of! I’ll have to take that under advisement!”

“Now yeh’ve done it,” Dwalin murmured.

Ori nudged back with a gentle elbow.

“So, what is in the cabinet?” Ori asked.

“Costs you two coppers a piece to find out! Are you a gambling dwarf, Lord Ori?”

Ori stared at him.

“Do I know you? Have we been introduced?”

Axsin’s smile widened.

“After a fashion, m’lord. Once your image is all over Vug Magazine, you’ve pretty much been introduced to everyone.”

“Oh,” said Ori, then he felt rather silly for saying it. Instead he hurried on to the contents of the cabinet. He was fairly sure it wasn’t empty, and he did have the coppers.

“Yes, please,” said Ori, handing over the coins.

“Step in, please,” said Master Axsin.

They did so. Master Axsin closed the curtains and opened phosphorus lamps that brightened the tiny space. He took a key on his chain from around his neck and opened the cabinet with great ceremony.

Inside the cabinet, on the middle of three shelves, sat a single picture in a gilt frame.

This Axsin took down with great reverence.

It seemed to be a faded graphite drawing of the city of Dale over the edge of a battlement. It was quite light, rather yellowish brown, with a smudge in the middle of the sky which was not a cloud.

“Why is this drawing a curiosity?” Ori asked, expecting to be told it had been drawn by Thror or “It’s a curiosity,” said Axsin, “because it’s not a drawing. It’s an image of the actual place, frozen in time, captured on special coated paper, like a memory.”

“Really?” Ori asked, not entirely sure he believed the dwarf. “What’s this smudge?”

“That’s a raven,” said Axsin. “The process for capturing such an image requires the paper be exposed to light for several hours, so much so that a bird flying across the image is barely more than a whisper. This object is called a sungraphic.”

Ori looked up at Dwalin.

“What do you think?” Ori asked.

“Is it th’ only one?” Dwalin asked.

“The only one outside of King Ulfr’s laboratory,” said Axsin. “Apparently he’s working on the process. This cost me a very valuable jeweled drinking cup made from the skull of an ancient dwarf warrior. More of a punchbowl, really.”

They thanked Master Axsin and walked on, out of this alley and down another alley that promised magical tattoos and cures for curses which seemed to be mostly eyeballs suspended in some greenish liquid sealed in clear glass bottles.

Finally they came to a stall with customers ten deep to the counter. There was much jostling and waving of arms. Whatever was on sale, it was very desirable.

“Can you see what’s going on?” Ori asked Dwalin. He himself was prepared to edge around it.

“Wait a mo’, love,” said Dwalin with a frown. Being so tall, he could see right over the heads of the crowd. His eyes narrowed, then his jaw fell.

“Mahal’s hairy arse.”

“What?” Ori asked.

“Look!”

Dwalin grabbed Ori by the waist and boosted him up to kneel on Dwalin’s shoulder.

“Ooooh, shit,” Ori muttered.

It seemed to be a souvenir stand, such as those seen all over at Durin’s Day or Yule, filled with cheap trinkets to sell to visitors from outside of Erebor. There were tea towels and plates and bells and tobacco pouches. There were tea cups and baby bibs and even lace-edged knickers.

And each and every piece bore a more or less badly drawn rendition of a very familiar face.

“Bearer souvenirs!” the merchant barked. “Get yer picture of the Blessed Bearer! Bring luck an’ plenty t’ yer house! Lookin’ t’ pop out badgers? Guaranteed t’ make yeh preggers within th’ year!”

“Rogi!” Ori bellowed.

And so it was, Vi and Margr’s not-so-darling boy, surrounded by the makings of the profitable scam of a lifetime.

“Clear off, yeh lot!” Dwalin roared.

The customers scattered and Ori launched himself from Dwalin’s shoulders without a second thought.

He hit the ground, hopped over the counter, and thundered down the alley behind - this, apparently, being Rogi’s planned escape route should business sour.

Rogi had a head start and he was not giving that up for anything.

Ori roared Rogi’s name, infuriated almost beyond belief, even as he realized he had no idea what he would do if he actually caught the little creep. Hold him down so Dwalin could pulp him, probably.

At first it was easy enough to follow, since Rogi wasn’t careful and he left angry merchants and broken glassware behind him as he bulled through the Alley of Colorful Lights, but then he turned into less crowded ways, moving left and right down passages Ori couldn’t even see. Nor was Rogi careful about knocking others to the side or down on the ground, something Ori would never willingly do.

Eventually Rogi pulled ahead and turned into a district filled with carpets and tapestries and disappeared.

Ori stood, panting, at the intersection of six crowded alleyways, with no idea where he was or where Rogi had gone.

Never mind. Margr and Vi would know where Rogi hid out when he wasn't home or in lockup.

He turned. For an instant he saw Rogi hurtling toward him, not paying attention to his path, then Ori was laid out on a pile of carpets, staring out into the vastness of the cavern ceiling. He was almost certain it shouldn't be spinning that way.

He shook himself off and someone help him up. He said an absent 'thank you' as the world stopped whirling all around him and settled back into place.

A crowd had gathered around something or someone before him.

With determination, he approached and tried to put some force - or at least volume - behind his "Pardon me. Excuse me."

The dwarf who helped him up called out, "Oi, yeh lot! Lord Ori's tryin' t' come through."

The crowd parted, giving him full view of the unconscious Rogi, sprawled on the ground.

Apparently Rogi had run himself in a circle and ended up exactly where he least wanted to be, and with the person he least wanted to meet, and all the worse for it.

Rogi was a slight, gangly dwarf, it was true, but Ori doubted that he himself had suddenly turned into a stone wall.

An ancient dwarrowdam had somehow managed to hunker down over Rogi, prodding Rogi's skull with an arthritic forefinger.

Ori knelt beside her.

"He smacked 'is head on th' ground right smart. Silly badger."

"Will he be alright?" Ori asked.

"Dunno. Heads is tricky. 'Course, this bein' Rogi, it's prob'ly empty."

Rogi groaned. He sat up in a wibbly fashion and blinked up at them.

"Wha' th' fuck?"

"Aye, no damage at all," she said with a smirk.

Dwalin arrived at that moment to loom over Rogi and glare.

"I didn't do nuffin'!" Rogi whined up at him.

"Nothin' strictly illegal," Dwalin granted, "but shady as fuck. I'm tempted t' run yeh in anyway, fer interruptin' our evenin' out."

"I'll lodge a complaint!"

"I'll tell yer mam," Dwalin shot back.

Rogi gasped, eyes full of fear.

"It's all Nori's fault!" he squealed. "He talked me int' it!"

Ori rolled his eyes. He had no doubt Nori was somehow involved.

"And I'm sure he held a knife to your throat, too," said Ori. "Don't you think Dori should have some say before you put his face on a tea towel?"

"Awright, awright," Rogi relented as Dwalin yanked him to his feet.

Ori helped the old dam to stand up rather more gently.

"Thank ya, lad," she said. "Didn't know how I was gonna do that on me own."

He shot a look over at Dwalin, who was still browbeating Rogi. The dam patted Ori's arm, saying,

"Not t' worry. Here, I got Rogi's purse."

"You stole his purse?" Ori hissed.

Dwalin sent Rogi on his way with a warning to close up shop. "Well, I took, yers, too," she admitted, "but I was always gonna give yers back."

She tucked both into his hand.

"Thank you," said Ori weakly.

"Now, now, yer a good badger. Tell yer Dori that old Vusma, daughter o' Vus, says hello."

"I will," he promised as she hobbled away.

Dwalin came back to him, then.

"Yeh all righ', love? Yeh want t' head home?"

"We have something to take care of first," said Ori grimly. "Has the midnight bell tolled yet?"
"No' yet."
"We need to go back to the Alley of Lost Coin, and I have no idea where we are."
"It's no' tha' far. Come on."
Dwalin took his hand and led him around three corners and, abruptly, they were at the crossroad.
"I'd say I need to map this place," said Ori, "but I have a feeling the alleys rearrange themselves when nobody's looking."
Ori turned to Master Ursith's gaming tables. As the midnight bell tolled, Master Ursith cleared the games and shuttered the stall. Vast sums of money changed hands, but no one complained that the games had ended. One did not complain to, or - Mahal forbid - whine at Master Ursith.
The gamblers drifted down the alleys to other games, leaving the square oddly and ominously deserted.
Ori paused a few moments, then went to the door at the back of the stall and knocked.
"Scram! We're closed, yeh idjit," Ursith barked.
"Master Ursith," said Ori, "we need to talk."
The door slammed open. Dwalin leapt forward to grab Ori, probably to shove Ori behind him, but Ori didn't react, even when the gambling boss snarled,
"Yeh!"
"Uh huh," said Ori, slipping by Ursith, into the booth, grabbing the larger dwarf by the ear in passing and dragging him back inside.
Dwalin stepped in behind them, filling the doorway, obviously shocked and confused.
"Ouch!" Ursith hissed, as Ori gave a vicious tug on his ear. "Leggo!"
"We. Need. To. Talk," Ori growled.
"Well, tell yer buffalos t' close the door, chick."
Dwalin gasped, slammed the door shut behind himself and leaned on it.
"Nuisance?"
"O' course it's me, cram brain," said Nori, exasperated. "Lemme go, chick."
Ori gave one more vicious tug, for emphasis.
"You're luck you still have your kneecaps, you jerk," Ori growled.
Dwalin laughed. At first it was a chuckle, then it rose to a roar, which shook both him and the booth.
"Yeh mean t' say, all this time, forty years, I been tryin' t' catch Ursith out doin' somethin' illegal, and all this time he's just-"
"Shut up!" Nori muttered. "Can't yeh see I'm in disguise? I ain't useful t' Thorin if everyone knows who I am."
Dwalin swallowed his guffaws, but they still shook him.
"What's the big idea, chick?" Nori demanded.
"Why is Dori's face plastered all over a bunch of shoddy knickers?"
"Like he'd mind!"
"I think he'd mind having his face on some dam's bum."
Nori grinned with evil glee.
"Tha' one was Rogi's idea, I was more along the line o' tea towels meself. What? I gotta keep me hand in, chick. I got a reputation t' maintain."
"And making a tidy profit from your own brother's fame has nothing to do with it?"
"But I ain't."
"Oh, you let Rogi keep the money out of the goodness of your little heart," snapped Ori sarcastically.
Finally, Nori's grin faded.
"Look, don't say a word, but I been passin' on me share t' Mistress Annis in Steam Alley."
"How much of it?"
"All of it, ya little shit."
"Really?"
"Pinky swear."
"Let me see if your fingers and your toes are crossed and I might believe you."
"This getup ain't real conducive to the striptease, but it's true. Just don't say nuffin' t’ Dori, right?"
"I think he's going to notice, Nori, when he goes to tap out his pipe and his face is painted on the bottom of the ash tray."
"Not about the goods, chick, just what I'm doin' with me proceeds. Like I said, I got a reputation t' maintain."

Ori sighed, threw his hands in the air in surrender then hugged Nori.
"Here, wha' were that f'r?"
"To make up for the beating Dori's going to give you when finds out."
"Right," Nori snickered. "Better give me another o' them. I'm gonna need it."
After that, Ori dug in his pocket and handed Vusma’s ‘gift’ over to Nori.
"Here, add this to Mistress Annis’ ’share’. It’s Rogi’s purse. An elderly dam named Vusma gave it to me."
Nori cackled maniacally and pocketed it.
finally, Ori and Dwalin exited the gambling stall through the door. Ori suspected Nori would simply sink through the floor, or perhaps there was even something as prosaic as a trap door under a rug in there.
Dwalin was still shaking his head, but he didn't say anything about Nori.
"Time t’ go home, love?" he asked.
Ori smiled and said, “I want to go to the Alley of Sweetmeats, first.”
“Aye? Yer wantin’ a candy necklace like th’ badgers’?”
“Bilbo was telling me about this one sweet. It’s jellied rose petals covered in bittersweet xocolātl.”
"Tha’ sounds like somethin’ worth stayin’ f’r,” Dwalin agreed.
“Then, I want to go home, so we can go to bed.”
“Tired, are yeh?”
Ori snickered.
“No.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Finally Ori and Dwalin get a little private time together and then we have some breakfast. If you’re not into martial bliss, skip to the last few paragraphs. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

When they got home from the market, Ori looked up and down the hallway from the stable entrance, slightly paranoid that Dori might have waited up for them. Happily, the hall was in darkness, with just the small phosphorous pebbles running along the floor to guide their way.

“Th’ coast clear?” Dwalin whispered.

“Ye-EEEes!”

He turned, giggling, and swatted Dwalin’s hand.

“The coast is not on my behind!”

“Ooops, sorry!” Dwalin snickered, completely unrepentant.

“Can I trust you as far as the shower?” Ori asked archly.

“As far as th’ shower. After we get there, I make no promises.”

“Fair enough.”

They shut and locked the bathroom door behind them. Ori made sure they had a goodly supply of pink towels on hand, then stooped to unfasten his boots.

“Wha’ did yeh like best a’ everythin’ yeh seen?” Dwalin asked, yanking off his tunic.

“The chips, of course!”

“A’ course,” Dwalin laughed, flinging the tunic into the hamper.

“And we got to dance together! You dance divinely.”

“I dance like a buffalo.”

“But a divine buffalo,” Ori insisted, kicking his left boot into a corner. “What did you like best?”

“Th’ second bes’ thin’ was yeh draggin’ th’ crime lord aroun’ by ‘is ear. Tha’ were dead sexy.”

Ori hopped out of his right boot and went and rested his forehead against Dwalin’s chest and giggled.

“Once you got over the fact that he wasn’t really a crime lord, anyway. Thank you for not stopping me.”

Dwalin embraced him and kissed the top of his head.

“I’ve learnt it’s bes’ t’ trust yeh, love, even if it seems like yer goin’ t’ get yer throat cut. Yeh always have yer reasons.”

“You trust me?”

“A’ course I trust yeh. We trust each other, righ’?”

“Yes, but it’s sweet to hear you say it. I guess I’m still getting used to being a grown dwarf.”

“We’ve only bin married five months,” said Dwalin. “An’ it wasn’ planned. I’d say yer doin’ jus’ fine. At yer age, I wasn’t quite as promisin’.”

“Were you awkward?”

“I was a walkin’ hazard t’ meself an’ everyone else,” said Dwalin as he unbuttoned Ori’s tunic. “I had a chip on me shoulder th’ size a’ Erebor, always thinkin’ I had t’ prove meself.”

“Well, you don’t have to prove yourself to me,” said Ori adamantly. Then he frowned and said, “If that was your second favorite thing, what was your first?”
Dwalin's grin widened into wickedness. As he pushed Ori's tunic off of his shoulders, Dwalin leaned over and whispered in his ear.

“When we danced, I wished we were alone, 'cos I wanted t' lay yeh down in th' middle a' tha' square an' suck yer cock 'til yeh screamed.”

Ori’s cheeks and his crotch caught fire, for two very different reasons.

“Really?” he rasped, looking up at Dwalin with what he knew must be large, fascinated eyes.

“Aye! Yeh wiggled yer arse in me direction an' it was a very near thin’.”

“I… I didn't do it on purpose,” Ori stammered. “I mean, I wasn’t trying to tease you or anything!”

“Ori love, yeh never have t’ try,” said Dwalin.

They kissed over and over, quick, playful pecks.

Dwalin leered and said, “I can’t wait t’ strip off yer… socks.”

“You’re such an animal!”

“Someone got t’ be, or we’ll never get int’ th’ shower, never mind out’ve it.”

“Alas,” Ori agreed. “Shall I unfasten your boots for you?”

“Depends,” said Dwalin, “is this jus’ a pretense t’ look under me kilt?”

“I’m not proud,” said Ori, kneeling.

He was good to his word, though he did unfasten the boots before he turned his head and planted a wet kiss to the inside of Dwalin's left knee. He aimed the next a little higher up Dwalin's thigh, the third higher still, then he let his head fall back and sucked and nuzzled Dwalin's balls.

Dwalin swayed a little on his feet and breathed, "Tha's enough f'r th' moment, love, at leas’ 'til I got me back agains' a wall.”

"Aww," said Ori, giving the sac a quick kiss as a promise.

He rose to his feet to find Dwalin red in the face.

Ori fluttered his eyelashes.

"I'm being cute for you," he said vacuously.

Dwalin snorted and turned him very firmly toward the shower.

"Yeh'll be th' death a' me, scribe." "Ah, but what a way to go."

They did notlinger too long in the shower, though Ori did take his time washing Dwalin's back as well as his front. That first shower they took together months ago was forever fixed in Ori's mind. He couldn't pass up another chance to lather them each up thoroughly and glide across Dwalin's luscious muscles.

It made him so happy, yet he was hungry for more.

In the bedroom, Ori grabbed Dwalin's hand and pulled him to the bed. Dwalin willingly followed, chuckling.

"Come on," Ori cried, "I want to try this!"

As it happened, he meant the xocolātl they had bought at the market, but it didn't seem like Dwalin minded. They lay on the bed, face to face, with the box open between them, and Dwalin fed Ori one of the small, dark squares. "Mmmm," Ori groaned as the candy melted on his tongue, first the bittersweet, then the taste of something his brain processed as thick silk and the spring greening of the mountainside, but deeper and richer.

Ori smiled and sighed.

"So that's a rose."

"Lessee," Dwalin murmured, leaning in.

Their lips met, and Dwalin's tongue traced Ori's mouth. It opened to welcome him and they kissed.

"Ah," said Dwalin, pulling back with a little smile. "I'm wantin' more a' tha'.

"Do you really?" Ori teased.

"Aye, really."

Ori fed him a xocolātl, then his fingers. Dwalin licked and sucked the tips of those, then their entire lengths, one by one, then, holding Ori's gaze, the thinner skin between each finger. Ori shivered and giggled.
"Do you want more?" he asked shyly.
"I want whatever yeh'll give me, love."
"More xocolātl?"
"Oh, aye, tha', too."
Ori put a square between his teeth and leaned forward. Dwalin grasped the rest in his mouth and they kissed amid the flavor of xocolātl and flowers.

"More?" Dwalin asked.
"Of you, so you'd better move the box out of harm's way," Ori warned.
"Yeh plannin' somethin'?"
"Mmmmaybe."
Dwalin put the box on the table behind him, and turned back over.
"Rrrow!" Ori growled, and launched himself into Dwalin's arms.

"Oi! Th' beastie's go' me!" Dwalin cried out.
He laughed and rolled onto his back. Ori, atop him, kissed his face over and over and finally kissed his mouth long and hard.
Ori pulled back a little.
"What do you want to do?"
"I though' we'd do each other, actually."
"I was hoping for something slightly more specific," Ori admitted cheerfully.
"Mebbe yeh should kiss me some more an' we'll see wha' happens."
Ori smiled into a kiss, Dwalin's hands firm on his bum and a buzz of pleasure through his veins.
“"You know,” said Ori, “I really liked when you touched me between the cheeks that time.”
“"I didn’t have th’ oil t’ do more. But I do now.”
“"Maybe… we could try that?”
“"Layin’ like this, where I kin see yer face? Hold on a mo.’”
Dwalin reached a long arm and opened the drawer of the bedside table, extracting a bottle of amber liquid in clear glass.

“What is it?” Ori asked.
“"Just a little pressed oil. Nothin’ scented ‘r anythin’."
“"So my arse won’t smell like a linen closet?”
“"Yeh know, tha’s jus’ wha’ I was thinkin’."
Ori giggled nervously and kissed him again and again, gathering courage as he let his legs fall to either side of Dwalin’s torso. He knew how this was supposed to go, but reading about it and doing it were two very different things, even with Queen Kivi’s advice.

“This may be a Prelude to Penetration with the Penis or other Object(s), or may be a Game unto itself. The Delivering Partner should have a Light Touch at first, especially if the Receiving Partner is Inexperienced. Or, if the participant(s) prefer Rough Play, please consult Chapter Twelve.”

Even Kivi couldn’t prepare Ori for how it felt.
Dwalin rubbed the bottle between his hands to warm the oil a little.
“"No use tryin’ this cold,” he said. “Defeats th’ purpose if I have t’ peel yeh off th’ ceilin’ first thin’."
Ori buried his face in Dwalin’s beard, giggling. He heard the stopper opening and in a breath-stolen second felt the warm oil slide between his cheeks. Then he felt the closed bottle fall to the sheets and felt it roll into his calf, cool on heated skin.
When Dwalin’s hands cupped his arse again he shivered.
“Kiss me, love,” Dwalin murmured.
Ori raised his head and kissed him with abandon, as if kisses could chase the fear away.
Then Dwalin’s fingers smoothed across his opening and there was no fear, just a shivery gasp of pleasure and the need to move hard against Dwalin’s belly.

“A’righ’?”
“Uh-huh,” he said in a small voice.
“More?”
“Yes, please,”
“Yer so polite.”
“Now!”
“Tha’s better.”

Dwalin teased him, pushing a little into him, then sliding all his fingers up along the walls and back several times before returning to the core. Ori tried to relax into his touch there, but he wasn’t quite sure how, and his breath was already running away with him. He didn’t know if he could take much teasing, and he shocked himself when he growled as Dwalin moved his touch away.

It shocked Dwalin, too, apparently, into laughing, eyes wide.

“Dwalin, I’m—”
“I get yeh, I get yeh. No more fuckin’ aroun’ while we’re fuckin’ aroun’.”

Ori gasped and reared up as Dwalin’s forefinger plunged just a little deeper than before, pushing against the ring of muscle, but not breaching it, then pulling back, then pushing forward and through and entering him.

Ori cried out in surprise, eyes tightly closed, as Dwalin’s hand stilled.

“Yeh a’righ?”
“More,” Ori squeaked.

Dwalin resumed, slowly and carefully, as Ori clenched around his finger, unable to stop himself. There was no fear now, nothing but pleasure, from behind and from his prick, hard and trapped between them, giving off sparks along his nerves as he ground into Dwalin.

Ori stared into Dwalin’s eyes as his body did things far beyond his bidding.

“I love how yeh rub agains’ me when yer excited,” Dwalin purred. “I could come jus’ fra’ tha’, me fierce li’le ember.”

Ori huffed out a laugh of doubt and shook his head, breathing harder, no breath to spare for more as he moved back and forth, sensing his completion, seeking it, yet not wanting it to arrive. Not yet. Not when this felt so good.

Then he was rubbing harder and faster and the pleasure rose, sweat dripping from his chin.

“Do-don’t stop,” he pleaded.

“No’ stoppin’,” said Dwalin with a proud, feral grin.

Ori shook so hard, coming in time with his gasping breath, that Dwalin had to hold him on top. Long after Ori came, he lay, shuddering, across Dwalin’s chest, struggling for breath. And just when he thought he was through, a new shivery wave rolled through him.

Eventually, time and place returned. The room had grown terribly quiet. Dwalin’s hands rubbed soft, sticky circles around his buttocks and Ori said,

“So… um… is that how it’s supposed to work?”

Dwalin laughed so hard he nearly bounced Ori off him. He rolled them over and kissed Ori hard.

“It really couldn’t’ve worked much be’er,” Dwalin promised.

“What would you like?”

“Well, now tha’ yer greased like a fryer hen, I though’ I’d roll yeh over an’ rub off on yeh.”

Ori shivered and grinned.

Dwalin leaned down and bit his ear, licked it, and said, “I’ll take tha’ as a ‘yes’.”

“You want me on my hands and knees?”

“Naw, I though’ I’d stick a pillow under yeh an’ tha’ll give yeh enough height. I’m intendin’ t’ do this lazy an’ slow.”

There were always plenty of pillows on their bed. Now Ori began to think this was a good thing. He couldn’t see himself or anyone else sleeping on a cum-covered pillow. Though, he was almost sure Queen Kivi would have something to say about it. Probably somewhere in Chapter Twelve with the pain, or at least ickiness. He wondered at his own selective scruples. He didn’t actually mind sleeping on the wet spot, but he didn’t want to wake with his hair plastered against his face with it.

Then Dwalin was kissing him and he didn’t think about ickiness anymore, just Dwalin’s mouth on his, still tasting vaguely of xocolātl. He twined his arms around Dwalin’s neck and gave as enthusiastically as he got.

Dwalin turned him on his stomach, kissing his neck and licking him between the shoulder blades, which got him a giggle and a poorly aimed swat for his troubles.

“If yeh don’ mind, I’m thinkin’ a’ olin’ meself up.”

“As long as you don’t get too slippery,” said Ori. “I’d hate for you to zip over me and smack into the headboard.”

“I’ll keep tha’ in mind.”

The mattress dipped on either side of him as Dwalin braced himself and eased down, seating his hard prick snuggly between Ori’s buttocks. He rubbed back and forth by experiment before dropped more weight on Ori’s pelvis, pushing Ori’s reawakening prick into the pillow.

“Oh,” Ori breathed. That’s nice.”

“Feels pre’y good fra’ here, too,” said Dwalin.

A little part of Ori still felt guilty that Dwalin couldn’t simply take him this way, as hard as his husband wished. After five months, was Dwalin really still satisfied to wait for that?

They heard Dwalin’s breath skip and guilty thoughts went right out in favor of bucking back, meeting strength with strength, gratified to hear Dwalin gasp in surprise.

“Keep tha’ up, this’ll be anythin’ but slow an’ easy,” said Dwalin.

“Should I stop?”

“… nah.”

Ori giggled into the mattress.

“Yer a menace, m’lord,” Dwalin growled.

“But I’m your menace.”

“Aye, yeh are,” said Dwalin in a low, dangerous voice. “It’s all I kin do t’ let yeh outa bed some mornin’s. W-want t’ cover yeh in xocolātl an’ cream an’ lick yeh clean fra’ head t’ toe.”

“Really?” Ori asked, more to see what would happen than anything else. He was not to be disappointed.

“If I could, I’d get down on me knees in open court an’ pull down yer britches an’ suck yer cock righ’ there.”

Great, blessed Mahal!

“Wh-what else?” Ori goaded, bracing himself, opening his legs a little more, letting Dwalin push against his opening with the length of his prick, which swelled with every pass.

“I’d take yeh on th’ battlemen’ in fron’ of th’ whole a’ Dale, bend yeh over th’ rail so they could see how pretty yeh look when yeh call ou’ me name, hear yeh moan when yeh come f’r me.”

“I want you, too,” Ori cried hoarsely. “Want you to take me on the battlement, want to feel your prick p-pound my hole.”

“Oh, Mahal,” Dwalin moaned, his breath and thrusts coming hard and short at once.

“Want you to swallow me down in… in the … the library! In the reference hall! Against the - the dictionaries!”

Dwalin came then, shouting, pressing Ori into the bed, Ori amazed that they hadn’t roused the whole house, and not really caring if they had because he was coming again himself, biting hard on the sheet, wishing for a pleasure-addled instant that Dwalin really was inside him.

They crashed to the mattress, laughing themselves breathless.

“Ori, love, ‘r yeh a’righ?”

“Dwalin! What in Mahal’s name did I just say?”

“It was hot enough t’ fry in, me pretty thin’,” said Dwalin, kissing his shoulder.

“If I could I’d get down on me knees in open court an’ pull down yer britches an’ suck yer cock righ’ there.”

Great, blessed Mahal!

“Wh-what else?” Ori goaded, bracing himself, opening his legs a little more, letting Dwalin push against his opening with the length of his prick, which swelled with every pass.

“I’d take yeh on th’ battlemen’ in fron’ of th’ whole a’ Dale, bend yeh over th’ rail so they could see how pretty yeh look when yeh call ou’ me name, hear yeh moan when yeh come f’r me.”

“I want you, too,” Ori cried hoarsely. “Want you to take me on the battlement, want to feel your prick p-pound my hole.”

“Oh, Mahal,” Dwalin moaned, his breath and thrusts coming hard and short at once.

“Want you to swallow me down in… in the … the library! In the reference hall! Against the - the dictionaries!”

Dwalin came then, shouting, pressing Ori into the bed, Ori amazed that they hadn’t roused the whole house, and not really caring if they had because he was coming again himself, biting hard on the sheet, wishing for a pleasure-addled instant that Dwalin really was inside him.

They crashed to the mattress, laughing themselves breathless.

“Ori, love, ‘r yeh a’righ?”

“Dwalin! What in Mahal’s name did I just say?”

“It was hot enough t’ fry in, me pretty thin’,” said Dwalin, kissing his shoulder.

“If I could I’d get down on me knees in open court an’ pull down yer britches an’ suck yer cock righ’ there.”

Great, blessed Mahal!
“Yer wonderful.”
“I’m sticky, and I’m too sated to move.”
“We’ll jus’ have t’ be sticky t’gether.”
“Good plan. Love that plan. Love you.”
“Love yeh, too.”

Much later on.

"Love, I’ve a question," said Dwain into the dark. "How does Nori ge’ his tattoos on, so they're th' exac’ same ev’ry time?"
"He uses stencils, registered on tiny marks actually tattooed into his hands and face. The ink's permanent until it's removed with rubbing alcohol."
"Huh. Stencils. I gotta remember tha' one. Cuts his own, does he?"
"No, I cut them."
"Really?"
"They have to be the same and they have to be perfect every time."
"Yeh could've had quite a life a' crime if th' scribe thin’ didn't work out."
"That's the irony, isn't it," Ori mused. "If I had, we would have met sooner. You could have persuaded me onto the path of law and order, reformed me, and married me anyway."

Dwain chuckled and hugged him close.

Early next morning, deciding to let his husband sleep, Ori washed, dressed, and went through to breakfast. Dori was presiding with Balin. Thorin, Bilbo and Frodo came in shortly after Ori. They were all in the middle of the meal when Roäc returned, strangely subdued.

"Everything go all right?" Thorin asked him.

Roäc held out his leg, which bore a message.

"Better read this," said the raven.

Thorin unfolded the same scrap of paper he had sent out to Ered Luin. Whatever he saw seemed to set him aback for a moment.

Wordlessly, the king handed the note to Ori.

Beneath the bloody thumb print was a one rune, khuzdul reply:

Understood.

"Oh," said Ori.

"Indeed," said Thorin. "But that could mean a lot of things, couldn't it."

"It could," Ori agreed.

"Excuse me," Roäc croaked. "There's a hungry raven waiting for his rabbit here."

"As you approached, I sent for someone to pull it out of storage down in the cheese caves and meet you at your aerie with it. Will that suffice, your majesty?"

"Eh. It better be good and smelly."

Thorin sighed as the raven swooped out. Dori bustled off with Mistress Dazla.

"Should we worry?" Ori asked, quietly.

"I don’t intend to," Thorin muttered.

"But you’re doing it," Bilbo said gently, placing a hand on the king’s arm.

"I know," Thorin frowned.

Nori and Bofur came in. Nori settled next to Ori with Bofur beside to him. Bofur emptied the remains of the platter of bacon and Nori looked extremely pleased with himself. Ori decided to rectify that at once.

"Nori, you jerk!"

Nori furrowed his brow and looked around.

"Dori here?"

"With Mistress Dazla, upstairs."
Nori glared, “So what was-?”
Ori hugged him.
“Oi! Wha’ were that f’r?”
"Because I didn’t say anything.”
“Good lad.”
Ori poured some tea for Nori, who was filling his plate with a slice of toast stuck in his mouth.
Dori whisked in, kissed Ori’s cheek and flicked Nori’s ear.
“Oi!” Nori barked, “Wha’ were that f’r?”
“You’ll find out,” Dori replied ominously, returning to his breakfast. Ori decided a subject change was needed.
"Dori, do you know a Vusma, daughter of Vus?"
The Bearer abruptly put down his fork.
"She's still alive? Great Mahal! She must be well over three hundred years old!"
"Did you know her from Steam Alley?"
"Back further than that, pet. Back as far as Ered Luin, and then again here in Dale. She was a bit of a healer, a bit of a cook and, let's just say she taught Nori everything he knows."
"Really?"
"Yes, though I drew the line when she wanted to teach you."
Ori thought he would keep it to himself that Nori had done it for her. Good thing, too, or Balin might still be chained to his desk.
Ori felt a prickle fly up his spine. He glanced out and saw Legolas appearing at the secret door at the bottom of the meadow. The elf crossed the meadow in seconds and hurried in.
“King - Idad Thorin! My people have sighted an orc pack!”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Oh no! Orcs! Whatever shall our dwarrow do? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori gulped. He’d thought they were finished with orcs.
“Where and how many?” Thorin demanded, rising from his chair, his face grim.
“Under twenty. They were spotted at the north end of the forest,” Legolas reported. “They are technically out of our boundaries, but they seem to be heading toward yours. I’m off to tell Ada.”
“Go,” Thorin excused him. He turned glancing about. Gloin entered with Sapphire on his shoulder.
“Sapphire,” Thorin ordered, “Find Dwalin, I need him here.”
“He’s still in bed,” Ori called as the raven vanished out.
“What’s to-do?” Gloin asked.
“Forgive me for borrowing your raven,” Thorin replied.
Ori felt he could almost see the plans forming in the king’s mind. He quickly formed plans of his own.

Dwalin was in no way thrilled with Ori’s plans.
“But, Dwalin, if I stay back and away from the fighting and stay hidden I can’t see the action, which is considerably different from the training ring and will give me practice in drawing movement.”
Dwalin sighed.
“Yeh know I’m jus’ afeert f’r yeh. I don’t want yeh t’ ge’ hurt, but a’ th’ same time I don’t wan’ yeh t’ think I think yeh ain’t capable a’ lookin’ after yersel’l. I ain’t Dori an’ I ain’t castin’ ‘spersions on our Dori.”
Ori laid both hands over his husband’s heart.
“I know, I know this, my love, and I doubt that you would try stowing me in a cupboard, if you thought there was danger.”
Dwalin raised an eyebrow.
“Did our Dori do that?”
“When I was very little, yes.”
Ori grinned at him as Dwalin rolled his eyes. He looked down at Ori, then sighed.
“A’righ’, me ghivashel. I can’t hold yeh where yer wantin’ t’ go. Just promise me-”
“I shall take every care I can, I promise.”
Dwalin yanked him into his arms and held Ori tightly.
Ori kissed the collar bone at his eye level and hugged back.
Dwalin released him and went to his weapons bench. He opened a large box and scooped out a handful of something. He closed the box and came back to Ori. Into Ori’s hands he placed a leather cloth piled with many polished and sharpened arrowheads. Ori nodded. He went to where he kept his slingshot and put the arrow heads into the pouch along with the several sharpened stones he used as ammunition.
They sailed in an elfin warship at midnight to the far shore of Long Lake to surprise the orc pack before dawn. Ori stayed curled up where Dwalin had tucked him, in a barrel, in case of rain or wind. Ori had a hard time not giggling hystically when he found that not only had Dwalin put a blanket in with him, but a few cushions so he would be comfortable and a pouch of dried meat and another of various snacks. Ori decided he would tell Bilbo, as this would be something Bilbo could use for his novels. It was so ridiculously romantic and comfortable that he was able, despite such cramped conditions, to get some decent sleep.

He woke with the sound of the elfin sailors quietly lifting the device they called the keel up through a vent and into the main part of the boat. The boat’s prow easily and silently slid up onto the shore. The dwarf warriors could disembark without splashing. Dwalin handed Ori up out of his barrel quietly and hissed, “Follow behind.”

Ori shook the feeling back into his limbs and scuttled silently after the troops.

They moved fast. Ori was glad he was a good runner. Dwarrow were natural sprinters and the squad moved at speed up the banks and through the grasses to where the elves had spotted the orc pack on the meadows between the Greenwood and the River Running.

Soon they were ensconced in a thicket of sumac and hemlocks. The canopy of leaves covered them and they could see easily between the skinny trunks. Ori stared. The pack was more in the lines of about fourteen orcs. The fire was dead and they lay about it in a large mess of bodies among swelling hillocks of earth. Unlike Drum, these orcs were huge, massively muscled, and made to be as ugly as possible to any other race Ori had ever seen. They made Drum look rather cute. A distance away stood their guards, one to the east and three others at the different compass points.

Dwalin put a hand on Ori’s shoulder and tucked him into the front of the thicket, so he could see. “There are only fourteen of them,” Ori said in iglishmêk. “Who attacks a mountain with fourteen people? For all they know, there might be a dragon in it!”

Ori was aware that in the back of his mind, it sounded like someone was choking on their ale. Across the meadow, a flicker of movement signaled that Tauriel and Legolas were in place with their troops, Kili and Gimli among them.

Dwalin grinned and kissed Ori’s cheek, then turned and gave orders in iglishmêk. A few soldiers slid silently out of the thicket. Ori watched, the darkness not bothering him in the least. The soldiers circumnavigated the orcs. They silently and easily disposed of the guard in the east, the north, and south. One of the hillocks rose and looked about.

Ori realized this was a warg.

He had heard of wargs all his life. He had even met one. No one ever told him they were supposed to be the size of ponies. Biscuit had been tiny. More of a toy breed, really. Silly of him not to realize, he thought with a silent, nervous giggle.

A few more wargs woke and looked about. Each of the first dwarrow soldiers dropped and froze. There was a breeze out of the northwest. The wargs sniffed. The thicket protected the dwarrow soldiers as did the breeze. The wargs looked about, then settled themselves again for sleep. “Why so few wargs?” a soldier asked in iglishmêk.

“Probably off pupping,” Dwalin signed back. “The elves said they had a couple a pregnant ones with them. Ready?”

Ori watched as Dwalin and the rest of his squad sidled in silence out of the thicket and took down the last guard.

Ori was sketching madly by now. Out of a far thicket Tauriel and Legolas drifted forward like smoke.

With a scream of discovery, the orcs leapt up and the battle began. The butchery was swift and vicious, but what struck Ori hardest was the noise, the shouting, oaths and battlecries, the ringing of metal on metal, all from this tiny skirmish. Ori filled page after page with gesture lines, split seconds of details burned into his mind. He used his sketchbook like a shield to keep from thinking about just what he was drawing.

To Ori’s horror, from the woods opposite appeared Loli, Omi, and Bain, wielding slingshots. They were definitely not part of Dwalin’s plan, and there was no time to warn Dwalin they were Then he saw a huge orc flush Loli and her slingshot from her hiding place and light out after her. She shrieked and dodged off into the woods. Ori scribbled: Helping Loli Meet at boat, propped his sketchbook up against a tree and raced after them, arrow head and slingshot in hand, sick to his stomach. Fog had risen with the dawn and turned the wood into a series of jutting black columns. He tried to watch for silhouettes and follow the sounds, but he tripped on downed branches and tangles of vines and stumbled gracelessly into a small glade where a female warg was pupping. Another female stood near. Both were scrawny and wasted with lack of food. Three pups lay beside the mother. The females stared at him, then past him. A roar at his back spun him around with a shriek.

He raised his slingshot and let fly. The projectile sang and struck the orc through the eye, jutting grotesquely from the socket. The orc looked as surprised as Ori felt, but Ori recovered instantly to fire another missile into the orc’s chest. The orc roared, staggered, toppled onto its face and lay, nerves shuddering, its back impaled by two sharp stones and a familiar axe. Loli and Gimli stood, panting, at the edge of the glade.

Tauriel and Legolas appeared, Legolas with Omi and Bain each by the scruff.

“Hurry,” Legolas hissed. “The orcs are scattering.”

Ori scrambled forward, then through his memory flashed Thorin and Dwalin talking about how easily wargs were trained, and Floris with Biscuit.

“The pups,” Ori gasped. He turned to the mother who had birthed another pup and was growling. The other female was shaking but also growling.

Ori shoved a hand into his belt pouch and pulled out a few snacks, which he tossed to them. Abruptly the wargs stopped growling, and looked utterly confused, but in a moment they sniffed at the food on the ground and ate it. Ori reached again and tossed them some dried meat. They ate this, too, and looked up at him expectantly. Two mangy tails wagged querulously. Ori went forward, and, hoping he wouldn’t be eaten on the spot, offered each a strip of dried meat. The mother and the other female cautiously took the meat from him. The mother rose, trembling, and emptied out her afterbirth.

Ori handed the warg another piece of meat, and the other came over, whining, and butted him in the shoulder with its head, knocking him over. Luckily he already had another piece out to offer her. The wargs sniffed him over, and pawed at his tunic, obviously looking for more.

“What are you doing?” Tauriel whispered in shock.

“Putting my life in jeopardy,” said Ori, struggling to his feet.

The fighting seemed to have stopped, the dawn sounds of the meadow and thicket rolling over them.

“Bain,” Ori asked, “do you have a boat at the shore?”

“Of course,” Bain grinned. “We followed you in my father’s old fishing dinghy. It’s at the shore next to the elves’ boat.”

Ori felt a headache but banished it and beckoned Bain and Legolas near.

“We need to take the wargs with us. I’ll try to lead off the females, if you’ll take the pups.”

Both looked startled.

Legolas said, “Ori, we’ll have our throats ripped out.”

“I don’t think so,” said Ori.

“You’re not certain?” Legolas asked.

“I’d take them all myself, but they’re the same size as Frodo, and they’re floppy.”

Bain turned to Legolas. “Can’t you do some elf magic or something to enchant them?”

“And then what? Turn them into field mice?” Legolas asked.

Ori offered more meat to the two bereft females, who seemed resigned that their pups should be taken away from them so soon. They came tentatively forward, their eyes on Ori. Ori gave each a piece and backed away and held out two more pieces.

Slowly they led the two females down to the boat. A young male limped toward them, sniffing after the food, interested in spite of the strangers and a orc knife shoved into its left hindquarter.
Legolas offered it some meat. The male tottered forward. As it took the meat, Legolas whispered to it in Sindarin. The beast's eyes glazed over and he toppled. Gimli swept forward scooped up the huge beast and Legolas helped him all but drag it into the boat.

"Wha' was all tha?" Gimli asked Legolas. "Did yeh jus' say 'potato' and 'skivvies' over an' over?"

"I had to come up with words that sounded soothing for that to work," said Legolas.

"I suppose 'Good wargie' ain't soothin' enough?"

Once in the dinghy, Omi and Loli put down a blanket and the wargs all but fell on it. Ori fed the mother more meat and messily managed to pour some water into her maw. Gimli and Tauriel put the pups down at the mother's belly and helped them to latch onto her nipples. Ori hope there would be some milk; she was so pitifully thin.

Legolas crouched over the young male as Gimli tried to get some water into the bleary animal. Ori rose at the sound of a shout. The war party was marching triumphantly over the crest. Ori waved madly. A soldier waved back and shouted. Dwalin appeared, Ori's sketch book in hand.

"All safe?" Dwalin shouted.

"All safe," Ori called back.

Dwalin arrived beside them, then halted abruptly.

"Where did you lot come from?"

"It doesn't matter if we can't get back," said Bain.

"What's wrong?" Ori asked.

"With the wargs, we're too heavy to sail, we're in danger of taking on water." He looked out over the lake, then did a double take and hissed, "Oh, shit!"

Another, larger sailing craft crossed the lake at speed. In a moment, a familiar figure came into focus. It was Sigrid at the bow. She was dressed in black trousers tucked into tall black boots, brown leather surcoat with a green shirt. Her golden hair flowed out from under a red velvet kerchief. One hand held the forestay of the jib and the other clenched one of Fili's swords.

Ori saw Fili was at the helm.

The bow grated up onto the sand and Sigrid leapt off, landed on Bard's fishing dinghy, and clouted Bain on the head.

"You idiots! Idad Thorin's livid, Wicked Step Mother's not pleased, and Da's about to have a cow."

"We were helping Ori!" Bain snapped, enraged and rubbing his head.

"Get everyone aboard our boat," she ordered and tied the dinghy behind.

"What's th' rush?" Gimli asked.

"There may be more orcs, mutton head. The soldiers have taken prisoners. Any chance they get a touch at us and they'll have a huge advantage. Move!"

In a matter on moments, they were off and sailing across the lake. Ori reluctantly patted the warg mother. Her fur was filthy and alive with fleas and ticks and she had decided he was her darling of the moment, snuggling against his leg. He wondered if Oin would have any remedies for the poor things. This female was plainly exhausted. The pups appeared to be getting some sustenance from her. Despite their legendary ferociousness and their size, the wargs appeared to be nothing more than the pitiful, homeless back alley dogs of Dale, which Ori had occasionally seen cowering away from all who laid eyes on them.

Sigrid had taken the helm and was guiding them easily through the waves. Ori looked back. The warship was following them. Ori reflected he had preferred the first crossing, with the wind behind them. Sailing against it now, required them to 'tack' as Bain called it, to run slanted one way then switch the sails to the other side and heel off the other way. Despite this, they moved swiftly. Dale loomed closer, Erebor rising behind. Even at this distance, Ori could see that there were rather a lot of people waiting at the docks.

They slid up to the dock, Bain dropping the jib at Sigrid's shout, and the remaining thrust floating them up to the pier. Bard caught the rope Bain tossed out and made the boat fast. He gave them all a cursory glance and turned. The warship slid along side the next pier. Several men came forward to catch the painters and make the ship safe.

Nori appeared at Ori’s side.

“Things’re ’bout t’ get right messy, Chick. Getcherself off home.”

“Is there a cart?” Ori asked. “The wargs can barely walk.”

“Yeah, over there.” Nori gestured with his chin.

Dipfa and Bujni pulled up to them in her cart, drawn by Poot-Poot. After a brief struggle and bribery with food the wargs were piled into the cart. Sigrid steered Bain homeward while Ori and his party sat along the sides of the cargo box and Dipfa urged Poot-Poot to trot quickly back to Fundin House.

Dipfa drove straight into the stable and out the back to the meadow. They all hopped out at the patio and Bujni ran indoors, calling for Oin.

Ori opened the back of the cart. Tauriel and Kill were fussing over the young male, Tauriel’s hand over the wounded hip. A faint green glow fell from her palm onto the warg’s flank, perhaps a temporary soothing of the pain. The other female and the mother stared down at the grass but made no effort to get out of the cart. Oin bustled out with Gridr, Dori, and Binni.

Dori opened her mouth to scold but her eyes fell on the wargs. Dori turned and went to speak with Mistress Dazla. Soon three large tubs were brought out and filled with warm water. Oin sifted powders and oils into each.

The adult wargs were put into the tubs. They were all a tight fit, as the wargs were so large, and they had to have their muzzles held as they lolled in the water, tired but clearly finding the water comforting. Next to the mother’s tub, Loli and Omi sat with the pups and a large basin, cleaning them up. Ori doubted the adults had ever had proper baths. They were quite disgusting.

And now, so was he.

Absently he scratched at his chest, wondering if Dori had a tub for him. He would like to go and bathe, but every time he moved a step away, the mother warg whined and started to panic.

Mistress Dazla brought out a platter of small strips of meat. These were fed to the adult wargs while everyone pitched in scrubbing them. Oin swore and went back inside but soon returned with some serviceable shears. Bilbo had come out and was standing with Dori. Frodo and Wee Sam stayed by the door as they had been instructed, but their eyes were glued to the enormous animals.

Out of the tubs and rinsed. Oin was obliged to cut away matted fur and oily knots of tar and filth that the orcs seemed to think made the wargs look good. In the end, Oin shingled all three coats to an inch long. Ori stared. Clean, watered, fed, their wounds tended to and with freshly cut coats, the wargs were quite as adorable looking as Biscuit.

The mother warg was the sparkling white of new-fallen snow, her eyes an icy blue-gray, the other female was a soft yellow with a pale yellow belly and brown ears. The male was reddish brown with large white and black spots. His feet were white, giving it the appearance of wearing boots. He also sported a huge red spot on the top of his head that looked just like a stylized heart. Kili burst out laughing.

Legolas came and snickered as well. Gimli patted the male, who’s tail instantly wagged furiously and the beast began eagerly licking Gimli’s face, knocking the dwarf on his backside. Gimli only chuckled and picked himself up to pat the head again. The male promptly fell over and rolled his belly up. Delighted, both Gimli and Legolas knelt and rubbed the exposed belly. Gimli hit the right spot and the right back leg began kicking wildly and the tail thumped the ground.

“With that spot on ‘is head—” Gimli said proudly, “we’ll call ‘im Romy.”

“What Romy?” Legolas asked.

“Short f’r ‘Romance’. He’s got a heart on his head!”

This amused everyone. Romy rolled over and took off, trying to run, despite his wounded leg. Romy lurched about half way down to the bottom of the meadow and then limped back. Gimli patted him, giving lavish praise. Romy trotted off a little to far side of the meadow, tottered on three legs across this then came back for more petting and praise. With short fur and the sunshine, his coat was almost dry. Legolas and Gimli immediately occupied themselves playing with Romy.
The mother settled on a blanket on the patio and Ori, Loli and Omi got all her pups to her side and feeding once more. The other female stretched out in the soft grass in the sunshine and was snoring almost instantly.

The mother looked up at Ori and he felt his heart lurch. The gratitude shone in her eyes. Bilbo brought another plate of meat and laid it near her.

“You know, Ori,” Bilbo murmured. “They seem pitifully happy to be with us. Those pups’ eyes haven’t even opened yet and she is fine with all of us handling them.”

“I know,” Ori replied. “Thorin and Dwalin said wargs are intensely loyal. And we all saw how wonderful Biscuit was.”

Bilbo chuckled,

“So what are you going to do with seven pet wargs, Ori?”

Ori considered.

“Um…” He watched as Gimli and Legolas seem to have successfully taught Romy to play a gentle game of fetch.

“They’re just as clever as Biscuit,” Ori mused. “Romy belongs to Gimli and Legolas. I wonder if Thorin would have a use for them. Kind of like the way men have guard dogs.”

Dori snorted, “Yes, but most men do not have dogs the size of overgrown ponies. Get in this tub, pet. Right now.”

Ori turned and saw that one of the tubs had been cleaned, refilled, and Oin was dumping various potions in the water. Ori wondered if this was how the wargs had felt as Dori made him kick off his boots then put him bodily into the tub, fully clothed.

Oin supervised while Dori scrubbed. Gridr and Binni arrived with towels and fresh clothes.

Ori was soon as spick and span as the wargs. Ori giggled and went over to the mother. She whined and her tail thumped as he sat beside her again. The pups had finished feeding and were asleep against their mother, at least three were asleep, one wiggled around blindly.

Ori picked up the pup. It was brindle with all colors of red and brown. It snuggled into his shirt. The mother gave the pup a lick but was not in any way disturbed by Ori holding it. Ori rose slowly and brought the pup over to Frodo and Sam. He made sure he was turned in such a way that the mother could see the pup. Frodo and Sam petted and cooed over the pup, quite enchanted by it. All too soon for the faunts, Ori took the pup back to its mother. He saw that Binni, Gridr, Dori, and Oin had brought out deck chairs and were settled in them. Balin came through and relieved Bilbo of Frodo and Sam, herding them back to lessons.

“Really, pet,” Dori teased with a frown. “I never dreamed you would go beyond Cluck-Cluck, Sassy and her kittens. What in all Arda are we to do with these creatures?”

“Well, I think Romy will be living with us,” Gridr pointed out to Binni, who giggled, watching Gimli and Legolas fuss over and play with the warg, Romy’s, tail going as he whined in delight.

“I still think they would be good guard dogs for Thorin,” Ori said, idly.

“Mmm,” Dori allowed. “We’ll just have to see what Thorin says.”

“That brindle pup, I’m giving to Dwalin,” Ori announced, watching it yawn, stretching its little legs out both ways, wobbling on its belly.

“I hope our deary likes it,” was all Dori would say.

“They’re in decent enough shape.” Oin put in. “They’ve been savagely beaten often as not, by th’ marks on ‘em. They’re all but starved t’ death an’ probably got worms…. Not that we can’t take care of that right enough.” The healer rose and went in the house, muttering about belly and heart worms and tincture of fish oil.

“That,” Binni reflected, “is going to be the cure for any worms, I believe.”

Fili, Kili Tauriel, and Sigrid were all sitting around the other female. She snoozed, her head on Fili’s knee, Sigrid’s hand stroking her ears. Gimli and Legolas came and joined them. Romy flopped down, so his body was across both Legolas and Gimli’s laps. Ori saw Oin had painted Romy’s injured hip with something, probably to keep down infection. It was going to have to work from the inside, because Romy had already eaten most of it.

Roäc winged through and perched on the back of Bilbo’s chair, with a shouted caw.
The wargs all lifted their heads and stared at the raven, ears perked.

“So that’s what wargs look like when they’re clean,” Roäc commented. “So ugly they’re cute.”
Romy staggered up and crossed to sniff Roäc in a rather personal manner. Roäc pecked at Romy, who dodged easily but continue to sniff.

“Go sniff someone else’s butt,” Roäc snapped peevishly.

“Where’s Thorin?” Bilbo asked.

“Right here, ghivasha,” Thorin answered, coming out to the patio followed by Dwalin and Nori. Thorin gave Bilbo a bit of a cuddle and a kiss before releasing him and looking around at the lazing wargs.
Romy stood still staring, ears on the perk, but did nothing. The other female and the mother rose and inched forward cautiously sniffing, but intrigued.

Thorin grinned, held out a hand, and made an encouraging noises. Both females came forward, tails wagging. Thorin petted their heads, cooing.

“There now. All safe and fed. There are my good damlings. Yes, who are my damlings? Who are my good damlings?”

Both females flopped down for belly rubs. Thorin tended to both, still mumbling fond nonsense. Nori stared as though he’d been hit upside the head but Dwalin just rolled his eyes, shaking his head, grinning.

Bilbo gaped.

“Did those wargs just destroy Thorin’s brain?”

“Dwalin,” Ori called softly and lifted the brindled pup. “Look, Dwalin, puppies! This one’s going to be yours. Isn’t he beautiful?”

Dwalin crossed to Ori’s side, kissing him lovingly.

“Ori, love, yeh said yeh’d stay in th’ thicket, no’ go out an’ round up pets!”

“I didn’t go out to find pets, I went out to help Loli… and found pets.” This, Ori reflected, seemed to be the dominating theme of his life so far. “And, anyway, Dwalin, puppies! You brought me kittens!”

“I know, love, they’re fine puppies, but please don’ do tha’ again. Yeh can’ go unarmed an’ inexperienced agains’ orcs.”

“We weren’t unarmed,” Omi piped. “We brought our slingshots!”

“That’s right,” Loli backed her up. “Bain had his knife, and Sigrid came, and she and Fili had swords.”

“Slingshots,” Dwalin groaned and wiped his face with his hand.

“Don’t underestimate slingshots,” said Ori. “We used them to kill an orc and wound quite a few others.”

Dwalin grinned at him.

“With yer slingshot? So them arrowheads came in useful.”

“They did very well, better than sharp stones any day. It’s all in where you strike them,” said Ori. “Do you think Nori would let me carry around an ineffective weapon?”

Dwalin looked to be considering and Ori imagined he was trying to find fault in that and couldn’t. Nori looked extremely proud of himself. Ori passed the pup to Dwalin, who lifted it, looked it over, then cuddled it to his chest.

“He’s a fine wee lad. We’ll call ‘im Killer.”

“Only you,” Ori laughed.

Thorin sighed, pulling his attention reluctantly away from the two wargs fawning over him.

“Dwalin’s right, Ori, please don’t do that again. Trying to manage him when he’s out of his mind with worry is worse than managing me when I’m angry.”

Dwalin snorted.

“Not even bloody close,” he muttered.

Thorin turned to look at Dwalin then at Killer snoozing in the warrior’s arms. A smile lurked at the corners of Thorin’s mouth. “But, it really is too bad, that Ori couldn’t get you a pup that was pretty like him and not ugly like you.”
“Fuck yersel’, Thorin.”
“I promise I won’t go off like that again,” said Ori. “I didn’t realize how quickly it would get out of hand. I was just worried when I saw Loli and Omi. It makes sense that Gimli would follow Legolas, but why would everyone else follow him?”
Dwalin cocked his head.
“Love, they weren’ followin’ Legolas ‘r Gimli. They were followin’ yeh.”
“Why?”
Thorin chuckled.
“Because they’re loyal to you, and because they trust you not to bring them into truly dangerous situations.”
Ori still didn’t get it, until he did.
“Oh,” he said, horrified.
“Yes,” said Thorin. “It’s a privilege and a burden. You have to think for them as well as for yourself. I have no doubt you can handle it. Now, I have to go back to Dale and appease Bard.”
Ori winced.
“Wait, Thorin, I’ll go with you.”
Bilbo caught Thorin’s arm.
“Lunch first, my dear.”

Changes were wrought in Dale while the Durins entertained the crowned heads of Arda. Ori, mounted on Honda and following Thorin on Minty, had no idea how much input Bard had, or was allowed, in the expansion of the original ancient kitchen. It had built up into a fine, large stone house of three stories, which the dwarf workers seamlessly grew from the one old room. The end result wasn’t a palace by any stretch, but Ori could not think of a person in Dale, who would not be happy to live in such a house.

Ivo, now in a uniform and looking considerably more confident in himself, saluted smartly and bowed them up the front steps. Master Dubb, bowing on the other side, looked to him with a veiled gleam of pride.

At the top of the steps, the old porch had been widened into an open veranda that ran the entire front of the building. The front door, of iron, was composed of vertical row upon row of cast arrows and opened into a sort of cloak room lined with hooks, and benches underneath them. A wood and iron-strap door in the back of the passage opened into the main room.

This was quite beautiful, though of course far too simple for dwarf tastes, an all-purpose throne room/feasting hall/living room with a hearth to the left on par in size with any under the mountain. The small window through which Bard had tossed back the badgers’ ball in the spring had been replaced with a huge, round one composed of many tiny panes of colored glass, set into the stone.

The colored glass cast a mosaic of light across the stone floor and across the table, which was new, larger than the last, and ringed in chairs, none more grand than any other. Bard stood at the far end studying a large number of papers.

Bard bowed rather stiffly when they met. Before Bard or Thorin could speak, Ori shot forward, his mouth already in motion.

“Please don’t be angry with Thorin, Bard. It was my fault. Omi, Loli and Bain were following me. I’m sorry. Will you forgive me?”
Bard sighed.
“Aw, Ori, stop looking at me like you’re a kicked puppy. You know I can’t stand that.” He turned to Thorin with accusation. “You brought him here on purpose!”
“He insisted on coming with me. How would I know you can’t resist those eyes anymore than I-” The two kings froze, looked at each other, looked at Ori, looked back at each other and laughed.
“We’re idiots,” said Bard. “We’re mushy idiots.”
“Yet another kingly quality,” Thorin agreed.
Ori thought the pair of them had lost their minds, or maybe it was just one more mysterious power he had that he’d never realized.
No, they’d lost their minds.

“Ori,” said Bard, “you didn’t do anything. You didn’t talk Omi and Loli into following you. You didn’t talk Bain into taking the boat with them.”

“I still feel responsible, somehow. I’m guessing Bain’s been punished?”

“He’s grounded until he’s dead, yes,” said Bard dryly.

“I’m going to have to talk to the sisters. I mean, their loyalty is heartening, but rather terrifying.”

“Welcome to my world,” said Bard.

“I have a feeling,” Thorin said to Bard, “that you should expect Omi and Loli to visit to apologize in person. As a favor to me, will you please not ask for their beards?”

Bard stared at him.

“Why would I want their beards? What would I do with them?”

Ori almost said: macrame, but instead he went with:

“He means, please don’t ask them to cut off their beards in penance for endangering Bain.”

“Bain endangered himself, and everyone in Dwalin’s party, including you, Ori.”

“But Loli and Omi are of-age, he’s not.”

“Oh,” said Bard. “Look, I suppose I could ‘make an example’ of them, but to what end? Tell you what, make it a public apology and we’ll call it good. You want some coffee?”

“Yes, please,” said Ori.

“That would be most welcome, thank you,” said Thorin.

Ori realized that Thorin had not slept. Of course not. He wasn’t at the meadow, but he would be worried for his soldiers, and he still had a part to play when they returned.

They went thorough a doorway to the side of the hearth and into what was now the kitchen, a cozy room with brick-colored plaster walls, a large cookstove and a sink with two taps. The old table and chairs had found their new home here. Bob, sprawled on his mat in the corner, pried open an eye to peer at them, thumped his tail on the floor twice and went back to sleep. They sat while Bard fetched mugs, plates and some bread and cheese. He took the pot from the stove and poured out coffee for the three of them.

Ori blew on his coffee, sipped it, recognized the bitter brew Dale folk liked when they could get it, and wished somewhat rebelliously for sugar and milk.

“Did you get anything useful from the orcs?” Ori asked. “What were they doing?”

“As it turns out,” said Thorin, “you were right. They were attempting to invade Erebor.”

“All fourteen of them?”

“Because, really, how much trouble could dwarrow be?” Thorin muttered.

Bard looked at him with a smirk, but said nothing.

Thorin continued, “When Mordor fell, it didn’t just kill a lot of orcs in Mordor. Apparently it created a power void, and every orc who has any sort of pretensions to power is ruthlessly killing every other orc they come across who won’t bow down to them. Apparently, Khazad-dûm is a slaughterhouse. These particular orcs left there because they figured they couldn’t compete with other orcs, but if they took Erebor, they’d have their own mountain.”

Ori didn’t like to think how Thorin had extracted this information, though he did think it was possible the orcs were bragging.

Right. Sure.

“We coulda taken ya, too, if not for those shitty little scribes with their slingshots.”

“So,” said Ori, “what did you do with the bodies?”

“Dumped them in the lake,” said Bard. “I hope it doesn’t poison the fish.”
Pups, Politeness, and Pottery

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The wargs are settling in, while the scribes are distinctly unsettled. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

When Dwalin and Ori arrived for breakfast, followed by Nori-Pori, Mask, Kihshassa, and Garnet, they found Thorin and Bilbo with Frodo between them at the table. Frodo was industriously eating porridge. Directly behind Frodo’s chair lay the mother warg. There was an empty platter before her and at her side, her pups feeding hungrily. The second female, sitting behind Thorin, looked on proudly, with her own empty platter nearby. Garnet swooped to land on the table and waited impatiently for someone to bring her the bacon. Balin idled over his tea and Dori bustled about with Powder sitting on his shoulder.

Dwalin squatted down near the mother and reached out to let her sniff his hand. Her tail wagged, she licked his hand and panted gently. Dwalin caressed Killer, who wiggled his tail and body, but went on feeding. Dwalin chuckled and ruffled the mother’s ears and patted the other female, who swiped his face with her tongue. Dwalin lifted Nori-Pori and stroked him as the mother watched interestedly. He then settled the kitten among the pups. The mother leaned her head forward, sniffed the kitten and gave it a lick then looked back at Dwalin.

“Guid lass,” Dwalin praised and repeated this with Mask. The mother accepted Mask and looked at Kihshassa. Dwalin patted the bat and it came over. The huge and tiny noses sniffed one another curiously. Seeming satisfied, Kihshassa crawled up Dwalin’s arm and leapt over to land on Ori.

The mother looked at Dwalin then put her head back to see Thorin. Thorin reached down and rubbed the ears and neck.

“That’s my good damling,” he crooned. “You’ll protect everyone in the family, won’t you, my sweet damling?”

The mother pushed into Thorin’s hand, licking it, and thumped her tail against the floor. Frodo stood up in his chair, pointing.

“The amad is Sugar and that mummy is Butter.”

“Oh, aye, laddie? Yeh name ‘em?” Dwalin asked, amused.

“Nope.” Frodo slid back into his seat. “Idad Thorin did.”

Dwalin snorted,

“In memory a’ Creampot?”

Thorin shrugged and sipped his tea. “The white coat, she might be a descendant.”

Ori glanced at Bilbo.

“He told you the story?” Ori asked.

Bilbo looked amused.

“Indeed he did. I thought it was very apt and rather hobbit-y. Unless you’re someone like old Farmer Maggot.”

“Maggot?” Ori gasped, delighted. “You know someone named ‘Maggot’?”

“That’s what I said,” Thorin told Dwalin. Dwalin went and got Ori and settled him beside Bilbo before seating himself and reaching for the coffee pot.

“I take it,” Ori said to Bilbo, “The war- Butter and Sugar were quite pleased to sleep in Bag-End East?”
Thorin nodded and Bilbo agreed.

“Yes, poor things. It’s probably the first time they’ve been in a cozy, comfortable room. We settled them before the sitting room fire with rugs and extra food and plenty of water before we went to bed. We woke up this morning and went through to get Frodo ready and both wargs were sleeping around his bed, the pups tucked with them.”

“They guarded Frodo and the pups all night?” Ori all but cooed, taken with the show of instant loyalty.

“Apparently so,” Thorin replied thoughtfully. “When Jim told us about Biscuit that first time I never thought he meant such a strong and instant bond. Rather makes me wonder if Dwalin and I could have been stealing wargs for years.”

Thorin turned with a smile for Butter and reached back to rub the huge muzzle. Butter whined lovingly and shoved her head onto his shoulder. Bilbo observed this and giggled.

“Not even the dogs in the Shire were this close to their masters so quickly. Mother dogs didn’t often let people touch their pups in the first weeks. We’ve all been handling them pretty much since birth.”

Mistress Dazla served omelettes and ham steaks.

They had just finished when there was a great knocking at the front door. Sugar and Butter leapt to their feet, snarling and barking loudly.

“Enough.” said Thorin sharply. Both stopped and looked at him expectantly.

“Sit,” Thorin ordered. Sugar and Butter looked at each other then back at Thorin. Thorin rose and put his hand on Sugar’s back haunches and pressed, saying, gently,

“Sit.”

Sugar sat down.

“There my good damling,” Thorin crooned and ruffled her ears and gave her a rasher of bacon.

Thorin turned to Butter

“Sit,” he ordered quietly. Butter sat down, tail wagging. Thorin praised and petted her as she received her rasher reward.

Mistress Dazla came through.

“You majesty, Master Vobwi is in the sitting room and he’s brought you …chow.”

They all rose and went through. Master Vobwi looked very pleased with himself but his eyes became saucer-wide as he saw Sugar and Butter.

Thorin commanded the wargs to sit which they did promptly, and Thorin greeted Master Vobwi.

“And how may I help you, today, Master Vobwi?”

“Well, your majesty, I rather thought I could help you.” He gestured to the large metal barrel beside him, then went and lifted the lid. He picked two large bowls out of his bag and scooped out a bowlful of whatever was in the barrel. To Ori, it looked like a pile of dried brown nuggets, but they smelled vaguely of meat.

“This was originally developed by the late grandfather of Mister Hallow for the feeding of his herding dogs. I have since worked to improve it for the needs of other kinds of dogs. It’s a mix of meats, vegetables, and grasses, concentrated and dried. A small amount will fill them up and there are other oils and granules that keep their fur glossy and repel worms and biting insects.”

“That sounds excellent,” Thorin smiled at the dwarf, who beamed and offered the bowls to Thorin. Thorin took a handful of chow out of each and offered them to the wargs. Sugar and Butter sniffed the chow with interest and ate the handfuls they were given.

As it turned out Master Vobwi had brought three barrels of the chow. Sugar and Butter soon had a bowl each in Bag-End East and a large basin of water. Dori made sure there was another feeding place in the breakfast parlor for when Thorin and Bilbo joined the family for meals. Thorin then sent Master Vobwi around to the Sons of Groin, so Romy would also be supplied.

Ori just had time to kiss Dwalin before he raced off for the library.

Once back in the workroom with all the shards, Ori, Arne, and Bilbo set to work. Bujni joined them a few moments later.
They started by laying everything out and numbering each piece, assigning it a general name along with a number and a sketch of the shape and the measurements of each piece.

Loli and Omi arrived looking a little embarrassed.

“We went and saw King Bard,” Loli explained.

“To get it over with,” Omi added.

“Was he v-ery an-angry?” Arne asked, worried.

Loli giggled a little.

“No, we went just in time to walk in on his morning council of all the local area members. We both bowed, begged pardon, and offered our beards. He got all red, sputtered, and thanked us for apologizing and assured us Bain could still keep company with all of us, then sent us through to see Sigrid and tell Bain he wasn’t grounded any more. We had breakfast with them and King Thranduil. I think King Thranduil was just out of bed. He was wearing the loveliest, blue striped pajamas.”

Ori and Bilbo exchanged gleeful looks.

Master Brur came through and looked at the dams.

“Did th’ Dale king chew yer faces off?”

“No, Master Brur,” they chorused.

Brur left them to it. They all looked at each other and giggled.

By lunch time, they had deduced that much of the writing dated from the rule of Regent King Nali in Khazad-dûm. The shards told of a political and a cultural upheaval that resulted in some drastic changes.

“This is really strange,” said Ori.

“Why?” Bilbo asked.

“The histories we learnt as badgers declared Nali’s reign to be quiet and prosperous.”

“But these shards report otherwise,” Bilbo mused.

Brur sent them out to the pleasant courtyard to eat. Ori hadn’t realized how hungry he was until he bit into the enormous beef sandwich with sharp cheese, pickled cabbage, and mustard. Dori had put in a bag of paper thin slices of potatoes roasted crisp in the oven with salt and pepper. It was so good!

Tay had sent Arne off with a cold, roasted partridge and raw turnip slices spread with soft cheese. Bilbo tore through three pork buns, half a dozen apples, and three flasks of tea and declared himself still slightly peckish.

Bujni, Omi and Loli scarfed down their large bowls of chicken, onion, and apple chunks in a milky dressing, and cheese rolls to go with them. Gridr had sent a baking of xocolātl cookies, with slices of almond in them, to share.

After dividing the last six cookies amongst them, they sat back, replete. Ori guiltily realized that it had taken them about ten minutes to eat everything. In the back of his mind, he could almost hear Dori telling him he was going to have a tummy ache.

“I didn’t realize I was famished,” Omi commented, looking at the dishes before them, all scraped clean.

“I did,” Loli put in, “my stomach’s been growling at me for an hour.”

“Yes, it h-has,” Arne teased.

Loli pushed him.

“There really isn’t that much history about Nali,” Ori reflected. “Mostly that he was a good king and Khazad-dûm prospered during his rule.”

“There was commentary that he was a great reformer,” said Loli, “but it was always in regards to corruption.”

“Yes,” Ori allowed. “I’ve come across that too. It was never really stated what the reforms were. They are never spelled out.”
“Tell me about this Nali,” asked Bilbo. “When did he rule?"

“He was a regent king between Durin VI and his son Náin I in Khazad-dûm. When Durin VI was killed by the Balrog - Durin’s Bane - Nain was still a dwarfling. Nali was Nain’s uncle.” He paused then went on slowly. “When I was working with Thorin on his reforms, everything was spelled out, what we were changing, why and how. You all helped with the copying. The copies were sent to each of the kings.”

“Indeed,” pondered Bujni. “One can search for such as regards King Nali, but only vagueness can be found. Do we suspect, my friends, that we are to uncover a great mystery?”

“T-there’s s-something a bit s-strange going on,” Arne put in, checking the partridge bones for any left over bits. “These s-shards are g-going to be f-fascinating.”

“But are they factual and valid?” Omi asked. “Or are they just the ravings of some angry people?”

Ori felt his scalp and spine prickle.

“No,” the voice in the back of his head supplied immediately. Ori frowned. This was not the hot boom of Mahal, but definitely someone near to Him.

“I think they’re valid,” Ori decided. “Why were they so hidden and kept in the manner they were?”

Bilbo swallowed the last of his cookie, nose twitching.

“Ori,” he said. “Do you remember the Infernal Adventures?”

“Yes, of course.”

“When was that actually written?”

“Longer ago than King Nali.”

“I wonder how old the version is that I read in Lord Elrond’s library.”

“Oh, that version dates back to… Oh. That version dates back to King Nali.”

Bilbo and Ori exchanged looks.

“Obliterate your enemies, don’t just make them vanish,” said Bilbo. “Remember?”

“We wondered why the scribe used that version of the word ‘to destroy’,,” Ori recalled.

“And we wondered if they weren’t building loopholes,” said Bilbo.

Loli finished off the fruit soda water in her flask and rose to go to rinse it at the small fountain near by. They all rinsed their dishes and put them away in their satchels. Ori frowned again. The largest mystery was why the chest had been discovered in the manner it had.

Ori glowered over the pieces before him. They were part of a larger piece, and when he fit them together, he didn’t like what they revealed. By his translation, Nali had been responsible for implementing the law that only Longbeards were to live and trade beneath the mountain of Khazad-dûm. Before his reign, although there had been various clans, all dwarrow were welcome there.

He could tell by the script, the way the pottery was formed, and the age when it last entered fire in the kiln, that it was from the reign of Nali.

“This is so weird,” Ori said aloud.

“You’re finding more st-strange things, too?” Arne demanded. Loli, Omi, Bilbo, and Bujni also concurred they were finding writing that defied what was deemed historically accurate.

Loli said, “You can tell it was written by trained scribes. The writing is in the definite style and proper formations as set out in S’tuk and Whilf.”

Ori sat up on his stool and stretched, glancing around. Everyone else was still bent over their pottery shards. He let his gaze wander over the room. His eyes lighted on the empty chest over in the corner. He got off his stool and wandered over to it.

He knelt down beside it and ran his hands over the open chest. The age of the wood matched the metal joins and findings. It was constructed as a new piece. He stared at the wooden bottom of the chest. It was solid and well put together. He laid his hand flat against the bottom and looked at the outside of the chest. He frowned and patted the bottom. Using his hand he measured the inside of the chest from the bottom to the top. He measured the outside. There was at least a five inch difference.

Ori sat back on his heels, staring. He climbed into the chest. It was large enough for Ori to have lain down and had a comfortable nap. He braced his bum against the lid as he sat himself on the edge. He pulled his knees up to his chest, took a breath, and kicked out with all his strength.

There was a crash as the front panel of the chest burst off and made his friends nearly jump out of their skins. Ori hopped down, and dropped to all fours. His heart was in his throat as he squinted into the space revealed by the removal of the front panel.

Ori was aware of all his friends crowding around, chattering.

The door crashed open.

“What’s going on?” roared Master Brur.

Ori reached in his arm, the edges of the splintered wood catching on his sleeve. His hand found paper! He scrambled around, sweeping all the paper he could find out from the space. His friends pulled the papers away and someone put a light down beside him. The shutter was closed to a small circle. Ori used it to check for anything else in the space. Finding nothing more, he rolled away and Brur hefted him to his feet.

“What in Mahal’s name’re yeh doin’, lad?” demanded Master Brur.

“Look!” cried Omi. “Ori found papers!”

Master Brur snatched them away, staring and shuffling through the pile.

“Get t’ tha’ table over there!” Master Brur shouted. “I want these counted an’ checked through b’fore yeh do anythin’ else!”

There was a flurry of activity. Another vast table was brushed off and the lights about it lit.

Ori found he was as weak as an overcooked parsnip. Master Brur held him up.

“Yeh alrigh’, laddie?”

“I think so,” Ori managed. He felt as though the blood in his veins had started moving again. He shook himself. Master Brur released him and Ori went eagerly to the table.

“What does it say?” Omi asked.

“That th-this is b-box ten of twenty-six,” said Arne

They groaned in chorus.

“Where are the other twenty-five then?” Loli asked.

“Wait! Wait!” Ori cried. “This box is the most important.”

“How do you know?” Loli asked.

“Because it’s the only one with these papers in it,” said Ori, leaning over Master Brur’s arm.

“This box came to Erebor with twenty-five others. They all contained shards of top-grade pottery to grind down and mix with whatever clay they found here. Which was how they smuggled these shards out of Khazad-dûm. This was the only box with the key for them, but even if this one was confiscated, scribes would be able to puzzle out the shards from the remaining boxes.”

“So where are the other shards?” Omi asked.

Bilbo huffed out a laugh.

“I imagine generations of dwarrow have been pissing on the pottery from which they were made.”

"Charming,"

“We have done our best to assure that this history, our true history, will not be lost in the upheavals of King Nali’s reign. Truth has become a casualty of political expedience, and lives are being lost along with it. Our hope is that some day future scribes will unearth and decode these shards and use them as the key to open the door behind which is hidden the Flower of Durin.

Third assistant librarian, Floviq son of Druviq
Great Royal Library of Khazad-dûm
Rule of Nali, High King of all Dwarrows

“What’s the flower of Durin?” Loli asked.

“Whatever it is,” said Bilbo, “I’m willing to bet my mother’s doilies that it’s a sunflower.”
“What’s a doily?” Omi asked.
“Crochet,” Bilbo replied absently.
“Aye,” Brur grunted. “It’s a great game, if yeh got th’ balls f’r it.”
Ori started looking through the rest of the papers. Bujni and Bilbo spread them out over the table. Omi, Arne and Loli were close to growling over them.
“These translate the shards,” Ori reported. “We don’t even have to put all the shards together.”
“Though we w-will, at some p-point,” Arne stated.
Omi clicked her tongue.
“Of course we will! We’re scribes!”
“So what do the pages say?” Loli cried.
“Not here,” Brur barked. “It’s quittin’ time.”
Ori almost whined in his impatience to know everything immediately. Arne, Loli, Bujni, and Ori moaned in unison.
“Master Brur!” Loli and Omi cried. “Why not?”
“Bringin’ ‘em t’ th’ king,” said Brur. “Meet yeh there.”
Bilbo was the first out the door.
“I have to get back and rescue Balin from Frodo and Sam,” he said, and hurried out of the room.

Ori put Honda out in the meadow after he’d helped Gibi to brush her down and put away the saddle. He thanked Gibi and came in through the stable entrance. He went to his room, dumped down his satchel, and threw off his outer tunic.

He went through to the sitting room, and found Brur across from Thorin, his lips buttoned up. Thorin regarded him with amused intrigue. Sugar lolled at Thorin’s feet, her head planted on his boots, her pups snoozing beside her. Bilbo came out of Bag-End East, looking a little grave. Butter bounced along behind him with Frodo and Wee Sam. Bilbo crossed to Thorin and kissed him.
“What’s going on?” Thorin asked.
Bilbo looked at Master Brur.
“Over dinner,” Brur grunted.
“Yes,” Thorin smiled, “you are most welcome to join us, Brur.”
Bilbo muttered and glared at his king. Ori sat down and fiddled with the cuff of his sleeve. He looked up. Thorin was looking intently at him.
“Ori?”
Ori flinched.
“Ori, what’s going on?” Thorin asked in a quiet, comforting tone.
Ori, sighed.
“Honestly, Thorin, I think it would make more sense if Master Brur told the whole thing.”
“And why hasn’t Brur already told us the whole thing?” Thorin looked back at the head librarian, this time there was no humor in the king’s eyes.

Bilbo shifted uncomfortably.
“Want Balin, Oin and ‘is Binni here. They’d be the ones t’ remember most.”
Almost on cue, Binni and Oin strolled in, Bujni on their heels, and followed by Gloin’s family which now included Legolas, and Romy, who gambled along, his leg obviously much improved. The wargs greeted each other with tails going, yipping happily and knocking over Mask and Nori-Pori playfully. Master Brur rose and pulled Oin and Binni aside for a moment. Ori saw Binni turn pale.

The sitting room door opened and Dwalin barged in, kicked off his boots, stopped short and stared at the tableau before him. Ori rushed his husband and hugged him fiercely.
“Wha’s goin’ on, love?”
“We found papers,” Ori mumbled into Dwalin’s chest.
“Fuck,” muttered Dwalin and held him close. Ori felt himself relax.
Balin came through as Nori and Bofur arrived, followed by Arne. Dis and Jani came in from the kitchen stairway and Dori summoned them all to the dinner table in the breakfast parlor.
Dinner consisted of mutton steaks, roasted cavern mushrooms, mashed yams and carrots, followed by apple fluff and cream. Conversation was a trifle desultory until dessert was cleared for wine and Miss Oqizla fetched Ori’s kit to him.

Thorin leaned back in his chair, his right arm resting on and scratching Sugar’s large head. Romy and Butter frisked in the meadow with Frodo, Wee Sam, Posey, and the kittens. The ponies and goats grazed nearby.

Thorin reached down with his left hand and lifted Bilbo’s hand to his lips, kissing it. Thorin glanced at Ori. Ori had prepared his paper and ink and he gave a nod to let Thorin know he was ready.

“Then council is convened,” Thorin told them, then pinned his gaze on Master Brur.

“Announcements, old business, and new business are suspended for the moment. Brur, what’s going on?”

Brur sighed and gave everyone the run down of what was in the chest found in Zark’s mine, what had been found with the first translations, and Ori’s discovery of the papers. Brur pulled the first paper out of his pocket and read it aloud.

Turn by turn, Arne, Loli, Omi, Bujni, and Bilbo reported on their findings. Bilbo added in about his translation from Elrond’s library and the ‘loophole’ he and Ori had discussed.

Thorin finally turned to Ori.

“And your opinion? Is this truth or conspiracy?”

Ori swallowed. The not-Mahal’s voice urged: “Truth.”

“It’s the truth,” he said, holding his king’s gaze.

“Is it of Mahal?” Thorin, as always, cut to the quick.

“No, not Mahal,” Ori stated truthfully. “But someone close to him.”

“Who?”

“I-I don’t know. I didn’t know the voice. But I felt it was someone close to Him.”

At Thorin’s raised eyebrow, Ori shook his head.

“No, not Yavanna,” he clarified.

“You’ve spoken to Yavanna?” Bilbo gasped.

Ori blushed hotly. The only time he had ever heard Yavanna’s voice was the time he’d been hiding in the cupboard of the room when Thorin and Bilbo had had sex at the inn.

“Um... Not exactly. I mean...er...”

“Ori?” Thorin asked, head cocked at Ori. Dwalin gave a sudden snort and Ori knew his husband had remembered the incident.

“I...I only heard her laughing with Mahal once.”

“Why in all Arda would Mahal and Yavanna laugh at you, pet?” Dori demanded.

Ori wanted to sink through the floor. Everyone at the table was looking at him.

“I...I... washidinginacupboard.” Ori rushed to get it over with and buried his head in Dwalin’s shaking shoulder. He thumped his husband, ineffectually. “Quit laughing,” he grumbled.

“Why would you hide in a cupboard?” Legolas asked as one fascinated.

“Fuck it, our Dori,” Nori snapped. “I tolja t’ quit doin’ that when he was a badger. I tolja it’d muck wif his brain!”

“Don’t be silly,” Dori retorted. “There’s nothing wrong with my darling pet’s brain. Unlike you, he has a working one!”

“Oi!” Nori protested.

Ori raised his head, hoping that Dori and Nori’s argument would distract everyone. He found Bilbo was staring at him. Ori felt his blush deepen. Bilbo’s eyes lit up and he grinned feraly.

“I suppose it was a boot cupboard in a small upstairs room at the far end of Bombur and Erda’s inn?”

Ori moaned and scrunched down.

Bilbo snickered along with Dwalin. Thorin turned inquiringly to Bilbo, who gave Thorin a filthy grin. Thorin blushed and looked back at Ori.
“I don’t suppose you could have just left?”
“I couldn’t!” Ori gasped. “I was playing hide and seek with Frodo. It was a good hiding place, but I fell asleep.”

“So Mahal and Yavanna laughed at you in your sleep?” Thorin asked hopefully.
“No, I woke up when I…er…heard footsteps and voices.”
“Why didn’t you just say ‘excuse me’ and leave?” Thorin pressed, his cheeks still red. Bilbo was giggling helplessly.

“Because I didn’t want you to screw up!” Ori cried.

“Oh, my dear Ori,” Bilbo gasped. “You heard Thorin get screwed up and down!”
“I know!” Ori wailed. “I tried plugging my ears, but it didn’t keep the noise out! And Yavanna and Mahal laughed at me and Yavanna said they weren’t laughing at me but with me. I’m sorry!”

Thorin snorted and looked at Bilbo, who was almost in tears laughing.

“Fine,” Thorin finally said and looked back at Ori with mirth in his eyes. “At least, you had the satisfaction of knowing I didn’t screw up, well, not in the way you meant.”

“He did ge’ a cock stand ou’ a’ it,” Dwalin added helpfully. Ori thumped him a few more times.

Dwalin laughed and pulled Ori into his lap.

“Ah, me puir wee perverted scribe. Yeh go’ found ou’.”

“Ori!” cried Dori horrified.

“It was an accident!” Ori shouted over the roar of everyone else’s laughter as realization had permeated the entire council.

“I’m sorry!” he said again, looking pleadingly at Thorin and Bilbo. Thorin smiled, shook his head and winked at Ori. Ori felt better, at least until he remembered he was taking official minutes in an official meeting. Minutes meant to go into the permanent chronicles of Erebor.

He sputtered over his notes.

“I’ll put it in if yeh don’ wan’ t’, laddie,” Brur offered.

“I don’t want you to put anything in anything!” Ori cried. “Wait! I mean-“

The room echoed with laughter.

As soon as everyone calmed themselves, Balin politely suggested that Ori put in a notation that there had been a brief pause for a family joke that was of no importance to the minutes of the meeting of the king’s council.

Ori nearly collapsed with relief. Why didn’t he think of these things? He slid back into his own seat.

“What do we know about Floviq son of Druviq?” Thorin asked, getting back to business.
“I vaguely remember hearing of a Druviq descendent,” Binni said slowly, “I think he was also a scribe. His name was Aodviq. I believe he was lost in battle.”

Balin sat back, stroking his beard.

“I’m a bit intrigued by wha’ our Bilbo an’ Ori discussed about th’ translation of th’ Infernal Adventures. Brur, have yeh an older copy, preferably never translated?”

“I’ve go’ th’ original in me office,” Brur replied. “It were hand-carried from Khazad-dûm.”

“That will have to be gone through,” Balin decided.

“Yes,” Thorin concurred. “If things were being smuggled out during a political upheaval, there may be other hints in the book. This letter, and the rest of the papers you found with it, are the translations of the shards found in the chest, you say?”

“Aye,” Brur said. “I’m thinkin’ there must’ve been somethin’ goin’ on down there. Th’ histories about Nali’re scrupulously clean as all the books we teach with are. He’s listed as a reformer of corruption.”

“Thus our question,” mused Thorin, “is what was corrupt? Binni, do you remember hearing anything?”

“What we learnt at school was the same as here,” Binni replied.

“Yes,” Thorin agreed, “but what about when you were training for your court duties as a Bearer?”

Binni raised his eyebrows.
"Bearers aren’t usually involved in politics, Thorin. At least, not officially."

Thorin smiled, “True, I was thinking more of sudden changes to custom, new songs, or removal of certain arts that showed histories.”

Binni’s sight turned inward and everyone waited quietly.

“I remember being taught the dances, being instructed on the way we should dress. Everything was codified and precise, but I do remember some of the older sibs would sigh and mutter about ‘in the old days’ as if things were done differently. Bearers do not take kindly to people meddling with tradition.”

“Such as dancing naked, except for jewels,” Thorin said.

“Exactly!” Binni cried. “The Bearer was originally presented in such a way to emphasize the true jewel among jewels - the Bearer being presented. Covering that up is obscene! You might as well blindfold the onlookers and be done with it!”

Binni went suddenly quite still.

“Unless that was the point.”

Thorin asked, “You think the Flower of Durin was a Bearer?”

“No,” said Binni. “No, I don’t. I can’t think why Bearers should have been made to change at all. It couldn’t just be a proscription on nudity. Dwarrow in general have no issues with it.”

“Control,” said Balin. “Nali wanted control a’ every aspect a’ dwarven culture. As high king, he would have widespread influence on every clan in every center an’ settlement in th’ dwarven world.”

Thorin looked troubled.

“Balin, the high king doesn’t exercise that kind of power.”

Balin’s smile was grim.

“No’ nowadays, laddie, bu’ yer adad wasn’t Durin. Nain’s was.”

“So Nali used his power as regent to erase tradition before Nain could know?”

“Think abou’ wha’ was happenin’. Durin VI dug up th’ Balrog, hundreds were killed outright, hundreds more died of wounds or were lost, their bodies never found. Mebbe folk got t’ thinkin’ this last Durin wasn’t really a Durin, or if he was, mebbe the line itself had a fatal flaw, the Durins weren’t fit t’ rule. There’s been tha’ kinda talk b’fore.

“Nali had t’ do somethin’ an’ quick if he wanted t’ keep his crown an’ pass it t’ Nain. First thin’ he gets rid a’ anyone under Khazad-dûm who isn’t a Longbeard, then he starts t’ prunin’ th’ family tree, get rid a’ any ancestor with questionable ties.”

Fili frowned.

“Balin, that would mean getting rid of any ancestor who wasn’t a Longbeard, even if they were married to Durin himself.”

Thorin choked.

“No,” he said quietly, shaking his head. “No, he wouldn’t be able to … ”

“Idad?” Fili asked.

“The story has come down to us,” said Thorin, “that the dwarf forefathers - and foremothers - awoke in pairs under mountains throughout middle earth. Except for Durin, who woke alone. They were all paired off and produced children. Durin produced an heir, too. Who was Durin II’s mother?”

Kili said, “Well, everyone knows that…. Wait. Who was Durin II’s mother? Was she a Firebeard or something?”

“If she was,” said Thorin, “it would have been expedient to erase her from history long before Nali’s time. But, you’re on the right track, Kili.”

“I am?”

“Yes, whoever she was, she was someone equally unacceptable to Nali, she was most definitely not a Longbeard dam. I’m afraid the ‘corruption’ Nali ‘reformed’ was what he saw as the corruption of his own bloodline. Which is to say, ours.”

“Just as well we’re not in the Shire right now,” said Bilbo. “Such a scandal as this would have people giddy to the point of fainting. Imagine all those bodies lying about, cluttering up the market. Most untidy.”
“Shocking,” Thorin agreed.
In the silence, Dori mused, “I hope Granny took her vinaigrette with her.”
“Very well,” Thorin said. “Our scribes will work on those found papers. They will give us the rights of what’s going on.”
“Idad?” Kili put in, taking Tauriel’s hand and glancing over at Legolas. “Should you like us to ask Thranduil if he can remember anything? Elves and dwarf did not have much contact but they may have noticed something?”
Thorin considered then nodded.
“Yes, if the translations don’t explain things, we will discuss this with Thranduil, Elrond, and the Lórien people. We will let things rest for now. Anything else? Announcements? Old business?”
Heads all round shook.
“Right,” Thorin rose. “This council is dismissed for now. Fili, Ori, I need you both to join me in my office in a half hour for a meeting with the mithril masters. Thank you all for this council.”
Everyone rose and bowed. Ori snatched a kiss from Dwalin.

Ori replenished his kit and joined Thorin and Fili in the hall outside Thorin’s office.
“They’re all here,” said Fili.
“All of them?” Thorin asked.
“I was amazed, too,” said Fili. “Mistress Dazla had the room set up with the long table and fed them all cake and wine.”
“Mistress Dazla’s pay needs to be radically increased,” said Thorin. “Ori?”
“Got it, Thorin.”
“Thank you.”
Ori followed Thorin and Fili through the door.
Around the table sat five of the oldest dwarf Ori had ever seen. Next to them, even Oin looked like a youth.
They might have been carved out of the mountain crags, their hair and beards the color of powdered white marble. As they turned and saw Thorin, they struggled to stand and Ori swallowed, for their eyes were identical, silvery with sparkles of deeper, icy flecks - the eyes gained by decades, even centuries, of working mithril.
“Masters, please sit,” said Thorin with a smile. “We will not stand on ceremony.”
He sat at the end of the table and Fili refreshed the glasses of the visitors, poured wine for Thorin, Ori and himself, and sat beside his uncle.
Ori sat at Thorin’s desk, taking notes.
“You have all heard the stories,” began Thorin.
“And know them for the truth,” said the sole dwarfdam in the room, half her face wrinkled with age, the other damaged by battle. “We have struck mithril in Erebor.”
“I would not have dragged you all here for anything less,” said Thorin.
“You need us,” said a block-shaped dwarf with a reedy voice. “We’re the only ones left.”
“Who know the secrets of working the mithril, yes,” said Thorin. “We have tons of material on paper about working silver-steel, but the page has only so much wisdom.”
“Want us t’ train up some badgers, do yeh?” asked a great mop of wool roving sitting at the opposite end of the table. It laughed, shaking all over. “Don’t know as yeh noticed it, yer majesty, but we’re about ready t’ go back t’ th’ stone.”
The dam snorted.
“Mahal’s waited this long for me, maybe for this He’ll wait a little longer. Kir is right, though. We don’t have time to give someone a full apprenticeship. I’m claiming Prince Fili right now.”
Fili jumped in his seat. He stood and bowed to the dam.
“I’m honored, master, but I fear I’d never have the time to do your teaching justice.”
She waved a negligent hand.
“You’re already a journeyman metal worker in gold, silver, and alloys. I’m not starting with the first hammer stroke. And you think you’ve got a time limit? Ha!”
Fili sat, glanced at his uncle, then dropped his eyes.
“You want this, don’t you,” said Thorin, smiling.
“Yes, Idad,” said Fili.  “But you and Erebor need me, and I have other considerations now as well.”

Thorin nodded, but merely gestured to the page at the door, gave the dambling instructions Ori couldn’t hear, and sent her off running.

All the masters were willing to take on apprentices, even Kir, though he had become quite vain about having grown his hair and beard to such extents that it was impossible for most to tell if he was coming or going.

“Aye, I’m willin’ t’ braid it all back f’r this,” he said.

“Or you could get that nice Mister Wandi to fix it for you,” the darrowdam suggested with a twinkle.

“Fuck yeh,” the hairball snorted.

The registers of journeyman and master metal workers were brought forward and scoured for names of ten possible mithril artisans, two for each master. Ori bit his lip as he listened to the masters talk frankly about the merits and failings of each candidate, the names of whom were often well-known and respected under the mountain and beyond.

“Her?  Mebbe,” said Kir.  “Nah, no’ him.  Known him since he was a pebble.  Total shalehead.  Don’t even know how he got past his gold apprenticeship.”

Kili crashed through the doorway like a battle ram, startling everyone in the room who could still boast an ounce of hearing.

“Fi!” he shouted.  “You have to say yes!  This is huge!”

Fili shot Thorin a look before turning to Kili, the younger dwarf panting like hard-run sheepdog.  He’d obviously raced all the way from the target practice range beyond the training arena.  He looked all around the room, and seemed to realize he wasn’t the only one in it.

Fighting a smile, Thorin introduced him, “Masters, my younger nephew, Prince Kili, son of Dis.”

Kili bowed hastily to the masters before tuning back to Fili, who cut him off before he could speak again.

“Ki, I’d love to,” said Fili, “but I have duties to idad and-”

Kir chucked at Thorin.

“Where’d yeh get ‘im, majesty?  Out’ve one a’ Shire’s bloody kissin’ books?”

“Unlike Shire’s heroes,” said Thorin, “Prince Fili is sincere.”

“Go on, Fi,” said Kili.  “I’ve already taken on the Greenwood and I’ll be studying elvish stuff, so you won’t have to worry about that, and our Gimmers is ready to ride with the city patrol now, so you can trade off shifts with him.”

“And your beloved amad,” said Dis, slipping in behind Kili, “is already weak with pride that you’ve been accepted by such a respected master of the craft.”

Fili looked between Dis and Thorin, then at Kili, and even at Ori, who smiled apologetically and shrugged.

“No pressure,” Fili murmured.  Finally he grinned, stood once more and bowed to the darrowdam at the table.  “Master Minta, I would be most honored to learn all you can teach me.”

She laughed.

“I heard the Durins arrived at all decisions by committee.  Glad t’ have yeh, lad.”

Kili and Dis joined them and the list of candidates was whittled down to nine more respected metal workers who would be invited to apprentice with the mithril masters.  Afterward, talk turned far less serious.

Kir, sitting next to Kili, levered a great curtain of hair out of his face and squinted at him.

“Why, yer bu’ a badger, yer highness.  Are yeh even a’ age t’ be courtin’ yer elf lass?”

“Kir!  Don’t be a tease,” said Minta.  “You know perfectly well he’s of age.”

“Bu’ still young enough t’ blush, I see.”

Poor Kili looked like an apple with black stubble.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Ori has a very busy night, and by the morning he’s … ravenous. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori sat up in bed in the middle of the night, his eyes smarting against a glow at the end of the bed.

He glanced at Dwalin, who lay asleep, snoring, oblivious. Ori thought to wake him, but instead he turned and watched as the glow widened, then deepened. Shapes within it shifted and clarified until he was looking into a forge.

It was all so sharp, he could see the grain in the leather straps around the handle of the hammer leaning against the anvil. He smelled the sooty smoke of the quench bucket and saw that the fire burned as embers, yet he still felt the suffocating heat.

A huge, red-bearded dwarf stood over a rough bench in the middle of the room. It was covered in paper and tools. At first glance, Ori wondered if it was Dain, then the dwarf straightened and grinned maniacally.

This wasn’t Dain.

The door behind him opened, apparently at his will, and he boomed out in a familiar voice:

“Me dear, I’ve go’ it!”

A cool wind whipped Ori’s hair back and embers swelled for a moment, the fire tinged green. A feminine voice from beyond the door called,

“Got what, husband? Where are you?”

“In here, me petal! I have it!”

“Have what? Dear, close the door, the violets are wilting.”

“Th’ amethysts! Th’ matchin’ amethysts! I know wha’ I’m goin’ t’ do with ‘em!”

“Wonderful. Lovely. Oh, botheration! Dearest, the impatiens are on fire!”

“Come on in an’ shut th’ door.”

“The impatiens-“

“Er - Oi! Ulwe! Little assist?”

Water splashed somewhere in the distance.

“Ta! Come on in, me petal.”

“I can’t. I have to go and find a mop. Since there isn’t a valar of one! What is so important that you’ve decided to threaten my greenhouse?”

“Th’ matchin’ amethysts! Bearers! Twins!”

Horrified, Ori cried, “I don’t want to be pregnant!”

Mahal looked right at him and chuckled.

“Yeh, back t’ sleep. Yeh’ll be needin’ it!”

The two valar laughed and Mahal put a finger on Ori’s forehead. The forge retreated back into darkness.

Ori woke muzzy-headed in the morning. He kissed Dwalin and, after washing up, came back and sat on the bed while Dwalin did his hair. He returned the favor and rose to dress.

“Yeh sleep well?” Dwalin rumbled.
“Eh. Strange dream.”

Ori went to the wardrobe, he was looking for an undertunic to match the tunic he had chosen for the day. Things were not going well. For some reason, all his undertunics had fled in the night, or perhaps they were stuck in the wash, or possibly Dipfa had taken it into her head to remove them all to embroider six inches of lace on the cuffs and hems of each one. Whatever the reason, he could only find one, and he had not worn it since before they had gone to the inn. He recalled it was a little snug, but it was in perfect shape, so he shrugged and pulled it over his head, and that was as far as it would go.

"Dwalin? Can you help me with my tunic? I think it’s rucked up in back and I can’t pull it down."

Dwalin approached, surveyed the situation and laughed gently.

"Sorry, love. Three squares a day’s done th’ trick. You’ll no’ fit in this tunic now."

"Oh, no! I’ve barely worn this tunic. All that cloth gone to waste?"

Dwalin took hold of the hem and turned it over to examine the seam.

"Naw, love, Mahrdin’ll jus’ let it out. He’s planned fer it. He’s bin outfittin’ th’ Fundin brothers long enough to know his business. Yeh’ll jus’ have t’ pick another."

"There aren’t any."

"Eh?"

"I think Dipfa took them for some reason."

"Tartin’ ‘em up, prob’ly." Dwalin snickered. "Dis’ll have some undertunics Fili’s outgrew, probably like new. Color’ll be wrong, but they’ll do ’til Mahrdin resizes this’un an’ Dipfa brings back yer others."

"I’ll send Garnet with a message, I guess."

"Love, hold up a sec."

"What is it?"

"There’s a tattoo on yer back."

"What?"

"It wasn’t there las’ night."

"I don’t have any tattoos," said Ori. "Did I just sleep on an ink bottle by accident?"

"Yeh bring ink bottles t’ bed?"

"No, but I’ve fallen asleep on my work and woken up with script on my face."

"This ain’t script. This is a raven."

"A tattoo of a raven? On my back?"

It never even occurred to Ori that Dwalin might be joking.

"Aye, looks like it’s bin here a while. It’s all healed over. Fresh tattoos’re literally a bloody mess."

"Why is there a raven on my back?"

"Best guess? I’d say Mahal’s properly claimed yeh, now."

"I was afraid you’d say that. Claimed me for what? Does this mean I have to become a hermit or something and have squirrels living in my beard?"

"Wha’?"

"Because I don’t have much of a beard yet. It would have to be a very small family of squirrels."

Dwalin turned Ori to face him with exquisite care. The look on the warrior’s face did nothing to aid the situation.

"Tell me I don’t have another one on my face," Ori begged.

Dwalin backed him up and sat him on the bed. He knelt at Ori’s feet with a hand planted firmly on either Ori’s shoulders.

"Love, did yer brain just throw a cog?"

"Yes? Dwalin…"

"Are yeh gonna throw up?"

"I’m going to scream."

"Ah."
Ori did so and threw himself into Dwalin’s arms, panting like a hard-run horse and whimpering like a child.

The door crashed open and Dori, Balin, rushed in, weapons drawn. Nori dropped through the ceiling, brandishing a pair of wicked knives.

“What’s happened?” Dori cried. “Ori!”

“He’s no’ hurt,” said Dwalin hoarsely. “Balin, yeh need t’ come have a look a’ this.”

Balin, his hair and beard a hurricane of points, clambered behind Ori on the bed.

“Dori, m’dear, will yeh ligh’ a few more lamps?”

“What is it?” Dori demanded.

“Or somefin’,” Nori growled.

Dori crowded on Ori’s other side, holding him as closely as possible without obscuring the strange mark.

That left Nori to get the lamps, which he did, and far clumsier than Ori had ever seen him move.

“What’re we supposed t’ do wif this?” Nori asked no one in particular. “Shouldn’t we call someone t’ look?”

Balin, at a loss, replied, “Who would yeh suggest?”

It wasn’t as if dwarrow had clergy of any kind. Their spirituality was private and individual and their Maker omnipresent. When they called upon Him, they assumed they were heard.

“Dunno,” said Nori. “Binni maybe? Don’t he an’ Oin know about this s-”

“Go!” Dori commanded him.

Nori went.

Ori quieted to frightened gasps, clinging to his clearly baffled husband.

Oin and Binni arrived still in their night clothes. Nori had obviously roused them from their bed.

Oin examined Ori’s back and declared the tattoo “well-healed”, which they already knew, but he couldn’t say how it got there in the first place.

“Did you have any strange dreams last night?” Binni asked Ori.

“Yes, but I only remember bits, I mean, I-I-I dreamt something about a forge. Then I dreamt I got to work and wasn’t wearing my tunic, but I have that dream a lot.”

"We’ve all had that one,” said Binni.

“I haven’t,” said Nori.

“Shut up, Nori,” said Dori.

“Right,” said Nori. “Who’s for brekkie?”

They turned as one and stared at him.

“What?” he asked. “Ori, yer not hurtin’?”

“No.”

“Ain’t dizzy?”

“A little, but I think it’s just nerves.”

“Well, since Mahal ain’t risen outa the floor, pronouncin’ th’ reforgin’ o’ the world, it prob’ly won’t happen much before noon. Might as well fortify ourselves.”

“Dwalin?” Ori asked into Dwalin’s neck.

“What is it, love?”

“I’m freezing. Can I put on a tunic?”

“Oh, right. Er… will one o’ mine do?”

“What’s wrong with his own?” Dori asked.

“They all bu’ one’ve disappeared, an’ he’s outgrown it. Tha’s where this whole thin’ started. Here yeh go, love.”

It was a soldier’s undertunic, almost as long as Ori was tall, recently mended and meant for winter storage, but it would do for now.

Once through in the breakfast parlor, Dori shooed Dwalin to sit and Ori curled in his husband’s lap. It was always a safe place not matter what happened. Dwalin could do nothing about this weird circumstance but Ori still felt safe. Dori and Binni bustled about the kitchen. Through the open door, Ori saw a confused Miss Larit enter in her nightgown, puzzled as to why work was starting so early. Dori sent her back to her bed.

Soon Oin, Binni, Dwalin, Balin, Nori, Ori and Dori had tea in front of them. Ori sighed as the hot teas slid comfortingly down his throat. Oin grunted and Nori went off through the walls.

After few minutes, Nori returned with Thorin, who was clad only in pair of pajama bottoms, Sugar at his heels. Thorin took in Ori’s pale face and extremely long undertunic, came over and very gingerly touched his shoulder.

“Ori, what’s wrong?”

“Dwalin can tell you,” he said quietly. “I’m not sick, I’m just a little off balance.”

Thorin sat and Dori poured him some tea. Fili, Kili and Dis came in.

“What’s going on?” Dis asked. “Is something wrong? Ori-?”

Mistress Dazla arrived on the scene, immediately provided them all with toast, butter and marmalade and turned to the kitchen to create something more filling.

Dwalin explained that morning’s adventure.

They chewed on this with their toast.

“We need help,” said Balin. “I’m sendin’ a note t’ Brur.”

Ori groaned and dropped his head in his hands, or rather the sleeves over his hands, which continued to lengthen no matter how many times he rolled up the cuffs.

“I’ll be late for work.”

“Laddie, right now it’s probably best yeh sit tight. Brur knows every inch o’ tha’ library an’ every book an’ scroll. If there’s mention o’ this happenin’ before, he’ll find it.”

“Why don’t we just asked Roäc?” Kili suggested around a mouthful.

Everyone turned and stared at him.

“What?” he asked, swallowing with effort. “He’s the messenger of Mahal, right?”

“Thorin, where is Roäc?” Dis asked. “Has anyone seen any ravens today? Beryl wasn’t on her perch this morning.”

“Neither was Garnet,” said Dwalin.

The king rose and went to the meadow doors. He opened them and gave the keening cry particular to Roäc.

The great raven swooped in past Thorin’s head with a second, slightly smaller bird close behind.
The smaller bird had a white feather in its tail, the only one Ori had seen on any raven.

Roäc alit gracefully on the back of Thorin’s chair, while the other hopped to a springy stop on the table itself and looked around with keen eyes.

The raven king cleared his throat and grandly announced, “We have been to a convocation of our kind. We have decided that the dwarf Ori should be granted the honor of our company. I present Quartzite, fledged by Mica, sired by Roäc, and so a prince of the line.”

“Fi!” Kili cried. “He’s us!”

“I’m sensible of the honor, you majesty,” said Ori, “but I can’t think what I’ve done to earn it.”

If Roäc had an eyebrow, it would have been raised.

“Silly nestling, you’ve been chosen by Mahal.”

“I’m not sure what I did to earn that either.”

Quartzite looked up from studying the bits left on Fili’s plate and fixed Ori with a grave look.

Or perhaps he was smiling. Raven expressions were complicated.

“Many hear, some see, few write. You do all three. Plus, you’re cute.”

“Please tell me Mahal doesn’t think I’m cute,” said Ori.

“No, I do. Too bad you have no feathers, plus you’re already bonded. Sad for me.”

Roäc turned to Thorin and gave a disapproving croak.

“Offspring!”

Thorin eyed Kili, who was wiping his mouth with the back of his hand.

“Mmm,” Thorin agreed.

“So, Prince Quartzite, what am I supposed to do? For Mahal, I mean,” said Ori.

Quartzite pecked at the platter of bacon.
“Quartz. Call me Quartz. Read fire runes, send messages, sometimes to people far away, so I’ll take them. Feed me.”

“By direction of Mahal?”

“By direction of my stomach.”

Oh. Ori thought that was something he could handle at least.

“What do you like to eat?”

“I’m a raven so, mostly deadish things. Mmm, you were right, Father-King. Good bacon here.”

Garnet flew in to land on the back of Dwalin’s chair and preen. She seemed to take no notice of the younger raven, but Quartz’s eye flew to her immediately.

“Ooooooh, Garnet!” he sighed.

He flapped over to land rather closer than was advisable.

She squawked and pecked at him viciously.

Dwalin ducked out of the way.

“Mebbe we should move th’ perches t’ th’ spare room,” he said. “I can see there’ll be blood on th’ walls.”

“So,” said Ori, once more winning back Quartz’s attention, “I don’t have to do anything specific, just write down when I see things.”

“Pretty easy,” said Quartz, making strategic retreat from the ruffled Garnet. He hopped back across the table to Ori. “Plus, you get nice ink to cover the no-feather bits. Good, right?”

“I’m going to have more tattoos.”

“Eh. Maybe.”

“Believe me, Ori-mate,” said Kili, “it hurts a lot less than getting them the usual way.”

Ori regarded Quartz for a moment then passed the raven a rasher of bacon. The raven disposed of this at speed.

“I suppose you know my bat and kittens?” Ori offered.

Quartz hopped close to Ori, then flitted to his shoulder and looked down at Mask and Nori-Pori in Ori’s lap where Ori had been slipping them tidbits. Mask mewed curiously and Nori-Pori immediately stood on his hind feet and reach out with a paw. Quartz cocked an eye at the kittens.

“Cute.” Quartz leaned down and Nori-Pori batted at the long beak. Quartz patted the furry head with his beak. Nori-Pori desperately tried to clutch the beak, but it was too smooth for the tiny claws to get a purchase.

Kihshassa eyed him sharply from where her chin rested on Ori’s other shoulder, and Ori would have sworn the raven swallowed nervously when he realized it. Quartz bobbed his head at her respectfully.

Bilbo came in sporting a marvelous, patchwork dressing gown and looked around.

“Do I want to know?”

“This is Quartzite, Quartz,” Ori said, tiredly. “And I have a tattoo of a raven on my back which appeared overnight.”

“Sounds as though you had a busy night without knowing it.” Bilbo came over and kissed his cheek, then settled beside Thorin.

Beryl smoothed in and landed on the table in front of Dis.

“There’s a party of riders headed here from Rivendell,” she reported.

Thorin sat back, putting his arm about Bilbo’s shoulders.

“Did you recognize any?” he asked the raven as Dis petted and fed her.

“There’s Rhonda and Linda, and Rhonda’s sons, and that other tall one with the funny name, who was here before. They’re escorting someone else. Looks like the elf king.”

Kili sat up.

“Maybe it’s Cemnesta. Wasn’t Thranduil going to write to him?”

“Tha’s true enough,” Balin nodded. “Cemnesta’s th’ heir t’ th Greenwood now. Must’ve finished up his studies right quick.”

“Makes you wonder what our Thrandy told him.” Dori poured more tea. “Ori, my pet, I think you need to rest today. Perhaps your nice, new raven would be kind enough to say so to Master
“Yes,” Thorin straightened. “If Elrond will be here, we must receive his party and I’ll need you here, Ori.”

Dori opened her mouth to protest but shut it again. Ori looked at his nice, new raven. “Quartz?”

“I’m on it.”

Quartz was gone out the door.

Mistress Dazla emerged from the kitchen, looking rather puzzled. “Er, begging your pardon, your majesty, there’s a great lot of undertunics in the scullery, draped over the brooms and drying racks.”

“Whose undertunics?” Thorin asked.

“Lord Ori’s, I believe.”

“They tarted up?” Dwalin asked.

“Yes,” said Mistress Dazla, raising a brow at the captain. Ori face palmed.

Thorin looked hopeful. “Ball fringe?”

“I’m not wearing ball fringe!”

“Ball fringe is beautiful!” Thorin insisted, teasingly.

“It’s ravens, actually,” said Mistress Dazla. “Raven buttons, lace with raven patterns along the cuffs and hems. The black hem lace is six inches long, I’m absolutely certain.”

“Me an’ me big mouth,” Dwalin muttered.

Ori groaned.

Kili said brightly, “Cheer up, Ori-mate. Could be worse. Could be buttons that look like Mahal’s hairy balls.”

“Please don’t give Him any ideas,” said Ori tightly, while the deeper voice in the back of his head mused, “Hm…”

At that moment Master Brur crashed in, wearing the previous night’s clothes and with his beard in knots from where he’d been unconsciously twisting it.

“Found it!” Brur announced.

“Good morning, Master Brur,” said Dori. “Would you like some breakfast?”

“Aye,” said Brur, thrusting his mug at Dori and hurrying to the table. He swiped a clear space in front of Thorin and plopped an ancient book down in front of him, open. “Read tha’!”

“You’re welcome,” said Dori snidely.

Thorin scanned the page. He looked up at Brur. He read it again.

“They don’t name her.”

“Nah, they don’. Bloody scribes.”

“What is it?” Ori asked.

“A passage that was removed from the newer translations of the Infernal Adventures,” said Thorin. “Take a look.”

Ori was shocked. The original text was just sitting here among the toast crumbs and jelly blobs. On the other hand, the original author had probably transcribed it at a desk covered in toast crumbs and jelly blobs.

The script, elegant and compact, was faded into a mellow, yellowish brown on a yellowed page, but still legible.

“…so Durin walked on without his light, the gold to his mithril, his Flower.”

“Th’ Flower a’ Durin,” said Balin.

“Aye, an no’ a word a’ who she was!” Brur growled.

Bilbo said, “The Flower of Durin was almost certainly represented by a sunflower.”

Oin considered, “P’raps she was a healin’ dam. There’s plenty a’ spores, molds, an’ fungus underground t’ promote healin’, but no healer worth their mithril’d give up th’ chance t’ see wha’ herbs an’ th’ like grew on th’ mountainside. Mebbe she were a dam who ventured out int’ th’ sun.
Sunflower oil does promote health. Th’ seeds ain’t bad eating’, either.”

Binni stirred his tea.
“And the first dwarven healer’s name has been lost to time,” he said. “Only the few precious manuscript pages remain.”
“Aye,” said Brur. “Bottom lef’ drawer a’ me desk.”
“Of course,” said Dori, almost to herself.
Ori looked to Bilbo.
“What do sunflowers mean to hobbits?”
“Good eating, for the seeds, of course. Esoterically, if you cut a sunflower at sunset while making a wish, the wish will come true before another sunset - as long as the wish isn’t too grand. You can’t ask to win the tomato competition at the harvest fair, for example. If you sleep with a sunflower beneath your bed, you’ll know the truth in any matter. And, of course, it wards off garden pests, which is luck to any farmer.”
“Sunflowers bring the truth,” Ori mused. “So, are we really speaking about a person, or Durin seeking the truths of Mahal?”
Thorn said, “He’d already sent down the truths of Mahal to us, so I think it’s a person.”
The not-Mahal voice in the back of Ori’s head said, “Yes!”
“Um, for what it’s worth,” said Ori, “my brain says you’re right.”
“Mahal?” Thorin asked.
“No, the other one.”
Brur had watched this exchange with increasing dismay.
“Yer hearin’ voices, laddie?”
Oin shot forward.
“Ori, take off yer tunic. Brur, yeh need t’ see this!”
The librarian’s eyebrows hit his non-existent hairline.
“This is all so sudden,” he snorted.
“Shut up!” Ori snapped. “I mean…. please, Master Brur. Sir.”
Dwalin wrestled him out of his tunic and the room went utterly silent.
Just for an instant, Ori wondered if the tattoo was still there, or if he was merely giving his soon-to-be-ex-boss a free show.
Brur whistled in awe.
“Laddie, how long’ve yeh had that?”
“Since some time in the middle of last night.”
“Great, bleedin’ Mahal,” he breathed. “Never mind about th’ shuttin’ up. Yer entitled, if only this once.”
Balin asked, “Is there any record o’ such a thing happenin’ before?”
Brur considered. Ori hoped he’d consider quickly. He wanted to put his tunic back on.
“No,” said Brur.
“Argh!” Ori shouted in frustration.
“I mean, there’s Durin who’s born with th’ anvil on his shoulder…”
The room had grown quiet again, this time with a sort of horrified tension.
“What’s the matter?” Ori beseeched.
Dwalin said, “Er, apparently Mahal fergot a star last night. He jus’ put it in.”
“How sweet!” cried Dori.
“Bollocks!” said Brur. “Ravens are the mouths of Mahal. Mahal’s gonna talk through him.
Means we’ll have to listen t’ everythin’ th’ lad says from now on!”
Ori thought he would leave out that Mahal already talked through him, and that He wasn’t the only one.
A moment later Quartz arrived and hopped along Ori’s arm to tell them the elfin party had arrived at the main gate.
Ori huffed out in exasperation.
“Thank Mahal! My mind needs a distraction.”
Varied company, Luncheon, and Closeted Skeletons

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Put on your hats and gloves and you best visiting clothes. Dori’s hosting another party and we’re going to have a good gossip…about dead people. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

At Dori’s excited cry, Ori went through to his room, put the undertunic back on and dressed a little more formally and washed his face again.

When he came through to the kitchen, Dori was helping Mistress Dazla prepare a fabulous luncheon. Ori was shooed out to the sitting room where Margr and Vi had arrived, all excitement because Glorfindel was back. Dwalin and Fili went down to the gate to escort the Rivendell party up.

Mistress Dazla’s bird swooped through and she hurried to open the door for their guests. Thorin came through from Bag End East with Bilbo, Frodo, and Wee Sam, all of them tidied up, the hobbits with smart new waistcoats. Kili, Tauriel and Sigrid bounced down the kitchen stairs and burst in. This set the wargs off barking and romping around the room until Thorin called them to heel.

Glorfindel plunged in and scooped up Margr and Vi, both sisters shrieking and squealing.

“Here are my darling dams!” he roared.

Thorin went to greet Elrond. The Lord of Imadris was the same as always, though a trifle travel-stained. Thorin and Bilbo welcomed him warmly. Frodo and Wee Sam accepted this arrival with calm. Elrond lifted his brows at the wargs. Thorin called them forward to greet the elf. Soon they were nosing around these tall people, looking for ear-scratches.

Lindir, Elrohir and Elloadan came in, smiling.

“Uncle Rhonda! Uncle Linda!” Kili cried. “And the trouble twins!”

Elrond looked amused. Both twins shouted with laughter and rushed over to greet the younger set, hugging and chattering.

Lindir shook his head as he rose from Dori’s embrace.

Elrond turned and said to Thorin,

“Your majesty, allow me to introduce Prince Cemnesta of the Greenwood. He is not long returned from the Undying Lands. Cemnesta, Thorin, High King of Dwarrow, and his betrothed, Professor Bilbo Baggins.”

Cemnesta came forward and bowed. Ori liked him immediately. He closely resembled his father, but he was serene, approachably calm, with a gentle smile, and his eyes held a twinkle of humor. He was simply dressed in white and gray robes. Ori felt he would be a good king for the neighboring elves.

Dori greeted the prince with a kiss before shooing their guests upstairs to wash and change for a meal. Mistress Dazla assured them they were all in their old rooms from the coronation.

Elrond chuckled,

“How strange it will seem with the house so empty.”

“Not to worry,” Dori comforted as she hustled him out. “The noise level will be just what you’re accustomed to, my dear.”

Roäc winged in.

“Bard and Thranduil are coming for lunch,” said Roäc. “I didn’t say anything but that elf looked right suspicious.”
“He’ll get over it.” Thorin replied with a smirk. “Thank you, Roäc.”
“Better get out the best Dorwinian,” said the raven. “King Thrandy’s going to have the vapors.”
Cemnesta paused on his way up the stairs.
“King Who will have the What?” he asked delightedly.

The Groinuls arrived and soon Romy was in love with the twins. Legolas was all but beside himself to see his brother. Cemnesta looked up from Nori-Pori, who was swatting Cemnesta’s braids, carefully handed the kitten to Lindir and swanned forward, arms wide, right at Gimli.

“Brother!” he exclaimed. “You’ve shrunk!”
Legolas rolled his eyes.
“Right here, Nesta. Remember? The blond?”
“Ah, that’s right,” said Cemnesta, as the brothers embraced. He looked down at Gimli. “Sorry, I didn’t recognize you right off, Tauriel.”
“Grand,” said Gimli. “One brother’s just as bad as th’ other.”
“This is Gimli Gloinul,” said Legolas proudly. “Gimli, my brother Cemnesta.”
They bowed to one another.
“Yeh ain’t seen yer other brother yet, have yeh.”
“No, I understand he’s undergone a bit of a revolution in personality. Which is to say, he now has one.”
Gimli gave a bellow of laughter and patted the elf on the arm.
“I like yeh,” he announced.
“Hardly fair, Nesta,” Legolas chided him, with a laugh. “He did have a personality. He was grumpy.”

“Ah, yes, that’s right. So, it’s true, then? Ada wasn’t exaggerating?”
Legolas smiled wickedly. “Brace yourself.”
Thranduil swept in, his eyes darting left and right with suspicion.
Cemnesta bowed to Thranduil with his hand over his heart.
“Ada.”
“My fawn!” Thranduil cried, then fell upon Cemnesta and embraced him rapturously, while Bard, Bain and Tilda entered after him.
Released after a long moment, Cemnesta stared at his father.
“That was weird,” he said. “I got your letter. That was weird, too.”
Thranduil laughed and said, “Things are happening apace. Here, come and say hello to your stepfather.”
Bard, who had been trying not to fidget, allowed himself to be drawn forward.
“This is Bard, King of Dale,” said Thranduil proudly. “Bard, Cemnesta Thranduilion.”
Bard bowed in the elvish fashion. He did look dignified that way.
Cemnesta bowed as well.
“Ada… Um… Father.”
“Just call him ‘Da’,” Tilda piped. “We all do. We want hugs, though.”
“Ah, you’re my sister Tilda,” said Cemnesta. “I think I can manage hugs.”
Cemnesta hunkered down to hug Tilda, and straightened to hug a startled Bain whether he wanted to be hugged or not.
“Sorry,” said Cemnesta, pulling back. “I assumed Tilda was giving a blanket command.”
Bain grinned.
“She always does.”
“And where is my brother -er- Wandi?” Cemnesta asked.
“Finishing up a hair-do,” said Thranduil, airily. “And then Mellon needs his snack.”
“His friend? Does Wandi have a dwarf boyfriend, too?”
“I didn’t mention Mellon in my letter, did I,” Thranduil mused.
“No, and I’m willing to bet it was on purpose, Ada.”
Thranduil put his hand to his breastbone, fingers splayed. He looked shocked.

“My fawn! What are you saying about your honored Ada?”

“I see,” said Cemnesta slyly. “So, Mellon is an oliphaunt.”

“The oliphaunt belongs to Ori,” Tilda interrupted.

“Ori has an oliphaunt for a boyfriend? I thought Ori was married to a Captain Dwalin.”

Tilda shook her head, her braids flying.

“No, Ori’s oliphaunt is with the circus. Captain Dwalin is Ori’s buffalo.”

“Tilda!” Bard and Sigrid cried in unison.

“But he is,” she insisted. “That’s what Ori calls him.”

Ori turned red, and Dwalin bellowed with laughter.

“It seems,” said Cemnesta, “that the Durins are beset with animals.”

Bard muttered, “You have no idea.”

“We just have Bob,” said Tilda, “and Mellon sometimes. He’s sort of like an in-law. A dog-in-law.”

“Ah, so Mellon is a dog. I can’t imagine Wandi with a dog. It must be a morose, grim thing, somewhere between a bear and a jackal.”

“Oh, he’s the light of your brother’s life,” said Thranduil. “Mellon was a present from Gimli.”

“That’s very kind of you, Master Gimli.”

“Jus’ Gimli’s fine. See, I already though’ he had a dog, ‘cause he kep’ moanin’ abou’ bein’ melancholy. I though’ he missed his friend, th’ collie.”

Thranduil added, “And when Gimli found Wandi didn’t have a dog, he brought Wandi, Mellon. And now Wandi need never be… melancholy.”

“That’s horrible!” Cemnesta turned to gaze at the amazing son of Gloin. “Gimli, you must be very proud.”

“Aye,” said Gimli. “Grand, in’t it?”

Legolas folded his arms and cocked an eye at Gimli.

“Don’t be fooled, Nesta. Gimli knew all along. He admitted he had been sitting on that joke for ten years.”

“You are possessed of admirable restraint, not to mention patience.” Cemnesta looked teasingly down at Gimli, who grinned.

“Aye, canna waste a good ‘un like tha’!”

Celeborn and Galadriel appeared in the middle of the room, and Kelli with them.

Galadriel looked over at Cemnesta and said,

“Cemnesta, always a pleasure.”

“Aunt Galadriel.” He bowed to her, but she was already gone on to her hostess.

“Dori!”

“Lady Galadriel! Look at you!”

They embraced rapturously, already talking at speed.

Dori cried out, “How well you look!”

Galadriel giggled.

“I do believe I’ve put on flesh!”

“I believe you have! Let’s see!”

Galadriel stood with her arms outstretched. Dori patted her tummy.

“Oh, yes, my dear!” Dori agreed. “Turn around. Turn around.”

Galadriel did so. Dori patted her backside.

“Congratulations, my dear! You have a bottom!”

The pair of them squealed and embraced again. Mistress Dazla and Binni echoed Dori’s sentiments and Galadriel embraced each of them as well.

Cemnesta side-gazed at his father, who chuckled.

“Ada, what is in the water around here?”

“Hm? Why do you ask, my fawn?”

“The room is full of very short, very fast-moving people, like a great whirlwind, pulling in all unsuspecting bystanders in its wake.”
“| You’ll get used to it. Have some more tea. |
| But, I shouldn’t like to walk into anyone. |
| Just have a care to mind out. |
“| I beg your pardon? Do what? |
Celeborn approached to pay his respects. He and Cemnesta bowed to one another, and Celeborn said with a twinkle in his eye, “You haven’t been introduced to Kelli.”
“Who is Kelli?”
“Rawwwk!” Kelli exclaimed, waddling forward and looking up at Cemnesta with an appraising air.
“What is that?”
Kelli offered a wing. Cemnesta carefully held out his hand, unsure of how to proceed. Kelli politely patted his palm with three wingtip feathers.
“I am pleased to make your acquaintance, Kelli.”
Kelli hopped in place with a squawk of alacrity, then waddled off toward the laden tea table.
“I’ve just made the acquaintance of a bird.”
Celeborn said, “And quite handsomely.”
“Lord Ori!” Dipfa cried, bursting through the door in a cloud of purple and green plaid chiffon. “I have come bearing undertunics!”
Everyone looked up as Dipfa arrived. She had a pile of cloth in her arms and stopped stock still in the middle of the room, open mouthed. Ori saw that she was staring at the pile of tunics which Mistress Dazla was carrying out of the kitchen.
“Mahal hid my other tunics and decorated them!” Ori burst out before his tailor-dresser could say anything.
Galadriel turned and looked at Mistress Dazla. She closed the distance between them and lifted the top tunic and held it at arm’s length admiring the raven trimmings.
“No, Ori dear, this is Yavanna’s needle. I’d know it anywhere.”
“Will they go through the mangle, marm?” Mistress Dazla asked worriedly.
“Oh yes,” Galadriel smiled. “Her work is very sturdy.”
“Thank you,” Bilbo commented aside, from where he was helping himself to cake and Frodo and Sam to sandwiches.
Dipfa rushed to inspect, once satisfied, Mistress Dazla swept out. Dipfa turned to Ori, clucked, and snatched at the tunic he was wearing.
“You are not wearing that at this luncheon, m’lord!” she ordered in a no-nonsense tone.
Ori started to turn back toward the bedroom when Dipfa decided to handle this situation herself and immediately. Ori sighed heavily as she yanked off the tunic and the undertunic. He’d given a show at breakfast, why not now?
Elrond, Cemnesta, and Galadriel were immediately towering over him.
“| When did this mark appear? |
| Sometimes while I slept last night,” Ori muttered. |
| You are to be congratulated, Ori of Fundin.” Galadriel’s smile was warm. “You are the Scribe |
| of Mahal.” |
Omi and Loli squealed with delight. Brur swore to himself and scratched the back of his neck.
“How do I mean,” said Ori as Dipfa shoved an undertunic over his head. “I think I’m fine with it now, as I didn’t know what it meant.”
“It can mean many things,” Galadriel went on. Ori looked at her. She was approachable, yet strangely distant.
“Does it mean: It is unwise to seek the council of elves. They will answer both yes and no?”
Her eyes widened, then she chuckled.
“The job of a scribe is to-”
“Seek knowledge and record the truth and-” Ori stopped himself. The pieces slowly falling into place. “I have to seek the Flower of Durin to find out what was hidden and why. This is all Jim’s fault!”

Ori found he had to step outside for awhile. Dwalin went with him to the meadow, rubbing Ori’s back as Ori simply breathed in the cool mountain air.

“I’m going to have to tell everyone the whole of the story, aren’t I,” said Ori. “Even about Mahal talking to me.”

“I’m sorry, love, but I think so.”

“Fine. Just, in a minute.”

“As long as yeh like, love.”

When they returned to the sitting room it was far more full of people than when they had left. Ori had no idea if this was Dori’s idea, or possibly Roäc’s. It might even be Quartz’s doing. Ori knew little about his new raven, but he was very aware Quartz was far more than an ordinary animal. He wondered what Mahal told Quartz. He wondered if it was permissible to ask. Ori might ask Quartz any number of things, provided the raven could be pried away from mooning over Garnet.

As he entered, the room went quiet and absolutely everyone was looking at him. He put his chin up and shoulders back and walked over to the tea table, making himself a nice cuppa, and one for Dwalin. Then Thorin beckoned him forward and Ori went to stand with him.

Before everyone, Thorin looked about and said coolly, “This private council meeting is now convened. I ask that all information discussed within this room remain here.”

The elves and Bard looked at one another and gave tacit agreement. Thorin bowed slightly and once more the story of the shards was told.

“It would seem,” said Thorin after Ori and the other scribes had finished, “that Nali pruned his family tree to the point where there’s no forking from Durin the Deathless. There is no name or mention of Durin II’s mother. For all anyone knows, Durin might have carved his son out of rock.”

“Perhaps,” said Cemnesta thoughtfully as Mistress Dazla and her team provided everyone with comfortable seating, “that is why the myth perpetuates that there are no dwarrowdams.”

Balin sighed. “We dwarrow’ve always been good at smackin’ our heads with our own axes.”

Thorin sat beside Bilbo on a love seat, so Ori took this as tacit permission to go and sit on his husband.

Kili turned to Thranduil, who was still at the table, deciding between a slice of iced gingerbread and a selection of new made candied fruit, and asked, is his best diplomatic tone, “King Thranduil, do you remember Durin the Deathless’ wife?”

Thranduil stared at him.

“Of course not! Why would you think that we’d met?”

“I know elves and dwarrow didn’t necessarily socialize much, but-”

“How old do you think I am?”

“I know you’re immortal, or you were.”

“Yes, but I did have a birthdate. That was before my time. Best ask Lady Galadriel.”

Thranduil made his way over, nibbling on gingerbread, and distractedly sat on the sofa next to Kir.

“Howdyeh do?” Kir asked.

Thranduil shrieked and jumped up, his eyes huge.

“It talked!” He turned to Thorin. “You’ve taught your wargs to talk?”

“Woof,” said Kir. “I’m no’ a warg, yeh great elfish numpty.”

Thorin grinned.

“King Thranduil, this is Master Kir, son of Lir. And the wargs aren’t usually allowed on the furniture as they’re far too large.”

“Oh, thank Eru,” said Thranduil. He bowed. “Well met.”

“Likewise,” said Kir. “Pardon me no’ standin’ up. I only got so much ‘stand up’ in me a day. I’m savin’ it f’r when I go’ t’ go take a piss.”

“Entirely reasonable,” said Thranduil, settling himself.
He jumped up once more as Lady Galadriel appeared, curled up, on his other side on the sofa.

“Ack!”

“Thranduil,” she said serenely.

Thranduil recovered admirably and put candied fruit in his mouth.

Kir’s grin was visible even under his hair as he leaned forward to speak to the lady.

“M’lady. Always guid t’ see yeh again. I shan’t bark at yeh.”

“Hello, Master Kir. Thank you. I trust you saved that pleasantry for Thranduil.”

“Go’ it in one, as usual, m’lady.”

Thranduil looked at Kir, looked at Galadriel, muttered something about conspiracies and sat.

“Lord Celeborn didn’t come with yeh?” Kir asked.

“Oh, he’s skulking about at the food. Here he is now.”

Celeborn came over with Kelli at his heel, though he stopped to speak to Vi and Margr along the way.

“How’re yeh keepin’, our Celeborn?” Vi asked. She and Margr sat, one on each of Glorfindel’s knees.

“Very well, thank you, ladies,” said the elf, “and I can see you are also … well-kept.”

The sisters screamed with laughter.

“Oi, wha’ a naughty thin’ yer turnin’ int’!” Margr chuckled

He bowed, arriving at last to incline his head at Master Kir.

“Master, you’re looking well.”

“How kin yeh tell?” Kir challenged playfully as Celeborn turned to Thranduil

“Cousin. You’re looking decrepit.”

“Cousin. You look like a git, as usual,” Thranduil purred.

“Lady Galadriel,” Kili started, admirably trying to rescue the council meeting, “do you remember Durin the Deathless’ wife?”

She frowned. Which was to say, a tiny crease appeared between her brows.

“I really have very few memories of the dwarrow of that time. I met Durin twice, but because of the Firebeard disaster, our peoples didn’t have much contact until long after Khazad-dûm was under construction. Later on, I was on friendly terms with Narvi, through Celebrimbor, of course. Oh, her yeast bread was so good! Light as a feather. But at the time dwarrow were far more secretive about themselves and their race than they are today.”

“Do you recall any stories?” Kili tried.

“You mean gossip?” she asked, with a smile.

“Malicious or otherwise,” he confirmed.

“I understand she was called the Flower of Durin, but I can tell you no more. It makes me wonder if there isn’t some scroll or volume about her, perhaps still hidden in the Great Library of Khazad-dûm. I understand dwarf librarians are inclined to hoard. Job security, I believe some call it.”

She lofted her eyebrows teasingly at Master Brur.

Binni shivered then turned to Ori,

“I’m sorry I can’t remember more.”

Ori smiled. Perhaps…” He paused then looked at Master Brur.

“Master Brur, did you bring all the papers found in the chest?”

“Aye, laddie, an’ though, for th’ most part, they’re like th’ work yeh an’ our Thorin did when he …er…inherited his crown an’ made changes, they’re bleeding short on actual histories.”

“You mean they wax cryptic on the Flower of Durin.”

“Exactly.”

“If the library of Khazad-dûm was still operating, then, like their translation of The Infernal Adventures, there might be hints in any item brought out with the refugees. Pity so much was lost.”

Ori muttered.

“Well,” Brur scratched his beard thoughtfully. “There is a catalogue of sorts.”

“There’s a catalogue of what’s come from the library at Khazad-dûm?” Ori demanded.

“Of course, these are librarians, the fussiest people this side o’ hobbits. Wha’ come over an’ wha’ remained. Every librarian knows what’s in every other library, in case they want to exchange. O’course, no one’s requested anything from Khazad-dûm recently. We do have some of the collection, a very small holding, because old Rivrur the Canny had a bit of a premonition and sent on what he could via caravans. And some of the earliest survivors brought what they could carry.”

“I’ll start digging t’marra,” Brur promised.

“Do you wish assistance?” Elrond offered. He and Lord Celeborn looked rather eager.

“If I do, I’ll stick th’ pair a’ yeh in me open stacks. No way on all Arda yer gettin’ t’ dig through me office.”

Celeborn and Elrond exchanged glances and shrugged; they had tried.

The sitting room door to the receiving room burst open and there stood Mister Wandi, resplendent in white robes and carrying Mellon, tucked under his left arm. Ori raised his eyebrows. Mellon was considerably larger and fatter than the last time he had see the dog of Dale.

“Your majesties King Thorin and King Bard, I do humbly apologize for being so dilatory coming to this event. Mistress Annis was undecided and Mellon sluggish with his biscotti.”

“Do come in, Mister Wandi,” Thorin invited, hiding a smile. “We are at council and would appreciate your reticence in discussing anything spoken of here.”

“Oh, of course,” Mister Wandi said eagerly and thanked Bilbo for the cup of tea he was handed.

“Of whom do we speak?”

“Dead people,” Fili answered dryly.

Mister Wandi’s face fell and he put Mellon on his paws.

“Oh. How dull…I mean, I am not intimately acquainted with any dead.”

“If you were, I would have brought a deal more potions than I did,” Cemnesta chimed in. Mister Wandi gaped at his brother then gave a delighted shriek, worthy of Dori, and pounced. Loli was near enough to seize the teacup mid-air without spilling a drop. Mellon made shrill yaps and waddled after his master.

Mister Wandi crushed King-to-be Cemnesta, then sharply shoved him away, gripping his shoulders, and running a critical eye over the younger elf.

“You won’t do as king of the woodland like this,” cried Wandi. “You’re far too skinny and these robes are completely second age and your hair, brother!” Wandi shuddered dramatically.

“I’m the same size and weight as Ada,” protested Cemnesta. “We have the same hair.”

“Mine is shiny and full of life,” snapped Wandi, pausing to tossed the extremely shiny tresses over his shoulder.

“I meant Ada.” Cemnesta argued.

“Exactly! In that gray, you look like a skeleton in the wind. I think a little feathering and some new slender braids, behind the ears. I just had a set of summer leaves made with green net cloth and painted with gold dust.”

Wandi turned as Mellon started to bark in earnest. Mellon barked fiercely at Sugar, Butter and Romy, who sat before the door, looking down curiously at Mellon. Mellon, Ori thought, was the size of an extremely plump sausage. He hoped Thorin would do something before Mellon suffered the fate of sausage.

Thorin swept over, scooped up a surprised Mellon and patted his head. He presented the yapping dog of Dale to Sugar. Sugar sniffed Mellon over then licked Mellon’s entire face in one swipe. Mellon stopped barking. Thorin repeated this with each warg, then put Mellon down. Thorin returned to his seat while Mellon stood undecided whether to yap anymore. Romy bent down in a playful crouch. Mellon barked. Romy leapt over Mellon’s head and stuck his large nose into Mellon’s butt, saying, ‘hello’. Mellon yipped. Ori winced, Romy’s nose was undoubtedly cold and wet.

Mellon barked at Sugar again. Sugar snorted and walked over to Thorin and flung herself at his feet. Butter cocked her head at Mellon then followed Sugar to sit near Frodo and Wee Sam at the fireplace in expectation of whatever was on their plates.
Mellon barked at Romy. Romy barked back. Mellon cocked his head at Romy. Romy turned three times around Mellon then sat on him. Mellon wiggled then twisted to look up at Romy’s huge face, panting gently, watching him. Mellon licked Romy’s nose and settled down for a nap under his new warm, if very heavy, blanket.

Now resupplied with his cooling tea and a plate of candied fruit and six xocolātl cookies, Wandi settled on the arm of the sofa near his ada, who was looking put out. Wandi peered down at Master Kir, who lifted a stray lock to glower at the elf with one eye.

“You are a worker in mithril,” Wandi announced. “You cannot work like that. Come to my salon tomorrow and I’ll fix it for you.”

Master Minta snickered.

“Cut it, laddie, an’ I’ll bit yer fingers off at yer toes,” Kir warned.

“Don’t be silly,” cooed Wandi, balancing his plate on his knee, so he could flap his hand expressively.

Wandi looked up and met his ada’s eye.

“I do not look like a skeleton,” Thranduil stated coldly.

“Of course, you don’t,” Bard comforted. “You’ve plenty of muscle. You’re long and lean by the standard of men.”

“Thank you,” Thranduil’s annoyance cooled a little.

“Who are we talking about?” Wandi wanted to know.

“Durin the Deathless’ wife.” Balin informed him.

“Before even Ada’s time,” Wandi stated and shoved another cookie into his face.

“What dwarf king did you hear anything about?” Kili prodded.

Wandi considered a moment.

“I remember nana speaking of Nain II. He was born with a horn in the middle of his forehead. They cut it off but you could see the bump.”

“He did not have a horn!” shouted Brur. “It was a wen!”

“I heard tha’, too,” Kir put in.

“It was all rubbish,” snapped Minta. “He was born with his hair twisted in a knot on top of his head.”

“Nana said-” Wandi started, Cemnesta laid a hand on his brother’s arm.

“It doesn’t matter whether he had a horn or a wen, a dozen horns or wens, or no horns or wens at all. Do you remember her saying anything else?”

Ori glanced at Thorin, who was sitting with Bilbo in a wide chair. Thorin was frowning with a hand over his mouth. Ori knew he was desperately trying not to laugh. Ori smothered a grin himself and snuggled closer to Dwalin.

Wandi frowned then,

“I remember her telling me that the only thing more precious to dwarrow than gems and gold was their history. She said that Celebrimbor and Narvi wove their magics together and placed sigils within the walls of the great library of Khazad-dûm which was why Durin’s Bane could not breech it nor the Watcher in the Water could destroy the door they made together.”

Ori’s mouth was in gear before he could process the thoughts he had at this news.

“Was Narvi a Bearer?”

Everyone in the room turned and looked at him. Ori looked at Dori who’s eyes were wide.

“Why do you ask that, pet?”

Ori shifted in his seat, not particularly liking the fact that this time he wasn’t the scribe but Brur, Balin, Loli and Arne were taking notes. Bujını and Omi were sketching.

“Well, Lady Galadriel told you that the touch of a Bearer is purifying. Maybe Narvi did some sort of purifying magic in the sigils.”

Most people shrugged and nodded except for Thranduil, Celeborn and Elrond, who looked shocked to the core and Galadriel, who looked as though she was trying not to giggle.

Dori did giggle.

“Pet, that would be suggesting that Narvi and Celebrimbor were lovers.”
“That’s annoying,” Kili commented. “I thought Tauriel and I were first.”

“So did I,” said Tauriel.

“Publicly, you are,” Dis comforted.

Ori looked at Lady Galadriel.

“Was Narvi a Bearer?”

The Lady shook her head.

“Celebrimbor was an elf male and Narvi was a dwarrowdam. I knew them quite well.”

“Were they lovers?” Ori asked. She slewed her gaze over to him but remained silent.

Ori sighed,

“If they were, I suppose, since it was so shocking back then and even now, you either discovered it or they told you and you promised not to tell.”

“She did promise!” Mahal’s hot boom assured him. Galadriel narrowed her eyes, staring into Ori’s. Ori heard Mahal chuckling then Galadriel’s voice sounded in his head.

“Am I now released from my promise?”

“Aye, lassie, yeh are.”

“Only one person in my head at one time,” Ori all but shrieked, uselessly clapping his hands over his ears.

“Fuckin’ eh!” Dwalin snarled, clenching Ori closer. “Th’ pair a’ yeh leave me husband alone!”

“Have you ever had people in your head?” Mister Wandi asked, excitedly.

“No,” Ori muttered. “Just Mahal usually. A couple of times it wasn’t, it was…. ” Ori pondered the other voice a moment. Someone who was close to Mahal yet wasn’t Yavanna nor any other of their sort.

“I wonder if that other voice is a dwarf, then,” he pondered aloud. “Someone dead, but close to Mahal.”

“Mebbe it’s tha’ Floviq wantin’ his secrets discovered,” Brur suggested.

“That would make sense,” Elrond agreed.

“The main point is why now?” Thorin put in. He looked about his expanded ‘council’. “Does anyone have anything else they remember that could help?”

There were head shakes and pensive looks all around.

“Master Brur, if you would fetch out the papers you spoke of earlier and bring them back in time for dinner and leave the ones from the chest here for Celeborn and Elrond to look over. We shall reconvene after dinner. This council meeting is in recess. I thank you all for your assistance.”

Brur vanished out, the younger set rose and went to the sadly depleted tea table to clear away. The elves, Bard and Thorin went to the other table to go over the papers Brur had grudging left in their care. Balin and Dori withdrew to the small Fundin library to look for something. Galadriel and Dis followed them. Oin seized Cemnesta and dragged him off, Bujni close on their heels, to visit Oin’s ‘lab’.

Ori turned over and hugged Dwalin. He sighed, he always felt so much better when Dwalin’s arms were wrapped tightly about him. They sat in silence for a while.

“I wish I knew where this is all going,” Ori finally murmured. “At the same time, I’m afraid to ask. It all seems to hinge on Thorin’s question of ‘why now?’”

Dwalin tightened his arms.

“Sorry, love, I’m at th’ point’ where I don’ bloody care, as long as folk, divine ‘r otherwise, stop worryin’ yeh.”

Ori smiled against his husband’s chest, then chuckled.

“What’s go’ yeh laughin’ then?”

“The fact that when you say things like that I feel safe and happy again and it doesn’t seem so frightening.”

Dwalin raised his chin with a finger and kissed him.

“Then I’m doin’ me job righ’.”

Dori came back through.
“Well, how fortunate my Balin has the old maps from Khazad-dûm along with a few others from around Arda from before the time of Nali.

“I have th’ mos’ recent as well,” said Bain. “I want t’ see if they rearranged anythin’ important while they were cuttin’ down th’ family tree.”

A shimmer went through Ori.

“May I see them?”

Dwalin chuckled and released him with another kiss. Dori raised an eyebrow and turned as Balin came through his arms full of scrolls. He carried them to the table where the other group was sifting through the ancient paper with great care. Bilbo with Arne, Loli, and Omi helped by translating for them.

Galadriel breezed in and seated herself beside her husband.

Ori crowded near, peering over Balin’s shoulder. Many of the maps showed old mine tunnel layouts, others showed plans for expansions throughout the area. He took up one scroll and looked at it. It was not the layout Khazad-dûm, but the outside of it. He frowned.

“What have you found?” Galadriel asked.

Ori put the map down in front of her.

“I know these are the Misty Mountains, but…”

“That is my home, Lothlórien. To the west, is the southern point of the Greenwood and further west within the Greenwood is abandoned orc fortress, Dol Guldor. South of Lothlórien was the old line of the ancient forest of Fangorn.”

“The old line? What’s happening in Fangorn?” Ori asked.

“Trees grow and have saplings. Fangorn grows toward Lórien.”

Ori cocked a look at Galadriel, she smiled enigmatically.

“Have I read much of Fangorn,” he murmured as the younger set came bouncing back in the room. “I have read that in Fangorn live the…er…”

Ori saw that Celeborn was paying attention to their conversation. He found a phrase that might do.

“In Fangorn dwells the Bane of Kili?”

The two elves giggled.

“Yes,” Celeborn said, low. “The trees have spread, the …er…Bane of Kili has been seen among the trees of Lórien and wandering the River Silverlode to Mirromere.”

“Mirromere,” repeated Ori. “Where Durin saw the Seven Stars reflected. How beautiful that must have been.”

“It still is,” Celeborn told him with a smile. “Perhaps when Bearer Dori comes to visit us in the spring, you will come among us and see it for yourself.”

“It seems odd to be speaking of spring in the summer,” Ori said idly. “If things are, well, calm by then I would love to come along.”

“Indeed,” Galadriel put in, “then we can all travel together to ‘holiday’ at the Inn by the Lake.”

Ori chuckled.

“I’d place your order for bathing costumes with Dipfa soon, then.”

“I want a pink one,” Galadriel said in a decided tone. “I shall try very hard to be fatter by then.”

“Will all the onions be ready all of a sudden?” Ori asked saucily.

Galadriel giggled and nudged his arm with her elbow.

“Must I wear pink to match?” Celeborn teased.

“You shall be in burgundy,” Galadriel murmured primly. “Then we shall throw one another into relief.”

Master Brur barged in, hauling a large basket on little wheels. It was filled with scrolls, piles of loose papers and books.

Oin and his party returned through their door in the sitting room. Oin looked terribly pleased and Cemnesta somewhat shaken. Bujni was busily recording whatever had happened.

Mistress Dazla came in and Dori told them all they had to have dinner before returning to their
The table in the breakfast parlor was expanded once more and everyone tucked into a roasted haunch of venison, roasted root vegetables, buttered noodles and white mushrooms with parsley sauce.

The conversation was mostly about when they would all go to holiday at the inn and what clothing ought to be packed before talk turned back to the maps and the lands around Khazad-dûm in relation to the papers Brur brought.

“I confess,” said Celeborn, “I was hoping the maps and papers would jog any memories, but it seems there aren’t any memories to jog.”

Thranduil snorted into his napkin. Celeborn turned and wrinkled his nose at his cousin.

Ori listened again as Galadriel and Celeborn spoke of how Fangorn had spread to Lórien and towards the Misty Mountains along the banks of the Nimrodel and Silverlode.

Thranduil assured the Lórien pair that his people had routed all the orcs out of Dol Guldor. It was nothing but an empty shell now and the forest would take it again over time.

Ori looked over at Elrond.

“Lord Elrond, Were you ever in Khazad-dum? If you were, do you remember anything about the library or the catalog Master Brur mentioned, that might have something about the Flower of Durin?”

“Now that I think on it, I visited several times, though the last time was extremely uncomfortable and it was obvious the librarian couldn’t wait to get rid of me. In fact… I remember thinking there were quite a few empty shelves.”

“When was this?”

“After Nain I. I don’t remember coming across anything about the Flower of Durin, but I am not as old as Galadriel or even as old as Thranduil.”

“But the shelves had been fuller?”

“Yes.” Elrond looked at Celeborn. “You were on that visit. What was missing?”

“Nosey elf,” muttered Brur.

“Besides every book on gold working I’d ever seen there?” Celeborn mused. “I believe there was much rearranging of materials. I went to look for a particular book of stories and found myself confronted with eight hundred years worth of minutes from weavers’ guild meetings. Not as compelling as you might think.”

Thorin and Bilbo exchanged glances.

Bilbo said, “Hobbits keep their history in their clothing. From what I’ve seen, dwarrow do as well.”

“We’ll have to keep that in mind,” said Thorin, “should we ever run across weavers’ guild minutes.”

“King Thranduil,” Kili started.

“What?” Thranduil raised his eyes to the young dwarf. “I’m not Uncle Elf anymore?”

“Uncle What?” Cemnesta cried.

“Uncle Elf,” said Fili. “Your cousin Celeborn is ‘Uncle Other Elf’.”

“And as I am used to being addressed as Uncle Elf, it’s too late to change it now.” He glared at Kili. “You wound me, your highness.”

There were giggles all around, then,

“Uncle Elf?”

“Yes?”

“Would it be …er… helpful to write to your uh… your sons’ mother?”

Cemnesta, Wandi, and Legolas all bushed. Thranduil looked rather amused.

“Unfortunately, no,” Thranduil replied. “I’m sorry to say Lady Elerrian of the Noldor didn’t think too highly of your people.”

“Sorry,” Legolas put in.

“Why?” Ori asked.

Thranduil rearranged his expression slightly.
“She was afraid of dwarrow,” “Afraid?” Dori demanded.
“Yes, she always thought your people were going to bite her.”
Margr piped up, “Here! Only if she asked nice!”
Dessert consisted of warm raspberry upside-down cake, and sweetened cream. After this they returned to the table in the sitting room to further research the mystery of the Flower. Ori sat with Galadriel once more.
“So the er…you-know-what’s are along the Silverlode river?”
Galadriel giggled.
“Yes, the men from Rohan and the Brown lands refer to it as Birnam wood.”
“Why?” Ori asked. “You’d think they’d just think it was part of Lórien?”
“Different trees,” Celeborn said. The trees of Lórien and Fangorn are different sorts, thus in the eyes of men, a different forest.”
Ori supposed this made a strange sort of sense.
“Mm. Dunland,” said Bilbo, pointing to an area west of the Misty Mountains. “That’s where the Fallohides dwelt a while before traveling north, crossing the Greyflood and up the Greenway, crossing the Brandywine to where the Shire was founded.”
“Who are the Fallohides?” Kili asked. He threw a suspicious look. “They aren’t ents, are they?” Bilbo laughed.
“No, my dear boy, they were certainly not ents. They were the hobbits who became the Took Clan, which is my mother’s family.”
“Are they nice?” Omi asked.
“They’re nuts,” said Bilbo. “They’re mad as mice. Still, they’ve held it together this long, so they’re either doing something right, or just very, very lucky.”
Kili grinned.
“Which side of your family do you take after, Uncle Bilbo?”
“I like to leave people guessing,” said Bilbo, with a mischievous twitch of his nose. “If you’ll excuse me, I think it’s time to head back to Bag End East.”
“Aw!” Frodo cried, from where he and Sam sat in the corner, playing with the kittens. Thorin raised an eyebrow at Frodo.
“Now then?”
Frodo jumped up and said, “C’mon, Sam.”
They ran off toward the door to the passage home, Butter supervising, but Frodo did throw over his shoulder, “Night, everyone! Uncle Bilbo, you promised us a story!”
Bilbo looked up at Thorin.
“You’d best help me face down the savage bed-time beasts. There’s only so much one hobbit can do.”
Thorin turned to the company as he scooped up the basket of Sugar’s pups.
“We’ll be back soon. Or, soon enough. I hope.”
Ori went through the catalogue of books from Khazad-dûm which had made their way to Erebor.
Dwalin rose, picked him up and placed him back in the seat, kissing Ori’s head.
“Be back soon, love. Got some business t’ take care’ve.”
“All right,” said Ori vaguely, scratching notes with a graphite wand.
When he looked up again, Thorin was returning to the table, but the company had thinned out considerably. By the bell toll he realized he’d been deep in study for at least an hour. Dwalin had not returned.
He stretched and looked around.
“Has anyone seen my husband?”
“I believe he’s in the kitchen, Lord Ori.” said Mistress Dazla, bringing in fresh teapots.
He went to the kitchen and looked in to find his husband in the far corner, deep in conversation with Bilbo. Though he couldn’t hear what they were saying, it was obviously something quite important, intense even. He backed out, congratulating himself for not eavesdropping for once.
Even if not knowing what they were saying would kill him.
Dreams, Dreaming, and Durins

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. After all that food and talk we need to have a good solid sleep….Wishful thinking with the Durins, as you know. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same darrow time, same darrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

All the reading and discussions ended around midnight. Ori, exhausted, flopped into bed and was asleep instantly.

Ori dreamed he saw Mahal enthroned, or whatever passed for His throne; truthfully it looked like a leather upholstered couch, much safer than cloth for someone apt to be toting sharp objects. A great rough chunk of rock crystal sat on an ornate base before Him, and Mahal gazed into it.

Some stirring in the crystal caught both their attentions.

Mahal frowned at it and the stirring defined into a moving image.

It was an image of Dwalin outside in the meadow under the full moon, lighting incense and bearing what looked like…

Uh oh, thought Ori, is he doing what I think he’s doing?

Mahal’s eyes widened.

“By me own hairy arse! No, laddie, don’t do it!”

Dwalin was offering flowers and it wasn’t to the Smith.

“Mahal!” came a feminine cry of outrage.

“Oh, shit,” Mahal hissed.

And there was Yavanna, and was She angry.

Mahal tried for a conciliatory smile.

“Yes, me petal?”

“Don’t you ‘petal’ me, you gopher’s rear end. What are you doing to Ori?”

“Nothin’ he can’t handle, me darlin’.”

Yavanna, dressed only in flowers, looked like a gigantic hobbit version of Queen Hild. She glared over Mahal with Her arms crossed, and the green fronds and vines of Her hair tossed dangerously, as if by an invisible gale.

“We’ll see.” She gestured off to Her right with Her chin, and Ori realized, She was indicating him. “And so will he.”
“Yeh didn’t!” Mahal protested. “Aw, fuck.”
Neatly caught out, Ori could only offer a weak apologetic smile and a force out a chirpy, “Hullo.”
Then he was awake in his own bed. With a groan, he sat up and craned to look out the window, where Dwalin had apparently finished his petition and was walking back toward the house.

Ori grinned.
He arranged himself cross-legged, facing the door and, soon enough, Dwalin came through it, opening and closing the door quietly before turning and freezing as he realized his husband was awake.

“Er… Ori, love… wa’re yeh…”
“You’ve been invoking Yavanna,” Ori accused with a grin.
Dwalin sighed, and, shucking his clothes, crawled into bed. He crawled right at Ori and into him and Ori went down with a squawk as Dwalin pounced and kissed him.

Dwalin drew back.
“Hope yeh don’t mind too much. We’re all worried about yeh.”
“So Yavanna said. How did you know which flowers?”
“Lily o’ th’ Valley. Tha’ was our Bilbo. D’yeh know how hard it is to get a hobbit t’ swear t’ secrecy over somethin’ this juicy?”
“My poor buffalo. You must be exhausted.”
“Actually, I feel rather chipper a’ th’ mo. Must’ve been th’ flowers.”
“What did they mean?” Ori asked, as Dwalin kissed his neck and proceeded lower.
“Return a’ happiness.”
“Really?” Ori giggled.
“Aye… mmmmm, yer belly’s gettin’ nice an furry.”
“I thought this was supposed to put hair on my chest. I suppose that would mean I had a chest to put hair on.”
“Yer plenty enough fer me.”
Ori gasped and writhed and giggled all at once as Dwalin darted the tip of his tongue into Ori’s navel.

“Dwalin!”
“Yeh don’ like it?”
“I do like it! A lot! It really tickles!”
Dwalin chuckled evilly, and nipped Ori’s skin in a little line unerringly south.
In the throes of passion, Ori had a horrible thought.
“Dwalin! Dwalin! Wait!”
“What?” Dwalin asked, pulling back a little, looking dazed.
“What if they’re watching?”
“Who?”
“Them!” Ori waved his hand out into the ether.
“Let ‘em watch,” said Dwalin. “We’ll give ‘em an eyeful.”
Dwalin returned to the task at hand, but Ori shot a warning eyeful at the ceiling.
And he thought the worst he had to worry about was Nori!

Later that night, Ori had a very different dream.
At least he thought it was a dream. He was sitting up in bed again, but this time there was a large dwarf perched at the foot, regarding him with amusement. Ori supposed he should be afraid, or at least angry, but he felt only calm. A glance told him Dwalin was still fast asleep.

He looked back at the dwarf, whose eyes were unmistakable and profile terribly familiar.
“Er… may I help you?”
“Brur ain’t goin’ t’ find wha’ yer lookin’ f’r,” the dwarf rumbled. Ori recognized his voice immediately. This was the one close to Mahal. “Yeh want th’ box with th’ flower. It’s in an empty crypt in th’ chamber a’ Mazarbul.”
“Where exactly is - “ “Khazad-dûm, o’course. Yeh’ll need help. An’ a crowbar.”
“Th’ Flower of Durin.”
“Aye, th’ Flower a’ Durin.”
“I see.”
“Yeh want t’ go soon. Th’ orcs’re in disarray since Mordor fell, slaughterin’ each other f’r th’ right t’ rule. It’s no’ safe, but it’ll never be safer.”
“Oh, um, alright. I beg your pardon, but are you a Durin?”
The dwarf laughed.
“Aye.”
“You’re Durin the Deathless, aren’t you.”
“Aye.”
“I was afraid you’d say that. Are you suggesting I do this, or ordering me to do it?”
“I’m no’ Mahal. I can’t order yeh t’ do much a’ anythin’. I’d say I very much wish yeh’d go. Th’ flower shouldn’ stay hidden any longer.”
“Dori is going to murder me.”
“If he does, I’ll have a nice ale waitin’ f’r yeh.”
“Thank you. Any particular crypt?”
“Aye, it’s listed as third assistant librarian, Floviq son o’ Druviq.”
“In the crypt of third assistant librarian, Floviq son o’ Druviq in the Chamber of Mazarbul in Khazad-dûm,” Ori repeated and reached for his notebook and scribbled this information down.
“Busy for a third assistant librarian. Um… is he still using that crypt himself?”
“Nah, Floviq go’ et by th’ Balrog. Nowt t’ bury.”
“Anything else?” Ori inquired, rather politely, he thought.
“Tell Thorin t’ marry tha’ hobbit.”
Ori stared, then,
“Go find something in a crypt in Khazad-dûm or tell the king to get married. You know either one might get me killed. Which is more important to you?”
The legendary king laughed and shook his head.
“Khazad-dûm, laddie.”
“I will do my best, sir…er…sire.”
“I’m no goat, laddie, though I may look an’ act like one.”
Ori turned to put his notebook back on the side table and said,
“I.”
But Durin was gone.

Ori woke and looked around. The fire was low, Dwalin snored beside him and everything was as it should be. It was just a dream then, his shoulders dropped in relief. He glanced to the beside table. His notebook lay open. In his own handwriting, he read the words.

Wishes of Durin the Deathless
1/. - Go to Khazad-dûm to the chamber of Mazarbul, in the crypt listed as 3rd assistant librarian, Floviq son of Druviq. There lies the Flower of Durin.
2/. - Tell Thorin to marry Bilbo.

Ori knew he was not going to sleep after that.
He went to the kitchen and got down a large teapot and started the dry ingredients for Dori’s scones. Then it was still the middle of the night, so he made a cake. But it was still early, so he sliced the cake into three rounds, made a filling of plum preserves and then drizzled the whole thing with honey. The sun was making the faintest glow on the horizon, so he fried rashers of bacon and made another pot of tea. He made more scones, three varieties, and as he was popping them into the oven, Dori appeared.
“What are you doing up so early, pet? Are you ill?”
“No, but I’ve now had three pots of tea and I can’t stop moving.”
“What is the matter?”
Ori sighed.
“Let me go use the privy - again - I really need to wait until everyone is here to tell you.”
Dori seized him.
“Have you grown different ‘bits’ since you’ve been married to Dwalin? Do you think you’re pregnant?”
“No!”
Dori released him with a raised eyebrow and Ori fled to answer the demand of his bladder.
Feeling relieved, Ori washed his face and hands in the sink, then looked at himself in the mirror.
He took time to brush off all the flour that had attached itself to him. When he glanced up at the mirror again, Durin the Deathless winked at him from the glass. Ori yelped and the door burst open.
“Yeh alrigh’, love?” Dwalin demanded, standing half dressed in the doorway.
“I’m fine, sort of, I need to…Why are you awake?”
“Dori. Sent Nuisance off to get everyone up, too.”
Ori groaned, crossed to his husband, and flopped against him.
“I had another dream last night.”
“I’ll fuckin’ kill ‘im,” Dwalin growled, tucking Ori closer to him.
Ori looked up.
“I’ll figure somethin’ ou’!”
Ori thought for an instant his heart would burst. He loved his Dwalin so much! He wrapped his arms around his husband and squeezed as hard as he could. Dwalin chuckled into his hair.
“Aye, bu’ yeh’ve go’ a grip, love.”
They lingered a few more minutes, then Ori heard an array of voices. Dori and Nori between them had raised the entire household including their guests. Ori groaned.
“I’ll go get my notebook.”

When Ori and Dwalin entered the breakfast parlor, everyone was there. Only Frodo and Sam were eating. The adults looked at him. Ori noticed his and Dwalin’s usual seats were empty. He let Dwalin steer him to his chair and sat down.
Dori served and everyone began eating but the conversation was nonexistent. Halfway through his food, Thorin looked up.
“What’s happened, Ori?” he asked gently.
“Durin was here last night.”
“Ooo, a dead one?” Wandi wanted to know.
“A Durin?” inquired Elrond.
Thorin appeared to consider and finally settled on, “Which one?”
“The deathless one,” Ori answered. Now that they were actually talking about it and Dwalin was beside him he didn’t feel so agitated. Everyone else was amazed and excited.
“Durin the Deathless was here in this breakfast room?” Kili cried
“What was he eating?” Gimli wanted to know.
“Durin the Deathless was using my kitchen?!” Dori looked outraged.
“No, he was on our bed, Dwalin’s and mine.”
“He was in bed with us?” Dwalin yelped.
“No, he was sitting on the end.”
“An’ a good thing, I’d’a thought he was a prowler an’ kicked his arse.”
“It’s an awfully big arse, Dwalin.”
“I’ve kicked bigger. Trolls have bigger.”
“Maybe,” said Ori, shaking his head in disbelief, “but none so… formidable.”
“Why was Durin the Deathless on your bed?” Sigrid asked, then grinned. “Was he trying to borrow your copy of Queen Kivi’s book?”
“Oi!” shouted Nori as Dori squawked,
“Where did you get a copy of that book, Ori?”
“Dori,” Ori blushed but couldn’t believe he was being grilled about his sex life at this moment.
“What does it matter?”
Dori sniffed, but still offered,
“I was planing on gifting my copy to you on your wedding day.”
“Bit late for that,” Bofur commented, shoveling more eggs into his mouth.
“Ah,” Balin teased. “I did wonder wha’ happened t’ mine after our night t’gether, m’dear.”
Dori pouted.
“An’ you call me a thief!” Nori was triumphant.
Dwalin growled and kissed the top of Ori’s head.
“Not t’ worry, our Dori. If it were Balin’s, we don’t want it anyway. It’d be all sticky.”
“Only from yeh borrowin’ it, brother.”
“Used Thorin’s,” Dwalin winked at Ori, making him giggle.
“Idad gave me that one,” Fili started, then looked at Thorin and Dwalin then screwed up his face.
“Ew! I’ll never be able to touch it again!”
“I’m not touching it either!” Kili reinforced.
“What’s sticky?” Frodo asked, turning from his serious and deep conversation with wee Sam.
“Nothing, my boy,” said Bilbo. “Would you like another scone?”
“Yes, please!”
“And no feeding it to Butter this time.”
“Awww. But she looks hungry!”
“She’s a warg. She always looks that way. If she eats our food, she’ll never eat her own.”
“She already ate her own. I think the wargs are part hobbit.”
“Ori?”
Ori turned to see his king looking at him.
“Yes?”
“What did King Durin have to say?” Thorin asked.
Bilbo poured Thorin and himself more tea, but his eyes were fixed on Ori.
Ori handed Thorin the notebook, open to the relevant page. Thorin stared at the writing. Bilbo gasped.
“What needs to be done?” asked Lady Galadriel.
“I have to go to Khazad-dûm,” Ori said with tired finality.
Deathless, Doom, and Don’t!

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Heavens to Betsy! Dead Durins, Khazad-dûm and breakfast! Oh my! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Everyone at the table was frozen in horrified silence for a moment, then bedlam broke loose. Thorin cleared his throat and everyone quieted down and looked at the High King of Dwarrow. Thorin raised the notebook at Ori.

“I take it this was the summary of your conversation with King Durin?”

“Yes,” Ori confirmed.

“These are his orders?”

“No. Durin said he couldn’t order me to do it, he isn’t Mahal. He just wishes very much that I’d do it as the Flower shouldn’t stay hidden.”

Thorin glanced down at the page again.

“And the rest?” The king’s eye held a teasing light and Ori couldn’t stop a smile.

“Durin said to tell you. I’ve told you,” said Ori, blinking.

“Hmmm,” Bilbo murmured. “I can’t imagine why Durin would wish that.”

Thorin’s eyes slewed over to his betrothed.

“You’re feeling quite certain you’re going to collect fifty gold off me from our discussion last night.”

Bilbo widened his eyes in shocked disbelief.

“My dear dwarf! I can’t even begin to—”

“Now, you’re positive you’re going to collect,” Thorin interrupted and leaned over to kiss Bilbo’s cheek.

“May we go out to the meadow?” Frodo asked. Bilbo checked the faunts’ plates and cups, and nodded his approval. Thorin lifted Frodo and Sam down and opened the parlor doors. Faunts, wargs, kittens, and Posey went tearing out.

“What did you bet on?” Legolas asked, running his finger around the rim of his plate to catch the last of the butter, making Thranduil lean forward and smack his youngest fawn’s fingers with a spoon.

“Stop it!”

“That,” Thorin replied to Legolas, “is unimportant… for the moment. What is important is how and if we should grant King Durin’s request.”

“If?” Celeborn stared at Thorin. “Durin is your first ancestor! He was the first of your people created by Mahal! He—”

“King Durin is dead,” Thorin stated with the power of the throne of High King in him. “Durin is asking that I allow one of my people to risk his life and the lives of any who follow. Durin is my ancestor, but his fourth incarnation dug too deep and released an ancient evil that is rumored to be under those mountains still. His reason for doing that boiled down to greed. I have seen enough of my people suffer and die because of the greed of the line of Durin. Never again. My peoples’ lives and safety come first.”

Ori sat still. It had never occurred to him that Thorin, of all people, would forbid this. He thought back on what Durin had said. Having accepted Durin’s word as law, he felt a little…a little let down. He was the scribe of Mahal. Durin could not have appeared to him if Mahal didn’t want him to. Durin must have petitioned Mahal for the chance to ask Ori for this. Ori raised his head.

“But, Thorin, how is you marrying Bilbo endangering the kingdom and everyone in it?”

Thorin and Bilbo laughed outright.

“If Bilbo is willing, I have no problem in granting that part of Durin’s wishes.”

Bilbo smiled as Thorin raised the hobbit’s hand to his lips.

“I think I might be persuaded.”

“Of course, you will,” Dori assured everyone.

Thorin looked at Ori again, then his eyes narrowed.

“Ori, what are you thinking?”

Ori shifted ever so slightly nearer to Dwalin.

“I’m thinking that Durin didn’t ask you to do this. He asked me.”

Thorin sat back a little in his chair.

“No!” Binni cried, grasping Oin’s arm in panic. “No, you can’t go to that horrible place!”

“Absolutely not,” said Dori with thunderous finality. “I forbid it.”

Ori shook his head.

“Dori, it’s not your decision to make.”

Dori sputtered and turned to Balin who, looking rather ill, only cast down his eyes apologetically.

The Bearer turned to Dwalin.

“Tell him he can’t go!”

“It’s no’ my decision either, bu’ if he’s goin’, I’m goin’ with him.”

“You’ll come with me?” Ori asked.

“Oh’ course I’m comin’ with yeh. With th’ leave a’ me king.” He cast a hard glance Thorin’s way, then smiled back at Ori. “Always felt bad we ne’er go’ a honeymoon.”

“We had one, at the inn. Besides, this won’t be the most romantic of settings,” said Ori.

“No, but dark.”

Fili opened his mouth.

“No,” said Dis.

Fili closed his mouth.

Elladan and Elrohir didn’t even get as far as opening their mouths.

“No,” said Lindir.

Elrond blinked at his sons, looking rather smug.

Thorin settled back in his chair, his eyes still on Ori. Finally he said,

“We will discuss this later. After breakfast, I have duties in the throne room. No doubt, King Bard and King Thranduil will want to introduce Prince Cemnesta to the people of Dale. We’ll resume after lunch. If that is an agreeable time to you, King Bard?”

Bard and Thranduil exchanged glances and nodded.

Frodo and Sam burst back in.

“Come look!” Frodo cried. “It rained on the other side of the Greenwood and we can see two rainbows!”

Thorin smiled and rose.

“Come, ghivashel. After that news, we can all use something beautiful to look at and consider.”

Bilbo tucked his hand into the crook of Thorin’s elbow and they led the way out to the patio.

Ori was surprise to see that the faunts had not exaggerated. Two beautifully colored arcs curved over the Greenwood. Thranduil and Galadriel were suitably transported with delight and assured Cemnesta it was a sign that augured him an excellent reign. There was much laughter and chatter in admiration, as Ori leaned thankfully back against his husband’s chest.

He glanced over the family and guests to see Balin bow over Dori’s hand and lead him out to the grass into a country dance. They twirled about gracefully in the bright sunshine, making Ori grin.

Dori was so happy and beautiful and Ori’s heart swelled. Dori had finally received everything that Ori had always wanted for his brother-come-parent.

Balin danced Dori up to the patio to a smatter of applause from the gathered company. Dori gave a sudden squeal as Balin unexpectedly whisked Dori up in his arms and pranced off inside the house. The tone of Dori’s giggles told Ori, Dori was being borne off to the bedroom.

People wandered back into the house and Ori turned to Dwalin.
“Do you have some free time at the moment?”
“Aye, c’mon, love, we’ll chat in our room.”

They settled before the fireplace with cushions.
“I’m glad for one thing, you said you’d come with me. I admit I have, at this moment, no idea how I’m going to do this.”

Dwalin considered, frowning at the ceiling. Ori snuggled into his side and Dwalin stroked his hair.
“Organizin’ th’ thin’. Would it help yeh t’ have yer notebook?”

Ori squeaked, bounced up, fetched it back and flopped on his stomach. He quickly divided a page into three columns. Next to the page was Ori’s note from Durin.
“So, we need t’ break this down,” Dwalin decided. “There’s th’ journey t’ Khazad-dûm, th’ actions we need t’ do in there, an’ th’ journey back.”

Ori titled three columns.

“Who’ll go with us?” Dwalin said thoughtfully. “Durin says yeh’ll need help an’ a crowbar. So tha’ means strong backs an’ knowledge o’ stone. There’s th’ danger o’ orcs, so fighters.”

“Yes. It’s a good thing Balin found those old maps of both inside and out. How long does it take to get there?”

“Depends on th’ route.”

The morning slipped away as they worked diligently. They were finally interrupted by a knock at the door. They looked up as Elrond entered.

“What’s t’ do?” Dwalin asked.

“I have been dispatched by the dear Bearer,” Elrond looked amused, “to summon you both to lunch.”

Dwalin chuckled and rose fluidly to his feet, bringing Ori with him.

“Did yeh wake tha’ blot o’ a brother a’ mine?”

Elrond winced dramatically, then shook his head.

“On the contrary, the honored Bearer has been busy preparing our meal. I believe Lord Balin has been assisting your king.”

“Mmm,” Dwalin grunted.

Ori gathered up the papers and they followed the elf lord out and through to the breakfast parlor. Ori went to the kitchen. Dori was swirling about, humming a happy tune, stopping every now and then to kiss Balin, who was leaning against the counter, watching Dori with loving eyes.

Ori frowned. Dori looked like… Was Dori glowing?

“Dori, what’s going on? Are you alright?” Ori asked nervously.

“Of course, pet. Nothing’s wrong at all.”

She gave a mysterious smile which Ori was not buying in the least.

“Dori! What. Is. Wrong?”

“Nothing, pet.” Dori patted his arm. “You’re just going to be an uncle.”

Ori gave out the loudest noise any of them ever heard him make.

Dwalin was there in an instant.

“Wha’ th’ fuck?”

Ori spun around and leapt into his arms.

“Dori’s preggers!”

Dwalin cocked an eyebrow at Balin.

“Bout bloody time.”

Balin bowed low then flicked an obscene gesture at Dwalin.

The four of them returned to the parlor where everyone was seated and looking curiously at them. Dori swept a triumphant gaze around the assembled. Nori glared at Dori, his mouth stuffed full of roll.
“My dearest family,” Dori cooed. Galadriel gave a small squeak and looked eagerly at Dori. Dori took Balin’s hand. “My beloved and I wish to announce—”

“Bloody get on with it!” snapped Nori. “What’re you natterin’ bout, our Dori?” Dori spared a frown at Nori then her glow returned. “Balin and I are going to have a badgerling.”

The noise was phenomenal. Lady Galadriel rushed forward but Bilbo was there first, flinging his arms about Dori. Everyone had to hug Dori and Balin and exclaim and congratulate them.

“Fuckin’ A!” Nori cried. “For real?”

Balin raised a brow. He opened his mouth, but before he could make a sound, Nori gave a holler, and grabbed Balin around the waist, inflicting a truly monumental hug.

“Let me go, yeh maniac!” Balin demanded.

“Nooo!”

Frodo and Sam came in from the meadow with Bujni and Dipfa, and stared at the mob. “Uncle Bilbo, what’s going on?” Frodo wanted to know. People calmed and laughed things over. Bilbo turned and Dori came forward to embrace both faunts.

“You’re going to have another cousin soon, tiny pet.” Frodo considered this, then asked, “When?”

Everyone laughed and Bard ruffled Frodo’s curls, having to lean down to do so. “Practical lad.”

“Congratulations, ma’am,” Wee Sam said solemnly.

“Honored Bearer—” Bujni began.

“I must design your maternity clothing!” Dipfa cried out.

Roäc stuck his head in the room.

“What’s the to-do? You’re inside, you’re outside. A raven can’t keep track!” Thorin smiled at him.

“The Bearer is expecting.”

“Expecting? Oh… Ohhhh! Bearer’s going to have an egg! Congratulations! I hope it fledges well!”

“Er… thank you, dear,” said Dori, as Vi and Margr linked hands and danced around her, singing off-key. “Perhaps you’ll send someone to tell my brother D—”

“And there he goes,” said Thorin, following Roäc’s speedy rise and bank to the north. He leaned in to kiss Dori’s cheek, meanwhile dodging the ebullient sisters. “Congratulations, Dori.”

“Thank you,” said Dori with a twinkle. “I’m sure our Deary will make sure this badger has its very own professional bullies.”

“Already picked ‘em out,” Dwalin assured her.

Mistress Dazla entered.

“Beg pardon, Lady Dori. Luncheon is served.”

Dori said, “Mistress Dazla, please let the household know Lord Balin and I are expecting.”

Mistress Dazla squealed, then slapped her hand over her mouth, turned scarlet, bobbed a curtsey and finally said, “This is the best news, m’lady! Congratulations to you both!”

As they sat about the table, Vi and Margr waxed nostalgic.

“I remember havin’ me own badgers,” said Vi. “I remember havin’ me own badgers,” said Vi. “How many do you have?” Ori asked.

“I’ve two an’ Margr has three.”

Margr reared back, staring at her.

“No, I’ve two, it’s yeh who’s go’ three.”

“No, no, hen, I’d remember if I gave birth three times. Yeh don’ fergit tha’.”

“So, if yeh had two, and I had two… Lessee, there’s me Rogi ‘n wee Milgr, an’ yer Vidin - oy, wha’ a time we had potty trainin’ him. Regular fountain he was. And then Twmi yeh had second.”

“So, who was tha’ wee shit used t’ sit th’ other side a’ Rogi at table?” Vi asked.
“Search me. No! Glorfy, no searchin’ in public!”
Glorfindel withdrew his hand from her waist and pouted.
Ori looked from one sister to the other.
“You really didn’t know how many children you had?”
Vi shrugged.
“They used t’ sleep on th’ floor in a heap. Couldn’t tell whose arms ‘r legs was whose. Really, when there’s badgers underfoot, yeh just feed wha’ever mouth’s open. Like baby birds. Except, more likely t’ bite.”
“Oh, Mahal!” Margr groaned. “Took fer’ever t’ get Rogi off th’ teat.”
Ori thought that explained quite a bit about Rogi.
Vi said, “Well, whoever tha’ badger was, he’s shockin’ rude. No’ a word ‘r nothin’ since…
When, Mar?”
“Can’t recall. I get the feelin’ I should, though. I kin jus’ see his face, wee scrap’ve a thin’ with a face round as th’ moon. Never mind. Some time it’ll come t’ me. Probably in th’ middle a’ th’ night.”
Thorin cleared his throat.
“It’s occurred to me that perhaps we shouldn’t be announcing Dori’s… expectant state until the quest to Khazad-dûm is over. News of the quest itself is likely to upset some people, those who are not as calm as Binni.”
Dwalin mused.
“Aye, our Dori’d make a temptin’ target if someone had the notion.”
Dori sat bolt upright and glared at her king, then the captain.
“I beg your pardon! I’m hardly in danger. I have bullies!”
“Dear,” said Bilbo to Thorin with a wry expression. “Since we’ve seen fit to tell Roäc, I doubt secrecy is an option now. It’s possible that a few orcs living under a boulder somewhere will remain ignorant, but everyone else in Middle Earth will know by nightfall.”
“True,” Thorin said with a sigh. “We’ll put off a formal announcement, though.”
“Yes,” said Dori archly, “it will give me time to knit little armor-plated onesies for the pebble.”
Galadriel said, “Ooo! Blankies!”

After lunch, Ori found himself summoned to the living area of Bag End East, where he found Thorin, standing before the fireplace, glaring and muttering to himself. At Ori’s approach, Thorin looked up and said, “Why would Durin ask you to do this?”
“He said it was for you, that it was important for you.”
Thorin closed his eyes as if in pain and when he opened them again he glared out into the ether.
“Thanks,” he growled.
Durin said to Ori, “Tell ‘im I’m sorry abou’ th’ greed thin’. Tha’ mithril was jus’ so… shiny.”
“Durin says to tell you he’s sorry about the - er - greed thing.”
“Greed thing…” Thorin repeated.
“Tell him: Live an’ learn,” said Durin.
“Really?” Ori asked.
“Go on.”
“He says: Live and learn.”
Thorin looked into the ether and said, “That is a lame arse apology.” To Ori he said, “Even if he’d ordered you, I’d still have trouble sending my beloved kin to their deaths on an errand just for me.”
“I have the impression it wasn’t just for you yourself, but also for you as king.”
“I don’t like this, Ori, but it is your quest. You are a gown dwarf and I can’t tell you not to go.”
“Oh, good. For a moment there, I thought you were going to tell me I had to be exiled until I came back successfully.”
“But if I could do it for you, I would.”
“Thank you, Thorin. I… do you want me to resign as royal scribe?”

“Don’t be ridiculous and don’t thank me until you’re all home safe and sound. You know it can’t just be you and Dwalin, right?”

“Dwalin and I have already begun to plan.”

“That’s for the best. You’re looking for something you might put in your pocket, or it might be large and heavy, and you may know where it is, but you have to get there and get out with it and get it home. If it’s the latter, you’ll need strong arms, someone with impeccable stone sense, someone who can figure and build the proper gear, and you need warriors to watch your back. Dwalin can help you organize it, but you’ll have to lead.”

Ori gulped. He’d been trying not to think about that.

“I’ll have to lead a quest.”

“Yes.”

Ori sighed and then gave Thorin a sparkling look.

“Dipfa will want to make me new clothes. At any rate, she’ll want to make me another hat, and we all know about Dipfa’s hats.”

Thorin shuddered and they both laughed.

“I had something brought up from the armory for you,” said Thorin. “I want you to wear it.”

He drew an object from a box on the side table. Then he turned and offered Ori a shirt of mail. It was obviously very fine, linked by a master armorer and probably weighed more than Ori himself.

Which was why he gasped when he took it and found it weighed almost nothing.

Then he gasped because he realized he held enough mithril to buy the entire Mountain of Erebor.

“Thorin! Where did this come from?”

“I wore it for my investiture as Thrain’s heir. It was the last piece my adad and udad worked on together. I was about fifty.”

“You should keep this for Fili or Kili or Gimli.”

“They won’t fit in it. As is, you’re just small enough. Another stone or so and it would have to wait for Frodo.”

“I…” Ori swallowed. “I’ll take good care of it, I promise.”

“I think the point is for it to take good care of you,” said Thorin. “Promise me you’ll wear it.”

“I promise, Thorin.”

Ori held it up and pulled on the shoulders experimentally. It stretched a bit, which was its saving grace. His arms and shoulders had grown along with the rest of him. He took off his outer tunic and put on the mail, then he looked down at the softly shining metal covering him. It was nice, not like mail at all. His brain went through all the knitting possibilities of mithril yarn. He could make Dwalin a long jumper, and a matching pair of socks.

Thorin crossed to the raven bedecked fireplace and took a bulky envelope from behind the foremost raven. He brought it over and, for a moment, Ori thought Thorin was giving him gold for expenses on the journey. Thorin opened the packet and drew out the small, crystal phial lady Galadriel had given him at his coronation.

“As you recall, Ori,” Thorin said, gravely, “this is the light of Eärendil’s star. I cannot think of a better purpose than it lighting your way through the caverns. Bilbo and I took it down to one a while back. It is extraordinarily powerful. It also seems to have the same light as Bilbo’s sword, Sting, so it will warn you if orcs are coming.”

Ori stared, and managed to nod as Thorin put the phial back in its envelope and handed it to him.

Ori didn’t know what to say. He paused a moment, then flung himself at his king and hugged him. Thorin’s arms were about him and they stayed that way for a moment.

“Oi,” Dwalin’s voice came from the doorway.

“Indeed,” Bilbo agreed in a teasing tone.

Thorin released Ori and turned to his betrothed and brother-at-arms.

“Dwalin, I’m counting on you to bring our Ori back safely. Successfully or not, I don’t care, but he is to return to us, unharmed.”
Dwalin chuckled and came to Ori’s side, kissing the top of Ori’s head. “I’ll see t’ it, even with me las’ breath.”

“No,” Bilbo interrupted. “We shan’t have that sort of talk. How well that mithril shirt becomes you, Ori.”

Dwalin inspected Ori with a soft smile. “Aye, grand lookin’, love.”

“Ori, you said you’ve started preparing?” prompted Thorin.

“Dwalin and I have started our lists,” Ori reported.

“Come, then,” Thorin said, turning with a smile. “The breakfast parlor should be clear. Dwalin, please help Ori remove the mail shirt and put it aside for now along with phial of Galadriel. Ori, would you bring your list and other notes? Amrâlimê, shall you and I collect Balin and his maps?”

They settled at one end of the table. Thorin looked over the lists Ori and Dwalin had worked on, nodding his approval. Balin rolled out his maps of both the outside and inside of Khazad-dûm.

Thorin pondered a moment then turned to Balin. “Would you please find Binni and ask him to join us for a few moments?”

Balin went out and Thorin hurrumphed, then, “I’m asking for Binni as he was among the last to leave. He would know of any changes that may have occurred to the east door above Mirrormere.”

“We’d better take copies of these maps in case that way is blocked,” Ori said thoughtfully.

“Perhaps while she’s here, we should ask Lady Galadriel about the journey.”

Thorin’s eyebrows went up and Ori went on.

“If we can arrange with Cemnesta and Galadriel, we could skirt the open lands and the River Anduin. Thranduil has assured Galadriel that he and his soldiers have cleared the orcs out of Dol-Guldur. If we stayed in the shadow of the Greenwood, we could then cross the open lands hidden from the mountains by Lothlórien. Galadriel speaks of the trees growing along the Silverloade and Nimrodel. Orc scouts have always given Lothlórien a wide berth. If we stay hidden for as long as possible, our chances are better.”

“Aye,” Dwalin agreed. “A small party kin get fra Lothlórien t’ th’ east door under cover a’ nigh’. Once we’re there we can see when an’ how often they change out their guards. Soon as a new watch appears we can pick ‘em off quick. Tha’ll buy us a good chunk a’ time.”

Thorin grunted an affirmative. Ori noticed that Bilbo was filling in for Balin, taking down their discussion. Bilbo glanced up and winked at Ori. Ori grinned.

There was the sound of stamping feet, the parlor door was ajar and a raven’s bill stuck itself through. “Bugger off, Alyne!!” Brur yelled. The librarian entered. Alyne flitted to the table. Eggr and Po remained perched on either of Brur’s shoulders.

“Got more maps wi’ proper measurement’s on ‘em.”

Brur sat down and looked at them.

“Yeh find anything more?” he asked.

Everyone looked at Ori. Ori sighed.

“Master Brur?”

“Aye, laddie?”

“I - I had a dream last night”

“Well, tha’s us bugged then.”

Ori retold his dream of Durin and handed Brur the notebook still open to the relevant page. Brur read it over.

“Well, shit.” he opined. “I suppose this means yeh’ll be needin’ a leave a’ absence?”

“Permanently, if we don’t plan this out right,” said Ori.

Balin entered with Binni, who looked pale beneath his beard, and Kili, Fili, Sigrid and Tauriel followed.

“Oh, Mahal’s hairy arse,” said Kili. “Did someone else die?”
“Not yet,” said Fili. “Idad? Do you need our help?”

“Since this involves you all to some extent or another, you should be here,” Thorin agreed.

Brur pulled out the floor plan of the library.

It was far larger than Ori had imagined. But, of course it was. It was one of the great libraries of the ancient world. It wasn’t a pantry or an airing cupboard.

“Where’s the crypt?” Ori asked.

“It’s in th’ floor,” said Brur. “Old librarians’re usually buried under th’ floor, because tha’ way th’ library don’t f’get their support.”

“In this case,” said Bilbo, “that seems to be quite literal.”

“I guess we’re really going to need that crowbar,” said Ori.

Kili tilted his head.

“Oh, so, the tombs aren’t right there, sticking up from the floor.”

Brur smirked.

“Got it in one, yer highness.”

“Well, think about it. All the tombs in Erebor are above the ground.”

“All the tombs in Erebor aren’t in the library either. What d’yeh think? They sat around th’ tombs, usin’ ‘em f’r tea tables?”

Kili looked offended.

“You can’t eat in the library. It’s against the rules. Maybe they’re, I dunno, study tables?”

Dwalin cuffed him.

“Tha’s enough out a’ yeh f’r now. Say we get this thin’ outa th’ floor. I hope they’re marked right, by th’ way. Diggin’ up th’ wrong librarian? Tha’d jus’ be embarrassin’.”

“Durin said it was marked,” said Ori. “And he described it as a box. I’m more concerned about how we’re getting it out of there. I have no idea how big or small a box it might be, but I don’t think we’re getting it across this bridge. I don’t even know how we’re getting us across it. Thorin? Should we ask Dain for advice? He’s the mechanical genius.”

“He is and we should,” said Thorin. “Just be careful what you ask for.”

Ori had terrible visions of Dain deciding they should cross the chasm via trapeze.

Binni said, “Let us all hope King Dain has a good idea. I recall crossing that bridge. Not much before or after, mind, but the bridge is etched in my memory.”

Ori said, “Would it be alright for you to tell us what it’s like?”

“Too narrow for more than one dwarf at a time, and it’s solid enough at either end, but the middle of the bridge is as big around as Bujni. I swear it was only the will of Mahal keeping it together.”

“Hmph,” commented Dwalin. “Think we should go wi’ th’ notion tha’ th’ bridge’s gone. Nice a’ these mapmakers t’ put in th’ measurements. We’ll need th’ makings of a bridge an’ a solid one a’ th’.”

“I agree,” Ori put in. “Anything that could be ruined will probably be so. That includes doors, I imagine.”

A little voice piped up from under the table, “Bring plenty of rope!”

Ori leaned over and looked beneath the edge of the table cloth, where Frodo and Wee Sam were stuffing their faces with xocolātl biscuits.

“Rope?” Ori asked.

Sam nodded furiously.

“That’s what my gaffer always says. Can’t have enough rope!”

“We’ll take that under advisement,” Ori promised.

Bilbo then stuck his head under the table and said, sternly, “You are neither of you to talk about this to anyone. Am I clear?”

“Yes, Uncle Bilbo.”

“Yes, Mister Bilbo!”

“Or no dessert for either of you until you’re thirty-three and can get your own.”

The faunts gasped in horror.

Thorin also looked under the table.
Perhaps you would like to take your picnic outside for now?"

"All right," said Frodo. He grabbed Sam’s hand and pulled him up. Neither were tall enough to bump their heads on the underside of the table. As they scampered out into the meadow, they heard Frodo say to Sam, “That was a lucky escape! In a minute Idad Thorin would have used ‘the eyebrow’.”

“Jings, Mr. Frodo!”

“The eyebrow?” Balin murmured in an awed fashion. Ori and Bilbo choked on giggles but Dwalin guffawed at Thorin. Thorin raised his eyebrow at his shield brother.

“Never worked on me then, lad, ‘r now.”

“Arse,” Thorin grumped. They returned their attentions to the maps.

Fili and Kili exchanged glances.

“Ori,” Fili said, “have you decided on your company?”

Ori sighed.

“Dwalin and I’ve been talking. We need fighters for any orcs and stonemasons for getting to the box. Everyone will need a mount.”

Kili took Tauriel’s hand and she smiled down at him. He grinned and turned to Ori.

“Tauriel and I volunteer. Wait!” he said as Thorin opened his mouth. “I’ve already spoken to amad. She doesn’t like it much, but gave her consent. Tauriel and I are both fighters and archers. We’re stealthy. We’re good for distance and Tauriel knows all the Greenwood and she’s visited Lórien many times. We can help. I can cook, too. We’ll need to eat. We’re willing, if you’ll have us.”

Ori gaped at the young prince. Thorin sighed and exchanged a look with Dwalin. Dwalin gave a curt nod.

“I don’t like it, either,” Thorin said, “but if you wish to go, you are of age and can make your own decisions. You must accept that Ori is your leader and you will follow his orders. If you would like Kili and Tauriel to accompany you, Ori?”

“Yes,” gasped Ori, “yes, thank you both. I’m sure we’ll need your help!”

“I’ll write up th’ contracts,” Balin said crisply.

Thranduil and Bard came in.

“Have you discovered anything else?” Thranduil asked, seating himself next to Tauriel.

Thorin looked up.

“Thranduil Oropherion, your foster daughter has volunteered to accompany my scribe on this quest.”

Thranduil turned and looked at Tauriel. He said something to her in Quenya. She bowed her head and also spoke. She turned to Ori.

“King Thranduil has requested that I give you my vow of service. I and my bow are yours to command, Lord Ori of Fundin.”

Ori smiled as the warm glow spread through him. He and Dwalin had help.

Dis and Jani came in. Kili rose and went to his mother.

“I must do this, mam.”

Dis clenched him close.

“I know, my little goat, but I still don’t like it.”

Jani scratched the back of her neck then tuned to Ori.

“Yeh said yeh’ll need stone workers. If yeh’ll have me, I’ll go along with yeh.”

“Jani!” cried Dis. Jani grinned and kissed the princess’ cheek.

“Aye, love an’ I’ll keep an eye on tha’ young cosset a’ yers, too.”

There were voices from the sitting room. Elrond and Lindir came in, followed by the sisters and Glorfindel.

Elrond seated himself gracefully.

“Has anything been decided?”

Balin cleared his throat and read back the notes he and Bilbo had taken.

“This is a momentous decision,” Elrond mused.
“And I shall accompany the party to Moria,” Glorfindel stated.
“Aye,” Vi agreed. “Won’t we, love?” This to her sister.
“We will,” Margr nodded. “Gotta make sure our Ori doesn’ go off an’ ge’ himself hurt ‘r nuthin’.”

“Glorfindel?” Elrond asked as Ori tried to get his jaw off the tabletop. Glorfindel gave his lordship a toothy grin.
“There may be a balrog. Can’t have dwarrow going off and meeting one of those.” Ori stared at him, horrified.
“I don’t want you to die again!”
Margr said, “He won’t be dyin’, will ‘e, Vi?”
“No, indeed!” Vi agreed. “We’ll be goin’ along t’ make sure!”

“Now, now, our Ori,” Margr cut him off. “Yeh need folk who kin move stone. What else’ve Vi an’ me spent our whole lives doin’?”

“An’ yeh’ll need stone workers,” Vi pointed out.
“Oh,” said Ori. He turned to Dwalin, who shrugged.
Galadriel came in with the rest of Groinuls, Legolas followed by Master Sadi, Cemnesta and Mr. Wandi. Galadriel seated herself gracefully on Dori’s other side and took her hand. Romy circled several times, waiting until Gimli and Legolas sat to park himself across their boots.

“Who’s goin?” Gimli asked baldly.
Ori said, “Dwalin and I will go, and Lord Glorfindel and Mistresses Vi and Margr, and Jani.”
“Tauriel and I are going, too,” said Kili.
“Then so shall I,” said Legolas. He turned to his ada, who sighed.
“Fine,” Thranduil said. “You’ll give Ori your oath of service as Tauriel has.”
“Happily,” said Legolas. “Lord Ori and his company must be protected.”

“Then I’m goin’, too,” said Gimli. He said this boldly enough, though he looked pleadingly at Gloin and Gridr.
“It’s no’ a pleasure trip, lad,” said Gloin. “Yeh don’t even have yer warrior’s braid yet.”

Gimli appeared to think about this very seriously before he spoke again.

“Then… let this be me test,” said Gimli. “Dwalin’d prob’ly be th’ one t’ test me anyway.”
Gridr and Dwalin exchanged glances, but didn’t look pleased.
“It seems yer t’ have th’ last word on this, Dwalin,” said Gridr. “Yer his fightin’ master. Is he ready?”

Dwalin regarded Gimli critically. To Gimli’s credit, he neither fidgeted nor whined, but held Dwalin’s gaze with complete composure.

“Aye,” said Dwalin. “We’ll see how well yeh follow orders.”
“Yes, Captain Dwalin,” said Gimli. “And thank you.”

“Heh, don’t thank me yet.”

Mistress Dazla entered, looked at the crowd around the table, and said, “Er… Lady Dori, tea will be served in the sitting room.”

“That would be lovely, Mistress Dazla. Thank you.”
They all rose and moved through to the sitting room. Ori’s mouth watered. Mistress Dazla had foreseen that hot food would be welcome and she was probably embarking on feeding up Dori. There was the usual fare of biscuits, scones and cake, but the additions included sausage rolls, fried dough around bacon-wrapped hard boiled eggs, and toast with a tangy mix of sharp cheese, mustard, and egg over it.

They were seated for exactly three seconds when there was a crashing sound of hooves and the door of Bag-End East slammed open. Chopper and Dain, with Sculdis pillion, filled the room.

The wargs shot to their feet, snarling.

“Sit!” Thorin roared. They did so, but remained watchful.
Dain bellowed excitedly as he vaulted off Chopper. Sculdis leapt off, too, as Chopper panted and staggered.
Roäc wobbled through after them, landing gracelessly on Thorin.
“Arsehole maniac fucking dwarf!” Roäc gasped.
Chopper threw himself down on the hearthrug, grunting a perfunctory ‘How’re yeh keepin’?’ to the startled wargs.
Dain hollered exultantly as he darted forward, seized Dori up, chair and all, and capered about the room, singing.
Bilbo wrung his hands.
“But, Dori’s delicate condition!”
Nori refilled Bilbo’s cup.
“Nuffin’ delicate about our Dori.”
Sculdis ran about the room, delightedly hugging everyone.
Cemnesta looked from the capering dwarf to the hearth rug and back. Finally, to Thranduil he said, “That’s a pig.”
Thranduil smirked.
“And Dain.”
“Which is which?”
“Does it matter?”
While Thranduil cackled at his own joke, Bard shook his head at his husband and explained, “The pig, by the fireplace, is Chopper. The loud, scary-looking dwarf is Dain, king of the Iron Hills. He’s the Bearer’s older half brother.”
“And the shrieking dwarrowdam with Fili and Kili each in a headlock?”
“That’s Queen Sculdis, Dain’s wife.”
“Ah,” said Cemnesta. “That explains… well, it doesn’t really go very far to explaining any of this.”
Dain stopped in mid-caper before the still-chortling Thranduil, and gave him a looking over.
“Pig herder,” Thranduil deigned.
“How’re yeh keepin’, our pixie?” Dain said affably, forcing Cemnesta into a most un-elfin princely snort of laughter.
Dori, still in the chair, said, “Oh, Dain, that’s Prince Cemnesta, he’s going to be king of the Greenwood since Thranduil married Bard and has decided to be mortal.”
“See yeh in th’ Halls, then, pixie. I’ll have a nice ale waitin’ f’r yeh.”
Cemnesta snickered, “Better make it a barrel of ale.”
Thranduil shot him a filthy look, Bard seemed to have something in his throat, and Dain roared with delighted laughter.
Sculdis relinquished her hold on the dwarf princes, bounced over, and embraced Cemnesta around the waist.
“Hullo, our dear. Are yeh jus’ arrived then?”
“No, I arrived about a week ago.”
“Lovely!” The Iron Hills queen moved off to greet Bard and Thranduil.
Frodo, torn between excitement and horror, said, “I just realized, I won’t be the youngest any more!”
Kili pulled Frodo closer, arm around his shoulders.
“Just think, you’ll have someone to teach everything I’ve taught you.”
Frodo thought about this and grinned.
“Sam, too?”
“Sam, too,” Kili promised
Thorin turned to Fili.
“Remind me to pebble-proof Erebor.”
“It’ll be years before we need to worry about the dwarving,” said Fili. “I’m talking about Kili.”
Ori turned to Balin with an imitation of Dori’s best withering look.
“At least, Dwalin married me, before we did any of that.”
Dwalin said, “Tha’s right. Fine example yeh are, brother.”
Balin grinned broadly.
“Fuck yerself, brother.”
Ori giggled as Dwalin drew him close and kissed him.
“Guess we know who’re th’ responsible ones in this family,” said Dwalin.
“Oh, aye,” said Balin. “Yeh’re responsible f’r all kinds o’ things.”
“Hear that, Nori!” called Ori, “We’re the responsible ones!”
“Well, that’s us buggered,” said Nori genially.
Dain returned Dori to his place. Sculdis refilled Dori’s plate.
“Tuck in, dearie. Yeh’re eatin’ f’r two now,” she exhorted him with a hearty kiss on the cheek.
Gridr turned to Oin. “And, brother, do try to do a better job than you did with our Gimli.”
“There’s nothing wrong with Gimli,” said Oin. “He still has all his bits. Didn’t do him a lick o’ harm.”
Legolas looked between Oin, who’s face had set like a goat’s, and Gimli, who’s face was the color of his hair.
“What did Oin do to you?” he asked.
“Nothin’!” Gimli growled.
“Nothin’?” Gridr protested.
“I never delivered a baby before!” Oin brayed in protest, glaring at Cemnesta, who looked interested in dwarrow obstetrics.
Gridr said, ‘He was so excited he didn’t even clean Gimli off before he went t’ hand Gimli t’ Gloin an’ he missed! Gimli landed right on his head.”
“He’s perfectly fine!” Oin shouted.
“He’s fine,” said Gridr, “but he cracked a brand new marble floor! I had Mahal’s own time finding a replacement from that same lode!”
Legolas dissolved into laughter and hugged Gimli.
“Aye, go ahead an’ laugh,” said Gimli. “Yer da probably picked yeh off a tree like a nut.”
Bujni leapt up, eyes blazing with the thirst for knowledge.
“Is that how elves come into the world? No wonder there are so many of you! You’re from acorns! How do you know when you’re ready for harvest? Oh, Mahal! I just realized squirrels are carnivorous! King Thorin, we have to kill all the squirrels before they decimate the elves of Mirkwood!”
All the elves stared at Bujni in a kind of fascinated horror, except for Galadriel, who had her napkin clenched to her face with both hands.
Binni stood and patted Bujni’s shoulder.
“Now, lad, sit down and rest yourself.”
Bujni wailed, “All that research ruined! I’ll never fly because I’m not a nut!”
No one at the table dared touch that.
“Oh, pass the sausage rolls,” Bujni cried, throwing himself tragically into his chair.
Plans, Pastries, and Plastered Plenipotentiary

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. It’s a bird! It’s a plane! It’s… okay, not really either of those things. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The tea was finally attended to, once all the excitement died down. Dain rose, mouth full, and with three fried bacon wrapped eggs in one hand, went to the hearth rug. Chopper snored loudly, but the wargs all sat up and watched Dain.
“Cous,” Dain commented at Thorin. “Wargs?”
“Yes,” Thorin replied with nonchalance. “Fine specimens, aren’t they?”
“Fine? These is wild orc animals gussied up like lap dogs.”
Thorin and Dwalin burst out laughing.
“You should have seen them when Ori first brought them here!” Bilbo cried.
Dain turned and stared at Ori. Ori grinned, but felt himself blush.
Dain groped for words, then,
“How in all of Mahal’s bloody arse hairs did yeh manage tha’, our wee scribe?”
Ori thought about reciting the entire tale but settled for brevity.
“Um, I had help. The wargs were dirty and starving, so I bribed them with meat and when we got here, they got baths and more meat. They like us.”
“Aye, or they’d’ve eaten yeh by now.”
Frodo approached and tugged on the side of Dain’s leggings.
“Cousin Dain?”
“Wha’? Oh, there’s me wee hobbit. How’re yeh keepin’?”
“I’m fine. Do you want to meet the wargies?”
“Wargies, eh? An’ yeh want t’ make introductions? Tha’s very polite.”
Frodo grabbed Dain’s hand and pulled him over to the hearth rug.
“And who are all these, then?” Dain demanded, examining the wargs with a grin. “Some o’ Creampot’s litter, by th’ looks.”
“This is Sugar. She’s the pups’ mama.”
“How d’yeh do?” Dain asked civilly.
“And this is Butter. She’s the other amad.”
“Butter an’ Sugar, eh?” Dain shot Thorin a look.
“And this is Romy.”
Romy thumped his tail once on the rug.
“And these are the puppies. Mostly they don’t have names yet, except for this one. He’s called ‘Killer’.”
“That’d be our Dwalin’s pup,” said Dain.
“Yes! How did you know?”
“Lucky guess.”
Dain slowly and carefully offered a hand to Sugar, who after a glance at Thorin, sniffed and licked it, then Dain handed up one of the dough balls, making Sugar wag her tail and gulp the treat down. Dain repeated his actions to Butter, who happily licked his hand right away and earned her tidbit, too. Romy didn’t wait to be offered a hand, he came forward and knocked his head into Dain’s, ready for his snack from this new nice dwarf. This completed, all the wargs appeared to settle. The puppies, of course, went on noisily eating.

“Cuz,” Dain said, “were yeh plannin’ on raisin’ yer own herd o’ oliphaunts?”

“No,” Thorin grinned. “Oliphaunts are Ori’s bailiwick, not mine.”

Everyone stifled laughter as Ori blushed and glared at his king, who regarded him fondly. Cemnesta looked down the table and gazed at Ori, rather confused.

“Ori-?”

“I met an oliphaunt and…and was,” Ori hunted for a good yet vague word.

“I’d never met an oliphaunt before,” Ori explained to the bemused elf. “She was so huge and wonderful and huge and—” Ori realized he was babbling as he always did where Fanny was concerned. “I was overwhelmed.”

“Gheir, he’s the king of the Stiffbeard clan, came to my coronation riding one,” Thorin continued. “She was a rather young one and Gheir really didn’t like her much. It was mutual. Once she met Ori, Gheir was, er…relieved to give her away. Fortunately for Erebor, Jim, known as the Great Woudini, and His Court of Miracles adopted her on Ori’s behalf. Her name, incidentally, is Fanny.”

“Fanny the Oliphaunt,” Cemnesta murmured. “Yes, Ada, you did mention the Court of Miracles in your letter. Nana, Celebrian and I discussed it. We couldn’t understand what you meant.”

Legolas choked on a laugh.

“You read Ada’s letter to Nana?”

Cemnesta favored his youngest brother with a teasing look.

“Of course. Other than Glorfindel being sent back, I am the only one to leave the Undying Lands for Arda since the…the-“ Cemnesta looked at Galadriel.

Galadriel gave an annoyed sniff.

“The bickering over a couple of white gems.” She turned to Thorin. “Some of my people have the most ridiculous passions for white gems.”

Ori gaped at her.

“My lady, are you referring to the wars fought over the Silmarils?”

“Bloody messy business,” Brur commented, helping himself to his seventh sausage roll and politely giving two more to Sadi.

“Yes,” Galadriel shrugged. “Such a huge fuss. Arda has so much to see and explore, but never mind. Such times are in the past and… Cemnesta, you look as quite bereft. What has upset you, dear nephew?”

Cemnesta shifted then raised his eyes to Glorfindel.

“I fear I shall deeply pain Glorfindel with my other news.”

Glorfindel looked up, brows raised. Vi and Margr immediately took his hands and sat ready to comfort their dear Glorfy.

“What is it, my young friend?” Glorfindel asked gently.

Cemnesta sighed.

“I am grieved to tell you that your dear companion Ecthelion never came to Eru’s care. His whereabouts are unknown to us.”

Cemnesta sat horrified as everyone giggled. Glorfindel threw back his head and roared with laughter.

“His fountains held him in healing sleep until, he tells us, about five years ago,” Celeborn explained. “He now travels Arda a with his troupe of balladeers.”

“No,” gasped Cemnesta, eyes alight. “Truly?”

“Aye, our Cemy pet,” Margr cooed. “They’re ‘venturin’ abou’, callin’ themselves Th’ White City Bang Crash!”

“Indeed,” Mr. Wandi assured him, “They are quite the loudest noise in all Arda.”

“They’re brilliant!” shouted Kili and the younger set immediately began singing the praises of the group to Cemnesta, who after a few descriptions began to laugh. This led to everyone retelling the entire tale of Thorin’s coronation to Cemnesta. The younger set cajoled Dain, despite Thorin’s pleadings, to sing ‘Me Zeydis” with their assistance.

Ori could hardly see for the tears of laughter in his eyes. The sight of the elves and men gathered at a dwarven table, helping to sing a barroom song as badly as they could was wonderful. In the back of his mind, he heard Yavanna’s giggle and the pleased grunt of Mahal, who said, “This’s how things oughta be.”

The extremely noisy high tea drew to a close with Cemnesta describing his mother’s and aunt’s gasps and looks of awed horror over the finer points of Thranduil’s letter.

Thorin rose, cleared his throat, and borrowed Bilbo’s handkerchief to wipe his eyes, still streaming with laughter.

“My friends, I apologize, but those interested in Ori’s quest must return to work in the breakfast parlor.”

As it was, everyone present followed Thorin and Ori through and seated themselves. Ori smirked to himself as Mistress Dazla had correctly assumed that this would happen and had provided seating for them all.

Wine and plates of tiny ginger biscuits were set along the middle of the table. Thorin seated himself at the head and Sadi took all Balin’s supplies and settled herself into the role of scribe for the session.

Thorin looked around as all were seated and stated to Sadi,

“We are now reconvened.”

“What’s all this?” Dain asked, chucking his chin at the maps and lists on the table.

“We’re planning a quest,” said Ori.

“I’m in,” said Dain, though he did look over at Sculdis for her nod of approval. “Me diamond?”

“O’ course,” Sculdis agreed. “Our Stonehelm is quite capable. Where’re we goin’?”

Thorin said, “King Durin’s charged Ori with a mission to Khazad-dum.”

“Aye? Ain’t he dead?” Sculdis asked

Ori said, dryly, “It doesn’t seem to make a difference.”

“Well, tha’s Durins for yeh. Goin’ t’ slay some orcs?”

“Only incidentally,” said Ori.

“Absolutely not!” Dori cried. “Ori, you aren’t trained! You will not fight.”

“Dori, I think I may safely promise you I will not fight. I’m leaving that to the professionals.”

Glorfindel grinned, sitting with Vi and Margr one on each knee.

“That’s me!” he announced. “I’m going! Who knows? I might get a chance to slay the balrog!”

“An’ we’ll be helpin’ yeh, our Glory!” Vi hugged her sister in excitement.

“Wait a moment,” said Bilbo. “Ori, are you really going to sneak into an orc-infested ruin with the four loudest people in Middle Earth?”

“Um… yes?” said Ori, fully realizing what had happened.

Bilbo turned to Thorin.

“And you’ve consented to this?”

“I suppose I have.”

“You’re going to be sleeping on the floor with the wargs until they all come back safe and sound.”

Thorin turned to Ori.

“Do what you must, but don’t tarry.” He grinned at Bilbo. “I suppose I shall have company.

Frodo and Sam would love to sleep on the floor with a pack of wargs.”

Bilbo frowned with a smile tugging at his mouth.

“You, my dear dwarf, are not a pack.”

Thorin then got back to the business at hand.

“Ori, what route to Khazad-dûm will you take?”

Ori took a breath,

“Your highness,” he looked at Cemnesta. The king-to-be smiled.

“Of course.”

Ori stared,

“You don’t know what I’m going to say, do you?”
Cemnësta laughed.
“‘No, but I imagine a journey west and a stealthy one, may start under the disguise of a visit to me. A diplomatic visit, of course. Whatever else you need of me, I shall happily aid you.’

‘Th-thank you,’ Ori swallowed then rose and pulled the largest map of Arda closer to him. ‘Very well, we can ‘visit’ you at Erys Lasgalen and, with your permission, travel through the wood, south to the eastern edge opposite Lothlórien. King Thranduil has assured us there are no more orcs or other such dark creatures in Dol-Guldur.’

People leaned forward as Ori traced his finger down and across the map.
“From there,” Ori continued, “under the cover of Lórien, with Lady Galadriel’s and Lord Celeborn’s permission—”

“You shall ‘visit’ us,” Celeborn added and Lady Galadriel said,
“We shall refresh you, replenish any further supplies you may need then conduct you along the River Silverlode in the shelter of the trees. When you move to enter the mountain, I shall join your party.”

She smiled at Ori, who was staring at her in shock.
“With your permission, of course, Lord Ori. And I do render my oath of loyalty.”

“My lady, are you…?” Ori had no words for such an amazing offer.
“I am quite sure.” Her sparkling eyes shone down on him.
“Grand!” Sculdis cried. “What a merry party we shall be,”
“Our Ori,” Dain bellowed, “Who all’s coming’ along f’r this merry party?”

Bilbo made a noise but turned it into a cough. Master Sadi banged her cane on the floor, rose and read loudly from her notes.

“The roster of the Quest of the Company of Lord Ori of Fundin to Khazad-dûm to recover the Flower of Durin as instructed by Durin the Deathless in a prophetic dream of Lord Ori is as follows: Lord Ori of Fundin House, leader of the quest; Captain Dwalin Fundinul warrior, first assistant and advisor to Lord Ori; Prince Kili of the House of Durin, an archer and warrior; Captain Tauriel of the Greenwood, an archer and a warrior; Janifur of the Broadbeams of Erebor, master miner; Gimli Gloinul, axe-wielder, journeyman warrior; Prince Legolas of the Greenwood, archer and warrior; Mistress Vi and Mistress Margr, hand-maidens to the Honorable Bearer of Erebor, stone masons; Lord Glorfindel of Rivendell, warrior; King Dain of the Iron Hills, warrior, master engineer; Queen Sculdis of the Iron Hills, warrior, master stone mason, engineer; Lady Galadriel of Lórien…."

Sadi paused and gave the Elf Lady and inquiring look.
Galadriel gave a charming giggle and said, “Decoration and master busy-body!”
Sadi quirked an eyebrow, then taking her pen made the addition to her roster and continued, “Lady Galadriel of Lórien, decoration and master busy-body.”

There was a cheer and Ori wanted to cheer, too, but now a worry had started. He was glad Dwalin was coming but the idea that he was now responsible for the lives of all these people whom he also loved as family smote him. Any loss was on his head, but the very idea of the loss of anyone nearly froze his heart to his ribs. He instinctively laid his head on his husband’s shoulder for a moment. The feel and scent comforted him, as did the heat of Dwalin’s arm sliding around his shoulders. He took a breath and looked up into Dwalin’s bright hazel eyes. Dwalin gave a nod and Ori rose.
“I-“ he began
“‘You’re welcome,’ Glorfindel said lightly.
Ori felt a flash of anger at what he perceived as dismissal.
“I’m not thanking any of you at the moment,” he snapped.
Eyebrows all round the table went up.
“Firstly, this quest came to me in a dream from Durin the Deathless. The point of this quest is that there is a vital part in dwarrow history that has been removed from all knowledge. It is the knowledge of our beginnings, the Flower of Durin, Durin’s wife, mother of Durin II. She was deliberately erased from all our histories. It is the wish of Durin that I find her history. Durin said that the evidence for her existence is in a box within the crypt of a third assistant librarian, Floviq son of Druvëq in the Chamber of Mazarbul in Khazad-dûm.

“Secondly, Khazad-dûm also called among other people, Moria, the Black Pit, is known to be under the rule of orcs and perhaps a balrog. Durin said that the orcs are in disarray, fighting amongst each other, for dominance. It is not safe, but it will never be safer, thus I must go as soon as possible.

“Thirdly, this is not a badger’s picnic party! None of us may come back alive! We could be maimed or driven mad or all of us could die doing this!” Ori panted as he realized he had been shouting the last parts.

Silence.
Ori looked about and concluded quietly, “This isn’t a joke. This is my quest. I must do it. Dwalin is my husband and has chosen to live or die at my side. Perhaps, many of you might want to rethink your offer to accompany me.”

Ori dashed his hand across his eyes and forced himself to, at least, try and glare around the table. Thorin and Bilbo regarded him with sympathy. Dori was in tears on Balin’s chest. Nori glared at the table top, Bofur’s arm about his shoulders.

Dain rose and came around the table to Ori. Ori prepared himself for a dressing-down, but his eldest half-brother simply caught his neck and pulled his head to rest against Dain’s forehead.

“Me own wee scribe o’ a brother, everyone here knows th’ dangers, an’ we’re goin’ as we love yeh an’ we’re no’ lettin’ yersel’ an’ our Dwalin go it alone. Yeh have all our oaths on this. We’re goin’ t’ follow yeh, be it t’ triumph ’r th’ Halls.”

Ori fought but lost and burst onto tears on his brother’s chest. He sniffed after a moment, feeling Dain’s powerful arms about him and Dwalin’s large, loving hand in his hair. Ori recovered himself, wiped his eyes and looked back at assembled at the table.

“Still comin’.” barked Gimli.

There were agreements and shouts of willingness from everyone listed on the roster. Dain laughed, patted him on the head and returned to his seat. Ori leaned back against Dwalin’s chest and smiled, eyes blurry again.

“Thank you all. As Thorin always says, ‘Loyalty. Honor. A willing heart’. I can ask no more than that.”

“The new moon is in two weeks, Ori,” said Thorin after a long moment. “Can you be ready in that time?”

Ori glanced up at Dwalin.

“We can make it so,” Ori promised. He smiled at Dain. “Brother Dain, I must admit it’s wonderful you’re here as I was about to write to you for your advice.”

“Oh aye?” Dain lit his pipe and grinned.

“Yes,” Ori pointed to the map of the interior of Khazad-dûm around the eastern door. “This bridge. Binni says it is wide enough for one person to cross, but we are going with the idea that it will have been broken by orcs.”

“More’n likely,” Dain agreed.

“Will you set your mind to making something we can bring with us, assemble quickly, and cross safely with what might be something large and heavy?”

Dain snorted and tugged the map over to him. He and Sculdís, who had perched some small round spectacles on her nose, studied the measurements listed.

“Any idea how heavy this ‘box’ is ‘r th’ dimensions?” Sculdís asked, peering over the lenses at him.

“Durin didn’t elaborate,” Ori said. “It could be the size of my thumbnail or the size of this house. But since it’s in a crypt, it has to fit. So, maybe crypt sized?”

“Mmmph,” Dain opined, then, “Cous, any a’ tha’ new lode a’ mithril going a-beggin’?”

“Bofur?” Thorin said.

“Aye,” Bofur agreed. “We got a chunk th’ size a this table loose yesterday. It’s down the main floor a’ th’ forges.”

“O’l’ Master Kir still kickin’?” Sculdís asked.

“We have five mithril master still living, Kir’s one of them.” Thorin turned as Roëc and Quartz flew in.
Roäc landed on the table as Quartz went to Ori’s shoulder and tweaked his ear.
“Ori, I’m hungry. Need a biscuit.”
Ori slewed his gaze to Quartz. He could have sworn the raven was grinning.
“Biscuits aren’t dead-ish,” he teased.
“No,” Quartz said and tugged on a tiny braid in Ori’s sparse beard, “but they are dessert-ish.”
Ori chuckled, broke a biscuit into chunks, and handed them up to the raven, who happily ate them from his fingers.
“News, Roäc?” Thorin asked. The raven snorted and helped himself to a biscuit, then,
“No good gossip. Ori’s quest is going forward?”
“Yes,” Thorin replied. “Roäc, Dain needs Kir, Minta and the other mithril miners’ help, first thing tomorrow morning.”
Roäc turned and cocked an eye at Quartz, who was gulping down the last chunk of biscuit. Roäc croaked at Quartz. Quartz made a huff noise, tweaked Ori’s ear again, and flew off.
“Next?” Roäc sassed. Thorin smirked then turned his attention back to Ori.
“Everyone will need a mount,” Ori said slowly, reading from the list he and Dwalin had written earlier. “We’ll need an estimate of the time it will take us to get to each stage.”
“I can supply your food,” Cemnesta said. “You don’t want people to know you’re carrying supplies like that to visit me.”
Tauriel made a face then said in Sindarin,
“Please, not just piles of lembas! I hate lembas.”
“I love lembas,” Legolas said, aside.
“If only one could coat them with xocolātl,” Mr Wandi mused.
“I promise it won’t just be lembas,” Cemnesta laughed.
“I dunno,” Vi said. “A good bit a roast lamb’s nice now an’ then.”
“Lembas,” Glorfindel explained, “is a kind of elfin way-bread.”
“I ain’t eatin’ elf cram f’r th’ entire time,” grunted Jani.
“I’ll take care of the food,” Kili put in, “I’ve already said I can cook.”
“Guid lad,” Sculdis said, “I’ll give yeh a hand, if yeh need.”
“Aye,” Margr put in, “Me an’ Vi’ll help yeh out, too.”
“Cemnesta,” Thranduil said, suddenly. “There are light tents in the armory, that will also hide the nature of this journey.”
Cemnesta nodded, then turned to Ori.
“I will also offer you an armed escort through the Greenwood, thus you can continue to journey under the guise of visiting Lothlórien.”
“And,” Celeborn added, “we shall have Captain Haldir and his guards escort you and my lady to Mirkormere. This will save your strength until you enter the mountain.”
There was a squawk and a huge pile of black feathers whirled in through the open parlor windows and landed with a disorganized thump in the middle of the table. This slowly unfolded itself into the biggest, fattest raven Ori had ever seen. Along with the usual amount of feathers, more stuck out every which-way. The raven appeared to have landed on its bottom.
Dain glanced up,
“Eh there, me Blu.”
Sculdis reached out as the raven righted itself and waddled over to her with a hoarse croak. She tickled the bird under the chin, making it coo happily at her.
“Blue?” Thranduil demanded. “Your raven’s name is Blue?”
Dain didn’t even look up from the map, saying
“Blu. Shor’ f’r Baluchistan. Wha’s wi’ yeh, Blu?”
“Stonehelm says t’ tell th’ bearer congrats f’r ‘im an’ he’s orderin’ th’ firs’ harvest t’ start t’marra,” Baluchistan grunted in a voice a full octave lower than Roäc’s.
“Guid. When yer up t’ goin’ home, tell th’ lad his mam an’ I’ll be here f’r a couple a weeks, mebbe a month.”
“Oh aye?” Baluchistan inquired. “Sounds intriguin’. Any nosh?”
“Biscuits.” Dain crumbled two in his fist and put the chunks before Baluchistan. Baluchistan eyed the biscuits a moment.
“Any ale?” the bird asked.
“Talk t’ th’ king,” Dain grunted.
“Though’ I was.”
“That king.” Dain looked up and pointed at Thorin, who was trying not to laugh.
Baluchistan looked at Thorin,
“Afternoon, king, any ale?”
“I’ll see,” Bilbo said, rising and heading towards the kitchen, stifling giggles.
Roäc hopped over and whacked Baluchistan with a wing.
“Brother.”
“Ro, me brother, yer lookin’ proper terrible,” Baluchistan said, genially. “Murder on th’ nerves these dwarrow.”
“Paff,” Roäc sneered. “You haven’t got elves and men tinkering about the place.”
“Whats an’ whats?” Baluchistan asked.
“Elves and men.”
“Where?”
“Here.” Roäc flapped his wings at all assembled. Baluchistan turned and looked about the table. He took in Bard and the elves.
“Eeee, so tall. Look like trees wearin’ clothes. Weird.”
Fortunately, Bilbo return with foaming jug, followed by Mistress Dazla bearing a tray of tankards and Larit with a tapped keg. Mistress Dazla, well acquainted with Baluchistan, put down a large saucer before the raven. Eyebrows raised, Bilbo poured an amount into the saucer.
“Come on now,” Baluchistan encouraged. “Don’t stint, luv.”
Roäc looked up at Bilbo.
“Fill it, please, Professor Baggins. My brother can all but drink King Dain under the table.”
Thorin glared at Roäc.
“He’s ‘Professor Baggins’ and I’m whatever you want to call me at the moment?”
“I like him,” Roäc explained.
Thorin stuck out his tongue.
Roäc replied in kind.
Bilbo looked amused, topped up the saucer, and set the jug down near Dain to provide Baluchistan with any refills the raven required.
Those who wanted ale were served and everyone settled back to the matter at hand.
Ori glanced at Baluchistan, who had seated himself once more on his bottom, and was drinking his ale like there was no tomorrow. Ori leaned close to Dwalin and murmured, “The feathers?”
“Gotta double coat,” Dwalin muttered.
Ori examined Baluchistan again. Baluchistan looked like a huge black chicken caught in a wind storm. How flight was possible, Ori didn’t know. He shook all thoughts of Baluchistan from his head and went back to the maps.
“Lady Galadriel, would you and Lord Celeborn give us an estimate as to where the new part of your forest lies?”
Ori pushed the map along and hands slid it down to the elves. Celeborn put down his ale and looked up at Brur. Brur pulled a leather box tied with twine and chucked it toward the elf lord. Celeborn caught it easily and opened the box, gave a noise of approval, and removed a graphite wand. He and his lady poured over the map, murmuring and marking it lightly.
“The new part of the forest has spread over the years,” Celeborn said. “The trees have not surrounded Mirrormere, but it would not surprise me if they did so in succeeding years. The men of Rohan refer to it as Birnam wood.”
“Why?” Bard asked.
Celeborn and Galadriel exchanged glances and smiled.
“Because,” Celeborn said, carefully retaining his composure. “A map maker from Gondor visited Rohan and he noticed it. Thus, as his name was Birnam, it was named for him.”

“Makes sense,” Bard allowed.

Ori still didn’t think much of this. Forests consisted of all kinds of trees, Lórien had its line and Fangorn its own. If Fangorn was spreading, it was still Fangorn. That was something for later.

“If we leave Erebor early,” Ori said, “we should reach Erys Lasgalen by mid afternoon, yes Cemnesta?”

“I will have a ship ready for you.”

“How long do you estimate it will take to travel to the edge opposite to Lothlórien?”

“Ada?” Cemnest looked over at Thranduil.

“Depending on the weather, two to three days.” Thranduil mused.

“Good,” Ori said, glancing needlessly at Sadi, who’s pen streamed across the paper, missing nothing. Ori overcame his need to write things down and went on.

“Lady Galadriel, how long will it take to cross Lothlórien to arrive at Mirrormere?”

“Again,” she smiled, “about two to three days, which includes resupplying your quest.”

Ori looked at Dwalin, who put his elbows on the table, setting down his tankard and wiping his mustache with the back of his hand. Ori felt a fission of admiration. His husband was such a big, capable warrior and his hands, so skillful in wielding any weapon, could hold Ori with strength and gentleness… Ori shook his head, feeling himself blush. He was not going to think like this right now. He faced his husband, who was grinning at him. Dwalin chuckled him under the chin and thudded a blunt forefinger on the map.

“When we ge’ t’ th’ edges near Mirrormere, we’re goin’ t’ have t’ take time t’ see wha’ th’ guard situation is. Once we learn tha’ we can pick off any a’ th’ star’ a’ their watches an’ tha’ll give us a window t’ go in an’ get this done. If yer Haldir, yer leddyship, kin give us any heads up on tha’, we’d appreciate it.”

Galadriel nodded.

“I will speak with him. Haldir has frequently kept a watch over Mirrormere and the eastern mountain side, known to the men of Rohan and the Brown lands as Dunsinane.”

“How long will it take us to get to the door from Mirrormere?” Ori asked.

Dwalin leaned back and pondered.

“At a good sprint, less’n ten minutes. Dain an’ I know where th’ door is an’ how t’ open it. I’m thinking’ we’ll need t’ leave th’ ponies wi’ Celeborn.”

Celeborn nodded, Dain grunted,

“There’s a trick t’ th’ door. I’ll brin’ a pick. Them’re th’ doors that fell on me leg, but th’ orcs may’ve rigged something there.”

“Ah, cousin, all you need t’ do is t’ provide our own Ori with a couple of pin shards an’ yeh’ll be through in no time,” Balin put in, laying his finger alongside his nose and with a sly wink at Ori.

The Durin and Fundins burst out laughing. Balin promised to regale everyone else with the ‘Story’ at a later time. Ori grinned at Balin, a flash of excitement went through him. The idea of picking the lock to get into Khazad-dûm appealed.

“Then there’s a quick bu’ dark sprint t’ th’ bridge,” Dwalin continued. “Our Dain, this is where we’ll need yer contraption t’ cross as we’re goin’ with th’ bridge bein’ gone. After tha’, righ’ opposite, there’s a tunnel t’ th’ Chamber a’ Mazarbul. Anyone r’member where th’ crypt f’r Flvioq is?”

Binni shook his head along with Celeborn and Elrond. Brur pulled the interior map to himself, counting and poking at it.

“I’m estimatin’ his crypt as t’ th’ rule a’ th’ last Durin. Th’ records were covered wi’ doors, so th’ room’ll be about so big, which’d park ‘im about here.”

Ori looked and nodded. Dwalin studied the placements and frowned.

“Pre’y close t’ th’ tunnel. Durin told me husband th’ crypt were marked, so we should be able t’ find i’ easy enough, even if them blasted orcs’ve wrecked any markin’s. How deep yeh think we’ll have t’ dig?”
“Usual,” Brur grunted. “One t’ two slabs about half a foot thick. Yeh’ll need some heavy duty crowbars and mattocks to hack ‘em up.”

Dwalin nodded, then looked up at Ori.

“Think Floviq’s gonna need reburyin’?”

“No.” Ori laid his hand on Dwalin’s arm, “Durin said the Balrog got him, so there was nothing to bury.”

“Canny t’ make him a grave anyway.” Dain helped himself, Sculdis, and Baluchistan to more ale. Baluchistan burped and looked around.

“Men, right? Where’s tha’ prince… Prince Whatsit?”

Roäc heaved a loud sigh.

“We’re kind’ve spoiled for choices, Blu. Which Whatsit?’

“Bail ‘r Tail ‘r Drain. Dunno. Prince a’ Dale.”

“Prince Bain of Dale?”

“Tha’s th’ feller. Got a note f’r ’im from Stonehead Junior.”

Bard reached out to ask for it, but Sigrid barged between them.

“I’m his sister,” she said. “I’ll look after it.”

Baluchistan rolled onto his back and stuck his leg in the air. In fact, he did have a message attached to his leg. Ori was less surprised that there was a message than the fact that the raven actually had legs and wasn’t simply entirely round.

Sigrid detached the message and stuffed it in her bodice.

Bard raised a brow at her.

“Da, you’re spending way too much time with Wicked Stepmother,” said Sigrid. She took her seat again beside Fili, but the raven remained on his back, both legs in the air. Baluchistan began to snore.

Quartz whizzed in and landed on the table.

“They’ll be here first thing–” He caught sight of the pile of feathers and shouted, “Idad Stan!”

Quartz hopped across to Baluchistan and yelled again. “Idad Stan, it’s me!”

The pile of feathers flew a foot in the air, spun, and Baluchistan landed on his feet, hissing and mantling his wings.

“Camaaahn, camaaaahn! I’ll fight yeh righ’ here! I’ll fight’ yeh wi’ one wing tied behind me back! I’ll fight yeh wi’ both–“ “Idad Stan!” hollered Quartz.

“Eh?” Baluchistan stared at Quartz. “Who th’ fuck’er yeh?”

“Quartz! Quartzite, of Mica and Roäc.”

“Ohhh, aye, aye, me wee laddie! Jus’ testin’ yeh. Yer lookin’ fine, laddie. I ain’t seen yeh since yeh were an egg. Yeh’ve grown, our Quartz.”

“Yes,” said Roäc, “and not quite so oval, either.”

“Aye, good t’ see yeh out from under yer mam’s arse.”

Quartz and Baluchistan tapped their beaks together then Baluchistan patted Quartz heavily on the head with a wing, almost flattening the younger raven.

Mister Wandi turned to Legolas.

“See, I could have been worse.”

“Yes,” teased Legolas, “your hair could be twice the size it is.”

“It would still be fabulous!” Wandi replied loftily.

Nori smirked across the table at Ori,

“See, I could have been worse.”

“You are worse,” Ori replied with a grin.

Bujni, meanwhile, watched Dain’s raven with rapt fascination.

“How does he even fly?”

Baluchistan turned to him, hopped over, scattering feathers everywhere, and said, very slowly,

“I. Flap. Me. Wings. Laddie! I’m a bird!”

“Yes, yes, of course,” said Bujni impatiently, “but you are an exceptional specimen. I’m attempting to calculate how much lift you must attain to offset your bodily dimensions.”

“Language!” Baluchistan admonished him.

“I mean to say, you must be very strong as well as light.”

“Must be all the ale,” commented Roäc dryly with a glance at Bilbo, who snickered.

“I flap me wings, laddie,” Baluchistan repeated, unnecessarily loud. “Flap an’ fly, flap an’ fly. I don’ think about it. I jus’ do it. If I though’ about it, I’d… oh, shit! I’m never flyin’ again!”

Dain reached over, grabbed Baluchistan, and threw him straight up in the air, “Bugger!” screamed Baluchistan, flapped wildly and floated easily down again. He waddled over to Dain and pecked his hand.

“Bastard.”

“It worked, didn’t it?” Dain barked.

“Aye, but it were startlin’. Don’ like t’ be start’ed. Bad f’r me health.”

“Yer welcome,” said Dain. “Yeh comin’ with us, Blu?”

“Fuck, no! I’m too old f’r tha’ shite. Th’ wee laddie kin go.”

“Where are we going?” Quartz asked Ori.

“What!” Quartz squawked. “I can’t go to Khazad-dûm! I’m too young to die!”

Ori rolled his eyes.

“Think about Garnet.”

“What say yeh an’ me do a li’le…nestin’,” Cemnesta choked, but held his countenance.

“A charming idea, but I am a trifle busy right now. Thank you all the same.”

“Righty-o , me pretty li’le tulip bulb!”

Undaunted, Baluchistan lurched his way around, inspecting Bard, Thranduil, Celeborn, then alighted on Galadriel. Baluchistan puffed out his chest feathers, which made him resemble an irate duster.

“Mel-l-l-lon, me lovely darlin’! Yer so…so…shiny.”

Lady Galadriel smiled over her tankard.

“Weren’t you just flirting with Cemnesta, Master Blu?”

“Who?” Blu blinked then glanced back at Cemnesta, “Oh aye, aye, lassie, bu’ -hic- here we are.”

“Number you are flirting with me? How fickle you are! Or are you simply ambitious? Two at a time? You know he is my nephew?”

Dain moaned and dropped his head to the table with a thump. Sculdis rose, went and hefted Baluchistan, and tucked him under her arm.

“Whoops!” Baluchistan warbled. “Cheerio, me lovely peahen! -hic- Don’ forget me in yer -hic- dreams!”

Sculdis sat down again, shoved Baluchistan into her tool pouch and returned her attention to the maps.

There was a muffled verse or two of an extremely rude drinking song that rapidly sank into snores.

“Well,” said Celeborn, taking his lady’s hand and raising it to his lips. “We must admit that raven has excellent taste.”

“I like to think so,” said Cemnesta.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Despite the title and his popularity, this chapter is not about Baluchistan. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next two weeks were brutal on Ori’s nerves. He felt like he spent all his time running from group to group, checking and updating his notes with the progression. The usual work of the kingdom went on around them, but hidden to all eyes, Fundin house was a-buzz with preparation. Dain and Sculdis divided the mithril masters between the forges of Fundin House and that of Durin. Fili, Gridr, Margr and Vi leant their aid whenever they could. The doors were closed to outsiders. How Bofur and Jani got the mithril there, Ori didn’t want to think about. He presumed everyone thought the royal family was taking the first part for family use. Dis occasionally joined them, as Randibur had taken to his position as her assistant with a passion and she was confident in leaving him with the usual guild meetings. Kili assisted Thorin in royal duties for Fili and Gimli took guard duty.

The elves all left for Erys Lasgalen to witness Thranduil’s abdication and his receiving the title of King-Father, and Cemnesta’s coronation as King of the Greenwood.

Brur took over a large table in the sitting room of Bag-End East and set Arne, Bujni, Loli, and Omi to work on compiling and preparing manifests, maps, and plans for travel. Balin joined them.

Dori, Binni and Mistress Dazla kept the household busy, furbishing traveling gear and preparing some food for travel. Dipfa, Pika and Mahrdin did their work at Fundin House.

Oin hunkered down in his lab, cooking up medical supplies in case of need.

Dwalin was in close conference with Furh’nk and Arb.

“Dwalin wants to be here to protect us, even if he isn’t here to protect us,” said Bilbo to Ori over a cup of tea. “Of course we all trust Furh’nk.”

“But Master Arb he doesn’t know as well.”

“Fortunately, my gut tells me to trust Master Arb. I wish Dwalin would take my gut’s word for it.”

Slowly and quietly, weapons were moved to the house. For Ori, the best parts were when he and Dwalin met up and went through the lists, checking on the preparations. This never took long and they often had a little time to spend in each other’s arms.

Ori had other duties to discharge before he left as well. He met with Bujni, Omi, Loli and Arne in his storage room-office.

“While I’m gone, you’ll have to work it out among yourselves to make sure Thorin always has a scribe at hand,” he said. “Master Brur has given us leave to arrange this as we wish, so he won’t be surprised if you’re absent from library work in turns.”

“We will endeavor to do you proud,” said Bujni. He rose, bowed and sat down again.

“You already do,” said Ori. “I have complete faith in all of you.”

As they filed out, Ori saw that Arne looked distracted, and more than a little worried. He leaned in closer to the Ironfist prince.

“What’s wrong?”

“Nothing wr-wrong exa-exactly. I got a l-letter from A-Amad. Instead of me ju-just riding home this fall, she an- and Adad are c-c-coming to collect me.”
They exchanged looks of heightened anxiety.
“D-don’t worry,” Arne promised. “I w-won’t let it af-affect my work.”
“I’m not worried about your work, I’m worried about you,” said Ori.
Arne smiled and shrugged.
“It was f-fun wh-while it lasted.”
Ori went to the scribes’ hall to survey the work in progress to restore it to its earlier glory and formally leave Master Sadie in charge in his absence.

Then he had to screw up his courage to meet with Dipfa, but she had actually created some very sensible travel clothing for him.
“This is great work, Dipfa,” he encouraged as she pulled tunics and leggings from their boxes. Dipfa pouted despite the praise.
“It pains me that your aura will fold in with that of the forest instead of bouncing off it, but I know your safety is paramount.”
He thought he would keep to himself that the socks he had knitted for the trip not only matched, but were largely brown.

“However,” she continued with more spirit, “you must realize your new bathing costume for the inn will have to be doubly decorated to put you back in harmony.”
“Of course, Dipfa, I had anticipated that.”
He hadn’t anticipated it with anything but terror, but that, too, would remain a secret.
Dwalin came into the room and looked at everything Ori had laid out on the bed with Dipfa’s help.

“Love,” said Dwalin, “yer th’ only firs’ time traveler I ever had t’ encourage t’ pack more f’r a journey than less.”

The day before they were to leave, Ori found himself in a small private meeting in Thorin's and Balin’s study with Balin, Thorin, Bilbo, and Dwalin. He had thought it was just tea with Balin, but instantly realized Balin was going to suggest something he wasn’t going to like.

“There yeh are, wee brother,” Balin said, passing the cup to Ori.
Ori politely thanked him, stirred it, took a sip, and set the cup down.

“Balin, what change to our plans are you going to propose?”
Balin raised his eyebrow and shot a look at Dwalin, who tucked his head down to hide a smirk.
Bilbo and Thorin tried not to grin and failed.
Balin opened his mouth, then closed it and smiled.

“Yeh know me too well, our Ori.”
“Yes, so what are you going to suggest?”
Balin chuckled and sat back in his chair, stirring his tea.
“This journey, laddie, is being veiled as a diplomatic visit to th’ elves t’ recognize King Cemnesta and then t’ pay a visit t’ Lady Galadriel as she’s visited us f’r Thorin’s coronation. As it’s a diplomatic one…”
Ori looked at his brother-in-law.

“Dori’s bullied you into coming,” Ori finished. “For the sake of form, of course.”
“Somethin’ like tha’. I’m supposed to be Thorin’s chief ambassador. It’ll look better.”
Ori thought this over for a few minutes.

“Yes,” he allowed. “It does make sense, but with all due respect to you as the first Lord of Fundin House, I don’t like the idea of you entering Khazad-dûm with us. Dwalin is coming, and currently both of you are the last of the line of Fundin. I don’t mean to say you are not a fine and capable warrior, but you are betrothed and have a child on the way.”
“I do, indeed, laddie, an’ I’ve no intention o’ enterin’ th’ mountain wi’ yeh. I’ll stay in Lórien wi’ Lord Celeborn.”
Ori paused, then looked at Balin with murder in his eyes.

“Dori’s coming with you, isn’t he?”
Thorin, Bilbo, and Dwalin all choked.
“Aye, laddie -“

“No one should ever bring the Honored Bearer of Erebor anywhere dangerous,” said Ori flatly.

“You know Dori won’t wait behind, demurely knitting badger booties while I’m-“ Balin held up his hands in a placating gesture.

“Wait, wait! Thorin, Nori, Oin an’ I have Dori’s oath tha’ we kin tether him bodily t’ a tree in Lórien, if he tries t’ follow yer group t’ Khazad-dûm.”

The image made Ori giggle, but he was quickly solemn again.

“I suppose it will look better. Dori going with us, I mean, not the idea of hog-tying Dori to a tree. Which, right now, I’m tempted to do.”

“Join th’ bloody guild,” Dwalin muttered.

“Exactly,” Thorin added with an imperious nod to his brother-in-arms. “I shall charge you, Captain Dwalin, to bring a small squad of soldiers to protect the Honored Bearer. Not too many to rouse suspicion, but enough to satisfy our people and Dale’s.”

“Yes,” Ori said slowly, “and Cemnesta and Galadriel have each promised an armed escort for us within their boundaries. As long as Dori stays out of danger with you, Balin, I suppose it’ll be all right. I might have known he’d find away to supervise me,” Ori finished dolefully.

Balin chuckled.

“Both Thorin and I’ve talked to him at length, quite often these past days. He’s promised to do his very best to be, as he puts it, a mere passenger.”

“I was thinkin’ more a’ lockin’ ‘im in a trunk with th’ baggage,” said Dwalin.

Ori turned to his husband.

“When did they tell you about this?”

“Bloody righ’ b’fore yeh walked in,” Dwalin growled, leveling a glare, first at his king, then at his elder brother.

“Typical,” Ori sniffed, haughtily, in a perfect imitation of Dori.

Somewhat later, Ori went to the kitchen where Dori was fiddling about with some crochet and humming a happy and self-satisfied little tune. On the table sat a pot of tea, two mugs, and a plate of scones, still warm from the oven.

“Dori,” Ori tried to sound stern, but Dori then put on such a guilty look, he was hard pressed not to laugh.

“Pet, do sit down and listen. I’m sure I-“

“Dori!” Ori pulled the fancy-work out of Dori’s hands and clambered into his brother’s lap.

“Ooof! Pet, I-“

“Ori’s Dori!”

They hugged for a few moments, then,

“Dori, I must have your promise you won’t under any circumstances enter Khazad-dûm.”

“I promise, pet. I don’t like it, but I do promise.” Dori frowned. “If you’re killed, I’ll be sending that buffalo of yours after you directly!”

“Did you tell him that?” Ori asked, with a smile.

“Yes!” Dori sounded put out. “He had the effrontery to tell me if you were, he’d be the first to follow you.”

Ori kissed Dori’s cheek and laid his forehead against Dori’s.

“I promise you, Ori’s Dori, I’ll do my very best not to be killed.”

“I petition Mahal every night,” Dori said, softly.

“Thank you. I love you, Ori’s Dori.”

“I love you, too, my own dearest badgerling. Always my own dearest, badgerling.”

“You’ll have another soon,” Ori teased.

“Yes, but it will be mine and Balin’s. You, pet, are my very own.”

Ori, planting another kiss on the top of Dori’s head, got up and gave back the fancywork.

“Stay here and talk to me,” Ori said, taking a scone from the plate. “I want to bake something.”

“Of course, my pet.” Dori replied, settling back. “What are you going to make?”
“Haven’t decided yet,” Ori said vaguely. He stuffed the scone in his mouth, idly going through cupboards and pantry.

Nori barged in.

“There you are!” he accused Ori. “You connivin’ li’le mole!”

Ori looked up and swallowed the scone.

“Squeak. Squeak,” he said, unimpressed.

They stared mulishly at each other. Ori had been expecting this. Nori encouraged him in all manner of adventures, but when it came down to the knife’s edge, Nori would fly off the handle at the last minute.

“I’m going, Nor,” Ori said, quietly. “This is my quest.”

“Bugger that!” yelled Nori at the top of his lungs. “I’ll bloody kill ‘im if anything happens t’ you! I’ll kill ‘im, then I’ll cut ‘im up, then I’ll boil ‘im in oil, then I’ll eat ‘im wif chips and then I’ll really get mad!”

“Durin is already dead,” Ori said, cooly.

“Not him! The other one!”

“You’re going to kill Mahal? How?”

“Not Him!”

“You’re running out of choices.”

“Yer bloody buffalo!” Nori shouted.

“I’ll be with him in th’ Halls, if he goes,” Dwalin commented as he came in.

Nori gave a roar and threw himself at Dwalin. Dwalin was too quick. He planted his large hand on Nori’s forehead and held him there. Nori swung punch after punch, bellowing, but Dwalin’s arms were longer and he held Nori away from him. Nori wore himself out and stood there, panting, then settled for shooting names and accusations at Dwalin instead. Assault and Battery stuck their heads out of Nori’s hair and joined in. Dwalin listened in silence, arms folded across his chest, withstanding the trio’s barrage. Dori went on crocheting and Ori decided on ingredients.

Finally Nori stopped. He glared at the larger dwarf then turned to Ori. Ori raised an eyebrow at him. Nori burst into tears. Ori went to him and held him.

“You’re me brother! I don’t want you goin’ off on some stupid fool’s errand an’ gettin’ y’self killed. You’re me li’le brother. You’re all me an’ Dori’s got.”

“Nori-”

“I’m comin’ wiff you!”

“No, you’re not, Nori.”

“Fine! I’m gonna bloody hate Mahal ’til He brings you back safe. Then, when I die, I’m gonna punch His lights out. An’ punch ‘Im again th’ next day an’ every day t’l the remakin’ o’ the fuckin’ world for it.”

In his head, Ori heard Durin say, “Da’s goin’ t’ be busy when yeh lot get here.”

“You keep out of this,” Ori muttered.

“I did not say a thing!” Dori protested.

“Not you, Dori. King Durin.”

“Well!” said Dori. “He’s abominably rude to eavesdrop on our conversation! He takes after you!”

“Or I take after him,” Ori reasoned. “Though I don’t see how, as you’re the Longbeard, not me.”

“Guilt by associations,” said Dori.

“Oi! We’ve got a drop ’r two a’ Longbeard in there...here...somewheres!” Nori protested.

Durin belched.

“Not translating that,” Ori warned, as he guided Nori to sit at the table next to Dori, who laid down his work and moved closer to put an arm about Nori’s shoulders, murmuring gentle platitudes.

Nori calmed down in a minute and, with Dori mopping his face with a handkerchief, mumbled a thanks to Dwalin, who put a tankard of ale in front of him.

Ori smiled at his husband and slid an arm about him. Dwalin tucked Ori close and kissed the top of his head. Bofur came in from his workday and looked about.
“Nothin’ like comin’ home after a long shift in th’ mines t’ th’ sound o’ yer honey yellin’ in th’ kitchen.”

“Noiri’s alrigh’ now,” Dwalin grunted.

Bofur looked to Ori, who shrugged.

“Our Ducky pissed ‘bout yer quest, Chick?”

Ori nodded. Bofur went over and kneaded Nori’s shoulders.

“Easy now, love. Our Chick’s all grown up an’ will come back safe in th’ shake of a pig’s tail.

He’s Mahal’s scribe. He’s gonna be fine.”

“I hate ‘Im,” Nori muttered.

Bofur looked up.

“Mahal,” Ori clarified. “Or Dwalin. Or both.”

Bofur sighed and went on working on his husband’s shoulders.

Ori decided he had everything he needed, the freshly baked cookies for Mahal and Yavanna, if she was there. Maybe they would share with Durin if he appeared, too. Incense, wine, a handful of differently colored feathers and the finest red silk ribbon he could find. He had his notebook and a couple of graphite wands just in case. But now he had a conundrum: where?

He couldn’t use the sitting room, someone might walk in, same with the kitchen and the rest of the house. He couldn’t go out to the meadow or the courtyard, someone would definitely see him. He considered the fireplace in the bedroom, but Dwalin would be coming to bed soon and he needed to do this before they left in the morning.

Dwalin came in, saw Ori standing there with all his accoutrements, and asked,

“Where yeh need t’ be, love?”

Ori sighed, then realized.

“Dwalin, would you please take me to the forge?”

‘Course, love. Now?”

“Yes, please.”

Ori prepared himself, while Dwalin hefted the chain of the trap door and let the lava pour into the trough. Once it was filled, Dwalin shut the trapdoor and came to Ori’s side.

“Yeh need me, ‘r yeh need t’ be alone?”

Ori stood on tiptoe to kiss his husband.

“I always need you, but this is something I must to do alone, if you don’t mind.”

Dwalin smiled and after giving Ori another hug went out, closing the forge door.

“I’ll be right’ ou’ here. Shout if yeh want anythin’ done,” Dwalin called back.

Ori placed his offerings on the anvil and took a breath. He waited, wondering what to do for a minute, but then as he watched, the forge grew up and out and became quite a different place, though a terribly familiar one.

The anvil, now enormous, still held Ori’s offerings, also grown to a colossal size. Mahal stood before it, hands on hips and wearing an indulgent smirk. Yavanna sat on the edge of the anvil, swinging her legs. Her hair was all flowers at the moment, and impossibly quick, tiny birds flitted from blossom to blossom.

Ori took a deep breathe.

“Hail Mahal and His Lady Yavanna. I come to crave a boon.”

“Rather formal for yeh, me scribe,” said Mahal.

“I’m asking for things, so I thought I should at least try to be polite.”

“Oh, aye? An’ wha’ thin’s would these be?”

“Everyone who goes on this quest with me has to come home safe.”

“Ah,” said Mahal, “I though’ yeh might ask.”

“So, that’s something You can do?”

“Bring everyone home safe?” Mahal looked troubled and Ori’s heart sank. “There’s a problem with tha’, see. Even if I protect me own dwarrow, I can’t guarantee th’ safety o’ elves. They belong t’ Eru. I can’t interfere wi’ ‘em.”

“Oh.”

Ori had to think about that. He was used to seeing dwarrow and elves on the same level now, almost as the same people. But they weren’t, valar-wise.

“But, You could affect other things around them,” said Ori.

“Such as?” Mahal asked.

“Say the elves were trapped by orcs and… and standing on the end of a long rock across a boulder. You could smack the other end of the rock and they would go flying above the orcs and be safe. Well, safer. It’s up to them not to land in a mine pit or something, but I think they can take care of that bit themselves. They’re spry.”

“Send a bunch o’ elves flyin’ across th’ room t’ safety. Hm,” said Mahal, eyebrows raised and a smile on his lips. “Flinchin’ a bunch a’ elves… Oi, that’d put th’ wind up Eru’s-” “Arse?” Ori suggested politely.

“Hush, lad! I would never say such a thin’! ‘Course I wouldn’t.”

Yavanna snorted as She leaned over and inspected the plate of cookies. She giggled to Herself and sing-songed under Her breath, “Wheeeeeeeeee!”

Ori worried he might have started something he shouldn’t have. He had to get this conversation back on track. He would have to make himself think of something besides airborne elves.

“No one can die,” he restated abruptly.

“Laddie, did I no’ jus’ say I can’t guarantee-”

“No one can die or… or… I’ll call off the quest!”

Ori folded his arms across his chest and stuck out his chin.

“I can’t-” began Mahal.

“I’ll call it off! “ Ori shouted. “And… and Durin will never have his Flower!”

“Hear tha’, Da?” Durin’s voice wafted up from somewhere out of sight. “I’ll be forever de-Flowered!”

“Hold yer whewist, yeh li’le shite.”

“No one can die!” Ori reinforced. “And If they do, I’ll wait until I get to the Halls and… and I’ll fight You.”

“Yes, I’ll kick You in the Shins! Every day! And… and I’ll hate You forever!”

Ori realized that made him sound like a badger who wasn’t allowed to go out and play, but he was grasping at whatever he could. What was the worst that could happen? Mahal could squash him like a bug, but that certainly wouldn’t advance the quest.

“Tha’ would be a tragedy indeed,” said Mahal. “I expect such decl’rations fra tha’ wee rascal Nori, an’ him t’ vow he was goin’ t’ punch me. Bu’ yeh, I’m thinkin’, when I made yeh I might’ve overdone th’ courage a wee bit.”

Yavanna gave a groan of impatience.

“Promise him you’ll do your best!”

Durin appeared and reached over to filch a cookie. She rapped him viciously across his knuckles.

“Those are mine!”

“Yeh kin spare one, Mam.”

“No, I can’t.”

She put a cookie in Her mouth with one hand and shooed Her husband into action with the wave of the other.

Mahal rolled His eyes, then relented.

“I’ll do me best t’ see yeh all safely through th’ quest. Tha’ is th’ most’ useful promise I kin give yeh.”

Ori nodded.

“Deal!”

He spat on his palm and held out his hand. Then he remembered: Oh, that’s right. Valar. I’m the size of His hand.
He wiped his palm on his trousers.

“Sorry,” he said with a wince.

The forge echoed with loud, raucous laughter.

“Go on wi’ yeh, now,” Mahal said, waving a hand and looking terribly like Dori for an instant.

“Yer husband needs seein’ t’ an’ yeh both need t’ sleep.”

Ori bowed.

“Thank You, Udad Mahal.”

As They faded back into the lava fires, Ori heard Durin say, “Jus’ one, Mam?”

“Oh, all right. No, take that one, it’s bigger.”

All the light went out of the room and Ori sat down hard as his knees gave way. He blinked and, as his vision adjusted to the low light of the phosphorous stones, he saw that the lava, all the offerings, their holders and containers had vanished. He looked around for the writing tools and paper he brought, but not used. They were missing, too. He climbed to his feet, then instinctively bowed low.

Dwalin was sitting on the ground in the hallway, back against the wall, grinning. He was suspiciously dusty, and Ori rather thought he’d been rolling around on the floor, laughing.

“Wha’ was all tha’ about?” Dwalin asked, climbing to his feet. He glanced into the forge, shrugged and made the door fast. They walked back hand in hand.

“What? You weren’t listening?” Ori challenged.

Dwalin put on a ‘Who? Me?’ expression.

“Fine! I told Mahal that if He couldn’t make sure everyone made it through the quest alive, I wasn’t going.”

“Oh, aye, tha’ all?”

“No. I also told Him I’d fight Him when I got to the Halls.”

“Fight Him…”

“Fight Him, kick Him in the Shins. Alright, I sounded like a badger…Nori, actually.”

“Yeh told Mahal t’ His face, yeh would fight Him, an’ kick Him in th’ Shins.”

“I’m aware I would need a step ladder to reach.”

Dwalin gave him a dazzlingly evil smile.

“I’ll put twenty gold on yeh t’ win.”

“You will?”

“ ‘Course!”

“Oh, that’s so sweet!”

Once back in the house, Ori realized he was going to have to explain to Dori that Mahal had appropriated Dori’s favorite serving plate. He went into the kitchen. Dori was making toast and Balin sat at the table with Nori, Thorin, and Bilbo. Except for Dori, they looked a little puzzled.

“Ori,” Thorin said as soon as he entered. “Your writing tools just…”

“Appeared in the middle of the table,” Bilbo finished.

“Oh,” Ori wondered what he should say and tried, “that’s good.”

Dori turned and put the platter of buttered toast down on the table. Nori reached to grab a slice, when something dropped from the ceiling and smacked Nori on the head, flattening his pointy coiffure.

“Ow!” Nori bawled and scrabbled to catch whatever had hit him.

“You be careful with that, Nori!” cried Dori, “That’s my favorite serving plate! What are you doing with it anyway?”

“It hit me!” Nori shouted, holding the plate out with both hands and glaring at it.

Dori snatched it away with an aggrieved huff and put it in the cupboard.

“At least, you had the decency to wash it,” Dori muttered.

“Ori! Lookit me hair! Good fing the gals’r off wiff Bofur.”

Ori giggled a little hysterically, but sat down at the table with Dwalin.

“Nori, I’m shocked! Your darling husband all alone and cold in your marriage bed!” Ori sassed.
“Eh, you know I can’t but sleep a few hours here an’ there,” said Nori, trying to salvage his points. “All me tossin’ an’ turnin’ill just keep him awake.”

“So,” said Dwalin, slyly. “Our Ori’s demanded tha’ Mahal bring everyone on th’ quest home safe r he’s no’ goin’. An’, worse’n tha’, when he gets t’ th’ Halls, he’ll kick Mahal in th’ Shins everyday.”

“Ori!” Dori cried. “Really! Such blasphemy! I expect that from Nori, but I thought I brought you up with manners!”

“I told Ori I’d put twenty gold on ‘im t’ win,” Dwalin added.

“I’ll double it,” announced Thorin with a grin.

“Ori,” said Bilbo. “If you don’t mind, I’m borrowing your writing materials for a moment.”

“You’re going to use this in a story?” Ori asked.

“Of course! I’ll put another twenty down of my own.”

Ori heard Yavanna call out, “Me, too!”

Followed by Mahal saying, “Aye, I believe it. Oi! Yeh’ve eaten’ all th’ cookies already?”

“I’ll make more,” Ori promised, to the confusion of his family.

“Snickerdoodles,” rumbled Mahal, “An’ don’ be stingy with th’ cinnamon!”
The Quest Has Begun!

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And we’re off!! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same darrow time, same darrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori felt almost guilty that the people of Dale and Erebor accepted their ruse so easily. Cemnesta’s coronation had only been for elves, as elves didn’t have the connections to the outside that Erebor had. It was perfectly natural that shortly afterward, King Thorin sent a congratulatory delegation to the Greenwood. What could be more fitting than Thorin charging the Bearer to go and give blessings upon the new elf king?

And the new king, Cemnesta, was everything charming, even sending a ship to carry the delegation in style. He was, after all, Mr. Wandi’s own brother.

Despite the early hour, darrow and men lined the streets to wave and smile and call out well-wishes as the Bearer’s caravan passed on its way to the docks. Some even came forth with wrapped up packets of ‘snacks’, as most, despite the demonstrations given by Thranduil, Tauriel, and Legolas, still thought that elves only ate leaves or dust or air.

“Take care o’ yerself, love!” someone cried.

“Make sure them elves give yeh meat fer yer tea, no’ just weeds!” shouted another.

The Bearer was accompanied by Lord Balin and the Bearer’s elder brother, King Dain and his queen, Sculdis. Scribe Ori was there to make sure everything arranged by the Bearer was reported to the High King. The Bearer had the royal ladies in waiting Margr and Vi, with Captain Dwalin, Prince Kili, and Gimli Gloinuil, along with a small detail of soldiers. There were several large wagons, no doubt filled with luggage and proper food to keep the Bearer healthy.

The elven ship was lovely as it lay at the end of the dock, the gold sails glittering against the perfect dawn-touched blue sky. The crowd grew quite thick as they neared the shore, so the Bearer rose from her seat in the tea cup and, just before Balin handed her down, waved to the assembled darrow and men.

“Farewell, my dear friends! I will give all your regards to the king of the Greenwood! Until we meet again!”

And she blew a kiss.

The crowd, of course, was transported.

If the Bearer was surrounded by a squadron of soldiers even more heavily armed than usual, well, King Thorin certainly wouldn’t risk her safety. Dori and Balin boarded, followed by Dain and Sculdis, with Vi, Margr, Kili and Jani with Gimli just behind. Thorin turned to Ori.

“Do you suppose they even notice we’re here?” Thorin asked with a grin.

“With the ‘dear Bearer’ around?” Ori replied. “Certainly not!”

He hugged Bilbo, then Thorin, who then held him at arm’s length and gave him a fond, worried smile.

“Ori, when you return from Khazad-dûm…”

“Yes, Thorin?”

“Please don’t bring back any pets.”

“I shall try my best, my king,” said Ori with a straight face.

He and Dwalin stepped back and bowed.

To the cheers and farewells of the darrow of Erebor and the men of Dale, the ship glided away.
to the far Greenwood, an emerald haze in the west. Ori went straight to the bow, Dwalin shadowing him. Ori looked out towards the west, the breeze from the lake blowing his hair. Ori wore his lavender coat and breeches, he had new rugged travel boots and a new knife courtesy of Nori. He had his sling shot tucked in his belt with the pouch of arrowheads. There were several of these packed deep in one of Honda’s saddle bags.

Dori, to Ori’s chagrin, had bustled in first thing that morning and insisted on helping him dress. Dwalin made no demur, but pushed in to take care of Ori’s hair, which made Dori teary-eyed and murmur things like ‘my badgerling’ and ‘all grown up and married’. Dwalin slid his arms about him. Ori leaned back against his husband’s chest.

“This is it,” Ori murmured. “We’re off on our adventure!”

“Aye, an’ we’re goin’ t’ be quick abou’ this one. Know wha’ I’d like?”

“What?” Ori asked, turning to burrow himself in Dwalin’s furs. The leather belts criss-crossing Dwalin’s chest held Grasper and Keeper, and his warhammer to his back.

“T’ take yeh all ‘round Arda, visitin’ all th’ places our kings’r from, an’ th’ others who came t’ our Thorin’s coronation. See th’ world wi’ yeh.”

“That sounds wonderful!” Ori enthused. “We’ll see everything, then come home and settle in our lovely house and be happy!”

“Already happier than I ever dreamed, me ghivashel.”

“Me, too,” Ori said, hugging his husband tight.

“Yeh still worryin’, love?”

“I know it makes everything seem normal, but I worry about Dori being here. I’m terrified he’ll somehow come with us.”

“Tha’s Balin’s look-out. I know him well enough tha’ he’ll find a way t’ keep our Dori safe, or a’ least outa too much trouble.”

“Yes, I really don’t want to watch Dori pregnant and immaculately dressed, scolding the balrog for not wiping its feet.”

Dwalin choked, then,

“Aye, he’d do it, too. We’ll be sneakin’ in an’ out, so no thinkin’ abou’ th’ balrog, love.”

“I’ll have a talk with Glorfindel,” Ori said idly. “I have to convince him not to go looking for the thing. You know Margr and Vi would go with him.”

“Donno, if tha’ thin’ could survive th’ sisters.”

Ori pondered the question that had teased him.

“Dwalin, did you ever see…it?”

“No, we were too occupied wi’ th’ orcs. They were bad enough. Mind, rumor had it, th’ orcs used t’ worship it.”

Ori snorted, “Of course, give it a ’sacrifice’ now and again and it won’t bother you.” He giggled, “If they’d fed it more it might have liked them.”

Dwalin looked down at him with a terrible frown, but his bright hazel eyes twinkled.

“Here now, love. Yeh keep in mind wha’ Thorin told yeh an’ Dori an’ Mistress Dazla said-”

“No pets this time.” Ori finished. “No, I don’t want a pet balrog. I can’t even keep an oliphaunt. A balrog would definitely never fit.”

“An’ it’d burn down Dale.”

“True, but if it sat a bit away, it could keep the crops warm all year.”

“Love!”

Ori giggled and hugged his husband tight again, then grinned up at Dwalin as they released each other. Ori looked towards the stern. Erebor rose as comfort in the distance. He turned his back on the strong east wind. The ship had unfurled all its sails to the fullest and they remained at the prow as it sped across the lake.

Once more, Ori experienced the silent landing, the prow sliding up onto the sand of the Greenwood shore. This time, instead of a stealthy sprint to the shadows of a thicket, they were greeted by the sounds of elfin singing.
“Here come the dwarrow to Greenwood.
Welcome, oh welcome to Greenwood!
Cute beards and beads in Greenwood.
Eat lots of leaves in the Greenwood!”

Awaiting them, a column of Sylvan elf soldiers stood on either side of a triple line of other elves, all dressed in long white robes, carrying bouquets of flowers and singing their welcome.

The Company was soon surrounded. The elves continued to sing while the dwarrow mounted their ponies, Dain on Chopper, while more elves caught up their luggage. Then an amazing palanquin appeared, all swathed in the most delicate of white lace and furnished with plump pillows of Durin blue velvet. Eight elves bore this forward and, still singing, tenderly installed Dori in it. Ori facepalmed at the sound of Dori’s delighted giggles and praise for those helping Dori settle in.

Thus gathered up, they were escorted back down the path the elves had arrived on, into the deep Greenwood.

“Welcome, Dear Bearer, to Greenwood.
We’ve never had Bearer in Greenwood
Please don’t give birth in Greenwood.
We’ve no nappies stockpiled in Greenwood!”

And just like that, Erebor was hidden behind the trees and Ori couldn’t see it. He was out of sight of home for the first time in his life. They were in the center of the cavalcade of elves. The ones before the palanquin tossed down their flowers for the Bearer to be borne over.

“You get used to it,” said Kili, on Saki, just behind Ori on Honda and Dwalin riding Harley.
“Hmm?” Ori turned back to look at the prince.
“Erebor. If you concentrate on it, you can still feel that it’s there, even if you can’t see it,” Kili explained
“It’s ridiculous to be instantly homesick, I know. Especially since it’s only been home for six months.”

Kili shrugged.
“No, it’s not. I miss Fili and I’ve been gone for half a day.”
“But you’ve been apart lots of times before this, right?”

“No.”

Ori felt a twinge of sorrow. He was about to apologize, then remembered that Kili had chosen this quest. Ori decided on a different tack.
“Thank you again for coming with us.”

Kili grinned, “There was no way I wasn’t coming. Both Fili and I wanted to go, but Fili’s idad’s heir, so that’s the bottom of the slag bucket, isn’t it.”

Ori nodded, then Kili asked,
“You’re going to write about this, aren’t you? And draw pictures of the things we see, right?”

“Oh yes!” Ori assured him. “I’m excited about doing it, too.”

“Good!” Kili said, eagerly. “If you’re writing and drawing it, I can be sure Fili will feel like he came with us!”

“Too much flattery, Ki,” Ori teased. “This is my first real adventure, other than the Inn, remember?”

Kili laughed.
“Going to the Inn was a brilliant adventure, wasn’t it?”

Ori snickered.
“A brilliant time for you and Tauriel!”

“Shut up,” Kili replied with a blush and an even bigger grin.
“Everyone’s happy in Greenwood.
Patter is snappy in Greenwood
Wits and words sharper in Greenwood
Don’t be a dolt in the Greenwood.”

The path wound around and in amongst the trees, Ori was able to make out a jumble of branches that might be a door.

“Dwailin’?” He leaned toward his husband. “I think I see a door, but where’s the building?”

“Yer lookin’ at it, love. Elves build t’ match trees an’ follow th’ lines th’ trees do. Takes a bi’ a’ lookin’ at b’fore yeh kin see it.”

Ori frowned and looked carefully at the trees above them, then back to where he’d seen a doorway. After studying the actual trees, he could properly see the strange looking palace before them. Soon he saw many, many elves all around them and in the trees. A new song of welcome began.

At least, Ori thought it was welcoming.

“Do you see what I see?
Do you see what I see?
“Dwarves!
“Dwarves!
“Riding in a line!
“We will serve them cabbage divine!
“We will serve them cab-bage divine!”

“Tha’s ‘dwarrow’, yeh daft woodland sprites!” Dain hollered to the sound of giggles and tittering.

“See The Dwarves!
“See the Dwarves!
“Shouting all the Waaay!”

Dwalin gave a grunt of annoyance.

“Bloody all th’ way to the palace. Tra-la-la-ing ’til yeh could jus’ puke!”

Ori giggled.

“It’s pretty, but you’d think they’d get tired of the noise!” Ori confided, low. “And they say we dwarrow are noisy! We may make noise but we don’t go on and on like this!”

“Aye. It’s livin’ in th’ trees. Gotta twitter like th’ birds all a’ time.”

“You know,” Ori said, thoughtfully. “Among the wild creatures, the finest songs and dances are to attract mates.”

Dwalin chuckled.

“Yeh sayin’ tha’ our quest’s a chance f’r all them elves t’ fuck?”

“No!” Ori cried, swatting ineffectually at Dwalin, who was too busy laughing at his joke. “Don’t be gross!”

“Ah, well, me love,” Dwalin allowed. “Mebbe it’ll put a good sparkle int’ our Kili’s an’ Gimmers’ eyes b’fore we get goin’. ”

“And Margr and Vi?” Ori teased.

“Like they need help,” Dwalin snorted, making Ori laugh outright.

“Oh Mahal,” Ori said, glancing back. “Kili and Gimli will be mooning with Tauriel and Legolas the whole way.”

Dwalin made an indifferent noise.

“Mebbe, but they’ll be serious once we’re at th’ mountain. Don’t worry yerself o’er tha’, me love.”

“Oh, I won’t,” Ori assured him as they rode under a tall stone archway, cleverly disguised as two trees with intertwining branches. Actually, he hadn’t been worrying about them mooning so much as wondering what shape the mooning might take. They were supposed to be quiet and stealthy, after all.

Once through, the arched doors closed behind them. They alit and their mounts were led away and Dori was handed out of the palanquin. Dwalin gave Ori’s back a pat and Ori went forward to where a richly dressed elf stood waiting to welcome them up a short, but very wide stairway.

When Ori reached the stairway, the elf descended with much aplomb and bowed low, greeting him with a long welcoming speech in Sindarin. Ori, silently and profusely thanking Master Khujik, returned a graceful and very correct reply, in verse, perfectly accented, and with enough volume that all assembled could hear him. The looks of shocked amazement made him bestow a smile on the elf before him. The elf blinked, snatched back his dignity, and led them up the stair to be presented to His Majesty King Cemnesta Thranduil of Erys Lasgalen.

The throne room was smaller than Thorin’s, but the dancing light from the trees above rendered it lovely. The throne was perched on stone, carved to be three spreading branches, the center one, a stairway. There sat Cemnesta with Thranduil standing proudly behind him.

The elf announced them and Ori breezed passed him.

“Cemnesta, your majesty! You look wonderful with your crown and on that throne!”

Cemnesta laughed and, to the surprise of his people about the room, descended his stair at a run to meet them, dropping to one knee to embrace Ori, before Ori could bend in a bow.

“Ori, Lord Ori, my dear friend! You and your company are most welcome to my home. Please come in and be at your ease.” Cemnesta rose and smiled around the party. “I am delighted to see all of you!”

Cemnesta and Dwalin exchanged bows and an arm clasp. There was a squeal from Margr and Vi in the back.

“Lovely t’ see yeh, too, our Cemy, dear!”

Margr pushed forward. Cemnesta was wise enough to bend quickly as he was grabbed and pulled in for a hearty kiss on the cheek. Vi came for her due and patted his waist as the sisters looked him over.

“Eeee, lookit our Cemy, love. Ain’t he rich lookin’?”

“Aye, love, finer than a new copper coin. These folk takin’ good care a’ yeh, lovey?”

Ori turned from the fussing and there was Thranduil, dressed in brown and gold, looking amused and impressed.

“King-Father,” Ori greeted him.

“Lord Ori.”

“Are you really so surprised to see us?”

“No, I’m amazed that Cemnesta didn’t trip on his robes on his way down and break his nose. There’s a reason to move in regal state as you ascend and descend those stairs.”

“How many times did you break your nose?”

Thranduil drew himself up majestically, then sighed.

“Twice. And you? How do you fare so far?”

“I haven’t broken my nose yet, but I’m excited, nervous, and can’t believe Dori’s with us.”

Thranduil’s eyes shot behind Ori and the smile that bloomed was genuine. Ori snickered with Dwalin as everyone else was forgotten.

“Honored Bearer! What a delight. I cannot begin to tell you how happy I am that you decided to accompany your brother.” He glared at Cemnesta. “My son told me nothing of this.”

“Dearest Thranduil,” Dori cooed, trotting over to embrace the king-father. “I assure you I’m only coming along to see you and darling Galadriel. When I found out about this diplomatic visit, I beseeched my darling badger and my adorable husband to allow me to dangle after. I did promise I would be very good and biddable the entire time!”

“How dear that must have cost you, you naughty creature,” Thranduil teased, taking Dori’s arm and patting her hand tenderly.

“Oh, Thranduil, you are too odious to pretend such and put me to the blush before yours and your son’s beloved peoples.”
“I’m gonna fuckin’ throw up,” Dwalin muttered to Ori.
“I may join you,” Cemnesta murmured. “Ada is bad enough with Bard, which I can excuse, but he is utterly ridiculous where Dori is concerned.”
“Dori has that effect on people,” Ori explained. “Fortunately, it’s paving the way for this adventure, so I’ll thank him for now.”
Cemnesta laughed and said loudly,
“And here are some people who have been waiting most anxiously for your party to arrive.”
There was a blur of red and green and Kili was high in the air, shouting with delight to be in his beloved’s strong arms once more. Ori grinned to see Tauriel clasping Kili to her, her face buried in his shoulder as Kili peppered enthusiastic kisses all over her head. Legolas came in another doorway, saw Gimli and gave a shout. Gimli roared happily and they collided in the middle of the floor, hugging, laughing, and insulting each other.
Glorfindel strutted into the room and was knocked on his elegant ass as Margr and Vi pounced, shrieking.
Elrond and Lindir entered, followed by the twins.
“Lord Ori!” Elrond smiled and came forward, hand on heart, then knelt to embrace Ori.
“Lord Elrond!” Ori was very happy to see the Lord of Rivendell again. “Master Brur sends greetings.”
“Does he?” Elrond’s eyes twinkled. “Are you sure he didn’t say to remind Lindir and I to ‘stay the fuck out’ of his library?”
Ori and Dwalin both chuckled at this.
“He tried to,” Ori told them, “but Master Sadi kicked him in the shin and he said to tell you ‘Hello’, instead.”
Elrond gave a shout of laughter as Ori reached to hug Lindir, who looked extremely amused.
Dain and Sculdís came up to greet Elrond. Dain looked very pleased with himself as he’d stopped to smack Thranduil on the ass and salute him with a bellow of “Yer lookin finer than a puddle a’ gravy, our pixie!”
Sculdis hugged Cemnesta and the Rivendell party. Dain gave Cemnesta a look over and told him he looked like a ‘proper elf king,’ before shaking hands with Elrond and Lindir and knocking brows with the twins.
After everyone was greeted and welcomed, Cemnesta dispatched the company to his ada’s care. Thranduil led the way with Dori’s hand in his, chatting happily up some stairs and into a lovely round sitting room.
Ori stared at the weird furniture that was all made of boughs and decorated with velvet leaves of green and gold. Like the breakfast parlor at home, there was a set of long windows which led to a large round balcony with more seating. The chairs or couches, Ori decided, were all long and thin. There were doors all around, opening onto a number of bedrooms. Dori squealed with delight, at looking in one, seized Balin, and bustled him in, slamming the door after. Thranduil snickered and opened the door next to the balcony.
“Lord Ori, here is a room for you and your captain to take your rest.”
Ori thanked him and went in. He instantly realized what had made Dori squeal. He nearly squealed himself. He had heard stories, but this was the first time he’d ever seen a bed for people of the tall races. It was an immense pile of white cushions. It was bigger than any at the inn, it was bigger than Thorin’s and Bilbo’s!
To Ori, it was just like when he was a little badger and it had snowed for three days and he saw the pile of snow in the middle of Steam Alley. Ori carefully removed his satchel, belt, coat, and boots. He ran like he had back then and leapt to land in the middle of the snowy piles of pillows and quilts. They hoofed all around him like the snow had. He lay there, face down, giggling maniacally. There was another pouf of pillows and quilts as he was bounced upward by Dwalin landing beside him. They lay there and laughed witlessly for a bit. Ori finally recovered and rolled close to Dwalin.
“This is the biggest bed I’ve ever seen! We’ll need a map to find each other in the dark!”
“I’ll find yeh jus’ fine, love,” Dwalin teased, rolling on top of Ori and kissing him soundly.

It was quite a struggle to get themselves out of the bed, as they were laughing too hard while they did.

They explored the room and went out onto the balcony from the windowed door in their room. Ori looked out over the balustrade. He rubbed his eyes and stared, trying to figured out what he was looking at.

They were in a deep ravine. The palace was carved into the rock face at one end. There were beautiful flowers and winding garden paths throughout. Elves wandered everywhere.

The bottom of the couloir was all hillocks with a lovely, winding river. This river flowed under the palace, and Ori realized it must come out the other side, then connect to the Forest River which drained into the lake.

Feeling a little more oriented, Ori went back in and found his company gathered, chatting with Thranduil. Three elves drifted in bearing cups, a small cask of wine and large platters of fresh fruit.

Shortly after this, Cemnesta arrived and smiled on Ori.

“My friend, as is traditional, I must have you, Lord Balin and the Bearer come to the soldiers’ courtyard and inspect the detail Tauriel, Glorfindel, and I have selected to escort you through my lands. Also, you should look over the foodstuffs, tents and other supplies, I have to offer you.”

Ori nodded and looked to Dwalin. Soon, Ori, Dwalin, Dain, Sculdís, Balin, Dori and Kili accompanied Cemnesta, Tauriel, Thranduil and Glorfindel down to an underground area. Ori was surprised the elves had seen fit to ready a detachment of about thirty soldiers for the escort to Lothlórien.

Inspection, Ori found, consisted of him walking beside Cemnesta, the others following behind, as they strolled in front of a mathematically straight line of beautiful soldiers with beautiful and identical profiles, all of them clad in beautiful armor. Their eyes were trained on something opposite them, and spears and shields at the ready.

Dori floated behind, complimenting and admiring.

“Oh, what a lovely shield. How tall you are. Such finely polished boots! Are you using them to peek up my robe, you naughty thing?”

“How d’yeh bloody tell one soldier from another?” Dwalin muttered.

“No idea,” murmured Cemnesta. “I haven’t been here long enough. I think Ada chose them for uniformity. All I know is that they come when I call.”

He looked to Thranduil, who raised his brows and said, “Don’t look at me. I didn’t choose them, my ada did.”

“They’re all… alike,” said Cemnesta.

“That’s the thing about woodland elves, isn’t it,” said Thranduil. “It’s not all long hair and cheekbones, but a lot of it is.”

“They look lovely, pet. Such nice elves to guard you. How relieved I am,” Dori said, loudly.

“And such snappy dressers,” Ori teased.

“That, too.”

They finished the line and Cemnesta led the way to the middle, so all the soldiers faced them. Dwalin turned and glared at the small detail of soldiers the dwarrow had brought with them.

“Targ, Spar, Varil, Torq” barked Dwalin. “Yer all assigned as a personal guard t’ th’ King-Father ‘til we return an’ he dismisses yeh.

“Du Bekar!” hollered the four, and shoved over to stand at four points around Thranduil, arms crossed and murderous expressions on their faces. Thranduil looked delighted.

Cemnesta addressed his own soldiers.

“You are now assigned to Lord Ori of Fundin House, scribe to the High King of Dwarrow in his seat at Erebor. Serve him well. Captain Dwalin Fundinul is now your captain until he sees fit to dismiss you from his command.”

All shields lowered, the spears went to the sides and the guards bowed to Ori as one.

Ori swallowed, then,

“I thank you all and your king for your generous service. I-I hope you will have a chance to enjoy some of this adventure with us.”

The soldiers bowed again, but this time their eyes flickered in confusion.
“We’re so delighted to have all of you along for the fun! Such a lovely group of gentle-elves,” Dori helped.

Dwalin came to Ori’s rescue by barking out, “We muster a’ dawn. Be ready. Dismissed.”
The line turned and marched out of the yard to somewhere else. Dwalin chuckled as the door behind the soldiers shut.

“Brother?” Balin asked, Dori’s hand tight in his.
“Jus’ thinkin’ a’ Da’s face. Me, captainin’ a troop a’ elves.”
Balin chuckled.

“Good thing he’s in th’ Halls, brother, ‘r that would’a sent him straight there.”
Thranduil tried not to choke. The Fundin brothers looked at the king-father.
“I take it, yeh remember him, lad?” Balin asked.
“I do,” Thranduil said with a sly smile. “And you are right, the shock of seeing his younger son leading a squadron of elves would have ended him.”

“Ah, well,” Dwalin looked teasingly at Ori, “seein’ as they’ve bin assigned t’ me husband by th’ king hisself, mebbe he might a’ jus’ fainted instead.”
Thranduil cocked his head and frowned thoughtfully at Ori.
“I wonder what Fundin would have made of the marriages of his sons.”
“Now, Thrandy,” Dori scolded, “are you suggesting that my late adad-in-law and I would have not been delighted with one another?”
Balin snickered.
“No, me heart. Adad would have fallen utterly in love wi’ yeh at first sight. And that’d a’ left Mam t’ adore our Ori.”

Ori tucked his hand into Dwalin’s.
“Do you think your amad would have liked me?”
Dwalin smile tenderly.
“Aye, love. She was a warrior an’ a scholar. She’d a takin’ yeh t’ her heart, righ’ off.”

Ori hugged Dwalin’s arm. He liked the idea of Dwalin’s mother. Dori could have handled Fundin just fine.

Dori looked over Thranduil, surrounded by scowling dwarrow, then trotted over and kissed Dwalin’s cheek.

“Thank you, deary, now my dearest Thrandy has his own professional bullies! And how chic!”
Dwalin raised an eyebrow, waiting for Dori to continue.

“Standing there like that, surrounding him, they look like a charm bracelet!”
Cemnesta led them to a great cavern. In this sat three large wagons. Dwalin, Balin, Dain, and Sculdis looked over the tents and traveling supplies. Kili went through the food wagon, teasing Tauriel with the supply of lembas that was mostly for the soldiers.

“They’re not that bad!” Kili called.
“They?” gasped Tauriel. “How many did you eat?”
“Four,” called Kili before getting back to his work.
“Four?” Tauriel stared. “One bite is enough to sustain an elf through an entire day!”

Kill bobbed up again.
“Really? We should feed them to Bujni and watch what happens.”
Tauriel went off into a peal of laughter.

Ori was pleased that Kili was taking his part seriously as the cook. The young prince counted everything, went through several discussions with some elves who had packed it and, after quite a time, declared himself satisfied. Kili bounced up to Ori with his lists and handed them over. Ori looked through them briefly. Kili had planned several menus in case they somehow took over a week to get to Lothlórien.

“I thought I’d best make sure we didn’t run short in case there’s bad weather or any weird stuff.”
“I’m glad you did,” Ori said. “Being prepared is always good.”
Cemnesta returned them to their chambers. Ori went through their plans again. Dwalin asked the elf page outside to send the captain of Lord Ori’s detail to them.

This captain arrived and was introduced as Omosuil. He was tall and blond, with high cheekbones, and he wore beautiful armor. Ori despaired he wouldn’t be able to tell Omosuil from any of the other elves, but he did have very sharp green eyes. Ori decided to just go with that.

Dwalin and Ori discussed the route with him. Omosuil was calm for the most part, but Ori saw his eyes often stray to look about at the company. Soon he was drawn into the discussion of the route and Dwalin questioned him on his military history. Omosuil had not seen the battle of Khazad-dûm but had trained with a soldier who had.

Ori asked about Dol-Guldur.

“It is perfectly safe,” Omosuil stated.

“Oh I know,” Ori said. “Thranduil assured us it was. I was just wondering, that if we are passing it, perhaps we could take a look at it. On the way back, of course.”

Omosuil gazed at Ori.

“Why?”

Ori swallowed the reply, ‘because it’s there and we can’, and tried,

“It may hold facets of historical interest.”

Omosuil considered this.

“Yes, but it has been inhabited by orcs for many decades. Orcs are destructive creatures, nor do they build or maintain anything that is outside of military use.”

“So the building itself is not longer viable?” Ori asked.

Omosuil didn’t seem to want to go on, but Ori couldn’t figure out why until Dwalin explained.

“Orcs stink.”

“But they’re not there now.”

“No, but the stink stays.”

Ori raised an eyebrow at his husband. Dwalin grinned.

“Orcs shit where they stand.”

Ori looked at Omosuil, who nodded.

“Oh,” Ori wrinkled his nose at the thought. “Yes, we should probably give it a miss then. Pity.”

An elf maid entered.

“Lord Ori, you and your company are invited to the feast.”

“Thank you,” Ori managed before Dori burst out,

“Oh! This minute? I can’t wear this old rag to dine with a king!”

The female elf smiled graciously and assured Dori they would be escorted to the feasting hall in half an hour.

In exactly half an hour, Dori was resplendent in a flowing gown of red-brown silk bedecked with emeralds. She was escorted by Thranduil on one side and Balin on the other. Ori went first with Dwalin, following the elf maid, who had informed them of the feast.

The feasting hall was fascinating. Ori realized that the tributary he had seen disappear into the palace from the ravine was now above them. The ceiling was glassed in. The river flowed across and the ground above had been removed allowing any light coming through the forest above to play about the room. The remaining twilight was lovely and coupled with the candlelight made Ori wonder if this was how it felt to be a fish.

They were all seated at a long table. King Cemnesta presided at the head and he placed Ori on his right and Balin on his left. Dwalin was next to Ori. Thranduil sat at the foot with Dori on his right and Sculdís on his left with Dain. The rest of the company sat as they chose. Ori wondered what in all Arda they would be able to eat of the feast, as elves mostly ate raw green food when they were at home, or so he had read.

He was relieved that the meal began with a pale green, but quite good, watercress broth. This was followed by individual bowls of chopped apples, celery, nuts and grapes in a sweet milky sauce. Ori found this to be odd, but good. The main course was excellent, consisting of asparagus, steamed and served with a pale, savory sauce, a flavorful pudding of corn and a haunch of venison.

Dessert was a chestnut pudding and a jelly-ish liquid called fruit soup. Ori was of the opinion that this needed to be boiled hard and thickened, then served over a cake.

Conversation was mostly the company asking Cennesta how he was settling and filling Thranduil in on what had been going on in Dale. Vi and Margr kept up an undercurrent of gossip.

The party closed early and Ori was happy to settle in Dwalin’s arm’s in the exact middle of the giant bed.
Captains, Carapaces, and Capricious Cacophony

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Ori is in charge, Dori is having a wonderful time and everyone is along for the fun. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The singing woke Ori. It was still dark. Dwalin grunted and kissed him.
“C’mon, love. It’s time.”
They washed and dressed. Ori wondered why he wasn’t terrified, then reasoned he could wait to be terrified when they entered the mountain. Quartz flew in the window and perched on Ori’s shoulder as they made their way to the courtyard. He rubbed his beak against Ori’s cheek, which Ori found soothing.

As the first light flickered through the trees, the company and their guard took leave of King Cemnesta. The only mishap had been that Gimli’s pony managed, through frisking among the trees, to badly scrape his hock. Gimli gave the pony a scold. Legolas came to the rescue by saying Gimli could ride with him on the horse the people of Rohan had given him a few years ago. This large white horse, named Arod, with a slightly gray mane and tail, was not in the least bothered by having a dwarf added to Legolas’ weight on its back. Gimli didn’t look quite as serene at the prospect and had his arms firmly locked about Legolas’ waist.

Captain Omosuil on his brown stallion Bazweejin went first with a couple of other elves as the front scouts. Ori on Honda with Dwalin on Harley came next followed by Dain on Chopper, Glorfindel on Asfaloth with Margr pillion beside Vi, driving the first wagon, Sculdis driving the second, and chatting with Jani. Dori perched in her palanquin with Balin beside it on Ducati. Kili drove the last wagon as Tauriel rode her horse, Hoorachi, beside him. Saki, with Kili’s pack, trotted behind the wagon. The rest, surrounded by Omosul’s soldiers, traveled easily.

The elvish road through the forest was a good, well-maintained one and Ori was able to look about him, make notes and sketches in his book as they went along. Omosuil had said it was not yet time for stealth, thus pleasant conversation was possible.

Dori spent a great deal of time blowing kisses to Balin and engaging any elf soldier, foolish enough to be carrying the palanquin, in light chatter. Since Dori was keeping her hands employed by crocheting tiny clothing for the expected badger, most of Dori’s talk concerned babies. Did the current elf near her have children? Those who had, were thoroughly interviewed on their ideas concerning child rearing. No children, were they married? These were idly questioned on their courtship and encouraged to hold forth on the courtship adventures the pair had engaged on. Any unfortunate enough to be of a single status and not, by Dori’s skewed judgement, ‘craft-wed’, received Dori’s advice on ‘improving’ their love lives. Dori had plenty of suggestions for possible partners from among her friends. In this, she solicited Margr, Vi, and Jani’s help.

By lunch time, Kili and Tauriel were keeping a count on which soldiers were the most stalwart in the face of Dori’s attentive match-making. Ori sent a pleading look at Balin, who merely smiled and shook his head.

Nor was Omosuil exempt from Dori’s ‘assistance’.
“Captain Omosuil? Are you … em… unwell?” Ori asked, regarding the elf who had ridden away from Dori’s side and at faster pace than necessary.
“No,” said the elf slowly. “I was just in conversation with the Bearer.”
“He does have that effect on people.”
“I don’t understand. He? She? Your brother? Sister?”
“Just use ‘sibling’, if you’re not sure. It’s a Bearer thing.”
“Ah, we don’t have Bearers. Are there many in Erebor?”
“There aren’t many anywhere.”
“And you cannot tell them from the general population?”
“I think, if you asked Dori, he would say that would take all the fun out of it. If I might ask, what did Dori say to you?”
“I made the mistake of admiring her needle work. I asked what she was working on and she said,
‘A onesie’. After she explained what that might be, she told me if I was a particularly good ‘lad’, she would make me one to match my ‘pretty’ eyes.”
Ori snickered.
“Lucky you! Dori never offered to make me one!”
“Oh, just whenever Dori came to visit. Or, you could try to outclass King-Father Thranduil in his pajamas.”
“The king-father wears… pajamas?” The grin which spread across Omosuil’s face could best be described as evil.
“Yes. Shall I tell you about our time at the inn?”
“Please! I mean, if you would be so kind, Lord Ori. I’m sure it would help pass the time.”
Hours passed. The shadows slanted to the east and Omosuil was all but weak with laughter.
Once Ori began telling the ‘adventures of King Thranduil at the inn’, everyone in the Company had to add to it. Kili went so far as to clip the wagon reins and give a demonstration of the spinning contest. Ori was delighted to find that the forward party of elves had come back to crowd in and amongst the dwarrow to listen.

The forest was dark and old, tangles of branches and vines wandered everywhere. They came into what Ori thought was a clearing but turned out to be a large road set with cobblestones. The bright afternoon sun was startling after so much time under the leaves in the forest, and Ori was amazed to find he’d quickly gotten used to the strange, dappled light that constantly moved.
Legolas informed them this was the old Forest Road and was still occasionally used by traders from the west.
They crossed the road and plunged back into the trees.
Legolas assured them they would meet with Haldir by next nightfall.
“I hope Haldir is ready,” Ori commented. “Thanks to you and your people, we’re a day ahead of schedule.”
“He will be,” Legolas replied cheerfully. “The Lady will know.”
Glorfindel shouted out a laugh.
“Not to worry. Haldir always comes early.”
“Ooo, tha’s bloody selfish, tha’ is!” Margr objected.
Ori looked about. Despite his earlier misgivings, he was enjoying the cool darkness of the forest.
It was mid-summer, but everything felt curiously refreshed.
“I didn’t think a forest would be nice to travel through,” Ori commented.
“It’s much better now,” Tauriel said from further back. “Once Mordor fell, we were able to clear out all the spiders.”
“Spiders?” Ori questioned, imagining all the branches covered in waving Rutiles.
“Giant ones,” Legolas elaborated. “Three times the size of your Honda and with extremely long legs.”
“Are giant spiders usual to forests?” Ori didn’t like to think about this too much.
“No. They were dark beings.”
“Could you not tame them like we did the wargs?”
To be sure, Ori didn’t like the idea of riding a giant spider. Spiders walked on ceilings and he thought it would be hard to spend the journey upside-down, clinging for dear life.

“No, they only wanted to eat anyone who got in their path,” Glorfindel supplied.

“Nasty,” Vi pronounced. “Any good cooked up?”

All elves present made disgusted noises.

A couple of elves appeared out of the trees. They, with Legolas and Gimli, went forward to Captain Omosuil. A few moments later, Captain Omosuil rode up to Ori.

“Lord Ori, since your people are curious and we are making good time, would you and your company be interested in seeing a spider? A carcass has been found close by.”

Ori nodded and Dwalin called a halt. The Company gathered with Ori, who had his drawing tools at the ready. Omosuil and two soldiers led them all through a few glades to a hollow.

Ori stared. Legolas had not been joking. The horrid creature was huge. It lay on its stomach, legs splayed out. Ori drew feverishly, while Dain, Sculdis, and Jani gamely went up and had a good look at the spider. Balin and the sisters helped Dori over to the body, so Dori could touch it and squeak in shock. Ori hastily drew the spider with the dwarrow nearby for a size comparison. Dain with Kili and Tauriel’s help, easily lifted off the back carapace. It was a huge, smooth, shiny basin.

“Me dumplin’!” Dain clambered down and balanced the carapace on end near Dori. “Lookit this.”

“Ew,” Dori opined, pulling her robe away.

“Noono, me dumplin’. It’s a perfect bowl. It’d make a grand crib.”

“No!” Dori cried. “Dain, my dear brother, are you entirely mad? Sleeping in that? My badgerling will have nightmares!”

“Admirable bathtub, then?”

“It can be lined wi’ somethin’.”

“No!”

“Mmmph.” Dain looked it over again then sighed. “Pity. It’s a good shape, too. Wonder what yeh could do wi’ it.”

Sculdis went and took it from Dain.

“Have a think on it, me love. We’ll leave it here f’r now an’ if yeh come up wi’ anythin’, we’ll pick it up on th’ way back.”

“Yer very wise, me diamond.”

Dain put the carapace back and they returned to the road. Ori noticed that at this point some of the soldiers smiling amongst themselves. Ori looked up at Captain Omosuil beside him.

“We are a funny people, aren’t we?”

The captain swallowed and gave Ori a shocked look. He seemed to debate with himself then, smiled.

“You are unlike any I have ever met, Lord Ori.”

Ori smiled back.

“Imagine using spider bits for baby furnishings.”

Omosuil lost hold of a snort.

“If I ever marry, Lord Ori, I wouldn’t dare to suggest such a thing to my lady.”

“Go back and talk to Dori,” Ori sauced. “If you want to be married, you know my brother will be delighted to find you a suitable mate.”

Omosuil chuckled.

“My soldiers are drawing lots as to who shall carry the palanquin and spend time with the Bearer next.”

“Kili and Tauriel are keeping count on who lasts the longest,” Ori told him dryly.

That made Omosuil laugh. His bright eyes twinkled down at Ori.

“Shall I send a message to have a squad follow us and fetch King Dain’s …er… bath tub back to the palace?”

Ori snickered, “Only if you want to see him try it out. With our luck, he’ll start wearing it as a hat.”
Omosuil retired, amused, to the front. Dwalin came and held Honda’s bridle while Ori got on.
yeh made ‘im smile, love. Wha’ yeh tell ‘im?”
“I told him if he wanted to be married to go and talk to Dori, then he offered to have that spider bowl fetched to Cermesta’s palace for Dain to use as a hat.”
“Dain’d do it,” Dwalin commented, swinging himself onto Harley. “ ‘R he’d have Sculdis cover it in jewels an’ sell it t’ Hild at ’n extortiona’e price.”
“As a hat?” Ori teased.
Dwalin laughed. They spent a few minutes suggesting possible uses Hild could put it to.
Ori thought that a mirror could be placed in it and Dwalin said she would put it on wheels and use it as a tiny cart or attach a handle to perambulate her first grandchild in.
Dain rode up on Chopper and demanded to know what they were saying about him. They went through their suggestions as to what he could sell the piece to Hild as, but Dain was enamored of the idea of having it as a hat.
“It’d be brilliant,” Dain bellowed. “I could have it f’r ridin’ me Chopper in bad weather! It’d keep th’ rain off both of us.”
Chopper grunted in agreement.
“Captain Omosuil,” Ori called.
The captain rode back, looking ready to be diverted.
“King Dain would like the spider bit sent back to your king’s palace. He’s going to use it as a bad weather hat.”
Omosuil stared at Dain, who winked at him. Omosuil burst out laughing, sketched a bow from his saddle, and returned to the front. Ori saw a thrush drop to the elf’s arm, then fly away. Quartz fluttered to Ori’s shoulder. Ori looked and saw that the raven had a number of long hairs from the spider. Ori removed these from Quatrz’s beak.
“What are these for, Quartz?”
Quartz looked very proud.
“Tiny points at the ends. Hollow. Use for drawing or writing maybe?”
Ori was touched and put a hand against the raven’s side and gently pressed the feathered body to his cheek.
“Thank you, Quartz. I’ll try them out.”
Quartz settled down on Ori’s shoulder, nibbled at his hair and beard beads, and tapped his beak against Ori’s nose.
When the road was shrouded in evening darkness, the elves led them off it to a pleasant glade with a stream running along the edge of it. Captain Omosuil declared the water potable and the tents were pitched.
Kili created a delicious vegetable stew. This was served with meat on skewers and soda bread baked in the coals. The soldiers were quite surprised and praised Kili’s stew and the bread heartily.
They murmured to Tauriel that she was wise in finding a mate who was such a good provider.
After the meal, the dwarrow settled down with their pipes and mugs of ale from the small keg that Kili produced from the pack wagon. They sang old songs and told stories, and toasted pieces of pound cake in the fire. The elves gathered near to listen with wide-eyes. Dain and Sculdis all but competed in telling ribald tales which made Dori scold and vainly try to cover Gimli’s ears, then failing that, latched onto an elf she decided was the youngest. The elf tried to explain he was over three thousand years old, but Dori insisted that since he was not four thousand and fifty, the stories were unfit for his tender years. This left Glorfindel and Gimli rolling on the ground.
Omosuil looked as though he wanted to ask something. Ori nodded to him.
“What’s on your mind, Captain?”
“My soldiers and I are curious as to the nature of your quest. What is it you hope to find in Moria?”
Ori briefed them on the box. The elves considered this then,
“How did you find out something was missing from your history?” Omosuil’s second, a dark haired elf named, Nomiriel asked.
Ori considered, then quietly related Durin telling him in a dream then seeing Durin in the mirror. The elves seemed startled by this and muttered in Sindarin. They used a word Ori didn’t know and he asked the meaning right away. This was discussed and Tauriel finally said,
“I think you call them spirits or ghosts?”
Ori nodded.
“Yes. Something like that.” Ori frowned then asked quickly, “Is this something elves consider taboo to speak of?”
“Oh no,” Legolas assured him. “It’s just very unusual and sad as elves are immortal and ghost are of death.”
“Oh!” cried Dori. “What fun! Dear Thranduil can now haunt people, if he wants to!”
Legolas and Tauriel looked appalled.
“Aye, “ Dain agreed. “Our pixie’d never resist tha’ chance. Mind, if he ever comes an’ bother’s me on th’ bog, I’ll be having’ words wi’ Mahal an’ Eru!”
“No one bothers yeh on th’ bog, luv,” Sculdis soothed. “Too bloody frigh’enin’.”
“Oi, “ Dain objected. “I kept me weddin’ vow t’ yeh ne’er t’ eat a whole crock o’ salt-soaked beans in a sittin’.”
The elf squad tried desperately to maintain their serenity, most failed and tried to stifle giggles.
“I’ve seen a ghost,” Kili stated from his curled up seat on Tauriel’s lap.
“Who was it?” Gimli demanded.
“I was quite young. I was sick in bed and woke up. There beside my bed was an older looking dam. She smiled at me and patted my hand then smoothed back my hair. I felt better and went back to sleep. I told Mam in the morning and she said it was Umad looking after me.”
“That’s beautiful!” Tauriel said, her eyes bright. “She was able to come and see you even though she was in the Halls of Aü…er…Mahal.”
Kili grinned up at her. “See. It’s not always sad.”
“But still strange,” she said thoughtfully.
“It’s no’ that unusual, is it?” said Vi. “I mean, Mar an me’ve seen spirits off an’ on our whole lives.”
“Have you?” Ori asked, leaning forward with interest.
Margr snorted.
“Off an’ on ye callin’ it, our Vi? There were days when we was tweens, it was a regular parade a’ dead people through th’ house - nigh’ an’ day. No’ real surprisin’ when yeh grow up in a roomin’ house.”
Kili sat forward and poked the fire.
“Does that make a difference? Living in a rooming house?”
“Think abou’ it,” said Vi. “Folk comin’ an’ goin’, livin’ an’ dyin’, all th’ blessed time. When they die, it’s jus’ business as usual.”
“Did anyone else in your family see them?” Ori asked. “You don’t think your mother or brother ever saw them?”
Nomirliel hastily refilled Vi’s mug, obviously wanting to hear more.
“Ta, pet. Mam pr’bly did, but Brother? Don’t think so. Mam said lasses was more inclined t’ see ‘em for some reason.”
“Were you ever afraid?” Legolas asked.
The sister looked at one another and shook their heads.
“Nah,” said Margr. “Growin’ up in East Dale, it was th’ livin’ yeh worried abou’. Ain’t tha’ so, our Ori?”
Ori smiled and nodded.
“The dead don’t eat your food or ask for money,” he said.
“An’ they come in handy, don’t they Vi?”
“Come in handy?” repeated Omosuil in shock.
“Aye, luv. Tha’s how I go’ rid a’ me second husband. Oi, he was a stinker. Wouldn’ listen when I put in me two coppers f’r anythin’. Wouldn’t listen abou’ th’ spirits. Tol’ me I were crazy,
“all abou’ in me heed.”

Glorfindel looked incensed on her behalf and pulled her closer.

“I hope you threw him down a stairway.”

“Didn’t hafta,” chuckled Vi. “I told’ him th’ dead folk were comin’ t’ kill ‘im in his sleep, so’s he’d become one a’ them. He laughed a’ tha’, but he was gone by mornin’.”

“No loss,” said Margr. “Here our Vi, why’d yeh even marry ‘im?”

“Kept me happy in th’ bottom bits. If only he’d bin mute.”

Gimli wiped his mouth with the back of his hand.

“Wha happened t’ yer firs’ husband?”

“Gimli!” Jani cried. “Tha’ ain’t poli’e.”

“Jus’ askin’.” said Gimli, “as we’re talkin’ on it, anyways.”

“Him?” Vi considered. “Him, I seem t’ have misplaced. No idea where he is, bu’ he was jus’ a wee thin’. I may’ve jus’ mislaid ‘im in me handbag.”

While the sisters and Sculdis snickered over this, Ori glanced at Omosul who looked as though he had been pinched on the bottom with hot tongs. Dori was looking over Omosuil with a critical eye. Ori wondered what would happen next. He didn’t have long to wait.

“You know,” Dori said in the throbbing accent Ori remembered from his badgerhood when Dori and the sisters had been talked into telling a scary story to Nori and himself, “it’s not the spirits of your own people you have to concern yourself with, but those of others.”

Dori shook his head. Ori saw him glance at the sisters.

“Eeee, lovey,” Margr agreed, “tha’ s th’ hones’ truth. Much t’ be afeart f’r an’ make yeh walk wi’ a care t’ yersel’,”

The elves all exchanged puzzled looks.

“What do you mean, ma’am?” Nomirliel asked.

“Yeh have t’ be careful once it’s dark an’ th’ spirits walk loose in th’ land, lassie,” Vi told her in a dour tone.

“Aye,” Dain agreed. “Th’ hobbits’ve their barrow-wights, an’ there’s plenty other thin’s.”

“The Darkness has left Arda with the fall of Mordor,” Legolas insisted.

“Oh yes, that darkness,” Dori said, loftily. “There are, you know, other things.”

“Other things?” echoed Omosuil, reminding Ori of himself as a badger.

“Yes, child,” Dori said with infinite patience. “You should be more careful, especially here in the wood.”

The elves laughed and wanted to know what could possibly be in the wood they that they wouldn’t know about. Dori pinned them with her eye.

“There are many things afoot. You perhaps do not fully comprehend the shockingly horrid creatures that roam the night.”

“Aye,” Vi agreed. “Terrible thin’s. It’s said there’s them evil blood-sucking worms tha’ lurk in dark pools.”

“Leeches?” Omosuil scoffed.

“No, no, laddie!” Margr chimed in. “Leeches is nuthin’ an’ quite medicinal. We’re talkin’ ’bout parasites.”

“Parasites?” Nomirliel stared.

“Aye, bigger than yer arm, luv.”

“They get in yer tubes,” added Vi in a dark tone.

“Tubes?” asked another elf, equally at sea.

“Poison?” Gimli started.

“Aye,” Dain concurred. “Bu’ yeh go’ t’ be careful.”

“I should think you would,” Omosuil gasped.

Dain nodded in agreement.

“Aye, it’s gotta be th’ righ’ poison.”
“How can you tell?” Omosuil demanded.
“Well, tha’ s th’ trick, ain’t it?” Vi told him. “That’s why yeh gots t’ be careful.”
Ori heard the elves muttering amongst themselves. They were confused as to whether these parasites existed or that the dwarrow really were aware of a danger they had not come across. It didn’t seem to occur to any of them that they were just being told ‘stories’.
“Then there’s th’ neccrocs,” Dain began.
“What are those?” Nomirliel asked.
“Terrible dangerous them lot are.” Margr shook her head. “Wouldn’ like t’ meet one a’ those. Gotta stay indoors ‘r they’ll getcha!”
“But what are they?” Nomirliel insisted.
“Like ‘n orc bu’ far worse,” Sculdis explained.
Since orcs were thought to be mutations of captured elves, the woodland people drew closer to the fire, and gave each other and the trees sideways glances.
“They don’t die when yeh kill ‘em,” Sculdis went on. “An’ when they’re supposed t’ be dead an’ re wanderin’ about’, an’ bits an’ bobs start t’ fallin’ off, they just replace ‘em with whatever weapon they got t’ hand.”
“Such as?” Omosuil asked skeptically.
“Suppose it loses a foot,” she elaborated. “An’ all it had t’ use was a… a…”
“Hook!” Dain supplied.
“Tha’s it!” Sculdis approved.
“I’m afraid I don’t understand,” said Omosuil. “Why would someone fear an orc with a hook for a foot? Would it not overbalance when it walked?”
“No, no, luv!” Margr said. “Can’t overbalance if yer dead. Sneaks up on yeh while yeh sleep an…”
She leaned close the grabbed his leg, shrieking “E get’s yeh!”
Omosuil pulled back and lifted a brow.
“Is this some strange initiation ritual to which the dwarrow subject their companions?” Glorfindel snorted.
“Yes, Omos. Soon, you’ll begin to grow a beard.”
“I told you not to call me that.”
“It’s better that what I called you as a fawn.”
“Not by much,” Omosuil muttered.
“‘Almos’?” Margr asked “Why would yeh call ‘im tha’?”
“Aye,” Vi agreed. “Wha’d e ‘almos’ do?”
Things grated to a halt at that point and Dori sent everyone to bed. Dwalin and Captain Omosuil had a brief argument about watches, before Dwalin escorted Ori to their tent.
Ori and Dwalin had put down the thick mat and undid the fluffy bedroll then put the second on top for a quilt. They stripped to their drawers and Ori settled to write up the day’s events in full. Dwalin lay down beside him, his head against Ori’s hip, looking through the sketches Ori had made during the ride.
“We’re a day ahead, so we’re doing quite well, yes?”
“Aye, love. Fuck, lookit th’ spider. Bloody ugly beast. Glad we didn’t have t’ deal wi’ ‘em. Fighting’ in th’ trees’s never easy.”
Ori finished and closed his book. Dwalin handed him his sketch book and lay back as Ori cuddled under the cover, next to Dwalin.
“That spider was horrible. I’m glad they’re all gone now. The elves must be relieved.” Ori had a bad thought. “I hope there won’t be any in the mountain.”
“Nuthin’ f’r ‘em t’ eat there. They ate th’ fores’ animals. Deer an’ th’ like.”
Ori looked up, the canvas above them moved slightly in the light breeze. It was then Ori heard all the forest noises, so many noises! He picked out the now familiar ones from the stay at the lake. Frogs, owls, a few night birds, crickets but the forest contained many more, including a few that were not of the animal variety. He lay looking up into the darkness, waiting for the noise to subside, but the wind seemed to carry it closer, not further away. It went on and on.

Ori was at the point of marching out of the tent to have a word with whoever was on guard and pop them one on the nob for whistling. He hissed at Dwalin, who chuckled.

“Pine trees, love. The wind blowing th’ needles, make th’ noise.”

Ori groaned and buried his face into the bedroll.

“And the leaves rustling,” Ori muttered. “No wonder elves sing all the time. It’s to drown out the racket!”

Ori sighed and put his head on Dwalin’s shoulder. Quartz flew in and landed on Ori’s hip and gave him a saucy whistle.

“Hush, you,” Ori grumbled as Quartz chuckled.

Once Ori knew the noises to be normal for a forest, he was able to drop asleep.
Breakfast, Bastions, and Banding Together

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. We’re traveling through the forest and there’s lots to see, investigate, and talk about. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori groaned. Why was their bed hard? Forest noises reminded him and he sat up. The light was dim but the birds seemed to be shouting. Dwalin rolled onto his back and yawned.

“Dawn chorus,” Dwalin said.

“What?”

“Dawn chorus. Birds all start twitterin’ at beginnin’ a’ dawn.”

“Oh.” Ori leaned down and kissed his husband.

“Time to get up, then?”

“Aye.”

Quartz flew in and shook his feathers.

“Kili’s cooking. Smells good. Save some?”

“Of course,” Ori promised.

Ori stepped out. Kili was busy at the fire which he had rebuilt. He grinned at Ori.

“Porridge with fruit, fried ham, and baked eggs and bread. I’ve got a good jorum of tea. Don’t worry, I brought sugar and dried milk for it.”

“That sounds wonderful,” Ori enthused and, with Dwalin behind him, hurried to the stream to wash. Once dressed, Dwalin settled him at the fire and went to check in with Captain Omosuil.

Ori was grateful for the tea and busied himself with the map once more, Kili having refused his help with breakfast.

Dwalin returned with the captain and shouted for everyone to get up. Gimli shot out and was washed and dressed in seconds. Dain swore roundly and stuck his head out of his tent to glare at Dwalin.

“It’s bloody barely dawn, yeh fuckhead!” Dain growled

“An’ this ain’t th’ time t’ be fuckin’ around!” Dwalin barked. “We got t’ ge’ on. Move yer arse!”

“Oi! I’m a king, yeh shithead!” Dain hollered.

“Aye, an’ I’m th’ firs’ assistan’ t’ the leader a’ this comp’ny, so move yer royal arse!” Dwalin bellowed.

Dain chuckled appreciatively and disappeared.

Ori saw the elves and Captain Omosuil staring.

Tauriel grinned at Omosuil, saying in Sindarin,

“Welcome to the world according to dwarrow.”

“I thought they were going to kill each other!” Omosuil said, still a little aghast.

“Oh no,” Tauriel told him breezily. “That would have involved weaponry; if they’re just yelling and punching each other, it’s quite friendly.”

“Blessed Eru,” gasped the captain.

Ori grinned as the captain looked at him.

“Don’t worry, we’re all family in this company. And I do mean family, we’re all related by blood and marriage… and guilt by association.”

“You’re fluent in Sindarin?” a soldier gasped. “I thought you just knew a few words.”
“Yes,” Ori replied in a teasing tone. “So if you want to keep secrets, you’d better switch to Quenya.”

A few soldiers looked shocked, but others began to laugh quietly.

“Food’s ready!” Kili shouted. “Come and get it!”

The porridge and the bread and egg bake was a hit with the elves. Many came up to Kili and complimented him. Kili grinned and told them that at home, cooking was his way of getting out of washing the dishes. The soldiers, finding out that he was a prince, were amazed at his ability to cook and happily offered to wash the dishes for him. Kili soon had a group about him asking if this was something all dwarf princes had to do. Ori fed tidbits of meat to Quartz. The meal was eaten, dishes washed and everything repacked before the sun had fully risen.

The road wound on. Ori busied himself with watching the map and taking notes on what they saw. There was plenty to see. Deer peeked out at them. There were squirrels, rabbits, mice, birds of all kinds. Quartz fluttered about and often perched on Ori’s shoulder to tell him what he’d seen. Once a tiny shrew scurried into the middle of the path and challenged them with enraged squeaks.

Chopper came forward to see and the shrew left in a hurry.

They lunched under a cherry tree, helping themselves to the fruit as Tauriel and Legolas and a couple of other elves brought down more from the top. Kili repacked a few things, freeing up a pail, and this was quickly filled with ripe red fruit.

They continued on. Captain Omosuil came back to tell them they were making excellent time and Dol-Guldur was only two hours away. Did Lord Ori still want to see it?

“Will it set us back much?” Ori asked.

“Very little. Even if we go and spent some time there, we will still arrive at our meeting place with Captain Haldir this evening, a day ahead of what we planned.”

Ori grinned.

“And how badly does it stink?”

Omosuil quirked an eyebrow.

“Several weeks of spring and summer rains have rendered it… less stinky.”

“Seeing as we were to meet Haldir midmorning tomorrow…” Ori looked back at the Company.

He stood up in his stirrups.

“Does anyone have an objection to seeing Dol-Guldur?”

The shouts of interest decided him and Ori gave a nod to Captain Omosuil, who smiled and went forward once more.

The ruins appeared through the trees. Ori thought they looked extremely creepy. The wagons and ponies were left with five of Omosuil’s soldiers and everyone else went forward to see the old castle.

Dwalin, Sculdis, Legolas, and Gimli went first with Omosuil and a couple of others, Kili and Tauriel covered them, bows at the ready. Ori followed with the rest of the company and the soldiers. Everyone was on point, even though the place had been cleared out. Ori looked up and saw Quartz flying high, scanning the area.

Ori sketched like mad as they neared it. Rubble was scattered everywhere, making walking awkward. Glorfindel loped forward and, sword drawn, swept through the open doorway.

Ori went up two ruined steps and looked into the entry. It was dark but for some holes which were once windows. Weeds and other fast growing vegetation popped up in various places. Puddles from rain pooled where the flagstones had crumbled. The elves peered about, making Gimli chuckle and produce a torch he’d stuck in his belt. Dain dragged a flint box out of a pocket. The torch threw a strong light about. Glorfindel spotted the stair that led up and around the tower to the top. Glorfindel went up and declared the stair usable.

It was a long climb but they all reached it. Ori gazed out at all the forest around them, busily sketching the view. He looked down over the battlements. He could see outlines in the lumpy grass and plants where the old foundations had been. It was very quiet. A small herd of reddish-furred deer grazed in what had been a back courtyard. The main balcony was wide enough to hold a small army. It was missing rather a lot of the balustrade.

“Have ya noticed?” Jani asked. “Th’ stones’re under a lot o’ pressure. They’re real angry.”

“I was trying to ignore that,” said Ori. “We aren’t going to be here very long, and maybe that’s a good thing.”

“This stone’s weathered many a long year,” Jani commented. “When this was built, the trees must a’ bin saplin’s.”

“Yes, “ Ori said, remembering his readings. “The historians spoke of the trees being nearly a mile away. This tower could be seen from the Misty Mountains and from Rohan.”

“My!” Dori said, looking about, “Trees do grow fast, don’t they.”

As Ori watched, the trees faded from view. The vegetation retreated and the stones rose out of the ground, and grew into walls, courtyards. The deer were replaced by soldiers at exercise. He heard the sounds of shouting, talking, even the voice of a chorus singing. He smelled fires, cooking, pony dung, wash water and freshly washed clothes. As he turned in a circle he saw the fortress as it had been originally, in its prime, before the coming of Sauron. It would never be this way again. He strained to store every sight, every sensation, in his mind, with the intention of recording it on paper.

Perhaps others would dismiss it as a folly, but he would know differently.

Between one blink in the next, it was all gone. The ruins returned, along with the vague, nauseating smell of orc.

They all stood in silence for a few moments then all descended again. Dwalin stood peering into an alcove which held a stair disappearing into the depth. Ori started over to join him, but recoiled at the smell. He turned to his husband.

“Dw-”

Dwalin’s hand was over his mouth and at a signal from Dwalin, the dwarrow hustled everyone out swiftly. Once they were back outside and halfway to the wagons, Ori asked for himself and the puzzled elves.

“There was something alive down there, Dwalin?”

“Aye.”

“There are no orcs in there,” Omosuil snapped.

“Didn’t say there was.” Dwalin replied easily. “But as Mahal’s me witness, I know what a bear smells like.”

Ori giggled in spite of himself.

“If bears are living there now, there are definitely no orcs.”

Omosuil blinked then looked at Glorfindel, who was a trifle red.

“I can’t remember encountering any bears before.” Glorfindel admitted. “I’ve never thought about what they might smell like.”

“Oh, our Glorfy!” Margr scolded. “Leadin’ th’ Bearer an’ us innocent hand maidens int’ a bear’s den!”

“Shockin’, our Glorfy, shockin’!” Vi teased.

“Righ’,” Balin said, “with yer leave, wee brother, I say back t’ th’ road an’ on our way.”

“Oh, yes,” Ori agreed. “I got some sketches done, so that will make Master Brur happy. Thank you for bringing us to see this place, Captain Omosuil.”

“Oh, our Margr!” Vi cried. “Yeh’ve been ridin’ along with our Glorfy all this time! I’m takin’ a shot at ‘im!”

“Yeh took plenty a’ shots at ‘im las’ night!” Margr replied, but graciously took up the reins of the wagon.

They restarted their way along the road. Quartz landed on Honda’s head and looked at Ori.

“See a bear?”

“No, but I could smell it.”

“Great,” Ori muttered. “Quartz, if you see any more bears or wolves or the like, please tell us, elves don’t seem to be concerned with them.”

“Yup,” Quartz promised. “See the fortress change?”
“Yup,” said Ori.

Ori led the way with Omosuil and Dwalin, the map open on Ori’s knees. He had been meticulous in marking their journey on it, numbering places, and describing each event in his journal and in his sketch book.

Everyone was now chatting and laughing together. Dain and Chopper, in a very friendly gesture, allowed a few of the elves rides on Chopper’s back. This made the elves giggle dementedly and Nomirliel nearly fell off when Chopper began frisking.

In return, Dain, with some difficulty, was boosted onto Omosuil’s horse. Dain crowed at the view and grabbed at the leaves above. When he had a large bunch, he hopped down easily and, with great ceremony, presented the ‘bouquet’ to his queen. Sculdis hooted, kissed her king soundly, and started sticking the leaves in his hair. Dain remounted Chopper, his leaf ‘crown’ fluttering, and rode on proudly. Any leaves that fell, he used to adorn Chopper’s head.

The trees thinned and there, in a secluded clearing, stood another squad of elves in formation. These, Ori noted, were dressed in silver and gold armor and were all blonde and stern. Captain Haldir, his helm under his arm, stood ready for them.

Omosuil rode forward and greeted the Lorien captain.

Ori listened in on the conversation conducted in Sindarin.

“Hail, Captain of the Greenwood.”
“Hail and well met, Captain of the Lórien wood.”
“You have discharged your service to your king and to my Lady. We shall bid you good travel as you return to Erys Lasgalen.”
“Your eagerness to relieve us of our charges is commendable. But we shall continue with the Company of Lord Ori.”
“You are not turning back to the palace?” Haldir asked with raised brows. “You are joining us on the road to Lórien?”
“Yes,” said Omosuil. “You might need our assistance.”
“Assistance? I believe we are certainly up to fighting any threat we might find in Lórien,” said Haldir haughtily. “Assuredly, better than anyone from the Greenwood would be.”
“Oh, not that kind of assistance.” Omosuil assured Haldir.

Ori thought Omosuil was enjoying this discussion far too much. Omosuil smiled charingly.

“You see, we have spent several days in close company with the Bearer.”
“And?”
“Should there be any cultural misunderstandings, we’ll be here to assist you.”
“Cultural misunderstandings?” Haldir stared, open-mouthed, at Omosuil.
“Oi! Our Diry!” Dain bellowed at Haldir. “Nice britches! They yer best? Er, tha’ is, yer new best?”

Ori could have sworn he heard Haldir’s neck crack as the blond head swiveled to catch sight of Dain and Chopper, still bedecked in leaves. Haldir’s expression was a study.

Ori rode up and dropped from Honda. He came forward and greeted Haldir in Sindarin.

“Hail and well met, Captain of the Lórien wood. We are honored by your lady’s offer to see us safely to Lórien under your escort.”

Haldir gazed down on him as though Ori was a bug in his wine. Ori smiled wider.

“Your Lady expects us on the morrow. My company is weary after our travel and we shall rest the night here. I’m sure this is perfectly acceptable to you, as it is to Captain Omosuil, whose soldiers have guarded us so carefully, for King Cemnesta gave him and his good soldiers to the service of my husband, Captain Dwalin Fundinul, until he sees fit to dismiss them from his command.”

A ghost of horror crossed Haldir face and disappeared as he groped to understand this.

Honda came forward and laid her head across Ori’s shoulder and stared at Haldir. Ori felt Quartz land on the top of his head.
“Hail and well met, Ourdiry!” shouted Quartz in ancient Khuzdul, apparently thinking this was actually Haldir’s name. Ori waited for Haldir to gather his wits.

The elf captain bowed.

“As you wish, Lord Ori of Fundin.”

Ori turned at called to his company.

“Time to camp!”

The company was instantly in a bustle of activity. The wagons were staged on three sides of the camp and the tents pitched. Wood was gathered and a large fire pit prepared. Omosuil’s soldiers gamely joined in and the camp was ready and dinner being prepared in minutes. Two of Omosuil’s soldiers brought Kili a brace of rabbits and Jani led two more soldiers off to the nearest stream with a net. They returned with a mess of perch flopping about.

Kili hopped up on a stone to embrace Tauriel as she returned with three pheasants for the pot. She carefully plucked them and saved the feathers, as Kili promised to fletch her arrows for her. Tauriel raised an eyebrow at him and he explained he would use the brightly colored ones, so her arrows would honor their targets, being beautiful as well as deadly just like her. Tauriel laughed and shook her head at her love in amused surrender.

Kili prepared food as Sculdís and Dain laid a large grate over the fire. Fish was wrapped in leaves and mud then thrust into the coals, the rabbits and pheasants, cut down one side and roasted on the grate. Kili made a slurry of eggs, rolled some slices of lembas in flour, then in the eggs, and back in the flour and dropped them in a pot of oil. He repeated this with thick slices of onions and put thick slices on cabbage on the grate then turned them and put slices of cheese on them. Omosuil and his squad ate heartily of these, and like the dwarrow, used their fingers and licked them at Haldir’s squad, who primly ate plain lembas.

A couple of Haldir’s squad tried the deep fried lembas and marveled at the delicious change in taste. Kili whipped up dried milk with water to a froth and poured it on sweetened scones smothered in a sauce of cherries, roasted in a pan with nutmeg and maple sugar. All of Haldir’s soldiers tried this dessert and praised it.

Haldir continued to eat his virtuously plain lembas. He looked like he wanted to order his soldiers to do so at well.

Ori thought Haldir must be racking his brains, looking for a way to reprimand his soldiers and for what.

Insubordinate eating?

Fraternizing with Dain and not scowling?

Once more there were stories and singing. Omosuils soldiers joined in the singing of the dwarrow songs and told a few stories of their own. Ori was amused that Omosuils’s squad made themselves perfectly comfortable; eating meat, chatting to Dori, and romping with Legolas, Gimli, Kili, and Tauriel as thought they had all been together since badgerhood.

Ori curled up in his and Dwalin’s bedding once more, feeling pleased with the journey so far, and looking forward to seeing Lady Galadriel and Lord Celeborn again.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Welcome to Lórien, where the elves are waiting and Galadriel has a new friend for the Company to meet. The Glossary and Appendix have been updated to help you keep track! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

They were on their way as the sun dawned, full of Kili’s pancakes smothered in butter and hot maple syrup served with sausages and fried sliced lembas with cheese melted on top. Haldir and his soldiers led the way and Omosuil’s mixed in with the Company.

Ori looked about as they came out of the forest. It was almost strange to be out from the trees and see the grassy plain before them. Straight to the west, was the golden haze that was Lothlórien.

Soon enough they crossed the River Anduin in small boats and reached the trees and once the trees became thick and very tall, Haldir called a stop.

“From here onward, you must all be blindfolded,” said Haldir. “Outsiders may not know the exact way to the heart of Lothlorien.”

The outcry was immediate and direct.

“Fuck yeh,” shouted Gimli. “We was invited.”

“Captain Haldir!” Omosuil barked.

Dain gave a bellow of rage and Ori was afraid Glorfindel would use the king as a battering ram.

Haldir was resolute.

“Now you have come thus far, you must be brought before the Lord and the Lady. They shall judge you, to hold you or give you leave, as they will.”

“Wait!” Ori said, surprised that the noise died as he spoke. “Quartz, please go and see Lady Galadriel and ask if these are her orders for my Company. We shall wait here for your return.”

“Wonder if she’ll have snacks,” Quartz muttered absently as he flew away.

Ori folded his arms and stood his ground before Haldir. Honda snuffed Ori’s ear. Ori felt Dwalin standing at his back and he didn’t need to look behind him to know that the entire company, including Omosuil’s soldiers, was standing just like him, but, unlike him, he sensed they were all glaring as hard as they could at Haldir.

Haldir looked determined, but Ori was sure the elf captain wouldn’t do anything rash. They were perfectly safe. All they had to do was stand there, in silence, and wait for word to come back from the Lady.

Yes, that was all they had to do.

Stand there, silently, and hope Haldir didn’t realize one of his own soldiers stood behind him, crossing his eyes at the back of Haldir’s head.

Giggling was also right out.

Bloody elves.

An odd ‘pop’ sounded and there stood Lady Galadriel with Quartz on her shoulder. She wore robes of silver over white, her fingers and toes twinkling with mithril rings and her ankles circled in tiny bells that tinkled musically whenever she moved.

Quartz cawed excitedly.

Galadriel laughed and scratched him lightly under the beak.
Ori drew a deep breath. At the same time he bowed and said, “M’lady. It’s good to see you again.”
“Lord Ori, you are a day early.”
Haldir also bowed and said, “M’lady, thank Eru you are here!”
She sighed and came to the elf captain. “Haldir, I owe you an apology.”
“I assumed from our talks that you would exempt Lord Ori’s Company from the laws under which we govern peddlers, adventurers, and the hopelessly lost. Your diligence may someday be the death of you.”
Haldir swallowed.
She smiled and patted his cheek. “But today is not that day.”
Then she turned and surveyed the glowering crowd at Ori’s back and put a delicate hand over her mouth. Ori thought this may be the elf version of face-palming.
“I see,” she said finally, “that Cemnesta was wise to ask that we expand our accommodations.
Captain Omosuil, you and your soldiers are quite welcome.”
M’lady.”
She walked past him. “Where is my Dori?”
A squeal of delight called her to the palanquin and she came forward to embrace Dori while lifting the Bearer from her well-appointed nest. Dori fussed over her and she giggled charmingly. Ori watched Haldir’s squad, who were shocked and intrigued.
A saddled white palfrey wandered toward the lady, browsing unconcernedly at the lower greenery as the friends all greeted one another again and Captain Haldir reassembled his air of authority.
Lady Galadriel replaced Dori lightly in the palanquin.
“Ah, there you are, Banbury,” said the lady addressing the palfrey, then she mounted, and they continued on their way, chattering and laughing. Lady Galadriel, riding beside the palanquin, was anxious to hear what they had seen and said and eaten.
“I’d be happy to fry some up for you, Lady Galadriel,” called Kili from his wagon.
“Don’t worry, I will hold you to that,” she said, turning to him with a smile. “It sounds like it would go wonderfully with a tankard of good ale.”
They rode deeper and deeper into a different forest, a forest made up, not of the gold flowers and silver trunks Ori expected, but by any number of different types of trees. He recognized them from his time at the inn: oaks, elms, pines of different sizes and shapes. He was far more confident under these trees than he expected.
Until one of them stepped into the path in front of them.
“Hoom!”
It cleared its throat. Through its mouth. Which sat under its long, knobby nose and large, black eyes, shaded with mossy brows. Then it bent far down to examine them.
“Hoom!”
The Company ground to a halt, the ponies stamped and shied; Ori barely kept his seat, mainly through desperate determination.
Behind him, out of deep silence, Kili said, “What. The. Fuck?”
“Ah, Treebeard!” Lady Galadriel cried, riding forward. Her own mount and those of the elves seemed unaffected. “You’re in time to meet Lord Ori’s Company.”
“So… many…,” said the tree that was, most definitely, not a tree. “Dwarf… with… axes.”
“Oh, shit,” Dwalin muttered.
Gimli peered around Legolas, all the while pushing his own axe a little further down behind his back.
On Ori’s shoulder, Quartz whispered, “Biggest tree ever.”
Ori mentally kicked himself in the ass and dismounted. He felt his legs shake as he walked forward, wondering if trees were vegetarians, or if that would make them cannibals.

He bowed, happy that Quartz’s talons could not pierce his mail shirt.
“Ori of Fundin at your service, m’lord,” he said, forcing his voice steady.

The tree looked him over for long minutes. Eventually other trees wandered up. Ori felt like he was being sniffed by a particularly large warg while the rest of the pack waited its turn.

“You… are… the… one…”
If he had the strength, Ori would have screamed.

“Ah,” he said instead. “You know Tharkûn.”

The creature, Treebeard, threw his head - upper trunk, branches, something - back and shook with laughter. Around him, shrubs tittered and the elm’s leaves rustled gleefully.

“You… are… the… one…" Kili cried, standing in his cart. “Those are-. I can’t-. I-. I’m not marrying that!” He turned to Tauriel, wild-eyed and shouting. “No! Just no! NO!”

Treebeard raised a shaggy brow, leaning over at him.

“Hmmmm… hoom… why… so… hasty?”

Kili was far too brave to scream, but he did whimper.

Ori stepped in.

“Because Prince Kili is already married to Lady Tauriel, Lord Treebeard.”

“That’s right!” Kili gasped. “I’m a happily married dwarf. Screw The Great Woudini! Very happily! To my One!”

“Ahhhhh… lucky… lad… I… was… married… once…”

He sounded so sad, Ori wanted to speak some comfort to him, but he didn’t know what comforted trees beyond water, sunlight and – above all – not being cut down, so he settled for, “I’m sorry.”

Treebeard regarded him again for long minutes. Ori was aware time was passing.

“Wind… through… the… trees…,” said Treebeard, finally straightening up. “You… I… like.”

The other trees – ents - whistled and hissed at each other over this hasty decision.

Lady Galadriel smiled up at Treebeard.

“I beg your pardon, Treebeard, but we don’t store water and minerals as you do. We must make our way to Caras Galadhon in time.”

The ents took giant strides, and would soon have left the Company far behind if the tall beings did not linger here and there, talking to some tree or other. Ori could only hear one side of these conversations, but they all seemed to involve ground water, lightning strikes and the possibility of rain.

Actually, they sounded like conversations Bilbo had with Hamfast, which was not so strange, as ents and hobbits were both children of Yavanna. He giggled to himself, thinking that they all shared the same family ‘tree’.

At a distance, Lothlórien appeared to be a forest much like Mirkwood, but when they walked alongside the Nimrodel, it revealed itself as anything but.

The sky disappeared, replaced by interwoven branches with gold leaves clustered around yellow flowers, which gave off a light all their own. The old leaf fall threw off a slightly mellower light, and the leaves did not crunch underfoot, but flew upward and flowed like dry, powdery snow and just as silent, around the legs of their ponies.

The trunks of the trees shone, not glittering silver, as Ori expected, but the buff of mithril.

Ori felt like he had entered a new room in a house he thought he knew well. As he watched, elves drifted into being around them, each intent on their own task, or happily idle, then faded from sight, only to be replaced by others.

They seemed to be speaking or singing, but were as silent as the fallen leaves.

Ori was formulating a question about them, when Vi said, “Spooky, ain’t it, how there’s no one but us about.”
Margr agreed.
“Aye. Here, our Gladdy, where is everybody? They canna all’ve been so naughty tha’ yeh sent ‘em t’ their rooms!”

Galadriel laughed, then turned to look right at Ori and said, “Oh, they’re around.”
“W-will we make it to the city by dark, Lady Galadriel?” he asked.
“No, though darkness and night aren’t mutually exclusive here.”
“Is that because we’re now outside of time?”
She shouted with delight.
“How clever you are, my dear!”
“Thank you,” he said, as the others stared. “But it was just a guess.”
Dain chuckled, “A shot in the ‘dark’, wee brother?”
Everyone groaned, including the elves.
“Or not, in this case,” said Ori.
Dwalin nudged Ori.
“Better write tha’ one down f’r our Bilbo.”
Dori said to Lady Galadriel, “At first I wasn’t sure I liked Professor Baggins’ influence on my Ori, but I’ve since found him to be quite the sensible sort who never lets anyone skip a meal.”
“Now, that is sensible,” Galadriel agreed. She peered a little closer at Dori’s handiwork. “Do you think you are carrying a dwarfling or a damling?”
“I’d say a damling, as the pebble is already quite active, and it can’t even be the size of a nugget yet. What do you think, Vi?”
Vi considered.
“Well, our Dori, yer ears do seem a bi’ larger, an’ tha’ says a damlin’, but it’s early days yet.”
“Aye,” Margr agreed. “Still plenty o’ time f’r yer hips an’ haunches t’ fill out, which’d mean a dwarfling instead.”

The elves within earshot had obviously tuned into this conversation.
Captain Omosuil looked at Ori.
“Do they speak in jest, mellon Ori?”
“Not in jest exactly, though there is some teasing involved. Dams and Bearers usually need extra lower body strength to pass a a male infant, because our heads tend to be larger and our skulls thicker.”
“Truly?”
“Yes, actually. I don’t know if ear size comes into it or not. Oin threw the runes, trying to scry if Dori’s pebble would be male or female, but the signs were inconclusive. Really, at this point it’s not either one.”
“Ah, it is only a walnut yet.”
Ori stared at him.
“Tell me you’re not speaking literally.”
Omosuil laughed.
“No, mellon nin, elves do not grow on trees. It is only a figure of speech.”
Ori gave an inward sigh of relief. He did not want to be the one to have to explain that Bujni’s hypothesis had been correct after all.
“What do elves do?” Ori asked.
“Do?”
“To guess the fawn..er…elfling’s gender?”
“We… don’t speculate. I don’t think it even occurs to most of us. Elflings are so rare. Prince Legolas is the youngest of our race, and he is already over two thousand years old.”
Gimli said smugly, “He’s very well preserved.”
In a few hours they approached a ring of trees around another, taller, ring of trees, and in the center of those, on the top of a hill carpeted with yellow and white flowers, stood the tallest tree of all.
“Hoom!” said Treebeard, apparently to this particular tree, “I… know… it… is… hasty…, but…
I… cannot… Hoom!… stop… to… talk. See… these… spry… little… saplings? They… must… be… herded… too!”

He said to Ori, “Rather… long-winded… that… one. Hoom! Comes… from… seeing… so… much.”

Ori couldn’t find the top of the tall tree, but he did see step-like fungus growing out of the trunk and spiraling around it, punctuated here and there by wider platforms.

Kili looked up, and up, squinting.
“‘We’re not at the city already?’”
“‘Oh, no,’ said Galadriel, ‘this is the Naith of Lórien.’”
“‘Does it have a top, or does it just keep going to the stars?’”
Galadriel smiled.
“It has a top, yes, but it would take the better part of a day to reach it. If you climb but a quarter of the way there is a flet – a platform – which overlooks the forest canopy, from which you may see across all of Arda.”

They passed this and traveled further amongst the trees. Dain spent a pleasant little while trying to wheedle the engineering secrets behind these platforms from the elves. He pretended not to believe the flets had been grown just like the steps.

Ori drew everything he saw, especially the ents and Kili’s reaction to them. He couldn’t wait to show those to Fili in particular.

A few hours later, Ori looked around at all the weary faces – dwarf and equine, not elven, of course. The elves looked fresh and clean and entirely too perky.

“We need to make camp,” said Ori to Captain Omosuil. “Is there a good spot nearby?”
“Oh, yes, I know where there is a spot with a deep, cold stream, excellent for bathing.”

Ori bit back a groan, remembering how elves reveled in frigid water. Dwarrow, not so much.

But, a bath was a bath, and Ori needed one. He felt grubby, though he hadn’t been sweating or rolling around in the dirt. His whole body felt distinctly itchy, especially his face. Really, that shouldn’t be the hardest part of his body to keep clean.

The dwarrow had used nothing but fallen wood for their fires since the day they arrived at Mirkwood. In Lothlórien, there didn’t appear to be any.

As he rubbed down Honda, he turned to Kili and said, “We can just eat something cold tonight.”
“After jumping in that river?” Kili asked with a grin. “At that point we’ll be willing to burn our tunics for a little warmth. It’s alright. There is a small supply of charcoal in the wagon.”
“You think of everything!”
“I think of things connected to eating.”
“I can attest to that,” said Tauriel. She gave Kili a wink, and he blushed scarlet and looked away with a grin.

After they had washed, shivered, dried off, and eaten, they settled around the fire.

Ori was grateful to find night falling after all, because he was still seeing the flitting figures of elves among the trees. He cuddled up against Dwalin and turned his eyes to the flames, only to find Durin popping his head up through them like Nori bent on mischief. Ori would never have guessed Durin could make so many funny faces. Ori sighed.
“What’s on yer mind, love?” Dwalin asked.
“Durin’s being a brat and there are tons of elves skipping through the forest around us that only I can see.”

Dwalin chuckled and kissed the top of his head.
“Are you laughing at me?” Ori looked up, giving him the squint eye.
“No, love, jus’ laughin’ in general. I can’t think o’ too many other couples who’ve conversations li’ this.”
“And you never think it’s weird?”
“Weird wen’ out th’ window six months ago, ‘bout th’ time I came home an’ found me brother shackled t’ his desk in his skivvies. Tell yeh one thin’, I ne’er imagined married life’d be this busy.”
“That sounds like a very polite way of saying it’s over the edge and around the bend.”
“Can’t be anymore over th’ edge than Dori and Balin’s. ‘R Nori an’ Bofur’s.”
“Mmm. Right. No ferrets.”
“If yer worried – abou’ th’ elves, no’ the ferrets – yeh kin always jus’ ask our Gladdy abou’ ‘em.”
Ori looked around the fire, but didn’t see the Lady there, just Vi, Margr and Glorfindel doing something they should really take into their tent.
Oh, well, they were all big dwarrow here. Or something. If Haldir was going to turn that shade of grey, it was really on the elf to speak up for himself.

He looked around the camp in general, and found Galadriel on the edge of the firelight, smiling at him.
“I’ll be right back, Dwalin. I think I’m being summoned.”

Soon he found himself walking with Lady Galadriel amidst the trees, guided by the light of Galadriel herself. She said nothing for a long while, and he didn’t know if it was because he was supposed to broach the subject, or if she was ‘communing’ with something or other and shouldn’t be disturbed.
As they walked by, a fair, familiar-looking elf bowed to them.
Galadriel inclined her head with a smile.
Ori looked up at her, wary.
“King Oropher,” Galadriel supplied.
“That’s Thranduil’s father?”
“Oh, yes, and that stick our Thranduil had removed from his behind was nothing to the sequoia tree that burdened his father.”

He snorted, then attempted to reassemble some dignity.
“Why am I the only dwarf who can see them?” Ori asked. “Is it because of Mahal?”
“In your case, I would say yes,” she replied. “Note, I did not say no as well.”
“Noted,” he acknowledged with a grin.
“I will add this: not all elves can see them, either. It seems to be a sense that comes upon us slowly as we age, hence Oropher’s acknowledgement.”
“But, what are they?”
“Just what they seem to be. We are seeing real elves, going about their own business in their own… times, my people would say, though it isn’t accurate.”
“Because we’re outside of time,” said Ori. “Everything that has ever happened here and will ever happen here, is really happening all at once.”
“You are an apt pupil, indeed, Ori of Fundin.”
Ori got a sick feeling in the pit of his stomach.
“I hope I don’t run into myself.”
“If you do, I’m sure you’ll find yourself just as adorable as the rest of us do.”
Ori saw that Galadriel had brought them back to the camp and there she parted from him. Ori went back into the circle of firelight and climbed into Dwalin’s lap.
“Well?” Dwalin asked.
“Saw King Oropher. He nodded to Galadriel and ignored me.”
“Rude.”
“Nice actually, Galadriel said he once had a sequoia up his butt.”
“Tha’d make strollin’ dicey.”
“This is a weird place.”
“Yeh ain’t th’ firs t’ think tha’, love.”
Ori scratched his cheek for the third time in row and frowned. His face was obviously still filthy.
He was even beginning to appreciate Dori’s spit, though he wasn’t exactly sad Dori and Balin had gone off to sleep and Dori wasn’t here to supply it.
“Have to find a way to wash this gunk off my cheeks,” he said.
Dwalin ran a hand down his cheek appraisingly and suddenly smiled with delight.
“Yeh’ll no’ wash tha’ off, love. Yer beard’s growin’ in proper now.”
Ori squawked, drawing everyone’s attention.
“Now? Dwalin, I can’t grow a big beard now! We’re in the middle of a quest. I’m busy!”

The dwarrow in the circle called their congratulations. Dwalin sighed and pulled him closer.
“Yer adorable.”
“I’m irritated!”
“I love yeh anyway.”
“Good thing,” Ori sighed. “Gimli, when did yours come in?”
The young dwarf looked up at him with a laugh.
“Yer kiddin’, righ’? Mam says she gave birth t’ a beard with a dwarf attached.”
“That must have been really strange for her.”
“Considerin’ I weighed abou’ as much as one a’ her anvils, I don’ thin’ she really gave it much though.”
“How big are your mother’s anvils?” Legolas asked innocently
Gimli did a spit take of his beer and Jani and the sisters brayed with laughter.
“Here, our Legs,” Jani said in a severe tone, which mocked her huge grin “It ain’t polite t’ ask a lass how big her anvils are.”
“Yers’re bigger than his mam’s!” Margr commented, cackling with Vi.
“Oi, you leave me anvils outa this!” Jani threw a heel of bread at Margr.

Ori awoke in the middle of the night, disoriented, until he remembered he was in a tent, in a forest, and he had to-
“Dwalin.”
“Love?”
“I have a problem.
“Aye?”
“I have to pee.”
“Just go an pick a tree.”
“What if I pick the wrong one?”
Dwalin sat up.
“Oh. Well. Knock firs’?”
“Lovely.”
It was almost impossible to navigate the camp in the dark, and Ori didn’t want to wander too far from the tent. There were no torches, as the elves used many other senses than sight to keep watch on the camp. Nor did Ori want to light up the entire camp with Eärendil’s star. He chose what he thought was a tree, close to the tent, and very well rooted to the ground.
“Hoom?”
“Oh, I’m so sorry!” Ori cried. “I didn’t mean-“
“Not…to…worry,” said an ent he had never met. “Hoom. Hoom. Nitrogen. Good… for…the… soil.”
Another ent called out, “We… could… use… some… over… here!”
“No….here!” a third beckoned.
“What?” Ori cried. “You all want me to pee on you?”
The eeccccrrrrccclle of lifffiffife,” said a Quaking Aspen. “Ggggggo onnnnnnn.”
“Too much pressure!” Ori squeaked. “Great, now I can’t pee!”
“Think - ahum- watery… thoughts,” said the first ent.
“You can’t look at me.”
“Eh?”
“I’m not looking at you and you can’t watch me, or I’ll never be able to pee.”
“Hoom. Hasty-”
“I don’t have time to debate.”
“Very… well.”
“You’re not watching, right?”
“Not… watching,” said the ent.
Ori looked up at the stars and finally was able to pee.
“Shake it more’n twice an yer playin’ with it.”
“What! You said you wouldn’t l - Gimli!”
“Serves yeh right fer talkin’ t’ trees.”

Excerpt from Ori’s log:
“Adventures are supposed to be learning experiences. They’re supposed to be good for you. Trying to pee on a tree when it asks you to do so is not good. Your eyeballs could be floating. You cannot pee.”

Morning brought breakfast of black bread toasted with butter and elderberry jam, fresh fruit, and nut spreads provided by the elves. Ori stuffed his face with slices of bread covered in sweetened groundnut paste and jam.
“Hey, Ori,” said Kili, hunkering down next to him. The prince looked around, but everyone else seemed to be busy with chores of their own.
He offered Ori a small ceramic bottle sealed with a cork.
Ori took it.
“What’s this?”
“It’s an odorless ointment that’ll soothe you face. Gimli said you needed it.”
And Kili winked at him.
“Is this yours?” Ori asked.
“Yep, I use it when I butcher my beard and when new growth makes me want to tear my skin off. Which is fairly often.”
“Thank you!” said Ori. “Do you have some more for yourself?”
“I don’t need it right now. I’ve got plenty in Erebor.”
Kili rose, then turned back and said, “Oh, and don’t drink it. You’ll be shitting for days.”
“I’ll keep that in mind,” said Ori.
Kili went back to checking his supplies. Ori looked around, opened the bottle, shook out a little of the clear liquid and smoothed it on his face, sighing as it soothed the irritation. At the same time, he hoped this wasn’t also a practical joke. It would be hard to lead a quest with a purple face.

They traveled on and a stop was called mid-morning. Galadriel greeted her Lord as he arrived on his white stallion, the saddle now equipped with a ridged mat behind for Kelli, who rode serenely upon it.
Celeborn dismounted to salute his Lady. Kelli hopped down, bounced a few times, then strutted forward to inspect the Company.
“Lord Celeborn!” Ori called.
“Lord Ori. Welcome to Caras Galadhon!”
Ori peered about him, but he didn’t see anything that looked like a city.
He counseled himself to wait. With Galadriel, things were seldom what they seemed.
They rode on for a little ways, following Galadriel and Celeborn down an unmarked path among the mallorn trees. Ori watched the fallen leaves swirl around the legs of their mounts, then mysteriously fall back exactly where they had sat before.
He wondered why they ever felt the need to blindfold anyone here. He doubted a stranger who stumbled into this forest could randomly find an elven city, and, if they did, they would certainly never find their own way back.
“Ori, love,” said Dwalin quietly.
“Dwalin?”
“Look.”
Before them, in their path, loomed two huge statues, bowing up and inward, elfmaids with their foreheads nearly touching, their faces serene, their arms full of flowers, all carved from stone in a familiar style.
Around and above this arch, the mallorn forest grew tall from the flat terrain, but between the arches, the land suddenly changed. A road appeared, the landscape grew hilly, other colors popped among the gold and silver.

Ori swallowed.

He knew that if they rode around this gate the forest would go on and on just like the parts through which they had ridden.

Through the arches, however, was a different place.

“The statues were a gift from the dwarrow of Khazad-dûm,” said Galadriel. “They mark the entrance of the city proper.” “The great dwarf sculptor Klyodhrheit, designed and carved them,” Celeborn went on.

The name was familiar to Ori.

“The famous Furh’nk Klyodhrheit?”

“Why, yes,” Celeborn turned to smile at Ori.

“He is the ancestor of Furh’nk, who is a second to Dwalin. We know him well.” Ori promised himself he would sketch the statues for Furh’nk.

Ori urged Honda to follow the Lord and Lady through.

“Spooky,” Quartz commented. Honda huffed an agreement. Ori held his breath as they rode through, but he didn’t feel the jolt he half expected.

The first thing he registered was singing, many, many elves singing. He thought at first they sang in Quenya but he swore as they all arrived, it changed to Sindarin and Ori was able to make out some of the verses.

You’re out of the woods,
You’re out of the dark,
You’re out of the night
Step into the sun
Step into the light
Keep straight ahead
For the most glorious place
On the face of Ar-dah
Or the sky
Hold onto your breath
Hold onto your heart
Hold onto your hope
March up to the gate
And bid it open
Open!

The wild order of the mallorn trees gave way then. The Company followed Galadriel and Celeborn on a roadless route among fruit trees, branches laden and heavy. As they rode over the gentle hills, clumps of red and blue and orange flowers appeared. There were still no buildings, but suddenly they were no longer in the wild. Walls of stone and vegetation grew up around them.

He had heard the city of Galadriel was a garden. So far this seemed quite literal.

Ori’s experience of gardens was limited, of course, but if he took the flower gardens of Bombur and Erda’s inn, with their riotous colors and rock walls, and magnified them a million times, that was his point of reference for the beautiful elven city.

The ‘outskirts’ were made of endless rooms filled with statues and waterfalls, bridges bowing gracefully over brooks and rivers at every turn, with yellow flowers and leaves flowing through and swirling in gentle eddies. Some spaces felt like the gardens Ori knew, open to the golden branches, and others really did feel like rooms in a grand home, roofed over with tangles of vines, dotted with low furniture and sumptuous cushions of velvet and brocade. Some of the ‘inside’ rooms were curtained with sheer, lace panels, while tapestries of greens, golds and teals lined the walls.
Elves waved and called at them through windows and doorways, leading them along, dropping petals in their path and singing in Quenya, serene and mysterious.

Then, in the center of a wide lawn, stood a single, great mallorn tree. It was much of a height with the one at the Naith, but the whole trunk was wrapped in flets pierced with steps. Even in the middle of the day, the lights of its lanterns glowed bright and warm and the hum of voices washed over them.

“You live here?” he squeaked to the Lady.

Galadriel turned in her saddle and smiled at him.

“I don’t spend all my time eating iklars in Erebor. Though, that is one of my favorite things to do.”

Dori stuck her head out of the palanquin and nodded.

“Very nice, my dear. I love what you’ve done with the place.”

Ori and Dwalin were given a room on a flet nearer the ground, but on the back side of the tree, which seemed to be quieter. There were hot baths, to which they availed themselves happily.

Ori walked out into their bedroom with a towel around his waist, and was about to change into a clean tunic and breeches when he heard whispers and giggling.

He looked up to find the window that opened onto the wide flet was now filled with ogling elven faces.

They spoke in Quenya, but he didn’t have to be fluent to know they were talking about his body, and, of course, all the hair on his body.

“Dwalin!” Ori called.

Dwalin stuck his head around the corner of the doorway, saw they had an audience and grinned. Out he strode, naked.

“Wantin’ t’ see th’ hairy, dwarrow, eh?” he called.

The elves squealed, happily scandalized, and fled.

“Tha’ was fun,” said Dwalin.

“I’ll just bet,” said Ori with a smile. “Where do you suppose they’ve run off to?”

“I’m thinkin’ they’re off t’ find Tauriel an’ ask f’r more details.”

“She’ll enjoy that, actually,” Ori decided.

“Kili may no’ be as happy,” Dwalin pointed out.

“Kili would do the same thing you just did, and be just as happy about it.”

“If he does, then I’ll know I’ve taught him well.”

Ori slipped his tunic over his head. He thought he could forego the mithril shirt while he was here.

“I suppose I should ask Lady Galadriel what she has planned. I don’t know when dinner is, or what it is. Is the rest of the Company nearby?” Ori pulled on his breeches and socks and boots.

“Everyone except th’ ents.”

“Where have the ents gone?”

“Continuin’ t’wards th’ mountains. ‘Parently it’s no’ small thin’, herdin’ trees.”

They heard a knock at the doors.

“Bloody elves,” said Dwalin.

Still naked, he strode to the door and flung it open.

“Alrig, yeh-”

The tall, blonde young woman at the door looked down at him, all of him, and smiled crookedly.

“My uncle said the dwarrow were friendly, but this is above and beyond,” she said.

Dwalin cleared his throat.

“Love? Visitor a’ th’ door. I’m goin’ t’ get meself dressed.”

He bowed to the lady civilly, then took himself away.

Ori stared. The young woman was dressed in light armor of Rohan make, and her long blond hair was loose. She looked a great deal like Theodred and Theoden. Ori grinned and went forward to meet her.
“Lady Eowyn, I presume,” he said as the woman held out both hands to him. “Ori of Fundin. I’m delighted to meet you at last! Theo talks about you all so much, I feel like I’ve known you all forever. So, I’m not standing on ceremony!”

With that, she was down on her knees, wrapping him in a hug. Ori hugged back, saying, “How much have you teased your brother by messenger on his married state?”

She threw back her head and laughed merrily. “Whenever I can. And since he doesn’t come back and rip up at me, I know he’s ridiculously happy.”

She rose and Dwalin reappeared fully dressed. “My husband...who you’ve met...briefly,” Ori teased. “Dwalin, here’s Eowyn, Theodred’s cousin.”

Dwalin grinned at her. “Greetings, Dwalin,” she announced, dropping Ori’s hand to hug Dwalin. Dwalin chuckled and opened his arms to embrace her. “Hello t’ yeh, lass. Yeh look finer than a chunk a’ new ore. How’re yer uncle an’ cousin keepin’ then?”

“Very well. I think Uncle is planning to visit Erebor again soon. Theo has been practicing madly with the sword your princes made for him.”

“Guid,” Dwalin approved. “Fili’s the heir, so he ain’t here, bu’ Kili’s here f’r yeh t’ meet.”

The three of them stepped down from the flet to the grassy glade where some of the Company had gathered, Kili and Tauriel among them.

“Oi, our Kili,” Dwalin bellowed. “Here’s our Theo’s cousin, Eowyn.”

Kili bounced forward and hugged Eowyn. “Hello, cous! Come meet my wife, Tauriel.”

Ori couldn’t missed the pride in Kili’s words and eyes as he tugged her forward to greet Tauriel. Galadriel came from another glade, hand in hand with Dori. Celeborn and Balin followed, talking.

“Eowyn!” Galadriel scolded. “How could you present yourself without my introduction?”

Eowyn grinned, blushing a little. “I’m sorry, milady. But everyone was saying Lord Ori was here and I just couldn’t wait. I promise to be very proper when you introduce me to the honored Bearer.”

Galadriel looked amused and patted her cheek. “Very well. I will excuse you this time as Lord Ori is irresistibly huggable on first sight.”

“What?” Ori gasped, his face aflame. Dwalin laughed and slung an arm about his shoulders. “Sorry, love, but yeh’ve tha’ effect on folk.” Ori tried not to blush as his Company and Omosuil’s soldiers all grinned at him.

Lady Galadriel turned to Dori. “Dearest Bearer Dori, do allow me to present to you Lady Eowyn of Rohan, niece of dear King Theoden. Eowyn, this is the honored Bearer of Erebor, Dori of Fundin.”

“Oh!” cried Dori in fullest delight. “Eowyn! You are dear Theodred’s cousin. Oh, and your uncle is that very naughty man, Theoden. How perfectly lovely to meet you, my dear! Do come here, so I may give you a kiss.”

Eowyn embraced the Bearer rapturously then politely exchanged bows, clasped arms, then hugged Balin.

Lady Galadriel led the way to an open glade and they seated themselves upon comfortable chairs beside a murmuring stream bordered by purple irises.

“Margr, Vi,” Dori called, “Do come and meet Lady Eowyn. She’s King Theoden’s niece, that bad man. Isn’t she just the dearest thing!”

Margr and Vi pounced and gushed over the Rohan lady until she nearly fell off her seat laughing. Captain Haldir returned, bowed to his Lord and Lady then came to Eowyn and bowed to her. He took her hand and Ori thought he was going to kiss it. He tried but was slapped with Dori’s fan for his efforts.
“Go away, you wicked elf. How dare you flirt with this darling girl. At your age! And in front of me! Lady Galadriel!”

Omosuil left the glade in a hurry, Ori thought he would burst before he made it to the tree line. As it was, they still heard his hysterical laughter and Haldir looked put out.

“Captain Haldir?” Lady Galadriel said with perfect gravity.
“I was merely paying my respects, Honored Bearer,” Haldir said icily.
“Yes, and we all heard at the late high king’s funeral about your respect for my darling Thranduil!” Dori was puffed up like an angry Kelli.
Celeborn made a noise between a cough and a sneeze, and hastily asked about the guard detail at the north end of Lórien.

Ori and Eowyn walked away from the glade and up a gentle hillside full of the yellow star flowers Galadriel called eleanor and the white and pale green niphredil. A thought had niggled at him and he wanted to know the answer.

“Eowyn,” he started. “What brought you to Lórien? Has the news of this quest reached Rohan?”
“Oh, no,” Eowyn assured him. “Seeing you and your Company here was a complete surprise for me. The patrols of my people’s borders heard from the few men in the Brownlands that…” she paused, frowning.

“That?” Ori encouraged.

“It made no sense, but rumors are that the trees of Fangorn are behaving strangely. Despite the fall of Mordor and the removal of the enemy, people still fear that dark things may yet linger.”

“Oh.” Ori was relieved that his quest was still secret.

“Uncle kept getting reports of such but they were mixed and odd. I was at loose ends and Uncle was hinting at it being time for me to marry, so I volunteered to come here.”

He looked up at her with a mischievous smile.

“Looking for a dwarven mate like your brother?”

“No, m’lord,” she replied, making a face at him. “I merely came as a messenger, and to consult with the Lord and Lady of Lothlórien.”

“And what did her ladyship tell you?”
Eowyn laughed.

“Everything and nothing, as is the way of elves. I suspected she is well aware and perhaps, even involved in it.” Eowyn continued hurriedly. “I don’t mean to say I suspect the Lord and Lady are expanding their lands with a conquering purpose but…”

She paused again, frowning at the flowers. Ori led the way to a clear spot and they sat. Ori looked long at Eowyn and, becoming aware of his scrutiny, she cocked her head in question at him.

“Why a diplomatic visit now?” she asked. “I have heard nothing of you and your Company continuing to Rohan or Beleghost to see its dwarf queen and my brother.”

“That is not our object,” Ori said quietly.
“Your object is?” she bluntly inquired.
Ori sighed. “It is of the utmost secrecy.”
“I am trustworthy. I quite consider all of you to be well-known and dear friends of my family and Rohan.”

Ori sent a question mark into the ether and received a nudge of encouragement in return.
He shifted closer, and quietly told the White Lady of Rohan the tale of his quest. She listened intently and made no comment.

“So you see why I asked you why you were here at this time,” Ori finished.
Eowyn nodded and considered.

“Your quest is a noble one,” she said. “I know little of your people. Rohan is of a patriarchal line but we honor our queens. To wipe out such, is wrong in our eyes as well. May I ask what you suspect?”

“I’m not sure,” Ori admitted. “I am quite sure she was not of the Longbeard clan of the line of Durin. The forefathers of our clans woke in pairs with their queens. All the queens’ names are preserved. The Blacklocks are a matriarchy, as they have been since the beginning, but they do not erase the names of the sires of their queens.”

“Longbeards are the line of Durin,” Eowyn mused. “Prince Kili is the most different looking of your Company.”

“Kili looks very like his idad, I mean uncle, King Thorin and so does his older brother Fili, though Fili is blond like their father.”

“Are your husband and his brother are Longbeards?”

“Yes, and of the Durin line. King Dain I was father to King Thror and Thorin is his grandson by Prince Thrain. Balin and Dwalin are from Dain I’s younger brother Borin, from Borin there was Farim. His sons were Fundin and Groin. Fundin was Balin and Dwalin’s father and Gimli is the grandson of Groin. So Balin and Dwalin are cousins to Oin and his brother Gloin, who’s Gimli’s father. Dori is also a Durin. He’s our Dain’s brother through Nain’s er…accident with our late mother.”

Eowyn grinned and asked, “Is that scandalous?”

“Oh yes! The Durins didn’t know about us, the Brothers Ri, until Dwalin and I married. Nor did I, for that matter.”

“An’ life’s bin topsy-turvy ever since.” Dwalin said, coming down to join them.

“You love it!” Ori accused.

“Aye, me ghivashel, I do.” Dwalin leaned in to kiss Ori. “C’mon th’ pair a’ yeh, dinner’s waitin’.”

Eowyn had no idea what dinner in Lórien would look like. He was sure it must be different from dinner in Erebor.

He just never imagined how different.

The lovely long table seated all the Company, Omosuil and his squad, Haldir and a few of his soldiers, and the Lord and Lady. The plates were white porcelain, so thin they were almost transparent, the only decoration a spider silk-sized thread of silver around the edge. The flatware and goblets were silver. There were crystal carafes of clear water or mead. There were three choices of food to begin the meal. Ori gawked.

Each was moulded in a ring. One was bright red and turned out to be cherries and walnuts in a cherry flavored gelatin. This was quite good though, to Ori, it was like having dessert first which he had no problem with. In the second ring, tiny orange sections spiced with cinnamon and cloves floated, suspended in an orange flavored gelatin with a different nut mixed in. This wasn’t as good as the cherry but still quite nice.

The third Ori was loathe to even try. He told himself he had tried everything when they visited the inn and had learned that green food was good. This however didn’t look good or smell good. It had only had the faintest scent of lemon and vinegar. It was vast ring of clear gelatin, floating inside were strings of green things and more bits of red and green things. Ori courageously put a small piece on his plate and stared at it. It looked like a slice of weedy pond water.

“What is it?” Dori asked, having also put a thin slice on her own plate. Ori watched as Dori popped a bite into her mouth.

“Perfections Salad,” said Galadriel. “What do you think?”

“It is certainly…. perfect,” said Dori. She reached for her goblet and drank down the contents.

“Perfectly what, our Dori?” asked Galadriel, blinking innocently.

“Don’t tease, dear.”

“It’s Captain Haldir’s favorite,” said Celeborn, apropos of nothing.

“Hmm,” said Dori. She turned to the captain. “Your life has been filled with disappointment, hasn’t it, dear.”

Ori bravely put a tiny bite into his mouth, regretted it immediately, and copied Dori, emptying his goblet to wash away the tasteless, gelatinous ick. Ori decided that flavorless gelatin, cabbage, and olives didn’t go together very well.

Eowyn had taken a slice and now poked at it in horrified fascination. Kili leaned his face in over her plate, asking,

"Why does it wiggle? How did you make the vegetables float? Is that cabbage? Who ever came up with such a thing? Is it elf magic?"

"Evil magic, more like," Dwalin muttered.

"I think, I’m er… of an elegant salad sufficiency,” Eowyn tried, exchanging a worried look with Kili.

Haldir, slightly miffed at the Rohan lady’s confusion at his favorite dish, sighed and said,

“Just put it in your mouth, m’lady.”

Eowyn turned, one eyebrow raised then smiled sweetly.

“You aren’t married, are you, Captain.”

“No. Why do you ask?”

Margr sighed and patted his thigh.

“Our Diry, if yeh don’t know, yer beyond our help.”

Haldir chose to reply by helping himself to another slice of Perfection Salad and consuming it with evident enjoyment.

Once all the orange and red… things… were eaten, the dwarrow still looked askance at the other… thing.

Celeborn wiped his mouth delicately.

“Well, then. Who is for chips with rolls and butter?”

The entire Company and Eowyn cheered.

Vi cried out, “Phew! We knew yeh were jus’ teasin’ with tha’ other stuff. Yer a hero, our Celli.”

Kelli, sitting beside the Lord, acknowledged this with a civil squawk.

Dinner was cleared away and the maps brought out and unrolled across the tabletop.

“We have been keeping careful account of comings and goings at the doors of Moria,” said Haldir. “It has not been difficult. There have been very few.”

“Th’ orcs don’t set watch on th’ doors?” Dwalin asked.

“No watch on the doors - indeed, there are no doors.”

“Coulda told yeh tha,” said Dain. “Me old leg is under one a’ ‘em.”

Haldir stared at him in horror as he continued.

“The orcs do no organized patrols of the vale before the… doorway. Of course, there is not much of a vale any more, either. The battlefield of Dimrill Dale is grown over with trees and ents.”

“There’s no way to tell how many orcs are still inside?” Ori asked.

“No,” Haldir replied. “We know they still dwell there. From time to time, some orc or other shambles out amongst the rubble, but they keep close to the walls, as they all have, since the ents have been herding their saplings along the Silverlode to Mirrormere. If your company moves under the trees, we see small likelihood of ambush, or even resistance.”

Celeborn added, “They are not the only beings alive in the mountains. There are the usual predators and smaller animals. For decades now we have seen flights of enormous birds over the peaks. Our eyes are keen and we see they are shaped like scavengers, but they are centered in the skies above Caradhras and come no closer.”

Ori looked to Dwalin.

“What do you think?”

Dwalin considered.

“We want th’ majority a’ soldiers in th’ woods around th’ doors, close t’ th’ walls. Once th’ company’s inside, th’ last thin’ we need is f’r th’ orcs t’ creep out from some tunnel we can’t see an’ move around t’ th’ doors t’ ambush us from behind. A smaller detachment should set up just inside th’ doors t’ guard th’ bridge an’ handle th’ transfer a’ th’ box.”

“Captain Dwalin? Lord Ori?”

Dwalin and Ori turned to see Omosuil and his squad all looking at them.

“What’s on yer mind, Omosuil?” Dwalin barked.

“I and my soldiers are in your service and will remain so until you dismiss us, no doubt, when we reached the court of King Cemnesta again. We are ready to escort your Company into Mo… Khazad-dûm.” The elf captain stumbled a little over the khuzdul, but his eyes and poise never wavered. Dwalin cocked an eyebrow then looked at Ori.

“The mountain is a dangerous place,” Ori began. He was worrying now. This was a change to his original bargain with Mahal. Mahal had promised to do His best for the Company. Cemnesta’s soldiers were not in the picture.

“We are soldiers,” Omosuil said firmly. “When we were assigned to you, we accepted the fact that we could die protecting your Company, Lord Ori. If we can spare the lives of your Company by doing so, we are willing.”

Ori paused. A hot boom echoed in his mind.

“I said elves, me wee scribe. Be it three ‘r thirty-three, I told yeh I’d do me best. An’ that goes f’r any more tha’ toss their lot in wi’ yeh.”

“Thank you,” Ori whispered then smiled at Omosuil, who was staring at him oddly. Lady Galadriel beamed and Celeborn’s eyebrows were at his hairline. Ori grinned up at Dwalin, who turned to Omosuil.

“Right, lad, yer all in. Stay sharp.”

Omosuil turned, eyes alight at his warriors. all of whom rose as one and shouted.

“Du Bekâr!”

Which brought the Company up shouting, cheering, and hugging each other.

Haldir looked appalled but the Lord and Lady laughed. Ori relaxed into Dwalin’s shoulder. Dwalin leaned close, murmuring.

“Mahal promised t’ do His best f’r em, too, eh?”

“Yes,” Ori whispered back. “But I’m a little leery now as He added that goes for any more that tosses their lot in with us. Dwalin, Dori is not coming no matter what!”

Dwalin snorted then leaned back in his chair. Ori watched as Dwalin caught his brother’s eye and signed in Iglishmêk that neither he nor Dori were to come. Balin bowed his head in acquiescence, but chuckled and threw Ori a wink. Dori turned at the end of this exchange and looked inquiringly at Ori. Ori frowned as hard as he could.

“You’re not coming, Dori!”

“Why, pet! I already said-”

“You’re still not coming.”

Dori made an angry noise and turned in appeal to Lady Galadriel, who laughed again.

“Beloved?” Galadriel said to Celeborn.

The elf lord smiled.

“You have my word, Lord Ori. Come the time you all set out, I shall shackle the Honored Bearer to my own wrist.”

“Dori’s very strong.” Ori said doubtfully.

“Then dear Treebeard will ask the great Mallon here to hang on to Dori,” Galadriel said merrily.

“Really!” Dori huffed. “I gave my word already!”

“Yes, my darling,” cooed Galadriel, “but as a mother myself, I know what it is to try and stop your child from going into danger.”

“Celebrian never did anything dangerous,” Celeborn noted aside.

“Yes, my heart,” Galadriel informed him, “but if she had, you know I would have gone to her aide. I would have walked into Mordor itself.”

“Good thin’ we ain’t walkin’ int’ Mordor,” Dwalin observed to Ori, who giggled.

“One does not just walk into Mordor,” Haldir said, severely.

“Laddie,” Balin replied, genial to a fault. “If there was a danger callin’, our Dori would walk into Mordor, complain about th’ furnishin’s, take what was needin’ protectin’ an’ stroll out.”

“I would, too!” Dori snapped. “Imagine if my Ori was in Mordor! He’d catch his death of cold!”

“Doreeeee,” Ori groaned. “We’re not going to Mordor! We’re going to Khazad-dûm. It’s not going to be that cold. Besides, it wouldn’t be cold in Mordor, anyway. It’s a big lava flat and probably too hot to go near yet.”
“Uncle has been told it’s still smoking,” Eowyn added helpfully, a naughty twinkle in her eye.
“There,” Ori added on. Dori sighed and lapsed into a pout.
Dawn found Ori, Dwalin, Dain, Eowyn and Haldir climbing the flets. When Haldir stopped them on one, Ori was stunned by the view. The fleeting fog of the night was pinkish in the first light and they had clear sight over the trees to the Misty Mountains. The peaks of Caradhras, Celebdil, and Fanuidhol towered above. Ori consulted his map and easily pinpointed the door of Khazad-dûm.

Dwalin removed a spy glass from his pocket and watched for a few moments. Dain pulled something out of his own pocket and grunted at Dwalin. Dwalin handed his cousin the spyglass. Dain affixed something else to the end of it and Dwalin looked out through it again.

"Nice one, our Dain."

“Aye, curved mirrors an’ lenses’re a wonder.”

Dwalin handed Ori the spyglass with a grin.

Ori trained the glass on the door and looked through.

The door of Khazad-dûm was right there, though it looked more like a simple pile of loose stone and rubble. Before this, there was a gap of several yards then the trees began. Ori could see the tops of the ents moving about. He handed the spyglass back to Dwalin, who handed it to Eowyn.

She stared through it.

“It’s true,” she muttered in disbelief. “All the tales and reports were true. Within this three miles, I can see it coming. I can see the grove moving. Birnam Wood has come to Dunsinane.”

Ori looked at Dwalin again.

“Then we’d best go.”

“Aye,” Dwalin agreed.

Dain grunted before commenting,

“The door of Khazad-dûm was right there, though it looked more like a simple pile of loose stone and rubble. Before this, there was a gap of several yards then the trees began. Ori could see the tops of the ents moving about. He handed the spyglass back to Dwalin, who handed it to Eowyn.

She stared through it.

“It’s true,” she muttered in disbelief. “All the tales and reports were true. Within this three miles, I can see it coming. I can see the grove moving. Birnam Wood has come to Dunsinane.”

Ori looked at Dwalin again.

“Then we’d best go.”

“Aye,” Dwalin agreed.

Dain grunted before commenting,

“An’ if there’s orcs, we’ll lay int’ ‘em an’ dead will be ‘im tha’ firs’ cries hold, enough!”

Coming down was achieved much faster than ascending, mostly because Dain and Dwalin chivvied each other, racing in great leaps from flet to flet. Ori and Eowyn rushed behind, hampered by giggles, while Haldir skimmed down with the usual vile elegance of elves.

Kili and some of the elves, who waited on the Lord and Lady, had breakfast laid out. Galadriel and Dori cozed pleasantly over cups of tea.

Balin looked up from enjoying a pipe and watching Celeborn feed pieces of egg bread to Kelli.

“Come an’ fortify yerself, wee brother. Orcs don’t like bein’ abroad in daylight much, so yeh’ve got the most of a day t ge’ this over an’ done with.”

“Yes, pet,” Dori agreed and started making Ori a plate, much to Ori’s embarrassment. “You need to go on adventures with your tummy full. I’ve had Kili make up little packs of snacks in case you’re not back by luncheon.”

Dori sounded like they were going on a picnic somewhere, so Ori decided that discretion was the better route and politely ate the hearty meal of hot oatmeal, fruit, and toast Dori set before him.

He finished and sat back, Dwalin’s arm was across the back of his chair, touching Ori’s shoulders. Ori felt better with his husband’s muscle at his neck. Ori took another sip of tea, straightened, and looked about at his Company. He was startled to notice his Company and Omosuil’s soldiers immediately quieted and looked expectantly at him.

“We must first gather the things we need to get in, get the box, and get out. We’ll need our tools and weapons, but at the same time try and travel as lightly and quietly as possible for speed. As Balin said, orcs do not like daylight and so they would be asleep or, at least, not near the entrance where the daylight penetrates. We’ve come to Lórien with the appearance of a delegation, so it’s doubtful they will considered such a small band as ourselves a threat.” Ori pondered his cup in his hands. This adventure was real. It was happening. They were going to enter Khazad-dûm today and get the box.

“Thanks to the ents, Birnam Wood has indeed moved to Dunsinane and is within a few yards of the entrance. So our advance should be completely hidden until the shelter of the entryway. Our current action now is preparing ourselves to go in.”

“Right,” Dwalin barked. “Yeh’ve all heard th’ orders, get crackin’.”

The Company rose laughing and talking. Ori looked up at Dwalin, who kissed him and smiled.

“We’re gettin’ this done, love. An’ then we’re goin’ home wi’ yer box.”

Ori took a deep breath, then, “Yes, we’re getting it done.”

“Of course you are, pet,” Dori prompted. “Now hurry up and get ready. You’ve a lot to do.”

Ori grinned, rose and went to Dori’s side, kissing Dori’s cheek.

“Yes, Ori’s Dori.”

The armory wagon swarmed with activity. Everyone was arming themselves. Kili packed his and Tauriel’s quivers. They each had two. Tauriel sharpened and polished hers and Kili’s swords. Margr and Vi stood ready, their mattocks strapped to their backs. Dain was pulling tools about and turned when Ori came up.

“What in’ Durin’s beard is that bloody great chest fer, wee scribe brother?”

Ori looked into the wagon. There was a large packing box at the side.

“What’s in this?” Ori asked pulling the box forward. On it, in very official script, was stamped ‘Jumpsuits for Entering Khazad-dûm’.

“What’s a jumpsuit?” Kili asked.

Ori said weakly, “I hope it’s not something to jump in. If they have ears and little fluffy tails—“

“Then our Dipfa’s goin’ t’ th’ Halls sooner than she planned,” Dwalin griped.

They pried off the lid. The box was filled with clothing.

Ori lifted and unfolded a garment at random and was relieved to find it a one-piece tunic and leggings affair, along the same lines as Bujni’s coronation costume, but not nearly as bright.

“Stone colors, a’ leas’,” said Dain.

“There seems to be one for each of us,” said Ori, after passing out the ‘jump suits’ then looking back in the box. “Except, there’s not one for you, Lady Galadriel.”

“Guess again!” Dori sang. She walked forward waving a rather lot of material in each hand.

“Dori!” Ori cried.

“Don’t look at me that way, pet. Dipfa asked me if she could and I told her I thought it would be a lovely gesture.”

“Of course you did,” Ori mumbled as Dori wafted over to Galadriel.

“Now, darling, she wanted you to have a choice, so we have one that is very much like the others, and then this pretty pale green one with floaty, cloak-y things sewn onto the back.”

Galadriel clapped her hands together in delight.

“Oh, how thoughtful of you both!” Galadriel cried.

“And I made sure they were both roomy enough to flatter your more ample figure!”

“You think of everything!”

Galadriel shook the suit open. It was a very pretty pale green but Ori gaped as he saw what was attached to the back.

It was a project Dipfa had shown him once, made of material similar to that of Dori’s presentation robe but more opaque, with tiny iridescent threads running all through. Ori groaned.

Wearing it, would make Lady Galadriel the giant fairy of Dipfa’s dreams.
Galadriel held it up to herself and looked at Celeborn
“Isn’t it fun, my Lord. And such a nice summer-y color?”
Celeborn looked at his Lady and the jumpsuit and folded his lips. Kelli waddled over, inspected the suit, made a loud clonk noise with his beak and strutted back.
“I agree with Kelli,” Celeborn said, majestically.
Galadriel looked the suit over again and gave a delighted cry.
“It has pockets! It has pockets everywhere!”
Ori looked his over and saw the suit did indeed have a great many pockets. There were pockets on the chest, going down the sleeves, against the ribs, on either side below the waist, and others going down the legs. The material was sturdily quilted but smooth to the touch.
“Ooo,” cried Vi, admiring her own suit. “They’ve all got lots a’ pockets!”
“Alright,” Dwali allowed. “I give one t’ our Dipfa. Lots a places f’r weapons ‘r tools, an’ warm, so we kin cut down on weight.”
“Aye this’ll do nicely,” Jani agreed. “I’m goin’ t ask our Dipfa f’r a few more. These’ud be great f’r th’ mine.”
“Are you sure you want to wear the green one, ma’am?” Eowyn asked Galadriel.
“Oh yes, I like it.”
“Good,” said Eowyn. “I’ll wear the other one.”
They all turned and stared at her.
“You don’t still think I’m letting you go and do this without me, do you? If nothing else, I will stand guard with the elves.”
Everyone turned to Ori and he wondered for an instant if he had ink on his forehead. Then he remembered he was supposed to be leading this quest.
“Oh, yes, actually, that would be wonderful and I’m sure Master Haldir won’t mind the extra help, if you prefer to guard.”
He looked over at Haldir, who waved a lackadaisical hand and said with resignation, “Why not?”
“I’m going into the mountain,” said Eowyn firmly.
“I brought spare contracts,” said Balin. “Kin yeh read, lass?”
“Oh, yes, in westron and in the language of Rohan.”
“Lessee. Westron,” said Balin, going through a sheaf of papers. “Aye, here we go.”
“We’re dwarrow,” said Gimli to Eowyn. “We’re prepared.”
Lady Galadriel, still inspecting her jumpsuit, said, “Oh, how sweet, she’s embroidered our names one each one.”
Ori facepalmed. Indeed, they had on the left, just below the collar bone, each of their names handsomely embroidered on a rectangle patch.
“Dipfa!” Ori groaned
Galadriel turned to one of her handmaids and held out the plain suit Dipfa had made.
“Can this be quickly altered to bear Lady Eowyn’s name instead of mine?”
“Immediately, Lady Galadriel,” said the elf maid. She curtsied and took the suit away.
“Haldir?” Galadriel called to him.
“I… don’t believe they’re my color, m’lady.”
“Alas. But no doubt that is why there isn’t one for you.”
Eowyn was glancing through the contract, she grinned at Ori and Balin handed her freshly dipped pen.

Soon everyone was arrayed in their suits and repacking their tools and weapons into them. Tauriel looked extremely amused while Kili checked her suit’s fastenings and adjusted the straps, asking her every now and then if it fitted well and if she could reach her quiver without trouble. She returned the favor. Sculdis and Dain matched perfectly and every pocket on their suits was filled.
Legolas sat cross-legged on the ground, inspecting arrows and filling a second quiver. Gimli frowned as he carefully braided his elf’s crown hair into a braid, keeping any stray hair away from Legolas’ eyes. Ori smirked when he saw their suits also matched, and each had a sewn-in stout harness for their weapons. Ori dressed with Dori’s help while Balin helped Dwalin into his suit. Ori was glad he’d put on the mithril shirt that morning. It was safely hidden under his tunic.

“Now remember,” Dori scolded, kissing Ori’s cheek. “You leave the fighting to your professional bullies.”

“Yes, Ori’s Dori.”

Ori smothered a giggled. Dwalin wasn’t so subtle, as he snickered.

Glorfindel chuckled as Margr and Vi got him into his suit.

“I can’t wait for you to take it off me again,” he said.

Vi smacked his arse.

“So tha’s why yer no’ wearin’ yer drawers, is it?”

“This garb seems to fit better without them,” he said. “Besides, drawers are an evil invention of men, designed to keep our bottom parts from breathing as Eru intended.”

“Your bottom bits start breathin’, love,” said Margr, “an’ yer sleepin’ with th’ ponies.”

They fastened his halberd on and told him where they were tucking the rest of his weapons.

Dain passed out crowbars of varying sizes to everyone.

Captain Omosuil burst into the grove with his squad. They had all changed their raiment from the forest pine of the Greenwood to shades of stone gray, like the Company.

Galadriel reappeared with Celeborn. She made her jumpsuit look the height of fashion. Janni nodded approvingly and handed her a very large, long crowbar. Galadriel took it and brandished it like a sword. Celeborn groaned, took it, and put it in the long pocket at her shoulder and going down her back, as she giggled and teased him.

Dori tucked Ori’s sling shot into a pocket at Ori’s waist and put the pouch of arrow heads in the opposite pocket. Dori sniffed. Ori turned and grabbed Dori tight, hugging her.

Dori warned him, “I’m petitioning Mahal as soon as you enter that horrid place.”

“Do it before,” Ori said. “I want Him concentrating on us while we’re there.”

“I promise, pet. Remember, leave the fighting-”

“Yes, Dori, to my professional bullies.”

“Righ’,” barked Dwalin. “All o’ Lord Ori’s bullies ge’ fron’ an’ center.”

Captain Omosuil’s squad marched forward and surrounded the Company in formation.

“Seriously?” Ori asked.

“Bullies, reporting for duty, Lord Ori,” said Omosuil with a smirk.

“This is going to be fun,” said Kili, sending Tauriel into giggles.

Treebeard and a cadre of ents arrived.

Ori approached, bowing.

“Thank you for doing this, Treebeard. We really appreciate the help.”

A wind blew through the branches and Ori had the strange feeling that the ents were… well, not purring, that would be strange, but making pleased sounds at any rate. Apparently, a couple of days to think it over had brought them to the decision that they liked Ori and his Company as well.

“The… orcs… will… not… escape… us,” Treebeard vowed.

“Good, great,” said Ori.

He didn’t ask what Treebeard meant by that. He didn’t think he’d like the answer. He simply trusted that Treebeard and his companions knew what they were about. They must, if they had lived this long.

Celeborn turned to Dori.

“Bearer, I have a great favor to ask. I would like to go with the Company to the mountain, though not entering it, of course, and I would be much easier knowing that I left Kelli to your capable care.”

Dori’s eyebrow raised precipitously.

“My dear Celeborn, that’s quite a lot of well-intentioned pony shite, but I will do it, seeing you asked so prettily.”

She bowed and Kelli squawked and smacked Celeborn’s hip with his forehead.

The elf knelt down so he and the bird were eye to eye.

“You be good for Lady Dori, Kelli.”
Kelli cuddled against Celeborn.
“I’ll take that as a ‘yes’,” he said.
“Ready?” Ori asked.
On hearing that all were prepared, Ori turned to Treebeard.
“Let’s go.”
Treebeard lifted Ori and Dwalin each onto a limb, while all around them the other ents did the same, lifting dwarrow and elves and all their equipment before setting off in a traveling grove at high speed toward the mountains.
Ori heard a croak and the flap of wings and Quartzite landed on his shoulder.
“Quartz, what are you doing? You’re supposed to stay behind with Dori!”
The raven favored him with an unimpressed look.
“Going with you. You need me. Plus…”
“Plus?”
“Orcs are quieter.”
“Oi!” came a shout from Dain. “I resemble tha’ remark!”
“Mahal help us all,” groaned Dwalin.
“Tell yer hubby no’ t’ worry,” came the hot boom in Ori’s head. “I’m on it.”
They made it to the huge, over-grown doorway. It was in ruins but rocks covered most of it. Dwalin climbed up and signed in Iglishmêk the ‘all clear’. Ori stood by his side in a moment and there was an opening. Quickly, Ori signed this to the rest of the company and instantly everyone was busy removing the rubble and stones from the entry, preparing room to move the box through. Ori glanced back into Birnam Wood which had followed them to a few feet away. Eowyn did her best to help move the rock but she was not of the same caliber of Jani, Margr and Vi. She turned and kept watch above them, sword drawn. Galadriel helped by making the rocks cling together and emit no noise as they were dropped to the sides.

“Heh!” Dain snickered, holding up the remains of a leather something that had weathered a century in the rubble.

Ori signed, “What is it?”

Dain replied in kind, “The boot I was wearing when the doors fell on my leg.”

“Please tell me your foot isn’t still in it.”

“No, that’s gone, but, here’s my lucky gold coin!”

“How lucky could it be? You lost your leg!”

“Sure, it’s lucky. The doors could have fallen on my head!” He looked at the boot fondly. “I still have the match of this one at home.”

Sculdís snorted and signed, “No, you don’t.”

Dain looked incensed.

“What did you do with my boot?”

“I threw it away. Just like this one,” she signed, taking it and pitching it to the side.

Dain threw her a stink-eye but returned to removing rubble.

When the entrance was clear enough, Ori signed a halt. Quartzite fluttered out of the trees to land on his shoulder.

“You can stay out here, Quartz,” whispered Ori.

“Nope,” hissed Quartz.

“All right, then,” Ori muttered, somewhat relieved to have him there.

Following Ori, the company silently entered Khazad-dûm. Ori fished into his chest pocket and withdrew the phial Galadriel had given Thorin.

Slowly, he held aloft the Phial of Galadriel. For a moment it glimmered, faint as a rising star struggling in heavy earthward mists, and then as its power waxed, it began to burn, and kindled to a silver flame, a minute heart of dazzling light until the darkness receded from it, until it seemed to shine in the center of a globe of airy crystal and the hand that held it sparkled with white fire.

Ori gasped then looked about. The cavern was vast, reaching up the inside of the mountain.

This had once been a grand entrance. He could see beyond the filth and the rubble that empty niches lined the walls. Broken statues on the floor had their origins above the door lintel. In the floor itself, under the dirt, Ori picked out the shadows of a mosaic. From this, his gaze wandered down into the chasm yawning before them. He then vowed to himself that he would never do so again.  The middle of the bridge was gone, as they had predicted, but the approaches on each side of the chasm showed Ori how high and how narrow it must have been.

Now he knew why Binni remembered this bridge.

Dwarves as a rule were not afraid of heights.  The narrowest walkways in Erebor were open and without rails, which were only used for decorations, or to surround pits in mines, where even dwarves might accidentally fall.

But only as a last ditch effort to save one’s life would a dwarf scoot across this.

He wondered how they got carts and animals and large numbers of soldiers through the eastern side of the mountains in the old days.

Service entrance, probably.

“A’righ’,” said Dain quietly, “let’s bring up th’ crate.”

“What is it?” Omosuil murmured.

“Jus’ a li’il somethin’ a’ me own design,” said Dain. “Lookee.”

Now that Ori was looking at it, Dain’s mithril crate, about six feet square, was not entirely featureless.  There was a switch on the back.

“Here, our Diry,” Dain motioned to Haldir.  “Come take a gander.”

Once Ori would have thought the elf angry or annoyed, but he was beginning to think this was just the elf’s normal countenance.

“How may I be of service?” Haldir asked with a slight bow.

“Yer goin’ t’ be in charge a’ th’ bridge, righ’?  Watch, real simple.  Flip th’ switch up.”

He did so and a motor clicked, then whispered into action.  Ori felt the ground beneath them yielding to mechanical pins as they screwed deep into the earth.  The front half of the crate shot soundlessly across the chasm, drawing out myriad cables as it traveled.  And where this part of the crate landed, almost out of sight beyond the far doorway, it forced down more screws and anchored itself tight.

Between the crate halves hung a miraculous mithril bridge, the cables so close together and strung so tight as to form a road that any three or four dwarves could walk across abreast.

“That… is amazing!” hissed Haldir.  “And you designed this?”

“Aye, I’m a genius.  Now, when we’re back across, yeh flip th’ switch down an’ it’ll pack itself back up.  Righ’?”

“Yes, yes, I believe so.”

If not, I will tend to it, mellon Dain,” Omosuil assured the king.

“Good lads,” said Dain, smacking Haldir smartly across the ass.  He turned to the rest of Ori’s company, with a maniacal grin.  “Let’s do this bastard.”

Ori felt the surge of excitement course through him.  They were doing it.  He was leading a Quest!  They were going to find the box of the Flower of Durin!

Ori held the phial aloft and marched across, his Company following swiftly with their gear.  With the Light of Eärendil gleaming ahead, they silently navigated the passages leading to the Chamber of Mazarbul.

Dain all-but chanted under his breath,

“Righ’, guid.  Righ’, ” as he checked their route for debris that might impede their return journey.  Ori tried to keep his mind on his goal and not be distracted by the ruined splendor around him.  But it was difficult.  His eyes caught flashes of mosaics, carved screens fine and thin as parchment, broken shards of colored glass from lanterns hanging far above in the shadows.

“Ugh, what a smell of sulphur,” Galadriel commented, under her breath.

All of it was filthy, and the stench made Ori pull the collar of his jumpsuit up over his mouth.  They turned left, then right, and at the niche featured on the old map, they turned into a chamber to dwarf the throne room of Erebor.

The Company slowed as they crossed the dark expanse, the room littered with broken tables and benches, burst casks and smashed cups, torn tapestries and bat shit aplenty.

“Dwalin,” Ori whispered, “where are all the bodies?”

Orcs take skulls f’r trophies, bu’ even they can’t eat bone.”
“But we can,” said a creaking voice.
Ori shivered and lifted the Light of Eärendil to find—
A bird.
“Oh, dear,” said Galadriel, which was the only way Ori knew he wasn’t hallucinating.
It was not the size of the great eagles, but easily the size of a dwarf, and perched on the back of a cast aside stone chair.
Its skull was large and close to the skin, with shrewd, sunken black eyes and a sheen of short, red feathers up the neck, mounting to a large crest of scarlet at the crown. The beak was large and powerfully made.
Ori waited for someone to say or do something. Then he remembered that he was the one who was expected to say or do it.
He stepped forward slowly and bowed.
“Please pardon us for trespassing. We mean no harm.”
The bird turned its head to focus one eye on him closely.
“Aren’t you a little short for an uruk?”
“We’re not orcs. We’re - most of us - dwarrow.”
“Hmm.”
As they stood there, Ori hoped no one would pull a weapon. Really, he hoped no one would as much as sneeze.
“You,” the bird finally pronounced, “are like the ones who were here before. You are like the statues.”
Other birds crept into Ori’s notice, crowding in to surround the Company. He could have kicked himself. Had he not already been in this situation? Except, these were not ravens.
That was what he got for assuming orcs would be their only problem.
The bird croaked at Ori.
“Why has your majesty returned?”
“Er… I’m not the king.”
“The king’s egg, then.”
“I’m not related to the king by blood, but I do represent him.”
The bird lengthened its neck and he was appalled to find how long it was. It examined his face and hair minutely, flicking the blunt beak on his marriage braid. Quartz scooted to Ori’s other shoulder.
The bird hissed in Ori’s ear,
“Only the most royal may wear the red crest. Your king thinks highly of you, to let you rub your head in the red clay.”
“Um… actually, my hair comes out of my head this way. See, my brother Dain’s hair is red, too, though he is a king.”
“Then we shall assume,” said the bird, head drifting side to side on the long neck, “that you are personages of equal importance to ourselves.”
The other birds croaked and squawked and it suddenly occurred to Ori that this bird was using the royal ‘we’.
“Forgive us, your majesty,” said Ori. “We didn’t realize we were in the royal presence. We must plead ignorance of your ways.”
The bird laughed.
It might have been in humor, but it was in no way a comforting sound.
“You are welcome to whatever we may claim as our realm. We are the Red Queen of All Bonebreakers. Alas, our people share this mountain with those other things far less pleasant. Egg stealers. Nest stompers. The largest hunt us. The smallest shake our eggs and laugh.”
“The orcs,” said Ori.
“Uruks,” said the bird distastefully. “Why did your king cede such a fine aerie to the likes of them?”
“We didn’t cede it, your majesty. We were beset by the fiery beast from the depths and then, when we were weak, the orcs attacked. They killed many of our people, and drove the others out.”

“Ah, yes, the dead. Their bones were far tastier than those of the uruk.”

Ori debated if it would tax the bird monarch’s patience, then finally said, “We are no friends of the orcs. It honors us that you cleared away our remains.”

The queen nodded in regal acknowledgement.

Ori continued, “We have only come seeking some treasures we thought lost to us, if we have leave to do so.”

“Is it bone?”

“No, your majesty.”

“Is it egg?”

“No, your majesty.”

“Then, take what you will, and, if you see any uruks, perhaps you will kill them and leave us the bones. Distasteful as they are, that is all we can eat, and now they are scarce.”

“Your majesty is kind. Are there any orcs nearby?”

“Who can tell? They move here and there, like ants. Sometimes they crash about, sometimes they crawl silently out of holes even we cannot see. They are always fighting each other, and not even over mates. They are stupid.”

Ori bowed, sensed the others of the Company doing likewise, and was more than relieved when the queen and her court flew off to who knew where.

No doubt she would leave a few scouts behind to watch them closely.

“Pleasant bird,” Quartz cracked.

Ori felt Dwalin’s hand on his shoulder.

“Well done, love.”

“Nice of ’em t’ tidy, I s’pose,” Vi muttered. “Still makes me wanna throw up.”

It took another quarter hour to cross the room, Gimli, Eowyn, and Dwalin in the lead with weapons drawn, Legolas, Kili, and Tauriel, bows ready bringing up the rear. Then, after a twist in the opposite passage, they reached their goal.

It lay behind the shattered remnants of some unassuming doors of the Chamber of Mazarbul.

Ori felt a little disappointed. This was, in effect, the entrance to the Great Library, but the doors could easily have concealed a broom closet. The door and rubble were not cleared enough for the bonebreakers to shift or squeeze through. Nor, apparently, had a orc bothered to claim their meals. He reached the light between broken panels and looked on a sight unseen for almost a century.

Battle had come to even this dusty crevice of the mountains. Books and papers littered every surface, some burnt, some spattered with ink, or possibly blood. The floor was strewn with the mumified bodies of long-dead scribes.

“This is it,” he said.

In a few minutes they had removed the rubble, the broken doors, and entered the room. It was square, lined not with shelves, but flat, metal walls, decorated with shields and devices. These were actually doors concealing the archives. The others looked about them, but Ori had eyes only for the dead scribes, their sunken faces, their vermin-ruined clothes. Some still held their pens in hand, others, further from the door, had drawn weapons in a last, futile, attempt at salvation.

He found himself standing over the body of a journeyman scribe, the rank evident by the remains of their hood and scattered beads on the floor by their head. The empty eye sockets looked to the ceiling. The fragile hands clasped a volume caked in dust.

“I’m so sorry,” whispered Ori.

“That’s alright. All over with now,” said a voice at his elbow.

He turned and did a double take. He looked at the body on the floor, then at the scribe at his elbow, and realized she was ever so slightly transparent. She reminded him of Omi and he tried not to think about that too closely.

“Teyan, daughter of Eyan, at your service,” said the scribe. “Been waiting for you lot. Durin should have told you the crypt’s booby trapped. I like your turn out. Very practical. Shows your bum to advantage.”

“Thank you,” said Ori weakly.

“Anyway, if you’d take that book I’m holding? That was my master work. I spent four decades on the blessed thing. Someone ought to read it!”

“Of course,” he said.

He stooped to do so, horribly embarrassed when the two hands holding the book in place broke off at the wrist.

“Ooops!” Teyan said merrily.

“Love?” Dwalin hissed. “What’re yeh doin’ with tha’?”

“A dead scribe told me I need to take it.”

“Aye. Grand.”

“She also said I have a nice bum.”

“Tha’ yeh do. Any idea where Floviq’s hidin’ out?”

“It’s beyond that door,” said Ori quietly, and pointed at a pair of innocuous matching shield works.

“Yeh sure?”

“I think that’s him doing a jig in front of it it, so, yes.”

“A’righ’,” said Dwalin as he turned to the doorway. “Clear off, yeh. We got work t’ do.”

“Oh, and Teyan, the dead scribe, says the crypt itself is booby trapped.”

Dain chuckled.

“Planned fer tha’, wee scribe brother. Pickaxes a’ th’ ready?”

“I’ll leave you to it, then,” said Teyan, vanishing.

Ori and Dwalin went with Lady Galadriel to find the edges and latches of the doors disguised as walls. In silence the shield work was carefully removed. Lady Galadriel plied her crowbar and with Margr and Vi’s help the doors opened with the hiss of a long-sealed tomb. The Light of Earendil revealed a chamber thirty feet square, filled with shelves.

Kili Tauriel, Gimli, Eowyn, and Legolas stood outside in the main room, on guard.

Ori frowned, looking around in the smaller room.

“I thought it would be bigger. It is on the maps.”

“Oh, it is,” said Galadriel, taking Teyan’s book. She put it in one of her satchels. “It is the chamber proper and it goes on in other rooms for nearly a mile, but, judging from the spines and labels, I’d say this is everything the scribes held the dearest, items they most wanted hidden - and no elves allowed!”

Galadriel darted forward and flitted from shelf to shelf, her long hands plucking books decisively as she moved, putting mainly small, very ancient books into the satchels across her shoulders and even smaller ones into the pockets of her jumpsuit, her crowbar drawn and tucked under an arm. She hummed serenely to herself, punctuated by an occasional obscenity, the only indication of her concern.

Then she hissed out sharply.

“Mahal’s hairy balls! This is my mother’s diary!”

“Really?” Ori asked.

“Yes! No wonder I’ve never been able to find it!”

“Oh, well, this is a good thing then,” said Ori encouragingly.

“Do you know how much dirt there is on King Oropher in this? I’ll have enough to torment Thranduil for at least a century.”

“Oooo, our Gladdy!” Margr giggled softly from the outer room.

“How well that sounds!” Vi seconded.

Ori looked about Floviq reappeared and walked around a section of flooring. Ori grabbed a piece of charcoal and chased him, marking the floor where the ghost walked. Completing a rectangle, Floviq went to the middle, bowed and disappeared.

Dain, Sculdis, Vi, Margr, Janni and Glorfindel pounced forward and began work, chipping away, loosening the stones around the crypt cover.

“A’righ’ yeh lot,” said Dain, “yeh kin stop diggin.”

“But there is only a little left to remove,” Glorfindel protested.

“Exactly.  Clear away, now.”

He hunkered down with a long-handled pick, figured for distance, and struck hard on the final five inches of stone.

The gap erupted explosively.  The dwarrow scrambled for cover as hundreds of blades flung upward to strike and ricochet off the ceiling.

“Shite!” Vi barked, looking out from behind one of the shield doors they removed.

“Elbereth!” Glorfindel agreed.

“Fanny feathers!” Quartz cawed.

Eowyn ducked through, sword ready.

“Is anyone hurt?”

“No, but so much for stealth,” said Galadriel, as she, Dwalin and Ori peered around a shelf to survey the devastation.

Glorfindel rose to approach the crypt, but Vi grasped the back of his jumpsuit.

“Wait a mo’, dearie,” said Margr, as she gestured Eowyn back outside.

They waited, and were rewarded with a second volley of blades.

Legolas swore and Jani groused, “Bleedin’ overachievers.  Is that it?”

“Let’s hope so,” Sculdis replied and Margr nodded.

Slowly, with the groan and scrape of hidden machinery long disused, the crypt lid rose and, under it, a massive wooden box.

It crunched to a halt with the top at about knee level, for a dwarf anyway.

Ori gaped.

He didn’t know what he had expected, though it wasn’t what amounted to a packing crate.

Actually, it was a packing crate.  Lettered on the side, a legend proclaimed:

Premium Iron Hills Sheep Skins - Three Hundred Reams

“That it?” Eowyn asked, over her shoulder.

“I think that’s done it,” said Dain.  “We kin lever off th’ top now.”

He approached with the crowbar.

“Are you sure all the booby traps are disarmed?” Ori asked.

“No,” said Dain unconcernedly.

“But, what if it takes off your leg or something?”

“Depends which one,” said Dain with a push of the crowbar and a grunt.  “Either way, I’ll jus’ have t’ hop aroun’ fer a bit.”

Ori winced.

He did not want to have to explain Dain’s missing leg to Dori.

“Er…” Dain said, finally looking up.  “Yeh may want t’ duck back down fer a mo’, just in case.  I kin replace a leg, I can’t sew yer heeds back on.”

He levered the bar under the stone lid and began to rifle it while the rest held their breaths.

Nothing happened.

Nothing happened.

Nothing happened.

Nothing happened.

It was amazing how high Dain could jump on his mechanical leg, and how quickly, skipping up on top.  The crowbar flew across the room with a hail of about a million nails that shot out horizontally into the walls.

Dain surveyed the damage from his perch atop the box.

“Sculdis, me jewel?  Will yeh bring back me crowbar?”

“I’m on it,” she said.

He jumped down and the stone workers and Glorfindel helped move the lid aside.  Dwalin, Glorfindel, and Margr helped carefully and quietly prop it against a wall, though Ori didn’t see much point to the silence. If a full armory smashing around a stone- and metal-lined room didn’t bring every orc in the mountains, he didn’t know what would.

Once the lid was off, the box rose another five feet until its bottom was level with the floor. Dain leapt up on top, pried up a board and peered inside.

“Hullo? Anybody home?”

“Git yer arse back down here, funny dwarf,” said Sculdis.

“Is it the right box?” Ori asked.

“Lotsa lil’ boxes an’ whatnot. I’d say it is.”

They unpacked the pieces of the cart Dain had created and quickly assembled it. Within minutes they were ready to move the box onto it.

Ori grew increasingly nervous as time passed. They had moved as fast as they could, without stop, for what felt like hours. Their luck held, but they were only halfway home.

They easily moved the box with their combined strength, and it fit almost too perfectly into the cart.

“Are we ready?” Ori asked.

“Ready,” said Dain.

“Ready,” said Lady Galadriel.

She had appeared with two bulging satchels, one on either hip, strapped shut. Every pocket on her jumpsuit was stuffed to bursting. She looked extremely…bumpy.

“Eeeew our Gladdy,” snickered Vi. “Yeh look like yeh bin liftin’ weights f’r a lifetime.”

Galadriel glanced down at herself and flexed. The bulges popped like overblown muscles making the elf lady giggle. They replaced the doors to the library chamber, then she laid a palm on the wall and whispered, a halo of light around her hand. Tauriel and Legolas laid their hands on the wall near her, somehow added their strength to hers. Ori could almost feel the stone around the chamber growing tighter, growing into the metal doors, sealing everything in - and everything else out.

Eowyn breathed, “And so, these are elves.”

“We need a lookout,” said Dain. “See if th’ passage is clear.”

“I’ll go,” said Ori, and went before anyone else could even reply.

It occurred to him that he should have simply let someone else do it. Quartz, now back on Ori’s shoulder, could have easily done it himself, but it was just to check the hall. It wasn’t like a pack of orcs was waiting to spring out at him.

And they weren’t… waiting. They had been climbing up through a hole in the floor under the cover of all that noise, or perhaps attracted by it, and looked as surprised as Ori felt. Ori stepped back hastily, tripped on loose debris and sat down hard on the broken floor. Quartz flittered up frantically, cawing.

As Ori scrambled to stand, his hand closed around the handle of a weapon on the floor. The orcs howled and fell upon him.

Ori blinked.

He stood in a large, beautiful, empty stone chamber filled with reflected light. There were no orcs. There was no terrible stench of decay. He looked around at the sconces in their niches, circling the room just a little higher than the top of his head. The gold fixtures held crystals carved into frozen, glittering flames. Beneath his feet, a mosaic of lapis, moonstone and mithril picked out Durin’s anvil and seven stars in the light gray granite. Before him, lay an open doorway of immense size.

The air whispered around him and Quartz landed on his shoulder.

“Wow! Big, shiny aerie!”

Feeling rather queasy, Ori looked behind him at the huge metal doors closed so that only a dwarf would be able to find the opening. A dwarf, or a friend of a dwarf, anyway.

He glanced about and on his right, there stood a dwarf with a familiar face, who gazed with blue eyes that sparkled with humor. Ori wasn’t sure who this dwarf was. He looked like Thror, though quite a younger version of him, and hale and strong and good-humored.
“Hello?” Ori asked.
“Hullo, lad,” said the dwarf. “Welcome to the Halls of your Ancestors.”

Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yes, we can hear you. Where is Ori? Where’s here? Dolly, Stevie, what’s with your promises not to kill anyone you like? We thought you liked Ori! What’s he doing here? All good questions and we love Ori very much. Not to worry, all these questions are to be answered…now. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“Halls of my Ancestors?” Ori yelled. “Why am I dead?”
“Ori-” Quartz started.
“I didn’t do anything really stupid!”
“Ori-” Quartz tried again.
“Quartz, are you dead, too?” Ori shouted.
“Ori-”
“You’re not dead, lad,” the dwarf assured him with a worried look.
Quartz rolled his eyes. “Thank you!”
“Mind,” said the dwarf, “you are the first to come here and demand at the start to see the Grandfather of us all.”
“If I’m not dead, I will be soon, if my body’s lying there in front of a pack of orcs!”
“Your body isn’t lying there it’s…occupied.”
“And who, may I ask has…nicked my body?” Ori demanded.
“That would be Durin,” the dwarf explained.
“Who’s in Quartz’s body?”
“I am,” snapped Quartz.
“Durin said something about getting in some practice,” the dwarf managed to put in.
“I hope he intends to practice killing orcs along with practicing body snatching.”
“Yes, you are,” Quartz muttered.
“Er-…,” Thror began, “I was told to answer some of your questions and take you to other people who can answer your…other questions.”
“Where’s Mahal?”
“In His forge-”
“Where’s that?”
“Lad, you can’t just-”
“Fine,” Ori snapped again. “I’ll go find it myself! Who would have thought that in the Halls, you’d need an appointment to see Udad Mahal?”
“Would be polite,” said Quartz philosophically.
“Um,” Thror said awkwardly. “I was also told I could ask you some questions.”
That stopped Ori short. He really looked at Thror this time. The Durin blue eyes sparkled with warmth. He looked…friendly.
“You’ve changed,” Ori commented, lamely. “Um, I’m Ori, by the way, but you probably know that.”

“So I’ve been told. That’s the whole trouble. I’ve been told what happened during my reign, but I don’t remember much about it. I have a vague recollection of Frerin as a wee lad, but nothing after that. They tell me I did horrible things because I was sick. Forgive me, Master Ori, but I don’t recall you at all. Did we know each other well?”

“Um, no, your majesty. I only met you a week or so before you …er… died. But, you did give a public blessing of my wedding.”

“Did I?” The late king beamed at him. “Well, congratulations! Who’s the lucky dwarf or dam?”

“Dwalin Fundinul, the captain of the city guard of Dale.”

“Fundin’s boy! And captain of the city guard! But, why Dale? Are there dwarrow living there?”

“It’s where I grew up.”

“And I see by your braid that you’re a scribe. Excellent! Dwalin was always sharper than Fundin liked, but why should a soldier not also be a thinker? Fundin’s since come around on that. Now, if it was so easy to repair his marriage. I think that may be lost.”

Ori didn’t quite know how to reply. Perhaps it was a blessing Thror couldn’t recall anything.

“Thorin’ll toss his scree,” Quartz whispered to Ori, who nodded.

They walked from the antechamber into a vast cavern, spanned by a beautiful marble bridge. It was wide, without rails as was the dwarven style, but lined with statues, each carved by a different hand. There were smiths, stone masons, glassworkers, and weavers, jewelers and bakers and scribes. The air was filled with ravens, circling and calling.

On the other side of the bridge, through a broad arch lined with stone and metal filigree, Ori saw dwarrow of every possible description, laughing, arguing, and singing.

“This is Khazad-dûm,” said Ori. “This is Khazad-dûm before the balrog. Durin patterned it after the Halls.”

“Can you think of a more perfect place?” Thror asked. “I grew up at Khazad-dûm, and seeing all this when I arrived was like coming home. Though, even I’ll admit this is a much better bridge. You mind a bit of a walk?”

“No, your majesty, of course not.”

“Call me Thror. We don’t have much use for titles around here.”

“Er, um, this is my raven, Quartz.”

Quartz shrugged.

“He knows that.”

Ori’s eyes darted everywhere, and he itched to take out his sketchbook and graphite wand. He did still have them, hanging from his shoulder in his leather satchel.

He was even wearing his old cardigan.

By reflex he put up his hand to ensure his marriage bead was in place. It was. Ori sighed with relief.

“Where are we going?”

“The great feasting hall. We spend most of our time there, er…”

“Feasting?” Ori supplied impishly.

“Whenever possible,” Thror agreed. “It’s not far, mind, but there’s some fountains and sculpture and what-not cluttering up the place first. I don’t mind the fountains so much. Great for soaking your feet. The statues are a little too first age for my taste.”

True to Ori’s original thought, he didn’t recognize anyone he knew. On the other hand, there were possibly millions of dwarrow here and he could easily pass a relative without ever knowing. He happened to glance over at a couple sharing a bench in a mosaic-ed alcove. Sitting, talking, holding hands, they were a very pretty pair, a handsome Blacklock dam and… and a compact, dark-haired elf.

“There are elves here,” he said, mostly to himself.

“Eh?” Thror asked.

“There’s an elf sitting there with that dam.”

Thror looked over, frowned, and raised his brow at Ori.
“Lad, get a grip. There’s no one sitting there but Master Narvi.”
“You can’t s-. Oh. Right. I must be muzzy from the trip. Wait. That’s Master Narvi? The one who created the western doors to Khazad-dûm?”
“Oh, yes. Bit of a celebrity around here. I try to keep a low profile myself.”
“Would you mind if I went to pay my respects?”
“No, go ahead. I’ll wait.”
“Thank you. Quartz?”
“I’ll just hang out here, thanks.” He hopped over onto Thror’s head.
Ori neared the alcove, feeling somewhat guilty for interrupting them, but he could hardly stop himself.
When they noticed his approach, he bowed.
“Master Narvi? Master Celebrimbor?”
“Aye,” said Narvi, a well-grown dam with massive shoulders, deep brown skin and aqua blue eyes, which narrowed at him questioningly.
“I’m Ori of Fundin. I seem to be… visiting.”
She startled him by rising to return his bow. All her beard beads jingled together, as they were tiny metallic hammers.
“At yer service, Lord Ori.”
“Yes,” said Celebrimbor, his eyes twinkling with mirth. “It’s quite an honor to meet the scribe of Mahal, especially when he isn’t dead yet!”
“Please, sit down, Master Narvi, I’m the one who’s honored.”
Narvi sat and grinned evilly.
“Lady Galadriel spilled th’ secret, didn’t she?”
“Mahal gave her leave to do so.”
“Guil! We want everyone t’ know. No more a’ this coy foolishness.”
“I also would like to offer my congratulations. I think it’s wonderful.”
“Thank yeh.” Narvi nodded. “Mebbe someday there’ll be more as feels th’ same as yeh. There’re others like us, they shouldn’t have t’ hide it.”
“Actually, Kili, the younger prince of Erebor, is married to Lady Tauriel, the ward of King Father Thranduil of Erys Lasgalen.”
Celebrimbor choked out a laugh, gripping Narvi’s hand.
“Dearest, just wait until King Oropher finds out. He’ll drop dead twice!”
Narvi agreed, “I’m amazed Thranduil hasn’t already kicked it once!”
“Oh, he’s much better since he took the stick out of his arse,” said Ori. They all laughed at that, then Ori said, “I’m sorry, but I can’t keep King Thror waiting. He can’t see you, Master Celebrimbor.”
“Call me ‘Brim’. He can’t see me, because he can’t accept the idea of elves being here.”
“I imagine he’s not the only one,” said Ori.
“And you would imagine right,” replied the elf.
Quartz returned to Ori’s shoulder and Thror took them on for a short while longer when Ori heard a soft and persistent buzzing, which he decided must be coming from down the passageway. The volume grew steadily and soon split into many different voices. The nearer they came to the great open doorway, the more it became apparent that there was an epic food fight in progress.
And that was hardly the only thing going on. There was gaming and dancing and snogging, and it looked like a cadre of Ironfists engaging a group of Firebeards in a little friendly mayhem off in the corner. A roll stuffed with pulled pork sailed toward Ori’s head. Thror caught it handily, took a bite out of it and nodded.
“No’ bad.”
He held it out to Quartz, who took a healthy bite.
“Mmm. No’ b’d,” Quartz agreed.
The feasting hall went on for acres in every direction. The long tables and benches ran endlessly along either side of their path. From time to time Ori and Thror had to dodge the odd barrel of ale as it rolled itself to some destination or other, though as Ori watched, he saw the platters on the table refilling themselves with meat and root vegetables and pastries of every kind.

Thror turned abruptly to the right between two tables and continued three or four more until he reached a set even more populated and louder than any of the others.

“Thought you might like to meet the family,” said Thror. A substantial dwarf body flew across the table in front of them, and a second ran over the boards, chasing it, and screaming a battle cry. The two collided at the edge of another bench and the diners didn’t even react as the two young dwarrow proceeded to wrestle on the floor, intent on pounding each other into slag.

“Fundin! Groin!” a warrior barked. The two dwarrow broke apart, and the red-head grinned, while the brunet looked sheepish. Ori turned.

For one, mad instant he thought he was looking at Dwalin. Same armor, same axes, same forearms the size of Ori’s torso.

But this was a dwarrowdam, and she had all her hair, and her eyes were different. Balin had inherited them.

“Knock it off,” she admonished them. “We got company.”

“Yes mam,” the red-head sassed. Ori assumed this was Groin.

“Don’ yeh ‘mam’ me, yeh overgrown badger. I’ll fetch her here an’ she’ll kick yer sorry arse.” She turned to Ori, grinning.

“So yer me Dwalin’s Ori. Idris, daughter a’ Eenid, at yer service.”

“Ori of Fundin at yours and your families… mam.” Quartz whistled appreciatively.

“Nice beard! Nice ink!” he enthused.

“This is Quartz,” said Ori. “He’s very young.” Idris smiled crookedly. “No’ so young as all tha’, I think. Are yeh, master raven?”

“Mmmaybe.” She turned to the brothers.

“Oi. Fundin, Groin, clear off some a’ tha’ rubbish, so our Ori kin sit an’ eat!” Groin hopped to it immediately, but Fundin peered at Ori for a second longer. Uncomfortable, knowing Fundin’s history, he merely bowed. Fundin bowed in return and turned to help his brother make room for Ori. Ori sat.

“So,” said Idris, pouring mead into a cup that had appeared at Ori’s elbow, “yer married t’ me Dwalin.”

“Yes, mam. He’s my One.” Idris looked up at Fundin, who looked down at the table.

“An’ he treats yeh well, I kin see tha’ in yer eyes.”

“He’s never been anything but sweet to me. Maybe I shouldn’t consider that a great achievement, as we’ve only been married six months, but he’s such a good, honorable dwarf, and we’re so happy together.”

“Now, then, I don’ think bein’ married t’ Mahal’s scribe kin be terribly easy,” she said. “I’m… a lot of work, I think,” he admitted.

A plate appeared in front of him. Thror speared a chunk of roast meat from the platter on the table and started to fill Ori’s plate.

Quartz cleared his throat.

A second plate appeared next to Ori’s and Thror put meat on that one, too.

“Ta,” said Quartz. A helmet crashed to the table, startling Ori, and disturbing Quartz to let out a squawk.

“Wha’ did I tell yeh abou’ yer lame arse righ’ flank defense?”

“You try relearning how to fight with two eyes instead of one.”

“Whine whine whine. Yer like a pebble.”
"I’m older than you."
"Then why’m I still wipin’ yer snotty, pointy li’le nose?’"
"Ah,” said Idris. “An’ here’s th’ bloody floorshow.”
The floorshow consisted of two familiar, but startlingly large figures.
"Oi!” said the dam. “Tha’ him?”
"Aye,” said Thror. “Mahal’s scribe.”
The dam strode forward.
Ori stood, wondering if he should bow, but she offered her arm in the way of warriors and he clasped it automatically.
"Freris, daughter a’ Ardis, at yer service.”
"Ori of Fundin at yours and your family’s.”
"Good grip,” said Freris. “What’s yer weapon?”
Behind her, Thrain rolled his eyes.
"Slingshot,” said Ori truthfully.
Her blonde eyebrows shot up in her dark face and she laughed. It sounded like music.
"Mahal’s hairy butt, Freris,” said Thrain, pushing her aside. “Not everyone is a blade-obsessed maniac like you.”
"Aye, bu’ I’ll bet he kin duck,” she shot back, throwing herself down on the bench and reaching for a slice of roast. “Unlike some dwarrow.”
Thrain made a face at her, then turned to Ori and bowed.
"Thrain, son of Thror, at your service.”
And there were those eyes again, that sparkling Durin blue. Ori thought it was a shame Thrain ever had to lose one. “Ori of Fundin, at yours and your family’s.”
Thrain looked like he wanted to say something, but he schooled his features and gestured for Ori to sit again.
Ori did so and waited for Thrain to say what he wished to say. Thrain sat, considered the contents of the platter before him, and appeared to be waiting for the words to come.
Finally, the prince cleared his throat.
"Lord Ori, would you please tell me how fares my son Thorin? Is he a good king?”
“Oh, yes!” Ori reported happily. “He’s very determined, and his people love and respect him already.”
Thrain’s expression never changed, but a light came into his eyes that Ori read as pride.
“Excellent. I knew it would be so.”
“He found his sense a’ humor, then?” Freris asked around a mouthful of- Was that an iklar?
“He’s getting there,” Ori replied. “He can be quite a brat, especially when we’re all together in the family. I think Bilbo helps a lot.”
“Who’s Bilbo?” she demanded.
Oops.
“He’s Thorin’s betrothed.”
Silence.
Everyone stared at him in blatant amazement.
“Thorin? Thorin is betrothed?” Freris marveled.
“Not officially, but the people have already accepted Bilbo as the future consort.”
Thrain’s eyes drilled into his.
“Who are Bilbo’s parents? What clan is he?”
“Bilbo is a hobbit. He’s a professor of languages. He-”
The roar of laughter around the table startled him into silence.
“I knew it!” Fundin barked. “Did I no’ say it’d happen? Pay up, brother!”
Disgusted even in mirth, Groin threw a bag of something across the table. It sounded and smelled like emeralds.
“A lucky guess,” was Groin’s only concession.
“Go on,” Freris urged Ori. “Who is this Bilbo?”

“His last name is Baggins. His father was Bungo Baggins and his mother was—”

“Belladonna Took!” Freris shouted and shot to her feet.

Even Thrain looked amazed.

“Our Thorin?” he asked. “Our Thorin is marrying Belladonna Took’s son?”

“Yes, he—”

“Freris! Send a raven!”

“Already on it,” the warrior replied. She cawed into the air.

“You know Bilbo’s parents?” Ori asked.

Idris laughed.

“They were at this very table las’ nigh’. Mahal’s hairy arse, but’ tha’ were a guid cake!” A very large raven winged through the hall to land on Freris’ shoulder.

“You called?” the raven said smoothly,

“Carc, go find Belladonna an’ Bungo! They have t’ hear this!”

“Right-o,” said Carc.

“Grandfather Carc?”

Everyone stopped.

Quartz hopped across the table, bowing.

“Quartzite, fledged by Mica, sired by Roäc.”

The raven patriarch peered down at Quartz.

“You’re Roäc’s?”

“Yes!”

Carc heaved a sigh of what sounded like relief.

Ori giggled,

“Yes, King Carc, we all had the pleasure of meeting Baluchistan the other day.”

Carc cocked an eye at him.

“Who?”

“Baluchistan, Roäc’s brother.”

“His name is Blue,” snapped Carc. “His feathers were blue black when he came out.” The raven considered a moment then. “Who’s with him?”

“Dain,” Ori reported faithfully.

“Bloody fuckin’ Dain,” muttered Carc. “They’ll suit. Blue was always ‘n utter nutter. Mind, his egg was cracked before it was laid. What does Dain call him again?”

“Baluchistan,” Ori repeated.

“Sounds like a fuckin’ drain cleaner,” the old raven muttered before flying off.

Thrain stared at Ori.

“What does Dain call his raven? Baluchistan?”

“Yes. He molts a lot. The raven, I mean. Not Dain!”

“Easy mistake,” Thror muttered.

Ori cocked his head at Thror,

“So you remember Dain, do you?”

“Don’t think he’s that easy to forget. I recall he was about three foot square, and his hair was piled atop his head like a red pine tree and that was just when he was born. I remember something about pigs, too, but that’s more the stuff of nightmares. You related to him somehow?”

Ori considered and finally went with, “Yes.” Ori paused then, “Dain has a wonderful new battle boar named Chopper. Chopper’s very intelligent. Oh, and Dain is married to Sculdis, though I’m sorry, I don’t know her lineage.”

“No matter,” Freris said. “I do. Fine lass. She’ll keep him walkin’ th’ righ’ way. Was she yer connection t’ Dain?”

“No,” Ori said, slowly eyeing Thror aslant. “I’m related to him through my older …sibling.”

Thror looked back at him the same way.

“The way you say it, I can only guess that you’re related through an oliphaunt.”
“I have met an oliphaunt. Her name is Fanny,” said Ori, “but we’re not related that way. Um… I probably should just leave it that he’s related.”

Thrain and Freris exchanged glances.

“Good choice,” said Thrain.

“An’ me wee Dis?” Freris asked around a full mouth.

“Aye,” said another voice, a little further down the table. “Tell me a’ our Dis.”

Ori peered down the table, and a massive, blond dwarf with big brown eyes that smiled back, hands and braids of a master blacksmith.

“Kili has your dimples.”

Vili swallowed and chuckled.

“Long’s he means t’ give ’em back.”

“You are Vili, aren’t you.”

“At yer service. G’wan.”

“Dis is loved and feared by all the family.”

Freris nodded, obviously pleased.

“As she should be.”

Ori continued, “She’s Thorin’s minister of trade, and has taken an apprentice. She was very kind to me when I first came to Fundin House.”

Vili smiled, and looked so wistful.

“She’s no’ alone, is she? Tha’ would be a waste.”

“No, she has a lover, Janifur, daughter of Scur, who’s a miner.”

“Guid! An’ me lads?”

“Fili is the heir, so he’s back in Erebor with Thorin. He’s also betrothed to… er… Princes Sigrid of Dale. She’s the great-granddaughter of King Girion.”

“Aye? Tha’s wonderful!”

Ori swallowed a little.

“And Kili, he’s on the quest with us. He’s married.”

“Already?” Vili asked. “Who’s he married t’ then?”

“Her name is Tauriel.”

Vili cocked his head and frowned.

“Tha’s no’ a dwarf name.”

“No,” Ori said meaningfully, chucking his chin a little toward Thror. “It’s not.”

Vili snorted, then threw his head back and laughed.

Thrain rubbed his temples and Freris threw up her hands in helpless exasperation.

“Tha’ maniac! Vili, he mus’ take after yer side a’ th’ family.” She turned to Ori. “A’right, an’ wha’ a’ Frer’—“

A door that had not been a door a moment ago opened and two hobbits burst through, carrying a covered dish. Carc swept in after them and the door vanished.

“Freris!” the hobbit lady cried, “is it true?”

“Aye, we’ve jus’ had word!” Freris replied. “Sister!”

“Sister!” cried Belladonna Baggins. “Oh, hello, Udad Thror! Will you hold this while I hug Freris? Thanks! You’re a doll!”

Bungo shook hands with Thrain gravely.

“What is it?” Thror asked Bungo.

“Just some spice cookies,” said Bungo. “Sorry, we hadn’t baked anything yet today. And how are you, sir?”

“I have cookies,” said Thror. “How bad could I be?”

Carc and Quartz strutted to the middle the table and helped themselves to meat, croaking and cawing in low tones to each other. Ori presumed Carc was catching up on the gossip. While the hobbits and the Durins celebrated, Ori turned to Idris.

“Thror can see the hobbits?”

“A’course. He never even met a hobbit in his own life. He don’t object t’ them. It’s th’ cake he cares about’."

Belladonna turned to Ori.

“Pleased to meet you, Mister Ori. I understand you know our Bilbo?”

“Yes, I consider him my friend. We all live in the same house, Fundin House. Bilbo has his nephew Frodo living with him.”

Bungo said, “Excellent! We’ll be able to tell his parents that he’s well looked after. They did worry that Bilbo would have a time keeping hold of him.”

Fundin peered down the table at Ori.

So far Dwalin’s father had not said much at all to anyone except Groin.

Now he said, “You all live in Fundin House? You and Dwalin, Thorin, Bilbo and Frodo, and, of course, Balin?”

“Well, yes, but the sons of Groin live there, too, with their spouses and sons, The houses are joined by tunnels now, and Balin is betrothed to my sibling, Dori—”

“Who is somehow related to Dain. How many people live in this house?”

“I can’t give you a number, but, let’s just say, sitting at this table feels very familiar.”

“And you’re all somehow related?”

“Yes.”

Thror laughed.

“That’s Durins for you, wrapped tighter than an owl pellet. Good cookies, Bella.”

Ori looked hard at Belladonna and Bungo. Bilbo closely resembled his father. But his eyes were his mother’s and Bilbo had something of her looks about him.

Ori decided she looked very like Frodo. He chuckled to himself. Belladonna turned to face him.

“Yes, Bilbo looks very like his father, doesn’t he? And I resemble the Tooks, as I’m sure Frodo does, despite being a Brandybuck.”

“Frodo looks so much like Thorin,” Ori said idly, “people still wonder if Thorin and Bilbo had an assignation in earlier years.”

Bungo gaped at him.

“Only dwarrows think it,” Ori clarified. “I don’t think hobbits have bearers, do they?” Ori offered.

“What’s a ‘bearer’?” asked Bungo.

Both Idris and Freris started to explain when Ori glanced over to the distant great fire place. There stood a dwarrowdam. She looked hale and hearty enough as the rest, all in their primes, but her face was as familiar as it was now loathed.

Ori rose without comment and crossed the floor to her. Within a few yards, she turned and looked at him. It took her a moment to recognize him.

“So, the runt has arrived. I might have guessed, last born, first to die. I suppose it’s for the best. My poor Dori, how silly that son of mine was to insist on keeping you.”

“I’m afraid I’m disappointing you again, am…Rikmha!” Ori ground out. “But I’m busy with a royal quest and am only letting Durin the Deathless borrow my body for a bit.”

“You rose to a common soldier? That’s more than I ever expected of you. Why so angry with me, pet? You love your mam.”

“I’m not your pet,” Ori kept his voice low and polite. “Dori was both my mam and da. You killed Dori’s baby.”

Rikmha brushed this aside.

“That’s a lie. He wasn’t pregnant. He wanted to be, so acted like he was. Stupid thing. He was fool enough to get himself involved with an old letch. That tea was the right thing to give him a tummy ache. It was for the best.”

“That old letch is Lord Balin of Fundin House.”

“What?”

“Oh, yes,” Ori was vaguely disturbed at how much he was enjoying telling her this. “Cousin to Thorin, son of Thrain, son of Thror, who is now High King of All Dwarrow. Just think, if you’d followed Dori’s original plan, by now you would be spending your later years living in luxury in the royal caverns of Erebor, with all your loving sons about you.”
“Dain would have something to say,” she countered. “There would be civil war.”

“Nonsense,” Ori smiled. “Dain loves Dori. Calls us all his brothers. He gave Nori his father’s old watch.”

“Well, there wouldn’t have been a you, without my doings,” Rikmha smirked.

“If it had meant Dori and Balin and their child would have been happy, I would never grudge it to them.”

Rikmha looked him over.

“A journeyman scribe and married into Fundin house. So you married that old letch. What a cruel thing to do to dear Dori.”

“Dori is betrothed to Lord Balin. Dori is also the Honorable Bearer of Erebor. I’m married to Captain Dwalin, Balin’s younger brother.”

Rikmha snorted. “If he’s built on the lines I’ve heard…well, it’s your arse taking the poundings. If he keeps you in silks and furs then why should I complain?”

“Dwalin is my One. He is the most generous lover I could ever have dared to imagine. He’s never hurt me and he thinks I’m beautiful.” Ori paused, then grinned. “And according to Lady Galadriel of Lothlórien, I am irresistibly huggable on first sight to everyone.”

Rikmha stared, her mouth trying to say Galadriel then shook her head.

“My way was better,” Rikmha stated. “If I’d followed Dori’s ideas, everything would have gone to shit. I consider it my wise decisions that made sure my Dori and Nori are still alive. My Nori, arrogant little thief. So selfish! Never looked after his mam. Dori’s too fussy by half and has too soft a heart, silly badger. Too stupid to act the role of a true Bearer.”

“Act the role?” Ori questioned. “Dori is a Bearer.”

“Bearers are just a way for dams to hold power, silly badger,” Rikmha sneered. “I should know. I grew up in the Rikanta house. My mother schooled me in what to do. If Nain had been properly educated he would have known better. Dori is a male. If he’s told you otherwise, it’s a lie.”

“Dori’s pregnant.”

“Dori’s delusional. He was born with a cock and a wee flap. You don’t grow badgers in flaps.”

“Dori has been examined by the royal healer, had a proper presentation before Thror, and is pregnant.” Ori remembered. “Dori has bloomed.”

“Bloomed? He lied to you, you stupid little stone. I knew you’d be a half-wit. He’s lived his whole life as a lie, a silly daydreamer. He doesn’t love you or Nori. He’s only interested in making himself rich. Dori’s nothing, but a conniver and a fool.”

Ori saw everything through a haze of red. He reached for Rikmha, but hands, many hands and arms, twisted around him as he fought to reach her. She had hurt Ori’s Dori so horribly. He couldn’t move forward.

“Let me go,” he shouted at his oppressors. “She killed Dori’s baby! I hate her!”

“She’s already dead like th’ rest o’ us, laddie!” Idris’ low voice was in his ear.

Ori, his vocabulary and ability for speech failing him, snarled. He was immediately annoyed he sounded rather like Mellon facing off with Romy.

He felt a well-muscled arm curl around his belly and he was hefted off his feet. He yelled his fury as he realized his mother-in-law was carrying him like a sack of potatoes over her shoulder, back to the table followed by muttering relatives. He was sat down back in his place, and Idris sat on one side of him and Freris on the other.

“Smackin’ her won’t make her learn anythin’, pet,” Idris said, soothingly. “Pick yer battles.”

“You sound like Dw-”

Of course she did, Ori reflected, she was Dwalin’s mother.

“Fine,” he allowed. “But I still hate her. I used to love her but when I found out…” Tears started. “Poor Dori! He never lied to me!”

Idris’ arm around his shoulders helped. It felt a bit like Dwalin’s.

“Get a hold of yourself,” Freris ordered. “She’ll get another chance at livin’, like th’ rest of us.”

Ori looked up at her. There was tenderness in her eyes but also steel.

“Good,” he said. “Then I can find her and tell Dori and let him decide.”
Suddenly the ceiling swirled with fire. Ori stared in shock, while everyone else simply looked interested. Out of the whirlpool of flames Mahal’s giant hand reached down over Rikmha. Before Ori’s eyes, she stopped, stood stock still and staring. Her color faded to stone. The Hand scooped her stone form into Its palm and rolled it around. The stone became a round gray ball, bits of other stone floated out from the walls and melded with it. A sparkle of gems followed. All were rolled together as they twirled around and around in the huge Palm. The final round stone became a perfect sphere like a piece of pink granite. Forged and changed to something new. It shrank in size, smaller and smaller. Then a figure slowly formed. It was a badgerling, Ori realized.

“NO!” Ori howled. “Don’t make that Dori’s baby!”

“Hush, me wee scribe,” the hot Voice boomed. “Already made f’r our Dori. An’ it’s time f’r yeh t’ be gettin’ back. Ye’ve seen an’ heard all yer needin’ t’ this time.”

“Oh,” Ori looked around quickly. People and things were starting to grow fuzzy around the edges.

Ori side-hugged his mother-in-law,

“I love you, mam. Thank you for my husband and my new brother.”

Idris chuckled. Ori flapped vainly at the others.

“Mr. and Mrs. Baggins, I’m so glad I met you! I’ll tell Bilbo you like his betrothal! Prince Thrain, Princess Ffreris, I’ll tell Dis and Thorin you’re both pleased. I’ll tell Roäc you’re here, King Carc. King Thror, I’m glad you’re well now and I’m really sorry about your funeral.”

Everything faded to gray, the last thing Ori heard was raucous laughter and Thror bawling out, “What in Durin’s name happened at my funeral?”

“Ori! Ori! Yeh in there?”

The first thing Ori saw, was Dwalin’s face, creased with worry.

“Dwalin? What’s the matter? Are you alright?”

His husband gawped at him.

“I’m fine. I’m no’ th’ one sittin’ arse-deep in orc entrails.”

Ori looked down at himself, covered in sticky, black, evil-smelling muck. Then he looked up and around, seized at once by the sight and the smell of dozens of freshly-dead orcs. Later, he would probably be wretchedly ill, but right now he was too stunned.

“Dwalin! You killed all these orcs?”

“Nah, love,” said Dwalin gently. “Tha’ were yeh. With tha’.”

Ori looked down at the huge axe in his hand. His muscles remembered wielding it, but he couldn’t even say how it got there.

“It wasn’t me, exactly,” said Ori. “I’ve never held an axe except yours, to clean it.”

“Was it Mahal?”

“It was Durin. In fact… I think this is his axe.”

Dwalin’s eyes flared open, huge.

“Durin’s Axe!”

“Yes, but… Dwalin, I can’t open my hand to let it go. In fact… I don’t think I could lift my arm. Or stand up. How long have I been gone?”

“Three minutes or so.”

“How is that possible? I was in the Halls for hours.”

“You were in the Halls?” Dwalin’s voice came through rasping and slightly higher pitched than usual.

“Oh, and King Thror said to say ‘hello’ and congratulate you on our marriage.”

Dwalin paused, looked like he wanted to say something, but shook his head.

“Let’s get yeh out’ve here. Glorfy an’ me mopped up th’ last o’ th’ orcs an’ yanked th’ bodies out’ve th’ way. Eowyn, Kili an’ Tauriel are keepin’ watch in th’ cavern entry. Dain, Sculdis an’ Jani’re a few minutes ahead’ve us, an’ I sent Quartz wi’ ‘em. They’ve taken th’ box, as there were no orcs in this passage t’ stop ‘em.”

Ori giggled hysterically.
“Not anymore. Didn’t the others go with them?”

“Gimli an’ Legs’re keepin’ ’em covered wi’ th’ box. Th’ sisters, our Gladdy, an’ Glorfindel hung abou’ t’ cover th’ rear flank, an’ t’ help me find yeh an’ make sure yer still alive.”

“Your mam was lovely,” Ori commented, still dazed.

A throaty cry broke over them and the Red Queen descended to land on, and peck viciously at, a dead orc.

“Well! What a feast! Really, dwarf egg, you shouldn’t have!”

“I wish I could say I did, your majesty,” said Ori.

“Oi! Our Dwalin!” Vi called from the turn in the doorway. “Wha’s keepin’- Our Ori! Yeh look like yeh fell int’ an orc’s privy!”

Dwalin was unable to release Ori’s grip on the axe. He had no choice but to wrap the twin blades in swathes of tattered tapestries and lay it across Ori’s body as he lifted Ori and rushed back toward the chasm. As they ran, a tremor shook the mountains, and knocked them into the walls.

Somewhere up ahead, great chunks of rock cracked and fell.

“Ooo,” said Vi. “If tha’s a cave-in, we’re in fer a time.”

But the passage held. The rock had tumbled in and around the chasm. The chamber was filled with even more rubble than before, and a pile of it had fallen in a jagged mess between them and the bridge. The only flat place to stand was the thin ledge of rock, just a few feet in front of them, between their doorway and the fallen stone.

Ori was relieved to see that the elves and rest of the company had already crossed with the box. Dain stood in the middle of the span, where they could just see him.

“Move yer arses!” the king bellowed

“Move yers first, yeh maniac!” Dwalin answered.

Before they could pick their way over to the bridge, the ground shook, not from within, but as if something struck it hard. It shook again a moment later, and their uncertain, rocky path to the bridge grew to a small mountain of broken stone. They could barely see over it, now.

The heat rose around them.

The cavern blazed with blood-red light.

The balrog had come.

It flapped its enormous wings as it rose from the depths, and the only dark spot in the entire world at that moment was the balrog’s maw as it flung open its mouth and roared.

“Well,” said Vi, “that’s us buggered.”

“I’d hoped it was dead or asleep,” Ori cried.

“No,” said Galadriel, “it was dormant for a brief time, before the Enemy raised the orc armies that invaded Khazad-dûm, and the orcs worshipped it. Not that I think the balrog noticed, except to come up on occasion to snack on them.”

“Makes yeh wish it were a bit more peckish,” said Margr.

“Balrog,” said Glorfindel with a ravenous grin.

The creature swung its fiery whip in a circle about its head, and brought it down with a crash on Dain’s bridge, snapping it in two.

Then it laughed.

Dain, incensed, stomped to the edge of his ruined bridge, his voice quaking with fury.

“Yeh bastard! Look wha’ yeh did t’ me bridge! Yeh fucker! Yeh… yeh bashibazook!”

Sculdis grabbed her husband by the collar and the seat of his jumpsuit, hefted him over her head and bore him away, still bellowing.

Kili and the elves inside the doors fired volleys of arrows at the creature, to no effect.

Doom.

Doom.

DOOM!

Ori heard the drums of the orcs, closing in from behind.

“They’re going to attack now?” Ori demanded indignantly.

All around them he felt rock under enormous stress. It buckled and, deep in the mountains, it broke. Each beat of the balrog’s monstrous wings shook the foundations of Khazad-dûm. The sheering of rock felt like breaking bones. He could tell by Dwalin’s shudder that his husband felt it, too.

The rubble before them rose to a small mountain and they could no longer see the other side of the chasm.

“How did Khazad-dûm even withstand this creature’s first assault?” Glorfindel cried.

“The kingdom was a lot sturdier then,” replied Ori absently.

Most of his consciousness was gripped by the breaking rock, the crumbling passages both natural and dwarf-made, the turmoil of lava streams far below them, the-“Look a’ tha!” Vi cried.

She pointed to the wall off to the left. As they watched, it buckled outward dangerously toward the chasm.

“Tha’ can’t be good,” said Margr.

“That’s water,” said Ori. He felt it, and he knew they felt it, too. “All the walls breaking must have breached the aquifer.”

“Wonderful,” said Glorfindel. “We can drown instead of burning.”

Vi and Margr exchanged evil smiles.

“Glorfy, dear,” said Margr, patting his arm. “You stay here.”

“Where are you going?” he demanded.

“Just nippin’ along this path a ways. Be good!”

The two sisters, mattocks on their shoulders, moved quickly toward the bulge in the wall. Ori winced as they skipped lightly over breaks in the floor that overlooked only distant fires.

“The balrog will see them!” Glorfindel hissed, leaping up. “I’ll distract it!”

“Take the light!” Ori cried. “Dwalin!”

Dwalin fished it out of Ori’s pocket and thrust it at Glorfindel, who took it and jumped up onto a pile of rubble. His screams to gain the balrog’s notice, in Sindarin, and extremely rude, were ineffectual, but when he held the light aloft, he suddenly had the balrog’s full attention.

The horrid creature brandished its whip and Glorfindel leapt all about to avoid it, dancing with death.

Ori consigned Glorfindel to the care of Eru and looked around him.

Doom.

Doom.

DOOM!

“Dwalin, the orcs.”

“I hear ‘em,” said Dwalin, placing him on the ground against the wall.

Orcs crawled out of holes above them, up through the floors and poured at them from the tunnel from which the Company had just escaped.

Dwalin turned and drew Grasper and Keeper.

Galadriel came to stand with him, her hands glowing gold, then blue, then black.

It was a brave show, though they were outnumbered about five hundred to two.

Screams cut in under the balrog’s roar as the bone breakers filled the cavern, diving in a deadly ‘v’, straight at the orcs, talons and beaks at the ready.

The shrieks and splashes of blood were the least of the horror.

The bonebreakers were bent on revenge, and Ori was certainly not going to stand in their way.

Nor was he going to watch. He closed his eyes.

“Tha’s nasty,” said Dwalin.

“Mmm,” Lady Galadriel agreed. “The whole face all in one swipe?”

Ori would probably have vomited at that moment, had the sisters not suddenly come dashing back to them.

“Tha’s done it!” Vi cried. “Oi, our Glorfy! Quit playin’ around an’ get back here.”

Glorfindel did not hear her, he was concentrating on the balrog and the whip, but it hardly mattered, because he wasn’t in the trajectory of the great torrent of water that burst the wall, exploded through the cavern, above the peaks of the rubble-

And swept over the balrog.

Glorfindel fell back, tumbling the last few yards and rolling to his feet over Ori.

A wall of steam bore down on them. Galadriel forced it back somehow.

Behind them, the orcs ran in full retreat, harried by the bonebreakers, the screams growing fainter and fainter in the distance. The roar of the falling water replaced the roar of the balrog.

The balrog had disappeared.

Or so they all thought.

They carefully approached the edge of rubble where water still fell in cascades, but a little closer to them, in the center of a wet, sooty ring on the stones stood the balrog - all ten, furious, dark grey inches of him.

In a tiny squeak of a voice, hands fisted at its sides, it told them off:

“Fuck you, you fucking fucks! Do you fucking know how fucking long it takes to absorb that amount of fucking fire! Thousands of fucking years! I’m older than fuck. I’m too fucking old to go through that shit again.” It stamped its tiny foot. “I’m short, fuck it! Of all the things you fucking orc-jambags could have done! What a world, what a fucking world!”

Vi came forward and said, “Oh, look, he’s jus’ a wee thin’.”

The balrog made an obscene gesture, now dancing up and down with rage, waving its tiny arms helplessly.

“Assholes!” screamed the tiny, evil thing. “Ugly Morgoth-fucking bug-eyed animal shit balls!”

“Oi, wha’ a mouth!” Vi scolded. “Yeh kiss yer mam wi’ tha’ thin’? I oughter give yeh a good spankin!”

“I’m not fucking afraid of you!” the balrog shrieked.

Margr prodded Glorfindel to his feet, since he’d fallen on the ground, shaking with laughter.

“Assholes!” screamed the tiny, evil thing. “Ugly Morgoth-fucking bug-eyed animal shit balls!”

“Oi, wha’ a mouth!” Vi scolded. “Yeh kiss yer mam wi’ tha’ thin’? I oughter give yeh a good spankin!”

“I’m not fucking afraid of you!” the balrog shrieked.

Margr sighed, hopped over the shattered stone, and stepped on it, squashing it flat.

“Well done, deary,” said Vi.

“Well, he would go on,” said Margr. She scraped her boot against a sharp stone. “Ooo, it’s mucky! We done here, do yeh think?”

“Aye, best be gettin’ on,” said Vi. “I think the rest o’ the walls’re goin’ t’ go, then th’ lava’ll go, then we’re fucked.”

Dwalin swiftly rearranged his straps and buckles.

“Dwalin?”

“Need me hands free, we got a climb t’ get over th’ res’ a’ tha’ rubble t’ reach th’ broken edge a’ the bridge.”

“And then what?” Ori asked as Dwalin scooped him up and bound Ori against his chest.

“We’ll think a’ somethin’.”

It was a short but perilous climb. Huge chunks and slabs of rock fell from the ceiling as the water crashed through rooms and mines, slamming its way toward the fires. The ground shook constantly, but the Company persevered. Glorfindel, determined as any dwarf, and Galadriel, who never really touched the ground, pointed out the easiest hand- and footholds.

Only when they reached the top of the rubble did they realize how hopeless it was. Even then, the long, upward-jutting slab of rock on which they perched was over balancing and would slowly tilt into the cavern, dumping them to their deaths. On the other side Dain, Sculdis, Jani and the elves were tying ropes to arrows, fully determine to create some sort of a means for them to cross. Lady Eowyn shouted for them to remain where they were as rescue was imminent.

“Lady Galadriel,” said Glorfindel, “save yourself.”

“I am not leaving without all of you,” said Galadriel with dangerous finality. “If necessary, we will die together.”

There was a crash and most of the main entryway burst open.

“Hasty!” Treebeard called, entering the cavern with other ents. “Hold… on…”

Treebeard strode to the edge of the chasm until he was face-down over the abyss. He was tall, but not tall enough to reach the entire way.

A second ent - Leafbower, Ori thought was his name - strode out along Treebeard’s trunk, then lowered his crown branches to entangle with Treebeard’s. Much as Treebeard had done, but face up, Leafbower lowered his body over the chasm, and his roots touched the bridge buttress and sank in.

The two ents were plenty wide enough for the company to cross.

“Go, go, go!” Dwalin shouted.

Glorfindel grabbed Vi and Margr one over each shoulder and sprinted up the steep incline and hopped down onto the roots, and along the wide, smooth bole.

Ori worried about Leafbower. He didn’t want to step on the ent’s face. It seemed terribly rude. Before Ori, Dwalin or Galadriel could move to follow, a huge fall of boulders shaped like a fist slammed down on the upward end of the rock slab on which they perched.

They shot into the air with no time to scream, Dwalin curled around Ori, trying to protect him.

Treebeard reached up a branch and easily and gently caught Dwalin and Ori while Lady Galadriel had allowed the see-saw action to propel her upward, high into the air and, with her arms wide in her green jumpsuit, the little gossamer parts fluttering bravely, she looked exactly like a moon moth in the afternoon sunshine. Ori could have sworn he heard her cry “Wheeee!”

She landed with perfect grace on the other side of the chasm, straight into the waiting arms of her husband.

As the Treebeard and Leafbower reversed their gyrations, Ori watched the cavern mouth, then the scenery, tumble around him, then Treebeard carried them away, into the sunlight.

“Retreat!” Dwalin bellowed to the soldiers on the ground. “The lava’s goin’ t’ go!”

Ents abruptly picked up every elf and dwarf, along with Lady Eowyn, the Flower’s box, and all their gear, and lit out like a pack of savage trees toward Lórien.

The ground shook harder now, and constantly, and even through Treebeard’s enormous strides, Ori felt the turmoil build and rise beneath the earth. The lava would not simply ooze. It was far too late for that. They were well within the reach of volcanic destruction and nothing could be done.

Yet again he faced his death. Their deaths.

This had become an annoying habit.

The explosion hit them like a physical thing. It bent trees and would have thrown them to their deaths if not for Lady Galadriel’s protection.

But she could not protect them from everything.

The first volley of rock and ash and steam blew the mountains of Khazad-dûm asunder. The mountains heaved straight upward, exploding into billowing clouds of boulder, rock and dust. Darkness spread wide over the land.

Ori’s final, hysterical thoughts were that at least he and Dwalin would die together; he already had friends in the Halls.

Then-
Nothing.
Silence.
Then-
The nearby, gentle lap of water.
“Wha’ th’ fuck?” Dwalin gasped.
Cries of shock and disbelief poured out around them.
“What’s happening?” Ori asked into Dwalin’s beard.
“Look.”
Dwalin turned him around, facing the volcano….
Which was gone.

The massive dark cloud had vanished. The plumes of ash and the gasses which would kill anyone but a dwarf had simply evaporated. The burning steam fell from the sky as a gentle, warm summer rain….

Onto an enormous lake where the mountains had been.
“Mahal…” Ori breathed.

In his head he heard, “I’m a wee bit busy, righ’ now, laddie. Oi! Ulwe! Nice touch wi’ th’ rain!”

“Ta!” Ulwe replied in his gurgling voice. “Ahoy! Tentacles ho!”

Chunks and lengths of tentacles fell around them in great, disgusting profusion.

“It’s the Watcher from the West Door,” cried Legolas. “At least, it was…”

The ents batted the most threatening pieces away.

Quartz landed on Ori’s shoulder, his feathers in a shaggy, unpreened mess.

“Wowee!” Quartzed cawed. “Suppertime!”

“Don’t you dare!” Ori cried. “That’s probably as poison as orcs!”

“Awww.”

As they watched, trees uprooted and bent by the force of the blast began to straighten and reroot.

Ori heard Yavanna’s voice, “Up you go. Pines? Yes, good thing I made you so bendy. Aspens? Yes, you may commence quaking. Oh, you poor dear. Your trunk is here and your crown is on the other side of the lake, and that’s just you all over. We’ll have to restart you as a sapling. Oh, don’t pout. It can’t be helped.”

While they stood there, too stunned for further words - except for Dain, who muttered, “I’m goin’ t’ piss meself.”- the waters of the lake gave forth a tall, gleaming column of stone, taller than it had been before and remade in obsidian.

The Durin Stone.

Closer to shore, two other objects surfaced, improbably floating since they were huge and made of metal and inscribed with runes. They washed to the shoreline and rested there.

“These are Narvi and Celebrimbor’s doors,” said Galadriel.

Ori started to cry. He couldn’t help it. He was an idiot.

“D-Dwalin?”

“Everyone’s safe, love. Well, except f’r th’ orcs.”

“Thank Mahal.”

Mahal said, “Aye, well, a nice batch o’ xocolatl bikkies all me own wouldn’t go amiss. Wha’m I suppose t’ do with all this rock? Heh. Go’ a naugh’y idea.”

And Ori giggled.

They were alright. They were alive. Everyone was-

There was another, far smaller explosion in the distance, making them all turn. A plume of smoke drifted into the sky.

“What th’ fuck were tha’?” Sculdis demanded, from her perch in a sizable oak.

“Seeing how it is to the east of us,” said Celeborn, helping his lady down from a majestic black walnut tree, “I’m going to guess it was Dol-Guldur.”

Dain snorted, “Nice t’ have a hill fort fart a’ yeh, ain’t it.”

“Never liked tha’ place anyway,” Mahal commented in Ori’s head. “Wife want’s t’ put silver birches there. Can’t have bears bringing’ up their young in a smelly ol’ place like tha’.”

Treebeard placed them carefully on the ground as he and the other ents strode forward to help Yavanna with the trees.

“Look!” Eowyn cried, pointing upward, shouting, “The eagles! The eagles are coming.”

Ori looked up. Eight gigantic eagles whirled down towards them. Ori saw a familiar gray figure seated on the leader’s back.

The eagles landed and Celeborn went forward.

“Greetings, Gwaihir, King of Eagles. You are welcome among us. Mithrandir, what errand brings you to our home in the company of Gwaihir?”

Despite his great age, Tharkûn dropped lightly down from the eagle’s back and hurried over.

“I was told there was an adventure underway being taken by thirteen dwarrow and one other. I was overcome by the feeling I was supposed to be apart of it.”

“Nine dwarrow, four elves, and a woman,” Galadriel corrected him. “Nothing to do with you, dear Mithrandir.”

“Ah,” said Tharkûn, sounding relieved. “I’m glad I didn’t miss anything.” He looked around at the huge lake. “Well, so there was an adventure then. How shocking I wasn’t invited. What has happened to the three peaks?”

“Mahal, Yavanna, and Ulwe decided to redecorate,” Dori said peevishly, pushing forward. “And my Ori has had quite enough adventure, thank you, Mr. Wizard.”

“Lovely view,” Tharkûn admired.

“We destroyed an entire mountain,” said Ori.

Dain said, “Three, if yeh want t’ get technical.”

“Oh, Celeborn, look!” Lady Galadriel cried. “Now we’ll be able to watch the sunset!”

“So it would seem,” said Celeborn, a bit awed and amused. He put his arm about her waist. She sighed happily and laid her head on his shoulder.

Celeborn looked down at her.

“My dear, why are you so very….bumpy?”

“Books,” she murmured gleefully.

“Ah.”

Ori got ahold of himself and said, “Quartz, please go tell Thorin we’ve made it out.”

“What? All the way back to Erebor? On an empty stomach? But, I’ll miss something!”

“You won’t miss anything! I’m sure they could see that explosion from Erebor.”

Dwalin said, “Go tell Garnet how brave yeh were.”

“Ooo! On it!”

Ori followed the flight with his eyes. He couldn’t quite turn his neck, but he could still feel all his muscles tightening. Ori sagged in Dwalin’s arms as Quartz swiftly flew away.

“Go raise nestlings,” he grumbled into Dwalin’s chest.

Suddenly, Dori was at Dwalin’s side, fussing.

“… do you mean, orc guts? That’s disgusting! He’ll catch a disease! And why did he-”

“Dori,” Ori interrupted the flow of sympathy and scolding. “You and Balin need to talk to the eagles. They have to get you two and the chest of the Flower back to Erebor as soon as possible.”

“I can’t leave you!” Dori cried.

“You must, dearest,” Galadriel had a hold of Dori and was drawing her away. Celeborn caught Balin’s shoulder leading the pair to the eagles.

“Gwaihir,” Celeborn called. “Forgive me, my friend, but I need you and your court to carry that box and these two dwarrows to Erebor with all possible speed.”

Gwaihir looked at the box and gave a majestic shrug.

Dain shouted, “Ropes! Chains! Bring all yeh go’!”

Omosuil and his squad rushed off.

Celeborn waved Haldir and his soldiers into action. Within moments the box was netted with rope and four long stout chains were locked on. Four eagles took flight then swooped to grab the ends they were thrown. The box whisked up into the air. Gwaihir, with Dori and Balin astride his back, whirled off into the lead. Dori’s hair flew loose in the wind like a mithril ribbon in the distance.

“The Durin Stone seems to have settled itself right here at the lake edge,” Celeborn went over and patted it.

“The doors?” Ori asked.

“We’ll need a bigger wagon for those,” Kili replied, coming up to them. “They weigh far too much for eagles or anything else that flies.”

“Where are we going to get a bigger wagon?” Ori asked.

“Let’s worry about’ tha’ la’er, love,” Dwalin stated.

“What do we do now?” Ori asked.

But it was Galadriel who replied.

“Right now, you are going to sleep.”

And he did.

Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Phew! What an action-packed time Ori’s had! Now, it’s time to rest and recuperate a little. Not that that has ever stopped mayhem in this tale before. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori awoke feeling far better than when he went to sleep. He was clean, for one thing, and the pain was a distant, hazy thing, though he knew better than to push it. He seemed to be reclining on enormous, down-filled pillows of marvelous jeweled velvets, embroidered in swirls of gold. He fervently hoped he hadn’t drooled on any while he was asleep. He was still exhausted.

“There you are,” Cemnesta’s soft voice greeted him.

Ori turned his head. The room was circular, and filled with trees and plants, some growing as pieces of the wall. He couldn’t see a roof, only a fluttering canopy of huge, green leaves far above. Sunshine dappled through this. Cemnesta sat on a low wall which Ori supposed was of a decorative fountain, since water flowed perpetually from a horn held by the statue of an elf maid on the far edge.

“Are we in Erys Lasgalen?”
“No, we’re still in Lórien. Lady Galadriel called upon me to attend you. I admit, I was terribly flattered.”

Ori had a hard time looking directly at Cemnesta. The elf king was shiny… and vibrantly arrayed in robes of purple, scarlet and orange plaid.

“Wh-what are you wearing?”
Cemnesta grinned.

“They were a coronation gift from Master Dipfa.”
Ori groaned.
Cemnesta chuckled.

“There’s no end to her reach, is there?”

“Is she here?”

“Oh, no, but I thought I should at least try these on. She sent them especially, with a note insisting I use them to bring light and happiness to my reign whilst throwing the foliage into relief. I think the foliage would be relieved if I didn’t.”

Cemnesta rose to his feet, drawing a pitcher of water from the pool. He poured out a measure in a small golden cup, placing the pitcher on a dainty table next to the bed, and leaned over Ori, helping him sit up to drink.

Ori sighed with pleasure. It was the most delicious water he ever drank.

“Where are we?”

“Oh, just a guest room on the forest floor, far below the busiest section of Galadriel’s palace.”

“The busiest section wouldn’t be where Mistresses Margr and Vi are currently holding court, would it?”

“Galadriel thought it best to leave them in charge of the social fascination for a few days. My aunt and the sisters keep talking about something called an iklar that I just have to try, then they give each other such filthy laughs that I don’t quite dare.”

“You’re showing kingly wisdom. Where’s my Dwalin?”
Cemnesta nodded and Ori looked. Dwalin was sprawled face down on the foot of the enormous bed. There was a blanket tangled around his feet. One pillow lay on the floor, another propped against the footboard and the third under Dwalin’s left armpit. He lay completely still except for the occasional snore.

Cemnesta sighed. “He refused to leave your side. He’s been here helping us tend you, since we laid you on the bed. I admit I slipped a sleeping draught into his drink some hours ago. It seemed the only way to make him rest.”

“How long have I been asleep?”

“Two days.”

“Two days?” Ori yelped, struggling to get out of bed and regretting it instantly.

The room spun violently, though his muscles barely complained. Cemnesta grasped him carefully by the shoulders and eased him back down, swearing under his breath.

“I should have warned you to move slowly. The medicine I gave you is very powerful. It mends the muscles and ligaments quickly, but it has to pull much of the energy to do it from the rest of your body.”

“Ah,” said Ori. Then he shut up because talking seemed to make the dizziness worse. His brain spun one way, his stomach the other.

Cemnesta smoothed a hand over his forehead, and the nausea and dizziness retreated.

“Thank you,” Ori breathed. “Lesson learned.”

Sleep crept up on him again, though he fought it. For some reason his mouth was moving independently from his brain and he said,

“There’s me love,” said Dwalin, reclining beside him on the pillows. “Dwalin!” Ori cried and tried to reach for him. “Is everyone all right?”

“Barely a scratch among us,” Dwalin promised, pulling Ori into his arms.

That was so nice. Ori felt the last of the pain leave his muscles and the nausea and dizziness roll back into nothing. He was still as weak as man-made ale, but that was nothing with Dwalin there to hold him. Dwalin had washed with the same, vaguely copalish soap that had been used on Ori, and Ori didn’t even blush when he wondered who might have been the party doing the scrubbing. Probably Dwalin. Possibly Dain. Thankfully not Dori, who must be safely back in Erebor by now in triumph.

“I’d love to stay here with you forever,” said Ori.

“But?”

“But, I have to pee.”

“Aye?” Dwalin chuckled.

“Then I have to eat. A lot.”

“Cemnesta’s been expectin’ tha’. Page’ll go for a tray.”

“I can’t pee on a tray!” Ori teased, euphoria surging through him at the sight of his smiling husband.

Dwalin shook his head and kissed him.

“Th’ food’ll arrive on the tray, silly dwarf. Th’ rest we’ll take care a’ now.”

Ori sat up against the pillows, his belly comfortably full. Dwalin handed the tray to the page outside the door. It had held a good meal now completely decimated. Dwalin locked the door, but instead of turning to pounce on Ori, he leaned his brow against the panels.

“Dwalin?”

Ori was truly worried. Dwalin was shaking.
“Dwalin, are you hurt?”
Dwalin crossed the floor between them and clambered onto the bed.
“No, love,” Dwalin’s voice sounded strained. Still shaking, he gathered Ori in his arms.
“Yer safe,” he managed.
Ori realized the great warrior was quickly losing his stony exterior.
“Yes, we’re all safe and we’ve won through our quest.” Ori kissed him and carded his fingers through Dwalin’s hair. Dwalin had no doubt been holding himself together until now. Ori looked into his husband’s eyes, which darkened, then the tears spilled over. Horrified, Ori clasped Dwalin’s head to his heart.
“We’re all safe, my husband. You protected and saved me. We’re safe.”
Dwalin tightened his grip around Ori. Ori forced himself not to wince and clenched Dwalin as he wept.
Dwalin recovered himself in a few minutes and managed to say into Ori’s chest.
“I couldn’t hear yer song. It jus’ stopped.”
Ori realized that Dwalin meant the time Durin possessed Ori’s body. While Ori had been in the Halls, Dwalin had only silence in his heart.
“Oh, Dwalin! Oh, my beloved! I never thought…! How horrible for you. I wished I’d known.
I-”
Boiling rage filled Ori.
“Durin!” he yelled
To Ori’s surprise, the large dwarf appeared, sitting at the end of the bed.
“Sorry ‘bout tha’,” the king said, sheepishly.
“Sorry?” Ori seethed. “I’ll ‘sorry’ you when I get to the Halls for real! After everything we’ve done for you!”
Dwalin raised himself, releasing Ori, and stared. Ori realized that Dwalin could see Durin, too.
“You orc’s ass!” Ori addressed the First Dwarf again.
“Wait, love,” Dwalin said gently.
Ori stared at Dwalin.
“After what you’ve been through? I’ll knock him-”
Dwalin sighed.
“He saved yer life, love, no’ me.”
“And let you hear silence?!”
“Didn’t think ‘bout tha’ part,” Durin put in, a little thrown. “I’m no’ me adad. I’m still learnin’. An’ I gotta admit, once I go’ t’ hunt some orc.”
“I believe yeh,” Dwalin agreed.
Durin looked remorseful.
“If yeh want, lad,” Durin addressed Dwalin, “I’ll give yeh me beard when yeh get t’ th’ Halls.”
“Er, no, bu’ thank yeh jus’ th’ same,” said Dwalin.
“Yer sure, laddie? Yeh could prob’ly weave a tent from it.”
“Fine,” Ori snapped, his anger slowly draining as Dwalin seemed satisfied to let things rest.
“Thank you for saving me but…well, you can understand. Being flower-less for so long.” Ori considered a moment. “She will be able to be with you when we discover her name, won’t she?”
Durin winked and vanished.
“I’m still mad at him,” Ori growled, more pissed that his question had not been answered. He had a lot of questions.
Dwalin gave a watery chuckle.
“It’s brilliant th’ way yeh shout at ‘r ancestors an’ valar. Mos’ a’ us’ud f’rget everythin’ an’ drop t’ our knees.”
Ori opened his mouth then closed it and blushed.
“Me brave wee scribe.” Dwalin’s eyes, though wet, danced with laughter.
“I love you,” Ori said, unable to think of anything else to say.
Dwalin chuckled again and wrapped his arms about Ori as they sank back against the pillows.
Ori settled Dwalin’s head against his heart once again.
“There.” Ori murmured. “Up against your ear. Better?”
Dwalin mumbled inarticulately and rubbed his cheek against Ori’s chest.
“So sweet t’ me ears an’ heart. There’s no singer ’r flute ’r fiddle ’r anythin’ that’d equal. Like bein’ able t’ hear mithril emergin’ from th’ stone, ’r looking int’ a gem an’ seen’ th’ light shinin’ inside. One time, as a wee lad, I watched a bu’erfly come outa its cocoon an’ take fligh’. Yer song jus’ sits in me heart an’ shines an’ glimmers in me.”
Ori felt his face burn.
“Warrior and a poet,” he teased, kissing the tattooed pate below his chin.
Dwalin soon moved upward so they were face to face.
“We did it,” said Ori, resting his brow on Dwalin’s. “We really did it!”
“Aye, we really did. An’ I’m proud enough a’ yeh t’ bust.”
“I’m proud of everyone,” said Ori. His cheeks grew hot with embarrassment. “I couldn’t have done this alone.”
Dwalin kissed him and they cuddled in the cool, quiet chamber. Birds sang in the distance. Then a brief shower pattered overhead while the sun still shone.
Ori sighed and rubbed his cheek, startled to find the new thicker hair on his face was at least a quarter inch long.
“I still don’t believe this,” he said. “I don’t believe it happened now, or this quickly.”
“Why? Once yer belly fur comes in, it’s usually only a matter a’ a few weeks.”
“Is it? Why didn’t I know that?”
“Best guess? I’d say our Dori was afraid if he said somethin’, it’d happen, and once it happened—”
“I’d be grown up! Oh, Dori!”
“Mesel’, I kin hardly wait f’r it t’ grow,” said Dwalin with a feral grin.
“Oh? Can’t you?” Ori teased.
“I’m goin’ t’ make a fetish a’ yer whiskers. I’ll never be able t’ keep me paws out’ve ’em. Jus’ like I can’t keep me paws off th’ rest a’ yeh.”
“I’d put my paws on you if I could lift them that long,” said Ori. “I’d love to see to you, and show you just how much I love you.”
Dwalin kissed his nose.
Ori wrinkled it and giggled.
“I was thinkin’,” said Dwalin, “th’ same thin’ abou’ yeh. I mean, th’ showin’ yeh part. I kin lift me arms jus’ fine.”
“Oh,” said Ori.
“If yer up t’ it.”
“Part of me is getting there. I wonder what Cemnesta would say about this.”
“Yeh wanna ask ’im?”
“Not particular-—”
Dwalin’s kisses were insistent, but gentle, on Ori’s mouth, along his jaw, nuzzling his neck. If Ori felt guilty that he could not reciprocate, that stopped when he heard Dwalin’s sigh in his ear.
“Yeh always taste so guid.”
“Going to eat me up?”
“Gonna do me best.”
“Oh. Oh, yes.”

Ori sighed as Dwalin helped him dry off.
“I wish the medicinals the healers put in the bathwater didn’t make me feel like a noodle,” Ori grumped. “I’m all floppy.”
“Good.” Dwalin approved and put the clean nightshirt over Ori’s head. He easily lifted Ori and carried him back to the bed. Ori flushed at the sight of it, newly-made with clean sheets and pillows. Dwalin wasn’t as subtle.
“Hope our Gladdy’s folk know how to get dwarf spunk outa th’ sheets.”
“Dwalin!” Ori scolded as his husband tucked him back in, sitting up against the pillows. There was a babble from the other side of the door that boiled closer. Ori looked up as Dwalin sat beside him and put his arm about Ori’s shoulders. The door burst open. Kili and Gimli shoved each other in.

“Ori, mate!” Kili shouted. “You were brilliant! Are you feeling better?”

“Bloody Idad Other Elf wouldn’t let us see yeh!” Gimli added, loudly.

The pair clambered up on the bed, Kili gamely jumping up and down on it.

“We did it!” the young prince crowed. “We got the Flower of Durin!”

Ori burst out laughing. Dain, Sculdis, and Jani pushed in after with the rest of the Company on their heels. Tauriel came over quickly and Kili bounced sideways and landed on her ready back, hugging her.

“Well done, me wee scribe brother!” Dain blustered as Sculdis came round the bed to lean over on it and give Ori a kiss on the cheek. Dain followed this up by ruffling Ori’s hair violently.

“Aye, our Ori,” Margr put in. “It were a grand adventure, wasn’t it, lovey?”

“It was, it was!” Vi answered. “The firs’ an’ best’ we’ve had! Ain’t tha’ righ’ our Glorfy?”

Glorfindel grinned down at Ori.

“Excellent explosion, Lord Ori.”

Ori groaned and flopped back.

“Explosions seem to happen with me.”

Eowyn giggled and climbed on the bed to sit on Ori’s other side.

“That was an amazing adventure, Ori. Thank you! Uncle will blow a vein in his head and Theodred will be so jealous!”

Celeborn came in and looked amused at the amount of people seated on Ori’s bed.

“I told them they might visit you one at a time,” the elf lord said gently. “Apparently, among dwarrow, that means one company at a time.”

“Of course it does, my love.” Lady Galadriel entered with a merry look in her eyes. “All for one and one for all!”

“Du Bekar!” Gimli roared in agreement.

“Lady Galadriel,” Ori said. “Have you heard from Erebor?”

Roäc flew in with Quartz.

“Hail, Conquering Hero,” Roäc croaked. “King Thorin’s chuffed with you. And so ‘m I.”

“Thank you for coming, Roäc,” Ori said, smiling as the raven king fluttered down to land on Ori’s bedding-encased knee. Quartz hopped up to the pillow behind Ori’s shoulder and tweaked his ear.

“The Bearer arrived,” Roäc said, “on the King of Eagles and the egg laying…er…pregnancy was announced. It is now being stated throughout Erebor and Dale that the Bearer has been served by Mahal.”

“Served…you mean everybody’s saying Dori was impregnated by Mahal?!” Ori straightened up, grimacing.

“Yup!” Quartz added.

Ori groaned. “Wonderful! We’re going to have to tell people to stop saying that, in case Yavanna, you know, Mahal’s wife takes offense. Offended Yavanna means no crops.”

“Nonsense,” the low laughter of a feminine Voice in his head told him. “I think it’s funny. It makes Him blush.”

“Mahal blushes?” Ori was surprised into saying this aloud.

“That’s an odd imprecation,” Tauriel observed. “I’ve never heard it used before. Is it common to dwarrow?”

“No,” Kili said. “Is that a new one you’ve invented, Ori?”

“No!” Ori said quickly. “I - I. Never mind. But Dori and Balin are alright, yes?”

“Of course!” Roäc grunted.

“Where is Cemnesta?”

“He was called home,” said Celeborn. “I believe he has the same problem to face as we do.”
“Is everyone well?”
“We’re quite well, and so are all the naked, full-grown elves who have been crawling up from the River Nimrodel and out from under the rocks all over Lórien.”
“What! I mean, where did they come from?”
“Our best guess is that they were the elves who originally were ensorcelled into orcs. The last thing most of them remember is crossing the Field of Celebrant, down into Dagorland marshes.”
“Great Mahal!”
“Indeed. Their table manners are atrocious.”
“So all those legends about the start of orcs were true,” Ori mused. “They must be happy to be free once more. I’ll miss Drum. Maybe he’ll find Ecthelion again soon and continue as the drummer.”
“I don’t think Drum was ever an elf,” Celeborn said. “And now, we must ready your Company for your triumphal return journey.”
Dwalin snickered into Ori’s hair.
“That was the best kind of adventure,” commented Jani. “Everyone safe, little ‘r no hurts, an’ no regrets.”
“Indeed,” Glorfindel agreed.
Ori thought this was almost correct.
“I think the only one who will have any regret or get mad at me would be Master Brur.”
“Why?” Tauriel demanded.
“Yeh got th’ box!” Gimli added. “He wanted tha’.”
“Yes,” Ori agreed, “but unfortunately along with three mountains, the great library of Khazad-dûm blew up, too.”
“Not all of it, Lord Ori,” Galadriel said in a teasing tone. “You all saw that I sealed it.”
“Sealed it?” Eowyn asked.
“The whole thing?” Jani added.
“No, the central core, where the scribes had hidden those items they treasured most, not to mention the diaries of ancient elf ladies,” Galadriel exchanged a loving glance with her husband. “I apologize if I missed any irreplaceable treasures.”
Ori stared at her a moment as everyone looked confusedly at one another.
“Lady Galadriel,” Ori said slowly, “where is the core of the library now?”
“At the bottom of the Misty Lake,” she said breezily.
“Sealed up?” Ori asked.
“Completely sealed against all the elements.”
“How can we get to it?” Ori asked.
The Lady smiled mysteriously at him.
“That must be discussed when we all return to Erebor.”
“I’m coming, too!” Eowyn stated, and squeezed Ori’s feet through the bed clothes. “I want to see Erebor and meet everyone.”
“A very good idea,” approved Galadriel. “I shall write to dear Theoden and say that I am making a diplomatic visit to recognize Cemnesta’s coronation and, of course, will look in at Dale to congratulate King Bard and King Father Thranduil on their engagement and visit the Bearer at Erebor to consult what she may need for her upcoming Event. Naturally, I shall bring you with me as my ward and introduce you. It will be very advantageous for you to meet any noble young males who might be lounging about at the three different courts.”
Eowyn laughed delightedly and rose to embrace Galadriel.
“Thank you so much, my lady.”
Galadriel patted her.
“If you are my ward, you must refer to me as your aunt, my dear.”
“Thank you, Auntie.” She turned to Celeborn. “Thank you, Uncle.”
Celeborn looked amused and inclined his head.
“Of course, my child.”
Kili shouted as Gimli biffed him with a pillow. Gimli then whacked Vi, who leapt on the bed, tackling the young dwarf. Kili vaulted on, armed with another pillow and Tauriel followed. Eowyn and Glorfindel shouted with laughter as they bounced to join in the rumpus.

Ori pulled his legs up and stayed in Dwalin’s sheltering arms as a tremendous noisy pillow fight waged all over the rest of the huge bed. Celeborn just shook his head, amused, arm in arm with Galadriel, who called encouragement to the combatants.

When it looked as though all adversaries were losing, Celeborn called a halt to the chaos and ordered everyone out.

Ori secretly felt relieved. He needed a nap.

“You’ll stay, won’t you, Dwalin?” he asked, afraid he sounded needy, but in fact, he felt very needy.

“I’m no’ goin’ anywhere righ’ now.”

“Ah, I shall amend my command,” said Celeborn. “Everyone out except Dwalin. Will that do, your lordship?”

“Yes, quite,” said Ori loftily, then spoiled his regal demeanor by giggling.

Ori had no idea how long he slept, though it was evening again by the time he woke.

“Impressive showing, dwarf egg.”

The Red Queen perched on the edge of the pool, peering down at them sharply. Two other bonebreakers perched one on either side of her, their crests not nearly as red as hers. They weren’t introduced, so Ori assumed they were not her heirs.

“I’m sorry we destroyed your majesty’s aerie,” said Ori. “I hope, at least, some of your people made it out.”

“Rest assured, we are all quite well. Eru warned us to flee and our hatchlings had fledged in the spring.”

“We also spoiled your majesty’s dinner. All those orcs! What can we do to help?”

He hoped she didn’t demand they sacrifice some of the Company or the elves to make up for it.

“We finished up any orc bones left on the sides of the lake. When you decide to leave, we are going back to Erebor with you,” Red Queen announced.

“Wha’? All a’ yeh?” Dwalin demanded.

Ori squeezed his husband’s wrist. A pathetic effort, but enough to warn Dwalin.

“Of course,” said the queen, apparently not deigning to notice this lack of protocol. “We seem to recall some nice red clay about the River Running.”

“And there are plenty of bones in Dale,” Ori said reflectively. “They leave them in piles.”

Red Queen blinked at him and craned her neck forward in fascination.

“Piles? Did you say there are piles of bones in this Dale?”

“Aye,” said Dwalin. “They grind ‘em up t’ make fertilizer fer their fields. Just make sure yeh poop over the fields an’ no harm done.”

Into Ori’s ear, Dwalin said, “Our Thorin told yeh no’ t’ bring home any pets.”

Ori squawked and Dwalin laughed.

“They aren’t pets!” Ori hissed. “And… and…. It’s not my fault!”

Ori nudged him in the ribs, but Dwalin’s laughter only grew.

Ori tried to get the conversation back on track.

“Of course, your majesty knows that the king of ravens already has his aeries at Erebor.”

“Old Roäc? Phht! We’re not afraid of him. Besides, our aeries are different from his. We nest closer to the ground. The ravens will pick the flesh, we will clear the bones. Yes, an elegant arrangement.”

Ori thought Roäc would disagree. He would also take exception to being called ‘old’, even if he was hatched when King Thror was a youth. The trick would be explaining everything to Roäc before he molted entirely. Ori doubted Roäc had the same regrowth ability as Baluchistan.

“Will your majesty allow us to escort you all to Erebor?” Ori ventured. “I’d like to send word on ahead, to let King Thorin know of your majesty’s arrival, so he can greet the bonebreakers properly.”
“Mmm, you have leave to do so.”
“Your majesty is gracious.”
“Yes, we are.”
The bonebreaker queen and her attendants flew away.
Ori groaned.
“I’m glad Roäc’s already flown home. I’ll need to think of a way to break this to him.”
Ori relaxed back into the pillows and curled against Dwalin.
“I wish I had planned this better,” said Ori.
“Love, we planned f’r everythin’.”
“The volcano?”
“Yeh couldn’t’ve predicted tha’.”
“This was a quest for the line of Durin. If there’s a volcano involved, it will erupt, or blow up, or become a pile of toothpicks. Something.”
“Tha’ yer theory?”
“I think it’s a physical fact. We were just lucky Mahal, Yavanna, and Ulwe stepped in.”
In Ori’s head, Mahal said, “I couldn’t have yeh kickin’ me shins everyday, could I?”
“I wouldn’t really have done that,” said Ori.
“Tha’ Mahal?” Dwalin asked.
“Yes.”
Mahal said, “I believe yeh’d’ve given it yer best shot. I did promise I would try, didn’t I?”
“Yes, but Yavanna didn’t, and I didn’t know Ulwe would help, either.”
“Yavanna won’t be left out a’ thin’s, no’ if she kin help it. And Ulwe… well, he runs hot an’ cold.”
Ori groaned.
“The valar of water runs hot and cold? That’s terrible.”
“But true,” Mahal insisted. “An’ his sense a’ humor’s somethin’ savage, bu’ he never misses a chance t’ gleek ol’ Eru.”
“They don’t get along?”
“Ulwe’s always resented th’ influence Eru exerts over the tides. Meddlin’, he calls it.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. It’s time to head back in triumph but it’s a long-ish journey, so let’s head out. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori rode Honda along the wildflower-strewn bank of the Anduin. He was still tired but his heart felt light. They had recovered the box. No one had been hurt. The balrog was destroyed. Yes, they had also destroyed the greatest dwarf kingdom ever known, three mountains, and made a lake, but everyone, so far, seemed quite happy about it. The ents were spreading themselves around the edges of the Misty Lake.

Dwalin rode beside him, close enough that they could hold hands as they rode. They had planned on using boats to sail up to Beorn’s, but the doors of Narvi and Celebrimbor made this impossible. Omosuil cantered up to Ori and Dwalin.

“Mellon Ori, we shall just follow the river north. We will be at the Master Beorn’s by nightfall tomorrow.”

“That’s good news, Omosuil. Are the horses managing with the doors?”

“Oh yes, having eight of them all pulling, none are feeling any strain.”

Ori glanced over at Galadriel, who was on her Banbury. Hers and Celeborn’s horse, Hennef, were a matched pair and, finding riding the pace of the ponies too slow, they romped and galloped in the fields nearby. Red Queen and her flock swooped lazily overhead.

Ori thought the vast field was the loveliest meadow he’d seen. The tall grasses waved silver and green in the morning sunshine. Tangles of purple vetch and red trumpet flower vines twirled through. Pale blue mountain poppies bobbed in the ghost of a breeze. Buttercups popped up, showing their golden bowls, and dark orange daisies grew everywhere.

Ori saw Galadriel put her hand in a small sack she carried and fling something in the air. At this distance, it looked like dust, but Ori rather thought it was seeds. He smiled, flowers of Lórien would spread.

He glanced behind. Kili drove one wagon. He had the reins latched, as he busily worked on a flower crown for his wife. He was already decorated with the one she had made.

Margr and Vi took turns driving the other wagon and riding with Glorfindel. Sculdis drove the new huge twelve wheeled wagon containing the doors of Celebrimbor and Narvi, all carefully wrapped for travel. Kelli rode on a cushion beside her as there was no way for Kelli to remain on Hennef while galloping. Gimli hung on for dear life and hollered as Legolas sent Arod cantering about, Dain on Chopper at their heels. Jani played her small balalaika and Omosuil’s soldiers sang to her music.

Haldir and his squad followed them closely. Haldir, on his horse Albarcas, constantly gave Omosuil a disapproving glare, and was constantly ignored.

Eowyn, on her own horse Windfola, rode beside Kili and Tauriel. Ori was so pleased she was accompanying them back to Erebor. Lady Galadriel had dispatched her note to King Theoden via goldfinch, to explain that everyone was fine and she was traveling to Erebor on a visit and was taking his dear girl with her.

“Why a goldfinch?” Ori had asked Lady Galadriel.

“I used to use a phoenix, but it kept incinerating all the messages.”
“Really?” Ori had gasped. “Like in the Shire novels? There really are phoenixes? Where do they come from?”

“No, I’m just making it up. I use whatever bird doesn’t mind the journey.”

“Oh.” Ori had been a little disappointed that there was no such thing outside of Bilbo’s novels.

“Good of you.”

“Thank you. Actually, it’s better to go with a small, stealthy bird. If you use a pigeon, the Rohan falcons eat them.”

Ori wondered again what King Theoden would make of the Lady’s message, never mind its mode of delivery. If anything, Theoden King would probably be sorry that he wasn’t coming along. Theo would just be annoyed to be left out.

Eowyn galloped her horse up beside them and turned a little to face them both.

“Auntie was telling me about your King Thorin and his consort. Was it a great romance like you find in those wonderful novels by Notathain A. Shire? I love his novels. Do you know of his works?”

Ori and Dwalin looked at each other and laughed until Eowyn demanded to know the joke.

“We know Shire,” Ori said in a mysterious tone.

“What is he like?”

“Very interes’in’ fella,” Dwalin said with a wink.

“Will he be there, while I’m visiting Erebor?”

“Aye. I stood there wi’ me mouth hangin’ open. If I were a dog, me tail’d’ve wagged itself off an’ gone flyin’ like a bird.”

“What did you do?” Eowyn asked, giggling.

“Nuthin’,” Dwalin said, “I could see he weren’t more than jus’ o’ age. I tried t’ think a’ wha’ t’d do ‘r say, when our Nuisance barged int’ me back an’ said if I’d business wi’ him then it were betwixt me a’ him an’ t’ leave his wee brother out o’ it.”

“He warned you away from me?” Ori cried.

“Aye, an’ then I knew who yeh was an’ where yeh lived. F’r handin’ me tha’ news, I could’a kissed him then an’ there!”
“Wait,” Eowyn interrupted, her face covered in confusion. “Ori, do you have another brother? Is his name really Nuisance?”

“Nah,” Dwalin grinned. “His name’s Nori. I call ‘im, Nuisance.”

“And you let him?” Eowyn asked Ori.
Ori shrugged.

“Nori is a nuisance. He’s between Dori and I. Together we were called the Brothers Ri. The first time I ever saw Dwalin was when I was helping Nori home. Nori was drunk. Dwalin came along and Nori started yelling at him. I was horrified as he was yelling at one of the Erebor guards. Dwalin just came across the street, threw Nori over his shoulder, and walked us home. He dropped Nori on the step, nodded to me, and went away.”

“You didn’t say anything!” Eowyn accused Dwalin.

Ori thought, then,

“Why didn’t you say anything to me, Dwalin?”

To Ori’s surprise, his husband blushed.

“I couldn’t believe I were walkin’ wi’ yeh. There yeh were, at me side. Beautiful an’ sweet, lookin’ up a’ me wi’ them lovely, big, brown eyes. I were as tongue-tied as a sheep.”

Ori and Eowyn laughed.

“At least, he didn’t bleat,” Eowyn teased.

“Why didn’t you say anything to me, Dwalin?”

“Nori is a nuisance. He’s between Dori and I. Together we were called the Brothers Ri. The first time I ever saw Dwalin was when I was helping Nori home. Nori was drunk. Dwalin came along and Nori started yelling at him. I was horrified as he was yelling at one of the Erebor guards. Dwalin just came across the street, threw Nori over his shoulder, and walked us home. He dropped Nori on the step, nodded to me, and went away.”

“You didn’t say anything!” Eowyn accused Dwalin.

Ori thought, then,

“Why didn’t you say anything to me, Dwalin?”

To Ori’s surprise, his husband blushed.

“I couldn’t believe I were walkin’ wi’ yeh. There yeh were, at me side. Beautiful an’ sweet, lookin’ up a’ me wi’ them lovely, big, brown eyes. I were as tongue-tied as a sheep.”

Ori and Eowyn laughed.

“At least, he didn’t bleat,” Eowyn teased.

“I wouldn’t have noticed,” Ori admitted, blushing himself. “I was too much in awe of him. A big, handsome warrior of the king’s guard, helping me, a nobody from the back of Steam Alley. Inked, pierced, the best beard I’d ever seen, I was utterly in love. Dori thought I was sick as I couldn’t eat my porridge next morning. I was in a haze for weeks. I kept my eyes on every guard detail I ever saw, hoping to see him again.”

“And you did?” Eowyn helped.

“Of course,” Ori smiled up at his husband. “I spent years peeping at him around corners and from behind fences. When Sigrid was old enough, we saw him with Prince Fili in the guard. Sigrid fell head over heels for Fili. Sigrid and I talked about them endlessly.”

“Did you see Ori peeping at you?” Eowyn sent a teasing glance Dwalin’s way.

“Oh aye, every time, I think. Kept ‘im in me sigh’s.”

“Why didn’t you go and talk to Ori?” Eowyn demanded. “Are you both very shy? Theo didn’t give me that impression and having met you, I certain don’t think so.”

“I tried,” Dwalin defended himself.

“Did you?” Ori gasped. “I don’t remember you coming to the house to ask me to walk out with you! Was I not in?”

“Yeh always had yer brothers wi’ yeh. Dori were li’ a bleedin’ watchdog. Jus’ once I saw yeh down th’ lakeside dock, where th’ Master’s la’est kept her flowers fenced in, but le’ folk sit on benches t’ look at ‘em. Yeh were finally alone an’ busy sketchin’, I s’pose. I brushed mesel’ off an’ gave th’ beard a quick fluff an’ strolled over t’ say hello. I were halfway there then our Dori comes up an’ sits beside yeh. Mahal’s hairy arse, wha’ a glare he sent me way. Though’ me eyebrows’d burn off.”

“Dear Lady Dori glared at you?” Eowyn said, in disbelief. “I find that hard to believe.”

“Dori can glare,” Ori assured her.

“Aye, our Dori kin glare. An’ there he stayed, watchin’ yeh draw ‘r write, ‘casionaly playin’ wi’ yer hair, an’ glatin’ a’ me. He stayed there ’til yeh both walked off.”

Ori suddenly remembered that moment. He’d finally had a chance to go and sketch the flowers. He’d been doing his journeyman. Master Khujik told him to go and practice drawing from nature for a change. He’d found the perfect bench and set himself to work. Dori had got off early and found him there. He’d stayed by Ori’s side the whole time, which Ori had thought strange. When they’d got home, Dori took him aside and told him not to go down to the docks alone.

Ori nearly fell off Honda, laughing

“I remember that day! I was relieved I’d got all my drawings done as Dori forbade me to go back there by myself. When I asked why, Dori told me there were pirates at the docks and they might steal me away!"

Eowyn giggled and Dwalin looked incensed.

"I ain’t a pirate. I’ve a bone t’ pick with our Dori, now."

Eowyn called them back to the story, so Dwalin and Ori told her of their Day of Fate months ago, making her laugh harder.

"So much for romance!" she managed.

"It was very romantic," Ori objected. "Dwalin was so kind and good to me from the first moment."

"All right, that bit is romantic," she conceded.

"Wha’ yeh lot talkin’ on?" Gimli demanded as Legolas brought Arod along the other side.

"Dwalin’s and my whirlwind romance," Ori told him.

Gimli chuckled.

"Aye, heard all ‘bou at tha’ from me mam an’ da talkin’. Mam kep’ saying Cap’n Dwalin needed t’ get hisself together."

"Eh?" Dwalin demanded.

"Everyone knew," Gimli said carelessly. "Imad Dis an’ Mam would talk on it. Mam though’ yeh ought t’ hurry up an’ Imad though’ yeh should brin’ Ori round f’r us all t’ meet before walkin’ out."

Dwalin snorted.

When evening drew in, they crossed the River Anduin at the old ford. The river ran wide over a bed of small stones, the water less than knee deep, tinkling and sparkling. The Company crossed with ease and traveled a little further north. Then the tents were pitched along the river bank. Kili had a good sized fire going and was busy with dinner. The elves turned the horses and ponies out on the grass to rest and graze.

Dain and Sculdis brought in several large trout while camp was being set up. Kili made the fried lembas as he’d promised Galadriel, with chips and served the last barrel of beer with them. For dessert, Kili dropped flattened pieces of dough into the pot of bubbling oil and once they browned, removed them and dropped them in a plate of sugar and cinnamon. These were handed out, still piping hot.

"Mmm, good mullis, Kili," said Jani. "Not as good as Chat’s, but still some good."

Kili smirked at her.

"Where do you think I got the recipe? Nothing’s missing. It tastes just the same."

"Ya left out the beard oil."

Ori wanted to laugh as Omosuil and his soldiers gorged on fried dough. He didn’t blame them, he decided, finishing his second and licking his fingers coated with sugar and oil.

Quartz made himself sick helping Ori with his fried dough. Dain provided some of the mixture he used on Baluchistan. This made Quartz better, but he burped obscenely for a few minutes then fell heavily asleep in Ori’s lap, sprawling, wings all skwee-wiff and his head hanging down off Ori’s leg.

Omosuil and Nomirliel badgered Margr and Vi to tell their ‘scary’ stories. With such an eager audience, the sisters sat, one on each of Glorfindel’s knees, and held forth on all kinds of ghosts, ghouls, creepy-crawlies, and things that, as they stated, go bump in the night.

Eowyn’s eyes were as round as saucers but Galadriel and Celeborn all but wept with laughter. This prompted Ori and Dwalin to regale them with their adventures in the Night Market. Eowyn begged them to take her. Tauriel assured Nomirliel the open courtyard dancing was better than any she’d ever attended. Ori tried to explain the lights to the Lórien couple. Dain and Sculdis snickered and dropped hints about what was available in the Alley of Divine Bliss. Gimli told Legolas they would go to the Moo and Cluck. Ori wondered if the Company would be descending on the Night Market as a whole. The idea was so funny, he flopped, giggling, into his husband’s chest.

"Let’s all go!" Jani said, her eyes shining. "It’ll be a celebration of our Company and success!"

"Ha," laughed Omosuil, "the celebration of the grand adventure of Lord Ori and his professional bullies!"

Ori, delighted, blushed and thanked everyone.
Dain called a toast to everyone as the Company of Lord Ori and His Bullies.
The laughter was just subsiding when the elves all sat up listening. Ori and the dwarrow fell silent. Ori strained his ears. Then he thought he heard hoofbeats. Everyone reached for weapons. Galadriel waved a negligent hand.
“There is no threat. It is Mithrandir.”
Kelli gave a profound squawk and everyone settled back. Ori wondered why the wizard was here.
Tharkûn trotted up on Shadowfax. Tharkûn patted the flank and dropped to the ground.
“Here you all are,” he said brightly, doffing his hat and bowing to Galadriel then to Eowyn. “I had hoped to catch up with you sooner.”
Kili rose to go to the fire.
“A nice cup of chamomile, Master Tharkûn?”
“Actually, I’d like a little red wine, if you have it?” Tharkûn smiled. Kili went to a wagon and rummaged.
“No real news,” Tharkûn said seating himself as Omosuil brought him a cushioned stool like the ones the elves had, the dwarrow preferring to loaf on the grass. “Everything seems to be perfectly settled. Treebeard sends his regards and says all the saplings, the new ones and the replanted ones, are doing well.”
“That is excellent,” Galadriel smiled.
“Here you are, Master Tharkûn,” Kili brought over a small goblet full of ruby liquid. “It’s got a fruity bouquet.”
“It has what?” Tharkûn asked.
“That’s what Dori always says. I don’t know what flowers have to do with anything,” said Kili.
There was a flapping of wings and Red Queen landed on the lowered tailboard of the biggest wagon which Kili had been using as a work space for preparing dinner.
“Your majesty,” Ori greeted her.
Red Queen gestured Tharkûn with her beak.
“Do you need him slain?”
“No,” Ori said quickly. “This is Tharkûn. He’s a wizard and a friend to all of us.”
“Ah.” Red Queen leaned her long neck forward and peered at Tharkûn.
“Tharkûn,” Ori slipped into his diplomatic role, “this is Red Queen of the Bonebreakers, late of Khazad-dûm. They are moving to Erebor now that Khazad-dûm is no more. Your majesty, this is Tharkûn.”
Tharkûn rose and bowed.
“I am delighted to make your acquaintance, your majesty,” Tharkûn murmured politely, though Ori was wary of the twinkle in the old wizard’s eye.
“Mmm,” Red Queen considered. “We know of you by the name of Gandalf the Gray. A cousin of ours informed us that in the Shire, you are called a Disturber of the Peace.”
Tharkûn drew himself up.
“If your cousin was referring to the incident of the removal of Mr. Baggins from the Shire, I was barely involved. All I did was give him a little nudge out of the door.”
The Company as a whole, burst into laughter.
“Oh, aye, lad,” Dain roared. “He lit out an’ yeh instructed a returnin’ squad o’ Thorin’s soldiers t’ clean out his entire home, takin’ th’ plumbing, an’ th’ panelin’ throughou’ with ‘em. They came back carryin’ th’ bloody front door!”
“He is a friend, your majesty,” Ori assured the large bird over the vociferous amusement of everyone.
“If he can be trusted to bring an entire nest of a family member of yours to safety, dwarf egg, then he is, indeed, a fine friend. We are pleased to meet you as well, Tharkûn.” Red Queen was gracious.
“Thank you, ma’am,” Tharkûn resumed his seat and sent a stink eye at Galadriel and Celeborn, who were trying to stifle their giggles in each other’s shoulders.

Kili politely offered the scrap bowl full of fish bones to Red Queen. She seemed surprised at this, blinked, then upended the bowl in her beak and emptied it in one gulp.

Tharkûn turned to Eowyn.

“And you, lady, did your adventure meet your expectations?”

“It was certainly amazing. I’ve been rushed by murderous orcs before. I was taken aback when they ignored me.”

Ori gasped.

“You were attacked by orcs? Did they sneak around and come through the door behind you?”

“No,” said Eowyn, wide-eyed. “They came pouring through a hole in the ceiling over the doors, just as we got across the bridge with the box. We made ready to engage them. And they ran at us, and right past us and continued on into the forest.”

Nomirliel nodded.

“Yes, they must have been out of their minds with fear. I cut off the head of an orc as it passed us and the body simply kept running into the trees. Any of them that made it past us were mopped up by the ents.”

Eowyn shivered.

“I could have gone my whole life without hearing how ents deal with orcs.”

They made such excellent time the next day that it was mid-afternoon when they reached a broad wall of wood and stone. Behind this grazed a flock of sheep. All the sheep looked up at them, then bounded off.

“Shall we take th’ wall down, drive through, an’ build it back up?” asked Jani.

Ori looked at Galadriel, who smiled and dismounted with Celeborn.

“We will in a few minutes. We have reached the lands of Beorn. Those animal live with him and have gone off to tell him we have arrived.”

Ori stood up in his stirrups and looked. Dwalin’s hand steadied him. A figure appeared and headed their way at speed. Beorn shouted a hullo. Ori waved, sat back down, and got off. Everyone else dismounted and made the wagons fast.

Beorn vaulted easily over his fence, smiling and came forward to greet Ori. Ori gamely held out a hand, but Beorn caught him up and hugged him.

“Easy, lad,” Dwalin barked. “Me husband’s had a rough time in th’ mountain.”

Beorn looked at Ori now settled at his shoulder. Ori felt like a badgerling.

“From what I saw, the mountains got the worst of it.” Beorn chuckled and gently put Ori back on Honda. “I shall take you to my home and put you in my steam room. There I’ll rub you down with salt and beeswax mixed with white willow bark. With that and a good meal, you’ll sleep like a newborn lamb at its mother’s side.”

“That sounds wonderful,” Ori said simply. “Thank you, Beorn, I’m glad we came back this way.”

“Where’s Dori?” was Beorn’s next question.

“Dori had to go with eagles back to Erebor, so no one would think anything had happened to the Bearer.” Ori quickly explained. Beorn nodded then greeted Galadriel.

“Welcome to my lands, Elf Queen. Long have we been neighbors, but this is a first visit.”

Galadriel smiled and held out both her hands to skin changer.

“Indeed. With the darkness gone by the actions of Lord Ori, we need have no fears of any evil thing lurking to stop us seeing on another.”

Beorn took her hands and Galadriel stood on tip-toe to kiss Beorn’s cheek. Beorn then shook hands with Celeborn and kissed his cheek.

“And here we have my ward,” Lady Galadriel announced to Beorn. “She is King Theoden of Rohan’s niece. My dear?”

Galadriel took Eowyn’s hand as young woman came forward from her horse.

“Eowyn, my child, this is Beorn, Lord of the Carrock. Beorn, this is my ward, Eowyn, the White Eowyn dropped a slight curtsey and held out her hand. Ori was taken by the sunny smile Eowyn gave the skin changer. He rather thought the White Lady of Rohan was going to make the most of her chance of being out from under her fond uncle’s eagle eyes.

“Lord Beorn,” Eowyn looked up. “I am honored to meet you. I apologize for being only able to present myself so travel stained as I am.” She placed her hand on his large one. Hers all but disappeared in his.

“White Lady,” Beorn rumbled. “You are as fair as your name and all the stories brought to me of you.”

Eowyn laughed and blushed.

“Being a neighbor to elves has made your tongue fair, sir.”

Ori thought Eowyn was hoping Beorn would do something else with his tongue and Beorn certainly looked as he would like to.

“Well met again, Skin changer,” bellowed Glorfindel in high humor. “It has been long since we last met.”

“Ah,” Beorn looked the elf hero over. “You.”

Beorn turned.

“Now here’s the one I’ve been looking forward to seeing again!” He moved toward Dain mounted on Chopper.

“Guid t’ see yeh, laddie,” Dain enthused.

Beorn ignored him and knelt, stroking Chopper’s face and scratching his ears.

“How are you, my fine boar friend? You look very well indeed.”

Chopper oinked politely and nuzzled Beorn. Dain craned over Chopper’s neck.

“Showin me up ‘re yeh, me lad? An’ after everythin’ yer mam an’ I’ve done f’r yeh!”

Chopper rolled his head back and guffed at Dain.

“He speaks lovingly of you,” Beorn said with a smile.

“I should hope so,” Dain snapped. “No dessert f’r yeh,” he scolded.

Ori realized that pigs could actually whine.

“Ah well, never mind, seein’ as yer sorry,” Dain allowed.

Beorn shook hands with Tharkûn.

“Good to see you kept the tip of your nose,” Beorn rumbled.

“It was a very near thing,” the wizard replied.

Ori looked from one to the other, than realized his imagination could supply anything leading up to this scenario except, perhaps, the truth.

Red Queen floated down. Beorn raised his arm, inviting her to land on his forearm.

“Bearman,” Red Queen croaked.

“Scavenger queen,” Beorn replied. Ori didn’t think they were very cordial until Beorn told her that a wolf pack had brought down an elk further up the river. Red Queen didn’t quite lick her chops, but she and her flock flew away at speed.

Everyone was greeted and stepped forward to help Beorn take down the wall, so they could drive the wagons through. The wall was built back up and they all moved easily through the meadows. Beorn led the way, showing them around. The sheep gamboled about the party as they came toward Beorn’s huge log house.

Eowyn admired it and Beorn walked beside her horse for the rest of the way.

There was an open area of neatly scythed grass sprinkled with forget-me-nots and purple thyme. Looking somewhat out of place in the middle, was large round marble pool in the center of which was a carved fish in the dwarrow style. From the fish’s upturned mouth spurted a sparkling fountain.

“Nice fountain,” Sculdis observed.

“Yes,” Beorn said, a curious note in his voice. “Day before yesterday it fell out of the sky and a spring bubbled up from the bottom. The animals like it, the water is better than that from my old well. Prettily made, too.”

“Yes,” Ori murmured to himself. “But a little too First Age for my tastes.”
Then he giggled hysterically as Dwalin helped him off Honda. Dwalin took Ori indoors, escorted by a large black dog that walked on its hind legs. The dog gestured with a forepaw to the fireplace and Dwalin helped Ori to a cushion by the hearth.

“Thanks,” Ori sighed, turned and looked at the dog. “Thank you.” The dog ducked its head slightly and went out through another door. “Yeh in pain, love?”

“No, just a little achy. I’m stupidly tired, though.” Beorn entered with the rest of the company and elves. Beorn waved people to make themselves at home.

“I’ll make my steam room ready.” Beorn leaned on his knees, looking down at Ori and Dwalin. “There’ll be a bed ready for you, until our evening meal.”

Ori was a little abashed as he lay on his stomach on a soft linen sheet spread over a large table. Dwalin stood, arms folded over his chest. Dwalin had stripped to his waist and was barefoot, leaning his arms on the table Ori lay on. Ori was naked. The timber room had a brazier burning sweet-smelling apple wood. Next to this sat a large bucket of water. The room was as hot as a forge. Beorn came in wearing nothing but a short kilt, and carrying a large bowl. He put the bowl on the table and threw another sheet over Ori, covering him from the waist down.

Beorn cast two ladles of water over the coals, which puffed steam about the room. He dipped his hands in the bowl and rubbed them. “Relax and take a nap, if you like,” Beorn rumbled. Ori tried to relax as Beorn’s hands landed on his shoulders and squeezed.

Sometime later, Ori felt Beorn covering him completely with a sheet. Ori couldn’t think. He was muzzy and his body felt like liquid. He was poured off the table into Dwaln’s arms and wafted somewhere. He registered a warm bed and Dwalin climbing in with him.

Ori cracked an eye open. Through a large window he saw the shadows of dusk. He rolled over into Dwalin who was looking through his sketch book. Dwalin grinned at him and kissed Ori’s nose.

“Better, love?”

“Wonderful. If I was a cat, I’d be purring. Which one are you looking at?”

“Th’ ane fra the journey t’ Lórien. Dead funny some a’ ‘em.”

“I hope Dain’s hat is safe,” Ori murmured, snuggling under Dwalin’s arm and settling his head against Dwalin’s chest.

“He’ll have t’ tie it on somehow ‘r it’ll be wobblin’ all over th’ place.”

“I can’t wait to see him wear it.” Ori snickered, then his stomach made a loud demand for food. “Guess we’re gettin’ up,” Dwalin teased.

There was a knock at the door, then Tauriel looked in.

“Dinner time?” Dwalin asked.

“Yes. Do you need help?”

Dwalin dropped out of the bed and grinned at her.

“If yeh grab his clothes, lass, I’ll get this one up, thanks.”

Ori, despite doing his best, was still a little wobbly. Between them Dwalin and Tauriel got him dressed and steadied him on his feet as they went through to the main room.

Kili and several of Omosuil’s squad helped the animals set up the dining table. Galadriel and Celeborn sat on a bench before the fire, Tharkûn and Jani on another opposite them. On the floor, Legolas frowned in concentration as he untangle Gimli’s hair, which was wet as Gimli looked as though he’d just come from a bath. Ori and Dwalin exchanged glances. This was not two warriors helping each other prepare for battle as before. If Gloin and Gridr had been present this time, they would have been shocked at such wanton behavior. Eowyn came in, her hair a sheet of gold, wearing a long dress of white with belled sleeves. She looked like a princess from a Shire novel.

“There you are, my child,” Lord Celeborn took Eowyn’s hand and seated her between himself and Galadriel. “You have been in your role as a messenger of Rohan for some days, it is well to see you as the Lady of Rohan. I’m sure your uncle would be most proud to see you now.”

“Have you heard from my uncle?” she asked.

“I have, my dear,” Galadriel told her, patting her hand. “He sent a falcon. Hopefully it didn’t eat my goldfinch. Anyway, your uncle writes he was startled by the explosion but is quite satisfied with my explanation and arrangements. He begs a letter from you when you have a spare moment.”

Eowyn laughed.

“He wants details. I shall give them, then tell him I was privileged to be counted among Lord Ori’s bullies.” She twinkled at Ori, who stuck out his tongue.

“Honestly!” cried Ori. “This talk of bullies. It’s all Dori’s fault.”

Ori grinned as Dwalin settled him a well-cushioned armchair then got in beside him.

“How are you feeling?” Celeborn asked.

“Much better, thank you.”

“Well, our Ori,” said Margr. “Bullies may no’ be th’ soh-bree-kay yeh like bu’ yeh go’ t’ admit it does have a ring t’ it. Bunch o’ bullies takin’ down a balrog.”

Ori did giggle at that.

“Ah,” said Tharkûn. “You all defeated him.”

“Well,” Ori admitted, “it was mostly Glorfindel and Margr and Vi.”

“Indeed,” Tharkûn observed. “In your usual manner, Glorfindel?”

“No.” The elf hero lounged before the fire, his head in Vi’s lap and an arm about Margr, who was leaning on his chest. “My dear ladies, here, released the aquifer and melted him down to about a foot high, then Margr squashed him flat with her boot.”

“Ah,” Tharkûn nodded. “You liquidated him.”

Ori nudged Dwalin, who was rolling his eyes. Jani, Gimli, and Legolas chuckled.

“Poor fellow,” Tharkûn murmured. “He made a foolish choice.”

“What’s wrong with our Glorfy’s choice?” Margr glared at the wizard.

“Oh no, dear lady. I meant the balrog.”

“Yer callin’ him a poor fellah?” Dwalin demanded.

“Oh, he was,” Tharkûn assured them.

“I didn’t know balrogs were hims or hers,” Eowyn put in. “Are there… balrogesses?
Balrogettes?”

Tharkûn smiled on her.

“Indeed, as there were only a few and were of no gender. I’m referring to this one as ‘he’, for I was acquainted with him before he chose to become a balrog.”

“Became a balrog?” Legolas gasped. “I thought Morgoth created them all.”

“Oh, no, no, lad,” Tharkûn puffed on his pipe and sent a smoke ring shaped like a cow running across to the fireplace.

Soon everyone was tucking into vegetables roasted soft and covered in a honey glaze, mashed roots dripping with butter and cream, patties of crushed nut meats dipped in bread crumbs and fried in butter. Loaves of many kinds of grains and nuts and seeds, butter and piles of cheeses, and for dessert they had roasted fruit with mint leaves, and drizzled with honey and whipped cream. Beorn served water, milk, and mead.

Everyone enjoyed this hearty meal and laughed and talked.

Kili looked up at his host.

“I was helping your animals with dinner and I noticed you have a lot of dwarrow-made cookware.”

“Yes,” Beorn rumbled, nodding. “The basin of the fountain was full of it when it landed. Along with the cookware there were rather a lot of glass pickling and canning jars and larger crocks for storage. I have already begun to make good use of them. I had to fish it all out as the water started coming up.” Beorn turned and mumbled something to one of the goats, which bustled back to the kitchen then returned a moment later with a small saucepan.
“They all have this same mark on them,” Beorn said and handed the sauce pan to Ori.
Ori took one look at the design and began to giggle.
“These carry the rune mark of the royal kitchens of Khazad-dûm.”
“Oh,” Beorn considered. “Do you want them back?”
“Oh, no, thank you,” Ori said quickly. “If they came with the fountain, then they are meant for you.”
“Good.” Their host looked pleased as Ori returned the saucepan to the waiting goat, who trotted off with it.
“But, Mithrandir,” said Legolas, “how did it come about that you know the balrog in Khazad-dûm?”
The wizard sat back in his chair and drained his mead.
“As you, or some of you, know balrogs were maiar who refused to obey and serve Eru. They went to Morgoth. Eru made a few of us—”
“Yer one a’ them maiar?” Dain demanded.
“Yes, King Dain, I am. Eru made a few of us to be wizards to aid him in Arda. I am Gandalf the Gray. You all know of Saruman the White, who has returned to Eru, and Radagast the Brown. There were also a couple of blue wizards but their whereabouts are unknown and their names escape to me. Eru made another, named Myron.”
Dain snorted.
“Myron the Maiar?”
“Alas, King Dain, some of us suffer under life’s crueler alliterations. He wasn’t a bad fellow at heart.”
“You knew him well?” Ori asked.
“As I told you before, we were formed and trained at about the same time.”
“Oh, I am so sorry.”
“Never mind, young master. He never was much of a team player, though I can only lay half the blame on him. Eru wanted to make him the puce wizard, a color which in no way flattered him. Or anyone, let’s be frank.”
“Is that a major impediment for successful maiar?” Ori asked.
“Of course! Myron the Puce? Who would take him seriously? Not to mention the attendant self-esteem issues.”
Galadriel smiled over her cup.
“Not a problem you’ve ever suffered, Mithrandir.”
“Indeed. Our friend Bilbo says I had to be shaped like Big Folk, or my ego would never have fit.”
“So,” Ori said slowly. “Myron became a balrog and slept under Khazad-dûm?”
“Balrogs like fire. They rest in it and absorb it into themselves, thus their great size.”
“He was dead ugly,” Margaery mused. “Yeh’d think he’d a’ preferred bein’ puce than ugly.”
“I believe it was the wings, he liked,” Tharkûn replied, shaking his head. “Myron always had a fancy for wings.”
“Yeh maiar’re dafter than brushes,” Gimli muttered and helped Legolas to more fruit and cream. Legolas protested but Gimli silenced him by saying that he, Legolas, had better eat or Gimli’s mam would throttle Gimli for not looking after his One. Beorn roared with laughter at this.

Once dinner was finished, they all rose and the table was cleared. Everyone did their best to help the animals with the washing up. When everything was pristine again, they found their host had gone out to his back garden where he was setting up tall torches all about with Eowyn’s assistance. Ori traded looks with Dwalin. Eowyn seemed intent on having a wonderful flirt with Beorn and he had no intention of refusing her.
“Oi,” Vi commented, coming out to the back porch where Dwalin and Ori were standing. “That lass be’er have dislocatin’ hips, if she’s gonna be ridin’ tha’.”
“She’ll be fine,” Glorfindel assured her. “She’s of Rohan. They ride horses all the time.”
“They ride ‘em, love. They don’ fuck ‘em. Don’t yeh know th’ difference?”
“One doesn’t always require a saddle?” Glorfindel teased. Margr hooted and Vi swatted Glorfindel. Ori and Dwalin moved aside to sit on the step and snicker. Glorfindel occasionally got a good one in on the sisters.

Beorn and Eowyn returned and Beorn invited everyone to come out and enjoy the evening. The animals brought comfortable seats and Jani came back out with her balalaika, making the elves call for a song. Jani obliged them.

Beorn enjoyed this and asked for something faster. Sculdis had found a small drum in the living room earlier and, now, brought it out to Beorn. He said it had been left there by a rude peddler along with a few other things. He didn’t play, but if she did, she was welcome to it. Sculdis and Jani sang a silly song making everyone laugh again.

Dain bounced up with a shout and barreled back indoors only to reappear with something all wrapped up in a woolen bag. He untangled it and held a weird bundle of sticks.
“I knew I brough’ me doodle sack f’r somethin’,” he bellowed.
Ori realized what it was and choked as Dain stuck the blowpipe mouthpiece into his mouth and his cheeks puffed out red as he blew. The bag under his arm inflated, emitting its drone and every sheep and goat on the land bleated in response. Kelli clunked his beak and crept under Celeborn’s chair.

Omosuil turned huge eyes on Ori.
“Mellon Ori, why is King Dain torturing that poor animal?”
“That’s not an animal. It’s a musical instrument. It’s properly known as a bagpipe, but Dain, for reasons only known to himself, calls it a doodle sack.”
Omosuil looked at him blankly.
“It does seem to be an instrument of some kind. Musical? Well…”
“One dwarf’s meat is another dwarf’s poison,” Ori shrugged.
“Oh, Great Eru!” laughed Omouil. “Is he using it to rid his tubes of parasites?”
Dwalin chuckled.
“If he had ‘em, I s’pose it’d get rid of ‘em quick.”
Satisfied with the drone, Dain caught the chanter and started with ‘There’s a merry old inn’, with Sculdis and Jani accompanying him. The dwarrow sang, as did Galadriel and Tharkûn.
Jani went into a well-known country round dance and most of the elves and dwarrows rushed out to the grass, made up sets and danced. Beorn offered a hand to Eowyn and she took it, laughing, and they joined in.
Ori leaned back into Dwalin’s chest. The dancing was wonderful. He wished he and Dwalin could join in, but his muscles weren’t ready for that yet.
“You can go dance, if you want,” he said.
“Don’t wanna t’ wi’ any bu’ yeh,” Dwalin told him, kissing his ear. Ori glowed. He settled to watch as he and Dwalin shared a mug of Beorn’s good, sweet mead.
The animals had joined the dance, leaping and jumping. Beorn occasionally swung one high in the air, when he wasn’t swinging Eowyn. The elves whirled and pranced. Tharkûn hopped about, quite spritely, his long beard pirouetting after him. Kelli hopped after Celeborn, fluffing his tail and clunking his beak the entire time. Gimli and Legolas were sometimes in unison and at other times seemed to compete. Kili and Tauriel twirled about and all around, dancing sometimes and chasing each other.
Red Queen landed beside Ori and Dwalin.
“Dwarf egg, is this a ritual?”
“Ritual?” Dwalin asked.
Red Queen looked down her beak at Dwalin. Ori hurriedly explained.
“Your majesty, Red Queen, this is Dwalin, he is my mate. And please called me, Ori.”
“Very well, dwarf egg…Ori. You may address me with familiarity.” She looked Dwalin over minutely. “Your mate is big and strong. May you lay many eggs.”
“Thank you,” Ori said gravely as Dwalin snickered into his hair. “What do you mean by ‘ritual’?”
“Sometimes the uruks would take torches and move and make other noises. They would chain a group of other uruks together then go into the depths. Some time later the torch carriers would return. The chained one were never seen again.”

“Balrog?” Red Queen repeated this in a questioning tone.

“The big creature of fire, ma’am It was referred to as a balrog,” Ori explained.

“Then what is your flock doing?”

“They’re…” Ori didn’t think Red Queen wished a detailed explanation of the concept of dance, so he went with. “They’re celebrating our success.”

“Success?”

“We have succeeded in recovering the treasure lost to all the…er…dwarf flocks of Arda.”

“Ah.”

Ori thought quickly.

“If you and your flock have finished your dinner, you’re all welcome to join us.”

“We and our flock are roosting in the hay store in that big building,” Red Queen nodded at one of Beorn’s barns. “We heard your flock’s noise and we came to see.”

“I hope we’re not disturbing you.”

“No, your noise is much more pleasant than any noises the uruk made. One may flap one’s wings to it in a joyful manner.”

“That’s sort of the same as what we…my flock is doing,” Ori tried. “As I said, you and your flock are welcome to…er… flap with us.”

Dwalin roared with laughter and Red Queen made a hissing sort of snicker.

“We call such flapping, dancing.” Ori tried to recover his dignity but couldn’t.

Legolas and Gimli did look like they were trying to become airborne at the moment.

Kelli bounced on his tail and then pranced. Red Queen’s eyes followed him.

“Oh what is that?” she demanded, gesturing Kelli with her beak.

“That’s Kelli,” Ori told her. “He’s a companion to Celeborn. He’s what is called a raphcuctus bird. They are a type of flightless bird that comes from the far south.”

“He doesn’t look much like a bird,” Red Queen commented, a note of curiosity in her voice.

“He’s round and huge, and being a bird is to fly. If a bird can’t fly, then what’s the point?”

“I have no idea.” Ori admitted.

Kelli caught sight of them and paraded over. Red Queen stared. Kelli fluffed his tail, put his tiny wings out and fluttered the ends, drew them back to rest on his belly and bowed with the studied elegance of elves. He rose and regarded Red Queen a moment then clunked his beak a few times.

Red Queen inclined her head. Kelli bowed to Ori and Dwalin then strutted back and returned to dancing.

“That was the oddest behavior,” Red Queen observed. “We can’t get our beak to do that noise.
How does he make that noise with his beak?”

“I don’t know that either,” Ori shrugged.

Red Queen stayed beside them, watching until the tune drew to a close and Jani called that the musicians needed a break.

Kelli strutted off to the berry bushes to snack. Beorn went in to see what was in his kitchen. The dancers chatted and either sat on the grass or came to the porch to sit. Red Queen headed to straight to Dain.

Dain gazed stone-faced at her and farted.

Red Queen stared at him.

“The noise you make with that bag, not your smelly noise, fledgling. Focus.”

Sculdis rocked back, howling with laughter.

“Lassie,” she managed when she could breathe. “If yeh didn’t have feathers, I’d swear we was sisters.”

Red Queen considered this and then hopped over to bat her beak against Sculdis cheek.
“Sister dwarf,” she proclaimed. Sculdis wiped her eyes and got herself together. “Lift yer wings,” she said. Red Queen looked puzzled and did so. Sculdis leaned in and wrapped her arms under the wings and hugged Red Queen. Red Queen caught on and folded her wings about Sculdis’ back.

They parted. Dain scooted a stool over and showed Red Queen his ‘doodle sack’.

Beorn and his animals came back out with more mead and platters of toast slathered with berry jams.

“Scavenger queen,” Beorn rumbled. “What brings you here?”

“We heard your celebratory noise and came to partake, Bearman.”

Beorn shrugged and passed out the food. Ori offered a slice to Red Queen. She sniffed it. “It’s good,” Ori told her. She examined the slice with both eyes, one after another, then opened her beak. Ori slotted the toast inside, mindful of his fingers, and she gulped it down.

“Do you like it?” Ori asked.

“Sweet, has some crunch. We like it.”

As if to reinforce this, she reached forward, using her right talons, and grasped another slice and shoveled it in.

Ori grinned up at Dwalin.

“She likes it.”

“Aye, bu’ keep her away fro’ th’ mead, love. I ain’t dealin’ wi’ a soused bird.”

“That,” said Ori, watching Margr help Red Queen to drink out of a cup, “isn’t going to be your problem.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Beorn is a helpful friend and Ori feels better. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori woke with the sun on his face, the snoring of his husband beside him, and a strange buzzing noise. He peeped over the bedclothes and a honey bee the size of Killer was standing on them. Ori swallowed and stayed very still, watching it. The bee, he realized, was not looking at him but at Dwalin. Every time Dwalin snored, the bee buzzed in return. Ori clenched his teeth and strove to stay still but the giggles were almost bursting from him. Dwalin grunted and shifted.

Ori hissed, “Good morning, husband. Please don’t move or anything.” Dwalin’s body stilled. An eye cracked and looked at Ori.

“Wha’s th’ problem? We abou’ t’ fall offa somethin’?”

“No. One of Beorn’s bees is visiting. It’s standing on us. It’s really big.”

Dwalin cocked his head down and looked at the bee, only two feet from his nose.

“Fuck,” Dwalin muttered.

“Bzzzz,” commented the bee.

Ori giggled a little and whispered,

“Every time you snored, it buzzed back at you. I was wondering what you two were talking about.”

“Let’s hope I weren’t cussin’ at it,” Dwalin reflected. He slowly brought out his arm and offered a finger to the bee. The bee crept forward and tasted his finger.

“Bzzzz,” the bee opined, then buzzed out the window.

“Fuck.” Dwalin rubbed his hand over his face and blinked, sitting up. “How yeh feelin’, love?”

Ori moved slowly and stretched. He felt much better. He was ready to get things done as usual.

“I’m better.”

He looked at Dwalin. Dwalin grinned.

Ori pounced, knocking his husband back amongst the pillows.

“Get yer arses up!” bellowed Dain, banging on the door. “Breakfas’s abou’ ready.”

“Fuck yerself, Dain,” Dwalin called cheerily back.

Ori got out of bed and went to the window. It was early and the garden was truly buzzing with bees, busy at the wild flowers that grew rampant all around Beorn’s house.

Once dressed, the pair of them went and washed their hands and faces at the wash room nearby then went to the main room. The table was set and Kili was helping to put food on the table. Kili had made sure there was hot tea to go with the milk Beorn usually had for breakfast. Through the wide open door, Ori saw Tauriel out in the garden, picking berries.

Ori and Dwalin seated themselves. Dain and Sculdís were already there. Beorn, on his way somewhere, told them to ‘get started’. Ori got started, he was starving. Kili, along with tea, had made a great pile of scones. Ori filled up on scones, Beorn’s good jams and cream. People began to trickle in. The sisters came in, tailed by Glorfindel. Jani dragged herself through, yawning. She grunted in greeting, poured herself a tankard of tea, added a trickle of cream, dumped in half a jug of honey and went outside to have a pipe and wake up.
Beorn returned and landed in his chair at the head of the table. He looked at Ori.

“So the Bearer is carrying?”

“Oh yes,” Ori grinned. “Having a nephew or niece will be fun. I helped Dori with all Bard’s badgers.”

“Same mother?” Beorn inquired. Ori realized Beorn was different from the men of Dale.

“Oh yes, Matilde was very nice. Sigrid looks a lot like her. Matilde died shortly after Tilda was born. Matilde and Dori were great friends. We were neighbors.”

Beorn nodded then, “Now Bard’s taking up with the elf king, hmph. Do the children like the elf?”

Both Ori and Dwalin laughed.

“They brats got Thranduil under their wee thumbs. They call ‘im, ‘wicked stepmother’,” Dwalin told Beorn. Beorn raised an eyebrow.

“Because,” Ori took up the story. “The Great Woudini told Sigrid she would have a wicked stepmother then a handsome prince would rescue Sigrid and take her away to live in his palace.”

Beorn snorted. “Nice the handsome prince lives a hop, skip and a jump away. Woudini is notorious.”

“His real name is Jim,” Ori said idly, running his finger across his plate to catch the stray crumbs, blobs of jam, and cream.

“He gives th’ weirdest predictions, bu’ it’s amazin’ how they work ou’ sometimes,” Dwalin allowed. He cocked an eye at Beorn. “He ever predict f’r yeh?”

Beorn looked at Dwalin, then chuckled.

“He told me once that I would burrow underground where I would be an honored guest at a great party and I would hear strange music that would render me unable to hear anything else for seven days after.”

Ori and Dwalin roared with laughter.

“Yes,” Ori gasped. “The White City Bang Crash was extremely loud. Your poor ears!”

“They were ringing for a good long time,” Beorn admitted with a chuckle. “He also said I would have a very short but mad love affair with a snowflake.”

“Was the snowflake’s name Eowyn?” Ori giggled.

Beorn grinned with a mouthful of rather sharp teeth, but he narrowed his eyes.

“Isn’t there a saying that one should never kiss and tell?”

“Best no’ t’, if yeh ever meet her uncle,” Dwalin observed.

“I certainly wouldn’t,” Beorn replied with a wink. “I like kissing too much.”

Eowyn came through. She wore a long brown smock over a bright blue dress. She looked happy and Ori noticed, happily sated. Beorn patted the seat beside him.

“Come and eat, my morning daisy. You look in need of food.”

Eowyn sat and helped herself to three scones, jam, and the cream. Beorn poured her a tankard of milk which she drained then put the tankard down for a refill. Beorn chuckled and did so. Eowyn gave an evil smile at Ori.

“Good morning, Lord Ori.”

“Yes, it is, isn’t it?” Ori teased.

Galadriel and Celeborn breezed in. Galadriel regarded her ward.

“You’ve bathed, good girl. It’s highly impolite to arrive at the breakfast table…glowing.”

Eowyn shrieked.

Beorn colored a little and remarked, “That explains why you two were running for the river before dawn.”

Celeborn laughed and raised his lady’s hand to his lips. Ori leaned back in his chair and frowned at Dwalin.

“I hate Dain. Why couldn’t he go wake up someone else?”

Dwalin chuckled and put an arm about Ori’s shoulders, while Dain protested around a full mouth.

Omosuil and his squad trailed in either from outside or the bedrooms. Tauriel came back with a basket full of berries which Kili took, thanking her with a kiss, and returned to the kitchen. Jani returned smiling and refilled her tea.

Ori looked around.

“We are most grateful for your hospitality, Beorn.”

“Yes, well,” the huge man leaned his elbows on the table. “I admit I’m pleased you stopped to stay. Having a nearby mountain range explode but leave little damage intrigued me. Your tales of the event were excellent. I shall send you all on your way around midday. I have gifts I need to gather for the Bearer.”

“That’s most kind of you,” Ori smiled, blushing a little at the generosity for Dori.

“I have plain cotton lengths,” Beorn went on. “They are soft and will do well for nappies and small bedding. I shall also send herbs for teas and plenty of honey. I have several boxes packed from my ice house to carry clotted cream, butter, and cheeses. When the Bearer runs short, perhaps that young raven of yours will come and see me and I’ll send more.”

“Yup,” Quartz cawed as he whisked in and landed in front of Ori. Ori buttered a slice of bread and put jam on it, before cutting it up in small pieces for Quartz to gulp down.

“You should get married and have cubs,” said Eowyn. “You obviously love children and this is a marvelous place for some.”

Beorn grinned at her.

“What are you proposing, White Lady?”

“I’m not proposing,” she twinkled at him. “I’m merely offering some advice for the future. I’m sure many travelers pass your lands and not all of them will be male. Many women have hard lives and, in some places, are considered secondary beings to men. Someone like you would be nothing short of miraculous. Some women also wish to have a basket full of children, which I don’t. Your home and life here would be a fond dream come true for such.”

Beorn inclined his head with a teasing smile.

“You have my word that I shall see to it, ma’am.”

“Do,” Eowyn grinned. “I look forward to sending amicable ponies to you to care for and teach your children to ride the steppes.”

Beorn roared with laughter, caught her hand, and kissed it.

“You speak with wisdom, White Lady. My quiet household is naught to a free spirit of the wild wind that dances on the mountain crags of Rohan. As you advise, I shall seek one who shares the call for solitude and the gentle kindness of the meadows and rich earth.”

“While I am visiting Erebor and the Dale,” Galadriel said with a bright smile, “if I should meet any ladies I deem worthy, I shall direct them to travel this way.”

Beorn’s eyes widened a little and as he groped for something to say. Celeborn patted his wife’s hand.

“I’m sure Beorn will manage nicely without any assistance from you, dearest….or Lady Dori.”

Galadriel pouted out her lower lip at her lord, but giggled.

“Lord Ori,” Celeborn went on. “What are your plans now?”

“We have to pack up and add in Beorn’s presents for Dori. Beorn say he will see us off around midday.”

“I shall make sure you have foodstuffs, too,” Beorn added. “That young Kili seems to have a good head when it comes to provisions. I shall also send your excellent king some of my mead and berry wine.”

Dwalin leaned over and whispered to Ori, “I’m sure Thorin’ll love pourin’ ou’ a glass ‘r three f’r ‘is hobbit.”

“Hush,” Ori admonished with a grin.

Beorn went on, “I have more roving than I know what to do with. I’m sure your people will have plenty use for it.”

“Beorn, we-” Ori began, but Beorn waved his words away.

“Your people have destroyed an evil maiar and an army of orcs. I won’t miss them trying to steal my animals,” Beorn grinned at Galadriel and Celeborn. “And you have provided me with some good neighbors.”
Ori went out to the meadow and called to Honda. She came at the gallop, Harley at her heels. She squealed to see Ori and bounced around in front of him. Ori laughed and, once she stopped, put his arms around her upper neck and hugged her as she nuzzled his back and huffed in his hair.

“It’s time to go, Honda,” Ori cooed at her. “Just a couple of days more and you’ll be back in your own stable with Gnasher and Grinder and the others. I’m sure you miss them all.”

Honda snuffled and nibbled at his tunic. Harley came forward and bumped his head into Ori’s shoulder.

“Come on,” Ori said and led the way back to the house a hand on each pony, scratching the manes. Dwalin came out with both their packs. He dropped them and folded his arms, chuckling.

“Lookit, yeh, laddie,” he teased Harley. “Followin’ after me love like a pup. Yer almost’ as bad as me.”

Ori went straight up to Dwalin and grabbed his husband’s beard and pulled him into a kiss.

“I’m so lucky,” Ori grinned as he came up for air.

“Aye, yeh kin get lucky wi’ me anytime, me love.”

Ori giggled but blushed as he saw Omosuil coming over to them.

“Mellon Ori, am I interrupting yours and the good captain’s mush?”

“Aye,” Dwalin said with a terrible frown but a twinkle in his eye. “We about ready?”

“Yes, Captain. The wagons are packed. Everything is ready. All who are riding are…hunting up their mounts.”

“Huntin’?” Dwalin repeated amused.

“Yesss…” Omosuil managed. “It seems the horses and ponies of the Lord of the Carrock household have been …er…telling our horses and ponies what a nice life they lead.”

Ori looked horrified at Honda.

“Honda! Don’t you like living with us?”

Honda gave a disgusted huff and put her head over Ori’s shoulder and pulled him to her. Ori hugged her again. Dwalin raised an eyebrow at Harley, who snorted and rolled his eyes.

Worried, Ori took Dwalin’s hand as they walked to the largest barn before Beorn’s house. To his relief, all the horses and ponies had turned up and appeared to be showing off to Beorn’s animals how well they could walk over and stand in their traces to be hitched to the wagons or saddled up, to the point where they walked around the wagons inspecting the wheels, picking up bridles and checking their saddle straps, nickering and nosing their riders to loosen or tighten them.

Ori carefully shook out the saddle blanket and folded it beneath Honda’s eye and arranged her saddle on it. He took the bridle from her mouth and held it, while she nodded her head down into it. When she was ready, he looked her over and hugged her again.

“You’re the best pony ever, Honda.”

Honda snuffed and tried to nibble at his beard, making him giggle. Dwalin led Harley over to them. Ori mounted up and looked about at his Company.

“Everyone ready?” he called out. Shouts of confirmation sounded and they set off. Beorn led the way.

“I will see you to the edge of the Greenwood. My lands end there and you, sylvan elves, will be in your own.”

“Thank you, Beorn,” Ori smiled at the huge man walking beside them.

“As I told you, you’ve done a great service to any living between the mountains and the Greenwood. I have had news that the goblins of the northern Misty Mountains have fled toward Ered Mithrin and Withered Heath. With the destruction of Moria and Dol-Guldur, they live in fear of Mount Gundabad, too. The rangers of the area have pursued many of their bands. Rumor has that a few have been seen fleeing to the Northern Waste. There will be more trade moving on the old North Road. We shall all benefit. You are the one we should all render thanks to.”

Ori blushed hotly.

“I had a great deal of help.”

“It were yer quest, love,” Dwalin told him, squeezing his hand. “Yeh led us.”
“And it was an excellent adventure,” Eowyn chimed in.
“Indeed,” Glorfindel put in. “I shall stay on in Dale as its protector but will inform King Bard that I intend to accompany you, Ori, on any further adventures you may take.”

Ori wished his face would stop burning.
“I don’t think I’d like another one like this. I don’t like bringing people into danger. Mind,” he smiled up at Dwalin. “I would like to see a little more of Arda. We have seen many beautiful places and met such kind people.”

“I hope you will come to Rohan,” Eowyn offered.
“Yes, I’d like that. I’d also like to see the White City of Gondor. First March Warden, Boromir, son of Denethor, told us much of it when he came as guard to King Elessar and Lady Arwen for Thorin’s coronation.”

“You’ve met Boromir?” Eowyn cried. “He’s lovely, but such a pain in the neck.”
“Yes. How did you meet him?” Ori turned to her.
“He’s been to Rohan often as a messenger of the king to be. He and Eomer were always up to some lark when he stayed, and he and I were always baiting and playing pranks on each other. He would stuff dried grass and heath down my neck whenever I rode out with them. I would get him back.”

“Oh?” Beorn wanted to know.
She laughed.
“Yes, once I put two field mice in each of his trews pockets before he put them on. The racket he made when he sat down to breakfast. He jumped up and danced all around. Another time I covered a large hole with bracken. He stepped on it and fell in. I’d thrown a slurry of horse shit in the bottom. Then once I sewed a few small crushed snails in the lining of his message bag. Lady Arwen wrote me, it was a year before he figured out why his favorite bag stank so badly, no matter how many times it was cleaned and by many different specialists. She sent hers and the king’s congratulations. She wrote that Elessar said he wanted me to serve on his council of war, if it ever became necessary.”

Ori was helpless with laughter and Beorn was wiping tears from his eyes.
“Yer a dangerous lass,” Dwalin complimented her. “I’ll be keepin’ on yer good side.”
“As I’ve seen all your sides?” she teased. Dwalin threw back his head in mirth.
“I’m going to introduce you to my brother, Nori,” Ori said decidedly. “You’ll like him.”
“Bleedin’ balls a’ Mahal, love. Though’ yeh loved us all,” Dwalin protested with a grin. “Don’t go givin’ our Nuisance a fuckin’ apprentice!”

Ori grinned. “He probably would want her as one, wouldn’t he? I’d better not. Bofur, that’s Nori’s husband,” he explained to Eowyn, “would never forgive me and I don’t want to think what Dori would do. Probably accuse me of corrupting an innocent princess.”

“Innocent princess?” Eowyn snorted. “Dear Lady Dori doesn’t know me very well. I have no wish for such a life as that. To me it would be as a cage. Only such as Arwen, I envy. She is an equal to her king. Her counsel, he gives great heed. This is strange to the ways of men. I swear sometimes it is to my sorrow to have been born a maid among men.”

“Come now, niece,” Celeborn adjured her. “You are strong in your spirit and I trust none shall imprison you in a life you do not desire. Indeed, my Lady and I shall counsel Theoden on your behalf, if you wish it so.”

“Oh, Eowyn,” Ori said quickly. “Dori would only say such in the same way he scolded Haldir for flirting with you! Don’t dislike yourself for being a female. Even if the way of your folk is to favor males, with Galadriel and Dori to speak out for you, there is no possible way for you to be run roughshod over. Having met you, I doubt any would dare try. And Dwalin and I would certainly have plenty to say to anyone who doesn’t think you are perfectly capable of doing anything a male of your people can do.”

“An’ if they don’t see sense in tha’,” Dwalin nodded. “I’ll happily thump ‘em f’r yeh, if yeh ain’t there t’ do it on yer own.”

Eowyn laughed again. “Thank you! I have, as you put it, thumped Boromir a number of times. I am the equal to my brother in swordplay and a better rider, though I fully admit I lack his brute strength.”
“T’ll have no criticism to make of your physical strength, White Lady,” Beorn murmured eyes sparkling at her. “Nor any complaint at you being a lady.”
“Quiet you!” Eowyn commanded and reached out to smack him. He ducked and laughed at her reddened cheeks.
“Eowyn!” Vi scolded. “Yeh naughty pet. Yeh only go’ introduced yesterday.”
“Has that ever stopped you or your sister?” Eowyn demanded.
“Tha’ ain’t th’ poin’, our lass.” Margr admonished. “Yeh ain’t passed yer bearin’ years.”
“Did that stop you two, before?” Eowyn poked.
“No,” Glorfindel grinned impishly. “And I bless Mahal and Yavanna everyday for it.”
“Here now,” Margr bellowed, obviously highly pleased. “We’re jus’ a couple a’ minin’ wenches.
She’s a proper lady and such.”
“If they are mining wenches, “ Eowyn asked Celeborn. “Does that make me a battle wench?”
“And if she is a battle wench,” Galadriel asked Celeborn from his other side, “Does that make me a magic wench?”
Celeborn choked then gasped, “There shall be no ‘wenching’ done.”
“Sir,” Jani told him with a grin, “yeh ain’t no fun a’ all t’.”

They saw the tree-line very soon and Omosuil and his squad cheered and galloped forward.
“Just making sure all’s safe for you!” Nomirliel called back to Ori.
“Thanks!” he shouted.
“Aye, thanks f’r makn’ sure th’ trees don’ eat us,” Dwalin said to Ori.
“I think the ents ate the orcs,” Eowyn said with a grimace.
“Tha’d be some shitty fertilizer,” Dain replied.
“I suppose,” Ori said thoughtfully. “If the ents…er…consumed them, they were then able to come out of the trees, rocks and the rivers as elves again. But I hope the trees won’t get sick from it.”
“I’m sure Treebeard an’ Yavanna’ll take care o’ em, love,” Dwalin assured him as they rode into the shade of the Greenwood.
Omosuil and his squad were waiting for them at the Forest Gate of the Old Elf Path. Here they bade farewell to Beorn.
Ori dismounted and went to offer his arm to Beorn but Beorn knelt and embraced him.
“You are a good dwarf. I have learnt how you have wrought great changes in Erebor and were instrumental in putting Thorin on the throne. He is a wise king and Bilbo will advise him well. I shall look forward to meeting you often, Scribe to the Valar of Fire.”
Ori blushed and stammered something but then Beorn was clasping hands with Dwalin.
“I do not envy your care for this one, dwarf warrior, but your strength and stout heart will carry you both.”
“Aye, tha’ yeh kin tie t’,” Dwalin responded, pleased.
Beorn chuckled then lifted Kili and tossed him like a badger.
“You are a fine provider, young one. Your lady is fortunate.”
“Thank you,” giggled Tauriel and caught Kili as Beorn tossed him to her.
“Look, I’m Bujni!” Kili shouted “I can fly!” He regained his footing and grinned at Beorn. “I put our extra stores in your pantry. I baked you up a few batches of scones and showed some of your goats the recipe. There’s a layer cake with jam and cream for your dessert tonight.”
“You baked me a cake?” Beorn’s eyes widened.
“You put up with us,” Kili countered.
Beorn laughed and ruffled Kili’s hair.
“You, I wish to see again. Perhaps when you and your lady go hunting in the depth of the Greenwood, you shall visit me.”
“That would be lovely,” Tauriel glowed. “I shall remind Kili to bring his fiddle to play for you.”
Dain and Sculdis stood back snickered into each other’s shoulders as Beorn had a private conversation with Chopper then nodded farewell to them.

The sisters embraced Beorn and told him he was a ‘guid lad’ and promised to knit him some ‘nice, warm things’ for the winter. Glorfindel grinned maniacally at Beorn, who snorted and told him his ‘wives’ had improved him. He shook hands with Tharkûn and had a few brief words with Shadowfax.

He shook hands and kissed the cheeks of both Galadriel and Celeborn again. He said his farewells as they all passed through the gate into the wood, speaking to each as they all thanked him for his kind hospitality.

He saved Eowyn for last.

He lifted her up so her feet dangled off the ground and they kissed.

"Travel safe, White Lady, who blushes so pretty."

"I will, man sweeter than his own honey."

"Oi,” said Gimli on Arod.

Legolas sent back an elbow into his shoulder.

"Hush."

They rode deep into the pleasant cool and shimmering light of the Greenwood. For what was described as a path it was a good wide road that allowed them to ride easily in ever changing groups. At first, Ori and Dwalin brought up the rear, giving a final wave to the huge bear that loped back home across the meadow. They went slowly forward, checking in with each of their Company. The sisters were with the wagon bearing food stuffs and their packs. Vi drove and Margr rode in front of Glorfindel with Eowyn beside them

"You sure yer comfy enough t’ ride, lovey?" Margr asked Eowyn.

"Of course I am," Eowyn looked confused at the dam. “Why shouldn’t I be?"

“I would have thought yeh’d have t’ unhitch yer hips t’ get around a cock tha’ big.”

“It was too big, but there are other delights. The things that man can do with honey.”

“Ooo, aye?” enthused Vi.

“So, how big was it?” Margr wanted to know.

“I’m not saying.”

“Ooo, yeh wee stinker!” The sisters cackled delightedly.

Ori was pleased that they were moving smartly along. There were few others traveling the path, mostly, elves. Haldir was on high alert. Ori exchanged a look with Dwalin, who muttered to Celeborn and Galadriel. The lord and lady gently told Haldir that he really didn’t have a great deal to worry about as, after all, they were with Omosuil and he knew his home woods.

Haldir turned his attention to inspecting the Company. Wheels turned, horses and ponies trotted happily. Ori wondered if he ought to engage Haldir in conversation to put the elf captain at ease but Glorfindel came up from the rear, a huge grin plastered on his face, now with Vi ensconced on his lap.

"Ho, friend Haldir!” Glorfindel greeted Haldir with great affability.

Haldir turned and favored the elf hero with a frown as he drew abreast of him.

"Here, chook, have a nice ginger toffee,” said Vi, handing him a small square of candy in a waxed paper wrapper.

“Where did you find candy out here?” Ori asked.

“Peddler feller down th’ path,” said Margr as her wagon drew up beside them.

“You ran into a stranger, leagues from nowhere, and bought candy from him?” Ori asked.

“Where did you get the money?”

“T ook it outa Haldir’s purse,” said Vi. “No’ t’ worry.”

Needless to say, Ori did worry. Thus far, elf and dwarf had been getting on perfectly, and he wanted to keep it that way.

Haldir checked his hip and withdrew his purse. He stared down at it, puzzled.

“I did have some small coin in my purse, but I don’t recall having this much,” he said.

“Yeh didn’t, laddie,” said Dain as Chopper trotted back to walk with them. ‘Th’ ladies emptied it, an’ I refilled it with a little extra.”

“Why?” Haldir demanded.

“I’d say ye earned it,” said Dain.

Haldir’s face turned a livid gray. His voice shook with rage.

“I am no mercenary! I do my duty as I have sworn!”

“It’s no’ pay fer soldierin’, our Diry,” said Dain.

“Then, what, precisely is it, your majesty?”

“It’s a wee pressie f’r bein’ such a good sport.”

“And what, pray tell, is ‘a good sport’?”

“Someone who don’t slit yer throat while ye sleep, even when ye’ve been a right pain in th’ arse.”

Haldir went from anger to horror in a breath.

“I can’t imagine an elf who would do such a thing!”

“I know several dwarrow who would,” Dain countered. “Go have yerself a pint on us.”

“I could have many pints on such a sum!”

“Yours t’ use as ye will.”

Haldir looked at Dain, then the purse. He sat at on Albarcas, silent, as the others traveled on in companionable silence.

Finally, at length, Haldir looked up and around at them, a wicked gleam came into his eye. He smiled a feral smile.

“Perhaps there’s even enough for a new pair of dress trousers.”

Everyone stared at him, and he shrugged, looking quite pleased with himself.

They all laughed, as much in surprise as mirth.

Vi patted his arm.

“There ye go, love, mebbe with some nice gold pipin’ along the sides.”

They stopped for an early tea in a pleasant glade. Ori was getting excited, they would spent the night at Cemnesta’s then repack and leave for Erebor! They lunched on bread, spread with Beorn’s good butter and Kili heated sausages to have with it. Tharkûn ate seven of these, then remounted Shadowfax and appeared to go to sleep.

They continued on their way and as the shadow deepened into the last of the sunset, lights appeared and singing followed. Omosuil and some of his soldiers rode forward calling to their kin.

Soon the path widened further and there in a large courtyard stood King Cemnesta, his face wreathed in a smile. The new king seemed to prefer the plain white robes of the healer, though he tied it with a silver corded belt and a circlet of mithril rested on his brow, adored with a single star gem. Behind him Thranduil awaited, regally amused and clad in sumptuous velvet robes of primrose embroidered with peridots.

“Welcome back,” Cemnesta called and hurried forward before Ori even dismounted.

“Your majesty,’ Ori greeted Cemnesta as the king reached him.

The elf king looked him over, gently feeling his pulse then smoothing a hand across his forehead.

“You looked well, Lord Ori. I’m glad.”

“And you look happily monochromatic. Is the foliage relieved?”

“Indeed, I can hear it sighing in relief. How do you feel?”

“I’m fine. A little hungry, but fine.” Ori grinned.

Cemnesta went to Dwalin next, who grunted, smiled and said, “Guid. Rested.”

“I like a dwarf who doesn’t mince words,” said Cemnesta cheerfully.

Thranduil wordlessly embraced Legolas, then turned, hesitating, to Gimli.

Cemnesta elbowed Thranduil in the ribs and cleared his throat.

Thranduil knelt and embraced Gimli as well.

Gimli cleared his throat and said, very politely, in sindarin, “Hannon le, ada.”

Ori said to Dwalin, “Well, that’s miraculous.”

“Ah well,” Sculdis commented. “If our Gimmers’s marryin’ tha’ Legs, our Thranduil’ll have to broaden his horizons.”

“Seein’ as he’s in our Bard’s britches,” Dwalin muttered, “Bit broader than yeh’d expect.”

The bonebreakers alit in a flock all over wagons and surrounding trees.

Ori opened his mouth to introduce them, but screams of terror cut him off.

Several of the elves, who had joined Cemnesta in the courtyard stumbled backwards in terror.

“What is it?” Cemnesta asked them. “You know you are safe here.”

One of the elves shrieked, “She tore my face off!”

“Pardon?” Cemnesta asked.

Red Queen huffed impatiently.

“Because you were an uruk, silly elf nestling. No point in doing it, now.”

Cemnesta looked between the two and ventured, “You’ve met.”

“Mmm,” said Red Queen, still eying the remade elf.

Ori saw his opening and took it.

“King Cemnesta of the Greenwood, may I present Red Queen, High Queen of All Bonebreakers.”

“An honor, your majesty,” said Cemnesta, bowing.

She deigned to nod in acknowledgement.

Thranduil drifted forward and Ori added,

“King Father Thranduil Oropherion; her majesty, Red Queen of Bonebreakers.”

Red Queen and Thranduil acknowledged each other.

“You have a charming, nestling,” Red Queen cooed.

“Yes, I do, your majesty,” Thranduil smiled at Cemnesta. “Almost as charming as myself.”

Red Queen cackled and Cemnesta blithely continued.

“As we have had word of your arrival, a banquet of bones has been prepared for your people in the south courtyard. I’ll have my steward escort you.”

“No need,” said Red Queen “We can smell it. Our thanks, Greenwood king.”

The flock flapped off at a royal screech from Red Queen, who simply alit before Cemnesta.

“If you will be so kind as to show us our accommodations for the night.”

Cemnesta didn’t even blink.

“Of course, your majesty.”

Apparently the trees were fine for lesser bonebreakers. Or, maybe she was milking this for all she was worth.

Thranduil stepped forward.

“Do allow me, ma’am, I’m sure we have much to discuss.”

“I’m sure we do!” Red Queen took a leaf out of Kelli and the elves’ book and laid the tips of one of her wing feathers on Thranduil’s arm and they strolled off together.

“An interesting outcome,” Tharkûn commented.

“Well, that’s you arse deep in the shit,” Dain observed to Cemnesta, who snorted to cover his chuckle.

“Indeed, it appears so, mellon Dain.”

Cemnesta led them to the same rooms as their first night of the Quest. Cemnesta, with a mischievous smile, opened the door of Dain and Scudis’ room and Dain roared out,

“Me hat!”

Everyone laughed as Dain excitedly dragged the carapace out and balanced it on his head. It was ridiculously huge and wearing it, his head couldn’t be seen. It wobbled precariously.

“Bugger!” Dain observed. “I’m going t’ have t’ find a way t’ keep this thin’ on.”

“Hammer ‘n nails,” Dwalin suggested.

“Nah, if there was rain, it’d leak ‘round th’ nail holes,” Dain muttered, absorbed in his new project.

Everyone was able to wash up and change. Dain gave his ablutions a lick and a promise, then sat on the floor in the middle of the main room, busy with his ‘hat’.
The same elf maid as before arrived to escort them to dinner. She bowed.
“Lord Ori,” she said in a high, breathy voice. “May I take this moment to welcome you back to the Greenwood and congratulate you on your successful adventure?”

“Thank you, …er?”
“Maithuen,” she supplied, a little shyly.
“Thank you, Miss Maithuen. It’s very nice to be back.”
“What a terrifying explosion that was,” Maithuen went on. “We were all very shocked when the ground shook and the sky darkened.”
Ori grinned. “Not quite as shocked as we were being in the middle of it.”
“How horrible for all of you,” Maithuen commiserated, her brown eyes, wide. “I’m am deeply relieved you are all safe. Did you find what you went on your quest for?”
“We did, lassie,” Dain assured her. “An’ our Gladdy had herself quite a time.”
“The great Lady Galadriel accompanied you into that dreadful mountain?” Maithuen was astonished. “How intrepid she is and so majestic.”
“We were very glad she was there to help us,” Ori told her as she led them into the banqueting chamber and bowed to her king.

The room was just as beautiful as he remembered. Ori grinned at Cemnesta, who smiled and nodded to the table. Everyone piled forward. Cemnesta’s only sop to formality was to place Ori on his right with Dwalin and Thranduil at the foot with Red Queen on Thranduil’s right. Red Queen perched proudly on the cushion placed on the chair seat for her comfort. She glanced up and saw Ori looking at her.

“We decided that it was time for us to become accustomed to social interactions between many races, as dear Father King tells me Erebor is very diverse among its traders. He thinks I shall enjoy moving among its many peoples.”

“Father King is very wise,” Ori said, crinkling his nose at Thranduil, who was enjoying himself a little too much. Ori smiled at the Father King. “I’m sure you will soon be very well acquainted with King Bard of Dale. I’m sure Father King has told you all about his courtship with King Bard.”

Red Queen raised her long neck and stared at Thranduil.

“Why, no, he did not. How delightful, a new clutch of eggs is always pleasing. Are your courtship rituals and dances public?”

There was smothered snickering all round the table. Fortunately for Thranduil, the meal was served and Red Queen diverted by the sight of food.

The dinner was simple and excellent. Rabbit meat in a spicy sauce, roasted roots and nuts drizzled in maple syrup, and steamed wild rice. Red Queen was provided by Thranduil with a large spoon. She wielded this elegantly with her left leg and Thranduil and Sculdis on Thranduil’s left, kept the queen occupied. Everyone else chattered and laughed throughout the meal.

For dessert, fresh berries and cream in bowls were set before each. Cemnesta smiled to Ori.

“I thought simple and a good deal would be best.”

“Tasty,” Dwalin said with a smile. “By th’ way, lad, we’ll need t’ borrow Omosuil’s courtyard a bi’ la’er. Somone’s go’ t’ pass their initiation.” Dwalin looked down the table at Gimli who blushed, but managed a look of calm. Omosul and his soldiers looked around at each other then, “I hope you will allow us to accompany you to Erebor, Lord Ori,” Omosuil with great care. “I don’t feel the time is quite arrived for you and Captain Dwalin to dismiss us from our duty to you.”

Ori swallowed. He had forgotten that this was where Omosuil and his squad had joined them. Dwalin and Cemnesta burst out laughing.

“Oho!” Dwalin said, grinning at Cemnesta. “Someone’s wan’in’ t’ see this ‘dvventure t’ a close,”

“So it would seem,” The king replied with twinkling eyes at the elf captain. “We shall see. In the meantime, Omosuil, please see to it that your …er… courtyard is prepared as our Captain Dwalin wishes.”

“I shall make it so, your majesty,” Omosuil promised, his squad all nodding.

“After you finish…whatever you need to do,” Cemnesta went on. “Please take time to rest. At midnight, we shall rouse you and escort you to the ship wanting to take you all back to Dale and Erebor. Father and I shall be accompanying you. Thus, we shall arrive at the dawn of the day of the full moon as you planned."

This brought on a round of cheers, as Cemnesta was popular with the Company and in Erebor and Dale.

“We will get your wagons back,” Ori put in quickly. “I’m afraid we had to …er… adapt one with another of Lady Galadriel’s to carry the doors of Narvi and Celebrimbor.”

Cenesta laughed.

“I’m sure you will, Lord Ori. There is no cause to rush. I do not often suffer a dearth of wagons.”

After dinner, Ori spoke a little with Cemnesta. The king had strolled with Ori out to a solitary balcony and once comfortably seated, Cemnesta asked for the tale of Ori’s time in the Halls.

“I admit,” Ori said slowly, unready to speak with any on the subject other than Dwalin. “Finding myself in the Halls of my ancestors was far stranger than anything I’ve ever had happen to me.”

“You speak of a feeling of unease, which is natural in your circumstance, I certainly would be shocked. Your Halls sound beautiful and your meeting with late family, pleasurable. I sense that something still troubles you.”

Ori sighed and related the incident with Rikmha.

Cemnesta listened with great attention. When he finished, Ori looked up at the king.

“Do you think me a fool?”

“No, I don’t. Not many of us have the chance to speak to those long past. The undying lands are not the same. We do not find out all. You found out, though by accident, what had happened to Dori and, your love for them, demanded that you confront your mother. I suspect that your elder brothers perhaps shielded you from her less than honorable side. I do not think you have anything to concern you further. As you have told me, Aüle…Mahal told you that He had already ‘made’ for Dori. Unless you think it needs to become your next quest to find her and interfere—”

“Oh no,” Ori assured him.

“Then it is not really your affair. She is now given to some dwarrowdam and will be born in…I forget the length of pregnancy in dwarrow…?”

“About six months,” Ori told him.

“Thank you. In six months, she shall be born. Unless you intend to track every female badger born around that time?”

Ori laughed.

“You’re right. I suppose I am being silly about it. But it was just so…. ” Ori search for the word. “Maybe disturbing, is the best way I can describe it.”

“Would it make you feel better to speak to your Dori?”

Ori mulled this over. “I’m not sure. I’ll have to consider it.”

Cemnesta rose and offered his hand to Ori.

“Then put it to the back of your mind for now. Shall we go and see what it is that your Dwalin has in mind for young Gimli? I have to admit I am rather curious myself.”

Cemnesta and Ori entered Omosuil’s courtyard. It had been cleared and rather a lot of people were gathered, shouting and cheering. Cemnesta and Ori crossed to Dwalin who was stripped to his kilt, leaning on his hammer, next to him stood Haldir and Omosuil. Thranduil and Red Queen lounged comfortably on an upholstered chair nearby.

“Dwalin?” Ori said, approaching his husband.

“There yeh are, love,” said Dwalin, nodding to Cemnesta and pulling Ori under his arm to kiss him. “Have a good chat?”

“Yes,” said Ori absently. He took in the scene before him.

In full armor, Gimli stood alone in the center of a large ring of armored dwarf and elf warriors, his axe at the ready. Ori recognized Kili and Tauriel with their bows, King Thranduil’s dwarf guard, Eowyn, Nomirliel, even Lady Galadriel with her crowbar.

Without warning, Torq who had been behind Gimli, rushed forward, his own axe high over his head, but Gimli spun and deflected the blow, and Cemnesta’s practice ring rang with the sound of live steel. The pair battled at full strength, the dwarf warriors in the circle calling encouragement and ridicule toward one or the other.

“Oi! Torq! Yeh kin do be’er’n tha’!” shouted Targ
“Yeh goin’ t’ let th’ pebble’s wipe th’ ground wi’ yeh?”
“Wee Gloiniul’s s’ tiny, he kin barely hold up tha’ axe. Nothin’ t’ his ol’ da, is he!” Dain teased
“So they’re really trying to kill him?” Ori asked.
“No’ really tryin’, love, though a’ course it migh’ happen.”

Ori watched the fight, his stomach tightening with fear. The warriors fought dead silent, only the grins on their faces spoke of their enjoyment. They panted, circling each other, looking for an opening, and Gimli found it. He hooked the older warrior’s ankle with his boot and dropped him.

Gimli held his axe to the Torq’s throat.

“Yer dead.”
“Aye, bu’ they ain’t!”

Torq rolled away, and Spar and Varil took his place. Now Gimli was pressed by both at once and the shouting from the circle rose to double itself.

“He has to think on his feet, and plan for either opponent,” said Ori.
“Aye, yeh go’ it.”
“Are elves usually involved?”
Dwalin chuckled with Omosuil. Cemnesta smiled and even Haldir looked amused.
“No’ usually, love, but then, we been t’ battle t’gether. In this case, I’m sayin’ a warrior’s a warrior.”
“Um… Dwalin?”
“Aye, yeh kin draw it. It’s no’ a secret.”
“Thank you!”

Ori sat on a bench nearby and pulled out his sketch book and graphite wands, finally grinning himself. When he looked up again, he froze. Legolas stood high in a tree across the way, watching and visibly trying not to wince.

Gimli took a backhand to the head, which didn’t seem to faze him at all. Nomirliel looked surprised, which was when Gimli took her down.

“Aye,” Dwalin commented, “our Gimli’s go’ th’ Durin skull.”
No sooner had Gimli dispatched her when he dodged both Tauriel’s arrows and even broke Kili’s, smacking it aside with his axe as it sped toward his chest.

“Excellent,” Haldir allowed, nodding. “That is not the least of skills a warrior may have.”

Eowyn fell upon Gimli next, brandishing her sword, and Ori saw how highly trained a warrior she really was.

“She’s sparred wi’ dwarrow before,” Dwalin observed to Omosuil.
“Lady Galadriel did say she rode as security for trader caravans,” the elf replied.
Dwalin shook his head.

“Dwarf caravans are guarded by dwarrow. It’s rare to find a dwarf sell-sword among caravans of men or elves.”
“Unless they’re with the circus,” Ori said, drawing at a furious pace.
Then he seemed to realize what he said, and looked up to find Eowyn’s movements were very familiar.

Though, the last time Ori had seen them, young Floris had been pretending to slay her warg.
Dwalin chuckled.

“As long’s our Eowyn don’ announce she’ll smite our Gimmers an’ expect he’l roll over wi’ his tongue hangin’ ou’.”
“He only does that for Legolas,” Ori muttered, then looked up, eyes huge, and slapped his hand over his mouth.

Thranduil’s eyebrow seemed bent on flying from his brow, and Cemnesta didn’t even bother to stifle a laugh. Worse then that, Ori knew Legolas had heard him, because the elf’s face and hair threw each other into violent relief.

“Sorry,” Ori squeaked, and turned back to his drawing, looking up to note movements, gestures, and expressions.

Despite their differing styles, they were evenly matched. She was quick, agile, he was methodical and determined. As they chased each other around every inch of the circle, Ori felt like he was watching two highly competitive siblings. This was confirmed when Gimli obviously let her duck around him and she smacked his rump with the flat of her sword. He howled like a badger.

“Oi! Tha’ hur’ me pride, lass!”

“Is that what dwarrow call it?” she teased back. “I’m calling this a draw, before I break a sweat.”

“Oooh! Tha’ stings!” Targ howled.

“G’wan wi’ yeh,” Gimli called back. “I’ll let yeh off easy this time.”

He barely had a moment to turn before Dain and Sculdis charged him from either side. Ori almost choked with laughter as it was immediately obvious Gimli had been taking lessons from Legolas. Instead of trying to engage either, Gimli leapt up and flipped himself out of harms way. Everyone winced as the Iron Hill rulers collided headlong. The crash rang against the walls and the two bellowing dwarrow rolled in the dust. They sat up and looked at each other, confused. Everyone burst out laughing. Dain turned to Gimli, then his gaze traveled up to the tree where Legolas perched.

“Yeh wee shit!” Dain roared at the elf. “Jus’ go’ teachin’ him yer sneaky elf way, why don’ yeh!”

“Sorry, not sorry!” Legolas replied merrily

Sculdis fell back shrieking with laughter.

“Our Gimmers, yeh wee scamp. I’m lettin’ yeh have this one f’r sure. I can’t figh’, laughin’ this hard ’r I’ll pee mesel’!”

Dain helped his hysterically giggling, delicate jewel of a bride to her feet. She shoved her weapons at him and ran out, grabbing an elf on the way to ‘show her th’ bog’.

The circle recovered itself and started teasing Gimli again.

“Think he’ll ever be able to fight more than other badgers?”

“Aye, well, give ‘im a century ’r so, mebbe.”

A bolt of blue lightning smacked the ground at Gimli’s feet and threw stones and dirt in the air. He hopped away smartly, then whirled and crouched to face his next opponent.

A shiver ran through the circle, as Lady Galadriel glided forward. She wore a tiny smile, shiny armor and an air of danger. The Lady held her crowbar in her left hand and fire in her right, and she was obviously ambidextrous.

Gimli, wisely, played to her left side, since that was the weapon less likely to smite him or turn him into anything unnatural.

Ori expected Gimli would keep his distance, at least, but the warrior did exactly the opposite, moving closer and closer even as he dodged great balls of fire.

“Goodness gracious,” said Lady Galadriel. “Am I dead?”

“Nonsense! It was handsomely done!”

She straightened, and as she did, three strands of her hair nicked by Gimli’s knife floated to the ground.

The babble of sindarin rose from consternation to panic.

Gimli’s jaw fell open and he bowed, sputtering.
“A thousan’ pardons, milady. I wouldn’t willingly harm a hair on yer heed, an’ here I’ve clumsily murdered three of ‘em!”

He reached to pick them out, but he didn’t quite touch them, torn between apology and embarrassment.

“It’s only hair, mellon Gimli,” Galadriel said, fetching them up herself.

“Bu’, yeh see, milady, I hold yer hair as sacred as a dwarf’s.”

She smiled on him.

“Sweet-speaking and deadly, too. If my locks are so precious to you, you may have these three to do with what you wish.”

The sindarin, if anything, grew increasingly frantic. She looked around at her fellow elves and laughed.

“It is my own to give as I will, and I choose to give it to my worthy opponent, and my good friend and comrade.”

Gimli and Galadriel bowed to one another and Gimli handed her back her crowbar.

“Thank yeh, milady. I will encase these in crystal, an’ keep ‘em as an heirloom a’ me house.”

She retired from the field, but Gimli’s initiation was not over. He was given a moment to braid the three strands together and tuck them away, as if they were a lady’s favor in a tournament.

Ori realized Gimli had no knowledge of the significance of the three strands of Galadriel’s hair. Nor did Ori know if it was wise to enlighten him. Certainly, Ori thought him worthy of the honor and chuckled at this subtle fashion of Galadriel cocking a snoot at Fëanor somewhere in the ether.

Still Gimli circled, waiting for whatever came next.

What came next, at full roar and fury, was Dwalin, who was about to find out if he truly taught Gimli everything he knew.

Gimli’s eyes narrowed and his mouth set.

Startled, because Gimli looked so unlike himself, Ori forgot to draw for a moment.

Then he got distracted by the ripples of Dwalin’s muscles, and the flash of his butt when his kilt flew upward.

The axes rang, several dwarrow swore creatively, Legolas caught a horrified breath, but Ori’s attention was entirely fixated on something less than sharp, but certainly just as interesting. He shook himself, trying to concentrate on mayhem, even concentrating on grimacing faces for as long as he could.

It wasn’t all that long a time, as it turned out.

Axes were cast aside for knives. These were cast aside for hand-to-hand combat. Gimli was shorter, but he was one solid muscle. Dwalin was older, but far more experienced. They spat and swore and threw dust in each other’s faces, eventually reduced to mutual beard-pulling, though neither would submit. All too soon they rolled across the ground, wrestling like a couple of badgers, yelling names and curse words around grunts and heaving breath.

“Really?” Thranduil mused. “What’s next? Thumb wrestling?”

A shadow fell over Ori’s sketch book.

“Nicely done,” said Cemnesta, “but aren’t you supposed to draw more of him than that?”

“Huh?”

Ori looked down at his pages and groaned.

Two entire facing pages filled with Dwalin’s arse cheeks.

Yes, they were expertly rendered, but it was still mortifying.

“Enough a’ this shit,” Dwalin barked.

Ori looked up.

The two dwarf warriors sat on the ground, grinning at one another.

“Tha’ do, captain?” Gimli asked, panting.

“Aye, it’ll suffice,” Dwalin replied.

The circle erupted into cheers and battlecries.

Legolas shouted something loud and triumphant, and vaulted from the tree, did three somersaults in the air and landed in the circle between them.
Gimli shook his head and struggled to his feet a moment before Legolas seized him and hugged him.

“Congratulations, meleth nin!”

“Yer goin’ t’ ge’ yer pretty leaves all mussed, elf,” Gimli grumped, but he was still smiling.

“Like I give a fuck,” Legolas growled.

Gimli’s eyebrows flew up and the dwarf laughed, the elves smirked and Cemnesta shook his head.

“I’m a terrible influence, I suppose,” said Gimli.

Dwalin ruffled his hair, then held up a few strands which stood on their own.

“Here, our Legs, take ‘im off t’ th’ baths, see if yeh kin find me enough unsnarled dwarf fur t’ pu’ a braid in.”

The two went off toward the baths, hand in hand, followed by most of Gimli’s other opponents.

Omosuil threw Dwalin a sideways smile.

“Prince Legolas has always enjoyed a challenge.”

“Guid thin’,” said Dwalin. He turned to Ori and smiled.

“I’m f’r th’ baths meself. Wan’ t’ join me?”

Cemnesta snickered.

“By all means, mellon Ori. It will give you opportunity to draw other… aspects of his anatomy.”

While Dwalin cocked a quizzical brow at the elf king, Ori shot Cemnesta a filthy look.

The baths, as it turned out, were communal, the elves having no concept of bodily embarrassment or privacy, Ori reflected, though at least Cemnesta had somehow added heated water to the bathing pools in deference to his non-elven guests.

They eventually reconvened in their rooms and Cemnesta flung open the door of the large room across the hall from theirs. Everyone came in laughing and talking. This room opened out onto a spacious balcony and an elf lady with a harp and another with a flute stood ready. Dain gave a delight shout and went for his doodle sack, dragging Sculdis and Jani with him.

Several barrels of ale had been tapped and bottles of dorwinian wine were set out. Platters of tiny cakes and other sweet dainties enticed and beside them little bite-sized, piping hot azzips with various toppings, and bread slathered in toasted cheese and mustard all served on salvers wrapped in cloths to hold the heat.

Sculdis and Jani came back in with drum and balalaika, followed by Dain fiddling about with his doodle sack.

“This is nice,” said Ori to Cemnesta, looking over the crowd of happy dwarrow and elves, eating and, above all, drinking.

“Yes,” said Thranduil as he swept by with a glass of wine dangling from his elegant hand. “And close enough to the guest rooms to drag off anyone who overindulges.”

“Most convenient,” Red Queen agreed.

Ori thought she must have found some red clay nearby, because her coif was spiffed and even more vivid than before.

“Alas,” said Ori. “We’re not going to be here long enough to be dragged off. Maybe next time.”

A shout rang forth and Legolas and Gimli entered, again hand in hand.

Gimli’s hair was as immaculate, or as immaculate as it could be. It hung loose around him in ringlets.

Ori found himself very glad that Dori wasn’t there at that moment to coo over them.

Dwalin strode forth to stand, arms folded, the other warriors opening the space between he and Gimli.

“Gimli, Son a’ Gloin, Son a’ Groin.”

The dwarf in question stood, calm and solemn, with this face the color of his own hair. He patted Legolas’ forearm.

“Be righ’ back, melleth,” he said, striding forward to face Dwalin. He crossed his arms, too, mirroring Dwalin’s glare.
“Yeh called, captain?”
“A’ leas’ yeh know yer own name. Yeh ready t’ swear yer oath? Yeh have t’ repeat it after me, an’ I’m only doin’ this once, so don’ fuck it up.”
“Understood, Captain Dwalin.”
“Tha’s miracle number two f’r the nigh’.”
Dwalin glanced around. Everyone had made a circle around them, dwarrow in front so they could all see. Ori had his graphite wand and paper in action.
“Gimli, Son a’ Gloin, son a’ Groin, yeh came t’ me trainin’ a wee badger w’ more temper an’ brute force than sense. I’ve seen yeh grow int’ th’ warrior tha’ yeh are now. Yeh’ve proved yersel’ t’ be counted among the High King’s finest. An’ t’day I say yeh worthy a bein’ called a warrior and t’ wear a warrior’s bead to show all who see yeh. C’mere.”
Gimli came closer and Dwalin removed from his pocket a small gold box studded with rubies. He opened this and took out a lapis bead set with a tiny diamond star. Dwalin then turn to Legolas and held out the box to him.
“Better come closer, laddie, as yeh probably gonna be puttin’ this in often enow.”
Both Gimli and Legolas blushed and snide comments were made from various point of the room. It fell back to silence as Dwalin slowly braided a lock of Gimli’s hair and attached the bead. Dwalin gruffly spoke the ancient khuzdul call to arms and Gimli muttered his responses. Dwalin stepped back and looked at Gimli.
Gimli looked back at Dwalin.
Dwalin grinned.
“There’s me lad,” was all he said before Gimli grabbed his captain in a bear hug.
The cheers were deafening.
Trips, Teasing, and Triumph

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. It’s lovely to be home and our Dearest Ori is busy as usual! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori waved back to elves standing on the shore. It was midnight, the moon was all but full and in the strong west wind, the ship moved swiftly out onto the lake. This vessel was much larger than before. Cemnesta explained they needed it to accommodate the additional weight of the doors. Once more Ori went to stand at the prow. Quartz fluttered to alight on the rail. This time Ori was straining his eyes for the sight of Erebor. He could feel it there in the distance in the star and moonlight. Dwalin joined him.

“We’ll see it soon now, love.”
“I know, well my brain knows, but my eyes want to keep looking.”
“How about yeh come an’ bed down f’r a bi’.”
Ori turned and grinned at his husband.
“With you?”
“No, wi’ Honda, she’s lonely f’r yeh.”
Ori laughed “No, she isn’t! She’s over there snuggling up to Harley. What should we name their colt?”
“Tyke? Tryke?” Dwalin suggested with a smirk. “‘R we could see wha' color it come ou’ as.”
“Hmmmm, “ Ori teased. “We could combine their names and call it ‘Harda’ or ‘Honley’?”
“I ain’t yellin’ Harda ’r Honley t’ anythin’ scootin’ around th’ meadow.”
“Scooter?” Ori suggested. Dwalin snickered.
“Aye, if they have ane, we’ll call it ‘Scoo’er’ f’r yeh. Comin’ t’ bed?”
Ori giggled, caught Dwalin’s hand as they walked to the middle deck, picked their way among the Company, all rolled in bedding next to the wagons, to where Dwalin had both their quilts laid out. Ori pulled off his boots and crawled between the quilts, snuggling up to his husband.

Ori woke at the first faint light of dawn. His eyes popped open and he sat up. Quartz hopped forward and tweaked Ori’s ear. The sails were full. Galadriel, Celeborn, Thranduil, and Cemnesta sat in a couple of seats at the stern, talking together quietly. A few elves were tending the rudder and rigging, moving carefully not to disturb the lines of sleeping bonebreakers on the railings. Glorfindel and Tauriel curled around their loves. Ori carefully unwrapped himself from Dwalin, but Dwalin opened his eyes and smiled. They got up, put their boots back on, folded the bedding, and Ori led the way as they headed back to the prow. His heart filled.

There before them towered Erebor. The huge mountain was a dark shadow in the distance. Taller than any in the Misty Mountain chain. Huge and alone, it rose, nestled in the gentle hills and lovely meadows of Dale and the surrounds. Mahal’s own mountain, Ori thought, in the valleys of Yavanna. Ori could see a point of light marking the braziers at the front gate. Little sparks marked the Dale and early morning risers. Ori almost squealed like an excited badger at Yule. He hugged Dwalin hard and kissed Quartz on the top of his head.

“We’re nearly home!” He had to struggle to keep his voice to a whisper. “I feel like we’ve been away forever!”
Dwalin squeezed him and nuzzled his face into Ori’s hair. Quartz snorted, hissing, “You have no idea of distance, Ori.”
“I’ve never been that far away from home, before. My longest journey before was to Bombur and Erda’s inn. Look, it’s getting lighter!”

There were faint waking noises from the company. Then Dain sneezed himself, and everyone else, explosively awake. The elves all giggled amongst themselves.

“We there yet?” Jani shouted.

“Soon,” Ori called back, delighted he could make noise. “I can see Dale and Erebor!”

There was a rush to the prow. Kili, Gimli, and the sisters cheered. Dain swaggered forward, inspected the view, and clapped Ori on the back.

“Best we star’ gettin’ ourselves ready f’r our grand arrival.”

“Dain!” Ori almost shouted. “Are you really going to wear that…that thing as a hat?”

‘Course I am!” Dain grinned maniacally. “An’ we’re all gettin’ back int’ them jumpsui’ thingies! Ain’t we?” Dain bellowed at the Company. Everyone cheered, the elves crewing the boat laughed and Galadriel swept up from the stern, arrayed in her green suit once more.

“Bullies of Lord Ori!” she cried delightedly. “Jumpsuits on!”

The Company scrambled into their suits, laughing and joking. The ponies were readied. Kili, Sculdís, Jani and Eowyn uncovered the doors.

“What am I supposed to wear?” Ori demanded, teasingly. “I don’t have a jumpsuit!”

“I had a new one made for you,” Celeborn called from the stern, hurling a parcel to Dwalin, who caught it easily. Ori giggled as he and Dwalin dressed and armed themselves.

“Right, love,” Dwalin grinned, holding Durin’s axe at the ready.

“How, in all Arda, do I carry that?” Ori asked.

“Go’ yeh a harness,” Dwalin answered cheerfully. He slung the belts around Ori, securing the great axe to Ori’s back. Dwalin and a giggling Jani had to help Ori get on Honda. The crew got the gangplank ready. Ori could now see in the light of the slowly awakening morning, distant tiny people were gathering at the Dale dock. He saw silvery sparkles of armor from Erebor. Standards were raised. Small boats were launched.

Under full sail, now with lanyards of the green pennants of Erys Lasgalen and Lothlórien raised to trim all the stays and rigging, the huge ship glided closer.

Little sailing boats whirled to the side of the ship. Ori grinned at the occupants, who either stared open mouthed at them or called welcome. The crew let out more rigging line, letting the sails flap, lessening the speed. They drifted up to the dock.

Ori got Honda to stand at the head of the Company. The axe was heavy and Quartz perched at the top of the axe, preening.

“Wanting to look good for Garnet?” Ori teased.

“Yep!”

Dwalin sat on Harley a little behind them. Everyone was placing themselves and snickering. Red Queen landed beside Honda and looked Ori over, while all the other bonebreakers alit along the railings and masts. Ori had a flash of an idea.

“Red Queen, the doors of Narvi and Celebrimbor are from your old aerie, would you like to present them to King Thorin?”

Red Queen’s eye twinkled. “Indeed, and the wagon will be far more comfortable for our flock to perch upon. We approve.”

She squawked and the bonebreakers swarmed all over the wagon after Glorfindel, Omosuil and some of his squad hurriedly covered the doors again. Ori grinned, it was going to be a surprise after all.

In the forefront of the huge crowd on shore, Ori saw Thorin, Bilbo, Dis, and Fili, mounted on their ponies, waiting for them where the docks and great pier met the port buildings of Dale. A wide space had been left for the Company to present themselves to their king. Bard and the Bardlings stood with the Erebor royal family. Dori’s teacup arrived to rampant cheering. Ori waved as he saw Dori and Balin rise in the coach to alight. He heard Dori’s shriek of delight. The Groinuls arrived next, Gloin standing up in the coach, bellowing.

The ship slid up to the dock, where crowds of waiting arms readily caught the painters being thrown. The ship was tied up, the hawser set to hold the ship fast, the crew removed the side gunnel and the gangplank was settled into place.

Ori glanced back, Dwalin grinned.

“Let’s go to Thorin,” Ori murmured to Honda. Honda set out briskly, her hooves navigating the gangplank deftly, Dwalin on Harley behind. Ori kept his eyes on Thorin, but he felt his cheeks burning and he couldn’t stop grinning. People of Dale and Erebor oooh-ed and aaah-ed, cheered, or stood stock, still staring. Thorin looked serene but for a cocked eyebrow. A very amused Bilbo stood next to him. Frodo and Sam each clenched one of Bilbo’s hands and bounced in excitement.

Ori rode up and, with Dwalin’s help, dismounted. Dwalin removed the axe from the belt on Ori back and handed it to Ori. Silence fell. Ori went forward and formally knelt before Thorin. Ori raised his voice,

“We have succeeded in our quest, your majesty King Thorin, and I offer your majesty the Axe of Durin the Deathless.”

There was a collective gasp from the crowd. Thorin wordlessly took the proffered axe and looked it over, awed. He looked back at Ori and smiled.

“Lord Ori, I am pleased at the triumphal return of you and your company, and welcome you with great joy. For the service you have done to all dwarrow, I give you Durin the Deathless’ axe to carrying from now on, that all shall see and know that you are deeply honored by us. Welcome home, Lord Ori of Fundin House, Scribe to the High King of All Dwarrow. Rise and let me greet you.”

Ori got to his feet. Thorin came and embraced him.

“I’m so glad you’re safe,” Thorin said in his ear.

“I’m so relieved,” Ori murmured back. “Oh, Thorin, I’ve so much to tell you all!”

Thorin released him with a grin. “You’ll be telling us all when we get home. Now, for Mahal’s sake, go to Dori.”

Ori giggled and turned. Dori was right there and wrapped him in a cloud of gold and sapphires.

“Oh, my badger! I’ve been so worried! My precious badgerling!”

Dori burst into tears. Ori was vaguely aware of Dwalin embracing his king, then Balin.

Bilbo kissed Ori’s cheek over Dori’s arm.

“Ori, I want all the juicy details! Nice outfit.”

Ori felt Frodo and Sam hugging him. Gridr and Binni also kissed his head and Gloin and Oin shouted their welcome.

“Dori,” Ori managed around a face full of silk and hair. “Please don’t cry. I’m fine and I have to show Thorin the stuff I brought.”

Dori yanked him out to arm’s length, staring at him.

“Stuff? What stuff are you talking about? The box is here.”

Ori winked rudely and turned back to the ship and waved to his Company. Celeborn, Haldir with their soldiers, Cemmesta on horseback, with Thranduil surrounded by Targ, Spar, Varil, and Torq rode down the gangplank, came forward, dismounted and were politely greeted by Thorin. Then the Company came; Jani came first on her pony. She was followed by Glorfindel on his horse and Margr in his lap, Vi driving a wagon. Kili, Tauriel, Gimli, and Legolas were next with their wagon, piled high with gifts from Beorn on top. Dain on Chopper with his enormous hat, jogged down. Somehow Dain had managed to secure his hat to sit at an angle, so he could see and wave to people. Galadriel, Eowyn, and Sculdis came last with what looked like a wagon load of bonebreakers, all surrounded by Omosuil and his squad in their gray gear. Red Queen perched proudly next to Sculdis, nodding to the crowd regally.

Ori went to Thorin’s side as everything came to a stop in front of the royals of Erebor and all had dismounted. Everyone in the Company grinned at Thorin.

“Ori, what is all this…stuff?” Thorin gasped. “What, in Mahal’s name, is on Dain’s head?”

Ori grinned. Dwalin stepped in, winking at Ori.
“Yer majesty, King Thorin, we, Lord Ori an’ his Bullies, return t’ yeh.”
“Lord Ori and his…bullies,” Thorin managed, torn between shock and laughter.
“Professional bullies,” Dwalin corrected and turned to the Company.
“Lord Ori’s Bullies, Iron’ an’ cens’er.”
The Company, Lady Galadriel, Lady Eowyn, and Omosuil and his squad came into a close group and bowed. Thorin choked, then mastered himself.
“Bullies…of Lord Ori, I thank you all for your brave service and….and triumphal return.”
“You are quite welcome.” Lady Galadriel came forward, drawing Eowyn by the hand. “May I present my ward, Eowyn, niece of King Theoden, the White Lady of Rohan.”
Eowyn curtsied before Thorin, her eyes sparkling with laughter.
“You are welcome, Lady Eowyn, ward of Galadriel, niece of Theoden,” Thorin replied and held out his arms to her. She knelt, so Thorin could embrace her, shaking his head as he released her.
“Need I write to your uncle to inform him of your arrival?”
“Oh no,” she replied cheerfully, rising. “My dear Aunt Galadriel has already informed him of her intention to chaperone me on our travels to Dale and Erebor.”
“Oh how nice!” Dori cried. “Bard, dear, come and meet dear Lady Eowyn, such a charming girl. Sigrid, my love, come and meet your cousin!”
Sigrid and Eowyn looked at each other, giggled hysterically, and hugged each other.
“Sibling! Cousins!” bellowed Dain.
“Dain!” Dori all but screamed. “Take that disgusting spider thing off your head this instant! Your hair could get a disease or your head will wither and fall off!”
Dain swept Dori up with a noisy kiss.
“Now, now, me dumplin’. Hairless or headless, I kin still manage all me doin’s. Jus’ ask me delicate jewel o’ a bride. Don’t getcher self in a fuss.”
Ori nodded to Sculdís and Red Queen flew up to him.
“Your majesty, High King Thorin of all Dwarrow,” Ori announced. “It is my honor to introduce you to her majesty Red Queen of all Bonebreakers. Ma’am, this is my king, Thorin Oakenshield.”
Red Queen was only a head shorter than Thorin. She strutted forward, swept her wings open and bowed. Thorin mimicked the sweep and bowed as low as the Queen.
There was a flutter of wings. Thorin said, “Your majesty, may I present Roäc, King of Ravens of Erebor.”
Roäc bristled and hissed out,
“We’ve met.”
“Roäc! Dear!” said Red Queen, dripping poison sugar. “We have wonderful news for you. Though, it will keep.”
“You’re being deposed?” Roäc asked archly.
“No such luck.”
“Sister Queen,” Thorin broke in quickly. “I am delighted and honored to welcome you to Erebor,” Thorin smiled. Red Queen opened her beak in a version of a smile.
“Brother King, Your Ori has rendered our people great service by ridding us of the uruks, who shook our eggs and killed our people. We have chosen to accompany him here. At his request, we gift you with…these!”
Red Queen in the full enjoyment of her presentation, gave a great wave of her wing at the largest wagon. All the bonebreakers took flight, taking the coverings with them. The doors of Narvi and Celebrimbor shimmered and glinted in the dawn light. Everyone gasped.
Balin went forward to climb on the wheel of the wagon and stare.
“Wee brother…” Balin turned to gape at Ori. “Wha’ in all-”
“Those are the west entry doors of Khazad-dûm,” Ori announced gleefully. “They were created by the affiliation of Narvi of Khazad-dûm and Celebrimbor of the Noldur of Eregion.”
“We hope they fit.” Red Queen added, proudly.
“Gimli! Gimli! Lad, yeh made it!” Gloin bellowed, sweeping his son into a hug fit for a snow bear. “And yeh’ve the warrior’s head! Ah, inudoy, I’m fit t’ burst wi’ pride!”
“Da, I can’t breathe,” Gimli rasped. Gridr hugged Gimli as well, not quite dry-eyed. “Yer all grown up now! Why, it was only yesterday yeh was a tiny pebble.” She turned to Legolas. “Yeh’ve come through alright, pet?” she asked. He knelt down to embrace her. She squeezed him and patted his hair. “But yeh haven’t been eatin’ properly, neither o’ yeh! Yer so thin, pet!” “We’re fine, mam,” said Legolas, choking a little as Gloin knocked his brow against Legolas’. “Gimli and I took good care of each other.”

Tauriel coughed but was otherwise engaged, startled to be greeted by both Dis and Thorin. Kili was hugging Fili, the pair talking at speed. King Bard, red-faced, and to the delight of his people, kissed Thranduil. The bardlings swarmed in for hugs, loudly welcoming back their ‘Wicked Stepmother’. Tilda was delighted with Red Queen, who treated her to a hug and told Bard his nestling was cute. Bain was more interested in greeting Legolas and pelting him with questions. The royals chatted and embraced and the crowds cheered and surrounded the largest wagon gapin at the enormous doors lying within. Ori grinned, watching at celebrations. His heart was full. Despite the excitement, Ori could feel tiredness creeping up on him. He knew exactly what to do. “Ori’s Dori?” “Pet,” Dori swept him close again. “You look tired.” “I am tired,” Ori admitted, then grinned. “Ori’s Dori!” “Yes, my dearest badgerling?” “I’m hungry.”

In a remarkably short time the returning heroes, the royals of three kingdoms, and the luggage were marshaled into a long parade to Erebor. The bells of Dale rang out. The populous lined the streets and followed, cheering and singing. The bonebreakers rode on the biggest wagon again and soon enough they entered Erebor.

There was another triumphal march to the royal caverns. The entire household and the Guild of Scribes turned out to greet them. Mistress Dazla stood at the front, squealing like a damling. “Our Lord Ori! Yer home at last! Ooo, I’m going to give you a hug!” Ori scrambled off Honda “Please do, Mistress Dazla,” said Ori. “Kili’s cooking was very good, but I admit, I missed your apple crisp with cream.” “Oh, well, we can fix that right quick, can’t we. Get yourself settled and I’ll see about popping a batch in the oven!” “You’re very good to me.” “What’s not to be good to, I ask you?” And she hugged him again then allowed him to be welcomed and congratulated by the household. The guild chairs beamed on him as he exchanged pleasantries with them while the journeymen and apprentices looked on in awe. Ori blushed, remembering that not only was he the youngest first chair in Erebor’s history, but the only one to achieve it before his mastery. And now he had gone on a quest, returned with a treasure of dwarrow history, and bearing the Axe of the First Ancestor. He had never before thought of himself as a disgusting over-achiever.

When he was finally able to turn back Honda, he found that all the luggage and pack were being disposed of. Dwalin helped him out of the harnesses and Ori gave over the axe to Balin, who carried it reverently indoors. Ori sighed with relief as Gib pulled open the stable door and Ori led Honda inside. Ori, with the stablehands’ help relieved Honda of her tack then rubbed her down. Ori opened the back door and let her out to the meadow. Honda bounced off with a squeal. Ori squealed. There, in the middle of the meadow, stood Fanny.
Bath Time, Brunch Time, and Babble Time.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Home at last! Ori’s relieved and Dori is on a caring tear! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“Fanny!” Ori yelled and rushed to the oliphaunt, who trumpeted joyfully and bounded toward him. Ori flung himself at her. Fanny caught him with her trunk and lifted him high then brought him close against her cheek. Ori spread his arms wide and hugged as much of her as he could.

“Oh Fanny, I’m so glad you’re back. I’ve missed you! I can’t wait to tell you about my adventures and hear all about yours!”

After a long hug, Fanny set him back on the ground and Ori stood back. His friend had grown considerably. Her tusks had thickened and lengthened and she seemed a little taller and a good deal plumper. Ori stood next to her leg and looked up. Yes, she had grown at least a foot taller. He reached up to touch her tusks. Fanny brought her head down, so he could span all six with his hands, they had all grown.

“Fanny!” Ori was delighted. “You’re bigger and you’re well-fed, too! This is wonderful!”

The breakfast parlor doors burst open. Frodo and Sam rushed out, shouting, “Surprise! Surprise!”

Sigrid, Omi, and Loli bounced out behind the faunts, dragging Eowyn with them. “Jim and the circus arrived last night!” Sigrid said, laughing. “We were all at sixes and sevens. I honestly thought Da’s head would pop off.”

Fanny followed Ori to the patio. Ori and Sigrid hugged each other tight. “Oh, Sigrid, I’ve so much to tell you!”

“I bet you do! Dori told us everything up until they came back on the eagles. Dori’s been a mad thing ever since. Bilbo’s had such a time as Thorin’s been an utter gloom bucket the whole time, worrying.”

“King Thorin, the gloom bucket,” Eowyn observed aside. “You have no idea,” Sigrid turned to her, letting Omi and Loli pounce on Ori. “We have to show you everything we’ve done since you left.” Loli said in one ear. “Bujni and Dipfa are being weirder than usual,” Omi said in his other ear. “Pet, you come in here right now,” Dori ordered.

Ori gave Fanny’s trunk another hug and waved to her as he was hustled inside.

There was a squeal as he came in and Floris and Mavey rushed at him. “There you are!” “Isn’t Fanny big!”

Ori hugged them both and looked Mavey over. She was tanned, pink cheeked, had put on muscle and weight and she was glowing with happiness.

“Fanny looks wonderful,” he told them. “Thank you so much for taking such good care of her.” “I have an act with her!” Mavey bubbled. “I have a teeny pink dress with lots of spangles. I dance and she dances with me and she puts me up on her back and I pose on her head when she stands on her back legs then she puts me on the edge of a big tub of water and I dance around the edge then I jump in then she lifts me out and I twirl while she blows a fountain of water all over us!” Mavey ran out of breath.
“Will you be showing us?” Ori asked eagerly.

“Oh yes,” Floris butted in. “We’re here for a bit, practicing new acts. We’re going to be here to work the night market for a while and then in the Last Harvest Festival. Professor Baggins says that’s a huge thing in the Shire and King Bard and King Thorin like the idea very much, ‘cose all the stuff Mr. Hamfast put in is growing like mad!”

“Come on.”

Sigrid pushed them all toward the sitting room. Ori entered. The sitting room was full. Ori sighed with happiness and went to drop into Dwalin’s lap in a corner of the sofa.

“We did it.”

“Aye, love, we did.”

Ori snuggled his head into Dwalin’s chest as Dwalin kissed the top of his head.

“O! Oriiiiii!”

A blaze of red hair streaked through the room, swept Ori up off his seat and danced him around in circles in the air.

“Nori! Put me down!”

Nori sang, “He’s a he-ro, he’s a he-ro!”

“The hero is going to puke on your head if you don’t put him down!”

“Hah!”

Nori swung him back down and danced him in circles, then abruptly stopped and peered at him closely.

“Heehee! Finally! A proper beard! We was afraid ye’d be stuck wif that puppy chin fluff forever!”

Nori began to yank on it and Ori slapped at him.

“Thank you, Nori,” said Ori dryly, managing to escape. “Any more grey hairs since I’ve been away?”

“Nary a one!” Nori said proudly.

“Because he dyed ‘em all out,” said Bofur, coming over to give Ori a hug.

“Snitch!” Nori muttered.

Bofur hugged Ori.

“Good t’ see ya, Chick. Bin awful quiet around here without ya.”

“Well, you’ve grown!”

Ori whipped around.

His great grandmother appraised him with a mischievous smile. She looked glowingly healthy, and as flamboyantly dressed as Dori ever could be, in a fitted gown of citrus colors with wild billows of ruffles at the cuffs and hem, a matching turban with a flowing train and ropes of gold and silver beads the size of apricots around her neck.

“Granny Klak! You came home!”

They embraced.

“Of course I did, my love! I said I would! Besides, I was out of vinaigrette.”

“Have you really needed your vinaigrette?” he asked her slyly.

She batted her lashes.

“It is good for the digestion.”

Dori then took over.

“Right, now that’s taken care of, you’re late for the bath. And those disgusting clothes are late for the forge chutes. Now, pet, where did you really get that axe?”

“I, um, picked it up in Khazad-dum. I was hoping Thorin might want it. It belonged to Durin.”

“Yeh were fer serious, wee brother?” Balin cried. “Tha’s really th’ firs’ Durin’s Axe?”

“Actually, I’m sure it is,” said Ori. “That’s what he told me, anyway.”

Thorin shook his head.

“Then it’s your axe, though, if you wouldn’t mind, I would like another look at it.”

“Of course. But, Thorin, I do think you should have it. What use have I for it?”

“Considerin’ how many orcs yeh killed with it? I say yeh done due diligence,” said Dwalin.
“Mahal forbid!” Dori cried. “Ori, you promised me you wouldn’t fight orcs!”

“That wasn’t really me!” Ori protested. “My soul was in the Halls while Durin used the axe.”

Dori shrieked and tottered back, hand over heart, while Balin leant support.

Ori lunged forward. “It’s alright, Dori, I wasn’t dead, just visiting!”

“Just visiting! Great, blessed Mahal.”

Ori decided he could say nothing useful and turned back to Thorin. “You’re the king, Thorin. You should have it. I can carry it, but I’d accidentally slay myself trying to swing it on my own.”

“Love,” said Dwalin, “it was th’ first axe yeh laid yer hand on, an’ it was sittin’ there all freshly sharpened f’r yeh, despite it had bin sittin’, molderin’ in th’ dark f’r a century.”

“Durin wouldn’t use a dull axe!” Ori protested.

“He hasn’t needed t’ use one f’re a couple thousand years, love,” said Dwalin. “He didn’t use it now just on a whim.”

Dis said, gently, “Ori, this is not making a great case for giving that axe away.”

Ori sighed.

“What would I do with it?”

“As I said,” Thorin smiled. “Wear it on state occasions. I’d say you’ve earned the right, even if you never slay so much as a slug ever again.”

Ori sighed. He glanced across the room. Thranduil was seated beside the table near Bard, who was talking to Eowyn and the Lórien couple. Thranduil held Gimli’s shoulder in one hand and his other hand was employed in picking flower petals out of Gimli’s hair and brushing gold dust out of it from the parades. Legolas was charmed and Gimli looked remarkably stoic.

Ori said to Sigrid, “Well, that’s miraculous.”

“It is,” she giggled. “Evil stepmother has become very maternal towards us and when Da brings him here, he’s the same with the younger set of the household, even Bujni. Da likes it.”

Tilda piped up.

“Oh, King Thranduil has to do what Da asks now, ‘cause he’s going to be our new mam.”

Legolas stared at his father.

“Really?” he asked, his voice breaking for the first time in almost two thousand years. “You will marry in the way of men, Ada?”

“You think you are the only one who can… broaden his horizons, my son?”

Dwalin muttered, “Bit broader than yeh’d expect.”

Ori huffed at him and said to Bard and Thranduil, “Congratulations! But, see what happens when I go away! Everything!”

“Not to worry,” Bujni announced. “I have logged all events whether large or small in strict date and time order. The wedding was announced precisely three days, sixteen hours and forty minutes ago.”

“How can you know that?” Ori asked, agog.

Bujni opened an extra flap across the front of his black tunic to reveal at least a dozen miniature watches sewn into a spiral on the fabric.

“My precious diamond’s latest creation,” he said proudly. “Only Master Brur says I can’t wear it while I’m at work. Apparently I tick too loudly.”

Dori, recovered, bustled to Ori again.

“Now, pet, dearest Wandi has prepared the bath for you and our deary. Off you both go.”

“Don’t worry, Lord Ori, “ Dipfa was by his side. “Agrib and I are here to take your jumpsuits and have them cleaned.”

Ori grinned.

“Those jumpsuits were quite a surprise, Dipfa.”

“Did they serve your purposes, Lord Ori?” she asked, all but wringing her hands.

“Yeh did excellent work, lass,” Dwalin told her. “Them jumpsuits were good work.”

“Yes,” Ori added. “Lady Galadriel looks wonderful in her green one and, as you see, Lady Eowyn had taken the other one. Your pockets were admired by all.”

Dipfa glowed, then she snatched at Ori’s jumpsuit.
“This isn’t my work! These aren’t my stitches!”
“No,” Ori hastily explained. “My jumpsuit was ruined in a skirmish with some orcs. The elves could mend the rents but they couldn’t get all the blood out. Orc blood,” he added at her horrified look. “They made me a rough copy for the return parade.”
“Oh,” she let go of the material and gave the rough copy an unimpressed once over. “Well, that was kind of them. I shall create another.”

The bathroom smelled wonderful. Mr. Wandi stood in attendance, dressed in a sleeveless white cotton tunic and loose white cotton trousers. He was barefoot and his hair was immaculate.
Jars and bottles crowded the small table. Another, larger table to the other side was piled with enough fluffy towels to dry all of Omosuil’s squad. Steam rose from the tub, which was filled the brim.
“Hair washing first, if you please!” Wandi said imperiously but with an inquiring look in his raised eyebrow.
Ori and Dwalin smiled at each other then came forward. They took a moment to remove each other’s beads and braids. Agrib held the bead box for them.
“And you’re going to have a first soak while I do it.” Wandi added.
“First soak?” Ori giggled. “Dwalin, we’re socks!”
“‘Long as nether a’ us shrinks in the wash, we’ll be alrigh’,” Dwalin teased as he and Ori were swarmed upon by Agrib, Dipfa, and Wandi. The two were stripped and hustled into the water. Ori sighed. This water was better than the bath water in Lórien. This was heated with lava. Agrib and Dipfa left with the clothes and bead box.
“Lord Ori?”
Ori glanced up. Wandi had a large crystal pitcher in his hand. The elf smiled and placed a hand over Ori’s face and poured the comfortably hot water over Ori’s head. Ori looked at Dwalin sitting opposite him in the tub. Water slopped onto the floor. Dwalin snickered.
“Don’t worry, Captain Dwalin,” Wandi cooed. “You’re next.”
Wandi’s hands, filled with creamy gunk, landed on Ori’s head and began to scrub. Ori kept his eyes and mouth closed as foam ran down his face. More water was poured over his head followed by another scrubbing. This was rinsed out and Ori opened his eyes. Wandi looked disgusted.
“I had a bath in Lórien. I’m not that dirty.”
“I wish they’d washed your hair properly,” Wandi snapped. “Look.”
Ori looked. The water had darkened a little.
“Oh.”
“Shall I treat your beard?” Wandi asked.
Ori looked at Dwalin, who gazed at him fondly.
“If Dwalin doesn’t mind you treating his, I don’t mind,” Ori replied.
“Go f’r it, love. Migh’ as well get th’ full medicamen’s as they’re bein’ given ou’.”
Wandi took this as acceptance and Ori was able watch his beard being thoroughly cleaned.
“That feels so much better,” he praised. “Now that it’s coming in properly, it itches.”
“I can commiserate with you,” Wandi said idly, massaging his chin. “As a very young child, I once got tree sap in my hair. It took forever for Nana and her servants to get it out. They pulled and tugged on my hair so much, I decided I hated it. Left alone, I took up Nana’s sewing scissors and cut it all off.”
“Mahal!”
“Mahal’s hairy arse!”
“Oh, yes, how it itched while it grew in. Nana and Ada were both properly horrified and I was strictly forbidden to be anywhere near any sharp objects for, oh, I don’t know, years.”

Dwalin and Ori gaped at each other.
“Go on and laugh,” Wandi chuckled. “I certainly do, now. I think it maybe why Ada never had me train with swords.”
Dwalin roared and Ori giggled.
“And maybe that’s why you like hair so much?”
“Certainly. I made sure I never got sap or anything else in it after that. Now you sit here and soak while I’ll tend your hubby.”

Ori giggled again. Dwalin had to put his head back over the rim on the tub behind him as his hair was so long. Wandi took more time scrubbing. He washed Dwalin’s bald pate and anointed it with a something that looked like green whipped cream. Ori was kept in stitches as, once Dwalin heard what was on his head, made some truly terrible faces. Wandi giggled the entire time he scrubbed Dwalin’s beard.

Their heads declared clean, they were sent to the shower to wash. Wandi emptied the tub, cleaned, and refilled it with more steaming water now redolent with foam and bubbles. Ori went over as Wandi beckoned them. The water was thick with herbs, flower petals, oil, salts and, Ori noticed, a remarkable amount of silver and gold dust.

“Wha’ in Mahal’s name is all this sparkly shit?” Dwalin demanded. “I ain’t gonna bloody glitter about th’ place f’r th’ res’ a’ me days.”

Mr. Wandi sniffed. “Only if you don’t intend to bathe for the rest of you life. Get in, you’re both going to soak in it for half an hour.”

Dwalin grunted and climbed in. Ori climbed in after and settled himself between Dwalin’s legs.
Wandi tidied up and went to the door. He turned back with a fulminating look.

“And please behave, the medicinals in that water are not improved by ejaculate.”

“I ain’t plannin’ on cussin’,” Dwalin teased.

“You know fine well what I mean, you horrid dwarf,” snapped Wandi, winking at Ori and closing the door behind him.

They both snickered.

“I suppose we’ll just have to wait,” Ori mused, leaning back happily.

“Aye, any pain, love?”

“No, I’m just tired. We’ve been gone two weeks and I feel like we’ve traversed the world.”

“Well, maybe a good bi’ a’ it. Yeh’ve seen th’ Misty Mountains, love.”

“And destroyed three of them.”

Dwalin laughed and hugged him tighter.

“Me brave wee scribe. Yer so fierce.”

“Yes, I sounded like Mellon on a tear when I was in the Halls.”

“Yeh’ve only tol’ me a bi’ a’ that.”

“I know. I’m still thinking about it. Trying to…I suppose, process everything I saw and heard.”

“More foresigh’?”

“More like hindsight and pieces of puzzle.”

Ori decided, then said slowly.

“I told you I met my mother.”

“Aye, bu’ no’ much else. Did she know yeh?”

“Yes, she called me a runt.”

“Li’le shit. Does Dori know she spoke t’ yeh like tha’?”

No. I’m still not sure if I should mention her to either Dori or Nori. Nori would just cuss and tell me not to worry about it. Dori…”

“Did she ask yeh t’ send ‘em word?”

“No, she was rude about them. She said Nori never cared for her and Dori was a conniver and didn’t care about anything except wealth.”

Dwalin was silent. Ori turned a little to peer at him. He was frowning. Ori waited.

“She say anythin’ a’ use?”

“No, I accused her of killing Dori’s baby and she brushed it off then said Dori wasn’t a real Bearer.”

“She sounds brain-addled.”

“Then I saw red and tried to attack her. Your mother grabbed me, chucked me over her shoulder, and trundled me back to the table and told me that it wouldn’t teach her anything.”

Dwalin chuckled.
“Aye, sounds li’ me mam.”
“Then Mahal’s giant hand appeared in a swirl of fire and remade her right there. It was so strange. The Hand appeared, she tuned to stone, then He picked her up, rolled her around in His Hand. Other rock and gems came from the walls and she was rolled up into a baby.”
Dwalin sighed.
“Mebbe tha’s th’ only way.”
Ori frowned.
“What do you mean?”
“She didn’t learn anythin’ in her firs’ life so, she’s got t’ go back an’ try again.”
Ori thought about this for bit.
“Dwalin?”
“Love?”
“Your…your father was there.”
Dwalin’s body tensed.
“Di’ he speak t’ yeh?”
“Only once. He asked me how many people were actually living at Fundin House. Most of the time he just looked ashamed. He was with the family, with his brother Groin, but he didn’t say much. Your mother was lovely.”
Dwalin was silent again.
“So,” Ori went on. “Unlike my mother, he understands what he did was wrong. His treatment of you, Balin, and your mother was wrong. He knows this. My mother didn’t. That’s why she was remade in front of me, I think…."
Ori mulled this further.
“I was able call her to account. She was remade at that moment, so I could realize that she hadn’t learned anything so has to try again and I could….“ Ori smiled to himself. “So I could let go.”
“An’ come back an’ tell me an’ Balin, it were time f’r us t’ le’ i’ go, too.” Dwalin said, softly.
Ori squirmed around so he was across Dwalin’s lap, which was a tight squeeze in the tub. He settled to hug Dwalin closely.
“I’ll have to talk to Thorin, too. And Bilbo. Belladonna and Bungo were very sweet and Belladonna and Freris call each other sister.”
They rested another moment.
“Love?” Dwalin said. Ori looked up.
“Were Vili there?”
“Oh!” Ori realized his omission. “Yes, he was. He’s lovely. He hoped Dis wasn’t alone and approved heartily of her and Jani. Kili has his dimples. I can see why he was Dis’ One.” Ori paused then pulled a little away to look at his husband fondly.
“You, my Dwalin, look just like your mother.”
Dwalin laughed and colored a little.
“Aye, I do. ‘cept f’r th’ hair.”
Ori giggled.
“Yes, you are very like her. When she picked me up and carried me away from arguing with Rikmha, then sat with her arm about me, it felt like you a little bit. Oh,” Ori paused. “I forgot to tell her you’d given me her knitting basket.”
“I’m sure she knows, love.”
They relaxed in the heat.
“If this glitter shit ge’s under me skin, I’m goin’ t’ take me axe t’ our Wandi’s hair,” Dwalin growled.
The water had started as a myriad of different mixtures, and then turned a uniform sparkling bright pink.
“Pink does suit you,” Ori chuckled. “But it looks like we’re sitting in a raspberry cream dessert.”
“Yer always th’ bes’ dessert, me love.”
Ori chuckled and they kissed lazily. Ori was so comfortable. The last of the aches disappeared under the press of Dwalin lips. He hoped the medicinal in the tub had finish their work, so he and Dwalin could become a little more active.

Wandi arrived.

“Oh Elbereth, I might have known,” was his greeting.

“We ain’t even go’ star’ed, our Wandi.” Dwalin grunted.

“Good. Get out and go rinse off, then we’ll get you dressed. Personally, my dear brother and I would prefer to send you both to bed for a couple of hours—”

“Sounds good.” Ori and Dwalin chorused then snickered at each other. Wandi stifled a chuckle and frowned terribly at them.

“However, dearest Bearer Dori is preparing a marvelous repast for you all and you’re both expected at table.”

Ori’s stomach loudly seconded this idea.

Clean and dressed in some old, comfortable clothing, Ori slopped out to the sitting room and presented himself to Dori. Rather than the approval Ori expected, Dori lunged forward with an outraged cry and grasped him by the jaw.

“Your beard grew!” Dori accused.

“Um. Yes, it did.”

“That’s almost as red as Gloin’s!”

“Is it? I haven’t closely examined it yet. Not clean, anyway.”

Dori pulled back to regard him, though not releasing Ori’s jaw.

“Great Mahal! You look just like your father!”

Ori didn’t know what to say to that, so he settled for, “I’m sorry?”

“I’m not blaming you, pet,” said Dori, though her frown didn’t ease. “I’m just a little startled, that’s all.”

“Alright,” said Ori. “May I have my face back?”

“What? Oh. Sorry, pet.”

Dori patted his cheek absently then shooed Ori and a snickering Dwalin out to the receiving room.

The room was full of people, animals, and barking wargs. Floris’ Biscuit was having a delightful time chasing Romy, who was galloping after Chopper, who was squealing. Mask and Nori-Pori clung to Chopper’s back. Kihshassa swooped around above them. The Gamgee faunts ran after Frodo, who was mounted on Posey. Ori noticed Posey now owned a saddle. He suspected Gridr had provided it.

Sam rode a mechanical pony, steering it by turning the head. Dain bounded after, shouting encouragement or winding up the key that was disguised as the pony’s tail. Ori rather suspected that if this had not originally belonged to Fili and Kili then perhaps their mother or uncle.

Ori and Dwalin were welcomed and congratulated by everyone. Jim and Ruelis were delighted to see him. Jim grinned maniacally.

“I’ve been hearing strange things about you, my friend.”

“How strange?” Ori asked, swallowing.

“I hear the evil creatures of Arda have retreated into the wastelands for fear of the dwarf king’s wizard.”

“What? Dwarrow don’t have wizards.”

“Hey,” said Jim, “I don’t make this stuff up. This is just the story going around the entertainment caravans. They say the dwarrow have a red wizard.”

“Red? Wh- What do think I’ll do? Write scathing poetry about them?”

Jim licked his lips as if he tasted something delicious.

“They say, if any dare oppose your liege, you’ll drop a mountain on them.”

“Oh, Mahal’s blessed boots! Really?”

“You’ve already done it twice,” Jim said.

“Accidentally! And the first time it was Roäc’s fault”

“If you can drop a mountain on someone, I don’t think your intentions are taken into account.”
“I’m not a wizard! I can’t even make a long-tailed rabbit from a handkerchief!”
“Oh well, that reminds me, find anything floral, Lord Ori?”
“The box of the Flower of Durin, you mean?” Ori teased.
Jim’s eyebrows went up.
“So that’s what that meant. Huh.”
“Have you spoken to Lady Eowyn?” Ori asked.
“No, should I?”
“I think she might have a comment about a snowflake for you.” Ori teased.
Jim frowned, mouthed ‘snowflake’, and looked around.
“There she is,” Ori pointed. “Go introduce yourselves.”
Jim raised his eyebrows, but Ruelis started pushing him over.
“Come along, dear. Time for you to be brought to book. I remember all about the ‘snowflake’. Lucky for you, he’s not here.”

The fireplaces blazed cheerily, the torches and lamps all lit. Two of the great tables were set for a meal, the largest table in the middle of the room with an array of food laid on it. There were platters of fresh and roasted vegetables, hot buttered noodles and great loaves of bread and wheels of cheeses.

“Welcome, Lord Ori,” Lord Elrond and Lindir came forward. Ori grinned. They embraced and Elrond looked him over and laid a hand against his cheek.
You’ve been talking to Cemnesta,” Ori accused him teasingly.

Indeed. You seem very well recovered,” Elrond smiled and turned as his sons came forward to greet Ori.

“We’re so glad you’re back!” Elladan told him with a grin.
“Very glad,” Elrohir added.

“Thank you,” Ori said carefully wondering what these elf versions of Fili and Kili were up to.
“Yes,” Elrohir nodded. “Ada and Lindir are driving us all to a mental infirmary. They’re both terribly excited about what you’ve discovered.”
Ori laughed then headed straight for the end of the buffet. There sat a steaming joint of roasted goat. Dwalin carved slice after slice for him. After piling the side of his plate with thickly buttered bread, Ori led the way back to the table and chose a seat at random. He sat and admired his meal. The meat was done to a turn and smelled delicious. Ori stuffed several slices between buttered bread and shoved it in his mouth with a moan of need.

The meat satisfied something he hadn’t realized he was craving desperately. He gobbled the makeshift sandwich as fast as he could. He looked up. Opposite him, sat Thorin looking extremely amused.

“Better?” Thorin inquired.
Ori nodded and swiped his sleeve over his mouth.
“Until I saw the meat I didn’t realize how much I was missing it. Needing it.”

Bilbo came and sat beside Thorin, which put him directly opposite Dwalin, who hadn’t bothered with bread or flatware, simply cramming meat into his mouth.

“You poor things,” Bilbo commiserated. “You dwarrow would never survive without meat, would you?”

“No,” Thorin agreed. “It’s necessary to us. All those jokes about parasites in tubes do, I imagine, have an origin in eating raw or badly cooked meat.”

Ori had a flash imagine of Durin ranging like a warg after a rabbit and shoving it whole, down his maw.

“And what’s amusing you, Lord Ori?” Thorin asked.

“Thinking of Durin on all fours hunting rabbits,” Ori managed somewhat thickly around his mouthful.

Eowyn arrived at Ori’s other side with a plate of meat as well. She tuck in immediately and sighed happily then looked ruefully at her plate.
“I’m ashamed to say this was one of the other reasons I couldn’t stay with Beorn. I’d eventually steal his animals and eat them.”

“Oh?” Bilbo asked interestedly. “You made the acquaintance of Beorn, milady?”

Dwalin made a rude noise. Dain and Sculdis crashed down near Bilbo.

“Aye, she made his acqain’ance,” Dain grunted. “Spen’ th’ nigh’ a’ fore las’ fuckin’ his brains ou’.”

“Jealous?” Eowyn parried.

Dain stopped eating. He sat there, staring at her in dumb disbelief.

Eowyn glanced at Sculdis, who was sitting with her hands and lips primly folded but she was shaking with suppressed laughter.

“Eh?” Dain finally managed.

Sculdis gave a shriek of delight and roared with laughter.

Thorin rose and bowed to Eowyn.

“Madame, you have done the extraordinary. No one has ever startled my younger cousin enough to stop him eating. May I formally congratulate you?”

Eowyn rose, curtsied, and went back to her meal.

“And how fares the Lord of the Carrock?” Thorin asked.

“He’s fine an’ sent lots o’ pressies,” Jani reported as she arrived with a plate piled high with meat, and Dis at her side. Dis put Jani beside Thorin and seated herself on Jani’s other side.

“What kind of pressies?” Bilbo wanted to know.

Ori saw Nomirliel hesitating and flapped his hand to her. She smiled and came and seated herself next to Eowyn.

Ori swallowed his last sandwich and introduced her to Thorin and Bilbo. She almost rose but Thorin told her to eat as formality could come later and had she enjoyed her adventure.

Eowyn said, ‘presents’, around a mouth full of noodles. Nomirliel caught the hint and told about what she had seen Beorn put into the wagon.

Mistress Dazla appeared with another dish in her hands. When she set this on the buffet, Thorin rose and went to her. She laughed at whatever he said to her and they parted, smiling.

“Not to worry,” Thorin said as he resumed his seat. “The foodstuffs have been taken to the larder to keep cool.”

“And,” Ori said enjoying the feeling a tummy full of meat, “Beorn sent mead and berry wine.”

“Beorn’s berry wine,” murmured Bilbo with a nostalgic smile. “Not as fancy as dorwinian but such a pleasant, sweet wine. Best thing to get thoroughly soused on while on a picnic of a warm summery day.”

“Good to know,” Thorin teased. “I shall hold it aside for such occasions.”

“Greedy beggar,” Dwalin said, sliding his fingers around his plate to catch the remaining juices. Ori laughed and handed his husband his remaining slice of bread. Dwalin dropped it on his plate, wiped his sleeve over his mouth and grabbed Ori into a sloppy kiss. Ori was laughing too hard to kiss back. Dwalin pulled back and carded his fingers through Ori’s new beard.

“Dwalin!” Ori squawked.

“Oh!” Nori scolded, rising out of the center of the table to shake a finger at Ori.

“Ya li’le flirt!”

“Nori, get out of the table,” Ori replied.

Eowyn and Nomirliel stared open-mouthed at Nori. Nori saw their wide eyes and bowed.

“Ladies.”

Assault and Battery peeked out of his hair and chittered. He sank back out of sight.

Eowyn and Nomirliel looked at each other and shrieked with laughter.

Eowyn turned to Ori, still unable to speak.

“Yes, that’s my brother, Nori,” Ori affirmed.

“Nuisance,” Dwalin added, using the bread to thoroughly wipe his plate.

The meal finished with xocolāt pudding with an extraordinary amount of cream. Nomirliel moaned with delight.
“‘If only it was polite to put your face in the bowl,’” she mourned.
“‘I’m tempted to anyway,’” Eowyn agreed.  “‘I wish I’d only eaten this, now.’”
“No, pet,” Dori arrived.  “You need your proper food.  You may be a soldier, but you’re still thin and you need fattening up.”
“Like you fattening up my Aunt Galadriel?” Eowyn teased.
“Indeed!” Dori cried.  “And see how well she’s looking!”
They looked down the table where Galadriel and Celeborn were catching up with Balin, Elrond, and Gloin.  Galadriel’s face was obscured by her ale tankard.  She set it down, obviously drained, and Gloin gamely refilled.
Ori, Loli, Dipfa and Bujni strolled up to ask Ori if he was of an elegant sufficiency.  He kissed Dwalin and got up to follow them back out to the patio.

Ori curled in the chair, Fanny at his side, her head near him, so he could stroke and pat the trunk lying across his lap.  He grinned, watching his friends go through his sketch books, marveling at the pictures from his adventure.
“This enormous spider is fascinating,” Bujni commented studying the pictures intently.
“And now King Dain is wearing it as a hat,” Omi added reverently.
Ori remembered and pulled up his satchel.  In a side pocket he found the spider hairs Quartz had brought him.  He examined one carefully, only half listening to the chatter near him.  It was longer than a quill, but thinner, and ended in a sharp point.  It was also hollow.
He reached into his satchel and removed an ink bottle, and a pine sap bung, from which he cut two slivers.  He tossed the rest of the bung back and uncorked the ink bottle.  He inserted the sliver to fit closely inside the bottle neck, effectively sealing it.  He turned the bottle upside down and the bung stayed and no ink leaked around it.  He set the bottle on the arm of the chair and took up the hair again and drew out his boot knife.  He cut the wider end to a slant with a point, then used this point to pierce the bung.  He turned the bottle upside-down, filling the experimental pen with ink.
He pulled the hair free, righting the bottle at the same time, and set the bottle down on the ground and corked it.
He covered the wider end of the hair with the rest of the pine sap and pulled out a note book.  Ori used his boot knife with the greatest care, nicking off the tiny point of the hair.  He tapped the end of the hair against the paper.  A tiny speck of ink appeared.  Ori snickered to himself and wrote his name across the page.  The ink flowed easily and yet was the finest line he ever produced.
He scribbled a couple of verses of an old poem, delighted with it.
Quartz landed on his shoulder.
“Works?” the raven demanded.
Ori grinned at the raven.
“It’s perfect, Quartz.  Look”
Quartz studied the page.
“Pretty.”
“What have you got?” Loli asked leaning forward.
“A new pen.  Quartz got it for me.  Look how well it writes.”
The other three tried it out, exclaiming at the tiny lines.
“What is it made with?” Bujni asked, examining it closely.
“Giant spider hair.”
Omi and Loli screamed.  Bujni looked horrified and hurriedly gave the pen back.  Ori laughed at them.
“Did you break them off?” Omi asked.
“No, I told you, Quartz got them.”
His friends looked askance at Quartz, who preened from his perch on Fanny’s trunk.  Ori took up the sketch book with the pictures of the spider.  He held it up so Fanny could look at it with one eye.
She made disturbed noises and the end of her trunk came up to sniffed and touched the pen.  She regarded Ori, then stroked his head gently with the end of her trunk.

Master Brur and Master Sadi arrived on the patio. The four scribes got up as the pair of them descended on Ori with welcomes and hugs.

“You did very well, Lord Ori,” Master Sadi beamed on him. “For a new first chair to go on such a quest is a very great thing. Your success was monumental.”

“Thank you, Master Sadi,” Ori blushed. “More like falling monuments.”

“Thank Mahal yer back, laddie,” Brur said, grasping Ori’s shoulders and shaking him a little. “Rhonda and Linda’ve been drivin’ me buggernuts.”

“What did they do?”

“Hoverin’ constantly while I clean up the Flower’s box an’ look f’r markin’s: D’yeh need help wi’ th’ box, Master Brur? D’yeh need me t’ adjust th’ lightin’, Master Brur? Clean towel, Master Brur? Wipe yer butt, Master Brur?”

“Really?”

“Awrigh’, no’ th’ las’ bit, but pretty close.”

“Well, perhaps we shouldn’t worry about it now. Please tell me,” Ori asked eagerly, “what did you find inside the box?”

“Eh? Ain’t opened it, laddie.”

“Why not?” Ori gasped, shocked. “Master Brur, are you telling me the box has been just sitting… wherever it is?”

“It’s f’r yeh t’ do, laddie. Yer quest. Yeh get firs’ crack at it. Whachacall th’ booby prize?”

“Where is it?”

“Locked up in the archives. Yer brother-in-law’s ordered an armed guard there ‘round th’ clock.”

“Oh.” Ori considered then his heart skipped. “Should we go now and…”

“Yer Dori’d have a fit, if I took yeh down there now. Let th’ moon get past full, we’re pullin’ in th’ past, lad. If I can get thin’s placed, we’ll do it t’morrow.”

“And I’ll have the guild heads there to record all the events,” Sadi added.

“Ooo!” Omi cried. “This is going to be so exciting! May we come, too, Ori?”

“Of course,” Ori replied. “I hope Thorin will be there. He’s the king and I think he really ought to do it. Thinking about it, if it’s all right, I’d like everyone who helped us to be there.”

“Even tha’ manchild?” Brur grumped.

“Which man child do you mean?” Sigrid asked, coming out arm in arm with Eowyn. They made a lovely picture. Eowyn had put aside her jumpsuit and was simply dressed in a white frock trimmed with sky blue ribbons. Sigrid was in sky blue with white lace.

Ori laughed.

“Careful, you two. Keep dressing alike and when you’re old and gray everyone will confuse you with Margr and Vi.”

The two young women looked at each other, giggled and Sigrid grinned at Ori. “That would mean Fili would be our Glorfy. Wonder what he’ll think of that?”

Eowyn chuckled delightedly.

“Go ask him,” she teased.

“Would either of you be interested in seeing what’s in the box we brought back?” Ori got down to business.

“Yes!” they chorused.

“Only if it’s allowed,” Eowyn added. “It is your people’s history, it might be something private.”

“I’ll ask Thorin,” Ori decided.

Sadi patted his shoulder, smiling.

Ori led the way back in after taking leave of Fanny, who rose to play with Floris and Mavey, who had brought Frodo, Sam and the other little Gamgees with them.

Ori found Thorin at the sitting room table with all leading elves, Bard, Balin, Bilbo, Dis, and Gloin. Dwalin was coming through from the receiving room. Ori thumped into him and hugged him hard.
“There yeh are, love. How’s Fanny?”
“She’s very well!” Ori squeezed his husband’s arm. “She’s getting taller and her tusks are growing, too, and she’s much plumper. She looks wonderful!”
“Never as wonderful as yerself,” Dwalin murmured in Ori’s hair.
“Wait,” Eowyn gasped, “Ori, do you really own that oliphaunt?”
“Of course, I don’t own her!” Ori swallowed his annoyance, remembering the ways of men.
“Fanny is my dear friend. Jim and Ruelis look after her and travel with her as she’s too big to live here in Erebor. Besides she is active and very clever. She would be bored here. Jim and Ruelis bought her back so Fanny and I can visit.”
“Thank Mahal,” Dwalin murmured.
Eowyn stared, then laughed.
“Oh, Ori! Galadriel was right. You are irresistibly huggable on first sight to everyone and everything. Red Queen, ponies, kittens, bats, and oliphaunts love you, too. No wonder Dwalin fell for you instantly!”
Ori looked up and grinned.
“Now that reminds me.”
Grabbing Dwalin’s hand, he hurried over to where Dori was talking to Balin, Eowyn gamely following them.
“Ori’s Dori,” Ori bounced up and clenched Dori’s arm.
“What is it, pet? Have you and dearest Eowyn been telling secrets?”
“Why did you always glare at Dwalin whenever he came around?”
Dori turned and stared at Ori.
“I never did any such thing! I have been very good to him here!”
“No, no, Dori, I mean before, when we lived in Dale.”
“I was not acquainted with the captain. I never noticed him.”
“Yes, you did! He told me the story of when I was drawing the dock flowers. The day you told me never to go there because there were pirates.”
“Nonsense, I was merely chaperoning you. There were several passersby, who were admiring you!”
“You glared Dwalin away!” Ori accused.
“I did not!” Dori cried. “I most certainly did not! I merely smiled encouragingly.”
“Bloody bared yer fangs a’ me,” Dwalin observed to Eowyn, who was clenching her hand to her mouth.
“I-” Dori paused then tossed her head. “Perhaps I was a little protective, but-”
“Yeh unsheathed yer knife an’ polished it a’ me,” Dwalin observed to Eowyn, who was clenching her hand to her mouth.
“A perfectly normal pastime! I’m sure you approve of the care and maintenance of weaponry!”
“Maybe the way we did get married was the only way it could have happened,” Ori reflected.
“Why, pet! That’s not true! I’m sure if Dwalin had called in a respectable manner and asked to walk out with you-”
“Hard t’ ask when yeh go’ a slit throat,” Dwalin put in.
Dori huffed in annoyance and glared at Dwalin. Eowyn and Ori giggled. Dwalin shot a grin at Dori, who had the grace to color slightly and cast murmur aspersions. Balin chuckled and took Dori’s arm and escorted the Bearer to a seat near Galadriel.
Eowyn and Dwalin looked at each other. Dwalin winked and Eowyn was finally able to let go of the laugh she had been bravely holding back.
“Now I believe Lady Dori is very fierce,” Eowyn managed.
“Yeh’ve no idea, our Wynny,” Dwalin grunted. “Yeh didn’t know us when we were dealin’ wi’ Frerin.”
“Who’s Frerin?” Eowyn asked, one eyebrow raised.
“Thorin’s and Dis’ younger brother,” Ori explained. “He’s an asshat and was sent to Belegost to have his own kingdom, but Arivett and your brother overthrew him. I think he’s being an accountant to King Snur in Ered Luin…” Ori paused. “At least, that’s the last I remember hearing of him.”

“Oohhh,” Eowyn said thoughtfully. “So that’s where that whole asshat thing comes from.”

“Yeh majesty?” Furh’nk appeared at the front door.

“Yes, Furh’nk?” Thorin turned from his conversation with Omosuil and Gimli.

“Indeed?” Thorin grinned. “I suppose my letter of explanation to the king was not enough.

Probably Captain Boromir is his representative.”

“Fr’m th’ spy-glass, majesty, I’m thinkin’ it’s Elessar hissel’.”

“Then please prepare a welcome, Furh’nk, and bring his party straight here. Bearer?”

“I’m before you, Thorin dear, and Bilbo is already gone to the kitchen.”

“Thank you both. Furh’nk?”

“I’m on it, majesty.”

“Thank you.”

“Thorin?” Ori went to his king’s side. “Do you think everything’s alright? Surely Arivett hasn’t—”

Thorin chuckled and looked at Dwalin.

“Ori,” Thorin put an arm over Ori’s shoulders and brought him back to Dwalin’s side, “I don’t think it’s anything more than Aragorn and Arwen wanting all the juicy details.”

“What will we do? I haven’t had time to write up anything,” Ori worried.

“You and Dwalin are going through to the breakfast parlor,” Thorin instructed, steering Ori toward the sitting room door to the hallway. “Dori and Mistress Dazla are preparing it. I’ll gather the crowned heads and your professional bullies. We’ll join you and, by that time, Gondor should be here to gather with us. Then you are going to enthrall all of us with what, in Mahal’s name, happened.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Ori is back and ready to tell (almost) all! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Of special note: Has anyone run into any Eowyn/Beorn smut???? If not, why hasn’t anyone written it???? There’s a shockin’ lack a’ Beowyn out there!!!!!

Ori nodded and he hurried through. Dwalin said he’d be along in a minute. In the parlor, Dori was laying out his sketch books which she had wrenched away from Bujni. Mistress Dazla set out tapped kegs and let the bottles of dorwinian breathe. In the kitchen, Ori heard Bilbo busy with food preparation and instructing the staff on helping him.

“Now, pet,” Dori said. “You will sit at Thorin’s right, as you will be speaking.”

Ori paled. Dwalin entered carrying a wiggling ball of fur that had grown quite a bit. Ori forgot his nerves and laughed.

“It’s Killer!” he cried, going over to pat the pup. Killer was very fuzzy and very excited. The pup eagerly washed Ori’s face for him.

“He’s so sweet!” Ori giggled, wiping his face with his sleeve.

“Aye, he’s a grand wee thin’ ain’t he?” Dwalin grinned down at the little warg. Killer whined and yipped and made happy noises, tail a blur of motion.

Ori remembered his duty then and snatched hold of Dwalin’s hand.

“Yer fine, love. Yer jus’ tellin’ us abou’ our adventure. Everyone here’s like family.”

“That’s true,” Ori admitted, calming.

The Company and Ori’s other bullies filed in, followed by Thranduil, Bard, Mr. Wandi, and Cemnesta. Galadriel carried in her satchels and a large basket. Ori thought they must contain the other books she had ‘rescued’ from the crypt and stowed in her jumpsuit pockets. He went to the head of the table. Thorin strode in, flanked by Sugar on his right and Butter on his left. He sat and they circled several times before plopping down behind his chair, panting happily and sniffing around. Dis, Jani, Fili, Sigrid, Kili and Tauriel followed next, the princes assisting the six mithril masters in and settling them.

Kir lifted a lock of hair, peered around, grunted and folded his arms across his chest. Sigrid held out Ori’s other satchel to him and he took it gratefully.

Thorin waved for everyone to seat themselves. Bilbo came from the kitchen and seated himself on Thorin’s left. Ori was relieved that Dwalin sat down beside him, Killer snuggling into his lap and gazing up at Dwalin with worshipful eyes.

Kihshassa winged in and climbed on the back of Ori’s chair and settled herself there and laid her head on his left shoulder. Mask clambered up Dwalin and balanced on Killer, bravely standing firm as Killer slobbered him happy. Nori-Pori hopped on the table and sat in front of them. Eowyn and the others of the company, who had not been introduced to the wargs, stared at them.

Jim, Ruelis, Floris and Mavey came in and found seats. Nori and Bofur sidled in. Eowyn leaned forward, looking eagerly at Nori’s hair. Nori winked at her and whistled. The ferrets popped their heads out and leapt to the table and bobbled around sniffing and receiving pets and fondling from everyone. Eowyn was delighted and giggled when Assault took a tour around her neck under her hair.
Dain and Sculdis barged in next with Elrond, Lindir, Elladan and Elrohir, Glorfindel and the sisters, Celeborn, Kelli strutting beside him, Haldir, Legolas, Gimli, a barking Romy, and all the Groinuls. Everyone found seats. Haldir looked aghast at the wargs lying on the floor next to Thorin, but seeing as how Omi and Loli were cuddling Romy and Dwalin had a warg pup in his lap, Haldir chose not to comment. Tharkûn appeared from the ether, seated comfortably next to Glorfindel.

Finally Dori, Powder draped about her neck, came in with Brur, Sadi, Nodun and Arne, the scribes’ arms full of baskets of papers and ostrakais. These were laid out on the table before Ori.

Red Queen flapped down to land on the patio. Ori rose and greeted her. She followed him in and was introduced to everyone, including the household animals. She deigned to take the chair Thranduil pulled out for her.

Fanny came forward and lay down near the open doors, her ears flapped open wide to catch the discussion.

Granny Klak entered, holding Brandy, who had grown plump and fierce, but was perfectly happy to be cradled like a baby. Granny Klak sat beside Red Queen and they nodded to each other regally.

“What is that?” Red Queen asked.

“One of my great, great, grandbadgers,” said Granny Klak simply.

Roäc swooped in, and perched on Thorin’s chair back. Quartz darted after him and landed on Ori’s right shoulder.

“Gondor’s here,” said Roäc. “Aragorn, Arwen, and Boromir. Dazla’s helping them tidy up.” “Excellent. Any other news from your look-outs?” “All clear,” Roäc added and accepted the chunk of scone Thorin passed him. Everyone seated was being served with drinks and helping themselves to the snacks laid out on the table.

Aragorn and Arwen entered. Shouts of welcome ensued and Thorin rose to embrace them both. “Gondor, it’s good to see you again,” Thorin smiled.

“What happened to Aragorn, Thorin?” Aragorn laughed.

“I’m being royal for greetings.” “Not on my part you shouldn’t, we have wagged, as you remember.” Thorin chuckled and leaned forward as Arwen bent for them to kiss each other’s cheeks. Sugar and Butter rose, tails wagging for pats and praise.

Arwen and Aragorn went around the table greeting everyone and meeting others. They didn’t bat an eyelid as they exchanged pleasantries with Red Queen. Aragorn came to Ori and frowned terribly.

“Lord Ori of Fundin, I am deeply, deeply angered,” he growled, though Ori saw the twinkle in the man’s eye.

“Why?” he asked, more curious than anything.

“Because you went on an important quest and did not invite Arwen and myself to accompany you. We are very hurt.”

Aragorn laughed and embraced him.

“It was supposed to be secret!” Ori protested, returning the hug. “A secret?” Arwen teased. “Like blowing up Mordor?”

“I didn’t do that!” Ori argued.

“You gave the arkenstone to Roäc,” Arwen said, while Aragorn and Dwalin greeted each other and Aragorn was able to enjoy a face wash from Killer. Dwalin shared some Old Toby with the king and both lit up.

“I didn’t tell him to take it to Mordor!” Ori insisted, hugging Arwen.

“And then you blew up Moria.” “That wasn’t the plan. It was an accident. Mahal, Yavanna, and Ulwe made it happen.” “Don’t yeh go implicatin’ us.” A hot boom chuckled in the back of Ori’s head.

“I’m not implicating You,” Ori said aloud, accidentally, making Elrond’s eyes fly wide open and Galadariel laugh.

Eowyn and Arwen embraced, giggling as Arwen told the White Lady how jealous she was of Eowyn going on the Quest.
“You will call upon us next time,” Aragorn stated and drew out a seat for Arwen and seated himself beside her.

Boromir blew in, Frodo tucked under one arm and Sam under the other.

“Sorry, I’m late;” he crowed. “I was ambushed!”

“Mister Boromir!” shouts came from either side of the man.

The First March Warden grinned, then spotted Eowyn.

“Addled One!” he shouted in greeting.

“Bored Mouse!” she called back, laughing.

Everyone snickered at these pleasantries. Boromir sat down next to Dain and perched the faunts on his knees. Dain helped him to ale and the faunts to snacks.

Thorin lit his pipe, glanced around, nodded to Nodun, who had perched herself cross-legged on the sideboard with the drinks. She in turn nodded to Sadi. Sadi gave Omi, Loli, Bujni and Arne a look and they readied their pens and books.

Thorin rose to speak, the room dropped to silence.

There was a squawk and a huge pile of black feathers whirled in through the open parlor windows over Fanny’s head and landed with a disorganized thump in the middle of the table.

“Righ’!” bellowed Baluchistan. “I’m here, let th’ figh’ start.”

Dain reached out, grabbed his raven and yanked him into his lap, muttering, “Shuddup, Blue!”

“Whoops! Aye, laddie, I’m as mum as a goose.”

Thorin smothered a smile.

“The Quest of the Company of Lord Ori of Fundin to Khazad-dûm to recover the Flower of Durin as instructed by Durin the Deathless in Lord Ori’s prophetic dream has been successful. Lord, Ori will you please inform the assembled of your quest.”

Thorin sat and Ori rose. He opened his notebook and turn to the page where he had written in a dream state the request of Durin. He looked at it a moment. It almost seemed a lifetime ago.

Ori told of the ostrakai. The pieces were passed around the table and examined. Ori explained the symbol of the flower.

He told of his dream where Durin made his request and gave the location of the box. He told of the assistance he had received and thanked each person. He took up his first notebook from the sailing of the ship to Erys Lasgalen and Cemmesta’s assistance, their ride through the forest with Omosuil’s soldiers, the sketchbook with the pictures of the spider, the sketches of Dol-Guldur and the visions of the original buildings as he’d seen them. He explained the meeting with the ents and their leader Treebeard, then the reception Galadriel and Celeborn had hosted for them.

Dis smiled into her tea.

“So, you met ents.”

Kili’s head swiveled toward her and he said, “Yes. And no.”

She chuckled evilly under her breath.

Celeborn stared, fascinated, at the ceiling.

Ori sat down to let Dwalin tell of the battle preparations and the assistance they had received from Haldir and the ents. Ori drank raspberry soda water with great relief. He took over Dwalin’s pipe, the soothing properties of Old Toby relaxed him. He watched the scribes taking notes and Nodun sketching the meeting.

It was interesting to hear Dwalin’s take on their adventure. Dwalin saw it through the eyes of a battle strategist. Ori could easily see why Thorin trusted him completely. Dwalin missed nothing about their approach to Khazad-dûm, how the ents moved and covered their tracks, how the rocks around the entryway had to be watched and possible areas of attack spotted.

When he reached their entry of the mountain, Dwalin nodded to Dain and sat down. Dain handed a snoring Baluchistan to Sculdis, hauled out a folded sheaf of papers out of a pocket, which he chuckled to Thorin, rose and proceeded to explain his and the mithril masters’ work creating the bridge and how it had spanned the chasm. Thorin studied the papers Dain sent his way. He handed them to Dis and the papers made a slow trek around all the listeners.

Ori glanced about. Anyone who had not been with them was wide eyed. They went through the sketches, staring and gasping.

Sculdis nodded.

“Me hubby’s no’ jus’ another pretty face, yeh know.”

Dain continued until they reached the first cavern then Dain nodded to Ori. Ori rose once more. He told of the meeting with the bonebreakers. He politely asked if Red Queen would care to add anything.

She took a moment to explain how her flock lived and the damage the orcs did. The huge bird actually apologized for not understanding black speech, so she could not advise the assembled on any plans the orcs may have had. Thorin thanked her and nodded to Ori.

Then Ori rather shyly told of his finding the skeletal remains of Teyan and her ghostly request to take her masterwork with him. Ori indicated the neatly bound book on the table. Brur snatched it up, read the title, roared with laughter and shoved it in his outer robe pocket. Ori frowned, then explain what the work was about. Gasps went round the table and Elrond glared at Brur.

Ori then told of Floviq showing them where the hidden chamber was. Dain took up the tale again, explaining the mechanics of the boobytraps, and how the box was raised. He turned and winked at Galadriel, who giggled and rose. She emptied her satchels and the basket on the table. Books slewed out all over. Brur, Elrond, and Sadi screamed in delight, and the scribes almost knocked each other senseless in the scramble. Thorin bellowed fora calm and Dain snickered at them as they all recovered themselves. Dain continued to the point where Ori said he would check the tunnel.

Everyone looked at Ori.

“Pet, you didn’t!” Dori cried.

“I did,” Ori admitted glumly. He told of the orcs, then sighed. This was the part he had dreaded telling.

“I opened my eyes and there I was with Quartz in the Halls of Waiting.”

“Yup,” said Quartz.

Thorin and Elrond leapt to their feet with the shout of, “What did you see?”

Ori sighed and carefully told of his meeting with Thror, then their passage to the feasting hall, and his meeting with Narvi and Celebrimbor.

“He ask me to call him Brim.” Ori couldn’t help himself.

Thranduil, Elrond, and Celeborn hung on his words. Galadriel giggled when Ori reported that they teasingly accused her of spilling the secret. She was obviously delighted they remembered her.

Ori faithfully related everyone he had met and what they had said. Dis, Fili, and Kili were in tears when Ori told them of Vili and the words Vili had said.

Ori grinned at Kili.

“You have your father’s dimples.”

“Tell him I’ll give them back when I get there.” Kili smiled with wet cheeks. “I wish I remembered him.”

“I’ve drawn you a sketch.” Ori turned to the place in one of the sketch books he’d used on the ride back. Kili grabbed it and stared at the picture. Dis looked around the hankie she was wiping her eyes with while Jani rubbed her back.

“That’s him,” she sniffed. “Oh, Ori, you draw so well. The picture looks ready to speak to you.”

Fili had his face buried in Sigrid’s neck as she stroked his hair.

“Fili looks so like him in this picture,” Kili said marveling. “All the others I’ve seen look so stiff. I do have his dimples, and his smile.”

The assembled politely waited for the three to recover themselves. Then Ori turned to Thorin. He tried not to giggle as he related Thrain’s and Freris’ interactions. Dis turned to the pages Ori indicated and gasped. Ori was pleased he had taken time to add some color to these portraits. Thorin rose and leaned over to see.

“Adad has both eyes,” Thorin breathed. “I’d forgotten how he looked with both.”

“Look at amad,” Dis put in. “Ori caught that little secret smile she had. Ori, will you?”

Dis looked up. Ori nodded. He could easily draw more portraits of all he had seen.

Bilbo peered around Thorin’s arm and then up at Thorin, and smiled.
“I like this portrait better than the official portrait in the archives. Though both seem to have the same aura of... seriousness about them.”

Ori nodded.

“Believe me, this is nothing to having him look right into your eyes with a purpose.”

“Does he do that eyebrow thing?” Frodo asked.

“I get that from my amad,” said Thorin.

“Oh.”

Ori went back to telling about how Thror remembered nothing. He took a breath and related his discussion and accidental dropping of Bilbo’s name, and Fundin and Groin’s bet on it, which sent Oin and Gloin into peals of laughter.

Ori told of Freris calling for a raven and how Carc had arrived. This made Roäc squawk, which woke Baluchistan in an explosion of feathers.

“Wha’ th’ fuck, brother?” Baluchistan yelled.

“Father’s in the Halls!” Roäc shouted.

“Father’s bloody dead!” Baluchistan shouted back. “O’ course, he’s in th’ Halls! Where else yeh think he’d be? In a fuckin’ fish bowl?”

“Ori and Quartz met Adad in the Halls, you idiot!” Roäc screamed. “Pay attention, fluff-head.”

“Oh, did yeh, laddie?” Baluchistan strutted across the table to question Quartz. “An’ wha’ did our da have t’ say t’ yeh?”

“He said Adad Roäc once got his head stuck in the keyhole to the treasury and King Thror had to grease his head with lard to get it out,” Quartz snickered.

“I did not!” Roäc yelled.

“Aye, yeh did!” Baluchistan argued.

“I - I must’ve been drunk. I don’t remember!” Roäc wailed.

“Drunk off yer feathery arse, brother!” Baluchistan croaked cheerily.

Ori waited for Thorin to stop laughing, so he could get the room under control once more. It took a few minutes but Thorin finally shushed the ravens and everyone else and invited Ori to continue.

Ori grinned at Bilbo as he related how Carc had returned with Belladonna and Bungo Baggins and how Freris and Thrain had celebrated with them.

“It is nice to have universal parental approval, even from beyond the grave,” said Bilbo.

“Yes,” said Thorin dryly. “But whether they approve more of us or each other, that is open to debate.”

“I was surprised King Thror could see the hobbits but not the elves,” said Ori. “Dwalin’s mam said King Thror didn’t object to hobbits. I think it had something to do with the hobbits bringing cake.”

Dis and Thorin traded delighted looks and laughed.

“That sounds like the udad we knew,” said Dis. “Once he was off his cake, we knew things had become serious.”

Ori paused a moment then skipped the part with Rihkma as it had no bearing, nor added to any information about the quest, and went on describing the remaking of a dwarf and then how things had faded.

He paused and took Dwalin’s hand. Dwalin took a breath and rose. Ori didn’t sit but stayed close to him, clutching Dwalin’s hand with both of his. Dwalin quietly related the few minutes of escaping the chamber and finding Ori and the axe.

“Did you know what had happened to Ori?” Elrond asked curiously.

“I only though’ th’ wors’ when his song in me hear’ stopped.” Dwalin’s grip tightened on Ori’s. Ori let go and shoved himself under Dwalin’s arm which clenched him tight.

Silence then Dis burst into tears again and Dori, Dain and both the sisters joined her. Thorin rose, came and embraced both Ori and Dwalin.

“Oh, my shieldbrother, the pain you must have felt.”

Dwalin took another breath and chuckled.

“Good thin’ it didn’t las’. Nex’ thin’ I know is him lookin’ up a’ me askin’ if I were alrigh’.”
Thorin touched brows first with Dwalin, then Ori, and returned to his seat.
Once they got to the part about the Balrog, nearly everyone in the Company had a part to tell. The reduction of the balrog made everyone burst into laughter. Tharkûn shook his head, murmuring about poor Myron.
Dain growled.
“Bloody Myron. Bloody, fuckin’ balrog! He destroyed me mithril bridge, th’ bastard.”
The mithril masters jumped up and exclaimed in anger and echoed his wroth sentiments, to the point where Kir tuckered himself out and had to sit down.
“Fuck,” Kir said. “I hope I don’ have t’ pee again soon.”
The listeners gasped and exclaimed and wondered at the final escape with the explosion of the mountains and the appearance of the lake.
Ori told of everything he had heard the valar say. Celeborn added the details of the explosion of Dol-Guldur. The Company and Haldir told about how everything had settled and the arrival of the great eagles.
Ori finished his tale with Galadriel sending him into healing sleep.
Dori flopped back in her chair.
“Oh, pet! Such danger!”
“I had to, Dori.”
“I know, pet. But I’m sure I would have fainted at the sight of such a horrid creature as the balrog.”
“Bugger!” Nori replied. “Sheesh, Chick, jus’ leave me an’ our Dori in shade. Make us all commonplace an’ shit.”
“Nori,” Ori said, teasing, “Dori is a bearer and you can walk through walls. Please explain to me how that could be in anyway commonplace.”
“Cheeky li’le mole,” Nori snickered.
“H-hold on,” Arne said. “Lady G-gladriel said she s-sealed the core of the l-library. Where is the c-core now?”
“Tha’s wha’ our Ori asked,” Gimli put in.
“In ‘er bloody handbag?” Baluchistan suggested.
“At the bottom of Misty Lake, sealed against all the elements,” Galadriel cooed, pointedly ignoring the raven.
“Let’s worry about that later.” Thorin raised his hand as Brur looked ready to roar. “So, how long were you asleep Ori?”
“Two days,” Ori answered. “I woke up to find Cemnesta with me.”
“And what did you find amiss with my scribe?” Thorin asked the woodland king.
Cemnesta cleared his throat and folded his hands on the table top.
“While Durin possessed Ori’s body, Durin seems to have brought his own strength with him and, from what Dwalin tells us, dispatched most of the orcs. Unfortunately, this possession resulted in his straining every muscle in Ori’s body. I can only guess that it was Durin’s strength that kept every bone from breaking as well. From what I could deduce from my examinations, as a living dwarf, Durin was quite likely twice Ori’s size.”
“He’s pretty big,” Ori confirmed.
“How dare he!” Dori cried.
“It’s alright, Dori,” Ori soothed. “He appeared when I woke a second time and Dwalin was with me. He apologized and he and Dwalin made it up.”
“I should hope so!”
“If Isildur ever appeared on the end of my bed, I think I’d pass out,” Aragorn said, wonderingly.
“I have encountered ghosts, but I think that would be a bit much for me.”
Arwen nodded, staring at Ori.
“Then what happened?” she asked.
Ori looked at Red Queen.
“You are right, Lord Ori, it is time for our announcement,” she hissed gleefully. She cleared her throat and made a proclamation.

“Since we usually nest within or much lower on mountain sides than ravens do, and as we prefer bones rather than meat for food, and as Lord Ori tells me you haven’t any way of ridding yourselves of bones other than grinding them up for your fields, and as we are now without a home nesting ground, and as the River Running has some rather nice red clay on its banks, we have decided to live here in Erebor.”

Roäc screamed and fell off Thorin’s shoulder, into his lap.

“Goodness me!” Bilbo cried. “Roäc’s fainted!”

“Brother!” Baluchistan squawked. “Get ‘im some brandy!”

Granny Klak immediately offered her vinaigrette.

Thorin righted Roäc in his hand and peered at him, tapping the raven gently on the head. Thorin took the pipe Dwalin offered him, took a pull, and blew a little smoke at Roäc’s beak. Roäc coughed and flapped about, struggling to a perching position. Thorin stoked him. Baluchistan bumbled over, leaving his usual trail of feathers for Kili and the elves to pick up for fletching, and peered at Roäc.

“Yeh alrigh’, brother?”

“Brother,” Roäc said weakly, “that monster’s moving here.”

“Now don’ yeh go fussin’ ‘bou’ tha’,” Baluchistan soothed. “I’ll take care a’ her.”

Baluchistan gave his feathers a major fluffing. Bilbo picked scattered feathers out of the wine cups and off the plates, while Baluchistan strutted across the table to Red Queen.

Red Queen peered askance at Baluchistan and the trail of feathers on the table.

Baluchistan gave another fluff and waggled his tail, then drew himself up in the circle of scattered feathers. He winked lewdly and, grabbed Red Queen’s saucer of wine in his beak, downed it, and made a swinging bow, wings outstretched.

“Hello, me bebeh; hello, me darlin’; hello, me eggtime gal! How’s th’ River Runnin’ runnin’ f’r yeh?”

Red Queen cocked her head. Dain’s head hit the table with a groan and all the elves giggled.

“We believe the River Running runs as it always has,” Red Queen answered carefully, regarding Baluchistan with one eye, then the other. “What are you, exactly?”

Baluchistan hopped forward, so they were all but beak to beak.

“Lassie,” Baluchistan crooned, “I’m yer every wildes’ dream made flesh!”
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And now the continuing saga of Baluchistan…. No, it’s Ori’s story and he’s got more to tell. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori stared. Red Queen was his own height; seated at the table, she was taller. Baluchistan was a cross between a large chicken and a feather-stuffed cushion. Red Queen’s neck lengthened and she craned upward to stare down at the ball of black feathers bobbling about in front of her.

“I could eat you,” she hissed in warning.
“Oh, aye? Try it!”
Baluchistan waved his wings like a fighter brandishing his fists.
The assembled people shouted in alarm as Red Queen’s head flashed forward. There was an explosion of black feathers.

Nothing.
Red Queen spat out feathers and looked about confused.
“Brother!” Roäc yelled, jumping forward.
Baluchistan landed on his own rump on the table in front of Red Queen.
“Missed!” he taunted.
She snaked forward and again there was an explosion of feathers. She was left spitting black feathers out of her beak and choking on them.
Baluchistan smacked down on his head, rolled over, and snickered at her.
“Go on,” Baluchistan squawked. “Have another shot!”
“Baluchistan!” Sculdis bellowed.
Ori saw Roäc leap to the floor behind Red Queen’s chair as his brother hopped about and teased her.

Hissing in anger, Red Queen’s neck lashed out again. This time she stopped short, squalling. Roäc fluttered back up on the table, one of her splendid tail feathers in his beak.

“Ha!” shouted Baluchistan. “Welcome t’ Erebor! Home a’ th’ sons o’ Care!”
“Stop!” roared Thorin.

A different explosion of feathers, a great hooting and clunking erupted, and Kelli somehow leaped up on the table. He clunked several times, his tail feathers on end and his tiny wings flapped madly. He hooted at the two ravens.

Roäc and Baluchistan stared in shock. Red Queen was as startled as they were. Kelli drew himself up and began to intone in a stream of clucks directed at the ravens, flapping little wings for emphasis.

Celeborn got to his feet and tried to reach for Kelli. Kelli gave him a stink eye then clunked at the ravens again. Celeborn sat down.

“We were here first!” Roäc screamed. “Mahal put us here!”
“Bloody right!” Baluchistan put in.
Kelli clucked some more then glared at them. Roäc and Baluchistan glanced at each other then looked at Red Queen.
“I said,” Red Queen managed a cool tone, ruffling her feathers back into place. “We nest lower on the mountain than you and we eat bones, nothing in the way of interfering with you and your aeries.”

Kelli clunked and nodded wisely.

“Fuck,” Baluchistan griped.

Roäc turned and looked all round at the people seated at the table. Quartz looked out from Ori’s shoulder and chirped.

Roäc huffed and croaked.

Thorin nodded gravely.

“Fine!” Roäc snapped. He cocked his head at Red Queen. “You assisted Ori and Mahal in the Quest. I thank you for that. If elves and dwarrow can share territory amicably, then so can we. If you need assistance settling, I’ll hold myself ready to assist you.”

“Bloody right!” Baluchistan put in with another paroxysm of feathers.

Kelli bowed judiciously to both ravens. He crossed to Red Queen and held out a wing. Red Queen stared, then carefully brought up one of her own wings to touch Kelli’s. Kelli bowed over her wing, touched his beak to the tips of the feathers, rose and bowed again then strutted to where Celeborn stood, then perched regally still as Celeborn gently lifted him back down to the floor.

There was a collective sigh of relief around the table.

Roäc strode back to Thorin and fluttered to the back on the chair.

Baluchistan swaggered over to Dain and Sculdis then flopped down on his butt in front of them. Sculdis bapped him on the beak with a finger, while Dain filled a saucer of ale to revive the raven. Dain put it down, muttering “idiot”. Ori had an insane desire to laugh, but realized that would not be a good idea.

Thorin cleared his throat.

“Ori, when you were well enough to travel?”

“Yes.”

Ori schooled his brain back to the end of the quest. The rest was fun. Everyone enjoyed hearing about Beorn, his fountain, and his new kitchen tools.

“If it’s the set I remember,” Binni said. “They were especially commissioned to cook for the Bearers residence. They were said to be divinely inspired.”

“They’re great to use,” Kili said. “No idea how they were made, but the food never sticks to them.”

“I noticed that,” Nomirliel argeed. “They seemed heavier than what Kili was using, but far easier to clean.”

Everyone had something to say about the party at Beorn’s

“Aye,” Dain added happily, “I ain’t had me doodle sack out in ages. Red Queen there liked looking at it.”

She gave a graceful nod of agreement.

Bilbo choked on his wine.

“You showed Red Queen your…doodle sack?”

“Aye, a’ th’ dance a’ Beorn’s.”

“In front of Sculdis?”

“In front a’ everyone. D’yeh wan’ t’ see it? I’ll jus’ go ge’ it.” Dain scrambled up from his chair.

“It’s detachable?” Bilbo gasped.

“Aye, I keep it in a sack.”

“You keep it in a sack?”

“Where else would I keep it?”

“In your trousers?”

Dain stood still, staring at Bilbo,

“Don’ fit, lad. Don’ be daft. Rather hard t’ play it in there.”

Bilbo turned and looked helplessly at Thorin, who was staring at the ceiling and twiddling his thumbs.

“Thorin!” Bilbo cried.
Thorin looked affronted.
“What have I done?”
“Doodle sack?” Bilbo demanded.
“I’m sorry, my treasure, I don’t play the bagpipes.”
“A doodle sack is a bagpipe?”
“Of course,” Thorin said lightly, then pretended to glare. “Why, what did you think it was?”
Bilbo huffed, and turned red. Dain dropped back in his chair and roared with laughter.
“Naugh’y hobbit!” Dain teased
“You hush!” Bilbo told him, and shoved an elbow into Thorin’s side.
Ori finished by telling Dori what Beorn had packed for the baby at which Dori sniffed and shed a few happy tears while Dipfa and Gridr looked excited.
Some of the guests looked puzzled.
Thorin rose.
“I’d like to formally announce that Dori, Bearer of Erebor, and Lord Balin of Fundin are expecting their first badgerling.”
Congratulations and happy exclamations filled the room. Several people hurried over to hug Dori and shake Balin’s hand.
Dori accepted the well wishes with perfect grace. Balin looked glowingly happy and still slightly dazed by the idea.
Oin slapped him on the back.
“Never too old, cousin. Look a’ me!”
Dori shot him a look.
“I hope the pebble will be slightly smaller than Bujni, at least at the birth.”
Oin looked at her this way and that and finally decided,
“Eh. Probably.”
When the merriment had subsided, Ori made a quick run down of traveling in the Greenwood, Cemneste’s reception and Gimli’s initiation and subsequent party.
Ori looked at Thorin,
“Master Brur thinks we ought to wait until the full moon begins to wane to open the past. If you think it right, we should open the box tomorrow. I would also like to request you, King Thorin,” then Ori looked about all assembled, “allow everyone here and those involved on the quest to be present.”
There were a few gasps from around the table.
“Of course, we would readily understand and respect your wish to deny this request,” Elrond said quickly. “It maybe that there are things from your history that you wish to remain private. I’m sure we would happily wait until you decided to share any of the contents with us.”
Thorin stroked his beard, his eyes went to Bilbo then to his family gathered there.
“Lord Ori,” Thorin said formally, then smiled. “This was your quest which came to you from Durin. It is for you to decide who you wish to be present.”
“Thank you!” Ori cried and was out of his chair before he could stop himself from throwing himself bodily on his king. “Thank you so much!”
Thorin patted his back and chuckled. Finally Ori released him and turned to beam around the gathering.
“You’ll all come, won’t you?”
The room resounded with affirmations and cheers.
Brur rose.
“I’ll’ve th’ room ready f’r after breakfast. An’, wi’ Lord Ori’s permission, wha’ th’ fuck’re these books?”
Ori laughed and, with Brur, Elrond, Glorfindel and several others’ help, the books were lined up and placed face up. Sadi helped herself to Brur’s pocket and brought out Teylan’s masterwork.
Brur looked at it again, then snickered, “So, who’s goin’ t’ defend’ th lass’ master thesis?”
“I will.”
Silence.
Everyone stared at Tauriel.
Brur raised an eyebrow at her.
“Yeh a scholar along wi’ bein’ a soldier, lass?”
“No,” she smiled, shaking her red locks. “This Teylan spent her time researching something very close to my heart.” She paused to look down and take Kili’s hand.
He grinned up at her. “I’ll help if you like.” Kili then turned and faced at Brur. Ori saw Vili’s strength in the prince’s face.
“I’m no scholar either, but I think it would be an incredible read and probably she’d think it funny if a married dwarf and elf defended it.”
“I’m certain,” Tauriel went on, “that Teyan’s work is sound and worthy of giving her the accolades of Master even in death. I don’t presume to think that Kili and I can give it the presentation she would, but we will both do our best.”
“Excellent,” Sadi stated.
“Aye,” Brur agreed “Lemme know when yer ready and I’ll set up the room f’r yer defense.”
Sadi slid the book over to Tauriel.
Dis beamed on her son and Fili grinned and ruffled his hair.
“On behalf on the late Teylan,” Thorin said. “I thank you both.”
Bard was leaning across the table peering at a small volume. Balin looked over, then with a glance at Bard, took it up.
“This’s in a language I haven’ seen,” Balin mused and passed the book to Bard.
“I have,” said Bard, his voice barely a whisper.
“Da? What is it?” Sigrid asked.
She rose and went to look over his shoulder.
“Oh,” she said. “That looks like—”
“It does, doesn’t it,” said Bard. “Ori, what is this?”
He slid the book to Ori, who turned it around and smiled.
“That’s a badger’s school book. It’s very old, but still legible. See, this is ancient Khuzdul, this is the old Noldor Sindarin. Oh, here is some Quenya or it might be Telerin and this is the runic that, I believe, became Westron. This… I don’t know what that is.”
Tilda hopped up on a chair and scooted over the table on her hands and knees around the half-empty plates and spilled feathers.
“It’s like Da’s book!” She spun to look at Bard. “It is, isn’t it!”
“I think so,” said Bard. “I could never read it.”
“I’m going to go get it!” she announced and barreled off the table.
“Monster child, you cannot run off through the streets of Dale,” said Thranduil.
She paused and peered up at him.
“’Cose it’s dangerous?”
“Little is more dangerous than you, admittedly,” said the king father. “However, I’m thinking even if you run, you won’t be back before dawn.”
“Furh’nk can take me on Puffball!” Tilda announced, and turned, grasping the startled soldier at the door jamb, by the hand. “C’mon, Furh’nk!”
“Er, with yer permission, yer majesties?” he asked, hanging back even as Tilda attempted to drag him forward.
“I doubt our permission enters into it,” said Thorin. “Bard?”
“Hm?” Bard looked up from the book.
“Do you mind if Furh’nk goes on a special mission with the Princess Tilda?”
“Oh, no, as long as Furh’nk doesn’t mind. Tilda knows what she’s looking for.”
Tilda barreled out with dwarf in-tow.
“Bard,” Ori asked, “is this your people’s language?”
“I think it is.”
“Sure you don’t want to wait until the full moon has past?”
Bard looked up at him with a grin.

“I’m afraid the top of my head will pop off if I do wait. We were always told we came from the far north and east of Arda, bordering the lands of the cold drakes. Later outsiders said we were akin to the people who became the Rohirrim, but nothing about their culture seems familiar to me. We did have a written language, not that I can read it.”

Bilbo hurried around the table and leaned over Bard’s shoulder to look at the book. Bard handed it to him. Bilbo murmured a thanks and returned to his seat. Bilbo paged through then chuckled saying,

“That may soon cease to be a problem. This school book features the same phrases in each language. They’re certainly interesting phrases. I didn’t know elves grew on trees.”

Thranduil raised a brow.

“What kinds of trees? Do we flower first or simply appear as giant fruit?”

Thorin looked up at Thranduil appraisingly.

“I always suspected those twigs were growing out of your head.”

Margr and Vi giggled.

Thranduil slid a gaze over at them, then turned to Thorin with narrowing eyes.

“Don’t tell them that! Now everyone will know from whence grows the royal line. I’ll have to swear you all to secrecy!”

Thorin shrugged.

“They do say: heavy is the head that wears the crown. Or at least the twigs.”

Samwise slid off Boromir’s knee and trotted over to look at Thranduil very closely, then said in a considering way,

“I’ve seen Dad prune shrubbery. I don’t think those twigs are attached.”

“Are you brave enough to find out, Master Samwise?” Thranduil challenged him, looming forward over the faunt.

Sam swallowed, then gave his braces a tug, looked to Frodo, who mouthed, ‘Do it!', and set his lips in a serious line. He reached up and very deftly plucked one twig from Thranduil’s hair.

“I was right!” Samwise cried.

“You were right,” said Thranduil gently, amusement on his face.

Meanwhile, his sons looked on the verge of apoplexy.

Sam frowned.

“If they aren’t attached, how do you get them to stay upright?”

“Magic,” said Thranduil, widening his eyes.

“Oh, well, I’ve heard elves do magic,” Sam allowed. He held out the twig. “Do you want this back, Mr. Thranduil?”

“If you don’t mind. I don’t like to break up a set.”

Frodo turned to Boromir.

“Told you Sam’s the bravest.”

“He is indeed,” Boromir agreed. “I would never have dared to do that. Well done, mate.”

Sam glowed under this praise, reset his braces and climbed back up onto Boromir’s knee, and shoved a cake in his mouth.

“Uncle Bilbo,” said Frodo, “are there any stories in that book?”

“Not as such, my boy,” Bilbo replied, “but there is quite a bit of material here. According to this, somehow hobbits both grow out of the ground and are part rabbit.”

As the grown dwarrow around the table showed degrees of embarrassment, Frodo had a deep ponder. Finally, he came up with,

“Are we roscobal rabbits?”

“I don’t think we’re big enough,” said Bilbo.

“Mebbe roscobals’re yer descendants,” Dwalin offered.

“Dwalin, don’t help!” Ori hissed, giggling then continued in a normal tone. “Bad enough we had to move all that hobbit ‘history’ over to the folklore section of the library.”

Bilbo sipped his wine.
“If it makes you feel any better, it was fascinating reading.”
Fili picked up a nondescript book with a blue cover, flipped it open, scanned the contents, turned raspberry and snapped it shut.
“What is it?” Sigrid asked.
“Poetry. Not for badgers.”
She grinned.
“Naughty dwarrow.”
“Um, naughty elves, actually.”
Lindir looked interested. Fili passed it over to him.
“Enjoy.”
Lindir perused a random passage and looked intrigued.
“I didn’t think you could successfully rhyme those two words.”
Elrond peered over his arm, then his face fell and he went almost as red as Fili.
“What is it?” Lindir asked.
“That’s my brother Elros’ handwriting! I can’t read that!”
Glorfindel deftly plucked the book from Lindir’s hand.
“I can.”
Thorin picked up a fat, square book with fine velum pages. The right hand pages were covered in a variety of finely wrought text. The facing pages each featured a curious, and curiously similar abstract blot of ink. He grinned.
“Roäc, something here for you.”
“Mm?”
The raven hopped over and peered into the book, then cawed and flapped excitedly.
“What is it?” Ori asked.
“My lineage!” Roäc exclaimed. “All the way back to Vrarhar and all the way forward to my sire, Carc. These are their talon prints.”
“What’s in the text?” Ori asked.
“Our greatest deeds!” Roäc crowed.
“And your worst missteps, I’ve noticed,” said Thorin, slyly. “Apparently Vrarhar nearly drowned in Deathless’ mead cup.”
“A bit of nothing. Youthful folly.”
Ori asked, “Roäc, what do you consider your greatest deed?”
“Saving Erebor.”
“And your greatest misstep?”
Roäc’s beak fell open in a raven version of a smile, “Saving Erebor.”
“What about you, Baluchistan?” Dis asked. “What great deeds do you have to your name?”
The raven cracked an eye at her.
“Lassie, tha’ book ain’t big enough.”
“And your greatest misdeed?” she teased
Baluchistan rolled an eye at Red Queen.
“Marryin’ ‘er.”
Red Queen’s neck lengthened to fullest extent.
“We are not married to you. Whatever you are.”
Baluchistan rose, spread his wings and bowed to the company.
“Then, I don’t have any misdeeds.”
He bowed a little too far, rolled over onto his back and laughed.
“That’s a good one. Hear tha’, our Dain?”
“Yer drunk,” said Dain.
“Yeh always were th’ quick ‘un,” said the raven, and he faded into a snore.
Galadriel turned to Bilbo,
“You say it’s a child’s book? Is the writing legible?”
“Oh, the instructor’s writing is perfect. I imagine the practicing of the lines would be on paper or something similar to be long gone. What would the little scholar write on, my dear?”

Thorin turned to Balin, who shrugged.

“Slate shingle and chalk, I would think. Easy to wipe clean and reuse. I doubt paper would be wasted on ones so young and paper would be rather beyond the price of most. What are some of the examples?”

Bilbo turned a page.

“This is the same phrase over and over with a little variation: Elves grow on trees. Dwarrows grow from stone. Hobbits grow from the ground as bulbs. I had no idea I use to be a bulb,” Bilbo commented. “Probably the strange surmises coming from a people who would not have had much contact with any other races other than a little trade, perhaps.”

“I apologize for the added ignorance of my ancestors,” Bard said, shaking his head.

“Don’t,” Thorin chuckled. “There are still many who believe dwarrows spring from stone as they don’t realize dams can grow beards.”

Brur picked up a dainty volume. The paper within was pale pink vellum encased in covers which were once white silk. It had been held together by a pale pink silk ribbon which was now falling to pieces.

“This’s a pretty wee thin’” Bur observed. He opened in and peered at the writing. “Written by some lady elf.”

“That is my mother’s diary which I shall take,” Galadriel held out her hand for it. “Sorry,” Brur tightened his hold on the book. “If it came fra’ th’ library, it’s been cataloged.”

“Then you shall remove the entry,” she told him firmly. Brur shook his head.

“Canna do tha’. Don’t know who received an’ added it t’ th’ collection. Migh’ a bin a gift. I ain’t go’ th’ right’s t’ weed collec’ions I ain’t th’ bibliographer f’r.”

Ori rather thought this was bullshit as Brur was the Librarian of Erebor, and so he was entitled to weed any collection he wanted to.

“It’s my mother’s diary!” Galadriel started, in an aggrieved tone. “She was known as the Swan-maiden of Alqualaondë. Her name was Eäwen of Olwë, the Teleri of Aman. She married Finarfin of the house of Finwë.”

“Sorry, lass. It were in th’ crypt. It were a vital par’ a th’ collection. I canna jus’ discard such.”

“Who would have given it?” Galadriel demanded. “It was sent to me by courier when I married my dearest Celeborn. Nana sent it from her home in Aman, where I presume they still live. They traveled to Arda to see us when Celebrian was born, which was the last time I saw them.”

“Donno who gave it, bu’ it’s par’ a’ th’ collection a’ the Great Library o’ Khazad-dûm. It’s go’ t’ stay.”

“It’s mine!” cried Galadriel. “Eäwen…Nana gave it to me!”

Ori glanced at Thorin, who gave a quick nod.

“Master Brur,” Ori interrupted, “if an exact copy could be created, we could add a codicil to the catalog that it is a copy, so no discard need be made and the collection will remain intact.”

“Copied?” Brur barked.

“An exact copy, vellum and silk, everything reproduced.”

Brur growled.

“Will you accept a copy being made to keep the integrity of the collection?” Thorin asked.

“Who would make it?” Galadriel asked.

“I will,” Ori said before he could stop himself.

Galadriel smiled on him.

“Yes, if you create the copy, Lord Ori, I shall happily wait for it to be made and trust you to restore the original to me.”

“Good, that’s settled,” Thorin said.

Brur opened his mouth.

“It is settled, Master Brur,” Thorin chided gently. Brur hurumphed then settled back in his chair.
“Fine.”
“Lord Ori?” Elrond leaned forward, grinning like a mad creature. “How much would you charge to make another copy!”

Brur gave a shout and Galadriel whirled on her son-in-law.
“Fuck yourself, Elrond!”
There was a collective gasp. Lady Galadriel colored slightly.
“That was unnecessary, I apologize.”
Elrond folded his lips and shook a little, as he tried desperately not to laugh.
“Mahal’s hairy arse,” Dwalin commented. “An’ all o’ us though’ yeh were fierce facin’ tha’ balrog.”
That made everyone laugh even Galadriel.
“What’s in that diary that you put such value on it?” Thranduil asked, eyes narrowing.
Galadriel gave a feral grin.
“Dirt on Oropher and his predecessors to last a century!”

Every elf at the table lunged for Master Brur, who dove under the table.
Ori saw a hand stick the diary into his own satchel.
He looked up to see the chairs empty of elves and the sound of Master Brur roaring and bellowing under the table.

Frodo and Sam disappeared then popped back up.
“They’re tickling him and searching his pockets,” Frodo reported.
Thorin rolled his eyes, pushed back his chair, and bent to peer under the table.
“Enough!” he shouted, which started all the wargs barking and the birds squawking. Thorin rose and patted Sugar and Butter, who sat down again, tails wagging. Gimli grabbed Romy’s head and rubbed the ears.

The elves all crawled out from under the table, Haldir dragging a fiendishly giggling Brur. Lindir politely helped the Master to his feet.

“Where’s the diary?” Haldir demanded.
“I et it!” Brur cried, eyes a light with humor.
“Bullshit,” Glorfindel laughed.
“Brur,” Thorin said tiredly.
“I put it safely away, yer majesty,” Brur replied, regally.
“And they say we misbehave!” Roäc teased.
“Shockin’, brother, shockin’,” Baluchistan agreed. “Wouldn’ yeh say so, Queenie?”
“Shocking, indeed!” Red Queen hissed her version for a laugh. Kelli clunked at Celeborn and brushed his favorite’s robe with a wing.

Aragorn helped his giggling intended up into her chair.
“Safe,” Brur repeated.
The elves looked at each other then at Sadi. Sadi sneered at them and fingered her cane. No one moved.

“If the diary is safe,” Thorin said, icily. “I command that it be conveyed to Lord Ori for him to fulfill his commission. Now.”
“It’s in my satchel,” Ori told him.

“Of course,” Celeborn chuckled. “We should have guessed. The safest place in all Arda is in Lord Ori’s protection.”

“Hey!” Ori protested.
“Never mess wi’ th’ instumen’ a’ Mahal,” Dwalin teased, which brought more giggles.

Bard leaned back in his chair and looked up at Thranduil with a grin.
“What a fine example you are to our children, sweetie.”
Thranduil opened his mouth, blushed, and turned to look where Bard was pointing. Wandi, Cemnesta, and Legolas had come out from under the table together and sat with Bain and Sigrid on their laps.

“Wicked stepmother!” Sigrid said in a reproving voice.
Bain, Gimli, and Tauriel snickered.
“Ada!” chorused Wandi, Cemnesta, and Legolas.
Mahal, Idad-elf!” Fili and Kili teased.

“Oh, hush all of you,” Thranduil muttered, seating himself. Bard put an arm about Thranduil’s shoulders and brushed at his robe.

“Is there a book here tha’ won’ cause a riot?” Balin asked.

Frodo knelt up and pulled a thick one toward himself. He opened it and shrieked with delight.

“Oh!” cried Dis, “Udad told us about that one!”

The book’s pages were several leaves of paper thick. When opened, a beautiful paper room folded upward. It was breathtakingly painted and studded with the tiniest slivers of precious metals and pinpoints of gems.

“That’s the throne room of Khazad-dûm,” Binni breathed.
“Indeed,” Tharkûn agreed. “Thorin, is this what is called a ‘pop-up’ book?”

“Yes,” Thorin smiled, looking fondly at the item. “They are tricky to make and quite fragile. We will have to have a master of such books copy this as well. It needs to be used in the schools.”

“I’ll see t’ it,” Brur promised.

The book was left to Sam and Frodo and, by force, Boromir, to look through.
Balin reach for a blue, slim volume and opened it, then started to laugh.

“What is it, my heart?” Dori wanted to know.

“Th’ legendary pocket book a’ Durin IV’s jokes an’ bad poetry.”

“Read one!” Fili and Kili shouted.

Balin flipped a few pages.

“There once was a lady fra’ Eregion
Who rode on th’ back o’ a lion
They returned fra’ th’ ride
Wi’ th’ lady inside
An th’ smile on th’ face a’ th’ lion.”

Everyone groaned.

“Ori?” Bilbo asked. “Did Durin strike you as the sort who would pen such a terrible limerick?”

“Yes,” Ori nodded. “When I was dreaming that he was sitting on the end of the bed, I told him Dori would murder me if I went on a quest to Khazad-dûm, he said he’d have a nice ale waiting for me.”

“Pet” Dori scolded.

“There’s a few in here dedicated t’ Duswi a’ th’ Orocani,” Balin added.

“Who?” Aragorn asked.

“Duswi,” Balin explained. “She was a master silver smith an’ came t’ train as a mithril master. Married Dain IV. Queen Duswi rather.”

“What does he write about her?” asked Fili.

“Duswi’s a pretty dam
She turns my heart to cram
I’d marry her
I’d carry her
On my head like a tam.”

Noises of disgust came from all around. Ori went into giggles. He leaned over and whispered in Dwalin’s ear.

“You did better than that on the shore at the Inn.”

Dwalin snorted.

“Any’d do be’er than tha’. Tha’s bleedin’ awful.”

Balin flipped a couple of pages.
“Righ’, here’s a couple a’ riddles.”
Silence greeted Balin as he resorted to his magnifier to read.
“How yeh stop a skunk fra’ smellin’?”
“Rug it all over with a tomato,” Bain said authoritatively. “We had to do that three times to Bob when he met one and got sprayed.”
Balin shook his head.
Cemnesta frowned then,
“There is a surgery some healers can do to remove the musk glands, but only if they are very young and to be raised as a beloved household pet.”
Balin shook his head.
“Wash four times in a water solution of lemon juice, cider vinegar, and lye soap?” Wandi tried.
“Yeh hold its nose.”
Everyone groaned.  Haldir sat still, staring then he roared with laughter.
“Hold its nose!” he wailed, sliding in his chair a little.  People started to giggle at him.  Haldir made no effort as he slid gracelessly off his chair under the table.  His laughter drifted up along with the occasional hiccups of “hold its nose” “Another!” Frodo called.
Balin paged through.
“Right, wee laddie, here’s one; Why did th’ elf throw th’ clock out th’ window?”
Frodo frowned.  Ori had a feeling this would end in a vile pun.
“Sam?” Frodo asked.  Sam considered
“He didn’t like it?”
“No,” Balin said, “he wanted t’ see time fly.”
Both faunts giggled delightedly.  Boromir groused under his breath.
“Balin,” Elrond said, “how drunk do you think Durin was when he wrote these?”
Balin chuckled.
“He’s got a neat hand, so I’m thinkin’ he was sober, lad.”
“Aye, an’ now we know wha’ happened t’ him,” Dwalin commented, lighting up another pipe.
Balin turned to him,
“Aye, brother, he and his folk dug too deep an’ woke th’ balrog.”
“Aye,” Dwalin shrugged.  “They woke it, but bloody Durin wen’ down there an’ read his writin’ t’ it.  Th’ only way f’r th’ balrog t’ shu’ ‘im up was t’ eat ‘im.”
Ori choked on his fizzy water as everyone else burst out laughing.
“I believe you!” Galadriel cried.
Bilbo turned to Tharkûn.
“Speaking of horrors, Did you ever find out what possessed the hobbits in Hobbiton?”
“Yes, actually.  Apparently, it was Lobelia’s baked goods.”
“I always knew she was vicious, but I’ve never heard anyone complain about her scones.”
“It wasn’t the scones themselves, but what she added to the icing that made those who partook both easily suggestible and positively mean.”
Bilbo cut his eyes at the wizard.
“I don’t want to know, do I.”
“No, you do not.  I, for one, could have gone the length of my days happily without knowing.  Let us just say, the wraith was involved, so there are no worries about it now.  Not unless young Master Sackville-Baggins goes tromping through the downs again.”
“We can hardly stop him, or anyone else, from doing that,” said Bilbo.
“Hmmm.  Well.”
Tharkûn applied himself to his pipe and Ori realized the wizard had no intention of continuing with the subject.
Bilbo glared at Tharkûn.

“What did you do?”

“I may have planted some illusions along the border between the woods and the downs.”

Ori shot forward.

“What do they look like? Dragons?”

“No, Lobelia’s mother.”

Bilbo shuddered.

“Quite right, my friend. No one will ever go down there now.”

There was a distant crashing of doors.

“Tilda!” they heard Furh’nk bellow.

Tilda rushed into the room.

“What’d I miss?!”

“Bad poetry,” Bain said idly.

“Nothing then, good.”

Furh’nk appeared in the doorway, carrying a wooden box about twenty inches square and six inches high.

The room fell silent. Ori felt a chill go up his spine.

Furh’nk handed the box to Tilda, who placed it in front of Bard.

“Here, Da!”

Age and soot darkened the ornately carved wood, and fire had singed the edges, but for all that, Ori saw beautiful, stylized carvings of birds with long tail-feathers and tall crests on their heads. The birds faced off in pairs, perched upon long tree branches and surrounded by flowers with heart-shaped petals. Traces of red and yellow paint still showed in the deepest crevices.

Red Queen stretched her long neck to peer over Bard’s shoulder.

“What kind of birds are those?”

“No idea. Roosters, I think.”

“Ah.”

Bard drew a cord from around his neck and under his shirt. For an instant a fine dwarven chain flashed in the sunlight. Sigrid had told Ori that Bard never took off the chain and anvil pendant Thorin gifted him. The looped cord, long discolored, stood in stark contrast to the chain, but it held something Bard obviously thought as precious, a tiny key.

“Didn’t you used to wear that?” Ori asked Sigrid.

“Yes, but only to keep the Master from noticing it. By rights it belongs to Da.”

The key turned, the box opened on hidden hinges and flooded the room with a spicy scent.

“Sandalwood,” said Sigrid, “with a cedar inlay.”

Bard withdrew a linen-wrapped object from the box, laid it on the table and unfolded it to reveal a book ancient enough to draw even elven attention. The brown leather had age upon it, but no cracks that Ori could see. Instead it bore strange pock marks.

“Dragon skin,” said Thranduil. “That’s nearly unimaginable.”

“From time to time, my ancestors had to trap and slay a cold drake,” said Bard, almost like an apology. “Apparently, our people started out farther south than we ended up. There weren’t a lot of real flowers that far north, and the neighbors could be inhospitable.”

Bard wiped his hands down his shirt and carefully opened the cover.

The unexpected blaze of color squeezed a gasp from Ori’s throat. Every scholar and scribe in the room practically scrambled across the table for a closer look.

Ori smelled the precious stones that went into the pigments on the hand-decorated pages. Chief among them he recognized gold and lapis, but a dozen other scents wafted over him as well, from two facing pages that revealed a miraculous city-scape.

Bard rose, handed the box to Thranduil, and pushed the book further toward the middle of the table, so more could see.

Squat, arch-roofed houses, the largest graced with rounded domes, sat under a mantel of snow, and lines of smoke meandered into a cobalt-blue sky. Ori could almost feel the cold shimmer off the Jewel-like colors swirled together in patterns on the domes, the walls, the pennants rippling from the dome finials. The largest building in the center of the city was not painted at all, but still honey-colored. Ori squinted, leaned forward, sniffed.

“That’s mosaic of the thinnest amber slices.”

“Apparently,” said Bard dryly, “amber was very big.”

Tharkun chewed on his pipe stem and considered.

“You can’t read this book?”

“No, though I have a general idea that it’s the history of this city, forward until sometime in the middle of the Wandering Days,” said Bard. “Mostly, I’ve just looked at the pictures and wondered how I could possibly be related to these people. If I wear more than two colors at once I start to itch.”

He moved further through the pages and closer in time and Ori saw what he meant. A king and queen, clad in gold and jewels, sat on gold and bejeweled thrones. The king wore layers of robes, each a different color than the last, and the queen seemed to wear billowing bloomers beneath layers of gowns with different patterned hems. Between the raiments and their jewelry, their ornamentation took up most of the page and it was obvious that the massive constructions they wore as crowns were not actually attached to their heads, but suspended from the backs of the thrones themselves.

Dipfa, Arne, and Nodun, who was now standing on the sideboard, sketched like mad things, though Ori feared Dipfa’s motives. He did not want to wear whatever Dipfa was designing. Instead, he turned back to the royals on the page.

Ori thought their features familiar, and not just because Bard had descended from them. Their skin was brown, their brows dark, their eyes almond-shaped with heavy lids without creases. They looked like-

“Bard, is your family part borjeval?” Ori asked.

“Not that I know of,” said Bard. “Their features do seem closer to Jim’s than mine, though, don’t they.”

Jim leaned over the page and grinned.

“I like to think my ancestors wouldn’t wear chandeliers on their heads, even if they had chandeliers, which I don’t recall seeing until I got to Arda proper. We were more the seal oil lamp types. You wouldn’t want to wear one of those on your head, either.”

Bard turned the page again. A very handsome young noble appeared to be slaying a dragon with his bow and arrow.

Bain said, “That’s the prince who got kicked out.”

Thranduil looked over at him with amusement.

“Incorrigible Stepson, do you mean he was exiled?”

“No, really, kicked out, on the point of his da’s boot,” said Bain earnest. “His da didn’t age really well, and he got nervous that his son was growing up and would overthrow him someday, so the king got rid of the prince, but that was really a bone-headed move.”

“The prince was his only heir,” Thranduil ventured.

“Not only that, but about ten years later, the kingdom was overrun by orcs, and since the prince had taken the best fighters with him, well, things went down the toilet really quick for the king. The prince’s people wandered around for decades, and eventually founded Dale. Well, they didn’t have a lot of choice. They were out of money and this is where they ended up.”

“The book,” said Bilbo. “Those divits on the cover. They don’t mark where jewels once sat, by any chance?”

Bard sighed.

“Our luck only ever changed to get worse.”

“May I?” Bilbo asked, gesturing to the book.

“Please. You’ll probably get more out of it than I ever could.”

“Oh, I don’t know about that. Right now I’m examining it more from a book arts point of view. Elrond, look at this. Look at the stitching!”

Bard raised a brow.
“They always looked like plain old stitches to me.”
Elrond smiled gently.
“If they were just any old stitches, this book would have fallen apart long ago. Your ancestors were master bookbinders.”

“An’ master builders.”

Everyone turned to Master Kir now standing behind Elrond on the elf lord’s chair, had plastered back his hair to his forehead with one hand to get a better look as Elrond turned the pages. Elladan and Eolohir got Master Kir his chair and Elrond moved so the Master could be seated beside him.

“Thanks, laddies,” Kir nodded then glued his attention back to the book.

“Look a’ th’ vaults along th’ buildin’ foundations,” Kir murmured, his gnarled finger tracing the page. “Cold caches, probably, sunk int’ th’ ground?”

“I can’t tell you,” said Bard. “I can’t read the text, so the diagrams are of limited help.”

“Did yeh jus’ say ‘diagrams’, laddie?” Kir laughed. “Here, Pr’fessor Baggins, best translate this right quick. Our Bard may be sittin’ on priceless treasure.”

“I’m sure if there was anything valuable left when the orcs were finished, it was carted off long ago,” Bard protested.

Kir shook his head.

“It’s no’ jus’ gold as glitters, lad. Never know wha’ yeh’ll find.”

Bilbo and Bard grabbed their chairs over, the assembly sifted and soon they had their heads together, with Kir and Elrond over the book.

Arwen took up another which was twice a tall as it was wide. This proved to be a ledger for all trading agreements between the dwarrow of Khazad-dûm and Rohan people. Arwen passed this to Eowyn, who paged through and giggled.

“What did you find?” asked Dipfa.

“I don’t read khuzdul but whoever kept this ledger was quite the artist.”

She grinned and slid it over to Ori. Ori opened it. There were many detailed sketches of elves, men, and horses. Whomever the artist had been, they were obsessed with the height differences the races and their mounts. They had drawn what men wore and what women wore. There were several sketches of elves where the artist had noted that it was unknown where the elf was male or female, both or neither. The occasional name recorded in phonetic khuzdul noted that names gave no hint of sex either.

Ori giggled at this and passed the book to Celeborn and Galadriel.

Mistress Dazla entered and requested the Bearer to make room for her to serve afternoon tea.

Aragorn put down his tea cup as Arwen closed the pop-up book with a smile.

“It’s beautiful,” she told Thorin. Thorin chuckled and glanced down at the two snoozing faunts now in his lap.

“It is,” he agreed. “I’m sure making a few copies of this available in the other dwarf kingdoms, in Gondor, and other great cities, will bring back the handicraft.”

“Lady Eowyn,” Thorin turned his gaze. “Do you think such a thing would be popular among your people?”

She considered a moment.

“It is certainly amazing and something children would enjoy as it is like our tapestries. They and our songs hold the history of my people. I would like my uncle to see them.”

“I shall have a copy made and send it to him,” Thorin decided.

“That reminds me,” Aragorn said with a look at Arwen, who burst out laughing.

“Yes,” Arwen managed, “do tell dear Thorin about what happened the day after the Misty Mountains blew up.”

“What?” Thorin said a slightly worried look on his face.

“Well,” said Aragorn with a pause to thank Dori for another refill of tea. “We found the most enormous pile of weaponry, swords, and axes in the main courtyard in front of the palace.”

Thorin face palmed and everyone else chuckled.
Sandy blew in the open doors and landed on Aragorn’s shoulder, tweaking his ear and leaning over to tap her beak gently on Arwen’s cheek.

“Are you telling the story, King Sweetiepie?” she chirped. “It was such fun! King Sweetiepie wakes up and goes to the balcony and there’s an enormous pile of swords and axes in the middle of the courtyard. And he says to Darling Arwen, ‘Dearest, We need to write to King Thorin. The dwarrow have been at it again.’ And she starts to say, ‘How do you know it was the dwarrow?’ But then they just look at each other and laugh. Ooo, is that bacon?”

Dori put a plate full of bacon in front of her.

“Oh, and there’s Prince Quartzie-Wartzie! How are you keeping, your highness?”

Quartz twitched.

“Fine, cousin.”

“Lovely!” Sandy enthused, before massacring her bacon.

“Really?” Balin asked the Gondorian royals, tiredly.

“Oh yes,” Arwen corroborated. “That’s why we headed your way as soon as possible.”

“We left Boromir’s younger brother, Faramir, in charge.”

Arwen frowned a little. Aragorn nodded.

“Faramir,” Eowyn questioned, then turned to Boromir. “Have I met him?”

“It was that one time your uncle came with you and Eomer to Gondor,” Boromir replied. “I think we were all still in our teens.”

“Was he that quiet young lad, who watched us horsing around in the stable yard?”

“Yes,” Boromir grimaced. “I wish father wasn’t so hard on him. He’s a fine, studious lad and an excellent archer. He doesn’t lack fighting skills or bravery. He’s a good leader. I suppose father wanted another loud mouth like me.”

“Denethor,” Bilbo said coolly, “needs to stop expecting Faramir to turn into Glorfindel.”

“Thank you,” Glorfindel laughed. “There’s only one of me, thank Eru!”

“Thank Eru indeed,” Thranduil murmured, shifting slightly as Tilda sprawled on his knees, half asleep.

“What bring you here, Sandy?” Aragorn asked leaning forward to stroke the raven.

“Oh, King Sweetiepie!” Sandy cried. “Dear Fary ask me to come. Beastly has been bothering him at all hours of the day. The poor boy is trying his best to keep everything running, and he’s doing it very well as everyone likes him, but Beastly keep nagging him about Mr. Shire.”

Aragorn, Arwen, and Boromir frowned.

“Beastly?” Eowyn asked.

“My father Denethor,” Boromir grumped. “I wish he would leave Faramir alone for five minutes.”

Bilbo made an impatient noise.

“Why would Denethor have anything to say to me?”

Eowyn stared at him. She opened her mouth, then closed it, then turned to glare at Dwalin and Ori, who snickered.

Bilbo went on. “He knows perfectly well I received the printing proofs last week as I sent him a message saying so and he replied asking me to finish with them next month.”

“Oh,” Sandy said airily. “He wants Fary to bring an apprentice sized press to Erebor and teach some of the dwarrow here to assist the master printers, so Beastly can expand his holdings.”

“Indeed?” Thorin’s eyebrows went up. Boromir blushed, Arwen rolled her eyes, and Aragorn looked put out.

“Sandy,” said Aragorn, “when you are rested, please return to Gondor. Tell Faramir I am delighted to hear of his progress and am in no way surprised by it as I knew that he would do well. Tell Denethor that any expansions of his holdings require the proper trade agreements, just as they were required when he opened that press in Bree. He is to submit his plans and requests through the proper channels, as he is well aware. Until this is completed, neither I nor Faramir while he acts for me, are willing to pay heed to any such talk.”

“Goody!” squeaked Sandy. “I hate ol’ Beastly anyway. He’s no fun and he’s such an orc to Fary.”
“Sandy,” reproved Arwen.
“Well, he is,” Sandy grumbled and flitted over to Aragorn’s shoulder, creep behind his head and settled herself in his tunic’s hood.
“Thorin,” Aragorn said, “I apologize that you had to hear that. As much as I respect Denethor’s passion for making books available to as many as possible, I do not hold with his encroaching behavior in regard to expanding his business.”
Thorin nodded to Dis, who smiled at the Gondorian king.
“When we hear from you about the trading requests, I shall be delighted to meet with Master Denethor.”
“Dis is my trade minister, as you remember,” Thorin grinned.
Aragorn swallowed a chuckle and inclined his head.
“I look forward to your meeting with Master Denethor, ma’am.”
“May I watch?” Boromir asked.
“You can guard him, if you wish,” Aragorn replied in a teasing tone.
“I’ll supply you with popped corn,” Thranduil offered, sending the younger set into giggles.
“Sister?” Thorin said.
“Yes?’ Dis smiled sweetly at him.
“Yes, and?”
“No punching him in the teeth.”
“Awww.”
Arwen looked around.
“Princess, did you not have a trade apprentice?”
“I do have one, yes. You’re wondering why he’s not here? He’s working. He does that. A lot.” Dis shook her head. “I’ve tried to get him to rest, or at least slow down, but he looks miserable if he’s idle too long.”
Bofur sighed.
“Yeah, he gets that from ‘is folks. Definitely an Ur thing.”
“Namad,” said Thorin, “You think he’s hurting himself?”
“I was worried before, but now I think he may be craftwed. He never looks tired and his work never suffers. He’s terribly happy just to add long columns of numbers and put together proposals. He also has a mean right hook, as several of our more recalcitrant guild heads have discovered.”
Eowyn looked alarmed.
“You really do hit each other at trade negotiations?”
Dis shrugged.
“We are dwarrow. Sometimes things get heated and devolve into a brawl. In some guilds, it’s almost a tradition.”
Before anyone could comment further, Great of Heart flapped in and landed in the middle of the table and shrieked at Thorin.
Bilbo sliced up a sausage and some bacon. He gave this on a saucer to Great of Heart, who ate placidly. Bilbo removed the attached letter case, opened it and held the letter for Thorin read it aloud over the heads of the sleeping faunts.

“Hail Brother King,
This missive come with wishes for you good health and happiness.
I have been reassured by the Lady of the Golden Wood that the eruption in the Misty Mountains was for the good of dwarrow and engineered by your Aüle.
The following morning, most of my lands within sight and reports from heralds around have stated that Rohan is now growing beautiful blue poppies and other mountain wildflowers. I shall presume this was also an act of your Aüle as they were fully growing and blossoming by dawn. We were concerned at first that the strange flowers might prove poisonous to our horses. Instead, they're stuffing their faces with flowers and acting like frisky colts. We usually have only white flowers, or sometimes pink, but these are an exceptionally beautiful blue.

I have had further report that Helms Deep has acquired new bathing areas and kitchens fully equipped, deep within the hold and that they are fantastically decorated with beautiful mosaics and there are hot springs available throughout.

Would this also be an Act of your Aüle? If so, please advise us on how to render appropriate thanks.

I also understand my niece now visits you. As much as the Lady of the Golden Wood has my deepest respect, may I render the care of Eowyn to be shared by Princes Dis, your gentle sister and the Honorable Bearer, as well, so that like myself and Theodred, she may learn the correct manners and ways of Erebor and the Dale.

I hope to visit your splendid mountain again soon.

Cordially,

Theoden

—It may be sooner than you think. I fully admit I miss you and your family a great deal!"

Eowyn groaned and looked at Dis.

"Please, ma’am, I don’t need that much supervision!"

Dis snorted.

"I don’t have time to supervise you. Don’t agree to marry anyone you meet in a pub. Dori?"

Dis looked at Dori, who had taken Theoden’s letter when Thorin passed it to her.

"Mmm?" Dori glanced at Eowyn, vaguely. "Don’t slouch in your chair like that, dear childling, and don’t play cards with Nori."

"Oi!" Nori objected but winked at Eowyn.

"I’m rather good at cards," Eowyn tried.

"Nori cheats," Ori put in.

"Oi!" Nori shouted again as Bofur nodded at Eowyn.

"Eowyn cheats, too," Boromir commented to no one in particular.

Eowyn looked about her for something to throw. Fili grinned and chucked a scone to her.

Eowyn looked a little surprised but gamely threw it at Boromir. The March Warden had learned his dwarrow manners well, caught it easily with his mouth and ate it. The younger set cheered, waking Frodo and Sam, who cheered, too, not to be left out.

Dipfa trotted over and around the table to Ori’s side. She peered at Quartz, studying the raven intently then,

"If I may, I need to measure you, Prince Quartzite."

Quartz turned to her, and Ori could read the trepidation there.

"More Bujni experiments?"

"No, your highness, I simply feel remiss. You were the only one of the Company to enter Khazad-dûm who didn’t get a jumpsuit."

Quartzite screamed, then gathered himself back together.

"Generous, but not neces-.."

"With your name on a little patch on the breast."

"Really, I’m fine-.."

"It’ll be like a little shirt with spaces for your wings. It will tie down the back."

Quartz opened his mouth to protest, but simply sighed.

Dwalin gave his beak a light tap.

"Tough mornin’, our Quartz."

"Tell me about it."

Dipfa went contentedly back to Bujni, who politely drew out her chair for her.

"Well,” Dori put in. “It is far past time for our guests to go to their rooms and rest. It will be dinner in a couple of hours and I know we all want to relax and change. Nothing formal,” Dori added hastily. “Just a nice family supper.”

Celeborn and Galadriel exchanged looks with Aragorn and Arwen.

“Did you skip breakfast this morning?” Celeborn asked.

“Yes,” Aragorn laughed.

“So did we,” Jani replied.

Cemnesta blushed.

“I knew I’d forgotten to pack something on board.”

“I think we were all too blasted excited t’ remember it,” Dain mused.

“Then this tea will tide you all over until dinner,” Dori said and rose. “I’ve put you all back in your old rooms, so you’ll be comfy.”

Mistress Dazla appeared and ushered the guests off with her upstairs.

“Now come with me, pet,” Dori took Ori’s hand and led him off to the small sitting room.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. What a long day Ori’s having and it’s not over yet. Poor dwarf won’t get to open the box until tomorrow and he still has to absorb the things still happening and a lesson in never trying to hide anything from the Honored Bearer. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

We would like to give a huge shout out to @papermachette on Tumblr and their beautiful little drawing “Dori-sees-these-two-and-thinks-maybe-this-time-he-won’t-leave”. It’s in her Tumblr archive under the date: August 1, 2013. It was the inspiration for a little scene in this chapter.

Dori put on the fire, lit some lamps and sat down where he had when Ori and Balin had first brought Dori to Fundin house. Dori patted the seat on the couch next to him.

“No, pet.”
“Ori did so, saying,
“I’m fine, Ori’s Dori.”
“I know, pet, but—”
Nori came in, shut the door behind himself, and sat down in front of them on the low table. Dori frowned at Nori, then,

“Pet, you said you were in the Halls?”
“Yes, I—”
“You wouldn’t have known any of our adads, but did you see amad?”
Ori’s heart sank. He had almost decided not to say anything to Dori or Nori about this.
“Well—”
“You did see her, then.” Dori knew him too well. “Did she recognize you?”
“Yes.”
“Did she speak to you?”
“Yes,” Ori hedged desperately.
“What did she say, pet?”
“Um…nothing really important.” Ori wanted to leave the room, but Dori was holding his hand and Nori was planted right in front and staring hard at him.
“What did she say?” Dori coaxed.

The jumble of Rikmha’s cruel words rushed back. Ori felt his anger rise and tears pricked his eyes.

“She’s horrid! Why did you always say nice things about her?” Ori demanded of Dori.
“Because I wanted you to have only happy memories. What did she say?”
It all came out in a rush.
“She was mean about you and Nori and she called me a runt and said that you weren’t a real Bearer and you’re delusional and only wanted money and it was all lies and Nori never looked after her and—” To Ori’s annoyance he began to cry. Dori’s arm was about his shoulders. Nori was growling. Ori’s words burst out of him again.

“She killed yours and Balin’s baby and she doesn’t care and she doesn’t even think you were pregnant or a bearer and thinks we’re all bad children!”

“Pet, as I’ve always told you, you are my baby. I don’t missed the child I lost, because I have you.”

“I don’t care!” Ori cried. “Even if it had meant there was no me, and even if she didn’t believe you were pregnant, she had no right to do what she did to you!”

“Me an’ Dori’d’ve missed you, Chick,” Nori patted Ori’s head. “You know fine well, ye’re th’ glue that holds the Brothers Ri together.”

Ori curled around, pulling his feet up, half lying in Dori’s lap, put his face in Dori’s shoulder and sobbed.

“I hate her! She’s horrible and cruel and doesn’t give a stone or anything for us!”

He felt Nori sit on the couch, lifting his legs, and putting them on his lap.

“She’s dead, Chick. No point.”

“I don’t care!” Ori raged ineffectually. “She was so mean about you both and you raised me and were so good to me and I love you both so much! It makes me so angry to think she was mean to you. She doesn’t deserve either of you as a son!”

“Shhh, pet,” Dori soothed rubbing his back. “Nori and I have come to terms with it long ago, so it’s nothing to us.”

“’S right!” Nori agreed. “We knew what she was all about. We just never wanted you t’ know. Bein’ such a nice liddle fing that you are. Best you fought we’re all a happy family.”

Ori thought this over while Dori petted and cooed over him. Ori remembered he had just led a divinely ordered quest, returned in triumph, was proclaimed a Hero of the Realm and here he was crying like a badger into his older brother’s tummy. He sat up, wiping his eyes.

“I’m an idiot, I shouldn’t let that bother me.”

Nori snorted and Dori kept an arm about him.

“Now, pet. This is something from your badgerhood. Something you’ve always relied on. Nori and I only wanted to shield you from such a…an unnecessary hurt.”

“S’right, Chick. We didn’t fink it would ever come back t’ bite our arses.” Nori pondered a moment. “Leastways, not like this.”

Ori gave a watery giggle. Dori patted his back. Ori raised an eyebrow at Dori. Dori smiled serenely and continued to pat his back.

Ori waited.

Nori waited.

Dori waited.

Ori heaved a sigh and burped. Dori laughed and gave him a hug as Nori shouted.

“Clever liddle lad!”

“You’re both silly,” Ori pouted.

“Well, pet, I have to get back in the way of things. It’s been quite some time since I had to care for a wee badgerling.”

“So you’re going to practice on me?” Ori demanded, trying to be severe but giggling. “No, and Balin won’t either.”

Dori wrinkled his nose. “I do hope Balin will start getting in the way things. I try and talk to him about baby things but he just shakes his head and says there’s plenty of time. Silly dwarf.”

Ori took Dori’s hands and patted them overly carefully.

“Now Dori, you know he’ll start behaving properly soon enough. Won’t he, Nori?”

Ori turned to look at Nori, who was back sitting on the table.

“Yep, he will, don’t you worry yourself all over that, our Mother Goose.”

“Exactly,” Ori went on in a too soothing voice. “I know you’re worried, but do mind me and Nori in this case, because we both can assure you.”

“Yep, ’course we can,” Nori nodded wisely. Even having no idea what plan Ori had suddenly hatched, he played along easily.

“Assure me of what?” Dori demanded, an edge to his voice that told he was now well aware he was about to be pranked.
“That things are, you know, different,” Ori placated.
“Different?” Dori asked. “Different how, may I ask?”
“Different, dearest,” Ori cooed. “Aren’t they, Nori? Things are different, you know.” Ori paused before he delivered his punch-line. “When you’re married.”
“When you’re married proper, our Dori.” Nori corroborated.
“Why you wicked badgers!” Dori cried. His tone was scolding, but his eyes were alight with laughter. “You’re both quite, quite dreadful! I shall repudiate both of you. Yes, right this minute!”
Nori slid over and sat on one of Dori’s knees while Ori climbed on the other, shoving Dori back into the couch as they hugged Dori and each other.
“Get off, you silly pebbles!” Dori shouted. “You’re both too heavy to sit on me! I’m squashed!” They heard a knock at the door and Balin’s voice.
“Beloved?”
“It’s all right, dearest, you may come in.”
Balin entered, then pulled his shoulders back.
“Beloved, yeh canna keep yer brothers on yer lap any more.”
“I’m not keeping them! They did it themselves and they’re squashing me!”
“Ori’s Dori!” Ori cried.
He peppered Dori’s face with kisses.
“Nori’s Dori!”
Nori joined in, the pair of them giggling, while Dori was reduced to indignant squalls and Balin smiled indulgently.
“Good thin’ yer so sturdy, beloved.”
“Nori! Stop licking me!” Dori cried indignantly. “That’s disgusting! Stop slobbering on me, both of you!”
He heaved them both off his lap, Ori onto the couch, Nori onto his arse on the floor, the pair of them helpless with laughter.
Dori shot to his feet and tried without success to brush himself off.
“Look what you’ve done! I’m all wrinkled! You’ve ruined this tunic!” He grabbed them both under an elbow and whisked them to their feet. “Such behavior! And in front of Lord Balin! I thought I raised the pair of you better than this!”
Lord Balin snickered into his beard and waved an indulgent hand.
Dori said, “I tell you, Lord Balin, I did my best!”
Nori aped, “He did his best, Lord Balin.”
Ori added, “And who could blame poor Dori?”
“Hush, both of you!” Dori ordered. He released them and went to his husband to the chants of “Ori’s Dori!” and “Nori’s Dori!”
“Best get used t’ it, beloved,” said Balin, kissing Dori fondly. “We’ll have another underfoot soon enough.”
“That one I’ll raise properly!”
Dori flounced out with a backward look of love. Balin winked at Nori and Ori and closed the door behind him.
“Alright now, Chick?” Nori asked, ruffling Ori’s hair.
“Yes. I think so. Dwalin’s and Thorin’s mams were there, and Dwalin’s mam is lovely.”
“Did you punch ol’ Rikmha?”
Ori blushed.
“I tried.”
“Tried?” Nori’s eyebrows twitched. “If she hit you-”
“She didn’t get a chance. I went for her and Idris, Dwalin’s mam, grabbed me, chucked me over her shoulder, carried me back to their table, and told me there was no point as it wouldn’t teach her anything.”
Nori grunted, considered, then “Probably fer the best. Fer you, Chick.”
“Then the ceiling became fire, just like I said. And Mahal’s big Hand came through and remade Rikmha, right in front of everyone. She was molded into a baby. I screamed that He better not make that Dori’s baby, but He told me to hush as He’d already made for Dori. I suppose she’ll be born somewhere soon."

“Huh,” Nori allowed. “May have t’ go find her an’ kill her.”
“No,” Ori frowned. “We’re the Brothers Ri and we’re better than that. She may never remember, but if she ever does, and we meet, we’ll show her we’re better than she ever was or could be.”
Nori looked fondly at Ori. Ori grinned.
“Yer a proper liddle rascal,” Nori said with a chuckle. “’Sides me Bo, yer th’ only one who kin smile and make me do whatever ya want me to. I’m a bloody fool. Serves me righ’ fer fallin’ fer ya when ya was nothin’ but a liddle froggy. Starin’ up a’ me in yer liddle purple onesie an’ gigglin’ all cute.”

“And grabbing your nose and pulling it?” Ori teased.
Nori laughed.
“Yeah, an’ me beard an’ me eyebrows. Grabbin’ everything’ in front a’ ya, ya li’il lizard.”
Ori blinked innocently then grabbed the end of Nori’s nose and pulled. Nori gave a yowl and Ori fled the room for the kitchen where he guessed Dori was. Nori gave a bellow behind him. Ori almost reached the kitchen when Nori bounced out of the wall in front of him.
“Ha! Got you, you liddle mole!”
Ori dove between Nori’s legs, scrambled up, plowed into the kitchen, and whisked behind Dori. Nori barreled in and yelled.
“That bleedin’ badger yanked me snoot!”

At the kitchen table sat Thorin, Dwalin, and Fili and Kili. Bilbo was helping Mistress Dazla as they flitted about the kitchen, making the final preparations. Fili and Kili gaped then exchanged confused looks. Thorin snickered and Dwalin roared with laughter.

Dori drew herself up and smiled reprovingly at Nori.
“Now, duck,”
Ori peeked around Dori’s shoulder and giggled. He stuck out his tongue at Nori, who moved to pounce. Dori made soothing clucks, forcibly pushed Nori to the table, and shoved a biscuit in the open mouth before Nori could say anything else.
Dori turned and looked at Ori with a frown over dancing eyes. Ori folded his hands behind his back and peeked up at Dori.
“Naughty badger,” Dori cooed and cuddled him. “How many times have I told you not to pull our dearest Nori’s little nosey.”
“Sorry, Ori’s Dori,” Ori tried to sound remorseful, but couldn’t keep the giggle out of his voice.
“Very good,” Dori said with too much gravity. “Now what do you say to Nori?”
Ori turned and looked at Nori. Nori was frowning horribly but his eyes twinkled. Ori blew a raspberry at him. Dwalin and Thorin laughed.

“Ori!” Dori said with mock severity.
“I’m sorry, Nori,” Ori grinned.
“And what are you sorry for?” Dori prompted, obviously stifling giggles. Fili and Kili had joined the mirth at this point, fascinated by the family dynamics on display.
“I’m sorry your nose is so pullible?” Ori tried.
“No,” Dori scolded, the laugh creeping into her voice. Nori frowned harder but started to shake.
“Sorry, I’ve got a good grip?”
“Ori!”
“Sorry, I pulled your nosey,” Ori giggled.
“Very good,” Dori praised and shooed Ori away with a spank. Ori went and climbed into Dwalin’s lap. Dwalin was still chuckling.

“Yer a menace, love.”
Ori looked at Dwalin, “Didn’t you and Balin go after each other like Nori and I do?”
“Nah, Balin’s more an age a’ Dori an’ I were always gettin’ int’ mischief wi’ our Thorin.”
Ori looked at the princes.
Kili shrugged.
“We fought plenty but I don’t think we ever pulled each other’s noses.”
Dis came in followed by Jani.
“Mam?” Fili turned to Dis. “Did Kili or I ever yank each other’s noses?”
Dis paused and stared at her sons a moment then managed,
“What?”
“When we were badgers. Did Ki or I ever yank each other’s noses?”
Dis rolled her eyes.
“Yes, but then you were both so full of remorse you held each other and cried and were covered in snot.”
Kili said, “Oh, that’s alright then.”
“Excellent,” Dis said rolling up her sleeves. “I’ve got a cake to make, so all of you who aren’t here to cook, get out.”
Ori hopped up and grabbed Dwalin’s hand.
“Come and see Fanny.”
“Aye, sure, love.”
The pair of them went out to where Bain, Tilda, Frodo and Sam were romping around the meadow with the younger Gamgees. They were deeply involved with knocking the First March Warden and the King of Gondor on their asses. Legolas, Gimli and Bard shouted encouragement, while Thranduil serenely combed Wandi’s hair for him. Ori could hear them murmuring in quenya.
Arwen, Eowyn, and Sigrid were lounging on the grass, sitting in the space between Fanny’s legs as the oliphaunt lay on her belly in the late afternoon sunshine.
Ori and Dwalin came over.
“Doesn’t she look wonderful?” Ori enthused.
“Aye,” Dwalin managed before Fanny’s trunk snaked out, seized him around the waist, and lifted him forward. Dwalin chuckled and bowed his brow against her huge one.
“Yer lookin’ well, lassie,” he said, giving the start of her trunk a rub.
Fanny rumbled happily and set him gently on his feet again.
There was a loud bleat and Gnasher galloped over. Dwalin snorted, turned, and rushed the ram.
Ori settled himself next to Sigrid.
“Wrestling time,” he commented at Eowyn’s surprised face.
She laughed and looked about her.
“It’s beautiful here,” she said simply.
“And instantly feels like home,” Arwen added.
“That’s Dori’s fault,” Sigrid told them. “You come in and Dori’s fussing over you like a mother and stuffing you full of food.”
“You’ve know Dori a long time, haven’t you?” Arwen said.
“All my life,” Sigrid answered, snuggling up to Ori. “Mam died when Tilda was born and Dori helped Da raise us. I think I’m so used to dwarf ways, being in the mountain with dwarrow feels as natural as being in Dale among men does.” She laughed again. “Probably why I fell so hard for Fili.”
Eowyn giggled. “He’s very handsome. It’s funny at first I thought that he and Kili were complete opposites, but sometimes now, it’s hard to tell them apart. They remind me of Lord Elrond’s twins. They do that…thing, you know.”
“Yes,” Ori agreed. “I think it sometimes drives Balin scatty. He was their tutor.”
“Poor sod,” Eowyn commiserated.

Ori settled happily at opposite Thorin in Thorin’s and Balin’s shared office. Balin sat at his own desk, sorting through papers. Elrond, Galadriel, Aragorn, and Arwen entered.
Galadriel immediately perched on Bilbo’s desk stool which was tall for the hobbit but a fine size for Galadriel to sit and draw up her feet to the second rung. She wrapped her arms about her knees. and looked pleased. Aragorn and Arwen sat on the sofa and Elrond took the chair Balin indicated.

“It’s very nice to have my scribe back,” Thorin commented with a smile to Ori.

“It’s nice to be back,” Ori agreed. “I feel like I’ve been running around madly.”

“Just time t’ catch all a’ yeh up b’fore dinner, wee brother,” Balin said genially. “Here’s the main happenin’s while yeh were asleep in Lórien. Read ‘em aloud, Ori.”

Ori took up the first scroll and opened it.

From the Account of His Highness, Arne, Prince of the Ironfists
A great explosion rocked the world.
In Erebor, we felt the lava jump in its tubes, not just once, but five times, each time more violent than the last.

In the Great Library, books and scrolls fell from library shelves and all over the mountain bells tolled wildly; the stone foundations of the city twisted and strained as alarms sounded at the mines and dwarrow scrambled to raise the emergency evacuation lifts.

I was looking out over the vast, panicking throng as it fled the mountain, when Lord Nori arrived, grasped me by the elbow and pulled me. I do not understand where or how, only know that when he let me go I stood beside King Thorin and Professor Baggins on the threshold of the main gates of Erebor.

The king urged calm, even as the dwarrow swarmed past him.

Then, to the south, what seemed the entirety of the Misty Mountains heaved into the air atop a fountain of fire and smoke. The panic was indescribable, though the king and Professor Baggins merely joined hands as they watched, their faces set in resolve. Roäc, king of the Ravens of Erebor, alit on King Thorin’s right shoulder and waited there for what would come.

Then, all at once, the great plume of fire, rock and ash that should have destroyed us all, simply vanished and the rock below us stilled, and the lava deep in the earth continued in its channels as if nothing had happened at all. The horizon, though, looked oddly flat and wide, and for the longest time, everyone, dwarrow, men, hobbits and elves, stood and peered out at what seemed like floods of rainbows across the horizon.

A great commotion went up in the direction of Dale, and the crowds parted for King Bard and King Father Thranduil, riding the great elk at full tilt into the courtyard and up to the steps. King Bard leapt from the elk before it even stopped, and was shouting even before he alit.

I have tried to preserve the dialogue just as I heard it.
King Bard demanded of King Thorin, “How did you do that?”

“What?” King Thorin asked. “Blow up the Misty Mountains?”

“The statues!” King Bard replied. “They fell from the sky and planted themselves on every street corner in Dale!”

“What do they look like?” Professor Baggins inquired.

At that moment King Father Thranduil alit. In a voice completely calm, he explained,

“They appear as individual carvings of dwarrow, each on a plinth, and each with a street sign hanging from the outstretched, pointing hand and a crystal lantern looped around the thumb.”

“I mean, it’s very useful, obviously,” said King Bard. “We hadn’t gotten around to it ourselves, but, when did the craftsdwarrow have time? Did Bujni catapult them from the ramparts as a sort of practice run? And street signs?”

King Thorin, was visibly surprised, but he considered for a moment, then replied,

“Actually they had time over several thousand years. If they are as you describe, the statues once lined the approach to the royal throne of Khazad-dûm. The street signs seem to be a more recent addition. As far as I know, Bujni was not involved.”

“Oh,” said King Bard. “Well, pity to waste them I guess, but how did you move them?”

“We didn’t,” said King Thorin. “I believe it was Mahal.”

“What about the toilet, then?” asked King Bard.

King Thorin paused for several seconds, then ventured, “Toilet?”

“Thranduil came out of the bathroom and thought I was wonderful for commissioning him a toilet
“No, I did not,” said King Bard. “No matter the temptation. Is this also the work of Mahal?”

Professor Baggins agreed, “Bit out of His line, I should think.”

“Diamond,” King Thorin mused. “A diamond toilet seat and tank cover? Off white, rather bluish diamond?”

“Yes!” King Bard replied.

“That belonged to Nali, regent of to King Nain,” said King Thorin.

“No, I did not,” said King Bard. “No matter the temptation. Is this also the work of Mahal?”

Professor Baggins agreed, “Bit out of His line, I should think.”

“Diamond,” King Thorin mused. “A diamond toilet seat and tank cover? Off white, rather bluish diamond?”

“Yes!” King Bard replied.

“That belonged to Nali, regent of to King Nain,” said King Thorin.

“Why would I get that?” King Bard asked.

“I imagine it wasn’t for you particularly, but for Thranduil,” King Thorin replied.

“At my expense?” King Bard persisted.

“Revenge?” King Thorin answered. “Nali erased everything that wasn’t about dwarrow, particularly about Longbeards. Imagine his prized toilet seat going to an elf. And not just any elf. The elfiest elf who every elfed.”

At that moment, a tiny black dot emerged from the shifting colors on the horizon, and in time, out of the sky flew Quartzite, a prince of Erebor’s ravens. He alit on King Thorin’s left shoulder and squawked and croaked in King Thorin’s left ear while King Roäc seemed to be asking questions via the king’s right ear.

What King Thorin heard must have pleased him.

King Thorin turned to look at him in collective puzzlement.

Then Gwaihir, King of Eagles, and his court arrived, alighting in spots cleared by the awed and scattering crowds. Some eagles bore among them a huge wooden crate. The eagle king himself carried Lord Balin Fundinul and Lady Dori, Bearer of Erebor, upon his back. King Thorin handed down Lady Dori to the cheers of the crowds and stepped forth with Lady Dori on his arm and proclaimed that the Bearer was pregnant.

An old dwarf in the crowd shouted, “It’s Mahal! The explosion! It was Mahal impregnating the Bearer!”

Lady Dori snapped, “Don’t be ridiculous! Lord Balin impregnated the Bearer… I mean me!”

But the crowd had taken up the old dwarf’s words and deep as the panic that had ruled moments before, there was merriment in the streets.

Young dams and women approached with great reverence and asked for a touch of the Bearer’s hand, which she gave quite generously.

Meanwhile, Lord Balin explained to King Thorin about the appearance of the box and the eagles. King Thorin and King Gwaihir bowed to one another and King Thorin gave his thanks and ordered venison brought up and piled on the side of the mountain for the eagles to refresh themselves.

Master Brur arrived with wagons and librarians to bear the eagles’ burden into the mountain and down into the depths of the archive. I was bidden to follow.”

Ori rolled the scroll back up and put it in its labeled casing.

“Poor Arne!” he giggled. “I’m glad I asked Quartz to fly home and tell you.”

“As we all are,” Thorin mused. “I don’t know if I would have been able to contain the riot.”

“Yay,” agreed Balin. “Sendin’ me an’ me beloved on th’ eagles back here wasn’t a bad idea either.”

“I simply must call upon dear Thranduil and Bard,” commented Arwen.

“Indeed,” Galadriel smiled. “We simply cannot leave Bard and Thranduil without a visit to try their new…er… convenience.”

Ori picked up the next scroll.

From the Account of Omibur, Daughter of Erda, Journeyman Scribe
Having decided that the explosion was Mahal impregnating the Bearer, many dwarrow and people would not accept the truth, that the Bearer’s visit to Greenwood was a ruse to cover up a quest to the depths of Khazad-dûm - and that Khazad-dûm and the southern Misty Mountains were no more because of it.

Lady Dori was obliged to go by carriage with Lord Balin and myself beside her, block by block through Dale and market to market under the Mountain, to explain all that had happened. King Thorin and Professor Baggins rode their ponies to the right of the carriage. A man brought King Bard his horse, so that Dale could accompany the carriage as well.

Lady Dori was very patient with the crowds. She wore a caftan of Fundin red and green silk as the sun over Dale was quite hot, and she cooled herself with a fan of raven feathers. She seemed to enjoy the attention as she was fortified with flasks of strong iced tea and lavender sweet cakes.

By evening she declared herself fatigued and ready to return to Fundin House. It was then that the first ravens from outside of Erebor arrived to tell what strange changes had seized the peoples and landscape of Arda.

“Other changes?” Ori asked, staring at his brother-in-law and his king.

“Oh yes,” Thorin sat back in his chair. “Balin, do you have the letters and copies of my replies in the order they were processed?”

“Aye, lad,” Balin chuckled, putting a pile of smaller letters that had obviously been sent by raven in front of Ori.

“Yes indeed,” agreed Elrond. “I had a missive from Lindir’s assistant that my entire house and several others in Inmaldris are filled with roughly a thousand years worth of guild minutes from many different guilds in Moria. As far as he has been able to ascertain, they do contain some rather good gossip. I have ordered him to organize them by guild and dated order and, once I have the scribes to do so, we shall extricate the gossip for you, Thorin.”

“Thank you, I look forward to it,” Thorin chuckled.

“Did it fall out of the sky like Beorn’s fountain?” Ori asked.

“The assistant did not relay such,” Elrond replied amused. “From what I gather, people woke in the morning and there were the bound books scatter everywhere throughout houses, gardens, and upon several rooftops. Apparently my bath, fortunately empty, was full and piled high with the notes from the guild of woolen merchants.”

Ori swallowed, giggled, and took up the first from the open file folder titled.

Letters received and sent by His Majesty, King Thorin II, Oakenshield Transcribed/Filed by Lolibur, Daughter of Erda, Journeyman Scribe.

The first one was remarkably brief and to the point, as Ori read it aloud.

From His Majesty, King Gheir of the Stiffbeards:

Thorin,

What in Mordor’s bloody name have you done? All my wives are pregnant at the same time! Except for Mavey, I presume, and I don’t know where she is! We heard and felt an explosion; we assume the Longbeards were responsible, as usual.

Best,

Gheir

The second and third were lighter in tone and reflective of style of the writer, which delighted the group in the study.
From His Majesty, King Ahkn of the Stonefoots:
Dear Thorin and Brood,

You blowing up mountains again? Anyway, we hear Queen Arivett’s ‘expecting’. We don’t know what exactly she’s expecting, but that Eomer fellow doesn’t mess about. Hear about all Gheir’s wives being pregnant at once? Hope his diaper changing skills are up to it.

Best,

Ahkn

From His Majesty, King Ulfr of the Ironfists: Thorin, where did all these fucking elves come from?
-Ulfr

Ori snickered delightedly at Ulfr’s single line of script, pressed so hard the runes were distinct on the back of the paper. He took up the first of Thorin’s replies. It was delightfully brief. Ori could tell Thorin had roared with laughter as he wrote, as everyone in the room was laughing now.

From His Majesty, King Thorin II, Oakenshield:
Dearest Ulfr,

Which fucking elves would these be? You have to specify. I didn’t order a gross to be delivered to you, if that’s what you’re saying.

Best,

Thorin

P.S. I assume the smoke coming from the direction of your mountain originated in your ears.

From His Majesty, King Ulfr of the Ironfists:
Thorin, Never mind.

From His Majesty, King Thorin II, Oakenshield:

Dear Ulfr,

?

Best,

Thorin

From His Majesty, King Ulfr of the Ironfists:

Dear Thorin,

Upon closer study, I’ve discovered that all these elves, who seem to have crawled up from under rocks all over my mountain, are actually reincarnations of some relatives of mine. This includes my parents, my maternal and paternal grandparents, my late brother and his husband, and my old maths tutor. Sucks to be me right now.

Best,

Ulfr

From His Majesty, King Thorin II, Oakenshield:

Dear Ulfr,

I swear, this is not my fault! I am, however, giggling like a lunatic. Enjoy yourself!
Seriously, I have no idea how this is possible without the will of both Eru and Mahal together. I have not had any other reports for surfacing elves, except for those in the elven realms who at one point had been turned into Orcs. Eru and I haven’t spoken recently, but I’m thinking Iluvatar lost a bet.

Best,
Thorin

“Mahal!” Ori gasped, staring and paging through the letters again. “And here I thought the only elves that had come back were elves who had been originally ensorcelled by Sauron to become orcs. Now there are elves who used to be dwarrow?”

“Indeed,” Thorin nodded, his lips held a ghost of a smile. “Apparently there will be more than just the meetings of friends in the Great Halls. People will experience not just a different life but a different people. More lessons to learn.”

Ori considered, then frowned.

“That must be very odd. If they are remembering their lives as dwarrow, but are now cast and remade as elves…” Ori swallowed again. “It must take a lot of getting used to. Elves are almost twice our height.”

“Imagine being that tall, and going back to your old home and having your legs hang out the bed from your knees,” Balin murmured.

“Elbereth!” Arwen got her breath back. “Dearest, can you imagine?”

“If any were warriors,” Aragorn reflected. “Their center of balance will be wildly off.”

“I was thinking more about forgetting to duck going through doorways,” Thorin replied. Ori choked.

“Poor Ulfr’s going to have to deal with a lot of elves with headaches and bruised foreheads.”

“Keep goin’, wee brother,” Balin said with an aloof smile.

From Her Highness, General Aris, Princess Consort of the Blacklocks:

Dear Thorin,

You must have heard about Arivett’s being with pebble. I was initially writing to warn you that Hild was on a tear, throwing things, screaming, and threatening to ride out to Belegost to rip off Eomer’s balls, but this will no longer be necessary. I discovered the magic word. Apparently, it’s ‘grandpebble’. Hild, Terror of the Orocanis, is going to be a granny, and so am I. I’ve pencilled ‘sweetness and light’ into Hild’s schedule, for the next five minutes anyway.

Best,
Aris

“Oh how nice,” Galadriel said. “I shall send her a congratulatory gift.” Elrond and the Gondorian couple agreed they should also sent presents.

From Her Majesty, Queen Hild of the Blacklocks:

Thorin,

Why is there suddenly a new mountain outside my bedroom window, a stone cairn in my throne room, and a pile of shale in my bathtub? The mountain completely blocks the view!
Don’t try to deny it, I know you Durins are responsible!

Hild

“Your Aüle seems to have a strange obsession with filling bathtubs with things that don’t belong in them,” Elrond said in mock complaint.

“Maybe Ulwe likes them,” Ori said, before thinking. “He does run hot and cold.”
Elrond stared at him.
“Ulwe? The Valar of Water, runs… That’s terrible.”
“That’s what Mahal said, anyway, and I think He meant it to be.”
Everyone snickered and Ori went back to reading.

From His Majesty, King Thorin II, Oakenshield:

_Dear Hild,_
_Oops._
_Love,_
_Thorin_
_P.S. Congratulations on the impending pebble._

From Her Majesty, Queen Hild of the Blacklocks:

_Thorin,_
_How did you know I was pregnant?_
_Hild_

“Great Mahal!” Ori exclaimed. “She’s pregnant, too! Aris will be completely gray-haired when we see her next.”
Thorin grinned evilly.
“Keep reading.”

From His Majesty, King Ahkn of the Stonefoots:

_Dear Thorin,_
_Queen Hild and I seem to have miscalculated a roll in the mines down memory lane. In the excitement of current events, we each thought the other had taken their tea, and neither of us had. Good thing Oin sent more linament. I’m going to be chasing a toddler again - and at my age! I’d say I was too old for this shit, but apparently, I’m not!_ _Best,_
_The Adad-To-Be_

From His Majesty, King Thorin II, Oakenshield:

_Dear Ahkn,_
_Congratulations! A lifetime supply of linament is on its way. I told you that you were not old._
_Now you see what you get for not believing me!_
_Best and Warmest Wishes,_
_Thorin_

From His Majesty, King Gheir of the Stiffbeards:

_Dear Thorin,_
_Did you hear about Hild? I am laughing through my tears. Oh, wait, the tears are because I’m laughing._
_I think that I’m allowed this moment of glee, since I’ll shortly be up to my ears in pebble shit._
_Best,_
_Gheir_

Balin handed Ori an official scroll bearing the king’s seal.
“Better read this before yeh go on, wee brother. It was distributed throughout th’ dwarven world, t’ be posted in all gathering’ places an’ announced by criers.”
From His Majesty, King Thorin II, Oakenshield
To: All Dwarrowdams, Bearers, and Dwarrow in the Dwarven Realms
Greetings. If you do not wish to produce dwarflings at this time, please drink the proper teas and take every precaution.
We are suddenly extremely fertile.
Blessings of Mahal upon you all.

“We’re having pebbles?” Ori yelped.
Balin raised a brow.
“Some of us’r havin’ pebbles. We’ve no’ all changed bits overnight.”
“But, yes,” Thorin added, “we are experiencing a sudden and definite boom in expectant parents. Everyone is claiming Mahal is responsible, but I think at least two other people were involved each time.”

From Her Majesty, Queen Arivett of Beleghost
Dear Thorin,

We got your letter and thank you for your warm wishes. I was expecting my honored amad to come riding in on her battle ram with an axe to chop off my husband’s bits, but I understand she was persuaded that being an umad trumped her plans for revenge.

I awoke the morning after half the Misty Mountains fell to discover an enormous marble arch, taller than the mountain of Beleghost itself, before the front gates of the realm. My beloved, while understanding my shock, couldn’t understand why I kept going on about the marble. Admittedly, not my most queenly moment:

“But, it’s marble!”
“Yes, my wife. I know what marble is.”
“No. No. It’s marble. It’s Khazad-dûm marble. It was only mined from one place in Arda - which is now a lake bed.”

Ori continued on through the stack of missives when he came upon letters in a different style and on different paper than dwarrow used. Everyone gathered was thoroughly enjoying the missives.

“Wait,” said Ori. “These are from the Shire to Bilbo.”

“Yes, and Bilbo graciously allowed us to enter them into the record,” said Thorin. “After he stopped laughing so hard he couldn’t breathe. Read on, Ori”
The first was in a childish hand.

To: Uncle Bilbo Baggins, Erebor
From: Merry.
Dear Uncle Bilbo,

Lobelia Sackville-Baggins is screaming all over Hobbiton because a dwarf statue appeared in her front garden that we’re not supposed to look at. We looked anyway, and it’s terribly naughty. Mrs. Sackville-Baggins’s face turned purple and everything. It was great fun. We were hoping her head would pop right off, but none of us really wanted to catch it.

When you marry King Thorin, are you going to have to wear a crown and behead people and things?

Best wishes,
Meriadoc Brandybuck
Son of Saradoc Brandybuck, Master of Buckland.
At the enquiring looks, Thorin smiled, saying, “Meridoc or Merry, as Bilbo tells me he is called, is a cousin of Bilbo’s but as he is closer to Frodo’s age, he addresses Bilbo as ‘uncle’."

The next was in a mature hand, but covered in blots and scratches, some ripping the paper, as though the author was extremely angry and writing in fury. “What exactly-“

Bilbo stuck his head in the doorway with a grin. “Has he found it yet?” Thorin nodded. “He’s just getting to it now. Read it aloud also, please, Ori.”

* Bilbo,

_You tell your filthy wizard to get this disgusting statue out of my front garden immediately. Don’t deny you were involved, this is obviously a dwarf statue and in an indecent state of undress._

* Lobelia

“Oh, look,” said Ori, “she included a sketch.” Bilbo said, “Yes. Who knew she had it in her?”

Apparently, Mahal had dropped the gigantic figure, arm outstretched and finger accusatorially pointed right at Lobelia’s smial door. That wasn’t the only part of it pointing. “Yes, it’s not bad,” said Ori. “I don’t recognize it, though it’s nice how it’s standing at attention. All of it.”

“Binni said it’s a fellow named Arr the Lawgiver,” Bilbo informed them. “He was reputed for the length of his… diatribes.”

Balin looked amused and held up a sheaf of paper. “Apparently tha’s no’ th’ only one. I’ve reports from rangers tha’ say a statue of a dwarf warrior marks each mile along th’ Grea’ North Road.”

The next letter to Bilbo looked to be official stationery, and the handwriting looped and swirled and appeared to roll its loops eccentrically left and right.

* From: Gerontius, Thain of Tooks, Great Smial of Tuckborough
To: Bilbo Baggins and Co., Erebor.

Dearest Bilbo,

Well, here is a to-do. Not the Lobelia thing. That’s just funny. This is different and a most perplexing predicament.

This morning I was awakened before first breakfast by a riot of some sort out in the courtyard. When I leaned out the window to look - and you’ll be happy to know I took my nightcap off first, since I was being official - I saw a lot of the young Tooks were chattering and yammering around something they obviously thought was important. Didn’t look like much going on to me. I thought with all that fuss, that at least the pigs had got into the garden. But, no, as it turned out, earlier that morning, a load of barrels rolled themselves through the gate and assembled themselves into a pyramid at the front door.

We figured them for dwarfish, as here’s the mark on them, but we’re afraid to open any of them.

My khuzdul’s not up to snuff, so we’re hoping you can tell us what we’re dealing with, and if it will explode. Please tell us soon, as they’re still blocking the door.

Best wishes,

Grandfather Took
From: Bilbo Baggins and Co., Erebor
To Gerontius, Thain of Tooks, Great Smial of Tuckborough
Dear Grandfather,

Thorin tells me the barrels are marked with the official seal of the High King of Dwarrow at Khazad-dûm. They contain dorwinion wine, at least a thousand years old. Either it’s really good wine or very interesting vinegar. You’re either going to be potted, or having a lot of salad, or both.

Love,

Bilbo

“Oh my,” Ori managed. “All that dorwinian. I hope no one tells Thranduil.”
“I propose we make a pact,” Elrond suggested.
“No need,” Thorin sighed. “He was here when the letter arrived. He informed us he prefers newer vintages. Keep going, Ori.”

From Her Majesty, Queen Hild of the Blacklocks:
Thorin,
The mountain outside my window seems to contain extraordinary amounts of metals and there a slim vein of mithril. Tell Dis we’re going to have to renegotiate the contract for less mithril and more clear gems.

Hild

“Can that be done over distance or should we expect another visit?” Ori asked.
Balin chuckled and stroked his beard, “It kin be done either way, wee brother, but we better hold ourselves ready f’r visiting’ jus’ in case.”

From His Majesty, King Ulfr of the Ironfists:
Thorin,
We started excavations in a fresh section of the mountains last week. Overnight, the newly opening caverns resealed themselves with solid rock. Cheeky things. The vibrations felt different than they had the day before, so we put a pike through one wall and a gas spewed out. We corked the hole up right quick. Not sure what this gas is but any who got a breath of it spoke two octaves higher than usual for a few minutes. There’s another gas we discovered, which we filled a bottle with. I put a tinder to it and it’s amazingly flammable.
This is amazing. I have a great deal to do.
Will write again when I find my eyebrows and mustache.
Ulfr.

From His Majesty, King Gheir of the Stiffbeards:
Dear Thorin,
After hearing about first my wives then about Hild the next morning I woke to find that the palace grounds now contain a giant walled garden with lots of stone shapes for badgers to play on.
The walls are covered with mosaics from which my historians inform me are from the nurseries at Khazad-dûm.
I am making the presumption this is some sort of Longbeard thing.
“Ehh, that must’ be a sigh’,” sighed Balin.
“I’ve heard about the royal nursery from Thror,” Thorin commented idly looking up at Bilbo, now seated on his knee. “He always said they were magnificent.”
“I imagine they would be,” Aragorn said. “Your Aüle seems bent on sharing out all the wealth of Moria.”
“There jus’ a couple more, wee brother an’ then we can head to th’ sittin’ room f’r dinner,” Balin encouraged.
Ori took up another brief note.

Our Thorin and family,
I’ll have to trot over for another visit some time or you can come visit. My wife is pregnant again and I woke up this morning to see my docks have been improved by a huge new pier of fine stone, inlaid with mosaics my queen tells me are from Khazad-dûm. The pier is twice the size of the old one, which was already respectable for a deep water port, and this new one has wrought iron lampposts twenty feet tall at the least, and there’s a lantern on each, lit with the brightest phosphorus stones I’ve ever seen.
You’re going to have to tell me all about this as soon as you can.
Love to you all,
Chat.

“I must write to Chat,” Galadriel mused. “Elrond, help me think of something I can send to amuse his children.”
“I don’t know about amuse,” Elrond smiled. “But your dried apple rings dipped in honey would certainly delight them.”
“Oh, of course,” she nodded. “Perhaps you could make a couple of those twig hoops you made for Arwen. She had such fun rolling those along the paths.”
Balin stretched.
“Aye, I had one of silver when I was a badger. Yeh have a matchin’ stick t’ smack it t’ keep it rollin’. Gave it t’ Dwalin when he got t’ th’ age I’d played with it.”
“Did he play with it, too?” Ori asked.
“Nay, his back teeth were comin’ through an’ he chewed it in half then flattened it. He kept it though.”
“I remember that flat silver stick,” Thorin said with a grin. “He took it everywhere. He would always poke things with it: rocks, hornet nests, visiting dignitaries he didn’t like. When he could get away with it, his adad.”
Balin rolled his eyes while everyone laughed.

From His Majesty, King Ahkn of the Stonefoots:
Dear Thorin and Brood,
I think the Valar had a mix-up. I’ve received a trophy that ought to be Gheir’s.
Two mornings after I first wrote you, my kingdom woke up to a new sculpture in the middle of my main square.
It’s a giant, white marble penis with diamonds seeming to drip down it.
As I said, I’m thinking it should be for Gheir. Oh well, I’ll bask in the reflected glory. It is glorious and it does shine.
Best,
Ahkn
Ori fell back in his chair and laughed. Thorin grinned at him.

“And now you know what happened while you were away.”

“Thorin,” Ori recovered and sat up again. “This seems a trifle ridiculous. What in all Arda were the valar thinking?”

“Well, Ori,” Bilbo said merrily. “You are the one who speaks to them on a regular basis, perhaps you could ask on all our behalf.”

“I did promise cookies,” Ori reflected.
The door to the office opened.

“Why are you all still in here?” demanded Dori. “I’m ready to dish up!”
Feasting, Frivolity, and Fornication.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Ori has to catch up on what's happened while he was away and the guest have to eat! The last part has lots of sexy bits, so if you don’t like sex, you can skip it, the first part is fun because Nori-Pori and Mask are in it. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

And a shoutout to our @VacationPlease for the lettuce and mayo decorations!!

Ori rose, putting away the correspondence. He lingered as the royals went out. He looked up and saw Balin waiting for him to hand over the scrolls and papers.

“Balin?”
“Wee brother?” Balin smiled at him with a quizzing look.
“Are…are you…um…alright?” Ori wasn’t sure how to frame his concern. Balin’s eyes widened.
“Tha’s ’n odd question, laddie. Why wouldn’t I be?”
“I was worried,” Ori floundered. “The happenings in the Great Halls I told you about. Your parents.”
“Ah,” Balin nodded and smiled. He raised a finger and turned to stow the correspondence away before turning back to Ori.
“Laddie, I’m old. I’ve had a long time t’ consider. What yeh told us, gave me joy. Adad’s ashamed of himself. He’s learned what he didn’t in life, no matter how hard Dwalin an’ I tried to teach him. There’s a reason I became Lord of Fundin House an’ head of th’ family b’fore Fundin was killed in Dimrill Dale.”
Ori stared at Balin.
“You…you defeated him in a claim for the head of the family?”
“I did, lad. When he reached full recovery, Dwalin challenged him f’r me second an’ defeated him. Fundin marched with us a’ mine an’ Dwalin’s orders to Dimrill Dale. Even although Thror didn’t want him t’ go any more than he did himself.”
“Dwalin said he was alright,” Ori ventured. “I was just worried about you, brother.”
Balin chuckled and pulled Ori into a hug then released him, patting his shoulder.
“Yer a dear wee lad, Ori. I’m tha’ proud t’ have yeh in me family.”
Balin put his arm back around Ori’s shoulders and they followed the party through to the sitting room.

Dori and Mistress Dazla were shooing people to the long table that now took up most of the room. People crowded in, seating themselves with no real thought to formal arrangements other than leaving the chair at the head for Thorin and the seat on the left for Bilbo.

All the doors were propped open, to allow the warm breezes to flow through the room.

Dinner began with platters of thin toasted bread covered in either tomatoes and bavlo cheese or slices of cucumber or thinly shaved ham with soft cheese and tiny slices of spring onions. These were accompanied by potato salad and bowls of new peas dressed with a light oil.

Kili and Tauriel seemed to be competing to see how much bavlo cheese they could consume while Fili badgered Kili for details about the quest. Sigrid was telling the Dale news to Tauriel making the elf maiden shriek with laughter.
Lindir and Elrond were aghast that Lady Galadriel had acquired a large crowbar.
“What are you going to do with it?” Elrond asked.
“Carry it with me,” she shrugged.
“What for? You can’t go about with a crowbar. What would you do with it?”
“You carry swords about all the time. I'll carry it like that. That way I can whack things with it.”
“What things?”
“Things that need to be whacked, of course.”
“I’ll engrave it f'r yeh, lass.” Dain promised.
“Thank you, dear Dain.” Galadriel’s smile sparkled.
Elrond gave up. Celeborn grinned at his son-in-law and Galadriel helped herself to more toast with ham, cheese and onions.
This was followed by hot turkey slices dressed with parsley sauce, and a sheet tray with puff pastry covered in cheese and asparagus, roasted golden. This was accompany by a pasta salad, a new spinach salad and Mistress Dazla placed a large plate before Haldir.
“The Honored Bearer and I pressed dear Lady Galadriel for her recipe.”
To Ori’s horror, the plate held a perfection salad, jiggling on a bed of lettuce and decorated with mayonnaise. Haldir smiled fondly at it and thanked Dori. Lindir’s and Elrond’s eyes lit up. Elrohir, Arwen, and Elladan made disgusted faces.
Ori shoved turkey in his mouth. He finished his plate of that and Dwalin put a chunk of puff pastry with asparagus and cheese in its place.
Dori was praising this and Bilbo was explaining it was his mother’s recipe.
Cemnesta had sent over for a haunch of venison which the staff had dressed with a lovely blackberry glaze and Bard had brought a catch of trout, which had been lightly fried.
Ori did not squeak as Mistress Dazla bought out a great platter of chips.
Elrond, Lindir, and Haldir divided the perfection salad among the three of them as no one else wanted anything to do with it.
Dessert made up for it as Mistress Dazla had made a xocolātl steamed sponge with a dark xocolātl syrup to pour over and candied cherries and sweetened whipped cream to go with it.
There were several audible moans of delight as dessert was consumed.
After dinner the entire party adjourned to the patio. Drum, viol and doodle sack came out and eventually post-food lethargy gave way to dancing. Ori only danced a while. He had nervous energy to spare, but dancing wasn’t where he wanted to spend it.
He sat in Dwalin’s lap in one of the lounge chairs, watching their family and friends disporting themselves. When the musicians rested, Ori began to think he and Dwalin had paid off any debt of civility they owed.
“Do you think they’d notice if we just slipped away?” Ori asked.
“Yer Dori would.”
“We could plead tiredness.”
“That’d get us 'n invite t' a nice cup a' hot milk t' help us sleep.”
“You’re right,” said Ori, standing. He held out his hand to Dwalin, who smirked as he let himself be towed across the paving stones toward Thorin and Dain, the two Durin kings talking animatedly over a pitcher of beer.
When they arrived, Ori bowed and loudly requested of Thorin, “Permission to adjourn to our chambers, your majesty?”
Everything stopped dead. As Dori darted forward, Thorin, with a twinkle in his eye, replied, “Permission granted, m’lords. Sleep tight.”
“Night, everyone!” Ori cried, turned on his heel and towed Dwalin into the house behind him.
Inside the house, Dwalin asked, “Do we ge’ time t’ brush our teeth, Lord Ori?”
“I suppose we must,” said Ori with a long-suffering sigh.
“Yer gonna pay fer tha’, yeh know.”
“Who wants to live forever anyway?”
Ori tossed his clothes into the hamper and lay down, naked on his back in the exact middle of the bed, his arms and legs splayed, and wriggled against the sheets with a happy groan.

He loved this bed.

He worked his arse down into the mattress and arched his back to rub his shoulders into the pillow.

Impatiently, he whisked his hair from between his back and the bed, letting it spill over the pillows.

“Mmmm, yes,” he murmured. “That’s it.”

“Fancy yeh startin’ without me.”

Ori’s eyes flew open.

Dwalin stood at the foot of the bed, naked, grinning wickedly. Then Ori saw his hand gripping the bedpost, knuckles white.

“Ori.”

It was on Ori’s lips to apologize, but he fought that back and smiled up at his husband and held out a welcoming hand.

“Dwalin.”

In the next instant Dwalin loomed over him and pressed his mouth against Ori’s. Heat poured off Dwalin, a vibration of despair as well as passion.

Ori broke the kiss.

“You, my husband, need seeing to. Tell me what I can do.”

Dwalin pulled back, uncertainty in his eyes.

“Ori, love…”

“Dwalin, so help me, if you tell me it’s all right, you don’t need whatever you need, I will write bad poetry about you for a year.”

The warrior drew back in horror.

“No! No’ tha’!”

“Oh, yes. I’m quite evil, as you know,” he said archly, before the archness bled out to tenderness.

“Dwalin?”

Dwalin hesitated only another moment.

“I want yeh inside me.”

Ori bit back a squeak. His heart took off at a gallop and sweat broke on his brow. Right at that moment he would have gladly served himself to Dwalin with barbecue sauce.

When he was certain he had command of his voice, he said, “Tell me what to do.”

“I don’t think I could do anythin’ fancy. I’m too far gone.”

Ori mentally paged through everything he had absorbed from Queen Kivi.

“You want to ride on top? Then you can control how fast and hard.”

Dwalin nodded.

Ori wished he could wipe the uncertainty from Dwalin’s face. Then he thought of something.

He gave a little smile and rubbed his cock against Dwalin’s thigh.

“Just promise me you’ll kiss it first for luck.”

Dwalin’s mouth curled up naughtily and Ori felt triumphant.

Ori licked his lip, mouth suddenly dry.

“Do you still have the oil?”

Dwalin gave a quick nod before rooting around in the drawer of the bedside table.

Nori-pori chose that moment to tumble out of the basket, yawn, stretch in all directions at once and jump on the bed.

“Oh, I don’t think so,” said Ori. “Get down!”

The cat flicked an ear at Ori, then skittered up to lick his face.

“Dwalin!”

“No’ t’ worry. Go’ somethin’ f’r ‘im.”

He drew a tiny stuffed mouse from the drawer and swung it by the tail, instantly drawing feline attention.

“You keep that in there with the oil?”

“I put it where I was afraid we’d need it. It’s full a’ catnip.”

Mask, who had been lounging back in the basket, suddenly sat up with interest. Nori-pori got down into a crouch and wiggled his rear end.

“Go git it, yeh li’le hairballs,” Dwalin muttered, and flicked the mouse off into the corner.

Instantly the cats fell upon it, tearing it to shreds in a fragrant cloud of catnip. The cats rolled around in it ecstatically.

Great, thought Ori. I bet I looked like that five minutes ago.

“Um, what do we do now?” Ori asked.

“We court death,” said Dwalin.

He went to the door, opened it and whistled back, dangling a second mouse for the cats to see. The moment they moved he tossed the mouse into the hall, and when they went for it, he shut the door behind them.

“Alone a’ last.”

“Dori is going to murder us for that.”

“Aye, so we have t’ make th’ mos’ a’ tonight.”

Dwalin climbed back up onto the bed. He smiled down on his husband, and smoothed a hand up and down Ori’s torso, through the newly thickened hair.

“Yer li’ a great, ginger tom.”

“I’m not leaving, even if you throw catnip.”

“Guid thin’ f’r me.”

Dwalin took up the oil jar, tossed the cap back on the table and poured the oil over his fingers. Then he handed the jar to Ori and turned slightly, so Ori could watch Dwalin spread his own cheeks and slather the crack of his arse, massaging the opening. Ori was mesmerized. His body remembered the feel of Dwalin’s fingers on him there. He itched to try it himself, but Dwalin’s breath was already speeding up as he breached himself with a finger, moving in and out, and then slipping in a second before moving again, stretching his fingers apart and back, twisting them and spreading himself.

When he finished, Ori went to pour the oil into his own hand, but Dwalin stopped him.

“Wait a mo’. We’ve go’ a deal,” said Dwalin. He leaned down and pulled Ori’s cock gently toward him. They locked eyes as Dwalin kissed the head.

“Oh,” Ori breathed.

They smiled at each other and Ori felt his face burn, but the heat was pure happiness and the anticipation of pleasure.

Ori went a little crazy coating his cock with oil.

He raised a sarcastic eye to Dwalin.

“I’m not sure a gallon will be enough, are you?”

“I thin’ we’ll muddle along,” Dwalin assured him.

He took the jar and put it aside.

“Yeh ready?”

“I am. Are you?”

Dwalin’s smile only widened as he leaned over and kissed Ori’s mouth.

“Backward ‘r forward?”

Ori blinked at him, not sure for a moment what he meant.

“Backw- Oh! Forward, please. I want to see your face, not your backside.”

“No?”

“Maybe next time.”

Dwalin eased a leg over him, tall enough to clear the tip of Ori’s standing cock, and took the length in hand, guiding it to his entrance.

Terror seized Ori when he thought that Dwalin would simply drop over him and not even notice, but the moment Dwalin lowered on to him, Ori understood that was not going to happen.
Dwalin worked himself down and Ori in. Ori didn’t know where to look, at his own cock disappearing inside Dwalin, or at Dwalin’s face. His husband’s eyes were closed, his mouth open in a silent moan.

The grip of Dwalin’s body around him, the heat, the slickness of the oil. Suddenly Ori wanted to be inside him, all the way in. Fuck self-control.

He nearly giggled at that last thought, but it faded into a gasp as his cock breached Dwalin’s muscles and Dwalin slid down onto him oh so slowly, just a little ways, then stopped and pulled almost all the way off again.

Dwalin opened his eyes and breathed.

“Ori… Oh, Mahal’s hairy balls, this feels…”

He paused with Ori halfway in.

“Yeh alright’?”

“Yes,” Ori whispered. “Please go on.”

Dwalin’s thighs trembled with the strain, his prick huge and red and bobbing so temptingly, Ori wished his could suck it all down at the same time, even if he tried he’d end up broken in half. He put his hands on Dwalin’s thighs and felt the muscles flex and strain. He knew it would be a race to see who would last longer.

Ori fought to keep his eyes open. He didn’t want to miss a second of this, even as his pelvis tightened and his muscles threatened to thrust him up.

Dwalin smiled down on him.

“A’right’?”

“That’s… that feels amazing. How does this feel to you? I’m inside you!”

“Yeh feel lovely. I need t’ move. I’ll try t’ be careful.”

“You’re not hurting me. Take what you need.”

Dwalin lowered himself with a sigh.

“You’re beautiful,” said Ori.

Dwalin chuckled.

“If I am, it’s ‘cos yeh make me feel tha’ way.”

“I think I have to move, too. I’m sorry.”

“Don’ be sorry. We’re doin’ this t’gether. D-don’ know how it ends up.”

The pace quickened and the squeaking of the oil forced giggles from Ori’s throat. The bed springs squeaked, and this time not because Ori was jumping up and down on them. Rather, they were jumping up and down on them together.

He laughed.

“Wha’s go’ ye so tickled, me wee gem?”

“Does this make you Beorn? Or me?”

Even as Ori strained up into the tight heat, he felt pleasure stealing his control. He recalled Kivi had mentioned something about changing the pattern of his breathing to postpone climax, but the details eluded him and he wasn’t about to stop to look them up. Right now, he didn’t think they would help him anymore than Mr. Dezimahl’s numbers.

“Mahal! Dwalin-”

“Ohhhh. Grab me cock, love.”

That waylaid his climax. He slid his still slick hands up and around the cock he’d so desperately wanted to suck and throttled it in time with their bucking. He wondered if his grip was too tight, but Dwalin couldn’t tell him, head thrown back, mouth working in silent, delirious murmurings. Ori put his feet flat to the mattress for purchase and thrust without thought, throwing himself into the moment.

The journey went on and on.

Sweat poured down Dwalin’s chest in fascinating little rivers, a drop glistening from one of his nipple rings for an instant before flicking off. Pearls of precum beaded at Dwalin’s slit and oozed over. Abruptly, Dwalin changed his angle and thrust himself hard on Ori’s cock.

The warrior’s cry rose almost to a scream as he pumped without rhythm, He spent wildly over Ori’s chest and belly, yet he never stopped moving, his grip around Ori’s shaft yanking Ori along with him to the edge of the abyss. Ori was forced to let go of Dwalin as his husband fell forward onto his hands and used the leverage to impale himself over and over.

Now Ori squeezed his eyes shut as pleasure took him, and he was a willing captive to Dwalin’s body. He gave up every illusion of control and let Dwalin carry him to completion.

As always it was ecstasy tinged with regret. The pleasure rolled though his blood, and he was sorry to see it end.

The stillness stole over him. Dwalin lay atop him, the pair of them panting like ponies. Ori felt himself slip wetly out of his husband as the tremors slowly faded.

“Dwalin?”
The warrior pulled back and looked down at him.
“Love?”
“You’re wonderful.”
“So’re yeh.”
“Did I see to you properly?”
Dwalin chuckled, leaned down and kissed him.
“Ghivasha, what do you think?”
“That these sheets need to be boiled and thrown over a hedge and so do I.”
“So, yeh want me t’ call our Wandi back?”
“Funny dwarf.”
Beverages, Breakfast, and the Box.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yes, this is the chapter you’ve all been waiting for. Time for our beloved dwardor to… eat breakfast! Yes, and then open that mysterious box from Khazad-dûm! Be sure and have plenty of snacks and beverages on hand, this is a long one! And please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwardor time, same dwardor tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

We’d like to take this moment to say "Happy Birthday" to @Fangirl_Forever!! Hope it was wonderful!!!

Ori heard birdsong and, with difficulty, dragged his eyes open. The light of dawn peeped in the bedroom window and Ori couldn’t move. He smiled happily. He and his husband had become glued together in sweaty sleep. With his face against Dwalin’s chest, listening to his heartbeat, Ori had no desire to move. He could see that Kihshassa was asleep on the largest branch of the stand for the ravens. Garnet had her head under her wing and Quartz was preening.

Quartz caught Ori’s eye and fluttered to land next to Ori’s head.

“Two smell,” the raven teased.

“Well, don’t go trying to hold our noses,” Ori whispered in reply.

Dwalin mumbled and his grip tightened. Ori tried valiantly not to giggle.

“What are you going to do about that?” Quartz wanted to know. He gestured down the bed with a wing.

Frowning, Ori raised his head a little. He saw what looked like the top half of a barrel at the end of the bed.

“Who put a barrel there?” he murmured.

“Donno,” Quartz admitted. “I was up in the aerie for a bit last night. Came back, it was there, and you two were snoring.”

“Any marks on it?” Ori whispered.

“Can’t find any. Maybe up against the bed.”

“Hmm, well, it’s not doing anything, so we’ll just wait.”

“I want to know what’s inside,” Quartz whinged.

Ori giggled and Dwalin’s eyes opened.

“Mornin’, me ghivashel.”

“Good morning, my buffalo.” Ori teased. “And how are we this bright day?”

Dwalin’s grin became lecherous and his hands gripped Ori’s waist. Ori giggled again and leaned forward to kiss him. They both became very interested in this pleasant pastime until Quartz fluttered up on Ori’s backside and demanded.

“What’s in the barrel?”

“My dick,” Dwalin replied, moving his hands to Ori’s rump and squeezing.

“This whole room stinks of both your dicks, so I can’t tell what’s in there.” Quartz complained.

“Garnet,” Dwalin called.

The she-raven flew over.

“He’s right,” she opined. “I can’t smell anything but your dicks, either.”
“Lass, why doncha, take him on a fligh’?”
“I want to know what’s in the barrel, too.”
“Wha’ barrel?” Dwalin asked, suddenly alert.
“There’s a barrel at the end of our bed,” Ori told him, rubbing his face in Dwalin’s chest fur.
“Apparently, it appeared last night when we were asleep, according to Quartz.”
There was a shriek outside the door.
“What in all Arda is this mess?” Dori was heard to cry out. “Powder, get back on my shoulder! Don’t start licking that dust! Oh! Don’t eat catnip now, Powder! Look at your brothers! They’re all…”
“Lit like th’ mountain lanterns,” Balin’s voice finished. “Up yeh come laddies. No face-lickin’ now. Th’ pair a’ yeh are gettin’ chucked int’ th’ garden t’ sober up.”
Dwalin and Ori looked at each other and snickered.
“I suppose we better get up and dressed,” Ori sighed. “I’d love to stay here, but I’m hungry.”
“Tha’ makes two a’ us.” Dwalin replied.
They unstuck themselves and got up. Ori peeked out of the bedroom door. The hallway was devoid of people. He turned back to Dwalin.
“Race you!”
Ori let out the shriek of a badger as he bounded down the hall to the bathroom, Dwalin hot on his heels.
“Dori’s Ori! You put some clothes on before you come through!” Dori shouted from the kitchen.
Once washed and dressed, Ori and Dwalin took time to comb and braid each other’s hair and put in their beads. They stripped the bed and put the bedding in the hamper with several gold coins buried throughout as an apology to the cleaning crew, who would have to tend to it.
Garnet and Quartz flitted about the barrel, scratching and pecking at it. Kihshassa dropped from the stand and crawled over to climb the barrel and sit on top of it.
Dwalin turned and lifted Kihshassa off the barrel and Quartz went to Ori’s shoulder.
Dwalin hefted the large keg and stood it on the bed, looking at it. Ori frowned at the runes, as they didn’t make sense to him.
“What’s that?” he asked. “The runes look like brewers’ marks.”
Dwalin squinted, read the runes and laughed.
“It’s a Lost Keg! Durin hid three kegs of his best brew across Middle Earth, enchanted, yeh know, so’s not t’ skunk out. This is one o’ th’ three!”
Ori glanced up toward the ceiling. “Alright, thank you, that’s one for you.”
“Idad Blu will be happy,” Quartz told Garnet, who cackled.
Dwalin boosted the keg to his shoulder and took Ori’s hand as they headed out to the breakfast parlor.
Ori bade everyone good morning as they entered. The only ones present were Thorin, Bilbo, Balin, and Dori. Butter and Sugar lolled on the floor.
“You are not drinking that for breakfast,” was Dori’s first comment when they entered the room.
“Naw, it’ll wait,” said Dwalin. “Somethin’ this special yeh save fer Yule.”
Thorin sat back in his chair, peering at the runes.
“Is that one of the Lost Kegs?”
“Yes,” said Ori. “Nice to know Durin keeps his word. And I didn’t even have to die!”
Dori dropped the wooden spoon into the porridge tureen on the table and scolded.
“Really, pet, must you say such things?”
Dwalin put the keg on a stand near the side board and joined Ori at the table. Dori passed them bowls of porridge with dried berries and nuts poured on top. Dori twitched, rose, and left the room, muttering.
“Honestly, it’s far too soon for you to be sitting on my bladder like this.”
Ori looked at Balin who was looking after his mate with raised eyebrows.
“How far along do you think Dori might be?” Ori asked.

“How far,” Balin muttered. “I’ll get Oin to have a look.”

Bilbo took over the dishing up, then called Frodo and Sam in from the meadow where they cavorted with Fanny and the warg pups. Ori could see all of them running around Fanny, who occasionally tapped one or other with her trunk. At Bilbo’s call, they came scampering in and Thorin lifted the faunts into their seats while the pups piled in to be with their mothers, all except Killer, who went to Dwalin, whining to be picked up. Dwalin picked up the pup and set him in his lap. Dwalin patted Killer and Ori scratched behind Killer’s ear and got his face swiped wetly.

Bilbo set porridge bowls before the faunts and poured milk. Ori shoveled porridge into his mouth. Thorin was eating his porridge plain and he dipped each spoonful into a cup of milk beside his bowl. Bilbo put a teaspoonful of brown sugar on Frodo’s and Sam’s porridge then settled to his own, after pouring a little cream on top.

Mistress Dazla came through with a platter of poached eggs and a pile of sausages and black pudding. The Groinuls arrived, called greetings and seated themselves. Bilbo handed the serving spoon to Gloin to ladle out for his family.

Thorin finished and rose. Butter and Sugar bounced up and rubbed up against him, making happy noises.

Thorin went through to the kitchen and came back with the warg’s feeding pans filled with their chow. Thorin put these down. The wargs looked up at him expectantly.

“Come eat,” he allowed them, and they did, with noisy enjoyment. Thorin looked over at Gimli, who shook his head around a full mouth.

“We fed Romy already,” Legolas translated, reaching down between his and Gimli’s chairs where Ori saw, when he craned his neck, that Romy was snoozing.

Dori came back in and looked around to make sure everyone had food. Long minutes of munching followed.

Finally, Oin rose, wiping his mustache.

“Come here, luv. Yer Balin wants me t’ have a look at you.”

“Nonsense,” Dori protested. “I’m fine.”

Frodo and Sam having finished their breakfasts, Bilbo shooed them back outside.

Oin removed what looked three tiny cups attached by tubing. He stuck two in his ears.

“Open the tunic, luv,” he ordered.

“We’re having a meal!” Dori objected. Balin rose and gently turned Dori to face the wall and everyone looked discreetly away.

“Hmmmm,” Oin said.

“I told you I was fine,” Dori said.

The sisters and Glorfindel arrived. Glorfindel went to the table, but the sisters immediately went to Dori.

“Ooo, aren’t you plumpin’ up nice, our Dori!”

“Aye, I’m thinkin’ a girly, love.”

“Oin can hear my heartbeat and the baby’s heart beat.” Dori began to explain.

“I’m hearin’ three,” Oin barked.

Oin waved him over. Balin went as though in a fog. Oin stuck the ear parts into Balin’s ears and press the third against a small open area in Dori’s tunic.

Oin listened. Dori snatched one ear piece away and listened, too. Dori’s face was a picture of wonder then her eyes lit up and filled with tears.

“I have two in here, darling!”

Balin fainted dead away.

Gloin tutted and Oin said, “Aye, there he goes.”
Thorin, Dwalin, Gloin, and Glórfíndel lifted Balin to a chair and held his tea cup to his lips. Binni and the sisters sneaked and hugged Dori. Ori absorbed this news then flung himself at Dori.

“Ori’s Dori!”
The sisters moved so Ori could hug Dori. Dori laughed and cuddled Ori close.

“My pet, I seem to be making you an uncle twice over!”
Balin recovered and rose to his feet. Dori kissed Ori’s cheek and crossed to Balin. They embraced. Everyone else left them to each other and sat back down to eat.

Nori and Bofur came in, ferrets bumbling after them.

“What’s to do?” Bofur asked, glancing at Balin and Dori, but addressing everyone else. Ori rushed over to plow into Nori.

“Dori’s having twins!”

“What the fuck?” Nori got out.

Dori and Balin parted happily and Dori turned to Nori.

“Yes, Oin has just informed us I’m having twins.”
Nori stared.

“Rubbish! Yer havin’ me on!” Nori said and laughed heartily.

Bofur’s eyes slid to Dori. Bofur swallowed and said nothing. Dori huffed and flapped a hand at Oin. Oin came around, grabbed Nori, hauled him over to Dori, shoved the listening device into Nori’s ears and Dori put the other end to her belly.

“There a heartbeat!” Nori crowed. “And another liddle one an’ another…liddle one…?”
Nori backed off, staring. Dori raised a triumphant eyebrow. Nori threw himself at Dori.

“You got twins, our Dori!” Nori shouted, lifting Dori off her feet and dancing about.

“Put the Bearer down,” yowled Oin. “She’s in a delicate condition.”

“Ha!” Nori retorted. “There ain’t nuffin delicate about our Dori!” But he did put Dori down again and hugged her.

Dori returned to her seat beside Balin who had pulled out her chair, gazing at her rapturously.

“Congratulations, our Dori,” Bofur said. “May we send a raven t’ tell th’ family out at the Inn?”

“Ha!” Nori retorted. “There ain’t nuffin delicate about our Dori!” But he did put Dori down again and hugged her.

“Twins?” Sculdis gasped.

“Indeed, cousin!” Balin smiled.

Sculdis went back and picked her chair off the floor where she’d knocked it getting to Dori. “Twins,” Dain repeated. “Twins….” Dain fixed Balin with a fierce eye. “How many bloody times a nigh’ did yeh tup me siblin’ t’ put two in there!?”

Thorin came within an inch of a spit-take over the table and Dwalin choked on a mouthful of egg. The Groinuls tried desperately not to laugh but failed. Legolas looked confused. Oin rose and bellowed.

“That’s not how it works! How batshit crazy do you have to be to think that?”

“How, in th’ name a’ Mahal’s hairy arse, would I know?” Dain shouted back. “There’s never been twins born t’ a dwarf!"
   “Elves, hobbits and men have twins, it’s all in—”
   “Mixed race don’t matter. It ain’t like any such as our Ruelis ever popped out two a’ once.” Dain barked. “Wha’ if Balin did somethin’ unnatural t’ me wee sib?”
   “Dain!” Dori cried. Balin facepalmed and groaned. Sculdis helped Dain to focus his attention on his breakfast. Baluchistan applied himself to a couple of Dain’s sausages.
   Dwalin recovered himself, kissed Ori, rose and went to thump his forehead to Balin’s. “Well done, brother.”
   “Thank yeh kindly, brother.” Balin shoved his chair out to reach up and give Dwalin a hug. Dwalin returned the hug and, with a silly grin, sat down on Balin’s lap. “Oof!” Balin objected.
   “Aaah, brother!” Dwalin said, in a sentimental tone. “T’ think a’ yeh makin’ me ‘n uncle an’ at yer age. Why, I remember when I were nothin’ bu’ a wee badger—” “Gettoff!” Balin struggled but Dwalin slouched, spreading his weight, never pausing in his oration.
   “Runnin’ about th’ place, gettin’ int’ trouble wi’ our Thorin there, an’ now yer settled an’ makin’ me an uncle.”
   Balin gave a mighty grunt and shoved Dwalin bodily off him. Dwalin slid to the floor, never stopping to tussle, went on, “An’… Oi!” Dwalin was on his feet, glaring at the couple, roaring. “Th’ pair a’ yeh aren’t married!”
   “I warned you, Ori’s Dori,” Ori chimed in merrily.
   “It’s shocking, I tell you,” Nori threw in his two coppers. “Fine example f’r our liddle Ori. No wonder he eloped!”
   “Thorin,” Dain bellowed, “marry this pair righ’ now! Think a’ th’ scandal!”
   Thorin was too busy trying not to fall out of his chair with laughter. Glorfindel put an arm about each of the sisters and watched the antics with a grin that displayed all his shiny teeth to admiration.
   “Of course,” Ori said half to himself. “That explains that dream.”
   The room fell instantly silent. “What dream, Ori?” Thorin inquired slowly.
   “Not another quest, pet!” Dori almost wailed.
   “No!” Ori said. “It was the night I got my tattoo from Mahal. I was dreaming I was in His forge and Mahal was telling Yavanna He had decided what to do with a pair of matching amethysts and then He accidentally set Yavanna’s impatiens on fire and Ulwe had to put them out and Yavanna said She had to go find a mop as there wasn’t a valar of mopping and Mahal said twins! I said I didn’t want to get pregnant and they laughed at me and put me back to sleep.”
   Silence.
   “Well,” Balin smiled at Dori and patted her belly. “We’ll be sure t’ have a good welcome f’r our wee amethysts when they arrived, won’t we beloved?”
   Dori beamed at him. Dwalin hugged Ori and muttered in his hair, “So bloody glad it’s our Dori an’ no’ yeh, me gem.” “Me, too!” Ori whispered back.
   Thranduil, Cemnesta, Bard, and the Bardlings came in. “What’s happening?” Tilda demanded over the greetings of her family. “We heard yelling.”
   “Dori’s pregnant with twins,” Legolas informed her as she romped to his side and clambered into his lap. “Oooo!” Tilda enthused and started to eat Legolas’ toast with gusto. He giggled and placed an egg on the left over piece for her. Gimli ruffled her hair, winked at her, and spread another slice of toast with nicely fried black pudding and added it to Legolas’ plate.
   Thranduil went to kiss Dori and pat Balin’s shoulder. Bard followed this and smiled on Dori.
   “I suppose it’s a last wish from Mathilde. She told me twins ran in her family.”
   “Oh, how very naughty of her!” Dori laughed. “Of course, she was so large and heavy with Bain, we did think she might be having twins.”

Bard turned a teasing look at Bain, who had come to hug Dori as well.

“Yes,” Bard replied tousling his son’s head. “My mother-in-law always said Bain was so big, Mathilde must have been pregnant for a year.”

“Why?” Thranduil inquired, smiling down on Bain and straightening his tunic.

“He was born in late winter,” Bard explained. “Too cold to come out.”

“Clever lad,” said Balin, winking at Bain, who was blushing.

Sigrid kissed Dori’s cheek and hugged her.

“I’m so happy for you, Dori.”

“Thank you, my little childling. I do hope you might help me sometimes?”

“Oh yes!” Sigrid cried, delighted.

“I shall hold myself ready to assist you in any way, Honored Bearer,” Cemnesta added, also kissing Dori’s cheek.

“Sweet child,” Dori cooed to the elf who was several thousand years older then her.

“I suppose,” said Thorin philosophically, “this puts paid to our efforts to keep the people from thinking Mahal is the father.”

In Ori’s head, Mahal mused, “Should I print ‘It’s all Balin’s fault’ on each twin’s forehead?”

“I don’t think that’s necessary,” Ori muttered out of the side of his mouth.

Galadriel and the other Lórien elves entered with Fili and Kili and Tauriel. The news was broadcast and there was more hugging, kissing, and congratulations. Galadriel, Gridr and Binni soon had their heads together discussing baby things. Dori sat serenely, basking in the delight of the family about her.

Ori smiled, it was so wonderful to see Dori so happy. Nori and Bofur were happy and Ori was perfectly happy with Dwalin. He decided there was nothing further to think about or attend to concerning his late…Rikhma. She didn’t matter. She was to be born elsewhere and learn her lessons again. The Brothers Ri were now part of a large, noisy, lovely family.

Ori laid his head against Dwalin’s shoulder. Dwalin kissed his brow.

“Wha’ go’ yeh smilin’, love?”

Ori turned and grinned up at him.

“You.”

Dwalin laughed.

Next arrived the Rivendell elves, and Aragorn and Boromir. They were also delighted with the news. Lindir told Elrond they would have to look out the baby things that had been used by Elrohir and Elladan. Elladan and Elrohir looked horrified that these things had been kept at all, which surprised both Fili and Kili, who asked if these nursery things had been used by Elrond’s parents.

Granny Klak came in with Jim and his family and was delighted with Dori’s news. Ruelis and Jim laughed and Mavey and Floris crowded around Dori, while Granny Klak shed a few proud tears.

Dipfa came in with Eowyn and Nomirliel. Dipfa look very proud. Eowyn was dressed in a short blue and tan striped tunic with front pockets, a pair of blue baggy breeches that dropped to just below her knees, and sported a pair of new, tall, tan colored boots with copper toes and flecked with little triangles of copper studs.

Nomirliel was clad in a white blouse heavily embellished with embroidery of varying shade of green leaves. At her waist was a wide white leather belt with a circular pewter buckle. Her long green skirt, embroidered with silver dandelion seeds, was actually a pair of baggy trousers, with side and back pockets, neatly covered her new green velvet slippers with tiny heels.

Everyone complimented these new fashions and Dipfa was given a round of applause. Dori and Balin’s news delighted both Eowyn and Nomirliel and sent Dipfa into a fever of drawing baby garments while she ate.

Red Queen flew in. Mistress Dazla fetched out a platter holding a nicely roasted ham bone, marrow still melting out.

Red Queen consumed this with relish and magnanimously offered Dori some of her own down feathers for the nest and inquired when Dori would begin laying.

Nori and Ori glanced at each other and grinned at Dori.

“Aye,” Nori said, thoughtfully stirring a spoonful of blackberry jelly into his tea. “It’s past time you an’ the brother-in-law got started building that nest. I’m sure there’s some choice twigs down by the River Runnin’.”

“Don’t be silly Nori!” Ori got out before Dori had a chance. “Dori and Balin don’t want twigs for their nest, they want velvet cushions.”

“Velvet cushions’re no good,” Nori argued. “Velvet ain’t gonna sop up any mess!”

Red Queen’s head went from one combatant to the other in fascination.

“Neither will twigs!” Ori put in, clenching Dwalin’s hand as the big warrior fought a losing battle with laughter.

“Enough!” cried Dori banging her serving spoon on the table.

“We’ve already go’ a crib,” Balin put in smoothly, taking Dori’s hand in a comforting way, thus stilling the spoon. “Haven’ we, beloved?”

“Oh, yes!” Dori cried in delight. “Dearest Red Queen, I must show it to you when we’ve all finished here.”

“Indeed,” Red Queen inclined her head. “We are most eager to see all your preparation. The first egg laying can be a delicate affair. If you wish it, do summon us to your side when it commences, we shall be happy to coax you through it. Until that time, we advise you to practice relaxing and clenching the orifice.”

Galadriel, Gridr, Dis, and Binni all did spit takes and Bilbo dropped his toast in his porridge bowl.

“Hear that, our Dori,” Nori shouted. “Get a wiggle one an’ clench that orifice!”

“Clench them all!” Ori encouraged.

Omi and Loli shrieked. Bujni blushed and Fili and Kili looked like they wanted to slide under the table.

Eowyn nudged Boromir with her shoulder.

“I’m clenching mine right now!”

“Shut up!” Boromir grimaced and shoved his plate of eggs away. “You’ve put me off my food.”

“Aaaagh!” Boromir yelled and slapped his hands over his ears, “I don’t hear you! La-la-la-la-la!”

Aragorn put his face in his hands and moaned.

“I’m clenching, too!” Arwen cooed, leaning her head against her betrothed. She looked up at him vapidly, fluttering her lashes.

Elrond and Lindir looked appalled, while the twins and Legolas and Gimli roared with laughter.

“Very good!” sang out Granny Klak. “If you got one; one-two-three: clench!”

“Clench and relax!” shouted the sisters.

The shrieks of female laughter erupted all round the table.

“Look, Da!” called Tilda, “I can clench two orifices at once.”

Bard took a horrified look at his daughter, who was holding her nose. Bard turned green and looked helplessly at Thranduil, who had gone remarkabley pale.

“You’re very shiny,” Tilda called from the far side of the table.

“Yes, my dear. It takes some getting used to.”

“What happened?” Thorin demanded looking the wizard up and down. Ori thought Bibo was going to giggle or at least make a snide remark.

“Oh,” Tharkûn said dismissively. “I availed myself to one of Mister Wandi’s special mud baths.
Nice, warm mud. Relaxing. I confess, I fell asleep. I had a dream that the valar had gathered round to tell me I’d done a good job in Arda, so I was being promoted to Saruman’s former position as head of the order. When I awoke, I was Gandalf the White.”

“That must have been shocking!” Granny Klak commiserated.
“Not as shocking as finding they’d done away with my hat. I rather liked that hat.”
“What did Mr. Wandi say?” Legolas asked, eyes twinkling at his eldest brother.
“I said,” Mr. Wandi replied, “Hon, the valar gave you a dye job.”
“He calls you ‘hon’ now, doesn’t he,” Thorin said, politely.
“Better than ‘toots’,” the wizard sighed.

Mistress Dazla entered from the kitchen, her brow furrowed in consternation. She went right to Thorin.

“Your majesty, there’s a visitor in the sitting room.”

Thorin rose.
“I wasn’t expecting visitors. Did anyone hear the front door?”
“I don’t believe the front door was involved, King Thorin. I was just tidying up there and King Theoden appeared on one of the couches.”

Thorin shot out of the breakfast room door in an instant, Ori and Eowyn close on his heels, followed by the rest of the herd.

It was Theoden sure enough. He sat, looking confused, wearing trousers, an under tunic, and a pair of house slippers. He sported a napkin tied around his throat and held a knife in one hand and a slice of buttered bread in the other.

“Theoden?” Thorin ventured.

“Ah, Thorin,” said Theoden. “Good morning, all. Eowyn! You look well.”

Eowyn rushed to kiss his cheek and sit beside him.

“Uncle? Are you all right?”
“I’m probably better off than your cousin right now.”
“What happened?” Eowyn pressed.
“Someone said something about opening a box, and suddenly I’m here. I suspect I vanished before Theo’s eyes.”

Ori growled into the ether, “Kidnapping? Really?”

“No’ t’ worry, me scribe,” said Mahal in Ori’s mind. “I’ll put ‘im back soon enough.”

“His son must be having a fit right now!”

“True enough. Here.”

Theodred appeared on Theoden’s other side with wild eyes. He looked all around himself, still in his nightshirt, and finally he said, calming, “Oh. Dwarrow. Hullo, Idad Thorin.”

“Good morning, Theo.”

“Great,” said Ori. “Now we’ve kidnapped the heir as well as the king. What are his people to think?”

“D’yeuh wan’ me t’-“

“No!” Ori shouted. “Please leave the population of Rohan where it is!”

“An’ wha’ would yeh have me do?”

“I don’t know! Tack a note on the throne: Back in five minutes? We should at least tell someone in charge that they’re here.”

Despite getting only half the conversation while finishing his bread, Theoden had the jist of Ori’s concern.

“My door warden, Háma-”

A liveried man of Rohan with a small beard and quantities of red hair appeared before the couch.
Dori said, “At least he’s fully dressed.”

“Theoden King!” The man shouted, sword drawn. “Where are we?”

“Erebor,” said Theoden. “Put up your blade, Háma, we’re perfectly safe. Apparently the prince and I have some business to attend here, and we’ll be sending word about when we’ll return.”

“Er… yes, my king.”
And he was gone again.
Theoden rose and peered at Thorin.
“I know people come and go quickly here, Thorin, but is there something else we should know about? Do you know why we’re here? Oh, hello, Gondor, Lady Arwen. Bearer Dori, I understand congratulations are in order.”
Theoden bowed and embraced Dori.
“Thank you, Theoden dear. We’ve just discovered we’re expecting twins. Thorin, perhaps we should return to the breakfast parlor? I’m sure our new guests could use breakfast and a cup of tea. And perhaps some medicinal brandy.”
“Breakfast?” Theodred perked up. He disentangled himself from Bain, Fili, Kili and the rest of the younger set. “That’s the magic word!”
Ori asked the ether, “I don’t suppose you could magic up some clothes for them?”
Jim said, “We should have something in the caravan. I’ll just-”
“Sit down an’ finish eating,” said Ruelis, “while I pop out t’ get it. I’m not sure King Theoden’d be happy in a sequin leotard.”
Mavey shook her head.
“He wouldn’t fit in my outfit.”
“And it’s not his color anyhow,” said Floris.
While they sat down to eat, Ruelis and Miss Oqizla ran out to find some appropriate clothes for their unexpected guests, who seemed far more happy to be there than disturbed at how they arrived. Theoden and Theodred didn’t even bat an eyelash when introduced to Red Queen, who, after greeting the king and prince and exchanging a few pleasantries, flew off to oversee the arranging of her new aeries still being carried out.
Dori put a cup of tea in front of Theoden, who beamed at her. Dori patted his shoulder. Mistress Dazla announced the Gamgees who trooped through and partook of their second breakfast. Bell and Hamfast were delighted to see King Theoden and Theodred once again.
“And, so?” Theoden asked Thorin.
Thorin turned to Ori.
“And, so?” Thorin asked.
Ori weighed his words, but there seemed to be nothing for it.
“You majesty, I believe you’re here because Mahal wants you here.”
“I didn’t think Mahal would regard us men one way or the other,” said Theoden. “What’s happened?”
“We’re about to open a box which will reveal the origins of the house of Durin, and, by extension, all dwarrow of Longbeard blood.”
Theodred chewed thoughtfully and swallowed.
“But, we’re not dwarrow. Are we, Da?”
Theoden shook his head.
“Not as far as I know.”
Lady Galadriel swirled her toast around her plate to pick up every trace of elderberry jam.
“Race doesn’t seem to enter into this,” she said. “Ori, I get the impression that more is at stake here than whatever is in that box.”
“I do, too, Lady Galadriel. But the voices are oddly silent about such details.”
Durin snickered.
“Oh, jus’ yeh wait.”
“That isn’t comforting,” Ori muttered.
“Wasn’ meant t’ be.”
“Do you want me to open this box or not?”
“G’wan. Th’ only way t’ keep yeh from openin’ tha’ box would be t’ handcuff yeh t’ th’ desk in th’ other room.”
“Funny.”
Kili piped to the startled Theoden, “The valar are much chattier with our Ori these days.”
“Durin isn’t a valar,” said Ori pointedly to the ceiling. “He’s a pain in my… Stop giggling, Durin! Now you’re just creeping me out.” Thorin shook his head.

“Maybe we should apply ourselves to our food for right now. For good or ill, I want to see what’s in that box, too.”

Ruelis and Oqizla quickly returned and the Rohan pair got properly dressed.

“This tunic’s nice, and, Ruelis, how much do you want for these boots?” said Theoden. Ori studied the burgundy leather thigh-highs, liberally fringed along the length, with a short black heel. He wondered if Dipfa had long lost family practicing fashion design in the horse country.

The entire party being dressed and fortified, they all travelled down the lifts and through the corridors in the deepest archives, where the oldest and rarest manuscripts were kept. Ori squinted out into the dark, looking for signs of the archivists, but they were oddly silent. Or perhaps they just couldn’t be heard for the noise of dozens of people strolling through their corridors.

The Durins, their families and friends from all over Arda, Ori’s Company and his bullies, had been joined by the chairs of the scribes guild and at least twenty or thirty scribes. The younger set wheeled the mithril masters in a parade of old touring chairs, Master Kir last of all, muttering that he should at least have been given a flag for his.

“Yeh young dwarrow have no sense a’ occasion.”

Hamfast commiserated and politely tied his red and white polka dotted handkerchief about the top of Master Kir’s cane. This made the ancient dwarf chuckle and hold his makeshift standard high. Roäc, Quartz, Garnet, Mica, and Sapphire fluttered above them.

They all stopped at a nondescript door, the seventh in the row of such doors.

Brur handed Ori the key and Ori felt almost ravenous as the door swung open and the light flashed on in a huge room, revealing book cases filled with books of all sizes, writing implements from all the ages, and ancient scrolls from before the binding of books. On one work table lay some precious few shards of ostrikai. Ori thought some scholars must be hard at work on them, judging by the reams of notepaper and bins of broken nibs.

As the party made their way through the chamber led by Brur, Ori glanced over the translations and realized that so far what they had uncovered were grocery lists and recipes for jelly buns.

Normally it would be hard for Ori to keep himself from leafing through every book he saw. Actually, it would be hard to keep himself from licking every book he saw, but now he only had eyes for the crate, larger than he remembered, sitting like an island, in the middle of the empty floor, with a low scaffolding around it, since the dwarrow wouldn’t have been able to see inside of it otherwise.

All of the other work tables had been cleared and covered in clean white cloths to hold whatever they found in the box.

“This is a remarkably tidy crate,” said Ori, looking it over.

Omi giggled.

“We had to do something, Ori, the anticipation was terrible!”

“Don’t worry,” said Loli, “we were careful to check for inscriptions, but there weren’t any. I hope this is the right box.”

So did he. It would be awful to have risked all their lives for a box of old Imad Gisis’ dented cookware, but he doubted Mahal wouldn’t have let them leave without the right one.

The masters were wheeled up front as the party formed a wide circle around it. Elrond, Lindir, and Celeborn hovered eagerly. Lady Galadriel perched on a scholar’s stool, her arms around her knees. She looked terribly pleased. Theoden, Theodred, Hamfast, and Bell looked over the box curiously as Thorin explained what it was and how it had come to be here beneath the mountain.

Frodo, the Gamgee faunts, and Tilda examined the box all around, supervised by Boromir, joined by the eldest Gamgee daughter, Lavender, and Floris and Mavey.

Ori shivered. He grabbed Dwalin’s hand and drew him forward, drawing strength from his buffalo.
“Ready, love?” Dwalin asked, kissing the top of his head.
Ori climbed the scaffolding, put his fingers on the top of the box and sent out a wordless prayer.
The room shifted around them, the plain, smoothed stones and leveled floor grew rough and grey with the soot of a thousand fires, and the heat and smell of the forge swept over them. Apparently, they were no longer under the mountain, but wherever Durin kept his forge, but the air and heat was tempered so that the non-dwarrow could survive it.

There, Durin sat on his work table, swinging his legs back and forth, looking immensely pleased.
When all the ravens squawked as one, Ori realized he was not the only one who could see him.
“King Durin?” Thorin asked.
“How’re yeh keepin’, our Thorin?”
Thorin did not seem to know where to look.
“Well, thank you. And yourself?”
“Calm down, our Thorin. Yeh get any more polite, yeh’ll pull a muscle.”
The elves and men stared in great curiosity. The other dwarrow bowed.
“Who’s that?” Tilda asked Thranduil, pointing at the huge dwarf. Thranduil gently covered the finger, taking the child’s hand and turning her to lean against his legs and watch.
“Durin! What are you doing here?” Ori asked.
Durin winked at Tilda thencocked his head at Ori.
“Waitin’ f’r yeh t’ open me bloody box, yeh numpty. Yeh did go on this quest f’r me.”
“Mahal’s hind end,” Kili whispered, “he really is… dwarfy, isn’t he.”
“Ori,” Fili urged, “maybe we should open the box now.”
“Open the box!” Frodo and Sam shouted excitedly. This was immediately echoed by Gimli, Legolas and Eowyn.
This galvanized Ori’s attention back to the box.
“Right, let’s open it,” Ori said, forgetting Durin and reaching for the lid.
“Y’ think it’s booby trapped?” Nori asked from the shadows.
“No,” Ori and Durin chorused.
“We did that bit already,” Eowyn put in.
“Y’ sure about that, Chick?” prodded Nori, ignoring the first king
“Yes,” Ori said, without hesitation.
“Hush up, our Nori,” Durin added.
“Right. Hushin’ up.”
Everyone in the room was focused on the box as Dain, Dwalin, and Vi and Margr used small pry bars to loosen the nails. The wood creaked, old and dry.
Dain grunted.
“We won’t be able t’ ge’ th’ lid off in one piece, nadadith.”
“It can’t be helped,” Ori decided. “If you can, save the nails for Gridr.”
“That’s me chook,” laughed Gridr.
The top came away in three large sections, but there was nothing on the underside but a tiny mark, burnt into the wood.
“Das, Daughter of Tas,” Ori read as Loli made notations. “It must have been depressing to have to make something this plain and simple.”
“She probably threw this together in fifteen minutes,” Thorin commented, “which means it could have held up one end of the mountain for at least a thousand years.”
Ori motioned his team. Arne, Loli, Omi and Bujni followed him up, Brur assisting Jansad after them.
Loli did a fast sketch of the contents as they had been packed in the box. Everything inside was wrapped carefully in linens, some of which were embroidered, the colors in the threads still vibrant.
Jansad nodded her approval.
“These are scribes we’re talking about,” she said. “Even the way they packed it could have meaning.”
“Where do I start?” Ori asked.
“Same way you read, I think,” said Jansad. “Right to left, up to down.”

It made sense, but Gimli said, “Wait a mo’. Lemme see tha’ sketch?”

Loli handed it down to him and Gimli scowled at the drawing, then he laughed.

“See th’ dark cloth among th’ light? Yeh can just pick it out. It’s a rune.”

“Yes,” said Ori, giggling. “It’s the rune for: ‘You found it!’

“Cheeky bastards,” Balin said with a grin. Durin snorted and there were giggles from several people.

Ori lifted the linens away, aware of every snag of dry skin against the delicate fabric. He and Arne handed the pieces down to Podvu, Kacuho, and Rouho, who laid them out on a table with Ubqim’s, Ruelis’, Arwen’s, and Lindir’s assistance. Some of the pieces were fragile, but still supple, and others so embroidered with figures as to be nearly inflexible. Frowning, Bilbo glanced at the fabric then turned his attention back to the box.

There were bound canvas parcels of varying sized, and boxes upon boxes, big and small, oblong, on occasion round, all placed with exquisite care, and, if what they’d seen was any indication, packed that way, too.

They pulled the first wooden case from the second tier, right corner. It was heavy, the contents slightly shifting. Ori didn’t think these were books or even scrolls. He carefully set it down on the side of the box. It had an inset latch that popped open at a touch.

“Something new for you to study, Gridr,” Ori called out.

He heaved it over to her and, with Gloin’s help, she carried it out to the corner and started to remove pieces further wrapped, this time in emerald velvet.

“What in Mahal’s blessed boots?” she asked.

“What is it?” Ori asked. “They’re too large t’ be earrings, unless they’re f’r orcs ‘r somethin’.”

Gloin held up a few crystals for all to see. The gems sparkled, etched and shaped like diamonds, but gleaming poisonous green, purplish pinks and sulphur yellow. Jim and Granny Klak each took one and examined them.

“Must be dozens jus’ in this box,” Gridr considered. “Some sort’ve an ornament. Look, here’s some little silver, rose gold and gold discs. They all have eye-hooks embedded in the tops, so they must’ve dangled from somethin’.”

“They’re not so bad,” Bard put in as Thranduil looked over his shoulder, brows raised. Sigrid held up two baubles to her ears, making Nomiriel and Ruelis giggle.

Not knowing what they were looking for, never mind what they would find, Ori began to pull out the first layers of bundles at random.

“Master Brur, I seem to have come upon a cache of books,” said Ori.

“Aye, go’ th’ catalogue righ’ here. Wha’re we lookin’ a’? Kin yeh read ‘em?”

“This is nice,” Ori commented, opening a rather well polished brass box and looking in.

“The Book of Bearers’. They seem to be a set of seven, none of them have an author’s name, but the covers are black velvet.”

“Naturally,” Binni sniffed.

Dori nodded in agreement.

“Go on, pet. What does it say?”

“This is just the first volume. It’s entitled: Decoration.”

“Of what, pet?”

“A lot of different things. The chapter on Bearers’ chambers is one line: Don’t get in their way.”

“Tha’ explains our washroom,” Balin said philosophically.

“Then there’s a volume that seems to be mostly dance music.”

Ori passed this box of books to Arne, who reached down to Brur, but Binni’s arms were longer.

“Thank you, Ori,” said Binni, while Brur grumbled.

The books were a mixed lot. There were several boxes of books containing diagrams, apparently designs by Durin himself.
“Look, here’s his axe,” said Ori as he paged through.
“Wha’d we do with it, love?” Dwalin asked.
“It’s under the bed. Perfectly safe.”
Durin choked.
Ori and Arne and Dwalin heaved out these books and many hands reached forward and Jansad conducted the helpers to lay these out on one table.
Ori reached in again and removed something cached in a small leather portfolio decorated with strips of birch bark. He untied the leather thongs and opened it. He immediately realized what he was holding.
“This is a sketchbook of Celebrimbor’s,” Ori reported. “I recognize the style. Oh. Um. Lady Galadriel?”
“Yes, Ori?”
“Could you take this?”
“Oh!” Brur bellowed.
“Sorry, Master Brur,” grinned Ori. “You’ll see why in a moment.”
“Well!” Galadriel declared with a grin. “And not a stitch on either of them! Apparently when Celebrimbor said he was interested in hardware, he didn’t just mean door hinges.”
Jansad knocked Brur out of the way.
“Lemme see! By my beard! Oh, give it t’ Kili an’ Tauriel.”
Galadriel blinked.
“You think they need any suggestions?”
“They’ll be defending Teylan’s thesis! This is an exhibit to go along with it!”
Galadriel giggled as she handed Kili the portfolio. Kili looked in at a page. He frowned, then turned it sideways, then upside down, and finally said, “Oh!” He thought for a moment before adding, “I suppose it could work that way, too.”
He handed it to Tauriel who looked in, assisted by Normiriel and Granny Klak.
Dis leaned her head against Jani’s shoulder, mumbling something about raising badgers. Mavey and Floris whispered to each other and giggled.
Meanwhile, Master Brur was practically purple.
Noting this, Ori grabbed a rather fat, important looking volume at random and handed it down to the librarian.
Brur snatched it as if it were in danger of elf-appropriation and opened it triumphantly. Then his eyebrows plunged.
“I dunno, lad. I really didn’t think there’d be tha’ many recipes fer cram.”
“It’s a cram cookbook?” Eowyn asked in disgust.
“After a fashion, I suppose,” Brur shrugged.
“Burn it!” shouted Jani sending Dis and Thorin into a peal of laughter.
“Here’s another book,” said Ori quickly before Brur could scream about the folly of book destruction.
Brur took it and leafed through it.
“Aye, tha’s more like it. Nice recipe f’r cavern mushrooms righ’ off th’ bat. Mebbe a copy f’r Bombur an’ Erda next Yule.”
While Brur was thus distracted, Ori pulled out the final book in the cache.
The cover was studded in real diamonds. He didn’t even have to open it to know what it was.
“Wha’ yeh go’, laddie?” Brur asked over his shoulder.
Ori held up the item, almost sobbing with laughter.
“Queen Kivi!”
“That’s the original!” Brur roared
Someone had long ago set the marker ribbon to a specific page and Ori opened it knowing exactly what he’d find.
“Mahal’s hairy fucking balls,” he hissed.
“Now, Chick, language.”
“Shut up, Nori,” he said to the ceiling.

The illustration of Position 20 was not just a right hand page, but the left hand page was folded over, and when he unfolded it, there were more figures on those pages as well.

“We only had a third of the diagram!” Ori cried. “There are one, two… five other people in this position!”

“Sounds like a party,” said Dwalin.

“No wonder the directions don’t make any sense! You’d need a crane to do this with only two people!”

Sigrid and Tauriel looked at each other and laughed.

“That’s why,” Tauriel said merrily, passing it with a naughty grin to Theoden.

“This is a book of pornography!” the king shouted.

Boromir and Arwen snatched it from him.

While the adults passed the book around, Ori pulled out the plain oak panels where the books had rested and handed them over the edge to Gimli, who put them aside to be later dismantled and examined.

Ori looked back into the box to find the books had rested on more bundles of linens, pieces much like the others they had found. Carefully he lifted out the piles and handed them down to Bilbo. Under these, Ori found some odd, net-like circles, about the size of dinner plates.

“These look familiar,” said Ori, “but I can’t say where I’ve seen them before.”

“I have,” said Bilbo, reaching for them. “They’re doilies.”

“Why are they in this box?” Kili asked.

“Because, they go with the rest of the linens,” said Bilbo. The hobbit sent a look at Durin, adding, “Mithril doilies, my word.”

Ori looked over at the table where the hobbit and his nephew spread the pieces of wrapping cloth flat on the table, rearranging them. They were embroidered all over with a multitude of undwarflike figures.

“I don’t recognize this flower,” said Frodo, pointing as he hooked his chin over the tabletop.

Thorin picked him up and settled him on a stool.

“Mountain whites,” Bilbo supplied. “That’s what the design is called, anyway. The flower is supposed to stand for daring and courage, but this symbol for them is ancient, from the wandering times, I doubt anyone in the Shire has even seen a real one.”

“We call it eldwis,” said Oin. “It grows in mountain meadows, where we graze our goats.”

“Here’s crocuses,” said Frodo, “and snowdrops.”

“Married in the early spring then,” said Bilbo.

Thorin leaned over the table.

“You know what this is, ghivashel?” he asked Bilbo.

“Yes, it’s a hobbit marriage quilt.”

“If it’s bed linens, why is it in pieces?”

“Because it’s stitched together over time, like the marriage itself,” said Bilbo. “Every significant event in the marriage is commemorated with a new addition, a symbol, and flowers to represent the time of year. This is the top of the quilt. See the edging? That’s the same material that would have been used for the wedding gown. This is woven, and rather plain, but as time went on the materials and the threads grew richer. When you get here, this is the birth of a son. I don’t even think that thread is spun fiber.”

Thorin looked closely.

“No, it’s mithril thread.”

“I don’t get it,” said Omi. “Why is it in pieces?”

“Why is it even in this box?” Loli asked.

“The quilt is taken apart when both marriage partners have died,” said Bilbo. “Nowadays the scraps are given to family members as remembrances, but in the old days, when we buried our dead with their worldly possessions, the scraps were used to wrap grave goods. But these scraps are in perfect shape.”
“Maybe they’re still wrapping grave goods, after a fashion,” said Ori. He reached into the space in the box left by the material and found two more objects. Ori unwrapped a plain brown leather book, the edge bound with cord. There were no markings, no decorations or words across the entire cover, and when he opened it, he found pages of different sizes and shapes, some crisp, almost perfect, and some ancient to the point of crumbling, nearly every one in a different hand, as if they had come from a variety of works over time.

“Love?” Dwalin asked.

Ori’s hands shook as he turned the pages, reading. There was no continuation of text from one page to the next, but they all had one thing in common.

“It’s her,” he whispered. The room went quiet and every eye was on him. “It’s her.”

Dwalin eased over and peered down at the book. Ori leaned back against him. It felt so good.

Brur squinted.

“Th’ pages—“

“All torn out of other documents,” said Ori.

Now his heart pounded. These were stories, the history of his race from nearly the birth of Durin, and there was the story of Durin’s romance and marriage. Ori looked up at the first Durin, who beamed down on him, nodding.

“Oooo!” Omi squealed. “What is her name? What is it?”

Ori gave a watery giggle.

“It’s Sunflower.”

“A’ course it is!” Brur roared.

“And there’s a portrait of her,” Ori cried.

The scramble was the stuff of skirmishes. Durin chuckled at them as everyone in the room tried to climb up on Ori’s shoulders.

Dwalin, of course, could see it first, and he roared with laughter and shook his head, and roared some more.

“And?” Fili demanded. “And?”

Ori looked up at Thorin.

“Would you like to see, my king?”

“I would be happy and thrilled and honored, Lord Ori,” said Thorin.

Ori handed him the book. Thorin looked. Thorin snickered.

Thorin turned to Bilbo and said, “I owe you fifty gold.”

Bilbo grinned.

“I was never in any doubt.”

Thorin held the book so Bilbo could see it, then Bilbo looked over at the quilt and giggled in perfect glee.

“Malahl help you all, my dears, but I’m afraid you are Tooks.”

“W-wait,” Dain said in a choked tone, “are yeh sayin’ th’ mother a’ Longbeards, the queen a’ Durin, was a hobbit?”

Ori nodded like a maniac.

“Yes! Yes, she was!”

The surprise and jubilation and laughter was universal, except for Frodo, who looked at them in total confusion.

“Why is everybody so surprised?” Frodo asked.

“The Durins just discovered they’re related to hobbits,” said Bilbo.

Frodo giggled.

“I knew that!”

Again everyone fell quiet and looked surprised at Frodo, except for Durin, who giggled mischievously.

Kili got down on one knee and asked, “How do you figure that, Frodo?”

“You look just like mama, Kili!”

Kili’s mouth fell open and there was a few snickers around the room.
“Ummm,” said Frodo, perhaps realizing what he’d said, “But, you know, as a boy.”
Balin mused, “Makes sense, when yeh think on it. Th’ big, round eyes, th’ high cheekbones an’ smaller noses.”
“The hairy feet,” said Kili, standing.
“We’re dwarrow,” Fili pointed out. “We have hairy everything.”
“I wish I had access to my genealogical books,” said Bilbo. “I can only trace back to the founding of the Shire for written records, but before that, such things were remembered through stories, and those were recorded as well. The designs on the wedding quilt are definitely Tookish, however. We still use them,” Bilbo trailed off, then smirked. “I wonder if that’s where… Oh, but that’s rich.”
“What’s rich?” Ori asked.
“Fauntlings grow up hearing the tale of the little hobbit who lagged behind her family on their wanderings.”
“She got lost?”
“She got eaten by a mountain.”
“She got eaten by a mountain?” Thorin cried.
Durin roared with laughter.
“At least, she didn’t get eaten by a dwarf,” added Bilbo.
Nori stuck his head through the ceiling and opened his mouth, then apparently thought better of it as Durin sent him a stink eye.
“Your mother actually told you this story?” Thorin asked.
“No,” said Bilbo. “My mother wasn’t much for cautionary tales. She heard the story when she was about Frodo’s age and decided she would go find this mountain, slay it, and rescue the girl. She got lost in the old forest and they found her two days later, sleeping in a tree.”
Durin chuckled and lit his long very fancy pipe.
“Which apparently,” remarked Balin dryly, “th’ apple doesn’t fall far from. Bu’ why do we find all this ou’ now?”
“Maybe the ribbon,” said Ori. “I made an offering to Yavanna and buried a red ribbon under one of the oaks at the edge of Dale. Sigrid and I both did it. No dwarf has done that in a very long time.”
“Well done, lad,” Durin praised, releasing twelve smoke rings, one after another making Tharkûn look annoyed.
Thorin turned to look at his betrothed with a grin, Bilbo stood on tiptoe and kissed him.
“Silly dwarf.”
“But,” Durin continued, “yer only par’ way t’ th’ answer.”
“Durin! Are you through yet?” called a merry, unknown female voice. “Your supper is getting cold!”
Sunflower appeared, dressed in her namesake colors and wearing an apron which had obviously dueled a batch of spice cookies to the death and triumphed.
All the dwarrow bowed and Bilbo gasped, then beamed.
“Well, aren’t you a polite lot,” said Sunflower. “Obviously you got it from my side of the family.”
Frodo and Sam edged forward, mesmerized.
“You really are a hobbit!” Frodo breathed.
“And you smell like spice cookies!” Sam squeaked.
“So I do!” she cried. “Hmmm. Let’s see.”
She reached behind her back, toward nothing Ori could see, and when she pulled it forward again, she bore a trayful of cookies.
“Hope you don’t mind I borrowed your tray, Lady Dori,” she sparkled. “It’s just the perfect size!”
“No, no, not at all,” said Dori, “as long as you don’t break it over Nori’s head, it’s just fine!”
“Oh!” Nori cried from somewhere in the ceiling.
“Here you go,” said Sunflower. “Plenty enough for everyone.”
She turned to Ori and her smile grew fond.
“Spice cookie, Lord Ori? I’d say you’ve earned it.”
Her eyes were gold, her face rosy and freckled.

“Thank you, your majesty,” he said, even as he felt his cheeks burn.

Thorin said, “Queen Sunflower, we are honored by your presence. Welcome home.”

She reached over and patted his cheek. They were the same height, though she was soft and round, as a hobbit should be.

“I’m very glad to be back, my dear. Now you take care of Bilbo.”

“As often as I can and to the best of my ability, your majesty.”

“Oh, you Durins are so naughty!” giggled the first queen of dwarrow.

Durin reached a hand in to grab a cookie and she raised a brow, which caused him to draw it back.

“Honestly!” she cried. “As if you don’t have an entire jar waiting on the kitchen shelf!”

He blinked at her, as if seeing her for the first time, instead of just her cookies.

“Wait. Sunny?”

“Yes, love, I’m back.”

The room was filled with shouts and cheers as Durin, his eyes bright with love, embraced his wife and queen. The kisses were loud and desperate.

The ravens flew in circles around them, shrieking and cheering.

Dori and Galadriel caught the tray of cookies as it was flung in their direction.

Ori grinned at Thorin, who had tears in his eyes. Bilbo pounced on Ori, “You clever thing,” he laughed, hugging Ori tight. Ori hugged back and felt Dwalin’s arm about his waist. Dwalin and Thorin drew closer, resting their brows together as they embraced both each other and their beloveds.

Ori sighed happily. The lights of the room mingled and sparkled with the firelight of Durin’s forge. All about the reunited First King and First Queen of all Dwarrow’s embrace, Ori saw glimpses of the celebrations.

Omi and Loli caught Frodo’s, Sam’s and Tilda’s hands and danced around with Tharkûn.

Dori and Binni burst into tears and were petted by Oin and Balin with Celeborn’s help and Galadriel’s, who had popped the tray on a nearby table, half a cookie still hanging from the corner of her mouth.

Theoden put his arms about both Dis and Jani, who were crying, Mr. Wandi supplied handkerchiefs and smiled benignly on the Rohan king.

Theodred and Bain laughed and hugged Fili and Kili, who were hugging Tauriel and Sigrid.

Bard busily shook Bofur’s and Nori’s hands and Thranduil was throughly hugged by Sculdís.

Haldir, Glorfíndel, Elrond, and Lindir hugged and congratulated Brur and Jansad.

The twins pounced on Dipfa and Bujni, Elrohir swung Dipfa high as she shrieked.

Legolas and Gimli and Aragorn and Arwen laughed with Dain, Gridr and Gloin.

Baluchistan, who had been snoozing in Dain’s pocket, stuck his head out and squinted blearily.

“What’s all th’ noise abou’?”

“Queen Sunflower’s returned t’ Durin,” said Dain.

“Really? Bloody finally!”

He turned back over and went to sleep.

Cemnesta, Normiriel, Omosuil, Jim and his family, the Gamgees, and the other dwarf scribes held the mithril masters up while they embarked on a circle dance with the heads of the scribes’ guild and the rest of Lord Ori’s bullies.

Ori heart was full. The Quest was a success, they had found Queen Sunflower, and Dwarrow history would be put to rights. He looked back at the box. His brain wondered what else it held, and if the wood should be taken apart or the box should be kept together and cataloged as a single kit or as single pieces, each a three dimensional object. Thorin, Dwalin and Bilbo freed one another.

Ori remembered he’d seen one more thing on top of the linens besides the book. He padded over to the box again and looked inside.

He reached in and pulled out a cloth covered, plain wooden box, about the size of a pastry box, without markings or ornaments. Ori picked it up and looked it over. It wasn’t so much of a box as it was a small dresser drawer, then he removed the cloth.

“Socks?” said Ori.

Ori stared at them and came back down to Thorin, Dwalin, and Bilbo.

“Socks?” Dwalin asked, peering down over his shoulder. There were at least a dozen pair. “Aye, bu’ sadly plain socks. Jus’ white.”

“At least they’ve been washed,” said Ori and crossed to the table that held the quilt. He placed the box on it and ran his hands over the socks then lifted a few to see the plain, wooden bottom of the drawer. He felt around among the socks.

Thorin mused aloud, “The ancestral socks of the Longbeards. That’s very… underwhelming.”

“Wait,” shouted Ori, causing instant silence to fall over the room. Everyone looked.

“There’s something else in here. Another box.”

Ori snatched up a sock with something small and square stuffed in it.

People converged to see. Ori vaguely heard Durin laugh and Sunflower scold him for putting things where they didn’t belong.

This box was woven strands of beaten rose gold, but otherwise plain. Ori lifted away the top and the chamber was filled with light.

As they blinked and shaded their eyes, the contents of the box reabsorbed most of the glow.

Two large oval stones sat nestled in a gold velvet lining. Ori thought they looked like starlight gems, but something told him these were different. Not evil, like the arkenstone, but not benign either.

“No!” Lady Galadriel cried, abruptly standing over Ori and the box. “It cannot be!”

“Dearest?” Celeborn asked, coming to her side, face set with worry. “What is it?”

“Oh, them,” said Durin, carelessly. “Aye, those’re them silmarils.”
Temptation, Temptation, and Temptation

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. May we tempt you with another chapter? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“Why do you have the sacred stones of the elves in with your socks?” Ori gasped.
“Durin!” Sunflower said with a giggle in her voice.
“Seemed like a safe enough place f’r ‘em.” Durin didn’t appear to be that interested. He was busy gazing lovingly at his wife.
“Pardon me, King Durin,” said Galadriel. “But how did you end up with them?”
“Eh?” Durin looked up.
“Galadriel wants to know where you got the stones,” Sunflower prompted.
“Found one when a volcano burped it up at me feet,” Durin shrugged.
“It didn’t burn you?” asked Lindir.
“It were a wee thin’ hot, but, I am a dwarf, after all. Then, later on, I was walkin’ a’ th’ edge a’ th’ sea, looking for carnelians for me Flower, an’ th’ other one washed up a’ me feet. Pretty thin’. I tried t’ give it t’ her-”
Sunflower laughed.
“I have no use for such shiny things and they’re so bright, we couldn’t sleep with them in the room!”
“Aye, “ Durin agreed then said thoughtfully. “I seem t’ recall there was talk a’ three Simarils, but’ I only ever found two.”
Elrond rasped, “Still in the sky.”
“There yeh go. Prob’ly no’ goin’ t’ find tha’ one soon.” Durin was genial. “A’ least yeh know it’s tucked up somewhere safe. Don’ know wha’ else t’ do wi’ these. Give ‘em t’ me mam?”
Galadriel considered before speaking.
“She’s meant to end up with them anyway. A lot of things have to be rearranged before then, of course. There must be the Dagor Dagorath, the Final Battle, when evil is at last defeated and my Uncle Fëanor is released from the Halls of Mandos to retrieve them. We have no idea when this will be, of course.”
“Final Battle? Oh, aye, already done tha’. ”
Galadriel’s mouth fell open.
“I beg your pardon?”
“When th’ wee raven blew up Mordor, eh?”
“That’s… that wasn’t much of a battle,” said Galadriel.
“Excuse me!” Roäc muttered.
“We’d only just started the first assault,” Aragorn commented lamely to Theoden, who was trying not to laugh.
“I liked it,” said Durin, shrugging.
Dain piped up, “Wasn’t exactly fair, was it. Yeh took out all them orcs an’ lef’ piss-all f’r us.”
Sculdis reached over and covered Dain’s mouth with her hand.
“Hush, m’ dear.”
Ori spoke, finally.
“Maybe all this time we’ve been looking at the Last Battle the wrong way. We were expecting huge armies and war. Maybe it wasn’t that kind of struggle. Maybe it wasn’t a battle of armies at all.”

Durin chuckled.
“Go’ it in one, wee scribe! Very guid!”

“The balrog?” Ori asked. “Was that part of it?”

“When dwarf, elf, an’ man joined t’gether t’ defeat ol’ Myron? Excellent job, ladies, by th’ way.”

He winked at Vi and Margr, who blushed and giggled like maidens.

“An’ Lady Galadriel, no’ only are yeh deadly, bu’ yeh looked a treat in tha’ jumpsuit.”

She inclined her head to acknowledge the compliment. Dipfa almost swooned in the tacit flattery of her work.

“Wait,” said Thorin. “Durin?”

“Aye, lad?”

“Did you just say the world had been remade?”

“Ask yer scribe. I canna remember tha’ far back. Oh, aye, well, I thin’ I must’ve done; th’ room’s gone awful quiet, an’ yeh look li’e yeh swallowed a toad. Wha’ was it f’r? Th’ remakin’ a’ th’ world? Surely yer Balin must’ve taught yeh, unless yeh slep’ through th’ lesson, too.”

Fili and Kili hooted in delight.

Kili said, “Now the truth comes out!”

“The remaking of the world,” said Thorin, pointedly ignoring them. “It means different things to the different peoples, obviously, but for dwarrow, it means, the Second Music, where we’ll have a hand in rebuilding what was lost. It means, we dwarrow will find our place as acknowledged equals to all the other races of the world.”

Durin snorted and looked around the room.

“And?”

“Ah,” said Theoden. “Now I know why Eowyn, Theodred and I here, at least. Thorin, you have nothing but my respect, and I’m sure you have Bard’s as well. You are an excellent king, and we are, at the very least, equals, though I prefer to say good friends.”

“You certainly do have my respect,” Bard added with a smile. “Your efforts saved Dale from Calmar and we will be in-laws soon enough.”

“Dwarf and elf are equal,” said Thranduil. “It’s true. Annoying, but true.”

Thorin inclined his head to acknowledge these words and Sugar whined and rolled over on Thorin’s foot, looking for a belly rub.

Thorin automatically hunkered down to obey, making the tail wag madly and Sugar whine with delight.

“So this,” said Thorin wonderingly, “is why all these things have happened now. This is the why.”

Everyone was looking questioningly amongst themselves when Galadriel suddenly said, “Wait, what do we do with these stones in the meantime? I refuse to have them anywhere near my wood.”

She drew away from Ori.

Celeborn took a large step back with his lady.

“Elrond?” he suggested.

“I don’t want them!” gasped Elrond, also backing away, Lindir and the twins with him, shaking their heads.

“Certainly not,” Thranduil, Cemnesta and Mr. Wandi chorused, each pulling their robes away and stepping back in the same manner.

“Those stones caused the first kin death and many wars,” Arwen said as she and Aragorn also drew away. Aragorn turned.

“King Durin?”

“Seein’ as they were in me sock drawer,” said Durin absently, while he and Sunflower giggled together, as she sat on his knee. “I think I’ve had ‘em long enough.”

“Someone has to take them,” said Thorin.
“Thorin, why don’t the dwarrow keep them for now,” said Galadriel, quickly.
“Excellent notion,” concurred Elrond. Thranduil and Cemnesta murmured their agreement.
“But, they don’t belong to dwarrow,” Thorin protested.
“They belong to Yavanna, actually,” commented Tharkûn. “But until she comes to collect them, Erebor seems to be the safest place for them. It’s not like Lady Galadriel’s uncle…er…half-uncle is going to come and look for them.”
“Do you think…,” Thorin began, then pulled himself together. “Would they prey upon a dwarf’s mind, as they did some elves’?”
Lady Galadriel countered with, “Do you feel any pull toward them?”
Durin snorted derisively.
“No,” said Thorin, “and, frankly, I’ve seen prettier rocks.”
“Then, I’d say you’ve answered your own question,” Galadriel teased.
Thorin huffed a sigh and took the box from Ori, tucked it into one pristine white sock, looked at everyone in the room, and said, “Fëanor will search for the silmarils, that is his quest and we will respect it, until Yavanna advises us otherwise. Ghivashel?”
“Yes, dear.”
“Please keep these for us until then.” Thorin held out the stuffed sock.
“Really? Why me?” demanded Bilbo.
“You’re a child of Yavanna.”
“What am I supposed to do with them? I don’t have a sock drawer! Or for that matter, socks!”
Bilbo stared at Thorin, then blew out a breath, took the box, and shoved it into his jacket pocket.
Immediately, the elves in the room seemed to sag with relief.
Dain looked about, grinned maniacally, and called out, cheerily, “Y’know, I’ve never seen a silmaril. Anyone else here ever seen one?”
“Eh?” Tharkûn asked with a teasing smile. “Whatever are you all talking of, my dears?”
“Nope,” said Nori.
“Nary a one,” Bofur added.
“They are the stuff of legend,” pronounced Celeborn.
“Indeed, they are,” Elrond agreed. “Only to be found by Fëanor. It is his destiny.”
Thranduil looked down his nose and sniffed.
“I never thought they existed.”
“Personally,” said Theoden, “Gondor and I have no idea what you’re talking about.”
Aragorn and Arwen looked at each other grinned then turned to shake their heads at Theoden.
“Does anyone else know what they’re talking about?” Aragorn asked of the assembled.
“Nope!” piped Sam.
A resounding chorus of ‘no’s’ echoed around the room.
Lady Galadriel giggled.
Eowyn went over to peer into the crate.
“There’s more stuff in here!” she called out.
“Back to work,” bellowed Brur.
Everyone pulled their attention back to see what else would appear. Ori removed the last of the linens and looked in. The next layer was a mass of octagonal boxes perfectly fitted. Nodun came over and they waited while she made a detailed drawing.
Ori took out the first one, lifting the lid. There was a whisper of the scent of flowers from ages past. Layers of tissue paper covered something. Ori took this to the table and the light, almost transparent layers of papers were removed one by one. There was a circle of embroidered quilted silk which hid a blown glass domed box. A mithril fastener marked the middle where the globed lid could be opened.
Ori didn’t have to open it. He could see the contents perfectly. He laid it out on the table. There was a sigh of admiration. Within lay a flower crown. It was ivy decorated with wild roses, eldwis, snowdrops, crocus and violets. Despite their great age, they still held faint traces of their original colors. The crown rested on a second crown. It was a copy of the first but made of mithril and gems. Bilbo and Thorin looked at each other, then Thorin turned to the first rulers.

“Your wedding crowns, your majesties?”

They nodded and smiled. Thorin looked at Bilbo, who chuckled.

“My dear dwarf, these are too delicate to use but I’m sure we can make passable copies for our own wedding.”

“Yes!” Dori jumped on the idea of weddings. “Yes, Thorin you must. Just think how very auspicious it would be.”

“Aye!” Vi cried. “Very suspicious!”

“Suspicious as anything!” Margr seconded.

“Indeed,” Thorin murmured.

“Where will you put this?” asked Theoden. “This is really too beautiful and precious to be hidden away.”

“Valid point, laddie,” Balin agreed.

“Is there a place where they’ll be protected from fading yet be seen by your people?” Elrond inquired.

“Perhaps the hall where all the picture of dwarrow kings are,” Ori said thoughtfully. “Maybe with a small table beneath each portrait to hold some of these artifacts?”

“That would be lovely!” Dis agreed.

“It would be, yes,” said Thorin. “If we had portraits of both of them. Are you volunteering yet again, my scribe?”

Ori smiled.

“In this case, I think it would be time well spent.” He held up his sketchbook. “I’m already doing the studies for them.”

“You’re way ahead of me as usual.” Thorin turned to the head librarian, considering. “Master Brur, I think all those portraits need to be moved to the old royal residence. It’s not the royal residence anymore, more a place to lodge visiting diplomats or our guests when Fundin house spills over during parties or celebrations. Perhaps it can also be made into something of a museum as well, open to all who wish to see our histories.”

Dwalin looked pained.

“Yeh wan’ th’ whole a’ bleedin’ Arda loose in th’ royal caverns whenever they fancy? Glorious.”

But the idea was already rampant among the scribes.

Jansad said, “I’m sure we can get your scribes and ours to curate such exhibits.”

Brur nodded, his eyes held a calculating look.

“We c-could show off the ostrikai!” Arne said eagerly. “With all the n-notes and translations!”

“Indeed,” Podvu added. “The guild hall of the scribes is almost finished and when we are once more in residence there…”

“Good,” Thorin said. “Brur, Jansad, Podvu, I rely on you. Ori?”

“I can’t wait to see the scribe’s guild hall again,” Ori enthused. “Is it-“

He looked at Podvu, who beamed.

“Yes, First Chair, it is almost fully restored to its original grandeur.” Podvu looked pleadingly at Thorin then Ori. “I do hope you will impress upon his majesty to conduct the re-opening and blessing?”

“Of course,” Thorin nodded.

“That will be so amazing!” Bain enthused, surprising his father and wicked stepmother. Bain was too busy with his thoughts to notice. “Master Brur, Master Podvu, may I help? Please?”

Bain whirled and looked imploringly up at Bard and Thranduil. The two exchanged glances and Bard gave a surprised nod.

Thranduil smiled tenderly.

“Of course, incorrigible stepson. Be sure to report to Master Brur whenever he requires you, but-” Thranduil paused to glance at Bard, then turned back with a severe look. “But you are not to enter any mine or other dangerous tunnels under any circumstances. I’m sure you will respect this stipulation, Master Brur?"

Brur sniggered and nodded, reaching up to ruffle Bain’s hair as the lad glowed at his parents.

“Thanks!” Bain managed.

“Now,” Thorin broke in, “what else it in this box of yours, Ori?”

Leaving the scribes to sketch and examine the crowns, Ori went back and, with the help of Arne, Boromir and Normiriel, hefted out a strange long sack. It felt and smelled like metals. They put it ungracefully on a clear table.

Many hands helped with the unwrapping. Everyone stared at what was revealed:

Large pieces of metal tubing of all shapes and sizes. Each was wrapped in silver, rose gold, and gold wire. There were straight tubes, curly cues, and s-bends. These were all laid out.

“What is this?” Thranduil asked. “It was wrapped together but the shapes have no real relation to each other.” Gridr walked around the table, looking. Dain and Sculdis went the other way round.

“I suppose…” Dain began.

“Gridr!” cried Sculdis.

“I see it!” Gridr said, beginning to giggle.

“Is that a—” Thorin started but Gridr and Sculdis made shushing gestures.

“We’ll put it together, cuz, an’ show it t’ yeh proper,” Sculdis promised. The pieces were wrapped up again and Gridr and Sculdis carried them to the other table with box of odd gems Gridr had taken charge of.

Ori and his team of just about everyone went back to the crate.

Out came several of the octagonal boxes, intricately carved with sunflowers. Ori looked at the queen and she nodded, grinning.

These were set out on the cleared table and opened. Groups of people opened them, while a couple of scribes supervised and made notes.

“What is this? Oh! Teaspoons!” Arwen cried. “They are gold and look at the lovely work; the spoon bowl is a poppy and the handle’s stem has engraved leaves on it.”

“Here’s the rest of the flatware and serving items underneath,” Boromir added, looking over Aragorn’s shoulder as the king lifted out item after item.

“Oooo!” Binni and Dori chorused as they lifted an object out of their box.

“Is that a mithril teapot?” Galadriel asked.

“Yes, with elven designs engraved on the handle and over the lid.” Minta looked at the teapot, squinting through her spectacles.

“May be a trade item?” Balin asked.

“Or a dwarf copy of one,” Minta replied. “I don’t think our earliest ancestors had either the contacts or, if they did, the desire to buy tea. The elves would already have both.”

“There’s a very nice set of boar-bristle brushes,” Thorin announced as he, Bilbo and Frodo dug through another box.

Balin cocked his head.

“One has a handle, th’ other is entirely rectangular wit’ a strap across th’ back.”

Bilbo picked up the handled one and said, “Head brush.” then the strapped one and said, “Foot brush.”

“Yeh have a brush jus’ f’r foot hair?” Gimli demanded, looking up from the box, he and Legolas and Eowyn were going through.

“Of course!” Bilbo said in a shocked tone. “It’s disgusting to use one brush for the other.”

There was a squeal from Tauriel as she lifted out a marvelously carved jade pendant. The box she, Fili, Sigrid and Kili were inspecting held smaller boxes of jade, topaz and sapphire beads, all these jewels carved into flowers, with gold and mithril findings. Most were loose, but some had been strung into complicated, heavy ornaments.

“The pieces have survived marvelously intact,” Fili noted. “They could literally be taken out of their cases and worn right this second.”

“What is this?” Thranduil asked, raising an item from the box he, Bard, Theoden and Tilda were looking at. “It’s odd-looking for a brooch. It doesn’t have a pin to make it fast, just a flexible
“That’s a hair ornament,” Bell said, taking the item as the father-king offered it to her. “See, the flange is hinged. Once it’s bent inward toward the back of the piece, it stays closed. I’m guessing a lot of the jewelry will be of this nature?”

“This box is packed with similar hair ornaments,” Bard observed, watching as Tilda lifted one to the light and squeaked. It was gold with tiny tourmaline bunnies running across the top.

“Yes,” Thorin said thoughtfully. “Truthfully, once we started uncovering jewelry I expected more bracelets and necklaces.”

Bilbo laughed and slid his arm about Thorin waist, hugging him. “My dear dwarf, they’d just get in a gardener’s way. Hair ornaments, headbands, beads for braids, perhaps earrings if they sit close to the ear. Mind, earrings have a sexual connotations.”

“Really?” Boromir asked then blushed. Floris and Mavey giggled and nudged Lavender Gamgee, who cocked her head, inspecting the First March Warden of Gondor with a speculative eye.

“Hobbit ears are very sensitive,” Bilbo explained. “Allowing a lover to put a hole through one’s ear is an act of trust, the piercing itself is an erotic act.”

Hamfast, beetroot, cleared his throat loudly and Bell, a little red, exclaimed, “Mister Bilbo Baggins! Really!”

“Now, Bell,” Bilbo replied in a comforting tone. “I’m sure there will be other interracial marriages. These are cultural peculiarities and it’s important for people to know, so embarrassment can be spared.”

“Oh, I suppose,” Bell allowed. “A little embarrassment now’ll save a heap later.”

With one glance she seemed to sweep up both Boromir and Lavender, and with another, convey them to her husband’s eye. He lifted his brows, and gave a chuck of his chin to say he understood.

Ori watched this exchange with admiration, wondering if he and Dwalin would be able to do that someday.

He reached for a box, lifted it, opened the lid, turned red himself, and closed it, aware everyone was watching him.

“Ori?” Thorin asked. “Are you alright?”

“Yes, fine,” said Ori.

He carried the box over to Thorin and handed it to him.

“But these probably shouldn’t go on display.”

Thorin took the box and opened it, snickered and handed it to Bilbo.

“My,” said the hobbit. “They were certainly busy little collectors.”

“What is it?” Tilda perked.

“Kissing things,” said Bilbo.

“Oh,” said Tilda, with a moue of distaste. “I thought it was something interesting.”

Bilbo called upon Furh’nk, who was standing guard at the door, and handed him the box with directions to bring it to his study in Bag End East.

Nori stuck his head in through the wall.

“Goin’ to study ‘em, eh?”

“Closely,” said Bilbo with a wicked smile. Then he seemed to think better of it and turned to the first couple cooing and kissing on Durin’s work table. “Ahem? If that’s all right with you, your majesties?”

Without looking up, Sunflower waved her hand in the universal sign of ‘whatever’.

“Thank you,” said Bilbo civilly.

Now that there was room to stand easily in the box, Gridr handed up several hefty-looking packages to Elladan and Elrohir, who untied the twine and pulled away the canvas covering each.

“Is it a mithril table?” Legolas asked.

“It has four legs, but no top,” said Elladan.

“So It’s more of a suggestion of a table,” said Elrohir. “At any rate, it’s wide enough, but too short for even a hobbit to sit at comfortably.”

Dain and Sculdis wandered over for a closer look.
“No’ a table,” said Sculdis. “I’d say a frame, Gridr?”

Gridr handed out a small bundle, about the length of her forearm, wrapped in identical canvas.

“I’d go with that, love. Here, lads, turn it over. An’ this seems t’ be a go-with, an’ there’s another largish lump of something here still that goes as well, ‘bout th’ size of a decent hassock.”

The smallish packet held four substantial springs of a mithril alloy.

As Ori drew, he saw there were spaces at the ends of the legs - now obviously uprights - where the springs attached.

“Th’ mystery deepens,” said Dain, chuckling. “Oy, Udad Durin! Care t’ give us a hint?”

“I’m a wee bit busy, nidoye. Better use the brains Da gave yeh.”

Dain scowled.

“How d’yeh like tha’!”

Legolas piped, “Queen Sunflower seems to like it quite well.”

“Yoohoo! Remember me?” Gridr called. She had balanced a large, tuffet-shaped affair on the edge of the box. “Take it ‘r catch i’, makes me no nevermind.”

Dain opted to take it. The twins groaned in disappointment.

“Hold yer whewist. It wasn’t yer head she was aimin’ f’r.”

The bundle unfolded in layer upon layer of canvas, which had been treated with a preparation that carried the scent of something between cedar and pine, with maybe some raisin thrown in. When the last of the cloth came away, they saw why.

“It’s Chopper!” Tilda cried, the faunts agog all around her.

It was, indeed, a battle boar, about half-size and apparently cast in mithril, but still miraculously bearing gem-studded leather saddle and bridle both. A master hand had inscribed the finest hairs on the torso, and placed citrine embedded in white marble orbs for eyes, giving the creature a roguish demeanor.

“Mister Frodo,” said Sam, “it’s smilin’!”

“I’d be smiling, too, if I got let out of that box,” said Frodo. “It must’ve been terribly dark in there.”

“Terrible,” Sam echoed, shaking his head in pity.

Sculdis said to Dain, “Are yeh thinkin’ wha’ I’m thinkin’?”

Dain said, “Aye, Durin’s an’ Sunny’s kids was spoilt rotten.”

Everyone gathered around as the Iron Hills monarchs studied the boar, then the uprights, and then attached them via the springs. It looked like the boar was leaping in the wide center of the uprights.

Dain looked around, caught hold of Frodo and lifted him onto the boar’s back.

“Now hold on, lad,” said Dain.

He carefully pushed the boar’s snout down about three inches, then let it go. Frodo grasped the reins in a deathgrip as the boar rocked back and forth, and bounced up and down, and every youngling in the room rushed forward, squealing, all begging to try it at once.

Hamfast shook his head.

“They’l all have sick stomachs and dizzy heads t’night.”

“Aye,” Margr agreed, “but it’ll be fun while it lasts.”

“It was built t’ withstand badgers,” said Dain. “I don’ think hobbitlin’s’re strong enough t’ push it int’ real mischief.”

Bilbo said, “Now you’ve done it.”

Meanwhile, Vi, Theoden and Jani had wrangled another large object from among the rest of the contents of the box. It was also wrapped, but not as carefully, and when the canvas fell away, Ori saw why. This was also mithril. At first he thought it looked like a handleless teacup for a giant, as it was round and the sides flared toward the lip, then he recognized the shape.

“That’s a flower,” he said.

“Yes,” said Thorin, terribly amused. “I believe it’s a buttercup, which represents new beginnings and joy.”

“That’s a good thing,” said Jani

“Yes, but among farmers, the buttercup can also indicate ingratitude, hence, the sprays of sapphire forget-me-not’s inlaid in the outside surface. Those mean true and undying love, remembrance during parting, loyalty despite separation. I think they neutralize any of the negatives of the buttercups.”

“I’d say they obliterated ‘em,” said Vi.
Ori grinned up at Thorin.
“Is this self-defense, my king?”
“I know on what side my bread’s buttered,” said Thorin. “Given my new in-laws, anything less would be catastrophic.”

Bard, who had been puttering about with the ghastly crystal ornaments, said, “They’re not just your in-laws anymore, Thorin. If you’re looking for advice on dealing with a strange, new family, I’m quite at leisure.”

“Da!” Tilda cried. “Wicked Stepmother isn’t that strange!”
“Thank you,” said Thranduil dryly.
“Wandi’s pretty odd, though,” she concluded.
Mr. Wandi shrugged and said, “I prefer to think of myself as unforgettable.”
Gimli muttered, “In so many ways.”
“I like our family,” Tilda decided. “We aren’t at all boring, are we.”

Thranduil picked her up and set her on his hip.
“We are certainly not boring, and you, my dear Monster Child, have to stop eating rocks.”
“Da says I’m growing like a weed,” she said unconcernedly.
Dori gave a cry of delight as the base of the buttercup appeared.
“It’s a cradle! Balin, look! Isn’t it darling!”

Thorin said, “You’d best claim it right now, Dori. You’re going to need two, after all.”
Dori squeaked, actually squeaked, and hugged Thorin off his royal feet.

“Wicked Stepmother?”
“Yes, Monster Child.”
“What kind of weed were you?”
“I beg your pardon?”

“You’re so tall, you must have grown like a weed and just kept growing.”
Bard bent his head right down into the box, as though he were studying the contents closely, though his shaking shoulders betrayed him.

“I am not a weed,” Thranduil insisted with dignity. “I am a mighty oak.”

Tilda studied him this way and that.
“I think you’re more like a willow tree. You’re very tall, but very bendy.”
Bard could no longer hold in his laughter.
He leaned back against the table, tears running down his face.
Thranduil raised an eyebrow and asked Tilda, “And what kind of weed is your da?”
“He’s a thistle,” said Tilda with great certainty. “He’s pretty and spiky.”
“Really?” Thranduil purred. “Tell me more.”

Bard returned to his side and put Tilda on her feet.
“There you are, young lady,” he turned to Thranduil. “Later, sweetie.”

Thranduil displayed a magnificent pout.
“What’s this?” Celeborn said, lifting something out of the battle boar’s wrapping.

Ori looked over. Celeborn was holding a small metal cylinder painted with bright red and white stripes. Theoden went to his side and looked.

“There’s a lid, I can see the line, Celeborn. Open it.”

Celeborn frowned as he was forced to struggle with it. Theoden frowned, too, then said, “Here, let me try. I’ve got calluses from working with horses, might give me a better grip.”

Celeborn handed it over and Theoden struggled with it a moment.

“Eru, what’s in this,” Theoden muttered. “Those elf rocks put paid to it being anything earth shattering.”

“Here,” said Celeborn, “I’ll hold it and you twist and lift.”

“}
“Right,” Theoden gave it back to Celeborn who gripped both hands around it and held it steady. Theoden squared up to the little can, spat on his hands, rubbed them together, wiped them on his hips and took hold of the lid.

Ori glanced over at Durin and Sunflower. Durin watched the man and elf struggle with a maniacal grin and Sunflower rolled her eyes. Ori looked back at Celeborn and Theoden.

“I felt it move!” Celeborn shouted making everyone turn to watch. “Keep turning and lifting, mellon Theoden!”

“Right!” Theoden bellowed and gave the lid another twist and yanked it back. There was a metallic sproing noise and something shot out of the can over Theoden’s head.

“Fucking-shit!” the horse king yelled, falling back to avoid getting hit.

“Kill it!” Celeborn roared, leaping at Theoden, his hands lifted to catch whatever had flown out. He slammed into the king and the pair of them crashed to the floor.

There was a shout from Glorfindel and a yell from Gimli as the pair leapt over to slay what had flown from the can, sword and axe at the ready. They stopped and stared down. Gimli grabbed it and shook it at Durin.

“Durin, yeh rotten…” Gimli paused, realizing, then, “er…sneaky ancestor…” he finished, lamely.

“What is that?” Glorfindel demanded.

Ori groaned.

“I had one of those,” Fili cried. “It’s an iron spring wrapped in material to look like a snake skin. You stuff it in a can or a box and it’s to surprise people.”

“Yes, dear,” said Dori. “Delightful.”

Durin roared with laughter as everyone else stared at the heap on the floor which didn’t seem likely to move.

Finally, a gruff voice drifted up.

“They told me elves were light.”

A second voice replied, “They told me men were soft.”

Graladriel drifted to the heap on the floor and leaned over them.

“Dearest, should I become jealous?”

Possibly, my dear. I can’t get up. In fact, neither of us can.”

Thranduil grinned evilly.

“Cousin! I thought I was the one who was supposed to be decrepit!”

“I’m not decrepit, chestnut brain, I’m stuck.”

Theoden burst out laughing, then cried,

“Lord Celeborn! I never knew you cared!”

“Then, King, Tempter, I can no longer resist your charms!” Celeborn shouted and hugged the man on the floor. They rolled across the floor a few times. Everyone laughed and cat-called them. Celeborn landed on top again and stretched his neck.

“Beloved a little help?”

“You’re that enfeebled?” Thranduil asked solicitously.

“Shut up, bark brain,” Celeborn snapped. “Something’s stuck.”

“Sounds like a personal problem,” Bard observed to Thranduil.

“Stow it, fish breath!” Theoden bellowed at Bard. “My belt’s snagged on his robe.”

Dwalin took one of his big axes down.

“This calls f’r drastic action!”

“I’ll get the sticking plasters,” said Ori.

“You bring that axe anywhere in the vicinity of my belt or my crotch, Fundinson, and I’ll—”

“Hold still, you silly things,” Bilbo interrupted Theoden as he squatted down beside them and plunged his hands between the man and elf. Celeborn made a rather undignified noise.

“It’ll go much faster if you don’t wiggle,” said Bilbo sweetly. “One, two, there we go!”

Celeborn rolled off and sat on the floor, looking startled.

Theoden snickered.

“Who knew hobbits were so… handy,” he said, then snorted with laughter, ending with a wince.
“If I might humbly ask for a hand up?”

Vi and Margr grinned at each other and approached.

“Aye,” said Margr.

“Here yeh go,” said Vi.

Theoden yipped and sprung to his feet like a man half his age. Dwalin looked him over, bottom lip out.

“Nice. Yeh let th’ hobbit near yer crotch an’ no’ me. Well, there’s love f’r yeh.”

Theoden flipped an obscene gesture at him, grinning and then looked at Celeborn. Celeborn and Theoden turned and looked at Durin. Durin snickered. Man and Elf looked at one another.

“They are truly his descendants.” Celeborn observed.

“They don’t descend that badly,” Theoden replied.

Durin slapped his thigh and roared again.

“Enough!” shouted Brur. That crate ain’t emptyin’ itself.”

Durin sing-songed, “Yessss, Master Brur!”

“Enough outa yeh! Yeh ain’t too big, I can’t… a’righ’, yeh are, lucky f’r yeh.”

Another box of books came out and they were laid out on the table. One was a large volume on the cultivation of cavern plants and included farming any fish found in underground lakes.

Another on how to care for and wash opals, one on drying cavern lake plants for medicinals, several on the mining and working of mithril which the old masters took gratefully.

Bujni had sat himself firmly at a table corner, reading from a leather-bound notebook. One eyebrow was cocked at an angle of incredulity and he seemed to be muttering to himself about scientific observation. Ori noted that his clothes and the book were the same color and wondered that Dipfa did not grab the book away and replace it with one that would throw him into relief.

“What do you have, Bujni?” he asked.

“Apparently, the notebook of Marvyn, son of Kevyn, a dwarrow merchant who travelled beyond the Ororcarnis. He had made an important discovery and wrote of it to benefit his descendants. It is called A History of Men.”

“Oh, dear,” said Sigrid.

“Obviously, this dwarf was not a scientist,” Bujni sniffed. “He doesn’t seem to have approached the men, merely observed their behavior from a distance. His conclusions are mainly unsubstantiated conjecture.”

“Shockin’!” Dain cried.

Theoden and Bard exchanged glances and Bard said, “Go on, Bujni. Does he say we came up out of the water in a fishing net or climbed out of a trolls cooking pot?”

“I shall read a telling passage,” Bujni allowed.

“They are tall, like elves, but incredibly clumsy. On the other hand, they have rounded ears, though smaller than ours, and their voices are very loud, also like ours. I can only conclude that they were an experiment by Eru to create his own race of dwarrow, but He wasn’t quite successful, being less deft than Mahal.

“Only the males grow facial hair of any amount worth mentioning. The young are largely hairless, and on the grown people there are some tracings of body hair in the appropriate patterns, but no where near the necessary perfusion. This accounts for their being subject to extremes of heat and cold.”

Thranduil coughed delicately and turned to his husband.

“I suppose this is why you’re such a blanket hog.”

“Forgive me, sweetie, but you know we men aren’t built to withstand the slightest breeze.”

“I did notice you are more delicate than a hothouse flower. I’ll have to start calling you my petal.”

“Please don’t.”

“Of course not. Well, not in public.”
Bujni continued,

“That do work with stone tools. Not very well, but they are managing. Again, it’s possible Eru did not have the deftness of craft to give them. This is regrettable. They aren’t likely to last very long, I’m afraid, unless they can learn to adapt.”

“Shall I continue?” Bujni asked.
“Please,” said Bard.

“There was a big event today, the men met elves. Here is my observation of the event.
“There wasn’t any bloodshed, at least.”

“I don’t recall you being horrified when we met,” said Bard.
“We’ve learned to internalize,” Thranduil replied, with an evil grin.
More, a Meal, and Musings

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yup, Ori and the herd’re still emptying out that box! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“Bujni,” said Dis. “I think we can dispense with Marvyn, son of Kevyn’s, observations for the moment but I’m sure if you translate it, Master Brur will be happily to shelve it among the comedies.”

“Indeed, your highness,” Bujni said solemnly. “That would be the best place for this oddity.”

“More stuff!” called Gridr. “There’s a board we thought might be the bottom but it isn’t.”

Bundles of all shapes and sizes were handed out. These were wrapped within an inch of their lives, and rightly so, as they filled another table.

“A flute,” Bilbo stated, opening a small one.

It was intricate, with many attached handles that would hold down stops when played. Bilbo handed it to Bofur.

The first silvery notes brought silences and stillness. Bofur, entranced, played a soft melody. As the last notes drifted away. Galadriel sighed.

“Bofur, I think Ecthelion would be proud.”

Bofur nodded and reverently passed the flute back to Thorin.

“When Ecthelion returns to us, we shall gift this to him,” Thorin murmured. “It appears it’s not the only one amongst these.”

There were several flutes and larger wind instruments. There was a viol so big, it had to propped on end to be played. It produced the deepest notes any had ever heard, but was in dire need of tuning. Kili peeked inside then asked Fili for some light.

“This was made by a dwarf named Ztradahvaris,” Kili reported.

The scribes wrote this name down for further research.

There was a brass horn that was a long, concentrated 'S' form and made a weirdly appealing sound. Another had a very large horn and the pipe wound in a few tight circles with all sorts of knobs and stoppers.

Everyone sighed as a perfect harp was uncovered. The frame was black walnut, inlaid with abalone and mithril. Thorin touched the strings. It needed tuning also but the notes were true.

Around this were packed many very thin harps with three strings.

“What are these?” Elrond asked, lifting one. It was made of birch but the mithril strings were tight as if newly made.

“Those, laddie,” Master Brur explained, “were f’r hangin’ in an air vent. Any breezes will cause ‘em t’ play.”

“How lovely,” Lindir breathed. “Such a beautiful idea.”

Thorin handed one to Elrond, then another to Cemnesta, then a third to Celeborn.

“Here, please take these. You can use these to copy from.”

They thanked him profusely. Cemnesta noted, “We can hang them in the trees!”

Next came more solidly wrapped bundles of various sizes and shapes. A beautifully wrought silver case opened to reveal the first ceremonial crowns of the king and queen of dwarrow. They shone and sparkled on the table.
“These,” Thorin said, “we will wear at our wedding, Ghivashel. I will put the flower decoration of them in your charge.”

Bilbo inspected them.

“Oh yes, these will be very easily decorated.” He turned to Ori. “And perhaps somewhat complicated to draw?”

“Not as long as I see them first,” Ori promised.

Bell nearly fainted at the next parcels. Durin had made sure his queen had every kind of baking pan or mixing tool she would ever need. There were many pans in the shapes of flowers and animals. Tilda and Frodo clamored for someone to make Radagast a cake in the large pan shaped like a rabbit. There were cast iron pans to pour batter into shapes of vegetables, flowers, and more animals.

“You could bake a bouquet or an entire farm!” Hamfast admired.

Beneath this lay more tools.

“These are for working with mithril!” Fili cried.

The masters shambled to his side as quickly as they could, and cooed over the tools as though praising grandbadgers.

“Here’s three proper anvils f’r jewelry work,” Gridr called.

Dain snickered.

“Keep one a’ these set up f’r our Hild when she visits. She’ll no’ be in any shape t’ be scootin’ abou’ on her knees f’r quite a while.”

“An’ look here’s another board!” Sculdis cried.

Beneath this board they found clothing in great variety. There was a mithril mail shirt like the one Thorin had lent Ori. It was too big for any dwarf and too slender for any man. Thorin draped it over Galadriel’s arm.

“For your assistance with Lord Ori’s quest and preserving of the library,” he said simply.

Galadriel stared at it in silence then dropped to her knees to rapturously embrace Thorin.

“I shall think of a way to reach that library,” Bujni was heard to say.

Dori gave a shriek as quantities of beautiful embroidered baby clothing appeared.

A collection of water color paintings and etchings came to light from beneath the onesies. Galadriel stared.

“This is Lórien, before Celeborn and I came to dwell there. Your work, Queen Sunflower?”

“Yes,” giggled the queen. “The etchings are my dear hubby’s copies.”

“What’s this?” Bilbo withdrew a strange piece of work. It was a large board wrapped in black velvet. An elvish schooner was outlined in silver nails and many colored threads wound from nail to nail, criss-crossing into wondrous designs.

Durin groaned and Sunny laughed.

“Look darling,” she crowed. “It’s your string art.”

“I dunno how t’ work wi’ fiber,” Durin grumbled, clearly embarrassed that his ‘art’ had been preserved.

Ori lifted the end of a long, well-wrapped roll of what he presumed was material. He handed it out to Theoden and Celeborn helped him carry it to another table. There it was unwrapped and everyone sighed again.

“It’s Erebor,” said Thorin. “Seen from a distance.”

“Celebrimbor’s painting!” gasped Nodun.

The colors sang together as there the Lonely Mountain stood in all its grandeur against a blue sunny sky.

Thorin grinned.

“Aragorn, Arwen, would you care for this? I am rather enamored of my tapestry.”

The pair stared and then glowed at each other.

“Thank you, Thorin,” Aragorn said warmly

“Yes, indeed,” Arwen added. “We shall have it framed and it will look beautiful in our private sitting room.”
The canvas was rewrapped and set aside.

“Here’s the bottom!” called out Gridr. Everyone rushed to see. Gridr and Ori lifted out a folder which contained notes. Ori read them curiously. They appeared to be chemical formulas with the titles of blue; red and yellow; sparklers; pinwheels. Ori frowned.

“Did Durin teach you how to make your fireworks, Tharkûn?”

“Whyever do you ask?” Tharkûn said suddenly, his eyes wary.

Ori waved the folder at him.

“These are chemical formulas for them.”

“Oh, I’ll take that!” Tharkûn said quickly. Thorin grabbed the folder and handed it to Dain.

“Science for the scientists,” Thorin explained cheerily.

Dain, Bujni now glued to his side, paged through, all but salivating.

Tharkûn looked put out.

Ori turned and peered down into the box. He could see the bottom, but he and Gridr were separated from it by rows and rows of small canisters. Ori bent and lifted one up. It was labelled.

“Contents,” he read aloud, “two thousand count: plantains.” He shook the canister, there was the rattle of tiny somethings.

“I think these are seeds,” he said in disbelief.

“Seeds!” shouted all the hobbits at once. Gridr and Ori started passing out canisters.

Thorin read the contents for all.

“I’ll get a-plantin’, Mister Thorin,” Hamfast panted. “If Mister Bard there can build me some forcin’ houses. They’ll weather the winter just fine.”

“I hope they’re still viable,” murmured Thranduil.

Durin rolled his eyes.

“A’ course they’re still viable! Pu’ th’ same mark on ‘em I used f’r th’ los’ kegs!”

“Is it empty?” Dori asked hurriedly. “There’s lunch to be had and these badgers are squashing my bladder again.”

“Empty as an orc’s head!” sang out Elladan.

Durin laughed again and he and Sunflower and the forge vanished to the noise of the faunts and Tilda shouting, “Bye!”.

Dori hurried out, Margr, Vi and Galadriel at her side.

Thing that were to be take up to Fundin house were gathered and packed into wheel baskets. The rest was left for the study of scribes.

Ori followed the crowd out, but lingered with Arne.

“What was in Teyan’s book?” Ori asked.

“The g-gathered marriage c-contracts between elves and-and dwarrow throughout the h-history of K-khazad-dûm,” Arne said with a little laugh.

“Not easy to find,” said Teyan, looking over Arne’s shoulder.

He spun around to stare at her.

“Boo!” she cried.

Arne’s eyes cut toward Ori, his mouth slightly open.

“It’s all alright,” said Ori. “It’s her book.”

“Oh,” said Arne. He sketched a bow. “Arne, P-prince of Ironf-fists, at your s-service.”

“Teyan, daughter of Eyan, at you and your family’s,” the ghost giggled. “Anyway, they weren’t. Easy to find, that is. I spent years snooping around the archives after the librarians had gone home. They hid the records, but they were too conscientious to destroy official documents. I found most of them between the pages of mining assay journals between eight hundred and thousand years old.”

“Thorough,” said Arne.

“You have no idea.”

“So,” said Ori conversationally, “are you going to come back to life with the others?”

“Eventually,” Teyan said, looking around the room. “Udad Mahal said I could come back as an elf if I want. I’ve always wanted to be tall! But, you know, I’d never left Khazad-dûm before, and I’m really liking this ghost thing. I think I’ll stay here and haunt the library for a while first.”

Ori and Arne exchanged naughty looks.

Ori said, “Do us a favor? Go down and haunt the archivists.”

“Are you kidding?” Teyan squawked. “The way they scuttle around in the dark? They scare me!” and with that she vanished.

Arne and Ori looked at each other and laughed.

“You know,” Ori said as they head after the others, Brur locking up after them. “I think this library needs a nice ghost scholar.”

“Wha’ yeh ravin’ abou’?” Brur demanded. Ori and Arne blinked innocently at him. Brur growled and stomped off in the direction they came.

Back in Fundin house, all the wheeled baskets were set around the large table in the sitting room. Their contents were piled on the table. Dori fled to her chambers with Balin, muttering that she was bursting. People either went to their rooms for relief or milled about talking. Dori reappeared looking radiant and as soon as everyone was gathered, Mistress Dazla announced lunch.

Once more everyone gathered in the breakfast parlor. Great platters of grilled duck smothered in oranges were set down with dishes of fried new corn, wild rice and basil. Several salads accompanied the plentifulness.

“Aye, Mister Thorin,” Hamfast announced looking proudly at the bounty. “All the crops’s growin’ like weeds.”

“This is excellent,” Thorin agreed.

“It is,” Bard added. “Hamfast, you and your family have worked wonders. Between the fishing and your fields every adult in Dale has employment and the left over gold from Calmar is making it possible to pay good wages.”

Thranduil smiled on Bard, “Indeed, my dear, Dale can almost be said to be prospering.”

“I’ve had word from the plumbing guild,” Dis put in, “by the end of this week the pipes and hot springs from the mountain will be ready so you’ll be able to flush the streets as we do every night.”

“When?” Bard asked. “We’ll have to warn people.”

“In the mountain, we have it done at midnight,” Thorin explained. “Just let the master of the plumbing guild know what time you wish it done.”

“Not to worry, Bard,” Glorfindel grinned. “I shall fulfill my promise as Protector of Dale by making sure there’s no one on the streets when it’s time.”

“Thank you.” Bard mused, “I imagine folk will be fascinated to see streams of water flowing through all the streets every night.”

Thorin and Dis glanced at each other.

“Bard,” Dis said. “It going to be more in the nature of a torrent blasting through. It will peter out at the swamp land to the south at the edge of the lake.”

“Should I order the swamp drained?” Bard asked, wide eyed.

“No, no, Mister Bard,” Hamfast cried. “You want a good swamp!”

“I do?” Bard looked a little asea.

“Aye,” Hamfast said eagerly. “All them minerals for th’ water plants in a big swamp? It’s very good for the lands around and a great nursery for water birds and fish!”

“Elk and other animals will come to drink at the swamp,” Thranduil reflected. “They will also enrich the earth there.”

“Then a swamp we shall have,” Bard chuckled. “Maybe we could start growing some rice as well.”

“Already planned for it, Mister Bard” Hamfast rejoiced. “You’ll be over-flowin’ in rice, water fowl an’ good land by next year.”

“My dear fawn,” Thranduil turned to Mr. Wandi. “How fares your palace of health and beauty?” Wandi glowed around a mouthful of duck.

“We shall open officially in two weeks. Mister Hamfast, it will be quite sultry in the palace, do you think we would be able to support some of these seeds from faraway hotter lands in my palace?"

“To be sure, Mr. Wandi,” Hamfast expanded with pleasure. “You need to pick out some good sized urns, they’ll need t’ have a hole at the bottom, to drain and a large sort of a saucer to sit on. We can get some of those seeds from your box, Mister Ori.”

Ori looked at Thorin, who was pouring more milk for Frodo. Thorin caught his eye and smiled.

“Certainly, Mister Hamfast. We will put all those seeds in your care immediately,” Thorin paused. “Mr. Wandi, I suggest you and Hamfast visit the pottery guild and have them design what you need...er...envision for your palace.”

Mr. Wandi beamed at the word ‘envision’ and Hamfast exchanged a look with Bell, but they both bravely did not giggle.

“I think that is an excellent idea,” Lady Galadriel approved. “Bard, Thranduil, what about the forcing houses? Will they be possible in Dale?”

“They’ll work,” Sculdis replied, licking orange sauce off her fork. “We have quite a few attached t’ our mountains. They get th’ heat from inside an’ th’ glass roofs allow th’ plants t’ get sunshine year round.”

“You might grow your plantains,” suggested Tharkûn, mashing the last remaining grains of rice with his fork to get all of them.

Everyone who had been at the inn chuckled. Ori remembered the fried plantains at the inn and thought it was a good thing he was eating as he would start drooling just talking about the delicacy.

“A forcing house, if it is very large,” Aragorn mused, “could be quite an attraction for those visiting from other realms. We have large ones in Gondor, referred to as botanical gardens and arboreums. Visitors to the city often take pleasure in walking through them. Occasionally, any staff working there will take a sizable group of people through and explain the workings and about the plants.”

“We did that,” Eowyn cried.

“We did,” her uncle agreed. “Most interesting I found it, too.”

“There’s an idea,” Bilbo said. “Bard, aren’t there a few more old warehouses that need to be taken down between Mr. Wandi’s palace and the docks and shore?”

“There are,” Bard said, his mind obviously busy. “We could take those down, re-use the materials for repairs and such then have a botanical garden going right down the lake.”

“How beautiful,” cried Dori, “there could be a great swath of grass between the glassed-in garden and the lake and perhaps there could be a shop or a restaurant for people to take tea or have a meal. In the summer, there could be a special dock made for parties and dancing!”

“Yer a genius, me dumplin’,” Dain shouted, “jus’ like me!”

Bard looked at Thranduil then Hamfast,

“Could this be done?”

“Course it can,” Hamfast encouraged. “Take a bit o’ time and funds, but it can be done.”

“The forcing house will have to be quite tall for the trees,” murmured Thranduil. “You dwarrow can make clear and colored glass and there’s mica as well.”

“The frame could be copper or iron,” Galadriel put in. “It shall be a fairyland, Mister Gamgee!”

“I’m liking this,” Bard said with a smile.

“I always thought of Lórien as a fairy land, Lady Galadriel,” Dipfa said, dreamily. “And you and Celeborn are the fairy king and queen. That’s why I was so happy to hear you had worn the green jumpsuit!”

“If you like, Dipfa,” Ori said. “I’ll draw a picture for you of Lady Galadriel flying through the air at the falling of the mountain. She looked just like a green night moth!”

“Ooo!” Dipfa enthused. “Yes, please, Lord Ori!”

“That means,” Omosuil said with a huge grin, “Haldir is a fairy captain.”

Haldir grimaced as some people giggled and others tried to restrain themselves.

“Fairy? Elf?” said Gimli, poking Legolas, who poked him back. Gridr grabbed her son’s hands before things devolved into a poke war.

This did not stop Gimli from adding, “This means yeh ain’t elves, mebbe Felves or Evairies?”
“Evairies?” Celeborn said blankly.
“Captain Haldir cannot be a fairy captain,” Dipfa frowned. “He’s much too frowny to be a fairy. Really, he’s almost as grumpy as a dwarf.”
“And tall like a man,” Tilda shouted “He’s a Dan!”
Haldir blanched, groaned, then dropped his face in his hands. Dain rose and went around the table, grinning hugely and clapped Haldir on the shoulder
“How’re yeh doin’ there…Danny-boy?”
“Shut up, Dain,” Haldir said with a red face, but it was obvious he was trying not to laugh.

The younger set rose and cleared the table and everyone else returned to the sitting room. After a few minutes of dish washing, the younger set returned.

Ori noticed that Kili had a thoughtful frown on his face as he and Tauriel seated themselves on the cushions near the fireplace with the younger set and the animals. The younger prince had been oddly quiet during the entire meal. Kili looked up at Tauriel and said,
“That book by the dead scribe, the one with all the elf and dwarf marriages?”
“Yes, mel nin?”
“I wonder what it says about their offspring.”
The room fell silent, everyone stopped talking and looked at him.
“What?” Kili asked. “I mean, um, pardon? It does seem like an obvious questions. They’d have badgers.”
“Yes,” said Thorin, “and so would those badgers.”
“And so forth and so on,” said Bilbo, “down to the present day, most likely. Which means…”
“They’re descendants would still be alive, right,” said Kili. “That’s a good thing. Isn’t it?”
Thorin smiled mischievously.
“It’s a very good thing, sister son. Here’s the question. How many of them know they aren’t just elves or just dwarves?”
“Oh,” said Kili. Then the implications struck him. “Oh! Mahal’s blessed bum!”

Miss Oquizla came in bearing a tray of tea things, Mistress Dazla carried in the pot and Dori followed.

“Now then,” said Dori gaily, raising a plate which balanced a large, four layer xocolātl cake with xocolātl icing and decorated with fresh raspberries. “We have a nice little cake for dessert!”

That was the last thing Ori heard before he found himself again in the Halls.
This time, he was not at the door where Thror had found him, but at a table in a cozy kitchen with windows looking out into vast, lush gardens, where birds sang and bees buzzed around the flowers that framed the windows outside and threatened to spill over the sill into the kitchen itself. The ceiling hung with dried plants, none of which he recognized, and crockery threatened to overflow the cabinets on every wall. The air smelled of warm butter and cinnamon and a pot of fragrant stew simmered on the hob of a big, black stove. On the table, on a cloth embroidered with flower baskets, sat a mithril tea set. A familiar, grinning hobbit lady sat across the table.

“Queen Sunflower,” Ori said, bowing his head.
“Hullo, master scribe,” she said.
Ori finally got a good look at her as she was very near him this time and not bouncing around, greeting everyone and talking. He had been rather stunned when she first appeared.

She was tall for a hobbit, and round, built along the lines of Bell Gamgee, with beautiful, graceful fingers, adorned but not overwhelmed with rings of mithril and serpentine.
“Tea?”
“Yes, your majesty.”
“Oh, just call me Sunny, everyone does.”
That seemed appropriate, because her eyes were the most startling gold.
“And you’ll call me Ori?”
“Whether you like it or not, yes,” she said with a teasing smile. “Sugar and cream?”
“Yes, please.”
“Excellent choice. I prefer it this side of syrup myself. It’s been a long time since I’ve had any, and now I can have as much as I want and I will. Rather like sex.”

Ori stirred his tea. He tried to keep from snickering, he really did.

“Oh, go on and laugh. After everything you’ve been through, it must be a relief. Ooo, where are those xocolātl scones?”

They appeared on the table on a serving platter than looked familiar.

“Hopefully Dori won’t mind if I borrow it again,” she said with a naughty grin. “I should just make my own, I know.”

“Can you? Make your own?” Ori asked.

“Oh, yes. I was the one who set up the first kiln in Khazad-dum. Metal is wonderful, but I wanted something warmer, at least for mugs and things.”

They drank their first cuppa in companionable silence.

“So, who’s in my body right now?” Ori asked.

“Mahal.”

“Mahal’s in my body?” Ori repeated then sighed. “I hope I don’t pop. And Durin?”

“Sleeping. Poor dear is worn out, for some reason.”

“Smithing takes a great deal of energy,” Ori observed.

“Yes, all that banging and pounding.”

“Sunny, how long have you been back here since we opened the box?”

“About ten years.”

“You had a lot to make up for,” said Ori, nervously.

She giggled.

“Don’t worry, Ori. I’ve been back ten years, but you’ve only been missing from Arda for about ten minutes.”

Ori heaved a sigh of relief. He watched her stirring her tea. Looking closely, he saw that her hands were far stronger than they first appeared. The pads of her fingers were calloused in the same way as Bell Gamgee’s, the hands of someone who worked.

Ori considered carefully.

“From the time you died until the time we opened the box, you and Durin were apart?”

“No, were together through several cycles of life and death, but then came that mess with the balrog. I disappeared right before Durin’s eyes.”

“So, all the kings named Durin weren’t actually the Durin.”

“No, though it’s a very cute and somewhat painful idea,” said Sunny. “Durin II was hard enough to birth, never mind someone the size of Deathless. Sometimes, my Durin would come back as another king of dwarrow. He was Thorin i, in fact.”

“That’ll certainly mess with our histories,” said Ori. “So, you disappeared? You don’t remember anything of that time?”

“I remember all of it. I mean, I existed. I wasn’t suffering. I lived with the other hobbits off in Yavanna’s endless gardens, but no one had any idea who I was, including me. My identity had been taken away.”

Ori swallowed.

“I’m so sorry. Does that happen to everyone who’s forgotten?”

“No, just to those who are… forcibly misplaced. I understand Durin even came looking for me in the gardens, but couldn’t find me. Every time he was reincarnated, he hoped I would be, too, but I wasn’t. Next time will be different.”

“Then, it was all worth it,” said Ori. “And I had an adventure. And now Lady Galadriel and Lord Celeborn have a lake.”

They grinned at each other and raised their teacups in a wordless toast.

“Oh,” she said, as if she could hear something he couldn’t. “Finish up, Ori, it’s almost time for you to go and you still have someone who wants to talk to you.”

Ori drained his cup, stood and bowed to her.

“My compliments, your majesty, and please thank your good husband for the lost keg.”

“I hope you enjoy it. I brewed that ale myself.”
Ori saw she was growing fuzzy around the edges.
“I’ll send your compliments!” he cried.
“Please do! And kiss your husband for me!”
“Oh! Wait! I forgot to ask. Are you really a Took?”
“My dear, I couldn’t possibly be anything else.”
He was back at the door of Halls, where he had first entered. Prince Thrain stood waiting for him, and actually wearing a mischievous smile.
“I understand my son tried to be polite to Durin,” he said.
“Yes, your highness.”
“Yes, Thrain,” the dead prince corrected. “We’re not at open court or anything.”
“Yes, Thrain,” said Ori obediently, grinning.
“Total waste of time, being polite to Durin. He’s worse than I remember Dain ever being, and that’s saying something.”
“Dain’s only improved since then,” Ori assured him.
Thrain paused for a moment, apparently collecting his thoughts.
Ori waited.
Finally, Thrain said, “I have something I want you to give Thorin.”
“Of course, if it will actually make the journey back to Arda.”
Thrain hugged him, an all-encompassing embrace that made Ori feel safe and welcome.
How did the Durins always manage that?
“There,” said Thrain, releasing him. “I believe that will travel very well.”
Ori found himself exactly where he had been before his latest visit to the Halls. An empty cup and plate sat on the table before him, surrounded by a desert of crumbs, and his stomach was so overfull he didn’t dare move.
“Ori!” Dwalin seized him by the shoulder. “Are yeh alrigh?”
“I’m fine, I promise. Just, whatever you do, don’t squeeze me around the waist!”
Nori cackled knowingly and said, “Welcome back, Chick. Mahal really like that cake.”
“I was looking forward to it, myself,” Ori groaned.
Dori patted his arm.
“I saved you a piece.”
“Maybe in another ten years or so,” said Ori. He looked around. Everyone seemed rather subdued.
“What did Mahal say?” he asked.
Bujni cleared his throat.
“I have the complete transcript here, Lord Ori, if you would care to read it.”
Ori grimaced with pain and mirth.
“Bujni, are you ever just going to call me by my name, or am I going to have to start ‘milord-ing’ you in self defense?”
“Oh. Yes, I see your point, L- Ori.”
Ori took the black leather notebook. He read. He choked.

Lord Ori slumped in his chair and for a moment we thought he had gone to sleep, which was a shame, because we all so looked forward to the cake. As it turned out, he was not asleep, but absent from his body. Which is not to say there was no one in residence. When he opened his eyes again, Lady Dori shrieked and staggered, nearly dropping the cake, and even Captain Dwalin did not look quite calm.

Of course, discovering your husband’s eyes are on fire would be trying to the most stalwart soul. Yet Lord Ori was not in distress, nor did any further of his person catch fire, but he looked all around himself with interest.

Professor Baggins lifted and sat young Frodo and Master Samwise on each of his knees. Princess Tilda turned her face into King-Father Thranduil’s shoulder.
Captain Dwalin removed his arm from about Lord Ori’s shoulder and demanded to know who he was and where he had sent Lord Ori.

King Thorin seemed to put things together quickly, rose to his feet and bowed.  “Udadel Mahal.  This is an unexpected honor.”

“Aye, well,” said Lord Ori, in a voice that was not at all his own, but booming, and very loud, rather on the order of Lord Dain’s.  “Had t’ come an pu’ in me two coppers, didn’t I?  There’s a few thin’s our Durin lef’ ou’, though’ I’d better do i’ now, seein’s how wee Durin an’ his lady’s indisposed.  Those two cooshy-doos are off on a second ‘r third honeymoon.  Won’ ge’ two words a’ sense out a’ em now.  Is tha’ cake?”

Lady Dori recovered quickly.  “What have You done with my Ori?” she demanded, all the while cutting out a large chunk, while King Dain poured Udadel Mahal a healthy portion of ale.

“He’s safe enough, sent ‘im on a visit t’ th’ Halls,” said Mahal.  He ate the slice of cake in three large mouthfuls, washed down with the entire tankard of ale, and gave forth a hearty belch.  “Ahh, now tha’ hits th’ spot.  If yeh’d be so kind, Lady Dori?”

He held out his plate.  Dori’s eyes grew very large, but she didn’t seem to be able to refuse Him.  “Yeh all have questions, I kin see,” said Mahal.  “Yeh go’ me full attention, so now’s th’ time t’ ask.”

Lord Elrond looked to Thorin, who nodded, and the elf lord stepped forward and bowed.  “I beg permission to address Lord Mahal.”

“Wha’s on yer mind, Rhonda?”

Elrond looked startled, then smoothed over his features as best he could, but it was obvious he was trembling and, strangely enough, trying not to laugh.

“If I might inquire, has anything changed among the valar?”

“Yeh wan’ t’ know if ol’ Eru’s still loitering’ abou’?  Aye, he is.  No’ in charge anymore, but, aye.”

The elves and men all eyed each other nervously.

“Oi!” Mahal barked.  “Calm yerselves.  No need t’ get yer knickers in a twist.  He weren’t kicked out’re nothin’.  He’s a guid, honorable sort, so he kep’ his word t’ me.”

“About?” Lady Galadriel ventured.

“I were a wee bit cheesed off t’ have created th’ dwarf, only t’ have Eru say I had t’ put ‘em all t’ sleep ’cause he wanted his elves t’ be first.”

Gimli interjected.  “He tol’ Yeh t’ kill us off!  He only let us live ’cause He saw Yeh was humble.”

Mahal snorted.  “Aye. an’ there’s th’ Firebeard temper.  Two thin’s, inudoye.  First, I ain’t humble.  I’m a righ’ cocky bastard.  Jus’ ask me wife.  Second, all this talk a’ Eru bein’ in charge has got t’ stop.  He mighta been, once, bu’ it ain’t true now.”

Cemnesta inquired, “Has He been deposed by the other Valar, m’lord?”

“Thank You,” said Cemnesta, quite taken aback.

“Anymore a’ tha’ cake, our Dori?  Thank yeh.  Nah, he weren’t deposed.  Li’ I said, he’s a guid, honorable sort.  He really wanted his elves t’ be first, so we made a deal.  I pu’ me dwarrow t’ sleep while he messed with his elf project.  Turned ou’ t’ be a better deal’n I thought, actually.  Gave me time t’ make improvements.  Anyway, in exchange f’r his elves bein’ first, he agreed t’ step down as chief a’ th’ Valar a’ th’ remakin’ a’ th’ world.  Which He has.  Thorin?  Yer lookin’ li’ yer gettin’ yer courage up.”

“Yes, Udadel, I was just wondering if this means You’re in charge now.”

“Me?  Nah!  I haven’ th’ patience.  Tha’d be th’ Wife.”

Hamson Gamgee threw his fist in the air.

“Yes!” And when the entire room turned to look at him he stammered, “I mean, er, that’s grand, Your Lordship.”
Hamfast looked pained, but Mahal only laughed.
“Brave hear’, Master Gamgee.  They do grow ou’ a’ it.  Some a’ ‘em, anyways.”
Mahal polished off his third piece of cake.
“So,” said Thorin, “does this mean all the dwarrow from the Halls will be back at once, or just by the dozens or so?
Mahal laughed.
“Laddie, lets jus’ say, it’s a guid thin’ yeh go’ all those empty rooms.”
Kili said, “We’ll be up to our eyeballs in dirty nappies!”
“I’d lay in a supply,” Mahal suggested.  “Anythin’ else?  I should be gettin’ back.”
“Yes, actually,” said Thorin.  “Grandfather, why didn’t You just tell Ori all this and he could tell us?”
“Yer kiddin’, righ?  Yeh don’ know wha’ it’s li’e in ‘is head.  It’s li’e th’ Grea’ Library.  One upset an’ he’s reshelvin’ th’ whole bleedin’ thin’.  After th’ ‘Sikar’ incident at th’ Scribes’ Hall, it looked li’e a mine collapse.  Reshelvin’ f’r days.”
Mahal took a final, vigorous swallow of ale.
“Aye, doesn’ do t’ spend too much time talkin’ t’ our wee scribe.  I’d be answerin’ existential questions ’til the next remakin’ o’ th’ fuckin’ world.”

Ori looked up from his reading.
“My brain is not like the Great Library!”
“I dunno,” Dwalin put an arm about his shoulders.  “I kinda like th’ dictionaries myself.”
Mistress Dazla bustled in and up to the king and Ori had the strangest feeling of having done this before, that morning in fact.
“Your majesty,” she said.  “You have a visitor.”
Thorin looked up at her as if at a loss for a moment.
“Did they arrive or appear?”
“It’s Lord Zark,” Mistress Dazla reproved him.  “His lordship requests a moment of your time and, er, he’s rather… agitated.”
“I see.  In the receiving room?”
“Yes, your majesty.”
Thorin pushed back his chair and rose.  He turned to Ori, who automatically stood, made sure he had his kit with him, and followed Thorin out through the door.  His stomach was still very full, but he felt better standing upright.
Lord Zark was dressed for the mine, his face was sooty and his expression made Ori wish that Dwalin had come with them.
The nobleman bowed at their approach.
“Good afternoon, Lord Zark,” said Thorin.  “What news?”
“I’m sorry to disturb you, your majesty.”  Zark’s voice was a little higher pitched than usual.
“We’ve found another box in the mine.”
Containers, Confusion, and Chats.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. More boxes, who knew! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori stared. He hadn’t been warned by Durin or Mahal about this. He sent his wondering to the ether but only received a distant feminine chuckle.

“Wait here, Lord Zark,” Thorin said and went back into the sitting room.

“Is it like the previous boxes, milord?” Ori asked. “The ones with the ostrikai?”

“No,” Zark said gruffly. “Bigger.”

Ori noted the dwarf lord was a little pale and asked if he would care to have a seat. Zark shook his head. Ori thought perhaps standing was the only thing that was actually keeping Zark upright.

Thorin returned with Dwalin, Balin and Oin in tow.

“Lead the way, Zark,” Thorin ordered.

In the now very familiar mine, Ori had his waist desk on and ready. Bofur and Jani had taken charge and were helping draw out not one but seven caskets made of crystal. Ori had arrived just in time to see Nori vanish into the wall, which explained how Bofur and Jani had got there so quickly.

Seeing Thorin, Bofur came forward.

“There’s seven, melud,” Bofur explained. “All containin’ dwarrow, who look like they’re sleepin’.”

“Why are they all in crystal boxes?” Thorin asked.

Jani snorted.

“Dunno, but I ain’t kissin’ ’em. Bo, yeh think they’re dead?”

“Nah, this one’s eyes’re blinkin’.”

The lid of the first box was carefully lifted away and the naked dwarf inside stared up at them.

“Where are we? Why is it so dark?” the new dwarf asked.

“S’ not really dark,” Bofur said, encouragingly. “Plenty a’ light t’ see.”

“Wait. Yes, it is growing lighter. Are we… in a cave?”

“Yer in a mine under th’ mountain o’ Erebor.”

“What?”

Oin bustled forward, automatically checking pulse points, feeling for fever and surveying pupil size.

“Don’t suppose ya remember yer name’re anythin’?” he demanded.

“I’m… no, not really. The last thing I remember, my comrades and I were crossing the Field of Celebrant.”

Thorin and Ori exchanged looks of horror, then a slow, sly smile crossed Thorin’s face.

“You wouldn’t, by any chance, be an elf, would you?” Thorin asked.

“Of course I’m an elf!” the new dwarf looked a little put out. “Do I look like I have a bear- I have a beard!”

Ori bit his lip, writing as fast as he could. The elf-now-dwarf stared down at his beard and stroked it like it was a baby animal.

“Look how thick it is! I think it needs a wash. I always wanted to be a red-head.”

Oin peered at the newly forged dwarf, eyebrows raised.
“Yeh dizzy, lad?”
The dwarf stared at him.
“I’m not a lad. You dwarves could never tell an elf maid from a…”
The dwarf looked at his crotch.
“Oh. That’s new. Help me stand up.”
Bofur and Jani looked to Oin, who shrugged.
They each grabbed the new dwarf under an arm and hoisted him to his feet.
Zark looked positively ill. He turned to Thorin.
“Why can’t you ever find these boxes in your own mine?”
“Technically, this is my mine. No, I am not asserting ownership! Please don’t set your wife after me!”
“Oh, Elbereth, I’m really short, aren’t I,” said the new dwarf.
“Actually, yer a good size f’r a dwarf,” said Jani.
“Am I?” The dwarf gazed at them, then all around, then looked at his feet. He wiggled his toes.
“That’s really… I just felt… Did I just… Dwarves are really sturdy, aren’t they. The moment I stood up, I felt right. Solid.”
Slowly Bofur and Jani let him go, he stood steadily on his own.
Thorin said, “It’s because you’re connected to the earth. Dig your heels down a little.”
“That is a fascinating sensation.” The dwarf giggled and jumped up and down. “Penises really do flop around, don’t they. How do you keep them from getting caught in things?”
Bofur snorted.
“Lad, ya keep it in yer britches until ya need t’ use it.”
“Of course.”
A cry of anguish echoed through the mine as another new dwarf emerged.
“Where is my penis?”
“I have it,” sang the first new dwarf merrily, “and I’m not giving it back. It was wasted on you, anyway,” “Hey!”
“Enjoy learning to shoot around those breasts!”
Oin turned to Thorin and patted the king on the shoulder.
“They’ll be fine,” he said.
The first new dwarf frowned mightily, looking Thorin over.
“Are you Durin?”
“I’m a Durin. I’m Thorin, son of Thrain, son of Thror.”
“Are you a miner?”
“I’m the high king of dwarrow, which is the plural of ‘dwarf’, by the way.”
“Ah. Er.” The dwarf put his hand over his heart and bowed. “Your majesty. Is there a reason we are here now and… short?”
“Yes, the world has been remade.”
The dwarf appeared to be digesting this under a cloak of myriad emotions. Ori thought Nori would say this one needed to work on his ‘poker face’.
Thorin continued, “Why don’t we go up to the house, you can wash and eat and I’ll explain.”
“Oh, Eru, yes. For some reason I feel the need to eat a piece of meat bigger than my head.”
The second once-elf barked, “Nothing is bigger than your head!”

The new dwarrow, covered with cloaks Jani borrowed from the miners common, had been brought in by the stable door and right into the breakfast parlor as Oin had suggested.
“They can’t go through that lot in the sitting room, the sight a’ that’d kill anybody!”
There had been a brief detour to the main bathroom for them to wash and wait while Mistress Dazla and the household staff rounded up some proper clothing for them.
There were seven new dwarrow in all, four of them dams. Except for the first two, they seemed to have come back whatever genders they had always been, but they were all of them bewildered, hungry, and failing to negotiate food around their beards with any sort of finesse.

Fanny, Posey and Kelli, the ponies, goats and several ravens peered through the breakfast room windows at them, occasionally sniffing the air and looking perplexed.

“How can you even hold a spoon with hands this size?” asked the first dwarf, whom they had taken to calling Dree, just for convenience.

Dori, overseeing the dining mayhem, sighed and said, “Those hands, properly trained, can produce a chain as fine as a thread.”

“Right now they can’t even find my mouth.”

“Give yourself a chance to adjust, dear.”

“Seems a shame to have tidied my beard before I ate. It’ll need another scrub afterwards. At least these garments appear washable.” Dree looked down at himself. “I certainly couldn’t camouflage myself among the leaves in them, but they are surprisingly comfortable. Also, I believed the body hair would itch, but it’s far softer than I imagined.”

Dori paused, seemed to do an internal check and swore.

“Badgers are sitting on my bladder again. I’ll be right back.”

While Dori stepped out, Thorin watched them from the head of the table, cultivating an air of benevolence. Ori sat at the foot of the table, writing and nursing the teeth marks in his lip where he had bitten down too hard, trying not to laugh.

The second dwarf, now called Erris, looked up from her demolished plate and straight up at Thorin.

“I fail to see why the remaking of the world affected elves at all. Is Eru not Master of the Sky?”

“Eru is still Master of the Sky, but elves are no longer held as superior to all the other races of Arda. Apparently that was the deal Eru made in order for elves to be firstborn.”

The former elves protested mightily. Ori wondered if they realized their mouths were full.

“But, that is not true!” Erris cried. “Eru spared the dwarv- dwarrow when He saw that Aüle was humbled after His transgression, and so Eru allowed the Smith to put His lesser beings to sleep instead of demanding they be destroyed. This is fact.”

“Actually, Eru agreed that, in exchange for elves being first, dwarrow would be acknowledged as their equals at the remaking of the world,” said Thorin with a genuine smile.

“And who told you such a thing?” Erris demanded.

“Mahal did. He was here about an hour ago.”

“And I’m supposed to believe—“

A miniature volcano erupted from the middle of the table, oozed a quantity of lava down its slope, then transformed into an apple tart, leaving the table unmarked.

“This is insane,” one of the other elves pronounced.

“Welcome to Erebor,” said Thorin.

“Then, are the elf kingdoms no more?” Erris demanded, smashing her fist on the table, which was luckily quite sturdy.

“Have the elves been subjugated?”

Ori nearly fell out of his chair.

Erris had gone from elves being superior to elves being slaves as if there were nothing else possible. She stared at Thorin, her eyes were wild, like a frightened horse’s, though the new dwarrow around her continued to chew. The fear in the air was a live thing. Dwalin adjusted his grip on his axe and sent a wordless order to Furh’nk, who quietly loosened the strap to his war hammer.

Dree wiped his mouth with the back of his hand and belched, surprising more than himself.

Nori appeared, leaning on his elbows against the wall, his lower half still obscured by stone.

“Calm down, idjits. You elves’re the same silly gits you always was, tralalalyin’ all over the bloody place. Just means you need t’ share from now on.”

“You are not the only elves to return,” said Thorin. “Most of those who became orcs have so far been returned to their original forms. There is a matter of the seven dwarrow in the Ironfist kingdom who returned from death as elves. I think they must have your original bodies.”
Thranduil swept in, surrounded by his dwarven guards.
“So, these are the unfortunates,” he said archly, but with a smile.
The seven jumped up and bowed.
“Prince Thranduil!” Erris cried. “Your highness!”
Thranduil waved an imperial hand.
“It was actually ‘your majesty’, though not anymore. Please, sit.”
“Has your kingdom been overrun?” one of the dwarrow cried in anguish. “Have you been taken prisoner?”
“No, these are my body guards. Impressive, aren’t they? My crown has passed to my middle son, Cemnesta. I have abdicated to marry the King of Dale and become mortal.”
The seven stood, staring, in bewilderment.
Thranduil bade them sit and eat.
“And, for Eru’s sake, wipe your beards!”
They looked at one another, obviously torn between obeying and running for the door. Except for Dree, who surveyed the room, shrugged, and sat back down to her food.
“But… Cemnesta is a child…what has become of Prince Aewandínen?” Erris asked. “Was he executed by the dwarrow?”
“Cemnesta is a few thousand years old,” said Thranduil. “Aewandínen is a hairdresser down in Dale.”
“That makes perfect sense,” said Dree.
“At least something does,” said Erris. “But, your maj- King Father Thranduil, what of the dwarrow? Are they not our new masters?”
Thranduil snorted.
“At water fights, perhaps.”
“We won fair and square, Thranduil,” said Thorin.
“And I am gracious enough to concede you did. Don’t push it, Thorin.”
Thorin raised an amused brow.
“All right,” said Thranduil. “Don’t push it more than you already have.”
Dori swept back in, crying out a greeting when she saw Thranduil.
“Thrandy dear! Thank you for tearing yourself away from the cake! Your silly fawns are all aflutter.”
The new dwarrow watched in horror as Thranduil rubbed Dori’s shoulder affectionately
“Thank you for taking them in hand, Dori. You are wonderful.”
“I am, it’s true,” said Dori. She turned and made a shooing motion with her tea towel. “Go on now, silly fawns, your food is growing cold.”
The rest of the new dwarrow slowly sat, but only Dree continued to eat.
“This duck is excellent. Is there more ale?”
While Dori poured the ale, Thorin looked at Dwalin and nodded.
Dwalin went out, and in a moment they heard a roar of voices laughing, and furniture being shoved around. The door was flung open and the room invaded by youth, of varying descriptions. Fili, Kili, Gimli and Legolas crowded through, Bain following to shut the door behind them.
“Ada!” Legolas called. “We bring news of our great triumph!”
“Over what?” Thranduil asked, looking his youngest over. “Did you wrestle the cake?”
“In a manner of speaking,” said Legolas cheerfully.
Seeing the strangers at the table, they all came to a halt.
Fili stepped forward and bowed.
“Forgive us, we didn’t realize we were interrupting.”
Thorin smiled with mischief.
“You aren’t, really. These are new dwarrow. We just dug them out of the mine. Apparently, they used to be elves.”
Fili’s eyes opened very wide.
Kili said, “We have now officially gone round the bend.”
“Masters,” said Thorin, “my heir, Crown Prince Fili, and his brother, Prince Kili. This is Master Gimli Gloinul, son of my cousin, and Prince Legolas Thranduilion, and his stepbrother, Prince Bain Bardsson of Dale.”

Bain murmured to Legolas, “Did wicked stepmother plant them or something?”

“Imagine what those seeds would look like,” Legolas replied.

“Kiliii!” Frodo shouted, and shot through the doorway with Sam at his heels. “You’ll never guess!”

Kili gathered him up and lifted him against his shoulder, while Gimli caught up Sam under the arms and swung him in the air, the faunt giggling.

The former elves watched this with amazement, and some mirth.

“These are not dwarrow, nor are they elves,” said Dree.

“These are young hobbits, called faunts,” said Thorin. “The darker is Frodo, the nephew of my betrothed. The lighter is Samwise, Frodo’s companion and son of King Bard of Dale’s Minister of Gardens.”

“Don’t worry,” said Ori brightly. “I’m writing it all down for you.”

“I need a nap,” said Dree. “Does anyone else need a nap?”

Frodo tilted his head at the dwarrow at the table and leaned over to talk quietly to Kili out of the side of his mouth.

“I think you should,” Kili replied, placing him on his feet.

Frodo, and Sam after him, stepped forward and bowed.

“Frodo Baggins, late of the Shire, at your service.”

“Samwise Gamgee, late of the Shire, at yer service,” echoed Sam.

The new dwarrow looked at them, obviously on the edge of laughter.

Frodo cocked his head.

“It’s your turn,” he encouraged them.

“Er… we are new to these parts, Master Frodo,” said Dree. “Your customs are unknown to us.”

“Oh!” said Frodo, obviously willing to help. “You bow and say your name, and then you say: At your’s and your family’s.”

The new dwarrow all looked at each other, stood and bowed.

Dree said, “We are at your service, and your family’s, but we’ve unfortunately forgotten our real names.”

Nori threw in, “They was elves once, but the details’s fuzzy.”

Samwise perked up, “You were elves and now you’re dwarrow? That’s so neat! Do you think we’re likely to turn into somethin’ else, Mister Frodo?”

Erris snickered and said, “Master Samwise, I believe you may already be something else.”

In a short while the new dwarrow were ready to rest in their rooms at the former royal residence.

“I hope you don’t mind, dears,” said Dori, as Furh’nkn and Oqizla led them off, Nori disappearing into the wall, probably to shadow them. “It’s rather lonely down the hallway where you’ll be staying, but it’s quieter than the wing where the circus performers are staying, and, of course, the scribes get terribly loud when they’re debating punctuation.”

“Circus?” Erris murmured. “Scribes?”

Dree hissed, “You never had better manners than an orc. Thank you, Lady Dori, we’re sure the rooms will be perfect.”

“You always were a kiss-up,” Erris snapped.

The younger set took Frodo and Sam out to play in the meadow. Dori went to ‘freshen up’, and Thranduil went with her, which likely meant gossip and Dori changing clothes yet again. Ori had learned to read the signals. With the bodyguards marching after, that left only Ori, Dwalin, and Thorin in the breakfast parlor.

“What are we going to do with them?” Ori asked.

Thorin chuckled.

“i haven’t a clue.”

“It was a good idea to introduce them to only a few family members at a time.”
“Yes, I thought I’d save Vi and Margr for last.”
“But why?” Ori asked, blinking.
Dwalin chuckled.
“An’ they think they need a nap now.”
Thorin threw back the dregs in his tankard, looking weary.
“I’m ashamed to say I could use a nap myself.”
“A nap,” said Ori longingly. “But, you’re right. We have a duty to our guests.”
“I have a duty to my guests. I think you have a duty to yourself,” said the king, getting to his feet.
“But, Thorin—”
“No ‘buts’, milord. I’m not the one who was possessed by a valar this afternoon.”
Dwalin laughed, so there was no help coming from that quarter.
“I suppose,” Ori sighed, putting on the long-suffering look that Dori wore so well. He got up and pushed in his chair, the three of them walking out together, when Ori remembered. “Wait! Dwalin, will you leave us a moment? I have something to give Thorin.”
Dwalin quirked an eyebrow, but went out, saying something about leftover cake.
“Ori, you’ve given me quite a bit already,” said Thorin.
“This didn’t come from the box. This was something I got in the Halls. Your adad gave it to me to give to you.”
Thorin looked puzzled, then Ori hugged him. Ori felt and heard him gasp. Ori tried very hard to hug with his whole being. He wished he had Thrain’s stature, because it would probably be more effective.
They stood like this for long minutes, holding each other.
Finally, Thorin pulled away, his cheeks wet, and a smile on his face.
“Thank you, Ori.”
“You’re welcome, Thorin.”

Back in the bedroom, Ori flopped down on his bed, completely wrung out. Dwalin came after him and shut the door.
“Tha’ were quite th’ haul, love.”
“I know! Who would have thought there was so much and so many different things. I really believed it would mostly be literature about Durin and Sunflower.”
“An’ string art,” Dwalin added. They both chuckled over it. “Wonder where Thorin’ll have tha’ hung up?”
“In the museum with all the rest,” Ori giggled.
Durin’s voice in his head said, “In the privy, if he’s smart.”
Dwalin kicked off his boots and plumped down on the bed next to Ori. Ori rolled over and they kissed.
“Teyan, the dead scribe, is now haunting the library,” Ori told him.
“Good place f’r her.” Dwalin agreed. “She kin tattle on folk who try an’ nick any a’ th’ books.”
Ori snuggled closer and Dwalin took him in his arms.
“I’m so proud a’ yeh, love. Yeh went on a grea’ quest, stood a’ th’ center a’ th’ remakin’ a th’ world, an’ brought back all these treasures f’r all of us.”
“And I didn’t throw up once!”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Well, that was a very nice quest pretty much over and done with, so it’s back to normality…. Yeah, no such thing around here. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori wandered through to the sitting room, hand in hand with Dwalin. The nap had done him good, as had time alone with his husband. People were busy at the table with the books and oddities from the box. Dori was setting up tea on the stone table before the fire. Ori took note of everyone, then, “Dori, where is Granny Klak?”
“Drinking with her new buddies in the breakfast parlor,” Dori replied with an annoyed tone.
“Her new buddies?” Ori repeated.
“Margr and Vi,” Dori snapped.
Raucous laughter reached them from beyond the kitchen.
“They’ve been at it at least two hours. Red Queen joined them an hour ago. My own dear granny corrupting my handmaidens and a bird.”
Dori swept majestically back to the kitchen.
“Red Queen is drinking?” Ori asked worriedly.
They heard the bird monarch’s distinct voice, “No, no, no, I’m not going to attempt the cliffs right now. I can’t fly for shit when I drink. Pour me another.”
“You missed it,” said Thorin, over at the fire, with Bilbo tucked against his side. “Nori made the mistake of checking on them and ended up on Vi’s knee. And that is why I am staying right here.”
Dwalin threw himself onto the sofa and sighed.
“So wha’s next?”
Thorin grinned.
“Night Market.”
Dwalin sat up and Ori squeaked.
“Really?” Ori found himself hopping with excitement and didn’t care.
“I did promise Theoden at the very least,” said Thorin. “So, it seems we’ll be going in a herd, minus the soused quartet in the breakfast room, I imagine.”
Bilbo clicked his tongue and gave a roguish smile.
“Birds and dwarrow! When will they learn to hold their liquor?”
Ori pounced on him and poked his side like he would Nori’s. Bilbo ‘eeped’, jumped about six inches and burst into giggles, smacking at Ori ineffectually.
“Naughty dwarf!”
The pair of them engaged in a slap fight of less-than-epic proportions, since they were laughing almost too hard to breathe.
Thorin abruptly grabbed Bilbo around the waist and yanked him back.
“Thor-in!” Bilbo reproved.
“Er, ghivashel,” Thorin said. Then he whispered into Bilbo’s ear.
“Oh,” said Bilbo, snickering.
Ori tilted his head, confused. Then he saw how pink Thorin was, and realized that a bit of slap and tickle turned him on, even when he wasn’t doing the slapping or tickling. Ori smirked and turned to Dwalin, then drew his shoulders back in surprise. Dwalin was even pinker than Thorin.

Oh, the conversation Ori knew he and Bilbo were going to have later on.

The party heading for the Night Market first went to the Groinuls’ house to watch Gimli and Legolas become officially betrothed.

The Groinuls’ sitting room was different from the Fundinuls’; it was like a long hall with massive fireplaces at each end and everything was stone except the ceiling, which had been paneled long ago in oak. The panelling and the beams had taken on the patina of thousands of years of woodsmoke and pipe leaf.

The ceremony was a simple matter of the blushing pair braiding the traditional courting beads of the House of the Groinuls into each other’s hair. The braids were in the elven style.

They exchanged their promises in khuzdul, then in sindarin. They both managed to get through it, though listening to Gimli raise the timber of his voice in musical syllables and Legolas growling through the hard consonants was almost surreal.

Oin and Binni sobbed on Gridr’s shoulders. Gloin sniffed bravely and Romy pranced round the pair, barking. Loli and Omi squealed in delight and Bujni and Dipfa stood proudly nearby.

Omosuil and his squad in their gray, with all the other elves, sang the traditional sylvan betrothal song for the new couple. Oin, Binni, Bujni, Omi, Loli, Gridr and Gloin then joined hands and danced around the couple, while all the dwarrow sang the ancient khuzdul rites of engagement song. Theoden gave the royal Rohirrim blessing with Eowyn singing the prayer to Eru for happiness and prosperity.

Many toasts were drunk to the new couple. Gridr and Gloin presented Thranduil and Cemnesta with the contract of engagement. Thranduil dutifully signed it, witnessed by Cemnesta, making Gloin burst into fond tears and seize the Father King around the waist for a long hug. Thranduil smiled with genuine fondness and patted Gloin’s hair.

Ori turned to Cemnesta.

“Are you going with us to the Night Market, your majesty?”

Cemnesta pretended to pout.

“Alas, I have been claimed by my brother Wandi for the evening. Apparently he wants my ‘input’ on his palace decorations. That just means he wants to show off.”

“Do you really mind?”

Cemnesta smiled and shook his head.

“It’s not a chore to spend time with my brother, especially now that he’s come into his own. I don’t think he was ever happy with the idea of being king. Now he’s where he wants to be. Ada is going along with you, though.”

Unlike most of the party, who had dressed in their jumpsuits, Celeborn wearing something green to match his lady and and Lindir and Elrond, Thranduil had foregone his usual robes and wore all black, trousers tucked into boots under a long tunic with a belt. Ori thought it looked very like Bard’s outfit when he was dressed up for a Dale wedding. Thranduil, however, would never be mistaken for a man. With his platinum hair loose and unadorned, he looked even less man-like than he had in his robes.

Tilda cried, “Wicked stepmother! Your clothes match your eyebrows!”

Thranduil scooped her up against his shoulder and said with mock severity, “Yes, and you’d best have a good look now, as you’ll be fast asleep by the time I return. If you’re very lucky, perhaps Lord Balin will tell you and the other fawns a bedtime story.”

“Aye,” said Balin, grinning, “I have a few thousand ‘r so, though me fav’rite’s the one where I was beset in me own sittin’ room by a fierce, dwarf warrior, who took me prisoner a’ swordspoint.”

“Oooooo!” the younglings all gasped at once.

Ori was horrified.

“Thorin, Bilbo, Dwalin, is it time to go yet?”

Dori bustled over.

“I have to go get supper on. Have fun. Don’t eat too many sweets.”
She bumped foreheads with Ori and then swept off with Balin and a miniature entourage in tow. Bujni, Dipfa and the rest of the younger set supervised by Elrond’s twins followed.

Ori sighed.
“I’m finally a grown up.”

Dwalin leered at him and took him by the hand.
“Aye, time t’ go do ‘grown up’ thin’s.”

“Oh. I thought we were going to the market,” said Ori, leering back.

“Tha’, too,” said Dwalin.
Bilbo and Thorin exchanged looks.
“Newlyweds,” said Thorin.
“Yes, my dear,” said Bilbo. “We’d best leave now before they change their minds about going at all.”

The guards around them had forgone their uniforms, and stayed a small distance away from the party as they entered the night market.

“The Durin’s Day decorations are out already?” Dis snapped, exasperated.
“I know,” said Thorin. “It gets earlier every year. Pretty soon we’ll be seeing them at mid-Summer.”

“At least the balladeers aren’t out yet,” said Fili. Sigrid rolled her eyes.
They followed the outlying path Ori had seen at his first visit. Eowyn, Arwen, Jani and Dis were immediately distracted by the naughty booklets. They perused several and Dis shrieked out,
“Nadad, you and Bilbo are in this one!”

“Oooo,” Eowyn called. “Who knew hobbits have such big ones!”

“Jealous yet, White Lady?” Thorin teased in his turn.

“Seriously!” Bilbo growled in exasperation. “What am I supposed to do with all that? Play golf?”
Theoden realized what the booklets were and, horrified, tried to take the item away from Dis, but desisted in shock when she growled at him.

“They do that,” Legolas reassured the horse king.

“Please tell me I’m not in one of them,” said Ori.

“You’re in this one,” said Dis.

“Oh, Mahaaaaaalll!”

“Don’t worry,” said Dis, “you’re fully clothed.”

“Then what am I doing?”

“Drawing them having sex.”

“I think that’s worse,” Ori wailed.

“Only if you’re hiding in a boot cupboard,” said Bilbo.

With a wink at Ori, Dwalin led the way to the stall selling small runs of liquor. Everyone gathered around to try them out.

Arwen, Eowyn and Tauriel drank samples of beetroot wine and stuck their tongues out at each other to see how purple they had become.

Aragorn tried the parsley wine, gagged and managed to get out, “It’s a little dry.”
Dain tried the same wine and muttered about paint remover.

Sculdis smacked him.

“Be nice! It’s ‘is livelihood!”

Kili sniffed at his sample of parsnip wine for quite some time and then said, “This one definitely does not have a fruity bouquet.”

Haldir, in a very congenial mood no one was used to yet, gamely tried the lichen whiskey. He idly did the sample as a shot. A moment passed as his face showed he was trying to sort out the taste, then his eyes bulged and he suddenly had the silliest grin on his face Ori had ever seen.

“Ooooo, this is great,” he burbled rather loudly

“Thank you. I make it myself,” the proprietor beamed.

Glorfindel snickered at Haldir.
“He was always a lightweight.”

Haldir shoveled the refilled sample glass at Celeborn with amazing violence.

“Try this!” Haldir shouted then blinked, “my lord.”

Celeborn did the shot and coughed, then his smile curled around his head.

“Thranduil, my dear cousin,” the Lord of the Golden Wood cooed. “You have got to try this shit.”

Thranduil snatched the glass as the proprietor handed it to him and downed it. He paused, then addressed the proprietor.

“Do you have more of this?”

“Four cases and my sample bottles.”

“Send all the cases to Fundin House.”

“All of them, m’lord?”

“Yes, all of them. Charge Lord Celeborn for them.”

“Shut up, bark brain,” said Celeborn. Then he relented. “Oh, alright. One for Lórien, one for the revered king-father, one for Greenwood, one for Rivendell. If that’s alright with you, Elrond?”

“Eh? Yes! Quite.” He turned to Lindir over his second ‘sample’ of the whiskey. “What did I just agree to?”

“Soaking your head,” said Thranduil. He hiccuped.

Bard sighed.

“That’s enough lichen whisky for you, sweetie.”

Theoden muttered to Dwalin, “I thought it tasted like dirt.”

“Tha’s wha’ I said,” Dwalin snickered, his arm tightening around Ori. Ori giggled, seeing the group of tipsy elves about them.

“We’re taking the rest of the sample bottles,” Thranduil announced, tossing the man a bag of coins.

“Thank you, m’lord! Here, take the cups, too.”

Galadriel said, “Thank you, but I don’t think that’s necessary.”

She snatched the bottle from Thranduil’s hand and swigged from it.

“Ooo! What a kick!” she cried. “What shall we look at next?”

Thorin, turned to Ori.

“Wandering the night market with a bunch of drunk elves.”

“Happy thought, indeed,” Ori replied.

Theoden and Bard exchanged amused looks at the effect the lichen whiskey was having on the elves.

Dwalin and Ori led the way to the chip barrel, as there was no way Ori was going further without chips. Ori glanced behind him to see the extremely drunken Celeborn, Galadriel, Elrond and Lindir all holding hands in a line and trying to skip after them. Haldir was unsuccessful in making Theoden skip as well.

“I do not skip,” roared the horse lord, torn between rage and laughter.

“First time for everything,” said Haldir, gayly.

Dain shouted, “It’s easy, laddie!”

He grasped Haldir’s hands in his own and skipped in circles with him.

Sigrid and Fili had disappeared, but Kili and Tauriel joined Dain’s circle and skipped with them.

“Where are Sig and Fili?” Ori asked Dwalin.

“Where d’yeh thin’? His mam’s still here wi’ th’ drunk elf parade.”

“They’ve popped down the the Alley of Divine Bliss, haven’t they.”

“Never yeh mind, or, at leas’, never tell. Chips?”

“Yes, please! With vinegar this time!”

“Yer such a risk taker!”

“I’ve grown bold through my triumphs.”

Theoden and Bard definitely wanted chips, and so did Aragorn and Boromir, and Glorfindel was not one to refuse.
“So,” said Aragorn to his march warden. “Where is Miss Lavender this evening? Have you already fallen out?”

“Haven’t even had a chance to fall in,” said Boromir around a mouthful of chips, gravy and cheese curds. “At least I know she’s of-age.”

Theoden raised a brow at him.

“Making inquiries?”

Boromir snorted. “I got three feet out the door of the library and I was suddenly getting the hobbit version of the shovel talk from every Gamgee in the place.”

Once they were all replete, Ori led them down the square, following the sound of the music. He saw plenty of dancers and plenty of lights, but no one was doing the wag.

“Oi, yer lordship,” said a young dam Ori recognized from Buer’s circle. “Come back f’r more?”

“And brought my ‘hubby’,” said Ori, “and a few other friends.”

Her jaw hit the ground.

“Is tha’ th’ king?”

Dwalin chuckled.

“Aye, an’ a bunch a’ soused elves.”

Ori looked out over the crowd. They hopped from foot to foot in long lines, the hopping varied and complicated in pattern, the music drum-heavy.

Everyone was stripped to the waist and there was a lot of hairy, jiggling flesh in motion, bathed in the strobing lights.

“Is that a new dance?” Ori asked.

“Roscobal Hop. It’s th’ lates’ thin’!”

“Is it always danced topless?”

“If possible. Yeh burn a lo’ more energy than yeh do wi’ th’ wag. Bu’ it’s no’ required, if yer friends wan’ t’ join in. An’ I guess they do.”

Omosuil and his soldiers had stripped to the waist and were hopping along with the young dwarrow.

“An’ there goes Lady Galadriel,” said Dwalin, chuckling.

The elf nobles quickly followed, along with the younger set, Boromir and Aragorn. Eowyn followed gamely, though she left her singlet on, probably to spare her uncle’s feelings. Glorfindel had no such scruples. With a brief flinging about of clothing, he rushed stark naked into the dance and joined a line, hopping madly.

Bard and Theoden, left holding piles of clothing, looked at each other and said, “No.”

Dwalin grinned over at Thorin.

“Wha’s yer pleasure, yer majesty?”

Thorin laughed and shook his head, “I’m on the fence about it. I am supposed to maintain a modicum of dignity under my own mountain.”

He looked to Bilbo, who was already entranced.

“Go on, ghivasha, I know you want to.”

Bilbo kissed him and made his way to the dance floor, weskit, shirt and neckcloth left in Thorin’s tender care.

The dancers shouted and cheered when he joined them, his long, springy feet proving well-suited to the dance.

Ori was impressed.

“He’s really good at that.”

“Yes,” Thorin purred, smile feral. “Yes, he is.”

Ori looked up through his eyelashes at Dwalin.

“Shall we?”

Dwalin shot Thorin an inquiring eyebrow.

“Go ahead,” said Thorin. “Best leave us old duffers to ourselves.”

Master Dubb snorted. He had insisted on coming along, even though, as he told everyone he met, he was retired.
“Speak f'r yerself,” Dubb spat, then, dropping his backpack, he was gone to the dance floor. Dwalin took Ori’s hand and they lit out after him.

Ori quickly realized why they were stripped. Between the dance and the energy given off by so many dwarf bodies in one place, he was soaking through his under tunic in minutes. It wasn’t so much the heat itself, though it was definitely of the forge, but more akin to the nearly-solid thermal wall that belted him when Dwalin first opened the lava gate.

Dwalin was obviously more than happy to help Ori remove the top part of his clothing, and his own, tying the upper parts of their jumpsuits about their waists as the others had.

The drum beat jolted through Ori’s chest and carried him along. The bodies in constant motion threw another layer of effect over the strobes, which he thought must have been altered since he was last in the market. It was easy to tell who the Ironfists were, because their already-iridescent face tattoos seemed to jump separately from their skin.

Nodun and Arne hopped by, Nodun waving, and Jani and Dis danced in a tight circle with Dubb and another dam Ori didn’t recognize.

Someone started a holler to the beat of the drums and then they were all hollering, bouncing up and down to the beat.

Ori turned to Dwalin, whose howls sent pleasant shivers up Ori’s spine. They grinned at each other in perfect joy.

The dance went on and on, but the drummers finally cried for mercy and someone brought them beer.

Ori found himself carried along with the crowd to the fountain, where they splashed each other in the cool water, washing away the sweat and generally misbehaving. Dwalin scooped up water to rinse off Ori’s back.

“Love, looks li’e yeh go’ another tattoo started.”

“Really? What is it?” Ori twisted around, but got distracted by the rivulets of water running down Dwalin’s chest. Suddenly, Ori was warm again. He bit his lip as he looked up at his husband.

He grasped Dwalin’s beard in both hands, pulled him down and kissed him hard to the sound of clapping and whistling.

“I love you,” Ori said.

“I love yeh, too, me fierce, wee scribe.”

“We need to stop right there, don’t we?”

“Sad, bu’ true,” said Dwalin with a sigh.

Dwalin led him back toward the edge of the square, where Thorin had found a towel from Mahal-knew-where and was sponging off his soggy, giggling consort. Ori supposed kings were never left wanting for towels when they needed them.

“Ori!” Bilbo cried. “You dancing wizard! You put us all to shame!”

They knocked foreheads, and when Bilbo pulled away he did a double-take and grinned.

“Gracious, but you are popular, aren’t you.”

Ori tilted his head in question.

Dwalin cuddled into him and said, “Take a look a’ yer side, love.”

Ori twisted to look. The blaze of colors startled him, along with the sheer amount of acreage. It was a big tattoo, even for a dwarf.

It was a sunflower, of course, though Ori thought the abstraction made it look like something else, too.

“That’s a doily, isn’t it,” he said with a sigh. “I have a tattoo of a doily on my skin.”

He sent a silent ‘thank You’ to the ether anyway. He wondered if he was supposed to be Yavanna’s scribe as well as Mahal’s now, and if so, how he would divide up his time and when he would sleep.

Yavanna’s voice flowed through his mind.

“No to worry, my dear. I already have a scribe.”

Ori wondered who it might be.

“That would be me,” said Bilbo with a wink. “I’m not just another hobbit conkers champion, you know.”
Ori laughed in surprise.
“Of course you are!”
They embraced and Ori said merrily, “We’re doomed!”
“Yes, but at least we’ll be doomed together. Much more sociable that way.”
Ori looked up to find both Thorin and Dwalin staring at them as if they had lost their minds. He supposed that was to be expected when they weren’t hearing the whole conversation.
Bilbo looked back and up at Thorin.
“Scribe,” he said.
“Ah,” said Thorin.
Dwalin leaned back with his arms folded.
Thorin smirked.
“Don’t get your armor in a twist, I’ll explain later.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The Night Market is a wonderful place, isn’t it? After so many serious adventures and discoveries, our beloved characters are long overdue for some seriously silly fun. You might need junk food for this chapter as it’s all Ori and crew are going to be eating and this chapter does go on relentlessly. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

A fruit water vendor had wisely set up his cart nearby, and Bard bought them all cups, while Theoden redistributed clothing to the now-cooled dancers.

“You’re all worse than my son,” he teased them.

Kili stuck his arms through the sleeves of his jumpsuit.

“It’s not like we could hang them up on a convenient tree,” he said. “You’re the next best thing to it.”

Theoden smacked him lightly with the sleeve of Boromir’s jacket.

“Rotten child. Finish dressing before you catch cold.”

While Ori sat on a bench, he saw the same dam he’d spoken to earlier.

“I’m sorry,” Ori said, “but I’m almost certain Buer introduced all of you.”

“Bu’ yeh can’ remember me name?” She laughed and shook her head. She had Broadbeam features, down to the freckles, and tattoos of picks and hammers in a necklace of ink, from her chin down to her breasts. “I’m no’ surprised. Our Buer talks li’e there’s no time t’ waste, then just expects yeh t’ remember. I’m Nugget.”

Ori blinked.

“Ori of Fundin, at your service.”

She laughed again.

“It’s jus’ me Night Market name. I have another, bu’ it’s terribly stuffy.”

“Where is Buer?” Ori asked, realizing he hadn’t seen the brightly-hued tinkerer yet tonight.

“Oh, he’s go’ a new thin’ goin’ near th’ Alley a’ Sweetmeats, right at th’ edge a’ where th’ Court a’ Miracles se’ up. Yeh know tha’ new cane sugar tha’ comes fro’ th’ East? He uses it t’ make spun sugar ‘r some such. He’s really int’ it! He started ou’ wi’ jus’ pink, then he added blue an’ green. Don’ know how he makes it pink, bu’ it doesn’t taste pink, anyway.”

Dwalin peered down at Ori and Nugget.

“Wha’ does pink taste li’e?”

“We’ll find out,” Ori quipped with a grin.

Dwalin sat down on his other side. Nugget was hailed by some friends and, with a cheery farewell, shot off to join them.

While they finished their drinks, Ori rested against Dwalin and closed his eyes. Beside him he heard Bard and Theoden talking.

“-wasn’t the way I was raised,” said Theoden.

“It wasn’t the way I was raised, either,” said Bard, “but this is their mountain and this is dwarven culture. As with the elves, it’s not nudity that’s important, but what you do with it.”

“They seemed to be doing quite a bit,” Theoden pointed out.

The dancing had recommenced and the flesh was sparking under the lights.

“They’re all of-age,” said Bard. “You’ll notice, there aren’t any children here. Besides, I don’t remember hearing the Rohirrim described as a chaste people. All that rolling around under the blankets by the campfire.”

“Under the blankets being the operative words,” said Theoden. “It’s just startling to think they were such a closed society for so long, yet among themselves, so equally open. There’s so much to learn. I hope Princess Dis doesn’t hold it against me that I tried to take away her… er… book.”

“Dis will pretend it never happened, as long as you don’t do it again.”

“I think I’ve learned my lesson. But, none of this bothers you?”

“If it does, I look at something else. It’s not like there isn’t plenty to look at.”

Now curious, Ori opened his eyes and peeked at the two men. They stood together quite at ease. Ori thought they could pass for common men of Dale.

Theoden chuckled.

“I’m chanting inwardly that Eowyn is more than of age, and it’s not my business when and if she’s rolling in the hay with anyone. Is that how you’re thinking about your Sigrid?”

Bard squeezed his eyes shut with a look of pain.

“Yes, but I’m pretending my Sig is home with Dori. I do know fine well she’s slipped off with Fili as soon as my back was turned. I know she’s perfectly safe and she’s with Fili. They have two guards with them. So she is, no doubt, perfectly happy… Which is why I’m not going to wring his hairy little neck when I see him next.”

Theoden clapped Bard on the shoulder.

“My nephew’s married a dwarf queen and your daughter has herself a dwarf prince, we should congratulate ourselves, Dale.”

“We should, Rohan, but they’re always our wee ones, aren’t they?”

Theoden nodded, laughing, and the Company moved on, though Omosuil and most of his elves stayed on with Thranduil’s blessing.

As they wandered, Ori saw there were many more men and quite a few elves from the Greenwood than the last time he had been. He knew some had set up as vendors, though if they didn’t live in Dale or Erebor, they paid a fee to the crown for the privilege. Thorin used the entire income to upkeep the market itself, as it was open night and day.

They arrived at a large, open stall that was jointly owned by a subgroup of the weavers’ guild that sold sewing notions and fancy work. They were officially the Trim Guild, but were informally called the Buttons and Bows.

The guild members had leased their stall for night use to a group of dwarrow devoted to developing the strange bouncy substance gifted to Thorin at his coronation.

They seemed to have developed furniture with it. A lot of furniture: tables, chairs, sofas, benches, anything Ori could imagine, and all of it packed tightly into a sea of brightly colored, softly undulating shapes and a variety of sizes. Dwarrow, elves, and men wandered through in equal numbers.

“iKeyha,” Ori read off the banner they had strung over the entrance. “How did they even get it all here? Just one sofa must weigh a ton.”

Bilbo nudged him on the shoulder.

“Maybe not. Look.”

Hathor and Guernsia had chosen a big-person sofa of aquamarine. The elf pointed it out to the attendant, who was a dwarf. They had a brief conversation.

The attendant drew his knife and plunged it hard into the sofa.

They all flinched, but the blade merely bounced off the surface.

Hathor and Guernsia exchanged looks and she nodded.

The attendant picked up the sofa by one end and hoisted the entire thing easily over his shoulder. It was awkward, but certainly not heavy.

“Wha’ th’ fuck?” Gimli asked to no one in particular.

Guernsia said something and the dwarf nodded and put the sofa down. He opened a nozzle on the side and the sofa deflated into a flat patch before their eyes. The attendant folded the entire affair into something smaller than a pastry box and carried it to the counter.
“Dwalin, what did we just see?” Ori asked.
“Dunno,” said Dwalin, “bu’ I wan’ t’ see how they put it back.”
The attendant produced a small cylinder with a handle at one end and demonstrated re-inflating the sofa part way before deflating it again.
“Takes a li’le effort, ma’am, bu’ yeh kin re-inflate it in a tic. Be’er’n tryin’ t’ blow it up by mouth any day.”
“How much?” Guernsia asked.
“Sofa’s twenny gold. We throw in th’ pump f’r a silver.”
“How about trading the pump for a packet of coffee?”
She took the parcel out of her satchel and waved it.
The attendant’s eyes lit up.
“Yeh got more a’ tha’ wi’ yeh, ma’am?”
“I have three.”
“Tell yeh wha’. Gimme all three an’ yeh kin have th’ whole kit f’r fifteen gold.”
She held out her arm and they grasped each other’s wrist.
“Done and done,” Guernsia said.
“Done an’ done,” said the attendant.
Personally, Ori thought Dale coffee tasted like iron filings, which weren’t as flavorful as one would think anyway, but some dwarrow had gained a liking for it.
The couple took their parcel and greeted the king’s party in passing.
“King Thorin, you must come and see how the raphcuctus birds have settled in,” said Guernsia.
“King Bard was just saying that, Mistress Guernsia,” said Thorin. “We’ll be heading your way later this week for the Gamgee’s housewarming party. They want to do it now before the harvest starts in earnest. Would you be able to accommodate us next rest day?”
“Certainly! Hathor and I and all our family have been invited as well, as we’re their neighbors now. Fine couple, the Gamgees, very friendly and obliging. Our children go to school together.”
Thranduil gamely offered the lichen whiskey to Hathor.
“No, thank you, King-Father,” Hathor laughed. “That stuff doesn’t bother men or dwarrow but one glass can knock an elf into next week.”
Thranduil grinned evilly. “Yes, so we’re all finding out and deliciously so.”
The couple took their leave and the Company flooded into the stall.
Out of the corner of his eye, Ori had seen the attendant register who his next customers might be. The dwarf stood resolute in the dwarfish way, but if he were a little younger he would likely still be shuffling nervously. His braids marked him as an apprentice chemical engineer, the same trade as King Ulfr, but his bead and clasps were not the usual material. In fact, his reddish-brown beard had been gathered into one long strand, decorated and held every few inches with brightly colored material that did not appear to be string or metal.
He looked like he might just be of-age.
“Yer majesties, nobles, an’ er, everyone,” he bowed. “I’m a’ yer service.”
Thorin bowed.
“You are very good, Master Darnub.”
The youth’s eyes grew very wide.
Thorin laughed gently.
“You look just like your grandfather.”
“I didn’t tell ’im who yeh was,” said Dubb. “Git on wi’ yer pitch, lad.”
Darnub swallowed.
“Yes, udad. How may I be a’ assistance, yer majesties?”
“We’ve come to look,” said Thorin. “Is this the same tree sap that Queen Hild brought for the coronation?”
“Some o’ it, yer majesty. Th’ masters set us a task f’r our journeyman’s, t’ come up wi’ somethin’ made a’ this stuff. Said we could do anythin’ we wanted, bu’ it had t’ be useful. Turns out, there’s no’ a lot yeh can’t do with it.”
“Is that what your bead and clasps are made of?” Ori asked.

“Aye, Lord Ori. Take a look.” He stretched the lowest of the bands from his beard and removed it. “It’s jus’ a li’le tube a’ purple sap, bu’ it stretches an’ bounces back a treat. Sort a’ li’el a clasp, righ’? No’ as sturdy as a real clasp, an’ stretches out eventu’ly, bu’ when it breaks down, yeh pu’ it back in th’ meltin’ crucible an’ make y’rself a new ‘un.”

“That’s amazing!” Ori said, pulling and stretching the band in his fingers before handing it back.

“Has Mister Wandi seen this yet? Imagine what he could do with hair if he just had a few of these.”

The young dwarf looked struck.

“I never though’ a’ him! Ta, mate - er, milord - I’ll pop down there t’morrah an’ see if he’s interested.”

The Company had spread out through the space, throwing themselves on furniture and rebounding into more furniture and into each other. The elves especially laughed uncontrollably.

Darnub looked at them out of the corner of his eye.

Thorin said, “They’re drunk, not mad. Please send me a bill for any damages.”

“Shouldn’t be much, yer majesty. If it can wi’stan’ tha’, I’d say I’m set.”

‘That’ was Dain and Sculdis, bootless, jumping up and down on a bed, holding hands, and going for height.

Bilbo said, “That looks like a dangerous trend.”

“This is nothin’, perfesser,” said Darnub. “Jus’ wait until they ge’ t’ th’ Castle Bounce.”

“What’s Castle Bounce?” Bilbo inquired, an eyebrow raised.

Darnub grinned.

“Jus’ a li’le somthin’ me master built an’ sold t’ Master Woudini.”

“This ought to be good,” said Bilbo, “but we may end up buying one for Dain’s birthday.”

“If yer interested, perfesser, we do make hobbit-sized furnishings, too.”

“Ah,” said Bilbo, “such as that bright yellow sofa upon which King-Father Thranduil has so picturesquely arranged himself?”

Thranduil had indeed posed like a well-fed cat, to Bard’s and Galadriel’s amusement and Celeborn’s ridicule.

Galadriel giggled.

“You look like a bumblebee!” she cried.

“He always was a pain in the arse,” said Celeborn. “Cousin, you are never going to be able to get to your feet with any sort of dignity.”

They exchanged ugly faces, then Galadriel dragged her husband off to look at the beds.

Bard stood with his arms crossed, looking down at his husband.

“You can’t get up, can you?”

“Not with any sort of dignity, no. And I’m not even disgracefully drunk yet.”

“There’s only one thing to do, then,” said Bard. “Push over.”

“What are you doing?” Thranduil asked, laughing, as Bard flopped down beside him.

“We’ll be undignified together,” said Bard. “Wasn’t that what we promised? To do everything we could together?”

“I don’t think my ancestors planned for this eventuality,” said Thranduil.

“Then they were sadly unimaginative,” said Bard. “This is very comfortable. We should get one.”

“It is not going in our bedroom,” Thranduil said with dangerous finality.

“I would never dream of mucking about with your elegant arrangements, sweetie. I meant, for the family room, only ours will be taller and less blindingly colored. We bring it home and we let Tilda try to destroy it. If it can survive Princess Disaster and her Enchanted Boot Knife, it can survive anything.”

“Princess Disaster? I like that! Is it possible to add it to her titles?”

“I don’t know, is it? You’ve done all this king stuff before.”

“I’ve never officially bestowed such a title,” Thranduil confessed, “though when Wandi was Theoden and Aragorn watched the two with interest, then Theoden said, “That’s almost as tooth-rottingly sweet as you and Arwen.”

“We’ve had longer to practice,” said Aragorn.

Bard and Thranduil waited until Celeborn and Galadriel had scampered after Aragorn and Arwen, off toward the Alley of Sweetmeats, before Gimli and Legolas helped pry them to their feet. Bard and Thranduil looked over a few taller sofa specimens in the same shape, and gestured to Darnub.

If the apprentice was startled to find the remaining Company following along with him, he didn’t show it.

Thranduil bowed to Darnub, listing only slightly, and said, “I apologize if we have frightened away any customers with our display.”

Darnub laughed.

“Nah, king-father, jus’ th’ opposite. If they hear th’ quality’s bin here, we’ll be swamped wi’ curiosity seekers. Some a’ em at leas’ll buy a piece ’r two.”

“In that case, I expect a cut of the profits. Joking! I’m joking! King Bard and I would very much like to buy the teal sofa off in the corner. Twenty gold and a silver for the pump, is it? And a bit more to have it delivered in Dale?”

“No need, yer majesty. I’m goin’ by Dale Hall anyway t’ visit Mister Wandi. I’ll drop it by then.”

‘Dale Hall’ was the default name the people had given to the house where Bard’s family now lived. Ori knew Bard had been hesitant to call it a royal residence or any such thing, but he had no objection to people naming it for him.

“Spun sugar next?” Ori asked Dwalin eagerly.

“Hungry again?”

“I need to fortify myself before I visit Castle Bounce, whatever that is.”

Dwalin looked out over the furniture and chuckled.

“Don’ suppose yeh’d mind a wee detour int’ th’ Alley a’ Divine Bliss on the way?”

Ori licked his lips.

“I think I might be persuaded.”

Dwalin seemed to gain Thorin’s attention through thought alone.

Thorin turned, Dwalin chucked his chin off to the left and Thorin grinned.

“Have fun.”

The first stand along was crowded with canvases and drawings, charcoals and pastels, oils and colored inks. The largest works depicted nudes in every media, light, and mood, sometimes alone and sometimes in groups, and the variety of races: dwarrow, men, elves, though no hobbits as far as he could see.

There was so much art in every square foot, and all of it so luscious, that Ori had to carefully pick his way through, wanting to lick everything he saw. He and Dwalin were alone in the stall with the dwarf proprietor, a mature, broadly built dwarf, with bright red curls and dark skin. His beads allied him with the Blacklocks and called him a master of fine arts, though, interestingly, he didn't have apprentice or journeymen's beads.

Ori bowed slightly in greeting and the bow was returned, somewhat nervously.

"If there's anything I might help you with, milord, captain, I am at your service."

"Thank you," said Ori, wishing he could find a way to relieve the dwarf of this deference.

Although, perhaps he was just intimidated by Dwalin, who seemed to take up the remaining room in the enclosure all on his own.

In a bin on a stand, Ori found smaller drawings and prints, upright on their edges in temporary frames. The first portrayed a simple nude of a dam. It looked like the study for a painting, but had been rendered in color, sensuous and pleasing, the work of the same painter's hand.

Curious, he flipped through.
The next print showed him a dam with a strap-on phallus, taking another dam from behind.
Oh.
Same coloring, same style, though the proportions were not as fine. The piece was dated a good deal earlier than the last, which accounted for the looseness in technique, but the overall effect was-
What in Mordor's bloody name was he thinking?
A picture of two dams having sex in front of him and he was critiquing proportions?
Ori mentally face-palmed and flipped to the next, a picture of a male elf masturbating, as viewed from above.
The ecstasy captured in the elf's features was nothing less than breathtaking, but the angle gave Ori vertigo and he moved to the next.
In a pastel of soft greys, brown and blues, a dwarf and a man tangled together in a tender embrace. They were both solid, well-grown, and exceptionally hairy.
"Nice they've gone in f'r variety," said Dwalin, looking over his shoulder.
"I was just thinking that."
"This appeal t' yeh?"
"Yes, actually. I don't think I could walk away from it, though I have no idea where I'd put it."
"In th' bedroom."
Ori looked up at him in surprise.
"Really? Do you like it, too?"
"Ac'ually, I thin' it's sweet, bu' don' tell anyone I ever used tha' word."
"'Actually'?"
"Smar' arse. I go' a -"
"A reputation to maintain, I know," said Ori, elbowing him gently.
"B'sides, tha' room's allus bin a li'l' bare, 'cept f'r th' swords 'n hammers 'n such."
"You're actually suggesting we decorate with something other than implements of mayhem?"
Ori fluttered his lashes before turning to the dwarf, who was trying hard not to hover and failing.
"Excuse me? What can you tell me about this piece?"
"These are all mine, Lord Ori. I work from life for the initial sketch, adding detail to the finished piece as it appeals to me."
"Everything I've seen so far is magnificent, but this one is especially beautiful."
"Thank you, milord. I was pleased with it."
"How much do you ask for it?"
The dwarf looked startled and named a modest sum.
"Really? I think you need to raise your prices," Ori teased gently.
"I haven't had my mastery very long, milord. It's a bit daunting to ask even the price the guild suggests."
"You should, as soon as possible," Ori encouraged.
The dwarf didn't know where to look.
"I know I should, milord, but, you see, I'm self-taught. Feels almost like a cheat to ask the same as those who had proper masters."
Ori turned to Dwalin.
"Would you give me a minute, love?"
Ori thought this was becoming a habit. He hoped Dwalin didn't resent it.
Dwalin just gave him a knowing grin and said, "'Course. I'll be over a' th' next stall, lookin' over th' new wibbly pricks."
Ori turned to the dwarf.
"What is your name, master?"
"Kyur, son of Myur, milord."
"Master Kyur, I've had some proper teachers, but only because my brother was willing to go without to make sure I did. Not everyone is as fortunate. Your work is at least as good as mine, and your grasp of shading makes me all but swoon. What was your craft before this?"
Kyur ducked his head.
"I still sell skivvies in the day market. I did so for about seventy years before I got up the money and the courage and found a sponsor in the guild."
"And they looked at your work and accepted you for mastery right away."
"Yes, milord." He looked horribly embarrassed.
"Yet, you don’t think you’re as good as the other masters?” Ori shook his head, but it was out of fondness, not censure. "This is what I'm going to give you for this piece."
He named a substantially larger price than what Kyur had asked.
The dwarf gasped.
"Milord, really, it's more than kind, but if it’s just a kindness-"
"It's a little over guild asking price," said Ori, "and we both know it. Besides, if you take less, how will you make a living and pay your extremely attractive models?"
Kyur grinned and visibly relaxed.
"You have me, milord. They are a little tired of being paid in underpinnings, and my elf never knows what to do with them anyway."
As Kyur carefully wrapped the picture and promised delivery to Fundin House on the morrow, Ori asked, "Are you here every night, Master Kyur?"
"The night before rest days, and the nights of both rest days, milord. Skivvies don't make themselves, after all."
"Alas," said Ori, "it's true."
They parted cordially and Ori went on to find Dwalin at the stall where the faux pricks were displayed. The vendor had set up a new display of items made with the novel tree sap material. They swirled with color.
"Bu' how durable 'r they?" Dwalin asked the dam.
He held a lightning blue and gold specimen, shaking it by the base so that the generously proportioned length shot back and forth like a spring.
Ori snickered.
"Are you playing with that nice dam's penis, Dwalin?"
Even as the words came out of his mouth, he actually realized what he'd said and his face was hot as a forge.
Dwalin and the vendor turned to look at him. The dam snickered and Dwalin laughed out loud in surprise and delight.
"S' alright," he said. "She gave me permission."
"To answer your question, captain," said the dam, "they are very durable and very easy to clean. However, should they get nicked or cut, they will tear."
"So, lettin' th' wargs play wi 'em's out a' th' question?"
"I'm afraid so," she replied. "A shame, I know. This new material is quite something. It's as easy to mold as any glass or metals, and has a pleasant 'give' to it. We have a limited number at the moment, because they sell so well. I've heard they do have some drawbacks, though."
"Besides no' bein' warg-safe?"
"Yes. I don't know how it affects hobbits. Dwarrow and elves seem perfectly fine, but some of the men have reported rashes when the material comes into contact with sensitive areas."
"Ouch," said Ori.
"Yes," said the dam. "I'm glad that was discovered before I sold any of these to the men. Now they can't say they weren't forewarned."
Ori frowned.
"The way the men see sex, do you have any as customers at all?"
She snorted.
"What the men say and what they do are often two very different things, milord. Though, I can see changes even now. King Bard's elf is one of my best customers, and he'll say so to anyone who'll hear it. He's as shameless as any dwarf, and quite popular in the city. Amazing what can happen when you take that stick out of your arse."
She excused herself to tend to another customer.
Ori looked up at Dwalin.
"I'm surprised Bard hasn't combusted from the embarrassment."
"He ge's back 'is own. Did yeh ever thin' yeh'd hear any call Thranduil 'sweetie'?"
“And live? No,” said Ori, looking idly through the cases, which also contained new items since the last time they'd been.
Because he had been such a Faithful Reader of the Works of Queen Kivi, he now recognized the contents of the case and, for the most part, how they were used.
He looked askance at the cock rings.
Usually, he was on the edge of passing out just from what he and Dwalin did now. Mucking about with delayed ejaculation was too much to plan for, never mind to bear.
"It's kind of intimidating, isn't it,” said Ori. "All these gadgets."
"These 'r dwarrow we're talkin' abou', love. Lots've us go' a serious hardware fetish. No ma'er wha' yer hand does, there mus' be somethin' t' do it be'er. Which ain't t' say none a' this has it's uses.
Bein' handcuffed kin be a pretty tease - so long's yeh've go' the key f'r 'em."
"Sometimes,” said familiar voice, "letting them think for a moment that you've lost the key adds a little excitement."
"Master Tay!” Ori cried. "How are you keeping?"
Nodun's husband looked as perfectly well-dressed and groomed as he had the last time they met, but Ori would never forget how he looked, bedraggled and naked, telling King Ulfr to shut up and get out.
"Well, thank you, Lord Ori. Captain Dwalin."
"Master Tay. Doin' a little research?"
"I am on business elsewhere in the market, but I always drop in here to see what's new."
"Didn' hear yeh was much f'r novelties,” said Dwalin, conversationally.
"I'm not, professionally speaking, but despite my Ironfist frugality, I'm not above buying trinkets I don't need. This, however, I think I'll forego."
"What is it?” Ori asked, peering into the case.
"A sterling silver reproduction of the penis of Durin IV."
Durin snickered in Ori's mind.
"Righ’. They thin' I posed f'r tha?"
"Didn't you?” Ori muttered saucily.
"How would I even ge' tha' in me trousers?"
"It does seem a little large,” said Ori aloud.
"Obviously forged in the spirit of eternal optimism,” said Tay. "Supposedly it can be used as a sex implement as well as a doorstop, but even I have my limits."
They wandered together into the next stall, which was a larger than most. It sold oils and incenses, and was one of the shops that stayed open night and day.
Ori supposed Tay or Dwalin might be able to make sense of it, but all he saw were shelves upon shelves of glass bottles, most clear with a variety of liquids, but some blue glass or brown, and furniture like bureaus, but fitted with dozens of small drawers, each bearing an ancient, smudged label in khuzdul.
He had noticed the slight scent of this place from several stalls down, but here it was as large and present as the bottles and bureaus. He couldn't say it was familiar, but he rather liked it.
As far as Ori could tell, the bottles were not grouped or even organized in any fashion, though the labels were easier to read.
"Oil of Peppermint. Isn't that what you put in cookies?"
"Yes,” said Tay, “but also very soothing for the feet."
"How does eating peppermint help your feet?"
Tay grinned.
"Eating or drinking it won't help your feet, though it might settle an upset stomach. No, you use it to massage the feet."
"Well, I feel like a cram brain,” said Ori.
Dwalin kissed him on top of his head and Tay chuckled.
"Go easy on yourself, master scribe. The Great Library wasn't filled in one day."
"True," Ori relented. "We saw Nodun and Arne dancing at the square. Don't you dance?"
"When I can, but right now I'm on a mission. There it is. Oil of Cinnamon." He turned to the old dwarf behind the counter and peppered him with questions. "Do you make your own? Where did the cinnamon come from?"
Tay must have liked the answers he got, because he bought two large bottles.
"Is that good for the feet, too?" Ori asked.
"Good for the rest of the senses. Supposedly, biologically the males of mankind find it irresistible."
"Why?"
"No idea, but, really, who wouldn't want their lover to smell like pie?"
Tay had a wheeled basket of his own, which quickly filled with bottles and packets.
"I have to stock up," said Tay, "before bloody Wandi corners the market and drives up the price."
"Do you think Mister Wandi will really cut into your business?" Ori asked.
"Somewhat, though obviously I offer services he doesn't, and my currant scones will always be superior to his."
"How do you know?"
"I got my recipe from Dori."
"Really? I would have thought he'd give it to Wandi as a favor."
"I asked Dori about that. She said she didn't want to be seen playing favorites. But we all know how silly that is. It's obvious that you're her favorite."
"And I already have the recipe," said Ori.
After they bade farewell to Tay, they stopped for a nice cuppa and some almond-flour cookies with powdered sugar and lemon.
"This is nice," said Ori, cuddled up against Dwalin on the cushions at a Stiffbeard tea house. The little table in front of them was a sunburst pattern of tiny tiles and the cloth panels that provided temporary walls glinted with mirrors among the threads of the embroidery.
"Though 'yeh might' li'e a breather b'fore we head back t' th' herd," said Dwalin.
Ori sighed.
"It is tempting to just ditch the herd and stay right here, but I know we can't."
"We'll be back soon," said Dwalin.
The dam who ran the house carried her tiny pebble in a back strap. It was too young to do much more than stir and yawn. As the dam bustled among the customers, she was followed by a young dwarf who closely resembled her and who talked incessantly and in dialect, which she did her best to ignore.
Finally, the badgerling woke and started to cry.
Exasperated, the dam turned to the dwarf and said in westron, "Tell him to go fuck himself. I'm not going back, and I'm not sending the damlings back, either. He can cook his own damned dinner."
She sat, expertly moved the pebble to her chest, bared a breast and popped the nipple into its mouth.
"But, Nilis-"
"Don't you 'but' me."
Dwalin turned to catch her eye and chuck his chin at the youth.
"Naw," she said. "I can handle it. Ta."
The youth turned and left, taking all the tension with him. The teahouse settled once more into serenity.
Ori watched the baby feed for a moment. Its little chin whiskers bobbing up and down, and reflected that the infants of any race were adorable, as long as he didn't have to have one himself.
"Killer an' th' kittens 'r plenty f'r yeh," said Dwalin with a grin.
"You always read my mind. I think I'll be much happier as an uncle."
Ori leaned over and brushed the powdered sugar from Dwalin's beard. Then Dwalin brushed the powdered sugar from Ori's!

"Oh!" said Ori.

"F'rgot f'r a sec, didn' yeh?"

"Since it's stopped itching so much. I know it'll never be as nice as yours."

"I like it," said Dwalin simply.

The smell of sugar wafted over them at the entrance to the Alley of Sweetmeats. Despite the tea and cookies, Ori’s mouth watered.

He could see the rest of the Company cavorting among the stalls. Lady Galadriel wore three strings of fruit candy necklaces, which Lord Celeborn nibbled at, missing the necklaces themselves a good bit, but causing Galadriel to giggle and bat at him.

“Naughty!”

“Who could resist?”

“Apparently, not you.”

She kissed him, perhaps trying for a distraction, but it didn’t work and she didn’t seem to mind.

“What do you think of these?” she asked, lifting a tiny pair of legless drawers, which sparkled in sugar-covered candy colors.

Ori narrowed his eyes at the garment, then giggled, hiccuped and stepped back into Dwalin all at once.

They didn’t just look like candy, apparently, as Celeborn leaned in and took a healthful bite out of the crotch.

He chewed, swallowed, considered and said, “Ask if they have any in peach flavor. You know it’s my favorite.”

Ori looked up at Dwalin.

“Their stall is in the wrong alley.”

He wondered how many pair Sigrid had sprung for, and how soon he could corner her to ask.

The owner of the stall, who apparently was beyond any fear or shock, ventured, “And would the gentleman care to examine our line of similar garments for males?”

Galadriel squealed.

“Oh, yes, my dear!”

Theoden, standing nearby, studiously watched the operation of a clockwork taffy pulling machine, while Dain excitedly explained how it worked.

“Doesn’t the machine oil tend to leach into the taffy?” Theoden asked.

“Jus’ adds flavor,” said Dain, shrugging.

“I think I’ll pass,” said Theoden.

“Heh. More f’r me,” said Dain.

Thranduil had joined Galadriel and Celeborn, followed by a visibly reluctant Bard.

“I see it all now,” said Bard. “You’re trying to kill me.”

“With xocolātl penises? At least you would die happy.” To the vendor he asked, “Are they hollow or solid?”

“We have both, m’lord. The solid are always nice, but we can fill the hollow ones with the cream flavor of your choice.”

“Eru save me,” Bard muttered.

Thorin and Bilbo investigated a stall across the way, Thorin talking to the stall-keeper, a woman who was dark-skinned like a Blacklock, though her hair was coiled and clumped eccentrically, not braided.

“I see you’re getting on, Mistress Deneb,” said Thorin.

“Yes, it is very good,” said the woman, grinning. Her face bore rows upon rows of neat, tiny scars. “We sell many pastries, thank you, your majesty.”

Ori turned to Dwalin with a quizzical brow.
“Easterlin’s,” said Dwalin softly.
“Really?”
Ori went to the case and looked in.
There were lots of very interesting items, almost none of which he recognized.
Bilbo nudged him.
“You want to try that round one, with the molded designs. Dates stuffed with walnuts, in a solid pastry crust. Mahnl, I think they call it.”
“That sounds really good,” said Ori. “What about those? Is that custard?”
“Custard tarts. The crust is a little more crumbly.” He looked up at the woman. “Excuse me, ma’am, what do you call these?”
“Nataj, also very good, professor. Very… hmmm? What is… tasty.”
Ori bit his lip.
“Dwalin.”
“Love.”
“How many of those do you think a dwarf could eat before he explodes?”
“Ask Bilbo how many a hobbit kin eat an’ figure abou’ half a’ tha’.”
Bilbo nodded.
“Very wise, actually.”
Ori ended up with a sack of a dozen of both, since he knew he would eat at least three of either at a sitting, and he wanted to have one each to bring back to Dori.
They wandered on, sampling divinity and caramel and maple sugar molded into shapes, rounded bits of xocolātl with hard sugar shells of different colors, some plain and some with peanuts. There were sugared violets and rose petals, cakes made entirely of gooey caramel wrapped in solid xocolātl and curious, thin, dark xocolātl cookies sandwiching a creamy sugar confection.
The largest crowd gathered around a dwarf with a long, thin slab of marble for a counter, and a vat of melted xocolātl. He took up a small ball of xocolātl, or crushed, creamed nuts on the end of a skewer, dipped it in the xocolātl sauce, rolled it in ground cinnamon and left it to sit on the marble slab. Then, when he had a row of them, he dipped them and rolled each anew, in different ingredients, finally left to set in perfect rounds, which he decorated.
The entire process was mesmerizing.
Then the dwarf cut the finished products in half to show the layers, and they were just as beautiful that way as they had been whole. Then he passed the pieces out as samples, and the moans of pleasure bordered the obscene.
“Where do you even learn to do this?” Ori asked.
The dwarf grinned, never looking up from his work.
“I developed it m’self, m’lord. Lots o’ trial an’ error. O’ course, the best part o’ the error is, you get to eat your mistakes.”
The candies were steeply expensive, but seeing the work that went into them, Ori didn’t mind paying so much.
Kili was suddenly right there in front of Ori and he was terribly excited.
“Ori-mate! Did you taste this?”
Obviously, Kili had, because he had some powdered cinnamon on his chin. He held Tauriel’s hand in a deathgrip and was nearly jumping up and down. His pupils were very, very large.
“Yes, I did, Ki,” said Ori. He exchanged glances with Tauriel, who looked like she was about to explode with laughter before he continued, “What have you been up to?”
“There’s a vendor down the end of the alley who’s figured out how to turn coffee, sugar and cream into candy. I had some of those.”
“How many would that be?”
“About forty.”
“Ah. Perhaps some chamomile tea?”
“Why?”
“No reason. Forget I said anything.”
Kili latched onto Gimli next, and started the entire conversation again.
Ori asked Tauriel, “Are you alright?”
“I’m fine,” she said. “It’s a good thing I’m strong, though. When he crashes, I’m going to have to carry him upstairs and tuck him in.”
Dis snickered, feeding Jani some candied grapes.
“It’s not my job anymore, nathith. Sorry.”
Ori felt like quite the hedonist, for he bought a dozen of these layered chocolate creations, which the dwarf called truffles.
“Because they’re rare an’ beautiful,” he clarified, “not because they taste like dirt.”
Ori bought two each: ginger, cinnamon, hazelnut, jellied brandy, coffee, and pomegranate.
He felt like he’d committed a crime and everyone was letting him get away with it, which he supposed was part of the charm. He didn’t know if he should eat them or paint them and then eat them. They were just too perfect not to capture for posterity.
“I’ve lost my mind,” he announced to Dwalin.
“I’m thinkin’ truffles’ll do tha’ t’ yeh,” Dwalin replied.
Boromir and Eowyn had bought extra long licorice laces and were dueling dangerously at the edge of the crowd. Glorfindel and Legolas purchased the entire batch of machine-pulled taffy and were attempting to hold each other captive with it. Lindir and Elrond took turns nibbling at a mahml and taking swigs from the lichen whiskey, which Elrond declared imperiously to be a valar-inspired combination and wondered aloud how to impose it as mandatory fare at the Last Homely House. Arwen watched complacently, while Aragorn went on an errand for her - back to the stand with the edible skivvies, though he was having trouble gaining the vendor’s attention, since Dubb had taken a shine to her and was chatting her up.
Thorin and Bilbo watched the entire scene with perfect serenity. Bilbo made sure the guards were all well-supplied with an assortment of treats, which certainly didn’t make him any enemies.
They waited for Gimli and Tauriel to cut Glorfindel and Legolas from their mutual sticky prison before Thorin called the Company to order.
“Are we ready for the fun fair?” Thorin asked.
“I want to know what a Castle Bounce is,” said Bilbo.
“Thorin, can we stop on the way to see Buer?” Ori asked.
“Of course,” said Thorin. “Besides, there’s food involved.”

Buer’s stall was unmistakable.
It was fully lit around the top and down the sides with strings of Ulfr’s lights, but in miniature, which twinkled on and off seemingly at random without being touched. Buer himself had transformed his appearance since last they had met. His hair was purple, and twisted in a whirlwind up from the top of his head. It still jingled whenever he moved, and he moved constantly, over a large bowl of something fluffy, swirling a stick around the inside edge. When he pulled it out, it was encased in a globe of lovely spun sugar, bright blue in color.
Thorin looked over Ori’s shoulder at the throng around the stall and said, “Imagine, all those dwarrow, spoiling their dinners. Best not tell Dori.”
Ori snickered.
“What do you think, my king? What does blue taste like?”
“It’s just a guess,” said Thorin, “but I think it tastes like sugar. I am willing to test this hypothesis until we find a satisfactory scientific conclusion.”
When they reached the counter, Buer bowed to the king and took his order, then greeted Ori like an old friend.
“Ori! Hi! How’s the lording business?”
“Lately, extremely busy. We came to try out your new confection.”
“You’re in for a treat, and that’s not just me being modest,” said Buer.
“How does it work?”
“Come around and see.”
“Really?”
“Sure.”
Ori walked around the back of the stall and looked into the bowl.
“How is the air moving?”
“Foot pump. I adapted it from a bellows, but I have to keep changing feet or one of my legs would look like an oak tree and the other’d look like a sapling. The air spins the sugar into strands, all I do is keep the stick rotating and moving in a circle. There’s a charcoal caldron underneath to keep the sugar melted.”
“How is the air moving?”
“Where did you get the idea?”
Buer looked a little embarrassed.
“My sister and me were having a bit of a prank war down in the forges and things got out of hand. She was brushing sugar out of her hair with a wet brush and some of the sugar melted and stranded. From there I just worked backward.”
“Good thing you did,” said Ori. “I don’t think I’d want to eat spun sugar from your sister’s hair.”
Ori watched Buer supply the Company with treats. He took out his coin pouch.
“No worries. King Thorin’s already paid for yours,” said Buer, handing Ori his treat. “I kind of miss her.”
“Your sister? What happened to her?”
“Nothing bad,” said Buer, who was in constant motion while he spoke. “She’s gotten an apprenticeship in the stone masons’ guild and she’s gone off with her master to Ered Luin. Then amad had the new pebble and adad told me it was time I moved out.”
Ori breathed in sharply.
“That’s terrible!”
“Nah, it’s better this way. The house is about the size of this stall, so unless I wanted to listen to a pebble wailing all night, it was time to go.”
“Are you making a living?”
“Yep. I’ve got patents, sell my stuff in the day market, make up new gadgets for Master Axsin. I probably would have moved out a long time ago, but I never took the time to look for a place. I live in one of the flats in the old noble quarter. Doesn’t leave a lot of time for wagging or hopping, though.”
“We just hopped. It was incredible!”
“Isn’t it? Nugget’s a genius.”
“Nugget invented the hop?”
“Oh yeah. She adapted the wag, too, so you didn’t need a music box to dance it. Don’t be surprised if you see her at open court. She wants to petition the king to reestablish the guild of court dancers.”
Ori felt guilty about taking so much of Buer’s time, though Buer didn’t seem at all phased, dealing with customers and making spun sugar the whole time. Ori could see Dwalin waiting for him as the rest of the Company moved off toward the fun fair.
“I should get going,” he said reluctantly. “But I’ll be back.”
“Any time,” said Buer as they bumped foreheads.
As Ori left, he saw that many more people had queued up for spun sugar in the wake of the king.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. This is every circus, carnival, and county fair we’ve ever been to or read about! So grab yourself some funnel cake and candy! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

A gaily painted, temporary wall had been erected across the way, marking the edge of the Night Market proper, with a queue leading up to an entrance painted like an open mouth. Right by the mouth sat a bright red stall. People had lined up at it, waiting to enter.

Inside sat Helar, taking entry payment. When she and the others in line saw the royal party, they made to move away. Thorin went forward and handed Helar an entrance coin, which Dwalin told Ori, Jim had given him for their party. Thorin then looked back, counted everyone who had been in line and handed Helar a small bag. She poured out gold coins, squealed, and waved everyone through. It took some time, as all those who had been waiting, wanted to personally thank the king. Ori smiled as Thorin and Bilbo stood together, talking and exchanging pleasantries with any who wanted their attention.

They walked through the ‘mouth’, giggling a bit, then Ori gaped along with the rest of the party - the dwarrow and men in surprise and the elves because they were drunk.

Strings of Buer’s tiny colored lights swooped and blinked all round and over everything. There were brightly dyed canvas tents, gaudily painted stalls, and bunting looping from place to place. Dwarrow and men were everywhere walking, looking, and their offspring running around.

“Where did all these badgers come from?” Ori asked. “They aren’t allowed in the Night Market.”

“There’s a separate entrance to the fun fair. They’re allowed in until a certain hour,” Thorin told them. “Balin and Jim worked it out while you were…er…questing.”

Everything inside the gate was, to Ori’s eyes, a sparkling wonderland of swirling hues, music, voices shouting in delight, and delicious smells.

Haldir gasped and ran forward, arms open, and spun to face him.

“Oh, Lord Ori! It’s a fairy land!”

“Keep it t’gether, Danny-boy,” Dain called from the back.

They followed the crowd along the stalls on the right. A tall, lean man Ori knew to be of Jim’s group had a large stall with an array of knives laid out on the front counter and piles of fuzzy things which, as they approached, Ori saw were toy stuffed animals, specifically toy stuffed wargs, yellow and white wargs. Of course, ‘toy’ was a matter of proportion.

Ori, Bilbo, and Sculdis all squealed at this sight. The stall owner spotted them and shouted his carnival bark,

“Come on up! Come on up! Easy game! Three chances f’r two coppers! Very easy! Lots of fun! Win a toy of the king’s wargs!”

Ori rushed up before he could stop himself, Arwen and Eowyn on his heels.

Beyond the counter full of knives was an open area, then a far wall covered in targets. Each target had a cherry stuck to the center.

“Look!” Ori cried.

Dwalin swaggered over and looked. He glanced at Ori and tossed down two coppers to the man, who took them, shouting,
“Come on up! Try your luck! Lessee what the Captain of the King’s Guard can do, folks!”
Dwalin took up a knife, weighed it on his middle finger, flipped it into his hand and threw it with deadly speed and accuracy. The knife split the cherry in the furthest target. The entire party and anyone else watching burst into cheers. Dwalin followed with the other two knives. Each pierced the same cherry, right next to the first knife, leaving a mess on the board.
“A WINNAH!” the barker announced. He grinned at Dwalin. “What’s yer ’druthers, my friend?
Butter ’r Sugar?”
“Well, love?” Dwalin prompted.
“Butter, please,” said Ori.
The barker handed over a yellow warg that was about two feet tall. Dubb removed the pack off his back and took out a frame. This unfolded to a large wheeled basket. Ori stowed his prize in it with a grin for Dubb, who looked patiently amused.
“I thought you were retired,” Ori teased.
“It’s no’ business,” said Dubb. “It’s pleasure. I’d join up again if it meant seein’ a bunch a’ drunk elvess every day.”
Bilbo inspected the game and said, “You know, I’d very much like to try that.”
“I’ll have to find you something to stand on so you can throw over the counter,” said Thorin.
“No need.”
Bilbo rose up and balanced on the balls of his feet. This made him taller than Ori, though still not quite as tall as Thorin, who looked as surprised as anyone.
“How long can you remain in that stance, ghivasha?” he asked.
“Indefinitely,” said Bilbo. “My feet lock in this position. If I need to, I can sleep standing up.”
“Ah. You’re teasing me,” said Thorin.
“Constantly, my dear, but in this case it happens to be the truth. Don’t tell Bujni.”
Bilbo slid his two coppers onto the counter.
The barker obviously recognized the hobbit and smiled indulgently at Bilbo, placing half a dozen smaller knives before him.
“Right-o, perfesser, I’ll even spot you an extra three chances.”
Bilbo examined one of the daggers in his palm.
“Thank you, but I don’t think that will be necessary.”
He didn’t even hesitate between the blades, but threw them one after the other with impeccable precision.
Thorin glowed with pride and kissed Bilbo soundly, while the barker struggled to pick up his jaw from the counter.
“Well, who’d’ve fought! How’d yeh do that?”
“I was the All-Shire conkers champion fifteen years in a row. Good aim is required, you know.
You do develop a knack.”
“What’s yer pleasure, m’lord?”
“I’ll take a Sugar, please, that way Ori and I will have a complete set.” He accepted his prize with a gracious ‘thank you’. “Frodo will love this. Hopefully we can keep the real wargs from using it as a chew toy. The pups are at the teething stage.”
Thorin shrugged.
“I never liked my dress boots anyway.”
They bade the barker goodbye as his stall was now crowded with people who wanted to try their luck at what the royal party had been doing. Bilbo popped his Sugar in to sit with Ori’s Butter.
Dubb arranged them on the edge so they could ‘look out’.
At the next stall, a lady showed off her pony, which she explained, was an exponent of arithmetic. Curious, Lindir handed the lady his three coppers and rattled off a complex equation.
The lady repeated it to the pony, which watched her, then used its left front hoof to stamp out the answer. All the elves, despite their rather soused state, were quite surprised that the pony had got the right answer. Ori giggled behind his hand. He knew the trick and had watched Nori train a rat to do such. The lady bowed and smiled and cuddled her pony, giving it a treat of some kind.
Next was a stall that was selling sweets. Ori and Kili all but drooled. Laid out were great slabs of what to Ori looked like two-inch-thick cake icing. The seller told them it was called fudge. There was a plate of little samples. Ori tried a small tan colored one. It was smooth and sugary and tasted of maple syrup.

“Mmm, Tauriel,” Kili said, turning to her. “Try this, it’s walnut!”

Ori spotted a slab of xocolātl with green and pink things in it.

“What’s that?” he asked, pointing.

“Xocolātl with candied rose petals, and nuts from the far south and east called pistachios.”

She gave him a sample.

Ori moaned in bliss.

“Good, eh?” Dwalin teased.

Ori grabbed Dwalin’s beard and pulled him into a kiss.

“Mmm,” Dwalin commented as they drew apart. “That’s a keeper.”

He fished a couple of silver out of his pocket and handed them over. The lady gave him a half pound box tied with a green ribbon. Dwalin put it in the basket.

“F’r la’er,” he chuckled with a nibble at Ori’s ear.

In the next stall sat a huge glass, pot-bellied bottle as large as Ori. It was full of the kind of marbles badgers played with. These were made of beryl and turquoise. Theoden raised his eyebrows.

“One copper!” the Barker of this stall cried out to them. “Guess the number inside and win the lot!”

The party went over and Elrond examined the bottle carefully and thought about it for quite some time. Ori supposed he was having a hard time thinking through the lichen whiskey.

“Yes,” Elrond decided. He put down a copper and the Barker handed him a slip of paper and a graphite wand. Elrond printed his name and his guess and the Barker popped the slip into a large wooden box with only a slot in the top.

“We’ll bring it over to you, if you win,” the Barker promised.

“Thank you,” Elrond said.

Thranduil handed him the bottle of lichen whisky the elves were working on. Elrond took another shot.

“What will you do with them?” Thranduil demanded.

“Do with what?” Elrond blinked at him, confused.

“The bottle of marbles,” Theoden coaxed.

“Oh!” Elrond smiled. “I thought I’d retile my bathroom with them.”

Dis and Arwen exchanged looks and giggled.

The next stall had a similar box and the game was to guess the weight of the rooster strutting about the counter. The rooster was large, with brilliant blue-black feathers, gray feet and a bright red wattle. The comb and the rooster’s face were hidden by a pouf of long, thin, black feathers. The elves stared owlishly, but Theoden marched up, handed over five coppers, and held the bird in his hands for a moment.

“Hmm,” he frowned. “Four pounds…three ounces.”

The stall keeper grinned and wrote this down.

“What shall I win if I’m right?” the king enquired.

The rooster’s keeper nodded at the rooster. The rooster crowed at Theoden. The party strolled on.

“What, in Eru’s name, am I going to do with that thing?” Theoden muttered in disbelief.

“Oh, uncle,” said Eowyn, “just put it in with the other chickens. The flocks need new blood and any chicks might have some pretty feathers.”

They traveled on, stopping at each stall to play at games or exclaim over strange things on display.

Kili ran up to a dam with a cart selling flavored, shaved ice and told her he wanted one of each flavor.

“I have fourteen flavors, your highness,” said the dam, amused.
“Yep. Uh huh,” he said, nodding furiously.
“Kili,” said Thorin, “you should really leave enough for the rest of the fair visitors.”
“Oh.” Kili frowned. “You’re right, Idad. Please give me a cone of whatever flavor will stain my mouth the freakiest color.”
She gave him a cone of ice with one side blue and one side green.
They all had to try this, though the elves poured splashes of lichen whiskey on top of theirs.
The dam cocked her head, watching.
“I never thought of that.”
They walked on, periodically sticking out their tongues at each other, until the ices were finished and they arrived at a large tent. Inside, hay was scattered everywhere and, at the center, sat a huge glass barricade.
Ori stared then laughed.
“Thorin! Bilbo! Look! It’s a Smeg!”
“Smeg th’ Second,” said one of the tent attendants, a man, coming to talk to the royal party.
“Interestin’ animal.”
Celeborn stared over the thick glass with Theoden.
“Alligator or false dragon,” Ori remembered.
Everyone crowded about and looked into the huge enclosure. Smeg the Second rested on piles of wet moss next to a great shallow water bath. Plants in pots decorated the area and the attendant boosted himself over the glass and walked forward.
“It’s huge!” Eowyn said. “I can see why they call it a false dragon. Where do they come from?”
“Down in the hot, swampy area to the far south and east,” was the answer.
Smeg turned to see the attendant. Smeg’s mouth opened revealing a very large snaggle-toothed maw.
“Elbereth!” murmured Galadriel.
Dain hung over the glass, his feet on Sculdis’ shoulders.
“Imagine takin’ that thin’ f’r a walk! Here, lad, how long is our Smeg?”
The attendant moved closer to Smeg, and said, “He’s quite unusually big f’r his kind, sir. Twenty-three feet, six inches, sir.”
“How heavy is he?” Arwen asked, staring.
“Eight hunnred an’ five pounds, twelve ounces, milady. Weighed ‘im this mornin’. Here Smeggy.”
The attendant offered Smeg a heavy wooden handle that was designed for an axe. Smeg leapt forward and the handle broke like a twig as the jaws snapped down on it with a deep threatening noise.
“Eru!” Bard gasped. “I’m glad they don’t live around here! What a set of teeth!”
“Bite a man’s leg clean off, sir.”
Smeg looked at the attendant again, who tossed a dead rabbit into the jaws. These snapped again. Then Smeg tossed up his head and swallowed the rabbit whole.
“How quick’re they?” Dwalin asked.
“They can move pretty smartly on land, deadly fast in the water, sir. Feet’re webbed an’ th tail ’s like a paddle. All muscle, they are.”
“Yer no’ worried he’ll jus’ gobble yeh up?”
“That’s why I keep feedin’ him, sir. So he don’t feed on me.”
The party thanked the attendant but he hopped out of Smeg’s domain and walked them over to another smaller container.
“Hatched like that,” he said with a grin.
Ori stared at the snake, which was also quite large. Its tummy was colored a pale yellow, giving way to a back striped with pale yellow and dark greenish blue. All along its body, the bright yellow stripe bordered with scarlet that faded to brownish purple. It had two heads, each brown with the edges of blue green. All four shiny black eyes blinked at them and two pink tongues flickered out. Everyone had a good look at this marvel as well.
“Can both heads eat?” asked Tauriel.

“Yes, indeed, milady. Often enough one will eat and the other keep watch.”

“Is it poisonous?” Thorin wondered.

“No, majesty. This one’s a squeezer.”

“Squeezer?” Sculdís repeated.

“They don’t bite prey an’ poison it, they wrap their bodies round and round then squeeze. Breaks all the prey’s bones then they swallow the meal whole.”

“How often does such a thing eat?” Bilbo asked.

“Depends on the size a’ the meal,” the attendant looked proudly down at the snake. “This one caught a rat once. Slept for two weeks after it. They take time to digest.”

“No second breakfast for you,” Bilbo muttered at the snake.

“Did you see it kill the rat?” Dis questioned.

“No, ma’am, found him with a big ol’ rat shaped bulge in his middle.”

“Durin’s beard,” muttered Jani.

There was a terrible scream and the attendant waved them to follow. In an area, containing a pan of water and a platter full of seeds, stood a beautiful bird not quite the size of a goose. Ori recognized it from his lessons. “Is that a real peacock?” he asked, smiling up at the attendant.

“Aye, young sir.”

“It’s feathers look like it’s dragging a beautiful cloak after it,” commented Thranduil.

“Watch what it can do with it, sir,” the attendant beamed then turned to the peacock. He hunched up his shoulders and opened his jacket. The peacock’s tail sailed upward and unfolded. The royal party gasped and exclaimed at how beautiful it was. The peacock strolled around, the tail feathers of bright green and turquoise, shimmering and trembling. The peacock opened its beak and screamed again.

“What a horrible noise for something so beautiful,” Bard commented, looking vaguely disgusted.

“We used to say that about someone else, back when,” said Celeborn with a smile.

Thranduil gave a death-glare.

“If I weren’t so drunk, I would make you regret that.”

“You won’t even remember it later.”

“Alas.”

The attendant gave a whistle and offered seeds in his hand. The peacock deigned to fold its tail, come over, and eat.

The party was led to another enclosure and everyone gushed in delight. There, calmly eating some hay, was the tiniest horse Ori had ever seen. Its head only came up to Bard’s hip. Theoden knelt, chuckling, and rubbed the face and neck, murmuring endearments. The tiny creature whickered happily and nuzzled the horse king.

“Where…? How…?” Theoden managed, looking up at the attendant. “Wee Mack here, is what’s called a miniature horse, sir.”

Galadriel giggled and leaned over the horse.

“Dear little thing,” she cooed.

Mack whinnied, stamped a minute hoof and looked up at her, ears perked forward.

Everyone took time to pet Mack, who bore all the attention with glee. He showed off, trotting and, when Eowyn held out her arms, making a hoop, he jumped through with ease. Eowyn was delighted and scooped Mack up and hugged him. Mack nickered, squealed, and nibbled at her hair.

“He’s lovely!” Eowyn cried.

Aragorn and Arwen laughed and ruffled the mane and stroked the little back.

“He’s a fine piece of horseflesh!” Aragorn praised.

Theoden rose and turned to the attendant.

“How much?”

The attendant laughed.

“No, sir. Mack an’ me are old friends. I can put you in touch with th’ breeder, if you’ve a fancy for one. She’s got several sired by Mack.”
“I do and I thank you,” Theoden said with a smile. “I’m staying up with King Thorin. If you’d come round, I’d like to speak about this breeder with you.”

“Indeed sir, I’ll pop round tomorrow in the morning. Now come and see my last little pet. She’s very young. Got her from a trader. Some wild beast killed her mother. She’s a sweet wee thing and gets on with Mack a treat.”

This enclosure was like Mack’s, except the creature in it was like nothing Ori had ever seen before. Even Dwalin gasped.

It was covered in short, shiny fur of pale yellow with big brown spots. It was not a miniature anything. There were four thin gangly legs, each taller than Bard and Theoden, a slanted compact body and a neck that stretched up, up to almost the ceiling of the tent.

Everyone stared.

“What… is that?” Elrond asked in an amazed whisper.

“That, sir, is what’s called a geeraph. They’re from the great grasslands beyond the eastern desert. Beautiful, ain’t she? Just a baby, too. She’ll grow to three times her present height.” The attendant looked proudly up at her. “You’re a lovely girl, ain’t you, my Merrymaid.”

Merrymaid blinked long lashes and leaned her head down to the attendant. He stroke her head and motioned them all forward. They took turns stroking the soft fur, being nibbled by huge velvet lips whiskered on the top, and gazed into the large, dark eyes, full of trust and sweetness.

Dis rubbed her cheek against Merrymaid’s

“She’s so lovely. I’ve never even dreamed such a creature existed.”

“She is, milady,” the attendant agreed. “I’ve done some askin’ around an’ they travel in a family group of ladies. She’ll eat leafy twigs, bushes, and fruit. Gentle thing, she is.”

They thanked the attendant, exited the tent, and moved to the next stall. The smell informed Ori that donuts were in the offing. There was an open stall with people making and frying the donuts, then icing them. In front were several clothes lines strung at various heights. Hanging from these on strings, were the fresh donuts, plain, iced, some were even dripping jam.

Gimli gave a shout and romped forward.

“What are these?” cried Legolas. “They smell and look delectable! Are they mullies?”

“Same idea,” Gimli laughed as he handed one of the owners some coppers. “Pick one an’ eat it, elf. Yeh can’t use yer hands, though.” Gimli trotted to one on a line designed for dwarrow and, hands locked behind him, took a huge bite out of a xocolātl one covered in powdered sugar. A small cloud of sugar snowed over his face, he coughed but went on eating.

Legolas was escorted by a helper to a line for tall folk and Legolas copied Gimli’s stance and bit into one. A blob of blackberry jam plopped out and landed on his chin then oozed down his front.

“These are delicious!” Legolas called.

Thranduil squeezed his eyes shut and groaned, while everyone else laughed.

Kili and Tauriel decided they both wanted the same donut, but the height difference was comical.

“Hold on a moment,” said Ori.

He did it without thinking, hurried over to the prince and lifted him around the hips until Kili and Tauriel were the same height.

“Whoa! Ori-mate!” Kili cried. “No wonder those orcs never stood a chance.”

“Hush, you,” said Ori, giggling. “Eat your donut. You’re still heavy.”

They did so, though they certainly took their time over it.

Ori clicked his tongue.

“If you’re sick, it’ll serve you right,” Dis scolded.

“I’m never sick, ma’am,” Glorfindel announced with a grin and emptied a whiskey bottle.
Thorin politely gave the attendant extra when she gently removed the bottle from Glorfindel.

Replete once more, the party moved to the next stall. This was open, too and, in front, was an enormously wide, waist high vat. It was full of water and floating apples. Bard laughed, tossed his coin to the attendant and handed his shirt to Thranduil.

“Are you going for a swim” Thranduil demanded.

“No, getting you an apple, sweetie.”

Bard swaggered over to the vat and, hands gripping the sides, plunged his head and shoulders into the vat.

Galadriel, Arwen, and Lindir shrieked and Eowyn cheered. Bard reappeared, an apple in his teeth and tossing back his soaked hair, took the apple and passed it to Thranduil.

“What kind of…?” Thranduil started.

“It’s called ducking for apples,” Bard explained. “Traditional harvest game in Dale when I was a lad.”

He took the towel passed to him by the attendant and bent over to rub his hair dry.

“Thank you,” said Thranduil. He looked bemused at the obvious chomp marks, then shrugged and started eating his apple.

“Well, that’s me,” said Theoden and, following Bard’s example, stuck his head in. It took him a little longer and considerably more bubbles before he emerged in triumph.

Dain and Scudis bounced up on the low bench for dwarrow and, holding hands, fetched out apples. Arwen and Eowyn thrust their hand forward. Eowyn’s hand was a fist. Arwen held out two fingers.

“Ha!” shouted Eowyn. “Rock blunts scissors! Shall I hold your hair for you?”

“Certainly not!” Arwen laughed, stripping off to the waist, leaving only her shift. “I know you, you’d chuck me in!”

Dis and Jani giggled.

“Off yeh go, love!” Jani said.

Aragorn caught up Arwen’s hair in his hand and tied a kerchief about it. Arwen went to the vat and leant over. Aragorn took the very ends of her hair in his hand and she plunged in. Eowyn stepped forward, Aragorn leapt at her, leaving Boromir to grab Arwen’s hair. Eowyn and Aragorn had a violent wrestling match. When Arwen emerged, apple in mouth. Aragorn had Eowyn upside-down and by the waist. He shook her vigorously, shouting.

“Hurl! Hurl!”

Eowen could only laugh helplessly.

Thorin and Bilbo quelled the noise and led the party onward. They played horseshoes, which won Theoden an enormous woven willow oliphaunt about the size of a small pony.

“Well done!” Bilbo praised.

“I had to win,” said Theoden. “The king of Rohan losing at horseshoes? How embarrassing! How I’ll get it home I have no idea.”

It disappeared out of his hands, to the amazement of everyone except Ori.

Theoden recovered and said to the ether, “Thank you. I’m much obliged.”

Mahal said to Ori, “Tell ‘im it’s waitin’ f’r ‘im back in Rohan.”

“Where?” Ori muttered.

Mahal just laughed, which didn’t comfort Ori in the least as he relayed the message.

Tossing balls into a far basket let Aragorn present Arwen with a stuffed raven that was made on the lines of Baluchistan and Dwalin to hand over a large stuffed bear to Eowyn, who blushed and promptly hit him with it.

Archery, more knife throwing and axe throwing allowed every member of the party to pile prizes into Dubb’s wheeled basket.
“Bloody over-achievers,” Dubb muttered, grinning.

They ate fried dough called funnel cake, roasted goose legs, and biscuits filled with minced beef patties, cheese, lettuce and a slice of tomato. They devoured fat sausages on wood skewers, the meat wrapped in dough and fried. They gobbled from paper dishes full of frozen custard decorated with hot xocolātl syrup, bananas, nuts, and candied cherries, with sweetened whipped cream on top, and small paper plates that held freshly baked rolls, buttered lavishly and filled with hot, salty chips. They nibbled from waxed paper pockets of popped corn rolled into balls held together with soft toffee, and spooned up royal gravy from tiny paper bowls. There was fruit soda water, lemonade, and ale.

“What are you going to do with all this food paper?” Celeborn asked.

Thorin pointed. A very large paper canister stood by each stall. People tossed their food and drink papers into it.

“When full, the canisters are taken down to the open lava pits, and put on sheets of metal over it to burn to powder. Then the powder is use by soap makers and some people use it to make body paint.”

They entered a tent displaying exotic plants and fish, all of which were for sale. Eowyn sniffed every bloom she came across, marveling at the different scents. Dis, Galadriel, and Jani discussed the display of what were called orchids. Ori took time to sketch these blossoms in his pocket notebook. They ranged from the huge and brightly colored, to flowers that seemed no more than a green spike with tiny faint yellow blooms with diminutive brown spots.

Ori glanced over to see the elves crowded around Bard and the tent attendant. The attendant held up a good sized clear glass bowl with a plant growing out of the top. Ori could see a small fish swimming beneath, among a few roots. Bard was talking about the fish. Wondering where Eowyn was, Ori looked about. She stood before a table that held bright lanterns and a tray of peculiar, straggly-looking plants. Ori crossed to her.

“Look,” Eowyn said. “These are the strangest plants I’ve ever seen.”

The plants were small, and not particularly interesting, but for what he presumed were odd flowers. The ‘flower’ sat at the end of a stem and opened like a boiled egg cut in half. This blossom was green on the outside, but of a deep brownish purple or rust orange on the inside, and funny little green hairs lined the edges.

As they watched, a small moth fluttered close, attracted by the light. It landed on a flower and rested. To Ori shock, the flower closed of its own volition and the little hairs interlocked, imprisoning the moth. Ori and Eowyn stared at each other then back at the plant.

“Ah,” said the attendant, startling them both. “I see you two have found the carnivorous plants.”

“Carnivorous?” Eowyn repeated.

“Indeed, milady. They’re found in hot, swampy regions and where the soil is poor, and so they grew to foraging. That there is a fly trap plant.”

“Moth trap in this case,” Ori murmured.

“Anything that’s fool enough to land there, sir. There’s a dew fern over there.”

Ori looked where the attendant pointed to see a fern like leaf covered in purple-y spines. Another moth landed on this and struggled, stuck. The leaf slowly coiled down over it while the spines wrapped the insect up.

“And just over there,” the pleased attendant continued, “is a jug plant.”

The jug plant had what looked like an empty space for a flower bud. The attendant picked up the plant and brought it close.

“See the liquid there at the bottom? Insects falls in, drown, and the plant absorbs ‘em.”

“How big do these plants get?” Eowyn asked, fascinated.

“All found so far, milady, are very small.”

“May I?” Ori asked, pulling out his notebook again.

“Certainly.” The attendant was only too pleased to hold the plant while Ori sketched. The attendant brought the fern forward and then the fly trap. Ori was transfixed and a little horrified.

“Yavanna!” his brain whined.
“Plants need to eat, too, my dear,” answered the soft tone.

“Is it poisonous?” Ori wondered.

“Yes, little scribe, they all are. You may want to add that to your notes as well.”

Elrond and Lindir bought a beautiful orchid with a three foot spike of white flowers with purple throats. Celeborn bought the fish with the plant and Glorfindel bought a fly trap.

“Does the apartment get a lot of flies?” Ori asked.

Glorfindel winked.

“Yes, but he doesn’t know that.”

Ori giggled as they went on to another stall.

It held row upon row of apples, covered in caramel, or hardened sugar, each with a stick jutting from the top.

“They’re upside down,” Legolas said.

The attendant lifted one by the stick and flipped it so the apple sat up at the top.

“It’s an apple pop,” said Legolas.

They each had one as they wandered.

Legolas looked down at Gimli.

“You have caramel in your beard.”

“Savin’ it f’r later.”

Another stall had a huge water trough with various little yellow toy ducklings floating. Ori thought they were made of the same stuff as the iKeyha furniture. This game involved toy fishing poles ‘baited’ with small rounds of metal. Each duckling had a magnet inside and whichever duckling got caught, the pole was lifted out and matched with a prize. Bilbo won Thorin a very pretty red sap ball that, though pocket-sized, bounced amazingly well. Arwen got Aragorn a packet of raspberry flavored hard candies. Jani won Dis a toy plush turtle and Bard scored Thranduil a paper conical hat like the one Mavey had worn in the play as the princess, Thranduil’s was a good deal fancier, having been painted purple with silica powder to make it sparkle, and pom-poms of pink paper. A light green gauze ribbon ran from the top and two gauze ribbons tied under the wearer’s chin.

Thranduil donned this and posed for Bard, who almost doubled over laughing. Celeborn rudely said it suited him. Aragorn and Boromir had to walk away, and hold each other up. Ori sketched madly and wished Sigrid was there to see her ‘Wicked Stepmother’.

Arwen and Eowyn didn’t see it was fair Thranduil got a hat and they told Galadriel it didn’t suit him. Galadriel took the whiskey bottle away from Lindir, had a swig and agreed with them, while Thranduil assured Bard that ‘they’ were merely jealous.

The next stall was long and very open. In the middle was a great table covered in an ample number of little stands, each with a familiar large, round nut balancing on top.

“Coconuts!” Kili cried. “Those are so good!”

The game was three coppers to throw a small ball and knock a coconut off a stand, thus winning the coconut. Everyone, having excellent aim, cleared the table of nuts and left the vendor with a good deal of money.

Tauriel shrieked to Arwen and Eowyn, and the three of them rushed up to the next stall. Three ladies were selling hats. These were not just ordinary hats but all were made with paper. There were hats like Thranduil’s, big hats, hats folded in such a way as to look like a bird or a flower or a boat.

Arwen popped on one that had a green brim and crown, then a great tube of yellow with a fringe on top.

“Look,” she giggled to Aragorn, who held her arm so she wouldn’t stagger. “I’m the biggest daffodil in Arda!”

“I solemnly swear I shall not say anything about you being daffy,” Aragorn said, widening his eyes and heroically not smiling.

“Uncle,” cried Eowyn, “Here’s one for you!”
She plopped a hat that looked like a horse’s head on her uncle’s head. One of the now giggling vendors offered Theoden a mirror. The king looked at himself, adjusted the head to a jaunty angle and turned to his niece.

“Will I do, young lady?”

Eowyn laughed and grabbed her uncle’s arm to turn him a little.

“Quick, Ori! Draw us!”

“I can’t, you don’t have a hat!” Ori teased her.

“I’ll get her one,” Theoden pointed to one and it was handed out. Eowyn squealed and pulled the hat on. Ori drew the horse king in a horse head hat and the White Lady in a daisy bonnet that framed her face with huge petals. Tauriel and Kili found ones that looked like Kili’s hat from the inn. She wore the green with the red feather and he had the red with a green feather.

Glorfindel chose an intricately folded blackberry bush with curls of paper coming out to purple paper knots as berries that bounced and swung whenever he moved. Dain and Sculdis whispered to one of the ladies, who winked and went to the back to rummage.

Thranduil insisted Celeborn wear a green cone with a silver pom-pom on top. Lady Galadriel was delighted with a ship. Bilbo and Thorin found crowns and one of the ladies quickly painted ‘king’ on one and ‘consort’ on the other.

“In case we get lost,” Thorin said gravely to Bard.

Just then Fili and Sigrid came up. Fili carried a satchel stuffed with prizes and they were sharing an enormous disc of hard candy on a stiffened paper stick.

“Oh, hats!” enthused Sigrid, hugging Eowyn and Arwen. Arwen swept Sigrid safely down then explained that his lady was drunk off her ass with all the rest of the elves via lichen whiskey.

“Wicked Stepmother are you-?” Sigrid got a good look at Thranduil and shrieked with laughter at the purple cone on his head.

Fili brought her a crown with ‘princess’ painted on and his had ‘prince’ on it.

Dain and Sculdis found matching pig hats and made Ori draw them.

Dwalin found himself a buffalo head and tried to chase Ori with the horns lowered.

“You are not wearing that to bed,” Ori gasped around giggles. Dwalin clapped a hat on Ori’s head and Ori bounced to the mirror and shouted with laughter. Dwalin had found him an ink pot with a huge quill sticking out of it.

The other vendor came back and grinned.

“And a proper hat for the King of Dale.”

Everyone laughed and cheered. It was a huge yellow cone with curls of paper coming off it.

“’S no’ a chandelier, lad, but I think she did a fine job,” Dain snickered.

Bard sighed and rolled his eyes while Thranduil placed the crown on his head and kissed him. Fili had to hold Sigrid up as she was laughing so hard she cried. She couldn’t see, much less walk.

They added Fili’s satchel to the wheeled basket and helping Dubb to his feet as he’d been on the ground clenching his sides and wheezing with mirth. They traveled on.

They visited a man who charged all of them a copper and set a large box on the table. The tiny curtain was drawn and there lay a diorama of circus acts. They all peered in, watching as things moved about and jumped. Ori did not believe for one minute this man had trained fleas to perform. He couldn’t see the man’s feet but he suspected filament was involved to move things about.

Theoden frowned and cock an eye. Eowyn was frowning, too but the elves stared bleary eyed and cheered for the ‘performers’. Bard looked at Ori and they nodded to each other.

The next stall sold paper rolls for music boxes. Fili and Kili immediately asked for anything by the White City Bang Crash. The gentleman had several, and chatted amicably with them all. Ori couldn’t take his eyes off the man. There was something strange about him, specifically his mouth. Ori nudged Dwalin.

Dwalin looked inquiringly down. Ori stood on tiptoe and whispered, “I think that man has two tongues!”

Dwalin frowned and looked at the man, too. Sigrid was thanking him for a roll for a song Dipfa liked.
“Would you like an envelope to carry that, miss?” the man asked and turned to fetch one from behind him, before she could answer, he faced her once more with the envelope. He did not have two tongues, he had one which was bisected half way in. With these two pieces of tongue he held the envelope. Sigrid gasped and carefully took the envelope. The man laughed and wagged the two ends at them. Bilbo raised an eyebrow and Dubb came forward full of sympathy.

“Yeh war-wounded, laddie?”
The man laughed again. “No, sir, drunk off my ass as a youth.”
Elrond shook his head to clear it and came forward.

“Is it painful?”
“Oh no, sir. Great f’r parties.” The man wagged the ends and Elrond watched the two wiggle independently.

“I suppose it’s a talking point,” he finally managed.
“Certainly is, sir. Makes me rare popular with the ladies,” said the man with a lascivious wink.

They stopped at the next stall which was selling slices of hot fresh azzip then went to the last tent which had a closed flap but had the signs out advertising that inside the Great Woudini was reading fortunes with his magic crystal, for one silver.

The party stopped and they all looked at each other.

“I’m going,” stated Lady Galadriel, drained the current bottle in use, relieved her husband of one silver, and marched in. The rest stood about looking out over a wide open area. The circus acts were here. Ori could see a wrestling ring with a huge, well muscled man with an enormous black mustache that curled at the ends, standing in the ring, looking fierce while the barker called for challengers.

In the middle, Ori saw Fanny doing her act with Mavey. He watched Fanny proudly. Despite her size, Fanny moved daintily and sprayed water about so that it caught the lights and sparkled, to the cheers of the crowd before them.

Galadriel emerged from Woudini’s tent. She returned to the party looking a little confused which was extremely odd for her.

“What did he say, my love?” Celeborn asked.

“He said there will soon be a great shining light that will come out of my torso and then I will see my parents.” She frowned. “I knew of many ways I could die, but I never thought I would explode.”

Kili looked thoughtful.

“Better have some damp cloths handy. The stains would be terrible.”

Galadriel gazed at him, her eyes filled with awe. She whispered, “Yes. Yes, you are right.
Prince Kili, you are very wise.”

“She’s drunk,” Aragorn told Thorin. “At least I hope she’s drunk.”

“If she isn’t,” Thorin replied dryly, “then we are all in a lot of trouble.”

They passed the wrestling ring. Dwalin waved to the strong man then shouted.

“Oi, Yanni, yeh want me t’ come over an’ lay yeh ou’?”

The strong man’s eyes lit up and he roared back,

“Dwalin, son o’ Fundin! Git along, you ol’ goat. I ain’t lookin’ t’ git me ribs broken again, you rotten dwarf!”

Dwalin drew Ori over the to ring with him. The giant of a man vaulted over the ropes and greeted them. He and Dwalin embraced and clapped each other on the shoulder. Dwalin introduced Ori with such pride in his voice, Ori blushed.

Yanni pumped Ori’s hand and told him he was honored as he’d heard about the quest and seen the mountain blow up. They said their farewells and Yanni leapt back into the ring and snarled and roared at the crowd the Barker was gathering.

They stopped and looked upwards to watch. Far above them, three young ladies in tiny, frilly orange costumes swung from bars on ropes between two poles and caught each other, and swung out to the opposite poles.
They arrived at the crowd around Fanny and Mavey. Mavey danced easily along the narrow edge of the huge vat of water. Fanny trod lightly around the other way, her trunk swinging to the beat of the three men playing music for them. Mavey’s pink dress looked as though it was made of Buer’s spun sugar. Fanny had a matching lace mat on her head that was held on by a giant bow of pink satin.

Mavey skipped forward and Fanny grasped the dam with her trunk and raised her high. Mavey struck a pose as she floated aloft. Fanny rose up on her hind legs and steadied herself, resting a front foot on the edge of the vat. Fanny then placed Mavey on her head. Mavey twirled and posed while the crowd gasped and cheered. Fanny stayed steady. Mavey jumped and landed in the vat with a great splash. Fanny reached her trunk in and scooped her out, Mavey sitting on the curve of the trunk, waved, as Fanny spurted water upward. Everyone cheered again at the beautiful tableau they made. Ori clapped until his hands tingled.

Fanny placed Mavey on the ground. Mavey hugged Fanny’s leg and, standing together, they bowed.

Once the crowd went on to the next show, Ori hurried forward. Mavey squealed to see them all and Fanny wrapped Ori in her trunk and lifted him to her cheek. Ori hugged her as best he could.

“Oh, Fanny you looked wonderful! I never imagined you could be so light on your feet! I could watch you dance forever. I watched you so hard I forgot to draw you, but I promise I will later.” Fanny rumbled fondly and squeezed gently before setting him back on his feet.

Mavey, having hugged everyone, apologized for making them damp and told them her act didn’t go on again for bit would they like her to show them around? Thorin and Dis smiled on the young dam.

“That would be lovely, Mavey,” said Dis, arm in arm with Jani. “Thank you very much!” Mavey glowed and led the way.

Kib was in his green paint with the red and orange stripes. He also wore the pink breech clout, but he had forgone the horn from his head. He smiled and bowed as the party approached. He went to the center of a black velvet mat where a single metal pole stood about nine feet high. He reached up and grabbed the pole with one hand and allowed himself to swing about the pole in a leisurely manner. He took the pole with both hands and held himself outwards from the pole, his body a perfect line parallel to the ground.

“Now that takes some true strength,” Theoden nodded as they applauded. Dwalin nodded.

“Nice t’ see our Granny Klak lef’ him in one piece.”

“Mmm,” said Ori, “No doubt the one she likes best.”

Kib grinned and easily hauled himself up the pole with his hands, his legs sticking out, toes pointed. At the top, he locked an elbow around the pole and spun gracefully upside-down to the middle. There he locked a leg around the pole and wound around to the bottom. Here he somehow kept his body flat against the pole and, using his hands, moved upward feet first to the top. He flipped himself up and stood on one toe, balancing on top. Ori gasped as, perfectly stable, Kib proceeded to spin and dance on the tiny top. He suddenly leapt high and with one hand grasping the pole, he spun rapidly down, dropped on his feet and bowed deeply.

Everyone applauded and cheered. Thorin and Kib shook hands and Thorin passed the man a fat little purse.

“You, sir, are amazing!” Bilbo offered.

Kib bowed again and thanked them all, winked at Mavey and suggested they visit the kindly gentleman sitting at a small table. Mavey giggled and led the way over.

The table was perfectly plain and not in any way decorated. The man smiled genially. His hands rested on the table. His sleeves were rolled to above his elbows and there appeared to be nothing unusual about him other than he was rather innocuous in the middle of the fair. It was then Ori saw the three familiar silver bowls and little white ball.

Ori giggled. This game had been the most honest job Nori ever came up with. Unfortunately, Nori had used it to get a hundred gold off a highly placed council man of Calmar’s. The man complained and Calmar had immediately ordered that the game was illegal.

Glorfindel marched up, took a swig from the latest shared bottle of lichen whiskey, passed it back to Celeborn, and greeted the man at the table.

“Hail and well met, my friend. What game have you here?”

The man rose, smiled sweetly up, and gestured for the elf hero to seat himself in the chair opposite and examine the table to his satisfaction. Glorfindel picked up the chair offered, looked it over, and tested it. He gathered up the silver bowls and the table for scrutiny then patted the man down as well. Bard told Glorfindel to leave be, but the man assured Bard this was fine and he was quite willing to be studied as it was only fair.

Pleased, Glorfindel sat down.

“My friend, what happens now?”

The man gestured to the three bowls and the ball placed between them.

“Please examine these things to your satisfaction again, sir,” the man beamed. Glorfindel looked up as all his soused companions crowded around. Lady Galadriel reached through, scooped up the items then put them back.

“There is no sorcery involved. What must happen now?”

“What price do you charge to show me whatever game you play?” Glorfindel asked

“That, sir,” said the man looking cordially at the elf, “depends on how much you’d like to bet.”

Glorfindel stared. The man continued,

“You shall place the ball under one of these bowls. I shall move them about, then you tell me under which bowl the ball is. If you are right, you keep what ever amount you betted. If you are wrong, I keep the money.”

“Right,” said Glorfindel and slapped down a gold coin.

After losing five times, Glorfindel threw up his hands and got out of the chair. Elrond tried and failed as well. Theoden, Aragorn and Eowyn also lost. Bilbo refused to play as, he said, he hadn’t been able to figure out how the trick worked. In quick succession Thorin, Kili, and Dwalin also lost. Ori stifled his giggles and stepped forward as the party was declaring defeat and starting to move on.

“You sure, love?” Dwalin asked. “Don’t pay to play another’s game.”

“I want to try,” Ori grinned.

He sat down, pushed over a gold piece and the man went through his trick. He asked Ori to point out the bowl he wanted lifted.

“It ought to be the one on the right,” Celeborn said to Bard, who nodded.

Ori pointed to the one on the left and lifted it. There was the little white ball. Everyone gasped and the man looked keenly at Ori.

“Have we met, sir?”

“No,” Ori teased, “but you, I think, learnt this game from my brother, Nori of the Brothers Ri.”

The man laughed, clapped his hands to his forehead then offered a hand to Ori,
“I should have known those freckles and that nose!” he chuckled.

“If you’re the one I remember Nori telling me about,” Ori said, “I thought you had a trained rats game.”

“Oh, I do, sir, but my little ratty girls are currently working Castle Bounce.”

“Are they doing a trick?” Ori asked.

“No, no, they’re helping to work the bellows. They’re gettin’ cuddles and all manner of treats from our Floris and Fior. They think they’re playing. Here, I’ll split this take with you, if you promise not to tell that lot how I do me trick.”

Ori laughed, “And put my own brother out of business? Never, master, never.”

They bade the man farewell and moved on.

“Ori-mate?” Fili said. “Did Nori teach you that?”

“Yes. Go ask him if he’ll show you, but bring coppers.” Ori grinned at the crown prince. “Lots of coppers!”

Everyone laughed and followed Mavey and Fanny to a huge frame set up, with a vast black canvas stretched tight across held by many large, strong springs. A group of badgers, jumping high on it, shrieked and laughed. Thorin greeted the vendors, who were various members of the weaving guild and forging guild, and asked about the game.

“The frame and springs are from our guild,” the young dwarf explained and grinned at the dam close to his age beside him. “The canvas is from the weavers guild. They used the sap Queen Hild brought.”

The dam took up the story.

“We coated all the threads with the sap, set up the warp and the weft then coated them again, wove them together then coated them once more. You can see, with those wonderful springs, you can bounce very high.”

Ori could see that the coming together of the guilds to invent with the sap had allowed these two to meet. They both had the sparkling of diamonds in their eyes. Ori looked up, watching the barefooted badgers and children going for height. Above them, at about twenty feet, hung brass rings on thin cotton strings. A young dam managed a huge bounce and reach up, grasping for a ring. Bilbo saw them, too and asked.

“Oh,” the dam giggled, “Makhad, here,” she indicated the dwarf beside her, “thought there ought to be a prize.”

Makhad chuckled, “and Dahkr,” he smiled at the dam. “Came up with the idea of using weak cotton strings to hang the hoops. If you manage to grab a hoop, you win a prize.”

Dahkr pointed to a table nearby. “My sister, Lakhr, is in the culinary guild with pastry. She made all those. If you grab a hoop, you get one free.”

On the table there were varieties of biscuits, hand pies, and pieces of cake, all for sale.

“Oh,” Galadriel admired, “those do look good!”

They waited, watching the little ones bounce and shriek as their parents either stood by calling encouragements or bounced with them. Ori saw Guernsia and Hathor holding hands with two of their little ones, the adults bouncing hard and the little ones squealing as they flew high in the air. Hathor let go and, with a tremendous bounce, his family drove him high and he snatched a ring. Everyone cheered and clapped as Makhad went forward and called their time was up. He pulled up a set of steps, so all could get down to solid ground again. The families laughed and talked with the rulers of Dale and Erebor, while their offspring gobbled sweet things.

Makhad looked at the party. Eowyn, Sigrid and the other six females rushed forward, hopped about, pulling off their shoes and any weaponry, then danced up the steps to the springy surface. They stood ready and Makhad pulled the steps away and they all joined hands and, on Sigrid shouting “Three!”, started jumping. They bounced high in the air, squealing like the little ones. Tauriel let go and managed four flips in the air and grabbed two rings. Lady Galadriel spread her arms and the fairy wings on her jumpsuit fluttered about her. She and Eowyn changed sides with the next bounce. Then they bounced out of sync and Sigrid was thrown high enough to grab three rings. Jani and the rest bounced Dis high enough to grab another three rings then they all fell on their backs. on the canvas and laughed and gasped for breath. They bounced less and less until the canvas stilled. They struggled to their feet and walked unsteadily or just crawled to the steps, their hats sadly askew.

“Nadad!” Dis panted, flushed and struggling not to giggle. “You must try this. It’s the best fun!”
“Da!” shouted Sigrid. “You and Wicked Stepmother have to do it!”
Sculdis just rolled to the side and let Dain catch her as she dropped off.
Aragorn laughed and barked out,
“Gentlemen, we are called upon!”
Aragorn and Boromir led the way followed by Bard, the dwarf princes, Gimli, Legolas, Dain and the other elf males. They removed their boots and any weaponry and climbed the steps. Legolas and Gimli rushed up and bounced about laughing and hooting. Gimli got Legolas on his shoulders and bounced higher.

“Look at me!” Legolas cried, “I’m flying!”
Haldir marched out and promptly tripped over his own feet and fell flat on his face then flopped about on the moving canvas. Boromir shouted with laughter and copied him but bounced right back to a standing position.

“Courage, lad!” Dain shouted and dragged Haldir to his feet. Haldir was too busy laughing to assist Dain. Celeborn looked slant-eyed at his cousin and bounced right behind Thranduil, who went down. Bard shoved Celeborn in revenge, knocking him into Elrond, who dragged Lindir and Glorfindel flat on the canvas with him.

Fili and Kili seized each other’s shoulders and bounced hard. They gained a good height by the time the rest of the males got themselves sorted out and bouncing with them. The combined weight of the group made the frames shake and shudder and the entire contraption started to bounce, too. The guild members rushed to the frame and tightened the holding straps at each leg, steadying it again.

Fili and Kili maneuvered to the middle. The rest of the males enclosed them in a circle. The circle bounced opposite the princes, sending them higher. With a last tremendous bounce, both Fili and Kili shot up among the rings, snatching all they could, and crashed down in a heap of shouting, hooting males. The canvas stilled as they all lay there in a laughing jumble of bodies and limbs. Ori drew maniacally.

Aragorn got himself up and slid over the edge. He was gasping and shaking his head. Thorin and Dwalin went over to help him off, and hold him steady until he was able to stop snickering and move to his lady’s side. The others crawled or staggered off via the steps, all hats ruined beyond repair.

Glorfindel stalked over to the attendant, said something, and the attendant pointed to a drinking fountain pouring into a large hole. Glorfindel marched to the hole and put his head in it. The water poured merrily over the back of his head and washed his hat away as they all heard him being loudly sick. Theoden, Gimli and Boromir cat-called him about his earlier declaration of never being sick. Celeborn, Fili, and Aragorn finally had pity on him, went over and helped him out and gave him handkerchiefs to wash his face. Glorfindel squeezed out his hair, took a drink, and walked back with them.

“Assholes,” Glorfindel pronounced when he neared them. Boromir and Theoden shouted with laughter and clapped him on the back.

“Ready?” Fili called to them. He and Kili were holding rings in their hands and Kili had stuck his feet through a couple as well. Mavey called to Fanny, who gamely came forward and lifted her trunk to make a hook. Fili and Kili shouted and began to toss the rings over her trunk. Fanny caught them all.

“How many?” Gimli roared.
“Seventeen!” Kili shouted as he and Fili knocked heads.
“One for each and two left over for Mavey and Fanny,” Bard chuckled as he was still helping Thranduil to stand upright.
Dwalin took Ori’s hand.
“C’mon, love.”
Ori hurried forward as he and Dwalin followed Thorin and Bilbo. Bilbo removed his paper crown and a pocket dagger. Ori took off his hat, kicked off his boots, and put aside his jumpsuit belt with his note book and graphite wands. He tied the arms of his jumpsuit around his waist as Dwain had, and rushed up the steps after Bilbo.

Ori had expected it to feel like the time he had jumped on his and Dwain’s bed, but the canvas was smoother and much bouncier. He and Bilbo bounced from sitting in the air down on their butts then back to standing. Dwain and Thorin joined them, Ori saw that everyone from their party was crowded about the frame, cheering them on.

Thorin smiled to Ori and Bilbo and said quietly, “Dwalin and I have a plan,” Ori and Bilbo looked at each other. “Does this plan,” asked Bilbo as the four of them began bouncing gently, “Involve Ori and I being naked?”

Dwalin snorted and Thorin grin was feral. “Not this particular plan, ghivasha, no.” Bilbo made a moue and Ori giggled. “Does it involved you and Dwain being naked?” he asked Dwalin reached out to tap the end of his nose. “Plans firs’, me love, naked later!” “Then,” Bilbo said as they bounced higher, “do share this plan, my dear dwarf!”

They shifted; Thorin behind Bilbo facing Ori with Dwalin behind. Dwalin clasped Ori’s waist as Thorin took hold of Bilbo. They bounced higher and higher. Ori watched, fascinated as the canvas bowed beneath them.

“Now,” said Thorin as they plunged down. The canvas sent them shooting upward and, at the highest peak, Dwalin and Thorin threw Bilbo and Ori upward. Ori yelled as he found himself among a forest of suspended rings. He grabbed at strings and plummeted. He landed in Dwalin’s arms and they bounced a few times more.

There was cheering all about as Thorin and Dwain somehow stilled the canvas beneath them. Dwain carried Ori off and down the steps, Thorin bearing a giggling Bilbo behind them. “How many did you get” Bilbo asked Ori as their Ones set them on their feet. Ori looked down at the mess of string in his arms. There was rather a lot of rings attached. Thorin counted Bilbo’s for him as Bilbo and Dwain untangled Ori from his stash.

“Bilbo managed eight,” Thorin informed them. Kili heard and shouted to everyone. Ori realized another group of fair goers had arrived and seen them bouncing. They were crowded around, the adults congratulating them and the children all around Fanny, patting or hugging her legs. Fanny remained still, looking them all over like an indulgent mother, and touching them all with her trunk while Mavey explained oliphaunts to the little ones.

Dwalin gave a shout of triumph. Ori had managed to pull away ten. The royal party cheered and surged forward to clap Ori on the back and tease.

Ori looked at Thorin then the badgers of two races gathered around Fanny. Thorin smiled, took Ori’s from Dwain, made a head count of the offspring and, with both Ori’s and Bilbo’s rings, went to talk to Mavey. Mavey sent a delighted look to Ori and asked Fanny to lie down on the ground. There were enough rings for every tyke to climb up on Fanny’s back and, at Mavey’s word, Fanny rose slowly and carefully. Mavey waved to them and Fanny trumpeted back to Ori as they walked off to give the little ones a tour of the fairground.

Bilbo chuckled as Thorin returned to them. “And there’s enough left, so we each get a dessert!” Dwalin looked at Ori, with a soft smile. “Yer every ane a’ me fondes’ wishes come true an’ twice over again,” Ori blushed and hugged Dwain, burying his face in his husband’s beard. Dwain wrapped his arms about Ori and laid his cheek against Ori’s hair. “Yeh jus’ give t’ every one, don’ yeh. All them wee ones gettin’ a ride. They’ll chatter ‘bou’ tha’ “Coming?” Thorin asked as Ori raised his head.
“We’re going to get cake,” Bilbo elaborated.
“Want cake?” Dwalin asked amused. Ori grinned up at him “Definitely!”

They went over and joined their party still enjoying pastries. Ori looked at all that was on offer and chose a plain hand pie baked golden with big sugar crystals sticking to it. It had a familiar wonderful smell. He bit into it and moaned. It was still faintly warm and full of thick xocolatl cream, flavored with hazelnuts. He chewed and licked at the xocolatl cream dripping out. Eager for more he thrust his tongue into the pie and half scooped, half sucked the cream out, then licked all around the edge. He nibbled off every sugar crystal and licked the pie all over in case he missed any, then popped the rest in his mouth, it was so good. He licked his lips then saw that he was being stared at. Bilbo was smiling teasingly at him while Thorin looked first at Ori then Dwalin, who had flushed raspberry and was grinning like a fool.
“What?” Ori demanded.
“Shesee, Ori,” said Sigrid. “Just go have sex with your hand pie in public.”
“Better than having sex with your hand in public,” Fili helped.
“I did not!” Ori cried, blushing. “I’m not like Father-King Thranduil sucking off an iklar at Dori’s tea party!”
“What?” Fili and Sigrid demanded together. The guild members tried to hide their smirks but couldn’t. Bard grinned at them and shrugged,
“What can I say? My elf likes to eat.”
“Da!” hollered Sigrid.
“What?” Bard asked, turning his grin to her.
“Ew,” she replied.
“I never sucked Haldir’s dick,” Thranduil said forcefully and late to the argument.
“I’m not hearing this,” Sigrid put her hands over her ears and turned away to Fili.
“No one said you sucked Haldir’s dick, sweetie,” Bard said in a pacifying tone. “You sucked off an iklar at Dori’s tea party.”

“Who’s Iklar?” Hathor asked in passing. He and Guernsia were heading to the far side where the family door was. They each had an unconscious child in their arms.
“Not who, what.” Thranduil told him crossly.
“Come dear,” said Hathor with a chuckle. “We’re leaving.” Thranduil huffed.
“Wonderful, now Hathor will tell everyone he knows I sucked something that wasn’t a dick but I thought it was Haldir…” Thranduil frowned at his words, Ori rather thought they weren’t the ones he’d hoped to use.
“Sweetie,” Bard soothed, “Let’s just forget about Haldir and his dick.”
“My dick isn’t that forgettable,” Haldir objected loudly, apparently only hearing the part about his dick.
“O’ course it’s not, love,” Sculdis said comfortingly. “I’m sure yeh’ve go’ a perfectly respectable elf-y dick an’ yeh should be proud.”

Haldir swallowed another shot of whiskey and pondered aloud.
“Why should I be proud of my dick? My dick can’t take guard duty without me. Mind, I can’t take guard duty without my dick.” Haldir frowned and shouted after Dain. “My dick and I are attached!”

“Right,” said Thorin authoritatively at volume, “moving along.”

They thanked and bade farewell to the snickering guild members and headed off to the next attraction. This was a huge pole with a great round metal canopy on top. From the canopy hung double seats, each on two chains. The seat had a bar that went across the lap of the sitters. The whole thing was attached by a huge gear that tumbled a large bar that stretched across the ground to attach to another gear. This was affixed to a large winding capstan. Four lovely dark brown ponies stood beside the winding pole. These were being brushed, petted, and fed carrots by the attendants. The ponies all had bright red leather harnesses and a tall plume of dyed bright red feathers on top of each of their heads. Ori thought they looked very festive.

One attendant came over and everyone gamely paired off and sat in the seats. The attendant went round and secured each bar and told them to hang on. Ori saw the other attendant hitching the ponies to the bars attached to the capstan.

“What’s going to happen?” Arwen called. The attendant tossed off a salut to her and rushed over and mounted his pony. This set the other three on their ponies and, with a shout from the first attendant and squeals of delight from the ponies, they galloped around, turning the capstan and the bar on the ground. This twisted the pole in the center but nothing else happened. Ori peered up at the top. Something up there was being wound very tight. He could hear the twisting noise.

“What’s going on?” Theoden asked Glorfindel next to him.

The elf hero shrugged, confused.

Dain peered up as did Sculdis.

They looked at each other.

“Shit,” said Dain.

“Hold on tight!” bellowed Sculdis.

The ponies stopped, one attendant pulled the bar free from the bottom of the pole and the seats began to move forward. They went around the pole at a merry pace the first time. The speed picked up and then seats and their helpless passengers spun wildly around the pole. Faster and faster they went, yelling and screaming the entire time. Ori flung up his arms and hollered into the wind.

Dwalin threw back his head, roaring with laughter. They were whirling almost horizontal to the ground.

All too soon for Ori, the wheels lost velocity as the twist unwound and the seats slowed and resumed their original upright movement. The attendants laughed, unhitched their ponies and set them loose to frolic then, came and freed the passengers. Ori, with Dwalin’s help, hoisted himself upright.

“That was so much fun!” he told the dwarf assisting them.

“Grand, ain’t it?” he agreed.

Ori turned and saw that not everyone had had as much fun as he and Dwalin. Dain and Sculdis were busily studying the pole and discussing it. Bard held his head with both hands and had his eyes shut. Ori thought he must still be a little dizzy. Thranduil just sat stock still in the seat with his eyes wide open but fixed on nothing.

The Lord and Lady of the Golden Wood sat on the ground in front of their seat and laughed hysterically at each other.

Fili, Kili, Sigrid and Tauriel stood together giggling and trying to sort out their hair.

Eowyn laughed at Boromir, who was a trifle green. Aragorn sat in a seat with his lady. Arwen had her head on his shoulder.

“I like this seat,” she said waveringly. “It so nice and…still.”

Theoden and Glorfindel stood on either side of their seat, clutching the chains for dear life. Dis was half lying in her seat, howling with laughter and Jani was splayed, face down on the ground, telling it how much she loved it.

Thorin and Bilbo came over to them, laughing and bright eyed. Bilbo’s curls were every which way and Thorin looked like he’d braved a windstorm. Ori felt his own hair and thought he must look the same. Dwalin’s hair and beard bristled out in every direction.

Thorin laughed and hugged Bilbo into his side.

“What’s next?” Ori asked.

“Off t’ the fun house,” the attendant said with a smile as Thorin handed him a roll of gold coins.

Ori looked over at the so-called ‘fun’ house. It has the facade of a house but was painted with so many colors and written over in so many languages that it was hard to give it a place anywhere in the definition of house. The languages stated things like Joke!; Joy!; Oops!; Got ya!; and many runes for laughter. Happy faces were painted over in different colors.

Bard shaded his eyes.

“Ugh, it’s like looking at Difpa too early in the morning.”

Arwen clenched both Aragorn’s and Boromir’s arms.

“I’m getting dizzy just looking!”

“Come on,” Bilbo sang out, already tugging Thorin’s hand.

Ori trotted after him, pulling Dwalin behind. Thorin greeted the lady standing before the house.

She wore a long dress, the bodice laced so tight the tops of her breasts bulged dangerously at the low neckline, and the skirt was held out with panniers. She crowned this with a very fancy bonnet with tall dyed feathers arcing out of the top and she carried a jaunty parasol. The ensemble was all the colors of the fun house.

Thorin indicated the entire gaping party and handed her a roll of gold coins. She curtsied and ushered them up the steps to a large octagonal door. Bilbo opened this and walked in.

Ori followed, looking about. It was a plain rough whitewashed hall. All along the walls were shuttered windows just the size of a head, each knob fixed to the shutter labeled ‘Open!’

The window were at a height for men but with a set of steps, so dwarrow and badgers could reach to see.

Bilbo went up to one, opened it and,

“Boo!” shouted a dwarf with an absurdly painted face on the other side. The shutter slammed shut and Bilbo almost fell off the steps laughing.

“Did you see that?” he cried.

“Let me see,” Thorin said. He jump up on the step and opened the shutter. A wooden box was in the space. It was completely painted black with a little black sign board with white lettering reading ‘Try Again!’.

Intrigued, Ori went to another. Ready to be boo-ed at, he opened it. There was another black box but this held a small paper cup filled with lemonade and decorated with a mint leaf. Ori squealed and drank the lemonade.

“Thank you!” he called into the box then closed the shutter again, still giggling. He turned to Dwalin, who was looking at all the shutters.

“You’re turn.”

Dwalin stepped back to one of the first shutters and opened it quickly. A man’s face painted completely orange with a giant false purple nose popped out.

“Bo-“ the man started. Dwalin was too quick. He leaned in and kissed the man on the mouth then slammed the shutter.

“Blaah!” came the yell from behind the wall. Dwalin snickered and wiped the residue paint from his beard. Thorin and Bilbo roared with laughter and Ori had to sit down to hold his sides.

The rest of the party barged in and looked about.

“Go on,” Ori said.

“What happens?” Sigrid asked, rightfully suspicious.

“I got a cup of lemonade and Thorin got a little sign telling him to try again,” Ori hedged, not wanting to spoil the surprise.

“Go one at a time,” Bilbo advised.

Lady Galadriel refreshed herself from the whiskey and opened a shutter. Inside the box was a plum.

“Oh how nice,” she cooed and started to eat.

Celeborn took heart and opened a shutter.

“Boo!” shouted a green face.

“Aaaaagh!” Celeborn backed up and knocked into Sculdis.

“It was a face!” Dain hollered and bounded to the end of the hall. He bounced up the steps and yanked open a shutter.

“Try again!” he grumped.

Everyone tried.
Thranduil got a cup of water, Bard a ‘try again’ and Legolas and Gimli scored a small poke of buttery salted popcorn. Boromir got a small wooden spoon, which he laughed at heartily. Eowyn got boo-ed at, but she seized the bright blue false nose before the shutter slammed closed.

Sculdis found a dogwood tree blossom, Arwen, a walnut and Aragorn, a toy rabbit. The rest ended up with ‘try again’s.

They gathered at the end of this hall and a sign shaped like an arrow pointed to the right.

This was a bigger hallway but one side was lined with tall mirrors.

Bilbo turned to the first one, looked at his reflection and chuckled.

“Thorin, look!”

“What is it, ghivasha?”

Bilbo gestured to the mirror. Ori could see the surface had been warped in some way so Bilbo looked to be ten feet tall.

“I see,” Thorin replied. “How does it feel to be tall?”

“Not all its cracked up to be, it seems.”

Haldir looked in the next mirror and discovered himself three feet in both directions and giggled, jumping up and down and watching the effects and giggling some more.

“Ori! Ori!” Galadriel called.

He turned and discovered the lord and lady of Lórien standing in front of a similar mirror with their hair wrapped around their chins.

“Look!” Galadriel cried. “We’re short and stout! We’re dwarrow! Ori, you draw us.”

“I’m far ahead of you, m’lady,” said Ori, sketching madly.

Everyone scattered through this hall, looking at themselves and each other, giggling, pulling faces and jumping and waving their arms. Dain and Sculdis did a jig in front of one.

They tried all the mirrors and were about to decide they were finished when they heard a voice coming from the doorway behind them.

“Woooooo-aaaaaaah! Boooooooo!”

“What in-?” Bard started.

A man appeared, dressed in a bright blue baggy jumpsuit with white pompoms down the front, a big white ruffled collar, red shoes several sizes too large for him and a silly little white cone as a hat. His hair consisted of two scarlet points sticking out from behind his ears. His face was chalk white and he had a red ball for a nose. He was hunched over and he crept around the door frame and peered in at them. They all looked at him. Thorin stepped forward.

“Good evening, sir. May we assist you in some way?”

The man sighed deeply and straightened up.

“Great, I get an entire group of trained warriors. I didn’t sign up for this job to die.”

Ori and several others chuckled.

“And what job are you supposed to do?” Thorin asked with a grin.

“See,” said the man, removing the ball from his nose, so he could speak clearly. “I sneak in and scare the children and chase them through here to that far narrow hall then they run through that and up the spiral stair at the end.”

“Ahh,” said Thorin.

“We can do that, Idad,” Kili said eagerly.

“Yes,” Fili agreed. “We came for the full fun house experience and we can’t let this poor fellow down, Idad.”

Thorin kept his countenance, but his eyes sparkled.

“Well, everyone, let us oblige this gentleman and let him frighten us and chase us to that other far hallway and up the stair.”

“I’m in!” Dain bellowed.

Ori grabbed Dwalin’s hand.

“I’m scared already, aren’t you?” he teased.

“I’m shakin’ in me boots, love.”

The man looked a little confused.
Glorfindel strode unsteadily forward and bowed, calling out at battle pitch.
“My friend, we shall be true to our word and run in terror from your ferocity. Please go back through your door and begin again. We shall not fail you!”

The man looked at Thorin and pointed at Glorfindel. “Is he for real?”
“’Yes,” said Thorin, “and he’s extremely drunk just like all our elf companions.”

The man paused then looked at Thorin and his eyes flew wide open.
“Shit! I mean, I - I - I didn’t realize you’re the king! Sire, I-”

Thorin chuckled and smiled.

“We are merely a group of friends celebrating, sir, and we are now looking forward to your performance.”

“Um…” The man came forward and Thorin shook hands with him. The man grinned, bowed, and tipped his ridiculous hat to Bilbo then turned and ran back out, shoving his nose in place.

They all stood for a moment giggling, then Kili took charge.

“I don’t know, Tauriel!” he said loudly. “It may be called a fun house, but I think it’s creepy in here.”

“I believe you’re right, mel nin. You’d better hold my hand. We should be on alert.”

“Aye,” Dain blustered. “Someone could sneak up on us!”

“Yes,” Sigrid helped. “Fili, I’m scared! Aren’t you scared, Arwen?”

Arwen stared, then when Aragorn nudged her, she said, “Oh yes, I’m very scared!”

“I’m going to faint with fright!” Galadriel announced, taking another shot and passing the bottle to Arwen.

“Wooooo-aaaaaaah! Boooooooo!” came from the doorway.

“What was that?” shouted Boromir, as everyone bounced into each other in a huddle.
The man peered around the door way and smiled a horrible smile.

“I seeeeeee you!” he taunted, in what Ori thought was an excellent villain’s voice.

“Look!” shrieked Jani.

She turned to give the eye to every female. As one they all screamed. Glorfindel and Thranduil looked at each other, looked at the man, shrugged, and screamed, too.

“Sweetie!” Bard said. “Take a damper, that was right in my ear!”

“I’m so sorry, my love,” cooed Thranduil and kissed the offended ear.

“I’m gonna get you!” growled the man in his blue jumpsuit, hunched over and creeping into the room. “And I’m gonna eat you!”

Glorfindel turned and addressed them, shouting.

“My friends, this looks to be a true creature of darkness! We must flee! I suggest that corridor!”

“Quick!” yelled Kili. “To the corridor!”

“Run for your lives!” Dis giggled.

Thorin pushed Bilbo to Dwalin and Ori, who lingered, grinning. Thorin frowned a terrible frown at them all.

“Fly, you fools!”

The whole group bounded off to the corridor, yelling and screaming like fiends in a Shire book.
Ori tried to yell, but he was too busy laughing and stumbled as he ran, clutching Dwalin’s hand as Dwalin pulled him along.

They reached the narrow corridor. The man was close behind, but he was bent double and Ori heard him give a snort of repressed laughter.

The corridor was odd and Ori realized it was only solid to the waist of a dwarf the rest of the wall was fabric painted to look like a wall. Hands reach out of slits and touched them. Lindir, surprised, fell back into politeness and cordially shook the hand plucking at his hair.

“Good evening, how do you do?”

Sigrid crowed with laughter and shoved him along.

“They aren’t saying ‘hello’, Linda, they’re trying to eat us.”

They hurried to the far stair, it was a very narrow, spiral affair that only allowed them to ascend one at a time. They clambered up, giggling and shrieking the entire time. The man in the jumpsuit reached them as Thorin coming last, got off the top step.

“Coming?” Thorin asked, genially as he, Bilbo, Ori, and Dwalin looked down over the railing. “Nope,” the man grinned. “Evil clowns like me can’t climb stairs, so you’re safe.”

“Alas,” Thorin teased, “you shall have to find others for your dinner.” The man laughed and said, “Hey, where’s that blond wench?”

Giggles came from behind them. “Which blonde wench does he want?” Sigrid called as she, Galadriel, and Eowyn came and leaned over the railings.

“We’re all blond wenches,” Galadriel called down, twirling the whisky bottle at him. “Which of us wenches are you looking for?” He pointed at Eowyn.

“Excellent choice,” Galadriel sang out. “Sigrid is courting and I’m married. Eowyn here is both lovely and single.” Eowyn leaned down over the railing.

“Please tell my aunt and chaperone what kind of a husband an evil clown makes.” The man snickered, shook his head, and grinned up at her. “Ma’am, since your party’s on the top floor, we’re going to let in another group and I’ve got to be behind my shutter in the first hallway.”

“What fun!” Sigrid enthused. “I hope you get to shout ‘boo’ to lots of people,” Eowyn smiled.

“Me, too, lady, but I need my other nose to do that.” “Oh!” Eowyn said, remembering and digging through her jumpsuit pocket. “Here it is! Sorry, I forgot all about it!” She dropped it down to him. He chuckled and waved. “Thanks, lady! You and the king’s party have fun.” “Thank you for scaring us,” Galadriel caroled after him.

Dwalin turned to Thorin as they heard the man’s receding guffaws. “Aye, jus’ makin’ friends an’ influencin’ folk all over th’ place, ain’t yeh?” Thorin flipped a rude gesture, bowed, then offered his arm to Bilbo.

Dwalin turned to Thorin as they heard the man’s receding guffaws. “Aye, jus’ makin’ friends an’ influencin’ folk all over th’ place, ain’t yeh?” Thorin flipped a rude gesture, bowed, then offered his arm to Bilbo.

They all entered yet another hallway off the landing. “There’s no furniture in this house,” Glorfindel grumbled. “How are you supposed to live in such a house? Where can you entertain guests and ask them to sit down?” “I don’t think this is that sort of house,” Celeborn replied and removed the bottle from the elf hero and took a shot.

He headed into the new hallway. As soon as his foot touched the floor, the board under his foot moved. Celeborn staggered, looked at the bottle in his hand and promptly passed it to Arwen. He took another step and the boards moved again. He stood still, staring at the floor. “It’s not me,” he said, confused to his lady. “The floor’s moving, Idad Other-elf,” Fili helped.

Elrond and Lindir stepped cautiously forward. The floor lurched under them as well and they caught hold of each other and staggered. Kili poked Fili and they grinned at each other. Fili grabbed Sigrid’s hand and Kili shouted, “C’mon Tauriel!” The four lit out across the floor, bouncing and dancing from board to board. Sigrid shrieked, “This is like jumping boat to boat in a wind storm!”

Tauriel squealed and giggled as she made it to the other side, Kili now riding on her back. “Hurry up you lot!” Kili cried, dropping off Tauriel. “It’s easy!” “Famous las’ words,” Dwalin commented.

“I thought those were ‘hold my ale and watch this’?” Ori teased. “Same thin’, love,” Dwalin said and took his hand. “Step, ride th’ liftin’ a’ th’ board, an’ step t’ th’ nex’ ane.”
Ori followed Dwalin carefully. It worked just like Dwalin said it would and they gain the far side soon enough. The elves and men staggered and stumbled as Jani, Dis, Sculdis, Gimli, and Dain kept them from falling flat. Thorin and Bilbo brought up the rear, skipping as Bilbo insisted.

“How does that work?” Theoden asked, squatting down to peer at the floor.

Dain escorted Sculdis over and she stood on a board. It lifted and Dain went down on all fours and looked beneath.

“Pressure locked,” Dain said, got to his feet and gave Sculdis his hand, so she could step down.

“Enough weight an’ th latch loosens an’ springs lift th’ board up.”

“ Ingenious,” Theoden said, impressed. Eowyn nodded.

“Onward to the next hall?” Aragorn laughed.

“Lead on, Gondor,” Thorin called.

The next hall was a huge, long, rolling tube, which fomented just as much disaster as Ori feared. It was soon clogged with drunken elves falling all over each other, taking everyone else down with them, all of them laughing too hard to move of their own volition. Bard skipped clear of all of them, having spent years on boat decks, but Celeborn tripped up Theoden and they went down in a heap.

“Theoden!” Celeborn cried. “I knew you couldn’t resist my charms!”

“Do something, someone!” Theoden shouted. “My virtue is in danger.”

Thranduil tried to crawl toward the end of the tube.

“Please get me out of here! I will be unwell!”

Bard darted in a hand, extracted Thranduil, and deftly sat him on a bench.

“Sit still, sweetie.”

“Ah, much better, thank you,” said Thranduil.

“Thranduil?” Thorin asked. “Are you alright?”

The elf looked up at Thorin.

“How did you get out here so fast?”

“I went through the door.”

“What door?”

“The door to the side of the tube marked ‘Exit’.”

“I didn’t see an ‘exit’ sign.”

“It’s at eye level. If you’re a dwarf.” Thorin grinned.

Thranduil stared, then sat back crossing his legs and then his arms. He glared.

“Well, fine. I’ll just sit here and pout.”

“Don’t do that,” Thorin said, offering the father king a hand up. “It’s time to go ride Ulwe’s Boat.”

“Ride Ulwe’s boat?” Thranduil tried to shake off some of the effects of lichen whiskey and failed. “Is that an actual thing or are you asking me for sex?”

“Wrong alley for that.”

With help, everyone was extracted from the tube and sat about giggling.

The exit from the fun house was an open balcony on the top floor. Between it and the ground curved a steep corkscrew of sheet metal, about four feet wide.

“We get to slide!” Gimli shouted. He grabbed Legolas’ hand and parked his butt on the top of the metal sheet. “C’mom, elf, sit behind me!”

Puzzled, Legolas sat down and Gimli arranged the long legs on either side of him.

“Now, hang on t’ me,” Gimli instructed and Legolas wrapped his arms about Gimli’s middle.

Gimli grinned back.

“Ready?”

“I suppose,” Legolas said.

Gimli grabbed the smooth sides of the metal and pushed them forward. They shot down and around, Gimli roaring and Legolas laughing and shouting. They hopped off at the bottom and waved.

“Do it, Ada!” Legolas called up. “It’s great fun!”

Glorfindel gave a shout and cast himself flat on the metal, face first and hurtled down. “Catch him!” Dwalin bellowed to Gimli and Legolas. “He’ll break his bloody neck!”

They scooped the elf hero up at the last minute and righted him. Dis gave a squeal and Jani pushed her forward.

“Right, lass.”

“All the ladies together!” cried Dis.

The line of females, all sitting one behind the other and clutching each other, was sight Ori scribbled to draw. Dwalin Theoden and Aragorn and Thorin went to the last lady, who was Arwen, and put their hands to her back.

“Ready?” Dwalin asked with a laugh

“Now!” Dis shouted.

The males pushed and the females disappeared, shrieking, screaming, and laughing. They all tumbled off at the bottom. Thranduil corked the last whiskey bottle and called to his son. Legolas came near the wall and looked up.

“Catch,” Thranduil said casually and dropped the bottle. Legolas did and Arwen promptly took it away from him. Dwalin caught Ori close and sat him on his lap.

Ori yelled as they slid at speed round and round and down. They got off and Ori hugged Dwalin.

“That was fun, but not as fun as the swings.”

Dwalin laughed and held him close to his side.

Theoden appeared next, followed in quick succession by Boromir and Aragorn.

Boromir looked back up the slide.

“Too bad the faunts aren’t with us. They’d have a wonderful time with just this contraption.”

Dain slid down, half standing and leapt off.

“Brilliant!” he shouted and Sculdis congratulated him on his skill.

Bard arrived next with Thranduil and Celeborn hanging onto him for dear life.

Kili and Fili slid down, standing as Dain had, but hanging onto each other for stability.

Thorin and Bilbo came last with Bilbo laughing the whole way.

They reformed, called thanks to the lady in front and walked towards a larger round metal tent. As they got closer, Ori saw it was a bit like the swings but more complex.

“It’s clockwork,” Dain said.

The attendant turned at the sound of his voice and hailed him.

“Those lads helped me wi’ our Hamfast’s plow,” Dain said. “Looks like they’ve come up wi’ somethin’ t’ ride on.”

It was a round affair with a gaily painted, low coned top decorated with little lights and fancy gilt scrollwork. This provided a cover and beneath were small boats, smaller than the row boats used in the Dale. They were overly decorated, too, and were fixed to a stand. The stand was painted blue with wooden painted waves covering the base. Large gilt lettering on the front proclaimed ‘Ulwe’s Boat’.

They greeted the attendants. Thorin handed over payment and they were cordially invited to climb up and sit in the boats.

Once more the group paired off and Ori climbed into a bright red boat. There was a wide canvas cushion for two and it was almost like a much smaller version of Dori’s teacup carriage. Ori looked about as everyone settled and laughed and joked. In the center, a group of musicians smiled and waited for them to be ready. There was a dwarf with a large drum on its side, fastened to a smaller upright drum, which had a pair of cymbals attached. A man had a guitar and a dam, a pipe.

“Ready?” called the attendant, everyone shouted they were. Two of the attendants pushed a large lever on the side of the stand and the band began to play ‘Pull for shore Ulwe’.

Ori squawked as the boats began to move. They went in a circle but they rocked up and down, side to side and font to back.

Ori started to laugh. He could hear everyone giving their opinions and these were varied.

“Don’ look up, love” said Dwalin.

Suddenly water spurted from various parts of the ceiling and fountained up from the floor. The little boats clanked their merry way around the band, who played with enthusiasm.

The song finished and the boats stopped. Everyone got out, splashed, damp and staggering with laughter.

“Lads,” Dain shouted as he helped his giggling wife out of their boat, “yer gonna rust this thing ou’ a’fore th’ moon comes t’ full again.”

“We’re working on that!” called back one of the attendants.

Galadriel turned to the attendant nearest her and pointed with the same hand that held the bottle. “This is not Ulwe’s boat. Ulwe’s boat never felt like that. This is pissed off Ulwe’s boat.”

The attendant beamed. “Yeh think, ma’am? That’s an idea. We may have t’ use tha’ one!”

They regrouped. The male elves were starting to look a little rough around the edges. All the ladies were now in the middle of a circle dance, Galadriel and Arwen stumbling a little.

“Is it over?” peeped Lindir.

“No!” cried Tauriel and Eowyn. Eowyn turned to Thorin “We don’t have to go home now, do we?”

“Certainly not,” Thorin teased. “But I think we have arrived at the ultimate fun fair attraction.”

Everyone looked where he was pointing.

Ori couldn’t swallow a shout of delight.

There before them was the biggest thing made of the sap. It was shaped like a castle out of a fairytale. It was colored like a headache, with bright yellow walls and turrets, embellished with the occasional purple, oblong patch like a paving stone. The front opened in a huge, arched doorway and they could see an expanse of blue inside. The entire thing was held fast with many, many ropes and it hummed.

To the side, a large, bright red tube joined a caster attached to a huge bellows with many tubes of many colors then more casters, bellows, and more tubes that all led up to more bellows and a stand decorated with bunting.

Floris and Fior stood on this, playing with things that ran around on the table before them. Ori went over.

“Ori!” cried Floris

“There you are!” Fior put in. “We were wondering if you’d make it!”

“We have,” Ori laughed. “The elves are drunk and dizzy from everything!”

“Perfect!” Floris giggled. “Come look.”

Ori climbed up the steps on the side and saw. There were at least a dozen beautiful rats scampering every where. They were all colors rats could come in and more, black ones, gray ones, pie-bald, even white ones with sparkling pink eyes. There were bowls of food and water and little toys. The rats pranced about, occasionally coming to the two youngsters for hugs and pets. They mostly played on small wheels made of metal; some of these were flat like dishes, others were on end, so the rats could hop in and run. The wheels worked some mechanism below the stand.

“What are they doing?” Ori asked.

“Oh,” said Floris dismissively, “the wheels turn little gears which turn larger ones and so on that work the bellows to keep Castle Bounce filled with air.

Ori looked down at the rats. The rats were having the time of their lives, running pell-mell in and on the wheels, rolling and playing with the toys, and each other. Ori put out his hand. A large gray rat bounced into it. He bought it to his face and cuddled it. The little tongue tasted his cheeks and the snuffly nose and small paws explored his beard busily.

“They’re so sweet!” Ori enthused.

“They belong to Master Bifinak,” said Floris. “He does the ball and bowls trick.”

“Oh, we met him!” Ori laughed. “He bilked Glorfindel out of five gold and a good deal more from the rest of our party.”

Fior and Floris snickered.

“Did he bilk you?” Fior wanted to know.

“No,” Ori giggled. “Nori’s the one who taught him the trick.”
“Get away!” Floris cried. “Really?”

Ori nodded. The rest of his party came over and took turns visiting on the stand. Fior had to come off the stand and open the side door of it to show the workings to Dain, Sculdis and Theoden. This completed, they took their leave of Fior and Floris and their playmates, and moved forward. Thorin passed a roll of gold to the attendant and they all once more removed their footwear and weaponry. Steps were placed at the entrance.

Bilbo and Ori rushed up them.

The steps showed the inside. It was one great square of blue, several feet below them. They would have to jump from the top step to land in it.

Bilbo offered a hand.

“Shall we?”

“Yes!” Ori cried, grabbing Bilbo’s hand and they leapt into Castle Bounce.

There was little or no way to stand steady, but Bilbo and Ori did their best to bounce like they had on the canopy. Castle Bounce was much less sturdy and they were flung about like they were jumping on a huge bed.

There was a shout and Boromir leapt off the steps in landed on his bum in the middle. Bilbo and Ori almost flew to the ceiling, shrieking with the rebound. Boromir scrambled away, rolling into valleys made by his own weight. More people leapt in and shrieked and yelled as they were bounced around and rolled every which way.

Being the smallest, Ori and Bilbo were tossed the highest but the elves were also flung about. Boromir, Aragorn and Theoden ended up rolling and struggling in a valley. Legolas tried to help them out but slid in also. Thorin quickly gathered Dwalin, Dain, Sculdis and the other dwarrow in and they bounced as hard as they could. The three men sailed upward yelling and politely landed on a very confused Glorfindel and knocked Bard and Thranduil into another valley with them. Fili and Kili tried to coordinate everyone but it was too difficult with people bouncing, rolling, and falling all over. Jani and Dis rolled into the boys and they went down in a heap, then Eowyn screamed as she and Arwen got their bottoms wedged between the floor and the wall.

Everyone staggered and fell trying to get them out, but this made the mess worse. Slowly and inexorably the rest of them were driven by the amount of bodies in one place, and ended up together in one valley struggling mindlessly, laughing, roaring and helpless!

Ori and Bilbo had been the last to fall and no amount of effort could get them out.

Ori heard laughter from outside.

“Aye, that’s the lot a’ them stuck!” someone shouted from outside. Then there was a weird popping noise and the rush of air. The floor deflated and they were left on the ground. Ori climbed off Kili and Fili and got unsteadily to his feet. The mass of bodies sorted themselves out.

“Come on, sweetie. Up you get.”

“I can’t. Theoden’s lying on my legs.”

“Sorry, King-Father!”

“Jani! Do something!”

“Like what, love? I can’t see anythin’ but our Rhonda’s behind.”

“Oh, do excuse me!”

“Wheehee!” Eowyn called from somewhere.

“Quite squirming, Addled One, I can’t get Sigrid out!”

“Tough tiddles, Bored Mouse!”

“Help me!” Arwen cried plaintively. “I’m at the bottom and I have to pee!”

This galvanized everyone to scramble to their feet. Arwen was rescued and she, Sigrid, and Tauriel rushed out in the direction one of the attendants pointed.

Once outside, Ori giggled some more and hugged Bilbo as he came out.

“I’m still a little dizzy,” he confessed.

“I’m still squashed!” Bilbo laughed in return.

“So, have we enjoyed ourselves?”
Jim came up, followed by Mavey and Fanny. Ori went and hugged Fanny.
“Jim!” cried Sculdis. “Yer a wretch!”
Jim looked delighted with this.
Thorin came forward with Dwalin.
“Jim, that was extraordinary. I’m amazed at what you and the guilds have created.”
“And I still have plenty of ideas, you majesty,” Jim bowed.
“Lad,” Dain said, throwing his arm about his queen. “If me Stonehelm was ready, I’d step down an’ retire here t’ make f’r yeh. There’s ‘n excellent amoun’ a’ thin’s t’ tinker with.”
“Aye, plenty t’ build,” Sculdis agreed, her eyes once again taking in the mechanism to the side.
“Oooo!” Mavey enthused. “Would you come on the road with us?”
“Nay, lass, but we’d be building f’r when yeh’d return. Our Stonehelm need’s t’ get his feet proper stuck in and settled b’fore we start talkin’ tha’ way f’r serious.”
“I would love to have both of you with us, Sculdis, Dain.” Thorin leaned in and knocked brows with both.
Ori bounced forward and hugged Dain.
“That would be wonderful, but if I were you, I wouldn’t say anything to Dori yet.”
“Mahal’s balls, lad!” Dain bellowed around laughter. “Never yeh fear! He’d be nailin’ our boots t’ th’ kitchen floor b’fore th’ next dawn.”
The three ladies returned, chattering with Ruelis, and Jim escorted them all to a far set of tables and chairs.
The chairs were pulled into a group and people sat, grateful that these chairs didn’t appear to be able to move under their own volition.
“Now, my friends,” Jim said with a grin, and started pouring out paper cups of ruby red wine, and passing them out. “Opinions, problems, suggestions?”
“That bastard with the ball and bowls took me for five gold,” Glorfindel bitched, “and I still can’t figure out how he did it.”
“Magic, my friend, maaaagic,” Jim poured a cup for Ruelis and one for himself. They raised them to the company, who raised theirs in return.
“To celebrations!” Ruelis said.
“To a fine group of good friends!” answered Thorin, smiling round at everyone.
Everyone was happy to drink to this.
Legolas looked down at himself, damp, wrinkled, and food stained.
“And for making me the messiest I’ve ever been in my entire life.”
The rest of the elves looked at themselves and at each other. All were in a similar state.
Lindir looked at him.
“Thank you, mellon Theoden. I think that exactly sums up what we look and feel like.”
Galadriel laughed and looked at the last bottle of lichen whiskey. She took a drink and passed it to her husband. There was just enough for each elf to have one last shot. Aragorn, Bard, and Theoden exchanged looks and chuckled.
“So?” Jim prompted.
“The swinging machine was wonderful!” Ori enthused.
“The acrobats far above were breath-taking,” Elrond put in.
“The evil clown was the funniest thing out!” Fili declared.
“Right, said Ruelis, “more acrobatics and more clowns.”
“Clowns doing acrobatics,” Dis suggested. “He was ever so funny.”
“Such wonderful games.” Sigrid added. “The prizes were so silly but just right!” “You could probably convince a few more people to sell within the fair itself,” Thorin pondered. “The food went well, but having the little ones here, you might do well with toys, supplies for games, and such.”
“Noted,” said Ruelis, pausing to refill the cups, Bilbo demurred, still nursing his first. Ori snickered, remembering Bilbo and the effect berry wine had on him. Ori had no such qualms. They were safe in Erebor and having a party.

“Any problems?” Jim asked.

“Glorfindel was sick in the drinking hole,” Boromir tattled with a grin.

“Mmm,” Jim opined. “Few more places with potable water with room to barf. Good to know, good to know.”

“Yes,” giggled Eowyn, “and maybe places to relieve oneself?”

“That’s easily accomplished,” Ruelis said. “The mountain is amazing and adaptable to almost any situation.”

“Excellent animals,” Aragorn added. “I’d never seen or heard of a geeraph before.”

“Food plants as well as flowers,” Jani put in. “All that stuff coming north with the trade route open will be good.”

Jim nodded and poured another round. Ori cuddled against Dwalin. He was now pleasantly muzzy and enjoying it.

“Here now,” Dain said, “I’m thinkin’ there ought t’ be a bi’ a’ th’ engineering guild devoted t’ making’ stuff f’r yeh lot. Me an’ me delicate jewel of a bride have some grand ideas.”

Thorin chuckled.

“You both can approach the guild heads yourselves. Mind, they may also insist you run that group.”

“We’ll hunt ’em up t’morrah.” Sculdis vowed.

The cups were filled again and the talk became varied as people reflected, or attempted to, through lichen whiskey and now wine. Ori looked around at his friends. He had so many now. He had gone on an adventure and now they were celebrating and everyone was having a wonderful time. Ori finished his latest cup and Dwalin refilled it and his own as the new bottle was passed about.

“Dwalin?” he said.

“Me love?”

“I’m going to give my Butter to Frodo. I think having you and Killer and the rest are going to be enough in our bed.”

“I’m thinkin’ yer righ’, love.”

“Dwalin?”

“Aye, love?”

“I think I’m getting drunk.”

“Then yer in fine company wi’ th’ res’ o’ us, me lovely darlin’.”

Ori hugged Dwalin’s arm and turned his blurry attention back to what was being said.

“The place with all the candy,” Theoden said, “was unbelievable. The taffy pulling machine! I had no idea such things could be contrived.”

“Those truffles,” murmured Dis.

“I’m hungry,” Kili announced.

“I’m positively ravenous!” Bilbo agreed, sitting up.

“My poor hobbit,” Thorin teased. “You can’t have had more than five meals today.”

“Very true, my dear dwarf,” laughed Bilbo. “My question, then, is what do you intend to do about it?”

Thorin tossed back his wine and rose.

“Ruelis, Jim, we all thank you and your performers for a wonderful time. Be in touch with the guilds for whatever improvements you’d like to make. You have my full approval.”

Jim and Ruelis bowed, grinning.

“My friends,” Thorin smiled around at the Company, “it’s time we availed ourselves of a sit-down dinner.”

There were cheers all round.

“Righ’,” Dwalin rose and offered his hand to Ori. “T’ th’ Moo an’ Cluck.”

“The what?” Haldir managed.
Meals, Merrymaking, and Meandering off to Bed.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And now since we fed you all that junk food last week, here’s a proper meal, although if you don’t eat meat, you’re going to have to wrestle Celeborn for the coleslaw. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Orras had set aside the private room for them, but they still had to make it through the main dining area, where they were received properly as heroes. It didn’t hurt that now they were almost as drunk as most of the patrons. Several dams banded together to tell Glorfindel he was a fine chunk of elf flesh and Lindir wept openly after receiving several offers of marriage from dwarrow and dams, who kept calling him Linda, thinking he was a maid.

“Thank you, thank you,” he repeated over and over. “Really, you are too kind, but I wasn’t on the quest. No, I only lent moral support and made sure the privies were clean.”

“Linda is with me,” Elrond bellowed at an unusual volume for him. Lindir raised an eyebrow and Elrond squared his shoulders, put a proprietary arm about Lindir, and strode to follow Thorin. Lindir grinned over his shoulder as he was swept on.

“Thank you all very much!” he called, waving with the delicacy of a debutante dam. Arwen and Eowyn, arms linked, walked behind them and giggled.

“My!” Arwen cried. “Isn’t Ada feeling ’manly’ tonight.”

“Let’s hope he doesn’t start spitting and scratching inappropriately,” said Eowyn, setting them both off in peals of laughter.

“Oi!” someone cried. “Oi! It’s Lord Ori!”

A knot of miners jumped up on their table and started chanting.

“O-ri! O-ri! O-ri!”

He waved, completely abashed, and turned his face into Dwalin’s side.

“Get me out of here, dear husband.”

“Righ’,” said Dwalin.

He picked Ori up, draped him over his shoulders like a hunting trophy and strode proudly through the cheering crowd.

“This isn’t what I meant,” Ori hissed.

“Sorry, yeh didn’ specify,” said Dwalin. “Too late now.”

“I am going to die of embarrassment.”

“Ain’t happened yet.”

Dain was not one to be deterred either. He jumped up on the nearest empty chair and roared,

“Three cheers f’r our Lord Ori an’ his Bullies. Champions a’ th’ Quest t’ Khazad-du’um!”

All the diners stood up and cheered, whistled and hollered. The cooking staff came through and joined in.

At Thorin’s signal, Orras passed out a round to the members of the Quest and everyone lucky enough to be there. They all drank a toast to the heroes on the king’s purse.

This achieved, the entire party was hustled into the back room.

Unlike before, the room had a massive long table for all and, as soon as everyone found seats, Orras and his staff started loading the board with food. This was the cue for everyone to pile up their plates with the sweet, sour, delicious barbecued meat, cool, milky coleslaw and chunks of buttered
They were all starting when Haldir drank off his flagon of ale and slammed it down on the table. Everyone looked at him.

“I think I ought to say a little word,” said Haldir, seeing he now held their attention.

It was obvious his eyes weren’t focussing, but he looked determined.

“Yes, Haldir?” Galadriel prompted.

“I think you’re all beautiful people, and I’m glad I know you. I’m delighted with my new dress trousers, and I do believe this is the best meal I’ve ever eaten.”

Which he then fell face first into, and began to snore.

Gimli motioned to Legolas, who lifted Haldir’s head. Gimli took the plate away. Bilbo brought over a pile of napkins and put it on the table, then Legolas, wiping off Haldir’s face, rested Haldir’s head back down gently upon it. Gimli poured the contents of Haldir’s barely touched plate onto his own. Gimli looked up as everyone stared.

“Wha’?” Gimli bellowed. “It ain’t li’e he’s gonna eat it.”

Ori found himself sitting between Fili and Dwalin, with Kili and Tauriel across from them. An idea percolated through his brain, something he meant to ask about, but was now too muzzy with his fourth ale to remember.

Something about…

Was it…

Oh!

Suddenly he was a bit more sober.

“Fili!”

“Huh?”

“Easterlings!”

“What about ‘em, Ori-mate?”

“Where did they come from?”

Fili raised an eyebrow.

“The east?”

“Besides that. How did they get here?”

“They walked.”

“Pardon?”

“No, really, Ori, they walked the entire bleeding way, right through the Orocarnis.”

Fili walked his fingers across the table, hopped them onto the edge of the plate and through the sauce to grab up another rib and tear off a chunk of meat.

Ori watched this process in fascination.

“Why?” he asked at length.

“Cult of Morgoth or some such, broke up when Mount Doom went splat.”

“Splat,” Kili agreed, nodding solemnly.

Ori flicked his gaze to Tauriel, who was perfectly composed, even though she wobbled slightly.

“Splat,” she agreed, then fell into a fit of giggles.

Kili gestured toward the east with his pork rib.

“Fi said there’s fifteen of ‘em, mostly women and badgers. They get points for herding all those badgers, you know.”

“They got here about an hour after you left on the quest,” said Fili.

“And no one told me?”

Kili shrugged.

“That’s how it is with Durins, Ori-mate. Everything happens at once.”

“It’s a rather important detail. You’d think someone would have gotten to it, since I’ve been back over-. Oh. I’ve only been back a little more than a day.”

“See,” said Kili. “Told you.”

Fili cast an empty rib bone into a low paper box on the table, looked askance at the bowl of coleslaw at his elbow, and took another chunk of meat from the platter.
“That was a bad scene, when they got here.”
Ori turned to Dwalin.
“Did you know about this?”

“Thorin tol’ me las’ nigh’, since it were a security thin’. Lads’re righ’, though. Easterlin’s didn’t know they were at Erebor. They walked righ’ int’ a patrol. Th’ dwarrow though’ we were bein’ invaded, the’ easterlin’s though’ they were goin’ t’ be executed.”

“What happened?” Ori asked, with rising alarm.

“Luckily, Arb had th’ sense t’ send a raven t’ Thorin, an’ Bilbo rode ou’ with him.”
Fili seemed to remember something that gave him a great deal of glee.

“Alright, spill it. I’m too drunk to be patient,” said Ori.

“It was brilliant, Ori-mate. Bilbo knows about five words of easterling, and one of them is this welcome/you’re safe/we won’t eat you-type of thing, about five miles long.” Then he seemed to lose his train of thought. “Did you know the easterlings don’t speak in sentences? Bilbo says it’s all an idea in one word and they just add syllables and endings on to fill it out. Imagine learning to speak that.”

“I’d still be a mute,” said Kili.

“But what happened?” Ori persisted.

“It worked,” said Fili.

“Saying ‘hello’ worked?”

“It’s not just ‘hello’.” The crown prince licked the sauce off the back of his wrist. “It’s this majick spell that means: If I break my hospitality oath, the sands will swallow me.”

“Bilbo knows how to say that?”

“Yep.”

“In easterling?”

“Yep.”

“Belladonna?”

Fili nodded.

“Yep.”

Oh, Ori could just imagine.

“Bilbo’s mother went to the Orocarnis, met and befriended members of the Cult of Morgoth and learned words in their language?” he surmised.

Kili looked to be struggling.

“I’m too drunk to follow all that, Ori-mate, but you’re usually right, so, yep.”

Bilbo, sitting on Thorin’s knee at the end of the table, hopped to his feet and came charging over.

“There’s more to it than that! Honestly, boys! My mother wasn’t some wizard easterling-charmer.” He pushed Fili and Ori’s plates apart and jumped up to sit on the table. “As it turns out, hobbits look like an ancient, pixieish spirit they worshiped from the time before Morgoth.” He crossed his ankles and swung his feet back and forth. “The spirit was short, round, and had big feet and pointed ears. It mainly protected children and women, and was vicious when its people were threatened.”

“Basically,” said Ori, “your mother.”

“Indeed. I’m not conversant in easterling, but at least it calmed everybody down. It calmed the easterlings, anyway.”

“What happened?”

“The masses of dwarrow acted like a million easterlings had come to plunder the mountain. Panic in the streets.”
Ori felt his head spin.

“Someone told them that?”

“They told each other that, Ori-mate,” said Fili. “There were fifteen of them, someone heard there were fifty, someone else assumed that meant fifty thousand and that this was just an advanced scouting party.”

“Oh Mahal! What did you do, Thorin?”
“I sent for Binni,” said Thorin, who, as usual, was not quite as drunk as everyone else. “Binni, Dis, and I brought Deneb and her older daughter all over under the mountain, then to Dale, where they took tea with the king and king-father and Mister Wandi fawned over them and gave them manicures and iklars.”

“Great Mahal! You weren’t attacked?”

Bilbo waved one impatient hand while reaching for a rib with the other.

“We brought Butter and Sugar just in case.”

“That bought us some time,” said Thorin. “Then, we were almost overcome by disaster.”

“After all that? What happened?”

“Dipfa,” said Bilbo.

Ori swallowed, aghast.

“She tried to clothe them.”

“Yes,” said Bilbo. “I honestly thought the poor people would be forced to flee. She danced all around them, attempting to drape fabric on them. Bujni rescued them by removing her. She didn’t seem to mind so much after he carried her off over his shoulder. Who knew he was so strong? Or so demonstrative?”

Ori eyed Dwalin, who was wearing a ‘who? me?’ expression, and batting his lashes.

“Imagine that,” said Ori. “But, the people in the Night Market didn’t seem bothered by them.”

“That’s because Dori came home, pregnant,” said Thorin.

“And spread a little Doriness far and wide,” Ori guessed. “One Bearer holds them at bay, the other charms them into making nice. By example, of course.”

“Of course,” said Bilbo.

“Pastries?” Ori prompted.

Thorin shook his head, his expression sad even under his smile.

“They arrived with nothing, just the clothes they were standing in. I offered them sanctuary, but Deneb insisted they would work to earn it. We had a long talk about what Deneb and her family could do.”

“Thankfully,” said Bilbo, “her westron is far better than my easterling.”

“And then,” said Thorin, “Granny Klak came home with a box of pastries from the Gondorian Bakery.”

Ori nodded.

“What do immigrants do when they arrive someplace new?”

“Exactly,” said Bilbo. “They eat as if food could take them home. Deneb’s Aunt Ara is a talented baker.”

“They had no money for the ingredients, so I bought them,” said Thorin. “I made sure they understood it was a long-term loan, not charity. I don’t care if they pay me back or not, but I wouldn’t tell them that. They use one of the kitchens at the Oakenshield Inn to produce the baked goods.”

“The what?” Ori cried as the Durins broke up laughing.

Fili said, “That’s what Mistress Dazla calls the old royal residence. The way things are going, it’s not far from the truth.”

“Beg pardon,” said Theoden, looking around, “but has anyone seen Eowyn and Boromir? They seem to be missing.”

Dis shrugged.

“They cleaned their plates like good badgers. They said they’d be back sooner or later.”

Arwen drained her tankard and reached for another rib.

“Surely you aren’t worried the two of them will do something unseemly,” she teased.

Theoden looked pained.

“Whenever those two start hatching a plan, it’s time to lock up your horses and hide the best ale. They’ve always been that way.”

Lindir yawned and leaned against Elrond’s shoulder.

“Falling asleep?” Elrond asked.
“Just resting my eyes,” said Lindir.
“Tha’s fuckin’ adorable,” said Dain.
“Thank you,” Elrond replied dryly. “We planned it especially for your entertainment.”
“How long’ve yeh bin rehearsin’?” Dain asked with a wink.
“How long’ve we?” Sculdis tweaked him.
Orras stuck his head around the door jamb.
“Ready f’r puddin’?”
“Yes!” Kili perked up immediately.
Most of the elves looked horrified, and even Thranduil shook his head, but the dwarrow were all on-point.
Orras and some assistants carried in several great platters piled high with balls of xocolatl frozen custard, mixed with chunks of fudge, ribbons of caramel, studded with marshmallows and sporting curls of spun sugar over the top, like pink, green, and blue streams. These were laid all along the table within easy reach for everyone.
“An’ spoons,” said Orras.
“Aw,” said Kili.
“No face-planting in the pudding, inudoy,” Dis chided lightly. “Save some for the rest of us.”
“If I must, amad,” he said, obviously much put-upon.
“You must, or you’ll be forced to arm-wrestle Lord Celeborn for the rest of the coleslaw.”
Celeborn looked up from the big bowl, fork in hand, and put a protective arm around his prize. He growled, or tried to, but it set him off snickering.
“Guid effort,” Gimli encouraged.
Arwen laughed, shocked.
“Grandfather!”
“What?” Celeborn replied. “I have claimed this coleslaw for the elves of Lórien and Greenwood. I should think you’d muster some elvish pride in support!”
“I’m supporting this spoon into this dessert,” said Arwen. “Grandmother isn’t the only one who can put on flesh. If I’m messy enough with it, maybe someone will mistake it for a beard on my chin.”
Aragorn sputtered into his own custard while Glorfindel clapped his hands and cried, “Here, here! That’s the spirit, m’lady!”
He picked up his own spoon and looked at it in dismay.
“Do you think they have larger ones?”
“Think of it as a challenge,” said Legolas. He looked down at his tunic. “My challenge is to find my mouth five times out of six.”
Thranduil sighed.
“I’ve quite given up on you, my darling fawn who can’t find his mouth. You’re regressing.”
Thorin’s eyes gleamed with mischief.
“That’s what happens when you catch a beard. Didn’t you know?”
“Alas, there were some unfortunate holes in my education. I suppose this is grounded in scientific fact?”
“I don’t know. I’ll have Bujni look into it.”
“Perhaps Marvyn, son of Kevyn has made commentary?”

At length, they stayed so long and ate and drank so much, they had to wait there while the streets were being cleaned. Most of the other patrons had left and the staff was cleaning tables and mopping the floor. Kili and Ori gamely offered to help but Orras shooed them off to stand at the far end near the entrance doors which were thrown wide open. The debris had been thrown out the door onto the street to wash away.
Thorin brought Bard to the street door to watch the water flow through, the rest milling about around them.
“Oh,” said Bard. “Yes, I can see why we want everyone off the streets. They’d be parboiled.”
“And they’re not even good eating,” said Thorin.
“Oh, I don’t know about that,” said Thranduil with a wicked grin.
Bard turned to him, incredulous.
“Sweetie, you’re very drunk.”
“I’m not drunk enough to forget that. In fact, you taste—”
“Thranduil!” Bard cried plaintively.
The king-father clicked his tongue.
“Spoil my fun. Wicked man.”
“Lord Ori!”
They turned as Orras bustled up to them, visibly upset.
Ori’s mind flew instantly to Dori and the pebbles.
“What’s happened, Master Orras?”
“Master Ursith is here, demandin’ t’ speak with yeh!”
“Oh,” said Ori, chuckling in relief. “Is that all? Where is he?”
Belatedly, he realized he should have looked afraid and clutched at Dwalin’s forearm, but it was too late now. Orras, the remaining customers in ear-shot and even Thorin’s guards stared at him.
“I’m a scribe,” Ori said with a shrug at them. “What possible threat am I to him or he to me?”
“Er… yer a scribe t’ th’ king,” suggested one of the cooks.
“I suppose I could write a letter to Thorin for him.” Ori offered.
Everyone looked at each other and went about their work again.
“He’s in me office, milord,” said Orras. “I don’ know how he go’ there, with th’ streets full a’ boiling water, but I only lef’ f’r a moment - I even locked th’ door behind me - an’ when I returned, he was sittin’ in me chair with his feet up on th’ desk.”
Ori clicked his tongue in disgust.
“That’s terribly rude! I’m so sorry! Did he say anything else?”
“No an’ I don’t know what t’ do. I don’t want t’ endanger yeh, bu’ if yeh leave it too long, he’ll come ou’ here lookin’ f’r yeh.”
“Tha’ would pu’ everyane off their beer,” Dwalin rumbled.
Thorin stepped in.
“Lord Ori, perhaps, as Ursith didn’t specify you should come alone, it would be best if you brought Captain Dwalin with you.”
“Yes, my king,” said Ori.
“A’ course, me king.”
Ori waited for Dwalin to walk in front of him, then followed. He figured it made him look more cautious, and helped him ignore some of staff still gawking. Also, he could watch Dwalin’s bum better from here.
Like everything else at the Moo and Cluck, the door was solid.
Dwalin banged on it, and Ori heard the echoes vibrating off the steel.
“Wha’d’yeh want?” Ursith snarled.
It would have come across threatening, if it didn’t sound like it was rising out of a tin can.
Dwalin shoved the door open wide.
“Evenin’, Master Ursith.”
“Why’e yeh here? I sent f’r th’ scribe.”
Ori followed Dwalin in and shut the door behind him.
In a quiet, reasonable voice, Ori offered, “You shithead, you’ve about scared Master Orras to death.”
Nori sighed and shook his head.
“I do have a rep—“
“A reputation to maintain.” Ori looked back and forth between his husband and brother. “The two of you! Honestly!”
“Listen, you little mole,” said Nori, “as soon as the streets’re empty, you need t’ come an’ take possession o’ your two western pals.”
“Which pals would these be?” Ori asked.
“Boromir and Eowyn! They’ve been cheatin’ the whole time they been at me card table. They about cleaned me out. I’m just lucky they was the only two left by the end.”
“Oh, mahumb,” said Ori, scrubbing his face with his hands. He was definitely sobering up, and quickly.
“You know what’ll happen if somebody catches on they cheated Ursith and got away wif it?”
“You’d have to kill Ursith off and replace him with someone worse,” said Ori.
“Ooo. There’s an idea,” said Nori. “Never fought o’ that.”
“Look, you let them win as a welcoming gesture and to show your approval of King Thorin. Maybe he’ll do you a ridiculous favor you can show off about. Will that do?”
“I like it,” enthused Nori.
“Righ’,” said Dwalin, “message delivered. Ge’ yerself gone b’fore I have t’ rough yeh up f’r threatenin’ me wee scribe terror.”
“I’m outa here,” said Nori, vanishing cleanly through the floor.
Ori rested his head on Dwalin’s chest.
“Let’s go and collect my sticky-fingered ‘pals’.”
“Then, home?” Dwalin asked, cuddling him close.
“I think we’re about at the end of the evening. I’m going, even if no one else is.”

Ori thought it miraculous that they found Boromir and Eowyn close to the scene of their latest crime. He was sure they would have wandered off by now, perhaps to purchase Durin IV’s penis. “Uncle!” Eowyn cried, brandishing a heavy purse. “Let’s go buy you one of those inflatable chairs!”
“Of course. I’ll use it to replace the throne,” said Theoden. “You realize, I’d never get Theodred out of it.”
“We’ll buy him one, too. A little one, for a king in training.”
Alas, the iKeyah had closed for the next couple of hours, and the group was forced to face the journey home.
“What did you buy, Omosuil?” Ori asked.
He and Dwalin found themselves walking with the elf and his lieutenant.
“I spent most of my pay on truffles,” announced Omosuil, clearly unrepentant.
“I’m very proud of you,” Ori said.
“Thank you.”
Ahead of them, Glorfindel had the unconscious Haldir over his shoulder. Elrond was torn between skipping with Lindir, who had got his second wind, or making Glorfindel promise to actually put Haldir to bed when they got back to Fundin House.
“In his own bed,” Elrond specified. “Kindly, do not leave him where he can be squashed, pickpocketed or otherwise besmirched. Or my mother-in-law will turn you into a toad.”
“She can’t do that,” Glorfindel scoffed. “Can she?”
“Do you really wish to find out?”
Thranduil, initially far ahead of them, walked slower and slower. By the time they reached the dancing square, he had stopped entirely, with his wrist draped over his forehead.
“Alas!” he cried. “I cannot go on! Leave me! Save yourselves!”
“You have to go on,” said Bard. “I don’t think you want Dain and Sculdis to carry you.”
Thranduil looked at him, momentarily startled, then,
“I want you to give me a piggyback ride.”
“What?”
“You’re certainly strong enough.”
“Seriously?”
“Just until we get to the stables and the elk can carry me the rest of the way.”
“You’ll look ridiculous.”
“I’m too drunk to care.”
“Fine. Ori, please sketch this. I want some sort of proof for our grandchildren.”

Sigrid called out, “Did you hear that, Fili? Da wants grandchildren! What can we do about that right now?”

“Run while he’s weighed down?” Fili suggested.

Happily, Bard was strong enough, and sober enough, not to lose his footing and send himself and Thranduil careening off into a chasm. Then Eowyn jumped onto Boromir’s back and it became a race.

Bard just managed to edge Boromir out, but Eowyn complained that Bard had an unfair advantage, since elves were so light.

“Not when they’re drunk asleep,” said Bard, happily letting Theoden take Thranduil from his back.

“He’s not asleep,” said Theoden. “His eyes are open.”

“He’s asleep all right,” said Bard. “Elves do that.”

“I never knew that!”

“Neither did I,” said Bard dryly. “I wish someone had explained it before I woke up next to him like that the first morning and thought he was dead.”

“Eru!”

“I imagined I’d killed my new husband before I’d even broken him in. I shouted, or gargled or something, and that woke him up, which made me scream.”

Ori winced.

“Sorry, Bard,” said Ori.

“You can’t think of everything, Ori.”

“That’s a big one to miss.”

Theoden held up the royal elf and looked worriedly from Thranduil to his elk.

“Is he likely to break his neck when he comes tumbling off that?”

“Let me get on first,” said Bard.

He turned to the elk and said something quietly in sindarin.

The elk sighed, and hunkered down on its knees to allow Bard up onto his back.

“Astride or sidesaddle?” Theoden asked, looking down at his unconscious burden.

“What’s ‘sidesaddle’?” Bard asked.

“Something he’d likely never live down.”

“Tempting,” said Bard, “but I need to be able to control the shift in weight.”

“Tha’s impressive,” said Dain as Bard called the animal to its feet. “Yeh couldn’ do tha’ las’ time we was here, our Bard.”

“I didn’t have hot and cold running water, either. Amazing what you can get used to, even at my age.”

Bard, with Theoden and Aragorn’s help, got Thranduil across Bard’s knees. The Father-King’s hair was hastily tied up with a couple of handkerchiefs.

Everyone mounted up rather slowly. Ori noted that someone had sent to Fundin House for Dori’s teacup. The elves were boosted into this and lolled inelegantly over the cushions, their mounts tied to the back. Boromir gave his horse’s reins to Eowyn and drove the teacup.

Ori needed help from Dwalin to get on Honda. She kept looking back at him over her shoulder and Ori could have sworn she was laughing at him.

They moved off quietly through the silent city, silent until the next lot of miners came up for dinner and the party in the Night Market would start again.

Celeborn hung dangerously over the edge of the cup and reminded Glorfindel that Haldir had to be safely put to bed.

Dain chuckled,

“Aye, lad, an’ extra points if he kin convince me Chopper t’ sleep in th’ same bed.”

Dwalin offered to pay Dain to do it.

Boromir looked over his shoulder at his inebriated cargo.

“Great Eru, I look like I’m collecting the bodies of plague victims.” He raised his voice to call,
“Bring out your dead! Bring out your dead!”

Lindir stirred and grumped, “We aren’t dead.”
“You’re not fooling anyone you know,” said Boromir. “You’ll be stone dead in a minute.”

They finally got back to Fundin House. It looked beautiful. There was light showing through the raven and bat bolt holes. Ori squirmed at the thought that Dori was waiting up for them.

After helping the sleepy stable boys tend the mounts, they all walked around to the receiving room door. Bard carried Thranduil across his shoulders and Aragorn cradled his lady. Thorin opened one door quietly and ushered Bilbo in. Theoden and Boromir helped Eowyn steady the rest of the drunk elves as they followed. Kili assisted Tauriel to weave her way through the entryway, while Fili and Sigrid giggled at them. Theoden and Dwalin helped Dubb get his weighted wheeled basket over the threshold.

Once everyone was in, Thorin closed and bolted the door. Ori sighed. It was lovely to be home after such a wonderful evening.

“There you all are,” Dori said, sweeping in from the sitting room to frown at them. She wore a gold, quilted wrapper that trailed behind, making Dori look like she was gliding. Ori was glad Dori had kept her voice lowered with the lateness of the hour. Her clothes were quite loud enough.

“Can you read by the light of that robe, Dori?”

“Don’t be rude, pet! Honestly, I…. What have you done to my dearest Galadriel?”

“Darling Dori!” Galadriel managed and stumbled over to collapse in a heap on the Bearer. Dori stood firm and patted her back as she lay, now snoring, over Dori’s shoulder.

“She’s drunk,” Dwalin stated.
“Elves don’t… How much wine did you give her?”
“Very little, Dori,” said Bard, setting Thranduil down and holding the sleeping elf against his side. “It seems that only a shot of lichen whiskey is enough to get an elf soused.”

“Lichen whiskey?” Dori repeated. “Ugh, that stuff tastes like dirt.”

“Lichen whiskey and mahml are going to be the official food of the Last Housely Home,” announced Elrond, swaying dangerously. Boromir grabbed him.

“Then I shan’t be visiting you any time soon,” Dori vowed and began to shoo the guests upstairs.

Sculdis and Dain assisted Glorfindel getting Haldir up and, giggleing, disappeared around the corner. Ori thought he could hear Chopper oinking.

Balin, dressed in a red plaid flannel nightshirt with matching night cap, herded the rest of them into the sitting room. Bilbo landed on the couch and lay there, giggling a little. Thorin came around to the front of it and Bilbo held out his arms.

“Carry me. I’ve fainted dead away, my delicious dwarf.”

“Or something,” Thorin teased, then turned to Balin. “Where are my faunts?”

“Snug in their beds, laddie. Looks t’ be time f’r yerself t’ be headin’ that way.”

“No problems?”

Balin smiled fondly.

“All been as good as gold, me king.”

Ori imagined that they had been indulged to the fullest of Dori and Balin’s efforts. All were probably dead asleep after too much romping, stories, and sugar. Dubb steered the wheeled basket to the center of the sitting room, bowed jauntily to his king and the Bearer, and Dwalin went with him to the front door.

As they went, Ori heard Dwalin said, “Sure we can’ temp’ yeh int’ stayin’, Master Dubb?”

“Riiigggggghhh,” said Dubb. “Tha’s a ‘no’. I’ve had me dose a’ weird f’r t’day. Besides, I’m re-”

“Retired, aye.”

Dori returned and Thorin handed her a well wrapped package and murmured something. Dori took it, giggling, and went through to the kitchen.

Lavender Gamgee arrived and looked them over as Boromir, Dwalin, and Eowyn came through from the receiving room, snickering.

“Haldir’s all tucked in,” giggled Eowyn, “with Chopper snuggled up to him.”
Thorin and Balin snorted.
“I need a drink,” Boromir sighed, throwing himself on a chair.
Eowyn laughed outright.
“Thought you were sobering up?”
“After putting a boar in an elf’s bed, I’m not sure I want to be sober when he wakes up.”
“You,” Lavender addressed the First March Warden with a stern look, “will have a cup of chamomile tea.”
Boromir grinned, but bowed his head, saying contritely, “Yes, ma’am.”
Lavender smirked and swished out.
“Well, that’s you caught,” Eowyn teased. “Hope your daddy likes her.”
Boromir winked.
“Miss Gamgee would throw Father off the parapet if he annoyed her.” “She would, too!” agreed Bilbo, suddenly alert and sitting up.
“Just like her mother,” Thorin put in.
“She so cute,” Boromir said to no one in particular.
“Caught like a moth in a fly trap plant,” Ori observed to Eowyn.
“She’ll be havin’ him f’r breakfas’,” Dwalin added.
“In every one of his dreams,” Eowyn leaned over the chair back to rattle her knuckles back and forth across his head.
“Piss off,” Boromir grouched.
Lavender came back in with a steaming mug and gave it to Boromir. Dori brought in a tray with a large teapot and cups. They all seated themselves and took tea, which Ori was grateful for.
“Well?” Dori wanted to know.
“It was wonderful,” Ori said simply.
“We went to the wine merchant almost first thing,” Eowyn reported, “and the elves bought all the lichen whiskey right off. I think it’ll be delivered tomorrow morning.”
“In a few hours then,” Balin commented dryly.
“There will be a number of deliveries,” Thorin added. “There will be a few people as well.”
Dori raised a brow.
“And will there be anyone besides me awake to greet them?”
“That remains to be seen,” said Thorin. “Supposedly, elves don’t suffer hangovers. But, that too remains to be seen.”
Ori went to Dubb’s basket and guddled about. Soon he found what he was looking for.
“What’s all this?” Dori asked coming to look. Ori handed Dori the boxes of candy and pastry he had bought in the Alley of Sweetmeats.
“Oh, my!” Dori was delighted and popped a piece of nataj into her mouth. “Mmm, delicious! Deneb is so talented.”
“This one is truffles,” Ori said, handing out another box. Dori sampled one and gave a blissful sigh. Ori found the box of fudge he’d got for Dwalin and himself.
“And that is?” Dori teased.
“Mine,” Ori grinned, then opened it and gave Dori a piece.
“Lovely,” Dori enthused then giggled. “Oh well, I didn’t think I’d be getting much sleep this night after all. I—”
Dori stared as Ori began handing her coconuts.
“Why did you buy all these?”
“We didn’t,” Ori chuckled. “We all won them. And this is my Butter. Dwalin won her, and this is Bilbo’s Sugar. He won that. Aragorn won this raven for Arwen and Dwalin got this bear for Eowyn.”
Kili came over and peered in.
“Ori-mate, you find my coffee cream candy?”
Ori dug out another box. Kili looked in it.
“Nope, these are popped corn with caramel.”
Ori retrieved several more and Dori stared as Fili and Sigrid helped to go through, Fili’s sack of purchases disappearing discreetly the moment it surfaced, but there were still piles of things in the carriage.

There were funnel cakes, donuts, the sausages on sticks, more candy, some of which was claimed as Bard and Theoden came through. Gimli and Legolas arrived again with their parents and Romy. Gimli found their candy. He passed a box of truffles to Gloin and Gridr, who were delighted and giggled over the two coconuts they received with it. Fili found his mother’s plush turtle and tossed it to her.

Ori found his scroll of music and backed away from the basket to watch. He glanced over and saw that Lavender had perched on the arm of Boromir’s chair. He was smiling up at her and handed over a small wrapped packet. She took it with a lifted eyebrow, then squeaked as she removed a truffle. She bit into it and closed her eyes in delight. She ate half then popped the rest in Boromir’s mouth. They sat talking quietly and gazing into each other’s eyes.

Ori looked over at Bilbo, who had seen the whole thing, and grinned at Ori. Ori laughed to himself and then felt Dwalin’s arm drift around his waist.

“Aren’t Boromir and Lavender sweet?” Ori murmured up at his husband.

“Ne’er as swee’ as yeh,” Dwalin whispered back, kissing one ear, then the other.

“I’m exhausted,” Ori admitted and turned to hug Dwalin.

“Then it’s bedtime f’r us,” Dwalin replied.

Dwalin drew him to the couch where Thorin was sitting with Bilbo’s feet on his lap, Sugar lolling on his boots, and Butter with her head on the couch’s arm, receiving ear rubs.

“We’re off,” Dwalin told his king.

“Yes, I’m going in a minute,” Thorin replied and then turned to Ori. “Sleep well.”

“Thank you,” Ori said as Bilbo waved to them. “Good night to you both.”

Ori turned to the hallway and Dwalin snapped his fingers at Killer, who bounded after them like a loose mine cart. As they walked down the hall to their bedroom Ori looked at the warg pup.

“He’s growing like pigweed, as Bard would say,” Ori observed.

“Aye,” Dwalin agreed, proudly, ruffling the ears that now reached his waist. “He’s a grand wee thin’.” They entered the bedroom and Quartz winged in, closely followed by Garnet. Kihshassa squeaked from her pole and climbed right side up to look at them.

“You look messy,” Quartz said, landing on Ori’s shoulder and tweaking his ear.

Ori laughed.

“I suppose I’m too messy to give you dried bacon cooked in maple syrup then?”

“Said you were messy. Didn’t say it was a bad thing,” Quartz argued. “Just need to preen a little.”

Ori pulled the small packet he’d bought in the stall next to the truffles and fed the raven a piece.

“Dead and sweet,” Quartz managed around a piece. “Dead sweet, this is.”

Garnet rubbed her head on Dwalin’s head, then leaned toward Ori with her beak open. Ori obligingly popped a piece in. Dwalin told Killer to sit. The warg did promptly and Dwalin gave a piece to Killer, who swallowed it instantly.

“Yeh didn’ even bother tastin’ it!” Dwalin teased. “F’r all yeh care, I could’a fed yeh a sock.”

“He’d eat it,” Ori giggled.

“I’ll jus’ nick some a’ yers,” Dwalin teased. “Then, as none a ‘em match, I’ll be fashionable.”

Ori stuffed the bacon packet back in his pocket and pushed at Dwalin, who laughed and pushed back. They had an enjoyable tussle and ended up with Ori flat on his back on the bed.

Ori leaned up to kiss Dwalin’s nose.

“Let me up, I’ve got to get out of this jumpsuit.”

“Nah, jus’ gonna tear i’ off yeh.”

“Dipfa will kill you, if my special jumpsuit gets torn.”

“Bugger,” Dwalin muttered and got up.

Ori undid the fasteners and struggled out of the top part. He was very tired. He tried to kick off his boots but Dwalin kneel and pulled the boots off and tossed the socks aside as well.

“Thank you,” Ori managed around a huge yawn. “I’m so sleepy…”

Ori opened his eyes and noticed Dwalin was now in his old faded pink skivvies.

“Oh, you’re wearing my favorites.”

“Always f’r yeh, me love.”

Ori pulled off his under tunic and crawled up to get under the covers.

“My buffalo, come to bed. I can’t keep my eyes open and I want to kiss you.”

Dwalin climbed in beside him as Ori flopped down on the pillow.

“We have the best bed in the whole world,” Ori murmured and slid an arm about Dwalin’s neck.
Domesticity is Not Pretty…but It Can Be Funny.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The Night Market is over, but the fun goes on, and on, and on… Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori woke to the sounds of snores and the feeling of being delightfully trapped. He blinked. Dwalin was spooned behind him, with Killer draped across both their waists. Kihshassa had flopped on their feet, Nori-Pori was lying across the tops of his and Dwalin’s heads on the pillow, Mask was curled next to Ori’s tummy, Garnet slept on Killer’s back, and Quartz was under Ori’s chin. Ori grinned. The whole family was asleep but him. Ori looked down at Mask. He and Nori-Pori were almost full grown. Nori-Pori was a long string bean of a cat and Mask was turning into a large ball of fur.

Ori was about to doze off when he heard a sniffing noise. He opened his eyes again and, at the corner, he could just see the end of Fanny’s trunk reaching through the window casement. The full length of the trunk arrived and sniffed about the room. It touched the wardrobes and bureaus. There was a long sniff, then it found the pitcher and basin. The trunk went inside the pitcher and the sniffing echoed in the porcelain. Ori tried hard not to giggle. Quartz ruffled his feathers and stood up, blinking at Ori, then turned at the noise. Ori grabbed Quartz’s beak before the raven squawked.

Killer snored louder. Quartz looked reproachfully at Ori, who took his hand away and stroked the feathers in appeasement. Fanny’s trunk came out of the pitcher and rose high in the air.

Garnet stirred and looked.

“Fanny,” Ori murmured under his breath.

The trunk’s end swiveled and a rush of air came through it. Ori shook slightly in silent laughter. The air came again, this time accompanied by a low ‘hoo-ing’ noise.

The cats’ and the bat’s heads shot up. Killer snorted, rolled off them, and curled next to Dwalin’s back. Dwalin made a waking up noise and tightened his grip around Ori. Ori felt a whisker-y kiss pressed to his ear.

“I kin feel yeh gigglin’, love,” Dwalin rumbled in his ear.

Fanny hoo-ed again a little louder. Dwalin rolled over to look.

“Fuck me,” he muttered.

“I can’t,” Ori teased. “We’re covered in animals.”

Dwalin snickered.

“There’s ‘n excuse I ain’t heard b’fore.”

It took a little time to free themselves of furry bodies, but they were finally able to get up. Ori trotted over and patted Fanny’s trunk.

“We’re up, Fanny. I’ll meet you in a bit on the patio.”

The trunk withdrew and Ori grabbed Dwalin’s hand as his husband led the way to the bathroom.

They emerged, washed and dressed, to a line of two cats, a bat, and Killer, tail wagging madly.

“What lovely children we have,” Ori grinned up at Dwalin, who snickered.

“Aye, guid thin’ they canna talk.”

Ori leaned over, grasping Killer’s head and said in a silly, growly voice, “I’d say ‘I love you, adad’.”
“Great,” Dwalin laughed. “If he star’s askin’ t’ borrow me war hammers, that’s righ’ out.”
“We could tie one to my tail, adad!” Ori tried, nuzzling the puppy’s head. Killer wiggled and slobbered to lick Ori’s face.
“C’mon, yeh rascal,” Dwalin said with a swat to Ori’s ass. “I’m thinkin yer needin’ food t’ straigh’en yer head out.”
Ori giggled and hugged Killer, then took Dwalin’s hand. Killer bounced up and put his forepaws on Dwalin’s shoulders and licked his face.
“Blaaaagh!” Dwalin snarled, rubbing Killer’s ear. “Git down, yeh numpty. I washed me own face just fine. Don’ need yeh re-doin’ it! Sit!”
Killer sat obediently and looked lovingly up at Dwalin, tail sweeping the floor. Dwalin smiled and rubbed the pup’s ear again.
“Sittin’ room,” Dwalin ordered.
Killer took off at a run and the cats tore after him. Kihshassa climbed Ori and settled herself as a short cloak on his back and they went through.
They arrived to Dori scolding Killer, who was racing around the long table at high speed. Ori grabbed an apple from the table, called Killer to follow, went through the breakfast parlor and out to the patio. Killer scamped after and dove into some long grass. Ori gave the apple to Fanny and hugged her leg. Kihshassa took flight and swooped over to where the brambles grew next to the rock wall, the bushes now covered in berries.
Ori heard the faunts and Tilda playing in the meadow over near Bag End East.
When he came back in, he saw that only Thorin, Bilbo, Balin and Dori were sitting at the table, so he went and hugged Dori.
“Now, pet, you sit right down and have some breakfast. After that you can go outside and play with your doggie.”
“My doggie?” Ori said, releasing Dori and looking down at her with a cocked eyebrow. “Go outside and play with my doggie?”
“Oh,” Dori flushed. “You know, I mean… I do have badgers coming, pet. I’m getting into practice.”
“Of course,” Ori teased. “Can’t have you falling behind.”
“Here.” Dori pushed a plate at him piled with fried ham and a large serving of egg bake. “You need to eat.”
Ori giggled, planted a wet kiss on top of Dori’s head, and went to sit with Dwalin.
Thorin’s eyes twinkled at him and Ori grinned at Bilbo, who was staunchly not laughing.
“Anythin’ happenin’ yet?” Dwalin questioned his king.
“Nothing thus far,” Thorin replied, finishing his last mouthful of ham. “But time will tell.”
“Why, our Thorin,” cried Dori, “whatever are you hinting at? Are there going to be more guests coming?”
Thorin spread marmalade on his toast and shot a mischievous smile at Dori.
“As far as I’m aware, Honored Bearer, we need only expect four cases of lichen whiskey, an artist who specializes in nudes, the owner of Smeg II and Wee Mac, the miniature pony, and, if Elrond guessed correctly, an enormous bottle of marbles, and, if Theoden guessed correctly, a rooster. If there are more, I have not been informed.”
“A rooster?” Dori’s eyes widened considerably.
“Yes,” Thorin confirmed. “A rather fetching one with black feathers, a red wattle, gray legs, and the most elegant pouf of black feathers obscuring its crown. I dare say, the veritable king of fowl.”
“Laddie, yeh makin’ tha up?” Balin asked.
“Who wouldn’t want a royal cock?” Bilbo wondered idly.
Dori looked at Balin, then they both turned to Thorin.
“I used to ask myself that question every day,” said Thorin cheekily, “before we met.”
“Flatterer,” Bilbo teased
“To answer your question, Balin, indeed I am not,” Thorin replied, finishing his toast and thanking Bilbo for refilling his tea cup. “We all saw it. I wouldn’t recommend asking any of the elves for confirmation as they were drunk.”

Mistress Dazla came in and gave Dori a significant look. Dori excused herself and followed the housekeeper out to the receiving room. Balin regarded Thorin, who had helped himself to another slice of toast.

“Yer f’r serious, lad?”

“I am.”

They all heard Dori cry, “Oh, for Mahal’s sake!”

Thorin dropped his napkin on the table and went through, Butter and Sugar at his heels. Ori popped after him to watch.

In the receiving room stood the brewer with a large dolly. Four big crates were piled on it. Dori was in a slight huff, the brewer wearing a huge grin and Mistress Dazla was giggling. The brewer saw Thorin and bowed low.

“Good morning, Master Brewer,” Thorin greeted him, offering his arm. “The lichen whiskey, I presume?”

“Good morning, your majesty.” The brewer looked askance at the wargs, but seeing them fawning over Thorin, persevered. “Yes, all four as requested, majesty.”

“Thank you for coming so promptly,” Thorin smiled, amused. “Will it keep better here or somewhere cool?”

“Cool, majesty.”

Thorin turned to Mistress Dazla, who had recovered her poise.

“Is there room in the larder?”

“Certainly, my king. If you’ll kindly follow me, master?”

Ori went back to his seat and Mistress Dazla led the master with his dolly through to the kitchen. When he returned in a few minutes with the dolly empty, Thorin offered him a fat purse and Bilbo offered him breakfast. The brewer took the purse with a bow and politely demurred to join the breakfast crowd, though he looked tempted, then Mistress Dazla showed him out.

Ori giggled in spite of himself and Dwalin speared up more ham slices with a fork and dumped half of them on Ori’s plate. Thorin took his seat again.

“Thus it begins.”

“Wha’ yeh goin’ t’ bet’s comin’ next?” Dwalin asked.

“Me,” said Eowyn at the door. She went around the table to greet Dori with a kiss.

“Oh aye, lass?” said Balin, “an’ who delivered yeh?”

“My mother’s midwife, silly dwarf,” she teased, kissing his cheek.

“Mark that one f’r th’ lass,” Balin conceded, patting her cheek. “Where’s yer poor idad?”

“He’s right here,” said Theoden as he entered with Theodred. Following his niece’s example, he went to Dori, saluted her cheek and shook hands with Balin and Thorin and bowed to Bilbo.

“Do sit down, all of you,” Bilbo said. “You must be starving.”

Theo nodded as Dori released him and Balin finished patting his back.

Theoden parked himself in the chair opposite Ori and Dwalin, and Eowyn and Theo sat on either side of him. Balin loaded their plates with ham while Dori added bake. Mistress Dazla came through with pilsner glasses and Agrib followed with a tapped keg.

“So what did you all see last night?” Theo wanted to know as his father and cousin tucked in.

“Theoden,” Bilbo said, by way of an answer, “Theo really must see the fair.”

Theoden chuckled.

“Only if the Honored Bearer doesn’t mind us cluttering up the household a day or so longer.”

“Of course not!” Dori cried. “We all adore having you here, no matter how you arrive. What a pity dear Eomer and dear Arivett couldn’t come with you.”

“I have yet to meet Arivett,” Theoden commented.

“Exactly,” Dori pursued. “What a nice place this house would be for you all to meet and get to know one another.”

“Erebor does serve as neutral ground for the other rulers, if the bickering gets out of hand.” Thorin told Bilbo.
“It ain’t likely t’ be tha’ middle a’ th’ nigh’ stand off between Gheir an’ Hild,” Dwalin commented.

Theoden laughed but Eowyn and Theodred looked puzzled.

“Remind me to tell the two of you about that sometime,” their uncle said.

Balin rolled his eyes.

“Nonsense,” Dori insisted. “Eomer and Arivett are in love.”

“Mornin’,” mumbled Bain as he trailed in.

“There you are!” Dori cooed and took up a plate to fill. “Come here and I’ll make you a breakfast. I’m sure your tummy must be quite empty!”

“Thanks, Dori,” Bain brightened at the mention of food. He carried his full plate over and sat beside Theo.

“Dear Theoden,” Dori said, fixing the horse king with an accusing eye. “What is this our Thorin has been telling me about a rooster?”

Theoden sputtered in his ale, recovered, and burst out laughing.

“Dori,” cried Eowyn, “it’s just the prettiest thing.”

“I may have won a rooster,” Theoden corrected. “We don’t know yet.”

Theo stared at his father.

“How can you win a rooster? Did you play cards or something?”

“No,” Eowyn butted in. “It was one of those ‘guess the weight and you win’ games.”

“Oh.” Theo paused then, “Da’s good at those.”

“We’ll just have to wait and see,” Theoden closed the matter.

“Are you going to buy your uncle an inflatable throne?” Bilbo asked Eowyn, apropos of nothing.

“How do you inflate a throne?” Bain asked.

Bilbo polished off his cup of tea.

“Carefully, if King Ulfr is anything to go by.”

“He didn’t inflate his throne,” said Thorin, refilling Bilbo’s cup. “He blew it up.”

“Very dwarfy of him, I’m sure,” said Bilbo.

This was being thoroughly discussed as Sigrid, Fili, and Boromir walked in.

“Blessed Bearer,” Boromir threw himself on his knees next to Dori and kissed her hands. “I have been following my nose to that ham and bake since I woke up.”

“Silly boy,” Dori scolded, highly pleased.

She withdrew her hands, made him a plate, and shoved a slice of toast in his mouth. He managed a grateful noise and went to Dwalin’s side and sat down, chewing. Theoden kindly passed him a glass of ale. Sigrid kissed Dori and Fili accepted plates for the pair of them.

“Did you win the rooster?” Sigrid wanted to know.

“No word yet,” Eowyn told her.

The contents of the Groinuil residence came in and greetings were exchanged and food dispensed. Romy went to the food bowls near the fireplace and finished what was left. Sugar and Butter lolled behind Thorin’s chair, full and asleep.

“Where are the puppies?” Eowyn asked.

“Romping in the meadow at the moment,” said Bilbo, “learning about why one does not bother the rams, or the ponies for that matter.”

“Is that safe?” Eowyn asked. “Aren’t the faunts back there?”

“Furh’nk is keeping watch,” said Bilbo.

“The pups don’t need their mother?” asked Theodred, looking at Romy, who was looking lovingly at Theo’s breakfast plate.

“They’re weaned,” said Thorin. “Apparently, they only get fed for a few weeks, and then they have to fend for themselves. Or in this case, find the food bowl in Bag End East for themselves.”

“Are you planning on breeding them?” Theodred asked, apparently trying to push Romy off by the power of his will alone.

Romy wasn’t buying it.

“We have to decide that, and soon,” said Thorin. “I’m aware that not everyone in the two “Idad Stan’ll hate that!” said Quartz, fluttering to rest on Ori’s shoulder and tweaking an ear.
“Where have you been?” Ori asked.
“Errr, well…”
“Well?” Ori prompted.

Then Garnet flew in and hopped to a stop at Dwalin’s plate, but instead of digging in, she made eyes at Quartz.
“He-llo, Quartz,” she cooed.
“Hullo, Garnet,” the raven replied, ducking his head beneath his wing, under the pretense of preening.
“Hail the conquering hero,” Ori whispered at him.
“Shu’ up,” Quartz replied.

Lavender came in with Frodo, Sam, and Tilda, their cheeks rosy from the sunshine and their hair windswept.
“Second breakfast,” Lavender announced.
“Yay!” the faunts and Tilda cried in unison and ran toward the table.
“Ahem,” said Lavender.

The younglings bumped to an abrupt halt and bowed to the Company.
“Good morning,” they chorused, though in a rather singsongy way that obviously told Lavender they were humoring her.

“Fine,” she said with a sigh. “Barbarians. What will I do with you?”
“Feed us,” said Frodo.
“Silly me,” said Lavender.

Boromir rose and pulled out her chair for her.
“Thank you,” she said simply as she sat.

“Blatant fav’ritism, that is,” Nori grumped.

Dain arrived with Sculdis and they shouted greetings to all. Dain gave Dori a hearty kiss on the cheek and a hug which almost knocked Dori out of her chair. They seated themselves and Theoden began asking about the machines they’d seen the night before.

Baluchistan stirred from his place in Sculdis’ hood, but she merely fed him tidbits of ham over her shoulder and they all heard munching and an occasional ’Nummy!” from him. Ori hoped Sculdis washed her hood out thoroughly after this, but then he reflected that the raven would likely leave not a morsel of food, only a mattress-worth of loose feathers.

Bard, Thranduil, Galadriel, and Celeborn wandered in, followed by Aragorn and Arwen, and the other elves trailed after, except for Haldir. No one really expected him much before noon. The elves greeted everyone and were delighted to receive great helpings of ham and bake from Dori and began to eat as if there could be no sickness from drink at all.
“Bloody elves,” said Nori.
“I should like to announce,” said Dori, “there are four cases of liquid dirt in my larder.”
“Ah, the lichen whiskey arrived,” said Celeborn. “Excellent!”
“I suppose someone had to think so,” said Dori. “As long as it’s leaving with you, I have no qualms about storing it for you.”
“You are so good, as always, dear Dori,” cooed Galadriel.
Perhaps there was some sign of drink after all, Ori thought. Though, in blithe spirits, she was even more pale and ethereal than ever, and not quite solid around the edges.
“Auntie,” Eowyn said, “are you … glowing more than usual?”
Galadriel looked startled and bent her head to examine herself.
“You are,” Celeborn stated.
Elrond said, “I can’t remember you glowing like that before.”
“How odd,” Galadriel murmured. “I don’t feel like I’m going to explode in the least.”
“You’re not making a hissing noise either,” Kili observed around a mouthful of bake. “You usually hear a hissing noise before something explodes.”
“That’s very true,” corroborated Fili.
Galadriel raised her head, her eyes shining, and with a smile of delight.
“Oh,” said Galadriel. “I’m pregnant.”
Celeborn and Kelli slowly turned their heads to gape at her. In Kelli’s case, it could have been because her eyes had literally just sparkled, but Celeborn was truly struck.
“You’re what? Dearest?”
“No, really! It’s just like with Celebrian.”
He let out a whoop of joy, which startled everyone, and hauled her into his lap to cuddle epically.
The room rang with calls of congratulations and Dori bustled over to give her a kiss.
“We’ll be pregnant together!” Dori cried. “When do you think you’ll be due?”
“About a year and a half,” said Galadriel.
“We’ll be pregnant together for a little while,” Dori amended.
“I should write to my parents, I suppose.” Galadriel said idly, snuggling in her husband’s lap while he rained down kisses on her.
“Do,” he encouraged. “Perhaps they will come for a visit as they did when Celebrian was born.”
“That would be lovely. We can bring them to Erebor and Dale for a visit. I want them to meet all my dear friends.”
“Of course you must, my dear!” Dori cried. “They will be very welcome at Fundin house. Perhaps we’ll have a little party.”
Balin caught Ori’s eye and shrugged helplessly.
Galadriel paused, frowning, then laughed out, “So that’s what Woudini meant. I’m glowingly pregnant and my parents will visit us! I’m not going to explode at all. He’s so esoteric!”
Ori thought this was odd, coming from her, but he held his piece.
Gimli frowned up at Legolas.
“What’s ‘esoteric’ mean, then?”
“I think it means he’s full of shit,” Legolas replied. “But Ori could probably give you a proper definition.”
“Nah, I li’e yer’s jus’ fine.”
Bombur and Erda’s raven, Cookie, arrived with a letter, which Bofur read at the table, squawked and snorted with glee.
“I never! But apparently, they do,” say Bofur.
“What’s doin’, me dear?” Nori asked.
“Bombur and Erda send their congrats to our Dori an’ Balin on their expectationin’. Erda’s pregnant with her fifteenth pebble.”
“Well!” Dori cried. “I’ve been upstaged!”
Balin patted her hand.
“There’s no catchin’ our Erda, though, mind, she should stop tryin’ t’ populate th’ entire dwarven world by herself. No need anymore.”
“How very fecund we’ve all become,” Dori giggled.
“Yavanna is blessing everyone in sight,” Bilbo said, amused.
“Oh!” Dori stopped then looked over at Thranduil. “Dearest Thrandy. I think three is enough and adopting three more at your age. I hope you are taking your tea.”
“Every morning, dear Dori,” Thranduil smiled, blinking innocently.
Bard started to laugh, checked, then seemed to think better of saying anything at the moment.
Thranduil gave him a side glance and said, “Not going to happen, dear.”
“Thank you,” said Bard, visibly deflating.
Haldir entered, his arm around Chopper.
“Dain,” said Haldir, “I wish to announce that Chopper and I are deeply in love and getting married.”
Chopper oinked and looked up at Haldir tenderly.
Dain jumped to his feet and flung himself at Haldir,
“Son!” he shouted and seized the elf about the hips and hoisted him, off the floor.
“Adad!” Haldir replied rapturously, laughing as Dain hopped about, jostling him.
Sculdis pretended to burst into noisy tears, waking Baluchistan from his post-ham roost in her hood.
“This is th’ happiest day a’ me life!” she cried.
“Wha’ th’ fuck?” Baluchistan demanded fuzzily.
“Haldir and Chopper are getting married,” said Quartz.
“Bugger th’ f’r a lark,” said Baluchistan. “Me nephew’s marryin’ an elf?”
“Now, now,” said Gloin, carefully patting his head. “This is no time f’r jealousy.”
Tilda looked askance and turned to Sigrid.
“Is Mister Haldir really marrying a pig?”
“Think how convenient it’ll be on market days, Til,” said Sigrid. “Chopper can carry all the shopping home.”
“True,” said Tilda.
Bard said to Thranduil, “Did you not have a… er… thing with Haldir?”
“Once or twice out of desperation.”
“Now we see where his desperation took him.”
“I think I’m being maligned,” said Thranduil.
Tilda asked, “If they have children, will they be elflets or pelfs?”
“Pelves,” Thranduil corrected absently. Then he looked startled and asked Celeborn. “What did I just say?”
“I was rather wondering that myself,” said Celeborn. He turned to his captain. “Haldir, are you sober?”
“Absolutely, my lord. Fruit soda water all night.”
“Horse shit,” Celeborn muttered.
Haldir grinned nervously.
“I believe I must be sober now, my lord. Waking with a battle boar in your bed will do that to one.” He looked down at Chopper. “And such a fine specimen you are, my love.”
Chopper demurred, butted Haldir gently in the hip and trotted over to where Miss Larit was putting down a bowl of mashed yams and maple syrup on the floor by Dain’s chair.
“He’s always bin a wee bi’ fickle,” said Dain.
He took Haldir by the elbow and led him to the table.
“Is he actually craft-wed and simply toying with my affections?” Haldir asked.
“Bi’ a’ both, prob’ly. Ah, well, we’ll have t’ postpone th’ weddin’s all. How’s yer tum?”
“Fine, actually. My head is a little muzzy, but it’s not pounding.”
“Bloody elves,” said Dain admiringly.
“Only,” said Haldir wistfully, “I’m sorry I didn’t get to eat that fine dinner last night.”
Dori patted his shoulder.
“They saved you a plate, our Diri. Would you like it for breakfast?”

Haldir’s eyes lit up.

“Yes, please, milady!”

Dwalin muttered to Ori, “He looks li’e Killer when yeh offer ‘im a treat.”

“Let’s hope he chews it instead of just gulping it down,” said Ori.

“Aye, he will. It’s no’ a sock.”

Mistress Dazla, no doubt hearing Haldir’s voice, stuck her head around the door jam of the kitchen and raised a brow at Dori, who smiled. Mistress Dazla bobbed away, then entered with a covered dish, and a chilled bowl heaped with coleslaw. She set these down before Haldir and removed the lid. Haldir sniffed eagerly at the steaming pile of ribs before him and thanked her profusely. She chuckled and patted his shoulder. Boromir passed him the bread and butter.

Having cleared their plates, the faunts and Tilda were free to romp with the animals in the meadow after breakfast. Boromir and Lavender went out with them.

Bain and Theodred remained at table with the younger set, indulging in thirds.

Mistress Dazla entered with a wry smile.

“Beg pardon, your majesty, but a Master Kyur has arrived.”

“Ah, the artist,” said Thorin. “Excellent. Please send him in.”

The housekeeper seemed to be rolling words through her head, amused and somewhat at a loss.

“Perhaps, your majesty, it might be a kindly and kingly gesture to meet him in the receiving room. He has several parcels, and it would be a struggle to get them all through the door at once.”

Ori looked at Dwalin and Dwalin shrugged.

“We weren’t that drunk,” said Ori. “Was the picture we bought actually a ten by ten foot painting or something?”

Bilbo polished off his tea, stood and brushed himself off.

“I recall that the one Thorin and I bought was nicely and heavily framed.”

Sigrid said to Fili, “Ours was only about five by five inches.”

Bard whipped around the stare at her. Thranduil turned him forward again.

“Remember, grown-ups, dear.”

Dain said to Sculdis, “Ah, tha’s th’ feller with our pretty pi’ture.”

“Among other things,” said Thorin.

“You, too, nadad?” Dori gave Dain the stink eye. “As if you needed any suggestions.”

Master Kyur looked startled at seeing the large number of dwarrow coming to meet him. Given that he had several largish, awkward parcels with him, perhaps he shouldn’t have been, Ori thought.

The artist bowed to the king and Company and Ori chirped, “Good morning!”

“Good morning, Lord Ori. I hope I’m not interrupting breakfast.”

“I believe we’ve all reached an elegant sufficiency,” said Ori. “Anyone who hasn’t, is still stuffing their faces.”

“I seem to have been visited last night by just about everyone in your party. If this was your doing, I thank you for it.”

“I didn’t actually say anything,” said Ori. “Your art spoke for itself.”

“And rather loudly,” said Theoden, looking askance at all the parcels.

“Beg pardon, m’lord, I don’t think we spoke,” said Kyur.

“We didn’t,” said Theoden distractedly. “While many of the others visited you, I believe King Bard and I were off looking at the oddities at Master Axsin’s. Those contortionists! Eru forbid!”

“And the fellow who stuffs metal spikes up his nose!” Kyur exclaimed.

“He must have a permanent headache,” Theoden agreed. “Er, Theoden, king of Rohan, at your service.”

Kyur’s jaw dropped, but he got hold of himself quickly.

“Kyur, son of Myur, at yours and your families.”

“So, Master Kyur, are these all nudes and such?”

“Yes, your majesty.” Kyur tilted his head at Theoden, obviously taking his measure. “It is a treasured subject among dwarrow, but I understand it may not be to everyone’s tastes.”
Mistress Dazla saved him having to grope for further conversation. "Beg pardon, Theoden King," she said, "but there's a gentleman here, asking for you. I believe he has a chicken coop."

"Ah! I won my rooster! Excellent!" Theoden said, bowing and excusing himself. Dwalin leaned in and said to Ori, "Saved by th' cock."

"Hush, you."

"Oh, I believe that's mine," said Thranduil, picking up a square parcel wrapped in linen. "That is yours, m'lord," Kyur affirmed.

Bard stared at him. "You bought something?"

"While you and Theoden were off being wholesome. Now, don't look at me that way. I'm not about to leave them on the breakfast table where the fawns might see them."

"Them?"

"The prints seemed to be part of a series. Some dam was off on a grand adventure."

Thranduil unwrapped and flipped through them as Bard looked on. "I didn't know you were interested in-. Oh. I suppose beauty is where you find it."

"And you must admit, she is quite beautiful."

"She is," said Bard. "Perhaps we can examine them more thoroughly at home."

"Yes, after we've inflated the sofa," said Thranduil wryly.

"You remember buying the sofa?"

"Yes, and I remember you promising we wouldn't have it in the bedroom."

"I'm nothing if not well-trained," said Bard. "I don't suppose you remember the piggy-back ride?"

"I gave you a piggy-back ride?" Thranduil cried, horrified.

"No, I gave you one, sweetie, you insisted."

"I most certainly did not!"

"I have witnesses," said Bard, "and Ori drew a picture of it for our grandchildren."

Thranduil whipped his head around to fix Ori with his eye.

Ori took out the pocket notebook and waved it merrily. "I'll give you six hundred gold for that picture," said Thranduil.

"I'm not strong enough to avoid being flattened like lembas, but thank you anyway."

Once everything was sorted, Kyur was sent away with a packet of the rolls that had just come from the oven.

"Here we are," said Theoden loudly and Theodred and Eowyn yipped in delight. The rooster crowed as Theoden lifted him out of the basket.

The faunts appeared, intrigued by the sound of a rooster inside. "Why's Mister Theoden got a rooster?" asked Wee Sam.

Romy bounced in, tail wagging, and looked eagerly at Gimli and Legolas. "No," they chorused. The tail slowed slightly then Romy bent in a playful stance. The rooster squalled and flapped lightly to gain Theoden's shoulder. It crowed again.

"What are you going to name him?" Tilda asked.

"Cockrill, after the captain in the Shire story!" Eowyn announced.

She grinned at the shouts of laughter that accompanied this. Bilbo bowed to her. There was another knock at the door. Aragorn politely answered it, then gave a laugh and threw the door open.

“Lord Elrond!” he hooted, “you have callers.”

Everyone turned as four dwarrow dwarhandled a small cart into the room and yanked off a tarp, revealing a giant bottle of marbles. Everyone chuckled, Argrib arrived with glasses of ale for the tradesmen to refresh themselves and Elrond went to examine the bottle.

“This is most impressive,” he said wonderingly. “But what has it to do with me?”

“Yeh won tha’, m’lord,” said one of the dwarrow, handing him the slip of paper from the night before. “Yeh guessed how many was in there.”

“Elbereth!” Elrond gasped. “How close did I come?”

“Yeh guessed it exactly, m’lord,” said the dwarf. “No ane’s ever done tha’ b’fore!”

“Yes, well, I suppose you have to be drunk to do it,” said Elrond. “The question is, what do I do with them?”

Ori piped up, as he sketched maniacally, “You said something about retiling your bathroom.”

“Oh, excellent idea. Apparently, drunk me is a genius.”

“Lovely,” said Lindir with a sigh. “I’ll find someone I despise to install them.”

Elrond gave him a mischievous look.

“The Lord of Privy Perfection isn’t going to do it himself?”

“I’m still trying to catalog all those meeting minutes,” said Lindir. “And I thought elves couldn’t shut up.”

The bottle was set in a corner of the receiving room, the dwarrow who had brought it, enjoyed their round of ale, and then went off, quite happy to be relieved of their burden.

There was a brief pause while Elrond examined the bottle, looked at his guess, frowned and scratched his head. The faunts gathered around to press their noses to the glass.

The door sounded with another knock. Cockrill crowed and Romy barked.

Theoden pushed in front of Aragorn and pulled the door open. Mistress Dazla giggled and opened the other door and pushed the door stop against it, while Aragorn followed suit on the first door.

“Aha!” Theoden said in obvious pleasure. “Come in, come in! I’m glad you’re here.”

Ori recognized the man from the tent with Smeg II in it. Wee Mac bounced in first and gave a whinny. The result was instant.

“Oh! It’s a tiny pony!” Dori cried.

Wee Mac trotted over immediately and bounded around her like a colt.

“What a darling little lad you are, yesss. Yes, you are!” Dori cooed, delighted, patting Wee Mac and scratching his little mane.

The man looked on, grinning.

“He likes any female who’s going to drop a foal. He thinks they’re all his.”

Balin gave Wee Mac a mock stern look.

“No such luck, laddie.”

Meanwhile, Dori continued to lose her mind.

“Who’s a lovely pony? Yes, you are! Yes, you are! Oh! Just look at your little tail! It’s so flappy!”

Ori said to Bilbo, “Next she’ll be telling it to go outside and play with the doggies.”

The faunts and Tilda made excited noises and hurried over. Wee Mac thoroughly enjoyed their attention. Bain and Theodred came through to see.

“That’s the tiniest horse…” Theo began, staring.

“He’s a miniature horse,” Theoden smiled. “His name is Wee Mac and his owner, Mister Przewalski, has stopped by to put me in touch with the breeder, who specializes in them.”

“Are you going to breed tiny horses, Da?” Theo gasped as Bain continued to goggle at Wee Mac.

“I haven’t decided,” Theoden grinned at his son, “but I think having at least one is my duty as the King of Rohan.”

“Oh, yes!” Eowyn agreed.
Dain regarded the pony with a chuckle, but Chopper turned up his nose. “Now, don’ be li’e tha’, our Chopper,” Dain reproved him. “He’s no’ comin’ home wi’ us, so it’s up t’ yeh t’ be th’ bigger pig abou’ it.”

Chopper sighed and consented to go over and touch noses with Wee Mac. “See,” said Dain, “No’ so bad.”

Mister Przewalski regarded the two animals, who eyed and sniffed each other curiously. “I’m sure they’d get on famous with a little time,” he said.

“I know th’ feelin’, lad,” Dain commiserated.

“Good morning?” said the voice of the gentleman from the tent with all the plants, as he peered in uncertainly at the door.

“Mister Brassica,” cried Bard. “Here you are!”

The man grinned and entered carrying a large tray, on this was the orchid Elrond and Lindir had purchased, the plant with the fish Celeborn had chosen and a small fly trap plant.

Celeborn and Galadriel hurried over to relieve him of the plant with the fish. Lindir, in close pursuit, to get his hands on the orchid. They spent a brief time in conversation about the care of them. Celeborn picked up the fly trap, looked it over, sighed, and promised the merchant he would see it safely put into Glorfindel’s hands.

Mister Przewalski shook hands with Theoden and Theodred, then took leave of Dori, bowing over her hand. Dori flattered him on his gift for raising such a lovely creature at Wee Mac and embraced the tiny horse once more. Ori caught a glance of Thorin putting a purse into Mister Przewalski’s hand and saying something about tolerance. Frodo, Sam and Tilda all hugged Wee Mac and waved as the miniature horse and his daddy went out.

“Someone else is coming,” Sam announced.

Ori went to look out, then waved to Darnub, who was strolling up the path, his hands in his pockets, whistling. Darnub quickened his pace, giving a jaunty wave and came in.

“Hello,” Ori greeted him.

Darnub peered about.

“Udad here?”

“No, you’re safe,” Ori teased.

Darnub looked relieved and embarrassed.

“Don’t get me wrong,” Darnub confided. “Udad’s grand, but he don’t like seein’ me with my hands stuffed in me pockets. Says it makes me look disreputable.”

“Nah, nah, nah,” Nori assured him, patting Darnub on the shoulder. “Makes you look ready t’ pull money outa your pocket an’ spend.”

“Aye, well,” Darnub lifted a brow at Nori. “I’ll be leaving’ yeh t’ tell ‘im tha’.”

“What may we do for you?” Ori asked politely.

“There’s tha’ Darnub, now!” bellowed Sculdis and trotted over.

Darnub bowed and, taking off his back pack, handed out of it a small, square packet of something made of sap and dyed a charming shade of pink. “Here yeh are, our dumplin’,” Sculdis called, waving it above her head.

Dori scooted over and took the pink square wonderingly.

“Thank you! What is it?”

“Jus’ you wai’, our dumplin’,” crowed Dain, “Where’d yeh like a nice comfy chair?”

“Oh my!” Dori said looking about. “I… I suppose in the sitting room.”

“Sittin’ room, it is,” Sculdis declared. “Come along wi’ us, our Darnub.”

Dain and Sculdis bustled poor Darnub off to the sitting room, Bard and Thranduil in pursuit.

A battle-pitched shout of ‘good morning’ from the top of the stair announced that Glorfindel was ready for the day and Margr and Vi on either side of him looked in fine fettle. They bounced down the stairs and greeted everyone.

“Now, pet,” Vi nabbed Ori. “Where’s our Dori then?”
“Through in the sitting room,” Ori said eagerly and was pleased to see them bustle off to the other room. There were shrieks of greeting and delight at the chair. The elves, Glorfindel, and Bard went back up the stairs to put away their purchases, except for Elrond’s bottle which remained in the corner.

“One more comin’ along,” Dwalin said to Thorin.

“Good,” said Thorin. He smiled, putting an arm about Bilbo, who hugged him, grinning.

“That should be the gentleman supplying your ‘going away’ presents for everyone.”

As the gentleman entered, Ori recognized him as the truffle maker.

“Ah, good morning, Master Uberaceae,” Thorin greeted him.

The dwarf smiled and bowed low.

“You majesty, good morning. Professor, your lordship.”

“Were you able to complete my order or have you brought me a partial shipment?” Thorin asked, looking regal yet approachable.

Mister Uberaceae grinned and removed the rectangular basket from his back and opened it to display several uniform gold paper boxes tied with a silk ribbon of Durin blue. Mister Uberaceae opened one to display a tempting arrangement of about two dozen truffles of all varieties.

“Perfect,” Thorin approved. “If you don’t mind, Master Uberaceae, please take them through to Bag End East. Bilbo, ghivashele?”

“Come right this way, Master Uberaceae,” Bilbo said and led the way through.

“Just so you know, professor, they should be kept cool, but in no way should be put in a cold cache or come into contact with ice.”

“Good to know,” said Bilbo. “I’m much obliged.”

After breakfast, the visitors went their own ways for a while, intending to return at lunch. Thorin and Dwalin carried off their parcel to Bag End East.

“I should have known you’d find Kyur,” Ori teased Bilbo.

“Thorin and I went just after you and Dwalin left. The artist mentioned you had been. He asked me if I knew any hobbits who might want to pose for him.”

“Do you?”

“Yes, actually, but they all live in Tuckborough. Bit of a jaunt for a casual drop-in.”

Dori, who had apparently been waiting for them to come back out, sashayed over and said, “Really, pet! Must you indulge in such things?”

“How do you know what we indulged in, Ori’s Dori?” he asked with a grin.

“I can well imagine, given your husband is a dwarf of the world. You’re not putting that up in the sitting room.”

“Dori, you don’t even know what it is! It’s a moot point anyway, it’s going on the wall in our bedroom.”

“Suppose I don’t care for the subject matter?”

“Then, I guess you could stay out of our bedroom, couldn’t you.”

Dori heaved a sigh of the much put-upon.

“Go raise badgers!” she muttered primly, and flounced off.

“At least I don’t have a mirror over my bed!” Ori called after.

“Mouthy badger,” said Bilbo with a grin.

“I’m so ashamed,” said Ori with a happy nod.
Supper, Scampering, and a Surprise.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The dwarrow have guests, and you know what that means: Even more food than usual! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori heard laughter long before he reached the sitting room. He was ready for some tea. He felt he had made a good deal of progress organizing his notes that afternoon.

Cemnesta and Wandi had arrived, and so had all the once-elves from Zark’s mine.

The only ones who didn’t look happy were Erris - and Haldir, who sat off by himself, seemingly reading a book, but actually looking over at the group from beneath his brows. Whenever Wandi looked his way, Haldir seemed very much interested in his book.

The book was a livestock manual in khuzdul entitled ‘Tips on Breeding’.

Ori doubted Haldir would be amused by the irony, even if he could read khuzdul, which Ori was sure he could not, as the book was upside down.

Wandi turned to say something to Cemnesta, and Haldir’s gaze drifted over the top of his book again.

Ori found this fascinating, especially given Haldir’s history with Wandi’s honored sire.

The conversation, in sindarin, tended toward the catching up of the once-elves on the doings of the past age, and attempting to tease Erris out of her gloom.

“But, we’re going to die, don’t you understand?” Erris pleaded. “We’ve lost our immortality.”

Dree snorted and toss back the contents of his cup. “We just spent the past few thousand years at the bottom of a bog. We weren’t getting much out of it anyway.”

Ori heard Dori puttering about in the kitchen and went through. The counters were piled high with food, including a huge platter of xocolātl chunk cookies on the surface behind her.

“Dori?”

“Yes, pet?” said Dori, as she and Binni de-stemmed what looked like about a hundred cave mushrooms.

“The once-elves and Haldir, Cemnesta, and Wandi are out in the sitting room, unsupervised.”

“Yes, pet.”

“And Haldir is trying very hard to pretend he isn’t looking at Mister Wandi.”

Dori didn’t look up, but she grinned. “Yes, pet.”

“I should have known it wouldn’t escape your notice.”

“Nothing ever does, pet. Nori, if you touch even one cookie, I’ll cut your fingers off.”

The insubstantial hand jutting up through the counter froze. Nori cursed and the hand withdrew.

“So, you have a plan?” Ori asked.

“Naturally. It may be a little difficult to maneuver, as we’re having a barbecue on the patio, but I will arrange for them to sit somewhere close together.”

“And then you won’t let them escape, will you.”

Binni cackled and Dori looked offended.

“Of course they won’t escape, pet. I haven’t lost my touch!”

“I have every faith in you,” said Ori.
He went through to the patio. Honda whinnied excitedly at him and Ori met the pony part way for mane scratches and general silliness. From where he stood, Ori could see the entire length of the patio, where the family and many of the guests had already gathered for lunch, indulging in fruit salad and cold meat sandwiches and all good things.

Dwalin and Balin were trying to light the cookfire, so it would be ready to roast that evening’s dinner, but mostly they squabbled about the proper way to do it. A grill sat to the side, waiting to be put over a wide bed of short flames.

“Yer worse than an old woman,” Dwalin groused as Balin fiddled with a small starter fire.

“Th’ point is t’ cook th’ food, no’ char it t’ bricks, yeh maniac,” said Balin. “Slow an’ low.”

“Why d’yeh talk abou’ yersel’ tha’ way?” Dwalin cracked.

“Funny dwarf. Yer way, yeh’ll char th’ food an’ lose yer eyebrows again!”

“An’ yer way, we’ll be eatin’ some time in th’ next age. Look.”

Dwalin picked up a bucket of fuel and the word ‘Don’t!’ was not even out of Ori’s mouth before the warrior doused the fire and it exploded into a fireball bigger than Fanny.

Theoden stepped out onto the patio and admonished him.

“That will never do for a beacon. It needs to be set up higher on the mountain and be much larger.”

“We ain’t signalin’ Gondor,” said Dwalin. “We’re cookin’ dinner.”

“With a fire that size? Are you insane?”

Balin looked smug and Dwalin disgusted.

“Fine!” Dwalin grumbled. “Yeh two ‘experts’ ‘r in charge a’ makin’ th’ cookfire. We’ll eat in another decade ‘r so. Mahal, Yavanna, an’ Durin, wha’ kin yeh do?”

He stalked off toward the other side of the patio, where Bilbo, Thorin, and Fanny supervised the tapped keg and a vat of fruit soda water. At their feet, the faunts, Tilda and some young easterling children were cut throat and out for marble-playing mayhem. A very elderly easterling man sat on one of the receiving room chairs, next to Bilbo, bolt upright and looking around himself quite excitedly, as if he had no idea how he’d come to this pretty pass.

Fanny kept patting first his left shoulder, then his right, with her trunk, as if teasing him, and he laughed delightedly every time.

The old man turned and said something to Bilbo, who smiled encouragingly.

In the back of his mind, Ori heard Durin say, "He thinks he's fallen int' a wakin' dream, li'e his folk always tell abou'. Tha's some importan' goin's on if yer easterlin'."

"He looks thrilled," Ori murmured.

"Tha's some importan' goin's on if yer easterlin'."

"He doesn’t seem afraid at all. Is he unhinged?"

"Nah, he believes our Bilbo’s there t’ protect him.”

“Does Bilbo know that?”

Durin chuckled.

“No.”

“Wouldn’t Yavanna tell him?”

“No’ necessarily. His job’s diff’ren’ from yers.”

“Am I allowed to tell Bilbo? Will a tree fall on me or something?”

“Nah. Well, mebbe, bu’ Da’d bring yeh back.”

“What a relief,” Ori sassed, walking across the patio.

“Ah, Ori,” said Bilbo, “please come and let me introduce you to this gentleman.”

Bilbo stood and put his hand on Ori’s forearm.

“Rigel-chuh, this is Ori of Fundin. Called ‘Ori’. Ori, this is Rigel-chuh, that is, the Honored Rigel.”

Ori smiled in what he hoped was a warm manner and bowed.

“Pleased to meet you, Rigel-chuh.”

The old man’s mouth bent into a gape-toothed smile and he nodded with great civility, then chuckled. He reached out a gnarled hand as if to indicate Ori’s face, then pulled it back toward his own. He was lighter-skinned than the other easterlings Ori had seen, and his skin was dotted with freckles.

“Oh! We match!” said Ori.

Rigel wore many silver rings attached to his nostrils and septum and together they looked almost like a mustache. Ori thought it quite fetching.

“Westron?” Ori tried, raising an inquiring brow. Rigel-chuh just smiled and looked at Bilbo.

“No,” Bilbo nodded to Rigel-chuh. “He doesn’t speak it, but he does understand introductions and the like.”

The smallest child toddled up to the old easterling, pulling on the wrap he wore, which hung from his waist to his ankles like a long kilt. He had very little body hair, but an impressive collection of scars.

He turned to speak to the child, who pointed to the oliphaunt.

Rigel lifted the girl on his lap with some effort, and Fanny snaked her trunk around the child’s waist, setting her off in giggles.

“Bilbo,” said Ori, “Durin says this gentleman expects you to protect him.”

“I suspected as much,” said Bilbo. “Luckily, I’m a spirit with many minions to do my bidding.”

“I’d like to go and sit with my husband. Is that going to cause trouble?”

“No. He knows Thorin and I are together.”

“And he isn’t upset?”

“I think he simply believes the world he’s arrived in is upside down, so it’s to be expected.”

Ori sat close to Dwalin, who put an arm around him and kissed him.

“How ‘r yeh keepin’, love? Been a busy few days.”

“Actually, it’s not any busier than I expected,” said Ori, grinning.

He took out his sketchbook and graphite wand and idly drew images of the badgers at play, of Fanny and the tot, of Rigel sitting close to Bilbo, smiling like the sun.

Gimli and Legolas burst out of the breakfast parlor doors, with Romy bounding out after them.

“Speaking of the unexpected,” said Thorin.

The elf and the dwarf threw a ball back and forth over Romy’s head and he leapt mightily, trying to catch it. Then Legolas purposely threw the ball far over Gimli’s head and Romy went after it, whipping excited slobber everywhere.

The young ones all watched this, the easterling children chattering. They seemed to be saying the word ‘tiavli’ over and over.

Ori raised a brow at Bilbo.

“It means ‘elf’,” Bilbo explained. “Well, actually it means ‘demon’, but apparently demons aren’t all they’re cracked up to be.”

Butter rolled over on Rigel’s feet and Sugar rested a chin on his knee like a big numpty, looking for ear scratches. Rigel happily patted both, beaming down on them and talking gently as though to children.

Balin and Theoden were busy piling coals on the fire which caught and glazed beneath. Even with the mountain breezes, it was in no danger of going out.

Dwalin snorted and Balin sent him a dirty look, making Theoden snicker.

“Do you and Balin always go on at each other about fires?” Ori teased, looking up. Dwalin grinned down at him.

“Aye, love, every chance we ge’. Which is why I always have th’ propellent ready before we even ge’ star’ed.”

Ori giggled and snuggled closer.

“It’ll take a bit t’ ge’ goin’ so we’ll be eaten’ dinner in a couple a’ hours or so,” Dwalin told him, satisfied. Ori smiled, tucked himself a little more firmly into Dwalins side and went back to sketching.

After some time, Binni came out on the patio and nodded to Lavender, who began gathering the badgers.
“Come on,” Frodo called to the others.
“What are you going, Frodo?” Ori asked, as the little herd bounded onto the patio.
“To take a nap!”

Not at all what Ori expected.
Wee Sam cried, “Mister Bilbo, an’ Mister Boromir, an’ Lavender are taking us to the fun fair this evening, Mister Ori!”

“Ah. I see,” said Ori. “Very wise of you to shore up all your energy.”
Thorin looked up at Boromir with a grin.
“The guards are at your disposal, but, by all means, call for the city patrol if you need rescuing.”

“With Professor Baggins there? I have no fear,” said Boromir. “But, just in case, we’ve conscripted two of our finest to assist us.”

Boromir grinned at Bain and Theodred.
The youths looked suitably horrified.
Boromir laughed.

“Not to worry, boys,” he said. “I just need you to meet me by the eighth bell at the Fun House to mop up and carry the whole crew back home.”

“We can do that,” said Bain.
Theodred nodded furiously.
Theoden approached his son with a raised brow.
“You will stay within the fair itself, won’t you, Theo?”
The prince tried to bury a look of exasperation. He really made a valiant effort.
“Yes, Da.”
“Excellent.”
“You’re going, too, Bilbo?” Ori asked.
“Yes, the toddler will stay here with Rigel-chuh, but Deneb said her other little ones could go, provided I was there.”

“You’re taking the easterling children to the Fun House?”
“The oldest one. I think the younger ones will spend a great deal of time in the Castle Bounce. Those are not nightmares for which I want to be held accountable.”
“I suppose Deneb’s oldest daughter is working?”
“Unfortunately, yes, but we’ll be sure to bring her home a treat.”
“Better bring a cart for your ill-gotten gains,” said Ori mischievously.
Boromir laughed and said, “We have Master Dubb’s. Hopefully he won’t mind we’re borrowing it. Are you coming along, Addled-One?”

Eowyn snorted and linked arms with Arwen and Sigrid, Tauriel grinning at Sigrid’s other side.
“We’re having a bit of a hen party. You go and see how married life suits you.”

He made a face at her and she returned it, but his face lapsed into glee at the faunts flooding inside, heading for Bag End East.

The meat was done and the other things all ready and piled on the table inside the breakfast parlor when the badgers bounded in, fresh from their naps, and dressed in miniature jumpsuits of different bright colors.

“Where did those come from?” Ori asked.

Bilbo grinned.
“I commissioned them from Dipfa. They’re loose-fitting, so they would be sure to fit, and even the easterling children will get a little wear out of them.”
Tilda’s was turquoise, with special silver piping, “‘Cos I’m the oldest,” she explained.
Eowyn was not so sure.
“How will they relieve themselves without having to get undressed?”

“See the front leg seams?” said Bilbo.
“Yes, I thought that was rather odd.”
“They unfasten that way.”
“Oh! Of course, they wouldn’t unfasten behind because the faunts’ll probably be scooting about on their bums.”

“And they’re easier for the faunts themselves to reach. Dipfa was hoping they could give them a go and Lavender could let her know if the design needs improvement.”

Lavender gave what Ori would only describe as an efficient nod, as if acknowledging her marching orders, and turned her attention to dishing up food for the chattering little ones.

Wandi and Cemnesta filled their plates and Cemnesta sat near his father and Wandi went and sat with Haldir to share one of the deck chairs. Ori though Wandi looked as though he had decided his prey was suitably trapped. Haldir looked as though he had just received a Yule present.

Ori leaned his back against the house wall. He was very content to sit and eat and watch with his Dwalin beside him.

Erris had cheered up a good deal since talking with her once-kind, and was now busily shoveling food in her mouth.

Ori was amused that the once-elves had very quickly adjusted to eating without getting most of their food stuck in their beards.

Dain and Sculdis had partially deflated Dori’s chair, brought it out and re-inflated it. Dori and Balin had somehow managed to shove themselves into it and were feeding each other from one plate. Ori tried not to laugh when he wondered how they would get out of it.

Most people had chosen to sit on the grass before the patio, Fanny was sneaking fruit and tomatoes every now and then, which made all the badgers giggle.

There was mutton, chicken, and mushrooms from the grill, bowls of different salads, cheeses and breads of all kinds. Ori enjoyed a mouthful of cold cooked wheat with peas, berries, bits of bacon, and herbs. He had been told it was a salad, but it wasn’t like any he had seen before. Dwalin gnawed what was left of chicken leg as most of the meat had ended up in Killer’s belly. Killer snored on Dwalin’s boot.

Ori noticed that all the wargs were in a similar state.

Butter and Sugar snored at Bilbo and Thorin’s feet. Romy was on his side, flat on the grass asleep. Legolas and Gimli were talking and using the warg as a pillow. The badgers stood in a group before Lavender, who was brushing crumbs off them and wiping the faces that needed wiping. Boromir herded the boys off to the bathroom in Fundin House, Everyone could hear him being encouraging.

“Great Eru! No, put your jumpsuit back on! What’s Mister Rigel going to say to me if you run off to the Fun Fair in your skivvies! There we are. Well done, lad!”

Aragorn and Arwen looked at each other and giggled.

Lavender checked over the girls and took them in after Boromir returned.

Ori heard Lavender say, “I don’t care if you don’t have to go, you’re going to try.”

Soon all the little ones were assembled in the receiving room and Lavender and Boromir herded the younglings out the door, down the steps and up into the largest of the Durin carriages. A few of the adults had come to see the party off.

Thorin gave Bilbo a hand into the carriage.

Bard called up to Bain and Tilda, “Have fun. Behave yourselves.”

The siblings looked at each other, then Bard, and chorused, “Yes, Da!”

“Cheeky brats,” Bard muttered.

Rigel limped out into the courtyard, leaning on his stick, to admonish the young easterlings. To Ori it sounded like:

“Have fun! Behave yourselves!”

And an answering chorus of ‘Yes, Da!” punctuated by mad giggling.

Rigel caught Bard’s eye as he turned back toward the house. They sighed in tandem and shook their heads as they went in.

It started out as a quieter evening than Ori expected.

Master Kir and Master Minta arrived, and after Rigel-chuh adjusted to the idea of a giant ball of hair that spoke, the two settled down to a game of chess. The game wasn’t played exactly the same by easterlings and dwarrow, and they muttered at each other on occasion, but then simply adjusted and went on.

Ori thought maybe it was better that they didn’t understand each other. They seemed to get on quite well that way.

The easterlings didn’t drink ale or wine, but they appreciated good tea, and iced tea seemed to be a novelty. Kir drank ale and between them, they decimated the remainder of the xocolātl cookies.

The dams and women had gone off to the hot springs, leaving most of the males to play cards, or chat. Theoden quickly showed that he was a superior card player, and unlike his niece, he didn’t have to cheat. Oin and Gloin were livid they were barely keeping up with a man, and, since they were playing for xocolatl-covered coffee beans, there was quite a bit at stake. Nori walked around the table looking at everyone’s cards and snorting rudely. It was all he could do as he had been told he was not allowed to play.

Ori had thought to disappear for a while this evening, to try to get some work done, as he had to return to the library in a few days, but that didn’t feel polite, with all their friends visiting.

He decided he should simply give up on splendid isolation and brought his notes out to his desk in the sitting room.

Before settling he peeked out through the breakfast parlor. The elves and Gimli remained out on the patio, enjoying the night and idly roasting more mushrooms over the coals of the cookfire. At Dori’s suggestion, Wandi tried out new styles for Haldir’s hair while Mellon lay on his back close by, snoring, and Romy watched the dog of Dale in fascination.

Ori returned to the sitting room, here he found himself quite productive, writing away as Dwalin played the viol, accompanied by Thorin on his harp.

Dori herself sat on her new chair in the sitting room, near the sofa, having changed into a deep maroon robe of watered silk to set herself like a jewel. Ori was sorry he missed Dori and Balin escaping the chair while it was on the patio.

Fili and Kili played with the toddler, fed her, changed her and attempted to rock her to sleep in the easterling carrier/cradle contraption, but she fought sleep at every turn.

Thorin watched them with undisguised glee.

“Good practice,” he assured them, before snorting into his ale.

Dori sighed at their fumblings and finally gave in to charity.

“Lads, bring her here.”

Kili lifted the tot as if she were something slightly poisonous that might strike at any time and deposited her gently in Dori’s arms. Dori rocked the child and sang to her, and the toddler still didn’t sleep, but at least she was quieted.

“Dori, how did you do that?” Kili asked.

She stood with the tot in her arms and went through to the kitchen herself, having sent the servants off earlier.

Eight bell sounded, and Ori thought he had a fairly good draft outline for narrative of the quest, and had begun a list of people involved who would need to be interviewed for their perspectives. He started on a catalogue of artifacts which would need presenting and which then must be drawn in detail for the accompanying document. Dain had already promised to provide diagrams for his mithril bridge, as well as speculative drawings of the mechanisms which raised the box from the tomb and several of the box’s contents.

Given Ori’s official duties, his job at the library and his due to his family, if all went well, he figured he would be finished in about twelve years.

Well, mahumb all the way to Mordor and back. He could sleep when he was turned back to stone.

He felt a familiar, fuzzy buzzing in this brain that told him Mahal was there.

“Keep up tha’ pace, an’ it’ll be sooner rather than later, laddie.”

“I know,” Ori muttered, hunched over his work, hoping no one else overheard. “But what can I do? You made me sturdy.”
“Aye, bu’ yer no’ the footin’ of a bridge, either.”
“What would You have me do?”
“Go tell Brur yeh need some time off.”
Ori sputtered.
“Seriously?”
“Aye. I need yeh t’ make yer presentation. Wish I could’ve done th’ same f’r poor Teyarn.”
“Was Teyarn Your scribe?”
“Aye, bu’ she was th’ las’ f’r a long time.”
“I’ll think about it.”
“See tha’ yeh do. I swear, someday yeh’ll worry me t’ anemia.”
Ori swallowed an obvious reply.
“I hear and obey.”
“I’m outa here. I kin hear a keg callin’ me.”
Ori wrote down a few more notations, then put his pen down, stretched and turned.
And froze.

The room had taken on a reddish cast. Everyone else in the room had frozen in place, though Ori could still hear them talking and moving around, the elves carousing on the patio. It was like listening from under water. His eye was drawn to the hearth, where a valar he did not recognize walked out of the fire and stood, looking around in obvious confusion.

At least, Ori assumed it was a valar. It was shaped like an easterling man, but men did not have beards of fire or robes of ever-shifting lava. The valar regarded him with raised brow, looking over him, and the room, and everyone in it, before returning to Ori, who had no clue what he was supposed to do.

Screaming didn’t seem all that helpful.
Instead he took a very deep breath, and bowed low as he would to Mahal.

The being in the corner inclined its head, and Ori hoped that would be the end of it, when Nori, suddenly standing next to him, said, “Who the fuck’s that?”
“You can see him?” Ori asked through the side of his mouth.
“O’ course I can see ‘im. He’s a little hard to miss, ain’t he. I’m amazed the rug ain’t on fire. Mahal’s balls, I’ll be amazed if our Dori don’t drag ‘im out by the ear.”
“Nori,” Ori warned. “He can hear us.”
“Bloody Dori, spillin’ over,” Nori cried in disgust.
“Nori!” Ori snapped, then got ahold of himself and continued more quietly, though just as urgently, “do me a favor and bow to him and shut up.”
“Will do.”

Nori gave a credible bow.

Instead of acknowledging it, the being raised a mighty finger and, looking puzzled, traced the contours of Nori’s hair in the air.

Ori said into the ether, “Durin, I don’t suppose you’d care to weigh in?”
“No’ a guid idear, our Ori.”
“How about Mahal?”
“Tha’ would be worse.”
“Lovely.”

Dori, babe in arms, chose that moment to return. She caught herself up when she saw the valar, and pulled back her shoulders, black affronted.

“Whoever you are, you were not invited! Get out of my house this instant!”
The valar reared back, obviously surprised.
“Told you,” said Nori.
“Go on,” said Dori. “Out!”

She stepped forward, and the valar actually took a step back, looking around in disbelief.

He raised a hand filled with fire as if to hurl it.
“No!” Ori cried. “Dori!”

“Don’t. You. Dare,” Dori growled at the valar. “You put that away, or I’ll shove that fireplace poker right up your jacksies.”

Ori grabbed up his sketchbook and brandished the open book at the valar, and not-so-coincidentally stepped between him and Dori.

The being looked, cocked its head, looked some more, then, finally lowered its arm and vanished. The room returned to its normal colors and volume.

The brothers, apparently, had been the only ones to notice anything amiss.

Thorin looked up at Ori, expression growing concerned.

“Ori? Are you alright?”

In a very small voice Ori replied, “Just a moment.”

Ori turned and marched to the privacy of the bedroom and closed the door.

He dropped his sketchbook on the table, still open to the drawing of Rigel and Bilbo sitting close together on the patio, with the children at their feet.

“Durin,” said Ori, “you have some explaining to do.”

Durin appeared sitting on the bed. Nori-pori, who had been napping, immediately jumped up onto his massive thigh and curled up, purring.

“Er… well, tha’ was a god,” said Durin.

“What’s a god?”

“Sort’ve a flimsier version of a valar. Tha’s wha’ folk have outside a’ Arda.”

“So, a version of the valar who created everything else in the world?”

“No’ exactly. They tend t’ come an’ go. Their power relies on how many folk worship ‘em an’ where.”

“Who created them? Eru?”

“Nah, folk make ‘em up as they need, then se’ ‘em aside when they don’. Since ol’ Morgie went an’ branched ou’ to th’ East, their gods haven’ been abou’, bu’ Sauron’s gone now, so they’re back.”

“And that was one of them?”

“Aye, tha’ were th’ easterlin’ sun god. He an’ Da’ve never got on. There ain’t room enow’ in Erebor f’r th’ two of ‘em an’ their egos.”

The hearth suddenly burst forth in fire and the ground rumbled.

“Aw, cu’ it ou’, Da’, yeh’ve said so yersel’.”

The rumbling stopped and the fire vanished.

“And, are there more of these things around?”

Durin looked apologetic.

“Sorry, tha’se th’ problem wi’ openin’ yersel’ up t’ th’ world. Sometimes yeh ge’ uninvited guests.”

“Could he have really hurt Dori?”

“If he could’ve, I imagine he would’ve. I thin’ he jus’ felt cornered.”

“Someone threatening to shove a poker up your bum’ll do that. How did he even get here?”

“Da’ says tha’ Rigel feller’s go’ more t’ ‘im than even he knows.”

“He conjured up that god? How?”

“He prob’ly muttered ‘oh god’ ‘r some such.”

“I suppose we should be glad he didn’t mutter ‘holy shit’,” said Ori savagely. “Durin, I can’t always be around to wave pictures of hobbits at every god who might show up in Arda.”

Durin listened for a moment, then said, “No worries. Th’ hobbits bein’ here’ll keep folk protected. Tha’ was why yeh shoved tha’ pi’ture under tha’ god’s nose, righ’?”

“Yes, I’m just grateful I’m not a sculptor.”

Dwalin entered the room, nodded at Durin, and said, “Love, yeh alrigh? Nuisance was jus’ tellin’ us an’ interestin’ story.”

“It’s all true, except for the part where he scared the being away by flashing his dick.”

Durin laughed and Dwalin looked impressed.

“How’d yeh know… aye righ’, ‘course he would’.”
Ori turned and hugged him. With his face buried in Dwalin’s tunic he said, “Durin, go away, I want to snuggle with my husband for a while.”

“Yeh may wan’ t’ hold off on tha’, lad.”

Ori turned and all but exploded.

“No’ another one!”

“No’ another god, bu’ somethin’ possibly worse.”

Durin vanished. Nori-pori yowled in outrage at suddenly finding himself back on the mattress.

Ori and Dwalin exchanged horrified looks and they were out in the sitting room within moments, just as Tharkûn appeared.

Thorin greeted the wizard off handedly and Ori watched as Tharkûn suddenly fixated on Rigel, who was still staring down at the chess board.

Tharkûn approach Rigel slowly and smiled as Rigel looked up at him. Rigel turned his attention back to the game then frowned and shook his head.

“Lad?” Kir asked.

Rigel got to his feet and clasped his head in his hands.

Thorin exchanged glances with Oin and both rose.

Rigel stared at Tharkûn for a long moment then said slowly, “Olórin?”

Tharkûn beamed.

“Pallando, my old friend, how are you?”
Maiar, Memories, and Midnight.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The coach and four hasn’t turned into a pumpkin, but that’s about the only thing our brave hero is sure of tonight! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori gulped, his mind racing. He knew that name, but only by vague mentions in old stories and the occasional note in history books.

Glorfindel sat up and looked at Rigel, who seemed to be trying to clear his head.

“Yeh know him, love?” Margr asked.

“Only in passing,” Glorfindel rose and crossed the room. “Mithrandir, is this truly one of your council members?”

Tharkûn smiled and laid a gentle hand on Rigel’s shoulder.

“Glorfindel, please call Cemnesta in. I require his assistance.”

Glorfindel shrugged to the sisters and went out.

Ori went over to Rigel and looked at the old man. Rigel was still blinking and frowning, but his gaze rested on Ori.

“Oh-chuh,” he said slowly.

“I’m here, Rigel-chuh.”

Oin walked around Rigel, inspecting, then proceeded to count his pulse. Cemnesta came through quickly, took one look at Rigel, then put an arm about the man’s shoulders, sat him down again, and laid a smooth white hand gently on Rigel’s face. Rigel stilled under the elf’s touch. Glorfindel stood by, politely interested.

Ori could see the blue energy moving beneath Cemnesta’s hands and rippling into Rigel. Oin took out a magnifier and peered into Rigel’s ear.

Ori felt Dwalin’s hands on his own shoulders and relaxed. He watched as Rigel slowly straightened his back and become less frail-looking.

Galadriel, Celeborn, and Elrond entered and stood looking. Then Galadriel came and laid her hands on Rigel’s head. Ori felt the powerful swirl as her energies joined with Cemnesta’s. Elrond followed suit.

After a moment they drew away. Oin grunted approval and folded his arms.

“What’d’ye see?” Gloin asked, coming alongside his brother.
“Nothing,” said Oin. “I was hopin’ I’d at least get a look at his brain.”

Rigel blinked as though waking from a long nap and looked about him. He fixed on Tharkûn.

“Olórin, my old friend!” Rigel laughed, suddenly speaking perfect westron. “How glad I am to see you. What a great time it has been…” Rigel looked about, taking in the sitting room now full of dwarrow, elves and men.

“Where are we?”

“Rómestámo,” said Galadriel. “Is it truly you?”

Rigel turned to look at her. He smiled, stood, and bowed.

“Why, if it isn’t Fínaefin’s little lass! How you’ve grown, my dear.”

Galadriel laughed and pressed his hands.

“It has been so long, I did not recognize you.”

“Well,” began Rigel, then looked down at himself. “What in all Arda am I wearing?”

Dori came over, carrying a sleepy toddler, who immediately held out her arms for Rigel. Rigel took her automatically and began petting her and cooing in the easterling tongue. She giggled, then cuddled to sleep at his shoulder. Rigel looked up, worried.

“Olórin, we must have help, the easterlings are strong, but-”

“The last battle has been won and the world remade,” Tharkûn laughed.

Rigel looked closely at him.

“Olórin, why are you in white? That is for Curumo to wear,”

“He has gone back to Valinor,” Galadriel said, quietly, “with Morgoth and all his minions. The black forts and towers have all been thrown down.”

“That is wonderful news.” Rigel chuckled. “What a pity I didn’t get to see it. Who engineered their fall?”

Elrond chuckled and Galadriel smiled at Ori.

“This lovely, talented, and very brave young dwarf.”

Rigel looked down at Ori, who stammered and blushed.

“I’m just a scribe! I’m-”

“Th’ Scribe a’ Mahal,” Dwalin finished.

“That’s right,” Dori chimed in. “My dearest badger is the hero of the day.”

“Oh!” said Rigel then to Ori’s horror, bowed low to him. “We are all in your debt, gentle dwarf.”

“I couldn’t have done it without help,” Ori babbled.

“Got everyfin’ goin’ our Ori did,” Nori butted in.
“Shut up Nori,” Ori managed. “We had a quest, everyone helped. Roäc threw the egg into Mount Doom.”

“A noble quest is a wonderful thing,” Rigel beamed at him. “Who is Roäc? Where did you quest to?”

“Khazad-dûm,” Ori managed.

“Ah, “ said Rigel. “Yes, this room is of dwarf design. Are we in Durin’s keep?”

“No,” Dwalin said, loud enough to make everyone turn to him. “Yeh, me lad, ’re in th’ royal household a’ Thorin II, High King a’ all dwarrow, in his seat a’ Erebor.”

Thorin had come to Ori’s side. He was still dressed as he had been, but someone, Ori suspected Nori, had fetched him his crown. Everyone drew away from Rigel and Thorin came forward.

“King Thorin,” said Tharkûn gravely, but with a merry twinkle in his eye. “May I present to you my colleague and dear friend, Pallando, also known as Rómestámo, the East helper? He is one of the Blue Wizards.”

Pallando bowed formally. Thorin smiled benignly and offered his arm.

“You are welcome among us, Pallando. Please be seated and make yourself comfortable. We would hear your story.”

“Thank you,” Pallando bowed again.

“An’ I’m Roäc,” announced Roäc, fluttering to Thorin’s shoulder and looking majestic, too.

“Your majesty,” Pallando allowed Roäc a bow as well, which was acknowledged with a ravenishly pleased look.

Roäc tweaked Thorin’s ear.

“See, he figured out I was important right away!”

“Honored Bearer,” Thorin said, turning, and handily ignoring the raven.

“Wait’l I tell Blu!” Roäc cackled as he flapped away, checked Scudis’ hood, found it empty, then winged out.

“Yes, dear Pallando,” Dori cooed, sweeping forward. She took the Blue Wizard’s arm, drawing him to one of the armchairs. “You sit and be cozy. Would you like some tea?”

Pallando stared, then gasped.

“Honored Bearer? Why, I only hear vague tales such beings exist. This is a great honor!”

Pallando saluted Dori’s hand, making her giggle.

“Oh fiddle-faddle! You sit right down and I shall make you a nice glass of iced raspberry tea. Sweet or plain?”

“Er…sweet, if you please,” Pallando managed.

Dori bustled off and Pallando sat down carefully as the child still snoozed on him.
The other elves came in from the patio, Romy trotting beside Gimli and Legolas. Romy trotted over and sniffed the child, licked her bare foot, then went and sat on the hearth rug with Chopper, while Cemnesta quickly explained to the others what had transpired.

Thorin went to the chair opposite Pallando and everyone seated themselves where they could. Dori returned with the promised tea in a sweating glass, garnished with a slice of lemon and some mint leaves. Butter and Sugar wandered in and flopped beside Thorin.

“Well,” Pallando said, looking about at them all. “This is a merry meeting. Even the wolves that the dark lord corrupted are back to their old selves. This is wonderful. Are you all living together in this mountain?”

This made everyone laugh.

“Well,” Pallando said, looking about at them all. “This is a merry meeting. Even the wolves that the dark lord corrupted are back to their old selves. This is wonderful. Are you all living together in this mountain?”

This made everyone laugh.

“Well,” Pallando said, looking about at them all. “This is a merry meeting. Even the wolves that the dark lord corrupted are back to their old selves. This is wonderful. Are you all living together in this mountain?”

Thorin smiled and waved this off.

“Not quite,” said Tharkûn. “But I imagine our dear King Thorin may feel that way sometimes.”

Thorin smiled and waved this off.

“Our home is always open to those who come in friendship. Please, tell us how you came to be among us, Blue Wizard?”

“Certainly, your majesty,” Pallando enthused.

Ori thought he was a bit like Tharkûn in liking to tell a good tale.

Pallando looked around noticed the occupants on the hearth rug and cried,

“What an enormous pig!”

“He’s a battle boar,” Dain explained. “Very clever our Chopper is.”

Chopper lifted his head to look at Dain, winked, then oinked at the wizard before going back to sleep. Dain and Sculdis beamed and Pallando looked impressed then turned his attention back to matters at hand.

“But, first, may I asked the date?”

Ori, who had seated himself on the footstool next to Thorin, looked up from his graphite wand and notebook and told him.

“By the Great S— Hmmm, thats not right. Why would I invoke an sun god? How strange. Well, it has been a very long time and I vaguely remember being just an old man among the easterlings whom I thought of as my people. As to myself, I was captured and tormented by the Dark Lord. It was terrible. He sought to corrupt my mind and make me his servant.”

Pallando shuddered and Cemnesta was once more near him, resting his hands on the blue wizard’s shoulders.

“Aaahhh, thank you,” Pallando murmured. “Yes… he kept trying. I fought with all my might. I was left in the southern desert to die….”

Then Pallando smiled. “I was found by a group of the easterlings. I remember now. The last spell flung at me when I fell. It was to destroy my memories of who I was. I don’t think it worked as he intended. I don’t think it destroyed them, merely buried them very deep. I didn’t recall anything until just now. I have wandered with the cult of Morgoth until…until… my dear Ara and I set out for friendly lands.”

Pallando looked at the child in his arms then all about.

“Here is little Dalim, but my Ara and Deneb, the others, we numbered fifteen! We-

“Are all safely here in our mountain,” Thorin interposed. “Currently Ara and Deneb have a bakery. You all arrived about two weeks ago.”

“Erebor,” Pallando said thoughtfully then his eyes flew wide. “We walked from our lands to Erebor? Erebor is the great lonely mountain beyond the Greenwood of King Oropher!”

Thranduil said, “My honored sire was taken away to Mandos long ago.”

“Ah! King Thranduil! I salute you!”

“Thank you, but I’ve given up my throne and my immortality to marry my husband,” said Thranduil. He smiled at Bard. “This is King Bard of Dale. I am now addressed as King-Father.”

“Oh. Well met, King Bard. Er, King-Father Thranduil, did you ever marry a… Do you have…” Pallando didn’t seem to know how to phrase the question delicately.

“Yes,” Cemnesta said gently, but Ori could hear the laugh in his voice. “I’m Cemnesta Thranduilion, at your service.”

“A pleasure, your majesty. Wait!” Pallando cried. “Where is my Alatar?”

“That we do not yet know,” said Tharkûn solemnly. “But fear not, my friend, we shall find Alatar.”

“What do you remember of the last time you saw Alatar?” Thorin asked politely.

Ori froze, then babbled.

“Oh, Mahal’s blessed balls! Durin, not another quest! I just got back!”

“Calm yersel’, lad, Alatar ain’t far off.”

Ori realized everyone in the room was staring at him, and he could feel his cheeks burning.

“Sorry,” he said sheepishly. “Just pitching a fit at the first king of dwarrow.”

Pallando started to open his mouth but Dori bustled over to Ori.

“No more quests for you, pet! Stay right there and I’ll get you some nice cookies and mi-. Oh, bugger! Go pour yourself some ale.”

Everyone chuckled at that as Dori daintily curled herself back in the pink chair slightly behind Thorin.

“Aiwendil?” Pallando asked. “Tharkûn, is he-?”

“He tends his animals and plants in the forests east of Imladris,” Tharkûn informed him. “Thus we must only account for Alatar.”

“An’ who’s Aiwendil?” Balin asked.
Tharkûn chuckled.

“You know him as Radagast the Brown.”

“Radagast is fun,” Ori put in, scribbling down information as fast as he could.

“Does he still have the rabbits?” Pallando asked with a wince.

“Oh dear,” said Pallando with a sigh. “Perhaps there was something to Curumo complaining that he ate too many mushrooms.”

Mistress Dazla came through.

“The revelers have returned,” she announced cheerily.

“Revelers?” Pallando asked.

“Some friends of ours and Professor Baggins took the young easterling children to a Fun Fair in the mountain,” Thorin said, rising.

“Baggins?” Pallando muttered.

Thorin’s eyes twinkled as he turned to follow Mistress Dazla.

“You might have met his mother. Her name was Belladonna Took.”

Pallando stared.

Ori pattered after Thorin. He was torn between following, or staying and taking notes, but his first duty was to note down anything the King said. He knew Balin would probably keep accounts of everything the wizards spoke of.

The revelers drew up in the courtyard of Fundin house in the Durin carriage. The badgers were covered in every substance known to carnivals and floppily unconscious. Deneb and Ara and Deneb’s eldest daughter, Eridani, rode on the ponies drawing the carriage.

Bilbo handed Frodo down to Thorin, waiting until the king had a firm grip before warning merrily, “Be careful. He’s sticky.”

“Yes,” said Thorin. “I suppose it’s a lot harder to drop him this way.”

Sam didn’t even stir as Boromir carried him in. Sam looked like he had a little beard, but it was mostly blue spun sugar.

Bain and Theodred were awake, but barely, grinning, with stains on their tunics and candy in their hair.

She rolled over and said, “Carry me.”

“You’re getting kind’ve big for that.”
“Then ‘m sleepin’ here.”

Bard stepped forward and scooped her out.

“Come on, Til.”

“Aww,” said Thranduil, “her little jumpsuit is all food stained. Just like Legolas at that age.”

“My jumpsuit was food stained?” the prince asked archly.

“Yes. It was white lace. Quite fetching on you,” sighed Thranduil with a dramatic gesture worthy of Dori.

“I remember that jumpsuit!” said Cemnesta with a grin. “It had an adorable neck frill.”

“Don’t help me, Nesta,” Legolas grumped.

Gimli poked him in the side and simpered, “Awwww, how cunnin’!”

Deneb smiled on them all, her eyes bright. She bowed to Thorin and handed him a fat purse.

Thorin smiled and nodded his thanks. Fili came out and Thorin passed Frodo to him and most of the party moved into the house. Thorin stopped Bilbo and beckoned to Deneb and Ara. Their eyes widened with immediate worry, but Thorin smiled encouraging.

“Our little one and friend are fine, mistresses,” he said, immediately.

“You tell us something?” Deneb asked.

“Yes,” Thorin looked at Bilbo. “Help me, my love.”

“What’s going on?” Bilbo asked.

“Tharkûn is here.”

“Oh dear, what has he done?”

“It seems our friend, Rigel-chuh, is in truth the Blue Wizard, Pallando. Tharkûn recognized him and, with the help of Cemnesta and Galadriel, Pallando remembers who he is. Apparently, he resisted the Dark Lord to the point where Morgoth instead of making his a follower, tried to destroy his memories and cast him out into the desert to die.”

“Great Yavanna!” Bilbo gasped.

“I’m not sure how to explain this to Deneb,” Thorin finished. He turned to Deneb. “Mistress Deneb, do you know any one called Rómestámo?”

Deneb and Ara looked at each other, then shook their heads.

“Perhaps Pallando?” Thorin tried.

Deneb frowned.

“Old story. Very very old. Pallando, person of the…mmm, the Sun. Powerful. Dark One killed to take…mmm…be king of easterlings?” she tried.

“Pallando,” Ara said sorrowfully “Alatar!”
“Yes,” Thorin said.

Deneb put her arms about her aunt as the woman began to sob.

“We don’t know. The word…mmm…name, Alatar, gives her great, great sad. Always.”

Ori looked at Ara.

“Perhaps, my king, Pallando could explain. He does speak their language.”

Thorin nodded.

“It may be the best way. I don’t want to trouble them too much while they are still settling in and becoming part of the mountain.”

They turned and entered the house once more and made their way to the sitting room. Somehow, probably due to Tharkûn, Pallado was now more wizardly looking in a long robe of sea blue. He smiled at Deneb and greeted her in the easterling tongue. Deneb and Eridani listened, wide eyed, then Eridani began to giggle. Pallando pretended to be shocked and smoothed the front of his robe. Deneb glared at her daughter, then smiled and shook her head. She reached back and drew Ara forward.

Pallando and Ara stared at one another.

Ori gasped.

“Go’ it in one, me scribe,” Mahal’s hot boom chuckled at the back of Ori’s head.

Pallando smiled as Ara raised a trembling hand to touch his face.

“Yes,” Palando said with a choke in his voice. “It’s me, my wonderful Alatar.”

Galadriel, Cementa and Tharkûn hurried forward and laid their hands on the newly revealed Alatar. After a few moments she frowned and blinked as Pallando had.

“My beloved?” she looked at Pallando.

“It is indeed, I-”

“The easterlings!”

“All your group is safely here in Erebor,” Thorin said again.

Alatar turned and caught Deneb’s hands, speaking earnestly to her. Eridani stared, then made a comment, looking stunned. Deneb huffed and Alatar laughed. Bilbo snickered.

Ori looked at Bilbo.

“Cheeky faunt. I believe Eridani said she knew Ara was old but not that old.”

“Pallando, Alatar, Deneb,” Thorin addressed them. “It’s late and, no doubt, your young ones need to be..er…scrubbed and put to bed. There is no need for hasty decisions at the moment. Deneb, you have a home here in Erebor for as long as you wish it. For now, please remain calm and carry on as you were. This purse proves you have had a most successful day and I am pleased and proud of you. Succeeding at your craft is one off the highest honors among dwarrow.”
Alatar related this to Deneb, while Pallando beamed on them.

“Well,” said Deneb through Alatar. “Your majesty has been most generous and we have made a good start. With your help.”

She paused and Ori piped up.

“I was just a scrivener in the slums of Dale and look where I am now with Thorin’s help, Deneb-chuh. Everyone needs just the right spot for their talents to shine. Your pastries are so delicious.”

This was conveyed to Deneb and she laughed and pointed something out that made Alatar chuckle.

“She says,” Alatar replied giving Deneb’s smile a reproving look. “She learned from the best. But I wasn’t the one who suggested mixing mint and lemon.”

The easterlings declined tea as they had sticky children to wash, took their leave and headed back to Oakenshield Inn. As they left, Ori overheard Alatar laughingly asking Pallando what he’d done to his nose.

Everyone else stood about talking. Thorin and Bilbo went to Bag End East, taking Ori and the wargs with them.

In the bathroom of the master bedroom, Ori sat on a small stool while Thorin ran a bath, then helped Bilbo undress Frodo and Sam. While they did this, Thorin and Bilbo quietly discussed the situation of the easterlings and Ori took notes of their observations.

Butter and Sugar took their motherly duties seriously, trying to help by washing the faunts. Obviously, the candy and whatever else covered them was too sweet or highly flavored for the wargs’ tastes. Ori giggled, flipped over a page and drew the expression of faint disgust on Sugar’s face as she busily washed Frodo’s hand.

Frodo woke up enough to complain he didn’t need a bath. Sam never stirred and flopped about in Thorin’s hands as he was scrubbed clean.

“How, in Mahal’s name, did Sam get toffee in his hair?” Thorin murmured. “He’s worse than Kili, and he and Fili threw food at each other.”

“Kili’s taller,” Bilbo chuckled, “and hobbit hair is curly, so it holds everything.”

Ori drew as Thorin, now shirtless, cradled Sam in one arm and took the soapy washcloth to scrub Sam’s feet. Thorin rubbed at the hair on Sam’s feet for a bit, then sighed and put both feet back in the water to soak. Bilbo flapped a hand at Ori, who passed him a large towel. Bilbo scooped Frodo out and swaddled him then laid him on the mat in the bathroom. Bilbo then tended to Sam’s feet and likewise wrapped him up.

Thorin and Bilbo each took a faunt. Ori rose and pulled the plug in the bath, the draining water a distinct shade of gray. Ori grinned and followed Thorin and Bilbo to the bedroom. In front of the fire, the king and consort-to-be combed out curls on heads and feet. Thorin said, “Bags,” to the wargs. They disappeared out, then returned with two plush animals, one an oliphaunt in Butter’s mouth and the other a battle ram in Sugar’s, and dropped them next to Bilbo.

Thorin bestowed praised and ear scratches on Sugar and Butter, while Bilbo unlaced the tummies of both plush toys. Ori saw that these were convenient places to keep nightwear.
Soon the faunts were settled fast asleep in Frodo’s raven nest bed. Butter and Sugar settled themselves beside the bed.

As they left, Ori asked.

“Do Butter and Sugar always sleep next to Frodo and Sam?”

“As soon as they’re put to bed, “ Thorin said, “yes, but later, during the night, she and Butter will trade off so there’s alway one with Frodo and Sam and one with us. The pups are now tending to sleep on the foot of our bed, so there will be more room when they move on to stay with their new… er…parents,” Thorin finished, amused.

“It’s wonderful how smart they are.” Ori observed.

“I’m amazed myself,” Bilbo admitted. I wonder that the orcs ever realized just how intelligent the wargs really are.”

“A good thing for us they didn’t,” Thorin teased. “But you are right, Ori, teaching them tasks or having them stand guard is amazingly simple. They worked out the strategy of taking turns guarding Frodo during the night themselves.”

Bilbo laughed out as they reentered the sitting room.

“Just the other day I heard Frodo trying to scold Sugar. I found Sugar blocking Frodo’s bedroom doorway. Frodo was trying to come for first breakfast without brushing his hair. Sugar had the brush in her teeth and wouldn’t let him out of the room.”

Ori laughed at that.

“I must ask Gimli and Legolas if they’ve had a similar experience with Romy.”

In the sitting room, Dori was holding court. Everyone was avidly discussing the sudden return of the blue wizards.

Wandi and Haldir danced around each other, talking and flirting. Thranduil never turned his head, but his eyes followed their progress around the room, his face a picture of mirth tinged with horror. Ori snickered to himself and went to join his husband who was talking with Legolas and Gimli. Romy snored on their feet. Killer had worked himself between Dwalin and the back of the sofa and lay there happily wagging his tail as Dwalin used him as a cushion. Killer wiggled and whined until Ori sat down next to Dwalin and ruffled Killer’s ears while Killer industrially washed his face.

“Gimli,” Ori asked, “have you or Legolas notice that Romy is really smart?”

Legolas fell back, laughing.

“Aye,” Gimli grumbled in a pleased way. “Disgus’ingly so. Ne’er lets us sleep-in if there’s sumthin’ t’ do an’ nags th’ life outa us when it’s bedtime. If I make th’ bleedin’ mistake a’ sittin’ on th’ bed fully dressed, th’ bloody animal goes and yanks me boots off with his teeth!”

“It’s true.” Legolas said, looked fondly down at Romy. “Gimli kept reminding me I need to replace the strap on my quiver and I kept putting it off. Gimli was showing me the new leather strap he’d made me and Romy went over, brought my quiver to our feet, and proceeded to gnaw through the old strap, so I had no choice but to repair it then and there.”

“Mam says our Romy’s a jewel,” Gimli added and scratched Romy’s belly as Romy snorted and rolled over, half asleep but still looking for attention. Legolas leaned against Gimli, smiling happily and playing with the dwarf braid in his hair.

Dwalin looked speculatively over his shoulder at Killer.

“Oi, Killer,” Dwalin said.

Killer was on his feet, gazing eagerly at Dwalin in an instant. Dwalin’s eyes twinkled. Ori wondered what in all Arda Dwalin was going to ask Killer to do.

“Give me Ori a kiss,” Dwalin ordered. Killer whipped ‘round, swiped Ori’s face with his tongue, then turned back, eager for more. Ori giggled and wiped his face with his sleeve while Gimli and Legolas laughed. Dwalin’s grin became feral.

“Go fetch our Nori-Pori.”

Killer leapt into action and disappeared into the hallway. Killer reappeared moments later, an extremely annoyed orange cat born gently in his jaws. Ori laughed out as Killer delicately dropped the wet cat in Dwalin’s lap. Nori-Pori hissed and swiped at Killer’s nose. Killer licked Nori-Pori, who hissed again in disgust then proceeded to lick his own fur back into place with a look of utter revulsion.

Ori grinned around at their companions. Dori was sitting comfortably drinking tea, Powder in her lap and Balin seated next to the pink chair, an arm tucked into Dori’s.

Dori paused as though listening. Ori swore that if Dori had antennae they would have been twitching and searching. Dori put aside her tea with a smile, patted Balin’s arm, and rose. Ori watched curiously as Dori marched purposefully to the sitting room door leading to the receiving room. She positioned herself, turned the handle silently, then flung open the door and shrieked dramatically.

“Captain Boromir! What do you think you’re doing to my poor little Lavender?!?”

Aragorn and Arwen stood beside Dori in an instant, giggling and peeking through.

“Lavender dear,” teased Arwen, “whatever has happed to your bodice ribbons?”

“Oh!” Lavender cried from the receiving room, “If you don’t know, my lady, then Aragon isn’t doing a proper job of courting you.”

“Take notes, my king,” Boromir laughed.

“Lavender, you get in here this minute,” Dori scolded, striding into the receiving room. “And as for you, Captain. Come here!”

“And let you grab ahold of my face, Honored Bearer? Never.”

“Wicked creature!” Dori shooed both through.

Arwen clapped hold of a flushed Lavender and they giggled together. Ori snickered as Eowyn drifted over to Boromir, who was rather flushed himself.

“What would your honored sire say?” she demanded.

“Nothing, if he doesn’t want my Lavender to bash him with a frying pan.”

“She’s perfect for you,” said Eowyn.
“I know,” said Boromir, grinning.

Ori found himself lingering long after their guests and most of the family had turned in.

“Love?” Dwalin asked.

“Do you want to go outside and sit on the patio with me?” Ori asked. “I know I should be exhausted, but I don’t think I could sleep just yet.”

“Sounds guid,” said Dwalin.

He took Ori’s hand and led him back out into the night.

The cool air felt lovely on his skin, and a breeze rustled the grass. With the house lights down, the dome of the sky was washed with stars.

“That’s amazing,” said Ori.

“Aye, jus’ li’e me husband,” said Dwalin.

“You’re sweet.”

“An’ yer blushin’.”

“Of course I’m blushing!

Dwalin sat on one of the patio chairs and leaned back, Ori climbed into Dwalin’s lap, and wrapped in his husband’s arms, hummed softly to himself.

“Someone sounds happy,” Dwalin said.

“I am happy,” said Ori. “I don’t know what I thought Erebor would be like after the quest, but it’s just like it was when we left. Chaos.”

Dwalin laughed.

“A’ leas’ it’s a guid sort a chaos.”

“It is. At the same time, it feels like something’s ending, and something else is beginning. I know I’ll be driving everyone crazy soon while I worry about whatever it is, but right now, I’m content to let it come. It’s going to come anyway, whether I worry or not.”

“Wise a’ yeh t’ realize tha’, love,” said Dwalin.

“Now, if only I’d realized it seven months ago.”

“Hindsigh’ bein’ wha’ it is?”

“Even for the scribe of Mahal.”

“No ma’er wha’ happens, yeh know I’m behind yeh, righ’? Even if I’m no’ standin’ with yeh?”

“Yes,” said Ori.

He turned his face and kissed Dwalin.
“Yes,” he repeated, giving him another kiss.

“Yes,” he said again and kissed him.

“Third time’s th’ charm?” Dwalin asked, teasingly.

“Third time for luck,” said Ori. “Fourth time because I love you.”

They did kiss, again and again, and cuddled, until finally Ori nodded off -

And startled awake with a shout as Fanny trotted out into the meadow from her new area of the stable, with a happy trumpet of welcome.

Ori found himself sitting on the ground with Dwalin standing over him, knife drawn as if to defend them, then visibly relaxing and laughing as Fanny approached, snuffling at them and hoo-ing excitedly.

“Fanny! Hush!” Ori hissed, laughing, as Dwalin lifted him to his feet. “You’ll wake Erebor!”

Fanny wasn’t having any of it, and thus they patted her and told her how darling she was until finally, she settled down beside them and drifted off to sleep.

 The Appendix and the Glossary have been updated for your reading pleasure! *****
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Life in Erebor, as always peaceful and chaotic. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next morning, at the breakfast table, Theoden made his apologies.

“I’m afraid Theo and I need to start back for home,” he said. “It’s been a wonderful, if completely unexpected, visit.”

“But, Theoden, dear,” said Dori, “how will you get back?”

“Cemnesta has offered the loan of some of his horses.”

“Shall I drop you off instead?” Galadriel asked.

“Thank you, m’lady, but it’s a bit out of your way, isn’t it?”

“On my way to where?” Galadriel asked.

“Lórien?”

“Oh, no, we’re stopping here for a while longer. It would be a round trip for me.” She twirled her fork in the air. “Pop. There. Pop. Back. All sorted.”

Theoden looked to be struggling.

“Thank you,” he said finally. He turned to Theodred, who had just downed his sixth rolled blackberry cake, these chasing a steak, three eggs over easy, breakfast potatoes and a tankard of ale. “Theo, are you of an elegant sufficiency?”

“Yes, Da.”

They disappeared.

“That wasn’t me,” Galadriel announced firmly.

“Oh!” Dori cried, rather cross. She shouted at the ceiling. “Don’t they even get a chance to say a proper goodbye?”

The room was swept with a sigh, and the Rohirrim returned to their seats.

“That was weird,” said Theodred.

Dori bustled forward to embrace them.

“I told our Mahal that you needed to say goodbye!”
Theoden nodded.

“Of course—You asked Your Mahal?”

“Scolded, actually,” said Ori, looking worriedly toward the ceiling.

“Either way,” Dori dismissed. “Give us a kiss, Theoden dear. Wait, how will you get Captain Cockrill home?”

“Taken care of,” said Mahal, sounding long-suffering.

Ori said, “Mahal says it’s taken care of.”

“And the truffles?” Dori asked archly.

“Dori!” Ori cried. “Don’t push it!”

“Truffles, too,” said Mahal. “Anythin’ else th’ Bearer migh’ require while I’m here?”

“Do You really mean to want to ask?” Ori muttered.

“No, no’ really.”

“Good choice.” Ori remembered who he was conversing with and blushed. “Er… good choice, M’lord.”

Mahal chuckled in his head.

So Theoden and Theodred got to say proper goodbyes, and Theoden was obviously quite moved when he finally looked up at the ceiling and said, “Hello? Lord Mahal? Are You quite ready…er…Sir?”

Apparently He was, because they once again disappeared.

Dori nodded after and said, “Thank you, Dearest Mahal. Much obliged.”

“You’re welcome,” said Mahal wryly.

“He says ‘You’re welcome’,” Ori translated flatly.

“Oh, how sweet!” Dori cried. “That’s why He’s our valar!”

Ori rolled his eyes and said to Bilbo, “Because our valar would have perfect manners.”

“Yes, He would, indeed!” Dori cried. “In the dwarfish way, of course, because He invented them.”

In the back of his head, Ori heard Yavanna cry, “Ha!” and the hot boom of Mahal’s laughter.

Nearly everyone else had decided to stay the week through, so as to attend the Gamgees’ official housewarming party. Luckily, they were the sorts of guests who could easily amuse themselves while the Durins conducted official business.

Most of the elves, and Binni, and Gridr went shopping, visiting, or sight-seeing, except for Elrond and Celeborn, who had been given the run of the Great Library, with the caveat that they stay ‘ou’ a’ me hair’, per Master Brur.

Lindir divided his time between the library and shopping. He spent an afternoon with Mr. Wandi and came back with an experimental hairstyle. His hair fell straight and unbraided to his shoulders, with bangs bowed out to just above his brows, and the locks at the back of his head bumped up to an enormous degree.

“What do you think?” he asked Elrond.

“It’s stunning,” said Elrond.

Ori couldn’t agree more.

Dori only occasionally accompanied the shoppers, as ‘Bearer-mania’ was a hobby all Erebor and the Dale enjoyed. Dori couldn’t go about very much without people swooping around, congratulating and thanking the Bearer for blessing them all, and pressing upon her exquisitely made baby clothes, toys, and any other pebble paraphernalia. Dori was approachable, benign, and all charm to any who spoke to her, and always returned with at least three wheeled cart-loads of things. Dori kept the occasional one or two items she liked best or the ones she knew would help the creators whose work would be worn or used publicly. The rest she went through meticulously, made up packages for new parents and then sent them to Mistress Annis to dispense to those who truly needed the supplies.

“Given how our population is booming,” explained Dori, “I don’t think we’ll lack for ‘takers’.”

Aragon and Arwen found the ways of dwarrow, hidden for so long, fascinating and Balin thoroughly enjoyed discussing law with both during the evenings. During the days they spent half their time with Dis at the guild meetings and the rest shadowing Thorin in all his doings.

The visit to the weekly miners’ guild meeting only devolved into a brawl once.

At tea that afternoon, Aragorn wondered aloud what had even sparked the violence.

“Nothing. They were just showing off for you,” Dis sniffed.

Randi nodded his agreement and soaked his bruised knuckles in ice water.

“How… flattering,” said Arwen.

Nori stuck his head up through the tea table.

“How… flattering,” he opined.

Eowyn and Boromir rode with the Dale city patrol with Dwalin and Furh’nk and accompanied them to Dale Hall to meet with Bard and Glorfindel as they coordinated the combined security for the mountain and city. It was the first such official meeting, and Gloin and Targ were there, as well as Master Dubb and Ivo, Tauriel and Sigrid. Bard had invited Thorin and Ori attended to take notes for both kingdoms.

Ori was impressed with the way Dale Hall had developed. The private, upstairs meeting room was not ostentatious, but it was roomy and comfortable, with large, south-facing windows and a hearth at each end. The three windows each sported a deep sill, large enough to sit on, and two sets of shutters, one set just behind the glass and another between the sill and room.
“Those are wonderful,” said Eowyn, “but they must weigh a ton.”

“Not all that much, actually,” said Bard. “Take a look.”

Eowyn was amazed to find that the shutters were far lighter than they looked.

“An alloy of iron and mithril,” said Bard. “Fili’s latest project for Master Minta.”

Thorin said nothing, but he practically glowed with pride.

“What were the old shutters made of?” Boromir asked.

“These are the originals,” said Bard. “Except for the main room downstairs, none of this building existed four months ago.”

“It looks like it’s been here for centuries!” the Gondorian said.

“That was the architect’s idea,” said Bard. “She thought it would put me at a disadvantage if it all looked too new. Tilda designed the andirons.”

“Tilda!” Thorin cried. “Really?”

“Oh, yes, with Thranduil’s encouragement.”

Ori went and inspected the andirons and shouted in amazement.

They were miniature Romys, each sitting on a miniature Mellon.

He wondered how Bob felt about it, then he thought that Bob could care less, as long as his mat was still comfortably close to the kitchen stove.

Ori surveyed the rest of the room. He suspected the cowhide chairs and maple slab table were Thranduil’s idea. A sideboard of matching wood held ale, plates of cold cuts and bread and cheeses, and even sliced vegetables. That was probably the king-father’s doing, as well.

They chatted as they served themselves.

“This is quite a challenge,” Boromir ventured. “How do you insure the security of a city with no walls? Minas Tirith was laid out from the foundation to be orderly, with regular roads and squares. I don’t think there’s a sharp angle anywhere in this city.”

“It wasn’t planned at all,” said Bard. “It was originally a rich woman’s villa and lands, then it lay abandoned and over grown for centuries, then, when my people arrived, it became a refugee camp, then a fishing village on the edge of the Long Lake, and it grew out from there toward the mountain.

“Then, about thirty years ago, Calmar started knocking out buildings and erecting walls and whatever else suited him.”

Ori reflected that Dale was far more fluid than the cities of the West, and, thanks to Calmar, a good deal messier in its set up. Dwalin always said it was a challenge to patrol.

On the table Bard rolled out the current map of Dale. They all gathered around, chewing and studying.

“Something wrong, Captain Boromir?” Bard asked.
“I thought the mountain was to the east of town.”

“It is.”

“What’s it doing at the top of the map?”

“East is ‘up’,” said Bard, “as on dwarven maps.”

“Th’ righ’ way,” Gloin nodded.

Bard chuckled.

“Think about it,” he said. “The dwarrow maps have east at the top. If Dale maps had north at the top, how would our soldiers communicate? It would take way too long to figure out where everyone should be.”

“Ah,” said Boromir. “It certainly will put any invaders at a disadvantage.”

“We don’t really fear outside attacks,” Bard said. “With a mountain full of rampaging dwarrow nearby, no one in their right mind would even bother. Our problems usually come from within. A few of Calmar’s thugs stayed and are trying to bully people, but this shall stop soon enough.”

He grinned to Glorfindel, who nodded feraly.

“I vow I shall catch out that Ursith!” Glorfindel swore.

Thorin and Dwalin exchanged glances, then looked at Ori. Ori shrugged, as it was a private meeting. Ori looked up at Bard and Glorfindel.

“Make sure you always just fail a little bit. Ursith is Nori.”

The mouths fell open.

“Nori, as you know,” Thorin explained, “is my spy master. Thus, by his, or rather Ursith’s, ruling any criminal element, I always know what’s goin on.”

“Oh,” said Bard, somewhat flummoxed.

“Of course!” Glorfindel enthused. “I shall harry him and fail at the last hour.”

“Thank you,” Thorin said gravely, with a twinkle in his eye.

Eowyn and Boromir burst out laughing.

“I really ought to talk to Nori about disguising myself as a criminal and running my king’s underworld,” snickered Boromir.

“You’re too innersent lookin’ f’r that,” Nori commented, dropping down through the ceiling.

“I’ll never get used to that,” Ori heard Bard murmur to Boromir, who shook his head in agreement.

“Anything I or Bard should know?” Thorin asked.

“Yup,” Nori reported. “A couple a’ dumbasses’re tryin’ t’ organize a heist o’ mithril. Th’ small store you got in th’ river warehouse. Ursith’s authorized that little party fer two bells b’fore dawn.”
Make sure yer there, Glo, but all accidental an’ such. There’ll be five men an’ free dwarrow. They got ‘nother escape route outta ol’ Feesers basement.”

“Feeser back runnin’ a game?” Dwalin asked.

“Pretendin’,”

“Guid t’ hear he’s up t’ his ol’ tricks in service t’ th’ crown. Th’ watch’ll ferget ‘is place t’night. Set up a bar figh’ t’other end a’ th’ docks.”

Nori nodded and cocked at look at Bard.

“I’ll be unusually awake, if you need me.” Bard promised.

Glorfindel and Boromir looked delighted.

“You know, King Thorin,” said Boromir, “you’re well established if you ever wanted to run a criminal empire.”

“Fortunately, my schedule doesn’t allow for it,” said Thorin.

“I run it fer ‘im,” said Nori, drinking ale from the pitcher, probably, Ori thought waspishly, because Dori wasn’t there to smack him.

“Yes, running it right into the ground,” Thorin chuckled.

Dubb, deeply impressed with Eowyn’s prowess as a warrior, politely asked her if she would care to help him train Ivo.

Eowyn agreed, for she was as adept at training soldiers as her brother or her uncle.

Faced with Eowyn in the practice ring, Ivo goggled at her, demurred at fighting a woman, then, when Dubb told him not to be a bacon-brain and lift his weapon, he did so, striking a pose that said he wanted to show off a little.

Ori realized right off this was a poor decision, as Ivo was put on his mettle as never before. Ori sat quietly in the stands, watching as Eowyn circled and then, with a swing of her broadsword, knocked his shield edge so hard, it flew away from him.

Ivo started looking more than a little worried as Eowyn pressed the attack. He was fighting as hard as he could, panting, with rivulets of sweat dripping from his forehead. Eowyn didn’t even appear to be using half her strength. Ori reflected she could hold her own against Dwalin, or Dain, or Thorin.

Eowyn eyed her opponent, then slashed downward, striking his sword guard, forcing him to drop the weapon and stumble to his knees, her swordspoint held unshaking to his throat.

Ivo looked slowly up the blade to the White Lady of Rohan, who stared impassively down at him. Her bright hair shone and rippled in the breeze.

Ivo caught his breath and gasped out loud enough for Ori to hear him clearly.

“I love you! I want to marry you! Please marry me. I’m not rich, but I’m sure me mam’ll like you, and I’ll love you forever. I promise!”
Ori groaned.

Eowyn rolled her eyes and sheathed her sword.

“Thank you, young Ivo, but no.”

Ori could tell that Eowyn was desperately trying not to laugh.

Dubb smacked Ivo across the back of his head.

“Tha’s no’ th’ way yeh go abou’ makin’ a dam ’n offer, yeh pony’s arse.”

Ori reflected that perhaps there was far more for Dubb to teach Ivo beyond the ways of the sword.

Ori walked Eowyn back to Fundin house after the bout. Eowyn looked displeased about something and Ori didn’t trouble her until she chose to speak.

She did so only after she joined Ori and Dori in the kitchen, washed, her hair in a towel. She sat dejectedly in a chair, dressed only in her shift, nursing the tea Dori had poured out for her.

“Imad Dori?”

“Yes, my love?”

“I think I’m craftwed.”

“Nonsense! You just haven’t met the right one.”

“But, they’re all either craftwed, or idiots, or married to each other and they don’t want a third!”

“The best way to find someone, is not to look.”

Eowyn cocked an eyebrow.

“Have you been talking to my uncle?”

“No, dear, why?”

“You sound like my late aunt, Elfhild.”

“Then she was a sensible woman, for it’s a fact, dearest.”

Ori piped up, “I tried to look at Dwalin, but every time Dwalin looked back, Dori growled at him.”

“Pet, that is hardly helpful,” Dori admonished. “What’s happened, dear?”

Eowyn told her.

Dori’s lips sat in a line across her face. She appeared to consider, but Ori knew she was trying not to laugh. Finally Dori offered, “Well, it just goes to show, dear, you really haven’t met the right one yet.”
Ori took a few days to himself. It bothered him that he should be working, not sloughing off, but he was still recovering from the rigors of the quest and all its amazing consequences.

He rested, finished his picture of Sigrid and embarked on the initial sketches for Thorin’s official portrait, which Ori had been dithering over for quite some time.

Ori found it was best to have several paintings going at once, giving each a chance to dry between his efforts.

One afternoon, he spent a pleasant few hours in the meadow, flipping through sketch books from the time back when he was just married to the present. Fanny was off working with the Court of Miracles, but Honda lazed nearby, one rear leg slack as she napped.

In the way of scribes, Ori was meticulous about dating his work, no matter how seemingly trivial. Every master he ever had enforced this idea. He also never abandoned anything. When he tore something out to give away, he noted that, too.

So, as he worked his way from the beginning, he watched Thorin change. The king’s rigid posture relaxed, and even when he wasn’t smiling, a light had come into his eyes.

Ever so gradually, Thorin’s lean frame filled out, his chest widening, his hair growing and curling eccentrically.

It seemed to make his nose look longer, even sharper than before, and his beard and mustache had white streaks now that suited him.

Ori frowned.

He went back to the beginning and started to look again.

Roäc began to appear in them around the time of Thror’s death, but increasingly the raven perched on Thorin’s shoulder. Finally, Ori arrived at yesterday’s dinner. During dessert, Thorin turned to say something to Bard. Roäc sat on the back of Thorin’s chair, rolling his eyes as only Roäc could.

The resemblance was not Ori’s imagination.

Thorin was becoming a raven.

Which was not to say he would sprout wings at any moment, or build a nest in the throne room, and he certainly wasn’t going to collect shiny obj-

“What have you there?”

Ori shrieked and whipped around.

“Bilbo!”

The hobbit grinned down at him.

“Really, Ori, you make it far too easy.”

“I know,” said Ori, exasperated. He gestured with his sketchbook. “It’s not what you think.”

“How do you know?” Bilbo asked, plopping down beside him. “I think a lot of things.”

“You think this drawing is naughty.”
“Figured me out already, have you?”

Ori showed him what he had discovered.

“By my buttons! Ori, I believe you’re right. He’s a little more raven-ish every day. Though, mind you, I haven’t seen him viciously peck someone in the head yet.”

“Do you think he notices?”

“Thorin doesn’t seem to think much about himself, unless it’s in conjunction with his people. I understand from Dori that he wore the same color and cut of clothing every day of his life up until the time he went to the inn.”

“He did!” Ori cried. “Oh, if you had only been there the day Dori tried to get him to wear pink!”

“With Thorin’s complexion, he could pull it off.”

“That’s just what Dori said.”

Bilbo chuckled.

“How much of this conversation did you hear?”

“A great deal of it.”

“You realize, this compels you to tell me the whole story?”

Ori did so, and Bilbo laughed until his face turned the same color as his coat.

“Ahh, now that remark about the silk whispering makes sense. Dori really said Thorin’s underwear should whisper? What an extraordinary idea.”

Ori peered out from under his lashes.

“Does it?”

“I don’t know. He hardly bothers to wear any. I’m amazed his tailor isn’t prematurely grey.”

They went back through the books randomly, and Ori pointed out significant personages and told Bilbo stories about them.

“This is the asshat, isn’t it,” said Bilbo

“How did you know?”

“He might as well have the word printed on his forehead. Sugar water and rags in his hair every night before bed?”

“I always thought so! Though, we can’t all be as lucky as hobbits. You all have such beautiful curly hair.”

“Yet, as a lad, I longed for perfect, pin-straight hair like an elf’s. We all want what we haven’t got, don’t we.”

“You aren’t going to cut yours, are you?” Ori asked in alarm.

“Certainly not! Hamfast and his sons do so like proper hobbits, but Hamfast isn’t attached to a dwarf king. I wouldn’t shame Thorin that way.”

“How attached are you?” Ori asked. “You can tell me to push off if you like, I’m being very dwarfy just by asking.”

Bilbo smiled, pink to his ears.

“I was afraid to think too hard about it when I first met him, but I may have already been a little in love even then. Hobbits don’t have ‘Ones’, but that doesn’t mean we don’t recognize our match when we meet them.”

“Thorin would put his braid in your hair today if you asked.”

Bilbo laughed and nodded.

“Yes, I know. I also know such a thing will throw two kingdoms into an even bigger tizzy than they already are just from the Bearer being pregnant.”

“Dwalin and Thorin call it Bearer-mania.”

“Exactly! How much can one expect people to take before they’re all laid out with nervous prostration?”

“That’s an awful lot of vinaigrette,” Ori mused.

“Nori would have a stomach ache for a lifetime.”

“Yes, and Dori would say it served him right,” said Ori.

“You know, I was an only child. I find sibling dynamics exotic and amazing.”

“Siblings can be amazing pains in the arse,” said Ori, “but I couldn’t wish for better. I couldn’t have done all I have so far without them.”

“Then, I envy you,” said Bilbo. “I’m glad the Durins live like this. It gives Frodo the family he should have had. He’s a properly spoiled faunt.”

“Thorin is very attached to him as well.”

“They seem to be very attached to each other. Dis told me that Frodo is a lot like Fili was when her One died. Fili clung to Thorin like a baby opossum to its mother. At least Frodo’s hair seems to be growing down and not just out like mine.”

“Your hair is fascinating,” said Ori, truthfully.

“My head looks like a forsythia bush.”

“But it’s a nice forsythia bush.”

“Thank you,” said Bilbo dryly. “Do you actually know what a forsythia bush looks like?”

“No, but I’m sure it’s lovely.”

Bilbo snorted.

“Don’t tell Mr. Wandi. It’ll become the latest style.”
Then they flipped through Ori’s pocket notebook of all the sketches from the night market and laughed.

“These are wonderful, Ori. I see you’ve decided to give some of them a bit of polish.”

“I think such an event should be preserved for posterity, don’t you?”

“Thranduil wearing a shiny ‘princess hat’ should be, if nothing else.”

The breeze picked up. Already it held a whisper of coolness that warned summer on the mountain was on the wane.

“You should soak up as much light as you can, Bilbo. Winters this far east are very long and dark.”

“I’ve wintered hereabouts before,” said Bilbo. “It’s not me I’m particularly worried about.
Deneb’s family has never experienced snow. The Gamgees will need to keep an eye on the faunts.
The snow will pile up quickly over their heads.”

“And the pipes beneath the streets of Dale don’t go all the way out there to keep the farm road clear,” Ori mused. “I need to talk to Bard. I think the heat from the lava vents beneath that section of Dale can be redirected, so even if they don’t put in the road by winter, at least the Gamgees won’t be snowed in.”

“Is there anything dwarrow can’t do?” Bilbo asked.

“We can be serious cram brains when it comes to things like emotions, and we’re dead stubborn when we think we’re right, even after it becomes obvious that we’re wrong.”

“Hopefully I can work my way around the stubborn part this winter. It may seem like a big enough mountain—”

“Until you’re cooped up with a sulking Durin?”

“Exactly. He missed you all very much while you were away. The true gloom biscuit of Erebor, according to Dis. How fortunate I’m fond of biscuits.”

“Even gloomy ones?”

“Especially those.”

They lapsed into silence as Ori cast about for a way to broach the subject.

“So…”

“So, Thorin and Dwalin were terribly aroused by our rather pathetic combat,” Bilbo opened the conversation with a teasing twinkle in his eye.

Ori giggled.

“Neither of us is a born warrior.”

“We’re lovers, not fighters,” said Bilbo. “That may be the point. They think we’re cute as kittens.”

“I suppose between the two of us we’re suitably fuzzy,” Ori mused. “The question is, how far should we take it?"

“However far we wish,” said Bilbo, smiling. “Are you interested?”

Ori thought about it.

“Whether I’m interested is secondary to the fact that I can do very little about it. I don’t have much experience. Dwalin hadn’t even taken me yet, and we’ve been married over seven months, which is just embarrassing.”

Bilbo shook his head.

“He’s careful with you because he cares so much. His adoration is nearly a physical thing.”

Ori nodded.

“He might decide what we do most of the time, but he always lets me say how far we go.”

“Such a considerate lover is a fine, rare thing.”

“But it doesn’t follow that anyone else would be as patient,” said Ori. “I’m afraid you would be bored, and maybe frustrated.”

“If all I was after was sex, perhaps,” said Bilbo. “This is more about giving each other pleasure while tempting our mates than it is sexual gymnastics, with all due apologies to Queen Kivi.”

Ori laughed.

“No, Queen Kivi talks about that, too. I think she must have been part hobbit. Is it true that hobbits are as sexually active as rumor says?”

“We don’t have sex morning, noon, and night,” Bilbo protested. “Even for hobbits of leisure, that would hardly leave time for seven meals a day, marketing, gossiping, cooking, gardening, and a nice cup of tea and a pipe in front of the fire. That said, we do become sexually active as tweens, but we aren’t actually fertile until our late twenties, which is why age of majority is early thirties.”

“So, by that time you’ve been rolling around behind the coal bins for over a decade!”

“In a manner of speaking. We don’t have coal bins, but we do have plenty of flowery meadows and hay lofts. The average healthy young hobbit does not lack for opportunities.”

Ori considered. He was terribly fond of Bilbo and was only slightly intimidated by his experience. Ori didn’t let himself think about being intimate with Thorin, or at least he didn’t think about it closely. That seemed a bit too much too soon.

“Maybe,” Ori said, “we should just stick with teasing our mates for right now. If it excites them, then at least they would each have an outlet for it, that is, us.”

Bilbo nodded.

“Your logic is quite sound.”

“But I’d like to test something out first,” said Ori, looking over his shoulder at the house.

“As you will,” said Bilbo.
Ori took Bilbo’s face in his hands and kissed him. It wasn’t open-mouthed passion, but it wasn’t a brotherly peck, either, and Ori was startled to find Bilbo kissing him back.

At what felt like a natural juncture, Ori pulled away.

Bilbo ran his tongue over his bottom lip, his eyelids heavy.

“Well?” Bilbo breathed. “Was your experiment a success?”

“Yes, it was lovely.”

So they did it again.

It was odd for Ori to kiss someone so close to his own height, and so beardless. He thought poor Bilbo must be suffering beard burn all the time. But the hobbit’s mouth was soft and moist and, it seemed to Ori, so ridiculously well-made for kissing. Bilbo didn’t immediately set fire to his bits like Dwalin did, but Ori felt a more leisurely pleasure, like the coziness of a fire in the hearth instead of lava flowing into the forge.

By the time Ori felt his prick stir and reluctantly pulled away, they were clutching each other rather intimately.

“If I go any further, I’ll hurt myself when I stop,” said Ori apologetically.

“It does seem rather dangerous to continue,” said Bilbo. “But now we know.”

Ori grinned.

“Now we know.”

“So, if I pat your bum at odd times in front of Thorin and Dwalin, you won’t slug me into next week?”

Ori let himself fall sprawling on his back, and laughed at the sky.

“We should probably warn them, shouldn’t we.”

Bilbo poked his belly, convulsing Ori into giggles.

“Come now, Lord Ori. What fun is that?”

Ori and Bilbo exchanged looks then laughed again.

“You and Dwalin will be having dinner at Bag-End East tomorrow,” Bilbo announced.

“Yes, Professor Baggins,” Ori teased in a contrite voice. “What are your orders?”

“My orders?”

“What would you like us to bring?”

“You yourselves, silly dwarf.”

While Ori saw Bilbo’s point about not warning Dwalin and Thorin about intermittent bouts of slap and tickle, he did feel he should tell Dwalin that he wouldn’t mind at the very least the odd make-out session with Bilbo. As an adult dwarf, Ori wasn’t under obligation to tell his husband anything, but Dwalin had told Ori all about his adventures. Perhaps, at last, it was time to talk about the possibilities of Ori’s own.

He felt almost positive Dwalin would simply nod and encourage him, especially since Dwalin was part of the intended audience.

Wouldn’t he?

Ori mentally slapped himself about the head.

He would.

Ori was a big dwarf now, and he would proceed as big dwarrow did.

Dwalin was absent at dinner, off on patrol with Ori’s ‘western pals’. The elves had decided to return to the Moo & Cluck, Haldir being determined to go and actually remember the experience. Ori thought he wouldn’t really see much beyond Mr. Wandi, but Ori was a hopeless romantic.

“He’s quite civil when he relaxes,” said Fili. “He’s still kind of a dol dornog at times.”

Tilda looked up from her coconut spiced chicken.

“Did you just call Mr. Haldir a doorknob?”

“Oi!” Dain scolded them. “Tha’s me wee lad yer on abou’.”

“Not ‘doorknob’, Fili said, refilling Dain’s flagon. “Dol dornog. Dol being sindarin for ‘head’ and dornog-“

“Oh! I know this!” Tilda cried. “Dornog is khuzdul for a tossing stone.”

Thorin looked at one nephew, then the other.

“Am I missing something?”

Kili said, “You won’t if you go on day patrol, idad. Those badgers who go to school together are learning in two, sometimes three languages.”

Fili laughed and put on a high-pitched damling voice.

“Ikhuz, dum dumel! It’s all shandabied.”

“Dumdumel?” Thorin asked.

Bilbo patted his arm.

“Dum dum of all dum dums, my dear.”

“What have we done?” Thorin asked. “Ikhuz means stop. Shandabi means agreed. What were the little rock rats agreeing to do?”

Kili shook his head.

“Uh-uh. Wouldn’t tell you even if we knew. That would be like ratting out our younger selves and we’re not doing it.”

“There is a sort of honor in that, I suppose,” said Thorin.

“Thus, language evolves,” said Bilbo. “You’ve taken your language out into the daylight, and now it’s going to grow.”

“Yup!” said Frodo, nodding.

Dain sat back in his chair with his flagon in his hand and an evil smile on his face.

Sculdis gave him a side-eye.

“What’s going on in the crowded skull of yours?”

“Oh, just thinkin’ what Ulfr an’ the other staunch traditionalists’ll say, next time they’re in town and some street urchin calls them dumdumels. I wan’ t’ be here for that.”

Ori asked Bilbo, “Do you think it will qualify as a dialect?”

“Oh, I’m certain it will,” said Bilbo. “Frodo here is going to establish it in literature.”

“I am?” Frodo asked.

“Even if you don’t want to commit yourself to it full time, I’m sure you’ll want to toy with it a little.”

“Maybe I’ll come up with new words,” Frodo pondered. “I’m not as good as some of the others. Idad Balin doesn’t use a lot of v-vern… what do you call it, idad?”

“Vernacular, laddie.”

“Ver-NAK-yoo-ler,” Frodo tried out.

Sam said, “That sounds like the noise you get when the axle snaps on your cart and you keep driving!”

Ori took a good, long bath, reading a paper copy of a Shire novel he’d just purchased. He wondered if bathtub reading wasn’t really what was behind these cheaper editions after all. He certainly wouldn’t bring a one-of-a-kind manuscript into the tub. If this copy got soaked and was irreparable, he would simply send it with the other unofficial papers to be turned to ash and used again without a loss to literature. It would be a sad turn of events, but not catastrophic.

Afterward, he lay in bed, thinking about a million different things, but mostly just waiting for his husband to return, which he did in the course of time, freshly showered and smelling delicious.

“Dwalin?”

“Still awake, love?” Dwalin asked, moving cats and a warg pup aside on the bed to make room for himself. Nori-Pori meowed piteously at being relocated a foot to the left.

“Hold yer sauce, yeh silly thin’. Yeh ain’t bein’ murdered, nor shaved for the stewpot. Some people’s cats!”
Dwalin finally managed to get beneath the covers and turn on his side to kiss Ori.

“Dwalin,” Ori started again.

“Aye, love?”

“I have something to tell you.”

“G’wan.”

Ori took a deep breath and said all at one,

“Bilbo and I were talking about how much you and Thorin liked us messing about together and we decided we want to do something about that so we’re going to be teasing you a bit from now on and I wanted you to know I kissed Bilbo and I really liked it.”

He hid his burning face in Dwalin’s chest fur as Dwalin laughed.

“I know.”

“You know?” Ori echoed, pulling back in amazement.

“Garnet an’ Quartz tol’ me.”

Ori shot a look at the perches where the ravens pretended to be asleep. Of course, they were also pretending to snore, and this was punctuated by occasional snickering.

“Nosey bird brains!” Ori spat.

“Aw, now don’ be li’e tha’, love.” Dwalin gathered Ori up against him for a cuddle, a twinkle in his eye. “Must’ve bin cute, th’ two a’ yeh canoodlin’ in th’ meadow on a nice summer’s day. Sorry I missed it!”

“You are?”

“Aye. Yeh’ll jus’ have t’ do it again so I kin watch!”

“Dwalin!” Ori cried, tugging his beard smartly. “I’m trying to be serious here.”

“A’righ’, a’righ’, Lord Serious. Wha’s ailin’ yeh?”

“You really don’t mind?”

Dwalin rested his brow against Ori’s.

“Whether I do, ’r I don’, it’s no’ me business, is i’?”

“I’m not talking about manners, Dwalin. I’m talking about your heart.”

“So, why’re yeh doin’ it, then?”

“To turn you…o-oh!”

Dwalin laughed.

“I don’ thin’ I’m bein’ shortchanged, love.”
“But it’s more than that, isn’t it! I’m doing it because I like it, t-oh. But, what if you aren’t there and I still want to do it? Will you be upset?”

“Nah. We jus’ worked it out between us, didn’ we?”

“I guess we did. That’s good.” Ori let the conversation soak into his brain. “So, I know it’s not my business, but, would you tell me if you wanted someone that way?”

“Would yeh wan’ me t’?”

“It isn’t necessary, but I’d say I’d like to know, even after the fact.”

“I kin do tha’. See, all sorted.”

“Queen Kivi would be so proud of us,” Ori murmured.

He slid forward and kissed his husband and found himself rolled over and happily, arousingly squished into the mattress.

As Dwalin pulled back, Ori sighed and said, “I liked that.”

Dwalin kissed him. Ori sighed happily into Dwalin’s mouth, which soon wandered to his cheeks, his nose, his chin and finally, to Ori’s ear where he whispered.

“I figured, as long as we’re tryin’ t’ impress her majesty, we’d see if we could go two f’r two.”

Ori’s first day back at the library proved very quiet, and it was just as well. Ori spent most of it going through the incredibly large pile of scrivening work his friends had done while he was away. He was terribly pleased with the quality of their work and he told them so.

The scribes were gathered at their desks, doing some end-of-day copying when Master Brur came bursting out of his lair and hollered,

“A’righ’! Who moved me samich?”

The scribes looked at each other, then at Master Brur, who was purple about the ears with rage.

“I don’t think any of us did, Master Brur,” said Ori, feeling as though he had been deputized to speak.

“Don’ gimme tha’! I pu’ it down, I turned aroun’, an’ when I turned back, it’d moved exactly six inches to the left!”

Ori could only imagine Brur took out a ruler and measured it.

“Is it possible you nudged it with your elbow when you turned around?”

“No, it is no’. I don’ even have a stain on me sleeve. No’ a new one, anyway.” He narrowed his eyes at Ori. “D’yeh think it were a certain sneak we both know?”

Ori shook his head.

“If it was him, he would have eaten your sandwich.”
“Guid point. Mebbe them elves?”

“They’re in the topmost closed stacks,” Ori reminded him.

Teyan appeared behind Master Brur. She did a little dance and held her hands up behind his head to give him ‘elk antlers’.

The scribes didn’t dare react beyond their eyes growing very large.

“Wha’t’re yeh all gawpin’ abou’? None a’ yeh’ll confess?”

“I did it!” Teyan shrieked.

Brur swung around to stare at her.

“Who th’ fuck’re yeh? Yer no’ one a’ mine!”

“I’m Teyan, daughter of Eyan,” Teyan announced. She slipped down through the floor and appeared behind him again. “Yoooo-hoo! Right here!”

Brur turned again and glowered, opened his mouth, closed it and frowned.

“Why’re yeh all blue an’ wispy?”

“I’m dead,” she said merrily.

“Yer a ghost,” said Brur.

“Yes!”

“So yer tha’ Teyan. Did yeh muck with me samich?”

“Uh-huh!”

“Yeh pu’ tha’ blue shite on it?”

“Mmmm-hmm. When I licked it.”

Omi whispered, “Ewww!”

“I see,” said Brur. “Yeh plannin’ on doin’ tha’ again?”

“If I do, will you scream and yell and turn purple and jump up and down?”

“No.”

“Oh, well. I’ll have to think of something else.”

“Aye, guid luck wi’ tha’.”

He turned and marched back into his office and firmly closed the door.

Teyan turned to them with a frown.

“Tough rock to break!”

Omi said, “You don’t know the half. So, you’re the dead scribe who helped Ori?”
“I think I’m more like the dead scribe Ori helped. Do you mind?”

“That you helped Ori?”

“That I’m dead.”

“No, it’s not the strangest thing we’ve ever seen,” said Omi.

Loli added, “Maybe not even the strangest thing we’ve seen this week.”

“I can confirm that,” said Bujni. “Perhaps, Miss Teyan, you could spare me some time to answer my inquiries about your current non-physical state?”

Teyan considered and then shrugged.

“Sure. I’ve got plenty of time. Then, if you don’t mind, I have lots of questions about your coronation apparel. Was Miss Dipfa really wearing packing paper? How did she sew the seams securely? Were there rivets involved? Was there really an oliphaunt in the throne room? Who made her cap?”

While Bujni adjusted to being on the other end of the questions, Ori looked worriedly toward Master Brur’s office.

“G-go on, Ori-m-mate,” Arne encouraged. “You c-can do it.”

Ori went to Brur’s office door, took a deep breath, squared his shoulders and knocked.

“Piss off!” Brur barked.

“It’s Ori. May I come in?”

“If yeh mus’.”

Ori did so.

Brur sat at his desk with Eggr, Alyne, and Po, all of them looking down at Brur’s now-blue sandwich.

“I’m sorry to bother you, Master Brur.”

“Yer th’ only one who says tha’, an’ I believe it’s sincere.”

“Er… thank you. I’m afraid I-”

“Need another leave a’ absence.”

Ori pulled back his shoulders in surprise.

“Yes. Given that I just had one, I would fully understand if you asked for my resignation.”

“Orc shit,” said Brur. “Yer no’ goin’ anywhere. I already tol’ yeh, I knew I’d be sharin’ yeh with Oaksheild.”

“But this isn’t about my official duties.”

“Aye, it is. No’ yer duties t’ th’ king himsel’, bu’ yer duties t’ Mahal. I’m no’ fool enough t’ mess with Him. ‘Sides, He wrote me a note.”
“A note?

Brur gestured absently behind him. What Ori had taken for some stone work he must have forgotten was, in fact, a note. In a sharp, angular hand, Mahal had carved:

Dear Master Brur,

Please excuse Ori of Fundin from his library duties for the duration of his getting his quest materials together.

You can have him back when he’s finished, pinky swear.

Sincerely,

Your Maker.

“Seriously?” Ori asked.

“Aye. This is goin’ up in th’ scribes’ hall wi’ th’ rest a’ th’ samples.”

“You’re going to let someone come into your office to pry out the wall?”

“Yer kiddin’, righ’? I’m doin’ it meself. Don’ tell Sadie!”

Ori thought Sadie would probably know by some dwarf sixth sense, but he had other business to tend.

“So,” Ori started. “I can have some time off?”

“Yeh was involved in this remakin’ a’ th’ worl’. I thin’ I kin give yeh a month ‘r so t’ ge’ yer thoughts together.”

“I’m afraid it may take at least that long to get the presentation ready.” Ori sighed. “It’s a toss up whether I’d rather do the presentation or face more orcs.”

Finally Brur looked up at him, and his hard features morphed into something terrifyingly like a smile.

“Lad, promise me yeh’l do’ try t’ do this all yersel’. Yeh go’ good folk, talented folk, willin’ t’ help yeh.”

Eggr poked at the sandwich with his beak and drew back with a ravenish ‘ick’ face. The other two ravens laughed at him.

“I realize and appreciate that fact, Master Brur,” said Ori. “In fact, I was hoping you would read through the final manuscript and tell me what you think.”

“Oh, aye. I’ll be doin’ tha’ if yeh’d asked ‘r no’.”

That evening, Dwalin and Ori arrived at Bag End East to an all-enveloping scent of fresh blackberry tart.

Ori stuck his head around the door jamb into the kitchen.

“That smells wonderful, Bilbo.”

“Oh! There you are! Yes, mountain blackberries are Thorin’s favorite, and they’re finally ripe for the picking. Dwalin, have you come to lay siege to the cookie jar, or can I interest you in dinner, first?”

“I kin postpone th’ siege,” Dwalin assured him.

“Quite forbearing of you. Where is that dwarf? Thorin was supposed to be on hand to greet you and make sure you were well-supplied with drink.”

“I’m here, ghivashel,” said Thorin, crossing the sitting room. “Fili was up in arms about mithril.”

“Isn’t he usually?” Bilbo asked, shooing them out of the kitchen.

“There’s some controversy as to whether mithril workers belong to the jewelers’ guild or the smiths’ guild.”

“Let me guess,” said Bilbo. “They both want to lay claim to all that mithril?”

“And Kir thinks the mithril workers should be their own guild, as they were in Khazad-dûm. He’s told the heads of both the other guilds he’ll fight them over it. Fisticuffs, apparently.”

Bilbo rolled his eyes and returned to the kitchen, muttering about people with dented skulls and little feet.

Ori was horrified.

“Master Kir can barely stand up!”

“But there’s nothing lacking in his upper body strength,” said Thorin, leading the way to the overstuffed furniture by the fireplace. “Minta’s afraid he’ll fall over and shatter into a million little pieces. Fili is trying to get him to go for arm wrestling. At least that way he’ll be sitting down.”

Dwalin flopped onto the sofa, Thorin went to the sideboard. Ori followed him.

“Thorin, I wanted to give you these before I forgot.”

He held out the Light of Eärendil.

“Oh, thank you, Ori,” said Thorin.

He took it and moved to the mantel, where he took down the original envelope, put the light back into it and replaced it among the iron ravens.

“Why do you leave that there in an envelope?” Ori asked.

“Keeps it safe enough,” said Thorin. “That’s what Bilbo says.”

Bilbo shouted from the kitchen, “It’s good enough for the simarils!”

“I’m not contradicting you, ghivasha,” Thorin promised.
Ori held out the mithril shirt of mail and said, “Dwalin helped me clean it and everything. It’s really hard to get dried orc blood and stink out of all those little rings.”

Thorin took the shirt, looked it over, and handed it back with a smile.

“You keep it, Ori. You earned it.”

For a moment Ori was speechless, then he was horrified.

“You think I’m going to need it again, don’t you.”

“You’re a Durin. I’d say it was inevitable. And now, even if you outgrow it, we have the mithril to add more rings.”

“Thank you - I think,” said Ori.

Dwalin and Thorin exchanged grins.

“He’s jus’ tryin’ t’ keep yeh safe, love,” Dwalin said.

“From myself, apparently,” said Ori in dismay.

Bilbo called them to the table, which was laid out for just the four of them. Ori wondered what Bilbo had in mind or if it was just a chance for a quiet evening. Frodo and Sam now shared the three main meals of the day with the entirety of the family in Fundin House, and the intermittent hobbit meals were given to them by Bilbo in Bag-End East.

Thus Dori and Balin had the strange joy of spoiling the faunts, the younger set and even the easterling children while their parents worked at the bakery.

Alatar did not stop her duties in the kitchen and Pallando was often there with her.

Bilbo served thick slices of tomatoes roasted under little blankets of bahvlo cheese, generously garnished with slender ribbons of fresh basil.

This was follow by tiny, cheese-filled dumplings under a sauce of sour cream redolent with chives, and caramelized onions.

After this, when they were deep into the beef and vegetable stew, Thorin said,

“Ori, I propose that you take a leave of absence from your royal scribe duties.”

Ori’s stomach hit the floor.

“Alright, Thorin,” he said meekly. “If that’s your wish.”

Thorin raised his eyes to the ceiling and muttered, “This is all your fault, you ancient git.”

Then he looked back at Ori and continued.

“Ori, it’s not because I’m displeased and want to replace you. It’s because, right now, the Quest and where it led is more important.”

“It is?”

“Yes, and you have to make the presentation, possibly to a roomful of marble-headed dwarven
“That had occurred to me,” said Ori, nodding, “but, Thorin, this could take months.”

“If you have to follow me every time I go haring off, it’ll take a lot longer than that.”

Ori thought about those particular dwarven idiots. The scholars might listen, and might believe what Ori had to say, or not. A little thing like blowing up a mountain range was a debatable occurrence. Dwarf scholars weren’t even unanimous in the belief that elves existed, though elves appeared in Erebor in increasing numbers. Ori heard a scholar recently say something about mass hallucination.

“This could go terribly wrong, Thorin. You have my preliminary account. It reads like a Shire tale with a lot more gruesome bits.”

“Which I intent to steal, by the way,” announced Bilbo.

“We knew tha’,” said Dwalin.

“What if I can’t get any of them to believe me?” Ori asked. “I can’t expect Mahal to pop up to save my arse whenever I run into trouble. I don’t want to make you look foolish.”

Thorin put down his tankard of ale, went to wipe his mustache with his hand, saw Bilbo being brave and opted for his napkin instead.

“Ori, these are some of the same people who accept the Infernal Adventures of Durin the Deathless as fact.”

“But Durin isn’t a weedy little scribe from the wrong side of Dale.”

“No, but neither are you. You are a member of the royal household, and a hero several times over. You have no idea how well you’re regarded.”

Ori looked down at the table and mumbled.

“I only did what had to be done.”

“I see,” said Thorin. “And, were you afraid when you did all these things?”

“Anyone would be! Anyone with sense. Well, there’s Glorfindel, but I don’t think he counts. I don’t think he feels fear.”

Bilbo agreed, “Returning from incineration will do that.”

Thorin sat back, regarding Ori fondly.

“You were afraid, but you did all these things. Why?”

“For my family, for the Durins, for you. That’s why I’m so afraid I’ll destroy it, everything we’ve built, all the good will the crown has earned.”

“A few weeks ago I escorted an easterling lady and her daughter all over Erebor, and pledged myself as protection for them, and accepted the consequences should the people find my actions despicable.”

“It was the only thing you could do,” said Ori. “The only honorable thing.”
“It was, but that didn’t mean my head wouldn’t be on pike if enough dwarrow objected. I was lucky Dori returned when she did. There are no guarantees, Ori-mate. You’ve been brave all those times. You can be brave again.”

“Sides,” said Dwalin, “me an’ Thorin an’ Bilbo’ll be righ’ there. ‘Specially me.”

Ori leaned into him, though he almost overset his chair doing it.

“It’s true, I always feel I can do anything when I’m with you.”

Dessert was the meltingly sweet blackberry tart served warm with frozen custard. Ori and Thorin had a big chunk each and Bilbo and Dwalin all but fought over the rest of it.

After dinner, Dwalin and Thorin had the effrontery to talk ‘business’.

“Really!” Bilbo sighed.

“They’re obsessed,” Ori teased.

“I believe you’re right, m’lord,” said Bilbo, linking his arm through Ori’s. “Come along. We’ll leave them to themselves. I want to show you what I did with the ‘mauve’ room.”

“Nailed it shut?”

“Wish I’d thought of that first,” said Bilbo.

Bilbo and Ori wandered through the house, Ori relieved and happy that Bilbo had seen fit to paint over the mauve room in a jewel-tone aventurine with lacy medallions of deep plum around the upper border. Mauve was far too timid a color for a dwarf, never mind a hobbit.

“I hope you don’t mind,” said Ori, “but I told Dwalin about yesterday in the meadow.”

“And he said it was fine with him and was sorry he’d missed it.”

Ori stared at him.

“I talked to Thorin yesterday and Thorin predicted it. Of course, now we’ve excited their anticipation.”

“Which is just what we wanted!” Ori cried.

“Exactly. We can’t disappoint them now.”

In the bedroom, Ori admired Kyur’s painting of the origins of the Stonefoot axe dance, orcs dead everywhere at the warriors’ feet, though he hoped the original dancers hadn’t been quite so naked and aroused at the time.

“Master Kyur’s work is quite something,” said Bilbo.

“I feel like an underachiever,” said Ori. “All my models are doing is a little erotic cuddling.”
“Tenderness can be as erotic as anything else,” said Bilbo. “By the way, of the three of us, you came out looking best.”

“Best where?”

“In the dirty booklet Dis bought.”

“She bought that?” Ori nearly shrieked.

“She thought Thorin and I might like it as a betrothal present.”

“That’s really odd.”

“Of course it’s odd! Imagine getting a present on your betrothal instead of giving one.”

“Wait, are you officially betrothed?”

“We will be as of tomorrow,” said Bilbo with a grin.

“Really?” Ori gasped.

“The private betrothal anyway. The public betrothal will have to wait until we can make a ridiculous number of arrangements.”

“Congratulations!”

Ori hugged Bilbo right off his feet.

“Sorry,” said Ori gleefully.

“You can’t be that sorry,” said Bilbo. “My toes still aren’t touching the ground.”

“Oops,” said Ori, still not letting him loose.

“Very funny, Lord Ori.”

Ori did put Bilbo down, but he didn’t let go of him.

“Who else knows? Does Dori know? What about Dis? Do you know what will happen if Dori isn’t allowed to make a cake?”

“Dis knows, or she guessed. Terrifying dam. I don’t think I’d survive meeting her mother.”

“Your mothers adore each other.”

“Perhaps the most terrifying fact of all,” said Bilbo. “We’ll make the general announcement tomorrow at breakfast.”

“Cake?” Ori prompted.

“Is this in the interest of my welfare or do you just want cake?”

“Both,” said Ori, nodding.

“Dwarrow! Dori can make as many cakes as she likes before or after the day of the official betrothal. As the party whose hand was requested, it’s my right to make the betrothal cake for my prospective in-laws. Reasonably, this could mean everyone in Durin House and beyond and including the elves and men, so the cake will be quite large.”

“Xocolatl?”

“Naturally! I’m not unaware how well that’s to be received, though I will be making layers of carrot cake and lemon cake as well.”

“Can I tell Dwalin?”

“Thorin planned to tell him t-”

“Yeh sneaky bastard!”

“-onight,” Bilbo finished. “Shall we join the festivities? I bought some lovely berry wine for the occasion.”

Bilbo and Ori sat in front of the fireplace, unravelling a skein of yarn, sipping berry wine, and growing increasingly giggly while Thorin and Dwalin serenaded them with harp and viol.

Bilbo said, “You know, Ori, you have the nicest beard.”

“I do?” Ori asked.

The hobbit grinned and ran his hand through it lingeringly.

“Oh, yes, what a lovely texture. I could play with it all night.”

“I could let you play with it all night,” Ori admitted, sighing. He leaned into Bilbo’s hand.

The music had stopped, for some reason.

Ori and Bilbo turned to discover their respective mates, bright red and staring.

“Oh,” said Bilbo, “but this is going to be fun.”
Fans, Fury, and Fatigued by family.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Ori finds time to help out, as usual, and things happen strangely ... as usual. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next morning, Ori woke at his usual time. Dwalin had rolled out of bed and was pulling on his trousers.

“Wha’ are yeh doin’ awake, love?” asked Dwalin.

“It’s time to get up.”

“Though’ yeh migh’ wan’ t’ sleep in at leas’ one day.”

“No, I want to do this right. Besides, Thorin and Bilbo are supposed to make their announcement this morning! I’m not missing that!”

“An’ t’ morrh?”

“I’m getting up the same time, no matter what. Unless we’re both here on a rest day. Then I’m staying in bed with you. When I’m working, I’m even going to get properly dressed.”

“Really?” Dwalin teased.

“Alright, I’m going to wear my cardie. I miss it. You’re not wearing a uniform today?”

“I promised our Dori I’d take her t’ th’ market, help her pick ou’ yer name day present.”

“You’re taking Dori to the Alley of Divine Bliss?” Ori blinked innocently.

“Funny dwarf. It’s no’ worth me skin t’ even suggest it. Though, f’r Balin’s nameday present, I was thinkin’ a’ buyin’ him Durin IV’s penis.”

“You could have it engraved.”

“Aye, ‘A dick fr’m a dick’. Perfect.”

“He’d use it to prop open the bedroom door and torment us. You know, my birthday isn’t until a month or so after Durin’s Day, right?”

“I have all tha’ information by heart. Dori insisted. Yer favorite color’s amethyst. Yeh could read b’fore yeh could walk. Yer afraid a’ wasps, bu’ no’ bees ‘r spiders.”

“Wow, Dori did insist.”
When they were sitting over the pitiful remains of toasted wiggs, spicy scrambled eggs, and sausages, Thorin cleared his throat and he and Bilbo stood and held hands.

They immediately had everyone’s attention.

“We’d like to make a little announcement,” said Thorin, visibly abashed.

“You’re preggers,” said Nori.

“Y- No! Nori!” Thorin cried in exasperation.

Dori smacked Nori in the head.

“Hush! He’s struggling with his emotions as it is.”

Thorin groaned and rubbed his face with his free hand. He looked at Bilbo imploringly.

“We are engaged to be married,” said Bilbo simply.

They were immediately buried in the embrace of ecstatic, shouting dwarrow, men and elves. Dori put her hand dramatically to her heart and declared it was all she could wish. Fili and Kili seized Bilbo and tossed him in the air, demanding to call him ‘uncle’. Bilbo cried that they were lovely idiots and they’d best put him down. Thorin was danced around in turn by all his kin, by Bard, even, at one point, by Thranduil. Butter and Sugar forgot all obedience and bounced around the excited family like puppies. Frodo heaved a long-suffering sigh.

“Finally!” he cried. “Keeping secrets is really hard!”

Dori laughed and hugged him.

“You are quite forbearing, my tiny pet.”

“Yep, I am,” said Frodo. “What does ‘forbearing’ mean?”

“It’s what I have suffered through, every day! It means you are patient in the face of suffering!”

Ori stared and Nori snorted into his cup.

Dori shot him a look.

“Hush! You’re ruining the moment!” She turned to Thorin and Bilbo. “When are you announcing it to the people?”

“A week from first work day,” said Thorin, “at open court.”

“But you’ll do the braiding now,” said Dori.

It was not a request.

Thorin grinned.

“Yes, Bearer, we will do the braiding now.”

Thorin reached into his pocket and handed a box to Balin. Balin opened it and Dori peeked in, squealed, then closed her eyes.
“Ya gonna fall out, our Dori?” Nori jibed.

Dori’s eyes flew open as she frowned.

“Hush! I’m opening my consciousness to the ether for the blessing of Mahal and Yavanna on these beads!”

Ori heard snickers in the back of his head.

“Like they bleedin’ need ‘em,” Mahal chuckled.

“Oh hush,” reproved Yavanna. “You heard Dori. Your Thorin is struggling with his emotions.”

“They’ve already fucked. It’s me who’e strugglin’ here.”

“Darling, blessings now, fucking later.”

“Righty-o, me gem.”

Ori almost groaned.

Dori looked glowingly serene and daintily fluttered her fingers above the beads and then leaned over the box in Balin’s hands and kissed each bead. She stood back, looking pleased with herself and flapped her fingers at Bilbo and Thorin. There was a polite round of applause as no one had a ready reaction to the Bearer’s blessing.

Nori said, “Best clean the spit off ‘em before you use ‘em, our Thorin.”

“At least my breath doesn’t smell like vinegar,” Dori hissed.

Everyone wanted a look at the beads. Balin very kindly showed them around the table before bringing them back to Thorin and Bilbo.

They were miniature treasures of openwork mithril, studded with sparkling diamonds, and inside, a curious grass green stone with traces of yellow veining.

“Is that a type of jade?” Ori asked.

“Yes, a long time ago, Hild sent me a block. It’s been in my secret stash this whole time, apparently waiting for a child of Yavanna to wear it,” said Thorin.

Bilbo shook his head and chuckled. Everyone else groaned.

Roäc chided, “Thorin, that’s sappy even for you.”

“Aye,” Baluchistan commented from Gridr’s hood. “Yeh mus’ be very proud, our Thorin.”

“As a matter of fact, I am,” said Thorin. He turned and smiled at Bilbo. “Shall we begin?”

Ori expected the vows to be in khuzdul and westron. Instead, Thorin seemed to be speaking a third language Ori had never heard, a string of soft consonants and rounded vowels that gave Ori the shivers. With Thorin’s deep, smooth voice, the words sound almost erotic. Ori was dying to ask, but he knew he had to wait until after the ceremony.

Bilbo’s hair was stubbornly curly, and not easily woven for the right braid, so it had to be modified a little, using a method common for badgerlings, whose hair was not quite long enough for anything else. Expertly, Thorin wove in strands from each side of the braid as he went.

Everyone leaned in when Bilbo braided Thorin’s hair, and spoke the words in khuzdul. His accent was impressive, and his fingers were quite nimble, even though the braid was not as even as it would someday be. A little imperfection in the betrothal braid was charming.

“Done and done, my king?” Bilbo asked with a twinkle in his eye.

“Done and done, ghivashel.”

Dain huffed impatiently.

“Bloody kiss already!”

The pair obeyed and there was a shout of cheers.

Then Bilbo sat and put Frodo on his knee and Thorin said something entirely unexpected, in khuzdul, while adding a Longbeard braid and Durin bead to the hair at the nape of the faunt’s neck. Sam leaned against Bilbo’s side with Bilbo’s arm around him and watched with wide eyes.

Of course. Frodo was being adopted.

When Thorin was finished he pressed his forehead to Frodo’s and smiled.

“It is done,” he said.

Frodo squeaked and threw his arms around Thorin’s neck, as everyone cheered again.

Thorin lifted Frodo up and held him, laughing.

“That braid must be powerful. Your grip is already getting stronger.”

“It is, isn’t it!” Frodo agreed. He rubbed his nose against Thorin’s. “Thank you, idad!”

“You are most welcome, o lord of muffins.”

“Oh, wait. Doesn’t Uncle Bilbo get a braid like this?”

“He will at the wedding, I promise,” said Thorin.

“Your turn’s up, idad!” Kili announced.

“Hand over the cousin,” Fili demanded. “He’s officially ours!”

Frodo was seized, tickled, dangled by his ankles and was quickly laughing too hard to breathe. Thorin leaned over and kissed Bilbo while the Durins and their guests called their congratulations.

“Well done, my dear,” said Bilbo.

“Well done, Mister Thorin!” Sam cried.

Fili threw Frodo over his shoulder, Kili swept Sam up onto his hip and the four of them lit out for the meadow with warg puppies right on their tails.

Dis embraced Bilbo rapturously. Ori thought the pair of them looked a little teary-eyed. Dis removed Frodo from her sons and proceeded to keep him and Sam on her lap for the rest of the meal. Jani was amused.
“No contracts?” Ori asked Balin as he sketched. On duty or not, Ori wasn’t passing up on the opportunity to record the event.

“They’re all drawn up, but folk’ll wan’ t’ see ‘em signed,” said Balin. “We’ll do tha’ next open court.”

“If Bilbo’s already wearing the braid, we’d better prepare for the place to be overflowing with people.”

“I’ve already warned Master Tin an’ Lord Zark we’ll be consumin’ large quantities a’ their finest now through Yule at leas’.”

Ori waited until the newly betrothed couple had accepted everyone else’s well wishes except his and Dwalin’s.

“I still say yer a sneaky bastard,” Dwalin told Thorin as they embraced then knocked brows.

“I didn’t think it qualified as a secret,” said Thorin. “Apparently every dwarf, man and elf in three kingdoms knew before I did.”

“Should’ve listened t’ yer drawers when they whispered,” said Dwalin. “Tha’ll teach yeh t’ go wi’ou’ yer skivvies.”

Ori hugged Thorin and then Bilbo. Bilbo laughed and said, “Go on and ask before your skull pops off.”

“Was that a hobbit language?” Ori asked. “Is it a secret like khuzdul was? When did it develop? Did Yavanna give it to you like Mahal gave khuzdul to the dwarf?”

“I did ask for it, didn’t I,” said Bilbo. “It’s a sort of cradle language most of us speak before we venture out beyond the front garden on our own. It’s very old, obviously, and it doesn’t have a written form, or even a name. The men of Angmar called it ‘hobytlaschpek’, but I think they were borrowing from the Numenoreans.”

“It’s very beautiful.”

“Especially the way Thorin speaks it,” said Bilbo, leaning into the beaming king.

“I had very good teachers,” said Thorin. “Truthfully, it was a lot easier to learn than baking muffins, no matter how well those muffins turned out.”

“That’s settled,” Dori approved. “Now, as we’re speaking of baked goods, what kind of cake would you like?”

Bilbo said, “Actually, I was going to ask for your help with that, our Dori. As the party whose hand was requested, it’s my duty to make the betrothal cake, but since it has to feed the entire family, if I were to do it myself, and I wanted it in a week, I’d have to start now.”

“Well blessed Mahal, we can’t have that!” Dori cried. “I would very much like to offer my assistance!”

“Thank you, Dori,” said Thorin.

“Yes, thank you,” Bilbo echoed. “Things will go far smoother with you there.”

Dori embraced them tenderly. Bilbo winked at Ori from around Dori’s arm and Ori grinned.
“What?” Nori groused. “No abuse on them not askin’ her ladyship’s permission to marry?”

“Permission? Why, I practically arranged it!” cried Dori. “What better permission is there than that?”

Balin smiled proudly.

“None better, beloved.”

Nori muttered about Balin knowing what side his bread was buttered.

After breakfast, Ori went to his office and started getting his materials together. He had just settled down to sort through all his quest notebooks when he heard a scratch at the door.

“Please come in,” he said.

Mistress Dazla entered, looking apologetic.

“Beg pardon, Lord Ori, but Mistresses Vi and Margr have come.”

“But Dori’s away at the market.”

“They actually asked for you.”

That set off alarms in his gut, but he was too honest to claim to be indisposed.

He sighed and stood.

“I’ll go put on a proper tunic. Please tell them I’ll be right there.”

“I’ve put them in the sitting room, milord.”

She curtsied and went out.

Doffing his cardie in the bedroom, he laughed at himself. As if Vi and Margr would be offended by his knitwear. It spoke to how well-trained he had become.

“There’s our Ori,” clamored Vi.

The sisters sat at the table in front of the fireplace with tea and jelly buns. They wore old shifts and had kerchiefs on their heads. Their beards, unadorned, ran in single plaits from their chins.

Something had riled them enough to make them leave their home without first ‘gussying up’. They kept a gig now, with a pony to pull it, which was likely how they had arrived.

He bowed to them, which set them off in snorts of laughter.

“Sit yer arse down an’ have a cuppa,” said Margr “We need your help.”

He did so, though he forewent drinking all of it before he asked what he could do for them.

“This come in th’ post this mornin’,” said Margr.
She slid an envelope across the table to him. It was addressed ‘Mistresses Vi and Margr, Dale’.

“An’ we can’t read it, a’ course,” said Vi. “Glorfy’s on patrol an’ our Milgr’s off keepin’ house f’r our Bard.”

“I’m honored you came all this way to ask me,” said Ori. Margr and Vi exchanged nervous glances.

“We couldn’t stand t’ wait,” said Vi.

It occurred to Ori as he looked over the envelope, that they had never received a letter in their lives. This must come as quite a shock.

“Do you know anyone in the Shire?” he asked. “This is hobbitish paper, and definitely hobbitish handwriting.”

“No’ a soul,” said Vi.

“If I may?”

Ori took his boot knife and slit open the envelope. He scanned the contents quickly, his eyebrows climbing his forehead.

“Oooooo whatever is it?” Margr asked, clutching Vi’s arm. Vi clutched back, looking terrified.

“Is someone we don’ know dead?”

