Summary

Dwalin Fundin/Ori Ri, Dwalin/Ori, Dwori, Balin Fundin/Dori Ri, Balin/Dori, Darlin. Soon Nori/Bofur, Eventual Fili/Sigrid, and Kili/Tauriel, Several OC dwarrows. Eventual Thorin Oakenshield/Bilbo Baggins, Thilbo, Bagginsheid, Ori of the Brothers Ri is a freelance scribe in the poorest part of the City of Dale. He rushes to rescue his trouble-making elder brother Nori and finds a life, romance and food in the Mountain among royalty. Dori has secrets! And there’s nothing like a fairy-tale of scandal and lost nobility! The story is completely from Ori’s point of view. Expect appearances from Thror, Frerin (who is an utterly spoiled brat - apologies to Frerin worshipers), Lady Galadriel, Thranduil and practically everyone else. This is totally safe for Dain fans! Smaug never hatched and Isildur listened to Elrond (somebody has to) and the one Ring no longer exists. Sauron is just a bad guy with orc armies. There are some serious bits, but mostly it’s just a lively romp with food. Did we mention the food?

Notes
Those of you have read Stevvie’s previous epic know she is heavily influenced by Jane Austen and more so by Georgette Heyer’s regencies. Dolly loves them, too (and is unanimous in this - Lots of ridiculdockle pop culture references. See how many you can find!). There are some shocking bits; fist fights, mentions of past violence, murders, and abortion but in the past and Dwalin and Nori use rather a lot of bad language. This is not at the level of Pride of the Jedi silliness but Ori has some truly loopy adventures and lots of interesting friends, both canonical and OC. We have included various hints from other fanfics we have enjoyed. Our favorite authors listed below. Also the names of Erda (Bombur’s wife), Gridr (Gloin’s better half), and Binni (Oin’s hubster) as all used as tokens of respect to original authors.

We bow in the four directions and to the following writers who have blown our tiny minds with their writing :-

determinamfidd: Empress of all Tolkien fanfic.
sam_ptarmigan: As no one can write Dori like Sam! And Sam’s term ‘jill’ for bearer.
badskippy: Intertwined - so cool!
bubbyssub: Bother had me in stitches laughing
Meg_Thilbo: My big fat dwarven wedding was hilarious!! scarletjedi: Comes around again - Wow!
crueltyland: Adorable fics!! sum_nemo: Because there’s nothing like a good old accidental wedding and the beautiful hairbrush!
Bluesparkle and Hattedhedgehog for the saga of Chicken, inspired by a clip of Jed Brophy somewhere on the ’net.

Finally Stevie would like to thank profusely editor and co-author Dollypegs. She has been amazingly patient with Stevie’s lapses in grammar and spelling, an excellent sounding board, and made Stevie draw rooms and interiors so the descriptions matched! (Stevie recommends this practice!). Dolly also has the amazing ability to edit on Stevie’s laptop while Stevie’s driving both of them to work!
Finally you can find us on Tumblr as Stevviefox or Dollypegs. We delight in kudos, feedback, other sorts commentary and any artwork you fancy sending us. We also adore any suggestions or recipes you’d like to send.

See the end of the work for more notes.
Scares, saves and socks

Chapter by Stevie_Foxx

Ori of the Brothers Ri and son of Rikmha was busy at his desk come kitchen table in the little house in Steam Alley in the town of Dale outside of the Great Dwarf Mountain Kingdom of Erebor. He was proud of the work he could do as a free lance journeyman scribe. True, he and his two elder brothers were amongst the poorest of dwarrow and lived outside the mountain but he was talented in his penmanship, drawing and languages which included Ancient Khuzdul, every day Westron and Sindarin.

He was busy transcribing a letter for the master of his eldest brother Dori. The master was a weapons smith who coveted Dori’s eye and hand for knives. He was fulfilling an order for the current Steward of Gondor, which had required Dori to be away yesterday, today, and tomorrow. Ori was half way through the letter when there came a bang against the door and little Tilda Bardsdatter nearly fell through it.

“Tilda, whatever is the matter?” Ori cried, out of his chair and crossing to help her up.

Tilda scrambled to her feet.

“Oh, Ori! It’s terrible! Nori’s been taken by the Master of Dale and they’re going to execute him!”

Ori felt his heart drop into his stomach. Nori was between Dori and Ori in age and just as dear. Ori flung himself to the kitchen cupboard and reached to the back, fumbled the lock of the strongbox and wrenched out the bag of all the coin he’d saved from his pay for the last six months.

Tilda slammed the door behind them as Ori lead the way down the street toward the main road that lead into the center of Dale.

Ori raced around the corner and crashed into what he thought might be a wall. He almost fell flat on his back but his arms were caught fast in a strong grip.

“Oi, lad!”

Ori’s heart sank. Of all the times to run into a dwarf cadre. Nori was a well-known mischief maker among his own, and for Ori to run straight into Dwalin, son of Fundin, Captain of the Royal Guard of Erebor and Protector of the City of Dale at a time like this didn’t bode well.

Ori struggled without success to free himself of the captain, who looked at him with narrowed eyes.

“Please excuse me, Captain Dwalin, sir. I must hurry.”

The captain set him on his feet and looked him over.

“Bit of a rush, Ori-lad?”

“Please! I must go!”

Ori yanked himself free and fled to his goal. He felt sick as he heard the fading voice of Tilda telling the captain that Nori was going to be killed very soon. A part of his brain registered delight in how handsome the captain looked this day and the fact he actually knew Ori’s name!

Ori yanked to a stop in front of the Master’s grand house and High Court of Dale. The guards in front were busy talking to one another. Ori slipped passed. He tried the double doors. They were barred, so he sidled to the right and slid in the open window, and hurried into the opulent meeting room where the Master regularly ‘held court’. There before him was a vile sight. The Master sat heavy in his extravagant, overlarge chair on the raised platform. He was ostentatious in his person and dress. His oily smile ranged over those before him: three of his soldiers, basically hired thugs, two of whom were holding a kneeling Nori.

“Wait!” Ori cried.

Nori turned. Only Ori registered the horror in his older brother’s eyes. The thugs snarled and one reached for Ori. The Master waved an idle hand.

“No, let it come forward. Now who might you be, little rat?”
Ori bristled at the slur but held himself and advanced to stop by Nori.

“Master, I am Ori of the Brothers Ri, Nori’s younger brother. I have brought his fine.”

The thugs sneered and elbowed each other. The Master smirked.

“Oh, indeed, have you? Unfortunately, his fine is his life. Have you enough to buy a life in your little bag?”

The Master nodded and Ori gasped as the bag was snatched from him and its contents dumped out on the floor. The Master leaned forward, regarding the collection of copper, silver and a few gold coins.

“I think not. Not even for this piece of dung. Anything else?”

Ori thought wildly for a moment.

“You said a life? Then I offer myself. I give myself in turn for my brother.”

“Ori, no!” Nori growled.

“Quiet,” Ori hissed and put himself in front of his brother.

The Master seemed nonplussed for a moment then as he looked Ori over slowly, his ugly mouth began to smile. Ori didn’t think this was any improvement whatsoever but stood his ground.

“Well, well, well, I’ve heard of the Ri and you are the youngest. Oh yes, yes I shall like this arrangement much better. Guard, throw this other one away. I’ll keep this little thing as my new pet.”

“No!” Nori shouted and got to his feet.

The thugs he’d throw off leaped back to grab at him but there was loud shouting and crashing outside.

“What in-?”

The Master never finished his words as the double doors smashed open and in rode a cadre of Erebor royal guards. Ori was half over-joyed and half horror stricken. In the lead, on a very large, malevolent-looking goat, sat an equally large, malevolent-looking Captain Dwalin.

The captain rode forward to stop directly behind Ori. Ori glanced to his side and found he was eye to eye with the goat. He’d never realized goat pupils were square.

“Afternoon, Master Calmar,” the captain began in a conversational tone. “Heard you were havin’ a hearin’ concernin’ one of our folk, so I’m here t’ represent His Majesty Under the Mountain.”

The Master turned ingratiating.

“No, never, of course not, my good captain. I would never hold a case against one of your people without first consulting your Liege Lord. This is merely a matter of payment.”

“Payment?” The captain laid his war hammer across his knees and regarded the Master with a disarming smile that fooled no one. The rest of soldiers and goats seemed to stray about aimlessly but quickly hemmed the six persons in the room into a circle. The Master looked about in shock as he realized he was surrounded. His thugs muttered amongst each other in fear. Nori grabbed Ori’s arm and pulled him nearer.

“An’ what sort a’ payment would this be?” the captain prodded.

The Master licked his lips then began plaintively.

“That evil dwarf with the three prong beard robbed me! I wish re-payment and a fine of course!”

“Did he now?”

The captain eyed Nori, who had the manners to flush slightly before shrugging and grinning. Captain Dwalin pointed at the scattering of Ori’s pay. Nori swooped in to scoop it back up. Dwalin rolled his eyes and turned his attention back to the Master.

“I take it, then, yer thinkin’ that lovely pile a’ coin is reimbursement?”

“Ye… No! You don’t understand, my good captain! We have a file on this one. All his thievery.”

The Master snatched up a thick pile of papers from his lap and waved them about for good measure.

Captain Dwalin rode forward with his hand out. The Master placed the file in the captain’s hand. Captain Dwalin leafed through it with a disinterested air. His goat leaned down to have a taste of the rug on the platform.

“And,” the master continued, eyeing the goat worriedly, “that other one has just pledge his life as payment for it. So, you see, it was all but a small matter and it is clean and tidy now. There’s nothing for you to do here.”

The Master rose with another oily smile.

Dwalin’s goat spat out the pieces of rug, looking unimpressed.

“Right ye’ are, Master Calmar.” Dwalin smirked back. “Come along, lads. Let’s be getting’ back.”

The captain reached Ori’s side and held out his hand.

“Up yeh get, lad.”

Ori stared.

The Master stared forward crying, “Wait! He’s mine!”

Captain Dwalin looked piercingly down at Ori.

“Ori of the Brothers Ri, did yeh just say yeh’d stand as payment f’r yer brother’s deeds?”

“I did.” Ori said and shivered.

“Well, then I accept yer payment f’r yer brother. Up ye get.”

“But-” the Master began.

Captain Dwalin swung round, goat and all, facing the Master.

“Unless it’s f’r goods ‘r in gold, payment a’ dwarrow goes t’ dwarrow same as payment f’r men goes t’ men. Yeh sayin’ th’ treaty between our folk’s no’ honored by yeh, Calmar, Master a’ Laketown?”

The Master’s mouth opened and shut helplessly.

Ori’s arm was taken in a firm grasp and he flopped as he was swung bodily up and seated before Captain Dwalin.

Next thing he knew they were out in the sunshine and riding up the road that lead to the Great Gate of Erebor. One of the guards was talking to a raven which flew off at speed to the mountain.
Ori glanced about. He was crushed against the captain’s chest. The feeling of the goat trotting beneath him was most unsettling and strangely enough most of the streets were empty here.

The captain slowed, and when they reached stone open courtyard before the gate, Ori noticed they were right before the door of the Mountain. It towered above them. The vast statues of warrior dwarrow on either side carved from the sold green granite of the lonely mountain itself.

A large brasier sat on either side of the open door before them. Being still early spring and after the noon hour, there were no merchants or deliveries coming in or out. The captain dismounted and set Ori on his feet. Nori rushed up from another goat and tried to seize hold of Ori. The captain stopped him with a large hand against his chest. The captain reached into his tunic and brought out the sheaf of papers he had taken from the Master and gave Nori a look. Nori swallowed whatever he had been about to say and watched.

There was the sound of hurrying hooves. Ori looked up. Another dwarf emerged from the mountain on pony back. The dwarf hailed the cadre and cheerfully alit.

“Captain Dwalin, son of Fundin. I’m at your service.”

“Gloin, son of Groin. Well met, old friend. Glad yeh were able t’ get here right quick.”

“Yes, your raven was most prompt.”

Master Gloin undid a saddle bag and pulled out a rather blocky-looking something wrapped in a bright red cloth. He tossed the cloth back over the pony’s saddle and Ori watched in delight as Master Gloin unfolded and set up a cunningly wrought wooden desk stand. Gloin readied a parchment on it, uncorked an ink bottle, sharpened a pen and stood at the ready.

The captain turned to Ori.

“Did yeh offer tha’ bag a’ coin as fine f’r yer brother?”

Ori straightened.

“Yes, I did, captain.”

“An’ did yeh pledge yer life as payment f’r yer brother’s deeds?”

“Yes, I did, captain.”

“Yeh heard me say t’ Calmar that payment other than goods or gold a’ dwarrow goes t’ dwarrow same as payment f'r men goes t' men?"
    “Yes I did, captain. I accept being your indentured servant.”
    “Yeh know we dwarrow don’t do that, lad.”
    “Oh.”
    Ori puzzled a moment then untied his neck scarf and opened his collar.
    “I accept my brother’s execution order, captain.”
    Dwalin raised a quizzical eyebrow.
    “I ain’t killing’ a dwarf over that, lad.”
    Ori stared.
    “What are you going to do, captain?”
    “Th’ only thin’ I can, lad.”
    “Say ‘no’, Ori!” Nori interjected.
    Captain Dwalin turned and told Master Gloin to write a basic contract. Master Gloin wrote busily while Captain Dwalin rummaged in his inner pockets.
    He found what he wanted and, taking Ori’s arm, drew him to Master Gloin’s desk. Gloin finished what he was writing with a flourish and turned the desk to the captain. Dwalin signed it and Ori added his name without bothering to read it. He turned back to the captain who smiled and nodded curly then began putting a braid into Ori’s hair.
    Am I being adopted? Ori wondered.
Maybe he should have read that contract after all.
    Dwalin finished the braid and, to Ori’s shock, attached a mithril bead set with emeralds in the braid. He turned Ori to face him and handed him a matching bead.
    “Better put it in me beard, lad. I ain’t got enough on top anymore.”
    This brought laughter and a few cracked jokes from the squad, which the captain shushed with a glare. Ori braided carefully with shaking hands and attached the bead he was given. When that was accomplished, Master Gloin beamed and spoke the ancient words of Khuzdul that declared them married.
    Married? Ori thought wildly. I’m married to Captain Dwalin. Blessed Mahal! Dear Lady
Yevanna! Dori’s going to kill me!!
    Ori felt himself reel a little and Nori swore.
    “I’m fine, Nori” Ori said the first thing that occurred to him.
    Nori came to his side, almost shaking with rage.
    The captain looked coolly at him.
    “What else could I ha’ done. You saw-”
    “It’s fine, captain,” Nori hissed. “May I salute you as my brother?”
    Captain Dwalin raised an eyebrow.
    Ori gasped as Nori’s fist flew passed his head.
    “Nori! No!”
    To Ori’s surprise, the captain only staggered back a step and put his hand to his mouth. Ori and Nori were instantly at the sharp end of every soldier’s weapon. Nori growled, but the captain waved them away. Ori cringed as a small trickle of blood showed in the captain’s beard.
    “Leave ’m be,” the captain ordered, then chuckled as he turned back to Nori.
    “I accept this. Yeh see it that I’ve hurt yer brother. Yer act’s honorable.”
    Nori looked flabbergasted and Ori shuddered with relief. The captain reached out to his second and took the sheaf of papers removed from the Master of Dale. He walked to the brazier and tossed the papers in. They caught instantly and were gone within moments.
    The captain came back and stood before Nori.
    “I ain’t never seen yeh before and I better no’ again.”
    “What’s that supposed t’ mean?” Nori demanded with a side look at Ori.
    “It means stay th’ fuck outa trouble, pebble brain.”
    Nori pondered this silently. A shout flew up from the bottom of the road. The group turned to see little Tilda running up to them, panting.
She handed Ori his worn leather satchel.

“Here,” she rattled off. “I know you were finishing an important letter and I didn’t know when you’d be back, so I brought it. And I corked your ink really tight, so it wouldn’t spill and I grabbed your pens and sharpening knife, but I couldn’t find the cover, so please be careful. Are you coming back soon? What should I tell Mister Dori when he gets back? Shall I tell my Da anything?”

“Um…” Nori began.

“I won’t be back for a while, pet. I’ve married Captain Dwalin, so-“

“You’ve married Captain Dwalin?!” Tilda squealed and clapped her hands. “That’s so wonderful, ‘cose he is the one you like best, isn’t he? I heard you tell Sigrid he’s got a nice bum. Isn’t that him?”

Tilda pointed at the captain, who was obviously trying very hard not to laugh. Ori wished the ground would swallow him. Nori groaned and raised his eyes to the sky, muttering about mouthy badgers. The collected soldiers were also trying not to laugh as they covered their mouths or turned away. Master Gloin looked terribly pleased and patted Tilda on the head.

“That’s right, little lassie. Splendid news, yes?”

Tilda looked Master Gloin over with a wondering stare.

“My! You do have an awfully bushy beard!”

“Why, thank you, my dear!” Gloin looked fit to burst with pride. “You are most kind to notice that. What a clever little lass, you are!”

Tilda turned back to the captain,

“You better be nice to our Ori, ‘cose he’s my best friend,” she stated in an authoritative tone.

Captain Dwalin folded his arms and looked down at her.

“An’ who might yeh be, wee ‘un?”

“I’m Tilda Bardsdatter. He’s the bowman. He’s got a posh barge boat.”

“Bard th’ Bowman, grandson a’ Girion, eh. Fine man, he is.”

“Yes, he is. So you better be nice an’ all proper gentlemanly and romantic and stuff.”

She drew herself up, folding her arms and trying hard to mimic Dwalin’s stern stance.

The captain looked amused.

“Are we making’ a bargain then, lass?”

Tilda paused, then nodded firmly.

“Yes, yes we are.”

She marched up to the captain, spat on the palm of her right hand and offered it to him. Without missing a beat, Captain Dwalin spat on his right palm and they exchanged a firm handshake.

“We set?” the captain asked.

“Yes,” Tilda confirmed then turned to Ori as she wiped her hand on the back of her dress.

“You’ll be alright.”

“Why do boys do that?” She indicated her hand. “It’s gross.”

“Yer supposed t’ lick it,” the captain told her.

“Eww!” Tilda objected.

Ori palmed his face before he could stop himself. This day simply could not get any more silly or frightening or both. He pulled himself together as best he could.

“Master Gloin, might I trouble you for a small scrap of paper? I need to scratch a note to my eldest brother.”

Master Gloin was happy to oblige. He produced a cream colored piece of textured notepaper, moved aside, and adjusted the desk to Ori’s needs.

Dear Dori,

I hope this finds you well. I regret to inform you I have been obliged to marry Captain Dwalin, the circumstances of which I leave Nori to advise you.

Young Tilda has restored my writing satchel and pens to me, so I shall finish your Master's letter a soon as I may.
I shall do my very best to inform you of my further actions, when I discover what they might be.
All my love,
Ori
—Please don’t kill Nori, he didn’t do anything this time, at least he didn’t do anything I’m aware of this time.

Ori started to blow gently to dry the ink, but Master Gloin rescued him by amply a blotter and sanding the paper with some rosemary scented powder. He folded it, attached an unmarked white wafer, and handed it, smiling, back to Ori.

Ori shoved the sealed letter into Tilda’s hands and requested Nori to escort her home. Nori said what he thought. Ori attempted to glare at him the way Dori would have. Ori must have succeeded somewhat as Nori looked horror-struck then stomped off. Tilda paused to hug Ori fiercely then tore after Nori. The captain nodded to one of his soldiers who turned his goat, scooped up Tilda, and proceeded to follow Nori, who appear to be heading to a pub. Ori knew Tilda was clever enough to instruct the guard to take her home.

Ori sighed and looked down at himself. Everyday clothes, wrapped in woolens as he had only managed to get himself out of bed before doing the household chores then working on the letter. His face was still unwashed, his hair unbrushed, and his socks didn’t match. He looked like an old, ill-used laundry bag.

“Right, lad,” Captain Dwalin said. “Let’s be getting’ back t’ th’ barrack offices. I got reports t’ write.”

Ori shook himself. He had to concentrate on what was happening. He had to make his way in a new life without Dori, but with his husband. His husband, the handsome, strong, experienced warrior. Handsome….

Ori felt the blush rising again. He had once buried a feather and a red cotton ribbon to Yevanna, when he had first clapped eyes on Dwalin. He’d just come of age at the time and nearly swooned at the sight of the captain. He and Sigrid spent many happy hours discussing the merits of Captain Dwalin compared to Sigrid’s favorite, Prince Fili. Every single compliment from light to downright rude came back to his mind in a rush.

He had read the Queen of the Fertile Land had a sense of humor, but this was a bit much.
He looked at the captain who was standing beside his goat obviously waiting for Ori to come over. The rest of the soldiers were back on their mounts and ready. Ori hurried to Dwalin’s side. Dwalin swung up easily then offered Ori his hand. Ori was effortlessly brought up before him and the goat trotted through the gate and into the mountain.
Sitting, scribbling and mortification

Chapter by Stevie Foxx

Chapter Summary

CHICKEN!!
Dorothy’s nemesis!

Ori sat on the edge of the plush chair while Captain Dwalin rifled through a large marble cabinet full of scrolls. With a grunt, he pulled out a group tied together with twine dyed green. He brought these over to Ori, while untying the twine. Ori looked through. Nori had not been too, too much of a bother to the dwarrow guards. A few petty thefts of trinkets, but mostly bar fights, general mischief of stealing hats (a favorite past-time of Nori’s since a badger, and chalking rude words and pictures on nobles’ house walls and a rather obscure habit of drawing Ori’s badgerhood pet chicken Cluck-cluck as a signature.

Ori sighed, rolling the scrolls up, grateful the Captain had burnt the lot from the Master of Dale as Nori’s Dale thievery had been prolific and shocking in some cases. Dwalin took the scrolls back and tossed them into a small covered hole in the wall. When Ori cocked his head, Dwalin explained that it was a chute that ended in the forges.

The captain handed a lap desk to Ori and bade him write whatever letter he had been working on before the Incident. Ori wrote busily, every now and then glancing at Dwalin who was at his desk also writing and signing different reports. Occasionally he would read one, snort, and throw it into the chute.

When he had finished his own work, Ori looked about. The office was pleasant, large and airy with a high ceiling. The room was richly appointed but not ostentatious. There were several large candelabras as well as a heavy iron wheel suspended from the ceiling, covered in quartz shards that reflected the candles mounted on it to light the room well. Maps covered the walls and Ori itched to go and study them.

There was a row of little tubes in the wall where it met the ceiling. Ori wondered what they might be for. In answer, a small brown bat came hurtling through one and landed inelegantly on the Captain’s desk.

Dwalin chuckled at it, removed the intricately folded piece of paper it carried, and lifted the bat over to settle on a stand. There was a circle of fur, a large shallow basin of water and several little pots Ori thought might contain food of some kind for the bats. The tiny creature peeped at the captain, who snickered, patted the little head with a finger, and left it to drink its fill.

He undid the paper, read it, and closed his eyes as though in a headache.

“Gloin, yeh got a gob th’ size a Mordor.”

Ori watched as Dwalin turned back to his desk. He saw Ori looking at him and shrugged.

“We’ll be getting breakfast at Thorin’s. Dis wants to met you.”
Ori felt his stomach fall into his boots. Dis, the Princess Royal, Amad of the Heir of Erebor. The only daughter born in the direct line of Durin in 500 years. He gulped.

“She’s fine, lad. She ain’t gonna eat yeh. I grew up with her an’ Thorin. Mahal knows I’ve badgersat and trained those two brats of hers often enough.”

Ori tried to connect all the things he’d heard about the heirs - Fili the Golden and his Lionhearted younger brother Kili - with the captain referring to them as ‘brats’.

“I hope I won’t embarrass you,” he managed faintly.

The captain chortled.

“Not to worry, lad. The princes’ll embarrass themselves within a moment or two a’ meeting’ yeh.”

Ori stared, having no reply to this. Dwalin sat down and began working again. Ori returned to examining the room. He reflected that at the moment the captain seemed quite likable and kind. He hadn’t tried to do anything impolite to Ori or treat him as a servant. He shuddered a little. Of course, they were still at the captain’s place of work, there was no saying what he might be like when they went to the house for the evening.

He and Sigrid had read enough novels about terrifying trader kings who captured helpless young maidens and took them off to be concubines and dance naked in throne rooms. That was until handsome heroes came to rescue them and take them away to live happily ever after somewhere.

Ori knew he couldn’t dance for shit. He’d look ridiculous dancing naked.

Visions assailed Ori: himself dressed in wispy garments, hiding nothing, sitting at Captain Dwalin’s feet while he worked at his desk. What would he have to do with his hair and beard? The young maidens in the novels always had long flowing hair. His was barely down to his shoulders and his beard was still quite sparse. None of the maidens ever had beards!

He started to shake, wondering if the captain would force him to shave it off. The maidens! Oh no, he’d have to have his entire body shaved. He trembled, staring at the captain, terrified at the thought of being shaved, then waxed, and covered in fine perfume then dancing.

Captain Dwalin looked up, caught his eye, and stared back, incredulous.

“What’s th’ fuck is wrong, lad? Yeh look like ye jus’ found an orc army in yer britches.”

“I…I can’t dance,” Ori blabbered. “And…and I don’t want to be shaved. Dori will have a fit then die of shame and it’ll be all my fault and Nori will never forgive me…”

“What th’ flying’ fuck are yeh talking’ about?”

“Like the maidens in books, they’re stolen and the evil trader kings…”

Ori realized he was babbling stupidly and clamped his mouth shut. Captain Dwalin continued to stare at him like he had three heads.

“Lad… Catch me up. What’s stolen by who?”

Ori felt his face burn and squirmed in spite of himself. He felt a fool.

“Nuthin’,” he mumbled, then recovered himself. “I-I read a lot.”
Dwalin turned at his desk to face him. Ori thought he saw amusement in those bright hazel eyes.

“Read a lot? A lot by the famous, ’r should I say infamous, Notathain A. Shire?”

“You read Shire’s novels, too?” Ori gasped out before he could stop himself.

The captain smiled.

“Have to.”

“Why?” Ori asked.

“Self-defense. Whole bloody royal family reads ‘em. If I want to have any chat or peace I have to know ‘em.”

Ori giggled before he could stop himself.

“Sigrid… I mean Miss Bardsdatter…”

“I know th’ family,” Dwalin encouraged.

“Sigrid and I read them together. They are rather fun. Shire must do a great deal of traveling to know so much about distant parts.”

“Or reads a lot and likes maps.” Dwalin winked at him. “Don’t you write?”

“Yes, I… No! Don’t you dare accuse me of being Shire. I couldn’t come up with such adventures even in my wildest dreams.”

Ori laughed and Dwalin crossed to his side offering a goblet. Ori took it and sniffed. It was a light ale. He sipped.

Dwalin regarded him a moment then dropped his voice low.

“Moo-ha-ha-ha-ha, I’ll get you, my pretty!”

Ori managed not to choke, but got half a mouthful down his front.

“Bastard!” he cried and kicked out at the captain, who leapt aside, laughing at him.

Ori remembered his situation and hurriedly got to his feet and bowed.

“I’m sorry, I—“

“F’r what, lad? Nice kick by th’ way. Nori teach yeh?”

“No, Dori. He said most don’t suspect such and, among Men, it’s to our advantage. Their knees, you know.”

“He’s right about tha’,” the captain agreed.

Ori’s drink made him realize how thirsty he was and he swallowed it, wiping his mouth with his sleeve; the alcohol hit and he cursed as he remembered he’d had nothing since his morning tea. In answer to his unspoken question, the low call of the evening horn volley sounded.

“Huh, late as that is it?” the captain commented. “C’mon, laddie. Let’s be getting’ home. Don’t know about you, but I could use a meal.”
Ori folded the letter he had finished. He’d have to go and deliver it to Dori’s master tomorrow as he’d promised.

“Captain?”

“Let’s start as we mean t’ go on, lad. Yeh call me Dwalin an’ I’ll call yeh Ori.”

“Um, Dwalin. I must get back to the Dale tomorrow. I promised Dori’s master I would have this letter ready for him.”

“Where’s he live?”

“Master JinGhr, he’s at the Great Forge of Dale. He lives beside it.”

Dwalin went to the door and gave a shrill whistle. In a moment, a large raven swooped in and landed on the desk. Dwalin took one of the little pots off the stand where the brown bat was still grooming itself. He offered the pot to the raven who gobbled a few morsels, then looked at him expectantly. Dwalin repeated the name and address of Dori’s master. He motioned Ori over. Ori held the letter out, the raven took it in its beak and flew off.

Ori got his satchel together while Dwalin put out the lights. As he shut the office door, he took Ori’s hand and led him out of the building. Dwalin whistled again, long with two high notes. There came a clatter of hooves and Dwalin’s goat arrived from around the corner. Dwalin swung Ori up in front of him again and the goat trotted off at a brisk pace.
Stable, house and sleeping

Chapter Summary

Your hint is: Thor.

Also there’re are two links : to where I got Dwalin’s pony’s name and to some rather lovely arctic flowers

Chapter Notes

Hello again!

It’s Friday and here’s chapter three of Ori’s weird adventures in Erebor. I do hope you’re all enjoying reading it as much I am, writing it.

Stay tuned for chapter four next Friday, friends, and keep those cards and letters coming!

Ori stared. The mountain was big enough when seen from the outside but inside its vastness and importance imposed upon him: the soaring walls with beautiful bridges connecting the endless layers. Some bridges met and joined in large squares where open markets had their pavilions. Dwarrows were everywhere busy with their lives, talking, laughing, singing, and music swirled all around. Phosphorus rock lined all the streets and bridges and walls with a mix of yellows, blues and greens.

Ori was busy looking around and didn’t notice they were making their way upward until the goat struck out on one of the great roads that wound layer by layer up the edge of the mountain. From here he could see the middle of the kingdom and down to the bottom of the city where the forges over the mines glowed with orange light.

Looking up and up his eye caught an almost pinkish light coming from the far away peak of Erebor. Why it was pink he didn’t know but filed that thought away to ask Dwalin later.

The road became more elaborate and Ori gasped as they passed under a intricately wrought archway. He’d only read of this place. This was the entry to the royal living quarters.

Right next to this, carved from the wall, reaching from the top of the city and down to the gate where they had entered from the Dale was what he knew instinctively to be the great Library of Erebor.

The goat trotted through the open gate and the edifice was lost from sight as they rode down a tunnel lined with highly wrought phosphorescent lamps. Suddenly all the sounds of the city were shut out. Ori felt strange. He had never been in such a quiet place.

The goat brought them into a large open cavern. In the middle of this was a beautiful mosaic covering the groundstone and at its center a mirror-still reflecting pool. The far wall curved and was lined with separate courtyards behind magnificent iron gates. Beyond these gates the walls were carved and clad to indicate separate houses set into the rock face. He saw huge doors in huge walls, each decorated differently. They passed a house and door of sandstone set with rubies. When they reached one of red granite with a oak and beaten copper door they stopped. Dwalin got down and opened the gate.

Pathways checkered the courtyard in patterns interspersed with different colors of moss and lichens. Every now and then various sized and shaped plinths held containers of other plants found in the deep.

The goat’s hooves rang loud as Dwalin led the way to another beaten copper door off to the side of the house, a smaller twin to the larger. He opened it and Ori rode into the smell of hay and leather. This was the stable.

Dwalin lifted Ori off the goat, then undid the saddle, and removed it. The goat hunched its shoulders then stretched its back legs straight out behind, almost putting its belly to the ground, then stepped forward, shaking itself a little.

Dwalin slapped the goat’s haunch and ruffled the fur.

“There’s a good lad, Gnasher. Time f’r yeh t’ get yer feed an’ rest.”

Dwalin crossed the stable to a matching door opposite the entry and threw it open. The evening light poured into the stable. Gnasher trotted out into a vast meadow, snorting, and proceeded to leap about and kick out his back legs like a tiny kid, then fell on his side and legs straight out, rolled ecstatically around for a few moments, scrambled back on his hooves, shook, and scratched his ear with a hind foot. Ori laughed and, at Dwalin’s nod, went outside.

The town of Dale was like a badger’s plaything. He had never been so high up the mountain in all his life. Huge boulders rose all about and looking upward he could see the snow covered cap of the very top. A few clouds ringed it and he felt the wind, cooled by the snow, rush down the sides. Ori wrapped his cardigan closer around himself. Spring was only beginning here, so snow dotted the hollows as well but where the rocks provided shelter Ori saw the tiniest spots of color.

The sunset cast the mountain in a pinkish light. Ori wondered how this had been reflected to the inside of the mountain. It was beautiful to see it from so high up.

He went to the closest spot of color in the grass and found a small, newly green plant, showing it’s rich purple-pink blossoms proudly. From where he stood now he could see a few daisies here and there in the meadow.

Ori made his way a little farther down and flopped into the grass. He was not alone as there were several ponies grazing and they spared him an inquiring look.

He lay back. Although somewhat cold and dampish, it was lovely to feel the grass beneath him and the only sounds were the calls of ravens and other birds.

He was startled out of his daydreams by another shrill whistle. He sat up. A large brown pony with a black mane and tail lifted its head, ears up, gave a squeal, and lit out for the stable. Ori went after it, curious. He remembered seeing Dwalin riding such a pony through the square in Dale.

“There yeh be,” Dwalin greeted the pony which shoved its face into his chest nearly knocking him over.
“Mind out, yeh daft beast! C’mon in and I’ll get yeh bedded down. Come away in, yeh great shithead.” Dwalin ruffled the mane affectionately with a smile.

Ori giggled and Dwalin winked at him. They went into the stable and Dwalin shut the back door then proceeded groom the pony before breaking out in another round of swearing.

“What in th’ name a’ Mahal’s big hairy balls’ve yeh been’ down’, yeh great knob? Yeh got burrs from one end t’other! Curse it, Harley, can yeh no’ keep yersel’ outta trouble f’r five bloody minutes?”

Ori watched as Dwalin continued to scold the pony which wiggled and nosed at him happily. Dwalin settled Harley in a loose box, amply supplied with hay, gave him a small bag of grain, and twisted a brass spigot in the wall which poured sparkling water into a metal trough.

All this finished, Dwalin shut the first door, led Ori out and around through the front door of the House of Fundin.

Ori looked about him at the large, beautiful, octagonal room, walls of shining red granite and polished wood wainscoting from shoulder height to the floor. The floor was tiled with octagons of different shades of red granite in circular patterns. A grand fireplace loomed to the left, surrounded by fine, heavy furniture. A massive table set with chairs balanced it to the right and beyond that a staircase with carved balusters and rail traced the angles of the walls with a sweeping row of glass faced lanterns. At the landing a red curtain with gold trim graced another arch.

“What a beautiful sitting room,” Ori sighed.

“Eh? This’s th’ receivin’ room. Sittin’ room’s through there.”

Across from Ori loomed another great door of beaten copper with hexagonal prisms of brass set in a crescent. Dwalin led the way through this and stopped to kick off his boots, set his axes and other weapons down on the floor, and hang his fur vest on a peg beside the door. Ori came after and followed suit with his boots, satchel, and scarf as Dwalin shut the door. The floor was warm! Ori wiggled his toes. There was definitely warmth coming through the floor. Ori looked down and cringed at his mismatched socks again but Dwalin, after lighting the fire, was heading deeper into the apartment.

Ori followed him through the large but cozy sitting room with its fireplace a twin to the last, but surrounded by a couch and three armchairs, all plush and well worn, with a low, red granite table between the seating and the fireplace.

A very elegant but sturdy desk sat off to the side of the couch. It was carved from the rock of both the floor and wall with a comfortable looking leather chair before it. Another archway opposite the door led to a wide hallway with a high ceiling, but Dwalin went through a smaller archway to the right and into another room. Ori trotted after him.

Ori walked into the most beautiful kitchen he had ever seen, a rectangle crowned on each side with cupboards of dark wood, glass fronted, and filled with dishes and all kinds of jars and crocks. The entire ceiling was covered in a lattice work of steel. Many chains with hooks fell from it and off these, above anyone’s head, hung bright copper pots, pans, and cooking utensils of all kinds.

White marble counters ran to the left and right, each pausing with smaller versions of the door they had just entered. The wall to the left of him held a vast cooking surface and a cast iron heater containing three ovens.
A good sized table with six chairs about it sat in the middle of the room.

At the far end of the room the ends of twilight still showed through a long, tall halfmoon window filled with circles of highly polished mica.

Dwalin opened one of the narrow door on the right. Cool air wafted through the room.

“Eggs?” Dwalin asked.

“Huh? Oh! Yes, please.”

“How many yeh want?”

“Four. if you have enough?”

Dwalin raised and eyebrow then palmed an enormous egg to Ori. Ori goggled at it.

“That’s not from a squab!”

“Nah, goose.”

Dwalin brought out six and a pile of other things in his arms. He dumped these on the table and reached up for a shining frying pan, twirling it in his hand before setting it on the cook top. He nodded to a big loaf of bread and requested Ori to cut some slices. Ori busied himself and Dwalin lit the heat under the pan, mixed the eggs in a bowl, then started laying rashers of bacon on the griddle. He took down a few small jars from the cupboard and brought them to Ori along with a mortar and pestle.

Ori took up the pestle and watched as Dwalin dropped in salt, pink pepper corns, and a couple of other powders Ori didn’t know, but smelled delicious. Dwalin put an knob of butter on a small plate and had Ori pour half his now ground spice mix into it.

After combining these, he handed it back to Ori to butter four slices of bread on both sides. These were added to the griddle. By now the bacon filled the room with its good scent. Ori’s mouth was watering.

In minutes, they both sat down to a dinner of fried bread, bacon, and spiced scrambled eggs. Dwalin had ale while Ori was on his second mug of cool, fresh water from the spigot over the smaller of three sinks at the end of the left side counter. The other two, Dwalin had explained, were for washing up and the water was roasting hot from the forges below.

Ori was so happy, it had been so long since he’d had a big meal like this and it was so good. He figured out that one of the powders was garlic and the other was the popular spice mixture most dwarrow favored to marinate their meats. They ate in silence; each paying attention to their meals. Dwalin rose, Ori assumed it was to get more ale, but he came back in a few moments with more bread, this time soaked in the remaining egg mix and fried with more bacon, all of which he dumped on Ori’s plate. Dwalin had got himself bacon as well, but was eating it with thick slices of bread liberally plastered with butter.

Ori sat back, full and very comfortable, and sighed contentedly. He was about to burp then remembered this was considered impolite among the noble and rich men. Was it so with noble dwarrow? He swallowed and looked up. Dwalin was regarding him with a teasing look in his eyes.

“The question is, laddie, kin yeh finish the first three lines of the primer?”
Ori almost choked. The primer was how every badger started their Khuzdul. It began with “All Hail to Mahal and to the Seven Stars of Durin Shining Bright.” It was considered quite a feat to get out the complete ‘All Hail to Mahal’.

Ori gave Dwalin as contemptuous a look as he could muster, summoned the best burp he could and intoned, “All Hail to Mahal and the Seven Stars” before he ran out of burp and almost peed his britches.

Dwalin threw back his head and roared with laughter, reaching over to clap Ori on the shoulder, nearly knocking him off his chair.

“Well done, lad!” ‘Yer better than ol’ Tzlur! It took him two tankards a’ ale, one a’ soda water and a crock a’ beans t’ get even that much out.”

Ori laughed with him. He hadn’t had this much fun since Nori had taken him out to a quiet pub for a boiled dinner.

“Nori says there’s a dwarf called Old Granda Tz and he’d eat a crock of beans and fart the entire thing in his sleep.”

“That’s the one and the same. Thorin an’ me took guard duty with him as youngsters. Had t’ share a tent with him and three others. Ol’ Tzlur slept happy an’ th’ rest a’ us nearly died a’ fumes.”

“Ugh!” Ori commiserated.

Dwalin rose and stacked their dishes and put them in the sink and turned on the spigot. This water came out like a geyser and billowed with steam. Dwalin only had to hold each item in the stream for a moment before handing it to Ori, sparkling clean. Ori dried each and Dwalin showed him where they were kept.

“Tea?”

“Yes, please.” Ori said quickly.

Dwalin led the way back into the sitting room and placed the large tray on the low red granite table before the hearth, pushed the large sofa closer and dropped into it, slapping the cushion near him for Ori to seat himself. Ori came over and sat with the cushion between them. Dwalin parked his feet on the table. Ori was about to follow suit, saw his socks again, and chose to sit cross legged instead.

“That the latest fashion?” Dwalin commented in a friendly way.

“I shouldn’t sit like this?” Ori asked.

“Sit anyway yeh like, lad. I meant yer socks. Is tha’ th’ latest thin’ among th’ young and artsy set down th’ Dale?”

Ori blushed hotly, briefly considered telling him it was, but shook his head.

“I was a bit sleepy this morning, when I got dressed.”

“Thank Mahal.” Dwalin grumbled. “It it’d been a fad, I’d be off t’ warn Thorin as he’d be havin’ Fili and Kili up his arse trying’ t’ get’ him t’ do it with ‘em.”
Ori wondered again and caught Dwalin’s eye. Dwalin’s look narrowed and he seemed fierce, but the laughter was still there.

“Don’t yeh bloody dare, lad!”

Ori made a show of cocking his head, then giggled.

“I promise I won’t. Sigrid would never forgive me if I made his Royal Highness, Prince Fili the Golden, look foolish.”

“Oh aye?”

“She thinks he’s got a nice bum.” Ori snorted into his tea. If Tilda could embarrass him in front of Dwalin, Nori, and an entire cadre of soldiers, he could tell Dwalin that Sigrid fancied Fili.

“Nice as mine?” Dwalin teased.

Before he thought, Ori threw the teaspoon at him. Dwalin only caught it and laughed. Ori swallowed his fear.

Dwalin went through to the kitchen again and returned with a large crock and a plate. He dumped some of the contents on the plate and passed it to Ori. Lovely fat biscuits, crisp, smelling of ginger, and full of currants. Ori grabbed two and crunched blissfully. Dwalin dropped back down, shoved a very puffy tasseled pillow between them, and leaned his elbow on it. He dunked the biscuit in his tea before eating it. Dwalin belched contentedly and rooted out his pipe and pouch. Ori liked the scent of the smoke. It was rich and not stinging like so many others he’d come across.

“That’s not like the weed men usually smoke or the local field balsam,” Ori commented.

“This is the good stuff, lad. Old Toby pipeweed, from the Shire. Say wha’ yeh like about’ th’ hobbit folk, but they know weed, beer, an’ fortified wine. Dark stuff kicks yeh right’ in th’ arse. Not like tha’ twice watered shit th’ tree shaggers pass off as wine.”

He handed Ori the pipe. Ori took a draw. He was deeply impressed with the flavor, dark, rich and with an almost coffee taste to it.

“That’s very nice,” he praised, returning the pipe.

Dwalin grinned and nodded before settling back. Ori curled agains the other side of the pillow. It was made of brushed velvet and the firelight was cozy and pleasant. He was full, warm, and very comfortable.

Ori blinked. His cardigan was removed and he was lain down against the softest pillow he’d ever felt. He closed his eyes again.
Fry-ups, stories, and shopping

Chapter Summary

The continued adventures of Ori!!
Your hint is: Who do you think Balin's tailor might be if this story took place in today's New York City?

Also there’re are two links: to where I got the term ‘jill’ and to what Ori calls ’chips'

Chapter Notes

Last Friday's chapter was rather short, so I decided to give you another which is nice and long and Ori meets more interesting people.

Also please welcome Dollypegs as co-author. It's making it so much easier on both of us to do it this way. She is very evil and has given me so many excellent ideas!

Stay tuned for chapter five on Friday, friends, and keep those cards and letters coming!

Ori woke in a cocoon of comfort. He had no idea where he was.

Well, yes, he was in a bedroom, in a fine bed with blankets and he lay between cotton sheets. On the bedside table a carafe of water with a small glass sat beside a wrought iron lantern. His eye swept over the dresser and matching wardrobe of light colored wood, to the sunlight that poured through a small halfmoon window. It matched the mica window in the kitch-

He was married to Captain Dwalin.

He was married to Captain Dwalin!

Ori sat up, put his feet on the floor and sighed. Warmth soaked through his socks, still mismatched. He rose and went to a large silver water pitcher sitting in a matching bowl on a stand. A facecloth and towel hung from the rail.

Ori quickly gave himself a wash and felt more awake. He found a comb on the dresser and borrowed it. He opened the door and peeked out. Opposite, a long wide hall led to the sitting room where he had sat with Dwalin last night. To his left and right were more doors all on the same wall as his. At the very end of the right side, a door opened. Dwalin appeared in trousers, barefoot, and rubbing his hair with a towel. He saw Ori and nodded.

“Mornin’, lad. Was jus’ coming’ t’ wake yeh. We’re bidden t’ Dis f’r breakfast.”

“Good morning, Capt- Dwalin. Yes, I remember you mentioning that. Where might I find the privy?”

Dwalin tapped the door on his immediate right. Ori hurried down and Dwalin opened the door.
Ori emerged feeling a great deal more awake and trotted down to the sitting room. He noticed that the other door to the kitchen opened into this hall. That left three other doors around this room and, he thought, an upstairs.

Dwalin was pulling on his boots when he got there. Ori reached down but Dwalin passed his boots to him. Ori wasn’t sure what to say, so went with the amusing.

“As you see, I’m once more artistically attired.”

Dwalin snorted, shrugging his weaponry on.

“Aye, fancier than a goldfinch. You sleep alright?”

“Yes. I’m sorry I fell asleep on the couch.” Ori girded his loins. “Shocking behavior for a newlywed, really.”

Dwalin scoffed.

“Don’t feel too badly, lad. I woke meself up with me own snorin’ at the second night bell.”

Ori snickered and brushed at himself.

“Hungry?” Dwalin asked.

Ori was surprised to find he was, even after all he’d put away last evening.

“Yes. You?”

“Starvin’. Lucky f’r us, Dis always puts on a good spread.”

Dwalin opened the door, waved Ori through then shut it behind him.

“So do you,” Ori pointed out.

“Soldiers’ fare, lad. I can cook, but nuthin’ fancy,” as they went through the receiving area.

“It was very good,” Ori insisted, stepping out and Dwalin shut the front door.

Dwalin chuckled, ruffled Ori’s hair, and took him by the hand. Dwalin led the way across the Fundin courtyard then out to the main one.

Ori saw they were heading toward the neighboring home with its lapis lazuli facade, courtyard and wall, the wall inset with stars filed with tiny diamonds. Under the middle and largest star was a gate of rose gold.

Ori gulped and glanced down at himself.

“Yer fine, lad,” Dwalin said quietly. “Stop worrying’ yersel’.”

They passed through the golden gate.

“There you are,” said a female voice.

Ori jumped, in spite of himself, and turned quickly.
The dwarrowdam who stood before them was like none Ori had ever seen.

She was almost his height but wider and exquisitely dressed in Durin blue. Her dark brown hair and beard were set with mithril beads and sapphires, her hair piled on top of her head with a few curls dropping fetchingly about her neck. Her black eyes snapped and sparkled as she peered at Ori.

“So, you are the new husband.”

Ori nodded, remembered his manners, and bowed.

Dis straightened him immediately.

“Now, none of that. I’ve been waiting to meet you since Gloin came and told us he presided over your marriage. It was too bad of you not to invite us, and with Balin away. Well, we’ll talk of it later. Breakfast’s ready.”

Dis grabbed Ori’s wrist.

“Mornin’ Dis,” Dwalin said laconically.

Dis turned back to look at him.

“Well, don’t just stand there, Dwalin, your new husband must be hungry.”

She hustled Ori inside.

Ori was ushered through a wide hallway of lapis into a huge receiving area, all wooden paneling, which opened into a dining room of white marble set with mithril panels: floor, walls and ceiling. Ori felt like he had been popped into a youth’s snow fort. The table was set with silver, silver … everything. Feeling like a badger at a glass vendor, Ori automatically put his hands behind his back. In a burst of loud laughter, Dwalin entered with another dwarf. Ori didn’t need to be told who this was. He bowed to Prince Thorin Oakenshield.

Thorin was dark like his sister and came forward with a ready smile.

“Ori, is it?”

“Yes, your highness.”

“Yes, Thorin,” the prince gently corrected.

“Yes, Thorin,” Ori repeated and blushed.

Thorn looked him over and smirked at Dwalin.

“He is very pretty. No wonder you don’t shut up about him.”

It was Dwalin’s turn to redden.

“Fuck you, Thorin,” he muttered.

Ori didn’t know where to look.

Thorin chuckled and went to sit at the head of the table. He waved for Dwalin to sit on his right and Ori to his left. Ori sat carefully on the ornately carved white marble chair upholstered in white leather. He swallowed and felt his appetite vanish. Dwalin and Thorin were already discussing something about a diplomatic trip to Gondor. The party was due to return shortly.

Dis swished in with two covered platters in her hands, abjuring someone behind to mind out. After her came two male dwarrow close to Ori’s age or older. Ori knew them to be Princes Fili and Kili, the sons of Princess Dis and her late husband Vili. Both also carried platters which they bumped down gracelessly.

Fili was fair, with honey-colored hair like his long dead blacksmith father while Kili looked like a younger Thorin - a younger, very mischievous Thorin. Kili looked at Ori, pointed and shouted.

“You’re him!”

Kili bounded around the table to Ori, who rose. Kili genially knocked foreheads with him, and clapped him on the shoulder.

“Well met. Are you going to soldier with Dwalin or keep house?”

Ori couldn’t answer as he was knocking foreheads with Fili. Dis ordered the princes to their seats and began to serve. Dis handed Ori a plate piled high with fried chicken eggs, bacon, spicy sausage, blood sausage, morels, tomatoes, fried bread, and beans in tangy sweet sauce. Ori swallowed and wondered if he would end his days looking like the magnificent Bombur, son of Ur of the Lake Inn. Master Bombur was the largest dwarf ever but he was also the handsomest. Ori might grow large, but he doubted he would ever have Bombur’s charming personality or superb beard.

Thorin and Dwalin continued to talk while the princes shoveled their breakfasts into their mouths. Ori enjoyed his, but thought he was going to need a nap after. He was glad when Dis passed him a cup of tea which revived him a little. Dis was torn between commenting on what Dwalin and Thorin were discussing and scolding her sons for their manners. Ori was glad everyone was distracted for the time. The time didn’t last as Fili finished his meal and looked at Ori with a curious air.

“You’re from the Dale, yes.”

“Yes.”

“I don’t remember you scribing for any of the meetings or working in the library. Who do you scriven for?”

“I free-lance.”

“Nice,” Kili put in on Ori’s left. “Who do you know in the Dale? You live in the main square where all those lawyers are?”

“I don’t think we … er … socialize in the same circles. We don’t live in the square,” Ori began.

“You have a big family?” Fili put in.

“Just three of us. I have two older brothers.”

“The Dale’s small, you must know Master Calmar,” Kili went on.

Ori felt a surge of rage spurt through him at the mention of the Master.

“I have met him exactly once and I didn’t enjoy it.” Ori didn’t quite hiss.
Both princes looked startled, looked at each other, then went back to questioning him.

“What happened to your parents?” asked Fili.

“Are they in the Iron Hills or the Blue Mountains?” asked Kili.

“Our mam is dead. I have no information on our das.”

“Boys!”

Ori was grateful for Dis’ interruption even if it was merely to tell the princes they needed to be on their way or they would be late for lessons. Both rose, crossing to their mother, one on either side and simultaneously removed her matching ear cuffs while they bade her and their uncle goodbye, and Dwalin reminded them they had a practice with him that afternoon, making them both groan. Dis cursed them roundly and took back her jewelry. Kili looked doubtfully at Ori and Fili clapped him kindly on the shoulder.

“We’ll see you later, Ori-mate!”

Ori smiled in return and watched the princes go out as two dams came in. Ori wasn’t sure if they were cousins and if he should rise to greet them. Dis merely smiled and nodded at them as they removed the platters and, as Dis rose, slid away a leaf of the table. They replaced the tea tray on a table now half the size it had been, bobbed curtsies when Thorin and Dis thanked them, and went out. Dis drew her chair closer and refilled the cups. She passed Ori’s cup back to him and smiled.

“I heard you telling my boys that you live with your two brothers in Dale and your amad has passed to the Halls.”

“Yes, she died when I was just a badgerling. My eldest brother, Dori, raised me and my other older brother Nori.”

“Your adad?”

“I never knew him, ma’am.”

“That’s unusual among our people, what happened?”

“Dis,” Dwalin growled.

“I’m just trying to get to know your new husband, Dwalin!”

“Then try bein’ general. Yer worse’n me best interrogator!”

“And that’s saying a great deal,” Thorin commented dryly.

Dis huffed at them and smiled warmly back at Ori.

“I’m not interrogating you. Just wanting to get to know you, so we can have your best interests at heart. So, when I introduce you—“

“We go by the Brothers Ri,” Ori helped.

“You’re amad’s name was Ri. Ah, Ri of the Iron Hills?”

“No, Ri short for Rikmha.”
Thorin exchanged a look with Dwalin and Dis looked startled.

“An unusual name for a dam. What was her craft?”

“She was a cleaning dam in Dale,” Ori told her, waiting for royal disapproval.

“Oh. Did she work for herself or was she in a union?”

“For herself.”

“She must have been very successful and to have three boys. A fine family,” Dis approved. “What a pity she died when you were so young. Was it an accident?”

Ori blushed again.

“Sort of. She was out … enjoying herself with a group of … er … friends and she fell badly. She was bedridden for three years before she died.”

Dis looked shocked.

“That’s dreadful. I am sorry for your loss.”

“Thank you.”

Thorin reached over and gave his shoulder a squeeze.

“And your brothers?” Thorin asked.

“Dori is an assistant to a weapons maker.”

“Master JinGhr at the Great Forge of Dale,” Dwalin said.

“I’ve seen their work,” Thorin nodded. “Excellent. The knife work is exquisite.”

Ori glowed.

“That’s Dori’s specialty.”

Thorin smiled in return.

“Then I shall have to cultivate your eldest brother’s acquaintance.”

Thorin rose with Dwalin.

“I have a meeting with udad. Provided he’ll consent to see me outside of the treasury. Dwalin?”

“Aye, I’m with yeh. Dis, would yeh keep Ori comp’ny ’til I get back?”

“Certainly. What are you doing after?”

“Takin’ Ori t’ Balin’s tailor. He needs a few things.”

Dwalin winked at Ori and followed Thorin out. Dis rose and bade Ori to accompany her. She led him through to a sunny room. The long, tall window was actually a series of six doors, two of which were open and lead out to area paved with lapis. A scattering of white marble urns held only earth.

Dis settled him in a one of the comfortable oaken chairs upholstered with embroidered black linen.
One of the dams returned with a crystal jug and two glasses. Dis thanked her, poured out for both of them and passed a glass to Ori.

“I hope my sons didn’t embarrass you. They are very enthusiastic when meeting new friends.”

“No, I … I’m just a little on edge. Sometimes when living among men, one has to be careful with what one says.”

“Of course,” Princess Dis agreed absently, she glared pensively out at her patio.

Ori sipped at his drink. Ice-cold water flavored with ginger and lemon balm, and sweetened with honey.

Princess Dis seemed to debate something in her head, then turned back to him.

“You said your amad’s name was Rikmha?”

“Yes, milady.”

Dis frowned.

“Dis is fine. I thought I heard Thorin telling you titles were not used among family.”

“He did, but,” Ori searched for a way to explain. “I am rather new at being married and being er … suddenly royal.”

Dis laughed at that and regarded him curiously.

“Rikmha.”

“My mam?”

“Where was she from before she came to the Dale?”

“As far as I know she was born and bred in the Dale. I was never told otherwise. Though she must have spent some of her life in Ered Luin as Dori speaks of it and I think Nori was born there. I don’t remember her well. Just her being in the bed and coughing and groaning a lot. Dori was more my parent that she. Why does her name cause such curiosity?”

Dis sighed.

“I supposed it became a popular name outside of the mountain as news like that rarely travels beyond the circles in which it happens.”

Ori looked at her incredulously and she rattled her nails against the chair arm.

“Oh, well, I supposed it really doesn’t matter any more. The family is in disfavor anyway. Although Lady Klakuna still tries to curry approval with me every time she sees me at open court.”

“What’s open court?” Ori asked, having always heard court among dwarrow referred to in terms of royal names and for the wealthy.

Dis stared at him, incredulous.

“Open court. Any and all dwarrow are welcome to bring their complaints and questions before the king. Although udad has not been well the past few times so Thorin has stood for him.”
“Dwarrow in the mountain.” Ori nodded.

“All dwarrow,” Dis corrected.

Ori stared at her.

“I’ve never heard of such a thing. No one I’ve ever spoken to has ever mentioned it either.”

Dis frowned.

“That is something Thorin will need to know immediately.”

She seemed to ponder again then turned back.

“Are you acquainted with Lady Klakuna or her household?”

“No, this is the first I’ve heard that name. Does she employ dwarrow from the Dale? Did my mam work for her?”

Dis sighed, reached out and took Ori’s hand in hers.

“Ori, there has only been one Lady Klakuna, thank Mahal. And as far as I’ve ever heard one Rikmha. They were both of the House of Rikanta. Klakuna is the yâsith to the current head of that house and she lives with her younger inùdoy’s yâsith, her nathith-in-law, Riuna. Klakuna was known for her grandnathith… Rikmha.”

“Are you trying to tell me I’m royal?” Ori asked.

“Um, I don’t know. Like I said it may have become a popular name in the Dale. Let me tell you the story first,” Princess Dis hedged. “Are you familiar with the term ‘bearer’?”

“Yes, though I’ve always heard them referred to as ‘jills’.”

Dis snorted a little, then continued.

“Bearers are considered almost divine amongst our people. They are very rare now. In the past when we were a small numbered people, they were responsible for saving the race of Durin. We would have dwindled and died out long ago. They are considered in the light of a great gift from the dear wife of Mahal, Yavanna.

“Very occasionally one or two are born into our race nowadays. Many years ago, the house of Rikanta arrived here from Ered Luin. With them was their Lord Rikut and Lady Klakuna and their two inùdoy. The eldest was married and so they had a grandchild, a mere badger at the time, who was a bearer. A bearer arriving was a time of great rejoicing and King Thror made much of Lord Rikut and his family. For a time Lord Rikut was considered a rival to the Fundin family as favorites of the king went.

“I attended schooling with the bearer and we grew up with the other children of nobility. When we had all come of age, the bearer was presented at court. The bearer was graceful, charming, a wonderful dancer, and such a social success. This went on for a number of years. One Yule, Thror threw a huge party as his favorite cousin, King Nain of the Iron Hills, was visiting. The bearer was presented and Nain was most struck. Well, as with many parties and celebrations one thing led to another and you can imagine how that went.

“The following morning there was the most terrible argument between Thror and Nain. It boiled down to the fact that the bearer wasn’t a bearer at all; she was a dam.

“Lord Rikut claimed his older inùdoy, his inùdoy’s yâsith, and their servants had lied to himself and his wife, Lady Klakuna, and he sent his guards to slaughtered all of them. Lord Rikut also banished his granddaughter from the mountain. It was the most horrid scandal. Turned out Thror had convinced Nain to marry this ‘bearer’ and Nain thought his cousin was making a fool of him.

“Thus Thror now tolerates the Rikanta clan. Lord Rikut is on the periphery of the court.”

Ori began to realize what he was about to be told and felt his entire body freeze.

“The whole thing was hushed up and only those in the upper court knew about it. I doubt the story traveled to the Dale. The reason I’m telling you this, Ori, is that the granddaughter’s name was Rikmha. Of course, it could be a common name in Dale or Ered Luin.”

Ori sat still. His mam was the only dwarf he had ever heard of with the name Rikmha. It had been bad enough that she had born three sons by three different sires but now this. He hated the thought of Dori ever finding out.

Dori was on the brink of having Prince Thorin wanting to know of him. Dori’s career in his craft would be made with the prince as a patron.

Nori wouldn’t give a rat’s ass about it, that Ori knew immediately.

At first, Ori thought it wouldn’t affect him much then horrid realization crawled into his heart.

Dwalin was now married to a fatherless whelp of the cast off of the rivals of the House of Fundin. Ori closed his eyes and took a deep breath. He had to tell Dwalin. It might dissolve their marriage and that was easily done as it was unconsummated and came about accidentally, really.

A part of him was deeply saddened by this thought. But it would be terrible to force Dwalin and thus Lord Balin to live with such shame. His mind cleared. Of course, Dis had told him the story. The royal family would gently disengage him from Dwalin and hush things up and life would gone on as before. He hoped Dwalin would remain a nodding acquaintance to him.

He heard a door slam in the distance, pulled his hand out of Dis’ clasp, and rose.

“I believe that is the return of your nadad and the captain, ma’am. I must go now.”

“Ori—”

“Thank you for telling me that story and for your gracious hospitality, ma’am. It was most … illuminating.”

Ori made himself walk out of the room and into the hall where Dwalin and Thorin were talking.

“There yeh are, lad,” Dwalin greeted him, cheerfully.

Ori smiled and went to him.

Harley waited outside, looking both bouncy and impatient. Dwalin lifted Ori into the saddle and swung up behind him. Harley rushed off in the direction of the city.

At an imposing facade with a conservative silver name plate, which read simply ‘Greneeld’, Dwalin secured Harley and led Ori inside. There was a respectably sized room, lined with long narrow shelves. In these Ori saw many different piles of fabric bolts. A dwarf arrived from behind a vast cream velvet curtain. He was thin by most standards, and dressed entirely in grey.

“Why, Captain Dwalin,” he greeted in a surprisingly soft voice. “How very lovely to see you. You look well.”

“Thanks,” Dwalin replied, not his usual dry silent self as Ori had see him behave with merchants in the Dale.

“And Lord Balin; has he returned?”

“Not yet.” Dwalin grinned at the smaller dwarf. “So yeh’ll have to wait a little to find out just how many folk in Gondor were blinded by that diamond coat yeh made ’im.”

The dwarf gave Dwalin a reproving look followed by a small smile.

Ori stared at the dwarf. For all he was dressed in the most unremarkable grey, his clothes were beautiful. The cloth seemed to have grown in the shape of him. It wasn’t until he was closer that Ori, after squinting a little, finally saw the barest hint of stitching. So intent was he in admiring the cut and non-existence of the thread that must hold the clothing together, he didn’t register the next time Dwalin spoke. He startled when Dwalin’s hand rest on his shoulder.

“Ori, lad, this is Master Mahrdin, son of Greneeld. He’s Balin’s and, when he can put up wi’ me, me tailor.”

“I am delighted to be presented to you, Master Ori,” Master Mahrdin bowed. “How may I be of service to you?”

Ori looked at the dwarf, realized he had no idea why he was here and looked up at Dwalin.

“He need a few thin’s,” Dwalin responded helpfully.

“And what sort of few things does Master Ori require?” Mahrdin asked, smiling gently at Ori and casting a stink eye at Dwalin.

“Um,” Ori elaborated.

“He needs a bit a’ everythin’,” Dwalin put in.

Master Mahrdin humph-ed and gave Dwalin another disapproving look and gently took Ori’s arm.

“If I may have the privilege of measuring you, Master Ori, then we shall be able to proceed.”

Master Mahrdin snapped his fingers and two assistant scurried out silently. One rushed over to lock the entry door while the other placed chairs and a table with refreshments to the side and a large round piece of wood in the middle of the floor. Ori presently found himself standing on this.

The first assistant was a young dam with bushy black hair all pulled to the top of her head and clased there with several coils of brass, set with black onyx. The hair then poured down freely rather like the fountain in the center of Dale. Her beard was twisted into tiny points which stuck out like thorns. Her clothes, entirely of yellow satin, ballooned hugely about her arms and legs. She was introduced as Dipfa. She was very excited about her work.

The other assistant was a young male dwarf, more conservative and traditional in his dress. His light brown hair and beard were braided tight all around his skull, to the point he looked like he was wearing a brown hat with chin straps, and he wore a suit, absolutely skin-tight, in shades of brown. He was introduced as Pika. He looked terrified.

Ori felt extremely weird being stripped to his combinations by three people, but the way they removed his clothing, folded it carefully, and laid it aside as though it was some priceless silk made him want to giggle.

He looked at the ceiling, so he wouldn’t have to see his socks. He heard Dwalin snort and settled for glaring at him.

“I’m artistic,” he said in a grumpy tone.

“Aye, that yeh are, lad,” Dwalin teased, relaxing back in one of the chairs looking terribly pleased with himself.

“Mmmm,” Dipfa observed. “I love those fashion-progressive socks, such a statement! But that scarf is totally Second Age! Very lovely stitchery, though.”

“Thank you,” Ori managed. “My brother made it for me.”

“He’s got matchin’ pair a’ them socks back home.” Dwalin drawled.

Trapped on the stand, Ori settled for making a face at him. Dipfa ran around Ori, looking up and down critically. Ori felt like a public statue.

Master Mahrdin waved the assistants away and stepped forward. Dipfa and Pika produced notebooks and stood at the ready while Master Mahrdin measured every inch of Ori. While he did this he talked gently to Ori about himself and how he had come to have his own shop.

“My family and I were in Moria when the orcs came. I was a mere badger at the time. I was the only one of my family to survive. Lord Balin found me wounded and brought me to the healers. I travelled back to Erebor with him and he had me apprenticed to a dwarf who was then the royal tailor. Lord Balin noticed my work and began to request me specifically. In time, I rose to prominence and was able to open my own business. In honor of his patronage, I added the ‘din’ ending to my name” “I’ve heard much of Lord Balin’s excellent taste,” Ori ventured, looking around for Dipfa and Pika who had vanished.

“Do you enjoy his company?”

“I have yet to have the honor of being introduced to him. I look forward to it when he returns,” Ori said.

He planned to remember all his manners when the Lord of Fundin House returned… if he wasn’t back in the Dale, a single lad, by then.

Master Mahrdin turned and looked at Dwalin.

“Married without your brother’s consent?”

“I’m a second son, Mahrdin. He’s the heir and I’m the spare,” Dwalin replied easily.

“Youth,” Master Mahrdin scolded gently, despite it was quite obvious he was younger than Dwalin.
The assistants reappeared with armfuls of things. Ori was shown to a curtained room to change into new underthings then brought out again for a very nice pair of trousers and a matching pale lavender shirt. Pika disappeared again. Ori was fitted with an intricately stamped pale leather belt with a silver buckle. A lilac padded over-tunic was added and Ori was led to a large mirror to approve. Ori stared. He had never worn such fine clothes in all his life. He smoothed his hands down the tunic enjoying the feel of the soft linen.

“Like?” Dipfa asked.

“Oh, yes, it’s beautiful!”

Pika arrived suddenly, puffing and very red in the face. He carried a large paper-wrapped parcel which Master Mahrdin took, unwrapped and placed before Ori. It was a pair of sheepskin boots dyed dark purple with nickel trim. Ori stepped into them while Dipfa adjusted the fit. She frowned, rifled in her pockets, found what she wanted, and laced the boots up with a braided cotton cord in the most alarming shade of green.

Master Mahrdin raised an eyebrow at this.

“Master, you see,” Dipfa explained, “House of Fundin is dark red, which goes with his pale purple, and green is the Captain’s color.”

“Mmm, no doubt it will fade to the proper shade,” Master Mahrdin observed. He turned to Dwalin.

“Captain?”

“Bloody brilliant. Right lad. we’ve got another stop t’ make before heading’ back. Mahrdin?” He turned back to the tailor, who inclined his head interestingly. “When yeh’ve go’ some done, send ‘em up t’ the house.”

Dwalin laid a leather bag on the table beside the refreshment tray. Ori heard the heavy sound of coins.

Master Mahrdin ignore this and bowed.

“Serving the House of Fundin is both my honor and pleasure, Captain. Master Ori, your servant.”

All three bowed. Ori ducked his head shyly in return.

Dwalin lifted Ori back on Harley and they galloped back across towards the royal apartments, but they turned aside and rode to the Great Library. Leaving Harley once more, Ori trotted along with Dwalin as they went in a small side door half way up the edifice.

As they entered an enormous room, Ori looked eagerly around for the books. They were everywhere: books, maps, scroll, piles of parchment, rocks with etchings in them, paintings, drawings and prints of places and people, all varieties of various historical ephemera, on shelves and in boxes, on carts and on other tables covered in tools related to bindery and preservation. They left this and went down a long hall. Dwalin stopped at what turned out to be a large office.

Dwalin led the way in, pulling off one of his knuckle dusters. A dwarf sat hunched over a large desk piled high with papers, scrolls, and books of every size and color. The dwarf’s back was to them and all Ori could see was a completely bald head and a mountainous orange robe.

Dwalin rudely knocked his knuckles on top of the head. The dwarf whipped around with a roar and glared at him.
“You! Out!” he ordered, his enormous grey beard bristling in every direction.

“Afternoon, Brur,” Dwalin greeted him cheerily.

“Yeh look well, friend,” Dwalin complimented.

“Yeh look like a damn pack of trouble. As usual. Wha’ yeh done tha’ I’ve got t’ get yeh out of this blasted time’?”

“Nuthin’. Got a scribe for yeh.”

“Bat dung. All these young scribes suck old cave water. They can’t write script f’r shit.”

“Try this one,” Dwalin encouraged.

Master Brur glared at Ori, who stood quietly with his hands folded.

“Those journeyman braids yeh got in yer hair, lad?” Master Brur demanded.

“Yes, sir,” Ori replied, keeping his voice even and calm.

Brur snatched a few things from his desk and rose. He went to a small table, cleared a space with a sweep of his arm and shoved a chair next to it.

“Sit. Translate this passage from Sindarin to Khuzdul an’ illustrate it, then write about why yeh chose to illustrate it the way yeh did. If yeh feel ambitious, try guessing what it was like in the original Westron.”

Ori settled himself and sharpened the pen he was given. The poem was an early work of Shire’s about walking on a road. He remembered the poem well and quickly wrote it out in its original form, before translating it into Khuzdul. The Sindarin was easy enough but the poem scanned better when translated from Westron to Khuzdul. It didn’t take him long to write out the translation. He decorated it with flowers, a few birds, and a road wandering off into a grassy field. He wrote briefly about hobbits, their way of life, and the romantic writings of Shire.

Ori rose. Dwalin was smiling at him and Brur was glaring at Dwalin. Brur turned when Ori cleared his throat.

“Stuck?”

“No, sir,” Ori responded. “Finished.”

Brur stared, was beside Ori in a trice and snatched the paper away. He glanced it over, before raising his eyes to stare at Ori admiringly.

“Well, fuck a duck,” Brur chortled. “The lad can write.”

“Yeh think I’d a’ brough’ ’m here if he couldn’t?” Dwalin groused.

“Ach well, laddie,” Brur was all smiles and friendliness. “Yeh an’ tha’ princeling did some daft shit back in the day.”

Ori suddenly wanted desperately to know what possible ‘daft shit’ either Thorin or Dwalin could have got themselves into. Brur turned to him.
“Brur, son a’ Abjur, lad. Yeh’ll be getting yer mastery soon enough or I’ll kiss his arse.” nodding to Dwalin.

“Yeh keep yer mouth an’ th’ rest a’ yeh t’ yerself.” Dwalin agreed.

Ori couldn’t stop his mouth before saying, “As his husband, his arse is my business, so keep your bits away from it.”

Brur and Dwalin roared with laughter and Ori cringed at himself. His shoulder was grabbed and Dwalin slung an arm around him.

“He’s me keeper now. Gotta make sure I do as I’m told,” Dwalin joked.

Ori tried to slug him in the ribs but couldn’t squirm free.

“His keeper?” Brur looked at Ori. “Lad, either yeh’ve tied ‘im round yer wee finger or yer as daft as he is.”

Ori peered up at Dwalin, who was grinning at him.

“Bit a’ both, aye?” Dwalin said.

Ori snickered.

“Very likely.”

“Right,” Brur was serious once more. “Enough a’ yer lovely-dovey slop. Ori of the Brothers Ri, is it? Fine, we need a cataloguer and someone on th’ reference desk. Yeh seem th’ right sort. I’ll look yeh out a desk and th’ rules we go by. Yeh’ll start tomorrow. I’ll just have yeh follow me about. I’ll see yeh back here at eight of th’ morning bell. Yes?”

“Yes,” Ori said eagerly.

“Aye, he’ll be here,” Dwalin promised.

“Good, good!” Brur grinned at them, frowned, and pointed at the door.

“Out!”

Dwalin drew Ori to the hallway and Brur’s door slammed violently behind them.

“I think I just got hired to work at the greatest library in all dwarrowdom,” Ori said in an awed voice.

Dwalin led the way back.

“Aye yeh did, lad. Knew yeh would! C’mon, it’s near dinner an’ I’m gettin’ perishin’ hungry.”

Ori set the kitchen table, then leaned against it. Since he’d peeled and chopped several potatoes, he hoped Dwalin knew about chips.

What a strange day it had been, Ori mused. Hired at the library, new clothes, meeting Dis, finding out his mam had been banished and was the shame….
Ori swallowed and clutched at his stomach. Why in Mahal’s name had he gone through with everything? It was ridiculous. Dis and Thorin realized who he was and were no doubt going to tell Dwalin he had been led astray.

Ori took a deep breath. No, they were not going to tell Dwalin anything. They wouldn’t get the damn chance. He was going to tell Dwalin. He shivered. How? How could Dwalin possibly believe that Ori had been completely ignorant of his parentage?

Ori shook himself and took a breath. Well, he had been and that was sad. He would be honest and tell the captain what he had learned. Things would be set aside, hushed up, and hopefully, hopefully they might still talk occasionally.

He turned to Dwalin who came in from the cold room carrying a platter with two large pieces of fresh meat.

“How yeh like yer steak, lad?”

“Dwalin I have to tell you something I didn’t know it until today when Princess Dis told me I was in utter ignorance until that time I am not who you think I am I am a fatherless whelp of one of the greatest scandals of Erebor I know you don’t want to be married to such and believe me I’m sure Dis and Thorin will hush things up and I will run away forever to the Dale and Lord Balin will never know it’s all quite fixable I’m sure it will be quite plausible and you will not live in shame for the rest of your life and go on to be a mighty captain and marry an excellent female with whom you may have many, many children I know a dwarf who had fourteen children well his dam did and it was all very nice and I’m sure this can be seen as nothing but I’m sure your men would vouch if you asked them and say you had more to drink in that pub in Dale where I ran into you I do apologize for that I was quite upset about hearing about Nori being executed and that’s another thing he should not have hit you.”

Dwalin put the platter of meat down on the counter, crossed to Ori, grabbed him around the waist, lifted and sat him on the table, so they were at eye level. Ori stared at Dwalin, who was staring at him.

“What?” Dwalin asked quietly.

Ori burst into tears. He vaguely felt Dwalin’s hands on his shoulders, rubbing gently. Ori got his breath back and looked up.

“Why would Dis an’ Thorin want t’ hush up anything’ an’ I don’t want fourteen brats!” Dwalin said in a more moderate tone.

“Because I’m Rikmha’s child. I—”

“I know tha’, lad.”

“You do?”

“Aye, ‘ve known f’r quite a bit now.”

“But Thorin and Dis won’t like it!”

“Thorin knew I was doing’ some investigation’ and he’ll be filling’ Dis in, too. He’s fine wi’ it an’ she’ll be, too.”

“Are you sure?”
“Aye, an’ yeh and yer brothers don’t have nuthin’ t’ do with any of it. That family are no’ one a’ Thror’s favorites. They got no power in court. They’re rich enough but no one give a shit abou’ wha’ they think.”

Ori sniffed then realized he was gripping Dwalin by his braces. He removed his hands and wiped his eyes.

“Sorry.”

“Don’t be, lad.” Dwalin looked at him then leaned forward and gave Ori a hug.

“No more tears now, lad. Everythin’s fine.”

Ori clutched him a moment then let go.

“Thank you. You’re very kind to me. I’ll try and be a good husband.”

“Yer a fine husband.”

Ori found his handkerchief and wiped his eyes and nose.

“Right,” Ori said. “First order of being a good husband, feed him.”

He smiled up and Dwalin chuckled.

“Aye, how yeh want yer steak? Warm and bloody on th’ inside?”

“Yes, please,” Ori agreed eagerly.

Ori sat back. The steak and chips were probably the best meal he’d ever had. He had a feeling he’d eaten most of the chips. Dwalin was finishing up the steak Ori couldn’t manage. He glanced over at Ori, who smiled.

“Better, lad?”

“Much, thank you. I’m sorry I made such a fuss.”

“S alright’, lad. Yeh had a bit ’f a shock, tha’s all. Yeh honestly didn’t know abou’ yer mam?”

“No. I wonder if Dori or Nori know. It’s all so strange. Although Dis wondered if it had become a common name in Dale or Ered Luin. I never heard of any with even a similar sounding name. I don’t think I want to be related to that family, though.”

“Can’t blame yeh there. Never liked ’em much. Rikut always put me hackles up. No one really made much of ’n effort t’ find out ’bout ’em. They came out fra Ered Luin and there wasn’t much correspondence going’ out tha’ way, so who knows. I did quite a bit a’ checkin when I was finding’ out about yeh. And yer brothers, a’ course.” Dwalin finished quickly.

Ori raised an eyebrow.

“Don’t worry, lad. I’ll keep me eye on that family. They won’t cause yeh no trouble.”

Ori smiled again, picked up the plates, and took them to the sink. He washed them quickly and took down cups and a pot to make tea. He poked through the jars trying to decide what tea he wanted.
Dori would love this he thought and stopped dead. Dori. Dori was due back late tonight. He had to write to Dori!

“Everything’ alright?”

“I need to write a proper note to Dori! He’ll be worried sick if I don’t tell him more.”

“I though’ Nori… Aye, yeh better drop Dori a word. I’ll call yeh a raven t’ take it down. Kettle’s about ready.”

“I’ll take our tea through to the sitting room. May I use the desk there?”

“Aye.”

Ori brought the tray through and set it on the red granite table. He went to the desk and rooted out paper, ink, and a pen which he set to sharpening.

Dwalin came through with a large raven sitting on his shoulder. Ori started to rise to pour the tea but Dwalin waved him down and the raven hopped onto the table with a loud croak.

Ori tapped the nib for a moment then:

“Dear Dori,

By now you will have heard the whole story from Nori. I do assure you that I am well and Captain Dwalin has been everything that is polite and kind.

I now have a job with the Library of Erebor and start tomorrow!

Please be easy that I’m perfectly safe and very comfortable.

I will come and see you as soon as I can and, hopefully,

Captain Dwalin will accompany me.

All my love,

Your Ori.”

Ori folded the letter up and tucked the edges in. He turned to Dwalin, who was sitting on the couch but hunched forward so he could tease the raven by tapping its beak and pulling his finger away before the bird could catch it. The raven cackled at Dwalin, dancing about, obviously enjoying their game. It looked up at Ori when Dwalin did.

“All set, lad?” Dwalin asked.

The raven hopped over. Ori handed the raven the letter. It took it and flew out to the reception area. Dwalin went with it. Ori moved to the table and poured out the tea. Dwalin returned and lifted a bag off a shelf. He sat down on the couch and put the cushion Ori had fallen asleep on last night next to him and patted it. Ori put Dwalin’s cup near him, took his own and sat down.
Dwalin opened the bag and removed a beautiful viol. Ori watched as Dwalin plucked at the strings, listening and tuning, then set it to his arm and drew the bow across the strings.

Ori sighed, settled against the couch and tucked his feet up. Dwalin played an old mining tune, then drifted into others about marching and poetry. Ori drank his tea, staring at the fire while the soft music wrapped him in contentment.

Dwalin stopped and placed the instrument on his knee.

“Ye play, lad?”

“Not strings. I do have a flute at ho- Dori’s.” Ori gulped his slip and went on. “Nori taught me and Dori plays one, too. Dori’s very good at it. Sometimes I talk him into playing while I do the knitting. I know he likes playing it more than knitting.”

“Oh, aye. Yeh like t’ knit?”

“Very much. Dori taught me. He made up a special pattern that only Nori and I know how to do. It’s on my cardigan. I” He paused. Where was his cardigan? The tailors. Ori leapt to his feet.

“Dwalin! What will the tailors do with my old clothes? Do I have to go and get them? Will they send them back to Dori? Will they destroy them?”

“They’ll bring ‘em to th’ house t’morrow.”

“Oh.”

“Destroy ‘em?”

“Well…”

“Who in th’ whole a’ Arda does tha’?”

Ori thought of several of the meaner merchant men of Dale and shrugged. Dwalin gave him a narrow look then put the instrument and bow on the table and looked around with a frown. He went to the opposite side of the room and started going through the shelves. Ori followed, skimmed over the titles of the books there, and looked at the many knick-knacks collected by the Fundins over the years.

He looked over at the sound of Dwalin’s muttered curses and saw him on his haunches, digging through a cupboard.

“What are you looking for? Perhaps if I looked, too, I-“

“Here we are.”

Dwalin rose, turning to Ori with a grin, and handed over a large round ball of a basket of woven grasses. It was obviously very old. Ori looked curiously at it while Dwalin escorted him back to the couch. They both sat and, at Dwalin’s nod, Ori lifted off the lid.

The inside swam with beautiful colors. All different kinds of worsted and other types of yarns. Ori gasped and touched the ones on top. Some threads caught as his fingers were rough from cold and working with pens, paper and other chores. He turned back to Dwalin, who looked satisfied.

Ori scooted forward and removed skein after skein, feeling and admiring each one before laying it on the table. Among the skeins was a long packet wrapped in embroidered linen which Ori took out and examined. Untying the ribbon fastener, he unrolled it, and shining knitting needles of all sizes and dainty crochet hooks revealed themselves.

“Mam liked to knit, too,” Dwalin said. “Balin hid these away as adad didn’t like either of us doin’ it. Said it wasn’t a warrior’s craft. Bloody batshit. Warriors need socks an’ clothes an’ th’ gumption to mend ‘em. ’M sure Balin’d be delighted yeh like th’ craft.”

“You don’t think he’ll mind?”

“Nah, lad. Help yerself t’ it. Stuff should still be good to work with.”

Ori looked at the bounty all round him. He leaned back against the couch and put his head on Dwalin’s arm and patted it.

“Thank you, Dwalin.”

Dwalin covered Ori’s hand with his own and gave it a squeeze. Ori couldn’t resist and sat forward again. He looked carefully and drew out a skein of dark green.

“Shall I make you a scarf, some gloves, or a jumper?”

Dwalin took the skein and felt it. He looked distant yet pleased.

“Me mam was going to make me a jumper a’ this but she never go’ ’round t’ it. If yeh could—”

“Of course!” Ori said immediately. “What pattern would you like?”

“Plain’s fine. Mebbe a bit a’ yer special pattern ‘round th’ collar an’ arm bands.”

“How long? Do you wants long sleeves, too?”

“Real long, lad. Like ‘em t’ come down t’ me knees, but no sleeves.”

Ori dug in the basket again and found five more skeins of the same.

“This isn’t sheep’s wool.”

“Nah, goat. Men call our goats, like my Gnasher, giant kahmeere goats.”

“It’s lovely,” Ori admired. He inspected the needles and removed a pair of silver ones. They were perfectly smooth and highly polished. The ends were capped with emeralds. Ori sat back and dropped the skein in his lap. He found the end and pulled several lengths free and began to cast on his stitches. When he thought he’d put on enough he started the bottom hem with the Ri brothers’ pattern. Dwalin watched him for a few minutes, then took up his viol and began playing again.

Ten lines in, a yawn nearly split Ori’s face. He rubbed his eyes. In the distance, he faintly heard the night bell for the hour. It was quite late.

“Shit,” Dwalin commented and put the viol away.

Ori put everything back in the basket and laid his work on the top.

“Just put it beside the couch. Nice t’ see it out again,” Dwalin said as he picked up the tea tray and headed to the kitchen. Ori tidied what little there was to do and went to the fireplace. He turned the lever as he’d seen Dwalin do, the flames lowered and went out with a hiss. He heard something close. Dwalin came back in.
“Is this the right way to do this?” Ori asked.

Dwalin twitched the knob.

“Aye, lad, yeh go’ it.”

“How exactly . . . What is…? It’s a lovely fire-“

“Comes up fra’ th’ forges,” Dwalin explained. “Lets th’ smiths change the height a’ th’ heat, when they’re working’ with different metals. Every fireplace, cook top an’ oven in th’ mountain’s linked t’ ’em.”

“Ooohh,” Ori sighed with envy. “How lucky you all are! It’s such a grind having to fetch from the woods or buy from the coal merchants.”

Dwalin said nothing but frowned a little.

“Need t’ get yer rest, lad. And-“

Dwalin stopped dead and Ori, who had started to follow him, went nose first into his back.

“Yeh a’riga’, lad?”

“Yes, what is it?”

Dwalin paused, seemed to choose his words, then reddened as he finally said, “Yeh don’t have anythin’?”

“What do you mean?”

“Shit, I shoulda gone t’ yer Dori’s yesterday and go’ yer thin’s. Yeh’ve no’ even go’ a nightshirt in tha’ scrivener’ bag wee Tilda brought yeh?”

It was Ori’s turn to blush.

“I didn’t think of it either until I wondered about my cardigan.”

“Right,” Dwalin said decisively. He walked through the hall and opened Ori’s room door. He went to the wardrobe and lifted a huge chest down from the top. It was made in the same manner as the wardrobe so Ori had thought it was part of it. Dwalin opened the chest, which was filled to the brim, rifled through, then nodded.

“Make free with anything’ yeh find. Was my stuff when I were young. Was about yer height then. Yeh’ll need th’ belts f’r th’ britches.”

“Thank you,” Ori brightened.

There was a wealth of clean, carefully folded clothes. He could see the finely made linen from where he stood.

Dwalin turned and went to the door.

“Sleep well,” he said with a smile.

Without a thought, Ori rushed to him and, reaching and throwing his arms about Dwalin’s neck, kissed his cheek impulsively.
“Thank you again so much. You are so kind to me. Sleep well, too!”

Dwalin looked both surprised and pleased as he scooped Ori into a bear’s hug.

Embarrassed, Ori slid away and shut the door.
Arguments, ambitions and a letter

Chapter Summary

The continued adventures of Ori!
Here we learn more about Dipfa. What the upstairs of the Fundin house is like. Also the exciting way Thorin and Dwalin killed Azog!!

Three hidden hints this time; Dylan Thomas, Persuasion (1995 film) with Amanda Root, Addams Family Values movie.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The Master laughed horribly as the guard chopped Nori’s head off. Ori screamed. There was blood everywhere. It rose from the floor and welled out of the walls. The Master’s laughter grew louder and more horrible. Screaming came from everywhere - Dwarrow, men, elves....

Ori sat up in bed with a small cry, shaking, soaked in sweat and gasping for breath. He was safe in the House of Fundin, married to Captain Dwalin, who was kind to him, and Nori had gone home safely. It was just an awful dream. Ori sighed and gathered his wits.

He got out of bed and helped himself to the water in the carafe. Moonlight shone through the window and he could hear the wind outside. His borrowed night shirt was so long it brushed his ankles. He walked back and forth wondering if elves felt this way when they wandered about the trees in their long robes.

Seized with the desire to get out of his room, Ori silently opened his door and peered out. There was only darkness broken by the two tiny lines of green phosphorous along the edges of the floors. Ori, overcome with curiosity, peeped into Dwalin’s room. By the small glow from the low fire he saw Dwalin sprawled face down across a bed big enough for three. The room was a disaster with weapons covering every wall, things for cleaning, mending and making weapons and bits of clothing strewn everywhere. There were books, pilled on the nightstand, on a large desk, and more unceremoniously dumped near the hearth. along with several maps and unrolled scrolls. A raven stood on a stand with its head under its wing. The only sound was Dwalin snoring. Ori closed the door soundlessly.

Ori padded down the hall and through to the kitchen. He sat for a minute then decided he didn’t want any tea and wandered though to the sitting room, then the reception room and all around that. It was vast and cool although the floor was warm like the back living quarters. He decided to climb the stair to the second floor.

Behind the curtain he found a large room with comfortable seating and two fireplaces. Three hallways went off from the room. Ori explored these and only found silent bedrooms and sitting rooms, all unused and empty. Dwalin’s parents must have entertained many people. He remembered that Lord Balin was away, so when his lordship returned the rooms would probably be busy again with visiting diplomats.

Ori looked around the largest room again and realized he was tired. He went quietly back to his own room and climbed into bed.

He suddenly felt very small and alone without Nori and Dori close by. He tried not to but ended crying himself to sleep.

Ori woke to sunshine glowing pinkly through the window. He clambered out of bed and looked at himself in the mirror, at the dark circles under his eyes and his hair completely on end and in all directions. He grabbed the towel and washcloth and scampered to the privy. After washing up in the sink there, he returned to his room. He dealt with his hair, put his new trousers back on and went to the chest. He found some dark green socks and a pair of bright red ones. Snickering to himself he put on one red and one green. He pulled on a cream linen shirt on and found the purple tunic. He glanced at his reflection once more and went out. The door on his right opened and Dwalin walked out, mumbling.

“Good morning.” Ori greeted him.

“‘Mornin’, lad.” Dwalin managed and peered at him. “Yer awful chipper this early.”

Ori giggled at him. Dwalin blinked, grinned, and tousled Ori’s hair as he went past and down the hall. The door to the privy slammed.

Ori padded through to the kitchen and perched at the kitchen table until Dwalin pushed in and smiled at him.

“Are we going to Dis and Thorin’s again?” Ori asked. “Or shall I make you something?”

“Goin’ over there. Ready?”

Dwalin led the way through to the sitting room, shrugged into his furs and his halberd, sliding the hooded axes into place. Ori took up his satchel and they went out to the courtyard.

Fili opened the door.

“Ori-mate!”

“Good morning, Fili.”

“Dwalin, our idad Frerin’s here. I think it might get ugly,” Fili said quietly.

Dwalin didn’t reply. Ori cocked his head at Fili.

“Frerin’s the youngest and udad’s favorite. He likes to think he’s the heir, “ Fili remarked dryly.

Ori drew a little behind Dwalin wondering what if anything he might do to assist Dwalin as Fili led the way to the white dining room.

Seated on Thorin’s left was an exceptionally handsome dwarf. He had the Durin face, like his siblings, but his blond hair fell in ringlets obviously created by the copious use of sugar water and rags followed by a great deal of pomade. He wore several braids, mostly family and accomplishments like archery, swordsmanship and pony riding. He was also a journeyman gem inspector. His hands were covered in rings of gold. He wore wore his beard tightly braided and adorned with lapis beads.

“Fili,” he said and turned to look up as Fili proceeded Dwalin and Ori into the room. “Come, my child, sit and eat. Dwalin, you’re late.”

Frerin’s voice was pleasant but he spoke with a mincing tone that made Ori’s hackles rise. He cought sight of Ori and looked down his nose.

“What’s this?”

Thorin cuffed Frerin.

“Manners, little brother. This is Ori of the Brothers Ri and Dwalin’s new husband.” Thorin smiled warmly at Ori and nodded to his right side. Dwalin pulled out the next chair for Ori and sat directly at Thorin’s right. Dis arrived.

“Ori! Dwalin! Good morning to you both. You’re just in time.”

“Good morning.” Ori greeted her with a smile.

“Are you alright?” she asked.

“Yes,” Ori said slowly.

“You just look a little peaky.”

Ori made himself shrug. “Queer dream. Startled me a little.”

Dis seated herself.

“Sleeping in a different place and bed will do that to me, too,” Dis said comfortingly and dished up from the enormous pie in front of her.

Ori had never had sausage pie before. It was very good as were the pile of scrambled eggs Dis added to his plate. Thorin and Dwalin were talking about the caravan again. Fili and Kili were telling their mother about training with Dwalin that day. Ori enjoyed his breakfast until he felt eyes on him. He looked up at Frerin staring at him with a look of faint disgust on his face.

“Dwalin,” Frerin said.

Dwalin and Thorin looked at each other and both of them looked at Frerin.

“Wha’?” Dwalin grunted.

“A scribe? Really?”

“Me brother started as a scribe. What of it?”

“Yes, but look at him.”

Dwalin turned in his chair and looked Ori over. Ori blinked prettily at him with a smile and Dwalin chucked him under the chin.
“He looks finer than a new cut gem, doesn’ he?” Dwalin teased.

Both Thorin and Dis chuckled as Fili and Kili made kissy noises. Ori blushed and nudged Dwalin with his knee. Dwalin nudged back, still grinning.

“Well, I don’t remember having my permission asked for,” Frerin growled.

“Your permission isn’t required,” Dis snapped. “Dwalin told us about Ori a long time ago. We like him.”

Ori blushed to his toes and squirmed before he could stop himself.

“Well, it’s of no real matter to me,” Frerin said loftily. “I have excellent news for all of you, although perhaps not for Fili and Kili.”

Frerin smirked at the two princes, who looked at each other, shrugged, and went back to their food. Frerin didn’t look very pleased with their reaction and went on.

“I believe I have found the dam who shall be my bride.”

Thorin picked at his leftover crust and glanced at Dwalin, who obviously didn’t give a shit. Dis looked a little exasperated with all of them and replied pleasantly.

“That’s wonderful, Frer! I didn’t know you were courting. What’s the dam’s name? Where did you meet?”

Frerin leaned forward, delighted to have all the attention.

“Well as you know I was riding parade yesterday with some of Udad’s guard and we had paused, most kindly, I thought, to let a group of dwarrow coming out of the mines and heading to their various little homes, I suppose. And there among them was the loveliest dam I have ever laid eyes on. She was walking aloof and tall and beautiful. I immediately accosted her and introduced myself. She was properly impressed, I do assure you, sister, she stared open mouthed up at me on my white pony.”

Ori sat back. He could just imagine it. A group of miners coming out, tired from work, desperately ready for food and rest, and all of a sudden this primped and shiny princeling rides his pony into the center of their group and starts talking at them while his guards circle around. Poor dam probably thought she was being arrested for something! He tore himself away from his thoughts as Frerin announced he had asked her to present herself at dinner here some time this week.

Frerin smiled.

“She seemed quite overcome. I count on you to be friendly to her, namad.”

Dis smiled faintly, lifting her teacup to drink. Frerin tossed his napkin down on his plate, rose, and headed for the door. He waved his hand vaguely in their direction, pulled open the door, demanded of the arriving servant why she hadn’t been on hand to open the door for him and ordered her to clear the table. The servant entered the room and shut the door, blocking out the rest of whatever Frerin was going on about.

There was the sound of breaking porcelain as Dis crushed her cup in her hand and the rasp of the chair legs as Thorin got to his feet.

“Mistress Dazla, I apologize-“ Thorin began.
The servant merely shook her head at him.

“No need, your highness. I’ve been in this house all his life and he’s never had a piece of manners at all.”

“True, but you shouldn’t have to put up with his-“

“I don’t regard him, sir. I serve you and her highness, I don’t take orders from the likes of him. And neither does any other dwarf with sense,” Dazla added.

Dis laid her hand on Dazla’s arm and the older dam patted it.

“More’s the pity you have to put up with that, marm.”

“Oh Dazla, he didn’t used to be this way. You remember.”

“Course I do, marm. Which is why I’ve never broken a kitchen crock over his head. Unlike the captain there.”

Dwalin turned, eyebrow raised playfully at Dazla.

“I ain’t never touched any a’ yer crocks, missus. Not even th’ one yer married t’.”

“Oh! You dreadful wretch!” Dazla scolded and, for the want of anything not breakable, settled for throwing a napkin at Dwalin.

Thorin sighed and sat back down heavily. Dazla went out and shut the door. Fili and Kili started to laugh.

Fili flapped his napkin at his uncle.

“After lessons today I shall accost a poor dam and tell her to present herself at my amad’s then marry me as I haven’t the charm of stuck pig!”

“Hoink, hoink! I don’t know her name but I know mine. Hoink!” Kill added, snickering.

Dwalin roared with laughter. Thorin tried not to. Dis tried to frown and settled on telling Kili not to make such noises at the table. Dis turned to Ori.

“Really, Ori, he’s isn’t mean at the bone, he’s just, well, Amad hadn’t expected another dwarfling after me and he was a lovely surprise for our parents.”

“Until he learned to talk,” said Dwalin.

Dis frowned at Dwalin and continued. “Udad was so taken with him. He’s the spit of our Umand, you know.”

“And wasn’t given the training and discipline you and Prince Thorin did?” Ori guessed.

“Exactly,” Dis smiled wanly. “Thus he’s very spoiled and thinks he’s very grand and kingly. I do hope this dam he speaks of will help bring him around.”

“She’ll need a bleedin’ warhammer,” Dwalin added.

Thorin snorted, went to the fireplace and rested his foot on the fender. “Fili, Kili, off to lessons, the pair of you.”
The princes scrambled good naturally out of their seats, kissed their amad, nearly knocking her from her chair, and went off.

“Later, Ori-mate!” Fili called back and Kili echoed, “Later!”

Dwalin turned to Ori.

“Right, I’d better be getting’ yeh t’ th’ library. Ol’ Brur’ll have a conniption if yer late.”

“I’m ready.” Ori got up. To Dis he said, “Thank you.”

Dis rose and came and kissed his cheek.

“We’ll see you at dinner, then,” she instructed kindly.

Dwalin lifted Ori down from Harley and gave his shoulder a pat.

“Enjoy yersel’, lad.”

“I’m sure I will,” Ori said, adjusting his satchel over his shoulder. “Will you be seeing Dori or are you busy?”

“I’ll make time to look in on ‘im.” Dwalin promised and rode away.

Ori went through library’s big main doors and into a vast room at least four floors high. All the walls were shelves filled with books. There were long tables and chairs for readers and a large desk that made a square of itself in the middle of the room. Master Brur was there, talking with another dwarf. Ori trotted over and Master Brur saw him.

“There yeh be, lad and right on time. Good. I’ll take yeh up t’ yer desk.”

Ori’s desk was on the same floor as Brur’s office, in a great hall full of desks with scribes busily working at each one. Ori put away his satchel in a small cupboard for personal items under his desk. Brur left him there to study how the library divided its collections with numbers and rune markings.

Brur collected Ori for lunch and while eating, Brur discussed what fonts and size of scripts were used for what and how each subject had a bibliographer who organized, collected, and managed each part of the collection. After lunch, Ori was given a very intensive tour and introduced to each bibliographer.

Brur brought him back to his desk after that. Ori nearly gasped when he heard the afternoon bell for two. He turned back to his perusal of how subject headings were grouped when there was a throat cleared next to him. He looked up and Tilda threw herself at him.

“Tilda! What are you doing… Hello.”

Ori saw the soldier who had taken Tilda home the other day.

“Furh’nk, sir,” the soldier supplied as Ori rose.

“Master Furh’nk, it was most kind of you to bring Tilda to visit but how…?” Ori wasn’t sure how to phrase his question.
“Captain Dwalin’s orders, sir. He was at your brother’s earlier, still there now, but thought it be best t’ send me along with the lassie.”

“He’s got a pretty goat,” Tilda put in. “Its name is Puffball and she’s a girl.”

“Aye, that she is,” Furh’nk agreed, obviously very amused with Tilda.

Ori thought Furh’nk was either a good father or an overly indulgent uncle.

“We brought you your clothes and Dori put some other stuff in,” Tilda went on. “He wrote you a letter. And he pressed really hard on the paper as he was really mad at Nori but there wasn’t much of a point ’cause Nori was really drunk and tried to beat up Dwalin, but Dwalin pushed him away and Nori fell on his butt and then he got up and took off his trousers, climbed on the table and yelled ‘Does anybody want a fight?’ Dori called him an old baboon then my da lifted him down and he sat on the floor and cried that he was a bad brother and Dori said yes he was and get off the floor and make some tea. Da told Dori Captain Dwalin was very nice and I told them you like his butt and Sigrid told me to hush which wasn’t fair and she bundled your things while Dori wrote you a letter and told me to bring it to you and Captain Dwalin told this nice soldier to bring me and I got to ride on his goat and I never knew the mountain was so beautiful on the inside. Do you live right here at this desk now?”

Ori waited calmly until this barrage of Tilda’s excitement ran out of steam. Furh’nk was inspecting the ceiling with the most terrible frown on his face. It was obvious it was the only way he could stop himself from bursting into laughter. Ori notice a few of the other scribes had peered around their desk to see.

“You ain’t arresting’ me scribe,” Brur’s growl got the soldier’s attention.

“I’m sorry for the commotion, Master Brur,” Ori said quickly. “My young neighbor has just stopped in to give me news and a parcel from my eldest brother.”

Brur looked at the guard, then turned to Ori, opened his mouth then looked back at the guard.

“You Missus Helar’s boy?”

“Aye, Master Brur, that I am.”

“Weren’t you the one who used to put centipedes in my ink bottle to watch them crawl out and ruin my papers with their little ink tracks?”

The soldier grinned.

“Aye, Master Brur, that was me. Just barely a pebble back then. You were so good letting’ me play with yer stuff.” Furh’nk was almost misty-eyed.

“Aye,” Brur agreed, narrowed his eyes, and gave the soldier a clip round the head with the back of his hand.

Furh’nk chuckled at this and Tilda’s eyes got big. Ori quickly turned back to Master Brur.

“Master Brur, this is my er.. brothers’ young neighbor Miss Tilda Bardsdatter. Tilda, this is Master Brur, he-“

“Sooo,” Brur drawled folding his arms and looking as far down at Tilda as he could. “Ye enjoying’ yourself around these scribes are yeh? D’ yeh know what scribes do, little lass?”
“Of course,” replied Tilda loftily. “I’ve watched Ori loads of times and he taught me stuff and my teacher thinks I’m a genius because I have joined up writing and I don’t need lines on paper to write straight. I’m going to be a scribe. I’m sure when I’m old enough I’ll be working here, too. There’s an empty desk just over there. That might be my desk and Ori and I will work next to each other!”

He leaned over Ori’s desk and pulled out a blank sheet of paper and a pen.

“Go on,” he ordered.

Tilda looked up at Ori, who helped her into the chair and got her started with the ink.

“Put you full name at the top. There,” Ori murmured. “The date goes in that corner. Now begin with a greeting.”

Tilda put her tongue between her teeth and carefully wrote ‘Master Brur’. Beneath this she wrote the Westron alphabet in both small and capitals, wrote her numbers through 30, followed by her teacher’s favorite writing practice sentence. She finished and, with Ori’s help blotted it, then she handed it proudly to Master Brur. Master Brur took it and looked the writing over scrupulously. He looked at Ori.

“I take it that you taught her.”

“Letters, numbers and basic reading,” Ori admitted.

Master Brur turned his attention back to the paper and frowned.

“‘The quick brown fox jumps over th’ lazy dog’…” Master Brur looked at Tilda. “That’s one bloody lazy dog.”

Tilda shrugged.

“That’s what I said and the teacher made me sit in the corner. Ori explained that it uses every letter in the Westron alphabet, so it’s just practice and doesn’t mean anything else. I wish Ori could just be my teacher. He knows everything.”

“Mahal, Tilda!” Ori choked. “No one knows everything!”

His demurring was lost on Master Brur, who was shaking soundlessly and Furh’nk almost had to leave the room.

“Well, young lassie,” Master Brur said when he could speak. “Yeh keep practicing and yer nose in yer books and mebbe we will see yeh up here when yer of age.”

“Really?” Tilda squealed then clapped her hand over her mouth and whispered “Sorry.” loudly.

Master Brur chuckled and patted her on the head.

“We’ll see, lass, we’ll see. You need to be off home now. Master Furh’nk here needs to be back at his duties and Ori has work to do.”

Master Furh’nk took Tilda’s shoulder and began to steer her out. She yanked away to hug Ori again then trotted off, turning only to wave and shout, “Bye!”

The door shut behind them and Master Brur turned back to Ori.
Ori blushed.

“Tilda is excitable,” he managed.

Master Brur stroked his beard.

“She’s also very clever,” Master Brur said seriously. “If she does stick to it, I’d hire her. I’m not as old fashioned as some. Knowledge’s something for all who wish to study. I’ve had a project in the back of me head for a while. I’d like to see th’ history of dwarrow in other languages. A full set of our history in Westron or even Sindarin. The Lord of Imladris would pay dearly for such. Yeh can translate to Sindarin and having a man-child translating that t’ Westron’d be quite an accomplishment for th’ library.”

“Are you in earnest, sir?” Ori asked, his mind reeling with possibility.

“I am, lad.” Master Brur cleared his throat. “Well, this is down the road a bit and we need to get yeh trained and doin’. Yeh’ve got about half a bell and another before yeh leave. Keep on with that headings work. I’ll pop in to see how yer doin’ tomorrow.”

Master Brur left and Ori sat down again, his thoughts all to the winds. He finally gathered himself and went back to his studies until he heard the last afternoon bell and got up as did all the other scribes.

Ori came out the great doors and saw Dwalin on Harley. Next to him was Dipfa dressed in similar fashion as yesterday except her suit was bright orange. She was seated on a freshly sheared goat. The goat’s wool was white with rather garish pink and yellow spots painted all over it. As he drew closer Ori saw the goat also pulled a small cart.

“Hello,” Ori said.

Dwalin dropped down, Dipfa followed and bowed to Ori.

“I have some your new wardrobe all ready.” She was positively beaming.

Dwalin chuckled as Ori put his hand into Dwalin’s.

“None a’ yer new socks match,” Dwalin added.

Ori blushed, elbowed Dwalin, and smiled to Dipfa.

“Really? So soon? That’s wonderful.”

Dwalin put Ori’s parcel into Dipfa’s cart. He caught Ori around the waist, set him on Harley, and swung up behind. Harley trotted off and Dipfa brought her goat alongside with some coaxing.

“Get a wiggle on, Poot-poot.”

“That’s what a little man child called him once. I was never sure if it was because of the dots or that particular time while I was looking at fabric someone fed him beans. He’s also a bit fat, so makes a kind of quiet ‘poot-poot’ noise when he has to go up hill,” Dipfa explained.

“Why’d yeh paint th’ poor thin’?” Dwalin asked.
“Emotional movement,” Dipfa explained. “When Poot-poot is in motion, the primary color is randomly blended and thrown into relief by the secondary. At times this can happen simultaneously. As living beings our physical state can be a blend or it may cast our emotional state into relief.”

Dwalin looked at Ori and Ori folded his lips carefully and observed that this was a fascinating concept and asked how had she developed it. The rest of the ride to the Fundin residence was taken up with Dipfa regaling them with her metaphysical relationship with color.

They stopped at the front door of the Fundin House. Dwalin let Ori down and Dipfa hopped off Poot-poot. Dwalin took Harley to the stable while Ori opened the door. He was about to help Dipfa bring things in, but she winked and let down the back gate of the cart. Inside was a metal box. Dipfa pulled on this and as it slid out, metal legs unfolded. They had little wheels on the ends and she rolled to the door. She then removed the cart’s wooden back gate, laid it down, and rolled the metal cart up the improvised ramp.

Ori led her through to the sitting room, hung up his satchel and took off his boots. Dipfa looked about and declared the room very cozy. Ori put the fire on and came to help her unpack.

Dipfa first handed him the bag Tilda had brought. This Ori put on the couch. He saw a flash of paper and grabbed it. It was the letter from Dori as Tilda had said. Ori shoved it in his pocket and turned to Dipfa. Dipfa was admiring his socks.

“I’m so glad you’re staying with your crossed harmonic color choices.”

She pulled the dust cover off the cart.

“I tried to incorporate it into your new clothes, but subtly, as you seem to be a dwarf of great subtly and mystery.”

Dwalin came in on that statement and grinned at Ori. Ori blushed furiously and created a smile for Dipfa.

“I’m very excited to see what you’ve do- created.”

Dipfa basked in the word created and brought out a complete set of clothes, all draped over a piece of wood with an attached hook to hang it with. There were lilac colored trousers and a coat in a paler shade, inside was a shirt of checkered material containing both colors, each square outlined in the tiniest thread of dark green. A silk scarf to go with this ensemble was striped again with both colors; She matched this with a pair of deep purple shoes and dark green socks. One sock had a lilac strip and the other a lavender stripe. Ori cringed, but was overcome with joy at such lovely clothing.

“Dipfa! It’s perfect!”

“Oh,” she demurred and laid it across one of the chairs. “It’s just for everyday. Here’s another.”

She drew out a second suit. This had dark green trousers with side slashes filled with a currant colored satin. Instead of a shirt, this had a long tunic of dark green with bunches of currant berries and leaves embroidered along the edges. There were soft boots dyed dark green. These laced from toes to knees and were paired with currant colored socks with two different shades of green dots on them to show through the laces. This joined the other on the chair. Dipfa took away a cotton cloth and removed another suit.
“This is your court dress.”

Dipfa held up the most amazing suit Ori had ever seen. It looked black but when the material moved, it showed the darkest green Ori had ever seen. It was sewn together in red thread with garnets studded along each seam. There were black boots with tassels of dark green silk, each tied off with emeralds.

Dwalin rose from his seat on the back of the couch and came over to look.

“Aye, this is fine and proper. Yeh’ll look a treat in this.”

“It’s…beautiful.” Ori gasped.

“My pleasure, sir.” Dipfa curtsied low and laid it with the others on the chair. She went back to the cart and removed a final parcel wrapped in white cotton cloth. She gave this directly to Ori with a murmur about underpinnings.

“Thank you so much, Dipfa.” Ori managed. “You have done amazing work in so little time. I’ll be so proud to wear these.”

Dipfa blushed and curtsied again.

“It’s my pleasure and honor to be your tailor and dresser, Master Ori of the House of Fundin.”

Dwalin chuckled and tossed her a small purse. She looked at it and frowned.

“I thought this was-

“Yeh did a fine job, lass. Yeh deserve it.”

Dipfa didn’t squeal but Ori could see it in her face. She curtsied again, grabbed her cart and headed out. Dwalin went with her to open the door.

Ori turned back and stared at all his new finery. He had never owned so much clothing in all his life. He was still sitting there, staring when Dwalin came back in.

“Yeh like ‘em, lad?”

“Yes…I’ve never owned anything so fine before… I’m almost afraid to touch them.”

Dwalin chuckled again and scooped the pile into his arms.

“Right, lad. Let’s get these t’ yer room so yeh kin put ‘em away. We’re going’ t’ Dis f’r dinner, yeh want t’ put one on? How about this purple one?”

“Shall I?” Ori asked.

“Aye, do it. Yeh kin show off.”

Ori looked up at Dwalin, who was smiling down at him. He waggled his eyebrows making Ori burst into laughter.

“Oh, alright,” Ori conceded. “The purple one it is!”

Dwalin went out and Ori opened Dori’s parcel. His clothing and his little treasures he’d kept in his room were there, and the long leather folder in which he’d kept all his sketches. And the secret one he had hidden between his mattress and the straw tick. He shuddered to think Dori had known where that was. He considered whether Sigrid had put it in as he had shown it to her a few times.

He put his own few clothes away. They were not as fine as his new ones but they had been made with Dori’s love and he still wanted to wear them. Buried in the middle of all the clothing was his little wooden flute, carved by Nori from birch near the River Running. Ori was delighted to see it again.

Next to this, there was something wrapped in thin paper. Ori opened it carefully and found the beautiful hairbrush Nori had once brought Dori. It was very old, an antique. Dori had said it was from Ered Luin but occasionally Ori wondered who Nori had stolen it from. Ori placed it carefully on the dresser.

Half in eagerness and half dread, Ori sat on the bed and opened Dori’s letter.

My dear wee badger,

Nori was not able to apprise me of the situation until I had come home. I stepped around the street corner to Bard’s and he immediately returned with me, bringing both Sigrid and Tilda. Tilda related all the events she knew.

It was then your Captain arrived. He explained the incident thoroughly and was most patient in answering all my questions. Even although your brother was in a disgracefully inebriated state, he did apologize for hitting the Captain.

As this had been done I did not foresee the need for me to do so myself. I do wish the Captain had come to a less momentous decision than marriage, however what is done is done and unless you tell me you wish it otherwise, I shall accustom myself to it. In his favor, Captain Dwalin seems upright and honorable and did state he shall do all in his power to make your happiness complete.

He also promised that you both shall join us for dinner tomorrow evening. I look forward to seeing you again soon. And trust me when I say that it shall only take from you a word, a look, will be enough to decide me that this marriage will be called quits.

All my love,

Ori’s very own Dori.

Ori smiled after reading this. Dori was so good. He was ready to support Ori no matter how he chose to live. Well, as long as he didn’t get up to half the things Nori did, Ori reflected. He folded the letter up and tucked it into the sketching folder and decided he should get washed and dressed.

Ori looked himself over. He had put the other two suits in the wardrobe and nearly cried with delight at the lovely cotton underclothing now filling the small dresser. He had put on a new set of combinations then carefully combed his hair and put on the purple suit. He turned and looked in the mirror. He looked so different than he had two days ago. He looked like a well-born dwarf scribe.

He went out to the sitting room where Dwalin, who had also changed into more comfortable clothing, was waiting for him. Dwalin looked him over then walked around him.

“Ahh, lad, yeh look finer than a new cut diamond.”

“Thank you. These are so comfortable. I never thought anything would be so nice to wear.”

“C’mon then,” Dwalin said clapping Ori’s shoulder. “Let’s go an’ show yeh off.”

“Look at you!” Dis cried as she greeted them at the door. “That color suits you, Ori. Did you take him to Mahrdin, son of Greneeld’s, Dwalin?”

“Aye, an’ ol’ Mahrdin put ‘im th’ hands a’ his new assistant; lass called Dipfa. She thinks our Ori’s very fashion progressive.”

“Well,” Dis giggled. “I shall have to take care I’m not thrown into the darkness by your husband.” She looked Ori over then paused.

“I’m afraid your Dipfa has mismatched the stripes in your socks.”

Ori swallowed a laugh and tried to look down his nose.

“They’re not mismatched, your highness, they are in a deep metaphysical state of emotional movement and throwing each other into relief with the rest of my clothes.”

Dis stared.

“What in Durin’s name does that mean?”

Ori grinned.

“I have no idea. Dipfa says that’s what’s happening.”

Dis laughed and pushed the pair of them through to the dining room. Thorin came through from another door and nodded to Ori. Ori looked about.

“Fili and Kili are over with the In’s this evening,” Dis told him. “Gloin has a young son they like to spend time with. I hear he’s quite up and coming with all his lessons.”

“Not too bad with his axe, either,” Dwalin put in. “Lad’s got tha’ gift from his da.”

Dazla entered with a large tray and told Dis she was served.
Ori tucked into his dinner. Meat dried then stewed in a sweet, spicy sauce served with soft, floury rolls and a large glass bowl filled with two colors of raw cabbage, finely shredded and mixed with carrots, onions, nuts, and raisins, and dressed with a milky spiced sauce.

“Ori.”

Ori looked up at Thorin who was regarding at him rather seriously. Ori swallowed his mouthful and waited.

“Dis tells me you’ve never heard of open court.”

“No, I haven’t. It is something new?”

“No, it’s something that’s been going on since the time of Durin the Deathless.”

“Oh.”

“Does the Master of Dale have such?”

“No. He just levies a lot of taxes. It’s a little hard as only certain jobs are open to dwarrow who live in the Dale. We can’t be hired to do things like accounting or litigation for men. Of course, this led to dwarrow only working for other dwarrow. It’s kind of strange. Ever since I was a mere badger I’ve watched as the Men of Dale seemed to change. Not change as people but people moving away and different people coming in.”

Thorin leaned back in his chair, frowning slightly.

“Have…have I said something amiss?” Ori asked.

“No, not at all,” Thorin assured him. “I have been under the impression that things had become rather different in the Dale than what we had thought. We dwarrow, as you may of noticed,” he said with a slight smile, “are slow to change and very set in our ways. We are also much longer lived than men, thus we do not always expect them to change as quickly as they do. I have been slowly over the past five years taking on more responsibility concerning the Dale and our people. Dwalin has been assisting me in this. You’ve probably noticed the soldiers are traveling through the town rather than just scouting the outer borders.”

“Yes,” Ori said quickly. “Most of the dwarrow left in the Dale noticed. We weren’t sure why and just thought Calmar had asked for them to patrol. He thinks everyone is after his money. Actually that’s how I saw Dwalin for the first time and Sigrid saw Fili.”

“She think Fili’s go’ a nice bum,” Dwalin supplied unhelpfully, making both Thorin and Dis choke on their tea.

“He gets it from me,” Thorin commented, smirking.

“He gets it from Vili, thank you very much. I should know,” Dis countered.

“He gets the blond hair from Vili and Amad,” Thorin argued. “When he was a babe, he had our Umad’s eyes.”

“’S aright,” Dwalin told Ori. “We took ‘em outa his mouth right after.”

“Dwalin!” Dis cried as Thorin roared with laughter. Ori giggled watching as Dwalin grinned like a fool. Suddenly he remembered what Master Brur had said.
“Dis, what did Dwalin and Thorin do when they were young that Master Brur had to get them out of trouble for?”

Dis looked surprised then sly.

“Yes, tell us, boys. What was it? I heard amad say something about wargs?”

“Oh that wasn’t it. Brur got us out of what we did to the poncey elf King’s robe mess.”

“Robe mess?” Ori asked, eyes alight.

“We were naught but badgers,” Dwalin explained. “They were having a council meeting and we got under the table. We poured yellow ink on the floor near his feet and they were there f’r a couple hours, talkin’. When the elf King got up he got this weird look on his face and looked down. His entire front t’ the waist was wet an’ stained yellow. Looked like he’d had a huge piss under the table.”

“Oh Mahal!” Dis cried. “I never heard that story! What happened?”

“Nuthin’. He glared and marched out and the council stood about. Me an’ Thorin were stuck under th’ table. ‘Course we started gigglin’. Thror hauled us out, promising’ a beatin’ but Brur assured Thror he’d told us we could be there t’ listen in. Good f’r our education, he said. We got outa there freer than ravens. Lucky f’r us there was no ink on the floor. That robe soaked up the lot.”

Dis fell back in her chair laughing and Ori giggled so hard he could barely breath. Thorin and Dwalin watched them. When Ori and Dis got their breath back Thorin and Dwalin exchanged a look.

“The wargs,” Ori cajoled as Dazla and another dam came in, removed the dinner dishes, set down a pie and a large jug of thickened cream.

Thorin chuckled and Dwalin encouraged him with a wave of his hand. Thorin turned his chair, crossed his legs and played with his tea cup as Dis served out slices of the quince and pear pie, ladling the thick sweet cream over them.

“Dwalin and I were sent out for a summer season to ride with the outer border patrols. There were a lot more small orc raiding parties then and they mostly went after merchant wagons. Dwalin and I noticed after being sent to spy on them that the wargs were instantly loyal to their riders. The orcs encouraged breeding and the pups started out very small but they were quick to learn. That told us that the wargs were, in some ways, smarter than their orc riders. It didn’t take much to train the wargs as when they’re pups as they’re eager to please.”

“Very eager,” Dwalin added.

“So whenever there was a warg on guard without a rider, we...well, we’d bring them treats.”

“Treats?” Dis demanded.

“Piece of meat, something like that,” Thorin said airily. “We’d teach them little tricks like ‘sit’ or ‘stay’.”

“Roll over, play dead, shit on command,” Dwalin continued.

“Exactly,” Thorin agreed. “We’d also name them.”
“Name them,” Dis repeated.

“Name them what?” Ori asked, half horrified, half delighted.

“Silly things,” Thorin said. “Like there was one with yellow spots so we named her ‘Buttercup’.

“Th’ brown one, ‘Shitass’,” Dwalin helped.

“There there was the white one Azog rode.”

Both Thorin and Dwalin looked feral.

“Aye, we named him, ‘Creampot’.”

" But you killed Azog, how-?” Dis asked frowning.

“Easy.” Dwalin grinned. “We gave Creampot lots a’ treats. He loved us. Every time we snuck over he’d come t’ us, tail waggin’, all happy.”

“Yes, so when Azog towered over us on that huge boulder, threatening to kill our entire party, all we had to do was get Creampot’s attention and tell him to ‘sit’.”

“How in-” Dis was confused.

“Creampot sat and Azog fell right off his back like a lump, toppled off the boulder, ass over tea kettle, and spattered his ugly head all over the ground. The Orcs didn’t know what to do and we destroyed them.”

“Durin’s hammer!” Dis cried.

Ori laughed until he nearly fell out of his chair. The picture was ludicrous!

When he recovered and Dis was wiping her eyes, Dwalin turned thoughtful.

“They’re not a bad animals, those wargs. Ugly as shit but damn useful.”

“I know,” Thorin agreed. “Think what we could do if we had a few breeding pairs. Train them to herd the goats and protect them. Riding them would be a bit of a challenge, they don’t move the same as goats and ponies, but still.”

There was the sound of doors opening and closing. Thorin and Dis looked at each other and sighed.

“An’ here comes th’ bloody floor show,” Dwalin commented dryly.

The dining room door opened and Frerin swept in.

“Thorin, her name is Janifur. You need to tell Udad I want to marry her. You know he’ll want you and Dis to back me on this. I found out today. I stopped her again and asked for her name. I think she’s quite shy and I need you to convince Udad that this is the real thing. I love her.”

Thorin stared.

“Who?”

“Janifur! The miner dam I told you about yesterday!”
Dis looked up.

“Frer, If you’ve only just met her-”

“It’s love! I love her!” Frerin’s voice raised to a shout.

Dwalin rolled his eyes and leaned his elbows on the table.

Thorin looked as though he was developing a headache.

“Little brother,” he began. “I can’t go to Udad to support you in a marriage claim to someone we only have a given name for. I-“

“I knew it! You give Dwalin free rein to marry a nobody and tell me I can’t marry my heartsong. I can’t believe you of all people would betray me this way!” Frerin yelled. He stormed out of the room and the slamming of doors marked his passing through the house and out.

Thorin sighed and looked at Dwalin.

“Ori isn’t a-“

“I know and Ori knows, doncha, lad.”

“I think,” Ori said quietly. “Prince Frerin will have to do more than what he has done if he wishes to court a miner. Many mining families are very selective as to where they marry, nobility or not. They like to know their family members are treated well and are happy. If she has family, they will wish to examine Frerin’s family and him in particular.”

Dis pondered this.

“Then that may teach him a few lessons. We shall have to hope for the best. You two come for breakfast again tomorrow. Fili and Kili will be sorry they missed you, Ori.” She rose and came to Ori’s side. He got up and she embraced him.

“I do apologize you had to witness his outburst.”

“Don’t,” Ori said quickly. “I have the advantage of being very close to my brothers and although they do bicker on occasion we never treat each other so. I hope, as you say, this er…courtship will teach him to appreciate you and Thorin more.”

“Thank you, Ori,” Thorin said gravely.

He rose also as did Dwalin, who clapped Thorin’s shoulder and they laid their brows together, briefly sharing breath as brothers in arms. The act moved Ori greatly. It was strange yet beautiful to see these powerful warrior dwarrows clasp each other in tenderness. He felt his eyes sting and he wanted Nori and Dori there to hold.

Dwalin and Thorin drew apart and Thorin patted Dwalin on the back. Dwalin came to Ori and grinned.

“C’mon , lad. Let’s get yeh home and t’ bed. We’ve both got work in th’ mornin’.”

Chapter End Notes
I'm using the terms:
idad - uncle
udad - grandfather imad - aunt umad - grandmother
namad - sister
Late Night Intruder.

Chapter Summary

And just when you thought things were settling down.....

Ori gets to be Brave!!

Stay tuned for chapter seven this Friday, friends, and keep those cards and letters coming!

Your hint is: Meow set to Music

Ori registered the noise in his sleep at first. It was as though Nori was trying to creep in without waking Dori. He slipped somewhat clumsily out of bed, clad in his long nightshirt, to help his brother in and make a cup of tea to clear the night’s cold and drunk as usual.

The instant Ori’s bare feet touched the heated marble floor his mind set him abruptly back to reality. He listened again. He did hear someone moving stealthily in the outer rooms, quietly rummaging. A sick cold knifed through Ori, then he pulled himself together. Dori wasn’t there with his strength, nor was Nori here with his fighting skills.

Ori took a breath. He was Dwalin’s husband and this was something they should deal with together. Ori threw on his old winter coat and yanked the hood up. Thus prepared against some punches and barefoot so as not to slip, he silently opened his door.

A faint light glowed from the sitting room. Ori slid silently over to Dwalin’s door, which opened under his hand. The fire still burned in the grate but the raven was gone and Dwalin was clearly not in bed. Ori choked and wondered how whoever had broken in had managed to overpower Dwalin without a noisy struggle. Ori’s mind worked. He had heard noises. Maybe it had been a distraction to bring Dwalin out of the house. Balin’s absence was well-known but barely anyone knew Dwalin was now married.

Ori tightened his belt and turned. The walls held quite an array of weaponry. He selected a manageable sword, as Nori’s voice reminded him that a knife would allow an enemy too close to his body. Thus armed, Ori chose some hefty-looking manacles.

Ori padded noiselessly along the corridor to the sitting room. The Interloper leaned over the desk opposite, going through a drawer. The casual blasphemy of the relaxed stance suddenly made Ori’s blood boil. How dare this … this crook try and pillage the House of Fundin. His house!

Ori leapt across the room and thumped the villain across the back with the sword. With a loud “Oof!!” the criminal dropped to his knees. Ori finished the job by whipping out the manacles and fastening them around the burglar’s wrists via the stout front leg of the desk.

“Right you!” Ori shouted and pointed his blade at the crouched figure. “Thought you could rob the House of Fundin, did you? Turn around and face me. I’m not afraid of one burglar. You want a tussle? I’m up for it. I’ll give you a taste of dwarfish iron! Right up your jacksie!”

The villain turned and looked at Ori during this speech. Ori was surprised to say the least. The dwarf was a good deal older that Ori expected, dressed in nothing but a rather threadbare set of grimy combinations and a thick pair of wet, muddy socks. His eyes were bright with a calculating look. The surprising part was the dwarf’s beard, which if clean and combed would might have been a beautiful white, thick and long to nearly his waist.

“Well at least you’ve got some sense of propriety seeing as how well you keep your beard,” Ori commented.

The dwarf raised a bushy eyebrow at him as Ori glanced over to see what valuables were about to be stolen.

There, on the floor, spilling away from Ori's captive was a small waxed paper bag of sweets. Ori glanced at the dwarf again who looked about to speak.

“Don’t,” Ori told him shortly with no anger in his voice this time. He placed the sword out of reach.

“Wait here.”

Ori went though to the kitchen, but kept an eye on his captive. He threw off his coat then pushed the kettle back onto cook top and lit it.

He went though to the larder and quickly put together butter, bread, cold meat, some cheese and a couple of apples. The kettle sang as he brought the food through. He warmed a teapot, added the tea, poured then caught up two mugs and returned to the sitting room laden.

The burglar was busily chewing a sweet and trying without success to break the albeit rusted iron manacles against the desk leg. Ori stifled a chuckle. Seeing as how the desk was carved out of the wall and floor, the thief would have to work at this a long time to get free.

“Let be,” Ori ordered gently as he put down the plate of food, teapot and two cups. He pushed a stool over to the burglar. Once both were seated, one awkwardly on the stool and Ori on a chair near the red granite table, Ori passed the plate of food over to the captive and proceeded to pour them each a cup of tea.

“Thank yeh, lad,” the dwarf started.

“Don’t try and worm your way out of it,” Ori interrupted. “And you’ve nothing to be ashamed of by falling on hard times. Believe me, I know what it is to be poor. Mahal, if you’d just come to the door and asked, I’d have given you a meal.”

“Hard times?” the prisoner repeated.

“Well.” Ori looked over the brim of his mug. “You’re not exactly dressed for the court and you’ve just broken into the House of Fundin, the elder of whom is the head advisor to the king and the elder prince, and the younger is the captain of the royal guard, and also my husband.”

Ori briefly wondered if revealing this information was wise, but the dwarf was chained, so if any of his fellows came back, they would be less inclined to kidnap and ransom someone armed and ready. However, the only reaction was a stunned look that quickly melted into amusement.

“Yeh’re Captain Dwalin’s husband?”

“Yes, I am.”

“Really!” The prisoner’s lips twitched and his eyes twinkled. “Well, where’re me manners? Congratulations, laddie.”
“Thank you,” Ori replied gravely, feeling somewhat thrown by the burglar’s behavior. “Are you some drinking fellow of his and lost almost all but your unmentionables in a dice game? Surely just asking my husband for help would be better than breaking in. Or are you some highly placed flunky of Lord Balin perhaps?”

The reception room door banged open and Ori turned as Dwalin barged in.

“Right, that’s the ponies set.”

Dwalin kicked off his boots, stopped short and stared at the tableau before him. Ori went and tugged shyly on Dwalin’s sleeve.

“Please don’t be too angry. I really don’t think he meant any harm by breaking in.”

“What?” Dwalin managed, staring at the prisoner, who looked both serene and amused.

“That dwarf broke in and was stealing something for clothing or a gambling debt but only managed some candy before I caught him.”

Dwalin looked down, Ori had never seen Dwalin look so confused.

“What?” Dwalin repeated.

Ori pointed at the other dwarf.

“I heard noises, you weren’t in your room and I found him sneaking about, so I caught him.” “Aye! Thumped me properly with that blade then chained me up quick as spit,” the prisoner helped, holding his wrist up, so the manacles could be admired yet still managing to balance his half drunk mug of tea.

Dwalin was frozen in place, gawking. Ori looked up into his husband’s face then down where Dwalin had covered Ori’s ink-stained fingers with a strong hand.

“Dwalin?”

Dwalin’s head came down gently against Ori’s brow and rested there. Now Ori was confused. Dwalin’s eyes were shut tight, his face worked and his shoulders were shaking.

“Dwalin?”

Ori looked up as his husband threw back his head and roared with laughter. Ori sighed and decided that either his husband was laughing at a caught friend or that Dwalin had lost his mind. He looked back at his prisoner.

“I take it you and my husband are acquainted.”

“Aye, yeh could say that.” The other dwarf was all smiles and his eyes crinkled merrily at Ori. Dwalin recovered and put his arm across Ori’s shoulders and cocked his head at the captive.

“Thumped with what blade?”

Ori fetched it over.

“This one, Dwalin.”
Dwalin took the blade. His grin gave Ori fuzzy squiggles up and down his spine then settled, much to Ori’s chagrin, in his crotch.

Dwalin looked over the blade then gave the chain on their captive a tug. He turned back to Ori, his eyes bright with humor.

“Where yeh get these?”

“Your room,” Ori answered truthfully. “They were on the wall.”

Dwalin laughed again. “All the arms on the wall’re just f’r decoration. That blade couldn’t cut butter.”

“So yer goin’ to open this lock?” the captive inquired and drained his tea with a satisfied sip.

Dwalin smirked.

“Nah, I ain’t got keys f’r those. That’s why they’re hangin’ up.”

The captive sighed and rubbed the bridge of his nose.

“Brother, please tell me yer just jokin’.”

Ori felt his stomach turn over with cold horror.

“Brother?” he whispered hoarsely. He bowed as low as he could. “I am so sorry, Lord Balin… I…”

“Now, none o’ that, laddie,” Balin interrupted him right away and reached over to pat Ori’s shoulder with both manacled hands.

Ori wanted to sink though the floor.

Dwalin stretched.

“Right, you two sit tight. I’ll pop ‘round t’ Gloin’s an’ borrow his heavy shears.”

Ori grabbed Dwalin’s arm. “Wait! If you have two or three old key pin shards, I can help.”

Dwalin looked incredulous but fished said items out of a pocket.

“Donno what yeh kin do wi’ just spikes, lad.”

Ori dropped to his knees next to Balin and worked busily at the locks.

“Dori always locks up tight at night and Nori was suppose to have a key. I was too young to have one. Nori lost his key ages ago, so he taught me how to pick the front locks when I had to sneak out and help him home some times.”

There was a crunching click and the locks opened.

Ori helped Balin to his feet.

“I really am very-”

“Hush, laddie. Yeh did very well.”

Ori stared at Balin. “But-”
“Come now. Yeh’d no idea who I was an’ ye acted perfectly properly. Isn’t that right?” Balin looked at Dwalin, eyebrows raised. Dwalin grinned, tossing the blade from hand to hand.

“’Aye, not bad at the lock picking either. I’ve had a locksmith mess with those f’r half a day. He claimed they’d never open if shut again,”

Ori felt a blush crawl up his neck, but he couldn’t keep a smiling from showing. He turned back to Balin.

“But are you alright? How did you get so… so…?” Ori trailed off, unsure how to ask Lord
Balin why he was sneaking about the place in muddy skivvies.

“Just so you know, lad,” Dwalin chucked the blade and manacles on the low red granite table with a clatter that made Balin frown. “there’s a bell in me room; th’ guard can call me an’ I meet up with a runner. There was a bad storm earlier. Roads all to mud an’ ruts. Went up there t’ help ’em get the carts and ponies out.”

“Oh dear,” Ori sympathized. “Perhaps some hot food, milord? You must be chilled through.”

Balin smiled sweetly.

“Now laddie, ye’ve already got me a meal an’ a good hot cuppa. I’m feelin’ much better.”
Balin poured a second cup for himself and picked up his plate of food. “Well now, I’ll tell ye both good night as I’m off f’r a wash an’ a long soak in th’ tub.”

With that Lord Balin strolled off down the hall, food laden and muddy, but with the air of a parade marshal.

“Little brother, if ye’d be so kind as to’ fetch me my dressing gown that’d be lovely.”

“Get it yerself.” Dwalin responded without heat.

Balin turned and fixed Dwalin with the pin of his eye.

“Me dear brother, if ye’d be so kind.”

Dwalin grunted and Balin sailed off down the hall.

“’Aye alright?” Dwalin asked Ori.

“Yes, I hope Lord Balin isn’t too angry.”

“Nah, lad. He ain’t angry ’tall. That’s just his way a’ sayin’ he wants t’ cross examine me about things, mostly likely yeh.”

“Will he be upset with you after he finds out everything?” Ori asked worriedly.

Dwalin looked surprised then chuckled.

“Likely no’. Balin and I’re very close.” Dwalin was thoughtful a moment. “We’ve never struck each other. Well, never in anger. Was Dori angry with yeh?”

“No, and he spoke well of you.” Ori smiled, feeling better. “Shall I make more tea for you?
Would you like something to eat?”

“Nah, love. Get back t’ yer rest.”
With that, Dwalin escorted him to his room and they hugged briefly. It was only when Ori was snuggled back under the covers that he recalled the Dwalin had not called him ‘lad’ that last time but ‘love’.
Morning has broken several more rules of Dwarrow deportment.

Chapter Summary

It's Friday and time for a new chapter!! It's a shorter one but I have tried my very best to pack it with excitement.

Ori furthers his acquaintance with Lord Balin and learns a great deal more about hair, beard, beads and braiding than he ever wanted, and we discover the mystery about Dwalin's underpants.

Applause for my editor/co-author Dollypegs for her amazing ability to type and edit in a moving vehicle.

Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!!

This chapter's hint is: In Georgette Heyer’s The Talisman Ring - What did Ludovic do for a bet at Mrs. Ashley’s?

Ori woke as his bedroom door eased open and someone came in.

First he froze, then he took a breath and forced himself to remain still and calm. Dwalin was kind and unlikely to hurt him out of cruelty. Perhaps he was just coming in to wake Ori or refill the carafe of water at the bedside. Ori peeked out from under the covers with one eye as someone put a tray on the bedside table. On the tray sat a cup and saucer with a tiny silver cream jug and matching bowl of honey; a teapot smothered in an intricately sewn cozy took up most of the tray. Ori’s shoulder was gently patted.

“Wake up, laddie,” Balin greeted him cheerily. “It’s time f’r tea.”

Ori struggled out of the blankets and stared at his brother-in-law. Balin looked very fetching with his hair and beard clean, bright white and immaculately curled. He wore a quilted red velvet dressing gown with gold tassels around the cuffs, collar and hood.

“G-good morning,” Ori managed.

Balin smiled warmly.

“Didn’t hear how yeh liked your tea, so I brought both cream an’ honey.”

Ori looked down to admire the charming round tray.

“Th-thank you, Lo- Balin.”

“Why so surprised, laddie? Surely-” Bain paused then shook his head. “Nah, he’d not bother while I was away. Really, he ought t’ have now that yer married an’ all.”

Balin went to the door then turned back.

“When our adad was away, mam would always make tea an’ we’d each have a tray. It gives us another hour or so in bed t’ doze or read. Since she passed t’ th’ Great Halls, Dwalin and I always do this when we’re both home.”

Ori smiled at the tale, suddenly reminded of an earlier question.

“Thank you so much for including me. That’s such a dear story, I would fully understand if either of you preferred to keep it just between you.”

“Nonsense, laddie.” Balin beamed at him from the doorway.

Ori noticed he had another tray in one hand and was lifting a second off the bureau near the door.

“If you and Dwalin are going to er … read for a bit, might I trouble you to tell me where I might perhaps have a bath?” Ori asked quickly as he hopped out of bed.

“Of course, laddie. Hold this and I’ll just take Dwalin’s tray to him. On second thought—”

Balin handed Ori very old tray with a faded pattern of barely recognizable small blue flowers. The lower corner had a chunk out of it. Ori looked at the chunk wondering and Balin chuckled.

“Back in th’ day when we were lads, he’d throw it up at th’ ceiling t’ see if he could get it stuck in th’ wall rails. That chip’s all that’s left now t’ remind the pair of us when he fired it off too blasted hard an’ shattered th’ overhead glass light; fifteen candles - Or was it sixteen? - an’ all blown elfin glass. Mam hated the thing and just laughed. When adad found out, he beat Dwalin bloody, but Dwalin never cried an’ adad gave up in a rage. This tray’s somethin’ of a trophy now.”

“Mahal,” Ori intoned piously then blurted out, “All I could wonder was what had tried to eat it.”

Balin convulsed again. “If that was the case, yeh can assure yerself it was Dwalin.”

As though in a dream, Ori followed Balin through into Dwalin’s room. The raven woke and flapped its wings a little then settled once more. Ori watched as Balin strode over to the dark and cold fireplace and turned the lever. The flames leapt up and Ori got a good look at his sleeping husband.

Dwalin sprawled face down on the enormous bed. Black tattoos marched from under Dwalin’s hair down his spine to disappear into his drawers. Ropes of muscle stood out even at rest. The blankets tangled around his feet. One pillow lay on the floor, another propped against the headboard and the third under Dwalin’s left armpit. All was still and silent but for the whispers of the flames and Dwalin’s sonorous snoring.

Ori placed the tray on the bedside table, noting the handless stoneware cup, glazed grass green with bright yellow spots scattered over, and the battered enameled tin teapot of butter yellow with green cornets on the bottom and lid.

Balin made a shooing motion and Ori followed his method and laid a hand on Dwalin’s well-muscled shoulder. Dwalin shifted a little, growled deeply then, to Ori’s surprise, smiled, eyes still closed, and muttered.

“Fuck off, Balin.”

His tone was so warm and kind, Ori choked and giggled. Dwalin sat straight up and stared at him wide-eyed. Ori decided he quite liked his early morning husband, hair and beard askew, eyes wide, and sitting in the middle of a semi-destroyed nest.
“Good morning,” Ori said pertly.

Dwalin dragged a hand over his own face and stared at Ori.

“Fuck.”

Balin snickered.

Dwalin’s gaze whipped to his brother.

“What the fuck, Balin?”

“Good mornin’, brother.” Balin bowed with a flourish.

Dwalin squinted at him.

“What the fuck yeh got on yer feet?”

Balin lifted his dressing gown hem and Ori goggled at a pair of very elaborate slippers, red velvet, open above the ankle like a two-spouted ewer with gold tassels on each end. The slipper completely covered the foot and extended upward at the toe into an elegant curl with its own gold tassel. Balin turned his foot about and pointed his toe.

“We came back through Mirkwood, an’ th’ Sylvan elves came out t’ trade. Aren’t these fine?”

Ori nodded, wordless.

Dwalin snorted and rolled over to pour out a cup.

“You look like a tree-fuckin’ elf. Yeh gonna do a spring dance or sumthin’ f’r us?”

Ori clapped a hand over his mouth. Dwalin took a noisy sip and winked broadly at Ori. Ori blushed then winked back. Balin looked at both of them, caught up the hems of both the dressing gown and nightshirt and pranced across the floor to the bed, kicking up one leg then the next. Ori burst out laughing and scrambled out of the way. Balin twirled gracefully up to the bedside, turned, bent and fully mooned his younger brother. Poor Ori was choking by this point.

“Mahal!” Dwalin barked, slamming the mug down. “Put that away. I ain’t even had me first cup!”

Balin chuckled and wagged his rear but hopped nimbly out of range when Dwalin tried to smack the tempting target. Dwalin missed and tumbled to the floor, cursing. Ori, still giggling, helped him up. Balin executed a step dance out of the room, calling after.

“Ori, come with me an’ I’ll show yeh th’ bath. Come along, me poor grubby lad.”

Dwalin smirked, blushed, then rubbed the back of his neck.

“Better run an’ have yer bath, lad.” He smirk grew to a rueful smile. “Sorry, didn’t think of givin’ yeh a proper show around before. Feel free t’ hog as much hot water as yeh fancy, there’s always plenty.”

Ori return the smile, thanked him shyly then headed to the door. At the exit he turned and looked at his husband. Ori saw the humor in those bright hazel eyes as Dwalin caught him staring. Dwalin grinned naughtily and sucked in his stomach, raised his arms in a stretch then flamboyantly flexed his arms and chest muscles, swirled with tattooed runes and piercings. He popped one pec then the next, each accented by a flash of silver from the nipples, followed by a ripple of the abs beneath. Ori felt his face burn and his stomach flutter. He shifted, slid through the doorway then quickly turned, ready to run.

“What nice drawers you wear, husband. The color suits you. Dipfa would be so proud.”

Ori fled to the sound of Dwalin laughing and calling after that he was a “rascal.”

Balin, halfway down the hall, held his sides, silently shaking with laughter. When his eyes met Ori’s, they both snickered.

“Balin?” Ori managed.

“Aye, laddie?”

“The color suits him down to the ground but I never expected Dwalin of all people to wear pink drawers.”

“Well, our Dwalin gets impatient with servants an’ was making th’ point t’ me that we didn’t need ‘em. He did th’ wash. Once.”

Ori winced and closed his eyes,

“Aye, lad,” Balin affirmed. “Boiled it all together. Ruined most everything we had in th’ clothes baskets. Needless t’ say, he’s a stubborn so-and-so. Mind, he won’t be caught dead outside the house in ‘em. Here’s the bath f’r yeh.”

Ori leaned against the side of the tub, blissfully submerged to his chin in the hottest water he could bear. It was wonderful to be so clean and in a bath this size. Sitting with his legs out stretched he could not touch the far end and the sides came up to his ears. He desperately wanted Nori and Dori there, so they could share. No! Better, than that, they could each take a turn! He sat up a little, straightened, reached out to the small table beside and brought his tea back to finish his second cup with a contented sigh.

Lord Balin seemed perfectly happy to brush aside the insult of Ori attacking him. Dwalin had become more flirtatious and playful this morning. Ori put the playfulness down to the brothers being reunited once again. They seemed as close to each other as Ori was to Nori and Dori.

Today was the day Ori and Dwalin met Dori and Nori for dinner. Ori wondered what he could say to convince both his brothers that he did want to stay and give his marriage a chance. Everything he had written to Dori still held true despite Dori offering to ‘rescue’ him. The sound of movement in the hallway reminded Ori they were, as before, bidden to Lady Dis’ for breakfast.

Ori regretfully climbed out, pulled the stopper out of the drain, tidied the room and dressed. He padded down to his bedroom, rubbing the towel in his hair. Dwalin came out of his own room and grinned at Ori, the former still rumpled and only in his drawers but a great deal more alert. He stopped and ran a hand over Ori’s hair.

“Don’t dry it too much. I’ll redo yer braids f’r yeh. I won’t be long.”

“Where should I wait for you?” Ori asked politely.

Dwalin gave him a confused look.
“Where’ver yeh fancy. I’ll find ye. Mind, Balin’ll probably want company while I get meself sorted.”

Dwalin disappeared into the bathroom. Ori caught himself watching the pink linen clad behind. The solder had excellent posture and his movements were smooth. Watching the muscle flex and flow across his back and butt was like watching runes being written.

Blushing, Ori pulled his attention back to his hair. He drew his fingers down his marriage braid to the end to remove his marriage bead—that was not there.

Sick horror plunged him into shock. Ori took some deep breaths and closed his eyes. He meticulously cast his mind back then remembered: the wall spigot. He had washed his hair under the wall spigot before he climbed into the tub.

Ori burst through the bathroom door and flung himself on the floor, hands out-stretched, searching across the tiles around the drain as hot water coursed down.

“Bloody fucking Mahal!”

“My marriage bead,” Ori cried out, searching the floor nearby.

Perhaps it was in the tub.

He knelt up then was pulled to his feet and turned. His eyes followed the pointing finger to the two mithril beads tucked safely in the soap dish. Ori gulped with relief and nearly wept.

“Oh, thank Mahal! Thank you, Dwalin.” Still gasping, Ori hopped up on tiptoe to kiss Dwalin’s cheek. “Thank you so much I thought I’d lost it!”

Dwalin shook his head with a lop-sided smile.

“Easy love, it’s found, no need t’ fuss. Now go through and muck with Balin’s brain. I’ll bring ’em both when I’m done here.”

With relief still surging through him, Ori went to his bedroom, caught up his hairbrush and trotted through to the living area. Balin sat at the big desk he had been chained to not many hours ago, writing in a large, scrolling hand.

“Ah, there yeh are, wee brother,” Balin addressed him with a twinkle in his eye. “Feelin’ better are we now?”

“Much better, Ba- brother, thank you.”

Balin looked him over then straightened the papers, set the pen back in the tray and clicked shut the lid of the gem studded ink bottle. Ori noticed there were now several matching bottles along the polished marble shelf above the desk. Each bottle contained a different hue of ink. Ori resisted reaching for them as Balin rose. Balin escorted Ori to the sofa.

“I take it Dwalin’s going t’ put yer hair an’ beard in order when he comes through.”

“Yes.” Realizing Balin was running a critical eye over him, Ori added quickly. “He’s got our marriage beads with him.”

Balin nodded, looking at the brush in Ori’s hand.

“May I?”
“It was my eldest brother’s.”

Ori handed it over a little reluctantly.

Balin glanced at him then returned to the desk, twitched open a small side drawer and removed a box shaped object. Balin flicked it open to reveal a magnifier. He turned one end and it expanded into a double magnifier. With this Balin examined the brush carefully.

“Well, well, well. Very interestin’.”

“It was my brother’s!” Ori insisted. “He told me Nori didn’t steal it!”

Balin gave him a flabbergasted look, then cleared his throat and explained.

“This’s quite th’ treasure, laddie. It’s an oil brush. Did yeh know this?”

Ori shook his head.

“There was an art t’ makin’ these. Now look here.”

Balin came back to the couch and passed the magnifier to Ori and directed it for him.

“See here how th’ bristles’re hollow an’ th’ inside of th’ brush is soft? See over here, there’s a wee pommel? It should open an’ yeh’d siphon th’ oil into th’ brush.”

Ori stared then gasped.

“How cunning! You brush and oil your hair and beard perfectly! That’s why it always smelled so good. I just associated the scent with my brother.”

Balin put the magnifier away and regarded the brush.

“A very rare treasure. Hmm, we’ll need t’ take it t’ Lady Gridr, Master Gloin’s wife, cousins of ours. She’s an expert with trinkets an’ novelties such as this. She can clean an’ refill it with oil f’r yeh.

“Isn’t that right, brother?”

Balin turned, as Dwalin plowed into the room and over to the entryway to dumped his weaponry on the floor near the door, grunted in reply to Balin and unceremoniously tucked his linen shirt into his breeches. Balin tut-tutted at him.

“Brother, yer not half dressed.”

Dwalin turned, grinned at Ori then stepped over Ori’s knees to sit on the low red granite table in front of Ori.

“If yer in that much of a tearin’ hurry, do my hair while I do Ori’s.”

Ori leaned forward, expecting Dwalin to re-do just his marriage braid, but Dwalin had decided that he was going to brush and comb through Ori’s hair and beard.

Balin made quick work of Dwalin’s hair then came around to Ori’s side and started to instruct Dwalin on the intricacies of the differences between a scrivener’s braid and a scrivener who was training as a scholar at the library.
“It’ll do them all a deal of good t’ see th’ proper braids in yer hair, laddie.”

Dwalin grunted, busy with Ori’s hair. “I remember. I used t’ do yers.”

“Aye, but I got me scrivening as a scholar working in th’ diplomatic corp. Our Ori’s a fully-fledged journeyman scrivener working as a scholar toward academics. Th’ braid starts higher an’ begins with each end twisted t’ th’ right.”

Ori remained still as the brothers worked on his hair. Part of him was overwhelmed to think that the captain of the guard and the advisor to the king were doing this for him, nothing more than a poor parentless dwarf from the Dale. Yet part was thrown back to his childhood when both Dori and Nori would do his hair. The true difference in this was that unlike Dori’s fast-moving hands tugging through and Nori making the family braids far too tight, Dwalin’s hands were so gentle in Ori’s hair and neither brother pulled too tight or worked it too loose. Their interaction made Ori want to fall over giggling.

“Aye, lad,” Balin instructed. “No. Turn that one under then twist th’ middle to yer left … to yer left …No, yer other left.”

“Fuck yeh, Balin.”

“That’s me left.”

“I’m goin’ t’ bloody kill yeh.”

“Now yeh have it, lad. Well done.”

<grunt>

“Let’s tie t’em off with th’ teaching library color. There now … Dwalin, that’s th’ wrong color.”

“Th’ library color’s meridian blue. That bead yeh’ve got’s cobalt with gold inlay.”

“Fuck yeh, Balin! It’s blue. Th’ library color is blue; shades of blue f’r scholars.”

“Wonderful. Aye, let’s have our Ori go in front of Brur, th’ head of th’ Great Library of Erebor labeled with braids that say he’s a scholar working as a sausage-maker currently employed as a court dancer. Excellent!”

“What th’ fuck’re yeh talkin’ ’bout?”

“Cobalt in th’ hair on tha’ side’s mixed meat. Gold inlay’s a court dancer. Pray, why d’ we even have such beads in our house?”

“How th’ fuck do I know. I’m not th’ one spendin’ all ’is time muckin’ about in foreign parts.”

“I travel f’r- Don’t tie his journeyman braids that loose, Dwalin! People’ll think he’s a stable hand!”

“Fuck yeh t’ Khazad-dûm and back!”

“Now yer just bein’ shrill.”

“No, I’m bein’ pissed. If I were bein’ shrill it’d sound like this!” On the last words Dwalin lifted the timbre of his voice until he sounded rather like an irate peacock if one could speak.

“Fuck yerself, Balin!” said the peacock.

Ori snorted louder than he meant to and shoved his hand into his mouth to shut himself up which resulted in a sound rather like a barn animal. Ori looked up. Both brothers’ faces were almost in his, opposing eyebrows raised. The family likeness burst in on Ori and he almost slid off the couch laughing. He was immediately resettled by one hand from each brother in each of his armpits, hoisting him back up.

“Well, brother, I’ll leave th’ pair a’ yeh t’ put in yer marriage beads. Ah, here they are.” Balin picked up the mithril beads, looked them over frowning. He puffed on them then held the two beads together and polished them with his sleeve.

Dwalin carefully braided Ori’s marriage bead back in. Ori peered around to look. Dwalin had a soft smile on his face. He caught Ori’s glance and winked.

“Don’t worry. No one’s going t’ mistake this braid f’r a mastery in button-making.”

Ori snickered. “And I’ll do my best not to braid yours up to be mistaken for a paid companion.”

“Yeh kin try, laddie,” Dwalin chuckled, “but I’m sure as axes wouldn’t be able t’ pick up extra f’r the house-keepin’.”

“Why not?” Ori asked encouragingly. “You have a wonderful beard.”

“Thanks, love. But the ol’ fizz above it? Not likely!”

“You could always show ’em your pink skivvies.”

Ori felt slightly aghast at his own boldness but Dwalin was highly amused

“Nah, that’d scare off even a seasoned guard like meself. Sorry, love, yeh’ll have to’ come up with somethin’ else.”

Dwalin finished Ori’s braid and turned, so Ori could put in his. Ori bit his lower lip, and then seeing as how his husband seemed in a mood to joke, asked anyway.

“Is that why you still insist on wearing pink drawers?” Ori finished Dwalin’s braid quickly. “To frighten your subordinates?”

There was a loud snort and both Dwalin and Ori turned to see Balin bent double. Ori looked back at Dwalin, who smirked at his confusion then licked the tops of his two fingers and tapped them against Ori’s nose.

“Smart arse,” he said warmly.

“Are we ready then?” Balin inquired, seemingly fully recovered.

“Aye, right behind yeh.” Dwalin rose and offered his hand. Ori took it and was surprised by the sudden spark as their hands slid into one another. He’d never felt that before when Dwalin took his hand. Ori got up, he felt like a flame rising from the strongest spark that could ignite any tinder. He looked up at Dwalin. The older dwarf’s eyes were hazel with a fiery burn.

“Come along th’ pair of yeh,” Balin ordered.
Ori stepped out into the courtyard, hand in hand with his husband.
Hello again, friends,

It's Tuesday and the last Tuesday of regular postings. I had to use up some vacation time and was helping some friends, which gave me Tuesday evenings free for storytelling. That's finished as of today. I'll only be posting on Fridays now. This also works well for me and for Dollypegs as we have almost reached the point where I'm still furiously scribbling events to happen to Ori!

This is another shortish chapter and it is rather action-packed. And I get to use the word 'majestic'!

BIG WARNING: This chapter contains a nasty fist fight. If you don't want to read the fight part, no problem, the details of it are not vital to the story but that it takes place is. To avoid the fight, skip from "That chair's aslant." and start again at "Laddie! Wee brother! Yeh a'right?".

Your hint this chapter is: What is Erebor made of?

We'll meet again this coming Friday

Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!!

“I think it says a great deal that you weren’t attacked on this trip,” Dis put in, helping Balin to more bacon.

“Oh, but I was, milady! Quite suddenly, too! I was completely overpowered an’ taken prisoner.”

There were several gasps and the crashing of dropped cutlery and food.

“What?!?” roared Thorin.

Dis stifled a slight scream, while Frerin, Fili, and Kili’s eyes were wider than saucers. Ori wanted to slide under the table but rallied when Dwalin’s hand caught his. Dwalin leaned close and murmured in Ori’s ear.

“Balin loves spinnin’ a good tale. Jus’ look surprised an’ try not t’ laugh.”

Ori concentrated on his eggs while Balin spun the long, breathlessly exciting tale of his capture by Ori, conveniently not mentioning Ori’s name.

Ori snuck looks at the rest of the dwarrow at the table; all but Dwalin were hanging on Balin’s every word.

“Then,” Balin said after a dramatic pause, “Dwalin stepped into th’ room saw me predicament; saw me capturer, his sword an’ th’ manacles biting into me wrist an’ he said…” Balin turned to Dwalin glanced around at Balin’s audience now waiting for his part in the drama. Dwalin took a swig of tea, wiped his mouth with the back of his hand.

“I said I ain’t got keys f’r those.”

Ori almost choked, while everyone else’s agog expressions melted into confusion.

“No,” Balin complained.

“Aye, that’s what I said when I saw th’ manacles.”

Balin sighed gustily and shook his head.

“Yer never one f’r a good tale, Dwalin.”

“Dwalin, really!” Lady Dis scolded. “How can you be so lax about this? Thorin, don’t you-? Brother, whatever is so funny?”

Thorin grinned at Dwalin then leaned across the table to Ori.

“Let me guess; you woke up alone and heard someone lurching around your home that you knew was not Dwalin.”

Ori shrugged and saw humor in those deep blue eyes.

“I didn’t know who he was.”

“No!” cried Dis, her eyes wide. “Ori! You captured Balin?! Durin’s beard!” She burst out laughing.

“That’s brilliant, Ori-mate!” Fili reached over to clap Ori on the shoulder.

“But,” Kili started. “Didn’t you notice the sword was blunt?”

Ori blushed. “I don’t know much about swords.”

Balin beamed at him.

“Well, yeh’ve got a good arm if yeh ever want t’ take it up, laddie.”

Ori shook his head. “Thank you, but I believe I’ll leave the weaponry to Dwalin. Seeing as how my first attempt led to your … um… imprisonment.”

Balin chuckled. “Aye, an’ there I was caught with me hands in a poke of candy; clad in nuthin’ but me skivvies an’ muddy socks.”

This along with Balin’s shaking head and doleful tone set the entire company laughing again.

* * *

Dis signaled Dazla who brought out a small bowls of honey and cream covered tiny spring strawberries while Balin finished his tea and asked for the latest court news. To Ori’s surprise, there was a crash of fists and elbows on the table as Frerin leaned heavily forward.

“The news, oh great diplomat? Well, I shall tell you that the most interesting of which is that my elder siblings have, for no solid reasoning, rejected to support my suit to Udad,” Frerin barked angrily.

Thorin sighed and squeezed the bridge of his nose.

“Oh!” Fili spoke up. “The mine lass, Janifur, the one you met while on parade?”

“Yes. Suddenly she’s not good enough!”

“I didn’t say that!” Thorin roared.

“You might as well have,” Frerin yelled back.

“I said, I would not and, frankly, could not support your suit without being able to speak of her family.”

“And neither will I,” Dis agreed. “We must at least meet her!”

“There’s nothing wrong with her family!” Frerin argued.

“Now, laddie,” Balin soothed. “I’m sure we can sort this out. Who’s she the daughter of?”

Frerin sulked.

Thorin replied, “He doesn’t know her family name.”

Balin appeared to consider then looked back at Frerin.

“Now lad, that’s going to be the first thing the King’ll ask.”

“Why does it matter? She’s wonderful. She’d clever and beautiful and strong! She’d be a wonderful yâsith in this family. You’d all like her!”

“I’m sure we would and will, little brother,” Thorin continued, “But until we know her family we can’t…”

“Stop worming your way out of this!” Frerin shouted. “You’re just like Adad and Udad! You just want to marry me off like a tool, not a living being, to the most useful ally you want to because you’re both afraid Udad will leave me the throne.”

Ori glanced at Thorin and Dis, both looked as though they were developing headaches. Balin was obviously keeping a patient face on. Dwalin looked bored. Ori caught his eye and lifted an inquiring eyebrow. Dwalin shrugged and rolled his eyes. Ori calmed, this was obviously an old argument taking a different form. Ori pondered as the shouting match continued.

Frerin would be the worst king that could ever happen. Thror has become so insular and hard times have been descending on all over us and the people of Dale for quite some time. He will only make this worse. Janifur. Ori could think of at least three families who used the suffix ‘fur’ for their children, all with more than one child. They were all good families.

“Frerin,” Ori put in when all participants had stopped to draw breath. “I’ve been thinking-“
“I’m sure you have,” Frerin bit out. “Thinking how lucky you are to have snagged Dwalin hard enough that he’d elope with you.”

Ori gasped as Dwalin snarled and was on his feet. Balin held out a hand.

“Hold on, brother. Here, Frerin, lad, what do yeh mean by that?”

“Yes, Frerin,” Dis said over Thorin’s growl. “Tell us.”

Frerin glared at Ori, leaving the young dwarf puzzled as to what he might have done to earn Frerin’s anger.

“Well, Ori freely states he’s adadless by going as ‘of the Brothers Ri’ and he’s from the Dale rather than the mountain. Who of any good standing lives in the Dale rather than the mountain?”

“Good standing and wealth are not the same things, little brother,” Thorin said quietly.

“Fine!” Frerin went on. “Ori, have you brothers and sisters?”

“Only brothers,” Ori replied, keeping his tone good-natured. “I have two elder brothers, no sisters.”

“And you live where?”

“The end of Steam Alley.”

“Steam Alley - well, there are certainly some excellent families there! Running rag and bone shops, pawn brokers and several extremely dirty pubs.”

“Frerin, prince or no’!”

“Let me finish, Dwalin! And your brothers, what do they do for work?”

“Dori is a metal smith. He is first assistant and journeyman to Master JinGhr at the Forge in Dale.”

“And the other brother?”

“Nori’s…” Ori started.

“Nori does stupid things and gets in trouble.” Dwalin bit out. “Only he doesn’t had wealthy relatives t’ bail him out all the time.”

“I’ve paid Nori’s bail the last few times; ever since I got my journeyman’s,” Ori reminded him.

“Oh, you pay bail for a gaming philanderer, Ori of the Brothers Ri?” Frerin was back on him.

“Nori’s not a gaming philanderer,” Ori corrected quickly. “He’s a trouble-maker and sometimes thief who gets caught every now and then. It was so we could eat in the beginning, but now it’s his habit.”

“Brilliant. A thief in the family,” Frerin shouted.

“Makes an honest change from our own gaming philanderer,” Dis sniffed.

Thorin coughed then pushed Fili’s chair with his foot.
“Off to lessons, you two, now.” He reached into his pocket and Ori heard the clink of coins. Thorin placed some in Fili’s hand. “Hurry up. The butchers are at the market center today. Buy your lunch there.”

“Thank you, Idad.” Fili said brightly. Kili opened his hand for his share but Fili put it all in his pocket. “Don’t worry, Mam, I’ll make sure he eats properly.”

Kili pouted.

“Tidy your back, lad,” Thorin ordered and grabbed Kili by the belt. Ori saw him push a few coins into Kili’s pocket.

Kili turned with a huge grin on his face and glomped onto his idad.

“Thank you, Idad Thorin. I don’t like being seen with a messy back.”

Thorin grunted and pushed the young dwarf off him.

“Off with the pair of you. Now!”

Both dwarrow grinned as they barreled over to kiss their amad and shout farewells to everyone else at the table before pushing, arguing, and shoving each other out the door.

Balin smiled around. “Now we-”

“We were happy with having a thief in the family,” Frerin barked.

“Give it a rest, Frerin,” Thorin groaned.

“No. Ori, what do you do so well that you can afford a thief’s bail every now and then?”

Dwalin snarled and Ori put a hand on his husband’s beneath the table before he thought. Ori cocked his head at Frerin then said slowly and clearly.

“I am a scribe. You knew that from when we first met.” Ori finished his fruit, watching Frerin. The youngest prince showed no sign of letting the subject go even in the plain sight of his elder siblings’ boredom.

“Yes, an amazing scribe! Who’s shop do you work out of? Not any in the mountain.”

“I free-lanced from home after I finished my journeyman’s at Khujik’s shop. You know them as they publish all the pamphlets from the court land use cases.” Ori waited to see where Frerin wanted to lead this conversation.

Dwalin was almost half way around the table to Frerin before Thorin and Balin grabbed him. Ori felt the cold stone of shame settle in his stomach, although this was not the first time he’d heard the jokes about working out of his home.

“Of course not,” he replied frostily and quietly. “I charge by the hour it takes me to do the entire work and whether or not a translation is involved. I take it from your statement that the scribes you are used to dealing with only use those letters and have not a care for the character they draw from. Mind, even such can say they know what it is to earn their bread, unlike you.”
Frerin snarled in reply and Thorin and Dwalin both turned to look at Ori.

“Good one, laddie,” Balin commented as Thorin and Dwalin started to chuckle and returned to their seats.

“Well, expert wage-earner,” Frerin groused. “How did you trap Dwalin into marriage? I’d heard he was sweet on you but why not just keep you in elfin sheets with your own kind at Steam Alley? What did you do to force him to bring you up in the world?”

Ori froze. He had never thought of their situation in such a way before. His blood turned to ice as he slowly realized that this was exactly what he had done, though not by original design. To the noble class, it would look as thought he had trapped Dwalin. Dwalin was a dwarf of honor and good lineage. Faced with Frerin’s words Ori knew he had trapped Dwalin in the cruelest manner possible.

Ori rose, fists clenched, glaring at Frerin as tears rolled hot down his cheeks.

“Yes, Frerin, I trapped Dwalin. I had offered myself in payment to Master Calmar when Calmar decided to execute Nori for his tricks and thefts. Instead of leaving me to my fate at Master Calmar’s, Dwalin rescued me and instead of accepting my service or my life, Dwalin married me instead. Nori and Dori are all I have and I would happily have given my life for them. Instead Dwalin gave me a new life, he freed Nori, burnt his file, married me, got me a job at the library where I can make a good living, and neither Dori nor Nori will have to go hungry. Yes, I trapped him and – ”

Ori’s words caught in his throat and became sobs. The next moment he was held tight, sagging into Dwalin’s broad chest, crying hysterically. Ori clenched Dwalin’s shirt in his fists.

“I’m sorry, Dwalin! I’m so sorry! I jus-”

“Hush, love. Ain’t nuthin’ t’ be sorry f’r.”

Ori choked, he knew that some how he had to make this right. He had acted dishonorably. He registered Dwalin’s arm about him with one hand deep in his hair.

“But Dis,” Frerin’s voice had taken a to a whiney turn. “Janifur?”

“Yes, yes, she and her chosen family members. Bring them to dinner; anytime convenient.”

Frerin crowed and called back over his retreating footsteps, “I knew you’d support me, namad!”

Dwalin muttered several curse words Ori didn’t know as Thorin growled in Khuzdul. Dwalin lifted Ori out of his embrace. Ori swipe at his eyes. Enough, he told himself. He had to face what he had done and at least do that as a proper dwarf.

Ori was thrown for a moment as now he and Dwalin were seated in a couch before a good fire. Ori remembered it as the room he and Dis had spent the afternoon in just the other day. Dis was at the fire and Balin and Thorin were placing chairs opposite Dwalin and Ori. Thorin pulled his up close in front of Ori.

“My prince,” Ori began, determined to get through this, “you must free Master Dwalin. I only-”

As the other two came and seated themselves the prince leaned forward, fixing Ori with his majestic gaze.

“Ori of the Brothers Ri, son of Rikmha, did you or did you not just claim that you tricked Dwalin to marry you?”

Ori sat up. “Yes, my prince.”

“And do you feel that this is a harmful marriage to Dwalin?”

Ori nodded, eyes stinging.

“Answer me,” Thorin ordered.

“Yes, my prince.”

“Do you see this marriage as solely for your own benefit with nothing to benefit Dwalin?”

“Yes, my prince.”

“Then let this tribunal decide. You will explain your side and Dwalin shall explain his. Now repeat, in detail for all present, how you came to be married to Dwalin.”

Ori straightened his spine and carefully repeated the circumstances from how he had first heard of Nori’s predicament to falling asleep in the Fundin House.

“Very well,” Thorin said evenly. “You will now explain why this is harmful to Dwalin.”

Ori swallowed; it just was.

He paused and said slowly, “Dwalin is the captain of the guard, thus with me as being poor and from the Dale and …”

Ori trailed off as Thorin raised one eyebrow while Dis looked as though she was trying not to laugh. Ori realized this argument would lead nowhere, so he tried again.

“Um… I’m a scribe… I have nothing to …to improve his, um… well, his life. And- and he doesn’t know me and Nori’s a thief and hit him. And we live in Steam Alley. I don’t know anything about his career as a soldier. And…”

Ori wavered then the right words arrived.

“My past life and associations could only hurt Dwalin’s standing in court and among his peers and men-at-arms,” Ori finished quickly and paused. He looked at Thorin, who regarded him calmly.

“How is this solely for your benefit,” Thorin asked, “and not Dwalin’s?”

Ori felt back in his element.

“That’s obvious, my prince. I have already listed the ways it could damage Dwalin and all of you can readily see I have received all manner of benefits.” Ori gestured, taking in the room, the company, and his own clothing.

“Hmph,” Thorin replied. “Dwalin, did the marriage come about as Ori said?”

“Aye,” Dwalin agreed.
“Are you harboring a deep hurt from this marriage?”

“Nah, me lip’s pretty much all cleared up.”

Silence.

“Dwalin?”

“Wha’?”

“Attempt to stay with me in this discussion. Are you hurt in anyway… barring the physical?”

“Nah.”

Thorin sighed in unison with Balin. Ori glanced to his right. Dwalin leaned against the couch back, looking quite pleased with himself.

“Do you see this marriage as hurting your standing at court or with your superiors or with your men?”

“Nah, if they’re in service t’ me, they already know me as a commander an’ they respect me or I wouldn’t be where I am. They know when it comes t’ family and personal matters I don’t give an elf’s crotch hairs about such matters.”

Both Balin and Dis choked and Thorin muttered, “Charming.” but Ori saw the deep affection in the prince’s eye.

“Do you feel you were forced into this marriage under false pretenses?”

“Yeh’ve got to be kidding!”

“Do you feel you have been in many ways led astray?” Thorin asked with a long-suffering sigh.

“Led astray?”

“Captain Dwalin!” Thorin finally shouted, though Ori thought there was a tiny edge of laughter in his voice.

“Look,” Dwalin leaned forward, obviously ready to give more that a monosyllabic reply. “I’ll tell yeh sommat about what was going on a’ th’ Master’s court. I’d bin checkin int’ thin’s there f’r a good while now. Yeh an’ Balin know why.

Thorin’s eyebrow raised in query.

“What we were talkin’ on b’fore Balin went off.”

Both nodded.

“Besides I couldn’t’ve shown up in Dale th’ next rest day askin’ t’ see Ori, could I? What in Mahal’s sight would that’ve looked like? ‘Good day t’ yeh, Master Ori. I’m Captain Dwalin. I left yeh to watch Calmar murder yer brother and even though yer a slave now di’ yeh fancy a long walk down by th’ lake with me?’ That’ve been bloody grand, wouldn’t it?”

“Good point,” Thorin conceded. “Still do you see yourself as being forced into this marriage?”

“Mahal, no! It was th’ only thing I could think a’ do t’ save th’ lad.”
“Save me,” Ori repeated. “You saved Nori by taking me.”

Dwalin paused. He drew a breath and his expression hardened.

“Nah, lad.”

Ori stared at him puzzled, then Thorin leaned forward.

“Master Ori, if Dwalin had not come to your rescue, what would you have done?”

Ori shuddered at the memory.

“I’d have…” Ori took a breath. “I’d have acted no differently. I’m glad Dwalin came, though.”

“Why?” Dis asked.

“Calmar was so disgusting,” Ori whispered then made himself shrugged before continuing. “Dori always said time heals all; cuts, bruises, tears, and in time memory fades…”

“Lad,” Dwalin cut him off softly. He laid his hand on Ori’s cheek and bowed his forehead against Ori’s.

“Oh, lad, didn’t yeh wonder about what Calmar woulda’ done t’ yeh?”

Ori shuddered again.

“But I had to save Nori…”

“Aye, yeh know once that sort gets a taste they only want more and they share.”

Ori choked then tried to stifle sobs as the full horror of his situation finally dawned on him.

“Mahal! Oh Mahal!” Ori buried his face in his hands, his body shaking. Ice curled about his heart but steadied a little as he felt Dwalin’s arms about him.

“It’s a’right, lad. I was there an’ I’m here, now. Yer gonna be safe wi’ me.”

“But-” Ori struggled to recover. “This isn’t your choice. You don’t want to be married to me. I…”

“Didn’t I jus’ say I was plannin’ on comin’ down t’ call on yeh?”

Ori looked up at him.

“Whatever I can do to-”

“I don’t want yer pity ‘r gratitude,” said Dwalin sharply.

“What else could I do to be a good husband?” Ori asked. “Other than the obvious and I am grateful.”

“Good point,” Thorin repeated. “Tell us Dwalin, in what other way does this marriage benefit you, other than, as Ori say, the obvious?”

Dwalin glared at his prince, who remained aloof and immune.

“Fine. He can write and take notes faster then any other I’ve seen. He can write in different scripts as well as doing fine illustration. Master Brur hired him on the spot. He’s got proper manners as yeh’ve seen, so there’s no need to train him up f’r court nonsense an’- Eh?”

Dis was making slight movement of encouragement to Ori, Dwalin snorted.

“I know he can cook, he told me. I also know he’s a dab hand at makin’ and knittin’. He’s also good with maps as I caught him looking over some at the office. And I’ve seen some a his sketchin’. Balin and Brur can have him trained up in no time f’r codes and other languages. And….” Dwalin paused. “You lot an’ Balin all like him. He’s a good fit with us.”

Thorin leaned back in his chair.

“Ori,” Dis asked gently, “is there a reason why you and Dwalin should not be married?”

Ori gawped at her, at a loss.

Balin smiled and leaned forward.

“Perhaps all this business with Nori aside; if Dwalin had come callin’, would yeh’ve received him?”

“Of course, but I…” Ori wasn’t sure how to put what he wanted to say politely.

“Say it, lad.” Dwalin’s voice was resigned but gentle.

Ori sighed.

“I would have, but considering the differences in our statuses, I … I would have been quite suspicious that you were either amusing yourself for some strange reason or trying to get information out of me about Nori, - which would be useless as he never tells me anything like that because if he did Dori would break his head - or that you had lost a bet.”

“Lost a bet?” Dis cried. “Ori, you are not allowed to speak so low of yourself!”

“I hadn’t given courting much thought without my master’s in scrivening. The only other thing was Dori told me once that your really should attain your mastery before thinking about things like courting and getting married.”

Balin cleared his throat.

“Ori, laddie, are we t’ understand that yer only true objections t’ being married t’ Dwalin’re that yeh don’t feel yeh know him well enough t’ trust his interest thus affection an’ attraction t’ yeh. An’ yeh do not feel yer qualified either as relatin’ t’ yer chosen work or social status?”

Ori pondered. “Well, yes, I think so… I thought, well, I was in for a rough life then suddenly I’m signing contracts in Khuzdul and braiding hair.”

Thorin snorted. “You’re such a joy to be around, Dwalin. No wonder Ori’s swept away by your charm.”

“Fuck yerself, Thorin.”

Ori giggled before he could stop himself.

“Ori,” Dis reached out and took his hand. “Let’s be practical for a moment; do you like Dwalin, the entire concept of games like “hide the sausage” or “What’s in the mine shaft” aside?
"Namad!"

"Lady Dis!"

"Fuck!"

"Aside!" Dis continued loudly. "Do you like him well enough as a companion and want to work together as his partner?"

Ori looked sidelong at Dwalin, who was as red as hot coals.

"I – I- Yes. I mean these last few days have quite wonderful and both he and Balin were most forgiving of my er… poor decision skills this morning."

Both Thorin and Dwalin roared with laughter.

"An’ that’s another reason Dwalin an’ I benefit,” Balin pointed out. “He’s quite capable of defending our household! True, it was defending it against a son of th’ house but it showed great honor an’ courage.”

“In my note to Dori,” Ori continued. “I told him that I did intend to give this marriage a try but then I was only thinking of my advantages.”

Thorin turned to Dwalin. “So, other than the obvious reasons to marry Ori-“

“Will yeh stop fuckin’ sayin’ that!”

“Fine. Aside from fucking-“

“I’ll kill yeh!”

“Do you like Ori?”

“Are yeh off yer head? Did I just say that I want’d t’ court him? Ain’t I bin sayin’ f’r the last year and a bloody half I’m that blind-ass daft about him?” Dwalin roared.

“Thank yeh, dear brother! Well said,” Balin praised. “See how much easier thing are when yeh use yer words!”

Dis and Thorin stifled their laughter in each other’s shoulders. Dwalin groaned and looked pleadingly at Ori. Ori could feel his own face burning and presumed it quite matched Dwalin’s at the moment but at the same time, Ori felt his heart warm and he found himself smiling through new tears of happiness.

“Oh! Captain! I mean Dwalin! I- I- No one has- I mean- I never ever expected such words from anyone in my life. I can assure you no one has ever expressed such sweetness to me before. I promise I shall endeavor to do my very best to be an excellent husband, scribe and map specialist for you and the House of Fundin.”

Ori reached over and took both Dwalin's hands into his, and his heart melted when Dwalin responded by catching him close, an arm about him, a large hand burying itself in Ori’s thick hair, mumbling.

“Just wantin’ yeh to be happy and have everythin’ yeh need and never goin’ without again.”

Thorin broke the moment by clearing his throat at a rather unnecessarily loud volume.
“Since both of you are in agreement in giving your somewhat surprising marriage a try, I shall grant you two years trial period. We will open this matter again at that time. For now, barring death or violence against one another, the matter is closed.

“Dis and I are late for court, Dwalin needs to be in the Dale. Balin has a meeting with Brur and thus will be able to escort Ori to the library.”

Dis bustled off to the kitchen with Balin in tow. As Thorin told Dwalin to help him get the ponies ready, Dwalin gave Ori’s hand a squeeze. Ori squeezed back happily.

“Shall I come and help you both?” he offered.

“No,” Dis popped in again. “You stay here, I’m just going to put on my court shoes. Hurry up you two.” This to Thorin and Dwalin, both of whom chuckled. Dwalin let go of Ori’s hand and led the way out. Thorin chucked Ori under the chin and followed.

The house seemed suddenly empty even although Ori could hear Dis swearing somewhere about a ‘stupid heel” and in the distance he thought he could hear Balin singing something about birds and bees and sycamore trees. Whatever a sycamore tree was.

Ori glanced about then quickly busied himself with putting the room and furniture back to rights. He pushed the last chair in place when he heard footfalls in the room.

“Mahal, Dis! Your court shoes sound very-“

Ori turned and there was Frerin in the doorway, Ori took a breath. Everything had been sorted. There was no need for further enmity between himself and the younger prince. He smiled

“Oh! You’re back quickly, I-” A thought struck him. “Nothing’s happened at the court, has it? If you need Thorin, he and Dwalin are in the stable getting-”

“Well, aren’t you just making yourself comfortable in this house.”

Ori sighed, so much for calm family times.

“I’m just helping put things back to rights before we all leave. Speaking of which.” Ori decided to change the subject to something less tense. “Would you happen to know what a sycamore tree is? I heard Balin-”

“You. Balin. Already counting yourself as our equals then?”

Ori sighed.

“Lord Balin invited me to address him as so… your highness.”

“Better. Though why Dwalin would hang on the likes of you when he’s been tupping Thorin since they were grubby badgers.”

Ori shrugged.

“Don’t care, eh?” Frerin commented. “As long as you get your full pay in house and home I suppose it matters not.”

“It’s the tradition of princes and men at arms bond together over time and become comrades in arms. I think I would be more surprised to learn they were not, your highness.”
“I bet you would be. That chair’s aslant.”

Ori turned. The next thing he knew he was on the floor with a pounding pain on his jaw.

“That’s for Dwalin. I heard what your brother did. Striking a captain of the royal guard, too. Your brother should have gone down on his knees and thanked Dwalin. Dirty street scum.”

Ori struggled up and looked at Frerin as bravely as he could.

“I accept this. My brother hurt a member of your family. Your act is honorable. May we put our animosity aside now and at least behave as friends?”

“Friends? Friends with you? Of all the…creatures Dwalin could have chosen. He should have been mine, you know! Once Thrain was lost in Azanulbizar and Thorin took his place for Thror, Dwalin ought to have been assigned to me. Me! And by Mahal, I would have had him knowing his place and obeying!”

Ori registered thinking that Frerin was as fruity as a nut cake in Nori’s terms, before Frerin grabbed him by the throat and slammed him against the wall.

Ori reacted as Nori had taught him, as this was the behavior of men. He grabbed Frerin’s littlest finger and wrenched it back while kicking Frerin in the crotch as hard as he could.

Frerin howled in both pain and rage, dropping Ori. Ori jumped to his feet, but being unfamiliar with thick carpeting, tripped on the rug and stumbled back on the couch.

Frerin loomed over Ori. As quickly as he could, Ori scrunched down on the seat and pulled up his knees. He grabbed the fabric for leverage and kicked out with both feet as hard as he could. Frerin toppled back across the room, falling heavily to the floor. Ori got to his feet, panting.

Unfortunately Frerin was a trained warrior who was both taller than and outweighed Ori. Ori was forced back against the wall. Frerin’s forearm shoved into his collarbone, holding him there. Ori pulled up his knees again and kicked out. Without the proper leverage his feet did not have the accuracy or power of his first kicks. They were however, effective enough that one landed in Frerin’s thigh and the other on his knee.

Frerin landed a breath-stealing punch to Ori’s gut then vanished upward. A familiar pair of brawny arms lifted Frerin by the belt and hair to a full arm’s outstretch toward the ceiling then body-slammed Frerin to the floor.

Ori slid to the carpet, gasping; Dis and Balin were on either side immediately

“Laddie! Wee brother! Yeh a’right?”

“Ori! Ori, dear- Mahal, you’re bleeding!”

Ori looked at Dwalin, who was holding a furious Frerin pinned to the floor, with his boot on Frerin’s face.

Thorin grabbed Ori, lifted, and passed him bodily to Dwalin. Ori sank gratefully against Dwalin’s chest as the larger dwarf’s strong arms wrapped him close. Ori felt safe there.

“Yeh hurt?” Dwalin murmured in his ear.

“Not much. Just a couple of scratches-“
Thorin started laughing in a most unpleasant manner.

“Look at you, brother. Both eyes blackened, missing tooth, all scratched and cut from top to bottom. Perhaps it’s for the best it was here in private. Now you can safely say you were set upon by a pack of warg-riding Orcs rather than admit you just got your ass beaten by a little scribe half your age and size!”

Ori started to apologize to Dis about her furniture, but she was more concerned with the blood on him, which turned out to be mostly Frerin’s.

“It’s all his fault!” Frerin shouted, pointing at Ori as Thorin had finally managed to force Dwalin to get his boot off the dwarf prince’s face. “If he had behaved in courteous manner towards his betters—”

“Fuck yerself, Frerin!”

“But I did, “ Ori protested. “I called you by your title when speaking to you as you asked.”

“Family members don’t use titles in private!” Dis scolded. “Just a moment, Ori, pet. I’ll get you one of Kili’s shirts. You can’t go to the library looking like that.”

Frerin pointed at Ori.

“You struck a son of the royal house.”

“I said I accepted your first hit as revenge for what Nori did to Dwalin. That’s fair – “

“Fuckin’ Frerin! I’ll kill yeh!!”

“But…” Ori went on, putting his hand on Dwain’s fist. “When you struck me again I was within my rights to defend myself.”

“No, you’re not!” Frerin roared, “You live in the Dale, not under the mountain! You should have begged for mercy”

“Frerin! Don’t talk such idiocy!” Thorin barked. “All of the race of Durin are equal whether they live beneath the mountain, around it, or high in the vales of Ered Luin. We as nobles and leaders are born to help our people not demand their worship the way the races of men do.

“A true king is only as great as the lowest of his people. We serve. We do not expect anything more of our people that we are not prepared to do ourselves. You want to be pandered to? Go rule among men or elves.”

Frerin sniffed and Ori rubbed at his throat. Suddenly Dwalin’s hands were there, lifting his chin. Ori saw a look pass between Dwalin and Thorin. Thorin came over and inspected Ori’s throat.

“Laddie!” Balin gasped. To Ori’s surprise the older dwarrow reached over and grabbed the youngest prince by his side-whiskers, eliciting a yelp of pain.

“Leave be, Balin,” Dwalin said suddenly. The brothers exchanged a look of understanding.

“Frerin,” Thorin said quietly. “You come with me and Dwalin to the stables. Balin, would you please get Ori to work.”

Dwalin bowed his head to Ori’s brow with a murmur.
“I’ll catch yeh up later.”

Ori, out of sheer gall that Frerin was still watching them, leaned up to press a kiss to Dwalin’s cheek.

“Remember, we are bidden to Dori’s tonight for dinner.”

“Aye, I’ll fetch yeh from the library.” Dwalin smiled, an impish look in his eyes as he returned the gentle peck to Ori’s mouth.
New Faces, Old Friends.

Chapter Summary

Hello again friends!

It's Friday so we're back and ready for another exciting chapter of the weird life we've given Ori

In this chapter, we meet some new people. Do tell us how you like them as both will be good friends to our hero. No overt hints this time, but there is a library joke.

We love seeing the hits count going up and thank all you very much for the kudos which make our days when we see them. Please tell us what you think, as constructive criticism is always welcome. If you have any plot bunnies for us, do tell! We can't promise to pop them in, but we'd love to hear about them or see your artwork!

If I have a minute or two Tuesday night, I will try and get the next chapter up, but if not, we'll see you all back here next Friday!

Keep those cards and letters coming! And we're off!!!

Ori could still feel himself blush whenever his mind returned to that kiss. Balin guided the pretty grey pony at a fast trot through the streets and then cantered up to the huge edifice of the library.

Ori stroked the beautiful bright blue linen shirt he now wore. Dis had caught him in the hall, on the point of his walking out the door with Balin, stripped off his blood-spattered shirt, then manhandled Ori into this one of Kili’s. It sat rather longer on Ori than Dipfa would approve of, but he knew he looked very nice.

Balin drew the pony to a halt at the front steps, hopped out, then held out his hands to Ori. Ori carefully navigated his way out of the little shay. He turned and blushed hotly as Master Brur walked up to them. Brur told one of the young library pages to see to Lord Balin’s pony and, with a sly wink, Balin tossed the badger a little coin bag.

“So I see yeh’ve each made the acquaintance a’ th’ other,” Brur commented obviously quite amused.

“Aye, indeed we have.” Balin smiled and drew Ori’s hand through his arm. “I couldn’t have chosen better f’r my brother. Our Ori’s been a joy from th’ start.”

Ori stared wide-eyed at Balin, who winked at him and laid an expressive finger along the side of his nose. Ori turned to Brur, hoping his aghast confusion wasn’t showing too much. Brur looked him up and down and Ori felt as though he was back in his badger days when Dori had once caught him sitting in the middle of a mud puddle in his feast-day clothes.

“Well, yer a little early, young master Ori,” Brur observed, “but it does rather appear yeh’ve something of a busy morning.”

Ori swallowed down the comment that rose to his lips.
Why yes, Master Brur. I have already ambushed and manacled Lord Balin, teased the Captain of the Royal Guard about the color of his drawers and interrupted his bathing, had a fist-fight with one prince, and am now roaming abroad in the shirt of another.

Ori took a breath.

“A little complicated perhaps, Master Brur.”

“Hm. I’ve had th’ pages supply yeh with th’ books I want yeh t’ start with on yer desk. Miss Konul here’ll show yeh th’ way up to th’ Scholars’ Hall from this door. I’m no’ sending yeh t’ lectures, as that’d be a waste of yer time. I’ve also put yeh down t’ spend th’ afternoon in th’ reference hall t’ familiarize yeh with general searching an’ such.”

Ori perked right up at the Head Librarian’s words.

“Miss Konul,” the librarian called.

A badger lass raced over, pink-cheeked and eager. Ori quickly named himself and offered his hand with an “at your service”.

Konul, daughter of Thul, was thrilled and told him so in a voice so high-pitched Ori decided her parents had put her to work in the center of the mountain so the people of Dale would not suffer hearing damage.

He turned and bowed to Brur, then to Balin, who tut-tutted and embraced him. Chucking Ori under the chin, Balin turned to Brur.

“Please go easy on him t’day, old friend. He’s only beaten th’ living snot out a’ Frerin this morning. Just after breakfast, actually.”

Brur remained motionless in body and expression except for the one large eyebrow, which shot upwards at an alarming speed.

“Oh, did he now?”

A clatter of hooves turned all four dwarrow toward the road as Harley galloped up and jumped to a stop. Dwalin got off and went to Ori. Ori, not sure what to expect, chose to hold his ground while Dwalin roughly invaded his personal space, gathering him close.

“Here,” Dwalin shoved a small coin purse into Ori’s hand. “Yeh’ll need to pop out t’ the market f’r yer lunch. Both Balin an’ I’ll be back later with th’ ponies t’ get us all t’ yer brothers.”

“Oh,” Ori turned. “Are you coming too, Lord Balin?”

“Of course, laddie. I’m lookin’ forward to meetin’ me new brothers-in-law very much.”

Ori, under the guise of hugging Dwalin, whispered, “I’ll probably be paid soon so if you would please buy something extra for Dori’s table, I’ll repay-“

“I’ll take care of it,” Dwalin murmured.

Ori sighed then raised his eyes.

“We both need to be at our work.”

“Aye, I know. Here, yeh know I-“
Ori surprised himself by saying, “Yes, and if you keep behaving as you are I shall likely be falling ass over tea kettles in love with you before next week is out. So never say I didn’t warn you.”

Ori felt his cheek burn at his own brashness but Dwalin grinned around a blush of his own. Ori smiled to Dwalin, who leaned in to kiss him. Ori delighted in the burn of Dwalin’s lips against his own.

“Be safe,” Ori said softly and started as he was rewarded for his sauce by a wicked grin and gentle slap on his butt.

Harley whickered while Dwalin swung himself back on. Ori giggled as Dwalin urged the pony forward and the velvety nose snuffled Ori’s ear. Harley gave a squeal of mischief and, with Dwalin’s encouragement, took off at full speed, up the street leaping lightly and cleanly over a merchant’s cart and vanishing out toward the main gate.

“Ooooh, Master Ori!” the page sighed in delighted admiration. “You are so lucky! Your husband is sooo handsome.”

Ori smiled to himself.

“Yes, Miss Konul, he certainly is.”

Konul giggled.

“Well, I suppose I shall be quite rude and ask you if he has any brothers.”

Ori turned to Balin, who cocked an eyebrow at the page. Konul turned purple as Brur rolled his eyes.

“Let me take you to your desk, Master Ori,” she squeaked and rushed for the door.

Ori followed and when they were through, Konul turned.

“I’m so sorry, Master Ori! Do you think Lord Balin will be very angry?”

“I doubt it.” Ori smiled.

Konul bustled forward and she and Ori vanished into the great halls of the library.

* * *

Ori put down the last translation and collected his notes to reread and edit.

“Master Ori?”

He looked up at a dam close to his own age standing by his bookshelf. She was obviously quite passionate about the color pink. Two large, pink bows perched side by side on the back of her head, holding back a thick cascade of nut brown hair. Tiny pink ribbons dotted the mass of tiny braids crisscrossing her beard.
She was shadowed by another dwarf who was about as round as he was as he was tall, wore an anxious frown, and was clad completely in black. Something about the way he did his hair made Ori think it was colored that amazing shade of absolute black by copious use of boot polish.

Ori rose and offered his hand to the dam.

“Yes, I’m Master Ori, at your service”

“Omibur, at your service,” she said as she grasped his hand eagerly. “You’ve just started yes?”

“Yes, I have, so I may not be able to assist you with much.”

Omibur laughed, her head ribbons bobbing.

“You can assist us by coming to the market for lunch, please.”

Ori was a little shocked at her bubbly manner, but found he liked her right away. She looked vaguely familiar but Ori couldn’t place her just then.

“I’m Buj, at your service,” the other young dwarf announced out of the blue. “I apologize for Omi’s rudeness. She was raised at an inn.”

Ori turned at looked at Buj, who glared at Omi, whose sole response was to put out her tongue.

Buj offered Ori his hand.

“I’m trying my best, Master Ori, she wasn’t raised in the mountain and I don’t want the other dwararrow to make fun of her.”

Ori clasped Buj’s hand briefly.

“Then I’m afraid I’m placing both of you in danger. I was born and raised around Steam Alley.”

“How nice!” Omi cried.

Ori stared at her.

She giggled again.

“I mean it’s nice because I know Steam Alley. My mam goes there to see old Dam Rittl. She makes medicines for dams.”

Ori smiled.

“Mistress Rittl also makes the best current buns if you’re there on first rest day.”

Omi clapped her hands softly. “I know!”

“We’re wasting our lunch time,” Buj told them.

Ori corked his ink bottle and laid his pens aside.

“I’m coming.”

He smiled at Buj, who grinned hugely in reply.
Ori had seen the area and heard many things about the meat market but to be going about in it was bewildering. Everything smelled delicious! The young dwarrow wandered about deciding what to eat. Ori chose a thick mutton stew served inside a heavy roll and some raspberry cordial. He found a seat on the broad stone dock set over a decorative pool in the middle of the market. He looked up to see Omi and Buj making their way over to him.

“We have a sample tray!” Omi called. She hurried up and showed the woven straw tray with a number of little rolls, each with different fillings.

“And,” she cried, putting them on the stone, then bumping down opposite Ori. “My imad gave me these today!”

In another basket were several quite lovely looking elderberry tarts.

Buj arrived with four large filled pastries and something wrapped in white paper. Ori was about to ask about them when suddenly two large dwarrow landed one on either side of him.

“Hello, Ori, old mate!” Fili greeted him cheerily then began stuffing his own face with a large chop, using the bone as a handle.

“Ori!” Kili stuck his head into Ori’s space. “What have you got?’

“Stew. My friends-”

Kili looked up at Omi and Buj staring at him. Omi obviously recognized the princes. Buj was merely startled at the expansion of their little group.

“I’m Kili, he’s Fili,” Kili stated, smiling.

Fili grunted around the bite he’d just taken.

Omi swallowed her awe and immediately introduced herself and Buj.

“I’m Omi, he’s Buj. Do you want some of these samples with us?”

“Thanks.” Kili was delighted. “Here, have some of this bird I’ve got.”

He tore off wing and held it out to Buj, who regarded it in the light of something about to bite him.

“No, thank you. I’m involved with some research. I’m proving a theory on myself. It’s complex.”

Kili blinked then paled a little.

“Oi, come on, mate, there’s a dam here and we’re out and about. You can’t go poking yourself! Besides the humans say the palms of your hands will grow hair.”

“He said prove,” Fili bellowed around another mouthful. “Not poke, you idiot!”

Kili pointed at Omi.
“Dam! There’s a dam here! You can’t talk filth like that in front of a dam! I’m telling Mam!”

Fili grasped frantically at his belt for weaponry, found nothing large enough to satisfy his outrage and settled for glaring at Kili who, having finished his fried bird, was wolfing down his fourth sample. Buj busily peeled all the pastry off his food and Omi laughed so hard she curled on the stone, holding her sides.

“What is your theory?” Ori asked, weakly.

“What in Mahal’s name are you eating?” Fili demanded.

Buj raised a superior eyebrow at the elder prince and laid out all his food items on the tray for their inspection.

“We have a selection of different items consumed by the various peoples of the realms,” Buj explained. “These are seed cakes - hobbit food. Hobbits are smaller than us and have large feet connecting them to the ground in which they grow their grains. Here we have a custard - food from Men. They make cheeses, puddings, and butter. They get their food from animals, mostly as liquid. Now, here is our food, mostly meat roasted over fire. Finally, here are some items Elves eat.”

Buj opened the paper and displayed a bunch of fresh green leaves and a bunch of dried herbs.

“Their food comes from plants, which feed on air. As the men say ‘you become what you eat’.”

“If I eat that seed cake, will I shrink?” Kili asked.

Buj beamed at Kili.

“I’m very glad you asked that question, Master Kili. You show great depth and it is at this depth that my testing begins. One or two seed cakes here and there aren’t going to matter a whit. But what if, and I repeat if, you ate nothing but seed cakes?”

“You’d get the runs!” Omi said firmly.

“No,” Buj said, tiredly.

“Yes, you do!” Omi insisted. “My mam made a whole tray for the dinner crowd and my youngest brother ate the lot! He spent the whole night on the pot and the noises he made were dreadful!”

Fili looked up. “Was he moaning and groaning in pain?”

“No, he was farting and poo-ing which woke us all up and we thought it was an early spring thunderstorm!”

“That bad?” Fili gasped. “Just from seed cakes? Mah-a-a-al, I wonder how the hobbits cope?”

“That is just my point!” Buj said loudly. “If it’s the only things you eat, your body will change and adjust.”

Fili leaned forward, licking his fingers.

“So you’re going to eat all that elf food to grow taller?”

Buj shrugged.
“That may be a side effect but we do know for a fact elves are durable and very light. Light to the point of walking on top of newly drifted snow.”

“Yes,” Ori agreed, “but how does that prove your theory of … er … your theory?”

Buj reached onto a deep pocket and withdrew a small book. His fingers fluttered through pages, riddled with notes in a crabbed hand and violent sketches.

“He dropped the book open on the stone, his forefinger jammed to a picture of a dwarf in what looked like a bird costume. All looked at the picture, then at Buj, all in a similar state of confusion. Buj beamed at their attention.

“Yes, my friends, by eating extreme amounts of elfin food I shall render my person quite light, don this apparatus and, from the top of our mountain, and using the wind …” He paused for dramatic effect. “Fly!”

“Mahal!” Fili, Kili and Omi gasped together.

Ori wasn’t sure about this.

“Are you certain the apparatus and the wind will be enough?” he asked

Buj gave another superior smile, tucking his book back into his pocket and patting the outside.

“No matter. I have been saving my pay against such projects. As my inventions require, of course. If further calculations show more thrust is necessary, I shall petition the king for the use of the military catapult.”

Ori was assailed by a vision of Buj being hurled via catapult from the top of Erebor in a high east wind. Such would put Buj straight into Mirkwood. Having only seen an over-copied print of the king of the Greenwood, Ori could not imagine Thranduil’s reaction to a dwarf in a bird costume suddenly plummeting into his court.

Ori sighed. He’d best let Balin know there was such an idea afoot. Balin would make sure Sylvan elves understood this was a testing of a theory and not King Thror suddenly deciding to turn the joke about dwarf-tossing into a form of active warfare.

Kili poked him and startled Ori out of his reverie

“Wha’?”

Kili looked him over.

“I don’t remember you wearing a blue shirt this morning at breakfast. It looks exactly like one of mine. Blue really isn’t your color, Ori-mate.”

“I know. It is your shirt,” Ori supplied. “Your mam put it on me before I came to work.”

“I know. It is your shirt,” Ori supplied. “Your mam put it on me before I came to work.”

“Oh.” Kili pondered. “Didn’t you like the shirt you were wearing? I thought you looked well in it. Didn’t you, Fili?”

“Aye, aye, suited you fine, Ori! Don’t remember you getting covered in your own breakfast to have to change it. What happened?”

Ori didn’t think it was a good idea to tell them he’d been fighting with their idad.
“Um … It’s kind of complicated,” he floundered.
Kili nodded compassionately and patted his shoulder.
“I understand, old fellow. I have days like that, too.”

* * *

Brur introduced Ori to the reference librarian, who was heading the main desk that afternoon. Wobr, tall for a dwarf, carried himself with a military build and manner. His clothes, all of varying shades of brown velvet, were copiously bejeweled with brown enstatite, his hair heavily oiled and beaded with tourmalines. His beard coiled tight to his face and braided into a long strand that almost touched his collar button. His waxed mustache wound into large double curls on both sides. He didn’t bother to hide that he was unimpressed with Ori.

After Brur left, Wobr waved Ori off to the stacks area to reshelve the cart of books by the desk, telling him to explore and find his way about.

Ori studied the file markings on the books and various shelves. It didn’t take him long to see the pattern of filing and he went about his duty with pleasure.

He was about to shelve the last book and turned down the area to do so. On the floor, at the back wall between the shelves, sat a red haired young dwarf paging grumpily through a book and muttering. There were more books on the floor than on the shelves, many open in various places and others piled recklessly about.

He was in the most magnificent sulk Ori had ever seen.

“Hello,” Ori greeted him and was treated to a frowning yet morose look.

The book in use was dumped on the floor.

“I hate books,” the young dwarf declared in a surprisingly deep voice.

His words were childish but his tone was more defeat than anything else.

Ori looked at the mess between the two shelves.

“You appear out-numbered. May I offer some assistance?”

He made his way through the piles and offered his hand to the dwarf.

“I’m Ori, first level librarian on reference duty this afternoon. At your service.”

“Gimli, Son of Gloin, at me wits end an’ ready t’ pull out me beard, at yers,” the dwarf replied glumly.

Ori quickly picked up all the books and put them on his cart. Gimli gave him a hand once he saw what was happening.

Ori led Gimli out to a long reading table and sat him down at the head. He turned the cart and so all the titles from the books showed on the spines and then sat at the corner of that table.
"How may I assist you, Master Gimli?"

"I need t’ know some Elvish."

"To converse?"

"I suppose so . . . sort of."

"In person?"

"Nah, letter."

"Do you need a translator?"

"No!"

"I’m sorry.” Ori pondered his now crabby client. “Let’s begin anew.”

"I jus’ want t’ be able to say a couple of thin’s in elvish.”

"Oh.” Ori smiled. “I know a few phrases—”

"Yer a pointy-eared, tree-shaggin’ butt-head.”

"Oh. Ah. Unfortunately, those aren’t any of the ones I know.”

"Aye, well it ain’t in these books neither.”

Ori arranged his chair to a more conversation oriented set.

“Perhaps it might be best if you explain how this need to call someone a butthead in elvish came about. Is it perhaps a one-up game with your friends?”

‘One-Up’ was a badgers’ insult game and was annoyingly popular among the richer classes of badgers.

Gimli shook his head then glared at Ori.

“Yeh better not tell—”

“This is a reference interview,” Ori interrupted curtly, “not a gossip session. Please proceed.”

This turn of phrase seemed to impress Gimli enough that, after grumbling to himself, he dug out a piece of paper, and handed it to Ori.

Ori examined the delicate written sheet. It was not the smooth vellum dwarrow used. It was soft to the touch and looked as though it was made of birch bark. He unfolded it and read quite an insulting letter in Westron. Placing the letter on the table he pondered the insults. There was no rhyme or reason, no statement of intent, no demand for apology for an insult or injury.

“Had you met the writer and held conversation with this person before?"

“No, jus’ smiled an’ handed it to me.”

“An elf?”

“Aye.”
“May I examine this fully?”

Gimli looked a little confused but nodded. Ori held the letter up to the oil lamp then crossed to the great fireplace then tried to see if there was another layer between the paper as even bark grew in layers.

“What in Mahal’s name’re yeh doin’?”

“Elves are known for codes and riddles. This could also be his way of trying to play one up but there’s no sense to the insults.”

Ori laid the letter on the table and placed his hand across, obscuring all but the first letter of each line.

“Look.”

As he and Gimli gazed at the first letters, Ori showed Gimli that reading downward, the letter now read, ‘Hello, my name is Legolas. Would you like to be friends?’

“It’s called an acrostic,” Ori explained. “As I said elves are known for riddles especially word games.”

“Would yeh look at tha’!” Gimli admired.

Ori smiled to see the younger dwarf’s eyes light up.

“So how do I answer back? How d’ yeh make these thin’s?”

Ori pondered then looked through the books Gimli had been going through.

“Well, first off, why are you in code PJ5118? That’s language and etymology.”

“Because tha’ oily bonce over there said so.”

Ori sketched a glance at Wobr, who was busily inspecting the ink bottle label.

“Come, ‘Ori said. “We need to be in code GV1507 and while we’re at it, probably GV1507 rune break W9.”

Putting his full cart next to the desk for counting, Ori led the way to the various places and soon had young Gimli supplied with a simple Sindarin to Westron dictionary and three books about making word puzzles. Ori also raided the references desk while Wobr was mending his pen.

Gimli stared at the vellum heavily inked with a grid. The next hour saw Ori and Gimli carefully build a word puzzle with a friendly answering message hidden amongst a jumble of other Westron letters in the shape of a Dwarrow Rune.

Gimli patted the blotter lightly over his message and beamed at Ori.

“’This’s brilliant! I’ll tuck it back in with Da’s letters goin’ t’ th’ West this evenin’.”

“I hope you had an enjoyable time with this,” Ori replied. “I’ve made a note here of the codes and the titles, so when you need you can look them out again.”

“Troll poo!” Gimli grinned. “I’ll just ask f’r another reference interview with Ori th’ first level
Ori took a deep breath, deciding on the shortest answer.

“I’m not long married into the House of Fundin. We’re quite near—“ “Fundin?” Gimli barked as his eyebrows shot up. “Yer Captain Dwalin’s new husband then?”

“Yes, I am.”

“Sweet golden ore! What a choice turn! I’m right glad we’ve met. My Mam’s first lady in waitin’ t’ Princess Dis an’ th’ pair of ’em were in a huge flutter abou’ th’ whole thing. Lady Dis thinks gems fall out of yer every orifice an’ Mam’s tha’ eager t’ meet yeh. She’ll about get her beard in a twist when I tell her we’ve met. We live next t’ you. Th’ door Da had done in red sand stone with th’ name plates in rubies.”

Ori remembered it and nodded.

“I am happy to know you, Master Gimli.”

“Right, I’m off,” the younger dwarf announced abruptly. “Yeh want puttin’ ’em all back? I could probably do it in a hic an’a half.”

Ori pictured Brur in a towering rage and demurred politely.

Gimli marched out, his boots thumping across the stone floor twice as loudly as before, whistling a jolly tune, and slamming the main door for good measure on his way out. Ori was thankful no one else was about.

Ori gathered the books and took them to the reference desk. To his horror, Wobr glared at him and Brur was watching Ori with interest.

Ori placed the books on the cart and came to stand in front of the desk.

“I can’t believe you had the gall to conduct a reference interview on someone I had already helped!” Wobr hissed angrily.

“I’m sorry. I didn’t know,” Ori replied quietly. “I was shelving the books you told me to and found him in the PJ section in a rather morose state. I was only trying to help.”

Wobr opened his mouth but Brur stopped him.

“Thank yeh, Master Wobr, yer time f’r reference desk’s finished f’r th’ afternoon. I believe yer due up in preservation.”

Wobr stalked off. Brur sighed and sat down at the desk, motioning Ori to follow suit.

“I see our young researcher nearly took th’ PJ section apart. Obviously he wasn’t findin’ what he wanted.”

“No, Master Brur,” Ori replied honestly. “We found what he needed in code GV1507.”

Brur sighed.

“I didn’t think he looked th’ sort t’ be wanting a bunch of text books an’ such.” The older dwarf looked up. “I’m glad yeh were here. Did yeh enjoy it?”
Ori reflected a moment. Yes, I did. Doing copy work for others has its own rewards but helping that badger decipher and create a letter in a different code, hopefully meeting a new friend had been, well, it was fun.

“I’m still finding my way about but, yes, I did enjoy it.”

“Good.” Brur smiled, nodding. “I’ll assign yeh some work yeh can bring t’ this desk.”

Brur rose and turned to leave Ori at the desk.

“An’ by th’ way,” Brur looked faintly displeased. “We’ve pages t’ shelve an’ keep use count, librarians of any level do not.”

Brur drifted off soundlessly. Ori was inclined to feel angry with Wobr until he remembered Wobr was now going to have to deal with Brur, so it was nothing Ori had to worry about.

He examined the desk to his satisfaction, going through all the drawers, notes, seeing what instruction books were left about, studying the maps of the floor plans of the reference room and it’s twenty floors of open stacks, to the two hundred and eight floors of closed stacks, offices, workrooms, lectures halls, and storage areas for more unusual items.

“Sorry I’m late, the lecture-“

Ori turned to see a dam about his own age hurrying forward. She reminded him of Omi and he knew he had met her before. He knew her well. The dam obviously had the same thought.

“Ori?”

“Lolibur?”

Loli clapped her hands over her mouth to stop a squeal and rushed forward. Ori was so happy he nearly cried.

Lolibur, daughter of Bombur, had been his only friend as a small badger. Her parents Master Bombur and Mistress Erda had owned a pub at the far corner of Steam Alley on Steam Track.

When Ori was just starting to be considered for an apprenticeship, Master Bombur’s older cousin arrived home from the war in Azanubizar where he had been thought lost years ago. Master Bifur was fine, he was still a little confused, of course, and could only speak in Khuzdul or sign in iglishmêk as he had the remains of an orc axe stove into his forehead, but was otherwise quite well. After visiting the military headquarters in the Mountain he also had a hero’s pay. The whole family, Master Bombur, his wife, his brother, and all thirteen of Loli’s brothers and sisters moved to the far side of Lake Town to a beautiful inn Master Bifur purchased with the pay.

Loli and Ori had a good, long hug and a good hard forehead thump that left them both giggling.

“Oh, Ori! I’ve missed you so! How are you?” she asked, looking him over, rather like Dori inspecting a roasting swede. “How are Dori and Nori? What are you doing here? Not that I’m surprised! How long have you been working here since I’ve never seen you!”

Ori laughed. “It’s so good to see you, too, Loli! We’re all fine. Dori and Nori are in a house in Steam Alley now, not in that horrid rooms to rent place any more. I only just started here yesterday. How’s all your family?”

“Are you in classes?” Loli skipped the family question in her eagerness.
"No. Master Brur said study in the mornings, reference desk in the afternoons."

Loli stared. "You must be a genius! But then you always were the cleverest one."

"And you had all the courage," Ori reminded her.

They looked at one another again and laughed.

"So," Loli proceeded when they let go. "I’m here with my younger sister Omi."

"I met Omi and Buj! They invited me to lunch with them today."

"Oh Durin’s beard! Buj! He’s clever but completely off his nest. His parents, Broadbeams from the West a few generations back, are very noble. Don’t know what to make of him. His elder brother Wobr works here too and pretends they aren’t related. Their mam feels like the weasel that ate the hen only to lay eggs for the rest of her life."

"Buj is a very unusual egg at that," Ori allowed. Now that egg has not only hatched but quite determined to fly in truth. No wonder Buj is so resolute. To be so inventive and have an elder brother like Wobr? Nori would never treat me with such pettiness any more than I would treat either Dori or him.

Ori had a sudden flash of memory.

"I remember Omi now! We used to call her Moth, didn’t we, as she was always chasing shiny things!" Ori recalled. "No wonder I didn’t recognize her name."

A thought shook him.

"What happened to the lovely inn down near the Lake at Dale?"

"Nothing," Loli smiled. "It’s a vast success! We’ve even had Elves to stay. Why?"

"It’s a long haul to travel every morning for the pair of you."

"Oh. We stay with Mam’s sister’s husband’s brother-in-law and his husband. He’s Oin, son of Groin and his husband, idad Binni. Idad Oin’s the Master Healer. He’s awfully nice, deaf as a stone troll but nice. We call him idad along with his own brother Gloin and his wife imad Gridr. They have a—"

"Son named Gimli," Ori finished. "He was just here."

"Well, Mahal’s hammer! Gimli in the library? Next you’ll be telling me King Thanduil’s gone dry."

"The ‘Vigorous Spring’ never dries!" Ori and Loli chorused together in the old joke on the Elf King’s name and ability to consume vast amounts of alcohol without visible effects.

After another hug, Loli went off with the full cart and Ori settled with the unabridged copy of the Annotated Arrangement of Codes for Research, second revised edition. He needed to know this before tackling the third revision which was organized with the title Research, Discussion, and Admission. Master Brur had told him not to bother with the mens’ way of coding, which had been invented by a strange man from Bree names Doowhee Dezimahl. He had created a coding system using only numbers and had died of a heart attack when he discovered (as dwarrow and elves had always known) the concept of infinity.
Ceremony, Kings and Dale

Chapter Summary

Happy Friday, friends, and we're off and running once again!

Ori is plunged into the depths of Erebor royal manners and gets another outfit! (surprise, surprise!)

No deep, hidden hints this chapter as I had too much fun with Balin's room or, as Dollypeg's fondly calls my habit, 'telling what the room is wearing'.

And here we go, friends. Keep those cards and letters coming!

Ori walked out with Omi, Loli, and Buj to the foyer. Wobr ignored them, talking and posturing at a dwarrowdam with immaculate black curls and heavy green and gold beading in both her hair and beard. Her clothes were expensive green velvet and silk with entirely too much gold and green variscite festooning all the pleats, flounces, rouching, and frills.

Loli spared the two a glance and told Ori that T’dilla was considered a catch at court and Wobr was baiting himself with everything he had - which, Buj informed them, wasn’t much beyond a vat of hair wax from the wilds of Angmar.

Omi, Loli, and Ori were still laughing about this when there was a clatter of hooves and Balin arrived. Ori said good evening to his friends and hurried over. Balin, to Ori’s surprise, hopped down from the shay and helped Ori up to his seat. Taking the reins again Balin nodded to the young dwarrow and chirped to start the pony.

“Very good, laddie. Yeh seem t’ have made a nice group of friends there.”

“Yes,” Ori replied both surprised and pleased. “Mind, I know Lolibur and Omibur from before. Her parents, Master Bombur and Mistress Erda once owned a pub near us.”

Balin turned.

“Master Bombur of th’ Lakeside Inn?”

“You know them?” Ori asked.

“Only in passing, lad.”

Ori glanced at Balin as he guided the pony toward the house.

“Are we not going up to Dori’s? And where’s Dwalin?”

“We’ll be meeting up with Dwalin on th’ way, but we need t’ get yeh dressed, laddie.”

Ori started to worry as Balin merely tied the pony to the handrail near the door. He hurried Ori inside and sent him back to wash.

Ori had just managed to pull on clean drawers when Balin came and escorted Ori off to Balin’s own rooms.

Balin’s rooms overwhelmed Ori. Balin explained that as the eldest he was entitled to the main suite, as he called it, which had been his parents’. They entered through a small seating area with large, plumply stuffed furniture the frames of which were elaborately carved from a black marble, set with rubies. From this a flight of four steps led up to a vast circular bed festooned in great swathes of red silk and velvet draperies and all the walls and the very ceiling itself were inset with gold-framed mirrors.

Balin hurried Ori into a dressing room the size of the ground floor at Dori’s. Off this Ori saw a spacious bathing area beautifully tiled in iridescent blues, greens and gold.

Balin snatched up some robes and hurriedly dressed Ori. Ori was two blinks away from being horrified when he realized these were noble wedding clothes. He choked but Balin smiled and smoothly explained as he continued to dress, primp, and sort Ori from matching boots to his hair.

“Well, you see, m’dear, it was all a long time ago. Adad never approved of me bookishness, nor that I was utterly disinterested in any of th’ dams of ‘our set’ as he would say. He contracted a marriage with a Firebeard dam f’r me an’ Mam made these bridal clothes.

“As everythin’ was ready, we only had t’ wait f’r me wife-t’be t’ arrive from Mount Dolmed. Amad, Adad an’ King Thror with Dwalin, Thorin an’ meself went f’r th’ ceremony in that beautiful inn by th’ great lake in th’ Dale f’r a final time together before me new wife took me back to th’ Blue Mountains.

“To our combined surprise, me wife-t’be was already there. Most unfortunate. Apparently, she’d decided th’ rooms she’d been given wouldn’t do an’ took over th’ rooms reserved f’r King Thror. Needless t’ say th’ marriage was called off when our king was ushered int’ a scene of debauchery between me wife-t’be an’ her elfin lover. He was half elf, half man from Imladris. Believe his name was ‘Star-dome’ or somethin’.”

Ori swallowed. Even he had heard of the far off Last Homely House and its mysterious lord.

“I’m very sorry for you, brother. If these clothes give you sad memories-”

Ori held out the surcoat he wore.

“Nonsense, laddie,” Balin beamed. “These robes were made by me adad with great love an’ they mark th’ happiest day of me life. Me adad went int’ a rage an’ told me I was never t’ marry a dam! Such a relief!”

Balin straightened the collar before placing the medallion of the House of Fundin about Ori’s neck.

“I was small like yeh back then an’ these robes do look well on yeh, m’dear.”

Balin turned Ori to face the full-length, three-way mirror at the front of the dressing room. Ori stared at his reflection in disbelief and delight as Balin carefully arranged his hair into the proper braids of accomplishment.

The bridal clothing was made in the ancient dwarrow traditions. The linen was as soft as breath against his skin. The colors of the Fundin House were deep where they touched his body at the shoulders down to the thighs but faded to the cream of the raw fabric at his heart, as was right, because now he was part of the family but he was new to them so the colors were not completely saturating his entire dress.

“Balin, what are we .. ? Why I am-?”

“Oh, it’s just f’r th’ ceremony, dear.”

“Ceremony?” Ori felt nauseous. “What ceremony, please? We’re supposed to be going to Dori’s!”

“We are, m’dear. But ceremony first.”

“But-”

“Oh, not t’ worry, m’dear. It’s just a little thing with th’ Guard. Dwalin’s Captain of th’ Royal Guard and Protecter of Dale, so it’s considered a polite gesture on his part to present yeh publicly t’ his main cadre of soldiers. Now don’t look like that, dear. They’re no’ going t’ eat yeh. All that’ll happen is yeh’ll be walked by ‘em, they’ll congratulate yeh, th’ older ones may tease gently but all yeh need do then is blush. It’ll please ‘em no end.”

Balin finished the get-up with some soft, doeskin boots like leather socks. Ori easily felt the floor through them.

“I think I’m going to be sick,” he whispered, mostly to himself.

“In these clothes, m’love? I don’t think so.”

* * *

Ori wasn’t quite shaking as Balin drove them up to the Dale and towards the main square and court house of the Master where this mad course of action set in motion. Ori’s heart sank. Those who had witnessed his shame before the Master might be present.
“Balin, this is where I offered myself to Calmar. They’ll know that.”
“Which is why we’re here, laddie. Now all yeh have t’ do is, when I stop th’ cart, hop out an’ get t’ Dwalin’s side as quick as yeh can, all righ’?”
“But—”
“That’s all yeh need t’ do, lad. We’ll take care of everythin’ else.”
Ori swallowed and sat still, clinging to the side of his seat, as for reason’s known only to himself, Balin set the pony to a gallop.

The shay hurtled into a square full of excited-looking Dale people, any number of nobility in and out of carts, on and off ponies, milling around, dressed in their finest, and the full cadre of King Thror’s guards, their helms, weapons and standard glowing in the red gold of the evening sun.

“Right, laddie, there’s Dwalin on th’ pony. See him?”
“Yes.”

“Soon as I stop this, off yeh go.”

The pony hopped to a standstill and Ori leapt free. He focused only on Dwalin as he ran a gauntlet of peers, nobles, townspeople, and military. He felt all their eyes on him. Dwalin seemed a beacon of safety before him.

“Dwalin!” he rasped out.

“Hello, me chuck,” Dwalin greeted him. “Yer lookin’ finer than a lava forge.”

Ori was about to answer when the pony flung up its head to look back at Dwalin and whinnied. Ori clung to Dwalin for dear life as the pony pranced a few steps then hopped in place a time or two.

“Quick muckin’ about, Harley!” Dwalin scolded without rancor. “We’re on parade, not at some jacksie pony version of a country dance.”

Harley flung his head back again, looked at Dwalin, gave a snort and a foot stamp then rolled his eyes to look at Ori. Ori would swear to any who ever questioned him after that Harley winked. Dwalin guided Harley forward. Ori gulped, staring at the huge chair mounted on a low dray bedecked in gold, mithril and obsidian. Dis stood on one side of the seated king and Thorin on the other. On the steps of the Dale court house stood the Master, dressed in his most ostentatious clothing, with his thugs around him. Dwalin swung off the pony and held out his arms. Ori slid into them, unable to take his eyes from the aged king. Dwalin walked them forward keeping Ori’s hand firmly in his as they both bowed.

King Thror stared at them in silence. Ori instinctively pressed himself to Dwalin’s side. Dwalin pulled Ori in front of himself but kept his arms close around Ori’s waist.

“So,” rumbled King Thror, “the rumors are true. I can see the ink stains. A scribe, Captain Dwalin? Can you do no better?”

Ori felt Dwalin straighten.

“Me own brother, yer and yer grandson’s most valued advisor, began as a scribe, sire. I take it as an excellent example.”

King Thror watched them in a way that made Ori feel cornered.

“I hear among some, the other title would be ‘pup of a penniless slut’.”

Red swirled before Ori’s eyes. He felt Dwalin move. Ori remembered that if either of them raised their arms to their king, he and Dwalin would be spending the rest of their married life dead. Ori white-knuckled Dwalin’s arms about him, keeping the larger dwarf from springing, as Dwalin snarled.

“Then some may be lookin’ t’ have their tongues cut out.”

King Thror laughed.
“Ori heard himself say, ‘If it was a true concern of honor in the Court of Erebor, your majesty, why then do ‘some’ not come forward to make their complaint?’”

King Thror snickered and folded his hands then looked directly at Ori.

“Come here.”

Ori looked up at Dwalin, who released him but followed closely as Ori went to the edge of the dray.

King Thror peered down into Ori’s face, searching, rather as Dis had when telling him of his amad.

“What’s your name then, cosset?”

“Ori of the Brothers Ri, son of Rikmha, at your service, sire,” Ori stated clearly and automatically held out his hand.

King Thror looked at the proffered hand, smirked and, leaning forward, grasped Ori’s in a cold, dry clasp. Despite the size and amount of armor and other metals there was little or no strength in the grip. Ori tightened lightly then released. The old monarch regarded him.

“Ye’ve more spit in ye than old Rikut’s other grandsons.”

“I have no knowledge of them, sire.

Thror stared.

“Who’s your adad?”

“I don’t know, sire.

“Who raised yeh? Which of Rikut’s boys?

“My amad, Rikmha, then my own elder brothers, sire.

“Who are they?”

Dori and Nori, sire.”

“Who were their adads?”

“I don’t know, sire.”

King Thror snorted

“Aye, yer little Rikmha’s spit. An’ freckles. She should have done right by you and taken what was offered. Do any of you blame her, for you should?”

“I haven’t the pleasure of understanding you, sire.”

“She should have taken what I offered and at least ye’d have had a proper home. It’d’ve been in prison with a single prisoner to be ada to all a’ yeh, but yeh’d have been in the mountain.”

Ori clenched his teeth, holding himself in check, wishing he had Dori’s strength to knock this dwarf with all the sensibilities of a goblin off his seat.

Dwalin growled and moved but Ori grabbed the warrior’s hand again.

“Amad, with my brothers’ help, always made sure there was a roof over our heads and food on the table and, when she left us for the Great Halls, my brothers saw to it we had a home, sire. Neither Amad nor any of us were anyone’s prisoner.”

Thror grunted.

“Aye, she said as much when I offered. Said she’d rather die a in a pauper’s bed with adadless pups to tend her. I told her I’d like to see that.”

Ori wanted to cry but his tight hold on Dwalin and hearing Dwalin hissing curses helped.

“Had we known of your wish, sire, my brothers would have sent an invitation for your viewing pleasure over sixty years ago.”

“I’m sure Rikut, for all his talk-“

“Did nothing for us, sire. I wouldn’t know this Rikut person to speak to or even recognize in the streets.”

The king stared at Ori.

“You speak the truth, pup?”

“Yes, sire.”

The old king sighed. He waved his hand to Thorin, saying, “I’m too old to hear such.”

Thorin didn’t budge.

“Boy!” the king barked, “be you blind and deaf these days?”
“Udad,” Thorin pitched his voice for the gathered crowd to hear, “we and the good people of Dale have come together this day to witness you giving your blessing to my dearest friend, cousin, and brother at arms and his new husband. We are all eagerly waiting to celebrate this moment.”

“As am I, Udad,” Dis added.

Thror cursed then ordered Ori and Dwalin nearer and told them to stand together.

As the Khuzdul words of royal blessing were said over himself and Dwalin, Ori tried to appreciate them but on the inside he was still shaking with rage. When he and Dwalin stood back to let the royal dray roll away, Ori managed to calm his breathing. The crowd cheered and shouted congratulations. The court house bell rang out and all children of men ran about tossing handfuls of rolled oats high over the couple as a sign of good fortune.

Thorin and Dis approached them. Dis pulled Ori into her arms and turned him.

“Now, Ori, here’s someone much better fun than Udad.”

Ori turned to the dam before him. She was easily the finest, most beautiful dam Ori had ever laid eyes on. Her hair and beard were a ruddy brown, intricately braided and beaded with gold and rubies. She was almost as wide as she was tall. Her braids marked her as a worker in gold, an accomplished cook and baker, a birthing dam, and amad. Ori recognized her birthplace medallion as Blue Mountains, her husband as the richest dwarf in Erebor, and mischievous eyes as young Gimli’s amad.

She held out both hands to Ori and he shyly offered his own to be grasped then his left to be tucked firmly across her arm.

“Well, Sweet Daughter of the Maker! The way this day has been progressing I quite thought I’d never meet you, my little butty! It’s been that busy and here I am stuck. Yes, my lady, stuck!” turning to nod at Lady Dis, who was stifling laughter behind her hands, “hearing what a sweet little chook you’ve turned out to be to her.”

Dis did giggle at that point and took Ori’s other arm to hold with her own.

“Ori, this is Gridr, she is officially my first lady-in-waiting but tends more toward my friend, helper, second amad to my boys, and all around keep-me-in-line and behaving when Udad is present.”

Both dams laughed delightedly at each other. Lady Gridr turned about.

“Now, Dwalin, stop standing about with Thorin, you both make the place untidy. We need this ceremony done soon or your guards will fall asleep waiting.”

Dwalin smirked at Lady Gridr.

“I’ll do th’ damn ceremony as soon as Dis an’ yeh gimme me husband back already.”

Dis and Gridr looked at each other then at Ori. Gridr flicked the tip of her nose with her thumb at Dwalin.

“No, we’re keepin’ him! Learn t’ cope and get on with this before Balin there dies of old age.”

Balin widened his eyes as he stood next to Thorin and Dwalin.

“Me very, very dear Mistress Gridr, yer settled, married, an’ have a growing son. Why th’ unseemly need f’r hasty action from males?” Dwalin and Thorin roared in with the lewdest laughter Ori had ever heard. Gridr and Dis were not far behind. Gridr kissed her fingertips to Balin.

“Why, my very dearest lord! You know I was speaking to Dwalin as such, being new wed and all. I would never think to ask for any sort of speed from one such as yourself . . . age be damned, of course.”

Dis shrieked delightedly. Dwalin was about bent double. Ori cottoned on to what was being implied and blushed to his toes.

Balin winked at Gridr and bowed with a flourish in reply.

Gridr tucked Ori closer.

“Now you just never listen to Balin. He’s nowt but a dirty old lecher. You let Dwalin take care of you. Just be your soft little self and he’ll be good and hard until you tell him t’ melt.”

Ori thought his face was going to boil off and Dwalin removed Ori from the two laughing dams. “Enow with yer smut, th’ pair a’ yeh. Gimme him here “

Ori leaned against Dwalin, horribly embarrassed but now giggling. Dwalin put an arm about his shoulders and led him over to the cavalcade of soldiers.

The commander at the starting end was a terrifying looking dwarf with muscles like Dwalin, wider and more heavily scarred. He peered in at Ori with his one eye. Dwalin introduced him. Ori bowed his head slightly. To his surprise, the commander grinned, touched his armored glove to his own lips, touched his marriage bead then reached out to run his finger down Ori’s braid while murmuring the seven bridal blessings.

As though in a dream, Ori was walked along the line of soldiers, introduced and blessed. Furf’nk was there with a huge grin for Ori. Those who were married touched their marriage beads then his in the old symbol of offering their happiness and good fortune to a newlywed.

Unmarried ones just bowed their heads, blessed Ori and usually made a smart remark to Dwalin. Some older soldiers stood with their offspring and fewer with their grandchildren. Those few times the grandparent would bless then gently tug on Ori’s braid then proceed to tug the hair of the child where their marriage braid may be then tease and tell the younger to hurry up or say this would be ‘luck’ for them.

The outpouring of respect and caring was overwhelming. Ori was glad of Dwalin’s arm about him as well as the wise-cracking presences of Lady Gridr and Lord Balin behind them. Those guards who had been with Dwalin when Ori was at the Master’s made no remark beyond what others had already said.

Ori was both sad and relieved when the end of the parade was before him, though he did get quite the surprise when he realized it was Prince Frerin standing before them. The prince bowed slightly and mumbled something before Ori was glomped on by Kili, who erupted from behind his idad. Frerin was rudely shoved aside as the young dwarf pounced at Ori.

“Ori! Isn’t this a wonderful ceremony?! Did you know I was in the Guard with Dwalin? Isn’t this exciting?! Lady Gridr, we never call her that, only imad, made a cake this afternoon and won’t let Fili and I have any until you’re there, too!”

“Kee, stop squashing Ori!” Gridr scolded as she pried Kili off Ori.

Kili looked hurt.

“I get to hug him! He’s my cousin now! Well, sort of.”

“Cousin? You and Fee’s cousin? How do you come by that, leveret?”

“We call Dwalin idad sometimes as he’s like Thorin’s brother. Balin, too.”

“Laddie, that’d make him yer idad too.” Dwalin pointed out.

Kili brushed that aside.

“Ori’s not idad aged, so that makes him a cousin-in-law.” Kili added the ‘in-law’ as an after thought.

Dwalin and Thorin looked at each other and snorted.

“My son,” Lady Dis interrupted, “I do not know what to fear more: your concept of family relationships or your complete disregard for common Westron grammar.”

“I’d stick him with both, Mam,” Fili put in, but that statement didn’t stop the older prince from embracing Ori just as enthusiastically as his brother. Both Fili and Kili stayed clamped to Ori as they were teased and scolded by Lady Gridr, who also thanked Ori for helping her young Gimli that afternoon.

Ori glanced over to where Dwalin, Balin, and Thorin were having what looked like an important discussion with several of the commanders. Ori wondered what was going on. If a parade was merely for show why use it to have such discussions? Then Ori wondered about the fact that the parade was at the Dale court house in the evening, especially as … Ori’s brain slowed weakly.

Especially as the Master and his thugs bore witness. When Ori glanced about they were still watching nervously from the court house steps. These same thugs had see him offer himself to the Master in trade for his brother’s life, offer himself as a plaything to Calmar three days past. Now they saw him back here with Dwalin in the company of the royal family dressed in new bridals as the captain’s husband.

A strange, fierce pride suddenly bubbled up in Ori. He had left this place in shame but now there was no question he was honorably and properly married. He was acceptable in the highest circles of dwarf society. Yes, he had come from low beginnings but it was not a matter that his family had no name, he was respectable.

Ori straightened his shoulders and lifted his eyes to stare back at them, unashamed, the medallion of the House of Fundin against his heart, the mithril marriage bead glowing in the evening light.

Ori made himself look coldly at those who had derided him and those once sneering gazes dropped with respect and heads bowed with only courteous murmurs to be heard.

Ori took a deep breath and walked slowly back to his captain’s side. He caught hold of Dwalin’s wrist and held it as he slowly and purposefully slid his hand into Dwalin’s in full view of all. Dwalin other hand covered his.

“Love?” Ori raised his eyes and smiled. “Our family is waiting for us.”
Dori and Nori, Danger and Knickers.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends! You're just in time for another... Dinner party!
Yes, the Fundin Brothers and the Brothers Ri enjoy a nice, quiet family dinner. Nope!

This is a longer chapter as it's full of all kinds of action, adventure, and most importantly, food!

Your hint is the movie "A Wonderful Life"

Do let us know what you think so far, friends! And keep those cards and letters coming!

It was strange to watch Dori’s house come into view as the shay turned from Steam Square down Steam Street to Steam Alley. Dwalin rode beside them on Harley, who gave the impression that he was Middle Earth’s Happiest Pony.

Ori was slowly getting used to riding in the shay. He had never done so before today, nor had he ridden a pony. To be moving so far off the ground was unnerving enough, but Balin’s pony, Ducati, seemed incapable of going any slower than a fast trot.

Dwalin swung off Harley and looped his reins on the boot scraper at the front door. He caught Ducati’s reins when Balin tossed them out and put her next to Harley before coming to the cart and lifting Ori down.

Balin took a large bunch of carrots from the wide basket mounted behind the seats of the shay and handed them to Dwalin who dropped them down for the ponies. Balin passed Ori a beautiful little straw cage containing two very intelligent looking birds, one sparrow and one wren. Dwalin took the three bottles of wine, which came out next, and Ori a pretty box. The design declared it to be from a bakery and the sweet, sugary scent emerging made Ori’s mouth water.

Balin closed the shay basket, holding a deep rush bag. Through the woven grasses Ori thought he saw bread, fruit and what might be a haunch of some kind.

The front door flew open.

“Ori! My dear, dear lad!”

Hands still full, Ori found himself crushed to Dori’s chest, his feet dangling freely. Ori stifled a giggle as Dori kissed both his cheeks loudly and sloppily

“Oh, my little badger, I’ve been that worried! Are you all right? Have you been frightened?”

“Oh, laddie, have yeh not written t’ yer poor brother?” Balin’s friendly tone chimed in.

Dori put Ori down to look at Balin and Ori managed to squirm into the house, so everyone had to follow. Ori felt a tad guilty, as he’d never seen Dori so fussy since he left his tweens.

Their one room of seating and kitchen was just the same. Ori sniffed. Granny pie for dinner!
Balin put his burden down on the table and proceeded to gently thump foreheads with Dori and embraced him.

“How dreadful that yeh were worrying needlessly,” said Balin. “Th’ young’re so thoughtless when they’re in th’ midst of excitement. If I’d known I’d’ve either stopped ‘round ’r at least dropped yeh a note.”

“Why- he did, but- thank you,” Dori managed, looking both surprised, pleased, and, strangely enough, as though he and Balin had met before. Ori wondered if Balin patronized the Dale forge. Dori hadn’t mentioned Lord Balin’s name before, but then, Ori reflected naughtily, Balin was extremely handsome by dwarrow standards.

“Balin,” he spread his arms wide and bowed low, the charming smile never leaving his face. “Son of Fundin an’ this lummox’s elder brother.”

Balin reached over and caught Dori’s hands again and patted them while Dori beamed at Dwalin.

Dwalin put the wine on the kitchen counter and took Ori’s burdens from him. Ori looked up at Dwalin, who rolled his eyes, then pulled a bratty child’s disgusted face. Ori giggled. Dwalin wink at him, turned back to his brother and said in a genial tone,

“Fuck yeh, Balin.”

To Ori’s surprised, Dwalin offered his hand and when Dori clasped it, congenially thumped foreheads with him. Then Dori turned, clasped Ori’s hands and stood a little back, admiring him. Ori blushed and tears showed in Dori’s eyes.

“You look beautiful, pet. Just beautiful.”

Ori couldn’t stand it any more and pounced on Dori for another hug. Releasing him, Dori went into full fuss mode and together, with Balin, they removed Ori’s outer robes and popped a clean shirt of Nori’s on him instead. Satisfied, Dori turned back to the table and gaped at the pile on it.

“What in Mahal’s name?”

“I thought it best,” Balin explained, “seeing as th’ original plan was, I think, just Dwalin bringing Ori. Now you have both of us an’ he,” pausing to raise a dramatic eyebrow in Dwalin’s direction, “can eat half an ox. I thought I’d save yer larder a little. By my beard, it does smell quite luscious in here.”

Balin sniffed about eagerly. Ori thought he made it look as though he was sniffing Dori.

“Is it granny pie, Dori?” Ori asked.

“Yes, my love.” Dori smiled, though he was looking at Balin the entire time.

Ori felt relieved that Dori seemed to approve of Balin at least.

“Where’s Nori?” Ori asked.

“Upstairs sleeping off his indisposition.” Dori wrinkled his nose then turned to Balin, who released the two birds onto the window sill and turned his attention back to the table. “Why, Master Balin! Is that a venison haunch?”
“Yes, Master Dori, smoked and ready. I hope you have a care for venison?”

“Why, Master Balin, this is too kind of you. I hardly know how to thank you.”

“I’m sure th’ pair a yeh’ll think a somethin’,’” Dwalin commented.

“Dori, you’re so good with blade smithing, perhaps you could make him something,” Ori suggested, while he put the haunch in the oven with the pie. “Balin, you can’t imagine how gifted Dori is with his hands.”

Ori wanted his new family to know they were exemplary dwarrow.

“Of that I have no doubt.” Balin smiled at Dori.

“Well, I certainly hope I would never disappoint, Master Balin.” Dori favored Balin with a naughty grin.

“Will the pair a yeh just find a room already. Me and our Ori’re hungry f’r dinner.” Dwalin smirked at Ori.

Ori realized the connotations his helpful suggestion had brought about and blushed furiously. He busied himself with setting the table and finding dishes for the Balin-enhanced bounty. He kept his eyes down but he knew Balin and Dori continued to flirt and Dwalin watched them, arms folded, occasionally suggesting they go elsewhere and take full advantage of each other.

Dori finally excused himself to Balin, on a mission to get Nori, but from the noise upstairs Ori knew Dori had gone to his own room.

Balin turned to Ori.

“Yer brother’s a darling.”

“Yes he is,” Ori replied, suddenly feeling fiercely protective. He took a couple of deep breaths and tried to keep his voice calm. “If you hurt his feelings, I’ll manacle you to the desk permanently.”

Dwalin laughed.

Ori nearly jumped as Balin turned Ori so they faced each other.

“Laddie, I’d never do such a thin’, so no feelin’ angry with me now.”

Balin’s face was entirely serious and full of tenderness.

Ori hugged him immediately.

“I-I know. It’s just, he’s my Dori and he raised me. I have a very small family, Balin, and-”

“An’ now yeh’ve more in Dwalin an’ meself.” Balin rested his forehead against Ori’s. “All right now, laddie?”

“Yes. I’m sorry I snapped at you.”

“Nonsense, laddie. Just know that, at th’ moment, yer Dori an’ I’re merely amusin’ ourselves with flattery. An’ speaking o’ flattery, Master Dori, those beard beads’re marvelous! Wherever did yeh get them?”
Ori looked, his eyes widening. Dori had apparently washed, brushed, and changed clothes in a matter of moments; he was now perfectly posed half way down the stair, resplendent in his good tunic and breeches of bright plum with garnet and gold beads intricate braided into his hair and beard.

Dori stopped, blinked rather confusedly at Balin’s question, then absently patted the adornments on his beard and smiled coyly.

“Oh! These old things? Why I only wear them when I don’t care how I look.”

“Rogue,” Balin laughed and went forward, offering his hand to escort Dori down the steps. Ori sidled over to Dwalin

“Those are Dori’s best,” he whispered.

“Th’ pair of ‘em are just bein’ silly t’ make th’ other laugh. Watch an’ see.”

Dori mocked a bow then laid his fingertips on Balin’s wrist and came the rest of the way down the stair all gracefulness until Ori noticed he had Nori by the ear, dragging the other along behind.

“Lemme go! I ain’t about to eat with a pair of sodding, cradle-snatching.”

“Nori! _Dear!”_ Ori heard the steely tone in Dori’s voice he only used when he was angry.

“These are our brothers! Balin and Dwalin are here for dinner.”

“I ain’t callin’ that prick of a captain brother!”

“Master Balin, my younger brother Nori. You must excuse him he’s feeling a trifle out of sorts.”

“I am not!”

“Of course, of course.” Balin smiled, ignoring Nori’s loud protests.

“Captain Dwalin, you remember Nori.”

“Nah, never seen ‘im before in me life.” Dwalin nodded to Ori, who grinned, remembering Dwalin’s promise when he’d burned Nori’s file.

Dori just tittered and Nori went into full roar.

“I won’t eat with this dirty great brother-napper! He’s a rake and a bully and he’s probably bruised our baby brother’s bottom like a cave troll in a well.”

Dwalin growled, but Dori dragged Nori over to the table and sat him down with such force the sturdy chair creaked dangerously. Nori whimpered that now his bottom hurt.

To continue Ori’s surprise, instead of seating himself at the head of the table, Dori sat Balin there, waving Ori to sit with Dwalin, who settled at the foot. There were only four chairs and Dori perched on the kitchen stool. He got up a moment later to fetch the pie out of the oven as Balin helped with the haunch. Ori quickly switched his chair for the stool.

“Ori, dear,” Dori started, placing the steaming golden pie on the table.
Ori just grinned at him and scooted closer to the table and sniffed eagerly at the pie.

“Where’d yeh want this, Dori?” Dwalin asked, a small keg of ale in his arms.

Nori rose out of his chair.

“It goes on the stool, so you better let Ori have your chair. It’s only proper.”

“Nori!” said Dori and Balin at once, frowning.

Dwalin grinned like a wolf at Nori. He turned to Ori, putting the keg on the table.

“It can balance on the sofa back,” Ori said quickly.

Dwalin gave him a naughty look then offered his hands to Ori.

“No’ a problem. Here Ori, we’ll put this on th’ stool jus’ as our Nori insists an’ yeh come sit on me knee.”

Dwalin dropped into his chair and swung ’round to face Ori, patting his right knee invitingly while giving Ori a teasing look.

“C’mon me little nug-humper, sit on your honey-papa’s knee.”

Dori gave a horrified gasp and snatched Ori back into his seat. Nori lunged forward across the table and seized the keg to balance it on the couch back before crashing into his seat.

“Brother, please!” Balin chided.

“Honey-what?” Ori asked sliding closer to Dwalin.

Dwalin laid his hands on Ori’s waist, drawing the smaller dwarf close and parking him on his right thigh.

Ori was first and foremost startled by the heat. Dwalin’s body was warm. Very warm. Ori felt himself blush as Dwalin’s heat smoothed through Ori’s breeches to curl around his butt. Ori twisted to lean his elbow on Dwalin’s shoulder.

“Nug-humper? Since when am I a rabbit trapped in a forge? And what was the last one?”

“Ori, don’t encourage him. Sit down properly,” Dori said.

“I’ll tell yeh later,” Dwalin promised.

“No, you won’t!” Dori snapped.

Ori glanced at his brothers then looked at Dwalin.

“Later as in bed?”

“Ori!”

“Aye, if yeh like.”

“Dwalin!” Balin scolded. “This is no’ a dirty low drinking pit in Gondor. This’s a respectable dwarrow household. Neither Master Dori nor meself wish t’ hear such language again! Am I no’ correct, Master Dori?”
“Oh, you are quite correct, Master Balin.”

“Thank yeh, Master Dori.”

“You’re quite welcome, Master Balin. Your intervention is most appreciated.”

“Me pleasure, Master Dori.”

And with that Dori began to serve the pie and bade Balin to carve the roast, if he would be so kind.

Nori snorted, “It ain’t right this marriage.”

“We both agreed to it, Nori,” Ori reminded him.

“Aye, fine. What if you fall in love or your Heartsong turns up in a week or so?”

“Nori, please!” Dori gasped.

Balin raised his eyebrows, clearly surprised that Nori would so easily speak of what was so private in the dwarrow world.

“Well, I’m thinkin’ of our Ori. What if he does and he’s chained to that arsehole? Yeh think I want t’ see out Ori’s heart broken?”

“Nori,” Balin said gravely, “yeh know as well as th’ rest a’ us that th’ marriage law in Erebor an’ th’ other dwarrow kingdoms release a spouse if a Heartsong’s found an’ also in th’ case of love outside a’ arranged marriage. We’ll leave violence an’ other such things out of th’ picture f’r now. None’d be so cruel as t’ forbid either.”

“So you’d release him?” Nori demanded of Dwalin who frowned.

“’Course I would, provided the One met me provisions.”

“What?” Dori and Nori cried together.

“Ori’d have to ask f’r release,” Dwalin stated firmly and looked straight at Ori. “Freely an’ of yer own will. I need t’ know that yeh’d want t’ go an’ be with yer One or love.”

“Thank you,” Ori replied, wondering how someone would not desire to be with their Heartsong or love.

“Good,” Balin murmured.

"Any’d rather be with their One,” Nori snapped.

Balin and Dwalin looked at each other, then Balin gave the barest of nods and Dwalin sighed and, to Ori’s surprise, clasped his hand.

“Aye, well, our adad an’ mam were Heartsongs.”

“But that can’t be,” Ori tried. “I heard Balin say he was cruel to you as a badger.”

“He was, an’ t’ Balin, an’ he’d beat our mam. An’ that’s why I tell yeh now that I’ll be havin’ a full investigation as t’ how yeh’ll be treated, be it Heartsong or love.”
Dori cleared his throat. “Well, Master Dwalin, that’s very thoughtful of you and I have no doubt that you’ll be keeping Nori and myself apprised of whatever you find out.”

“’Course.” Dwalin nodded.

“Well then, now we’ve finished with that-” Dori began.

“Wait,” cried Ori and colored a little when everyone turned to stare at him.

“What about you?” Ori looked at Dwalin.

Dori tut-tutted.

“You’d just come back home to us, pet.”

Dwalin seemed to ponder a moment then looked Ori in the eye.

“Yeh’ve nothin’ t’ worry ‘bout, a’right?”

“Fine by us,” Nori barked.

“But you might find your Heartsong,” Ori insisted.

Dwalin just smiled.

“Which brings us,” Dori chimed in, “to the rather annoying discussion of your being a soldier. What happens to Ori if you go off fighting and, Mahal forbid naturally, get yourself killed?”

“Both Balin and Thorin are avowed t’ me that if need be they’d care f’r him. If he is to come back here t’ yer house, he’s entitled t’ my estate, includin’ wealth, forge, my side of the mines, and the keep up in Blue Mountain.”

“Oi, Ori. Want me t’ just, ye’ know!” Nori mimed a stabbing Dwalin in the ribs.

Both Dwalin and Nori laughed but a wave of white hot pain shot through Ori. He slammed to his feet.

“You shut right up, Nori! That’s not funny!”

Nori stared at him, aghast.

Dwalin put his hands on Ori’s shoulders, sitting him gently down.

“Easy, love, he’s only jokin’.”

“It was mean,” Ori argued, furious with Nori and the tears he could feel burning in his eyes.

Dwalin took both Ori’s hands and smiled.

“Oh, c’mon now, love. Yeh really think f’r one moment our Nori could get th’ drop on me?”

Ori giggled at that, swiped at his eyes and sniffed.

“Good point. You’re right.”

“Well and we all know the silly badger would never dream of such,” Dori put in with a tender smile to Ori and a blazing stink eye at Nori.
Nori gulped, half-laughed and nudged Dwalin’s elbow.

“Aye, li’le un! Even Dwalin here knows I was just having me joke.”

“There ye are.”

Dwalin squeezed Ori’s hands once more.

Dori served Balin first, then Ori, Dwalin and Nori then himself, but then he put more grannie pie on Ori’s plate.

“Eat up, darling. Being hungry is making you all silly.”

Nori tore into the venison as though it was his last meal.

Both Dwalin and Balin declared grannie pie delicious but wondered at the name.

“Grannies can make goodness out of anything,” Dori explained.

Ori took a bite and savored it. The crust was oat flour mixed with dripping, inside a delectable mix of chunks of potato, parsnip, onion, leeks, carrot, and turnips with chicken stock thickened with oat flour and flavored with salt, watercress, and plenty of ground pepper root.

Everyone was tucking in while Balin started discussing forge work with Dori.

“Master Dori, our Ori here says yeh’ve a gift f’r th’ blade.”

“Oh, well, Master Balin, I do my best.”

“May I ask yer indulgence, Master Dori, t’ look over this blade I came across in me travels? It has a most strange patina.”

Balin drew out an impressive dagger, the blade of which was encrusted with a chalky white substance. Balin used a thumbnail to scrape off some. Ori watched as the pale flakes, each oddly shaped, fell from the blade.

“Aren’t these strange, Master Dori?” Balin pushed the various detritus into a line then held the dagger out to Dori.

Dori stared at the line of flakes, raised an eyebrow at Balin then examined the dagger. It didn’t look to be that interesting.

Dori’s face drew into a moue of disinterest as he moved two or three of the flakes into a line beneath the first.

“I can see why you would think it to be quite exotic, Master Bain. The artisan has used pig iron as a base to give it that early first age look. The flakes are known as carrot mold as it turns an orange color over time. It’s easily cleaned with a solution of vinegar and natron, shaken vigorously.”

Balin applauded Dori and swept the dagger, holder and flakes into the bag he had brought it in.

“Wonderful! Thank yeh most sincerely, m’dear Master Dori.”

“Oh, please don’t mention it, Master Balin.”

Dori excused himself to hurry upstairs. Ori stared as his elder brother returned down with the “Dori?” Ori started.

“Well, pet. I can’t just sit about. Need to have my knitting with me don’t I? Nori! Don’t be such a warg with the venison. I would like at least a small taste of it!”

Dori sat down again with the box on the floor between his knees, fluffing his long tunic to cover it.

* * *

“…An’ he picked th’ locks quick as quick wide open. Rusted shut they were. Dwalin’s best locksmith said there’d be no way t’ open ‘em again,” Balin ended chuckling.

Ori swirled his finger through the remains of the honey topping from the pastry left on his plate. As chagrined as he felt, he was beginning to think Balin rather liked telling the story of how he and Ori ‘met’. Ori glanced about. There was nothing but a few bits of crust left of the grannie pie. Half the haunch was eaten away. Dwalin sliced the rest of it, put it onto buttered bread and placed it at Nori’s elbow. Nori was eating vaguely, totally bound by Balin’s tales. Dori was similarly taken in and didn’t notice Balin subtly sliding extra food onto his host’s plate.

A happy warmth filled Ori. Never had he seen anyone care for himself or his brothers the way Dwalin and Balin were now.

Ori reflected that along with the public announcement of his marriage this afternoon, not only had the House of Fundin restored Ori’s reputation, but now it was spreading its wealth to enrich Dori and Nori. Ori pondered that, although he had not been ready to marry, and he still didn’t know Dwalin that well, he was ready to give this his best over the next two years. He blushed thinking that the time he had spent with Dwalin had not diminished how much he still fancied the older dwarf, especially since he now knew Dwalin also held him in great regard.

There was one bottle of wine left and Nori pulled the tap out of the barrel to get the last of the ale. Dori was busy telling Balin that Nori had all the classic symptoms of middle child syndrome and what was Dori to do?

“Have yeh a cellar?” Balin enquired.

“I tried that. He tamed the rats, taught them to race and began to make book. Highly illegal.”

“Oi,” said Nori.

Dwalin rattled a small bag he’d drawn from his pocket and drew Nori’s attention. When Nori sat down again Dwalin tossed him the bag, Nori’s eyes lit up as he emptied the dice out of the pouch.

Ori watched them throw but he thought Dwalin looked distracted, as though he was listening or waiting for something to happen. Then Ori heard tiny rustling noises. His mind raced as he tried to think of a way to tell Dwalin without his brothers noticing. He swallowed and shuffled closer and leaned against Dwalin.

“I’m sleepy,” he announced and settled himself in a way so he could whisper in Dwalin’s ear.
“There’s someone or two outside,” he murmured.

Dwalin hrumphed and cleared his thought before muttering back, “Aye, they’re getting’ in position. Be ready.”

Ori gave the barest nod and stayed seated. He adjusted his stance, so Dwalin could move quickly if needed. Dwalin exchanged a glance with Balin and tossed the dice again with an extra flick of his wrist. The dice fell in perfect nines. Nori roared in protest, saying the dice must be uphills. Both Balin and Dori exclaimed loudly that Nori was being silly. Ori heard the knock at the front door once then twice. Balin and Dori continued to talk and laugh loudly at Nori’s arguments.

The third time someone was obviously getting impatient and banging on the door.

“Did you hear something?” Dori asked

“Oh, probably just squirrels, m’dear,” Balin teased. “I hear they’re quite violent this time o’ year.”

Dori shouted with laughter as Dwalin bellowed over it

“Don’t be daft, Balin! Aren’t any about this side a’ town! Me guard took ’em out last month.”

“I think it’s the bloody door!” Nori roared, staring at Balin and Dwalin as thought the pair had lost their minds.

“Oh!” Dori gasped, pink-cheeked and wide-eyed. “I do believe you’re right, Nori, do be a dear and open it. I’m all fankled up with my knitting at the moment.”

Dori hauled out some knitting and, knocking over a wine bottle, made a pile of some of the plates.

“What?” Nori started.

“Nori, dear!”

“Aye, aye! Hold yer carts. I’m comin’.”

Nori opened the door and was knocked over by group of about six men, three of whom Ori recognized as the Master’s thugs.

“Got yeh this time, bastard.”

The lead thug grabbed Nori.

Dori screamed dramatically. Ori stare at him. Dori never screamed.

“Oi.”

The group looked up. There was Dwalin playing with the dice box, sitting tipped back in his chair, boots now on the table.

“What yeh lot think yer doin’?”

The first thug gulped. “Captain Dwalin! Er, sir, I- We’re apprehending this thief, of course, sir…er captain.”

“Thief?” Dwalin asked genially. “He’s been here all evening with us.”
“We know he has evidence leading to a syndicate of thieves, captain. We’re takin’ him in f’r questionin’!”

“Why?” Dwalin asked, still playing with the dice box.

“Well.” The thug looked a little confused the straightened. “We need to search the place and take all occupants into custody to be questioned with regarding connections to a crime syndicate.”

“All occupants, soldier?” Dwalin raised his eyebrow with a smile.

The group of men laughed a bit uncertainly.

Dwalin turned to Dori.

“Our Dori, d’ yeh mind havin’ yer house searched f’r evidence leadin’ t’ a syndicate a’ thieves?”

Dori tittered, “Oh Mahal, really, captain, how funny you are!”

The thugs growled.

Dwalin shrugged and Dori finished his line and laughed.

“Oh, very well. Be sure you check under my bed for the strong box and don’t forget the false board in Nori’s room, end of the corridor, the squeaky board in the middle. And do show us the evidence you find.”

Dori looked back at Balin. “Now I am most intrigued, what are we connected with? Smuggling ponies, perhaps? Nori, I just thought you were too lazy to clean your room! How do you keep the ponies so quiet?”

Nori gaped at his brother then laughed slightly hysterically.

“Well, ye know, straw, whisky, er… yer mornin’ porridge!” he flashed at Dori.

Dori widened his eyes playfully.

“Well, now I understand why you weren’t getting fat! Three bows full every morning!” this to Balin.

They could all hear the squad rummaging around upstairs, a sprinkling of cuss words then a shout of triumph.

Nori turned pale and looked pleadingly at Dori. Dori added a thread of green to the yellow worsted he was knitting. Ori frowned. There was no way in all Arda he would wear a scarf that looked like it was made of snot.

The thugs rushed down with a small thin box and a larger one.

The lead thug placed them on the table before Dwalin, who ignored them, smiling at Ori. Ori wasn’t too sure what game was being played so he decided in favor of shyly lowering his eyes and fiddling with the crochet hook and a pretty blue cord Dori had passed him. Dwalin tickled him under the chin and Ori giggled in spite of himself.

“Captain?”

Dwalin stroked one of the family braids in Ori’s beard.
“Captain?”

Dwalin chucked Ori under the chin, saying, “Gimme a minute, love.” Then slammed to his feet.

Despite being considerably shorter than the man, the thug still cowered away, fully aware an angry dwarf could make mincemeat of at least three men in an instant.

“What? An’ this be’er be good.”

“We found the evidence, captain. See?”

The lead thug tore open the slim box to reveal a sheaf of papers. Nori looked as though he as going to throw up. Dwalin went through the papers then threw them on the table.

“Ye’ve got to be jokin’!” he roared. “Evidence? This only show’s tha’ he spends a lot’ a time with a hand down his britches.”

The lead thug stared down. Ori looked, then looked again. At first he thought he was looking at grossly over colored anatomy prints of dams in rather scanty underclothing, but an instant later Dori cried out in horror and slapped his left hand over Ori’s head to cover his eyes.

“Put that disgusting pornography away at once! Nori! I’m ashamed of you! How could you allow such filth to be brought into this house? What if our Ori had seen it? You could have done terrible damage to his mind.”

Ori struggled to no avail to get away from Dori. He was beginning to think it was Dori’s mind that was terribly damaged at this point. Nori had brought such pictures home long ago and Dori shrugged, then pointed out to Nori that in the ones where the dam’s entrance could be seen meant that the dam had had to shave her area because of infection or infestation. Dori then told Ori in no uncertain terms that it was unwise to fall with any who had no hair in such areas as he might catch whatever they had.

Ori struggled away from Dori only to see the outraged thug shoving Nori’s hands full of the crumpled prints. Nori’s face worked but no clear thought pattern could be seen.

The furious searchers started on the other box.

“Now there’s no need for you to go through that one as you seen from the top it’s just my knitting!” Dori insisted.

Ori frowned. Dori’s voice was a shade higher and he wrung his hands as he rose. He reached out for the box but the thug smirked and snatched up the box and dumped the contents all over the table. Dori screamed louder than the last time as they all stared.

The new evidence consisted of material. In fact, it was his mam’s old underclothing, stockings, stays and some red velvet knickers.

The searching men gaped at the pile of lace and unmentionables now sloughed through the dinner dishes.

Dori stood there, fists clenched

“Well, sir. Are you finished?”

The lead thug looked confusedly at him.
Ori watched as Dori’s face went purple and there were tears in his eyes.

“Are you quite finished shaming me before my family and noble guests? You’ve flung my secrets on the dinner table, now perhaps you’d like to quote a price to my guests? All my life I’ve worked to put food on this table honestly and this is how people we all trust to keep us safe at night, this is how you thank me, you shame me like this!”

Dori’s voice had risen to a shriek at the thugs, all of whom looked horrified. Whether they were shocked at the ugliness of the revealed underclothing or they were all worried that they hadn’t realized Dori was actually a dam wasn’t clear. Ori wanted to laugh. Men were notorious for not being able to tell dwarrow gender apart. When dams went to sell their crafts in the Dale they always made sure to wear clothing that was recognizably female to the men.

“Enough!” Dwalin roared.

Balin took Dori in his arms and Dori sobbed loudly.

“If that’s it, yeh pack a’ ijits?” Dwalin glared.

“No, Captain. We’ve got a file on that one longer than my arm. He’s a criminal, sir.” The leader flailed an accusatory finger in Nori’s direction.

The lead thug and his second slunk to the corner as the rest rushed out to fetch the file, no doubt from the Master.

Ori and Nori looked at each other then quietly began repacking all their late mam’s dainties back into the large box. Dori appeared to be still sobbing into Balin’s shoulder but from the way his body was quivering and sniffing loudly, Ori could tell Dori was laughing fit to burst.

Balin seemed to cope with his humor by frowning horribly at the two accusers across the room. Ori wondered what Balin, Dwalin and Dori had planned.

Ori was just curious as to how Dori seemed to be ‘in’ on whatever Balin and Dwalin were doing.

There came a crashing of wheels and feet. The rest of the group arrived and they were all strangely quiet and white-faced.

“Ha!” The lead thug grinned maniacally. “Now, Captain, ye’ll see the evidence.”

“Good, ‘cause yer’ wastin’ my time an’ th’ judge’s here.”

“Not t’ mention tramplin’ on th’ good name o’ ‘n excellent young dwarf!” Balin snarled, patting Dori’s head a little harder than necessary as Dori made an agonized sound of sorrow more akin to an irritated duck.

“Well?” The leader looked to his minions as Dwalin rose, paused to nuzzle Ori’s throat, making him giggle involuntarily, and sauntered over.

Ori was feeling a little more in control of whatever it was they were doing and cooed delightedly, “Oooh, Captain!”

“Well?” Dwalin demanded.

The leader looked at his men, who settled an entire filing cabinet on the floor.
“Why in Eru’s name did yeh bring all this?” the leader asked.

“Because we couldn’t find it,” a minion whispered.

“Can’t find what?”

“We can’t find the file on that one, sir.”

“What do you mean you can’t find the file?!” the leader about screamed.

He wrenched open the cabinet and started rummaging.

“It was here!” he roared. “I added to it the day the Master called you lot to take that one’s thrice damned head off! You remember, captain?” to Dwalin

“Lad, yeh expect me t’ remember every soddin’ fool who’s committed a crime in Dale over me life?”

“Um.”

“Look, laddie, either there’s a file or there ain’t. Now which is it?”

There was a general murmuring among the guards, then one called out, “Who cares! We all know!”

Dwalin looked the group of eight over, then glared at the leader.

“Well, I know these three t’ be guards. Who in th’ Bloods’re th’ rest a’ these an’ why’re they now privy t’ Master Calmar’s files?”

The leader started to explain as well as argue with his compatriots for a few seconds before Dwalin roared for them all to shut the fuck up.

Dori rose.

“I need some tea after this horrific scene.”

He moved to the stove.

Ori noticed he was tottering and swaying.

Dori?” Ori moved toward him.

Dori turned and, with a hand pressed to his brow and the other to his chest, said in an oddly high pitched way, “Oh Mahal! I do believe I feel a trifle faint. Ori, pet, do get me some water, there’s a dear.”

Ori hurried to comply as Dori gasped, “Oh my! Oh my heart! Such spasms! I never felt so weak. Oh dear!”

Dori turned so the men had the full effect of his agony and then Dori promptly fainted dead away into Balin’s amazingly ready arms.

“Master Dori!” Balin cried out in a voice of horror. “Master Dori!”

“Sweet Mahal!” Nori leapt into action “NO! Not now! Yer so young and full of life!! Sweet brother! NO!"

“Don’t stand there li’ ijits,” Dwalin bellowed at the thugs. “Get him a healer!”

The men all knocked in to each other and one fell into the files, spilling them all over the floor. Ori flung himself down on the floor next to Dori, calling out his brother’s name. Nori was beside him, uselessly patting Dori’s hand.

“Try and cry,” Nori hissed in Ori’s ear.

Ori threw him a ‘don’t be stupid’ look but flung himself over Dori and buried his face in Dori’s tummy.

“Dori! Dori!” he wailed through the material.

“Get out a’ th’ way. Clear a space! Move!” Dwalin backed the men up. “Balin! Call tha’ sparrow in th’ yard. Send a note t’ Oin th’ Chief o’ Healing in Erebor. Let him know what’s happened then yeh an’ th’ lads get that poor sufferin’ creature t’ Oin as quick as ever yeh can.”

Dwalin started shoving the guards and the mess into a corner.

“Master Dori! Come now, open your eyes,” Balin pleaded.

Dori did so with a cry of shock.

“Oh, where am I? Am I dead?”

“Please don’t die, Dori!” Ori shouted.

Nori knelt with his face on the floor, yanking his hair and howling like an angry cat.

Balin and Ori assisted Dori to his feet. Ori kicked Nori’s boot and he hopped up with a curse.

“Get him a cloak ’r he’ll take a chill,” Balin ordered.

Nori threw Dori’s full length rain cloak with the purple hood on the invalid. Dori, slightly bent, panting laboriously, scooped up the strong box and hid it all under the cloak, out of sight of the men.

“Nori,” Dori quavered, “you stay here and straighten up like a good lad. Ori, pet, help me to the cart. Oh!”

Ori clutched Dori as they staggered out the front door and Dori landed back in Balin’s arms.

“Oh, Lord Balin,” Dori gasped, almost weeping again. “How kind you are! I don’t like to think what would have happened if I’d been here, all alone with my badgers! It’s too cruel to think of.”

“Right now, Master Dori,” Dwalin said gruffly, but with great gentleness, “yeh let me brother here take yeh t’ Master Oin. He’ll have yeh t’ rights in no time. Lemme help yeh over th’ wheels.”

Ori snuffled into his sleeves and collar, stopping at the doorsill to hug Nori.

Nori patted his back vigorously.

“Now, now, pip, you be brave for our Dori while he’s not well. I’ll take care a’ things here. Don’t you worry your pretty little head at all.”
Ori sniffed loudly and clenched Nori tight to hiss in his ear, “Fuck you, Nori.”

Nori resorted to his sleeve to hide a smirk.

Ori hurried to the cart. Dwalin turned from helping a rather overly clumsy Dori into the shay. Dwalin took Ori’s hand.

“Yeh help Balin take good care a yer Dori now. I’ll catch yeh up in a little bit after I help Nori here, then I kin escort yeh home.”

Ori ducked his head in a vain attempt not to giggle at the rather overdone leer and wink Dwalin gave him.

“Why you!” Ori paused then smirked. “You naughty captain!” he managed as Nori pushed him into the seat as Balin started the pony.
Fainting, ‘fessing up, and fright

Chapter Summary

Hello again, friends, and welcome back!

Dollypegs and I do apologize for this late posting! Things were frightfully busy and today is our first chance to sit down, stuff our faces with breakfast, and entertain you!

Because we worry, we would like to warn you this next chapter, though expressed in the past, does contain some things that may cause triggering in some readers. Unfortunately, the events related are integral to moving the plot along.

These contain violence, behavior that can be interpreted as stalking, and abortion.

On the flip side, there’s cake!!

Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori hung onto his seat and Dori as Ducati hurtled along, flashing through the main market toward the gates of the mountain.

Ori glanced behind. There was Harley at full gallop and Dwalin in his green hood. Then he realized that was not Dwalin. Whomever was on Harley, they were not as good a rider.

Ori whispered to Dori, who glanced back also.

“Nori,” he murmured to Ori. “I can tell. Never could ride a pony or anything like that. He gets all funny if it’s between his legs and not the other way around. Ori, pet, do look like you’re comforting me still. And try and look a bit more pitiful. Pretend you’re a badgerling again and Nori’s just spoilt your pen.”

They rode through the first resident gate of the royal living quarters and rolled up to the splendid sandstone and ruby encrusted door which, now looking closer, led to two grand houses occupying the same space. The rubies in the beaten gold plaque that stated the Sons of Groin lived there.

The ‘Dwalin’ rider caught up just as a spasming, tottering Dori was tenderly helped from the cart and half carried up the path. The double front door popped open and three dwarrow hurried out. A very familiar dwarf with brilliant red hair shouted for his son to take care of the cart and ponies. Gimli bounded past, nodded to Ori, and went about his work.

“Come right in,” said the third dwarf in a loud voice. “The surgery is ready. I’ve got all my instruments; we can begin the operation immediately.”

Dori gave a final bellow of sorrow and collapsed carefully backward and full length into three waiting pairs of arms.
Once they were safely inside and the door shut tight, Oin, who was very grey and as hard of hearing as Ori had heard, and his brother Gloin, Gimli’s da, introduced themselves and roared with laughter when Balin gave them an account of the men.

Gridr ordered them into a quiet, small sitting room. She took Dori’s cloak.

“Here we are. Do sit down, chook, you must be wore to a thread with all this espionage cafuffle. Now all formality aside, I’m Gridr and I know you’re our Ori’s dear brother Dori. What kind of tea would you like? Sit right here by the fire, love.”

“Oh, my dearest Gridr, such a ridiculous to-do. I do believe I’d like a little raspberry leaf if you have it.”

“Oh I do. You just stay right here, warm up and-” Gridr flashed them a grin from the door, “rest your poor nerves.”

Dori laughed delightedly.

Ori sank onto the beautifully cushioned settle opposite Dori. Dori perched comfortably on the small couch, looking terribly pleased with himself. Balin sat beside Dori and raised Dori’s hand to his lips. Dori chuckled at him.

“Was my ‘pretense’ to your standards, Lord Balin?”

“Oh, m’ very dear Master Dori. Yer magnificent. I believe our entrapment t’ be a triumph.”

Balin turned to Ori just as Nori landed with a thud next to Ori.

“Oh, lad, don’t worry about a thin’,” Balin assured him. “Dwalin'll be home later this night. Th’ trap, now sprung, is water-tight, yeh’ll see.”

Ori folded his hand and looked at the pair.

“May I ask what’s going on?”

Dori glared at Nori, who had the gall to look embarrassed.

“’M sorry, pet,” said Nori. “It’s sort a’ my fault.”

“Sort of?” Dori asked, annoyed.

“Fine It’s all me bloody fault! Happy?”

“Not happy until you change your ways!”

“Well as to that-“

“Would someone please explain how I became the toss stone in this game?” Ori snapped.

Dori turned, as did Balin.

“Now then, laddie-“

“Darling, you’re not a toss stone, thank Mahal. You were almost a slave!”

Balin patted Dori’s hand.
“Master Nori, perhaps yeh’d like to tell yer brother what yeh’ got yerself into.”

“Wouldn’t like it ’t all, actually,” Nori barked.

“Master Nori,” Balin’s voice was suddenly quiet and full of menace. “That was a politely put order, no’ a serving suggestion.”

“Ah, a’right.” Nori turned to Ori, still shamefaced. “Look, pet, you know I ain’t too bothersome about how I get money, right?”

“Gaming, thieving, pick-pocketing, looting, yes, I do.”

“Well, I got involved with a grand scheme, or so I thought. It was Calmar’s group who had a system f’r gaming that cheat a player out o’ gold, dagger, an’ boots, then sent ‘em up prison-ward f’r not payin’. It was easy money.”

“And?” Ori asked.

Nori squirmed.

“I was goin’ through things t’ get a group of me own started one night an’ found a stack a papers. I grabbed ’em t’ check f’r treasure holes an’ like. Turns out th’ Master weren’t locking folk up f’r debts but using it as a cover f’r sellin’ ’em int’ slavery down south t’ Mordor f’r Orcs and such.”

Ori had to clap both hands to his mouth to stop himself from getting sick.

“I hid the papers upstairs.”

“Then they have them now?” Ori gasped.

“No, I have them.” Dori patted the strong box.

Nori stared.

“How’d you know where t’ find ‘em? Along with me…erm, night-time readin’?”

“Please,” Dori snorted. “I know all the hidey-holes in that house. I even know you taught little Ori to pick the front lock as you lost your key near forty years ago. I knew he was an honest lad and would never use that knowledge to do anything untoward.”

“So what’s happening at our house?” Ori asked.

“Lemme finish,” Nori went on. “That time yeh came t’ rescue me an’ that arse married yeh, the next day he came down an’ spent most a th’ day gettin’ in me face about what, if anythin’, I might know about the slave ring. I told him even if I knew anythin’ what the rocks could he really do t’ me an’ you two’d be better off anyway.

“He called me a fool and said they’d make Dori an’ you suffer f’r sure as you ain’t warriors. After he left, one o’ them men from the gang told me they knew I’d taken the papers an’ if I didn’t give ‘em back, and keep me mouth shut, they’d see t’ it that you an’ our Dori’d be on the next cart south with the orcs.”

Ori stared at Nori, who was yanking on his beard braids.

“I crept out th’ other night an’ came ‘round t’ yer Dwalin’s door an’ told him everythin’ and showed him the papers. Balin called in some bloke Br-sumthin’.”
“Brur.” Balin smiled.

“Aye, he came an’ copied the papers exactly, then gave me th’ copies. Then yer Dwalin told me everythin’ would be fine an’ t’ go home an’ he’d take care of everythin’ when yeh all came t’ dinner. What he’s doin’ now, I couldn’t tell yeh. Last I saw, he clipped me ’round the ear, called me a pest, threw his cloak on me an’ said t’ ride off w’ yeh an’ do whatever his brother says.”

“Oh, Nori,” Ori sighed, “you silly, greedy fool. You do realize if it wasn’t for our marriage he’d have never been able to stop them if that gang had shipped you off?”

Nori sulked. “Aye, well, kiss him f’r me. You’re probably real good at that now.”

“Dwalin’s never laid a hand on me like that,” Ori paused. “Never in seriousness or in private, I mean.”

Nori’s eyes went round.

“Mahal! Is he war-wounded and can’t get it up? Did some enemy whack it off?”

“No!” Ori snapped.

“How d’ yeh know then? If yeh ain’t fallen with him?”

“I saw him bathing.”

“Yeh spied on a feller bathin’? Oi, but yer a dirty wee lad, aren’t yeh!” Nori laughed.

“No, you idiot! I thought I’d lost my marriage bead and walked in on him.” Ori blushed as he recalled.

“If it was lost, then why not just come home and say it all never happened?”

“It was in the soap dish.”

“Aye, but it wasn’t in yer hair. So why not just say he lied and seduced yeh. None ’ud think less a’ yeh, yeh being young and romantical.”

“Nori, that’s wrong!”

“Why’re yeh defending that ugly ol’ buffalo? Yeh had an open chance t’ come back t’ us!”

Ori groaned, he felt a headache coming on.

“Nori, that would bring dishonor upon our family for lying and dishonor upon the House of Fundin for lying about his intentions.”

“Is that it?”

“’That and…’ Ori paused a moment, recalling his and Dwalin’s meeting with Balin, Dis and Thorin that very morning.

“And what?” Nori prodded.

Ori smiled and felt himself blush.

“And I happened to rather like my buffalo, who for the record is neither old nor ugly.”
Balin and Dori smothered chuckles and Nori made a face.

“I don’t like him.”

“I imagine the sentiment is mutual,” Ori commented dryly.

Nori flung himself back into the settle to sulk. Balin and Dori ooked pleased. Dori opened his mouth to say something but then Gridr swept back into the room followed by her three menfolk.

The dwarrow sat down with teapots, cups, saucers, cream, honey and a plate piled high with buttered toast. Into the middle of all that Gridr placed a dark-colored cake on a beautiful platter. Ori thought it must be some sort of molasses, or possibly even coffee.

* * *

Ori was nearly nodding in his seat when Oin sat up and brushed the crumbs off his knees.

“Well, that’s a good long time, if they’ve got anyone or a creature watching. Master Nori, you’ll be stayin’ here with us. Balin, if you’ll set your brother’s cloak on Master Dori there you’ll be able t’ take him and our young Ori home.”

“Yes, indeed,” Gridr nodded. “All of you must be close to dropping. Gimli, good lad, you show Master Nori there to his room. Put him in the east wing, so you don’t disturb your cousins. They have to be up early. Your Uncle Binni made up the red guest room there.”

The various party members rose and said good night. Dori embraced Nori most affectionately but Ori was close enough to hear Dori hissing in Nori’s ear exactly what would happen if Nori dared do anything even slightly criminal at the In residence.

Once more the shay moved off and Ori was relieved to see the steps of the Fundin House almost immediately. They drove in to the stabling area. Balin closed the door behind them.

Ori relaxed at the sound of the locks clicking shut. They were safe. He and Dori helped Balin see to Harley and Ducati. Ori tried not to yawn too much but he felt it was getting late. Balin opened a side door half-hidden behind a pile of straw, put out the lanterns and led Dori and Ori along the connecting bare hallway to another door at the end. Balin opened this.

“I’m terribly sorry, Master Dori, bringin’ yeh int’ th’ house through th’ side door. Most improper f’r a guest such as yerself, m’dear.”

Dori smiled demurely. “Nonsense, Master Balin. I much prefer it. Feels more like family this way.”

Ori glanced about. They were in the large hall area next to Dwalin’s bedroom.

Ori thoroughly enjoyed dragging Dori all around the house - except for the bedrooms as this made him feel self-conscious. If Dori noticed the omission, he didn’t comment on it. Dori praised all he saw but he was only effusive of the cooking equipment, larder, pantry and scullery. Ori smiled and hugged his brother.

“We can cook together here sometimes.”
“Oh, Ori, pet, I’d like that very much.”

Dori held Ori and rested his cheek on Ori’s hair, something he hadn’t done in a long time. They were standing that way when Balin rejoined them.

“Ah, there yeh both are, m’dears. Ori, my lad, would yeh like t’ show our Dori th’ bath so he can relax an’ change while yeh an’ I make a room ready? Dori m’dear, may I tempt yeh with a nightcap? I’ve some rather good red currant wine. Nicely fortified an’ steel barreled in th’ Shire, Late Second Age?”

Ori had no idea what that all meant but he squeezed Dori’s arm.

“I think you ought to be tempted, Dori.”

“As you wish, pet.” Dori smiled. “Thank you, Master Balin, you are more than kind.”

Balin bowed them out. Ori dragged Dori down the hall again and eagerly showed him how the bath worked. Balin had thoughtfully provided clean drawers, a night shift, felted house shoes and a beautiful dressing gown of elfin silk with lovely lavender pastel stripes and creamy satin cuffs and collar.

Ori left Dori to it and hurried out. Balin met him half way down the hall with a basin full of water and a cloth bag.

“Ori, lad, come and help me a moment, please.”

Ori trotted after Balin into Dwalin’s room. It was spotlessly clean. Ori glanced about and Balin chuckled.

“I got th’ cleaners in while th’ pair a’ yeh were at work. F’r one who’s so scrupulous in his military doin’s, forgin’, and weapons, he’s th’ most dreadful slob here at home.”

Ori snickered. “Dori says the same thing about my pens and paints. They’re always perfect and tidy, yet I end up covered in ink.”

“I think th’ pair a’ yeh’re well suited, then.”

Ori blushed then realized what Balin was doing and helped. He had spent more than enough time patching up Nori after fights to recognize bandages and salves.

“If he’s badly injured, how shall I get ahold of Master Oin?”

“He’ll send his own raven, first t’ Oin then t’ me, if he’s no’ well enough t’ come home. If I receive such, I’ll wake yeh, if yeh wish.”

“Yes, please.”

Balin patted Ori’s cheek.

“Don’t look so worried, lad. It’s usually no more than scratches, scrapes an’ bruises. Come, let’s go an’ put together something nice f’r our Dori, yes?”

Balin led Ori to a cozy sitting room right next to Balin’s own suite. It was smaller than the downstairs room at Dori’s house. There was only room for four people to sit comfortably. Balin turned up the fire and smiled as he went out, leaving Ori to inspect the four walls each covered in bookcases to the ceiling.
Ori had never seen so many books in a residence before. He guessed that both Balin and his amad had been avid collectors, and maybe Dwalin, if his bedroom floor earlier had been anything to go by. It appeared the House of Fundin enjoyed poetry, First Age classical drama, Old Púkel burlesque, High Elven literature as well as many satirical works from Gondor, both translated into runes and in the original Westron.

A deep box contained large maps fixed to thin pieces of slate: maps of villages, forests, mines and lakes, some colored, others solely lines of elevation. Ori sighed blissfully, one day he would sit here and look at all of them.

Many shelves held histories of the peoples of Middle Earth as well as great tomes about the properties of that earth, stone, both precious and common, and many about lava.

It surprised him to discover a high shelf filled with books about the sky and all the constellations.
The study of the stars was not anything he had given a great deal of thought to before. He paged through, intrigued.

“Ori! What in Mahal’s name are you doing up there?” Dori’s voice startled him.

Ori nearly fell off the back of the couch but gripped the shelf.

Dori stood next to Balin, looking very well in his borrowed clothes. His hair and beard streamed loose about his shoulders and down his back.

Balin laughed and stepped forward. He took the book from Ori and helped him down.

“Astronomy a favorite of yers, m’dear?”

Ori shook his head. “I know next to nothing about it. I’m sorry I didn’t mean to pry.”

Ori took the book again as Balin handed it to him and sat on the couch corner near the fire as Balin indicated.

“Nonsense, m’dear, this is yer home. I insist yeh both feel perfectly free to help yerself to our books. I will tell yeh just to be careful, as we do tend to put in bookmarks or little mementoes and such. We’ve never had any qualms about writing notes in them either. As long as it’s neat an’ doesn’t obscure anything already written.”

Now Ori wanted to check every volume to see what notes and other treasures they might hold.
Balin ushered Dori to the corner opposite Ori and nearest the fire then poured each of them a glass of ruby red wine. The scent was delicious as they all leaned forward to toast.

“Welcome home, m’dears,” Balin said gently.

The wine tasted better than it smelled and the first sip went down like honey.

Ori smiled, then it playfully kicked him behind the eyes, and he giggled.

Dori turned slightly in his corner and curled his feet underneath.

“Dear Balin?”

“Yes, m’dear?”

“I’m almost frightened to ask but what is happening at my house at the moment?”
Balin studied the color of his wine then looked up.

“I sincerely hope nothin’, an’ that th’ entire mess is nice an’ tidy by now.”

Dori made a non-committal noise.

Ori glanced from one to the other.

“Balin?” he asked. “Did you tell Dori what was going to happen earlier today?”

Dori and Balin smiled at each other.

“Do show the lad,” Dori prompted.

Balin reached into his tunic pocket and drew out the ornate dagger he had asked Dori about over dinner. He laid it on the table and arranged the detritus nearby. Ori peered at the white flakes, each with its own distinct shape.

“Are those runes of some kind?”

“Yes, pet.”

“Very good, laddie.”

Ori looked up.

“So you told Dori about the plan when he was looking at the dagger?”

Dori nodded. “After a fashion. I had to, shall we say, improvise somewhat.”

Balin sighed.

“It’s been months in th’ works gettin' Gondor, Rohan an' Mirkwood t' discuss an' share information on th' slave trade, gettin' everyone t' cooperate, first t' find out what Calmar an' Sauron were doin', then how they were doin' it. Everythin' hinged on t’night as we knew Calmar’s group was plannin’ t’ set out from Erebor with a load o’ slaves. Our plan was t’ replace each load o’ slaves leavin' Dale with our soldiers an’ never let th' evidence leak t’ the next stoppin' point.

"At first we thought this whole to-do with Nori'd muck it up, then we realized, we could use th' master's vendetta against Nori as a diversion."

Dori looked askance.

Balin sighed.

“Yeh have me word whatever’s been broken or lost’ll be repaired or replaced. In th' meantime, yer quite welcome t’ stay as long as yeh fancy.”

“Thank you, Master Balin, you’re very kind,” Dori said graciously.

Ori tucked his feet up and yawned then tried to cover it but it was too late.

“Off to bed with you, pet,” Dori commanded.

Ori opened his mouth to protest but his face cracked into another yawn.

“Aye, laddie,” Blain concurred. “And I’ve left yeh a clean night shirt and house socks. Do be careful hanging up that wedding tunic. We’re due f’r the market tomorrow and folk always like t’ see the newlywed. Don’t f’rget yer book either.”

Balin handed it to him as Ori leaned in to kiss Dori’s cheek.

“Good night, Dori. I hope you’ll be comfortable here, brother.”

“Oh, I don’t see how I couldn’t be, pet. Go and get some sleep now like a good badger. Sweet dreams.”

Balin kissed Ori’s cheek and patted his shoulder.

“Off yeh go, laddie. Night-night.”

* * *

Ori padded from the bathroom, the wedding clothes hung carefully in the steamer closet. He was washed, comfortable in the cream linen nightshirt and long drawers that Balin had left out for him. Wearing the felt house socks in matching cream, Ori found he could walk silently. Book in hand he headed back to his room, but voices stopped him dead, listening.

“Dori, m’dear, if I’ve satisfied yer curiosity about our younger brothers, there’s somethin’ else we must discuss.”

Dori sighed. “Must we?”

“Aye, me darlin’, as it could throw this entire arrangement for Dwalin an’ Ori completely awry.”

Ori hesitated only a moment before deciding that since it was a discussion about him, he had a right to know. He dropped to all fours and slipped back into the room, hiding under the table covered in a thin cloth so he could just see them. Dori and Balin still sat on the couch but Balin was holding Dori’s hand!

“Jus’ tell me th' truth, beloved,” Balin said gently. “Is Ori mine?”

“What?”

“Is he mine?”

“Balin, you must be aware I’m male. You have seen me-”

“Yes, dearest, an' touched you. Thoroughly.”

Dori blushed and Balin went on.

“I also see that yer exceptionally strong in th’ hips, yer center is there, an’, though small by dwarrowdam terms, yeh do have enough in th’ breast t’ nurse and yeh’ve a very nestin' nature. All that an’ th’ fact that many male dwarrow with mithril hair’re bearers.”

Dori sighed again. “Yes, I’m a bearer but no, my love, he is not yours, though he should have been.”
Ori held himself silent with the cuff of his shirt stuffed in his mouth.

Dori stroked Balin’s hands.

“Please, my love, hear me out. The day we met in the town forge in Ered Luin was the second most beautiful day of my life. Wait. There was nothing I wanted more that to go with you and be your love. We are each other’s Ones but I left you in that delightful inn room for a reason.”

“Yeh said family.”

“Yes, Mam was still trying to get Nori’s adad to marry her. She was working in the mines then and Nori was already learning to be a naughty little badger. It needed both of us working to keep hearth and home together. You did look lovely but I was not going to drop everything in your hands.

“I spent the next month full of joy that I knew of you, my One, and that we loved one another. Mam had taken Nori with her to stay at Nori’s adad’s place. I had our rooms to myself. I was happy to distraction. Believe me, my love, I was. I had every hope that Mam’s relationship was set and I could get my mastery and then find you again.

“They did come back and were very happy together. Mam noticed my joy and one evening we sat down together to talk. I told her everything. How I had planned it all out and made a budget for her and Nori’s adad to live comfortable without me. Mam made a pot of tea and we sat together as I as I explained it all.”

“Tea?” Balin queried.

Ori felt his stomach drop out of him.

Balin’s eyes widened in horror.

“Oh, no, me beloved?”

Dori held up his hand, shaking his head tiredly.

“Yes. Two days later I was sick and had a horribly painful flux that lasted nearly three days. I don’t know if a child had formed or not but I grieved for the possibility.

“Mam, when I confronted her, was adamant that I was confused about Heartsongs. They were only stories and I had been foolish enough to fall with a handsome noble just as she had. She firmly held that she was protecting me from her fate.”

Ori felt faint. Tears burned his eyes.

“Beloved,” Balin said gently.

He moved closer and Dori rested his head against Balin’s shoulder as the other dwarf put an arm around him.

“Needless to say,” Dori went on, “I was devastated, but there was Nori to help with and Mam left him to me often enough.

“For all the bad that was in her relationship with Nori’s adad, he was usually a kind sort. It wasn’t until they’d been together a few years that things began to change for the worse. Both of them liked to drink and Nori was growing more adventurous and bold in the trouble he was getting Mam and her love were spending more and more time down in the pubs which meant more of my pay went to keep us fed and clothed and a roof over our heads. It didn’t help matters Nori’s adad liked to gamble occasionally.”

“So,” Balin put in quietly, “there was no chance t’ follow yer plan t’ save an’ leave?”

“Mmm, you’d think she’d want me out of the place. I wasn’t her current love’s child and I was a reminder of her fall from her family. No one would have been surprised if she had encouraged me to leave or even if she’d thrown me out. I made a point of saying this to her once while helping her to bed when she was blind drunk.

“Apparently she held onto hope that we should all travel back to Erebor and one of her noble family or my adad’s family would see me and, being struck by my amazing beauty, take back both of us. And all would be forgiven.”

“Yer adad?” Balin asked.

Dori looked at him a long moment before saying, “The noble Thror tried to marry her to.”

“Sweet Mahal’s hammer,” Balin moaned. “Dwalin was righ’.”

“Dwalin?” Dori raised his eyebrows.

“He’s a soldier bu’ also a dab hand a’ investigation,” Balin explained. “When he began his work on yeh-

“Why?” Dori demanded.

Balin smiled ruefully.

“Ori, of course. When Ori came of age t’ be courted, Dwalin felt he’d need t’ know more abou’ him, so he could request o’ th’ proper head o’ th’ family th’ permission t’ court him.”

“Idiot,” Dori muttered.

Balin chuckled and nodded.

“Rather delusional o’ Rikmha if she though’ Lord Rikut’d welcome her back.”

“Yes it was. So life went along in Ered Luin until Nori’s adad took a journey to the Iron Hills.”

“Oh no!”

“Oh yes. While he was gone, she met a new one at the pub, a darling young thing. My age. And a scribe who wrote plays for a traveling carnival and theater. He left and she decided to follow him. She thought he’d said he was going to Erebor. It took us nearly four months on the road, tinkering and whatever other work we could find to keep us in food and shelter on the way. Nori’s thieving skills kept us alive often enough. She took up work cleaning when we arrived in Dale. She didn’t realize she was carrying until there was an accident at the building she worked in. She was examined by a healer and put on lighter duties.”

“I take it this wasn't Nori’s adad’s work?”

“No, no it wasn’t. She was furious. Herbs and tea would kill both herself and the child at this point and no healer would be able to remove it without destroying her ability to have more children. Then she heard from an old Ered Luin neighbor that Nori’s adad had returned from the Iron Hills and he was on his way to Erebor in search of her. She was stuck and counting her days to make sure she gave birth before he got there. Needless to say luck was with her. A few weeks before he was due to arrive, she gave birth. She didn’t even want to see the child. The midder caring for her just handed me the baby and went back to help her settle. Oh, my darling! He was the most beautiful little boy and he opened his eyes and looked right up at me! His were that sweet hazel, just like yours.”

“Ah, dear love!”

“He was my baby, my darling Ori. I would never let him go. The midder came back to tell me Mam was sleeping and said that Mam had told her to take the brat to the healers for adoption. I’d bathed and settled my little badger by then and told the midder I’d take care of all of it. While Mam recovered in bed over the next few days I kept my badger with me and quiet. Oh, such a good badgerling. I loved him so within a day I found I was able to nurse him. He almost never cried and then it was just a wee little noise.

“When Mam found out she was furious. She tried to force me to take the child to the healers but I would not be swayed by any amount of talk and there was no way she could physically overpower me.”

“But Nori’s adad?”

“Oh, he and I’d had one bout back in Ered Luin and he learn right quick not to cross me. Well, the days passed and my little Ori grew more and more sweet. Nori came for a visit and fell head over heels in love. I would take both of them to the forge with me and they’d play for hours. Mam met Ori’s adad again and they took up where they had left off. Fortunately he was of the classic empty-headed sort of writer who cannot focus on anything beyond what Mahal or the Green Lady happen to whisper in their ears at the moment. He never noticed I was caring for a child, and if he did he probably thought it was mine.

“Well, three months later Nori’s adad arrived. He found her in Dale. The fight was loud and out he walked. Did you or Dwalin ever hear of the Millgakhin pub murders?”

“Aye, love, but we were still down in Khazad Dûm a’ that time. Clearin’ up after th’ battle. Ori’s adad?”

“Yes, stinking drunk one night. Nori’s da and a gang of his equally soused cronies went after Ori’s adad and his brothers. Burned the place to the ground. Twenty folk were sent to healers and three dead - two of them Nori and Ori’s adads.”

“Oh, beloved.”

“It doesn’t matter now. Mam was finally resigned. Nori was helping us again with his skills and I had my Ori. He may have called her Mam like the rest of us but it was me he came to for praise or comfort. It did mean I couldn’t come to you, but he’s grown now.”

“I wished I’d betrayed yer trust, come an’ taken yeh all away t’ be with me here. I don’t like t’ think how yeh suffered, love.”

Balin pressed a kiss onto Dori’s temple.

“We’re here now, aren’t we?” Dori smiled.

Ori watched as they came together in a long kiss. They rose. Balin closed down the fire and placed the screen. Dori picked up the tray of glasses as they left, putting out the lamps as they Ori was sure he could hear Dori crying softly.
Welcome back, friends, to a new chap-episode and a nice long one!

We have Ori’s reaction to what he heard previously. This includes a melt-down, vomit, and smooching but, we do assure you, not all at the same time.

There’s a link to what seemed to be a perfect piece of music for the moment.

A old familiar friend pops in and we find out more about the mysterious dwarrowdam Frerin is nutty on.

Keep those cards and letters coming, friends! We adore hearing from you!

Ori sat very still under the table, hugging the all but forgotten book to himself. His mind was empty except for Dori’s voice repeating the tale over and over. He crept from the room and wandered blindly through the hall. He went to Dwalin’s room. He couldn’t absorb all this. Dwalin would be back soon and he would need medicine and wound cleaning. Ori sat on the edge of the bed.

_Nori’s adad killed my adad. Nori and I are only half brothers. Mam. Mam killed Dori and Balin’s baby!

He curled up on the foot of the bed, staring into the fire glowing before the large armchair there.

_Dori and Balin were each other’s One but have been forced to live apart most of their lives._

Ori fell into an uneasy sleep. Ori dreamed. Ori dreamed his One came to the door and swept him away with the promise of love and adoration but only took him back to the squalor of Steam Alley Close, the freezing cold of a winter in a single room in the letting house with nothing but a communal stove at the center of every floor. There was no rest and no work and the One was drunk and violent. Ori cried for Dwalin, but in the Alley, Dori’s house was burnt down and there among the ashes the bodies of the Fundin brothers lay dead.

“Dwalin!”

Ori jerked awake and stumbled away from the bed. With a shaking hand, he poured water from the pitcher and drank. He stared at the fire, willing himself to be calm.

He nearly fell over when the back part of the high chimney opened seamlessly and Dwalin stepped in. Ori stared. Dwalin was disheveled, blood-spattered as were his axes; he clapped them and his hammer in one hand while he closed the door.

Ori took the kettle from the hearth and poured some hot water into the wash basin.

“I take it things went well?” Ori asked.

Dwalin jerked around to look at him.
“Ori! What yeh doin’?”

Ori added some herbs and a few drops of the tincture as Balin had showed him.

“Waiting for you. Put those weapons down for now and let me see to the damage.”

“I’m a’right, yeh jus’ go off t’ yer bed, love.”

Dwalin placed the weaponry on a large long table near the others and turned.

Ori pointed to the chair, cloth in hand.

“Go and sit down, so I can take care of this.”

Dwalin smiled gently.

“I said, I’m a’right, love, really. Go an’ get some sleep.”

“Don’t patronize me. I am your husband and equal now! Go. Sit. Down!”

Dwalin stared blankly at him.

Ori pointed to the chair.

Dwalin backed up a few steps and did as he was bid.

“I’m sittin’. I’m sittin’,” he said, slowly lowering himself into the chair, never taking his eyes from Ori.

Ori re-wetted the cloth, warming it.

“Take off your tunic and shirt.”

“Aye, love, just lemme-”

“Take them off!”

Dwalin struggled out of his belt and shoulder weapons harness, which would have been a great deal easier to do had he been standing up, then stripped to the waist.

Ori kept his calm by frowning, quickly and efficiently clearing the grime and blood off Dwalin. Ori forced his hands to remain steady, aware that Dwalin was watching his face intently. Ori was, somewhere deep down inside, relieved to see it was mostly just grime and someone else’s blood. Ori finished Dwalin’s torso, dried him and pulled a nightshirt over his husband’s head.

“Thank yeh. Love, I-”

“Boots and britches,” Ori ordered.

Dwalin opened his mouth, seemed to think the better of it and complied meekly.

Ori tossed all the clothing in the hamper near the bedroom door, took the boots to the fireplace door, opened it and put the boots beside the step, shut the door, then returned to Dwalin. Really, the only nasty wound was a cut down his left thigh.

“Sword?” Ori asked in a neutral tone as he cleaned, anointed, and bandaged it.

“Broken plank.” Dwalin shrugged. “Uh, everythin’ a’right, love?”
“Fine.”

Ori pulled the footstool closer and busily finished washing and drying Dwalin’s legs and feet.

Dwalin continued to watch him keenly but otherwise gingerly followed whatever Ori told him to do.

Ori told himself he was fine and everything would work out well.

“Here, put on your drawers and tell me how to clean up the weaponry,” Ori instructed.

Dwalin looked ready to argue but after a moment complied. Ori then learned about cleaning and oiling weapons by watching. Whether he would remember any of it was not high on his list of priorities.

Ori tidied away the medical supplies and put out the lamp. He crossed to the bed ready to put the final lamp out. He turned to Dwalin.

“Come along. Get into bed.”

Dwalin crossed to his side. He started to reach for Ori then paused.

“Ori, love-“

“What?” Ori replied brusquely and folded back the covers.

“I- Whatever I’ve done, I’m very, very sorry. I realize-”

“You haven’t done anything,” Ori said shorty. “I’ve been thinking things through. We’ve both been tiptoeing around each other and playing courting games. The fact of the matter is we are married and a Royal Triad has given us two years. It would dishonor both our families if we fail at this. I refuse to fail. We are married and we will be a proper married pair. Now, take off all your clothes!”

“What-?”

“You heard me.” Ori proceeded to undress himself and, pushing Dwalin out of the way, climbed into bed, moved over to make room for Dwalin, then sat against the headboard, arms folded, and frowned at Dwalin. Dwalin was still standing at the bedside watching Ori, only now one eyebrow was raised.

“Hurry up,” Ori snapped.

Dwalin removed the nightshirt and slowly sat down beside him in the bed.

Ori glared

“Now. Have sex with me.”

Dwalin’s other eyebrow shot up and he looked Ori straight in the eye.

“Right now?”

“Yes.”

“Yeh sure?”
“Yes!”

“It’s late, love an’ we’re both tired—“

“I don’t care. Do it.”

“Yeh sure yeh wouldn’t like t’ sleep f’r a bit an—“

“I said: Now!”

Dwain cocked his head, eyes narrowed.

Ori frowned and glared at the fireplace for a few moments.

Dwalin didn’t do anything other than look at him.

“I’m waiting,” Ori growled.

“Right.”

Ori decided to glare at Dwalin again.

“May we just get on with this?”

“Aye…right.”

Dwalin slid nearer and put his arm around Ori’s shoulders. It was warm and comforting. Ori felt his throat tighten. Refusing to cry, Ori shoved Dwalin away.

“Don’t touch me!”

Dwalin turned and sat cross-legged opposite Ori.

“’M sorry, love, but I kinda have t’ if we’re goin’ t’ have sex.”

Ori blushed hotly, instantly enraged.

“I know that!”

“Righ’.”

“Oh, will you stop making fun of me and just get this…out of the way so we don’t have to dread it anymore!”

“Wasn’t makin’ fun of yeh, love, I—”

“Dwalin!”

“C’mon, love, we don’t have t’—“

“Yes we do! So then it’s over and done with and people can stop hinting and we can get on with life. We’ll go and adopt a baby that looks like Dori and Balin, so they’ll have one and we’ll get Nori a proper job, so he won’t have to find out his da was a murderer and Dis won’t remember any more about Rikmha and Dori won’t have to think about his baby dying and remembering that Mam—”

Ori choked. He curled forward, his face in the mattress and wailed into the covers. His insides hurt so much he wanted to rip them out. Dwalin held him tight and settled Ori in his lap, cradling Ori’s head against his shoulder.

“’M here, love.”

“This has to work!” Ori sobbed. “It has to or you’ll leave me.”

“’M not leavin’ yeh.”

“I won’t go if my One comes. I’ll stay, as he’s a drunk and a horrible person. He’ll kill you and Balin and what’ll Dori do?”

“I’ve got yeh, love. ’M not lettin’ yeh go an’ it’ll take more’n some arsehole t’ dust me an’ Balin, don’t yeh worry.”

Ori sobbed harder. Somewhere in the back of his mind he knew he was beyond hysterical, but he was crying so hard he was almost throwing up. He wished he hadn’t had that thought because his body thought that throwing up was a great idea.

Next thing Ori knew he was lying across one of Dwalin’s thighs, spilling his guts onto the puddle of his own night shirt and drawers on the floor beside the bed.

“Oh shit,” Ori rasped.

“Nah, but I’ll carry ye t’ th’ pot if yeh need.”

Ori laid his cheek against Dwalin’s thigh. He felt exhausted and useless.

“I’m sorry,” he offered listlessly.

Dwalin wiped Ori’s face with his own nightshirt in reply. He tossed it on top of the mess and turned Ori to lie down.

“Shhh, just rest a minute an’ I’ll get yeh some water.”

Dwalin rose, covered Ori with a thin cotton quilt and moved away.

Ori stared at nothing, his cheek against the cool linen underquilt.

Dwalin came back. He easily slid his arm under Ori, raised the smaller dwarf to help him drink a cup of cool water, then eased Ori down to lie on his back. He folded a wet cloth over Ori’s eyes. A few moments later, Dwalin removed it, wiped Ori’s face and neck with it before re-soaking it in the pitcher now on the side table. He folded it again and laid it over Ori’s eyes. The second time he removed it, Ori reached up to rub his eyes, but Dwalin stopped his hand.

“Don’t love, yeh’ll bruise ’em.”

Ori obeyed but did nothing more. After a few more times Dwalin left the cloth in the pitcher and helped Ori into a clean nightshirt. Ori rose and padded toward the door. He wanted to go to his own bed, pull the covers over his head and sleep, never wake up again.

Dwalin came to his side and walked him to the bath.

Ori felt a bit better after washing his face properly. He looked up at Dwalin, who was leaning against the wall next to the sink.

“Um…I’m....” Ori didn’t know what to say.
Dwalin smiled at him.

“Fancy a walk?”

“A walk? At this hour? Where?” Ori was completely thrown by the question.

“Nowhere. Up the circle. Get some air and get out a th’ house.”

Ori blinked. “Actually a walk sounds nice.”

Dwalin slid off the wall with a grin.

“Grab yer britches an’ socks an’ I’ll meet yeh back in me room with yer boots.”

Ori came back into Dwalin’s room. He’d thrown on his old trousers and a long-sleeved tunic. Dwalin, similarly dressed to Ori, was putting the screen in front of the fire. He opened the fireplace door and they sat together on the step pulling on their boots. Ori found himself smiling. He liked this part of married life.

Dwalin led him down a dark cramped hallway and pulled the end door inwards.

Ori peered around him to see they were in the stable. Ducati and Harley looked at them sleepily. Ori couldn’t resist going over and patting both ponies. Dwalin handed him an apple for Ducati and gave his to Harley.

Dwalin shut the stable door behind them silently, locking it as Ori looked about.

It was completely silent in the cavern. The street was steaming slightly, but beautiful.

Ori looked questioningly at Dwalin.

“They flush all th’ streets of th’ city with the geysers below the mines.”

“How luxurious,” Ori marveled.

“Aye, that an’ who really wants t’ have th’ job of cleanin’ pony shit an’ th’ like off th’ street every day.”

“Good point,” Ori agreed.

He stretched and sniffed the air. It smelled bright with the tang of fresh cut gems and the crisp scent of stone mixed with ore.

They walked down the long tunnel and out under the arch that marked the royal residence cavern. The whole silent city, the entire mountain, stretched before them. Ori suddenly wanted nothing more than to run. He had always loved to run as a badger and even now if pressed he could leave Nori far behind. He turned to Dwalin

“Where are we going?”

“See that spire up over there? Right by that arch?”

“Race you!”

Ori took off like a deer. It felt wonderful. Suddenly, he heard pounding feet behind him. He risked a glance back. Dwalin was almost at his heels. Ori pushed himself as hard as he could. Dwalin kept up and drew almost abreast.

“Left at th’ stair,” Dwalin said.

They barreled under an arch that marked the entry to an ornamental garden with artistic arrangements of cavern plants and carved wooden trees.

They slowed to a stop, panting, in front of a reflecting pool circled with graceful statuary and benches.

“Feelin’ a bit better?” Dwalin asked.

Ori nodded, catching his breath.

“Much. You’re the first who’s ever caught up to me.

“Years a’ trainin’, love. ‘Sides, we dwarrow’re natural sprinters.”

Dwalin went over to the pool and flopped down on his stomach, slapping the ground beside him.

“C’mere. Show yeh summat.”

Ori followed suit. Dwalin pointed into the pool.

“Now if yeh look careful yeh can see th’ stars from th’ dome in top a’ th’ mountain.”

Ori peered into the pool, then gasped. “I do see it! So beautiful! I didn’t know the very top of the mountain was open.”

“Only when it’s safe an’ clear. Th’ openings just a dwarf’s length across, th’ light’s refracted with crystal and mirrors.” Dwalin sat up. “It’s good f’r any livestock folk bring down from th’ surface. S’why we don’t actually build on th’ side of th’ mountain, grazing and such. Yeh saw part a’ it with th’ meadow outside the house.”

“This is lovely. Thank you,” Ori said quietly.

He scooted a little nearer to Dwalin. The older dwarf smiled and also moved closer, so their shoulders just touched. They stayed there looking into the water for a while. Dwalin told Ori all about the stars they could see sparkling in the mirror-like pool.

“Yeh see th’ difference between th’ brightness a’ those three an’ th’ little sparklers ’round about?”

“Yes. This pool makes it very easy to see.”

“Aye, yeh don’t get th’ torch light from th’ town t’ interfere. Now, what yeh kin do if yeh get yerself turned ’round when travelin’ is find that group a’ stars there. See?”

“Yes, they look like a ladle.”

“Aye, th’ one at th’ top of th’ handle always shows north, so yeh kin work out where t’ go on a journey.”

Ori gaped.

“Really? I thought the stars moved with the sky.”
Dwalin turned to look at him. “No, love, our world moves beneath th’ sky.”

Ori stared into the pool, his mind spinning with this new line of thinking. Our world moves beneath the sky? What’s under our world? Our world is round; if we are moving, then are the stars all around us? Is our world alone spinning in the sky? Are there other worlds?

Everything had turned on an edge; the sky, the world, who he was, and dear Dori. Ori blinked hard, determined not to cry.

“So,” Dwalin said gently. “After yeh left with Dori, did Nori catch yeh up quick enough? I didn’t hear anythin’ about yeh bein’ attacked.”

“No,” Ori replied, forcing his mind back on present matters. “No, we made it to Master Oin’s fine. Dori had more time for spasming and fainting there, too.”

Dwalin snickered.

“We had toast, jam, cake, and tea,” Ori counted off on his fingers. “Then we went home with Dori pretending to be you. After we got in, Balin got Dori and I nightwear and fed us cakes and wine.”

Ori paused, his eyes stung. He stared into the water, trying not to start crying again.

Dwalin rolled once again onto his back and turned to face Ori. He cupped the smaller dwarf’s cheek with his large hand.

“What’s happened, love?”

Ori blinked and was temped to laugh it off, saying he was affected by the stars and their beauty, but was stalled when a couple of his tears splashed into the pool, rippling its surface.

“It’s not my secret to tell. I’ve a bad habit, Captain Dwalin, since badgerhood. I like to listen to conversations I am not part of.”

“Yeh heard Balin an’ Dori say summat that upset yeh?”

Ori nodded.

Dwalin frowned, obviously thinking it through, while his hand still rested on Ori’s cheek.

Ori clutched at the hand as the lump in his throat threatened to choke him.

Dwalin pulled Ori down to rest his head against Dwalin’s shoulder. Ori wrapped both arms around Dwalin’s thick muscled one and curled against it. He felt Dwalin roll so they were spooned together. Ori took a shaky breath.

“Never tell. Promise.”

“Promise. We’re married. Our secrets’re jus’ ours an’ we’ve no secrets from each other. Yeh kin tell me anythin’. I’ll no’ judge yeh.”

Ori held on tight while he related what he’d heard under the table of the little sitting room. By the time he got to the end, he was crying again.

“So everything I thought I knew about me is a lie,” he finished in a whisper.
Dwalin hugged him tighter and Ori felt a kiss pressed into his hair.

“Nah, yer still yerself.”

Ori squirmed loose then settled on his side, facing Dwalin.

“But I’m not.”

“Yeh still love both yer brothers the same, right?”

“Of course.”

“Then they’re still yer brothers. Doesn’t matter th’ blood part. Balin an’ Dis accept each other as siblings since they know Thorin an’ I’re brothers at arms. I jus’ wish I’d had th’ chance t’ finish my investigation’, so I could’a told yeh an’ mabbe spared yeh a bit a’ pain.”

Ori sighed. “It’s alright I suppose, but poor, poor Dori and Balin.”

“Aye, that’s an iniquitous thing. If Rikmha was alive th’ only thing keepin’ me from hatin’ her is yeh, but I’d be more f’r thankin’ yer Dori f’r that. Poor shit, wha’ a life. Wha’ he’s like makes a lo’ more sense now.”

Ori nodded, thinking back on Dori’s words and his own actions.

“Dwalin?”

“Aye, love?”

“I’m so sorry for the way I behaved and for what I said this evening.”

Dwalin laid his forehead against Ori’s and ruffled his hair.

“No harm done, love. I knew yeh were upset when I first got in.”

“How? I thought I was calm.”

“Aye, very calm, with a face whiter than mountain snow an’ eyes all but screamin’ with pain. All I could wonder was wha’ in Durin’s name I’d done. I really thought yeh were gonna slit me throat from eyes t’ crotch.”

“I’d never-“

“I know, love. Yeh jus’ looked that upset.”

Ori sighed and shook his head.

“I’m still sorry for-“

Dwalin rubbed his knuckles against Ori’s cheek. Ori grabbed the hand and held it there.

“C’mere,” Dwalin rumbled and drew him in for a hug then rolled onto his back, pulling Ori on top and murmured an old cradle song.

Ori sighed and laid his head on Dwalin’s chest. He heard the steady, strong beat of the older dwarf’s heart. Ori closed his eyes to listen as, unbidden, the song of his own heart rose in his mind. Ori treasured and found comfort in the low, deep tones. It had always made him feel stronger and protected. He smiled as the song grew louder and almost rang in his ears, well mostly his left ear. That was against Dwalin’s chest. Ori paused his thoughts.

His song, the song of his heart, was coming from…Dwalin?

He raised his head. Dwalin looked sleepily at him, still humming. Ori stared at Dwalin. Dwalin’s eyes snapped into focus. He stopped the old tune and crinkled his mouth into a fond smile. Ori’s brain grasped desperately at what was going on. How can a heart song be heard with the ears?

Dwalin grinned and stroked Ori’s face with both hands.

“Hear it?” Dwalin whispered.

“I thought only I- Can you- hear me?”

“Ever since we won th’ day at Khazad Dûm.”

“I was born that day.”

A bubble of happiness formed inside him and he grinned back.

“It’s you! You’re my One! We’ve found each other!”

“Aye, love.”

Ori flung himself over Dwalin, shoved his arms around and underneath Dwalin’s neck and held on hard, squeezing as fiercely as he could. He felt Dwalin chuckling as he hugged back. Ori let go to lean up and peer into Dwalin’s face, nose to nose. Dwalin was still grinning but there was a glisten of moisture in his eyes.

“You said since Khazad Dûm,” Ori whispered. “Is that why you were waiting and not coming ’round to walk out with me? You were waiting for me to notice?”

“Aye, sort of. I kept plannin’ t’ ask yeh to court but every time I had a day t’ spare and a decent interval’d passed, yer brother would go and do summat stupid and yeh’d have t’ come and get him and I’d be back at square one.”

Ori smiled. “I wish I’d been able to hear you earlier. It must have been very hard for you to see that I couldn’t.”

“Nah, just tried t’ be about an’ see what I could do an’ mebbe if yeh’d notice.”

“I’ve noticed now,” Ori offered and leaned in to kiss him.

Dwalin’s lips were warm and as gentle as before and it thrilled Ori more than ever.

Suddenly shy, he buried his face in Dwalin’s beard.

“I always did like the way you behaved and you are very handsome,” Ori mumbled.

Dwalin made a noise between a purr and a growl as he slid a hand into Ori’s hair. Ori sighed as the kisses and nibbles at his throat made him shiver. Ori murmured in delight.

“I don’t know how you do it. It’s always so nice when you kiss me or hold me. I never did like it before.”
Ori felt a minuscule pause in Dwalin’s attentions the larger dwarf drew away but only far enough to rest their foreheads together.

“Love, I had lovers a’fore yeh were born an’ that can’t be undone, so I’ll never fault yeh fra havin’ yer own before this. But if some arsehole treated yeh bad when yeh were expectin’ sweetness, name ‘em an’ so help me I’ll hunt ‘em down an’ skin ‘em alive.”

Ori surprised himself by chuckling.

“No, I never loved anyone that way and Mam being who she was, no one was interested in me. The other times? Well, the first was in a pub when I was fetching Nori home. The adad of the publican, who was a nice old fellow, it was his name day I think. He was kissing each of the bar maids goodnight and I was standing there and it was quite funny, actually, but he tasted horrid.

“The second was one of Nori’s drinking cronies. He grabbed me and kissed me. Nori punched him in the nose. That was disgusting. His mouth was all wet and slimy and cold. I felt like it took weeks to wash the feel and taste of him out of my mouth.

“The only other one was a stable boy in Lake Town, who thought slamming his mouth into mine was a good idea before throwing me down in a stall and telling me to open my legs. I did. I kicked him in the crotch with one foot and the throat with the other when he bent over. I never really liked the idea since. As I said, but you’re different.”

Ori looked into Dwalin’s dark eyes, which were full of sympathy and barely suppressed rage.

“They weren’t thinkin’ a’ yeh, love, just themselves, curse ’em.”

“I know, but still it’s strange to think it can be nice.”

Dwalin grinned and pulled Ori in close and was extremely nice to him for a while.

When they drew apart to breathe, Dwalin smirked and said, “I hate t’say it, love, but it’s about time we think o’ heading’ home.”

They walked toward home hand in hand.

“So,” said Ori playfully. “What do you want to do when we get home?”

“I can show yeh how to do somethin’ else nice.”

Ori wrinkled his nose and grinned.

“Too late! Nori taught me to jerk off when I was a tween.”

Dwalin roared with laughter.

“No, he did! Dori had to go to a mastering session overnight, so Nori had to watch me. He invited his friends around to play cards. He wanted, apparently, to talk shop with them, so I couldn’t stay in the room but he would not let me take a light to read upstairs. I think he figured if he showed me I would be occupied for the rest of my life or at least until I attained a semblance of adulthood.”

Ori kissed Dwalin on the end of his nose.

“Even that should wait until we get inside,” said Ori, though he did kiss Dwalin on the lips and Dwalin kissed him back, and then they kissed each other rather passionately and Ori pulled a bit away. “We really should not be out here rolling around having sex in the street.”
Dwalin snorted.

“We are not rolling around in the street. This is rolling around in the street.”

Ori gasped as Dwalin covered the back of Ori’s head with his hand and clamped the other around Ori’s waist, dropped them to the ground, then rolled them off somewhere. Nor could Ori stop laughing when they finally slowed to a stop with Ori sprawled across Dwalin’s chest.

“See?” Dwalin said. “Now that was rolling in the street.”

“You great silly!” Ori managed, looking about.

They were at the entrance to the royal cavern. Dwalin leered, pulled him in for another long kiss, and roll them over once more which started Ori laughing and made kissing rather ineffective.

“Oi,” a male dwarf’s voice said. “Get yourselves a room, yeh drunks.”

Ori was not quite sure how Dwalin managed to spring from lying flat to being on his feet in one smooth movement and keep hold of Ori while he was doing it. Dwalin was in the other dwarf’s face instantly.

“Who wants t’ repeat what they just said? No’ t’ mention what business they go’ in th’ royal caverns a’ this time a’ nigh’?”

Ori peered around Dwalin.

The other dwarf was obviously a miner, pleasant featured and amused about catching them. Ori knew that familiar face and funny hat anywhere.

“Master Bofur. How lovely to see you again after all this time!”

“Well bless my beard! If it ain’t young Ori, Rikmha’s son! Grand t’ see yeh, laddie!”

Master Bofur offered his hand immediately then chuckled and ruffled Ori’s hair.

Dwalin stepped closer with growl. Ori put his hand on Dwalin’s chest and put himself in between the dwarrow.

“Dwalin, please. This is an old friend of my family. Master Bofur and his brother, Master Bombur, used to run the Steam Circle Pub. They were always very good to us.”

Dwalin grunted assent and glared at Bofur but kept Ori’s back flush to his chest and leaned his arm casually under Ori’s chin. Ori blushed and smiled weakly. Master Bofur looked Dwalin over then narrowed his eyes.

“Ori, lad, does yer Dori know yer here with him at this time of night?”

“Well, no, but it’s alright.”

“Oh, really?” Master Bofur frowned. “Here you! I think it’s time this young dwarf was home safe with his brothers.”

“This young dwarf’s me husband an’ he’s perfectly safe,” Dwalin snarled.

Master Bofur’s eyes bugged slightly as he gasped out, “Master Ori! Yer married? Durin bless us all! Truly?”
Ori grinned and nodded enthusiastically. Master Bofur dropped his pack and tools at his feet with a huge grin.

“Well, then I’ll shut my scolding and offer yeh my hand instead! Married our Ori, did you? Bless us all, that is fine news.”

Dwalin unbent enough to take the other dwarf’s hand

“Dwalin, son of Fundin. I’m Captain of the City guard.”

“And Prince Thorin’s personal guard. Our Ori’s flying high. Bofur, son of Scur, miner an’ toy maker dependin’ on the market, at yers. My congratulations to both of yeh.”

“Bit late t’ be diggin’ ain’t it?” Dwalin asked conversationally. “Hit a vein good enough t’ rouse the royal family?”

Bofur chuckled.

“Nah. Was havin’ a chat down the Central Pub, then…well, jus’ came up to, er… take in th’ lay of th’ land, as it were.”

“Lay of the land?” Ori asked.

“Aye,” Bofur sighed. “Ori, lad, you remember our Janifur, yes?”

Ori and Dwalin looked at each other then Ori said, “So it is your younger sister Frerin is trying to court?”

Bofur groaned.

“I knew it! I told her th’ princeling was after her, bu’ she jus’ kept saying she don’t know him from nowt. Came home all excited t’ other night. Been invited to Princess Dis’ house f’r dinner. I’m not happy about thin’s. Came up t’ find the blessed place, so we wouldn’t be late! Oi, how d’ yeh know about it?”

“We had breakfast with Princess Dis the other day and Prince Frerin told us,” Ori explained.

Bofur picked up his pack and the three dwarrows walked beneath the arch way and strolled up through the tunnel to the royal cavern.

“Bollocks!” Bofur frowned. “He’s not already done that has he?”

“Nah,” Dwalin shrugged. “Idiot badger f’rgot to ask f’r her family name, so no one’ll say nowt as that’ll be first thing Thror’ll want t’ know.”

Bofur rolled his eyes.

“Should be an interestin’ dinner party then. I’ll tell Bom what’s t’ do.”

“How are Master Bombur and Dam Erda?” Ori asked.

“Very well, very well indeed, laddie. May I tell ’em of yer good fortune?”

“Oh yes,” Ori blushed again. “Please do. Will any other of your family members be attending the dinner with your sister?”

“Aye, me an’ Bom’ll be there. Prob’ly our cousin Bifur, if he fancies it.

Dwalin frowned. “Yeh talkin’ a’ Bifur, son o’ Ozur?”

“Aye. Yeh know my cousin?”

“An’ well. He was with us down in Khazad Dûm. Still no’ acceptin’ his key t’ the Great Halls, eh?”

“Aye, both his sight an’ hearing’ve returned an’ he can get about as fine as any of us.”

Dwalin grinned.

“That’s good news, Master Bofur. Tell ’im I’m lookin’ forward t’ meetin’ up with him a’ dinner. I know both Balin an’ Thorin’ll be thrilled t’ see ‘im. It’s th’ lapis house you’ll be wantin’ to show at, by th’ way.”

Bofur looked.

“Fuckin’ eh,” he commented.

Bofur grinned back at Dwalin and started digging through the pack.

“Master Dwalin, it’s been a right pleasure makin’ yer acquaintance an’ seein’ our Ori again, lookin’ finer than a new smelter. Now here we are. Jus’ lemme give me blessin’s here.”

“No, yeh don’t have t’!” Dwalin started.

Ori blinked as Master Bofur started tossing liberal amounts of gold dust over them, saying the ancient seven blessings in Khuzdul. After the last cloud landed over them Bofur saluted them and sloped off.

“Bloody bless his tools up his arse,” Dwalin growled.

A little shocked, Ori started, “Dwalin! It was very kind of him to bless us and he’ll hear you!”

“Good!” Dwalin said louder.

Bofur popped out from behind the first turn of the tunnel to the city.

“Don’t want yer business known, don’t do yer business in th’ street!” the miner called jauntily.

“I’ll teach ye some business,” Dwalin threatened and Bofur ducked out of sight but they could still hear him laughing.

“Dwalin,” Ori pleaded. “He’s a friend!”

“Aye, who jus’ covered us in gold dust. We walk anywhere, we’ll trail it after us.”

“Oh!” Ori realized. “Oh. Slag! What should we do? We can’t walk about and the streets are already washed.”

“Son of a barrow-wight!” Dwalin griped, then he caught hold of Ori and leaned him over.

“Here.”
Dwalin ruffled Ori’s hair and beard. Gold dust showered down. Ori giggled in spite of himself and swiped at his clothes.

After bushing themselves off for some time they were finally able to walk away unmarked. Ori looked back at the mess then glanced at the houses then realized they had been exactly in front of the Sons of Groin household.

“Dwalin, look where we were.”

Ori pointed. Dwalin said “fuck” and led the way back the center of the courtyard were there was another, smaller reflecting pool.

Ori bent and touched the water to see it ripple.

“Ye kin play an’ stick yer feet in but it ain’t potable,” Dwalin commented idly.

“I love to watch it ripple,” Ori confided. “It’s what I imagine lava to be like.”

“Lava’s a bit different. Here, wha’ ye mean ‘imagine’?”

Ori looked up at Dwalin’s incredulous face.

“I know about lava from what I’ve read.”

“Ye’ve never seen it?”

“In pictures.”

“Can’t have that. C’mon.”

Dwalin offered his hand and Ori grabbed it, allowing himself to be pulled to his feet and back down the tunnel. Half way along Dwalin turned and placed both hands on the wall. A door just large enough for a dwarf to pass through slid open. Dwalin ushered Ori into a room the size of a closet. The entire tiny room was paneled in blue-green jewels. Ori felt like he’d been popped into a lake-themed trinket box.

Dwalin told him to hold onto a think glass handle on the wall. Ori did so and watched Dwalin pull an ornate glass lever. Ori nearly jumped out of his skin when he felt the box slide downwards. He had to hang on tightly which was difficult as the downward speed made it feel as though his tummy was trying to fly into his head. Dwalin pulled on the lever and the box slowed and gently slid to a stop. Dwalin opened the door and Ori hurried after him down the long, curving spiral staircase.

They reached the bottom and walked out a big porcelain door into what looked like Mahal’s own forge, but in reality was the work and mining levels of the mountain.

“Where’re we going?” Ori asked.

“T’ me family’s forge.”

Ori about swallowed his tongue. He had only read stories about the old Noble Forges.

At the end of an enormous long hallway, Ori saw a huge door, the family crest of the Fundins emblazoned on it.

Dwalin pulled out several keys all chained together and undid a sequence of tiny locks then pushed the door open. Ori padded into an open area surrounded by doorways screened by panels of glowing red phosphorous, the sole lighting in the room. Dwalin slid back a screen and Ori saw each of these doorways gave access to rooms stuffed with treasure. Ori had never seen so many riches in all his life, or even imagined so much.

Though these dazzled briefly, they paled in comparison to the scent that seemed to physically draw him forward. He vaguely heard Dwalin close and lock the doors behind them. Ori reached the far wall and the only other solid door in the room and laid his hand on it. It was warm, an alloy of steel and mithril. He rested his cheek against the metal. The scent drew him to press himself against the smooth surface. His fingers sought something along the metal.

He turned as Dwalin chuckled.

“Lemme open that.”

Ori stood back as Dwalin unlocked and hauled the door back into its recess. Despite being of a hand’s length thickness, the door glided sideways soundlessly.

Ori stepped through and peered into the gloom. Dwalin slid the door closed and locked it again, tossing the keys on the floor.

“Wha’ yeh think?” he murmured gruffly, crossing to lay his hands on Ori’s shoulders.

“I can’t see much but there’s a scent, a feeling.”

Dwalin walked him over to what looked like a vast stone trough running clear around the room.
In the middle of the room sat the anvil, blackened by centuries of use but the edges and surface were flawless. To Ori, it was the size of a full bed. The rounded point jutted out over the trough.

Ori turned at the scrape of a lever. Dwalin had his foot braced against the trough and he was pulling on a huge chain. Ori watched as a stone lifted at the back of the trough.
Lava poured through. The hot scent titillated and the ripe heat flowed across his face and skin. It rolled and billowed out, soundless, until it touched the trough then it sputtered and hissed. It spilled through with all the beauty and colors of fire. It spread over the stone and the flames leapt up and danced as in a seer’s flame bowl.

Ori was entranced and moved to the side of the trough. The moist bubbling rose into his face.
He took a deep breath: sweet, salt and heavy like syrup. Ori leaned closer.

“Mmm, so good,” he murmured.

“Aye, there’s naught like it,” Dwalin agreed. “Dwarves alone can revel in that scent. If they smell it close enough men and elves’ll be overcome and die. Orcs and goblins, too. Nor can they stand this close and no’ burn.”

“I never dreamed it would be so beautiful,” Ori breathed. “Look how it moves. It’s like poetry.”
He gasped, eyes glued to the element before him. “No it’s- it’s like runes!”

Ori felt Dwalin draw closer.

“Yeh know the legend then?”

“Yes,” Ori said. “Durin the Deathless watched the lava move about his forge. He listened for the voice of Mahal to command his hammer, but as he stood in the beauty, a song of Yavanna came to him in the dancing flames. He was overcome with the melding of flames and lava. He took up his splinter of mithril and poured the lava upon his anvil and as it cooled it traced the first runes which gave us the words of Khuzdul and he spoke them there in the forge.”

Dwalin slid his arms about Ori’s waist from behind. Ori felt the warmth at his back and leaned on Dwalin’s chest.

“I never had th’ steady hand like yeh an’ Balin. I got so far with me studies before adad came home an’ put an end to ’em.”

Ori felt the sorrow in his mate and folded his hands over Dwalin’s.

“I can help you, if you’d like.”

“Thanks, love. If yeh could read me some of th’ old poets sometime, I’d like that.”

“Of course I will.”

Ori enjoyed the silence between them.

The lava roiled in the trough before them. Runes formed and changed in the trough, casting their light. Reflected sigils flowed over the walls all around them.

As the runes came and went, ancient words and poetry sprang forward. Ori felt he could hear the songs playing for him. He fumbled to speak, to sing as they rushed into his sight.

“And so they dig the depths of the Arkenstone. The star within our star. Breath of our breath. The One of…”

Ori felt Dwalin catch him as his knees gave way.
Welcome back, friends, to another episode!

Things are slightly calmer but not much this time. It’s a new morning for new things to happen and we learn the value of the Donelan adage that there’s no use in taking a lover if you can’t double your wardrobe.

Keep those cards and letter coming, friends, we love hearing from you!

Ori opened his eyes. He lay flat on his back on a bed. The ceiling told him it was in Dwalin’s room. The vague light from the window told him it wasn’t quite dawn. He glanced about and counted one pillow on the floor, one up against the headboard. He himself was tucked under Dwalin’s armpit. He heard only the flames hissing in the fireplace and the sonorous sound of Dwalin’s snoring.

Dwalin’s face at rest was more telling than awake. The scar across his eye crinkled, his skin was tanned from the sun, toil, and battle to the texture of oiled leather. The tattoos tracked across his pate.

Ori craned for a better look at them, the runes for the battle cries of their people faded with time but still easily seen. His shoulders bore the marks of the triumphs of the House of Durin. Ori smiled, this was his house now. The Rikanta line had a distant kinship. He started to wonder when and what the rest of the Rikanta clan would think of his marriage. What would they say? What would they do? He knew that both Balin and Dwalin, and most likely Thorin, would stand behind him. Thror had already given them the royal blessing, so there was no argument there. Added to that, he and Dori were Dwalin’s and Balin’s Ones.

Dwalin rumbled and shifted closer. Ori smiled. Dwalin stirred again and opened his eyes. He looked at Ori

“Ah, there now. Yer awake.”

“Yes. Thank you for tucking me up.”

Ori wiggled a little, enjoying the heat of the furs.

“Mmmm. Jus’ so yeh know, love, I should’a put yeh back in yer room, but seein’ as yeh’d been that upset t’ the point a’ bein’ sick, it made me feel better t’ put yeh here where I could keep an eye on yeh.”

Ori looked back up at the ceiling and grinned remembering.

“I heard the tea tray knocked out fifteen candles before destroying an entire light of elfin blown glass.”

Dwalin snorted.

“Sixteen candles, love.”
“Are you sure it wasn’t fifteen?” Ori tried to keep his voice steady.

Dwalin started chuckling.

“Sixteen an’ Thorin was stayin’ over an’ Balin was relegated t’ this room as Dis was in his.”

Ori started giggling.

“Oh well, seeing as you had witnesses.” Ori attempted to sound demure but failed.

He snuggled into his furs again, wrapped to the point he felt rather like a moth still in its cocoon. He’d never slept in furs before. They were so soft compared to the woolens he was used to. Then again, the past few nights he had been enamored of his cotton sheets. He smiled to himself and burrowed in again.

“So soft,” he murmured. “Furs and a cotton quilt below. You have the best bed in the world.”

“Like it?” Dwalin asked.

“Yes.”

“Anytime yeh like.”

“Oh- I- ”

“I don’t mean that, love. I mean, if yeh like sleepin’ here, yer more then welcome. An’ I do mean just’ sleep.”

Ori turned to face Dwalin, who lay stretched out on his belly beside him.

“I do like it,” he said truthfully.

“I like yeh here. Yer good t’ talk to.”

Ori smiled shyly.

“You’re very good to me, Dwalin.”

“I’m yer husband. An’ speakin’ a which, yer a pretty damn good husband yerself.”

Ori blinked in surprise.

“Really? How so? I haven’t done much.”

“Well, as Balin says, yeh put up with me an’ he says me temper’s improved.”

Ori laughed. “If this is you good tempered I’d hate to see you sulk.”

Dwalin chuckled.

Ori had been going to roll and put part of his fur over Dwalin but found he was found he was wrapped far tighter than he had thought.

“How do I get out of this?”

Dwalin knelt up and got ahold of the end of Ori’s other side and started to pull. Ori rolled onto his side. Ori looked up at Dwalin, who grinned wickedly.
“Don’t you dare!” Ori gasped out.

Too late. Dwalin was on his feet in a flash and yanked the wrapping upward. Ori flew into the air and spun around before landing back in the bed on his belly.

“Dwalin!” Ori choked, laughing and reeling with dizziness.

Dwalin dropped down beside him, laughing quietly. Ori sat up, grabbed a pillow to swat Dwalin, but was still too dizzy and fell over. Dwalin laughed harder. Ori sat up again, got a good hold of the pillow, and swatted Dwalin upside the head. Dwalin nearly fell off the bed but didn’t stop laughing.

“Nice shot, love!”

“You made me dizzy, you- you buffalo!”

Dwalin raised an eyebrow then put both his fists to his brow and pointed his forefingers like horns then made a snort noise.

Ori squeaked and swung the pillow into a ready position, having a terrible time trying not to giggle. They fenced, then Dwalin charged, knocking both of them to the end of the bed. Ori smothered a shout, lest he awaken the house. With the pillow between them, Dwalin rolled to them back up to the top of the bed then freed Ori, snickering. Ori tried to frown but couldn’t.

He settled on “Daft!”, reached out and ruffled the hair around Dwalin’s ear.

“Snort, snort, bellow,” Dwalin replied cheerfully then settled back about the pillows. He pulled up the furs and patted the space beside him

“C’mon, love. Back t’ sleep.”

Ori laughed, scooted over and settled beside Dwalin, automatically turning on his side. He was pleasantly surprised as Dwalin spooned behind him and pulled the furs in close. Ori drifted back to sleep with a smile on his face.

Ori felt warm, curled on his side, with a heavy arm around him and a large breathing furnace behind him. Ori licked his lips and tasted powder. His eyes popped open and he groaned at the sight. He and Dwalin cuddled together in the middle of the bed and completely covered in gold dust.

“Fuck you both, Balin and Dori,” Ori muttered to himself, spitting quietly to get the dust out of his mouth.

“Just swallow, love,” Dwalin grunted. “It’s considered good luck if yeh shit gold th’ next day.”

Ori sat up and looked down at Dwalin, who flopped over on his back and laced his fingers across his chest. He looked like he had been dropped in a bin of gold dust. Ori glanced down and saw he had fared the same.

Dwalin snorted in good humor.

“Apparently some people think we need a shit full of luck,” Ori groused. As bits and pieces of the night before came back to him, Ori groaned, “Please don’t tell me I fainted in the forge.”

“Nah, yeh fell asleep readin’ fire runes on th’ wall.”
Dwalin rolled over and grabbed a small bound notebook while Ori tried not stare at Dwalin’s ass.

“Here.” Dwalin handed Ori the book and opened it to about a quarter of the way through. “I wrote down all yeh said when yeh started readin’.”

Ori was at a loss for words, so he settled on, “Thank you, Dwalin. That was so good of you.”

Dwalin smirked at him.

“Can’t yeh thank a body better than that?”

Ori considered, then decided he was fine.

“Alright then.” He smiled. “Just let me take off my britches.”

“Ori!”

“What?” Ori asked in surprised.

“Durin’s arse, love. I were only hintin’ f’r a kiss!”

“Oh!” Ori blushed then realized how silly the situation was and giggled. “Sorry.”

He crawled over to Dwalin and puckered up. Dwalin caught his chin and kissed him.

Once free Ori giggled again and stood upright on the bed. Gold dust streamed off him. He struggled to keep his feet. The bed was remarkable springy. Curious, he hopped a little. The bed bounced him back higher than before. Ori couldn’t suppress a crow of delight as he bounced up and down as hard as he could. Covers went every which way, the pillows toppled off, clouds of gold dust went everywhere, and the headboard knocked against the wall. The bed made a distinct squeak noise.

“Springs, metal. A mannish idea,” Dwalin explained as he kept himself on the bed with both hands on the underquilt.

Ori was about to reply when he heard voices in the hallway.

“Leave them be, lad.”

“Yes, Nori, dear Balin has the right of it. Let them get up in their own time.”

“Hush up! Couple a cooshy-doos the pair a yeh. I’m just checkin’ on our wee Ori.”

“Nori! Leave them be!”

Ori looked at Dwalin, who rolled his eyes, got off the bed, and rose to his feet. Ori couldn’t help himself. He bounced violently on the bed. Dwalin turned and stared. The voices in the hall died at the sound of the metal springs and the headboard doing a regular beat against the wall. Ori grinned at Dwalin.

“Oooooh Dwalin!” he moaned loudly.

Dwalin bent double with a hand clapped over his mouth.

Ori felt creative as he bounced.

Ori watched as Dwalin staggered back on the bed and buried his face in the under quilt, shoulders shaking.

“You’re a huge bear,” Ori cried, delighted with his mate’s reaction. “Oh! By all the gods, I’m being fucked by the Lord of the Carrock, Beorn himself. Yessss! Ooze within me, my beloved!”

There came a horrible roar and something Nori-sized crashed against the door, a scolding protest from Dori, then the unwelcome noise of Nori retching. Ori fell back against the mattress and stuffed the hem of his night shirt into his mouth. Dwalin came into his line of vision and dropped a pillow on his face. Ori desperately tried to laugh quietly. Dwalin’s face came under the pillow and Ori felt the furs being pulled over the both of them.

“Nori! That’s disgusting!” Dori scolded. “And Sweet Yavannah! What have you being eating, you horrid badger?”

“I’ll get the bucket from the stable,” said Balin.

Dwalin and Ori giggled harder into each other’s necks.

“I’m so fuckin proud a’ yeh!” Dwalin managed to hiss into Ori’s ear.

“I’m not going out there before Nori cleans up his sick,” Ori replied.

He snuggled closer to Dwalin as they listened to Dori scold while Nori cleaned and swore. Ori smiled. It sounded like home.

A bit later, the noises faded and Ori lifted his head. Dwalin seemed to be dozing off again. Pleased with the lack of bodies outside the door, Ori sat up carefully but woke Dwalin anyway.

“Oi! Where ye off to, me wee nug-humper?”

Ori turned and made a face at Dwalin’s naughty grin.

“To pee, oh great cock of the north.”

Dwalin snorted.

“That’s right. Th’ envy a men an’ elves.”

“Aren’t you lucky then,” Ori teased, putting out his tongue.

Dwalin caught him close and kissed him deeply. First Ori was startled, but the warmth and sweetness of Dwalin’s tongue exploring his mouth quickly turned him boneless.

It was so gentle, yet teasing. Ori wasn’t sure how to respond, but clung to Dwalin and tried to mimic what he’d enjoyed earlier. It must have been right as Dwalin made a pleased growl and laid Ori back against the mattress, sliding his arm around Ori as he did. Ori wrapped his arms around Dwalin’s neck and couldn’t stifle a murmur of pleasure of his own. Dwalin worked around to kiss along his cheeks and his eyelids, light feathery kisses, before trailing down to Ori’s neck. Ori gasped and clutched Dwalin’s shoulders as Dwalin left a trail of hot kisses and little nips. Even though Ori hadn’t done this before his body seemed to know what to do as he relaxed and drew his left knee up to clasp against Dwalin’s hip.
Dwalin was heavy on him, nuzzling his collarbone, nipping hard, then soothing with his tongue and more kisses.

“Dwalin,” Ori managed and hugged him tighter.

Ori squirmed round to get another kiss and Dwalin obliged, worrying Ori’s lower lip gently between his teeth. Ori felt the heat and pleasure down in his crotch. He moaned for more and his stomach growled loudly.

Ori blushed and Dwalin fell away laughing.

“Some ane needs their breakfast.”

“Sorry,” Ori chuckled at himself.

Dwalin rolled off the bed and offered Ori his hand. Ori let Dwalin take his weight as he was pulled off the bed. Dwalin drew him close for another kiss.

“I’ll be right back,” Ori said with a smile.

“Go eat. I’ll be through in a bit,” Dwalin said.

Ori turned but squeaked when he received a light smack on his butt. He made a face at Dwalin, who grinned.

After visiting the bathroom, Ori romped through to the kitchen. On the hob, there was a kettle on the side plate and on the steady heat was a large pan bubbling with porridge. Honey and cream were set on the counter. Ori found himself a bowl and spoon. He helped himself to porridge and the consistency told him Dori had made it, creamy and salty. He greedily poured cream over the surface, he was about to stuff the first loaded spoonful into his mouth when he saw an open door leading to a small, beautiful eating area. He went through and there were Dori and Balin having tea. Ori bounced forward, and dumped his bowl on the table.

“Ori’s Dori!” he shouted and pounced into Dori’s lap.

“Oomph!” Dori managed, immediately squashed. “Sweet Yavanna, my love! You’re far too big to sit in my lap!”

“ORI’S DORI!” Ori laughed and hugged harder, shoving his mop of hair into Dori’s face and rubbing.

As of old, Dori burst out laughing and hugged back then tickled Ori until Ori fell on the floor in helpless giggles.

Balin chuckled as Ori clambered to his feet and glomped onto him.

“Good morning brother,” Ori cried out in Balin’s ear.

Balin laughed ad patted Ori’s back with both hands

“Sleep well, laddie?” he asked with a sly wink.
“Brilliantly,” Ori answered with a grin.

“Sit down properly and eat your porridge. I’ll pour your tea,” Dori ordered. “Such a carry-on and before breakfast on first rest day.”

Ori plumped down on a chair and shoved a spoonful of porridge into his mouth. Dori filled another cup, adding cream and honey before putting it before Ori.

“Chew, badgerling, don’t inhale.”

“Eth, Duthee,” Ori managed. He hadn’t realized how hungry was was.

“Aye, lad.” Balin agreed. “You’re missing a treat.”

“Where’s th’ tea?” Dwalin strode in, wearing nothing but his pink drawers.

Dori had to suppress a shriek of mirth.

“Good morning to you, too, brother,” Balin said dryly. “Ask Master Dori.”

Dori had both hands clapped over his mouth, eyes dancing with laughter. Dwalin reached across between Balin and Dori to put his bowl of porridge next to Ori then put his mug down next to Dori.

“Wha’?” Dwalin asked as Dori was still attempting to control himself but failing miserably “Dori’s never boiled the reds with the whites.” Ori explained around his last mouthful of porridge.

Dwalin rolled his eyes and a tinge of a blush appeared in his cheeks. Dori fell back in his chair and roared with laughter. Balin took mercy on his brother and filled the waiting mug. Dwalin grunted thanks. Nori entered, grunted a greeting, and poured himself some tea. Ori pushed his bowl aside, came over to Dori and climbed back into his lap.

“Ooof, pet,” Dori huffed. “Whatever’s the matter?”

“Nothing,” Ori said. “Ori’s Dori. Always Ori’s Dori.“

Dori chuckled and cuddled Ori close.

“I take it you want to go in the other room and tell me something,” Dori stated with the innate knowledge of a parent.

Ori nodded, climbed off, and, grasping Dori’s hand, pulled him into the kitchen. Dori smiled and held both Ori’s hands across his belly.

“What is it, pet? Was your first time nice?”

Ori blushed.

“Not that, Dori. I - I have something to tell you. I - I’m sorry. Dori, pleased don’t be angry...well, too angry.”

Dori’s eyes widened.

“Whatever’s happened, pet?”

Ori took a breath.
“You know I have a bad habit of...”

Dori paled then said, “You heard Balin and I talking last night.”

“Yes. And I don’t care, Dori! You’ve always been more to me than Mam. I’ve always loved you best that way and please don’t ever think that I don’t. I-”

Dori hugged him close

“Oh, pet, I know. I just don’t like you knowing about your adad and Nori’s.”

“Does Nori know?” Ori asked tucking his head under Dori’s chin.

“Oh yes, pet. He does. Don’t worry, I’ll tell him you know now.”

“I-I’m sorry about the baby, Dori. I wish-“

“I know, dear one but I have you, don’t I?”

“Oh yes! Dori there’s something else. It’s Princess Dis.”

“What in all the mines does the princess have to do with anything?” Dori asked.

“She and Mam knew one another as badgers. She’s hinted she knows who your adad was.”

To Ori’s surprise, Dori smiled and patted his hair.

“Oh, that’s no secret to me, pet. I know fine well who my sire was.”

Ori popped up. “You know?”

“Of course, pet, it was Nain, adad to Dain Ironfoot.”

Ori goggled at Dori’s shrewd smile a moment.

“Dain rules the Ironhills.” Ori started.

“I know pet, that’s why Nain had to, shall we say, to return to his own mountains so quickly.”

Ori pondered a moment then, “Dain is Thorin’s second cousin, is there something-?”

Dori shrugged and cuddled Ori closer, saying, “It’s no doubt why this Dis is so interested in me.”

“Dori, what about Mam’s family? We’re going to have to face them at some point.”

Dori chuckled, “Now pet. They cast our mam out. How can we three possibly expect to be recognize by any of them at all?”

Ori frowned.

“You mean just pretend we don’t know them?”

“Do you know any of them?” Dori asked with a smile.

“Well, no,” Ori was forced to admit. “Not really and I was still quite small when Mam died.”

Dori patted his cheek. “Then there we are, pet.”
“Nori-

“He’s of the same opinion as I am, pet. So not to worry.”

Ori was about to comment when there was a noise at the front door.

“Hello, we’re here!” Dis’ voice caroled down the hall.

Ori froze and Balin came swiftly through just as Dis entered the kitchen.

“Balin,” Dis greeted him, then caught sight of Dori.

“Durin’s beard. Balin! You have been lucky! Marvelous time out at a Dale pub?”

Ori gasped and heard Dwalin mutter “shit” in chorus with Nori. Before Balin could say a word Dori laughed brittlely.

“Oh good. I’m glad you’re here before I’m dressed. You may take the dirty laundry with you. Ori, Nori, come with me so I can do your hair. Oh, and you may start with the kitchen.”

Dori, with a hand on Ori and Nori swept out leaving stunned looks behind them as they went to Balin’s rooms.

Dori shut the door behind the, humming and smiling.

Nori flung himself on a couch.

“Pretty dressed up f’r a housekeeper. Hope she brought herself a pinnie ‘r she’ll ’be a mess before long,” Nori commented.

“Dori!” Ori gasped. “That was Princess Dis!”

Nori fell off the couch in a coughing fit that quickly turned to smothered laughter.

Dori started going through Balin’s clothes.

“I know, pet,” Dori said in soothing tones. “But if I’m just something Balin picked up at a pub, why can’t she be a cleaning dam?”

Ori sighed and hoped to Mahal that Balin and Dis would understand and there would not be any dead bodies in the kitchen.

Dori was resplendent in a few moments and was just finishing his beard braids when Balin came in. He closed the door and leant against it. Ori saw his eyes were twinkling and felt better.

“Love?”

“Yes, my One.” Dori peeped into the mirror, put the brush down and turned to smile teasingly at Balin.

“That was very naughty o’yeh, me darlin’,” Balin said lightly.

Dori laughed.

“Well, my dear, if you are happy as being my ‘latest.’”
“No, dear. I’ve explained. Now come along in yer finery an’ we can have a proper breakfast.”

Dori laughed again and sailed forward into Balin’s arms.

“How fortunate for you that I’m a bearer and it is the law that we may not be slaughtered.”

Balin snorted and enveloped Dori in his arms, murmuring, “Foolish one.”

Nori sat up looking from Dori to Ori and back.

“Dor! That’s your One?”

Ori nodded vigorously as Dori smiled.

“Yes, Nori, Balin’s my One.”

Nori stared a moment then started to grin which quickly slid to feral.

“Mahal’s big-assed bouncing balls! This is rich!” Nori laughed uproariously at them. “Thank Mahal, I’m a single lad yet!”

Balin ushered them back into the sitting room. Ori saw that not only was Dis there but also Thorin, Fili and Kili. The young dwarrow looking puzzled as Balin drew Dori close.

“Prince Thorin, Princess Dis, here is Dori, son of Rikmha, my One. We have found one another again.”

Ori watched as Dis jumped up and held out her hands to Dori.

“I am so pleased to finally meet you, Dori. Balin has missed you greatly. I do hope we shall be great friends.”

Dori took the hands offered him.

“Oh, I know we shall, my dear Princess, and more so for you have already done so much for my Ori.”

Dori and Dis came together and bumped foreheads. Dis released Dori as Thorin came forward to also bump foreheads with Dori.

“I’m glad you’re here, Dori. It’s been too long for both you and Balin,” Thorin said graciously.

Dori widened his eyes and fluttered his lashes at the prince.

“Why, thank you, dear prince. You are too good.”

Thorin briefly looked as though he’d swallowed his own tongue but recovered and bowed gracefully.

Dis introduced Fili and Kili. Ori almost groaned aloud as both princes puffed out their chests and tried to out do each other in charm.

“Ori-mate!” Fili almost shouted as he laid eyes on Ori.

Ori took the easy way out and introduced them to Nori.
Kili was quick to ask if Nori played cards.

“Oh now, lads, I haven’t played cards in ages. Ye’ll prob’ly have t’ teach me again,” Nori drawled.

“Oh no, you don’t!” Ori said elbowing Nori sharply. “You play most card games just fine.”

The other three laughed.

“Ori,” Dori called. “Come and help me scratch a few things together for a light breakfast, pet.”

Ori followed Dori through and chopped and mixed while Dori flew about to produce more porridge, eggs cooked in cream and dill. paper thin pancakes with shaved ham, onions, and sharp cheese rolled inside, hand pies filled with dried herbs stewed in wine and strained with curds. Ori made more tea and toasted an entire loaf of egg bread and kept an eye on the vast skillet piled with bacon and sausage while a huge platter of mushroom and tomatoes, roasted dark, sizzled in the side oven.

Dori spooned plum compote onto the last piece of toast and passed it to Kili. Fili and Kili were seated opposite Dori and had behaved like well-mannered puppies for the entire meal. Ori glanced down the table to see Nori between Balin and Thorin with Dwalin. The four were in deep conversation. This had been the case most of the meal with Nori being closed off at first then slowly opening up and all four were now talking heads together very seriously. Ori wondered if Dwalin and Balin had convinced Nori that his knowledge and underworld connections would be of use to the prince.

Dori and Dis seemed to have become instant bosom bows. They chattered about cooking, food, and metal work. Ori swiped the last of the jam from his plate with a forefinger, watching everyone. He sucked the jam and savored the rich flavor on his tongue. Dwalin caught his eye and winked. Ori winked back then realized the connotations and blushed.

“Right,” Dori said loudly. “Ori, pet, come and get ready. We’re all to go marketing. Now I might need a small bit of help with the clearing and washing up—”

Kili leapt to his feet.

“I shall help you gladly, Master Dori.”

Fili was on his feet, also.

“I’ll come, too, dear Master Dori. Kili can be clumsy, so I’ll make sure he doesn’t break anything.”

“Oi, I do not!” Kili argued

“You go and take your time getting ready. We’ll take care of everything,” Fili promised.

“Yes,” Kili agreed, not to be outdone. “You won’t have to lift a finger!” and began piling up dishes.

Dori smiled sweetly at both princes.

“Oh, dear Dis! What excellent young dwarrow you have raised. Thank you so much! You’re both too kind.”

Ori stifled a laugh as both princes almost wriggled at the attention from the Bearer. Dori rose and didn’t even notice the frenzied rush to get to his side to pull his chair out. Dis did and winked at Dori as Fili triumphantly opened the door for Dori to leave. Ori didn’t quite roll his eyes. Balin, Thorin, and Dwalin were still talking to Nori.

Dori took Ori’s hand and led him out.

Ori was glad it didn’t take Dori long to get Ori back into his wedding clothes. Ori felt a little worried about going through the market in such finery, while Dori sighed over it a few times.

“Dori?”

“Yes, pet?”

“When will you and Balin get married?”

“Oh, not for a bit yet, pet. As the eldest, Balin will have to put on quite a show.” Dori smiled. “Which should amuse the entire mountain at the very least.”

Ori giggled at the thought. Dori guided him to a chair, then Dori went and washed his own face and rechecked himself in the mirror.

“Come along, pet,” he said to Ori.

When they reached the sitting room everyone was waiting. Dwalin was in his full uniform and looked very well. Dis had several string shopping bags. Thorin, Nori, and Balin looked amused and Fili and Kili looked damp.
Hello again, friends!
Welcome to a new episode of Ori’s adventures. Again it’s a short one but don’t worry chapter 16 will be nice and long.

We’re going shopping, now, and we’re shopping Dwarrow Downtown Central Erebor! Oh, and we meet someone new! Not much food this time, so please be sure have your own beverage and snack. Rest assured the next chapter will be so full of food we nearly popped writing it.

Keep those cards and letters coming, friends as we love hearing from you!! Stay tuned for next Friday’s episodes and bring your appetites and don’t forget your dancing shoes!

Ori had never been to this market before. Along with carts, barrow, stalls, and tables lining the walkways, the shop fronts were built into the mountainside, each huge building that towered above was one shop with more than just a sales floor.

Balin led the way into one of these called iKrôth. Ori brightened. The place smelled rather like the library with the added scents of oils, waxes and pigments. Balin went straight to the counter and asked for the owner. While an underling rushed away, Balin had others pull out reams of different kinds of paper from thick cushiony parchment to vellum so fine, it was transparent. Balin turned to Ori.

“Now, lad, some canvases, I think. An’ take time t’ practice outside as well. Th’ river’s quite lovely any season depending on th’ weather.”

Ori gasped as the owner, Kujur, son of Tajur, arrived, bowed deeply and called for canvas. Several rolls of canvas were brought out, different widths as well as different sizes and others already stretched on frames of every proportion. Ori was almost dizzy as Balin chose several of each.

Dwalin took Ori’s hand and walked him up the spun brass spiral staircase in the middle of the shop that reached all four of the floors. They stopped at the third.

The entire space was devoted to writing implements, pens of feathers, some of steel, ornate with gems or scrollwork, and others of blown glass with colors swirled into them. The shelves held thousands of tiny glass jars of ink every color imaginable. There were pallets of stone, holding mortars and pestles of all kinds, materials and discs of colors, if you chose to grind your own ink.

Balin arrived with the others and began advising Ori on what pens he would need for different types of work. Ori stared as Balin ordered out boxes of different colors including the ones needing to be ground. Handfuls of different pens, charcoal sticks, brushes of all kinds, and graphite wands were added. There were various shades of putty and exquisite glass templates for drawing shapes and lines.

Dwalin put his foot down when it came to selecting the small bottles for carry ink for daily use. He insisted on plain round glass as he informed the group Dwalin himself would be doing the scroll work that would make them a matching set and exclusively Ori’s. Ori sidled closer and squeezed his husband’s hand, receiving a grin in reply.

The owner had three underlings with him now and all were scampering about wrapping and packing all of the things into crates to be sent to the house. Ori wasn’t allowed to protest. He looked to Dori for assistance but Dori only smiled at him, then preened as Balin looked his way. Ori began to wonder about Dori and Balin’s wedding. At this rate, it would be a huge affair.

Outside of the stationary shop they re-grouped with Thorin, Nori, Fili and Kili. Ori was firmly tucked under Dwalin’s arm as he looked about.

He saw an overdressed house guard shepherding three other dwarrow. Two middle aged dwarrowdams trailed after one very elderly, very elaborately dressed dwarrowdam. There was something about that elderly dam that made Ori nervous.

He turned and caught Dori’s eye. Dori glanced over at the group looked back at Ori and winked. Then he tucked his arm into Balin’s. Ori shrugged inwardly and laced his fingers with Dwalin’s hand resting on his shoulder.

Dis was telling them that they needed to see to Dori and Nori’s other clothes. Nori was refusing, as his contacts would suspect something. In his peripheral vision, Ori saw the elderly lady noticed Dis and Thorin and began to make her way over to them to pay her respects. Ori took a deep breath and forced himself to relax.

“Your Highnesses! A most pleasant rest day to you and all your lovely family,” the elderly lady greeted Dis.

Dis turned and nodded politely as the family before her bowed low.

“Lady Klakuna, daughter of Rikanta's house. And to your family,” Dis responded coolly.

Lady Klakuna hurriedly asked after Dis’ dear sons. Ori saw Lady Klakuna was trying overly hard to be regally charming but her air of desperation did nothing for her. She greeted Balin, who smiled and introduced Dori as his mate. Dori deigned to notice Lady Klakuna, who promptly screamed and fainted dead away at the sight of him.

Her family hurriedly picked her up, quickly explaining that the dear lady had probably had too much excitement and took her away across the market to an ornate cart drawn by a rather garishly blue dyed sheep.

Dis turned and grinned at Dori, saying softly, “So what do you think of your lovely great umad?”

“Oh dear,” Dori sighed. “She does seem a bit high-strung to be wandering about. I do hope her family will take good care of her.”

Ori nudged Dwalin as the warrior choked and swallowed his laughter. Both Thorin and Balin had trouble schooling their features.

Fili and Kili were chatting with two young dams in a cart. Ori recognized Omi and Loli. Buj approached Fili and Kili from around the cart, making vast gestures. Ori grinned and hurried over.

“Ori!” Loli called.
The young dams alit and the three friends bumped heads happily.

“Come meet everyone!” Ori said, tugging on Loli’s arm.

The young group hurried over and Dori was delighted to see the girls again.

Ori made special care to introduce Buj to Thorin and Balin.

“Buj does experiments,” Ori urged, nodding at the younger dwarf.

Buj turned raspberry and looked very pleased.

“Show ‘em your flying one!” Kili urged.

Buj happily took out his notebook and explained the plan to the prince and the lord. Balin’s expression of polite interest never changed but his eyebrows flew into his hairline. Thorin affected great attention while politely clamping a hand over his mouth.

Dori took Dis and Ori off with him to shop for clothing leaving the chatting group behind. They ran into Lady Gridr and Oin who were also delighted to see them again and explained they had just lost Gimli to Fili and the youngsters.

Ori was tired by the time Dis and Dori decided they had done enough for the day. Dis had introduced them to scores of people, some pleasant, some too noble to show disappointment that their daughters were now out of luck where Captain Dwalin was concerned.

* * *

It was late in the afternoon when they finally returned home from the markets. Thankfully Ori was sent to remove the wedding robes. It was a relief to change into his plain tunic and comfortable breeches. He slipped on his house shoes and carefully hung up the robes back in the steamer closet before he padded back into the sitting room. Thorin, Balin and Dwalin had gone but Fill and Kili lingered, trying to get Nori to play cards with them as Nori was suggesting they play dice instead.

Ori went to the kitchen where Dori and Dis were putting together tea and some cakes. Ori could see that there were several simmering pots on the cook surface and good smells came from both large ovens.

“I thought we were going to your house, Dis, for the dinner with Janifur and her brothers?” Ori asked.

“Oh, we are, dear.” She smiled.

“I just thought we’d prepare a few dishes now,” Dori said, “so it will be less of a chore when we go over.”

Ori looked about at the ‘few’ dishes. The ovens were obviously loaded and every cooking surface covered.

“Dwalin said he met Master Bofur,” said Dori.

“Yes, he and and Master Bombur will be accompanying their sister.” Ori grinned. Master
Bombur’s ability at the table was legend. “Is there anything I can do, Dori?”

“Yes. Go through and tell those boys we’ll need help to ferry all this over to dear Dis’ home.”

Ori nodded, popped a tiny raspberry tart into his mouth and pranced out of reach as Dori threatened him with a small wooden dough docker. He went out to the sound of Dis’ and Dori’s laughter. Back in the sitting room Fill and Kili watched as Thorin and Dwalin adjusted a movable twin of Balin’s desk. Balin held a straight backed, leather padded chair at the ready.

Dwalin got to his feet and grinned at Ori.

“C’mere, love, and see if it’ll suit.”

Ori trotted over. The desk was beautiful, just like Balin’s, large and full of drawers and cubby-holes for storing things. Ori admired it.

“It’s lovely, Dwalin.”

“Try it out, love.”

Ori stared.

“For me?”

“Aye, wee brother,” Balin assured.

Dwalin pulled the chair around and Ori slid into it. It was perfect. Everything was in reach and the correct height for him. The chair was so comfortable yet supported his seat and back well.

“Dwalin, it’s splendid! I don’t know how to thank you!”

“Kiss him, you pillock,” Kili supplied then yelped as Thorin cuffed him.

Ori rose with a blush and stepped into Dwalin’s arms for a quick kiss and a long hug.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode! Lots of food, fun, food, drama, food, and dancing! There’s also food! Always food! If you are offended by people getting rather soused, please bear up, these are dwarrow. Besides, they won’t be soused long and most are funny drunks. Lots of links in this one, mostly so you can see/hear/cook what inspired us while we wrote. Keep those cards and letters coming! We love getting your comments and especially your speculations! ;D Enjoy and see you all next Friday!!

“You want us to bring in all the shopping, sister?” Thorin asked in an oddly light tone as he stood in the receiving area of the Durin household.

Between helping Dori and Dis organize the food and seeing the Fundin side of the family all dressed for the special dinner with the Urs, Ori had yet to be able to wrench his eyes from his husband. Thorin, his nephews, and Dwalin were in dress battle uniform. With his usual weapons and boots, Dwalin was dressed in the green tartan with red stripes of the Fundin House and kilt. The sash was caught at his shoulder with an old fashion brass medallion. Thorin and his nephews were similarly attired in the plaid of the Durin blue.

Dis poked her head around the hallway door from the kitchen where she and Dori were setting down the last of the food they had made.

“Yes, brother, bring in all the shopping. Thank you!” She vanished with a huff and Ori could hear her telling Dori and Dori commiserating.

Thorin turned with an evil grin to Dwalin and Nori.

“Well, lads, you heard. All of it.”

Dwalin straightened his shoulders and Nori snickered and rolled up his sleeves. Ori had a bad feeling about it. He opened his mouth to ask Dwalin if this was wise but Dwalin stopped him with a swift kiss.

“Jus’ stay here, love. We’ll take care a’ all of it.”

The three dwarrow went out and returned with all the cloth, food and supplies. These were parked near the far wall of the receiving room. Ori was about to breathe a sigh of relief but the three trooped out again, mischief on their faces.

Ori groaned as the double doors opened and the three returned carrying Ori’s new pony, Honda. Ori was so glad he and Honda had liked one another instantly. She was a little nervous being carried into a house but she saw Ori and he couldn’t stop himself from giving the pony a guilty yet non-committed shrug. Ori could have sworn she rolled her eyes.
Thorin, Dwalin and Nori carried the now placid Honda into the middle of the room. Thorin patted her head as Dwalin and Nori maneuvered her into position. Dwalin grinned like a fool at Ori, who shook his head. As if Nori needed help pulling pranks and causing trouble. Ori was quite sure Fili and Kili got their streak of naughtiness form their idad.

“All in, dear sister,” Thorin almost crowed.

“Thank you,” Dis called.

Ori watched as the three snickered together.

There was a heavy knock at the front door. Ori realized the Ur family had arrived.

Mistress Dazla hurried in from the kitchen, having shed her apron. She sidestepped the dwarrow and the pony with barely a quirk of her brow and opened the door with a flourish.

“Welcome, honored guests!”

Ori smiled weakly as Bofur, Bombur and Master Bifur trooped in first.

Their friendly smiles dissolved as they stared at Thorin, Nori, and Dwalin standing beside Honda. Honda regarded the guests with a banal expression and whinnied politely.

“Mahal’s arse!” Bofur said. “Bif, when yeh said the royals were a tad daft I din’t think yeh meant this daft!”

Dis hurried in with swish of skirt and a flash of blue.

“Come in, come in! Welcome. Please make yourselves comf-”

Master Bifur looked at the pony, threw back his head and roared with laughter. This galvanized Thorin and Balin, who recognized Bifur immediately.

“Master Bifur!” Thorin shouted. “Well met, old friend! It’s good to see you so well.”

The prince greeted his old man-at-arms with a hearty embrace and an enthusiastic forehead thump. Balin was not far behind in exclaiming his pleasure at seeing Master Bifur again after so long. Thorin turned.

“Sister, look! Here’s-”

“Dear brother.” Dis had her arms akimbo and turned the full force of the Durin glare on Thorin.

“What?” Thorin asked, confused.

“What? What!” Dis’ voice rose. “There’s a pony in my receiving room and you have the nerve to stand there and say ‘what’?”

Fili and Kili popped in on either side of their amad

“Oi,” Fili announced. “There’s a pony in here?”

“Where?” Kili demanded. “Amad, why’s there a pony in the room?”

“I don’t know,” Dis hissed. “Ask your idad.”
Put on the spot, Thorin cleared his throat, took a nonchalant stance, and shrugged.

“Well sister, you did tell us to bring in all the shopping. We simply did as you asked.”

The Ur family all chuckled.

“There’s a tease for yeh, mistress,” Bofur commented genially.

Thorin looked pleased at this.

Dis pinned Bofur with her eye then scowled at Thorin.

“Thorin Oakenshield, Prince of Dwarrow, get that pony out of my house or I swear I’ll take you out in the square and beat you with it!”

“Well said, dear,” Dori chimed in, appearing at the door.

“Hear that, Bif?” Bofur quipped. “Lass is going t’ beat ‘im with a pony. I want t’ see this!”

“Thorin!” Dis didn’t quite scream but Fili and Kili dove for cover and the Ur family backed up.

“Right, lads,” Balin said soothingly. “Excellent fun for all, now let’s get our Ori’s poor pony out to the stable.”

Ori suddenly felt his moment had arrived. He hurried over.

“I’ll do it.”

He caught the reins from the back and hopped up as Dwalin had taught him earlier. He nudged Honda’s flank with his heel and Honda trotted gaily toward the door.

Fili and Kili rushed to the door but only succeeded in knocking into a young dam which sent all three of them ass over tea kettle. Honda watched unimpressed.

Fili was up first and helped the dam to her feet, which was difficult as she was laughing so hard.

Kill held open the double doors. Ori urged Honda forward a bit too vigorously. Honda barreled through the open doors and bowled Frerin off the front step. Honda buzzed into the square and reared happily, rolling Ori off onto his butt. Ori squawked but wasn’t hurt. Honda was beside him instantly, snuffling in his hair.

Ori started to pick himself up, part of him horrified at what he had done, but he couldn’t stop the giggles. He’d got to his knees when a pair of familiar hands hoisted him up.

“I’m fine.” He beamed up at an extremely amused Dwalin.

“Aye, love, jus’ ride a bloody pony through the royal household.”

Ori smiled sweetly.

“It wasn’t through the household, just the receiving room.”

“Smartarse.”

Ori turned and saw Balin and Thorin solicitously picking up and brushing off Frerin, while Dis, her boys and the Ur family watched.
Ori caught a hold of Honda’s reins and Dwalin called over a young badger who was employed in Thorin’s stable and gave him a gold coin to take Honda back to Fundin House. Dwalin led Ori back in time to see Bombur hand Dis a large box tied with pink string. Master Bombur had made his famous strawberry tarts.

Dis thanked him profusely and Dori whisked the box off to the kitchen.

Ori finally had a chance to have a look at Frerin’s ‘miner lass’.

Janifur was as tall as Bofur and as wide as Bombur, crossed across her back were the tools of her trade, a mattock and a pickaxe. Her red-blond hair was caught up in series top knots from her forehead to her neck then the rest poured freely down her back to below her waist. Her beard was intricately divided and braided upwards into her eyebrows and hair. She wore brown breeches and copper-toed boots. Her rose-colored, lace-trimmed tunic showed off her cleavage most advantageously. Ori slapped himself mentally for thinking that Frerin could easily asphyxiate in those enormous, round pillows of boobage and die happy.

* * *

The food was sumptuous and so good. It was the first time Ori ever attended a dinner so fancy that it included a gravy course.

He glanced about. Thorin sat at the head of the table with Bifur on his left and, as always, Balin on his right. Dori was cozily next to Balin and across from Dwalin. Ori smiled, very happy to be seated next to his husband and opposite Fili. Bofur was on Ori’s other side and bantering across the table with Nori. Bombur sat easily between Nori and his younger sister, smiling benignly across the table at Kili who seemed vaguely uncomfortable with his Idad Frerin between himself and his amad at the foot. Frerin gazed dreamily over the table at Jani, who was chatting animatedly with Dis.

First course consisted of several different kinds of mushrooms cooked with bacon and flavored with parsley, sage, rosemary, and thyme.

Ori ate and watched the two dams laughing and talking. Jani often reached over and grasped Dis’ hand when making a point. It hadn’t taken Ori long to realize not only would Frerin and Janifur make a terrible match, but their likes were far from similar.

At this point the second course arrived. Ori was rather disappointed at all the vegetables: roasted ramps, morels, wood sorrel, nettles, fiddle heads, and fried pickles. He shook his head when Dori passed him the dish of fiddleheads, drenched in butter and fried with bacon.

“Try it,” Dori murmured to him. “Just a mouthful.”

Ori shook his head.

“I don’t like green food.”

Dori heaved a sigh and rolled his eyes. He put half a spoonful on Ori’s plate anyway along with one fried pickle. Ori tried the pickle and refused to admit it was quite nice. He smiled hugely at Dwalin when his kind husband swiped the fiddleheads off his plate and ate them while Dori wasn’t Frerin liked the idea of the mines but his love was the court and nobles. He was quick-witted but at the same time short tempered and spoiled by his position in society.

Ori thoroughly enjoyed the third course which got him a good bowl of rich goat stew, deep brown and redolent with chunks of meat.

Janifur was on par with Frerin’s wit but she was temperate, even in the greatest passion about her work. She and Dis were equals when it came to matching gems to gold. Ori overheard Dis exclaim when Janifur admitted it had been she who had left small ingots of rose gold on Dis’ supply table.

The fourth course was chrain which Ori had never tasted and decided that for a vegetable item it was rather good. It was served with boiled beef tongue, the meat dark and very tender but with Nori and Bofur joking about the meat that tastes you back, he had a hard time enjoying it.

Ori glanced back at Janifur and caught himself from gasping. On Janifur’s face he saw the same dizzy look of love Ori remembered on Frerin’s except instead of directing it at the young prince, Janifur was looking at the princess.

“Oh no,” Ori thought. “But it does make sense as to why she happily agreed to come to have dinner. Now what? Frerin’s too enamored to notice how Janifur is looking at Dis. I wonder…”

Ori was utterly distracted by the gravy course which was excellent and warmed his tummy through and through.

Ori went back to watching Dis under his lashes. Dis was quite unaffected and obviously enjoyed talking with another who shared her passion.

A movement caught Ori’s eye and he followed from the hand to Dori’s eyes. Dori raised an eyebrow. Ori glanced back at Dis and Janifur. Dori didn’t have to look long. The adoration in Janifur’s face was obvious.

Dori smiled like an overindulged cat who had just eaten the pet songbird. Always quick, Nori widened his eyes and his grin became feral as he turned to Bofur. Bofur grinned back and shrugged. Bombur took a long sip of wine and winked at Bifur, who snickered and signed in Ingleshmek to the upper table ‘beguiled, besotted, and befuddled.’

“Fuck,” hissed Dwalin in Ori’s ear.

Ori nodded with his mouth full.

Fill and Kili slowly became cognizant of what was happening while the sixth course was served. Lecsó with bread and hard boiled pigeon eggs.

Dis caught her older brother’s eye and realized that, except for Frerin and Janifur, the entire table was smiling knowingly at her. Her mouth opened then she turned to Janifur and saw the dam’s smitten gaze. Dis swallowed and blushed. Janifur realized her brothers and cousin were watching and turned scarlet. She fervently tried to admire the ceiling rather than face anyone.

Everyone was reduced to silence by the main course which was grilled elk chop smothered with morels, topinambour, roasted potatoes, parsnips, honeyed carrots and mashed turnips.

Dis recovered and bit her lip a little then neatly turned to Frerin to ask his opinion of the work in the mines.
Frerin grinned triumphantly at his sister.

“See, sis, I told you she’d fit right in with us. Thorin!” he called loudly. “Now you and Balin have no reason not to see udad about her!”

“What?” squawked Dis and Janifur together.

“Durin’s balls, Frerin!” Janifur barked, making him stare at her like a kicked puppy.

“What Janifur? I just—“

“I said I admired and liked your sister. That doesn’t give you the right to barge in before I get a chance to ask if she’d like to court!”

Janifur’s face froze when she caught up with what had been coming out of her mouth. She clapped both hands over it and turned horrified eyes on Dis. Dis recovered her composure. Frerin was still trying to get his jaw off the table.

“Nice one, Jani!” Bofur called as Bombur and Bifur could no longer contained their laughter.

Frerin refitted his jaw.

“You mean you don’t fancy me?”

Janifur gaped.

“You? You’ve said you’ve seen me before and never noticed I don’t fancy males?”

“You don’t fancy any males?” Frerin paused.

Janifur rolled her eyes.

“Oh, honestly Frerin! How can you be so dense? I’ve got a dam to dam bead in my beard and another in my hair, not a dam to dwarf!”

Frerin looked abashed then blurted out.

“I just thought you were poor and it didn’t matter so much in the lower classes.”

Silence.

Ori grumbled inwardly. The Ur family went stone-faced. Thorin groaned aloud and buried his face in his hands. Balin squeezed the bridge his nose and muttered about years of teaching wasted. Dis was mortified and Fili and Kili shifted embarrassment.

“Frerin, yeh dumb-fuck,” Dwalin said.

The tension broke at that and everyone except Frerin chuckled.

Janifur looked at Dis, mumbling.

“’M sorry. Wasn’t supposed to come out like that.”

Dis laughed.

“Things like that never do, dear.”
Frerin leapt to his feet.

“So you just used me to get to my sister and get yourself a place in the nobility, did you? And make me a laughing stock of the place! Well, I hope you’re happy that you succeeded in making both me and my family look like fools!”

“You did that fine on your own,” Thorin commented dryly. “Bifur, old friend-”

“I hope you’re pleased, you above-ground spiderling!” shouted Frerin. “Going to find a nice tree-shagger next?”

Dis and Bombur grabbed Janifur as she lunged across the table in her rage. An instant later Balin and Dwalin forcibly escorted Frerin out.

Dis and Thorin started to apologize but both Bifur and Bombur waved the whole matter away and Bofur made a few jokes about youth and hot heads.

When the Fundin brothers returned with a still furious Frerin, the rest of the dinner passed merrily except for Frerin who refused any more food and openly seethed in silence. The Ur family ignored him. They finished with diplomat pudding and figgy duff.

They had all risen from the table and Dis was leading the way back through the reception area when Dazla met them and smiled.

“The families of the Sons of Groin, marm.”

“Here we are!” Gridr cried.

Janifur gave a shout of delight and rushed to her aunt. The two dams hugged ecstatically. Gloin and Gimli called welcome to both the Urs and the Durins, followed by Oin and Binni.

Ori had not met Binni before. He was of a height with Oin but built along the lines of Marhdin. His hair and beard were mithril like Dori’s, both tied back in leather thongs. The two long braids of his mustache swung heavily, completely beaded with jade to match his eyes.

He dressed in an unadorned deep orange suit with boots dyed to match. They had open lacings which sported his bright yellow socks.

When he was presented to Dori they saluted each other on the lips then Binni pulled Nori’s ear and patted Ori on the head.

Ori was delighted to knock foreheads with both Omi and Loli, both of them in very fancy party dresses. The dresses had puffed sleeves (the latest thing, Loli told him later, from West Farthing) and the hems dropped to a little below the knee. Both were in white with foaming lace at their throats, their sleeves and the hems of their skirts. Both wore white kidskin boots, tied with lace ribbons, which reminded Ori of his wedding boots.

Gimli also greeted Ori with a forehead thump of some violence and was obviously quite pleased with his own new suit of fawn brown leather adorned with iolite.

Dis brought Ori, Dori, Gridr, Binni, Omi, Loli, and Jani with her to a small parlor with a wonderfully figured curtained archway opposite and a lovely fire in a small marble brazier in the middle. There were seats around the fire and Dis bade them make themselves comfortable and served them frozen dessert of mixed fruit and strong liquor along with the raspberry tarts. Gridr had brought cupcakes with pink icing and honey cakes. Binni added a platter of iced cookies. Dori was kind enough to bring out his little silver flute and played for them while Binni sang. Dis, Gridr, and Jani shared a pipe and Ori, Loli and Omi thoroughly enjoyed their dessert.

Soon, Ori became aware of some rather strange noises from beyond the curtained archway. Gridr started up at a loud thump and went to the arch. She drew the curtain open and there was Bofur.

“There yeh are, mistress! Just coming’ through t’ fetch yeh ladies.”

“Why thank you Master Bofur,” Dori said with a dazzling smile. “How kind you are. May I request the pleasure of your arm to escort me through?”

Ori choked on a giggle as Bofur blushed and almost bounded across the room to do as he was bid. He gamely offered his other arm to Binni, who smiled ferally and sidled close to the miner. Jani and Dis giggled like school dams and Gridr had to hold the princess up.

Ori hopped up, a touch dizzy but in a very pleasant way and went through to the bigger room, Loli and Omi scampering after him. While he and the others enjoyed dessert, the Urs, the Fundins, the Sons of Groin, and the Durins were busy (Frerin had obviously stomped off in high dudgeon.) for the low table by the hearth overflowed with empty tankards around a large, tapped keg.

Master Bombur beat his fingers on a large drum between his knees and adjusted the tension to his liking. Bifur bent over a box, fitting his pipes together. Ori gasped as Thorin uncovered a beautiful harp. Kili and Fili had produced fiddles and the Fundin brothers their viols. Dwalin looked up and grinned at Ori, who was walking quite steadily thank you very much. Dwalin started to cross to him but Bombur struck the drum and began to keep a beat. Bifur swung the bagpipes to his shoulder and the drone rasped out under the first notes. Dwalin turned and glared at them, but the pipes and drum were insistent. Bombur laughed. Dwalin blew out a breath and chuckled.

“Bash on with it, Dwalin!” Thorin called. “Do what you’re called to!”

Kili gave a shout, seconded by Gimli, and Loli and Omi squealed delightedly.

Dwalin cussed but removed his axes and tossed aside his shoulder plaid. Removing the hoods, he laid the axes crossed on the floor then turned and bowed to Ori with the others behind him. Ori’s mouth dropped open as Dwalin turned and, with a lightness Ori had never expected, Dwalin stepped up to the axe heads and began to dance.

Ori had heard of, but never seen, the warriors’ axe dance. Dwalin crossed and circled his weapons, his boots pounded against the floor and the kilt swung with his movements. But never once, no matter how close he seemed to come, did any part of his boots ever touch the weapons. With a final leap, Dwalin finished and bowed to his audience. Bombur gave the drum a last blow and shouted in triumph as everyone else clapped and cheered.

“Oi, Jani, “ Bifur called, he pointed at another case. Jani grinned at Dis and went over and produced a balalaika. She spun a silver plectrum and strummed a chord. Balin twirled on his heel and bowed low to Dori. Dori went off into a peal of laughter and allowed himself to be led to the middle of the floor which Dwalin had vacated along with his axes. They bowed to each other and began to clap. Everyone but Bombur on the drum, Fili on the fiddle and Jani strumming a country tune joined in.

Balin and Dori lifted their hands and began to do the forward kicks in time with the clapping. They whirled and bowed to each other then caught their hands high and hopped deftly about in a circle.

Ori loved to watch Dori dance. He was so light on his feet. Dori was laughing and beaming at Balin who glowed back at him in perfect love.

Ori clapped until his palms tingled.

Balin finished by lifting Dori in a spin then they bowed together.

Dwalin shouted for more and Nori and Bofur seconded him.

“No,” cried Dori. “You two shall sing to us!”

Nori and Bofur exchanged bows and wicked looks.

“Now here we go,” Bofur began then he and Nori gave the company a silly, rather rude song about dragons and maidens. Fili, Kili and Jani shrieked with laughter while Dis and Dori scolded. Loli and Omi were giggling but very red.

Ori was beyond delight when Dwalin fetched him to join the others in a circle dance. Bombur, Bifur and Kili teased the dancers by playing faster and faster until they were all breathless and almost falling over one another.

Balin took over the drum, Kili the fiddle, and Dori played the flute for a reel. Again the musicians raced the dancers. Dwalin tossed Ori in the air, making him shout, and Jani swung Dis so hard she crashed into Thorin and kicked the pair of them head over haunches and when the tune finally ended they fell about, panting and laughing. Mistress Dazla came in with iced liquors and they refreshed themselves.

Thorin played them some soft beautiful melodies on the harp while they rested. Ori sat cross-legged on the floor before the hearth. Strangely enough Fili, Kili, Gimli, Loli, and Omi joined him there.

Gridr, Gloin, Oin and Binni sang some old ballads with Thorin. Dis, Balin and Dwalin joined in. Nori and Bofur played their flutes with Thorin’s harp. Ori sighed, he was warm and the air full of music. Sounding through, the voice of his heartsong thrilled him. He was full of food and the iced liquors were so delicious. He turned to look up at Dwalin who was seated in a deep arm chair beside him. Dwalin looked down to him and grinned fondly. Ori clambered to his knees and then up into Dwalin’s chair. Dwalin helped Ori sit in his lap. Ori snuggled his head into Dwalin’s shoulder.

“I’m sooooo happy,” he crooned into his husband’s ear.

“Oh, aye? Are yeh now?”

“Yes, yes completely. I wish I was a bearer.”

“Huh?”

Ori lifted his head and smiled at Dwalin, who was staring at him confused.

“Yes,” he said, grinning. “I wish I was a bearer and I’d give you lots and lots and lots of badgers! Yes, I would and I don’t particularly like looking after young ones. Oh, Tilda was alright because she would go home after a bit. You know we’d have to get the stone masons in.”
“Why?” Dwalin asked very carefully for some reason.

“If I was a bearer and gave you lots and lots and lots of badgers, we’d have to convert the upstairs into a huge nursery. Imagine that! You might have to expand the house! There I’d be, popping out badger after badger like a bubble mud geyser. Mind,” Ori frowned in thought, “I really don’t know how I’d get any of my work at the library done as I’d be having to run back and forth popping out badgers. I’m not sure I’d like that,” he reflected. “What little I’ve read about pregnancy, it sounds too much like being constipated and badgers aren’t poop. They’re much larger and that would hurt.”

Dwalin was shaking. Ori examined him. Dwalin was definitely shaking, had his face in the hand that wasn’t holding Ori. Ori took the hand away from his husband’s face.

“Don’t cry, beloved,” he comforted. “Neither of us are bearers so we can always adopt or simply enjoy any badgers produced by Balin and Dori.”

Dwalin grinned up at Ori.

“Love, yer a’ least three parts drunk.”

Ori eyed him owlishly.

“No, I’m not. I know I’m not. I’m rather happy but I know I’m not drunk. I got drunk with Nori. He took me to a pub and we had a boiled dinner and he gave me all the ale I wanted as Dori was away and doesn’t approve of me having lots of ale. Nori was sitting opposite me and I downed my eighth ale, I felt sick and tried to get up and accidentally threw up all over Nori’s drink, his front, and in his lap. He had to carry me home. Don’t laugh. He was most annoyed with me!”

Dwalin choked and re-arranged their seating so Ori was straddling Dwalin’s knees facing him.

“So you see,” Ori continued, “I know I’m not drunk as I don’t feel in the least bit queasy and I know I’m not going to throw up.”

“I’ll put yer head over th’ side a’ th’ chair, if I see yeh lookin’ that way, love.”

“Would you?” Ori asked, raising his eyebrows interestedly. “You know, I think that is a very wise idea. Floors are much easier to clean that chairs.”

Ori paused and sighed. He really was the luckiest dwarf ever to live. Dwalin was so handsome.

“You are beautiful,” he said simply.

Dwalin blinked, swallowed then chucked Ori under the chin.

“Aye, an’ yer lovelier than any I’ve ever seen.”

Ori wrapped his arms somewhat awkwardly around Dwalin’s neck and kissed him. He knew this was a good idea as Dwalin made a pleased noise and leaned back in the chair. One of Dwalin’s hands clamped around Ori’s butt and Dwalin’s other hand slid up into Ori’s thick hair, pulling him closer into the kiss.

“Oi,” Bofur said. “Get yerselves a room, yeh drunks.”

Enraged, Ori sat up so quickly he overbalanced. If it hadn’t been for Dwalin’s grip on him, he’d have continued back and landed smack on the floor.

“I’m not sex and we’re not having drunk!” Ori snapped angrily.
Dwalin roared with laughter.

Bofur grinned down at Ori.

“Are yeh sure, laddie? Want t’ run that by us again?”

“Huh?” Ori inquired.

Dori swam into his eyesight and handed him a cup.

“Drink this, pet. No more frozen drinks for you.”

Ori obediently knocked back the contents. He almost wailed as the bitter, oily taste hit his tongue.

“Dori!”

Ori felt the inside of his stomach burn then the fuzzy feeling in his head cleared. He blinked and looked around. Gimli lay flat on his back and snoring on the floor before the hearth. Loli and Omi curled on either side of him using his belly as a pillow. Kili and Fili played cards beside them. Bombur and Bifur chatted quietly with Nori and Binni, smoking their pipes. Thorin strummed his harp idly, while he had a discussion with Gridr and Gloin. Balin and Oin stood with Dori. Dis and Janifur were squeezed together in a chair, examining each others hands and whispering.

“Better?” asked Dori.

“Yes.” Ori rubbed his eyes. “Yes, thank you. What a disgusting concoction.”

“I know, pet. Look on the bright side. It’s the first time I’ve ever had to make it for you. I’m rather proud that you’ve never come home drunk.” Dori paused to send a glare Nori-ward. “Unlike our brother.”

“Nori gets sing-y and staggerish, when he gets under the mine hatches with ale,” Ori admitted. “Unfortunately, I just throw up.”

Dori looked startled.

“I don’t ever remember that happening, pet.”

Ori smiled sweetly up at Dori.

“Well, Nori was trying to teach me how to handle myself and thought I should at least know how to drink.”

“Why, I never!”

“He’s been punished,” Ori forestalled the rapidly angering Dori.

Dori raised an eyebrow.

“Has he?”

“Yes, every time he took me out and got me drunk, no matter where he placed himself I always threw up all over him.”

Dori choked, then patted Ori’s cheek.
“That’s my good badger.”

“That’s my good badger.”

“That’s my good badger.”

“Sons of Erebor! Arise!” shouted Gimli, sitting straight up.

“Sons of Erebor! Arise!” shouted Gimli, sitting straight up.

“Sons of Erebor! Arise!” shouted Gimli, sitting straight up.

Omi and Loli squawked as they were rolled aside.

Omi and Loli squawked as they were rolled aside.

Omi and Loli squawked as they were rolled aside.

“What’s got into you, our Gimmers?” Fili asked casually.

“What’s got into you, our Gimmers?” Fili asked casually.

“What’s got into you, our Gimmers?” Fili asked casually.

“Eh? Nuthin’. Dreaming, I suppose.” He glared at his cousins. “All that weight on me belly!”

“Eh? Nuthin’. Dreaming, I suppose.” He glared at his cousins. “All that weight on me belly!”

“Eh? Nuthin’. Dreaming, I suppose.” He glared at his cousins. “All that weight on me belly!”

“Oh hush,” Loli replied and yawned. “What are you doing up there, Ori?”

“Oh hush,” Loli replied and yawned. “What are you doing up there, Ori?”

“Oh hush,” Loli replied and yawned. “What are you doing up there, Ori?”

“Recovering,” Ori giggled as Dwalin gave his butt a squeeze.

“Recovering,” Ori giggled as Dwalin gave his butt a squeeze.

“Recovering,” Ori giggled as Dwalin gave his butt a squeeze.

“And that’s that,” commented Oin. “Brother!”

“And that’s that,” commented Oin. “Brother!”

“And that’s that,” commented Oin. “Brother!”

Gloin and Gridr got to their feet as did Thorin. The other party guests grouped around the fireplace except for Dis and Jani still deep in very serious conversation.

Gloin and Gridr got to their feet as did Thorin. The other party guests grouped around the fireplace except for Dis and Jani still deep in very serious conversation.

Gloin and Gridr got to their feet as did Thorin. The other party guests grouped around the fireplace except for Dis and Jani still deep in very serious conversation.

“Oi, Jani,” Bofur called.

“Oi, Jani,” Bofur called.

“Oi, Jani,” Bofur called.

Jani and Dis looked up and both tried to struggle out of the chair at the same time. They managed but there was a lot of struggling, gasping and squeaking noises and Jani ended up on her knees with her front in Dis’ lap. This sent the pair of them into giggles. Binni and Nori had to help them up. The party moved slowly into the receiving room and toward the door. Ori put his arm about Dwalin’s waist, whether to keep himself on his feet or because Dwalin had a lovely warm hard waist he didn’t know.

Jani and Dis looked up and both tried to struggle out of the chair at the same time. They managed but there was a lot of struggling, gasping and squeaking noises and Jani ended up on her knees with her front in Dis’ lap. This sent the pair of them into giggles. Binni and Nori had to help them up. The party moved slowly into the receiving room and toward the door. Ori put his arm about Dwalin’s waist, whether to keep himself on his feet or because Dwalin had a lovely warm hard waist he didn’t know.

Jani and Dis looked up and both tried to struggle out of the chair at the same time. They managed but there was a lot of struggling, gasping and squeaking noises and Jani ended up on her knees with her front in Dis’ lap. This sent the pair of them into giggles. Binni and Nori had to help them up. The party moved slowly into the receiving room and toward the door. Ori put his arm about Dwalin’s waist, whether to keep himself on his feet or because Dwalin had a lovely warm hard waist he didn’t know.

They spilled out into the courtyard and Balin immediately invited the Urs to stay the night at the House of Fundin. After demurs and arguments, it was agreed.

They spilled out into the courtyard and Balin immediately invited the Urs to stay the night at the House of Fundin. After demurs and arguments, it was agreed.

They spilled out into the courtyard and Balin immediately invited the Urs to stay the night at the House of Fundin. After demurs and arguments, it was agreed.

There were hugs, forehead thumps, and promises of meeting again at breakfast. Ori saw Dis and Jani standing a little away. Jani held both the princess’ hands, speaking quite earnestly to her. Dis was being very regal but smiled with pink cheeks. She nodded and Jani squeezed her hands again and moved toward her brothers.

There were hugs, forehead thumps, and promises of meeting again at breakfast. Ori saw Dis and Jani standing a little away. Jani held both the princess’ hands, speaking quite earnestly to her. Dis was being very regal but smiled with pink cheeks. She nodded and Jani squeezed her hands again and moved toward her brothers.

There were hugs, forehead thumps, and promises of meeting again at breakfast. Ori saw Dis and Jani standing a little away. Jani held both the princess’ hands, speaking quite earnestly to her. Dis was being very regal but smiled with pink cheeks. She nodded and Jani squeezed her hands again and moved toward her brothers.

The Urs and the Fundins trotted off in flurries of well wishes, waving, and lewd commentary back at the Sons of Groin and the Durins. The Sons of Groin and the Ur young ladies went to their residence. Balin, arm in arm with Dori, chatting amicably with Bifur and Bombur, while Nori and Bofur lagged behind. Ori leaned against Dwalin. Dwaín was so nice and warm and strong. Ori smiled and felt his eyes close.
Elves, birds and breakfast.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode!! As you’ve all noticed, Thror’s not behaving like a king, Frerin is a pain in the pahtoot, and things are not well with the people and dwarrow who live in Dale; this is where Dollypegs and I embark on fixing those problems. So, in the words of the incomparable Ms. Davis: “Fasten your seatbelts, we’re in for a bumpy night.” Don’t worry, there’s still lots of food, fun, food, comedy and food!!!
See you all next Friday, friends, and keep those cards and letters coming!

Ori woke in the warmth of Dwalin’s arms. He wondered how that had happened then bits and pieces of the end of the evening came back to him. He felt his face heat. Dwalin chuckled.

“Aye, love, yer a funny drunk. An’ yeh didn’t even brin’ up yer dinner on me.”

Ori giggled.

“Perhaps that’s something my drunk mind only does to Nori.”

Dwalin roared with laughter.

“Oh, lad, I hope so. That’s too precious. Yeh got t’ tell ‘im.”

“No. If I did, he’d try and get me drunk then go and dump me all over you when I do get sick.”

There was a tapping on the door and Dori came bustling in.

“Oh, good, you’re awake, pet. And good morning to you too, dearie,” this to Dwalin. “I do need help with getting breakfast together and Nori isn’t in his bed, so it seemed simple enough to come and find you as the Ur family is still abed upstairs.”

“Yeh try Bofur’s bed?” Dwalin asked, yawning, as he sat up and stretched.

“Don’t be disgusting, dearie.” Dori admonished.

Dwalin leaned back o the pillow his arms folded looking at Dori from under a raised brow.

“Disgustin’?”

“You are a very determined, dominating dwarf,” Dori said, actually waving his finger at the warrior. “You might, even with the best of intentions, teach our Ori or influence him to the detriment of his still-forming character.”

“Aye, righ’!” Dwalin grumped then pointed out, “an’ unlike me equally determined an’ dominatin’ brother a’ leas’ I’d th’ manners t’ marry Ori b’fore I bounced int’ bed wi’ ‘im.”

“Don’t be absurd, you provoking creature!” Dori whisked out to hide his glowing cheeks.

Ori leaned over and kissed his husband.
“He’s gone an’ bloody called me ‘dearie’,” said Dwalin. His face was a study.

“You should hear what he’s calls Nori, even when he’s not upset,” Ori giggled, clambered out of bed, and scampered after Dori via the bathroom and his old room to dress himself.

By the time he romped into the kitchen, Dori was busy and Dis, Gridr, and Binni were all at various employments.

“There you are, pet,” Dori smiled at him while hefting a bowl of creamy, fluffy eggs, pouring all of it into a heavy iron skillet and shoving it into the top oven.

“Please go and set the table in the breakfast parlor. Put everything on the sideboard as, no doubt, we’ll have people bobbing in and out. Enough plates and things for nineteen, pet.”

Ori went about his chore. The sideboard had one end piled with plates and closely followed by many platters of breads, rolls, pastries. The long hob at the end of the room was keeping hot pans of hash, fried potatoes, flapjacks, sausages, bacon and slices of meat puddings. Ori made sure there were enough chairs as Balin brought through more. The table bore several pots of tea and Ori put out mugs and spoons. The scent of all the food was almost making him drool.

He heard noises from the sitting room and saw Dwalin hurrying through, still tucking his shirt in and fastening his braces. Ori tore after him and was pounced upon by Fili and Kili, who had dragged young Gimli, Gloin, the cousins and their uncles along with them. Thorin brought up the rear looking rather amused. All the younger ones were chattering nineteen to the dozen.

In the receiving room, the Urs were descending the stairs, dressed and looking refreshed. Bofur had quite the spring in his step and Nori followed closely, appearing to be running his hands over pretty much everything within his reach, including Bofur.

Ori noticed that the Durins, Fundins, Urs, and Groinsons were all accounted for – minus Frerin, of course. Ori didn’t know what Frerin actually did with his time when he wasn’t bullying people and Ori wasn’t sad for the lack of his company.

Dwalin and Balin shepherded their guests into the now tiny-seeming breakfast parlor.

Ori and Dwalin seated themselves in the middle of the long side of the table, facing Bofur and Nori who had their backs to four long, tall windows, two of which were doors now open to let in the spring sun and pleasant breezes from the meadow. To the right of Dwalin sat the older generation and to the left of Ori the younger. It was rather amusing to see the occupations.

Gimli, the princes, and their cousins were all eating and writing notes to their friends. A small peregrine falcon sat on Gimli’s forearm, tweeting occasionally, and helped him eat sausages while Gimli was busy with his letter, which started in the middle and spread outwards and circularly on the paper. Ori supposed the falcon belonged to the elf named Legolas.

Loli and Omi were scribbling notes on ribbons and wrapping them about their bats’ legs. The bats, perfectly used to this morning routine, stood idle on one leg and drank their fill, one of the fruit syrup and the other out of the cream jug, twittering at each other now and then.

Fili and Kili took turns adding text to a letter to their second cousin, who lived in the Iron Hills and named Thorin.

Bats, ravens and other birds, including an extremely small owl at one point, flew in and out of the doors opposite Ori.
Watching them all reminded Ori of those times Dori chided him for sitting at the table with his face in a book.

Well, except for he never had any correspondence with friends and unlike Gimli he never had that elf thing happen to him.

Ori called out to him, “Gimli, how did you fare with the acrostic?”

Gimli chuckled. “He wrote to tell me it took him most of the night to figure out. He thinks I’m very clever.”

Gridr beamed and Gloin looked proud, but troubled.

Dis asked, “With whom does he correspond?”

“Legolas of Mirkwood,” said Gridr.

“The crown prince?” Dis asked, amazed. “Thranduil’s son?”

“Gimli has slain him with a single axe blow from his eyes,” said Gridr. Gloin choked on his breakfast. Gridr patted his back and refilled his cup.

“His first flirt,” said Gridr, sighing with sentimental smile.

Gimli listened to this, his face the color of raspberry compote.

“Amad!” he protested, at the same time exceedingly pleased with himself.

Fili and Kili stared at him, appalled.

Kili said, “Imagine wanting to flirt with an elf!”

“He’s not that bad,” Gimli protested.

Kili thought on it and shrugged.

“Legolas’s an excellent bowman” he allowed.

Fili muttered, “I’m sure his aim will be perfect.”

Gimli threw a roll at his head.

The older generation were entertaining each other for the most part. Balin had his arm across the back of Dori’s chair, feeding him fresh strawberries dipped in honeyed cream.

Gridr, Dis, and Binni had their heads together over the plate of scones which Dori had made. Ori suspected them of attempting to deconstruct the recipe by taste and minute examination.

Oin and his brother were applying themselves to hearty breakfasts.

Thorin brooded over a cup of tea.

Bofur, Nori, (who Ori suspected, had his hand in Bofur’s trousers) and Bombur discussed the excellence of the ham with Jani, who was seated close to Dis. Dwalin sat like his brother, with his arm across the back of Ori’s chair, his fingers occasionally brushing and flicking Ori’s hair.
Roak perched on Thorin’s chair back and Dwalin’s own raven was finishing Dwalin’s hash for him. Binni got up to call in the oddest looking bird, (Binni later told Ori it was called a parrot) which was swooping around the meadow in a confused way. This brightly colored creature landed on the table and after helping itself to an entire sausage walked over to Balin and spoke. Its voice was guttural and it accented its phrases with whistles.

“Greetings Lord Balin (whistle). Lady Hoondah of Angmar wishes to know if perhaps this year you shall grace her ladyship with your presence (whistle). You haven’t visited since your most delightful acquaintance was made by her ladyship (whistle).”

The parrot cocked its eye at Balin. Balin smiled serenely and bowed his heads slightly.

“Greetings Great Lady of Angmar. I regret that I shall not be visiting this year as I have lately become engaged. I do hope however her ladyship will be so kind as to receive my betrothed and I once we have celebrated our nuptials.”

The parrot did a double take, glared at Balin and made the most horrid crackling screech noise.

“Bugger,” the bird croaked clearly and flew away the last rasher of bacon in its claws.

When most of the serving dishes were empty and the breakfast group had sat back with communal, contented sighs, Thorin raised his demeanor from beverage contemplation.

“Dori?”

“Yes, dear Thorin?” cooed Dori, all quite at one with the world.

Thorin smirked and went on.

“As you are the…er…unknown son of my udad’s nephew, Nain—“

“I thought Nain was his cousin,” Dori interrupted.

“As did I,” Dis said, putting down her third scone.

“It’s the name and closeness in age,” Thorin explained. “Nain was Thror’s nephew, which makes Dain my cousin.”

“A cousin once removed,” elaborated Balin.

“Ye’d have t’ remove him lot more then tha’ before ye couldn’t hear ’im,” Dwalin added making Ori giggle and Bofur frown.

“Ye’d have to go all the way to Dale,” he muttered. “That’s where it starts.”

“To continue,” said Thorin, eyebrow raised. “Dori, Balin is sixth in line for the throne and he is a public figure. Whether or not you’re actually presented to the king, people will wonder who you are.”

Though Thorin’s tone was gentle Dori still looked anxious. He put his hand into Balin’s.

“My mother’s people may now realize who I am,” said Dori. “I’m not concerned with them.”
“But your brother in the Iron Hills doesn’t know about you,” said Thorin, “and I’d rather he heard about you from us, not from the Rikanta.”

“I have considered that,” said Dori.

“Then, may I please have your permission to write to him?”

“It’s not as though I can stop you.”

Balin squeezed Dori’s hand.

“M’dear, please.”

Ori glanced at Dwalin.

“What sort of person is Lord Dain?” he asked. “Will he be angry about Dori? Will he see Dori as a threat?”

Dwalin and Thorin exchanged looks of pure glee.

“Well, Thorin?” Dwalin drawled. “Do tell us. Wha’ sort a’ person is Dain?”

“Loud,” Thorin supplied.

Dori muttered, “Hardly a complete picture.”

Dis, on Dori’s other side, patted his arm and struggled to elaborate.

“He’s not entirely like us in his manners,” she said.

“He doesn’t have any,” Thorin added.

She frowned at her brother, who chuckled to himself, unrepentant.

“But he isn’t really so different from us either,” she finished.

Kili added helpfully, “He has a family. His wife is a lot like Imad Gridr, except even more patient. And he has a son. His name is Thorin, too.”

“I told him not to do that,” said Thorin, half to himself, but still looking pleased.

“Very well,” said Dori, resigned. “Thorin, if you would contact Lord Dain and, of course, send him my and my younger brothers regards.”

Balin kissed Dori.

“It’ll be f’r th’ best, beloved. Yeh’ll see.”

“Thank you, Dori,” said Thorin. “I’ll send a raven as soon as I’m able.”

Ori looked out over the meadow, clear to the wall at the far end. He saw a movement at the top of the rocks. A blond head hopped up to stand there, closely followed by another, redheaded.

“Who’s that?” he asked, quickly. “There’s someone climbing over the great rock wall into the meadow.”

Everyone rose to the open doors. Swords, axes, and knives appeared out of nowhere.
Dwalin flung himself out, closely followed by Gimli, both of them armed and roaring. Ori slipped around behind them in time to hear Gimli roar again, this time in greeting.

By now everyone else had clambered through, save for Dis and Gridr, hampered by their dresses, and Bombur who stood by the dams, ably protecting them with the carving knife.

Gimli sprinted down the meadow as the blond jumped down to land by him.

Gimli shouted and grabbed the elf around the waist in a hug, bellowing that he was welcome and must get inside before he got his head cut off.

The redhead dropped down gracefully beside them.

In his enthusiasm, Gimli grasped the blond by the hand and half dragged him up the way. The blond elf looked confused but happy to be dragged by the hand and at speed. It was obvious to Ori, the elf had never been lead by hand at speed anywhere. The other elf, terribly amused, followed gamely.

Excited by the arrival of his friend, Gimli immediately forgot all manners and introduced Legolas first to his mam, then to his adad. Gloin looked appalled and Gridr pleased, but also appalled.

“Gimli!” she cried.

Gimli instantly remembered his manners and properly introduced Legolas to Thorin.

With a raised eyebrow, already acquainted with the prince, Thorin greeted him.

Dis also greeted him from the other side of the doors. Dori invited them in to breakfast.

Fili and Kili discovered two more chairs and drew them up to the table as Dwalin and Gimli brought the elves into the breakfast parlor. Dori politely asked them to sit. Dis introduced the rest of the party and the elven prince introduced his companion, his close friend Captain Tauriel.

Ori sat again, this time with Gimli at his side, and Fili and Kili opposite. Kili looked the elven prince over and turned a teasing eye at Gimli.

“I don’t care much for elf maids myself, too thin, and all creamy skin and high cheekbones. Not enough facial hair for my taste.”

He smiled at Legolas.

“But you’re not bad.”

“He’s no’ an elf maid!” Gimli thundered and threw the butter at Kili.

“What brings you to the Wall of Erebor?” Thorin asked Legolas.

“Three things, the first of which is that Ada is on the outs with me. He found Gimli’s letter and he’s furious and warns me I’ll catch a beard.”

Nori snickered.

“Looks like you’ve already caught one, laddie.”

Legolas gave a wisp of Gimli’s beard a small tug with a smile. Gimli flushed darker than a ruby, Gloin sputtered on the verge of exploding. The older dwarrow gasped in shock, except for Dwalin, who threw his head back and roared with laughter, and Balin, Dori and Binni all chuckled.

Gimli muttered, “We don’t do that lad, at least not in front of other people, like my parents.”

“Most of us don’t,” said Nori, shrugging.

Legolas realized he’d breached conduct and apologized profusely to Gloin and Gridr.

Balin cleared his throat.

“The other two things, your highness?”

Legolas frowned, a worried look on his face, which melted into surprise as Gridr put a nourishing bowl of oatmeal in front of him and filled a mug with tea.

Ori noticed Kili staring open-mouthed at Captain Tauriel as she gingerly sampled her oatmeal, appeared to find it tasty and started to tuck in.

Ori nudged Dwalin

“Look.”

Dwalin murmured loud enough for the table to hear, “Mahal’s hairy arse, I thin’ I jus’ heard th’ lad’s testicles drop.”

Fili, Bofur and Nori cackled maniacally.

It was Kili’s turn to blush red.

The captain looked up and smiled sweetly at him.

“Hello,” she said.

“Grch,” Kili responded politely.

“The second thing?” Dori prompted gently.

“Lord Balin, were you able to put an end to the slave trade as you discussed with my father?”

“Aye, your highness.”

“Then why are there still wagons leaving Dale for Mordor? We have heard nothing from King Thror and my father grows wary.”

Balin and Thorin exchanged looks.

“The third has come to our ears that Gondor will march on Mordor to free the slaves there. Gondor intends to call on Rohan. The Ents of Fangorn grow restless. Has King Thror not received word from Gondor?”

Thorin’s hands gripped the arms of his chair hard enough that the wood creaked.

Balin stepped in smoothly.

“This is the first we’ve heard of it, Prince Legolas. The message must have gone astray,” Ori thought it must have strayed into King Thror’s fireplace along with many another vital letters.
Elves, sneaky birds and Dain-ful letters!

Chapter Summary

Hello, friends, and welcome back to another episode! We have more elves and more animal allies of the dwarrow. Oh, the things Ori learns! Not to mention what he gets to eat! The excitement’s just beginning, so stay tuned and see you back here next Friday. Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Legolas' aquamarine eyes gazed steadily into Thorin’s.

Thorin remained cool in the princeling's stare.

"Quite so," he stated quietly.

There was a horn volley in the distance and Ori heard the clock tower bell faintly from Dale.

Gimli grumbled that he was due in the armory for a practice in hand to hand combat with Furhnk. He rose, grabbed Legolas by the shoulder and knocked his forehead into the princeling’s and gave him a pat on the back. He headed out while Legolas rubbed his forehead, a little confused.

Ori leaned over and said, “That’s a gesture of friendship, your highness.”

“Oh, good,” Legolas observed.

Loli and Omi groaned simultaneously as Gridr reminded them they had a tutor coming for their illuminated script practice from their last lectures.

They shooed their bats off with their messages and bade everyone farewell for the day.

With the removal of the youngsters, Dwalin turned to the elves.

"So," he drawled in a conversational tone. "How’d the pair a’ yeh get over th’ wall?"

The prince and captain exchanged glances. Tauriel rose fluidly and removed something from her belt. She handed it to Thorin.

"These are from Lórien from our Lady Galadriel. They are only made there and allow the wearer to keep out of sight of any eyes. Well," she smiled ruefully at the ravens, "most eyes."

The assembled dwarrow glared at Roäc, son of Carc, Garnet and Sapphire, who was Gloin’s raven. The ravens continued to help themselves to table scraps. Ori thought they looked quite pleased.

“Lemme guess,” said Dwalin dryly. “The ravens told me guards on the wall t’ let th’ elves pass an then didn’t bother t’ tell us wha’ they told th’ guards. Some sentries yeh be.”

Roäc gave the raven equivalent of a shrug.

“It was Thranduil’s egg, not an orc.”
There was some giggling at this, particularly from Captain Tauriel.

Dis came to her brother's side and together they unrolled the strange fabric Tauriel had given them. Ori thought it looked rather like a grey, green cobweb.

"How clever," Thorin allowed in a level tone.

"But can it keep the rain out?" Dis asked, fingering the material.

"No," Tauriel allowed. "But they do hold heat so you cannot freeze, even if you would fall a slept midst snow and ice. Yet they are so light you can wear them in the hottest weather so that your skin will not burn from the sun."

"Fascinating," Gridr allowed, an eyebrow raised, as she held the fabric up towards the window.

Balin humphed,

"Do go on yer highness; yeh mentioned wagons leaving th’ warehouses."

"Yes," Legolas nodded. "It's built as though it might house a barge or a few small boats but we noticed that miners and other workers, both men and dwarf, were being let in the back. They look very shabby so they are no doubt the poor of both peoples."

Balin and Groin both groaned.

"We need to keep an eye on this," Thorin said to Roäc.

"I'm rather obvious," Roäc reminded him.

Dis said, "Roäc, can one of your people take Rutile down into the mine?"

Roäc looked to Sapphire, who hopped forward.

Dis swished out.

Thorin suggested to Roäc, "Perhaps some songbirds, thrushes, would be willing to keep their eyes open for us?"

Roäc cocked his head, considering, and croaked in agreement.

Dis returned with a small gilded box. She opened the box, which Ori noticed had air holes. It appeared sumptuously cushioned inside. Dis smiled down at the contents saying, "We have work for you, Rutile my dear."

To Ori’s surprise, the largest, hairiest spider he had ever seen climbed jauntily from the box. It was dark brown, but appeared to wear red and yellow socks. It was bigger than Dwalin’s hand. All its eyes appeared to look up at the princess and it waved two forelegs eagerly at her.

“Oh, how pretty!” cried Jani and reached over to tickle the spider's abdomen.

The spider’s back legs arched up like a cat’s and its wiggled its pincers happily.

Dis brought out a black handkerchief and Rutile scampered in to the middle and curled up. Dis tied the ends of the handkerchief together and Sapphire, taking the ends in her beak, flew off.
Ori frowned briefly, then said, “How will Rutile tell us what’s going on?”

Dis smiled brilliantly.

“Rutile can write runes.”

“Oh, famous!” said Dori, much pleased.

They seated themselves again and Binni came back from the kitchen with two plates full of scones and another pot of tea.

Balin went out and returned with a lap desk and placed it before Thorin. Thorin sighed, drew out ink, paper and pen and began to write.

The scones and tea were passed around and everyone tucked in.

“I never realized dwarrow ate this much,” said Legolas, “but you eat like hobbits do. You eat seven meals a day as well.”

“I ain’t never seen a hobbit,” said Nori. “Are they huge like men?”

“No, actually. They are smaller in height than dwarrow.”

“Where do they put all the food?” asked Kili.

“No one knows,” Tauriel said with a mysterious smile.

Thorin finished his letter, blotted it, sanded it and handed it Balin who read it aloud.

Dear Dain,

I hope this finds you well, and your queen and Prince Thorin (I still haven't forgiven you for that) equally so.

You recall the unfortunate incident between King Thror and your father. I would not stir up such pain again but to give you a balm for it. The union of your late father and Rikmha of Rikanta produced a dwarfing, Dori of Rikmha, a bearer who has been living, impoverished, in Dale.

It would never have been known but that Dori's younger brother Ori is heartsong and husband to Dwalin.

Yes, that Dwalin.

Their was a marriage of expediency and the families had not previously met, or so we thought.

You will recall Cousin Balin long ago briefly met his One but they were separated. This was Dori of Rikmha, your half sibling. Dori and Balin are promised to each other and Dori is also living at Fundin

A middle brother, Nori, is dear to his siblings, but far harder to pin down. He comes and goes as he will.

Dori sends his kindest regards and, along with myself, invites you to visit if you are so inclined. Please let us know.

You are, as always, most welcome.

Yours,

Thorin.

"Will it do?" Thorin asked.

"It will," said Dori slowly. "As long as he understands I have nothing to do with the Rikanta clan. I even made my dear umadel faint. And that I have no interest in Dain's throne, nor do any of my brothers."

"Well," Nori started.

Dori smacked him hard across the back of the head.

"Oi!" Nori cried.

Ori said, "It's so strange being suddenly noble. I keep expecting that I fell asleep over Dori's letter and I'm drooling on it and when I wake up I'll have to rewrite it."

Dwalin gathered him up, laughing, and kissed him.

"Not a dream, love, I promise."

Nori grimaced.

"For those who don't care for syrupy sweetness it's more on the order of a nightmare."

Dori smacked him again.

"Cut it out!" Nori growled.

Ori looked at Nori askance.

"And you're not syrupy sweet with Bofur?"

Nori sputtered. He actually sputtered.

Ori jumped up and pointed.

"Dori! Look! Nori's blushing! Hold on to everything, the mountain's about to fall!"

He frowned so terribly, so hard, that his hair moved.
Ori giggled.
"Braided your eyebrows too tight again."

Nori gave a bellow of rage.

Dori said, "That's enough out of both of you."

Ori snuggled up to Dwalin, who was still chuckling.

Dori admonished, "Don't tease your brother, pet. You know he's sensitive about these things."

"Aye! That's right. I'm- I'm what?"

Dori shrugged and said, "Well?"

Bofur looked up from his tea.

Ori called out, "Careful, Bofur, Nori's in a sensitive mood."

Nori threw a scone at him. Ori tried and failed to catch it in his mouth. Dwalin caught it in his hand instead and split it with him.

"He's what now?" Bofur asked. "Don't worry, Dori, I know our Nori and I'll take care of him. Won't I, Ducky?"

Nori's face turned the same color as his hair.

"Ducky?" Dwalin asked.

Ori said, "Bofur always called Nori 'Ducky' when we were all together in Steam Alley. Nori was Ducky, Dori was Mother Goose and I was Chick."

"Why were you called Chick?"

"I had a pet chicken. Lovely, speckled thing. Nori gave her to me. I called her Cluck-cluck and she laid the best eggs."

"Speckled?" Dwalin asked, eyes narrowing. "With white patches on each leg?"

"Yes!" Ori cried. Then dread stole over him. "Yes?"

"She always laid exactly five eggs every mornin'?"

"Yes, always brown, with double yolks."

Dwalin rounded on Nori.

"Yeh stole Chicken! Yeh shithead!"

Nori cackled helplessly, all the while he leaned up against Bofur.

Thorin broke in. "I remember Chicken."

Balin face-palmed.

"Oh, Mahal."
"She followed Dwalin everywhere," Thorin continued. "She sat on Gnasher's arse when he rode. Even laid an egg or two there."

Ori put a placating hand on Dwalin's arm.

"I took very good care of her," Ori promised. "You don't mind that I called her Cluck-cluck, do you?"

Dwalin deflated.

"Nah, love. I'm glad she went t' yeh. Wha' happened t' her?"

"She stole a nest and brought off thirteen chicks. We gave them to Bard. His late wife Matilde had a flock. He shared the eggs. Eventually Cluck-cluck died of old age. Sigrid helped me bury her under the doorstep."

"Mahal wept," Balin groaned.

"And Nori was kind enough to sing the funeral song for her."

Bofur fell back in his chair, roaring with laughter.

"Nori, yeh sang a dirge… f-fer a chicken?"

"Shuddup, arsehole," Nori hissed.

The table had dissolved into snickering.

Ori said to Dwalin, "I'm sure if we asked Sigrid would give you one of her great-great-great-great grandchicks."

"That's kind o' yeh, love, but I'm set."

"I had a kitten after that. I named her Sassafras," said Ori, "though, Nori brought me that too. Mahal, Nori, you didn't steal that as well?"

Nori said, highly offended, "I found that kitten."

"That's what you said about Cluck-cluck," Ori protested. "It's the same thing where you're concerned. Is Sassy still around the house, Dori? We should go get her, though I'm sure Sigrid's looking after her."

"Of course, pet," Dori soothed.

"You had a chicken?" Legolas asked Dwalin, his eyes full of curiosity. "Why?"

"She was a pet," Dwalin explained dismissively.

Captain Tauriel nodded. "I have heard chickens are wonderfully docile."

"You ain't bin pecked by one." Dwalin assured her.

Thorin rose and withdrew from his pocket a silver key. He held it up before Tauriel and Legolas.

"To save you some climbing I'm entrusting you with this. Roäc will show you the door. It will bring you to the meadow and down to the end of the lake. The ravens guard it, no one else knows of it. If you see any other strange goings on please feel free to tell us. And should we or Roäc’s people see danger approaching your lands we will send a warning to Mirkwood immediately.”

The captain and the prince bowed politely and thanked the dwarrow for the breakfast.

Gridr hurried to Legolas and smiled up at him.

"Ach, wee badger, you're just so thin. Not to worry, I'll get you nice and fattened up."

She patted his tummy. The elf prince did nothing beyond widen his eyes in amazement.

Both elves stifled laughter and went to the door.

Gridr followed, gave them each a maternal swat on the bottom and told them to be off.

Ori thought he could hear them giggle as they went back out to the meadow.
Treasonous plots, traumatized tarantulas, and scones

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to another exciting episode of our little dwarf telenovela-ish story!! The plot thickens like gravy in this one!! As always, we love hearing your thoughts!

Join us again next Friday, friends, and keep those cards and letters coming!!

While they waited for Rutile and Garnet to return Ori helped Dori gather the plates. The talk around the table grew more serious, and not just because of the scones, which were Dori’s best and not to be taken lightly.

Ori wasn’t sure if he belonged at the table. It seemed more of a political discussion and he didn’t know anything about that but his seat beside Dwalin remained empty.

He considered staying in the kitchen where Dori was washing up but Binni, despite he was company, had insisted on doing the drying. The two of them talked and laughed with their mithril silver braids close together. They had only just met, yet to Ori they acted like old friends. They felt alike somehow and it occurred to Ori that they might actually be very much the same, that perhaps Binni was a Bearer as well, though he knew Binni and Oin didn’t have dwarflings of their own.

“I’m finished here, Dori,” Ori said.

“Thank you, pet. Run along now and have fun.”

Ori swithered and trailed out to the breakfast parlor again. People seemed reluctant to move from this pleasant spot and seeing as how Ori thought he had over heard Dori and Binni talking about more food and tea, it was unlikely anyone would. Ori pondered about the situation. He had the feeling Dori would not be best pleased if he was involved. He knew he was determined to be involved no matter what the outcome was. He needed an ally first.

Ori went to his husband and put a hand on Dwalin’s arm.

“Bin shooed outa the kitchen, love?”

“May I speak to you a moment? In private?”

“A’ course, love.”

Dwalin rose with a nod to Thorin. He slid his arm about Ori’s waist and they left the parlor. Ori led the way to Dwalin’s room. Ori shut the door and leaned against it for a moment. Then he sighed and came forward. Dwalin ran gentle hands down Ori’s shoulders.

“What’s wrong, love?”

“Dwalin, what’s going on?”

“Th’ Ur’ve stayed t’ talk business.”
“But not the business with Frerin.”

“Mahal, no, tha’ won’t be ’n issue now.”

“Then, what is it?” Ori took a breath then, “I think I understand some of it but not all.”

Dwalin looked troubled.

“I don’t like t’ tell yeh, no’ ’cause I don’t think yeh’d understand. It’s jus’ no’ information it’s safe t’have.”

“It’s about the king, isn’t it.”

“Aye.”

“Then I should be there.”

He expected Dwalin to laugh or pat him on the shoulder and tell him not to worry himself. He didn’t expect Dwalin to look at him with such thoughtfulness.

“Love, it’s reached th’ point where there’s no goin’ back. Wha’ said in tha’ room could get every one o’ us killed. Tha’s not what I want fer yeh.”

“It’s not what I want for you either.”

“Then, let me ask yeh this. Why do yeh want t’ be there?”

Ori heard himself say, “I want to help Thorin. I can’t do it the same way you do. I’m not a soldier, but if there’s anything I can do for him, I want to be there to do it. I know you need to be ready day or night. I know whatever happens could take minutes or it could take days. Whatever it takes, even if it means… I guess that was the shortest library career in history.”

“Yeh’d give that up for the Durins? For Thorin?”

“What good would it do me if you and Balin and Thorin and everyone else is gone? If everything goes to Mordor?”

“Yeh’re already in, aren’t yeh,” said Dwalin and he sighed. “Mahal’s blessed balls. Look, don’t worry abou’ Brur. Yeh know he’s in this, too. If it comes to it, we’ll send him a note t’ say yer absent on account’ ye’ve ‘official business’. If Brur’s angry with any it’ll be me an’ Thorin an’ it sure won’t be th’ first time.”

Ori nodded then impulsively pushed forward and wrapped himself around Dwalin. Dwalin folded him into his arms and kissed the top of his head. They stood that way for a few moments. Then Ori looked up.

“What exciting lives we live, husband.”

Dwalin roared with laughter

“Aye, love, an’ wha’ a gift f’r understatement yeh’ve got. C’mon, we best get back b’fore Thorin finds a way t’ hang himself with out anyone noticing.”

It was only when they returned to the breakfast room that Ori realized he’d forgotten something important.
Dori was there and by the look on the eldest Ri brother’s face it was obvious he hadn’t expected Ori to be as well.

Ori stepped between Dwalin and the angry Dori as he’d so often stepped between Nori and Dori, because of all the dwarrow in Arda, Ori was the one Dori could never hurt.

Balin, wisely Ori thought, had not moved to become involved.

“Dori,” said Ori, “we’ll talk about this later.”

Dori turned his glare from Dwalin to look at Ori and froze.

Ori had been practicing his ‘Dori Has Spoken’ imitation for decades. Judging by the look on Dori’s face, he had finally gotten it right.

They held this gaze for what seemed like an hour before Dori said emphatically, “We will talk about this later.”

Ori took this as the sum total of Dori’s surrender.

They had work to do.

Ori felt the atmosphere of the room seemed far more serious than before. Even Fili and Kili sat at the table, looking unusually grim.

Thorin said, “Bofur, you have something we need to discuss?”

“Aye. Tell the truth now. Is your Udad Thror mad?”

Instead of leaping across the table for Bofur’s throat, Nori would have done it. Mahal at the forge, Bofur himself would have done it. Ori thought, Thorin answered the question with another question.

“Why do you ask?”

“Because if he’s not, then he’s a tyrant and, to dwarrow, that’s a whole lot worse.”

It was, Ori knew. The mad were sick and sickness happened, just like breaking an arm or leg happened. A mad dwarf was locked away, but given every comfort no matter their station.

If Thror was mad it was pitiable, but not punishable.

Tyrants were overthrown and executed out of hand, generally tossed to the mob.

In the end, though, among dwarrow the same consequences applied. The old king’s line was weakened, easily toppled by a stronger rival house, and at best dwarven society was thrown into chaos. If the style of the incoming monarch was to quell the chaos with violence, the chaos could spread to engulf other dwarf states and leave the dwarrow open to conquest by men or elves or even orcs.

It was the greatest weakness of their society, as far as Ori was concerned, to leave the security of the entire race in the hands of one dwarf. Historically speaking, the Longbeards, the people of Durin, had flirted with disaster from the day they stepped from the stone.

“You are suggesting that Thror is unfit to rule?” Thorin asked evenly. “That the descendent of Durin himself is not fit to rule?”
“The way things are going? I’d say no, he’s not. In which case, he oughter be removed for his own good as well as ours.”

“You realize this is treason?”

“Someone has to say it,” said Bofur with deceptive cheer. “Better to execute a miner or two than us all bleed out slowly, ain’t it? From what I seen, plenty of folk’re already pretty much bleeding out as it is. Or wishing they were. Or they’d do it themselves if they had a choice.”

"The true treason," Bombur said in his quiet voice. "Is the treason being committed by Thror. The way he is taking the life, taking food out of the mouths of other children of Durin, is treason against the laws of Durin the Deathless. Those were given to him by Mahal. Thror is no longer following the ways of Mahal. To me, this is treason."

“I said it was treason,” Thorin replied. “I didn’t say I disagreed with you.”

It seemed to be the best answer Bofur was going to get and he knew it. So he changed the subject.

“As it stands, if you wanted to become king right now, the miners of Erebor will support you… to point. But if you’re to be king, you’d best be ready to right some terrible wrongs the minute that crown hits yer head.”

“Tell me.”

“Been in the mines lately?” Bofur asked. It seemed almost conversational. “I don’t mean the royal mines. Yer brother has charge of ‘em and he’s a git but he don’t mess where he eats. And he knows you an’ Dwalin and the lot’ve you are down there tolerably often. I’m talkin’ the private mines, the ones held by Thror’s cronies, the ones not controlled by the guild.

“Go have a look, yer highness. I think you’ll fin it ed-oo-cashnul. Specially as that’s now the work done by half the dwarrow who live down in Dale. Even the master owns a mine.”

Thorin blinked.

“It’s illegal for anyone who isn’t a dwarf to own a mine in Erebor.”

“Oh, it ain’t obvious,” put in Jani. “He’s what ye call a silent partner, and I expect he’ll soon have bigger problems than lode yields, courtesy of yerself.”

“If the mines are tainted Erebor will collapse around them,” said Thorin.

“Best get busy with the shorin’ timbers then,” said Bofur.

“Where do you suggest I start?”

Bofur sat back, considering.

“Yeh plan on movin’ on this now?”

“Yes. As soon as possible. If I’m going to rush down there to find rot I don’t want anyone to have time to cover it up.”

“Best start with Lord Vors’ zinc mine then.”

Gloin spoke up.
“Vors owns a zinc mine? I have no records for that.”

“Yeh won’t. That’s the one the master owns. I worked it meself last week without me guild badge – heh, even without me hat – just to see. Every miner down there lives in Dale, has for the past six-month.”

“I also have all the numbers of dwarrow who go down the mines every day,” said Gloin. “They’ve steadily risen for years, but no sudden increases by a few hundred miners.”

“You can’t count these,” said Bofur. “They don’t come through Erebor. They come through the tunnel adit under the warehouse in Dale.”

Dwalin jumped up, enraged.

“They come through a wha’?”

He and Thorin exchanged looks of horror.

“You knew,” Thorin accused Bofur. “You knew what Rutile will find in Dale.”

“Couldn’t expect you to just take my word for it,” said Bofur with a shrug. “I ain’t official.”

“Bofur,” said Thorin, not quite calm, “you’re telling me there is an unguarded tunnel that leads from Dale, right under the heart of this mountain. Whether you think I believed you or not is immaterial.”

“Oh, aye, but it is guarded, y’see,” said Bofur, “by the master’s thugs. Not like they hang around outside or anythin’, but they keep our miner folk quiet and in line. Y’don’t want to be the one to rat ’em out.”

“But you are doing so,” said Thorin.

“Like I said, better one miner than the rest all bleedin’ out.”

“And all that zinc,” said Gloin asked. “Erebor is supplying zinc to Mordor.

Balin groaned.

“No wonder those wagons t’ Mordor were so dashed heavy.”

Slowly Dwalin sunk back into his chair, muscles tight.

Ori put a hand over his on the table and carefully rubbed over his fingers, attempting to soothe his husband without crowding him. Dwalin let out a pent up breath, and with it some of the tension bled from his shoulders. He turned his hand under Ori’s and held it.

“I don’t understand,” said Ori. “Why does Mordor need zinc? What is it for?”

Jani said, “Zinc’s used to stabilize iron, turn it into steel. Right now the orcs have shite weapons of pure iron, brittle, easily forged but just as easily broken. Better steel means orcs with better weapons.”

Ori sucked in a horrified breath as his brain glibly remarked Really, what was next? Forging better orcs?

Thorin said, “Then this is where we start, with the worst of it. This is the worst? You’re not holding back anything, Bofur, Jani? Once I’ve tipped my hand the others will have time to protect themselves.”

“Vors is the worst I know,” said Bofur.

Bifur, who had not spoken before, did so now, his deep voice rolling in the poetic, ancient Khuzdul.

“If I may? Thorin, thou will needs have to make an example of the Lord Vors, with or without the king’s sanction. Unfortunately, thou be at a crosstunnel. If thou do naught and find thyself king, thou shalt be complicit in this unholiness. If thou act, thou wilt bring down the wrath of King Thror, or at least they who would call Frerin his heir.”

“You’ve forced my hand,” said Thorin.

“Indeed, we have. I’m sorry, mine friend. And I do remain thy friend, no matter the cost. I, and many others who fought with thee at Dimrill Dale, will stand with thee now, in this, which shalt be the beginning of thy mighty rule of honor among dwarrow. Thy support there hast never wavered.”

“Nor has that of the merchants,” said Bombur. “Princess Dis has been tireless in finding us new trading partners. Our markets are the most diverse in Arda, and our trade routes the safest and best patrolled.”

“Yes,” said Thorin, “all the while I’ve been protecting the dwarrow abroad I’ve been letting the ground collapse under my feet. I’ve done a proper job of it.”

The Urs exchanged looks but said no more, the room grew quiet. They all turned to Thorin. Ori thought he could hear the thoughts reforming in Thorin’s head.

Garnet and Sapphire all but blew in the open doors. Sapphire once more carrying the handkerchief. The material was bowing out as though a tiny but mighty struggle was going on inside. Ori quickly laid several pieces of paper next to the one sheet Dis had laid out and poured ink into a saucer. Rutile leapt free and dropped to the table. Every hair on the spider twitched with obvious agitation.

“Rutile…?” Dis gasped.

Rutile flung herself onto the paper thrusting four of her legs into the ink. Ori watched as runes appears. Each leg made a stroke and Rutile turned as she made the mark. She appeared to dance, spinning across the paper at high speed.

“Blessed silks of all! That utter inedible dirty fly!! His acts towards little hairy half-legged spiderlings just tears my web! May his dinner always break loose and get away!!”

There were gasps all around as Dis read out the message.

“What spiderlings? Does she mean badgers?” Thorin asked, horrified.

“Yes,” Dis returned as shocked as her brother.

“Hairy half-legged adults and spiderlings in that deep hole. No paths, oozing water!
Smelly! Not good for any to find dinner in! Dig! Scrape! Dig! Scrape! Adults and spiderlings! Not getting fat at all. Never stopping! Nasty adult shouting, No rest! Nasty adult with long leather snake hitting them!”
There was a sharp grinding as Thorin leapt out of his chair and began to pace the room, then, abruptly, the piercing blue eyes looked straight into Ori’s.

“Ori, I need a favor.”

“Of course, Thorin.”

“I need you to come with me into the mine. I’ll need a scribe.”

Ori swallowed, aware of the enormity of the responsibility.

“You don’t want to take a royal scribe with you?”

“Royal scribes report everything I do and say to the king,” said Thorin. “I need someone I can trust.”

Gloin said, “You’ll want Vors’ mine records, he owns several, though I suspect Calmar has all the real and useful information.”

Thorin nodded. “Dwalin, put together enough units to take the building in Dale, and also everything, every paper, every rug, every lamp from Vors’ home and office, but hold back awaiting my signal. I don’t want Vors to be able to say he knew nothing, even if he can say Calmar forced this on him.”

“And Vors himself?” Dwalin asked.

“Pick him up now, quick and clean. Put him in solitary in the common lock up in Erebor. No one talks to him, not his family, not other nobles, no one but me.”

Dwalin made a smirk of disgust.

“As a nobleman he’ll have the right to plead his case before the king.”

“He’ll get it, just not right away.”

Thorin turned to Bofur.

“I hope for your sake you’re right about all this, Bofur. If you aren’t, you’ve just toppled the House of Durin.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode! Well, we're off, running, and completely over the deep end! Hope you all enjoy it and come back to join us for more next Friday! Thanks, friends, and keep those cards and letters coming!

Thorin sat, thinking a moment. Gloin muttered an excuse and went out, taking Gridr with him. The Urs looked at each other, remaining quiet while the Crown prince considered.

“I need to make an ostensible inspection of the mines. It hasn’t been done in decades. One of the duties my grandfather has neglected and I wasn’t even aware of it until Bofur mentioned it. This can be the official reason should any question be raised.” Thorin’s gaze fixed upon Ori. “You’re sure you want to go with me? Remember, it’s up to you, Ori. As I said, this is a favor. I can’t just order someone into the mines.”

To Ori it was obvious Thorin could do just that, but Thorin didn’t do things that way. Ori really could refuse if he didn’t want to do it.

“I’m sure, Thorin.”

“Thank you, Ori.”

Ori went to prepare and Thorin left the room as well. Dwalin followed Ori back to the small room where Ori’s old clothes still sat. Dwalin pulled from the trunk again to place a stout leader jerkin over Ori’s shirt and strapped on some leather elbow braces and vambrances. Ori also added some woolen breeches over his own and Dwalin made sure his knees and shins were also protected before Ori put on his oldest cardigan.

Ori reflected that although it was meant to be a rest day, the mines never stopped. There were always miners who longed to be in the depths. The mines were the place they felt complete. It was those forced to mine just to eat the Durins worried over, and so it must be today that Thorin went to Vors’ zinc mine.

Dwalin gave him a quick kiss and went off to complete his various tasks.

Ori found Dori sitting alone in the kitchen over a cup of tea. Even though Ori felt nervous and keyed up it cheered him to see how Dori was so immediately at home here, how quickly this kitchen was becoming Dori’s kitchen. Dori poured a second cup with milk and honey and pushed it toward the seat next to his. Ori sat and sipped. They drank in silence.

Finally Dori said, “There was a time, not so long ago, that I could say I forbade this and you would simply obey.”

“You did what you thought best, Dori, but now I have an obligation to my husband’s family.”

“You’re far too young, Ori, you only have a husband because our Nori is such a rat.”

Ori’s face must have shown some of the hurt he felt.

Dori sighed, his shoulders rounding.

“I’m sorry, pet. I shouldn’t have said that. Not the thing about your husband, anyway. We all know Nori is a rat.”
   “But he’s our rat,” Ori concluded.

   “If only Dwalin had the opportunity to court you properly. It might have given you time to grow into yourself a little more. You’ve always been so impressionable. Dwalin is a very domineering dwarf, he could easily manipulate you even with the best intentions.”
   Ori thought about pots calling kettles black, but let it pass.
   Dori muttered something about “too many Shire novels”

Now Ori huffed in frustration.
   “I may be young, and I may read tunic-rippers for fun, but I’m not some opal-eyed romantic idiot. He didn’t seduce me. We’ve barely had time to kiss.”
   Dori reared back, fire in his eyes.
   “He leaves you alone every night?”
   “Calm down, Dori. It’s not like he’s down at the pub. He’s busy. Mahal’s blessed forge, I’ve been busy. When I imagined married life, it never include worry over the fate of Erebor.”
   “The Durins do run amok,” said Dori, setting back into his seat. “You know other noble families aren’t like this, don’t you?”
   “Or so Balin claims?” Ori teased.
   “Or so he claims. It’s not as though I’ve taken tea with the queen of Gondor recently. If Thorin has his way I may do so, sooner rather than later.”
   “You’d love it,” said Ori slyly. “You’d wear a plum velvet tunic with jeweled gilt lace at the cuffs and terrify them all.”
   Dori’s whole face lit in an evil smile and it set Ori off giggling. Dori laughed softly. He reached and smoothed Ori’s hair.
   “If only it were all like that, pet.”
   Balin bustled in. He kissed Dori soundly and turned to Ori.
   “Here, wee brother. I’ve got somethin’ that’ll come in handy in th’ mines.”
   It turned out to be a wooden desk contraption worn around the waist and easily closed in tight spaces, all without spilling a drop of ink. There were compartments fitted with lids for more ink, his penknife and spare nibs.
   “This is beautiful, Balin, but my night vision will only carry me so far. How do I see to write?”
   “Turn th’ lids of the nib an’ pen compartment all th’ way over.”
   Each was backed with the thinnest veneer of phosphorescent stone and settled perfectly into place upside down.
   “Oh, that’s clever,” said Ori. “Where did this come from?”
   “One of Gridr’s trinkets. She’s got quite th’ collection. Yeh can give it back when you go visit Gloin.”

   Ori gathered his courage and his equipment and went in search of Thorin’s study.
   Nothing in it or about it surprised the scribe.
   It was a large, square room, almost entirely blue granite, with a few old rugs on the floor and tapestries on the walls for insulation. Overflowing bookshelves backed the desk to the left. An ornate hearth dominated the wall to the right. The room itself was filled with well-worn furniture, and heavily decorated with ancient implements of mayhem, both real and... imaginary.
   Ori tipped his head.
   “Is that a wooden sword?”
   “That was Fili’s,” said Thorin at the desk, scratching his signature on some orders. “His shield is around here somewhere as well, probably under the couch. That’s where he hid all his important possessions. I think his toy raven is still under there too.”
   Ori imagined Fili and Kili as badgers, leaping around this room, dueling and shrieking and knocking over piles of documents while their Idad Thorin tried to work at his desk.

“I got most of my work done after they wore themselves out,” said Thorin, as if reading his mind. “They would nap on that couch just like I used to.”

“This was your father’s office,” Ori guessed.

“It’s where I feel closest to him. I find myself wondering what he would have done with this situation. Now I won’t know until I get to the Halls.”

“I never thought much about the Halls,” said Ori. “I supposed it’s different when you’ll have someone there to meet you.”

“You will have,” said Thorin, “but we’ll try to keep that for many years in the future. Right now, we’re meeting Bofur at the warehouse. He’ll bring us down into the mine itself and hopefully keep us from falling into an open mine shaft.”

Ori swallowed.

“There’s an open mind shaft? No rail?”

“There are at least six open mine shafts. The floors of two have fallen so they’re considered bottomless.”

“How jolly,” said Ori dryly.

“When we get back to the surface a guard will be there to bring you to Gloin’s house. Whatever you’ve written down, give it all to Gloin. Don’t keep any of it.

“I won’t, Thorin.”

Thorin regarded him with a small grin.

“You’re so calm.”

Ori laughed.

“Ask poor Dwalin how calm I am. He’s there when I’m not calm. I’m sure he’s told you.”

“He’s told me when you’ve been very upset, but no details, Ori. Those are between you and Dwalin. Given how you came into this family, you’re entitled to be upset every now and then.”

“Do you get really upset?”

“Lately the top of my head blows off at least once a day, but very few people have ever seen it. The crown prince has to have his royal upsets in private. It’s a good thing Dwalin has such broad shoulders.”

They rode unrecognized, or at least with discretion, hooded against a sudden fine spring rain. Their escort – Furh’k and another warrior named Targ – rode a little ways behind them, but in ready enough reach.

Honda seemed to enjoy the outing despite the weather. She’d been chosen in part for her easy, placid nature, and Ori was grateful. This was not the time or place to come blazing in on a war stallion, axes whirling overhead.

Draped in an old oilskin cloak of Fili’s, he didn’t feel terribly heroic.

Thorin wore a plain blue tunic over black leggings and boots, his clothes of excellent quality but unadorned, and he had removed his jewelry, even the rings from his fingers. He wore his hair in a long queue with a single smaller braid wrapped around it and capped with the family bead that marked him as both Clan Longbeard and of the line of Durin. Identical to Dwalin’s, the bead was mithril, engraved and without gems, but there was no need to make it any fancier. This was the one bead Thorin would not remove, Ori knew.

Except when bathing, for fear of losing it down the drain, Ori recalled with an inner smirk.

Idly he wondered if Dori would have one, if Balin would give him one, or even if he already had. Dori’s hair was complicated. The beads were decorated with glass, not gems, but it was all so shiny it was hard to rest the eye on any one of them.

Ori knew that Thorin was humbling himself by taking off his jewels and beads, but if he was looking to be approachable, he had failed. Unadorned he looked fiercer than ever, as if the customary noble details had simply softened and blunted the sharp edges of a trained dwarf warrior.

He wasn’t a solid wall of muscle, like Dwalin, but his broad shoulders dominated his rawboned frame. With his height he seemed to loom in from above.
Nori would have said, “Now that ain’t half intimidatin’.”
The prince wore a simple dagger at his belt, under a black coat, but otherwise went unarmed.
Ori, along with his trusty slingshot, carried a knife in his boot, which Nori had long ago forced into his hand and taught him to use, but right now it was more of a security blanket. He was not a trained dwarf warrior. He hoped it wouldn’t come to a fight with anyone. He needed space to use the slingshot with any accuracy.
They dismounted and paused under a porch overhang at the side of a pub where Ori thought he had been sick a time or two, and waited for Dwalin’s signal.
Around them the city sat eerily quiet, except for the plash of rain as it drained from the roofs into barrels. The quiet unnerved him. He grew up in this city and it was almost never like this. Unless there was a howling blizzard there was always a todo.
Dwalin gave them the all clear and they entered a big, weatherbeaten warehouse like a dozen others around it. Ori saw a small smear of blood on a bin and some scuffing across the dirt, the only signs of struggle. Bofur was there, but all the other dwarrows in the building wore the uniforms of the city patrol.
Ori looked his husband up and down for possible injuries, relieved to see him unhurt. Ori would have liked to hug him.
Dwalin gave him a wide grin and a saucy wink.
“The mine bosses from this shift’ve been ‘detained’,” he said. “Yeh shouldn’t run inta tha’ kinda trouble.”
“Does the mine go all the way back to Erebor?” Thorin asked.
“Aye,” said Dwalin sourly. “We grabbed all Calmar’s men before they could leave th’ warehouse. The ones still in the mine nearly got away. Turns out they have an escape hatch and a lift into the mountain.”
Ori thought he could hear Thorin grind his teeth.
“Where does the lift leave them?” Thorin asked.
Bofur snorted.
“An old side tunnel at the central textiles market. Not by accident neither. Twenty orcs, kick-dancing in their skivvies, could probably go unnoticed there, never mind a coupla men coming out of a crack in a back wall.”
Ori tried very hard not to imaging orcs in skivvies. Sadly, he failed.
“They won’t care about a few men passing through,” Ori said, “but a few dozen dirt covered miners?”
“Mebbe if the miners promise not to handle the velvets?”
Thorin, wisely, didn’t touch that comment.
“This will work out better than what we’d planned,” he said, “It’s safer to evacuate the miners directly into the mountain than try to smuggled them through the streets. Dwalin, send a raven, warn the unit on patrol in the market that we’re coming through.”
“Aye, I’m on it.”
“The ponies?” Ori asked. “If we won’t be coming back.”
“Someone’ll take ‘em back t’ th’ stables, love,” Dwalin assured him.
Thorin turned to Bofur.
“Were any of the miners hurt when the soldiers raided the mine?”
“Naw,” said Bofur. “They’re used to scuffles breakin’ out ’tween the master’s men. They just went along with their business. Still doing it now.”
“They’re still working?” Thorin asked, eyebrows high.
“They’re afraid to stop,” said Bofur. “The mine bosses’re gone, but the Master’ll just send more.”
“If he does it won’t do him any good,” said Thorin. “This mine is now forfeit to the crown.”

As they descended in a rickety lift that seemed cobbled together from old fish barrels, Ori remembered what Bofur told him about mines.
“They’re supposed t’ be our birthright as dwarrow, but, y’know, there’s some who just can’t do it, can’t go down in the mines without thinkin’ th’ whole mountain’s gonna crush ’em. Only, they don’t know it ’til the lift opens an’ they go t’ step out an’ they freeze. Just like statues. No way around that. Only thing left t’ do is ship ’em back up topside.”
“That must be really embarrassing.”
“Oh, they’re teased a little by their mates down th’ pub, but there’s naught anybody can do about it. Just the way they’re made.”

Ori had been to the forges with Dwalin, but he had never been in a working mine and the fear of freezing up when he was needed was, ironically, the thing that nearly paralyzed him.

At the bottom they stepped out into a large anteroom carved from the stone, lit with bare phosphorescent lanterns, and not many of them. In the gloom ragged dwarrow and a few men sorted raw ore into bins.
Bofur stepped forward and one of the dwarrow saw him and waved absently before bending back to his task – then whipped his head back up to gawp at the cloaked figures behind Bofur and the uniformed soldiers who flanked them.

No one else stopped working, their hands sorting ceaselessly, but Ori could see they stared at the newcomers from under lashes and fringes of hair.
Bofur approached the dwarf who had hailed him and they spoke in low, urgent voices. The grizzled worker wore a braid that gave his original craft as brewer of ale and mead. He looked over Bofur's shoulder at the prince with fear in his eyes and bowed his head.
Thorin returned his bow.
Bofur drew the dwarf forward.
“This is Tin, son of Tanis. He’ll take us through.”
Thorin raised his voice just enough that everyone in the room could hear him.
“Thorin, son of Thrain, at your service, Master Tin. It’s very kind of you to do this.”
“Eh… erm… are we under arrest, yer highness?”
“No, you haven’t done anything wrong. These soldiers and the ones above in the warehouse are here to protect you.”
“Above us?” Tin looked up as if he could see through a mile of stone before he turned back to Thorin. “Where are the mine bosses?”
“In the lockup in Erebor.”
“I see,” said Tin. “And, um, when’re they gettin’ out?”
“They’re not.”
“And the rest of ’em?”
“Will be dealt with, but you won’t see them again either.”

Now the mine workers looked at one another openly, shaking their heads, as if they couldn't understand what this strange, delusional dwarf was saying. Ori could hear them thinking: Poor sod thinks he’s the prince if Erebor.

Later Ori was glad he'd written down his impressions as well as recorded what happened. He could only recall the mine itself as a string of nightmarish sights, sounds, and smells. It was dark, but unlike men dwarrow didn't need much light. It stank, and not just of stale air and exposed minerals. The uneven stones beneath them, flat only in the tracks of the mine cart, tripped him up every other “Water on the floor,” Thorin muttered. “Most of it's been stagnant but here it's running and fast. There’s a bad seep someplace.”

Ori shuddered. Water was dangerous. It cracked and broke rock like the heaviest hammer, then it rolled through and filled tunnels and drowned miners.

Dwarrow could breathe mine gasses, even coal dust, and absorb it all happily, but they couldn’t breathe water.

“The walls are compromised too,” Thorin said.

Ori felt it, the strain on the shoring timbers, far too few and flimsy. Sweat ran down his back in rivulets as he looked around, increasingly wide-eyed.

He reminded himself like a chant: I am a dwarf. I belong here.

If he wasn’t convinced, at least it burned some nervous energy.

They saw dwarrow all along the path, thin, ragged figures moving frantically, if not carefully. Most never even looked up as the party passed. If anything the sound of approaching footsteps made them busier.

The first large knot of miners they ran into was pulling a full ore cart by dint of sweat toward the sorting room.

Ori knew next to nothing about how mines worked, but he knew carts were traditionally hauled by stout ponies, bred especially for that work. Nowadays dwarf mines had mechanical systems that ran on pulleys run remotely by steam. Dwarrow did not pull mine carts.

Master Tin halted them.

"Alright lads. Time to knock off."

They looked up at him in amazement and kept moving.

"Yeh lost yer mind, Tin?" asked the dwarf at the lead.

"Years ago, Jat, as yer so fond've tellin' me, but it don't change that it's time to go."

"Go where? Next shift hasn’t come."

"They ain't comin'," said Tin.

Silently, ominously, everyone in earshot stopped and turned to look at them, expressions bleak.

The cart came to a screeching stop.

"They didn't all get taken away in the wagons?" Jat asked in a low, desperate whisper.

Ori frowned. Did these dwarrow not know the slave carts had been halted?

"No," said Tin, “they ain't been taken away, but they ain't comin' back and we can't be here neither."

"Why not?" Jat demanded. He seemed to notice Thorin and the soldiers for the first time and looked them up and down, with a shiver.

"The mine's been closed," said Master Tin. "Fer, um, repairs."

"Repairs? Repair what?" someone out in the darkness asked. “Where would yeh bloody start?”

He was shushed viciously. The tension in the air only tightened another notch.

“Never mind repairs. Where will we go?” Jat demanded, his voice cracking. "If we can't work, we’ll starve."

Someone started crying in long, exhausted jags.

“You will not starve,” said Thorin, finally. "You’ll be paid while repairs are made."

The voice in the dark snorted in disgust.

“Who’ll pay us for no’ workin’? No one!”

“The crown prince of Erebor will pay you.”

“Oh aye? D’yeh know ’im?”

Low, bitter laughter swept the miners.

“That would be me,” said Thorin.

The laughter stopped.

“He serious?” a young dwarf asked. “The prince of bloody Erebor? In this mine?”
Ori’s head shot up. He wasn’t sure if he was allowed to speak, but he felt compelled.
“Lor, son of Tor, is that you?” he asked.
“An’ who wants t’ know?”
“Ori of the Brothers Ri, you dip.”
A young miner rounded the edge of the cart and peered at him.
“Mahal’s hairy hind end! It’s Scribe Ori from Steam Alley, right enough.”

Abruptly, oddly, the tension was broken, as if Ori’s presence meant there couldn’t possibly be any danger. If this was the case, Ori, thought, the miners were the victims of disorganized thinking. They surged forward suddenly and a babble of voices boiled over:

"Ori, Dori’s brother?"

"Oi! Ori! How’s tricks?"
"Can’t be him. I heard he went and worked in Gondor."
"Naw, I seen the king come and marry ’im off t’ that great lummox of a dwarf who runs the city guard."
"Wait, Ori, son o’ Rikhma? His brother Nori owes me twenny silver coins, th’ rat."

Finally Lor got another word in edgewise.
"What’s this really about, Ori?” he asked. "The master payin’ this joker t’ trick us?"
"No, he really is the crown prince of Erebor."
"Where’s ’is crown?"
Ori rolled his eyes.
"He’s not going to wear it in a mine any more than you’d wear your mam’s knickers."
Someone gave a saucy whistle and the miners snickered.
A female voice shot out, "Here, yeh leave me underpinnin's outa this!"
"So, yeh say he’s good to ’is word?" Lor asked.
"Yes, he is," said Ori, startled into realizing that he had blithely assured Lor after having known Thorin all of a week. Of course, Ori had also known his own husband all of a week. A tiny part of him wondered how he could trust so easily after a lifetime of distrust as self-defense. "Besides that, prince or not, it’s rude to talk about him like he’s not standing right there. If you did it to me I’d thrash you flat. You know I can."
Lor sniffed.
"Yeh got lucky th’ one time."
Jat rolled his eyes.
"Aw, shuddup Lor. He flattened yeh fair an’ square."
Lor subsided and just as well. Ori thought. He and Lor had been going round and round about that fight since they were badgers.

Once the miners recognized Ori it was easy to get them to agree to go up the lift, but they weren’t going without him, as if he were the security knife in their boot. They insisted on traveling with the prince’s party in an ever-increasing parade.

Ori shrugged to Thorin apologetically. As they moved deeper into newer parts of the excavation the roof pitched dramatically lower, and in a side mine where Tin led Thorin’s party, it was barely shoulder height and they had to stoop, the water rising around their ankles. The light was almost non-existent and Ori used the panels in his kit as much to see where he was going as to see to write. He heard the ring of handpicks and mattocks ahead in the darkness, but by the time they approached the worksite the roof had dipped to waist height. If they continued they’d be crawling through the water on their hands and knees.

Thorin called a halt.
“What are they doing in there?” Thorin asked Bofur. “They can’t even stand up. Shouldn’t the rest of the wall been carved out as they pursued this vein?”
“Bosses didn’t want to waste time,” said Bofur. “Instead o’ digging it all out they just jammed some supports in and called it good.”
“No full grown dwarf could move under there, never mind work.”
“No full grown dwarf could,” Bofur agreed.
Ori felt sick.
He watched comprehension slide over Thorin’s face and the mask of calm slid just a little.
“Mebbe yeh’d like t’meeet ‘em?” Bofur suggested.
“Please.”
“Alright, you lot. Knock off and come out.” He turned to Thorin. “Might want t’ back up a little. Give ’em some room.”
Somehow a dozen tiny miners and their gear had squeezed into that space and when they made their way back toward the main tunnel Ori saw they were badgerlings, not even tweens.
“This here’s Prince Thorin,” said Bofur. “He come t’ meet yeh and see where yeh work.”
“Are you really Prince Thorin?” one of them asked, eyes wide. From the voice Ori could tell it was a young dam.
“At your service,” said Thorin, and he bowed as well as he could in the cramped space. “And what is your name?”
The badgerling swallowed, but she quickly found her feet and introduced herself.
“Caris, daughter of Nadaris, at your service and your family’s, Prince Thorin.”
“Are these your siblings?” Thorin asked.
“Some of ‘em are.”
Obviously the ringleader and the boldest, she introduced each one of them properly by their name and a parent’s name. Ori wrote everything down.
“Here, Caris, who’re you talkin’ to?”
A great strapping dam struggled down the passage, visibly alarmed. Bofur caught her up and whatever he told her made the dam’s eyes enormous in her dirt-caked face.
“No!” she gasped. “What would he want with us?”
“What do you want with us, Prince Thorin?” Caris asked.
Thorin said honestly and directly, “I want to take you all out of here.”
“To do what?” Nadaris demanded. “If we leave now we’ll lose our jobs. It ain’t like they’re thick on the ground. We ain’t Erebor dwarrow.”
“But you are,” said Thorin. “For a long time a lot of very powerful people pretended you weren’t until everyone, including you, believed it. Truly, no matter where you are from, you don’t belong here in this mine. It’s a disaster in the making. But you all specifically, you deserve better. Caris, you and your siblings belong in school. Your parents deserve work that earns them enough that you can go to school and no one goes hungry.”
Nadaris snorted. “Well, that’s a nice fairy tale.”
“It’s not a fairy tale. It’s the way the dwarrow under the mountain live. It’s their birthright as dwarrow. It’s yours as well.”
Nadaris didn’t look convinced.
"You Durins abandoned the dwarrow in Dale," said Nadaris. "Now you say you want to fix this?"
"I will fix this, or I will offer you something better. I give my word."
"What does your word mean to us?" she demanded.
Thorin looked down. Ori watched every emotion cross his face, from shame to despair to resolve, his royal mask not serving him well. When he looked up again, it was directly at Caris. He unwrapped the smaller of his braids from the larger, took his dagger and cut it off, bead and all, and offered it to the dwarfling.
"We are dwarrow," he said. "When words mean nothing, this still means everything."
Caris took it, open-mouthed, before regaining her composure with admirable speed.
Even as the other dwarrow burst into exclamations of shock and urgent whispering, Caris fixed him with a look far older than her years.
"We'll hold you t' this, yeh know, Prince Thorin."
"I expect you to, Caris. If I fail you, with that bead you can demand my life."
She opened her mouth again, and closed it, looking to her amad.
Ori slid his gaze over to Nadaris, even as he wrote faster than he ever had in his life. His heart pumped at a painful speed, all fear of the mine forgotten.
Nadaris lifted her chin, assent, if not quite agreement.
Caris tucked the braid into her tunic.
"I guess we'll see then," said the dwarfling and offered her hand to Thorin.
They clasped wrists in the universal dwarf symbol of 'deal made'.
"Now, we all need to leave," said Thorin. "You know far better than I that this is no place for the living."
Caris asked, "So where do we go?"
"We can't go home," said Nadaris, "and wait for the mine bosses to pick us off in our beds."
"For now, you aren't going home," said Thorin. "There's a back way into the mountain and we're taking it. Plans are already in motion to round up those responsible for this mine. You have someplace safe to stay until then."
Tin groaned.
"I have a dam and my son's dwarflings still at home. What of our kin still in town?"
"Furh'nk," Thorin signalled.
The young guardsmen came forward.
"Master Tin, you know Master Furh'nk?"
"Aye, grew up with his udad. Yeh've grown tall an' broad, Master Furh’nk. Mahal’s blessed yeh."
"Thank yeh, Master Tin."
"Ori," Thorin called, "take down the information on the families still topside. Furh’nk, organize a unit to get them to safety."
"But, where are we going?" Caris repeated.
"The miners' commons," said Thorin.
Nadaris shook her head.
"Those are for guild miners. Dwarrow who live in Erebor."
"That's not true," said Thorin. Ori saw the tightness in his jaw, the frustration building. "They're for any miner who needs them. Garnet?"
The bird swooped down to land on Thorin's outstretched arm. Ori realized she must have been with them the entire time, waiting.
Thorin and Garnet had a brief, clicking, scraping conversation in the language of the Erebor ravens, then Garnet flew away, disappearing back into the darkness, although Ori didn't know how she saw where she was flying.
Ori noted angrily that the lift to the tunnel behind the market was much smaller, but much safer.. They could only go two and three at once and the rest had to wait, but in that time Thorin stood and talked to the miners who waited. Or, the miners talked and Thorin listened.
Bofur leaned on Ori's shoulder and chuckled.
"That's miners for yeh. Never say a bloody word, then when they do start talkin' they never shut up."
"Bofur, what are the miners' commons?"
"Safe place to rest, wash, get somethin' t' eat. Erebor's got seven in all, the main commons and six smaller ones supplied off've it. Guild dues pay for some of it, but mostly it's the mine owners' get, and the crown chips in." He lowered his voice to a murmur, expression grim once more. "Or it usedta. Food still comes from the royal kitchens anyway."

When it his turn came Ori stepped in with Bofur. He waited until they were well on their way to turn to the miner.
"You don't know what to think of Thorin, do you. You don't trust him."
Bofur gave him a 'Who? Me?' look, then chuckled self-consciously.
"Not a matter o' trust. Me cousin Bifur's hero pay that bought us the inn? That didn't come outa the royal treasury. That come out of Thorin's pocket. He's got a good heart, aye, but he's in a bad spot, an' no tellin' what a dwarf in a spot like that'll do. Mark me words, Ori lad. Whether his grandad's alive or not Thorin'll be wearin' Thror's crown by Durin's Day."

Ori watched with shameful relief as Bofur and the last of the miners disappear into the main commons dormitory. His hand was cramping and his eyes watered from writing endlessly in poor light, but he had done good work that day, he knew. He wished he could lay down and sleep, but at the same time he couldn't get what he'd seen and heard out of his mind.

He turned to follow Thorin on their borrowed rams to take them back home.

Thorin’s expression had grown distant and hard. He was obviously deep inside himself and it wasn’t a peaceful place.

They returned to the royal quarters in silence, Ori increasingly worried over Thorin’s state. The prince had gone from merely withdrawn, to agitated, to drumming his fingers on his thigh and breathing through his teeth.

An explosion was imminent.

Finally they halted in front of the prince’s house and dismounted. Ori wanted to take his leave, but a jaunty ‘toodles’ wasn’t going to cut it and he was afraid for Thorin – and anyone unfortunate enough to cross his path. Ori screwed up his courage finally and asked,

“Thorin, are you so angry you can’t speak right now?”

The prince nodded.

“Would you like to be left alone?”

Another nod.

“Are you going to throw things, brood over a past you can’t change and refuse to eat or sleep?”

Thorin stared at him, startled.

“Just a guess,” Ori said dryly. “I’m not going to tell you not to blame yourself because you’ll blame yourself no matter what. I won’t tell you to get some sleep, because I don’t think I could right now either, but at least eat something while you’re blaming yourself and not sleeping or you’ll be sick and Dwalin will kick your arse.”

Thorin nodded, still a bit shocked.

Ori realized he was standing with his hands on his hips like Dori on a tear and was this far from waving a finger at the crown prince of Erebor as if Thorin were a puppy who had peed on the kitchen floor.

“Alright, then. I have to go. Please take care of yourself?”

Thorin shrugged somewhat helplessly, but at least he looked less homicidal, or maybe that was just Ori’s wishful thinking. He watched Thorin disappear into the house just as Dwalin arrived on Harley.

“Dwalin!”

Finally Ori got that hug he had wanted, and a kiss in the bargain.
Dwalin pulled back a little, and looked down at him with a frown.

“Ori, love. What’s wrong?”
“With me, nothing. I think you need to go and see Thorin.”
Dwalin looked over at the lapis house.
“Upset by things in the mine?”
“I think if King Thrór had been there, Thorin would be under arrest right now.”
“He so mad he can’t talk?”
“Yes.”
Dwalin rubbed his face.
“Mahal’s hairy arse. Have you gone to Gloin with yer notes yet?”
“I’m on my way, but I couldn’t just leave Thorin like that and not tell anyone.”
“Right, I’ll take care of it,” said Dwalin.

“It sounds like you always do,” said Ori as he stole just one more hug. Dwalin rode off.

Ori ran into the Fundin House and dumped the desk on the low stone table in the sitting room then hurried out again to ride his borrowed ram down to meet Gimli, only to find the ram missing. Wondering if it had decided to make its own way home, he ran into the long tunnel leading to the city.

He stopped. All the lanterns that usually lit the way were out. He frowned then turned to go back to the house for a lamp.

A crowd of ravens blocked his way. He began to back away and then looked toward the darkened tunnel.

He was now completely surrounded by ravens.
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to another episode!
We do assure you we are not in anyway influenced by the late, great Mr. Hitchcock in this chapter!
Hope you are riveted and we look forward to you joining us for more next Friday! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The ravens dove at him. He cried out, covering his head, but instead of falling on him they and wheeled and squawked all around him, forced him to move and drove him forward toward the wall, up against the wall, and through a crevice he had not even seen. It was Ori-sized. A larger dwarf would never have fit.

He tripped on loose debris, fell forward, tried to catch himself. His hand caught a rock, which skittered away and he went sprawling.

Stunned, he lay absolutely still and let his eyes adjust to the gloom and his heart slow from its gallop.

The soft breath of wings sent his shoulders up around his ears, but the noises settled around him in croaks and squeaks.

He knew he was in a side tunnel, the mountain was riddled with them. Some were used as shortcuts, but many others were forgotten as the dwarrow carved the inside of Erebor into ever new dwellings, businesses and offices and quicker, more permanent routes were mapped.

This was an old tunnel, filled with undisturbed debris until he’d so gracelessly slid through it, but the debris was small and probably mixed with raven droppings. He turned his thoughts to the structure of the walls, what the stone itself could tell him. The rock around him did not groan under stress and he doubted the ravens would use the tunnel if they thought it might collapse.

Slowly he stood, reaching with his arms over his head. He couldn’t touch the ceiling. He looked up, carefully shading his eyes in case of falling stone. The remnants of the phosphorescent lamps were only enough to show the roof of the passage disappeared somewhere far above in the gloom.

Wings brushed his head and talons grazed his hair. He might have thought it an accident, but he suspected nothing here had happened without the ravens’ intent. They were urging him forward, down the passage, away from the entrance.

He lost track of time, slowly picking his way down the path, fearing he would tumble down some sink hole or long abandoned mine pit. Dwalin would never find him. No one would.

Finally a lamp far ahead, slightly brighter and yellower than the others, grew into a doorway.

He should have been happy, or at least relieved, but instead anxiety bloomed in his chest and confusing smells assaulted his memory.

Metals of all kinds, gold, silver and steel, but mostly gold.
Dread seized him all at once. He did not want to see where this tunnel led. He might have turned back, but a huge black shape descended before him and cawed.

Slowly he walked toward the light and saw that this wasn’t just any raven. By the mithril message tethers on his legs, Ori saw this was Roäc.

The tunnel ended just beyond, in a shallow walkway running left and right and backed by a crumbling wall. The wall rose to about chest height, and above he saw the carved and decorated ceiling of a vast, torchlit cavern.

Unsure what lurked behind the wall he hunkered down between two broken sections and looked.

The golden light was not just the torches, but fire reflecting off a sea of gold.

He’d been led to the great treasury room of Erebor.

Ori did not like this, not the feel in his gut or the scent on the air. It smelled of gold and cut gems, but also rot, though not the dead-mouse-under-the-floorboards decay. This was the smell of evil.

Coins clinked and slid and a vague, unmusical humming heralded the appearance of King Thror from around the back of a huge, obsidian pillar. The old king waded through gold chains and crowns and other trinkets up to his knees, though he hardly seemed to notice, as if years had been stripped from his limbs. He was counting coins.

Thror piled the shiny discs in columns on the tilted surface of an emerald-covered coffer. When the coins rolled off Thror simply laughed and started counting again. Ori watched this happen five times, six times, seven.

Abruptly Thror froze.

He swept the remaining coins off the coffer, opened it and drew out a cut gem so large he held it in both his hands.

It glittered like an opal, but with the smoke of obsidian underneath the sheen. Black shifted to red, then violet, independent of the torchlight.

It must have been heavy, for the king’s arms soon trembled under the weight and he was forced to close the lid of the coffer with his forearm and place the gem on top. There he caressed it and murmured at it as though it were a child.

A weird glow formed around it, pulsed outward about a foot and back on a heartbeat, then out again a little further and back, and every time it retreated more gold surrounded the coffer. Every time the wave rose in length and height and violence.

The skin on the back of Ori’s neck prickled as the waves of - something - rolled across the room in all directions, including his.

Surely it couldn’t reach the broken wall, he thought, but it did, and it kept coming, leaping, breaking on the stone and spraying a flume of something horrible over the wall, over him.

He gagged on the filth, his eyes streaming, his stomach rebelling.

He didn’t scream but the fear of being swamped again pushed it up his throat.

The wave retreated once more, and a little farther, and a little farther.
He turned back to look. In his wavering sight he watched the king put the evil thing back into its coffer and close the lid with satisfaction, all the while freeing his legs and robe from under the new piles of treasure.

Túrth was talking to someone Ori couldn’t see.

Too far away to hear Túrth clearly, Ori leaned forward, still dizzy, still sick.

Then he leaned a little too far.

He dislodged a chunk of stone.

It fell thirty feet, picked up speed, careened off to the left, bounced off a pillar of rose quartz, knocked over a teetering stack of gem-encrusted bucklers and the chain of falling treasure fell inevitably toward unsuspecting the king.

Rather than engulfing him in a mass it threw forth a ruby-studded goblet that struck Túrth across the back of the head and knocked him face down in the gold.

He lay there unmoving.

Blood roared in Ori’s ears.

Mahal’s hairy arse. He’d killed the king.

He killed the king.

He wanted to cry. He wanted to scream. He wanted-

It was then he finally threw up, right over the edge and into the gold.

The raven at his shoulder cawed uproariously.

Ori turned and fell with his back to the broken wall as the cavern echoed with the harsh scrape of mockery.

Dozens of ravens had exited the tunnel and were laughing - rolling around, beating their wings in the dirt, falling down laughing.

Because Ori killed the king.

A sound, low and deeper than the ravens filtered through to him, then the clink of displaced coins.

Ori turned to peer back into the treasury.

Túrth rolled over in the gold, rubbed the back of his ill-used skull and looked right up at Ori’s hiding place.

“Shut up, you little bastards!” Túrth barked. “That wasn’t funny!”

The ravens disagreed.

Ori had reached the end.

He crawled back toward the tunnel, staggered to his feet and back the way he had come.

Eventually he found his entry point and walked toward home.
As he exited the tunnel he heard a great uproar ahead.

A crowd of dwarrows, many of them soldiers, had gathered in front of Fundin House, and Dwalin stood at the center, barking orders, his face like a storm.

Ori swallowed and slowed.

A dozen horrible possibilities swirled around in his head. The masters’ men had somehow got into the house and kidnapped Dori or even killed him. The king had discovered what Thorin did in the mine and had him dragged away to the dungeons. Frerin had declared himself king and they were all in danger.

He dismissed the second and third choices almost immediately. Unless full scale rebellion was imminent the soldiers wouldn't be here, armed and grim and ready to march.

That left-

Ori rushed forward.

"Dwalin! Dwalin, what's happened to Dori?"

Dwalin's eyes flew open.

"Ori!"

To a dwarf, the soldiers turned and stared at him.

Furh’nk deflated in what looked suspiciously like relief and growled, "Oh, thank blessed frickin' Mahal."

Dwalin was on Ori in three large strides and gathered him up, dirt, blood and feathers, and all. Ori's feet left the ground and he was held agreeably tight, though the thundering beat of Dwalin's heart did nothing to calm Ori's fears.

"Dwalin, what's the matter?"

"Wha's th'- Love, yeh never went to meet Gimli, yer notes were still sittin' on the table in th' sitting' room and yer battle ram was grazin' at Dis' herb boxes. Yeh vanished off th' face o' Arda! The Durins're all over Erebor and Dale lookin' fer yeh!"

Dori appeared in the doorway and reached them without seeming to even open the gate.

"Ori! Put him down, you oliphant. He could be injured!"

"Aw, love, look at yeh!" said Dwalin mournfully. "Tell me the other fella got the worse of it!"

"Uhm... Um, no." Ori buried his face in Dwalin’s front. Feeling Dwalin’s strength and breathing in his scent made the moments of remembered horror leave Ori’s brain for the moment.

“Take me home, Dwalin, please,” he mumbled.

Dwalin turned to shout over his shoulder.

"Gimli!"

Gimli appeared at the door of his father's house, gawped at what he saw, turned and ran back inside, presumably in search of Oin.

Dwalin scooped Ori up so he looked less like a kitten dangling from a branch and rushed into Fundin House, Dori at his heels berating him in endless, creative ways.

Dwalin carried him into the washroom and set Ori carefully down on a stool.

Ori looked up at Dwalin’s face, it was hardened and grim but his eyes were full of worry as he peeled back the layers of clothing.

“Wha’ hurts, love?”

“Nothing, but kind of everything. I don’t think I broke anything, just stumbled a lot.”

“An’ wha’ happened?”

Ori opened his mouth to reply, but he couldn’t string the words together and Dori jumped in.

“May we wait to make sure he’s unharmed before you interrogate him?”

“If someone’s after him? No.”

“No one’s after me,” said Ori wearily.

“Pet, you look like someone dumped an aerie over your head,” Dori insisted. “How did you get this way?”

“Ravens. I tripped.”

“Dori, please” Ori started, then the door opened again.

Balin came in with Oin, who immediately made sure Ori’s pupils were the same size. He helped Dori and Dwalin clean Ori up, put a nightshirt on him and then nodded approvingly.

“He’s not in acute pain. He’ll bruise like a patchful of crushed blackberries, but he ain’t complainin’ of particular injuries. Heh, give him some of this spirea to chew to cut the ache. Sorry, laddie, it tastes disgusting. Make sure you lot paint any cuts with this salve, give him some water and put him to bed,” said Oin.

Dori went off to let Oin out and get the water.

Dwalin returned to Ori’s knee.

“What else, love?” he urged.

“When we’re alone,” said Ori.

He had no idea who knew the truth about Thror. Some part of him understood he was lying to Dori, which he had never done. At the same time he suspected it wouldn’t be long until everyone knew.

The king was not simply mad, he was playing with something far too dangerous to hide.

Dori returned and made him drink the entire mug of water, chew the spirea root which made him grimace, and drink more water to get rid of the horrid taste.

“Now, pet, into bed, by yourself,” said Dori, in a tone that brooked no argument.

“Aye,” Dwalin argued. “He’s comin’ with me, so I can watch him.”

Dori demanded. “Where were you when he was injured?”

“Where were you?” Dwalin asked.

“Please, Dori,” said Ori. “You’ve patched me up. Dwalin will take care of the rest.”

Dori opened his mouth, but when Balin put a hand on his arm, he shut it again and went out, muttering about making tea.

Dwalin lifted Ori and took him to what Ori considered to be their bedroom now. He put Ori down on the bed, kicked off his boots and tossed aside his tunic before sitting down and taking Ori into his lap.

Ori finally felt safe and embarrassed himself by starting to cry.

“I’m sorry,” he said in a watery voice. “It’s foolish-”

“Nah, love. Yeh’ve had a bad time. Let yerself get through it.”

“I’m always crying on you,” Ori said, trying vainly to be stalwart.

“‘S why Mahal gave me broad shoulders, love. Jus’ f’r yeh.”

With that, Ori let himself weep for a little, while Dwalin held him close and stroked his hair, murmuring comfortingly.

In a while Ori was able to pull himself together and sit up a little.

“There now,” said Dwalin. “Kin yeh tell me what happened? Last I saw of yeh, was when yeh were about to see about our Gimmers.”

Slowly, Ori told him the whole, shuddering over the part about the king.

Dwalin listened without comment.

“I saw him,” said Ori. “I saw the king in the treasury. I don’t know what that gem - thing in the box was. I suppose one could say it was very pretty, but to me it was horrible. Just evil.”

Dwalin was obviously thinking deeply, then his eyes went to the door.

Ori turned.

Thorin came into the room, closing the door after him. He crossed to the bedside and sat down next to them. He sighed, then reached over and laid his hand on the back of Ori’s neck, pulling the younger dwarf to him, touching their brows together.

“I’m sorry for what happened to you.” he said quietly, then released Ori.

He and Dwalin caught each other’s hands for a moment.

“I’m alright, now,” Ori assured him, feeling almost himself again, except for a lingering fatigue.
“Good.” Thorin looked him over. “Rest. You’ve earned it.”

Thorin rose and left the room.

Dwalin settled Ori beside him. Ori closed his eyes and knew nothing more.

Ori woke up alone, rested though a little sore. He crawled out of the big bed, went to the dresser, looked in the mirror above and shook his head. That bruise on his cheek had bloomed magnificently and the scratch through it, though not deep, would bear watching. Likely it would scar and wouldn’t that be something, to gain his first battle mark because of a bunch of rude birds.

He looked about. Someone had left clothes over the arm of the chair for him. He put on the old, soft tunic and breeches. His stomach rumbled. He decided to go and find Dori and ask for something to eat. Feeding Ori always made Dori happy.

When he opened the door he heard hushed, urgent voices down the hall. He picked out Dwalin’s, Balin’s, Dori’s and Dis’ and… his heart sank.

Thorin was there.

“- miners having someplace to go will tip the balance,” he said. ”We’re not tossing them out into the street. They’ll still have jobs, it will just be a while until the mine reopens.”

“An’ what if it can’t be reopened?” Bofur asked.

“There’s legitimate work within the guild.”

“That costs money. Yeh have to pay a fee, then yer dues, and yeh have to be sponsored by a member t’ join. Yeh might pay their way, Thorin, but yeh ain’t a guild member.”

“No, but you are.”

Bofur drew a breath of surprise, then he laughed in delight.

“Yeh want me to put me standing in th’ guild on the line by sponsorin’ dwarrow I don’t know?”

“Yes.”

“Alright.”

“Alright? Just like that?”

“Aye, well, I sorta owe yeh fer talkin’ business at yer breakfast table. Not t’ mention puttin’ yer entire family line at risk.”

Ori took a deep breath and gathered up his courage.

When he appeared at the sitting room doorway, everyone stopped talking and started at him.

Ori made his way to Dwalin and held his hand.

Thorin recovered first.

"I apologize again, Ori.”

“It wasn’t your fault, Thorin. I’m glad you’re here. We need to talk about the king. He really is mad. I saw him in the treasury. The ravens showed me.”

The prince’s eyebrows shot straight up and Ori took that as permission enough to continue.

“They just swooped down on me and herded me off the street and down this passage I couldn’t see. It was scary, but if I didn’t know they were your ravens it would have been worse.”

“Roäc and his family?”

“Yes.”

Dwalin muttered to himself, something about ravens on a spit.

Dis cocked an eyebrow at him before turning to Ori.

“You were still very brave,” she said. “We trust them, yes, but they aren’t always gentle when they help.”

“But they are the eyes and ears of Mahal, aren’t they,” said Ori.

He turned back to Thorin.

“I had no idea that much gold existed, never mind in one place.”

Thorin’s shoulders sagged.

“Unfortunately, it does, and it’s sitting in the middle of Erebor, just waiting for a dragon to fall on it – and us.”

Ori’s hand tightened in Dwalin’s.

“We can’t defend the mountain against a dragon!”

“But we would be duty bound to try,” said Thorin, “and countless dwarrow would die in the effort. My grandfather knows it, but in his gold sickness he will not part with a single coin. Dis and I and Dwalin and Balin and Oin and Gloin have been emptying our own troves, both to stave off a wyrm and to support the dwarrow and men abandoned by royal greed. It seems Thror accumulates it faster than we can get rid of it.”

“It did seem to grow as I watched,” said Ori.

Thorin sighed.

“I don’t know what Udad has done or what sorcerous bargains he’s struck, but whatever they are they’re exacting their price. As time goes on it grows harder to keep what Thror has become from the people. There are so many traps and pitfalls. What if a dragon comes? What if our people starve through the Durins’ neglect? What if Thror is deposed and our family isn’t strong enough to hold the throne?”

Ori took the last to mean: What if Frerin becomes king and then becomes his grandfather?

Thror had been a mighty king in his time. If gold sickness happened to the strongest of dwarrow, it might certainly happen to one of the most foolish. And what of Thorin himself?

Thorin smiled humorlessly.
“If I fall to the gold sickness, your husband is under orders to make sure no one ever finds the body.”

Ori looked up at Dwalin with his mouth hanging open.

Dwalin had Thorin fixed with a hard stare.

“Aye, an’ yer under orders t’ make sure it don’ ever come t’ tha’.”

“I hear and obey,” said Thorin.

“But, I don’t understand why Roäc showed me the treasure trove,” said Ori. “It’s not like I can help you.”

Dis smile warmly.

“You don't think so? You've done nothing but help since the day you arrived. In this case... I suppose it was a foolish attempt to limit the number of people who know about the gold sickness.”

"I don't think it's foolish," said Ori.

“We were tryin’ t’ protect yeh, love,” said Dwalin. “But thin’s’re movin’ fast now, and ye're far better able t’ handle yerself than we first thought.”

“It would seem” said Dis, “the ravens knew better than the rest of us. The eyes and ears of Mahal indeed.”

“Do Fili and Kili know?” Ori asked.

“Yes,” said Thorin, even more troubled. “Fili has to know. Despite what Frerin thinks, Fili is my heir. If the worst happens, Fili may have to become king long before he’s ready, possibly even in exile. And what Fili knows, Kili knows. I always wondered how that was, since Fili is often sworn to secrecy and I know Fili to be a dwarf of his word, brother or not.”

“Do you think Roäc tells Kili things too?” Ori ventured.

“It’s beginning to look that way, isn’t it,” said Thorin.

“Aye, a spit,” said Dwalin darkly. “An’ mebbe a nice birdie pie.”

“Thorin, I’m really sorry.”

“You have nothing to be sorry for.”

“Actually, I might have… It was such a long way down from where I could see and this rock fell and then a cup hit the king in the head and I thought for a moment I’d killed him and i was sick and dizzy and I threw up.”

The strangest look crossed Thorin’s face, as if he wore a mask of pure marble.

“You thought you’d killed King Thror?”

“Yes, with a cup. Then I got sick.”

“On what, Ori?”
“I don’t know,” said Ori in a tiny voice. “The ravens were laughing, and then he got up and he must have a head made of granite! Um, that is… I didn’t mean it, and I’m really sorry, and I’m so embarrassed because I threw up again!”

Thorin didn’t seem to be able to speak.

Ori thought he must be furious until Thorin choked and managed, “No matter.” before his composure broke entirely.

Ori turned to Dwalin for support but his husband was clenching the back of a chair and visibly shaking.

“Dwalin! Husband! Are you laughing at me again?” Ori demanded fiercely.

“No.” Dwalin managed before completely giving way to guffaws of laughter. “People’ve fainted at th’ sight of the treasury, laughed, cried, screamed. But yeh, love… Yer th’ first t’ vomit on it!”

Fili and Kili burst in, talking excitedly to each other, but then they caught sight of Ori.

Kili slowed to a stop.

“Oi, Ori-mate, did you beat up Idad Frerin again?”

“Again?” said Dori, in accents frozen.
Welcome back, friends! In this episode, poor, pooped Ori is reviving after his last action-packed adventure. We’re giving him something that might seems like a rest but isn’t! Yes, you all know us well! Do let us know how you’re enjoying the story and we hope to see you back here next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori didn’t quite know what to say, but that didn’t stop Nori from appearing like smoke to do it for him.

“Naw, the ravens just rouged him up a bit.”

“Nori!” Ori hissed. “That’s not true.”

“Well, yeh almost did kill the king.”

While the princes gaped, speechless, Dwalin reached over and smacked Nori across the back of the head.

“Tha’s enough o’ tha’, nuisance!”

“Ow! Hey! Leave off, you. Only Dori’s allowed t’ do that.”

Dori said coldly,

“I consider that as perpetual permission, brother.”

Nori groaned at Dwalin.

“See, now look what yeh done.”

“Pet,” Dori said gently to Ori. “I have some tea here for you and Gloin. He mentioned you have notes to go over?”

Oh, the notes! Ori bolted his tea and got up. He had completely forgotten in the face of everything else. The mine felt like days ago, yet it was only this morning.

Ori and Gloin adjourned to the Fundin’s library.

Gloin opened the little folding scribe’s desk and took out the notes, each piece of paper written thoroughly in official black, but many pages rotated ninety degrees and written across again. Each version was legible and Gloin turned a pages this way and that, fascinated.

“I haven’t seen paper used this way in years,” he said.

“Paper is expensive,” said Ori. “What’s crosswise are my own observations, nothing important.”

“No?”
“No, though it turned out to be a good idea anyway. I used every single sheet I had.”

Even professing to be fascinated, Gloin took what Ori considered an inordinate amount of time on each page, reading the actual notes, then Ori’s own.

Ori didn’t mind Gloin reading his personal notes of course, but Gloin’s increasingly perplexed expression was making him nervous and they spent so long over the whole, sad mess that, by the time they had finished Ori realized he’d taken most of the pot of tea for himself.

“I need to step out for a moment,” said Ori.

“Hm? Oh, certainly.”

He went and returned, much relieved, at least until he heard the voices coming from the study. Thorin and Gloin were discussing something that had them both agitated.

Ori heard his name and his heart abruptly started to pound.

He reached the doorway and cleared his throat.

Thorin turned with Ori’s notes in his hand.

"Ori? What in Arda did you write?"

"Er... my raw notes weren’t supposed to see the light of day," said Ori. "I used the the cross through space for a scholarly exercise."

"Yes, but what is that for?"

"A scribe writes what he’s told but a scholar writes what he sees and thinks as well. I'm sorry, Thorin, it won't happen again."

"It would be a shame if it didn't," said Thorin. "These insights are valuable. You saw things I missed and you saw meaning in things I wouldn't know anything about. I didn't grow up with these dwarrow, you did."

"So, it's helpful?"

"Yes, it will help me reach people. It's just what I need, though, you may want to carry more paper when possible."

“As I was telling Gloin, I know paper is expensive.”

“But this is the best use for it,” said Thorin. “For a kingdom of stone, Erebor goes through a lot of paper and ink.”

It was just as well Ori had worked up an appetite.

Dori served him a joint of beef larger than his head and half a field each of potatoes and carrots roasted and swimming in sweet glaze.

“Dori! Not so much veg!”

“It’s not green, pet. Think of the potatoes as chips in their natural state.”
The eldest Ri was making such a fuss, Ori feared Dori might go so far as to cut him his meat for him, but Balin swooped down to draw Dori into a discussion with Dis, Gloin and Gridr at the far end of the table. Ori was left with Fili and Kili, both still happily shoveling food into their mouths.

“Dwalin and Thorin didn’t come in with you?” he asked.

“Last minute planning,” said Fili. “Happens a lot. They’ll be here.”

“Thanks for helping out today, Ori-mate,” said Kili

“You’re welcome, but I only wrote things down.”

And attempted, with limited success, to comfort a furious Durin.

“What we found really hit Thorin hard,” said Ori. “He never faltered while we were down in the mines with people, but afterwards… All those poor badgers working down there beside their parents.”

The brothers looked at him, then at each other. Kili rubbed his eyes with his free hand. Fili glared down at his plate.

“It was just as bad as Bofur said,” Fili muttered. “No wonder Thorin had locked himself in his office.”

“He shouldn’t blame himself,” said Ori. Even he heard the pleading tone in his voice.

“Of course he’s blaming himself,” said Fili. “What you saw goes against everything idad’s taught us, everything that being a Durin is about.”

Kili breathed out in frustration.

“I’m amazed Thorin didn’t go looking for Udadel Thror,” he said.

“Ori sent Dwalin to look after him,” said Fili. “Dwalin keeps him from doing things he’ll regret. It’s getting to be his whole job lately. Here, Ori-mate, see this plate of food?”

Before Ori could reply or Fili go on Dori bustled forward and refilled Fili’s plate, Kili’s plate and topped up Ori’s plate with a murmur and a pat on the shoulder, then he hastened back to Balin’s side.

“He does that,” Ori assured them.

Kili muttered something about Dori being related to Mistress Dazla or Rutile.

“Why Rutile?” Ori asked.

Fili laughed and Kili grimaced.

“Rutile’s very maternal,” Fili snickered. “When we’re home, Amad lets Rutile run loose during the night. Rutile goes to Kili’s room and tries to untangle his hair. Before that she comes to my room and takes all my beard and hair beads out of the dish and lines them up by color value. She used to visit Idad Thorin but he doesn’t like it when she starts recleaning his toenails for him.”

Ori giggled.

“Please go on,” Ori prompted Fili. “You were telling me about Thorin.”
“See this plate of food?” Fili repeated. “If you’re a Durin, it’s not enough just to be thankful you have it.”

“Though we are,” Kili assured him. “A lot.”

“You also need to ask: Who doesn’t have it? Then you make sure they do. We’re, y’know, responsible.”

Ori said, “He can’t fix problems he doesn’t know about.”

“No, he can’t,” said Fili. “He can’t fix the whole mountain by himself either, but until pretty recently he thought he should. Balin and Amad and everyone else have always tried to help, but just now he’s started actually asking for help. Like he asked you.”

Gimli burst in, apparently having dined with friends, judging by the state of his tunic. Ori watched him bump foreheads with Gloin, startled once more by how similar they were.

Well, except for the elf thing.

Binni and Oin arrived directly after, each carrying a mysterious and extremely scrumptious-smelling parcel.

All excitement, Dori took Oin’s and, with Binni, disappeared into the kitchen, already talking at speed.

Soon the elder Durins withdrew to the sitting room while the younger lingered at table. Gimli restlessly moved between the rooms, still at the age where a badger could not sit still in company.

Or perhaps, Ori thought, it was just Gimli. After all, Ori had seen him stationary at the library, but only in low spirits.

Fili swirled a finger through the sheen of gravy on his plate and licked his finger clean. Ori looked around, sure Dis must be lurking.

“Y’know,” Fili said, “Balin thinks he’s being subtle, assigning us history lessons about which dwarf kings were most successful and what they all had in common.”

“We figured it out,” said Kili with an eyeroll. “They didn’t work themselves to death.”

“Balin is still your tutor?” Ori asked.

“One of ‘em,” said Kili. “Dwalin teaches us fighting and tactics and weaponry. He even taught me the bow, though Udadel Thror doesn’t think it’s a proper weapon for a ‘prince of Durin’.”

He said the last in such a way that Ori had to smile.

Kili gulped down half a cup of watered mead before he continued.

“Bow comes in handy when Idad takes us to Mirkwood. For some reason Prince Legolas spends a lot of time outside the palace.”

“For some reason,” Fili echoed with a snort.

“We go hunting.”

“Arrow diplomacy,” said Ori.
“Oi! I like that, Ori-mate,” said Kili. “Definitely writing that down. Anyway, it’s widened my range as an archer. We aren’t always at war, but we always have to eat.”

Fili sat back in his chair, arms crossed.

“Maybe this whole thing with the mines’ll be good in a way. Maybe Idad will let Kili and me help him more. We aren’t shaleheads. Well, not complete shaleheads anyway. We can do things for him. He protects us too much.”

Ori debated his own coin’s worth, then shrugged to himself and tossed it in.

“Maybe because he was younger than you when he became crown prince? He doesn’t want you to miss out on actually being young.”

“I’ve thought of that,” Fili agreed.

“Fi’s the responsible one,” said Kili as he chased the last chunk of potato across his plate and onto the table.

“I’m not that responsible,” Fili protested. “Just shows you how bad it’s gotten if even I think I should spend more time in boring meetings.”

Dori entered with a cake on a platter and fresh plates and silverware.

Having only just put the final morsel of his own dinner in his mouth, Ori wondered once more over Dori’s secret power that allowed him to know when pudding was truly necessary.

Like, right this moment.

Dori gave him a wink.

Ori, Fili, and Kili hurriedly stacked up the dirty dishes to take back and Ori stood to remove the tray when Dori waved him off and swept out with it.

Ori was left to sit back down and consider the bounty before them.

“This looks like the same kind of cake we had at Gridr’s,” said Ori. “Xocolātl?”

“Xocolātl,” Fili affirmed. “From the far southeast.”

He sliced off a slab for Ori and one for himself while Kili attacked it from the opposite side.

Fili refilled Ori’s cup.

“Ever since Amad hosted that Ironfist delegation we’ve been getting ‘gifts’, all kinds of things we never heard of before. Even Balin had to do research to figure out what to do with the xocolātl seed pods.”

“This came from a tree?” Ori asked, amazed.

Kili grinned.

“Yep, and you should have seen King Thranduil’s face when Idad Thorin gave him one of the pods. Imagine a dwarf gifting an elf something that grew on a tree. For a moment Thranduil’s expression actually changed.”
“To what?” Ori asked. “Did he smile? Has anyone ever seen him smile?”

“I did once,” said Fili, “but it was only his ‘very funny, peasant, now I’m going to eat you’ smile.”

“To be fair,” said Kili, “we were running around with his favorite bottles of wine on our foreheads, pretending to be elk.”

“But you were very young badgers, of course,” said Ori

Fili grinned maniacally.

“Two months ago, actually. He hasn’t had us back since, though he did invite Amad to take tea.”

Ori had a brief, terrible vision of Dori and Thranduil taking tea together. He shook it off with a shudder.

“Anyway,” said Kili, “it was a great gift, even to the elves. I mean, they like to say they’ve seen everything and nothing surprises them.”

Fili snickered.

“His face was all ‘surprise-happiness-horror’.”

Dwalin entered, grimfaced, kissed his husband, and sat beside him in a graceless sprawl.

“Is Idad Thorin coming to eat?” Fili asked.

“Aye, he made it a point t’ say he would.” Dwalin smiled at Ori. “He said he had t’, seein’ as he was under orders.”

Ori sank a little in his chair.

“I didn’t mean it like that.”

“He took it in th’ spirit it was intended, love,” said Dwalin. “Is tha’ xocolātl cake?”

Fili cut him off a slice.

“What happens now?” Ori asked.

“Now our friend Bofur gets t’ see wha’ it takes t’ fix this mess. Thorin’s made him his personal mine inspector an’ informant which, considerin’ Thror’s appointed inspectors never set foot in th’ mines, shouldn’t be th’ hard to pull off.

“Getting’ around Thror’s cronies who own th’ mines, tha’s another problem f’r th’ list.”

Dwalin took a bite of cake, chewed and swallowed, his face transformed in ecstasy. The sight of it made Ori squirm a little in his seat, pleased and warm and mortified.

Kili pushed over a cup of mead to Dwalin.

Ori cleared his throat and tried to sound stern.

“Husband, you have not had your supper yet.”

“Puddin’ first,” said Dwalin. “Pattin’ mehself on th’ back f’r talkin’ ‘round his royal broodiness this afternoon.”

“His royal what?” Ori cried as the brothers laughed.

“His royal broodiness,” said Dwalin. “Tha’s wha’ I called him when we were badgers. He used t’ call me a few thin’s too, none o’ ‘em tha’ nice.”

“Do you have to go back on duty?”

“No, I’m stayin’ close ’til we ride out tonight.” Dwalin slid a grin at Ori. “There’s someone else I gotta take care o’ besides Thorin, someone else’s who’s had a tough day.”

“Really,” Ori protested once more, “all I did was write things down.”

“An’ yeh knew somethin’ was wrong with our Thorin, or yeh wouldn’t’ve said so t’ me. An’ yeh got roughed up by them talkin’ vultures. Home’s where I need t’ be.” He turned a warning eye on the princes. “Bu’ don’t go thinkin’ me gettin’ married’s made me any less’ve a bastard.”

Fili nodded.

“We think it’s made you a much better bastard. Don’t we, Ki?”

“Uh-huh,” said Kili, as he cut another piece of cake.
Pleasantries, pockets, and a pig

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode! We’ve got a lot of excitement in this one and a momentous meeting! And another Heyer reference! Do let us know how you like it and join us again next Friday for more fun and adventure! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends.

Ori sighed tiredly and leaned back against Dwalin's chest.

"Yeh wantin' yer bed, love?" was the quiet rumble behind him.

"I- no not quite yet. I think I need some fresh air."

"Go through to the breakfast parlor, pet," Dori said, still bustling about between the kitchen and the sitting room. "I'll bring you and our deary a nice cup of tea and some little cakes so light you won't know you're eating them."

"Then wha's th' fuckin' point?" Dwalin muttered, escorting Ori through.

Ori giggled at this.

"You still haven't reconciled yourself to being called ‘deary’ have you?"

Dwalin chuckled.

"Could be worse I s'pose. Least ways, he ain't called me darlin' yet."

"Shhh!" Ori gasped in a whisper. "He'll hear you!"

"He's in the kitchen, love."

"Dori's ears go 'round corners!"

Dwalin opened the mica-paned doors out to the meadow and Ori took a deep breath. The ponies and goats grazed peacefully and all traces of snow were gone. Spring had arrived. The meadow was dotted with bright colors. Along the paved area, beautiful sky blue flowers shaped like trumpets were closing for the day. White ones were starting to open. All around wafted the light scent of the mint that tangled through the grass.

Ori sighed and Dwalin slid his arms around Ori from behind. Ori leaned back against his chest. Dwalin rubbed his face in Ori’s hair pressing kisses into it. Ori giggled as Dwalin leaned lower and nibbled at his neck.

“’Bout bleedin’ time we got t’ take a shared breath,” he muttered into Ori’s ear.

“I know. Everything’s running at the highest speed. I used to think my life was quite quiet and dull.”

Ori turned and grinned up at Dwalin.
“What a terrible influence you Durins are.”

“Yeah, I notice our Dori’s jus’ so shocked he’s runnin’ you away from us.”

Ori laughed again and hugged Dwalin. They stood together in silence enjoying the peaceful evening light and each other.

Honda looked up, gave a happy whinny and cantered over. Ori smiled and Dwalin released him with a chuckle. Ori moved to the edge of the walkway and reached out. The pony put her head across his shoulder making snuffling sounds in his ear. Ori patted the warm, fuzzy face and scratched gently down the line of the pony’s mane. Honda whinnied and drew her head back. The velvety lips nipped Ori’s sleeves. Ori bowed his head to the pony’s forelock.

"There," he whispered. "Do you know how many adventures I’ve been having since you came here and I didn’t get to ride you except for once. You’ve just been here in the field playing with Harley and Ducati!"

"An’ gettin’ fat!" Dwalin added.

"Who’s getting fat?" Thorin asked as he, Balin and Dis joined them.

"I hope it's my Ori," Dori said, bringing a large tray and setting it on the low stone table Fili and Kili brought out.

The Sons of Groin and the Urs join them, Omi and Loli and Buj following. Dori brought over two large mugs of sweet tea and two cakes. Ori took a tiny bite of cake and frowned. It was cake but it tasted like lavender blossom but it was cake. Ori decided Dori had given up on making him eat green food and now was trying to make him eat flowers. Buj was not so nice.

"These cakes are fascinating. They have the consistency of traditional tea cakes, yet they smell and taste like my amad's linen closet."

Ori looked at Dwalin, who had an eyebrow raised at Buj. Ori murmured, "I don't want to know how he knows what a linen closet tastes like."

Dwalin snorted. “Probably tried eatin’ it t’ see if he could turn int’ a kite ‘r somethin’.”

Ori fell into giggles and had to separate himself from the group in case he was asked what was amusing him so much.

His gaze went beyond the meadow and rock barricade, far off to the east and north to the Iron Hills. The last of the setting sun made the distant peaks just visible. Ori wondered how King Dain was taking Thorin’s news. Roäc had made no comment that Ori had heard when the King of Ravens delivered Thorin’s message.

Ori's eyes caught a faint movement out there. Idly, he wondered at it. At first, it just seemed to be a faint wisp of smoke. Then Ori realized it was something moving, something moving toward Erebor. Whatever it was, it was moving very quickly.

"What's that?" Ori asked, pulling at Dwalin's sleeve.

"Eh, love?" Dwalin turned, catching the attention of Thorin as well as Balin, Dori and Buj.

Buj climbed on the low stone table for a better look.
"Mahal's hammer!" Dwalin said, slowly. "That's Dain on his way or I'll eat Bofur's hat."

"Yeh bloody well, won't," Bofur put in and he and Nori began having a tug of war over the hat, making Dis and Jani giggle.

Balin smiled.

"Aye, that'll be our Dain for sure. Doesn't care f'r letter writin', would much rather speak in person, so here he comes."

"He's coming awfully fast," Thorin observed. "Who knew his pigs had such speed in them."

"Is that pig even touching the ground?" Dori asked. "Thorin, didn't you send that letter…"

"This morning," said Thorin blankly.

"Fuck," said Dwalin.

Dori chuckled.

"A dwarf on a pig in flight!"

"Flight?" burst out Buj. "Curse it! I wanted to be the first!"

The entire company turned to stare at him as he jumped down from the stone table in the deepest disgust.

Ori over heard Thorin asking Dwalin, "Where did he come from? Isn’t he a librarian?"

"Aye," Dwalin responded. "Prob’ly testin’ wind currents ’r somethin’."

"He’s going to fall on his head," Thorin observed as Buj tried to climb up the doorframe for a better look.

"Won’t hurt him," Dwalin commented with a grin at Ori.

Ori gave a sign of strangulation at his husband and went over to assist Buj down from standing on one of the door handles before he broke it.

"It's the pig. He's not doing it unassisted. It’s just galloping," Ori said, comfortingly.

Buj rewarded him with a sweet smile, which quickly lapsed back into perturbed brooding.

"I must resume my research," Buj grumbled. "If he has perfected flying pigs, he is only a step away from my own ideas. Excuse me."

Buj wandered out, notebook in hand, chewing on the end of his pen.

Kili and Dis looked at each other.

"Pigs can't fly," Kili said.

Fili snorted. "Well, not yet they can’t, but no doubt Buj will make that a lie."

Gloin went halfway back indoors and roared for “Our Gimmers!” Ori faintly heard the adad instructing his badger to go to such and such tunnel.
Ori peered again. The plume of smoke had become larger and there was definitely something tearing along at full speed and something else on top with a red cloak flapping wildly like a much fraught battle standard. Ori worried a little. If King Dain was coming this quickly, it might be he was angry. Perhaps, despite Thorin’s assurances in his letter, King Dain still wanted Dori ‘out of the way’ or saw him as competition for inheritance or perhaps King Dain had wanted someone else to marry Balin or Dwalin.

Ori frowned as the tiny, high-speed shape reached the foot of the mountain and disappeared.

Dis came out.

“If that’s Dain, he’ll be here in a shake of a ram’s tail. I asked Dazla to bring more dishes over for a sizable tea. Shall I ask her to stay?”

“Dis, dear, how kind you are,” Dori replied with a warm smile. “Please tell Mistress Dazla she is quite welcome to go home and rest. I’m sure she’s tired after today’s labors. If we’re having tea, I imagine we must get out the stoneware, from what I’ve heard of King Dain. I do hope he’s not in a temper.”

Dori and Dis went back into the kitchen. Leaving the doors open in the breakfast parlor, the company went into the sitting room. Balin was just telling Dwalin that he may want to go and meet Dain as he entered the courtyard to put the pig out to graze when there was a thundering racket coming from, it seemed to Ori, behind the sitting room wall. A hidden door in the wall seamlessly crashed open and a gigantic mass erupted into the room.

“Halt, Chopper!” bellowed a deep voice, pitched to the battlefield.

The biggest, hairiest, sharp-tusked, most savage-looking battle-boar Ori had ever dreamed of, stopped so suddenly it slid along the carpet, rucking it up into several folds and leaving skid marks on the stone floor. Ori stared. The vast dwarf on its back allowed the force of the speed to carry him over the pig’s head and land firmly before them all.

This dwarf was of a height with Thorin and, although he sported muscles like Dwalin, he was wider. He had the brilliant blue Durin eyes but his hair was as red as Ori’s own. It was streaked with grey and left long like his vast beard. The top of his hair was drawn away from his eyes and ears, being caught up in a topknot that gave him the appearance of a pissed-off rooster and his mustache was twisted on both sides of his mouth to hold a ferocious tusk on each side.

It was at that moment Dori entered the room followed by Dis. Ori noticed that his eldest brother had not only put on his best plum-colored tunic but had also redone his hair with rubies. Dori assumed an elegant pose, looked about the room, and finally allowed his eyes to come to rest on the newcomer, who was staring at him, eyes positively bulging.

“Ahhh,” Dori crooned, with a winsome smile. “Your Majesty, King Dain, I presume. I am Dori, betrothed to Balin and I do bid you be welcome in the House of Fundin.”

The King of the Iron Hills gawped for a moment longer then in two strides crossed the room, scooped Dori under the armpits and hoisted him in the air at arm’s length, and began spinning them both about and roaring joyously. The massive hog flung its tail in the air and squealed in delight.

“Sister!” Dain bellowed.

“Um-“ Dori began.
“Brother!” Dain shouted, not even pausing for breath, continuing to carry Dori high and capering about the room, the pig bouncing after, grunting and oinking in a merry way.

“Actually-“ Dori tried again.

Dain stood still, looking up at him.

“Sibling?” he offered.

Dain put Dori down only to seize him into a crushing hug, which ended with Dain giving Dori a large, loud kiss on the cheek. Dain held Dori out at arm’s length to look him over. Dori looked rather piqued as his lovely tunic was now unduly creased and his beard a little skew-whiff. Dain looked immensely pleased and rudely patted Dori’s belly, gave him what might have been for Dain a gentle shake, further fluffing Dori’s tunic, and tucked Dori back under his arm.

“How fine yeh look, me dumplin’!” Dain brayed jovially. “So lovely an’ ripe for any flirtin’ possible.”

“Really-,” Dori gasped, hovering on the edge of being offended.

“An’ marryin’ Balin!” Dain continued at volume. “Well, he’s a prosy old windbag f’r all he’s th’ best advisor any could wish f’r. But if he keeps yeh happy in th’ bottom bits, me dumplin’, I’ve nothing t’ say on th’ matter.”

“Well, thank Mahal for small favors,” Dori snapped and frowned terribly at Dain, who looked down at him, raised an eyebrow then laughed again and gave Dori another hearty kiss on the cheek. Ori sneaked a glance at Balin, who was quietly seething. Ori almost fancied he could see smoke rising in wisps from Balin’s ears. Gimli, with Fili and Kili’s help, was giving Chopper a mighty tummy rub. The pig was rolling on its back, enjoying itself hugely, and squealing in delight.

Dori managed to free himself and grabbed Nori by the shoulder.

“Dain, dear brother, here is my younger brother Nori-”

Nori was mightily clapped on upper arms and there was a crash as Dain brought his forehead into resounding contact with Nori’s. Ori’s heart sank as he saw Nori’s hand whip out and slip instantly in and out of Dain’s outer coat pocket. Dain freed him and looked Nori over in great interest. Nori grinned like the holder of an undiscovered loaded die. Dain frowned, grabbed Nori’s hand, and twitched it open. Ori groaned. Nori appeared to have relieved the King of the Iron Hills of a remarkably fine pocket time-piece.

“Nori! Dear!” Dori started but Dain just threw back his head and roared with laughter.

He clapped Nori on the shoulders again.

“Well done! Well done!” Dain put the timepiece back in Nori’s hand.

Nori stared at him with a brow raised.

“No, no,” Dain assured him at volume. “Yeh found it an’ thus yeh keep it. Was me an’ our Dori’s father’s. Very proper yeh should have such.”

“I ain’t related, sunshine,” Nori said politely.
“Nonsense,” Dain barked, frowning. “Dori said yer his brother. Tha’ makes yeh me half-brother as well. By the way, yeh’ll like this watch. Lookee here.”

Dain opened Nori’s hand and popped the lid on the watch. Ori could see that it was gold, round, and flat, but there were tiny spokes all around the edge. Dain removed one and Ori saw it was the smallest knife he had ever seen.

“Mahal’s arse!” Nori was impressed.

“Wait,” Dain bellowed eagerly. He withdrew another. This one was obviously a lock pick. The others were all different tiny tools. Nori was practically salivating by the end of Dain’s exhibition.

“Dain, dear,” Dori interposed.

Dain gave the appearance of forgetting all about Nori, which was fine as Nori was so delighted with his newest acquisition he had forgotten Dain’s presence.

Ori took a breath and fortified himself. Dori smiled at him

“Dain, dear, here is my youngest brother who-”

Ori steeled himself as Dain launched himself at Ori. Ori was also swung, dizzily into the air and hugged to the point he feared his ribs would crack. Dain put him back on his feet and held him also at arm’s length to look him over. Close to, Ori could see that Dain was perhaps a few years younger than Thorin and Dwalin. His hair had greyed earlier than theirs and there were a remarkable number of crowsfeet that crinkled merrily at the corners of his eyes. Dain huffed a laugh and thumped foreheads with Ori quite gently then turned to Dori.

“Well, me dumplin’, yeh must be full o’ pride with this one. Look how young an’ got his journeyman braids in scrivenin’ already. With those big eyes an’ sweet little fluff of a beard, he’s as cute as a new farrowed piglet!”

Ori didn’t really fancy being compared to a piglet.

“He’s sweeter than a nut an’ as fancy lookin’ as th’ King of Gondor’s wee spaniel!” Dain continued.

A little ticked off and feeling mischievous, Ori, as Dain was busily patting his cheek, turned his head slightly and bit Dain’s finger.

“Ooop!” Dain yelped, staring in surprise and good humor. “Feisty, too! No’ a wonder tha’ our Dwalin’s took up with him.”

Ori turned to see his husband’s reaction but sighed and shook his head at the sight of Thorin and Dwalin laughing so hard they had to hold one another up.

Dori saved the situation by quickly inviting Dain to come have some tea and something to eat. Dain chortled and agreed, patting Dori’s arm but excused himself to the washroom as he needed to refresh himself, tidy his clothes and, as he candidly told the room at volume, take a good dump.

Fili, Kili, and Gimli helped Chopper out of the saddle and bridle. After an extreme amount of shaking and some pleased grunting, Chopper trotted off to stand outside the washroom, squealed impatiently, and occasionally kicked the door.

Everyone had removed to the breakfast parlor once more. Dain returned with Chopper frisking happily at his heels.

Ori saw that Dain walked with a barely noticeable limp, though Ori knew he had been wounded at the Khazad-dûm battle. Dain greeted the Sons of Gloin, pinched Binni’s ass, grabbed Gimli and turned him upside down before dropping him on the couch, then kissed Gridr noisily on the back of her hand. He embraced Loli and Omi loudly and pinched their cheeks, declaring them to be quite the sweetest, fuzziest peaches ever and gave them both candy. Dain didn’t appear to realize that Buj was not part of the family, patted him violently on the head, and handed him a dagger. Buj examined it as though it was a new kind of centipede.

Thorin, Dwalin, and Dain cuffed each other good naturally. Dain was then introduced to the Urs, who he greeted cheerily and took time to ruthlessly tease Dis and Jani. At being reunited with Bifur, the joyful volume rose to amazing heights.

Once more everyone sat down. Dori and Binni had created a light late night supper and Dori helped his elder brother to goat stew redolent with carrots, onions, raisins, apricots and smoky spices. Dain was a thorough eater and polished off everything Dori set before him. Everyone else took tea and more of Dori’s scones, cheese, dried fruit, and fried chicken. Dori gingerly put down a saucepan of porridge for Chopper, who immediately thrust his nose all the way in and the sound of chewing went on for some time.

After all that, Dori brought through a hot dish of bread pudding that looked as though it was made with the left-over xocolātl cake, cherries soaked in brandy, and whipped, sweetened cream. Everyone partook of this treat.

Ori leaned back in his chair. His brain registered that the day had begun in this room with breakfast and a visit from two elves. Ori sighed. No wonder he felt tired, the day had been quite ridiculous with events and some remarkably frightening in their intensity.

Ori looked up. There in the meadow were two quickly moving tall figures.

Gimli bellowed a welcome as Legolas and Tauriel came in. The elves made their bows and answered the greetings given them by all present. Legolas seated himself next to Gimli and was immediately provided with pudding and chucked under the chin by Gridr. Tauriel seated herself gracefully next to Kili, who gazed worshipfully at her as he shoved his half-eaten bowl of pudding in front of her. She smiled, confused, but once she tasted the pudding, polished it off happily.

Dain regarded Legolas.

“So it’s yourself, is it Greenleaf? Yer lookin’ well enough.”

“Thank you, King Dain,” Legolas responded formally

“How is tha’ snockered old woodland sprite, anyway?” Dain returned around a mouthful of pudding.

Tauriel twitched and Legolas fought a smile.

“If, by that honorific, you are referring to my royal father, your majesty, he is in excellent health, I thank you.”

Thorin turned to Legolas,

“If you think King Thranduil will allow it, I’d like you both to stay this evening. We muster at midnight tonight to scour Dale before dawn.”
“My captain and I are quite at your service, King Thorin,” Legolas returned gravely but with the light of unholy glee in his eyes.

“My grandfather’s not dead yet, elf.”

“Oh. When may I tell my royal father to expect to hear of his abdication?” Legolas inquired in an innocent tone.

Dain and Dwalin roared with laughter making the rest of the table join in.

Thorin frowned then relented.

"Brought yeh a present, cous’,” said Dain. He waved to the open doorway. "Take a look."

Thorin went to and stood upon the paving and looked toward the east and north. He chuckled. Ori, curious, slid out to stand beside him. Hidden from Dale in the lee of the mountain were an awful lot of torches.

“Rather a lot of light for a camp of one,” Thorn said casually.

Dain grinned.

"Thought yeh'd like a nice army."

Thorin turned to him, eyes lit brighter than any beacon.

“Why, Dain! You spoil me. So, does this mean-"

The secret sitting room door crashed open and then the door to the breakfast parlor was completely filled with a single dwarrowdam, Dain's equal in height and girth, with jet black hair and beard in a thousand tiny, spangled plates.

"Hullooooo! We're arrived at LAST!"

"Sculdis! Me delicate jewel of a bride," Dain announced. "Come give us a kiss and meet yer new brothers!"

She swept in like the queen she was, exquisitely graceful, with hands the size of stove lids and her eyes the color of iron. Behind her, looking very amused and patient, stood a miniature copy of Dain.

Ori thought this must be Young Thorin.

Dain and his queen crashed together in the middle of the room like two headlong mine carts. There were several loud sloppy noises, and they parted, though somewhat slowly as they had to disentangle themselves from now locked together braids, beard beads and leather lacings. Dain swooped an arm about her and drew her over to Dori.

Dori and Sculdis embraced rapturously, with plenty of giggling. Sculdis kissed Nori’s cheek, slapped his bottom, and called him her naughty badger, which made him blush. Ori steeled himself for another hug like Dain’s, but she simply enfolded him warmly and kissed both his cheeks, beaming proudly at him.

Once she released him, Fili, Kili, Omi, Loli and Gimli all pounced on her immediately. She hugged and grappled with all of them, laughing uproariously.

“All me little goats! How lovely t’ see yeh all again! An’ this time we get t’ go into battle t’getter!! Go greet yer cousin!”

With that she left them all to crack heads with young Thorin, who was quite good at it. They all referred to him as Stonehelm.

Sculdis hugged Gridr and Dis at the same time, squeezed Binni, slapped Gloin on the nose, making him chortle and reached for Oin’s mustache braids. Oin wasn’t in the mood to have his mustache yanked and there was a little chase around the room. She relented and he deigned to hug her. She got to twitch the mustache anyway making him sputter and Binni giggle. She finally hugged both Thorin and Balin then turned to Dwalin.

“You!” she snapped then pointed to the door. “Out!”

Dwalin grinned maniacally, turned, whipped up his tunic, and made as though he was going to treat her to a view of the full moon.

“Eugh!,” she cried. “Don’t! Ugh, the things you see when you haven’t got an axe!”

Balin politely introduced the Urs and Buj, all of whom she also embraced. She greeted Jani, caught Dis’ eye, and winked. Dis clicked her tongue and huffed, hissing under her breath that she was not obvious and people were gossips, that’s what.

Thorin went over to greet Stonehelm.

“How are things in the Iron Hills, little cousin?”

“Oh, yeh know, loud.”

Thorin nodded, trying hard not to snort.

Stonehelm narrowed his eyes.

“Aye, cousin, lots o’ tha’, too.”

Which just caused Thorin to laugh uncontrollably in a very unkingly fashion.

Soon everyone was seated again in the sitting room. The younger dwarf sat on the floor near the hearth, both elves gamely with them and the older generation all over the furniture at hand as well as several additions from other parts of the house. Dori brought young Thorin and his mother each a large bowl of stew and after that, some pudding. Ori wondered how Dori instinctively knew to keep some back so both had plenty. Sculdis praised the stew and Stonehelm was quite blissful over his pudding.

The talk quickly turned back to the plans for midnight. Dain and Sculdis declared themselves and their army ready to march whenever Thorin gave the word. Thorin finally rose and, going to the hearth, stood before them all.

“My dear friends, I cannot begin to thank all of you for standing with me. Bifur, my brother at arms, my thanks to you and your family for bringing these difficulties to my attention. Through your good work many, many dwarf will soon be able to partake amply of the riches of Erebor and we shall be prosperous as Great Durin the Deathless decreed we should be.”

Dwalin and Dain rose and everyone followed, raising their drinks to toast Thorin.

“My king, we art with thee now and indeed always,” Bifur stated.
The company drank to that and as a one they all bowed. Thorin raised his glass to them.

“May Mahal make me always worthy of your respect and may He always remember those who pledge to follow me. Loyalty. Honor. A willing heart... I can ask no more than that.”

He bowed to all assembled. He broke the formality with a ruefully look and a smile.

“And now, my friends, those involved in the muster should get some sleep before we go,” Thorin finished quietly.
Fur, fun, and fear

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode! Since you’ve all been hinting like mad it’s time for a little bit of….romance! And food and clothes and excitement, and adventure, and really wild things! (Quick, where’s that from?) (there an Heyer reference just for Acopia, too!) Join us again next Friday for more here at Dwarf Telenovela Central! Same dwarf time, same dwarf tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori saw Dwalin go off to the bath to wash and get ready for bed. He took a deep breathe and decided. Silently, he slipped into the kitchen and hunted through the cupboards for the wine goblets he had seen once. He frowned and finally located them. There were only two and he silently scolded Dori as he likely had used the other two for himself and Balin.

Carefully bringing them to the table he added a bottle of sweet wine and put it all on a silver tray. Another deep breath and he picked up the full tray and trotted through to Dwalin’s and his bedroom.

The door was ajar and firelight danced through. Ori slipped in and stopped dead. There, leaning an arm on the mantle shelf was Dwalin. He was dressed only in a pair of deep green drawers. His hair and beard were brushed to shining and loose, all but for his marriage bead in his beard. The firelight glinted off Dwalin’s tattoos and piercings. Ori’s breath caught. He was swamped once more by the reaction he had had years ago when he had first seen Captain Dwalin. He was so handsome and strong and…. Ori shook himself and grinned. Who could have guessed that now Captain Dwalin would be his husband? Ori stepped forward and Dwalin turned with a soft smile.

“There yeh be, love.” Dwalin looked at the burden in Ori’s hand and laughed. “Looks as though we both had the same idea.”

Ori cocked his head and Dwalin nodded towards a table. There was a matching silver tray with the other two goblets and a bottle of the same wine. Ori giggled then his eyes went to the floor before the fire. In front of it lay what looked like a great quilt with fur.

“What’s that?” he asked.

“Where did it come from?”

He had heard of bears but they were usually black or brown.

“Up north. We’d gone t’ see Dain f’r a Yule party an’ he took Thorin an’ me hunting. We then had t’ stay until both Thorin and Dain got one each.”

Ori laughed.

“That doesn’t surprise me in the least.”

Ori put his tray next to Dwalin’s and crossed to examine the enormous white pelt on the floor.
“It’s very beautiful,” he marveled and squatted down and patted it reverently. He tried to wrap his mind around the size of the creature. “It must have been quite fierce!”

Dwalin laughed.

“Aye, aye, yeh could say that. Have a seat on it, love.”

Ori didn’t have to be told twice as he clambered on it with delight and then flopped down and rolled, rubbing his face in the softness.

“So wonderful!” he managed around a mouthful of fur.

“Here,” said Dwalin as Ori slowly removed his face from the fur.

Ori sat up, took the goblet Dwalin held out, and gave Dwalin an enquiring look.

Dwalin touched his glass to Ori’s.

"To us."

Ori smiled.

"And all the wild, careening rides that entails."

Dwalin laughed.

"Aye, seems like we never get a moment's peace does it."

"And we only have a few hours until you and your soldiers... er, clean up Dale."

"I ain't talkin' about that, love."

"Ah, so now I should take off my pants."

Dwalin choked on the wine.

"Only if yeh want to."

"Dori would say you're trying to seduce me."

"Nah, just want t' spend some quiet time with yeh."

Dwalin reached over and pulled some cushions closer and lay on his side, leaning against them. Ori followed suit and stretched out a hand to stroke his braid in Dwalin’s beard. They kissed gently, leaning in a little, then a little more, soft and light and sweet. Ori felt Dwalin’s tongue on his lip and opened to it, giddy and pleased and slightly ticklish with the beard. He wondered what that beard would feel like on his-

“Oh!” Ori cried.

“Love?”

“You spilled wine down my back.”

“What? Aw!”

Ori grimaced mirthfully.
“It’s cold!”

Dwalin laughed.

“Now there’s romance.”

“I’m afraid your nice white rug is going to have a few spots,” said Ori. “I don’t regard my tunic, since it’s dark, but you’ll have to take a wet cloth to the rug right now, or it will stain.”

“So me snow bear rug has a few spots? It’ll be inked jus’ like me. I’m no’ inclined to get up an’ leave yeh right now.”

“You’re so sweet.”

“I’m sweet?” Dwalin asked, and huffed out a laugh. “There’s no’ many who’d go along wi’ yeh.”

“You’ve been nothing but sweet to me since the day we got married.”

“If I am, it’s ’cause yeh make it easy t’ be sweet,” said Dwalin. “That was quite a day, our weddin’.”

Ori giggled.

"Yes, and I suppose we will have to thank Nori at some point, when things calm down. When he sees how happy we are, he’ll take full credit for it."

Dwalin chuckled.

"Hopefully he'll be too busy wi' Bofur t' notice."

"That's true. I think they make a lovely couple."

"Couple o' wha'?"

Ori shoved Dwalin's shoulder and laughed.

"Exactly, but not as sweet as Balin and Dori. I often wondered who would be the best person for Dori. I sometimes wondered if Bard would do, but I see now that Balin is quite perfect."

Dwalin raised his brows.

"Did Dori ever fancy Bard?"

Ori pondered.

"I don't think so, but I do know it was quite a few years before Bard realized Dori wasn't a dam. Dori was always so good to Bard's children, you see, and I believe he was well-acquainted with Bard's late wife. I'm not sure if Matilde ever realized Dori wasn't a dam either."

"I mostly played with Loli and Omi when I was very young. I didn't make friends with the man children. Then I was training to be a scribe. Once I had my apprentice braid and started my jouneyman’s, I used to look after Tilda. Her mother died when she was born. Dori always tried to help with Sigrid when she was growing up. She is quite like Dori in some ways now. He taught her to cook and market like he had taught her mother. Sigrid is very good, but she doesn't have Dori's knack with pastry."
"That granny pie was bloody good," Dwalin put in.

Ori chuckled.

"Dori's way of getting us to eat vegetables."

"Aye, not partial to 'em meself, but those spring ones Dis made were fine."

"It was the butter and bacon, wasn't it?" Ori teased.

Dwalin grinned.

"Mind," Ori went on, "I'm not allowed to say I don't like green food, as Dori says the Bardlings will copy me."

"Bardlings?"

"That's what we always called Bard's children. Matilde though it was funny. Bard gets vaguely embarrassed when we say it. On that, what will happen to all the women and children of the men of Dale when you go to clean up?"

"Furh'nk's got that charge. He's good with 'em."

"Tilda certainly likes him," said Ori, "and his goat named Puffball."

Dwalin laughed.

"It's actually the old Khuzdul term for Thistledown."

"Well, that does make more sense."

Ori pondered a moment.

Dwalin reached out and drew Ori's brow to his own.

Ori blurted, "I'm scared for you."

"Don't be, love. It's not like we're goin' up against orcs."

"I know but I- I don't want you to get hurt."

"I'll do me best not to."

Ori recalled himself.

"We only have a few hours as you leave at midnight. You should rest."

Dwalin finished his wine, as did Ori. Dwalin put the goblets aside and took Ori in his arms and laid him down on his back against the cushions.

Ori raised an eyebrow and Dwalin grinned.

"Wanted t' kiss yeh some more wi' out tha' dangerous weapon in me hand."

"I thought you were going to rest?" Ori teased.

"In a minute. Got somethin’ t’ see t’ first."
Ori tasted the wine again on Dwalin’s lips, pleased to feel how his own mouth had learned to fit against Dwalin’s. Now that his mouth knew what to do, his hands could roam at will, over broad shoulders and down the nape of the thick, muscular neck. Ori’s fingers traced the edges of Dwalin’s large ears, one rounded and cuffed with iron, the other flat over the top from an old wound.

Ori pulled back and frowned.

“Does that still hurt to the touch?”

“Naw, no’ anymore,” said Dwalin idly, his own hands busy under Ori’s tunic. “Now it jus’ looks like the wors’ piercing job in the history o’ Arda.”

“Warrior piercings,” said Ori. “Promise you’ll to teach me what to do and not do to those.”

Dwalin’s smile took on a wolfish cast and Ori felt himself mimic it.

“If it’s wha’ yeh want, love.”

“It is what I want,” said Ori. He breathed in exasperation. “When will we have time?”

“We’ll make time,” said Dwalin.

“Right now you need to sleep.”

Dwalin sighed.

“Aye.”

He pillowed his head on Ori’s chest, over his heart.

Ori wrapped his arms around his husband and stroked the hair flowing down Dwalin’s back.

Dwalin held him tight and sighed deeply.

Ori kissed the bald pate and tightened his knees around Dwalin’s waist.

“My love,” Ori began.

“Shhhh, me darlin’. Just lemme me hold yeh. I ain’t got pretty words.”

Ori sighed with happiness.

He remembered the time in the city garden when he first heard Dwalin singing softly to him in the voice of his heart.

Firelight danced as Ori gazed idly around the room, still gently stroking Dwalin’s hair.

How strange, he thought. Dwalin and I have only been married for six days as of today, and since that day the fortunes of my brothers and I have changed to the point of standing on our heads. I fancied Dwalin for so long and soon found out he’d been fancying me and that he is my heartsong. I don’t know how how I could have been so lucky. I’m half scared of him a little but I can’t stop myself from jumping to his arms whenever I see him. He’s so good to me. Mind, his parents where heartsongs but they really didn’t get along very well. Poor Dwalin and Balin. How difficult it must have been for them. They are very close but when I think on it, Dori always made sure we had a loving home. He and Nori bickered a lot but they both lavished love on me.

How beautiful Dwalin is, so tall and strong and his beard is perfectly magnificent. How I wish I was not so small and scrawny and was beautiful for him too. I wish I knew all kinds of things about seduction and flirting so he would be enraptured with me. I never thought this would happen so I contented myself with books and took vicarious pleasure in Shire’s novels.

Maybe I should ask Dori to teach me to dance and then dress up in filmy material and sway around the bedroom until he was half mad with lust. Oh, but I can just imagine.

‘Dori, would you teach me to dance?’

‘I’ve already taught you to dance, pet. You know ever so many: the round dance, the-‘

‘No, I mean, like a bearer, so I can dance for-‘

‘For Dwalin? Certainly not! How could I live with myself knowing what you were doing in there with him?’

‘I imagine you’d distract yourself by doing the same thing with Balin.’

‘No, pet, I couldn’t concentrate knowing you were in there dancing for that… that buffalo!’

And, of course, Dwalin would be standing right behind him when he said it. What a row!

So, no, not dancing.

Perhaps I should wait until I know he’ll be home early one day and bathe and perfume myself then languish on the bed and throw my underwear at him when he comes in the bedroom. Or maybe leave a trail of clothing leading up to the bedroom? That would be naughty. But then Dori would find it and pick it all up and Dwalin wouldn’t think to come to the bedroom and I’d be languishing naughtily and Dori would walk in and demand why I was late for dinner.

Perhaps I could climb in the bath tub with him. I could bounce in and fling off my clothes then climb in. Water would go everywhere and then we’d have to do an awful lot of mopping after.

Hmmm, perhaps if I accosted him in the armory. He could shove me against the wall and have his way with me. Someone might walk in and there’d I’d be up against the wall with my trousers hanging off my boots, Dwalin having his way and what does one say at such a moment? ‘Hello’? ‘Excuse us’? How very awkward that would be for Dwalin.

All these scenarios were getting him nowhere but they were making him slightly uncomfortable in the crotch and that was nothing he could do anything about at the moment so he let his mind drift to other things.

Dori is Balin’s heartsong and they’ve been apart for years and years. It’s almost like a Shire novel. So much romance and court intrigue. Perhaps, since I’m noble now, I may meet Shire and give him permission to write the story like one of his novels. Names changed, of course. We’ll have to be the Sisters Ri. What laugh! All the silly things will have to be left out, as nobles have to be terribly formal and reserved.

Ori frowned.

Shire would have to rewrite Dwalin as Balin’s cousin, because the way Shire writes it would be very important that I was Dori and Balin’s secret child.

I wonder how Shire would make me look. Hmmm, I think I should have curls instead of what I have now, and I shall have violet eyes and dark brows. Yes. Those eyes and brows and curly hair would be our family trademark. How mysterious Shire would make us!
Ori’s attention went back to his husband, whose breathing had grown low and steady.

He’s asleep. Good. He needs to rest. I mustn’t worry so much. Dwalin is a fine soldier, and perfectly accomplished at fighting orcs. Dealing with Calmar and his thugs shouldn’t be too difficult. Bofur has the dwarrow miners loyal to him. I can’t think of anything that’s been left undug.

Those dwarrow and men in the zinc mine are just like we were back in Steam Alley, just trying to make enough to eat and be sheltered. I know I did plenty of copy work for some who had left lessons early to go and help their families. I don’t like to think how many of the men folk didn’t have any money to send their badgers to school rooms. Those poor tutors receive nothing from Calmar for their work, and like their parents they barely had anything in the way of true schooling themselves.

Everything is so wrong in Dale. If Bard was king, things would be so different.

Mind, if everything goes to plan, Bard will be king. I’m so glad nothing came of my and Nori’s attempts to see he and Dori married. Dear Yavanna, how silly we were!

Ori’s thoughts drifted as he dozed lightly.

Bard is like many men folk and would feel funny about marrying another male. Men as a race seem to be funny about gender. I have read this is not so in Rohan or Gondor, but in Dale and other settlements like Bree. I wonder if hobbits are similar, or if they are like dwarrow and elves. Admittedly, from what I’ve seen of elves I can’t tell who is male and who is female, until we’ve been properly introduced. I wonder if they have bearers too.

A slight noise brought him to awareness again. His eyes slid to the door. Balin and Dori entered silently with their arms full of Dwalin’s armor.

Ori deliberately closed his eyes and feigned sleep. He heard them place the gear upon the bed.

Ori heard a firm tread he knew to be Thorin’s. Why was Thorin here? He peeked out from under his lashes and Dori leaned over him, smiled and winked.

Ori sighed and glanced up. He heard the soft toll of the midnight bell.

Dwalin stirred, lifted his head, leaned up, and kissed Ori thoroughly.

Ori wished the others would go away and leave the pair of them for the rest of the night.

Dwalin stood and helped Ori up too.

In silence, the warrior went and sat on the edge of the bed and pulled on his socks.

Balin beckoned Ori over and handed him the armor a piece at a time, teaching Ori how to help Dwalin put it on. They were nearly finished when Thorin stepped forward with a box in one hand and a long piece of cloth over his arm.

He put the box on the bed and unfolded the cloth to reveal several long chains of mithril. Thorin himself crossed and recrossed the chains over Dwalin’s chest and back.

“You have a husband now,” Thorin said quietly. “While I ask you to take many risks for me, the least I can do is offer you protection for him.”

Thorin smiled at Ori, who tried very hard not to cry.

Then Thorin took the cloth itself, a surcoat to go over Dwalin’s armor, dark blue with the simple seven stars of Durin, not the ornate silver runes that Thror’s soldiers usually wore. These were the arms of Durin the Deathless. Ori understood the gesture, a sign that Thorin intended for Erebor to return to the trust of Mahal.

Thorin placed the surcoat over Dwalin’s head and settled it on his shoulders and helped him close the belt around it. Thorin beckoned to Balin who brought the box and opened it. The prince removed mithril knuckledusters, beautiful and shining. Dwalin drew a startled breath.

“Durin the First forged these himself,” said Thorin.

He handed each to Ori, who with Dwalin’s help, secured them on the warrior’s large hands where they fit perfectly. Ori stroked them carefully. Dwalin gathered Ori close and embraced him, his husband of barely a week, then drew back and kissed him firmly. They parted and Ori took Dwalin’s hands and placed them in Thorin’s.

“My heart and hands are yours to command,” said Ori. “Use us well… my king.”

Thorin’s eyes glistened.

“Thank you. May Mahal see that I am always worthy of them.”

Dwalin stepped back and bowed to Thorin, who drew Ori to his side.

“My shield brother, if I send you to your death, know that your heart will remain always in my care and I will see him crowned my consort should it be his will.”

Thorin and Dwalin clasped wrists and touched foreheads, then Dwalin’s gave Ori a last, quick kiss before turning. Furh’nk, Fili, and Kili stood in the doorway with Dain and Sculdis, each wearing Durin’s colors. Sculdis came and folded Ori in her arms.

“Stay safe,” Ori whispered.

“I will,” Sculdis replied.

The soldiers made their way silently out into the night.

Dori turned to Ori.

“Did you sleep, pet?”

“A little.”

“They’ll be fine, wee brother,” Balin encouraged him.

“I know,” Ori sighed.

Dori hugged him.

“Do you want to go back to bed?”

“No, I’ll just lie there and worry.”
“Well then, pet, come with me to the kitchen. We have a deal of baking to do.”

“I’ll be off, makin’ sure no one who shouldn’t sees anything.” said Balin.

He kissed Dori and strode out.

Dori and Ori went to the kitchen and started taking out implements, dishware and staples.

Once more they had work to do.
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central! Midnight has come and dawn is approaching and our Ori is busier than the average bee! Nori’s out doing what he does best and being a spying busy-body, and Dori is keeping everyone else busy. Do let us know how you like the story so far and remember to join us again next Friday for more excitement! Oh, and you may want snacks for this one! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Nori came into the kitchen while Ori was measuring ten pounds of flour into a huge vat for Dori’s scones.

Dori was in the vast larders of Durin House, supervising the bringing up of even more barrels of flour. The plotters had already commandeered every egg in Erebor. Dori had said to expect ‘all hands’ imminently to help with preparations.

Nori wasn’t terribly helpful, though he did look well pleased with himself.

“Old Vors’s had ‘is hearing, for all the good it done ‘im,” said Nori.

He stole a chip off Ori’s plate.

Dori had made Ori a snack to fortify him for baking. Only Dori would fry chips while waiting for two hundred people to arrive for tea. Two hundred people, as he’d informed Ori earlier. Ori still wasn’t over that news.

“You were there when Vors went before the king?” Ori asked.

“Not where anyone could see, but close enough.”

Ori pictured Nori hunkered down under the throne.

“Oh, it was a treat,” said Nori.

He reached for another chip. Ori smacked his hand.

“Get your own!”

Nori looked put out, but he did so, then sat with the plateful. He poured liberal amounts of spiced vinegar over all of it, peered into the bottle, shrugged, and swigged the rest.

“Ew!” Ori gasped.

Nori fixed a stare at him

“Wha’? ’S good f’r the blood. Cleanses it. Yeh should drink a tablespoonful everyday.”

Ori made a face and Nori and continued his tale, while eating.
“There’s old Vors, all rumpled and havin’ the hysterics after only a few hours in the lockup, sputterin’ and whinin’ and demandin’ his rights. And there’s Thror, lookin’ like he’d rather be somewhere else. And Thror says, ‘I don’t have time for this shite’.”

“He did not!”

“I’m, whatyacall, paraphrasin’,”

Ori’s eyebrows shot up.

Nori shrugged.

“That’s the word, ain’t it?”

“It is, go on.”

“Then Thorin, cool as they come, says, ‘Oi, grandad, yeh want me t’ make this problem disappear?’ and Thror says, ‘Aye, go make yerself useful fer once.’ and the king just up and leaves old Vors standin’ there with Thorin, who looks like a ferret with a field mouse. I swear Vors about pissed hisself.”

“What did Thorin do?” Ori demanded.

“Wait a mo’, I ain’t half finished. Then Vors says, ‘Where’s Prince Frerin?’ and Thorin says, ‘No place that’ll save you. Yeh’re for the razor and the mob, my lad.’ An’ Vors falls on his face, grovelin’, swearin’ he’ll go into exile, he’ll give Thorin half o’ everything he owns.”

Ori winced.

“That was exactly the wrong thing to say.”

“Bet yer arse it was. So there I am thinkin’ Vors ain’t gonna get as far as the mob, mebbe Thorin’ll take him out right there in th’ throne room, but then your Dwalin’s soldier, that Furh’nk, he rushes up to Balin, whisperin’ like he found out Princess Dis’s laid a egg, and Balin whispers t’ Thorin, and Thorin says t’ the guards, ‘Take Lord Vors back t’ the cells.’. I guess Thorin’s gonna finish ’im off later.”

“I hope Vors doesn’t get to Frerin before then.”

Nori leaned back, smile cold.

“No worries about the git prince, little brother. He’s busy eatin’ at a new trough just now. Seems he tore out o’ dinner the other night and smack int’ T’dillah of Rikanta, the choicest cut on the noble meat market. They’re awful cozy. Sickenin’.”

“Do you want more chips?”

"Silly question."

Ori fetched more for himself and for Nori along with a new bottle of the vinegar.

"Where did Thorin go when he left the throne room?" Ori wondered.

Nori snorted.

"Where d’ye think? A certain scribe married t’ a certain prince's shield brother just -Pop!-
disappeared off the face o’ Arda.”

"Ooooh,” said Ori. His face burned all the way to the tops of his ears. "I seem to have impeded progress."

"So Vors spends a couple few more hours in the lockup, stewin’ over his fate. Sounds like progress t’ me."

Except that it made Ori an unwitting party to passive torture.

Nori shot him a stinkeye.

"Oi, I know that look. That’s the ‘I broke Dori’s teapot’ look. It was dumb when yeh was twenny and it’s dumber now. Yeh didn’t do nothin’. Yeh didn’t even know. Not that the bastard don’t deserve it."

Ori sighed, then cursed.

He’d lost count on the measuring. If he messed up Dori’s scones the ‘teapot affair’ would be nothing in comparison.

*********

Binni and Gridr arrived with Omi and Loli, and Buj was in there too, though Ori didn’t know why or how, all carrying huge baskets of bread and crocks of butter and endless platters of jam tarts.

“Only six different kinds,” Binni apologized. “Short on time.”

“We helped,” said Loli.

“Everyone else is out fighting or guarding the doors,” said Omi, around a mouthful of cheese scone.

It seemed no time at all passed before the heavy knocker at the front door sounded and he heard Dori answered it.

Dori quickly returned.

“The guests are here, pet.”

As Gridr flipped flat cake after flat cake directly onto a plate Omi smeared each with jam or butter or both and Loli rolled them and stacked them on a growing mountain on the largest platter the Durins owned. Mistress Dazla directed a cadre of dwarrow toward the back door with huge urns of tea and jugs of honey and cream.

“More blankets,” someone said. “We’ve cleared about as much shite as we’re going to out of the top of the meadow.”

Dori directed, “Take the table out of the receiving room if you need it. Dis, dear, do you have some to spare?”

Ori’s world, meanwhile, had shrunk to scrambling vats of eggs and frying rashers of bacon.
“Gimli and Young Thorin are with the unit holding the gates,” said Gridr merrily. “What terrible faces! They want to be down in the city.”

Binni laughed.

“Stuck up here with the badgers and the codgers. Their times will come. Impatient tweens.”

Ori realized Oin wasn’t here and his heart sank. Of course, Oin would be at Dale to see to any wounded. They would be treated first at the fighting itself, then at the royal infirmary. Who-

“Ori!”

A storm of braids and skirts nearly knocked him into the hob.

“Tilda!” he cried.

“Ori! Furh’nk came’n got us and said we were to take tea in the meadow and there’s ever so many badgers and their parents and tea and juice and lovely cakes and Princess Dis is sooo pretty and I want my beard to look like that someday only Sigrid is mean and says I won’t have one and Furh’nk is so strong and he gave me a piggyback ride and he ran all over with me and I didn’t get sick once!”

Ori put down his spoon and placed a hand on each of her shoulders.

“What?”

She clicked her tongue and cried out in strangled annoyance.

“Furh’nk got a whole bunch’ve us from Dale and we’re all here in the meadow for tea.” She grabbed his forearm and tried, without success, to drag him away. “Come on now, we’re missing cake.”

Bain arrived, dodging trays and pans.

“Sorry, Ori,” said the youth. “She ran off to find you before I could catch her and your eggs are gonna burn.”

“Oh, mahumb,” he muttered, then clapped his hand over his mouth, but it was too late.

“What does ‘mahumb’ mean?” Tilda asked sharply.

“It’s a bad word, so don’t you repeat it,” Ori warned, stirring for all he was worth. “Tilda, can you go and save me some cake? I won’t be finished here for a while and I’m afraid I’ll miss out.”

“Oh, alright!”

She darted away, happy to have a mission of her own.

Bain looked tired, and now that Tilda was gone, he looked scared too.

“I should be back in the city,” Bain said. “They won’t tell us what’s going on, but Da’s down there and I should be with him.”

Ori wanted to cheer him up, but the best he could come up with was, “If you aren’t here, who’s going to protect me from your little sister?”
Bain shrugged, at a loss, but then Dori noticed that he was there and standing still with empty hands.

“Bain, my dear, take a tray and gather any empty plates and cups and silver you find on the lawn. We’re running low, there’s a lad. Ori, pet, I’ll take over the eggs for right now. The platter of rolled flat cakes needs to go out.”

For such lights cakes they nearly staggered him with their weight. Must have been all the jam.

“Where do I put them down?” he asked.

“You won’t have to, pet. The lot of them out there are vicious.”

Ori had read of locusts, how they descended on field and farm, turned day to night and ate every stalk and blade in their path, leaving only desolation. Now he saw it firsthand.

He thought he heard some of them say ‘thank you’ but it was hard to tell with their mouths full.

Ori took a moment to stand with his empty tray and look at their guests: men and dwarrow, the very old and very young, harried looking women surrounded by man badgers and Dis was somehow everywhere, asking after the young and coaxing someone to have another cup of tea, and soothing someone else’s fears over not knowing what happened in the Dale.

For adults the fear seemed to war with stunned fascination at taking tea with the dwarf princess, a beautiful bearded whirlwind of kindness no taller than most of the children.

Ori saw her speaking to a dam surrounded by badgers. The dam's hair was already streaked grey and he saw she carried one shoulder lower than the other. He recalled Nadaris, in Vors' zinc mine, had stood in such a way.

“-what I’m supposed t’ tell her,” said the dam. “At least she’ll be fed today. Regular spoiled she is. And blackberry jam! But, I s’pose you have that every day under the mountain.”

“We’re thankful for it every day, Mistress Nadaris, believe me. I’ve just been telling the dwarflings that there are far too many ponies and goats in the streets for Dale to be safe right now and most of them simply shrug and run off.”

“But not my Caris?” Nadaris asked slyly.

Dis laughed and shook her head.

“Your Caris gave me the first, second and third degrees and I don’t think she’s happy with my answers yet.”

“Aye, welcome to me life.”

Dis looked over at Ori, her smile widening.

“Here’s Master Ori. How are you faring?”

“Glad to step out of the kitchen for a moment, your highness. It’s a lovely day.”

Nadaris cocked her head at him.

“I know you,” she said. “You’re Ori of the Brothers Ri, who was at the mine yesterday.”
Dis excused herself to bring a cup of tea to an elderly man who sat nearby on one of the Fundins’ receiving room chairs.

“I hope you’re well, mistress,” said Ori.

“Fair ’t middlin’. We wondered what become of you all. The house in Steam Alley is shut.”

“We live here now.”

Her eyes flew open in amazement.

“You work for the swells too? Ain’t you the clever one.”

“Er… actually, I live here. I’m married to Captain Dwalin, the head of the city guard.”

The old man laughed. He was so elderly his eyes were blind white and a cane leaned on the arm of his chair.

“I remember him. He’s th’ one with all that scribblin’ on his head. He still got that mess of a coxcomb for hair?”

“Master Arim!” Nadaris cried, then cackled.

“No,” said Ori, “it’s all migrated down and hangs from about his ears.”

“Oh!” Master Arim cried happily. “A fellow sufferer! Well, there’s more room for his pate scribblin’ now I daresay.”

Nadaris peered sharply at the bruise on Ori’s cheek.

“He’s a hard one, that Captain Dwalin. And you with a mark. He knockin’ you around?”

“No, mistress, I lost a fight with some ravens.”

She didn’t seem to know what to do with that, her expression moving from horror to sympathy to mirth.

Finally she settled for, “Since yesterday we saw you? You do have a busy life.”

“Mam! Mam! Look!”

A badger ran up to her with what seemed to be a disgruntled rock lizard in his hands.

Nadaris sighed.

“And so do I.”

He took leave and wandered back toward the house with his tray, thinking about what he saw and heard.

So the badgers of either race had mostly accepted this strange circumstance, as they accepted their circumstances in Dale, and ate like piglets and drank juice. For them, at least, Ori was relieved. He remembered what it was like to worry over things he didn’t understand, or understood all too well at too young an age.

Here in the meadow, those badgers who wished to ran wild. Furh’nk led them in playing games
Furh’nk had a dozen nephews, nearly all pre-tweens) or the badgers wrestled in the grass. For others, Brur had a table surrounded by benches and the older badgers and children practiced their letters and those who didn’t want to, or were too young, used the clever, colored pieces of wax Brur had invented to draw on paper scraps.

One small daughter of men ran up to Brur with a brightly rendered picture of something or other and tugged on the old dwarf’s sleeve.

“Look, Idad Brur! I drew you!”

Ori jerked back in surprise.

Had she just called Brur ‘uncle’ in Khuzdul?

Ori held his breath at what was usually a trespass, but gruff, dour Brur only approved and encouraged and didn’t correct her.

The longer Ori stood, the more he realized they all called him that, dwarfling and child alike.

He turned, distracted, and walked right into Sigrid.

“Sigrid! Sorry!”

Her face like thunder, she glowered down on him with her hands on her hips and a smear of jam on her chin.

“Ori!” she hissed. “What is really going on in Dale?”

“I haven’t a clue, Sig.”

“You’re a lousy liar, Ori. Your husband’s the captain, you must know.”

“Oh, look!” he cried. “Prince Fili has returned!”

She spun around to look behind her and he quickly slipped away.

******************

When Ori returned to the kitchen Dori met him with a full plate and a cup of ale.

“Here, pet. Balin’s in the sitting room.”

“You want me to take these to him?”

“He already has his. I want you to take this for yourself and go sit and eat it.”

Ori sagged.

“I love you, Dori.”

“As well you should,” said Dori haughtily. He nudged Ori along. “I love you too, pet, so eat while you can. The lunch rush is coming.”
Ori groaned and fled.

He found Balin, impeccably dressed as always, happily consuming eggs, bacon and fried potatoes smothered in onions and garlic.

“Mornin’, wee brother. How’re yeh holdin’ up?”

Ori sat beside him on the couch and put his plate down on the table.

“I have a stomach ache I can’t get rid of, but I’m still hungry enough to eat a bat.”

“That’ll be nerves,” said Balin. “Not surprisin’. Even seasoned warriors get those before a fight.”

“Even Dain?” asked Ori slyly.

“Mebbe not Dain,” Balin admitted. “He’s hovered so close to death he could smell meat roastin’ in the ancestors’ halls. Nothin’ seems t’ frighten him.”

Ori was half afraid to ask and half afraid not to know, but he ventured, “Have we heard from the city?”

“Thin’s re proceedin’ apace. No casualties, no serious injury.”

“There’s that at least,” said Ori, though it didn’t bring him the relief he sought. He knew anything could happen at any time. “Meanwhile, I’ve been scramblin’ eggs.”

“We all do wha’ we can, laddie. Meself, I’ve been out an’ about makin’ sure tha’ no one who shouldn’t know anythin’ doesn’t know anythin’.”

“And do they?”

“The lords who’re smart enough t’ know’re afraid they’ll be sharin’ th’ lockup wi’ Vors if they talk. The king only cares f’r his treasure an’ Frerin pays court t’ T’dillah o’ Rikanta, a pretty dam, rather vacuous an’ a little too young, even if she is o’ age, if yeh take me meanin’. Her family can think only o’ Frerin’s interest in their daughter an’ Frerin himself thinks his sister’s havin’ a tea party an’ couldn’t care less. Though, t’ be fair, Fili an’ Kili wouldn’t willingly attend a tea party either, unless it was f’r th’ cake.”

“So, everyone is either afraid or doesn’t care?” Ori asked, astonished and appalled.

“So it seems,” said Balin.

“How is this kingdom still functioning?”

“On th’ backs o’ th’ common people, wee brother, as always. Yeh can administrate an’ delegate an’ be as lordly as yeh like, but at th’ end o’ th’ day, all yeh’ve done is help or hinder th’ dwarf who really keeps th’ mountain alive.”

“Because authority isn’t about power, it’s about service,” said Ori.

“Got it in one,” said Balin slyly.

Ori recalled that, among many other things, Balin was a teacher. Ori chewed thoughtfully.

“Balin, about Dain… He seems familiar, but I don’t know why.”
“Reminds yeh a little o’ Bombur?”

“Yes, actually, though I can’t say exactly how, except for the red hair.”

“Dain’s amad was a Broadbeam like th’ Ur. They get their red hair from Firebeard stock.”

Ori couldn’t imagine two clans so different: the cheerful, practical, hardworking Broadbeams and the proud, wrathful warrior Firebeards, who had nearly been wiped out in retaliation for the sacking of the elven city of Doriath. He supposed if you folded all that together you might equally get Bombur or Dain.

“From which side does Dain get his volume?” Ori teased.

Balin grinned impishly.

“That’s all Durin blood, laddie. Yeh never met me adad or Dain’s. Even Thrain in his cups could rattle th’ mine braces. Dwalin manages it when he’s barkin’ out orders. I never had th’ need fer it m’self.”

“Thorin doesn’t seem to do a lot of shouting.”

“Thorin’s sort o’ deadly quiet like his amad Freris. Terrifying dam. She could silence a guild meeting with a look. Dis is very like her, though she’s gained th’ sort o’ grace a princess needs if she’s t’ be more than a warrior an’ more than just a means t’ get an heir. Dis is a great axe wielder, just like Freris.”

“I would never have imagined that,” said Ori. “Dis always looks so elegant, and it can’t be easy to fight in a brocade gown.”

“Make no mistake, even if she don’ haul th’ axe about, our Dis is heavily armed no matter th’ occasion. Fili got tha’ from her. Amazin’ the lad don’ rattle when he walks. One time when Fili was a badger Dwalin saw him walkin’ out o’ th’ armory lookin’ rather fat, so Dwalin grabbed him up by th’ ankles an’ shook him upside down. Soon enough there was a grea’ pile o’ knives under him. Oh, the wee lad went pale when he was brought before his mam, an’ was she angry.”

“Because he stole them.”

“Because he did such a sloppy job tryin’ t’ smuggle them out!”

The memory obviously tickled Balin no end.

“Aye, she’s a tough one, our Dis. She could’ve gone t’ Dale wi’ her brother last night, but she serves him better here.”

“So, she was trained like Dwalin and Thorin.”

“Durins are raised t’ fight from th’ cradle, wi’ no thought t’ gender. Oh, she was angry t’ be left behind when we marched t’ take back Khazad Dum. It was a very unpopular campaign, a suicide mission. Yet she would have gone. She was the next in line, yeh see, if Thorin didn’t come home, an’ someone had t’ be here in case Thror was overthrown, t’ get wee Frerin t’ safety. Thror didn’t go. O’ course.”

Balin drained his cup, and then frowneded at it, even as he continued his story.

“Tha’ was when th’ trouble between Thror an’ Thorin really started, at Khazad Dum, when th’ crown prince was killed. Thrain, an’ Dain’s adad, an’ both me parents, all o’ them burned dwarrow. No time t’ entomb them proper in th’ stone, too far t’ bring th’ bodies home in th’ hot sun. I remember stragglin’ in off th’ trail. Dwalin had t’ hold Thorin back from killin’ Thror himself. Mahal help me, but sometimes I wish he’d just let Thorin do it.

“Thror demanded Thorin pick up th’ crown prince’s duties from the day he returned, though Thorin wasn’t exactly in his right mind either. He’d brought Dain back to Erebor, yeh see, rather than returnin’ him t’ th’ Iron Hills alone. Dain was little more than a badger. He’d lost his adad an’ he’d lost his leg, nearly bled out from it an’ he was in constant, horrible pain. Thorin couldn’t stand it.”

“Wait,” said Ori. “Dain lost a leg? I wouldn’t have known that either. He barely limps. I’ve seen miners with mangled legs. The ruined one drags after them if it moves at all.”

“Dain an’ Thorin designed and built tha’ contraption Dain’s walkin’ on an’ Dain’s been makin’ improvements ever since. Tha’s his craft. Th’ lunatic’s a mechanical engineer.”

Balin laughed.

“Oh, laddie, yer face is a picture. Aye, Thorin helped him learn t’ walk, then helped him figure out how t’ fight on it. Then Thorin an’ Dwalin an’ an army of volunteers rode at Dain’s back t’ th’ Iron Hills t’ claim Nain’s crown from the regent.”

Ori chewed and swallowed, Dain’s words from last night coming back to him.

“Thorin brought Dain an army, so Dain brought Thorin an army.”

“The pair a’ them’re ridiculous but dead loyal. Tha’ was a long, horrible year between Khazad Dum an’ ridin’ on th’ Iron Hills. All th’ while Thror complained tha’ Thorin was neglectin’ his duty to his own people.”

Ori frowned.

“But Dain is one of his people.”

“Aye, an’ family besides. Thorin wasn’t even as old as Kili is now, but he always did have an outsized responsibility to save th’ entire bloody dwarven world.

“I watched him throw himself into helpin’ th’ soldiers, th’ refugees, anyone touched by wha’ happened at Khazad-dûm, an’ there weren’t many who lived at th’ time who weren’t. Tha’s when I first thought: There is one I could call king.”

“King Thror never noticed,” said Ori.

“No, too busy seethin’ an’ countin’ his gold. He couldn’t outright take Thorin’s title away. Thorin was a hero. But from tha’ very first day I could see Thror groomin’ Frerin’ t’ take Thorin’s place. It never happened, thankfully. Thror’s mind’s been crumblin’ fer decades. Half th’ time he can’t remember who Frerin is. If Thror had a plan for th’ crown o’ Erebor it’s gone by th’ wayside now. Hah! I almost feel sorry f’r Frerin.”

“Do you? Really?”

“Imagine if yeh’d been told all yer life tha’ yeh’d be king someday, an’ when tha’ day came th’ crown went t’ another, even though tha’ other was th’ rightful heir.”
Ori thought about it and decided Balin was right in a way. It did sound like a painful turn of affairs. Still, Frerin would remain a prince of Erebor. He would have more power and more wealth than Ori could even imagine. So, what was Frerin’s disappointment compared to that of a miner, expecting the tiny pay that kept many mouths fed, only to discover the pay wouldn’t come? Ori shook his head.

“I’ll never be able to sympathize with him. I’ve seen too many good dwarrow and men go without.”

Balin huffed out a laugh.

“I said I almost felt sorry for Frerin. I’ve never quite managed to finish th’ journey.”

Their cups and plates were empty by now. Ori started to gather them up. Balin rose and stretched.

“Don’ get old, laddie. I’ll be flexible as granite in short order.”

“Balin, you’re only twenty years older than Dwalin.”

“It’s no’ th’ years. It’s how yeh use ‘em. Besides, look at me hair. Yer darlin’ husband’s th’ one who put every white strand on me head.”

“All of them?” asked Ori with a grin.

“All right, he put half o’ them there. Thorin put in th’ others.”

“Balin, Dain brought Thorin an army. How did Dain know to bring one? Thorin’s letter didn’t say anything about Dale or what Thorin was planning.”

“I guarantee tha’ was Roac’s doin’. He can never jus’ deliver a message. He’s got to hang around an’ gossip after. Ravens are terrible gossips, laddie, keep tha’ in mind. Almost as bad as dwarrow.”

Notes

Mahumb - in Khuzdul, literally 'droppings'. In Westron, basically 'Oh, shit.'
Kings, Kin, and Kittens

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. In the interest of space (and travel time) we’ve congealed the City of Dale with Laketown. Since the Long Lake is a port, it makes sense that the City would slowly creep towards the main money making-part as well as to Erebor where the mines are. City centers do ‘move’ around as they grow and depending of which neighborhood is the most popular so, that it’s Dale but the port part is the Laketown side of Dale. This isn’t technically canon, but we’ve tossed aside Smaug and so Dale was never destroyed and it does make things easier on the storytelling in this one. Right This is is another little party chapter and Ori gets lots to do and a lovely surprise, but things occasionally get a trifle…er…gassy. Do let us know how you’re liking the story and please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori washed his hands a final time and glanced around the kitchen. Everyone else was now out in the meadow talking and eating. Ori had come in needing some quiet to think. The longer this went on the more he couldn’t stop wondering what was going on and worrying about Dwalin. Not being capable of making light conversation, he had retreated to the kitchen and, needing something to do, he cleaned it.

He wiped down the table one last time. There was a cauldron taking up most of the bottom oven filled with beef stew bubbling with potatoes, onions, with a stock of dark beer, spiced with mustard and a dash of strawberry jelly. The middle oven was full of more bread and the top one full of rich dark honey loaf cakes filled with berries and nuts. The cook top was covered with a huge pot of peppery fish stew of trout, bass, perch, eel, leeks, garlic, and parsley simmering in white wine and tomatoes. Ori wasn’t sure about the fish but the stew did smell quite good.

Everything was ready if things progressed to the dinner hour. Ori sighed wondering what to occupy himself with next. If people were going to eat here he had best light the fires in the receiving room.

He trailed through, lit both and then began lighting each of the huge lanterns hanging from every panel edge around the room. He lit the ones on the stairway also.

This took some time and he paused at the top, looking around to make sure he had got all the lights. He couldn’t help admiring the room. It was enormous and unlike the other times when they just walked through it, it looked both elegant and welcoming. Ori imagined people would bring in the tables and chairs in when they came to eat.

There wasn’t anything else to do. All the dishes and flatware were in use and all the cooking and baking implements were now washed and piled neatly along the counter.

“Yer worryin’ ‘bout yer buffalo, ain’t ya?”

“Nori!” Ori turned and pushed Nori, who had somehow arrived behind him on the top step.
“Aw, don’t get all het up ’cause yer happy I’m fine, pet.” Nori teased.

“I am happy you’re fine, but this sneaking up on me-”

“Yeh make it too easy, pet.”

“Shithead.” Ori decided.

“Language, pet.”

The front door opened and in came Gimli, Legolas, and Stonehelm. Ori hurried down.

“Is everything-”

“Done!” Gimli bellowed happily. “All Calmar’s dirty rats’ve been rounded up and’re bein’ stuffed down th’ dungeons.”

“Not stuffed,” Legolas frowned, puzzled. “It looked as though they had a cell each.”

“Yeh know wha’ I mean, khuzsh!”

“Do you want something to eat?” Ori asked. “There’s stew in the kitchen or snacks out on the meadow with the people of Dale?”

The little cadre headed to the kitchen

“Toldja,” Nori grinned.

Ori made a face at him then pounced for a hug.

Ori ladled out four bowls of the beef stew and turned as Sigrid’s voice sounded.

“Ori!”

He sighed. Sigrid was pissed at him.

“Stew?” he offered.

“Up your bum!”

Nori snickered. “Not a good thing unless there’s a carrot or two in it, lassie.”

“Shut up, Nori!” Ori and Sigrid shouted in unison, which made them giggle.

Gimli industriously tried to shove his entire chunk of bread into his half eaten stew making the gravy puddle up and dribble over the sides. He squished the bread in half and raised the messy improvised sandwich to his mouth and consumed half of it in one mouthful.

Legolas watched interestedly, apparently thought this was the correct way of eating stew if one was a dwarf, and copied him. Unfortunately Legolas’ mouth lacked the capacity of Gimli’s and shortly there was gravy on the table and all down the elfin prince’s tunic.

Stonehelm actually cackled at him.

“Tha’s it!” Gimli praised Legolas, who was obviously horrified at the state of his front. “Yeh’re a “Does trencher mean I’m a mess?” Legolas asked.

“Nah, means yeh know how t’ eat.”

“Among my people, knowing how to eat means you don’t miss your mouth.” Legolas sighed, taking the damp dishcloth Ori handed him and wiping ineffectually at his clothing.

“Yeh just need t’ open yer mouth more,” Gimli consoled. “Practice, lad, that’s all.”

Legolas said nothing and, grinning, Nori slammed his empty ale mug down on the table and shouted. “All Hail to Mahal and to the Seven Stars of Durin Shining Bright!”

Stonehelm managed ‘all hail-’ in his belch. Nori got ‘to Mahal’ and Gimli threw back his head and got out “All hail to Mahal and-” before he ended.

Stonehelm and Nori cheered and Legolas stared wide-eyed. “You can talk and burp at the same time?”

“Aye, laddie,” said Gimli. “It’s an art!”

At this moment, Kili and Tauriel wandered into the kitchen. Tauriel was smiling and Kili was holding her hand and obviously telling her something very wonderful. “Dwarrow can burp and talk at the same time.” Legolas informed her.

Tauriel blinked and considered. “Why?”

Legolas shrugged and Nori helped. “It’s a gift of Mahal, lassie.”

“What strange gifts your valar gives.”

“It’s fun,” Kili told her and made a grabbing motion at Nori who poured out two fresh mugs of ale and fired them off, sliding down the table. Kili caught one in one hand, spun, and caught the other then passed the first to Tauriel with a grin. “The trick is to take a gulp of air, hold it and drink the ale down,” he instructed.

“Don’t tell her that!” Nori shouted indignantly.

Tauriel sniffed the ale, licked her lips, and chugged the entire mug. She concentrated and sucked in her stomach. She frowned and concentrated again. The noise was impressive.

“Wrong end, lassie.” Nori informed her as the rest of the table dissolved into howls of laughter and she turned raspberry.

Kili who had been right beside her, rolled his eyes up into his skull, and fell over backward, flat on the floor.

Tauriel cried out and knelt beside him.

“Kili! My prince!”

"I used to be ‘my prince’,” Legolas informed Gimli.

“She aint yer sort, laddie,” was the reply.

“Don’t just sit there!” Tauriel rose and waved them to do something. “Get a healer.”

Kili opened his eyes, saw the tableau, grinned naughtily and winked, then hurriedly feigned unconsciousness again.

“Maybe you need to kiss him,” suggested Sigrid. “That’s how you cure things in the stories.”

Tauriel stared blankly at her, turned, and knelt to do so. Kili made the mistake of puckering up. She gasped then bapped him on the nose.

“You- you arrogant rabbit!” she raged, choking on her own laughter.

“And we all know what rabbits’er like.” Nori added.

“Shut up, Nori.” chorused Ori and Sigrid again, this time joined by Tauriel.

Tauriel sat down on the last chair, stretching her long legs under the table as Legolas did. Kili jumped to his feet, sidled up to her, and sat on her knee. She giggled and shifted to make them both more comfortable. Gimli made a decisive grunt, pushed his chair back a little and proceeded to wrestle a puzzled Legolas into his lap. Both elves looked at each other and startled to laugh.

Sigrid turned to Ori as the raucous laughter and drinking continued at the table.

“So, how’s life?”

“Oh, Sig! It’s - it’s so- so busy and in the most insane ways. I love it.” Ori grinned at her.

“Is his bum as nice as you hoped?”

Ori giggled and blushed.

“Sig! We haven’t, well, done…everything.”

“Why not?” she asked, hushing her voice.

Ori felt his face still burning.

“He’s so good to me, Sig. From the start he was just like a good friend and we’d talk about anything and everything and if I got upset he’d always be there to calm me down and hug me and…” Ori paused then grinned shyly. “It sound so silly to say it but we’ve fallen in love, Sig.”

“Ooo, Ori! That’s so wonderful! He’s so fierce-looking but he’s really good to you?”

“Oh yes. We’ll have to sit and talk it all over soon. I have so much to tell you and-”

Ori heard the front door open again.
Fili swaggered in a moment later, walked directly up to Sigrid and bowed low.

“Your highness,” he said with a grin.

Sigrid looked at him, dumbfounded, then around at the others coming in.

“Er… what?”

He straightened, his grin warmer and fonder.

“You don’t know?” he asked.

“Know what?” She looked past him, stabbed Bard with a look and shouted, “Da!”

“Ah, Sigrid. I’m glad you’re here.”

“Not for long,” she promised. She darted forward, grabbed his sleeve and pulled him aside.

Ori could chart the course of the conversation by how rapidly the color drained from Sigrid’s cheeks.

“Da, are you out of your mind?” she cried.

“Possibly. It seems I’m now a king.”

Tilda flew through and right into her father’s arms.

“Da! Where’ve you been? You missed the cake!”

“I’ve been out with our friends, scouring Dale.”

“You scrubbed the street? Did you use our mop?”

Dain roared with laughter.

“Aye, she’s darlin’.”

Tilda glared up at him, frowned, and put her hands on her hips, looking scarily enough like Dori.

“Who’re you? You’d best have helped Da with the mopping!”

“Aye, Chopper used his tail.”

“Who’s ‘Chopper’?”

Dain brayed over his shoulder, “ChoPPER!”

The boar squeed and frisked in, tail in the air. Ori could swear he looked pleased with himself.

“This here’s Chopper,” said Dain to Tilda.

Furh’nk gestured to Dain. “An’ this here is Chopper’s daddy.”

Tilda looked between the dwarf and the pig, entirely unsure if Furh’nk was serious.

“This is a pig,” she said. “Isn’t it?”
“He’s a battle boar, lassie,” said Dain. “He likes his ears scratched.”

Tilda looked over at Bard, who couldn’t seem to find the words and ended in a shrug.

Dain said, “See, like this, lassie. He won’ bite ‘less I tell him t’.”

Tilda very carefully reached out and scratched Chopper’s head as she was directed.

The pig immediately leaned into her hand and tilted his head, to take full advantage of the scratching on offer. The flat nose snuffled at her and he made happy grunting noises.

Tilda’s eyes brightened and she laughed.

“He likes that!”

“Of course he likes it,” said Dain. “He’s a very intelligent boar.”

Dori and Balin entered from the meadow and Dori went to Dain immediately.

“Ah, brother, back and in one piece, I see.”

“You have another brother?” Tilda asked. “That makes three! I only have one!”

Bard sighed.

“It’s not a competition, Tilda, and no, I’m not making you another brother.”

“That’s alright, Da, I think I want a Chopper instead.”

“You’ll have plenty of room,” said Thorin.

“Why will we have plenty of room?” Tilda asked. “Are we moving house?”

“In a manner of speaking,” said Bard. “I seem to have become king of Dale.”

“What? With a crown and everything?”

“Not yet.”

“We’ll work on that,” said Thorin.

Bard shot him a wary look.

“Tilda, I thought you wanted a goat,” Bard said.

“I do. If you’re going to be king we can probably have both.”

“At least she hasn’t mentioned a pony,” said Thorin, lightly, smiling at a glare from Bard.

Bain arrived and hugged his father without the usual adolescent embarrassment.

“Da, are you alright?”

“I’m fine, Bain. Master Calmar and his men are locked up. He can’t hurt the people anymore.”

“But, what’s happened?”
Bard sighed. He turned to Thorin.

“You’re going to make me announce this, aren’t you.”

“I can’t make you do anything,” said Thorin.

“Mmm. Alright, for everyone present, someone,” he nodded in Thorin’s direction, “has talked me into taking back my grandfather’s crown. I will henceforth be King Bard of Dale, at least until my neighbors wise up and run me out of town at the point of a pitchfork.”

While most present shouted out congratulations, Bain only looked concerned.

“Um, Da, does that mean I’m going to have to be crown prince or something?”

“No, Bain, Sigrid will be the crown princess.”

Bain looked relieved.

“That’s alright then. Being the heir means having to do all the boring stuff she likes to do anyway.”

“I’m going to have you executed,” Sigrid growled.

Dori bustled forward and immediately took her in hand.

“Oh, dearie, what a shock this must be for you. Come sit down now. We’ll have tea and you can rest your nerves and we’ll work this out, just like always.”

“Mother Goose,” said Bofur as he entered.

Ori looked around as people arrived, increasingly uneasy. If Thorin was here, then where-

“Has anyone seen my husband?” he asked, a little more desperately than he intended.

Thorin went to him with a smile and bumped foreheads with him.

“He said he had something to take care of in the city before he came home. He’s fine, Ori. No one was killed.”

“Kili did try,” said Fili. “He fell off his pony.”

Kili made a ‘snerk’ and turned scarlet.

“Tattler!”

Fili clicked his tongue, “No one’s ever died of embarrassment.”

“Considering the lecture Oin gave him, he could try for dying of mortification,” said Thorin.

Binni shooed them out of the kitchen.

“Go on with you, out into the receiving room. Look what you’ve done to the table! And the benches… and the floor. Piglets!”

Chopper squealed indignantly.

Dain was offended on Chopper’s behalf.
“I’ll have yeh know his manners’re far finer than this lot’s. An’ mine, come t’ think o’ it.”

Ori made to grab a damp rag but Binni snatched it up and bustled him along with the others.

The front door opened just as Ori reached the receiving room. It was Dwalin.

Ori’s heart bounced in his boots.

Dwalin was hunched forward with his arms crossed over his stomach.

“Dwalin!”

Ori ran to embrace him.

“Easy, love.”

“You’re hurt?”

“Naw. Went looking for yer old cat. Sorry, love, but she must’ve lost a fight. She did leave yeh presents.”

They cleared a path to the fire place.

“Here, put tha’ blanket on th’ rug.”

Ori did so and Dwalin gently withdrew three tiny balls of fur from under his surcoat and put them down on the blanket. They made peeping noises and squinted at their new surroundings.

“Kittens!” Ori cried.

One was grey, one was orange with stripes and one was all brown and black patchwork over cream with a dark patch bisecting its face perfectly from ears to chin.

Bofur said, “I suppose you’ll name them ‘Tassy, Kassy and Nassy’.”

“I’m naming this orange one Nori. It matches his hair. See how it staggers? Just like he does when he’s drunk.”

“Oi!” said Nori.

Tilda viciously elbowed Nori aside to get to the kittens.

“Can I pat them?” she asked longingly.

“Gently,” said Ori. “Remember, they’re babies.”

Dori said, “I’ll warm some goats’ milk, shall I? I’ll have to search to find some teaspoons to feed them.”

“Here,” said Bain. Absently he removed a handful from his pocket. “You had me on dish patrol, remember?”

Ori turned to Dwalin, glowing with happiness, and threw himself into Dwalin’s arms.

“Thank you!”

“Only took a minute, love. Thought it might brighten yer day.”
Nori looked at Bofur.

“Mush,” he pronounced solemnly.

“Oh, yeh love it,” said Bofur.

“Nah,” Nori denied, but with a goofy grin.

Dori said, “Speaking of our day, we do still have over a hundred people in the meadow and Dis is out there being supreme hostess with very little support. I know the starlight is very beautiful and the night balmy, but someone is going to have to sleep eventually.”

“Now, m’dear,” Balin interposed, “it’s not a problem, we’ll jus’ move everyone int’ th’ receivin’ room. plenty o’ space and seating’ in there an’ tha’ lovely stew yeh’ve been keepin’ on th’ back oven will do nicely f’r everyone. Dwalin an’ I will roll out a few o’ th’ kegs an’ we’ll have a nice wee party t’ finish th’ day.”

Dori went out to inform Dis and in few moments all the guests from the meadow happily strolled through from the breakfast parlor through the sitting room to the receiving room. Fili, Kili, Dain and Scudis had led a squad to the receiving room bringing in the chairs and tables. People, mostly the returning menfolk of Dale, exclaimed at the sight of the food and Dori bade them help themselves which they did with gusto. Bofur took the lead then. He and Bomber gathered people from the meadow into the open center of the room laughing and clapping as Bofur piped a dance tune and Bomber accompanied him on his drum. A round dance stated. Fili and Kili reappeared with their fiddles and Jani with her balalaika and soon there was a jolly celebration going on.

Dori and Binni piled two tables high with more clean dishes and dinner time food and Dwalin, Thorin and Dain tapped a hogshead of Shire brown ale.

When Binni called him, Ori went back to the kitchen, his arms full of sleeping kittens, Dwalin and Tilda at his heel. He hadn’t felt so blissfully happy in ages. His husband was safe and although missing Sassy hurt, her kittens were his. He looked up to ask Dori about more milk but saw his eldest brother had other business as Furh’nk wavered a little from his post at the kitchen door. Dori honed in on him like a lightning strike.

“Master Furh’nk! When was the last time you slept?”

“Uh-”

Furh’nk looked over at Dwalin in panic.

Dwalin winced apologetically.

Finding he was on his own, Furh’nk tried to straighten his spine.

“I can’t remember, Bearer. I’ve been busy.”

“Busy! Honestly! Our Dwalin, you aren’t looking after your badgers.”

“He’s not my badger!” Dwalin protested.

Dori waved his hand in violent dismissal.

“Here, Master Furh’nk, you march right down the hall and second door on your left.”
Since this was technically Ori’s room, Ori considered his options and retired from the field of battle.

Furh’nk was still trying.

“But, Bearer-“

“Don’t you give me ‘but’. You get yourself to bed.”

“I wouldn’t want t’ put anyone out, Bearer.”

“No one is using that room right now,” said Dori. He shot Ori a pointed look.

“Er, if yeh don’t need me right now, Captain Dwalin?”

“Go t’ bed, Furh’nk. It’s not worth me life or yers t’ disobey a direct order.”

“Just so,” said Dori dismissively. He turned to Ori. “Now, pet, I found a nice basket in the scullery and some rather odd pink dish towels to use as a lining.”

“Oh,” said Ori, biting his tongue so it hurt.

“And when we’ve tucked them up we’ll start bringing out the stew.”

They carried in the kettles and people began ladling out for themselves.

Ori saw Master Tin helping Master Arim along as the elder hobbled to a chair. Master Tin poured him some ale and the two chatted amiably as the music played.

Ori brought over a bowls of stew. He gave one to Master Tin before he turned to the elder.

“Here, Master Arim,” said Ori, “there’s a bowl for you on the table and here’s a spoon.”

“Thank you, lad.”

Master Tin turned to speak to Bard.

Ori said to the old man, “You and Master Tin are great friends.”

“Oh, aye, his brother and my brother were close. They were also great friends and, er, they shared a room and …” The old man heaved a sigh and a laugh. “They were married. I think I can say that now, can’t I? They’ve been gone for many a year and it won’t matter to you what they were.”

“Actually, it makes me very happy to hear, Master Arim. I’m sorry they aren’t still with you.”

“I kinda wish they’d been around to see this, truth to tell. Great Eru, I’m around and I rather wish I could see it. I’ll have to settle for hearing it, I suppose. At the moment it’s quite tuneful.”

Kili had approached Tauriel with his fiddle, playing a jig and capered around her. She caught up with him and quickly they were dancing together, Tauriel graceful and Kili sometimes out of step, making her laugh and him redden, but then laughing at himself.

Ori saw Thorin watching them dance from over the rim of his cup. Ori lost a breath or two in apprehension but Thorin seemed perfectly at ease. When he caught Ori staring Thorin winked.
Robes, Romance, and Rude Bits.

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Dori loves his new home and growing wardrobe, Nori loves getting up to mischief and Ori loves his kittens and Dwalin! Yes, that song is exactly what you think it is. You’re all on your own for snacks this time as supper’s finished and the people of Dale ate most of it. Do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The people of Dale departed with their new king, Bard. There was a good deal of laughter in the talk along with some side long glances and whispers at Prince Fili and the new Crown Princess Sigrid. They were apart from the crowd, sitting on one of the long tables now clear of dishes in the receiving room, Fili cross-legged on the table and Sigrid beside him her feet on a chair seat, and talking quite seriously to each other in low tones.

Ori went through and sat down on the sitting room sofa, quite pooped. Thorin’s Company drifted through in ones and twos until they were able to shut up the receiving room and everyone had settled in the sitting room and only quiet talk was heard. Dori, Binni and Gridr once again produced tea and, as Binni called them, snackies.

The door popped open and Omi and Loli barged back in with Buj and made their way to the snacks and the bookshelf to sit about. They were soon followed by Mahdrin and his two favorite assistants. The tailors came forward and bowed to Thorin.

"My king," Mahdrin murmured, "I am here as I understand there will soon be a presentation of a bearer to the court."

Thorin stared at Mahdrin. "I am the crown prince. King Thror is in his treasury."

Mahdrin widened his eyes and bowed again.

"Just so, sire."

Mahdrin, with another bow, moved on to speak to Binni.

Dain threw an arm around Thorin’s shoulders.

“Lemme give yeh some advice, 'cous. If yeh announce yehrself wi’ a bonfire on a mountaintop, yeh can’t put it out by pissin’ on it.”

“It was Bard’s bonfire,” Thorin argued.

Dain snorted and smacked him lightly on the back of the head.

“Idjit.”

Thorin laughed, a genuine laugh that made his demeanor lighter and his face more handsome. Ori could see just how much care had worn Thorin down.

A movement caught Ori’s eye and he looked at Pika. The young dwarf was staring at Omi who had just turned from her inspection of the books on the far shelves; she was singing softly to herself. She stopped, stared back at him, tossed her be-ribboned beard, and pointed her left boot toe outward in a decidedly flirtatious gesture. Ori was amused that little Moth had grown up fully absorbed with Loli’s courage.

Pika bowed with such a swoop, his right knee hit the floor. He made the Iglishmêk sign for 'heart'. Omi blushed and giggled behind her hand and fluttered her fingers for 'song'. Pika amazed Ori by prancing across the intervening floor in a step dance. Omi hopped in place until they were close enough to clasp hands. They stood gazing into each other’s eyes. Their foreheads bowed and touched.
Ori smiled at the sweet scene. They turned away from the rest of the company, quite in their own world.

Dori came bustling through at that point. Balin introduced his tailor to his betrothed. Mahdrin was obviously most taken and called his assistants but there was no response.

Omi and Pika were seated close together, sharing a chair. Their fingers danced in Iglishmêk. Ori watched them then blushed hotly. He was married and well read, but some of the things they were saying to each other were shocking and rather interesting.

There was a crash and Ori looked around at Buj and Dipfa. Buj had dropped his books, notes, and pens in a heap around his feet. Dipfa stood in a similar pool of fabric and haberdashery. They stared at one another in open mouthed silence. By now everyone had noticed them and watched most interestingly. Dipfa gave out a sudden, delighted scream of joy and rushed at Buj.

"My heartsong!" Buj managed to bellow before the force of Dipfa landed on him, knocking them both to the floor where they rolled energetically, rapturously kissing.

The Urs chuckled and the sons of Groin almost as loudly. Thorin face palmed and shook his head. Dwalin winked at Ori. Fili and Kili watched with interest as their mother and aunt tried to pull the boys away.

Dori looked highly amused and Balin put his arm around Dori's waist.

"Ah, lovely memories, eh, m'dear?"

"Yes, but at least we waited until we were not quite so public."

"Aye, nothin' as shockin' as a sittin' room floor. We were very discreet in tha' lovely pub's airin' cupboard."

"Oi," Nori cried. "The pair a' ye pounced on each other and had yer first tup in an airing cupboard. Well, that's romance!"

Dori rounded on him.

"You and Bofur aren't to talk. I caught the pair of you in my bed!"

Nori looked vaguely guilty and Bofur came to his rescue.

"Now then, we changed the bedding f'r yeh, yeh know we did! Even after yeh chased both of us up th' street with a mop!"

"Yes," said Dori, "and left me the laundry to do, you dirty badgers!"

Mahdrin cleared his throat with extreme volume and Dipfa and Pika recalled themselves.

"Master Mahdrin!"

Pika stood at attention, red to his hair and Omi sat fanning herself with both hands, panting slightly.

Dipfa rushed over and stood ready, now oblivious to Buj, who was still in a somewhat confused heap on the floor. He blinked, rolled a little and pulled out his notebook. He flipped a few pages and began to make copious notes.

Ori could not decide if he wanted to know what Buj was writing.

Dwalin dropped onto the sofa beside him.

"Well, love, Balin and Dori went at it in an airing cupboard. Bofur an' Nori borrowed Dori's bed. Yeh know, everyone who's sayin our marriage were sudden an' shockin're full a shit."

Ori giggled.

"Except they think that I think you're Beorn of the Valley."

Dwalin snorted

"Aye, true enough."

A worry float across Ori’s mind.

"Dwalin, are you disappointed in me?"

Dwalin stared

"'Eh? Wha'? Why th' fuck would I be?"

"Well, because we really haven't...done anything yet."

"Di' yeh like wha' we've done?"

"Oh, yes, but-"

"Then tha's wha' matters."
"But you...um..." Ori wasn't sure how to frame what he wanted to say. "Do you like what we've done?" he said finally.

Dwalin shot him a feral grin and put his arm about Ori’s shoulders. Ori pressed closer instinctively.

"I donno, love. Wha yeh think?"

Ori chuckled. "Sometimes I worry..."

"Don't. Keepin' yeh happy makes me happy. Don't ever forget tha'..."

Ori turned to lean into Dwalin's lap and laid his head over Dwalin's heart.

"I'm so happy it frightens me sometimes. We have all this intrigue and things rushing around us and all I think about is that it must be a lovely dream that I married you."

"Even when there're ravens draggin' yeh through Mahal knows wha'?"

Ori giggled again.

"Well, it may have slipped my mind for a moment or two at that point," he said.

Nori came over with Bofur and the pair of them sat on the low stone table. Nori looked at Ori thoughtfully for a moment then reached over and tweaked Ori's family braid.

"Yeh happy, pet?"

Ori smile and lazily brought his leg around to kick Nori's boot.

"Yes, I am. So there "

Nori kicked at Ori's and they thumped their boots together back and forth for a few moments. Nori grunted and kicked Dwalin's boot again.

"Alright, wee pet. If yeh're happy then I'm happy f'r yeh."

Nori winked at Ori and removed Nori's vest knife. Nori looked at Bofur with raised brows and then snatched Bofur's hat away. Bofur tried to get it back but Nori threw it to Ori. Intrigued, Ori tried it on. It was nice and warm but it was too big and the front slid down covering his eyes. Amused, Ori sat up and folded his arms against his sides then flapped his elbows.

"Quack! Quack! Quack!" he said, slightly muffled by the hat.

Bofur and Nori roared with laughter. The hat was removed and Ori turned to see Dwalin try it on. Dwalin's head was too big and the hat perched on top like a hedgehog.

Ori yipped happily, grabbed the hat and jammed it down on Nori's head. Nori yowled and tried to free himself. Ori half climbed on the table attempting to keep the hat squashed on Nori's head. Nori's hand shot out and rippled along Ori's sides, tickling him. Ori screamed and fell on Dwalin, laughing.

"Oi! Don't you two go spoiling my hat!" Bofur shouted and rescued it.

Nori's amazing hairdo was utterly wrecked. The top point was bent down to where the tip pointed at Nori's nose. Nori swore and tried in vain to fix it. Dwalin stood, neatly put Nori in a headlock and wound the point tightly around his fingers then let go.

Nori glared.

"Bastard," he said as Ori and Bofur laughed helplessly. Nori's once perfectly triangular point was now a long stiff coil winding straight out from his forehead.

Bofur recovered and managed, "it's not all that bad, duck. Looks like yer off t' a fancy party." Ori giggled.

"You look like Poofy, the Magic Horned Horse from Tilda's old story book."

Nori stood up on the table and started to sing an old traditional dwarrow marching song using his deepest voice and his own lyrics.

"I'm a horned horsey
I'm a horned horsey
What's having a horn all about?
I'm a horned horsey
I'm a horned horsey
Having a horn is magic!"
Bofur pulled out his flute and kept the tune for him.

"I'm a horned horsey
I used to wonder what kind of hay I'd eat at night.
I'm a horned horsey
Until the goats shared their pasture grass with me!"

Dwalin was completely flopped back against the sofa, laughing so hard, he just shook soundlessly. Ori put his face in his husband's line of vision. Dwalin silently jerked a thumb towards the back. Ori looked over. Dis, Thorin, Fili and Kili all stood behind the sofa, staring at Nori. Thorin's face hadn't worked out what he was feeling. Dis and her sons had eyes like saucers.
Nori noticed them and finished in a bullfrog's voice.

"Yes, I'm a horned horsey!"

Nori bowed low, removed Bofur's hat from the miner's head and waved it for a flourish. Ori glanced around to see the reactions. Gloin in the other chair shook his head. Oin opposite his brother, snored while Omi slept at his knee. Buj was still on the floor writing busily.
Dori swept back into the room with his entourage of Binni, Gridr, Jani, Mahdrin and his assistants.
Dori looked up.
"Nori, get off the table."
Nori hopped off and started going around with the hat held out in solicitation.
Both Fili and Kili happily dropped a couple of silver coins in.
Nori went to Dis.
"Go away," she said with a giggle.
Nori looked offended.
"Wicked princess! I'll have yeh know I'm a happy horned horsey an' if yeh don't put silver in my happy horsey hat, I'll impale yeh with my magic horn!"
Dis laughed harder.
Nori grinned and danced forward and made as though to poke her with his hair. Dis grabbed the horn and yanked on it. Nori grabbed Dis and hoisted her over his shoulder.
"The Happy Horned Horsey has a prisoner! I shall gallop around!" Nori shouted as he started to rush around the room recklessly leaping and climbing over furniture. The young princes shouted and tore after Nori and their hopelessly laughing mother. There was a whoop from Bofur and Jani as they joined the race.
Ori stood up on the sofa to watch. Dwalin rose and stood with Thorin, Balin and Dori.
"How nice," Dori said, smiling. "Nori has always missed the days when I played with him."
Thorin snickered.
"Well Dis always did enjoy it when Dwalin and I used to rough house with her."
Dwalin turned to Ori. Ori snatched up a tasseled cushion and grabbed at Dwalin's shoulder. Ori had been planning on a pig-a-back but Dwalin hoisted him up to sit on his shoulders.
Nori saw what was in the wind and fumbled Dis to sit on his shoulders. She was laughing so hard she wasn't much help and her skirts were bummled up and everywhere. Nori rushed toward Dwalin and Ori, hollering it was time for a joust. Half-way there Dis' skirts fell over his face, blinding him. Nori careened forward anyway. Dwalin dodged and Nori rammed into Oin's chair. Nori fell over the chair arm and Dis crashed down on Oin.
Omi and Oin shrieked awake.
"What in Durin's name?" the old dwarf roared.
"It's all Nori's fault," cried Dis and she frantically tried to get herself together and ended rolling off the other arm.
“I don’t care if it’s all for naught. The pair of you should watch what you’re doing,” Oin scolded. “Her skirts got in me eyes,” said Nori as he tried to shift the blame. “Dessert was lovely! I’ll tell your poor brother you said there was only shit for pies,” Oin vowed dangerously and rose.

Ori leaned on Dwalin’s head. He was laughing so hard his ribs hurt.

Dwalin reached up and slowly took Ori down sliding him against Dwalin’s body which Ori enjoyed. Mahdrin and Dipfa were having a last minute discussion with Dori. Binni, Bombur, and Bofur began to clean up. Fili and Kili were sent through to the kitchen to wash dishes. Thorin was talking quietly with Bifur. Dain and Sculdis were talking to Stonehelm and the other younger dwarrows. Ori trip to suppress a yawn. Jane and Dis were sitting on the sofa arm hand in hand.

Ori went back into the kitchen to check on his kittens. They were still in their basket, curled together sound asleep. One cracked an eye open, saw him and began to mew. This woke the other two. Soon Ori was seated beside them on the floor, feeding them warm milk from a teaspoon again. He pondered that it might be best if he took them to the bedroom that night. They would probably get hungry again in a few hours.

Ori found a stone flask for carrying tea and soup. He carefully filled this with more warm milk and stoppering it tightly, put it in his pocket; carrying the basket of now-sleeping kittens, he went through to the bedroom. Dwalin came through a moment later.

“Yeh beat me t’ it, love.”

“I’ve got milk for them, too, if they wake up in a few hours. Where do you think would be the best place?”

They decided the safest spot was by bedside on the floor, nearest the headboard, so there was no danger of the little fur balls tumbling off the bed and no danger of stepping on them. Ori put the flask and spoon on the bedside table.

Garnet came to inspect.

"Tha’s no’ a snack," Dwalin warned her.

She gave him what Ori could swear was a raven ‘I’m not impressed’ look.

Dwalin put a screen before the fire and attached it securely. He stretched and yawned.

“I’m off f’r a wash and a salt soak. Somethin’ abou’ Calmar’s thugs makes me feel like I bin tussling with orcs. Filthy bastards.”

“I’ll bring you some vinegar and natron to scrub yourself. Mind, with that lot I’d be tempted to offer lye,” Ori suggested.

Dwalin snickered as he left the room.

Garnet whisked out the window on some mission of her own.

Ori made the kittens comfortable, turned down the bed covers and washed his face in the basin before pulling on his drawers and night shirt. He scrunched down on hands and knees for a bit, watching Sassy’s babies.

The orange one was definitely Nori. This might cause difficulty if he was calling for either one as cats didn’t usually come when called, but then neither did Nori. A naughty smile crossed his face. The kitten could be Nori-pori, very singsong-y. Bofur would laugh his head off, Nori would growl but if Ori was lucky the kitten would come when called and with the suffix Nori would pointedly ignore him.

The grey kitten he thought would be Powder and the three-colored one, Mask. He got up again, a little stiff from being in that position for so long, and glanced at the timepiece on the bedside table. An hour had passed since Dwalin went to bathe. Ori frowned. He must have got caught up talking to someone. If that was Thorin, Ori decided he’d better interfere.

He peeked out the bedroom door and looked about the hallway. Only the phosphorescent light showed. Ori padded barefoot through to the bathroom and saw the door ajar. He pushed it open. Dwalin sat in the tub in the light of a single torchiere. The water was a thin, milky color for the salts. Dwalin’s head was bent forward. He looked to be asleep. Ori came into the room and stopped half way, remembering that one should never startle a warrior from sleep as it was a good "Dwalin?" he whispered.
The only reply was a whoof of an out breath.
He tried again.
"Dwalin? Husband, wake up."
Dwalin’s head lifted slowly. He blinked, turned and saw Ori.
"Love? Shit, I must a’ been’ dozin’.
Ori came to the side of the tub.
"It would be an ignominious thing to drown in the tub after such a triumph."
Dwalin chuckled,
"Aye, it would. How long I bin here?"
"Nearly an hour."
"Fuck."
Ori was turned by a sudden idea. Half eager, half terrified, he dropped his drawers and, grabbing hold of the tub sides, carefully climbed in. Dwalin looked surprised then feral. The bathwater was not steaming hot as it must have been but the stone tub, the warmth of the surrounding water pipes and chunks of salt held the heat so it was not chilled. Ori put a foot down near the edge and his foot slid past the outside of Dwalin’s leg. He stood warily and started to put the other foot down. The salts had made the bottom of the tub slippery and down he went.
Dwalin let out an ‘oof’ as Ori landed clumsily on his chest and water splashed and poured over the tub’s sides.
"Shards!" Ori muttered, feeling his face flame.
He would have scrambled up, but the weight of his soaked nightshirt made it hard to move quickly. He was such an orc. He should have paid attention to the side of his brain said this was bound to happen. He should have-Dwalin was laughing, not mockingly, but a fond and happy laugh, and to Ori’s surprise Dwalin caught him close and, sliding his hands under Ori’s hips, pulled him up to straddle Dwalin lap.
"Well!" Dwalin said, eyes bright. "Fancy findin’ yeh here, love!"
Ori giggled nervously before he found his courage again. He didn’t quite know where to look as he pulled off the sodden nightshirt and dropped it in the puddle at the side of the tub. Naked, he leaned back and grinned shyly up. Dwalin looked extremely pleased, both at what he’d done and how he looked.
Dwalin trailed blunt, gentle fingers down his cheek, down his chest, and lingeringly caressed a nipple.
Ori drew in a sharp breath of surprise. He had never thought to touch himself there.
When Dwalin moved his hand Ori caught it and put it back, biting his lower lip, completely flustered.
Dwalin growled.
"Yeh like tha’, do yeh?"
Dwalin ducked forward for a kiss and Ori was happy to oblige. Now that his mouth knew Dwalin’s it heightened the pleasure and made him sure of what he had dared to do. Well, that made him sure and Dwalin’s growing hardness confirmed it. No voice in his head would stop him now.
The salts clouded the water, so Ori went by feel and hoped to Mahal that he would do this right. He slid hands down through the slick hair on Dwalin’s chest and stomach, under the water and around Dwalin’s cock.
He only knew what had worked for himself the few times he’d stolen moments to do so, but Dwalin was bigger. Ori shrugged inwardly and used both hands.
A breath caught in Dwalin’s throat. Ori stole a glance, not quite daring to look his husband in the eye.
It seemed that what had worked for him did fine for Dwalin. His eyes lost focus and his head fell back and he grinned foolishly.
"Ahhh, love," he murmured, “yer hands’er perfect!”
Encouraged Ori concentrated on his work. Dwalin’s own hand rubbed up and down his back in rhythm with his own. Abruptly Dwalin sat up and seized hold of Ori’s hands and tightened them. They locked eyes as Dwalin let out a gasp and a long groan of pleasure and slow, deep shudder.

Ori released him, smiling, elated. Dwalin pulled him up hard and they kissed.

“How’d yeh know jus’ wha’ I were needin’?” Dwalin murmured in his ear when he got his breath back.

“I didn’t. I just wanted to.”

“Anytime, love,” Dwalin chuckled. “Yeh get wantin’ yeh jus’ come an’ find me I’ll see t’ yeh.”

“Or I’ll see to you,” Ori teased.

Dwalin laughed.

"Right, love. Let’s get this salt offa us.”

Dwalin rose, lifting Ori clear of the water and stepped out of the tub. Ori leaned over his arm and pulled the chain of the stopper. He expected Dwalin to set him down but Dwalin carried him over to the limestone enclosure where the spigot emerged from the wall above them. He put Ori down and the spigot gushed pleasantly hot water over the pair of them. Dwalin soaped a washcloth and rubbed Ori down with it, taking his time, and when Ori was covered with suds Dwalin tossed the cloth aside and did the same with his big, powerful hands.

Ori closed his eyes, his breath coming quicker. He didn’t know how he was keeping his feet as Dwalin’s hands slid over his skin. The lather made the movement smooth and slick and Ori moaned aloud before he could stop himself. He shook his head to clear it, but then he was in Dwalin’s arms and the lather made a tease of all that friction. Ori really felt he could do this forever.

“So beautiful,” he said, “I love touching you.”

Dwalin grunted impatiently.

He muttered something about touch, but he had already pulled Ori under the spray and rinsed the pair of them. Ori was about to step out but Dwalin backed him against the wall with a naughty grin.

“No’ finished, love,” he said.

He dropped to his knees and caught Ori’s hips firmly in his hands.

“Dwalin? What? Ooooh!”

Dwalin’s mouth sucked in his cock and held him firmly in perfect, tight heat. Ori had never dreamed anything could feel this amazing. He couldn’t feel his legs and he didn’t really miss them. He was almost drowning in the sheer delight of Dwalin’s tongue swirling around him.

Then there was no thinking anymore, no room to think. He moaned Dwalin’s name, clutching a double handful of Dwalin’s hair, gasped and babbled that he was going to come and Dwalin ought to-

His knees gave out and he was vaguely aware of sliding down the wall in a blissful haze. He heard Dwalin chuckle and felt the room move around him as he was sat on the stool, Dwalin drying him with a towel.

“I love you,” Ori said, grinning and wondering how he would ever manage to walk again.

Dwalin hoisted him easily once more and walked out of the bathroom into the hall. Ori nuzzled his neck mumbling that Dwalin was beautiful and must be the very image of Mahal and he was perfect in every way. Dwalin hugged him closer. Ori was faintly aware of Nori’s voice telling them to get a room.

“Not t’ worry, nuisance. It’s where we’re headed,” Dwalin answered cheerily.

Dwalin laid Ori down on their bed. Ori sighed with happiness. He reached up as Dwalin lay beside him and enclosed Ori in a hug.

“I love yeh, too, me darlin’, me ghivashel,” Dwalin whispered.

Ghivashel. Treasure of treasures.

He turned Ori on his side and spooned behind him. Ori closed his eyes, warm and content in his husband’s arms.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Now that everyone has settled, we can proceed with the next part of the adventure! Such fun! Be sure to have your own snacks on hand as we have another meal in this chapter and it won’t do if any of you drool on your keyboards or phones!! Do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori jolted awake at the first morning volley going off in the center of the mountain. Oh, Mahal! He’d be late to the library. He hopped out of bed, waking Dwalin.

“Love? Shit! Was tha’ th’ first volley?”

“Yes, I’m going to be late,” Ori gasped, splashing water on his face and throwing on some clothes, the nearest he could find.

“The kittens!” he remembered as one mewed and the other two were stretching.

“I’ll tend ’em. Get yourself gone, love.”

Ori rushed over, kissed Dwalin, and tore out of the room. He galloped into the kitchen, grabbed a roll stuffed with egg, cheese and bacon off the plate, and yelled something with his mouth full back at a disgusted Dori and laughing Balin.

He sped along the corridor to the city and caught up with Omi and Loli, who were also rushing along, bits of breakfast in their hands.

“I can’t believe all three of us will be late,” wailed Loli, swallowing down the last bite of cheese scone and trying to re-tie a ribbon in her beard.

“But such a day yesterday!” bubbled Omi.

“Hush,” warned Ori. “No one’s supposed to know. At least, I don’t think they are.”

“How can they not?” Loli wondered.

“I’m in love with a beautiful dwarf named Pika,” Omi crooned. “He’s so accomplished! He is so erudite in Iglishmêk and he studies how color expresses silence!”

“How?” Ori asked wondering vaguely if this was the case how Pika managed to co-exist with Dipfa.

“The solidity of primary colors,” Omi said authoritatively.

Loli caught Ori’s eye and rolled hers.

They were able to slow to a sedate pace as they arrived at the entrance of the library. Buj plodded toward them, moving as though he was underwater.

They reached the reference entrance. Ori, Loli and Omi slowed to a stop and stared around. It was empty of workers, silent and unlit, but for a few tapers.

Buj kept moving, smacked hard into a pillar, bounced backward three steps, bowed and said, “I beg your pardon, Master Brur.”

“Buj. I am behind you,” said Master Brur, dryly.

The four of them turned and peered at the librarian, who managed to look down on them from a great height despite the fact that he was shorter than any of them.

“The lot of you, go home,” he ordered.

Ori gulped.

“But, Master Brur-“

“Oh, for the love o’ Mahal’s blessed arse. Mebbe th’ nobles ain’t noticed yet, but yeh overthrew a government last night. Yeh’ve earned a little time off. Home. Bed. Now.”

“Yes, Master Brur,” they chorused, turned as one and filed back out again.

On the way home, Omi got the hysterical giggles and it was contagious.

They remained in a ridiculous cadre all the way to Fundin House and through the gate, through the front door, through the sitting room door to where Dori, tidying, looked up in surprise.

“What’s happened, pet?”

“Master Brur says overthrowing a government means we get to stay home and nap.”

“All of you?”

It never occurred to Ori that this might be unusual. They trooped through toward the bedroom.

At the clamor, Dwalin entered from the washroom.

“What the fuck?”

Ori grinned at him as he and his friends went into the bedroom, shucked off their boots, climbed into bed.

“Saved you a space,” said Ori with a sleepy smile before falling quite asleep.

He awoke briefly to a loud ‘thud’, but since Dwalin was now curled up around him, he had no desire to investigate.

By the time he woke again, Dori was at the door, calling them for supper.

“Pet,” said Dori, “why is Buj on the floor?”
Ori peered over Dwalin and down on the floor. Buj was flat on his back, he would have been snoring but there were three kittens sleeping on him; Powder on his brow, Mask on his beard and Nori-Pori on his face.

“Um, warming the kittens?” Ori offered with a grin up at Dori. Dori clicked his tongue and shook the dams’ shoulders.

“Up you get, dears. Get yourselves tidied and dressed. Dinner’s ready.”

Buj and the girls filed out. Ori sat up. Nori’s description of Furh’nk being so excited the he looked like he was going to tell Balin the Dis had laid an egg floated into his brain. He giggled a bit.

“What love?” Dwalin asked gently, a hand on the small of Ori’s back.

“Nothing. I was just remembering Nori how described that scene in the throne room with Vors.”

“Telt yeh ‘bout tha’, did ‘e?” Dawlin said sleepily.

“Yes, he told me Furh’nk rushed in all excited and looked like he was going to tell Balin Dis had laid an egg.”

“What?!” roared Dwalin, sitting up straight, looking wild-eyed at Ori.

Ori shrugged.

Dwalin paused a moment longer then fell back on the bed, bellowing with laughter.

Ori watched delighted as his husband almost fell out of bed.

Soon the five of them were making their way through to the breakfast room. Dwalin sat with Ori and Buj plumped down near them. Stonehelm moved to let the girls in on either side off him. Sculdis came in, dressed in what Ori guessed was Dain’s night shirt and smacked Dain lightly in the arm.

“Squash up, you. I’m sitting here too.”

She crowded him over and Chopper stirred at Dain’s feet under the table, but only turned onto his back and snored. Dain and Sculdis had pulled the bread closest to them and were demolishing it with lashings of butter.

The Durins, the Urs, and the Sons of Groin were all there along with Legolas and Tauriel. Gridr, Dis, and Jani had arrived from the bath.

Dis sat with a graceless thump, far too tired to remember her manners or to care that everyone had now seen her in her oldest, rattiest, most comfortable shift. Her freshly washed hair and beard were braided into simple plaits without ornaments and her eyes sat in deep shadows under her brows.

Bofur had jumped up when the dams arrived and now he put a mug of ale in front of each of them.

“Thank you, Bofur,” said Dis.

“Pleasure’s mine,” said Bofur.
“Durin males, take note,” said Dis. “A gentledwarf of quality notices when a dam needs a drink and brings her one.”

“You missed it,” Gridr said, sitting down next to her husband. “Our Dis did such a song and dance yesterday, she stole the whole show.”

“I wish I’d only stolen half of it,” said Dis. “I’m glad it’s Dori’s presentation tomorrow and not mine. I’m done.”

“I don’t see what’s so exhausting about serving tea,” Thorin teased.

“Dori,” said Dis, “do we have any forks left? I need to stab my brother.”

“Just use his, dear,” said Dori. “That way I only have to wash it once.”

“A hundred and twenty gallons of tea, Thorin,” said Dis pointedly. “I drank at least two gallons of that myself. I’ve tanned my innards to rawhide for you.”

“I acknowledge and honor the sacrifice of your innards,” said Thorin. “Seriously, Dis, all of you, thank you for this. You managed to pull off something in two days that it usually takes months to plan.”

Gridr waved a negligent hand.

“Lot easier when you don’t have to send invitations.”

“Really, Thorin,” said Dis, “we couldn’t leave it up to you. You would have served them a buffet of cold cuts, tapped a keg of ale and still managed to burn down the kitchen.”

She turned to speak to her youngest but shut her mouth and nudged Jani who giggled.

Kili was next to the elf dam, gazing at her worshipfully. Gimli and Legolas were arguing over how many of the thugs Legolas had downed.

“It was forty three,” Legolas affirmed.

“That ain’t what Dain said,” Gimli argued.

“That’s King Dain,” Legolas pointed out.

“Exactly,” Gimli grumbled.

Gridr was admiring the pair and Gloin was trying to but was too confused by the attraction between his son and an elf.

The Ur men were occupied with baiting Jani and Dis, who were teasing in their turn. Oin was discussing something with Thorin, Bifur, and Fili. Binni and Dori came through bringing out dinner and scolded everyone to attend and eat.

“You still haven’t told us what happened in the city,” said Dis, pointing a serving spoon at Dwalin.

“First we picked off Calmar’s sentries,” said Dwalin. “I should say our Nori picked off th’ sentries. I never though’ I’d be happy tha’ our Nori’s so blasted hard t’ catch. Bit vicious. He didn’t kill any of ‘em, but he wasn’ gentle. Where’d he learn t’ do that’s wha’ I want t’ know.”
“The quietness, I have no idea,” said Ori. “I think he gets the viciousness from Dori.

“Now pet,” Dori reproved but his eyes twinkled merrily as he filled Ori’s plate for him.

Ori was happy to tuck into roasted mutton garnished with meaty brown mushrooms and roasted potatoes. Tiny onions smothered in bread sauce were in a huge bowl and a enormous platter of rabbits cut in strips and fried crisp, on a bed of new peas were passed around. Tangy mint sauce and pickled tomato puree were in bowls to be spooned on the sides.

“Most o’ th’ lads took th’ perimeter,” Dwalin went on.

“Originally,” said Kili, chimed in “I was supposed to guard the perimeter while Fili went house to house with Bard, but there’s no way I’m leaving Fi’s back undefended.”

“There were other people to do that,” Dis reminded him, “including your Idad Thorin.”

Kili shook his head.

“I belong with my brother. We’re better as a team. Besides, Fi doesn’t have a Dwalin to keep him safe. Every crown prince should have a Dwalin. He should be standard issue. Since there’s only one of him Fili will just have to make do with me.”

“Mahal has a weird sense of humor,” Fili commented and got a piece of rabbit thrown at him.

Dori went back into the kitchen and brought more bread in the form of small, floury rolls. Bofur and Kili were soon throwing these at Stonehelm, who was an excellent catcher and had quite remarkable aim as well.

In the distance, they heard someone call. Dori hurried off and then welcomed Bard into the room.

Thorin rose with a grin and a bow.

“Do come in your majesty, we are deeply honored.”

“Shut up,” grumbled Bard, obviously embarrassed. He bowed to the ladies and came and sat a little awkwardly as Dain wretched over a chair and banged it up near the table.

“Siddown, Bard! Eat yer fill b’fore these wargs finish it. Ouch!”

Both Sculdis and Dori bopped Dain on the head at the same time which made him chuckle. Dori put a plate piled high with food in front of Bard and Thorin handed down a mug foaming over with ale. Bard looked a little unsure but the smell of the food stopped that and in a moment he was eating like a man starving.

“How did you get all those Dale people to come with your without causing an uproar?” Ori asked when the rolls stopped flying.

Thorin grinned.

“That was Bard. He went with us to every single house and asked them to go with the nice dwarrow. They love him to pieces down there.”

Thorin winked as Bard said something rude with his mouthful. Bofur chimed in at that point.

“He’s been in Calmar’s lockup more times than anyone else. It’s like battle scars to them. Offering them free meals didn’t hurt either.”
Ori nodded, food was hard to come by often if you weren’t part of the rich who fawned on Calmar.

Buj had poured his plate full of onions in sauce, picked out and eaten all the onions. He was now staring at his plate, as though undecided about what to do with the lake of sauce left.

Gimli took his plate away, poured half the sauce over all his own food and a roll and poured the rest all over Legolas’s rabbit. Legolas smiled sweetly at Gimli, who blushed, grunted, and handed Buj’s plate back to him. Problem solved, Buj reached for the peas, covered his plate with them and dumped most of the pickled tomato puree over the steaming green mound.

“Then what?” Dis wanted to know.

Fili, being the only one without his mouth full, recalled, “We started from the edge of town. We had the perimeter set up as planned. The thugs might’ve gone to ground but they weren’t getting out of Dale. Then Furh’nk and Bard cleared two streets of innocents and once they were on their way to the mountain we started on the first street picking up targets. We went to the first house on Nori’s list. Then we went to the next and the next. Right, Kí?”

Kili nodded, while he was making sure Tauriel’s plate was supplied with mushrooms, which she was enjoying thoroughly. Dwalin buttered a roll, shoved a large piece of roast potato in it, and handed it to Ori. Ori chewed ecstatically and immediately surrendered his peas over to his husband.

“Calmar’s men never knew wha’ boulder fell on ‘em,” said Dwalin around a mouthful of mushrooms. “Some put up a fight, but no’ many. Most’ve ‘em were smart enough t’ surrender. Now if only they’d bin smart enough no’ t’ be arseholes in th’ firs’ place. Ah, well, Dain an’ Thorin had themselves a merry time with tha’.”

Dain laughed raucously and said, “Aye, well, waking up in their wee trundle beds surrounded by twelve heavily armed dwarrow smartened ‘em up quick.”

Thorin shot his cousin a grin.

“You enjoyed that a little too much.”

“There’s no such thing, cous’.”

Nori snorted.

“Oh, right. There they are, asleep in the lap o’ Mahal and then Dain calls ‘em,” Nori did a credible imitation of Dain, complete with evil grin: ‘Wakey wakey, sweet pot. There’s a lad. Now better come along quiet or I’ll have to stick me axe up yer arse. Aw, look, he shite the bed. Naughty!’”

The room fell apart.

“Well, he did,” Dain insisted. “Wha’ a stench! Mahal alone knows wha’ he had t’ eat tha’ night.”

Suddenly there was a angry scream from Dori and he bounced up and rushed over to slap Nori, who was drinking the mint sauce straight from the jug.

“Oi! It’s a compliment t’ th’ cook!” Nori protested.

“Then just say so, you horrid badger, and leave some for others.”
“Everyone’s had some.”

“That’s not the point!” Dori snapped and snatched the jug away, huffed in annoyance that the jug was empty, and flounced back into the kitchen. Dain reached over and ruffled Nori’s hair.

“Good lad, wee brother. Mint’s a proper tonic f’r the stomach. Sensible f’r yeh t’ look after yer health.”

“Mint promotes digestion,” Sculdis confirmed.

Nori grinned maniacally and Bofur roared with laughter. Bard stretched and pushed back his now empty plate, looking happy and sated. Dis grinned at him.

“Would you like to get a word in edgeways?”

Bard laughed,

“It’s alright milady, I have three children, I’m used to not get a word in at all, but if you insist.”

“And you know we do, your majesty,” Thorin teased. Bard flipped his middle finger at Thorin which Ori knew was a curse gesture among men.

Bard took a long pull at his ale and settled.

“By the time we got to Calmar’s house, he’d somehow gotten wind,” said Bard. “That was a mess. He’d had a tunnel dug out to escape and he made a break for it. Bofur warned us not to follow him down there, and good thing too. Once he started running, Calmar collapsed the tunnel behind him, and the house on top of it.”

“How did you catch him?” Legolas asked.

“His own men ratted him out about the tunnel exit. Even then, he had a head start. He still might have gotten away if he didn’t try to take every ounce of gold he owned with him.”

“Where is he now?” Dis inquired.

“In his own lockup, thanks to your Furh’nk” Bard grinned. “I’m happy to say the accommodations aren’t to his liking.”

“Where is Furh’nk?” Dori put in suddenly. The room went silent. Frowns crossed a number of faces.

“I remember you telling him to go to bed in my old room,” Ori recalled. Dori and Binni exchanged a look and Binni vanished.

In a short time, Dori rose to get dessert while the younger dwarrow gathered the dishes to take them through. Fortunately, all were scraped clean as Fili, Kili and Nori began to chuck them about and juggle the flatware. Bofur piped a merry tune to keep time.

Ori stood patiently, moving slightly as dishes landed in an ever growing pile in his arms. He carried the plates to the kitchen. The others following with the platters and the rest. Binni arrived looking amused and bade them to put all the washing up in the sink. Dori was fussing over what looked like an enormous tart as well as a metal bucket which was so cold the sides were frosted. There were three porcelain pitchers warming on the cook top. Ori went back into the parlor just as Furh’nk walked in.
Furh’nk seemed to be slightly muddled and his hair and beard jutted off entirely to his left, as though he’d stood in a stiff gale. He’d had the presence of mind to remove most of his uniform before he went to sleep, but was less than successful donning it again, and some of the buckles were fastened to wrong ends.

With a squint, he took in the room, bowed to Thorin and presented himself to a startled Dwalin with great dignity.

“At ease, Furh’nk,” said Dwalin, rubbing his own temple and obviously struggling for control. “Sit down an’ eat. Then go back t’ bed.”

“Yes, captain,” said Furh’nk.

He sat, his eyes closed, and he started to snore.

“Or not,” said Dwalin.

“Brother,” Balin began. “Brother, how long was Furh’nk on duty before th’ siege?”

“I thought’ he’d stood down with th’ others a’ th’ end o’ every shift,” said Dwalin.

“I believe yeh thought wrong,” said Balin.

“Aye, an’ yeh’d be right. Fuck yeh anyway, Balin.”

Dwalin rose, moved to the comatose guard, slung him over his shoulder with a grunt and left. Binni followed with a flask and what looked like a covered dish of food.

They returned in a few minutes.

“Maple sugar tart!” Dori announced and placed a communal platter on the table with fresh bowls and a serving spoon.

“Maple?” Thorin inquired.

Legolas smiled.

“Yes, my people tap these trees for their sap in the spring. If boiled down, it makes a soft, brown sugar unlike the beets the Hobbits use or the cane that’s grown in the south. The flavor is very pleasant.”

“Indeed,” Dori said proudly. “And it makes a delightful sweet tart and the sap when boiled half way makes a delicious syrup to pour over. That’s what’s in the jugs. Have a care, it’s hot. And there is sweet, frozen custard flavored with it, too.”

They fell on it like wargs.

Dori finished his and played with the few drops of syrup on his plate. Ori knew that look. Dori was planning something.

“Do-ri!” he teased.

“Yes, pet?”

“What are you thinking of doing?”
Dori smiled wickedly.

“I think this maple sap or syrup will make a quite marvelous mead.”

There was a table-wide cheer.

Ori curled himself into the corner of the sofa before the fireplace. Omi, Loli, Fili, Gimli and Stonehelm were playing cards on the floor. Legolas sat behind Gimli as Gimli explained the game and Legolas watched his cards.

Buj was on a stool so near the fire, Ori thought he must be roasting himself while he busily wrote in his book. Kili and Tauriel shared a cushion watching the game and whispering.

Gloin, Gridr, Thorin and the other older group were sitting around the kitchen table. Their conversations and laughter drifting through.

Ori remembered and checked beside the sofa then went to the far cupboard. He withdrew the basket and returned to his corner. He took out his knitting happily. He’d just finished a line when Dwalin came out of the kitchen and sat down beside him. He grinned at Ori’s work and put a mug of tea down on the table near him.

“Thank you,” Ori smiled and snuggled a little closer,

“Good t’ see yeh down’ th’ work yeh like, love.

Dori came out of the kitchen and took Bofur over to a corner and had a very serious conversation with him. Bofur paled and nodded wide-eyed. Dori seemed satisfied and called to Binni. The pair of them went out and Ori heard them going up the stairs in the receiving room.

Judging by the faint noises soon after, Ori decided that Binni and Dori had locked themselves into one of the big meeting rooms up there, so as not to disturb anyone wanting their beds.

There was a rustling noise and the hidden sitting room door opened. Nori came out, looked around, cursed, and disappeared back behind the door, closing it as he went. Ori shrugged to Dwalin, who seemed amused. Dwalin lit up his pipe and put his arm around Ori’s shoulders. Ori knitted on, perfectly happy.

Moments later, Dain and Sculdis came through.

Dain went over to his son.

“Ye’ve had enough supper, laddie?”

“Yes, Adad.”

“Right, off with ye, then. I kin see ye there noddin’.”

Stonehelm didn’t even bother to argue.

He bumped foreheads with Dain and Sculdis and wandered off toward the upstairs, his parents bidding everyone good night and leisurely following him.

Not long after, a rock, half way up the opposite wall, opened out. Nori stuck his head through “You lot again? Shit!” He vanished immediately.

“What’s he doing?” Ori wondered.

“Probably trying’ t’ spy on our Dori an’ Binni. They’re upstairs practicing’ f’r Dori’s presentation dance.”

“Ahh,” Ori nodded. “If they’ve locked him out, he’ll go daft trying to find out. Nori can’t stand not knowing things.”

“I wish ‘im th’ best then,” Dwalin snickered. He passed the pipe to Ori, who took a pull and let the dark scent waft through him.

Loli and Omi yawned in unison then giggled at each other. They tossed their cards in and whatever they owed in hard candies then scrambled to their feet.

Gimli looked like he might try to hold out, but Gridr appeared in the doorway and raised an eyebrow.

“Yes, Amad,” said Gimli, utterly embarrassed.

“Good lad,” she approved.

He chucked down his cards and Fili divided the sweet spoils with him. Gimli and Legoas gently knocked heads. Gimli, blushingly handed over the candy to the elfin prince and went off with his parents, Uncle Oin, his cousins, and Buj back to the In residence.

Fili put the cards away, stretched and yawned. He went over and kicked Kili’s boot.

“Say good night, Kili.”

Kili grinned hugely at Tauriel

“Good night, Kili!”

“Sleep well, Tauriel,” she giggled in reply. Fili rolled his eyes and dragged his brother off by the hand.

Bofur, Bombur and Bifur came though and wished everyone left a good rest and took themselves off upstairs. Dis and Jani came in followed by Thorin and Balin. They all sat down near the fire seeming content to enjoy the quiet around them.

Bard yawned, stretched and took his leave as well, pausing to request that his thanks to Binni and Dori profusely for such a delicious meal be conveyed to them when they reappeared. Laughing Thorin walked him out to the front door.

Dwalin showed Ori the three impressive smoke rings he had blown, one after the other. Ori giggled, tried but couldn’t duplicate the effect. Thorin returned and landed back in a chair.

A small vent in the ceiling right in front of the fireplace opened and Nori fell out onto the hearth rug. He was covered in soot and stank of smoke. He looked at them, looked up at the ceiling, and swore again.

“Yeh know, Balin brother,” Nori grumped, brushing himself off. “That there hidden passage was a bad notion. It’s dirty, smoky and a right narrow way t’ crawl through. What’s it for anyway?”
Balin raised an eyebrow at Nori and said placidly, “We didn’t have it built as a passageway, laddie.”

Dwalin snorted.

“It’s th’ bloody fuckin’ chimney, nuisance!”

Nori looked briefly embarrassed then grinned again.

“Still ain’t an excuse, lads. Got t’ have everything’ set up right!”

He vanished again but this time into the kitchen. Ori thought he heard the pantry door slam.

Ori yawned, laid his knitting down to rub his eyes, then cuddled closer to Dwalin and slept.
Breakfast, Broth, and Brouhaha.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Why are all the nobles not available, you wonder? Easy, everyone who thinks they can get themselves into the main throne room hall which supposedly can hold all the population of Erebor, is getting ready with so much excitement. Why are they excited? Because Balin has got them all terribly excited because this day of days is the day when a Bearer will be presented to King Thror! The last time that happened it turned out to be a False Bearer and what a scandal that was! So shocking! Balin has been busy telling everyone that this is a True Bearer and Of Royal Descent!! Sweet Hammer of Mahal and Mighty Lady Yavanna. This hasn’t happened since before Thror was crowned! Everyone is so excited and decorating themselves in that mountain, who would even bother to notice anything happening in Dale! So much….Uh-oh, if Dolly catches me using the word excitement again, she’ll stab me with her editorial pencil! Hang onto your hats and do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Challenge of the week: Find the Sansukh quote! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori woke in his nightshirt over his drawers and cuddled up to Dwalin who lay on his back snoring. Ori sighed with happiness and rubbed his face in Dwalin’s chest hair. There was a snort then a low chuckle.

“Think I’d be happy with tha’ as a wake up every day.”

“Oh would you?” Ori asked, grinning then leaning up so he could reach to kiss his husband.

“Mmm, I think I like this way even be’er.”

Ori giggled.

They heard Balin singing out in the hallway. There was a rap at their door and Balin came in.

“Good morning, brother, wee brother. I’ve just had a raven from Master Brur. The library’s closed f’r th’ presentation an’ he’s comin’ t’ breakfast. Might want t’ get yerselves dressed.”

Balin went out. Dwalin groaned and kissed Ori again.

“No lyin’ in bed f’r us, love.”

“It’s amazing how rare a thing that is,” Ori commented and made a point of crawling over Dwalin to get out of bed. As he hoped, it got him groped a little before he made it to sit on the edge.

Dwalin sat up and slid his arm around him.

“Mebbe we can have a late breakfast.”

He nuzzled Ori’s neck making him giggle again, before turning and regarding his husband with a quizzical eyebrow.
“Late for a breakfast made by Dori on his presentation day?”

“Aye, yer righ’. I’d rather have breakfast with Azog.”

Ori choked and said wryly, “I don’t think you’d be alive to have breakfast with Azog, ”

Ori clambered off the bed and headed for the bathroom. After some quick ablutions, he came out and met Dwalin on his way to the privy. He dodged the attempt to grab him and ran to his old bedroom to dress. He skidded to a stop as there was Fruh’nk still unconscious on the bed. Ori quickly and silently grabbed a few clothes, his hairbrush and fled back to their shared bedroom.

He was almost finished dressing when Dwalin arrived.

“Dwalin?” Ori wondered how exactly to frame his sentence.

“Whate’er it is, aye, a’course.”

“You don’t even know what I going to say,” Ori laughed. “But thank you!”

Dwalin laughed, too, and crossed to Ori’s side and ruffled his hair before kissing him.

“A’right, love. What yeh wantin’?”

“I bounced in on Fruh’nk; fortunately he stayed asleep while I got myself some clothing.”

Dwalin grunted.

“We gotta find time t’ get yer thin’s in here.” He paused and looked at Ori. “If yeh want a’course.”

“That’s what I was going to ask you. Except where would it all go?”

Dwalin glanced about.

“I’ll organize me books a bit an’ there’s a dresser ’r two upstairs. We’ll go up after breakfast an’ yeh kin pick th’ one yeh like.”

“Um, a wardrobe?”

“Tha’ un’s empty.” Dwalin nodded to an oak affair standing off to one side of the window. It had a twin on the other side.

“I only use th’ other.” He grinned down at Ori. “So there’s plenty a’ room f’r all yer fancy stuff.”

Ori chuckled.

“At the rate Dipfa’s going, I may need two.”

“Then yeh’ll get two. C’mon, I’m hungry.”

They entered the breakfast parlor to find it was filling up, with dwarrow, with Tauriel and Legolas, and with incredible, delicious smells. A huge tureen of soup held pride of place at the center of the table, filled with rosemary-spiced chicken and plump white dumplings speckled with some other mysterious herb. Sweet potatoes pureed with more of the maple syrup filled several bowls surrounding the tureen, and a platter of tiny onion and leek tarts was making the rounds.

It was odd for a breakfast, even for Dori, and it all must have taken hours to prepare.

Ori wondered if Dori had slept at all, yet there was Dori, fresh and fierce as always. How Dori could still be standing Ori hadn’t a clue. It wasn’t even his own presentation and Ori’s nervous stomachache was back with a vengeance.

Only the slightest tremor as Dori ladled out Ori’s soup betrayed any nervousness, and then only because Ori had known Dori all his life. Ori rested his cheek on Dori’s shoulder for a moment, earning an appreciative pat from Dori's free hand.

Dis entered from the kitchen with a plate of hardboiled eggs.

“Where did those come from?” Ori asked as she put them down.

“I brought them,” said Dis.

“Oh they’re yours, then,” Ori said coyly.

“Yes,” Dis replied with a puzzled frown.

Ori looked over at his middle brother.

“There you go, Nori.”

Nori sputtered, turned red, and roared, “Shut up, you little asshole!”

Dori smacked Nori’s forehead with a spoon.

“Language!” He turned as Binni entered. "Ah! The omelet! It's amazing we've any sausages left at all."

He turned and smacked Nori again.

"Oi!"

"For what you were thinking," Dori explained dryly.

Nori muttered something to Bofur, kissed him, and slipped away, stealing a handful of tarts in passing.

Furh'nik came through immaculately dressed. He promptly ate two entire loaves of bread and then excused himself to attend his duties.

Binni went out and came back in with Master Brur, resplendent in his ink-stained orange robe. He was accompanied by three ravens, one on either shoulder and one on top of his head. He carried a large mug which he immediately, wordlessly proffered to Dori.

“Master Brur, I presume. Tea this morning?”

“<grunt>”

“There’s plenty on the table, do sit up and help yourself.”
“<Grunt-grunt>” Master Brur crashed into a chair and poured half the contents of the maple sugar bowl into his tea and drank the entire thing down. He sat still a moment then slowly his head rose, he blinked benignly around the table and then to Dori where upon he rose and bowed.

“Good Morning. Master Dori I presume.”

“Master Brur, I am delighted to make your acquaintance. I do hope you are satisfied with my young badger’s work?”

“Capital, capital!” Brur enthused, then snarled loudly, “Gettoff, yeh wee fuck-heads!”

The ravens hopped off him as a unit and stood in a line on the table. They all turned in perfect sync and bowed to Dori, cawed, then put their heads into the bowl of soup Dori passed over to Brur.

Brur swore at them. Dis passed over a plate of cut up bacon and the three ravens mechanically ate from that.

“They are quite determined,” Dis giggled. “What are their names?”

Brur pointed at them as they all simultaneously lifted their heads and turned to face Dis.

“Eggr, Alyne and Po.”

‘How sweet they are,” Dori observed. “Eat up,” he commanded waving his hand in a way that encompassed the birds and Brur.

Ori glanced across the table. Legolas and Tauriel were sitting together, whispering to each other in Sindarin and trying not to look as though they were both staring at Brur.

“Did you ever see a flagon that size used for tea? And he’s carrying it around with him.” Tauriel was obviously rather confused. Legolas glanced at Brur under his lashes and murmured in reply.

“It’s because he’s a librarian. They carry the mugs they always use for everything as a symbol of the library’s single dedication to the pursuit of knowledge. They all have one.”

“Really?”

“Oh, yes. Ada told me they’re buried with them.”

“Stars!”

Ori glanced at Brur, who winked at him. Brur turned his mug slightly so Ori could see that there was painted on the side a rather cartoonish bat frowning and displaying its top wing claws the way a man would his middle finger and in ancient Khuzdul above the bat’s head were the words. “I ain’t had my tea. Fuck off.”

Ori confined his brain to his plate until he had his face under a semblance of control.

“Dori, how do you manage this meal after meal?” Thorin asked. “This soup is incredible.”

“Broadbeam family recipe,” said Dori serenely.

“Something about the spice in the dumplings,” said Ori. “Bombur swore Dori to secrecy. I don’t even know what’s in them.”

Everyone else at the table was duly impressed.
“Good people Broadbeams,” said Dain. “Good soup.”

“Thank you,” Bombur smiled. “Dori, these are just right.”

Dori blushed.

“I had a good teacher.”

Ori caught Thorin’s eye.

“How are you feeling this morning?” Ori asked.

Thorin paused with the spoon halfway to his mouth. Slowly he lowered it back into the bowl.

“Why do I have the feeling you really want to know?”

“Because I really want to know,” said Ori.

Thorin pushed at a dumpling.

“I’m cautiously relieved. We could all be in the lockup by now. We’re lucky Bifur was right, the soldiers are loyal to me, or at least to Dwalin, and not to my grandfather.”

“But things could still fall apart,” said Gloin cheerfully. “We did just stage a coup.”

“It’s not a coup,” said Thorin. “My grandfather is still king. The crown prince is allowed to make independent decisions without the permission of the king if the situation is dire.”

Balin regarded him with amusement.

“True, though usually th’ crown prince goes an’ tells th’ king wha’ he’s done afterward.”

“Anyone who needs to know already does,” said Thorin.

Dain gave a bark of a laugh.

“Yeh’ve already got this ‘king’ deal well in hand.”

“We’ll see. Everyone in the mountain is excited about the presentation today, and rightly so, but there may still be repercussions. We just don’t know what they are yet.”

“Now there ye go,” Dain admonished. “Ruinin’ everybody’s fun.”

Thorin deflated. First Ori thought it must be relief, but his eyes were troubled and he continued eating silently while the others talked.

At least he was eating.

“Still, it went well,” said Ori. “If the king had burst in during the raid and started giving orders, you would really have been sunk.”

“He wasn’t going to burst in anywhere,” said Thorin. “He was still in the treasury. We made sure he stayed there.”

Thorin slipped a key from the pocket of his tunic. Ostentatious, crusted with diamonds, it seemed from another, much shinier, age.
“This is the master key to the treasury. It overrides the locks for every other key on Thror’s ring. He received it at his coronation.”

“Where did you get it?” Ori asked, before immediately answering his own question. “Nori! Nori stole that right off Thror’s belt?”

“While he was wearing it. For someone who’s spent most of his life in Dale, its amazing how much Nori knows about the layout of the royal quarters. And it explains the chicken.”

“The chicken?” Ori asked, a horrified suspicion rising in his brain.

“One night I went to check on Udad. He was fast asleep in his bed and on the wall beside it someone had scrawled a drawing of a chicken.”

“What did Nori take?”

“I have no idea. I do remember rousing Mistress Dazla to help me scrub it off the bedroom wall before Thror awoke.”

“I’m so sorry.”

“Don’t be. Your family displays an amazing array of talents.”

“Thror doesn’t notice he’s being locked up?”

“We make sure he has food and so on, though he hardly eats it. Come to think on it, he’s been in there since before the siege.”

Ori gaped at him.

"He's been in there for two days? No one's noticed the king has been missing for two days?"

“Not even himself,” Thorin assured him. “He’s been doing it now of his own volition for months. In fact, now we’ll have to dislodge him and neaten him up for the presentation. He will not be amused at being disturbed.”

Thorin passed the key over his shoulder. A hand slipped out from behind the arras, took the key and disappeared back behind the cloth.

“I’ll have him at his chambers in fifteen minutes,” said Thorin, answered by a familiar snort.

Dori shouted, “We will speak about this!”

There was a faint chuckle in the distance.

At that point, Gridr roused her brood and the sons of Groin and two elves headed out to prepare themselves for the presentation. The Ur’s and Dain and his family went upstairs and the Durins left soon after. Ori bullied Dori to sit with a cup of tea and supervise while he Dwalin and Balin cleared the table, washed the dished and cleaned up the kitchen.

Shortly before the noontime horn volley, Mahrdin, Dipfa and Pika arrived. Dori was hustled into his and Balin’s chambers and Balin endured the slight indignity of having this door shut in his face, much to Dwalin amusement.

In a few minutes Dipfa came out, carrying a large, wrapped parcel, and took Ori’s arm and said, “Time to get you dressed for your brother’s royal presentation, Master Ori.”
“Couldn’t you just call me Ori,” Ori suggested, allowing her to take him to his and Dwalin’s bedroom.

“No, Master Ori. It isn’t seemly.” She grinned naughtily.

Ori sighed.

Ori watched in the mirror as Dipfa dressed him like a badger’s plaything. He’d been a little flustered as she’d had him strip down to nothing and wash in the basin, while she opened the parcel on the bed. He supposed as her craft was tailoring and dressing she had seen all the sorts of bodies that were possible. He tried not to be too bashful. One by one she dressed him in new under garments. Each one was in Dwalin’s deep green and all were finest silk.

“Why do I need silk drawers?” Ori asked. “I don’t think Thror’s going to care about such.”

“Master Dwalin will,” she replied, settling his court breeches about his waist.

The material still fascinated Ori. He couldn’t stop himself from moving to see the black material shift and turn to dark green in the lamp light. Dipfa sternly put a stop to this. The tunic was next. This showed off the red thread of garnets studded along each seam even more than breeches did. The black boots shone richly, now sporting brass caps, with their tassels and dark green silk tied off with emeralds.

Dipfa went to her open parcel and removed a matching cloak. Ori gaped. This was trimmed in the fur of a black warg. The fur was on every edge in a dark roll, the width of Ori’s hand. The fastenings were highly polished brass. Dipfa laid this across Ori’s shoulders and showed him how the fastenings could either hold the cloak shut against the cold or pin it back to show off his fine clothes.

Dipfa went back to the bed for another, smaller parcel and this held a slender brass box. She brought it over and set it on a chair nearby.

“Captain Dwalin gave me these the other day for you to wear.” She opened the box and drew out a pair of beaten brass wristlets studded with rubies and inlaid with mithril. There was a wide banded brass belt to match, with a large mithril bands and shining buckle each inlaid with garnets and emeralds. Finally she brought out the hair beads. They were like his originals but made over in brass and mithril, all with a signature garnet or emerald. She was about to start on Ori’s hair when Dwalin came in wearing his battle dress uniform. Ori sighed in delight.

When Dwalin caught sight of Ori and what Ori was wearing, his smile looped around one ear and reached to loop around the other.

Dwalin swaggered up to him, grasped him by both shoulders, kissed him breathless and whispered in his ear.

“Yeh look edible.”

Ori felt white hot with embarrassment and pleasure.

“So I really?” he teased.

“Aye, quite th’ mouthful.”
Ori had to look away before he combusted.

“You’d better stop that right now or we won’t be presentable at court.”

“Dori’s th’ one being presented, no’ us,” said Dwalin, giving the earlobe a little nibble.

“A-hem,” said Nori, slipping into the room. “Y’ might wanna save that ’til after the presentation, unless y’ wanna be prying Dori’s head outa the ceiling.”

“You’re not going to dress up?” Ori asked.

“I’m not actually gonna be there, even though I’m gonna be there,” said Nori. “Some o’ us got work t’do.”

“Oooooh, well,” said Ori with a smirk.

Dwalin heaved a sigh. “Unfortunately, I do as well. Have t’ go be official an’ soldierly. We’ll see each other at th’ feast, love.”

Nori fluttered his eyelashes.

“Of course we will, darling!”

“No’ yeh, nuisance. Yeh behave yehrself an’ mebbe I’ll slip yeh some ale.”

“Looks like another dry night for poor Nori,” said Ori.

The brothers traded filthy looks.

Ori turned back to Dipfa, who had both hands clamp over her mouth trying vainly to stifle giggles. She held out the comb. Dwalin took it and, with Dipfa handing him each bead, he put all Ori’s braids in for him. Dipfa opened another side case in the box and removed and unfolded a piece of dark green velvet. Dwalin put a mithril ring with a oval garnet inlaid with brass stripes on Ori’s left middle finger and then a ring of brass with a large square cut emerald and put it on Ori’s right third finger. He put a matching ear cuff on Ori’s right ear and the left was a mithril cuff with a tiny brass chain hanging from it. At the end of the chain was an emerald set in a bezel of two tiny crossed axes of mithril.

Ori looked in the mirror again. Dwalin looked also and slid his arms around Ori.

“We look extremely regal, husband,” Ori said finally.

Hand in hand, Dwalin led Ori out to the receiving room. Legolas and Tauriel were in their Greenwood guard attire with their hoods drawn up. Legolas passed on the information that the Sons of Groin had already gone to the throne room. The Ur family were assembled all in their best. Brown with copper seemed to be the colors of the family.

Master Bombur looked positively like the dwarrow ideal male with his girth, his black iron mace, and magnificent beard, braided in a thick rope that looped around his body.

Bofur had cleaned up well but was not without his hat. His mattock was slung across his back; for some strange reason he looked vaguely uneasy.

Jani was in her usual mining gear with her mattock in her hand, her toast to the occasion was a low cut bodice of apple green.

Bifur had donned his old armor, polished to a high sheen and Dipfa was employed to quickly tie a few ribbons of silver lace into a bow at the top of the shaft of his great boar spear.

There was a noise in the receiving room and Bard and the bardings arrived. Ori and Sigrid hugged ecstatically, and Tilda demanded her share as well. Balin and Dwalin shook hands with Bard and Bain.

“Oh, Ori you do look fine!!” Sigrid admired.

“So do you!” he returned for she did. Sigrid was in a beautiful deep blue dress embroidered with flowers in silver thread. Her hair was up as was proper for a young lady of age. She wore a head band that perfectly matched her dress. Tilda was in a pretty poppy red frock and her little buttoned boots had curled toes. She seemed very happy with herself. Both Bain and his father were dressed in greens and browns, not decked out as Calmar used to but simply. Ori wondered which if not how many of the Dale ladies had got together to dress up their king and his family in one night!

Dain and Sculdís came down the stairs. Ori stared. They looked magnificent. Dain’s hair was washed, brushed and pomaded into a top knot that rose to at least two feet over his head. On either side of this, his hair was tufted out in a way that looked exactly like Chopper’s ears. His hair and beard flowed with gold and rhodochrosite trinkets and he’d added many more tusks to his look. His tunic was scarlet with gold trim. His wide gold belt has a large buckle of rhodochrosite shaped like a pig. His tunic bottom hem was trimmed with tiny rhodochrosite pigs running. His breeches and boots were also scarlet and gold with a rhodochrosite pig face on each boot toe. He wore a reddish brown bearskin cloak with shining gold fastenings.

Sculdis had a matching cloak. Her dress was scarlet with gold trim also. The placket of her bodice closed in a line of tiny rhodochrosite buttons. On either side of the placket were embroidered very pink running pigs, the heads at the top and the hind feet and curly tails just above the waist. Her enormous skirt pooled around her, the flounce showing the gold lace festooned petticoats. Her hair was amazing. Ori wondered how she had poofed and pinned it into an almost exact shape of a boar’s head, complete with tusks.

Stonehelm was mostly covered in brown fur and gold and his hair was merely in order and braided with his family and achievements. The look was quite restrained. Ori suspected he didn’t care to compete with his parents.

He stopped by Ori’s side as they stood waiting for Dori.

“You look very well, Stonehelm,” said Ori.

“Thank yeh, cousin. As do yeh.”

“You parents must have spent hours preparing. All those extra tusks in Dain’s hair!”

“Tha’s pretty simple fer ’da, really. Doesn’ want t’ show Dori up on his big day. Looks like he left th’ tail at home,” Stonehelm suggested.

“Maybe he’s wearing it under his cloak.”

“Hadin’t thought o’ tha’.”

Tilda rushed to hug both Dain and Sculdís and squeal in delight over the pigs on their clothes and stand back in open-mouthed admiration of Sculdís’ hair-do.
Balin arrived in his best deep red court robes. His hair and beard shone a blinding white, looking well with the mithril trimmings on his clothing.

They all turned at the sound of a door opening upstairs. Mahrdin came out escorting Dori, who was resplendent in the traditional long sleeved high necked white robe of a bearer. His hair was loose and flowed about him with a few strands of mithril pinned in, further accenting its beauty.

Dori floated slowly down the stairs to the sound of everyone’s compliments and gushings of praise.

Dain and Sculdis went forward and each took an arm and helped Dori down the last three steps. They escorted him to Balin, who bowed deeply and respectfully kissed Dori’s hand. Overcome Ori rushed over and kissed Dori’s cheek.

“Oh, Dori! You’re so beautiful!”

Dori beamed and his eyes went a trifle misty.

“Thank you, my sweet pet. I’m so happy you think so.”

“Are you nervous?”

“Only a little, my badgerling, but just in a proper way, of course.”

Ori looked him over again.

“I thought you said you and Binni and Mahrdin had designed a completely new robe. This one looks just like the traditional one you see in all the pictures.”

“This one is a ruse, my pet, just a ruse. Wait and see.”

Ori sighed but decided he wouldn’t spoil whatever Dori had planned.

Tilda pronounced that Dori was a fairy princess which made everyone laugh. Sigrid said nothing just hugged Dori very hard and sniffed. Ori thought he saw her wipe away a tear when she turned away. He went over and squeezed her hand. Apparently Bard and Bain were both too tongue tied to say anything. Dori fluttered his eyelashes at Bard, who colored a little and swept Dori a most courtly bow.

Mahrdin cleared his throat and everyone parted so the tailor could present the cloak which Ori recognized as a white bear’s pelt. After he and Dain placed this on Dori’s shoulders, Mahrdin unrolled a large silver filigree lace cloth which Sculdis and Dain cast over Dori, veiling him completely.

The entire group moved out to the courtyard where Chopper was hitched up to a beautiful cart that looked like a large pink velvet upholstered teacup. Gnasher and Balin’s goat, Grinder, and Poot-poot stood saddled and ready for master Mahrdin and his assistants. The Ur’s cart was hitched up with two of Thorin’s ponies. There was another upholstered shay, much larger than the ‘teacup’, drawn by Fili and Kili’s two ponies. Kawa and Saki were a matched pair, white with a lovely sprinkling of black dots all over them. Honda, Ducati and Harley were also saddled up.

The royal family of Dale and their elven companions went into the large shay and Bard assured them he was fine with driving the ponies. Dain and Sculdis with Dori between them got into the teacup and Stonehelm took the reins. The Ur’s were in their cart with Master Bombur driving and Master Brur already in deep conversation with Bifur. Dwalin assisted Ori onto Honda then swung onto Harley. Balin maneuvered Ducati around, inspecting the line up, and off they went. Balin and Dwalin led the party from Dale, then Ori, then the teacup, then the Urs followed by Mahrdin and his assistants.

As they left the royal cavern a guard swung in, with two riders on massive fierce goats beside each cart. As they slowly processed along the streets, dwarrow, all hurrying to the throne room on the ground entrance floor of the mountain, stared and cheered and waved, goggling at the veiled figure sparkling at the center of the teacup.

Ori wasn’t sure he like being the center of attention like this but reflected that everyone was concentrating on what they could see of Dori rather than anything else. Dain and Sculdis waved serenely from the teacup. Occasionally when Dain recognized a friend he’d bellow a greeting. Tilda was standing up being held securely by Sigrid as she tried to wave to everyone.

They got to the main floor and the cadre of soldiers who had escorted them gave the carts and animals over to more soldiers waiting there. Dain and Sculdis helped Dori out of the teacup and people cheered as Mahrdin and his assistants ran forward to adjust the Bearer’s cloak and veil. The Bearer turned to the group of dwarrow and gave a little bow, inclining the head to acknowledge them which brought on louder cheering.

The soldiers herded the entire party through into an anteroom to prepare to be presented. Brur went through and took his place at the arched doorway to announce them. The guards went out leaving only a few to keep them safe and Dwalin, giving Ori a quick kiss, vanished off to his duty.

There was a small hallway off the anteroom and there was something going on in it. Ori heard a scuffle and a shout. The guards turned as did the entire party. Everyone went to have a look.

Prince Frerin and the Rikanta in all their finery were arrayed in the hallway and Lord Rikut and Lady Klakuna appeared to be in the middle of quite a tiff as she jammed her sharp finger into her husband Rikut’s breastbone with every word.

“You lied!” Lady Klakuna shrieked. “You lied about my granddaughter being dead, you lied about my great-grandson. You lied about everything! I don’t want to be married to you anymore. I am NOT married to you. It’s my line you married into, my wealth and prestige you have enjoyed and myself you have abused and I declare before all my relatives here and now that I am NOT married to you. You will go away. Anyone who wants to stay with me may stay, but you will take yourself out of this mountain. I state right now before this entire mountain and Mahal himself and his Lady I Am. Not. Married. To. You!”

“But, my dea-“

She had an amazing left hook and he left an amazing imprint of his body in the stone behind him.

From the onlookers there came a delighted “Oooooh.” mingled with shock, except for T’dillah, who gave a little noise and started to cry, and Frerin who immediately comforted her.

The nobility had a new scandal broth in which to partake.

Ori sighed.

It would not be long-lived. No one had seen Dori in his presentation robe.

Catching sight of Dori’s party Lady Klakuna, her flavescent gown flowing behind her, marched over to Dain and announced without preamble, “Your majesty, allow me to present my great-grandchild with you.”
Dain’s eye twinkled.

“Of course, of course,” he said, perfectly amiably. “Get in line with us, my dear. Off we go.”

Dain gave a whistle and Chopper, now be-ribboned with silver lace bows on each ear and tail wagging, came trotting around the corner with a happy squeal, almost pushing aside Lady Klakuna. Sculdis caught hold of her arm and tucked it under her own, declaring merrily, “I love presentations, don’t you?”

“Oh, so do I,” trilled Lady Klakuna. “And such a special day for our dearest Dori. I’m so proud!”

Every torch in the throne room was lit, every crystal cleaned, every inch of stone polished, every tapestry dusted and aired for this occasion. Having never been in the throne room Ori would have been awestruck at any rate, but he could only think this was the perfect setting to display his jewel of a brother. Above the tapestries the walls of the natural cavern had been left in their original state, with only balconies carved out and these were full. Every dwarf in Erebor or Dale who could possibly attend had done so and since this was a Bearer presentation, no dwarf could be locked out.

A flutter of movement in and around the galleries caught Ori’s eye. He swallowed hard. What he had taken for bands of jet in the rock were ravens, perhaps a thousand, perched on every possible surface in the chamber and looking down on the dais with unsettling intensity. They didn’t make a sound. Ori had a mad thought for a moment that he was the only one who could see them, but Stonehelm muttered something about the ‘bloody terrifyin’ birds’.

The object of their interest, the king himself, looked even more gaunt and brittle than he had a few days before, a strangely shrunken doll of a dwarf, overwhelmed by the gold ornaments in his beard.

Thorin stood beside him in his usual blues and blacks though trimmed in silver ermine. His face beneath his crown was masklike, yet he still looked far more alive than Thror.

Ori saw Dis and Fili and Kili a step below the main dais. Kili caught his eye, smiled and waved. Dis closed her eyes and set her mouth in a straight line as if to keep herself from laughing and possibly from smacking at him. Under her chin, her brooch also waved at Ori and he realized Dis was wearing Rutile as an ornament. Glints in the torchlight told Ori, Dis had created rings small enough for Rutile to wear on each little leg.

Frerin stood at the lowest raised level of the dais, in front of the throne, as though he thought he was presenting important noble visitors. The Rikanta had claimed a spot close by, with T’dillah, pretty and slightly terrified out front, and it occurred to Ori that Frerin had plans of his own today, plans which probably included upstaging Dori by presenting what he surely thought was the next queen of Erebor.

To the left of the dais, at attention, stood a unit of the city guard, with Furh’nk out front, pale but polished. To the far side Dwalin had stood Targ at the head of the royal guard, his eyes roving the crowds of elites on the main floor, meeting those of each of his lieutenants in turn. Dwalin himself stood at attention on the second step down from the dais. Dwalin had deployed his soldiers carefully. He was taking no chances. The unit closest to Frerin consisted of some of Dwalin’s most capable fighters. Apparently Frerin’s plans had not gone unnoticed there either.

Brur cleared his throat and roared out that all attention and homage be given to the High King of Dwarrow, King Thror. Every dwarf present bowed to the king who waved a vague hand at this.
Brur started talking about how important Bearers were and Ori lost the thread. He realized with the gesture from one of the guards he was to cross from the ante room to the throne first. He had to walk up that aisle which suddenly seemed leagues long. He looked helplessly over Brur’s shoulder then he saw Dwalin. Looking at Dwalin steadied him. Dwalin was on guard and ready. He was safe.

Brur waved his hand behind his back and the guard nodded to Ori. Ori went forward.

Ori stepped out, keeping his eyes on Dwalin. To his surprise, a polite applause followed him from the floor as he walked steadily toward the throne.

Then the gallery erupted into saucy whistles and shouts.

“Oi! Ori! It’s me! Lor! I made it!”

“Scrunch down, Lor, we can’t see around yer fat head!”

“Ooooo! Don’t our Ori look a treat!”

“Bit sexy, in’t he?”

“My, but he is sharp! Cleaned up nice.”

“Who wouldn’t look good in a suit like that?”

“Oh, hush! He looks fine. YEH LOOK FINE, LADDIE! WE’RE JUST MAKIN’ SURE YER HUBBY’S TAKIN’ CARE O’ YEH!”

“I’ll just bet his hubby takes care o’ him.”

“SHUT YER MOUTH! YER EMBARRASSIN’ TH’ POOR LAMB!”

“His brother still owes me twenny gold, the rat.”

The corners of Dwalin’s mouth twitched but he held his composure. Ori, on the other hand, thought his own head may explode from the embarrassment.

He got to the steps to the dais and bowed low to Thror who nodded but was obviously thinking of something else. Probably that horrid thing in the box down in the treasury, Ori thought waspishly as he crossed to Dwalin’s side. Dwalin winked at him and Ori couldn’t stop himself from grinning up at Dwalin. How marvelous he looked in his battledress and Ori silently wondered why Dwalin didn’t wear a kilt more often. He looked wonderful in it.

“Bard, Grandson of Girion, King of Dale and his family.”

Brur’s voice brought Ori back to the now. Bard, followed by his children and the two elves, made their was across and bowed to Thror. Thror was interested enough to rise and offer his arm to Bard.

“Old Girion’s grandson, are you? I remember him well. Great Bowman in his time.”

“Thank you, your majesty.”
“Glad to see Dale’s come to it senses and brought back it’s monarchy. And this is your family?”

“Yes, My eldest Sigrid and then Bain-“

Thror promptly shook hands with Tauriel then Legolas.

“I see they get their height from you. And who else?”

Bard was still horrified at what had just happened but Legolas stepped easily in, gesturing Sigrid and Bain.

“And here are Tauriel, Legolas.”

Thror nodded.

“And Tilda.” Legolas patted her shoulder.

“Welcome welcome! Girion, it’s good to see you again. You haven’t aged a day. Rare among your folk. Looks like old Brur’s going to make the official announcement. Here, stand with my guard Fundin, there.”

Wordless, the group from the Dale moved to stand with Ori. Bard looked as though he wanted to be a thousand miles away Sigrid and Bain were horrified. Tauriel and Legolas were unrepentant and, to Ori’s annoyance, inclined to giggle. Tilda was caught up in the magic of the room.

Brur bellowed out again.

“Their majesties King Dain and Queen Sculdis of the Iron Hills and their son and heir Prince Thorin Stonehelm.”

Dain, his family and Chopper strolled up the aisle and at the edge of the dais Dain strode forward and bowed.

“Great Uncle Thror! “

“Oink,” put in Chopper.

A change swept over the king, as though he suddenly woke, and what he woke to horrified him.

“Oh, Great Mahal, not you again! And that fucking enormous bloody pig! Mahal! Balin, lock up all the larders before Dain and his pigs eat us out of house and home!”

Dain grinned.

“A pleasure, as always, idadel!”

“For whom?” Thror demanded. He turned to Thorin. “Please tell me he isn’t here to stay?”

“He’s not, udadel,” Thorin assure him.

Thror collapsed in relief.

“So, Dain, what is the purpose of your mercifully brief visit?”

“T’ meet me long lost sibling, and t’ present him here at court.”

“Sibling?” Thror’s eyelid twitched. “There are more of you?”
“Just the one more, Idad Thror. May I present Dori of Rikmha?”

Music started from a gallery and Dori appeared at the far end of the aisle. The crowd gasped as Lady Klakuna drew off his veil and again as Mahrdin removed Dori’s cloak. Dori’s mithril hair hung around him in long, shining locks catching the light and he carried a fan of raven feathers all painted with silver and diamonds at the tips.

A thrill shot through the crowd as everyone turned to look. Dori took the white silk cushion Lady Klakuna passed him. On it was the silver flute that would play the music to which the Bearer would dance. Anyone who was any kind of musician readied themselves as the Bearer looked about. Dori nodded to Bofur. Bofur went to him, bowed, and took up the flute. Bombur and Jani came up behind him. Bombur had a small hand drum and Jani held two sticks with tiny silver bells attached to them.

At their fanfare, Dori struck the proper pose and clasped the neckline of the traditional presentation robe and tore it away revealing the robe he, Binni and Mahrdin had designed.

Ori gasped!
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. No food this time but Music! Dollypegs and I hunted through lots of various kinds of dance music with flutes and we decided we liked especially Mr. Remo Fernandes’ “Flute Song”, but feel free to imagine any music you wish to think of Dori dancing to as we don’t know if all of you can reach a link, if we posted it. Believe me, we shall, at some point post an appendix or something, with all the links, hints, and recipes. Do join us again next Friday more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Dori stood barefoot in the perfect starting pose for the ritual dance. Dori’s hair fell loose all about him like a pour of melted mithril. Set on his shoulders was a wide band of white silk shining with diamonds and attached to this falling all about him was a full length robe. The material looked as though it was created of water, it flowed and shimmered about Dori in the torch light and yet left no part of his body to the imagination.

After a brief, regal pause, on the proper beat, he began to dance.

It was such a spectacle as the court had not seen in many a year. All around him Ori heard gasps and whispers.

“What a beauty! Where has Dain been hiding this one?”

“Is that really a Bearer? I remember umad saying only Bearers danced at their presentation.”

“A Bearer of Durin blood! A great omen!”

The music began in earnest. Instead of stately parade, Dori took seven steps to the right, leapt high and spun around to land at the correct spot to assume the proper Pose of Shyness. The pose was perfect, yet somehow Dori rendered it to be not so much a studied posed but as a true Bearer, awash with sudden startled demureness of being brought into a crowd of new people. On the turn of the melody, Dori whirled out of that pose, skipped lightly to the far side of the walkway and executed a daring pirouette, making his robe whirl about him. To Ori, he seemed like a large drop of water.

Ori heard Dwalin choked behind him and glanced to see. Dwalin’s mouth fell open with an audible creak.

“He looks like a bloody great soap bubble with a dick!” he hissed in Ori’s ear.

Dori, arms expressively raised and toe pointed, fell into the Pose of Recognizing a Childhood Friend. This completed, Dori sailed into a number of complicated skips and shimmies that took him back across and scooped himself into the Pose of Saluting Family Members. The flute trilled and, instead of processing further, Dori whirled back the way he’d come, nearly to Brur’s side, turned and came up the walkway at a run. Before he reached the center of the walkway for the next pose, Dori turned three neat handsprings and flipped himself high in the air, spinning while aloft.
A side glance showed Ori that Bard had put his hand over Bain’s and Tilda’s eyes. Ori heard Tilda protest, wanting to see the pretty princess dance. Bain said clearly, “It’s alright Da, I don’t want to look.”

Sigrid mumbled, “I was really looking forward to seeing more of Dori, but this isn’t at all what I had in mind…”

“I don’t think any of us did,” reflected Tauriel.

“I certainly didn’t,” put in Legolas.

Once more the bubble of Dori’s robe surrounded him. He moved forward quickly and flawless into the Pose of Saluting the Great Friends to All Dwarrow, the Ravens. They cawed as one when Dori completed this pose and he skipped off while fanning himself all over.

“What is she… I mean he… I mean, what are they wearing?”

“Not terribly much.”

“… betrothed to Lord Balin, lucky bastard.”

All the while Dori approached the throne, Balin practically glowed with pride.

Thror himself was struck dumb, frozen with his mouth open.

Ori couldn’t hear what Thorin said as the prince leaned toward King Thror, but he read the concern in Thorin’s face.

Dori cavorted up the walkway to stop and glance over either shoulder in the Pose of Invitation before spinning again and capering in another circle, prancing as though to a lively country dance. In the middle of this he stopped as though in fear, but this melted into a gesture of respect as the Pose of Saluting the High King of Dwarrow brought Dori into a graceful bending of knees.

Thror’s jaw worked, but no sound emerged.

When Dori had almost reached the foot of the dais, the old king rose, shaking, white-knuckling the arms of the throne. His face had gone perfectly slack and grey. He moved forward to stand at the center of the dais.

Dori bounced up again to spin a little then skipped easily backward then ran forward and flung himself high in the air twirling and toss up his fan which burst apart. Dori landed with perfect grace almost at Thror’s feet and fell into the Pose of Durin the Deathless’ Vision of the Seven Stars with the glittering feathers floating down to rain about him in the stunned silence.

The crowd held its collective breath.

“Y-you,” Thror croaked in a terrible voice. “You are the Arkenstone! I have been blinded! Blinded by an evil beyond everything! I have failed my people, myself as a king, and Mahal Himself! You, beautiful Bearer, are the True Arkenstone!”

With a choke, Thror fell forward and collapsed onto the dais before Dori, terribly still.

Then everything happened at once.

Balin and Thorin leaned over the king. Oin sprang up the steps far faster than Ori would have believed he could move. Frerin, standing above the Rikanta, shot toward his grandfather and made it all of three steps before a tearing cry split the silence and a great black cloud of ravens led by Roäc fell upon him, pecking him, and smashed him to the floor. Dis and her sons skidded to a stop as they had started forward to intercept Frerin. They stood in shock, staring at the moving mound that buried Frerin under of feathery black mass and cacophony angry cries.

Oin was beside the king in a trice. He leaned over, his hand flitting over the various pulse points and listening for breath.

He shook his head at Balin, and said in a stage whisper, “Deader than a cold forge.”

Balin rose, turned to the crowd and shouted, “The king is dead!”

Dori rose to his feet in complete grace and moved into a series of postures of grief, one right after the other, as if he’d done this every day of his life, before falling into the culminating Pose of Unutterable Agony of Spirit.

Balin raised Thorin from his grandfather’s side, turned him to face the assembled dwarrow and shouted, “Long live the king!”

Dori leapt up into the Pose of Saluting the High King of Dwarrow again as Roäc landed gracefully on Thorin’s shoulder.

They all went down like avalanches after that, Ori thought as he automatically bowed to Thorin.

Dwalin bowed, which meant all the soldiers bowed. Dis and her family bowed, so all the nobles bowed, even the Rikanta, except for Frerin, who was still covered in vicious, violent birds. Bard came to his senses as Legolas touched his arm and both he and the elves promptly bowed to acknowledge the new king.

For a moment Thorin froze, then he slowly exhaled, and when all had straightened again he held out his hand to Fili, who needed a slight prompting from Dis to realize what was expected of him. When he arrived, he knelt at Thorin’s feet. Thorin took off his own crown and placed it on Fili’s head.

“Prince Fili, son of Dis, Durin by blood and my heir.”

Ori shot a look over at Frerin, who was being helped to his feet by the Rikanta but still guarded by the malevolent ravens. The stunned look on his face was not simply the daze of attack, but the realization that he’d been supplanted in the line of succession by Thorin’s decree. By decree of King Thorin II of Erebor.

Dain and Sculdis crossed to the dais and Dwalin nodded to the cadre of the Royal Guards. Dain looked down at Thror and sighed. Sculdis did as well but, putting her arms akimbo, gusted, “Well, fuck a duck.” Chopper nudged her while oinking in ready agreement.

The soldiers quickly fitted their shields together, creating a broad platform and Thorin, Dwalin, Balin, and the other Durins and Dain and his family lifted Thror’s body onto this. The shields were raised high with the royal family surrounding them. Thorin took his place at the front to lead the mourners and the body of the late king to the room of rest where Thror would lie in state until his funeral could be held.

Dori, glowing and panting slightly from his dancing, immediately came to stand behind Thorin as Lady Klakuna scuttled after him, vainly trying to put the bearskin cloak back over him, clucking anxiously that he would ‘take a chill’. Binni was there also, kissing Dori fondly and assuming him he had been fabulous. Ori was horrified to overhear them whisper.
“Did I look alright?” Dori murmured.

“The king died, darling.”

“Hush, you naughty thing!”

“You were a triumph, my love, trust me,” Binni cooed and straightened the cloak as Lady Klakuna brushed fussily at it.

Dwalin took Ori’s hand to walk with him as part of the royal family in their mourning. The room was awash with the whispers of dwarrow amazed, shocked, worried and horrified, yet many more delighted.

At this moment the great entrance gate opened of its own volition. A tall figure in dusty, grey travel robes and a tall pointed hat, strode in and looked about.

“Ah,” said a calm, clear voice, “it seems I have been expected.”

Thorin whirled, glaring, and roared.

“Tharkûn!”
Death, dirges and Tharkûn.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Great Mahal!! There’s a Wizard in Erebor! Whatever shall Ori do? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwararrow time, same dwararrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori stared in shock then horror as everything he had ever read concerning wizards dropped through his thoughts like a fall of boulders. It all came from the novels of Shire where, when wizards appeared, things exploded and people got turned into unnatural forms, or their heads popped off or they had nasty things fall out of their every orifice.

That Thorin shouted in such rage at perhaps the most famous, or infamous, of all wizards in Arda was terrifying.

The wizard raised an eyebrow and moved into the hall. Without thinking, Ori leapt forward and flung himself in front of Thorin.

“No, Great Wizard! You are not to incinerate the king before he’s been king for barely five minutes!”

Strangely enough, his small action galvanized the entire population of Erebor to mirror his reaction. Anything from a roll of paper to the finest steel was drawn and there were shouts of support for the new king.

The wizard turned and regarded Ori. He took his staff, now in both his hands, and leaned on it with a low chuckle.

“Ah, so you’re the one,” said Tharkûn.

“One what? Me?” Ori questioned, startled. “What have I done? I didn’t do it…I mean yes, I did it! It’s all my fault and nothing to do with Thorin!”

Ori found himself pushed aside by Nori, who puffed himself up.

“Th’ lad’s right. Thorin didn’t do nuffin’! I did it.”

“No, you didn’t! I did!” Ori insisted.

“Hush up, banty-cock. Every’un knows I’m th’ trouble-maker.”

“Shut up, Nori. You had nothing to do with it! Everyone knows that! I did it.”

“Yer full o’ it! I did it and that, th’ wizard kin tie to!”

“You’re overflowing with it, Nori! I’m the one who does weird things around here!”

Dori put a powerful hand on each of their shoulders, holding them still and silencing them.
“Why, Master Tharkûn.” Dori’s smile was winsome and his eyes full of amusement. “How lovely for you to visit to celebrate with us. Unfortunately, it has proved too much for the dear late King Thror’s health. Thus you find us quite despondent.”

Ori glanced over at Dwalin, who instead of being afraid was at ease to the point of disinterest. Dis looked amused and Fili and Kili just curious. Perhaps the Durins had better knowledge of wizards than Ori did.

“Ah.” Tharkûn looked at the late king’s body on the shields and nodded. He turned to Dis with a bow.

“My condolences, ma’am.”

Dis made an slight curtsy and Dori continued politely.

“Indeed, Master Tharkûn, we were about to gather in the main hall for a little refreshment. If you would be so kind as to remain here for a short time, we are just going to pop our late grandsire down in the Room of Rest.”

There was a shrill cry from T’dilla that someone needed to help Frerin before he bled to death.

Dori turned and, regarding Frerin as though he had never seen him before, “Dear me! We appear to have wounded. Cousin Oin, perhaps he could be tended?”

“Aye,” Oin grunted and shouted across the hall to a knot of his assistants. “Oi! You lot! Get this one an’ bung him up in the infirmary. Clean an’ tape ‘im up.”

They were immediately at Frerin’s side, taking hold of him as though they were a cadre of Dwalin’s trained guards. They began to escort him away under the prince’s loud protests and Oin barked a final order.

“An’ tape ‘is mouth while yer at it.”

Ori felt a mad desire to laugh, but Dori was in full host mode and readying the group at the base of the dais to carry the late king out.

“If you would kindly excuse us, Tharkûn.” Thorin’s tone was now bland.

“Yes, yes, of course.” The wizard was now surrounded by ravens and had somehow produced treats from one of his robe’s capricious pockets.

Thorin led the way down from the dais, dwarrow moved aside and bowed as they passed. Nothing was said, neither in praise nor in sorrow, only silence. This unnerved Ori and made him wonder what the funeral would bring.

Once through the royal entry way they had a long trip towards a grand door which was opened. They marched along a very long dark hallway until a guard hurried ahead and went to another set of doors. They passed through these and entered an ante-room. This room was empty and at the other end was a set of grey velvet curtains set against a wall. Two guards parted these to reveal a large stone door, incised on this were ancient Khuzdul runes reading “Death”.

Behind him, Ori heard Kili and Fili muttering.

“So,” Kili pondered. “This is death’s door. I did wonder what was meant when people said they had heard someone was at it. Now I know.”

“Yes,” Fili replied, dryly. “Covered by death’s curtain.”

“Hush,” admonished Dis.

Ori glanced around to catch Dwalin rolling his eyes at Thorin, who’s lips were pinched together as though suppressing either anger or laughter. Ori suspected it was the latter.

The two guards opened Death’s Door and inside was an even smaller room. They all filed in. This room was suddenly remarkably crowded. The walls were tiled in slate and the grout holding them was silver. The rune of Mahal’s name was written in silver on all the walls and the ceiling and floor.

Dwalin open a tiny cupboard beside the door and pull a lever. Ori realized they were in a contraption like the little one Dwalin had used to transport them to the forges. This ride took much longer and was slower. Ori felt they had gone deeper than the forges here. Finally, there was a slight bump and the guards opened the doors again.

They entered a huge cavern. Ori thought it was at least half the size of the inside of the mountain, though this was not anything like the great city carved by hand. This was a naturally formed cavern. Enormous stalactites and stalagmites hung and rose all about them. All was bare rock except for streaks of phosphorus glowing here and there.

They walked along a path that opened out into a vast, deep canyon. It was completely dark and, to Ori, it seemed bottomless. In the middle, rose a single round plinth. Flat on the top, the surface was large enough to host a lively dance party. On it sat a single block of black obsidian. They crossed the chasm by a steel bridge toward the block.

The guards moved aside and Thorin and the other Durins carefully laid Thror’s body upon the block. He was, fortunately, perfectly dressed for the occasion. Thorin drew the king’s sword, called Warg Cutter, and Dis and Fili and Kili helped him to lay it along the king’s body and move his arms up so that he clasped it. The Durins drew back.

Dori went forward with Binni and removed a tiny cover at the corner of the block. Gloin had a tinder box ready. The flame burst up immediately. Then, in turn, all along the edges of the block, light danced to surround the late king in a frame of small blue flames.

They all stood around the king’s resting place. Balin chanted the prayer of first mourning. Oin hissed in a stage whisper that someone was now supposed to sing the king’s favorite song. Balin winced and Thorin closed his eyes as though in pain. Dwalin snorted a little.

“Fine,” Thorin sighed. “Who wants to do the honors? Dain, you’ve the voice for it.”

“Don’t know what he liked, cous.” Dain lied, grinning like a warg.

Thorin growled then sighed again, stepped to his late grandfather’s head and took a breath, then his deep tenor rolled lushly over them as he sang.

“There’s an inn, there’s an inn, There’s a merry old inn-“

Ori was very glad he was not the only one to give an involuntary choke of laughter at the ridiculous old pub ditty. Soon everyone joined in the singing and clapped and stamped their feet.

At the close of the song, they all bowed to the late king’s body and filed back across the steel bridge, back to the lifting device.

The door closed on them once more and Ori felt them rising.

“Well, that was somewhat bizarre,” Dis commented.

“It was his favorite,” Thorin shrugged. “Don’t worry. All the appropriate dirges will be sung at the funeral ceremony.”

“That’s why there’s always a private one first, laddie,” Balin comforted. “I don’t know about the lot a’ yeh, but I’m a bit peckish. Are yeh, m’dear?” turning to Dori.

“Mahal, I’m so hungry!” Dori approved. “The thought of that feast waiting is positively making my poor tummy rumble.”

“I could eat,” Dwalin observed. “Love?”

Ori swallowed. “What about Tharkûn?”

“What about him?” Thorin replied with raised brows.

“Is he going to kill us or make the mountain explode? That’s all I know about wizards!”

Thorin shook his head.

“I’ve known him all my life. He’s been popping in and out of Erebor since the beginning, and before that in Khazad-dûm. He was probably loafing in Mahal’s forge the day Durin was made.”

“So, he hasn’t exploded or imploded anything yet?”

“If he didn’t do it when udad was king, he’s not going to do it.”

“But, he says I’m the one. One what?”

Thorin and Dwalin exchanged looks. Dwalin scowled and put his arms around Ori.

“He’s no’ allowed t’ do tha’ t’ me husband,” said Dwalin. “He’s always dropping’ a box o’ hammers on yeh, then disappearin’ before explainin’.”

Dori said, “That’s right. No dessert for him until he explains himself.”

“No idle threat,” said Balin. “It’s trifle with blackberries an’ brandy. Tharkûn never could resist it.”

Ori looked around him, realizing two very different things at once. The first thing was that he was surrounded by people who loved him, the second thing was that he was thicker than a warg skull. Of course, Tharkûn wasn’t going to hurt Thorin.

He looked up at Dwalin.

“I’m an idiot,” he stated.

“Wha? Yer no’ such thin’.”

“I thought Tharkûn was going to roast Thorin with apples, eat him with new potatoes and wash him down with a glass of rum.”
Dwalin grinned.

"Yer just fine, love. How many wizards’ve yeh met? Wish we’d had warnin’, but Tharkûn don’t give yeh those. Likes t’ make an entrance. We’re just used t’ him is all. Yeh fit in with us so well, we forget yeh didn’t grow up with th’ family.” He leaned down and whispered. “An’ yeh fit in with me so well, sometimes I can’ think straight.”

Ori giggled.

Dwalin kissed him.

“Love, promise me this. Next time yeh think Thorin’s in danger, let me be th’ one who jumps in front o’ him. It’s me job, remember?”

“I don’t know if I can promise you that,” said Ori, honestly. “I didn’t plan it, I just did it.”

Thorin looked over at him.

“It was very brave of you, Ori, but Dwalin is right. If you put him out of a job, he’ll be home all day getting in Dori’s way. You think wizards are dangerous!”

Ori laughed, a little self-conscious, but a genuine laugh all the same.

Before he thought of it, he patted Thorin’s arm, as he’d seen Dori do so often when giving comfort.

“I’m sorry about your udad, Thorin.”

“Thank you, Ori. I have to admit, it was a very Durin way to go.”

The lift reached the level of the throne room and the door slid open. Thorin and Balin walked side by side, speaking with quiet urgency.

“You sent the raven to make the arrangements we always talked about?” Thorin asked him.

Balin gave him the most evil smile Ori had ever seen.

“Aye, this’ll put some sparks up their tunics.”

“Or cause a riot,” said Thorin.

“No, these’re dwarrow o’ quality,” said Balin. “They’ll save th’ riot fer Thror’s funeral.”

And so Ori found himself sitting with Dori on one side of him and an empty seat for Dwalin on the other, at the king’s own banquet table. Dwalin stood behind and to the side of Thorin’s chair, leaned on Grasper and looked terrifying every time one of Thror’s cronies entered and approached the table to speak to the new king. Each dwarf or dam had started the day assuming that they would be sitting at this table come feast time and was silently reminded that their time was up.

Balin sat in his customary place to Thorin’s left, smiling benevolently at each of them in turn.

First came Lord Zark and his family. After making his obeisance to Thorin, Zark turned to the room. The vast banquet hall was usually ringed in tables, each traditionally seating the family of one of the nobles at the king’s table. It took a small army to do it, but today the room had been swiftly rearranged so as to be unrecognizable to these highborn people. The center, usually left open for after dinner entertainment, was now filled with long tables and benches and dwarrow of every station.

“Where is my table?” Lord Zark inquired.

“Oh, yeh kin jus’ sit anywhere, milord,” said a dwarf in an apron, who was sliding a huge tray of mugs and jugs of ale onto the table.

“I can’t sit ‘just anywhere’!” Zark protested. “Do you know who I am?”

The dwarrow already at the table, many of whom had been in the zinc mine, whooped and bellowed with laughter, startling the lord and causing his lady to draw her son closer to her side as if to protect him, despite he was old enough to tower over her.

An elderly dam seated close by, cackled and shouted.

“Great Mahal! Poor thins fergotten who he is!” She took hold of Zark’s belt and yanked him bodily onto the bench beside her. “Siddown, yer lordship. Let’s pour yeh a drink.”

Now sitting, but facing the wrong way, Zark gingerly turned toward the table. Lor, son of Tor, sitting on his other side, slid down a bit to allow room for the lady and her son. Zark’s older dwarfling, a well-grown dam, shrugged and sat in an open space nearby next to a grizzled old veteran and those two dams were soon trading tips on knife sharpening.

The same scene happened over and over again as Ori watched, and though some nobles took this change better than others, none refused to sit. These were dwarrow, after all. Who would refuse a meal?

“What are we doing here?” Ori asked Dori, who sat to Balin’s left. “This table’s reserved for the king’s family and close councillors.”

“So it is, pet,” said Dori.

Fili sat at Thorin’s other side, Dis beside her eldest, separating him from Kili by a chair. She’d been doing this since they were badgers and many a noble lady had commented rapturously on how sweet that was, Dis flanked by her sons. Dis had admitted to Ori that she started sitting there because separating them was the only way she could enjoy at least a little of the meal before the food began to fly. She continued to do so for the same reason.

Dain, Sculdis, Lady Klakuna and Stonehelm sat to the side of Kili, and Chopper sat at Dain’s feet, privileged to eat before even the king was served, his snout buried deep in a large basin of maple syrup glazed yams.

Bard, the Bardlings and the elves sat at the side table to the king’s right. Gimli had insinuated himself between Tauriel and Legolas, abandoning his seat between his parents at the table across, to his mother’s amusement. Gridr and Gloin sat at that side table with the Ur, who looked as puzzled as Ori felt, but were not averse to being fed under any circumstance, and with Oin and Binni.

“I’m afraid I’m not dressed for dinner,” Tharkûn commented as he removed his hat.

“Yeh never are,” Gloin said jovially as he lowered the section of stone on which Gimli’s abandoned chair sat. As the stone tile moved downward, a smaller section of stone just in front of the chair sank independently a further two feet, allowing Tharkûn to sit comfortably with his feet on the floor. The dwarrow had done the same for the chairs of the men and elves, so that everyone was more or less at eye level with their host.

“Very kind of you, Master Gloin,” said Tharkûn.

“Aye, can’t have yeh sittin’ here wi’ yer knees about yer ears.”

“At my age, if I were to bend myself into such a configuration I would never escape it. King Roäc could use me as a perch.”

Roäc, on the back of Thorin’s chair, cawed out a laugh and a gargoyle of sounds that caused Tharkûn to lift his brows.

“Really, Roäc! There are dwarflings present!”

Ori’s vision went fuzzy and the noises in the room grew distant. Tharkûn was bantering with Roäc when abruptly the wizard’s features changed. The old man was gone and in its place a being of pure silver light, the great, almond-shaped eyes the only feature.

Ori shook his head to clear it and Tharkûn was just as he had ever been as far as Ori knew.

A murmur of excitement grew as doors around the room opened and the food was carried in with great ceremony.

Dwalin opened the door behind the king’s table and a long line of bowls, platters, and plates began a seemingly endless march before Ori’s eyes.

Legolas had sent to Mirkwood for fresh venison and a haunch of moose. The venison was roasted, sliced and served unadorned. The moose had been marinated with juniper to tenderize it before cooking and it arrived with a compote of blueberry preserves.

Great wedges of potatoes smashed with garlic and cream stood out over their plates like cliffs above the sea.

Chicken and apple sausages, shot through with rosemary, sat on a bed of caramelized onions along with sausages of turkey, cranberries and bay.

Rolls of heavy, dark bread and crocks of sweet butter reached the tables accompanied by sliced hardboiled eggs, and then the oddest thing Ori had ever seen on any dining table. Smaller glass crocks and flasks of water sat in a much larger bowl filled with crushed ice, and in each glass crock, a differently colored pearlescent mound of grains.

Dwalin had taken his seat by this time, Furh’nk having relieved him at loom-and-scowl duty.

“What is this?” Ori asked, indicating the grains.

“Tharkûn brought it. Don’t know how he got it here without it spoilin’. Must have ice in his pockets.”

“It’s food?”

“Aye, fish eggs from the western sea, to eat with th’ bread an’ butter.”

“Fish eggs?” Ori was aghast, and slightly revolted. “They’re so tiny! How do you peel them?”

“They’re small enough yeh don’ have t’ even bite into them, but if yeh do, they pop like pomegranate pips.”
“I’ve read about those,” said Ori. “What do they taste like?”

“No’ like fish eggs. Here, try this.”

Ori would rather pin his mouth shut with his own boot dagger than try it, but he sat here in the company of the king and when he looked around he realized several nobles who had approached Thorin earlier were now smirking up at him knowingly.

Bastards.

“Tell me what to do,” Ori murmured to Dwalin.

It wasn’t nearly as bad as he had feared. When the eggs burst in his mouth, he mostly tasted brine.

Thirsty, he grabbed a flask of the clear liquid and drank it down in a gulp.

The minute it hit his tongue, he realized this wasn’t water.

It burned all the way down and hit the pit of his stomach like an ember in a quench bucket, throwing off steam.

“Shit!” he hissed though clenched teeth, refusing to cough or even grimace. “What is that?”

Dwalin sighed.

“Tha’s potato liquor, an’ I shoulda warned yeh, but yeh moved too fast.”

“It tastes like ink solvent”

“Drink a lot o’ ink solvent, d’yeh?”

“You know what I mean!”

“Aye, it goes with the fish eggs an’ bread. Now yeh’ve had th’ whole set.”

“And I never have to have it again,” said Ori.

He stuffed a chunk of bread and butter into his mouth, the better to stave off the acrid taste on his tongue.

“Psst! Psst! Ori!”

That was Nori’s voice, but Ori couldn’t pinpoint him.

“Where are you?”

“In the space under yer chair platform, so don’t lower it!”

“What? Why are you down there?”

“Pass us down some ale, would yeh?”

“You’re on duty!”

“Aye, and it’s thirsty work.”
“How are you supposed to drink it?”

A narrow straw poked up from the gap between the stone tiles.

“Oh, Mahal’s blessed arse, are you serious?”

Nori started whimpering and whining loudly, like a pup.

“Ahem,” said Dori.

Abruptly the noises stopped and the straw whipped out of sight.

Dori sighed.

“I suppose we should admire his inventiveness, and be thankful there are no cloths on these tables. It’s impossible for him to fiddle with Bofur in plain view.”

Bofur squawked and jumped in his chair.

“Nearly impossible,” Dori corrected.

The vast banquet room had been carved out long ago with the acoustics of performers in mind, and so that anyone in the room could be heard by the king without shouting. Of course, the dwarf shouted anyway, but it wasn’t strictly necessary. Because of this, Ori was privy to snippets of talk throughout the room. With food and decent ale, people who never thought to sit in the same room, never mind side by side, slowly drifted into conversation. At a table nearby, Ori saw two miner lasses admiring Lord Zark’s daughter:

“She’s a pretty thing. Bit above my station, eh?”

“Her scullery maid’s above yer station, Miris. Dream on.”

“Ooo, she’s lookin’ this way. Did she just wink at me?”

“Must’ve, look at that scowl on her amad’s face.”

On the other side, Ori heard Sculdís say to Lady Klakuna:

“So I said to Dain, ‘It’s time he slept in his own bed. He’s old enough and that’s why he has a nightlight.’ An’ Dain, the big soggy lump says, ‘Suppose he has a nightmare? It’s no’ like he’s go’ thumbs t’ turn the’ doorknob an’ come get us.’”

Lady Klakuna, who was about six flagons of ale ahead of Sculdís, clicked her tongue and cried, “Fuck me! You’re fuckin’ talkin’ about that bloody fucking pig! I thought you were fuckin’ talking about your son!”

“He’s like a son to Dain. Takes after ‘im, too.”

Not too far away, toward one of the large braziers, Ori noticed that Tharkûn had plunked himself down on a bench and was surrounded by small badgers as he performed the time honored ‘rabbit from a handkerchief’ trick that Nori used to show Ori at that age. Some ravens had fluttered down to perch on him and watch as well. Tharkûn produced a handkerchief and flapped it to display it was nothing more than such. With great deliberation and slowness he made several intricate folds, tied a knot in it and displayed a comical ‘bunny’ with a rather long tail. He patted it while the little ones leaned in to admire and with the slightest movements of his hands Tharkûn made the ‘bunny’ look as though it was wriggling about. One badger stretched out a hand and tried to pat bunny. With a simple flick of the long old fingers bunny leapt to Tharkûn’s shoulder. The badgers squealed with laughter and the ravens looked at him askance.

“Careful now, little ones. You startled him,” crowed Tharkûn. He replaced bunny in his hand. Another then another badger reached in to pat bunny. Sometimes bunny stayed still and waggled a little, other times bunny took flying leaps, sometimes landing on Tharkûn’s hat, other times on some badger’s head.

Ori’s eyes were caught by a sudden movement at the table with Bard, his Bardlings and the elves. Tilda was now standing on her chair and looking down at the table, her eyes like saucers. Bain had pushed his chair away from the table and Bard and Sigrid both looked a little worried. On the table before them was Rutile. Being as Ori had heard that Rutile was of a maternal nature, he supposed that Rutile had come to check on the Bardlings.

“That’s the biggest spider I’ve ever seen, da.” Bain sounded concerned.

“Is it going to eat us?” Tilda asked.

Tauriel looked over from Bard’s left and said,

“Oh, that’s Rutile. She belongs to Princess Dis. She acts as a messenger, like the ravens. Kili says she’s very motherly, so she must have come to see you.”

Tauriel’s eyes glinted at Tilda. Tilda leaned over then sat back down in her chair. Bain returned his chair halfway to the table. Bard looked at Legolas, shrugged and went back to his meal.

Tilda was studying Rutile intently as the spider stood before her. Rutile raised a leg and waved it at the child. Tilda’s eyes got big again and she giggled. A passing servant saw the spider and put a small shallow bowl of water on the table for Rutile.

Rutile waved two legs in thanks. She looked back at Tilda, jumped straight up in the air and landed in the center of the dish of water. Tilda squeaked. Rutile then danced around, spinning in the dish, minuscule drops of water showered all about. Tilda squealed with joy and clapped her hands.

“Tauriel! Look! What’s it doing?”

Tauriel gave the spider a look. Rutile waved at the elf captain.

“Offhand,” Tauriel said. “I’d say she was showing off.”

“Can I pet her?”

“May I,” Bard and Sigrid chorused. Tilda huffed.

“ May I pet her?”
“Be very gentle, she is a spider,” Tauriel warned. “Don’t be surprised if she shies away.”

Tilda gamely put out a hand. Rutile hopped out of the water and hurried to the outstretched fingers. She bumped her head into them and then with four legs caressed the ends of Tilda’s fingers making her giggle and shout that it tickled. Bain put his hand flat on the table. In a trice, Rutile was on it and running straight up his arm to sit on the top of his head.

“Da!” Bain raised excited eyes, “Da, may we have a spider?”

“No!” replied both Bard and Sigrid loudly.

And as the ale began to flow even more freely, tongues loosened until the dwarrow reached that point between pleasantly drunk and barroom brawl. The dwarrow with younger badgers withdrew and Ori heard the old dam say to Lord Zark:

“Oh, aye, old Thror was a rotten bastard toward th’ end, may Mahal rest his soul. I heard him talkin’ t’ th’ young princes once, while I was scrubbin’ th’ floor in the ante-chamber. Made me so mad I wanted t’ jump up an’ feed him my scrub brush, only me knee’s so bad now, y’know.”

“Very kind-hearted of you, dear lady, to want to take the princes’ part that way. You have a beautiful soul to go with a pretty face.”

“Yer lordship’s a flirt and a cad.”

“Who would have thought?”

They were both giggling by this time and given that Lord Zark’s wife was right there, Ori thought there was trouble on the horizon, but the lady had engaged Master Tin across the table and that talk had crossed the line beyond flirty. Lord Zark’s son, who had to be forty if he was a day, had crawled under the table and showed every sign of being asleep.

Dain and Brur who had been doing a friendly circuit of the room, Chopper trotting after them, had obviously been having a few drinks with said friends, Ori noticed. The two large dwarf males sat heavily down on the top of the three steps that raised the king’s tale before the hall. Dain waved to a servant, who grinning, stopped to refill their tankards. Chopper push between the two and snorted loudly. Dain immediately turned, put his arm around the pig, and, lifting his tankard as Chopper raised his head, Dain poured the contents into Chopper’s open mouth and the pig chugged happily. Sculdis was on her feet, shouting.

“Dain. Don’t yeh dare go makin’ tha’ pig drunk again! Las’ time yeh did tha’, he ate me best pair a’ indoor shoes an’ a sack o’ turnips!” Dain looking wonderingly at her then looked at Brur. Brur shrugged and amicably put his arm around Chopper. His voice began to rumble and Dain joined in a drunken dirge with Chopper helping.

On this day o’ days,

When I harken t’ Mahal, [oink, oink]
Raise yer cup, say farewell,
'Til we meet within His halls. [oink, oink]

On this day o’ days,
I will scratch my fuzzy balls, [oink, oink]
An’ yeh can kiss me arse,
Fer I’ll be drinkin’ with Mahal! [oink, oink, oink]

At the head tables Fili had traded with Kili to sit with Sigrid, who was looking annoyed.

Sigrid said, “Inger Jansdaughter told me I should eat nothing but water and hard biscuits.”

“Sigrid!” Fili cried, aghast. “Why would you do that?”

“She said I was too fleshy to be a princess and needed to reduce.”

“Reduce to what? All of you is perfect the way you are.”

“Flatterer.”

“It’s true. Sigrid, you’d be perfect if you had three heads and a horn.”

“Don’t talk about horns. Nori will hear and then he’ll sing. I heard about that.”

Fili winced. “Good point. Wait a moment. That woman, that Inger, she’s the daughter of Calmar’s lawyer.”

“Aye, that’s her.”

“She has no business speaking of your appearance or anyone’s. She looks like a skeleton and she can barely walk without winding herself. Amad, Inger Jansdaughter told Sigrid she was too fleshy.”

“It’s not Inger’s business speaking of anyone’s appearance,” said Dis.

“Apparently she tells people it’s all due to eating nothing but water and hard biscuits.”

“If she does that, then she’s a fool. It’s one thing to be that slim naturally, but to suffer for it? She’s fully of age and she looks like a little boy in a nightgown.”

Then the tables were cleared off and more plates and spoons arrived. Dessert made its appearance to hearty cheers. Huge glass bowls of trifle, the chunks of cake, covered in blackberry jam soaked with blackberry brandy piled around the bottom then covered in more blackberries, topped with more cake, jam and brandy until the layers came to the rims of the bowls and the tops were heavy with sweetened, whipped cream.
Ori heard Master Tin said to Lord Rikut:

“Here, have some o’ this trifle. It’ll sweeten yer disposition. Naw, better have more than that.”

Both roared with laughter and toasted each other.

“Ah,” said Tharkûn returning to the table. “Trifle!”

“None for you, I’m afraid, Master Tharkûn,” said Dori, rising and wrapping the bear skin around himself with great dignity. “Not until you’ve come back to Fundin House with us and explained yourself to my poor Ori.”

Ori, who had been rather mellow and looking forward to the trifle, sat up abruptly.

Tharkûn peered at Dori from under his bushy brows.

“You’ve an iron core under all that beauty, Bearer.”

“Master Tharkûn, you don’t know the half. Shall we?”

Tharkûn rose and popped his hat back on, while the rest of the royal family was also preparing to leave.

As one, the entire population rose from their seats out of respect. Thorin was briefly startled, but calmly bowed to his people and bade them all a good rest and to not allow the absence of the Presence to put a damper on their banquet. He turned with a benign smile on them and, taking his sister on his arm, led them out. Several ravens fluttered after them.

Thorin nodded to the head server and only said “Princess protocol, Hijli.”

Hiljli nodded, fighting a grin.

“That’s Durin protocol,” Dis snapped with a filthy look at her brother. Ori filed this away to ask about later.

The Urs, the Sons of Groin, Bard, his children and the elves followed. Ori noticed that Dain and Sculdís walked with Stonehelm, who had given his arm to Lady Klakuna. Chopper snorted happily and brought up the rear, tail high.
Prophecies, Passages, and a Bad Thing in a Box

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Well, things are just getting strange now that the wizard is here. What will Ori do? And whatever will Chopper think? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori sighed with relief as they all once more came in and gathered in the sitting room of Fundin house. Dori murmured to Binni and turned to his guests.

“You must excuse me a few moments. This dancing robe is lovely to wear, so light and freeing, but a trifle chilly.”

This brought laughter. Binni, Dain, Sculdis, and Lady Klakuna went into the kitchen. Gimli went to the fireplace with the princes, crown princess, Stonehelm, Bain, Omi, Loli, and Buj following. Tauriel and Legolas gamely joining the younger dwarrow.

Throin, Tharkûn, Balin and Bard seated themselves at the large table at the other end of the room. Bard held Tilda in his lap. She was fast asleep. Oin came to Bard’s side, muttered something and took the exhausted child over to the corner, where Chopper had decided to nap. Gloin put a cushion on the floor and, after his brother laid Tilda down, unfolded a blanket to cover her. Chopper woke briefly, looked his charge over, settled closer around her and closed his eyes with a contented sigh.

Ori ran back to the bedroom and checked on the kittens. They were asleep but promptly woke as he came in. He carefully lifted their basket and brought it through to the kitchen. Dwalin was there and warming some goat’s milk off to the side as the others bustled about getting a light supper ready. Ori and Dwalin fed the kittens and brought the basket with them through to the sitting room. The younger set by the fire immediately helped to occupy the furballs.

Dori came back in, all smiles, dressed in his everyday breeches, house shoes, and an old tunic of Balin’s. He went to the kitchen but Binni came out with the largest teapot Ori had ever seen. Dain and Sculdis brought a tray each of food stuffs and Lady Klakuna bore a large tray of cups, saucers, and plates.

“No,” said Dori, pouring Tharkûn out a cup, which looked tiny in his long, narrow hands, “what is all this about my Ori?”

Tharkûn sighed.

“If I must speak plainly, and though it pains me greatly-”

Thorin snorted.

“It’s obviously against the wizards’ code.”

“Yes, well, be that as it may, I received a visit from a raven, who shall remain nameless.”
Tharkûn looked directly at Roäc, who was making a great show of preening just then from his perch on the back of Thorin’s chair. “He said there was a dwarf here who had read the fire runes.”

“But any dwarf can read those,” said Ori, nuzzling Powder, who was lying like a baby in his arms. “Can’t they?”

From the looks on the faces surrounding him, he thought not. Ori turned to Dwalin, as Powder batted playfully at his beard beads.

“You never said anything.”

“Didn’t want t’ scare yeh, love. Though’ it might be a one time thin’.”

“You were terribly calm about it,” Ori noted.

“I was quakin’ in me boots, love, but panic wouldn’t’ve done yeh any good. I didn’t think on it much ’til Thror called Dori th’ true arkenstone.”

Dwalin removed Powder who had got one of her tiny claws firmly latched into Ori’s beard.

“I’d dearly love to know what that was about,” said Dori “What is the arkenstone?”

Kili, who was lying on the floor, teasing Nori-pori, piped up, “That’s the ghivashel, the treasure of treasures we’re supposed to find to secure our prosperity for a million years or some such.”

Fili added, “Great as far as it goes, but whoever possesses it eventually goes mad.”

“Well, I am good,” said Dori, “but I’m not that good.”

“The arkenstone is just a story,” said Thorin. “Udad was mad on his own merit. It runs in the blood.”

“What if it’s not just a story?” Ori replied, cuddling Powder and Mask in his lap. “What if Thror found it and it just made his madness worse? The treasure of all treasures makes treasure, doesn’t it?”

“An’ th’ gold an’ such in th’ treasury seemed t’ grow while yeh watched,” Dwalin recalled. “Love, d’yeh remember wha’ yeh said in the forge? Wha’ yeh read from th’ runes? I wrote it down f’r yeh.”

Ori gave Dwalin the kittens and went through his pockets until he came up with the small bound book filled with Dwalin’s painstakingly even writing, all in graphite pen. He didn’t have to skim very far to read And so they dug the depths of the arkenstone.

“Oh,” he said, rather shaken, since it seemed he’d unwittingly augured a prophecy.

Tharkûn winked at him.

“Yes, you are one with a talent, young master.”

Ori felt himself pale and was glad of Dwalin sitting behind him.

“I don’t understand,” he said. “I’ve never done anything like this. Have I, Dori?”

“No, pet. You’ve always been quite of-this-world. Adorable, of course, but quite of-this-world.”
Ori rolled his eyes as snickers filled the room. Mask and Powder tumbled down and went to see what Nori-pori was doing.

Ori turned to face Tharkûn.

“You seem to know more than you’re saying,” he accused. “Where did this come from? Are you responsible?”

“No, not this time, anyway. I suspect it may have something to do with your brother Dori coming into his own. Is that not how it works, Master Binni?”

“It is, yes. Oin wasn’t much for prophecy before he met me, but now he reads the signs quite well. I think it’s just the magic of the Bearer overflowing.”

Nori shot Dori a look.

“Yeh overflow on me an’ I’ll slug yeh.”

Ori was comforted a little. If it came from Dori, that wasn’t so bad. He didn’t think anything from Dori could hurt him. Ori turned his mind back to the problem at hand.

“But, that means the arkenstone is still down in the treasury. We can’t just leave it there.”

“It could take a lifetime to find it,” said Thorin, “and then only if we know what it looks like.”

“I know what it looks like,” said Ori. “I’ve seen it. I think that’s what made me sick.”

Tharkûn chuckled and muttered to himself about vomit and treasure.

“Ori, you are not going down into the treasury,” said Dori.

“I don’t have a choice, Dori. I know what it looks like.”

“But not alone,” Dori pleaded.

“Aye,” said Dwalin, pulling Ori back to sit on his knee. “Our Dori’s no’ th’ only one who don’t like yeh goin’ in th’ treasury alone.”

A call like a saw through lead echoed around them. Garnet landed on Dwalin’s shoulder. She pecked at Dwalin’s torn ear and croaked at him in the raven language. She preened the edge of his beard and grumbled and scraped and laughed at him.

“Garnet says she’ll help yeh,” said Dwalin. “She an’ some o’ her brood. If yer certain, love.”

Of course, he wasn’t certain. He was frightened and already queasy, but a sick stomach didn’t give him leave not do what amounted to the will of Mahal.

“I need to do it right now,” said Ori. “I don’t want time to think about it.”

Thorin turned to Tharkûn.

“Are you coming with us?”

“No, no. There’s something else I must currently tend to, so I’ll just pop back to the party and make sure all’s going well and you’re not running out of wine or such like.”
The old man grinned and tapped his finger alongside his nose and went off, chuckling.

Nori shook his head and pronounced.

“Nutter.”

“But not a fool,” said Dori. “That’s where the trifle is.”

Ori hurried to the bedroom and Dwalin helped him don old clothes. They came out of the bedroom meeting Balin and Dori, Dori was yawning. He paused to hug Ori affectionately.

“Do be careful my pet. Mahal, I’m exhausted. Have a care to my badger, deary.”

“No’ t’ worry, our Dori. I’ll keep ‘im close.”

Balin patted Ori’s shoulder and thumped foreheads with Dwalin.

Ori and Dwalin returned to the sitting room, hand in hand, where Thorin and Furh’nk were waiting to take him to the treasury. The younger set on the rug called promises of ‘kitten-sitting’. Lady Klakuna was on the sofa resting her eyes. Bard remained at the table with Dîs, Dain and Sculdís, the Urs, and the Older Sons of Groin. Both Tilda and Chopper were still completely unconscious. Thorin and Furh’nk led the way out to the courtyard where Mahrdnin and Binni had saddled up Honda, Harley, Thorin’s pony, Minty, whom Furh’nk addressed as the Queen of All Ponies, and Furh’nk’s pony, Suzuki.

Soon the four of them were riding down the eerily empty streets of the city as all the population, though technically in mourning now, was still in the great hall drinking. In the vague distance, Ori could occasionally hear shouts. Here even the streetlamp covers were partially closed, dimmed. It might have been any of those nights Ori tried to slip his inebriated brother home through a sleeping Dale.

They gained the treasury level and threaded a maze of narrow streets lined with archers’ slots. The looming stonewalls and tall buildings felt artificial and cold, lacking the age-old vibration of carved stone everywhere else under the mountain.

Dwalin leaned in to whisper, “All this’s new in th’ past five years. This street used t’ be twen’y feet across.”

Ori shivered. He felt many eyes upon them. Even though he was with the king and Dwalin’s uniform and distinct features granted them passage, still Ori could not say it felt like safe passage.

Thorin turned to Dwalin.

“Why are there still soldiers on duty here?”

“They mustn’t’ve got an order t’ do anythin’ else.” Dwalin rode Harley to a stop and stood on the stirrups to shout. “A’right, yeh lot, stand down. There’s food an’ drink in th’ great hall fer yeh. Yeh kin report t’ th’ office tamarrah at the usual time.”

They were too professional to whoop and holler, but they cleared their posts with amazing speed.

The party pulled to a halt at a grand, windowless facade clad entirely in gold. Furh’nk guarded the ponies while the rest walked up the steps and approached two stone-faced guards. Dwalin dismissed them and the three comrades entered yet another maze, this time of narrow corridors with more archers’ slots, though the archers had gotten the word to leave their posts.
Two more royal guards, nearly identical to the first sentries, stood one on either side of a pair of enormous golden doors. A smaller access door set into the bottom of the left door.

“You are dismissed,” said Thorin to the guards. “Please join your fellows in the great hall with my compliments.”

Ori could have sworn he saw flickers of amazement and a little fear, though they obeyed Thorin readily.

“Yes, er, yer majesty,” said the elder as they bowed and took their leave.

Thorin drew the diamond-coated key from the folds of his tunic and threaded it through the keyhole, nearly invisible in the doorjamb. He turned the key to the right a quarter turn. The access door swung inward. Another quarter turn and a transom above the door fell open on huge chains. All at once Ori heard the ravens on the other side and saw that the room was already fully lit.

Ori looked over at Thorin in amazement.

“Udad ordered the lanterns lit at every hour of the day and night,” Thorin explained. “There’s a fuel reservoir, so no one else had to enter to tend them.”

Thorin himself had not looked into the room.

“Listen, Ori, “ Thorin said. “When you find it, put it in this and Roâc will fly it out and get rid of it.”

He handed Ori a plain cotton sack the size of his head. It had a draw string that had several knots in it, for the ease of a raven carrying it.

Ori felt Dwalin’s hand moving in slow circles over his back.

“Yeh don’t have t’do this, yeh know.”

“No one will think ill of you if you can’t,” Thorin added.

“I can do this,” said Ori.

He walked through the doorway and heard the access door click shut behind him and it was just he and more ravens than he could count on opposite shores of a sea of gold.

The room looked different from down here, the piles of gold mountainous, threatening. For just a moment, he shrank in despair, his mind full of ‘what ifs’, then he forced himself to straighten up and look. The ravens circled the obsidian pillar where the goblet glanced off and struck Thror down on his face.

Ori knew it was the right one. They were all made of different stone and not even the gold and jewels could bury them to the ceiling.

Getting to it was another matter. He couldn’t fly like the ravens. As he tried to move forward, the coins and chains and jeweled hilts shifted under his feet and he fell to his knees. As he struggled up he knew he could be buried under all this and his body never found. He looked around him with a sinking feeling. A voice in his head that sounded very like Nori’s suggested that there might already be bodies under the surface.

Ori rolled his eyes and continued to slog on.
Heat and nerves sluiced over him and through him and down his skin as sweat. He tried to keep his mind and his eyes on the column, on the ravens, and not think of how long this was taking or how far he had or hadn’t advanced. He would get there eventually. Thror had, every day, and he had been ancient and frail.

When he found himself at the pillar, at the trunk, his hand on the latch, he realized his struggle wasn’t over. He tried to clear his mind and took a deep breath as he threw open the lid. A blast of heat and evil knocked him back on his arse into the coins.

The ravens scattered, screaming, to the upper reaches of the chamber.

As he sat there, stunned, the stone seized his mind and put images there, all the wonderful things he could be and have if only he left the stone where it was, perhaps put a chunk of pyrite in the sack instead, if he just left the arkenstone here and worshipped it.

First the stone offered him power. It showed him a world where dwarrow and men and elves bowed to him and did his bidding. He saw himself as a mighty king on the throne of Erebor. He wore velvet robes and the raven crown and held forth with proclamations that kept all of Arda enthralled.

It was the silliest picture Ori could imagine and he actually snorted with laughter.

The vision was snatched away.

Then the stone showed him wealth beyond wealth. He would never be hungry or cold or have to depend on the pity or good will of anyone. Dori could live in a grand palace with a hundred servants and a dozen mithril teapots holding the finest teas. Nori would never have to steal again.

Ori shook his head. He had a warm, cozy home and food and a wonderful job he’d earned on his own merit. Dori already owned a teapot, and had the use of any of Balin’s, and none of them were mithril, but they all held tea, which was the whole point. Nori could never stop stealing or sneaking no matter how rich he grew, because he liked the challenge and because he knew it drove Dori crazy.

“No, I don’t think so,” said Ori.

If it were a dwarf the stone would have huffed in exasperation.

A new vision rather made Ori blush. Handsome and beautiful bearers swayed towards him and opened their robes, smiling lovingly and declaring him to be their master. Ori shook his head to rid himself of the vision. This was beyond silly. No one could compare to Dwalin and Dwalin was his One. The One given by Mahal.

The stone actually growled. To Ori, it sounded like frustration. All the visions of riches and lust were whisked away.

Ori found himself standing in the royal library of Erebor, surrounded by tall shelves filled with books and scrolls. He didn’t know why the stone thought this would tempt him. He already worked in the library.

Then he stepped forward and looked closely at the books on the shelf in front of him, beautiful volumes all bound in colored leathers and decorated in gold. Every title bore the name of the same author: Ori, Son of Rikhma. He looked up and down the shelves and around at all the others. Each volume bore the same name, his own.
This shook him, but only for a moment.

In this vision he reached and pulled out a volume and opened it. All the pages were blank. He didn’t even have to look at the others to know they were the same. The stone tempted him with fame, but fame such as this couldn’t be given. It had to be built.

“You know,” said Ori, “I don’t think you have anything I want.”

The flare of bright gold blinded him and the stench made him gag. The stone howled like an animal, but when the spots cleared from Ori’s eyes, he still sat in the coins. The heat and sickly energies had subsided.

Carefully he stood and looked down upon the arkenstone, much shrunken and now dulled from Ori’s refusal. He scooped it up easily with the sack and it didn’t even whimper.

Without another thought, he tied off the bag and held it out. Roäc appeared in the open transom, swooped down, grasped the material in his sharp talons and flew back out, on his way to the open aeries of the mountain and hopefully to a place where the cursed stone would never be seen again.

It hardly seemed the work of a minute to return to the access door, lift the latch and step out, right into Dwalin’s arms.

“Ori, love, yeh did it!” Dwalin shouted and kissed him breathless.

It hit him all at once that he had succeeded and he would have liked to shout his triumph too, but he felt filthy to the point of disgusting and as though he hadn’t slept in days.

“I did,” he said. “Now I need a bath and a nap.”

“Aye, we’ll rinse yeh down, but I won’t put yeh in water by yerself. Yeh’d fall asleep an’ drown. Th’ hero o’ th’ day shouldn’t meet his end in his own bathtub. It would be, yeh know, ignominious.”

Ori felt his knees giving way and he slumped in Dwalin’s arms. Between Thorin and Dwalin, Ori was walked back along the corridor out to where Furh’nk was waiting. Dwalin tied Honda’s bridle to Harley’s saddle and swung up before leaning down to lift Ori onto the saddle before him. Ori rested against Dwalin the entire ride back. Ori wondered why the others were not more cheerful but then the creepy thought of wondering just how such an object had come into Thror’s possession in the first place shook him.

He peered around Dwalin’s arm and looked at Thorin.

“Thorin?”

Thorin smiled encouragingly, so Ori asked,

“Do you think there might be another arkenstone somewhere under this mountain?”

Thorin frowned.

“That’s more a question for Tharkûn.”

They arrived back at Fundin house. Marhdin, Dain, Gloin and Binni were waiting for them. Dain shooed Thorin, Dwalin, and Ori to go inside.
“We’ll put up th’ ponies, get tha’ lad inside. He looks ready t’ fall on ‘is ‘ead.”

Both Dori and Dipfa were waiting to pounce on him. Dori allowed Dwalin to take Ori to the bathroom with Dipfa. Dwalin helped Ori to strip off. Dipfa made comforting noises and took the vile clothes away, muttering about storing them in a forge chute.

Ori was too tired to do much other than let Dwalin tend him. Slowly the scent of soap and steam from the hot water revived him a little. He was able to get up and dry himself. Dori came back in bringing Ori clean, soft linen drawers, a nightshirt, and a pair of slippers.

Soon they came back to the sitting room. Dori provided Ori with a large mug of chamomile tea and a plate of hot, buttered toast. This seemed to attract a good deal of attention so some time was taken to make sure everyone had some. The younger group at the fire was given a tea service, a large dish of butter and a couple of loaves a bread. The kittens had been fed, they assured Ori, and were tucked back in their basket, apparently Legolas had sung them to sleep much to the enchantment of Gimli and the consternation of the rest, leaving their ‘sitters’ to enjoy themselves toasting slices on highly polished, long-handled steel forks.

Ori was happily settled on the couch, tucked securely under Dwalin’s shoulder. He sipped the tea, lavishly sweetened with honey, and began to feel better. Marhdin seemed satisfied to stay as his assistants were spending a happy time with their Ones. Pika and Omi were glued together eating toast from each other’s hands and Buj wrote busily, perched on half a small bench jammed against the fender and Dipfa beside him on the other half with her own notebook, drawing fashion impossibilities. Sigrid had given way to tiredness and was curled on the floor beside Fili, her head on his belly as he lounged before an armchair where Lady Klakuna now snored contentedly. Kili and Tauriel sat on one end of the couch and Loli, Bain, Stonehelm, Gimli, and Legolas made a pile at the other end.

Thorin, Balin and Bard and the older set were back at the large table.

Tharkûn breezed back in.

“And where is it?”

“Where’s what?” Thorin asked, seeming not terribly interested.

Tharkûn frowned awfully at him.

“Thorin Oakenshield, where is the arkenstone?”

“Oh. Yes… I remember. Roäc took it.”

“Roäc?” Tharkûn demanded, his eyes wide. “Roäc took it? Where?”

Thorin turned and peered at the wizard with an overly puzzled look.

“I have no idea. Somewhere appropriate, I imagine. Roäc is the king of the messengers of Mahal.”

Tharkûn groaned and sat down heavily.

“I might’ve known. I made the mistake of assuming that you would bring it to me, thus thought I would be safe in having a small dish of trifle.”

“Undone by fine trifle,” Balin consoled. “A sad lesson for all of us.”
Thorin chuckled at this and Tharkûn shot him a filthy look.

“I have to admit,” said Bard to Thorin, “that raven of yours gives me the shivers.”

Thorin smiled wryly.

“He’s not my raven. I am his dwarf.”
Danger averted, mourning perverted, and Frerin subverted

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Thror’s clammy dead body’s in the crypt, there’s a funeral to plan and many other things to take care of. Ori’s got a lot to do!! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

In the cozy firelight, Bard stared at Thorin, who was occupied now with lighting his pipe.

“You are his dwarf?”

“Yes, Thorin replied, and took a pull from the tankard at his elbow.

“I’m sorry, Thorin,” said Bard, “that’s just… I’m still getting over the idea that you can speak to a raven, never mind that he talks back. That you talk to each other.”

Dis chuckled. She was curled in Jani’s lap and Rutile perched over Dis’ ear, looking like nothing so much as a jeweled hair ornament.

“You men talk of having ‘pets’ among animals,” said Dis. “Do you not speak to them?”

Bard’s eyebrows hit his hairline.

“We speak to them, yes, but the first time my dog answers me in Westron I’ll be on the next caravan to Gondor.”

Tharkûn looked chidingly at Dis.

“Really, ma’am, you’re becoming as bad a tease as… as me!”

Dis clicked her tongue.

“Shame on you, Tharkûn, ruining my fun.”

Bard looked from princess to wizard and back, his face increasingly uneasy.

Thorin took pity on him, though with a mischievous grin Ori thought made him look eerily like Kili.

“Bard, I can talk to Roäc and he talks back because he’s not an average raven. Ereboorean ravens were sent by Mahal, making their pedigrees rather better than ours. If anything, Roäc considers me his pet and not the other way around.”

“When di’ yeh think Roäc’ll be back, lad?” Balin turned to Thorin.

Thorin shook his head.

“I have no idea. He’s getting rid of an extremely dangerous object. The arkenstone is not to be cast aside lightly.”

“Aye,” Dwalin agreed. “Needs t’ be hurled wi’ great force.”

“Master Tharkûn,” Ori asked, “will there be another arkenstone in Erebor?”

“Given what the arkenstone is? No.”

“I figured it was just an evil rock,” said Ori. “All rocks are alive just like all dwarrow are alive. It only stands to reason rocks could be good or evil as well.”

“It does stand to reason, but the arkenstone was not a rock, it was a dormant dragon egg.”

Everyone in the room looked horrified.

“Oh, not to worry,” Tharkûn said in a reassuring tone. “Dragons generally nest far to the north where nothing lives that goes on two feet and dragons only produce one egg at a time, else we would be knee deep in them.”

“Yeh’d be knee deep,” said Dwalin. “We’d be up t’ our hairy arses.”

“Tharkûn, how did this egg get into Erebor?” Thorin demanded.

“I would say, long ago in the age of dragons, one was passing by when it was time to lay the egg and this was the best nest on offer. It’s not like dragons are attentive parents. The egg hatches at some time after two millennia, and the hatchling grows to full size overnight.”

Thorin sat up, horrified and furious.

“That thing could have hatched at any time? Sweet, blessed Mahal!”

He sank back in the chair and buried his head in his arms. Abruptly he looked up again and growled at Tharkûn, “You knew! You knew what it was and what it could do and you just let it sit there! Are you simply content to have so much blood on your hands?”

Tharkûn seemed to shrink in on himself, looking miserable. Finally, he sighed.

“You want a direct answer? I suppose I owe you at least one in your lifetime. I am not a man, an elf or a dwarf, Thorin. I am not truly self-willed in this world. The points where I may interfere in the lives of middle earth are few enough and not negotiable. For the ‘why’, you would have to take that up with Eru Himself.”

Ori stared at him.

“That’s why!” he exclaimed, then slapped his hand over his mouth.

Tharkûn raised an eyebrow.

“That is why?” he inquired.

Nori said, “Don’t tell him, Ori. See how he likes his own game.”

“Shut up, Nori,” said Ori. To the wizard he said, “That’s why you looked different in the feasting hall.”

“What does he look like?” Nori asked. “A stick insect with a hat?”
Ori ignored him.

“This isn’t your face,” he persisted.

“Ah, but it is, young master,” said Tharkûn, “for the moment. My original would not allow me to converse with you very well. This one was chosen, not by me, mind you, because it was thought to be non-threatening… and rather silly. These eyebrows? Really? Now, I have reached the limit to the questions I will answer. I’ve already bent the rules as it is.”

“You still haven’t told me what I’m to do,” said Ori. “Or even really why I’ve been chosen to do it at all.”

Tharkûn grinned.

“Others will do so over time, several of them quite a bit better looking than the Old Grey Goat of Arda, but none who do a better job making a rabbit out of a handkerchief.”

“A dragon’s egg,” said Thorin to Dis. “It was a dragon’s egg. It could have hatched inside Erebor.”

She rose, crossed to his side, and squeezed his arm.

“It didn’t, nadad. It’s over.”

Thorin sighed, clawed his fingers through his hair. “Well, that part certainly. We still have one dead and one uncrowned king. The moon needs to go through its phase three times before my coronation. We need to prepare for full mourning. It wouldn’t do to perform for Thror what we did privately for father.”

Dwalin said to Ori, “We sat on Thrain’s empty tomb an’ go’ blind drunk. We were all in mournin’ fer our folks.”

“Not a lot of ceremony,” said Thorin. “At least we were sincere.”

“Mm,” Dis agreed. “Sloshed but sincere.”

Ori had another cup of tea, then, feeling restless, he went over to the fireplace to check on the kittens. They had woken once again. Powder was fascinated with Legolas’ nose, the elf prince sprawled on his stomach. Gimli trundled in and sat very deliberately on Legolas’ rear end.

Legolas turned to Tauriel and said in Sindarin, “Dwarrow are heavy.”

She replied, “It’s alright. I intend to ride on top.”

Ori gaped at them. Legolas noticed and turned red.

“You speak Sindarin?”

“A little,” said Ori. He was actually fluent, but he had already had a rough day, too rough to go into it.

“Hey, Ori-mate,” said Kili, leaning against his older brother on the rug closest to the fire. Mask had decided to stalk the closures on Kili’s tunic.

While Kili just sagged with fatigue, Fili looked scared despite having a lovely crown Princess snoozing on his turm.
“How are you?” Ori asked, leaning over them.

Fili flapped a loose hand in the air. It seemed to sum up the atmosphere in the room.

“So,” Gimli announced. “What’s t’ happen now?”

Dis said, “We were just talking about how we would go about the mourning.”

Dipfa’s head jerked up and she stared at Ori.

“Master Ori! You’ll need mourning clothes.” She tore the previous three pages out of her notebook, threw them in the fire and began scribbling maniacally.

Balin sighed and cast a dubious glance at Dori, who sighed too.

“Lad,” said Balin to Thorin. “Our beards?”

Bard looked confused. Thorin took pity on him.

“It’s traditional for members of the royal family to cut their beards in mourning.”

This had everyone glancing at each other in a way that was not comforting. Thorin held up is hand and continued.

“Considering how we all felt about Udad by the end of his life, that seems like hypocrisy. We aren’t mourning. We’re relieved. Maybe we can mourn later, with time and distance.”

“Form must be observed, laddie,” said Balin, though he looked like he’d eaten something sour when he did.

“It will be,” said Thorin, “by me. I’ll cut my beard as the head of the family. For everyone else the proscribed clothing and jewelry are enough.”

“But how will it look to the people, nadad?” Dis asked.

“Given how despised Thror had become? They’ll likely see it as the token gesture it is and think him fortunate to warrant such consideration. At some point in the future his memory will be rehabilitated, but right now it’s best we distance ourselves from it. And from him.”

“What do you need me to do?” Bard offered. “Shall I ask my people to observe the death in some way? I will, of course, be at the funeral…if it’s permitted?”

“Thank you,” Thorin said. “You’ll be welcome. Dwarrow wear gray, the color of plain stone, for mourning. If you wish your people to wear that or make whatever observance men do, we will appreciate the gesture.”

“An’ that leads t’ another issue,” said Balin. “What will yeh say about him?”

Thorin deflated once more.

“They’ll expect me to speak at his funeral service. The only thing saving me is that it’s not about me, it’s about the kingdom. In his time Thror was a great king. I suppose I could emphasize that.”

“But it feels false,” said Ori.

“Eventually I may learn to let go of my anger, but right now? Yes, he was sick, but the sickness sprang from greed. Yet, if it were me who’d been seized by gold sickness, is that all I’d want anyone to remember about me?”

Ori thought back on what he had read about the funeral rites of kings. They were always described in minute detail, but Ori preferred the most ancient ceremonies, which were by far the most elegant and austere.

“You could do the ceremony in its ancient form,” he said. “It’s in Khuzdul and the words don’t allow for variation. In practical terms it fits with the concept of returning to the ways of Mahal.

“Also, it might keep you from wanting to scream and throw things.”

“Where did you get the idea that I throw things?” Thorin asked. “That’s the second time you’ve mentioned it.”

“Is it accurate?”

“Yes, but that’s not the point.”

Dis, Dain and Sculdis chuckled.

Ori raised an eyebrow.

“I’ll go find the description of the rite.”

“Try the small parlor, laddie,” Ballin said. “Shelf to the right of the fireplace. Should be something on that there.”

Ori grinned at Balin and rose.

“Thank you, Ori.” Thorin said, majestically, while his eyes twinkled. “I’ll try not to throw things while you’re gone.”

Ori giggled, then glanced around as suddenly the back of his neck was prickling.

“Wait! Where’s Tharkûn?”

Everyone immediately looked about.

“He’s gone,” said Thorin.

“People come and go so quickly here,” said Ori.

“And then,” said Tharkûn, sweeping in, “they come back again!”

He was not alone. He had Prince Frerin, now covered in dozens of gauzy white plasters, by the scruff and deposited him on the rug in front of Thorin where Frerin sulked like a pre-tween.

Sculdis looked down at him.

“Wha’ th’ bloody fuck ’re yeh tryin’ t’ do, cosset?”

“Don’t call me that!” Frerin snapped.

“Laddie, yeh look like yeh’ve rolled in th’ lint barrel,” Dain commented. “Wha’re yeh tryin’ t’ hide as a ewe all preggers or somethin’?”
“His highness was heading toward the stables,” Tharkûn broke in. “Perhaps he was just going for a walk to clear his head? Then again, given his pretty companion, perhaps not. I wouldn’t have interfered with love’s young dream, but they seem to be packed for a journey of some duration.”

“Didn’t he take a cart?” Kili asked. “Idad Frerin, if you’re going on a trip you need to take a cart. It’s easier on the pony and you don’t run the chance of getting a sore butt.”

“Where were you going, Frerin?” Thorin interrupted quickly as Frerin didn’t look as though he was going to answer Kili in a polite manner.

“Away from here, to be happy with T’dillah,” Frerin spat.

Thorin glanced at Tharkûn.

“I sent her back to her family. She is safe enough,” said Tharkûn.

“Oh dear,” Buj observed thoughtfully. “Wobr will be disappointed. All that hair wax for nothing. And Prince Frerin is blond. That borders on his being jilted!”

Lady Klakuna raised an eyebrow. “Well, my dear young badger, I wouldn’t get too upset for your brother. She is my own bloodline, you know, but really all she does is write bad poetry and recline tragically upon the divan. Perhaps our sympathy should be directed to the young man over there, Prince…”

She let the line fade away like her interest as Powder began trying to climb her dress hem.

“Dear little kitten,” she gushed.

“How shocking!” Difpa frowned. “Buj, perhaps your dear brother has made a good escape after all.”

Thorin rubbed his temples, then appeared to come to a decision. He rose to his feet and turned toward Frerin.

“We will discuss this in my office. Now.”

“No.”

“No?”

“We will discuss it here if we are to discuss it at all,” said Frerin imperiously. “I want witnesses.”

“You didn’t seem so keen on them on your way to the stables just now.”

“Aye, f’r sure, laddie!” Jani was most helpful. “Happy t’ be of service t’ th’ witless.”

Frerin shot her an ugly look, then,

“If you must know, we were eloping. Thorin’s pet wizard has put paid to that.”

Tharkûn chuckled and Thorin replied in a heavy tone.

“You will not leave this mountain before you marry T’dillah and I will perform the ceremony myself.”

“Why sh-“
“You will not dishonor her and you will not dishonor this family. Do you understand?”

“Perfectly” Frerin grit out.

“Do you even know where you’ll go once you leave? Have you thought that far?”

“Why do y-.” Frerin obviously thought better of this tactic now. “We intend to live at her grandfather’s old estate in Ered Luin until we make the choice of our own.”

“By the time that household’s done with you, you’ll not have the money to do anything but crawl home to Erebor. The very last thing you want.”

“And I suppose you have a better idea? Because you always do, don’t you, Thorin.”

“If I had all the answers we wouldn’t be at each other’s throats right now.”

Thorin looked troubled, but Frerin’s face only hardened further into contempt.

“I’m listening.”

“Beleghost is without a king. It was something grandfather spoke of long ago as a missed opportunity, because the ground is rich in mineral deposits and it sits on a major trade road. We’ve had a succession of regional governors, but no one with the skills or authority to make it prosper. If you go there with your fortune intact you will have your own court.”

Dis added, encouragingly, “Since Thorin doesn’t intend to move his household into the king’s quarters you might offer grandfather’s staff the chance to move with you.”

“We’re well aware you chose almost all of them,” said Thorin.

Frerin’s eyebrows shot up, his only show of surprise.

Thorin shook his head.

“You think I don’t know you ran that house while grandfather was ill?”

“He sees all and he knows all,” said Frerin sarcastically. “Easy to look clever when the ravens tell you everything, I suppose. Tell me, Thorin, was it your idea that they attack me or their own?”

Thorin stared right through him.

“They let you off easy, Frerin. I’ve seen them peck someone’s eyes out.”

Frerin, taken aback, did not answer for a moment. Garnet and Sapphire laughed uproariously at Frerin and danced forward in false threat. Frerin twitched slightly and when he could speak again he blatantly changed the subject. “And when did you plan on this all going forward?”

“First mourning has begun. If you can be ready in a week, it will give you time to make arrangements. You can make offers to anyone you wish to go with you as your court and assemble a staff to ready the royal caravan to Beleghost. With the prospect of being queen, I imagine T’dillah will happily wait here an extra week.”

Nothing was said about dealing with personal sadness in that time, if indeed Frerin felt any. He was supposed to be closest to Thror, but Ori couldn’t see that the old king’s passing affected Frerin at all.
Frerin’s eye swept sideways toward Dori and Balin on the couch.

“We will be few in number. We should take the bearer with us.”

Dori’s smile was nothing short of feral.

“I’d like to see you try,” he said.

Frerin swallowed and made a strategic retreat. He turned back to Thorin. The two stood face to face and no one moved and no one spoke.

Ori inched a little aside to give Dwalin a clear path to the two if he needed it.

Finally Frerin lifted his chin, a sharp, regal movement.

Ori felt the urge to giggle.

“I’ll take your offer under advisement,” said Frerin, “and give you my answer tomorrow. If I have leave to retire, your majesty?”

Thorin sighed.

“Of course, Frerin. Go to bed. It’s late.”

When Gloin and Binni had escorted the sulking prince away, Ori didn’t want to know where, Bard rose to his feet.

“We had best go, too. Poor Tilda is out and I can hear Bain snoring from here.”

Dori said, “Why don’t you all stay the night? We have plenty of room and tomorrow we can give you a proper breakfast.”

Bard shot Dori a crooked smile.

“In other words, we’ll be waddling our way back to Dale tomorrow. Thank you, Dori, we’ll take you up on that.”

Bard lifted Tilda into his arms and Dain said to Chopper, “Come, laddie, time t’go. Yer needin’ yer beauty sleep.”

Bard said to Dain, “I wonder if Tilda would consider her wished-for pig the same way you consider him. Very few men in Dale keep animals as ‘pets’. If its not a working animal, we can’t afford it. What does a pig give unless it becomes dinner?”

“Depends on th’ pig,” Dain reflected. “They’re smarter than dogs, but no’ as obedient. Have their own minds, an’ their own tempers.”

“You think a pig is a bad idea?” Bard asked.

“No’ necessarily,” said Dain. “But, indeed, it’d have t’ be th righ’ pig. I’ve raised ‘em all me life an’ Chopper’s a gem beyond any!”

“He certainly is,” agreed Sculdis.

Chopper oinked up at them sleepily.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. No dead bodies here. Clammy? A little. Sweaty? Definitely! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrows time, same darrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori fetched up his knitting again. The repetitive movements calmed him a little. He was also determined to have this finished for Dwalin as soon as he could.

“We should depart as well,” said Legolas, finishing the last of the bread and butter. “At least to show my father I’m still alive.”

Gimli got off him with visible reluctance. Legolas rose and turned to him then shyly bent and bumped foreheads with him. Kili obviously thought he’d got a better reward, however, since Tauriel rose only to her knees to hug him before following the woodland prince out to the breakfast parlor and the meadow. Fili appeared to think he had won, when Sigrid mumbled as she got to her feet, pausing only to kiss Fili’s cheek before groping her way to her father, leaning into his side as he followed Dain and Sculdis out to the receiving room and upstairs to the guest chambers.

Finally it was just the Fundins, with Dwalin and Thorin deep in discussion near the fire.

“My, but it’s been a busy day,” said Dori, as he returned from the kitchen where he’d taken the dishes. “I believe it’s time for me to turn in. Balin?”

Balin rose, smiling and crossed to his side.

“Of course, m’dear, yeh must be exhausted.”

They bid the room goodnight and went to bed.

But not, apparently, to sleep.

And they left the bedroom door open.

It started with a distinct slap and some not-so-discrete giggling. Ori didn’t think much of it at first. He just rolled his eyes and went on with his knitting. He wanted to finished these next few lines and as far as Balin and Dori’s romantic noises, he resigned himself to waiting it out.

“Balin, your hands are cold.”

“Just tryin’ t’ warm them up.”

“There’s a fire in the hearth right there.”

“I find this forge right here t’ me likin’.”

“I’ll just bet. Mmmm, that is rather nice.”
“On second thought, this bit here’s even better.”

“Ooo, I do believe you’re right.”

This went on rather longer than made Ori comfortable, and it only increased in volume.

“Now, now, turn about is fair play.”

“Oof! Wha’ a grip yeh have.”

“And how well you fill it.”

“I kin think o’ a few places I’d like it t’fill.”

Ori dropped a stitch, cussed under his breath and tried to recount. He couldn’t concentrate. He glanced around. So far he seemed to be the only one who noticed. That lasted another thirty seconds.

“Oh, Balin!” Dori cried. “Oh Balin, you naughty creature!”

“Naughty, am I? Oh, yeh’ve seen nothin’ yet.”

“I beg your pardon, I believe I’m seeing plenty!”

Oh, Mahal’s hairy arse!

“Close the door-close the door-close the door!” Ori moaned, covering his ears, sinking into the sofa cushions.

Dori’s delighted squeal as Ballin molested him was not something he wanted to hear. Ever. He was happy to think Dori was being well taken care of by Balin, that they were happily in love. But this? Er. No.

Dwalin and Thorin turned to stare in the direction of the bedroom. Nori slid from behind an arras with a smirk. There was a thud and Bofur’s feet, then legs appeared as Nori had left him to slide sated to the floor.

“Balin did say Dori had to be exhausted. Seems like Balin’s just the dwarf t’ do it.”

Dwalin moved to the hallway and bellowed, “Shut th’ door, yeh fuckin’ rabbits!”

“Fuck yerself, Dwalin!” Balin called back merrily, though they did hear the door latch shut.

“Right,” said Nori. “I need a drink. Who’s with me?”

“Aye!” Bofur thrust himself free of the wall covering and leapt to his feet, grinning like a fool.

It was late when Ori turned in. He made sure the kittens were safely asleep in their basket at the bedside. Garnet, on her wrought iron perch, yawned and tucked her head under her wing. He curled up cozily on the cotton under-quilt, the over-quilt and furs nestled around him. He closed his eyes but his brain was racing.

What could Thorin possibly say about Thror that was complimentary? Ori was young and he didn’t know about Thror’s great deeds. Thror had just been the king and Ori never gave him a great deal of thought. Ori’s thoughts once he’d grown older were more occupied with helping Dori keep food on the table and a roof over their heads. He’d never considered the injustices that were visited on his fellow dwarrow. Life in the Dale was hard but that was due to the Master.

Ori rolled over again. He realized why he had instantly disliked Frerin. Frerin was very like Calmar. He cared only for position, power and wealth. He treated the people who served him like so many pieces of furniture or as a something that existed to serve him. He cared nothing for them as his own people. Thorin did. Thorin treated his servants as valued colleagues. They made it possible for him to assists others. They were as his arms and legs and through them he was able to reach as many as he could. He cared more for them than he did himself. He was a true leader. Ori had read how, in the Battle of Khazad-dûm, Thorin had headed the battlelines, calling his warriors to follow. Thorin never ordered any to do what he would not be willing to do himself.

Ori couldn’t think too hard about what Tharkûn had said about him being an instrument of Mahal. Mahal was the Maker of All. Ori was a scribe from a penniless home in Dale. He wasn’t from the line of Durin. Dori was, but Ori’s father from what Dori had revealed to Balin was a playwright from a traveling band of actors and musicians. Ori didn’t even know what clan his father had hailed from. He knew the Rikantas were of Lady Klakuna’s line in Ered Luin.

How could Mahal have chosen him? He was a nothing. What could he possibly do that wouldn’t be better handled by someone like Balin or Gloin? Oin read the signs, surely he could be a better judge of what Mahal was saying and was better positioned to carry out such things.

Ori glanced at the window. The moon was sinking toward the west. He heard Dwalin’s footsteps and their bedroom door opened quietly. Dwalin must have finally finished discussing ‘the Frerin business’ with Thorin. Ori heard Dwalin undress and the bed sank on the side as Dwalin climbed into bed carefully, as though making sure he didn’t wake Ori.

Ori rolled over, kissed him and rested his head on Dwalin’s chest.

“What’re yeh still doin’ awake, love?” Dwalin asked.

“So tired,” said Ori, “but I can’t imagine sleeping right now. It’s so busy inside my head.”

“Worried abou’ this whole thin’ with Mahal?”

Ori laughed.

“That makes it sound like we’re two friends who had a tiff! But, yes, I am worried about that, and about what we all have to do next. Mourning a king? As a member of his family? Me? Here I thought a zinc mine was the hardest thing I’d have to navigate!”

“I shoulda warned yeh. It never stops with th’ Durins. Been doin’ it all me life.”

“How do you sleep?”

“Yeh learn t’ live in th’ moment, like a wolf, and t’ put yer thoughts aside when yer tired.”

“But how?”

“I give ’em t’ yer friend Mahal,” said Dwalin.

Ori could almost hear Dwalin smile.

“I think I can do that,” said Ori.
“I know yeh kin.”

Ori couldn’t quite picture Mahal, but he could imagine a hand the size of Erebor as it descended from clouds full of fire. His thoughts, both leaden and loud, left his mind and settled in the giant palm. The world rumbled with laughter and another hand appeared and a huge forefinger caressed the top of his head. Ori heard a sharp ‘crack’ at the crease of his shoulders and neck and the tension fell away as he snuggled further into his husband.

“Love you,” said Ori.

“Love yeh, too.”

The sun shone through the window when Ori opened his eyes again. It seemed like less than a minute since he closed them, but he felt rested and at peace.

He lay on his side with Dwalin curled around him. Dwalin’s chin rested on his head, deep breaths ruffling Ori’s hair.

Dwalin stirred, muttering as he woke.

“Good morning,” said Ori.

“Mornin’. Sleep well?”

“Really well. Now I’m… awake,” Ori giggled. “All of me.”

“Uh?” Dwalin’s hand drifted down to cradle him through his drawers. “So yeh are.”

Ori wriggled his arse back against Dwalin where it was obvious he was also awake.

Dwalin grunted.

“Keep doin’ tha’ an’ yeh’ll be late fer yer breakfast.”

“Right now I’m aiming for lunch,” said Ori.

“Oh? Aye? I don’ think we have quite tha’ much time, but we’ve more than time enough. If yer interested?”

Ori nodded. He felt his face glowing as Dwalin tugged loose the tie of his drawers and drew them down. Then Dwalin pushed the covers away so they could both see what he was doing and Ori swallowed a whimper.

He’d been too startled in the bath to pay too close attention. This was slow and close. Lazily Dwalin ran his fingers along Ori’s prick.

“Yeh have such a pretty cock,” said Dwalin.

“I do?” Ori asked, breathless.

“Aye, goes wi’ th’ rest o’ yeh.”

Dwalin’s hand curled around him and slowly tugged, over and over. Ori lengthened and filled while Dwalin’s grip tightened, the hand strong and the skin rough against his.
This went on and on, the pleasure building slowly with the pace of Ori’s breath. He felt Dwalin breathe in his ear and then Dwalin’s mouth took hold of his earlobe. Dwalin growled low then slowly, gently, insistently, bit it.

Every nerve and muscle in Ori’s body twitched at once. He could swear he heard Dwalin give an evil little laugh before he bit Ori again! And licked where he’d bitten and then bit him again!

While Ori got over the shock his body had better ideas and he writhed back against Dwalin, suddenly very hard and very, very turned on.

“Rub against me!” Ori ordered.

Dwalin pushed his pelvis hard against Ori’s behind and rubbed his trapped prick in lazy rhythm with his hand. Ori pushed back and purred.

“Oh, yeh know I like tha’,” said Dwalin.

“You do? I mean – uhm… Do you need to pull down your drawers?”

Dwalin drew away, the cooler air startling against Ori’s skin. A bit of a scuffle took place behind him and then Dwalin returned, all fur and warm hardness nestled in the crack of Ori’s bum.

Ori bit his lip, now redder than his own hair, as they moved in earnest. He put his hands flat on the mattress for leverage, determined to give as good as he got.

They rocked the bed, the springs singing, and Ori laughed.

“Y- you want me to call you ‘Beorn’?”

“If yer still talkin’ we’re doin’ this wrong.”

“Oh, no, you’re doing this – ooooh.”

Ori shuddered and twitched. This was different from before, pleasure spreading from both sides, the sharper, gasping, irresistible burn, caught in Dwalin’s grasp, and the new, tingling vibrations from his backside, traveling up into his ass and under his stones and also up his spine. He wanted more of that.

He wanted more.

He ground back, pushing a gasp and a moan from Dwalin’s throat.

“Oh, Mahal, Ori.”

Then Ori was on his hands and knees with Dwalin shoving against him and Ori still gripped and throttled in the slickened palm.

He bucked back as hard as he could, his muscles locking as he came, his lungs burning, his panting breaths taking on the edge of a cry as he sprayed the sheets and didn’t care.

Dwalin still moved over him, gasping as he milked the last drop from Ori’s prick. His big, rough hands took Ori by the hips as Dwalin ground into him, not pulling back anymore, pushing and pushing and coming with a groan Ori would remember the rest of his life.

Dwalin spent, splashing Ori’s lower back as his cock shook and leapt in the crack of Ori’s arse.
In the moment of shaky silence Ori wondered how he’d be able to stand it when Dwalin actually put the thing inside him.

The hard breaths echoed in the room as Ori lowered himself to the bed and Dwalin followed to cover him.

“Ori, love, are yeh alright?”

Ori rested his cheek on the mattress and laughed.

“I’m fine, and I may never move again.”

Dwalin chuckled and pressed a kiss to his shoulder before easing off him. Ori flopped over on his back, surprised to see that Dwalin still looked uncertain.

Ori wiped a trickle of sweat from the side of Dwalin’s face and drew his hand down the braid in his beard. Dwalin’s tattoos stood out nearly black against his ruddy skin.

“You’re beautiful,” said Ori.

To his amazement Dwalin closed his eyes, laughing a little, and going even redder.

Dwalin – his Dwalin – was embarrassed?

Ori put a hand on each side of Dwalin’s face and drew him down to kiss him.

“Good morning, husband.”

“Good mornin’, love.”

They both felt it at once.

Just for a moment the stones beneath them, around them, above them, undulated in all directions.

Ori grasped Dwalin and drew a horrified breath.

“That wasn’t a mine collapsing?” he pleaded.

“No, love, tha’ wasn’t a collapse,” Dwalin assured him. “Tha’ would ‘feel’ like stone breakin’ an’ there’d be damage. This felt like… th’ lava?”

“The lava…” Ori repeated.

In his minds eye he could see the endless stream of fire far below the deepest mines. Without warning it had leapt from its channel, then slammed down again and flowed on, as if Erebor had merely hiccuped.

“Has that ever happened before?”

“No’ in my memory, but it’s over now.”

Ori sagged into him, relieved. He giggled.

“I thought the earth was supposed to move during sex, not after.”

Dwalin chuckled.
“Alright, funny dwarf.”

“I’m funny?” Ori asked, squinting at him.

“Aye, an’ bossy, too, orderin’ me t’ rub against yeh.”

Ori looked away, embarrassed.

“I’m sorry.”

“I’m no’. I liked it.”

Ori turned back, amazed.

“You did?”

“A lot.”

Ori grinned and kissed him, then kissed him a little more.

Dwalin growled, easing him back into the pillows, burly hands on his shoulders.

Ori was wondering if they should try to push on through to lunch after all when a tiny, fuzzy head popped up over the side of the bed and Nori-Pori gave a meow exactly twice his size.

Dwalin groaned.

“He’s already scalin’ th’ side o’ th’ bed?”

“We’ll have to be careful when we – er – romp before breakfast,” said Ori.

“Rompin’? Is tha’ wha’ they callin’ it these days?”

“It’s what I’m calling it. Dori’s going to make us wash our own bedding, you know.”

“A very small price t’ pay,” Dwalin assured him, “fer the pleasure o’ yer company.”

Nori-Pori padded across the mattress and smacked Dwalin’s arm with a sharp little paw.

“I think his lordship wants his milk,” said Ori.

“I think his lordship’s gonna start sleepin’ with Nori an’ Bofur.”
Beads, Brunch and Bonnets

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Wakey-wakey, it’s time for brunch with the usual Durin romps. We find out what ever happened to that horrid Master of Dale! And some secrets about Bearers. Please do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori was washed and dressed in mourning gray, clothes sent along to him from Gridr. She had rooted them out from Oin’s young days. They were disgracefully out of fashion but for the rites going to be performed at Thror’s funeral they were remarkably apt. Ori didn’t care about fashion one way or the other, but he looked at his marriage bead with its chips of emerald and sighed. It went into the bead box with Dwalin’s. Ori found the sewing box and rummaged through it.

“What’re yeh doin’, love?” Dwalin entered the room, washed and wearing a dressing gown and a towel on his head like an odd turquoise hood.

“Looking for some grey thread to bind the end of my marriage braid.”

“Ah, leave off then an’ come with me.”

Dwalin sat Ori on the end of their bed and sat next to him, unbraiding and rebraiding the plait of Ori’s marriage braid. Then Dwalin took a familiar-looking mithril bead, plain with carved cirths and clasped the end of the braid.

“Um, Dwalin? That’s a Durin bead. I can’t wear that.”

“If the king says yer a Durin, then yeh are. Thorin meant this fer yeh when th’ time came. Time’s come.”

“Shouldn’t it be on a different braid?”

“It will be when yeh kin wear yer marriage bead again.”

Ori thought how ironic it was that a nameless scribe wore this bead while Thorin’s own bead rested in possession of a miner’s daughter.

He wondered if Thorin would ever get it back.

Thorin must have others like it, Ori knew, but the king had not replaced the missing bead in his hair.

Ori noticed that he and Dwalin were not the only ones who ‘slept in’. It was closing on midday when they finally made their appearance. Following an enticing savory hot scent Ori led Dwalin into the breakfast parlor.
At the table were Thorin and Balin, and Dori. Dori sat to the left of the head of the table and was presiding over the teapot, a loaded bread board and a large covered silver platter. He wore an immaculate robe of dove gray that rustled softly whenever he moved. Ori decided it was entirely of silk.

Balin, clad in his usual style but in a grey matching Dori’s, was at the table’s head, reading a scroll.

“Good morning brother and wee brother.”

Dori gave Ori and Dwalin the eye.

Thorin, on the other side of Balin, was still wearing yesterday’s clothes. A book sat open on the table before him, the parchment yellowed and the runes faded.

“Found it,” Thorin said to Ori with a teasing smile.

“Really, pet,” said Dori, starting to fill plates for Ori and Dwalin. “This is hardly a seemly hour to appear. It gives one pause as to what you might have got up to.”

Ori was in such a happy mood, he blinked innocently at his elder brother.

“Did you pause to consider what I was getting up to while Balin was making you squeal like Chopper at dinner?” Ori asked saucily.

“Ori!” Dori cried, cheeks flushed, but his eyes twinkling.

“Oh, Balin! Oh Balin, you naughty creature!” Ori mimicked. “Really, Dori, you could have done terrible damage to my mind.”

Dori flushed scarlet and sputtered as Balin clamped his mouth shut, but was obviously holding in a laugh.

“Really!” Dori protested.

“Next time, shut the door before you start!” Ori said.

“Noted,” said Balin, who took a sip of tea, then shut his mouth again.

Dwalin leaned in the doorjamb, laughing too hard to breathe.

Dori whirled on him.

“This is all your fault!”

“No, it’s not,” said Ori, seating himself, taking the two full plates handed to him, setting one next to him and started to work on the other. “He made sure the door was shut before I took off my britches.”

“Mahal’s beard!” Dori exclaimed, covering his ears. “I do not want to hear this! I am not hearing this!”

Nori stuck his head out of the vent above the stove.

“I guess he really is related to that Klakuna dam.”
“Good morning every- oh! Captain! Are you alright?” Lady Klakuna trotted in, full of the joys of life and obviously ready for brunch.

“Bugger,” Nori’s voice sounded.

“Nori, you naughty lad!” Lady Klakuna scolded indulgently as she seated herself next to Dori, kissing his cheek fondly. “You come down from there, my precious badger! You’ll get your tunic all dirty!”

Ori singsonged under his breath, “Gran-ny’s precious bad-ger.”

“Fuck you, Ori,” Nori snarled from somewhere behind the ovens.

Lady Klakuna ‘tut-tutted’ while Dori poured her tea.

“Thank you, darling,” she crooned, patting Dori’s hand. “What a great trial it must have been when you were so young and alone. To have such a busy little badgerling to raise.”

Balin regarded his tea with great focus and Dori’s face was a study.

Ori glanced over the rim of his teacup to see what Thorin was doing.

Thorin’s face was impassive but he was white-knuckling the book.

Dwalin pushed off from the doorway, passing Thorin on his way to Ori. He gave Thorin a swat about the head.

“Fuck yeh, Thorin, stop laughin’.”

Thorin looked up with a ‘Who? Me?’ expression worthy of his nephews. A grin appeared. Ori knew where Kili’s had come from.

Said nephews arrived, Kili moving at speed toward sustenance, Fili attempting to swagger, but that proved difficult as he and Kili were falling over each other in their bid to arrive first.

“Uncle!” shouted Kili.

Thorin raise an inquisitive brow.

“Good morning!” Kili replied gleefully. “Did you get any sleep or have you been reading Balin’s dusty old books all night?”

“Been reading all night by the looks of it,” said Fili, bouncing a fresh hot roll off Kili’s head. “You’re the one who sleeps in his clothes.”

“Boys,” Dori said in dulcet tones.

Ori heard his slippered toe tapping under the table.

Fili and Kili exchanged glances.

As one they leapt up and seized Dori, kissing him soundly on each cheek.

“Sorry, Dori!” Kili said.

“Don’t hit us in the head with a spoon!” Fili pleaded.
At that moment Sculdis, Dain and Stonehelm entered. Stonehelm headed straight for the food. Dain passed by Thorin’s chair pausing only to plant a large sloppy kiss on the very top of Thorin’s head. Thorin did not move except to swing a fist behind him. He missed and Dain chuckled all the way to his seat.

Thorin took in the grey garb all around him and pulled back his chair.

“If you’ll all excuse me for a moment, I need to wash and I’ll rejoin you presently.”

“Aye, g’wan an’ make yerself pretty fer us, cous’,” Dain cooed.

“Why are Fili and Kili’s mourning grays so dark?” Ori whispered to his husband.

“Food stains,” said Dwalin. “Watch.”

Gimli entered and he, too, was wearing very dark gray.

“Ah,” said Ori.

It was just as well, seeing what Dori had on offer: beef ribs barbecued with a tangy sauce of tomatoes and hot peppers, roasted potatoes with butter and salt, pickled beets and sliced eggs.

As if following the delicious scents the Ur males, Bard and his family, and the Sons of Groin and their families drifted in. Dis arrived last with Jani, hand in hand. Soon the room was full and noisy with everyone speaking at volume and eating.

When Thorin returned the room fell silent.

Everyone stared.

Dis burst into tears and her sons were not far behind.

“What? Is it uneven?” Thorin asked, running his hand over his beard shorn to barely a finger’s breadth long.

Ori stared, horrified, as Dis threw herself into his arms and hid her face in his shoulder.

“He doesn’t deserve it!” Came the muffled cry. “The bastard doesn’t deserve it!”

Thorin held her and murmured something to her, but she only shook her head furiously.

“That’s really disturbing,” said Bain with his mouth full.

“Shut up,” Sigrid hissed, passing a mug of tea to her father whose eyebrows were at his hairline.

Thorin sent Jani a pleading look.

Jani went over and drew Dis back to her seat.

“Come with me, lovely. Yer food’s gettin’ cold.”

“He doesn’t deserve it, Jani!”

“Aye, I know, I know.”

It was then the elves reappeared.
Dori welcomed them and there was a general cry of greeting that Ori knew was usually saved for other dwarrow. He doubted the elves would understand the significance, but they definitely knew when they were wanted.

Legolas sat with Gimli. Sigrid moved up for Tauriel to sit by Kili.

Legolas did a double take at Thorin’s beard, but was too well bred to make any personal comments to a king. He had no such compunctions with Gimli.

“Why are you wearing such a dark—“

“Shut up. Eat this.”

Legolas looked askance at the contents of his plate.

“What is this?”

“Beef rib with tangy sauce.”

“Really?” Legolas looked horrified, yet fascinated. “Where are the utensils?”

“Don’t need ‘utensils’. That’s against th’ rules.”

“What rules?”

“Here, like this.”

Gimli picked up a meaty rib in his meaty fingers and tore off a piece of beef with his mouth. Sauce dribbled down his chin, into his beard and disappeared into the dark fabric of his tunic.

“Ah, that explains it,” said Legolas. Gamely he picked up a rib, sniffed it, apparently liked what he smelled and sampled it.

His face betrayed amazement, enjoyment and finally the corners of his mouth practically curled with glee.

“Tauriel, you must try this!”

While the elves made culinary inroads avidly aided by the younger set, the talk at the other end of the table had turned serious.

“I chose to send Calmar off to Mordor with his thugs and their accomplices rather than execute him,” said Bard. “It probably sounds cowardly to dwarrows, but beheading isn’t the way of men, at least not in Dale.”

“We quite understand, lad,” said Bain in a comforting tone.

“I just hope tha’ don’t come back t’ bite us,” muttered Dwalin.

“It won’t,” said Legolas. He’d heard everything quite clearly. “When Ada learned about that last load of wagons going off to Mordor, he rode his elk out and stopped them. Calmar saw him and threw himself on Ada’s mercy.”

Legolas snorted at the idea and licked the sauce off his fingers as he’d seen Gimli do before lifting his brow at Bard, adding, “Did you mean to mock him by dressing him that way?”
“Dressing him what way?” Bard asked. “He looked same as always when we put him in the cart.”

“Aye,” said Dwalin. “Put him in with some o’ th’ Dale wives. We figured th’ other men would shank him before they reached Mordor.”

Legolas snickered, “When he came out of it he was dressed like a female of men.”

“Like a what?” Dwalin, Fili, and Kili bellowed.

“He and that associate of his,” explained Legolas, reaching for another rib. “They were dressed as ladies.”

“The other elves didn’t see how it could have fooled anyone, really,” observed Tauriel. “Perhaps they were distracted by the sheer size of Calmar’s…”

She lifted her cupped hands to chest height as though holding a pair of watermelons.

Kili choked, colored, and applied himself to his food.

“To be sure,” she continued, “there were actual females, though none of such a stature. Even that Alfish… Foetid…”

“Alfrid,” Bard stuttered. “His name is… Well, I see your point. Sorry, go on.”

“Alfrid, then. They could see where he might pass for a female. But the volume of his skirts! Like standing in the middle of a horse! How do such females fit through doors?”

“Sideways,” Dis supplied.

“Sideways?” Tauriel exclaimed. “That can’t be practical, unless they fear falling down, then the layers might prop them up somehow.”

She listed to one side in her chair, face intent with the experiment.

“I’m going to assume,” said Thorin, “that King Thranduil didn’t take pity on him.”

“No,” said Legolas, “he took pity on everyone else. He had the guards free Calmar into his ‘protection’, then Ada killed him.”

Everyone at the table stared.

By now Legolas had sauce in his hair, but he hardly seem to notice.

“When he told me what he did I said, ‘You said you would free him.’, and Ada said, ‘I did, I freed his ugly head from his vile body and I saved us from that hideous hat.’. Apparently it looked like a violet salamander.”

Dori shuddered.

“Perhaps it’s for the best, Thorin dear.”

“Yes,” said Thorin dryly. “Now arda is safe from bad millinery.”

And then, just like that, there were two other elves in the room.
Ori could not have said where they came from or how. He knew he didn’t know them, but since the other dwarrow didn’t reach for their weapons, he assumed they were not hostile.

Perhaps he’d learned his lesson with Tharkûn?

“Lady Galadriel,” said Thorin, rising and bowing. “Had we heard of your approach we would have turned out to greet you.”

“I didn’t approach, I arrived,” said the elf lady. “But I thank you anyway. You called for me?”

“Actually, we didn’t.”

“No matter. I’m here now.”

Although all elves were immortal, Ori felt she was much older than any he’d met so far. Her clothing was white, and rippled without any help from the air, and her hair was so pale gold it was nearly silver. Ori’s neck hair crinkled just from her presence and positively jutted out straight when he saw that her feet did not quite touch the ground.

The male elf with her was shorter, darker, far younger, although still ancient.

She waved a hand in the direction of her companion.

“You’ve met Lord Elrond of Imladris?”

Ori’s eye was caught by Balin, who looked at Elrond with considerable amusement from under his lashes. Something about the name Elrond was familiar. He recalled it meant something about the dome of the-

Oh.

Oh dear.

Elrond and Thorin bowed to one another. Thorin introduced the company and bade the new guests to sit and eat.

“Tea, milady?” Dori asked smoothly, passing down a dainty porcelain cup painted with primroses.

“Yes. Lovely. Thank you.”

“What can we do for you, Lady Galadriel?” Thorin asked.

“Actually, I believe I can help you. When Mount Doom erupts, there’s usually something afoot.”

“Mount Doom erupted,” said Thorin.

“This morning!” Ori cried. “That was it!”

“Nuthin’ like bouncin’ lava t’ wake yeh up.” Dain observed.

“Er, how did you know that was us?” Thorin asked.

“My mystical powers!” she cried, then she laughed at herself and said, “King Thranduil told me.”

“Who th’ fuck told him?” Dwalin muttered.
“He’s such an old gossip,” said Galadriel. “I can say that. Had his suit been successful he would have been my son-in-law.”

“Really?” Dori asked enthusiastically.

“Oh, yes, but Celebrian - that’s my daughter, Celebrian - had already decided upon dear Elrond.”

She put a ridiculously graceful white hand on Elrond’s arm. He blushed like a badger and smiled tightly.

Balin clean his throat suddenly as though he was trying to disguise a laugh.

“Giviris must’ve been a bit of a come down, lad.”

“I thought we were just going to discuss trade,” Elrond explained, looking rueful. “Her majesty was rather stronger than I was expecting and I’m afraid I was as surprised as you were. I don’t recall being so confused in my life.”

“Must’ve though’ yeh were a maid.” Sculdis commented. “She’s never been interested in males.”

“That’s what I had heard.” Elrond nodded in agreement.

“Luncheon, Lady Galadriel?” Dori offered.

“Please!”

“We have several choices really, some quite nice veg.”

“Do you have any more of those ribs?” The lady craned her neck toward the sadly depleted platter.

“Yes, yes we do,” said Dori, startled. “What would you like to go with it?”

“Some elderberry jam?”

“We… have that, yes,” said Dori.

Here ancient eyes lit up.

Literally, Ori noted with a swallow.

Binni shook his head at Dori and went out to the kitchen and returned with the platter replenished and a crock under one arm. Binni pour a generous amount of the shining purple jelly into a bowl and set it and the platter before Galadriel.

She happily dipped each rib delicately in the jam before savoring them.

“So, Master Dori,” she said, “I understand you are a Bearer.”

“Yes, milady.”

“How fortunate for the kingdom. The touch of a Bearer is purifying.”

Dwalin eyed Balin.

“Really?” the soldier asked.
“Really?” Nori and Ori asked together, totally agog.

“I’m as pure as the driven snow,” Dori assured them with a sniff.

Binni snarked into his tea.

“Aye, but yeh drifted,” said Bofur.

“Such a lovely family,” Galadriel said.

Nori spoke up.

“So, yer ladyship, what’s this got to do with the price o’ chicken feed?”

“The treasury,” said Thorin. “Dori can purify Thror’s treasure.”

Dori scoffed.

“I’m not going to go live in the treasury, thank you very much!”

“You don’t have to live in it,” said Galadriel. “You just have to spread your energies there.”

“Spread my energies how?” Dori asked suspiciously.

“You do have a lover?”

Balin, great diplomat of Erebor, choked on his tea and was silent.

“First, you must dance and cavort in the gold,” said Galadriel.

Dwalin turned to Balin.

“Right, lad, get those cavortin’ shoes out.”

Dis, Gridr and the other dams fell in a heap, laughing over each other.

“Sure, yer not too old t’cavort?” Dwalin challenged.

“Hush, dear brother,” Balin growled.

But Dwalin was not bridled. He all but licked his chops.

“Where’re them elf slippers with th’ pointy toes?”

“Oh, no, no,” said Galadriel. “You must go unshod. Naked is best!”

“Cavort-cavort-cavort,” Bofur chortled.

Dori banged a serving spoon on the table.

“That is enough!” he admonished. He turned to Galadriel. “I imagine, milady, you can instruct us on this dance?”

“Indeed! Elrond and I will give you a demonstration. Won’t we, Elrond?”

Elrond’s brows hit the circlet on his forehead then he looked grave, yet horrified.
Roäc flew in.

“Thranduil’s at the gate! Hide the silver!”

Dwalin stretched and rose.

“I’ll go put on me boots an’ give him an escort.”

Galadriel hurriedly finished the elderberry jam.

Dori said gently, “There’s plenty more of that, milady.”

“Don’t tell Thranduil, or there won’t be.”

In a few moments, Dwalin opened the door and Thranduil swept through in all his glory, his robes billowing over the room. The king of Mirkwood was dressed in shades of green and brown and his hair was white gold. His brows were incongruous with his hair, being large, black and almost as bushy as a dwarf’s. His nose was high and he didn’t look particularly pleased to be present. His eyes lit immediately on his son, who sat stuffing his face with ribs, smeared to the eyebrows in sauce.

Thranduil sighed, swiped Thorin’s napkin and wiped Legolas’ face.

“Ada!” Legolas protested, while Gimli snickered and Tauriel looked over at that very interesting corner by the windows.

“If you are going to eat like a fawn, you should expect to be tidied like one.”

Bofur chimed in.

“Look on th’ bright side, lad. He didn’t clean yeh with spit. Leastways, not yet!”

Thranduil tossed down the napkin, bowed to Lady Galadriel with his hand over his heart and demanded of the room, “What goes on here?”

Galadriel sighed.

“You’re just sulking because you weren’t invited.”

Dori smiled sweetly at the king of Mirkwood.

“Lady Galadriel was about to give a demonstration of purification by cavorting. I don’t suppose you have anything to offer in that area?”

Dain pushed a chair out with his foot, tacitly inviting Thranduil to have a seat. In the spirit of avuncular benevolence he offered the elf a toke from his freshly lit silver pipe.

“Ah, no thank you,” said Thranduil.

“Just hold it fer a mo, willya?” said Dain. “Got a squeak.”

Thranduil held the pipe at arm’s length. Dain propped his leg on the table, opened a flap in his trouser leg, then a metal door in his fake leg, plucked a tiny screw driver from behind his ear and fiddled with the cogs which ground away where his shinbone should be.

If Ori was discomfited, Thranduil went luridly grey.
“There we are,” said Dain, slamming the hatch shut and relieving Thranduil of the pipe. “Ta!”

Binni put a plate down in front of Thranduil piled high with toast, tomatoes, mushrooms and ribs all fried together.

The woodland king consumed the tomatoes, mushrooms and toast, while looking askance at the ribs.

“They’re really good, Ada!” Legolas enthused.

But Thranduil had left it too long and Roäc and Garnet relieved him of them.

“Best part,” said Roäc.

“His loss,” said Garnet.

Thranduil inquired of Galadriel how cavorting could purify treasure.

Galadriel murmured something in Quenya.

Thranduil blanched, then turned purple, then took refuge in the mug of ale that Dwalin set before him earlier.

Thorin excused himself and presently returned with an ornately carved wooden box. He sat and placed the box before Thranduil.

The elf’s brows flew to his hairline.

Thorin smiled faintly.

“You son and captain have rendered me great assistance,” he noted.

“Have they?”

Thranduil frowned slightly and opened the box. Startled, he let the lid fall back on its hinges. The gems inside threw sparkles of light around the room. He lifted the object which proved to be a necklace apparently set with stars.

For once he struggled for something to say. He looked at Thorin with changed demeanor.

“These were in your grandfather’s possession,” he said softly.

“Yes, though not in the treasury. I understand you placed the order some time ago. The assistance of your kin has rendered the debt paid in full.”

Thranduil nodded and closed the box.

“I am well satisfied.”

Ori thought probably not, but it was prettily said.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Royal business never ends, there’s a funeral to prepare for and Ori’s in the thick of it and people want to make him thicker! Please do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

They had three days to commit Thror to the stone, in accordance with custom. All dwarrow throughout the mountain and in the Dale were dressed in grey with only iron or silver or clear gems. All but the most necessary businesses were closed in respect for the kingdom’s mourning. All the forges, even the lava ones, were reduced to glow status. There was no music or merriment in the streets. This, however, did not mean the Durins were idle. It was just as well Ori did not need go to the library as it was also closed. They were moving now at speed.

Thror had long since severed all royal ties to the Scribes’ Guild, instead giving the position of ‘royal scribe’ as favors. Most of the real business of the mountain was recorded by Balin’s ever-growing team of ‘secretaries’, who were on loan from the minister of finance, which was to say, Gloin.

Now that the coup was complete, however oddly it happened, Ori was prepared to let more experienced scribes take his place at Thorin’s side.

But Thorin didn’t replace him. Thorin was busy every moment of every day, and wherever he went, he took Ori with him. Ori learned more about running a kingdom in those three days than he’d realized there was to know and Gríadr’s little waist desk became almost a part of him during this time.

He also understood why Thorin never gained weight.

Royal Decree 1.1 in the Reign of His Majesty, King Thorin II of Erebor. All public and private debt currently held against any dwarf or dam under the Mountain of Erebor, or residing in the Kingdom of Dale, or in the surrounding countryside within sound of the River Running, will revert to the hand of the crown and therefrom be paid.

“Even those of nobles?” Ori asked.

“Even those of nobles,” said Thorin. “I want to make it as easy as possible for those who want to follow Frerin to go to Belegost.”

Royal Decree 1.12 in the Reign of His Majesty, King Thorin II...

When they returned to Fundin House for a late lunch Ori soaked his wrist in ice water, but it was Thorin who winced.

“I’m sorry, Ori.”

“That’s alright, Thorin, but I think I may need some help.”

At Brur’s insistence, Buj, Omi and Loli were pressed into service for copying and were very excited to do so. Brur set them up at the big table in the Fundins’ sitting room and Ori was ordered to hand over all his notes. Brur provided the necessary paper and special inks for the proclamations. These would be entered into the library, sent out to all nobles, officials and guilds as well as several to the dwarrow neighborhoods in Dale. During lunch Ori hurried his food, like Thorin and despite Dori’s scoldings, leaving his three friends in a whirl of hard work and the contemplation that their work, their handwriting, would be preserved in the archives of the Great Library in perpetuity, a dizzying sort of immortality for journeyman scribes.

Royal Decree 1.16 in the Reign of His Majesty, King Thorin II…Any dwarf or dam of noble station, and all their kith, kin descendants or heirs who now or evermore remove their household from Under the Mountain shall forfeit their land and buildings therein, private and of business, to the hand of the crown.

“They’ll fight yeh on that, laddie,” said Balin. “They won’t go quietly.”
“They’ll go,” said Thorin grimly.

Royal Decree 1.19 in the Reign of His Majesty, King Thorin II… Being the execution warrant for Vors, Lord of Erebor, declared an enemy to the peoples of Erebor and Dale.

“No’ just th’ dwarrow?” asked Balin.
Thorin held up a letter in a plain, even hand, in westron letters.
“Bard has consented.”
“Got it in writing, did yeh? Yeh actually listened t’ somethin’ I said?”
“I do on occasion.”

“… death by beheading by the king’s own hand in the great courtyard before the main gates of Erebor at dawn on the seventh day following the death of King Thror. The body of Lord Vors shall be cast to the mob in accordance with tradition, save his head which shall be displayed at the gates until time, weather and ravens remove it.”

“Gruesome,” said Nori approvingly.
“An’ smart,” said Dwalin. “Th’ nobles who leave with Frerin’ll have t’ ride out past it on their way t’ Beleghost.”
Ori peered up at Thorin.
“Have you ever beheaded anyone?”
“Yes, but I don’t enjoy it.”
“I would never accuse you of that,” said Ori.
Thorin squeezed his shoulder.
“You’re worried about me.”
“Always, since you don’t worry about yourself.”
Thorin called for ponies to be saddled for himself, Ori, Dwalin, and Fili. Ori had noticed that since Dain had arrived, the loyal servants of Dis and Thorin came to Fundin House for the day. Jani and Dis seemed to have made one of the upstairs bedroom at Fundin House their own. Nori and Bofur had a small chamber up there, too. Fili and Kili had also claimed rooms upstairs as had Thorin. The king had also taken over half of Balin’s study which suited both of them well. Dori presided over the kitchen but Mistress Dazla asserted herself as his assistant in all other things household related, making sure Fundin House was always shining. Ori briefly overheard Balin and Dori discussing with Thorin and Gloin about creating a tunnel between the House of Fundin and the House of In and expanding the stable. Ori was amused and happy at this. To have his family all together in one place was comforting. It also allowed Thorin to have impromptu council meetings whenever they were needed.
Ori reflected on this while he and the other three moved off into the receiving room, the huge double doors thrown open to the royal cavern for the day.
“Where are we going this afternoon?” Ori asked Thorin.
“Bard is expecting us in Dale.”
Just then a carriage pulled up before Fundin House and an ancient noble dwarf in elaborate grey robes was assisted down the step by a footman.

“Oh, Mahal,” Thorin breathed. “I should have expected him first.”

“Who is that?” Ori asked.

“Lord Sikar.”

Fili groaned and Dwalin rolled his eyes.

The dwarf was announced by Mistress Dazla in an emotionless voice, disguising her annoyance.

“I beg His Majesty forgive my intrusion,” said Sikar in his creaky, gravelly voice, bowing painfully as he looked as though he was already half way to stone. “I did attempt to call to convey my condolences in person, only to find His Majesty on a visit.”

The censure was barely audible but it was there.

“This is my cousins’ house, Lord Sikar,” said Thorin. “My family is of great comfort to me, as I’m sure yours is to you.”

“Oh. Quite. Quite,” said Sikar, bowing. “Best to have everything dealt with in the family, mind cleared of rash emotions, before His Majesty attempts business of State.”

He bowed again, as if for good measure.

The rest of the company entered, as they were each of them off on assignments of their own, and Lord Sikar looked startled to see so many dwarrow at once. He raised an eyebrow at Bofur and his hat, then his eye lit upon Dori and he bowed yet again.

“Bearer,” he said, all but licking his lips.

“I’m afraid milord has the advantage of me,” said Dori smoothly.

Introductions were made.

Thorin said, “And, of course you are acquainted with Lady Klakuna.”

The edges of Sikar’s beard practically curled.

“Yes, yes, very well,” said Sikar, bowing over her hand. “Lady.”

She sighed, pulling back her fingers as soon as she decently could. Ori would swear she was counting her rings.

“How have you been, Sikki?”

“Desolate without you, Klakuna. Why do you never visit? Surely old Rikut can’t object now that you are … best rid of him.”

“Oh, I won’t have much time for frivolity, Sikki. My dear Dori will need my help, as the new head of the family.”

This was news to Ori, and he wasn’t the only one.

“Well! Congratulations are in order, Lord Dori,” said Sikar, practically batting his lashes.

“Lady,” Dori corrected.

“Er… lady?”

“At the moment. I’m afraid it will depend upon my mood which I choose for the day.”

Mistress Dazla and two maids curtsied immediately to reinforce Lady Dori’s mood. Ori thought he saw them stifling giggles.

“That will make it difficult to address your lordship without insult from day to day,” said Sikar, bemused and befuddled. “How shall one know what to call you?”

“I suppose one will wait until I call upon one,” said Dori with a winsome smile.

Abashed, Sikar made a strategic retreat back to Thorin.

“I’m eager to see what direction Erebor will take in the coming year. I’m sure once His Majesty has emerged from bereavement, He’ll wish to address His council?”

“Thank you,” said Thorin with a smile and a nod, “I already have.”

Sikar opened his mouth but paused before he spoke, as if reviewing what this might mean.

“I was unaware the council had met. Where are His Majesty’s preferred chambers?”

“The breakfast table. As you know, these meetings are not public.”

“But, Your Majesty, I served Your grandfather faithfully for Eleven decades!”

“And I thank you for your long, devoted service. No doubt now you will be relieved to devote yourself to your family and your craft.”
“Er… that… may I ask His Majesty, who now serves as royal council?”
“You may. The House of Fundin and the House of Groin.”
“His Majesty's kinsmen, of course.”
“The Siblings Ur and the Siblings Ri.”
“They… I don’t believe I’m familiar with the family Ur. Are they some lesser branch of His Majesty’s amad’s family?”
“The Ur are Broadbeams,” said Thorin, indicating the family behind him. Jani chose that moment to adjust her breasts around her equipment straps. “Lady Dori’s brother Ori is married to Captain Dwalin and is my close associate.”
Ori fought the urge to wave.
“But, Your Majesty, the Ur and Master Ori, they are not noble.”
“There is no law which demands they be so.”
“No law, certainly, but by tradition the council has always consisted of nobles. Tradition is vital.”
“Of course. Master Ori, will you please make note of this? Every dwarf or dam at the table this morning who was not then noble is now, by my decree, ennobled.”
“Done, your majesty.” Ori wrote on his waist desk with great flourishing movements of his pen and promptly passed the paper to Loli, who had come through to see what was going on, bowed to Thorin and took it back through to the table and squared up to the paper to make it so.
“Unless the lords or lady candidate have some objection?” Thorin asked, looking around.
“Naw,” said Bofur. “I don’t mind. Long’s I don’t hafta give up me hat.”
“I would never presume to ask,” said Thorin. He turned to Lord Sikar. “There. All tidied. I bid you an excellent day, milord. You are dismissed.”
Rather stunned, the rejected nobleman went.
Thorin glanced over to arras by the fireplace and lifted his chin.
A flutter of cloth was the only sound to betray Nori’s exit.
“Ah, t’ be a fly on tha’ wall,” said Balin.
“Nori will be,” said Thorin. “I suspect the wall in question will be Frerin’s.”
“Yeh think he’ll try t’ persuade Frerin t’ contest yer right?”
“He’ll try, but Frerin’s already half way out of the mountain with a new crown. If there’s trouble it won’t come now, maybe in six months or so.”
Thorin turned to Balin and grinned.
“In the meantime, we’ll just have to put such a loss as Lord Sikar behind us and bravely carry on.”
“Er, Thorin,” said Bofur.
“Yes, Lord Bofur?”
“Well, that answers that. Y’know we ain’t exactly lordly.”
“Lord Sikar’s father was a cheese monger. He used to prop his feet up on the table and pick his teeth with his fingernail during meetings. He was ennobled because he promised my grandfather free cheese for life. I dare say you’ve already exceeded him.”
Bombur cleared his throat.
“Thorin, I can’t leave the inn, as much as it’s an honor to be included. Bifur and I are needed at home.”
“Understood. We still have a quorum without you. I wouldn’t keep you from your family for long stretches of time.”
“We will, of course, attend you as needed,” said Bombur.
Bifur added his affirmative in inglishmek. Apparently he wasn’t feeling very verbal at the moment.
“I’ll take you both up on that, trust me,” said Thorin.
Ori threw a teasing glance at Thorin.
“And the elves and men, your majesty?”
Thorin slewed a look at him.
“There is no need, most royal of scribes, they are already extremely noble.”
They dismounted at the main square in Dale and were there for only moments when they were descended upon by a pack of elderly dams, who all seemed to coo in unison.
Dwalin muttered, “Brace yerselves, lads.”
Like a wave breaking on a wall the dams reached them, proffering sympathy and baked goods in great profusion.
“Oh, yeh poor lad - er, majesty! Yer beard an’ all. He wasn’t worth it, deary, fer all he was yer udad. He wasn’t worth yer beard!”
“Isn’t our Prince Fili handsome! What a fine couple they’ll make. She’s not spindly like some of those women, she’s a hearty lass and she’ll make them plenty o’ babies, mark me!” “Here now, King Thorin, you take these rolls. You’re so thin! How will you ever run a kingdom when you can’t hear for your belly growling?”
“Oh, Mahal, here comes Lord Vors’ sister. Yeh best look out, yer majesty. Don’ take nothin’ tha’ come outta her kitchen. Dam can’t cook t’ save her life.”
“Oh, and here’s some rolls for our Master Ori. You need some building up if yer to keep that great strapping husband of yers happy.”
This dam turned and gave Dwalin a saucy wink.
They made very slow progress across the square, and Ori could see Bard watching them from the step of his temporary headquarters, smiling and snickering.
When they made it to the step they had a parade of dwarrow and men behind them.
“How do you fare, King Bard?” Thorin asked.
“Much better now,” Bard replied.
Thorin mouthed the word ‘bastard’ at him.
They all went inside - just Ori, Dwalin, Thorin and Fili with Bard, thankfully, though Ori feared the others might try to shoehorn themselves in. But Bard hadn’t had enough time to even pick councilors.
Ori sagged against his husband.
“Can we go kill some orcs now? I need a vacation.”
“Sounds good,” said Dwalin.
They sat at a scarred table surrounded by mismatched chairs, all original to the squat, square building. It had once been the detached kitchen of an ancient mansion. It was very small, just a few rooms, its chief advantages being its sturdiness and a hearth that hadn’t fallen in. They could hear badgers playing in the ruins of the old walled herb garden just outside.
Sigrid entered with ale, bread and cheese and sat beside her father. Fili beamed at her. Sigrid blushed but was otherwise composed.
“Personally, things are going well,” said Bard. “I haven’t had my throat cut yet.”
“Me neither. Encouraging, isn’t it,” Thorin agreed.
“Publicly, things aren’t quite so shiny. Until last week the Master controlled all the farmland around Dale. He dictated what we’d plant and how much, so as to make sure there was a shortfall of something important.”
“And that drove up the prices,” Thorin concluded.
“We’d already planted for the year when he was removed. It was going to be a very, very bad year. Even looking at adding cold weather crops, a lot of our poorer families will have a bad time of it.”
“No,” said Thorin. “There’s enough money in Erebor to bring food from the four corners of Arda. We can get it here and we can distribute it. No one is going hungry.”
“And what is it you wish in exchange for this largesse, King Thorin?”
“Your immortal soul, King Bard.”
“Rather cheaply bought, Thorin,” said Bard into his cup.
“Da!” chastised Sigrid and gave Ori and exasperated look as she shook her head at her father. Ori just smiled and held his tongue.
“We’ve spoken of this before, Bard.” Thorin continued. “I have no intention of going back on my word.” He signaled to Ori. “I am now in a position where I can commit that word to paper. We will happily tide you over until you have the planting under control.”

Tilda skipped in, up to her father and clambered into his lap.

“When is your birthday, King Thorin?” she demanded.

“It’s Midwinter Day,” Thorin replied solemnly.

“Good, I have lots and lots of time then.”

She jumped off and bounced away.

“Should I be afraid?” Thorin asked.

“Why should I be the only one?” Bard replied.

“At least she didn’t ask how old I was,” Thorin reflected.

“She assumes you and I are the same age: two inches from decrepit.”

After an hour’s discussion, which defined the manner and intricacies of the trade and supply lines, they decided it was time to brave the square again. Here they discovered things had proceeded apace in their absence.

Furh’nk looked apologetic and each of his soldiers was steadfastly facing forward, spine stiff, holding baskets and bags that smelled suspiciously like baked goods. There were more containers on the benches nearby and a royal wagon was pulling away with still more.

Yet more elderly dams had descended upon the square, their numbers swelled by the sisters of men.

“Thorin,” Ori whispered.

“Don’t show fear,” said Thorin. “It just riles them up.”

To Ori’s horror, he was the sole target of their concern now. Despite a balmy breeze, apparently they thought he wasn’t wearing enough to keep his neck and hands warm. The mitts were rather well-done, he thought, though he’d never go through fifty pair in his lifetime, and each scarf was louder and warmer than the one before. He peered up over the top of the last they’d draped over him and scowled at his snickering husband.

“Yeh look adorable,” said Dwalin.

“I look like a sheep’s worst nightmare,” he breathed in exasperation. “It’s very, very heavy. I’ll never get on Honda wearing all this.”

“Here, gimme some o’ tha’. Ah, so yeh are under there after all.”

“You’re sleeping in the barn tonight.”

“With a bunch o’ naked sheep I’m guessin’.”

“When did they even have the time to make all this? This one has little books and pens knit into it! This one is… Are those radishes?”

“Upside down hearts?” Fili guessed.

Thorin cleared his throat, intoning sonorously,

“Those are representations of Dwalin’s behind.”

“They are no’!” Dwalin roared.

“So they are,” crowed Ori delightedly. “So they are. Look, Dwalin, they even have your dimples.”

“Master Ori! Oh, Master Ori! There he is, Margr, told yeh!”

“Well, bash on with it, Vi, he don’t have all day.”

Facing away from the approaching dams, Ori indulged in a wince, then plastered a smile on his face and turned around.

“Mistress Margr! Mistress Vi! A good afternoon to you!”

They were obviously sisters, their hair and ornaments identical. They were also obviously retired from some heavy trade, for they were as tall and broad as Dwalin and they stood shoulder to shoulder, as formidable as any battlement.

Mistress Margr put her hand over her heart, her impressive bosom straining her tunic.

“Well! Master Ori! It does me heart good to see yeh.”

“An’ mine,” said Vi.

“When we saw th’ house in Steam Alley shut, we thought f’r a moment yeh’d all been pitched “Out!” said Margr.

“An’ after all Dori’s strife an’ struggle!” Vi added.

“I said t’ my Rogi, yeh remember me Rogi, th’ pair a’ yeh were badgers together. He finally got out o’ th’ lock up last week an’ he’s livin’ with us f’r a time, I said, Rogi, yeh wouldn’t believe, but th’ house in Steam Alley’s shut! But Rogi said yeh weren’t turned out, but had all got married, ‘r gone into th’ army ‘r something.”

Vi interjected, “An’ we said, What? All three at once? Not bloody likely, chuck!”

“An’ then Ribdis from next door dropped by f’r a visit,” Margr continued, “an’ said she’d seen yeh here with th’ king an’ th’ prince, yer pardon, yer worships,” she curtseyed, “an’ that great, strappin’ Captain Dwalin an’ yer married after all! An’ so young! Oh, let us give yeh a kiss!”

They did so, Ori thanking them nervously.

“An’ one f’r Captain Dwalin!” Margr cried, throwing her arms rapturously around the startled Dwalin.

Furh’nk, visibly horrified, was obviously unsure whether he should intervene or guard the king and prince from similar affection.

Dwalin had only just recovered when Vi took her turn.

“Er, thank yeh, Mistress Margr, Mistress Vi,” said Dwalin, bowing.

“An’ many happy returns o’ th’ day!” Margr cried, apparently thinking this was somehow appropriate.

Vi dug her elbow in the vicinity of Margr’s ribs.

“Time t’ go, hen. I’m sure Master Ori’s very busy writin’ thin’s down f’r the king an’ all.”

They curtsied once more in tandem and they were gone.

The silence was startling.

“What in Mahal’s blessed name was tha’?” Dwalin asked.

“You want the long version or the short version?” Ori asked.

“I take it this gossip has some value beyond entertainment?”

“Not bloody likely,” said Fili, nodding vigorously, then looking suddenly horrified. “Mistress Margr and Mistress Vi won’t expect an invitation to tea or something, will they?”
Of course they will! Dori will have to invite them since they came all that way just to congratulate me. That’s why they did it! Imagine, Margr and Vi of Steam Alley, getting a personal invitation to Fundin House to take tea with the Bearer? Not just tea with the whole town and meeting the princess, but just themselves invited especially! Seeing all those knickknacks and ornaments? Eating with that silverware? They’ll think they’ve died and gone to Mahal’s Halls, and they’ll have gossip to lord over Steam Alley for the rest of their days!”

“Um,” said Fili.

“Shall I make sure it’s when you’re out on patrol?”

“Yes?” Fili asked in a small voice.

Ori looked over at Furh’nk, who was striving to be brave.

“You too, Furh’nk?”

“If it’s all convenient, Master Ori.”

“Er-” Dwalin started.

“You’re doomed,” concluded Ori.

Thorin hunched over his pony, arm on his belly, laughing.

“Shall I ask Dori to invite you, too, my king?” threatened Ori.

“Please do. I must hear all this excellent gossip.”

“They’ll kiss you,” Ori reminded him.

“I’ll suffer.”

By the time they reached Fundin House they were all bright red with laughter, in stark contrast to their mourning garb. They collapsed on the furniture in the receiving room, trying in vain to catch their breaths.

Dori swept in.

“What in Arda have you done?”

Dwalin leapt up and snapped to military attention, barking out,

“Master Dori! It is me pleasure t’ inform yeh tha’ yer youngest brother has acquitted himself honorably in battle with th’ most ferocious creatures in Middle Earth - an army a’ dwarrow grandmothers!”

Dwalin saluted smartly then swept aside to reveal the table where the soldiers had stacked their sugary gifts.

“Behold! Th’ spoils o’ war!” Dwalin bellowed with an exaggerated sweep of both arms and another bow.

Dori’s eyebrows flew up.

“Well, I see you have all been very busy.”

Kili entered, already shouting, “What’s for dinner?”

“Rolls,” said Fili.

“Lots of rolls,” added Ori.

“You got those in town?” Kili asked. “Idad, those could be poisoned! You weren’t afraid to take them?”

“I was more afraid not to take them,” chuckled Thorin, sprawled in the deep armchair. “Roäc ‘vetted’ them, if you’re worried.”

“Still,” Dori observed, “I can’t see you eating all those on top of supper.”

“I had hoped you would know who needed them most,” said Thorin.

“I certainly do.” Dori was all business. “Where is our Furh’nk?”

Furh’nk looked in from his post at the door.

“Bearer?”

“You round up a few of your comrades and take these down to Mistress Annis’ rooming house in Steam Close. Make sure she knows I sent you or she won’t let you in. If you put them on the parlor table, every one of them will be gone by nightfall.”

“Immediately, Bearer.”

“And mind you each take one for yourselves.”
“Yes, Bearer.”
“You’re looking a might peaky.”
Ori quickly donated all the knitwear he had received, save the scarf with the pencils and the one covered with tiny ‘Dwalin arses’, to the pile. Personally he thought Furh’nk was the least ‘peaky’ dwarf he’d ever met, but Ori wouldn’t get between Dori and one of his ‘projects’. Apparently this one involved making Furh’nk as wide as he was tall.
“That’s an excellent choice, Dori,” said Thorin. “Thank you.”
Kili looked crestfallen, so Fili picked him out a blackberry jelly bun, which Kili took gratefully and ate in two bites.
Dwalin turned to Thorin.
“D’yeh think he even tastes his food before it hits his stomach?”
“Did we at that age?”
They rested for a couple of hours then Dori sent them all to dress. Thorin looked grim but resigned. They had Thror’s funeral tomorrow and Thorin had arranged for Frerin to celebrate his nuptials that evening. All the Fundins had talked Thorin out of holding the ceremony at Fundin House before he’d even had a chance to voice it. It was to be held in Thorin and Dis’ old home. With the assistance of Mistress Dazla and the loyal servants, Thorin and Dis had moved all their own and the royal family’s personal effects to Fundin house, so the old residence was now merely an empty, though elegantly appointed, meeting place.
Thus the Durins were waiting in the receiving room of Thorin and Dis’ old home for the Rikanta to arrive with T’dillah. Dis attended, with Fili at her side every moment, but Kili was out in Dale on patrol. Balin, Dwalin, Ori and Lady Klakuna rounded out Thorin’s party. Technically Lady Klakuna was representing the head of her family, so she had to attend, but she refused to mix with the rest of the Rikanta clan and placed herself near Ori at all times.
“Did you find the crowns you wanted in the treasury?” Thorin asked Frerin. Frerin wore blue court robes, his second best set, since his first had been aerated by the ravens. He was still a little scraped up from his ordeal, but the swelling had gone down considerably.
“Yes.”
“And you asked Dori to handle them to purify them?”
“Yes,” said Frerin wearing a puzzled look. “But I had to have them cleaned carefully first. They seemed to have been caked with dried something or other.”
“Really? Extraordinary.” Thorin’s face was bland but Ori wanted to crawl up the chimney. Dori had used the ‘strain of the cleansing’ as an excuse for his absence, but it was Ori who actually felt strained.
Mistress Dazla ushered in the bride’s family. Everyone except the bride and groom (and the bride’s mother) still wore mourning grey. T’dillah arrived dressed in a red brocade gown with gold trim, rather daring for dwarrow bridal colors. Klakuna told Ori quietly that it had belonged to T’dillah’s mother Bathis, that skinny dwarrow dam over there, wearing that rancid green dress with too many ruffles, so deedy! Bathis had fancied herself a trendsetter in her youth, and the dress looked as though it only needed taking in at the bodice for it to be ready in time for the wedding.
“I remain unimpressed,” Lady Klakuna assured Ori.
“A queen,” Bathis repeated to herself under her breath, over and over. The dyed green chicken feathers waving in her coiffure looked ready to wilt. “My daughter will be a queen.”
The small throne room-come-drawing room provided a pleasant place for the ceremony. Thorin stood before the roaring fireplace and Frerin was straight backed and looking very proud of himself as T’dillah’s parents escorted her into the room. The Rikanta family applauded and complimented the couple.
Thorin used the ancient marriage rite to marry them and there were sighs of delight over this. Frerin was given leave to salute his bride and Ori was unimpressed with the amount of time they took over thoroughly exploring each other’s mouths with their tongues.
The delighted noises the Rikanta made drowned out Dwalin’s hissed whisper to Ori, ‘He mus’ be inspectin’ her back teeth.”
Ori stifled a giggle and nudged his husband.
Lady Klakuna told them in an undertone, “He won’t find any. T’dillah had six of her back teeth removed due to too many sweets as a tween.”
The bridal couple finally broke for air and the assembled family exploded into loud applause and Bathis burst into a flood of tears. Dwalin leaned over to murmur in Ori’s ear.
“I wanted t’ give yeh somethin’ like this, but, yeh know, happy.”
“A wedding is just one day,” whispered Ori. “You’ve made me happy every day since.”
Dwalin smiled lovingly down at him, then froze and his smile turned naughty.
“Aye, we were wed, then courted an’ fell in love, then bedded each other. Remind me t’ propose t’ yeh.”
“Tonight?” Ori said, batting his eyelashes playfully. Dwalin grinned and winked.
Balin cleared his throat and looked pointedly at Dwalin. The assembled drew back once more and Thorin came to Dwalin and Ori’s side. Since Thorin had not been crowned yet, Balin did the honors.
“Frerin, Prince o’ th’ House o’ Durin, step forward.
Frerin did so, kneeling somewhat painfully at Balin’s feet.
Balin looked for the crown which should have been on a blue velvet pillow on a chest, but, having been encouraged by Klakuna, Dwalin was twirling it on his finger.
“Gimme that,” Balin hissed, snatching it, but with a twinkle in his eye.
Balin held the crown over Frerin’s head.
“Frerin, Son o’ Thrain, Son o’ Thror, do yeh swear t’ uphold th’ laws an’ customs set down by yer forefather Durin th’ Deathless which were given t’ him by Our Maker Mahal?”
“I so swear.”
“Do yeh swear t’ answer th’ call o’ th’ high king o’ dwarrow, providing aid in arms or sustenance in times o’ strife?”
“I so swear.”
“Do yeh swear no’ t’ be a little sh- short tempered with yer consort, yer subjects an’ comrades at arms?”
Frerin raised an eyebrow.
“I so swear.”
“Then I crown yeh Frerin I, King o’ Beleghost. May Mahal grant yeh Wisdom, Strength an’ Prosperity.”
Balin placed the crown on his head. It was a little small, but it didn’t tilt or slide off, to Ori’s disappointment.
Frerin rose and turned to receive a courtesy bow from the assembled witnesses, which he thoroughly enjoyed.
Balin moved back.
Frerin held out his hand to T’dillah, who all but squeaked as she bustled forward to kneel before him.
“Mahal’s blood,” Ori muttered, “she’s panting like a spaniel.”
“Not to worry, Ori dear,” Klakuna murmured. “She only drools in her sleep.”
Ori wanted to sink through the floor. Dwalin was shaking but silent.
Frerin said very grandly, “T’dillah of the House of Durin, Queen of Beleghost.”
He placed the crown on her head and raised her up to stand beside him.
She was given her courtesy bow, which made her giggle.
“Thank you!” she cried, rapturously. “Queen T’dillah! How well that sounds!”
Bathis was still weeping.
Thorin came forward to give his blessing. T’dillah offered him a rather damp piece of black paper. Even from where Ori stood he could see the metallic silver ink on it.
“I wrote this poem as a gift for my darling Frerin,” T’dillah gushed. “Will you please read it, your majesty?”
“Aloud?”
“Well, yes.”
Ori could practically hear Thorin thinking: Mahal’s hairy arse!
So Thorin read, and all the while T’dillah clasped her hands and held them to her bosom, mouthing the words to Frerin as Thorin spoke them:

“Rubies are Red,
Sapphires are Blue,
Diamonds do Sparkle,
Just like my Love for You.
There are Rocks in Life,
Through them We Shall Hew,
And Diamonds Shall Sparkle,
Just like my Love for You.
The Rocks are Solid,
Solid and True,
And Still Diamonds Always Sparkle,
Just like my Love for You.”

Bathis gave a cry of ecstasy and passed out, completely overcome
Klakuna muttered, “Silly chit should stick with dirges.”

They adjourned to the dining room for the wedding supper. Ori found himself oddly nostalgic in the large, silvery chamber, though he’d first seen it not two weeks before. The table had been expanded with several leaves, with Frerin and T’dillah together at one end on a small, red velvet upholstered divan made of oak as symbolic king and queen of their wedding day.

Though the party was relatively small and sedate, with no music or dancing due to the kingdom being in mourning, they certainly would not pass on the traditional wedding supper and a sumptuous feast was served with all the traditional food and drink.

Ori felt ravenous, but he looked at the food askance.
Thorin saw his discomfort and leaned in.
“What’s the matter?” he asked quietly.
“Did the Rikanta provide all this?”
“It came from the royal kitchens,” said Thorin. “I’ve never employed a royal food taster and I’m not going to start at my own brother’s wedding.”

T’dillah and Frerin fed each other spoonfuls of a scaldingly spicy soup, the idea being that the more they could swallow the better their chances for healthy dwarflings. There was an entire young goat roasted with turnips, potatoes and carrots. Somehow the cook had braced the goat in such a way that it stood on its four legs with a large carrot still with its greens hanging off it in the goat’s mouth. The veggies were piled about to look like the rocky land beneath its hooves and there were bundles of herbs with spring flowers scattered on them for the complete meadow effect. There was much teasing involved in the bride and groom sharing the goat’s heart.

There was a gravy course, beef with chunks of morel, and a great big platter of chicken cut into strips and served in a spicy sauce of peppers, nuts and bean shoots.

There were sausages wrapped in fried scallion pancakes. The dwarrow snickered but no one refused them.

The dessert was T’dillah’s favorite. It was a four tiered, molded white gelatin, flavored with vanilla, sugar and cream. It had green sweet spearmint sauce poured over it and was decorated with sugared spearmint leaves.

And then the serious drinking began. Conversation was kept to neutral subjects, mostly the couple’s dreams about their kingdom and how it should be decorated.

Finally, just before they retired for the night, the happy couple gifted each unpartnered dwarf and dam who wished it a ginger-spiced cake stuffed with golden raisins to sleep on, the better to dream of the face of their One.

T'dillah shyly approached Thorin and put one in his hand.
“Er, thank you… namad,” he said.
She blushed and shrugged.
“It couldn’t hurt.”
Klakuna murmured to Ori, “It will if there’s a piece of glass in it.”
Dwalin choked back a laugh.
Eventually the Durins went back to Fundin House and the Rikanta hardly noticed, for there was still food to eat and ale to drink.

“Do you think Frerin and T’dillah will be happy together?” Ori asked Dwalin.
“They’re each other’s One. They got a shot at it.”
“Do you think they love each other?”
“I don’ know. They each have wha’ they want. She’s go’ a rich, handsome king fer a husband.
He’s go’ a kingdom, wealth, an’ a pretty heiress queen who thinks he hung th’ bleedin’ moon. Sad truth is, there’s been many a royal marriage made on far less.”
“At least they got to meet before the wedding,” said Ori philosophically.
“Aye, an’ it wasn’ hate at first sight.”
“Don’t be silly,” Ori giggled. “Nori didn’t hate you, he just loathed you.”
Family, Friends, and Funereal Functions

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Clear your throats, friends, it’s time for us to sing dirges for the late King Thror. We’d also like to take this moment to thank our dear reader Arel for the fabulous plot bunny of Thorin as a wee badgerling scampering about. Please do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori stared at himself in the mirror. Dwalin was putting some last touches to the gleam of his axes. Dipfa fuss ed around Ori.

“I still can’t believe Thror is dead.” Ori said softly.

“And thus you need to look well as the husband of the captain of the guard,” Dipfa said.

She brushed his back free of imaginary lint and fluffed his hair a little. Ori wore a grey version of his court robe. Dipfa was quite observant of tradition but her sop to fashion was that one of Ori’s socks was a shade lighter than the other. Ori caught Dwalin’s eye over this and they exchanged smiles.

Dwalin wore a matching grey to Ori but Ori still thought he looked magnificent in it.

Dori bustled in.

“Pet, I have a cap for you. Light hair is usually covered in times like these.”

“Oh, yes, Master Dori!” Dipfa was delighted.

Ori turned.

Dori’s hair was covered up in a long grey net that came down to his waist. Lady Klakuna, who seemed to have become Dori’s shadow, pattered in after him.

“Dori, dearest,” she began, “are you sure you’ll be alright for this? I’ve seen a royal funeral. I was a mere child, of course, but it was devastatingly sad.”

Dori turned an amused smile on her.

“Now, dearest grandmamma, I understand your worry but do think of poor Thorin. I must be there to support him in his despondency.”

“True,” Klakuna sighed gustily. “You are a proper Bearer, so kind, so very worthy. Oh dear, I feel a trifle faint.”

Dori swept off to the kitchen with her, promising to make her something he called a vinaigrette.

In a few moments, they were all gathered in the main entrance to the royal cavern. They were once more in the carriages they had ridden to Dori’s presentation. The carriages were swathed in grey fabric. There was a large amount of matching grey ponies, each blanketed in grey material. Harley, Honda, and the others were all safely locked in the stable.

Tharkûn rode with Dis, Thorin, Fili, and Kili. Dain followed with his family and then the Fundins including Lady Klakuna. The house of the Sons of Groin and the Urs brought up the rear.

They rolled off down the streets to the main hall once more. This was the opposite of what they had experienced at the presentation. The lamps were shuttered to half light, all windows were closed and only suspicions of light cracked out. Any dwarf they passed only bowed a grey hooded head or their dark hair, loose and unadorned.

It was an unearthly ride. Ori, despite not having any liking for the late king, was depressed by the gloom. The cap felt funny on his head. It was, for the most part, like a hood but it split above his ears so they showed and the two lengths coming down on either side of his chin had their ends embroidered with the Brothers Ri pattern.

The entire mountain seemed shrouded in deep sorrow. It was the falsity of this which disturbed him most. To Ori, it was as though the entire kingdom had become a theater and everyone played a part strange to themselves.

The carriages stopped at the main entrance of the mountain. The entrance was full. To the left stood a contingent of elves. Ori gazed wonderingly at them. King Thranduil was there and beside him was Legolas with Tauriel behind him. A cadre of elven soldiers followed. The king of Mirkwood was dressed in shades of brown and grey.

Beside Thranduil was Lord Elrond. The elf next to him was much paler in skin tone, dressed in varying shades of white, and his hair was a flat sheet of gold. Thranduil introduced him as Celeborn, Lady Galadriel’s husband. Behind them was their captain, Haldir. Galadriel, like the other elves, had politely covered her hair in a long trailing grey mantle.

To the right, Bard stood with his family around him and behind them were many, many people from the Dale. Ori stared. He wondered if the entire population of Dale had showed up. All of them were dressed in black as was the usual color of grief among men. Each male had a length of grey material knotted about their upper right arms. The females wore grey gloves and hats.

Unlike her people, Sigrid wore a grey dress trimmed with black and her hair was caught up in the ancient povyazka of the people who had travelled from the east to settle in Dale. The open lacework threaded with black ribbons trailed down all around her head making her seem almost fragile in appearance.

Thorin and Dis stepped down from the carriages followed by the two princes. They bowed to both men and elves and Thorin thanked them for their kindness and respect in attending. Dis echoed this. They all came forward and clasped hands first with the elves and then with the men. The four elf males murmured condolences but Galadriel said nothing. Ori glanced at Dori to catch Galadriel giving Dori a small, knowing smile. Dori nodded and smiled back.

When Thorin shook hands with Bard, Fili went to Sigrid and bowed over her hand. She smiled and said something that made them both smile. Tilda clasped her hands and bounced a little. Bain made a grimace while pretending to stick his finger down his throat.

Tharkûn got down from the carriage and hurried forward, saying, “Wait. Someone else is coming.”
A figure strode up, passing the people of Dale who drew aside in startlement. Ori blinked and shook his head before looking again. The figure as it came forward was obviously much taller than all the people of Dale and the elves. He was like a man but larger and he was as hairy as the most respectable dwarf. His hair rose far above his head more like fur than hair. His clothing was as simple as that of any poor Dale person.

Tharkûn welcomed him and brought him forward to meet Thorin.

“Your majesty, this is Beorn, Guardian of the Valley. Beorn, Thorin Oakenshield, King-To-Be Under the Mountain.”

Thorin and Beorn bowed slightly to each other and, after looking Thorin over, Beorn said,

“Condolences or congratulations, dwarf king?”

Dis choked a little, but Thorin’s face remained calm.

“My people and I thank you for your condolences, Master Beorn, and are honored you came to support us in our mourning.”

The elves, Beorn, and the Dale royals joined the progress, Dis having arranged carriages for people in advance. The men and women of Dale and the cadre of elven soldiers following, mingling with the dwarrow. In a long procession, the carriages began to follow a dark tunnel that sank down inside the mountain, spiraling beneath, it was lit only with phosphorus and the walls chiseled with prayers to Mahal.

After a long time Ori saw huge doors open before them. Soldiers came and the royal party alighted from their coaches and went forward on foot. Ori heard the beginnings of an ancient dirge. He followed Dori and Balin through the doors.

Once more they entered the enormous cavern where they had laid out Thror’s body. This time, coming from these great doors, Ori noticed small paths and steps upward and down, winding between huge stalactites and stalagmites which hung and rose all about them. Great torches blazed everywhere.

“Tain’t right,” a voice near Ori barked. “Shouldn’t have non-dwarrow seen’ this, bein’ here.”

Ori glanced over and saw a noble dwarf frowning at two elvish soldiers who were waiting as a young mother aided a woman of great age to climb a stair.

A dam sneered at the noble as she went forward to assist.

“Oh, wha’ yeh think they’re gonna do? Tell someone we’ve rites f’r our dead? Who in Arda doesn’t’?”

“They might copy ‘em!” was the argument.

“Aye, so they’ll be takin’ it up with Mahal then, won’t they?” The dam looked up at the elvish guards, jerked her head at the noble dwarf and pointed at her temple.

“Off his lump, he is! Are yeh lot goin’ t’ copy us then?”

The two guards looked at each other puzzled, then turned back to the dam.

“Why?” one asked politely, his tone was respectful and his curiosity genuine. “We are not Ori smiled to himself, following Dori along the edge of the chasm.

As the noble party once again headed toward the steel bridge to cross to the plinth, the other dwarrow and people behind turned off following the paths. Ori looked around as they made their way forward. Although the torches were large, the vastness of the cavern was still mostly in darkness, making them mere pinpoints of light.

Ori’s eyes tuned in to the dimness; he began to see that all around the cavern outer circles were filling with mourners. He caught sight of Frerin with T’dillah, still in bridal colors, but covered in gray cloaks, walking with the Rikanta clan. Ori watched as the entire population of Erebor and much of Dale filled the cavern but still it felt empty.

As before, they crossed the steel bridge one by one to gather there. The great block of black obsidian was clear and the lights surrounding it were still lit. Ori wondered where Thror’s body had gone.

His questioning look was noticed by Balin, who murmured that it had been removed and pall bearers would be bringing it back in on a bier from the door as the ceremony started. Once more they gathered near. The elvish nobles and Bard and his family closed behind them.

Bard looked to Thorin who nodded. Bard turned and waved to a group of Dale women standing before the great doorway, and they readied themselves.

Ori recognized the funeral song of the people of Dale. The group of nine women sang their mourning. Despite its size the cavern framed the sound beautifully. Ori’s fingers itched for his pens. This was history. Never before had the people of men or elves entered this place, to say nothing of participating in such a rite.

The song came to an end. The women bowed and stepped away. King Thranduil nodded to Legolas. The elven prince stepped forward and sang in Sindarin of the sorrow of passing.

When the final note died away, the sound of heavy boots rang. Oin went to the point of the plinth and began the opening verse of the dwarrow dirge of mourning. After the first two lines, the rest of the royals joined in and then the voice of every dwarf was raised.

The squad of soldiers entered the cavern, bearing King Thror’s body. Unlike the first time, the late king was not laid upon their shields but on a plate of polished steel. The dirge went on as he was carried around the periphery of the great canyon. The dirge ended when the circle was complete.

Balin took Oin’s place and chanted in khuzdul about putting a king in the cavern to return to the stone and enter Mahal’s Halls to meet with his ancestors. While Balin chanted, the soldiers took Thror’s body around the periphery once again.

Once more the voices of dwarrow swam around the cavern in another dirge. For the third time the soldiers carried Thror’s body around the periphery.

Finally Thorin came to the head of the obsidian block. He looked about the cavern before he, too, began to speak in khuzdul about Kingship. The soldiers stopped at the foot of the iron bridge, holding the bier high, this time crossing to stop near Thorin.

Under the solemn speech, there seemed to be a noise like a drumbeat, though there were no musicians on the plinth, or anywhere else Ori could see.
Nor was it terribly musical.

Perhaps it was martial?

The longer he thought about it the louder it became, so much so that he knew he was not the only one who heard it. Distracted, dwarf, elf, and man looked all around them.

If Thorin had been worried about how the mourners would react to his speech he needn’t have, Ori thought, because no one was paying attention to him anymore. Lady Klakuna placed a delicate hand on Dori’s forearm. Elrond and Celeborn exchanged raised eyebrows. Thranduil looked at Beorn, who had his eyes turned toward the huge open doorway. Even Tharkûn looked worried, but Lady Galadriel remained perfectly serene with a secretive little smile.

The drumbeat grew to a pounding and seemed to circle the entire, vast chamber, as if something very large was moving in the tunnel the funeral procession had come down. It was coming very fast.

Thorin stopped speaking. The pallbearers shifted about, looking.

Through the huge doorway burst a familiar, four-legged figure, running and squealing for all he was worth.

“Chopper!” Dain bellowed.

Indeed, it was Dain’s favorite battle boar and he was not alone.

“That,” said Thranduil, “is my elk.”

Chopper flew across the threshold, a long length of brown cloth in his teeth and triumph in his eyes. Thranduil’s elk galloped and bellowed in pursuit. The sound of hooves on rock rang all around like bells out of tune.

“Those are my trousers,” said Haldir.

“Aw, that’s cute,” said Dain. “Chopper playin’ wi… with tha’ thing betwixt a donkey and a pine tree.”

“Those are my favorite dress uniform trousers,” said Haldir.

“There’s Harley, an’ Honda, an’ Ducati,” said Dwalin bleakly. “An’…”

The two animals became four, then six, then ten as the combined inhabitants of the Fundin stable blew through, eager to join this exciting game. A cloud of squawking ravens swept in and hovered around them, cawing and cackling at them, doing everything to encourage the mayhem.

The mourners all around gasped and the talk became wild as the animals bounded in a wide circle before the canyon. The elk seized hold of the flapping end of the cloth and the resulting snap spun Chopper around in a great arc. The two beasts yanked violently, but Chopper once more gained the upper hoof and he was off, running towards them right up the steel bridge.

They romped across it to the plinth. They romped toward the pall bearers. They romped very close to the pall bearers. They were almost upon the pallbearers when the pallbearers decided discretion was better than being flattened and leapt away each in a different direction.

The bier hit the ground with a violent clang. The raven crown bounced free and rolled clattering to Balin’s feet. The bier slid away, metal screeching along the polished stone, teetered for a heartbeat on the edge and then slowly, deliberately, plunged over the edge into the chasm.

The silence was horrible, punctuated by ever further bangs and pings as the body and the bier caromed down through eternity and were finally gone.

Out of the silent shock came young Tilda’s voice.

“Da, is that how it’s supposed to go?”

“Ohops,” said Dain.

Thorin sighed. “Shit.”

“Well, fuck me,” said Balin.

The ravens were all over the plinth and flying around cackling, shrieking and laughing.

The tittering among the dwarrow started very small, then a wave of laughter swept through the cavern. All dwarrow howled with mirth. Shouts of “Ooops!” and “Guess Mahal wants him quick!” peppered through. The people of Dale weren’t far behind in amusement and the entire cavern rang with merriment.

Ori looked at Dwalin, who was snickering. Balin lifted up the crown and, with an eyebrow raised, offered it to Thorin. Thorin looked as though he was being offered something smelly and shook his head. His voice was heard over the receding mirth.

“Let it stay here in the stone with Thror. It was his and his father’s crown. It does not follow the designs of Durin.”

There were murmurs of approval all around. Thorin sighed and nodded for Balin to place the crown on the obsidian block. Thorin glanced about.

“I think we’re done here,” he stated and, with a majestic toss of his loose hair, led the way across the bridge. He was followed by his family, extended family, Bard and his children, the elvish nobles, and a small herd of barn animals. Ori glanced back and was vaguely worried when he saw that the ravens had stayed on the plinth, some hovering, others strutting around the block and still others on the block itself. Roäc perched next to the crown, watching the royal mourners leave. Ori caught Roäc’s eye. The raven winked.

Ori waited in the group behind Thorin who stood at the doorway with his sister and nephews. As the mourners filed out, they bowed and murmured condolences. Thorin and his family bowed and thanked each one as was perfectly proper. The impudent grins and winks Thorin received were also accepted with calm demeanor.

At last, only the nobles who had been on the plinth remained. The Urs lagged back to rejoin them. Thorin nodded to the guards who stood ready to shut the doors. It was then Thorin noticed that Roäc was still perching next to the crown out on the plinth. Everyone saw Thorin’s distraction and turned to look.

“Oh, dear,” sighed Dori.

Roäc, keeping his eyes fixed on Thorin, lifted one leg and placed it on the crown. Roäc looked at Thorin. Thorin stared back.

“Oh, go on, you little shithead.”
Roäc cawed triumphantly and gave the crown a shove. It slid off the obsidian block and hit the floor with a loud clang, bounced across the plinth and the cavern rang once more with metallic bangs as the raven crown followed its erstwhile wearer into the depth of the chasm.

Balin sighed.

“Yeh can’t go about crownless, laddie, an’ yeh can’t be crowned with a day circlet.”

“We’ll worry about that later,” Thorin replied. “We’re due in the main hall for the mourning feast. And I have every intention of getting extremely drunk. I knew somehow this was going to be a terribly bad ceremony.”

“Well,” Ori wracked his brain for something cheerful. “It wasn’t bad, Thorin, it was actually quite epic-worthy.”

This started their company giggling. Thorin gave Ori a side-long look.

“Then, young scribe, I trust you will write this epic out to your own satisfaction.”

“Aye, that’ll be quite th’ read,” Bofur snickered.

“Come,” Thorin said briskly, “The feast awaits and we have guests who, I think, need food and drink. Furh’nk, princess protocol this evening.”

“Durin protocol,” Dis grumbled as Thorin gracefully helped her back in the carriage.

Ori clambered in with Dori, Balin and the rest of his little family. The carriage started forward and began to trail back upward through the long tunnel. Ori turned to Dwalin.

“Princess or Durin protocol?”

Both Balin and Dwalin chuckled.

“Way back when Dis was just a wee badgerling, “ Balin explained, “she crept out in the middle of the night after a feast. Found plenty of dwarrow lyin’ on th’ banquet hall floor sleepin’ off their er… potations. She got all concerned an’ started coverin’ everyone up with tablecloths, rugs an’ anythin’ else she could find t’ hand. She put empty buckets around an’ put jugs of water all about. Makin’ sure there were places t’ be sick an’ that there was plenty f’r any who woke up thirsty. After that she made a point a’ wakin’ after any feast an’ hurryin’ down t’ cover sleepin’ folk.

“She go’ caught at it an’ cried so much tha’ folk’d freeze, be sick on th’ floor an’ need water. Thrain and her mother, Princess Freris, instituted th’ practice o’ whomever was doin’ clean up would put blankets over whoever was passed out in th’ room. There’d be buckets an’ those gallon drums o’ water f’r all. They told her it would be called Durin protocol. We’ve always called it princess protocol.”

Ori and both his brothers laughed over this.

Ori peered into the feasting room, which was not festooned gaily as for Dori’s presentation, but bare of decoration, except for some grey, coarse material hung to hide the bright tapestries and the mirrors.

The food would be different, Ori knew, rather plain, just stew for the dwarrow and greens and vegetables for the elves. Right then Ori was hungry enough to actually contemplate eating vegetables.

He turned to speak to Dwalin, but his husband was not standing beside him. Ori looked around and watched as Dwalin sidled up to Beorn, the mischievous look on his face giving Ori pause, then a horrified amusement swallowed him.

“Somethin’ the matter?” Beorn rumbled.

“Naw, just thinking’ about me cock.”

Beorn’s demeanor instantly lightened.

“You raise them, too?”

“Aye, raise mine every chance I get.”

Ori groaned. Whether Beorn would do the deed or he would strangle Dwalin himself, he was going to be widowed before the night was out.

Beorn stared at Dwalin, then threw back his head and laughed uproariously.

If anything, there were even more people in the feasting hall than after Dori’s presentation, except now the noble and everyday dwarrow were also obliged to mix with elves. There was some stilted conversation at first, until the dwarrow realized the elves could hold their drink. Vats and enormous hogshead barrels were rolled in and tapped. Dwarrow ale, called zul, flowed like the River Running at spring melt with the dorwinian wine not far after. The head tables were now fuller than before, so that some guests sat opposite others at the side tables. The conversation there wasn’t stilted at all, but then the Durins seemed to be drinking for the effects more than the pleasure. It was difficult to stand on ceremony with everyone talking to everyone else at the tops of their voices. Ori decided after two mugs of ale that before things got too hazy he should get to the bottom of events. He sidled up to Lady Galadriel, who was drinking zul from a long pilsner glass. She beamed at him very much as though she already knew what he planned.

“Lady Galadriel?” Ori asked. “Did you put Chopper up to that?”

“Up to what, dear?”

“Dragging Haldir’s britches through the funeral.”

“Were those Haldir’s?” she asked and drained the glass in one long pull.

“He did mention they were his favorites.”

“Oh,” Lady Galadriel looked faintly befuddled and blinked prettily before turning back to him in all innocence. “Really, I try not to think about Haldir’s … er… britches if I can at all help it.”

“You’re not answering the question, milady,” Ori reminded her as politely as he could.

“And what question was that, my dear?”

“How’d he lose his trousers there anyway?” Dain barged in and refilled both his drink and Galadriel’s. “It’s no’ like Chopper could go through his baggage.”

“How indeed?” Haldir sniffed. He was helping King Thranduil empty their third carafe of wine.
“Well, tell us, lad,” said Dain. “Were yeh rollin’ around in the hay wi’ someone an had t’ run out before yeh were caught?”

Haldir reared back, horrified.

Thranduil snorted into his wine.

“Climb off your high horse, Haldir,” The elven king smiled around his glass. “When your ada caught us you ran bare-assed naked across the High Summer Market.”

“Oh!” Dis cried, bumping down a keg on the table and seating herself. “Just like Thorin!”

“Dis! Don’t you d-” The king whipped around from his discussion with Bard, a miner, and Dwalin.

“Just like Uncle Thorin what, amad?” Kili cried eagerly, spilling zul down the table on over to Nori who made a vain attempt using his hand to sweep the puddle back Kili’s way.

“Yes, tell us!” Fili seconded and mimicked Bofur trying to slurp up the puddle from the table top.

Thorin buried his face in his hands.

“Why couldn’t this be my funeral?” he muttered as Dwalin refilled his drink and told him to shut up.

“You remember, Thranduil,” said Dis. “When Thorin was just a badgerling?”

Thranduil smiled like he tasted blood.

“Ah, yes, Oakenshield. I do recall. You went through the phase where your clothes were not to your liking and you would fling them off in public at every opportunity.”

Thorin shot Dis a filthy look.

“You are completely disinherited.”

But it was too late to stop Thranduil announcing to all and sundry, “He ran right through the assembly of kings, naked to the world and shrieking, with Balin in close pursuit, waving a pair of tiny trousers over his head.”

Balin, lounging at ease with his arm about Dori who was sitting on his lap, smiled fondly at the remembrance.

“Aye, he was a speedy wee shit. Not unlike our Dwalin, so I knew the drill, but our Thorin-Forgive me. His majesty - had a gift f’r speed I was unable t’ match.”

“Fuck yeh, Balin,” said Dwalin, apparently forgetting his company.

“It was baths our Dwalin didn’t like,” said Balin. “Got up t’ such escapes t’ avoid ‘em as our Nori would be proud. Finally he got so filthy we tracked him by his wee footprints an’ caught him in a blanket an’ he was still kickin’ an’ screamin’ like an angry warg pup.”

Ori leaned in close to his husband.

“You seem to enjoy them well enough now,” he whispered.
Dwalin gave him a happy leer.

“Especially when I got th’ righ’ company.”

Ori giggled and, as Dwalin slammed his drink on the table and slapped his thighs, climbed happily into his husband’s lap.

Bombur arrived with four bottles of brandy laced in the fingers of one hand and a larger keg under his other arm. The huge elegant dwarf chuckled as he refilled all the glasses. He seated himself near Bofur and removed his elder brother’s face from the table as Bofur finished drinking the puddle.

“I loved baths as a lad,” Bombur said reminiscently. “Our mam had a lovely porcelain tub which was oval. I loved swishing back and forth, end to end. Of course, by the time Mam came back in, all the water was on the floor and I was scooting back and forth in about a finger’s breadth of water, enjoying the lovely scootching noises my bottom made against the pottery. Our bathroom had the cleanest floor you ever did see.”

“Ada!” Legolas cried, having just heard the story speeding around the table. “You and Haldir? Really?”

“I was very young and apparently quite desperate,” said Thranduil blithely.

Elrond made a noise like he was sneezing underwater as Balin threw him a most lascivious wink.

“Really,” Balin went on, his gaze teasing Elrond. “That sort of thing can often happen at delightful inns, usually by lakes.”

“I believe there is a syndrome called ‘lake effect’,” Elrond replied solemnly, but his eyes twinkled merrily.

“Ah, laddie, is that what they’re callin’ it now?” Balin asked. “Well, good t’ know, good t’ know.”

Thorin looked up at the nearest server.

“More wine, please?”

The dam snickered and dumped a new keg at the other end of the table from what Bombur had just brought.

Thranduil peered at his son imperiously.

“You also went through a phase where your clothing was not to your liking and I could never catch you. Inevitably you climbed a tree and were too afraid to climb down and I was obliged to rescue you.”

Legolas laughed.

“I wasn’t afraid, Ada, I just liked watching you climb trees!”

Thorin raised is glass in Legolas’ direction.

“Do you know when last Mount Doom erupted?” Lady Galadriel asked Dis. “When Isildur tossed in Sauron’s ring.”
“Not our fault,” Thorin insisted.

“That was thousands of years ago,” said Ori.

“I thought it was a legend,” said Nori.

“It was thousands of years ago and it’s not a legend,” Galadriel stated solemnly. “I was there.”

Nori mumbled under his breath, “So not a legend. Just ancient history.”

Galadriel shot him a look.

“Oi!” Nori cried. “Get outa me head, woman!”

“Gladly, it’s a mess in there. You never tidy.”

“You should see his room,” announced Dori.

“No, thank you,” she replied with a brilliant smile.

“More wine, milady?” Dori offered.

“Yes, please. You’re such a dear, Lord Dori.” She patted his arm. “You must come to Lorien in the spring and see the leaves. Next time you have ambassador duties to Gondor, please stop through. We’ll have tea.”

“Why, thank you, Lady Galadriel. You’re most kind.”

Balin’s eyebrows bounced against his hairline but he said nothing as Dori was suddenly focused on Klakuna who was sitting back in her chair, fanning herself with her napkin.

“Are you feeling faint, my dear?” Dori asked solicitously. “Do you have your vinaigrette?”

“Dear Nori drank it all, such a naughty boy, but I’m quite well, dear, not to worry.”

“Yes, he is quite a naughty boy,” said Dori, patting her shoulder. He leaned across the table and grabbed one of Nori’s eyebrow braids. Ori heard Dori hiss, “Stop drinking her vinaigrette, you ass.”

“Good for the blood! Leggo!” Nori whined.

Dori released him so abruptly Nori nearly tipped over, but the evil smile could not be moved.

Galadriel, who had watched this unfold in silence, turned to Ori and said abruptly, “You have the Sight.”

Ori felt his cheeks heating and gulped.

“I’ve only seen the fire runes once, milady.”

“Thus far,” she agreed.

“I’ll see them again?” he asked. He hated the way his voice squeaked.

“Once the valar find a suitable vessel they tend to use it again.”

“That’s terrifying,” he said frankly.
“It was meant to be encouraging,” she said, “but I’m aware my reputation bespeaks that. The truth is, I almost always mean to be encouraging, but I’m a scary old bat.”

Ori giggled, tried to stifle it and couldn’t.

“There, that’s better,” said Galadriel. “Do not fear, Ori of Rikhma. You are stone, not porcelain. You are not a vessel that is easily broken. Besides, the Sight is not always about war and heroes, life and death. You may foresee the doom of Middle Earth, or you might foresee a rise in the market price of carrots.”

Ori blinked.

“Have you ever-?”

“I recommend investing in carrots,” she said dryly. “Potatoes, not as much.”

“Ah.”

“On the other hand, you might not want to spread it around that the universe is telling you about vegetables. It’s hard to cultivate an air of mystery when you’re the Queen of Crops Futures.”

“I’m not certain I’m up for mystery, milady,” said Ori.

“Just as well,” said Galadriel. “It’s positively exhausting.”

Ori looked to see how Bard was doing. Bard was sitting back in his chair regarding Thorin studiously.

“King Bard, you look very serious,” Ori commented, a little louder than he meant to and hanging over Dwalin’s arm to see Bard better.

Bard huffed a laugh.

“I’m supposed to be a king, but I certainly don’t look like that.”

Bard gestured helplessly to Thorin, who, even joking rudely with Dwalin, carried himself effortlessly and regally.

“He’s had his whole life to practice,” Ori explained. “And the hair doesn’t hurt.”

Bard regarded Thorin once more, a ghost of a smile hovering.

"I suppose if I lived as long as a dwarf."

"Exactly," Ori encouraged. "And we both know how old King Thranduil is."

Bard’s eyes twinkled, "So you mean the longer one lives-"

"No," Ori said, firmly. "No, I don't mean that the longer you live the more likely you will turn into an elf."

Bard laughed.

"A drunk, certainly," Ori reflected, "but not an elf."

Bard watched as Thorin smirked at something Balin said.
“I suppose the hair does help. I’ll have to let my hair grow.”

Thorin laughed, then gave his black silken mane a regal toss.

“Now that I can’t do.” Bard observed. “I’d break my damn neck.”

Ori nodded in agreement then as his head was in motion he realized he and his beloved husband had never shared a friendly head butt despite being married for over a week. Ori stared at his husband’s profile and relished the handsome face. It was time.

"Husband!!"

“Ori-love, would yeh marry me?”

Delighted, Ori knocked his forehead into Dwalin’s with all the force he could muster.

Ori admired the beautiful shower of stars that danced before his eyes.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. We've dialed back the excitement for this chapter so our poor dwarrow may recover. Ori, of course, is getting into things and has Dwalin to get him out. Out of what, you ask? Read and see. Do let us know what you think of the story so far. Dollypegs and I are having the greatest fun coming up with things we think will keep you all amused. As you saw from the opening last chapter, we are always open to ideas, so let us know! Please do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next morning the Durins resembled nothing short of an epidemic aftermath, bruise-eyed and stumbling over furniture, barely alive and certainly not enjoying it.

Fili kicked something near the sitting room fireplace and the metallic ricochet set dwarrow groaning with their arms over their heads.

"Oh, so there it is," said Fili.
"What?" said Kili.
"The top of my head. I wondered where I left it."

Even Dori looked slightly worse for his libations. He muttered about them getting their just desserts for overindulging, but he soon found himself administering his disgusting 'anti-drunk fixer-upper' medicine to dwarf and dam, one by one, with a line out the kitchen door. It was the only way he could get them to eat, to make sure they could stomach something. Anything.

At first he wasn't going to give Nori any, but Bofur threw Dori a pitiful pleading whine and Dori relented "just this once".

"Dori," Thorin mumbled into the tabletop, "if you weren't already a lord, I'd ennoble you."
"Yes, I do believe I'm a 'lord' this morning," said Dori. "I'm feeling about as dainty as a warg."

In this case it was plain porridge with salt and butter and large cups of strong tea. For those truly in pain, dried toast was consumed and everyone stumbled back to bed, rising only with the midday volley.

A few of the merchants had reopened that day and Dis, Jani, Sculdis and Gridr were off to the central textile market, to look at cloth in some other hue than grey. As Dis threatened Jani with a velvet brocade gown of her very own in 'Ur' family colors, Ori wondered once more at the nature of their relationship. Dis had married and lost her One years ago, but dwarrow were far too practical to demand someone remain alone for centuries. Ori thought Jani must be craftwed, married to her mining, a dwarf through and through.

He was hard pressed to come up with an elegant term to describe their union, and he would have to, since Jani was now part of the recent history of Erebor.

Of course, so was he, leaving him in a unique position. Scribe historians traditionally recorded events, but were not part of them. Ori could downplay his role, but he could not erase it because, to his mortification, he realized he'd cause a great deal of it.

While everyone else went out, napped or was minimally functional, he seated himself at his new desk, grateful and excited to finally put it to use. He set about recording his impressions of the funeral and the feast thereafter, or at least what he could remember of it.

Dwalin wandered over to him and draped himself over Ori’s shoulders, carelessly, to all appearances, but Dwalin had actually waited until he put his pen down.
“Love?”
“Yes?”
“Di’ I propose las’ night?”
“I believe so.”
“D’yeah say ‘yes’?”

Ori giggled and Dwalin’s breath blew his hair into his eyes. Ori brushed it aside with his forearm, well aware of too many ‘ink smear’ incidents in his past, none of which left him looking the least bit dashing.

“Yer hair’s gettin’ long.”
“I know. Pretty soon Dori will want to cut it. He hates seeing it in my eyes.”
“Yeh don’t sound thrilled.”
“I’d actually like to grow it out, but with Dori you have to pick your battles.”
“WASN’T aware yeh battled him all tha’ much.”
“I’m sure lately he thinks that’s all I do. I’ve become a naughty and defiant badger, just like Nori. Alright, maybe not just like Nori. That takes up too much time. I’d never get anything else done!”

“Wha’s this yer doin’?”
“Writing about the funeral. I’m trying to strike the proper tone, but all I keep coming up with is farce.”

They blinked at one another.

“I think I need to let it rest for right now,” said Ori. “How are you feeling?”
“No’ like death, so improved.”
“Are you on duty right now?”
“No’ actively, which is jus’ as well. Right now I wouldn’t trust meself with a pocket knife. Since Thorin has no intentions o’ goin’ ou’, or o’ receivin’ visitors ’til tonight, I kin stay put.”

“I was thinking we could indulge in a nice distraction,” said Ori, looking anyplace but at Dwalin.

“A distraction?” Dwalin lifted an eyebrow.

“If you’re feeling up to it,” said Ori. “I found a book of poetry, I thought we could read it together.”

“Tha’ sounds like th’ best use t’ make o’ this day.”
So they found themselves once more wrapped up together on the bear rug, surrounded by pillows and quilts, with a small fire in the grate, more for comfort than to ward off chill. They had stripped to their drawers. Ori lounged in the crook of Dwalin’s left arm as Dwalin read aloud from the book Ori found.

"More than th' bottomless shaft
F'r tha’ is empty
But, rather, like a well,
Risin' an' fallin'
With spring rains
Though never runnin' dry
Yeh quench th' thirst.
Still, fr yeh
I am thirstin’.

"It's no' bad," Dwalin judged, putting the book aside. "Bit trite."
"I thought it was rather racy," said Ori with a twinkle. "All that rising and falling."
"An’ thirstin’?" Dwalin teased.
"Especially the thirsting," said Ori.
"Yer right. It is a bit sexy. Where’d yeh get this book?"
"Balin’s library."
"Oh, really? Do tell," said Dwalin.
"I'm sure he keeps the truly explicit works elsewhere."
"Yeh looked f'r 'em, didn't yeh."
Ori blushed bright red and said in a small voice, "Yes."
Dwalin laughed in delight and hugged him.
Ori giggled a little nervously.
Dwalin pulled back and smiled at him.
"Makes yeh uneasy t' tell me such thin's."
"It's better than it was," said Ori. "Before I got married I'd only every been treated as a badger.
It's a bigger leap than I thought, from thinking about sex to actually talking about it. I keep expecting Dori to pop out of an alcove to give scathing reproof."

"He is pretty scathin'," Dwalin agreed.
"I was always a bit spoiled, actually. Dori saved his most scathing comments for Nori, who ignored them."
"Aye, wha' a thankless task it is, raisin' badgers," said Dwalin, draping his wrist across his forehead in woe.
Ori laughed and poked him in the ribs.
"Dori's never been that bad!"
"That's a fib."
"Yes, it is," Ori admitted happily.
"I've thought, talented as yeh are, yeh'd have written yer own smut an' drawn the pictures t' go with it."
"I didn't have the experience to imagine much beyond two people kissing. Actually, I need to clarify that. I had plenty of vocabulary. I'd hear it on the street. I just didn't have the - er - mechanics to go with them."

It bothered him still that he couldn't give Dwalin everything in bed that his husband might want.
Dwalin was more patient with Ori than Ori was with himself. He felt he needed to remedy his ignorance soon, though he knew a trip to an as-yet-unexplored section of the great library would have to wait.

"Yer awful quiet all of a sudden," said Dwalin, kissing the top of his head.
"I want to show you something, but I'm afraid you'll just think it's silly."
"I dunno if yeh realize it, love, but no' much yeh do is actually silly."

"This is," said Ori. "Let me up for a moment."
"Awwwww," said Dwalin, tickling him on the way to his feet.
"I'll be right back!" Ori promised. "Oh, no. Dwalin, please, don't stick out your bottom lip that way."
"Make yeh feel guilty enough no' t' go?"
"No."
Dwalin lay back, laughing, while Ori went to his satchel and returned with his sketchbook with the blue cover.

"This a new one?" Dwalin asked. "I ne'er seen it before."
"No one has, except Sigrid. I carry it around with me, so it doesn't fall into the wrong hands," said Ori, continuing in his mind, Lest I die of mortification.

He settled back down amid the pillows and handed the book to Dwalin, who opened it.
Dwalin turned the pages in complete silence, eyes growing larger the further he went on.
"This is pi'tures o' me."
"I'm sorry, they're not very good, but they are drawn mostly from life."
"They're beautiful, Ori. Though, I'm sure I never looked this heroic on even me best days."
Ori shrugged, rather than answer this directly.
"I had to study you at a distance and armor throws off the anatomy."
"Yeh got everythin' down t' me uniform buckles, love. It's-"
Ori knew he had reached the drawings Ori had done after they were married. These were also drawn from life, but there were no buckles involved.

"Oho," said Dwalin, his smile widening out to a grin.

They were mostly done in graphite pen, but at least one drawing was brightened with the judicious use of color.

"Mahal's hairy arse!" Dwalin laughed and fell back on the rug, the book open to the picture of him flaunting his pink drawers.

"You like it?"

"Love it! Makes me wish I could draw one o' yeh in yer combinations. We could frame 'em an' display 'em on th' mantle as a pair!"

"Maybe for our first anniversary," said Ori slyly.

Dwalin lay the book aside with the other and opened his arms. Ori dropped down into them for a kiss and a cuddle.

Ori touched the gold hoop through Dwalin’s nipple.

"Didn’t it hurt?" he asked.

"A little, at first. Th’ trick was t’ keep me chainmail from rubbin’ against it before it healed. Usually yeh wait ’till yer on leave before yeh have it done, but this was done right after Khazad-dûm. Thorin an’ I got ‘em at th’ same time, an’ a lot o’ mourning marks as well.”

Ori ran his finger along the hoop, then by experiment, back and forth over the nipple itself. He remembered Dwalin’s hands on him in the bath, how the pleasure of those blunt fingers on his nipple shot straight to his crotch.

"Yeh can keep tha’ up as long as yeh like,” said Dwalin.

"Feels good?"

"Aye."

"I wasn’t sure, with the piercing, if you’d feel it the same."

"I feel it.”

Impulsively Ori leaned in and kissed where his finger had rubbed. He felt a tremor go through Dwalin’s body, and so he set out down this new path.

He darted out his tongue to lick the nub then closed his lips over it and sucked.

Dwalin stirred beneath him.

Ori kept up his attention to the nipple in his mouth and ran his hand through the gorgeous, thick mat of hair on Dwalin’s chest until he found the twin and rubbed his fingers over it.

“If yeh tug on th’ ring just a little, tha’s lovely too.”

Ori did so and he could swear Dwalin purred.

He eased the tip of his tongue through the ring and pulled it gently over and over.

Dwalin’s hand cradled the back of his head, so he dared a glance up. Dwalin’s eyes, darkened nearly to black, caught his and held them.

Ori felt a flash of heat at the adoration he saw there.

For him?

Just for him?

He gave the nipple a long, lingering kiss, then stretched up his face to peck the corner of Dwalin’s mouth. Their lips fit together and the kisses only deepened.

It almost felt like abandonment when Dwalin left his mouth to kiss down Ori’s neck, sliding down to press more kisses into his collarbone, over his heart, and to take one of Ori’s nippled in his mouth and suck and-

“Oh,” Ori breathed, sparks of sensation, tingling from the barest nip of Dwalin’s teeth on his sensitive skin. Then Dwalin licked over it with the flat of his tongue.

When Dwalin squeezed his ass cheek it suddenly occurred to Ori that his drawers were quite a bit tighter than when he put them on.

“Wait,” said Ori.

He struggled up to his knees, untied his drawers and shimmied out of them. He did it nearly without thinking and it only caught up with him how easily he’d done it when he saw the wide grin on Dwalin’s face.
“‘Well,'” said Ori, looking away modestly, then squeaking as Dwalin growled, seized him and tumbled him to the rug, tickling him ferociously.
Ori shrieked with laughter.
“No fair!” he cried.
“Oh, am I bein’a villain, then?” Dwalin loomed over him menacingly.
“Yes! And I, the helpless object of your villainy! Alas!”
Dwalin drew his furry belly across the head of Ori’s cock, which was very much at attention.
“A lass, eh? Coulda fooled me!”
“Well, you villains are supposed to be terribly clever.”
Dwalin kissed him and whispered in his ear.
“I was thinkin’ o’ suckin’ yeh off, if tha’ appeals,”
“That would be wonderful. Feel free to proceed, Captain Dwalin.”
It was different from the first time in the bath. For one thing, Ori wasn’t in total shock, and now that he had time to think about it, he very much wanted to watch.
He propped a pillow behind his head as Dwalin’s mouth made its meandering journey down his torso, the fringe of his long beard a silky caress before moist kisses.
Rather than just swallow Ori whole, Dwalin rubbed his cheek against the shaft and thoroughly sucked and licked every trembling inch of it. Only when Ori didn’t think he could wait another moment did Dwalin slowly pull Ori in and Ori went off with a shock that arched him right off the rug.
As he lay there, panting, the grains of the stone in the ceiling starkly visible, everything in sharper focus than he could ever recall, it occurred to him that he’d come.
“Dwalin?” he gasped.
Dwalin’s face appeared above his, mouth wet.
“Love?”
“Did you remember to lock the door?”
They napped for a while and when Ori woke Dwalin was returning to the room with a plate.
“What’s that?” Ori asked sleepily.
“Buttered toast an’ tea. There’s jam, as well.”
“Oo, lovely.”
Dwalin sank to the pillows beside him, kissing the top of his head on the way down.
He poured the tea while Ori spread berry jam on the toast.
Ori sat between Dwalin’s legs, resting against his broad chest and sighed happily.
“Yer content?”
“Yes. I’m almost ashamed at how much. What about you? Is there anything you’re missing?”
“No, right now I’m exactly where I belong.”
“Funny, that’s what I was just thinking;” said Ori cheekily, nudging back with his elbow.
“Oh, are yeh? Kiddin’ aside, I’m one o’ th’ lucky ones. I knew what I wanted out o’ life even as a badger. What about you?”
“I always knew I wanted to be a scholar, but I could never afford the training. I became a scribe because I knew it would bring money in. I studied on my own at night.”
“Yeh never went t’ school?”
“No. Dori taught me to read and write and sometimes when he could scrape up the money I had a tutor to teach me special things.” Ori laughed. “I had a drawing master who taught me to sketch from life and she also brought me books showing the nude figures of the various peoples. I was rather young, and I thought Dori’s head would pop right off, but he clamped his mouth shut because he’d already promised payment.”
Ori squeezed the last few drops from the teapot.
“Dwalin, is there anyone in the company who can’t read?”
“No, don’t think so, except mebbe Bifur, since he was wounded. I remember bein’ surprised the Ur could read, but their mam was bonded by th’ guild t’ read out th’ contracts o’ miners who Ori couldn’t read for themselves, before they signed or made their mark. Why d’ye ask?”

Ori turned his thoughts over in his mind. He didn’t like to sound foolish, but in the end he realized it was quite a practical notion.

“I wonder if the adult dwarrow in Erebor and Dale who can’t read would like to learn?”

“An’ why would yeh have ‘em do tha’?” Dwalin asked.

Ori searched for censure or ridicule in Dwalin’s voice, but didn’t find it. Still he parcelled out the next notion with just as much care.

“I was thinking about all those dwarrows from the zinc mine. If Thorin gets his way, they’ll all have guild contracts. When you think about it, we are a race that runs on contracts. We’re always signing or making our mark on some document or other, and usually without a trusted person to read them first. I wonder what horrible things the Master made people sign and what they agreed to without knowing.”

Dwalin nodded.

“Yeh should bring that up with Thorin.”

Ori swallowed.

“Alright,” he said, “if you’re sure it’s a worthy idea.”

“It’s a very worthy idea. Explain it t’ him jus’ like yeh did t’ me.”

“Er-”

Dwalin chuckled.

“Go on an’ write it down. I’ll wait. I won’t even pout. Much.”

Ori kissed him and ran to the bedside table to make the note, but quickly returned to snuggle down with him.

They woke with the tapping on the door.

“Tea time!” Dori called, through the door, thankfully, which Ori discovered was, indeed, locked.

When they had tidied and made their appearance, everyone else had assembled, looking a lot less dead.

Three days later in the early evening, Mistress Dazla tapped on the sitting room door and put in her head from the receiving room.

“The elves have arrived, yer highness.”

“Thank you,” said Dis. “Oh, do we have more elderberry jam?”

“I made sure we have a good supply, yer highness.”

“I am very glad I have you to think of these things.”

Mistress Dazla curtsied and showed the guests in.

The elves swept in. Tharkûn joined them and ate nearly as much cake as Bombur, but neither ate as much as Lady Galadriel.

“Layer cake with raspberry preserves and cream,” she sighed, licking each long finger tip of her own and then eyeing Celeborn’s rather keenly, a look her husband returned with a small smile.

Just as they were all enjoying themselves, Furh’nk arrived, looking harried and rather annoyed.

He bowed to the assembly.

“Everythin’ alright, Furh’nk?” Dwalin asked, already half way to his feet.

“Er, well. Yer majesty, yer brother has requested to speak with you.”

Thorin closed his eyes tightly and opened them, perfectly composed.

“He’s standing on the other side of the door?”

“Yeh, yer majesty.”

“And he knows who is here?”

“Yes, yer majesty. He’s come to take his leave.”

“Please, show him in,” said Thorin.

Frerin swaggered in, as if he weren’t under house arrest until he left the mountain.

He bowed, face grave.

“The royal caravan departs for Belegost at dawn tomorrow, your majesty. I take it my wife and I will be freed from my chambers to depart?"
   "Yes, Frerin, but you already knew that," said Thorin.
Dis sighed.
   "Please, Frerin, sit and have some cake. How does T’dillah fare?"
   "She is quite well, but no thank you, namad," He glanced around the room dubiously. "Udad and I had similar taste when choosing our friends."
Thranduil opened his eyes wide.
   "You have friends?" he said in his silken voice.
A crash came from the kitchen.
   "Don’t mind me," came Nori’s voice. "Just getting some ice f’r that burn!"
Elrond looked over toward the kitchen, then over at Dori.
   "Silly badger fell out of the cabinet," said Dori.
   "Ah," said Elrond, as if this were not at all surprising.
Thorin and Dis rose and Fili and Kili followed and crossed to Frerin to say their farewells.
Frerin merely bowed coldly and said to Thorin, "Your majesty."
Tharkun looked up with a smile and said, "Live long and prosper."
Elrond looked over at him now.
   "Little something I picked up on my travels," said the wizard.
Ori reflected that Elrond had well-exercised neck muscles.
Frerin cleared his throat and said, "Yes, well -"
Lady Galadriel laughed and made a shooing motion at him with her hand saying, "Go, go, we would not wish you back again."
Frerin stiffened, black affronted, but before he could respond Dori rose with elegant grace and a look Ori knew meant danger.

   "A moment, Frerin."
   "Bearer," said Frerin with a sneer.
Dori glided winsomely up to him. Fili grasped Kili by the sleeve and very insistently tugged him out of the way.
   "I understand," said Dori to Frerin, "when you first met my dearest badger, a small unpleasantness occurred between you."
   Frerin gave an ugly laugh and said, "Yes, your dear little badger."
   He turned to Ori and back to Dori with a nasty smile. Dori returned it with a glowing smile of his own, drew back his fist and slammed it into Frerin’s jaw. Frerin crashed into the wall beside the open door, breaking the wood panelling. Dori was on him and grabbed him up by the collar with one hand.
   "No one," said Dori with deadly softness, "touches my family."
   Dori pulled back his fist again but Thorin, Dain, Dwalin, Gloin and Sculdis seized him and tried to pull him back.
   "Beloved, let him go," Balin pleaded, standing between the combatants, attempting to pry Dori’s fingers from Frerin’s collar.
   "I already beat him up, our Dori," said Dwalin. "Mahal, Ori’s already beaten him up!"
   "Just let him go an’ we’ll bill him f’r th’ panelling," said Gloin.
Furhnk and his squad wrestled Frerin away from the enraged Dori. Frerin was still reeling, and still trying to speak. He recovered, thrust the soldiers away, and straightened his collar.
   "Well-"
   Dori lunged forward, dragging all five of the dwarrow with him, and it was obvious that this time they would not hold him back.
   Nori’s head burst through the grate above the fireplace and he shouted at Frerin, "Get out o’ here, you ass!"
   The soldiers snatched up Frerin and carried him away, protesting, over their heads.
Nori snorted.
“With any luck, they’re off t’ toss him down the chasm as well.”
“T’ll kill him, Balin!” Dori hissed. “I will find him and I will kill him!”
“He’s not worth the effort, beloved,” Ballin soothed.
Really,” said Binni with a sniff. “He’s already caused you to break a sweat, Dori. It’s most unseemly.”
“My dears,” Thanduil purred. “This is the sign for both of you to stand down.”
Everyone turned to see Legolas and Tauriel lowering their bows.
Dori took a deep breath, closed his eyes, took another deep breath and smiled upon the company.
“More tea, anyone?”
“Oh, yes, please,” said Lady Galadriel. “This is such delicious tea.”
Dori turned to Lady Klakuna, perhaps remembering suddenly that his great-grandmother had been present for the entire event. She sat on the sofa, shaking.
“Umadel? I’m sorry, dearest, has this upset you? Where is your vinaigrette?”
“Oh! Oh, I am j-just f-fine, my love,” said Lady Klakuna, who was suddenly laughing with delight. “More tea w-would be lovely. Drop a shot of medicinal brandy in mine, if you please.”
Dori set off in pursuit of the brandy.
Lady Klakuna assured Lady Galadriel, “He gets that right hook from my side of the family.”
After that they had quite a merry party. Lady Galadriel also had some medicinal brandy, then insisted Celeborn needed some as well “to guard against the shock, dear”, all the while with her hand on his knee.

Lady Galadriel and Lord Celeborn retired earlier than the others.
Nori, who had slipped in from somewhere unseen, leaned over to Ori and muttered, “Bastard’s gotta be good fer somethin’.”
Ori smacked at him and hissed, “Will you shut up? Go drink someone’s vinaigrette.”
Tharkûn was next to go.
“I’m afraid I must be leaving Erebor at first light,” he said, rising and stretching in a chorus of cracks and pops. “I take my leave of you now, my dear dwarrow. Who knows, but perhaps we may all meet again.”
“It’s inevitable,” said Thorin drily, though he did bow cordially.
“You’re leaving already?” Ori asked, rather surprised to find he was sorry to see the wizard go.
“I’m afraid I must, Master Ori, I have new, pressing business to the West. I leave you in good hands. Indeed, you are the most closely guarded scribe I have ever met. I’ve certainly never been denied trifle for the sake of one before. Most disconcerting!”
Elrond rose and bowed to Thorin and they exchanged promises to keep in touch and set up new trading policies.
Thranduil finished the last elderberry tart and brushed his robe. He turned to Legolas.
“My child, I take it you and Tauriel will be staying?”
The two younger elves looked at each other then toward Kili and Gimli who looked at Thorin.
"He has a key,"Thorin smiled and shrugged.
"Oh, he has a key." said Thranduil. An eyebrow lifted in his son’s direction.
Legolas tossed his hair.
"I have a key."
Gimli chuckled and slapped Legolas on the back.
"Aye, he's got a key."
Kili gazed lovingly at Tauriel and muttered something about a key.
Tauriel smiled, pink in her cheeks.
"Mush," said Nori, coming out of the kitchen with a chicken leg in hand.
"Put that back!" Dori cried. "That was for lunch!"
"Ha! Already got me spit on it."
Lady Klakuna bustled over, gave Nori a tiny smack on the bum and said, "Naughty badger!"
She took him by the free hand and led him back into the kitchen.
"Let's find you something else," she said.
"Righty-ho, Granny Klak," said Nori, tossing off a salute and grinning back at the company.
Ori sing-songed quietly, "Granny's precious badg-er."
Dwalin snickered and kissed him.
"Moving along," said Thranduil dryly.
"Yes, Ada, King Thorin did give me a key to keep," Legolas replied, then after a thought, "If you allow."
Thranduil sniffed.
"I am amused and no longer wish to play the villain. Oakenshield."
"Oropheron."
"Cheerio, our pixie," Dain called from the far side of the room.
"Rot in peace, pig-herder," was the light reply.
"Princess Dis," Thranduil bowed elegantly over her hand and stepped away with a teasing smile.
"Your servant, my dear."
Dis snickered and bowed a dainty curtsy.
Thranduil bowed over Dori's hand as well. "Bearer."
"Thrandy," Dori purred.
Thranduil startled as though he'd been goosed and shot Dori a look.
"Only you, Dori. Only. You."
"Of course," Dori smiled prettily and raised a flirtatious cheek to Thranduil.
Thranduil looked shocked, then his mouth fell into a mischievous grin and he kissed Dori's cheek.
"Whenever you're in the area," said Dori, "do stop by for tea."
"Oh, I shall. I shall."
He turned and stopped short.
Legolas and Tauriel gaped, open-mouthed and horrified.
Ori was willing to bet they had never seen Thranduil act like this.
"Some of us don't need a key," said Thranduil, and he swept out.
The dams fell about laughing.
Dis cackled, "I don't believe you did that! Thrandy!"
"Ah ah ah," said Dori. "Only me."
Balin shook his head fondly.
"Yer shameless, beloved."
"That's why I'm yours, my sweet."
Nori returned from the kitchen with a sizable chunk of cake on a plate and another sizable chunk of cake in his mouth, which he spoke around.
"Wha' I miss?"
Thorin said, "Your older brother has set up a flirt with Thranduil."
"Has he?" Nori turned to Dori. "Greedy bugger, aintcha."
Dori just batted his lashes.
Galadriel rose and bowed to Dori.
"Congratulations, Dori, not even my own daughter got him to do that."
"Of course not, milady. He loved her."
Thorin shut the door to the receiving room and leaned his back on it.
"And now, to get on with our lives."

The next morning brought a breakfast of Dori's excellent fowl hash. Sculdis exclaimed over it.
"It's just cut up chicken meat," Dori explained. "Put it in a baking dish, dust it with salt, pepper and nutmeg, add cream to just cover it and sprinkle it with a sharp cheese before it goes into the oven. Simple, easy and you only use one pan."
Three dishes of this, four loaves of new bread, and at least a gallon of elderberry jam later, the lady and her lord made to take their leave. The dwarrow had no idea how the elven couple would achieve this, though the guard told them quite a crowd had assembled to watch.
Lady Galadriel lingered in the receiving room close to Thorin and Ori, while Lord Celeborn and the others walked out into the courtyard.

“Before my grandfather died, it had been many a long year since we last met,” said Thorin. “By the accounting of dwarrow at any rate.”

Galadriel gave him a small, sad smile.

“I am aware my presence is not linked to any happiness for the dwarrow.”

“Not happiness perhaps, but gratitude always. If your people hadn’t ridden into Dimrill Dale to support us the death toll would have been far higher.”

“You were already withdrawing with your wounded. It is not heroism to keep someone from getting a knife in the back. I am sorry we could not help you reclaim Khazad-dûm.”

Thorin shook his head.

“It was a lost cause from the first. Even survivors of the original disaster said we had dug our mines too deep, taken too much from the ground. We woke up evil things that should never have been wakened, not the least of which was our own greed.”

“You are content with Erebor?”

“I’m not planning any empire building. Most of my ambitions are less than grandiose. Our strength as dwarrow once sat on the bedrock of our prosperity. No one went hungry. No one slaved day after day for a tenth of nothing. That’s what I want us to have again.”

“An excellent ambition, I would say, to see your people fed and clothed and housed.”

“Time will tell how successful we are, Lady Galadriel, but please don’t let all of it pass before we see you again. You are welcome, with or without your… party.”

She grinned a little feral grin.

“My ‘party’ and I will take you up on that offer, perhaps sooner than you think, and possible more often than you would like.”

“I like to live dangerously,” said Thorin. “The offer still stands.”

After she had gone Ori found himself alone with Thorin.

“What makes up the rest of your ambitions?” Ori asked. “Were you planning on becoming a pastry chef?”

Thorin grinned wryly.

“No, I need to keep my aspirations within the realm of possibility.”

Ori raised and eyebrow and Thorin laughed.

“Pastry is a little too fiddly for me,” Thorin confessed. “No, what I want to change is how I define ‘my people’.”

“You want Erebor to belong to more than the dwarrow.”

“Technically the dwarrow already share it with the ravens. They far outnumber us, not to mention thinking of us as lesser beings. The dwarrow of all dwarf kingdoms combined are less than half what they were in my great great udad’s day, and the numbers continue to dwindle. Even if every dam who could have a dwarfling did, we would still be extinct in five generations. We need to change or we will perish.”

“And dwarrow by definition resist change.”

“Our strength and our weakness. What do you think?”

Ori thought about it.

“What you want is admirable, but if you succeed will be still be dwarrow?”

“We will, only not as we are now. Just as a dwarfling will one day be a grown dwarf. They’ll have a different form, but they won’t be a different person.”

“That’s why you didn’t speak against Fili courting Sigrid.”

“Their child or dwarfling or whatever it might be will unite the thrones of two kingdoms. I wouldn’t have forced them together if they weren’t already inclined. I wouldn’t force Fili to marry just to produce an heir. It’s not the dwarrow way to arrange marriages like that.”

“You never married.”

“I’ve been busy,” said Thorin glibly. “I’m fortunate my sister took the time.”
“You’ve never had offers?” Ori asked slyly.
“The crown prince has offers, and would have them even if he looked like the bottom of an orc’s boot, but I am determined that only the greatest love with tempt me into marriage.”
“You haven’t heard your heartsong?”
“No.”
“Maybe they just haven’t been born yet.”
“Given how old I am already? I wouldn’t saddle some fine young dwarf with me seventy years into the future. So, I will have to content myself with being ‘married’ to Erebor. It's not a bad thing. So many of us never get married. I’ll be in good stead.”
Ori said nothing, though in his personal experience anyone who said they were never getting married usually did so by the following Durin’s Day.
Dwalin returned to join them. Thorin put one arm over each of their shoulders as they walked back through the house.
“But,” Thorin said, briskly, “if I have very good luck, I may in time meet with another T’dillah.”
Ori felt a shiver run through him. His sight dimmed, then returned and he shook himself off and was fine.
Dwalin said, “Thorin, yeh best pray he ain’t seein’ fire runes, or yer ass-deep in th’ slag.”
Wayward writers, royal quandaries, and furry things

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And now begins the Mystery of the famous writer Mr. Notathain A. Shire! Do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Dawn was just breaking. The great balcony over the main door of Erebor was still sunk in darkness but all around the edges the pale pink light was growing. Ori stood with Omi and Loli as they watched Frerin’s wagon train head out of Erebor and towards the junction of the Great Northern Road. Even at the distance of the balcony over the front gate, Ori could see the lump impaled on a long pike in the center of the courtyard. The butt of the pike had been driven into the ground there. Ori knew rather than saw that it was topped by the head of Vors.

The wagons had to veer slightly to go around it. The message was clear and cold. Even in the thin light of the dawn, Ori knew the slowly growing dark patch on the ground was the blood draining from it. Already, the ravens screamed and fought for the eyes and other choice pieces of soft flesh.

Loli sighed when they spotted the wagons that bore the crest of Buj’s family.

“Poor Buj. It’s so sad about him and Dipfa. Do you think his parents ever found out?”

“I don’t know,” Ori said. “They really don’t seem to pay any attention to him whatsoever.”

They waited until the last wagon turned over the bridge of the foot hills and disappeared into the far end of Mirkwood.

The three of them wandered back toward the royal quarters.

“That’s Buj’s family home.” Omi pointed as they went along one of the fine streets.

Ori looked. It was quite fancy, the windows and doorframe decorated with tourmaline and brown enstatite. It looked dark and desolate. Ori frowned. There was a tiny round decorative window just under the roof and Ori saw a flicker of light.

“I think they’ve left a candle burning,” he said.

“We’d best go in and make sure,” said Loli quickly. “It would be like them to try and undermine Thorin by accidentally staring a fire. It might be a lava point.”

The three friends hurried to the house to try the front door. Surprisingly, it was ajar. Ori quickly found the stairs as there were several phosphorous stones that gave a dim glow throughout. He went up two flights and saw a definite glow under a far door.

“Careful,” adjured Omi.

Ori pressed forward. He couldn’t smell anything other than the faint scent of candle wax. He touched the door. It was not heated as though there was a fire behind it. Ori eased the door open.

The room was obviously a study with a small library, all lit with a single candelabra. There, seated at a battered desk, was Buj, busily writing and hunched over a few books.

Ori stared.

“Buj?” Ori ventured

Buj sat up with a frown then turned.

“Ori! How very good to see you, my friend. I’m glad you’ve decided to ignore my puffed up family and come to call on me. I believe I may be on the verge of a breakthrough but I will need your assistance.”

Omi and Loli pushed in behind Ori.

“Buj!” cried Loli. “What in Mahal’s name are you doing here? The wagon train has completely left!”

Buj widened his eyes at her in puzzlement.

“What wagon train?”

“The wagon train for those following Frerin to Belegost,” Omi interrupted. “We saw the ones with your family crest on them!”

“My family moved to Belegost?” Buj asked. “When?”

“Today! We just saw them cross the foot hills,” said Omi.

“Huh.” Buj frowned and considered. “Well, I had no I idea. Mind, I did think there was a great deal of noise last night and earlier today. That does explain it.”

“Buj, this house is empty,” Ori said gently. “What are you going to do? Do you want us to help you catch them up?”

“Catch them up to go to Belegost?” Buj stared. “I can’t do that. I have a job at the Library of Erebor and I have Dipfa, my precious diamond, to think of. No, no, I cannot leave.”

“What would you like us to help you do?” Ori offered.

“I have no idea,” said Buj vaguely. “I must complete my experiments.”

“Well.” Ori paused then said, “Come to Fundin house and have some breakfast. We can talk it over and see what’s to be done.”

Buj thought about this and nodded

“I think that’s a good notion, Ori. Now that I think of it, I can’t remember having anything to eat. Food would be a good idea. It’s breakfast time, is it?”

“Yes, “ said Ori gently and took his arm. Loli put out the candles and Omi gathered the books and notes Buj had been working on and popped them into his satchel.

After shutting the door, the four went downstairs and out to the street. Buj was deep in thought.
and no one felt like talking.

Ori was horrified. He couldn’t believe that Buj’s family either forgot or abandoned him.

Ori led the way into the kitchen where the Durins and Balin were already seated and Dori was dishing up.

“There you are, pet, I was about to send a bat.”

“Sorry, Dori, we were watching the wagons leave.”

Dori waved him to a chair, put out plates and cutlery, and bade the other three to draw up chairs and eat.

Ori didn’t know how to broach the subject but noticed that Balin was looking thoughtfully at Buj.

Gimli, leading his parents, came in and joined the group at the table.

Gridr paused in her discussion with Dori and Balin about what was to be done with the family houses left vacant by the new court of Belegost.

“Buj dear,” she said, “I didn’t know yeh planned to remain. Are yeh going to stay in yer family home or will yeh be taking lodgings near th’ library? I’m surprised yeh convinced yer family to let yeh stay.”

Buj looked up from his third helping of green apples fried with onions and slivered almonds. Ori worried slightly over Buj’s digestion as this dish was the only one Buj had partaken of and heartily.

“They didn’t inform me,” Buj stated, wiped his mouth delicately on a napkin and went back to demolishing his plate of apples.

“What?!?” Gridr, Gloin, and Dori all gasped together.

The sudden noise startled Buj and he jerked back up, to stare at them.

Balin leaned forward.

“Laddie, are yeh sayin’ tha’ yer family told yeh not t’ come?”

“No, Lord Balin. I had no idea they even wished to accompany Frerin.”

“Why of all th’-” Gridr broke off, words failing her. She turned to her husband and Gloin humphed a moment then they exchanged a nod.

“Lad,” Gloin said, “yeh needn’t stay in that bloody great barn of a house unless yer over fond of it. Why don’t yeh just take lodgings with us?”

“Of course, yeh must,” Gridr immediately concurred. “Yeh have a room with yer things in it as yeh’ve stayed often enough and it would be delightful to have yeh permanently settled with us. Of course, yeh will be marrying Dipfa when yeh both reach yer mastery and then yeh can either found yer own house or simply stay with us in th’ family home!”

“My experiments-“

“Oh come now, laddie,” Gloin. “Yeh’ve a big room with us and I know Oin has a couple of rooms yeh could use for yer studies.”

“We’ll help you move your things!” Loli said immediately. “We could probably do it today!”

“Aye, aye,” Gloin agreed. “I’ll speak to some friends of ours and we’ll have yeh packed up and moved in time for supper.”

Dori shot a look at Mistress Dazla, who gave a sharp nod.

“Thank you,” said Buj seriously. “You are most kind, Mistress Gridr and Master Gloin.”

“Perhaps, since yeh are now part of our household,” Gridr smiled, “yeh should best call us Aunt and Uncle. Will that suit yeh?”

Buj rose and bowed solemnly to them.

Later, Ori joined Omi, Loli and Buj as they left the library for the courtyard to discover what Dori had seen fit to pack in the enormous basket for their lunch. They sat down near the paddock for the ponies and opened the basket. There were insulated metal bowls clamped shut, full of piping hot soup of chicken broth, barley, and nettles with pepper and salt. Ori picked out all the nettle leaves and gave them to Buj, who was perfectly happy to take them. There were about a dozen sandwiches, some filled with ham, grated carrot, and creamed cheese and others filled a mix of chopped dates, figs, and nuts with butter. They were just polishing off the shortbread topped with caramel and melted xocolātl when they heard a shout.

“Ori! Ori!” Sigrid called.

He looked up.

“Hullo, Sigrid! Come join us!”

She bumped down beside him, purposely jostling Buj just a little. He shot her a sour eye and snickered. Loli gave her the last piece of shortbread.

“You have to see this!” she said, pulling a thick sheaf of paper from her apron pocket.

“What is this?” Ori asked, taking it.

‘This’ was a folio of printed paper, folded over once and sewn into a booklet. The cover was only paper of a slightly heavier stock, with a simple printed image.

“It’s a new novel by Notathain Shire!” Ori said, amazed. “The Heaving Bosom of the Ocean - A Tale of Terror and True Love on the High Seas!” Why is it printed like this?”

“It’s a different edition from the one with the leather covers. It’s the same text, but it sells for three coppers!”

The librarians all gaped, amazed.

“Three coppers!” Omi cried. “Why would he - oh, so more people can afford to buy it.”

“It came with the post wagon,” Sigrid said around a mouthful of shortbread. “The driver said soft-covered books are all the rage in Gondor, because everyone can read out there. Da thinks the publishers must be trying their luck with a new king in Erebor. But that’s not the most important part. Read the note at the back!”

Ori turned to the colophon and, indeed, there was a note from the publisher.

Loli urged Ori, “Read it aloud.”

‘We extend our sincerest apologies to our Dear Readers for leaving the Story at such a Delicate Juncture. We have long awaited the Concluding Chapters from Mr. Shire, but in vain. News has reached us that the whereabouts of Mr. Shire remain Unknown.’

“Shire is missing?” Loli cried.

“Impossible!” Buj interjected.

Ori shook his head.

“It must be a stunt to attract more readership,” Ori said.

“I don’t think so, Ori,” said Sigrid. “We get a new Shire novel twice a year, once when the last snows of spring finally allow the post through and then just before the snows close the passes for the winter. When was the last time we got a novel?”

“It wasn’t that long ago, surely,” said Ori. “We got one… Oh, we got the last one just before Yule. There wasn’t one this spring. Things have been so chaotic I hadn’t even noticed!”

The first afternoon bell rang and they parted company. Ori studied forms of description while he looked after the reference desk that afternoon. The strange news about Shire buzzed in and out of his thoughts often.

When he and his friends gathered to walk home, they discussed it again in great detail.

Ori wandered with Loli, Omi and Buj into the central part of the city. They waited outside the tailor’s for Pika and Dipfa to be released for the day. Then the six young dwarrow strolled toward the outskirts.

Ori listened to the conversations around him. He watched Omi and Pika converse in a rather erotic form of Iglishmêk, and he learned from Dipfa, walking hand in hand with Buj, that the legendary Grandda Tz was Pika’s grandfather. Pika had been often given to his grandfather’s care as a tiny badgerling and had developed a most dreadful fear of sudden loud noises. Ori commiserated politely.

Loli turned the conversation to discussing when it would be allowed for them to have a little party. Loli had heard from one of her brothers that there was a new dance now popular among young people in Gondor. It was called the Beleghost body-wag. The city elders disapproved and referred to it as musical graffiti. The group of musicians who had invented and made it popular called themselves White City Bang-Crash.

Loli’s brother had received not only the written lyrics of the song and map of the steps and arm movements, but also a much coveted music box note sheet to play the song. There was also a new snack associated with the band which consisted of a food called azzip, which Loli whispered excitedly was bread dough flattened then covered in a savory sauce and an assortment of smoked meats and cheeses. It was then baked and served in hot slices and one drank sparkling water infused with fruit while eating it.

Ori thought izzip sounded good but he didn’t think he wanted to drink sparkling water with it. He was pondering whether or not it would taste better with a deep red wine or with a good dark ale, when a variety of noises caught his attention.

There was a shop which seemed full of cages.

“What’s that?” he asked loud enough for the group to turn and look.

“Ah,” Buj observed. “That is the small animal emporium. It’s owned by Master Vobwi. He deals in exotic pets and orphaned bats, falcons and pigeons. He also takes orders for flocks of chickens. He is a most interesting conversationalist.”

Ori was instantly intrigued. The group went over and entered the shop.

Master Vobwi stood behind a counter. He wore very thick spectacles, his hair was salt and pepper, and stuck straight up in the air like a hedgehog’s. His beard was oiled and braided tightly into a long strand that disappeared below the counter.

Master Vobwi looked up and greeted them.

“Welcome, welcome younglings. Pardon the smell, me new owl’s damp. Me and them don’ like it, make ‘em musty. What might yeh be lookin’ f’r?”

“Good evening, Master Vobwi,” Buj said gravely. “My friend here is new to this part of the city and was fascinated by your shop.”

Ori bowed. Master Vobwi looked pleased and bowed also.

“Well, laddie, I’ve got all kinds a thing’s t’ keep a young gentle-dwarf like yerself company. What yeh like?”

“I have three kittens—” Ori began.

“Ahh, very good. Nice an’ playful. Jus’ th’ thin’. I do have a number a’ toys they may like.”

Master Vow moved toward a shelf across the shop, stepping between cages full of brightly colored, twittering birds the like of which Ori had never seen. Master Vobwi took down a large jar full of small felted balls of wool. He handed one to Ori and it made a tinkling sound. Ori looked up at Master Vobwi, who grinned.

“There’s a wee metal ball with a bell inside then we felt the wool around it.”

Ori immediately asked for three and chose a red, a green, and a bright blue one.

Omi and Loli asked for dried bat treats. Dipfa examined a very large white bird with a pale yellow crown that Master Vobwi assured her could be taught to speak a few words.

Pika and Buj inspected an albino blood sucking bat.

Ori looked about the cages. He wandered farther into the shop which gave way to large glass tanks. The first ones held strange kinds of lizards or turtles or snakes.
Further on there were more tanks filled with water and held many different kinds of tiny fish. Ori stared half fascinated and half horrified at a creature in a very large, water-filled tank. It looked like a brown and grey speckled bag with eight long snaky legs that all wiggled about freely.

The name plate on the side declare the animal to be a false squid and its name was apparently Kthulluh. Ori realized the bag also had two very round black eyes that stared back at him. Ori waved a hand vaguely at it. A snaky appendage waved back and Ori stepped away quite unnerved.

He’d reached the back wall and noticed a box full of straw. Ori peeked in. There, lying on its side, was the largest bat Ori had ever seen. Its fur was the most beautiful reddish brown and fine and thick. It was obvious the bat had given birth very recently. Its eyes opened and Ori felt his heart tear at the look of utter sorrow he received. He was wondering where her kits might be when Master Vobwi came to his side.

“Aye, poor wee thin’. She’s quite th’ morose fruit bat. Only eats fruit, berries an’ th’ like. Poor thin’ ain’t eatin’ now. She’s just lost her kits. She had three, very rare. Poor thin’s were born weak an’ got sick in a day. Don’t know what I’m goin’ t’ do with ‘er."

Ori was overtaken by a wonderful idea.

“Master Vobwi, how much do you want for her?”

“Eh, laddie?” Master Vobwi was taken back.

“How much do you want for her? My kittens have only just opened their eyes and need a mother.”

“I dunno if they’ll take t’ each other, laddie.”

“If they don’t, neither are worse off, are they?” Ori reasoned.

Master Vobwi considered, polishing his spectacles.

“Well, laddie, if yeh think she’ll be happy, I’ll let yeh take her, never mind th’ gold. If they don’t take, bring her back an’ I’ll deal with her. If they do take t’ each other an’ prosper, yeh come back an’ we’ll talk gold.”

“Really?” Ori asked, delighted. Something told him that the bat would love the kittens.

Master Vobwi grinned and gave his shoulder a friendly slap.

“Aye, laddie. I’ll wrap her up in a cloth f’r yeh. Remember now, she eats juicy fruits an’ needs a big window t’ get out of by night.”

“I’ll make sure,” Ori promised eagerly. Master Vobwi lifted the listless animal and gently swaddled her. Ori was about to settle her warmly in his satchel when there was a flash of dark brown fur and his satchel was suddenly full of two writhing bodies.

“Get out a’ there, yeh wee bastards!” Master Vobwi bellowed and dug savagely in Ori’s satchel while Ori clutched the fruit bat. Master Vobwi managed to disgorge two baby ferrets.

“Dratted little thieves, the pair o’ yeh!” Master Vobwi muttered and gave both a little shake. This unfortunately loosened his hold and, in perfect sync, the pair leapt back amongst Ori’s belongings.

Ori looked at Master Vobwi.
“I have a brother who’s always wanted ferrets. How much?”

“F’r them two? A bloody copper a piece an’ I’d be tempted t’ pay yeh t’ take ‘em.”

Ori laughed as he handed over the money for the toys and the ferrets, now happily asleep in his satchel. Omi and Loli had a bag of bat treats each. Fortunately Dipfa and Pika had talked Buj out of buying the blood sucking bat by telling him that sending it to feed on Wobr would make the bat die of hair wax poisoning.

Ori was half way to the door when he felt something crawling up his back thigh. He stopped and turned to scootch his sight over his shoulder. A baby badger had caught hold of his tunic and was determined to come along. Ori thought this would be ideal for Ballin and put down six silver for it. Master Vobwi threw in a bucket full of hay to carry the badger.

The friends walked on and headed toward their various homes. Buj and Dipfa turned off near the main avenue, as Buj refused to let his precious diamond walk unescorted. Pika and Omi parted romantically and then Ori and the two sisters headed to the royal cavern. Loli told Ori that Buj’s belongings had been removed to the Sons of Groin’s residence while they worked.

It wasn’t until Ori came in through the receiving room that he had a stab of worry about what Dori might say.

“I’m home,” he called as he shut the sitting room door behind him.

He was greeted with silence. He kicked off his boots and took his wiggly purchases through to his and Dwalin’s room. He placed the satchel carefully on the bed so as not to wake the ferrets. He put down the bucket and laid the large bat in her cloth on the bed.

The kittens peeped out of the basket, watching as he removed his cloak and thick cardigan. He returned to the bed and carefully unwrapped the bat. It gave him a sad look. He kissed the furry head impulsively.

“I have something for you,” he murmured and knelt down by the basket. The kittens began making hungry noises. The bat’s ear flicked. Ori laid her down in the basket and helped the kittens to her still full nipples.

All three kittens latched on and began feeding greedily. The bat raised its head and looked at them. Ori swore he saw surprise and interest in her eyes. She watched for a moment then leaned down her head and began to wash the kitten nearest. Ori pulled a stool from nearby and watched. The bat curled around her new kits and washed a second one with new vigor. Her wing opened and covered them. Ori got up and hurried upstairs. He found the stand he remembered from his earlier explorations, brought it down and set it in the bedroom. It was made to hold several bats and a few ravens so he was sure it was up to bearing her weight. When he went back to the basket by the bed the bat had wrapped both her wings around the kittens and was holding them close to her body. Omi smiled down at her.

“Better?” he asked.

The bat looked up, her eyes full of life and sparkling. He lifted her carefully and brought her to the stand and helped her grasp the bar to hang upside down as bats preferred. The kittens wiggled in the cradle of her wings, obviously righting themselves, and settled again. The bat sighed deeply and drifted off to sleep.
Ori went through to the pantry and found a packing box. He filled this with the hay from the badger’s bucket. The badger was now curled into a ball on the bed.

The ferrets were also asleep and he placed them in the box and took them upstairs to Nori and Bofur’s room. He placed it on the bed, closed the window, and locked the door behind him.

Returning to the bedroom with a basket from a store room upstairs, he found an old, very poufy cushion and placed it in the basket. Ori dexterously lifted the badger into the basket and carried this off to Balin’s and Thorin’s office. He put it on Balin’s desk chair and left him a note.

Ori came out and heard noises in the kitchen. He went though and found that Dori was home with Klakuna in tow and Mistress Dazla was fussing behind them.

“There you are, pet.” Dori came over to kiss his forehead and pat his hair.

“Guess what, Dori!” Ori said eagerly.

“They found Shire?”

“How did you know he’s missing?”

“It’s all over the mountain, dearest. Did they?”

“No, or, at least, not that I know of. Come see!”

Ori dragged his brother to the bedroom and showed him the fruit bat. The bat opened an eye then closed it again. Dori stared.

“My dear, that is the biggest bat I’ve ever seen!” Dori marveled. “Is it for deary?”

“No, the kittens!”

“Where are they?” Dori asked, looking at the empty basket.

Ori went to the bat, cradling her gently and encouraged her to open her wings a little. Dori looked startled at the sight of the three kittens curled happily in their new mother’s wings.

“Well,” Dori managed. “it will be quite something when she tries to teach them to hunt mice.”

“She won’t,” Ori explained. “She’s a fruit bat. Master Vobwi says she likes things that have lots of juice like raspberries.”

“Who is Master Vobwi?”

“He owns the small animal emporium. He had all kind of different things. The most beautiful tiny birds all different colors from every corner of Arda. And lizards and fish and a horrid thing with eight legs. I suppose it was an underwater spider but I didn’t see a web. Mind, it must be difficult to spin a web under water. Master Vobwi made these lovely toys for the kittens, too.”

Ori unearthed them from his satchel. Dori looked over the felt balls, amused.

“Well, pet. I’m glad you had fun, but how did you find Master Vobwi’s place?”

“Buj took us. We went with Omi and Loli and Pika and Dipfa. Buj wanted to buy a blood sucking bat to eat Wobr over time but Pika talked him out of it.”
Dori chuckled, and putting his arm about Ori, led him back to the kitchen.

“So, my pet, what is your red bat’s name?”

“Kihshassa,” said Ori decidedly. “You know like that red licorice candy from Rohan.”

“I like it,” Dori approved. “Kihshassa, she is.”

Dori and Ori had just sat down to share a cup of tea when there was a shout from upstairs. Ori giggled and Dori gave him a what-did-you-do look. Nori came bounding into the kitchen, his arms full of ferrets. Bofur bounced in after him waving his hat.

Dori! Lookee, I’ve got me ferrets!” Nori was jubilant.

“Yeh aint keepin’ them destructive monsters! Look what they done t’ me hat!” Bofur shouted.

Nori scoffed.

“They ain’t done nuffin’! Just had a wee nibble on the edge. They’re are makin’ themselves comfy!”

“It’s me hat, not a bleedin’ nest f’r yer vermin!”

“You like them?” Ori asked eagerly.

Nori grabbed Ori’s head and rubbed his knuckles through Ori’s hair, making him yelp.

“Love ‘em, pet. Yer th’ best! I’ll have ‘em all trained up in a tic.”

“Tea, dears?” Dori offered.

Bofur slumped in a chair and stared morosely at the edge of the hat which Ori noticed bore a lot of tiny tooth marks.

Dori looked up toward the doorway and rose. Ori heard the front door open and there were rather a lot of voices. He raised his eyes to Dori, who calmly made more tea.

The sitting room door burst open to admit a major Durin crisis.

“You have to do something, Thorin!” Dis insisted, waving her arms at Thorin in a very un-Dis-like manner, Kili at her elbow, wringing his hands.

“What in Mahal’s name can I do about it?” Thorin demanded.

“Shire is missing! You’re a king. There must be something you can do.”

“Get a grip, Dis, I can’t just issue a proclamation ordering him found.”

“You could offer a reward!”

Dori turned to Ori.

“As I said.”

“Uhm. Yes, but I’m going to read what Sigrid brought me before I decide.”

As Ori finished his tea he heard the front door open again and Sigrid’s voice greeting them.
“Did you read it?” she demanded of Ori as soon as she saw him.

“But I’m about to. Come on.”

And Ori dragged her off to his bedroom, where the pair of them sprawled on the bed to read.

Excerpt from ‘The Heaving Bosom of the Ocean - A Tale of Terror and True Love on the High Seas!’ by Notathain A. Shire Squire Harsh sneered at her.

“Don’t be a fool, girl. Come away with me now. The pirate king has given you to me.”

“He has given me leave to stay or go at my will and I will not go with you.”

“And why not?”

“I know you for a brute. I will not be whipped by you like your oxen or your horse.”

The squire drew back his shoulders and declared, “I shall not whip you! You will be my wife. I will be kindness itself to you. Certainly, I will be kinder than a barbarian who chains you to his bed.”

She shook her head.

“No, if you take no pity on dumb animals, you will not spare your wife, definitely not one with so tart a tongue as I. You assume much. I am not chained to his bed. I come and go from it quite freely.”

Squire Harsh sputtered and gasped as though he had been splashed with icy water. His face turned several shades of purple, then scarlet, than nearly grey before he mastered himself again.

“Think carefully on what you throw away, Estrella. I am willing to forgive that you are soiled and give you a respectable establishment. I am willing to lift you up in this world.”

“Captain Cockrell has already lifted me as far as I care to go.”

“How long will that last? How many women has he had? He tires of your charms already or he would not give you leave to go so readily. Soon you will be just another perfumed jade in his hareem.”

She blinked at him.

“He lives on his boat, Harsh. Where do you think he hides such a hareem? Amongst the rum barrels?”
“You were once a noble lady, Estrella, who knew every comfort, every luxury. Perhaps I am not a lord, but I am a man of wealth and respectability, a landlord, and my father’s heir. You would give up all that? I ask you one last time, Estrella, will you come away with me now?”

Ori gasped as he read that very last line in the book.

“Don’t do it, Estrella!”

“That’s exactly what I said,” Sigrid agreed, vehemently. “But the pirate king isn’t helping by not telling her that he loves her. How can he command fifty bloodthirsty cutthroats and be the terror of the high seas and not know he has to do that? Really? He cannot be that dense!”

“You know how these things go,” said Ori. “He is that dense until he nearly loses her and then he confesses his love and reveals he is the true, lost king of someplace or other, who can’t return home because of something or other.”

“You live for that,” Sigrid accused.

“Yes. Yes, I do,” Ori admitted happily.

From Balin’s study they heard Thorin curse.

“Really? How can you be a pirate king and be that dense?”

Balin’s tongue clicked as his voice obviously came from the study as well.

“Have mercy, laddie, th’ rest o’ us haven’t read it yet.”

“Sorry.”

“An’, aren’t yeh supposed t’ be writin’ a ‘no thank yeh’ reply t’ General Aris’ latest proposal o’ marriage?”

Thorin’s voice took on a nasal, whiny tone. “Yes, Master Balin.”

“Aye, very nice. Give me tha’.”

“Dis has a copy,” said Thorin in mock petulance.

“Dwalin took it t’ read in his office.”

A brief pause, then Balin came to the bedroom doorway.

“Wee brother?”

Ori and Sigrid snickered.

Ori held out his copy.

“Here, we just finished.”
“Thank yeh, laddie. If yeh could give Thorin a hand with his letters, laddie, that’d be grand. Yer highness, I believe our Dori is waitin’ in th’ kitchen t’ have a chat with yeh.”

“Is there tea and cake?” Sigrid asked hopefully. “And don’t call me ‘your highness’, it’s weird.”

Balin winked and laid his finger alongside his nose.

“A’ course, yer highness.”

Sigrid stuck her tongue out at Balin then pushed Ori off the bed and ran out laughing as he cursed her.

Balin led the way to his and Thorin’s study.

Ori was briefly taken aback by what looked like a set of drying racks beside the window. There were four long rungs, each thickly populated by bats, crows, owls, thrushes, and pigeons. Ravens disdained the racks and perched themselves wherever they felt like it. There was a single pole, on which Thranduil’s falcon perched. It looked about, seeming fascinated by everything around it. It held a large piece of dried meat in one claw and snacked on this while it waited.

Before the fireplace, sitting on a large velvet cushion, was the most enormous bird Ori had ever see. Ori wondered if it was a goose of some kind, but it was larger than that and completely white. Seeing his look, Balin chuckled.

“It’s called a swan, wee brother. It’s a water bird an’ can fly high an’ very fast. Belongs t’ th’ Queen a’ th’ Blue Mountains out by th’ western sea. Apparently, th queen there fancies lakes. She has a great big ‘un with fountains an’ th’ like, full a’ these sort a’ bird.”

Soon Ori was settled at Thorin’s desk, proper papers before him, but he held a scratch notebook for rough drafts. Thorin was staring out the window and Balin seated himself at his own desk. He gave Ori a look as he picked up the baby badger and settled it in his lap.

“What have you named it?” Ori asked, eagerly.

“Brandy,” Balin replied. “A sweet, strong name for a sweet, strong, wee badger lass.”

“Hello, Brandy,” Ori greeted the kit.

Brandy paid no attention as she industriously dug at Balin’s lap then settled herself with a little grunt. She looked up at Balin and delivered a long speech of squeaks and snorts. Balin looked inquiringly down at her and nodded gravely.

“Aye, wee one, that’s jus’ wha’ I think.”

Thorin turned from the window and nodded to Balin’s desk. Balin picked up the letter on it and read it over.

“Very polite, laddie. So, married t’ th’ mountain, are yeh?”

“No, you’re not,” Ori interrupted.

“Yes, I am,” Thorin replied, trying not to smile at Ori’s vehemence.

“No, you’re not.”

“Ori,” Thorin reasoned. “I told you and Dwalin yesterday-”
“No, you’re not!” Ori wasn’t too sure why it seemed very important to him that Thorin not say this officially. “You can’t be. You’re not king… I mean, you haven’t been crowned.”

“Lad has a point, Thorin.” Balin came to Ori’s assistance.

Thorin waved the matter away.

“Very well. Tell her I’m currently too busy with affairs of state to be entertaining such and certainly cannot do so in the middle of mourning.”

“Ahh, very good, laddie. Mourning is an excellent excuse.”

Balin’s pen stroked through the offending line and wrote out the chosen excuse. Balin then handed it to Ori, who quickly copied the letter out fair and handed it back to Thorin.

Thorin re-read it, nodded and signed it. Balin prepared the wax and Thorin slid his signet ring to his knuckle to seal the letter shut.

There were a number of similar letters. It was now that Ori learned the letters that went to merchants and guilds were taken care of by Dis. Kingdom-wide trades had to go through Thorin first. Ori quickly recognized Dis’ hand and stationary. Thorin merely glanced through these, and signed them. Thorin never quibbled with anything Dis had negotiated. She was quite as adept as Dori when it came to haggling, except hers was on a much larger scale.

“Yes, “ sighed Thorin. “Some how I’m going to have to explain that Thror’s correspondence was not attended to personally due to his declining health. Now I am king so he needs to correspond with me and also to be wary of Frerin.

“Aye,” Bain agreed, stroking his beard thoughtfully. “Absolute truth yet polite, hmmm.”

Ori watched as the two older dwarrow considered. Ori fidgeted and scribbled nonsense to keep his mind clear. He looked up. Both were now staring at him.

“What?”

Thorin cocked an eyebrow.

“We heard you writing. What did you think?”

“Umm,” Ori gulped and looked at what he’d written. “It’s nothing; I was just messing about and…practicing keeping my handwriting nice.”

Thorin narrowed his eyes, a grin starting.

“Ori.”

“Yes, your majesty…er…Thorin.”

“Read what you wrote.”

Ori looked panicked at Balin.

“Yeh heard his majesty.” Bain filled his pipe, his eyes crinkling in mirth.
Ori gulped again and read aloud.

“Dear King of Gondor,

My grandpappy dropped dead so I’m king and my brother’s an asshat.

Cheers,

Thorin.”

Thorin and Balin roared with laughter, Ori tittered nervously.

“Yes,” Thorin assured him blithely. “Very elegant.”

He turned to the raven on the corner of his desk.

“Roäc, what do you think?”

Roäc snorted and chuckled.

“Asshat, eh? The scribe has admirable restraint. I would have called him a little-“

“Ahem” said Thorin. “I’ll just bet. Shall we try this again?”

“Yes,” said Ori. “I’m ready when you are. Please tell me what you’d like it to say.”

“I’ll leave out that ‘asshat’, then?”

“Please,” Ori muttered, totally embarrassed, but relieved to find Thorin was far from angry.

Thorin began,

“Saluations, Elessar, King of Gondor…”

Several minutes later Ori handed the finished letter to Balin, who approved it and passed it on to Thorin to read over and seal.

“That’s done,” said Thorin, offering it to Roäc, who took it without comment and flew it away. “One ruler down, an endless number to go.”

Balin regarded him slyly.

“Wait ‘til th’ coronation invites have t’ go out. Gold ink on parchment, raised seal and all.”

“And each guaranteed arrived graced with genuine Ereboean raven spit,” said Thorin. “A homey touch.”

“The swan is waiting,” said Balin.
Said swan seemed to shrug, and wave him off with a negligent wing before tucking its head underneath and starting to snore.

“Or not,” said Balin, “as the case may be.”

Dori called them in for supper. They arrived to find Bofur grumbling to Jani about his hat.

“Oh, calm yer arse down,” Jani muttered. She reached into her kit and pulled out another, identical hat and tossed it to him. “Here.”

Ori whispered to Dwalin, “He has a spare?”

“Safety first,” said Dwalin.
Training, tiny tots, and tea.

Chapter by Stevie Foxx

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And so the days progress and the mystery deepens. Again we’d like to give thanks and cute kudos to #Arel for her suggestion and translation of the Mushroom Song. Thank you so much, dear. We love it! There’s a tea party in this one and dinner, so you may want to er… fortify yourselves before reading and maybe during. Please do join us next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Shortly after breakfast next morning, Ori sat on one of the spectator benches at Erebor’s martial training grounds and pulled out his sketchbook. It was a beautiful, warm day.

Down in the round, sandy arena Dwalin put the youngest badgers through the first steps of warrior training. They came from all over Erebor and Dale for this opportunity, and their parents filled the benches around Ori, calling out encouragement to their tiny warriors-to-be.

Even with training gear sized to their frames, the badgers still moved liked they’d been popped into iron nappies, lifting and swinging unwieldy girders for swords.

They wobbled and fell a great deal more often than they managed to stay upright. Much of Dwalin’s time was taken up encouraging them to get up on their own, and finally, after watching them struggle like stranded turtles, picking them up and putting them back on unsteady feet.

None of this dampened their excitement or enthusiasm.

Ori saw Dain and Thorin entering from the armory, kitted out for combat, carrying their weapons and helmets. They stopped to watch the proceedings, but one of the badgers caught sight of them and cried out, “Look! There’s King Thorin and King Dain.”

The badgers immediately lost all discipline and stood, staring with their mouths open, except for the badger who remained on the ground, struggling, and crying piteously, “I want t’ see King Thorin!”

Thorin handed his sword and helmet to Dain and went and scooped the dwarfling up, placing him on his feet.

“There you are. My, but you struggled bravely!” Thorin commended him.

The badger gaped at him, speechless, with huge eyes.

Thorin winked and brushed the badger’s braids out of his face before returning to his chuckling cousin.
Perhaps sensing they would get no more out of them today, Dwalin and Furh’nk shelled them from their armor like dwarf walnuts and lined them up once more.

“Alright, yeh wee wargs,” Dwalin barked, “ten laps an’ off t’ th’ baths wi’ yeh!”

They stood and stared at him in confusion.

The bravest one said, “Captain Dwalin, sir, what’s ‘laps’?”

“It means: run around th’ circle, yeh silly nestlin’s! Go!”

They did this far more energetically than the older soldiers, shrieking and chasing each other, until Furh’nk herded them off to the bath. The parents gathered themselves, ready to collect their badgers, hopefully less sand-covered after the bath than they were now. Assistants retrieved the abandoned armor to sort and clean. It would be a while before the little ones would be expected, or trusted, to clean their own.

A dam sitting nearby looked over Ori’s shoulder.

“Oi, that’s my pebble Nattis. How much yeh want f’r tha?”

Ori pulled the page free and turned to the dam, “Oh, nothing. Here. You take this. It’s just for practice.”

“Y’r that Lord Ori feller, th’ king’s scribe, ain’tha?”

“Um… just Ori, but, yes, I am a scribe.”

“Well! I never! Here, will yeh sign it? She’ll think tha’s grand!”

“Of course.”

He did so, rather startled to find that this opened a kind of floodgate. In a short span, his sketchpad was largely decimated, though he still did have a few extra drawings as he’d done several of this badger or that as he worked out movements and shading.

“I think you’ve captured the essence of the chaos,” said Dis over Ori’s shoulder. She sat next to him. “May I?”

He handed her his book and she leafed through, smiling and nodding.

“These are wonderful, Ori. It doesn’t seem so long ago that my own terrors were just like this. Fili waved his sword around, shouting threats as if he could defend Arda single-handed and Kili sat in the sand with his arms crossed and announced that he’d have nothing to do with all this silly ‘sword stuff’ and had decided to become a wolf.”

Ori choked, then,

“Was Dwalin stricter with them than the others?”

“I think he tried to be, at first, as his father had been with him, but once he learned to treat them as he did any other badger, he got more from them.”

“I can’t even imaging Dwalin was ever this small,” said Ori.

“Small is a relative term. He was never exactly fragile, I admit.”
In the arena, Dwalin took the smoothing plane with its long handle to the kicked up sand. He turned to Dain and Thorin, who donned padded hoods and then their helmets over them.

“I don’ suppose yeh’ll need a referee?”

Dain settled his helmet with a tap.

“Like we’d listen t’ an old worrywort like yeh!”

“Fine, jus’ keep th’ bloodshed t’ a minimum. Oin’s out in Dale with Binni t’day. Unless yeh want me t’ stitch yeh up with a rusty needle?”

They made him rude replies as they took their positions. Dwalin chuckled as he made his way to the benches.

“Hullo, love,” he said and kissed the top of Ori’s head. “Wha’ yeh got there?”

Dis enthused, “Show him, Ori. Dwalin, you have to see these.”

Shyly, Ori offered the sketchbook to Dwalin, who went through the drawings of his badgerling trainees with sparkling eyes and a grin.

“These’re great! Look at Tirin bitin’ his lip. I’ll have t’ train him outa tha’. An’ Mris with her wee scowl. She’ll be murder one day, yeh’ll see.”

A howl and a ring of metal drew their attention to the arena where Dain started with a great, swooping chop that Thorin parried so the axe blade sank six inches into the sand. Dain swung his bulk around to knock Thorin off balance while he freed it, but Thorin spun away and tried to kick Dain’s legs out from under him. Dain leapt clear on his metal leg with impressive grace and swung the axe in a blur. Thorin dodged to protect his midsection, but this left his belly exposed and Dain pressed the advantage, forcing Thorin back and back across the sand.

Dain’s sinister chuckle reached them on the wind.

“So,” said Ori, “this is what Durins do for family fun.”

“Sometimes,” said Dis. “You can only drink so much tea. Unless you’re Dori, of course.”

She watched as Dain jabbed Thorin hard in the side with the butt of his axe. The armor took the bulk of the impact, but it still knocked Thorin sideways several feet.

“Yer outa shape!” Dain roared. “Dwalin oughter make yeh run in greaves like th’ badgers!”

Thorin did not rise to the bait. He dropped back into a ready stance and they circled each other. They feinted and glared and waited for one of them to make a move, make a mistake.

Dis raised an eyebrow, and said in a voice meant to be heard by the combatants, “You should have brought your knitting, Ori. Those two can do this for hours.”

“We await your pleasure,” Thorin said, dryly.

“Well, bash on with it, then, you sorry old dwarrow!” goaded his sister. “You’ve both gone to scree!”

Dain laughed and Thorin grinned.
“She wants a show, cous’,” said Dain. “Should we give the lady what she wants?”

Thorin bellowed and attacked. Dain deflected and they were off.

It was fast and harsh and they had fallen silent to save their breaths for storms of savage blows. They struck and kicked and threw dust in each other’s eyes.

Dain clouted Thorin across the back of the helmet with his metal gauntlet, throwing sparks. Thorin spun and clocked Dain in the chin below his faceplate with a wicked elbow.

They were so equally matched and so competitive that the fight went on and on until the two of them grew clumsy with exhaustion and Dwalin called a halt.

“Tha’s enough, yeh lot. Yeh’ll run each other through in a minute an’ I’m no’ scrapin’ yer innards off th’ sand.”

“Aw,” Dain complained. “Yer worse’n me mam.”

“I’ve met yer mam, an’ tha’ ain’t hardly possible.”

Their weapons put up, they pulled off their helmets and caps, sweat pouring down their reddened faces, and bashed their armored shoulders together, chuckling and gasping.

“I’d’a had yeh in other minute,” Dain declared.

“You mean you’d have had it in another minute,” Thorin shot back. He looked up at Dis. “Will that suffice, your highness?”

“Not bad for an off day,” she said airily.

“Oh! Me fragile ego!” Dain cried. “Evil dam! Well, I stink. Time for th’ bath. Then, a pint or twelve, I think.”

“Sounds good,” Thorin agreed. “Would her highness care to join us?”

“And listen to you two whine in your ale? Terrible waste of a few hours!”

Off they went.

Dis turned to Ori.

“When they were younger they tried to outdrink each other, too.”

“You never had to sneak Thorin home drunk, did you?” Ori asked.

“Tha’ was my job,” said Dwalin. “I could hold me ale better than those shaleheads, at least at th’ pub. At home, we all got plastered often enough, an’ we didn’t have a Dori standin’ by with a magic drink. I think Oin knew how t’ make it, but he kept tryin’, with no success, t’ teach us a lesson.”

“So, yes,” said Dis. “I suppose this is what Durins do for fun. Can you think of a better way to spend a morning?”

“Yes, and that’s why I’m here,” said Ori. “Dori and Balin found the better way.”

“I see,” said Dis sympathetically.
“Right through a locked door,” said Ori, shaking his head. “They’re really good.”

“Or at least really loud,” she said.

“I’m just not terribly comfortable listening to that right now. I don’t suppose I ever will be comfortable with it. No more than Dori would probably be listening to me and Dwalin.” Ori frowned. “Especially considering some of the things we say to each other when we’re… I’m going to stop talking now.”

Dwalin roared with laughter and hauled Ori to his feet and, with Dis, they headed to Fundin house for lunch.

Once home, Dori shooed Dwalin off to bathe before the meal. While he did so, Ori rummaged in the larder and filled a wooden bowl with new strawberries, red brambles, and a few plums. He took this through to the bedroom. Kihshassa blinked, flipped neatly down to the floor, and opened her wings. Powder, Nori-Pori, and Mask tumbled out and scampered to Ori’s tunic.

Ori rolled out their new toys onto the floor. Nori-Pori fought like a warg with his, knocking it into the stand and hissing as he lunged after it. Mask was dainty as he patted the ball and looked startled every time it rolled and rang. Powder curled her fluffy tail about her front paws and regarded the balls with disgust.

Ori sat on the floor near Kihshassa and the bat clambered up to balance her wing fingers on his knee. Ori put the bowl in his lap and held out the plum to her.

Ori was very pleased to watch as the bat devoured all the plums and strawberries. He started on the raspberries just as Dwaln walked in. He was drying his hair, with another towel slung about his waist. He came over and watched as Ori fed Kihshassa berries, one at a time.

“Them raspberries, love?”

“Yes,” Ori chuckled. “She’s already had three plums and a dozen strawberries. She seems to like these best.”

“Mmmm,” Dwalin observed. “Better be careful feedin’ her them.”

“Why?” Ori looked up, surprised.

“Yes, why?” Dori and Balin looked in at the door.

“All them rasps,” Dwalin grinned. “They’ll get in her milk an’ when she feeds th’ kittens it’ll turn their fur pink.”

Dori and Balin laughed. Ori tried to frown at his husband, but could’t.

“Perhaps then they can hide in your drawers. Such perfect camouflage.”

Dori and Balin laughed harder to the point that Dori leaned against the door jamb. Dwalin dropped the towel on Ori’s head, removed it swiftly to kiss him and then turned toward the door.

“Where are you going?” Ori asked.

“Kitchen. Find some cool water f’r tha’ burn.”
Ori giggled. Dwalin turned, swooped down and seized him, noisily kissing his cheek.

“Oh dear,” Dori wiped his eyes. “I’m so glad they left the door open, my heart.” This to Balin.

“At least we do know when to close it,” Ori replied. “Unlike you two.”

Ori lifted Kihshassa to the stand where she started grooming. Ori looked at his still laughing brother.

“Mahal, the pair of you!” Ori waved his hands about and went on in a silly, raised voice. “Oooo Balin! OOO Balin! OOO that tickles! If Dwalin and I want to play such games, we shut the door.”

It was Dwalin’s turn to roar with laughter.

Dori shook his finger at them.

“Come along, now. We have to get lunch out of the way. I must make ready as dear Mistress Margr and Mistress Vi are coming to tea this afternoon.

“Hmmm,” said Dwalin. “Just remembered somethin’ I got t’ take care o’ in me office. In town.”

Dwalin left rather quickly after lunch, to take care of his alleged business in his ‘office in town’ and Fili went along ‘to help’. Dori had Mistress Dazla and her assistants polishing everything in the sitting room and receiving room and laying out silver cutlery. As they did, Dori baked scones, shortbread, cake and myriad of other goodies, all the while singing to himself, periodically breaking into giggles.

If you have a knife in your pocket and against the thirst something in your bottle and a handkerchief for the mushrooms you don't need anything else.

You have to know though, where the good mushrooms grow or you will only bring home poisonous ones this evening.

Ori looked down at the plate of fresh gnishes stuffed with mushroom and sweet and sour mutton and wondered if Mistress Margr and Mistress Vi were in for more than what they bargained.

“How are they getting here?” Ori asked, idly re-arranging things on one of the tea trays.

“Balin has sent the Fundin carriage for them. The teacup-shaped one. Though it’s still decorated in grey mourning, I’m sure they won’t object.”

“The Fundin carriage is going to Steam Alley?”

“The driver should be safe enough,” said Dori blithely. “At least, from the thugs in Steam Alley, though possibly not from Margr or Vi. We were right to send Fuhrn’k off to hide. They’d eat him alive and he certainly wouldn’t enjoy it.”
“Who did Balin send?”

“Mokrah, the stable lad. He’s deaf and mute.”

“He is not!” Ori gasped, hotly.

“That’s what I told him to sign in inglishmek, it’ll be easier on him that way.”

Ori considered this then shrugged.

“Desperate times do call for desperate measures.”

In this case, the measures involved four kinds of scones: milk, cheese, wild chive, and basil. Ori took the shortbread biscuits from the cooling rack and topped them in melted caramel and xocolātl. Dori sliced a round sponge cake into three layers and filled them with last year’s red current jelly and sweetened whipped cream, and dusted the top with powdered sugar.

He ordered Ori to open a crock of elderberry jam, and butter a huge pile of toast as Mistress Dazla came in and raised an eyebrow. Dori nodded then shooed Ori out of the kitchen, telling him to put on his ‘nice purple suit’.

When Ori came back in, buttoning a grey sleeveless cardigan of grey over the ‘nice suit’, Dori was there, dressed in a a simple robe of a cloud of rose-colored silk, all trimmed with mourning grey. His demitrain whispered across the floor as he moved to inspect the table settings, casually attaching ear cuffs that looked like tiny silver butterflies. There were matching rings on his fingers and his grey felted slippers peeped from beneath the hem, Ori saw they were splashed with silver butterflies. Dori’s hair was unbraided but a few of the soft waves were caught up with silver butterfly shaped pins.

“Dori, you look…” Ori wondered what in Arda he could say. His stalwart brother, the strongest dwarf, if not any in the Dale and maybe the whole of Erebor had morphed into a dainty vision of apple blossom.

Dori raised an eyebrow, “Yes?”

Ori decided.

“You’ve bloomed, Dori.”

Dori blushed faintly and hurried forward to clasp him.

“My sweet little badgerling,” Dori murmured and kissed Ori’s hair.

“Ori’s Dori,” Ori mumbled into Dori’s hair, hugging back hard.

After a moment, Dori released him and gave his bottom a spank. “Now you wait here and I’m going to check on the tea.”

A moment later Mistress Dazla went whisking through the sitting room door to the receiving room. It was this time that Ori spotted the tiny chickadee that obviously gave her warnings as to when and who was coming and going, flying before her to the front door.

Ori heard her offer welcome, then he heard the voices of Margr and Vi.

“Oh!” Margr exclaimed. “Vi, would yeh jus’ look at that fireplace! It’s bigger’n me whole kitchen.”
“And cleaner,” said Vi tartly.

The two of them laughed uproariously.

Mistress Dazla admitted them to the sitting room and they exclaimed like pigeons.

“Such a room!”

“Such ornaments!”

“Such furnishings as I never in my life-“

“Lookit tha’ table, yeh could clog dance on tha’ until yeh was fagged to th’-”

“An’ there’s Master Ori lookin’ cute as a nugget!”

“An’ tha’ suit! So rich lookin’!”

Dori swept in.

“Ladies! I bid you welcome to the House of Fundin.”

“Ooooooooh, our Dori,” Vi cried. “Yeh look just ravishin’!”

“And you, Vi, and you. You and Margr both look simply… incredible.”

Ori imagined that was the safest word either of them could use.

Plaid. He saw endless yardage of cranberry-raspberry plaid, from their voluminous matching frocks to the oversized bows in their oversized coifs to the ties of their boots. They wore rings on every finger, bangles and bracelets up each arm and mounds of necklaces in profusion thick as scarves. Their ears were invisible beneath earcuffs and rings and in their hair, which Vi had dyed cranberry and Margr’s raspberry to match their outfits. As a sop to mourning, they had tied huge grey ribbon bows around each ankle.

To his horror, Ori got a glimpse of how Omi and Loli might look in another hundred fifty years.

Doubtless they would think such a thing wonderful.

He thought Vi and Margr were more like unfortunate Yule tree ornaments.

He wondered if Dori had any more of that medicinal brandy about.

The ladies and Dori kissed each other’s cheeks rapturously and Ori bravely endured having his cheeks pinched.

Mistress Dazla swept out of the kitchen carrying an enormous silver tray. On this was a set of porcelain cups and saucers, plates with a matching pattern of cream background emblazoned with fat crimson and peach colored roses and gold trim. In the middle, stood a tall, pot-bellied mithril teapot.

“Would you care for refreshments?” Dori asked them.

“Would we!” Vi cried. “It’s rumored yeh Durins put on quite a spread.”

“No fair guessing,” Dori purred quietly while the ladies turned and charged the table.

Once settled, Dori poured tea and Mistress Dazla passed around the shortbread before curtseying
“Thank you so much, Mistress Dazla,” Dori cooed. “I’d be lost without you.”

“It is always an honor and a pleasure to serve you, Bearer,” sighed Mistress Dazla with a melting smile before she retired to the kitchen.

Margr stared after Mistress Dazla, then hissed at Vi.

“Servants! He has servants!”

Dori smiled sweetly.

“Mutton gnish?”

For a long little while there was minimal talk and maximum chewing, though the sisters’ eyes never stopped wandering the room, doubtless taking in every detail.

Margr said at length, “So many changes in Steam Alley in so little time, our Dori. Yeh know where the grocer’s was that burned? They salvaged th’ front and knocked in a wall to the flat behind an’ now there’s a bakery there, just like that! Very nice. Quite pretty stuff, high class but not so high priced. It’s that Dal who’s doin’ it, the one who’s got that aunt of his mam’s out in Gondor. Foreign lady, yeh know. They’re bringin’ in Gondorian pastries and the badgers’er all beggin’ f’r coppers f’r a taste.”

The teapot was on its fourth pass when Lady Galadriel swept in, unannounced.

“Dori, my dear! I was just passing by and I thought I’d pop in.”

Vi’s mouth creaked open and her biscuit fell into her tea with a splash.

Margr’s eyes went directly to Galadriel’s bare, white feet.

Ori would have sworn Galadriel was floating a little higher than usual on purpose.

Dori and Ori rose and bowed, leaving Margr and Vi to scramble up after.

“Lady Galadriel!” Dori called, coming forward, holding out both his hands. “Do come and join us.”

“I’ve been desolate without you, my dear,” said Galadriel, kissing Dori on both cheeks and Ori on one and giving him a cheeky wink with her back to the Dale ladies. She was wearing her usual white robes but this time there was a sprig of apple blossom tied with a ribbon at her left shoulder. The lady turned.

Dori said, “Here are my neighbors from Dale, Mistress Margr and Mistress Vi. Ladies, Lady Galadriel of Lothlorien.”

“Er…” said Vi.

Margr curtsied and said loudly, “Please t’ meetcha, milady.”

Vi caught up, “Yes, yes, any friend of our Dori’s and so forth and so on and on and…”

“How lovely to meet you both!” Galadriel cried. “Please, do sit down before your tea gets cold.”
Ori adjusted the chair platform to Galadriel’s height and she patted him fondly on the cheek.

Dori said, “I’ll just ask Mistress Dazla to bring you some of Binni’s elderberry jam and another platter of toast.”

Mistress Dazla walked through the door with said items on a tray at that moment, smiling a winning smile.

Lady Galadriel beamed at her.

“Mistress Dazla! You darling! You remembered.”

“Of course, ma’am,” said Mistress Dazla, dropping a curtsy.

Dori spooned honey and milk into a cup and poured tea for Galadriel.

He said, “Margr and Vi were just telling me about a new bakery that’s opened up. Apparently the family has an aunt in Gondor and they’re introducing Gondorian pastries. Go on, Margr, you tell it so nicely.”

“Well!” said Margr. “Dal, son of Lal-“

“You remember, our Dori?” said Vi. “His sister is married to that butcher we never liked.”

“Mm, yes,” said Dori.

“Oh, not anymore, hen. She’s shown him the door anyway,” said Margr, “and good riddance I say. Anyway, Dal always was a dab hand at pastries.”

“Only we never realized just how dab it was,” said Vi.

“Very dab, as it turned out,” said Margr. “He’s got the sweetest and the sourest tarts, of course.”

“Rather like her sister’s ex husband,” said Vi wryly.

“But he’s brought out this breadish, donutish affair filled with cream and dipped in jocklatel or some such. Have you had that yet, our Dori?”

Ori was about to point out that, yes, Dori had, and so had she, since she was talking around a mouthful of it, but Margr would not be stopped.

“The latest thing. Rather pricy, but I’m sure he adds a lot of sugar to stretch it. He calls it an iklar or some such.”

Vi tittered.

“Long, thick tube o’ cream with a hole at the end. Woulda thought they’d call em somethin’ else.”

“But, where did the money come from to open such a place? Who shops there?” asked Dori. “Can the neighborhood support it?”

Margr swallowed her biscuit.

“That Lord Whatisname’s invested in it. Invested in a lot o’ stuff now. What was ‘is name, Vi?”

“Zark. Lord Zark,” said Vi, obviously proud to know his proper name and title. “He didn’t go on t’ Beleghost with th’ others. He’s invested in th’ bakery and in old Amalin’s brewery that Amalin lost to th’ Master on account of his gambling debts. Amalin’s son Tin’s a master brewer.”

“He was one o’ them zinc mine fellers, poor things,” said Margr. “Oh, everyone’s very excited t’ have the brewery open again. He’s taken on apprentices an’ o’ course he needs laborers, so there’s some jobs t’ be had.”

Vi slurped her tea with a twinkle in her eye.

“That ain’t all Tin’s taken on, is it Margr?”

“No, not the least of it,” said Margr. “Rumor has it Lord Zark an’ his wife Lady Kadis are very great friends with Master Tin and his wife, Mistress Ondr. Such great friends that they’re all over at Zark’s house or Tin’s house nearly every night and none of ’em leaves ’til dawn.”

Ori had thought they were all rather friendly at the Bearer’s Feast, but at the time he’d assumed it was mostly alcohol. However, he wouldn’t spoil the sisters’ triumph by revealing he suspected first. They were guests, after all.

“All four of them?” Galadriel asked, amazed.

Dori sliced into the cake and served everyone with a plump triangle.

“Oh, yes, me dea- milady,” said Vi. “It ain’t all that unusual in itself. They’re all old enough, certainly. Oooo, our Dori! This cake!”

“Old enough t’ know better, certainly,” said Margr with a laugh, swiping her sixth biscuit.

“It’s just Zark’s a lord, ain’t he, and Tin’ ain’t, you know. That’s not done, or it wasn’t ’til our Thorin became king. An’ speaking’ o’ our Thorin, our Dori, yeh’ve got t’ get him married. Wouldn’t want t’ waste such a nice set o’ shoulders an’ that pretty bum.”

Something in Balin’s study crashed to the floor.

Ori suspected it was Thorin falling out of his chair.

The sisters turned to Galadriel.

“And how’re yeh keepin’, milady?” asked Vi solicitously.

“Yes, did poor Captain Haldir ever get a new set of trousers?” Dori asked, stirring his tea daintily. “Such a pity my brother Dain’s pig ate the others.”

Vi and Margr erupted into laughter.

Margr said, “Oh, so that’s whose britches they were!”

“Least he wasn’t in ’em at th’ time,” said Vi.

“Wait,” said Margr. “Yer brother?”

“That’s right!” said Margr triumphantly.
Ori could swear she was constructing a family tree for Dori in her head. Or, in this case, a guilty-by-association tree.

“I wonder where they got a bed big enough for all of them?” Galadriel wondered, a thousand miles away at least.

Slowly the pot slid across the table and tipped to dispense tea into her cup.

She startled.

“Oh, dear! I’m sorry, Dori. Where are my manners?”

“Where are mine, letting your cup run dry?” asked Dori. “Speaking of which, more toast?”

“Actually a bowl and a spoon would be lovely.”

Vi and Margr’s eyes were large enough Ori wondered they didn’t drop out of their skulls.

The door from the receiving room opened and Balin entered bearing a large pink box tied with a white ribbon.

Dori saw him and lit up like a bit of phosphorus in water.

“Balin! My heart, you’re back early from Dale!”

“Aye, beloved, got somethin’ here f’r yeh an’ th’ ladies.”

Dori met him halfway and they kissed and tapped foreheads. Then Balin saw Lady Galadriel had joined them.

“An’ th’ Lady! Well, now here’s a whole pi’ture o’ loveliness.”

Ori raised an eyebrow.

“Aye, aye, wee brother, yer lovely, too.”

Balin kissed Lady Galadriel’s hand and bowed low to Margr and Vi. To Ori’s eyes, they practically vibrated with excitement. Oh! How much they would have to tell!

“There’s a new pastry shop in Dale, I thought yeh might like an assortment o’ dainties.”

“Oh!” Dori exclaimed. “Margr was just telling us about that.”

Vi, who apparently could not contain herself, cried, “Did yeh bring th’ iklars?”

Balin tilted his head, an eyebrow raised but he replied smoothly,

“Yeh must understand, Mistress Vi, tha’ yeh know much more o’ these things than I. It was easier simply t’ ask th’ baker for a samplin’ o’ their best.

Mistress Dazla entered and took the box away. Balin sat at the table and Dori poured his tea.

“How are yeh ladies keepin’?” Balin asked. “Though I kin see yer all in very fine point, indeed!”

Margr giggled and the Dale ladies practically hugged each other in delight.

Vi tittered, “Oh, Lord Balin, yer as smooth as yer beard.”
“You must tell us all about the wedding,” said Margr, though Ori knew she must know it hadn’t taken place yet.

“We’re still betrothed as yet,” said Dori.

“Well!” Vi cried. “Now there will be a great marriage!”

“Have you picked the date?” Margr asked, shrewdly.

“Oh, we’ll marry next spring. It will take a while to plan, of course.”

Dori lowered his eye in feigned shyness, but with a wicked smile. Balin put his cup down and regarded Dori fondly. “I’ll not have it be any less than th’ best o’ everything for me beloved.”

“Of course not!” Vi and Margr chorused.

Dori beamed at Balin.

“Yes, Mahrdin must have time to design a wedding robe for me. I can hardly be married in my presentation robe!”

“Yeh were a vision!” Vi opined in delight.

“We all so enjoy seein’ yeh dance, Dori,” breathed Margr. “Yer so light on yer feet.”

“Whereas I’m only light on everyone else’s,” said Vi, giggling.

Mistress Dazla entered with a tray full of the dainties.

“Here we are, yer graces,” she said.

Balin rose.

“Alas, my dear ladies, I have work waitin’ in me office.”

Dori said, “Wait, my heart, take some -er- iklars with you.”

He put several on a plate.

“I can’t possibly eat all those, beloved,” murmured Balin.

“They aren’t all for you,” muttered Dori out of the side of his mouth.

They kissed and Balin swept a bow to the ladies and he went out.

Vi got back to the business of local gossip and said, “Have yeh heard about tha’ Shire, th’ writin’ feller, vanishin’?”

“It’s the talk of the mountain,” Dori agreed.

“What’s this?” Galadriel asked. “Shire is missing?”

Margr nodded sagely, apparently quite chuffed to be one up on an elf.

“Tha’s what me badger, Milgr, says. She reads all o’ Shire’s books t’ us. Such a good daughter! She was just readin’ us that new three copper one an’ she gets t’ th’ end an’ such a shock we got! Gone an’ without even finishin’ the book properly!”
“A scandal!” Vi agreed.

Galadriel looked surprised, then more than a little horrified.

“I wonder if Mithrandir knows…” she mused.

Ori wondered who Mithrandir was, and what they had to do with it, when the door opened and Dwalin walked in. Ori caught just a glimpse of a startled Fili behind his husband, but Fili apparently was sensible of the danger - and that he hadn’t yet been spied by the visitors, vanished.

Dwalin smirked over his shoulder and continued into the room alone after shutting the door.

He bowed politely.

“Yer ladyship. Mistress Vi, Mistress Margr.”

“Oh, it’s our dear Captain Dwalin!” Margr crowed, resting a rough hand gently on her bosom.

“It’s like Yule,” Vi agreed. “Presents all around!”

Dwalin took Balin’s abandoned seat, kissing his husband on the way down.

Margr and Vi sighed at this vision of romance.

“Here you go, deary,” said Dori, passing him a cup of tea. “And a nice gnish to go with it.”

“Thanks, our Dori.”

He was about to dig in when a dusting of plaster filtered through the air. A chip of it fell in Ori’s tea.

Ori looked at Dwalin. Dwalin looked at Ori.

Margr stopped talking and Lady Galadriel murmured, “Oh, dear.”

Their coordination was flawless.

Dori snatched the teapot, Galadriel, the jam, Margr, the milk and Vi, the honey. Everyone nabbed their cups and Dwalin and Ori swept away the trays of dainties as Nori crashed through the ceiling and landed on the table in a heap.

Nori groaned, looked around at them, rather dazed, grinned and said. “I had a dream and you were there, Dori, and you, and you.”

“You imbecile,” Dori snapped, “you could have squashed the iklars!”

Nori rolled over.

“If it’s all the same t’ yeh, Dori, I believe I’ve squashed mine. Oh, hullo, yer Lady Galadrielness. Didn’t know yeh had a twin.”

Balin and Thorin both appeared at the door. Balin sighed.

“Yeh know, Nori, me ‘da had tha’ trap door sealed up f’r a reason.”

“Obviously faulty workmanship,” said Nori.
Dwalin picked out a berry tart, inspected it, and fed a bite to Ori.

“Least we don’t ‘ave t’ get anyone in t’ reopen it.”

“Thanks fer yer concern,” said Nori. “I’m fine. A mere concussion is all.”

“Nonsense,” said Dori, wrestling him off the table. “Clearly if you fell on your head you wouldn’t feel it. Margr and Vi, you remember our Nori, my rat of a younger brother.”

“Oh! Yes!” Margr cried and Vi dusted him off. “Never mind, lovey, you join us fer tea.”

Dori looked properly horrified.

Thorin, though he obviously regretted drawing attention, said, “Nori, I think we should send for a healer.”

“Because your hair is flattened and even from here I can see your pupils aren’t the same size.”

“Aw! Tha’s total shite, Ori. I’m fine. Quit yer mewlin’.”

“Nori,” said Ori, “I’m over here.”

That rather tore it.

Dwalin sighed and handed the tray to Ori.

“I’ll go an’ get Oin.”

Dwalin went, Ori rather wished he could go, too. Thorin found himself the unwilling center of attention. There may have been only two sisters ogling him, but they appeared everyplace he turned. Finally he tried,

“Ladies, your servant,” he bowed. “May I say your frocks are stunning.”

“D’yeh really like them, yer majesty?” asked Vi, starry eyed as a tween.

“Really, I have no proper words to describe them,” said Thorin truthfully.

He looked to Ori for help. Ori could have committed regicide at that moment.

“They are fascinating,” Ori began. “Every time I look at them I see something I’ve never seen before.”

The tea party continued around the events. Dwalin came in then Binni and Sculdis entered with Oin and Sculdis assured Dori she and Binni would get dinner on. Lady Galadriel finished the elderberry jam, six cream puffs, and an apple-rhubarb turnover, then eyed the remaining mixed berry tart that Dazla had brought from the kitchen over the course of the exciting tea. Oin went out again muttering about getting something. Others began arriving home from work or other duties and Nori, despite he was supposed to remain quiet and still, insisted on telling his adventure to each arrival, changing the story every time so that, by the end, Dori was actually supposed to have picked up the table and clobbered Nori over the head with it.

“Good thing I saved the teapot,” said Nori to Gloin.
Then Bofur arrived home, tired and filthy, to find Nori telling his ferrets, now suddenly named Assault and Battery, that they were very naughty for tripping him down that flight of stairs.

“Nor?” Bofur asked leaning over him on the couch. “Yeh alright?”

“Hullo, dumplin’ butt,” said Nori, kissing him soundly.

Dori shook his head as Oin returned.

“Physically, he’s concussed,” said Dori. “Mentally, he’s really not much different that usual.”

Bofur looked grim. He wiped his hand on the underside of his tunic before tucking a loose fall of hair back over Nori’s shoulder.

“Head wound’s naught t’ joke about, Dor,” said Bofur.

Oin said very loudly and succinctly, “He never lost consciousness and he didn’t vomit. He’s got a bump the size o’ Erebor, but he’s not bleeding. That’s encouraging, at least. Here, I’ve got the skull hammer.”

The healer had to take the ruins of Nori’s hair down, which the thief fought vehemently so that Dori had to sit on him to keep him still while Oin examined the options, decrying Nori’s ‘irregular head shape’. Nori stuck out his tongue.

Oin muttered and struck Nori sharply on the head with the hammer. The crack echoed off the walls and Nori sighed and his smaller pupil grew to match his larger.

“Better?” Oin demanded.

“Aye,” said Nori. “Don’t feel like me head’s in a vice anymore. Oi, Bo, when’d you come in? Bofur snorted.

“Shortly before yeh called me ‘dumplin’ butt’ in front o’ th’ entire company, yeh daft thin’.”

Bofur kissed him, obviously relieved, and dragged him out to redo his hair.

Binni entered.

“Dinner will be ready momentarily, darlings. Meanwhile, here are some snackies.”

Balin turned to Vi and Margr, who had planted themselves in a corner, well out of the way. Ori imagined they were absorbing every single word and deed. At sight of the tray of hot toast pieces dripping with sharp cheese and mustard, they were once more in the thick of the crowd.

“Ladies,” said Balin, “if you would be so kind as to join us for dinner?”

“Oh,” said Margr, “we couldn’t possibly, could we, Vi?”

“We couldn’t? I mean, oh, but we wouldn’t want t’ put anyone out.”

“It’s no trouble at all,” said Balin. He turned to Lady Galadriel.

“Milady? May we tempt you?”

“It’s a very good thing for you that we are both otherwise engaged, Lord Balin. You’re far too tempting in and of yourself.”

Dain blustered in, Stonehelm under his arm.

“Well, me lovely family, we’ll be leaving’ yeh tomorrow so me an’ me darlin’ queen’re makin’ yeh a proper Iron Hills dinner!”

“Oh, how exciting!” Dori enthused as his older brother dropped his heir and barged over to take Dori in his arms and look him over.

“Ah, me dumplin’ yeh look like a pink sugar bun an’ twice as sweet.”

Dori giggled and snuggled up basking in the attention. Balin chuckled and shook his head, then gave Dori a look.

“Oh,” Dori cried. “My manners have gone sadly begging’! Margr. Vi. Come and meet my dear older brother. Dain, these are my two lovely neighbors from the Dale.”

Dain turned and immediately burst his attentions on the two dams.

“Well, well, well, an’ who’re these pretty young thin’s? Lovely peaches. An’ where’s yer mam? Can’t be introducin’ such sweet young thin’s t’ an ol’ goat like me, Dori. Shocking’ behavior, me dumplin’.”

“Dear brother,” said Dori sweetly, “your wife is in the kitchen, likely wielding a cleaver. I’d say that thought should provide you chaperone enough.”

“Aye, well,” said Dain breezily. “All me important bits’re in her saddlebag anyway.”

He bowed to the sisters very low, making the sisters giggle and hold out their hands for him to salute, which he did quite noisily.

Sculdis came out of the kitchen.

“Me king, get yer arse in here as I’m ready t’ serve. Quite flirtin’, yeh ol’ goat. Ignore ‘im, ladies. He’s ain’t go’ th’ manners o’ a warg. Don’ yeh, me love.”

“Aye, aye, me diamond,” Dain concurred happily and trotted off to the kitchen.

Chopper bounced in the door and then scampered, squealing to the kitchen which elicited a howl of rage from Binni.

Once again all seated themselves at the table. Sculdis and Binni came in one carrying a massive platter of fluffily mashed potatoes and the other with a matching platter of equally fluffy mashed turnips. These were placed on the table and the pair seated themselves. Stonehelm arrived with six dusty bottles of Iron Hills lava whisky which was poured out.

Dain bellowed out of the kitchen bearing a vast ashet which he placed before Dori at the foot of the table to serve.

Ori stared at what looked like a huge, dead hedgehog. It was grayish and round with flecks of black.

Dori looked it over with an air of interest.

“And how do I serve this, dear brother?”
“Give it a wee slice across th’ top an’ spoon it out, me dumplin’,” Dain instructed proudly.

Gingerly, Dori followed these directions and what came out Ori recognized as a sort of sausage meat. All were served and helped themselves to both potatoes and turnips.

Ori sniffed. It smelled like mutton and oatmeal but mostly like black pepper. He tasted it cautiously and it was exactly that. Couple with the potatoes and turnips and washed down with the rough whisky, it was quite a tasty meal.

Margr and Vi looked deeply interested and Ori was quite sure they were deconstructing it so they could cook an exciting foreign meal for their household.

Lady Galadriel, despite having throughly enjoyed everything served at the tea party, serenely consumed her plateful of Iron Hills special cuisine as though she was dining on the finest elven food.

“This is quite delicious, King Dain,” she commented. “What is your secret?”

Dain put another mouthful in and grunted.

“Entrails.”

After dinner, Thorin called for the Durin’s own carriage to take Margr and Vi home to Steam Alley and Ori requested a moment of Lady Galadriel’s time in private.

Since he didn’t have an office, they adjourned to the bedroom, which Ori reflected had now been seen by more females in two days than it had in probably Dwalin’s previous lifetime. Or maybe not. Ori would have to inquire about the nature of Dwalin’s former partners, if he ever got up the nerve.

Lady Galadriel exclaimed over the kittens and picked Powder up to nuzzled her. She seated herself on one of the chairs and Ori took the other. Ori opened his mouth but stopped as, now that he had the lady alone to talk to in private, the words he needed to describe what he felt were not available. Lady Galadriel waited patiently, stroking a purring Powder. The lady’s eyes held his. Part of him hoped she would just see what was in his brain and explain it to him. He sighed and she smiled.

“There are many things on your mind, Ori of Fundin House.”

“I can’t explain it in a way that would be sensible.” he said, ruefully. “At least, if I knew how to begin, it would help.”

Galadriel smiled more broadly.

“Then begin at the beginning. Is this something private to you or does it concern another?”

“It’s Thorin,” Ori stated. “If it was just my eyesight, I wouldn’t have bothered you, but I don’t think it is.”

“You seen something in Thorin?” she suggested.

Ori twisted the end of his cuff then blurted out,

“Lady Galadriel, when you look at Thorin, what do you see?”
She looked as though she were holding in a smile.

“Perhaps you should be more specific, dear.”

“Get me a staff and a pointy hat, I’ve lost my mind,” he groaned. “I mean, when you look at him, does it seem like… like…. As though there’s something near him but you can’t see it? Perhaps you can and I can’t but…?”

“Yes. I wondered if you would notice.”

Ori didn’t know whether to be relieved or worried.

“It’s as though there’s a space next to him,” Ori went on slowly, hunting for the words to describe what was technically indescribable. “As though…as though, I don’t know. As though someone should be standing there?”

“But isn’t,” she agreed. “Not yet.”

Ori digested this for a moment then,

“He almost declared himself married to the mountain the other day.”

“Oh! He mustn’t do that!” she cried.

“I know. But, he’s so stubborn. I don’t want to know the penalty for telling your king to keep his big gob shut!”

The lady laughed gently at that.

“I don’t think that will ever be a worry to you. You are his scribe and that casts you into the roll of an advisor as well.

“I can’t advise him,” Ori gasped. “I don’t know anything about politics and ruling and… and being royal.”

“And there lies your talent,” she went on. “Your experience is different. You see things his training and life have never shown him. How would he had ever found out the true needs of Erebor if you had not…er…arrived in his life?”

Ori swallowed.

“You know all about it, I suppose.”

The lady merely looked amused.

“I love Dwalin,” Ori said honestly. “I’ve barely known him a month and I love him like he’s always been a part of my life.”

“He was designed for you by Aüle, just as you were designed for him.”

“I know,” Ori sighed. “I just wish we came with the technical specifications. It would make things so much easier.”

Galadriel laughed whole heartedly.

“You are not alone in that, dear child.”
Ori looked into the fire for a moment. That the lady had known and understood what had troubled him was a relief.

“What would you advise me to do?” he asked.

Galadriel’s eyes widened.

“I have every faith in your ability to keep Dwalin happy.”

“No!” he squawked and she looked teasingly at him.

“Ah, about Thorin. You will know.”

Ori groaned and dropped his head into his hands.

“Why can’t some wizard or ancestor just, I don’t know, appear at the end of my bed and say, ‘do this as it would be a good thing for so-and-so’. It would make sense then.”

Lady Galadriel stared beyond him then sat up straight.

“Ori.”

“Yes, ma’am?”

“Always be careful what you wish for.”

“Yes, ma’am. Nori always told me the story of the wandering peddler who granted wishes. A man meet the peddler on the road and the man paid the peddler and said he wanted a bird with long, lovely legs.”

Galadriel’s brows lifted.

“‘Bird’ is Dale slang for a woman,” Ori elaborated.

“Oh.”

“Well, the man said that’s what he wanted and the peddler waved his arms and ‘poof’, there was a giant ostrich from the southern Islands. It then kicked the man down a nearby well and ran away.”

Galadriel stared at him.

“It shows that you have to be careful what you’re asking for,” Ori explained. “He did get what he asked for.”

Galadriel giggled.

“I’m going to use that story next time Elrond or Thranduil ask me for anything.”

Ori grinned.

“Just promise me you won’t tell them I told it to you.”

“Never.”

“Ma’am?”

“Yes?”
“Do you think that peddler was Tharkûn?”

“I was rather wondering that myself, my dear.”

Ori felt much better and escorted the lady back to the sitting room.

After all the guests had gone, Dori and Ori related the entire horrifying tea party experience to the company, imitating voices and gestures and laughing as though they’d imbibed something a great deal more potent than tea.

“Can you imagine what’s going on in Dale right now?” Dori exclaimed. “Oh, sweet, blessed Mahal!”

Ori said, “They’re running from house to house like blindingly-dressed town criers.”

Dori said, roughening his voice like Margr,

“Ooooo, an’ tha’ Lady Glad-rail! Y’know the witch o’ the wood, an’ all the time her feet never touched th’ ground! I doubt her butt ever touched th’ chair!”

Ori snickered and put his hand delicately to his imaginary bosom and squealed, “Ooooo, my dear! Yes! And the ornaments! And the furnishings! Because we’ve never seen a chair before!”

Ori and Dori collapsed together in hysterics.

“What were they on about?” Ori asked, frowning. “Their furniture in Steam Alley was much nicer than ours!”

“It’s different now, my love.”

“Yes, apparently now we have nicer chairs. Really? You can only sit on one at a time.”

Dis and Jani entered, aghast to find them strewn across the cushions in their finery, laughing to the point of tears.

“Dori! What are you wearing?” Dis cried. “What are you supposed to be?”

“A powderpuff, dear. If you think I look like a cushion, you should have seen the couches that just left.”

“You missed it, Dis,” said Thorin, sitting with his head back on the sofa, eyes closed.

“What’s wrong, Thorin?”

“Headache. I had to compliment their frocks. Plaid, Plaid everywhere. Plaid for days.”

“I don’t know if I should be sorry I missed it or glad,” said Dis.

“Be glad,” said Thorin. “At least one Durin will live to carry on the line.”

“Aye,” Dwalin agreed. “Fili fled a’fore he go’ in th’ door! Mebbe it’s f’r th’ best as they’d a’ spent th’ time askin’ him about our Siggy.”

Ori sat up as the full horror of the idea slid through his brain.
“Where is Fili?” he asked Kili as the young archer arrived with Legolas and Tauriel beside him.

“Oh, we passed him in the Dale. Apparently he was dropping in to see Bard for tea and dinner. ‘See Bard’ my ass. He went to goggle at Sigrid.”

“Shite head.” Dwalin observed.

Lady Klakuna swished in and embraced Dori.

“I’m all settle in my rooms upstairs and the old house is cleaned out, dearest. I must thank you for inviting me to live here. It’s too generous and I shan’t bother you-“

Dori tut-tutted, interrupting

“Nonsense, dearest grandmamma. You’re family and however would I manage without you?”

Ori thought Dori would manage very well but Klakuna had cast off her family for Dori and Dori took this strangely seriously.

Bard, Fili and the Bardlings arrived shortly thereafter and Nori and Bofur rejoined the party. Nori’s hair was really no neater than it had been and Ori was not surprised.

For dessert, Dori served the remnants of the sweets and the dainties from the bakery with tea and he and Ori reenacted the entire debacle again. Tilda was enraptured by the new ‘princess dress’ Dori wore. Sigrid and Fili were holding hands.

Bard leaned over Thorin.

“Is this why you look like you’ve taken to your bed like a romance novel heroine?”

“It was horrible. I had to say nice things about their hideous clothes.”

“Heavy is the head that wears the crown,” said Bard.

“And you, Bard, and you.”

“So,” Dori began, “Bard, dear, when will you be inviting Mistresses Margr and Vi to take tea at your home?”

Bard’s face fell.

“I-I- I’m a widower! It wouldn’t be proper for me to invite single ladies to my home. I- I- don’t.”

“We don’t want to die!” Bain cried.

Dori laughed delightedly.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Things are moving apace as usual and plans are being made. Ah, but plans for what? And what can top last night’s dinner?? Please do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori woke when Dwalin stirred. Since he was lying on top of Dwalin, this was inevitable. Ori smiled into his husband’s chest and tried to pretend he was still asleep. He felt Dwalin looking at him. A chuckle rumbled in his ear.

“I know yeh ain’t asleep, love.”

Ori made an asleep noise and tried to stay still. Nothing happened. Ori waited, wondering what Dwalin was going to do.

He shrieked as Dwalin’s fingers lightly tensed against his sides and he almost leapt free. Almost. Ori found himself flat on his back, Dwalin on top, grinning down at him.

“Feels kinda strange t’ be tickin’ th’ instrument o’ Mahal,” Dwalin teased. “Dunno if it ain’t some sort o’ blasphemy.”

“Don’t you dare stop!” Ori cried.

“Tha’ an order, librarian?”

“Yes, I’m giving all the orders now. Thorin is to eat and you are to eat me.”

Dwalin’s eyes flew open wide and he laughed.

“So speaks th’ instrument o’ Mahal!”

“No one ever says what kind of instrument,” Ori mused.

“Triangle? Balalaika?”

“Maybe you should think of me as a bugle.”

“Aye, I kin blow a bugle,” Dwalin growled.

Ori giggled and stretched his neck so he could kiss Dwalin on the end of his nose. Dwalin leaned down. Then his eyes widened and he roared a curse.

Dwalin rose straight up on his knees and Ori sat up right after him, staring.

“Mew?” inquired Nori-Pori, hanging off the back of Dwalin’s drawers with all his tiny, needle-sharp claws.
“Fuck,” said Dwalin.

He grabbed the kitten around the belly and gently pulled it free. He brought Nori-Pori up to look the kitten in the eye.

“Yeh do tha’ again an’ I’ll make yeh int’ a hat!”

Nori-Pori licked his nose and purred. Ori fell back against the bed and laughed.

“Oh, your poor bum!” he cried. “Maybe I should kiss it and make it better?”

“Yer as much o’ a menace as he is,” Dwalin replied.

Ori recovered and looked around. Dwalin was sitting cross-legged and defeated as Nori-Pori finished his climb and sat triumphantly on top of Dwalin’s bald head. Ori’s fingers itched for his sketch book.

Kihshassa hopped onto the bed looking half asleep while Mask attacked a fold of blanket and Powder stretched her butt in the air and yawned to the point of almost folding her head in half.

Ori heard footsteps and there was a tapping on their bedroom door.

“Breakfast.” Dori called.

Ori looked at Dwalin, who grinned at him and removed the kitten.

“Guess we’re up,” Ori reflected.

“Mmm,” Dwalin commented and leaned over to kiss him.

“Aye, might as well eat while we’re at it.”

Ori chuckled and let Dwalin pull him off the bed.

Ori led Dwalin by the hand into the breakfast parlor, followed by the three kittens.

Kihshassa swooped in and landed in the middle of the table. Dori took the lid off a bowl of raspberries and put it in front of the fruit bat.

Balin, Dain, Binni, Oin Gloin and Gridr were all there. Binni, Bombur, and Sculdis helped Dori put food on the table while Balin talked with the rest.

Dwalin seated himself and made sure Ori was next to him. Ori lifted Nori-Pori and Mask into his lap and Powder marched over to Dori and meowed loudly to be picked up. Dori, never missing a beat, scooped the kitten up, popped her onto his shoulder and continued his preparations.

Roäc flew in, dropped something large onto Thorin’s plate and flew out again.

Omi, Loli, Buj, Stonehelm, and Gimli came in chattering nineteen to the dozen with their bats and settled themselves just as a small cloud of birds and bats flew in to land between dishes at their end of the table, all the winged beasts laden with the daily messages from friends.

Nori and Bofur strolled in and seated themselves. Assault and Battery peeked out of Nori’s hair and hopped down to the table. Both Bofur and Nori fed them toast.
Fili and Kili arrived and Dori started dishing up.

Dis came in with Jani and Thorin arrived in their wake.

Legolas and Tauriel arrived, ducking out-going and incoming birds and bats.

Thorin greeted everyone and Dori told him he was late and passed him a plate loaded with scrambled eggs, fried mealy pudding, and toasted bannocks. Thorin thanked Dori and took up the missive before putting his plate down. It bore an elaborate seal in silver wax and the paper was obviously thick and very fine. He opened it and raised his eyebrows.

“What is it, idad?” Kili asked.

“It’s a letter from the king of Gondor.”

“Oh, aye?” Dain said around a mouthful of bannock and gooseberry compote. “How’s th’ wee lad doin’? He old enough t’ marry tha’ elf of his yet?”

“No that I’ve heard,” Tauriel reported. “We would have had to attend such a wedding and, no doubt, so would all of you.”

“Hope they know how t’ feast proper f’r weddings.” Sculdis remarked. Her tone didn’t hold much hope. She glanced over at Thorin, suddenly everyone quieted down and watched Thorin look over the letter then he read it aloud.

To Thorin II, King-Presumptive of Erebor, Greetings,

I offer my sincere condolences upon the death of your grandsire.

Thror was a mighty king in his time and my grandfather often spoke of him warmly.

“I’m glad someone did,” Thorin muttered and put a forkful of eggs into his mouth before going on.

“Very courteous o’ him t’ say so, laddie,” Balin added, smiling at Dori, who was lovingly re-filling his tea cup.

I will happily accept ambassadors from Erebor at any time, or in fact send ambassadors to you or to any point between our kingdoms at your earliest convenience.

“Excellent,” Gloin, rumbled. “That’ll give us a chance to re-establish those trade routes Thror let drop and we can do the pretty with yer coronation invites.”

“Indeed,” Bombur agreed. “My dear Erda and I were discussing expanding our inn. More trade will give us the patrons to do so and that will bring in more trade and work as we start to build and need more staff and construction workers.”

“Remind me t’ send someone down when yeh go, laddie,” Sculdis joggled Gloin’s arm making his fork fly out and into the trencher of eggs.

“Absolutely,” Binni concurred and passed the eggs to Gloin who had more and retrieved his utensil. Thorin cleared his throat and read on.

Also, I understand my recent overtures regarding the freeing of slaves from Mordor were unfortunately timed, given subsequent events.

You will be gladdened to hear the campaign was successful. We managed to liberate the peoples of the several kingdoms and were able to get them to safety before a sudden, unforeseen eruption of Mt Doom.

“Ahem, well,” said Balin.

“Naughty mountain,” Dori commented airily, making the younger dwarrow and the elves giggle.

Per your messenger, we will approach the new …”

Thorin’s voice trailed off and he stared blankly at the letter. Everyone glanced at each other in wonder.

Dis frowned.

“Thorin?”

Thorin gave her a strange look and went on.

“… we will approach the newly crowned king of Beleghost with caution.

Forgive the confusion, but is ‘asshat’ a corruption of the khuzdul or is he, in fact, an asshat?

Sincerest regards,

Elessar of Gondor

It took a moment of silence for that all to sink in.
“Mahal,” groaned Balin.

Everyone else was looking about at each other in half horror, half delight.

“I did not put that in the letter we sent to Gondor,” shouted Ori, horrified his joking note had somehow made it to the foreign king’s knowledge.

“I know,” Thorin stated. “I signed and sealed it before I gave it to-”

He slammed to his feet and went to the open doorway to the meadow.

“Roäc!” he bellowed.

The only reply was a distant, cackling laugh.

“Mahal’s blessed… Roäc!”

The raven fluttered in, landed on the back of Thorin’s chair and proceeded to preen.

“You idiot,” Thorin growled, coming back in.

“Well, cuz, he’s righ’ ‘bout yer brother,” Dain attempted to placate. Thorin ignored him.

Ori could swear Roäc shrugged, which did nothing to soothe Thorin’s temper.

Roäc finally said, “Calm down, Thorin. I know what I’m doing.”

“Do you know what will happen if this gets to my brother?”

“He’ll despise you even more than he does now? Not possible.”

Balin sighed.

“Done’s done, laddie. I hate t’ say it, bu’ th’ wee bastard’s right.”

Roäc mantled at Balin and hissed in his direction but it seemed a half-hearted effort. He was obviously well pleased with himself. He pecked at the letter on the table.

“This Gondor’s reply?”

“Yes,” said Thorin tightly.

Roäc hopped around and leaned over it, reading under his breath.

“Sincerest condolences… mighty king… la di dah, la di dah…ambassador… la di dah… Asshat!” He laughed uproariously. “Famous! Oh, yes, I do like that man.”

“Roäc?” Fili started.

The raven fixed him with an eye.

“Roäc, did you really tell King Elessar that Idad Frerin was an asshat?”

“Oh Mahal,” gasped Gridr. “Oh Mahal!” She threw back her head and laughed. That started everyone laughing. Thorin sat down with a thump and glared at Roäc, his mouth twitching.

“I’m sorry,” said Ori to Thorin.
Thorin waved this away.

“Balin and I did want to start by being honest. Oh well. And as that young Elessar is betrothed to Arwen Undómiel and she’s Lord Elrond’s daughter, it’ll be in his ears before lunch.”

“And Lady Galadriel’s before mid-morning,” Dori reflected.

“Already told her,” Roäc commented, busily eating the slice of mealy pudding Dori had put on a saucer for him.

“You read King Elessar’s letter for me to her?” Thorin choked.

“No,” Roäc snapped. “Told her what I said.”

“Brilliant!” Nori grinned ferally.

“What did she say?” Dis demanded.

“Laughed. That mate of hers, Cele-whatsis, wasn’t very amused. Impudent elf. Called me a gossip. Stole his lembas. Not very tasty that stuff. Any more of this?” Roäc looked at Dori who put another slice on the saucer and stroked Roäc, who made a show of enjoying it more than he should.

Thorin sighed, then looked back at Roäc.

“Did you tell anyone else on your way back?”

“No, well, that Beorn fella. Stopped for a drink and a peck at something.”

“And he said?”

“Said it was a good name for him, laughed, and fed me buttered bread.”

Dain sighed, exchanged a look with Sculdis, and stretched.

“Well, cuz, time fer us t’go,” he said.

Dori batted his eyelashes.

“Oh, must you, brother dear?”

Dain ruffled his hair annoyingly and let out a long sigh then burped.

“Aye, me dumplin’, we must. I’ve a kingdom t’ tend an’ Stonehelm’s got lessons. Me diamond has her own thin’s t’ keep a-runnin’ as well.”

Dori looked wide-eyed.

“You two can’t do that here?”

“Dori!” Dis cried in delighted horror.

Dain pulled one of Dori’s braids

“Saucy wee minx,” he smiled. “I may be th’ loudest dwarf who ever lived, but even I can’t give orders from this distance.”

“An’ he has tried,” Sculdis winked at him.
Everyone giggled congenially but the two elves, who blushed.

There was some fanfare at the gates where Dain’s army was beginning the march east. Many of the people of Dale turned out to cheer and wave. Dain bid farewell to his new family members.

Dori was hugged to the point of being squashed out of shape. Nori was patted violently only on the shoulders as Bofur had put himself bravely between his love and Dain when the king attempted to give Nori a forehead bump. Dain picked Ori off his feet for a hug then rudely tossed him over a few heads and into Dwalin’s arms.

Dwalin shot Dain a filthy look

“Don’t ever dare t’ toss me husband, turnip sucker.”

Dain laughed joyously, his arm around his queen, who was calling farewells and promises to meet again soon and blowing kisses. Sculdis jumped up to the driver’s seat of her war wagon. Dain boosted Stonehelm onto the heir’s excited pony, then Dain himself hopped lightly onto Chopper and the pig trotted off, oinking loudly and cheerfully into the sunshine.

They watched the Iron Hills family go off around the bend.

“Ironic, isn’t it,” Ori muttered.

“How quiet it will be without them,” said Dori. “What a pity they couldn’t stay. Perhaps next time it will be longer.”

“You really are going to miss him?”

“Yes,” said Dori, smiling, “though it is hard to believe anyone could miss him. Even if he were hiding, he could be traced by his belching alone. Yes, pet, I will miss all of them.”

“Me, too,” Ori owned. At the sound of the morning volley, he turned. “I have to get to work, Dori.”

“Yes, pet, off you go. I’ll send lunch over in time for you and the others.”

“Thanks, Ori’s Dori.”

He pecked Dori’s cheek and Dwalin lifted him up on Honda’s back.

“Ride careful, love.”

Ori leaned down to kiss him. “I will.” And with that Honda cantered off to the library.

At the Reference Desk, Ori was supposed to be studying, but he kept thinking about him and Dwalin and what they were doing - or not doing - in bed. It was shocking to think that a few weeks ago his sexual curiosity was of the idle variety. He really didn’t think he’d ever have practical use for it and imagined he would be doing hypothetical research on it when he was one hundred seventy five or so and going grey.

Now it was still research, except it wasn’t hypothetical and he wasn’t grey, though dithering over what to do would likely make him so sooner than he’d like.
He chided himself for acting like a tween. Really, he was a grown dwarf. No one would think twice about him going over to look at the sex manuals. That was what grown dwarrow did. Of course, he suspected most grown dwarrow didn’t have Dori living in their heads, clicking his tongue in disappointment and admonishing them about being naughty badgers.

I’m a grown dwarf. I’m of age. I have my own life. I have a husband. I have…

“A big problem,” he muttered to himself with a sigh.

He and Dwalin actually beat Dori home that night. They had just come in and Ori put his satchel in the bedroom when he heard Dori enter the kitchen, greeted by Lady Klakuna who said, “I’ve just put the kettle on, love. We’ll have a nice cup of tea. Oooo, what did you buy?”

Ori went to the kitchen door where the answer was obviously: Everything in every market under the mountain. There were numerous parcels and sacks and boxes and Larit, one of Mistress Dazla’s assistance, was bringing in more. Ori knew these were just the specialized items, the ground spices, cheeses, and fruits, and special wines imported from across Arda. Bulk items like flour and honey were delivered at the beginning of each week by the barrel, the fresh milk and eggs brought each day before dawn, and shortly thereafter the butcher visited.

“Well, it was a fierce melee at the markets,” said Dori. “You’d think the entire mountain had been a week without access to any sustenance and the confectioner was entirely out of ‘hundreds and thousands’.”

Dwalin turned to Ori.

“What’s ‘hundreds an’ thousands’?”

Before Ori could answer Nori stuck his head out of the lower cupboards and said, “It’s those little bits o’ colored, sugary shite yeh put all over ice cream.”

Dori dumped the, fortunately still cold, contents of the tea kettle over his head.

“Oi!” Nori yelped and withdrew back into the cupboard.

Without blinking, Dori refilled the kettle and put it on the hob.

“Dinner will be a little late tonight, pet,” he said to Ori. “I completely lost track of time in the shops.”

Lady Klakuna took stock of the new teas Dori bought.

“Not to worry, my love,” she said. “Binni is bringing dinner, and Master Bombur has a cake all frosted and waiting in the larder.”

Dori sighed. “Bombur and Bifur will be leaving tomorrow as well.”

“Now, now,” Klakuna patted his arm. “Even without them, I’m sure the chaos will be quite enough to keep you entertained. After all, Nori will still be here.”

“Oi!” Nori protested from behind the ovens. “Granny Klak! I thought y’ liked me!”

“Of course I love you, my troublesome little badger, and so does Dori or he would have flattened you years ago.”
“True,” said Nori.

“Now come out from behind the ovens and have some tea.”

“In a mo’, Gran, I’m just wringin’ out me under-pinnin’s.”

Binni brought a ‘Dale’ pie, the flaky crust hiding a tasty mix of noodles, mutton, tomato and finely chopped onions. The dish was, appropriately, bathtub-sized and Binni required Oin’s help bringing it in.

“We should pop it in the oven to keep warm until we’re ready to eat it,” Binni said.

“Right,” said Nori.

An oven door fell open, seemingly of its own accord.

“That’s creepy,” said Ori.

“Just a knack,” said Nori.

Dori kept glancing over at Ori all through dinner, and so Ori knew what was coming.

They were finishing with more tea when Dori said, “Your hair is getting long, pet. Time to give it a trim.”

Of course, now Dori didn’t have as many distractions, the Bearer would reframe his focus to its customary place.

“I think I’m going to let it grow, Dori,” said Ori.

“It’s in your eyes, pet.”

“Dwalin likes it,” said Ori into his plate.

“Oh? Dwalin likes it.”

“Be nice, Dori. It’s like the plum tunic you always wear because Balin likes it.”

“There’s nothing wrong with that tunic.”

“There’s nothing wrong with growing my hair.”

But Dori, apparently, would not be deterred.

“How can you see to write?”

Considering the conditions under which he’d had to write in the past few weeks. Ori thought his hair far down on the list of challenges.

Dwalin, around a mouthful of cake said, “He could use a clip t’ pull it back like Fili and Kili do.”

Ori turned to Dwalin with a grateful look. Dwalin winked at him. Ori took a deep breath and turned back to Dori, who seemed surprised at Dwalin’s interference. Ori thought he should press his advantage while Dori was a little off balance.

“I’ve had the same haircut since I was a badger, Dori, and what looked cute when I was twenty doesn’t do much for me now.”
“Not t’ mention it’s kinda creepy,” said Nori.

“Thanks,” said Ori dryly.

“Ain’t my fault yer head looks like the top of a carrot muffin.”

Dwalin glared.

“His head does no’ look like a muffin.”

“Yes, it does,” said Ori resignedly.

“No,” said Dwalin, pulling back to look at him. “It doesn’ loo… Oh, Mahal’s hairy arse. I wondered why it looked so familiar.”

Ori’s forehead clunked against the top of the table. He despaired over this, then realized he could use it. He lifted his head and looked at Dori.

“I can’t spend my life with my husband thinking I look like a muffin. I can’t, Dori.”

Dori sighed.

“I see your point. It could be a bit scarring, couldn’t it.”

Dwalin said, “There, all sorted. We’ll get yeh a plain clip f’r now, an’ one in the Fundin colors f’r the end o’ mournin’. Sound good?”

Ori smiled and nodded.

Dwalin kissed him.

“Yeh go’ beautiful, coarse dwarf hair, th’ perfect texture. Holds a braid like a dream.”

Ori reddened.

“You might be a little biased,” he said shyly.

“Who th’ fuck cares?” Dwalin replied with a smile.

They were about to kiss again when Nori snorted.

“Mush,” he said, then jumped in his seat with a shout. He whirled on Bofur. “Oi! That’s me ankle.”

“Be thankful I can’t reach th’ other, yeh big puddin’.”

“I can reach it,” Jani said helpfully from Nori’s other side.

Nori drew his knees up to his chin and pouted.

“Very well, pet,” said Dori with a sigh. “We’ll let it grow, see how it looks.”

“And no taking the scissors to it after I’ve fallen asleep,” Ori warned.

Dori looked shocked - shocked - at Ori’s suggestion, going so far as to place his hand against his bosom.
Nori snickered.

“That’d be a little tough t’ do around yer overgrown attack dwarf.”

Ori raised his brow. He’d seen Dori do it often enough.

“I’ll have you know my attack dwarf is exactly the right size.”

“Perfect fit, eh?”

Ori threw a spoon at him.

Balin, who had watched the entirety of Ori’s negotiation in silence, now smiled in amusement and turned to Thorin.

“An’ now, laddie, th’ moment yeh’ve been dreadin’.”

“Frerin’s come for a visit?” Thorin asked.

“No, we’ve gone as far as we can without yer input, now we need t’ talk about th’ coronation.”

Thorin held onto his tea cup as if it would ward off evil.

“Already?”

“Second mournin’s almost over. In another month or so yeh’ll be withdrawin’ with th’ family fer th’ ceremony t’ end th’ bereavement.”

There was no description of this ceremony in any book Ori had ever read. It was performed by the family of every king since the first passing of Deathless so long ago, but was never even spoken of to anyone outside the Durin’s inner circle. The family went into seclusion for over a week. A regent ruled, and though the incoming king was supposed to be immediately available in case of disaster, or should someone try to seize the throne, he was not to be otherwise disturbed.

Ori hoped it wasn’t some type of enforced meditation. He couldn’t imagine Thorin sitting still that long.

“Where does the ceremony take place?” Ori asked. “What do you need me to do?”

Fili and Kili exchanged grins and Fili said, “Ori-mate, can you swim?”

“Swim? Er, no. Why?”

“Never mind,” said Kili. “We’ll teach you. No drowning the scribe. We like having you around.”

“Um… thank you?”

Thorin said, “Bombur has very graciously invited us to the inn for the withdrawal.”

“We’ll be very happy to host you, Thorin,” said Bombur. “Really it’s not even high season, so we will have the rooms. It will be no trouble at all.”

“Thank you, Bombur,” said Thorin. “This is by way of an experiment. It’s never happened outside the mountain before.”
Now Ori’s curiosity was bad enough to cause a rash.

A ceremony that took place at an inn on the mountainside, and which apparently involved swimming.

“That sounds like a holiday,” he said.

Thorin nodded.

“That’s exactly what it is, Ori. Perhaps the only one the king ever gets, and he takes it before he’s even king.”

“So, that means-“

“Yes, the Durins are going on vacation.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. When a to-be-crowned king plans going on holiday, there’s a lot to be done. And we all need fun summer clothes! Also, we have an important announcement at the end of this chapter, so please read! Please do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next day, Ori arrived home from work to find the sitting room filled with Bard and the Bardlings. Dori, Thorin and Bard sat at the dining table deep in talk. Tilda played on the floor with the kittens under Kihshassa’s supervision and Bain was curled up in the corner surrounded by books he’d pulled from the shelf while Kili looked over his shoulder, apparently explaining the khuzdul. Ori looked to Thorin. This was, technically, forbidden. Thorin simply shrugged.

Sigrid’s voice drifted in from the kitchen, and Fili’s lower tones flowed beneath it. Lady Klakuna said something and the other two laughed.

“Ori,” said Thorin, “come join us if you have a moment.”

“I’ll just put my satchel away.”

He did so and when he returned Mistress Dazla was putting out another cup and plate for him. The plate held a portion of cold pork, a bun and a slice of very sharp cheese. The cup held beer. It wasn’t Dori’s usual pre-dinner snack, but the sort of thing the men enjoyed in Dale.

Bard smiled to him and said, “We were just talking about Sigrid going with you all to the inn.”

“That would be wonderful,” Ori enthused, further brightened by the prospect of having his dear friend with him.

“It will be a good opportunity for she and Fili to get to know each other,” said Thorin, “and between Dori and Dis there’s only so much trouble they can get into.”

“I’m not so worried about that,” Bard said quickly. “I just rely on her so much to mind Tilda and keep the house. It’s not fair to her, I know. Most women that age have a least a little freedom to socialize before they marry.”

Mistress Dazla cleared her throat.

“Begging your pardon, your majesties, but if the family has gone to the inn, I won’t be needed here as much. I could mind Princess Tilda and my mister could help with Prince Bain.”

Thorin smiled.

“I had intended for you to take a well-deserved break, Mistress Dazla, not do even more work.”
“Oh, it isn’t much of anything. I raised two pebbles of my own, and a rowdy pair they were. Princess Tilda’s mischievous to be sure, King Bard, but I doubt you’ve ever come home to find her dismantling the stove.”

“No, no she hasn’t attempted it yet. I always say ‘yet’ with Tilda. It could happen. If you wouldn’t mind, mistress? It is a lot of work, despite what you say.”

“Oh, stuff and nonsense, your majesty. It’s all settled.”

Sigrid was beyond excited at the prospect of going to the inn. Neither she nor Ori had ever been so far from the mountain. It was a whole other hillside and required a ride of at least two hours! Loli and Omi had said it was on the shore of the lake and there was a lovely stretch of sand at the lake edge. Gondorians and people from Rohan would come occasionally and lie on large towels on the sand to soak up the sun and swim in the lake. And, Omi informed them, they would actually be able to see all of Erebor and the city from a distance!

Tilda was not excited.

“I want to go, too!” she cried. “Why can Sigrid go and not me?”

Bard sighed.

Bain was unhelpful.

“Princesses don’t whine,” he said.

“Really, Bain?” Bard asked.

Ori said, “Tilda, can I tell you a secret?”

She swung to look at him, eyes large.

“A real secret?”

“An important one,” said Ori.

“Alright!”

She grabbed him by the wrist and dragged him to the far side of the fireplace. Then she turned to everyone else and ordered, “Don’t listen!” before she cocked an ear at Ori, in silent demand to be told.

Ori realized she had grown recently. He didn’t have to bend much at all to whisper in her ear.

“Sigrid is going to court with Fili and they might kiss.”

“Really?” Tilda shrieked, gleefully horrified, before lending her ear again.

“And, well, they can’t do much of that while you and Bard and Bain are there.”

“But what about the dwarrow?” Tilda asked aloud, forgetting to whisper.

Ori didn’t.
“Dwarrow don’t worry so much about kissing.”

“Does Da’ know?”

“He might suspect, but he won’t know for sure. But you will.”

Tilda’s face split into a grin that would not have been out of place on Nori and for a moment Ori worried he may have created an entirely different problem.

“Remember,” Ori said aloud. “It’s a secret. You can’t tell anyone.”

“Pinky swear,” Tilda vowed solemnly.

There followed a flurry of preparations. The king’s workload seemed to triple with the possibility of him being unavailable for even a brief time, as if he would never come back to pick it all up again. Even when he wasn’t scribing, or supervising the others, or working at the library, Ori was busy with other things, almost too busy to worry about his own problems. Almost.

On top of everything was something Ori had not even thought of. He found himself looking through endless sketches of what Dipfa considered appropriate holiday clothes for a royal scribe of Erebor, which seemed to consist of white cotton material with various pale colored strips on it, which she announced was called seersucker. She also had any number of ideas for coronation robes of the royal scribe traditional garb, many unearthed then subjected to her artistic fervor then to be resized for him.

He barely saw Dwalin at all except for meals, and he found this quite wearing as well.

One day he returned from work to find Nori loitering in the hallway outside Dori and Balin’s rooms.

“What’s going on?” Ori asked.

“Oh, yer missin’ it,” said Nori. “Take a listen.”

Dori’s voice filtered through.

“Just a little lace at the throat, dearie.”

“No!” Thorin’s voice returned implacably. “No lace!”

“It’s not even scratchy, look.”

“I don’t care if it’s velvet, I don’t want anything tight around my throat.”

“That’s a good point actually,” Dori conceded.

“Thank you!” said Thorin, sounding relieved.

“We’ll spill it down the front of your tunic in a sort of foaming jabot.”

“Oh, Mahal’s hairy arse!”

Ori slapped his hand over his mouth. That traitorous voice in his head said he should be recording this battle for posterity.
Dori continued, “How about this jacquard, dearie? It’ll drape quite nicely from those broad shoulders.”

“It’s pink,” Thorin barked.

“With your complexion, you could pull it off.”

“Pink is not a Durin color, Dori!”

“Thorin, you can’t spend the rest of your life looking like a vicious, heavily-armed blueberry.”

“A blue-“

Zindis, Thorin’s tailor said, “Oh, Master Dori, that’s just what I’ve been trying to tell him for decades. But will he listen?”

“I don’t look like a blueberry! I’m not wearing pink and I’m not wearing lace!”

Dori said in a long-suffering tone, “Oh, I suppose small steps first. Look, Thorin. Here’s a different blue than you usually wear, a nice deep teal with just a tiny edging of lace at the cuffs and along the placket. Not even white, more of a pewter, actually.”

“Universal teal, your majesty,” Zindis put in. “Anyone can wear it.”

A tense silence followed until Thorin finally said, “It’s not hideous.”

“No, of course not. You see. Zindis can make you a tunic of this for court and some in linen for the summer.”

Nori smirked.

“That’s one decision made. Good thing he don’t run Erebor like he picks clothes.”

“How long have they been in there?”

“An hour. It’s slow work wearin’ away stone, especially when the stone’s been wearin’ the exact same color an’ cut o’ clothes his entire adult life.”

“I suppose that makes it easy to get dressed every morning,” said Ori.

“Aye, well, the king needs a little more panache. He ain’t Dori, it’s true, but he ain’t too ugly. ’Sides, if he ever wants t’ attract company o’ the romantical type, he probably shouldn’t dress like an East Dale assassin.”

“How do you even know he wants romantic company?”

“I don’t. He don’t even know hisself, but I think Thorin’s in the way o’ bein’ one o’ Dori’s ’projects’.”

“Oh, Mahal,” Ori groaned. “We’ll be lucky if Erebor’s still standing at the end.”

Dori said to Thorin, “Now, dearie, about your underpinnings, I think you should go with silk.”

“There’s nothing wrong with linen. I’ve been wearing it my entire life.”

“When you can be bothered to wear it at all,” said Zindis archly.
Ori stuffed his sleeve in his mouth, exchanging looks of pure glee with Nori.

Dori would not be discouraged.

“There’s nothing like the whisper of silk against the skin.”

“I don’t want my clothes whispering, Dori. People think the Durins are mad enough as it is.”

“You might meet someone to whom you wish them to whisper.”

“Dori!”

“You need someone shorter than you. Someone light on their feet.”

“Dori, I’m a little busy running the kingdom right now.”

“They say that’s when it happens, when you aren’t looking for someone.”

“Since when are you channelling my amad? Besides, I have an heir.”

There was a deep silence and Ori held his breath, though he didn’t know why.

“Thorin, dear,” said Dori gently, “it’s not just about the kingdom.”

Ori could all but hear Thorin thinking before the king said, “You know, that pink thing isn’t so bad. It’s very pale, and the breeches are very dark maroon.”

“Why don’t you try them on, Thorin?”

“Fine.”

There was a rustle of cloth and Dori all but cooed.

“Now then! You see, you look-“

“Like a vicious, heavily armed cranberry.”

Ori had a session of his own with Dipfa. The clothes she had created and laid out for his inspection were beyond whatever he had thought of the plans. He could think of no other word than ‘costume’ to describe them.

All over the bed were outfits made of cotton and the linen ‘seersucker’ she had called it. They were either white or left undyed. Most had tiny stripes. The vertical stripes were either palest lavender, palest green, or palest red. Ori looked them over and murmured that they needed ironing. Dipfa said that seersucker looked like that and the wrinkles made it nice and cool to wear.

He was standing in front of the mirror, slightly horrified, dressed in the seersucker with pale red stripes. It was nicely cut as a long plain tunic and pair of matching breeches tucked into a pair of pale grey canvas boots.

“Yes, a seer sucker,” said Ori. “I see it now.”

Dwalin barged in and stopped short, staring at him.

“Captain!” Dipfa greeted him in delight. “Master Ori’s summer holiday wardrobe.”
Dwalin continued to stare then a slow grin covered his face.

“More like winter, our Dipfa.”

“Winter?” she repeated, confused.

“Aye, with them long stripes an’ th’ white, he looks like a Yule candy. Very tasty, love.”

Ori blushed and giggled. Looking back he could see that he did look like the peppermint sticks that were passed out to badgers during Yule. Dipfa walked around him, obviously deep in thought. Ori had a horrid premonition that when Yule was near he would receive clothing that would be themed on various Yule sweets and decorations.

“Dipfa, he said quietly.

“Yes, Master Ori?”

“If you make me a suit in dark Fundin green and decorate it with shiny colored baubles and include a star-shaped hat, I will not wear it.”

Her face fell. Dwain chuckled and went to the wardrobe, the open door obscuring him.

She frowned again.

“Back to this one, it won’t do. I see that now. I had hoped to banish the juxtaposition but it does not answer. You cannot wear white and red with the color of your hair. Try the green stripe.”

Ori did and it looked quite nice, but

“Dipfa?”

“Yes, Master Ori?”

“I do like the cut and colors but not all together. Perhaps the stripes with plain breeches?”

Dipfa ruminated a moment then whipped him around, pulled everything off him and threw on the lavender stripe, rummaged through the pile and retrieved a pair of matching lavender trousers. Ori looked at these and liked them very much.

Dipfa then began holding other swatches of material up to him under his chin, muttered about a little spot of pale blue and smiled.

“I shall have twenty of these ready for you and a couple of nicer ones by the day after tomorrow.”

“Twenty?” Ori gasped. “Dipfa! We’re only going for a couple of weeks.”

“Yes, but you might get wet or covered in sand. And you need a couple of nice things for dinner,” she said, closing the subject. “Now, Captain Dwain.”

“Wha’, our Dipfa?”

Dwain came from behind the wardrobe door. He was dressed in a tan colored kilt. Dipfa stared open-mouthed.

“Perfect,” she declared. “You will wear pale colored canvas kilts. I will have canvas boots made for you and a few plain cotton shirts. Bright colors.”
“How bright?” Dwalin almost growled.

“How bright?” Dwalin almost growled.

“Very select. No orange or yellow… And I don’t think pink will suit you.”

She turned away and didn’t see Ori grinning maniacally at his husband. Dwalin shook his head at Ori mouthing not a word.

Dipfa bowed and left with her cart piled high with the rejects.

“Don’t worry,” she called back. “I haven’t forgotten the bathing costumes for you both.”

Silence.

Ori stared at Dwalin

“Bathing costumes?”

There were two weeks before the Royal Withdrawal from Final Mourning. The emotional support party for the grieving family had been chosen. The regents for the king-to-be’s absence were also chosen. The final preparations of ruling in absentia were finished and the kingdom told to rely upon Binni assisted by Oin and Gloin. Gridr and Granny Klak would take care of the guilds. Librarian Brur would serve as royal scribe.

The withdrawing party was the Durins, the Fundins, the Princess of Dale and young Gimli. Ori was almost trembling with excitement. The kittens, their bat, the badger and Nori, Bofur and the ferrets were being readied. Ori was in a rush to finish the work Brur had set him but the librarian assured him it would be there when he got back and he should be preparing himself to assist the Durins with their emergence form mourning. This last part had been said with a broad wink, so Ori was left to decide what he wanted to take to read, how many sketching books he might need and any number of pens, graphite wands and paints.

A week later Dori announced he was having another tea party. Ori was appalled at this announcement and thought it might be a bit much but Dori was adamant and charged an amused Roac with delivering gilt edged invitations, all written in his own round hand.

The day arrived. Thorin installed himself in the study with Balin and once more left the door open for entertaining listening. Dwalin claimed he had work in the stable to do and Gloin, Nori, Jani, and Bofur declared they would be helping. Dis and Gridr attended as did Binni. Granny Klak promised to make her famous ginger cake and the rumpus of preparations in the kitchen was paramount to a military campaign.

Ori, in pure merriment, took stock of the wealth to be served.

There were going to be three different kinds of tea, a carafe of blackcurrant cordial, a platter of hard boiled eggs, halved and the yolks taken out, beaten with powdered red pepper and milk then piped back into the whites. A basket piled high with bacon scones sat by a hot platter of beef, ground and mixed with onions and bread crumbs, moulded into tiny balls and swimming a savory sauce, each with a tiny silver pick for ease of eating. There were thin sandwiches some, containing cucumber, some cream cheese, and others shaved ham and mustard, or smoked fish or lettuce.

A plate offered small cakes each daintily iced with pink frosting. A golden syrup sponge, a very large peach pie and the ginger cake finished the repast. The cake was magnificent. It had been baked in a pan shaped like the mountain. The cake was placed in the middle of the table, its peak and several crags covered in white icing and the rest dotted with dyed green powdered sugar. These were complimented with bowls of soft salted butter, butter mixed with honey, sour cream dotted with herbs, and several bowls of elderberry jam and gooseberry jelly. Balin came in with box from the bakery in Dale. He beam at Ori and Sigrid.

“Can’t have th’ ladies doin’ without their er…iklars.”

Ori was able to divert Sigrid with the story of the last tea.

Ori, dressed in deep Fundin green suit with lilac trim, kept Sigrid company while they waited. Sigrid fidgeted nervously. Mistress Dazla had fetched her to Fundin house yesterday after dinner and bullied her into having her hair done. This had involved Dori, Gridr, and Mistress Dazla taking the poor girl in hand. Sigrid had been subjected to a scented bath in effervescence water redolent with lavender petals and a mix of mint, summer savory, and wintergreen leaves. She had been rubbed and massaged with rose oil, powdered, then sent to bed with her hair tied up in rags.

Now she was dressed in a white blouse covered by a sky blue overdress trimmed with white lace. Her hair was a mass of silky ringlets. the top kept out of her face by a circlet of silver with tiny aquamarine chips. The rest of her hair fell loose down her back except for two long ringlets from her front hair that were curled together at her throat and fastened with a clip that matched her circlet.

“I’ll spill tea down my front like an idiot. First sip.” Sigrid muttered.

“No, you won’t,” Ori said. “You’ll be fine, just smile and nod. Mistresses Margr and Vi do most of the talking anyway.”

Gridr swirled in. She looked a picture of dwarrowdam beauty. Her scarlet dress was exquisitely cut and she wore rubies in her hair and beard and gold rings on her fingers and gold cuffs dripped from her ears.

Dis was in Durin blue velvet, starched petticoats held her skirts out like a bell and she was decorated completely in silver.

Granny Klak was a sunbeam of bright yellow. Her dress was in the fashion of two centuries ago, the dress tightly moulding her form and drawing the folds to the back of her waist, where the golden satin was gathered and poufed out to fall to her feet in a small train. The cuffs and bottom hem were trimmed with intricately crocheted brown lace.

Sigrid whispered to Ori and he shook his head as he didn’t know how in all of Arda she was going to sit down in that.

Granny Klak had her grey hair rolled up on the back of her head indicative of a widow and one who did not intend to marry again. On top balanced a mat of brown silk with lace edges. Her beard was tightly braided and also rolled up under her chin. Ori was horribly amused she had decided to present herself as a widow, but she had cast off her husband’s family, so perhaps it was the correct move.

Binni wore a simple hooded robe of pale green embroidered all over with ivy leaves, his hair and beard were woven through with a bright orange silk ribbon and the toes of his orange boots occasionally peeped from beneath his robe.

Dori whispered in. This time there was no cloud of foaming material, but a severely cut suit of grey, though every seam was fringed with three-inch silk tassels of lilac. His hair was so intricately braided, Ori knew that it must have taken Balin over an hour to complete. Dori’s ear cuffs and the few pins in his hair carried lilac tassels. Today, he was Lord Dori and Ori was horribly reminded of a lampshade.

   Mistress Dazla was clad in deep grey with a blindingly white starched apron. Her assistants were similarly dressed and looking ready for anything.

   Anything arrived through the breakfast room in the shape of Lady Galadriel gowned in her usual white. Behind her were Legolas and Tauriel in white and palest blue and Thranduil in all his magnificence, complimented by a robe of pale copper and a crown of blossoming hawthorn.

   Dori smiled delightedly and cooed over his guests. At sight of the elvish prince and captain, Dis and Gridr disappeared and returned with their offspring.

   Fili dressed in grey and a golden surcoat. He looked relaxed and at ease until he clapped eyes on Sigrid. Then he lit up and swaggered over to greet his fellow guests with an elegance that befitted an heir to the throne.

   Kili was in Durin blue and eager for both food and mischief. His eyes popped open at Tauriel in a gown. The bodice was fitted and the skirt flared only a little.

   “Like a watercolor Durin dam,” he sighed.

   He glued himself to Tauriel’s side and the pair of them removed to the meadow for some archery practice.

   Gimli was not quite dragged into the room by his mother. He looked as though he had been washed speedily and violently and his clothes were freshly pressed. His sulk was amazing but quickly melted away when Legolas came to his side to make conversation.

   At Lady Galadriel’s request, Ori produced Mask and Nori-Pori and their bat mother from his room. He came back and found that Powder was already ruling the room from Dori’s lap. The elves were very interested in how Kihshassa had adopted the kittens. Thranduil voiced disgust when Ori described the ‘sea-spider’ and Galadriel frowned and said that it was best Master Vobwi kept the creature in a small tank as if given unlimited space the creature would continue to grow in size. Binni shuddered, mumbled something about Khazad-dûm and stepped out briefly for some air. When he returned, Ori was describing Balin and Brandy much to everyone’s amusement.

   A moment later Mistress Dazla stepped in, gave Dori a speaking look and went out to the receiving room. At the sound of Margr and Vi’s voices, Fili and Sigrid both turned pale and instinctively clutched each other’s hands.

   Mistress Dazla returned and announced the latest guests.

   The sisters had foregone plaid for a seasonal violent yellow and lime green print of enormous flowers, each having dyed her hair one of those colors to match, each wearing a giant fake flower of the opposite color on the top of her head. They wore beard beads carved like flowers, each trailing a tiny string of tinkling bells from their centers.

   “Vi, Margr,” said Lady Galadriel, “another triumph of fashion.”

   “Ah, there yeh are, yer ladyship. Charmin’ as always.”

   “Wherever did you find the material?” Galadriel asked.
“The latest fabrics from Bree,” said Vi confidentially. “Smart dressers, them hobbits, and Margr’s ever so handy with th’ needle.”

Ori couldn’t decide if they looked like tuffets or exotic, flowering shrubs.

Margr and Vi cast their eyes on Thranduil and froze.

He rose and bowed deeply.

They caught up quickly, as they were now quite used to ‘mixin’ with th’ quality’ in their new social circle, and dropped credible curtseys.

Vi said, “Beggin’ yer pardon, yer ladyship. That’s quite a becomin’ frock.”

“Thank you,” said Thranduil, the deep voice alerting the sisters that they’d made a bit of a social stumble.

“Er, beggin’ yer pardon,” said Margr.

She winced and Vi squeezed her forearm in distress so hard Ori was sure it would leave a mark.

Dori, who had been watching this whole exchange with ill-concealed amusement, took pity on then.

“Mistress Vi and Mistress Margr of Steam Alley, this is King Thranduil of Erys Lasgalen.”

“Charmed, we’re sure,” said Vi, curtsying again.

“Sorry about the whole ‘ladyship thin’, yer majesty,” said Margr.

“No harm done. Though I hope this doesn’t mean you disapprove of my frock.”

“Oh, no, it’s quite becoming, ain’t it Vi?”

“It is, it is. And them twiggy things on yer head. Very nice. Lovely touch.”

“Thank you, I change the ‘twigs’ to match the seasons.”

Vi nodded vigorously and Margr said, “Clever of you to accessorize.”

Lady Galadriel leaned in and said in Sindarin, “Yes, lovely twigs today, Thranduil.”

“Hush,” Thranduil admonished.

Vi said to Margr, “Ooo, that mus’ be some o’ that elf talk.”

“Yes,” Margr said airily. “Simperin’ they call it.”

Thranduil opened his mouth and closed it and Lady Galadriel appeared to be coughing delicately, her shoulders shaking slightly.

Dori quickly introduced Princess Dis, who made every appearance of being delighted to further her acquaintance with them and introduced Gridr and Binni. Dori brought forward Granny Klak, who delighted the sisters by telling Lady Galadriel in a stage undertone that the sisters were two lovely young dwarrowdams.

“My son, Prince Legolas,” Thranduil intoned. Legolas bowed and murmured a greeting in perfect calmness but his eyes were as wide as dinner plates. Gimli harrumphed next to him, but bowed politely when presented and grunted as was expected of a well raised young dwarf. Fili and Sigrid were equally gracious and personably friendly.

“Tea?” said Dori.

The elves chorused, “Thank you, yes.”

Once around the table, Margr started in on the eggs and the local news. The brewery had tapped its first barrel and it was declared excellent. Cider would soon be available. Apparently, there was a recipe for cider with honey and another with raspberries.

The bakery was doing well and iklars were a hit. Vi inquired if Thranduil had experienced this confection. On hearing he had not, Dori immediately passed the tray and Thranduil used the tongs to help himself to a plump one. He examined it interestingly.

“Chocolate covered pastry,” he observed.

“Aye,” said Vi. “Full o’ cream, funny thing to call it an iklar, eh?” this with a lascivious wink. Thranduil looked at her then the most evil smile came to his face. He took a good hold of one end and licked up the frosting, savoring it openly, then put one end into his mouth. His cheeks hollowed then he pulled the tip out of his mouth licking his lips. He grinned at Vi.

“You’re quite right. It is full of cream. You do have to suck hard to get it out, don’t you?”

Ori could not believe that he had just watched King Thranduil perform oral sex on an iklar. He didn’t want to think about it. He never wanted to eat an iklar ever again. He glanced down to the other end of the table. Legolas looked like he wanted to crawl under it.

After a single shocked moment, the dwarrow population of the table howled with laughter. Lady Galadriel gave Thranduil a look.

“Now I understand,” she smiled.

“Understand what?” Thranduil purred.

“Why you were not my son-in-law.”

Thranduil frowned.

“Why?”

“Because I had a daughter.”

Thranduil’s cheeks colored ever so slightly but he also chuckled.

“I do have sons, milady,” he pointed out.

“Yes,” she said in Sindarin. “You must tell me how you found time to birth all of them.”

Ori wondered what, if anything, he should tell Buj. He wondered if he should tell him that Thranduil was a Bearer. He wondered if all elves could simply reproduce or, if in fact, they were all actually one sex and just made themselves pregnant, like spontaneous combustion or something.
While he pondered this, Kili and Tauriel returned, Dwalin was with them, made his bows and sat beside Ori. Mistress Dazla brought through ale and the conversation continued.

“Really?” asked Lady Klakuna of Mistress Margr. “Someone simply broke into your house?”

“Oh, yes, years ago now. Still, gave me quite a turn,” said Margr, “and I don’t scare easy, not after three husbands.”

“Did you know the dwarf who broke in?” Ori asked, horrified.

“No, I don’t know every dwarf in Erebor no matter what me sister tells yeh.”

“Aw, Margr,” said Vi, “now that’s a fib.”

“Says yeh. Anyways, it was dark an’ it hardly mattered, did it. Even if it was my Rogi and he was drunk off his ass he’d said, ‘Oi, Mum, it’s me.’ when he come in. I didn’t know this dwarf, so I didn’t let him get no farther than me front room. I broke both his legs so he couldn’t run, then I broke his arm and bashed in his teeth, knocked him down and sat on him. Then I screamed fer help.”

“Then you screamed for help?” asked Dis.

“Well, it’s the city patrol, isn’t it. Yeh never know what’ll arrive all wrapped up in a nice beard and a pretty bum.”

Vi nodded.

“Aye, could be husband number four.”

Dis and Gridr exchanged glances and Gridr murmured, “Best to plan these things in advance.”

Dwalin broke in.

“That was four years ago, eh? I remember that. Had a good laugh over it.”

Margr chuckled.

“That’s right. I never ferget a nice bum.”

And she hoisted her ale to him in salute before knocking it all back in one gulp.

Dis, down the other end of the table, said, “I remember you telling us about that!”

Kili’s eyes grew even larger than usual.

“That was you, Mistress Margr? You were my hero!”

Margr looked truly touched at this.

“Aw, yer sweet,” she said, then assured him, “If yeh was only a couple hundred years older, yeh’d be a shoe-in fer husband number four. Then again, yeh do have a taste fer older dams and such.”

Tauriel raised an eyebrow and Margr laughed.

“Not t’ worry, me dear, I’m not goin’ t’ pinch him from yeh. It’s obvious he’s arse over heels fer
The young people managed to eat almost everything on the table and excused themselves for a refreshing turn about the courtyard. While Mistress Dazla and her assistants restocked, Vi leaned over to Lady Galadriel with an air of intrigue.

“We wanted t’ tell yeh, we found out th’ answer t’ yer burnin’ question.”

“Which one?” Lady Galadriel asked, while her spoon stirred her tea on its own.

“Well! We was invited t’ tea at Master Tin and Mistress Ondr’s house, yeh know, them that’s in so tight with Lord Zark and Lady Kadis.”

“Ah, that burning question,” said Lady Galadriel with a twinkle in her eye. “And what have you to report?”

“Well, our Gladdy, yer not goin’ t’ believe this.”

Ori and Dori exchanged horrified looks.

Our Gladdy?

Thanduil didn’t seem to know where to look.

“By the by,” Margr cut in, “we mentioned yeh was keepin’ well.”

“Thank you,” said Lady Galadriel. “I don’t believe I’ve been introduced to them.”

Margr assured her, “Mistress Ondr always asks after yeh. Not t’ worry.”

Ori reflected that after conversing with Margr and Vi, Mistress Ondr must feel she knew the elven lady rather intimately.

Vi continued.

“I had to excuse meself to the bog t’ powder me nose, an’ that’s past the bedroom an’ th’ door jus’ happened t’ be a little ajar.”

Ori wondered how many doors Vi had jarred before she found the right one.

“An’ there, lo an’ behold, was a great heap o’ cushions an’ rugs an’ furs laid out before th’ fireplace, a veritable sea o’ debowchrey!”

Lady Galadriel looked philosophical, “One should probably be comfortable when embarking on… debowchrey.

“That’s just what I said meself!” Vi cried, clapping her companionably on the forearm.

Lady Galadriel giggled.

“Excellent.”

“Hmph, Lord Zark,” put in Lady Klakuna, pausing to select a hardboiled egg. “Last time I saw him, he was walking like he was half turned to stone. Guess this Mistress Ondr must be something of a lava point.”
“Let’s hope he’s got a geyser to take care of it,” Gridr commented idly, making all the ladies cackle.

“Oh aye, milady,” Margr agreed. “When she was a young dam it were said she could light a cold forge jus’ by squattin’ over it.”

Klakuna snickered, “if she’s over Zark, that’s a squat that’ll pop a badger out in a flash.”

“Good thin’ then she’s past th’ age a’ poppin’,” Vi agreed. “Or th’ town won’t hear th’ end a’ it f’r a twelve month.”

Ori thought, Especially if you have anything to say about it.

Dori poured more tea. “Well, if you’re going to bubble you might as well get some fizz while you’re at it.”

Thranduil snorted out a laugh and then seemed to look absolutely horrified with himself.

When the younger set returned the party had adjourned to the comfortable furniture around the fireplace. Dori had gone off to his rooms and returned bearing the flimsy, sparkling accoutrements of his first courtly triumph.

“This was my presentation robe,” said Dori proudly.

Vi said to Lady Galadriel, elbowing her lightly, “No wonder King Thror kicked it.”

“You wore this in front of the entire kingdom?” Thranduil asked, not even bothering to hide his surprise.

Ori could sympathize.

Dori cooed, “Of course I did. The Durins shouldn’t have to endure rumors of a false Bearer, and what I did was in keeping with the Bearer presentations of old. In fact, I might have been rather overdressed.”

Binni nodded. “Before the reign of the original King Nali, Bearers traditionally wore only jewels and mithril to their presentations. Certainly the robes instituted afterward could hardly show a Bearer to best advantage.”

“And you wore such a robe?” Thranduil asked.

“I was never presented,” said Binni. “There was no money for one thing. Then by the time we had to flee Khazad-dûm and I was no longer… fertile.”

It was the most Binni had ever spoken about himself as a Bearer in Ori’s presence. Ori was torn between asking all the questions a scribe should ask and invading the privacy that Binni kept around himself like a fine cloak.

Thranduil reached for the robe.

“May I?”

“Of course,” said Dori, handing it to him.
“What kind of material is this?” Thranduil asked, fascinated. “I’d love a robe made of this.”

“No!” Legolas shouted. They all turned to look at him. “I mean, really, ada, it’s not your color.”

“Really?” Thranduil asked, tilting his head as if it were empty. “You think it would not look becoming on me?”

“Er, well…”

Bard walked in at that moment and Thranduil grinned evilly.

“Perhaps we should ask King Bard.”

“Ask King Bard what?” the man ventured warily.

Thranduil held the material up to himself.

“What do you think?”

“I think if you wore it, your arse would be hanging out in the air,” said Bard frankly.

“Well! I never!” Mistress Margr shrieked gleefully and she and Vi cackled so hard they had to hold each other up. Vi said, “Oh, King Bard, yer such a naughty feller!”

Dori said, “Yes, I suppose we would have to lengthen the hem.”

Finally, at the close of the party, Thorin and Ballin emerged from the study, where, no doubt, they had been working hard, and greeted the sisters warmly, bowing over their hands, then Galadriel’s. Thorin eyed Thranduil’s with a wicked grin.

“I wouldn’t,” said Thranduil dryly.

“Don’t worry, I won’t,” Thorin promised.

“You are wise indeed,” said Thranduil.

“Yes, I know you bite.”

Thranduil turned to Dori.

“Thank you for a most… instructive afternoon, Dori.”

“I live to serve,” said Dori, fluttering his lashes.

“Yes, somehow I very much doubt that.”

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT!!

Now available is the Glossary for this extravagant tale.

Posted today and, as people and…things arrive, they shall be added.
You can refresh your memories faster than ever before and,

like Mistress Margr, construct a family tree or a guilty-by-association tree for all the lovely characters mentioned here.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yes, it’s summer holiday time and to get you in the mood, here’s a little song.

http://www.perfessorbill.com/pbmusic_songs2.shtml - scroll down to: “By the Beautiful Sea”, Harry Carroll (M), Harold R. Atteridge (L) - 1914. Don’t forget your bucket and spade! And a nice sun hat, too! Ready? Off we go! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Next day dawned beautifully. Ori was awake at first light and jostled Dwalin, peppering kisses on his face.

“Wake up, wake up! We’re going to the Inn!”

Dwalin chuckled, grabbed Ori and held him still for a long ‘good morning’ kiss.

They didn’t linger, as Dori was already at the door, knocking.

Ori giggled as he raced Dwalin to the table in the breakfast parlor.

“What is this?” Ori asked, bumping into his seat as Dori put down his plate. Whatever was on it smelled wonderful and came out of one enormous pan in intriguing layers of varying color, texture and scent.

“Gondorian breakfast bake,” said Dori. “The latest thing, according to Margr. She got it from Dal’s foreign aunt.

“Soak bread in egg and milk, lay it in a large buttered dish, cover it with sharp cheese, sliced mushrooms, thin slices of ham, sliced tomato, another layer of the egg-soaked bread, bacon, grated dried cheese and finely chopped parsley and bread crumbs. You season it all with salt, pepper and nutmeg.

“And to drink, hot xocolāt brewed with milk.”

While they ate, Mistress Dazla was outside supervising the loading of luggage and hitching up of ponies.

Once fortified, everyone dressed in the pale grey of final mourning and adjourned to the courtyard.

Gimli climbed to the seat of the baggage cart where Bofur waited for him, still snacking on ham ends left over from breakfast. The baggage towered over them.

“Dori,” Ori said, “how many of us are going?”
“Why do you ask, pet?”

“Because judging from what we packed, I’d say all of Steam Alley was joining us.”

“Oh, no, pet, that’s just my lingerie.”

Ori tilted his head at Dori, who laughed.

“I’m joking, pet! Really! My socks are in there, too.”

Balin handed Dori into the shay, and after her, Mistress Dazla, who sat on a nicely cushioned seat behind. A basket rested at Dori’s feet with Kihshassa, Mask and Nori-Pori. Powder reposed regally in Dori’s lap while Brandy rode in Balin’s.

The rest mounted their ponies and with them a small detail of armed dwarf warriors, including Targ and a few others of Ori’s acquaintance.

From the battlement above them, Nori called down to Bofur.

“Oi! Sure yeh don’t wanna take Assault and Battery with yeh?”

“I’ll give it a pass,” Bofur called back. “Don’t want yeh t’ be lonely!”

“Don’t worry,” said Binni to Thorin. “I promise the mountain will be standing when you return. Oin will make sure I don’t get too out of hand.”

“What is ‘too out of hand’, Binni?” Thorin asked with a grin.

“Chintz is probably out,” the Bearer replied, “but I’ve always thought the main audience chamber could use a scattering of dainty velvet tuffets and chaises.”

“Try to keep them in Durin blue, if you would.”

Gloin stood behind his brother-in-law and looked stalwart and dependable.

“Of course, of course, Thorin. It will be very economical as we already have several hundred bolts already in stock.”

Kili said, “Well, that’s a relief!”

Dis smacked his leg.

“Let’s go,” Thorin called, and they rode out, Thorin at the head of the line on Minty, Queen of All Ponies. Roäc perched on Minty’s head, Minty obviously less than pleased with the extra passenger.

Dwalin rode on one side of Thorin, Garnet on his shoulder, and Ori rode at Thorin’s other side, Honda for once dancing about as playfully as Harley.

“You behave, you silly thing!” Ori scolded lightly.

Honda snorted, but did calm to a romp.

It was first rest day, so not many people were up and about to see them go. By the time they reached Bard’s home in Dale, the sun had fully risen.
Sigrid, and her father and brother, and a very sleepy Tilda, awaited them on the front steps.

Fili dismounted and bowed, handing Mistress Dazla down and Sigrid up into the shay, Fili and Sigrid giggling and pink.

“Right,” said Bain, “that’s done. I’m going back to bed.”

Thorin and Bard shook hands as men did, and Bard waited to wave them along. Tilda already sagging back into her father with a snore. Tilda took Mistress Dazla’s arm almost in her sleep and they turned to go back into the house.

Then the party was on the main road and Dale behind them. Suddenly they were farther from home than Ori had ever been in his life. He swallowed and gave Dwalin a nervous grin. Dwalin winked. Behind them Fili, Kili, and Sigrid chattered like magpies with Gimli throwing in the odd commentary when it was most likely to cause confusion.

“Lovely day for this,” said Dis, though she looked back wistfully, patting her pony, Sage. Rutile crawled out of her pocket and made her way up to settle in Dis’ hair, just above her ear.

Ori thought it was good that Honda was so patient with him. He turned to admire all around him, trying to see everything and failing. It was all so new. The road was wide and well paved. On either side trees grew and dappled the morning sun across them. Beyond the trees were farmlands, some with livestock, others sown with foodstuffs.

In the pastures, Ori saw the cows of Dale, beautiful animals almost deer-like in appearance and their coats in shades of cream and fawn, still rough and thick from the winter. These were said to give the best and richest butter and milk. They had been specially bred by a woman named Guernsia Aldernay.

As they continued along the road, the farms gave way to woods, thickets, and meadows. Birds of every kind twittered and sang. In amongst the trees, Ori occasionally saw rabbits, squirrels, and deer with their little speckled fawns.

Every now and then a wagon, horses or people walking passed them and exchanged greetings. There were a few dwarrow from other lands coming to trade or settle in Dale and Erebor. These were personally greeted by Thorin and he told them who they needed to see in the mountain to settle or negotiate trade. All condoled with Thorin and Dis for their loss.

After about an hour on the road, Thorin called a halt and they all drew off to the side. Ori was glad to slide off Honda and hurry to the treeline as his bladder was telling him it was time.

When he returned there were three gaudily painted wagons drawn up beside theirs. Everyone was laughing and chatting with the newcomers, men and dwarrow traveling together.

“Who are they?” Ori murmured to Dori who was handing out rolls filed with fried ham and egg to everyone.

“A group of travelers. They go from town to town all over Arda and entertain.”

At Ori’s wide-eyed stare, Dori smiled and shook his head.

“No, pet. Your father wasn’t a traveler. He was playwright, remember. They only went to dwarrow kingdoms. These people visit and entertain everyone.”

The soldiers had apparently leapt to their feet at the approach of the caravan, but Thorin waved them off and now they stood down, smoking or gambling or chatting with the newcomers, who were not only different races, but also varied in their skin colors and features.

Thorin was speaking to a tall man with black hair and almond-shaped eyes when two children ran up to them, calling the man ‘Da’. At first, Ori thought they were very young, then he realized the girl was obviously adolescent. Looking closer, he saw she had a bit of a neatly trimmed beard and the fine, large ears of a dwarf, ringed with cuffs.

Oh.

They were of mixed blood. He wondered if…

The man’s wife, a tidy dwarrowdam with hair like black wire, came up then, talking with Sigrid, and introduced her husband and children. Sigrid’s bright smile only brightened as the woman, talking rapidly enough to make Margr and Vi proud, patted her arm and said something that made them both laugh.

They had a merry time as everyone removed from the road and sat together on a grassy knoll nearby. The ponies grazed, the kittens and Brandy played in the grass watched over by Kihshassa, everyone talked and laughed and exchanged food and drink.

Ori looked back at the travelers’ wagons. One was a very vibrant red and on the side, amid swirling pictures of stars, crescent moons and sparkles, a painted banner proclaimed:

'Fortunes told! The Great Woudini - Oracle to the Crowned Heads of Arda'

“How does one tell a fortune?” Ori asked.

“Aaaaah,” the tall man with the black hair and almond eyes grinned at him. “You wish to see your future, young dwarf?”

Ori stared. Was this man a wizard like Tharkûn?

“How…how does one see the future?”

The man laughed, jumped up, and went into the wagon of the Great Woudini, a few moments later he came out again. He wore an very shiny pale blue cape edged with gilt and a great deal of shiny red material wrapped about his head and held together with a huge green brooch.

He was carrying something under his arm. He stopped before the group and bowed very deeply to Ori.

“Greetings, young dwarrow,” he intoned in an altered voice. “Shall I, the Great Woudini, peer into the magic Crystal and reveal your fortunes?”

“Yes!” chorused Sigrid, Ori, Fili, Kili, and Gimli all terribly excited.

The Great Woudini waved his hand dramatically.

“One at a time. You,” he pointed at Ori. “You asked first, so you shall be first.”

The Great Woudini sat down cross-legged and opened the bundle he had carried. In his lap rested the largest blue glass ball Ori had ever seen.
“Sit opposite me,” commanded the Great Woudini.

Ori did so and looked up at the man, wondering what he was going to do. Fili, Sigrid, and the others sat near him.

“Now close your eyes a moment, and let your third eye open.”

Ori wasn’t sure which race the Great Woudini thought he belonged to that he would have a third eye.

“Very well,” said the Great Woudini. “I sense you have prepared yourself. Now let us gaze into the Crystal and inquire to the spectral powers of the ether.”

The Great Woudini waved his hands over the glass ball and chanted.

"Wum-zigga-wum-zigga… Great Crystal tell us the fortune of this young dwarf…Wum-wum-wum. Eeny-Meeny-Gelateeny, the spirits are about to speak!"

The great Woudini leaned over and stared into the glass ball. Ori looked at it, too, but only saw the Great Woudini’s face reflected upside down.

“Mmmmm, interesting, interesting,” The Great Woudini commented.

“What? What do you see?” Sigrid asked excitedly.

“C’mon, tell us,” Kili encouraged.

“This young dwarf will return to his mountain soon,” The great Woundini lilted slowly. “And there he shall spend many moons searching in the deepest caves for a single mysterious flower to give to the love of his life and… and…” The great Woundini trailed off and squinted. “No, the Crystal has gone dark. That is all the Crystal will show. Next.”

Sigrid wiggled in, pushing Ori over.

The great Woudini repeated his performance.

“Aaah, my beautiful young lady. A fairy tale is for you. Your father shall be bewitched by a magical woman who will become your step mother. She will not like you nor will her four spoiled children. She will make you do housework from dawn to dusk, but worry not for you shall be rescued by a handsome prince and he shall carry you off to this castle where he will marry you and you will live happily ever after.”

Kili snerked.

“Handsome. I guess that leaves Fili out.”

Sigrid giggled as Fili jumped on him and the two wrestled, shouting.

The Great Woudini leapt to his feet and commanded them, “Halt! The Great Woudini must deliver a great proclamation to the dark-haired one.”

“That’s me!” Kili yipped.

Dis muttered under her breath about bread and butter for brains.

Kili disentangled himself from Fili and sat before the fortune teller, closed his eyes so tight his face wrinkled and shouted, “Ready!”

The Great Woudini raised an eyebrow at him, but sank back to the ground and looked into the Crystal.

“I see… I see…”

“What?” Kili cried impatiently.

“I see a swift end to the seeing if you are not quiet.”

“Oops. Sorry.”

“I see… Ah! Young dwarf, by the turn of the year you shall be married!”

“Mahal!”

“To an ent.”

“Huh?”

Ori burst out laughing.

Kili asked, “What’s an ent? Amad, what’s an ent?”

“Someone who will make your current height problems seem minor indeed,” said Dis.

“Better stock up on fertilizer,” Thorn added helpfully.

“What’s an ent? Some sort of freakishly tall gardener?” Kili demanded.

“Next!” the Great Woudini cried.

“What’s an ent?”

Ori ran to Dwalin’s side, where he lay stretched out on the grass, his pipe in hand. Ori grabbed Dwalin’s free hand.

“Dwalin, get up. Come, you must do this, too.”

“Dwalin cracked an eye and regarded Ori, amused. He sighed and rose fluidly to his feet.

“A’righ’ love, if yeh wan’ me, to.”

“You!” The Great Woudini had risen and was pointing at Dwalin. “You are the one the great Crystal has chosen to reveal its next prophecy.”

“Oh goodie,” muttered Dwalin as Ori pulled him to sit in front of the Great Woudini.

He took another draw on his pipe and made a show of closing his eye for a moment then opened them, winked at the Great Woudini.

“Aye, righ’, I’m ready, laddie. Me third eye’s all attention.”

The Great Woudini folded his mouth and glared into the glass ball. Ori thought he looked as though he was trying not to laugh.
“Aaaah, mighty dwarf warrior. You shall perform the heroic feat! The largest bird ever seen on your mountain will fall from the sky and you shall stand firm and catch it.”

Dwalin looked at the Great Woundini.

“For serious. lad?”

The Great Woundini nodded, smiling chummily at him.

“Yes indeedy-do. I just saw it happen in the Crystal. Huge bird, squawk, falling, bam, you catch it, plonk on the ground, cheers all ‘round. Next.”

“Tha’s it?”

“Well, that and I see a lot of baked goods. Next!”

Dwalin rose and put his arms around Ori, who was giggling.

At this point another man who had been walking by stopped and came over. He looked over the wagons of the travelers and turn to the dwarrow.

“You all know this is fake, yes?”

“Fake?” asked Dis.

“They just make things up, tell you rubbish, then charge you a lot of money for it.”

The Great Woundini cast the man a supercilious sneer.

“I told you, you were a shitty gambler. Did you listen? No.”

The man spat a curse and stomp off. Thorin rose, tamped out his pipe and smiled around at everyone.

“We should be getting along. I’m sure Bombur has started wondering where we’ve got to, Bofur.”

Bofur was finishing the last roll and chatting up a rather pretty young girl among the travelers.

“He knows it’s jus’ a nice relaxin’ trip. He’s expectin’ us, when he sees us.”

“You!” shouted the Great Woundini, pointing at Thorin, a delighted grin on his face. “You are the next and last one the Crystal wishes to communicate with today.”

Fili and Kili all but dragged Thorin over, hanging off his arms and grabbing at his legs.

“Get off!” shouted Thorin. “This stopped being cute when you turned forty.”

They managed between the two of them to haul him over, though, really, he didn’t seem to be resisting very strenuously.

He laughed.

“All right! All right!” He sat and waved his arm at the Great Woundini in a manner of tribute. “Please, Master Seer, I beg you proceed.”
The Great Woudini bent over his glass ball and this time, made several more whooo-ing noises and mumblings to the specters of the ether.

“Great dwarf, at your destination you shall meet a mysterious beardless dam, you will fall passionately in love and marry her. In your future, I see you and she happily together surrounded by your nine children!”

Thorin shouted with delight and threw up his hands, falling back on the ground, laughing.

“Perfect! I can’t think of anything better!”

“Wait,” said the seer. He frowned and pulled back his shoulders. “Not nine. Seven. There are seven. But she still doesn’t have a beard.”

Dis shrieked.

“Oh Mahal, you’re going to be changing an awful lot of diapers, brother dear.”

“Ah,” said Thorin breezily, “when I get back I’m going to put Dain and Buj in a small room on rations until they come up with a diaper-changing mechanical.”

Dis shook her head.

“Too much trouble. We’ll just get Kili to change them all.”

“Amad!”

“You’ll need the practice, what with your ent.”

“Will somebody please tell me what an ent is?” No one did as the Durins and the travelers were picking up their scattered food containers and other belongings and packing them back into the vehicles, all joking. Thorin paid the Great Woudini handsomely for his family’s hospitality and Bofur and another traveler started playing their pipes.

Sigrid and Fili hung back, giggling. Ori glanced at them in time to see Fili seize Sigrid’s hands and begin to whirl them about in a jig to the music, making Sigrid shriek and laugh.

They set off again waving to the party of travelers who were heading to Dale. Ori wondered if Loli and Omi or maybe Buj would get their fortunes told. He wondered what would happen if Bard found out he was going to be bewitched by magical woman and marry her. Ori choked as he remembered Thranduil teasing Bard. He decided he wasn’t going to think about it anymore and returned to admiring the scenery. Dwalin and Harley came up beside him and with a smile, Dwalin took his hand.

“Yeh had a funny look on yer face, love.”

“Did you hear what the Great Woudini said to Sigrid?”

“Aye, he was havin’ a grand time with yeh lot.”

“Do you think he er… ‘saw’ Thranduil?”

Dwalin roared with laughter.

“Mebbe, but neither o’ us’ll tell, righ’?”
“Right,” Ori agreed firmly.

The road wandered through meadows and down into a forest of fine tall trees. Funny little green things floated down from them. Ori caught one and looked it over. It reminded him of the clothes hangers on which Dipfa had brought his clothes. He realized this was how the trees spread their seeds. He grinned. It was so beautiful to be riding through and suddenly a flurry of spinning green seeds drifted passed them.

“What kind of trees are these?”

“Sycamore trees, laddie,” said Balin

Ori looked about.

“Well, I hear birds but I really don’t see any bees. Shouldn’t there be bees?”

Dwalin, Balin, and Dori all looked at him.

“Why bees, pet?” asked Dori in that gentle tone he used when he thought Ori had a fever or might be getting a tummy ache.

“Your song, Balin. The bird and the bees and the sycamore trees.”

Balin choked and then began to laugh.

“Laddie, yeh’ve got a memory like a lock box.”

“Oh, he does,” Dori concurred swiftly. “You have no idea how hard I had to go on at Nori not to use bad language in front of him. We were having dinner, fortunately just the three of us, and I put down Ori’s supper in front of him and said ‘What do you say?’ and he smiled up at me and said ‘Fuck you’.”

“I never did that” Ori shouted, horrified. Balin and Dwalin were thoroughly enjoying the story.

“Yes, you did, pet. I was horrified, but said ‘No, dear, you say thank you. Where did you hear that word?’ and he looks up at Nori and says ‘That’s what Nori says to all his friends when they give him things.’ Oh, I gave Nori a piece of my mind after Ori had gone to bed, I can tell you!”

Once his mortification died away, Ori realized just how funny the story was. That he, in sweet innocence, had said ‘fuck you’ to Dori was actually rather wonderful. He giggled to himself a little and caught Dwalin’s eye.

“I think that was the only time in my entire life I’ve ever even thought of saying the word ‘fuck’ to Dori.”

“I’d a given a sack o’ gold t’ have seen it, love.”

“See what?” Dis asked. Thorin was also looking back at them and the younger set had drawn nearer. Thus having a most appreciative audience Dori re-told the story with gusto and was even kind enough to allow Ori to deliver his famous line. After the raucous laughter calmed, Kili commented.

“Well, no wonder Oin said Nori’s head was an irregular shape. What did you hit him with?”

“What didn’t he?” Ori said in sotto voce.
“Oh, come now,” Dori protested lightly. “It’s not as though it had any effect. All that hair! Do you remember how long it took to do his hair on wash day?”

Ori giggled.

Dori lamented, “Oh, the fuss he made when I stuck his head in the sink and scrubbed it.”

Dis shrieked with laughter.

“All that hair fit in the sink?”

“That was the problem,” Ori told her.

They emerged from the forest and the road wound on around a grass covered hill. A few deer grazed on it, with a group of fawns jumping and playing together. At the sounds of the party approaching, they all stopped and stared. A couple of the fawns stepped forward curiously. Ori could see their noses taking in their scent. Kili groaned about a perfect shot.

"Let ‘em eat an’ get nice an’ fat f’r winter, laddie,” Balin advised.

“Oh, yes,” Dori agreed. “They’re too sweet and pretty now. Hello, little one,” he cooed as one fawn came to the edge of the grass to get a better look. Thorin chuckled and nodded. Roäc and Garnet swooped over and frightened the fawns back to their mothers.

“Better they stay away from people.” Fili commented.

They came around the hill to a splendid vista. Thorin halted and they all drew up to look.

“There we are!” Bofur cried proudly. “The Inn on th’ Lake.”

Ori sighed with pleasure. They left the main highway for a wide road of yellow brick meandering to a long, large house. The lawn had grass scythed short all about it and set with flowering plants and shrubs. Graceful birch trees lined the property, clustered about the house and waved at the slightest touch of breeze. Beyond the Inn was the lake. Ori had never seen so much water in one place before. It looked like a huge river without a far bank. The sunlight danced over its waters, smooth and shining!

The house was of two levels but looked as though it was several houses put together. There was a wooden walkway and platform attached to the house, with seats and tables to one side. The platform looked as though it continued on around the side of the house. At the other end of the house sat an enormous stable. Then pastures fenced with wooden rails painted sparkling white behind which a few different animals grazed freely: horses, ponies, several Dale cows, goats and some others Ori wasn’t sure about.

The house was white washed and criss-crossed with dark timbers with a roof of heavy thatch. There were so many windows all open and Ori could see sheer white curtains floating and fluttering.

“It’s lovely!” Sigrid said.

At their approach, Bombur and Erda emerged from the inn with a herd of badgers.

“Oi! Bom! Erda!” Bofur cried. “We made it!”

Ori thought Mistress Erda looked just the same as always. She was as tall and wide as her husband, all smiles and rosy-cheeked. Her beard was a mass of tiny ringlets all gathered above her bosom with a large green bow. The beard was as red as Bombur’s, her hair mostly caught up in a becoming cap edged with lace. A few curls escaped this as she hurried forward.

“Welcome, welcome! Oh, you must be tired after your journey. Bofur, you looked famished! Go into the kitchen, pet, our Isi and Neti will find you something. Oh, your majesty!” She curtsied to Thorin and then clasped his hands. “My Bom told me everything. Such a fuss and to-do for you, you must be worn to a thread. Come away in and we’ll get you comfortable.”

“Thank you, Erda. You’re too kind.”

Fili started, “The ponies-”

Erda anticipated him.

“Vali and Edi will see to them. Here they are.”

Two strapping dwarrows, red-haired, older than the princes, descended and set about unhitching. Fili and Kili went to help and soon the four were talking companionably.

Erda called out, “Kali, Randi, Jaki!”

Three more strapping dwarrows arrived, slightly younger versions of the first two, and unloaded the cart, with practiced efficiency, each taking far more at a time than Ori could imagine, and moving even more quickly than the royal servants who had laden it.

“Let me help,” Sigrid cried, hurrying down to grab a hold of the handle of one of the largest trunks. Randi grinned appreciatively and Fili’s eyes widened while he watched the muscle in Sigrid’s arm flex as she easily hefted her side of the heavy wooden chest.

As they filed by Ori noticed someone had thought to tag each piece of luggage with the name of its owner.

The three dwarrows disappeared upstairs, though the youngest gave Ori a wink and a sassy grin as he passed.

Ori followed Dwalin into the front hallway. It was almost a receiving room, dark wood and white wash like the outside, but there were exotic plants everywhere, and old mirrors, paintings and other works hanging on the walls. The hall ran the depth of the inn and Ori saw the platform outside on the back, and a swath of green grass, and a gravel path and then the shore and the lake. Even from here he saw sunlight dappling the water.

He wished he had his paints and canvas right this moment. He wanted to capture this sight with great urgency, as if it might evaporate. He tried to imagine seeing this every day and didn’t think he could ever grow tired of it.

Mistress Erda shepherded them all up the wide stairway to a long hall. Many doors opened off of this on each side.

“We’ve given you the lake-facing rooms,” she said. “Here we have Ori and Dwalin.”

The room was all white wash with dark wood wainscoting, doors and window frames. An old wardrobe stood in one corner, a dresser with a mirror on the other, and between an enormous bed with snowy white linens. The windows and the door to the little balcony had been thrown wide and a fresh breeze stirred the lace curtains. Off under the eaves Ori saw a tiny water closet. He had been in awe to hear that each room had its own.
“Oh, Dwalin,” said Ori. “This is amazing!”

Dwalin gathered him up from behind.

“If I’d been able t’ do thin’s right, we’d’ve come here f’r a honeymoon.”

Ori looked up at him with a little smile.

“Better late than never. Isn’t that what they say?”

“Aye,” said Dwalin with a smile, “tha’s wha’ they say.”

Ori turned in his arms and they were just about to kiss when Dori’s voice echoed down the hall.

“Where did all these trunks come from?”

“The cart, mistress,” said one of the young dwarrow. “They all have your name on them.”

“Well, aren’t I an overachiever. Thank you, my dear.”

“You’re welcome, mistress.”

Fili rushed by the door with Sigrid, hand in hand, Kili following and Gimli on his heels.

Dis called after them, “Not too long. We’ll be having tea soon.”

“We won’t miss that,” Kili assured her.

Erda laughed.

“You’ll hear the bell for meals! Not to worry, you’ll not go without!”

“We’re goin’ t’ look at th’ lake,” Gimli explained as he passed their door. “Are yeh comin’, Ori?”

“You go on,” said Ori. “I’ve got something to do first.”

Gimli snorted, but with a merry smile, and pounded down the stairs after his cousins.

Ori and Dwalin spent a few more moments agreeably occupied, then decided they would be brave and see what Dipfa had deemed they should wear, happy that the great reveal would take place at least two hours from home.

Dwalin rifled through his trunk.

“What the bleedin’…”

“What is it?” Ori asked, coming over.

“Our Dipfa!”

“Well, she did say bright colors.”

“Bright, no’ blindin’!”

“Look, she included a manifest,” said Ori, picking up the parchment from the case and snorting. “Ten sleeveless short tunics in the following colors: Buttercup.”
“Oh, Mahal’s hairy arse.”

“Yes, apparently she changed her mind about the oranges and yellows. I suppose she thought your tattoos would throw them into sufficient relief.”

“I’m no’ relieved.”

“Beet Soup, Apricot, New Grass, Eggplant, Pine Tree - obviously she was thinking of Fundin green - Polished Sapphire, Cyclamen, Mulberry - oh, and for dessert, Dandelion Seed Ecru.”

Dwalin groaned.

“Dipfa! Why d’ yeh hate me!”

“Seriously? She wanted to dress me like a Yule tree!”

“Did she pack me any britches or kilts, or am I t’ go about with me arse out t’ throw th’ tunics ‘int’ relief’?”

“Ten taupe kilts.”

“Fine, I kin go topless.”

“Ah. Found the parcel tagged ‘bathing costumes’.”

“Yeh goin’ t’ open it?”

“I’m afraid.”

Dwalin chucked it onto the top of the wardrobe.

“We’ll look when we want t’ go bathin’.”

“Oh, did you not want to go bathing right this moment?”

Ori blinked at him.

“Only if it’s skinny dippin’,” Dwalin growled.

“I’ll go lock the door.”

In a little bit, they changed into their holiday clothes, Ori in a white tunic with green stripes and matching green trousers, and Dwalin with his kilt and cyclamen red tunic. Ori thought it showed off his arms to advantage.

He went out to the hall just as Dori came out of the room in his. Dori wore a seersucker suit like Dipfa made and Ori refused, and the pieces matched: white with pale blue stripes. Dori smiled sweetly.

Ori said, “Just a minute!” leapt back into his room, slammed the door and leaned back against it, panting.

Dwalin said, “Wha’s wrong, love?”

Ori gasped, “Dori! His summer clothes! Mahal! He looks like a mattress!”
Ori slid down the door, stuffing his sleeves in his mouth, choking with laughter.

Dwalin lifted him, parking him on the bed, went and opened the door and there was Dori.

“Bloody fuckin’ Mahal!” Dwalin barked. “He does look like a mattress!”

“I beg your pardon!” Dori cried. “I do not look like a mattress!”

Ori bounced to Dwalin’s side and looked out again, as all the rest of the doors in the hall popped open and the rest of the party peered out.

Dis said, “Dori, what are you doing with that mattress?”

Dori turned in fury.

“I am not a mattress.”

Dis gasped, choked and darted back inside, slamming her door.

“Stop laughing at my summer holiday wardrobe,” Dori commanded imperiously.

Thorin muttered, “Maybe it’s not the worst thing to look like a cranberry.”

Dori whirled on him, just as Balin arrived, caught sight of his darling and stopped dead, staring.

Dori turned and pinned him with his eye.

“Do you think I look like a mattress, betrothed?”

Balin took a deep breath, summoned a smile and said, “Beloved, I think our tailors miscalculated th’ tint an’ size o’ th’ stripe in tha’ charmin’ ensemble.”

Dori calmed.

Thorin said, “Nice save.” and shut his door.

Ori looked up at Dwalin and they withdrew, but Ori could hear Balin smoothing Dori’s ruffled feathers.

Ori went back to the bed and buried his face in the pillows, giggling.

“I’m gonna be seein’ tha’ in me sleep,” said Dwalin, dropping down beside him. “I’ll be runnin’ and screamin’, chased by a ferocious mattress with a plate o’ eggs an’ bake.”

Ori rolled over.

“This inn will now be haunted by an angry mattress, screaming at people for laughing at its stripes.”

He shrieked as Dwalin caught him up and rolled him over, looking down ferally.

“No’ t’ worry, I’ll save yeh. Yer safe with me.”

“Uh huh. I love how you define ’safe’.”
They went downstairs, admiring as they went, to find Balin and Dori sunning themselves at a long table on the ‘deck’ as Erda called it, sipping lemonade with chunks of ice.

Dori had changed into a caftan of rich jewel purple. His hair was loosely dressed with a few purple ribbons tipped with amethyst.

Ori went and kissed him.

“You look very lovely, Dori.”

“Not as mattressy?” Dori asked archly.

Dwalin broke in, “Nah, bu’ still very plush.”

“Don’ help, brother,” Balin muttered.

Down on the beach, they watched Sigrid and the younger dwarrow disport themselves, their boots cast off, running into and out of the shallows and laughing and shrieking. Sigrid kicked a little water in Fili’s direction and he rushed her and grabbed her, threatening to drag her into deeper water. She screamed delightedly as she struggled to escape.

A bell rang from the end of the deck. One of the young Urs was summoning them to tea.

They assembled with amazing speed, all dressed in their gay holiday clothes.

Thorin looked more relaxed than Ori had ever seen him, and far more casually attired. He wore only a kilt of Durin blue and his boots. His long hair was unbound and hung over his broad, inked shoulders and his nipple rings shone bright silver against his dark-furred torso. Ori had never noticed it before, but the raven that adorned his arm and shoulder held the right nipple in its ‘beak’. Rather cheeky, actually. Ori would never have imagined he had it in him.

Thorin grinned at Dis and Balin and said, “If any beardless dwarrowdams are spotted by Bombur and Erda, tell them to send them in, for I am quite at leisure.”

Erda emerged from the house with the teapot, followed by the oddest looking person Ori could imagine carrying an enormous platter of cakes and sliding it onto the table.

“Here we go,” said the…

Ori realized this must be a hobbit, his utter beardlessness balanced by the golden brown hair on his very large, bare feet and the matching cap of curls on his head. He was even shorter than the dwarrow, though not perfectly round as Ori had expected. His face was quite cheerful, broad and pink-cheeked and graced with mischievous brown eyes.

“I’ll just bring out the sandwiches and we’ll be all set,” said the hobbit in a beautiful western accent.

He bowed slightly and darted back inside.

Ori felt other eyes upon him and turned his head in time to catch a smaller, darker-haired version of the hobbit’s features disappear back behind the door frame. While he watched the face slowly reappeared, all blue eyes and a little grin.

Ori smiled and winked.

The hobbitling squeaked and whisked back out of sight.

“Frodo, are you behaving?” asked the older hobbit as he returned with the sandwiches. A tiny voice reached them from inside.

“Yes, Uncle Bilbo.”

“You wouldn’t be fibbing now, would you, my boy?”

“Nuh-uh.”
“That’s a relief. Come into the kitchen. The ginger biscuits are out of the oven.”

Instantly the whole, small hobbit bounced into view and attached itself to ‘Uncle Bilbo’s’ leg, only to peer around again at Ori.

“You are the worst little flirt,” said Bilbo.

“What’s a flirt?”

“Keep batting your eyelashes. I’m sure it will come to you.”

After they’d gone, Kili said, “That’s the smallest badger I’ve ever seen, at least the smallest who wasn’t still crawling.”

“Are those hobbits?” Fili asked Ori.

“Yes,” said Ori, “but they’re far from home. Have you ever seen one, love?”

Dwalin shook his head. “Nah, I didn’t think they ever left th’ Shire. Never heard o’ one workin’ f’r a dwarf.”

“That’s Bilbo Baggins,” said Bombur. He had emerged from the inn without his apron and in full host mode. “He doesn’t actually work for me. He’s a scholar of languages.”

“Really?” Ori asked, suddenly very interested.

“Yes, published and quite famous, apparently. He’s spent every high season here helping me and Erda in the kitchen for years. Grade ‘A’ ore sort of fellow, do anything for you.”

“Thank yeh f’r accommodatin’ us, Bombur,” said Balin. “We didn’t realize it was already yer busiest time.”

“It’s not. He is early this year, arrived a week ago, and for the first time with a pebble in tow. I get the impression there’s more to the tale than he’s told me, but he’ll get around to the rest in time.”

Bombur chuckled at a private joke. “He always does.”

Dwalin nudged Ori’s foot, then chucked his chin over to Thorin. The king sat looking down at his plate studiously, but not eating, his cheeks and ears bright scarlet.

Mr. Baggins returned and Bombur introduced him. When he got to Thorin, Mr. Baggins bowed sharply and grinned.

“Your servant, King Thorin.”

Thorin sat transfixed. Finally, slowly, he rose to his own feet and gave a profoundly deep bow in return.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Aaaah, jolly holidays! Sunshine, a lovely lake, and …? Oh, and we’ve prepared a lovely dinner for our dear characters, so you may want to have a little something to comfort you while you read. And a shout out to our #TamerLorika! Be careful what you comment, dears. Your sneaky authors may use it! Please do join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Bilbo took in the gravity with which Thorin bowed and the corners of his mouth practically curled around in loops. Ori got the feeling Master Baggins was mischief incarnate.

“That,” said Bilbo, “is the finest bow I’ve ever been afforded. Careful, your majesty, your breeding is showing.”

Dwalin leaned close to Ori and whispered, “Considerin’ wha’ Thorin’s wearin’, tha’ ain’t all that’s shown’.”

“Hush!” Ori giggled, trying vainly not to be heard.

Bilbo nodded once more to the company and returned to his duties in the kitchen, greeting Bifur as the dwarf entered.

“Very pleasant fellow,” said Balin.

Bofur snorted.

“He’s got a tongue like a razor when he wants.”

Bifur lightly smacked him in the arm and signed in inglishmek, “He’s good with the badgers, especially getting the youngest pebbles to bed at night, telling them stories until they fall asleep.”

Erda nodded, “A regular blessin’ tha’ is. Why, Thorin, you haven’t touched your food.”

Thorin looked up, startled, as if he was miles away.

“I beg your pardon Erda, what did you say?”

Dwalin snickered.

“She says yer neglectin’ yer sandwich, an’ after Master Baggins slaved in th’ kitchen t’ make ‘em fer yeh!”

Thorin raised a brow, but Dwalin was not finished.

“Aye, jus’ imagine him, workin’ his wee hands through all tha’ dough. kneadin’ it, workin’ it, watchin’ it risin’ slowly, plumpin’ up t’ his satisfaction.”

Everyone else at the table started to cough. Fili and Kili looked gleefully fascinated and Sigrid horrified.

Ori gave Dwalin a look of reproof, which he feared made him look like a sullen chipmunk.

“You hush. He can’t help it if he’s struck.”

Thorin cleared his throat.

“Thank you, Ori, but I’m perfectly fine.”

Dis noted, “You look like a tomato.”

“Yes, lovely, Dis,” said Thorin. “Thank you as well.”

“His little hands smoothin’ an’—”

“Fuck you, Dwalin,” Thorin growled.

“Not me job anymore, lucky fer yeh.”

“We’ll put in in th’ marriage contract,” said Balin brightly, “under Other Duties as Required.”

Ori choked on his tea and considered sliding under the table. He was glad Thorin and Dwalin were so close. Nori and Dori would be nose to nose right now, just before Nori stormed off for a day or twelve.

Dori, predictably, called them all to task.

“That is enough. Let Thorin be now. It’s hardly his fault Master Baggins is such a handsome fellow, and such curls! Indeed, if my own dresser had the styling of his hair I shouldn’t be ashamed to be seen with him anywhere.”

“I don’t think he’d want to sleep with his hair in rags and sugar water,” said Ori.

“I wouldn’t know about that, pet, my hair has a natural wave.”

“Aye, an’ soft as a cosset,” Balin sighed.

He and Dori kissed and for a moment their eyes were off Thorin, except for Ori’s. Ori watched as Thorin sagged a little, the brief, carefree air gone, and in its place a rare unguarded look of bewilderment.

Thorin saw Ori looking his way. Ori smiled and nodded encouragingly.

Thorin returned the smile, tired as it was, and shook his head.

Everyone was lounging about after tea.

“Dwalin?” Ori asked. “Might we go down to the lake?”

“O’ course.”
“When you’re ready. It’s just… I’ve never been to one.”

“Well, then,” said Dwalin, smiling, “best bring yer sketchbook. There’s lots t’see.”

Ori sincerely hoped Dwalin didn’t mind spending his afternoon with a puppy with no attention span. That’s what he felt like.

“What’s this?” This was a small heap of fish vertebrae, bleached white from lying in sand and sun.

Then:

“What’s this?”

“Bivalve shell.”

“So pretty. Look at the colors!”

Then:

“What’s this?

“Driftwood,” said Dwalin.

“Yes, but why does it look like that? Where did all these grooves at right angles come from?”

“Worms in the lake most likely, burrowin’ through.”

“There are worms in the lake? I thought worms drowned in water.”

“The land ones do, these are different.”

“Oh, do you suppose Bombur has—“

“Books abou’ them? Aye, he does.”

Ori cast him a mock-sour eye.

“You’re just making fun now.”

“Wouldn’t make fun o’ books, love. I know which side me bread’s buttered.”

“So, why are the grooves at right angles?”

“Mebbe th’ worms’ve got a geometry fetish.”

“Oooo, what’s this?” He hunkered over a rock with a hole straight through it. “How did this happen?”

“Bigger worm.”

Ori paused a moment, thinking, then peered up at Dwalin.

“Rubbish,” he pronounced.

“No, no, bigger’n yer forearm.”
“Entire sack of rubbish.”

“How’m I supposed t’ get anythin’ past yeh now?”

“You’ll just have to cope. Do you know how this really happened?”

“I kin guess. If this was in the surface of the lakebed and a smaller, rounder rock got stuck in a bit of whirlpool and spun in place, it would carve a hole.”

“Like a drill. I see. Shall we wander?”

Ori picked up the stone, went to put it in his pocket.

Dwalin removed a small leather bag from his and held it out.

“A good soldier’s always prepared,” said Dwalin.

“For walking on the beach with their attention span-challenged spouse?”

“Yeh.”

“Can I put my worm fetish stick in there?”

“Don’t think it’ll fit. Here’s a smaller one.”

They wandered around the beach, Ori exclaiming over everything so that he thought it must drive his husband mad. It couldn’t be helped. Everything was so new. All this, and only two hours from home? What else had he missed?

They stopped to peer over the edge of the dock. The water was shallow enough here and clear to the sandy bottom. Ori saw tiny fish Dwalin called minnows, but he also saw strange creatures scuttling around in the sand. They looked like enormous insects with pincers and antennae.

“Crawfish,” said Dwalin.

“That’s a fish?”

“After a fashion, I guess. Watch this.”

Dwalin took up a small stone and dropped it through the water. It landed in the midst of the crawfish, which darted away almost faster than Ori could see.

“They move backwards?” Ori asked, amazed. “How do they know where they’re going?”

Dwalin shrugged.

“I dunno. Maybe they jus’ know th’ neighborhood. Anyway, they’re good eatin’.”

Ori gave him a dubious look.

“How?”

“Steamed, sometimes mixed with spices an’ served with rice, sometimes made int’ pie. Th’ shells’re boiled f’r soup stock.”

“I suppose it’s better than vegetables. What’s this?”
It was a very pale, very still version of the darting creature from the lake bed.

“Tha’s an old crawfish shell. They molt like spiders as they grow.”

Very carefully Ori picked it up and put that in his bag as well.

“What’re yeh goin’ t’ do with tha’?”

“Draw it. I’m going to draw all of it!”

“Well, leave some of it on th’ beach fer the next dwarf.”

Ori stuck out his tongue.

They walked back toward the water’s edge. Ori picked up wind flowers and interesting grasses. A flapping motion caught his eye and he turned to watch an enormous white bird, wading through the shallows on long stilt-like legs. Ever so often it darted its head down toward the water, picked up a minnow or small frog or crawfish in its beak and gobbled it down. It moved in a regal manner, deliberately, biding its time to strike.

“Egret,” said Dwalin.

“What’s that big, round leaf on the water?” Ori looked at the trees above the lake, but none of them had leaves like this.

“Lily pad. It grows out of the lake bed.”

“Really?”

“Really.”

“Not rubbish?”

“No’ rubbish.”

They stood for a while looking out over the lake. Dwalin gathered him close from behind as they took it all in.

“Look at the lake. I’ve never seen this color, Dwalin. I wish I could bottle it and use it as ink.”

“Yeh’d have t’ if yeh wanted t’ keep it. Th’ lake changes color as th’ season goes on, dark blue goes t’ blue an’ green, then th’ green kinda fades an’ th’ blue fades an’ it’s very light like th’ sky, an’ yeh kin see through t’ th’ bottom even in th’ middle o’ th’ lake.”

“Why does it do that? Water doesn’t have a color. It can’t be just reflecting the sky.”

“If I had t’guess? Th’ water’s cold ‘cause it comes from th’ mountain by th’ River Runnin’, an’ in th’ spring th’ river gets rougher, an’ takes a lot o’ loose rock an’ dirt with it. I think it’s th’ bits o’ different minerals we’re seein’, ‘cause they make th’ lake rise until summer, then th’ lake levels off an’ there ain’t as much comin’ in.”

“So, the bottom of this lake was once in the mountain. They’re connected that way. But…”

“But?”

“Remember when you showed me the fossils of the fish and insects and things the miners are always finding in the mountain?

“’Aye.’

“Where did they come from?”

“We think - an’ it’s just a thought, mind - we think th’ whole thing was under water once.”

“The whole mountain? Is there even that much water in Arda?”

“Dunno, mebbe at th’ time it was more’ve a mountain in trainin’?”

They were descended upon by screeching lake gulls in force enough that Ori feared Dwalin would have to jump in front of him to protect him like a warrior with a helpless maid from one of Shire’s novels.

"What do they want?" Ori asked. "What are they saying?"

"They're no' magical like ravens. They're just greedy an' vicious. If they were t' say somethin', it would be on th' order o' Gimme all yer food."

Sure enough, when it was apparent dinner was not forthcoming the gulls retreated back out onto the water.

"Mahal!" Ori muttered. "At least you can tell the ravens to push off."

He picked up his bag, which he had dropped, and found the gulls had left some white feathers behind. He picked up three and put those in the bag as well.

They walked a well-worn path that Dwalin said eventually circled the whole lake. It was cool among the trees, though Ori found himself dividing his time between staring around him in wonder and looking out for roots to stumble upon. A strange bird made ‘whooHOOwoowoowo’ noises. Ori snickered when he thought of The Great Woudini.

“Tha’s a loon,” said Dwalin

“It certainly is,” Ori agreed. He sighed happily and felt that welcome sensation he only got when he had learned much more than he could digest, a sort of intellectual gluttony signaled not by his stomach, but by the feeling of his brain swelling to fit tight in his skull from all the information he’d stuffed in.

He walked here with his One, with beauty all around them and with new learning in his head.

This was bliss.

“So, yer gonna paint it?”

“Yes, I’m going to try. I’m much more experienced with graphite pen and pen and colored ink, but I want to develop my skills with colored pigment. Painting was always a rare pleasure because the supplies are so expensive.”

“Yeh’ve the resources now, yeh shouldn’t ever have t’ worry abou’ tha’ again.”

Ori laughed.

“Yes, but now I have another problem. I know how much they cost and I don’t want to waste
“Aye, righ’, I ge’ it. It’s like a new knife from a great craftsdwarf. Yeh wonder if yer worthy of it.”

“Yes! Exactly!”

“But there’s only one way t’ tell if yeh are, isn’t there?”

“For good or ill, yes.”

The sun sat much farther down the sky by the time they returned to the beach.

Dori, Balin, Thorin and Dis lounged on the deck with cool drinks. Dis' hand seemed to be bobbing in the air, and then a small, dastardly creature leapt after it and Ori realized she must be dangling a long string for the kittens to attack. Dis said something over her shoulder to Thorin. Whatever it was hit home because he sprawled back with his arms outflung, as if he had been struck and she laughed.

Mr. Baggins returned to the deck to bring a large pitcher of something to drink.

"I'm dying to speak with him," said Ori. "I've actually heard of him. He's a published scholar and it's rumored that he speaks seven languages, including the sylvan dialect of the elves, which is a very difficult language to learn."

"Bit of any overachiever?"

Dwalin bent and picked up a stone and tossed it side hand across the water. Ori was amazed to see it hop across the surface several times before eventually sinking below.

"What are you doing?" Ori asked.

"Skippin' stones. Here."

Dwalin picked out a very flat, round stone and held it so as to surround it with his thumb and forefinger. He pulled back his arm, snapped it forward ‘sidearm’ and released it over the water where it bounced off the surface once… twice… thrice… five times in a row before it lost momentum.

Ori hunkered down and carefully rested his hand on the surface of the water, but it just felt like water, without even the buoyancy of the salt pools they sometimes visited under the mountain.

“Is it a special kind of rock?” he asked.

“Nah, jus’ a rock. Here, pick a flat one that’ll fit in yer hand.”

Dwalin adjusted Ori’s grip on the stone.

“There, now toss it.”

Ori did so, as he had seen Dwalin do, but it only skipped twice.

“Did I do it wrong?”
“If yeh’d done it wrong it’d’ve jus’ hit th’ water with a big splash. Some of it’s luck, some of it’s the righ’ stone, some is jus’ knowin’ when t’ let ‘er fly. Try it again.”

Ori did so and managed five skips!

“Well done,” said Dwalin, laughing.

"I wonder if I could do that with my slingshot," Ori mused.

"Speakin’ o’ overachievers," Dwalin teased.

They picked through the stones at their feet, looking for likely ‘skips’.

"Dwalin, do you think Master Baggins is Thorin's One?"

“How could he be? Mahal didn’t make him.”

“Maybe Mahal and Yavanna collaborated, like Narvi and Celebrimbor collaborated.”

Dwalin's grin widened.

“Narvi an’ Celebrimbor were makin’ doors f’r Khazad-dum. Though I can see th’ similarities between th’ doors an’ Thorin. He’s just as likely t’ start talkin’ t’ th’ hobbit as those doors are. Sometimes I really wanna shake him til he pops.”

“Now, now, no shaking the monarch. And speaking of the monarch – the tattoo? Great Mahal, how long did that take? And how much did it hurt?”

“A long time an’ I kin only imagine it hurt a lot. I was there when he got it an’ he jus’ sat there like stone, th’ whole time. He was tryin’ t’ burn off some anger after Thrain died an’ Thror was bein’ … Thror. He calls it his ‘Fuck yeh, udad, an’ th’ warg yeh rode in on’ tattoo.”

“Rather beautiful for such a terrible reason.”

“Aye, it put a bit of a pinch on our rollin’ around together f’r quite a while.”

Ori straightened with his left hand filled with stones. He was about to be quite forward, but this was Dwalin, after all, and the worse he might do was tell Ori it wasn't his business, and not even in a nasty way.

“Dwalin, if you didn’t have a heartsong, would you have become Thorin’s consort?”

“Probably, though I wasn’t necessarily lookin’ forward t’ it. Why?”

“Do you think Thorin was in love with you?”

“He an’ I never talked much abou’ thin’s like ‘feelin’s’. It was mostly abou’ th’ sex.”

Ori shook his head.

“No, do you think he was in love?”

“Ahh, I see. ‘Cause if he was-“

“It would make things difficult for him with anyone else.”

“Nah, I don’ think it’s like tha’. Though, I would’ve married him if he’d asked. Not very romantic, but if old Thror had really lashed out like we feared, at least I’d’ve bin close enough t’ protect him. But tha’ is neither here nor there. Yer me One, an’ Thror’s no’ a threat anymore.” Dwalin sighed as if he was very tired, and shook his head. Ori put his hand on Dwalin’s arm.

“Are you alright?”

“Bleedin’ Mahal. I’ve only know him me whole life. I’ve seen him in every possible mood. He’s even had a major lust a time or two. But I’ve never seen him react t’ anyone like tha’. Now I’ve got a minute t’ think on it, I think th’ idjit’s fallin’ in love a’ fuckin’ first sight.”

“But Master Baggins didn’t seem more than flattered,” said Ori, tossing a stone. “I’ve always read hobbits were lustful creatures, but I don’t know if they can even feel love.”

“Yer worried abou’ Thorin.”

Dwalin took his turn and they traded tosses with words quite companionably for such a heavy subject.

“How can I not be worried?” Ori asked. “He has – all of you have - done so much for me. I wish I could do something for him. If he was a neighbor back in Steam Alley, a blacksmith or a carpenter, Dori himself would have fixed it immediately, trapped them someplace they couldn’t easily escape and force fed them tea and biscuits until they talked to each other. But with the king of dwarrow, you don’t have that option, do you? I know the law. There’s nothing requiring him to marry a noble, or even someone wealthy, but I’m not sure he gets to pick someone out of sentiment, either.”

Dwalin chuckled.

"Love, we’ve gone from love a’ first sight, t’ lust, t’ royal matrimony in less than five minutes. Tha’ has got t’ be some sort a’ record.”

Ori giggled to himself, feeling ridiculous.

“I guess I am an overachiever,” he confessed. “I suppose we should at least observe them in the same room for more than a minute before we start sending out wedding invitations, shouldn’t we.”

Ori flung a stone and began to count. At nine his jaw dropped. At ten it hit the water next to a lake gull and the bird exploded in a storm of angry shrieks and flying feathers.

Ori winced and called, “Sorry!”

The gull shot him a look.

“Ori of Fundin, Lake Menace,” he said with a sigh. “Maybe it’s time to move on.”

“Yeh did very well, love!”

“Dwalin!” he cried, scandalized.

Dwalin laughed.

“Aw, g’ on. Yeh miss him.”
“Yes, though I can’t think why.”

“Yeh’ll see him at th’ coronation.”

Ori groaned.

“You haven’t seen Dipfa’s ‘improvements’ to the royal scribe’s traditional coronation robes.”

“They clash with yer hair?”

“Everything clashes with my hair. No, apparently she’s hoping to ‘reconcile the past solemnity of the Thror era with the current political climate, whilst striking a color chord to project the maximum joy warranted by the occasion’.”

“Yeh wrote all tha’ down, didn’t yeh.”

“She’s killing me.”

Dwalin nudged his shoulder.

“Yeh could join th’ city guard. Dress uniforms mean never havin’ t’ worry about lookin’ like a fashion experiment gone wrong.”

“Maybe if I could lift an axe. I’m too scrawny to intimidate anyone.”

Dwalin drew back his head and looked at Ori.

“Yer no’ scrawny, love.”

“You’re sweet.”

“Aye, I am tha’, bu’ I mean yeh haven’t looked at yerself in the mirror in a while, have yeh. I mean, when yeh weren’t tryin’ on one o’ Dipfa’s ‘creations’.”

“I haven’t had time lately to do much more than brush my hair and splash water on my face.”

Dwalin tugged him close and kissed the top of his head. “Yeh’ve been workin’ too hard.”

“We’ve all been working too hard,” Ori admitted. “It can’t be helped.”

Throwing on something ‘cleanish’ and mended went by the wayside when he started dashing after Thorin everywhere, attempting to look competent, professional and smart. Clothes with tears, holes and stains went back to Dipfa to be remade into something else. Even now, back in Erebor, he had a whole weeks’ worth of clothes picked out in advance, so that he knew they would be clean and would match without him having to think about it. He hadn’t been seen in public in a cardigan in weeks.

Ori went into the water closet and washed his hands and face. He peered into the mirror and saw that his freckles were very prominent. It was the sunshine he remembered, he chuckled and went back out. He changed his tunic for a plain lavender one that matched his breeches. Dwalin had also changed his shirt for the dark green one.

They went downstairs, hand in hand, and Bilbo met them in the receiving area.
“There you are,” he sang out. “Follow me. Dinner’s ready and the dining room is this way.”

They followed him through and entered a large open room. A long table was set for the entire party and almost everyone had come in. Gimli, Fili, Kili, and Sigrid were already seated together. They were chattering but they looked tired. They all had changed clothes but their hair was still damp. Sigrid had braided and pinned hers around her head like a crown. Both Fili and Kili had tied theirs up in messy buns on the backs of their heads. Gimli’s head merely looked like a pile of roving left out in the rain.

Dori and Balin had no need to change as they had enjoyed their time on the deck with Dis and Thorin.

Bofur was clean and relaxed, and all the badgers were in attendance. Little Frodo romped among them just as though he was yet another of Bombur and Erda’s. Thorin had put a tunic on. His relaxed calm had returned but his mind appeared to be elsewhere. Ori thought it was likely with the fascinating hobbit.

Bombur came through and bid them all to the table. In the center sat a strange floral arrangement, as well as three large pieces of wood like triangular pods, then several round fibrous balls. A few had been broken open to reveal a white interior. There were tiny bowls of different seeds and herbs and through all this were scattered large trumpet like flowers of brilliant hues. It all rested on two long, flagged, shiny green mats.

When everyone was seated, Bilbo, Bombur, Erda, and the grown badgers began to serve. The first course arrived in a vast tureen of a savory smelling, golden soup.

Ori took his bowl eagerly and sniffed. It was like nothing he’d ever smelled before. He could see a few unknown herbs floating and though the broth looked creamy there were tiny shavings of something among the herbs. He sampled it and was all but overcome with the spicy heat. Bravely, he tasted it, let it roll over his tongue but still didn’t know what was in it. He recognized a vague, nutty flavor.

“Bombur! This is amazing,” Thorin enthused.

“Yes,” Dori agreed, “whatever is it made with? Are there nuts in it?”

“Indeed,” Bombur smiled. “What we have made for you tonight is a meal from the Islands far to the south. The Firebeard clans who traveled there mixed with the menfolk and now have these delicious dishes. What you are eating is a soup made of a nut called a coconut.”

“You can see,” Erda continued, “there are sections of two leaves from the tree on the table for the decoration.”

Everyone in the visiting party leaned forward to examine the ‘green mats’.

“Those are leaves?” Fili asked as he took in the size.

Ori stared the leaf was almost as tall as he was.

“No, dear prince, this is a leaf.” Erda said with a smile to Kali. The young dwarf winked at the two princes and disappeared only to return with another leaf. He held it up.

To Ori, it was a giant fern, as tall as Kili, who had risen to stare. Kali handed it to him.

“Careful, lad, them edges get sharper as they dry.”
Kili took the leaf up and weighed it in his hands.

“It’s almost like wood,” he said wonderingly.

Thorin rose also and came to his nephew’s side, closely followed by Balin. Ori caught himself moving and Dwalin nudged him.

“Go on, love, yeh know yeh want t’.”

Ori padded over and after Thorin had looked his fill he handed it to Ori. Ori was fascinated by the strangeness, it was both light and heavy at the same time.

“What does the tree look like?” he asked Bombur.

“Very tall, one great long trunk then the leaves on top. The leaves are called fronds.”

“Come and sit down, dears,” Dori admonished them. “This lovely soup will get cold.”

They all returned to the table. Erda gestured to the huge pods.

“That is what the nut looks like when it’s on the tree.”

“That’s the nut? What are the round things?” Sigrid asked, scraping the bottom of her second bowl.

“No, this larger part is called the husk. The trees often grow in the shores of the seas and if they fall in the water, they can float for miles and then once washed ashore they can take root and grow.”

“That’s a bloody tough husk,” Dwalin observed.

“Aye, “ Bofur nodded. “Yeh need a large knife ‘r ax to open it and inside’re the nuts; those brown balls, an’ yeh break ‘r slash ‘em open, yeh can see the nut flesh. When they’re new there’s a deal of what’s called milk inside.”

“We used this to make a kind of cream,” Erda added, “and that is the broth of the soup.”

“How very wonderful!” Dori enthused. “And so delicious.”

The soup disappeared quickly, the bowls and spoons piled up, then older Urs brought out the next course.

The scents made Ori’s mouth water.

Bilbo and Jaki brought bowls of mountained white rice, buttery and fragrant with an unknown spice. Long baskets covered in cloths reached them next, and the cloths unfolded to reveal large rounds of warm flat bread. There were dishes of something dark green with what Ori thought was cheese in them. He really didn’t want to eat that, suspecting it vegetableish, but resolved in himself to, at least, try it. This was a royal summer holiday and he must open himself to all new experiences.

The main dish looked like chicken stew of some kind, Ori detected onions, mushrooms, black pepper, salt and tomatoes. He knew the taste now of the coconut which he liked. He found small pieces of another nut. Erda explained to Dori that these were called groundnuts by some and by others peanuts as the plant often resemble a pea plant.

Erda was still exploring the possibilities of it. She had found that the oil from the nuts was excellent for cooking and if the nuts were ground fine and mixed with a little oil and a pinch of sugar made a lovely spread for bread.

The stew was warm from the stove but it was the heat from the spices that made Ori breath out through his mouth. It was so delicious, he couldn’t stop eating it, but at the same time it made his eyes water, he felt his face and after a few moment his entire body break a sweat. He looked up and saw everyone in the royal party were experiencing the same thing.

He screwed up his courage and took a small scoop of the ‘green food’ and put it over his rice as he saw Erda had done. He gave Dwalin a sideways glance. Dwalin was watching him closely.

“Can’t a dwarf have a moment of privacy?” Ori teased.

“Wasn’t sure yeh wanted t’ be alone with tha’. Looks dangerous.”

It was, in fact, delicious, and Ori was only in danger of eating the entire platter of it.

“Creamed spinach,” said Erda.

“This is spinach?” he asked, shocked. Who knew it was edible if you only beat it into submission first?

“And the white cubes are new cheese from cow’s milk,” Erda said.

The cheese helped a little but the spinach, despite being green, was also highly spiced and had a sharper bite than the chicken dish.

Dis and Dori laughed and fanned themselves with their napkins. Fili and Kili shoveled food in with tears pouring down their faces, grinning foolishly. Sigrid took a mouthful, swallowed and fanned her open mouth.

The Urs roared with laughter at them.

“Oh, Erda, Bombur,” Dis enthused. “I would happily roll around naked in this rice!”

Bombur leaned over to Erda.

“Remind me to order another bag, dearest.”

Erda passed plates of sliced cucumber and radishes with a white creamy spread. Erda said it was made from milk and called yogurt.

When the plate came to Ori, he put several radishes and spoonfuls of the spread on his side plate. The yogurt was tangy but the burn of the spices melted away as he ate some. Dwalin copied him and grinned at Ori. They laughed at each other all red-faced, teary-eyed, and sweating. Ori ate some cucumber and realized cucumber was very good.

“I hope you notice, husband, I’ve eaten green food and will fully admit I like both.”

“What’s that?” Dori gasped.

“I like this green food. Only this,” Ori pointed at the spinach and the cucumber. “And just like this. This specifically, Dori.”

Dwalin slung his arm around Ori’s shoulders and pointed at the spinach then the cucumbers.

“Specifically this, our Dori.”
Dori laughed and turned to Erda.

“My dear I shall have to fairly prostrate myself upon your kindness for those and only those recipes. For you have done what I never was able.”

Bombur came back in with a tray with a large pitcher and glasses filled with ice. He poured a thin milky potion into each glass and popped in a thin yellow spear of what Ori guessed was fruit. These were passed out and Ori drank. It was more yogurt sweetened with honey and flavored with the rich yellow fruit which Neti told them was called mango.

All the burn from the spice melted away from Ori’s mouth, leaving it cool and refreshed. Ori thought he could feel the spices warming from his belly into his blood and heating him through.

Sigrid couldn’t get enough of the mango drink and Fili wasn’t far behind. Dis asked if Bombur and Erda shared their kitchen secrets.

Erda and Bombur chuckled and promised to produce all the recipes from the dinner.

“And my dear Dis, I shall advise you on the spices as my Bom tells me that you are the negotiator for trade.”

“Yes, please!” Dis said eagerly. “Perhaps tomorrow we can sit down and discuss this.”

Erda smiled and Bombur concurred.

“Of course, of course. We shall tell you of all the products, the names of the traders, their guild masters, and where they come from.”

“Thank you,” Thorin said and wiped his face with his napkin, sniffed then grinned at them. “That was a truly wonderful meal.”

“It’s not done yet!” cried Poli. “There’s dessert! Me and Isi made it! Mam had to help us fry them but we made them up.”

“And very nicely they turned out,” Bombur praised. “The syrup is perfect, my badgerlings.”

The dinner platters, dishes and plates were scraped so clean, Jaki and Randi naughtily thanked their guests, saying they wouldn’t even have to wash the dishes, just put them right back into the cupboard, making their mother scold and chase them out to the kitchen. Bilbo grinned over to Ori.

“I enjoy the food from the southern islands but I have to admit I was worried that Frodo might not care for them having only had food traditional to the Shire.”

Ori glanced over at the hobbit badger. Frodo was licking his fingers after using them to ‘clean up’ any of the sauces left on his plate. He was flushed and obviously quite enjoying his meal.

“He shares your taste, Master Baggins.”

“But not my manners, alas.” He took up his serviette and wiped Frodo’s chin.

“Uncle Bilbo!”

“What? Were you saving it for later?”

The dessert arrived. Bombur carried them in on a wide tray and little Poli was allowed to put a bowl before everyone. Ori thanked her and Dwalin winked, making the badger giggle.
In the bowl sat several small globes, golden from being fried and swimming in a light syrup. Once everyone was ready, they all tried them.

Ori almost squeaked in delight. The dainty things were not donuts nor were they cake. They were so good and the syrup was flavored and scented with roses.

Sigrid all but moaned with delight and Dis and Dori gushed over the taste. Thorin had a look of bliss on his face.

Balin asked, “Bombur, what are these?”

“Dried milk, a little flour and cream,” Bombur chuckled.

“That’s all?” Dori asked in shock.

Erda nodded.

Soon, everyone was of an elegant sufficiency. Thorin and Dwalin exchanged a look. Dwalin grinned, took in a breath, and intoned:

“All Hail to Mahal—“ before he ran out of burp. There were shout of laughter, followed by various attempts. When it was his turn, Ori did his best.

“All hail to Mahal and the seven stars of Durin—”

There was a cheer and Ori looked at Thorin. Thorin cleared his throat, rose, held out his hand as though he was on stage and about to burst into song.

“All hail to Mahal and the seven stars of Durin shining bright! Hic!”

There was a roar and Fili, Kili, and Gimli grabbed the bowls of seeds and tossed the contents towards Thorin. Thorin grinned and bowed again, and was obliged to resort to his drink to stop the bad case of hiccups this effort had caused. Everyone else was scooping up seeds and tossing them around laughing and applauding in between. Bilbo shook his head and rose.

“Uncle Bilbo, can I try?”

“No, my boy, you’ll explode. Thus the valar-given gifts of royalty.”

“It’s true!” shouted Kili.

“Yes, it is, and now you may help clear up,” Dori declared.

At that everyone got up and began clearing the table and carrying dishes and platters out to the kitchen. Both Erda and Bombur started to rise but Thorin shook his head.

Only Dori, Balin, Thorin and the Urs remained seated.

Carrying though a pile, Ori saw that Dis had stationed her sons at the sink and the younger Urs only had to organize and tell them where things went. Sigrid and Gimli returned to the dining room armed with brooms and dust pans. After disposing of a few crumbs and scraps into the bucket for the pigs, Dwalin told Kali to show him where it went and the pair went out.

Ori and Bilbo dried dishes and Ari, Muri and Buri put them away. It wasn’t long until the kitchen was clean and returned to order. Edi filled the biggest kettle Ori had ever seen and put it on to boil for tea. Dwalin returned chuckling and talking with Kali.

They trooped back into the dining room to find Erda herding the rest out to the deck.

Soon all were seated in chairs with very long seats, so they could put their feet up.

The older of the Ur’s progeny arrived with two large teapots and several cups. A light tea was served with honey and lemon and a delicious milky spicy sweet tea as well. After that they ran down to play on the lawn with the youngest badgers.

“They seem to have a great deal of energy still,” said Thorin.

“It’s the spices in the food,” said Erda. “They heat the blood. Best to burn off a bit of energy before you turn in or you’ll find you’ve a little trouble sleeping.”

“Yes,” said Bilbo. “Of course, everyone has to find their own best method for doing that, burning off energy, that is.”

He turned his head and looked directly at Thorin and said, “You need to burn it off or, who knows, you might just burst into flames.”

Thorin opened his mouth as if to speak, but seemed to lose his nerve on the way.

Dis muttered, “Great Mahal, Thorin could read by the light of his own cheeks.”

Dori said, “No, no, dear Dis, Thorin’s just a true son of the line of Durin. Lava runs in the blood.”

“Is that so, Mr Dori?” Bilbo asked. “Very interesting indeed.”

Ori curled up on Dwalin’s lap with his third cup of spice tea and relaxed.

The faint trails of the sunset were fading. The lake was still moving a little, Ori could hear the wavelets lapping at the shore. There was strange calls of birds. Ori picked out the noises of a screech owls and the large barn owls.

There were bats flitting about above them. Feasting on the insects the lights attracted. Ori gasped when a luxurious moon moth landed on his arm. Palest green and with long tails off its lower wings, the elegant creature rested, uncurling its long tongue and tasting him.

“Look a’ tha’, love,” Dwalin murmured, watching the moth.

“If it would give me my arm back I’d draw it.” Ori whispered in reply.

“Yeh’ll have t’ do it from memory, love.”
Canoodling, costumes, and cautionary tales

Chapter by Stevie Foxx

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Such summer time delights we have in store for you this charming chapter. It’s warm and sunny here at Long Lake, so don’t forget your sunblock! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori thought he would sleep immediately and peacefully. Instead he fell into a long dream where he was writing a letter on commission but he couldn’t get very far because he didn’t know how to address it.

His employer asked, “Who? Who?”

“I don’t know,” Ori said in his dream, “you have to tell me. It’ll go much faster if you do.”

“Who?”

“Please, be reasonable. I can’t help you otherwise.”

“Whoooooooooo?”

This went on endlessly until he woke in the early hours of the morning in total confusion. The windows all hung open, with a stiff breeze, but he was warm enough beneath the covers with Dwalin.

A voice outside the window called, “Who?”

“What in the name of Mahal’s blesses arse?” he muttered.

“It’s an owl,” said Dwalin in the dark.

“I’m sorry, Dwalin. Am I keeping you from sleeping?”

“I’m more concerned abou’ yeh. Whoever yer workin’ f’r in tha’ dream, I’ll wipe th’ floor with ‘im.”

“You’re so good to me. It’s so strange to hear one so close.”

“Aye, they don’ come so high up th’ mountain, ‘nless they’re deliverin’ messages. Yeh want me t’ shut the window?”

“No, now that I know it’s an owl, I can just tell him to go suck a lemon.”

When Ori woke again the first thing he heard was birdsong, then a door closing somewhere in the house and murmurs of low voices in khuzdul. The ceiling was white, as were the lace curtains flapping at the edge of his vision.

Just for a moment he had no idea where he was, but it was beautiful.

The inn, of course, and this spectacularly comfortable bed and the warmth of his equally spectacular sleeping husband.

The sun eased around the edge of the windowsill and he watched for while as the fingers of light moved up from the foot of the bed.

Dwalin's breathing changed and he raised his head.

"Mornin', love," he said. "Sleep well?"

"Except for the giant cabbages chasing me through the halls of the library."

"Giant cabbages," Dwalin repeated levelly. "I see. G'on."

"I finally lost them in the collected minutes of the weekly miners' guild meetings volumes 320 through 8,336b."

"Lemme guess, it was so dry th' cabbages wilted?"

Ori giggled.

"Aw, you spoiled my library joke."

"Sorry, love, it was self defense."

Ori slipped from beneath the covers.

"Where yeh goin'?"

"Answering the call of nature. I'll be right back."

He did so, then paused to examine his hair in the looking glass above the sink. He looked like someone had dangled him by the hair and spun him around.

"I couldn't do that myself if I tried," he acknowledged.

He reached to smooth it out, then decided against it.

Dwalin appeared in the doorway.

"Should I leave it for the day?" Ori asked, pointing to his hair.

"Our Dori'll have apoplexy."

Ori shook his head. "If Nori hasn't managed it yet, there's no chance I will."

He went back out to the bed, considered straightening it out and getting on with the day, but decided to climb back in. From his knees he fell face first into the down comforter. The bedding poofed up around him like clouds of whipped cream and he laughed.

"Now tha'," said Dwalin, "is a temptin' target."
Ori didn't even have time to answer before Dwalin pounced on top of him.

It wasn't all Dwalin's weight, happily. If it were, Ori was pretty sure there'd be nothing left of him but his squeak.

The weight itself was comforting and arousing at once.

He sighed happily as Dwalin rubbed against him, rubbed him into the mattress.

"Yeh are jus' way too much a treat f'r one poor dwarf," Dwalin said in his ear.

"I could say the same thing about you," said Ori.

"Nah, a big ol' buffalo like me?"

"I'd shout it from the rooftop," said Ori, grinding back against him, "except I'm pretty sure we'd hear Nori being sick from here."

Dwalin chuckled, lifted up a little and turned Ori to face him.

"I apologize in advance f'r th' mornin' breath."

"I couldn't give a fuck about morning breath," said Ori emphatically, and kissed him.

There was no destination in mind, just rolling around, kissing and laughing and sometimes licking a spot that caused a breath to hitch. Ori discovered that the crook of Dwalin's elbow was softer than chamois and deliciously sensitive under his mouth. Ori developed a theory while his tongue played and Dwalin's eyes lost focus.

"Dwalin?"

"Mm?"

"Roll over for a minute."

"Righ'."

Dwalin did so, leaving the backs of his knees on full view and vulnerable, and the evil scribe pressed full advantage.

"Mahal's hairy arse!" Dwalin gasped.

Ori giggled and darted his tongue against Dwalin's skin over and over.

Dwalin groaned and buried his head under a pillow, his body trembling harder with the passing moments.

Without warning he snapped up with a roar, seized Ori and rolled the scribe under him, kissing his face and neck in a merciless, sticky barrage. Ori shrieked with laughter, trying half-heartedly to defend himself, but mostly struggling to breathe. Dwalin drew back, teeth bared, face screwed up in a lampoon of ferocity and panted like a ravaging predator.

Then he dissolved into laughter like Ori, resting his forehead on Ori's shoulder until they eventually calmed themselves.

"Are you as hungry as I am?" Ori asked finally.
"I could be convinced," Dwalin conceded. "Wha' d'yeh think? Should I wear me pink drawers down t' th’ dinin’ room?"

"As if there's anyone who hasn't seen your pink drawers!"

"Oooooo, tha's underhanded, librarian. Foul! Foul!"

"You're just pouting because you didn't think of it first."

"Aye," said Dwalin, kissing him, rolled over, and looked out at the window, the sun was high in the sky, the winds lazier than yesterday.

“Love, I’m thinkin’ it looks like a good beach day.”

Breakfast was set up in the dining room as a buffet, to free the Urs and Bilbo to do other important chores around the inn.

The meal was everything comforting and hearty, eggs and sausages, bacon, porridge with cream and fruit, toast with butter and jam and huge pots of coffee, tea and xocolātl. While Ori happily ate his fill, he could have sworn he saw Thorin keep looking up from whatever he was doing. Ori suspected Thorin’s eyes sought the hobbit.

After he was through, Ori took his drawing supplies out to the long table on the deck to sketch his lake treasures from the day before.

He placed the empty crawfish shell on a block of wood in the middle of the table so the sun shone through it. His other findings were set carefully in a pasteboard box Jaki had found him. Ori removed his inks and paper then sat down to sharpen his quills.

A movement caught his eye as Rutile scuttled out at the top of the door jam, leapt from there to the chair opposite him, ran across the table, paused to look at the shell, then scurried toward Ori, taking in the ink and paper.

“Hullo, Rutile.”

She ruffled the edge of his paper.

“I’m going to draw,” he told her.

She paused, her eyes and upper body cocked up at him, so he assumed she was listening, and continued his explanation.

“I’m using the ink and paper to express what I see. In this case, it’s the crawfish shell.”

She bounced enthusiastically, bending her first set of knees.

“You want to try? Here.”

He set up a large piece of paper and poured out a saucer of ink.

Ori took his time with his own drawing, aware of people moving to and fro around him, coming out into the sunshine with plates of food and mugs of tea, though he wasn’t interrupted. The sunlight shining on the vaguely transparent shell was both beautiful and alien. It turned the shell from sickly yellow to a light tan with minuscule touches of dark.
Seeing it closely, it was as though the little creature had wore armor as fine as any made by his people. He made several small sketches in black then took out his colors. He had to water down a few of his colors to capture the light.

Finally, when he had worked to his satisfaction, he looked up to see how Rutile fared.

As it turned out, she had finished as well. At least, he thought she had.

All the pieces of the crawfish were represented fully, each eight times in a row. The lines were, for want of a better word, spidery. He peered closer, then closer still, aware Rutile was waiting for him. Finally, with his cheek nearly on the paper he realized the lines weren’t actually lines, but words in khuzdul runes, describing each part. One leg, for instance, was eight continuous repetitions of the word ‘leg’.

Ori jumped up and cried out, “Dis!”

Everyone at the table stared at him and Dis came to the door chewing a slice of toast.

She swallowed.

“Ori, what the matter?”

“Look!”

He pointed at the paper.

This brought everyone, so that it was hard for anyone to actually get a good look.

Balin flicked open his magnifying lens and examined the work, chuckling.

“Very good, laddie. Very clever.”

“This isn’t mine, it’s Rutile’s!”

Dis cooed, “Oh, Rutile! How beautiful!”

She snatched up the lens by its cord, which was, unfortunately, still around Balin’s neck, and examined the drawing minutely.

She cried, “How clever you are, my darling!”

Rutile leapt to her shoulder and cuddled under her neck, chirping.

Dwalin, looking over Ori’s head, said, “Don’t look now, love, I think yer crawfish exploded.”

Thorin turned to Dis, “I suppose you want it under glass for your chambers? Or perhaps over the fireplace at Fundin House?”

She kicked his ankle.

“Thorin! Your niece’s first artwork. You should be proud!”

The king closed his eyes and looked pained.

Dwalin choked.

“She’s not my sister!” Kili exclaimed.
“Don’t be rude, Kili,” Dis admonished. “You’ll hurt her feelings.”

“He’s just jealous, amad,” said Fili. “He couldn’t do that.”

“There are master scribes who couldn’t do that,” said Ori. “She might put us all out of work!”

“Finish yer drawin’, love?” Dwalin asked.

“Yes, it’s here.”

Dwalin looked it over.

“I like yer’s be’er.”

“I think you might be a little biased.”

“No, no, pet. I like yours better, too. Such pretty colors.” Dori said in an unnecessarily soothing tone. Ori made face at him. Dwalin put his arm about Ori’s shoulders.

“C’mon, love. We’re all goin’ bathin’.”

There was a combined shout from the younger set and they exited the deck in a pounding herd. Ori snickered. “I’ll put these away and be right up.”

Ori came up and saw that the doors of Fili’s, Kili’s, and Gimli’s rooms were left open. Sigrid’s was closed. Curious, he knocked.

“Sigrid? Are you coming down to the lake?” Ori asked through the door of her room.

“No!”

“What?” He really wasn’t expecting that. It was meant as a sort of five minute warning to get her sun hat and join them. “What’s wrong?”

“I can’t leave this room wearing this…this bathing costume.”

Ori raised an eyebrow.

Really, how bad could it be?

Well, it was Dipfa, so Mahal knew, Sigrid could look like a duck.

“Is it really, really ugly?”

“I feel naked!”

“Naked? Did she skimp on the cloth?”

“I’ll say.”

“What does it look like?”

“Not enough.”

“Let me in, Sig.”
The door opened, a hand reached out, grabbed him by the tunic and yanked him into the room with amazing force.

Be careful what you ask for, Ori thought.

And there was Sigrid. And there was Sigrid’s bathing costume.

But the first thing Ori thought wasn’t: Oh, the poor thing, she’s practically nude.

The first thing he thought was: I didn’t know they made polka dots that big. Or that orange.

On closer inspection, the dots were actually printed oranges, punctuated by lime green leaves on a cerulean field. She looked like a fruit crate label.

“Mahal,” Ori breathed.

“You haven’t seen the hat!” she wailed.

He steeled himself.

“Show me the hat.”

She put it on.

“Put it away. Please. Now.”

It was little satin plush fruits, stuffed and sewn together, attached to a green ribbon band that went around her head. The pile of hat rose a good foot over her head.

“Maybe…” he started, then he just stopped. There was no salvaging this. “Just the bathing suit.”

“My tummy shows!”

The costume consisted of a tight, sleeveless shirt that ended beneath her breasts, and then a short skirt around her hips and under that, narrow bloomers to her knees, all matching, if that was the word. Orange bows accented the knees and neck, with two larger bows, one on top of each cerulean swimming slipper, which were like little cotton socks, but they laced with lime green ribbons from the toes to a little below the knee.

“I don’t think anyone will be looking at your tummy, Sig.”

“Does yours look like this?” she demanded.

“I don’t know.”

“Why not?”

“I’m afraid to open the package.”

She crossed her arms.

“Go on. I’ll wait.”

Because, Ori thought, misery loves company, of course.

He went to his room.
Dwalin stood in the middle of the bedroom, dressed in the bathing suit Dipfa had made for him. The breeches were short, very short. They only came down to his mid-thigh. It was a single item affair that went from the thighs to just above his nipples then narrowed to a pair of finger wide straps that went over his shoulders. The whole thing was white and dark green in wide, horizontal stripes.

There were lake shoes in matching dark green.

“Really?” Ori asked, stifling a laugh.

“I wouldn’t wear this as a joke, love. Promise,” Dwalin snickered.

Ori picked out a cloth from among the open packaging and examined it. It looked like a large white handkerchief that had knots tied in it at all four corners. Dwalin took it and fitted it on the top of his bald pate. He struck a soldierly pose. Ori giggled. Dwalin grinned at him, turned back to his reflection and paused.

“Wait here,” he said and disappeared into their bathroom.

Ori waited impatiently for what felt like a long time. Dwalin emerged. He struck a new pose. Ori shrieked with laughter. Dwalin had waxed his mustache thickly and turned the ends upward and round in a curl. Ori fell on the bed and lay there gasping with laughter.

“You…you look ridiculous!” he managed.

Dwalin made a show of admiring himself in the mirror.

“Nonsense. A fine figure o’ dwarrow masculinity. I think I’ migh’ be sayin’ ‘I say’ an’ ‘frightfully’ a lot.”

“Why?” Ori managed still grinning.

“Donno. Jus’ this getup makes me think I should. Get yers on, love.”

Ori’s was cut in the same style but was a solid bright purple, a very bright purple, the hems were trimmed in thin lines of cream satin.

“Oh,” said Ori. “Sigrid isn’t going to like this.”

“Why no’?”

“I thought I had figured out where the rest of the cloth went from Sigrid’s suit, but this isn’t the same cloth. At least there aren’t any oranges.”

“Er… love.”

Ori froze.

“Where?”

“One on each arse cheek.”

Ori twisted to look in the mirror and burst out laughing.

“This will make her feel better. Maybe the oranges’ll distract the others from her suit, too, though I rather suspect Dipfa put them there for your benefit.”
Dwalin nodded.

“Sensible, our Dipfa. Lass’ll get a hefty tip f’r tha’.”

The lake shoes matched and there was a straw hat. The hat was bleached to a creamy white, had a moderate brim with a two finger high crown covered with matching purple ribbon and then was flat on top. Streamers from the ribbon trailed off to nearly the middle of Ori’s back.

They looked at each other again and snorted with laughter.

Ori picked up the snack basket Dori had sent up to them and Dwalin picked up the towels to sit on and the large canvas umbrella to plant in the sand to shield them from the hot sun. Dwalin put the towels over one arm and swung the closed umbrella to his shoulder and offered Ori his other arm, which Ori took.

They went to Sigrid’s room and Dwalin banged on the door.

“Alrigh’, our Siggy. Time t’ face th’ world.”

She opened the door with a scowl, froze, and fell back laughing.

“Oh! Oh… that’s…. What did you do to your… Eru preserve us. I don’t feel so bad now.”

“Come on then,” said Ori. “Let’s see what other delights Dipfa created.”

They sailed down the stairs, all three arm in arm, and out to the lovely deck. They crossed this and stepped down to the grass which soon gave way to the sandy shore. The late morning sun was very warm.

Ori saw that Balin and Dori were already there in low chairs under an enormous white and blue umbrella with a fringe shading them. They wore white dressing gowns and sandals on their feet. Balin’s hair stood on end. A thing that looked like it might once have been a hat sat on the sand by his side; apparently Brandy had decided to use it as a comfortable place to nap. Balin read through small, half moon spectacles and Dori languorously fanned himself, his hair loosely caught up by the red ribbon threaded through it.

“I say, I say, I say. Frightfully, frightfully!” Dwalin rattled off loudly.

Balin peered over the spectacles, speechless, and Dori looked up. Ori raised his silly hat to his brother.

Dori gave a scream then collapsed in laughter.

Thorin was standing ankle deep in the water, looking out at the lake. He had pulled back his hair into a messy ponytail and his suit, in Durin blue, ended very abruptly just below his bottom, and apparently only had one strap.

“Ummmm, Thorin?” Ori started. “Aren’t you cold?”

Thorin turned.

The only decoration to his suit was the crest of the house of Durin, embroidered in sliver thread across his abdomen.

“In case I forget who I am,” said Thorin dryly.
“Was there a hat?” Ori asked.

“It doesn’t matter. I’m not wearing it.”

“Shaped like a crown, right?

“Studded with paste gems, yes.”

“Sporting!” Dwalin shouted.

Thorin stared at him.

“What the fuck did you do to your face?”

“Frightfully, frightfully!” said Dwalin through a toothy, maniacal grin.

“Yes, that is the word I would have used,” said Thorin. He looked around Dwalin with a frown.

“Sigrid? Why are you hiding?”

“Tummy,” she whispered, apparently shy once more.

“She’s afraid you’ll look at it,” Ori helped.

“Why would she be afraid of that?”

“My tummy hasn’t been seen by anyone except my parents since I was born!” Sigrid said, acutely embarrassed that the king would see her tummy.

“A little sun will do it some good then,” Thorin observed.

She groaned.

Ori turned to her.

“Wait, Sigrid, you learned how to swim, didn’t you?”

“Of course. Working with my father on the barge, if we fell overboard we had to know how to save ourselves.”

“Weren’t you naked or wearing skivvies or something?”

“No, we had to learn to swim fully dressed. it’s not like we were roaming around the barge naked.”

There was a shout and the next moment had Fili saying, “There you are Sigrid!”

She jumped and turned with a look of a small animal caught in a trap.

“We match,” Fili announced with every appearance of pleasure.

Fili wore a pair of breeches of the same material as Sigrid that stopped above his knees and he was otherwise bare except for the lake shoes also like Sigrid’s. He also wore the most enormous hat Ori had ever seen. It was straw-colored with a brim so wide it shaded his entire body and the crown rose high above his head. The sole decoration consisted of tiny stuffed fruit strung and swinging off the brim.

Sigrid shrieked with delighted horror.
“Aüle!! That’s awful! You look like an umbrella!!”

“You didn’t get a hat?” Fili asked quite seriously.

“I-I did but—”

“Where is it?”

“It’s in my room. It’s horrid—”

“I’ll get it,” Fili shouted in his wake as he tore back to the inn.

Sigrid stood stock-still staring, then began to laugh heartily.

“Oh well,” she managed. “If Dipfa wanted us to match so badly, who am I to spoil it for her?”

Ori grinned up at Dwalin. “I’m going to draw everyone in their bathing costumes. Just for Dipfa.”

“Wait,” said Sigrid. “Fili didn’t look at my tummy.”

“Disappointed, Siggy?” Dwalin asked.

“He was admiring your arms,” said Ori. “You do have very nice, strong arms.”

“He admires my arms?” Sigrid asked, bewildered. “It’s not like he hasn’t seen them before.”

“He’s an ‘arm’ dwarf,” said Ori.

“And that makes you, what, a ‘bum’ dwarf?” she teased.

Dwalin gave a low, filthy laugh.

“Aye, an’ so’m I. Look a’ those wee oranges!”

Ori squawked, as Dwalin grabbed his ass, and he hopped away.

“Bad bum-dwarf! “ he shouted, laughing. “No arse cheeks for you!”

“Old horned dwarf,” Thorin said snidely.

“Not an old goat?” Ori asked.

“It’s still summertime,” Thorin replied.

Kili and Gimli rushed up out of the water where they had been busily dunking each other. Dis trailed up after them in a suit like Sigrid’s but hers was black and dotted with red cherries. Gimli’s costume was white with accurate, exquisitely embroidered axes crossed on the belly. With his bright red hair in a heap on his head, he looked like a lit match.

Kili’s suit appeared to be stitched together green leaves, from the single shoulder strap down to mid thighs.

“Like watching a holly tree attack a snow bear,” Dis commented.

“Kili, yeh look like Ori’s worst nightmare,” said Dwalin.
“I do feel the need to sell vegetables,” said Kili, “though I don’t exactly know why. I hate broccoli, but in a sense, I am broccoli.”

Gimli stared at Dwalin, struck.

“Wha’ happened t’ yer face?” he demanded.

Ori answered him, “Oh, that’s just his ‘beach mustache’. Go on, Dwalin.”

Dwalin obliged by grinning evilly and talking through his teeth.

“Frightfully, frightfully!”

“Aye, it’s frightful, alright.”

From the blanket, Kili picked up a clump of green cloth. It opened into a hat the shape of a rowboat which sat upside-down on his head. A little red feather perked out the back.

“Dipfa says it’s the sort of thing archer’s should wear,” said Kili. “Dipfa is strange.”

“Frightfully, frightfully!” Dwalin agreed, then laughed at himself.

“Where’s your hat, Gimli?” Ori asked.

Gimli looked surprised then waved a hand in the direction of the lake.

“Somewhere out there. Blew away. Pity. Was goin’ t’ stick it on that elf’s head. He’d look dead funny in it.”

“He would,” Kili agreed eagerly. “It looked like a white upside-down flower pot and had a silver tassel hanging off the top.”

Fili returned with Sigrid’s hat, which she donned with much less reluctance, since she saw Fili didn’t have an issue wearing his.

“We’re a perfect matching pair of idiots,” she said.

“As long was we match, then it’s perfect,” Fili replied. They admired each other then blushed in unison.

Along with Kili and Gimli, they started to gather their towels and blankets.

“Where are you going?” Ori asked.

“Over to the kettle well,” said Kili. “We thought we’d give you some space to learn to swim.”

“What’s a kettle well?” Ori asked.

“A very deep spot in the lake, near the shore. There’s a rope swing.”

“The rest of the lake shore isn’t deep at all,” said Ori. “Did someone dig it out on purpose?”

“Nah, love,” said Dwalin. “Remember yer rock, with th’ hole in it? Imagine a boulder rolling over a huge, flat rock, except the rock’s the actual lake bed.”

“I see,” said Ori.
Thorin followed the group heading to the kettle well and Dis, after wringing out her hair, dropped down on her towel and pulled an enormous round straw mat over her face. She gave every appearance of being settled for a nap. The mat was decorated with a black ribbon bows and cherries at the middle. Ori decided this ‘mat’ was Dis’ hat designed by Dipfa.

Dwalin dropped his burdens aside, pitched the umbrella and took the basket from Ori.

“Yeh ready f’r a swimmin’ lesson?” Dwalin smiled.

Ori was not ready, in fact, and now that he stood here, feet from the edge of the water he wasn’t sure he ever would be. He gave his inner self a good smack across the back of the head and told it to behave. He was doing this thing. The others knew how to swim. He needed to learn.

“Yes, I’m ready,” he said, hoping he didn’t sound like he was going to the chopping block.

“Come on,” said Dwalin, taking his hand. “We’re goin’ t’ th’ dock.”

Ori wondered what boats had to do with this, but Dwalin walked past the boats to the end of the wooden boards, dropped Ori’s hand, and stepped off feet first into the water. He surfaced quickly, since the water was only about chest-deep on him. To his amusement, Ori realized Dwalin’s wet hair and beard clung to him, smooth and straight, but his waxed mustache remained stubbornly curled.

Ori thought of the crawfish and who knew what else on the lakebed below.

“It’s safe enough,” said Dwalin. “Wouldn’t usually jump in from a dock. Too much garbage, fish hooks an’ wha’not in th’ water. Bombur’s lot’s more careful ‘cause o’ th’ badgers.”

Ah. Of course, Dwalin thought of these things.

“Water’s freezin’,” said Dwalin said helpfully. “Best t’ jus’ jump in.”

“So yeh don’ look like tha’,” said Dwalin, chucking his chin over at the beach where Dori stood at the very edge of the water, touched a toe to it, shrieked, shivered, laughed and tried it again with predictable results.

Dori tossed aside his dressing gown and Ori could not believe…. Alright, this was a Dipfa design. He could believe it. The suit was red and draped, the shoulder straps gathered into graceful folds and secured with silver brooches shaped like shells. A matching belt of silver shells cinched in loosely at the waist. The tunic fell to the mid thigh with a band of silver shells over a hem of delicate red ruffles. The wind shifted to show matching red short breeches beneath. His red lake shoes closed with silver ties.

Ori was sure he wouldn’t look so adorable. He’d just look like a git.

Balin stood and removed his own dressing gown to reveal a suit identical to Dwalin’s except with red stripes instead of green.

He took Dori’s hand and they waded together in the shallows up to their knees.

Balin released Dori and continued on to the depth of his waist. Then he returned to Dori, picked Dori up, carried him back out waist deep, Dori squealing and flailing, and fell backward into the water, dunking them both.
Dori emerged, shrieking.

“You naughty creature! Look what you’ve done to my hair!”

“Look what th’ water’s done t’ yer suit,” said Balin with an satyrish leer.

He snatched the ribbon from Dori’s hair as they returned to the shallows.

Dori grabbed for it, but Balin held it out of reach, waving it like a banner, laughing.

“Give me that, you evil, evil dwarf!” Dori cried, and proceeded to chase Balin over the sand, the two of them giggling like badgers.

Rolling his eyes, Ori took a breath and walked off the end of the dock.

The iciness of the water could best be described as astounding. He would have said so if he could have said anything at all around the scream as he surfaced.

As it was, the first intelligent thing he uttered was,

“MAHAL’SFUCKIN’ARSE THAT’S COLD!”

Dori looked over in horror, Balin chuckled.

“Aye, it is,” said Dwalin. “Yeh goin’ t’ be alright?”

“Yes, I think so. Once I start moving.”

It was a comfort that he could put his feet flat on the bottom and still keep his head above water.

“Sorry, I’m trying to concentrate.”

“Nah, don’ do tha’. Tha’s no’ relaxin’.”

“Sorry!”

“An’ stop apologizin’.”

“Sorry!”

Dwalin sighed.

“Wha’ d’yeh think is relaxin’?”

“Concentrating.”

“Ah. Think abou’ yer crawfish drawin’. See, there yeh go.”

“What do I do now?”

“Jus’ hang abou’.”

“For how long?”
“How long d’yeh hang abou’? Depends how long yeh wan’ t’ no’ sink.”

“I mean, how long an interval before the next figure?”

“Figure?”

“Position.”

Dwalin laughed.

“Pretend yer a boat.”

“Are my arms the oars?”

“No’ tha’ kind’ve boat. Alrigh’. When yer comfortable, turn ov-“

Suddenly Ori was bumping to a stop on the lake bed, which was not as smooth as it looked.

Dwalin lifted him to his feet.

“I did it wrong!” Ori announced, coughing a little.

“No, yeh jus’ didn’ let me finish. Yeh turn over slowly, gen’ly. Turn over fas’ an’ yeh’ll sink.”

“I noticed.”

“A’righ’, try it again.”

After about an hour, Ori had a handle on the floating thing and could even doggy paddle a little.

Dwalin looked tired but happy, and that was all Ori really wanted.

That, and not drowning.

With Dwalin’s help, he managed to swim the shallow diagonal back to the beach where Dori awaited, holding out a big, fluffy towel as if Ori were one of Shire’s shipwreck survivors, having barely made it through the storm tossed waters to shore.

The sun felt good. Dwalin’s arms around him as they sat in the sand felt good. The doze he sunk into felt even better.

He came back to the sound of distant screams.

Dwalin smirked.

“Fili an’ Kili challenged Thorin t’ a water figh’. They’re goin’ t’ die.”

“Did they make a suicide pact or something?”

“Nah, they jus’ can’ stop ‘emselves from doin’ it.”

“And Thorin went along with it?”

“Aye.”

“He’s hiding from Master Baggins, isn’t he?”
“Aye.”

Ori’s stomach growled, making Dwalin chuckle and reach for the basket they’d brought.

“Here, love, some a’ th’ goodies Dori packed f’r us.”

“Oh, so, if Fili and Kili are going to die, does that mean we can eat their shares?”

“I’ve already eaten them,” said Dis, still lounging on the sand, her olive skin glowing in the sun.

BIG NEWS

We have just posted the Appendix.

Now you can see what we're babbling about and probably figure out how old we are.

Mind, some of you know and if you make fun of us we'll yell at you to get off our lawns.
The sunshine eased Ori from his doze. He could still hear laughter and splashing in the distance. On one side of him snoozed Balin and Dori and the other his husband lay on his stomach, arms folded to rest his head. Dwalin was not asleep but he looked relaxed and calm.

“Yer lookin’ so tasty in this sunligh’, love.”

Ori giggled, rolled over and nuzzled his face in Dwalin’s hair, warm and rough across his back. There was a splash. Ori turned but saw nothing.

Then, as he watched, a very large fish leapt out of the water and plunged back in.

Curious, Ori rose and went to the water’s edge. The water was clear and sparkling. He bent and examined the sand and the water lapping a little on it. Something caught his eye. He picked it up a strange stone. It was flat and a foggy blue and was light for its size.

“Wha’ yeh found, love?” Dwalin was at his side.

“I don’t know. Here.”

Dwalin took it and looked it over.

“It’s ‘n old piece o’ glass. Been in th’ water f’r many years rollin’ over stones an’ th’ water movin’ it abou’ makes th’ edges soft like this.”

“It’s beautiful,” Ori stated honestly.

Ori waded in further, half bent and peering down at the lake bed. He moved slowly. A tiny crab wiggled from the sand and sidled away. Ori stood still. Minuscule fish gathered about his ankles and nibbled at them, eliciting a chuckle. He tried catching one but it proved fruitless.

“Too small f’r eatin’, love.”

“But they would be fun to draw.”

“Be righ’ back.”

Ori nodded vaguely, too caught up in his investigations. There were the tiny fish, there were more little crabs and more crawfish. Strange grasses waved languorously under the water along with the occasional slimy, weedy plant. He knelt down and crawled along the sand, the water not far from his face. The stones beneath the water were tumbled smooth and showed off their muted colors.

The sound of laughter recalled him. He looked up. Dwalin stood next to Balin and Dori. All three watched him, considerably amused.

Dwalin put something down beside them and came out into the water. Ori pretended to be miffed and, rising to his knees, used both hands to send a respectable amount of water Dwalin’s way. It was then he realized his mistake. Dwalin’s face turned delightedly feral and he pounced at Ori, who leapt to his feet and slogged through the water to escape. Dwalin didn’t follow, but dove out into deeper water. Ori looked for him in all directions. Nothing. He turned and looked out at the lake. The waters gave no hint. He looked back to the inn. Everything was quiet. He didn’t know what to think.

He was grabbed around the waist and plunged down into the water before he could even scream. His eye opened reflexively and Dwalin’s grin was in his face. Ori wrenched forward and kissed that grin hard. They resurfaced, still locked in the kiss, and Dwalin set him down.

“I was almost going to worry,” said Ori finally.

Dwalin chuckled evilly.

“Jus’ when yeh though’ it was safe t’ go int’ th’ water, eh?”

Ori caught his hand and Dwalin pulled him toward the shore.

“C’mon, love. Yeh kin do yer drawin’ on th’ dock.”

Ori followed willingly. Dwalin stopped near Dori who tut-tutted at Dwalin for being ‘rough’. Ori giggled.

“It was fun, Dori.”

“Well, “ Dori began then shrieked as Ori leaned over to drip on him. “Go away, you horrid badger! It’s cold!”

Balin reached out to smack Dwalin’s butt with his book.

“Off wi’ yeh! Pair a’ wee pests!”

Dwalin laughed and scooped up a large, clear demijohn. He grabbed Ori’s hand and they returned to the end of the dock where Ori had leant to swim. Dwalin put his burdens down. Ori was delighted to see that Dwalin had brought his graphite pens, his sketch book and Balin’s magnifier.

Dwalin grinned and dropped back into the water, disappearing with the jar. Ori sat down and got his tools ready. Dwalin reappeared and put the jar before Ori. Now it was full of water and silt. The silt sifted down and Ori saw a couple of tiny fish as well as other creature. Ori plopped down on his stomach and peered into the jar.

“Now yeh kin draw ‘em.” Dwalin rested his chin on his folded arms on the edge of the dock.

Ori leaned forward to kiss him.

“Thank you, my dearest buffalo.”

Dwalin chuckled and watched as Ori frowned and quickly set to work, drawing the tiny fish.

Looking through the magnifier he could see their gills and caught almost invisible sparks of color on their scales. A crab had stuffed itself into a shell. Another creature looked like a large ant but was dragging a pile of debris that was somehow glued to its back. The sand held bits of mica that caught the sunlight and sparkled. Pieces of plants floated slowly to the bottom.

To Ori’s delight, when he finished drawing everything in the jar, Dwalin took it, dumped it out and disappeared again to refill it with other things that dwelt near the shore of the lake. Ori saw so many lovely, interesting creatures he had never known existed. He was utterly absorbed.

The light was changing, Ori realized and he looked up. Clouds had gathered, though it was still warm. Dwalin looked pleased and calm. He seemed to be quite happy watching Ori draw.

“Doesn’t this bore you?” Ori asked.

“Nah, it’s brilliant watchin’ yer hands jus’ flick about an’ there everythin’ is. Perfect like as life.”

Ori stared.

“My sketches aren’t perfect, silly!”

“Well, mebbe I ain’t th’ bes’ judge, bu’ they’re fine lookin’ t’ me.”

Ori blushed hotly, staring at his husband who was watching the sketch pad as one fascinated.

Dwalin looked up.

“Wha’, love?”

Ori sputtered then shook his head.

“I think I’m the luckiest dwarf in all Arda.”

“Nah, love, tha’s me.”

Ori laughed, “Shall we have a huge argument about it?”

Ori was about to reply when there was a sudden sharp breeze. He looked up. The clouds had darkened further.

“Uh-oh,” Dwalin said.

Ori gathered up his materials and offered Dwalin a hand as Dwalin hauled himself up on the dock. Dwalin poured the jar contents over the edge and rinsed the jar quickly.

“I think it’s going to rain,” Ori said, looking about. The breeze was more insistent now. Dwalin motioned with his chin. In the middle of the lake, a grey curtain had fallen. He and Dwalin hurried to the beach to gather their towels and umbrella.

Dwalin grabbed Dis’ foot.
“Up yeh get, lass.”

Dis cursed and peered out from under her ‘mat hat’. Dwalin pointed to the now swiftly moving rain coming at them.

She leapt to her feet and gathered her things.

“Brother,” Dwalin barked.

Balin’s eyes shot open.

“Beloved.” Balin caught Dori’s hand, waking him. Dori saw the rain marching toward them, squawked, and leapt up.

They were all hurrying up the grass to the deck when the cold rain caught them. Dori gave a squeal louder than Chopper ever could and scampered on his toes toward the inn. Dwalin snatched the sketch book from Ori and lobbed it with amazing accuracy, spinning over Dori’s head, safely into the inn. Dis growled with disgust as her hat became a tent and kept her from running. She ripped it off and her hair was instantly flowing with water.

The four of them pushed into the inn, almost bursting the door frame as they all tried to squeeze in at once. Ori tumbled to the floor and sat there giggling until Dwalin hoisted him up. Balin took Brandy out of her bowl and put her into his dressing gown pocket. The kittens and their mother were around them instantly, the kittens mewing and licking drops off their feet. Rutile scurried over to Dis and bobbed about her, avoiding the water. Dis burst out laughing as Erda hurried in.

“Oh! Yer all soaked to the skin.”

Dis looked down at herself and shook her head.

“I don’t understand how I can be more wet than I was in the water.”

“Wait a moment, dearie. We’ll have you dry in a tic. Jaki! Kali! Isi!”

Erda summoned her badgers and they arrived, armed with fresh towels to rub down their bedraggled guests.

There was shouting from outside and Ori turned to see the kettlewell crowd moving towards them. They were not moving very quickly, as if they had given up any hope of outrunning the rain. Gimli and Sigrid carried towels and baskets and other accoutrements. Thorin carried Fili and Kili.

Perhaps carried was too nice a term.

He had Kili ass-backward over one shoulder and was towing Fili pretty much around the neck.

“Don’t worry!” Thorin called. “I saved them!”

“Idad Thorin!” Kili objected.

“Let me…I can walk myself…Idad!” Fili sputtered. “This stopped being funny when you were a hundred forty!”

“On the contrary, sister-son,” said Thorin grandly. “This never stops being funny.”

Some of the costumes weathering the dunking and subsequent storm better than others. Fili’s and Sigrid’s suits were colorfast for all their brightness, but Kili looked like a bunch of overcooked spinach. Gimli arrived holding a towel around his waist. Given that Ori could see every hair on Gimli’s belly, he could just imagine the suit had become transparent. Legolas would likely approve.

Thorin turned to Gimli with a towel in hand.

“Come here, our Gimmers. Let’s dry your hair before that wool starts to shrink.”

“Baaaaah,” said Gimli, but he allowed Thorin to sponge off the worst of it before Gimli turned to go upstairs.

Dori winced.

“We’re terribly sorry, Bombur. We seem to have tracked the lake through your foyer.”

Bombur laughed.

“A little water and a little sand? It’s nothing!”

Erda agreed. “In this house, anything tha’ don’t include a nose bleed with a split lip on top is very minor indeed.”

“We apologize in advance, however,” said Bombur. “The way the wind is picking up, any nearby travelers will likely stop here for the night. You may have to share the dinner table.”

Dis was scolding and toweling off Kili somewhat violently.
Thorin chuckled, tucking Sigrid into a dry towel and nudging her toward the stairs.
“As long as we don’t have to share our beds.”
“And here I was, rather hoping,” said Bilbo.
Ori had not heard the hobbit enter, but suddenly he stood close behind Thorin with a towel draped over his arm.
Obviously Thorin had no heard him either. He turned and looked down, startled.
“Hullo,” said Bilbo. “I’ve brought you a majestically large towel. Even matches those pretty blue eyes.”

Before Thorin could react, Bilbo stretched the towel over Thorin’s shoulders like a cloak.

“You’re welcome,” said Bilbo. He winked and turned back toward the kitchen. Frodo darted toward him in a panic.

“Uncle?” he asked, sticking his fingers in his mouth like a much younger pebble.
“Yes, my lad. They’re all back, safe and sound.”
When they had gone, Bombur said, “You know, Thorin, you can always tell Bilbo not to talk to you like that. Especially as, if you don’t, he will likely continue to do so.”
Thorin shook his head.

“He… It’s just… He shouldn’t startle a warrior that way.”
“I’d venture to say, if he thought for a moment that you’d hurt him, then he wouldn’t.”
“How can he know that?”
“Bilbo reads people very quickly and very well. It’s probably why he’s still alive.”

Ori retrieved his sketchbook from beneath the reception desk.

"And dwarrow don’t," Bofur was fond of saying.

Ori started looking at random and realized he would probably do so all the rest of the afternoon if he didn't pick something and sit down with it.

Bilbo and Frodo sat at a table in the next room with large notebook open in front of them. A rather odd stuffed animal sat on the table, supervising.

"Where did we leave off yesterday? What did I write?"
Frodo peered at the book with a grave expression and read aloud:
"Mr. Underhill went to the market, because he wanted apples for pie."

"Very good. And what did you write after that?"

"On the way he dropped his yellow basket."

"That doesn't bode well, does it."

"As he bent to pick it up, a faunt took it an’ ran down the road."

"Gracious! She stole his yellow basket!"

"Uh huh!"

"Then what happened?"

"Mr. Underhill sat down and cried. Poor Mr. Underhill. He cried and cried. Then he got hungry. He went to the market and bought another basket and apples and went home to make pie."

"Very good," Bilbo praised. "And I see you drew an illustration to go with it. Though… this isn't Mr. Underhill, is it?"

"No, that's the monster that ate the naughty faunt."

"Ah. Those aren't terribly thick on the ground in the Shire."

"It was there 'cause it got lost."

"In the Shire?"

"It could happen."

"Yes, we shall just have to suffer a difference of opinion. Now, here is your next sentence."

Bilbo wrote across the top of the facing page. "What does this say?"

"Two ponies grazed in a field. The sun was high in the sky. They decided to look for shade."

"You can take it from there, I trust?"

"Yes, Uncle Bilbo."

"Good lad."

Bilbo looked up at Ori and smiled. He rose, patting Frodo on the shoulder to encourage him, and left the faunt alone with the pen and ink.

"Mister Ori, please come and have a seat."

Ori joined him at two comfortable old chairs in the corner with a small table between. The numerous rings in the wood tabletop spoke of years of guests curling up there with a cup of tea and a good book.

"That's a very novel approach to teaching reading and writing," said Ori. "Certainly more interesting than copying."

"He likes stories. Besides, we don't always have access to a lot of printed books when we're on the road, but we always have a notebook. Since we got here, he's been asking me to teach him read khuzdul. I think he may be getting a little ahead of himself."

"You read khuzdul?" Ori asked Bilbo, agog. "It's always been against khazad law to teach khuzdul to anyone but a dwarf. Up until now anyway."

"Things have changed, have they? Glad to hear it. Anyway, I can't speak it, only read and write it. I love dwarven epics, but westron translations aren't widely available. Once I had read all the translations, I had to do something, didn't I."

"But, who taught you to read and write it?"

"I did. Language is my gift."

"So you taught yourself khuzdul? Great Mahal!"

"Language is a code to unravel like any other. Once you have the key, you unlock the code. There were just enough bits of knowledge for me to gather to make the key."

"That sounds like a lot of work!"

"What would you have done?"

Ori thought about it, then grinned.

"Taught myself khuzdul. I like codes as well."

"Exactly. Nothing stops a scholar."

"Did you want to learn to speak it?"

"I'm not entirely sure. I'd sound ridiculous, like a mouse trying to yodel. With my luck, I'd hail some great strapping dwarf like Mister Dwalin in the street and accidentally call him a doorknob."

They laughed and Bilbo shook his head.

"Besides, I've only ever translated the language for my own edification. I have no way of knowing how good it is. I should hate to be examined by a true proficient."

Ori went to the shelf and took down a book at random. He handed it to Bilbo.

"Can you translate this?"

Bilbo read the spine and his eyes sparkled with recognition.

"Oh, but this is hardly a test, is it? I love this story. 'I found myself in a dark wood wandering.' Down and down he goes into the earth, and finally finds That Which Cannot Be Named embedded in the ice, awaiting the great battle to signal the remaking of the world."

"That's a very novel approach to teaching reading and writing," said Ori. "Certainly more interesting than copying."

"He likes stories. Besides, we don't always have access to a lot of printed books when we're on the road, but we always have a notebook. Since we got here, he's been asking me to teach him read khuzdul. I think he may be getting a little ahead of himself."

"You read khuzdul?" Ori asked Bilbo, agog. "It's always been against khazad law to teach khuzdul to anyone but a dwarf. Up until now anyway."

"Things have changed, have they? Glad to hear it. Anyway, I can't speak it, only read and write it. I love dwarven epics, but westron translations aren't widely available. Once I had read all the translations, I had to do something, didn't I."

"But, who taught you to read and write it?"

"I did. Language is my gift."

"So you taught yourself khuzdul? Great Mahal!"

"Language is a code to unravel like any other. Once you have the key, you unlock the code. There were just enough bits of knowledge for me to gather to make the key."

"That sounds like a lot of work!"

"What would you have done?"

Ori thought about it, then grinned.

"Taught myself khuzdul. I like codes as well."

"Exactly. Nothing stops a scholar."

"Did you want to learn to speak it?"

"I'm not entirely sure. I'd sound ridiculous, like a mouse trying to yodel. With my luck, I'd hail some great strapping dwarf like Mister Dwalin in the street and accidentally call him a doorknob."

They laughed and Bilbo shook his head.

"Besides, I've only ever translated the language for my own edification. I have no way of knowing how good it is. I should hate to be examined by a true proficient."

Ori went to the shelf and took down a book at random. He handed it to Bilbo.

"Can you translate this?"

Bilbo read the spine and his eyes sparkled with recognition.

"Oh, but this is hardly a test, is it? I love this story. 'I found myself in a dark wood wandering.' Down and down he goes into the earth, and finally finds That Which Cannot Be Named embedded in the ice, awaiting the great battle to signal the remaking of the world."
Ori was impressed. As far as he knew, this book had never been translated. The original was kept in Brur's office, having been hand-carried from Khazad-dûm. Only one, untranslated, copy had ever left dwarf hands as far as Ori knew, unless there was suddenly a thriving black market for dwarven literature.

"Lord Elrond let you translate his copy at Imladris?" Ori asked. "He had sworn never to attempt it himself, since it's actually a prophetic text. It was given as a gift because he admired the illustrations."

"Oh dear!" Bilbo said. "I beg your pardon, I seem to have overstepped. I didn't actually ask for permission to translate it. I had no idea it was a restricted book. You may have my copy, if you wish, but please don't destroy it."

"I wouldn't destroy a book!" Ori yelped.

"But is that not what is proscribed in the Great Law of the Khuzd? 'Better destroyed than in the hands of the outsider'?"

"That is one translation," Ori admitted, "but the word the scribe used for 'destroy' can also mean 'put away' or 'make vanish'. It's not the emphatic word you would use to mean 'obliterate'."

"Ah, I see. 'Obliterate your enemies, don't just make them vanish.'"

"Exactly. Though, I wonder what was going on all that time ago to make the scribe choose that word. Dwarrow aren't usually so coy when they mean business."

"It does rather sound like someone was building a loophole, doesn't it."

Ori looked up and saw Thorin and Dwalin stood in the doorway and he realized they had likely heard the entire conversation. By the size of Master Baggins' eyes, Ori thought he'd just realized it as well.

Bilbo scrambled to his feet, bowing.

"I beg your pardon, your majesty. I hope I have not give fatal offense."

Thorin looked like he wanted to say something reassuring but simply couldn't get the words out of his mouth. Dwalin rescued him.

"No need fr beggin', Master Baggins. Thorin was just sayin' it's flatterin' t' think yeh'd go through all tha' jus' t' read dwarven stories. Yeh enjoyed them, then?"

"Oh, very much so! Truly, I think, as you've decided to be more open with your literature, they should be translated by a native speaker and printed. My publisher, Mr. Denethor, is always on the search for new material. And now I'm going to stop talking, if that's all right with you."

Ori laughed.

Bilbo stared at him.

"Said I something amiss?"

"You sound like me!"

"I'm sure you don't babble at King Thorin!"

"Constantly. And when I'm not, I'm babbling at Dwalin."

"I like yer babblin'," said Dwalin.

"I...," Thorin started, then paused, clearly amazed to find himself expressing an idea to Bilbo, with whom he couldn't even make eye contact without blushing and stammering. He cleared his throat and continued, looking at Ori the entire time. "I have doubts as to the widespread desire for our works in the non-dwarven world."

"I like them," said Frodo brightly from the table.

Thorin smiled down at the faunt.

"Do you? What do you like about them?"

"I like hearing about how Durin goes away, but keeps coming back to help his people. He never goes away forever."

"Oh, Frodo," Bilbo sighed.

"Not like Mama and Papa," Frodo continued, biting his lip. "Uncle Bilbo says they're looking out for me, but it's not... They can see me, but I can't see them."

Thorin nodded.

"Not terribly helpful, is it? I wish when I spoke to my parents I could hear their replies."
“Are they with Yavanna?”
“They’re with her husband Mahal. You would say ‘Aüle’.”
Frodo frowned.
“If Yavanna and Mahal are married, don’t they live together? Do they not like each other or something?”
“That’s a good point,” Thorin conceded. “Maybe it’s like living in the same house but wanting to have your own rooms instead of having to share.”
Frodo giggled.
“They used to sleep in bunkbeds!”
“Yes, that would make them want their own rooms. That way they don’t have to fight about who slept in the top bunk.”
Frodo grabbed up the stuffed animal.
“This is Gorgo. He’s a lion and a dragon and a pigeon.”
Thorin went forth to be properly introduced.
“Well met, Gorgo. So, Frodo, Gorgo both hunts and breathes fire?”
“And coos.”
“I see.”
“My mama made him.”
“He’s a rather fearsome beast.”
“He’s meant to keep me safe at night but, when you think about it, a lion and a dragon in your bed isn’t really safe at all. Plus, the pigeon would poop on the sheets.”
“The mess would be dreadful,” Thorin agreed.
“I like you,” Frodo announced. “You’re smart about things.”
“Not always, but thank you anyway.”
“My Uncle Bilbo is smart, too. You should marry him. Do you have bunkbeds?”
“Aye,” said Dwalin helpfully. “We’ve bunkbeds aplenty in Erebor. We’re dwarrow. We kin make anythin’.”
Ori had a horrifying realization of himself at Frodo’s age.
Oh, great, Mahal, he thought, the poor pebble’s me.
How did Dori cope?
With a great deal of patience, he could only imagine.
The sound of thunder rolled through, and on its heel the inn’s front door opened and they heard a very loud, very commanding, very familiar voice.
“Master Bombur, we have arrived.”
Then Bombur’s smooth tones.
“Your majesty! Always a pleasure.”
Ori went to the doorway.
Thranduil, his cloak streaming water, stood in the foyer, looking majestically mussed. Legolas and Tauriel entered behind him, no better off.
“We will require accommodations, Master Bombur. We seem to have miscalculated the ferocity of the incoming storm.”
“Of course, of course. We’ll stoke the fire in the grates in your rooms and perhaps some warming soup and wine.”
“Your lake-facing rooms will do, Master Bombur,” said Thranduil, completely ignoring the self-made puddle in which he stood.
“I’m afraid all those rooms are taken, your majesty,” said Bombur pleasantly.
“No matter,” said Thranduil, “tell the occupants to move.”
Thorin stood in the doorway beside Ori.
“I’ll arm wrestle you for them,” he said.
Thranduil whirled around, spraying drops in a wide circle, a look of surprise on his face for less than an instant before he pulled his shoulders back and peered down from his relatively great height.
“Oakenshield. What a treat.”
Behind him Legolas rolled his eyes and gratefully accepted a towel from Jaki.
“It’s good to see you again, King Thorin. How are you keeping?”
Thorin returned his sly smile.
“I’m keeping well, Prince Legolas, thank you.”
Thranduil accepted a towel, but did not dry himself. Ori supposed it wasn’t becoming to blot oneself in front of the peasants.
“So this,” Thranduil observed, “is where you have chosen to break mourning.”
“As you see,” replied Thorin with a smile. “Can you think of a more beautiful spot for it?”
Ori counted down from three and, on cue, Dori swept in with a little cry of delight.
“Thrandy!”
Thranduil’s face and posture underwent startling transformations.
His shoulders lowered and he gave a lazy, sideways grin.
“Ah, Dori, I see Oakenshield had the good sense to bring you.”
“He’s clever like that,” Dori cooed, took the towel out Thranduil’s hand and began blotting him with gusto. “Whatever are you doing, standing there in wet clothes? Naughty things! Elves weren’t meant to catch their deaths of cold! Come, there are plenty of free rooms upstairs. Erda and her dearest little badgers are preparing them as we speak. Let’s get you dried off.”
Almost in spite of himself, Thranduil was carried upstairs on the tide of Dori.
Ori thought, They probably don’t have any dry clothes with them. I wonder if Dori will let Thranduil borrow his mattress?
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Hungry? Yes, so are we after such rompings in the last chapter. We’ll happily wait while you get a snack before beginning. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

And….. Cinder1013 seems to be stalking us and seems to know exactly what goes on in this chapter! Shout out to Cinder for incredible prescience!

Ori and Dwalin came downstairs from changing for dinner. Dori had insisted they dress up as they ‘had company’. Ori had been more than pleased with the pale lavender tunic and breeches. They were simply cut but decorated with silver accents. Dwalin looked wonderful in a black sleeveless tunic and a grey kilt. Ori’s stomach rumbled rudely and they entered the dining room. The younger set were already there, larking about like yesterday.

“Ori, “ called Sigrid. “Come and see what Fili’s found for you.”

Exchanging a smile with Dwalin, Ori went over to look. The something turned out to be a framed water color on the far wall. Ori looked it over. Fili pointed out that it was, as Kali had told them, a picture of the palm tree. There was a man painted beside it to show the size. Ori was amazed and tried to imagine how such a plant, a tree, he corrected his brain, could weather storms. The long trunk with only the fronds at the top were alien to one who had grown up only seeing the forests around the mountain.

“I know,” Sigrid elaborated. “It’s a wonder they don’t just fall down all the time.”

There was shout. Ori turned and saw that Kili, Gimli, and the younger Urs had started a game of pop the whip, away from the long dining table. All the younger set had stayed barefoot and it was just as well. That many sets of boots all at once would sound like an orc invasion.

Ori made his way over to the group at the window seat and stood next to Dwalin who leaned against the window frame. Thorin, Dis, Dori, and Balin lounged there and they were chatting idly, occasionally commenting on the storm outside, and sipping something golden out of small wine glasses.

Dori was radiant in a powder blue robe, a twin of the one he had wore to his first tea party. This was accented with a deep blue, “Meridian,” he announced when Ori asked. Balin’s suit was in meridian blue with the tiniest stripes of powder blue. Dis was cool and summery in a lovely form-clinging dress of fiery orange. Thorin wore a pewter shirt and deep maroon breeches. Ori stifled a smile and snickered to Dwalin about ‘heavily armed cranberries’.

Unfortunately, Thorin’s hearing was excellent.

He shot Ori a look of horror. He stood abruptly.
“Ori, where did you hear that?”

“Um… I don’t seem to… er.”

Thorin stalked over and Ori was reminded how tall Thorin actually was. Especially if the king was looming over one with a frown.

“Were you listening at the keyhole?”

Ori took a big step behind his husband. In a very small voice Ori squeaked, “Sort of.”

Thorin walked around Dwalin, who had started to laugh, standing up from the window frame.

“And was anyone else ‘sort of’ listening as well?”

Ori stepped in front of Dwalin. He was not going to stop moving now.

“Well…”

“It was Nori, wasn’t it,” Thorin said, grasping him gently by the shoulder to make him stay put.

“Kind of,” said Ori, glad that he wasn’t Fili or Kili, or he was sure Thorin would have had him by the ear.

Dori scolded Ori. “Horrid badger! You never learn your lesson!”

Balin and Dis were as useless as Dwalin by now.

“I didn’t write anything down!” Ori cried in his own defense.

“That hardly signifies, does it, pet?” Dori asked.

Thorin shook his head.

“It does for scribes,” said Thorin then groaned. “And Ori’s done it again.”

“Done what?” Dori asked.

“Got me defending him without asking me to defend him,” said Thorin, throwing his arm around Ori’s slight shoulders and giving him a quick, and not at all painful squeeze.

“Sorry,” said Ori.

“It’s his gift, Thorin,” Dwalin finally managed.

“Yes,” said Thorin dryly, “most likely from Mahal.”

At that moment Thranduil swept in. His posture and movement were majestic but the effect was completely spoiled by the clothes that had been found for him. The elf king was barefoot and clad in a simple white robe. Its design led Ori to think that Bombur and Erda had hastily sewn together two sheets. This was further enhanced by the trim on the bottom of the robe with its thicker edge and tiny stripe of white satin ribbon. This ensemble was bound at the waist with a dark red satin rope ending in tassels that looked remarkably like the cords tying back the curtains.

_Hmmm_, Ori thought. _How like him to accessorize. He saw it in the window and just had to have it._
Legolas and Tauriel entered behind the elf king. They were similarly attired, but as well as white sheets, the inn appeared to possess sheets in pale blue and pale green, respectively.

Dori rose immediately and, going to the elf king with both hands outstretched in welcome, drew Thranduil to come and sit with the group at the window. Balin filled another glass and offered it.

“Sherry, yer majesty?”

“Oh, do, dearest Thandy,” Dori urged. “I’m sure it will warm you right up. What a dreadful downpour to be caught in.”

“Thank you,” Thranduil said graciously.

Kili shouted a welcome to Tauriel and Legolas and in moments the two elves were forcibly involved in a game they had never played and did not understand.

Ori glanced at Fili and Sigrid who had come over to join them. Both were trying to stifle giggles.

“He looks regal even in bedding,” Sigrid murmured.

“Well, at least this way, he doesn’t have to change before going to bed.” Fili agreed. “Actually, if you think about it, he’s in bed no matter where he goes.”

“Hush,” Ori hissed. “Elves are supposed to have very acute hearing.”

At this moment, Bilbo and Frodo entered. Frodo whispered loud enough for all to hear:

“The elves have such tiny feet! How do they keep from falling over?”

“Eru holds them up by the tops of their heads,” Bilbo replied and the dwarrow tried not to snort in unison. Master Bombur sailed in and politely introduced Bilbo and Frodo to the elf king and his entourage of two, who had somehow detached themselves from the game.

Frodo bowed gravely.

“Mae Govannen,” he said.

Thranduil looked down in amusement. The faunt reached a bit past his knee.

“You speak Sindarin, do you?”

“Only a little, to be polite, your majesty. Lady Galadriel taught me.”

“Of course she did.”

“She was nice. She shared her elderberry jam with me.”

“Is that so?” said Thranduil, turning to speak to Balin.

Legolas knelt down next to Frodo.

“Ada is jealous. The lady never shares her jam with him.”

“Is it because he’s naughty?”

“Yes. Very.”
Ori thought Thranduil must have heard all of this but didn’t deign to acknowledge it. Ori turned his attention to the table. He was surprised to see that it was set completely differently than last night.

The entire table was covered by a heavy cream-colored linen cloth. The place setting consisted of a single bright red folded napkin beside a golden painted wooden charger with a blue bowl placed on it. To the right of this was a porcelain cup fired to a shiny crimson with gold figures on the sides. At the top of the setting lay, what looked like to Ori, a pair of plain brown pin-straight twigs and a strangely shaped blue and white spoon.

Ten large brightly colored thick mats lined the middle of the table and these were interspersed with small bottles and bowls which Ori decided were condiments.

Great loops of red velvet swag festooned the ceiling above the table, hung with the most beautiful gold and frosted glass lanterns, all painted with tiny scenes Ori could not quite make out. There were red tassels hanging at all points and a long tassel at the bottom of each.

It was very beautifully arranged and entirely foreign to him.

Erda entered and announced grandly, “Dinner is served!”

There was a general scramble to the table, except for Thranduil who moved gracefully and Dori, who took his arm with one of his, and Balin’s with the other.

Ori sat between Bilbo and Dwalin and facing Tauriel, Kili, Gimli, Legolas, Fili and Sigrid.

Bombur stepped aside and the tureens of soup arrived, steaming.

These were placed on the table and the lids lifted off to great clouds of spicy scents.

To Ori’s surprise, teapots arrived next and tea was poured into their cups, a dark, slightly bitter brew, different from the teas of last night, and drunk without honey or milk.

Ori sipped. It was nothing like the tea he was used to, but he couldn’t say he disliked it.

They began to help themselves to the soup, though the puzzlement grew as they saw what they were helping themselves to. It was a golden brown broth with small, white cubes, slightly discolored from the broth.

“Hot and sour soup,” said Bombur with a rather mischievous smile.

“What’s in it?” Gimli asked suspiciously.

“Something with a bite,” said Bombur unhelpfully.

Gimli peered at his bowl from a bit of a distance, as if he expected something with teeth to pop out and nip him on the nose.

Erda swatted her husband lightly with a serviette.

“Honestly, dearest! You’re worse than the badgers! It’s a spicy soup with sliced pork and peppers and some ginger and various other ingredients, none of which can taste you back. So dig in!”

With what? Ori wondered.

He peered up at Dwalin who looked around the place setting, shrugged and picked up the strange spoon. It seemed to be made of some sort of ceramic and the broad bowl was flat along the bottom. However, in practical terms, it worked just fine.

The soup was hot in both senses of the word, but once Ori got past the heat the broth was velvety, and he could detect sesame and other tastes completely new. Unfortunately there was no raita to calm this heat.

“Is this a flower?” he asked, scooping up the item to show Bilbo.

“Yes, it’s a day lily.”

“So, it’s edible.”

“A lot of flowers are.”

“Really?”

He didn’t know what he was expecting. He supposed he thought it would be like eating daisies or something, but it was nothing like that.

“Care to munch on the centerpiece?” Dwalin muttered.

Ori elbowed him without looking up.

“You stay out of this.”

“Uncle Bilbo! Stop!” Frodo cried.

“I wouldn’t have to swab you down at all if you could only find your mouth the first time.”

Ori leaned over and said to Frodo, “Be thankful he doesn’t clean you off with spit.”

“Ewwww!” Frodo cried, though it gave Bilbo time to finish his work.

“Or jus’ lick yer face,” said Dwalin helpfully. “Tha’s wha’ goats do.”

Bilbo said. “See, there are lots of worse things I could do.”

Frodo stared at them as if they’d all lost their minds, but quickly went back to eating.

“Don’t want my face licked,” he muttered around a mouthful.

The soup was cleared away and bowls of rice appeared in their place. This was a different kind than last night’s, white and fragrant, but unspiced.

“Is this to eat by itself?” Ori asked.

“No, this is the base for the dish,” said Bombur.

The platters arrived next with a sort of stew consisting of tangy sausage slices, mushrooms, some sort of greens that looked rather like celery with much darker, slightly thicker leaves, diced onions, ginger and garlic. There were also rounds of a slightly sharp, white vegetable, rather like a tuber, Ori thought.

“That’s bamboo,” said Bilbo. “Most fascinating. It’s actually a kind of grass. The inner bark is edible.”
“I don’t really like green food,” said Ori.

“It’s not green, it’s white.”

So there, Ori thought.

“How do we eat it?”

“Scoop some on top of the rice.”

There were scoops for the rice. There were scoops for the stew. There was no way to get this combination to his mouth.

“Ummm, Bilbo…”

“Sticks.”

“Sticks.”

He reached over and picked these up. They weren’t raw twigs, but actually very thin, turned wood, a matched set, slightly thicker at one end, tapering to a rounded point at the other.

“How?”

“Oh,” said Frodo. “Like this.”

And he picked up his sticks, put them in his hand like a pair of scissors and started shoveling food into his mouth at a rate that would do Fili and Kili proud.

Ori felt something that might have been a tiny whine escape his throat.

“Here,” said Bilbo. “Think about it like you think about drawing with two graphite pens in the same hand.”

“Oh,” said Ori.

Bilbo constructed and deconstructed the proper arrangement in Ori’s hand, then in Dwalin’s. The size difference between a hobbit’s hand and Dwalin’s was almost surreal, but Bilbo worked very efficiently. When he put the sticks back together he said, “Now, this top stick is the only one that moves. The other one is stationary. You move these together like pincers.”

Dwalin did so in the air and then raised an eyebrow, but he seemed to understand pincers well enough and he could make the proper stick move in the appropriate manner.

“Now you pick up food with it and put it in your mouth,” said Bilbo with a teasing look in his eye.

Dwalin managed to pick up a single grain of rice and looked at it, then looked at Bilbo and said, “This is goin’ t’ be one fuckin’ long meal. I migh’ need a knife, love. It’s a bit too much t’ put in me mouth all at once.”

Ori couldn’t think of a reply he could say in front of Dori and blushed hotly.

Dwalin roared with laughter.
Ori very gingerly dipped his sticks into the bowl and raised a grain of rice on his own.

Bilbo shook his head, chuckling.

“Really, we don’t want you to starve. Look.”

He held the sticks very close together and scooped up some rice and stew on it and put it all in his mouth neatly without dropping a grain.

Ori nearly collapsed in relief.

“Thank you! I think you just saved my life.”

Thorin said, “Bombur, where is this food from?”

“The Ice Bay of Forochel, far to the north and west. They mainly grow root vegetables and hunt, but they trade extensively with other cultures to round out their diets. The foot is complex, I think in part because they don’t have a great deal of any one thing.”

Ori very earnestly tried to use his sticks as he was taught, though it was slow going. Dori, Dis, and Balin had seen Bilbo’s ‘shovel’ method and were getting along but only just.

Thorin looked extremely pleased with himself as he had retained his soup spoon and was making sure Dwalin saw just how much he enjoyed his dinner. Dwalin seemed to have got the hang of using the sticks properly by watching Bifur and Bofur with eagle eyes, and was sneering at Thorin.

Sigrid and Fili had copied the youngest Urs and Frodo and brought their faces down almost level with their food and were managing better but were giggling at each other too hard to get much food into their mouths.

Gimli had gone with a stick-in-each-hand method, to little effect and Kili had given up any pretense of civility and was merely stabbing at the food randomly, sticks held together in one hand like a knife.

Tauriel watched Kili do this, at first in silent but growing amusement. Finally, she put a gentle hand on his ‘stabbing’ wrist.

“Let me help you with that,” she suggested.

Finally, when ten minutes or so had passed and only a few of the guests had made much headway with the stew, the Urs took pity and Jaki was sent out to bring back forks.

“Thank Mahal,” Kili groaned, clunking his head on the table. “I’m so hungry!”

Tauriel giggled. “I’m pleased, I thought I was going to have to hand feed you.”

Ori watched as this thought struck Kili fully. He looked up at Tauriel, grinned, and ‘accidentally’ pushed the fork off the table and onto the floor.

“But I didn’t get a fork.” He gazed up at her, his eyes wide and puppy-like and a winsome smile.

Tauriel gasped then tried not to giggle, failed and took up her sticks.

“No matter, dear dwarf. I am proficient with these. You may have my fork.”
The full show of Kili’s bottom lip was truly magnificent.

“Thank you, Tauriel,” said Dis. “I was afraid that at any moment he would simply eat with his hands. Again.”

“A-MAD!” Kili cried out, horrified.

Dis was not impressed.

“Please, I remember when you tried to eat your own feet. When that proved impractical you went after Fili’s.”

“His food?” Tauriel asked.

“His feet,” Dis clarified. “Fili still has a scar at the back of his right heel.”

Fili frowned, glanced down at his foot.

“I thought I cut that on iron or something.”

“It’s distinctly tooth-shaped, I assure you,” said Dis.

This led to all kinds of acrobatics as Fili tried to look at his heel without falling out of his chair.

After the forks arrived, dinner picked up pace. The stew gave way to platters of sliced roasted duck and chicken with a complex, salty glaze, and bowls of sliced carrots and another white-ish vegetable Ori couldn’t identify. This vegetable was cooked, but somehow still crispy.

“This isn’t bamboo.”

“No, it’s called hikama,” said Erda. “You can also eat it raw and it tastes completely different.”

Ori had reached the point where he couldn’t protest the vegetables much more, especially as he kept putting them in his mouth. He couldn’t decide if it was the strange vegetables, the strange gravy on the vegetables or that he was almost humiliatedly grateful for a decent eating utensil.

When these platters were empty, Bombur sent for dessert.

The younger set cheered. Their elders looked surprised.

“I don’t think I could put another bite in my mouth,” said Thorin.

Bilbo opened his mouth to say something, but settled for just chuckling in a filthy manner.

“I think you’ll like this,” said Erda. “It’s very light.”

Dessert arrived much as the fried globes the night before, in pretty footed bowls. But this dessert was cubed and white and… wiggled with the slightest movement.

“That is vaguely disturbing,” said Thranduil.

“Now, dear,” said Dori, patting his wrist. “We’re all going to try it.”

It was cold. Ori supposed he should have expected that. It tasted like almonds.

“It’s so light!” Dori cried delightedly. “What is it?”
“Flavored gelatin,” said Erda.

“Calf’s foot?”

“Agar. I’ve hung my last bag of calf’s foot jelly to seep,” Erda vowed. “This I buy from a peddler and it’s ever so easy. Calf’s foot just takes forever.”

“It’s what?” Ori asked.

“Agar” said Erda. “It comes from seaweed.”

Ori sighed. He was doomed to eat green food even when he couldn’t see it.

Dessert was consumed and once more the younger set got up and cleared the table. Ori noticed that Dori had Thranduil well in hand, so the elf king did not notice that his youngest son and guard were helping to carry away plates and platters to the kitchen. Kili and Fili took up their station at the sink as before. Sigrid taught Tauriel how to properly dry dishes with Ori. Gimli handed Legolas a broom and Ori hoped Thranduil wouldn’t notice that either.

The young Urs supervised, put away, and cleared things that were beyond the ken of their guests. They finished quickly and went back out to the dining room. Dwalin, Jaki, and Kali were seen to be rearranging the furniture. Except for the chairs and couches at the window seat, all other seats were pushed back against the far wall.

Bombur, Bifur, and Erda entered. Bombur carried his large drum, Bifur brought his pipes, and Erda had a balalaika, though not as large as the one Jani had brought to the mountain. Ori’s heart jumped. If there was going to be music, there might dancing and that meant he would be dancing with Dwalin. He looked over at his husband who winked back.

“Oh, Master Bombur,” cried Dori. “What a wonderful notion to while away the evening.”

There were shouts of agreement from the younger crowd as they began milling about. Fili and Kili disappeared upstairs in search of their fiddles.

Ori caught Dwalin’s eye and the warrior crossed the room, bearing down on him in a purposefully manner. Ori’s skin tingled and snippets of their times together flitted through his mind. Dwalin caught him up and Ori laughed.

“You’re going to shock Dori,” Ori warned his husband.

“Naah, he’s doin’ th’ pretty, keepin’ tha’ elf in a good temper. C’mon, I’m off t’ ge’ me viol.”

Ori went with him happily. They reached the stairs just as Balin came down them.

“I’ve our viols, brother,” Balin greeted them cheerfully and disappeared back into the dining room.

Ori grinned at Dwalin, who gave him a look then grabbed Ori around the waist, lifting him and shoving him against the wall next to a bookshelf. Ori squawked and snickered as his husband attacked his neck lustfully. Thus occupied they both looked up when Bofur passed them, saying,

“Oi! Get yerselves a room.”

“Fuck yerser’, Bofur,” Dwalin replied genially, as he slid Ori to his feet.
“Well, that answers that question,” Ori commented idly.

“Which one?” Dwalin asked, looking amused as he accompanied Ori back into the dining room.

“Well, before I climbed into the bath with you, I spent some time trying to think up ways to seduce you.”

Dwalin choked on a laugh.

“Oh aye? Wha’ yeh come up with?”

“I thought of leaving you a trail of clothes from the door to the bedroom where I would be languishing nude, but with my luck, Dori would have picked them all up then come in and scolded me for courting a cold.”

Dwalin nodded.

“Aye, yeh got ’im pegged. So, yeh thought o’ seducin’ me?”

“Why wouldn’t I? But every time I did think on it, all I could do was think how it could go wrong. Then I wondered about accosting you in the armory. You would shove me again the wall and I’d be there with my breeches down and someone would walk in. What do you say to someone in that situation? Now I know. You’d say, ‘fuck you’. I had an endless number of disastrous scenarios.”

“An’ wha’ changed?”

“I stopped thinking.”

Dwalin snickered and threw an arm around his shoulders. They crossed to the group at the window seat.

Balin was discussing the preparations for the coronation to Thranduil, who obviously liked ceremony and was listening with both interest and attention.

“Yes, I received my invitation. Both the paper and ink were most elegant. Your scribes have excellent hands.”

“Aye, ‘e does.” Dwalin grinned lecherously down at Ori.

Thranduil ignored them.

“Thank you,” Thorin managed to remain grave, “but you are better off thanking Ori. He managed the affair with the head librarian, Master Brur. I believe you met him at the funeral.”

“Ah,” The elvish king nodded. “A most fascinating conversationalist.”

The silvery eyes lazily found Ori and rested on him.

“And how did you find your management of the affair?”

“All those invitations?” Bilbo added. “That must have taken a small army of scribes.”

Ori grinned at Bilbo.

“There were ten of us. We were given the special paper. Parchment with silver threads run through and gold ink to inscribe them.”

“Seriously?” Bilbo asked. “Gold ink?”

“Mahal, yes!” Ori replied. He and Dwalin sat on the couch by the window seat, Dwalin leaning back with his arm behind Ori across the top of the couch.

Bilbo poured them each a glass of lemonade and put down the pitcher next to a bowl of ice on the table.

“They had to be in gold,” said Ori. “They were the invitations to the king of Erebor’s coronation after all. I thought I’d have a nervous collapse. What if I should make a blot? And worse, I had to supervise the other scribes, so I had to look confident, as if I actually knew what I was doing!”

“Yeh did know wha’ yeh were doin’, love,” said Dwalin.

“Yes, but I didn’t know I knew… or something,” said Ori, frowning. “Then the inevitable happened and I made a blot and I was almost hysterical and Master Brur told me to calm my arse down. Er… I mean.”

Bilbo chuckled and shook his head.

“I’ve heard the word before, Mister Ori.”

“Right. Of course you have. So, Master Brur took the paper and put it aside and said, ‘We’ll burn out th’ paper an’ extract th’ gold later, yeh silly badger’. And I thought: what a shalehead I am. We’re dwarrow! Of course we will!”

“Master Brur saves the day!” laughed Bilbo. “I meant to ask, because Frodo asked me, and it’s a good point actually. How do you see inside the mountain? Do you all have especially good eyesight? It must be terribly dark and enclosed.”

“Oh, no, it’s huge and filled with light,” said Ori. “Really, it’s like being outside except it’s… inside.”

“Inside,” Dwalin seconded, nodding.

Bilbo turned to Thorin, who had been watching the setting up and general malarky going on in the middle of the room and keeping Ori and Dwalin between him and the object of his anxiety.

“Inside, eh, King Thorin?”

“Grch,” Thorin replied politely.

Ori sighed inwardly and reflected that Fili must get his smoothness from his father, because, when it came to chatting up potential lovers, the upper line of Durin had their tongues sewn in wrong.

Thorin made a noise that sounded roughly like, “Excuse me.” and, to be blunt about it, fled.

When Ori caught up with him, Thorin had his eyes tightly closed and his forehead flat against the woodwork in the entryway.

“How about you, Thorin?”

When Thorin opened his eyes, he saw Ori watching him. “I am an idiot,” Thorin pronounced. “Mr. Baggins must think I am the most inane, inarticulate… orc in Arda.”
“He’s heard you talk, Thorin, just not to him.”

Thorin groaned. Ori continued.

“He knows you aren’t inarticulate.”

“That leaves inane and an orc. Which would you suggest I work on first?”

“I’d suggest going back to the common room before he comes looking for you.”

Thorin stood poleaxed for a moment before he sighed.

“Lead the way. I’m a king. I should be able to face this.”

“Bravely on, my king?” Ori teased.

Thorin took a deep, readying breath, his face a ridiculous mask of dignified resignation.

“Yes.”

When they returned, Dori was in the middle of room, ordering everyone about to make up sets for a circle dance. Bombur, Erda, Bofur and Bifur were tuning up with Kili and Balin. The younger Urs had been divided between the guests, except for Gimli who resolutely went over, seized Legolas by the hand, and dragged him into the far group.

Thorin sat firmly with Thranduil, Tauriel, Bilbo, and Dwalin.

Frodo arrived and cajoled Bilbo to dance with him and Ori smiled at Dwalin, who came over and offered his hand.

Dori passed them, busily telling Tauriel to “go and keep Kili in order” and took Thranduil’s hand and all but towed the king out to the middle and proceeded to demonstrate the figures to be performed. Thranduil’s surprise melted immediately into studied amusement and he acquiesced to gracefully step and twirl with Dori.

Ori glanced over and was relieved that Thorin had taken up Fili’s fiddle and was reading himself to play, Fili being occupied with helping Sigrid find out which holds were most comfortable to her.

They were so taken up with their experimental ‘holding’, Dori stamped over to poke at them, advising them loudly to leave room for Mahal’s hammer between them.

“I thought it already was,” said Sigrid, giggling.

“Yes,” said Fili. Then it hit him what she’d said. “What?”

The older set snickered a good deal over this. Fili only made it worse by stating roundly he didn’t think he needed Mahal’s hammer to dance. This brought more laughter his way when he recalled the other things that could carrying the name of “Mahal’s hammer”.

Bombur struck the drum and they started off in a country dance. The sets spun and rollicked about. The musicians teased the dancers, quickening and slowing the beat. Ori was dizzy from laughing and racing about by the time the tune came to an end. The dancers clapped and demanded more. They were indulged and all partners changed.

Ori found himself dancing with Isi. They had an enjoyable frolic, laughing at the sight of Dwalin ginning maniacally and swinging Gimli around dangerously. Gimli was equally determined to match his instructor. His hair whipped around and he leapt in time and speed.

Legolas danced with Sigrid. They were having a bad time as they were both too busy watching Gimli dancing as though he was decapitating a legion of orcs.

Fili and Kali attempted to dance perfectly in sync with each other as mirror images while Kili cat-called at them. Erda danced around her husband. King Thranduil, with Frodo in his arms, twirled gracefully, seeming quite pleased with the faunt, who squealed delightedly at being so high up.

Bilbo and Poli jumped around their set with abandon. Thorin watched Bilbo and made Fili’s fiddle sing in a most delightful way.

Two more rounds dances and the musicians required a rest and some refreshment. Kali, Jaki, and Vali disappeared then bounced back into the room with a large music box and the stiff punched paper to play in it.

“Here we are!” Jaki shouted.

Bifur gave a mighty moan and made as though he was going to enclose his head into his pipes carrying case. Bofur begged Erda to fetch every one ear plugs.

“Stop!” Isi cried. “It’s wonderful!”

The guests looked at each other in puzzlement.

“When everyone’s rested we’re going to teach you all a new dance,” Kali announced eagerly.

“No,” Bombur said, shaking his head.

There was an outcry from his children, which made their doting adad finally say that it was only those who might wish to learn need participate. The eldest boys set up the music box while the rest came to cajole as many of the guests as possible to come and try the new dance.

As Ori suspected from the start, it was the dance Omi and Loli had mentioned.

“This is the latest new music from Gondor,” Kali explained. “The group of musicians call themselves the White City Bang Crash. This piece of music is called “Ghostriders through Anórin’. Are we all ready?”

Despite the older Ur’s disgust, all the guest stood prepared to learn. Kali wound the box’s handle vigorously for a few moments and adjusted the enormous horn that was attached.

“What’s that for?” asked Sigrid.

Jaki grinned, “It helps the sound come out.”

The noise that issued was, to say the least, rather confusing. There was great deal of percussion mixed up with pipes and strings. For Ori, it soon resolved into a sort of bouncing melody. The younger Urs were already bobbing to this strange sound.

“Now,” said Kali purposely, stopping the machine. “This is the basic dance that goes with it. Isi, come here. Now, we stand like this.”

They stood side by side. On a count of three, they both slanted their bodies to the right and pointed their left toes, then repeated this move on the opposite side. Then they both twisted their bodies back and forth, while shoogling their shoulders as they sank into a squat and twisted back up again, which required the butt to shake around as well. There was a right kick and then a left kick. They turned faced each other. Kali bent forward towards Isi who bent back, then Kali bent back and Isi bent forward. The shoulder and butt movement was constant. After that the entire sequence was repeated.

“There,” Isi cried. “That all there is to it! It’s called the Beleghost body wag. Now, let’s do it to music.”

Jaki gave the machine a couple of more winds for good measure. Ori glanced at Dwalin, who looked as though he was trying desperately not to laugh. The music started and everyone gamely tried the ‘body wag’.

Ori didn’t have much of a problem doing it as the steps were next to nothing. The ‘wag’ was just so different and Ori was quite sure he looked as ridiculous as everyone else. Gimli and Legolas laughed and teased each other as they twisted up and down.

“No,” shouted Vali, “Add some hand movements. Any kind you want!”

Isi and Poli energetically waved their hands and arms above their heads as though signaling distant armies. Kali pinwheeled his own as he wagged with gusto. Thranduil, who had been gracefully rising and sinking, looked momentarily appalled. Kili and Tauriel threw themselves into the wildest flailings, so Fili and Sigrid had to duck away and scold them between shrieks of laughter.

Dwalin caught Ori’s hand and they wagged about. Ori realized that this odd dance worked extremely well with the music. Balin and Dori were both wagging their bottoms in a most energetic way. Thorin was grinning like a fool as he wagged with Frodo. Frodo was not as coordinated but very enthusiastic. Ori had to admit the king was quite good at the wag.

“We-“ Ori gasped around laughter, “we all looked like we’ve stood on wasps’ nests.”

“Or we’re all despera’e f’r a piss,” Dwalin agreed. This made Ori laugh harder which made it difficult to ‘wag’ properly.

The music finally ended leaving everyone laughing and panting.

“Oh, cried Dori. “That is the silliest dance I’ve ever done.”

“Isn’t it fun?” cried Poli.

“Aye, aye, great fun for all,” Balin agreed and patted the badger on the head.

Thranduil retired to the window seat with remarkable speed and was indulging in lemonade. He seemed determined to act as though he had never participated in such odd behavior not only on sight of, but in company with, dwarrow. Kili and Tauriel were still wagging as they crossed the floor. Gimli and Legolas faced each other, arms folded, and jiggled in seriously competition. This had caught the attention of the badgers who bounced around them calling and encouraging. Thorin had swung Frodo to his shoulder and the faunt was chattering nineteen to the dozen. Dis and the older Urs had watched the entire debacle from the window seat. Thorin handed Frodo to Erda.

“Did you see me dance with King Thorin?” Frodo said. “We did the Beleghost body wag!”

“And very good you were, pet.” Erda praised.

Dis regarded her brother with a sparkling eye.
“You wag well, nadad.”

“Thank you, namad.”

Dwalin barged Ori to the table and handed him a glass of lemonade which Ori was glad to have. He looked about. The younger set was still out on the floor and Bilbo was now ‘body wag’-ing with Poli, and managing quite well.

“Oh, look at that, Thorin,” said Dori brightly. “Master Baggins is so light on his feet.”

Thorin grunted at him.

When the music ended the young ones fell about laughing, attacking the lemonade pitchers on the dining table.

“Ahem, well,” said Dori. “Perhaps now we older folk might enjoy something more tuneful?”

The musicians struck up a country dance and nothing could save Thorin as Bilbo approached and held out a hand.

“Shall we dance, King Thorin?”

“Er…”

Balin, ever helpful, said with a twinkle, “His majesty doesn’t do country dances. He plays f’r ‘em.”

Ori gaped. That wasn’t true at all! Thorin might not be a sprightly, capering fool, but he wasn’t clumsy either.

Bilbo looked up at Thorin from under his brows with a slight, challenging grin.

“He doesn’t do country dances,” Bilbo said to Balin, never taking his eyes away from the king, “but he will do them.”

Fili choked and Kali whispered, “Mahal!”

Thorin looked at Bilbo’s hand, licked his bottom lip thoughtfully, then accepted it and moved to take his place in the set.

Ori watched as Thranduil looked between the hobbit and the dwarf and an evil gleam lit his eyes.

Ori said, “If you say a single thing to either of them you will never take tea with Dori again.”

Thranduil’s eyes flew open and he stared.

“For such a seemingly meek person, you do go right for the throat, Master Ori.”

“I’m protecting my family, you majesty. One weapon’s as good as any other.”

Thranduil chuckled in amusement.

He bowed however slightly and said, “I take your warning in the spirit you intended. My amusement will remain my own.”

Dwalin led Ori off to the dance, and they had a merry time, but afterward, Ori felt he had a duty to perform. He went back to the group at the window seat and crossed to Dori.

“Dori.” Ori climbed into Dori’s lap. Dori huffed out his breath and arranged Ori a little.

“Pet?”

“I warned King Thranduil, he’s not to tease Thorin about Master Baggins or he’ll never be invited to your tea parties again.”

“Rather forward of you, pet,” although Dori’s mouth was twitching.

“Was I wrong?”

“No, you did right, pet. I shall reinforce.”

He patted Ori’s bum to get him off Dori’s lap and Dori rose. Ori slid back and curled in the warm hollow Dori had left in the cushion. Dori sailed forth, calling out, “Thrandy!”

Ori took great pleasure in watching the drama unfold. He didn’t feel the least bit guilty about ratting out the woodland king, and had the pleasure of returning Thranduil’s nod of acknowledgement over Dori’s shoulder. He felt like the power behind the throne.

They danced quite a few country dances, but slowly the youngest Urs and Frodo, then the older Ur offspring wandered off to bed. Their elders retired from the dance floor and chatted a while, but soon Bombur and Erda said their goodnights, followed by Bifur and Bofur.

“Mornin’ll come pretty early f’r us,” said Bofur, sweeping them a bow as he went.

Ori noticed his new hat already seemed a bit nibbled around the edge.

“Well, love?” Dwalin asked.

“Yes, let’s go upstairs,” said Ori, smiling up at his husband. “You need to kiss the other side of my neck.”

“Aye, wouldn’t want yeh t’ be lopsided,” Dwalin agreed.

A loud crash split the night, startling them from sleep, then they heard a pounding of feet like a herd of oliphants had decided to sprint down the hall. Dwalin was at the door in an instant with Grasper in his hand, Ori right behind him. Dwalin flung the door open, then all the doors whipped open and the guests stared out into the hall…. which was empty, and had fallen dead quiet.

Thorin had managed to find his sword at least, and suddenly a squad of soldiers made the top of the stairs, Erda right behind them with a cudgel.

“Yer majesty?” Targ asked as they all looked about, uneasy.

“Be ready,” said Thorin.

Then the pounding began again, from the unused room at the front corner. Dwalin put his free hand behind him to warn Ori back.

Suddenly, the intruders burst forth, yowling their war cries, and thundered past the startled inn guests.
The last beast slowed to a stop, noticing he was at the center of attention, and meowed.

Balin said, “Oh, dear. We seem to have left the door loose on its latch.”

Targ’s beard twitched and he said to Thorin, “Permission t’ stand down, yer majesty?”

“If you truly believe the danger has passed,” murmured Thorin dryly.

Brandy and the other kittens circled back, looking about them as if they had never seen people before. Or they weren’t acknowledging people at the moment, except for Nori-pori, who trotted up to Thranduil, took a flying leap and landed with his claws out, hooked to Thranduil’s shirt and rapidly climbed what was obviously the tallest tree in this hallway.

Aghast, Thranduil very carefully detached him and held him up. The kitten batted his nose and looked smug.

Thranduil held out the perpetrator to Dori.

“I believe this is yours.”

Dwalin snorted.

“Sure yeh don’ wan’ t’ keep ‘im?”

The kitten purred on cue.

“Don’t start that,” Thranduil warned him, walking out into the hall with his nemesis at arm’s length. “I already know what sort of orcspawn you are. No use trying to cover it up.”

It was then Ori got a good look at King Thranduil and his… night clothes. Ori slapped his hand over his mouth. They look terribly familiar, which meant they also looked terribly short on him, the pants ending at the knees, the sleeves at the elbows. At the same time, they were so voluminous they sagged on his frame.

Thorin did a double take, his mouth widening in delight.

“Dori!” he shouted. “Thranduil stole your mattress!”

“It’s not a mattress, you horrid creature!” Dori snapped, stamping his foot in deepest umbrage.

“Oakenshield,” said Thranduil with great dignity. “Kindly do not disparage my pajamas.”

To his credit, Thorin did not. He was on the floor laughing too hard to breathe.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. A new day at the inn and lots of adventures await. And we have a most delicious dinner planned. Do enjoy! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The dawn’s light woke Ori. He was very comfortable and cozy spooned with Dwalin snoring behind him. He didn’t move, just let the bird song drift through the window and the usual noises of the morning coming up from downstairs. Behind all this was the light sound of drizzling rain, the vestiges of last night’s storm. He sighed, snuggled down then grinned at a waking up noise from his husband. Dwalin’s arms tightened around him. A whiskery kiss was planted on his shoulder.

“Yeh ’wake, love?”

“Yes, sort of. It’s still raining.”

“Aye. Mind, Bom says it’ll be clear a’ fore noon, though.”

“Good, I want to draw. Master Brur and Balin thought I should do some drawing by the river and the lake.”

“Then yeh’ve go’ work t’ do, m’love.”

There was a low rumble. Ori, realizing it was Dwalin’s stomach, chuckled and turned over.

“Someone needs breakfast.”

Dwalin kissed him lingeringly.

“Aye.”

Ori rose and, thinking on the last night’s happenings, tucked a couple of things into his pocket.

Washed and dressed they went hand in hand down to breakfast. Thorin came down behind them. Ori tugged on his sleeve and Thorin paused. Dwalin gave Ori a look, chuckled and went on into the dining room.

Thorin smiled.

“What is it, Ori?”

In spite of himself, Ori looked around to make sure they were alone. He slipped the red ribbon and a white gull feather from his pocket into Thorin’s hand.

“For Yavanna,” said Ori, with a small shrug and a grin. “It worked for me.”
Thorin hugged him.

It was startling, but comforting. Thorin was a good hugger, Ori decided. He hoped Thorin got some comfort from it himself.

“Thank you, Ori. You’re right. It won’t hurt.”

They went in and joined the others at breakfast. Dori and Balin were enjoying tea and sharing a pipe. Thranduil sat at the breakfast table, reading a periodical and dipping dry toast in his tea. Dis, seated catty corner to the elf king, had finished her food but was savoring her tea. Tauriel and Kili chatted with Fili and Sigrid further down the table while Legolas watched Gimli eat with great amusement.

Ori seated himself beside Dwalin and poured out three cups of tea. Thorin sat opposite them. Dwalin drank back his entire cup and, patting Ori’s shoulder, went off to the buffet table. Ori saw him pile up two plates before bringing them back. Thorin wandered over and inspected the food before filling his plate with a large amount of ham.

Dwalin returned and put one of the plates in front of Ori.

“There yeh are, love.”

“Thank you. Oh, it smells good.”

Ori tucked into ham, scrambled eggs, and apples and onions fried together. Dwalin, like Thorin, had covered his plate in ham but had added a pile of eggs to go with it.

Ori finished and regarded the shield brothers. They were almost mirror images of each other as they ate. Thorin only had to say one word and Dwalin answered, often in the same taciturn fashion.

“Targ?”

“Perime’er.”

“News?”

“Nowt.”

“Letters?”

Dwalin looked up as Bombur came in with a letter. It was for Dis and as she blushed a little when she opened it, Ori guessed it was from Jani. Ori poured more tea for them. Thorin gave him a smile and Dwalin stretched and belched. Thranduil grimaced but never took his eyes from his reading. The giggling and whispers had risen in volume with the younger set when, as a whole, they leapt to their feet, yelling that the rain has stopped and the sun was out, and rushed off shouting and laughing up the stairs. Thranduil stared after the retreating forms of his son and guard with one eyebrow raised.

“What in Mahal’s name was that about?” Thorin asked.

“I don’t know,” Thranduil said quietly. “I have never seen my little leaf behave with such a lack of particularity.”

“Yer li’le leaf’s sproutin’ ou’, yer majesty,” Dwalin commented, putting his arm across the back of Ori’s chair and pulling out his pipe.
“I take it, then, Thranduil,” Thorin observed, “that Legolas has not had time to lack particularity for many years.”

Thranduil smiled at his thoughts.

“He was always much more of a handful than his brothers. Always curious, always getting into things he had no business getting into.”

“And making his da, or rather his ada, climb trees after him?” Thorin suggested. “Pity we never traded for a day. I would have had a quiet time watching a fawn take a clock apart and you would have been worn out chasing a couple of badgers who thought their sole purpose in life was to break anything in their path, yell at the tops of their lungs, and run everywhere as fast as they could.”

Thranduil choked on his tea, which Ori wondered how he could stand drinking as it must have been full of crumbs.

“Then I shall consider myself truly blessed we did not, Oakenshield.”

“Here,” Dwalin put in. “Was’ as though we were any differen’. Got inta lots a’ scrapes.”

Thranduil regarded Dwalin. “Rather like hiding under a council table and pouring yellow ink on the floor?”

Both Thorin and Dwalin roared with laughter.

“Mahal, we were a couple a’ rotten wee badgers.”

“Were?” Thranduil asked sweetly, a teasing smile on his lips. Dwalin and Thorin looked at each other. Dwalin moved his arms to hug Ori into his side.

“Here, love, next time yeh see her ladyship ask her ‘bout Master Fancy here. We’ve no ammunition here as these tree shaggers live longer than rocks.”

“Certainly.” Ori promised faithfully.

The result was delightful. Thranduil’s eyebrows hit his hairline and he looked horrified then quickly schooled his features back to bland insouciance.

“Yes, well, I doubt my late father said anything uncomplimentary of me to her.”

“Oh, aye, a’ course no”, Dwalin agreed, grinning.

“Certainly not,” Thorin seconded this.

Ori giggled and looked forward to Dori’s next tea party, quite certain ‘Our Gladdy’ wouldn’t hesitate to provide Thorin and Dwalin enough ‘ammunition’ to last several lifetimes.

Bilbo came back in and greeted everyone. Ori offered tea and Bilbo seated himself on Ori’s other side. Thorin pushed the milk and sugar over to him.

“Good morning, Master Baggins,” he rumbled.

Bilbo looked up from the tea and smiled.

“Good morning, King Thorin. Had you a pleasant rest?”
“Yes, very pleasant, thank you. And you?”

“Oh, I slept like a dream. The beds here are wonderful. I’m glad you’re getting the chance to experience them.”

Footfalls thundered on the stairs and the younger set bounded in. They were all paired off and dressed in their bathing costumes once again. Ori stared.

Sigrid and Fili had switched theirs. Sigrid wore her halter top and Fili’s shortened breeches. Fili was decked out in her bloomers and short skirt.

Kili wore a different pair dark green short breeches with a knot at his waist and Tauriel was in his bathing suit complete with hat. Kili’s suit was extremely tight on her and very short; fortunately there had been green short breeches with this, so she was clad but only just.

Legolas had donned Gimli’s suit. It was too short, so shoulder straps had been cut and lengthened with some knotted white material. The embroidered axes sat nicely right above his quite noticeable crotch. Gimli wore Legolas’ drawers. Ori knew this because dwarves made fun of what elvish males wore for drawers and referred to them as ‘tightie-whities’. Gimli was a good deal wider than Legolas and thus the tightie-whities were very tight indeed and gave Gimli the look that he was wearing white string with nothing but a coin purse for his cock.

“Look!” shouted Fili. “I can do that spin-y thing lasses do with their skirts.”

He spun wildly and the skirt frantically tried to keep up. Sigrid shrieked in delight. Dwalin and Thorin roared with laughter. Balin fell back on the window seat with a laughing groan. Dori tut-tutted. Dis rose, staring at Kili.

“Kili, son of Vili, are those your new green combinations?”

Kili grinned brightly.

“Yes, amad! See? They match perfectly.”

“You cut them in half and the legs off!” Dis wailed in despair. “How could you?”

“Scissors, amad.” Kili stared back at her, confused by her question.

“What are you going to wear for underthings, then?” she demanded.

“I have others and, besides, Idad Thorin doesn’t wear any,” Kili answered in a perfectly reasonable voice.

Thorin snorted and dropped his head into his palm.

“Yes, idiot,” he mumbled.

Bilbo was almost overcome by his tea.

Dis opened her mouth to scold then threw up her hands in defeat.

Ori glanced over to see how Thranduil was taking it. Thranduil leaned his elbows inelegantly on the table, his brow in his hands.

“Your majesty?” Ori asked.
“My dear Master Ori, “ Thranduil groaned without moving. “Would you be so kind as to asked Master Bombur to bring me some dorwinian wine and to follow it up with all he has in the house.”

By now Thorin and Bilbo were both laughing so hard they all but had tears running down their faces. Dwalin rose and clapped the elvish king roughly but kindly on the shoulder.

“Go raised badgers, eh, laddie? That why me an’ me husband have cats.”

Thranduil raised his eyes to Dwalin.

“You are a very wise dwarf, captain. Very wise indeed.”

Ori drifted down to the beach to sit with Dori for a while. Balin, Dis and Thranduil were also there. They had moved the long deck chairs, as Erda called them, out to the sand and pitched the large umbrella to shade them from the sun beaming down. Dis and Dori and Powder appeared to be sound asleep and Balin was reading, Brandy curled in his lap

“You do not go to the kettle well with the others, Master Ori?” Thranduil asked idly stroking Nori-pori who had taken up residence on his chair arm.

“I only just learned to swim, your majesty. I’m not really comfortable in the water unless my feet can touch the bottom.”

From where they sat they had an excellent view of the younger set at the kettle well.

Sigrid flew out over the water on the rope and sailed through the air to land with a great splash. She broke the surface, shrieking.

“Cold! I forgot how cold it was!”

Fili went next, with a battle cry.

“Du bekar!” he shouted, and pulled his knees up to his body and his arms around them as he flew free, purposely making as large an impact as possible.

Thranduil shook his head.

“I hope my own son is a little more decorous than that.”

Legolas took to the swing.

“Oi, Legs, let’s see wha’ yeh go’!” Gimli encouraged.

“Ha! Just you wait!” Legolas replied.

He leaped up extra high on take-off and let go at the top of the arc, screamed like a hawk, flailed spread-eagle through the air and snapped straight at the last moment, slicing through the water with nary a splash.

His golden hair broke the surface.

“Mahal’s hairy arse!” he cried. “It is cold!”
Ori peered up at Thranduil and suppressed a smile.

“Alas, sometimes we hope in vain, King Thranduil.”

Thranduil sighed and shook his head.

“‘Mahal’s Hairy Arse’ out of the lips of my son, Prince Legolas of Erys Lasgalen. This never happened before we became friendly with you dwarrow once more.”

Ori murmured so only Thranduil could hear.

“I imagine you never sucked off an iklar before then either.”

“Indeed, Master Ori,” Thranduil fixed him with an amused look. “I presume that, since this also never happened before you arrived at Erebor, I may lay the fault at your door.”

Ori grinned sunnily up at the elvish king.

“No, your majesty. It was Nori’s fault.”

Thranduil laughed.

“Yes, we’ll blame your brother Nori. That will do very well.”

By noon the sun shown down bright and hot and a light breeze blew across the grass.

“What’re yer plans, love?” Dwalin asked as they stepped back out onto the deck after lunch.

“I was thinking I would like to take my sketchpad out and try my hand at the scenery.” He smiled shyly. “Would you mind terribly if I disappeared on you just until supper?”

“O’ course not,” said Dwalin, kissing him.

Ori found a hollow with the trees making a perfect frame for a flower-dotted meadow and sat on a rock. As he was unpacking his kit, little Frodo skipped along and hunkered down over a muddy puddle where a toad had sunk himself to the eyeballs.

“Where is your uncle this afternoon?” Ori asked conversationally.

“Writing. S’ important. Mr. Denethor’s waiting for the pages.”

“Who is Mr. Denethor?”

“He’s at the printing house in Minas Tirith. He’s in high dud… dungeon.”

“Your uncle’s scholarly works are printed?”

“No! I mean, yes, but these are the other books, the ones I’m not allowed to read yet.” Frodo looked up from the puddle with an impish grin. “They have kissing in them.”

Frodo turned back to the puddle and frowned.

“Aw. Mr. Toad hopped away when I wasn’t looking!”

Frodo then saw a large bumblebee and decided it was his duty to follow it. Ori made a rough drawing of the lake and the shore. He went from this to detailed cartoons of various insects and flowers. He leaned back a moment and wondered if he was about to nap.

Out of the corner of his eye, in the distance he saw Thorin kneeling at the base of a large old oak tree and the flash of sunlight off metal. He smiled to himself sleepily.

After sitting up again, Ori continued to sketch, but his mind wandered and he couldn’t quite rein it in. Soon the pencils were tracing quite a different subject than the more mundane views around him.

Time stretched on and the sun moved without his noticing it. When the bell rang for tea he came back to himself, he had drawn Bilbo Baggins busily working at his desk, quill in hand, teacup nearby with a half-eaten scone in the saucer.

But this wasn’t some hobbit hole or even an inn as far as Ori could tell. By the ornamentation, he thought it must be Erebor, more specifically Thorin’s shared office with Balin at home.

Ori’s hand was cramped and he got a queasy feeling as he lay down his now much-shortened pencils and stretched his fingers. With a shiver he turned back a page, and another, and another. There were at least five full pages of sketches Ori did not remember doing, but the subject matter left him no doubt from whence they sprang.

Frodo sat on Balin’s knee as they poured over a huge book on the Fundin’s dinner table.

Bilbo leaned over an open oven door in the Fundin’s kitchen, pulling out a loaf of bread while nearby Dori frosted a cake.

Thorin stood at the great gates of Erebor in a crown and full ceremonial robes, as if to meet an honored guest. Bilbo stood at this left, and Fili at his right with Kili at Fili’s elbow. They all three wore crowns as well. Ori had the oddest feeling the dignitary they awaited was Dis. Yes, they didn’t look quite serious, though Bilbo glared up through his curls as if he could see his crown and was not impressed with it.

The last picture showed Bilbo curled up asleep in Thorin’s arms.

Ori felt his face warm, even though he had drawn them under a blanket. It wasn’t so much the subject as the looks on their faces.

Oh.

Oh….

“Wha’ yeh got there, love?”

Ori screamed and threw himself forward over his sketchbook.

“Nothing! Absolutely nothing! Nothing at all! Oh, shite! Mahal is making me draw rude pictures!”

“Mahal’s wha’?”

“I was just minding my own business, drawing the landscape, and when I looked down I’d drawn this.”

Ori thrust the book at Dwalin.

“Yeh drew Dori frostin’ a cake?”
“Not that one! This one!”

“Ohhhhh. Tha’s nice. Couldn’t’a shown a little more skin?”

“Don’t give Mahal any ideas!” Ori cried. “How am I supposed to look either of them in the eye? I don’t even know where this came from. I’ve certainly never seen this look on Thorin’s face.”

“If yeh had, I’d’ave t’ clobber him f’r no’ askin’ permission firs’.”

“What is Mahal telling me? That I’m supposed to be some kind of cosmic dwarf matchmaker?”

“Nah. Look, none o’ th’ other pi’tures’re like tha’. It’s jus’ life under th’ mountain. Mebbe Mahal’s sayin’ tha’, if it come t’ it, it’d be a good thin’. Or… He wants yeh t’ be a cosmic dwarf matchmaker, a’ leas’ f’r those two. No’ like Thorin’d get there on ’is own. He’ll overthink it ’til Bilbo runs off with Furh’nk.”

“No, I think Furh’nk will run off with Loli, or Loli will run off with him.”

“Oh, aye. What’ve yeh heard?”

Ori clicked his tongue.

“You’re as bad as Dori, digging for gossip!”

“Nah, jus’ lookin’ after th’ welfare o’ me soldiers. Captain’s duty.”

Ori raised a brow.

“Bat shit.”

“Aye, but it calmed yeh down.”

“Sneaky and a gossip!”

“An’ hungry. Bom’s rung th’ bell f’r tea, which is why I came lookin’ f’r yeh.”

Ori sighed and packed up his supplies.

“Yet another notebook I can’t show anyone.”

“Wouldn’t mind looking’ at more o’ tha’ sort o’ thin’.”

“Oh, really? You find cake that interesting? Of course, baked goods! What a truly great seer The Great Woudini is.”

“Funny.”

Dwalin tucked him under an arm as they walked back toward the inn.

On the deck sat Dori, Balin, Dis, and Thranduil. Mixed sandwiches, cakes and pots of tea were on the table. Thorin and Bilbo were discussing a map of Arda.

They called greetings as Ori and Dwalin approached. Dori asked after Ori’s work and Ori was able to show innocent bits of landscapes and insects. Dori praised these, as did Balin. Ori sat down and snatched up a bacon sandwich, his ear immediately tuned into Thorin and Bilbo’s conversation.
“Why is Erebor up in the north and the Shire and Gondor in the south?” Bilbo asked, puzzled.

“Erebor is in the east,” said Thorin, “as on all maps.”

“So, east is at the top on dwarven maps.”

“Of course.”

“I see. No other maps in Arda have east at the top.”

“They’re all wrong,” said Thorin.

(Of course. You’ve never considered, say, bringing your maps into alignment with everyone else’s?)

Then the dwarves maps would be wrong, too,” said Thorin with a smirk and, hearing a shout, he turned. "Ah, here come the ravages of the water wars."

The younger set dragged themselves up from the kettlehole, still bright-eyed and chatty, but obviously tired.

Ravenous, they decimated the sandwiches and cakes even before they sat.

Thranduil sat up and looked appalled at Gloin’s son.

“Wha’?” Gimli asked.

“Can’t you put that away? We’re trying to enjoy the vista. It was bad enough earlier but the water has made the material transparent.”

“Put what away?”

“What should be covered by your bathing costume but is not.”

“Why’re yeh looking’ at it, laddie?” Gimli challenged, flopping into a chair. Legolas sat gracefully beside him.

Thranduil sputtered.

“Sigrid is right there!” Thranduil said stridently.

Sigrid shrugged.

“I’m over it.”

“That is not the point!” Thranduil barked and Legolas buried his head in his arms and was heard to murmur, “My ada is going to kill my boyfriend.”

“Now, Thrandy,” said Dori, “don’t tease the boys.”

Thranduil looked like he might say something, then thought better of it.

Dori tapped him in the arms with his fan anyway.

“I can just hear you thinking, naughty creature.”

Thranduil smirked.
“Can you?”

“Really, Thrandy, you aren’t that opaque,” said Dori with a giggle.

Thranduil sat back, placated.

Ori turned to Bilbo, who was still looking at the map and shaking his head.

"Master Baggins, do you think you might spare me a little of your time at some point during our visit? I’d love to discuss your work on the sylvan and quenya languages."

Bilbo’s eyebrows shot up.

"You've read my books? Great Eru, you really are a scholar to slog through all that! I was just going down to the kitchen to start the sauce for dinner. Would you care to join me?"

"That sounds wonderful!" Ori cried, ignoring the dubious looks of Fili and Kili and the eye rolling of at least one or two young Urs. “I need to go wash my hands. Otherwise I’ll be leaving graphite handprints everywhere."

“I’ll meet you down in the kitchen, then,” said Bilbo.

Edi appeared in the doorway.

“Your majesty, the messenger has arrived from the forest with your clothes.”

“Thank you,” said Thranduil.

“Sent them out to be cleaned?” Thorin asked.

“Just enough to tide us over for the rest of the week,” said Thranduil.

“The week?” Thorin asked, clearly horrified.

“As Master Bombur has the rooms, we’ve decided it is our royal duty to stay and help solace your grief,” cooed Thranduil.

“You are too kind,” said Thorin in his dryest tone,

“Dearest Thrandy!” Dori cried. “You are too good! Your sweetness and disinterested are truly of the valar. As stalwart as your forest itself. Ah! I am all aflutter.”

“Stalwart?” Thranduil echoed, then laughed and laughed.

Thorin turned to Dwalin.

“Does Ori talk like that?”

Dwalin shrugged. “Sometimes.”

“How very poetic," Thorin ribbed him.

“I’m married t’ a scholar,” Dwalin snorted, kicking Thorin's boot. "Me life is poetry, yeh nut sack."

With that, Dwalin picked up Ori's kit and, with an arm around Ori, took his giggling husband upstairs.
"You and Thorin are so funny," Ori observed.

"Nah, we're jus' know each other too bloody well."

"Hmm." Ori turned as Dwalin shut their bedroom door. "Do you think when you and I know each other better, we'll call each other nut sacks?"

Dwalin grinned and wrapped Ori in a hug.

"I'd rather eat yers than jus' talk 'bout it."

Dwalin went to the wardrobe and opened the door. The shirt he had been wearing he hung over the top of it and Ori thought he must be routing around for a clean one.

"Dwalin, I'm a little worried about Thorin. Do you think he needs you?"

"F'r wha'?"

"To, you know, shag him."

Dwalin slowly leaned back from behind the wardrobe door with a look of surprise.

"Why d'yeh think tha'?"

"It's an option. You know him far better than I do. Sometimes, he just seems so...so, I don't know, so alone. And he shouldn't be alone. He such a good, kind dwarf and he never thinks of himself, he's always looking after everyone else. When we were in the mines and he gave his word to the badger, he meant it with all his heart. When he sent you to scour Dale, he promised you that if you were killed he'd marry me. Me! ...and I wondered if he needed some, well, someone to, well, to take care of him a little. You are his shield brother and you know him, know what he likes and needs. He shouldn't be left- I know it's summer, but left out in the cold. I've got you, Balin has Dori, everyone in the company's paired off except him. I know Bifur is single but Dis said that Jani said that he's craft wed. Thorin isn't craft wed. And he's not bloody wed to the mountain either. I don't care what he says. And Lady Galadriel agreed with me when I told her what he said about being so." Ori stopped, having run out of steam and obviously breath. A horrid thought occurred to him.

"I-DON'T-MEAN-I-DON'T-LOVE-YOU-I-DO!!" Ori bellowed and flung himself at Dwalin.

"Oh, love," Dwalin said, chuckling and holding Ori, rubbing his back. "I know that. I know just why yeh said what yeh did. I love yeh more'n I could ever tell yeh an' then some. I'd much rather shag yeh an' let Master Baggins see t' our Thorin. It's a lot more fun t' shag yeh and, t' be honest, I'm far past th' tween urges stage."

Dwalin kissed the top of Ori's head. Ori sagged in relaxation. They held each other a moment. Dwalin chuckled again and murmured into his ear.

"Unless yeh askin' 'cause yeh want t' watch."

Ori drew back his head in surprise and gaped up at his husband.

That had never even entered Ori's mind and it must have been obvious to Dwalin as well because he grinned sheepishly.

"Well, tha's an option, too."
Ori nodded, swallowing, face hot.

Watching other people have sex?

He had barely gotten used to watching himself have sex with his own husband.

He knew it was 'done' among dwarrow, even commonplace, but, of course Ori knew that was something grown dwarrow did, not-

Oh, well, that was worse, wasn't it.

Suddenly he was sitting in Dwalin's lap on the bed.

"All right, love?"

"Yes... but... right now, I think I'd just rather watch me and you."

"If yeh had yer 'druthers?" Dwalin teased gently.

"Aye," said Ori, "if I had me 'druthers."

Dwalin laughed again and kissed him lingeringly.

Ori drew away.

"What in Arda am I to wear? I don’t think we’ll be expected to dress up. Dinner is supposed to be very casual."

"Wear what yeh got on, ‘r if yer tha’ worried ‘bout getting’ messy, wear yer bathing suit."

Ori shot him a dirty look but couldn’t stop a smile.

"Silly buffalo."

"Snort snort."

"No, not right now. I’m going to go meet Bilbo before he changes his mind and then we have to go and eat messy food."

"Aye, love, then after tha’, yeh’ll be my messy food."

The kitchen and larders and passage to the cold cellar beneath ran the entire length of the inn, with stone walls and flagged floors.

"A spring flows beneath the floor," said Bilbo. "Keeps the place nice and cool all summer, even with the ovens."

Shelves and hooks lined the walls, bearing all manner of implements, skewers, knives and roasting forks. At first glance the arrangement seemed a jumble, but there was a sort of logic, one based on the height of dwarflings as they grew. The smaller, lighter items, the wooden spoons and such, sat closer to the floor, the sharper objects sat at about Ori’s shoulder level.

Pots lined up along the lower shelves, while pans hung from the ceiling. One pan was as wide as Ori was tall, and shallow like a bird bath, with two metal handles. He couldn't imaging what you might cook in that. He only knew he needed to get Dori down here and soon.

There were no windows, but the doors and bulkheads to the kitchen gardens were propped open. Ori stared out in amazement. The herb garden was obvious, but a vast vegetable garden was actually hidden from the view of the inn by a dip in the landscape. From the doorway Ori saw row upon row of identical green sprouts.

"Carrots," Bilbo explained.

"All of them?" Ori asked, astonished and a little horrified.

"Well, there are other plants, too, particularly the tomatoes, the onions, garlic and greens."

"Potatoes?"

"Potatoes not so much."

Ori felt a shiver go up his spine.

"Why did you plant so many carrots?"

Bilbo shrugged.

"It just seemed to me I should."

"Lady Galadriel didn't say anything to you?"

"About carrots? No. Why?"

"She seemed to think it would be a bad year for them and it would drive the price up."

"Considering that most of Bombur's carrots come from the farmland around Hobbiton? She's probably right."

"Something's wrong with the farms in Hobbiton?"

"No, the farmers," said Bilbo. "Help me get this pot onto the stove, will you?"

Bilbo didn't seem inclined to elaborate, so Ori assisted Bilbo in setting a pot the size of a bathtub on the hob, next to an equally large pot filled with heating water. Nearby Isi was slicing onions in huge quantities, the pile reaching over her head.

"D'you think it'll be enough, Idad Bilbo?" she asked.

"Oh, well done, Isi. That's perfect."

"Neti an' Buri already have a bucket of mashed garlic, oh, and the basil's finally tall enough to cut."

"Did you-"

"Put in water to keep it from wilting before you could chop it? I seem to recall doing that, idad," Isi teased. "I learned from the best."

"I should know to never doubt you, my dear," said Bilbo.

He dragged a stool out from under a work table beside the stove. Ori thought he was going to sit on it, but instead Bilbo climbed on top, took a can from the table and poured a generous quantity of the contents into the pot.

"Oil for the onions and garlic," he explained. "Please, take a seat."

"You don't need help?" Ori asked, dragging a chair from the work table.

"Oh, no, I'm fine. Tell me, what interests you about elven languages? Do you speak the dialects?"

"My sindarin is very good, my quenya not so much, but my sylvan is non-existent. I've never had the opportunity to hear it, and the only place I've ever seen a written version of it was in your analysis of the Ballad of Gil Galad contrasting the formal sindarin with the eccentric rhyming meter of the sylvan."

"The chaotic meter really does reflect the sylvan elves' less formal and much more realistic and violent take on the events. Once you've heard sylvan, you're in no doubt these people mean business."

Isi, Neti and Buri moved the chopped onions to the pot and Bilbo emptied the mashed garlic in after it.

What are you cooking?" Ori asked.

"The sauce for tonight."

"So early?"

"It's the kind of sauce that has to cogitate."

"Ah."

It was so easy to talk to Bilbo, Ori found himself dashing from topic to topic. Bilbo matched him at every step. The pair of them grew increasingly loud and animated, even as Bilbo took a wooden spoon not much shorter than himself and began to fry the onions and garlic.

"That smells like Yavanna's perfume."

"Doesn't it? Wait until I add the tomatoes," said Bilbo.

"Do they come by caravan?"

"Oh, no, these are ones I put up last year. You'll notice right now the menu at the inn is quite varied and exotic. That's because most of the farthest traveling caravans arrive at the beginning of our warm weather, but it's been summer for them for months already. As the season goes on the fare at the inn becomes rather more traditional to the dwarven palate. Or it has been. With the new trade routes opening up east of Erebor, even that's becoming more complex and experimental."

Isi, Neti and Buri carried in huge glass canning jars full of tomatoes, handing them up to Bilbo to pour into the pot one by one and taking away the empties to clean.

"Oh, Mahal, that's wonderful!" Ori said. "Can I bathe in that?"

"It is supposed to be good for the skin," said Bilbo. "Buri, lad, will you stir while I chop the herbs?"
“Yes, Idad Bilbo.”

The piles of greenery swiftly fell beneath Bilbo’s merciless kitchen knife.

“Do you have a choice of weapon, Master Baggins.”

“Bilbo. Call me Bilbo. I do have what passes for a sword on a hobbit, but is really more of a letter opener. It belonged to my mother. I’m not exactly the terror of Arda, but I can use it without chopping off my own hand. And yourself?”

“I do carry a knife, Nori insisted, but really I’m only good with a slingshot.”

“Don’t disparage the humble slingshot, Mister Ori.”

“Please call me Ori.”

Bilbo nodded.

“Ori. In hard winters hobbits have been known to fill the stewpot with squirrels and rabbits by virtue of their slingshots.”

“Really?”

“When you insist on eating seven meals a day no matter the circumstances, you can’t afford to be picky.”

The younger Ur helped Bilbo push the pot of sauce to a more temperate spot on the stove. Bilbo gave it a last good stir.

“That will do for now,” Bilbo declared. “Thank you, my loves.”

While the sauce burbled, Bilbo pulled out a chair and sat. He had taken an apple from the bin and peeled it.

Ori watched as he managed to do this in one long skin.

Bilbo looked at the peel, and looked at Ori with a grin.

“Shall we find out the first initial of the lucky soul I’ll marry?”

“With an apple peel?”

“Foolproof method. Ask any tween lass.”

“What are you going to do?”

“Throw it over my left shoulder with my right hand.”

He did so.

“Can you see it?” Bilbo asked, not turning around.

Ori leaned to look over his shoulder,

“What does it look like?” Bilbo prompted.

“Like the rune for ‘laundry’.”
Bilbo laughed.

“Story of my life.”

He got up, retrieved the peel and tossed it into the compost bin.

“Ah well,” he sighed. He cut the apple into pieces and they shared it between them.

“Do you know the Great Woudini?” Ori asked.

“Lovely fellow. His wife knits like a hobbit, and that’s the greatest compliment I can conjure right now.”

“You knit?” Ori asked, suddenly quite excited.

“I do, yes, almost all of us learn. And yourself?”

“Before I became terribly high-class, I used to knit almost all of my own jumpers and scarfs and mitts. Nowadays, I don’t have a lot of time for it, and when I do have spare time I spend it with my husband. I’m terribly behind in my reading. I did want to ask more about your work with the sylvan language, though. I understand you drew some ire for constructing a written language for it.”

“I didn’t exactly make myself popular with some of the more conservative sindar scholars. They can be a bit inflexible.”

“Do you regard the critics who say writing down the sylvan dialect could stunt the evolution of their language?”

“I don’t see how it could. It’s not like the silvan themselves are reading it.”

“They don’t really need to, do they,” Ori reasoned. “It’s for our benefit, not theirs.”

“Exactly. Their oral tradition is robust, as is their sense of themselves as a culture. It’s detestable how some scholars think the sylvan are less sophisticated than the sindar, just because they don’t have a written language.”

“You’re thinking of Gallut of Gondor.”

“The most horrifying person you can imagine. The soul of self-important bombast, and believe me, it takes one to know one.”

“His work is extremely influential and his arguments are quite persuasive.”

“More’s the pity,” said Bilbo with a snort. “He would have us believe that every meeting of cultures ends in the death of one or the other. When cultures meet on equal footing, they can produce something new and wonderful. It’s this insistence that one culture is superior to the other that leads to trouble.”

“Or that one map is superior to the other?” Ori teased.

“Precisely,” said Bilbo with a sniff. “This insistence on due north being due east is obviously a signal for the end of the world… or at least a lot of very lost dwarrow.”

“It’s worse that you think,” said Ori. “Most dwarrow have a horrible sense of direction aboveground. Separate us from the stone and we could wander in circles forever.”
“King Thorin wouldn’t happen to be one of these unfortunates, would he?”

“Dwalin says he gets lost crossing the street.”

“Oh, Yavanna. That’s ridiculously endearing. And speaking of the endearing,” Bilbo teased Bombur as he entered.

Bombur bowed and did a fascinating little shimmy of a dance.

"Thank you! Thank you! Oh, really, you're too kind," Bombur cried, raising his arms as if he was the toast of a huge and cheering crowd. "Ori, you're just in time."

"I am?" Ori asked. "I hope you don't expect me to sing or juggle."

Bombur chuckled.

"No, no, not going to put you on the spot. Actually, I wanted to show off my latest acquisition, a little something I picked up from the Orocarni traders when we were last in Erebor."

He took a device from the shelf. It looked like a steel box, perhaps a foot square, but Ori could see it had slots in the front and back, and a knob on one side and a crank on the other. The whole contraption reminded Ori of a laundry mangle.

"What does it do?" Ori asked.

Bombur's eyes sparkled.

"Marvelous things."

While Ori watched, Bombur combined flour and eggs on the work surface and mixed and kneaded it by hand until it was a ball of dough. Then he took a piece of this, adjusted the knob at the side of the box, fed the dough through the back slot with one hand and turned the crank with the other. When the dough emerged from the other side it was not longer a ball, but a flat sheet.

Then Bombur adjusted the knob and fed the sheet through again. This time the dough was even thinner than before.

Bombur continued to do this until the dough was almost thin enough that Ori thought he might be able to read through it.

"Now," said Bombur, "magic."

He turned the knob one more time and the sheet of dough emerged as many, perfect long ribbons.

Neti had been setting up long wooden racks, the kind which usually held freshly washed skivvies to dry before the fire, but instead of drawers and socks, Bombur draped the dough strings.

"We leave them to rest for a bit," he explained, "then we drop them in boiling potato water. Once they're cooked we strain them out, top them with sauce and serve it. Though, mind, it's better not to wear your best clothes to eat it."

Ori asked, "Did you just make really skinny dumplings?"

"They're called noodles," said Bombur. "And, yes they are rather like dumplings in that they take on the flavor of whatever you pour on them."
Then he took some more dough and made a sheet with it, but this time he didn't slice it to ribbons, but used a knife to cut it in two. He lay one half down and spooned a mixture of soft, loose curd cheese and herbs in long, even rows. Then he placed the second sheet over this, ran his finger around each mound to seal it and used the knife to cut it into equal pieces.

"Filled dumplings!" Ori cried. "Bombur, do you have more dough?"

"Yes, yes. Why?"

"Dori has to see this!"

As Ori predicted, Dori was impressed by Bombur's demonstration.

"My, they must certainly be running out of ideas by now!" Dori cried.

"But you aren't," Ori prompted.

"Oh, no, pet, and this is only giving me more of them."

Bombur apologized to Ori as they sat at table.

"This meal is usually begun with a salad of raw green vegetables," he explained.

Ori pulled his shoulders back and he took a deep, grounding breath.

"I am ready. Bring on the green food."

Erda came through and clucked at her husband.

Really, Bom! Here, Ori, I made this up special. Don’t worry, I removed the pits."

Erda placed a plate in front of him holding black olives and a sliced, thick cheese that reminded Ori of the cheese they had with the spinach stew. It had some sort of herb-speckled oil drizzled over it.

"The cheese is of a different milk than you’re used to. It’s from an animal called a bavlo. The dressing is made from pressed olives, same as on the salad."

The noodles came out of the kitchen in steaming bowls with odd, fork-like utensils in them, and more bowls filled with the sauce now a deep red and flecked with herbs. The smell of the sauce made his mouth water. He would happily have eaten just the sauce if it was the only thing on offer.

The noodle fork made it easy enough to move the noodles into his plate and the sauce was ladled on top. A container of dry cheese made its way around the table to shake over that.

Ori was ready to eat the table, actually, never mind what was on it.

The appetizer had merely made him want the noodles all the more.

There was only one problem.

Ori asked, "How, exactly…"

That was something that hadn't occurred to Ori before. The noodles were wonderful, but how to eat them?

To his horror, he looked around for the 'sticks' from last night, but there was only a fork and a very large spoon.

Thorin raised an eyebrow at Bombur.

"Will you please demonstrate for us?"

Frodo piped up, "I can show you, King Thorin! But you have to tuck your napkin under your chin like me."

"Ah," said Thorin, doing so. "Please proceed, Master Frodo. We eagerly await your instruction."

Unlike Ori, Frodo showed no qualms about being the center of attention.

"So… so, you put your spoon in your left hand and your fork in your right."

"Do I use the side of the fork to cut this into small pieces?" Thorin asked.

"No! Wait!" Frodo cried.

"Please," Bilbo prompted.

"Please wait! We're not there yet," said Frodo.

"Well done," Bilbo praised.

"You put the spoon flat in the noodles," Frodo continued, "and sort of scrape a noodle onto it with your fork and twirl the fork and the noodle around and around in the spoon until it looks like a yarn spindle. Then you can eat it."

"I see," said Thorin, attempting this with only partial success. The moment he lifted his fork his noodles fell back into the bowl and he dripped sauce into his beard. "That didn't go as planned."

"Your noodle wasn't wrapped tightly enough," said Frodo.

Dwalin muttered, "Story o' 'is life."

Ori snorted but elbowed Dwalin on principle.

"Try it again, please," Frodo encouraged.

Dis watched her sons closely.

Fili had it figured out quickly. Ori thought that, after learning to wield two swords at once, noodles on a fork must seem easy. Kili managed the twirling but was less successful at delivering it to his mouth.

Meanwhile, Gimli was terribly excited.

"At last! Food I kin spill on me beard wi' impunity!"

Legolas laughed.

"What do you mean 'at last'? When has food ever stopped you?"
"Come t' think on it? Never."

Kili leaned closer to Ori, his face a study.

"Ori!" he whispered, "Are they feeding us worms?"

"No, it's just long dumplings. I watched them make it."

"Oh, that's alright, then. What's in the sauce? That's not worms, right?"

"Yes, Kili, it's worm guts. Enjoy."

Tauriel giggled around a mouthful.

"Ada," said Legolas quietly.

When Thranduil looked up, Legolas indicated Thranduil had sauce on his chin.

"Don't make me use King Thorin's napkin on you."

"Impudent fawn," Thranduil sniffed loftily.

"Besmudged monarch," Legolas replied, grinning, as Thranduil blotted his chin lightly.

As the meal went on, Ori observed there was a great deal of sauce left over after the noodles had gone. It was wonderfully flavorful, full of basil and another herb called oregano, onions and garlic and mushrooms. He eyed his spoon, wondering if it was meant to be eaten like a soup.

"How do I eat this?" he asked.

He could just imaging drinking it from the bowl. That sounded like an invite to disaster.

"That's what the bread is for," said Frodo.

Baskets of hearty bread sat on the table along with carafes of a red wine thick enough to chew, something that looked like iced green fruit juice and water.

Frodo put his now unnecessary spoon aside and began to push the sauce onto a chunk of bread with his fork

They all found their own technique. Gimli used the tried and true method, dunking his entire chunk of bread into the sauce, folding it to hold as much as possible then putting the whole thing in his mouth at once.

He eyed Legolas.

"Will yeh no' try it?"

Legolas laughed.

"I learned my lesson with the stew. I'm not sure I'd survive being a 'trencher'. Certainly my clothes wouldn't."

Soon everyone was sitting back in their chairs in various dazed states of food satiation. Once more Dori and Balin shooed the elf king to the window seat while the table was cleared, the dishes washed and the floor swept. This time Thorin and Dis joined the cleaning crew. Dis, in the larder with Erda, discussed meals and Thorin, perfectly at ease, dried dishes with Ori and Bilbo. Ori tried desperately not to think of what he and Dwalin had discussed upstairs.

Bombur shooed everyone out, declaring that he was going to prepare coffee. When Thorin raised an eyebrow, Bombur laid his finger beside his nose.

“This is a most particular type of coffee, your majesty. It has a touch of this and that in it.”

Ori came back in to find that the furniture had been move about again. The dining table had been pushed back against the wall as it had for the dancing but all the comfortable furniture was clustered about the window seat. Oddly enough a few items seemed to be randomly scattered about the room.

Ori went straight to Dwalin and parked in his lap.

“Are we going to be dancing again tonight?”

“No, pet,” Dori told him. “Master Bombur and Mistress Erda said that tonight they are going to be teaching us a new party game.”

“From Gondor? Is wagging involved?”

“Don’t be naughty, pet.”

Dwalin hugged Ori harder and buried a snicker in his neck.

Master Bombur arrived with a large tray. On this were many beautiful cups, they were made of glass, had scrolling handles and pedestal bases and were tall and thin. Behind Bombur, Kali and Edi carried a large steaming canister. This was placed on the table. Bombur set down the tray and his sons set their burden down nearby. Bombur poured milky coffee into each cup and topped it with a dollop of cream and a sprinkle of cinnamon. Ori sniffed eagerly the combined scents were delicious.

Bombur came over with a tray of filled cups. Bilbo passed them out to Dis, Thranduil, Thorin, Dori, and Balin.

Dis sipped and smiled.

“Master Bombur, this is delicious!” she sighed happily

“Indeed, “ Bombur concurred. “A hobbit invention, a Mistress Glanbia Baileys from West Farthing, I think you said, Bilbo?”

“Yes, I believe she was a great, great aunt of mine.”

Thorin took a swallowed and all but purred.

“My compliments of your late aunt.”

“Thank you, your majesty.”

Kali arrived with another tray and Ori took his cup. He sipped carefully. It was a hot, sweet, heady mix of coffee brewed in cream and liquor.

While they enjoyed their coffee, the younger Urs, directed by Bofur and Bifur were re-arranging the furniture again.

I thought we were going to play-” Bombur started.
“Minnows,” Bifur said firmly, then chased Poli off by tickling her and making her shriek.

“Minnows?” Thorin asked.

“Minnows is a delightful, silly game,” Erda explained. “What we’re going to do is get the furniture set up, then we are going to put all of you in the hallway. We will send one person, the minnow, back into the room to hide. Then put out all the lights in this room. And because we all have excellent sight, we shall blindfold all of you as well.”

Everyone gasped and chattered. Erda held up her hand and continued.

“Then we will let you all back into the room. You mustn’t speak. What you have to do is find the minnow.”

“Without seeing?” Sigrid cried.

“Yes,” Erda laughed. “If you find someone, whisper to ask them if they are the minnow. If they are, they will whisper they are. You must then stay and hide with them. The game is over when everyone has found the minnow.”

Everyone laughed and chattered again.

“Now, “ Bombur smiled around them. “Who would like to be the minnow?”

This brought general suggestions and teasing until Thranduil, having been nudged several times by his ‘little leaf’, finished his coffee, sighed and said,

“Behold, I am your minnow.”

There was a cheer from the younger set and everyone finished their coffees also. The cups and urns were removed and they all went out to the hallway. Thranduil regally returned to the dining room with Erda and Bombur and the door closed behind behind them. Kali and the younger Urs busily passed out blindfolds and helped their guests put them on.

Ori let Dwalin blindfold him and he stood waiting, hearing everyone around him giggling and shifting. Ori heard the door open again and Erda and Bombur helped everyone back into the room.

Ori wasn’t too sure how he felt about moving about a room unseeing. He paused, pondering. They were looking for Thranduil, so he would be limited by his height. Ori shuffled over to the wall and slowly made his way along it, by running a hand on it. He carefully explored each of the curtains as he came to each window and ran his hand over the window seat and any other furniture he came across. He could hear everyone else wandering about and bumping into each other and stifling giggles. There were several squeaks and ‘ooo’s’ as certain people met other certain people and ‘indulged’ themselves.

Ori finished his circuit without finding the elf king or minnow. He tried to recall the rest of the room but tossed that thought aside as there had been noises of furniture moving while they were in the hallway. He found the door again and took a long step sideways to cross the room slowly. His hip came in contact with the table edge he had skirted before. A thought struck him. He ran his hands all over the table. Nothing. He considered, then shrugged and sank to his knees and slowly crawled under the table, sliding a hand on the edge. He got to the far side and was about to rise and continue when his hand found something. He took ahold of it. It was a leg.

“Minnow?” he whispered.
“Yes,” Thranduil murmured.

Ori bit back a triumphant noise and shuffled over to sit beside the elf king.

“You can take off the blindfold,” Thranduil breathed.

Ori did so and now he could see the other figures moving about the room. There was a shout and a crash.

“Got you!” Kili yelled. “Hang on to ‘im, Fi!”

“Get off me, you two idiots,” Thorin growled.

This brought laughter.

“Sorry, idad,” Fili said unapologetically.

“Whichever one of you is sitting on me, is going to be thrown out the window…as soon as I find one.”

With his blindfold off, Ori could make out the boots moving beside the table. He kept as quiet as possible but he knew Dwalin would find him and he was delighted by the idea. Dwalin had excellent hearing. Dwalin’s hands touched over the table and then he dropped to a squat and paused. Ori held his breath. Dwalin pounced forward and grabbed him. Ori clapped a hand over his mouth to stop his squeal. They had a brief scuffle on Thranduil, who hissed like an angry cat. Dwalin settled beside Ori, and arm around him.

“Yer minnowship.”

“Shut up.”

They settled then there was a shout of triumph from Gimli.

“Hah! Knew I’d get me some elvish arse. Got yeh, Master Minnow!”

“Gimli,” Tauriel’s usually patient voice had slight edge to it. “That is my ‘arse’! And if you don’t un-‘get’ it I’ll tie your beard in a knot. Several knots.”

There was a snort then a bright, “Ups-dpsy-daisy! Sorry, lass!”

“Gimli,” Kili roared. “Whatever you’re doing to Tauriel’s arse, stop it! I’ll kick you in the lake!”

“I’d like t’ see yeh try, laddie!” came the return volley.

“Stop both of you,” Thorin growled. “We’re looking for the minnow.”

“Fuck the minnow, Ki! I’ll have yer heed!” Gimli roared.

“Not even with yours!” Kili shouted.

There was terrible stamping and puffing and yelling as the two combatants tried vainly to find each other, followed by whoops of laughter as they happily mowed everyone in the way aside.

There were squeals as the youngest Urs dove for the door to leave but ended up under the table with the Minnow.

Poli shrieked in delight, starting Isi, Neti, Ari, Muri and Buri to exclaim at their luck of finding the minnow so soon.

“Found you! Found you!”

“Hush,” Ori tried in vain.

“Hang about, love,” Dwalin rose and moved toward the shouts of Gimli, Kili, Fili, and Sigrid, who were causing a melee.

“I’ve got you, our Gimmers!” that was a shout from Legolas.

Gimli shouted a war cry above the elf’s snickering.

“Hah, Got you!” Kili tried.

“Nah, laddie, yeh go’ me.”

In the dimness of the room Ori saw Dwalin hoist the younger prince like a sack of potatoes.

“Idad!”

“Throw him out the window, Dwalin” Thorin helped.

“Amad!!”

“Dwalin!” Dis shrieked

“Wha’?” Dwalin grumped.

“For Mahal’s sake,” Dis barked. “Open the window before you throw him out. It would be rude of you to break any as the Urs have been so kind to us.”

“Fiiiiiiii!” Kili bellowed, figuring his brother was his last hope.

Sigrid shrieked and started laughing.

“Fili, go help your brother.”

“And get caught by Captain– Oi, leggo of my hand.”

“I don’t have your hand! Stop pulling!”

‘What is this?’

“Let go!”

“I can’t. Right.”

Ori headed Fili give a grunt of exertion, there was the sound of tearing cloth and Sigrid shrieked again.

“Are you alright, Sigrid?” Tauriel demanded
“Yes,” Sigrid managed gasping between laughing. “I’m all right. I- I-”

“What the-,” Fili started. “Why do I have material in my hand?”

“What material?” Dis demanded.

“I don’t know.” Fili replied.

Sigrid continued to giggle helplessly. Ori heard her gasp something to Tauriel who started to giggle, too. At that moment, Ori heard Dori murmur.

“Finally a place out of the way and peaceful.”

“And now, m’dear,” replied Balin in a low, lecherous whisper. Ori gulped as he heard the pair slide onto the table top.

The table above them creaked menacingly.

“Oh, no,” Ori mumbled he seized the Ur badgers as a group and bodily shoved them out from under the table as the legs gave way.

“Sweet Aüle-fucking, goat-shagging, malignant, useless, blasted, dwarrow!” Thranduil raged, trapped under the table and Dori and Balin supine across it.

“Ada!” Legolas cried, clearly horrified by both his father’s predicament and rudeness.

The door flew open and Bombur, Erda, Bofur, and Bifur rushed in with lights.

“Get them and this ill-built excuse of a table off me!!”

Dwalin lifted Dori off and gave Balin a hand up while Dis and Thorin rescued the angry monarch. It took a good deal of brushing down, back patting and comforting words to soothe Thranduil, but Thorin and Dis showed themselves to be remarkably good at it.

Thranduil looked simmeringly at Dori, who was brushing himself off daintily.

Dori looked up, cleared his threat, and said candidly,

“If it’s all the same to you, Thrandy, dear, I would prefer that neither of us ever mentioned this little incident to dear Lady Galadriel.”

Dori cocked an eye at Thranduil with a tiny smile. Thranduil stared, then his lips twitched and he chuckled.

“Oh Dori,” the elf king groaned. “You are the most maddening, teasing, utterly lawless creature I’ve have ever met. No wonder you make everyone, including me, adore you. I demand your pity instantly.”

Dori laughed delightedly and skipped over to hug the tall, willowy monarch. Thranduil leaned over and swept his arms about Dori and kissed his cheek.

“Revilting, ravishing creature,” he chided.

Fili was examining the piece of material he held.

“Is this another bathing costume top?” he asked Sigrid, holding it out to her.
She snatched it away.

“No, you idiot. Dipfa made it. It’s an abbreviated under bodice.”

“What?” Fili was appalled.

“Yes, you ripped off the top half my underpinnings while in the same room as your mother. Good thing it was dark!”

Fili closed his eyes as though in pain and turned beetroot. Kiil and Gimli started to cackle. Thorin and Dwalin face-palmed in unison. Dis went to Erda and dropped her head on Erda’s shoulder. Erda patted her consolingly.

“Where did I go wrong?” Dis groaned.

Erda and Bombur laughed at her. Bofur and Bifur were re-lighting the lamps and making snide comments.

“I’m so sorry,” Fili mumbled.

Sigrid giggled and nudged her shoulder into his.

“Silly. It was funny.”

The furniture was put to rights and the Urs offered draughts, cards, and backgammon.

Dwalin plumped back into the couch and Ori sat beside him. In a few moments, Poli and Neti pushed a small table in front of them and fetched over Thranduil and Frodo. Thranduil sank into a winged chair and took the glass of wine Kali offer him. The lasses and Frodo sat on stools at the little table. Poli shuffled a pack of cards then began to deal them out.

“Wha’ we playing’, lassie?” Dwalin asked, amused.

“Rummy,” Poli informed them.

“Rummy?” Thranduil raised his brows inquiringly.

Poli proceeded to give him a quick run down of the rules. Ori tried not to smile as the elf king seemed to absorb the instructions and lifted his seven cards to look at them. The cards were sized to badgers and look tiny in the elf’s hands.

Ori hadn’t played in years and the game was lively enough with the three badgers taking their collections and discards very seriously.

Five games later, Bilbo rose from his seat where he had been talking with Balin, Thorin and Dis.

“Alright, Frodo, time for all good faunts to be abed.”

“I want a story, Uncle Bilbo! Please!”

The young Urs all echoed him. It was obvious Bilbo was not going to get away story-free.

They all cheered, games suddenly at and end.
“About Uncle Bu’ror,” said Frodo.

“About great-great-uncle Bullroarer. Hmmm. And, would this be the story about the trolls?”

“Yes!” Frodo cried. “The troll snot!”

“The candor of youth,” said Bilbo, picking up the faunt and sitting Frodo on his knee. “Oof! You are getting heavy, my lad. You know, I’ve told you that story so often, I think I’d like you to tell it to me for a change.”

The faunt pulled back, shocked.

“I can’t do that!”

“No? And why not? You know it, don’t you?”

“Yes, but that’s just wrong!”

“It can’t be all that wrong. I’ve seen you playing it for pretend out in the garden.”

“That’s just play!”

“But you do it so well. How about this? I will tell the story, but you have to help me make the troll sounds.”

“The really disgusting ones?”

“Especially those.”

Frodo nodded.

“Alright,” he said, “but you have to start.”

After the badgers were tucked off to bed, the elders sat about still talking.

Ori watched as Bilbo poured himself some water and added a few drops of wine into it.

"D' yeh no' like the wine, Master Bilbo?” Balin asked.

"I like it just fine, but I try to stay present and accountable if Frodo is off-step. He tends to have nightmares."

"You think he's ill?" Ori asked.

Dis nodded. "His eyes were just a little too bright."

"He gets overtired and overexcited," said Bilbo "He's still a little fellow and it's easy to forget when he's in company and chattering."

"He's certainly taken to us all quickly enough," Dori observed.

Bilbo and Bombur exchanged grins.

Bombur said, "That's because we're all hobbits. Did you not know?"
"Beg pardon?" Dori asked.

"When we arrived," said Bilbo, "Frodo saw a jolly fellow with a jolly wife and a dozen well-fed offspring and a tray of ginger snaps had just come from the oven. He wanted to know why the big hobbits wore boots and why they were all wearing such odd red scarves."

"Oh no!" Dori cried.

"Oh, yes," said Bilbo. "He adapted easily enough to days of cooking and cleaning and hospitality-by-herd. That's what it's like back home. Or, at least what home used to be like."

He frowned into his water, then abruptly snapped out of it.

"Time for that special dessert, Bombur? Now all the pebbles are abed?"

Bombur's eyes twinkled.

"I do believe you're right. A midnight snack for the grownups. "Tea?" Bilbo asked Ori.

"Yes, please!" Ori enthused.

He expected a pot of tea to materialize. Instead Bilbo poured out a cup of what Ori had taken for fruit juice.

Ori was horrified.

"Why is it green?"

"It's green tea."

"Ah." He narrowed his eyes at Bilbo. "You're not having me on, Bilbo?"

"I never joke about tea," said Bilbo. "My ancestors would come back to haunt me. Besides, wait until you add milk and honey."

"I shall reserve judgment," Ori promised.

It was well worth the self-control he found.

"It's really good! It tastes like it should be fruit."

"Melons?" Bilbo asked.

"Yes! How did they do that?"

"I'm fond of melons myself," said Dis.

"What kind?" Bilbo asked.

She smiled in such a way that Ori knew she was thinking of Jani.

"You know," said Tharkûn, suddenly sitting on the end of the couch near Frodo's empty seat, "melons are supposed to be terribly good for the digestion. Not to mention whetting the appetite."

"Gandalf!" Bilbo cried.
Dessert and a dazzling announcement

Chapter by Stevie_Foxx

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Tharkûn’s back. Put away the valuables and hide the candy. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

“Ah, Tharkûn,” said Bombur, not all surprise. “Just in time for dessert as usual.”
“Master Bombur. As you know, my valar-given mystical powers allow me to know exactly when dessert is being served everywhere in Arda.”
“Wait,” said Ori to the wizard. “Are you Gandalf, too?”
“It’s one of my names,” said Tharkûn. He leaned in closer and said confidentially, “When you have my reputation, an alias is useful.”
“You’re not exactly anonymous, Master Tharkûn,” said Ori.
“I beg to differ, young master, I think I blend in seamlessly with any room.”
“Except a really short one,” said Dwalin.
Bombur and Erda passed out little dishes, and served up coffee in tiny cups.
Ori found out why the cups were so small when he tasted it.
“Mahal! That is strong!”
Bombur assured him, “It’s what goes best with this dessert, and it is Tharkûn’s favorite.”
“Tha’ explains a few thin’s,” said Dwalin.
Ori looked at his dessert, a cross between a small square of cake and a cube of firm pudding, saturated with the scent of coffee and chocolate. The top was dusted with powdered chocolate and topped with cream and a plump strawberry. He took a mouthful and was delighted by the combined tastes. It was almost as though he was eating coffee liqueur soaked cake mixed with whipped cream.
Someone made a sexy noise, though no one would own up to it, and Dis said, “Should I be about to die, I demand someone shove a piece of this in my mouth immediately.”
Dwalin smiled at Ori and thoroughly licked off his spoon, leaned in very close and whispered, “Nice an’ creamy, jus’ like you.”
Ori squeaked unintentionally and squirmed away, latching onto the first thing that occurred to him.
“Did you ever find Notathain Shire, Master Tharkûn?” Ori asked, his voice rather higher than usual.
“How did you know I was supposed to be looking for him?” Gandalf replied, eyebrows high as he lit his pipe with the snap of his fingers and blew rings of smoke.
“Lady Galadriel wondered if you knew he was missing. She did say Gandalf and now I know that means you, I remembered her mentioning it.”
“Ah, yes. Well, I did know, in fact, it was why I left Erebor when I did. It certainly took Eru’s own luck to find him.”
“So, you know where he is?” Ori asked excitedly.
Everyone in the room sat up and stared at him.
“I do,” said Tharkûn.
The cacophony was marvelous.
“Where? Where is he?” Dis demanded.
“Is he alright?” Ori asked.

“He seems perfectly fine,” said Tharkûn. “A little harassed, not surprising, given the circumstances.”

Thorin said, “If he’s in difficult straits, he’s welcome to come to Erebor.”

“Indeed,” Dis agreed.

Bilbo looked up from fiddling with his pipe.

“That’s very generous of you, King Thorin.”

“He brings our people a great deal of pleasure, the Durins are no exception.”

“But do you know why he disappeared? What horrible things he’s supposed to have done?”

Bilbo asked. “He is a stranger to you, after all. Do you think the populace would be quite safe?”

Dwalin snorted, “Well, if he’s skinnin’ wargs alive an’ eatin’ orcs with hot sauce, I’m sure we’d’ve heard of it. In fact, we know naught o’ wha’ he’s supposed t’ have done. D’ yeh?”

“As a matter of fact, I do,” said Bilbo, “though eating orcs with hot sauce isn’t on the list as far as I’ve heard. Think you’d rather deserve some sort of medal for that, really.”

Bombur cleared his throat and wiped his mouth, turning to Bilbo saying seriously,

“You don’t have to do this, if you’d rather not,”

“Eat orcs?” Bilbo commented lightly. “As a matter of fact, I would really rather not.”

“You’re Shire!” Ori cried.

An electric thrill shot through the room.

Bilbo calmly lit his pipe from the candle on the table, puffed it into life and smiled.

“Guilty.”

Silence.

“Tell us she doesn’t do it!” Sigrid cried.

Bilbo looked startled and puzzled.

“What?”

“Estrella! Tell us she doesn’t run off with Squire Harsh!”

“Of course she doesn’t! That would be silly. She’s far too smart for that.”

“And how,” Ori jumped in, “can Captain Cockrell be a pirate lord and king of something or other and not be smart enough to tell her he loves her?”

Bilbo said, “Ah. Well, kings do tend to be rather dense when it comes to declaring their love.”

Balin and Dwalin were suddenly seized with coughing fits.

“But, why did you disappear?” Ori piped, somewhat in awe. “If you don’t mind me asking, Master Shire?”

Bilbo laughed.

“I’m not Shire. Shire is a brilliant, well-travelled, scandalous figure of legend. I’m Bilbo Baggins, erstwhile country squire and, unfortunately, a little too well-off for my near relatives’ liking. I wish I was Squire. Bastard would probably have just run them all through and been done with it.”

Dwalin chuckled.

“Yer great-uncle Bullroarer seems t’ have stayed in yer blood.”

“If he could see how badly I ride a pony, he’d disown me, I’m sure,” said Bilbo. “Really, I’m mainly spectacular for my ability to antagonize people.”

“Yeh didn’t strike me as a dangerous criminal,” said Dwalin.

“Perhaps not a violent criminal, but I am a filthy perverter of public morals. To amuse myself I took commissions to write pornographic works. My patrons were all wealthy hobbits who didn’t mind waiting for their stories, since I transcribed them, illustrated them and bound them by hand. Very few people knew of my little sideline.”

Dis considered.

“Whereas everyone knew of your wider fictional works, at least in the Shire. Things seemed to have come to a tipping point, Master Baggins.”

“Yes, last autumn. Frodo’s parents died and I adopted him and named him my heir. Suddenly, a good many people who expected to benefit from my death no longer had expectations. That was what set it off, and it wasn’t the ‘good stuff’ that they targeted as proof of my depravity, but the largely harmless stories I published under a pseudonym that were widely read all over the Shire.”
“All over Arda,” said Thorin quietly.
“Master Baggins,” Balin said, thoughtfully. "Yer fellow hobbits seem t’ have mistaken legal prosecution f’r literary criticism.”
“Indeed, Mister Balin, and what I find most galling is that my wealthy patrons are the ones who bray loudest about me producing extremely cheap, extremely mild versions of that for which they paid top gold. When my fellow hobbits started making noises about seizing my property and my heir, I felt it best for Frodo and I to absent ourselves. I could have gone to Tuckborough and stayed with my Took relatives, but they’re mad as mice and I’m only half-mad.”
Ori’s brain worked through this entire line of reasoning and came to a startling end.
“Your mother was the adventurer Belladonna Took.”
The Durins murmured amongst themselves. Belladonna Took was not an unknown figure in Erebor.
“She was,” said Bilbo “She probably would have run them through, too.”
A ghostly figure appeared in the doorway. It was Poli in her nightshirt.
“Mam? Frodo’s having nightmares.”
Bilbo abandoned his pipe in the ashtray.
“Excuse me,” he said absently.
He took Poli’s hand and brought her back up to bed.
People began to tidy up and Dwalin yawned and gave Ori’s knee a shake.
“C’mon, love. Bedtime?”
Ori nodded.
“Yes, I feel like I’m ready to sleep for a week.”
Bofur made an odd noise which he turned into a cough when Erda glared at him.
Upstairs Ori shucked his clothes off and pulled his nightshirt over his head. Dwalin got into the huge bed and Ori piled in beside him.
“’Night, love,” Dwalin murmured.
“G’night.” Ori kissed him and they settled down. Dwalin lay on his back with Ori curled beside him, an arm across Dwalin’s belly. Ori fell asleep.

Ori was awake.
He was wide awake.
He stared into the depths of the night, and sighed.
The coffee had not been entirely overcome by the liquor.
In the dark, Dwalin chuckled.
“Well, here we are. Wha’ d’yeh wan’ t’ do?”
His voice was leering and suggestive, but all Ori could think of was, “Let’s go outside!”
“Really?”
“Yes!”
“All right. Let’s go.”
“Should we get dressed?”
“Nah. If this is good enough f’r our Thrandy, it’s good enough f’r us.”
As they made their way toward the stairs, the door down the hall opened and Fili slunk out, closing it noiselessly behind him. He turned toward Sigrid’s room and had taken a step when he realized he had been spotted. He froze, he grinned and it froze.
“Thought I heard her calling me,” Fili explained, turning back to his room.
“You did,” replied Sigrid’s disembodied voice.
Dwalin and Ori walked past the young prince.
“Be’er do somethin’ about’ tha’, lad,” Dwalin commented with a smirk.
They continued down the hall to the sound of snoring. Following it to the source, they found Gimli’s door open and, tucked up in bed, Gimli himself flat on his back, snoring hard enough to ruffle the curtains.

Legolas sat crosslegged on the end of the bed in total puzzlement.

“I poked him twice,” said Legolas. “He didn’t even stir.”

“Wha’ d’ye pok him with, laddie?”

“Apparently not the right piece of my anatomy,” Legolas said, rather disgruntled.

Balin and Dori’s door was closed tight, but they were obviously not asleep. If not for Gimli’s snoring, Ori was fairly sure they would have been audible down in the kitchens.

Downstairs, in the sitting room, Thorin and Bilbo shared a pot of tea. Dis poured out a cup and said, “It could have been worse, Master Bilbo. He wasn’t sick to his stomach.”

“Oh, we’ve been through that more times than I care to count.”

“When Fili was about that age, he went through a period where he was terrified to sleep because he kept having nightmares about my husband’s death.”

“And Kili?”

“Kili was far too small to know what was happening. Of course, as he got older he had a habit of calling every male dwarf he met ‘adad’. When he started calling all the dams ‘adad’, we knew we had to straighten things out.”

As Ori and Dwalin passed, Thorin waved to them.

The front door was propped open and Bombur and Erda sat on a bench just outside, giggling and holding hands.

Erda smiled up at them.

“It’s such a nice night, so we decided on the coffee.”

Bombur chuckled.

“With predictable results.”

Erda added, “Careful if you’re going to take a wander by the lake. Kili and Tauriel started down that way a little while ago.”

Ori snickered and Dwalin said, “Aye, off shaggin’ his elf.”

“And is Gimli shagging his?” Bombur asked.

“He can’t wake Gimli up,” Ori told them. “Gimli is just snoring at him.”

“You’d think a clever lad like that would go about it a different way,” Bombur commented, thoughtfully, totally ignoring the fact that Legolas was least two thousand years older than him.

They heard voices in the back of the inn, young voices raised high in excitement while still others hushed them.

“Oh, stuff it,” barked Edi. “It’s not like anyone’s still asleep.”

Ori tilted his head over in the direction of the kerfuffle.

“The very youngest are in bed; as for the tweens, they don’t really need coffee, do they,” said Erda.

Ori and Dwalin wished them good night and wandered hand and hand toward the flower beds. Someone had been working at them recently. Ori tried to step carefully among the dirt mounds, feeling the irrational need to apologize when he trod too close to some planting of another.

Finally, he pulled Dwalin out onto the grass.

The lights from the inn only cast a faint glow here, and the moon was new. Ori looked up into the night and gasped.

“Look at all the stars!” he said. “I would never have thought there were so many.”

“More than anyone kin count.”

“So beautiful,” said Ori.

Dwalin wrapped arms around him from behind.

“Shoulda brought a blanket or somethin’. Better t’ see it all lyin’ on the grass.”

Ori cocked an eyebrow and looked up at him.

“I’m guessing that’s not the only thing that’s better on the grass.”

“Hmmmm, could be.”

They had rolled around in the park that time late at night, but roaming around a pasture in use at night had seemed a plan for disaster. Here the animals were pastured on the other side of the inn, beyond the barn. Ori couldn't help wishing he'd planned out this moment. He wouldn't mind rolling around on this hillside with Dwalin. The air here was different than under the mountain, the scent of the green grass present, the stone a little further away. The soft air had cooled just enough to make cuddling back against Dwalin even more decadent than usual.

He rubbed back against his husband.
"Fresh air got yeh a little frisky, love?"
"It's really delicious, isn't it."
"Delicious? Do tell, me little hedonist."
Ori opened his mouth to reply, but just then he was seized by this moment, possibly by Yavanna and most definitely with the surge of too much coffee in his blood.
He leaned forward, grinning, peering out into the night.
"Can you feel that?" he asked.
Since Dwalin's hands were roaming his chest and shoulders through his nightshirt at the moment, it wasn't surprising to hear, "I kin feel quite a few nice thin's."
"But, this is-"
Ori darted forward, entirely on impulse, flung off his nightshirt, and whirled around with his arms out as though he embraced the world.
"Dwalin! Can you feel it?"
"Feel what, love?" asked Dwalin, chuckling.
"The hills! They're alive!"
Dwalin tilted his head, frowning.
"Are yeh goin' t' sing?"
"Why would I sing?" Ori asked.
"Ne'er mind. If they are alive, yeh be'er come back here before they eat yeh."
Ori laughed and started a silly, skipping dance.
"Look! I'm an elf!"
"Aye, I kin see yer ears growin' from 'ere."
"Come on!"
"Yeh want me t' dance like an elf?"
Ori held out a beckoning hand, still skipping about as though he were mad.
"Aw, wha' th' fuck," Dwalin muttered.
He flung off his own nightshirt and grabbed Ori's hand, though the closest he could get to skipping was to jump in place.
Ori thought that looked like fun, so he jumped, too, the pair of them stark naked, jumping in tandem, laughing hysterically, until Dwalin slipped in the dewy grass and down they went in a heap, still laughing and still holding hands.
Gasping for breath, Dwalin said, "I'll ne'er live tha' down."
"I won't tell a soul," Ori promised.
"Th' same can't be said f'r Targ over there, walkin' th' perimeter."
Ori squawked. He sat up and leaned over his husband.
"Oh, Mahal! Dwalin, I'm so sorry! I shouldn't ha-"
Dwalin put a finger to Ori's lips.
"Love, if I was worried about wha' Targ thinks, I wouldn't've done tha'. Or this."
"What?"
Dwalin pounced on him and rolled him over onto his back.
Ori swallowed.
"What did you have in mind?"
"Jus' a little canoodlin'."
"Mmmm. Canoodle at will."
Ori slipped his arms around Dwalin's neck and drew him down for a kiss. It started off rather shy and teasing, but it was soon apparent his mouth was not all Dwalin intended to devour.
"Dwalin, that tickles!"
"Yer ears must be oversensitive from growin' like tha'."
Dwalin peppered him with kisses, so fast and all over, Ori couldn't really do anything but laugh and try to writhe away and Dwalin wasn't letting him go anywhere.
"S-stop," Ori giggled. "I can't breathe!"
"Faker," Dwalin accused, but he rolled over and let Ori curl up on him. "I'll give yeh a breather, but after tha', I make no promises."
"Merciful Mahal!"
"Sorry, th' hills tol' me t' do it."
After a moment, Dwalin lifted his head to peer down the length of his own body. With his free hand he grasped his cock and raised and lowered it carefully.
Ori laughed. "What are you doing?"
"Makin' sure I didn't sprain it with all tha' jumpin' around. Ah, it starts up just fine."
"Well, that's a relief!" Ori said, snickering. "When we first met, I would never have have imagined you'd do something this silly. You always seemed so... I guess stern is the wrong word, you're not a school marm."
"That's f'r the best, I'd look terrible with wha's left o' me hair in a bun."
"Anyway, I had no idea you'd ever jump around naked in the middle of some field at night, pretending to be an elf."
Dwalin snorted.
"The day we met, what I really wanted t' do was bounce around yeh like an overexcited puppy."
"Really?"
"I'd been watching' yeh so long. I knew just who yeh were th' moment I clapped eyes on yeh. When we got married I wanted t' pick yeh up an' spin yeh around, but since I'd pretty much forced yeh int' marryin' me, I didn't think it'd go over too well."
"Why do I get the impression that wouldn't have stopped Dain?"
"Because he's an even bigger Durin turnip than I am. Best I could hope f'r was yeh'd take a likin' t' me one day."
"I already had taken a liking to you, about three years earlier."
"Aye, well, timin' is everythin'."
As they lay there, floppy as noodles, a star broke from position and sped across the sky in a blaze and was gone.
Ori sat up in surprise.
"What was that?"
"Shootin' star. Make a wish, but don't tell any wha' it is."
There were so many competing wishes in Ori's brain, he couldn't just think of one. He had everything he ever could have wanted, but he knew others were struggling.
A baby for Dori and Balin?
Happiness in love for Thorin?
Oh, just a million things.
Finally he settled on: I wish everyone could be as content as I am right now.
As the lights of the inn went out one after another, and the night deepened, he finally thought he might be ready to sleep.
"We should go inside," said Ori drowsily.
"I think yer right." Dwalin stood and gave him a hand up. They turned toward the inn, but Dwalin held back.
"Just a mo."
He went and retrieved their nightshirts, ghostly white patches on the dark ground, now soaked through.
"Let's put these on th' dryin' rack," Dwalin said, chucking his chin to where they left bathing costumes at the end of the day. "Shouldn't leave our whatnots strewn about th' place. Got t' keep things tidy f'r th' quality."
“And what will we wear to go back upstairs?” Ori asked slyly.
“We’ll just have t’ take ’em at a run,” said Dwalin, grinning.
Everyone else had long since gone back to bed and Erda and Bombur had left the bench. The door was closed but the light above the door shown a soft, welcoming beacon.

That little, disaster-fixed voice in Ori’s head wondered what they would do if the door was locked. He could see the pair of them circling the house, desperately looking for an open window, inevitably running into Dori as he searched for a late night snack.

The door was not locked, however, and opened on noiseless hinges.

They stood in the hall, looking up the stairs.

"Ready t’ make a run f’r it?" Dwalin asked.

"Let’s do this,” said Ori. "We can't possibly make more noise than the cats did."

There was a certain thrill to it, as they could be discovered at any moment. Nudity wasn’t a problem for dwarrow, but running through the halls of a public inn naked might raise a few eyebrows.

Ori himself was loathe to display his freckled arse to the entire dwarven world.

They had a perfunctory wash, so as not to muddy the sheets, but he and Dwalin curled up together, still naked, pulling up the quilt from the end of the bed.

The last thing Ori thought of before he drifted off was to wonder how Thranduil had spent the night.

Probably enjoying his pajamas, Ori thought, giggling, and eased down into sleep.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. This chapter is quite the mile-stone thus we have prepared a truly wonderful dessert for your delectation! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori woke just before dawn and slithered out of bed to look out the window. The lake was dark and still. The birds had not yet begun their morning chorus. He thought he saw fireflies before he realized it was the wrong time for fireflies. He rubbed his eyes.

On the lawn between the lake and the Inn, Lady Galadriel was dancing blithely, flitting through the grass. To Ori’s surprise, a bare headed Tharkûn was galumphing along with her to some music only they heard. Ori shook his head. He must be dreaming and crawled back into bed.

He woke again later when Dwalin kissed him. They lazily washed, dressed, and wandered down to breakfast. Balin, Dori, Dis, and Thorin were already there.

They were drinking tea.

Ori and Dwalin greeted them and sat down. Ori looked about.

“We don’t help ourselves?”

“No,” Thorin replied, shaking his head. “Apparently Bombur has something special planned.

Tea?”

“Yes, please.”

“It’s not as strong as usual,” Dis laughed. “I think Erda is going to let us all get some sleep tonight.”

“I hope so,” Ori commented. “Not sleeping makes me see weird things.”

He had only meant it as a light comment but everyone at the table turned and looked seriously at him.

“What?” he asked.

Dwalin put his arm on the back of Ori’s chair.

“Wha’ yeh see, love?”

“Well,” Ori hesitated. “Don’t mention it to anyone but-”

“But,” Dori encouraged.

“I woke before dawn, or thought I did, and looked out the window. I thought I saw Lady Galadriel and Tharkûn dancing on the lawn before the lake.”

Thorin and Dis choked on their tea in unison.

“Well, well, well!” Balin murmured, eyes twinkling. “I always did wonder. She only had one badger by tha’ lord o’ hers. He never seems t’ be o’ much use. I suppose one such as herself requires many…friends.”

“Oh really,” giggled Dori. “Has she offered her ‘friendship’ to you?”

Balin laid a finger alongside his nose.

“I interpreted it as f’r both of us. Since I didn’t have time t’ speak t’ yeh ‘bout i’, me beloved, I politely turned her down”

“Hmmmm,” remarked Dori, pretending to be in serious thought but smiling naughtily.

There was a rumble on the stairs and the Durin brothers, Gimli, Sigrid and two younger elves trotted in and greeted everyone. All, except Gimli and Legolas, looked happy and refreshed. Legolas looked like he’d been laughing too hard and Gimli was red-faced and sulky.

King Thranduil swept into the room moments later and cast his eyes about.

“How very late you all are. I assure you the dawn was beautiful.”

Ori looked at the king, one eyebrow raised.

“I didn’t see you.”

Thranduil looked confused for an instant then smiled sweetly.

“You should have come and enjoyed the dawn.”

Ori grinned naughtily.

“Thank you, but Dwalin and I thoroughly enjoyed the starlight.”

“Yes, I’m sure you did.”

This exchanged brought snickering and a few blushes from the younger set.

“I didn’t do anything!” Gimli shouted, feeling persecuted.

“And I shall vouch for you, in that.” Legolas assured everyone.

Bombur bustled in with various family members and begged everyone to be seated.

“This morning we have for you another Orocarni meal. Today, we have sweetened rice, pork in a spicy sauce and fried plantains.”

Erda carried in a vast platter containing steaming small rounds, fried golden and smelling wonderful.

Ori, after sampling one of the plantains, dumped a good amount on his plate. They were mealy yet smooth and delicious. The rice was very slightly sweetened and very sticky, the grains much smaller than usual. The pork had fallen apart in the sauce and the tastes combined made Ori sigh with contentment. There were a few plates of cut fruit which looked a little like a peach but was, Erda told them, a similar fruit called an apricot.

Thranduil declined the pork and only had a small spoonful of the rice but after everyone had helped themselves to good portions of the plantains he took the platter, now two-thirds empty, and transferred all the remaining contents to his own plate. Even Thorin looked impressed as the slender elf ate away the entire pile with a smile that reminded Ori of a hawk dining on a rabbit.

Tharkûn arrived at that moment and Thranduil smirked at him.

“You’re just in time,” said the king, nodding to the empty platter.

“You majesty,” said Tharkûn with great dignity, “you are an utter bounder and a piglet.”

“What’s a bounder?” Frodo asked, entering with Bilbo.

Balin replied, “Someone who leaps about and capers.”

Everyone snickered, but Frodo eyed Thranduil with naked skepticism.

Thorin smiled at Frodo.

“How are you feeling this morning, akunith?”

Frodo shrugged and wandered over to him.

“I’m fine, I guess. What’s an ahkoonith?”

“It mean ‘boy who is young’.”

“In khudz… khuzdul?”

“Yes, very good.”

Frodo beamed up at Bilbo.

“I learned a word!”

“You did indeed,” said Bilbo. “Well done! Come and eat second breakfast.”

The table as one turned to Bilbo.

“Second breakfast!” Gimli cried as if he’d never heard something so wonderful. “You eat two breakfasts?”

“Yes,” said Bilbo, “and Frodo slept through the first.”

Erda arrived with a second platter of plantains and very deliberately placed them close to Tharkûn and Frodo and further away from Thranduil, who put on a puppyish frown that would have done Kili proud.

The remains of first, and second, breakfasts were consumed without undo ceremony.
Frodo knelt up in his chair and helped stack the breakfast dishes onto the tray with a practiced hand, Erda lifted it and Frodo followed her out.

The younger set bounded off to don their bathing suits, threatening each other with further water wars.

Bilbo went out, promising more tea and Tharkûn, sitting at his seat one moment, was gone the next.

Thranduil blotted his mouth with his serviette and mentioned something about perambulating the lake on his way out.

Ori put his nose back in his tea cup, wondering what, if anything, was planned today.

“Have you grass stains on your nightshirt, pet,” said Dori idly.

Since Ori wasn’t actually wearing his nightshirt at the moment, he was taken by surprise.

“How do you know?”

“You left it on the drying rack where anyone can see. I suppose this means I’ll have to do a wash.”

“You’re doing a wash here? On holiday? I mean final mourning?”

Balin chuckled and Thorin rolled his eyes.

“I can’t let you go about in dirty clothes, pet,” Dori continued. “You’ve always been…”

Dori went on, as Dori often did, but all Ori heard was: BlahBlahBlahBlah, Badger, BlahBlah…Ori was a grown dwarf, in fact did his own laundry back in Steam Alley. Dori obviously needed a distraction. Any distraction. Ori didn’t even think about what he would say before he said it.

“Dori, please just go get pregnant,” he cried, exasperated.

“Oh!” Dori gasped. “Did I raise you to be that ill-mannered, young dwarf?”

Ori collapsed into his hands, not quite pulling his hair. He hadn’t meant that to spew out the way it had.

“I’m sorry, Dori, but, my laundry? You surely have better things to do than take care of a full grown dwarf with a messy nightshirt. There’s the lake and Balin and the sunshine and Balin and…” Ori paused and looked pointedly at his brother-in-law.

“And Balin!”

Balin winked at Ori and put a hand on Dori’s shoulder.

“The lad does have a point, beloved. We should certainly put our energies into that, plug away at it, so to speak.”

Dori giggled, distracted by such a delightful notion.

“Aye, go plug,” said Dwalin, finishing his tea.

Dori looked flirtatiously at Balin, as he rose. “Well, my heart, are you coming?”

“I certainly hope t’, me beloved.” Balin followed him, patting Dori’s bottom. “Lead the way, as yeh always do.”

Dis and Thorin snorted.

Ori groaned and dropped his face back into his hands.

“Oh, why did I say that? I am such a bad brother!”

“You’re not a bad brother,” said Dis, rolling her eyes. “You’re just a frustrated brother. If he goes on about it again, just blame Dwalin.”

She smirked at him and Ori thought it made her look very much like Thorin.

“Aye,” said Dwalin, “yeh kin blame me. I don’ mind, if it’ll make yeh happy.”

Bilbo came in with the teapot.

“What’s happened, Ori?” Bilbo asked.

“Dori was going on about the grass stains on my nightshirt. I mean…”

Bilbo raised a saucy eyebrow.

“Ahh hah. And, pray tell, how did those get there?”

“We went out t’ muck about…t’gether,” said Dwalin. “We found muck.”

“Yes, Mister Dwalin, thank you,” said Bilbo, “but I had apprehended that much. I was just having Ori on. Do try to keep up.”

Dwalin grinned evilly. “When yeh go’ a young hubby like mine, lad? I’m keepin’ it up mos’ a’ “Dwalin!” Ori cried.
Bilbo chuckled.
“Yes, very good. Very well done. Married him for his subtly and charm, Ori?”
“And his cute butt,” said Ori.
“Aye, “ agreed Dwalin. “Bu’ mostly f’r me butt.”
Bilbo leaned back to inspect ‘the butt’ then nodded.
“Yes, that explains everything.”
Thorin poured Bilbo some tea and very deliberately placed it at the empty seat next to him.
“Do have a seat, Master Baggins,” he rumbled. “Perhaps your presence will keep the conversation on civilized terms.”
“No fear,” Bilbo replied as he seated himself and Thorin poured the exact amount of cream Bilbo usually took.
“Thank you.” Bilbo glanced around the company at the table. “I notice we had some very early risers. The dew on the lawn towards the lake was quite disturbed.”
Ori considered.
“Have you seen Lady Galadriel lately?”
Bilbo’s eyebrow flew up.
“Yes, when I awoke and came down, she was in the kitchen with Erda. She consumed an entire loaf of bread, fresh from the oven and went through a whole pot of elderberry preserves doing it.”
“Ahhh, dear Lady Galadriel,” Thorin said with a suppressed smile. “She does seem to be rather fond of elderberries.”
“Is she still here?” Ori asked.
“No, she disappeared off right after.”
“Didn’t she even pay her shot?” Dis teased.
“Yes,” Bilbo said meditatively. “The peas are ready two weeks early, all the herbs have grown two inches, and I think we may have several rows of onions ready to pull. Quite unusual, as we planted them not even a week ago.”
Thorin looked sideways at Bilbo.
“Really?”
Bilbo nodded. “Yes, onions take their own time. Mind, I’m not sure if I’m pleased that she left the tomatoes to my care or not. Having them suddenly ready would be lovely but I am most particular about my tomatoes.”
“That sauce last night was wonderful, Bilbo,” Dis complimented.
“Thank you. They were from last year.”
“I was amazed at how sweet they were,” Dis went on. “Usually you have to pop in some sweetening as they can be rather acidic.”
“If you’re sweet to them while they grow, they are sweet at harvest,” Bilbo stated.
“Is that a local saying in the Shire?” Ori asked, wishing he’d brought a notebook with him.
“No,” Bilbo smiled. “That was the deep secret imparted to me by my late father, Bungo Baggins.
He always won the prize for the best tomatoes. And, up until now, I followed in his footsteps.”
“If it’s any comfort t’ yeh,” Dwalin said. “Their loss ’s our gain.”
“And we don’t particularly fancy sharing,” Dis added, leaning forward on her folded arms and looking pointedly at Bilbo.
Bilbo actually colored a little and thanked her.
“Uncle Bilbo!”
Bilbo turned at Frodo’s shout and rose.
“Duty calls,” he said and went out.
Thorin stretched and stood.
“It’s a strange thing to have time to do whatever you fancy,” he said. “I keep thinking I ought to go and check on Fili and Kili but I imagine that’s the last thing they’d want.”
“If you offered to take them on again in a water fight, I’m sure they would greet you with absolute delight,” Dis replied.

Thorin paused then a slow grin started.

“Perhaps a sneak attack from both of us, namad?”

Dis squeaked, threw aside her napkin, and ran out after him.

Dwalin shook his head and kissed Ori.

“I be’er go an’ check up on the lads.”

The princes or our guard?” Ori teased.

“Th’ guard, smar’arse.”

“Make sure poor Targ isn’t traumatize?” Ori suggested.

“That, too.”

Dwalin went out and Ori rose and wandered to the window where he could see Bilbo and Frodo walking into the garden. Frodo, suddenly quite excited, ran out of his view. Bilbo chuckled and, placing a box of tools and some plants on the ground, knelt and started to dig in the dirt.

Bilbo took a potful of deep violet flowers, carefully removed the entire contents, dirt and all, and placed it in a shallow hole he’d made in the ground. Then he filled in around the dirt with even more dirt, so that the flowers and stems sat exposed. He patted it all into place and then he took up a can with a spout and poured water around the plant. All the while he was working he seemed to be talking to this plant in a way Ori had seen him talk to Frodo. Then with a final pat at the ground he took up another pot with another plant and did the whole thing again. Ori had a vague idea about plants. Sigrid kept pots of different herbs at the papered over window in her kitchen, where at least there was warmth and a little light. He’d never seen someone take one of those plants and put it back into the ground. A vague idea struck him that Bilbo was somehow taking apart a necklace and putting the gems back into the mine. He watched Bilbo turn and speak over his shoulder to someone Ori couldn’t see, then laugh and go back to his work.

Ori drifted out toward the garden, admittedly curious.

“Really, Gandalf!” he heard Bilbo snort. “I’m amazed he didn’t slam your nose in the door!”

Tharkûn’s familiar chuckle answered and the wizard said, “Given that it’s Celeborn, I’d be amazed if he wasn’t aiming for something besides my nose!”

Bilbo knelt up from where he worked among the flowers, and Tharkûn sat on a bench nearby.

“Ah, Ori,” Bilbo teased. “Revisiting the scene of the crime?”

“What are you doing, Bilbo?”

“Just putting in some flowers for Bombur and Erda. They thought it would be nice, seeing as they’re getting more and more elven guests. Elves know their flowers as well as hobbits do, and you certainly don’t want your flowers to say the wrong things.”

Ori cocked his head.

“I don’t understand. Do these plants talk? Is that why you’re talking back to them?”

“They don’t literally talk to us, no, though I imagine they gossip up a storm amongst themselves. I’m referring to their intrinsic meaning, the things they say symbolically.”

“Plants have meanings? There’s a language to them?” Ori asked.

“Yes, of course.”

Ori felt a shiver of excitement.

“And all hobbits and elves know this?”

“I don’t know if everyone knows it, but it was part of my ‘ground’ education, that is, all the things faunts’ parents teach them even before they can read and write: cooking, keeping house, gardening, manners, the traits and skills hobbits value most.”

“So, it’s not just you who has to be careful what you say. Your garden has to say the right things as well.”

“Yes! Exactly! Especially the front garden, of course, but even your kitchen garden out back should have an order to it. Marjoram, for instance, means ‘happy marriage’ and should be closest to the door. Cilantro is often kept in pots in the kitchen window, since it protects the gardener and brings peace to the home.”

“What about other herbs, like bay, parsley or basil? Those are common in dwarven cooking.”
“Bay and parsley are fine right behind the marjoram. Bay is for ‘glory’, parsley for ‘festivity’, but you might want the basil a little farther out, since it means ‘prosperity and happiness’, but can also mean ‘I hate you’."

"It can mean both?"

"Oh, yes."

Tharkûn chuckled.

"Bilbo, I think you may have created a minor uproar in Master Ori's world."

"Yes!" Ori cried. "Yes! He has! Bilbo, would you mind terribly if I wrote this down? It’s not a race secret or anything?"

"If it is, I’m the last person to say you can’t know about it.” He leant forward and reminded him rather primly, “I am a dangerous criminal, you know.”

“Very, very dangerous,” said Ori, sitting crosslegged in the grass. He pulled out his ever-present notebook and a graphite pen and sharpener.

Ori composed himself, letting his brain fall into the pattern required for gathering knowledge in an oral tradition.

“So, when dealing with plants you also have to be aware of ambiguity. How common is that?”

“Very,” said Bilbo, sitting back on the grass with his pipe. "Almost any flower or plant might have a double meaning, mitigated or enhanced by the flowers around it. Giving a bouquet of flowers has to be planned like a military campaign. The colors of the roses alone can set families to feuding for generations."

"I thought roses were only red; they’re common enough in westron stories, and I did understand they were given as love tokens, usually to pretty females."

"Oh, roses come in many colors," said Bilbo. "Most of them have complimentary meanings, but even the way they are presented has consequence. Offering any color of rose 'thorns first' indicates contempt."

"Might we back up a moment? I wasn't aware hobbits feuded."

"Just like any other race. Of course, until recently that meant refusing to divulge your great grandmother's gooseberry tart recipe."

"Will you please give me examples of plants with double or ambiguous meanings?"

"Of course. Dahlias are cultivated flowers, grown on purpose. They mean ‘instability’, but also ‘dignity’ and ‘elegance’. Yarrow grows wild, and it can mean ‘good health’ but it can also mean ‘this is war’. Almost all plants have at least one positive message, except for lobelia." He snorted to himself bitterly.

"What does lobelia mean?"

"Malevolence."

"Ah. And, will you please tell me, has anyone speculated on the origin of this plant lore?"

"Oh, sometime before the founding of the Shire, certainly, so before written hobbit history."

Ori blinked at him.

"The hobbits did not originally come from the Shire?"

"No."

"You didn’t come from Kingdom of Arnor, just outside the Shire?"

"No, but when Arnor was a kingdom, we did pay some allegiance to their king. It was part of the agreement when we arrived and settled from the east."

“But, that’s not what our history books relate in Erebor."

Bilbo’s eyebrows shot up.

“What do your history books relate?"

“That hobbits descended from the men of Arnor."

“Oh, for fuck’s s- I beg your pardon, Ori. No, hobbits are not descended from men. Considering some men I’ve met, I’m not sure it’s possible for anything to descend further than that. With apologies to any of your far more civil mannish associates."

“So, where did hobbits come from?"

Tharkûn raised his eyebrows.
“I’m afraid, young master, anything more specific than ‘from the east’ is rather forbidden knowledge.”

“Yavanna grew us out of the ground,” said Bilbo matter-of-factly, “in a fertile little vale between mountains and a dense forest, which I’ve always suspected was Lothlorien.”

“Bilbo!” Tharkûn cried, obviously appalled. “Your father would have fits if he could hear you telling hobbit secrets.”

“Since he’s dead, I’m assuming he can hear me,” Bilbo said dryly. “Considering the insane lies I’ve heard about hobbits in my travels, I’d rather at least the dwarrow knew what was true and what was just hogwash. I’ve heard myself described as ‘part bunny’ so many times I can’t count. My ears are not that long, thank you, and I do not have a fluffy little tail. Ori is a scholar and, I believe, sincere in his curiosity.

“Please, Ori, proceed.”

Ori was actually breathing hard when he finally made it back to the inn where Dwalin sat chatting with Bofur on the deck.

“Dwalin! You have to hear this!”

“Hear wha’, love?” He put his hand to Ori’s face and caressed it.

“I was just talking to Bilbo! You wouldn’t believe what he told me!”

“Go on, then.”

“He hasn’t got a tail!”

Dwalin and Bofur looked at each other, and then back at him.

Ori shook his head, “There was more to it than that!”

“That’s a relief,” said Bofur.

Ori grabbed Dwalin’s hand and pulled him to his feet.

“Come here, let me show you!”

He dragged Dwalin to the dining room and on the main table, he laid out the pictures he’d drawn of all the flowers Bilbo had planted or described and Ori sketched. Alongside were their possible meanings and notes as to color.

“They’re more like us than I would have ever thought!”

Dwalin looked at Ori, then at the pictures.

“Love?”

“The flowers aren’t just flowers. Like minerals aren’t just minerals”

When Dwalin still looked a little askance, Ori swept up the stones from a solitaire game on the table. Each stone was flat, smooth and blank on one side, and each was different. He picked up a ruby, an opal and so on, one next to another under his drawings of the flowers.

"This is a yellow rose," said Ori, pointing out one of the drawings. He’d sketched it from Bilbo’s description, since roses weren't common in this part of Arda, but Bilbo had assured him it was accurate.

"Roses are red," said Dwalin. "At least in every book I ever read."

"Actually, they come in different colors, each color with a different meaning, but in this case it can mean friendship, just like this does."

Ori tapped the red stone.

"Just like a ruby?" Dwalin asked.

"Yes. And if you take lupine, which is this plant, and an opal..."

"Opals mean a lot o' things, love," said Dwalin.

"In this case, both the lupine and the opal symbolize the imagination."

Ori could see the moment Dwalin understood.

"They're different, but th' same. Wha's this one called? 'Day lily'?"

"Like snowflake obsidian, it can mean purity. The real difference isn't what they symbolize, but how they're used. Stones are direct."

Dwalin snorted. "Like dwarrow."

"Exactly: this is what I want and this stone is my focus for getting it. Combinations of stones amplify the meanings of the stones themselves, but plants are more subtle. They can have good and bad meanings, and their combinations are used to say things polite people don't say out loud."

"Sneaky buggers, those hobbits."

Ori grinned. "You don't know the half of it. This same yellow rose can also mean jealousy, even infidelity. So, if you sent someone a bouquet of yellow roses and, say, forget-me-nots, it might be a warning about breaking a vow."

"Or: yeh blew it an' I won't f'rget?"

"I don't think hobbits ever forget. Anything."

"Let's hope Thorin realizes that."

Ori took a deep breath, feeling how bold he was about to be.

"I think... I believe this knowledge may grant us insight into the way the hobbits see their world, and possibly give us greater clarity in how we dwarrow see our own."

Dwalin gave him an evil smile.

"Love, are yeh sayin' tha' th' hobbits are throwin' our emotions int' relief?"

Ori giggled.

"Yes! Dipfa would be so proud! Oh! But there’s so much more than that! When I asked if it was true that hobbits were descended from the race of men he snorted and muttered - and then apologized for foul language - and then he said they certainly were not. He said they came from a valley between Lothlorien and the mountains."

“But, they came from Arnor,” said Dwalin.

“No, they came from the valley. That’s where Yavanna grew them from the ground.”

“But the valley between Lothlorien and the mountains, that’s Azanulbizar. Mahal’s hairy arse,” Dwalin muttered. “Is it possible Bilbo’s just having’ yeh on?"

“I thought he might be teasing too,” said Ori, “but Tharkûn was there and he just stared at Bilbo and said he couldn’t believe Bilbo was telling anyone who wasn’t a hobbit about such things. Then Bilbo said that, no, it’s important to tell a scholar because scholars have to be accurate. And, oh, Dwalin, when we get back, Master Brur is going to have to move those works on hobbits to the folktales section. At the very least they’ll have to be extensively annotated!”

The tiniest flicker of emotion crossed Dwalin’s face before it disappeared. Absently Ori noted it might be worry, but he was already off on another idea.

“I need paper! And colored pigments! And ink! I have to start transcribing this! I can work on it right here!”

He dashed up to the room for supplies and when he returned, Thorin had come back from the lake, and was busily toweling his hair and Dwalin was saying to Thorin, “extensively annotated!”

Thorin stared at his shield brother in disbelief.

“What did you just say? Extensively- Those are two words I never imagined coming out of your mouth."

“Fuck yerself, Thorin. I’m married t’ a scholar.”

Then Ori had another idea, and it nearly made him giddy because having one grand idea after another like that was a new and thrilling experience and he like it very much.

“Thorin! Have you ever considered sponsoring a non-dwarf scholar in Erebor?”
“No, but the idea has merit. Did you have someone in mind?”

If Thorin was teasing Ori certainly didn’t have time to note it.

“Bilbo! You have to invite Bilbo to Erebor! This could change the entire course of the dwarrow’s study of other races.”

Thorin opened his mouth but Dwalin beat him to it.

“It’d sure change wha’ Thorin studies.”

The king shot him a filthy look and went upstairs with the towel on his head like a hood. From the top of the stair, Ori heard him shout.

“Extensively annotated, Dwalin! Extensively!”

“Fuck yerself,” Dwalin replied without heat.

Ori sat at the lunch table, salivating. Everyone had come together on the deck to eat to in the sunshine. He had worked hard that morning and he was very ready for food.

A large bowl of cold, filled noodles dressed with a creamy sauce made its way to him and he served himself a healthy portion to eat with his glass of iced fruit juice.

The filled noodles were mixed with finely diced purple onions and green grapes. He had the noodles in his mouth, had bitten down on them, when he heard Dori said, “Bombur, these are delicious spinach dumplings!”

Ori squeaked, rather trapped. He couldn’t spit it out, but he couldn’t quite make himself swallow.

Dwalin leaned over and said, “Swallow it’ with a mouthful o’ juice.”

“Mm-hm,” Ori murmured.

He did so, relieved that it went down with very little trouble.

But, now he had a full plate of traitorous food in front of him.

Then he thought about it. He had tasted a sort of grainy, milky cheese, and there was another flavor he recalled. It was like a stew they ate the first night with the cubes of milk but with different spices. These spices were more like the seasonings from the noodles last night.

And, he liked it.

He huffed out a breath of surprise, shrugged and continued to eat. Why did green food at Bombur and Erda’s inn always taste so good when it was always disgusting when he was a badger? The food here was fresh and seasoned… He blushed a little. Poor Dori never had the money to buy good things and their seasonings had been the simplest. He felt like an ingrate. What a picky badger he had been. Frowning, he made a mental list of the green food he had been exposed to when young. Kale, okra, mustard greens, and those large yellowish green beans. The leafy greens had never been fresh picked and were usually a bit wilted and bitter. The beans had always been so dry, no matter how long they were cooked. No wonder they hadn’t tasted good. Poor Dori. He sat forward.

“Mistress Erda, I don’t know how you do it, but all your green food seems to be good.”

Erda chuckled and Dori shook his head and said,

“It’s all fresh from the garden, pet. Not like the markets under Calmar.”

“I think I might actually try kale or okra from the Ur’s gardens,” Ori stated bravely.

“Okra?!” Kili said, making a face. Almost all the Durins had a similar expression.

“You are truly brave, Ori,” said Thorin. “It just tastes slimy to me.”

“I don’t really use okra as a vegetable,” Erda nodded. “I only have a couple of recipes that use it as a thickener. They are simmered for a long time and the sliminess is cooked away.

“Kale we use also, but either in soup or roasted crisp with seasonings or dried and powdered.”

“Big beans?” Dori offered.

“Only when very young,” Bombur stared firmly
“I might like them, then.” Ori reflected and went back to enjoying the spinach.

After lunch, Ori hurried up to his room with a new sense of purpose. He rooted out his painting supplies and a new canvas. He put the supplies into his satchel. He took a deep breath and turned.

“Ori!” Kili shouted from the hall.

“Yes?” Ori answered.

Kili burst into the room and slammed the door behind him.

“There you are!” cried the younger prince. “I’ve got to talk to you!”

Ori raised an eyebrow. Kili was flushed and very excited, so he couldn’t be in that much trouble.

Ori folded his arms at Kili.

“What have you done?” he asked in mock seriousness.

Kili grinned hugely and thrust a piece of paper at him.

“Read this!” he commanded.

Ori turned the paper right-side up and looked at the somewhat messy runes.

“O slender as a willow bow
O clearer than a diamond
O sapling by the River Running
Fair Greenwood’s daughter
O bat-silent, raven-clever, fox-haired damsel
O wind on the waterfall,
How I love her laughter.”

“Um…What is this?” Ori asked carefully.

“A poem, but it could be a song,” Kili replied eagerly.

“Yes,” Ori replied, he was not sure where Kili was going with this and decided to proceed cautiously, very cautiously. “I see. Where did you find it?”

“I wrote it,” Kili informed him proudly.

“Oh.” Ori had a terrible premonition as to where this was going and didn’t want anything to do with it.

Kili grinned at him eagerly, saying,

“Can you translate it?”

“Translate it?”

“Yes. Into sindarin.”

Ori did not groan as he knew his premonition had been horribly right and wrestled wildly with his thoughts.

“I’m not sure if it will scan,” he said doubtfully. “Why?”

“It’s for Tauriel,” Kili admitted, blushing.

Now Ori was sure it would not scan.

“But you’ve said willow saplings aren’t good for bows when they’re all yellow and bendy,” he added, casting vainly for a way to talk the ardent princeling out of what he privately thought would be a sure-fire way of hearing the elf captain laugh to the point of tears and at Kili.

“The older wood is great for bows. But that’s not the point!” Kili cried. “It’s poetry!”

Ori wasn’t sure this little verse could be classed as poetry.

“Please?” Kili turned large puppy pleading eyes on him.

Ori sighed.

“I’ll do my best.”

“Thanks, Ori-mate! You’re brilliant.”

Kili rushed out, slamming the door after him.

Ori sighed, put his satchel and canvas on the bed. He might as well get this over with. He took out a notebook and graphite pen and started working on the ‘poem’.

Dwalin came in and looked surprised.

“Love, when I said me life was poetry, I didn’t think yeh’d rush righ’ out t’practice.”

“I can assure you, this is not my work.”

Dwalin sat next to Ori on the bed and read over his shoulder.

“Tha’ looks like Kili’s scrawl.”

“It is Kili’s scrawl. Unfortunately, it’s still legible.”

“Bat silent an’ raven clever? Oh, Mahal he’s got i’ bad as our Thorin.”

“Yes, and Kili’s sharing. I’m supposed to translate it into sindarin and have it make some sense.

I’m afraid he’s going to have to pick one or the other.”

“It’s better than T’dillah’s.”

“His hands are just as sweaty at the moment.”

Dwalin snickered and rose, collecting up Grasper and Keeper.

“Don’t be staying inside all day, love.”

“I won’t. I’m going to finish this and get my painting kit together.”

Dwalin kissed him.

“I’m goin’ to spar with our Gimmers. See yeh later?”

“Yes. Love you!”

“Love yeh, too.”

But just as Ori had finished the poem, a knock came at the door. Ori knew it wasn’t Kili as Kili didn’t knock.

"Please, come in," said Ori said putting the poem into his notebook and closing it.

It was Thorin.

"Ori."

Thorin closed the door behind him and leaned on the jam.

"Tharin?"

"What do you know about hobbits?"

"A bit. They aren’t as secretive as we are, just usually more elusive." Thorin was looking everywhere except at him.

"What is their custom concerning the taking of a mate?"

"In regards to their laws, their traditions or their biology? Oh, by the way, they aren’t bunnies.”

Then Thorin did look at him.

"What?"

"They don’t have fluffy little tails."

"Good to know," said Thorin. "But do they have heartsongs?"

Before Ori could haul his jaw back up, Thorin pushed off the door and continued briskly, pacing and gesturing as he often did when consulting with Dain or the Fundins, as if his heart was a matter of arranging companies on a battlefield.

"I understand they might use a different term for the same thing, or not use any term for it, or not understand the concept, which probably doesn’t exist between persons of similar gender or there wouldn’t be so many of them. In fact, the concept may be completely abhorrent to most of them, and even if it is not, who is to say what qualities they expect in a mate? They might-

"Tharin, are you in love with Bilbo?" Ori decided to interrupt.

The king lurched to a halt, something like fear in his eyes.

"I never expected this to happen," said Thorin. "I really did think myself craft wed, with my craft being my service to my people. It's all I ever thought I would have."

Ori smiled gently.

"I noticed that sometimes the valar have other plans," he said.

Thorin ran his hand down his face and sighed.

"I haven't felt like such a fool since I was a badger."

Ori filed through everything he knew about Thorin. It still wasn't very much, he thought, though lately they were together constantly. Then he searched his own feelings on the matter.
It would do no good to encourage Thorin to simply do this for his own happiness. That would just shut him down. Too many other people depended on him.

"Maybe it's meant as a way to get people used to someone besides a dwarf as a royal of Erebor," Ori said. "Maybe it's what Mahal wants."

Slowly Thorin sat on the edge of the bed, eyes wide.

"What do you know?"

"Do you trust me?"

"With my life."

A simple 'Yes' would have sufficed, and been a lot less likely to give Ori a nervous collapse.

"I was sketching the scenery yesterday and I lost time somewhere. It was noon, and then suddenly it was a lot later. I think Mahal was there, because when I looked back through my book I found I'd sketched pictures of life in Erebor. Bilbo and Frodo were in them."

"Doing what?" Thorin asked.

"Balin was showing Frodo one of the tomes from his library. Bilbo was making bread in the kitchen at Fundin House."

That was as far he would go toward telling Thorin he had drawn the king and a hobbit in bed.

"So, you think this a command from Mahal?" Thorin asked.

"A command? No. I think it's more of a gentle nudge, and I don't believe Mahal would encourage you toward anyone if it would make you unhappy, or for an alliance. You've said yourself, dwarrow don't just arrange marriages like business deals."

"But I am the high king."

"But you are still a dwarf."

Thorin breathed out slowly, casting about, perhaps for an answer.

"I am at that. Of course, I have no idea what Bilbo wants, besides the obvious."

"He's not exactly coy, is he," Ori mused. "But you'll never know if he wants more than that if you don't take pains to speak with him."

"Without sounding like a pedagogue or a belch of forge gasses? So far the most natural conversation we've had, has been about Frodo."

Ori sat up.

"There's an idea," he said.

"What is?"

Ori hopped off the bed and headed toward the door.

"I have to make some arrangements! I'll tell you what I did after dinner!"

Back in his room, a short time later, Ori, feeling much better, quickly finished his work on translating Kili’s poem and then took out a new piece of paper and a bottle of pale green ink. He sharpened a quill and wrote out the translation in sindarin script with a few flourishes.

At the bottom, he drew a small stem with willow leaves and then added a few dainty pink flowers to the work and wrote the title as ‘To Tauriel’. He sanded and blew on it to dry the ink. A flash on intuition made him fold it up into a paper bird. Satisfied, he picked up his satchel and canvas and went out. He came through the reception and went to the deck. Kili was fidgeting with the candle holder on the table. He jumped up when Ori arrived and silently handed the ‘bird’ to Kili. Kili’s eyes widened in delight as he examined it.

"Ori-mate! It's beautiful! You put flowers on it, too. Elves like flowers. You’re so bloody smart."

Kili looked up, grinning hugely. "Ori-mate, I can’t thank you enough. You’ve made this perfect! If I can-"

"Give it back to me and I’ll fold it up." Ori cut him off, feeling himself starting to blush with the praise. He quickly put it back into its bird shape and handed it to Kili.
   “There, go and give it to her. I hope she enjoys it.”
Kili grabbed Ori and squeezed him in a rough hug.
   “You’re the best, Ori-mate,” he crowed then let Ori go and sped off.

With a deep breath for courage, Ori set out the easel on a drop cloth on the lawn over looking the lake, then set the pots of colored pigments and solvents on a small utility table he’d borrowed from the barn. He opened the box of new brushes and worked them a little until he was happy with their shape and ‘give’ and picked up his palette.

   In front of him, on the stretched and prepared canvas, he had created a light cartoon with the graphite pen that represented the general shape of the landscape and the features he wanted to emphasize.

As he mixed the paint, thinking about the process, the sounds of the inn faded away. He watched the colors develop, the shades of blue, the little edges of jade green, the barest yellow-white and the deeper yellow and even the blue-white for the sun on the water. It occurred to him, that many of the same minerals in the water were also mixed into the paint base. Funny how he’d never thought of it before.

   The other thing that occurred to him was that if this didn’t turn out perfect, he might not be happy, but it wouldn’t be fatal either. He could do this however he liked, as many times as he liked. He had time now. He vowed to himself, he would make time in the future.

   Several hours passed. He knew this by the movement of the sun and the slight pain at the small of his back from standing and moving over and over in the same space, the tiredness of his arms from painting and holding the palette and the collection of paint smears on the old kitchen apron he used as a smock.

He looked at the painting, the palette, the brush and realized he was finished. It was finished. He made his sigil in the lower left corner with the date. He was proud of that sigil. Every king’s scribe created their own. It was how they signed their work. It was cut on the seals they used in the wax of official documents.

Snickering, he realized they were also used to sign rather abstract renditions of mountain lakes.

Sigrid came outside with a pitcher and glasses on a tray.
   “Here, I brought lemonade, and some biscuits I rescued before Kili devoured them all.”
   “That’s a really good haul.”
   “I stared him down as they were coming off the cooling rack. They have xocolātl chunks in them.”

She looked over the canvas.
   “Ooo, that’s nice.”
   “You think so? I only see mistakes.”
   “Time for Master Oin to look at your eyes.”
   “I beg your pardon! I don’t want him hooking up my thighs!”

Sigrid laughed.
   “You’re terrible! Accurate, but terrible.”

Ori capped his paints and set his brushes to soak in the tin of solvent before he wiped his hands and grabbed a bikkie. They sat on the grass as Sigrid poured.
   “Oh Maha’ this’ goo!” he exclaimed with his mouth full.
   “I know, right? No wonder Bombur and Erda are so round. I wish I could cook half so well.”
   “I’ve never heard your family complain.”
   “Bain eats too fast to taste anything and Da’d eat an old boot if I put it in front of him. I dread what Tilda will say when I get home and I hear what delights Mistress Dazla has cooked up. And speaking of Tilda.”

Despite the ‘immodest’ bathing costume, Dipfa had produced some very nice clothing for Sigrid. The sleeveless, sky blue tunic fell straight into extremely wide-legged pants, cinched at the waist with a cloth belt lined with pockets. She took a folded slip of paper from one.
“Pockets! Finally!” said Sigrid. “Why did it take so long for someone to figure this out? Did they think women wanted to pin pockets to their aprons all their lives?”

“She’s working on creating fashions that are ‘sleek and chic’,” said Ori. “I think she’s getting up her gumption to submit some designs to Vug Magazine. She’s already done a couple of small articles.”

“Then I’m flattered she’s trying them out on me, but I’m not exactly shaped like a dam.”

“Dipfa has an eye to a larger market than Erebor. She went on about ‘coordinating separates’, which I suppose means everything can be worn with everything else.”

“Yes, I suspect I’m supposed to wear a shirt under this,” said Sigrid.

“But then Fili wouldn’t see your fine arms,” said Ori.

“Exactly!”

“Rather brazen of you, your highness.”

“Go soak your head.”

“So, Tilda wrote you?”

“No, Mistress Dazla. Poor Tilda. This is the first time I’ve ever been gone overnight in her whole life.”

Considering how often Ori was left alone at that age, he was rather jealous.

“How is she?”

Sigrid sighed.

“Oh, that’s not good,” said Ori.

“I left Tilda in charge of the chickens. This morning she went to feed them and one was missing.”

“I’ll kill him,” said Ori.

“Who?”

“Nori.”

“Why do you assume it’s Nori?”

“It just saves time.”

“Anyway, poor Tilda was in hysterics. She feels like she let me down. As if she can stand guard over a chicken coop all night! Chickens disappear. It happens.”

“I’m sure Mistress Dazla distracted her with something else soon enough.”

“Yes, but I’m sure I haven’t heard the last of the Great Dale Chicken Emergency.”

“So,” said Ori, pouring them both out a little more lemonade. “How are things going with Fili? Have you seen his bare butt yet?”

Ori had his answer when Sigrid’s cheeks turned bright red.

“Ah-hah. Congratulations. If your da knew he’d have apoplexy.”

“I certainly have no intention of sharing it with Da’,” Sigrid assured him.

“Um… Sig, are you playing safe?”

“Yes, luckily Fili’s a gentledwarf. In fact, he was such a gentledwarf I had to lead him a little astray, strumpet that I am.”

“Shocking!”

Sigrid laughed.

“To tell the truth, it didn’t take much leading. The first time I put my hand on his crotch his cock went rock hard and the rest of him turned into puddle of dwarven goo.”

“I can see that happening,” Ori agreed. “The princes are amazingly good-natured, considering what trouble they might get into.”

“With an amad like Dis and an imad like Gridr? I think unrestrained wenching is out of the question.”

“Do you love him?”

“I think I’m a fair way to it. It’s nice we had this time together to talk about something other than the fate of Erebor. That sort of talk is essential, but not romantic. It’s amazing what we’ve found that we have in common. We both hate tripe in any form. We agree that Thranduil could be as hilarious as Dori if he would take the stick out of his ass, and we both think the smell of the rain-soaked rocks is the best.
“Actually, I’m rather surprised at myself. I’ve indulged in tunic rippers from an early age, and admired Fili’s butt nearly as long, but I always knew my fate was to marry a man like my father and be his wife and keep his house. My father would make sure my husband was a good, fair man, of course, but nothing out of the ordinary. Now I’m contemplating marriage to a dwarf prince, who is the perfect definition of a good, fair man and, most importantly to me, we can make each other laugh. That turn in the path came up rather unexpectedly.”

“Sometimes those turns lead to someplace pretty wonderful,” said Ori.

They clinked their glasses together and drank.

“May I join you?”

Ori shaded his eyes and looked up at Tauriel.

“Please, come join us. There are biscuits left, and you can share my glass if you don’t mind dwarf spit.”

“If I did before, I can hardly complain of it now,” said Tauriel. She knelt in the grass with the grace of a doe. “I take it the order of the day is shameless gossip?”

“Mainly about ourselves,” said Sigrid. “Remember what I told you about Fili?”

“Oh, yes!” said Tauriel, her eyes brightening. “How did it go?”

“He was quite agreeable and, you were right. It’s just the right size without making me choke.”

Ori nearly spit out his lemonade, but he supposed it was inevitable. He knew from Sigrid that dams said far more among themselves than most males could imagine.

“No wonder Fili’s smiling so much,” he said. “Are things proceeding apace with Kili?”

Tauriel smiled fondly.

“You wouldn’t expect it, I suppose, but Kili is more the hand-holding and star-gazing sort. We’ve kissed, but he’s very gentle. I long to tell him that, really, as a soldier I’m not likely to break for a little groping, but I don’t want to rush him, either. I have time. I can wait. Not that it makes me any more patient. But I can wait.”

“And what of Captain Dwalin?” Sigrid nudged Ori’s knee with her bare foot. “How does he measure up to your expectations?”

Ori felt quite secure in telling them, “He has the most adorable arse in all Arda.”

Sigrid giggled.

“You are such a love sick pup! Look at your face!”

“I admit it,” said Ori, “I’m ridiculously happy, and very well satisfied, though I’m sure we haven’t done a quarter of the things in bed he would like.”

“He doesn’t pressure you?” Tauriel asked, suddenly quite Stern.

“Oh, no, he’s a lot more patient with me than I am with myself. It’s just that, he’s not just more experienced than me, he’s also a lot… larger. His prick is beautiful, but also a little intimidating.”

Tauriel tilted her head, obviously thinking very seriously on this.

“You have no one you trust you might ask about such things?”

“Oh, I might ask,” said Ori, “but it won’t do me any good if I’m so embarrassed that I burst into flames before I hear the answer.”

“Perhaps a book? You do work in a library, don’t you.”

Ori blinked. I had never occurred to him, but, yes, he did work in a library and there were books on all subjects. He even had a general idea where to find the ones he wanted.

“I’m a complete shalehead,” he said. “Thank you, Tauriel.”

“Errrr… you’re welcome?”

“I’m sorry, Sig,” said Ori. “I forget you’re not a dwarrowdam. Yes, they do exist.”

Sigrid bit her lip.

“I don’t suppose there are books on sex between different races?” she asked.

“Ooo, that would be useful,” said Tauriel.

“You’d have to peek for me, Ori,” said Sigrid. “I don’t think I’m allowed in the Great Library.”

“You should be,” said Ori. “Everyone should be. I need to talk to Thorin about that.”

“Really?” Sigrid asked. “You’re going to ask Thorin to let non-dwarrow in the Great Library?”
“Yes,” Ori continued. “Well, and he’ll have to ask Master Brur. Thorin is the king, but Master Brur is… Master Brur. As far as he’s concerned, that’s his library to defend to the death. But I don’t think it’s a problem. Master Brur says knowledge is for everyone. He even told Tilda he’d hire her as a scribe when she grew up if she kept up her studies.”

“Did he?” Sigrid asked. “Was that at the military coup disguised as Princess Dis’ tea party for the people of Dale?”

“No, when she came into the library.”

“When was Tilda in the library?”

“She came in with Furh’nk once. She already has her desk staked out, right next to mine.”

“I wondered why she was suddenly so interested in her studies. She never has been before, but now she seems so determined. She chatters constantly about starting school in a few weeks.”

“King Bard is going to let her go to school with the other badgers?” Tauriel asked.

“Yes, the East Dale School. It’s not that far from his, er, office? The place he meets people to talk business. I believe they’re going to call them council chambers. Anyway, there are three schools to start with. Luckily, some of Calmar’s richer cronies graciously handed over their well-kept houses to the King of Dale.”

Both Ori and Tauriel snorted at this.

“But, will Tilda not have a guard?” Tauriel asked. “She is a princess.”

“We have a small squadron of volunteers among the men,” said Sigrid. “Furh’nk has them training with his soldiers, though so far it looks like a bunch of badgers fighting over candy at a Yule party.”

“Besides,” said Ori, “she knows every one of Thorin’s royal guards by name. Anyone who so much as looks at her in a threatening way is going to get a pike up the nose.”

“Excellent,” said Tauriel, “I approve,” and swiped the last biscuit. Sigrid picked up the empty tray and pitcher, putting the glasses inside. Ori gathered up his bits and pieces. Sigrid took the table and cloth and Tauriel took the painting canvas carefully in both hands and they all went into the inn.

Bombur met them in the hallway.

“Ah, Ori!” He smiled. “How did the painting go?”

“I really enjoyed myself but, as to the painting, I only see mistakes and Sigrid tells me I need my eyes looked at.”

“May I see?” Bombur asked.

Ori nodded and Tauriel held the canvas up for display. Bombur looked the painting over, his eyebrows slowly rising.

“Master Ori, I’m no expert, but I like this very much.”

Ori blushed. “Thank you, Master Bombur. It’s still wet, though.”

Bombur looked about the reception hall then went and removed a large cloth hanging from behind the desk. He rolled up the hanging, came back, gently took the painting and carefully hung the canvas by its edge on the ready hook. He stood back and eyed the painting.

“There. It can dry nicely here.”

“Master Bombur!” Ori cried.

That someone had immediately hung his painting in a place anyone could see it was almost overwhelming.

“It looks wonderful!” Sigrid enthused going to stand next to Bombur. Ori and Tauriel walked to their sides. Ori looked at his painting anew. Here in the inn, it wasn’t just a wet canvas. Having it on the wall made the painting quite different. He looked again and felt a small seed of pride in his heart. He had done a good job.

“My Erda,” Bombur called.

Erda’s voice caroled back from somewhere and she appeared from the stairwell.

“Yes, my Bom?”

Bombur gestured to the painting.

“Oh!” Erda cried and hurried forward. “Wherever did you get that, my love? It’s lovely and so true to life!”
“Our Master Ori just finished painting it, my plum. Right out on our lawn.”
Erda turned to Ori, delight in her eyes, and embraced him.
“It’s beautiful, Ori dear.”
Ori felt his face flame.
“Th-thank you,” he stammered. “It’s the first time I’ve ever painted a full, complete canvas. Do you really like it?”
“Master Ori,” Bombur said formally, “I will pay you handsomely for it.”
“No, no!” Ori gasped. “You won’t, please! Really, if you like it that much, you may keep it!”
Erda embraced him again, this time with a small gush of tears.
“When it’s dry,” Bombur said, thoughtfully, “I shall have Edi look through the wood store and find some strips of birch, I think, and stain them. We’ll put it in a very nice frame and it will stay right there.”
Ori thought his head would go up in flames.
“I’m honored Mistress Erda, Master Bombur.”
Dori and Balin came in through the front door at that moment.
“What’s to do?” Dori asked seeing them all gathered. Erda gestured Ori’s painting. Balin and Dori looked.
“That is an excellent work,” Balin nodded. “Is it still wet?”
“I just finished it.” Ori explained.
Dori and Balin stared at him.
“Yeh did tha’, wee brother?” Balin looked amazed and delighted.
Dori stared open-mouthed at Ori.
Ori nodded, a little sheepishly.
Dori looked at the painting again, burst into tears, and threw himself on Ori.
“Ooooh, my clever little badger! It’s so beautiful! I knew you were very talented but never dared dream you would make anything so wonderful! I’m so proud of you!”
Ori patted Dori’s back and buried his face in Dori’s shoulder.
“Do you really like it, Ori’s Dori? You and Balin aren’t just being nice?”
Dori pulled away.
“Being nice? Don’t be silly, pet. It’s lovely!”
Thorin, Dwalin, and Gimli came in from the deck. They looked at what was on the wall.
“That’s new,” Thorin observed. “Excellent work! Your artist has a talent with presenting light. Where did you find this?”
Tauriel beamed and Sigrid pointed at Ori.
“Talented artist, right there.”
Thorin turned and looked at Ori.
“You did this?”
Ori nodded, red-faced. Dwalin gave him a look that made him want to dance, burst into song, and hide under the bed for a week.
“I knew yeh had it in yeh.” Dwalin said simply, crossed to Ori, and wrapped him in his arms. Ori hugged his husband as hard as he could. Gimli rushed to the door to the deck and bellowed for the others.
“Ori, this is amazing.” Thorin added, staring at the painting. “It really is.”
“We’re keeping it.” Erda put in, a teasing light in her eyes. “Ori said we could. As soon as it’s dry, we’re going to have it framed.”
Thorin turned and regarded Ori with an amused look. “Well, in that case he’s just going to have to paint me another one. I think I rate a such a marvelous reminder of the lovely time we’re having at your inn, Mistress Erda.”
Ori buried his burning face and unstoppable grin of pride into his husband’s chest. Dwalin’s arms tightened around him. Ori felt his chuckle and hum of pride.
Dis, Bilbo, Fili, Kili and Legolas came in, trailed by the elf king.
“Ori, that’s magnificent!” Dis praised.
“Told you he was a genius,” Kili said with authority. Legolas and Fili nodded their agreement. Thranduil came over and gave the painting an appraising look.

“You just painted this, Master Ori?” he asked quietly.

“Yes,” Ori mumbled.

“Hmm,” he mused. “King Thorin, perhaps when you could spare him, you shall send your scribe to me. I have a section of garden of which I am particularly fond. I believe he will do it justice.”

Thorin didn’t reply, just grinned proudly at Ori.

Bilbo came from the kitchens and looked rather surprised at the amount of people in the hallway.

He looked at the painting.

“Very impressive, Ori.”

“Thank you,” Ori managed.

Thranduil turned back from the stairway and pinned Ori with a look.

“I think you should consider painting portraits as well, Master Ori.”

Ori slowly put away his supplies in his room. Dwalin was watching him. Ori straightened.

“I’m so puffed up yet so embarrassed, I don’t know whether to offer to sign autographs or hide in a pantry cupboard.”

Dwalin laughed and took Ori in his arms.

“I’m so bloody proud a’ yeh, love. I was wishin’ I could’a watch yeh th’ entire time, bu’ I know how yeh are when folks are staring at yeh workin’.”

“Did you like it?” Ori looked up, resting his chin on Dwalin’s chest.

“I think it’s brilliant. Looks like a mirror was pu’ up in th’ garden.”

Ori pushed his face harder into Dwalin chest.

“I love you,” he mumbled.

“I love yeh, too, me ghivashel, I love yeh, too.”

Ori squeezed hard again and let go. His body reminded him of the prosaic.

“I’m hungry.”

Dwalin laughed.

“Well, yeh better get yehsel’ washed an’ tidied up. It’s almos’ th’ dinner hour.”

Ori and Dwain headed into the dining room. Almost everyone was there and seated at the window or messing about as usual.

Gimli and Legolas came in after them.

Dori waved Ori and Dwalin over and Balin passed them each a glass of sherry. The decanter on the table was down to the dregs now and Thranduil and Dis were conversing quite merrily.

Ori tasted the amber liquid. It was thickish and strong, leaving a pleasant burn down his throat. Ori nibbled from a bowl of roasted and salted peanuts while drinking his sherry. It was making him hungrier.

Erda came in and called everyone to the table. Ori went to his usual seat and looked at his place setting. There was a wine glass on his right, a red leather mat on which perched a small plate. Beside the plate on the right were several forks. At least they looked like forks, with long handles but only two tines and these were thin, long, and quite sharp.

On the left sat a second plate and a spreading knife. Ori looked up at Dwalin, who had picked up one of his forks and was testing the sharpness.

“Guess we’re t’ poke our food t’ death a’afore we eat it,” he suggested.

Ori considered the fork.

“We must be eating mice.”

Dwalin snorted appreciatively and gave Ori’s knee a squeeze.

Again the seating was arranged as sets of four. On the table, for each set, three small contraptions held a wide dish over a wide, flattish candle with three wicks. Erda lit them all. Poli, Ari, Muri and Jaki came in and set platters of meat, chicken, crawfish and vegetables, some raw and some cooked, around each setting of four. Then Bombur, Bilbo and the rest of the Ur badgers followed bearing wide, cast iron, lidded bowls. They set three bowls on the contraptions and a fourth, which was cool, in a space nearby, and lifted the lids.

“Tonight,” Bombur announced, “we have another dish from Angmar. There it is called Fondue or Dips.”

“Why is everyone looking at me?” Kili demanded, bringing chuckles from around the table.

“The three hot dishes are sauces for the meat, chicken, fish and cooked vegetables, and the cool one is for the raw vegetable. There is a beef broth, a creamy white sauce flavored with parsley, and a hot smoked cheese sauce. The forks are for spearing what you wish to eat and then you dip it into the sauce. The heated ones will take a few moments to warm the food through. The small plates are for catching the sauce when transferring the food from the pots. Please enjoy your meal!”

The babble of talk started again as Bombur and Erda seated themselves as did their offspring. Ori looked at Sigrid seated opposite him and they both inspected the food offered. Ori speared a pink crawfish firmly and gingerly put his long fork into a bubbling cheese sauce. There were little notches along the edges of the bowls and these held the forks in place. Dwalin speared a piece of beef and stuck it into the boiling broth. Sigrid took a crawfish, too and popped it in beside Ori’s. Fili took up a stick of raw carrot and swirled it through the cool sauce. He tried it then grinned.

“This is good sauce. It’s like the dressing on the lunch salad but thicker and with more spices and flavor.”

Sigrid speared a thick chunk of cucumber and tried the cool sauce as well. She hummed in delight.

“Mmmm, this is good. Ready Ori?”

She grinned and caught hold of her fork. Ori grabbed his and using the little plate to catch the drips, brought the crawfish to his mouth. The crawfish was as delicious as Dwalin had said. Firm and tasty and warm from the cheese sauce. Ori turned to Dwalin.

“The crawfish are good.”

Dwalin nodded around the chunk of beef in his mouth.

“Aye. Try this beef with th’ broth, love. It’s broth bu’ almos’ gravy I don’t know wha’ our Bom put in, but it’s th’ best I’ve e’er had.”

Ori tried it and it was wonderful. The meal was enjoyed by everyone. Ori caught sight of Dori as he waved a veggie at Thranduil.

“Do try the smoked cheese sauce, Thrany, dear. It’s quite lovely!”

Thranduil looked sideways at Dori, who fluttered his eyelashes.

“Why Thrandy! Do I sense refusal or caprice? I ask you in all confidence: Do you… fondue?”

Thranduil look playfully down at Dori and took Dori’s fork, dipped it into the cheese and ate it before returning the fork to Dori. He seemed to consider then smiled.

“Quite tolerable.”

“Oh! You naughty creature!” Dori was quite satisfied and looked around for another victim.

“Thorin have you tried the beef?”

Dis made as though to help her brother to some.

“No, no thank you,” Thorin said quietly, gesturing his sister’s offer away.

“What’s wrong?” Dis demanded. “It’s very good. It’s lovely and thick and—“ “Just, no.” Thorin interrupted.

“Thorin,” Thranduil started.

“I’m sorry,” Thorin said quickly. “It… I used to change Kili’s nappies often and it…”

Dis shrieked with laughter and there were various cries of “Eww!” Unfortunately this idea put most of the older set completely off the beef but the younger set thought it hilarious and demanded the bowls be sent their way to eat.

After dinner was finished along with the clean up, Bifur directed the moving of furniture and Bofur brought out a large white canvas which he laid out in the middle of the floor. The cloth was painted with rows of large circles. There were six lines of six colors, a row in each color consisting of blue, red, yellow, green, purple and orange. The Ur badges were very excited about this and began urging their guest to come and gather around.

Thorin and Dis looked at the cloth and exchanged glances. Balin and Dwalin snickered at each other.

“Now,” Bombur began. “Tonight, we have another game. It was quite popular when many of us old folk were little badgers, but may be new to some of you as it fell out of fashion, being considered silly and somewhat rude. It must be played barefoot.”

Fili fixed his mother with a look.

“Amad, you know about this?”

Dis snickered.

Thorin groaned.

“Yes, Fili, your mother and I used to play it with the Fundins until your great grandfather ordered it banned. And, yes, we have spent the rest of our lives hiding our game pieces from you.”

Bombur chuckled and continued.

“The game is called ‘shimmy’ and requires six people and one other to roll the dice. The game ends when the last person falls down.”

“Falls down?” Tauriel repeated.

“Precisely,” Thorin smiled.

“Is this required?”

“More like inevitable.”

Erda beckoned.

“Well, since you and the Fundins already know how to play, come and show us the first round. Fili, Kili you can make up the set.”

The Durins and the Fundin brothers all pulled off their boots and socks, dumping them in a pile, and lined up, three to a side at opposite ends of the cloth. They were then instructed to place one foot on a red circle and one on a blue. This required some hopping around but when everyone was situated.

Ori was requested to sit at the side and throw the dice.

Ori willingly did so. Bombur showed Ori the two die One die showed color choices and the other showed pictures body parts, these were right foot, left foot, right hand, left hand, butt, and forehead.

Ori giggled and shook the dice in their box then dumped them out.

“Right foot, green,” he announced. The blue dots were on the far side of the cloth and soon there was a line of Durin and Fundins all with their right feet firmly planted on green dots. Ori shook the dice again and looked at the result.

“Left hand, purple,” he announced. There was a struggle as the players reached across the rows of dots to place hands on the purple. All the spectators laughed. Delighted, Ori shook the dice again.

“Right foot, yellow,” he called. There was a good deal of laughing among the players as they had to keep their hands on purple dots and hopped their right feet over to the yellow. The players were now bent, one foot and one hand held aloft.

The game progressed with both players and watchers laughing harder and harder as the players twisted themselves into ridiculous and convoluted stances, arms and legs stretching to all points on the cloth.

Kili and Balin were declared out first as the two became hopelessly entangled and Kili was laughing so hard he collapsed on Balin’s stomach. Dori and Tauriel rushed to help them and the two managed to crawl off to sit snickering at themselves. Dis and Fili got entangled and fell over each other next.

Thorin and Dwalin were left to almost wrestle each other, egged on by the teasing spectators. Ori called that butts had to be on green while right feet stayed on stayed on blue, while the left feet had to touch orange. The shield brothers faced each other, slowly stretching to park their butts on the middle dots. Dwalin, being only slightly taller than Thorin, was able to sit with a toe on the other two dots.

Thorin stretched and started to laugh so hard he snorted which set Dwalin off.

Fili, on all fours, leaned his cheek to the floor and declared that Dwalin’s ass was touching the green and both his toe and heel were on the other two colors.

“C’mon nadad!” Dis called.

Thorin hissed through his teeth and stretched.
“Mahal!” he wheezed. “Bloody good thing I already have an heir!”
“Stretch idad!” Kili shouted.
“Du bekar!” roared Bifur.
Thorin huffed and fell onto his butt and although his right toe stayed put, the left toe flew free.
“Ohhhhh!” grieved the princes.
Thorin dropped forward onto his face and shook with laughter. There was more laughing and cheering. Thorin rolled off the mat and lay face down, snorting into the floor. Dis, Balin, and Bilbo helped him up. He rubbed at his inner thighs. Ori went to Dwalin, who was also soundlessly shaking with mirth.
“Are you alright, Captain Champion?” Ori asked.
Dwalin relaxed back against him, his legs slowly closing.
“Sorry, love. No nooky f’r yeh t’nigh’. I think I may’ve sprained me crotch!”
Ori dropped his head on Dwalin’s shoulder.
“You’re so silly!”
“I dunno if I kin stand up, love.”
“Stop laughing and you will,” Ori told him, giggling, starting to tug at his shoulders.
Dwalin didn’t and, with a snicker, Thranduil came to their rescue and easily hauled the captain to his feet. Dwalin grabbed his savior by the neck and gave him a friendly forehead thump.
“Thanks, lad!”
Thranduil was left to ponder the implications of being called ‘lad’ with true affection for the first time in, perhaps, millennia.
Dori encouraged Thranduil to play next, and eventually he acquiesced, along with Legolas and Tauriel, Gimli, Sigrid, and Bilbo. Bofur threw the dice for them. He threw them and snatched them up so quickly Ori suspected he was making up a few moves just to add to the silliness.
Sigrid and Tauriel dueled to a draw long after everyone else had collapsed. Thranduil accused Bilbo of employing treacherous tactics, constantly pulling silly faces at the elf king when he tried to concentrate. Legolas claimed Gimli tickled him but Gimli protested loudly he wasn’t responsible for what his beard did.
The next round called for Ori, Dwalin, Bifur, Dis, Thorin and Bilbo to take to the cloth mat. Fili and Kili fought over the dice. Ori struggled vaiently but it was too silly and trying to crawl over or under his fellow players and not collapse giggling was awkward to say the least. He was almost grateful when Dwalin ‘accidentally’ sat on him, declaring them both ‘out’. Dis and Bifur seemed locked in combat with each other while Thorin and Bilbo pursued each other over the cloth. Dis emerged the winner, though Thorin complained she had burped in his face on purpose. Dis smirked and didn’t deny the accusation in the least.
The younger set went for another round with the Ur badgers while Erda set out a smaller round table at the window seat with more chairs around it. There she seated Thorin, Bilbo, Ori, Dwalin, Thranduil, Dori and Balin.
Tharkûn appeared on the end of the window seat, declaring he was going to watch.
Bombur brought eight wine glasses and a large decanter of brilliant yellow, cloudy wine. Bombur poured it out and Ori tasted. It was a vibrant citrus, cool and smooth, almost like lemonade. It was just as well Ori reflected, if Dwalin was slightly incapacitated, he was likely to be drunk.
Erda passed out blank pieces of paper and graphite pens to each and said they were going to play ‘Consequences’.
This was played by everyone writing a male’s name at the top of the paper, folding it over to hide the name then sliding the paper over to the player on the right. Then they were to write a female’s name and repeat the passing. A place name followed to serve as a meeting place. Then something that the male would say, then something for the female to say, something to happen and then something to finish as a ‘consequence’. After passing the papers a final time each paper was unfolded and read.
The first round resulted in seven strange little stories.
Thranduil read: “A male named ‘Calmar’ and a female named ‘Lobilia’ met in ‘Mordor’. He said
‘I’m wet’. She said ‘Fuck off’. They had a battle’ and the consequence was that ‘A group of hobbits threw potatoes at them’.

This was greeted with amusement and Dis read out:
“A male named ‘Vors’ and a female named ‘Galadriel’ met in ‘Erebor’. He said ‘Enjoy the starlight’. She said ‘I want carrots’. They made a cake and the consequence was that ‘they fell in a hole.’

This called for another round of paper and wine.

Among other stories, the second round produced: “A male named ‘Celeborn’ and a female named ‘Margr’ met in ‘Gondor’. He said ‘I have whizzbangs’. She said ‘I am married to an onion.’ ‘They danced beside a stream’ and the consequence was that ‘they flew away’.”

Three more rounds were played before the players’ invention gave out and it was declared that the younger members among the shimmy players ought to be in bed.

Legolas, Tauriel, Gimli, and Kili put away the shimmy objects and Fili and Sigrid came over to join the window seat group.

When Kili and his cohorts arrived there, they were allowed to read the silly stories from the game. These put them into whoops of merriment until Bombur arrived on the scene again followed by Erda to once more shuffle their guests into a group that was obviously ready for dessert.

Bombur turned to Thranduil and grinned. “I’ve prepared your favorite, you majesty.”

Thranduil smiled in a way Ori thought bode only ill. “Master Bombur! How good you are to me.”

The promised dessert arrived, served individually in flat-bottomed bowls.

It seemed to consist of a thickened whipped cream propping up something tall, narrow, white and obscene, topped by a candied cherry. Ori knew it was inevitable that all of it was meant to be eaten.

Bombur said nothing, but in short order each guest had been served their own nicely presented penis.

No one dared speak for a moment, then Thorin said, “Really, Bombur, you shouldn’t have.”

That broke everyone up.

Dori fanned himself with his serviette, giggling.

“Oh m-y-y-y-y,” he said in a low, deep voice.

Sigrid looked a trifle pale.

“Er… what is this?”

“Candle pudding,” said Thranduil merrily.

“That’s not what it looks like,” said Sigrid.

“I know, but I thought you were ‘over it’, my dear.”

“I might be all right with seeing them, but I’m not going to eat one in public.”

Thranduil laughed and clapped his hands.

“Well done, Princess Sigrid! Well done!”

Meanwhile, Fili was on the floor. Ori peeked down at him. The prince lay twitching, laughing so hard, and so silently that he couldn’t breathe.

“Oh, Bom… what sort of… what is this thing… sticking up?” said Ori.

“It’s a fruit called a banana, quite like the plantains but smoother and sweeter,” said Bombur. “Its skin is actually bright yellow but it has to be peeled before it’s eaten to get the full flavor.”

“A banana,” Tharkûn smiled. “Subtle as an orc and more delicious than cake. The perfect fruit.”

“Like other things,” said Erda, dragging a lazy finger through the cream and then feeding the dollop to Bombur.

Bifur murmured something in khuzdul about ‘pebble number fifteen’.

Ori breathed out slowly. He couldn’t even look at Dwalin right now. Dwalin’s hand on his thigh did nothing to help this.

“No’ quite th’ righ’ color,” Dwalin snickered.

“Hush!” Ori murmured.

“Certainly nothin’ t’ yers.”

“Dwalin!”

Kili looked up at Tauriel, grinning naughtily.

“What do you think?” he asked.

“It’s certainly… interesting,” she allowed.

“It’s a prick in a bowl,” said Gimli. “No gettin’ around it.”
“Is it? Hadn’t noticed,” Legolas teased.
“Lad, if yeh don’ know wha’ yer looking’ at …”
“Your spoon, King Thorin,” Bilbo said politely but with a twinkle in his eye. Thorin graced Bilbo with a sweet smile but eyes full of mischief. He removed the glazed cherry from the top and looked at it. Ori noticed, that though candied, the stem was still attached. Thorin popped the cherry, stem and all, into his mouth. He chewed, dropped the stone into his palm, and tossed it on the saucer. He had a humorous look in his eyes. Fili, who had managed to climb back in his seat, and Kili nuded each other and waited eagerly. Bilbo glanced at Ori, who shrugged.
Thorin swallowed then removed the stem from his mouth and held it up. The stem was tied in a perfect half hitch. Fili and Kili cheered. Thranduil looked appalled. Bilbo was very pink.
“And I thought my party trick was spectacular,” said Tharkûn with an audible “Hrmph.”
Thorin inspected the candle pudding with an unimpressed eye. He put his hands on the little table, leaned forward and took the entire fruit into his mouth and chewed it easily down. His tongue came out to lick the cream off his lips. He dabbed his mouth with his napkin.
“Nadad!” Dis cried in horrified delight.
“A very satisfying dessert,” he commented. He looked up, catching Bilbo’s eyes and smiled with utter wickedness.
Bilbo’s smile to Thorin in return made Ori rather warm himself. Burying the gift to Yavanna and his chat seemed to have broken the ice for Thorin and, Ori thought, everyone would be watching the king’s new pursuit of the hobbit. Indeed, if Nori were here he would be making book in front of everyone present.
Dori leaned over and put his hand on Thranduil’s forearm.
“Best save that one for King Bard.”
Thranduil blinked.
“Why would I do that?”
“Only polite to feed him before you eat him.”
Legolas choked.
“Ada! Are you and King Bard involved?”
“Certainly not!”
“Yet,” Dori sang merrily.
“Bearer!” Thranduil tried to sound stern, but he soon broke into laughter. He and Dori leaned against each other in mirth.
Ori thought it might be time to change the subject. Dwalin’s hand was creeping up his thigh with extreme lack of subtlety.
“Where does this er…dessert hail from, Master Bombur?” he asked quickly.
Bombur chuckled and Erda grinned evilly.
“Me,” said Erda. “I made it for Bom on our wedding night.”
Nope, not a change of subject at all.
Cinnamon Rolls, Muffins, and Fruit Wine
Chapter by Stevie Foxx

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The making of more food, a special letter and, well, alcohol. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

And a shout out to Our #Arel for the help with dinner!

In the morning at breakfast, Ori was in the middle of his plate of bacon and a large, delicious pastry Bilbo had made, called a cinnamon roll, when Kali came in with a letter. He handed it to Ori, grinning. Ori frowned down at the folded sealed parchment in his hands. The parchment was dyed black.

“Who writes on black paper?” Kili demanded.

Ori shrugged and opened the missive. It was then he recognized the swirling hand in shiny silver ink. Dipfa was full of news. At the behest of all at the table, he read aloud:

Sir, she began formally.

I do hope you are successfully Assisting his Majesty in Recovering from his Great Loss.

Everyone snickered at this. Thorin groaned.

Things here in the Kingdom are running as Usual. Master Binni is Greatly Involved in refurbishing the Throne Room.

“We’re doomed,” Fili laughed. Balin looked vaguely annoyed and Dori intrigued.

It is very Impressive and conveys a deep Emotional Sense of Comfort that is Thrown into Relief by the Height of Durin Tradition which is being Extremely Upheld.
“'Comfort’ for whom?” Thorin wondered aloud. Bilbo came in with more tea and Thorin drew out the chair beside him.

Indeed, at one point the shocked Interior Designers from all the Guilds in the mountain did fan themselves and shriek, “Have MERCY!” And standing before the Throne Master Binni’s Honorable Husband, Lord Oin replied in a Great Voice, "Hang nursey? Why? Have any of My assistant Healers Killed anyone they're Not supposed to?"

The younger set burst out laughing. Dwalin was grinning like a well-fed warg and Dis had her head on the table.

In the Dale, the Men are Painting everything and Fixing some things. Their choices in Paint are Genteel enough, but not to my Tastes. I am attempting to advise King Bard of Such Things and my beloved Bu advises His Majesty on All Things Mechanical.

“If I find King Bard hiding in my forest,” Thranduil inquired reflectively, “shall I convey him back to you, Thorin, or give him refuge?”

“Poor da,” Sigrid giggled. “I can just see him sitting in his chair, staring wildly at those two. I hope Mistress Dazla can protect him a little.”

“She’ll need a whip an’ a chair,” Dwalin added, making Ori snort before he continued.

My beloved Bu tells me All things at the Great Library are going well. Master Brur has lately received a letter from The Lord of Rivendell. My beloved Bu tells me the Elvish Lord asks whether the New Regime would consider a Westron or Sindarin translation of The Infernal Adventures of Durin the Deathless, a Prophecy in Three Volumes.

“Apparently it’s killing him not to know what the ancient dwarrow said of him,” Thranduil snarked. All the dwarrow at the table looked at him askance, and Legolas openly stared, obviously astonished. Ori thought about calling kettles black, but instead he read on.
My beloved Bu means to inquire of you, My Lord Ori, if you would consider approaching His Great Majesty King Thorin II to find out whether or not he would consider the matter.

Thorin shrugged, “If Master Baggins is agreeable, we can use his copy of the book.”

Bilbo choked and rearranged his countenance.

“Ahem, well, it’s a very rough sort of copy, really. I—”

“Master Brur will be happy to assist you with any small nuances you may feel you have missed,” Thorin assured him. “I will speak to the librarian myself about the matter but only when it is officially brought to my attention. I am neither Oin or Ori and to give the impression that I am capable of prophecy, would be more than I could deal with.”

The listeners around the table all chuckled and Ori went back to Dipfa’s letter.

Lady Klakuna and Lord Nori are very much in each other’s Company. My beloved Bu tells me that They always sit Together at Family Meals and Lady Loli and Lady Omi say Lord Nori is quite Lady Klakuna’s dearest great GrandChild.

“Granny’s precious bah-jer,” Ori snickered at that, setting Gimli and Kili off again.

“Now, pet,” Dori admonished.

“Dori, she’ll spoil him rotten.”

“Just like he says I’ve spoiled you rotten, no doubt,” Dori said loftily. Ori snorted and fluttered his eyelashes at Dori, who pretended to look severe.

“Go back to the letter, pet.”

Lady Loli is somewhat put out because Lady Omi spends, in her words, an inordinate amount of time ‘mooning’ over my Associate, Master Pika. If this is so, Master Pika is also ‘mooning’. He accidentally mixed his Correspondence and young Lady Omi received Master Pika’s Copious Notes on the Proper Weaving of Tweed and our poor Master Mahrdin received an Ardent Letter which made him Very Red and caused him to avoid My Associate’s company for Three Days.
Even Dori cackled at this.

“Me poor Mahrdin,” sighed Balin. “I’ll have t’ give him quite th’ tip f’r this. Havin’ witnessed those two chattin’, Mahrdin’s feelings must a’ bin quite out a’ curl.”

“Those two are shameless!” Dis cried. “Do they really think no one can else understands Iglishmêk?”

On the subject of Lady Loli, at my last Visit with her, she seemed in Low Spirits.

*After some Talk she Revealed that she was somewhat Prostrate as Your Lordship’s Mighty Husband, the Great Warrior, Captain Dwalin-

Ori had to stop as Dwalin was laughing so loudly, no one could hear any more.

“Love, remind me t’ give tha’ lass more business.”

“May I continue, Mighty Warrior?” Ori teased.

Dwalin snorted again but subsided.

...Dwalin did Command a most Excellent Soldier -And So Loyal to His Great Majesty King Thorin II!- by the name of Furh’nk to take Captain Dwalin’s part in Dale in the Great Captain’s Absence. Thus, the Worthy Furh’nk is far too Taxed to Attend her.

“Well,” Dwalin chuckled. “What a shockin’ Great Warrior I am, deprivin’, our Loli o’ her Light o’ Love!”

“And what a Shocking Great Majesty I am to be the cause of It!” Thorin agreed.

“I wonder if Furh’nk knows?” Ori pondered aloud.

Lady Loli thoroughly states that the Stalwart Furh’nk is her Heartsong. I have given her Every Assurance that Time will Pass. And that She will soon be Reunited with her Fine Soldier.

“If he doesn’t know by now,” Thranduil reflected. “No doubt he will, when Captain Dwalin returns once more.”

My beloved Bu’s Excellent Master Brur takes Lady Omi and Lady Loli, my beloved Bu, and Young Princess Tilda wherever he goes as Master Scribe to His Great Majesty King Thorin II in Your Lordship’s Absence. Master Brur, my beloved Bu tells me, tests Princess Tilda often and She is Most Interesting in Her Details of what should be noted as a Royal Scribe.

“Oh no, “ Sigrid laughed. “I can just imagine what Tilda finds interesting. Those poor dwarrow who have to speak in front of her. She notices every blemish!”

“She’ll have plenty to choose from,” Fili added.

I must Close now as Time does indeed Pass quickly and my beloved Bu awaits to Escort me to his Family home for Dinner. I hope my designs have served Your Lordship successfully and Look Forward to hearing Your Distinguished Opinions.

Respectfully At Your Lordship’s Service,

Dipfa

“Wait a moment,” said Bilbo. “Ori is capable of prophecy?”

“I’m not as good as the Great Woudini,” Ori protested.

“Few people are,” Bilbo soothed.

Ori squirmed and admitted, “I have accidents.”

Bilbo raised a brow.

“No!” Ori protested. “Not that kind! I seem to stumble onto things that… happen.”

Dwalin said, “He reads fire runes.”

“What are fire runes?” Bilbo asked.

Ori looked up, wild-eyed.

“Dwalin!”

“They’re th’ word o’ Mahal,” said Dwalin. He looked down at Ori and smiled. “Best he knows wha’ he’s gettin’ inta now.”

Dis grinned at Bilbo.
“Ravens herd him like their own personal kid goat.”

“That was only once!” Ori moaned. He klunked his head on the table. “Doomed.”

Fili put in, “And he vomits on treasure.”

“How is that prophecy?” Bilbo asked, laughing. “How do you auger vomit?”

“The ravens do,” said Thorin, perfectly seriously.

“They do not!” Ori cried.

Thranduil sighed.

“I’m glad you said that, Master Ori. I don’t want to spend the rest of my life thinking about ravens augering last night’s dwarven dinner.”

Balin shook his head.

“Over th’ edge an’ around th’ bend once more.”

“I’m sorry, Bilbo,” said Ori. “I won’t be angry if you’d rather not associate with me.”

“Don’t be silly,” said Bilbo. “I’ve known Gandalf all my life. If I can tolerate him… well, what’s a little prophecy between friends?”

Kili piped up, “The Great Woudini said Dwalin’s supposed to catch the biggest bird in all Arda! It’s going to fall out of the sky right into his arms.”

“I rather liked th’ bit about th’ pastry meself,” said Dwalin with a shrug.

Dis said, “And Thorin is supposed to meet a beardless dwarrowdam and have seven children.”

“I don’t see how he’s going to do that and keep his youthful figure,” said Bilbo.

Thorin snickered appreciatively.

“And I’m supposed to marry an Ent,” said Kili, frowning, “but no one will tell me what that is.”

Bilbo opened his mouth and closed it again.

“And neither shall I,” he finally settled.

“Someone is going to have to spill their guts sooner or later,” Kili grumped.

“I’ll make you a deal,” said Bilbo. “If you ever do meet an ent, I’ll tell you.”

At that point Legolas and Tauriel wandered in. They had been out practicing archery. Ori saw Kili go white as Tauriel withdrew Kili’s paper bird from her pouch. Legolas examined this and said in sindarin,

“Where did you find this?”

“I didn’t, Prince Kili gave it to me. Isn’t it cunning?”

“I smell ink.”
“I know, but from where?”

“Unfold it.”

Tauriel looked a little doubtful but did so. She stared wide-eyed at the paper and Legolas read over her shoulder.

“It doesn’t scan,” he said, outright.

Tauriel frowned. “It’s poetry. It doesn’t always have to scan.”

“I’ve never thought of you as being as silent as a bat. Bats are rather noisy, squeaking about the place, hunting bugs. Of course, I’ve never seen you hunting bugs.”

The blond prince’s grin turned feral.

Thranduil’s eyes flew open when his captain smacked her prince around the head with her quiver.

“Ouch!” cried Legolas mockingly, between laughter.

“There, now you know how I hunt bugs!” Tauriel announced in westron. She crossed to table, dropped her quiver on the end, and bent over to wrap her arms around Kili.

“Thank you, mel nin, you have a beautiful spirit of song.”

Kili glowed.

Breakfast had been cleared away and lunch was bubbling to completion when a small corner of the kitchen became an impromptu classroom with Master Frodo presiding over a class of one rather nervous royal pupil, Master Frodo’s silent partner Master Bilbo pouring tea for he and his associate Master Ori at the table nearby, but not interfering.

Thorin scooped up the flour and made to dump it into the bowl.

“No! Nonono! Too much!” Frodo cried.

“It’s a cup,” Thorin pointed out.

“It’s too much of a cup! See, like this.”

Frodo grabbed up the kitchen knife and used the dull edge to scrape across the top of the cup, dumping the excess back into the bin and leaving the contents of the cup level.

“Now it’s a cup,” said Frodo.

“Is it alright to put it in the bowl?”

“Yes, now is good.”

“How many of these are supposed to go in?”

“Five. See, that’s why you have to put in just the cup, or how would you know when you got to five for real?”

“Ah, I see. You know, this is an awful lot of work for muffins.”
“But they’re really good muffins,” Frodo assured him.

They continued in this vein for quite some time.

“Now,” said Frodo, “we add the milk and we stir, but not a lot of stirring, because then they’ll be tough.”

“Tough?”

“To eat. Just mix it until everything is wettish. Yes, that’s good.”

Finally the muffins went into the oven and Bilbo spoke.

“How fares your pupil, my boy?”

“He’s fine,” said Frodo, scraping down the counter, “but I need a nap.”

Thorin looked down at him.

“Really? You want a nap?”

“Yes, teaching you something is really hard.”

Frodo finished his clean up with practiced efficiency, directed the washing up of the implements, checked the muffins, pointed out their degree of doneness to the bemused Thorin, and finally pulled them out to the cooling rack before sighing and trotting out.

Ori concentrated on his tea, Bilbo’s jaw was clamped shut hard enough that the muscle flexed.

Thorin said, “If it helps, running a kingdom is easier than making muffins.”

Bilbo and Ori burst out into giggles and Dwalin leaned in the doorway, chuckling.

Finally Bilbo said, “Practice makes perfect, King Thorin. They do look good. Just put on the kettle for more tea we’ll sample them, eh?”

“Tea sounds wonderful.” Thorin managed. “Though, I’m … er… not much for making it myself.”

“Making tea isn’t a bad habit to cultivate,” said Bilbo. He gave Thorin a sly, sideways glance. “You do know how to make tea?”

“To my own satisfaction. I’d hate to inflict substandard tea on a hobbit.”

“Oh, that’s just rot. Here, put the kettle on. You can boil water, can’t you?”

“I … believe so, yes.”

“Then there’s hope for you yet.”

“Love,” said Dwalin.

Ori grinned up at him.

Dwalin continued, “Fancy a pony ride?”

Ori narrowed his eyes.
“Which of my ponies should I saddle up?” Ori asked.

Both Bilbo and Thorin snorted.

“The four legged one rather than the three,” Dwalin teased in turn.

“Get out!” Thorin ordered, wearily. Ori laughed and, bidding the king and the hobbit goodbye, put his hand into Dwalin’s and they turned to go out.

“Wait! Wait!” Bilbo cried, suddenly bustling about. “You’ll miss luncheon! Here, let me make you up something.”

‘Something’ as hobbits saw it turned out to be quite a bit larger than as dwarrows saw it.

They took muffins, of course, about six each, and a loaf of rustic bread, butter, cress and ham. Then apples and soft cheeses and pot of fruit preserves, knives to pare and cut up or spread all of that, and a sort of loaf of dried meat pounded with berries and, to drink, a flask of tea and a flask of beer and somehow it all fit into a latching basket that would hook to a saddle.

“Do you think it will be enough?” Bilbo asked, considering this very seriously.

“If not, we’ll be back in time for dinner,” Ori assured him.

Rather than asking one of the Ur badgers to saddle the ponies, Dwalin taught Ori to do it for himself. Ori turned out to be rather good at this, once he saw the entire process and recognize it as such. They went out to the field beyond where there were a few barrels and small jumps. Together, Ori and Honda learned to leap short branches and tiny rocks. That was scary enough, Ori discovered, and much harder than it looked.

Then they saddled Harley and went off for a leisurely ride along the lake.

While the ponies grazed, they played ‘tag’ on a secluded beach. There was far more tagging than actual running, and their version seemed to include a great deal of sand in their britches. From time to time the ponies would look over at them, swish their tails and snort. Ori could only imagine what they said to each other. He thought the talk must include references to those two git dwarrows, always jumping around like it was spring.

After stopping to take some lunch, because not even Dwalin could eat all of that, even with Harley and Honda helping with the apples, they saddled up again and practiced galloping in the meadows.

“Makes a nice change from gallopin’ through reception rooms,” said Dwalin.

Ori laughed and leaned over Honda’s mane and she lit out for the stables.

With a shout Dwalin and Harley were after them.

Though smaller, Honda was faster, and Ori lighter, and he just had time to slide from the saddle and act bored before Harley and Dwalin arrived.

“What kept you?” Ori asked, examining his nails.

Honda ruined his act by chewing on his hair.
“You’re a shithead, love,” said Dwalin with a smile.

“I am, yes, thank you for noticing. I still beat you here.”

“An’ I’ll never hear th’ end o’ it, I know,” said Dwalin.

Then Ori learned to unsaddle his pony, rub her down, brush her and let her out to the pasture.

“Never put a pony away wet,” said Dwalin. “They get sick, and cranky.”

“Sounds like Nori,” said Ori.

“He gets put away wet?”

“One time he fell in a muck puddle and Dori had to scrub him in the wash tub in the kitchen. He whined and struggled so much, Dori could barely towel him off before he was dashing for his room. At least, that’s what Dori says.”

“What’s yer take on it?”

“He was already grown up when I was born and Dori was never really specific about when this supposedly happened, though if I was to guess, I imagine Nori was at least sixty.”

“I only remember Balin havin’ t’ do tha’ t’ me once,” said Dwalin. “An’ Thorin an’ Dis as well. Mahal, we were mucky pups.”

“Did you get all dirty sparring?”

“Mud pie fight.”

“You must have been just wee badgers.”

Dwalin chuckled.

“Nah.”

“Omi, Loli and I had one once and we were still badgers. It wouldn’t have got so out of hand if Loli hadn’t tried to feed Omi a ‘pie’. Dori threatened he would scrub and throw us over a hedge to dry before we’d ever be clean again. Luckily, in Dale, hedges were in short supply.”

Coming out of the stable, toward the inn, they heard shouting.

Fili and Kili were making the most noise, roaring and shrieking, though Frodo’s small, high commands were in the mix.

“What are they doing?” Ori asked.

“Sounds like they’re playin’ ‘dragons’,” said Dwalin. “They always used t’ argue about who got t’ play th’ dragonslayer.”

“They both wanted to be the dragonslayer?”

“They both wanted t’ be th’ dragon.”

Dwalin and Ori arrived on the lake facing side of the inn. Frodo brandished a toy sword and rushed after a roaring and bellowing Fili and Kili, slaying them with great vigor. The funny thing about these dragons was they kept being slain and then coming back to life to be gleefully slain again. Frodo had, it appeared, a brave squire in Rutile. The spider leapt gamely at the ‘dragons’, jumping on their heads while slayer Frodo killed them. The dragons each and every time died in exquisite, noisy agony.

Kili resurrected - as a horrible snow dragon, he announced - and rushed, hooting maniacally, at the slayer. Frodo frowned terribly and pointed his sword at the creatures, ordering his squire to jump. Kili was prepared and dodged the eight-legged attack. Undaunted, and most likely carried away by the moment, Rutile whisked over Kili’s head and let fly with both her spinnerets. Kili stumbled face first into the grass, bellowing in quite a different way this time.

“Aaaah, Rutile! My mouth was open and everything! Yuck!”

Fili bent double laughing, completely forgetting to be dragon-ish, and trotted to Kili’s side. Kili knelt in the grass wiping frantically at his face and mouth.

Ori turned at the continued sound of laughter to see all the guests and the oldest Urs sitting about comfortably on the deck. Tauriel bounced up and went to see to Kili, grabbing a pitcher of water on her way. Sigrid saw Ori and Dwalin and waved.

“You missed the terrible battle!”

“Lass, I think we saw th’ bes’ part.” Dwalin answered, making Ori giggle.

Dori leaned over the rail of the deck and called out.

“There you are, pet! Time to wash and change for dinner.”

Dwalin murmured, “Good thin’ yer nightshirt’s clean.”

“Arse.”

Once everyone was seated at table, Bombur beamed on them all.

“Tonight we have something light and slumber inducing.”

He attempted to look bland but everyone chuckled and commented.

“Now,” he continued. “I have requested, and our Bilbo has kindly agreed, to create for you all a light summer dinner as is served in the Shire.”

There were eager noises and everyone was alert, interested and hungry-looking.

Ori smiled as a savory, thick soup was set before him in a small bowl. The broth was lavish with potatoes, fried onions, and mushrooms. Dots of bacon and parsley floated on top. Ori was delighted with it, as were the rest of the guests. Dori looked at Bilbo speculatively.

“Do tell me, dear Bilbo, do you share your recipes?”

“Why, of course, dear Dori. If I didn’t, you wouldn’t be having any now.”

Dori gave Bilbo a sideways look.
“Indeed.”

The elves were served a delicate chicken broth with snips of chives sprinkled daintily over the surface. This, Thranduil declared to be quite good.

When the bowls were removed, many covered platters were brought out and laid on thick cloth mats as the steam warned of hot things inside.

Bombur nodded to Bilbo.

“Here are some different dishes,” Bilbo smiled on them, his thumbs hooked in his braces as he rocked back and forth on his large feet.

“One is called a roulade. These have cabbage, minced beef, garlic and onions, flavored with caraway seeds. This is served with potatoes with browned butter sauce.”

Murmurs of approval went around the table. Ori was immediately starving again.

“We also have potatoes and eggs, boiled and served with dill sauce.”

There were eager noises from the elves and Ori was ready to start. Bilbo gestured to the other dishes on the table.

“These are potatoes pancakes—”

“Potato pancakes?” Sigrid said a look of delight on her face.

“Yes, indeed. Comprised of both cooked and fresh grated potatoes mixed to a nice dough. We hobbits call them ‘bambes’. They are fried and served with any number of sides, but I’ve chosen mine and Frodo’s favorites.”

Bilbo grinned at his nephew, who bounced in his chair.

“The bambes on this plate are plain and come with apple sauce. On this plate, the bambes have basil and garlic and come with a sauce we call tzatziki, which is yoghurt with chopped cucumber, garlic, salt, olive oil, a touch of dill vinegar and, of course, dill!

“This final one has bacon mixed into it and comes with—” Bilbo’s eyes twinkled around at them. “—surprisingly enough, bacon.”

Ori blushed as he and Dwalin automatically groaned happily at the same time.

“Also from the Shire, a light beer, not too hoppy and with just a hint of lemon. Enjoy,” Bilbo finished and returned to his seat.

Ori dug in with everyone else. The roulades were hot, savory, and the caraway gave the meat a different flavor that complimented the buttery potatoes. Ori sampled all three of the different bambes and their sides. He didn’t blame Bilbo and Frodo for having three favorites. He knew he would never be able to decide which of them he liked best.

Thranduil showed a marked enthusiasm for the bambes. Ori half wondered if the woodland king would be fighting with his captain and son for the apple sauce or the creamy sauce sides.

Dessert, with a mild black tea to drink, was almost paper-thin slices of a rich chocolate cake filled with sweetened cream cheese and cherries.
After the usual clearing away, the elves went to look out at the starlight, and Kili and Gimli went with them. Bilbo went off, Ori presumed, to put Frodo to bed. Dwalin and Thorin went to the sitting room to play cards. Almost everyone else begged off to bed early.

Ori didn’t feel as tired as he should. He tried to read a book from the hall shelves but his mind wasn’t on the text. Thinking he couldn’t do it justice he put it back and followed the sound of laughter to the other side of the reception hall. This was the inn’s bar and he hadn’t had cause to frequent it thus far. The liquor served with dinner had generally been sufficient.

Curious, he went through and found a pleasant pub. There was a beautiful bar of polished pale wood. Glasses of all kinds hung above the area behind the bar in easy reach for the tapsters. There were leather padded stools with shining tables, and a huge fireplace with a small fire burning brightly, making the whole place cozy and welcoming. A few dogs lay snoozing at the fireplace.

Off to the side was a wide arch through which he could see a smaller ‘snug’ with soft, comfortable chairs clustered about, and another fireplace for quieter conversations. Looking around, he discovered where the royal military detail had been spending ‘off time’, for a crowd of dwarf soldiers stood around a table, jeering and laughing, and Targ lit his pipe at the fireplace.

“What’s happening here?” Ori asked.

Targ turned and grinned, pulling another chair over. Ori seated himself.

“Spar just challenged that hobbit feller t’ a drinkin’ contest."

Tharkûn, who sat comfortably at the fire on his own, smiled a fatherly smile and couldn’t seem to hold back a giggle.

“What he really?” Tharkûn asked.

“What?” Targ appeared offended. “Spar’s the best we got.”

“Oh, I’m sure, but, you know, I wouldn’t actually recommend it. Heh. No, not at… Spar’s not on duty tonight?”

“Naw. Captain’d have our beards f’r drinkin’ on duty. Don’t have t’worry about it ’till tomorrah.”

“Perhaps you should start planning for that right now,” said Tharkûn.

Ori searched his pockets and found Dwalin’s other pipe and Tharkûn generously passed his pipe weed pouch over.

“Old Toby,” said the wizard. “Excellent leaf from West Farthing.”

Ori settled to watch the spectacle, scribbling and sketching in his notebook.

Later, as the soldiers carried away their oblivious comrade, Tharkûn chided, “Really, Bilbo. You are a menace.”

“I did try to warn him,” said the hobbit, counting his winnings. “Granted, I didn’t try very hard.”

Bilbo turned to Ori.
“I wonder, Ori, if you would do me a favor.”

“I will if I can, Bilbo.”

“Here, take most of this coin and give it back to young Spar when he sobers up. Best not to leave him with nothing and his cronies seem the types to ‘borrow’ without asking.”

“Torq not so much, but Varil definitely,” said Ori. “I’ll take care of it.”

“You’re very good, Ori, thank you.” Bilbo turned back to Tharkûn. “And how does young Frodo this evening?”

Tharkûn pulled back his coat to reveal the sleeping faunt tucked into his side.

Bilbo sighed fondly.

“Just like a top. Thankfully, apart from the occasional nightmare, he’s always been a good sleeper.”

“Shall I tuck him up for you?” Tharkûn asked.

“Would you? You’re very good.”

“I know you don’t often get a night to yourself. You should probably make the most of it,” said Tharkûn.

He put the faunt to his shoulder and went out.

Ori looked back at the table, buried under a mountain of empty tankards, and then to where Tharkûn had gone, and wondered what Bilbo did when the wizard wasn’t about.

“I don’t spend a lot of time drinking in pubs,” said Bilbo with a wink. “Books don’t write themselves, you know.”

Bofur came to clear up and looked down at the littered table with a click of his tongue and a grin.

“Up to yer old tricks, Bilbo?”

“Sorry for the mess, Bo. There’s coin here to pay for it, so don’t let Master Nori get him to pay twice.”

“I resent that insinuation,” called Nori from the fire in the snug.

“Do you really?” Bilbo asked.

“Naw, not really. Got t’ keep up appearances, is all.”

Ori grinned, scampered over, and tumbled over the back of the sofa to hug him.

“Nori! When did you get here?”

“Oh, I been here watchin’ the show this whole time. I come t’ collect Bo and bring Dis a-”

Dis shrieked in delight someplace upstairs.

“-present,” Nori finished with a grin. “I figured Jani’d be happy t’ see her and so forth.”
The brothers came through to the bar and Nori patted Ori fondly on the head.

“The lake is so nice,” Ori said, then asked, “You’re staying for a couple of days?”

“Not much f’r swimming’, chick. Musses up me hair. We’ll be gone t’morrah mornin’.”

“Have you seen Dori?”

Nori winced and Ori laughed, saying,

“Oh, you are so going to die if you don’t at least show yourself tomorrow at breakfast.”

“I suppose,” said Nori, pouting.

Assault and Battery stuck their heads out of his hair and he absently gave them sips from his glass of ale.

“Starting young,” Ori noted.

Bofur wiped down the table and put a tall green bottle and a glass on the table in front of Bilbo.

“Right, we’re off,” Bofur said. “Y’ want an extra glass?”

Bilbo turned to Ori.

“Join me in a potent libation, Ori?”

“You want to drink me under the table, too?” Ori asked. “I warn you, I’m not much of a challenge.”

“When it comes to fruit wine, neither am I,” said Bilbo. “I’m actually immune to the effects of grain alcohol. Hobbits are, you know, but don’t spread that around.”

“Rather naughty!” Ori cried.

“Indeed.”

Ori sat. Bofur put down the second glass and he and Nori bade them goodnight.

“One glass of fruit wine and I’m in rather a happy place,” said Bilbo, pouring Ori a glass. “Now, tell me about this research of yours on mine songs.”

Dori found them about four glasses of fruit wine in.

“Doriiiiiiiiiiiiii!” Ori shrieked in delight.

The dogs at the fire side raised their heads in alarm.

Dori was also, apparently, alarmed, though Ori couldn’t think why. The inn was a perfectly lovely oasis of… loveliness.

“Mr Baggins!” Dori cried. “You are a terrible influence on my badger!”

Bilbo blinked.
“You have a badger? Is it a pet?”

“Ori! Ori is my badger.”

Bilbo looked over at Ori, who was not inclined to interfere.

“He looks like a dwarf.”

“He’s a young dwarf. We call them ‘badgers’.”

Bilbo’s face fell in horror.

“Oh! I beg your pardon, Mr. Dori! I didn’t realize he wasn’t of age!”

“He is of age, technically, but to me he will always be-“

“Underage?”

“A badger,” said Dori very patiently.

Bilbo looked relieved.

“That’s alright, then.”

“Alright that you led my Ori astray?” Dori demanded.

“No, that you don’t keep badgers as pets, except for Balin’s, but I don’t think of her so much a pet as an accessory. If you did keep more of them, I’d have to send Frodo out to play wearing steel gauntlets. Aggressive creatures, badgers, prone to bite and so forth.”

Dori opened his mouth and closed it. Finally he settled on, “Ori, what will Dwalin say?”

“I’d say it’s probably time t’ bid Master Baggins good night,” said Dwalin in the doorway, with Thorin beside him.

“Ah, Mr. Dwalin, King Thorin,” said Bilbo, “perhaps you might clarify for me.”

“If we kin, Master Baggins,” said Dwalin.

“Why are dwarflings called badgers? Or is that a dwarven secret?”

“They both bite,” said Dwalin.

“Each other?”

“Er…” Dwalin turned to Thorin. “Yer on yer own.”

Instead he went to his husband.

“Yer drunk, love.”

“Oh, yes. Very.”

“Gonna throw up?”

Ori giggled.
“Dunno. Is Nori still here?”

That was so funny he rocked back on his stool with laughter, tipped over and Dwalin intercepted him on the way to the floor, which made Ori laugh harder.

“We’ll get some water, love.”

“From the lake? I can’t drink from the lake. It’s cold. And dark.”

“In a glass, love.”

“I can’t swim in a glass.”

Bilbo said, “Perhaps it’s a large glass. Perhaps it’s in a pantry Bombur’s never shown me.”

Ori giggled.

“It’s the size of the lake.”

“The glass?” Bilbo asked.

“The pantry,” Ori replied.

The pair of them went off in peals of laughter.

Thorin and Dwalin exchanged smirks that said, Oh, we are in so much trouble.

Ori beadled his brow, or tried to. His eyebrows were uncooperative right now.

“What’s funny?”

“Yer a funny dwarf, love,” said Dwalin.

“I’m funny? Bilbo, I’m funny!”

Bilbo lifted his now empty glass to Ori with solemn countenance.

“We. We, my friend, are funny. I venture to say we are fucking hilarious.”

“Hurray!” Ori shouted. “All hail to Mahal and the seven stars of Durin shining bright!”

He frowned and added, “Oh, I forgot to burp.”

Bilbo giggled in delight.

“Oooooo,” said Ori, so excited he nearly flailed out of Dwalin’s arms. “Thorin’ll like that.”

“Like what?” Bilbo asked.

Dwalin leaned against the bar, trying to managed both his husband and a sudden attack of hysterical laughter.

Dori cut in, “Master Baggins is a menace!”

“No! Nooo!” Ori protested. “Lobelia’s the menace!”

“What’s a lobelia?” Dori asked.

“She does sound like a menace,” Thorin managed.

“She’s an inconsequential twat waffle,” Bilbo pronounced.

Thorin’s smile slowly widened.

“She’s a twat waffle?”

“Yes, and not the good kind. I say, King Thorin, come here for a moment will you?”

Thorin carefully approached.

“Well, for pity’s sake, lean down,” said Bilbo. “I’m too drunk to talk to a pine tree.”

Thorin leaned down until they were face to face.

“Yes, Master Baggins?”

“You… are the most adorable fuzzy morsel I’ve ever seen in my life.”

He took his forefinger and tapped the high king of the dwarrow on the end of his nose.

“Boop!”

Thorin turned scarlet to his ears and laughed.

“Ah, Master Baggins, if only your sentiments remained unchanged when you were sober.”

“Those are my sober sentiments, King Morsel. You’re just too pretty for me to say that out loud.”

“You just did.”

“Ah, so I did. So I did. D’you know, I’m awfully tired. I think I’ll go have a lie down. Care to join me?”

“Not tonight, thank you, but I will help you upstairs.”

“Why not tonight? Are you tired, too?”

“Yes, very tired, Master Baggins. Perhaps another time. Come along.”

“Why, thank you, King Thorin. What a gentle dwarrow you are. Or is it a gentledwarrow? Wait, wait. Dwarf is singular. You are a most singular dwarf.”

“Thank you, Master Baggins.”

As Thorin helped Bilbo from the room, Ori shouted, “Yes! Yes, Master Baggins, Thorin is single. You need to do something about that.”

Dwalin sighed.

“C’mon love, let’s go t’ bed.”

“Why? Are you going to play the bugle of Mahal?”
Dori sputtered indignantly, opened his mouth to say something, closed it with an impatient noise and threw his hands in the air, making for the rest of the inn.

“Mistaking my Ori for an animal! He’s perfectly potted!”

On the way out he passed Bombur, who was taking his final sweep through the inn before bed.

Bombur laughed and shook his head.

“Dori, Bilbo knows what a badger is. He’s spent every high season here for years. He was having you on.”

“But he’s very drunk.”

“But he’s still Bilbo.”
Muzziness, Married, and Morsels

Chapter by Dollypegs

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. In this chapter Gandalf is going to meddle and Nori and Jani are here, and smut happens. Rather a lot of smut happens, actually. If you don’t like smut, skip from where Dwalin and Ori go upstairs with cake until “Time passed”. If you like smut, enjoy. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Shoutout to Shinigami24, whose comment inspired the opening scene!

Ori couldn't even be blamed for it. He was in bed, asleep. He was certain of it. He was lying down. It took time for him to figure this out, though, since he thought it might be just him and the wine but, no, Dori, Nori and everything else in the dimly lit inn kitchen only looked sideways. If they really were sideways they'd likely have fallen to the floor by now. Or the wall. Which, if the room were on its side would, technically, then be the floor.
Anyway, Nori sat at the table, eating an enormous pile of chips and Ori felt jealous. Dori was fidgeting around the room, talking and waving his arms in consternation. Nori wore a nightshirt, which Ori though must be Bofur's, since he couldn't recall Nori ever wearing one, never mind a lime green plaid one with little pickaxes embroidered all over it.

Then he heard his name and he wasn't really concerned about the floor or the wall anymore. Though he still rather fancied the chips.

Dori was saying:

"My little Ori has never-"

"He ain't our 'little' anythin', Dor," said Nori, who on closer inspection looked rather morose. "He's outta the nest. He's grown. It's over."

"Don't say that!"

"Say what? Truth is, he's been of age now for years. We ain't been doin' him a favor, keepin' 'im tied t' the kitchen table in Steam Alley."

"He was safe there. He's always been so impressionable."

"An' who's fault is that? Ours. There's plenty o' dwarrow younger than him out in the world already, masters o' their craft, or married and poppin' out badgers."

"Maybe, in a few years-"

"Dori, you ain't listenin'. As usual. Go take another look at the paintin' over the desk. That ain't the work of a badger drawin' pictures t' hang on the larder door."

"No! I will not listen to this nonsense! You're the last person anyone should take advice from on badger raising."

"I'm still alive and got all me fingers."

"Good for you. I am still not having this conversation right now."

"Have it wif me now, or have it wif 'im later. That little 'to-do' wif his nightshirt oughter have told you that's comin'."

"Heard about that, did you? Of course you did. Then you know what he had the gall to say to me."

"Keep pushin' 'im, Dor, that'll sound like a love song compared to what you'll get next."

"I raised him better than that."

"Raised, Dori, past tense."

Silence. Then,

"What did you just say? Past te-"

"Don't look at me like that. Can't live wif a scholar for eighty years an’ stay a total shalehead.
"S'matter?"

"Just remembering something Dwalin said to Thorin about the same thing. I never thought about it before, but Ori has... influence."

"And not just wif shaleheads. You ain't been listenin' t' those scribe badgers back in Erebor. Whole time Ori's been here they've been askin' each other 'What would Ori say?', 'How would Ori do this?', and me personal favorite, 'If I mess this up, Ori's gonna slaughter me'."

"I never imagined him the slaughtering kind."

"Yeh, no, me neither, but the upshot is, they care what he thinks. Apparently, as scribes go, he's somethin' of a bad arse."

Ori and Dori snorted in unison. Luckily, Ori's brothers couldn't seem to hear him. Of course they couldn't. He was upstairs asleep.

"G'wan and laugh. Those badgers look up to 'im."

"Of course they do, he's older."

"They're all more of less the same age, Dor. Even him being married only takes it so far, though I have heard more about th' cuteness o' Dwalin's butt in the past few weeks than is stric'ly necessary."

"Nothing to Bofur's 'dumpling' butt, I take it?"

"No one's is, Dor. No one' is."

Dori sighed and sat, folding his hands in his lap. He looked so dejected, Ori wanted to hug him.

"I don't know what to do about Ori," he said.

"Nothin' for us to do," said Nori. "He'll always be our Chick, but he ain't a chick no more."

"Not what I wanted to hear."

Then the kitchen faded out and suddenly Ori was stuffed in an empty barrel, slammed too and fro as it was hurled about in the rapids of a flood-swollen river. He registered 'cold', 'wet' and 'no chips'. Then someone said something about jam bags. Then he knew nothing else until the morning.

Ori could have sworn his eyelids creaked open. The sunshine was sparkling, the bed was warm and he was muzzy headed. He tried to organize his thoughts. He remembered drinking fruit wine with Bilbo. He sighed. He doubted Dori would offer his remedy as Ori had done this to himself. He snuggled into the warm space beside him. The warm space. He sat up suddenly, mumbling, "Hey!"

He looked around.

"Wha’s goin on, love?"

Dwalin stood in the washroom doorway, drying his face.

"Oh, there you are." Ori relaxed.
Dwalin chuckled and went back into the washroom. Ori heard water running. Dwalin returned, bringing him a large glass of water.

“Drink up, love.”

Ori winced.

“I'm not sure I can stomach it.”

“Believe me, yeh’ll feel better f'r it.”

Ori did so, being very thirsty. He was surprised at how refreshing it was. He was also sure it wasn’t just water.

He drained the glass and licked the lingering flavor off his lips.

“How did you get ahold of Dori’s ‘remedy’? He didn’t give it to you, I’m sure.”

“I go’ it from Oin. I figured he knew it.”

“But, how did you get it here so fast?”

“Had it all along, love. Remember th’ dwarven credo ‘Be prepared’.”

“I thought that was just for warriors.”

“Battlin’ a hangover counts.”

Ori sighed.

“You’re wonderful.”

Some time later, Ori with a patient - yet, he suspected, very amused Dwalin - made their way to the dining room. Ori availed himself of toast and jam. Bilbo breezed in to put a plate of ham and eggs on the table before Dwalin. The hobbit was sober and fresh as ever.

“Good morning, Dwalin, Ori… King Morsel.”

Thorin snickered into his teacup and Ori had to pat his back.

“Something wrong, King Thorin?” Bilbo asked, blinking saucily.

Ori rather thought Frodo was not the only incurable Baggins flirt.

“No, nothing whatever,” Thorin rasped.

Bilbo gave him a saucy wink and retired to the kitchen.

It was late in the morning, Ori noticed. All the others had gone off to the lake or other enjoyments and it was just he and Dwalin and Thorin at table. Thorin looked preoccupied, and Ori got the feeling the king had been there the whole time, waiting for them. He also thought Thorin hadn't minded waiting, not as long as Bilbo was guaranteed to come and go with tea.

“Well?” Dwalin prompted. “Spill it.”
I was summoned to one of Tharkûn’s meddling sessions. They’re very rare,” said Thorin dryly.

Dwalin snorted.

“It seems,” Thorin continued, “that Master Baggins under spoke his exile from the Shire. His property was seized by his relatives and he was banished until such time as they might see fit to forgive him his transgressions, which seem to include corrupting the morals of his underaged readers and generally smearing the good name of hobbits everywhere. The legality is rather vague, but the pitchforks were extremely sharp.”

“They banished ‘im even though he’d a badger?” Dwalin growled.

“Bilbo left with Frodo in the middle of the night when the same relatives who claimed his home started making noises about Bilbo as an unfit guardian.”

“Wait. We’re talking’ about th’ same badger who killed Fili an’ Kili over an’ over yesterday? Aye, he looked miserable.”

“Whether he looked miserable or not, he has a sizable inheritance.”

Ori winced.

“They mean that Bilbo’s an unfit guardian for Frodo’s money.”

“Doesn’t matter,” said Thorin. “They didn’t do their research. The money’s in trust until Frodo comes of age at thirty-three. Frodo’s guardian gets Frodo, that’s all.”

They observed a moment of silent glee for Bilbo Baggins’ stupid, greedy relatives.

“In case you were wondering, Ori,” said Thorin, “Tharkûn agrees Bilbo would make an excellent visiting scholar for Erebor.”

“I didn’t talk to him about that,” said Ori, puzzled. Then he thought about it and shivered. “Wait, we didn’t need to talk about it, did we?”

“No,” said Thorin. “I see you understand Tharkûn already. In fact, Bilbo wasn’t initially happy to see the wizard here, since he was afraid Tharkûn had been sent by Bilbo’s grandfather to collect him. Turns out Tharkûn had been sent, but to warn Bilbo to stay away.”

After lunch, Ori felt curiously unambitious, but he took out his paints and easel anyway. The light over the lake was different right now, and varied moment to moment. It would be an interesting challenge to catch it on canvas. Then, when he’d finished that to his liking, Sigrid came over to chat with him again and they sat on the grass looking out at the lake. Ori smiled at his friend as she sat, legs half folded leaning on an arm. She was in another of Dipfa’s creations. This time a pretty frock of sky blue. Apparently, Dipfa had decided it was her color. Ori had to admit, it did set off her curls and the Durin blue Fili would inevitably wear. The frock had only straps over her shoulders and the hem stopped at her knees. She was barefoot and her hair was loose. He had an idea.

“Do you mind sitting just like that while I paint you, Sig?” Ori asked. “I’ve never painted a person, just scenery. I promise I’ll try not to make it look like you have three noses and both your eyes on one side of your head.”

“Who would paint that?” Sigrid asked, appalled.
“Don’t know. It would be interesting, but if I ever do decide to try it I’ll ask Nori to sit for it.”

“As you wish, milord,” said Sigrid.

For a while he worked in silence, then he said, “I can’t believe we’re almost ready to go home.”

“I know. I’m afraid this experience has totally spoiled me. It’ll be hard trying to get supper on the table when I know I could be sunning myself on the deck with a cold drink.”

Ori sighed. “And Bombur’s cooking.”

“And Bombur’s cooking, though Dori’s cooking is nothing to laugh at either. But I’ve never eaten such a variety of foods. I don’t think even a princess of Dale will have easy access to some of it. Noodles. And tomato sauce.”

“And banana pudding,” said Ori slyly.

“Not something I would ever dare put in front of Da. I think that will remain my little secret, at least until Fili and I are married.”

“You’ll have to eat quite a lot to catch up with Erda.”

Sigrid winced.

“Dwarf babies. I don’t imagine they’re as easy to birth as man babies, and that’s almost murder in itself.”

“You need to talk to someone who’s done it. There have to be some women in Dale who have.”

“Rather a sensitive topic.”

“You just need to find the woman version of Vi or Margr. Then you’ll get more detail than you’ll ever need.”

“I’m trying to imaging what such a woman would look like,” said Sigrid.

“A furnished room,” Ori replied.

“Too bad I didn’t have more time to chat with the Great Woudini’s wife, Ruelis. She was so kind. Her sister in law is a woman with a dwarf husband. They all travel together. If she’s anything like Ruelis, I’d love to talk to her, too.”

“Yes,” Ori said thoughtfully, wondering how the group had been received in Dale. “Maybe they’ll still be there when we get back.”

“That would help,” Sigrid agreed. “I wonder if Tilda got her fortune told by the Great Woudini?”

“Most likely,” Ori nodded. “She’s be a great battle maiden with a penchant for writing books about everything she’s ever killed, with illustrations courtesy of herself.”

“I believe it.” Sigrid concurred. “And Bain will catch the biggest fish in Arda and teach it to talk.”

“What will it say?” Ori asked.

“If it’s big enough, it can say whatever it wants.”
Ori guessed, “Feed me?”

“Or ‘Put me back in the water, you git.’ That’s what I’d say to him.”

“You mean you haven’t already?”

After a light lunch of toast, various cheeses and a delicious paste made from beans which was from the south and called hummus, Ori and Bilbo sat in a corner of the big kitchen each with a cup of tea and a lovely slice of the cherry chocolate cake from last evening. The cake was still so moist, it might as well have been a brownie. The filling of tangy cream cheese was nearly as firm as the cake.

Frodo and Wilibur played in the corner with their toy animals.

"I like this room," said Ori. "It reminds me of the kitchen in Fundin House."

"What is Fundin House?" Bilbo asked, addressing his own slice of cake.

"It used to be just the House of Fundin, that was Dwalin and Balin's father's name, but now we all live there, so I guess it's the royal residence."

"You all live in the same house? That must be... loud." Bilbo’s eyes twinkled and Ori chuckled.

"I love it there. It used to be just my brothers and I in the house in Steam Alley, but then I married Dwalin and we found out that Dori was Balin's heartsong, so he came to live with us too."

"What is a 'heartsong'?”

Ori considered, then remembered Bilbo was also privy to Fire Runes and proceeded.

"A dwarf or dam's heartsong is the perfect partner made for them by Mahal. That's not to say the partnership always works out, but if they can negotiate what life throws at them together, they'll be happy in each other."

"How do you know when you meet your heartsong?"

"We're all born hearing a certain music and we hear it throughout our lives, in times of great stress or happiness. When we meet the one who can sing our heartsong, then we know."

"Rather sad for people who are tone deaf, don't you think?"

Ori raised an eyebrow at him and they laughed.

"Anyway," Ori continued. “Thorin's family and Gimli's father's family used to each live in a house to either side of Fundin House, but we all spent most of our time there. A lot happened in a very short time before King Thror died. Afterward it was just natural to remain together. Thorin considers us all his kin."

Bilbo nodded.

"Thorin seems to enjoy his family. I've watched you all together and I'm quite envious. I was an only child."

Ori gave a wry grin and a laugh.
"Believe me, having siblings growing up has its own… nuances."

"Very discrete of you," Bilbo teased.

"Anyway, Dori arrived at Fundin House and immediately took over the kitchen."

"Rather unusual for the spouse of a dwarf lord, isn't it?"

"Maybe, but Dori, Nori and I weren't raised as nobles. Our own kitchen means everything to us."

"The heart of the home," said Bilbo with a wistful smile as he glanced over at Frodo and Wili. "So you were raised playing on the kitchen floor as well?"

"Underfoot at all times." Ori smiled into his tea. "If I was out of Dori's sight for more than a minute he tended to fret. I'm still trying to detach myself from that, but at the same time honor Dori's feelings. He raised me, more my mother than my own mother."

"Dori is both male and female." Bilbo stated quietly.

Ori hesitated.

Bilbo shook his head.

"If I've stumbled onto a forbidden topic, feel free to tell me so. Some things are kept hidden from outsiders for a reason."

"We don't have much that we keep hidden anymore, actually. Thorin says our secrets have just caused others to mistrust us. Dori is a Bearer, physically both male and female, yet fertile, a gift from Mahal from a time when we were few in number. Even now, only one out of three dwarrow is born as a dam, at least in body. Bearers are few and special, and considered close to Mahal." Ori grinned. "Mind, Dori would tell you he was close to Mahal no matter what. Are there any hobbits like that?"

"No, but considering a married male and female hobbit can easily produce ten children, we really haven't needed the help."

"Ten…?"

"Bombur and Erda do have fourteen."

"They're the only dwarrow ever known to have more than six, and that's in a race where two is a blessing and three is extraordinary."

Dwalin found him, then.

Ori looked up at him, grinning, "Dwalin! Look, there’s still cake!"

Dwalin approached at a moseying slouch.

"I won’ refuse tha’. A temptation from a temptation."

"Tease," Ori accused, feeding him a healthy mouthful from his fork.

"Mmmm," said Dwalin, closing his eyes, his mouth curled in pleasure, and when he opened his eyes again he looked straight into Ori's.
Baked goods indeed!

Ori swallowed.

"Ah," said Bilbo, slyly. "Perhaps you would like to take another slice with you."

"Uh huh," said Ori, barely noticing when Bilbo offered another slice.

"Try to remember to bring the plate back," he teased.

"Eh!" Dwalin took the slice of cake in one hand and Ori in the other, leaving a snickering Bilbo with the empty plate.

As they left the kitchen, Ori all but floating, he heard Frodo say, "Where are they going?"

"To be alone for a while. It’s spring, you know."

"Oh," said Faunt. "It is, isn't it. Old people are funny."

"Really?"

"You aren't though, Uncle Bilbo."

"I'm not old?"

"You're not funny. Not like that, anyway."

"Is that a good thing or a bad thing?"

"I dunno. I think you could be funny, but you have to ask King Thorin."

Upstairs, Ori and Dwalin finished the cake in bed, feeding each other left over bits of cream.

With Dwalin's large, blunt finger in his mouth, Ori was glad they had left their clothing aside.

"Dwalin…"

"Aye?"

Ori gave the finger a nice, cleaning lick before he continued.

"Would you like me to play with your cock?"

Dwalin's eyes shot open in surprised, then narrowed in a hungry leer.

"Tha' sounds tasty."

"I… really want to," said Ori, forcing himself to speak his own mind.

"Take whatever yeh like, love."

As they were already lounging naked, the whole feast was on display before him.

Ori leaned over to kiss his husband, rolling atop him with a squeak when Dwalin lay back.

As they kissed languidly, the breeze blew the curtains around. They heard laughter from the beach. A door slammed somewhere in the depths of the inn. Peaceful as home.
Ori tangled his hands into Dwalin's hair, finer than his own, softer and feathery. He rubbed his fingers over Dwalin's scalp and ears and whiskered jaw and traced the lingering taste of cream from his lips.

Dwalin hummed his pleasure, nearly spanning Ori's middle with his hands, large and strong even for a dwarf.

How Ori loved those hands.

He pulled back and smiled and impulsively kissed the tip of Dwalin's nose.

Dwalin laughed in surprise.

"Shall I proceed?" Ori asked.

"At will, milord."

Ori had no idea what he was doing. He stuffed his nervous thoughts to the back of his head with a stern word for himself and set to work kissing and licking, under Dwalin's beard, enjoying and exploring his neck tattoos, and into the crease of his shoulder.

Dwalin's hands roamed his back, his sides and shoulders, soft and encouraging.

Ori's mouth found every scar and traced it, mapped each swath of ink, including the newest, where the artist had pierced Ori's name in runes above Dwalin's heart. All those hours apart, spent preparing for this trip, had not, it seemed, been Ori's burden alone. In that time the new ink had healed over, dark and sharp.

"Yeh like it?" Dwalin asked.

"I love it. I love you."

"Love yeh, too, ghivashele."

Ori spent long moment over each nipple, playing with the silver rings and tugging at them gently. Dwalin's breath hitched and then deepened. Ori felt Dwalin's cock stir against his hip.

He was ridiculously proud he had discovered this thing that aroused his husband, a piece of knowledge to file under the heading "Dwalin - sex research". He wondered how Master Dezimahl would code that and giggled.

Dwalin gave a gentle laugh.

"Yer so damned cute I kin barely stand it."

"Flatterer."

He gloried in Dwalin's belly, with its generous pelt of grey-brown fur, warm and spicy from soap and skin oils. Ori ran has face and hands through it over and over. He found he could not stop himself, even when he began to feel a little guilty because he was getting so much pleasure just from touching and tasting when it should be Dwalin he was seeing to.

His cock, always slow in rising, woke suddenly and almost painfully, shocking a gasp and a moan from his throat.

His senses overloaded and he had to pause just to breathe.
He looked up at Dwalin, apology on his lips, and froze. His husband was utterly overthrown, mouth open and eyes closed. He looked like a dream. Slowly Dwalin's eyes opened and they gazed at each other in perfect, lustful happiness.

Ori felt his ears grow warm as he looked back down and pecked a kiss at Dwalin's navel, which shook in silent laughter.

Lower now, the heated belly, the fur grown coarser and the cock slowly rising toward it. Ori buried his face in the crease of Dwalin's leg, licking and purring, one hand kneading the outside of the hip, the other grasping the thickening length. Ori moved his head to meet it, slid his bearded cheek up and down, then turned his mouth to kiss it.

"Ori," Dwalin breathed.

The syllables shivered right down his belly and into his crotch.

He swallowed hard, shifting restlessly, even as he ran his tongue up and down the purpling flesh. He had no idea how to proceed. He knew this thing was not going to fit into his mouth. Even at the beginning he might have put his lips around it, but not much of it and not for very long.

Perhaps sensing his hesitation, Dwalin ran a hand through Ori's hair.

"I know yer no' always fond o' veg, love, but if yeh could make an exception f'r me?"

Ah.

Ori mouthed lower to the dwarf's jewel sac and fondled it, sucked it, licked and kissed it as it tightened in his grasp, drawing up as Dwalin gasped and the cock in Ori's other hand shuddered.

Another packet of knowledge for Master Dezimahl.

He couldn't yet look lower than this, to his embarrassment and a bit of shame. Perhaps Dwalin wanted to be touched there, but Ori had no idea how. He'd never even touched himself there.

Later, he told himself firmly, got up on his knees and focused on the task very much at hand.

The head stood out from its sheath, leaking, and Ori's mouth watered. He swiped his tongue over the tip, sealed his mouth to it and thrust his tongue into the slit.

Dwalin convulsed on the bed with a shout, knocking Ori loose and back on his arse on the bed with a yelp.

"Ori!"

"I'm fine! I'm fine!" Ori cried, burning with embarrassment and fear. "Did I hurt you?"

Dwalin laughed, his head falling back onto the pillow.

"No, yeh didn't hurt me, but if yeh want t' do th'a', yeh'll have t' tie me up first."

"Seriously? I mean… oh, Mahal."

Dwalin smiled fondly and crooked a beckoning finger.

"Come back here, love. I need seein' t'."
"Alright," Ori agreed, ducking his head a little.

First he went back up to the headboard and kissed his husband again and rested their foreheads together for a long breath. As he traveled back down he trailed his fingers through the fur, over the tattoos and scars, and finally he knelt between Dwalin's thighs once more and took the trembling cock in both hands.

He bent his head and kissed it, licked it, traced the bulging veins, lapped up some of the spunk and used still more to slick his hands.

"Aye, just like tha'."

Ori watched how Dwalin moved as Ori moved, remembering that Dwalin liked a tight hand as he reached his climax. He experimented with closing his hands with increasing pressure, even as his mouth picked up speed. Ori's face was wet, his mouth full and still he moved, watching Dwalin's fingers put a death grip on the sheets.

The big body trembled under Ori's command and the truth of it left him baffled. He was doing this for Dwalin. He was making Dwalin feel these things.

Dwalin's whole frame went rigid beneath Ori's hands, his breathing changed, almost startled. The big fingers held his shoulders, just this side of painful.

"Comin'," Dwalin hissed.

And he did, copiously, in glorious white sprays as Ori pumped him to the end, laughing as Dwalin swore in one long, creative breath.

"OhMahal'sBlessedBleedin'HairyARSETha'sSoGood."

Ori lapped the thick whiteness from his hands, from Dwalin's cock and lower belly. He had no idea what it was supposed to taste like. He secretly had sampled his own just once and thought it rather salty. This was spicier, with just an edge more salt.

Ori held down a snort. It was rather like Dwalin himself, wasn't it.

He squeaked as Dwalin grabbed him under the arms and whisked him up for a fervent kiss.

This display of strength did nothing to ease his own want, urged on by more kisses, his hand playing in the stickiness setting in Dwalin's belly hair. Ori trembled violently, right on the edge.

Dwalin's breath evened out. He kissed Ori's face, slowly and deliberately, ending at his cheek and whispered in Ori's ear.

"Ori, will yeh jerk yourself off?"

"You want to watch?"

"Aye."

Vaguely embarrassed, but aroused past the point of caring, he knelt up and took himself in hand, the precum mixed with Dwalin's spunk making for delicious slickness as he throttled his prick, eyes heavy but focused on Dwalin, aware of Dwalin's sparkling gaze, aware he was given Dwalin something his beloved husband wanted while giving himself pleasure.

Almost unaware, he slid his free hand up his belly to his nipple, grasped it and twisted it hard.
His hips bucked violently and he nearly toppled over with surprise at the sudden sharp, accelerated pleasure. He rubbed his nipple in time to the rhythm of his full hand, hard nearly to the point of pain, panting now in cries, eyes tight shut as the pleasure tore through him, coming and coming and still hard, still wanting more. He twisted his nipple again and it felt like his pelvis burst and he fell.

Strong hands caught him and laid him down as he groaned and cried out into something warm and furry.

Time passed. The pleasure eased but it didn’t end. He felt like he had left his body, but perhaps he’d only dozed.

When he came back to himself, the shadows on the wall had traveled. A solid arm held him close, sprawled and boneless, draped over Dwalin in shameless abandon.

"Ori, love, yeh with me?"

"Uh? Have we missed supper?"

Dwalin chuckled.

"No, we haven’ missed supper, though, tha’ was quite a feast yeh put on fer me."

Ori turned his face into Dwalin's chest, embarrassed, then abruptly not.

"You liked it?" he asked slyly, happily.

"Yeh were amazin’."

Ori looked up at him and beamed.

They had washed and dressed for dinner, evening light pouring into the room. Ori sat on the bed while Dwalin brushed his hair.

"Got somethin’ fr yeh,” said Dwalin

He put a silver hair clasp into Ori's hands, decorated with emerald chips, to match the marriage bead he could finally take out of its box.

"Dwalin! It's beautiful! Thank you!"

"Wanted t' give it t' yeh before, but we barely saw each other."

"It's alright. We were all so frantic, Dori never even mentioned my hair. It was in my eyes! Can you imagine!"

"Terrible!” Dwalin agreed, grinning. "Hope yeh don't mind. I wanted t' be th' one t' put it in."

"Will it make my head will look less like a muffin?"

"Yeh'll always be edible t' me,” said Dwalin, winking.

Dwalin pulled the topmost tresses of Ori's hair up and back, left out a sizable hank and clipped the rest together, leaning in to kiss the side of his neck. Ori shuddered happily.
Then, even without Balin there to supervise, Dwalin put in Ori's braids of family and accomplishment with perfectly competent hands, making Ori wonder how much the first braidmaking session they'd all shared had been for the benefit of teasing Dwalin's brother.

Finally, Dwalin put in his marriage braid, and the bead Ori had missed most, and chucked his chin over in the direction of the dresser.

"Have a look in th' mirror. Wha' d'yeh think?"

Ori went and gaped.

"That's amazing."

His shorter journeyman's braid slid over the top of the sleeked hair and the family and marriage braids hung properly beneath it. The Durin braid, with its mithril bead, hid per tradition under his hair at the back of his neck.

"That's… That's really me?"

"Aye, an' now I kin see yer pretty ears, too, which is where these're goin'."

Dwalin took a matching set of earcuffs from his bead box. Ori returned to him to look at this new treasure. They were mithril, studded with emeralds, with many delicate silver chains to fall behind the ears, each chain ending at a different length and capped with teardrops of emerald and obsidian.

"These belonged t' me mam's mam," said Dwalin. "They been sittin' in tha' box waitin' f'r yeh all this time."

"Oh," Ori breathed as Dwalin put them on his ears, kissing his neck on each side as he did so. It had become a sort of ritual between them, when Dwalin put his beads and jewelry on, he kissed Ori's neck lingeringly.

Ori trailed his fingers down the chains.

"Oh, Dwalin, thank you!"

Ori threw his arms around Dwalin.

"Love you so much!"

"Love yeh, too. Will yeh put me beads back in?"

"Yes! Yes, of course!"

Dwalin's braids were more numerous and complicated than most people realized. His marriage braid went into his beard in part because the rest took up most of his available hair. There was the Durin bead, of course, and the bead of the Fundins, and the complicated braids of a warrior, which was how they counted rank. The beads were woven into the strands and clasped with gold: the first braid, the simplest, for a recruit, then that of a soldier, then of a battle-tested warrior. This bead, which Thorin, Balin and Bifur also wore, was jet with marcasite-studded caps, for those who had survived Azanulbizar. Dwalin's final bead bore a gold sword set in lapis under a tiny diamond star, marking him not only as captain of the city guard, but in the service of the crown prince.

"Will you have to change this bead?" Ori asked.

"Dunno. Thorin an' I talked about it. He's supposed t' give me another after th' coronation, when I take me oath, bu' I'm still captain o' th' city guard, an' we're both fond o' this one. The 'king's servant' bead is black an' gold."

"Ah." Thror's colors, of course. "Maybe this one is best."

Dwalin nodded.

“Aye, Thorin’s bin talkin’ t’ Fili about designing’ his own as crown prince.”

Ori snickered

“Well, the black and gold won’t show well against Fili the Golden’s hair and complexion.”

Dwalin snorted and took his hand as they left the room to go downstairs.

When they went down to the dining room, Ori received nothing but compliments and gentle teasing, except for Dori who said, "Well." and put his nose back in his glass of sherry.

Ori let it lie and was not discouraged. He knew all was well. If Dori hated it, he would have said so immediately.

Thorin and Fili entered from the sitting room, Thorin sedate and amused, Fili excited and grinning, all but bouncing like a badger.

Dis, seated with Dori, Balin and Sigrid on the window seat, tilted her head at him with a smile.

“Well, someone is certainly in a good mood!”

“I beat him, Amad! I beat Idad Thorin at chess!”

Thorin sat and nodded in the couch opposite with Kili, Tauriel and Thranduil.

“Thrashed me soundly. Very well done, Fili.”

“IbeathimIbeathimIbeathim,” Fili all but sang under his breath.

Sigrid laughed.

“Fili, you act as if-mmf.”

Fili had seized her by the shoulders and kissed her hard.

Then he pulled back, realized what he’d done in company, cleared his throat and sat in the chair off to the side of her.

“Yes, well,” said Fili, “I did.”

Kili said to the mystified elves, “No one ever beats Idad Thorin, except Balin, and Balin taught him.”

Abruptly, Dis threw her hands in the air and cried out, “Oh, rapturous day! To think, Mahal let me live to see it!”

“Amad,” Fili snerked.

She rose and fell to her knees before him, hands in front of her.
“No, no, say nothing, inudoye. Just let me bask in this perfect moment.”

Fili’s eyes grew very large and round, and Kili didn’t know where to look.

“The bards will sing of this day, o prince of Durin!”

She half rose and, lofting her arms over and over in tribute, backed out and around the corner of the book hall and was gone.

“Who is this dam and what has she done with our amad?” Kili asked.

Dis shrieked.

They heard a slap of skin on skin and a filthy laugh.

“Jani!” Dis cried.

“Well, yeh can’t offer me such a temptin’ target an’ expect I won’t take it, lovely.”

Once again the table was set up in fours, each place with a woven grass mat, a small plate and a napkin, with little red earthenware bowls of condiments, including one bowl of what Ori could swear was mashed up chile peppers.

"Well, if you were a scholar of green foods, I'd say this was your final exam, Ori."

Ori raised an eyebrow as Bilbo put a heavy bowl made of volcanic rock down for their set of four diners.

Inside the bowl was, without a doubt, the greenest food Ori had ever seen. The thick, chunky-looking mash was nearly fluorescent.

"Seriously?" he asked. "This isn't a joke?"

"I would never joke about gwakas, my lad."

"I wouldn't either, probably, if I knew what they were."

"They're yummy," said Frodo, visibly holding himself from falling headfirst into the bowl, at least until everyone else had been served.

"Why don't you tell Mister Ori what's in this, my boy, while we make sure everyone else has some, eh?"

Frodo nodded.

"It's gwaka sauce. It's mashed up gwaka fruit and lemon juice and onions and bits of tomato and hot peppers, and cilantro, which is like parsley, but tastes kind of like soap, but it's better than soap because you can eat it."

"And how do we eat it?" Ori asked.

"With our mouths," said Frodo, puzzled.

Ori thought he did have a point.
"I mean, what tableware do we use? A fork or a spoon? Not sticks?"

"Oh, no, we use corn wafers, that way we can eat them, too."

Poli set a basket of fried yellow wavers beside the gwaka soup… sauce… something. They were still hot from the oil, and the smell of salted, fried corn enveloped Ori with a seductive caress.

Dwalin swallowed audibly and said, "Mahal's blessed boots."

Across from them, Tharkûn chuckled and Frodo looked down the table, sharply watching for the very moment when everyone had some and the food massacre could begin.

As Bilbo passed, Ori leaned back and whispered, "Fresh tomatoes?"

" Came up from the Shire with the cilantro via a dwarf trader," Bilbo muttered, "but I won't tell Frodo if you don't."

Randi, Jaki and Ari carried in trays of ice-filled glasses and jugs brimming with cut up fruits swimming in a deep red liquid.

"Splendid," said Tharkûn. "I happily wait all year for Erda's zingria!"

"Fruit, fruit juice, wine and spices," said Randi pouring out a glass for Ori. "You'll love this. Mam's is the best."

"Yes, yes," said Erda, waving her hand, "no one can cut up fruit like I do."

"But it's made with love, my Erda," said Bombur, kissing her cheek in passing, "and that's the best ingredient of all."

Different jugs came out of the kitchen with a lighter orange mix of just fruit, spice and juice for the badgers, though Erda did add a few tablespoons of the original zingria to each.

Ori looked over and Dwalin, then down at the gwaka sauce and grinned.

"Ready"

"If yeh are. We'd best get t' it, before Frodo eats it all."

Eating this sauce with the corn wafers really didn't make it that different from eating chips, Ori thought. In fact, he thought this sauce might taste pretty good on chips. In fact, he thought this sauce would taste pretty good eaten right out of the bowl with a spoon. The gwaka chunks all but melted into a cream on the tongue. They were so soft, Ori was amazed they could keep their shape in the bowl. The onions and peppers gave it a little bite, and the tomatoes and lime juice added nice, contrasting zip. He had been wary of the cilantro, having once been warned off swearing with the threat of a chunk of soap in the mouth, but this was just different enough and just complimentary enough, to make it a nice bit of the whole.

The sliced fruit in the zingria turned out to be apples, grapes and rare and costly slices of citrus from the southeast.

It was not the first time at the inn that Ori had felt he was feasting like a king.

The atmosphere was very relaxed, they lingered over the crumbs of the corn wafers.

"This," said Bombur, "is one of the most exotic and unusual meals we have ever served. Some of the dishes we have seen and tasted before and some of the ingredients are common place, Obviously corn, wine, tomatoes, onions, are not unknown in this part of arda, but gwakas are from lands so far south and east that they are barely listed even on maps. If you were in any doubt as to the rewards of your work, Dis, this should certainly silence them. This meal could not exist without you.

"More than that, your willingness to take on my lad Randibur as a trading apprentice is boon we could have hardly foreseen." Bombur gave a mock-appraising eye to fourth son, who was helping clear the table and who, at seventy-eight, should have been beyond blushing, but wasn't.

Dis held up her glass to Bombur and Erda.

"If he works half as hard for me as he does for you, I will have nothing more to ask."

Balin chuckled.

"An' if he gets six words in during any conversation it'll be a miracle."

She blew him a kiss and an evil smile.

Ori wasn't as startled as he might have been by this new development, nor did he have a moment to ponder it, as more earthenware vessels, these covered, arrived at the table.

The rice was unexpected, though only slightly different than they had before, flecked with a red seasoning he suspected was ground chile, which seemed to be a current running through this meal. He wondered how many cultures in arda cultivated rice. It seemed to come from all corners of the world. There were also very dark beans mixed with kernels of corn, and more plantains, which he made sure he secured before Thranduil commandeered their platter as well as his own. Then the top came off the largest vessel and he saw cutlets of something, perhaps chicken, enrobed in the darkest red sauce he had ever seen.

It flitted through his brain that it might be a blood sauce, such as they made in the iron hills and among the Blacklocks, but it didn't smell quite right for blood. There was a lot of spice, he knew, some of it familiar.

He caught Sigrid's eye and tilted his head toward the dish. Sigrid shrugged helplessly.

"There are some toasted seed over the top," she said. "I recognize them, but I've never had them before."

"Sesame," Thranduil supplied. "They're also used to make oil."

"Oh, thank you."

Erda gave them a mischievous smile and said, "I'll tell you right now, the thing that gives the sauce it's rich, dark color is xocolātl, but you have to guess the rest."

Ori speared a cutlet, which turned out to be chicken after all, and poked at it gingerly with his fork. Everyone around him seemed to be wearing the same expression of total bewilderment, except for Kili, who bravely took his spoon to the sauce in the earthenware pot and shoved the entire sampling in his mouth.

He made a small, distressed noise, his cheeks turned bright red and he finally took the spoon from his mouth and said, "That does not taste like xocolātl. It tastes like smoke and heat."
"It's not soup, dear," said Erda, chuckling. "The sauce is just an accompaniment and it really is xocolāṭl, it's just not sweetened."

There were some larger and softer round versions of the corn wafers. Ori took one up and propped it on the edge of his plate, almost like a shield for his tongue. He was certainly going to try the unsweetened xocolāṭl sauce. He wasn't going to be outdone at this table by Kili.

It was wonderful. It was hot and sweet and spicy and it made him tear up.

"Onions, chiles… clove?" Dwalin guessed

"Very good," said Erda. "Anyone else?"

"Thyme, cinnamon, anise," said Dori confidently, then with consideration, "Hmmm, rather a sharp little bit. Pepper."

"Excellent," said Erda. "Keep going."

Kili yelped, "There's more?"

"Yes, over a dozen ingredients, and this is a very simple version, and perhaps a little unorthodox. The authentic sauce has over forty. Let me help. What usually goes into a red sauce?"

"Tomatoes," said Thorin.

Balin said, "I kin safely say we've tapped th' last o' th'a' vein. What else, Erda?"

"Lard at the base. Ground nuts, raisins and a little corn meal."

Dori was impressed.

"And this is the simple version."

The beans and corn were actually served chilled, with a sort of vinegary dressing and bits of an herb, much milder than even dried mint.

"I don't know what this herb is," he admitted.

"Ebzawti," said Bilbo.

"It's very light."

"It's not actually there for what it promotes as what it prevents. Let's just say, the foods we're eating tend to promote digestion."

"They make you fart," said Frodo.

"Really, Frodo?" Bilbo asked, sighing.

Tharkûn started to giggle.

"He's definitely a Brandybuck, Bilbo. There's not much you can do."

"No, but I keep trying."

"What's a Brandybuck?" Ori asked.
"My mama was," said Frodo.

"One of the three main clans of hobbits," said Bilbo, "along with the Baggins and Took clans. Bagginses tend to be respectable, upright and priggish. Tooks are outgoing, daring and foolish. Brandybucks are plain spoken, practical and, at times, tactless."

"Yep," said Frodo, helping himself to more rice.

Balin said, "Ori, I saw yeh an’ our Sig on the lawn earlier. Yer paintin’ her?"

"By way of experiment," said Ori.

"You’ve taken my advice then," said Thranduil.

"It’s just an exercise, your majesty. I wouldn’t want to excite any anticipation. If it comes out well it’ll be down to Sigrid being so pleasant to paint. I’ll likely work on it in pieces and finish it in Erebor, if Sig and I ever find the time."

"It’s a very interesting process," said Sigrid. "I never realized, but he puts down base colors in different shapes and sort of… I don’t know, molds the other colors onto them. It’s like he’s growing the picture."

"That is what it feels like, too," said Ori. "It’s sort of like building a cake."

"On that note," said Bombur, "we have dessert. Not cake, actually, but a sort of pastry from the same regions as the sauces and spices."

The luscious scents of something mouthwatering, sweet and fried proceeded the platters into the room. When Randi put the platter on the table, Ori had nothing to compare exactly to its contents. They were deep brown like doughnuts, long like iklars, and covered in cinnamon and sugar like fancy butter biscuits. A large pot of melted xocolātl nestled in the middle of each piled platter.

"J’ros," said Randi. "Careful, they’re habit-forming."

Kili looked askance at the pot of xocolātl. Obviously, having been fooled by the sauce over the chicken, he would not be taken unawares again.

The evening was so beautiful most people went outside to sit on the deck and chat or wander. Ori took Dwalin’s hand and they went down to the lake shore again. Here they took off their boots and socks and rolled up their britches so they could walk in the shallows.

"I can’t believe we leave here the day after tomorrow," Ori commented idly. "Sigrid and I were taking about it. Things will seem rather flat, I suppose."

Dwalin laughed.

"With the coronation comin’ up, all the kings comin’ t’ swear loyalty, we’ll be run off our feet, love."

"You’re right. And we have all the mines and guilds to sort. I’m glad Thorin’s had this rest. He’ll have a lot to do to get the kingdom sorted and Dale. I mean help Bard sort Dale."

"Mmm," Dwalin agreed. "Bard’ll have t’ star’ leanin’ on Sigrid a good bit. Th’ lass’s go’ a good head on her shoulders. She an’ our Fili will be perfect t’ rule when th’ kingdoms’re combined when they’re crowned.’

“I know,” Ori said happily. “I think Sigrid will make an excellent queen. She looks like one I think.”

“Aye, she’s growin’ int’ it fine.”

They walked on as the moon rose. Ori sighed. He was so happy.

“I love you, Dwalin,” he said, which seemed to sum up everything. Dwalin loosed his hand and put his arm around Ori’s shoulders.

“Yer me One, love. Sometimes I just want t’ stay in one place, all still, with me eyes closed an’ listen t’ yer song in me heart.”

Ori slid his arm about Dwalin’s waist and squeezed a little.

“I know.”

They paused a moment and stood looking at each other. Dwalin bowed his head and rested his brow against Ori’s.

Ori sighed as his eyes stung with happy tears. This was better than anything. It was better than chips. Chips.

Ori frowned. Dwalin looked at him.

“Why, love?”

“I had the strangest dream last night,” Ori said, as hand in hand, they continued to wander along the shore. “Nothing prophetic I think, but odd. I dreamed Dori and Nori were in the kitchen late, talking about me and eating chips. I listened in and, Mahal, I wanted those chips.”

Dwalin threw back his head and laughed.

They say anythin’ yer goin’ t’ sort ‘em out on?”

“No, just Nori telling Dori I’m a grown up and stop coddling me. He thinks the nightshirt incident is a pale harbinger of what I’ll do next if Dori doesn’t stop fussing over me.”

Dwalin looked down at him.

“Is it?”

“No, “ Ori protested. “I love Dori and I doubt I will ever stop snuggling up to him and being cute to get my own way.”

Dwalin choked and laughed again. Ori cast him a sidelong look.

“Dwalin, you must have noticed I am rather spoiled. I know I’m perfectly capable of wrapping Dori around my finger. I can do it to Nori, too, but I have to be sly about it.”

“Aye, but yeh don’t do it all th’ time.”

“Of course not! It’s mean.”
“An’ yeh know tha’.”

“Well, yes, but—”

“An’ yeh don’t do it unless yeh know tha’ either o’ them’re th’ only ones t’ fix a situation, right?”

“True…”

“Yeh don’t think Thorin and I don’t do th’ same t’ Balin?”

Ori stared up at him again.

“Really?”

“Aye, Dis, too.”

“I suppose that’s the way families are,” Ori reflected.

“Aye, it is. Mind, yeh know well yeh’ve jus’ go’ t’ pink an’ I’ll toss gems at yer feet.”

Ori laughed.

“Careful, love. Yeh’ve a mighty power. I think if yeh asked I migh’ try writin’ yeh poetry.”

Ori cocked his head, a speculative gleam in his eyes,

“Really?” he cooed.

“Prob’ly.”

“Hmmm.”

“Love?”

“Make up a poem for your dear, darling husband.”

Dwalin groaned and Ori went off in another peal of laughter. Dwalin frowned playfully.

“Yeh think I can’t?”

Ori grinned. Dwalin watched him a moment then took a breath.

“Me an’ me love walked by th’ lake
We were ponderin’ ‘n action t’ take
We though’ we’d dive in
And ‘ave a nice swim
Bu’ it were too bloody cold, f’r fuck’s sake.”

Ori shrieked and nearly fell over he was giggling so hard. He recovered and applauded wildly.

“That was brilliant! I’m going to write it down!”
“No yeh ain’t.”

“Oh yes, I am. A completely off the cuff poem from you! I’m unworthy! I shall pop it in my journal as soon as we get back.”

Ori grabbed Dwalin hand and pulled him back the way they came, both chuckling.
Hugs, Hide, and Go Seek

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Oh sorrow, oh woe, as all good things come to an end this is our dear dwarrow’s last full day at this charming Inn. In this chapter we have done our level best to make it truly memorable. Enjoy. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori wandered downstairs, as Dwalin had stopped to talk to Thorin.

Ori was surprised as the inn was very quiet. He knew he and Dwalin had woken early but he hadn’t expected to be the first one downstairs. He could hear a few noises from the kitchen but no one was in the reception hall or any of the public rooms. He wandered out to the deck and there he found Dori by himself on a chair in the deck, weeping.

“Dori! What’s wrong? Did you and Balin fight so badly, you had to kill him?”

It wasn’t as far fetched an idea as it could be, unfortunately.

“No, pet, nothing of the sort. I believe he’s still abed. I was just out here… remembering.”

“Remembering what?” Ori asked, sitting beside him.

Dori opened his hand to reveal a short length of extremely stained and ill used amethyst-colored ribbon.

“What is this?” Ori wondered, though he had a sinking feeling he already knew.

“The ribbon I used to bind your first braid when you were just a new badgerling.”

“Was my hair really that thin?”

“No, it used to be longer until you got hold of it one day and ate about two thirds of it.”

Ori winced.

“Sorry, Dori.”

“It’s alright, I always suspected Nori of putting you up to it. Really, I’ve always suspected him of putting you up to everything short of stealing Thror’s crown off his bedside table.”

“Do you think he ever-“

“No. I doubt it was kept out in the open like that. It’s just that… I was thinking how all grown up you are. You were right about your hair, pet. It’s quite becoming this way. It suits you.”

Ori smiled gently.
“I know it takes more than a new hair style to make a grown dwarf, Ori’s Dori.”

“It wasn’t so much the style as the one who arranged it for you. Isn’t that what it means to be married? To have your One braid your hair?”

“As Balin braids yours?”

Dori sniffed and looked up, a smile playing about his mouth, still a little misty-eyed.

“Yes.”

“And you wouldn’t change that for anything?”

“No…”

Ori grinned then stood and pushed Dori’s arms aside and plonked himself down in Dori’s lap.

“Ori’s Dori!”

“OH-Umph! Pet!”

Ori laughed and Dori joined in and they giggled together. Dori wrapped his arms around Ori and Ori put his head down on Dori’s shoulder and they sat that way enjoying the dawn breaking as the sun slid upward and crossed from the side of the house then scooped its way across the lake.

Sometime later Balin and Dwalin came out and found them.

Breakfast was nothing like what they’d had before, but it certainly excited other possibilities.

It was a beautiful, warm day and the table and chairs were set up on the deck. The ingredients for breakfast were laid out as well, but it seemed like such a random jumble of ingredients, Ori had no idea what he was supposed to do with them.

Fortunately, Poli was there to guide them through the construction process.

Ori took a round of the bread from last night, put in a scoop of scrambled egg and rolled it up into a tube. Then he spread it with some left over heated xocolatl sauce, shredded cheese and mashed chiles.

The aromas of the mixed food were likely to kill him with bliss.

“There’s juice left, too,” Poli said slyly. “Don’t worry, it’s not the zingria.”

“Awwwww,” said Ori. “I suppose I’ll have to muddle through somehow.”

The kettle well contingent arrived to table dressed in each other’s bathing costumes as before, wanting to get as much time in the water as they could on this last full day at the inn. They fell on the food like starving wargs.

Jani and Nori disappeared upstairs right after breakfast. Dis sat and lingered over her plate, smiling mysteriously to herself.
Ori found out why when Jani returned wearing a bathing costume.

It was black, and undecorated, but otherwise identical to Thorin’s.

It only had a strap across one shoulder and left half Jani’s chest bare.

Actually, Ori thought it was a good look for her.

Dori shot to his feet.

“My dear!” he cried. “That is simply shocking!”

The elves looked shocked at any rate. Thranduil was concentrating very hard on his juice and not at the breast which appeared to be watching him.

“What was Dipfa thinking?” Dori continued. “You’re so light-skinned, you’ll be sunburned in minutes!”

“I’ll take me chances,” said Jani, plopping herself down next to a very pleased-looking Dis. “That get-up our Dipfa made me’s just foolishness. I don’t object t’ a little lace every now and then, long’s it ain’t scratchy, but all that lace an’ frippery! Mebbe it’s fine fer Omi an’ Loli, but I ain’t wearin’ it.”

“I think it looks lovely,” said Dis, practically glowing with pride.

“No one is surprised, namad,” Thorin teased.

“Jani, this isn’t your suit?” Dori asked.

“Naw, it’s Nori’s. He’ll be down in a mo’.”

“If this is his suit, what is he wearing?”

“Here I am!” Nori announced. “Ready ’r not!”

The costume was cut much like Sigrid’s, with a cropped bodice, a skirt and bloomers, though Nori had forgone the hat and swim shoes. The material hung on him a little baggy, since Jani was a well-grown dam and Nori tended toward leanness.

It was hot pink with turquoise, yellow and lime green hearts of varying sizes all over, and the neckline, skirt edge, leg openings and bodice hem burdened with row upon row of burnt orange lace.

“You’ve certainly been thrown into relief,” said Ori.

“Nori, you look like a birthday cake,” said Bilbo.

Dori shook his head.

“Completely clashes with your hair.”

“Aye, but I can do that spiny thing the lasses do wif their skirts!”

He demonstrated.

“Done it already,” Fili sniffed, unimpressed.

“But not better’n me,” Nori declared.
“We’ll see about that, shall we?” Fili challenged.

Nori got that gleam in his eye.

“Yer gonna make it worth me while? Remember, the lace give me the edge.”

Chittering from the region of Nori’s skull interrupted them.

Nori frowned and looked upward.

“Well, come on down then if yer dizzy. You ain’t upchuckin’ in me hair.”

The ferret kits skittered out and down to the deck, a little woozy on their feet already.

Frodo drew a deep breath and grinned, bending over them, obviously in love.

“They’re so cute! What are they?”

“Ferrets,” said Bofur. “This one’s Assault an’ this one’s Batt’ry. Nori named ‘em.”

Bilbo cocked an eyebrow at Nori.

“What a surprise.”

“Do they bite?” Frodo asked.

“Yeh,” said Bofur, hunkering down, “but not too hard at the moment. They’re still babies.”

Assault and Battery jumped up on Bofur and quickly climbed to his hat, nibbling at the flaps.

Bofur sighed.

“There goes another one.”

“They love yeh,” said Nori.

“T’ death, probably,” said Bofur.

“Oi, Jani,” said Nori, “suit looks good on yeh!”

“Ta’,” said Jani. “Too bad our Dipsey didn’t have time t’ embroider th’ ferrets on it.”

Looking at Jani now, with her broad shoulders and powerful arms and legs covered in luscious hair, Ori wondered how Frerin had even dared approach her. His ego must be monumental for him to think he’d gain the attention of such a dam, even if she did have interest in males. Jani and Dis made quite a handsome pair.

Dori shook his head.

“I still say you’ll get terribly burned on your right side, dear.”

Dis said, “No, I have the perfect solution.”

She plopped her enormous straw hat on Jani’s head.

Dori pursed his lips.
“I suppose that will do.”

“I think I’d rather risk the sun than wear a campaign tent, lovely,” said Jani.

Dori humped and Thranduil sighed deeply, eyes closed and fingers to his temples in pain.

“You alright, Thranduil?” Nori asked.

Thranduil looked up at him, astonished.

Ori could see why. It was not as though Nori cared much about the elf king’s well-being, not to mention his ‘delicate’ sensibilities.

“I believe I’ll recover, but-“ “Swell, you’ll judge the contest!” said Nori.

“I’ll judge the what? The spinning contest? No, no, I’m afraid I’ll have to demure,” said Thranduil.

“No, no, no, Thandy dear, you cannot use that excuse,” said Dori, “that one’s mine. Unfortunately it never works on Nori anyway.”

“Oh, very well. Let us get this out of the way.”

Bofur muscled in.

“Right, right, the odds are about even. They both done this before, but our Nori’s got the slight edge due t’ th’ lace. Place yer bets!”

Legolas said to Gimli, “You dwarrow really will bet on anything.”

“Told yeh,” said Gimli with a shrug. “My f’r Nori. He’s got lace, an’ he can put a nice little wiggle in his walk when he’s feelin’ slutty.”

Legolas also bet on Nori.

Sigrid, Kili and Taurel loyally bet on Fili.

Bofur turned to Thorin.

“Yer majesty?”

“I’m not getting involved, thank you. If Nori wins I’ll have to deal with a mopey heir and if Fili wins I’ll never be able to close my eyes again.”

Ori said, “Well, how do you think I feel? Nori’s my brother!”

Nori turned and pointed at Ori.

“Stay outa this, Chick.”

Ori smirked. “Twenty on Fili!”

“Little shit,” Nori muttered.

“Who will go first?” Thranduil asked.
“Let them go at the same time,” said Bilbo, “then you can compare them side by side.”

“Yes, and it will be over with that much sooner,” Thranduil agreed. “You may commence when ready.”

Fili and Nori leapt into place before the elvish king. Bofur bellowed a countdown then everyone shouted encouragement. Both contestants spun madly.

“Lookit me lace!” Nori shouted.

“I’m on one leg!” Fili roared in return. Sigrid shrieked in delight.

“Fuck yerself!” Nori yelled. “I’m spinnin’ faster!”

“So ’m I!” Fili hollered.

The two spinning dwarrow, Ori realized, were fast becoming uncontrollable juggernauts. He had a horrible feeling that this was going to end badly.

It did.

They collided most spectacularly and fell to the deck, sprawled on their backs.

“Fuck,” said Nori.

“Why is everything still spinning?” Fili groaned. “I’m lying on the ground!”

Thranduil sighed and shook his head.

“No, no, no! What a pitiful showing! If you’re going to spin, you should do it with panache, like this!”

And Thranduil spun, arms outstretched, face radiant with glee, hair flowing in the breeze, robe rising to just about mid-thigh level in a great, white circle.

Ori suspected Thranduil had his robes specially tailored just for that reason. He seemed to have put in lots of practice.

“Like that!” Thranduil said, spinning to a stop and his robes wrapping around him in perfect twists for a moment before falling back exactly into place.

Fili and Nori looked at each other.

“I’m out,” said Fili.

“Me too,” said Nori. “Pot’s all yers, mate.”

“Oh!” said Thranduil, rather pleased. “What have I won?”

Bofur scratched his head beneath his cap, disturbing Assault, or possibly Battery, who had been napping. “We didn’t really get to the terms, did we.”

“You made bets, but didn’t decide with what you would gamble?” Thranduil cried. “What’s wrong with you people?”

Thorin had to excuse himself for a moment, his shoulders already shaking. Legolas was as pink as Nori’s swimming costume and nearly turning blue with holding in his hilarity. Tauriel rested her head on Kili’s shoulder and shook it, muttering about never getting the image out of her head as long as she lived.

“Me neither,” Kili commiserated.

“Biscuits,” said Frodo. “I’ll make you a batch of xocolatl biscuits.”

“That’s an idea,” said Thranduil. “I like how you think, fauntling.”

“Yes, and I get the ‘burnt’ ones.”

“Of which there will likely be plenty,” said Bilbo dryly.

“Well,” said Dori, “I, for one, thought it a brilliant display, Thrandy dear.”

“Thank you, bearer.”

“We’ll get you into that gossamer presentation robe yet.”

“Oh, I do have the accessories to go with it,” said Thranduil.

“We’ll have to have the hem lengthened, so we don’t discomfit Bard with your bottom on display. Not that it won’t be anyway, but somehow I hardly think it will matter if it’s yours.”

Once breakfast was completely finished, the younger set headed back to the beach again. Ori followed them, sketchbook in hand. He found a pleasant place in the sand with a large boulder at his back and watched the races and water fights and rough housing. He thoroughly enjoyed drawing his friends as they romped.

Sigrid galloping after Fili for stealing her hair ribbon. Kili and Tauriel leaping in abandon as they let go of the rope swing to land in the water. Legolas and Gimli sitting in the lake edge, creating fantastical buildings out of wet sand, twigs, and pebbles. Jani and Dis wandering hand and hand through the shallows. Dori and Balin resting under their umbrella, relaxing and babysitting the kittens, Brandy and Kihshassa. Nori and Bofur lying in the grass, busily teaching the ferrets weird tricks.

On the deck Thorin and Thranduil sat in a deep discussion both were obviously enjoying. Bilbo supervised a ball game with Frodo and the younger Urs and Tharkûn stretched out on one of the long deck chairs, his hat over his eye and his bare feet sticking out from under his robe to absorb the sunshine.

After a light luncheon of cress sandwiches, stuffed tomatoes and creamed eggs, Ori and Bilbo sat shelling peas in the door to the back garden. Out among the plants, Frodo had Thorin by the hand and was talking diamonds to dozens about every single one. The big dwarf merely nodded and gave an occasional ‘I see’ but was otherwise not getting much of a word in at all, though he didn’t appear distressed in any way.

“Sometimes I worry that I did the wrong thing, taking Frodo away from the Shire,” said Bilbo.

“He seems happy enough,” said Ori.
"He should be starting school with his age mates, and rolling down hills and falling out of trees."

"You're teaching him quite well, and he has plenty of friends among the Ur."

"And when we leave here? What then?" Bilbo wondered.

"What did you do before? This can't be the first place you've taken him that wasn't the Shire."

"Oh, no no, we wintered in Imladris, where I might add Lord Elrond, Lady Galadriel and every other elf in the place spoiled him rotten. He was ill when we first arrived, from traveling in the rain, you know, and the little imp was waited on hand and furry foot. I can only imagine Elrond understated the extents to which the elves went to keep him entertained."

"You weren't there?"

"I was sick as well, far worse even than Frodo, which is why my publisher didn't get his pages and Middle Earth was cast into uproar. Over a story? Can you imagine?"

"Umm... yes, unfortunately, I can."

"Valar bless you for saying so, Ori, and for blushing on my behalf. Oh, then we went to Gondor by way of Rohan. The Rohirrim and the Gondorians also spoiled him. All that candy? I'm amazed he has any teeth left in his head. We were going to stop at Ered Luin on our way here, since it's settled now, but Aragorn warned me that the new king is an asshat."

Ori snorted so hard he nearly choked.

"You know he's Thorin's brother, don't you?" Ori managed.

"I heard something to that effect. I also heard he was a waste of skin, so we gave it a miss and arrived here early. They can take it up with Denethor if they want copies."

"Who's Aragorn?"

"That's King Elessar's given name. His father's given name was Arathorn. Don't know why they don't just stick with their names. I think King Aragorn would have been brilliant, but it's not my dynasty, so there you are."

Ori shook his head.

"Why do they not consult you on these things?"

Bilbo sniffed. "Their loss, I suppose."

"I read your description of Minas Tirith in your last travelogue. Just the description of the banners rippling in the wind made me swoon."

"Now that is flattering, but it's not difficult to cast Minas Tirith in a glorious light. It really is that beautiful. Even the poorest inhabitants have plenty, and that's coming from a hobbit, someone with very strict notions of 'plenty.'"

"I think he and Thorin may get on well, then."

"Frodo absolutely loved him. Truthfully, their mutual admiration was over the top. Just for a moment, when we were leaving, I was afraid Frodo was going to hide in Aragorn's spare boots and we'd never find him."
All at once Bilbo looked troubled.

“Frodo told me he is happy as long as I don't leave him, but every time we depart from someplace he's grown accustomed to, it's like I'm tearing him out by the roots. He doesn't sleep well for days before we leave, or days after we arrive, no matter how felicitous the destination. Even visiting here had to be negotiated like a treaty between kingdoms. We could only come to the inn if I promised he didn’t have to go near the water and that I wouldn’t either.”

“He’s afraid of water?”

“His parents drowned.”

“Oh, Bilbo, I’m so sorry.”

“Thank you. Damned inconvenient of them. The point is, I’m rather at ends as to what I’ll ultimately do with him.”

Ori stared at him.

"You aren't thinking of leaving him?"

"No, no, no. He's my lad now, that's fixed. Just as soon cut off my own arm. I'm thinking in terms of if I would ever settle down, and where. Even if the Shire were suddenly a friendly place, I don't really have any home of my own to go back to. I ceded my position as the head of the Baggins family to Frodo’s father long ago, and now I suppose it's in the hands of one of my other charming relations."

"I take Frodo's father was more suited to the life of a country squire?"

"While I just wasn’t the sort to stay in one village for the rest of my life, listening to my tenants bicker over drops from apple trees on fence lines. Too much like my mother, I suppose.”

Ori had a startling thought.

“Bilbo, are you a nobleman?”

“Hobbits don’t have those, but I was the heir to The Baggins and I did give it up, and happily,” Bilbo threw a wilted pea pod over to where Nori-pori and Mask played and Powder napped with her back pointedly to all of them. The pod bounced on the ground and Nori-pori and Mask suddenly became fierce predators, tossing and pouncing on the unfortunate legume while Powder virtuously slept on.

“Over the years I’ve slept in palaces and haylofts, even in a convenient tree in a pinch.”

“But you can’t do that with a faunt,” said Ori.

“No, I can’t.”

"Can you afford to settle?"

"Oh, yes. It's not a matter of money. I don’t need much beyond a roof at night and a meal or six in my belly. The stories fund all that. The Gondoreans are very faithful about remitting to wherever I post. If it was just about me ... but it's not. Frodo needs someplace to call home, a kitchen to grow up in, or what sort of hobbit will he become?"

"It doesn't seem to have hurt you to grow up on this road."
"I get what you’re saying, but Frodo isn’t me. He’s more like Drogo, his father. More like my father, come to think of it. Good, solid, dependable hobbits, with no strange ideas about scantily dressed maidens at the mercy of pirate kings."

“Where did you ever come up with that?”

Bilbo chuckled. “When I was a fauntling younger than Frodo, I met my first elf. He was quite drunk, dancing in some filmy party costume with a glass of wine still firmly in his hand. Even then I had more hair on my feet than he had on his entire body. Except his head. That was covered in the most beautiful fall of silver hair.

“Only lasses in the Shire have hair that long, and even then it’s always curly. I loudly asked Mama why the elf’s hair was white but her brows so black and why she had no bosom to speak of and—”

“Mahal!”

Ori clapped his hand over his mouth while Bilbo laughed at his wide, startled eyes.

When he could speak again Ori said, “That wasn’t him, was it?”

“King Thranduil? Oh, yes.”

“How will I ever look him in the eye again?”

“That’s the advantage of being our height. You never have to.”

“But if he finds out?”

“Actually,” said Bilbo, “I’m sure he already knows.”

“How do you know? Did he say something?”

“No, but when we met again, years later, at Imladris, his glare could have curdled milk. But then, if he admits to knowing, he would have to admit to reading my books, wouldn’t he.”

“He would never do that!” Ori cried.

“Exactly.”

Thorin came over and threw himself into a chair with a tired sigh and a wry expression.

“Had you an interesting conversation with Master Frodo?” Bilbo teased.

Thorin huffed out a laugh.

“At that age, the conversation is guaranteed to be interesting. With Fili and Kili so close in age I used to get it in both ears at once.”

“Please let me know if he’s bothering you. He can be a bit much. Takes after me.”

“As long as he doesn’t ask me where babies come from.”

“He already knows.”

“Already?”
“Really, King Thorin, we are hobbits.”

“You know, when I’m at home with family, I’m just ‘Thorin’.”

“And I’m usually just ‘Bilbo’. Shall we proceed from there?”

Thorin grinned, and ducked his head a little.

“I think that’s an excellent idea.”

“Good. I’ll save ‘King Morsel’ for special occasions.”

Thorin sputtered and Bilbo laughed.

“You’re terrible,” Thorin pronounced.

“Oh, you love it,” Bilbo teased.

Frodo swooped in, apparently pretending to be a bird, and went right up to Thorin and said, “Come play hide and seek, King Thorin. Please?.”

“Just the two of us?” Thorin asked.

“Fili and Kili will play if we ask them!”

Ori said, “King Thorin has to rest, Frodo. He’s been very busy.”

Frodo considered.

“Mm. Old people get tired fast. Will you play with us?”

“Frodo!” Bilbo cried.

“I’d love to,” said Ori, and looked pointedly first at Bilbo and then Thorin. “We’ll leave the old people here to rest. Together.”

While Frodo counted to one hundred, Ori desperately looked for a place to hide. He overheard Fili and Kili talking about the roof, but he could just see himself getting all the way there and then being seized with mortification that he couldn’t get down. Yes, he was a grown dwarf playing hide and go seek with a small hobbit, but he still had enough pride that he wished not to need saving like a kitten stuck in a tree.

It wasn’t as though Kihshassa was strong enough to fly him down.

They had the whole house except the kitchen in which to play, surely he could find someplace suitable, yet not life-threatening.

He ducked into an unoccupied room where the eaves of the house made a little space at the join of two walls where someone had constructed a boot cupboard.

Perfect!

It was warm and quiet and actually fairly comfy, since someone had removed the boots and replaced them with pillows. Apparently this was someone’s hidey hole, hopefully not Frodo’s.

Yes, very comfy.

Very-

He had no idea how long he slept, but by the time he woke, he could tell by the light through the grill in the door that the sun had definitely gone round the other side of the house.

Oh, bugger.

He could just imagine the uproar it could cause if the Durins thought he’d disappeared yet again.

And where was Frodo? Shouldn’t Ori have been found by now?

He was about to crawl back out when the door to the room opened and a pair of furry feet were evident through the grill in the cupboard door.

The problem was, they were the wrong hairy feet, and they were followed by a pair of familiar boots.

Oh, Mahal’s hairy arse.

This was the time and the place Thorin chose to get Bilbo alone?

But, of course it was.

Ori stifled a sigh of frustration and closed his eyes and put his hands over his ears.

Not his business. Nonono. Not something he should be privy to, certainly not something he should watch. He supposed, where the king was concerned, voyeurism was a capital offense. Unless the king was an exhibitionist.

And the king’s scribe was a nosey little warg pup.

He could hear it through his hands, so he gave it up.

“-may I see you again?” Thorin asked.

“Do you want to see me again?” Bilbo replied.

“Desperately. Would you and Frodo spend the winter in Erebor as Ori suggested? You’d have your own quarters, and the royal library would be open to you.”

“And your quarters?”

“If you wished it,” said Thorin very quietly.

“You know hobbits are far worse hedonists than dwarrow, or they used to be anyhow. I’d take you on this bed right now if you wanted me. I’m not sure your people would like the idea of a foreigner fiddling with their king.”

“I think you would be very well received. If they haven’t wanted to dethrone me for encouraging my nephews to court a woman and an elf, I doubt my courting a hobbit would cause a ripple.”

Bilbo breathed in with surprise.
"You want to court me?"

"I am willing to go as far as you want me to go. I don't know your heart. If you wanted to share just your body, I would take it and be grateful for the gift."

"Don't sell yourself short, Thorin. Perhaps I don’t know you well, but I believe your heart is already engaged or you wouldn't speak."

Ori swallowed hard.

Apparently Thorin had decided that he would jump with both feet, and once Thorin decided something, he saw it through, no matter the consequences.

"My heart is engaged," said Thorin.

Bilbo gave a soft, self-deprecating laugh.

"Mine, too. Shall we see where this leads?"

"Right now, I'd like it to lead to a kiss."

"I believe that can be arranged."

There followed unmistakeable sounds, from the floor, to the bed, the covers moving, an article of clothing was tossed aside with enough strength to smack the cupboard door.

"Ah," said Thorin quite audibly, "Ori spoke true. You don't have a tail!"

Bilbo laughed low and said teasingly, "How very grateful you must be to have Ori around to point out these vital facts to you."

"Ori is indeed very valuable." was Thorin reply.

Ori dropped his face in his hands. Not only was his king attempting to play 'what's in the mine shaft' with Bilbo, but they were talking about him!

Fervent whispers, the bedsprings creaking.

Ori sighed, curled back up and prayed for oblivion.

Oh, he hoped they locked the door.

He could tell what they were doing just by the noises. To his horror they spoke in low, heated, perfectly intelligible voices: "Oh" and "Yes" and "More".

Of course, they were more experienced than he was, and if the escalating moans were any indication, apparently quite skilled.

Ori felt his body respond to it and he bit the inside of his cheek hard, trying to distract himself with the pain. He desperately recited Doowhee Dezmal's code in his head, at the back of which he could hear a low chuckle and a sparkling giggle and he realized Mahal and Yavanna were laughing.

"Sorry, dearest," came the unbidden thought in a feminine tone. "Laughing with you, not at you."

"Or we would be, if yeh were laughin'," Mahal completed.
He was startled awake again by a loud rap of knuckles on the door. Not the cupboard door, but the door to the room.

“Ori!” Dori cried. “Are you in there? Open the door, pet. You mustn’t go on disappearing like this! I’ve been worried si-“

The door creaked open.

“He’s not here, Dori,” said Thorin.

"Oh! I beg your pardon, Thorin. When did you switch roo… Ah."

"And a pleasant evening to you as well, Dori," said Bilbo chipperly.

"Well, Thorin, I see the silk whispered."

"Yes, very amusing. I'm going to get dressed now," said Thorin.

The door started to close when Dori apparently remembered why he had knocked in the first place.

"Have you seen Ori?"

"Not since lunch," said Thorin.

Bilbo laughed and said, "Dori, I'm sure he'll turn up when the dinner bell rings."

"But-"

"Is Dwalin worried?"

Dori snorted.

"He and Gimli have been bashing each other with sticks all afternoon."

Balin's voice came from up the hall.

"Beloved, have yeh seen me scarlet kilt? Brandy's taken a fancy t' it an' I'm afraid… Ah, Thorin, lyin' down on th' job, I see."

Dori said slyly, "But not alone."

"Aha," said Balin. Ori could just imagine the twinkle in his eyes. "Hullo, Master Bilbo."

"Good evening, Mr Balin."

Thorin said, "I'm closing the door now."

He did so, but not before Balin and Dori burst into excited whispers as they went back down the hall.

Thorin sighed.

"Well, the bat's out of the mine now."
Bilbo got up and started rooting around for his clothes.

"Do you really mind?" he asked.

"No, but you had better prepare for eighteen different versions of the 'shovel talk', even if there isn't a lot to shovel."

They stood so close to the cupboard that Ori could have bashed their ankles with the door.

Ori heard kissing, now more leisurely than before, and Bilbo's happy hum.

"So, more of a ladle talk, really. That's alright. I can handle a ladle."

"I suspect you can handle a great many things. You do know you're not under any obligation to me? As I said before, you'll have your own chambers at Erebor. They don't have to be in the vicinity of the royal residence, if you prefer."

"No, I want to be there. I find I'm a little in love with this family already."

"With all the noise and chaos?"

"Rather like hobbits actually."

Ori waited a good twenty minutes after they had left before he eased open the cupboard door. He was rumpled and dazed and he desperately had to pee. Even so, he was amused to see Bilbo had stripped the bed on his way out. Ori suspected he would also launder the sheets and remake the bed.

After a quick wash and a change of clothes he was just ahead of the dinner bell. When he entered the dining room Dori seized him by both shoulders.

"Ori! Where have you been?"

"I was playing hide and go seek with Frodo and I fell asleep."

"An' so did Frodo," said Erda, bringing in the bread. "I guess it's hard work countin' t' one hundred when there's soft grass an' th' shade of an apple tree."

When Thorin and Bilbo entered the room hand in hand, everything stopped. Dis raised an eyebrow and several bags of coins not-so-discretely changed hands, some being brazenly chucked across the table.

"So, Master Bilbo," said Dis lightly. "I take it you'll be joining us in Erebor this winter."

"I have been invited, yes," said Bilbo, "and it's not an invitation I would refuse."

"We're going to Erebor?" Frodo asked, his whole face lighting up.

"If it's quite alright with you, my lad," said Bilbo.

Frodo nodded furiously.
Ori was amazed that this meal was just as spectacular as all the others they had had here. But this one was strangely almost ‘normal’. It started with crayfish battered with coconut and fried, with marmalade sauce as a dip. Bombur explained that the main dish was twice baked potatoes: large potatoes in their jackets with their insides deliciously mixed with spring onions, bacon and cheese then broiled. There were dishes of new peas, new carrots and tiny onions all steaming and glistening with melting chunks of butter. The meat was large, perfectly done fried steaks. Ori wondered if this was the surprise. He wasn’t sure what beast it was from but the meat was dark and rich. Erda poured out the inn’s own brew of dandelion wine which, though light was delicious with the meat.

“This steak is excellent!” Thorin managed around a mouthful. Dwalin grunted and nodded equally enjoying his own. Ori kept tasting carefully but around the salt, pepper and flour and butter he could not place the meat.

During the course of the meal, Thorin turned to Ori.

"Sleep well?"
"Er... yes, thank you."
"Are you alright? You seem a little out of sorts."
"I think my brain is still halfway in a dream."

Dwalin put an arm around him and kissed the top of his head.

"No pullin' a 'Furh'nk' an' fallen asleep at th' table."

“No, indeed,” Dori agreed. “This is our last dinner here as poor dear Thorin’s mourning is at an end.”

At a sly look from Jani, Dis swallowed the last of her wine.

“I didn’t mourn,” said Dis. “Udad was an ass.”

Jani snickered and refilled Dis’ and her own wine glasses.

Thranduil cocked his head at Thorin.

“And have you mourned to your own satisfaction, King of Dwarrow?”

Thorin swallowed his mouthful, looked sneeringly at Thranduil, belched, and put another piece of steak into his mouth. The table erupted with laughter. Thranduil joined in, snickering.

“Yes, I suspected as much.”

The dishes from the main course were removed to the kitchen in their usual highly polished condition.

The dessert was brought out. The guests groaned in delight as bowls of sugared strawberries, small cakes to eat them with and whipped sweetened cream. There was also an enormous pie, filled with preserved cherries in their syrup. The steam holes in the top crust were cut out in the shapes of hearts. Ori tried one small serving of each kind of dessert and sat back. His tummy felt tight in his skin and he almost wanted a nap.

“Bombur, Erda, yeh’ve surpassed yerselves beyond everything!” Balin praised.
There was a round of agreement.

“But I cannot place the meat,” Dori finished. “Do, please tell us what it was from and what it is, or rather was?”

Bombur and Erda exchanged glances. Bofur commented,

“Don’ look at me, lads I never had it in me life.”

“The meat tonight was graciously supplied by the troupe led by the Great Woudini,” Bombur began.

“The Great Woudini?” Balin and Thorin chorused.

“Yes. It seems when they were far to the south in tropical climes, they were given an egg.”

Ori shivered involuntarily.

Thorin stared blankly at Bombur.

“Master Bombur are you about to tell us we’ve dined on dragon meat?”

“No, no, your majesty.” Erda comforted as the younger Urs giggled. “Though some do call the creatures ‘false dragons’. They are like lizards, with craggy, rough scales and huge long mouths full of dreadful teeth. They inhabit swamps and pretend to be logs floating in water to surprise their prey.”

“False dragons?” repeated Dis.

“Yes. They kept the egg warm and it hatched and they had for some time what they all agreed was a delightful little creature. Their badgers affectionally named it Smeg. Usually, they called it Smeg-head. Unfortunately, it grew quite quickly into a rather large, sharp-toothed, foul-tempered beast that, within a few miles from here, attempted to eat one of their ponies.”

“Mahal’s balls!” muttered Dwalin.

“Are those the creatures known as alligators?” Thranduil asked his brows high in shock.

Bombur nodded.

“Those,” Thranduil went on, “can grow to enormous size! I have heard of several reaching the length of eighteen feet, by the reckoning of men.”

“Yes, The Great Woudini said theirs had reached twenty-one feet. As said, they had to kill it to save the ponies and, from the tussle they had with it, probably themselves.”

“Then what happened to it?” Tauriel asked.

“Well,” said Bombur, “when I asked them the same question, they handed me these steaks and broke into this little song-”

The younger Urs shrieked and sang loudly.

“Yongling Broody Grumpy Dragon,
The guests roared with laughter. Thorin fell back in his chair, hand to his head.

“In the next age, they will say we ate a real dragon!”

“Durin dragon eaters!” shouted Kili.

Thorin sighed and turned to Bilbo.

“And you heard the Durins were merely crazy.”

Ori begged off the after-dinner socializing.

“I’m sorry, I’m a little wrong-footed right now. I think I’ll just turn in.”

Dori looked alarmed.

“You aren’t coming down with something, I hope.”

“No, I-“

“You’ve always been of a delicate constitution, pet.”

Ori swallowed a groan.

“No, really, Dori, I’m fine. I just need a rest. If I’m better in a half hour or so I’ll come back down. Excuse me, please.”

He was startled when Dwalin got up to follow him. He supposed he really should have expected it.

In their room, Ori stripped down and crawled into bed, pulled the sheet up to his chin and his pillow over his face.

Dwalin climbed in to lie beside him.

"Yeh goin’ t’ tell me wha’ happened? Did yeh no’ really take a nap this afternoon?”

"I did. I fell asleep in the boot cupboard in one of the empty rooms. At least it was an empty room when I got there, but just as I went to leave, Thorin and Bilbo came in."

The bed springs creaked as Dwalin sat up.

Ori slid his pillow aside.

"Love," said Dwalin, "did they find yeh?"

"No! First they were talking and I couldn't interrupt that. The mortification alone would make Thorin mute for the rest of his life. Then…"
"Then?"
"Um. They didn't leave."

The silence dragged on and Ori couldn't see Dwalin's face, but he didn't really want to, not if Dwalin was angry with him. Ori should have left the cupboard when they entered.

Really, would it have startled them at all?

Nori was forever popping out of trash barrels and falling out of crawl spaces. He rarely got a second glance.

Ori should have-

The bed shook.

Ori reached up and put his hand to Dwalin's chest.

"Are you laughing?"

Dwalin roared and fell back on the bed in gleeful hysterics.

"It's not funny!" Ori hissed. "Mahal and Yavanna were laughing at me."

Dwalin rolled over and buried his face in Ori's abdomen, still laughing so hard Ori feared he would hyperventilate.

Finally, after several minutes, Dwalin calmed enough for only the occasional snort and chuckle.

"Me wee scribe pervert," Dwalin wheezed. "Did yeh at leas' ge' a cock stand out've it?"

"Yes," said Ori in a small voice.

Dwalin gathered him up and rocked him.

"Ah, love, I'm sorry. Never mind yer ridiculous husband."

"I'm just glad you aren't angry."

"Why th' fuck 'ud I be angry? Yeh did wha' yeh though' best. Nobody was hurt."

"You won't tell them?"

"Mahal's hairy arse! No! Yer righ’. Tha' it'd jus’ drive Thorin back int' silence. Las’ thin’ we want, now tha' he's at leas' fiddlin' with Master Baggins."

"I think it's more than fiddling. Thorin told Bilbo he wants to court."

"Holy fuck! Thorin, th' Grea’ Silen’ Gloom Biscuit o’ Erebor, actually used th' word 'cour'?"

"Yes! I almost gasped out loud and got myself found."

Dwalin chuckled again then said, “Fancy a walk?”

“You know me so well.”
Ori led the way downstairs, he was surprised by the quiet. Had everyone gone to bed early? He realized that this was their last night at the inn. He had a feeling people were, no doubt, making the most of this charming spot.

He and Dwalin went silently out to the deck. The moon was heading quickly to new. The night of the new moon would be Thorin’s corona tion.

“Well, we’ll be busier than ever when we ge’ back t th’ mountain.”

Ori nodded as, hand in hand, they stepped off the deck and automatically headed to the lake.

“We’ll have to be careful,” Ori said. “We don’t want to fall over anyone also er… enjoying the moonlight.”

“Oh aye?” Dwalin teased. “Who’re we goin’ t’ fall over then? F’r five coppers, who’s on first?”

“Probably Kili and Tauriel, they-”

A log-shaped lump in the middle of the grass revealed itself to be Kili and Tauriel lying cheek to cheek their legs out in opposite directions.

“That is the fixed star,” Kili said, pointing upward suddenly. “We call it the Amrâlimê. You’re my Amrâlimê, Tauriel.”

“An’ th’ pair a’ yeh need t’ go ge’ a room,” Dwalin commented as he and Ori went passed.

“Go away,” Kili growled hotly and Tauriel giggled.

“Five,” Ori said stifling a laugh.

“Fine. An’ nex’?”

“Hmm,” Ori pondered. “Fili and Sigrid, probably.”

“Right. Another five on Fili and Sigrid,” Dwalin agreed. They headed north along the shore this time. The only sounds were the lapping of the water at the lake’s edge and the occasional night bird.

“Then Dis and Jani next,” Ori decided. Then either Gimli and Legolas or Balin and Dori.”

“Righ’, we’ll keep an eye ou’ f’r Dis an’ Jani.”

They wander on. Kihshassa swished passed them before circling up to head back to Bombur’s fruit trees and berry bushes. The sandy shore narrowed and the trees gave way to large rocks and behind this an upsweep of meadow. Ori could see deer grazing with some cows. Fawns and calves frisked together in a way no man farmer would ever see.

They heard a scuffle behind the rocks.

Instantly Dwalin pushed Ori behind him.

“Alright, whoever yeh are, come on out!”

Someone let out a startled shriek and Fili appeared, rather in a state of undress, with Sigrid hunkered down behind him, holding her bodice up over her breasts.

“Oh, fer th’ love o’ Mahal’s hairy arse!” Dwalin barked, deflating from his imitation of a mad grizzly. “What’re you two doin’?”

They looked at him blankly.

“I mean, I know wha’ yer doin’, but why here?”

They continued to look at him blankly.

By the light of the moon they seemed to glisten - more brightly than would seem possible just for rolling around on the sand.

“You’ve been skinny dipping!” said Ori.

“Aye, an’ now yeh got sand in yer drawers. Or yeh would, if yeh were wearin’ them.”

Fili stumbled about, “I … I… It’s a lovely evening, isn’t it.”

Sigrid cringed.

“Ori!” she begged in a tiny voice.

“We didn’t see anything. Did we, Captain?” Ori said rather forcefully.

“Eh?” Dwalin looked all around, everywhere except at the young couple. “Aye, nice night.”

Dwalin and Ori walked on hand in hand to the sound of two people very hurriedly tidying up behind them.

Ori got a full fifty paces before he started to giggle. He looked up at Dwalin who wore a rather crooked smile himself.

They rounded a huge clump of boulders and Ori fell over a driftwood log and went sprawling. The driftwood cried out and brandished a knife.

“Ori!” Dis cried, dropping the blade just as quickly. “Don’t do that! I could have run you through!”

From the ground Jani snorted. “Looks like someone already poleaxed him.”

Dwalin heaved a great sigh of exasperation.

“Dis! What’re yeh doin’ lyin’ in the path?”

Dis and Jani looked at him blankly.

He threw his hands up to forestall them.

“You owe me fifteen coppers,” said Ori.

“I heard that!” Dis cried.

“Gimli and his elf next,” Ori murmured.
“We all heard it!” Gimli shouted from somewhere in the darkness ahead, Legolas’ bright laugh followed right after it.

Ori giggled.

“Now you owe me twenty! I think we need to find some rocks before they’re all taken,” said Ori wryly.

“Bloody dwarrow,” Dwalin growled. “Clutterin’ up th’ place.”

“Really?” Ori wondered “Who’s next?”

“Who’s left?” Dwalin asked. “Seems a rather crowded spot.”

“Balin and Dori next,” he remembered.

“Aye? No’ Thorin an’ Bilbo?”

“No, Thorin would take him to the hayloft.”

“Yeh know, at this rate, no one’s finished th’ cherry pie an’ th’ inn’s go’ t’ be fairly deserted. We could take th’ pie up t’ bed an’ we wouldn’t have t’ worry about th’ sand.”

“You have the best ideas,” said Ori.

And they turned back toward the inn.

When they got to the kitchen they were surprised to find the lights lit and the younger badgers sitting around the end of the kitchen table.

They were eating the cherry pie out of the pan with spoons.

“Aw,” said Dwalin. “We were goin’ t’ eat tha’.”

He looked so forlorn, Ori wondered if he wouldn’t stick out his bottom lip.

Frodo looked at Dwalin, down at the pan and back up again.

“You can still have some.”

“We haven’t licked out the pan yet,” said Wili brightly.

Ori waved that off graciously.

“No, we wouldn’t deprive you of it. There’s still strawberry shortcake. Er… Isn’t there?”

Poli said, “There is. We were going for that next, but we can spare you some.”

“Yer all goin’ t’ have such bellyaches,” said Dwalin.

“But it’ll be fun while it lasts,” Isi reasoned.

Ori couldn’t argue with that.
When they got back to their room, Dwalin offered Ori a handful of coins.

“Here. Twen’y copper.”

Ori looked askance and gave him a mischievous grin.

“If you don’t mind, I’d rather have twenty kisses.”

Dwalin chuckled.

“Before th’ cake ‘r after?”

“During.”

“Ah. I get yeh. Tha’ can be arranged.”
There … and Back Again

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. One last inn brekkie, one last dip in the lake and, at the very least, one more embarrassing situation for Ori. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrown tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

They breakfasted again on the deck and Ori was amazed to find he was hungry, given that he’d eaten cake, strawberries and whipped cream not that long ago.

It was very traditional fare and quite comforting: toast and a choice of apricot, cherry, raspberry or orange jam, with or without lashings of butter. Fried eggs glistened in a tempting pile, the whites thick and the yolks done to a perfect solid, not too dry but not too runny. He couldn’t choose between the bacon or sausages, so he chose both. Bowls of yet more fresh strawberries sat by jugs of thickened cream. The black tea tasted strong and slightly citrusy.

They were almost all assembled, and everyone present was stuffing their faces, when Bombur and Thorin arrived.

As they walked out onto the deck, Thorin said, "Only if it's all right with you, Bombur. I know it's a lot of work, not just us, but the guard detail, not to mention the special Durin brand of chaos."

"Believe me," said Bombur, "your chaos isn't all that chaotic. During the last Gondorean delegation visit someone left open the back door of the inn. Nothing like waking to a kitchen full of goats."

Balin looked up from his tea.

"I've bin called an old goat many times, but there's only ever been one o' me. What's th' to-do, laddies?"

Thorin smiled.

"It all depends on what's happening in Erebor, of course, but if all is well, the Durins will return to the inn next year."

"Really, nadad?" Dis asked, obviously thrilled.

"We'll see," said Thorin. "You know how it goes, but after running trade negotiations into the spring, I know you'll be ready for a rest. Or, whatever it is that we actually do here."

Thranduil seemed to ponder and finally announced, "Yes, I believe I can arrange to be here."

Thorin did a double-take.

Thranduil laughed.

"You don't think the Durins will be rid of me so easily after this?"

"Oh, yes, Thrandy dear," cried Dori. "You all must join us again! Musn't they, Thorin?"

Thorin threw up his hands in defeat.

"I suppose you'll want the lake-facing rooms," he grumbled at Thranduil.

"I am willing to arm wrestle you for them," Thranduil cooed.

Out of the corner of his eye, Ori saw Fili and Sigrid shyly exchanging smiles and he had a feeling that at least one room would be opening up next year.

Oh! But the extra work involved, just clearing away for this visit! He'd have to start next winter at this rate!

As if reading his mind, Thorin turned to him and said, "You know the position of king's scribe comes with a staff, right?"

"A staff?" Ori asked, now completely confused. "Like Tharkûn's? Am I supposed to hit people
"I suppose that depends on whom you hire and if they like that sort of thing."
"Hire?" Ori asked, the situation suddenly, horribly clear.
"It's true, you'll have to hire and train them, but you'll have a year to do it. I wish I could have put everything in place before, but I'm only the presumptive king, and I'll be mending walls with the scribe's guild as it is."
"But, I'm too young!"
"You're young, yes," said Thorin, "but you're already doing the job."
"Aye," Balin added, "an' perfectly well."
"But, that would make me the youngest king's scribe in dwarven history," Ori realized.
"An' only one o' three t' take th' post before they earned their mastery," said Balin, shrugging.
"Are you sure you don't want someone with more experience?" Ori asked Thorin.
Thorin came and lay their foreheads together.
"You have experience, remember? Gather your team. We have work to do. Oh, and don't forget to write up your own contract."
Thorin gave his nape a gentle squeeze and released him. He turned to accept a cup of tea from Bilbo and sat down beside the hobbit.
"No' t' worry, laddie," said Balin. "I know all th' particulars. We'll work it out together."
"He's serious," said Ori.
"He's bin tellin' yeh so f'r th' las' three months," said Balin. "Now we can make it official. Jus' tidying up."
Immediately, Ori's mind went to Omi, Loli and Buj, but he would also need scribes from the guild, ones who didn't mind taking orders from a dwarf not yet a century old.
Mending walls indeed!
Dwalin hugged him.
"Congratulations, love," he said.
Dori burst into proud tears and hugged him next.
Nori brought him toast with jam.
"Keep your strength up," said Nori with a wink.
Sigrid poured Ori's tea, humming a gleeful little tune. Fili put an extra fried egg on his plate. Dis kissed the top of his head.
"He really thinks I can do this," Ori said to her.
"Of course," said Dis, as if it were perfectly clear.
"You'll be brilliant, Ori-mate," Kili assured him, throwing an arm around his shoulders.
"I will?"
"Of course, you're a Durin. Brilliance is our watchword."
"That, too," said Kili.

After breakfast they lingered on the deck with Ori's 'official' sketchbook, the one with which Mahal had not helped, and laughed over all the sketches Ori had made of everyone in their bathing costumes, including the 'double portrait' of Fili and Nori spinning like lasses in their skirts and even Thranduil demonstrating the 'proper' spinning technique.
Dori sighed.
"Nori's legs always did look like twigs."
Dwalin snorted and replied, "They work jus' fine, ask anyone who's had t' chase 'im."
Ori turned the page and Dis shrieked.
"Thorin! You wore it!"
In the picture he wore the crown-like hat Dipfa had made as well as his bathing suit.
"Only for this picture," said Thorin. He cleared his throat with great dignity. "I know how vital it is to the future of Erebor."
"Hmm, yes," said Bilbo, leaning over his shoulder. "I can see that picture’s destined for the throne
Then they were all shrieking.

Ori had drawn Gimli with his back turned in the picture, but he was grinning over his shoulder coquettishly in his incredibly sheer suit. His hat, which Kili had described to Ori, perched at a rakish angle on his head.

"Me best feature," said Gimli archly.
"Your shoulder or your grin?" Legolas teased him.
"Yeh get t' take your pick. Here's th' one o' yeh."

In his portrait, Legolas also wore the infamous diaphanous suit, though he held a quiver in front of his crotch, his face bright with a dashing smile. Tauriel stood next to him in Kili's costume, her eyes obviously cut toward him and full of disbelief and Thranduil sat nearby, glass of wine in his elegant hand, pretending not to notice, while Nori-Pori climbed the hem of his 'bed sheet' robe like a furry little assassin.

Thranduil looked from the picture to Ori with a raised eyebrow.
"I hope that's a Dorwinian vintage," he said dryly.
"Always, your majesty," Ori assured him.
"Hey, Ori-mate," said Kili, "where are you in all this?"
Ori giggled.
"Don't worry, I'm here."

Dwalin appeared in all his bestriped and mustache-waxed glory, striking a 'he-dwarf' pose with one arm curled up to show his muscle.

Off the side and behind stood Ori, with besotted expression, hands clasped to his bosom and little hearts drifted up from his hat.

"Brilliant!" Fili proclaimed.
"Really, pet," Dori protested, but his lip quivered on the edge of mirth.
"Righ' down t' th' freckles," Balin chuckled.
Sigrid shook her head and laughed.
"You drew yourself looking like a toothpick next to him!" she cried.

Ori leaned close to her and whispered, "He can put me in his mouth anytime."
She fell into gleeful, scandalized laughter.
"Here," said Ori, "I have a different one."

Dwalin and Ori wore their bathing costumes, but Dwalin stood behind Ori with his arms wrapped around Ori's shoulders and Ori held his sketchbook and a graphite pen.

"We stood in front o' th' mirror upstairs," said Dwalin. "He drew us both in a snap!"
"It was the only way I could get us both in the picture," said Ori. "Though, now that I've done it once, I think… No. Well…"
"Yeh think?" Dwalin prompted.
"I think I could probably draw us both together from memory, like my hand would remember how to draw it."
Nori nodded.
"You been doin' that for years, Chick, with one thing or another."
"I don't know why I thought it would be different with people," said Ori, genuinely puzzled.
"Maybe I just had to grown into it."

At the end of this, Thorin suggested a last swim at the kettle well.
Kili groaned.
"Idad! You've thrashed us into next week already!"
"I was thinking this time it would be you and Fili and I against everyone else."
Kili sat up straight and Fili grinned and almost yelped, "Really?"
"Really," promised Thorin. "I'll even wear my funny hat. Hopefully it will join Gimli's at the bottom of the lake."

Kili looked around like a maniac and demanded, "Who's in?"

Gimli, Legolas, Tauriel and Dis were definitely in. Nori begged off because he said Assault and Battery would get water logged and Jani said she'd just hang out on the shore and wait for Dis to slog out of the water in a clingy wet bathing costume.

"Y'know what?" said Bofur. "I'm in!"

He hopped out of his trousers and down to his skivvies right there. Ori was not at all surprised to see they were a familiar lime green plaid with little pickaxes embroidered on them. He had a feeling he already knew what the rest of Bofur's underpinnings looked like. He was also afraid that if Dipfa found out, they would suddenly be all rage among the chic of Erebor and possibly plastered all through Vug Magazine.

Bofur's dwarf fur was blue black and so abundant, Ori couldn't see if there was a tattoo anywhere on his exposed skin. Ori felt rather jealous. The Ur were obviously quite fuzzy in a way the Ri were not.

Ori turned to Dwalin.

"Are you going?"

"Nah, I'm goin' t' stay on th' shore an' watch th' mayhem. Hold hands with me, love?"

Dwalin winked and Ori felt his cheeks color.

"Shall we still put on our bathing costumes?" Ori asked.

"O' course. I'll even wax me mustache fer th' occasion."

The younger kettle well set raced upstairs to change. Thorin made to follow before pausing and turning toward the elf king.

"Thranduil? Can we interest you in a little friendly exercise?"

"You really don't want to give up those lake-facing rooms next summer, do you," Thranduil replied with a smirk. "I haven't a costume. Elves don't wear them to bathe. Of course, we usually bathe in private. If this week has taught me anything, it's that dwarrow do nothing in private."

"You can say that again," Ori muttered.

Dis said, "Come now, Thranduil, you've already worn bed linens. You can't have many secrets left. If you're really that shy, I'm sure Bombur and Erda can find you something."

"The tea towels, no doubt," said Thranduil.

"Wear my mattress, Thrandy dear," said Dori, with a teasing look at Thorin. "If you're lucky it may shrink a bit."

As they were all heading inside the inn, a leaf from Ori's sketchbook slipped free and skittered across the deck. He wasn't worried, because he had put anything terribly incriminating away. He reached for it, but Thorin nabbed it before it slid over and out onto the lawn.

Thorin looked at it, then looked closer at it, his eyes growing wider by the moment.

Ori got a sinking feeling.

He'd put all those pictures away. He knew he had.

"Ori," said Thorin, "is this a hobbit commission or wishful thinking?"

He turned the picture to Ori and, indeed, it was Thorin and Bilbo in bed.

"Ummm..."

Dwalin said, "It was a sort o' commission, bu' no' from Bilbo. Someone's wantin' Ori t' be a cosmic matchmaker."

"Someone?" Thorin asked, pointing up into the universe.

"Yes," said Ori. "That Someone."

"Oh," Thorin inspected the picture again then made to hand it back to Ori with a naughty grin. "It's very nice, but you could have shown a little more skin."

"Why don't you keep it," said Ori. "At least then I'll know where it is."

Thranduil was a cunning foe, but in the end he and all challengers were vanquished and when he slogged out of the lake, wringing out his hair, he wore a smile he couldn't hide.

"They're positively vicious," he said to Dori.

"I could have told you that, dear. I certainly wasn't going to go in myself and muss my hair."

The dwarf king and his heirs shouted their war cries in triumph, hugging each other all at once and laughing.
Thranduil accepted a towel from Randibur and watched them. His expression didn't change, but something in his eyes softened.

"They aren't so different from us," Ori heard him say. "Nor is he his grandfather."

Up in their room, Ori had just closed his trunk with a final, exasperated slam when Bilbo knocked at the open doorway.

"Hello," said Ori with a sigh.

"Finished repacking?" Bilbo asked.

"Just about. I told Dori if he ever packed my things for me again I was going to jumble all his hair and beard accessories. That was a bit vicious, I admit."

Dwalin stuck his head around the bathroom doorway and snorted.

"Had t' be done, love."

"It had to be done," Bilbo agreed with a sympathetic smile.

Bilbo and Ori sat on Ori's trunk. Dwalin came in and locked the trunk while the lid was held forcibly closed. He kissed Ori and went back to finish getting his things from the bathroom.

"I wish you were coming back with us," said Ori to Bilbo.

"I do, too," Bilbo smiled. "But I have to finish out at least the next week here. With the coronation coming up, we're booked to the roof. In fact, we may have to put a few bunks up there. Then I have to bring the last of my manuscript pages to Gondor. Denethor doesn't do a lot of editing, but they still have to be typeset and I have to see the printers' galleys. That will leave me just enough time to catch the caravan of my own books back east to Erebor before the passes are closed by the snows."

"The autumn publication," said Ori.

"I daren't miss this year's deadline. Mr. Denethor is far too large a fellow to be wroth with me."

"He wouldn't try to hurt you?" Ori asked, alarmed.

"Oh, no, no. He's a bit of a tyrant, just ask his sons, but he isn't much for violence. Besides, King Elessar is too fond of Frodo to let him be orphaned again."

Somewhere in the depths of the inn a great deal of crockery smashed at once, followed a long, feminine wail.

"Oh, dear," said Bilbo. "I believe duty calls. I'll see you outside."

Dwalin came out with the last of the toiletries in a kit and put them in his own trunk which, tellingly, Dori had not touched.

Kali and Randi came in just then, took both trucks away with them, and it was just Ori, Dwalin and the rumpled bed.

"I'm going to miss this place," said Ori. "I know. Why state the obvious?"

"Who wouldn't miss it?" said Dwalin. He sat on the bed and Ori sat on his knee with Dwalin's arms around him. "We made th' most o' th' time we had."

"And we've eaten some incredible food!" said Ori, pillowing his head on his husband's shoulder.

"Aye, our Dori'll despair keepin' us fed now, but mebbe tha's fer th' best. If I ate like this all th' time I'd never fit in me armor."

Bifur came in, shaking his head, and they stood to greet him.

"Is everyone alright?" Ori asked.

In khuzdul Bifur said, "Poli was carrying a tray of dishes into the kitchen and did trip over one of the dogs. She is well. The dog is well. The dishes, however, nary a one did survive."

Ori winced.

"I'm so sorry."

Bifur shrugged.

"Erda hath oft expressed a wish for new plates. Behold, I bringeth something for each of thee."

He handed each of them a tiny, finely carved figure, much smaller than his own hands.

Ori took his and his breath caught.

"Dwalin! Look!"

"I know," said Dwalin, holding out his own prize. "It's me."
They were miniature wooden copies of themselves, Ori's with bright red hair and a book under his arm and a wee scarf. Dwalin's wore his bathing costume, but carried a war hammer in each hand.

"Bifur, these are wonderful!" Ori cried. "Thank you!"

He hugged Bifur, which caused the toymaker to chuckle as he hugged back.

Ori let go and said, "Wait! Wait!"

Dwalin also embraced Bifur as Ori grabbed his sketchpad from his satchel and tore out a picture he had sketched of Bifur carving, surrounded by chattering badgers.

Shyly, he held it out to Bifur.

"It's not quite an even exchange. It's not even in color, but if you'd do me the honor of accepting this?"

Bifur took it and grinned.

"T'is a wondrous thing, Ori. It is I who am honored."

They looked at each other for a moment before breaking into laughter.

"M'lord," said Ori with a smart bow.

"M'lord," Bifur returned with a flourish.

"Well, don't I feel li'e a goat's hind end," said Dwalin.

They went out onto the deck where Erda was putting two very thick letters in Dis' hand.

"This one is for Omi, an' this is for Loli," said Erda. "Sorry, dear, but Wili kept comin' up with pictures he wanted me t' send them. He really does miss them terribly."

"At that age, it does no good to tell them he'll see them soon, does it," said Dis.

"None whatever. He an' wee Frodo will just have t' prop each other up."

"Where is Frodo?" Dis asked.

Erda chucked her chin over her shoulder. "Clin' like a little vine."

Thorin and Bilbo sat together on a bench in a corner of the deck, speaking in low, serious tones. They couldn't sit very close together, though, since a faunt sat between them with his face buried in Bilbo's waistcoat and would not look up for anything, but kept shaking his head when Bilbo spoke to him.

Finally, Thorin leaned down and said something which caused Frodo's blotchy face to separate from his uncle's side.

Bilbo handed Thorin his handkerchief, which Thorin used on Frodo with the deftness of a dwarf who had helped raise two snot-filled princes.

As he wiped, Thorin spoke gravely to Frodo, who then hopped up off the bench and tried to stand up straight and pull his little shoulders back, though occasionally still snuffling.

Balin and Bombur walked up to Erda and Dis. Balin said to Bombur,

"Yeh'll be at th' coronation then, laddie? Yeh an' Erda both?"

Kali, pouring iced fruit juice, laughed and handed Balin a glass.

"They will be, Master Balin."

"Oh, Kali, I don't know," said Bombur ponderously. "Such a burden to leave on your shoulders. You're only sixty."

"I'm ninety-eight, Da, and you know it."

"Are you really?" Bombur asked. "Oh, in that case, you're on your own. Your mother and I will see you in the spring."

"Riiiiight," said Kali. "If you're away for more than a week, you start hyperventilating. Seven days is plenty of time for Lord Bombur and Lady Erda to hobnob with the quality in Erebor."

Bombur chuckled.

"Alas, you're too right. We will attend the coronation, though, Balin, and gladly."

"Excellent!" said Balin. "I'll personally make up yer bed. Then yeh kin take it apart an' do it over right."

That left Bombur and Erda laughing.

All the Urs turned out to see their guests off.

A boat came into sight, whisking at speed across the lake. It sailed quickly and silently up to the “Until your next invitation for tea, dear Bearer,” Thranduil smiled, bowing, then turned to the dwarf king and did the same. “Thorin.”

“Thranduil,” Thorin said breezily, returning the bow. “We look forward to receiving you at my coronation and, as always, at tea.”

“Oh, I’m sure you do,” teased Thranduil. He turned to speak to his son but perceived Legolas on one knee in a fond embrace with Gimli. Then elf king turned to speak to his guard and perceived her locked in an open-mouthed smooch with Prince Kili. He looked at the royal party in annoyance and with a swirl of his robes, went down to the boat. Half-way along, he shouted back.

“I’m leaving!”

Tauriel and Legolas extracted themselves giggling, from their loves and rushed after him.

The boat soon was heading back across the lake, all the dwarrow shouting and waving at them.

The wagon was declared ready. Jani and Bofur said their farewells to their kin and got on their ponies to accompany the royal party back to Erebor. Off they went, all the ponies eager to be out and about, swishing their tails and tossing their manes as they took to the yellow brick road. The dwarrow were mostly occupied in turning back and waving and trading shouts.

Once they turned onto the main northeast road, the party moved briskly along. Ori glanced about at everyone. The company was laughing and chattering and all dressed in bright summer clothes. What a difference from the drab gray they had worn on their way to the Inn. Dis rode up to Ori and handed Erda’s letters to Ori.

“Here,” she said. “You’re more likely to see them first.”

“Of course,” Ori promised and pocketed the missives. Dis winked and fell back to ride with Jani again.

As they rode into the forest, Ori nudged Honda into a bit of a trot until they were even with the king.

"Do you think Frodo will be all right?” Ori asked.
"He'll be fine. He has his orders. I have no doubt he will dispatch his duties to the best of his abilities."
"You gave him orders?” Ori asked, mystified.
"I told him to look after his uncle and to make sure they were both safe in Erebor by the first snowfall. Also, I vowed that upon their safe arrival, I would ennoble him."
"Bilbo?"
"No, Frodo. He will the Lord of the Muffins."
"That would make him the first hobbit noble in… well, ever. Shall I draw up the appropriate documents?"
"No question about it," said Thorin with a grin. "I keep my word."
"Um, Thorin, I was thinking. We all want Bilbo in Erebor, but we didn't ask Master Brur's permission to let him use the library. I mean, I know as king you let anyone you want anywhere you want..."
"But it doesn't help to run right over people, especially in their own realm. Not to worry."
He took a folded piece of paper out of a his belt pouch and handed it to Ori. It was obvious from the weight of paper and Roäc's familiar beak marks that this was a letter.
"Should I read this?” he asked.
"You'll have to file it anyway," said Thorin with a shrug. "It does fall under 'official business’.”
"You already wrote to Master Brur."
"As soon as you mentioned the idea of Bilbo as a visiting scholar. Roäc's been loafing among the treetops at the inn all week. I thought he should feel needed."
Ori snickered.
Thorin continued,
"He returned the very next morning."
Ori read the letter, growing more astonished with each line.
…I look forward to finally meeting Master Baggins face to face. We have been corresponding for a decade now and to finally be able to invite him to the library would be gratifying for me and most flattering for the library itself…

"He actually sounds excited," said Ori, amazed.
"Apparently it only takes one hobbit to make some people happy," Thorin said, raising his brows.
Ori folded up the letter and put it away, smiling.
"One hobbit. Who would have guessed?"

They came upon the place where they had lunched before and there, in the road heading toward them, were three familiar, cheerily colored wagons.
“Look who!” shouted Kili.

The two parties met and everyone dismounted and greeted each other. The Great Woudini was in fine fettle and Ori followed as Thorin went straight to the seer.
“We thought you were going on to Dale,” said Thorin to Woudini.
“We’ve been! It was only a brief engagement. That is to say, they’re far too busy to pay us much mind, so we’re off to, hopefully, more golden opportunities.”
“But, you can’t leave yet. You have to attend my coronation.”
Woudini’s eyebrows flew up in true surprise.
“What? I beg pardon, I meant to say: What, your majesty?”
“As my guests.” Thorin’s face was quite sober but his eyes twinkled mischievously. “You should stay with us at least until after the coronation. It will leave you plenty of time to head south before the autumn festivals down there.”
“Let me consult the Infinite,” said Woudini. He turned to the wagon. “Dearest?”
Ruelis stuck her head out the open half door.
“Yes, my love?”
“Do you fancy hanging about Erebor with the royal family until after the coronation?”
“What do you think, silly man? You’re the one with the crystal ball.”
“I am, aren’t I. Well, then I’d say, the Infinite says, yes, we’d like to stay very much, especially if there’s a place to pasture the ponies.”
“That is easily arranged. Then you’ll really be able to say you’ve met the crowned heads of Arda.”
Ruelis called out to the next wagon along.
“Oi! Zendi!”
A woman Ori suspected was Woudini’s sister popped her head out the window.
“What’s my brother done now?” she asked tartly, but with a smile.
“Got us invited t’ the coronation in Erebor. Tell Rueri an’ Kib t’ turn the wagons about.”
“Who invited us?”
“The king. See, over there. Best wave. There’s a lass.”

The caravan was turned about and the entire party, laughing and chatting together, headed on toward Erebor. Thorin turned to Woudini, who was up on the box of the wagon, driving the ponies that pulled it.
“We were thinking of you last night,” said Thorin, “while we were eating Smeg steaks.”
Woudini threw back his head and laughed.
“At least something good came of that beast. Who would have thought he’d be so tasty?”
“Oh, and as to your prediction,” Thorin continued, “it wasn’t a dwarrow dam, and the beard was there, just on his feet.”
“His…”
The Great Woudini looked puzzled, then brightened.
“Oh! You met Bilbo! Where is he?”
Dori muttered to Ori, “Does everyone know your friend?”
“He’s still at the inn,” said Thorin. “And he has a faunt with him.”
“After a week?” Woudini raised his eyebrows to their fullest height and playfully affected a shocked look. “I had heard hobbits were prolific, but you certainly move quickly, your majesty. When are we to expect the other six?” Thorin laughed and shook his head.
“His nephew, O Great Seer, I’m sorry to disappoint.”
“Quite all right.” Woudini teased. “I don’t get them all either.”
“And I haven’t met an ent yet!” Kili added from the far side of Thorin.
“Do you know what an ent looks like?” Woudini asked.
“No,” Kili admitted.
“Then how do you know you haven’t met one?”
Kili opened his mouth, then closed it. He looked completely disgruntled that he didn’t have an answer, but he also looked like he would keep trying. Ori rather feared he would hurt himself in the effort.
To the surprise of all, an enormous warg stuck its head out the window behind Woudini and gave him a slobbery nuzzle that made him chuckle, even as he grimaced.
“Really? Must you?” The animal rested his massive chin on Woudini’s shoulder and sighed in adoration.
“A warg?” Dwalin asked.
Woudini patted the beast and it leaned heavily against him, tongue lolling and with all the air of a devoted dog.
“My daughter found the pup abandoned,” Woundini explained. “Bring ’em up with the family and they’re as loyal and loving as the best dog you could imagine.”

As they rode into town Ori couldn’t help but notice things were quite a bit tidier than when they left, almost as if the whole of Dale had been treated to a front step scrub and a lick of paint.
Bard came out of the house, Tilda just behind him, hopping up and down with excitement and even Bain looked happy to see them.
Mistress Dazla followed after Tilda and put her hands on Tilda’s shoulders, though they were much the same height.
“You see, Tilda,” said Mistress Dazla, “here we are again, all the same.” When Fili handed Sigrid down from the carriage, Tilda made sure she was the first to try and hug Sigrid off her feet.
“Sigrid!” Tilda squealed. Then she became very serious and contrite. “I’m sorry about the chicken.”
“It’s fine, Til’, it happens all the time. I’m not angry.” Tilda let out a huge sigh of relief.
Bard stepped forward, hugged her and then immediately said, “Thank Eru, you all came back.” Thorin dismounted and went to clasp hands with him.
“What’s happened?”
“Dippy and Boo-boo happened.” “Dippy…”? Sigrid asked.
Bard waved his arms in frustration.
“There are two of them! One looks like a paint warehouse exploded on her and her goat and the other looks like a ball of tar.”
“Buj and Dipfa,” Ori immediately clarified. His heart sank but at the same time he wanted to laugh. Bard would never understand them.
“Whatever!” Bard raged. “He wants to build a flying boat and she wants to make my boat into a ‘royal barge’ as she calls it! Blue trimming and gold sails, she says! She wants to paint the hull pink! Pink! It’ll scare the fish!”
“Now, King Bard,” Mistress Dazla said, comfortably. “They’re just encouragin’ you. No one will force you to paint your lovely boat pink.”
“Yes, “ Ori couldn’t stop himself adding fuel to the fire. “But with your coloring I’m sure it would throw the hull into fantastic relief.”

Dwalin snorted and Dori gave them both a stink-eye.

“That’s what she said!” Bard didn’t quite yell and waved his arms around again, clearly unable to deal with the unusual couple.

“Bard, I’ll have a chat with them,” Thorin cut in, his tone gentle and soothing. “Don’t give it another thought.”

Bard deflated immediately.

“Thank you, King Thorin.”

Ori glanced around and was pleased to see that while Bard had been thus engaged, Fili and Sigrid were able to kiss sweetly and whisper their goodbyes.

As Bard turned to his daughter, Fili stepped back and made a great show of patting his pony’s nose.

“Sigrid,” Bard asked, frowning, “what are you wearing?”

“Just some of the holiday clothes Dipfa made for me. Aren’t they wonderful!”

“Your arms are showing.”

“What! My goodness!” Sigrid cried. “What happened to my sleeves!”

“I think it looks nice,” said Bain, then suffered a scowl from his father and immediately shut up, though the corners of his mouth twitched rebelliously. He disappeared back into the house.

“You can’t show your arms!” Bard argued.

“Why not?”

“Because it’s too much temptation for some… people.”

“The people involved wouldn’t happen to be Fili, would they, Da?”

“You aren’t married!”

“Da, they’re just arms.”

“King Bard,” said Mistress Dazla, “did you not tell me that you used to hide under the carts when you thought Mathilde would walk by, just to catch a glimpse of her ankles?”

“You did what, Da?” Tilda asked with great interest.

“That’s different,” said Bard. “That was my wife.”

“Ah, but she wasn’t at the time,” said Mistress Dazla with a sly smile. “And you were not her husband.”

Bain brought Mistress Dazla’s bag out and put it in the baggage cart.

Ori watched as Dazla took a few steps to the side, as if to make sure they did so properly. She reached to nudge it a little, and Bard immediately went to assist her, which meant he wasn’t watching Sigrid, who squeezed Fili’s hand, then skipped off into the house.

Thorin said, conversationally,

“It’s good to see you again, Bard. The place seems rather cheerful.”

“The people are already preparing for your coronation.”

“My coronation?”

“They’re all very excited, which is perfectly fine with me, since the more attention they pay to your crown, the less they’ll pay attention to my lack of one.”

Dis teased, “You’re so averse to wearing one?”

“I’ve heard stories of the crowns my ancestors supposedly wore. I’m not walking around with a candelabra on my head.”

“That would definitely scare more than the fish,” Dis agreed.

Bard looked up again, then frowned slightly.

“Er… King Thorin, why is the circus back in town?”

Thorin smiled.

“Because the Durins are back in town.”

They took their leave. Mistress Dazla, safely ensconced in the seat in the shay, informed them of the latest uproar. Apparently, a large sea bird had flown in with a letter from King Frerin. As she was about to elucidate, Roäc glided down from the heights with a letter in his beak, alit on Thorin’s shoulder and spat out the missive into Thorin’s palm.

Thorin stopped the party and they gathered around as he opened it, rolled his eyes and handed it to Balin, who sighed. Dis got it next and read it, grinding her teeth as she thrust it back to Thorin. Ori was itching to know what Frerin had done and dreading it all at once. He wasn’t kept in suspense for long, however.

Thorin read aloud,

“Brother,

“I received the invitation to your coronation, but I regret I shall not be able to attend on the date you suggest, for my duties in raising my own kingdom do not allow me to travel at this time. In order for me to attend, I think it best you resend the invitations with a date put back by at least two months.

Cordially,
Frerin, King of Belegost.”

“Tha’ little shit!” Dwalin barked.

“How dare he!” Dori cried.

Fili, who had apparently been working through the consequences, said, “If he doesn’t attend, he can’t pledge his loyalty to the new king.”

Ori shook himself free of the red cloud of anger that was floating dangerously before his eyes.

This was not a time for rage, this was a time for planning.

“We can’t put this off, Thorin,” he heard himself say.

“No,” Thorin agreed, his countenance cool and serene. “We will not. Balin?”

“Aye, lad?”

“When we get home, pull all the genealogy tables. Find someone related to the noble clans in Belegost who is still here and still loyal to me. Whoever this is, they will stand for Frerin and pledge loyalty to me. If you cannot, and Frerin will not relent, then Frerin will find himself alone and with trade embargoes from all who swear loyal to me at the ceremony. I will not tolerate any undermining whatsoever.”

“As you wish, my king.” Balin said accompanied by murmurs of angry support, including those from the Great Woudini’s troupe.

“The crust!” Ruelis said angrily.

“Do you need us to do anything, you majesty?” The Great Woudini called.

Thorin smiled, shook his head, turned and led the way forward.

It was the dinner hour, so they managed to make it to the mountain without further interruption, but they were not going to go into it without greeting about five or six hundred dwarrow who stood between them and the gates.

“Look! There’s the king!” someone shouted.

Ori nudged Honda a little closer to Harley, not sure if this was a welcoming or a mob.

Vi and Margr had fought their way to the front, and Ori recognized most of the Steam Alley neighborhood at their backs.

“Hail to the king! Hail to the king!” Margr and Vi bellowed in unison, and the crowd took it up in a roar.

“Good to see yer majesty!” called Ondr, Tin’s wife. “How’re yeh keepin’?”

“Don’t you worry, King Thorin!” Margr shouted. “We’re with yeh, even if yer ratbastard of a brother ain’t, pardon me sayin’ so.”

Similar shouts accompanied this.

Thorin and Dwalin exchanged looks. Ori realized that somehow the entire population of the mountain knew the contents of Frerin’s letter as Mistress Dazla had intimated.

“We’re all agreed,” shouted Vi, nodding, “he can’t get away with snubbin’ our Thorin.”

“Tha’s right!” Margr loudly agreed, and so did several dozen other dwarrow in her near vicinity.
“Yeh jus’ say th’ word, yer majesty, an’ we’ll go out an’ fetch him f’r yeh!” came another shout. Ori had a vision of an angry horde of dwarrow tearing across the land to Belegost, all probably hoping to surprise Frerin, the faithless villain, in his nightshirt and drag him back to Erebor.

Thorin stood up in his saddle and held up his hands.
“Calmly, my people, calmly.”

The crowd parted for Granny Klak’s open carriage and the old dam shouted.
“The little shit wants you to put off the coronation until it’s more convenient for his sorry arse!”
“Yes, I am aware of that, dear Lady Klakuna. Have no fears,” Thorin assured her, and by extension, everyone else. “We’ll not be waiting on the King of Belegost. The coronation will go on as planned.”

This brought even greater merriment.
“See,” called Margr, at volume, sniffing, “told yeh th’ wee shit wouldn’t get th’ best o’ our Thorin.”

Thorin, perhaps realizing he was going to have to devise his own exit, held up his hands again.
“I’m so happy to see you all, and so touched by this display of loyalty. Thank you! You have entirely solaced all of my remaining grief.”

There was some snickering and coughing here, then Thorin continued.
“However, it is the dinner hour, and I won’t keep you from your trenchers another moment. Besides, Captain Dwalin gets cranky when he’s hungry.”

Miraculously, the now laughing crowd parted to let them through, with well-wishes and greetings and a few calls of “Oi! Ori! Nice hair!”, “Yeh look lovely, pet! So grown up!”, and “Shows off tha’ big, han’some nose t’ advantage, tha’ does!”

If Ori weren’t on Honda he’d have sunk through the ground.
Honda turned her head and winked at him.
“Hush you,” he muttered.
Her snort sounded suspiciously like laughter.

On seeing the wagons behind the royal party, people began to cheer.
The Great Woudini had organized, and several of his troupe had got up on the roof of one wagon and there was a sword swallower, a pair of ladies juggling knives back and forth and Woudini and Ruelis’ daughter Floris, who was dressed in armor, valiantly defended herself against terribly fierce warg who was obviously enjoying this wonderful game with his young mistress.

“Look! The king brought performers for the coronation!”
“I want my fortune told!”
“The king must have an official fortune!”
“They have a warg prisoner!”
“It’s so fierce!”
“How brave!”
The party managed to gain the royal courtyard, finally, and Binni and Oin were there to meet them, Binni looking smug and Oin grave. Omi, Loli, Buj, Gridr and Gloin stood along side them and all the servants lined up behind, completing the greeting party, and Granny Klak’s carriage pulled up just then and Balin went and handed her down.

Binni called gaily, “The asshat has struck again!”
“So I read,” said Thorin, dismounting. “Ah, Binni, I see you left the mountain in one piece.”
They bumped foreheads, then Binni looked around him.
“Where’s Bilbo?”
Thorin choked and Dwalin roared with laughter.
“How do you know about…” Thorin glared at Roäc, who was still perched on his shoulder.
“Never mind. Master Baggins will arrive sometime this fall, after he concludes his business in Gondor.”
“Oh, he’ll miss the coronation!” Omi cried.
“Come in, come in,” Binni encouraged them.
“Aye,” said Oin, “food’s no’ gettin’ any hotter.”
"Our Gimmers!" roared Gloin.
“Missed yeh, too, Adad,” said Gimli, hugging him before being snatched into his amad’s fond embrace.

"Tha' little shit sent his letter in a bloody ugly pelican” Oin bellowed. “No’ tha’ it wasn’t a perfectly courteous sort o' bird.”

"Frerin did have th' sense t' wrap th' letter in an oilskin pouch,” Gloin put in.
“I thought it smelled vaguely of fish,” said Thorin. He turned to Ori, rather apologetic. “I’m afraid my correspondence archive is going to be smelly.”

“Never mind,” said Ori. “I keep Frerin’s letters in a separate file. They already smell.”

Thorin greeted all the servants by name and thanked them for their loyal service. Mistress Dazla was soon ordering her minions to unload and stable the horses while Dori gushed over them all, getting in the way until Binni rescued them by escorting Dori in. Balin had already disappeared, Ori suspected, to his office to start looking for a loyal relation to stand for Frerin.

Granny Klak graciously organized the troupe to take up residence in the former home of Thorin and Dis and, at Dis’ request, a small squad of servants whisked over to care for their guests.

“How was your trip?” Loli cried, grabbing Ori into a hug, Omi not far behind her.

“Lovely!” Ori said eagerly. “Your family is all well and I have letters here from your mother.” He withdrew the missives from his pocket and both sister snatched for them. Buj came forward and formally clasped arms with Ori.

“My precious diamond and I are most pleased to welcome you home, Lord Ori. You look well rested.”

“Buj,” Ori grinned, yanking his friend forward to knock heads with him. “If you call me Lord Ori again, I’ll hit you! Where’s Dipfa?”

“My precious diamond will be joining us soon. Did you enjoy yourself and fully solace King Thorin’s grief?”

Ori snickered.

“Yes, and I have some sketches for you. I studied some rather interesting lake creatures. I’ll show them to you presently as I remembered you talking about fish flying through the water.”

“You met Bilbo, then?” Omi butted in.

“Yes, “ Ori was delighted by the turn of the conversation to his new friend. “We had some wonderful conversations and he brought his nephew, Frodo, with him. Such a sweet badger, er... faunt.”

“Mam said he’d brought him,” Loli was agog for further information as they hustled Ori inside.
Ori sighed. He’d had a wonderful time but this felt like home, so much more than Dori’s old place in Steam alley. This beautiful old house was his home, his and Dwalin’s.

Dwalin followed him in and brought with him the basket with the kittens, Brandy and the kittens' bat-mother.

The three young scribes followed Ori through to his and Dwalin's bedroom, talking.

“Is it true, what Mam says about Randi? He’s going to apprentice with Princess Dis?” Loli asked.

“Yes,” Ori managed as he picked up Brandy and freed the kittens. The kittens rushed around the room. Kihshassa went to the stand, flipped herself up and settled to close her eyes.

"We won't be able to get away with anything once he gets here!" Omi groaned.
Ori dug through his satchel and found his ‘safe’ note book. Dwalin thanked the servants and herded the scribes back through to the sitting room.

The scribes sat on the floor with Ori as he opened the book to show his drawings.

Omi and Loli were soon shrieking with laughter over the bathing suits and Buj almost had his nose to the pictures of gulls and fish. Ori ran back to his room for his bag of souvenirs. Omi and Loli were familiar with lake creatures and lake side debris. Buj studied a piece of driftwood as though it was a rare gem until he sat bolt upright and rushed out of the room. Omi told them he’d gone to get Dipfa.
Ori looked up. Dori buzzed about with Mistress Dazla and Binni seemed set on getting dinner on the table. Fili and Kili watched the scribes from the sofa. Both princes looked a little sleepy. Gimli and his family reappeared through a new door in the sitting room. Ori grinned. Binni had been busy.

Thorin came in followed by Jani and Dis then Nori and Bofur. Balin entered from the private hall, hands, clasped behind his back, smirk in place.

"Found it, laddie," he said to Thorin.

“And?”

“Ideally, th’ closer a noble t’ Frerin we kin get t’ express loyalty, th’ better. Th’ best representative would be a Rikanta.”

“Dori?”

“Dori can’t represent th’ Rikanta,” said Balin. “He’s related through Lady Klakuna, who divorced her husband an’ renounced her name. Dori is a Durin by birth an’ will be a Fundin by marriage an’, really, th’ founder o’ his own line. We have, however, one distantly related Rikanta still among us.”

“And this one is?” Thorin asked.

“Buj.”

The silence went on for several moments before Thorin’s mouth curled into a delicious smile.

“Mahal is kind, isn’t He,” said Thorin.

“And, thankfully, is very fond of our Ori,” said Thorin finally. “Does Buj know he’s related?”

“No, it wouldn’t, would it. Is he around?”

“He’s gone to escort Dipfa here,” volunteered Ori. “But you could probably ask him when they get here.”

“Is he likely to go along with it?”

Ori and Omi laughed.

Ori said, “If it could, in anyway, upset his brother Wobr? Instantly.”

Dori called them all to table.

“Where’s Granny Klak?” Ori asked.

“She is dining with and entertaining our er… circus.” Thorin told him. “They will join us after dinner. This gives them a chance to settle themselves and enjoy the old royal household.”

“I told Klakuna to be sure to show them all that hot spring downstairs,” Dis added smiling. “I’m sure they will be very happy to have some time together to eat and rest. Their ponies are in the meadow with ours.”

Nearly everyone was seated when the sitting room door opened again and Buj and Dipfa entered and Buj bowed to them. Dori cut short any speech Buj was about to make by greeting both he and Dipfa and ordering them to sit up at the dinner table.

It all but groaned under the weight of the food: a roasted goose with a marmalade glaze, chestnut dressing, potatoes mashed with cream, salt and garlic, and dishes of peas and carrots in butter sauce. It tasted wonderful.

Buj,” said Thorin while they were all digging in.

“Yes, your majesty?” Buj was instantly seated at attention.

“Are you aware of the circumstances raised here by a letter from the king of Belegost?”

Buj frowned.

“Yes, your majesty. If I may be so bold, I think him remarkably foolish.”

"And what would you have me do about it?"

“You majesty? Since you ask, the obvious solution is that you will appoint someone here who is loyal to you that remained here from his house to stand for him, or simply ignore him and he will be cut off completely, no doubt with trade embargoes on his head.”

“Exactly,” Thorin said gravely. “Lord Balin has researched the tables and we have found such a “Very good, your majesty. This person must be interviewed thoroughly and have a private loyalty swearing ceremony with you before the coronation. Do you wish me to draw up such a private ceremony contract?”

“Yes,” Thorin smiled. “Tell me Buj, are you loyal to me as High King of all Dwarrow?”

Buj almost fell out of his chair

“Yes, your majesty, always! I’m sure I-”

“Good,” said Thorin. “Do you swear this loyalty to me for your life?”

“Of… of course, your majesty, I always-”

“Good. That’s that taken care of. Do write up the contract.”

Buj frowned and seemed puzzled. Dipfa stared.

“Your majesty, are you saying my beloved Boo is this person you seek?”

Thorin nodded.

“Yes?” Buj squeaked. Dipfa gave a cry of delight and embraced Buj.

“I shall make your coronation robes, beloved!”

“I am the last loyal representative?” Buj wondered. “But I... I’m the youngest child…”

“You are here,” Thorin said, “and loyal to me as you have just stated.”

Buj rose so quickly he knocked his chair over and rushed to Thorin’s side. He fell to his knees.

Thorin rose and waited politely for Buj to recite the ancient khuzul oath of loyalty, which he did so rapidly it was almost garbled. Everyone eagerly watched. Buj came to the end and was left panting for breath.

“I’ve always wanted to do that,” he observed as an aside.

Thorin leaned down and offered his hand to Buj.

“Rise Lord of the Rikanta, most steadfast of retainers. I accept and treasure your loyalty.”

He raised Buj and clasped his wrist. Everyone applauded. Dipfa burst into tears and threw herself into Thorin’s arms, causing laughter among the older set.

“I pledge my loyalty, too, your majesty. I shall forever serve you with my art as my beloved Boo will with his inventions!”

Thorin patted her back and thanked her. He took her hand and Buj’s and clasped them together.

“When you both are ready, I shall consider it an honor to perform your marriage ceremony.”

Buj bowed and Dipfa curtsied. This brought another round of applause and both Binni and Dori shed tears. Buj led Dipfa back to Oin and Binni where they were embraced and fussed over.

Omi sniffed, misty eyed.

“It’s so romantic! We should tell Shire, I mean, Idad Bilbo. Perhaps he could put in one of his novels!”

“Oh, yes,” breathed Loli.

Ori rather thought all the things the Durins got up to, would provide Bilbo with a life-long wealth of material.

After a very sweet and cinnamon-y apple crumble, Binni escorted the company out through the breakfast parlor and into the meadow. Ori looked about. The paving stones now extended outward to almost double the previous size and Binni had invested in several cushioned deck chairs, like at the inn, and a wide copper brazier was set in the middle. This was soon lit and everyone settled to enjoy the evening.

Ori suspected that Binni and Mistress Dazla had planned this to keep Dori and everyone else occupied and out of the way while the unpacking and such was taken care of.

Shortly Mistress Dazla came out with a tray and lemonade and many glasses. She went to the far side of the new stone deck and gestured.

Thorin called a welcome as Lady Klakuna appeared leading Woudini and his troupe from that side. Dis and Dori made sure all in the troupe were comfortably seated and provided with drinks.

Ori made room where he was seated with Dwalin on one side next to Thorin and Omi, Loli and Buj and Dipfa on Ori’s other side. Floris, Woudini’s and Ruelis’ daughter, joined them, her pet warg following, tail wagging happily. Floris introduced the warg as ‘Biscuit’ due to the coloring of the beast’s fur. Ori patted Biscuit and was surprised at the rich softness of the coat.

“I thought warg fur was only like this after it had been cleaned and treated.”

“Oh, I do that,” Floris explained. “Biscuit gets a bath once a week and I brush him every day. We all had a wonderful time in the hot spring Lady Klakuna showed us and she had the loveliest dinner for us all. She’s a very kind woman. Biscuit spent most of the time jumping in and out of the spring and running around. He’s so good and clever. You saw how I’ve got him all trained to act like a furious monster when we perform. He’s got lots of tricks.”

Floris snapped her fingers.

Biscuit immediately sat up on his back haunches.

“Count to three, Biscuit,” Floris told him.

Biscuit barked three times.

Floris made a move as though stabbing Biscuit.

“I run you through, villain,” she ordered. Biscuit wobbled then collapsed dramatically onto his side and lay still, tongue out.

“Hugs,” Floris said with a laugh. Biscuit leaped up and threw himself in delight at his mistress, almost knocking her and the chair over, yipping and licking her face.

“That’s a fine animal,” Dwalin said thoughtfully. Biscuit leaned toward him and sniffed the hand Dwalin held out. He came forward, tail wagging, happy eyes beaming as though all dwarrow were his dearest friends. Dwalin gave the ears a good scratch and Biscuit melted to the deck and rolled over, a tacit request for a tummy rub. Dwalin laughed and obliged.

“Where’d yeh find him, lass?”

Apparently if orcs don’t like the size or coloring of the pups, they move on, forcing the mothers to abandon the pups. Sometimes when the litter is found quickly, one or two have survived. If you take them then, they make the best pets. Only some people keep them, most just kill them ’cose their wargs.”

Dwalin nodded absently. Ori wondered if he should ask Master Vobwi if he came across any orphaned warg pups, to keep one for Dwalin.

The rest of the evening past in perfect tranquility.
Queens, Crowns, and Startling Pictures.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And we’re back and back to normal. What is normal, but a setting on an old clothes dryer, as these are Durins, after all. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dward time, same dward tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori woke the next morning when Dwalin kissed his shoulder.

"Time t' get up, love. Bofur an' Jani'll be down in a mo'.'"

Ori sucked in a deep breath.

Right. Erebor.

He rolled onto his back to kiss his husband, who was already dressed.

"You're looking particularly sharp this morning," Ori said, smiling.

"Hafta go ransom me post back from our Furh’nk. Don' wan' t' go lookin' like a beggar. He might get th' idea t' chuck me out."

"Not a chance," said Ori, giving him one more quick peck before scrambling out of bed. "He needs time to pay court to Loli. Remember?"

"Ah, tha' s right. No' goin' t' be a lo' o' time f'r tha' in th' next few weeks."

"True love will find a way," Ori sing-songed, fluttering his lashes.

Dwalin tapped him lightly on the nose.

"Scamp."

While Ori washed his face in the basin, Dwalin took the robes Ori had predetermined out of the wardrobe and laid over the back of the chair.

"I'm so glad I don't have to decide what to wear," said Ori. "My brain is still at the lake."

"Long's yer body's still here wi' me," said Dwalin. "I need t’ go get a jump on brekkie, love."

"Save me a seat?" Ori teased.

"Always."

Ori smiled down at the deep green robe with its jewel-tone scarlet piping and cut work. The robe was heavy, the cutwork velvet. Luckily, it was always cool and dry inside the library. It made wearing a tunic and an over-robe a lot more comfortable. In Dale, late spring was growing toward sweltering summer, but among the books it might as well be the middle of autumn.
The cuffs of the robe were darker green, almost black. Dipfa protested making them that dark, something about not enough relief, but Ori had to be at least a little practical. He did work with ink all day. He thought about Master Brur, who favored yellows and oranges, in his constantly ink-stained robes. They were largely ink-stained because he cleaned clotted up pen nibs on them. Ori knew if he did that, Dipfa would kill him in his sleep.

Idly, Ori wondered if Master Brur had a tailor, or if that person had torn out their beard long ago and vowed to become a hermit.

He went to pull on his tunic and found it was a little snug.

No surprise, he thought, since he'd done nothing but eat and lounge for over a week.

It wasn't painful, or unbecoming, so he left it on. Mahal knew, after a few days of chasing Thorin around, he'd soon be back to his old, spindly self. Today, however, he was due at the library after breakfast. Loli had agreed to fill in for him with Thorin. Ori thought it would be good practical experience for her. She was actually quite competent, she just needed to see that she was.

Ori snickered to himself.

He was probably the last person who should judge someone as under confident.

This evening he was supposed to meet with Balin to draw up the draft of his contract as royal scribe. They would have just enough time to get his official seal cut, the one with his sigil, before the coronation. The oaths of Thorin's under-monarchs were recorded on paper as they were spoken. Thorin would sign and seal them, and Ori would sign and counterseal them. They had to be perfect.

He could hear Bilbo's voice in his head: No pressure there, my lad, none at all.

Ori took his place next to Dwalin at the table just as Dwalin poured him his tea. Dori, perfectly turned out at usual, put a split, hot roll in front him, slathered with butter and blueberry jam.

Ori was instantly in love this roll. It was love at first sight. He planned a very brief, passionate affair with this roll.

He felt eyes on him and looked up at Gimli, who was grinning. Gimli had a similar roll before him and was obviously planning a similar affair.

Bofur, Jani and Thorin sat hunched over some sort of plan at the end of the table. Loli sat with them, taking notes, and Fili stood looking over Thorin's shoulder.

Bofur said, "If y' think that zinc mine's creepy when there's folks workin', that's nothin' t'when it's empty."

Jani shot Bofur a look.

"That why you kept sneakin' back behind me and shoutin' 'Boo!' the whole time?"

"Aw, you weren't scared," said Bofur.

"Not after the twentieth time I wasn't, lummox."

"So, what do we have?" Thorin asked, bringing the conversation back from the realms of sibling squabbles.

Bofur said, "About the first third of the mine, startin' in Dale, is completely rotten and it oughter be filled in. That's where the water seepage start, at about the same level as the wells in that part o' Dale."

"Middle third's wet because the water's runnin' in from above," said Jani.

"There's no water seepage at that point?" Thorin asked.

"Naw, no seepage," said Jani. "It's wet because it's deeper than the first bit, so the water starts t' sluice. It's gonna take more'n rubble t' seal that off. We're thinkin' a wall o' molten slag. Once it's dry, we can go back an' see if the middle's salvageable, but don't get your hopes up just yet, the bracing's garbage, like they put in temporary chocks an' just left 'em."

"An' no rails around the deeper pits," said Bofur. "Er…"

"Tell me," said Thorin.

Bofur scratched the back of his neck and looked apologetic.

"Master Tin says there's been losses. At least three badgers have toppled over the edges."

"Of course," said Thorin grimly. "Now I'm wishing I'd made Vors' exit more lengthy and painful. What of their families? Were there other casualties?"

Jani and Bofur exchanged glances. Jani shrugged as if it couldn't be helped.

She said, "That low bit where those badgers, Caris and that crew, were workin'? Just before y'get there, there's a bit that's suffered three small scale cave-ins. The bodies were all recovered, but they were mostly from one family. Master Tin's son, his son's wife and her brother."

Fili looked over Thorin's shoulder and shivered.

"And they were forced to send their badgers back there to work. Mahal."

"We're doing what we can for them," said Thorin. "It won't bring their family members back, but we can ease the burden for the survivors. At least we know Master Tin has gone back to brewing. What else?"

"Last third of the mine's actually stable," Bofur continued, "but that's 'cause it's mostly a narrow passage to the escape elevator. The stone tells us there's plenty o' zinc there, an' we got a chance t' do this right if we take care o' the other business good 'n' proper."

"Which we will," said Thorin. "Who do we employ to do the bracing?"

"Thaldis' crew is the best," said Jani. "They're booked solid the next five years, but I'm thinkin' they'll make room for the crown, if y' ask nice."

Thorin looked uncertain.

"I don't want to delay anyone else's business just for me."

"Considerin' what it's for?" Jani snorted. "I think they'll forgive you just this once. What's goin' to be interestin' is gettin' workers down there t' do the job. Once we seal up that first section, the only way up or down's the elevator behind the textile market. The merchants'll love that."

Bofur continued,
"We need to excavate for a lifts anyways. For now we could tunnel through from the Emerald Mine an' piggyback on their lifts, if we can cut a deal."

"Lady Kadis owns that," said Thorin. "Zark's wife."

Bofur nodded.

"Her family dug the original shaft. She might let us share the lifts if you make it worth her while."

Thorin looked over at Dis.

"What do you make of Lady Kadis?"

"Socially, she's always been a little standoffish. She's very much aware of her lineage, though according to Vi and Margr she's learned to 'mix' with all kins. Business-wise, she's no-nonsense. The Emerald Mine's books are always up to date."

Bofur snickered.

"She came t' me about mine inspection before I ever called on her. Truth t' tell, I'm more 'n a little afraid she'll up an' eat me."

"Nah," said Jani, "she'll just nibble your hat a little."

"Funny."

"Speaking of Lady Kadis," Dori said, stirring his tea with portent. "Margr said Ondr -you know, Tin's wife - is staying home now to raise their son's badgers. She once worked scrubbing floors in the palace."

Dis said, "We've been home less than a day and you've already met with Margr?"

"This morning she rode in on a cart that was coming through Dale to bring us produce from the west."

"Vi wasn't with her? Can she even talk if they two of them aren't in the same room?" Dis teased.

"Vi was already queuing up at the Gondorian bakery. It's become quite popular, so you have to be there early to get the best selection."

"Has Mistress Ondr's pension gone through?" asked Thorin.

"Yes, though I'm not so much worried about their circumstances as I am about some of the others." Dori lofted his brows. "I believe they've moved to Lord Zark's house under the mountain in Mithril Square. It may have started as just a bit of fun, but apparently things have turned a little more serious."

"Apparently," said Thorin. He turned to Fili. "The empty townhouses passed inspection?"

"Yes," said Fili. "While we were, eh, in mourning, we had the various trades go through all the houses left by the nobles who went to Ered Luin. We didn't want any surprises."

"We're off this morning to take a look at the current living conditions," said Kili. "Since there's not a lot to be done, the worst off will be moving to Copper Placer in about a week, but almost everyone should be in by midsummer."
"I don't want anyone turned away," said Thorin. "Man, dwarf, anybody."

Fili grinned. "Considering that there are only twenty houses, but each is equal in size to Fundin House? Even dividing it into slightly smaller living quarters, every dwarf or dam who lives there will have room for a pony."

Omi and Ori chattered as they walked to the library.

"I can't believe Mam and Da didn't tell us Idad Bilbo was Shire!" said Omi. "We've known him for years!"

"Maybe they didn't want you bugging him for his autograph," said Ori with a smile.

"I never would! Well, maybe once," said Omi. She shifted a little closer to him and said, in a slightly lower voice. "So, what's it like?"

Ori laughed.

"Depends what 'it' is!"

"What's it like to have your One comb your hair?"

That took him aback. He had to think about it. He was pretty sure Omi and Pika were fooling around. If their Englishmak conversations were anything to go by, they were fooling around a lot. But combing and braiding someone's hair if you weren't related to them by blood or somehow committed to them was frowned upon. It just wasn't done.

"It's wonderful," said Ori honestly. "It's like… not like being fussed over like Dori fusses over me, more like, Dwalin is taking care of me and I'm taking care of him, like we're taking care of something precious. He's so patient about working the knots out of my hair. It's amazing how such a big, strong dwarf can work so delicately."

Omi sighed.

"It does sound wonderful. I can see Pika looking at my hair and beard and it makes me feel all squiggly inside."

"That feeling doesn't go away," said Ori. "Or, if I'm lucky, it never will. But as for combing my hair, he uses a brush. A comb will not go through my hair. Dori used to swear over all the broken combs. He even bought metal ones."

"And you bent the tines, right?" Omi nodded. "That's the curse of 'good' hair, isn't it, never mind that ultimate wooly texture that Gimli's got."

"And he doesn't even take care of it!" Ori agreed. "Though, I imagine after a while Legolas will be seeing to that."

"I hope he doesn't go too crazy," said Omi. "Gimli with straight hair? If Legolas can unravel all that, Gimli'll be tripping over it!"

Ori found that being back at work was almost a novelty after the inn.
Though he had sworn he would keep his promise to himself, Sigrid, and Tauriel about all their sexual educations, Ori spent his break swithering around the biology texts, which were adjacent to the sex manuals. He was a grown, married dwarf, but he still didn’t want to have to explain himself to anyone, never mind his coworkers and friends.

As he sidled over a little, reading the spines out of the corner of his eye, he saw Oin’s name on a rather ponderous black-bound text book: Sex Habits of the Ereborian Dwarf

Looking around, Ori saw only the page shelving books three sections away and so he slid out Oin’s book and opened it at random.

… engaging in the sex act by mutual friction or by penetration. Either is used, but particularly by mutual friction in the case of genital disease on the part of one or other, resulting in…

Ori put the book back.

He had a feeling that sentence didn’t end well. Nor could he imagine wanting to read about sex if he could only hear Oin’s gruff, loud voice as narration.

He retreated without looking further, berating himself as a spineless coward.

At the end of the day, Ori returned from Reference to his own desk and grabbed his satchel, surprised to find it weighed more now than it had at lunch.

He lifted the flap to find two new small books and one large. The covers were nondescript, but the titles on the spines of the smaller ones told him they were sex manuals.

Where had they come from? Why were his cheeks hot enough to fry an egg?

He carefully closed and secured the flap, looking around as if his mysterious benefactor might be lurking amongst the dictionaries.

There was only Master Brur, who glanced up from a crumbling scroll and very deliberately winked at him.

All right, forget frying an egg. He was going to burst into flame.

“Ready to go, Ori?” Omi asked.

She had gathered up her own satchel and Buj waited for them at the door.

“Er, you go on. I have some work to finish up.”

“Alright. Are you sick or something? You look feverish! Should we send for Oin?”

“No! I mean, no, I’m a little overly warm is all. I’ll meet you at home for dinner.”

He gave them a decent lead before he started for home, carrying his illicit burden tucked against his body and supported in a firm grip. He kept imagining what would happen if he dropped his satchel on the pavement and it ripped open, strewing titties and arses across the public street.

Everyone would know he was carrying them!

Everyone would know he needed sex manuals!

Everyone would know he was having sex!

Since he was a properly married dwarf, maybe they already knew that last part, but the other parts were just embarrassing. Bad enough his boss knew.

When he arrived at home it was just Dori having tea in the kitchen.

Ori begged off the offer of a cuppa, saying he was rather tired and just wanted a bit of a nap before everyone else arrived.

Then he went to his and Dwalin’s room and locked the door, leaning his back against it. He knew he was acting as if this was some top secret spy mission, but privacy was at a premium at Fundin House. Even if it seemed like he was alone, Nori always lurked in some drainpipe or laundry hamper. It was ridiculous to think that he had been more assured of being alone in the tiny house in Steam Alley than in this vast mansion in Erebor.

For once, though, he knew it was just him, Dori, and the animals in the house, and even Kihshasssa was out flying in the dusk while Dori watched the kittens and Brandy in the kitchen.

Right.

He set his shoulders and slid the books out of his bag. Brur had provided quite a range of material in so small a selection. Thank Mahal for librarians.

Anything had to be better than Oin’s medical text, which might be accurate, but made him think of faulty plumbing.

He took up the first volume, a very large but nondescript book with reddish brown covers embossed with a sprinkling of silver diamonds, but no title or author anywhere. He opened to the title page and read in some ancient scribe’s most flowing hand:

Queen Kivi’s Book of Glittering Diamonds.

Alright, maybe not anything was better than Oin. Casting his mind back, he could only think of one Queen Kivi, if indeed this was the same dam and not a pseudonym. She was the wife of King Durin III.

My Dearest Ones, be Assured that I have done my Utmost to insure that No one who casually observes you perusing this Tome will have the Slightest Inkling as to its Contents.

In return, please promise me Before You Proceed that you are a dwarf or dam Fully Grown and Married, for you would not wish to bring me such Pain as knowing you cut short your Innocence.

Ori snorted.

Then he turned the pages and he could rather see her point.

Queen Kivi’s prose might have fallen from the perfume flask, but her illustrations were perfectly clear and cheerfully filthy.

He turned the open book sideways at a particularly instructive diagram, blushing furiously even though he was alone.

“That is not physically possible. Really? Are you having me on, your majesty?”

_I assure you this position is Fully Obtainable provided you stretch well your limbs Before You Proceed._

He was inclined to disbelieve her. He was also inclined to think she attended orgies and sketched and described what she saw… and did. He could imagine her, beard and hair immaculate, wearing nothing but her jewels as she cried out in well-modulated and decorous ecstasy.

Apparently being married had done nothing to slow her down.

She was ruthlessly inclusive. Ori found pictures and descriptions for dwarf, dams and everyone along the spectrum in every combination. There was even a chapter on sex with other races.

He had a feeling Brur would be slipping this to Gimli in the coming years.

“Once he is a dwarf Fully Grown and Married,” Ori snarked.

He didn’t doubt Fili and Kili had already sought out this book for themselves. Or perhaps the Durins had their own copy. The author was an ancestor of theirs. He wondered if their copy was inscribed and giggled to himself.

Curious, he turned to the back pages and indeed there was an index of topics. Scanning down the columns was an education in itself.

His eye lit on the topic ‘Size Difference’ and he swallowed as he turned to page one hundred forty-two.

_Difference in Anatomical Size is an issue that Must be Dealt with Directly and Explicitly between and among partners to ensure the Blessings of Conjugal Felicity._

Fair enough.
As I have already instructed, penetration without thorough preparation is Highly Inadvisable for the novice and well-seasoned alike. Unless the participants Prefer Pain, in which case, see Chapter Twelve.

Ori thought he would give Chapter Twelve a miss.

Being Well Prepared is ever so much more important when the Receiving Partner is of smaller stature than the Delivering Partner(s).

He thought the plural was a misprint until he saw the illustration of one ‘Receiver’ and more than one ‘Deliverer’. That was instructional and, frankly, terrifying.

“I just want one up my arse at a time. That’s too much like mounting an elm tree.”

After a while Ori began to recognize the lilting, poetic tone Kivi used. It seemed familiar somehow.

He recalled Omi and Pika’s erotic inglishmek conversations and he realized that they were quoting Queen Kivi.

They certainly weren’t married!

“Am I the only dwarf in Erebor who hasn’t read this fucking book?”

Ori heard a dirty great crash from the kitchen and Dori cried out in surprise and alarm.

In an instant Ori was through the door, across the hall and into the kitchen. A tableau fit for the stage lay frozen before him.

Dori stood on one slippered foot in a circle of broken ceramics. The other foot hung in the air with Mask attached to it by his front claws and mewling piteously. Dori held Powder against his chest with one hand. With the other he balanced a tea tray upon which stood Nori-Pori, busily and unconcernedly lapping up spilt milk.

While no one was looking, Brandy had stuffed her face into the open biscuit jar.

The crash had apparently been the teapot, strewn in pieces across the kitchen floor.

“Hold on! Hold on!” Ori cried.

He ran and put on his boots, then ran back, shoving the shards aside with his boot until he could rescue Mask from dangling peril and Dori could - finally - put his foot down.

Ori took the tray, on which Nori-Pori had finished the milk and now fastidiously tidied himself, and slid it onto the table. He grasped Brandy by the nape and pulled her out of the jar with a ‘pop’. She had finished the biscuits but apparently gotten her head stuck.
Dori, eyes very large, used his now-freed hand to pry twenty tiny, needle-sharp claws out of his chest.

“Thank you, pet,” said Dori.

“What happened?” Ori asked, grabbing up the broom.

“I had just finished tea and stood with the tray when Nori-Pori, the little bas- monster, leapt from the counter and upset the pot. Mask tried to jump after him and missed.

“Are you bleeding?” Ori asked.

“Poor little Powder,” said Dori, cuddling the frantically mewing kitten. “Nothing a little soap and sticking plaster won’t fix. Won’t it, my love?”

Dori was addressing Powder, who licked his nose.

Ori’s heart rate slowed and he quickly gathered up the shards and checked to be sure he had not missed any under the table or chairs.

“I’m sorry about your teapot,” said Ori.

Dori huffed at Nori-Pori in annoyance.

“It was my favorite, naturally,” said Dori. “Nori would destroy nothing less. Oh, well, there are others, and it isn’t one of Balin’s or Dwalin’s favorites.”

Ori had just placed the broom back in the corner when he remembered he had left the bedroom door open and his books on the bed. He wracked his brains, but could not recall hearing the front door open, so he heaved a sigh at the near-miss and returned to his bedroom.

Where Dwalin, who had come in through the chimney door, was standing by the bed, leafing through the Book of Glittering Diamonds.

“Er…”

Dwalin looked up and smiled as if Ori were not the worst husband who ever lived.

“There yeh are, love. Have a good day?” Dwalin frowned and peered closer. He put the book down on the bed and went to him. “Yeh alright, love? Yer pale as an egg.”

“One of Dis’?” Ori asked faintly.

“What’s happened?”

“Oh, er, Nori-Pori broke Dori’s teapot. Shards everywhere. I was helping clean up so the kittens wouldn’t get cut.”

Dwalin hugged him and kissed the top of his head and Ori prayed to Mahal that the topic of that book on the bed was closed.

Of course he wasn’t that lucky.

Dwalin started to strip out of his uniform. He was fastidious with it, which no one who knew him only distantly would ever guess.
“So, Queen Kivi, eh?”

“Yes,” said Ori in a small voice. “I’m sorry.”

Dwalin peered at him, put down his tunic and went back to hold him very gently by the shoulders.

“Why th’ fuck’re yeh sorry, love? It’s a good book t’ learn from, though she sounds like she chugged down an etiquette manual with her ale.”

“You don’t mind I didn’t just ask you?”

“It’s no’ like I know everythin’, love. Yeh migh’ want somethin’ I know naught abou’.”

“I might?”

It had never occurred to him.

“Aye, isn’t tha’ why yeh look a’ such things? T’ learn? Well, an’ t’ get a thrill.”

“Yes, but, it wasn’t for me. I mean, I thought if I knew more about it, then we could do things and I wouldn’t be so unsure. I would be better at making you happy.”

“Tha’s sweet, but if yeh do it, do it fer both a’ us, love.”

“Us.”

“Both a’ us, right? That’s why I’m goin’ t’ go through it meself. I been over it a time or two, an’ I still don’ think Illustration 20’s possible, no matter how much yeh stretch firs’.”

Ori giggled.

“Neither do I. I’m relieved you don’t want to try it.”

“Sex shouldn’t land yeh in th’ infirmary.”

“Where you have to explain how you got hurt in the first place. Can you imagine? The healer looks you over and says, ‘Oh, aye, yeh tried Illustration 20, did yeh?’.”

They both laughed.

Dwalin hugged him close then drew him back to look at him.

“Our Kivi’s righ’ ‘bout quite a few thin’s, love. Yeh have t’ talk ‘bout wha’ yeh want, an’ yeh have t’ be prepared f’r it, ‘less yeh like it rough.”

“That’s Chapter Twelve. I didn’t go there.”

Dwalin grinned.

“I figure when yer ready t’ do th’ fancy stuff we’ll jus’ start with yeh as th’ … Deliverin’ Partner.”

Ori straightened his shoulders in surprise.

“You’ll let me do that?”
“It’s no’ ‘lettin’ yeh do anythin’, love. I want it, if yeh want it.”

“Will you even feel anything? I’m not exactly huge.”

“Yer not exactly tiny either. Besides, mind what our Kivi says. Size ain’t much without skill. Not enough t’ just push it in an’ shake it a little.”

Ori had an idea and asked shyly,

“Would you read this with me?”

“Aye, a’course. Tha’ way we kin make fun a’ th’ pi’tures. Some o’ ‘em are dead sexy an’ others, well, me spine don’ bend tha’ way.”

“Let’s hope no one’s does.”

Ori put the book back on the bed and turned at the sound of talking in the sitting room.

“Ori!” Tilda called and they heard her footsteps coming along the corridor. Ori seized the book. Dwalin, grinning, held up the pillow and Ori shoved it into hiding. He hopped up to peck a kiss on Dwalin’s cheek and went to the door.

“Hello, Tilda what’s-”

“Dori says to get ready. Dinner’s soon,” Tilda announced with authority.

“Thank you, Tilda. We’ll be right there.”

She marched off. Ori shut the door and stifled a giggle.

“Lookin’ after them chicken’s makin’ someone a bit bossy,” Dwalin snickered.

“It’s not the chickens, I think, but following Master Brur while he does business in the mountain.”

“Tha’ll do it.”

They went through. King Bard, Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda were in attendance, as were The Great Woudini, Ruelis and Floris, who had brought Biscuit. Tilda and Biscuit were seated on the floor before the fire with Brandy and the kittens. Biscuit was clearly fascinated by Brandy, who made the most interesting squeaky-growly noises every time Biscuit licked her. Nori-Pori sat on Biscuit’s head.

“Master Woudini,” Ori greeted the man.

“Please call me Jim.”

“Of course, er…Jim.” Ori knew this would be strange as the man would always be The Great Woudini to him.

Ruelis was seated on the couch with Sigrid and Dis, talking quietly. Ori hoped Sigrid was getting some useful information. Dori called them all to table.
The roast beef was perfect and everyone was delighted with it, the last of the season’s ramps, and potatoes roasted in their jackets and fluffy with butter and chives. Ruelis and Jim kept the company roaring with tales of their adventures and misadventures all over Arda.

Ori sat back and wiped his eyes from laughing so much. There was a tug at his elbow sleeve. He leaned down to Tilda.

“I never noticed,” Tilda whispered.

“Noticed what?” Ori asked.

“It’s a special dwarrow thing, isn’t it. Nori’s hair has eyes.”

“No,” said Ori, “Nori’s hair has ferrets.”

She leaned in closer.

“Does he know?”

“Yes, I gave them to him.”

“You gave Nori his hair?” Tilda shrieked. “It’s a wig?”

“No, it’s his hair, I just supplied the ferrets.”

“Ohhhhh,” said Tilda. She called out, “Da!”

“No!” Bard replied.

“You didn’t even hear what I was going to say.”

“No.”

“About Nori’s hair.”

“N–. What about Nori’s hair?”

“It’s got ferrets in it!”

Bain bounced out of his chair, rushed over and stared into Nori’s hair, to Nori’s amusement.

“Fuckin’… Da! Nori’s got ferrets in his hair!”

Bard sighed.

“I think I’ll have another cup of ale.”

After dessert Dori invited their guests to repair to the patio and enjoy the evening again.

Ori gave a nod to Dwalin and grabbed Sigrid by the wrist. They slipped away and Ori hauled her through to his bedroom.

“What is it?” Sigrid asked as he hurried to where he’d hidden Queen Kivi’s book.

“Something from the library.”

“You’ve never found–? Already?”
They perched on the side of the bed and Ori handed the volume to her.

“I can’t read this.”

“Just look.”

Sigrid gasped and blushed beetroot.

“Eru! Is that—? Not even—! More than one person at a time?”

Ori felt himself blushing.

Sigrid got to Illustration 20.

Sigrid looked up at Ori, “Really? That’s even possible?”

“Apparently, if you stretch first.”

“Maybe for dwarf,” said Sigrid. “I don’t think all the stretching in Arda would let me do that. Even if I could, I’d be too busy worrying over snapping in half to enjoy it.”

“Dwarrow aren’t any more flexible than men. We’re made of stone, remember? Either Queen Kivi’s a contortionist—”

“Or she’s having us on,” Sigrid concluded. “It is really interesting, though.”

“There’s a chapter on sex between the races.”

Sigrid’s eyes opened wide.

“Really?” she whispered, even though they were alone in the room.

“I thought you might at least like to look at the diagrams. I can translate the text, too, although I think the two of us will probably explode just from embarrassment.”

“When has that ever stopped us?” Sigrid asked.

“Never,” Ori acknowledged with a grin. Then he sobered. “Sig, if you’re really going to marry Fili, I don’t want you to go into it ignorant and scared.”

“You were?” Sigrid asked, biting her lip in sympathy.

“I was, but I was also very lucky. I have a husband who didn’t force the issue. Not that I think Fili would attack you like a Durin’s Day roast, but if you want to attack each other like Durin’s Day roasts, you should both go in armed with the right cutlery.”

Sigrid laughed.

“Are all dwarrow obsessed with food, or is it just the Durins?”

“I’d say it was built into the blood.”

Sigrid considered.

“You know, Dori was the one who explained to me where babies come from, and afterward about my monthly. I didn’t think it strange at the time that he knew so much about the race of men. When I finally asked him, he said my mother had explained it to him, knowing he would be the one
“to tell me.”

“And not Bard?”

Sigrid snorted.

“Da? I remember when Tilda asked him where babies come from and he turned sixteen shades of pink, sputtered and went round to your house, looking for Dori. Good thing he was home. Da would probably still be wandering the streets, wondering what to say.”

“Did Dori ever get around to explaining sex?” Ori asked.

“Well, yes, when it was obvious I was serious about Fili, but Dori was rather short on technical details and a lot longer on possible consequences.”

Ori groaned and shook his head.

“Dori!”

“What did he tell you?” Sigrid asked.

“He was rather short on technical details and long on consequences.”

“I always thought that was strange, and now that I’ve seen him dancing naked in front of the entire kingdom, I think it’s even stranger.”

Ori shook his head.

“Nudity isn’t much to dwarrow. The fact that his hair was loose and unbraided was more erotic than anything else.”

“Aha,” said Sigrid. “That explains it.”

“Explains what?”

“I was talking to Fili in the kitchen and I’d been running here and there and everywhere to get it ready because I was late. I like to have dinner on the table when Da comes in, or my larder will look like it tried to withstand a protracted siege. My hair was in my eyes, so I took it down right there at the stove, re-braided it and put it back up. Fili’s mouth fell open like an oven door. I suppose it was as if I waved my breasts at him.”

“Just about,” said Ori.

“I think I need you to translate this book for me, Ori. If Fili asks how I know all this should I disavow your part in it?”

“Fili won’t care.”

“Dori would have kittens,” she said.

“He already does. Besides, he has to get over the idea of me being a corruptible dwarfling. I’d like it to be before my fiftieth wedding anniversary.”

“If you don’t mind, I think I won’t tell Da.”

“Please! He can go on thinking I’m a corruptible dwarfling. I don’t want to be skinned alive.”
The next morning Ori woke early to find Dwalin had already gone. When he emerged from the bedroom, he found only Balin and Thorin at the breakfast table, Balin was his usual calm self, Thorin, on the other hand, was grim and on edge.

“Must this be decided right now?”

“Th’ time’s come, laddie. Coronation’s upon us. Yeh can’t go bare-headed, and the crown you wear now—”

“Is an everyday coronet, I know. I know that. Please, Balin, go down to the treasury. There are dozens of crowns in there. Just pick whatever looks right to you.”

“As you wish, sire,” said Balin with a smile.

“Oh, Mahal’s hairy balls. Don’t call me that! It makes me sound like I associate with barn animals.”

Balin’s eyes sparkled as he patted Ori’s shoulder in passing.

“Thorin?” Ori asked warily.

The king’s smile was weary but genuine.

“Ori. How are you?”

“Well, thank you,” Ori said. “I wouldn’t want to go down there either.”

“I can’t,” said Thorin. “Not yet.”

Ori nodded.

“Is there anything I can do to help?” he offered.

“As you wish, sire,” said Balin with a smile. “Would you like me to find you the medicinal brandy?”

Ori giggled. Finally he said, “Let me pour you another cup of tea. I wonder where Dori keeps the medicinal brandy?”

“Ah, yes. Buj took me aside last night and very gravely asked me if I might petition you to ask Roäc if the, and I quote, ‘mighty and mysterious king of all ravens’ would allow Buj to study his wings.”

Thorin raised his eyebrows and looked a little flummoxed for a moment then shrugged.

“Actually,” said Thorin with a grin, “give me an update on Buj’s experiments.”

Ori giggled. Finally he said, “Let me pour you another cup of tea. I wonder where Dori keeps the medicinal brandy?”

“Ah, yes. Buj took me aside last night and very gravely asked me if I might petition you to ask Roäc if the, and I quote, ‘mighty and mysterious king of all ravens’ would allow Buj to study his wings.”

Thorin raised his eyebrows and looked a little flummoxed for a moment then shrugged.

“We could, or we could just ask his mighty and mysteriousness if he’d mind.”

Ori giggled in spite of himself and drained his cup. He reached for the pot. It was rather light.
“More?” he asked.

Thorin shrugged and finished his cup.

“If you’re going to make more, Ori. I’ll not say no.”

Ori had just come back in from re-filling the teapot when Balin returned and wordlessly handed Thorin a bundle of cloth.

Thorin slowly unwrapped it. He peered down at the crown, then up at Balin, who looked slightly apologetic.

“Only the one,” Balin stressed.

“Roäc picked this out, didn’t he?”

“He may have nudged me toward it,” Balin confessed.

Ori thought he heard rough chuckling in the distance, though he couldn’t tell from where.

“Is it really that bad, Thorin?” he asked.

Thorin handed it to him.

“Take a look.”

Ori looked.

It was so simple compared to Thror’s crown, just a mithril circle of ravens in flight, cast in profile. When he turned the crown, Ori saw that each raven’s visible eye held a different shiny stone: lapis, ruby, tigereye, snowflake obsidian and fire opal.

Ori hoped it fit. It wouldn’t do for the king to wear something like a thimble on his head.

Balin said, “Bes’ try it f’r size. Gridr still has time t’ make adjustments tha’ way.” Reluctantly Thorin took the crown as Ori handed it back to him and put it on.

“Those little bastards,” he muttered.

It fit perfectly.

“It’ll do,” said Balin, looking far happier than Thorin, “even with th’ new braids.” Thorin took it off and handed it to Balin, who smiled impishly.

“I’ll just polish it up for yeh, lad.” Thorin threw him a dirty look and sighed.

“I don’t suppose we know who wore this first?” Thorin asked.

Ori said, “I can look into it at work. I’ll make time on my lunch hour. If it was made for a royal, the official image and any concept sketches will be in the library archive.”

When Ori did find the crown’s history in the archive, he instantly regretted that offer.

Dinnertime arrived. Ori wished Dwalin were here, but he and Nori were absent, on missions known to only themselves and possibly the king.

Lady Klakuna had joined them as, she reported, Jim and his troupe had taken an early dinner and were rehearsing their various entertainments for the coronation party. Ori got the impression that Granny Klak was rather indignant she hadn’t been allowed to stay and watch.

Dori and Binni produced roasted lamb with apples and turnips mashed together, new carrots, and a large platter of mushrooms fried in bacon.

Ori attempted to keep a low profile while the company laughed and talked.

By the time they got to the pound cake, raspberries and whipped cream with tea to drink, Ori thought he was safe. He should have known better.
Thorin glanced up from his cup.
“Did you have a moment to look into the crown, Ori?”

Ori forced himself not to wince.
“Yes, Thorin, I did. It’s quite old.” In a small voice he added, “It was originally made for Kivi, wife of Durin III.”

Everyone stopped eating and stared at him, then at Thorin.
Ori forced himself to hold Thorin’s gaze.
Thorin put down his cup, expression terribly blank.
“Ori, are you saying those overfed, yapping chickens picked out a crown fit for a queen?”
“Um, yes? Apparently she had quite a large head for a dam.”

He said the words in an apologetic rush. Only when they’d left his mouth, did he realize the implications.
“Oh! I don’t mean to say you have a large head!”

Then he realized that wasn’t much better and had just determined to drown himself in the gravy boat when Thorin’s eyebrows and the corners of his mouth rose in unison and he laughed, obviously delighted. The tension was broken, though amid the laughter and general comments about Thorin’s fat head, Ori tried again lamely.
“There’s always time to pick out another.”
Thorin shook his head.
“No, no. This is perfect. If I’m going to turn everything upside down I might as well start as I mean to go on.”

Ori giggled, finally. Thorin actually got up from his seat to lean in and bump foreheads with him.
“Thank you,” said Thorin with dignity. “You have rendered a great service to the ‘head’ of the House of Durin.”

“Wait a moment!” Kili shouted. “Queen Kivi? Queen Kivi with the racy book?”

Dis whirled on him.
“How do you know about Queen Kivi’s book?”

Fili rolled his eyes.

“Nice going, cram brain.”

Kili sputtered. “Idiot Thorin gave it to me.”

Dis stared her brother down.
“You did what? Thorin! Why would you… I thought you said you were going to give them ‘the talk’.”

“No, you said I should give them ‘the talk’, but Dis, what was I supposed to talk about? They’re interested in dams, a subject about which I know precisely nothing. At their age, I was rolling around behind the ore bins with Dwalin.”

“Thorin!” Dis cried, gesturing with her chin toward Ori.

Dori cried out in wordless outrage but was, alas, sitting too far from Ori to clap his hands over Ori’s delicate ears.

Thorin’s mouth snapped shut abruptly, then opened again in a groan of embarrassment.

Fili turned to Kili.
“You’ve been upstaged.”

“I don’t mind,” said Kili. “This is really interesting.”

“Oh, Ori, I’m sorry,” said Thorin. “That’s not how you should have heard about that.”

Ori shrugged then giggled.

“He told me, and before that, I’d guessed. I’m a scholar, remember? I know what ‘shield brothers’ means.”

“Still, I apologize for announcing it so abruptly.”

Balin shook his head.

“Does anyone else have any secrets they’d like to spill tonight?”

Bofur wiped his mustache.

“Nori an’ I got married this mornin’.”

Dori and Jani jumped to their feet and cried nearly in unison, “You did what?”

“Got married,” said Bofur cheerfully. “Seemed to be the thing to do now that he’s semi-respectable.”

A voice from the ceiling said, “Ha! I told y’ that you couldn’t keep it a secret for even a day.”

“Hush, you,” said Bofur, taking off his hat.

Indeed, he sported a marriage braid and a rather fine gold bead of antique style.

Jani seized the braid with a delighted shriek, nearly yanking Bofur out of his chair.

“Oi, our Jani! That’s attached, that is!”

Thorin, apparently happy to cede the center of attention, went back to his chair and raised his cup first to Bofur, then toward the ceiling.

“Congratulations! The bead looks perfect, Nori.”

Dori sputtered, “B-but you didn’t even ask me for permission. Does no one here have the manners to ask anymore?”

Ori leapt up and conked foreheads with Bofur.

“Welcome, brother!”

“Thank y’ kindly, brother!”

Ori shouted to the ceiling.

“Congratulations, Nori!”

“Thanks, Chick!”

“I didn’t even get to make a cake!” Dori wailed.
“Now, me beloved, yeh kin always make a cake,” said Balin, patting his arm.

“Nori, get down here right now!” Dori demanded.

A cupboard up along the wall above the counter swung open and Nori slid out onto the floor without disturbing a single dish.

“I’ll ‘polite’ you, you little shit!” Dori growled.

He seized Nori and hugged him.

“Congratulations,” Dori said. “My wedding present to you is that I won’t thrash you to within an inch of your disrespectful life.”

“Awww, love you, too, Dor.”

Dori released him and turned to Bofur.

“Well, stand up and take what’s coming to you, brother thief!”

Bofur did so, looking brave and resigned.

Dori hugged him, too.

“You’re very welcome, my dear. You’re better than he deserves.”

“Oi!” Nori cried.

“And certainly better than we ever thought he’d get, which was the chopping block.”

“True,” Nori conceded.

Fili muttered, “Idad’s company is getting more incestuous by the moment.”

Jani hugged Nori, then turned and grinned at Bofur.

“Bom an’ Erda’re gonna slaughter you! They didn’t get t’ make a cake either!”

Dori stood stock still, frowning then whirled on Lady Klakuna.

“You knew about this! You were there, weren’t you!”

“Hmmm? What is that dear? Oh, possibly. You know, when you’re as old as I am, a lot of things just slip your mind.”

“I’ll slip your mind,” Dori muttered, then refilled her teacup.

“Thank you, darling,” she cooed. “And don’t hiss, dearest, you’ll uncurl your beard braids.”

Dori stared down at her, his bosom swelled then he deflated, smiled and said quite docilely, “Yes, Grandmamma.”

“Granny’s precious badger,” Ori whispered.
Dori reached over and slapped his knee.

Later Ori approached Thorin by the fireplace.

“Those beads didn’t come from the treasury,” said Ori.

Thorin gave a rueful grin.

“They came out of my bead box. They belonged to Thror’s mother.”

Ori sucked in a breath.

“Thorin! Does Nori know that?”

“Yes. He was there when I took them out. I’m fairly sure Bofur won’t hock his, and you know they aren’t really worth anything if they don’t go as a set.”

Ori laughed and Thorin’s grin became genuine.

Ori said, “Dori’s never going to forgive you for knowing about Nori getting married before he did.”

“Nori felt he had to tell me first, because he thought it might affect the way the company operates.”

“Will it?”

“Right now, only for the good I think. Every union binds the company closer, but down the road that means every break will be that much more damaging.”

“Are you worried?”

“Depends when you ask. I never thought I would have a large family. For good or ill, the company has become the family, it has become the House of Durin, and I’m far more sentimental about it than I’m sure Nori will ever be.”

“You’d be surprised.”

---

Note, the stones on Thorin’s new crown and a few of their meanings and uses:

Lapis lazuli - truth, wisdom, awareness
Ruby - vitality and royalty
Tiger eye - Relieves doubt
Snowflake obsidian - Focus amid chaos, dispersal of negative emotions, including greed.
Fire opal - Optimism, confidence, joy of the heart, can stimulate sex organs
Yes, the ravens are being little shits.
Letters, Liaisons, and Loudness

Chapter by Stevie Foxx

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. And now we are in full swing preparing for Thorin’s coronation. Ori’s so busy he doesn’t know what could possible happen next. Rest assured, plenty will! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next day Ori had been excused from the library to work with Thorin. At first, it was rather enjoyable. Thorin and Balin waded through the usual work, much of which had been already dealt with by Gloin, Binni and Brur. Most just required Thorin to sign and send off. Birds of all kinds, and all sizes of bats, perched or hung from the wooden racks in Thorin’s and Balin’s office.

There were piles of letters of congratulations, a few sparsely sprinkled with condolences. Every dwarf king had replied and expressed excitement at coming to Erebor but mostly at the chance of seeing Thorin. Ori could tell Thorin was deeply touched. Thorin told Balin to set these aside as he would answer them personally.

Many nobles and many, many other folk had written, too. There were cards from people of all races and ages. Thorin laughed delightedly at a very brightly colored card from a place called Bagshot Row. The picture he showed to Balin and Ori was, at best, a stick figure drawing with a large yellow blob on its head and with huge dark brown scribbles all over.

“Mahal,” Thorin observed. “Being crowned seems to have set my beard on a complete rampage. Who knew it was so excitable?”

Inside were some squiggles

“Ah,” Thorin went on, “here’s a translation on the inside left, provided, no doubt, by the kind parents. Dear High King. Happy Coronation Day. I hope you get lots of presents. I get presents?” Thorin grinned teasingly at Ori and Balin. “How nice. I didn’t know that. Lots of love from Master Samwise Gamgee. Why don’t I get lots of love from my loyal dwarf kings? Ori, will you kindly reply to Master Gamgee? Use the invitation paper, please. If you might, do fashion it as a card and draw him a picture, too. I’m sure he’d like that.”

“A picture of you?” Ori snickered.

“I leave it to your discretion.”

Ori caught up a sheet of the stiff, cream paper trimmed with gold, halved it and ran the wooden folding wand down the edge, making the fold clean and straight. Picking up his pen and taking up a bottle of Durin blue ink, he composed a gentle thank you note inside the card. While waiting for the ink to dry, he pondered for a few minutes. He smiled to himself and took up the black ink. He quickly drew a picture of Thorin, wearing his new crown, with Roäc on his shoulder reading the card. Ori looked at the badger’s card again and drew in enough detail that it was clear the king and his raven were admiring Master Gamgee’s card. In the top right hand corner, he stamped the royal crest. He carefully sanded the picture. He passed it back to Thorin.

“Will this do?”

Thorin took it and Balin lean over his shoulder to look.

Thorin smiled at Ori.

“I like it.”

“I’m in it?” Roäc croaked. He hopped over. Thorin passed both the card and the reply across the desk to the raven. Roäc cackled over the badger’s drawing. He cocked an eye at Ori’s drawing.

“Nice. You can draw any raven you like and me, too!”

Thorin chuckled, “Better ask him while he’s in a good mood, Ori,” as he signed the card with a flourish and stamped it with his signet ring.

Ori stared, then,

“Oh yes! Roäc?”

The raven turned to him.

“My friend Buj is attempting to build an apparatus which will allow him to fly. He said he would very much like it if you would grant him some time to study you.”

Roäc dipped his head slightly and Ori thought that if the raven had been wearing spectacles he would be peering at Ori over them.

“You know, to look at your wings and their shape….I suppose, “ Ori added by way of an explanation.

Roäc cackled.

“Yes, tell that egg I am quite at leisure.”

Ori reflected that yes, this had all been very pleasant, but now it wasn’t. Everything was dealt with. Everything except for Frerin’s letter. Thorin had been in a very good mood. Except now he was livid.

“The idiot!”

“The question, laddie,” said Balin in his calm voice, “is what do yeh think best t’ do. Ignore him or send another letter tellin’ him t’ get his arse here.”

Thorin growled and paced, the birds and bats wriggling a little as his agitation filled the room. Ori realized that this office provided Thorin with a place to vent his anger. Unlike when they had first read the letter at the entrance to Erebor after the inn. It was good that he could do it here and in private. Ori reminded himself that Thorin was angry with Frerin not him, although his gut reaction was to quake in his boots. Thorin came back to the desk and snatched up a plain piece of paper. Ori pushed the quill and the ink to him quickly. Thorin wrote hard against the paper. Ori craned to read.

_You have four days._

_Get here._

Thorin swiped his signet ring against a candle and slammed the wax seal beside his signature. He folded the note roughly and barked,

“Roäc.”

The raven looked up at him.

“He won’t do anything except be glad he’s made you mad,” Roäc offered.

“I don’t care. Take this to him.”

“He’ll just ignore it.”

“Roäc!”

“Thorin, all you’re doing is feeding his pride and -”

“Roäc. Take this note and deliver it.”

The raven hopped over, inspected the plain folded paper in Thorin’s hand, then cocked his head at Thorin.

“Deliver it. That’s all?”

“Yes, Roäc, just deliver it.”

“Fine.”

Roäc snatched the note from Thorin and skimmed out of the window, heading east. The raven capitulated too suddenly for Ori’s liking. Ori felt the skin crawl on the back of his neck.

Thorin growled.

“There, it’s done. He’ll get his giggle but it won’t last when he finds out what’s been arranged.”

“All for the best, laddie.” Balin agreed.

Ori stared out of the window where Roäc had flown. He knew something was in the air other than Roäc himself but it wasn’t a bad something. More of a small twist that would alter the fabric of their lives slightly but not in a bad way. His gut assured him it was not in a bad way.

“Ori.”

Ori turned back. Both Thorin and Balin were regarding him solemnly.

“What?” he asked.
“Laddie,” Balin began but Thorin interrupted,

“What is Mahal telling you, Ori?”

Ori blushed.

“I don’t know if it’s Mahal but I… This will be fine, but there’s going to be a -” Ori floundered for a way to express himself. “I don’t know - a surprise, but a good surprise…”

Thorin raised an eyebrow, then came and clapped Ori on the shoulder. “I like good surprises. Maybe Frerin’ll send me a present.”

Both Balin and Ori chuckled over that.

“Better open it outside then, laddie,” Balin advised, tidying the desk. “It’ll no doubt stink a’ fish.”

He picked up a royal note.

“Ah,” said Balin, “Chat’s replied.”

“Who’s Chat?” Ori asked.

Thorin huffed out a laugh.

“King Snur of the Broadbeams, the King of Ered Luin. He’s been called ‘Chatty’ since we were pebbles.”

“Because he talks or because he doesn’t?” Ori asked.

Balin said, “More the way he talks than anything else.”

“What does he have to say?” Thorin asked.

Balin read, “Have the beer ready. Chat.”

“Doesn’t mince words, does he,” Ori observed.

Thorin chuckled, “Imagine Bofur, drunk, ruling a kingdom.”

“Oh, dear,” said Ori. “Is he a good king?”

“He’s an excellent king,” said Thorin, filing through the rest of the correspondence he wanted to reply to himself, obviously with more alacrity than he had with Frerin. “When the mines of Eren Luin played out, he reinvented his kingdom as a deep water port. A lot of the food we had at the inn that came from the far northwest? That came through Ered Luin.”

At that, Dori stepped into the room, arrayed in pale lilac and moonstones and her hair loosely dressed without braids.

“Beloved,” Balin greeted his One, eyes shining with pride.

Dori looked coquettishly at him, then turned to Thorin.

“Dearest Thorin, it is long past the noon hour. I insist you come and have a luncheon. You keep working like this, you shall fall into the sulks before tea.”
Thorin regarded Dori with a sapient eye.

“Indeed. And, speaking of tea, will there be guests?”

Dori widened her gaze innocently.

“Your majesty, one never knows!”

“Quite.” Thorin finished. “Thank you, Dori, we shall be through directly.”

Dori fussed at them as they seated themselves in the breakfast parlor. There was ale, bread, cheeses and cold meats and Dori insisted they fill their plates. Dwalin and Nori came in and Dori order them to eat.

Dwalin seated himself by Ori and kissed him.

“Business get done, love?”

“Yes, Roäc took a letter to Frerin telling him to get his arse here.”

“Good. With any luck he won’t come an’ our Buj kin stand f’r ’im.”

Thorin snorted.

“He’ll never make it in four days. But if he defies me again, no one will question my actions in cutting him off without allies. My real concern is for the people who went there originally.”

“If they ‘ave good sense they’ll drop trou’ an’ come ‘ere,” Nori put in with his mouth full. “That’ll leave ‘im wif nought.”

“Exactly,” Thorin agreed. “When Roäc returns, I’ll have him put out the word that any loyal subject there are welcome in Erebor where they may pledge their loyalty to me.”

Dori smiled as she brought through a huge platter piled high with xocolātl chip biscuits.

“And with things going so well here, there will be plenty of housing and work. I imagine many will come anyway. How nice.”

Balin chuckled and kissed Dori’s hand as Dori seated herself.

“Aye, beloved, they will come as soon as they hear the legends of your tea parties.”

Dori laughed.

“Well, Hmmm, I wonder…”

Ori knew that look. Dori was going to suggest something outrageous yet completely sensible.

“Perhaps, King Thorin,” Dori said sweetly. “Since mid-summer is a month after your coronation, we should help the people of Dale celebrate their old festival. It really hasn’t been properly done since the last master ruled Dale.”

Balin considered.

“We never had much to do with the festivals there. Thror didn’t like to ‘mix’ as he said. Tell me, beloved, is there a way to find out if we would be welcome and how they would like us to participate?”

Dori giggled charmingly and patted Balin’s hand.

“Leave it all to me, my heart.”

“Speaking of festivities,” Thorin said looking amused at Dori. “Do we know what is the plan for my coronation?”

“Oh,” Dori brushed this aside. “Of course, of course. Binni and I have it all settled. Dearest grandmamma is in conference with the Great Woudini as to what they would like to show us.”

“I’m all aflutter with excitement.” Thorin said gravely though his eyes twinkled.

“Hmph.” Dori replied and sipped her tea.

There was a thundering racket coming from the sitting room. They all heard the hidden door in the wall crash open and the sound of a gigantic mass erupt into the room. A loud oink sounded.

“Halt, Chopper!” bellowed a deep voice, pitched to the battlefield.

"Hullooooo! We're arrived at LAST!” the female version caroled after.

“Brother! Sister!” Dori shrieked in delight and rushed from the room.

“And so it begins,” Thorin said, rising with the others.

Ori came into the sitting room to find Dori embracing and being heartily embraced by Dain and Sculdís.

“Cousin Dain,” Balin called coming forward. “Delighted t’ see yeh again, lad.”

Dain released Dori to swoop over and thump his brow to Balin’s. He and Thorin cuffed each other and then Dain grabbed Ori in a bear hug with a shout.

“Here’s me wee scribe brother!”

“Welcome back, brother!” Ori said hugging back. He was delighted to have this new but huge brother back in their home. Dain held him at arms’ length and looked him over.

“Yer lookin’ well, pet. I see our dumplin’s fatten’ yeh up.”

Ori laughed, “That was our week at the Inn on the Lake. I would swear we did nothing but eat and lounge around.”

“Excellent. Gotta get all tha’ mournin’ out o’ yeh!” Dain chuckled with a sly wink and a finger laid alongside his nose. With a grin he pushed Ori to his right and converged on Nori. Ori turned and hugged Sculdís.

“There now, pet,” she cooed, patting his hair. “Don’t yeh look lovely. I do like th’ way yer doin’ yer hair now. So grown up!”

“Thank you. Is Stonehelm with you?”

“Aye, pet. He’s off stablin’ th’ ponies.”
Ori raised his eyebrows at her

"Why, sister? You’re not all riding pigs this time?"

Sculdis laughed and gave his bottom a spank. Dori fussed them all to their rooms upstairs and waved at Ori to go and see to things in the kitchen. Ori went and found Mistress Dazla was setting up the tea tray. She smiled at Ori

"Don’t worry, Master Ori. Our guests’ meal is all ready. We’ve got a good soup on to go with a lunch like we gave you earlier. And Lady Dori made a lemon fluff this morning."

The idea of Dain consuming lemon fluff made Ori snicker.

"Thank you, Mistress Dazla. Shall I clear the table?"

"Already done, Master Ori."

"Set the table?"

Mistress Dazla smiled and shook her head. "Now, Master Ori you either go and enjoy your family or get back to your work."

"You’re amazing, Mistress Dalza."

"Off you go, now."

Ori went upstairs and followed the sound of Dain’s voice telling Dori how pretty she looked today. Ori stood in the open door of the large bedroom Dain and Sculdis had occupied last time. Miss Oqizla, Mistress Dazla’s youngest daughter, was waiting on the Ironhills monarchs and she was busily helping Sculdis and Binni unpack. One of the two wardrobes was already full. Dain had his arm around Dori at the window and Dori was telling him all about their stay at the Inn on the Lake.

"Mistress Dazla says lunch is ready," he announced.

"Capital!" Dain foghorned. “Always be on time for a meal, I say. Me precious gem, are yeh hungry?"

“Aye, hungry enough t’ eat the whole larder."

“I’ll finish here, marm,” murmured Miss Oqizla.

“Aye, thanks so much, m’dear,” Sculdis replied and patted the lass’s cheek.

Dain came over to escort his queen and Ori saw a flash of gold as Dain tipped the servant with a smile.

Once more in the breakfast parlor, Dain and Sculdis tucked into lunch. Stonehelm came in,

“Ponies are set, Adad."

“An’ yeh cleaned yersel’ up, too,” Sculdis noticed. “Good lad, come eat.”
Thorin came in, ruffled Stonehelm’s hair and sat down.

“We’ve heard from every monarch in Arda. All are coming.”

Dain turned frowning,

“What’s this shite abou’ Frerin cryin’ off?”

“We have someone to stand for him, no matter.” Thorin looked very pleased and helped himself to bread and cheese.

“So help me, cous, I’m taking myself t’ Beleghost and choppin’ his fool head off,” Dain growled.

“An’ brin’ it back on a pike,” Sculdís added.

Thorin shrugged, “Why bother? He’s getting his comeuppance.”

“Aye, who yeh got t’ stand?” Dain asked, very interested.

“Buj.”

“Buj?”

“Buj.”

“That daft scribe always wears nothin’ but black?” Sculdís’ eyebrows had mixed with her hairline.

“That’s the one,” Thorin assured her.

“Fuckin’ eh!” Dain opined.

“He’s loyal?” Sculdís asked.

“Oh yes,” Dori told her. “As soon as he was informed he was to stand, he positively threw himself at Thorin’s feet and said the entire oath in under half a minute!”

“Indeed,” Thorin went on. “His betrothed, Dipfa, has also sworn loyalty and I have promised to conduct their marriage ceremony.”

Dain seemed to ponder, tapping his teaspoon against the table.

“He’s th’ youngest of that family who abandoned him f’r Beleghost, isn’ he?”

“Yes,” Ori said bitterly.

Dain smiled.

“Aye, he’ll do nicely.”

The rest of the afternoon was spent with Ori and Balin finishing the correspondence with Thorin. Dain sat in the office with them and regaled them with the latest gossip from around Arda.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Ori is having stuff happen he never dreamed of. Who knew there were such interesting people in Arda? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The next day, around noon, Ori went to the building in Dale where Bard had set up his office, the one that had once been the detached kitchen of a mansion. A busy squad of dwarrow stone masons was building what looked like a stout enclosure in the ruined walled garden off the side, as well as shoring up the walls themselves and putting in a gate.

Bard sat on a crate, looking perplexed and harried, while a stout dam with a great pouf of strawberry blonde hair on the top of her head and another at her chin loomed over him and pointed out this and that on a large, unfurled scroll.

"Bard!" Ori called.

They looked up at Ori, the dam said something quietly to the king and bowed before marching off toward a knot of workers chipping away at a massive chunk of stone. Ori presumed they were making adjustments to fit it snug into the rest of the wall.

"What's happened?" Ori asked.

Bard ran his rough hands through his rough hair, leaving it sticking up all in points.

"You remember where Calmar's house was?"

"How could I forget?"

Bard winced.

"Sorry. Anyway, it's a vacant lot now. We were scavenging useful materials through the ruins yesterday. We kept finding all these stone statues Calmar had - of himself. We thought they'd come in handy for filling in the cellar hole, and they did, once we emptied them."

"They were hollow?"

"Yes, as we discovered when we went to lift one and the head snapped off and a fortune in gold coins and gems spilled out of the neck. Between that and what we caught him with when he was trying to flee, we have the makings of a tidy treasury. Or we will have, once they finish building the treasury."

He gestured behind him at the workers.

"Is the treasure safe?" Ori asked.
"It's in Gloin's vault in Erebor."

"That's all right then," said Ori. "I thought you were going to tell me it was stuffed in the mattress in your house."

"That would make the bed even lumpier than usual," said Bard. "Not that we're going to be living there much longer."

For just a moment Ori got a sinking feeling that Bard's family had been evicted from their home, then he remembered there wasn't anyone left to evict them.

"Where will you go?" Ori asked.

"You're standing in it, or at least near it, or you will be. I have to meet with a completely different dwarf from a completely different guild to discuss it before lunch. Why don't you go on in? Sigrid's there, and if she doesn't tell you what happened last night I'm pretty sure she'll pop."

Ori went around the building.

Two guards armed with halberds stood, one at each side of the door, to the right a grizzled old dwarf, to the left a very young man who didn't look terribly fierce, or all that comfortable holding a 'pointy stick'. Ori thought this pale, scared-looking youth couldn't be any older than Bain.

The youth peered at Ori as if Ori might bite and slid his gaze over to the dwarf, who gave a tiny nod of encouragement.

"Er… Greetings, Master Dwarf," said the youth. "What is the… er… nature of your business with King Bard?"

Sigrid came to the door - which was propped open - and said, "It's fine, Ivo, it's just Ori from Steam Alley, remember?"

"Oh, aye," said Ivo, relaxing visibly. "I seen ye some once 'r twice."

After a moment's hesitation, the dwarf guard bowed and Ivo awkwardly followed suit.

"Thank you," said Ori, hoping to be encouraging, though he really wanted to giggle. "Very kind of you."

As they passed into the house Ori heard the dwarf tease Ivo, "Well, wha'd'yeh know? Yer still alive!"

Ori had the strangest sense of having done this before, when Sigrid grabbed his wrist and dragged him into the room.

"Sigrid! Wha-"

"Wait until I tell you!"

"Bain's eloped with Furh'nk?" he asked, looping his satchel on the back of one of the mismatched chairs around the table.

"What? No!" said Sigrid, busily stirring a pot of something mouthwatering at the stove. A batch of chips fried in a kettle full of oil nearby. "He's definitely not Bain's type."

"Bain has a 'type'?"
"I'm just kidding! Wait until I tell you! We were having dinner last night and guess who happened to dropped by? King Thranduil!"

"Thranduil! Dropped by your house! But he just went back to Mirkwood."

"Didn't waste any time, did he. Not only that, but judging from Da’s’s blush, he wasn't unwelcome! Wonder what those two will get up to?" she giggled.

"Discussing the latest fashions," Ori mused. "Do you think Thranduil’s really trying to court your father?"

"Court might be too strong a word, but Thranduil certainly didn't come to the arse-end of Dale at night to see me. Not that the usual lowlifes would survive a meeting with him. I know Dori was teasing Thranduil about lusting after Da, but what if they should become serious? I can’t see King Thranduil as stepmother material."

"He does have the wardrobe for it," said Ori, then, "Do you think he will make you do housework from dawn to dusk? I know he has three sons. Legolas is perfectly nice, but where are the other four spoiled children?"

They looked at each other and burst into giggles.

"So, Bard said you're going to live here?" he asked.

"Not in this room, but not too far from it, either. Wait until you see the plans."

"I thought you'd just move into one of Calmar's cronies houses?"

"Half of them were in such bad repair we'll have to pull them down. Fili, Kili and I talked about it with the builders and we decided it was best to just use those houses for scrap, to repair some of the homes in town that are still in salvageable shape. It's good all those houses came open under the mountain. I think the whole of Coil Road and Spring Close is moving there next week."

"What about the other emptied buildings in Dale?"

Sigrid sighed.

"A lot of them were booby trapped. Not surprising, really. They were owned by criminals."

Bard entered with a dwarf who might as well have been Pika in another fifty years. Ori didn't recognize him, but he did know the braid of a master builder. After the miners' guild, it was the largest, with trade guilds like plumbing, heating and stone masonry under it. This dwarf wore his iron grey hair and beard braided in circles together, around his face, over his head and back down under his chin. Except for his short, well-beaded braid, not a stray hair escaped.

"Teilnar, son of Tahlnar, at your service, Lord Ori," said the dwarf, bowing.

Ori bowed in return.

"Ori of Fundin, at yours and your family's, Master Teilnar. You can just call me Ori."

"Then you should just call me Teilnar," said the dwarf. "I hear great things about you and your work."

Ori was saved from having to sputter when Teilnar turned to the table, stood up on a short step Bard supplied, and unrolled another blueprint nearly the length of the table. Ori saw from the way it was laid out, it was the plan of a square, roomy building with this kitchen at the center, sitting in a fainter outline of the building and grounds as they once stood.

"This kitchen's the bloody sturdiest building in Dale," Teilnar said without preamble. "It was dwarf-built, of course. The house around it had a dwarf foundation, but a wooden frame. You'll note, the house isn't here anymore. It went in the quake with Isildur's ring. I'm thinking the original foundation's still here if you want it."

"I'm more concerned with just a sturdy house that's warm in the winter and where I can fit more than four people at a time without falling through the floor."

"A very modest request, your majesty."

"It's more than I have now," said Bard. "I've been living in a house the size of this room since I was first married."

"What? With three active pebbles? Mahal keep you. I think we can do better than that! I've had dowsers out looking for the old pipes, which are still intact and run right under this kitchen."

A thick finger traced a silver line from beyond the garden wall, under the kitchen and out even further than where the old house once stood.

"What were the pipes for?" Bard asked.

Teilnar blinked at him.

"Running water, your majesty."

"Running water…"

"Aye, there used to be baths, fountains, all kinds of things."

Bard glanced at Ori, looking momentarily lost.

"Running water. That's…"

"It'll take a few weeks at least to map it all out, get down into the tunnels, inspect the pipes and so on. No promises, but you could have most of the district up in about a month."

"Not just this kitchen, that's what you mean?" Bard said, as if he were trying to work it all out.
"There will be running water in town?"

"Aye, hot an’ cold. Say the word, it's done."

"Yes, please," Bard rasped.

"I'll work out a plan and an estimate, then."

He briskly rolled up his document, bowed smartly to Bard, and then to Sigrid and said,
"Afternoon, Ori." on his way out the door.

"What just happened?" Bard asked.

"I ask myself that every day," said Ori.

"I need to get a message to Gloin," said Bard. "I'm not negotiating a municipal water system by "Has Gloin been helping you while we've been away?" Ori asked.

"Yes, thank Mahal."

Abruptly, Bard seemed to realized what he said and added, quickly, "And Eru! Thank Eru, too! Oh, fuck it. I can thank Mahal if I want. I swear he sent Gloin just to save my arse. Gloin was here pretty much the week you were gone. He gave me a crash course in the finances of an entire city and he taught Tilda how to hamstring someone with her bootknife."

"Aw. He missed Gimli," said Ori.

"Hope you've worked up an appetite," said Sigrid, approaching with a tray. "Chips, cheese and chicken gravy!" said Ori, nearly swooning.

"This is a business lunch," said Bard with a grin.

Sigrid placed three full bowls on the table beside the pitcher of beer.

The hot chips and gravy were already melting the thick chunks of curds.

"Where are Bain and Tilda?" Ori asked.

"Bain's down at the boat, doing some repair work," said Bard, pouring out a cup of beer for Ori. "He has a pasty so he's not going hungry, but he'll be coming home ravenous. Tilda is taking lunch with Master Brur."

"He really likes her," said Ori. "What will she do when school starts?"

"He and I talked about that," said Bard. "Thanks to you, she already knows how to read and write in westron far better than her peers. She'll spend the morning in the East Dale school, learning to figure sums and whatever, and the afternoons at the library – learning to read and write khuzdul. The other badgers will learn it, too, but Brur thinks she really does have the makings of a scribe."

"Mahal!" said Ori. "That's amazing."

Indeed, it was. He could only have dreamed of such opportunity at that age.

Not that his life wasn't flooded with more opportunity than he could handle at the moment.

As they ate, the sound of playing badgers grew louder. Since the badgers could no longer use the ruined garden, they were playing on the other side of the house in yet another vacant lot.

A cry went up. A pigskin ball bounded through the open window and bounced down the middle of the table. Bard caught it in one hand without looking and tossed it back out.

Ori heard cheering and a young voice say, “Thank yeh, Mister Bard.” Then quarreling, and the same voice said, “Thank yeh, Mister King.” This was followed shortly by, “Yer such a spud.” Then, “I know yeh are, but what am I?” And, finally, “Thank yeh, King Bard!”

“You're welcome all three times,” Bard called back.

When they finished eating, Sigrid went out, promising to return shortly.
"A little early to pick up Tilda?" said Ori.

"She's gone to speak to a Mistress Annis in Steam Alley," said Bard, while he rinsed the dishes. "Dori said she might know a trustworthy soul who'd wouldn't mind keeping the house for us. Sigrid is going to be a little too busy helping me run all of Dale to keep my shirts washed."

When they had done with the dishes, they sat at the table sipping beer.

"So, are you ready?" Ori asked.

"As I'll ever be," said Bard.

"You know there are seven dwarf clans. At the moment there are six under-monarchs, plus Thorin, the high king. Thorin and Dain are both Durin kings, but Dain is also nominally head of the Firebeards, or at least half of them."

"And Frerin is also a Durin king, but he's an asshat, yes," said Bard.

"Then there's King Snur, he's the king of Broadbeams, but also rules over the remaining Firebeards."

"The Firebeards don't get their own king?"

"There really aren't enough of them to warrant an entire kingdom anymore. They were wiped out."

"Was it a war?"

"They were, er, bad."

"The Firebeards were bad."

"They sacked the elven city of Doriath in the last age."

"That qualifies as bad," Bard agreed.

"So the other dwarf clans slaughtered the ones most responsible, including their king. I wouldn't mention the Firebeards in front of Thranduil. He was an elfling in Doriath at the time."

Bard whistled. "Thank you for telling me that."

"Anyway, Snur is also called King Chatty."

"Tilda used to have a doll named 'Chatty'."

"I guarantee the doll didn't drink like Snur. Then there's Gheir, King of the Stiffbeards. Sometimes he's called 'Father Stiffbeard'."

"Because he's old?"

"Because he has fifteen wives and thirty-two children and he's about sixty years older than me."

"Sounds like it's not just his beard that's stiff," said Bard.

"Don't worry, he's only bringing five with him."

"Badgers?"
"Wives. He tends to provide his own entertainment." The pair of them snickered then Ori went on.

"Gheir's big rival is Queen Hild of the Blacklocks. Unlike all the other dwarf kingdoms, the Blacklocks have a matriarchy. Hild's regarded almost as a valar. She'll be arriving with General Aris."

"Her bodyguard," Bard guessed.

"And shield sibling, field marshall and consort. Hild doesn't believe in cluttering up the place with extraneous bodies. You probably won't have to worry much about Hild, though. The only males she willingly talks to are Thorin, whom she actually likes, and Gheir, because the two of them bait each other constantly."

"That just leaves the Stonefoots and Ironfists."

"King Ahkn and King Ulf. You probably won't have to worry about them, either. They'll be too busy trying to beat the tar out of each other to do much socializing."

"They don't like each other," Bard surmised.

"They're best mates. It's just how Stonefoots and Ironfists say 'I love you'."

"Good to know."

"Dwalin says the two of them should just get a room and be done with it," said Ori.

"Ah," said Bard. That seemed to sum it all up. "So, those are the dwarf monarchs, and they'll all be here, except, probably, the asshat."

"Yes," Ori grinned. "Can you name them all? There'll be a brief quiz after class."

"Name them, yes, but that's about it."

"And then there's what The Great Woudini would call 'the rest of the crowned heads of Arda'. We'll start with the elves you're likely to run into. You know Thranduil and Legolas. Thranduil also has two other sons, but the elder won't leave the forest and refuses to talk to anyone who isn't an elf. The middle son is studying esoteric healing in the Undying Lands. Thranduil is cousin to Lord Celeborn, he's husband to Lady Galadriel of Lothlorien. You may have seen or met him at Thror's funeral."

"Oh, aye, I remember seeing him. He's the one Dori calls her 'useless appendage'?"

Ori snickered.

"Nobody says that, at least not in front of him. No one except Thranduil, anyway, but they grew up together. To Celeborn's credit, he did give her a daughter, their only child, Celebrían."

"Wasn't Thranduil a suitor of hers?"

"Yes, but she married Lord Elrond of Imladris instead. You'll notice Thranduil and Elrond are civil, but cold."

"Because Elrond married Celebrían?"

"Because Celebrían and Thranduil's wife ran off to live together in the Undying Lands."
Bard paused.

"Lived together? Do you mean, they're sharing a house?"

"Yes, but also, they're lovers."

"Ah. I wonder if the chill between Thranduil and Elrond isn't at least half mutual embarrassment," Bard mused.

"More like ninety percent," said Ori dryly.

"I thought elves only loved once, like dwarrow."

"I think Elrond loved Celebrian, I'm not sure if it was mutual."

"And Thranduil?"

"He picked a suitable spouse for his station and title, but that's all. It must have worked on some level. She gave him three elflings, including Legolas. At least, she waited until they were grown before she took off."

"Poor Thranduil. Poor Elrond, when it comes down to it," said Bard.

"I'm not feeling that sorry for Thranduil," Ori sassed.

"Right," said Bard. "We'll see. What about Elrond?"

"Oh, rumor is he's carrying on with his steward, an elf named Lindir. Lindir is supposed to run Elrond's house, but I'm willing to bet Lindir will come with him to the coronation."

"Does Elrond have any children?"

"Three children, all adults. There are twins Lords Elrohir and Elladan, and a daughter, Lady Arwen Undomiel, who's engaged to King Elessar of Gondor."

"Does Elrond still speak to his daughter?" Bard wondered.

"Of course. Why wouldn't he?"

"Aren't elves touchy about their offspring marrying men?"

"Elessar is a Numenorean, a mixed race people descending from Elrond's twin brother Elros and a mortal woman. Their own mother was also a mortal woman. Elrond is sometimes call Peredhil, Half-Elven."

"So, are there any actual men coming to this coronation besides me?"

"Theoden King of Rohan, that's the horse kingdom closest allied with Gondor. I've never met him. Dwalin said he's a lot like a tall, blond Dain."

Bard grimaced.

Ori said, "Just don't get caught standing between them."

Bard chewed his bottom lip thoughtfully.

"You've written all this down for me, haven't you?"
Ori pulled a thick sheaf of paper from his satchel.

"Right here."

"You're wonderful, Ori."

"Very kind of you to say so."

"Without you I'd never know any of this, and I'd be sticking my foot in my mouth constantly."

"I know all of it and I still do," said Ori. "Your best bet is to stay close to Dori if possible, or Thranduil. You'll hardly have the chance to misstep with them. You'll hardly get a word in edgewise."

Ori considered a jagged scar on the table, then ventured, “How are things with you and Thranduil?”

"He came to visit last night."

"So I hear."

Bard reddened.

"Yes. He doesn't waste a lot of time."

"No, he doesn't. Bard, are you all right?"

The man looked down into his beer and shrugged sheepishly.

"I suppose. A year ago I couldn't imagine ever being free of the Master. Now I'm the king of Dale. The crown prince of Erebor is courting my daughter and the elven king of Mirkwood is making advances - toward me. What am I supposed to say to that?"

"Yes or no, depending on whether you think it would be fun?"

Bard shook his head.

“When you have children to worry about, it’s never that simple. Even if I didn’t have them, Thranduil’s obviously mistaken me for someone with a clue. It took me six months to get up the nerve to speak to Mathilde and I’d known her all my life. Thranduil’s a lot less approachable.”

"I don't think it's a case of you having to approach him. He's approached. And you're seriously considering it, aren't you."

"Fool that I am? Yes! Who wouldn't?"

"Thorin?"

"All right, besides Thorin, though, it would be pretty funny- Argh! Now you have me doing it! I wouldn't know the first thing about bedding another male. He is male, right? Are elves even built like men? Eru! Do they even keep their business down there?"

“‘Their business?’” Ori had a momentary image of a pushcart before reason set in. “Oh! Yes! Look, if you decide you want to have sex with him, you’d better make sure he knows you’re inexperienced and - er - I have a book you may want to borrow. Also, you might not want to call it your ‘business’. You’re going to be confused enough. Look at Elrond.”
Bard stared at him.

“What about Elrond?”

“Never mind, ask Balin.” Ori pushed out his chair and rose.

“Ori! So what am I supposed to call it?”

“That, you can ask Dori.” Ori grinned

“Fine!” snapped Bard. “Does he have a dick?”

At that moment, Teilnar returned.

“Should I not be here?” he asked.

“No, no, I was just leaving,” said Ori.

He gathered up his satchel.

As he stepped out the door he heard Teilnar ask Bard, “Anyone I know?”

It was close to the first afternoon hour, when Ori had taken leave of Bard. Honda cantered them back to the mountain and Fundin House. He smiled to himself and leaned over her mane. She gave a delighted squeal and took off galloping. She slowed to a sedate trot when they approached the great entry gate. It was wide open and birds whisked merrily in and out. Some carried messages, others chased each other or insects. Ori squinted up. Mud and hay lined the crevices of all the columns and statuary as swallows had decided to build their nests there.

Ori greeted the guards and made his way to the roadway that led up through the city.

At Fundin House, he left Honda with Mokrah and ran indoors. Ori went back to his bedroom. He washed and changed into formal robes and regarded himself in the mirror, lamenting his sparse beard, his journeyman’s braid. He had been dreading this meeting ever since he had realized it was inevitable. He was the king’s scribe and he must meet with the seven heads of the guild of scribes. He had to speak with authority in front of master scribes all far older than himself.

He felt sick for a moment, so went to his satchel and withdrew the small, thick book Dori had given him when he first started his lessons. These were the rules set down by Durin the Deathless on how to take notes, how to set them formally to document history, how to file them and everything else to do with a scribe’s craft. Ori had learnt this book by heart by the time he was fifteen. He stroked the spine, the book fell open. Ori read.

“The First Duty of a Scribe is to Record the Truth of the Eyes and Ears as Given by Mahal.”

Ori’s stomach settled. He took a deep breath. He put the book back in his satchel. He intended to go right back out, but after a moment’s deliberation he stopped at Balin and Thorin’s office. The door was open and the king at his desk, idly turning in his hands a flat, wooden disk about the size of a dinner plate. It was painted silver with a blue, vaguely animalish figure at the center.

He looked up and smiled.
“Ori.”

“Thorin, do you have a moment?” Ori asked.

“Of course, Ori, come in and have a seat.”

He stepped into the office and pulled the door shut behind him. “What’s that?” Ori asked, still looking at the object Thorin was holding.

“Fili’s toy shield. I found it when I moved the couch from my old office.”

“Oh, so that’s … a dog? A horse?”

Thorin laughed.

“It’s supposed to be a lion.”

“Oh,” Ori smiled a little. “That explains all the points sticking out of its head. The lion of Erebor?”

“At the time he was more the lion cub of Erebor, but yes. What can I do for you?”

Ori took a breath.

“I need to ask your advice, and I need you to be honest.”

Thorin nodded, so Ori continued.

“I’m thinking about translating Queen Kivi’s book into westron.”

“I think that’s an excellent idea.”

“So do I, but that’s not why I need the advice. I need to know, should I move to Gondor before Dori finds out, or Rohan?”

Thorin laughed. Then his eyes got a far away look. “You miss Bilbo,” said Ori.

“I do. That certainly happened fast, like a tree growing overnight.”

“Maybe that’s just what happens with your One.”

Thorin looked wary.

“How can he be my One? Mahal would have to forge my other half. Trees and stones don’t exist in one being.”

“But they do,” said Ori. “Amber, remember? It’s the blood of trees turned to stone.”

Thorin’s eyebrows raised, but he processed this quickly and nodded.

“Perhaps. This doesn’t feel like a shallow attraction. It feels older, somehow. Well-established. I hope I’m not just making a fool of myself and everyone around me.”

“If one of us sees Bilbo doing something that would hurt you, or the kingdom, we would say something.”

“But would I listen? Am I already too far gone? What if he’s like the arkenst-“ “Thorin!” Ori cried, startled by the sharpness of his own voice.

It must have sounded sharp to Thorin as well. He looked very surprised.

Ori sighed. He couldn’t stop now. He’d as much as told the high king of the dwarrow to hush his royal mouth.

“Thorin,” Ori began again in a more civil tone, “I have been up close and personal with that horrid thing. I can assure you with my whole being that Bilbo Baggins is not an arkenstone.”

“And you would know. Of course,” said Thorin.

“I apologize for raising my voice to you, your majesty. I just don’t want to see you hurting yourself, or hurting Bilbo, for no reason.”

Thorin grinned.

“The office door is closed. We’re in private. I’m not anyone here except Thorin.”

“You still deserve respect.”

“Dwalin would just tell me to pull my head out of my arse,” said Thorin.

“But I’m sure he would respectfully tell you,” said Ori.

“No, he wouldn’t.”

“No, he wouldn’t,” Ori agreed.

“Where are you off to?” Thorin asked looking Ori over.

“I have a meeting with the heads of the scribe’s guild at second hour.”

Thorin leaned back in his chair, grinning.

“Have a fabulous time.”

Ori stuck out his tongue.

Ori headed out to the stable where Mokrah had Honda waiting. Kihshassa swooped down and landed on Ori’s back. She sorted herself out by laying her wings across his shoulders and down his arm while she clung to his tunic.

The Guild Hall of the Scribes was not far from the library. Like the library it was built into the wall of the mountain. There was little in the way of decoration. There was a square courtyard. Seven steps rose to a great door above with runes carved in ancient Khuzdul “Mahal’s Eyes Read Our Truth”.

He turned Honda into the courtyard and she trotted up to the steps. Kihshassa peered over his shoulder and squeaked a little. It was a plain enough courtyard but off to the side there was a small garden with a fountain and a circle of stone seats.

At the top of the steps, before the doors, paced a dwarrowdam. Her gray-sprinkled hair was piled high on top of her head and her beard was tightly braided into a straight line down to her waist. She looked to be in great agitation.

“Pardon me, I-“ Ori said, getting down from Honda.

The dwarrowdam whirled around. At sight of him, she paled and half screamed before she swallowed, scuttled down the steps and bowed low.

“Do I-” she started in a quavering voice. “Do I have the great honor of addressing Lord Ori of Fundin House?”

Ori stared. Kihshassa licked his ear and he gathered himself and bowed to her.

“Um…yes. Yes, I’m Ori. I’ve been requested to meet with the heads of the guild of scribes at second afternoon bell.”

The dwarrowdam bowed again.

“Yes! Yes, indeed, Lord Ori. Please allow me to escort you. We are so honored you’ve condescended to meet with us. So very kind and attentive of you.”

Ori didn’t know what to make of the dam.

“And you are, please?” he asked.

She stood still, mouth open

“Who am I?”

“Yes?” Ori wondered for a horrid moment if she was someone he should have known immediately.

“I’m….“ The dwarrowdam shook herself and bowed again deeply. “I am Podvu, daughter of Mayvu of the house of Vors. I achieved my mastery one hundred and thirty years ago and I have sat as a guild head for fifty years, my Lord Ori. It has always been my life and solemn oath to serve the House of Durin.” She bowed again.

Kihshassa squeaked politely.

Ori gulped. He could understand a little of her nervousness. If she was related to Vors, she probably imagined that her loyalty was suspect. Still, a master scribe of a hundred and eighty years and a head of the guild shouldn't act like this to him. He wasn't anyone to fear. Something was wrong here. Very wrong.

He recovered himself and smiled.

“I’m delighted and honored to meet you, Lady Podvu.”

He offered his arm. Lady Podvu stared at his hand like it was a strange object then slowly clasped his wrist. Ori felt terrible. She was trembling.

“Lady Podvu, please tell me what’s happened. What is upsetting you? Is it because I’m so young and -”

“Nonono, Lord Ori! We are very delighted you’ve decided to meet with us, please do come in and be welcome.”

She ushered him into the hall. Kihshassa snuggled a little more firmly into the back of his tunic.
The hall sat square in the stone and rose over about twenty levels. There was this reception area and a door off to the right, but otherwise the one, great room was dominated by a huge staircase with wrought iron railings that went up and up. Every wall, floor and ceiling, every stair tread and riser, everywhere Ori looked, was covered in large squares of white and black marble, like a draughts board. There was no other ornamentation.

Kihshassa wiggled and gave a slight squeak.

Ori looked about. It made him a little dizzy. He decided this was the ugliest place he’d ever seen. A dirty hen coop had more color to it.

Lady Podvu twisted her hands together, knuckles white.

“It’s hideous, isn’t it,” she barked, her voice almost broke. “It was redone by Lord Sikar forty years ago. Before that it was built and blessed by Durin III and his queen. It was turquoise and blue topaz with gildings of labradorite and fulgurite, but Sikar said black and white was the way of the scribe. Things are either black or white. The word of the king or not.”

“That’s stupid,” Ori said before he thought.

Kihshassa clicked her teeth in a worried way.

The words of his book came back to him. “‘The first duty of a scribe is to record the truth of the eyes and ears as given by Mahal’.”

Lady Podvu turned and gazed upon him with the most beautiful smile and shining eyes.

“You know,” she whispered. “You remember. But how can you?”

“What?” Ori asked, confused.

Kihshassa licked his ear and made a chit noise.

Lady Podvu opened the black door nearby and ushered him in with a cry of, “He has come!”

Ori looked around, expecting to find Thorin had somehow arrived, but he was quite alone. He turned back around.

The room was also black and white marble. Before a table stood two dwarrow and three dwarrowdams. They all looked to be of the age of Lady Podvu except for one of the dams who was gray to the point of silver and her face was deeply lined.

She stared at Ori with a look of almost utter hopelessness.

The two dwarf males looked rather alike and their hoods matched and another dwarrowdam stood beside them. They seemed even more nervous than Lady Podvu. The final dwarrowdam stood slightly away in her own pool of despair.

Ori caught himself and bowed.

“Good afternoon. I am Ori of Fundin House, at your service.”

Kihshassa squeaked loudly and bobbed her head against Ori’s ear.
All the guild heads bowed very low. Lady Podvu hurried forward and presented him to the first master on the right.

“Lord Ori, this is Kacuho, son of Grouho. He achieved his mastery one hundred years ago and has sat as a guild head for twenty years.”

Kacuho bowed deeply again. He was a slender dwarf with light brown hair twisted neatly under a cap that reminded Ori of the one he’d had to wear to Thror’s funeral. His nose was round with a bump on the bridge. He was clothed plainly in maroon.

“At your service, Lord Ori,” he murmured in a soft, high voice.

Lady Podvu gestured the despairing dam over.

“Lord Ori, this is Ubqim, daughter of Mugwim. She achieved her mastery one hundred and fifteen years ago and has sat as a guild head for ten years.”

Ubqim bowed deeply, too, but couldn’t bring herself to raise her eyes to Ori. Her ‘at your service’ was mostly a moan. Her scribes braids in her mousey hair were bound with pale green thread but the rest was loose and looked rather like Gimli’s when he woke up. She was dressed in pale green robes that had scalloped edges everywhere they could possibly be put. Although she was perfectly dry, Ori thought she looked like she had been caught in a rainstorm.

“Lord Ori, this is Rouho, son of Grouho, Kacuho’s older brother. He achieved his mastery one hundred and fifty years ago and has sat as a guild head for seventy years.”

Rouho regarded Ori through spectacles that looked as though they had been cut from the bottoms of wine bottles. They were even slightly green. His dark brown beard was sprinkled with gray and bound similarly to Lady Podvu’s. He wore brown, which suited him. He was as bald as Master Brur except for a few threads on the left side of his head which he had carefully combed to cover the rest of his head very thinly.

“Lord Ori, this is Nodun, daughter of Brodun. She achieved her mastery one hundred and five years ago and has sat as a guild head for twenty-two years.”

Nodun peered at Ori. A tremulous smile came to her gray eyes. Ori automatically smiled back. She nodded at him, looking pleased. She was plump and wore a becoming shade of turquoise. Her hair and beard were fashionably styled with beads of fulgurite.

They finally came to the elderly dam. Ori saw she stood with the aid of a carved cane of labradorite. She didn’t wait for Lady Podvu’s introduction but bowed stiffly, denoting back trouble, and said immediately,

“Ori…Ori… You are the one of the Brothers Ri of Rikmha?”

“Yes, “ Ori told her. “I’m now married to Captain Dwalin of Fundin House.”

“You did your apprenticeship and journeyman under Khujik?”

“Yes!” Ori said happily. “I enjoyed training with Master Khujik. How do you know of him, Master…er…?” Ori realized they had not been introduced.

She bowed again.

“I am Jansad. Mistress Dazla is my great grand niece. I’m the only one left of my house, so I am
“I’m honored to make your acquaintance, Master Jansad.”

“Khujik was my last apprentice. I’m glad you enjoyed your time with him.”

Ori yanked his jaw off the floor.

“But… but he never mentioned you! He never spoke of it! Why did he—“

“He refused to follow the new scrivening laws put in force and was turned out of the mountain. Thus, neither of us were allowed to speak of one another.”

“Mahal!” Ori gasped. “That’s terrible!”

Jansad snorted and looked about her.

“Part of me wishes I’d gone with him. Don’t look at me like that, Podvu. Lord Ori, I am Jansad, I achieved my mastery two hundred years ago and have sat as a guild head for ninety years.”

“I’m honored, Master Jansad.” Ori put out his arm. Jansad snickered and clasped his wrist in a surprisingly strong grip.

“I like you.” she stated. “My friends call me Sadi, so you will, too.”

“Of course, Master Sadi. Mine call me Ori.”

“Shall we be seated?” Lady Podvu suggested.

The look on her face told Ori she not only hated the hallway but the entire place.

“Perhaps,” he said hurriedly, “we will all talk and think more easily in the informal setting. You have a pleasant seating area in the front garden. It looks to be…er… soothing.”

There was a communal sigh of pleasure and Lady Podvu led the way out. Master Sadi took the arm Ori offered her and hobbled gamely at his side until he assisted her to a stone seat near the fountain. Sadi patted a stone seat beside her and Ori sat. Kihshassa clambered down and nibbled at the flower buds on a shrub nearby.

The other set themselves about and looked at him expectantly.

“Lady Podvu,” he began casually as he thought it would be for the best.

“Yes, milord?”

“You said earlier that I ‘remembered’. What did you mean?”

“You remember Durin’s first book of scrivening ‘Elements of Scrivening’ by Durin the Deathless’ first two royal scribes, S’tuk son of Dutuk and Whilf daughter of Nililf.”

“Well, of course,” Ori said in surprise. “My eldest brother Dori gave me his copy which he brought from Ered Luin. I knew it by heart before I was twenty! If any of you wish to test me, I will be happily to answer.” He smiled, eager to be questioned by these masters. He could recite that book in his sleep.

Sadi sighed.
“Laddie… Ori. You’re too young to remember, and if your brother was in Ered Luin, he would not have known. That book was declared unfit for scrivening by order of the First Chair of the Guild of Scribes which came down from King Thror.”

“What?” Ori squawked. “It was ordered and approved by Durin. It was the manual and style guide for khuzdul. Ancient khuzdul! Our language is our birthright!”

Ori needed to move and, without a thought to the heads of the guild, flew to his feet and paced about before them.

“Khuzdul is our birthright and I also believe that it must be shared. How else can other races understand us if they don’t experience our language?

“Food and clothing and trinkets are all very well. Khuzdul is our literature, it’s our poetry. It’s who we are. We are made by Mahal. He is proud of us and we of him. We honor him by using the language he created for us. We write to express the truth Mahal gave us. It’s like the decorations that used to be in the Guild Hall. It was made and decorated with the stones that stood for truth and communication.

“Blue Topaz reminds us that the best discussions are had without the heat of anger. It’s clearness and quality dissipates any anger. Turquoise is the very truth of the stones themselves. Labradorite is the dark deep color of strength that brings order out of chaos. Fulgurite is made by the lightning striking the sands creating beauty; the communication of Mahal to us. The shining truth of Mahal.

“Black and white marble is used for kitchens and hallways as they show where to clean. It’s to do with storage and food not writing.”

Ori paused for a breath to find he was wearing a path on the soft moss and his arms tingled from waving them around.

His brain grabbed at the obvious. He snatched up his satchel and scribbled a note to Thorin.

Thorin,

Things are in a horrible state at the Guild Hall of Scribes. I’m sorry to write in this way but I’m so angry I can’t think straight. I need your advice as soon as you’d care to give it.

-Ori

Ori turned and Kihshassa sat up. He folded the note quickly and Kihshassa snatched it in her teeth. Ori lifted her up.

“Take it to Thorin as quick as you can,” he whispered then tossed Kihshassa high. Suddenly aloft, the fruit bat spread her wings, swooped, and was gone in a moment.

He went back to pacing. The hall needed to be put back to the way it had been under Durin. At the moment Ori was so angry he wanted to have a lava tube opened and turn the whole thing to slag and ash. He remembered well Lord Sikar and his slimy ways. Good thing the little bastard had thrown in his lot with Frerin. Ori knew that if Sikar was still around Ori would be at his house and punching him in the nose right now.

Ori forced his brain into the things that could be done. Tearing the horrid black and white out would be easily achieved. Talk to the construction guild, order the work. With what he made as Thorin’s scribe and working at the library he could probably cover that now. The rest he thought he could pay by increments. He stopped his brain. Thorin’s permission was first. He would ask Balin and Dori about getting the materials to put the guild back in order. Dori could haggle a better than any Ori knew. Of the four scrivening stones, fulgurite was the hardest to get, but they would have to find significant amounts of turquoise and the other stones as well. The other things, like the examples of writing of all members and the heads of the guild could be gathered. He wracked his brain to try and remember everything Khujik had told him about what the guild hall looked like.

“What happened to all the original interior furnishings?” Ori heard himself ask.

“It’s all in my brother’s cellar,” Lady Podvu said faintly.

Ori looked at her and she quailed a little.

“Why?” he asked.

“Well, you see, Lord Ori,” began Kacuho, “Lord Sikar ordered the reconstruction and Lord Vors offered his workers to do it.”

Ori rolled his eyes.

“Exactly,” Kacuho agreed. “However, the head of the project was Lady Podvu’s brother.”

“Yes,” Lady Podvu continued. “He knew how I felt about it and everything was removed very carefully. Pity to spoil good craftsmanship he said and together we contrived to smuggle it all away into his big cellar.”

“Well, at least it’s not all lost,” Ori nodded. “Master Sadi, what can we do about the manual?”

Sadi shook her head sadly.

“Every copy in the place was tossed to the forges.”

“What?” Ori almost screamed this time. “You must be joking, they cannot have done that! It’s wrong! It’s morally repugnant! That was-”

Ori couldn’t find the words he wanted at this point. Anger was seething in his brain and he wanted to hit something. He wanted to hit a lot of things.

“Mahal! It’s the king!” cried Nodun.

“What?” Ori snapped and turned on his heel to glare in the direction she was pointing.

Ori was greeted with the sight of a squad of guards led by his husband, with Thorin and Balin all in the courtyard getting off their ponies.

Ori made a bee-line for Thorin.

“Thor- Your majesty I have to take Honda and borrow Dwalin’s axes and go to Belegost. I’m going to find Sikar and chop him into pieces and then chop those pieces into smaller pieces and then chop them again until there’s hardly anything left and then I’ll…I’ll piss all over them! And then.."
and then I’m going to set them all on fire!”

Ori panted for breath. He could hardly see through the red fog in front of his eyes. His breath came back and he felt himself cool as Dwalin’s arms came about him.

“I hate Sikar!” he shouted. “I hate him!”

Thorin blinked and gently laid his hand on Ori’s shoulder.

“It’s alright, Ori. Tell me what’s happened and we will make it right.”

Ori puffed his breath and felt himself settle. Dwalin kissed his cheek.

“ ‘M here, love.”

Ori took a deep breath and turned in Dwalin’s arms and put his face into Dwalin’s beard.

“I’m sorry,” he mumbled.

“Don’t be,” said Thorin gently and turned Ori to face him again. “Now, what’s happened? You came here to meet with the heads of the guild, yes?”

Ori straightened himself.

“Yes, yes I did- Oh, hello,” he said as Kihshassa landed in his arms.

He put her across his shoulders again and looked over to where the heads of the guild stood in a line and Sadi was hobbling her way over to them. Ori got his wits back and brought Thorin over to meet them.

“You majesty, this is-“

“Master Jansad,” Thorin put in. “It’s wonderful to see you again after so long. You look well.”

“Shite, I look like an old hag and I am one, too, thank you very much. I do like this Lord Ori of yours, your majesty.”

“Thank you,” Thorin said and cocked his head at Ori. “We like him, too.”

Ori was calm enough now to remember his manners and politely introduced the other heads of the guild to the king. Lady Podvu looked terrified but Thorin spoke to her kindly and after she swore her oath of loyalty to him almost three times, he assured her that he accepted it and would not send her to Beleghost. She had shown her loyalty by preserving the old building materials.

This completed, Ori went to the next problem.

“Thor-your majesty, Sikar gave it as an order of King Thror that the original manual was not to be used anymore and had all the copies burned.”

“The manual?” Thorin asked politely.

“Yes,” Ori said vehemently, “the S’tuk and Whilf.”

Thorin looked at Balin, who closed his eyes, shaking his head.
“Elements of Scrivening from Durin’s time,” Balin explained. “I’d’ve kept me own copy if I hadn’ lost it when I was in Ered Luin.”

“You lost it in Ered Luin?” Ori asked.

At Balin’s surprised nod, Ori groaned and went to his satchel. He pulled out his manual and handed it to Balin.

“Is this it?”

Balin took the book and leafed through, staring.

“Aye, it is! This is me own copy!” Balin grinned joyously at him. “Laddie, how came yeh by this?”

“When you met Dori there, was Nori around?” Ori asked.

Balin stared and shook his head.

“I was given it as a name day gift by Dori,” Ori told him. “When I started writing and made my first poem. I was five.” Ori explained.

Behind him, Ori heard Dwalin palming his face. Thorin and Balin looked at each other, then burst out laughing.

“Nori pinched it from you?” Thorin suggested.

“Nay, laddie. I think me One pinched it. An’ me while at it. Cunnin’ little minx. I’ll have t’ have a wee chat with me beloved when I get home.”

“I’m sorry, Balin, I don’t mean to make trouble for you both, but-“

Balin interrupted, patting Ori’s shoulder. “It’s all f’r th’ bes’, wee brother. It might have been lost f’r good. Yeh mind?” Balin raised an eyebrow at Ori and handed the book to Sadi.

“You’ll have it copied again?” Ori asked her.

Sadi smiled down at the book in her gnarled fingers, her eyes moist.

“I’ll copy the first myself,” she promised softly. “After that the scribes can begin to make others. You’ve brought us a treasured gift, Lord Ori.”

Embarrassed, Ori immediately insisted Thorin inspect the guild hall. Thorin went in.

“Mahal’s hairy balls and arse!” he exploded. “What in all of Arda is this supposed to represent? It looks like an upside-down coat closet!”

Thorin’s voice rose at each demand, but Ori realized that, though angered by the situation, Thorin was making a racket for a reason. On every floor of the hall, doors popped open and scribes of all levels peered out over the railings to see what was going on.

“I’ve met orcs with better taste in decor than this!” Thorin boomed out. “Where are all the samples of the guild heads’ handwritings? Where are the plaques with all the master scribes’ names?”

Thorin turned to Ori, who realized all the head guild members were standing behind him. Thorin said with kingly authority,

“After the coronation ceremonies, Lord Ori, you will see the scribes move themselves to the old royal residence. There they will do their work until this—this travesty of a building can be made to look like a guild hall for scribes once more. I’m sure Lady Podvu and her brother will ably assist you in all the arrangements. Lord Balin will transfer payments for the royal coffers. See to it, Lord Ori.”

Thorin turned on his heel and went out. Ori gasped and all the guild heads behind him gasped, too. As soon as the king had left the building, the talking, shouting, and cheering began throughout. Ori went out, the guild heads on his heels.

“Thank you, your majesty,” he said.

Thorin smiled and turned to him. Ori bowed and the guild heads bowed, too.

“And now,” Thorin said. “I’m sure you will find excellent stone masons both here in the mountain and in Dale to help you with all the work that needs done. I recommend adding to the decor sodalite for clear thinking and some new jade for healing. Is there anything else, you need my assistance with, Lord Ori?”

Thorin asked gravely but with a twinkle in his eyes. Ori swallowed a smile and turned to look at the guild heads.

“Is there anything else?” he asked them honestly.

They all shook their heads. Sadi was grinning and the rest stared at him in wonder.

“I believe we’re all set, your majesty,” said Ori. “Thank you for coming so speedily. I hope we didn’t interrupt anything important.”

“Not at all,” Thorin said, obviously trying not to laugh. “I was quite at leisure.”

As the king’s party rode away, Sadi turned to Ori with a wry grin.

“So, laddie, I suppose you shit diamonds, too.”

“What? I just sent a note to the king. He’s the one who shi— I mean, he’s the one who set things to right.”

Sadi snickered. Rouho removed his spectacles and cleaned them with a large handkerchief. He was fighting a smile.

“Amazing, “ he commented, “just amazing. In all my life I have never seen a king deign to visit the scribes’ hall.”

“King Thorin came here once before when he was—” Ubqim started.

“He was a prince and he came with Lord Balin,” Master Sadi corrected. “Prince Thrain was with him. Neither were kings.”

“True,” Ubqim agreed, her eyes went far away. “Prince Thrain was so handsome, such a charming, well-spoken dwarf.”

Lady Podvu frowned.
“And Princess Freris so lovely, you remember Ubqim? His wife!” Lady Podvu’s tone bordered on the scathing. Ubqim was lost in her happy remembrance of a handsome prince and Podvu huffed.

“Perhaps Lord Ori,” began Nodun, “We should consult with Lady Podvu’s brother, Pahvu, about the reconstruction of the guild hall?”

“Yes, please,” Ori said immediately. “And be sure to tell him the king suggested the stone masons from Dale to be included in the project. You should probably begin preparing to move to the old royal residence for the interim.”

“It shall be seen to it at once, Lord Ori,” chorused the two brothers bowing.

“Things should continue as best as possible during this time, “ Ori pondered aloud. “Are Lord Balin’s assistants part of the guild?”

“I-I’m not acquainted with Lord Balin’s assistants,” Lady Podvu put in.

Ori, thought back on the invitation-writing ‘party’ as Master Brur had called it.

“There was myself, Buj, Omibur, Lolibur, Pafwi, Cypah, Naliu, Fuilan, Anbde and Vibr, “ Ori said slowly bringing all the names to mind.

“Ah,” said Kacuho. “Naliu and Fuilan began as apprentice scribes and then went to the library. They must have transferred from there to Lord Balin’s service. Vibr, I believe came with Lord Balin on his lordship’s return from Ered Luin. I have not met the others.”

“Loli, Omi and Buj work with me at the library,” Ori explained. “Pafwi and Cypah were sent from the Iron Hills to do their journeyman with Lord Balin. Anbde started under the accountancy and banking guild then transferred to Balin’ service.”

“That explains it,” Sadi said.

“Tell me, “ Ori said, an idea forming in his brain. “What duties do each of you as heads of the guild perform?”

Sadi shrugged. “We used to be the scribes to the king but once Sikar was in the first chair of the guild, we weren’t really needed he said. We teach and make sure the guild runs well. But that only require about two or three of us.”

“Who is first chair now?” Ori asked quickly. He presumed it was either Podvu or Sadi but he had to make sure.

“We don’t have one.” Sadi snapped. “Sikar was the first chair. He made no provision. The first we learned of his so-called retirement was when Nodun saw him leaving with Frerin, may that nasty piece of work rot. Besides, you are the king’s scribe now so that makes you the first chair. Am I right?”

Sadi grinned at her fellow heads. They all smiled and nodded.

Lady Podvu bowed with a flourish. “What are your commands, First Chair?”

Ori stared at these smiling dwarrow, put his jaw back in his face and gasped.

“I can’t! I’ve not achieved my mastery!”
“You’re good enough for the king,” Rouho pointed out, “thus you are obviously good enough for us.”

Ori sputtered a moment then blushed.

“Well, I-I really don’t know how things run, but if you are all quite sure this is what you want I... I shall rely on your advice.”

“Excellent,” Sadi beamed at him. “Perhaps Kacuho should summon the guild members?”

“Certainly.” Ori felt rather out of his depth but thought that this feeling was pretty much the order of his life now.

Kacuho went purposely to the fountain and lifted the sculpture in the middle out. This he opened in half and removed a beautiful silver horn, engraved all over in ancient khuzdul.

Kacuho brought it to Ori. Ori took it and admired it. The writing was the poem of Durin the Deathless calling all dwarrow to learn the language Mahal had given them. Ori handed it back to Kacuho.

“It’s beautiful,” he said honestly.

“Yes, indeed,” murmured Ubqim. “As it is the call to language, it is known as the Bugle of Mahal.”

Ori choked violently and ended with a fit of coughing. He turned his face away. All he could think about was being in bed with Dwalin and Dwalin offering to “blow the bugle of Mahal”.

Rouho, Nodun, and Kacuho started laughing, Lady Podvu turned scarlet, and Master Sadi cackled.

“Yes, Lord Ori, we all know the joke.”

Ubqim blinked and looked confused.

“What joke?”

“It’s your favorite quill to tickle yourself with,” Nodun told her.

“Shut up!” Ubqim yipped. “I have no idea what you’re talking about. I’m craft-wed!”

“Yes, dear,” Lady Podvu comforted. “If you please, Kacuho.”

Kacuho blew the bugle. It made a high clarion call. Silence fell then there was a rumble of feet and all the guild members poured out of the doorway to gather on the steps.

“Scribes, Lady Podvu announced in a ringing tone. “We have the great delight and honor to introduce Lord Ori.”

There was a cheer.

“Let me finish,” snapped Lady Podvu. The crowd settled again but most were grinning. Ori felt himself redden a little.

“Introduce Lord Ori of Fundin House and Scribe to King Thorin presumptive as the new First Chair of the-”
The cheering and yelling drowned out the rest of her introduction. The scribes roared down the steps and Ori was surrounded with them. He was congratulated and patted on the shoulder and generally exclaimed over by all. He tried desperately to remember names and faces but it was such a jumble he couldn’t manage. This went on for a bit then Sadi called them all to order.

Lady Podvu outlined the plans of renovation to them and instructed them to prepare for the move to the old royal quarters. This brought squeals and cheers of delight. Lady Podvu stepped back and looked at Ori. Ori swallowed.

“I’d like to thank all of you for your forbearance during this time of- “ Ori paused, made himself not cuss out Sikar and continued. “Time of great difficulty. I know the move will upset routines and other duties but I’m quite sure you will all do your best.”

There was another cheer and Lady Podvu bowed to Ori and made a shooing motion with her hands. The teachers and older scribes herded the others all back inside, all talking about what had to be done, how wonderful it was that Sikar was gone and how much fun they’d all have at the old royal residence.

Ori turned to his fellow guild heads and remembered his previous idea.

“Which of you enjoy teaching and running the guild administrative duties most?”

“Podvu,” Sadi said immediately. The lady nodded with a small smile.

“Yes,” agreed Rouho agreed. “I’ve been head of the teaching staff since my mastery was achieved. Ubqim teaches poetry, musical composition and calligraphy.”

“Good,” Ori said, delighted his plan would work. “Lady Podvu you are in charge of administration. Master Rouho you will continue as head of the teaching staff and Master Ubqim will assist you with her side of the teaching.”

“Excellent,” Rouho smiled and took the bugle back from his brother.

“Poetry is the true language of Mahal and is the voice of my soul,” murmured Ubqim. Ori took this as her assent. He turned to the other three.

“The king presumptive has told me that I must gather a team of scribes to serve the king. I have three others from the library of whom I told you earlier. Master Sadi, will you and Master Kacuho and Master Nodun work on my staff along with your usual duties here at the guild?”

Nodun and Kacuho both squealed in delight and hugged each other. Sadi beamed at him with tears in her eyes.

“Thank you, Lord Ori we will do so and happily.”

“Good,” Ori said grinning back. “We should all meet again soon so I may present you as scribes to King Thorin and Lord Balin. I shall ask Tho-King Thorin what time would be best for him and will send a message to you as soon as I know.”

Rouho gave the bugle to Ubqim so he could hug and knock heads with his brother. Ubqim stroked he bugle, smiling over the writing.

“We will all be here, Lord Ori,” Nodun assured him. “We look forward to hearing from you!”
There was a yell from Rouho as it appeared that Ubqim was set on making off with the bugle.  Nodun went to assist and there was quite a tussle until Rouho managed to snatch the bugle away from Ubqim while Nodun sat on her. Ori forced himself not to laugh and turned back to Podvu, Sadi, and Kacuho. Kacuho was snickering. Lady Podvu was horrified. Sadi just grinned at Ori.

“Ah” Sadi gloated, “to be scribe to the king at his side as Durin the Deathless insisted his scribes be, instead of just copying notes a cheese monger told us were the laws.”

Ori chuckled remembering what Thorin had told Bofur.

“Sikar’s father was a cheese monger,” Master Sadi told him.

“I know, “ Ori said blithely, before he thought about it. “He used to prop his feet up on the table and pick his teeth with his fingernail during meetings. He was ennobled because he promised King Thror free cheese for life.”

“Why am I not surprised,” Sadi replied flatly. “I swear that dwarf was constipated for at least fifty years.”

Ori swallowed a giggle, adjusted Kihshassa on his back, and turned to Podvu. “Is there anything else I need to be doing here now?”

Padvu smiled serenely.

“We are about to prepare to follow yours and King Thorin’s orders, Lord Ori. Lord Rouho and I shall move forward and perhaps in three days you would be kind enough to stop by and see what we have done and if it is to your satisfaction.”

“I’m sure it will be,” Ori replied. He went to Honda. Nodun went to Honda’s head to hold the reigns and Kacuho offered Ori a hand up to mount. Ori settled himself, took the reigns and turned Honda.

“Thank you all,” he said. The heads of the guide stood to see him off. He rode out the gate and turned and waved. The guild heads were bowing but they all smiled and waved back.

Ori turned and saw the end of the part of town where he had visited Master Vobwi’s emporium so long ago and had brought home Kihshassa, Assault Battery and Brandy. A stab of guilty caught him. He had promised to return and pay for Kihshassa if she had prospered. And that was weeks ago! He urged Honda to a trot.

Not too long after, Ori slowed Honda to a walk. Kihshassa clicked in his ear.

“We’re only going to show Master Vobwi how well you are,” he told the fruit bat. Kihshassa wiggled again and licked his ear.

Outside the Animal Emporium, Ori dismounted, looped Honda’s reigns over the rail and went in.

“Master Vobwi?” he called out.

The proprietor came out of the back and his eyes lit up at sight of Ori.

“Welcome, young dwarf. How do your kittens fare? Did they enjoy their toys?”

“Very much thank you,” Ori grinned. “I’m very sorry I didn’t return sooner but things have been rather busy. I thought you’d like to see Kihshassa.”

Master Vobwi looked curious and Kihshassa hopped from Ori’s back to the counter and chirped at Master Vobwi. Master Vobwi stared at Kihshassa.

“Young master, is this…Is this the same fruit bat I gave you?”

“Yes, she is.” Ori said, happily. “She adopted my kittens right away and the badger, too. I’ve found she is very fond of raspberries.”

Master Vobwi looked Kihshassa over and scratched behind her ears.

“Great Mahal, young master, I’ve never seen a finer looking fruit bat in my life. She looks wonderful. She’s positively fat and glossy. I’m quite startled. If you hadn’t told me and brought her, I wouldn’t have believed it. Marvelous!”

“So how much do I owe you?” Ori asked.

“Owe me?” Master Vobwi asked in a puzzled way.

“You said, “ Ori went on, “You told me if Kihshassa and my kittens took to each other and prospered, I would come back and we would talk gold.”

Vobwi polished his spectacles a moment.

“Don’t really want t’ charge yeh, lad. I didn’t think she’d last a day after yeh took her.”

“But-“

“Tell yeh what lad. If yeh’ll allow me t’ stop by and see yer kittens and th’ wee badger, we’ll call it even.”

“Are you sure?” Ori asked. This seemed such an odd request.

“Aye. I can barely believe this’s the same bat. I need t’ see her circumstances.”

Ori laughed.

“Alright, do stop by. I’ll let my family know as I cannot guarantee I’ll be at home. I’m a scribe and do a lot of running about.”

“I look forward t’ see yer family, lad.” Master Vobwi helped Kihshassa back on to Ori and followed him out to Honda. Ori swung up and grinned.

“Thank you for your patience, Master Vobwi.”

Master Vobwi, grinned, “An’ thank yeh, lad. Where will I be findin’ yer home?”

“Fundin House in the royal cavern,” Ori said and road away.

As he passed the Scribes Guild hall again there were lights in every window and he could see people rushing about inside. He smiled. He hoped they were all happy. The weight of all that had happened surged back into his brain and he felt very tired. Honda seemed to sense his need to be home and cantered the rest of the way.
Ori, exhausted and still shocked, dragged himself through the door of the sitting room at Fundin House. As it was the end of the day, the sitting room was full. Everyone was home, and Jim and his troupe were there as well, Jim and his daughter juggling precious Fundin heirlooms back and forth over the sofa from across the room.

“There’s th’ conquerin’ hero,” said Dwalin.

He ducked a ceremonial dagger as he met Ori halfway across the floor and Ori sunk against him with his face in Dwalin’s beard.

“Love?”

“I’m the first chair of the scribe’s guild,” said Ori.

Dwalin took him by the shoulders and pushed him back gently.

“What’?” he asked.

“The heads of the scribes’ guild decided I’m the new first chair of the guild.”

Dori and Binni came from the kitchen with platters and tureens full of dinner.

“What’s this, Dori’s Ori?” Dori asked.

“Are you alright, pet? Come and eat, you must be ready to eat a warg. No offense.”

Biscuit raised a brow at him, but didn’t otherwise budge from his spot on the hearthrug which he was amicably sharing with Chopper and the rest of the household animals.

“I’m the new first chair of the scribe’s guild,” said Ori.

Dori shrieked. Dain raced over and seized Ori off his feet and even Nori looked well satisfied.

“Yep, I knew it,” Nori drawled.

“It’s a mistake!” Ori wailed. “They only want me to be the head of the guild because they think Thorin will save me when I scream.”

“You don’t scream all that much,” said Thorin, sitting at the table. “Congratulations, Ori.”

Ori, aware he was still dangling off the floor, groaned.

“I’m so proud o’ yeh!” Dain bellowed in his ear. “Knew yeh had it in yeh!”

And now, to add to Ori’s troubles, he was deaf in one ear.

“Thorin,” Ori called, hoping this would get Dain to put him down. It half worked. Dain gamely carried him over and plopped him on his feet, clasped his shoulders and went back to the the kitchen doorway to tease his wife.

Thorin pulled out the chair next to him and Ori flopped into it.

“Well done,” Thorin said to him quietly.

“Thank you,” Ori replied. “Thorin I may have overstepped.”

“In what way?” Thorin asked, appearing amused
Ori sighed and told of all his arrangements with the guild heads.

“Excellent,” Thorin said simply. “Jansad is a legend. She assisted with Balin’s training, I had hoped at one point she would be one of my tutors but Thror wouldn’t have it. Nodun, I hadn’t met but her father Brodun was the senior editor of Vug magazine. She took over after his death and now her daughter runs it. She is an amazing artist.”

“So, I should introduce her to Dipfa?” Ori asked. Thorin laughed.

“Why not. It might be fun to watch.”

Ori looked at Thorin’s smile and said archly.

“Bilbo is a terrible influence on you.”

“Yes,” Thorin nodded then turned, his smile now a grin. “But Mahal seems to approve, so what are we to do?”

Ori giggled and went on.

“What do you know about Kacuho?”

“I saw Rouho more than his younger brother. Grouho came from a long line of weavers. Their family is responsible for all the arrases throughout all royal residences.”

“But now both brothers are scribes,” Ori said thoughtfully.

“Yes, but their younger cousin Laliho, has taken over the family craft. They call her sister as her parents died in the battle of Khazad-dûm and she was adopted by Grouho and his wife Moila daughter of Doila, who runs the great kitchens. The brother were very loyal to Thrain or at least my mother.”

“Would you be willing to meet my er… team of scribes?” Ori asked a little shyly.

“Of course,” Thorin nodded. Tomorrow morning?”

“What time?” Ori asked.

“Tenth morning horn volley?”

“Thank you, “ Ori said eagerly, “I’ll write notes to-“

Thorin looked around, as if on cue Roäc flew in and landed in front of Thorin’s plate. Thorin offered him a sausage which the raven devoured in three gulps.

“Roäc, would you please go and tell Master Jansad, Master Kacuho, and Master Nodun of the Scribes Guild that they are to present themselves at Fundin House tomorrow at the tenth morning volley.”

Roäc cocked his eye at Thorin.

“There’ll be two sausages when you come back.”

“Tenth morning volley,” Roäc smirked and flew off.

“And you’d better have delivered that letter,” Thorin muttered.
Ori, after considering, asked anyway.

“Ubqim is a little er… strange. Do you know her?”

Thorin frowned.

“Ubqim is daughter of Mugwim,” Ori suggested.

Thorin thought for a few seconds then shook his head. “I’m sure I’ve heard the name but can’t place it. Do you think she will be problematic?”

“No…no, she’s just,” Ori searched for a good word then, “Drifty. She teaches poetry, musical composition and calligraphy.”

“That Ubqim?” Thorin choked. “She’s a guild head?”

“Yes,” Ori began but Thorin threw back his head and roared with laughter.

“What’s so funny?” Dis asked as she sat down opposite Thorin. Dori began to serve out the sausages. Ori helped himself to steamed mushrooms.

Thorin recovered and managed,

“Mistress Ubqim is one of the scribe’s guild heads.”

“Ubqim?” Dain barked. “She’s got jelly f’r brains an’s daft as a rooster in a rainstorm!”

“Ubqim,” Thorin said looking at Ori, “in her youth was considered one of the most interesting of the young dams presented at court. She didn’t dance so much as strike poses. She would be found singing songs to whatever object she might find in a room and at a royal ball fell completely and utterly in love with my father.”

“Oh dear.” Ori said. “That sounds more that just awkward.”

“What?” Fili and Kili shouted.

“It was extremely awkward as the ball was in honor of the birth of Dis. At the sound of the music starting, Ubqim rushed into the middle of the room, performed the most interesting gyrations, then flung herself to the floor before the dais and declared her undying love for my father,” Thorin explained.

Fortunately, she was snatched up by family and declared extremely drunk. This was upheld by everyone including Ubqim, who wrote a charming letter of apology to my mother for being so intoxicated on such a special occasion and vowed never to allow alcohol to touch her lips again. She complimented King Thror on having a son who so impaired her inner poetical turn as to make her mistake him for Durin the Deathless, and then she announced herself craft-wed.”

“It were quite a scene f’r a few days,” Balin agreed.

“I wonder,” said Jim idly. ‘There’s a comic play, supposedly based on a maiden who fell in love with some southern prince and acted very like how you describe this Ubqim, except she went and locked herself in a tower.

“She cut off all her hair and threw it out the top of the tower’s one window. The hair watered by her tears grew into a huge bramble forest. She stayed there the rest of her life. Many handsome young swains tried to find and rescue her from her tower but they all got caught in the briars and “That’s a comedy?” Jani asked.

“Yes, because she was rescued by a young handsome pig herder. He got through because his devoted pigs ate the briars. They then got to the tower and he went through all kinds of things to try and climb the tower. He eventually did so by persuading his pigs to stand on each others’ backs so he could climb up. When he got there he found the lady, now old and fat. They had a discussion and while they did, the pigs leaned against the tower. The tower was very old and fell down. The herder and the lady were saved because the pile of pigs stood firm and they climbed down the pigs and went home where he told everyone in his village she was his long lost aunt and they lived quite happily ever after. He married and had a family and she wrote poetry about the brave pigs.”

Everyone laughed. Dain drained his tankard and regarded Jim.

“Tell me, laddie how in Mahal’s name di’ yeh perform tha’?”

Jim laughed.

“Carefully, your majesty, very carefully.”

“Tell us!” Kili demanded.

“Please tell us, Jim dear.” Dori added refilling the man’s drink.

“Thank you, Bearer. Very well, we have a prop we put together as a tower. It’s about eight feet tall. The day before we perform one or other of us goes down to the pub and picks out ten able bodied people to dress in our pig costumes. The way the pig tower works is having six people on all fours then four people on all fours on their shoulders, then two on top of them then one pig on top to assist the herder and the lady.”

“That sounds ridiculous!” Gloin guffawed.

“It is,” Jim assured him. “That’s part of the comedy. The volunteer ‘pigs’ are often drunk and the pile frequently falls over while being built and they try all different ways of building something to reach the window with a great deal of silly piles of people all over the stage.”

“Will you be performing this play at the coronation?” Fili asked.

“If the story is based on Ubqim’s behavior,” Thorin said, “Probably not, but if you would be so kind as to give a private performance, I’m sure you’d have plenty of volunteers to be pigs.”

There was a loud ‘oink’ from Chopper.

“Aye, laddie, aye, if we ge’ a performance, yeh kin be in it,” Dain promised lovingly.
Regalia, Royalty, and Ribaldry.

Chapter by Stevie Foxx

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Wardrobe time and people are starting to arrive! Which thrusts the burning question upon your loyal authors! What should they have for breakfast? Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrows time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori snuggled into Dwalin’s back and sighed. The bed at the inn was huge and nice but this was his and Dwalin’s bed. He kissed the skin his cheek was pressed against. Dwalin rumbled in his sleep. Ori sighed happily. Dwalin was his One. He was happily married to his One. Nori and Dori were with their Ones and they were all happy and comfortable. Ori kissed Dwalin’s back again and slid an arm around Dwalin’s waist. He tangled his fingers in Dwalin’s belly fur. Dwalin chuckled and his hand covered Ori’s.

“Mornin’, love.”

“Good morning, husband mine.”

Ori tightened his arm around Dwalin’s waist.

“You are my prisoner,” Ori hissed in what he hoped was a scary way.

Dwalin strained against him but not enough to break free.

“I’ll be free a’ yeh soon!”

“No, you won’t,” Ori told him. “I am so much stronger than you. I’m a fierce pirate king and I shall steal all your treasure.”

Dwalin struggled valiantly, then, “Bloody pirate! Yeh’ll never ge’ me treasure!”

“Hah!” Ori growled as best he could, rolled Dwalin over, and straddled his waist.

“You, my fine dwarf, are going to be tortured until you tell me where the treasure is!”

“Never!” Dwalin barked, frowning terribly but the sparkle in his eye made Ori delight in their little game.

“Yes, my fine dwarf, you shall know the terror of the great suffering of-”

“Breakfast!” Dori called through the door.

Ori snarled in frustration as Dwalin burst out laughing.

“Go away Dori,” Ori shouted. “Dwalin and I are - are in the middle accomplishing Illustration 20!”
There was a snort from Balin and Dori replied coolly.

“If you were doing that, pet, you wouldn’t be able to talk.”

“Fuck,” Ori grumbled.

Dwalin was still recovering.

“How do you know?” Ori fired back.

“Practice makes perfect, pet. Now hurry up.”

“Rubbish,” Ori said, then he leaned over Dwalin and kissed his nose. “Are we going to have to wait until we go to the inn again to get any peace?”

“Nah, we’ll find time, love.”

When Ori and Dwalin entered the breakfast parlor they found Nori shoveling eggs into his mouth and Balin shaking a finger at Dori.

“It was to remember you by,” Dori protested with a winsome smile.

“And t’ give t’ yer wee brother,” said Balin.

“To remember you b y. Besides, I didn’t have my Ori yet.”

“Yeh had Nori.”

The two dwarves looked at each other and burst out laughing. Nori shot them both a filthy look.

Eventually, when the two of them had calmed down, Dori said to Balin, “Darest, you’re not very angry, are you?”

Nori snorted.

“Please! If you chopped his hand off, he’d still be makin’ excuses for you.”

“I’m no’ angry, me beloved,” said Balin, taking Dori in his arms. “Considerin’ how it’s all turned out, mebbe it’s how Mahal meant it t’ be.”

Nori muttered something about resting his case.

Ori sat down and Dwalin dropped into the chair beside him. Dori poured tea and ordered them to eat. Ori helped himself to fried eggs, crispy bacon and fresh, still hot scones. There was a tureen of porridge, thick with nuts and dried red currants.

“Dori,”

“Yes, pet?”

“I went to see Master Vobwi on the way home yesterday to pay him for Kihshassa. He said he would like call and see the kittens and Brandy. He was very pleased with Kihshassa. He said he hadn’t thought she would last a day.”

Dori nodded.
“I shall tell Mistress Dazla, so whomever is home when he calls, they can show him the little ones.”

Fili and Kili bounded in and pounced on the food. Thorin followed, reading a letter, Roäc on his shoulder.

“What’s th’ news, laddie?” Balin asked as Dori poured tea and made a plate for Thorin.

Thorin thanked Dori and smiled.

“Bilbo wrote to say Tharkûn has made sure that Bilbo and Frodo have arrived safely and extremely quickly in Gondor. Mr. Denethor has been mollified and is quite delighted with the finale of ‘The Heaving Bosom of the Ocean’.”

Everyone in the room snickered.

“I hope Estrella sorts things with Captain Cockrell,” Ori grinned.

Thorin looked sidelong at Ori.

“I’m sure she will and they will live happily ever after as pirates sailing the high seas.”

“You don’t think he’ll take back his kingdom and settle there?” Dori asked.

Thorin considered.

“Very likely, but I’m sure when the king needs a holiday, they will go and be pirates again.”

“Or go off and stay in a fancy inn,” Kili observed to Fili who, as his mouth was full, could only nod in agreement.

Dis bustled in.

“Sorry, I can’t stay. I’ve a meeting with the guild of weavers.”

Dori poured her tea and created a bacon and egg sandwich with a couple of scones. Dis threw back the mug of tea, bumped foreheads with Dori and disappeared out again, breakfast in hand.

A few moments later Dain and Sculdis blew in. Sculdis was leading Dain by the hand as Dain was busy reading the house copy of the The Heaving Bosom of the Ocean. He crashed into a chair and mumbled thanks as Dori handed them each tea.

“Mornin’ all,” Sculdis said cheerily. “Don’t expect too much from me hubs this mornin’. He found tha’ when he got up in th’ dead o’ night f’r a tinkle an’ bin readin’ ever since.”

“It’s a good story,” Ori told her.

“Aye, quite Shire’s best,” Balin agreed.

“Shire’s missin’!” roared Dain.

Thorin raised a hand.

“Calmly cousin, he’s been found and is currently in Gondor delivering the rest of the tale to his publisher.”
Dain stared open-mouthed at Thorin. Ori had never seen his eldest brother so shocked. Thorin took a sip of tea and glanced at Dain. Thorin was obviously thoroughly enjoying himself.

“How in Mahal’s name d’ye know tha’?” Dain demanded.

“Tharkûn’s ways are mysterious.”

“Bah,” Dain muttered. “Wizards, they cause trouble. Shire better watch his arse.”

“Considering Shire must get ideas for his writing from things he’s heard about or seen, I imagine he’s perfectly capable of handling himself.”

“Mmm,” Sculdis opined. “Yeh finished wi’ that, love?”

Dain handed over the book and Sculdis put it in her pocket.

Bofur came in.

“Mornin’ all. Nice t’ see yer majesties back from the Iron Hills. Keepin’ well, ma’am?” and tipped his hat to Sculdis.

“Bofur!” cried Sculdis. She rose out of her chair to cuff him.

Bofur grinned, sat by Nori, and started filling his plate before Dori could get to it.

Dain drank back his cup of tea. Dori refilled it and Dain drank that back, too, slammed the cup down gently, and glared at Nori.

“Wha’s all this ‘bout yeh gettin’ married, our Nori?”

Nori grinned maniacally and Bofur looked pleased.

“Thanks f’r yer felicitations, melud,” said Bofur. “Thought it best t’ make an honest dwarf a’ him. Dori write ya?”

Thorin chuckled.

“I thought it best to allow them to explain themselves to Bifur.”

Bofur and Nori exchanged glances and Bofur paled a little.

“Aye, we’ll hafta go int’ hidin’,” said Bofur. “Our Bifur might be a tad displeased not gettin’ a chance to be at a weddin’. He pulled all the stops out f’r Bom and Erda’s. Bought ’n roasted ’n ox.”

“Roasted ox,” Sculdis said dreamily.

Dori smiled serenely. “I believe there will be six roasted ox for the coronation dinner.”

“Tha’ takes care a’ Dain,” said Sculdis. “Wha’ a’ th’ rest a’ us?”

“An’ none a’ th’ family there t’ witness it,” Dain continued at Bofur and Nori as if ox were no object.

“Not true,” said Nori. “Granny Klak was there. I’m her favorite.”
Dori and Ori looked at each other, then at Nori and chorused, “Gran-ny’s Precious Ba-dger!”

“That’s right,” said Nori, satisfied.

“Now, my love,” said Klakuna swooping into the room to wipe the egg from Nori’s chin. “You know I don’t play favorites.”

“Grandmama!” Dori cried, pouring her tea.

“Good morning, all!” Klakuna sang. “Ooooo, bacon.”

A raven flew in and landed in front of Ori.

“Eggr, I be,” the raven announced.

“Hello, Eggr.” Ori wondered why Brur’s raven had come. The raven stuck out a foot and Ori carefully removed the slip of paper tied around it.

“Wee brother?” Balin asked and Ori read the note.

“Brur says to meet him at the library front steps at the first afternoon bell.” Ori told them.

“Well, you better finish your breakfast and get a wiggle on, pet,” said Dori, “you’ve only an hour until you’ve got your meeting with your royal scribes.”

Ori thanked Eggr and gave him some bacon. After polishing this off, the raven flew out.

“Where would you like us to meet, Thorin?” Ori asked.

“We can meet in the office,” Thorin replied, finishing his third scone. “Might as well start as we mean to go on.”

Mistress Dazla entered with Miss Oqizla and young Master Agirb to restock the table. Shortly after, the Groin household came in. Omi, Loli, and Buj bounced over to sit near Ori. Gloin and Oin bellowed welcomes to Dain as Gridr and Binni rushed to embrace Sculdís.

“Oh, my dear, I can’t wait to show you what I’ve done with the throne room!” Binni cried.

Ori swallowed. Binni’s redecorating had completely slipped his mind, though he couldn’t see how.

“Oh!” Binni cried. “I forgot those fabric samples for the bathroom. Be back in a shake!”

Ori wondered if Binni had already eaten breakfast, and if so, what had been in it.

“Dori, tell me he’s not thinking of upholstering the toilet.”

“Of course not, pet,” said Dori. “The bathtub, however, may not be as lucky.”

Thorin passed Ori the butter.

“You haven’t seen the throne room yet,” said Thorin.

“How much damage could Binni have done in a week?” Ori wondered.

“I’m not sure it’s actually ‘damage’ but I’ll certainly be the first Durin king whose throne is covered in throw pillows.”
"Throw pillows?"

"Oh, yes, in the various official 'colors' of my loyal retainers. Apparently Binni and Dipfa collaborated."

Ori drew in a breath of horror.

"Oh, no!"

"Oh, yes. You haven't lived until you've seen rhodochrosite and jade plaid wool with russet silk fringe. The jade's the only thing that keeps them from looking like they're made of bacon."

"I suppose there are red and pine green plaids, too?" Ori ventured.

"Stripes. In satin. As bolsters."

Ori couldn't see Thorin lounging over such pillows, eating xocolatl truffles while deliberating the fate of some noble evildoer. Binni had somehow mixed up Thorin with Dori.

"Go on, tell 'im wha' else," Dain prompted Thorin. "He's strong enough. He can take it."

"Binni actually admitted to me he'd sat on the throne itself. Just to get some idea of the layout, of course."

"Of course," said Ori.

"He said he immediately saw the problem, and so set out to fix it."

"And the remedy was?"

"Snowbear pelts draped over the seat and back. He said the pelts were mithril-colored enough to lend a regal air, but they would also alleviate how cold the throne is against one's family jewels."

"Oh, Binni," Ori groaned.

"Yes, apparently he sent to my charming cousin," Thorin eyed Dain, who chuckled to himself and muttered about 'decor', "and Dain was more than happy to oblige."

"I was ecstatic t' oblige," Dain confessed merrily.

"Those considerations aside, Binni said the most important thing was that Bilbo have a comfortable place to sit," said Thorin.

"Awfully sure of himself, isn't he," said Ori dryly.

"I suppose I can see his point," Thorin mused. "Everything in the throne room is balanced just so. It would throw off the symmetry to put another throne on the dais."

Ori reflected that the queens and consorts of the Durin kings had never even had thrones upon which to sit. When their presence was required they stood to the left of the king.

"He's small enough, cuz," said Dain, eyes twinkling. "sitting up there, he certainly wouldn't crowd yeh."

"But, at the coronation all the under monarchs have to approach the throne to swear loyalty," said Ori. "Can everything be put back in time for their arrival?"
"I have no intention of having it put back," said Thorin.

"Balin, you must be having kittens!" Ori cried.

"He does go rather grim-mouthed whenever it's mentioned," said Thorin. "Ah, see, there he goes now."

"You just want to see how the other kings and queen react!" Ori accused.

"I already have a good idea of how they will react. I'll bet any money that Chat, at least, takes one look at it and laughs himself sick."

"It's possible I might be sick."

"Don't get sick yet, I haven't even told you what Binni did to the dais itself."

"What has he done?"

"Apparently, he took his cue from the ceiling of Balin and Dori's bedchamber."

"There are mirrors on the ceil-!" Ori abruptly shut up, wincing. He had a feeling he'd let the badger out of the basket. "Sorry, Dori. Sorry, Balin."

Dain raised an eyebrow at Sculdis. They both raised an eyebrow at Balin. Bain turned redder than his own robe. Dain threw back his head and laughed.

"An' ye said ye didn't like mine! Said it was tacky!" Dain cried. "Rascal! I feel like such an inspiration!"

"Er... there are a lot of mirrors in their bedchamber," said Ori to Thorin. "Binni didn't replace the entire throne room ceiling!"

"Of course not."

"Thank Mahal!"

"Even for dwarrow that would take weeks. No, he faced the stone blocks of the dais with mirrors at strategic points along the entire height. Other blocks are faced with lapis, jade and amber, ruby and opal. I was actually surprised how well it looks. It could have come out like a warg's breakfast."

Ori didn't quite trust the sanguine look on Thorin's face.

"Um... Thorin, are you feeling well?"

"I haven't felt this well in almost a century. I've been dreading the coronation my entire life. Now it's here and I'm going into it better prepared and better supported than I ever thought possible."

"Aye, an' now he's go' a flashier throne room than me," said Dain around a mouthful of egg.

"You've been served notice, cousin," said Thorin. "Time to step up your game."

Ori decided he'd try conversing with his fellow scribes. It seemed like a safer bet, especially when Binni came bounding back through with something that looked like strips of pink fish scales.

Buj was calm but both dams were in equal tizzies over the fact that both Pika and Furh'nk had Omi and Pika had walked in the meadow while Loli had talked to Furh’nk on the deck. Ori wondered if Furh’nk got a word in edgeways but decided that Furh’nk would be happy enough to sit, listen, and admire.

Loli turned to Ori, her mouth full, managing,

“Is it true Master Jansad is going to be working with us?”

“Yes,” Ori confirmed, still a little dazed over the events of yesterday. “Masters Jansad, Kacuho, and Nodun will be joining us. I do hope we will all work well together.”

Omi squeaked.

“So exciting! Oh, I do hope they don’t think I’m a dolt!”

“I am looking forward to informing my precious diamond that I will have the privilege of working with Master Nodun,” Buj volunteered. “My precious diamond tells me Master Nodun’s artistic skills are formidable.”

“Yes,” Ori agreed. “Thorin told me that, too. Her father was the editor of Vug magazine and she was the principle artist before she went on to become a head of the scribes guild.”

“Are you finished, pet?” Dori inquired.

“Yes, and I’m off to get dressed up, Ori’s Dori,” Ori smiled, Kissed Dwalin’s cheek, and excused himself. He went to his room and made sure his hair and ears cuffs were properly set and put on a dark green duster before catching his satchel. He returned to the table for a final cup of tea.

A few minutes later, Mistress Dazla came in and announced that the three head scribes were coming through the royal cavern entrance in a shay. Thorin, Ori and the other three rose and went through to the receiving room. The front doors were open to the new day and Ori saw the small cart being taken in hand by Mokrah as Kacuho and Nodun assisted Jansad down from the vehicle.

The three masters came in and bowed to Thorin.

Ori introduced Loli, Omi, and Buj to the masters. Kacuho and Nodun looked amused and Jansad looked very pleased with them.

They repaired to Thorin and Balin’s office. Balin had their contracts to be scribes to the high king waiting. Jansad looked almost feral as she signed hers. Ori considered that, after what the scribes’ guild had been through with Sikar, it was quite a triumph for the three of them to be personal scribes to the king. The high king of dwarrow at that. Sikar would squirm when he found out. Ori smiled at this thought in vicious pleasure.

He looked forward to writing that missive himself. Perhaps there were some advantages to being first chair after all.

After a short meeting, Jansad asked after the preparations for the coronation. Buj announced that his precious diamond was seeing to his scribe mitts. Ori swallowed his shock as this was the first he had heard of such.
“The coronation robes are kept in the archives,” Nodun stated. “Perhaps, Master Brur might be requested to assist?”

Thorin glanced at Ori.

“I have a meeting with Master Brur this afternoon,” Ori said. “I will be sure to ask him to help.”

“Yes,” Nodun agreed. “The mitts are quite legendary. Your precious diamond has tailoring experience, Master Buj?”

Buj swelled but Ori hopped in.

“Yes, she is assistant to Master Mahrdin, son of Greneeld. She is one of the dressers to the royal house.”

“Oh, yes,” Kacuho looked interested. “Who is she?”

Ori looked at Buj wth a smile.

“My precious diamond,” Buj intoned, “is Dipfa of the House of Fa. Fa is her father and her mother rejoices in the name of Dip. They combined their names for their daughter in the symbolic union of their true love.”

Buj sat like a happy tar bubble ready to burst. He positively beamed at Nodun. She smiled and slid a look at Kacuho, who was also rather amused. Jansad had an eyebrow cocked.

“Was Master Mahrdin responsible for the Bearer’s presentation robe?” Jansad asked.

“Yes,” Thorin confirmed.

“Fuckin’ eh.” Jansad muttered under her breath.

After lunch, precisely at first bell, Ori presented himself at the library.

Master Brur cocked an eyebrow at him.

“Yer lookin’ f’r copies o’ th’ S’tuk an’ Whilf?”

Ori should have been beyond surprise that Brur’s first words weren’t “Good Afternoon” or “How’re yeh keepin’?” or even “Eh, yeh again.”

“It’s good to see you too, Master Brur,” said Ori with a sunny smile, just to turn the knife.

“Bah, c’mon then.”

Instead of going to Brur’s office, they went to a nondescript door in a nondescript hall and the door opened onto a stairway which, while lit, appeared to plunge into the guts of Arda.

“Archives,” said Brur, shortly. Then he continued, “I knew when tha’ Sikar weasel started lookin’ f’r th’ scribes’ guide it stunk like an orc’s breath. I took every copy I could find an’ shoved ‘em in a box under me desk.”
“You have a desk?” Ori teased.

Brur started to descend and Ori followed him.

“It’s tha’ largish heap in th’ middle a’ me office,” said Brur. “No one finds anythin’ in me office unless it’s me. I call it ‘job security’.”

“So, everything Loli, Omi and Buj know—“

“I taught th’ silly badgers meself. They learned more fr’m me parcelin’ it out than they would’ve under a guild master nowadays.”

About fifteen minutes later, after Ori lost count of the number of flights and landings, they made a sharp turn into a hallway which lit, mysteriously, as they passed.

Ori said, “How is that accomplished?”

“Ghosts,” said Brur. “Kiddin’.”

A few more steps along the corridor and then,

“Here it is,” said Brur.

They were deep in the archives now, deep in Brur’s domain. Ori had expected it to be dark and perhaps covered in cobwebs. It was dark, because constant light would damage many of the more fragile objects. Dwarrow were perfectly capable of making fragile things, they just preferred objects that were large, hefty, useful, and, if possible, nigh unto indestructible.

Rather than dusty and dank, however, the place was disturbingly clean and cobweb-free.

“This is… tidy,” said Ori.

“Part o’ th’ archivists’ jobs.”

“We have archivists?” Ori asked. “I thought the pages ran back and forth.”

“They do. Archivists stay down here. Don’t like light. I swear they’re part mole.”

Ori looked around for mole-like dwarrow, but he supposed they scattered at the sound of approaching feet into whatever bolt-holes they could find.

By the instant lamplight, lighting their path and extinguishing behind them, they passed by looming statues of warriors and scholars, glass-fronted shelves crowded with seals and badges and a few things Ori really couldn’t identify. A small brass box, almost spiked with jagged fingers of amethyst, nestled among the debris.

“What is that?” Ori asked.

“Balls of Durin IV,” said Brur.

“What?”

“Jus’ havin’ yeh on, try an’ keep up.”

“Is that a bowl of warg teeth?”
“Aye, they were used as game pieces.”

“For what game?”

“No idea.”

“Pen nibs?”

“O’ Durin th’ Deathless. No barrels, though. Apparently he used t’ chew on ‘em ‘til they were less than toothpicks.”

They walked on.

The air grew colder, as if they were descending deeper into the mountain.

“Take a look,” said Brur, gesturing toward an open door way.

They stepped into a vast room lined with shelves filled with clear glass boxes. The light flashed on and the walls sparkled. The light reflected off the glass, and off the rainbow of colors within. Ori blinked until he could focus on what he actually saw.

“This,” said Brur, “is th’ great Bead Room o’ th’ Durins.”

The Durin beadmakers were obviously overachievers.

“May I?” Ori asked.

“Just wipe the drool off ‘em when yer done.”

Ori was aware time was limited, but he couldn’t help himself. It was like candy when he was a badger, except not edible. In fact, he had to restrain himself from licking every bead he saw. Oh, the cobalt roundels and amethyst barrels! The jet and marcasite double ended faceted and the carved lapis tubes! The-

He took a deep breath.

“All right, I’m overloaded. Let’s move on.”

They went down a long corridor where portraits hung down each side of the hall, some a thousand years old. Ori felt as if he were watching the entire evolution of dwarven painting, starting with slightly mannered and simplistic shapes and slowly evolving toward realism until they nearly looked like the real things.

“Kings an’ queens o’ Khazad-dum an’ Erebor,” said Brur.

He knew Queen Kivi before he even read the name plate. He could swear she winked at him.

As they reached the end Ori stopped and looked up at a stern, pale, black-haired dwarf with one eye patched and the other very blue. Ori cocked his head, thinking he’d met this dwarf before, but he couldn’t think where.

“This looks like Dwalin,” said Ori. “But also like Gloin and Thorin.”

“Tha’s Prince Thrain, Thorin’s adad. He did have those Durin features.”

“He doesn’t look very happy.”
“Yeh kiddin’? Tha’s him fit t’ bust out laughin’. He was th’ original Gloom Biscuit o’ Erebor. An’ then there’s his wife, Princess Freris.”

A dark-skinned dam glared out at them from across the hall. The beads in her yellow hair and beard showed the same apple green as her eyes. Her mouth was a thin, hard line.

Ori looked back and forth and, honestly, could not imagine these two dwarrow in the same room, never mind married.

“Was she his Heart Song?”

“Nah, she was his shield-siblin’, daughter o’ barge-dwarrow from th’ Orocarnis, Blacklock, and Firebeard bloodlines.”

“Her parents ran a barge.”

“Aye, sound familiar?” Brur chuckled. “She was rather like Dwalin in her ways, nasty as Mordor on th’ battlefield. Thror kept pressurin’ Thrain t’ marry, give him an heir. Canny o’ Thrain t’ pick someone who actually loved him. Whether she liked him, well, tha’ changed day t’ day. Sometimes hour t’ hour.”

“She died when Frerin was born.”

Brur snorted.

“She popped him out an’ was back on patrol a week later, an’ th’ midwife had t’ practically tie her down t’ get her t’ sit still tha’ long. She died th’ next day, takin’ down a stray orc pack by herself.”

“She didn’t wait for help?”

“Wha’ d’yeh think?”

“I guess that’s a ‘no’.”

“I swear she was part Durin, too.”

They moved on until they reached a metal door with the rune for ‘scribe’. Brur picked out one key from a ring of about five hundred and fit it into the lock. Ori had no idea how Brur chose just the right one, they all looked the same to him.

“Take care o’ this room meself,” said Brur.

The lamp flickered - and failed.

“Wha’ th’ fuck?” Brur demanded.

A familiar voice in the dark said, “Your housekeepin’ ain’t up t’ snuff, pardon my sayin’ so.”

“Nori!” Ori cried.

Indeed, one tiny light in the ceiling blinked on and it was Nori, perched upon a steel and glass case.

“Yeh! Out!” Brur growled.
“Aw, now that’s no way to treat a guest.”

“Nori,” Ori warned. “I wouldn’t.”

Nori sighed.

“Oh, alright. Spoil me fun.”

He rolled over backward into the shadows and was gone.

“Sorry about that,” said Ori.

“Never mind, I’ve dealt with worse. Long’s he left things where he found ‘em.”

An ornate silver candlestick flew through the dark and Brur caught it.

“Thank yeh. An’ while yer at it, put on th-“

All the lights in the room glowed to life.

Ori swallowed.

The case where Nori had perched held a mannequin wearing ancient and ornate robes.

“That’s them,” said Brur.

They were velvet, cut in the oldest style, a metallic grey overtunic to about the knee under a meridian robe with voluminous sleeves to the elbow, then closer cut from the elbow to the wrist. A hood of plum with a dagged edge topped the robe and the tail of the hood ended in a tassel of seven silver stars.

“Mahal!” Ori gasped to Brur. “I’m supposed to wear that?”

“Well, not just tha’. Yeh do have t’ come up wi’ yer own tunic, hose an’ underpinnin’s.”

“Hose?” Ori held back a giggle.

“I s’pose yeh could go barelegged,” said Brur, “bu’ yeh’ll find it awful drafty.”

“How about leggings, and we’ll leave the rest in the lap of Mahal?”

“Now yer spoillin’ me own fun. Yeh go f’r yer boots yet?”

“Yes.”

The bootmaker had made him a pair of tall boots in deep plum to match the robes.

When Ori asked how the bootmaker knew how dark to make them, she had turned to him with a raised eyebrow and said, “Our family’s only been making them for a couple thousand years, m’lord.”

“And have yeh gone t’ th’ glovers yet f’r yer mitts?” Brur asked.

“I’m going to ask Dipfa.”

Brur shuddered.

“She knows they got to be white kid, righ’? An’ she knows why?”
“I’ll insist they stay white, beyond that, who knows. I have to give her something to play with. She was upset when she found out she couldn’t make the scribe’s coronation robes. Or make over the robes, anyway. I can just imagine, orange-red fur around the edge of the hood with a Fundin green velvet band to back it.”

“Speakin’ o’ mitts.”

The next case over housed a macabre collection of hands sticking out of the platform. They were actually alabaster marble, left and right, and on each pair, a set of white, kid mitts, the oldest yellow with age, but all of them blotched with black ink and finally each signed in the palm by the original wearer and the date and king’s name of the corresponding coronation. The oldest had come from Khazad-dum when the Durin kings settled in Erebor and had blurred with time, but the set from Thror’s coronation were still crisply legible.

Ori swallowed.

“I’m really going to do this,” he said.

“Aye, yeh really are,” said Brur.

Ori pulled his shoulders back.

“I am going to do this,” he said firmly.

“No one who knows yeh has any doubt,” said Brur. “Let’s get th’ robes an’ get our arses outa here. Those hands always give me th’ creeps.”

Brur took a large lump of canvas from a chest and unfolded it into a sheet. Together he and Ori undressed the mannequin and carefully folded the robes, placing them on the canvas. This done the canvas was wrapped securely around the robes and Ori took up the package and followed Brur out. Brur locked the door and they headed back along the corridor.

“I guess we’d better start climbing,” said Ori, looking up the stairs.

“Yeh kin, if yeh want,” said Brur, “but I’m takin’ th’ lift.”

“There’s a lift?”

“Aye, I’m too old t’ be sloggin’ up tha’ mess.”

“Then why did we come down the steps?”

“Figured yeh could use the exercise. Besides, nothin’ atmospheric about a lift. No romance.”

“And we all know what a romantic you are, Master Brur.”

“Aye, just ask Master Sadi.”

“I - what?”

“Nice a’ yeh t’ make her a scribe t’ th’ king. Too bad she’s goin’ t’ kill me when she finds out I had those guides.”

“You didn’t tell her? You deserve to die!”

Brur chuckled.
“I know.”

The lift was quite utilitarian, just metal walls and ceiling and floor, but of enormous size. Ori thought it must be handy for moving statues and crates.

“How long have you two been… friends?” he asked Brur as they ascended.

“Depends on how yeh define ‘friends’. We’re each craftwed, bu’ we been flirtin’ f’r at least a century. Then old Thror popped off, and I met her again at the funeral.” The grin on Brur’s face was positively filthy.

“You fooled around with her on the day of Thror’s funeral?”

“Don’t be nasty, badger. We waited until after midnight. Yeh an’ Dwalin didn’t, I suppose.”

“I passed out drunk at the feast. I don’t even remember midnight. i don’t even remember how I got home.”

“Ah, t’ be tha’ young an’ foolish. I don’t have tha’ kind a’ time t’ waste. Queen Kivi servin’ yeh?”

“I’m still reading it,” said Ori, positively refusing to blush. “Thank you for lending it to me. I’ve decided I need to translate it into westron.”

“Really? My! Aren’t we full a’ surprises. That goin’ t’ be yer mastery project?”

“I keep running into people I know who could use it!” Ori went on, ignoring Brur’s comment. “Besides me, I mean. The chapter on inter-species sex alone would be invaluable.”

“We do seem t’ have quite a bit a’ fraternizin’ goin’ on, don’ we,” said Brur with a chuckle. “It’s f’r th’ best, I say. We keep goin’ on like this, there won’t be anymore dwarrow t’ keep goin’ on like this, an’ if there are, they’ll all have six toes on each foot an’ an ear in th’ middle a’ their foreheads.”

“I wouldn’t just be translating it for the young and foolish,” said Ori. “We have plenty of older people who need it. Look at Thorin and Bilbo. Look at Bard and Thranduil.”

Brur slid a grin of scandalized glee at Ori.

“Thranduil? Thranduil th’ elf? Th’ one tha’ looks like he was born suckin’ a lemon an’ enjoyin’ it? Tha’ Thranduil?”

“Do you know any other Thranduils, Master Brur? I thought you’d enjoyed a conversation with him?”

“Nah, I did. I jus’ like sayin’ nasty thin’s about him. He’s good f’r rememberin’ thin’s, though. I am a bit shocked, come t’ think on it. I thought Bard had better taste.”

“Oh, Thranduil’s not a bad sort, once he, um, takes that stick out of his arse.”

Brur laughed, actually laughed in a deep, booming voice that bounced off the lift walls.
Ori rode to Mahrdin’s establishment on Honda with the long package across his knees. He went in. Dipfa came out of the back room and hopped over in delight at the sight of him.

“Lord Ori! Whatever are you doing here? Have you something special there?”

“Yes, Dipfa, look.” Ori showed her the parcel.

Dipfa squeaked and took it from him to lay it on a long table. She carefully unwrapped it and gushed.

“Ooo, Lord Ori! The coronation robes of the high king’s scribe. How well you’ll look in these!”

“I suppose. Master Brur says I have to come up with my own tunic, hose, and underpinnings. What do you think? The idea of hose makes me feel a little weird.”

Dipfa pursed her lips, regarding the robes and pondering possibilities.

“I think we should dispense with hose and instead make a snug pair of breeches of that black green satiny material you wore at our dear Bearer’s presentation. I’ve been working with a leathersmith on a matching belt with an emerald-studded buckle to go around the grey tunic. I picked up your boots yesterday and will bedeck them with cords capped with diamonds and emeralds, to complement the tassel of the diamond stars on the hood. How glad I am I picked just the right shade of blue.”

“Blue?” Ori asked.

Ori hoped he didn’t do anything that would make him lose his breeches as the blue underwear would blind everyone.

“I’ll sponge and iron these and bring them right up to you,” Dipfa went on. “Really, I don’t think they will take much tailoring, perhaps a tuck here and there. I’ll bring them over with your mitts later this afternoon.”

“Oh,” said Ori, “I was going to ask you about those. Now I don’t have to. Thank you, Dipfa.”

He left her murmuring lovingly over the robes, smoothing them, completely absorbed.
Ori rode home and, after caring for Honda and turning her out to frisk in the meadow, went in. He entered the sitting room to find Lady Dori holding audience with an overwhelmed Master Vobwi.

“Oh, my dearest Ori is so good with all our little furry babies,” Dori was saying. Dori was a cloud of pale primrose gauze and her hair was loose and flecked with beads of gold. Her neck was wrapped in a beaten gold collar from chin to shoulders. Her arms bore beaten gold wrist and upper arm bands. Her fingers were covered in gold rings. Her feet were bare but for a dainty golden chain of tiny bells on each ankle. Ori thought Dori had Mistress Dazla cast some gold dust over her before she received her guest.

Ori glanced at Master Vobwi. The dwarf was wide-eyed and fascinated by the Bearer.

“There you are, pet,” Dori cooed and pattered across the sitting room to enfold him in a filmy yellow embrace.

Ori hissed “You’re terrible!” in Dori’s ear, eliciting a giggle. Dori took his hand and led him over, while Ori brushed the gold dust off himself.

“Here is my darling badger, Master Vobwi.”

“Good evening, Master Vobwi,” Ori said politely as the bewildered dwarf stared blankly up at him.

“Yes, yes,” Vobwi managed. “I…er…I-”

“Master Vobwi was just admiring our precious kittens and dear, sweet Brandy,” Dori explained. “He was agreeing with me that Kihshassa has done a wonderful job with them, thus restoring herself to perfect health!”

Ori rather thought Master Vobwi would agree if Dori suggested they nail the sitting room furniture to the ceiling.

“Indeed, indeed,” Vobwi tried, but lost himself in staring at Dori again.

“Such a nice time we’ve had, pet,” Dori said, smiling charmingly down at Vobwi. “Do drink your tea, dear Master Vobwi. You musn’t let it get cold.”

Vobwi jumped visibly, drank down his tea and hurriedly ate the slice of cake on his plate.

Dori fussed Ori into a chair and served him tea and cake. Ori looked at the very yellow cake with yellow icing and took a bite. It was sweet, moist, and lemony. Ori enjoyed his cake while Dori chattered about how adorable the house animals were.

“And my dear younger brother, he’s between my Ori and myself, so enjoys his baby ferrets. Such darling, naughty creatures, I do declare! He and his husband are quite diverted by their antics. Why the sweet things keep trying to eat his lovely husband’s hat. Have you ever heard anything so amusing?”

Vobwi blinked but Dori didn’t stop to see if he would say anything.

“And our own Brandy. She is the most precious thing, you simply cannot imagine! My dear betrothed combs her fur everyday. Her black stripes are coming in and she is going to be quite beautiful! And she’s growing so fast as you saw for yourself! Why she might become the biggest badger ever seen. I’m all a-flutter of excitement when I think of it.”
Ori finished his tea and decided it was time to rescue Master Vobwi.

“Master Vobwi,” Ori raised his voice slightly and it was enough to drag the dwarf’s attention from Dori.

“Shall we talk gold?” Ori suggested.

Vobwi pulled himself together and shook his head.

“No, no, Lord Ori. Certainly not. I still hold tha th’ fruit bat’s return t’ health is on this side of a miracle an’ havin’ visited your home, I can readily see why.” He rose and bowed very deeply to Dori.

“Blessed Bearer, it has been the greatest honor to wait upon you. An honor and a privilege.”

Dori giggled charmingly and rose, extending her hand to Vobwi.

“You are far too kind, dear sir. You have been charming company and I am so grateful you found these dear little creatures to share our home with us. I shan’t forget, you know.”

Vobwi saluted Dori’s hand, bowed again, and Ori escorted him out through the receiving room.

Mokrah had Vobwi’s goat ready in the courtyard as they exited the house.

Vobwi turned and looked at Ori.

“Mahal’s hairy balls, everything they say about Bearers bein’ magic’s real. I feel like I’ve been bloody enchanted.”

“Are you alright?” Ori asked.

“Aye, aye, ‘m fine. All I kin think ‘bout is wha’ I wan’ t’ give th’ Bearer f’r presents. Mahal, what an amazing experience. I feel like I’ve become a better dwarf f’r it. Thankee, Lord Ori, thankee very much.”

“You’re most welcome,” Ori said, though he really had no idea why.

Master Vobwi rode off and, as Ori watched, he passed Dipfa and Poot-poot heading towards Fundin House.

Dipfa steered Poot-poot into the drive and got down. Mokrah greeted her and took Poot-poot’s bridle while Ori came to see what Dipfa would have to say. She was obviously carrying his dress robes and there was a net bag on her wrist.

“Ah, Lord Ori,” said Dipfa. “I have your mitts, as ordered.”

She held out a box.

“That was certainly a swift job, Dipfa.”

“Oh, at the atelier we’ve all been bent on preparing our clients for the coronation. We really do have the finest clothiers the guild can offer.”

He took the box, opened it, nearly sighed in relief to see they were still white, kid mitts.

Then he got to the cuffs.
They were also white, but they were silk and crocheted into the Ri family pattern with the finest edge of tiny ruby and emerald beads.

He raised an eyebrow.

"I hope you don’t mind," said Dipfa sunnily. "I figured they’d be hidden by the sleeves of your robe."

"Yeeees. Until they go on display for all eternity in the archives," said Ori, shaking his head.

She bit her lip. He sighed and bumped their foreheads together.

"They’re lovely, Dipfa. You’ve done a wonderful job."

"I live to serve the Durins through my art, Lord Ori," she said, blushing.

"Do come in," Ori invited and took the net bag as she refused to surrender the robes.

As they crossed the receiving room, Ori murmured, "Dori is in high fettle. She just received Master Vobwi."

"That explains it," Dipfa nodded. "I said ‘hello’ to him and he said ‘Goldfinches or canaries? How does one decide?’”

"He’s overcome by Dori and wants to give gifts," Ori explained.

Dipfa giggled.

"I hope our dear Bearer likes birds."

They came into the sitting room and Dori bustled through from the kitchen with a large mug of tea and a sizable chunk of cake on a plate.

"There you are, our Dipfa," she cried. "I know you’re busy but I’m sure a tiny piece of cake and a little tea will do you a world of good. You are staying for dinner aren’t you. I’ve told dear Mistress Dazla to set you a place."

Dipfa shot Ori an amused glance and bowed.

"You are too kind, Bearer, I would be delighted."

Dori followed them to Ori’s bedroom and put the tea and cake down on Dwalin’s desk. Dipfa laid her burdens on the bed and unwrapped them. The coronation robes looked amazing. Ori swallowed. Somehow Dipfa had created the belt she had described and the boots were likewise decorated as she had planned. She unwrapped another parcel.

"I had the sewing assistant run you up the breeches." Dipfa grinned.

Dori hurried over and together they grabbed Ori and he was naked in seconds.

"Dori!” Ori protested.

Dipfa shoved him into the screaming blue underclothes. Ori caught a glimpse of himself in the mirror and groaned. He looked like an angry indigo bunting.

A few more moments and Dipfa turned him again to face the mirror. Ori gaped. He could hardly believe what he saw.

The robes fitted him perfectly. Seeing them on a mannequin was one thing, but seeing himself wearing them was another. He stared. In a matter of months, he had changed from a scruffy little back alley scrivener to a royal scribe to the high king of all dwarrow. He wondered if he’d grown taller. With his new way of doing his hair and the robes, he looked older. He came to himself again at the sound of Dori bursting into tears.

“Oh, my darling badger. You look beautiful. So grown up. You look like everything I’ve ever dreamed for you. I’m so proud!”

Ori leaned forward and clasped Dori’s forehead to his own.

“You should be proud of yourself, Ori’s Dori. You are responsible for all of it.”

“Dearest badger,” Dori murmured, pressing hard but with restraint. It would not do to embrace Ori, thus covering the robes with gold dust.

Dipfa sniffed loudly and had to apply her handkerchief.

Dori and Dipfa stood back and began to critically scrutinize Ori’s ensemble.

“Walk about, pet,” Dori ordered. “Are the boots comfortable?”

Ori walked about the room. The boots were the most comfortable he’d ever worn. The robes rippled around him. He felt rather royal wearing them. He grinned to himself and executed a spin like King Thranduil had at the inn. Dipfa shrieked in delight and Dori laughed.

“Now, pet. Don’t you go trying to be all elf-y over these robes. Whatever will your husband think?”

“He’ll think ’is husband looks a treat,” Dwalin said from his place in the doorway.

Ori ran over and hugged him. Dipfa squeaked about crushing the tunic.

“What do you think?” Ori asked, grinning up at Dwalin.

Dwalin smiled softly at him.

“I think yeh look bloody brillian’, love.”

“Right,” Dori was all business. “We need to get you out of this finery and set it aside for our Thorin’s big day. Run away, our deary. We have to get my badger back into his everyday clothes.”

Dwalin came in and shut the door. Dori huffed but didn’t voice any objections. Ori snickered at Dwalin as Dori and Dipfa stripped the robes off him.

“Wait until you see the under clothes,” Ori warned.

“I’m likin’ them britches, love,” Dwalin grinned.

The blue underclothes went on display and Dwalin roared with laughter.

“I’m thinking I’ll use them as a bathing costume next time we’re at the inn,” Ori stated.

“No, you won’t,” Dori and Dipfa chorused and hurriedly got him back into his own underclothing. Dwalin whistled rudely anyway.

Once he was back in his everyday clothes, the entire party went back into sitting room again.

“Gondorians have sent a forward party,” said Dwalin. “They’re comin’ through Dale now.”

“How do you know it was them? Were they wearing the Gondorian colors?” Ori asked.

“Nah, they stopped at th’ bakery. Comin’ out front t’ meet ‘em with me?”

Ori followed him through to the front door.

Shortly, a knot of five riders entered the royal cavern, each on a fine horse and all equally rumpled and dirty from travel. Dwalin and Ori descended the steps as the riders dismounted in the courtyard and the lead rider approached.

He was tall and lean, handsome in a mannish way, perhaps a little younger than Bard. His dark brown hair fell just below his shoulders and framed his beard, neat and trimmed as in the way of men. His eyes were bright blue and he had an open smile. He alit from his horse and murmured to it,

“Mae carnen, Brego. Mellon nîn.”

He wore dark brown clothing, a large sword at his hip and his leather cloak was fastened at his throat with a leaf of Lórien brooch. About his neck was a chain that ended in a mithril pendant with white gems.

An elf woman descended neatly and the man held out his hand to her with a smile. She took it and they came forward. She was dressed in dark green and leather, a great war bow across her back.

“Yeh King Elessar’s herald then?” Dwalin asked, looking the younger man up and down.

“I’m King Elessar,” he replied, proffering a tidy pink box. “I brought eclairs.”

Ori bowed with great respect, all the while half expecting Elessar to trip over the idea of two married males, but Elessar only looked delighted and bowed in return and drew forward the tall elf woman.

“My intended, Lady Arwen Undómiel of Imaladris.”

Ori hadn’t expected to see such a highborn elf lady heavily armed and spattered with mud. She was dark haired and eyed, very beautiful in the way of elves. Ori recalled she was considered to be the image of the great elf lady Luthien, but she had a terribly familiar smile.

She curtssied to their bows.

“A pleasure, Captain Dwalin, Lord Ori. I’ve heard so much about you from my grandmother Lady Galadriel and her… er… friends Mistresses Vi and Margr.”

“You’ve met them?” Ori asked, shocked.

Elessar looked pained and Arwen snickered.
“They introduced themselves at the bakery,” said Arwen. “They were quite out of breath. Apparently they had run the entire way?”

“I believe it,” said Ori.

“Then they complimented my bottom,” said Elessar.

Dwalin lost hold over a snort and Arwen lofted her eyebrows with a little smile.

“It is quite decorative,” she teased.

"If you say so, dearest,” said Elessar. "I haven't seen it recently. Captain Dwalin, Lord Ori, this is Boromir, son of Denethor, captain of my royal guard.”

This other man looked about the same age as the king but he was built on thicker lines, his beard and hair blond. The great horn of Gondor hung from a lanyard about his neck. He was dressed much like his king, but with a great scarlet cloak. He shook hands with Dwalin and bowed to Ori.

“This is a great pleasure, Captain Dwalin,” said the man. His voice was rough, rather like Dwalin's, Ori thought. Must be all that growling orders through a dangerous smile. “I've long heard of your exploits.”

Dwalin laughed.

“All th’ way out in Gondor? Yeh don’t have much t’ talk about amongst yerselves, then.”

“May we impose upon you to stable our horses?”

"Aye, Gibi there'll help with the horses. Right now I'll take his majesty and her ladyship inside, an’ when yeh an’ yer men’re ready, Lady Klakuna’s waitin’ t’ show yeh around t' th’ guest rooms.”

Elessar looked a little startled.

"They're staying in guest quarters?” he asked.

"Yes,” said Ori, “in Durin House.”

“Are there enough rooms?” Elessar asked.

“There are two hundred rooms,” said Ori. “King Thorin says it's a pity to let them go empty. Is that satisfactory, King Elessar?”

Elessar grinned.

"That's perfect! Ha! I wonder if Celeborn knows yet."

Arwen nearly hopped with glee.

"Grandfather will be so shocked! He might even change expression!"

Ori thought he would sweeten the deal a little.

"There is also a troupe of traveling performers staying with us, The Great Woudini and His Court of Miracles."

Elessar chuckled.
"Arwen, isn't he the one who told King Thranduil that his son would marry a dwarf?"

She put her hand on his forearm, practically agog.

"I believe it is!"

"Oh, Mahal's hairy arse," Ori breathed.

"Add our Vi and Margr t' th' mix an' it'll be a circus on its own," said Dwalin. "Yer majesty, yer highness, if yeh'll come with me."

"You go on, dearest," said Aragorn. "I'll help with the horses and join you in a moment."

"Are you sure?"

"Of course, go and have fun. Who knows? Maybe Mistress Vi and Mistress Margr will arrive to admire your bottom as well."

"Are they likely to do that?" Arwen asked as Dwalin and Ori led her toward the house. "Arrive, I mean. My bottom is rather flat. We can't all be as lucky as Elessar. Anyway, will they?"

“Aye,” Dwalin grinned. “Th’ sisters’re always underfoot come time f’r one o’ Dori’s teas. Quite chummy with yer gran. They call her ‘Our Gladdy’.”

“Oh, Grandmother didn’t tell me about that,” said Arwen. “Wait until I see her. Imagine her holding out on me! Is Bearer Dori at home to visitors? I would like to pay my respects. I also hear the tea is excellent.”

“If you didn’t come to tea,” Ori told her, “Dori would never forgive you and no one would ever hear the end of it.”

“Including me,” said Arwen, knowledgeably.

They went ‘round to the front door and then Dori was upon them, having ‘freshened up’. Ori supposed Mistress Dazla’s ‘little bird’ had told Dori everything. Dori now wore customary plum, a long silk duster, and an equally long scarlet tunic beneath, embroidered all over with plum roses, the petals of which were perfectly cut amethysts.

“Lady Arwen! You naughty thing! You should have sent a message ahead and we would have been out to greet you properly! Our deary, why is our esteemed guest coming out of the stables? Really! And where is her intended?”

Ori whispered, "And where are my eclairs?"

“Bearer Dori? I’m so happy to meet you at last!” Arwen cried. “I’ve heard so much about you from Grandmother, I feel like we’ve already met!”

They embraced rapturously.

“Ah, dear Lady Galadriel! I feel as if she and I are sisters!”

“May I call you ‘auntie’ then?”

“Of course, my dear, of course! Ooo, you’ve brought pastry! How nice!”

Dori and the elf lady disappeared into the house and shortly thereafter, Elessar exited the barn, grousing back, apparently at his soldiers.

"All right, all right. I know when I'm not wanted."

"Yeh seem t' have been left in the gutter, yer majesty," said Dwalin wryly. "Yer intend's been spirited away by our Dori. Don't know if they'll even notice yer missin'."

"I'm used to it," said Elessar, grinning like a fool. "Care to bear me company, Captain Dwalin?"

"I know it well," said Dwalin.

"No, you don't!" Ori cried, scandalized.

"With such a pretty husband, I'd say I do," said Dwalin fondly.

Ori snuggled up to Dwalin and said to Elessar, "Had you a pleasant journey, your majesty?"

"Actually, we did," said Elessar. "We just weren’t expecting the mud from the building project."

"Building project?" Ori asked as they turned to go into the house.

"Beaver dam. Rather embarrassing for a former ranger."

"Yeh at least get a couple o’ hats out’ve it?" Dwalin commented making the king laugh again.

The moment they entered the house Mistress Dazla pounced.

"Ah, your majesty, please follow me."

"Of course.” Elessar grinned at Dwalin and Ori, then followed the housekeeper upstairs to be shown into his room.

Ori looked about. The receiving room fires were lit and burning bright. The furniture was being rearranged around the room.

He slid his hand into Dwalin’s hand.

“So the kings are staying in our house and their parties are at the old royal residence? Is that how it was in the old days?”

“Nah,” Dwalin chuckled. “When ol’ Thror were king we an’ Gloin an’ Oin housed everyone an’ they had t’ go visit the king. Bu’ I were jus’ a lad back then an’ it were only dwarf kings tha’ visited.”

“So,” Ori mused, “Thorin really is turning everything around. Kings of all races will stay with us.”

“Aye, Thorin ain’t gonna keep folk apart an’ if there’s a chance t’ talk trade, it’ll happen.”

“And they can thank Thorin for it.”

They were now in the sitting room. Dori was deep in earnest conversation with Binni.

Ori heard something about lace and spangles and decided he didn’t want to know.

Dipfa sat on the floor by the fire place talking with Floris, who was cuddled up against Biscuit. Chopper sprawled on the sofa, snoring. It appeared that Dipfa had disposed of her tea and cake by then.

Dori came over. “There the both of you are. We’re getting the receiving room ready to sit in as there’ll be a lot of people soon.”

How d’yeh know tha’?” Dwalin asked. “There’ve been messages?”

“Oh no,” Dori breezed off. “I can just feel the tingle of excitement in the air.” Dori and Binni disappeared into the kitchen. Dwalin and Ori looked after them then looked at each other.

“Think Dori’s pregnant?” Dwalin asked.

“If she isn’t,” Ori replied, “she’s definitely working on it. Mind, sometimes Dori just knows things. Maybe it’s the maternal side of being a Bearer.”

“’R jus’ bein’ Dori,” Dwalin observed.

“Welcome to my life,” Ori said dryly.

Dwalin laughed and kissed him.

“Come help me get me glad rags on, love.”

Hand in hand they went through to their bedroom. There Ori dressed himself in his purple suit and Dwalin put on his dress uniform. They took time to do each others hair and jewelry, before heading back to company.

When they returned, the sitting room was empty but for Chopper still snoring on the sofa. The door was wide open to the receiving room and Ori could hear Dori chatting.

Clean and well-rested, Arwen was dressed in a long pale green gown with filmy sleeves and trimmed with white lace. She stood before the fire and Dipfa was involved with her clothing. Ori heard Dipfa telling Dori that she thought that a simple, long, red velvet gown with a short, black velvet surcoat would show the elf lady off to great advantage. Arwen looked amused and intrigued.

Elessar wore a light brown shirt and breeches all covered in a rust colored surcoat. He relaxed on the couch with his pipe in hand. Floris sat on a stool beside him. He watched her put Biscuit through his paces. Brandy was attempting to copy the warg. Mask perched on Elessar’s knee cap. Powder was curled in Dori’s lap and Nori-Pori and Kihshassa supervised Dipfa and Awren.

“There you are, pet, our deary,” cried Dori. “Come and have some tea.”

The company were on their third cup of tea each when Thorin and Balin finally arrived with a jovial Bofur, and a rather annoyed Dis. The knuckles of her right hand were wrapped in a bandage.

“King Elessar, Lady Arwen,” said Thorin, bowing, as the royal couple came forward. “I bid you welcome to Erebor, and I apologize for my late arrival. I was engaged in keeping my sister from cold cocking the grand master of the miners’ guild.”

“Was your endeavor successful, King Thorin?” Elessar asked.

Bofur chuckled. Balin looked amused. Thorin seemed to be composing something politely innocuous to say. Dis was having none of it.
“He was still laid out when we left.”

“My sister, Princess Dis of Erebor,” said Thorin, catching up.

Elessar’s eyes sparkled.

“Congratulations, ma’am, if they are in order.”

Dori took Balin’s hand and introduced her darling intended, then introduced “Lord Bofur, unfortunate husband of my brother Nori.”

“King Elessar, Lady Arwen,” Dis interrupted, giving a graceful curtsey. “I accept your congratulations, gladly, in order or not. If you’ll excuse me for a moment, I have to find some ice and a needle and thread. I cut myself on the Master Eyarn’s tooth jewelry.”

In a mild tone, Dori said, “How very shocking, my dear. Let us see what can be done.”

“Ha!” said Nori from somewhere underneath the couch. “I won twenty gold on that. Never bet against Dis!”

Elessar looked around, but said nothing.

“My brother Nori, husband of the ‘unfortunate Bofur’,” said Ori. “To the furniture he said, ‘Nori, it’s King Elessar and Lady Arwen.’”

“Ah! Top o’ the whatever t’ ya both!”

Elessar grinned.

“And to you, Lord Nori.”

Somewhere below them a door slammed, then the rug rose up and hand extended from under the edge. Elessar went and bent over the rug, shook the hand gravely and watched as it vanished, the rug sinking flat once more. Thorin and the Gondorian couple sat down and Dipfa began lurking around Elessar, muttering about deep blue gray.

“People come and go very quickly here,” said Ori, pouring Arwen another cup of tea.

“Indeed,” Arwen agreed. “Oh, please pass the… er… iklars?”

They both giggled.

“We have these in Gondor. How did the recipe get here?” Arwen asked.

“Dal, son of Lal, the baker? According to Margr and Vi, he has an aunt who’s a foreigner,” said Ori. “You know, from Gondor.”

Arwen grinned at Elessar.

“Do you hear that, my dear? We’re foreigners!”

“Perhaps I should wax my mustache and affect a funny accent,” he replied.

Ori shook his head.

“You’d need a silly hat.”
“Frightfully!” Dwalin commented making Ori burst out laughing.

Dori and Dis returned shortly.

Dis nabbed an iklar out of Thorin’s hand and ate it in two gulps.

"Dis!" he complained.

"Don't whine. I can count and I know you've already had three."

"I'd best put on more tea," said Dori. "Vi and Margr should be here momentarily."

"You don't think they've run here straight from Steam Alley?" Ori asked.

"If they thought it was necessary, I'm sure they would, pet, but in this case I sent Mokrah with the carriage for them."

"You didn't!" Ori cried with a grin.

"Of course I did. Do you think we'd be forgiven if they weren't invited to the center of the chaos?"

"I'm amazed they haven't moved in here yet," said Ori.

"I did offer them one of the newly emptied noble house under the mountain, but they declined," said Dori.

"Why?" Ori asked. "Those houses are a lot more solid than anything back in Steam Alley."

"Think about it, pet. Would you rather be a lady in waiting under the mountain, or an empress in Dale?"

"Ah, I see."

"Waiting up in the parlor for Lord Balin’s coachman to call for them? Riding through the neighborhood back and forth in style? Besides, between them and their brother, they know more about the comings and goings there than anyone else.” Dori giggled delightedly. "Oh, and they don't just live in those two rooms anymore, either. They took the whole upper floor."

"The whole floor? Really?" Ori was rather amused. Dwalin rolled his eyes and made a face at Elessar, who widened his eyes.

"And," Dori added, "pay their landlady to clean for them and to cook for them out of her kitchen in the basement. They are quite the dams about town."

“How very elegant,” Arwen observed with a secret smile for her betrothed.

There was the noise of a door through in the sitting room.

"Aragorn! Arwen!" Legolas cried. He entered the receiving room with Gimli.

The royal couple rose to welcome them.

"You're late, Greenleaf!" Elessar barked and they embraced.

"No," said Legolas, "just like a wizard, I am always just where I should be when I should be.
You, however, are unfashionably early."

"Shockin'," Gimli agreed.

Elessar's eyes lit up.

"Are you who I think you are?"

"Depends on wha' yeh think I done," said Gimli.

"That's my line!" Nori cried from the ceiling. "And they call me a thief!"

"Good day to you, Nori," said Legolas to the ether before turning back to Elessar.

"Aragorn, Arwen, this Gimli, Gloin and Gridr's son."

"Ah, so you're the famed Gimli Gloinul!" Arwen said, curtsying.

Gimli gave Legolas a stinkeye.

"Wha're yeh tellin' people abou’ me?"

"I've been telling absolutely everyone about how short you are," said Legolas, hugging hello with Arwen.

"Fuckin’ tree-shagger."

"I have never actually shagged a tree," Legolas informed all present.

"Does sound painful," Elessar shook his head.

"Mahal's bloody arse," snapped Gimli. "Now I got one in each ear. Or, I beg yer pardon, I would if I were tall enough."

"I like him," said Elessar. "I'm thinking he could probably spit nails."

"Swallow them, rather," Legolas snickered. "He certainly wouldn't waste all that iron."

"Tha's it!" Gimli roared. He seized Legolas by the torso and effortlessly flipped him upside down. Legolas giggled. Really, he could put his hands down flat to the ground if he chose to, but obviously that wouldn't be any fun.

"Don't drop me, Gimli! I'll break a nail!"

"Yer arms won't save yeh if I drop yeh hard enough."

"Should we be worried?" Arwen asked, leaning over and cocking her head, so she could see Legolas properly.

"If we were outside, perhaps," said Legolas, crossing his arms in total unconcern. "Gimli isn't going to splatter my brains all over Dori's nice clean floor."

Gimli sighed and tumbled Legolas over and onto his rear on the slate, then muttered something about revenge served cold.

"There he goes again," said Nori, sounding disgruntled from behind fireplace.
"Legolas, where is Tauriel?" Arwen asked slyly. "I wasn't aware you were old enough to wander around without your nanny."

"Ha. Ha," said Legolas. "You aren't that much older than me, Arwen. What's a few centuries?"

"The thing that allows me to torment you for being the youngest. Is she with this Prince Kili I hear so much about?"

Legolas looked down his nose at her, as much as he could, anyway.

"Possibly," he said.

Thorin rose as a cloud of ravens flew in the open front doorway. They immediately converged to perch on Thorin as if he were a park statue, all of them chattering to him at once.

"I don't suppose one of you could talk at a time?" Thorin shouted.

The din continued unabated until Roäc, on top of Thorin's head, gave a particularly loud, rude caw.

"Ahem," said Roäc.

"Roäc," said Thorin.

"What? You want them to be noisy again?" the raven asked.

"No, but I'd like to be able to talk to you where I can see you," said Thorin.

"Oh, all right. Si'down," said Roäc. "Make a space, you lot. I'm coming down."

He did so, hopping to a stop on the table covered in tea things, preening unconcernedly and looking around the room until his gaze alit on Elessar. He flapped over, landed on Elessar’s arm and strutted along it with a happy caw.

"You made it!" he cried.

"As you see, King Roäc. May I present my intended, Lady Arwen? I believe she was off visiting her father when you delivered your original message."

"The one about the asshat." Roäc bobbed at Arwen. "Milady."

"Your majesty, it's a pleasure to finally meet you," said Arwen.

"Ooooo, you have manners," said Roäc. "Quite a novelty with this lot."

"Excuse me, you ungrateful, gibbering turkey," said Thorin. "I believe there were messages to deliver?"

"Yep, keep your crown on." Roäc flew back and landed on Thorin’s shoulder. "Theoden King is about a half hour away, skirting Dale since he has fifty riders with him. You'd think horsey people would travel light, but no. Next?"

Garnet hopped forward.

"King Thranduil and his eldest son approach from the forest. They will be here by sundown and the elfling's having a major sulk."
"Great Eru!" Legolas laughed. "Ada dislodged my brother from his tree? That's going to be one very grumpy owl."

Thorin grunted.

"Something to look forward to, anyway. I've had a few cases of the best Dorwinion wine brought up from the cellar for your father. Should hold him at least through dinner."

"Next," Roäc cued.

There was a bit of a scuffle to be next, but finally Beryl hopped forward, spitting some feathers from her beak to drift across the table.

"There's my girl," said Dis.

Beryl puffed up her chest.

"Lady Galadriel says..." Abruptly, Beryl's voice changed into the elf lady's smooth, lilting voice, 'We'll be popping in once Celeborn's hair is dry.'"

"He washed it?" Thorin asked. "What an honor for us."

In her own voice Beryl said, "Lord Elrond's sons dumped a bucket of green gelatin over his head."

Arwen groaned.

"Would you guess those are my older brothers? Oh, well, I suppose this is what Grandfather gets for refusing to play with them when they were tots."

Mica, obviously not thrilled at being bested by Beryl, winged everyone else aside and said, "Tharkun's taking a bubblebath down the hall. He says to wake 'im once the food is ready."

Ori said, "This time he really isn't dressed for dinner."

"Does anyone else have any news?" Thorin asked. "Such as, when the other dwarrow might arrive?"

Sapphire piped up, "King Snur's about a day away. Ahkn and Ulfr will be here first thing tomorrow."

"What about King Gheir and Queen Hild?"

"They'd already be here if they hadn't stopped for a fistfight in the Orocarni foothills," said Sapphire. "At this rate I'm guessing they'll be here some time next week."

"Wonderful," said Thorin. "The two of them can spend their visit in our infirmary."

"You have quite the information network," said Aragorn to Thorin. "Very thorough and loud. Do you even need to use dwarf agents?"

"Oi!" Nori cried from the fireplace flue. "I resent that besmirchment upon me professional skills!"

"My apologies, Lord Nori," said Aragorn.

"Yep, well, just buy me a pint."
"How exactly does he do that?" Arwen asked. "The walls must be riddled with tunnels."

"If they are," said Balin, "they're from before me udad's day."

Legolas watched the tapestries flutter, as if tracing Nori's passage. He leapt up and pulled the last away from the wall, but there was no one behind it, no passage, not even an alcove or doorway.

"That's not possible," he said. "There's literally nowhere for him to go." The elf prince began running his hands over the stone wall, intrigued.

A moment later, Nori walked through the door to the sitting room with a jam sandwich.

"Lookin' fer me?" he asked, grinning.

"Nori, how did you get into the kitchen?" Legolas asked.

"Went 'round through the passage behind the curtain, naturally."

Everyone in the room started at him and Ori shivered.

Legolas held away the arras.

"What passage?" he asked.

"Whad'ya mean' what passage'? Use yer eyes. It's right there."

"Show me."

Nori shoved the rest of the sandwich into his mouth, wiped his hands in passing on a chair back, walked past Legolas - and vanished through the wall.

Gimli made a slight choking noise but other wise the room was silent.

Legolas reached and rapped his knuckles against the solid stone.

Dwalin swore as Nori's head reappeared.

"You comin' or not?" he asked Legolas testily.

"I don't think I can," said Legolas.

He moved his hand to just above Nori's shoulder and knocked once more.

Ori said, "Nori, I don't think there is a passage. I think you walked through the wall."

Just for a moment, Nori's face registered shock and fear before his mouth curled into a ravenous grin.

"Oh, just think what I can do wif this!"

"What about Assault and Battery?" Ori asked in a panic.

Nori glanced up as if he could see his hair. Perhaps he could, Ori thought. Nori whistled sharply.

Two little, furry snouts and two pairs of shiny black eyes poked out.

Elessar jumped and Arwen "Eeped" with surprise, then got hold of herself.
"I beg your pardon," she murmured.

The ferrets scrambled out over Nori’s shoulders, down his arms, and started burrowing through the various pouches on his belt.

"How sweet," said Dori dryly. "Like father, like sons."

"I'll have you know they're daughters," Nori sniffed.

Dori marched over to him and smacked him in the head with a tea towel.

"Oi! What was that for?"

"For wiping your filthy paws on my clean furniture. Get out of there."

Nori shrugged and stepped forward.

"Have you always been able to do that, Nori?" Ori asked.

"I dunno. As far as I can tell, there's always been a tunnel there." He narrowed his eyes at Dori. "Mebbe one o’ them ‘Bearer spillin’ over’ things happened."

"Well, there goes that project," said Thorin. "I was hoping you'd be able to remap the tunnels."

"Maybe there is a limit," said Dori. "Nori, did you not say you tried to get into the room when I was trying on my presentation robes, but couldn't?"

"Aye, couldn't figure it out," said Nori. "I'd used that tunnel lotsa times."

Dori smiled and nodded, pleased.

Bofur slid around her and patted Nori about the chest and shoulders.

“Here, what’re you on about?” Nori asked.

“Makin’ sure ya still got all yer bits an’ pieces.”

“No worries,” said Nori with a leer. “The most important bit’s still there.”

“So you’ll be in good shape if we have to run away from home.”

“We already got married,” said Nori.

“Not to elope, Nori, to flee. Bifur, remember?”

“Oh, aye. Bound t’ be a little a put out, I suppose.”

“My hubby’s the master o’ understatement,” said Bofur. “One little axe in me cousin’s fore’ead don’t mean he can’t still use that boar spear, y’know. Shove it right up yer-”

“Lo!” came the bellow from the front doorway.

Bofur choked.

“Mahal’s bloody arse, it’s Bifur!”

As if conjured by invoking his name, Bifur was in the room. He didn’t have his boar spear but he didn’t really need one to look terrifying.

“Bofur, Son of Scur!” Bifur roared in khuzdul. “Without even asking permission!”

Bombur strode in behind him, face as red as his beard.

“And without even a cake!” Bombur cried.

“Da, please,” Randibur pleaded, holding on to one arm while Erda had the other. “Let Idad Bifur handle it.”

“Da! Mam! Randi! Idad Bifur!” Omi and Loli cried, bursting in from the sitting room and rushing them like a miniature pack of orcs, effectively blocking any action beyond hugs.

Bifur, however, was loose and, Bofur and Nori having the sense to flee, he gave chase.

Ori could see the guests were just mystified.

Bifur shouting in khuzdul did nothing to clarify the situation.

The Durins watched the scene unfold with interest.

Dori turned to Arwen.

“More tea, dear?”

Bifur chased Bofur and Nori around the room, over the furniture, and finally backed them into a corner, advancing with menace.

Nori grabbed Bofur by the wrist and yanked him through the wall.

Bifur’s mouth slammed shut with a crash and he managed a whispered, “What in Durin’s fuckin’ name?”

“They’re through in the sitting room,” guessed Ori, rising.

“They are what?” Bifur demanded, whirling on him.

“They’ve gone through the wall into the sitting room,” Ori clarified, then realized exactly how that sounded and gave up on explaining. “Come on!”

Bofur and Nori sat on the floor, Bofur with his eyes huge and staring, his hand clutched hard in the front of Nori’s tunic.

“Darlin’,” said Nori, “y’ got me chest hair there.”

“I know,” said Bofur in a small, rasping voice.

“Righty-o,” said Nori, trying without success to unclasp Bofur’s fingers.

“What goes on here?” Bifur demanded, yanking them both to their feet by the shoulder.

“Me new trick,” said Nori. “I can walk through walls.”

Bofur said, “Did you know you could take me with you?”

“Well, no,” said Nori. “Not exactly. I figured Assault and Battery were safe enough.”
Bofur growled, “What d’ya mean ‘not exactly’?”

“Calm down. You’d’ve been left on the other side o’ the wall anyway. Bifur’s less likely t’ kill you than me.”

“And if you’d let go o’ me while we were in the rock?”

“Er, we won’t think about that, right?”

Nori didn’t have to worry about Bifur. Bifur had to keep Bofur from sluggin’ his husband.

“Oi! Bo! Calm down!” Nori cried, making a strategic withdrawal behind Bifur.

“You moron! That was just like a fuckin’ mine collapse! Ever been stuck in one?”

Nori groaned.

“Aww, Bo, I’m sorry. I didn’t realize. I can’t even see the rock, obviously.”

Bofur huffed out a huge, shivering breath of air.

“Nori, we’re never doin’ that again. Ever.”

Bofur took another breath then sighed and grabbed Nori into his arms.

“Don’t bloody scare me like that, love.”

Nori wrapped his arms around Bofur and hugged him, he muttered in Bofur’s ear and Ori hoped it was apologies. Ori decided he would withdraw back to the receiving room. Bifur followed him muttering about ingrate badgers.

“Welcome, dears!” Dori greeted Bombur and Erda, who by now had thoroughly hugged their daughters. The Urs were introduced to the guests and given tea. Bifur repaired to the fireplace bench and began carving something. Soon Nori and Bofur came through the door and Nori flipped into a chair and sat Bofur in his lap and Assault and Battery sat in Bofur’s lap. Ori sat down beside Thorin, feeling strangely tired for a moment.

Captain Boromir soon entered, was introduced and enjoyed a conversation with Bombur and Erda. General chatter resumed for about five minutes.

Jani came in and was greeted with the usual chorus. The miner bumped heads with her family and kissed Dis, then gently grasped her by the wrist, inspecting the bandages.

“Oi, our Dori,” said Jani, “why’s Dis’ hand wrapped up and why’s our Bofur grayer than granite?”

“Oh, Dis socked Master Eyarn at the miners’ guild meeting and Nori pulled Bofur through the sitting room wall.”

“Is that all?” asked Jani, smirking at Dis. “I hope yeh laid ‘im out, lovely.”

"Hel-lo!” a voice bellowed from the receiving room door.

Ravens scattered, cawing.

"Ah," said Dori. "Vi and Margr have arrived."
"Oh, Mahal," said Thorin, "we've eaten all the iklars."
“We brought iklars!” cried Vi as the sisters burst into the room, identically dressed in clouds and billows of pink and orange taffeta with dyed, hot pink bird plumes in their hair.

Elessar rose politely. Roäc ducked between Thorin and the arm of his chair and rasped, “My fanny feathers’re in danger.”

“Roäc, no one wants your fanny feathers,” said Thorin. “They aren’t poofy enough,”

“Are you saying my fanny feathers aren’t what they ought to be?”

“Calm down, Roäc, you’re a raven, not a snowy egret.”

Thorin rose and bowed.

"Ladies, welcome. We’re just brewing a new pot of tea.”

“Ooo, yer so kind, our majesty, ain’t he, Vi.”

Vi was already fixated on the newcomers.

“We come t’ see if tha’ nice foreign king feller an’ his elf lady made it all this way without bein’ robbed on account a’ their pastry. How’re yeh keepin’, yer majesty? Yer highness?”

“Very well, thank you, mistresses,” said Arwen, rising to curtsey.

“Oh, that’s right, Vi, we ain’t been properly introduced, have we?” Margr brayed.

Dori, knowing her part only too well, glided forward.

“Mistress Vi and Mistress Margr of Dale, I am pleased to present Lady Arwen of Imladris. She’s Lady Galadriel’s granddaughter.”

The room was instantly engulfed in the cooing of very large, blindingly colored pouter pigeons.

“OOooooooOooo!” they shrieked in unison.

Biscuit raised his head in alarm, Assault and Battery darted back to the safety of Nori’s hair. Chopper was heard to moan from the sitting room. Boromir, who had slid silently into the room after the sisters, crossed to stand behind Elessar and watched the sisters with a fascinated air.

Margr and Vi descended upon the elf lady in a storm of words and fluttering. To her credit, Arwen only looked momentarily terrified before plastering a gracious smile on her face. Really, her part was easy, simply to be pretty and agreeable and murmur ‘Most kind’ whenever a pause offered, which wasn’t very often.

“So very like yer gran.”

“Yer king feller certainly has an eye, don’t he.”

“Now, yeh’ll tell us if he’s no’ a perfect gentleman, won’t yeh.”

“Aye, an’ we’ll sit him down right quick f’r a little chat.”

The two of them gave Elessar ‘the eye’.

Ori thought, Mahal above, your majesty, don’t laugh.

Elessar merely bowed and said, gravely, “Understood, mistresses. I am devoted to my lady’s happiness.”

Margr and Vi were giddy with this response but turned their attentions back to Arwen.

“Well, we’re just that dee-lighted yer here, lassie!” Vi told her.

“Oh yes,” Margr agreed. “Now do let us give you a kiss.”

Arwen leaned down to each dam and received a resounding smooch on the cheek. Legolas snorted and Arwen shot him a look that spoke of revenge.

“You’re so kind, mistresses. It’s just as Legolas said. He was just telling us how he’d missed you both terribly while he was away.”

“Oooo!” cried Vi. “How sweet!”

The two rounded on the startled prince and instantly surrounded him.

“Let us give yeh a kiss then, too, laddie,” Margr threatened.

“Ladies,” he said, bowing and thus at the right height to receive smooches, which they bestowed noisily.

“Such a nice, sweet-faced lad,” said Vi.

“But so thin! Our Dori, can yeh no’ get him fattened up?”

“Never mind, laddie, yeh’ve a nice, shapely bum, which our Gimmers will appreciate.” Vi punctuated her statement by patting the shapely article.

“Already does,” Gimli grunted but made a strategic retreat as Ori saw Gloin and Gridr enter from the sitting room and greet the Urs. Dori introduced the Gondorian royalty to them and Gloin latched onto Elessar and pulled him aside to talk trade with Balin. Boromir followed with a grin to Arwen.

Oin and Buj came in and were presented. Buj immediately went to his precious diamond and they soon had their heads together over something. Ori presumed it was either Buj’s flight ideas,
Dipfa’s ideas about making the queen presumptive of Gondor a new wardrobe or both.

Upon hearing where Lady Arwen was from, Oin frowned.

“Here, our Dori you shouldn’t say such things. I’ve got great respect f’r Elrond as a healer but t’ say his daughter comes from bein’ ‘in a mess’ ain’t nice. Mind, I’ve heard things about those boys of his.”

Fortunately for Arwen, Oin moved away to speak to Bifur. Ori watched as the poor elf lady tried in vain to school her features but couldn’t. Arwen choked. Binni smiled up at her.

“It’s adorable, isn’t it. After all these years, I still haven’t figured out whether or not he does it on purpose.”

“Really?” Ori couldn’t stop himself from asking. Binni nodded serenely and Arwen giggled into her hands.

“He does have a point,” she managed. “After what Grandmother said about my brothers.”

“Yes,” Binni went on, “by the way, your ladyship, what is your dear grandfather’s favorite dish?”

Arwen looked a little surprised then said,

“There’s a bread he always talks about that was very yellow, made with eggs and braided but he doesn’t know what it’s called. He’s also very fond of fresh radishes but Grandmother doesn’t like it when he eats them.”

“I can understand that quite readily,” Binni smirked. “We do have some of that bread. Excuse me, I shall tell Mistress Dazla to make sure we have it at dinner and to have plenty of it during his stay.”

Binni drifted off to the kitchen and Dori bustled over.

“Now pet, Arwen dear, have you had enough to eat? We’re clearing away the tea things to get ready for dinner and I have to dress. If you like, Arwen dear, my pet can take you out to the meadow. I know how you elves do like to be outside.”

Ori led the lady out through the sitting room. Arwent glanced oddly at the sofa where Chopper was lying on his back, snoring.

“That’s King Dain’s battle-boar,” Ori explained. “He’s very fond of him.”

“He’s very large,” Arwen said in a rather awed tone.

“He’s also very intelligent,” Ori told her. “But unlike the ravens, he can’t speak, which is probably a good thing.”

Arwen digested this.

“Auntie is going to change?” Arwen asked as they entered the breakfast parlor. “I thought the lavender and red was lovely.”

“Yes,” said Ori with a snicker, “for the third time today. I wonder what she’s got for a dinner costume?”

“Costume? Oh, this is beautiful,” Arwen enthused looking about the meadow and far out over the protective barrier. Mirkwood was a dark shape and the River Running bounded down to the Dale to laze its way to the Long Lake. The ponies grazed in the meadow, which was now nearly covered in blossoming wild flowers, while the goats, who could easily hop over the barriers, were leaping and running up the mountain. Ori giggled to himself. He knew he shouldn’t, but Gnasher and Grinder looked funny having being shorn for the summer.

“Grandmother!” Arwen cried. Ori turned and saw that the Lady, King Thranduil, a sulky looking younger elf and Celeborn had appeared in the middle of the meadow. Arwen ran lightly to them. Thranduil looked amused. Celeborn bowed his head with his hand over his heart which Legolas had told Gimli was how elves traditionally hugged. Lady Galadriel smiled sweetly and opened her arms to her granddaughter. She looked up at Ori. He waved and hurried indoors.

“Dori,” he called when he reached the receiving room. Dori looked up from her conversation with Binni.

The tea things had disappeared and Dori had changed remarkably quickly. She was now dressed in what looked like a sheet of gold wrapped about her, making a long robe and shoulder scarf. Once again her hair was loose and the gold jewelry she had worn for receiving Master Vobwi was back in place.

Next to Dis, Jani was dressed as she had been when Ori had first met her at the Durin’s old household. Jim and Ruelis had arrived and were chatting with Elessar and Boromir.

“What’s going on, pet?” Dori asked. “Did Arwen fall down?”

“No, Lady Galadriel, Celeborn, Thranduil and another elf are here.”

They came in with Arwen at that moment.

“Thrandy!” Dori squealed and rushed over in a cloud of gold dust to embrace the king. Thranduil opened his arms and swept down to one knee to receive the delighted Bearer. Galadriel looked amused and Celeborn and the unknown elf appalled. Everyone else in the room rose and came to greet them.

Dori also embraced Galadriel. Celeborn looked confused as to what he was to do, so Dori politely held out her hand. Celeborn bent to kiss it and bowed civilly to everyone else.

“Oh, I’m ever so pleased you’ve all come. Thrandy! Margr and Vi-”

“Yer majesty! Our Gladdy! So lovely t’ see yeh!” The sisters bellowed and pounced on the elves. Galadriel managed an eager squeal of delight to see them and Thranduil complimented their gowns. When the entry noise had calmed a little, Thranduil turned and motioned the unknown elf forward.

“King Thorin, Princess Dis, Blessed Bearer, may I present my eldest son, Prince Aewandínen.”

Prince Aewandínen bowed politely. Thorin and Dis bowed and welcomed him.

“Oh, how lovely, dear Aewandínen,” Dori enthused. “Do come in and be comfy. Perhaps a snack?”

“Oh aye, our Dori,” chimed in Vi. “I’m sure our Wandi could do with a bite.”

“Aye, he’s lookin’ peckish.” Margr agreed.
Aewandínen looked as though he’d swallowed his tongue at the eager butchering of his name. Thranduil made a noise as though stifling a snort. Dori shooed Celeborn and Aewandínen to the sofa. Legolas grinned maniacally at his elder brother from the chair where he was sitting on Gimli.

Aewandínen looked disapprovingly then curious.

“Brother, that is a strange belt,” he said in Sindarin.

“It’s not a belt,” Legolas replied in Westron. “It’s a Gimli.”

Gimli stuck his head around Legolas’s arm and glared at Aewandínen.

“That’s disgusting,” snapped Aewandínen making Ori bristle.

Gimli cocked an eye up at Legolas.

“He says, ‘hello’,” Legolas told Gimli.

Distrusting this translation, Gimli glared at Aewandínen again

“Fuck off,” he replied politely.

Ori looked about. Everyone except for Aewandínen and Celeborn were chatting and mixing happily. Celeborn looked relieved when Mistress Dazla brought the tray around with glasses of Dorwinian wine. Aewandínen declined and put his nose in the air. Mistress Dazla laughed and said, “Suit yerself, badger.” before giving Thranduil his glass.

“Ahhh, Mistress Dazla. Dowinian, second age, how very kind of you.”

“Aye, well, his majesty’s got in a couple of cases with your name on ‘em, so you give me a shout when you need,” she winked at the elf king and turned to Dori with a raised eyebrow.

Dori giggled and said,

“Dear Mistress Dazla, would you be so kind as to check on our resident wizard? We can’t have him coming to dinner all pruney.”

“Of course, dear Bearer. Not that any would notice,” she replied comfortably and floated off.

“Oh, Thrandy,” Dori sighed. “I don’t know what I’d do without her. Princess Dis has given me a treasure.”

“No, I didn’t,” Dis replied. “Unless you include letting my entire family move into Fundin house a treasure.”

“Oh, but I do!” Dori assured her.

“Ah, you’re all living here now?” asked Galadriel.

“Yes,” said Thorin. “That way we all have instant access to Ori.”

“Very important,” Lady Galadriel observed.

Ori giggled, but was a little confused by the lady’s comment.

“Speaking of access to me, where’s my husband?”
“Dwalin went down with a cadre to escort Theoden King,” Thorin told him. He cast a look at Elessar, “Which is what we would have done for you, if we’d had word.”

Elessar smiled and said, “Sorry, we thought you’d prefer eclairs. Pardon, I meant ‘iklars’.”

Nori’s disembodied voice piped up from the wood bin, “Arsehole.”

All the elves laughed, except Aewandínen, who looked about, incensed.

“Good evening, Nori,” said Thranduil pleasantly.

“Evenin’, yer majesty. Who’s the elf wif the sour mug?”

“My eldest son.”

“Can you still get your money back?”

Dwalin appeared in the front doorway, turned his head and said, “Oi, yer majesty, I’m supposed t’ announce yeh.”

“I’ve never needed that before,” said a deep, laughing voice.

“Humor me, if yeh please,” said Dwalin, who wore a look of exasperation and said to the room at large, “Theoden King of Rohan, and his son Theodred Prince.”

A large, dashing, blond man swaggered into the room, followed by a slightly smaller, but still swaggering miniature. Both were dressed in traveling clothes.

They gave identical bows and Thorin stepped forward to welcome them.

“King Thorin, is it?” Theoden boomed. “Well met, your majesty!”

“Well met, Theoden King. Do you need a place for your soldiers to billet?”

"Thank you, but they've already set up camp on the plain between the mountain and the forest. Being underground like this is uncomfortable for them. Reminds them of sieges."

"Because of Helm's Deep," said Ori, half to himself.

Theoden spun around in surprise.

"Aye, because that's where we wait out sieges. And you are, sir?"

Theoden was very tall, and very broad, and the way he leaned over it was rather like having a parapet threaten to fall on one.

Thorin said, “Theoden King, this is Lord Ori of Fundin, my royal scribe.”

“Your majesty,” Ori bowed.

“M’lord. How is it you know so much more about Rohan than I do about Erebor?”

Ori blushed.

“Rohan and Helm’s Deep are written of extensively in the histories of middle earth. The great horn, the parapets. It's quite fascinating, and really quite similar to how things are handled in Erebor, except we find the stone comforting.”
Theoden smiled and nodded. “If we can’t be in the longhouse, most of us prefer to be under the stars with the horses.”

Ori bowed again and scurried back to Dwalin, holding back an ‘eep’ at his own boldness. Dwalin hugged him.

“I shouldn’t put myself forward like that.”

“Yeh didn’t run up an’ scream ‘Da’!’ I think he’ll live.”

“Should I save that for Bard or Elrond?”

Dwalin snickered and hugged him hard.

Thorin said to Theoden, “A llow me to introduce you to the company.”

Theoden looked about with a gleam in his eye.

“Ladies first, if it’s proper, your majesty.”

“Oh, blessed Mahal,” Jani groaned. “He’s not serious!”

“Shhh,” Dis hissed, giggling.

Behind Theoden, Theodred rolled his eyes.

“I can see you rolling your eyes back there, Theo,” said Theoden.

“Yes, father.”

In quick order, Theoden was introduced to Dis, Gridr, Erda and her daughters, Dipfa and Jani. He bowed to Lady Galadriel, with whom he was already acquainted, and then Theoden’s eyes lit on Dori and his smile gained brightness exponentially.

“And this is your Bearer?” Theoden bowed over Dori’s hand. “A pleasure, ma’am.”

“Likewise, my dearest Theoden,” said Dori.

“And, if I may ask, how many children have you and Thorin now? Will they be present this evening?”

Dori flickered her lashes and said, “I beg your pardon?”

“Unless, of course, it is a matter dwarrow do not mention in company,” Theoden said quickly.

Dori smiled sweetly, “I think you’re a little confused, dear.”

“Oh, so, you do not bear exclusively for Thorin, but for any dwarf who requires a dwarfling.”

Bofur went off on a coughing jag, Gloin blessed Mahal’s hairy arse and Balin actually bellowed, “Oi!”

“I… No,” said Dori.

“I beg your pardon, ma’am,” Theoden hastily explained, reddening a little. “I have tried to get as much information on dwarven culture as I could, but I find myself woefully ignorant.”
In the corner, into her wine glass, Lady Galadriel murmured, “Oh, woe is you.”

“It’s quite all right, Theoden dear,” said Dori. “Let me explain. I’m not a household appliance. I’m merely both male and female, you see. In fact, that sternly red-faced but stunning dwarf in the corner is Lord Balin, my intended.”

“My mistake,” said Theoden, giving a charming bow in apology. “I thought Bearers were dwarfs…er…dwarrow females, unusual but extremely prolific. You are wearing a gown, after all, and it is lovely.”

“Thank you, my lady parts are in charge today.”

“Ah,” said Theoden. “Are all … dwarf ladies … built in the same way?”

“Oh, no, bearers like myself are extremely rare. There only two in Erebor. Dwarrow do not grow out of rocks, like in those funny stories men tell. We have many ladies, called dwarrowdams. For instance, my friends Mistress Vi and Mistress Margr signaling me madly behind you, are quite female in every way.”

“Aye,” said Margr, “we got our lady parts in charge every day!”

Theoden turned to discover them actually standing much closer than he expected, and very pink.

“Ladies,” he bowed, as far as he could.

“Oh, so yer one o’ them horse fellers,” said Margr, looking him up and down appraisingly.

“Aye,” said Vi. “We hear yeh lot are always stiff in the saddle.”

They held out their hands simultaneously.

Margr said, “Go on, Vi, age before beauty.”

Vi insisted, “In that case, you go first.”

“I beg pardon, ladies, I assumed you were twins,” Theoden gasped, looking to Elessar for help. The Gondorian king merely admired the ceiling.

“Oh, no, no,” said Vi, batting his forearm coquettishly with bruising force. “Dwarrow don’t have twins.”

“No, we’re only sisters, though, mind, we do share everything.”

Theoden glanced over to see where his son was, but the young prince had made a strategic retreat and was talking to Legolas and Gimli.

Mistress Dazla appeared at Theoden’s elbow and offered him a large mug of beer.

He took it gratefully.

“Thank you,” he said.

Dain blew in the front doorway and roared, “Elrond! And ‘is steward an’ sons an’ some other bloke!”

Elrond entered with three other elves, two of whom were identical and looked much like him.
The third Ori thought was a little older than the twins, but younger than Elrond, though that could merely mean he was five thousand years old rather than six thousand. He was quite handsome in a vague, elvish way, though his eyes darted about, taking in everything as if assassins lurked behind the couch. He had a perpetually worried expression.

Elrond swept forward. He and Thorin bowed to one another.

“Welcome, Lord Elrond,” said Thorin. “I’m very happy to see you again.”

“Likewise, King Thorin. This is Lindir, my steward.”

“Your majesty,” Lindir bowed.

He looked slightly uncomfortable. Ori wondered if that was because he was usually dealing with Elrond’s robes and dishware and not with strange, short people with beards. Out of the corner of his eye, Ori saw Nori’s face appear next to the fireplace implements. It was obvious Nori had immediately found in Lindir a worthy target.

Elrond turned to present two young elf males behind him.

“Here are my sons, Elladan and Elrohir.”

The twins bowed in unison, greeted the company then romped off to greet their sister.

“I have brought another friend,” said Elrond. “He is seeing to the horses at the moment, but he’ll be in presently.”

Sculdis flew down the stairs.

“Dain!”

She flung herself into his arms as if she hadn’t seen him in months.

They kissed noisily.

A great squeal erupted from the sitting room and Chopper burst through the doorway and threw himself at Dain as if he hadn’t seen him at months.

“There’s me laddie!” Dain hollered, hugging his pig in rapture.

Lindir’s mouth fell open and Aewandínen winced in disgust.

Theoden used this pause to retreat, but Vi and Margr admired from the rear as he went. He made it safely to the corner where Ori was moving to talk with Arwen and Elessar and the sons of Elrond.

“We have a signaling system and an oath, Gondor,” Theoden groused at Elessar, who grinned.

“You didn’t light a beacon fire on top of a mountain.”

“I’ll light a fire for you! Look at them! They’re terrifying,” Theoden hissed.

“And quite determined,” said Elessar, nodding back to the sisters.

Theoden turned.

“Why are they flipping a coin?” he asked.
“To see who gets first crack at you,” said Ori.

“What?”

Jani broke in, “Aw, they’re goin’ easy on ya, laddie. They usually team up.”

Theoden paled.

“No wonder orcs fear your race.”

Elrond’s sons clotheslined Elessar and threatened to drag him off.

“Where are you going, Legolas?” Elessar asked as the elf left for the steps. “I could use some help.”

“Light a beacon,” said Legolas over his shoulder.

“Go on with you, you little orcs,” said Elessar, struggling to free himself.

The elf twins laughed.

“You’re no fun,” said one or the other, or possibly both in unison, and went to chat up Jim.

Ori wondered where Legolas had gone. He decided the elf prince must know Lord Elrond’s other companion. He noticed that Celeborn also watched Legolas leave, but his face was grim and he shook his head ponderously.

Ori turned to Arwen for more information

“I’ve never been able to find much about Celeborn’s history.”

“Oh, that’s because after Doriath, he changed his name.”

“Ahh, may I ask what is was before?”

“Yes, it was Teleporno.”

Ori froze, blurted, “Mahal, he had cruel parents.”

He slapped his hand over his own mouth, mortified.

Theoden mouthed ‘Teleporno’, shrugged, and drank back his beer.

Arwen just laughed.

“To tell you the truth,” said Arwen, “I’ve always thought so.”

Ori shrugged,

“I’d change my name, too. What was he called when he was a badger, er... fawn? Tele? Porno?”

“Only by King Thranduil, I’m sure,” said Arwen. “Elves don’t give nicknames. With Sindarin, there’s too much room for, er, creativity.”

“Like ‘Grumpy Owl’?” Ori asked.
Theoden snorted.

“Especially that,” said Arwen, “though I can’t say I’ve ever met anyone with a more appropriate nickname. He’s always been like this. When we were fawns, he was a little rat.”

Ori looked over at Aewandínen.

“That’s sad. Maybe something will happen, so that like his father when he was at the inn and finally…” Ori searched for a polite way of saying what he thought.

Arwen’s eyes sparkled as she glanced at Elessar then grinned at Ori.

“ Took the stick out of his ass?”

Ori gasped then snickered.

“Precisely. And then he will be good company.”

“I hope I live long enough to see that,” Elessar commented dryly. Theoden nodded sagely.

Legolas came in again, grinning and eyes brimming with laughter, and headed over to Ori and his little group. Gimli bore down on them at speed.

"Wha’s go’ yeh in such a tickle?” Gimli demanded.

"Lord Glorfindel arrived with Lord Elrond and Lindir. Ada hates him."

"Why?"

"Watch."

The largest elf Ori had ever seen strutted through the front doorway. He stood at least seven feet tall, with a land bridge-wide set of shoulders and masses of long, golden hair. Glorfindel sported a full set of shiny, white teeth, displayed to advantage in a wide and terrifying smile.

The elf looked about and his gaze locked onto Thranduil and he shouted,

"Thranduil! My friend!"

In a heart beat, he crossed the room, seized the horrified monarch around the middle and snatched him from the ground, rocking him so violently that his long legs swung back and forth like a pendulum.

"Glorfindel, put me down," Thranduil demanded.

Glorfindel stopped rocking, but he didn't release the struggling king, merely smiled wider and bellowed, "I'm so happy to see you!" and kissed Thranduil wetly and audibly in the middle of the forehead.

Then he set Thranduil down and went off, doubtless to greet some other hapless victim.

Thranduil brushed himself off, bright red in the face, collected his dignity and whirled about - to face Thorin, who didn't even bother to hide his grin.

Thorin threw his arms open wide.
"Thranduil! My friend!"

"Don't go there, Thorin," Thranduil warned.

"What? I don't get a hug?"

"You want a hug? Fine!"

"Uh-oh," said Legolas gleefully. "Ada's using the 'f' word!"

"F-word?" Theoden repeated.

"Yes, 'fine'." Legolas told him.

Thranduil grabbed the laughing Thorin around the waist and lifted him, shaking him violently from side to side.

Ori was impressed. Dwarrow were not light weight.

"Thranduil," Thorin groused, "you're doing it wrong!"

"What?"

Thranduil stopped. Thorin wrapped his legs around Thranduil's waist and locked his ankles together, then kissed him.

Thranduil squawked like an enraged goose, struggled, but could not dislodge Thorin no matter what he did.

Ori had to thump Theoden between the shoulder blades as the horse monarch was on his hands and knees choking on beer and laughter. Ori looked up to see Jim was assisting Captain Boromir in a similar fashion.

Bard and his children entered the room to find the two kings thus. When Thranduil turned to Bard in horror, Thorin released Thranduil's neck and let himself fall back until he was clinging upside-down by strength of his legs alone.

"Evening, Bard," said Thorin merrily.

Thranduil face-palmed and Bard's mustache twitched with one, violent tic, before he threw back his head and roared with laughter.

Tilda shrieked in delight then ran to greet Lady Galadriel, who caught up the little girl for a joyous hug. Bain rolled his eyes and went to Stonehelm and the young Urs to be introduced to Theodred. Sigrid, Fili, Kili, and Tauriel brought up the rear and snickered at Thranduil’s situation, before joining the younger set.

Thorin let go with his legs, caught himself by the hands against the floor and flipped over, favoring Thranduil with a bow and flourish.

"Thank you, your majesty," he said grandly. "You've been a wonderful dance partner."

Thranduil groaned.

"How much have you had to drink?" he demanded.
"Nothing," said Thorin. "But the night's still young, and there's still a case of Dorwinion wine with your name on it."

"Oh," said Thranduil, his hackles lowering. "I hope it's as decent a vintage as the last."

"I consulted Lady Galadriel, so I'm afraid that depends on how she felt about you at the moment."

"Of course," said Thranduil, resignedly. "All my reliance is on Mistress Dazla."

Ori said to Dwalin, "Why do I get the feeling there was more in Bilbo’s letter than Thorin read to us?"

"I kin guarantee it," said Dwalin, cuddling him from behind. "He probably sleeps with th’ thing. I wouldn’t touch it now."

"Eww! Dwalin!"

Tharkûn entered the room. He looked the same as always except for having pinker cheeks. Ori thought perhaps he had polished his hat.

Mistress Dazla pushed passed Tharkûn before he could say anything and announced,

"Dinner."
Dinner, dessert, and drinks

Chapter by Stevie Foxx

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. There’s nothing like a good dinner and a quiet evening at home with the family. Dolly and I are rather proud of this chapter as it took an entire evening (we stopped for dinner with Dolly’s spouse), the laptop, and a lot of paper and pens to organize this dinner party. Hopefully we didn’t leave anyone out! And there are more people coming to the coronation!! If there was only a GPS for imaginary rooms and Tolkien characters! And it’s all through Ori’s eyes and ears!! If you do see an ‘oops’ please let us know. We felt like wedding planners! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The party was shepherded into the sitting room, which was dominated by the long dinner table, since all the comfortable furniture was now in the receiving room. Dori welcomed everyone again and assured them that this was a family meal, so there was no standing on ceremony with the seating.

Ori was amused to notice that the table seemed to divide itself by age. The Durin princes played host to all the younger people at the foot. Elladan and Elrohir included themselves in this group with Legolas and Tauriel. The Gondorian couple planted themselves in the middle. Boromir sat with Margr and Vi on either side of him. The older Durins, Tharkûn, and the rest of the elves sat up toward the head of the table. Tharkûn seated himself comfortably opposite to Ori, who went straight to the point with the wizard.

“And how were Bilbo and Frodo keeping when you left them?”

“Oh, very well indeed,” the wizard smiled. “Frodo was delighted to see the king and the queen presumptive just before they left to come here, and several of his little playmates. Bilbo was fawned over by Denethor. It seems that publishing quite the cliff-hanger last time nearly doubled the sales. The pre-orders for the concluding chapters are guaranteeing at least twelve print runs of a thousand.”

“Oh excellent,” Ori said eagerly, happy to hear such good news of his friend. “Bilbo did write that you had brought he and Frodo to Gondor very speedily. How did you do that?”

“Ahh!” The wizard was pleased Ori had asked. “I was most fortunate while at the inn to find the company of the king of horses, the mighty Shadowfax. He kindly consented to carry the three of us to Gondor.”

“Shadowfax,” Ori breathed. “I’ve only read poetry of him.”

There was a shout of laughter from the other side of Tharkûn where Margr and Vi were keeping Boromir in stitches about their infamous housebreaker. This included a great deal of arm waving and descriptions of teeth flying around the room.

Mistress Dazla entered with her minions and great tureens were set on the table. These were followed by small dishes of butter and great loaves of bread partially sliced. The bread was very yellow inside and was baked in a braid. Ori peered over at Celeborn who looked startled and pleased.

Dori lifted the cover of the closest tureen and peered in.

“Carrot soup with oranges, Bearer,” Mistress Dazla informed for all the guests to hear. “Flavored with cloves.”

Everyone did and they were thoroughly enjoying it when Kili shouted out.

“This soup is great. Is there bacon in it?”

Lindir went white and dropped his spoon.

“There’s bacon in your brain!” Fili roared.

There were further yells from the younger group. Tauriel attempted to strangle Kili with her napkin while the others threw pieces of bread and spare spoons at him. Theodred and the twins found this a wonderful pastime and helped out to the best of their abilities.

Theoden looked at Dori, who giggled and said,

“Such silly little badgers. How amusing they are. Playing their funny pranks.”

“I’m ready to swear I found Kili in the poison mushrooms,” Dis grumped.

Glorfindel was enjoying the antics and threw a roll that way while he was at it. Thranduil waited until Kili recovered and was looking pleased with himself. Thranduil tore the center out of a piece of bread, wrapped it around a chunk of butter, rose and whipped it down the table perfectly beaning Kili in the forehead.

Elessar, Arwen, and Aewandinen gasped in shock. They glanced at the older Durins, who just laughed. The younger set cheered and Kili rose, missile still stuck to the center of his forehead. He looked glowingly at Thranduil.

“Excellent shot!” he cried, delighted. “How come we never see you with a bow?”

“I prefer a sword,” the elf king replied sweetly. “Oh, Kili dearest?”

Kili leaned forward to better see the elf. “Yes, idad Elf?”

“You have a…” Thranduil tapped his forehead.

Kili removed the buttery ball from his brow, looked at it, shrugged, and ate it, sitting down again.

The table roared with laughter, except for Celeborn, who looked pained, and Aewandinen who looked furious.

Thranduil groaned and muttered, “Uncle Elf? Were did he get that epithet?”

“Well,” Jani said around a mouthful of bread. “He’s our Gimmer’s cousin and yer lad’s courtin’ with him.”
“This is true,” Thorin remarked, leaning back in his chair at the head of the table, regarding his guest. “Cousin Thranduil.”

Thranduil eyes slew over Thorin.

“I hate you,” he said, lightly.

“Thrandy!” Dori chastised.

Lady Galadriel snorted in her drink and was left coughing. Celeborn gaped at his wife. Mistress Dazla returned to clear off for the next course.

The younger set of Erebor and Dale rose immediately to assist with the removal of the soup bowls, which brought their closest guests to follow suit. Elrond watched his sons with a soft smile on his face as they happily lifted tureens off the table and follow the rest through to the kitchen. Theodred was a little confused, having never done such a thing in his life, but Tilda stayed by him and coached him in dish handling.

The next course was beef steaks grilled and painted with savory sweet sauce. For the elves, Mistress Dazla produced deep cavern mushrooms. These were each as large as any steak served, and were grilled and dressed in the same way. Ori groaned. He loved both.

“Here, take a steak,” said Dwalin, “an’ I’ll take a mushroom, we’ll split ‘em in half an’ take a piece each.”

“You have the best ideas,” said Ori fondly, and kissed him right there.

Celeborn, perhaps attempting to be polite in the face of all this bread, asked, “And, how long have the two of you been married?”

“Since just after the winter,” said Ori.

“They eloped,” said Dori with a sigh.

Dwalin shrugged.

“We wanted t’ do it before I popped out our first puppy.”

Celeborn opened his mouth, as if to congratulate them, then frowned.

“Jus’ jokin’, yer majesty,” said Dwalin. “We’re both male.”

“We do have kittens and a bat,” Ori added.

“I’m only responsible f’r th’ kittens,” Dwalin explained.

“So, yer majesty,” said Vi to Thranduil, while Celeborn tried to untangle his thoughts. “Have yeh decided wha’ twigs yeh’ll wear on yer head t’ th’ coronation?”

Arwen, suddenly seized with a coughing fit, covered her mouth with her napkin.

Without a flicker to betray his horror, Thranduil replied, “I was thinking of flowering hawthorn.”

“Oh, how well that’ll look!” cried Margr.

“We was just sayin’ tha’ th’ other day, in th’ market, weren’t we, Margr?” said Vi.
Ori was sure they wouldn’t know flowering hawthorn if it was served to them as cake.

Thranduil merely inclined his head regally.

“I see we are of one mind, mistresses.”

Margr nodded.

“If yeh want t’ curl yer hair, f’r th’ coronation, yeh know, just let us know.”

“Aye,” Vi agreed, “all tha’ hair’d look a treat in ringlets.”

“Thank you, ladies, I’ve planned my outfit and twigs around my hair dressed as it is.”

Margr nodded and Vi said, “Right, pays t’ plan th’ accessories ahead.”

Ori could just imagine King Thranduil sleeping with his hair in rags and sugar water.

“But, perhaps for my son’s wedding,” said Thranduil, cocking an eyebrow at Legolas.

Jim and Ruelis snorted and after exchanging glances, concentrated on their food.

“I’ve never had a mushroom like this,” Elrond said hastily as the oldest elfin prince looked as though his frontal lobe was going to explode. “They’re quite delicious.”

“As far as we know,” said Thorin, “they’re only found in our mountain caves. They are wonderful, but have to be eaten fully cooked.”

“What are they called?” Elrond asked.

“It would be better to tell you when you aren’t eating them,” said Thorin.

“Ah. Perhaps later.”

Accompaniments included chips, and a modified version of breakfast bake that included spinach, asparagus and grated carrots instead of meat.

“The breakfast bake’s got green stuff in it,” Kili announced.

“That’s spinach, you twit,” Fili replied.

“It’s veggie bake, darling,” said Binni. “Breakfast bake is for breakfast. Hence, the name.”

“I like these things,” said Theoden, spearing a chip on his fork. “What are they?”

“Chips!” said Ori. “Fried and salted potatoes. They’re the perfect food.”

“Now, pet,” said Dori, “you know they aren’t good for you all the time.”

“I know they aren’t good for me all the time, but they are perfect!”

There were apples and onions fried together, which Arwen partook of heartily as did many of the elves.

Glorfindel ate three steaks and two mushrooms and Gimli was impressed. Glorfindel didn’t even get any down his front.
Margr’s and Vi’s voices rose again.

“An’ he wrote an’ said they had t’ put off th’ coronation ‘cause he couldn’t be bothered t’ come then.”

“Aye an’ we an’ everyone in th’ entire mountain were tha’ upset. Everyone was sayin’ He can’t do tha’ t’ our Thorin!”

“That’s completely disloyal!” Boromir looked angry on Thorin’s behalf, but Margr grabbed his forearm and went on.

“Oh, but they fixed him good, gettin’ tha’ Master Buj t’ stand fer Belegost. Bit odd, he is, but a reg’lar genius. They says he’s figured out how t’ fly.”

Ori glanced down the table but Buj was involved with a discussion with his precious diamond and appeared not to have heard the comment.

“Let’s hope he’s better at it than King Dain. I remember it well. Me mam was washin’ clothes in th’ fountain when th’ goat knocked him in.”

“I remember tha’!” Dain shouted. “It was bloody Thorin an’ Dwalin’s fault! They bet me five coppers I couldn’t ride it.”

“You rode an untamed goat for five coppers?” Thranduil asked.

“Would you do it for ten?” Thorin asked.

Thranduil reached to knock over Thorin’s goblet but the king grabbed it and chuckled.

“I hadn’t heard Dale had a king,” said Theoden to Bard. “How long have you ruled?”

“What time is it?” asked Bard.

“Da!” Sigrid cried.

Thorin said, “Bard is the grandson of King Girion, who was unlawfully deposed by a criminal headman called Calmar, who then called himself Master of Dale. That was until the people ran him out of town this spring.”

“King Thror didn’t do anything?” Boromir asked.

Thorin glanced at him and said,

“Ask Elrond about my grandfather.”

“You were not raised to rule?” Theoden asked Bard.

“I was raised to fish and pilot a barge,” said Bard.

Glorfindel asked with great interest, “How’s being king working out for you?”

“Let me get back to you in about six months,” said Bard. “We’re still rebuilding.”

Theoden echoed, “Rebuilding?”

“As Thorin said, we had a heavy criminal element,” said Bard. “A lot of Calmar’s cronies. They came in from all parts of Arda. After Calmar was gone, they left a large portion of their properties boobytrapped. I’ve already had workers hurt trying to disarm them. It’s easier and safer just to pull everything down.”

“But our Bard’s a wonderful king!” Vi announced. “I’m sure when his beard’s as long as Thorin’s, he’ll look real majestic.”

Ori watched Bard contemplating his fork with longing and he feared the man was thinking of doing himself an injury.

“Not sharp enough,” said Ori. “Besides, you haven’t had dessert yet.”

“Aye, those rotten bastards a’ Calmar’s,” Margr groused. “By th’ way, our King Bard, yeh ain’t invited us t’ tea yet.”

Both sisters cackled at Bard’s blush.

“My dear ladies,” Bard managed. “I would never dream of soiling your excellent reputations by inviting you to tea as I’m a widower.”

“Well, we’re widows, too,” Vi pointed out. “Ain’t we Margr?”

“Both of you?” Boromir asked.

“Aye, there was tha’ ol’ bugger, wha’s’s name-“

“Nah, love, yeh chased him down th’ street with th’ cleaver, yeh didn’t actually kill him ‘r nuthin’.”

Elessar sat close enough that Ori heard him say to Theoden, “Cheer up, within the first two hours I’d arrived they patted my bottom and gave me the ‘shovel talk’.”

“Sigrid’s got a cleaver!” Tilda piped up.

“That’s a dwarven honeymoon tradition,” Stonehelm told her. “The bride chases the groom with a cleaver.”

“That’s right! Kili corroborated. “She has to run down the main street!”

“Sig, are you going to chase Fili down the road with it?” Tilda asked.

Dis looked pained. “I’m beginning to wish I’d taken a cleaver to my husband after I had Fili.”

“Now, my dear,” said Dori, “if you had, what would poor Tauriel do?”

“Indeed,” Elrond commented.

“Her guard job,” Thranduil muttered.

“I am doing so, your majesty,” said Tauriel respectfully. “Did you not order me to keep your youngest son from harm?”

“I believe my order was to keep him from cutting off his own fingers,” said Thranduil.

“Ada!” Legolas cried, as this was obviously the first time he’d heard this.
“We knew it!” shouted Elladan and Elrohir.

“You did not!” Arwen argued back.

“You weren’t really very graceful as a fawn,” continued Thranduil. “If anyone could have shot himself with his own bow, it would have been you.”

Kili cried, “Idad Thorin used to say that about me! This is a great dinner! We have men and elves and dwarrow and look at all we have in common!”

“Yes, all our young are idiots!” Fili finished with a grin at Sigrid, who smacked his elbow.

“Yes, Kili,” agreed Thorin. “And already we’re creating our own, new traditions.”

“Going to Bombur’s and Erda’s inn!” Kili cried. “Remember, Idad Elf? You won the spinning contest.”

Galadriel batted her lashes.

“Thranduil! I had no idea you spun!”

“Did you use flax or wool, your majesty?” asked Theoden trying desperately to keep up.

Before Thranduil could say anything, Kili jumped back in.

“Oh, no, Theoden King. He spun in place and his robes went flying around him! Woosh! It was a contest!”

Glorfindel grinned at Thranduil.

“You spun around in a contest at an inn?” he asked.

“He wasn’t really in the contest,” Kili said. “We told him, he was the judge. Fili and Nori were wearing Sigrid and Jani’s bathing costumes, with skirts, you know, and Nori had the advantage because his costume had great gobs of lace, but King Thranduil said they weren’t doing it right, so he showed us all how to do it and so we all decided that he won! Only, we had forgotten to figure out what the prize would be.”

Bard stared at Fili in horror.

“You wore Sigrid’s bathing costume?”

“Not while she was in it,” said Fili.

Bard opened his mouth, but settled for, “And what was Sigrid wearing?”

“Mine,” said Fili simply. “It was more comfortable and it covered her better.”

“Oh,” said Bard, unable to protest more coverage rather than less.

Dipfa was not as easily appeased.

“You wore Princess Sigrid’s skirt? You must have had to twist it out of shape!” she practically yelped.

“Let’s not tell her about the pajamas, shall we,” muttered Thranduil.
Thorin sputtered into his ale.

“No, you should tell her,” said Dori airily and loud enough for Dipfa to hear, “then she can make you more pajamas, Thrandy dear.”

Dipfa opened her mouth, as if in outrage, then closed it in obvious confusion.

“I don’t recall making you any pajamas, your majesty,” she said politely to Thranduil. “Does the atelier have your measurements on file?”

“They were the ones you made for Dori, Mistress Dipfa,” said Thranduil carefully. “She was kind enough to lend them when my son, Legolas, Tauriel, and I were caught out in a storm with no change of clothing and had to take refuge at the inn. They were certainly short on yardage, but the most comfortable pajamas I’ve ever worn. When I bother to wear any at all.”

Bard busied himself with his chips, red to the ears.

“I don’t believe I made pajamas for the Bearer, either.”

“The blue and white ensemble, dear,” said Dori.

“The mattress,” Kili helped, nodding.

All the young people, who had been at the inn laughed.

Dipfa appeared deep in thought, then a change swept across her face and her mouth dropped open.

“That’s why the material looked so comfortable! Oh, Mahal’s dimpled knees! Bearer, I made you look like a mattress! I’m so sorry!”

And she burst into tears right there.

Buj tried to comfort her, but she seemed inconsolable.

“But it was a brilliant mattress!” Kili tried to be helpful. “It looked great on King Thranduil! And he didn’t have anything else to wear except the bedsheets!” The young set heartily agreed with him but it was to no avail.

Glorfindel howled, “You wore the bedsheets! Was this before or after the spinning contest?”

Elrond coughed as he seemed to have inhaled his wine.

“Kili!” said Sigrid.

“Yes, Sig.”

“Please stop talking!”

“If you like,” said Kili, jubilantly.

“Kili is right,” said Thranduil. “They were quite delightful. I would happily order more.”

“You w-would?” Dipfa sobbed.

“Did I not just say so?”
Dori got up, went around the table, and patted Dipfa on the shoulder and wiped her eyes.

“You see, my dear? It turned out for the best. Mahal blessed you with a brilliant idea when you made that mattress… er, ensemble.”

Elrond, who seemed to have recovered, said, “When did all this happen?”

“About a week ago,” said Dori.

“And we’re going again next year,” said Thranduil.

“My nephews and I won the water fight. We get the lake facing rooms,” Thorin reminded everyone.

Thranduil frowned and Ori thought he may have tried to kick Thorin under the table.

Elrond thought about it and said cheerily, “I believe I can arrange to be there.”

There were cheers from Elladan and Elrohir. Lindir balked slightly, then appeared to be taking the idea into consideration. Arwen and Elessar exchanged grins.

Thorin muttered something about leaving for the Sea of Rhûn.

Ori had a feeling the inn was going to be very crowded next year.

Just then Mistress Dazla entered to clear away for the next course and the young people again rose to lend their assistance.

Dessert was brought forth, a choice of apple pie or hot, mixed-berry crumble with either sweetened, cold cream or hot custard.

Everyone happily dug in to one or the other or both, the conversation dwindling to the sound of chewing and lip smacking. Mistress Dazla was just bringing in more coffee when the ravens in the courtyard erupted in caws. The guests all exchanged glances but Ori knew by the tone, it was a welcome to a known personage. A moment later,

“Aye, I’m here,” said a merry voice at the door. “Where’s the beer?”

A short, rather slight dwarf with coal black hair in an explosion of curls peered around the sitting room doorjamb. He was about Bofur’s age or a little older, Ori thought, and had the same mischievous twinkle in his eyes.

“Chat!” Thorin cried, rising in amazement. “We weren’t expecting you until tomorrow!”

“Should I go away and come back then? Ooo, is that pie?”

“Sorry, Chat,” said Dain, “it’s gone. We ate it all.”

“Says you, yah wing nut,” the newcomer replied.

“All right, we’ll do this expeditiously,” said Thorin. “Everyone, this is King Snur of Ered Luin. Please introduce yourselves as the opportunity arises, and, for your own safety, keep your fingers away from his plate.”
Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The elves, the men and King Snur - ‘Chat’ or ‘Chatty’ to his friends - are all here and there’s more to arrive! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Dori rushed forward. The moment Snur caught a glimpse of her, he smiled with pleasure. “Yer that Bearer I been hearin’ about.” He bowed in a very courtly manner and said, “Yer quite the happy little eyeful, pardon me sayin’ so.” “Thank you, King Snur,” said Dori with a twitch of her lips. “Or shall I call you Chat as Thorin does?” “Chat’s fine,” the Broadbeam monarch grinned as Dori patted his arm and said, “Would you like to freshen up and we’ll make you up a dinner plate?” “Yep, I should prob’ly wash half a’ Arda off me hands before I eat with ‘em. Don’t worry about the meat if you’re short - Ha! That was funny! I’ve had enough beef jerky to plug up the plumbin’ til’ Telphor’s Day.”

Elrond and Thranduil choked in unison but pretended it hadn’t happened.

Bifur and his family rose from their seats and bowed to Snur. “Well, all the Urs’re here t’night, thankya,” said Snur approvingly. “When’re yah comin’ f’r a visit, then? I got at least a dozen a’ conies with y’r names on ‘em.”

Jani said with a grin, “I’ll be ridin’ back in yer saddlebags if that’s the case, yer majesty.” “There’s room,” he assured her.

When King Snur returned from his ablutions, Ori couldn’t see they had made much impact, though he was wearing a clean tunic.

Thorin came forward to smack foreheads with him and they embraced. Balin fetched another chair and Thranduil moved a little to allow Snur to sit with King Thorin. It took a moment for Aewandínen to realize he was being shoved down to make room for a dwarf and he complied with little grace, not that Snur noticed.

Mistress Dazla came in and set a large bowl of soup and a loaf of the bread before Snur. Snur looked profoundly grateful, grabbed Mistress Dazla’s hand, and kissed it. She giggled flirtatiously and smacked him on the head with an empty cream pitcher. Snur laughed and Mistress Dazla carried the broken pitcher out.

“Now, our Thorin,” said Snur. “I never expected to see such a look on yer face,” “What look?” Thorin smirked.

“That thing in the way of a smile. Are ya cured a’ bein’ the Great Gloom Biscuit a’ Erebor, then? Did ya fall an’ hit yer head?”

Thranduil cackled delightedly.

“Who says I’m not allowed to be happy?” Thorin challenged him, lazily.

“Oh, yer allowed, but I wasn’t expectin’ yah t’ take advantage of it, if yah get me meanin’. Can’t imagine what it would take t’ make Thrain’s son smile.” Throats were cleared around the table.

With a sly grin, Dori revealed, “It was just the matter of a hobbit.” “A hobbit? What? One a’ them little, furry-footed fellers? Where’s he hidin’, then, Thorin? In yer pocket?”
“At the moment, he’s in Gondor, publishing a book,” Thorin responded loftily.
“So it’s the bookish types ya go f’r, is it? Glad ya figured it out.”
“He has a lot of facets to his character,” said Thorin.
“He’s good in th’ sack, in other words,” grunted Snur. “Really, who could blame ya?”
Tilda whispered at volume, “Why is someone in a sack?”
Snur looked startled, then peered down the table at Tilda. He was clearly mortified.
“Oi! Pardon me, little mistress. Didn’t realize there was a pebble in th’ room. I meant he must be good at sack racin’, ya know. Our Thorin’s fond a’ games.”
“Sigrid says he won twice at Shimmy.”
“Shut up, Til’ dear,” said Sigrid through a tight smile.
Mistress Dazla came in with Miss Oqizla, to bring Snur his meat and remove his first course.
“Thank you Mistress Dazla, Miss Oqizla,” said Thorin. “Chat, what is that in your beard?”
“What ain’t in me beard? I could hide a mine cart in there.”
“May I?”
“Help yerself.”
Thorin carefully reached in, watched by a fascinated Thranduil, and extracted a tiny, bright purple bow.
“Ha!” Snur cried. “Th’ cheeky little things! I was takin’ a nap an’ me pebbles thought they’d gussy me up a bit. I thought I’d found ‘em all.”
“Would you like to keep it as a souvenir?”
“Nah, you go on. Have it bronzed t’ remember me by.”
“Ah!” Dori said, in a reminiscent tone. “I remember when I used to dress my little Ori’s hair with those.”
Lady Galadriel relieved Thorin of the ribbon and giggled as she examined the tiny thing.
“Whadaya put in her hair now?” Snur asked.
Ori rolled his eyes and wanted to slide under the table. He could feel Dwalin silently chuckling at his side.
“His husband does it now,” said Dori with a gusty sigh and a smile at Ori, who although mortified, stood and bowed.
“Ori of Fundin, your majesty,” he said.
“Please t’ meetcha. Wait, aren’t ya th’ one who married that lummox Dwalin?”
“Th’ lummox is right here, Chat,” Dwalin growled without heat.
Snur pretended to squint at him and jump in startlement.
“Oi, Dwalin, sorry, I barely recognized ya. Yer shorter an’ wider since last we met.”
Dwalin cracked his knuckles.
“Nope. Yer thinkin’ a’ Balin.”
Balin cocked an eyebrow and said, “Wider, no’ shorter, an’ sharp enough f’r th’ both a’ us, thank Mahal.”
“Yeh weren’t so sharp when our Ori took yeh prisoner an’ chained yeh t’ yer own desk.”
“Dwalin!” Ori hissed.
“What?” Dwalin asked him, grinning. “Yeh were very brave.”
“I was very stupid.”
“Nah, yeh just didn’t know.”
Ori noticed that the table had gone silent. Bard, his children and all the visiting royals were completely agog.
“When was this?” Bard asked.
“Oh, I think we was married, wha’, two days?” said Dwalin carelessly.
“Yeh weren’t so sharp when our Ori took yeh prisoner an’ chained yeh t’ yer own desk.”
An oink of outrage reached them from the fireplace.
“Ohhh, aye, I’d just come back from Gondor,” said Balin, leaning back in his chair, warming to his story. “There was a storm an’ I was muddy from beard t’ boots…”
Balin told the tale with gusto and, by the end, everyone was laughing, even Ori, because with time and distance he realized how ridiculous it was.

“I can tell this is yer favorite story, Balin,” Snur gasped for breath. He looked at Ori. “I’m goin’ t’ stay on yer good side.”

“Are you afraid I’ll smack you with the flat of a dull sword, your majesty?”

“Lad, it took brass t’ do what ya did, defendin’ yer family home. No wonder yer Dwalin’s One.”

Now Ori felt his cheeks heating. He turned his face into Dwalin’s beard, which always brought him comfort. He wondered if he’d ever have the chance to return the favor. He wondered if he’d ever have a real beard.

Dis asked, “Forgive me forgetting to ask before, Chat, but how is your wife? Raising two children is an exhausting endeavor.”

It was then that Ori remembered to whom King Snur was married, and who she was supposed to marry, and who she ended up trying to seduce by accident.

“Dwalin,” he hissed, “tell Bard not to mention what Queen Givris did to Elrond. Tell him I’ll explain later!”

Dwalin breathed out, turned, and quietly spoke to Bard. Ori hoped he remembered to include everything.

Snur was expounding on his badgers and family.

“So I said, ‘Me dear, why’d’ya want a lake when we’ve all this water at the back door?’ And she says ‘Reasons.’ an’ smacks me over the head with the great seal o’ Ered Luin. Good thing it’s made o’ granite.”

“Good thing your head is made of granite,” Thorin teased.

“Aye, ’tis at that.”

All the elves around them, except the eldest prince, chuckled appreciatively. Mistress Dazla came back in with coffee and dessert for Snur. He finished the dessert at speed, put a huge blob of the sweetened cream into his coffee, stirred, and drank it back with a sigh of fullness.

Bard was now talking with Theoden King about Dale cows and the fact the horse people only had huge steppe oxen. Ori wondered what a cross between a steppe ox and a dainty Dale cow would look like.

The younger set at the foot of the table were shouting and laughing and flicking glops of custard and dirty spoons at each other.

Dori, seeing that everyone was of elegant sufficiency, suggested they retire to the receiving room. The younger set stayed behind to clear up the mess and wash the dishes.

Ori followed Dwalin through and Bard came over to them.

When Bard reached Ori, Ori grabbed him by the front of his shirt and all but yanked him down to his height.

“I forgot to tell you,” Ori hissed. “Remember when I told you that Balin was supposed to marry Queen Givris, the Firebeard dam, then he walked in on her trying to seduce Elrond? Don’t mention any of that. She’s King Snur’s wife.”

Bard stared at him.

“Bard?”

Bard swayed slightly.

“Oh, Mahal!” Ori hissed. “Dwalin!”

Dwalin lunged and caught the king before he actually went over like a felled tree. At that moment Sigrid came through, ostensibly to ask Dori something, but hurried over to bolster Bard up.

“Ori, did you overload Da’s brain again?” she demanded.

“Sorry, Sig.”

“Everyone all righ’?” Dain boomed. “Anyone need a faintin’ couch?”

“Yes! I mean, no! We’re fine!” said Ori. “We’ll be with you in a moment.”

Sigrid and Ori led Bard back to the sitting room where Elladan and Kili were mopping the floor. There was singing and splashing coming from the kitchen. Ori conducted Bard though to the bathroom where Bard could splash cold water on his face. Ori watched him, concerned with what he’d wrought.
“Blunt the knives and bend the forks—” Gimli’s, Fili’s, and Sigrid’s voices rose above the noise of the clean up.

“Wait a minute,” said Bard. “Didn’t you tell me the Firebeards didn’t have a king or queen?”

“Smash the bottles and burn the corks—” Stonehelm, Elrohir, and Kili shouted back.

“Not a real one. She used to be known as the ‘Bandit Queen’. A while back Thror tried to reinstate one of the old king’s descendants, hoping to bring the Iron Hills Firebeards under his heel and out of Nain’s control. But it didn’t take.”

“Chip the glasses and crack the plates!—” Bain, Tilda, and Elladan joined in.

“Lovely dwarf. I’m so sorry I never got to know him.”

“That’s what Mistress Dazla hates!” All the younger group chorused.

Ori heard Mistress Dazla telling the jolly cleaning crew she was going to crack their heads.

Bard looked up, listening to the raucous song in the kitchen.

“Cut the cloth, tread on the fat,
Leave the bones on the bedroom mat!”

“Please tell me they won’t do any of that,” Bard said as Ori chuckled at the lyrics.

“Pour the milk on the pantry floor,
Splash the wine on every door!”

“Oh, no, they’re just teasing. When they finish, everything will be exactly as she likes it. We cleaned up for Bombur and Erda while we were at the inn.”

“Dump the crocks in a boiling bowl!
Pound them up with a thumping pole,
When you’re finished, if they are who-o-o-o-le!
Send them down the hall to roll!”

There was the merry sound of Randibur’s flute and more shrieks and giggles.

“That’s what Mistress Dazla hates!” came the final combined shout.

Ori walked through, Bard on his heels. They went to the kitchen door and looked in. Mistress Dazla was inspecting her perfectly clean, shining kitchen with a satisfied smile; her underlings applauded and thanked the young people, who had done all their chores for them. The young people, proud of themselves and somewhat messy and damp, bowed in return.

Bard looked down at Tilda, who was hugging him around the waist.

“Look what we did, Da!”

“Should have brought you a change of clothes, young lady,” he said, with a huff of a laugh.

“Oh,” chirped Loli, “we’ve got to get something from our imad’s house, so we’ll put her in a dry dress.”

Bard raised an eyebrow as the two young dwarrowdams took Tilda’s hands and led her away followed by Randi. Mistress Dazla patted Bard’s arm.

“Don’t you worry, our Bard. I’ve got a couple of her dresses here, just in case. I’ll make sure she’s fit for company before I send her in.”

“Thank you,” Bard sighed in relief.

Ori and Bard followed the rest of the youngsters back into the receiving room.

“The dishes are clean and conquered!” Kili shouted by way of announcing their entrance.

Elladan went and sat on the arm of his father’s chair. “I now know how to mop a floor, Ada. Aren’t you proud?”

“Was it up to Mistress Dazla’s standards?” Elrond asked, dryly.

“Indeed it was, she praised my work and said Elrohir is a ‘dab hand’ at putting leftover food away.”

“Then I am proud of both of you…I think.” Elrond chuckled. “Mind, I have no idea how to do either.”

Ori watched as Fili brought Sigrid over to Elessar and Arwen. They chatted for a bit then Fili said something and Sigrid blushed and gave him a shove. Arwen laughed and leaned down to kiss Sigrid’s cheek and Elessar exchanged a handshake with Fili.

Boromir, Dwalin, and Dain stood in the center of the room, Dwalin facing off with the Gondorian captain. Ori thought there was a bout starting but just as Dwalin lifted his axes, he frowned and barked something to Boromir. Boromir looked confused and cocked his head.

Dwalin passed his axes to Dain, went over and corrected the man’s ready stance.

“Here, laddie,” Dwalin took hold of Boromir’s hip and shoved him back slightly. “Yer center’s up here. Yeh wan’ t be a little forward t’ spring, ‘cause yeh want t’ drive ‘em back.”

Dwalin went around behind him and forced Boromir’s other knee to bend slightly.

Boromir’s eyes widened with surprise.

“This is much better!”

“Aye, yer pushin’ forward, remember.”

As Dwalin was giving the impromptu lesson, Dain took the part of the aggressor and soon Boromir was delighting in new moves and feints.

Gimli and Legolas stood near watching and occasionally mirroring what Dwalin was teaching. Glorfindel, Margr, and Vi shouted encouragement at the clashing of steel.

Dori held court on the comfortable couches at the fireplace near the great stair. Theoden, Galadriel, Bard, Thranduil, Snur, Elrond and the older Durins enjoyed themselves there. Roäc and his harem of females perched around them. Theoden kept looking over his shoulders at the ravens, who preened and stared right back, saying nothing, but cawing occasionally.

As far as Ori could see, the conversation was mostly the guests getting to know Ruelis and Jim. Floris put Biscuit through his tricks. At the end, Lady Galadriel was moved to put out her hand.

Biscuit, directed by Floris, offered a polite paw. Galadriel was charmed.

Bifur and Tharkûn sat on a bench near the fire and smoked their pipes.

The youngsters gathered at the far fireplace near the entry door, now closed and bolted for the night, playing with the Fundin House animals with Chopper and a few of the ravens who consented to play along.

After some time, which Ori spent admiring his husband, there were raised voices and Gridr crossed to where her nieces and nephew were coming in. Tilda was resplendent in a white dress with puffed sleeves and the hem dropped almost to her ankles. There was foaming white lace at her throat, her sleeves and the hem of her skirt. She wore white kidskin boots, tied with lace ribbons.

Ori clamped his hand over his mouth. Omi and Loli had popped Tilda into one of their West Farthing dresses that they wore when the Urs came to dinner with the Durins that first time. Ori smiled to himself. What a long time ago that seemed. They were all just being introduced and getting to know one another. Now, in a matter of a couple of months, they were a close-knit family.

Tilda skipped over to Bard by the fireplace to show off her finery. Bard pretended not to recognize such a grown up young lady, rose, and bowed over her hand, requesting an introduction. She shrieked, blushed, and hugged him hard. Everyone nearby laughed and complimented Tilda.

Dori brought her over to sit with herself and Galadriel.

Loli and Omi and Randi converged on their imad, talking at the same time and at volume until Gridr shouted for quiet and told them they must ask the Bearer’s permission.

Dori looked up eagerly.

“Oh, my permission is required? Is someone getting married?”

Loli, Omi, and Randi hurried over to Dori. Randi carried a large, deep basket. Ori had a premonition as to what that basket contained.

Thranduil looked into it, as did Dori. Dori laughed heartily and Thranduil face palmed, much to Celeborn’s surprise.

“Very well,” Dori said, magnanimously. “But only for those who would like to participate. You are going to have to ask our deary to move his battle training over a little, if you’re doing that.”

The young Urs cheered which brought the rest of the youngsters over to Randi. Fili and Kili shouted excitedly as they saw the contents of the basket.

Randi put the basket down and lifted up the large music box from the inn.

Bombur, Erda, and Bifur rose and headed for the door.

“Where are you going?” Thorin asked teasingly.

Bombur gave a weighty sigh. “To make azzip and fruit soda water.”
Loli bounced up to Elessar and Arwen.

“Would you like to lead the dance?”

The couple exchanged glances.

“Certainly, “ Arwen said brightly. “What dance are we doing?”

“The wag!” Loli stated importantly.

The Gondorian couple looked at each other again, both shook their heads and Elessar smiled to Loli.

“My lady and I are not familiar with that dance-”

“But it’s from Gondor!” Loli insisted.

Dipfa came over and elucidated.

“The musical troupe is called the White City Bang Crash. They are famed for their invention of the dance the Beleghost Body Wag and the current favorite of their tunes is ‘Ghostriders through Anórin’.”

Buj nodded wisely and added, “The troupe is considered to be on the ‘cutting edge’ of music and most educated musicians refer to it as ‘musical graffiti’.”

“Musical graffiti…” Elessar managed, his eyes widening with glee and Arwen fought to control her face.

“Oh by all means,” the elf lady said in a tone shaking with laughter, “do show us how to…er…wag.”

The Ur badgers grinned hugely at her and the rest of the younger set began to try and cajole the elders to join in. Thorin rose and grinned at Thranduil, who rolled his eyes and glided to his feet.

“C’mon, Chat,” Thorin called. “Dancing is good for the digestion.”

“I’m game,” Snur hopped up.

Lady Galadriel rose and, taking Bard’s and Tharkûn’s hands, led them out to the center of the room. Since Dwalin had called a halt to the battle training, Dain, Sculdis, and Boromir looked intrigued. Glorfindel and the sisters came over immediately at the word ‘dance’.

Theoden stayed with Dori and the others elders at the fireplace, though they did move the furniture around to watch.

There was a quick lesson, which Ori remembered well, grinning up at Dwalin. Loli, Omi, and Randi demonstrated. Arwen and Elessar nearly collapsed in giggles but tried their best. A laughing Boromir fell over but Margr yanked him unceremoniously to his feet again. Buj and Dipfa wagged with great solemnity and dignity. Floris had Theodred under control and they wagged enthusiastically. Kili, Fili, Tauriel, and Sigrid wagged with the ease of experience, coaching Bain and Stonehelm. Elladan and Elrohir started improvising.

The music was put on and everyone commenced wagging in earnest.

“I like this!” shouted Chat, his arms pinwheeling wildly.

Thorin, Ori and Dwalin wagged, laughing at the others. Tilda was squealing and Bard was not having any luck with shoogling his shoulders and hips at the same time. Lady Galadriel wove about like a willow twig in the breeze. Tharkûn had to be helped away, holding onto his hip and Elrond took him in hand. Elladan and Elrohir linked arms with Legolas and Gimli and began to add high kicks.

Lindir rose from his seat to watch and seemed intrigued enough to join in while Glorfindel, Margr and Vi wagged and stamped so hard the furniture shook. Biscuit barked loudly, running among the dancers, trying to join in. Chopper roared over and tried to dance with Dain and Sculdis but there was no real physical way for the pig to wag successfully.

The music ended and there was a rousing cheer from the participants and applause from the audience, which was laughing too hard to pass any commentary.

Glorfindel put an arm about each of the sisters’ shoulders.

“That was an excellent dance! Thorin, my friend, will we be doing this dance at your coronation?”

Thorin shrugged, “I imagine so. White City Bang Crash has been invited to play after the feast and Jim’s troupe’s performance.”
The young people cheered and shrieked with delight.
“You didn’t,” Thranduil looked at Thorin. Thorin grinned and exchanged a wink with Roäc. The raven looked very pleased with himself.

There was the sound of a bell and Fili went and opened the entry door. Granny Klak bustled in, greeted everyone, told them all to call her Granny Klak as Dearest Dori was her great grandchild then went to kiss Nori and Bofur and make a fuss over them.

“Granny’s precious badger,” Ori cooed.

Lindir who had come forward, lost hold of a snort and blushed. He glided over to examine the music box and Randi happily showed him how it worked.

“Is Nori his granny’s precious badger?” Arwen asked as they pulled a couple of couches together and Elessar, Arwen, Dwalin, Thorin and Ori sat there. Dain and Sculdis joined them.

“Oh yes,” Ori said and explained his family lineage.

Elessar seemed to ponder this for a time then exchanged a look with his lady.

“King Thorin,” he began.

“We’ve done the ‘wag’ together, I think Thorin is fine.”

“Then please call me by my family name which is Aragorn.”

“What is it, Aragorn?” Thorin encouraged.

“Suits yeh,” Sculdis commented, tucking up her feet and snuggling in under Dain’s arm.

Ori looked at Aragorn as he seemed to be picking his words carefully. Ori felt a rumble of approval in the back of his mind and relaxed.

“I really should have given you my personal condolences when I first arrived—”

“Please don’t,” Thorin sighed.

“May I ask in what way your late grandfather died?”

Thorin’s eyes narrowed but his tone did not change. “I didn’t stick a knife in his ribs, if that’s what you want to know.”

“I didn’t mean that—” Aragorn started as Dain half rose, snarling.

Ori turned to Thorin.

“It’s alright, Thorin. Aragorn is a good man and Arwen can be trusted. We can tell them.”

Both Dain and Thorin looked at Ori.

“You’re sure of this?” Thorin asked.

Ori nodded. Sculdis pulled Dain back.

“If our Ori says it’s alright, it’s alright, yeh great lump.”

Arwen looked at Ori a moment then said softly, “Grandmother said you were a seer.”

Ori shrugged and blushed.

“He’s th’ instrumen’ a’ Mahal,” Dwalin announced, gravely.

Ori rounded on his husband. “You make one bugle joke and so help me.”

Dwalin grinned naughtily at him. Dain and Sculdis roared with laughter and Aragorn and Arwen giggled.

“Wonderful,” Thorin groaned. “Now I need to go and scrub my ears out with soap. I’ll never unhear that.”

The Gondorian couple became solemn again. Quietly, Thorin told them the story of Thror’s madness, his death at the presentation, then the strange funeral, and finally the arkenstone.

“It was a dragon’s egg, Aragorn,” Thorin finished with a sudden look of remembered horror.

“What in all Arda would have happened if—”

Arwen reached over and placed a firm hand on Thorin’s arm.

“It didn’t. You averted the danger to your people.”

Thror snorted. “More like I did as Ori told me.”

“And I did what the ravens told me,” Ori put in.

Thorin leaned back and closed his eyes, then sat up, composed again, and smiled.

“And now we can begin again and give my people and Dale the help they need to prosper. That is my foremost duty. To see my people prosper.”

“You have a noble mission,” Aragorn said with a smile. “I hope I may be a staunch ally, so that both our peoples may prosper and know peace.’”

“I did mean to help you with that mess in Mordor,” Thorin reminded him.

“You did,” Aragorn smiled. “I’m glad I now know what happened. Roäc dropped the arkenstone into Mount Doom. The eruption came out of nowhere as we were on the field.”

Arwen shook her head. “Father and I were in the main encampment tent and we felt it. We ran outside and there it was. It looked like the whole of Mordor exploded. Fires burning all along the walls and the black gate. Aragorn was out in the front battle line with the armies and they stopped fighting and raced to help any who were fleeing. The orcs either stood about or ran back to Mordor and their fell master.”

“What happened to him?” Thorin demanded. “If you need to root him out, I’ll gladly-”

“There’s no need, thank you, Thorin,” Aragorn said with a smiled. “Elrond, Galadriel, Saruman, and Glorfindel found him and he has been despatched to be judged among the valar.”

“Good.” Thorin looked relived. “I was holding that thought to discuss with all of you later but I’m glad none of us need worry about it.” Thorin paused, frowning, then, “No offense, but I never cared for Saruman.”

“None taken,” Aragon shrugged. “He’s gone off to the Undying Lands. He said he could no longer stay in Arda. He feared he would end up like Sauron. Too much temptation to meddle.”

Arwen turned to Thorin,

“May I tell my father?”

“If he asks, yes,” Thorin allowed.

“Thank you. I know he will respect your privacy.”

“We’ve trusted him with a copy of the Infernal Adventures of Durin the Deathless for this long. I wouldn’t doubt his word.”

“Bilbo loves that book, you know,” Arwen smiled.

“Yes, he told me. He has translated it into westron. When he found out from us it was a forbidden volume he was suitably horrified.”

“Oh no!” Arwen said clearly shocked.

“He didn’t know. And it will be rather useful when it’s published.”

Aragorn looked startled.

“You intend it to be published?”

“Seeing how being completely insular has profited us, I rather think it might be a good idea,” Thorin answered dryly.

There was shout from the sitting room door and the Urs and Mistress Dazla and her help trailed into the room bearing large round trays, glasses, pitchers, small plates, and bundles of napkins.

Bifur brought some over to Ori and his group. Thorin and Dain pulled a low table into the middle of their seating and Bifur put down two trays. The first held a circle of roasted dough, covered in a tomato sauce, a great deal of cheese and smoked meats. The second was devoid of meat but smothered in cheese, basil leaves, and caramelized rings of onions. The rounds were sliced across into plump triangles. Miss Oqizla set down two large pitchers of fizzing fruit soda water. One was bright orange and the other dark red and smelling of black currant.

Everyone was soon enjoying the azzip. The elves were quite taken with the caramelized onions. The fizzy fruit drink was approved of. The younger group were all sitting on the floor back at their fireplace and Floris was feeding chunks of meat to Biscuit.

Chopper tore across the room toward Dain, stopped a couple of yards away and slid up to Dain’s elbow on his butt. Chopper oinked eagerly and, with a nod from Sculdis, Arwen fed Chopper a slice of the basil and onion.

Chopper ate gently from her hand and Aragorn watched, amused.

“That has got to be the biggest pig I’ve ever seen, Dain,” Aragorn observed idly.

Dain grinned proudly.

“Aye, he’s a fine wee lad, isn’t he.”

“There’s nothing ‘wee’ about him.” Thorin objected.

Ori had two slices of azzip and drank a glass of black currant. He settled back against Dwalin’s shoulder and blinked.

Dain and Sculdis appeared to have turned into Chat and Dis. Ori shook himself. This wasn’t a vision, he was falling asleep.

He sat up to excuse himself but everyone was piling up the tableware and moving about setting the furniture to rights.

Mistress Dazla and her loyal subjects came in with the bedroom candles. She and the others tenderly escorted their yawning royal guests away to bed. Dwalin put his arm around Ori.

“Sleepy, love?”

“Mahal, yes.”
Cake, Kings, and Queening it over all

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Breakfast is early today as there are monarchs (an’ we ain’t talkin’ ‘bout th’ butterflies neither!) arriving. Everyone’s very eager to pop that crown on Thorin’s head! Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori slid from his dreams and smiled. Dwalin was licking the end of his nose with the tip of his tongue. Ori giggled. It surprised him that the tip of Dwalin’s tongue was so rough. Ori frowned and blinked. Mask was licking the end of Ori’s nose.

Ori smiled again and pulled a hand from under the covers and patted the kitten. Mask was getting big. Mask purred and bumped Ori’s chin with his head. Ori stroked the kitten. Mask was getting big and a bit fat, too. Through the gloom of the dark bedroom, Ori could see that the moon had set but dawn was still not there.

Ori sighed contently. He was cozily spooned into Dwalin. Dwalin’s face was buried in Ori’s hair and Dwalin’s arms were about Ori’s waist. There was a flutter of wings. Ori glanced back. Garnet landed on the covers on Dwalin’s shoulder. The raven looked Dwalin over, plucked at the covers and walked on Dwalin’s skin. Dwalin grunted.

“Wake up,” Garnet said in her grating voice.
“Fuck off,” Dwalin muttered.
Garnet pecked the torn edge of Dwalin’s ear.
Dwalin grunted and squeezed Ori.
“Someone be’er be bleedin’ t’ death, lass.”
“Dori’s coming.”
“That’s Balin’s problem.” Dwalin snickered into Ori’s ear. Ori giggled and looked at an exasperated Garnet.
“What’s going on, Garnet?”
“Dori’s busy and so are the Urs. You two have got to put in an appearance.”
“Fuck,” Dwalin muttered again. “Give us a minute.”
Garnet sighed and flew up to the head board and settled there. Ori rolled over and laid his brow against Dwalin’s. Dwalin kissed him and they settled back for a few minute’s peace.

Ori heard knocking, peeled open an eye, realized it was still dark and shut his eye again.
“Fuck,” Dwalin hissed. “Not even five bleedin’ minutes.”
But the knocking persisted and Dori, unreasonably chipper, called out,
“Pet! Our deary! Time to get up now.”
Dwalin rolled onto his back and groaned.
“Our Dori! It ain’t even th’ arse crack a’ dawn.”
“Our guests will be up after the arse crack,” Dori replied. “We have family business to tuck up before then. Hurry up.”
The door opened and Ori heard Dori say,
“Oh good you’re here! Please get them dressed. Thank you so much, dear Agirb.”
Agirb came in and set down two large pitchers of steaming water and a basket of towels.
“Good morning, milord, captain.”
“Good morning, Agirb,” Ori replied rubbing his eyes. He levered himself onto his elbows.
“Dwalin, do you smell cake?”
“Aye,” Dwalin agreed, “an’ no th kind yeh eat f’r breakfast.”
“It smells like the inn,” Ori said in disbelief, sitting up and swinging his feet to the rug.
Dwalin rose from the other side of the bed and stretched.
“In tha’ case, I be’er put me britches on.”
Agirb poured water for them to wash.
“You’ll wear, captain?”
Dwalin turned.
“Since when do yeh dress me, Agirb? I ain’t a royal fart.”
Agirb smiled, “It’ll go quicker, captain.”
Dwalin shrugged.
“If yeh like, lad. Grab me a shirt and kilt, thanks. Love? What’re yeh wearin’, seein’ Agirb’s askin’.”
Agirb looked pained.
“You want me to handle Lord Ori’s clothes? Is that an order, captain?”
“Yeh got a problem with-” Dwalin started angrily, but Ori had a flash of intuition.
“Has Dipfa threatened you, Agirb?”
“Yes, milord. She said if I ever touched your clothes, she’d kick me downstairs as I …er… ‘don’t understand the depth of the harmony of your wardrobe’.”
Dwalin laughed and clapped the suffering Agirb on the shoulder.
“We won’t tell her,” Ori promised. “Will my dark green with currant berries do for whatever Dori has in mind, Agirb?”
“Yes, milord.”
The young servant had everything laid out by the time they finished their ablutions. He set out their brushes, combs, and bead boxes while they dressed, bowed as they thanked him, and left.

The company had gathered in the kitchen, all in various states of wakefulness and dress. Only Dori, as usual, looked immaculate in her rose colored silk robe now trimmed with diamonds instead of gray, and Granny Klak, who had apparently never gone to bed at all but stayed up all night gambling at cards with Theoden, Jani, and Boromir.
“Did you take the whole pot?” Nori asked.
“Of course I did,” Granny Klak told him, patting his cheek.
“I wouldn’t ’spect anything less.” Nori kissed her hand and Ori saw the money bag pass from her hand to his.
“Happy day, my pet,” she cooed.
Nori grinned and pocketed the ‘present’.
Ori looked his brother over. Nori was dressed in his ‘good clothes’, the set Dori had forced upon him, if only for family occasions when his underworld cronies weren’t likely to see him. He wore velvets of garnet and amethyst, and Ori was amazed to find they didn’t clash with his hair.
At his belt, Assault and Battery lounged in open pouches. The baby ferrets had red velvet bows around their necks. Nori’s hair was down and loose and Ori was struck again by how long it was. No wonder Dori swore every time he had to help Nori wash it in the sink back in Steam Alley.
“Nervous?” Ori teased.
“Why would I be?” Nori reasoned. “We’re already married.”
“When you got married the first time, there wasn’t a committee gathered to pulp you if you did it wrong.”
“They won’t pulp me. It’d upset Bo, an’ he’s already been upset enough.”
“Has he forgiven you yet?”
“Yep, can you believe it? I guess he figured Ones are hard to come by.”
“He certainly waited long enough for you,” Ori observed.
“That’s what I don’t get,” said Nori, frowning. “We grew up together. I never heard the Music that whole time. The Urs moved away, still not a single note, not until I seen him again here at the
“I can see little red hearts if I want. I’m a shit, but I’m a romantical shit, at least wif Bofur.”
“Then, all of a sudden it was springtime and cute little red hearts.”
“Cute little red hearts?” he giggled.
“Maybe sometimes you do,” Ori said thoughtfully. “A lot of things changed the day I married Dwalin. We’ve all changed. Even you’re different. Not better, of course, but different.”
“Mebbe I’ll just smack you upside the head and be done wif it,” Nori muttered.
Ori stuck out his tongue and grabbed Nori in a hug.
“I hope you’re happy forever, Nori,” Ori said.
“Aye, well, if I am, blame Bo.” But Nori was grinned hugely.
The Urs arrived, dressed much like they had been the night of that first party that felt so long ago. Bombur and Erda looked proud, Bifur somber, and Jani half-asleep, resting her head on Dis’ shoulder. Omi and Loli had resumed their fine Shire fashions, but Randi had simply donned his clothes from last night, not even bothering with his boots.
Ori half expected Bofur to appear in his plaid nightshirt with the pickaxes, but the miner was quite formally dressed, his mustache spiffed and his hair loose. Ori thought he looked odd without his hat, but he did have very nice hair. It wasn’t very long, but thick, black, and glossy.
Thorin arrived, dressed in Durin blue, and looked around the company.
“Are we ready?” he asked with a smile for Nori and Bofur.
There were nods and murmurs of the affirmative.
Thorin led the way out to the patio.
It was still dark but the starlight was there, with the barest hint of the dawn beyond the mountain. Nori turned to Ori.
“Here, Chick, hold these if ya would.”
He handed Ori the marriage beads Nori and Bofur had been wearing. Up close they were even more exquisite than Ori remembered.
Thorin, with his beautiful voice, sang the first verse of the old khuzdul blessing song and then everyone joined in. Without instruments and in the open air, it echoed all around the meadow.
As the last notes faded, Bofur and Nori joined hands and recited their oaths together in khuzdul, and Ori wasn’t amazed that Bofur could speak it so beautifully. What surprised him was how fine an accent Nori had. Ori wondered how long Nori had been practicing for this. Then it occurred to him that Dori had probably forcibly shoved it into his brain as he had done with Ori back when they were badgers. Just in case, Dori used to say. You never know when the Music begins. Ori felt vaguely sorry for Nori. Ori had known the deep, comforting growl in his heart all his life. He turned his attention to the ceremony. He intended to put it to paper and ink later.
“As Mahal has forged us for each other, let us seek to make each other happy. Let us forge a new family and a new life together, as did our ancestors.”
Except, Ori was fairly sure he heard Nori say, “as did a couple’ve our ancestors”.
Binni, Bombur and Bifur sniffled through the rest of the ceremony. Oin patted Binni’s hand but was obviously amused. Erda kept Bombur supplied with a steady series of handkerchiefs.
Gridr had provided two fine, silver brushes for them to use on each other’s hair. Nori looked at his appraisingly.
“Don’t you dare,” Dori hissed.
“Suspicious, ain’t ya,” said Nori. “Look on the bright side, me hair’s Bo’s look-out now, not yours.”
“Thank Mahal,” Dori intoned piously.
“Believe me, I am,” said Nori.
In the back of his head, Ori heard a snort and he giggled.
He leaned back into Dwalin, smiling. Dwalin kissed the top of his head.
Bofur said to Nori, “Ya want me t’ do your braid first?”
“Awright, let’s bash on wif it,” said Nori with a grin.
“Is there enough light to actually do the braiding?” Omi asked.
Jani said, “We’re miners. There’s enough light to paint our names on our toenails.”
“It’s so romantic,” sighed Loli.
“Toenails?” Randi asked.
“Shut up,” she said happily.
“Just leave me eyebrows out’ve it,” said Nori to Bofur.
“Aw, yer no fun,” said Bofur, separating out the hair for the braid.
“I suppose I could bead me eyebrows before I tuck ‘em back up,” said Nori.
“They strong enough?”
“Dori pulls me around by ‘em, so, yep.”
“Only when you are naughty,” said Dori, “which is all the time.”
Bofur took his time with the braid, actually plaiting in love knots.
“Rather fancy for th’ likes o’ me,” said Nori with a grin.
“Looks like a braided copper bracelet like this,” said Bofur.
He took the bead from Ori to clasp it into Nori’s hair.
Bifur, astonished, said, “Bo, from whence came these beads? They be worth a king’s ransom! Nori?”
“I didn’t steal ‘em,” said Nori, rolling his eyes. “They was a gift.”
“From whom?”
“Me, actually,” said Thorin with a smile. “They belonged to Thror’s mother.”
Bifur made a noise which caused everyone to look at him with alarm.
“Such things shouldst stay within thy family,” Bifur insisted.
“They did,” said Thorin.
Bifur hugged him hard enough to lift him from his feet.
Thorin said something no one but Bifur could hear and patted his back. It took Bifur a moment to compose himself so Nori could braid Bofur’s hair.
“Sorry, Bo,” said Nori, “I’m sorta throwin’ off the symmetry. Now you got two braids on one side, an’ just one on the other.”
“S’allright, I’ll just list off to the right and bump ya into a lot o’ walls.”
“Ah, romance,” said Balin.
For the hand binding, they used the ferrets’ velvet bows, which had a few chew marks on them but were otherwise serviceable.
Dori sighed, but Nori said, “Nah, that’s just love.”
Thorin opened his mouth to pronounce the final blessing, but Roäc beat him to it.
“Malah loves yeh, now go be married!”
Ori turned. The ravens had lined the mountain side, the walls and sills of the house within, and all gave a roaring caw of approval.
Nori and Bofur looked back, Nori laughed, Bofur bowed and called out, “Thanks, lads! Ladies!”
Determined to have the final word, Thorin smiled and said, “You may now kiss your ferrets.”
And so they did, and the air was filled with flying gold dust and the cheers of ravens.

Everyone except Bofur and Nori went back to their rooms and changed into everyday clothes, Ori came out with Dwalin to find that Dori, now in an incredible dark Fundin red robe trimmed with gold which daintily showed her pale shoulders to great advantage, and Mistress Dazla was overseeing last night’s dining table move through to the receiving room and set for a breakfast buffet like they had enjoyed at the inn.
The other great table that had been used at the dinner party after the scouring of Dale was set up with chairs and place settings.
Mistress Dazla seemed to have surrendered the kitchen to Bombur, Erda, and Bifur and assigned them helpers.
Huge urns of coffee and a massive samovar for making tea were settled on the end of the buffet. Nearby sat a freshly tapped keg of light ale. Large, rectangle basins filled with hot coals and charcoal were set out on thick pads on the table. More metal basins were brought from the kitchen, these filled with hot, delicious-smelling food. They were fitted carefully over the heated ones.

Ori looked eagerly to see what was available. There were flapjacks and fruit in one basin, another held light, fluffy scrambled eggs. A large mound of hash towered over the edges of a third basin, while another held potatoes fried with onions, tomato and garlic. Next came lovely pile of toasted egg bread and a three enormous crocks, one of marmalade, another of mixed berries and the biggest of elderberry jam. A vast basket cradled hot scones straight from the oven. There was a basin full of freshly grilled bacon and one of steaming sausages and at the end sat a great joint of cold, roasted beef.

Theoden and Theodred came down the stairs, Theoden ostensibly admiring the house but Theodred obviously following his nose to the food.

Dori greeted them and bade them to help themselves and be comfortable. Theoden headed straight to the beef and ale. Theodred wandered the entire length of the buffet table and took a sample of everything. Dwalin helped himself to buttered toast and a great deal of bacon. Ori took four slices of buttered toast and made sausage sandwiches for himself.

Thorin filled his plate with eggs and beef and sat opposite Theoden. He nodded to Ori and Dwalin who seated themselves near, Dwalin beside Thorin, and Ori opposite, beside Theodred. Thorin, after watching Theoden drain half his tankard of ale and put away a few slices of beef, thoughtfully passed the man the mustard. Theoden raised his eyebrows, mouth full.

“Try it,” Thorin encouraged. “It’s very different from the smooth mild stuff you men make.”

Theoden took the small crock, peered inside, sniffed, knifed up a dollop and spread it over a slice of his beef. He shoved the slice in his mouth and his eyes lit up.

“This is wonderful! Such flavor!”

“You should try these flapjacks, Father,” Theodred said, obviously having the same flavor party in his mouth Theoden was enjoying. Theoden took his fork and helped himself to some from his son’s plate. He nodded, smiling.

“You dwarfs, sorry, dwarrow, certainly know how to cook!”

Thorin smiled.

“I understand you have great herds of steppe cattle.”

Theoden laughed.

“Yes, we do. Bard and I have an idea about crossbreeding with the Dale stock. But if you want the plain beef, we’ll certainly set up trade.”

“Well, we do like our mustard and now so do you,” Thorin teased.

“Nothing like a good steak,” Dwalin commented, mouth full. Ori nodded his agreement.

The guests began filing in one by one in various stages of spiffiness and all yawning.

Celeborn and Galadriel were immaculate and ethereal as always. Elrond looked relaxed and Lindir pensive. Greeting were exchanged lightly and the guest were directed to the food.

Elrond filled his plate with the flapjacks and a pile of potatoes. Lindr went with four scones with different jam on three and a small spoonful of egg on the last. Both elves partook of tea.

Lady Galadriel was still hovering over the loaded buffet. Celeborn had two scones with marmalade and took a cup of tea. The lady finally arrived at the dining table carrying one plate with several slices of toast, another plate entirely covered in bacon and the crock of elderberry jam tucked in her elbow. Celeborn brought her a cup of tea. The lady stared at the tea then looked at Celeborn with an eyebrow raised in faint disgust. Celeborn put the tea beside his own and, with a sigh, went back to get his wife a tankard of ale.

Jani came in with Dis and Jani patted the lady’s shoulder.

“That’s a lass! Set yerself up f’r the day. Always like a proper breakfast. Love?” She looked around for Dis, but Dis was already half way to the buffet. The Sons of Groin’s household came in, helped themselves and settled at the table around those already there. Conversation flowed from all sides. Ori noted that Buj drank several cups of coffee but ate only potatoes. Ori wondered how Buj managed to live on such a strange diet for a dwarf. The last time Ori had eaten only fried potatoes for a meal as a badger, he had spent most of the night in the outhouse.

Halfway through, Binni, Dori and Bombur carried the promised cake out to the receiving room, to the amazement and delight of the party.

Ori had no idea how they managed to move it. The cake was a pink and white tower of gradually smaller layers and, being at least five feet tall, swayed dangerously back and forth over the platter. When they finally set it down Ori saw a tiny spot on the top where perched two ferrets made of marzipan, wearing marzipan crowns.

“Xocolatl, with raspberry frosting and whipped cream,” said Bombur.

“Mahal!” Ori gasped. “Bombur, it’s beautiful! This must have taken all night!”

Dori said, “If you had asked permission, pet, you could have had one like it for your wedding dinner.”

“We had bacon and spiced scrambled eggs,” said Ori. “Dwalin made them, and then he soaked bread in the leftover egg and fried that. It was brilliant! The next day we had steak and chips!”

“I would never say our dearly isn’t an excellent provider,” said Dori.

“Thank yeh,” Dwalin replied, giving Ori a hug.

Dis managed to stop Kili from actually face-planting in the cake, but looked like she might be tempted herself.

Nori and Bofur traded knives to each cut a slice of cake and make a wish. Dori had insisted these not be their boot knives, but Ori was sure he would eat this cake off his own boot knife and not think twice about it.

The happy couple fed each other a bite of cake, though the way Bofur’s finger lingered in Nori’s mouth actually made Ori blush and Thorin and Dwalin snicker.

“Knock it off,” Dori hissed. “There’re badgers in the room.”

Ori looked around.

“Where?”

Dori raised an eyebrow and Nori said, “Let it go, Dor, he’s a grown dwarf.”

Ori made a face at his brothers.

“That’s right!” he declare, saucily. “I’m grown, have my journeyman, and I’ve been married longer than both of you, elder brothers!” Ori remembered his first thoughts about the contract and decided to be kind. “Mind,” he said smiling a little. “When Dwalin and I got married, I didn’t realize that’s what we were doing at first. All I saw with a big, long contract. I thought I was being adopted.”

“Or,” said Nori, “maybe not.”

“Shut up, Nori,” Ori snapped, blushing furiously. “Hurry it up with the cake slicing.”

“Cake!” Galadriel cried. “Oh, darling, isn’t it luscious!”

“Cake for breakfast?” Celeborn asked.

“Nori and Bofur got married this morning,” Ori informed them.

“I thought they were already married,” said Galadriel, wonderingly.

“Properly this time,” Bifur grumbled.

“And supervised,” Dori sniffed.

“Ahh,” Elrond observed. “Very wise.”

He nodded sagely at Bifur and the old warrior came over to the elf lord and they solemnly shook hands.

“Well,” said Nori, “we’ve had a weddin’, we’ve had cake. Come on, Bo, time for the weddin’ night.”

“No, you don’t,” Dori said indignantly.

“What?” Nori challenged. “We can’t go around all… whatyacall… unconsummated.”

“You’ve consummated enough for this life time,” Dori maintained. “You’ve used up your allotment. Besides, we have guests coming. Kings.”

“Why do they get to come an’ not us?” Nori asked.

Bofur snorted into his shoulder.
“Not another word,” Dori snapped.
“Wouldn’t think o’ it, our Dori,” said Bofur.
Ori had no doubt they wouldn’t give it any thought. He suspected the moment Dori’s back was turned they’d be gone without any thought at all.
Bard and his family arrived and helped themselves to breakfast. Ori looked over at Lindir, who having finished his repast, had gone to the couch, apparently worse for a night's sleep, rather than better. Ori went over with his tea.
"Are you all right, Master Lindir?"
"No, Lord Ori, I don't believe so. I was up all night listening to the most wretched noise."
"I offered you a sleeping draught," said Elrond, coming sit on the other side of Lindir. "I slept quite well."
"I didn’t realize they would be at it until dawn," said Lindir. "Where does he get the stamina? I suppose he's that tall for a reason."
Ori had a sneaking suspicion, and he was afraid to say anything, but he didn't have to, as Glorfindel swaggered down the stairs with Vi and Margr, one under each of his arms, looking like well-fed cats.
They smacked him, giggling, and bounced over to Dori, putting their heads together, the better to tell her every terrifying detail. Glorfindel threw himself down in a well-used chair, pointed at the sisters, and roared, "Now those are DAMS!"
Lindir whimpered.
Marg and Vi turned to wave and blow kisses, which the huge elf returned.
Ori was about to excuse himself when Dain descended the stairs with Sculdis, smacking her on the bottom, and then she went over to join Vi and Margr, doubtless to tell Dori much the same things as they had done. Stonehelm made a bee line for the food. Dain threw himself down on the couch beside Lindir, nearly launching the much lighter elf, the couch groaning beneath the Iron Hills king.
Ori smirked into his tea.
"Sleep well, nadad?"
"When I got t' it!" Dain replied. "Poor Chopper! I had t' send 'im off t' sleep in with th' Stonehelm. He was livid, I can tell yeh."
"Stonehelm?" Lindir asked.
"Chopper," said Dain, “Thanks, lad,” as Stonehelm brought his adad a plate piled with flapjacks and a tankard of ale. Stonehelm went off. Dain used his fingers to shove half a flapjack in his mouth. "Doesn't like it when he can't hog th' bed. Ha! Tha' was a good one!"
"Isn't Chopper a pig?" Lindir asked.
"Nah, his manners're better than mine."
"No doubt," said King Snur, cake in one hand, tea in the other.
"Yer lookin’ better, Chat," said Dain.
"It's been a few years since the port opened," said Snur. "We're all back t' eaten three squares a day. Thanks f'r the supplies, by the way. Saved our sorry arses."
"T'was nothin'," said Dain. "Burns me t' think folk're goin' hungry when I kin do somethin' about it."
Snur sat on Dain's knee and they continued to eat and talk, though there was nothing flirty about it.
Ori thought it rather like when he sat on Dori's knee. It occurred to him these dwarrow had known each other longer than he had been alive. Looking through Balin's genealogical tables, Ori found that Snur and Dain had a common Firebeard ancestor and weren't more than third cousins. In fact, all the dwarven monarchs were related more closely than he had believed. Even Thorin and Hild were related through their mothers.
The sheer magnitude of their shared history fascinated him. Add all the connections growing out from there and it was no wonder poor Bard had nearly fallen out.
Ruelis, Jim, their son Fior, and Floris, with Biscuit at their heels, arrived and greeted everyone before attending to the serious matter of eating. Fili, Kili and Stonehelm sat with them. Ori noted the all three had decided to break their fast with cake first.

Thranduil and Aewandínen descended the stairs. Thranduil came to the sofa and greeted Dori with a kiss on the cheek while Dori scolded him to go and eat. Thranduil did so, then returned and stood near Elrond and Lindir with a tankard of coffee. Aewandínen looked over what was on offer for breakfast and settled for a slice of dry toast.

He returned to his father and said in a bored manner,

“I am trying my best, honored Ada, but these walls, all this stone, they inspire nothing in me but thoughts of melancholy.”

Gimli, after helping himself to another plate piled high with flapjacks and hash with a side of cake, while Legolas sat watching fascinated, looked up and grunted at the eldest prince.

“Well, yeh should’a brought him with you then, shouldn’t yeh.”

Surprised into conversation, Aewandínen stared at him. “Brought whom?”

“’S not like any’d mind,” Gimli went on. “The Fundin’s’ve got load of animals an’ there’s Dain with his pig and our wee Floris with Biscuit there.”

The warg lay on the floor behind his little mistress, gnawing on the bone from the beef.

“Pardon?” Aewandínen was now confused.

“Yer dog,” Gimli clarified and shoved the cake in his mouth. Legolas and Thranduil were instantly fascinated by the discussion.

“I don’t have dog,” Aewandínen protested.

“Yeh jus’ said yeh did!” Gimli growled thickly in an incensed manner, but his eyes twinkled. Ori had a horrible feeling this was going to end in a lame joke but he couldn’t figure it out.

“I most certainly did not.”

“Aye, yer did! Yeh just told yer da, an’ we all heard yeh, yeh missed yer dog.”

“Perhaps,” Aewandínen said icily, “you misheard me around the food in your mouth. I told my father I had thoughts of melancholy.”

“Exactly,” Gimli agreed.

“How did you think that was a dog?” Aewandínen demanded. “Have you not fully mastered the westron language?”

“I’ve mastered it fine. Yeh said yeh had thought’s o’ melancholy. ‘Mellon’ is th’ elf word f’r friend and ‘collie’ is a dog. Yeh missed yer friend dog.”

Aewandínen’s mouth fell inelegantly open. Legolas stared, his brain obviously doing gymnastics. Thranduil looked struck. Elrond groaned and covered his face with his hands. Gimli put more food in his mouth and stared peaceably at Aewandínen.

Ori closed his eyes. That was the worst pun he had ever heard and at the same time it was surprisingly good. He wondered if Gimli had been cultivating it for years or it had been a flash of inspiration.

Dain and Snur brayed with laughter then went back to their discussion.

“Young Gimli,” Thranduil said in a slightly breathy voice. “Until now no one has every been able to make a pun using any elven language.”

“Aye, well,” Gimli grinned up at him. “As they say, live an’ learn.”

Thranduil sat heavily down on the nearest sofa which was opposite Elrond. “Melan-choly, “ he murmured. “Friend dog. That is amazing.” Then Thranduil looked at Elrond who seemed to be in linguistic agony. Thranduil fell onto the sofa seat near Elrond and laughed.

Legolas hugged Gimli’s head. Gimli groused that he was eating. Thranduil laughed until the tears ran down his cheeks.

“Friend dog!” he hiccupsed occasionally.

“Ada!” Aewandínen cried, horrified to see his regal father in such a state. “It’s not funny!”

Thranduil just laughed again.

“It isn’t funny,” the elf king gasped. “It’s fucking hilarious! Mellon collie! Friend dog!”

“Ada! I don’t have a dog,” Aewandínen protested.

“I’ll have Bard get you one,” Thranduil giggled helplessly. “Your very own melancholy.” Aewandínen stormed off to the tea urn.
“That was actually very clever,” Lindir admitted.

“Thank yeh!” Gimli grinned naughtily at the steward.

“Did you just think of it?” Lindir asked.

“Nah,” Gimli admitted. “I’ve had that one sittin’ in th’ back a’ me brain for, ohhh, mebbe ten years now.”

“You sat on a joke like that for ten years?” Elrond looked amazed.

“Course,” Gimli said, loftily. “Way a’ dwarrow. Gotta hammer th’ nail jus’ righ’ or th’ work won’t last.”

“You are a genius,” Legolas told Gimli fondly from his seat on the arm of Gimli’s chair, where he had been helping himself to Gimli’s plate and tea.

“Aye, well, I coulda told yeh tha’,” Gimli reflected proudly then frowned at his empty plate.

“Now I gotta think up another. Hope it won’t take ten years again.”

“I’m so glad I’m immortal,” Legolas told the room happily. Gimli growled and elbowed him in the ribs.

“I admit,” Lindir said reflectively, “I am now rather looking forward to the next one. Are you?”

He turned to Elrond, who was smiling and shaking his head.

“It was always said,” Elrond mused, “that it couldn’t be done.”

“And now you’re unhappy you didn’t think of it?” Lindir teased gently.

Elrond raised a brow at him.

“Don’t do it,” Snur advised Elrond. “Let wifey have the upper hand. Makes f’r a happy marriage.”

“Lindir isn’t my wife.” Elrond stared.

“Ah,” Snur corrected himself. “Then let yer lassie, Linda, have her joke. It’ll make gettin’ hitched quicker, right, our Rhonda?”

“Lindir,” Elrond corrected then, “I’m Elrond.”

“Sorry, lassies.”

“We are male,” Elrond hurriedly explained.

Dori came back from sorting out Jim and his family and settled on the sofa near Thranduil and patted his hand fondly. Arwen and Aragorn came with Dori and seated themselves on the bench by the fire.

“Oh,” Snur looked Elrond and Lindir over again then, “Ya are kinda pretty in a dwarrowdam sort’ve way.”

Elrond looked startled and recovered enough to say, “Thank you.”

“Right. If ya just had a beard ya’d be quite a bonny lass, as they say.”

Lindir snerked into his cup.

“I’m cutting you off,” said Elrond aside.

“From tea?” Lindir replied with an arched brow.

Dori cried, “Oh, Lord Elrond! I have just the frock for you! Should you ever want to be a bonny lass.”

“Thank you, dear Bearer. Unfortunately I cannot grow a beard. My brother could, but, alas, the gift was denied me.”

“Poor lad,” said Balin aside as he brought Dori another cup of tea.

Arwen was biting her lip so hard, Ori thought it must hurt.

Bard, Sigrid, and Fili came over and Sigrid broke in, “You don’t need to grow one, Lord Elrond. I got one.”

He didn’t quite seem to know what to say.

“I didn’t actually grow one,” Sigrid assured him. “But I got one all the same.”

“I thought it looked fetching,” said Fili.

“You’re sweet,” said Sigrid. “But you think I look fetching with fruit on my head.”

“You thought I looked fetching while I was doing that spinning thing in your skirt.”

“I won that contest,” Thranduil announced as Kili and Tauriel arrived to hear the gossip.

Ori was waiting for the brave soul who would argue the matter further. He was disappointed there were no takers, so he threw in,
“I did some great drawings of it! I could go get them.”

He started to rise but Elrond said, “Oh, please, don’t trouble yourself, Lord Ori, we’re all certain they’re beautifully… rendered.”

“I want to see them and so does my dearest!” Arwen cried just as Thoeden, Thorin, and Theodred joined them.

Thorin smiled into his cup.
“Shall we put it to a vote?”

“Get the pictures!” Fili, Gimli and Sigrid shouted together. Legolas and Tauriel burst out laughing.

Grinning, Ori went to his room.

Ori, after thoroughly checking his notebooks twice for naughty drawings, brought them back through. They were parked on the large low stone table and everyone gathered about.

Thoeden, Theodred, Bain, and Tilda laughed themselves sick over the bathing suits. Bard got a chuckle out of them once he saw Sigrid quite properly covered. Arwen and Aragorn kept exchanging glances and nodding at each other.

Gloin and Gridr wanted to keep all the ones with Gimli in them. Glorfindel seized the one of Thranduil in the bedsheets and demanded a framed copy. Without even a pause, Thranduil threw a teaspoon at him. Glorfindel was delighted.

Margr and Vig gushed over the bathing suits, declaring them ‘dead fashionable’. Jim and Ruelis looked through, snickering and marveling at the same time. Dipfa stood near and watched the people looking at the drawings as well as the drawings themselves. Ori wondered where she would find the time to design new wardrobes for them all.

Elrond and Lindir studied the lake creatures with great interest. Buj joined them and the two elves seemed to thoroughly enjoy their discussion with Buj.

Celeborn was fascinated by Rutile’s drawing. Dis produced the spider from her hair and the three of them sat back at the breakfast table with paper and a saucer of ink. Celeborn watched Rutile draw more things. Balin went over and handed his magnifier to Celeborn, delighting the serious elf, who, after polite inquiry, examined Rutile closely. Dis basked in the attention given to her favorite and Rutile showed off dreadfully.

“King Thranduil,” said Tilda from his side, where they were all still looking at Ori’s pictures, but Tilda was looking at the elf king.

“Yes, Princess Tilda?” he said with a lazy smile.

“Do you stab yourself with your ears when you try to brush your hair?”

“Tilda!” Bard cried, horrified.

Thranduil had been lazing on the couch, eyes half closed, now he sat bolt upright.

“What?”

“Your ears look sharp,” said Tilda.

Bard groaned.

“Tilda, they’re ears, not bottle openers. Apologize to King Thranduil.”

Thranduil snorted and laughed.

“It’s alright, Bard, she’s just curious. No, little one, I don’t cut myself with my ears.” He gestured the child closer and leant down. “Here, take a look. You can touch them, just don’t pinch.”

Aewandimen, incensed, stomped out of the room, though not forgetting his teacup. Thranduil barely noticed.

Tilda very carefully touched the tip of the proffered ear.

“Oh, they’re just like real ears, only pointy.”

“Yes,” said Thranduil dryly, but with a smile.

“You should pierce them like the dwarrow do. They’d look so pretty with mithril rings.”

“Thank you, but it isn’t the custom among elves. Also, I’m afraid any ear jewels would clash with my hair… twigs.”
“Oh, I see,” said Tilda. “I do believe you’re right.”

Ori rather thought Tilda had been spending too much time with Dori and Brur, as she was fast picking up their speech patterns.

Tilda sat herself on Thranduil’s lap in a proprietary manner and made further study, with Thrandui’s full indulgence.

“You’re very pretty,” she announced. “You’re the prettiest man I’ve ever seen, or you would be if you were a man, not an elf. Isn’t that right, Da?”

Bard didn’t know where to look, but finally murmured, “Yes, it is, Til, but it’s not good manners to go around saying such things.”

“Oh, I don’t know,” said Thranduil. “Feels rather freeing, especially as you say you agree with her.”

Bard cut his eyes at Thranduil, who lofted his brows at him saucily.

“They’re flirting!” Tilda leaned over to whisper loudly at Bain.

Bain rolled his eyes and went back toward the cake.

Roäc winged through, and fluttered to a stop on Thorin’s arm.

“Swells approachin’ on the road,” Roäc announced.

“How far?” Thorin asked.

“Just the other side of Dale. I’d know Gheir’s fat head anywhere.”

“Charming,” said Thorin.

Theoden and Theodred turned and looked at him, alarmed.

“Not to worry,” said Thorin. “He usually keeps his fat head to himself.”

“No,” said Theoden, shaking his head. “That bird…”

Roäc cocked his head.

“And you are, sir?” he asked archly.

“That is Theoden King of Rohan, as you well know,” sighed Thorin. “And your manners are atrocious, as usual.”

Theodred blurted out, “That bird talked.”

He suddenly looked very young.

“Oh, I see. I’ve been remiss,” observed Thorin. “You haven’t been introduced. Theoden King and Theodred Prince, this is Roäc, King of the Ravens of Erebor.”

Roäc bobbed his head at them. “Pleasure’s mine. So, are we going to look?”

“Do all the birds in Erebor talk?” Theodred asked.

“Mostly just us ravens,” Roäc answered him in a tone of disinterestedness. “We’re birds, but we’re not birds, if you get my meaning.”

Theodred nodded, rather awestruck.

Thorin turned to Ori. “Shall we go to the parapet above the front gate and gawk?”

The younger set poured out the front door after Thorin. Dwalin and Ori held hands as they followed. Thorin led the parade out to the courtyard then through a small side door Ori had never noticed, up some steps and through the back passage to the great gates of Erebor. This was a long, narrow corridor, not meant for the soldiers to use, but to keep the occasional visitor from clogging up the halls as the warriors went about their guard duties along the walls. Ori had seen those rosters in Dwalin’s office and he couldn’t imagine having charge of that many people, never mind the entire army of Erebor.

His stomach fluttered at the thought of just the number of royal scribes he had to place in and around the throne room for the coronation. He was not ashamed to say he had leaned on Master Sadi in that, since she had actually been there for Thror’s coronation.

Who did Dwalin lean on? Ori didn’t know what he could do about this thought, other than hold his husband’s hand a little tighter. Dwalin pulled him close.

They came out to a long narrow balcony overlooking the great entrance to Erebor.

“Oh,” said Thorin, peering over the wall. “I see Hild won the fist fight.”
“What do you mean?” Ori asked.
“She’s approaching first.”
“They fought over which of them would approach Erebor before the other?” Ori was horrified.
“That seems rather… extreme.”
Dwalin shook his head.
“Those two’ll fight over anythin’. Doesn’t take much.”
A gaily colored column wended into sight on the road. Ori squinted, then Dwalin handed him a spyglass to use. The soldiers appeared first, rank upon rank, five abreast ahead of the parade
He saw archers on the outsides, then halberd-bearers with a sword-bearer in the middle.
Five heralds followed, blowing an announcing volley, then at least a dozen standard bearers carried the scarlet, orange and black on gold poles, proceeding a party of riders dressed in vibrant finery, scarlets and oranges and golds but also twilight blue and metallic blue-greens like the dragonflies at the inn, and so layered with jewels that they glittered with every movement, every motion of the wind.
More soldiers brought up the rear, five abreast again. Ori felt sorry for them, having to follow the horses.
“Look at that,” Kili shouted. Tauriel leaned to over the rail and shaded her eyes.
“Queen Hild always does everything in style,” Fili agreed with his brother.
“Look at the flags!”
“Look at the colors!”
“Look at the heralds and their long gold trumpets!”
“Is that all just Queen Hild’s party?” Ori asked quietly amid the hubbub from the younger set.
“Aye,” said Dwalin with a sigh.
“Do you think they’ll all fit in Durin House?”
“Can’t be tha’ many of ‘em.”
“Not yet,” said Ori. “I’m just waiting for the jugglers, the trained oliphaunts, the dancing maidens and the strongman with the gong.”
Thorin and Dwalin turned and stared at him, then laughed.
Ori grinned.
“I must speak as I find,” he said. “Or, at least as I can only imagine. Too bad Bilbo isn’t here.
Oh, what he could do with this. Or would Hild send an assassin when she recognized herself in his new book?”
“Yeh ain’t met her yet,” said Dwalin. “Knowin’ Hild, she’d pass out autographed copies t’ everyone who crossed her path.”
As Hild’s party paraded down the road into Dale, the men and dwarrow of the town rushed to watch them pass. Out of the corner of his eye, Ori saw a much smaller party racing along around the edge of the city. There might have been a dozen riders, dwarrow on ponies, obviously armed. They were riding as if on a desperate mission.
"Dwalin," said Ori. "Look. Are they enemy soldiers?"
He handed Dwalin the glass. Dwalin looked then snorted and chuckled.
"It's Ulfr an' Ahkn. Look at 'em ridin' like all o' Mordor's on their arses."
"What are they doing?" Ori asked.
"They're movin' a whole lot faster than our Hild, aren't they," said Dwalin. "An' travelin' light."
Thorin grinned.
"Looks like they'll be here first. This ought to be cozy."
Nori stuck his head out of the wall and peered into the distance.
"I'll give ya good odds on Ulfr an' them makin' it here before Hild, but I ain't touchin' th' odds o' Hild killin' 'em all when she finally does get here. That's a sure thing."
"All this just to be here first?" Ori asked. "Is this normal for the other dwarf monarchs?"
"I don't think the word 'normal' applies," said Thorin.
"I'm jus' glad they're doin' this outside th' city," said Dwalin. "I'd skin 'em if they put people in danger, kings, queens or no'.
"Ah, that flash of blue," said Thorin. "I wondered when he's show up. Ori, it looks like you'll get your wish."

"What?" asked Ori.
Dwalin handed him back the glass.
Ori saw a lone rider in bright turquoise… on a massive -
"That's an oliphaunt!" Ori shouted.
"Where?!?" Both Theodred and Bain yelled, pushing up behind Ori and snatching at the spyglass.
"Exactly right, Ori," said Thorin.
"I've only ever seen drawings of them!" Ori surrendered the spyglass but pushed the two young men out of his field of vision.
The beast and rider trailed Ulfr and Ahkn by perhaps a hundred yards, but they were gaining.
"That's King Gheir, isn't it," said Ori.
"Yeh recognize his colors?"
"No, he was the only one left."
Thorin said to Dwalin, "He gets it."
"An oliphaunt," Ori marveled, "an actual oliphaunt!"

Sigrid was astride the balcony rail with Fili holding her safe. Kili had hoisted Tilda on his shoulders, so she could see. Gimli was half scrambling up to the rail but Bain and Theodred were cemented there.

"What's happening out there?" he grumbled. Legolas snickered.
"Hmm?" Gimli asked, looking up at Legolas.
"Or would like me to find you a box?"

Gimli snickered, then swore, making the elf laugh and offer him a boost. In a moment, Legolas had Gimli firmly around the waist as the young dwarf stood on the rail, shouting.

Roäc gave a very ravenish snort of dismissal.
"They all sent their birds ahead to say they'd be first."
Dain appeared on the parapet and asked, "Which o' th' idjits is in th' lead?"
Nori said, "Ulfr an' Ahkn're neck an' neck, wif Gheir gainin' on the outside."
"They certainly are flying," said Ori.
"Don't let Buj hear you say that," said Thorin, grinning.
"They'll be in the courtyard in a couple of moments at that rate!" Kili shouted.
"I must see the oliphaunt," Ori decided and, scooting behind the crowd leaning over the barrier, gawking and chattering, sprinted down the stair that led to the courtyard at the front gate. He rushed out and to his delight, there stood the oliphaunt.

It was enormous. It was all shades of gray and its legs were covered in long gray fur. It was at least fifteen feet tall and Ori drank in the sight. He had never seen anything so amazing in all his life. Its ears were huge flaps of skin, fanning in and out and waving. It had the most gigantically long nose which curled and moved about, taking in its surroundings. Around the nose, jutted six tusks, each about three feet long.

Ori went over to it and stood, staring up, lost in admiration. He went on his tiptoes but that didn't help much. The oliphaunt looked down and regarded him with some interest. Ori jumped a little, then, regressing to his days as a toddler, reached his arms up and out.

"I want to hug it," he announced. "But I don't know how!"
The oliphaunt gazed at him with obvious amusement and slowly, ponderously, lowered its front end to its knees, eliciting a yowl of rage from somewhere on top of it. Ori trotted forward and, filled with happiness, laid his cheek against the big head. He sighed and looked up. A large dark eye rimmed with long black lashes contemplated him fondly.

"Look at its big eyes!" Ori cried. "Have you ever seen anything so beautiful?"
The oliphaunt wrapped its trunk around Ori possessively.
"It's hugging me with its nose!" he cried in delight. He hugged it again, spreading his arms as far as they would go across the oliphaunt’s cheek. He vaguely overheard people talking around him.
“How… ad-Ori-ble!” Arwen giggled.
Legolas groaned and Arwen laughed.
“You’re just upset you didn’t think of it first.”
Ori was aware of someone crawling off the top of the marvelous beast and sliding clumsily down its side.
The rider approached Thorin, wiped his face with his scarf and bowed.
“King Gheir appearing as you requested, sire.”
Ori realized he’d forgotten he was supposed to be a scribe. That was, he was supposed to be writing this down.
He turned and looked pleadingly around. Kacuho was there and he smiled at Ori.
“I’m on it,” he said, waving his paper and graphite pen. Loli and Buj flanked him.
“Thank you!”
Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Nodun standing near, drawing the oliphaunt. Ori returned to hugging the oliphaunt as best he could.
“You’re the most wonderful oliphaunt I’ve ever seen,” he told it. “You’re the only oliphaunt I’ve ever seen, but you’re wonderful.”
The oliphaunt made a deep rumbling noise.
“It’s purring!” Ori cried in delight. “I think it likes me!”
He turned to see Dori hovered nervously, but almost everyone else had backed away. Dwalin tried to hover nonchalantly, but failed.
“Yer majesty, is tha’ safe?” he asked Gheir.
“He’s not wearing any armor, so the beast can’t shell and eat him. It saves that for me!” snapped the Stiffbeard king grumpily.
“I want one!” Ori cried, utterly charmed by the marvelous creature.
“No!” Dori shrieked.
“Love, I don’ think it’ll fit,” tried Dwalin.
“Pet, it could hardly be housebroken!” Dori reasoned.
“An’ it’s big enough t’ break the house,” Jani said decisely.
“Aye,” said Gheir, “and only just ten years old. She’ll grow another twenty or thirty feet over time. Drat the beast.”
“Alright,” Ori capitulated, rather disappointed, “then I want to visit one often!”
“Where am I goin’ t’ find him an oliphaunt t’ visit?” Dwalin wondered.
“The fact that you’re even thinking that-” Thorin said with a laugh.
“‘Course I’m thinkin’ it. Weren’t yeh listenin’ t’ th’ vows this mornin’? We’re supposed t’ make each other happy!”
“Of course I was listening. I just don’t recall the part of the ritual where you swap large animals.”
Ori clutched the oliphaunt but felt terrible for upsetting Dwalin. He saw Jim approach.
Jim patted Dwalin’s shoulder.
“Let me see what I can arrange, eh?”
He went over to Gheir and bowed, said something in a low voice and Gheir barked, “You want this thing? Here, take it! I wish you luck! I’m staying with ponies from now on. This thing’s savage!”
Jim glanced at the savage animal cuddling with Ori, but merely bowed and said, “Your wish is my command, your majesty. I believe I’ve got just the right pony to get you safely home.”
“Oi, Jim! What are you doing out here?” Ruelis called from the gate.
“My sweetie darling, I have something for you,” Jim cooed.
Ruelis lit up like the sun and jumped up and down, clapping to herself.
“Oh, dearest! You didn’t!” she squeaked.
“Apparently, I did.” He turned to Gheir. “What’s her name?”
“Name? Why would it have a name?”
“Fanny,” decided Jim.
“What?” Gheir demanded.
“That’s what we’ll name her.” He said and turned to Ruelis. “With your permission, my darling?”

“Oh, perfect! And then our Ori can see her whenever we pass through town!”
Dwalin practically deflated with relief. Ori sent a thanks to Mahal for making Dwalin happy and buried his cheek back against the wonderful oliphaunt holding the creature as best as he could.
Ruelis approached and patted the oliphaunt’s shoulder, or as close as she could reach.
“Now all we have to do is find you a nice boy oliphaunt once you’re of age.”
Detaching Ori from the oliphaunt proved hard to achieve, he couldn’t take his eyes off her.
Jim had taken over the care of Fanny and, after he and Ori and a few others had removed the ornate wooden saddle that was fastened around her with painted leather straps, Jim said, “Right. First thing to do is get you some water.”
“Here,” said Gheir and passed a stout wooden goad to Jim. “You’ll need this to get that thing to move.”
“No! Don’t hit her!” Ori, cried, horrified.
Jim looked at the goad, then at Fanny, who seemed to shrink a little. Jim broke the goad with his knee and tossed the pieces into one of the two braziers that always burned on either side of the great gates.
“Precisely how much water does such an animal require?” Buj asked, obviously making a thorough study.
“A lot,” said Jim.
“There’s a fountain in the center of Dale!” Ori cried. Addressing Fanny directly, “Go down this way,” Ori said, pointing towards the Dale. “Right across the square, and then take another right at the green gate, then on straight until you get to the burned out space where the Courtyard Produce stand used to be—”
“I’ll help her find it,” said Jim with a laugh in his voice.
“Thank you, Jim! I wouldn’t want Fanny to get lost on her first day in town!”
He gave Fanny’s trunk a final hug, went and hugged his husband, and turned to find his brothers laughing so hard they couldn’t make a sound, only rest their heads on each other’s shoulders and struggle for breath.
“What?” he demanded. Then it occurred to him, he had someplace to be and scooted forward to take his place back. He pulled out paper and graphite pen and said to Thorin, “Ready?”
Thorin seemed to be struggling with a grin, but King Gheir only looked confused. He was handsome in the dwarvish way, with lucky gold hair and creamy brown eyes. His beard was divided in the middle and braided back into his hair below his ears. Alas, he wasn’t showing to best advantage, sporting a black eye and a busted lip.
“Who’s he?” Gheir demanded of Thorin as he looked Ori over.
“Lord Ori, the royal scribe,” said Thorin.
“Good thing for him he’s so cute,” Gheir grunted.
“Is the rest of your party expected imminently?” Thorin asked. “Or is it just you and the oliphaunt? And, for Mahal’s own sake, don’t call me ‘sire’, you’re older than I am, Father Stiffbeard!”
“The rest of my party is about five miles back and should be here by this evening. I apologize, Thorin, I’ll be around for business, but we can’t stay long at the festivities. Zavis is getting late in her pregnancy. She doesn’t have easy births and I need to be there when it happens.”
“It was good of you to come in person,” said Thorin. “You could have sent a representative, you know. Family comes first.”
“How often do you get to pledge your loyalty at a coronation? Besides, that blot of a brother of yours won’t be here. And, I heard a nasty rumor about you smiling and I knew I had to confirm it for myself.”
King Snur squinted at the Stiffbeard king.
“Hullo, Gheir. I see ya lost another fight t’ Hild.”
“Up yours, Chat,” Gheir growled.
“Not even with yours,” replied Snur with a chuckle.
Gheir bowed to the company and followed Targ inside to be handed off to Mistress Dazla at Fundin House.

As he disappeared into Erebor, Ulfr and Ahkn and their party thundered into the courtyard.
Even before he had dismounted, one of them shouted, “Oliphaunt boy here yet?”
“Oliphaunt boy is here,” said Thorin, “and the oliphaunt’s gone to visit the town fountain. Good to see you, too, Ulfr. You still have the social skills of sandpaper, I see.”
“Aye, whatever,” said Ulfr, waving his hand dismissively.

The king of the Ironfists was shorter than average, round as Buj, with a shock of white hair, braided randomly and the braids dyed varying colors, blue and purple and green. Eccentric runes marched across his face and every other inch of exposed skin in similar hues that shimmered in the sunlight, even through layers of travel dust.

King Snur called out to him, “Ulfr! How are ya keepin’, ya sorry shitarse?”
“Up yers, Chatty,” grunted Ulfr without heat.
“Lot o’ that goin’ around,” Snur commented with a grin.
“Aye, well,” said Ulfr to Thorin, executing the smarmiest bow Ori had ever seen, “yer majesty, I have answered yer summons an’ me an’ me sandpaper are here t’ serve.”

A younger dwarf, opposite to Ulfr in almost everything, down to his somber brown clothing, dismounted and followed to stand beside him.

“Me son Arne,” Ulfr said shortly. “Yeh won’ recall him. He’s just of age.”
“Prince Arne,” said Thorin, bowing.
Arne bowed in return and murmured in khuzdul, “Your majesty. A pleasure.”
“The pleasure is mine.”

Arne gave him a smile that Ori would have sworn was gratitude, but he didn’t have time to worry about it, since Arne had noticed Ori and his face lit up like a Durin’s Day bonfire.

Thorin watched this with amusement.

“Prince Arne, this is Lord Ori of Fundin, the royal scribe.”
“Aye, I know,” Arne said, still in khuzdul, and remembering at the last moment whom he addressed. “I mean, yes, your majesty.”

Ori bowed and smiled.

“Your highness.”
“I - I’m a scribe, too, you see,” said Arne. “I’ve heard a lot about you. We-”
“Alright’, enough a’ tha’ f’r now,” said Ulfr. “Yeh can chit chat when he’s off duty.”
“Yes, Father.”

Father and son bowed again and Ulfr led the way into the mountain.
Ori and Thorin exchanged troubled looks, but there was no time for discussion.

A dwarf, well-lined and white-haired, limped over to Thorin and bowed stiffly.

“Your majesty.”
“Are you alright, Ahkn?” Thorin asked.

“Ulfr’s a menace. I’m getting too old for this racing across the countryside nonsense,” he said.
“How’re you keeping, Thorin?”
“I’m keeping well, Ahkn, and you’re perfectly young enough for this nonsense.”
“Pfft! Go on with you. You know I’ll be two hundred and twelve come Durin’s Day. Old enough to know better.”
“But still too young to care,” Thorin said, pleasantly.

“Ah, you young people give me a pain. There’s Dain, there’s Chat. Hullo, Chat!”
“Morning, Ahkn. Yer movin’ at the speed a’ me amad’s busted hip. Make sure Ulfr gives ya more liniment. Ya need t’ be able to dance the Beleghost Body Wag at the coronation feast.”

Ahkn made a rude gesture and shambled inside, talking with Dain.

They heard the parade coming long before it appeared. Even as the queen arrived at the gate, the parade was still filing toward it, now slowed by the sheer volume of the crowds which had gathered.
One of her personal guards rushed forward to hold her pony’s head as she dismounted and approached.

Ori realized the dam shadowing Hild must be General Aris. She immediately fell in just behind and to the right of her queen. They wore the most beautiful light armor Ori could have imagined. The Blacklocks were known for their armory, both practical and ceremonial.

The queen was no older than Thorin, beautiful and terrible, with glittering violet eyes in her dark face. She wore her ebony hair and beard in the ‘million braid’ style of the Blacklocks, the most complex and work-intensive hairstyle of any dwarrow. It was studded with beads of lapis and amethyst which set off her eyes to advantage. Her mouth was straight, her brows were straight, but a gleam in her eye told Ori she could be mirthful if she chose.

Aris was a little older, her hair peppered with gray, braids pulled back from her face and her beard gathered at her chin. Her skin was slightly lighter than Hild’s, and her eyes glinted pure amber.

They bowed in unison, which the Durins returned, somewhat less uniformly.

“Queen Hild, you and your party are welcome to Erebor,” said Thorin.

She approached and they bashed foreheads.

“Thorin! You look brighter than polished pyrite! Now if only we could fatten you up,” said Hild. Her voice was rich, with a hint of a laugh.

She and Dis embraced and Hild bowed to the company.

“I’m sorry you didn’t arrive first, Queen Hild,” said Dis.

“Quite alright. I’m fit to be seen and they are not. Which I predicted. Didn’t I, Aris?”

“Yeh did indeed, yer majesty.”

Ori could have predicted Aris’ gravelly voice, too. It seemed to be a warrior thing.

Hild’s eye fell on Dori and the corners of her mouth curled with appreciation.

She bowed.

“Honored Bearer.”

“Queen Hild,” Dori returned the bow with amusement.

“How’s it hangin’, Hildy?”

Hild turned to Snur with a cocked eyebrow.

“At the moment it’s not, it’s packed away neatly with the luggage. It’s good to see you haven’t changed, Chat.”

“Nah, I’m too lazy. I’d need a new wardrobe or some other foolishness. Too much like work. Y’know, that Rhonda and Linda are here.”

She opened her mouth, then closed it and turned to Thorin.

“Is there a translation key?”

“Lord Elrond of Imladris and his steward, Master Lindir,” Thorin informed her.

“Ah.” She leaned closer to Thorin. “Are they an item?”

“They only needed one room, so unless one of them likes to sleep on the floor, I’d say yes.”

“Well, well. Gheir owes me fifty gold. As usual. Aris, please note that.”

“Already noted, me queen.”

Ori noted it as well. In a completely business-like tone he asked Hild, “Does he have a running credit, your majesty, or is he prompt with payment?”

Then he looked up, absolutely horrified, and lamely added,

“In the interest of the historical record, of course.”

He blushed, wanting to sink into the stone. He was certain he could hear Thorin and Dwalin stifling chuckles.

“In the interest of the historical record,” said Hild, “no one in their right mind extends him credit. Ahkn holds all the funds. And you are?”

“A complete dolt, your majesty, whose older sibling is bemoaning my total lack of manners.”

Hild closed her eyes and obviously struggled to control a smile.

“I mean, what is your name, my dear?”

“Oh! I’m Ori of Fundin, your majesty,” he said, completely flustered and bowing without grace.

“I’m the royal scribe and, as usual, I should have been gagged before I went on duty.”
“Ah, so you’re Ori!” she said, and her eyes lit up in such a way that Ori was afraid she might gobble him up.

Behind her Aris grinned at Dwalin and mouthed, “Yeh lucky shit.”

“Captain Dwalin,” said the queen, acknowledging him graciously. “You are, indeed, a lucky shit.”

She inclined her head once more and, taking Thorin’s arm, allowed herself to be escorted into the mountain.

“Dwalin!” Aris greeted him.

“Aris!”

They smashed foreheads with a crack that caused even Roäc to flinch.

“Queen Hild’s still got eyes on th’ back a’ her head, I see,” said Dwalin, laughing.

“With a daughter like ours, it’s a good thing.”

“Arivett’s still at home?”

“Aye, we thought it would do her some good t’ try t’ run thin’s herself f’r awhile, now tha’ she’s of age.”

Dwalin turned and drew Ori forward with an arm around his waist.

“This is me husband, Ori.”

“Lord Ori.”

“Oh, please just call me Ori, General Aris.”

“Then yeh should call me Aris. An’ don’t worry abou’ Hild. Her eyes’re bigger than her stomach.”

Ori’s mouth fell open and wondered if Hild wasn’t the only one who could, apparently, read minds.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. The gang’s all here, time to get the show on the road and settle our new guests. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

This chapter is especially for #Jakquill Well, our Jakquill dear, we hope the trim is everything you could wish for and more!

Ori was amazed at the grace and expediency with which Mistress Dazla and Granny Klak got the dwarf monarchs settled in Fundin House and their entourages in the old royal residence. Dis personally escorted Hild and Aris to their room with Dori along for the gossip. Even from downstairs, Ori could hear the laughter.

The elves and men came back to the receiving room from the meadow where they had been relaxing and enjoying the sunshine. The young set milled around in a herd, waiting for the monarchs to come down.

Hild, on Dis’ arm, came down with Dori and Aris following. Dis brought them immediately to present Hild to Lady Galadriel.

Hild looked rather fascinated by the elf lady, who was very gracious and friendly to the queen. Celeborn was spared a nod.

Elrond and Lindir made the queen chuckle when they were presented. It wasn’t until Elrond colored slightly that Ori realized the queen obviously knew of Givris’ ‘accident’.

Thranduil was utterly charming to Hild, which made the queen raise an eyebrow. She obviously didn’t care about Aewandínen but watched Legolas and Gimli keenly. She was mildly interested in Theoden, Theodred and Bard. She deigned to cast a critical eye over Bain but muttered to herself. “Too young.”

Princesses Sigrid and Tilda were a huge hit with both the queen and her general. Tilda, seeing the two as relatives of Thorin, welcomed them both with open arms, hugs, and exclamations about their armor being the ‘prettiest ever’.

Hild took this in stride, but Aris lost control of her eyebrows.

Tilda turned to her horribly embarrassed father and said, “It’s really hard to hug someone in a breastplate, isn’t it.”

Bard looked apologetic.

“She’s very young,” he said, “and I never expected to be king.”

Hild said, “She’s charming. She’s wholly unspoiled.”

“Thank you, I’m afraid she’s prepared to be charming all over everyone she meets,” said Bard.

“We have towells,” said Hild.

“Er….”

“I’m joking, King Bard. Please try and keep up.”

“Yes, ma’am, I mean, your majesty. It’s just so early in the day and I’ve already lost control of my children.”

Aris breathed, “Aye, we know how tha’ goes.”

“Have you tried tethers?” Hild asked Bard.

“That’s a joke, right?”
“Ah, there’s hope for you yet, King Bard.”
Dis presented Fili and Kili to the queen. Ori noted they were on their best behavior. He also noticed Dis had each of them by the back of the tunic right up until the moment they bowed.
“They are well-grown, Princess Dis,” Hild allowed. “Both already engaged, are they?”
“Something like that,” said Dis.
“Very good,” said Hild, inclining her head, dismissing them, and turned to talk to Aris.
“Why do I feel like I just lost a cattle judging contest?” Fili asked, on returning to the younger set where Ori was standing.
“Moo,” Kili agreed.
“Both you bullocks did very well,” Dis praised.
Sigrid asked, “Princess Dis, why would she be judging them?”
“She has an unmarried daughter who is of age,” Dis told her. “Not all dwarrow do things as we do in Erebor.”
“You mean, she’s trying to arrange a marriage?” Sigrid asked, horrified.
“Not exactly,” said Dis. “She’s checking on potential candidates for suitability and sturdiness.”
“And obedience,” added Fili.
“That lets me out at any rate,” said Kili.
Sigrid looked at Fili, plainly troubled.
“I don’t like it that she treated you like a piece of meat,” she said.
Fili smiled and took her hand.
“I’m used to it, Sig. It’s just how things are. Amad and Idad taught us very early not to take it personally. Besides, she nodded and sent us away directly. That means she acknowledges and respects the matches. She won’t press a suit for Arivett.”
“Which is a good thing for us,” said Kili. “She’s bloody terrifying.”
“But what about poor Arivett?” Sigrid asked.
Fili and Kili snickered.
“Don’t worry about Arivett,” said Fili. “She’s about as biddable and delicate as Ori’s oliphaunt.”
“Fanny’s Jim’s oliphaunt,” said Ori.
“Nah,” said Kili. “Jim’s just keeping her for you so you can visit once a year.”
“I hope she doesn’t forget me,” Ori said wistfully.
Dis smiled and tucked a loose lock of hair behind his ear.
“Oliphaunts never forget, Ori. She certainly won’t forget Gheir in a hurry. He’d best stay out of her way.”
Kili said, “If he doesn’t, he might become Father Flatbeard. All those widows!”
“Hmmm,” said Dis. “Then Arivett could take her pick.”
“What’s Arivett like?” Theodred asked.
“Sort of Hild-in-training,” said Kili.
“Whomever she marries, they’ll have to go and live in the Orocarnis with the Blacklocks,” said Fili. “It’s a matriarchy.”
“Oh, good,” said Theodred with a sigh. “That leaves me out. Father would never consent to that.”
“She’s a warrior,” continued Fili, “equally skilled with the sword and the axe, but she also plays three musical instruments, composes poetry and arranges rock gardens.”
“Bit of an overachiever,” said Theodred.
“Her mother expects a lot from her,” said Fili.
“Her mother expects a lot from everybody,” said Kili.
“She might do for my Cousin Eomer,” Theodred commented reflectively. “He’s always galloping around the Riddermark, slaying orcs and chasing the occasionally bandit.”
“Does he use a horse?” Kili asked.
“Of course! He has the best six horses in the royal stable. He’s my father’s finest warrior. He gets all mushy about romance and he has a great singing voice.”
“She’d eat him alive,” said Fili. “Luckily for me, she thinks I’m an idiot. I was relieved.”
Theodred snorted.
Kili said, “We met her when we were just badgers. She thinks I’m an idiot, too.”
Fili added, “I think, at one point, Hild was hoping for Dwalin.”
Dwalin, nearby, choked on his beer and winced.
Ori turned and looked at him.
“Really?”
“Too young,” said Dwalin. “An’ I ain’t leavin’ Erebor f’r that. ‘Sides, her mum’s th’ kind who’d choreograph yer weddin’ night, right down t’ which of Queen Kivi’s illustrations t’ use. Then supervise.”
Arne burst out laughing. Theodred looked mystified.
“Queen Kivi’s sex manual,” said Fili off-hand, then realized to whom he was speaking and said, “Beg pardon, Theodred. I forgot you’re not just a particularly tall dwarf.”
“Sex manual?” Theodred asked, looking horrified and fascinated by turns. “Your parents don’t tell you how to do it? You… um… don’t just put it in and your wife has a baby?”
Sigrid rolled her eyes.
“It’s a little more complicated than that, Prince Theodred, or it had better be, unless you want your bride storming off in the middle of the wedding night.”
“I think I may be too young to have this conversation,” said Theodred. “I only stopped thinking girls were yucky a few years back.”
“Perhaps you’re right,” said Dis. “Let’s turn the subject, shall we?”
Fili leaned in to speak to Theodred.
“You might not want to mention sex manuals in front of your adad.”
“No worries,” said Theodred.
The group quietened down as, having completed her circuit being introduced to everyone, Hild stood nearby and exchanged pleasantries with Dain and Sculdis. Sculdis was doing the talking, while Dain stood beside her, grinning maniacally, in a marked good humor.
“What? Our Stonehelm no’ in th’ runnin’, our Hild?” Dain teased loud enough for all to hear.
Ori watched as all the color drained out of Stonehelm’s face. Kili hurriedly took his hand to comfort him and nodded to Tauriel who automatically reached and took Stonehelm’s other hand in hers.
“Far too young.” Hild replied loftily. Her eyes found Stonehelm’s and lanced a look at him.
“Aye, it’s just as well,” Dain brayed jovially. “I was thinkin’ o’ savin’ him f’r Tilda.”
Ori almost choked and Stonehelm swayed on his feet a little.
“Please shut up, beloved adad,” he breathed.
Tilda was not so subtle.
“I’m craftwed,” announced Tilda, “and boys are icky.”
Stonehelm said in delighted recovery, “Yeh hear tha’, Da? I’m icky!.”
“S’all right. Yer mother thinks I’m icky, too.”
Bard looked confused.
“What does Tilda mean, she’s ‘craftwed’?”
“Lots of people are,” said Tilda airily. “Master Brur was, until he took up with Master Jansad.”
Bard still looked a-sea, so Tilda took a deep breath and explained patiently, “Craftwed means you’re married to your craft, not to another person. It’s much better than having babies. Babies smell.”
“I see,” said Bard. “You know, you may change your mind in a few years.”
“Nope,” said Tilda.
“What about my grandchildren?” Bard asked.
“Bain can do that and Sig is going to marry Fili, so they can give you grandchildren, or granddwarrow or… I don’t know what you’d call them. A man and a dwarf? A morf?”
“A dwan?” Kili helped.
“How about a marf?” Elladan suggested.
Thranduil tugged on Bard’s elbow.
“Come along, dear. Let’s get some fresh air, away from the idea of smelly babies.”

Ori stared as Bard allowed himself to be led away. General Aris and Queen Hild looked at each other then at the retreating backs of the man and the elf. They looked at each other again and giggled delightedly.

“Note this, Aris,” Hild said, “one hundred and fifty gold that Thranduil and Bard are married by next high summer.”

“Noted, your majesty.”

Nori’s voice sounded, muffled by the tapestries.

“What’re your odds on who wears the gown?”

King Ulfr came down next. Both he and his son were arrayed in gold. Somehow, this played up the gold highlights of Ulfr’s face tattoos. Thoroughly washed, Ulfr was fancy. Not Margr and Vi fancy, of course, but Ori doubted Ulfr wore a lot of hot pink.

Arne looked rather glum, and chastened.

Ori leaned over to Tilda.

“We should ask Arne to come over with us, shouldn’t we,” he suggested.

“Yes, we should,” said Tilda. “He looks like a bird pooped on his head.”

Thranduil and Bard had returned and Thorin was presenting them as Tilda went and curtseyed prettily in her white dress for Ulfr and Arne, then took Arne in tow by the sleeve and said, “You need to come play with us over here.”

“Arne, where are you going?” Ulfr demanded.

“Apparently, to play with them, over there, father.”

“Behave yourself,” Ulfr warned. “Uhm. I’m afraid that’s entirely up to Princess Tilda.”

They were halfway across the floor when Fili called out, “Oi! Arne!”

Ulfr looked incensed, but Hild waved him off dismissively.

“He’s with that lovely little man-child. Pay it no mind.”

Arne arrived and Kili rattled off everyone’s name.

“What are you drinking?” Fili asked Arne, as they headed to the table full of refreshments.

“What do you have?” Arne asked in khuzdul.

“Raspberry soda water, ginger beer, and something greyish I’m afraid to try, but’s probably good for us.”

“We should avoid things that are good for us at all cost,” Arne mused as the party made its way to the loaded table.

“Does anybody know what that grey stuff is?” Kili asked.

Fili smirked. “Why don’t you stick your finger in it and find out?”

“Because I’m afraid my finger will disintegrate. An archer without fingers faces uphill challenges.”

“Oh, get outa me way,” said Gimli. “I’ll try it.”

He did so, sticking his finger in his mouth, making an odd face.

“Mashed bananas? Somethin’ milkish an’ sour like that yogurt-y stuff. Skinless pulverized grapes?”

“Aha!” Bifur cried, approaching. “I did wonder whence that went!”

He made to down the whole concoction direct from the pitcher, then recalled his manners.

“Wouldst like to try this libation?” he offered.

“No,” said Fili carefully. “Thank you, you go ahead.”

“Well,” said Arne, “that was a close call.”

“Er, I’m afraid my khuzdul isn’t good enough to let me converse in it, Prince Arne,” Sigrid said apologetically. “Fili is teaching me and he’s very patient, but so far my best effort is ‘Me targe’.”

Since this meant ‘By my beard!’, everyone agreed that, yes, this was less than helpful.

The prince looked around, noted his father was across the room and turned back to her.

“I-I’m ter-ter-terrib-b-ble a-a-a-at we-wes-wes-tron,” managed Arne quietly.
“Oh, thank Eru. I don’t feel so bad now,” Sigrid sighed with relief.
“We mix them together anyway,” said Fili with a shrug.
“I-I c-c-an sing-g wi-wi-withou-ou-t t-this st-st-stammer.” He proceeded to sing: “But it’s very hard to take me seriously when I ask you to pass the buttohUHHHHHtttermrrr.”
The others stared for a moment before they burst out laughing.
“That’s great!” Kili cried. “You should do that at dinner!”
“What’s wrong with singing?” Tilda asked. “Elves sing all the time. Maybe you’re just a really short elf. We could make you some paper ears.”
“You could be Gimli and Legolas’ love child,” Kili teased.
“Oi!” Gimli groused. “He’s older’n me!”
“Ah, well,” said Legolas, “it was a lovely dream.”
“More a bloody nightmare,” Gimli growled but Elladan and Elrohir cackled maniacally.
Ulfr, having overheard Arne’s solo, was stomping over when Ori caught Dori’s eye and nodded toward the peeved monarch.
“Arne, what’ve I told y-“
“King Ulfr,” said Dori, linking an arm through his as he passed and whirling him around to face her little coterie of Vi, Margr, Dis, Jani, Gridr, Binni, and Granny Klack. “Have you met my dear Great Grandmama?”
“Er, we did meet, bu’ a very long time ago,” said Ulfr. He bowed. “Lady Klakuna.”
“Ah, King Ulfr, you’re even more colorful than I remember. You’ve perfected that skin ink, I see. As I recall, formulating the red and orange was giving you fits.”
“I have, milady, thank yeh. An’ may I offer yeh condolences?”
“For what, dear?”
“Yer a widow?” he asked, indicating her rolled beard.
“Oh, no, no, it’s not my loss, it’s his. He didn’t die, I threw him away.”
“But first she punched him,” said Dori gaily. “Right before my presentation. It was charming.”
“And how is your lovely wife?” Granny Klak asked Ulfr.
“She’s… er… lovely,” said Ulfr. “She all but kicked me rear end rushin’ me outa me own mountain t’ get here.”
“I do like that dam,” said Klakuna. “I must write her a letter. You will carry it back for me?”
“Aye, milady, o’course.”
He looked over his shoulder at Arne, but Ori noted Arne and the others were having far too much fun to notice him. They were working their way around the refreshment table.
Arne said something that caused everyone to groan. Kili told him he was an inspiration and Sigrid hit Arne over the head with a pillow from a nearby chair.
Granny Klack sighed happily.
“I’m sure your wife will be thrilled to learn how well your Arne is fitting in with the others, won’t she? It’s good for young people to socialize. Why, someday Fili will be his liege and Stonehelm and Kill and the others will be his peers. For them to become friends at a young age will benefit all of them.”
“Certainly it will build his self-confidence,” said Dis. “He seems rather shy and loathe to speak. I can’t understand why. He’s obviously holding his own with my little goblins.”
Ori let out a pent up breath and went and sat on Dwalin’s lap.
“Well done, love,” said Dwalin. “Separatin’ th’ pair of ‘em.”
“I don’t understand Ulfr’s problem,” said Ori. “So Arne stammers. Bifur can’t speak westron at all, and he gets on fine with ancient khuzdul.”
“Look at it from Ulfr’s point o’ view. He doesn’ want th’ lad t’ look weak, or give anyone cause t’ ridicule him. Also, Ulfr’s folk are a lot more traditional than th’ Durins. They still don’ like folk who ain’t dwarrow t’ hear khuzdul. Everytime our Siggy opens her mouth t’ try it, Ulfr flinches.”
“He’s afraid.”
“Aye, he’s afraid.”
“That’s sad.” Then Ori brightened. “Imagine if he heard all those little Dale badgers calling Master Brur ‘Idad’.
“We’ll have Oin standin’ by with th’ smellin’ salts.”
Ori sat up and grinned maniacally.
“So, I guess this isn’t a good time to tell him I’m planning on translating Queen Kivi into westeron?”
Dwalin grinned back.
“Oh, I dunno. Maybe save it f’r dinner.”
“Where is Tharkûn?” Ori asked looking around. “He’s already missed breakfast.”
“Dunoo, wizard business, he always says. Prob’ly in the bathtub again.”
Ori snickered and watched as nearby Thorin and Hild met up again, Aris shadowing her queen as always.
“So, King Thorin,” said General Aris, “have yeh considered our latest proposal a’ marriage?”
Ori took the ‘our’ to mean Aris and Hild’s. They we’re most certainly a package deal.
“I was seriously mulling it over, General Aris,” said Thorin, “then I heard my Heartsong.”
The two dams gaped at him, then Hild cried, “Congratulations! No wonder you’re so happy!” and actually hugged him.
“We wish yeh well,” said Aris, “an’ hope yeh have many pebbles t’ fill yer house.”
“According to the Great Woudini, I’m going to have seven,” said Thorin.
“Who is the Great Woudini?” Hild asked.
“Jim.”
“Oh! Is he a seer?”
“Sort of,” said Thorin.
“And where is your One?” Hild demanded. “When are we to expect an introduction?”
“He’s in Gondor at the moment, publishing a book. I hope they’ll be back by Durin’s Day.”
“They?” Hild asked.
“He has a young nephew.”
“I’m guessin' he’s a Broadbeam, me queen,” said Aris. “Th’ house is quite filled t' th' brim with 'em.”
“Mmm, yesss,” said Hild. “That adorable miner with the hat.”
Nori’s voice emerged from a decorative urn by the table next to Ori, “Oi! Keep your hands t’ y’rsell, your graciousness.”
Ori discreetly kicked the urn as hard as he could.
“Aye, yer majesty,” said Aris to Thorin, “if yeh aren’t going t’ marry us, at least give us some consolation.”
“He’s a hobbit actually.”
“What?” Hild asked. “Did you say he’s a hobbit?”
“Yes,” said Thorin, “one of the children of Yavanna.”
“I didn’t know they heard Heartsongs,” said Hild.
“As far as I know, they don’t,” said Thorin. “But they seem to have other standards for such things. And he’s as cute as a gold nugget.”
Aris gasped and snickered. Hild shook her head at Thorin fondly.
She looked around expectantly and Aris grabbed a glass of wine off a passing tray and placed it in Hild’s hand as if on cue.
“Love this Dorwinion,” said Hild. “Who knew the elves had such excellent taste in wine?”
Encouraged by Thorin, the queen and general went off to the refreshment table where they were joined by Aragorn and Arwen. The four sat down at group of chairs about a small table and conversed.
Just then King Ahkn came down the stairs with King Gheir. Ahkn shouted a joyful greeting to the entire room on behalf of himself and Gheir, and Gheir looked a little put out at not having the due pomp and ceremony he usually enjoyed among his own people. Thranduil came over with Dori and engaged the two kings in light conversation. Ori watched as Glorfindel came to Thorin’s side.
“That’s quite a dam,” said Glorfindel indicating Hild with his chin.
“Don’t even think about it,” said Thorin. “You wouldn’t last five minutes.”
“I’ve battled and killed a Balrog.”
“You had to slay it,” Thorin commented. “Hild would just glare at it, then eat it whole.”
“That isn’t the way to talk me out of it,” Glorfindel grinned.
“Then think of what Margr and Vi would do to you, if you dropped them for Hild.” Thorin replied pleasantly.
“That’ll do it,” Glorfindel nodded.

After a pleasant luncheon, Bofur took all the elves and men off for a tour of the forges. They looked askance at the masks he handed them, but donned them willingly enough to check for size, when he explained that “the fumes’re alright for dwarrow, but they’ll knock you lot stone dead.”
Tilda was delighted there was a mask for her and once on, she refused to take it off and marched forward with one hand in Bard’s and the other firmly in Thranduil’s.

Thorin, Binni, and Balin brought the dwarrow monarchs to the throne room to show them Binni’s improvements and let them prepare themselves for the oath-taking. Ori went along, supposedly to record the event, but, since he hadn’t seen the room yet, either, he was terribly curious.

The throne room was a cavernous affair, mainly because it had been coaxed from a single natural granite cavern, which had once been the original mine of Erebor. Ori experienced a reminiscent shudder as the great doors to the throne room opened from their place at the center of the entry hall from the great gate. The last time he had entered this room was for the presentation of Dori and Thorin had dropped dead.

Except for the dais itself, the room was perfectly level and the floor highly polished, with the aisles from the various doors picked out in lapis and white granite inlay. The room itself was mainly one open space, with neither pillar nor chair. Columns ran down each edge, supporting galleries above, which had also been left largely in their natural state. In daytime the cavern was lit by sunlight bounced down from mirror to mirror through a huge window on the southern face of the mountain. On overcast days and at night the throne room was lit with torches, centuries of which had left the rock behind and above them dark with soot. This was never removed, as now and again a gifted seer could read these shapes as well as they read fire runes.

Ori, aware of this, tried to ignore them.
Thorin walked to the foot of the dais, turned and asked the others,
"What do you think?"
Dead silence fell over the room while the visitors stood, either stunned or grasping for words.
Ori couldn’t blame them. Words were his work, but they seemed to have failed him.
"That's... well... Is the throne trimmed in... scarlet fringe?" Gheir asked.
“Fuckin’ aye,” said Ahkn quietly.
"Indeed," said Hild, nodding. "All the way to Mordor and back."
"It's marvelous, isn't it?" Binni enthused. "It's just what the place needed, a little color, a little texture."

Hild turned to Binni.
"And you were involved in this... this decorating scheme, Bearer?" she asked carefully.
"Yes, well, I had expert assistance, but we did work from my initial inspiration," said Binni, glowing with pride. He bowed in Dain’s direction. Dain beamed in reply.
"It certainly makes an unforgettable impression," said Hild.

Gheir said, "And I thought it was Dain who got his sense of taste from the Firebeards."

Dain snorted. "If it was Firebeards there'd be restraints attached t' th' throne f'r entertainment purposes."
Ulfr said, "At least this way Thorin's arse'll be comfy."

"I like it," said Snur. "Livens th' place up. All that gray was too much like a funeral, wa'n't it. Durins don't always have t' be gloomy. It's not a law, right?"

He turned and shot Ori an inquiring look, as if Ori somehow had mental access to the complete
'gloom' bylaws of Erebor.

"I don't recall coming across such a rule, your majesty," said Ori. "But Balin might be know."
Balin muttered, "Thanks, wee brother, tha's one I owe yeh."
"Any time," Ori replied out of the corner of his mouth.
"And to go with all this," said Thorin, "a new crown. Binni?"
"Here it is!" Binni cried merrily.
He handed Thorin something that Ori first mistook for a metallic jockstrap. Thorin put it on and Ori slapped his hand over his mouth.

It was a band of silver lame, strung along the edge with masses of vermilion ball fringe. It fell down in front of Thorin's face and over his shoulders and his beard and onto his chest. He crossed his arms

"What do you think?" he asked with great dignity.
"You are joking," said Hild. "Arent you?"
Dain snickered.
"Looks like a skirt tha' Dipfa lass would make."
Snur added, "Or a skirt one o' them fancy hoochie dancin' dams'd wear."
Thorin chuckled and removed it.
"I am joking. It would be rapturous though, wouldn't it."
Ulfr let out a pent up breath.
"Thank Mahal. I couldn't come up with anythin' nice t' say about it, 'cept I was glad th' balls weren't blue."
"It's not a crown, but it will be used," said Thorin. "See the benches in the aisles under the galleries?"
"Those are new," said Gheir. "Of course, everything's new if you haven't seen it in a century."
Indeed, they were new, and rather comfy looking, actually. They were all slightly different. Some were like fainting couches, with a sort of arm rest at one side. Others were overstuffed and tufted like sofas. All of them had skirts of ball fringe in various colors.
Thorin said, "Binni realized there was no place to sit in here unless you were the king."
"No one is supposed to sit in the presence of the king," said Hild with great dignity.
"Not unless he allows it," said Thorin. "And I'm not going to tell a heavily pregnant dam with swollen ankles or someone past their third century mark that they have to stand through my entire coronation. Of course, this means whoever sits has to be very careful that their outfit doesn't clash with the upholstery."
"Dreadful notion," said Binni. "I tried to ensure we had variety on that score alone."
Ori wondered where Vi and Margr would sit.
"You succeeded," said Gheir to Binni. "Am I to understand all this was made in a week?"
"Only the upholstering," said Binni. "Long ago these benches were placed much as you see here, but then they were put in storage for some reason. And they were just bare wood. Oh, there were some plain stone ones, too, which would be fine for the garden on a nice day, but it's already cold enough in here to freeze your gems off."
Gheir bowed.
"Just as you say, Bearer."
Binni winked at him.
"Say, Thorin," said Snur, "are those pillows made o' bacon?"
"They've been dyed to resemble rhodochrosite," stated Binni, "which denotes release of sorrow and attracts unconditional love, happiness really."
"Bacon always makes me happy," said Snur by way of approval.
Ori took notes while Thorin walked the kings around the hall, explaining the structure of the ceremony. The great doors to the entry cavern would be flung wide open, all the doors would, in fact, between the great gates and the throne room. The visiting monarchs seemed a little surprised but didn't comment. Ori rather thought this 'extension' of the throne room was a good idea. It was likely that all of the mankind in Dale and surrounds would attend, along with every dwarf in the near vicinity. Sigrid had told him about the frantic rush of the people of Dale to deck themselves out in the finest clothing they could afford. The excitement and energy nearly overshadowed the rebuilding projects.

After they took in the throne room, an ornate carriage with seating for all arrived, pulled by Gnasher and Grinder. The visiting monarchs were treated to a tour of the City of Erebor.

Ori was glad to see the mouth of the royal cavern before them. It had been a long day. The ride itself had been comfortable, and many of the people of Erebor had turned out to see the other dwarf monarchs. Ori waved to the people he knew but concentrated on noting down everything that passed between the kings and their liege presumptive. All seemed to truly appreciate the tour. The library had elicited gasps from the monarchs, as they had never been shown it before. Ori had the feeling that Thror had merely fed and stabled them, heard their oaths, and sent them on their way. Hild and Ahkn seemed ready to hop down and start shopping. Gheir and Ulfr made noises about seeing the forges. Thorin told them they would be treated to extensive tour of the forges and metal crafting areas the day after the coronation. Hild almost drooled at this promise and Gheir wasn’t far behind.

As they rolled into the royal cavern, all the visiting entourages were turned out in uniform to greet them. Gheir was delighted to see that his train of coaches and horses had finally arrived with five of his wives.

The royal party exited the vehicle and were processed into Fundin House again. Ori noticed right away that Dori was presiding over a fabulous tea party.

All the furniture had been drawn around low stone tables loaded with teapots, cups, saucers, and platters of delicious looking dainties. In attendance were Tilda, Sigrid, Tauriel, Dis, Marg, Vi, Gridr, Erda, Ruelis, Floris, Galadriel, Arwen, and five dwarsoodams Ori did not know, in obvious high humor, thoroughly enjoying themselves.

They were all richly dressed in traditional Stiffbeard clothing: a loose white or tan translucent shirt, under a black or blue vest, colorfully embroidered. Instead of skirts or leggings they sported wide-legged and poufy pantaloons in a silk material, secured with a sash. This usually matched or complimented the vest, and the scarf worn in their hair about the neck and shoulders. They wore short, calfskin boots for riding.

They stood as King Gheir entered with the touring party.

Each dam was a beauty, olive-skinned and honey-eyed with dark hair and lashes, the oldest with her tresses liberally streaked with silver. Their hair was elaborately braided back from their faces in a single line from forehead to the nape, left long among younger dams and tucked under by the older. These braids shone with lines of bright jewels along their entire lengths. Gheir proudly introduced them:

“Mavis I, Mavis II, Mavis III, Mavis IV and Mavis XV.”

They curtseyed gravely in turn, except for Mavis XV who curtseyed with a nervous giggle and didn’t quite know where to look. Ori had a feeling that Mavis XV might be technically of age, but should really still be at home with her family. From the expressions of the older Queen Mavises, they thought so as well.

“Why are they all named Mavis?” Ori asked Dwalin in a whisper.

“It’s Gheir’s mother’s name,” said Dwalin quietly

“Ew!”

“Nah, that’s just th’ traditional name a th’ queen a’ Stiffbeards.”

This was actually news to Ori. He realized he must have been remiss when it came to the culture of the Stiffbeards, though, even in casual reading, he seemed to recall more variety in queenly names than that. Ori wondered if the queens had all been named at that birth, coincidentally, or if they had to assume that name upon marriage or if every Stiffbeard dam who might conceivably become queen was named Mavis for tidiness’ sake. Ori looked up at Dwalin.

“I’m going to think about that later.”

Dwalin grinned.
“I don’ let meself think a’ it at all.”
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. You may want to get a snack. There’s a banquet in this one. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Ori stared into the mirror as Dipfa moved around him, tweaking various bits of his new clothes. He was dressed in green, all shades of green. His boots, a soft leather, were Fundin green, open at the front to show socks with varying stripes so that they could be mistaken to match. The lacinings were a paler green. His britches were a bright green with lines of emeralds traveling up and down. His sleeveless tunic was a blinding green with a Fundin green belt with a silver buckle set with diamonds and more emeralds. Beneath it was a thin cotton shirt of the palest green. The sleeves puffed out loose and the cuffs were closed with emeralds and diamonds.

Dwalin had done his hair and ear cuffs before they’d got dressed and his ears felt funny with the weight of the jewelry. His front hair was pulled back and clasped with the one Dwalin had given him at the inn.

He glanced to his right. Dwalin stood there smiling proudly and looking him over. Dwalin was in his dress uniform with his kilt.

“Yeh look grand, love.”

“Thank you. So do you. I know I shouldn’t be nervous but I’ve never been to a private royal banquet.”

“It’s nothin’. Can get fun, if they start gossipin’. Or pretty funny, if they get arguin’. The food’ll be brillian’.”

Ori chuckled, “Oh, I’m not worried about the food. I overheard Dori and Bombur talking about it with Binni and Mistress Dazla. There’s going to be a gravy course. That’s how I knew Dori was making it really fancy.”

“Aye, it’s bin bloody torture smellin’ it f’r mos’ a’ th’ day. Thanks, our Dipfa.”

Dipfa bowed, then frowned at Dwalin, went over, and used the end of her sleeve to polish one of his buttons. Dwalin snickered at her. She looked offended and sniffed. She made a point of dropping Ori a deep curtsey and flounced out.

“Me name’s mud with our Dipfa,” Dwalin mused idly.

“You know she takes it all very seriously and you teased her.”

“Aye, I’m ’n ill-mannered beast.”

Ori went and put his arms about Dwalin, who pulled him into a tight hug.

“You’re my beast,” Ori stated, rubbing his cheek against Dwalin’s shirt.

“Always, ghiyashel, always.”

Ori stayed there, his head against Dwalin’s chest, listening to the steady heartbeat that matched and sang to his own.

“Dwalin, when can we just have a quiet evening together? I miss knitting, while you play the viol.”

Dwalin’s arms tightened and he kissed Ori’s hair.

“When this bloody ceremonial rubbish’s over. An’ if it’s too loud in th’ sitting’ room, we’ll sit in here. I ain’t forgotten yeh promised t’ read t’ me.”

Ori squeezed.
“I love you.”
“I love yeh, too.”

They arrived in the receiving room and Ori looked about. The two great tables had been joined end to end and third and smaller table was set against the middle of the two long ones, giving the entire affair a ‘t’ shape.

They were covered in a great Durin blue cloth with a border of silver thread and the seven stars of Durin embroidered at each corner. Down the middle of the tables was a runner of Fundin green tartan. Both the fireplaces were roaring, all the torches were lit and all the ornate silver candlesticks lining the middle of the tables brightened the room to almost daylight. All the places were set with silver flatware and white porcelain, so thin it was almost transparent, thus taking on a blue tinge from the cloth.

Ori gasped at the finery. Dori was inspecting the room with Binni, Dis, and Granny Klak, Mistress Dazla in their wake.

Dis was dressed in Durin blue. The dress was swathed skin tight around her and a final long length of cloth was tossed with careless elegance over her shoulder to trail down to her feet. Diamond and sapphire studded shoes peeped from her hem. Rutile perched at Dis’ shoulder, legs ringed with diamonds, stone still, and appearing only to be a lovely brooch. Dis’ top hair had been dressed high around a tiara of diamonds and sapphires with the rest pouring down her back.

Binni wore the scarlet of the House of In with red boots. His breeches were poufed and tucked into his boots and his shirt was also poufed like Ori’s, but the cuffs were clasped about his wrists with wide gold bracelets.

Granny Klak looked regal in a misty blue gown with a wide scooped neckline and fitted tight to the waist then spilled down. She had a white silk under-skirt covered in mist blue net embroidered with silver flowers. As always her hair and beard were rolled in the style of a widow though there was a swirled silver brooch set with aquamarines on the left side of her hair, holding three fluffy blue white feathers to stand six inches above her head.

Dori was a dream in Balin’s Fundin red. The robe was in the style of old traditional Bearer’s presentation robe with a high neck and skintight to the chest then flowed all around them.

Dori saw Dwalin and Ori and hurried over.

“There you are, pet, our deary. Oh pet, how well you look! That green just makes you eyes shine and brings out your hair. Our deary, I do admit I like this way you have of dressing my Ori’s hair. So very grown up and distinguished!”

“Aye, our Dori, he does look a treat.”
Dori looked Dwalin over and nodded.

“You look very handsome, our deary.”

“Thanks, our Dori.”

Dori stood on tiptoes and kissed Dwalin’s cheek then caught Ori close in an embrace.

“Are you ready, pet?”

“I think so. Dori, how will this work?”

Dori opened their mouth but Thorin entered with Balin and Dori was instantly lost in admiration of Balin. Balin looked every inch a dwarf lord. His hair and beard were so white, they were almost mithril like Dori’s. His hair was brushed to stand on end in a soft cloud around his head. His beard was snowy and looked as soft as silk, the ends curling perfectly.

His robes were deep red like Dori’s and accented with silver. His boots looked as though they were made of silver and the toes curled upward and flickered with a diamond on each tip.

Thorin wore dress uniform with his kilt, all in Durin blue, his hair left loose and flowing from the circlet of the crown prince. Ori knew it was the last formal occasion he would wear it before it was passed to Fili or Fili wore his own design.

Thorin smiled as he looked around the room, then came to Dori’s side and kissed their hand.

“Thank you, Bearer.”

Dori giggled. Dis and Binni approached and inspected Thorin.

“You look well, nadad.”
Thorin bowed over her hand and kissed it.

"Thank you, namad, as do you. This room is perfect. Your work is much appreciated."

Dis laughed and hugged him. Thorin turned to Binni and once more bowed.

"What? I don’t get my hand kissed, too?" Binni asked slyly.

"Of course," said Thorin. He kissed Binni’s hand, making Binni giggle. "Thank you for your work, Bearer."

"Just you wait until you get to the food," Binni teased.

Thorin laughed, "I’m already impressed. It’s been smelling delicious all day."

Fili and Kili appeared at the top of the stair with Theodred, Arne, Stonehelm, Bain, Legolas and the twins.

"Mahal!" Kili shouted, looking about. "This looks fantastic!"

"Thank you," Dis called, "now come down and say that properly."

The group moved forward but Kili hoiked himself onto the bannister, slid down, and hopped agilely off the end. Delighted, the rest of the group followed suit.

Thorin and Dwalin snickered and Dis face palmed.

"Ah, c’mon, Dis," Dwalin laughed, flicking her shoulder, "Like we didn’t bloody do that every time we could."

"Yes, but we knew when formality was called for."

"Yes, “ Thorin reflected. “And then we did it without holding on with our hands.”

Dis glared, “Do not help, nadad.”

The young males greeted everyone with great courtesy, perhaps inspired by their fine clothes. Fili and Kili, brought up with such occasions, looked relaxed even in dress uniform with kilts of Durin blue and circlets of mithril and diamonds on their brows.

Bain looked fairly disgusted with having to dress up, though quite dashing in brown velvet surcoat with yellow pantaloons and a yellow shirt. His knee-high brown boots thumped across the floor.

The top of his head was covered in a red velvet kerchief knotted at the back, denoting he was an able skipper of sailing boats.

Stonehelm wore his family colors, a gold circlet on his brow. Theodred resettled the collar of his long surcoat about his shoulders, jarred from his sudden landing. The rust colored linen was trimmed with copper to compliment the gold and copper twisted together in a torc about his throat. He eagerly looked around. Ori didn’t know if he was excited about the room or excited because he could smell food. Likely both, he decided.

Legolas and the twins were arrayed in white and silver with circlets of silver and peridot on their heads. They looked strange and mystical in such finery. Ori reminded himself they had all been doing the wag together last night, but now they appeared far distant from that.

Arne wore light blue trousers and dark blue boots. His shirt was dark blue and over this he wore a sleeveless tunic, white with hexagonal blue embroidery. He looked happy to be among males his own age. He spoke quietly in westron to them. Ori noted how all waited patiently while he fought with his stammer. Even when he told a joke, and he had several good ones, they all eagerly awaited the punchline and laughed uproariously. Ori noted that the more relaxed Arne became, the easier westron came to him. Having his listeners simply enjoying his conversation and not rushing him helped, too.

Dis and Thorin had time to chat with the young people. Theodred was a little shy at first, but warmed up quickly assisted by Thorin’s smile.

Gimli strode in, bellowing for Legolas.

“I’m here, mellon nin, not fifty miles away,” Legolas grinned at him. “By all the leaves of the forest, you do looked well, my friend.”

Gimli was certainly spiffed up. His front hair was gathered to the back and hung in a long braid topped by a gold clasp. Brushed and braided, his mustache and beard were longer than Ori’s. His shirt was gold with ruby fastenings and sat long on him. A scarlet leather belt with a ruby studded buckle circled his waist and his trousers and boots were scarlet with gold trim. Not being a prince, he didn’t wear a circlet on his head, but his beard had gold threads braided into it.
Gimli looked Legolas up and down and grunted, "Very nice, laddie, yeh clean up fine."

The rest of the inhabitants of the House of In arrived. Gloin looked terribly proud, completely covered in scarlet and gold trimming, with Gridr on his arm in matching colors. Her dress of gold cloth had scarlet silk fringe trim that shimmered at every move. Rubies and gold ribbons spangled her high-dressed hair. Oin wore his usual brown robe, but it was silk and there were rubies scattered about his person. His mustache and beard had scarlet ribbons twisted into them and were quite intricately done. Theodred stared openly, impressed, but this turned to a different sort of stare as Loli and Omi followed their aunt and uncles through.

Omi, stunning in a strapless dress of pink rose silk, quite impressed Ori. The dress fit tight to her bosom and down to her waist, then the skirt bowed out with layer upon layer of silk circles in various shades of pink. She appeared to be wearing an upside-down rose. Her hair and beard were pomaded, shining and decorated with tiny, silk pink roses.

Ori was anxious for a glimpse of Loli’s dress. Dipfa had shown him the materials of white, scarlet, and gold, but was mum about the design.

Dipfa had triumphed.

Loli wore a plain white blouse, and over this a skirt of long, alternating panels of scarlet and gold velvet. The top band of the skirt clung tight from just beneath her breasts and flowed down snugly to just above her knee, where it became loose and flowed as she walked. The skirt was held by oversized, scarlet velvet braces sporting large, ornamental buttons of gold. The braces crossed over her back. All her hair was pomaded, pulled to the crown of her head and wrapped in a gold tube, the rest falling in a long braid down her back. Her mustache and beard were also pomaded and smoothed tightly to her chin then braided and wrapped with gold.

The sisters enjoyed walking over to the crowd, as it was obvious the younger males were watching them. After they had curtsied to the elders and greeted their friends, Ori asked, "Where’s Randi?"

“He’s coming with adad and amad,” said Loli. “He was helping in the kitchen earlier. They’ll be through in few minutes with Idad Bifur and Idad Bofur. I think Idad Nori is with them.”

“Makes a change,” Ori admitted then saying in Loli’s ear, “I half expected Nori to be spying on our guests.”

Loli giggled and adjusted one of her braces.

“What do you think of my dress?” she whispered. “Dipfa brought it over two weeks ago. I’ve been afraid to wear it. It’s so different.”

Ori chuckled, “It certainly fascinated Prince Theodred.”

“Really?” Loli almost squeaked, then in her usual voice, “Not that I care as I’m devoted to my dearest Furh’nk, but it is always nice to know one can fascinate people. Speaking of which, Master Pika made Omi’s dress for her.”

“Did he?” Ori raised his eyebrows, then turned to look at little ‘Moth’ again. “It’s very lovely. He has certainly made every use of her favorite color.”

“I know. She’s a perfect rose. What a pity Master Pika couldn’t come. They’re not properly betrothed yet so…” Loli trailed off with a shrug. “Oh look,” she breathed turning to the stair.

King Bard descended with Sigrid and Tilda. Bard was in somber black but for a red shirt beneath his tunic. He wore a kerchief like Bain but his was black with red trim denoting an experienced captain of large ships and there was a single hoop of gold in his left ear that stated he had sailed the length and breath of the Long Lake as well as negotiating the deadly rapids at the south.

Tilda wore a dainty purple frock with white embroidered flowers all over.

Sigrid looked regal in a long, plain, white dress heavily embroidered with red thread in patterns of ovals interlinked. Her golden hair flowed out from under a red velvet kerchief saying she, too, was an able skipper. The forward tresses on either side of her face had been secured beneath her chin with a white ribbon held in place by a ruby. Ori head Fili gasp and sigh.

Thorin, Dis and Dori and Balin stood in the middle of the room and welcomed Bard and the girls. Bard stayed talking and Tilda made a running beeline for the younger set. Sigrid grinned and scooted over. Fili smiled up at her, his whole face alight at the sight of her. She blushed and grabbed his hands as he offered them. He kissed both.
“You look beautiful, amrâlimê.”
“Thanks. I’m that nervous and I don’t know why.” She pulled away a little and looked him over. She giggled.
“I like the kilt.”
“You have a thing for me wearing anything resembling a skirt don’t you,” he teased. She blushed, giggled, and gave him a playful nudge. Fili looked proudly up at her and put his arms about her waist and drew them together. Sigrid rested her arms about his neck and sighed.
“Those other dwarf kings think we’re crazy.”
Fili looked around at his companions. “Do any of you think Sigrid and I are crazy for being in love?”
Bain rolled his eyes as Theodred shrugged.
“I t-t-think…it’s…it’s b-b-eauti-f-ful.” Arne said with complete honesty.
Kili made a rude noise.
“You’re crazy? What do you think they make of me and our Gimmers?” He stuck a pose and narrowed his eyes and said in a lofty, hissing tone, “Cons-s-s-sorting with Elves-s-s-s-s!”
Legolas and the twins laughed delightedly and Gimli began mimicking Kili and then it turned into a hissing-face-making contest between them, which soon had Sigrid at ease and laughing.
The Urs arrived, resplendent in their browns and coppers, Nori with them and Randi made his way over to the younger set immediately.
Thranduil, in robes of silver and pale blue, wafted down the stairs like a lazy snowflake.
Aewandínen, dressed in dark green, marched decorously behind him, except for the times he turned back and frowned at Tauriel in her uniform, who looked bored as Aewandínen was adamant she walk six paces behind him while he followed four paces after his father.
Thranduil greeted Thorin warmly and kissed Dis’ cheek. He also greeted Dori with a kiss and spoke with Balin. Thranduil turned, noticed no one was beside him on either side, and looked around. Aewandínen stood very correctly four paces to his father’s right and his expression was what Ori remembered Marg and Vi describing as ‘restin’ bitch fiz’.
“What are you doing?” Thranduil asked. “We are guests, not standing on parade. Tauriel, do come here and make your bow before heading over to the younger set. They look as though they will pop if they have to wait longer for you.”
Tauriel made her bow to Thorin, who chuckled, and Dis drew the elf captain down to kiss her cheek.
“Off you go, Kili’s bursting to tell you something.”
Dori kissed Tauriel’s cheek, too, and said, “Probably one of Prince Arne jokes. He has quite a store of them and all equally dreadful as the next.”
As soon as Tauriel was ‘shooed’ to the younger set, Aewandínen bowed civilly and was greeted politely although Ori noticed that Thorin and the other three looked rather amused with Aewandínen’s behavior.
Kili rushed over and met Tauriel halfway across the room, grabbed her hands, spun her about, making her laugh, and then dragged her over to the others. Sigrid hugged Tauriel with apparent relief and Tauriel admired her dress. Then she stared, amazed at Loli’s and Omi’s dresses.
Theoden, Aragorn and Arwen arrived together, with Boromir at their backs. Arwen turned and laughed over her shoulder at something her father had murmured as he and Lindir followed them.
Glorfindel swaggered down with Margr and Vi, one on each arm.
The dwarf kings and the Stiffbeard queens made their appearance, Mavis II on Snur’s arm, trying to remain dignified, though he was talking at speed, cheerfully, about nothing.
Jim and Ruelis arrived with Floris and Fior. As performers, they were often gaudily dressed, the easier to attract the eyes of the audience, but this was different. Jim and Fior wore cropped jackets of slick, black hide, and long, straight kilts of the same material, tied closes with sashes beaded with smooth, buff-colored shells. Ruelis and Floris wore lengths of the same dark material, wrapped to cover them breast to feet, and draped in the front where they were pinned closed at the top with a brooch and fibula. They wore hooded shawls of the same material, the hoods pointed at the back. The hoods and dresses were fringed in dangles of the same smooth shells. The kilts, dresses and jackets, everything was adorned with scalloped patterns, row upon row, painted in whites, ochres and blues. A random figure or other shape appeared between rows.

They wore bangles of some white material around their wrists and ankles. Ori didn’t think it was stone.

Thorin and Dis approached and greeted them warmly.

“Thank you for taking the time to come and eat with us,” said Thorin. “I know you’re busy with rehearsal.”

Jim gave him a mysterious smile.

“Ah, but you see, I foresaw the invitation and so planned for it.”

Ruelis snorted.

“Says the man who spent the last half hour tearing the inside of the wagon apart, looking for his left ankle bangle.”

“I did consult the infinite to find it,” said Jim, “but the indications were cloudy.”

Ruelis said to Dis, “He was already wearing it.”

Finally, only the Blacklocks were left.

Hild made her entrance at the top of the stairs, paused and looked around as every head turned, and then every male who was not a dwarf or elf quickly turned away. Aragorn was the exception. He smiled and said, “Very well done.”

She had pulled her beaded beard back in two sections. She secured it over her shoulders to show that she wore a dragonfly blue velvet collar, and from this a long, openwork bodice of finest filigree netting to just below the breast, displaying her back, shoulder and chest hair decorated in luxuriant swirls painted with gold. From there, the teal gauze dress fell to her feet, tight only from forearms to wrist and cinched at the waist in with a wide corset of blue velvet, studded along the hems with malachite and embroidered with stylized dragonflies. She wore matching sandals. Her hair had been left loose in its braids, decorated with green velvet ribbons and teal and gold dragonflies.

To the eyes of the men, she was, essentially, naked.

“Nice fireplace,” Theodred muttered.

“It is, isn’t it,” said Bain. “I could stare at it all night.”

Sigrid said, “Eru!”

“Don’t her boobies get cold?” Tilda asked.

“Dwarrow don’t usually feel cold,” said Sigrid, “not unless it’s extreme.”

“Oh, that’s all right, then. She’s very beautiful. Isn’t she, Sig?”

“Yes.”

“Can I-”

“No.”

Aris, all in black velvet, walked behind her queen as Hild descended. Dori and Dis met the Blacklock queen at the foot of the stairs and gushed over Hild’s dress.

Dis said, “Hild, is that Gheir’s metalwork in your hair?”

“It is,” said Hild. “I concede it is the best. Watch.”

She nodded her head and the translucent wings of the dragonflies vibrated as if they were flying.

“Oooooo,” said Dori appreciatively.

Thranduil looked intrigued.

“Yes,” said Hild dryly. “They only cost an entire suit of ceremonial armor. I’m not the only one who’s exacting.”

Margr and Vi wore what Ori was sure were matching couch cushions, probably from West Farthing materials. Their dresses of brown and mustard had enormous splotches of abstract yellow flowers and doubled collars, with one set sticking straight up around their ears and the lower set long enough to brush the hems of their dresses. The dresses sported belts of the same material, with tourmaline-encrusted gold buckles, each the size of their heads. They wore crisp green leggings and matching velvet boots, and the entire effect made them look like malicious flowers. They presented themselves front and center to Hild, curtsied, and Vi said, “Ooooo, look at our Hild, Margr, all shined up. Mahal, love. Yeh could wear a bloody cheesecloth an’ make it look good.”

Margr concurred.

“Aye, she could. She’s that bonny. Ooo, I hate yeh, our Hild! Give us a hug.”

Hild, laughing so hard she could barely breathe, did so.

Vi reached back, grasped Glorfindel by the belt and yanked him toward them.

“Here’s our Glorfy,” she said.

“Now, our Glorfy,” said Margr. “Make your bow to our Hild. There’s a lad. She’s a queen, yeh know.”

Hild managed to return the bow, biting her lip.

“And, may I ask, Lord… Glorfy, is it?… how tall are you?”

“I’m seven foot and two inches, your majesty,” Glorfindel obliged.

Hild grinned at the sisters. “Three and a half feet for each of you. Quite convenient.”

“Mahal, yes,” said Vi. “An’ all o’ him very sturdy.”

“Aye,” agreed Margr. “T’ain’t true what they say ‘the higher up they are, the less there is down there’. He’s got ever such a big one!”

“Do you share?” Aris asked the sisters.

Glorfindel’s eyes grew quite large. Apparently, he was used to actually participating in such decisions.

Vi shrugged.

“If our Glorfy wants. Just let us know if you’ll be home for dinner, our Glorfy.”

Hild waved her hand elegantly.

“Oh, the invitation is open to you and Margr as well.”

“Four dams at once,” Glorfindel mused. “I’ll have to work that out.”

“Feel free to bring a friend,” said Hild.

“Yes, we’ll be here all week,” said Aris. “We have plenty of time.”

Vi nudged Margr’s ribs.

“Aye, just a matter o’ knowin’ how t’ fill it.”

“Oooo, our Vi, I know I’ll be serving up somma tha’ veal they got on sale in the market!”

“Aye, an’ we’ll stuff some mushrooms!”

“I just love a stuffed mushroom!” Hild added and all four dams laughed heartily. Glorfindel wore a look on his face Ori doubted anyone had ever seen there before. It was the look of someone who had bitten off more than they could chew.

Ori had overheard Dori and Binni planning the seating for this dinner. It was far too formal and important for a buffet. They spent nearly an hour on it, as if they were seating people at a wedding, the difference being that Dori and Binni matched up seat-mates for maximum explosive potential.

Formal, they were, but gleefully rotten, as well.

Ori obligingly made up place cards in his best westron calligraphy and waited for the games to begin.

The games began with crawfish or dough rolled in shredded coconut, fried and served with marmalade. The elves partook of the fried dough in great amounts.

“What are we eating?” Dain asked. “Tastes good, nice jelly, but it’s sorta snappy an’ chewy all a’ once.”

“Feels like somethin’ made o’ rubber,” Ulfr noted. “Did it used t’ be alive or did it ooze out’ve a tree, d’yeh think?”

Bifur said in ancient khuzdul, “Alive.”

Tharkûn enthused, “Yes, aren’t they delicious! They’re from the Long Lake.”

Boromir said, “This is fish?”

Gheir said, “It’s crawfish, shelled. We used to think they were just water bugs, but they taste really good.”

“Water bugs!” Mavis XV giggled hysterically.

Ori looked around just in time to watch Kili hurl one at Buj, who used two forks to carefully dissect and examine it.

“Fascinating texture,” he observed.

“You gonna eat that?” Nori asked, seated next to him.

“Eat?” Buj asked questioningly.

Nori took it and stuffed it in his mouth.

“Decision made,” he muttered.

Fortunately for Buj, a bowl of fried dough reached him and he partook of that.

Soon those bowls were empty and next course arrived: Freshly sliced tomatoes with bahvlo cheese and large platters with rolled up, paper-thin slices of beef to eat with it. The elves exclaimed over the cheese. Elrohir took a roll of beef and peered through it like a spy glass. Elladan slipped beef to Biscuit.

“Don’t feed him too much,” Floris warned him, “he’ll sleep through his performance and Fior will have to pretend he’s a warg again. I mean, he can be a little warg, but his teeth aren’t that sharp.”

“Sharp enough to leave scars in your ankles,” Fior growled under his breath.

“I love cheese!” Mavis XV cried. “I mean, I love a lot of different things, because I’m not shallow, or anything, but this is just the best cheese!”

“That’s nice, dear,” said Binni, patting her hand.

“What’s it like to be a Bearer?” Mavis XV asked. “Do you have to have lots of babies? Do you pee standing up or sitting down?”

“It depends on my mood,” said Binni. “Bearers have many moods.”

“Ooooooooh,” said Mavis XV. “I’m told I’m moody, but that’s not the same thing, is it.”

“No, dear,” said Binni.

Down the table, Ulfr sighed.

Ori nudged Dwalin.

“Am I moody?”

“Nah, occasionally feisty, but no’ moody,” Dwalin muttered. “Mahal, she makes bloody T’dillah look clever.”

Ori began to lose track of the courses, busily taking in the conversations around him.

As the soup arrived, he heard Boromir exclaim to the Stiffbeard king.

“You have thirty-two children?”

“Yes,” said Gheir proudly.

Even Thranduil looked impressed.

“How many boys and how many girls?” he asked.

“Twenty-four boys,” said Gheir, then looked slightly uneasy. “Eight girls. My oldest daughter, Zavis, is due with her third child. We’re hoping it’s a girl this time.”

Hild rolled her eyes.

“So, you have all these princes you will have to marry off to local dams, but you have fewer and fewer local dams, for whatever reason. Where, exactly, will you get these dams for your sons?”

Gheir looked defiant.

“All our dams stay at home, ready to be married, so there will not be a paucity when the time comes.”

“And you thought only ponies wore blinders,” said Hild.

Gheir growled and slowly rose out of his chair, reaching for his sword.

Thranduil laughed rudely and looked down his nose at them, saying,

“Really, Thorin, are we going to have to separate the children?”

Gheir and Hild glared at him. Thorin said nothing, but his eyebrows lofted with his amusement.

“At the very least,” Thranduil continued in a kinder tone, “you should take that outside.”

Gheir barked a laugh and sat back down.

“Over that? I’m not missing out on dinner for that. She’s just getting started.”
“Yes, I have to at least have the gravy course before I begin to breathe fire,” said Hild.
“What kind of soup is this?” Ahkn asked, obviously puzzled and not necessarily in a good way.
“Watercress,” said Dis.
“What exactly-“
“It’s a leaf vegetable. Not to worry, your majesty, here is a bowl of crumbled bacon to decorate it.”

“Excellent!” Ahkn approved.
“Beautifully seasoned,” Arwen praised.
“I don’t…” Lindir hesitated. “Is that sesame? You know, I have allergies-“
Glorfindel heaved a sigh.
“You don’t have allergies, you’re just a fussbudget.”
Lindir screamed and recoiled.
Elrond shot to his feet and went to him.
“What is it? What happened?” the elf lord asked.
“A face!” Lindir gasped. “A face suddenly appeared in my soup bowl!”
Oin exploded out of his chair.
“Is it a sign?” he demanded.
“Guess he really doesn’t want to eat that soup,” said Glorfindel.
Ori saw Nori’s seat was empty and groaned. Dori arrived next to Elrond and looked annoyed.
“I apologize for my brother,” Dori offered graciously. “We can’t take him anywhere, or even expect him stay in one place through the gravy course.”

“You… brother?” Lindir gasped.
“Nori!” Dori said sternly, “you apologize to Master Lindir!”
Nori’s head popped through the tabletop, right through Lindir’s bowl.

“Heh, sorry about that, lad. Sometimes me tricks get the better o’ me - an’ everyone else.”
Assault and Battery shot out of Nori’s hair to wave and chitter at Lindir for good measure, then the whole lot sank back through the table and Nori appeared in his seat and resumed eating as if none of it had happened, except for the filthy grin on his face.

“Naughy badger!” Granny Klak scolded adoringly.
Dis said soothingly to Lindir, “Please don’t mind him. He just found out he can walk through solid objects.”

“Really?” Elrond asked, clearly impressed.
Arwen said, “It gave me quite a turn, too, Lindir, but those little creatures in his hair are so cute!”
Glorfindel enthused, “I’d pay gold to see that again.”
Lindir gaped.

“You want him to appear in your soup bowl?”
“No,” said Glorfindel, “yours. Nice to see you have a pulse after all.”
“Glorfindel,” said Elrond reprovingly.
“If the bones aren’t too small…”
“Bass isn’t exactly a delicate fish, dear.”
Theoden, apparently thinking the madness could be contained, pushed back his chair and called over to Nori. “And, how did you come by your talent, Lord Nori?”

“Eh, our Dori spilled over,” said Nori.
He held up a piece of bread to his hair and little hands grabbed it and whisked it away.
“Ya’ll have crumbs in there again,” said Bofur. “I’ll spend another hour brushin’ ’em out.”
“As long as they’re bog-trained, I’m good wif it,” said Nori.
Theoden said, “Would you… might I… is it permitted to ask what you mean by ‘spilled over’? Is the top of the Bearer’s head open?”

“Nah,” said Dwalin, “though it does blow off from time t’ time.”
Theoden looked over at the returning Dori, who smiled sweetly.
“Not literally, dear.”
Bard said to Theoden, “Just another dinner with the Durins. Have some more of this soup, it’s really quite good.”

Soon the servants carried in three great platters of lake bass. Roasted whole, each fish was six feet long.

There were murmurs of appreciation up and down the table.

“Our King Bard was kind enough to supply this lovely fish,” said Dori, nodding regally to Bard.

“And you caught them yourself, didn’t you.”

Bard looked embarrassed but indicated that yes, this was so.

Mavis XV cried, “My, you must have an enormous rod!”

“I used a net,” said Bard, now red for a different reason.

“A triumph either way,” said Thranduil, saluting Bard with his wine glass.

“Thank you,” said Bard in a grateful tone.

The fish was served with parsley sauce, rice and new peas.

Ori thought the elves were giving the dwarrow competition as lusty eaters. He didn’t think they were up for a food fight, but he couldn’t rule it out, either.

He glanced down the younger table and noticed a few of his fellow diners were, indeed, flicking peas at each other.

Theodred and Fior and the twins seemed to delight in this activity and soon were attempting to hit each other’s open mouths.

A shiver of excitement went up and down the tables as the fish course was removed and big, black tureens with the royal seal were carried into the room in great state.

The smell was so delicious, Ori thought he might swoon, but then he might miss the food, so he settled for squeezing Dwalin’s hand tightly and bouncing a little in his seat.

Mavis I sighed in delight.

“How elegant!”

“Is that mushroom?” Elrond asked, intrigued.

“Yes,” said Thorin. “It’s quite versatile, and this is one of our favorite dishes.”

The two-handled bowls were soon filled with this simmering elixir of the valar.

Thorin and Dis and Fili demonstrated lifting the bowls by the handles to sip directly from the vessels.

The elves and men gamely followed suit.

Hild laughed.

“Every time I have this, I ask for the recipe, and every cook who makes it tells me to take a royal jump.”

“It is excellent,” Galadriel agreed.

Boromir said, “I’ve never been to a dinner where you had soup twice.”

“It’s gravy, Captain Boromir,” said Dori.

“Really?” Boromir asked. “Don’t you have gravy over meat?”

“Of course, but this way you get to truly savor it. Besides, it’s a mushroom gravy, so our elf friends can enjoy it as well.”

“Oooo, a gravy course!” Vi cried. “I do so like a gravy course.”

Ori reflected that she’d probably never had a gravy course in the whole of her life. He hadn’t himself until he was married.

Margr said, “Oh, our Dori, leave it t’ yeh to make it all so posh!”

“So, this is a gravy course,” said Thranduil, raising an eyebrow at Thorin. “You are honoring us.”

“Just don’t let word get out,” Thorin teased.

This was followed by a goat and two lambs, roasted whole, with grilled yams in maple syrup, mashed potatoes dripping with butter, candied carrots, roasted brussels sprouts doused in garlic and butter, cold pickled beets, beans with almonds, grilled cavern mushrooms, roasted apples in a blanket of melted cheese and gravy boats filled with mint sauce.

Dori threw Nori a sharp look.

“No,” was all Dori said.
Nori smiled sweetly and bowed his head, finished the contents of his wine glass and refilled it from the gravy boat in front of him. He toasted Dori wordlessly and down the whole thing in a gulp. Then he wiped his mouth with his sleeve.

Dori sighed, but Nori said, “Oi, didn’t want to dirty yer nice table linens again, Dori. Ain’t I a good brother?”

“No, you’re a very bad brother. Be quiet.”

Intrigued with Nori’s display, Elladan poured himself a glass from the gravy boat and drank it. His mouth full, his lips pursed, and his eyes got very large and round and there was absolutely nowhere for him to go. The table of the younger set roared with laughter.

Nori barked, “Just swallow, lad.”

Bravely, Elladan did so.

Floris and Loli passed him their wine, which he took gratefully. When he was at last able to speak he managed, “That was horrible. That’s mint-flavored vinegar.”

“Good for the digestion,” said Nori.

“Yes, especially if you never drink it,” said Elladan.

“It’s to go with the lamb,” Omi told him. “Never copy Nori. You’ll either vomit or die, or vomit and die. Either way, it’s not worth your life.”

“Lesson learned,” he noted.

The men enjoyed the meat, while the elves decimated the grilled cavern mushrooms once again. Lady Galadriel treated herself to a teaspoonful of mint sauce. When Theoden raised an eyebrow at her she smiled sweetly and said, “It’s good for the digestion.”

This led almost everyone to try it.

Ori thought Nori looked proud enough to burst his tunic. Dori, on the other hand, looked like they would burst the vein their forehead. Balin wiped his mouth, rose, and made a special trip down the table to pat their hand.

The goat and lamb was removed and everyone given a small plate containing a slice of toasted egg bread, with a spoonful of spiced, scrambled eggs on top. Ori suspected this had been planned to give the men and elves a little room to digest. He himself was still peckish.

Then arrived two roasted geese stuffed with clove-studded oranges, accompanied by bowls of buttered noodles and bowls of caramelized onions. The elves couldn’t get enough of the caramelized onions. Theodred and Bain played with the noodles. They had never seen them before and Bain started to make rude commentary about tape worms but Sigrid threw a spoon at him and smacked him hard between the eyes.

“Your aim’s really improving,” Fili noted approvingly.

“Indeed,” Tauriel agreed.

“I realize not everyone is fortunate enough to be able to aim a spoon,” said Sigrid modestly.

“How hard can it be?” Legolas asked, throwing a spoon at Tauriel and smacking Stonehelm in the ear.

Cutlery briefly filled the air over the table, until Dori barked that they would have to wash each and every piece before they ate dessert. That stopped things instantly.

Stuffed beef, and for the elves, chips, cheese curds and gravy arrived next, though Ori was more than happy to partake of the chips himself. Everyone munched happily on these offerings, except for Aewandinen, who didn’t seem to do much more than glare at his barely-daube plate, and Gheir’s youngest wife, who looked truly puzzled.

“What is this?” Mavis XV asked.

“Beef olives,” said Binni.

“I don’t see any olives.”

“There aren’t any.”

“Oh.” She looked puzzled. “I don’t understand. Is this another Bearer thing?”

“Yes,” said Binni, turning back to his food.

Bombur gently explained that the beef had stuffing in it, the way olives were sometimes stuffed with peppers, and they were the same shape.
“I’ve never seen an olive that big,” she said.
“Yes,” said Bombur, turning back to his food.
Oin picked up the last part.
“I’ve never seen an olive the size of a pig either, m’dear, so not to worry.” He patted her hand and addressed himself to his food.

“May I be excused?” Mavis XV asked, popping up from her chair.
“Where are you going, my dear?” Gheir asked from down the table.
“Oh, you know, away,” said Mavis XV. “Be right back!”
“Oh, don’t do that, dear,” Dori cried. “We have dessert next.”
“Dessert?” Mavis XV chirped, and sat down again.
Celeborn was heard to ask plaintively, “Dessert?”
“Perhaps some tea, Lord Celeborn?” Dis suggested.
“That would be lovely, thank you,” said Celeborn.
Dain leaned over Jani and said, “Told yeh tha’ yeh shoulda had a spoon a’ tha’ mint sauce.”
Jani cackled.

The table was fully cleared, then xocolātl pound cake, raspberry preserves, and bowls of xocolātl pudding were brought out with accompanying whipped, cold cream.

Tharkûn took lavishly of the pudding. Aragorn went for the pound cake and Dis giggled as Arwen filled her bowl with raspberry preserves and dolloped cream on top. Theoden and Boromir were enchanted with the pudding, neither of them having ever tasted anything quite like it. Ori noted the pudding tasted of hints of cinnamon and a bit of hot pepper, amazing in contrast with the cold, dark brown pudding itself.

The eating finally slowed down and Dori smiled around at them.
“Is everyone of an elegant sufficiency?”
There was a resounding ‘yes’ all around.
Positions, Pudding, and Perturbations.

Chapter Summary

Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Aaaaah, and now that we are all of an elegant sufficiency how about a nice, quiet evening at home? Not. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

Dis and Thorin rose and everyone followed suit. Mistress Dazla and her minions entered. A few carried tea and coffee things to the far fireplace and set them up on a large, low table. Dori and Thranduil headed over, and those who wished tea or coffee followed. Bifur and Tharkun sat nearby, smoking their pipes in companionable silence.

Mistress Dazla and the rest of her team started to clear.

"Would you like us to help you with that, Mistress Dazla?" Kili asked.

She lifted an eyebrow at him.

"In those clothes, your highness? I don’t think so. Give yourself the night off."

The table was cleaned off at speed, leaving the chairs close to one end for conversation. Thorin, Dis, and Balin went to the sideboard where a couple of the servants were setting up glasses and bottles of sweet after-dinner wine. Most of the younger set quickly headed back to their usual fireplace to plop down on the cushions and chatter.

Dwalin poured Ori a cup of wine as they watched the guests separate into various groups. Ori could guess the conversation of the party who stayed near the table. Every race was represented, and all with some link to commerce.

Bard sat next to Gloin. The man said something and Gloin laughed. They might have been thrown together to keep Bard from drowning, but they were becoming fast friends.

Aragorn and Arwen sat side by side, holding hands. Ori could already tell they were partners in everything. They would rule Gondor the same way.

Fili and Sigrid were about to sit and Thorin said, "You take the night off, too, Fi. I'll catch you up if something important happens."

"Yes, Idad, but…. um…"

Bard shook his head.

"You can go with him, Sig, it's all right."

"Thanks, Da," said Sigrid. She kissed Bard’s cheek and headed across the room with Fili, hand in hand.

"Does Thorin need me?" Ori asked Dwalin.

"Nah, it's just trade talk, bore yeh shitless. I'm stickin' with Thorin, Loli an' Buj'll take notes."

"All right, then I’m going to wander a little," said Ori.

He got up on his toes and kissed Dwalin’s cheek.

Dwalin whispered in his ear, "Soon, love."

"I'll hold you to that," Ori replied.

Ori looked about the room, noticing the various encampments. Everyone was gathering and mingling and having a great time… except for Prince Aewandinen of Erys Lasgalen.

Aewandinen sat by himself in the corner with neither tea nor wine, and looked disgruntled.

Ori had noted what the prince ate during this entire meal: A spoonful of marmalade, a slice of tomato, a spoonful of cress soup, three peas, a taste of gravy, two candied carrots, one brussels sprout, a corner of toast, a noodle, one chip and a spoonful of raspberry preserves.
Ori thought he must still be hungry, which certainly wouldn't improve his mood. He approached and asked, kindly, "Would you like some tea, your highness?"

The prince looked further annoyed at having being disturbed, but deigned to answer coldly, "No, thank you, I have come here to be alone with my thoughts. I am composing a poem."

"Oh! Let me bring you some ink and paper, then," said Ori.

Startled, Aewandínen could only manage, "Please."

Ori went to his own desk in the sitting room and pulled out the necessary supplies. He presented them to the prince, who thanked him in a dismissive manner. Ori was almost glad for it. Aewandínen made him uncomfortable on several levels, not just because the elf was a total prat. Ori didn't like the way he looked at Legolas, for one thing. Aewandínen looked up sourly whenever the younger prince laughed, and scowled when he saw Legolas and Gimli together.

Ori enjoyed his wine and drifting though the conversations of others. He passed Lindir and Aris pouring over the small, leather-bound book Aris wrote in whenever Hild wanted something noted.

"It's quite handy," said Aris. "It's divided by days, then hours, then fifteen minute blocks, unless it's a council meeting day. Then it's in ten minute blocks."

"That is clever," said Lindir, "but ten minute increments? How do you keep the councillors and petitioners to such strict schedule?"

Aris showed him a device on a cord around her neck.

"Stop watch."

"A what?"

"A watch that signals when the minutes have elapsed. Everyone has exactly ten minutes to say what needs to be said and get out."

"And they all adhere to it? Even, say, King Gheir when he visits?"

Aris smiled ferally.

"From what I understand, he never takes more than ten minutes to finish anything."

"How insufferably dull," Lindir giggled.

A burst of laughter rose from the trade table and Aragorn and Arwen stood.

"Hold that thought, please," said Aragorn.

"We're just going to get some tea," said Arwen.

Snur sat with Galadriel on an island of couches in the middle of the room, laughing about something, probably something inappropriate Galadriel herself initiated. Snur cast an eye at Aragorn as the Gondorian passed. Specifically, he peered at the sword at Aragorn's hip.

"Beggin' your pardon, Aragorn, but, is that Anduril?"

"It is," said Aragorn. "Arwen, will you go on? I'll be right there."

"I'll bring your tea, dearest," she said.

"This is Anduril, Flame of the West," said Aragorn. "Lord Elrond reforged it from the shards of Narsil."

"Aye, I know. Me ancestor, King Telchar, forged Narsil."

For a moment Ori was afraid Snur wanted his sword back, but the Broadbeam only asked, "Did he keep the original pommel, grip, an' guard?"

"Yes. Lord Elrond told me he tried to remain faithful to the original. You've never seen it, have you."

"Nah, only the concept drawin's. Dwarrow're obsessive about keepin' records. Amazin' how many torn out pieces o' sleeves an' tunics with drawin's all over 'em're stored in the archives."

Aragorn unbuckled his sword, and held it out.

"Please, take a look."

Snur stood and took the sword with a grin, slowly and carefully examining the work of his ancestor and even critiquing waggishly,

"Lord Elrond didn't lengthen that grip?"

"No, it fit my hand perfectly."

Snur chuckled.

"In khuzdul, that's a sly way o' sayin' ya enjoy your own company."
Aragorn barked out a laugh of surprise and delight. Arwen returned with the tea.
"Would you like to see the blade, too?" Aragorn asked Snur. "Or is that too rude for this room?"
as he took the tea Arwen handed him and had a sip.
"Ah, now, see, you're catchin' on. I would like to see this blade, though, not yours."
Arwen glanced over the rim of her teacup.
"They're both lovely, I assure you."
Snur roared and bowed.
"I stand before superior wit, milady."
"It's not wit," said Arwen. "It's just intimate knowledge I have that you don't have. Probably."
"Still, I surrender."
Aragorn blushed and Elrond pretended he wasn't anywhere near the conversation.
Ori moved on. As he passed the tea table, Dori leaned toward him.
"I don't suppose you've seen your brother and Bofur recently?"
Ori realized he hadn't since dinner. Ori bit his lip and Dori sighed.
"Off consummating, I suppose. They only have one set of manners between them."
"Where's Granny?" Ori wondered.
"She disappeared off. I imagine she's either gone to bed or," Dori cleared his throat, "gone to bed."
"How are things going?" Ori asked, fighting a blush.
"Oh, just lovely. Even with all this tea, I'm fairly sure we've all eaten enough to make us sleep for a week."
"Don't go to sleep just yet, Bearer," said Hild. "I need to ask you a question."
The way she said 'question' made Ori nod to them and swiftly retreat toward the younger set.
They seemed to be playing some sort of guessing game. Legolas and Gimli, however, sat together on a couch nearby, apparently in a world of their own.
"I am content to wait, Gimli," said Legolas.
"Are yeh?"
"All right, not 'content'. More like 'resigned'."
Gimli chuckled.
"It may no' be tha' long, anyways. Even if I lack a few years, a warrior's braid will mean I'm settled now in life t' marry formally an' set up house-keepin'. I'm thinkin' me bead'll look a treat in all tha' golden hair."
Legolas colored and dropped his gaze, but Ori could see the elf was pleased.
Then Legolas looked off to the left suddenly and frowned. Ori followed his gaze to Aewandínen still on the couch, who wore a mask of cold fury to rival one of Thranduil's own.
Legolas lifted his chin in defiance and turned back to rest his head atop Gimli's. The young dwarf put an arm around Legolas' waist, and Aewandínen was dismissed.
The elder elf prince shot to his feet and stalked down the hall toward the meadow.
Ulfr, standing nearby with his pipe, gave Ori a gimlet eye.
"It's like someone lit candles in here all of a sudden," he said. "It's brighter, yeh know?"
"I shouldn't say what I'm thinking," said Ori.
"But yeh kin think it all yeh want, laddie," said Ulfr. "Mahal's inky bum! We all are!"
Dori leaned over and cast a critical eye over the group at the trade table.
"That's enough business for tonight. I'm sure you could all do with a nice turn about the room, or there's a lovely patio that overlooks the meadow. And I'm sure several of you need either tea or coffee. Go on now. Shoo."
The business was left with promises to continue later as they all rose, some went for tea and others to refill their wine glasses.
Ori followed most of the others out through the breakfast parlor and out into the night, if nothing else to make sure no one got in Aewandínen's way, but the elf prince had disappeared into the darkness. Ori could only hope the unpleasant prince would slip on some pony dung.
It was a lovely night, and quite a few people had elected to carry their tea or wine out onto the patio. In this wide-open space, voices carried, spilling secrets.

“… think about our Hild’s offer,” said Vi.

“I am a seasoned warrior,” said Glorfindel, “but four dams at once?”

“P’raps tha’ lovely King Theoden could help, our Vi,” said Margr.

“Bit skittish, tha’ one,” said Vi. “Wonder if tha’ Mister Boromir is free.”

Glorfindel laughed. “Aye, let us see if he’s ‘up’ for it!”

Ori walked on until he saw two figures off in a sheltered corner. It was hard to tell in the shadows, but they seemed to be facing each other, one of them sitting on a low stone bench. The seated figure held out their arms in the universal symbol of helplessness.

"I don't know what to do," said Bard.

"You don't have to do anything," Thranduil replied.

"And if she falls pregnant? How can she hold up her head among men?"

"The same way she would among dwarrow, I believe. Dori raised her just as much as you did."

"What are you saying?"

"I'm saying she thinks like a dwarf. As far as the dwarrow are concerned, if Sigrid and Fili plan to marry anyway, it doesn't matter when the dwarfling comes. And you know as well as I that many a noble woman has produced her first little miracle a scant few months after her wedding."

"And the rest of the children each take nine months," Bard acknowledged.

"They will marry, Bard. They are already as good as engaged. Your blessing would mean much to them, but if it is not forthcoming, they will still be welcome in Dori’s house."

"And such a fracture in the family would hurt all of us," Bard sighed, then made a startled noise.

"Did I just say 'family'?"

"Possibly. One's hearing begins to go after the first few millennia."

Thranduil sat next to him.

"You know, I have lived in this part of the world for so long, I remember when your ancestors arrived here. They lived very differently than the Dale men do now, more like Theoden's people do, in extended families. It wasn't a perfect system, of course. Bad blood led to spilled blood more often than not, but when it worked, it carried them through good days and bad. For many, it still does."

"Are you saying we should go back to living that way?"

"I believe I'm saying that dwarrow still do."

"That's a relief. I like Vi and Margr, but I don't think I want to live close enough to hear every wheeze and moan."

"I agree. That would be icky."

Bard laughed.

"Did you just say, 'icky'?"

"Blame the dwarrow, or, better yet, Tilda, Princess Charming."

"I'm sorry about your ears."

Thranduil waved it off.

"There's nothing lurid in her interest. Better now than when she's grown."

"What? When she's 'craftwed'?” Bard snorted. "She will be the death of me."

"Oh, nonsense. When you are grey haired you will look back and tease her about it, especially if she's married with several little Tildas of her own."

"I can wait," said Bard. "I have time."

"That's my line, you thief."

"Too bad."

There was a pause, a rather tense, expectant pause, and then Ori heard the unmistakeable sound of lips meeting and a sigh.

His first though was: How sweet!

His second thought was: Where is my husband?

Alas, Dwalin was still back at the table, listening to Dain talk about the wonderful adventures of His Son, the Pig, and Delicate Jewel of a Bride, sloshing wine everywhere, and Dwalin could do nothing more than wink as Ori smiled, passing the table again.
Ori drifted back toward the tea table, where it was just Dori and Hild now. Hild was standing rather closer to Dori than previously, and her voice had altered huskily.

“Are you sure you want Balin? Aris and I could be so good to you.”
“Very generous, your majesty, but he is my One.”
“Ah, that’s quite unfortunate for us, then. He does have the nicest beard, doesn’t he.”
“It’s quite strong, too,” Dori purred.

“Really?” Hild asked with a loft of her brows. “You know what they say about the strength of a dwarf’s beard.”

“Completely true, my dear Queen Hild. Completely true.”

“Oh, you know, you could bring him along.”

“We’ll take it under advisement,” Dori promised, patting Hild’s arm.

Ori watched this entire exchange with a sort of horrified astonishment. There were entirely too many pretty people at Fundin House right now, and they seemed to be playing a game he didn’t want to participate in if it involved his brother. He went and stood near King Snur, who was amiable, and rather handsome, but not overwhelming in his beauty.

“Oh, aye,” said Snur to Lady Galadriel. “Gheir wanted t’marry Hild once. They say he took his pants down and she realized she had better and longer in the drawer at home.”

Ori decided he would go to the kitchen and hide in the larder. He actually had the larder door open when he heard Bofur moan and Nori say, “Stop thrashin’ about! I can’t keep a grip!”

Ori went and hid in his room.

This was fine as far as it went, but Sigrid and Tauriel found him out within ten minutes. Tauriel must have been taking her cues from Kili, though she knocked before she barged in.

"Ah, there you are," she said. "Sigrid and I want to see Queen Kivi’s book!"

They sat on the bed, so there was no escape.

He handed it over, bright red to the ears, and Tauriel opened it, shrieked with laughter and fell back on the comforter in peals of giggling.

It was inevitably Illustration 20.

When she could speak, Tauriel said, “Not for all the gold in Arda!”

“Wait a bit,” said Sigrid, grinning. “Ori, stand up with me for a moment.”

Ori raised and eyebrow, toed off his boots and did so. Sigrid doffed her fine dress to a short chemise and kicked off her shoes. Otherwise, they stood on the bed, fully clothed.

“Alright,” said Sigrid, now put your left hand here, and wrap your knee around… that’s it. Now, I’ll do a backbend. I hope I still remember how. Does it look right, Tauriel?”

“It does, but you can’t possibly be comfortable like that.”

“I’m fine at the moment. Now, Ori, stretch.”

“Stretch what?” Ori squeaked.

Sigrid laughed so hard she collapsed on the bed, taking him with her, and he rolled off her in such a rush they both tumbled to the floor.

“I don’t think you’re doing it right,” said Tauriel.

A fallen pillow flew over the edge of the bed and smacked her in the face.

“You think you can do it better?” Sigrid challenged with a laugh.

“I am more than willing to give it a try,” said Tauriel. “come back up here.”

“This is worse than Shimmy!” Ori groaned, crawling back up on the bed.

“Just close your eyes and think of Erebor,” said Tauriel.

“That sounds like an invitation to a broken back,” said Ori. “I think I need to see what we’re doing. Not that I believe what we’re doing. Not that we’re actually doing anything, are we, except tumbling off the bed.”

“Let Sigrid and I try,” said Tauriel.

Ori was more than happy to cede his position. Tauriel and Sigrid were closer to the same height, though the illustration didn’t make it clear if that was a better fit or a worse one. Tauriel slid off her boots and unbuckled her weapon belt before climbing up on the bed.

Ori coached them into the form. He had some vague idea both of them were putting their hands places that might cause Kili or Fili to chop them off, but Ori wasn’t particularly titilated by any of it.
He frowned down at the illustration again. Sigrid had piled the pillows up and still couldn’t stop giggling. Tauriel’s set scowl of concentration made her look like she was going into battle.

“I don’t think this works unless you’re really relaxed,” said Ori.
“True,” said Tauriel. “Wait a moment, please.”

She disentangled herself, shook herself in a peculiar way which seemed to involve the rearrangement of muscles, and re-entangled herself all in about ten seconds.

“Much better,” she said.

“For who?”

He was so shook up he couldn’t remember if that was grammatically correct.

“I can’t feel my leg,” Sigrid announced.

Ori consulted the book again and after a search found the leg Sigrid was complaining about.

“You have to put it up here,” he told her.

“I can’t move.”

Ori put the book down and attempted to move the leg.

“Careful,” Tauriel said. “Your elbow is a little too near my eye.”

Ori stood up to lean over them both, still trying to adjust Sigrid’s leg.

“That’s attached,” Sigrid reminded him.

“Wait a minute.” Ori went back to the book and studied the picture again.

“Tauriel, you need to bring your knee over here.”

“Where?”

Ori took a hold of the offending knee and pulled. Tauriel fell forward and Sigrid rolled off the bed with her, the covers pulled Ori after and they were in a heap.

“Where’s the book?” Ori demanded.

Two people who were not in the heap and certainly not any help, lost hold of their laughter.

Ori tumbled off the pile and looked up.

Fili and Kili leaned in the doorway laughing themselves to the floor.

“We weren’t doing anything,” Ori shouted.

“Except attempting to strangle each other,” said Fili.

“Don’t just stand there,” yelled Sigrid. “Help!”

Fili staggered over.

“Help you do what?” he managed.

“Shut up and get me off this floor.”

“How?” Fili snickered.

“Grab my hand.”

Fili grabbed a hand.

“That’s mine,” Tauriel told him.

Kili came over.

“What were you doing?”

“We were looking at Queen Kivi’s book and were trying to figure out Illustration 20,” Ori told him honestly and started to try and untangle the two women. Still chuckling, the princes finally got Tauriel and Sigrid unfankled and back on their feet.

Ori rescued the book and put it on the bed. He frowned at the illustration again.

“You know I really don’t think this can be done. I don’t care what Dori said.”

“Dori says it can be done?” Fili asked taking Sigrid’s hand and kissing it. He then found her shoes for her while she popped her dress back on.

“He said, ‘practice makes perfect,’ ” Ori said vaguely.

“Huh,” Fili replied. “Maybe it’s a Bearer thing. Only Bearers can stretch that much.” He tied the laces of Sigrid’s shoes for her while she sat on the bed, making sure her hair was no longer
“I pity Balin then,” Ori said a little waspishly.

“Let’s go back to the party and see if there’s any food left,” Kili said and grinned up at Tauriel as he held her weapons for her while she put her boots on. Tauriel giggled and put her hand in his.

Ori stuck the book back under his pillow and they headed back out to the reception room. Someone had refreshed the platters of finger foods. Kili and Fili collected a pile of various goodies onto a platter and they went over to the far fireplace and sat down before it amid the chattering younger set.

Tilda called out, “Queen Mavis!”

Five sets of eyes turned toward her and Tilda swallowed, stood, and curtsied, probably because she couldn’t think of anything else to do, and specified.

“Queen Mavis XV, please come and sit with us.”

Young Mavis looked pleadingly at Mavis I, all the while biting her lower lip.

“Go on, dear,” said Mavis I, flicking her fingers to shoo her over.

Young Mavis grinned and all but skipped over to join them. Ori watched the older Mavis queens exchange looks of complete exasperation. He caught a low, “… told him not to marry the child…” and “…another pair of pretty eyes…” and “…out of the schoolroom…”.

Mavis XV arrived and curtseyed before plopping down between Tilda and Sigrid and looking around nervously.

Fili said, “Your majesty? Would you care for something to drink?”

“Oh, please, just call me Mavey, your highness. That’s what they call me at home. I mean, that’s what they called me when I lived with my parents.”

Ori watched her eyes flicker from Fili to Kili to Stonehelm, then to Tauriel’s pointed ears and then she looked under her lashes at Theodred, but her gaze never settled anywhere. He wondered how many young males Mavey knew. He wondered if she had ever met anyone who wasn’t a dwarf. He rather knew the feeling.

“So, Ori-mate, let’s see this book you’re so taken with,” said Bain.

“Can’t,” said Ori. “You have to be of age. It says so in the book. You have to be married.”

“What book is this?” Mavey asked.

Ori reached and put his hands over Tilda’s ears and said over her protests, “It’s a sex manual.”

“Sigrid and Tauriel aren’t married,” said Bain.

“Close enough,” said Ori.

“I’m married,” said Mavey slyly.

“Go ask Mavis I if you can see it,” said Ori.

“Oh, she’s no fun,” said Mavey. “I suppose I wouldn’t be either if all I did was scowl and run the kingdom while our husband is making more babies.”

She clapped her hand over her mouth, her eyes huge and finally murmured around her fingers, “You didn’t hear that, right?”

“Hear wha’?” Stonehelm asked, batting his eyelashes to ridiculous effect.

Floris arrived with Biscuit and they plopped down beside Mavey.

“What did I miss? We were putting last minute touches on the costumes for the performance.”

“Queen Mavis would like to be addressed as ‘Mavey’,” said Fili.

“Sure. Did you leave any iklars?”

Biscuit raised his head, looking hopeful.

“None for you,” said Floris. “Xocolatl isn’t good for you. Remember last time?”

Biscuit sighed and flopped back down in crushing disappointment.

“Aw, poor pup,” said Mavey. “Does he mind being pet?”

“Are you kidding?” Floris asked. “You can pet him, but I’m warning you now, it’s a lifetime commitment.”

Mavey started behind Biscuit’s ears and soon the great beast was on his back, smiling coquettishly for a tummy rub.

“You are shameless,” said Mavey.
“So much for vicious wargs,” said Kili.
Mavey shivered.
“I’ve heard about them, horrid beasts that rip out your throat for fun and without provocation.”
The group got very quiet.
“Er… Mavey,” said Kili, “have you ever seen a warg?”
“No.”
“You’re petting one.”
Mavey stopped petting. She looked at Floris askance, then laughed.
“You’re all too good at joking.”
“Sh-sh-sh-she’s n-n-not j-jok-king,” said Arne.
“What do I do?” Mavey asked, frozen.
“Go back to petting him,” said Fior, “before th’ big puddin’ starts whining like a lost soul.”
Biscuit’s tail thumped enthusiastically on the carpet and his tongue lolled out and to the side.
Floris heave a sigh.
“Really, Biscuit? How is it that Chopper is a pig, yet you’re the bigger ham?”
Miss Oqizla came to refresh the platters on the table. She gave Stonehelm a long look, then walked away with a little wiggle in her step.
“She thinks your cuuuuuuuute,” Bain teased.
“She does not!” Stonehelm shot back. “Go soak your head!”
“She does, too. I’ll go ask her.”
Bain jumped to his feet, but Stonehelm grabbed him and pulled him back and the pair of them wrestled, endangering the refreshments. This was all the encouragement Arne and Theodred needed, and Gimli wasn’t going to be left out.
Floris looked indecisive.
“I’m thinkin’ I’ll just let ‘em bruise each other this once,” she said, winking at Mavey.
“You fight with the males?” Mavey asked, round-eyed.
“It’s not really a fight if I can beat them from here to Mordor, is it?” Then Floris laughed. “Oh, I dunno if I can or not, but I do know we rehearsed for five hours today, plus gave a short performance in town. I’m thinkin’ this carpet feels really good on my arse about now.”
She brushed her hair back from her eyes and Mavey stared at the red swirling design on Floris’ wrist.
“That’s beautiful,” she said. “Is it a henna design?”
“No, that’s permanent. The shad-zo did it when I was little. It’s supposed to protect me from evil spirits.”
“What’s a shad-zo?”
“A priestess among the borjeval men. That’s where my father is from, up in the ice fields.”
“He’s a long way from home,” Mavey observed.
“No, he’s not,” said Floris with a smile. “He brings it with him wherever he goes.”
“I mean, he’s far from his own people.”
“There aren’t all that many left. Another clan wiped them out when he was a boy.”
Mavey drew back, mouth open and working, with no sound coming out. Finally, she managed, in a horrified whisper,
“That’s terrible! I’m so sorry!”
And she burst into tears.
Floris looked mortified, and everyone else looked stunned. Even the wrestling stopped.
“Er… it’s alright?” Floris tried. “It was a long time ago?”
She awkwardly patted the Stiffbeard queen’s shoulder.
Fili leapt in with a napkin off the table for Mavey to cry into while he looked wildly around the room.
Finally he turned to Ori.
“Dori?” he asked.
“Hold on!”
Ori leapt to his feet, but there was no need, as Dori was upon them. Floris made room for the Bearer and Dori leaned over the distraught dam. “Oh, my dear, what has upset you?”

“P-poor Master Woo-Woo-din-i-i!” Mavey gasped.

“Great,” said Arne under his breath in khuzdul. “Now I have someone else doing it.” Biscuit wiggled around to Mavey’s other side to lick her face and Floris was still trying to help.

“It was a long time ago? He wasn’t even there when it happened?”

“It’s alright, Floris,” Dori crooned, though speaking more to Mavey than the stout younger dam. “You come along with me, Queen Mavis. We’ll go to the kitchen and make you a nice cup of tea.”

Mavey hiccupped, sniffled and said, “With honey?”

“Yes, dear, with honey, and I think there are still some lovely scones from this afternoon.”

Mavis followed Dori like a lost puppy, which, Ori reflected, she rather was. The younger group rose to refresh their platter and looked at what was still on offer.

“I shouldn’t have said anything,” said Floris glumly as she emptied a small plate of fudge onto the big platter.

“You didn’t know she was so sensitive,” said Fili, adding a pile of xocolātl chip cookies. “I mean, it is really sad.”

“I cried when Da told me, too,” said Floris, “but I was only a badger. I couldn’t have been more than fifteen. She’s a married dam! And older than me!”

“N-n-not b-by mu-mu-mu-much,” commented Arne, dumping a plate full of bacon and dill scones and a huge clump of sharp cheese to their platter. “She-She’s sh-sh-shelt-t-tered.”

“Most Stiffbeard girls are nowadays,” said Mavis I, who had arrived unnoticed and was looking over the refreshment table with a frown. “They don’t go out and play with the male badgers, because they could get hurt. We’re raising a generation of weak dams, and all on my husband’s orders.”

“Don’t you like Mavis XV, your majesty?” Tilda asked.

Mavis I’s hard features softened as she helped herself to three xocolātl chip cookies off their platter.

“She’s a sweet little thing, never a mean word on purpose, but she’s far too young and naive. She’ll do herself a mischief one day, you mark me. If we don’t look out, she’ll take the rest of us with her. Is that fruit soda water? I never! Well, not for a raven’s age, anyway.”

The younger set, platter overflowing, went back to their hearth seats. Ori followed slowly, listening in at other conversations.

On the couch nearby, Snur showed Galadriel portraits of his dwarflings which he kept in a slim folding frame in a pocket.

"She's goin' t' be just like her mam, I can tell," he said to Galadriel. "She was barely out o' nappies herself when she started followin' me here, there, an' everywhere else. 'What's this, Da?', 'How does this work, Da?', and always, 'Why? Why? Why?'."

"Oh, she's reached the 'why' stage," said Galadriel with a grin. "Celebrian went through it for a good ten years."

"No offense, milady, but I think I'd've sewn me own ears shut after the first two."

"It was very tempting. 'Why is the sky blue, Nana?', 'Because Eru made it that way, dear', 'Why?', 'I don't know, dear, you can ask him when next he's over for tea.' "

"Ya didn't say that! Did ya?"

"Not the part about Eru coming to tea. I just thought about that, then went and screamed into a pillow."

Slowly, the guests began to drift back upstairs to their rooms. The talk at the table coupled with the wine had devolved into outrageously exaggerated tales of warrior prowess.

Off on the couch, Snur had fallen asleep with his cheek against Galadriel's arm and she was desperately trying not to laugh and wake him while Celeborn tried to extract her, also without waking him.
Abruptly Snur sat up, snorted, looked around and said, "Where th' fuck are we now?"
Galadriel lost hold of her laugh and Celeborn said, "Erebor?"
"Oi, that's good," said Snur, yawning hugely. "We didn't miss that coronation, did we, Celly-mate?"

Celeborn, obviously startled to be called 'mate', never mind 'Celly', simply said, "No. It is tomorrow, or, rather, later today."

"Right," said Snur, patting Lady Galadriel on the knee with affection. "Nice talkin' to ya, your ladyship. Ya don't need any beauty sleep, but I can use ever minute I can get." He rose, stretched, burped, and trotted off to his bed.

Dain and Scudis were helped from the table by Stonehelm. Seeing as how the young dwarf was in some difficulty, Aragorn came over and gently hefted the Iron Hills monarch over his shoulder while Arwen put her arms about Queen Sculdis and lifted her. Boromir looked at Stonehelm with a laugh in his eye and the young dwarf grinned. Boromir stooped and the young dwarf leaped up for a piggyback ride. Chopper trotted after this entourage with great dignity up the stairs.

Ori went to where Dori was standing staring pensively into the fire. Dori looked troubled.
"What is it?" Ori asked.
"According to Mavis XV, she married Gheir because he was the first one who offered when she came of age and, after all, he is the king. She has no craft, and was never one for studies, so her parents said 'yes' because they thought this was the best they could do for her."
"She does make Tilda look worldly," said Ori. "She makes me look worldly!"
"I'll tell you something else. She doesn't want to be married, but she agreed to it because she thinks it's all she's good for."
"What will she do?"
"Go on being married, I imagine, unless something is done. I need to speak to Gheir, right after the coronation."

When all the guests were tucked safely in bed, Gridr, Dis, Jani, Dori and Binni went off to the baths with a xocolatl cake and red wine. Thorin thanked Mistress Dazla and her crew for all their amazing work that evening and told them they had their own free time until mid morning tomorrow.

The Durin males gathered around the kitchen table, eating the rest of the pudding.

Ori sat on Dwalin's lap, alternating feeding a spoonful to Dwalin and taking one for himself.
"We'll never sleep again," said Ori.
"I couldn't sleep anyhow," said Thorin. "I might as well enjoy being awake."
"It's no' even me own coronation an' I'm as jumpy as a pup," said Dain, who, on finding himself being tenderly put to bed, had shaken off his stupor, and come down to the kitchen with Stonehelm in tow. "Worse 'n me weddin' night."

Thorin raised an eyebrow.
"She agreed to marry you, even though she already knew what you looked like. I'd think the rest would just be gravy."
"Hardee har, funny dwarf," said Dain.

Chopper grunted a sleepy agreement at his feet.
Dain shrugged. "Besides, she'd already seen me with me trousers down. If tha' didn't drive her away screamin', nothin' would."
"There's a tradition among some men," said Ori. "that the groom is not allowed to see the bride before the wedding."

"Are they secluded or something?" Kili asked.
"No, they haven't met yet. They meet at the wedding itself."
"Why would you agree to marry someone you'd never met?" Kili asked.

Dain snorted. "Money. Power. Stupidity. If all yer lookin' for is someone t' squeeze out an heir or get filthy rich, y'r no' as picky. With men, it's not always a matter of 'agreein' t' marry. Yer folk say: yeh'll marry this one, and it's fixed."
Kili shook his head.

"It just sounds wrong. I mean, I really like Sigrid, and I think she'll make a brilliant sister, but I wouldn't want her to marry Fi just because Bard said so."

Fili rolled his eyes.

"If he just gives his blessing, I'll be happy. He's already hit me with the shovel talk, the plow talk and just about the catapult talk and I'm still not sure he even thinks it's a good idea."

"He sounded fairly certain to me," said Thorin.

"Did he?" Fili asked.

"Yes, but don't tell him I told you that. I think he's trying to keep you on your toes."

"It's working," Fili grumped. "It's going to be difficult enough paying her the proper attentions during the coronation. I'm not engaged, so I'm pretty much 'fair game' to all those dams looking for husbands. You'd think with the number of dwarrow compared to the number of dams, they'd spread out their search a little, especially considering I look like a badger's rag doll."

Kili said, "I guess a prince is a prince, handsome or not. You do have that 'lucky' hair going for you. And a beard."

"You'd have one, too, if you stopped shaving it off," said Fili.

"Wait a minute," Ori, said, shocked. "Kili, you can grow a beard?"

"Sure I can. It's not as nice as Idad Gloin's, but I'm in the direct line, so I can't expect all that much."

"But... but you shave it off?" Ori was seized in turns by horror and fascination.

"It would get tangled in the bow string," said Kili. "Believe me, Ori-mate, you never want to have your beard ripped off your face in one swift go."

Ori winced.

Thorin said, "But it's a family secret that he shaves it off, Ori. Not that he's terribly good at it."

"I always thought that was part of my charm," said Kili impishly.

"I would never say anything," Ori promised, "but, Kili, all those people saying nasty things about your lack of beard!"

Kili shrugged and gestured with his spoon.

"It's more important to me to be a good archer than to worry about what people say about my beard. I could grow one and wear an archer's mask, but those things are really ugly." He snickered.

"Fi, remember when Idad gave me my first bow?"

"Udad Thror turned purple," said Fili with great satisfaction. He deepened and graveled his voice and put on a sneer, "It's unbecoming for the prince of the House of Durin! I will go and have a majestic sulk!"

Thorin raised his eyebrows.

"You do that really well," he said with a slight laugh in his voice.

"If you hear it every day of your life, it's not that difficult," said Fili.

"I'm sorry I couldn't protect you from that."

"You couldn't protect us from being a blacksmith's sons, which is what Udad Thror thought was wrong with us."

"That seemed to be a trend with him," said Thorin. "He didn't approve of my mother, either."

Dwalin chuckled.

"Only he never said anythin' t' her, prob'ly because she scared th' shit out'v him."

Thorin smiled and shook his head.

"She wasn't exactly nurturing, was she. Remember when I fell and ripped my arm open? Instead of taking me to the healer she staunched and cleaned the wound and stitched it herself."

Fili and Kili looked horrified.

Thorin continued, "She spent the whole time telling me to stop crying and pay attention because she was only going to show me how to do it once. When adad found out they had the first fight I ever actually heard. Then he brought me to see Oin."

Oin snickered.

"I thought th' top o' his head'd pop right off when I told him it was a perfect stitchin' job an' there was naught f'r me t' do."
"You actually gave me something for the pain," said Thorin.  "Amad wanted me to tough it out."
"How old were you?" Ori asked.
"Fifteen.  I remember because I had just started training with the sword."
"Fifteen?" Stonehelm echoed.
The badgers Dwalin put through their first paces had to be at least twenty, Ori thought.
"Durins start young," said Thorin.
Apparently right after their umbilical cords were cut.
Though, now that Ori thought about it, Nori had begun to teach him how to use his boot knife around that age.  Not that anyone expected Ori to defend a kingdom, or even Steam Alley.
"Aw," said Kili, "I think we finished the pudding."
"What else is there?" Stonehelm asked, looking hopefully toward the larder.
"I could do us a fry up," said Gimli.
"Hollow legs," said Gloin.
"Aye, an' heads nearly th' same," Dain teased.
A great crash echoed through the sitting room.
All of them were on their feet instantly, fumbling for hammers, axes and swords.
"I secured th' house doors meself," Dwalin growled, already pounding through the sitting room.
At the doorway to the receiving room, he grabbed Ori, shouting, "Down!"
Ori had a vague impression of firewood flying over their heads and then he heard Legolas screaming in Sindarin.
"Take that back!"
"I'll not take it back!" Aewandínen snarled, "because it's true!  She left because you were such a disappointment, she couldn’t stand to look at you!"
Gimli growled something that sounded suspiciously like, “Fuck yeh, yeh fuckin’ orc!” and Gloin grabbed him before the fiery redhead could leap in.
"It’s a family matter, our Gimmers.  We haft’ let it be!”
The brothers grappled, spitting and cursing each other.  The furniture was knocked every which way.
"No’ t’ worry,” said Bain.  “It’s quite sturdy.”
Aewandínen picked up Legolas and slammed him onto a side table which gave way in a hail of splinters.
"Usually.”  Balin clicked his tongue.  “And they say we’re hard on furniture!”
Then Thranduil swept down the stairs in his cloak and, oddly, a nightshirt.
Ori had the feeling he’d grabbed the cloak for effect.
Aewandínen screamed, “I lost my mother because you were a nothing of a son!  Now you’re driving away father, too!”
"What is the meaning of this?" Thranduil thundered.
But the brothers fought on, rolling on the floor, though Aewandínen was stronger and heavier and Legolas was getting the worst of it.
"Just a mo’, your majesty,” Mistress Dazla appeared in her own robe and pin curlers.  She handed Thranduil an enormous metal bucket of water.  “This isn’t my first go-round.”
Thranduil took the bucket and emptied it over the combatants.
There were ice chips in the water, which certainly got their attention.
Aewandínen rolled to his feet.  Legolas rose slowly to his knees before climbing the rest of the way, dazed, his lip split.
Elrond and Lindir appeared at the top of the steps and Elrond quickly took in the scene.
"Is anyone hurt?” he asked.
Thranduil turned and looked like he might bark something caustic, but he abruptly sighed and said, “If you would look to Legolas, Lord Elrond?  He isn’t as big as Aewandínen and I fear he got the worst of it."
“He never bothers to train,” snarled Aewandínen, catching his breath.
Thranduil whirled on his eldest son, and he was suddenly ever inch a king. Ori could swear the temperature in the room dropped thirty degrees as Thranduil stalked over to his eldest son, his long, hard hand whipped out and he caught his heir by the face and slammed him against the wall.

Aewandínen’s eyes bulged, but he wisely did not struggle as Thranduil hissed in his face.

“If you ever say such a thing to your brother again, I don’t care if you are my son, I will gut you and throw you to the orcs. Do. You. Understand?”

Thranduil’s grip made speech impossible, but Aewandínen could still nod his head a little, which was, apparently, enough.

“Get out of my sight,” Thranduil growled and shoved Aewandínen toward the stairs, which the prince wasted no time in scaling.

The dwarrow came into the room and, giving Thranduil space to talk to his son, set the furniture to rights.

Thranduil turned to Legolas who sat, damp and forlorn, on one of the couches, hands clasped on his knees. Elrond stood next to him with a hand on Legolas’s shoulder, surrounded by a faint, blue glow. Ori thought Elrond might be channeling healing energy.

Thranduil knelt before his son, his anger evaporating. In Sindarin he asked, “My leaf, are you all right?”

Legolas answer the question with a question in weston. “Father, is it true? Did Mother leave because of me?”

Thranduil swallowed and looked up at Elrond, who nodded. “No, my son. She and Lord Elrond’s wife fell in love and left together for the Undying Lands. Nothing more, nothing less.”

Legolas looked up at Lord Elrond in horror. “I’m so sorry, milord.”

Elrond sighed. “It’s just as well this comes out now. They loved each other all their lives, but they were nobles, so they did their duties, raised their children, and waited long years to be together. It has nothing to do with you or me or your father or anyone else. There, the truth is told. Let it rest.”

Thranduil nodded and agreed. “Let it rest.” Then his put a hand on Legolas’ face and asked, “Have you spent all this time thinking you were to blame?”

Legolas fell into his arms and wept. The Durins looked at each other. Dwalin sighed and shook his head. “Lemme go, Da,” said Gimli plaintively.

“I am so sorry,” said Thranduil, rocking Legolas as though he were still a fawn. “In my arrogance and my anger, I never spoke of it. My silence has hurt you deeply.”

In time, Legolas drew back, red-faced and disheveled. Gimli came over and plopped himself down next to Legolas and took a handkerchief, which Ori was surprised he owned, and wiped Legolas’ face. “Now then, laddie. Yeh see, it’s all right.” He put the cloth to Legolas’ nose. “Blow,” he instructed. Legolas stared at him, mystified, and blew a breath out of his pursed lips. Gimli rolled his eyes. “No’ tha’ way, yeh great, silly elf. Blow yer nose.” “Oh.”

“Aye, yer funny. Here.” Gimli pulled a bun out of his pocket and shoved it at him. Legolas took it, brows raised, brush off the pocket lint and ate the bun, washed down with a glass of water brought by Mistress Dazla.

“Now, off t’ bed with yeh,” said Gimli, getting to his feet. Thranduil looked amused.

“Are you saying my presence is no longer required, Master Dwarf?”

“I’m no’ sayin’ nothin’ o’ th’ kind, but I’d like some sleep myself.” Gridr, in the doorway in her dressing gown, sighed.

“Take him back t’ yer room, our Gimmers. I doubt there’ll be much more bouncin’ around t’night. An’ yeh make sure his hair’s dry or he’ll catch a chill.”

Thranduil raised an eyebrow and Gloin opened his mouth, but Gridr stood with her hands on her hips and glared at each of them in turn.

“Right, me dear,” said Gloin.

“As you say, milady,” said Thranduil.

Gimli rose and offered his hand to Legolas, who took it.

“Let’s go, amrâlimê,” said Gimli. “Time f’r all good li’l elflin’ s t’ be in bed.”

“Are you going to read me a bedtime story?” Legolas teased.

“I’ll give yeh a story,” Gimli grumped.

Thranduil and Elrond went back up the stairs. Dis, Jani, Dori, and Binni came in after Gridr. They looked questioningly about the room and were told quietly what had happened.

On the promise of tea, they all went back to the kitchen. Dori had just put the pot on then there was another loud noise from the receiving room. Dwalin went out, rolling his sleeves up as he went. They heard him yank open the door then bark a laugh.

“An’ here we though’ yeh lot were off consummatin’ with others.”

They heard the bolt shot back into place and, into the kitchen came Nori, Bofur, and Granny Klak disgracefully late and even more disgracefully drunk.

“Granny!” Dori cried. “Are you alright?”

Granny Klak reeled in his direction, laughing, “Ooooh, don’t worry, my darlings, we’re fine! The night watch caught us.” She turned to Dwalin and shook her finger at him. “They let us go as I told them I was your great granny-in-law.”

Dwalin face-palmed as Thorin burst out laughing. Ori wanted to crawl under the table. Dori grabbed Nori by the ear, making him yelp.

“You got my great grandmother in trouble!”

“Our great grandmother didn’t need any help!” Nori yelled and pointed at Klakuna. She reeled around once more and beamed at Dori then leaned in to pinch his cheek and got a nostril by mistake.

“Nonono, darling Dori, we met in the courtyard and then we went to this lo-o-o-ovey pub-bec-pub-pub and there was such a cha-a-a-armin’ dwarf behind the bar and Ooof!” Granny Klak cupped her hands around what looked like a nice trim dwarf male’s buttocks.

“How was I to know his wife didn’t share?” she asked, pouting. “Now, don’t you worry, my loves, I told them to send us the bill for the damages.”

Bombur appeared in the kitchen door in a soft orange nightshirt embroidered with spoons, forks and ladles. He shook his head and, taking Bofur’s collar in one hand and Nori’s in the other, marched the two off to bed. Balin and Dori assisted by Dis and Jani, shooed Granny Klak off to hers.

Ori yawned and bumped his head against Dwalin’s shirtfront.
Welcome back, friends, to a new episode here at Dwarf Telenovela Central. Yes, this is it! This is the chapter Thorin will be crowned. Let the festivities begin!! You may want to get snacks etc., as this is a long chapter. Please join us again next Friday for more excitement! Same dwarrow time, same dwarrow tunnel! Keep those cards and letters coming, friends!

The sunshine through the bedroom window woke Ori. He was pillowed across Dwalin, who was lying back with a book in his hand. He looked up when Ori shifted to kiss him.

“Why did Dori let us sleep so late?” Ori asked.
“Everyone go’ t’ bed late.”
“I take it there weren’t any more fights, then?”
“Nah.” Dwalin chuckled and reached over to the bedside table. “Tea?”
“Yes, please,” Ori said gratefully.

They drank their tea in blissful peace. Ori leaned against Dwalin’s shoulder as Dwalin’s arm was about his waist. This was lovely. The quiet of the room was only disturbed by the sounds of Kihshassa hunting up Nori-Pori and Mask and giving both a thorough wash.

Garnet flew in the window, perched on the footboard, preened then croaked, “Today’s the day.”
“Yes, “ Ori agreed. “It’s amazing to think about.”
“An’ abou’ bloody time a’ tha’,” Dwalin agreed.
“Everyone in the Dale is running around,” Garnet went on. “You’d think they were rabbits with hawks on their tails.”

Ori and Dwalin laughed at that.
“Have you seen Fanny today?” Ori asked.
Garnet cocked her head and Ori rather thought she was amused.

“Your oliphaunt spent yesterday wandering the Dale, being fed fruits and vegetables by everyone, and snored the night away in the long grass next to main gate.”
“Oh good,” Ori said. “I’m glad she’s alright.”
“Dori’s setting up breakfast for the family in the breakfast parlor,” Garnet added.
“Anythin’ else?” Dwalin asked.
“We’ve all been checking around the city and Dale. Nori’s been looking around as well.”
“Rumors?” Dwalin rumbled.
“Other than some ladies worrying they may see another wearing the same dress?”
“Aye, besides tha’.”

“Everyone’s talking about whether or not the throne room has been covered in mirrors or if Thorin will, after he’s crowned, immediately marry Lady Galadriel.”
Both Ori and Dwalin burst out laughing.
“Poor Celeborn,” Ori teased. “Whatever will he do?”
“Apparently,” Garnet said reflectively, “he’s going to be a concubine to Queen Hild.”
Dwalin and Ori laughed again. Dwalin gave Ori a squeeze.
“Guess we be’er go an’ make ’n appearance a’ breakfast.”
“Yes,” Ori agreed and clambered over Dwalin and shrieked when he was tickled. “Come on, I’m hungry.”
Ori felt almost defiant as he pulled an old cardigan over his nightshirt. There was no use getting dressed just yet. They were all going to have to wash and put on their finery soon anyway. Dwalin, clad only in his scabby old pink drawers, picked up the tea tray and they headed to the breakfast parlor. Nori-Pori and Mask skittered after them and Kihshassa swooped along the hall with Garnet.

In the breakfast parlor, the doors were propped open to the meadow and a lovely cool breeze blew through.

Dori and Balin, in fabulous matching dressing gowns, presided. Powder presided over Dori’s plate.

“There you are, pet, our deary,” Dori cooed. “Come and have some coffee.”

Ori presented himself, kissed both Dori and Balin, and was given a large mug of fragrant coffee liberally graced with sugar and milk. On his way to his seat, Ori looked out over the meadow dotted with the grazing animals and rampant with flowers and realized there was a large rock in the middle of the space that hadn’t been there the day before. Then the rock shifted slightly and he recognized it.

“Dori, Beorn is here.”

“Where, pet?”

“He’s asleep in the meadow with the ponies.”

“Well you can go wake him in a little while, but be careful, pet. He might be a total ‘bear’ in the morning.”

“Dori! That was terrible!”

“Wasn’t it, though?” Dori practically sang. “I’ll be sure to bring out the big teapot and have a cuppa with him. There’s a porridge of oats, fruit and nuts on the stove. He’ll like that. He certainly won’t want what we’re eating.”

“Is it just us today?” Ori asked.

“The guests are having trays brought up to their rooms, pet,” said Dori as Mistress Dazla and her minions brought out platters of delicious smelling food. “They’ll want to sleep in, too, and have time to pretty themselves up at leisure.”

“Wonder wha’ Hild won’t wear t’day?” Dwalin said dryly, making Ori giggle and Dori frown. Balin was torn between the two.

Thorin came in, stretching and yawning, wearing nothing but a pair of pajama bottoms. He grinned at Dwalin. Dwalin grinned back and went to him.

“My king,” Dwalin said simply. They embraced and held each other for a moment. Ori’s heart melted at the sight. They released each other but stayed, brows resting together briefly. Then Thorin came to Ori and enveloped him in a hug. Ori tried to say something but only choked. Thorin squeezed him and ruffled his hair before putting him back into Dwalin’s arms. Thorin turned, Balin and Dori were there to salute him as king and greet him lovingly. Thorin dropped in his chair and Dori made up Thorin’s portion and put it down before him with a pat on the hand.

Thorin gaped at his overflowing plate.

“Steak and eggs, Dori?”

“You need to fortify yourself.”

“Isn’t it bad luck to eat anything bigger than your head?” Thorin asked.

“It’s your coronation day, dear. Today, nothing is bigger than your head.”

“I hope the crown still fits,” Thorin muttered.

“Like a pill on an oliphaunt’s bum,” Dwalin helped, making Ori giggle.

“Fuck you, Dwalin,” Thorin said with a smile.

Dis and Jani came in greeting everyone, pausing to hug Thorin as he tried to eat and before he could get out of his chair to greet them properly. Fili, Sigrid, Kili, and Tauriel arrived on their heels. Thorin managed to get out of his chair to embrace his nephews, an arm about each.

“This is the best day ever!” Kili shouted eagerly, making his uncle laugh. The boys stepped back and both said, “My king,” bowing in perfect unison. Ori wondered if they practiced or things like this just happened with them. He suspected the latter.
Sigrid hugged Thorin, too. He kissed her forehead and told her she was a bonny lass, making her blush. Tauriel came forward, bowed, and greeted him in Sindarin, “Hail, mighty king of all dwarrow.”

Thorin acknowledged this then held out his arms to embrace her. She leaned down to hug him and he kissed her forehead as he had Sigrid and said, “I’m glad you are here, Captain Tauriel.”

“Come and eat,” Dori commanded.

The households of In and Ur arrived and greetings were exchanged again and, again, Thorin was saluted as king. Legolas was with them, looking much improved, rested, and holding hands with Gimli. Gridr bossed them to chairs and settled them with food, fondly kissing the tops of both heads. Gloin looked quite satisfied with the arrangement now. Binni was delighted and Oin placid. Loli, Omi, Randi, and Buj settled themselves near Ori, helping themselves to food as Dori ordered.

Thranduil arrived and came forward immediately to greet Thorin. They bowed formally to each other then embraced somewhat awkwardly, chuckling as they did.

“You have many things to be proud of, King Thorin,” Thranduil said as he went to greet Dori with a kiss and a hand on Balin’s shoulder.

“I hope that counting you as an ally and good neighbor may be one of them,” Thorin responded easily.

Thranduil smiled and inclined his head.

“I rather think that was set in stone the day I arrived at the inn,” Thranduil commented as he nodded to Bombur and Erda. “Strange dwarven enchantments seem to linger there. Very dangerous.”

“Always cook love into the food,” Erda said with a smile. “Amazing results appear.”

Thranduil chuckled. He briefly rested his fingers on Tauriel’s shoulder then on Kili’s. When he got to Legolas, he bent and laid his hand over Legolas’ heart. Legolas leaned against his father’s arm.

“Ada,” he murmured.

“My little fawn,” Thranduil said softly. He patted Gimli’s hair, then seated himself on Legolas’ other side.

