They all check in. Fornell, Tony, and Draga, coordinate and replan for what they’re going to be doing. Which is bugger all. Gibbs and Abbi are on the other side of foot thick steel and concrete. Tony makes some unhappy noises about Ziva joining the party, but since the current plan is ‘bugger all,’ it’s not like there’s much danger. The FBI Anti-terror Assault Team is rolling in with their specs for the building, starting to lay out how they’d be getting in if they had to, but right now the quickest plan still seems to be cut through the bomb doors.

Leon’s watching that, listening, and then asks Tim, “The cell tower, how?”

“Ask nicely? I can’t hack the power department and the phones at the same time.” Leon looks relieved to have something to do, and then another idea hits him. “Send out a call on your bat phone.”

Tim sighs. “Thanks.” He’d been so into take charge he’d forgotten that he has employees who specialize in this sort of stuff. He takes a break from trying to get the cameras back online to write up a fast, All Hands On Deck, and send it live.

“Okay, in the next five minutes everyone who’s on shift for all of NCIS Cybercrime will be attacking anything even close to where you are working on getting it live again.”

Fornell comes back on the line. “Jaws of life didn’t do it. Arc welder time.”

“Those are hardened doors. They’re supposed to be able to take a bomb blast,” Leon says.

“I know. This is the tool they use to cut through the hull of a battleship. It takes time, but there’s nothing this baby can’t cut.”

“God can’t do th—“ And everything goes silent and dark.

“McGee?” Abbi says, not sure why she’d doing it. He cut off mid word the second the lights went. Not like this is a joke and he’s just screwing with them.

“Power out?” Gibbs asks.

Abbi’s checking her phone. No bars, no wifi. “No. New defense protocol. He’s put the building in lockdown. Nothing gets in or—“

They hear a quiet snick sound, followed by something hissing, and both of them drop to the ground, fast, as flames explode in the far corner of the room and begin the dance through the files.

Gibbs yanks on the door again, and it’s still locked. Apparently power out didn’t effect that lock. He grabs his flashlight, intentionally ignoring the flames that are getting stronger and hotter behind him, and starts really looking at the door.

“Got fifteen bullets.”

“Me, too.”

They both have Sigs.
“Don’t want to waste them on the hinges.”

Abbi nods, digging through her go bag. She doesn’t have tape. She does have Band-Aids. She already knows where Gibbs is going with this. As she’s ripping open the box, and he’s trying to see if he can get his phone wedged in between the door and the door jam.

“Won’t fit,” he reports back.

“Tape it on, hit the power button, and then push stacks of files in close.”

He’s grabbing boxes of files and stacking them up in front of the door as she’s opening band aids. “Hell of a way to make a shape charge.”

“Let’s just hope this works.” She’s got her phone taped to the bottom hinge.

He’s got one stack of boxes right next to the phone. He’s piling up a second stack that he’ll push into place as soon as she hits the power buttons.

With any luck they’ll be out of the way by the time the phone blows.

She hits the power button, and he shoves the boxes of files in as quick as he can, and they both run for it.

Not very far to run. The smoke is getting thick, and it’s getting hotter by the second in there. The liquid O2 in that canister did a great job as an accelerant for this fire. It’s growing fast.

They hear a much smaller whump sound than either of them wanted, and see the boxes smoldering, files scattered all over. Gibbs is pushing them away, pulling new boxes of files toward them.

They also see a shattered hinge. “It worked!” Abbi’s grinning. “When we get out of this, I’m making sure exploding cell phones are standard procedure for all of my guys.”

Gibbs nods.

She’s taping her phone into place, and he’s grabbing more boxes, trying to stay low, below the smoke level. He’s got the sense they’re going to need good wind for the rest of tonight, and gasping like a fish out of water with burned lungs isn’t going to get them out of this.

Second time works, too. Papers and boxes all over the place, but the top hinge is shattered. Gibbs pulls his knife and wedges it between the door and the frame, while Abbi grabs the handle, a good firm pull from her and a hard push from him, and they pop it out.

New, fresh air sweeps in, feeling good for a second, followed by the hot rush for fresh fuel to the fire behind them.

Gibbs grabs his pack, tosses Abbi hers, and they run.

“Smoke,” Tony says.

“Smoke? What’s burning?” Leon asks.

“Can’t tell. I can smell it, not see it. Fornell?”
“No visual. Draga?"

“Got smoke coming out of one of the southwest air vents on the ground floor.”

“Tell me you’re almost through the blast door,” Leon says as Tim types faster, breaking into the internals of the power company, finding out why the cameras aren’t working.

“Got about three feet done.”

“Not fast enough,” Leon mutters.

“I know.”

Only one way up and out of the basement level. Okay, not true. Only one way they can use. The elevators locked down as soon as the building went on lock down. Doors shut tight, emergency exit locks. No way into or out of the elevator shafts without a torch.

Which means they’ve got to get up three flights of stairs to get to the lobby. Or one flight of stairs to get to the parking garage, then up through the parking garage to get to their car.

“Armory?” Gibbs asks. It would have night vision goggles. They’ve got flashlights, but they’re almost more trouble than their worth, just highlighting how dark the dark around them is.

“Protocol for this is power goes down, anyone trained in security tries to get to the armory which is on the floor above us, and gears up. Some of us are in charge of defending the civilians in the building. Some are on attack.”

“Which are you?”

“Attack.”

“So what’s the plan?” He doesn’t like staying here. There in a long hall without any real cover besides the smoke-filled dark.

“Shoot anything that’s not wearing a Coast Guard insignia.”

“You mean, like us.”

“Exactly. Come on.”

“Going up?” he asks.

“Yeah. You ever use night vision goggles?” She has. She remembers how the ones they had in Iraq could pick up a cigarette from a klick away.

“Long time ago.”

She clicks her flashlight on and off. “Then you know what happens if you hit someone wearing them with one of these.”

Gibbs turns off his light and grins.
Down the hall, to the door, door leads into the stairwell. Up and out. Easy as pie, right?

They’re moving quietly, but not quiet enough. Gibbs stops them, pulling off his shoes, and nodding for her to do the same. His eyes may not be a quarter of what they used to be, but his hearing is still as sharp as it ever was. Blind fighting seems like the perfect time to use that to his advantage.

“Those goggles see heat?”

“No. Just night vision.”

He nods. Good to know they can’t see them through the door.

“Armory’s one floor up?”

“Yeah.”

“Flash bangs?”

Abbi likes that plan. If they can get there, they can get into something a lot more troublesome for night vision goggles than a flash light. That’s worth a detour.

“If we get to the garage, can we get out?” Gibbs asks.

“I like my odds against a bomb blast door if I’ve got a truck I can drive into it better than if it’s just me on my own.”

He nods curtly. “Armory, gear up, garage.”

“Good.” She kisses him, fast and hard, and then jerks her head to the door. Three fingers up, two, one. They go.

Only so many ways you can go through a door. Luck and skill was with them. They go through low and the first shot echos through the stairwell, zipping over their heads by not nearly enough distance. Gibbs went through first, keeping the door open. Abbi’s behind, covering. They hear a strangled yelp when she hits the gunman full in the face with her flash light, followed by a low gurgling curse as she shoots him.

She’s first up the stairs, Gibbs covering. He grabs the man’s gun, frisking him for weapons. He’s alive, knee shot, crying and yelling. Abbi cuffs him to the railing. “Why would you do this?”

Gibbs yanks off the goggles, stuffing them into his bag. It’s Adama. “Better this than jail.”

Abbi snorts at that. “Looks like you’ll get to enjoy both.” She ties off his leg efficiently, slowing the blood loss. “FBI’ll be here sooner or later.”

Adama’s looking at the bags. She can see in his face that he knows what’s in those files. “You’re not getting out with those.”

“Try us,” Gibbs says as Abbi clicks off the flash light, getting ready for the next flight of stairs.

“Anyone in the hall above?”

“No.”

Abbi wishes she had a clear view of Gibbs face. She’s sure Adama is lying, but it’d be nice to know what Gibbs is thinking, too.

Doesn’t matter, they’re going up, carefully, covering each other, quiet. They get to the door to the next floor up, the armory and parking garage, and Gibbs points up, Abbi thinks she knows what he’s thinking. If they go a few more floors up, and then cross the building, and then go down, they can come in from the side everyone isn’t watching.

Ten floors in this building, and they don’t think there are enough guys to watch all of them.

“Okay. Uh huh. Thanks.” They hear Fornell say.

“What?” Tim asks.

“Doc’s not at home. According to his wife he’s ‘working late’ tonight.”

“Fuck.” Jimmy mutters it. He’s going through as many medical files as he can find in the mass of pictures Gibbs and Abbi uploaded. “Got at least three cases where he’s slapped the wrong cause of death on a body. How about his assistant?”

“I’ll get someone on it,” Fornell says.

Abbi’s office is on the third floor. So, that’s not a good floor. Fourth floor has the computer they want to get their hands on, which means it’s likely got someone on it. Brandis’ office is on the sixth floor, so there’s probably someone, maybe Brandis, on that floor.

Second floor, Accounting and HR, it is. Once again, they go in low and quiet, flash light out to blind anyone, but no one makes a noise as they move in. No sound. No sight. They’re above ground now, so tiny bits of outside light are filtering in. It’s dark but not the inky, smoky black of the basement.

Everything is dead. Computers are silent. No glow from any lights. Not even the tiny green glow of the on button on a phone. Nothing.

It never occurred to Abbi how loud an office building is, even when it’s quiet. But right now, there’s nothing. Not the hum of the AC, or the computer fans, or anything. Just the sounds of them breathing, and quiet, steady footfalls as they cross the floor as quickly as they can.

There’s a conference room to their left. Abbi nods into it. Gibbs follows, wondering what’s going on.
She touches the window. “Bullet proof, bomb proof glass. But, they can look out and see everything. At least two hundred people, fire trucks… Tony!

Gibbs starts flashing his light. Basic distress call SOS.

“I’ve got ‘em!” They hear Tony’s voice over the radio. “Goddamn it. It’s Morse code. I don’t…”

“Can he see me from where he is?” Fornell asks.

“No. No LOS on you or Draga.”

Tim’s all over this. “Okay, listen up, Tony. Dot’s a quick burst, dash is longer. Where are you cutting through?” Tim asks Fornell.

“Front lobby door. If they can get there, we can get them out. Maybe five more minutes of cutting.”

Tim starts telling Tony a long list of dots and dashes.

“What’s that?” Tony asks when he’s done.

“Front lobby, five minutes. What’s he sending back?”

Another string of dots and dashes.

“Got it,” Tim says.

“Yeah, I know,” Tony replies.

“No, that’s what he’s telling you.”

“Getting more.” And Tony rattles off more dots and dashes.

Tim writes them down. “Adama’s taken care of. Cuffed to the banister in a stairwell.” He hits Tony with another long string of dots and dashes. “Letting him know the Doc and his assistant are in there somewhere.”

“Dash, dash, dash, pause, dash, dot, dash,” Tony says.

“Means OK.”

More dots follow and by now Tony’s figured out what means what. “He wants to know if we’ve got sight of anyone else?” Tony flashes back “No.”

One more series of flashed dots and dashes that translates into, “Got it. Lobby in five,” comes from Gibbs.

“Five minutes. We can just hole up, wait, and then make a run for it,” Abbi says.

Gibbs nods, looking at their current position.
“Not right here, though.” Abbi’s agreeing with what he’s not saying. With the light from the windows they can see well in here, and it’s not a great place. One door. Glass walls. No real protection. They want walls that can’t be shot through around them.

“No. If anyone is watching from the outside…” Or the inside. Anyone who knew Morse code could see the flashes flying about. Even if you only got sight of half of the conversation, you’d know where they’re going. And even if you don’t know Morse code, you know where they are.

“First floor, stairwell. Make a run for it as soon as they’re through.” Abbi knows they can see the lobby doors from the stairs.

“Okay. You first out the door, I’ve got you?”

“Sure.”

They shift their weight, ready to move. Abbi holds up three fingers again. Three, two, one.

Through the door. Left, right. Check the hall. Check the flanks.

Gibbs doesn’t see it. Couldn’t have. Too dark, too far away, but he did hear it. Sound of a rifle bolt. He heard it, and knew, and before anything other than his gut could check in he’s turning to face Abby, grabbing her, dragging them down.

He felt the hit, the silent, dull splat of a bullet to his back, felt one more, higher further out, burning tearing holy shit fuck pain through his arm and then numb, then his hearing went because Abbi, wrist over his shoulder, gun an inch from his ear, is returning fire.

Then they hit the floor.

He’s not getting off of her. He’s covering her body with his, ears ringing from the close up shot. She can see (as well as anyone can in this dark). He’s got a view of the floor under them. She’s saying something, trying to move, but he’s not going anywhere, and his ears are too fucked to make out what she’s saying.

Finally, she physically tilts his head, and his body, which is not interested, at all, in moving, flops over enough to see the man who shot is lying on the floor, not moving. Abbi gets up, tentative, gun trained on him, flashlight scouring the floor they’re on, and begins to move toward the man.

She stops two steps into that, noticing that Gibbs hasn’t moved.

He tries to sit up, but that doesn’t work on the first, and then the second, or the third try, which is when they both realize that he’s hit a hell of a lot worse than he thinks he is.

“Fuck.” She quickly sprints over to… Brandis, or what’s left of him. She thinks he’s dead, but she’s not sure and doesn’t want to waste too much time on it. She kicks the rifle away from him and frisks him fast, finding two pistols. She grabs them, and then runs back to Gibbs.

“Dead?”

“Or close enough.” She doesn’t like how Gibbs’ voice sounds. There’s a wet, sloppy tone to it that makes her blood run cold.
She’s messing with his vest, trying to get him sitting up, trying to find where he’s hit. Something got through, and it’s not just that shoulder wound. That would hurt like a motherfucker, but it wouldn’t make him sound like this.

She gets the back pack off of him, and wrestles with the vest, finally feeling hot, sticky mess on his back.

Gibbs is groaning. Everything hurts now, hurts really, really bad, hurts all over waves of red nauseous bloody hot pain.

She’s talking to him, but he’s not tracking it, not really.

He’s having a difficult time focusing on that. On anything really.

There’s just pain, and wet… Oh…

That’s when it hits. The shot in his… back? Under his shoulder blade? this hot, red, blinding white ball of pain, that’s where the bullet went through his vest. And from the feel of it, because he’s getting bits and pieces into place, so he can tell his front isn’t wet, it didn’t go all the way through him.

He knows where he was. He knows how much of himself he got in front of her. After some chunk of time it occurs to him, that if he’s shot in the back, it also means he was shot through the evidence in the back pack he’s wearing.

He thinks, assuming she can get the bleeding stopped, that this won’t kill him. (Though given how detached he’s feeling about that right now, there’s probably too much blood coming out.) He knows, given where he was in relation to her, that if that bullet had hit her, it would have been a dead center chest shot through one side of the vest and maybe out the other.

He’s smiling up at her as she’s stuffing her jacket between his vest and back, pulling the vest extra tight, using it as a makeshift pressure bandage. “I saved you.”

She looks up at him. “And if you survive this, I’m reaming your ass out so hard you won’t walk for a fucking week for doing that. I’m the cop, you’re the back up, you do not go throwing yourself in front of a bullet for me.”

He smiles again. “Too damn stubborn to die here.”

Her hands are shaking, and he’s getting cold. “You damn well better not.” She puts his gun in his hand, and he drops it, fingers aren’t doing a good job of holding tight. “I’ve still got to get us out of this. And we’ve got at least two unaccounted for. You stay put. You stay awake. That is an order, Marine.”

He nods, very slow, very tired. He can taste blood. That’s not good. And there’s a burbling sensation when he breathes, which is worse. “I’m bleeding on the evidence.” She’s got him propped up on the back pack he’s got filled with files. The back pack that was on his back when he got shot. “He had a rifle.”

“I know, Gibbs, big one.” His eyes are sliding closed.

She slaps him, hard, and his eyes jerk open again. “Stay the fuck awake. You do not fall asleep and you sure as fucking hell do not die on me, you hear?”

“Yes, Ma’am.” His eyes are drooping.
Abbi runs, as fast as she has ever run before, for the doors. How long did it take to get Gibbs patched up? How long do they have?

She stops, skidding, in front of the doors. Sparks, welding sparks, and a long, red hot on one side and cold black on the other, cut through the door. Soon. Just gotta hold tight. Her back is to the wall, no one can get her from that side, and she’s watching for any movement.

Clank. The cut bit of door crashes into the floor. She’s sprinting again as Fornell’s coming in. “Abbi.”

“Ambulance. Now!”

He’s barking orders, and she’s heading back to Gibbs.

“Is he alive?” Tim feels the fear high and tight through his whole body.

“I don’t know, McGee. Abbi’s in one piece, but bloody. We heard shots fired. The EMTs are fifteen feet behind me. What’s Gibbs’ blood type?”

“I don’t…” He’s getting into the HR database as fast as he can. But Gibbs isn’t there anymore because he’s not an active employee.

“Pump him full of O,” Jimmy says.

The EMTs know that. Tim knows they know that. Hell, it’s likely the only blood they stock. More hunting, service records, have to be here somewhere. “A positive.”

He hears Fornell say that to someone else.

He can hear feet pounding, and Fornell breathing hard.

“You see him?”

“No, just stepped over a body, but it’s not his.” More running and rasping breath. He hears EMTs saying something indistinct, and gets the sense that they just passed Fornell.

“They’re putting him on a backboard, and running an IV line. Picking him up, he’s holding Abbi’s hand, won’t let her go.”

Tim feel the vice around his heart relax. “He’s alive.”

He can hear the relief in Fornell’s voice, too. “He’s alive.”

“What hospital are they taking him to?”
Fornell asks, and a second later says, “Mercy General.”

“Abby and I are his next of kin,” Leon nods at him. The FBI’s got control of the investigation now. Tim’s running out, Jimmy close behind. They get to the parking garage, and Jimmy says, “You go to him, I’ll get the girls.”

“Thanks.”
Tim rarely drives like a maniac. Which doesn’t mean that he can’t do it. He just doesn’t like it. But, between Gibbs and Ziva he’s learned from the best when it comes to driving like Mario Andretti on speed, so flashers going, he races to Mercy, and manages to beat the ambulance there.

Flashing his ID all over the place gets him a prime place to wait, and when the ambulance does come in, EMTs rush Gibbs past, shooing Abbi and Ziva away. He gets a glimpse of Gibbs, unconscious, blood everywhere.

Abbi’s standing next to him, vibrating with scared and angry and too much everything, and then she turns, punches the wall, hard, denting the drywall, and collapses into Ziva, sobbing.

Roughly twenty million years go by before the first of the surgeons come out (though it’s before the rest of the family has gotten there, so realistically it’s been less than twenty minutes). “Are you Tim McGee?”

Tim nods. Abbi and Ziva also staring at the surgeon, all three of them quivering with nerves. “Yeah. How is he?”

“Insanely lucky and very hurt. The bullet entered below his right shoulder blade and chewed the bottom lobe to bits.” The surgeon shakes his head. “Never seen a bullet that big in someone still alive. We’re prepping him for surgery. The right lung has three lobes. The bottom one can’t be saved, and we’re not sure about the middle one, either. Top one’s taken minimal damage, we know we can save it.”

“What does that mean? Will he survive this?” Abbi asks.

“Barring unforeseen complications, yes.”

Tim feels himself, Abbi and Ziva relax a hair. But there’s survive and then there’s living. "Will he be on oxygen for the rest of his life?" Tim asks.

“Depends on how much of his lung we have to take out. If it’s just the bottom lobe, he’ll be more or less okay. Once he heals up, he won’t notice it except if he’s working hard. Take two thirds of a lung out, and it’ll start to slow him down in day to day life.”

“But he’ll live?” Abbi asks again, needing to hear it again.

“He should. We’re pumping him full of blood, and the faster we can get everything tied off the better his chances are. People have survived with only one lobe. He’ll have at least three of them when we’re done.” The surgeon checks his watch. “He should be ready to go by now, which means I’ve got to go. We’ll send a nurse out when he’s done.”

Another million years before Ducky and Penny get there.
Penny sees Abbi, so tense, so angry, so afraid, and so hurt. She swings into comforter mode. “Come on, Abbi, let’s get you washed up,” she says gently.

Abbi looks at her hands and arms, her shirt and pants, and sees she’s covered in Jethro’s blood.

She nods, slowly.

Ducky sends a text to Abby, telling her that Ziva and Abbi need clean clothing. She’s bloody from Jethro, and Ziva’s (less) bloody from holding her.

Eventually, everyone arrives.

Ducky tells them that the amount of waiting they’re doing is a good thing. It means they can likely save the second third of the lung. A straight lobectomy is a quick thing. In, and tie it off, and done. In Korea, he’d seen surgeons do it in less than twenty minutes.

Five hours in means they’re patching things up, tying off bleeders, and getting him into shape to heal up.

Tim hopes that’s true and not just soothing bullshit.

Eventually a nurse does come in. He’s tall, with a deep gentle voice, and smiling. “Gibbs family?”

The fact that they all sprang up the second he entered the waiting room is likely a hint that he’s in the right spot.

“He’s going to be fine. They’ve got him in recovery right now, and in an hour or so they’ll transfer him to his own room.”

“His lung?” Ducky asks.

“We were able to save the middle lobe. He’s going to be sore for a while, but he’ll be fine.” The nurse smiles at them again, looking at this group of people standing around. “Okay. He’s going back to his room in an hour, and he’s going to be asleep for a long time. Next of Kin, you can stay, the rest of you, go home, rest, come back with lunch, which is about when he’ll be waking up.”

Everyone starts shuffling around, not happy about that, but not about to fight it either.

Tim quickly looks at Abby and she nods. He wraps his arm around Abbi, standing so her left hand is behind his back, hiding the lack of wedding ring, and says, “Okay, where do we wait?”

“Tim and Abby McGee?” Tim nods, and Abbi knows what he’s doing. “You can come with me. When he gets to his room, you’ll be there.”

Tim smiles a little. “Sounds good.”

The next hour of waiting goes faster. They know he’s okay. They know he’s going to be okay. And they’ve got their respective higher ups demanding updates.

Granted, he’s just letting Leon and Fornell know what’s going on, but Abbi’s got Admiral Zukunft, Commandant of the Coast Guard on her phone, explaining everything to him.

From what Tim can hear, the Admiral is not having a great day. From what Abbi’s saying, he’s going to be spreading his not great day around all over the place in the not too distant future.

They’ve got the first of the sit reps done when the nurse comes back with Jethro. And, like he said, Jethro is asleep.

His skin is pale, and he’s got an IV in his left arm, a pulse ox monitor on his finger, and an O2 tube in his nose, and more tubes coming out from under his blankets. But he’s in one piece, and he’s alive.

Abbi’s right next to him, holding his hand, gently touching his face, and the nurse looks awfully sure that this is not Gibbs’ daughter.

Tim shrugs at him. The nurse shakes his head, small smile on his face, and leaves them be.

Another hour goes by. It’s late and they’ve both hit the crash part of the adrenaline cycle. They’re drooping. She’s slouched in the chair, snoozing, and he’s trying to find a vaguely comfortable position on the sofa. Tim thinks he’d just fallen asleep when the surgeon comes in and explains the case, how they were able to save the second lobe, how right now Gibbs is on oxygen and a lot of antibiotics, and has a drain in his lung, but, assuming everything goes well, they’ll take the drain out the day after tomorrow, and he should be off the O2 in a few more days.

Tim finally notices the bandage on Gibbs’ arm. “What’s?” he asks, pointing at it.

The surgeon checks Gibbs' notes. (He didn’t handle that part.) “Apparently he got clipped on the arm as well. That one’s fairly minor. The bullet took a chunk of his deltoid out. He’ll have a hard time raising his hand for a while, but with enough PT…”

Tim holds up his own hand in the cast. “I’ve heard this song before.”

The surgeon nods. “He should be sleeping the rest of the night and the morning. When he wakes up, we’ll talk with him about what happens next.”

Tim and Abbi nod at that, and the surgeon leaves.

It’s morning, not lunchtime, when Gibbs starts to shift a bit. His eyes open, and he sees Abbi, looking down at him. He smiles up at her, and she bends down, kisses him once, and then leaves.

Tim can feel the angry pouring off of her, and he’s sure Gibbs can, too.

“She’s going to kill you when you get out of here,” Tim says.

Gibbs looks over at him, surprised to see him here. “Hi.”
“Hi yourself.” Tim stands up, trying to get his body to stop yelling at him about what he just did to it, sleeping on the sofa. “So, looks like you’re alive.”

Gibbs is grinning. “Yep. What happened?” He touches the tube in his nose, but doesn’t try to remove it. “Feel like I was hit by a truck.”

“Just about.” Tim explains what happened, and Gibbs sits there, listening, fiddling with his tubes and the little button that gives him more pain meds, looking really perky.

Finally, as Gibbs is grinning at the ceiling, Tim asks, “So, you and morphine get along good, or are you just in a stupidly good mood for someone who just got shot?”

Gibbs smiles. “Happy.”

“Yeah. I can see. You’re smiling more now than we got married.”

“We got married? Didn’t think I was that out of it.”

Tim rolls his eyes. “When Abby and I got married.”

Gibbs giggles. Or tries to. He gets about halfway through the first laugh before his lungs let him know that’s not on the menu. So he grins. He’s in a ridiculously good mood. Tim’s not sure he’s ever seen him in this good of a mood. (He’s also wondering if he’s this goofy when he’s on Percocet, because from the outside looking in this feels really weird.)

He’s still smiling. “C’mere.”

Tim does, half sitting on Gibbs’ bed. Gibbs wiggles his finger, signaling closer. So Tim leans in and gets as much of a hug as a guy who’s less than a day out of surgery for a bullet to the lung, and one more that took out a chunk of his arm, can give.

Tim hugs him back, as long and intensely as he can without hurting him, another wave of how close he came to never doing this again hitting him. “Scared the shit out of me.”

Gibbs nods.

“I love you.”

Gibbs kisses him and ruffles his hair. “Love you, too.”

Tim wipes his eyes and leans back, but he’s still holding Gibbs’ hand. “I’m new to this having a Dad I love thing, but I do love it, so don’t make me bury you, not anytime soon, okay?”

“Okay.”

“My kids gotta learn how to sail, and they’ve got to learn how to build, and I need them to have memories of you. I need them to know who you are.”

Gibbs nods.

“And I need you. I need you here, in one piece, being you.”

Gibbs smiles at that, too. “Was being me.” He’s looking at Tim, so very earnest right now. “I saved her.”

Tim closes his eyes for a long second, and then opens them, and kisses Gibbs again. “Okay.”
He’d said it to his own Abby. Gibbs failed. Any man who was ever worth a damn has one goal and everything else pales next to it, and that’s to make sure his wife and kids outlive him. And Gibbs failed, and he carried that around so long and so far he’d forgotten what it felt like to not have it. And then Kate. And Jen, probably, too. They haven’t talked about Jen, so he doesn’t know if Gibbs feels responsible for that.

And for everyone he’s saved, for all the lives that have gone on and done big and beautiful things, the ones that mattered most to him personally, those he couldn’t save. Those he didn’t save.

Until yesterday.

Tim’s fingers hover lightly over the bandage on Gibbs’ torso. He can guess what would have happened to Abbi if that bullet had hit her. Only reason Gibbs is still here is because that bullet went through ten inches of files and a Kevlar vest. A direct hit to Abbi’s chest and that would have been the end.

Today Gibbs is smiling. Because last night years of would have, could have, should have, and soul scarring failure finally released their hold on him.

And of course, because he’s Gibbs, it took a bullet to do it.

Next time Gibbs wakes up, he hurts all over, and Fornell is sitting in the chair next to his bed. Fornell sees his eyes open and says, “The lengths you won’t go to to get out of having to give a speech.”

Gibbs begins to laugh, but that hurts. He tentatively tries talking, and that hurts too, but not as bad as he thought it might. “Told you’d rather die than give a speech.”

“Almost did. They dug a .50 BMG out of your back. Only reason you’re alive is it had to go through ten inches of paper and a Kevlar vest to get into you.”

Gibbs nods. He knew whatever hit him had to be the size of a rocket to get through all that.

“Didn’t get into her.”

Fornell nods. “She’s fine. Pissed at you.”

Gibbs nods again and rubs his eyes. He’s got no idea what time it is, and is starting to feel sleepy again. Though pressing that little button seemed like it was taking care of hurting. “How’s the case going?”

“Making Gillery… He’s the Agent who runs all of our high profile corruption cases… very happy. This one’s going to make his career.” Fornell inclines his head. “Abbi’s too. Admiral Zukunft just named her Acting Director of CGIS. She’s in charge until this case is done, and given the buzz, likely after, too.”

Gibbs smiles at that, too. “What are…” he realizes he doesn’t know who made it out, or for that matter who else was involved with this.

“What are the survivors saying?” Fornell asks for him.

“Yeah.”

Fornell smiles and shakes his head, his you’re not going to believe this look on his face. “Shitting us about how Abbi’s part of the corruption ring, and that she wanted to take over, so she’s pulling a coup on them.”

For the first time all day, Gibbs is awake and not smiling. “Fuck that.”

“Yeah. That’s going nowhere. They’re claiming she planted the incendiary and was trying to burn everything that showed she was part of it.”

“Uh huh. They know about Severs?”

“You mean that we’ve got him, and his bag, which has explosive residue in it from the detonator he carried in it to set up his own little IED? No, they don’t.”

Gibbs sighs, that hurts too. “The lawyers are having fun.”

“Oh yeah.” Fornell can see Gibbs is drifting again. “Go back to sleep. Case’ll still be here when you wake up.”

Gibbs nods, eyes slipping closed.

There’s an in and out round robbin of people visiting him. That’s the whole first day. Mostly he’s asleep, but every time he wakes up, someone is there with him, and he does get at least a few minutes with everyone. Except Abbi.

Gibbs thinks that’s the second day, too. Time’s gone wonky for him, and he’s not sure when anything is happening. Though he does remember having the drain removed (that hurt, too) and Penny and Ducky were with him when that happened.

He remembers talking to doctors, and Abby there for that.

And lots of weird dreams.

He sees Tony and Ziva, and Jimmy and Breena are there at one point. He wakes up with Ducky holding his hand, and gets a stern lecture about how, as Ducky’s executor, it’s his job to outlive him.

Gibbs does a lot of nodding and smiling, and promising he’s not going to go off and die anytime soon.

Ziva tells him Abbi will come, but she’s not here, not now. She’s angry.

He can live with that.

She’s alive.

She’s alive, so he can live with pretty much anything right now.
On Thursday afternoon, Abbi slams the door shut behind her. She’s glaring fire at Gibbs, and he’s thinking it’s probably a good thing he’s stoned, because otherwise this would be scary. But as it is, he’s mostly just amused.

She is not happy, at all. And he’s realizing (as she’s getting into it) that this is her with however long it’s been to calm down. He’s had some pissed off red heads yell at him before, and this one… This is a furious, red-headed, Marine yelling at him. He’s never been chewed out this thoroughly in his life.

“I saved you,” he manages to get in during one of the bits about how could he possibly be so goddammed stupid.

That doesn’t slow her down, at all. Abbi’s still yelling at him, and he doesn’t mind. It’s all good. She’s here to be pacing around yelling. He’s fine with that. She can yell as long as she wants, because it means she’s still here.

He’s smiling at her, looking pretty goofy, and that’s not doing much for her mood, because having him grin while she’s chewing him out is not the level of contrition she’s aiming for. Finally she just stops, because this is not hitting him, at all, the way it’s supposed to.

When she stops he says, “You saved me. Fornell says you got him, shot him from fifty feet away with a pistol, in the dark, while I was taking you down. Another shot and that would have been it for me.” He grins again, big, stupid, dopy, happy grin. “Thanks.”

Abbi sighs, and sits on the edge of the bed, and glares at him while holding his hand. “Go back to sleep.”

He nods, head resting on the pillows. “Okay.” His eyes are dipping low, and he’s still smiling. “I saved you.”

She kisses his forehead. “Yeah, you did.” She ruffles his hair. “Scared the hell out of me, too.”

“Sorry.”

“No, you aren’t.”

He shrugs. “If it means you’re still here…” He pulls her a little closer and kisses her. His eyes slide shut and he feels her breath on his face. His hand skims from the back of her neck to her throat, touching her skin where her pulse thrums. “I saved you.”

She kisses him again.

Once Gibbs is completely out of it, Abbi’s got to get back to work. There is a lot going on right now, and she’s got to get briefed, give briefings, and see how bad the destruction is.

As she’s getting ready to head out, she sees McGee and Abby also getting ready to head out. Ziva’s here, as well as Breena, so Gibbs won’t wake up alone, but they’ve all got casework that’s got to get done.

“Walk with me?” she says to the McGees as they’re getting ready to go.

“Sure.” Abby says. Tim nods along, too.

“What’s on your mind?” Tim asks as they head to the doors.
“He keeps saying, ‘I saved you.’”

Tim and Abby glance at each other. They know Gibbs has mentioned Shannon and Kelly to Abbi, they don’t know how much she knows about it. They don’t know what she knows about Kate, or about Jen, either.

Tim looks at Abby like he wants guidance, and she shrugs, seeming to say, Go ahead, worst comes to worst, he’ll be pissed. Tim nods at her.

“Got time for a quick coffee on the way out?”

Not really, but she’ll get one. Abbi nods at him, and they head to the cafeteria. He and Abby both get lemonade. The coffee smells like burnt battery acid, and since he’s not getting any caffeine out of it these days, it’s not worth the taste.

Abbi gets coffee. But this stuff is bad enough she puts milk and sugar in it. Tim never thought he’d see coffee so bad she’d doctor it to make it better.

Abbi’s looking impatient, not really wanting to discuss her coffee.

“You know Gibbs is psychic,” Abby starts with.

Tim rolls his eyes a little, but he doesn’t have a better term for it. “The gut knows. And when Shannon got mixed up in that case his gut started screaming. And it kept screaming. He wanted to be home to make sure they were safe. He tried to get leave. But they wouldn’t let him have it. He was ordered to stay, so he stayed. Shannon kept telling him she was safe. She had DEA protection. Hernandez sniped them, hit the driver of the van they were in, the van crashed, and they died. He didn’t save them, and that’s been killing him for twenty-five years.”

Abby nods along. “He’s been wishing he’d gone AWOL, grabbed his girls, and gotten them safe for decades now.”

“With Kate, the gut knew.” Tim’s heard a little about this. Abby’s gotten more out of Gibbs. One day, a few months ago, after they’d talked about Mike, after a good Shabbos and a few glasses of wine, she had mentioned how she felt Kate’s spirit around right after she died, and she gently got him talking about it. “He was having nightmares about her dead. He knew Ari was bad news. Knew this was going to blow up. And they were on that roof, and Kate took the bullet for him. Full on Secret Service jumped into it, and took it. She saved him. They got the situation under control. Got the shooter. And they’re standing there, talking, and Ari pulled the trigger and… And she was less than two feet away from him and right in front of Tony, and…”

Tim takes over. “And you’ve got to get almost a full bottle of bourbon into him before he talks about that. He thought, that that was it. She was safe. She stood back up, the vest did it’s job, and they started to relax, and then she was gone.”

“Before she died, he told Tony and Ziva to keep eyes on Jenny. Keep close track of her. But Jen didn’t want a shadow. She wanted to go out in a blaze of glory. She ordered them off, and she outranked them, and she died,” Abby says, quietly, sipping her drink.

Tim nods. “He’s buried almost every girl he’s ever tried to save.” His arm tightens around Abby, who Gibbs has successfully saved. “He’s buried every lover, or… he and Kate never got there, but they both wanted it. Any girl he’s loved who’s been in danger, he’s put in the ground.”

Abbi exhales long and slow. She knew the bones of those stories, some of them, at least, but not all of that. “Shit.”
“Yeah. He’s not that smiley because he’s having a good time on morphine,” Abby says. “We’ve seen him on painkillers. He’s usually pretty crabby. But he saved you, so he’s Mr. Smiley right now.”

Tim adds, “And if you stay the Director of CGIS, that means this was your last run out into the field. From now on, the most dangerous thing you’re going to run into is boredom and paper cuts.”

“First time in years, he’s feeling like he didn’t fail.”

Abbi nods. “He saved himself.”

Tim and Abby nod in agreement with that. “Yeah. I think a lot of scars just released,” Tim says.

Abbi takes a sip of her coffee, thinking about that, and about what he said to her, ‘You saved me.’ For the first time since the shooting stopped, she’s getting a minute to feel that. She doesn’t carry the weight of thinking that she should have somehow gotten her team out. She doesn’t blame herself for Liam’s death. The weight of living when he didn’t, that’s been there for years, but… there was no way to know. One minute they were fine, the next they’d bumped the IED and it was over.

But she can see it from Gibbs’ mind. See her history touched by his experiences, and how he understands that.

She takes one more sip, and grimaces. “This is awful.” She stands up. “Gotta get back to work. Thanks for the background.”

Tim and Abby glance at each other and then her. “Okay.”

It’s ten hours later when she gets back to the hospital. Ziva’s in Gibbs’ room, holding his hand, reading while he sleeps.

She looks up and smiles at her as she comes in, quietly saying, “Done for the day?”

“For the next ten hours. Then back. Three quarters of our case files are gone. And that thing Brandis did to shut us down, it totaled every computer in the placed. Turned them all into paperweights.”

One of the briefings she went to explained what had happened, and to answer McGee’s question, yes it was a small EMP. The idea being that if anyone was breaking into the building to get access to the computers, this would kill anything they could get (and kill all of their electronics, too). Supposedly, there are back ups of everything off site so it’s not supposed to be that much of a loss, but, staring at a building with no functional electronics, and a strapped budget for refitting it, Abbi’s not having a good time.

Ziva nods. She knows how massive of a mess this is.

“FBI’s questioning everyone. Nothing’s getting done. I’m shifting all of our active cases to Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston. And even with that, they’ve got their own local FBI investigations going. No one’s sure exactly how far this goes and it’s going to be weeks before I’ve got enough personnel cleared to have a functional office again.”

“Sorry.”

Abbi smiles grimly. Then something hits her. “You just transferred to desk duty, right?”
Ziva nods.

“What’s your security clearance?”

Ziva knows where this is going. “High enough.”

“I need someone to help me get this up and running again. I need someone who I trust and who I know isn’t involved in this. Feel like spending some time getting CGIS up and running again?”

Ziva smiles. “I can do that. And I think my Boss will approve.”

Abbi sighs. Having another set of useful hands feels good. “Go get some sleep. Tomorrow morning, 08:00, my office. We start wading through everything.”

“Good.” Ziva stands up, gently stroking Gibbs’ face as she turns to leave.

“How’s he doing?” Abbi asks as she settles into the chair next to his bed.

“Sleeping. Asked for you a few hours ago when he woke up. Still in a really good mood. He’s being nice to the doctor and nurses.”

“Wow.”

“Yeah.” Ziva shoulders her purse. “See you tomorrow.”

Abbi rolls her shoulders and kicks off her shoes. She should probably go home, get some clean clothing, get a shower, maybe eat something, but… nope. Right now she wants to be here. She scoots the chair around a bit, and puts her feet up on Gibbs’ bed, and then scoots down so her head is on the backrest. Time to grab some zzzs.

She wakes up feeling something rubbing her foot.

Sleepy blue eyes meet hers. “Hey,” Gibbs says.

“Hi.” She sits up, looking around, bit after 03:00 “You okay?”

“Yeah. More okay than I’ve been in a long time.”

Abbi nods. “Tim and Abby filled me in.”

He sighs. “Yeah.”

She leans in, taking his hand in hers, and kissing him. She’s looking into his eyes as she says, “So, how about we never do this again?”

He grins. “You know? I’m good with that.”

She chuckles lightly, and he starts trying to scoot over some. “What are you doing?”

“Making room. Wanna touch more than your hand.”

“Jethro…” She’s not too sure about him scooting over.
“If Abby could love on Tim when he was all beat up, you can snuggle me.”

“You’re not just beat up.”

“I’ve had worse.”

“Like fuck you have! They cut out a third of your lung.”

He shrugs.

She glares gently at him, but he’s all the way over, so she gingerly gets up onto the bed with him.

He smiles again, wrapping his good arm around her, holding her tight. That feels good. “Not like I was doin’ much with it.”

She pulls back at that, putting some space between them, looking him in the eyes. “Jethro, don’t! Don’t make light of it. Don’t joke it away. I am allowed to...” she doesn’t specify what she’s allowed, but he sees fear and anger and pain in her eyes, “And you laughing it off doesn’t help.”

More serious than he’s been since he got shot. “Okay.”

“I can still see your blood on my hands. Still smell it if I let my guard down.”

He nods and pulls her in close, kissing her forehead, feeling her warm against his side.

“And if you’re allowed to get shot for me, then I’m allowed to get mad and scared when you do it.”

He nods, kissing her again.

She pulls back again, wanting to be looking at him for this. “If this, what we have, is going to work, then... First off we’ve both got to be here. I’m not doing the dead fiancée thing again. I need a living, breathing man, not the memory of one!

“And I don’t need a hero. I’m the white knight. You’re out of the knight business. You hung up your armor and sword. From now on, you wear the pink poofy dress, and if need be, I’m saving your ass.”

He’s tempted to say, ‘you did’ but she’s on a roll, still lots of scared and angry needs to come out, and he knows breaking in right now is a bad plan.

“At the end of the day, I come home to you. That’s how this works. Every day. I come home to you. And I don’t get to do that if you go out there and get killed. So you don’t go out there and get shot! I don’t ever want to be scared like that again. Unless you’re donating it, your blood stays inside your body, got it?”

He nods, holding her face in his hands. “Okay. I’m okay.”

“I know.”

“Gonna heal up. Doc says my lung’ll expand to fill my chest. Won’t have quite as much wind, but as long as I keep working at it, I’ll get most of it back. Only got two lobes in the left side, right’ll be okay like that, too.”

“I know. I was there when you got out of surgery.”

“Right.”
She sniffs, and he realizes she’s been very determinedly not crying on him.

“I’m still here.”

“I know. But we aren’t doing this again.”

“Yeah.” He kisses her again. “Coming home to me every day?”

“Yeah.”

He kisses her once more. “I like that.”

---

In the end it was a ridiculously easy plan. Five guys, poker buddies, stationed out of the Miami Coast Guard, lamented how the people they were busting lived like kings, and they were scraping by on a beggar’s salary.

So, they came up with a plan. A way to build their own kingdom, get rich off the fat of the land, and still put the bad guys away. (Because, of course, in the plan, they weren’t the bad guys, and honestly, at first, they weren’t.) Simple really, be good at their jobs, really good. Get promoted, then promote each other, and once they had all of the power positions settled between them, they could do whatever they liked.

And, if they had stayed with just skimming off the drug money that flowed in with each bust, they could have lived like kings and probably done it indefinitely.

But they got greedy. When they started this plan, they didn’t realize that a King can burn through more money, faster, than they ever dreamed. They developed very expensive tastes. And expensive friends to go with those tastes. Which meant they needed even more money. And more money meant they needed help to maintain their operation, which meant more people learned what was up, and some of them were greedy too.

By the time Abbi had stumbled into it, the five kings had grown filthy rich, and covered in gnawing maggots level corrupt.

And like anything else so rotted it’s wriggling, all it took was a gentle push to topple it.

By the time Gibbs got out of the hospital, Abbi Borin, as the only Director at CGIS who was certain not to be part of the conspiracy, was the Acting Director of CGIS, in charge of “sanitizing” CGIS from the ground up if necessary.
The door doesn’t open. Gibbs is sure of that, just as sure as he is of someone else entering his hospital room.

He smiles because he knows who it is.

“Hey.” His eyes haven’t opened, yet, and he’s speaking in a whisper. Borin’s snuggled up next to him, asleep.

“Hi.” He turns his face to her, still smiling, and feels her stroke his cheek as he opens his eyes. Shannon’s smiling down at him. “Been a long time since I saw that smile.”

He nods.

“I missed it.”

He keeps smiling up at her. “Dreaming?”

“Maybe?” She shakes her head, saying, “It doesn’t matter.”

“Nope. Thought you weren’t coming by for a while.”

“You know what they say about plans, Gibbs. They rarely survive contact with reality.”

“Yep.”

Shannon’s studying Borin, and he gently kisses the top of her head. Shannon nods and smiles. “I do like her.”

“Good.”

“And I’m happy.” She squeezes Gibbs hand, kisses him softly, looks him in the eyes and says, “Don’t screw it up. This is the best thing that’s happened to you in a long time, so…” He knows that look, that, I know you, and I know your patterns so tread right, Mr. He didn’t see it a lot when they were married, but enough so he knows it, and knows she’s serious.

“I won’t.”

That gets another smile, and a gentle pat on his cheek. “Good. I love you.” Shannon looks kindly at Borin. “And when we finally get to meet, I’m gonna love her, too.”

“Really?”

“Of course! Why wouldn’t I love someone who helped to put that smile on your face?”

Gibbs doesn’t have words for that, but it makes him feel good, feel settled and right in a way he hasn’t for a very long time. So he smiles at his first wife, and kisses the woman he hopes will be his last wife, and Shannon nods at him, and fades away.

Gibbs wakes to the sensation of Abbi shifting around, getting out of his bed.
He’s got to get up, soon, too. His bladder is telling him time to get a move on. He supposes it’s a good thing they’re letting him walk around some, but he hates how out of breath just a ten foot walk makes him.

So, as she’s standing up, putting a call in for breakfast for them, he starts the slow process of collecting his various tubes, and shuffling to the head.

She comes in while he’s brushing his teeth, left handed, which feels godawful weird, but right now every time he does anything with his right hand his shoulder screams at him.

“Oatmeal and eggs coming soon.”

He gives her a half-hearted smile. “Don’t suppose there’s any coffee with that?”

She shakes her head. “If Ducky or Jimmy says I can sneak you a cup, I will.”

“They’re not going to say you can.”

“What a shock. At least you were on morphine the first few days.”

He nods at that. If you have to go from, on average, 120 ounces of coffee a day to cold turkey, being drugged to the eyeballs helps a lot. He’s also thinking this might be why, in addition to the pain killers, he’s sleeping so much.

Gibbs eyes the shower as Abbi gets in, but he still doesn’t have permission to get his bandages wet. Something about infection, and they only took the drain out of his lung yesterday, and just maybe it’s a good plan not to have a direct route for pathogens to get right into his lungs.

He’s making do with sponge baths, and supposedly will have to until he gets home on Sunday.

Home on Sunday.

He can’t speak loudly because of his lung, but he hopes she can hear him. “You serious about coming home to me?”

"Yeah." Apparently she can hear him over the sound of the water.

He pulls back the shower curtain, thinking he may look kind of silly, hospital gown, O2 tube still in his nose, hair sticking in fifty directions, but… Now, now’s right. “Then come home to me. Move in. Bring all your stuff and never leave.”

She’s staring at him, water pouring down her body, still a quarter asleep, and says, “Jethro?”

“Come home. Let’s make it home, for both of us.”

She steps out of the shower because she can’t pull him in, and kisses him, very gently. “Yes.”

Gibbs wakes up again several hours later. Abbi’s gone. Work’s eating up at least twelve hours a day right now, and would take more but she’s not letting it.
Tim and Tony are there.

“I don’t need you guys babysitting me.”

“Good morning to you, too, Sunshine,” Tony says.

“I never woke up alone when I was in the hospital, so you aren’t, either,” Tim adds.

“Besides, when you see what we’ve brought you, you’ll be happy we’re here,” Tony says with a grin, pulling a cup out of a bag.

Gibbs does look pleased to see that. He starts to sit up, and Tim reaches over to help him up.

Tony hands it over. “Just don’t tell Ducky or Palmer.”

Gibbs gently clasps the coffee in his left hand, reverently smelling the much too tiny cup of his one true love. “You’re good boys.” He takes a deep, savoring sip, and sighs, huge smile on his face, sublime joy lighting his eyes. “Missed this.”

“I’m sure,” Tim says dryly. He’s wondering if Gibbs is going to notice it’s decaf. (The ‘don’t tell Jimmy and Ducky,’ who of course know about this, is to help sell the idea it’s real coffee. Caffeine is a mild vasodilator, which means it effects blood flow to the lungs, and is, for the next few months, on Jethro’s no-no list.)

Gibbs looks up at Tim over the cup and smiles at him, again. “You know all about the first cup back after a while off.”

Tim nods. “And only five and a half more months until I get my next one.” Tim looks at Tony, “So, father to be, you doing anything…”

Tony shakes his head. “Unless Jimmy’s going to write me my own prescription for morphine for the next week, you don’t want to see me go cold turkey. You think you were annoying when you went off of it? I drink more coffee than you do and have been doing it for a decade… Hell, you started at like twenty, right?”

“Seventeen. Once I got to college, it was more or less glued into my hand. Every now and again before that, but it wasn’t a regular thing until college.”

“Okay, I’ve been doing it for fifteen years longer than you.”

Tim runs the math on that. “That means you started drinking coffee when you were eleven.”

Tony nods. “I was allowed to have a glass of wine with dinner then, too.”

Both Tim and Gibbs are just staring at Tony, with matching was your father insane expressions on their faces. “Not a big one. We were in Bern that summer. Dinner was long, started late, and if you were enough of a grown up to eat with the adults you got to eat what the adults ate. So, small glass of whatever went with the dinner, and coffee with dessert after.”

That lessens the insane looks a bit, but doesn’t entirely make them go away.

Gibbs takes another sip of his. “Dad always had a pot on. Back of the shop. When things were slow, he’d invite people to have a cup and hang out. Wasn’t allowed to have any until I was fourteen. ‘It’ll stunt your growth.’ Once I got taller than he was, I was allowed to have some.”

Tony grins. Gibbs is an inch or so shorter than he and Tim. “So, what, you should have waited “another year or so?”

Gibbs almost laughs, but he catches himself, and then says, “Uh huh. So, you’re supposed to be what, six eight?”

Tony nods, standing up as straight as he can, looking taller. “Story in our family was that coffee puts hair on your chest. Should have started sooner, McSatinySmooth.”

“Yeah, as life goals went, a hairy chest was never on my list.” Actually, back when he was younger it was something he dearly wanted, and he was deeply disappointed in when his body quit at seventeen chest hairs, but he’s sure as hell not bringing that up in front of The Silver Wookie and Wookie Junior. “Would have just meant more time shaving.”

Tony and Gibbs do that thing where they look at each other and pointedly decide they aren’t going to ask.

“Don’t give me that. I know you’ve done it at least once,” he says to Gibbs, who looks very startled by that.

“When did that happen?” Tony’s not remembering any moments of not very fuzzy Gibbs. But, if given the option, Gibbs rooms with McGee… something about wanting peace and quiet… maybe he wouldn’t have seen.

“Scrubbing off the plague. Not a hair on him.”

Gibbs shrugs. “Elizabeth liked it.”

Tony lights up at that. “Nameless red-head has a name!”

Gibbs smiles. “Yeah.”

Given how good of a mood Gibbs is in, and the fact that he seems to be enjoying it, Tim presses a little more. “Current red-head was in a really good mood this morning.”

Gibbs nods, grinning, looking very pleased with himself.

Tony’s eyes go wide. “Here? With the nurses and doctors wandering in all the time. That’s a trick out of Palmer’s book.”

Gibbs glares at that. He’s not uninterested in sex, but it hasn’t gone beyond a mild passing fancy, and between the tubes, not having any real privacy, and the fact that he can’t walk more than a few feet without ending up out of breath, he’s not thinking that mild-passing-fancy is turning into anything real anytime soon.

However, both of the boys are looking exceptionally amused, and from the looks of it have misread his glare to mean that yes, that’s exactly why Abbi was in a good mood, so he clarifies. “Not why she’s in a good mood.”

“So, why was she in a good mood?” Tim asks.

“Moving party next week.”

Tim and Tony smile at that.
“You appear to be in splendid mood today, Jethro,” Ducky says as he ambles into Gibbs’ hospital room.

Gibbs smiles.

“I take it Anthony and Timothy’s pick-me-up helped?”

So much for not telling. Gibbs thought he smelled a rat on that. “It did. What happened earlier this morning helped more.”

“Good news from your doctors?” Ducky asks as he sits down.

“Nope. They’re still yammering about observation and antibiotics. Not letting me out until tomorrow.”

Ducky raises an eyebrow.

“Asked Abbi to move in and she said yes. Next week, we’re loading up her stuff and moving her in.”

Ducky smiles widely at that, too. “Jethro! That’s wonderful.”

“Yeah, feels good.”

Ducky nods. “As it should, my friend, as it should.”

Gibbs looks at Ducky’s wedding ring. “How long did that take?”

Ducky smiles widely, eyes sparking with joy. “Seven weeks. Are you thinking of making a purchase?”

“Was thinking it might be nice to have something to give her, her first night home.” That strikes Ducky as a very Gibbs sort of answer. None of the other wives lived with him before he married them, though Diane certainly ’stayed over’ a lot.

“If you want custom work, it won’t be done that quickly.”

Gibbs isn’t sure if he wants custom work. He also isn’t sure if he wants to wait. He is sure that Tim and Ducky both had rings make, and they look awesome. Jimmy and Tony bought pre-made ones, and those are good, too. He thinks for a second and realizes he does have options. “Her birthday is in October.”

“That might be doable. Where’s your phone?”

“In about two hundred pieces in the basement of CGIS. Tim’s supposed to be bringing me a new one tomorrow.”

“Ah.” Ducky gets out his phone, and fiddles with it for a few minutes. “Mr. Blandon’s,” his jewler, “website. These tiny screens make it hard to see what he does, but I believe he has a mix and match menu you can customize from, and” Ducky touches his own ring, “obviously, you can continue to customize from there.”

Gibbs squints at the screen, and reaches over for his glasses. “Never thought I’d say it, but I want my laptop.”
“I understand.”

Gibbs flicks around, looking at the pictures. “This used to be easier.”

Ducky chuckles at that.

“I’m sure you can still walk into a jewelry store, hand them a pile of cash, and get the largest, most sparkly diamond available for that pile of cash.”

Gibbs eyes narrow at bit. He’d done that for Hannah. Diane and Stephanie picked out their own rings. Shannon’s he’d actually spent some time looking for the right one. His eyes narrow further as he thinks of the rings that didn’t result in anything good. Empty promises and broken lives.

“Doesn’t have to be a diamond, does it?”

Ducky is very pleased to see the level of thought Jethro is putting into this. “Depending on the woman, not a diamond can be an enticement. Penny would have been appalled to see a diamond on her ring.”

Gibbs inclines his head. He’s heard Abby and Penny talking about conflict diamonds, with Ziva adding how, before they’re cut, there’s pretty much no way to know where they come from, and yes, there are certification processes, but they are only as good as they people doing the certifying.

He doesn’t know if Abbi likes diamonds or not. She doesn’t wear them. But she doesn’t wear much in the way of jewelry period.

Of course, having been engaged once before, there probably was a time she wore one.

He wonders what her first ring looked like. She’s still got it; he knows that, but he hasn’t seen it. And, beyond not wanting to get anything that looks like it, he doesn’t want or need to see it. She’s allowed to have her own past and keep it hers.

He’s flipping through options on Ducky’s phone, and there are a ton of them. He might not have anything by the time she moves in, but an idea of what he wants to do for her birthday is starting to shape up in his mind, and he thinks he may be able to get something that’ll work well for that plan.

Ducky sits next to him, watching Jethro scrolling through rings, and smiles. He introduced Jethro to Diane, and remembers when they were getting engaged, and while Jethro was happy and excited, it was surface happiness. Nothing about it touched him deep down. Of course, back then, nothing touched him deep down. Back then, Ducky didn’t even know Jethro had a deep down.

But right now, he can see this is what truly happy Jethro looks like, and he’s immensely pleased to have his friend finally get there.
No Shabbos today.

Between various job commitments, and the round the clock someone with Gibbs vigil, it’s not happening.

This week, it’s Shabbos on Sunday. Gibbs is supposed to come home on Sunday, and rather than try to stuff all of them, and food, and baby girls into a tiny hospital room, they’re going to wait for him to come home.

And then they will properly celebrate the Sabbath, and life, and love, and family.

So, for Tim, Abby, Jimmy, and Breena, Friday is a quiet night in. Dinner, movie, PT, sex. A very good quiet night in.

Tim loves sex. And these days, he’s getting as much of it as he could possibly want. (And, were you to sit down with 2012 Tim and explain his current life to him, it’d be completely honest to say he’s getting more sex of higher quality and vastly more variety than he could have ever, in his wildest and most debauched dreams, imagined.) He thinks that’s important to moments like this one, because he knows he can enjoy them more. It’s easy, when you’re content in your soul, when all your needs are being met, to lay back, relax, and really steep in the joy of your loves.

He’s at Jimmy’s home, on the sofa. It’s fairly early. Dinner’s been eaten. Little girls were hosed off and put to bed. Breena popped up some popcorn, Jimmy queued up Captain America: Civil War, and now, they’re on the sofa, actually watching the movie.

He’s enjoying this. They’re all close and happy. Later, they’ll work on his hand, and he knows he’s going to ask the girls to work on his head and other hand while Jimmy does the hurt one. Then go to bed, have sex, watch each other, and then all go to sleep. He’s been looking forward to this since they worked on Jimmy together. It’s been a nice, happy, little fantasy in his head. He’s enjoying that, anticipating it, but enjoying now, because now is really good, too.

But if he was getting less sex, he’d be too keyed up looking forward to later to really enjoy this.

Abby’s curled into his lap, head against his shoulder, holding Breena’s hand, feet across Breena’s legs, in Jimmy’s lap. Breena’s on his side, hip against his, head on Jimmy’s shoulder. Jimmy’s on the far end, but he’s got his arm around Breena, so his hand is on Tim’s shoulder.

The sofa’s really only made for three people, but they’re skinny and friendly, so they fit.

And he thinks, (as Cap saves the day) (and Bucky, can’t end the movie without saving Bucky) that, as much as he loves the sex (which he really does) it’s these quiet, content moments he’s loving best.

Getting his hand worked on takes quiet, content up a notch.
Today he’s on the bed, lying on his back, naked, warm and very comfortable.

“What’d the Ortho say?” Jimmy asks as he carefully takes off Tim’s cast.

“One more week. Then I’m cast free and ready to start real PT on my hand.”

“That’s good, right?” Breena asks. His head is in her lap and her fingers are making gentle circles in his hair.

Tim sighs, very happy. This was good with strangers doing it. It’s phenomenal with his loves.

“Yeah.” He looks over at Jimmy. “Why are you taking it off?”

“Don’t worry about it.”

Abby’s holding his left hand, gently rubbing her knuckles into his palm. “That sounds ominous.”

“Not really.” Jimmy looks up from Tim’s hand to Abby, then to Tim, “Not like I’m going to be yanking it around or bending it. Just want it out of the way so I can get to all of your hand.” That makes sense, the cast covers the bottom half of his palm.

“Fine by me.”

And it’s exactly as good as he thought it would be. Not sexy per se, but really good. Just warm and happy and he feels good all over. (He’s got the sense that as soon as the girls move to the bottom half of him, this will ramp up a few notches on the sexy meter. Though given Jimmy’s also going to be really getting into his hand, they might just cancel each other out.)

“This should be a weekly thing. One of us gets worked on each week,” he says while Abby’s slowly stroking up and down each finger, and Breena’s rubbing his temples, and Jimmy works on loosening up his hand.

“Does that mean I’m up next week?” Abby asks.

“Oh yeah.” Tim grins up at her, looking forward to lying her out and rubbing all over her with Jimmy and Breena.

Breena’s grinning at that. Wide, happy smile. She shifts over a bit and kisses Jimmy, and then gently strokes Tim’s face.

“Want me to get video of it?” she asks Abby.

Abby’s grinning even wider than Breena at that. “You mean all four of us naked and both of them slicking me up and rubbing all over me together?”

Breena nods.

Abby kisses Tim, and looks up at Jimmy. “Oh, yeah, I want video of that.”

And from there it’s all good. Naked, in bed, his loves rubbing him all over, joking and talking and flirting all wrapped up in warm hands and loving touch. This is fabulous.

This is what he loves best.
Or not.

Holy shit, that’s... God, yes, more of that, please... Fuck! God and Fuck and...

Much later, they’re still in bed, laying around, warm, flushed, happy, enjoying another quiet moment. Those still seconds between orgasm and clean up, when everything feels gold. (The fact that they’ve got candles all over the place, so everything looks gold may have something to do with that sensation, as well.)

Abby’s lying on top of him. Her skin warm and damp on his. He can feel a fuzzy leg against his shoulder, and a smooth one is touching his cheek.

“You remember,” he asks Jimmy, though none of the other three know that yet, “when I was asking your for advice about dating Abby,” now Jimmy knows the question is for him, “and you asked me what I was afraid of, and I said keeping it going?”

He can feel a nod, though he’s too content to lift his head to look. Though he does kiss the top of Abby’s head, which is resting on his shoulder.

After a second, Jimmy replies, “Yeah. Said something to you like, ‘You’ve been in love with her for ten years, and you’re afraid, what, you start dating and you won’t be able to keep being in love with her?”

“So something like that.” He tilts his head to the side and nuzzles Breena’s leg, then kisses her ankle.

“This isn’t going anywhere. It’s not going to stop. It’s not infatuation or horniness. I’m yours,” Abby gets a kiss, “and yours,” he kisses Breena’s ankle, “and yours,” he tickles the bottom of Jimmy’s foot, and Jimmy jerks (he’s ticklish), “’til my last breath, and that’ll be true if we stay here, and it’ll be true if we move to the next level. It’ll be true if we never do this again. Though I really hope we do. I’m happy here, but I’d like to move on. Breena, you said it had to be forever, so… what marks forever for you? Vows and rings in front of everyone? You want another wedding?”

He can feel Breena smile, or imagine it, because he’s not looking at her, though she does gently stroke his cheek with her toes. “I don’t have a set idea of ‘marking forever.’ But I know it’s real. I know this isn’t going to fade away or break or… Our kids are growing up together, we’ll have pictures of each other’s grandbabies on the fridge, so, yeah, if it’s good with you,” they know she’s talking to Jimmy and Abby, “I’m good with moving on.”

“I am.” Abby says. “I think we stick to our original rules, make sure we’ve got more thinking and backing out time, because, at least right now, pregnant, really good orgasm oxytocin flowing through me, in bed with my loves, I’m just a big mushy ball of content and lovey. Though, I’m in favor of rings, maybe right hand rings, something tangible, something we wear on our skin to mark this. Jimmy?”

They hear a quiet snore. And Breena says, “And this is the problem with doing this right after getting off.”

Jimmy pokes her and laughs. “Not quite ready to pass out.” He kisses Breena and nuzzles Tim and Abby with his foot. “Thinking time is good, because I am about to fall asleep, but, yes, I want it all.”
Ducky shows up at Gibbs’ room a bit before lunch, which means it's time for Tim and Tony to move onto the second half of their day. Drywall time at the house.

Tim likes ripping out drywall. It requires no precision or finesse. He can do it one (and a half, ish) handed. Yes, he's slow, and he's sore all over doing it, but pulling his own weight around the house feels really good.

He also likes, as the walls are coming down, his ideas of how this house may look when they’re done with it. Obviously, weight bearing walls have to stay, but for the most part, they can rearrange however they like inside once they get this done.

Plus, as the guy who’s going to be doing the wiring (or at least as the guy who’s planning it out) it’s way easier to rewire from the studs out, than it is to fish wires through walls that are already up.

It’s him and Tony ripping down drywall on this side of the house. Jimmy’s around here somewhere. So’s, Breena. Abby and Penny have the girls today. (At his house. Abby’s having a sleepy day, so she’s taking it easy-ish, and Penny’s helping to keep an eye on everyone.)

Right now, he’s pulling down walls in what will, probably, end up being their great room and kitchen area.

But he’s thinking about the wing that’ll eventually belong to them and the Palmers. Thinking about one big bedroom for the four of them. Because, if this is forever… They want space where they have their own marriages with their own wives. But they don’t live here, not full time, and they likely won’t ever live here full time. So, this can be their space for when they’re together. That’s the plan. This home is for weekends and vacations, the times they’d get to be together anyway.

They’ll talk about that tonight, along with a lot of other things, he’s sure. But the more he works on the house, the more he likes the idea of them sharing one space here.

“You’re quiet.” Tony says as they yank down another panel of drywall.

And he is, because he’s thinking through his idea of how one room for the four of them would work, along with what they’re telling the rest of the family. The idea of ‘coming out’ seems very strange to him. Tim twitches a little when Tony speaks, and then says, “Just thinking.” After a second, he comes up with something to ask Tony about. “Okay, we’re not in the middle of an investigation, or cleaning one up. What’s going on with Ziva? She’s at Coast Guard now?”

Tony nods. “Yeah. She gave notice on Tuesday. Thursday, Borin offered her the job, and she took it.”

“Okay, I wasn’t actually asking for a rundown of the facts. I know what’s happening. I mean, why?”

Tony doesn’t look comfortable, and he’s very determinedly ripping down drywall as he says, “I shot a guy for looking at her. I got lucky because he had a gun and a knife and lock picks, but, all boils down, I shot him for looking at her. That was it. I can’t… I can’t work with her anymore. It’s just a matter of time until I fuck it up. ‘Till one of them isn’t really a threat and I… I can’t do it.”

Tim nods at that. He gently squeezes Tony’s shoulder and nods again.
“So that’s it? A nod?” Tony sounds defensive, like he’s expecting more.

“Yeah. I got out of the field so Abby wouldn’t have to deal with being scared for me. Not sure how I’d deal with it if she was in the field, let alone if I had to work with her every day. What’d you expect?”

“I don’t know. Some sort of lecture about respecting her choices and manning up and dealing with it better? Something about how if it’s my problem, I shouldn’t be forcing her out of her job.”

“Wrong generation of McGee. If you like, I’m sure we can arrange for Penny to give you that lecture.”

Tony winces.

“Yeah, I wouldn’t sign up for that, either.” One more block of drywall, and then Tim asks, “So, you got a line on a replacement for her?”

“Not yet. If… She’s only a month along, so…”

Tim nods at that, too. He knows what Tony’s too afraid to say out loud. So, he switches onto another topic they haven’t had the chance to talk much about. “How’s your house going?”

Tony smiles. “For once, so far so good. The bank’s happy with me. Mortgage is lined up. I’ve got a good interest rate. Closing date is October 1st.”

“Lucky you.” Tim says dryly. He’s still annoyed at the fiasco that was getting their mortgage.

“Yeah,” Tony smiles dryly, “amazing what happens when you don’t get your identity stolen seventeen times.”

Tim glares at the memory of the guy who basically turned him down for a mortgage.

“The paperwork is going great. Supposedly we get the inspection back next week. Though given how bad the house is, I don’t think there’s anything he’s going to say that could be a deal breaker.”

Tim smiles. “Guess we’re doing this for you soon.”

“Yeah.” Tony’s staring at the dry wall debris around them. “Gonna be weird without Gibbs.”

Tim yanks down another panel of drywall. “He’s going to be there. Not sure what all he’ll be doing. Probably like a crime scene, he looks like he’s doing stuff, but it’s really all us while he keeps watch and drinks his coffee.”

Tony smiles at that, but Tim can see some tension there.

“Some cloud to go with all that silver lining?”

“Feels unreal. It’s my dad, there’s got to be a catch somewhere. A big nasty one that poisons the whole thing. I feel like I’m waiting for the roof to fall on us.”

Tim shrugs. He certainly knows that feeling, and he’s seen Senior in action too many times to just say, ‘Don’t worry about it.’
Tim’s phone chirps at him as he’s whacking the wall.

_Help!_ It’s from Abbi.

_What’s wrong?_ He’s feeling a sharp jolt of fear at that, wondering if it’s Gibbs or if someone is coming for her. Just because the sneaking around phase of things is done, doesn’t mean they’ve found everyone, yet.

_I’ve had six vendors show me new computer systems today, and I am literally clueless as to what I need._

Tim sighs. Abbi’s told them that there was a small EMP, which killed all the electronics in the building. (He’s not sure why it didn’t fry their cell phones, but since they’re alive because of it, he’s willing to put it in the Acts of the God He Sporadically Believes In category and leave it there.) But, in that she is now the acting Director of a Federal Department, and in charge of a building that’s current filled with a huge collection of shiny paperweights, she has to get new stuff so that everyone else in that building can go back to work.

This is made more complicated by the fact that her head tech guy isn’t exactly looking squeaky clean right now. (Apparently there was a reason why all the files were on paper, and that reason appears to be a combination of making it harder to pin things on people and never upgrading meant there was that much more money to embezzle. She has found that CGIS _paid_ for a top of the line file system, they just don’t _have_ one.) And, on top of that, she’s got no idea how many of the lower downs were involved, either.

FBI’s handling the main investigation for that, and she’s got Ziva using her NCIS computer to run her own checks on people she really needs, right now, as well. But it’s slow. Even moving fast it takes half a day to clear someone.

_You got written proposals?_

_Yeah._

_Send them on. I’ll give them a look._

_THANK YOU!_

_What’s your budget for this?_

_HAHAHAHAHAHHAHAHA_

_We’ll have a chat about the miracle of ‘open source,’ too._

_You’re saving my life on this._

_No problem._

So, as the day wears on, Tim is not whacking down drywall. He’s sitting on the back patio, reading through a collection of proposals from different tech companies.

They look like they’re on the up and up, all of them are offering pretty much the same package for pretty much the same price. Little tweaks here and there depending on which vendors they use.
He spends an hour writing up his own proposal, what, if he were ever in the position of having to restock NCIS, on the fly, fast, with no budget, he’d want. He sends that back to Abbi along with a price range for what it should cost. Send this to all of them, and whoever can get you this for the least amount of money/time wins the bid.

What’s this?

What’d I’d stock NCIS with if it was my job. Once you’ve got it in place, we’re gonna talk paperwork software and the joys of functional databases. By the time you’re up and running you’ll be two years behind instead of fifteen, and you’ll have the platform you need to get ahead of the curve in the next three years.

That’s the best news I’ve had all day.

More guys get caught?

Tell you about it in person tomorrow.

______________________________________________________________

“Okay. Yeah. I know… Don’t work too hard… Uh huh… Yeah… Love you, too,” And Tony hangs up his phone.

“Ziva?” Breena asks. They’re wrapping up with the house. She, Jimmy, and Tim are all heading back to Tim’s for tonight. Tony’s supposed to be getting ready to have dinner with Ziva, but apparently she’s working late.

“Yeah. She’s still in the middle of one of the guys Abbi really wants cleared.”

“That’s got to be an awful job,” Jimmy says.

Tim nods along. “I think that’s part of why she’s got Ziva doing it. Someone with instincts you trust, who’s good at the job, but far enough away to not get personally into it.”

Breena nods at that. “She liking it?” They’ve seen Ziva for about nine minutes since she took Abbi’s job, and thus haven’t heard much about how she’s liking moonlighting for the Coast Guard.

“Yes, she is. It’s useful and important and she’s good at it…”

“And it’s safe,” Jimmy adds.

“That’s why I like it,” Tony finishes. “Feels weird to have her working somewhere else. Part of it’s great, end of the day we talk, and we’ve got stories the other one hasn’t heard, yet. Part of it’s hard. She’s not in the desk across from me. She’s not that shadow watching my back. It’s going to take a while to get used to that.”

Tim nods at that. “Yeah. Felt that way when I moved downstairs. Was really weird not seeing you all every day. Still feels weird not to head into the lab to work some days.”

“This mean you’re on your own for dinner?” Jimmy asks.

“Yeah.”
“We can toss an extra burger on the grill for you,” Tim says.

“Nah. I’m thinking Mona’s been pretty lonely. Going to head over and take her out for a good run.”

“Awww.” Breena’s grinning at him. In addition to round robin Gibbs-minding, they’ve all been dropping in to make sure Mona doesn’t go completely bonkers, but, even with a steady stream of visitors, she’s been missing her Gibbs.

“Think if I got a harness for her, I could sneak her into the hospital as a service dog?” Tony asks.

The other three laugh at that. “He’ll be home tomorrow. I think she can make it another night,” Tim says.

Abby and Penny are in the backyard with the girls when they get home. And, as they amble from Jimmy’s car over to them, she hops up, hugs all three of them, then steps back and says, “Agh! Drywall dust, mildew, and sweat! To the showers with you!”

Penny decides she doesn’t need to get immediate hugs in that case, and just waves.

It is true that there are three showers in Abby’s house. It’s also true that if you attempt to use more than one of them at a time you get a bare trickle of lukewarm water. (They found this out the hard way when Gibbs was staying with them last summer.)

And, it is also true that Penny was not born yesterday and that she and Ducky are neither stupid nor blind and have been privately wondering about what exactly is going on with the four of them. They hadn’t thought much about it when Breena mentioned sharing a room at the beach, until Penny noticed Gibbs swallow his tongue at it. Since then, they’ve been speculating about why the McGee-Palmer branch of the family does not appear to sleep on their own on the weekends anymore. (Actually, they started speculating as to if there was a McGee-Palmer branch of the family, and sort of took it from there.) They’d decided to gently breach the subject should an opening appear, and to Penny, three of them heading to the showers, together, looks like an opening.

(Penny and Ducky have also been speculating as to how the sexual dynamics of this work out, but they also figure that’s private and nothing they need to butt into, gently or any other way.)

“Feeling environmentally friendly?” she asks.

Abby smiles. “Save water, shower with a friend? Something like that?”

“Yes?”

Abby shakes her head slightly, looking at the dormant summer-brown grass and drooping leaves on the trees. “Well, there is a drought on, but no, not exactly.”

Penny nods, watching Abby carefully. Abby smiles.

“Big announcement soon?” Penny asks.

“Maybe? We’re still figuring stuff out. Talking more is on the menu for tonight.”

Penny nods.
“You okay with this?” Abby sounds like she’s testing the water.

“Why wouldn’t I be?” She sees relief on Abby’s face at that answer.

“Lots of people aren’t.”

Penny smiles wryly at her. “I’ve never been lots of people.”

“Which is why we love you.” Abby thinks of how best to put this. “We’re not hiding it, not exactly, but we’re not broadcasting it, either. Gibbs and Abbi know.” Which is another reason why Penny is not upset about it. She’ll be damned if there is ever a situation where Jethro out-liberals her.

“But Tony and Ziva don’t.” Not a question. It’s obvious to her and Ducky that whatever might be going on, those two are A: not part of it, and B: not aware of it, either. Ducky is somewhat worried that if something does happen that Tony won’t handle it well, but that’s not a conversation for today.

Abby nods. “They’ve got their own stuff going on, or they probably would have noticed something was up. And Breena’s family really doesn’t know and probably won’t ever.”

That is also, in no way, a surprise to Penny, and actually, given the delicate balance of Breena’s family/work situation, something she would counsel against telling them about. “I got it. You tell who you tell when you’re ready.”

“So, is Ducky okay with this?”

“You’ve heard the phrase there’s nothing new under the sun, right?”

Abby nods.

“Trust me, we’ve both seen versions of this before. Some worked out, some didn’t. You four… You look like it’s going to work out. If it didn’t, we’d be nervous, but, neither of us is feeling edgy about this.”

“Thank you.”

“Nothing to say thanks for. Just, make sure you can work it out.”

Abby nods. “That’s why we keep talking.”

“Good.”

They hear voices and see Jimmy and Breena heading onto the porch. A second after they make it out, she hears Tim saying, “Penny, you sticking around for dinner?”

She gives Jimmy and Breena a hug while heading into the kitchen, seeing Tim in the fridge grabbing ground beef. He gets a quick hug, too, along with, “Not today. Got a dinner meeting with a campus refugee action group.”

Tim smiles at her and kisses her cheek. “Sounds like fun.” Then he’s heading to the pantry, looking for the onions.

She looks at him, really looking, seeing that, yes, like Jimmy and Breena, he’s also right out of the shower, and looking quite pleased with himself and the universe right now.

“Timothy?”
“Yeah.” He’s got the onions and is debating burgers plain or adding some A1 to the mix.

She doesn’t say anything, so he shifts his focus and looks at Penny, curiously. She can remember a time where, if he’d been doing anything and someone said his name like that, he’d snap to immediate attention, looking nervous and guilty.

She nods to the back porch, where the rest of the family is. “Abby says you’ve got more thinking and talking, but, whatever it is you four decide, we love you.”

Tim’s a bit surprised by that. It feels good, but… “Not seventeen anymore.”

“I know. I figure you don’t outgrow wanting the people around you to approve of your choices.”

That’s true, but he’s still got a little itch going along with this in the back of his head. “And…” he looks over to the porch, where Jimmy and Breena are snuggling baby girls and listening to Molly’s version of what she did today, “you do approve? Not, you feel like I didn’t get enough of this as a kid so you’re pulling out all the stops now, but… this is really okay?”

Penny smiles at him, aware of what he’s seeing with this. “It’s really okay. I feel bad about the past, and I didn’t do enough, but not so bad that I’d give my blessing to something that looked like it would cause you trouble later because you want it right now. Remember, I wasn’t ever the person who bought you ice cream because I felt bad about something I allowed to happen.”

Tim’s eyebrows shoot up, and then it hits him that his mom did used to do that. Piles of sugary calories weren’t just about making him feel better. “I hadn’t put that together.”

“Oh.” Penny winces. “I…”

He waves it away. “I get the main point.”

She kisses his cheek. “Life’s too short to let convention keep you from what you want. Ducky and I are glad to see the four of you going after it.”

“Thanks, Penny.”

“No problem. You ever want to talk more, bounce some ideas off someone who’s seen everything and done a whole lot of it, too, Ducky and I are both around.”

He nods at that. “Not tonight.”

She smiles. “Thought so. Anyway, I’ll be late if I spend too much longer here. Tomorrow at Gibbs’?”

“Yep. Abbi’s bringing him home, and we’re helping Ziva cook.”

“That sounds great.”

“I think it will be.”

“Sooo…” Breena says to Abby, looking really happy while Tim’s mixing up the burger meat and Jimmy fires up the grill.

“You look like you’ve got the best secret ever,” Abby says to her.
“Not a secret, but it’s good.”

“What?!”

“According to him,” she nods at Tim, “Gibbs asked Abbi to move in with him.”

Abby squeals with pleasure at that.

Tim finally adds his own two cents. “He was looking really happy, we asked what was up, and he told us there’d be a moving party next week.”

“Awww…” Abby couldn’t be more pleased if she tried.

Molly’s watching this, not quite getting it.

“Uncle Jethro’s got something really happy going on,” Breena explains.

“Feel better?” Molly knows that Jethro’s not been feeling well. That he got hurt.

“I’d think this is going a long way toward making him feel better,” Tim adds.

“All of this is making him feel better. He’s still grinning all over the place,” Jimmy says.

Molly looks confused at that. Uncle Jethro’s generally a pretty laid back and happy guy in her experience.

The adults can see they’re just perplexing Molly, so they shift it a bit, “Are you going to help us get Abbi moved into Uncle Jethro’s house?” Abby asks.

“Oh yes! Pillows.”

Breena grins at her daughter. She’s been on a pillow kick lately. (First thing she did getting over here today was check out all the pillows in Tim and Abby’s house.) The chance to mess around with Gibbs and Abbi’s pillows is hitting her just right.

“If you ask, I’m sure Uncle Jethro will be happy to let you be the official pillow mover!” Jimmy says, before heading over to Tim to offer a hand with getting dinner ready.

Molly’s very pleased by that.

And like yesterday, like weeks before, dinner is light, and they talk about Ziva’s new job, and about Abbi moving in with Gibbs, or about how much better, in general, Gibbs is looking, but they leave heavy topics for when all conversations aren’t interrupted by feeding little girls.

But, eventually, babies are in tucked in, snoozing away. (Hopefully, Molly’s stared working on night-time potty training, so this’ll be interesting.)

Eventually, they’ve got time to talk to each other without interruption, and with a day to think about last night.

Once the girls are up, they settle in down in Tim and Abby’s living room. This is probably a bed conversation, but they’re here, at the McGee house, and in the living room, intentionally, to help provide a physical environment that encourages brains to be doing the thinking. There’s a lot of things that go with this idea of forever, and them moving forward, that’ll bite them in the ass if they just jump in without brains doing the thinking.

So, he and Abby are on the love seat. Jimmy and Breena have the sofa. They’ve got drinks on the coffee table, but so far no one’s drinking them. They’re getting ready to talk, seriously, about whatever the hell it is that comes next.

“Would I be correct in assuming Penny’s look at us as we came down, and her little pep talk with you means she and Ducky have figured out what’s going on?” Jimmy asks.

Abby nods, and Tim says, “Not sure how much detail they have worked out, and she didn’t ask if we were sleeping together, but they seem to have the general idea and she tells me they approve. And are offering older, wiser, more experienced counsel if we want it.”

“I suppose if there was someone who could tell us everything there is to know about the history of… polyamory? Is that right?” Abby nods, that’s the right word. “It’d be Ducky. Not sure he’s got what I’d call practical experience in the matter, though,” Jimmy says.

“Ah yes, this reminds me of the time I was living in the tribal areas of Namibia…” Tim pulls off a fairly decent version of Ducky’s delivery and accent. That causes the other three to laugh.

“So, maybe not much useful experience, but approval is good,” Abby says.

“Yeah, it is.” Breena replies. “Of course, actually knowing whatever it is they’re approving of would be good, too.” That’s the crux of it. Tonight they come up with a plan.

“Yeah, well…” Tim’s looking from Breena to Abby and back again. “I had a script for how this worked with Abby, go out, get ring, get on knees, party a year later. I don’t have a plan for how this works.”

“You’re thinking of this as a marriage?” Jimmy says.

“That’s what forever means to me. That’s what it means to you, right?” he asks Breena, suddenly wondering if he and Abby missed something in what she’d been saying.

She nods. “Yeah. That’s how I’m thinking of it. Emotionally and sexually, at least. This is the four of us for the rest of our lives. We might not share a home… I’d like us to… Room for us all together, and as twosomes, but, not now, not… The kids’ll take crap on this if we’re too open. And my family will be difficult, which makes work difficult. But… twenty years from now…”

Those are legitimate concerns. Might as well get them out, now, before they go further. Because in the end it’s not just the four of them with each other, it’s also the four of them in the world at large.

“I was thinking about our home, sort of, today. When we were pulling down the drywall,” Tim says. “We get time on our own,” he pets Abby’s back, and nods to Jimmy and Breena, “during the week, when we’re at our own places. But, the house is supposed to be for weekends and vacations and… I’d be good with us having one big room there. That’d be the space where it’s the four of us together. Wasn’t thinking about merging households beyond that, but… not now, but eventually… I could see doing that.”

“I like the idea of that,” Jimmy says. “The house is safe. Anyone who’s there enough to see how the bedrooms are laid out is someone we trust enough they’d know about us anyway, so, that’s not an issue.”

Safe. Jimmy calling it that, and Penny mentioning approval has Tim thinking. “Breena, what’s ‘difficult’ mean for your family?’” Ed wasn’t exactly a pile of sunshine and kittens with Amy and Collin, and they’re talking about going so far beyond that, they may as well be getting the rocket ready for takeoff.

Jimmy says dryly, “They’ll go batshit insane. Like challenge us for custody of the kids, insane.” From the way he and Breena are looking at each other, they’ve already talked about this. “There’s a practical reason for an at least twenty year moratorium on us sharing a home.”

They all realize that, given the wrong judge, that’s a case they’d lose. Doesn’t matter how happy their kids are, or how good their grades are or how well-adjusted, get the wrong judge and their ‘degenerate’ lifestyle will be deemed worse for their kids than the ‘upstanding’ upbringing Breena’s parents could provide.

And now, when they’re babies, when they can’t say anything about what they want or like…

They wouldn’t even qualify for the extremely limited protections offered gay and lesbian couples because that’s not who they are.

“No.” Abby says. “That’s not…” She swallows. “We don’t risk that.”

Breena nods.

“So, our own homes, for at least the next twenty years,” Tim says.

“Until our youngest is eighteen,” Jimmy adds, “and, whatever else we do, at church and at their home, we’re just good buddies.”

Tim’s watching Breena. He’s the one with the experience in unhappy parents, people you love, whose approval you want, looking at you like you disgust them. “Breena… okay, none of us love Ed, but you do, and… if being able to be open about who we are matters, we don’t ever have to cross a line you can’t tell him about.”

She half smiles at that. “I’ve been thinking about that. Okay, first off, we already have. There’s no way I can tell my parents about what we do on the weekends. The genie doesn’t go back into the bottle. I mean, say we stop this cold, go back to just being good friends, no more sleepovers, no more snuggles, no massage night, we’ll miss this. That’s the thing about this loving each other thing, it doesn’t go away because it’s inconvenient. And, this matters more to me than keeping my Dad calm.

“But, I also don’t want to piss him off. I have no desire to find out what he’d do if he ever learns about this. Probably nothing. Probably, like with Collin and Amy, he’ll just sulk. But… I don’t want to see what happens with that. And, unlike Collin and Amy, I think this is unconventional enough that the rest of my family would get behind him. I don’t see my mom just humoring him on this, while privately telling him he’s being foolish. She’d side with him.” Breena looks distressed for a moment and sighs. “I think even Collin and Amy would side with him. And, that could make things very messy.”

“What does messy mean?” Abby asks.

Jimmy gently rubs her back while she thinks. “Among other things, they can force me to sell my shares of the business. I’m only a majority shareholder in the one branch, and with the way we’ve got the business structured they can buy me out. They have to pay market value for the shares, so, yay, we’ve suddenly got a lot more cash. I get everything I’ve put in back, plus some because the stock’s appreciated over the years, but I’m also unemployed, and with as close knit as this business is, and how they like to keep the club closed, I’m likely not getting another job anytime soon.”

Tim winces, and Jimmy catches his eye, seems to be thinking the same thing. Jimmy says it, “And if it got out wider, even if your family was supportive, it could hurt the business because people may not want people like us in charge of burying deeply devoted Catholic Grandma.”

Breena nods at that, too. “Of course, that’s actually the best insurance for my family never saying anything about it, even if we are out to them. I make a fuss; I can tank the whole enterprise. A lot of our customers are referred by their family pastor, and we are not, by any stretch the only option around, so if we’re associated with something said pastor doesn’t like…” Breena smiles grimly. “Honestly, that’s part of my dad coming down on Amy and Collin like a ton of bricks. I feel a bit like Amy on this. I want you guys. I don’t want the crap that’ll go with being open about it. Not from them. Going through it once with Jimmy was enough.”

Abby heads over and wraps an arm around Breena. “This is supposed to be about love, and about joy, and pleasure. I’m fine with us never being out to… a lot of the world, if need be. It’s not their business. Life’s going to throw enough stuff at us we won’t be able to avoid, so… If there are things we don’t tell some people, there are things we don’t tell them. All your parents ever have to know is that we’re good friends who love each other. They never need anything more than that,” Abby says.

“So, we’re what… discreet?” Jimmy says.

Abby nods. “Our family knows. Maybe some of our co-workers. Jimmy, what about your family?”

He exhales, thinking. “Probably freak my mom out. Of course, since she ‘doesn’t like to drive’ which I think is code for ‘Bob,’ Jimmy’s stepdad, ‘can’t be bothered to get off his ass and leave Delaware,’ she hasn’t been down here since Jon’s funeral. We get up to visit once a season or so, and… unless you’re feeling a burning desire to meet my mom and step-dad, this is probably something that they’re entirely out of.”

“And Clark’s on the other side of the planet and unlikely to move back anytime soon,” Breena adds.

“Yeah. I get an email from him once a month, maybe. Last I heard, he’s working on getting Japanese citizenship. I don’t think he’s ever going to be an issue. What about Sarah?”

Tim nods at that. “I’d like her to know. Like Penny, I can’t imagine her being upset. I mean, have you looked at those books she’s publishing? We’re vanilla by their standards. So, I can see her being a little shocked at the idea of us doing this sort of thing, but I can’t see her being shocked by the fact it exists. Abby? Luca and Kyle?”

“Yes on Luca. He may not love it, but he’s not going to be a jerk about it. He’s really good on the live and let live stuff. Kyle’s not really part of our lives, so I don’t think I’d need to tell him.”

“And we just play the wider world by ear? Like… I’m pretty sure that unless Gibbs wants to tell him, Fornell doesn’t need to know,” Tim says.

“Vance?” Jimmy asks. They know they’re supposed to disclose, for legal purposes, which employees are with each other, but… They’re already great friends, so that’s known, and in the almost fifteen years they’ve been working at NCIS none of them has ever run into a lawyer who tried to run a you-guys-are-sleeping-together-so-you’re-faking-the-evidence-to-back-each-other-up play.

The three of them look at each other, not sure what the right answer is. Abby’s tapping her finger against the arm of the chair, putting the pieces together, and says, “If we got outed, that could be used to embarrass NCIS, and he’d be pissed by being blindsided on that.”

“And if we just head over and say, ‘Hey, guess what, we’re all sleeping together,’ we’ll get head-slapped into next week for TMI overshare,” Jimmy says.

Breena nods at that. “Are you guys, I don’t know, covered by some sort of anti-discrimination thing or something?”

“Penny’d know for sure, but I don’t think there’s any law covering polyamory,” Tim replies

“It’s policy that if you start some sort of romantic relationship with another co-worker you need to tell your supervisor. For all three of us now, that’s Leon. He’ll be all, ‘Oh God, why are you telling me this,’ but he’s not going to do anything. He wants to keep his ship happily sailing along, which means us each running our own department, so he’s not going to muck with a system that works. But…” Abby looks at Tim, and wiggles her fingers in a ‘come here’ gesture. So he abandons the loveseat and joins the other three on the sofa. Abby kisses him. “Jimmy and I are as high up as we’re going to go. Not like telling Leon means we might get passed over for promotions. You aren’t. Jarvis talked about you taking Leon’s place when he leaves. If we tell him, that could be the end of Director McGee.”

Tim shrugs at that. “I don’t love the idea of running NCIS. I want time, at home, with you guys and our kids. Won’t get a lot of that if I’m the guy in charge.” They’re busy. Vance is busy. “I’d rather not be travelling too much, either. I know I’ll end up doing some, but, if I take Director, they’ll expect me to be all over the world. Regularly. So, I mean… sure, maybe in ten years it’ll look more appealing, but… Us. I want us. I love my job. I love what I’m doing now. I want to keep doing it. I want to come home to you,” he kisses Abby, “and as often as possible,” he strokes Breena’s cheek and squeezes Jimmy’s shoulder. “So, getting booted out of the running for Director doesn’t break my heart.”

They’re quiet for a moment at that thought, and another one, related to work and what they’re talking about hits Tim. “There’s one reason I’d take it. Leon won’t do anything with us. We’re good at our jobs, we keep the ship running, and he cares more about that than what we do in our off time. Next guy might not be like that. I’d take Director if that’s what’s necessary to keep us all working at NCIS.”

Jimmy nods at that. “That’s a long time off. We tell him because that’s the rule. Because in the end we don’t want him getting blindsided or screwed.”

“Rule number one,” Abby adds.

“He’s not exactly your partner,” Breena says, meaning the three of them.

Tim shrugs. “He’s as close to one as I’ve got.”

Jimmy nods again. “We keep doing our jobs and doing them well, and… Ten years from now someone who’s trouble ends up in charge, maybe we don’t work for NCIS anymore. But, the family doesn’t work if one of us has to be away all the time. None of us wanted to be part-time parents, so we’re not going to make you sign up for that to keep the other two of us employed.”

“Thanks.”

They all look at each other. “So, we’re doing this?” Abby asks.

Breena smiles, real joy beaming off of her, and that smile spreads, lifting Jimmy and Tim’s hearts, too.
“Yeah. We are,” Tim says, feeling the immensity of this go arcing through him. He starts to laugh, and maybe it’s not completely appropriate, but this feeling has to come out somehow.

“Wow.” Abby says, and like Tim laughing, it’s a little silly, but it’s real. “Jimmy?”

He’s smiling, but he doesn’t say anything.

“You okay?” Tim asks.

“Feels big.” He giggles at that and then shakes his head. “Anything I’m going to say will be horribly inappropriate.”

They giggle at that, too.

Jimmy kisses Breena, gentle and slow. When they break apart, he shifts a bit, leaning across Breena, and kisses Abby. They’ve never kissed like this, for real. Lips wet and soft, tongues stroking. Tim’s watching it, Abby in his lap while Jimmy’s kissing her, and he can’t believe how hard this hits him. This is… God… This is so hot he doesn’t know what to do with it.

He gently pets Abby’s hair and neck while Jimmy kisses her, both of them making pleased, purring sounds. He feels a small hand stroking his shoulder, and realizes that must be Breena.

After another second, Jimmy pulls back from Abby, stands up and takes a step over, so he’s in front of Tim, and very quickly pecks a very surprised Tim on the lips. Then he sits back on his heels in front of them, and says, “That’s usually how you seal this kind of deal, right?”

Tim nods slowly at that, licks his lips, and then says to Abby, “Until my last breath,” and he kisses her, remaking the promise that marks their life together. All the love of her, and their children, and this life is in his touch, and the love for Breena and Jimmy, and their children, and this new step, sharpens that touch, and the desire that goes with it. They break apart after a few seconds, and he shifts a bit, turning his head to Breena, wrapping his arm around her, licking his lips again, feeling the ghost of Abby’s skin on his, and the heat of Breena’s skin under his hand, as he says to her, “Until my last breath.”

She smiles at him, scooting closer, one hand on his, the other around Abby’s waist. “That’s all the forever I need.” She leans in and kisses Tim, and it’s so good. Different. It’s very much not kissing Abby. Her touch is slower, a bit shallower, more lips and less tongue, but it’s good. Tim lets her lead for a few seconds, feeling, noticing what she seems to like, and then starts to play with it, tiny little nibbles, and soft, light sucks. Breena moans, soft and rich, then breaks the kiss, staring Tim in the eyes, and says to him, “Forever, Tim.”

He blinks at it, feeling that word crest through him. This feels like in the bathroom with Abby, after the freezer case. This is the moment they’re married, and whatever else may go with it, this is what cements it.

Breena pets his face, and he quickly kisses her again, and she kisses back, then she places a finger on his lips and turns to Abby, meeting her lips in what starts as a chaste press of lips to lips and slips into wet and soft and gentle, and both of the guys groan at it. And then she whispers to Abby, “Forever,” kissing it to her. Abby takes her ‘forever,’ and kisses it right back to her, “Forever, Breena” fingers running through Breena’s hair.

Tim’s mouth is going dry, and his heart is beating much too fast, and they really should have done this at Jimmy’s house because their bed is too damn small, and none of that matters because right now is ripe and gold and… “We need to be upstairs.”
Jimmy’s nodding along with that, holding his hands out to Abby and Breena, giving each of them a hand up, and as Tim stands up, he looks at Jimmy, hooks his arm around his neck, and pulls him close for a very fast, closed-mouth kiss. “Until my last breath, Jimmy.”

Jimmy smiles at him and ruffles his hair. Then Abby’s in his arms, kissing him again, adding her own “Forever,” to the mix.

He’s got no idea how they got upstairs, just that it happened. And even once in bed, it’s surreal, almost fantastic, like a dream, but real.

Some degree of fantastic is that there’s so many more options and opportunities going on. Even having played with four way fantasies isn’t preparation for the real thing, where there are soft, happy bodies all over the place. Tim wants at least three more mouths. He’s kissing Breena’s shoulder and stroking Abby’s tummy, and he thinks the warm swath of skin at his back is Jimmy, but it might be part of Breena and more lips, they need to be kissed, too, a lot, and soft hair, Abby’s, between his fingers, and it’s sensual and soft, and almost confusing because there’s so much going on.

Too many sensations all at once, too many inputs, and all of them are good, but trying to focus down to one thing means feeling like he’s missing other things.

Like, for a moment, he’s watching Abby and Breena kissing, which is mind blowing hot, slippery pink lips stroking over each other, and both of the girls are making soft, needy sounds, and Abby’s hand is on Breena’s breast, which, God, that’s amazing, and it’s so hot it’s almost paralyzing. He’s just sitting there, watching, a lump of barely-breathing, twitching, horny nerves. And Abby turns, twists to kiss Jimmy, who’s kneeling behind her, hands on her breasts, softly stroking while he nuzzles along Abby’s neck, and there’s this second where Breena’s just sitting there, not doing much of anything, before Tim jerks out of staring at the show in front of him, remembering that there’s an entire other woman here, who might want some company.

He pulls Breena to him, his hands flowing over her body, her hands on his, stroking each other as breasts and chest and belly and dick all rub against each other, and he knows he’s talking to her, telling her how beautiful she is and how good she’s making him feel, and how much he loves all of them, but he doesn’t think he’s making a whole lot of sense as he does it.

He can taste her skin, the richness of that little spot where neck and ear meet, and the suede soft whisper of the dip of her collarbone under his lips, his lips meet her nipple, pink on pink, and he traces his teeth over the underside of her breast.

She’s purring at him, and he thinks the hand trailing down his back is Abby, but he doesn’t want to look away to find out.

He lightly pets down Breena’s belly, noting soft skin, and fine gold hairs. His lips follow, and she makes very encouraging sounds, lying back, taking him with her, so he’s kneeling over her, kissing his way down her tummy. He can hear her moaning, feel her pubic hair tickling his chin, smell the sex on her, and he wants to just dive in, kiss her right, but he looks up, makes sure he’s got permission, she sees him look up, and smiles. He looks over to Jimmy, who’s sucking on Abby’s breast, completely wrapped up in Abby, so Tim gently whacks the back of his foot, and Jimmy looks over at him, sees what he’s about to do, and nods quickly, before going back to Abby.
Breena’s wet and soft and gold and pink and sweet. She’s candied musk and succulent peaches, and all those metaphors for brilliantly sexy, and Tim really wishes he had two working hands because he’d love to really go to town on her, but right now he’s too excited to lay on this stomach and go down on her, which means he needs one arm keeping him stable, in addition to kneeling, so all he’s got tongue and lips and teeth.

So he uses them. And he revels in her taste, in her heat, and the sounds she’s making. He soars with her legs growing tight against his face, and the feel of her fingers clenching in his hair. And he’s good at oral, but he’s not a mind reader, and he’s never done this with Breena before, so there are a few false starts, where he got her close and then slipped off target when she moved in a direction he didn’t expect, but finally she’s tight and tense against him, breathing hard, legs quivering, and that last lick does it and she ripples all over, twitching and shuddering and he feels like a sex-god with her coming under his mouth.

He holds her close, very gently licking, soft little kisses as she comes down, and by the time she’s sitting up, pulling him to kiss her lips, he’s so turned on he can feel his pulse in his ears.

He can feel the bed rocking, and looks over, finally seeing what’s going on with Jimmy and Abby. Abby’s on all fours, sucking Jimmy, who’s got his head back, thrusting slow and steady, enjoying the ride, but trying not to get off, and that turns him on that much more. He feels like he’s going to explode, like he’s got way too damn much blood in his body, and if he doesn’t get off soon, he’s going to go insane.

He hops off the bed, ripping open his night stand, “God, Abby, tell me we still have condoms,” he’s searching through as fast as he can, and feels Breena’s hand on his wrist.

“No.”

“No?” Last night, Jimmy and Breena were using a condom, because it’s her fertile week, and they want to wait until Anna’s a year old before starting on another baby.

Jimmy and Breena are at least vaguely aware of what’s going on, and they’ve stopped, watching Tim and Breena.

“First time we make love, I don’t want latex between us.”

Tim hisses at that, feeling it hit him straight in the groin.

“And if we love each other enough to do this, it doesn’t matter if the kids have green eyes or hazel ones.”

That takes him another notch higher, because if there’s anything on Earth that gets to a man, it’s a fertile woman he loves saying ‘let’s make a baby.’

So, he’s feeling like this is the most self-control he’s ever expressed as he sits back down on the bed, pulling her into his lap, and says, “Yes, God, yes, please, and… No. Not tonight.” He kisses her hard and deep, grinding against her belly. “Not making a baby on a whim.” And though he almost wants to whimper at saying it, he does, “Tomorrow, we’ll talk more about that. Tonight…”

Breena grins at him, trailing her pussy over his dick, so wet and slick and soft, and he groans against her shoulder as she does it, and then she slips onto the floor between his legs and wraps her lips around his dick.

“Oh God!” So good. So wet and hot and slick and it’s different. And just like he doesn’t know all of her tricks, she doesn’t know his, which is probably the only reason he doesn’t embarrass himself by getting off in nineteen seconds.

She’s using her hand and mouth, stroking them together, and he takes her hand in his, tightening her hold and slowing her down a bit. She follows what he’s doing, and he lets go, stroking her hair and face, murmuring how good this is.

He glances away from her, and sees Abby sinking onto Jimmy, head back, eyes closed, lips open, that pain-pleasure look he knows so well, and he’s got to close his eyes, because if he watches another second of that, he’ll get off, and this feels too good to end.

Abby and Jimmy are both groaning behind him, and Breena’s sucking slow and beautiful, and he feels so amazing, so happy and light and ecstatic. And even trying to make it last, trying to slow himself down, he knows he’s getting close, knows he’s ready to crest.

He opens his eyes, watching Breena’s head slip up and down, then looks over, sees Abby watching him, smiling, he strokes the back of Breena’s head again, and then takes Abby’s hand in his, and a second later he’s flying, orgasm cresting through him wet and hot, each pulse lasting a mini-forever of exquisite joy.

He comes down, cradling Breena’s head with his right hand, holding Abby’s hand with his left, feeling and hearing her and Jimmy still at it. Eventually, Breena stands up, and he kisses her deep and slow and intense, his tongue dancing with hers, and she kisses back, just as happy.

The bed really is too small for four people, so they’re hugging the edge, snuggled up against each other, as they watch Abby and Jimmy finish.

Abby’s on her hands and knees over Jimmy, kissing him, and he’s got one hand on her butt, the other one between them, working her clit as they both rock together.

And like when he was watching Jimmy and Breena do this, he’s thinking about how beautiful this is. How he wishes he had a better word for it, but he doesn’t. It’s beautiful. And just like with him and Breena, it’s not practiced or well-coordinated, but it’s still warmth and love and sex and joy.

It’s still beautiful.

It’s still two of his three favorite people making each other happy.

It’s still joy made touch made pleasure.

Abby’s sucking Jimmy’s tongue, and he knows those sounds she’s making, knows the way she’s moving, the tension in her legs and back and old friends. The lovely pink flush of her chest and face makes him feel warm and happy. Those high, breathy, panting moans are still the sweetest music in his world. (Well, at least right now, back when Breena was getting off, her orgasm song was the sweetest music in the world. Tim’s comfortable with having several favorite sounds.) Abby’s shuddering, twitching, coming loud and hard, and Tim reaches over to stroke her thigh while she gets off, feeling wrapped in an amazing wash of blissful joy.

Jimmy’s thrusting hard, rocking into her, hand clenched on her hip, small grunting breaths as he pulls her down against him, arching as deep into her as he can get, and Breena’s petting his shoulder as he climaxes.

For a moment, Abby lies on Jimmy, both of them breathing hard, looking peaceful and content. For another moment, they kiss slow and lazy. Then Abby pulls away and grabs the tissues, and they clean up.
When she’s back from the bathroom, she looks at their bed, and then starts pulling off the blankets. Breena figures out what she’s doing before Tim or Jimmy does, but, as she’s saying, “We’re sleeping together after that,” they get the idea. No way Jimmy or Breena are heading to the guest room after that.

Tim heads to the linen closet, they’ve got a few foam mattress pads, and he grabs them, tossing them on the floor, along with all of their pillows, while muttering about how first thing in the morning, they’re ordering a bigger bed.

After a few minutes, they’re all cuddled together on the floor. Tim’s got Abby in his arms, and Breena’s against his back, and Jimmy’s on the far side, and he honestly wishes there was a way to make sure everyone got snuggled on both sides, but that just doesn’t happen, so, they cuddle in, and are just about asleep when they hear a loud and bright, “MOM!”

Breena groans, and then calls back, “Go to the bathroom, Molly,” as she gets up, realizes she doesn’t have her bathrobe here, so she wraps herself in one of the blankets and heads out to make sure her daughter gets to the bathroom in time.

“Success?” Jimmy asks, sleepily, when Breena comes back to them.

“Bed is still dry, toddler is dry, and she’s back to sleep.”

Breena gets kisses from Jimmy, and Tim, and Abby on that, and then they settle into (what will hopefully be uninterrupted) sleep.
This time Jimmy’s the one who gets stepped on by a small girl (who is not in need of a diaper change) looking to get some early morning cuddles in.

So, to celebrate the first night of successful potty usage, Molly does get several minutes of snuggle time, in… “bed” with the adults. Which she laps up like a kitten with the bowl full of cream. Uninterrupted time with the adults is rare. Little sister/cousin are around a lot!

From there, it’s morning time. Anna and Kelly are also indicating they’d like out of the crib, along with breakfast. Tim and Breena get to sleep in this weekend, so Jimmy and Abby get the girls up, changed, and ready for the day.

Granted, for Breena, sleeping in actually means laying on her side drowsing through her morning nurse with Anna, Tim cuddled up behind her.

He’d slept through most of the getting up and moving, and didn’t actually start to wake up until Breena flipped over to nurse Anna on her other side, so for a second he was startled and lost in time. Waking up to the sounds of a nursing woman and child is something he hasn’t done in months, but after a few seconds he put himself back where he belongs, sorting out that this is Breena and Anna, and that he didn’t just dream the last four months.

His eyes open as he pulls the different threads of last night together and he sees Breena facing him, nursing Anna, gently stroking his side, and smiling.

Apparently, he didn’t dream last night, either.

He props himself on his elbow and kisses the top of Anna’s head. She’s looking at him curiously, because he’s very much not Jimmy, the guy who’s usually around for this, but she doesn’t appear to be bothered by him being there.

“Morning,” he says.

Breena gives him a quick kiss, neither of them have brushed teeth yet, so not much in the way of deep kissing is going to happen. “Back at you. Sleep well?”

Talk about surreal conversations.

“Yeah.” He sits up, stretching out, trying to work the kinks out of his arm. “Arm and shoulder don’t love sleeping on the floor, but… more than worth it.”

Breena smiles at him. “Yeah. So, bigger bed?”

He nods, resting his hand on her hip, amazed that he’s sitting here, touching her. “Much bigger bed. You think they make something bigger than a king?”

“You know, I’ve got no idea. I’m sure someone, somewhere does, but… the sort of thing you just grab at a store?” She shrugs, and Anna looks askance at the boob in her mouth moving. “Don’t you look at me like that, you love to latch on and then look all around the room, yanking my breast all over the place.”

If an eight month old can look irked, Anna is irked.
“Ten more inches than you guys have?”

“If you’re going to go that far, why not a full foot?”

He shrugs. “Why not? That’d be just as wide as long.”

“Plenty of room to play, and still comfortably snuggly.”

“That’s what I’m thinking. Keep it here for now. Move it to the house when it’s ready.”

Breena takes his hand and kisses it. “That sounds good to me.” She detaches Anna. “And I think you’re done. So, how about I take her downstairs,” she gently boops Anna on the nose, “You want some Cheerios, right?” Anna smiles at that. Breena looks back up to Tim with a little smile on her face. “And you get the water started in the shower?”

That sounds like a great plan to Tim.

Tim feels a moment of hesitation as he turns on the water. He knows what he wants to do when Breena gets up here with him. Okay, that’s already off the menu. He knows what the second runner up is, and that’s sending a warm, turned-on flush of hell, yes! All through him.

But, they also talked about this being something all four of them were there for. Can’t be wondering or jealous if you see what’s going on. Though, if they meant it, that this is a marriage, then, one on one shouldn’t be a problem.

He doesn’t think it will be, but, it’d also be nice not to mess it up on the first day.

The water’s starting to steam up the bathroom, so he steps into the shower, and lets it tumble over him. On one level that’s a disappointment, it’s rinsing away the scent of last night.

On another level, a few minutes by himself is a good thing. Last week, Jimmy and Abby did this, and it didn’t bug him at all. He didn’t even think about it. They got a shower. No biggie. He knows Jimmy woke up with morning wood, and he knows that it’s impossible to get a shower at Jimmy’s without some level of rubbing up against each other because there just isn’t enough room, and even if there was, they’d rub up against each other because it’s fun and it feels good.

And it didn’t bug him at all.

And right now, if he and Breena were down there, and Abby and Jimmy up here… No, it wouldn’t bug him. They could do whatever they wanted and that’d be fine. He wouldn’t even ask. He’d just assume they were playing with each other, because that’s what you do when you’ve got some free time in the morning and a co-ed shower with someone you love.

Sure, he’d like to be part of it, and would really like to watch, because, as he remembers, somewhat fuzzily, watching was awesome, too, but he’s not feeling any sense of jealousy or anger or… anything other than an eagerness to find a shower big enough for all four of them, and some time when they aren’t baby wrangling to take advantage of it.

He thinks wryly that there’s a reason why people go on honeymoons, and that if they can get a long weekend for themselves in the not wildly distant future that’d be a very good thing.
He feels the temperature in the bathroom shift, and knows Breena’s back. A second later, she’s pulling back their shower curtain, and stepping in.

There is enough room to not rub up against each other in Tim’s shower, so he steps back some, making sure Breena’s got direct access to the water. She sighs as it hits her, and tilts her head back, letting it flow over her.

They did this last night, too, though Jimmy was there. That was more of a just get cleaned up quick sort of thing. Not enough time to really enjoy naked Breena.

And later last night, he was enjoying naked Breena a whole lot, but there wasn’t much time to really focus or savor. He licks his lips and swallows, and then gently, almost tentatively, rests the tips of his fingers at the dip of her collarbone.

“This okay?”

She smiles. “Oh yeah. Didn’t get as much quiet time last night as I would have liked.”

He nods at that. “Yeah. Didn’t feel rushed, but… Just so much to look at and see and feel and…”

Breena steps closer to him, nodding, her palms on his chest. She gets it. Part of the reason to have a honeymoon after getting married is so you’ve got hours of quiet exploring time. “Still don’t have a ton of time. Twenty minutes, they’re going to want the shower, or we won’t make it to the diner for breakfast.”

“So, what do we do with our twenty minutes?”

She looks down at his erection, and lightly traces her fingers down his chest to curl around it. He groans quietly at that, stepping closer to her, and pulling her face to his for a kiss.

Can’t take too long, they’ve got to get washed up, too. “We’ve got to get some sort of honeymoon.”

Breena agrees heartily at that.

Tim gently presses against her shoulder, letting her know to turn away from him, and she does, facing into the spray. He reaches up and lowers it a bit. Breena’s shorter than he and Abby so if he’s got the water where they like it, it’s hitting her full in the face, which isn’t what he wants.

He pulls her hair over to one side, and kisses her throat and shoulder. “Abby’s shampoo or mine?”

“Abby’s.”

He grabs it, and starts to work it through her hair. She purrs at that, rubbing up against him. He laughs a bit at that, as her warm, soft butt is rubbing over him and he’s working on her hair.

“Funny?”

“We’re multitasking.”

Breena does laugh at that. “Like only veteran parents can.”

He spends another moment working on her hair, enjoying it wet and heavy between his fingers, enjoying her purring at him doing it quite a bit more. When he’s done, she turns in his arms, head to the water, letting it rinse out.

“You?”
“Hair’s good. Probably wash it tomorrow.”

Breena seems to think about that, and says, “So, what does get washed?”

“Skin and hair are pretty dry. They don’t like soap, even gentle stuff, every day. Everything got scrubbed yesterday,” because yesterday he did the kind of work that actually involved getting dirty, “so, today would usually just be armpits and dick.”

Breena grins at him. “I bet I can help with that.”

“I’d really like it if you did,” he says with a smile.

Breena reaches for his soap, and squirts a bit into her hands. Underarms is more tickly than erotic. It’s also pretty quick, though he gets the idea that one of these days Breena wants to go to town on him and find out exactly how ticklish he is, and exactly where. (The correct answers being moderately, and, with the right sort of touch, just about everywhere.)

Dick is a lot more fun. And a lot more thorough. He’s not sure if she’s being gentle, because she’s getting to know him, or if Jimmy just likes a lighter touch than he does, but this is good but not rocking his world.

She’s watching as she’s stroking him, and can see he’s into it, but not completely blissed out. Breena puts his hand on hers. “Show me.”

He curls her hand around him, snug and tight. “Tight. Like this.”

She kisses his shoulder, and says, “I can do that.” And she does, slick and tight and soapy, and that’s a hell of a lot better. She adds a little pulse-squeeze as she drags her hand up and down, and that’s even better yet.

Tim’s groaning at that, arms around her, watching her work him, loving the feel of it, and the sight of his dick slipping between her fingers. He’s thrusting against her, going for fast, wishing they had the time to linger on this, but they don’t. He wants to save as much of the time they’ve got for her, because getting him off is like driving an automatic. Anyone who’s even seen one can figure it out well enough to get from point A to point B.

Girls are like driving a stick. If you don’t know what you’re doing, the car doesn’t go anywhere and you just sit there, engine humming, cursing with frustration, in exactly the same spot you were when you put the key in the ignition.

He’s getting close, and remembers she doesn’t like getting cummed on, so, he tries to shift to the side some, and she reads him well enough to say, “If I’m giving you a hand-job, it’s okay.” He nods at that, once, and lets the pleasure overtake him.

He’s resting his head on her shoulder, and she’s petting his back and hair when he starts to come down.

He looks up and smiles at her. “Best way to start a day. How about you? What kind of clean-up do you want?”

“Usually soap everything up every day.”

Tim grins at her. “I can do that.”

She grins back. “I never doubted that.”
He likes this. Not lots of time, but some, to really look and touch. So, as he’s gently (And like Breena, he is using a more gentle touch than normal, because he doesn’t, yet, know exactly what she likes, but he’ll learn.) exploring, learning her body, mapping freckles and moles, tracing stretch marks with his tongue, noticing scars he intends to ask about later.

He gets to her pussy, carefully soaping her up, making sure to get every inch of skin foamy with lather, listening to hear if she likes what he’s doing, and she does sound pleased. Once she’s all rinsed off, he sinks to his knees.

“Tell me what you like. I know I wasn’t quite doing it last night.”

“It was good.”

“Could have been better, right?”

She nods, kindly, but she does nod.

He smiles. “Want to be amazing at this, but I can’t read minds. So, tell me. You can always tell me anything, and trust me, I want to know. I’m never going to act like you’ve cut my dick off if you tell me how to do this better.”

“Fingers. I like fingers. I can get off from penetration alone, takes a while, but i can, so, fingers and tongue are always going to be better than just tongue.”

He gently kisses her muff, and says, “You’re a unicorn. I’ve heard about women like you, but never met one.”

“Uh huh. Less talking, more sex.”

“Yes, Ma’am.” And he gets to it. And yes, adding his fingers to the mix does seem to make Breena happy. He loves the sounds she’s making, and the feel of her body wet and snug on his fingers has him thinking all sorts of delicious, wicked thoughts for whenever it is they finally get around to introducing his dick to her pussy.

She’s close, moaning, hands clenched in his hair, and he can feel they’re stalling out. He doesn’t know how to get her past this spot of almost there. And, while it’s true that he is dearly looking forward to laying her out, and then, with Abby, and Jimmy, keeping her an inch away from orgasm for as long as she can possibly take, and then completely blowing her mind when she gets off, getting stuck here isn’t exactly the best plan ever for a quickie.

“Up and down!” she finally gets out, and he's happy to adjust. Abby likes little circles on her clit, over and over round and round. Breena likes up and down. He can do that. Little awkward, takes a minute for his tongue to fully switch gears, but when it does, her hands clench tight, and her legs shake, and she’s quaking on his tongue and fingers and he’s very happy with this result.

And they manage to get out the shower a full minute before Jimmy and Abby come up with the girls.

Hearing Jimmy and Abby getting their shower, which they appear to be enjoying, while getting the girls ready to go to breakfast makes Tim very sure that this is okay. All he really wants is enough time on their own for all four of them to do this together.

“Long time, no see, Stranger,” Abby says to Ziva as she wraps an arm around her when she slides into their booth at the diner.

Ziva kisses Abby’s cheek, and sees Elaine heading to them, plates in hand. Home fries, turkey sausage, eggs, and fruit salad are very welcome to the quite sleepy newest addition to the Coast Guard.

“You look pooped,” Breena adds. “We need to have a chat with your Boss about your hours?” she says with a smile.

Tony slides into the booth, too, looking pleased to see a mug of black coffee, corned-beef hash, scrambled eggs, and biscuits looking up at him. “Elaine, I love you.”

She waves that away. “You bringing my boy home, soon?”

“Coming home today,” Tim says. “And we can’t wait to bring him in. You’ve never seen him in such a good mood.”

Elaine looks exasperated. “That man. Of course, he practically gets…” she sees Molly’s following the conversation and decides not to finish that sentence. “Only Gibbs would be in a good mood after that.”

“Yeah, well, it’s not the…” Jimmy’s meaningful look finishes that sentence. “It’s the red-head that we’re helping to move in next weekend that’s got him all smiley.”

“Awww… I’ve been telling him that she’s good for him. Glad to see he’s doing something about it.”

“He most certainly is,” Ducky says, coming up behind Elaine, and kissing her cheek as he steps out of the way so Penny can slide into the booth before he does.

“That sounds like you’ve got more details than we do,” Ziva says as Elaine hurries off to get breakfast for the last two members of today’s meal.

Ducky sparkles at her. “I do indeed.”

“And are you intending to share them?” Tim asks.

Ducky shakes his head, smug little grin on his face. “Jethro will let you know when he sees fit to. Ziva! So, tell us, how is life among the Coast Guard going? I’ve been hearing from Abbi that you and Timothy are saving her life.”

“I do not know about McGee, but I doubt I am saving any lives. What I am doing is slow, and for everyone involved, annoying, but necessary. As Acting Director, Abbi has to have people under her still doing their jobs. And she has to limit access to everything to make sure that no evidence is destroyed. That’s crippling their ability to do the job. So, for right now, I’m clearing her Department Heads and Division Heads. Pick a department, and keep going down the chain until I can find someone to run the office.”

“Isn’t the FBI doing that?” Penny asks.
“Yes, but their priorities are different. They’re dissecting the conspirators, and following the leads they find organically, which is exactly how we’d follow that case, too. But we, and the FBI, don’t have to run the Coast Guard. Abbi needs everything up in place yesterday. So, in some instances, I’m sure I’m doing the FBI’s job for them, and in others I’m getting to people they probably will not get to for months.”

“Like her lead Tech guy?” Tim asks.

“Exactly.” Ziva mutters something they can only assume is extremely rude, in Hebrew. “She can’t have him run the re-stocking until he’s cleared. So, he was the first name on my list. And it took me three hours to find out that he does not get to go back to work. In fact, right now, we’ve got a warrant out for him and the FBI is trying to track him down. I had to go through him, his second-in-command, and the next four people down from him before I found someone in the Tech Department who wasn’t on the take.”

The rest of the table responds with appropriate dismay at that.

“That was my first two days. Now I’m weeding through the people in charge of Evidence, which…” She bites her lip and her eyes are hot. “A mess does not begin to cover it. From what we can tell, as soon as a case was closed, anything that went with it became booty. Open to whomever knew what was going on and wanted it.”

Abby’s looking angry on Ziva’s behalf. “Lord!”

Ziva nods. “This is what kept me up late last night. You know how police offices all over the country auction seized equipment?”

They all nod. They know about that. That’s how a lot of departments pad out their budgets. NCIS does it, too. And, assuming the case is fully over, and the object in question has been legally seized, and the auction is open to anyone who wished to bid, that’s completely legal.

“Instead of having each branch store their own evidence. As soon as the cases were closed, everything was shipped to here or a storage site in California. Then they were auctioning off the seized guns and drugs.” Which are supposed to be destroyed, not auctioned off. “If you knew the right people, the evidence lock up was a supermarket for illegal goods. And for legal objects, if you were among the correct people, you got to pick and choose what you liked.”

“Sounds like they’ll be cleaning up this scandal for years,” Breena says.

“That is the optimistic time frame,” Ziva replies.

Abby thinks about that. “How were they covering that up? I mean… Okay, I get a bullet that matches a gun that was supposed to be destroyed…”

“I do not know. My guess is that some time with a file or a mild acid bath would change the marks on a bullet and not effect accuracy that much, but I do not know. Perhaps they had deals that said weapons could only be used outside of the United States. Maybe their Tech guy destroyed all of the files that matched the guns. I’m sure that will all come out as the cases proceed. All I’m doing is trying to find someone who can run their evidence lock up.”

“And once you’ve found someone?” Penny asks.

“I think they will have to hire out or import someone from one of the field branches. But, once that’s in place, then I start working on the second, third, and fourth down in the Accounting Department. Nothing’s getting paid out right now, besides wages. The Auditors are tracking down where the payments are going, and I’m tracking down someone who can run the operation.”

“So, are you on loan from NCIS or are you fully CGIS now?” Jimmy asks.

Ziva shrugs. “I have no idea. The work needs to be done. Leon does not appear to mind loaning me out. We’ll get it sorted out eventually.”

Elaine comes back then, with more coffee, and breakfast for Ducky and Penny, (Oatmeal and fruit cup for Ducky. Whole wheat French Toast for Penny.) which slows down the conversation some. They’re comfortable talking shop at the diner, but some things may not need to be broadcast all over the place.

Though, granted, right now the Coast Guard Debacle is all over every newspaper in the country, so getting quiet because Elaine’s over isn’t exactly top-notch secret-keeping.

Once Elaine heads off, they don’t immediately jump back onto what Ziva’s up to, so Tim says, “So, we’ve got some news.” He’s looking pretty pleased, and then very, very confused when he feels a firm kick to his shin.

From… Ducky?

He’s with it enough not to say, “Ducky, what the hell?” But he does look curiously at him, and Ducky looks back at him with a shut up sort of gesture, and though the rest of the group is wondering what’s going on, Tim shifts direction, trying to think of something that would qualify as ‘good news’ and comes up with, “Abby felt Sean move last night.” No, she didn’t, at all, he’s still about a month too small for that, but it’s the only thing he could come up with.

Tony and Ziva are looking at him, and each other, and Ducky, none of them buying that that’s what’s going on.

“Come on, what’s the secret you don’t want them spilling, Duck?” Tony asks.

“If I wanted you to know about it, I would not have shut up Timothy. You’ll learn in good time, Anthony.”

“Oh, come on! What…”

Ducky just shakes his head. “In good time, and not a minute before.”

At the end of breakfast, there’s this odd dance where Tim, Abby, Jimmy, and Breena all want to know what the hell Ducky was on about, but Tony and Ziva want to find out what it was Tim was going to say.

So, they end up lingering longer and longer over breakfast, and finally Tim says, “Look, I know what I was going to say, but I don’t know what he thought I was going to say, so I need to actually talk to him, okay?” to Tony and Ziva, who don’t look thrilled by that, but nod, and start the trek over to Gibbs’ place.

Once they’re off, in their car, pulling out of the diner parking lot, they’re all staring at Ducky.

“You were going to tell Anthony about the shift in your relationship, correct?”

“Well, yeah. Gibbs and Abbi know. You guys know. They’re the only ones who don’t, so, yes,” Tim says.

Ducky shakes his head. “That’s not a conversation for the whole family, together, in public.”

“Why?” Breena asks.

“Because he will find it uncomfortable and upsetting, and you care for him enough to try and make this easier for him.”

There is that, and there’s this. “And you four are happy and excited, and when he isn’t, this has the potential for exploding into a lot of hurt feelings and anger. So let’s snip the red and blue wires before there’s any shot of an explosion,” Penny says.

“Very poetic, my dear.”

Penny smiles at that. “Thank you.”

Jimmy and Tim are looking confused by that, and the girls aren’t far behind, but Ducky’s the profiler, so…

“Ducky… um…” Jimmy stops for a second because this is a beyond frank bit of conversation, and while they’ve had many of them over the years, they haven’t in front of anyone else. “Tony’s the only one we know for sure has actually done something like this.”

Ducky smiles gently at that. “I’m sure he has. And, like a lot of the things he did when he was younger and acting out in a constant quest for reassurance that he had value, he likely finds it horrendously embarrassing, and he covers that with a lot of bragging and bluster.” Which given how these days Tony doesn’t talk about the Adventures of the DiNozzo Party Machine, that’s likely a good read.

“He was weird when he walked in on us,” Abby says, highlighting at least one situation where Tony was a lot more conservative than they were expecting.

“Okay, yeah, but…” Tim’s not precisely comfortable even hinting at what Tony walked into in front of his very curious looking ultra-feminist grandmother but… “He had reasons for that, beyond just… I mean… Sh…” He sees Molly and Kelly watching him. “Okay, um… He was concerned about some of what he saw, which… uh…”

“We don’t need the details.” Ducky decides to stop that before Tim’s head explodes from intense blushing. “His father was a serial adulterer. He has his own issues with monogamy and sexuality that I’m not going to get into, but I’m sure you can piece together on your own. He also has trouble with things changing. And… though he’s much better about covering it now than he used to be, he’s not comfortable with homosexuality as anything other than an abstract concept that happens in the outside world, either. When you open up to him about this, you are going to be pushing him way beyond the bounds of his comfort zone.”

“Uh…” Tim and Jimmy are both spinning their wheels on this, because, speaking of things you don’t necessarily want to get into with your grandparents.

Jimmy finally takes over, “We’re,” he points to him and Tim, “just, not. It doesn’t work in that direction.”

Tim’s not sure if he should be relieved or annoyed when Ducky looks surprised by that. Penny’s expression could best be categorized as give it some time. Tim’s not sure if that’s annoying, either. They look at each other, having a silent conversation of their own for a moment, and then both of them shrug and Ducky says, “That’s fine. But it is something to keep in mind when you talk to him. This is likely going to open up all of his own history with broken marriages. It will likely touch on his fears. Fear of being unable to be a faithful husband or partner is part of why he spent so long single. When he talks about his father’s marriages, the problem he always brings up is his father’s affairs. If he talks about Ziva’s parents’ marriage or Gibbs’ ex-wives, that’s the issue he brings up. Deep in his mind, that’s what kills marriages. And, though I don’t know, though I do suspect, that goes even deeper for him, beyond just broken relationships. That, on a level he knows, rationally, is wrong, but he still feels in his gut, that’s the cause of his mother’s death.”

Tim winces. “He thinks she ODed. He doesn’t know. He never checked the files. He thinks she was schizophrenic and ODed one day.”

“And what he likely didn’t say is that he thinks how his father treated her exacerbated that issue. He is likely going to have a hard time separating out what you four are doing from what he sees as the thing that rips families apart and destroyed his childhood. Be gentle with him. Tell him in private. And be ready for him not to be supportive or approving, at first.”

They all nod, putting that into their mental files of things coming up, and then Ducky smiles at them, “So, you four are… a quadruple?”

Tim and Jimmy nod, and Abby and Breena are grinning. Abby speaks, “Yeah, we are.” She’s sitting next to Jimmy, and she just about leans in to kiss him, but she notices Elaine hovering at the counter, and shifts that into resting her head on his shoulder, which is an affectionate-Abby, sort of move.

“We’re telling you guys. And Leon. And Sarah. And, maybe some bits of the wider world at some point, but not Breena’s family,” Jimmy adds.

“Tim,” Penny’s got a very soft, comforting look on her face, and her voice is gentle as she asks, “every time we talk, you mother asks about you. Do you want me to…”

Tim shakes his head. “No. Just family, and Leon because it’s one of the rules.”

“This doesn’t need to go wider than that,” Breena says.

“We shall keep your secrets,” Ducky replies, “Though, we are also looking forward to a day, hopefully not long hence, when we can celebrate this as a family.”

Tim smiles at that, and sees the rest of them are, too. “We’d like that, a lot.”

They’ve got a few hours before they’re supposed to be at Gibbs’ place. Normally this would be church time, but… Not this week. Too much stuff they still need to talk about.

This time, they’re back at Breena’s house, and as much as it’s easier to have these sorts of conversations without babies being babies, now’s a pretty good time for it.

He’s sure the rest of them have been thinking about it. It’s been niggling around in Tim’s mind since Ducky said, ‘secrets.’ Niggling since Breena said no condoms.
So, as little girls splash around in the baby pool on the back porch, and they keep an eye on them, all four of them sitting on one of the chaises, Tim says, “So, if we’re keeping your parents out of the loop, how does that work if you’ve got a blonde kid with green eyes?”

“Bigger questions,” Abby asks, “are we…” she’s looking at the guys, who she assumes would be touchier about this than she and Breena are, “okay with this?”

“Are you?” Breena asks. “Tim and I make a baby, is that okay? I’m sorry about putting you,” she’s talking to Tim, “on the spot like that. I just, you know, got really caught up in it last night, and,” she kisses Tim, and he flushes a bit at the pleasure of that, “thanks for having enough functional brain cells to pull back, because right then, I didn’t.”

Tim nods. “Didn’t want to pull back. Really didn’t want to. Nothing gets to me like that does,” he can see Jimmy nodding in agreement. Nothing feels like a woman you love saying, ‘Make a baby with me.’ “I think we’re kind of supposed to be wired that way. But… Not something I’m doing on a whim. Not… not without making sure all of you are okay with it, first. Abby, Jimmy…”

Abby shrugs. “To some degree, I’m on the outside of this. By the time I’m fertile again, I probably won’t be. I’ll be creeping up on forty-five by the time Sean’s done nursing, so… It’s not impossible, but it’s not likely. And by that point, I’d love to have more babies, so I’m not looking any gift horses… gift babies? In the mouth.” She shrugs. “In the eyes? However it happens is good for me. But, look, it’s easier for us. I don’t have in-laws breathing down my neck if one of my kids has hazel eyes and brown curly hair. These days Tim’s hair is dark enough it’ll look like the color’s from him, and if need be I can stop straightening my hair, and that’s where the curls are from, and… Even if your parents got suspicious about it, that’s not the sort of thing they can raise too much of a fuss about because it’s not open or public. People don’t lose their kids for having affairs, and even if Jimmy and I were messing around, that doesn’t blow back on your business.”

Breena nods at that. Yes, if Abby ended up with another version of Molly and Anna, her parents would ask, and her dad would fuss, but it’s not the kind of thing you can take to court.

And if they swapped churches… stopped coming to Sunday dinner… Ed and Jeannie would almost never see Abby’s children.

“How do you feel about Tim and I making a baby?”

Abby shrugs. “I don’t know. Right now, it’s good. It’s great. I love the idea… For you and Tim or me and Jimmy…” Abby’s hands flutter as she tries to put this idea into words beyond happy emotive squeeing. “Something this big, and this important should matter, you know? It should change our world. You make love, and it should last. All this love and pleasure and joy… all of that coalescing into a beating heart. This is everything we feel for each other turned into a person. I love that. That’s,” her fingers caress over Sean, and she looks out at their girls splashing around, “why we did this, right? None of these little ones are ‘Oopses.’ But I am worried about the wider world, and I’m worried about your parents, and… If it was just us in a vacuum, I’d say yes in a heartbeat. But it’s not just us.”

Jimmy’s been listening to this, quietly. Tim knows he’s thinking hard, but not what’s in his head. Breena apparently knows he’s thinking hard, too, “Jimmy?”

He opens his mouth for a second, but nothing comes out, so he takes a quick drink, and starts again. “Before we knew neither of us were carriers of the trisomy gene, we were talking about how we’d have babies. Egg donor, sperm donor, adopt. If it had come down to needing a donor, we would have asked you guys. And, if I’d been the carrier, I would have had a vasectomy, and then we’d have had babies with a donor, might have been you, Tim, and those would have been my kids. That would have been the beginning, middle, and end of it. My kids. The DNA wouldn’t have mattered because of the love and care, and 2:00 AM diaper changes, and burps, and getting peed on, and first steps, and first words, and all the rest of that. We're dads. We know the spurting cum bit of being a dad is the single least important part of the whole thing. So," he leans over and kisses Breena, and then kisses Abby, "no matter what, Breena's kids are mine." He looks away from Breena to Abby and then Tim, "Abby’s kids are yours. And we don’t care what they look like or who donated the DNA unless fifteen years from now they’re looking a little too friendly with each other.

“And if Ed’s got so little tact as to ask about my son who looks like you, we’re making sure that we don’t have another trisomy child.”

They spend a few seconds feeling that, letting it settle, and then Tim smiles at the three of them, because Jimmy's absolutely right. It doesn't matter, at all, which one of them provides the DNA.

Abby's looking at Breena and Tim very carefully, thinking, and then says, “Breena. He'd look a lot like Breena. Fine light hair. They both have that. Tim’s green is dominant over Breena’s blue eyes, but Tim’s got blue-eyed grandparents and parent, so that recessive is in there. Besides the lips, any child of Breena and Tim would probably look a lot like Breena.”

Tim’s listening to that, but not as closely as he could be, there’s something niggling in his head about eye colors and kids that don’t quite match up, and as the other three of them are playing mix and match with potential offspring, Tim feels like he’s on the edge of something.

And then he knows what’s in the back of his head. “Serves that fucker right.” He says it low and hot and the other three of them are now staring at him like he’s grown a second head.

“Tim?” Abby says gently.

“Sarah has brown eyes and hair. She’s always had brown eyes and hair.”

Abby’s eyes go wide, and she starts to laugh, but Breena and Jimmy, who don’t really have much in the way of images of Tim's family don’t get it.

Tim can see they don’t get it. “That son-of-a-bitch. Mom pulled one over on him. She’s got green eyes. He’s got blue eyes. No one in my family, besides Sarah, has brown eyes. No one!”

That gets the other two laughing. “So you’re saying, what? Your mom had a good friend ‘round ‘85?” Jimmy asks.

“We lived on base. Not like there’s any shortage of horny guys on a Naval base.”

Abby giggles a bit at that. “He’s also saying, that, as long as our kids are as observant as he is, they’ll never notice.”

“Yeah, well, if she had that good friend, it was while I was at school. Never woke up with a guy other than my dad at home. I probably would have noticed that.”

Which brings them back to the wider world and keeping this quiet. “Sooner or later they’ll get old enough to figure out that most families only have two grown-ups sleeping together at a time,” Jimmy says.

“So…” Tim sighs. “Two bedrooms at the house, say, stick the bathroom in between so they’re adjoining but not right next to each other, hop from one bed to the next, and make sure we’re up before they are… Or, just treat it like it’s normal and hope they don’t say anything about it at an inappropriate time?”
“Like to Ed or Jeanie,” Abby finishes.

The kicker is, none of them know the answer to that. They know what they want, warm happy mornings where they wake up together and then baby wrangle and all the rest of it. Basic, just another day in ‘paradise,’ family life.

But they don’t know if they can have it.

“You know, I don’t ever remember talking about how my parents slept,” Jimmy says.

“I do. Speculating when I was a teenager about if our parents still had sex,” Abby replies.

“Okay, well, yeah, but… by the time they’re teens they’ll be old enough to get the idea that maybe some things don’t need to get spread around,” Breena adds.

“Which more or less promises they’ll tell everyone they know,” Tim says.

Abby shrugs at that. “Maybe. The more normal this is. The more it’s just how life works for them, the less likely they are to remark on it.”

Jimmy shakes his head. “No way to know. Either we hide it from them, and hope they aren’t too pissed when we finally tell them in two decades/find out on their own, or we let them know and hope they don’t talk to the wrong person. So… how likely is trouble if they know and blab, versus how pissed are they going to be if we spend their entire childhoods lying to them?”

They don’t know the answer to that, either.

“And suddenly Penny and Ducky’s invitation to talk to someone who’s been round the block a whole lot seems worth it’s weight in gold,” Tim says.

Abby grabs her phone. “They offered. Let’s take them up on it.” She hits the contact button and after hellos and are you busy right now, she says, “Did you mean it when you offered to give us advice?”

“Certainly,” Penny replies.

“We’re talking, and we’d like another set of ears on this. Feel like taking a detour to Jimmy and Breena’s before heading over to Jethro’s this afternoon?”

“We can do that. Be there in half an hour or so.”

“Thank you!” Abby hangs up her phone. “And they’ll be here in half an hour or so. I had one more thought on babies…” They look at Abby, waiting for her other thought. “You weren’t planning on trying again until Anna’s a year old. Do you actually want to change that plan, or was that part of getting caught up in it?”

Breena looks sheepish. “That was part of getting caught up. I meant it about not wanting to use a condom the first time.” Tim nods vehemently in agreement with that. He’s entirely on board with that plan. “But, with as sick as I get, pregnant and nursing at the same time isn’t a good plan. Too many calories going out, not enough going in.” They all nod at that. They also all get what she isn’t saying, and that’s she was nursing Molly and pregnant with Jon, and it’s true that the logical brain knows trisomy and possible lack of fetal nutrition aren’t related, the logical brain isn’t always the one doing the thinking. “And… brain in charge… It’s not like I’m aiming for a baby with Tim, if we’re only sleeping together on the weekends, probability says my babies will be Jimmy’s, but come baby making time, whichever one of you does it is fine with me. I’m good with us never finding out. It’ll probably be obvious, but… if it’s not, that’s fine, too.”
That feels really good to Tim. He watches Jimmy, who looks comfortable with this. He's thinking it's probably a good idea for them to talk about this with just each other, make sure they're both really good, but, right now, everyone is looking cool.

“So… how to tell Tony? Is that up next?” Abby asks.

“Probably. How about we don’t tank Gibbs’ first day home?” Jimmy says.

“That sounds like a decent plan,” Breena says with a sardonic nod.

“So… invite them over for dinner tomorrow?” Abby says. “That’s private and gentle, right?”

“When was the last time you invited them over for dinner, just them, on a week night? He’ll be jittery all day. The ominous thunder cloud hangs on the horizon, looming over everything. He’s going to think someone’s dying,” Breena says.

“Morgue is private. Next time he’s down…” Jimmy sees the other three wince.

“He’s going to be badgering us left and right all night, tonight,” Tim says.

“So, first off, damage control. What’s our good news?” Breena asks.

“Uh…” Tim snaps onto a quick idea, “Whatever the hell it is that Ducky knows about Gibbs.”

Abby shakes her head. “You said, ‘we’ve got good new.’”

“Damn. Ummm…”

“Tech him.” Jimmy says. “You got some new spiffy computer stuff. We means Cybercrime, and you just start spouting random words and letters, his eye’s’ll glaze over, and we’re good.”

Tim nods. That’ll more than work. Tony immediately stops listening to the tech stuff by the third sentence. “And Ducky thought I was going to spill Gibbs’s secret… He’ll want to know what it is, and I’ll be able to honestly say I’ve got no idea. Then we can focus on pressing Gibbs.”

That would work. Not perfect, but… good enough. “Tomorrow, or whenever there isn’t a case, one of us’ll call him down for lunch, and we’ll tell him then,” Jimmy says. “No looming cloud of doom in that case. We grab lunch the three of us every week or so… And you two tell Ziva… whenever it’s good?”

Abby nods at that. “They’ve got their first OB appointment on Monday, so we’ll make the date to snag her away from Abbi on Tuesday, and if the case Gods are kind, you’ll grab Tony the same day, possibly for the same reason, and we let them know quiet and gentle.”

“Ziva will be okay? Right?” Breena asks.

Jimmy shrugs. “We thought Tony would be. Maybe he will be, but… We’re okay with it, so maybe we’re seeing that in everyone else?”

“I think she’ll be okay. She’s the one who asked us if we were together in the first place,” Abby says. “And she didn’t seem bothered or disgusted, mostly just curious about the idea.”

“When was that?” Jimmy asks.

“Years ago.” Breena thinks. “Second anniversary clubbing.”
“That’s before we,” Jimmy means him and Breena, “even talked about this.”

Breena nods. “Her asking is what got me thinking about it. Thinking about it got me talking to Abby, and from there…”

“So, we need to get Ziva a thank you gift?” Tim says with a smile.

Jimmy laughs. “Oh, I can just see that. Into the florist I go, ‘So, um, yeah. I want a bouquet that says, thanks for giving my wife the idea that we should marry our best friends. Umm… what would that be? Lilies?’”

They’re laughing at that idea when Ducky and Penny show up.

After hello hugs, and a quick shift from girls in the baby pool to girls in the living room getting dried off and dressed to go to Gibbs’, they lay out their quandary of discreet, but what do the kids know to Penny and Ducky, looking a bit nervous and in need of guidance. Ducky looks to Penny, who nods briefly, and then says, “Timothy Raphael McGee, did I forget something, or are you the Director of Cybercrime for NCIS?”

“I thought you didn’t have a middle name,” Jimmy says, staring at Tim, confused.

Tim flashes him his You want to do this, now? look, but Jimmy’s still looking curious and Breena and Ducky apparently want some background on how Timothy No Middle Name McGee appears to actually have one. “I don’t. It’s my confirmation name.” He knows he’s getting grilled on that later, but to make sure later stays later he says, “Yeah, Director of Cybercrime, Penny, so?”

She arches an eyebrow, and says dryly, “And, am I incorrect in assuming judges are assigned to cases by a computer?”

In retrospect that was a blindingly obvious bit of information.

“If Ed so much as breathes wrong, you four will stand up, form a wall, and shut his ass down. You will fight for your family using every tool at your disposal, and between the four of you, you have a considerable box of tools to pick from. And, if, somehow, you cannot run him off by power of will alone, along with a direct threat to his family’s livelihood, you will make sure the judge who gets your case is hand-selected and that judge will toss this case before it ever sees the light of day.”

Ducky nods in assent. “Rule number one. No matter what, we will close ranks to protect our family, and that includes any possible threat to the children. If worst came to absolute worst, you would know about anyone moving against you before they took the first step, and among other things, between the four of you, you have not inconsiderable wealth, the ability to create new identities, someone with a means of getting you out of the country that does not require you to purchase tickets or set any sort of visible plan in motion. No matter what might happen or how it may work out, Ed, and any threat he or anyone like him may bring, holds no power over you. The only question is, are you the kind of people who will stand up and tell him directly to ‘fuck off’ if that is what needs to happen?”

“No shame,” Tim says it quietly, but Jimmy immediately gets the reference, too.

“Exactly,” Ducky replies. “It is good to be cautious, and discreet. The wider world does not need to know about this, and I can imagine that you’d prefer not to antagonize your parents, Breena, but do not let that fear shape your world or limit your options.”

Penny takes over. “Will your kids talk? Maybe. Will it be a problem if they do? Maybe. Given the structure you’re talking about where you maintain separate homes, they likely won’t twig to anything being odd until they’re old enough to know not to talk about it. Will spending decades lying to them be a problem? Absolutely. Do not break trust with them. They’re people, small ones, true, but just like everyone else you’ve ever met, ‘I lied to you to protect you’ will go exactly nowhere with them. You grew up in a house filled with lies,” no one needs clarification to tell she’s talking to Tim, “and it was a disaster. Don’t do it to your kids.”

They nod at that.

“Speaking of lies…” Tim says to his grandmother. “Um, so we’re talking, about kids, and how… some of my kids might not look much like me, and some of Jimmy’s kids might not look much like him,” he can see from the look on her face that Penny knows where he’s going with this, but she won’t fill in the blanks either. So Tim says, “Sarah has brown eyes.”

Penny nods. “I have noticed that. So has Ducky,” who also nods.

Tim waits a beat and Penny still doesn’t offer anything. “Does The Admiral know?”

“I cannot imagine he did not at some point notice.”

“But he didn’t divorce Mom.”

Penny shakes her head. “Nope. Tim, just like you may eventually have some children that don’t look like you, I have a granddaughter who doesn’t look like me. That has in no way changed the fact that she is my granddaughter. And, short of you or her needing a bone marrow transplant,” because the highest possible chance of a match is between full siblings, “I do not see any possible circumstance where how she got those brown eyes matters.”

Tim hears that, and understands what she’s saying, and what she isn’t saying, as well. “But you and Ducky have an idea as to that, don’t you?”

Ducky smiles at that. “Of course we do. We have a great many ideas about a great many things, none of which need to be repeated to anyone outside of the two of us. However, if you are madly curious, you do know someone who can sequence DNA, so it would not take too much time or effort for any questions you may have to be answered.”

Tim takes that as a definitive mind your own business, and pulls back.

Abby gets Kelly’s foot tucked into her little sneaker, and with that she says, “And I think we are ready to head off to Gibbs’.”

“Good. And, will you be talking to Tony?” Ducky asks.

“Yes, but not about this, not today. It’ll hold for when we aren’t getting Gibbs home,” Jimmy says. Ducky nods at that. “Wise.”
Gibbs is ready to go home. He’s beyond ready to go home. Yes, he’s been in a very good mood, especially for him, and definitely for him in the hospital, but that doesn’t mean he wants to be here a second longer than he has to be.

He’s up, out of his bed, sitting down in one of the armchairs, messing with his new phone, dressed in real clothing, and ready to get out of here NOW.

But he can’t leave until he gets the OK from the Docs, and apparently, having heard that he was supposed to be discharged today every Doctor in the greater DC region bugged the hell out, and it’s just him, and Abbi, and a horde of nurses who keep telling him the Doc will be in soon.

Finally, some high school kid in scrubs and lab coat shows up, claiming to be one of the surgeons who worked on him, making Gibbs feel seventy million years old, but, right now, he doesn’t care if Doogie over there really is a doctor or not as long as he lets him out of the hospital. And he does. But, like everything else, it’s slow. Doogie makes him get out of the real clothing, for one last checkup. (Supposedly the one this morning, the reason he got into real clothing, in the first place, was ‘the last one.’) He gets gently poked and touched while Doogie makes some thoughtful sounds about how he’s doing.

Then comes paperwork. These guy need Tim to show up and beat their paperwork system into shape. Gibbs’s signing the stack of release forms, as well as he can, his right arm doesn’t want to do much of anything, and of course, he’s a righty, as the Doc drones on and on about what he’s supposed to be doing with himself when he leaves.

Gibbs can see it’s in the paperwork, and Abbi’s listening, so he’s not paying too much attention.

Unfortunately, apparently Doogie noticed he wasn’t paying too much attention and starts, apparently from the beginning, as soon as Gibbs looks up from signing the last form.

“Take it easy. Nothing strenuous. And for God’s sake,” the Doc gets up, grabs the 02 canister that’s on the opposite side of the room from Gibbs, “keep this nearby! It’s good to see you don’t need it right this second, but that does not mean it should be out of arm’s reach for you. Your oxygen levels drop too low, and you can be unconscious on the floor before you can grab this, so keep it close.”

Gibbs nods, taking the canister in hand, and thinking as soon as he gets home, he’s got to see if Tim can find him a smaller one, maybe something the size of a pepper spray canister, because he can’t see lugging this fire extinguisher looking thing every single place he goes.

“You’ve got a follow up appointment next week, and if you start a fever, feel achy beyond the sore of the surgery, you get to a hospital fast. You’re missing a chunk of your lung, so you cannot afford to have any sort of infection on top of that.”

More nodding.

The Doc goes over his pain meds, and Gibbs’s mostly listening, and he explains how he’s supposed to just rest for at least a week, and after the follow up they can talk more about really moving around, and as he’s wrapping that up, it occurs to Gibbs that there is some moving around he’d really like to do when he gets home.

Gibbs looks at Abbi, who’s also been carefully listening to this, smiles at her quickly, and then says, “What about sex?”

The Doc licks his lips and looks at Gibbs for a second, something that appears to be saying, good to see you’ve still got it in you. Gibbs glares at him. He’s old and hurt, not dead.

“Once again, take it easy, keep your oxygen nearby, and don’t mess around if you have a hard time breathing. You know the signs of a heart attack and a stroke?” The Doc seems to be asking Abbi almost as much as Gibbs.

She raises an eyebrow at that, and Gibbs eyes go wide. Yeah, he does, but he was hoping it wasn’t going to be that dangerous. “You’ve just had major surgery. You exert yourself too hard, at anything, you might throw a clot and stroke out. So, slow, gentle, easy. That’s going to be as true for sex as for walking to kitchen to get a drink.

“You are on major painkillers, so your sense of touch is dulled down. Remember you’ve got three two inch spans of plastic mesh where you used to have ribs from where that bullet hit you. We had to pull aside or cut all the muscles between two more of them, then spread them apart, breaking the edges at the front and back where your ribs come together so we could do the work that saved the top two lobes of your lungs. Don’t let anyone lean against your chest.”

Gibbs nods at that, he’s been on his side or sitting up as much as he can, because just the weight of his own body leaning against his ribs aches, so someone else… Nope.

“If it weighs more than five pounds, someone else picks it up for you, and honestly, if it weighs less than five pounds and there’s someone else handy, have them pick it up for you.”

“So, now’s a bad time to ask you when I can go back to working construction?”

The Doc laughs out loud.

“Take it you’ve got some plans for when we get home?” Abbi asks as she opens the car door for Jethro. He’s not loving that, but it does weigh more than five pound and his ribs really don’t like the idea of the effort involved in that, plus the seventy foot walk from the wheel chair they wouldn’t let him leave the hospital without to Abbi’s car has him out of breath. Still this little, lizard brained, male part of him hates standing there while she does it.

But he does like the question. So he kisses her, gently, and then sits down in the passenger seat. “Got some hopes,” he says with a big smile as she closes the door.

“Got a bunch of people who are going to be there when we get home, too.”

Gibbs nods. He knows that, and he’s looking forward to seeing them. And he’s looking forward to them going home, too. Then he smiles again. “Won’t stop me from thinkin’ about it.”

“Be good, don’t tire yourself out too much, and maybe you’ll get to do more than think.” Abbi says, deadpan, and then looks at him with a grin.

Gibbs grins at that, too.

Mona hears the car pull up before the rest of the party does. Everyone else is at Gibbs house, getting ready for him to come home, talking, joking, having a good time. But when she makes a ninety mile an hour beeline straight to the front door, barking at it, everything stops.

Abby’s got the sense to grab Mona before Gibbs gets to the front porch, because as soon as she hears his footsteps she’s trying to bound through the door to him.

They hear “Take it someone’s looking forward to seeing me,” as Abbi opens the door and Mona tries to leap out of Abby’s grasp to knock Gibbs over with slobbery kisses.

She doesn’t get free, and Gibbs shuffles over to her, looking at Abby, letting her know not to let go, and then kneels down and pets Mona all over with his head pressed to her neck. “I’m home. You’ve got to be gentle with me, okay? Can’t be jumping up on me anytime soon.” Ecstatic barking marks Mona’s response. “I missed you, too.” After a few more minutes of “Good girl!” and petting, Abby’s able to let Mona go without her leaping up onto Gibbs, and then he moves away, and she follows, right at his knee, as he goes into the house to get hugs from everyone else.

Hugs from everyone else also means that Molly gets basically the exact same ‘no leaping on Uncle Jethro’ lecture Mona just did, though Molly, at twenty-seven pounds, weighs less than a third of what Mona does.

Eventually, he’s been hugged and kissed and petted, and he’s sitting down at the head of the table, food all over it, home with his family for Sunday dinner.

After supper, little girls are looking droopy, so naptime for them. Tim and Jimmy head up to take care of that. Mona would normally go up with them, make sure they do it right, then keep watch on the girls, but her Gibbs is home so she’s not going more than two feet away from him.
Tim’s gotten to the point where he can, maybe not easily, but at least without any pain, get Kelly picked up, carried upstairs, cleaned up, and ready to lie down, and since he finally can do that again, he is, pretty much any chance he can.

The only hurdle left to clear is tubby time, and that’s not going to happen for a few more months. No one thinks it’s a good idea to have him with slower than average reflexes while both he and Kelly are on a wet, slippery surface.

He’s still looking forward to being able to do it again.

Like with any naptime where all three of them are in one room, he and Jimmy linger outside, quietly making sure they really go down. They’re used to sleeping together, and at Gibbs’ place, so this isn’t completely new, but it’s been an exciting morning for them, so spending a bit of time to insure they actually nap is worth it.

And, it’s also good for the two of them. They haven’t gotten any time together, alone, since last night, and checking in seems like a good plan.

Granted, everyone is downstairs, so it’s a very quiet, mostly non-verbal sort of checking in. A ‘Can we still sit here quietly and be good with each other?’ sort of checking in.

And they can. As they’re sure the girls are asleep, Jimmy gives Tim a hand up, and for a second after that, he holds Tim’s hand, thumb gently stroking over the back. Tim nods at that, it feels nice, and gently squeezes Jimmy’s hand in return.

And from there they head down to rejoin the welcome home party.

“Soooo…” Tony’s sidled up to Tim. He looks right, he looks left, Gibbs is talking to Ducky, on the other side of the room, and they aren’t paying any attention to them. “Quick, what didn’t he want to get out?”

Tim tries to look frustrated. “I don’t know. I told him what I was about to say, he stared at me said, ‘Oh,’ and that was it. I couldn’t get what he thought it was out. Probably whatever it is Gibbs is scheming about.”

“So, you don’t know?” Tony also seems to think that if Gibbs has something in the works, Tim would know about it.

“Hasn’t told me. Anyway, I wanted to say, we got the okay for the expansion of our IRQ units, which means the Rota office will be getting through its crypto-breaking fifteen percent faster.”

Tony nods, eyes glazing as Tim keeps telling him about how the IRQs supposed to work. Tim sees it and internally smirks. There’s no such thing as an IRQ, but Tony’s doing his usual routine upon having piles of technical information dumped on him.

Then Jimmy looks over, sees the two of them chattering away. He’s close enough to see, but not really hear, so he quickly decides that Tim might need some rescuing on the ‘what’s today secret front’ and pipes up with, “Tim’s got a middle name!” glee in his voice. (Or he might just want to tell. He’s got a somewhat smug grin on his face right now.)
Okay, on a pure tactical level, Tim gets this. Tony’s jumped on this like it’s a nail biter of an Ohio State game. After this, he’s not even going to remember Ducky whacked him in the shin to get him to shut up about something.

On a everyone knows about Raphael level, he’s less than thrilled.

“I do not have a middle name, James Milton.”

Jimmy whips around to stare at Tim, no idea he knew that about him. “How do you…”

“It’s on your driver’s license.”

“Did you go through my wallet?” Jimmy looks appalled at that idea.

“Yeah, when you tossed it to me and told me to pay for dinner, like two years ago. You were playing with Molly and didn’t want to deal with the delivery guy. Saw the M on the credit card and was curious.”

Jimmy does actually remember that, so he switches to defense on Milton. “Hey, I didn’t pick that for myself! That’s how confirmation names work, right? You pick them.”

Tony’s glowing at this. “I can’t believe I didn’t think of that. Of course, you’ve got a middle name. All of us who grew up in Catholic families have at least one.”

“Confirmation names?” Ziva asks. By now the whole crew is completely focused on this conversation.

“If you’re Catholic, you’re born into the church, but when you’re seven or so, you’ve got to reaffirm that you’re part of it. So, you take some classes, prove you know enough Catechism to pass the test, and then you get to fully join the Church. Usually there’s a big party, and you get a new name to signal that something’s changed. Like of like a Bar Mitzvah, but usually younger,” Tony explains to Ziva.

“What’s yours?” Ziva asks. Somehow, none of them had felt the need to explain this aspect of growing up Catholic previously, so Ziva had been completely in the dark about it.

“I thought you didn’t like Star Wars,” Abby says.

“I was confirmed before it came out. Just dumb luck that every guy on Earth picked it two years later. So, McDevious, what’s this name you’ve been hiding from us.”

“I did not hide it! None of you, except Abby, has ever asked what my Confirmation name was, and when she asked, I told. Likewise, I do not have a middle name. My birth certificate says Timothy McGee on it, and that’s all. So, I have never lied about that, either.”

“Half of us didn’t grow up with confirmation names and didn’t know to ask,” Gibbs says, “So get talkin’, Elflord.”

Tim rolls his eyes. “Just, remember, I was a kid. And you’re supposed to pick the name of a saint or angel. And… Okay, The Admiral had some picks he really wanted me to take, patron saints of sailors, and I didn’t want them.” Didn’t want them, and since he’d have rather died than spend time on a boat, he didn’t think St. Nicholas or St. Brandon, the patron saints of sailors would want anything to do with him, either. “So, I talked to our priest about what I did want, and he had a suggestion, and I liked it better than Nicholas or Brandon, so… Raphael. The healer.”

Everyone’s quiet for a second, and then Gibbs shrugs. “That kind of build up, I was expecting Jedidiah or something like that. Hokey and Old Testament.”

Tim raises his eyebrow at Jethro on the idea that he’d say something about a name being ‘hokey and Old Testament.’ But, like with Milton, Jethro didn’t pick his own name.

And Tony’s looking amused, and like he’s thinking, but… he’s not coming up with anything, and suddenly Tim’s thanking God and all that’s good and or holy because when he was a kid Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles were popular, but by then Tony was an adult, in college or something, and probably missed the whole thing.

And for a second, that feels good, until he catches both Jimmy and Abbi, who are grinning at each other, and softly humming the Teenage Mutant Ninja theme, as Abbi quietly says, “Heroes in a half-shell.”

Jimmy’s shaking with giggles by that point, and manages to gasp out, “Turtle power!”

This, of course, has everyone focused on them, and Jimmy and Abbi explain the wonder that was the Teenage Ninja Mutant Turtles, which means Tony’s got new nicknames for the next million years, and Tim glares at Penny, and says, very dryly, “Thanks, Grandma.”

She smiles back at him. “It’s a good name. It matched who you wanted to be, and has been used by great men. And,” she smiles a bit, lips starting to quiver with a giggle “apparently, one great mutant ninja turtle, too.”

Tim stares at the ceiling, then looks back at the rest of the family, nodding, voice filled with dry sass, “I’m killing all of you assholes in your sleep.”

“Gonna show off your ninja moves,” Jimmy says, nudging Tim’s shoulder with his own.

“Oh yeah, and you’re first.”

“Uh huh.” Jimmy nods slowly, not looking terrified on any level. Of course, Tim’s kidding, but he could at least try to look terrified. “He’s getting sulky. Someone find some pizza.”

Tim glares at Jimmy and then smiles. “You know, you seem to know a whole hell of a lot about this.”

“Of course! Watched it on TV every day. So did she.” He looks to Abbi, and she nods. “And I assume you. Everyone who’s our age did. I was at the movie on opening night.”

Ziva’s been watching this whole thing, mostly with a look of immense curiosity on her face, and finally she says, “What is a Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtle? How can turtles be ninjas? The shells…” Abby gives her a googled picture of the Rafael on her phone, (the Michael Bey version) and Ziva stares at it in horror.

“This is what you watched on television as children?”

Tim, Jimmy, and Abbi, who are all within two years of age of each other, all nod. (With mental images of the cartoon ‘80s version in their heads. Were they to see the Bey version, they’d be appalled, too.)

“How did you ever sleep? I would have had nightmares for years at this!” Ziva’s eyes are wide, and she can’t believe this is appropriate entertainment for children.

“Abby…” Tim’s asking as he scoots over and sees what’s on that phone. “Good Lord, yeah. No! That’s… I don’t know what that thing is.” He grabs the phone and finds the right sort of mutant ninja turtle, which is a cute, almost cuddly, or at least as cuddly as a turtle can be, little ball of pizza and snark.

Ziva sees the cartoon version of them, nodding, looking relieved, and Tim points out which one is Rafael.

“I loved April,” Abbi says, “There were only two red-heads on TV and the other one, Daphne, was too girly. Couldn’t ever see myself in a little purple dress with perfect hair. But, April, an investigative reporter who fights crime with the turtles, she rocked.”

Ziva’s still looking through the pictures on Abby’s phone. “What is this brain-looking thing?”

Apparently, attempting to explain Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles was a very pleasant way to spend an afternoon.

It’s not late, at all. Like with some of the previous Shabboses they didn’t bother with waiting for sunset. The spirit of the thing matters much more than the timing. And an early night for Gibbs, who is looking awfully tired, seemed like a good plan to everyone involved. (Except for, maybe, Gibbs, who’s looking annoyed to be this tired at 4:30 in the afternoon.)

There’s the usual getting ready to go hoopla, made a bit less by the fact that at least right now little girls don’t need warm weather gear, but Tony and Ziva, and Ducky and Penny have said goodbye to everyone and pulled out long before Tim and Abby, or Jimmy and Breena, have collected all of the baby stuff and babies into their respective cars.

Of course, it’s also possible that both Palmer and McGee families were taking a bit longer than was strictly necessary to take care of that. They might have decided that having a full on heart to heart with Tony about what was up with them was a bad plan now, but they do want Gibbs and Abbi to know that their relationship has shifted.

There are many words, many ways to describe it, or lay it out, or they could just go for direct and simple. So, as with any gathering where they’re saying goodbye for the night, they wrap with hugs and usually the guys will kiss the girls on the cheek, but this time Tim hugs Breena and full on kisses her on the lips, and that seems to get the message across just fine.

They trade goodbye hugs and kisses, and by the time they’re done, Abbi and Gibbs are both grinning at them.

“I take it you figured it out?” Gibbs asks.

“Yeah, we did,” Breena says. “One day soon, they’ll grab you and fill you in on all the details.”

Gibbs looks uncomfortable at the idea of details, and Tim sees it. “Who we’re telling, stuff like that. Not details.”

Gibbs nods. Then he thinks about the timing on this, and the easy way they’re standing around with each other, comfortable, casual touch that they weren’t doing when Tony and Ziva were there. He’s got his arm around Abbi’s waist, and Jimmy’s doing something very similar with both Abby and Breena. The kind of easy contact couples, or, apparently quadruples, share.

“Tony and Ziva?”

“Not yet,” Jimmy says. “Ducky suggested we do that one on one.”

Gibbs nods at that, too. “Good plan.” Abbi seconds that, “Very good plan.” Unlike the rest of this group, she’s been hit on by Tony a few times, as well as got to hear about his ideal woman for Gibbs, (who might have had more than a few shades of his idea woman for him, tossed in there) and has a decent sense of where his lines are now, and much less of a sense of where his lines used to be.

Tim hugs Gibbs. “Okay, enough of this. You’re ready to drop. Sleeping time. Healing up. I’ll stop by for lunch tomorrow if I can swing it.”

Tim catches something in Gibbs’ eye on that, but Gibbs says, “Fine,” before starting to say goodbye to everyone.

So, more hugs, more kisses, and then Tim and Abby are in their car, heading to their home, with Jimmy and Breena in their car, heading to their home, and the weekend is, more or less, over.

“Quick honeymoon,” Abby says.

“Too quick. We’ve got to do something about that.”

Abby smiles. “Breena and I are already on it.”

Tim’s pleased to hear that, but a bit surprised they didn’t say anything. Though given it’s been less than ten hours and they’ve been doing a lot of other stuff… “Were you going to surprise us?”

“Not exactly. Wanted to make sure we could track down baby watchers for a long weekend before getting everything set.”

“That’s what that text was!” Halfway through dinner, Abby had gotten a text from someone, seen it, grinned, quickly texted back, and then tucked her phone away.

“Yeah. Asked Sarah if she could take Kelly for a long weekend on the 17\textsuperscript{th}, and she said yes.”

“Cool.” Tim thinks for a moment as he’s watching the traffic around them. “Why not the 10\textsuperscript{th}? He knows why next weekend doesn’t work, they’re getting Abbi moved. He doesn’t know why the weekend after that doesn’t work.

“Think about it for a moment.”

It’s clear from Abby’s voice this is something he’s supposed to be able to figure out, but it’s not making itself immediately clear. “I’m not getting it. No babysitting?”

“If right now is fertile weekend, two weeks from now will be period weekend. She usually starts on Sundays, but we’d like to get a four day weekend and have all four days.”

Tim’s nodding, feeling a bit silly for not coming up with that. Though the Sunday comment explains why he hasn’t seen Jimmy and Breena period sex, yet, which is likely why it didn’t occur to him. It’s not that he’s got a problem with menstrual sex, but it does limit things to some degree, and especially if Breena, like Abby, gets crampy and finds deep sex uncomfortable the first two days, it limits things a lot. He’d rather have the full list of options available, and he’s assuming the other three would, too.

“Come on, up you get.” Abbi’s got a gentle arm around Gibbs’ waist. He is tired, and breathing harder than she wants to see. “Naptime and some O2.”

He doesn’t glare at that, but he’s not thrilled, too. And with the kids gone, he’s willing to lean a bit more heavily on her.

“Yeah, I know that look. I’d rather you didn’t feel this way, too. Come on.”

He nods and they start the trek up to his room.

Being back in his bed feels good. Seeing her pillows on her side of his bed feels even better. Slipping in between her sheets is excellent. Trying to find a comfortable position, and getting used to not having a bed that raises and lowers itself as well as inclines, is a less awesome experience, but he does, eventually, get himself on his side, O2 cannula in his nose, more pain meds in his system, and by that point he’s just about unconscious.

But, just about isn’t the same thing as fully there, so he reaches over, and squeezes her hand. “You’ll be here when I wake up?”

Abby gently strokes his cheek, fingers skirting over the O2 tube. “That’s what come home and stay forever means, right?”

He smiles at her, “Yeah. It does.”

“You get a nap. Eventually we’ll have dinner and get you a shower, and if you’re feeling up for anything after that, there may be some sex.”

He really smiles at that, and then pulls her hand to his lips to kiss her palm.

Tim and Abby are getting ready for bed, doing the usual brush teeth, get undressed, put the day aside and move onto sleepy thoughts, routine.

And like usual, Tim’s in their bathroom, naked, brushing his teeth.

What isn’t usual is he’s feeling quite contemplative. He’s looking at himself in the mirror, and he looks pretty much exactly the same way he did this morning, and yesterday morning, and the morning before that.

He doesn’t expect to look different. But to some degree he feels like he should.

“You’re right, you know,” he says to Abby, who may be sensitive and definitely knows him better than anyone else on earth, but is not in fact a mind reader, so she’s pleased to hear she’s right, but she doesn’t know about what.

“Good. What am I right about this time?”

“You do something like this, and it should change your world. When you’re touched by hands that love you, it should mark you. I look the same, but I don’t feel the same.” He finishes with his teeth, and turns from the mirror to her. “I did this, something like it, the when we got together, staring at myself, trying to see my body through your eyes, feeling you on my skin and in my heart and all of the rest of it.” He touches the cuff tattoo. “And I wear that burned into my skin, because it matters. Because it changed who I am, so it should show.”

She’s smiling gently at him. He takes another step closer, wrapping his arms around her, and resting his head against her shoulder. For a moment, he stands there, holding on, smelling her skin, feeling her body warm against his, very aware of her life and his and their love, and the life growing inside of her. Very aware of how these feelings move through them and shift their world.

“I do want to do something that marks this. Something that can’t be changed or forgotten or removed.”

Abby’s beaming up at him. “Tattoo ideas?”

“Yeah, a few. For me. I’d love something for all four of us, but I know it’s a bad idea for Jimmy, and I don’t know if Breena’d want one.”

Abby nods along at that. “That’s why I said I was in favor of rings. If Jimmy could get one, I’d be all over another matching tattoo, for the four of us. As it is, just on me, I’d love to get two more sets of lips.”

“Ohhhh.” Tim grins at her. “I like that! What are you thinking?”

“I’ve got your lips on my throat, love to have Jimmy’s on one wrist and Breena’s on the other.”

Tim’s still smiling. “Wrists?”

“We do go swimming sometimes, so… first choice, inner thighs, might cause some talk, especially if they aren’t matching lips.”

Tim likes that idea, too. “Have them kiss each other each time you cross your legs.”

Abby giggles at that.

“Put ‘em up high enough and have them kiss you.” He’s got a big grin as he says that.

She giggles at that, also, and then winces when she thinks about how healing up from that would go and how much of a massive kink having two healing wounds, one on each inner thigh, burning and itching, for weeks, would put in her, and by extension, Tim’s sex-life. “Uh, no.”

He thinks about it and figures out why she winced. “Wrists, huh?”

She nods. Wrists are safe.

Then reality shifts back again. “Are your lab rats going to ask why you aren’t wearing your cuffs and whose lips those are?”

Abby sighs. “Yeah. Damn it…” Her eyes narrow at that.
“Maybe next weekend, after we’ve got Abbi all moved in, we’ll get out the lip tars and put kisses all over you, see where you like that won’t get too many questions.” Abby perks up at that. Tim kneels and gently kisses the underside of her breast. “That’s not obvious.”

She laughs. “The healing up on that’ll kill me.”

“We’ll find somewhere.”

Abby definitely enjoys the idea of how that challenge will go. “What are you thinking? For you.”

He nods at their bed heading to it, and she wraps up with her teeth quickly, then joins him on their bed. He’s sitting back against the headboard, legs stretched out in front of him, fingers resting lightly on the dragon on his calf. The dragon she designed for him. The visual image of the guy he’s become. It’s a green dragon, mostly the light, warm-toned green of his eyes, but there are darker forest green scales on the belly and wings. It’s European-style, crouched on its back legs, wings high, tail curled around its legs. It’s eleven inches from feet to uppermost wing tip, and takes up the left half of his leg. Next to it, starting at the feet and looping his leg to the dragon’s tail, is the first band of knotwork.

Kelly’s band. It’s a ribbon of green and gold that twists and turns over itself in an eternity knot. No beginning, no end, just a long flow of colors that make up the start of what will, eventually be a full calf tattoo.

He strokes over the first band, the one that represents Kelly. The dragon is eleven inches long, so, assuming he keeps the bands small, there’s room for a lot of them. Kelly’s is about two inches wide. There needs to be some space between them, so, if he keeps the rest to an inch/inch and a half…

“You know I’m adding one of these for each of our children, and when we’re done, the idea is to add a band to the middle,” between the kids’ bands, “for us.”

She nods.

“In my mind, the middle band was a wide two strand knot. One color for each of us.”

“Okay.”

“I’m thinking of adding a band for Molly and Anna, and any other children Jimmy and Breena have, in addition to our children.” Abby’s smiling. She likes that idea. “And, instead of one two-strand knot in the middle, how about two four-strand knots at the top and bottom, capping the whole thing?”

“Tim, that sounds awesome.”

“You’re good with Molly and Anna on there?”

Abby nods.

“And… really… you’re good with the idea of some kids who may be Breena and I?”

“You good with some kids that might be Jimmy and I?” she counters with.

“Yeah.” He’s looking at his leg, but thinking of the girls, and Sean, and Jon who they never got to properly meet. “Yeah. I am.”

“Me, too.”
He’s still looking at his leg. “Do I put a knot on for Jon? Is that, good, or… too sad?”

“I think it’s good. They both wear his diamonds. I think they’d be touched that you remembered him.”

Tim nods at that. He seen the tiny flash of light that comes off of Jimmy’s medic alert bracelet when he moves his hand in the right direction, and the small diamond solitaire necklace Breena never takes off. The image of them in his mind is quite clear. Jon’s diamonds aren’t white. They’re a smoky gray-blue, and Tim’s thinking that’ll be the color of his knot.

He looks up at Abby. “So, all I need now is about twenty free hours to get it all done!”

Abby laughs at that. “Little by little, you know.”

Tim nods. “Yep.” Abby’s snuggled up next to him, lightly stroking the dragon on his calf. He shifts around a bit, and then kisses her, wondering if touching her after Jimmy has would feel different, or is there’ll be some sense of reclaiming her, or something…

But there isn’t. It’s Abby. His wife and love, and it’s her skin against his, and again he remembers Jimmy saying something about how he kissed Breena for the first time and nothing changed. How it didn’t make them any less. Abby’s kneeling between his legs, and he’s got his hand curled around her neck as they kiss.

Jimmy was wrong, everything’s changed. The world is different today than it was yesterday.

And he’s right. Everything changing hasn’t made him and Abby any less. He hasn’t lost anything. She’s still his, and he’s still hers, and nothing about them became less, but their whole world just gained a universe of more.

Love isn’t a zero sum game, and he doesn’t have to love Abby any less in order to love Breena and Jimmy more, and he knows they couldn’t have done this faster, that they did need the time to make sure they were okay, but he’s wishing he could have figured it out sooner, because love may be infinite, but his time on Earth isn’t, and he wants every minute of this life that he can possibly get.

Gibbs wakes up, sore and a little disoriented. It takes him a second to figure out that he’s back in his own bed, and the tapping noise next to him is Abbi working on her computer.

“Good nap?” she asks, as he blinks himself awake.

“Yeah. Weird dreams.”

She looks at him curiously.

“Don’t really remember, just felt like they were silly while they were happening.” He slowly starts to lift himself up, and once again wishes he had the sort of bed that inclines for him.

Abbi gives him a hand at that, helping him get the pillows behind his back. Once he’s up he says, “Working hard?”

She wiggles her hand indicating so-so. “Annoying, not hard. I’m writing up a briefing to our Union Reps who are screaming about how many people I’ve got on leave right now.”
“Not thrilled with guilty until proven innocent?”

“Not at all. If it wasn’t for the fact that I’ve got so many of them banned right now, I think they’d be threatening a strike.”

Gibbs quirks an eyebrow.

“At my office I’ve got six out of ten of them gone already. Nine out of ten on anything sensitive. Not like saying goodbye to the others will matter all that much. I’m already moving at a glacial pace.”

He sighs and rubs her shoulder.

She exhales, and flashes him her, I’m done with this shit look. “Start moseying toward the shower. By the time you get in there and the water on, I’ll have this wrapped up.”

Hot shower sounds great to Gibbs, so he unhooks the O2 tube, or starts to, but she gives him a little glare, so he leave it in place, and begins his mosey.

_____________________________________________________

Warm, humid air does make it easier to breathe, so that feels good. After a few breaths he takes off the tube and tentatively tries to breathe as deep as he can. His lungs and ribs tell him to stop that before he gets to anything that might be called a decent breath.

It takes Abbi a bit longer than she anticipated, so Gibbs takes a moment on his own to really see what happened to him. His shoulder feels tight, and hot, and sore, and swollen, and all of that is true. The divot on his delt has been sewed into a small, tidy scar, but the flesh under it looks like someone took an ice cream scoop and hollowed out an inch wide trench of his arm.

He’s got a long, thin scar that runs from one side of his ribs to the other between the second and third from the bottom ribs. Looks a bit like a smile. A smile he could do without.

He turns his back to his mirror, and checks the bullet wound. Part of his shoulder feeling so tight is they did stretch the skin to sew the wound back into a nice tidy line. But under too tight skin is a huge hole. The bullet took out six square inches of his back, just below his shoulder blade.

They built some sort of mesh to replace the missing rib pieces. Supposedly the bones will eventually grow into the mesh. Supposedly the two lobes he’s got left of his right lung will expand to fill his rib cage. Rumor has it the muscles that they reconnected and reattached and stretched all over the place will get stronger and start doing their jobs again.

Supposedly, he’ll heal.

But unlike Tim, no one’s saying anything about him regaining full use or strength on his right shoulder. And Gibbs doesn’t know if they aren’t saying anything because they’ve decided he’s just too damn old to get it back, or if it’s physically impossible for him to do it.

Either way, he intends to prove them wrong.
“Looks better than I thought it was going to,” Abbi says as she steps in and finds him naked in the bathroom looking at his back.

He makes a noncommittal noise at that. He doesn’t much want to get into her thinking he was going to die. He can guess how bad it had to have looked/felt when she was getting him patched up in that hallway. He’s been on the other side of that, and usually with worse results.

Her fingers trail over his scars, and he gets the sense that just because he doesn’t want to deal with this doesn’t mean he can avoid it, and now might be a really good time to work on his don’t screw it up technique.

So, unlike with Shannon, he doesn’t try to hide. That was beyond stupid the first time he tried it. Unlike with Jen in Paris, he doesn’t try to pretend he’s not hurt. (Speaking of stupid, attempting to pretend you’re fine to the woman who dug the bullet out of your leg is more or less the definition of stupid.) And unlike with Diane, or Stephanie, or... honestly, every woman he’s been with, he doesn’t try to run away from her angry and hurt and scared.

He turns to her, not sure, what, if anything, he should even try to say, probably with something of a hang dog look on his face, and she purses her lips and shakes her head at him. Then she nods to the shower. “Come on, before all the hot water goes down the drain.”

He nods and steps in, sighing happily as warm water goes streaming down him. Abbi strips off her clothing and gets in with him.

Gibbs smiles at her, eyes trailing over her body. “Missed seeing this.”

Her hands rest on his chest, very gently, and she steps close, forehead on his unhurt shoulder. She doesn’t say anything, but he can feel the edge of fear coming off of her. He starts to wrap his arm around her, but she shakes her head, so he keeps it at his side. She’s slowly stroking her hands over his arms and chest, hips and legs, from the back of his neck to top of his thighs. Her touch is feather light over the scars, and firmer, reassuring that he’s really there, over the parts of him that aren’t hurt.

She’s chewed him out up and down for almost getting killed. She literally yelled at him for breaking protocol, and how it was his job to clear the room, her job to cover HIM, not the other way around. Not until she had moved forward past him. (He’s got a somewhat different interpretation of what happened, but he’s sane enough to know that isn’t anything they need to argue about.)

Now though, they’re alone, no nurse is going to walk in, there are no doctors around, it’s just them, and he feels it when she starts to shake. Feels her drop the anger that’s been keeping fear and sorrow tamed down. He can tell the exact second she drops work, drops the ‘I’m okay’ façade she’s been wearing since Tuesday night, since she stuffed her jacket between his Kevlar vest and the hole in his back that was bigger than her fist.

He kisses the top of her head as her arms circle low on his hip (she wants to hold him tight, but can’t around his ribs) and she stands there, shaking, crying, silently. He doesn’t hear any sobbing, but he feels her shuddering.

He rests his hand on her back, between her shoulder blades, and holds on, letting her get it out.

Sad, scared, angry woman in his arms isn’t nearly as bad as it could have been. Of course, unlike the times he’s tried to get out of this before, he’s (most likely) not going back to what he’s trying to get her calm from.

The job came first. Even with Shannon, the job came first. It called, and he went. And he thinks part of why he couldn’t stand this before, why he was willing to do anything to avoid it was that he knew the job would win, and that it didn’t matter how much it hurt the woman in question, he was going to go back to it.

And right now there’s nothing to go back to. Hell, the most dangerous thing on his menu right now is trying to get girls into the US, and that’s been put off for however long it’ll take to heal up, and after that… he’s not planning on getting into shootouts for that. He’s not planning on going into pirate infested waters, and the Coast Guard won’t shoot him if he does what they tell him to do (which he will.)

He smiles to himself as he thinks that, what with the fact that the whole reason he’s standing here, holding Abbi, is because the Coast Guard just shot him… Won’t happen again, though.

At least, not on the water.

He kisses the top of her head. She’s starting to slow down, and he’s fairly sure she can hear him over the water. “You come home to me. I promise.”

Abbi looks up at him. Her eyes are red, and she swallows hard before saying, “You damn well better.”

“I do. I’m going to be here.”

Her eyes search his, looking deep, making sure he’s on the up and up, and then, though he knows she wants to grab him, hard, and pull him tight to her, she gently reaches up and lightly kisses his lips.

He smiles at that kiss. “Not gonna break me. Kiss me like you mean it.”

Her tongue slips over his bottom lip followed by a quick nip, and he growls low and deep at that, very pleased, which sounds good and sexy for two tenths of a second until he starts to cough. She steps back, looking dryly at him. “Oh yeah, you’re so ready for this.”

He flashes her that hangdog look again.

She gently pushes on his good shoulder. “Turn around, let’s get you washed up, and we’ll see what happens when we get you back on dry land.”

Getting washed up feels amazing. He’s never appreciated having his hair washed the way he is today. And by the time they’re contemplating dry land, he’s decided that he will chew his tongue off rather than cough because there is no way in hell he will make any move that might derail them having sex.

Warm soapy hands all over his body have focused his mind with laser-like precision of getting both of them naked in bed and doing way more than just cuddling.

Finally, they get into bed, and finally she’s touching him all over, sitting in his lap, her skin on his in soft, ghosting touches that light his whole body up and make him want to pull her close and grind into her hard and deep.

He’s not doing that, and she’s touching him like he’s made of paper thin porcelain, so soft and slow and gentle, and he’s just about out of his mind at these gentle, teasing brushes of her skin against his by the time she slides down his aching dick.

He wants to groan, loud at that, but he keeps it to a soft whimper, which doesn’t use up too much oxygen, and is vocal enough that she gets how much he’s liking this.

She’s rocking slowly against him, and in this position, he’s able to easily kiss and nuzzle her breasts, which he loves, seeing if with soft, wet sucks and gentle nibbles he can turn her on enough to get her to move faster, take him deeper, let him get off.

This soft and gentle ride is killing him. He’s close, can feel his orgasm a few inches away, but it might as well be miles because he can’t really move enough to get there.

His head is back against the headboard, and he’s trying his hardest not to breathe deep or hard, so these soft, little panting breaths are slipping between clenched teeth as she keeps up a slow, easy grind.

If he were even remotely near healed up, he’d be grabbing her by the hips, or better yet, thighs, and slamming her down onto him, pumping up to meet her, deep and wet and hard, and he’d be groaning, loud, telling her in quivering muscles and non-verbal song how much he loves this.

But he’s not, so he’s got a little bit of motion at his hips, and one hand knotted in her hair, as he’s trying to do her some good with his right hand, but getting it to the right place makes his shoulder and back ache, and eventually she grabs his wrist and presses that hand to the bed.

She’s doing herself, which he loves watching. Her fingers long and swift on her pussy as she slips, still so slow and soft, up and down on him.

He feels her body going tight on his, and he’s so close, and working so hard at not breathing deep, at keeping air moving in and out and in and out and he’s focusing on that and on her and the up down in out one two of sex and life and how it all blends and bleeds together, and she shivers all over, body twitching on him and it’s almost but not quite enough and he’s begging, flat out “Please, please, please,” begging her to move just a little faster.

And she does, still twitching on him, up down hard and fast and it only takes twice before he’s burning and pulsing all over with one of the most welcome orgasms of his life.

When he’s come back to himself enough to know what’s going on, beyond happy chemicals flooding his body and the feel of her (gingerly) against him, she’s watching him carefully.

He is breathing hard, but he’s not coughing. He gives her a lopsided smile. “So worth it.”

“You feeling okay?”

He nods, slowly. “Really, really okay. Haven’t felt this good in years.”

She doesn’t look like she buys that, but she kisses him gently, reaches for the tissues, pulls off of him and cleans them both up. Then she hands him the 02 tube, and he tucks it into place without any complaining, the extra oxygen does feel good, and maybe keeping it in place would be a good plan for next time.

It’s still not very late, but he’s wiped out. She’s in the head, finishing up her clean up, and carefully scoots himself down onto the bed, rolling onto the side that doesn’t hurt, then, feeling experimental, tries rolling onto his stomach, which… actually feels okay.

He’s drifting close to sleep when she comes out, pads over to the bed, and lays down next to him, resting her lips on his shoulder and her knees pressed into his hips.

He reaches over enough to kiss her and says, “Thanks.”
“Thanks?”

“Yeah. For not running off.”

“I’d never…”

“Not at HQ. After. From me. Five years ago, I’d have rather shot myself in the head than do what you just did. I would have run away from it. So… Thanks.”

She kisses his shoulder. “You’re welcome.”

He nods slowly at that. “I love you.”

He feels the smile against his skin. “I know. I love you, too.” It’s the first time she’s said it, and it feels brilliant, a beautiful flush all through him.

He smiles at that and kisses her again.
Chapter Notes

In this A/U version of the real world, Tailhook took place in ’94 instead of ’91.

Vance gets in at his usual time, a bit after eight. He does his usual morning routine, say hello to Vera, find out who he’s seeing today… which is where usual morning routine stopped.

Both McGees and Dr. Palmer want to see him, together.

He’s hoping it’s a vacation request. But with those three it could be anything from a twenty part murder-conspiracy on three continents, to them telling him in person that Gibbs took a turn for the worst and he’s got to get his funeral suit out, to some sort of new plan to streamline the way they handle physical evidence, to… he doesn’t know.

He’s hoping it’s a vacation request.

He’s getting a lot more of them these days. When he okayed McGee’s paperwork software he’d just been thinking about how great it’d be to be able to get through cases that much faster, and be able to find everything easily.

It’s been live for almost six months now, and he’s starting to see some real differences. More vacation time is part of it. His budget is going to look great this year because his people are actually using their off days, so he’s not paying comp-time.

And the case backlog… At this rate, that’ll be done in two years.

Cold cases… the MCRTs that, unlike DiNozzo’s, haven’t added to their umbrellas or shifted focus, they’re cracking into them. They’re never all going to get solved, but… it’s not going to be all that much longer before his cadre of retired officers who are working on the cold cases are going to get bumped from their positions because he’ll have active investigators doing the work.

He’s having a bumper year at closing cases. Which is great.

And next year is going to be great, too.

And the year after that, where, if his projections keep pace with reality, he’s going to have 35% more Agents than he needs, is not going to be great. By then they’ll have finished the backlog. The cold cases that can be solved will have been solved. And he’s going to have people sitting around twiddling their thumbs. Not a problem that needs to be solved today, but, it is something he’s aware of, and being made even more aware of with each passing vacation request.

After all, it’s a lot easier to take a long weekend if there isn’t hours of paperwork in need of filling out on Monday morning.

“Did McGee give you any hint what they want to talk about?”

“He submitted a filled out 453Q,” vacation request form, “for him and Abby, and there’s one from Dr. Palmer, too.”
Vance feels his spine unknot, no fifty part conspiracy then. At least, not a new one. He’s got a meeting with Abbi Borin to talk about possibly loaning her more agents while she’s vetting her own people. He’s fine with that, and wonders, briefly, if that’s part of how he’s going to deal with too many people when he gets there. Everyone else is short-staffed, he might end up being the Federal Temp Agency.

Or he’ll start giving out McGee’s paperwork software, using it as a bargaining chip when he needs information and access other Feds don’t want him to get. And, eventually they’ll all be overstaffed.

He shrugs to himself, and gets his cup of coffee. After all, as problems go, overstuffed and under budget is an awfully good one to have.

“So, how do we start this conversation?” Abby asks as she and Tim and Jimmy are in the elevator heading toward Vance’s office.

Last night, kissing each other had done a fine job of letting Gibbs and Abbi know what was up, but that doesn’t seem like an appropriate way to go about breaking this news to Vance.

“Follow up, do we really need to tell him?” Jimmy adds. Yeah it seemed like a great idea in the abstract, in the elevator, heading up, it’s seeming a bit less necessary. “I re-read the regs. None of us work together. None of us are each other’s Boss. We aren’t actually dating. So we don’t technically have to disclose this.”

Tim flips off the elevator. “We already made the appointment. It’s going to look weird if we don’t go in there. You getting cold feet?”

He shrugs. Not about the four of them. About telling everyone… “Feeling like I’ll get in there and start stupidly blathering away.”

“Don’t worry. I’ll kick you if you do. Get you to shut up way before you bury yourself.” Tim says.

Jimmy rolls his eyes. “That’s so much better.”

“Always here to help,” Tim says with a smile.

Abby steps closer and kisses him. “Come on. Right now we’re in a situation where if we ever have to seek forgiveness, it’s going to hurt way, way worse than giving him the heads up will.”

Tim squeezes his hand. “Yeah. Me, too.”

They’re barely in the door when Vance, without looking up from his computer, says, “Yes, vacation time is approved. Stay close enough to get back here fast if I need you. And next time, all three of you don’t need to come up for something like this, one of you is enough.”
He looks up when he hears Tim shut the door, and notices the other two are still in there with him.

“This is more than a vacation request, isn’t it?”

Abby nods, and Tim heads behind her and Jimmy, pulling the chairs over to the sofa, nodding at it, suggesting this would be a good place for them to be.

“Gibbs is all right?”

The three of them start nodding, quickly, realizing that given the timing on this, what they’re doing is pretty spooky.

“Yeah, Leon, he’s fine. Came home yesterday. I’m supposed to have lunch with him today if work allows,” Tim says.

Leon settles on to his sofa with all three of them staring at him, wondering what could possibly take this sort of kid gloves treatment.

“So, is this where you tell me that you’ve found something on Jackie’s case?” Which is the only other thing he can think of that warrants all three of them up here looking like they’re trying to think of the most delicate way possible to break some bad news to him.

They’re staring at each other again. Dr. Palmer blurts out, “No. Nothing with work, or with you, or with a case of any sort or…” Vance sees McGee nudge Palmer’s ankle with his foot and he shuts up.

“Then what’s with this… You three look like you’re afraid to breathe too hard.”

Tim sighs at that, and says, “Saying it out loud’s a big step. Okay… Um… Yeah… So…” Vance is still staring at them, wondering what the hell just brought back 2012 Agent McGee. This time Palmer gives McGee a little kick.

Abby looks at both of them, shakes her head, takes both of them by the hand, giving each one a little squeeze, and looks at Leon. “As per the rules, we’re here to tell you about a shift in our relationship. We, and Breena, but she’s not here because she doesn’t work here, so she wouldn’t be here, because she’s not covered by the rules…” Both of the guys are staring at her, but Vance has the sense neither of them are dumb enough to give her a small kick to the ankle. “Anyway. We, the four of us, are together, you know, romantic, and that’s not going to be changing, and we thought you’d rather get a heads up from us as opposed to just stumble into it one day. Because, if you end up stumbling into it, that probably means something’s gone really wrong, and we don’t want that to happen, but…”

McGee nudges her with his foot, and she stops.

Vance stares at them for a second, noticing, once again, that Abby’s holding both Palmer and McGee’s hands, and for a second, nothing forms in his head, at all. There just this blank, quiet, shocked out of his head moment.

Then he blinks.

And he swallows.

And then he laughs. Because he can’t think of anything else to do. Well, he could yell at them, but he’s not up on his sexual harassment regs, let alone any ones that might cover this situation, and he’s not sure if yelling at them for following the rules is the kind of response that could bite him in the ass later.
He gets up, pours himself a drink, not, even remotely, his usual 8:30 in the morning routine, and slugs it back.

Then he rubs his eyes. He can feel them, behind him, staring at him, waiting for him to say something. But he’ll be damned if he’s got any idea of what to say. That rule is there to shield NCIS from sexual harassment suits, and make sure that everything is properly disclosed to any lawyers who have to deal with their cases.

The problem is, if he knows this, then it has to go into those case filings, and if this goes into those filings, two of his most commonly called witnesses are going to be grilled, over and over, about how they can’t be good at their jobs because they’re perverts. Any decent defense lawyer worth his salt will have a field day with the idea of three-cornered inner-office hanky-panky messing up the chain of evidence.

Apparently, 2016 Director McGee decides to show back up, because McGee says, “We don’t expect you to disclose anything. You haven’t actually been told anything, and if anything happens, it’s all on us. We’re going to be discreet. We won’t be ‘out’ here, no out of line behavior at the Christmas party, nothing like that, but… We thought you’d rather know it was happening than get hit with it out of the blue. Right now, we’re here, telling you about our vacation plans, and you’re listening to them. In a few minutes, we’ll head out, and everything you’ll ever see with the three of us will be the same as it ever was.”

Leon nods. That covers things. “As long as that’s true, we don’t have any problems.”

Tim nods at that, along with Jimmy and Abby. They’re getting up, heading toward the door, when Vance asks, “This vacation, is it a honeymoon?”

“Yeah,” Dr. Palmer says.

Vance nods at that, too. Then he sighs. “Congratulations. I hope you enjoy it.”

“Thanks,” Abby says, brightly, “We will.”

The door to his office shuts, and Vance sighs again. There are a few moments of his career where he’s been proud of himself, where he’s felt like he fought the good fight and was working on the side of the angels.

Not a whole lot of them, but a few.

He looks at the picture of his daughter, who’s almost sixteen now, and in two years, assuming all goes well and she keeps her grades up, she’ll be a Plebe at Annapolis.

Anyone who looks at Kayla knows she’s black and female. No way to hide that. Not everyone knows that she’s got a girlfriend. And not everyone is, or would be, as tolerant of that as Vance’s family is.

Second generation of Vances at Annapolis, and he’s damned if she’s going to have to go through the shit he did.

The first black man graduated Annapolis in 1945, so it wasn’t exactly like someone with his skin tome was some sort of new or exotic specimen when he got there in 1981. But that’s how a lot of the students, and upperclassmen, treated him.

And he wasn’t, by any sort of a long stretch, the first black officer, ever, but he still took his share of shit and about six other guy’s shit, too from his commanders, and from insubordinate assholes who didn’t want to take orders from any First Lieutenant, let alone one who looked like him.

And that’s just how it was. Bing a black guy in the ‘80s and ‘90s meant work at least twice as hard for half the results. It meant going selectively deaf and blind over and over and over again.

And he did it. He took the shit, climbed the ladder, fought, literally and figuratively, for every promotion he got, and even with that, even with a spotless record, that fucking asswipe McCallister just saw him as a pretty face to fill a coffin and start up the Cold War again. He didn’t pick any pretty white boys to go get killed to advance his career, nope he picked Leon.

“Why don’t the sharks go after black sailors?” “Cause they don’t eat whale shit.” Not like he didn’t hear that joke over and over.

Not like he didn’t know the guys who agreed with it.

But he never thought some fucker would decide to have him killed for it.

He was good at his job. He was great at his job. And it didn’t matter. He was Black, so he was disposable.

That was a crystalizing moment for him, in a lot of different ways. (Among other things, when he got home, he got real serious about Jackie. Life was too damn short to be dithering about her. He still thinks that’s the best decision he ever made.)

Professionally, that was the end of him just looking the other way at racism. Anyone who worked for him knew to toe the line and to be ready to get the shit beaten out of them if they didn’t. And a few guys, they needed some time in the ring to get the message, and Leon is still proud to have literally pounded equality into several half-wits who needed the shit beaten out of them to get it.

Tailhook was a wake-up call. He’d like to say he was always on the side of the angels at that one, but… He wasn’t. He knows, especially back at Annapolis and when he was a young officer, he did see his job as a boy’s club and resented the hell out of the girls who tried to sneak in. But there’s being irked at having women around, and there’s tolerating rape, and he was never cool with that.

When he got word of Tailhook, he was at NIS, and he was a husband, and he had a woman he loved more than his life, one who was dealing with her own issues of being a black woman in the working world, and though he personally wasn’t part of the team that started investigating it, he got himself onto that investigation, and several similar ones that followed it.

He was working one case, two years later, young Petty Officer, very pretty, roofied and gang-banged by the men who should have been her brothers. She was holding together by her fingernails, talking about loving her job, and how good she was at it, how she finally felt she’s broken through and was ‘one of the guys,’ and he could see how betrayed she felt, how, if it had been a group of strangers, that would have been one thing, but…

And he knew how that felt. Remembered being so happy about being picked by McCallister for that mission in Amsterdam, strutting around, looking like a “tourist,” and how it all fell away.

He got convictions on all five of them. That’s a case he’s proud of.
In the mid ‘90s you did not want to run into Leon Vance if you were a male sailor accused of assaulting a female sailor.

The leap from seeing women as real sailors to seeing gays as real sailors probably shouldn’t have taken as long as it did, but, he didn’t just do it instantaneously. It still took time, and effort, and honestly, he had to work on shoving down a whole lot of squeamishness, especially for the guys, lesbians never bothered him much, but he got there.

He got there because that’s what a good man does. Because that’s what a good officer does. Once someone puts on the uniform, that’s it. Black, white, male, female, gay, straight, it doesn’t matter. They’re his people, and it’s his job to keep them safe. It’s his job to make sure that if something happens to one of them that they find justice, or their nearest and dearest do.

That’s the job.

That’s working on the side of the angels.

He sighs and takes another drink. Running people is complicated. Justice is easy and pure. People are weird and mucky.

But he’s in the justice business. He’s in the making the world a better place, one case at a time business. And the only tools he’s got for that are people. Lots and lots of people. And, as he takes another sip of his bourbon, he’ll admit that the idea of McGee and Palmer and Abby and Breena makes him feel squirmy the way gay sailors used to, but he also knows that it doesn’t matter because three of those people do more to keep his ship running, keep his sailors safe, than any twenty other members of his staff.

He wishes they hadn’t told him. He’d be happier not knowing that about them. But he respects that they did.

And he knows, that if the shit does hit the proverbial fan, he won’t let them fall on their sword. They’re his people, and they do the job, and they do it right. Merit, who you are as a person, that’s the side of the angels, that’s where Vance wants to live. That’s the world Leon Vance is trying to build, the world he wants his daughter and son to live in, that’s all that matters.
“So… How did that go?” Abby asks as soon as they’re in the elevator.

“He wasn’t cursing at us,” Jimmy says. “So, that’s good, right?”

“Better than it could have been,” Tim says with a shrug.

“Anything less than we all got fired, is better than it could have been,” Jimmy says dryly.

“You know what I mean,” Tim says as Abby flicks off the elevator. “He laughed instead of yelled, and we got congratulations instead of head slaps, that’s good.”

“That’s a guy who’s really freaked out by something trying not to be an asshole about it,” Jimmy says.

“Which is way better than the guy who’s completely freaked out and doesn’t care if he’s being an asshole,” Tim says. He shrugs a bit. “I don’t need Leon to love this; I just need him to not be an asshole about it.”

“Yeah, but it’d be really nice if he at least liked it,” Abby says.

“I think that’s asking more than we can get from anyone who’s not family,” Jimmy replies.

Tim nods, and all three of them look at each other, thinking about Tony, wondering if that’s too much to ask from family, too.

“You make that lunch date with Tony, yet?” Abby asks.

“Sent him the email this morning. Haven’t heard back, yet,” Jimmy replies. “You and Breena and Ziva are all set?”

“Penny’s coming too, and if she can swing it, Abbi’s coming,” Abby says.

“That sounds like your lunch is mostly about baby DiNozzo, and we’re the side bit,” Tim says.

Abby smiles. “That’s the plan.” She flicks the elevator back on. “So, lunch with Gibbs?”

“Hopefully. Let’s see what caught fire since I checked in last night.”

Jimmy’s floor first, and before the doors open, he catches a quick kiss from Abby, and then heads down to see what of interest may be going on. No hot cases for him right now, though how long that’ll remain true is always a question.

Abby’s floor next, and Tim doesn’t have to grab a quick, discreet, hidden by the doors kiss, so he doesn’t. She winks at him as she bounces off, ready for another day of evidence galore. Jimmy may have a slow day, but in the lab, it’s never slow. Not anymore.

Tim stands there for another fifteen seconds, waiting to get to his stop, and then off he goes, time to get into it and solve some crimes.
That momentary little flicker that Tim saw, but didn’t really catch when he mentioned lunch to Gibbs is starting now. Specifically, Jethro isn’t sure if he is free for lunch. He’s got, along with Ducky, plans.

Jethro woke up, after Abbi had left, and, after a few false starts he got himself up, and medicated, and showered and dressed and all the rest of it.

He got a bit of time playing with Mona in. He tossed the ball, and she ran after it. (He’s distressed about how playing fetch gets him out of breath, but he’s also thinking that he’s got to keep doing things like this, or he’s never going to get his wind back. So he tosses the ball again, and maybe a little harder than necessary. Mona leaps after it, running full out, bounding into the air and catching it on the fly. She’s happy as a clam to play this hard and wouldn’t mind some tug of war and wrestling, too.)

But eventually, the smoothly purring engine of Ducky’s Morgan breaks the sound of happy doggy barks and small feet scrambling around on Gibbs’ back porch.

A moment after that, as Gibbs is tucking away the tennis ball, while promising Mona that he will come back, and he won’t be gone long, and she’s staring at him with the biggest, saddest puppy dog eyes in the history of puppy dog eyes, Ducky heads around to the back yard.

“I take it you’re getting some morning exercise in?”

Gibbs nods a bit, patting Mona on the head. “Lucky for her, Abbi’s willing to take her for a morning run, or she’d be going stir crazy.”

“I’d imagine.” He eyes Gibbs, wondering how stir crazy Gibbs will be by the end of a week at home “resting.”

Ducky notes that Gibbs is behaving. He’s not using his O2 tube, but he does have it nearby, along with the little back pack looking thing it lives in when Gibbs expects to go anywhere.

“You look ready to go.”

“I am.”

“Do you have your parking tag?” Ducky asks as Gibbs sits in the passenger seat.

“God, Duck…”

Ducky sends him a stern, I’m taking no bullshit from you Mr., and if you want to get out of this house, you will follow the Doctor’s orders, look.

Gibbs flashes him his annoyed look. “On the table.”

When Ducky gets back with it, hanging the handicapped tag on his mirror, Jethro glares at it. “Those spaces are supposed to be for people with real issues.”

“A third of your lung is in a bio-hazard waste dump. You have issues, Jethro.” Gibbs wants to glare at that, but, Duck’s right. And what’s worse, he’s really not up to walking more than a few hundred feet at a go and there might not be any other parking that close.

Still, he’s going to want to slap himself upside the back of the head if someone with a wheelchair can’t park close because his sad ass is having a hard time breathing.

“Ducky!” Stephen Richards, Tim’s, and now Ducky’s, jeweler looks up, very happy to see him come through his door. (Of course, as a jeweler who does custom work, men with taste, money, and women they like to buy goodies for are extremely welcome in his shop.)

“Hello, Stephen,” Ducky says warmly.

“Is this the whole family? Do I now have all three generations?”

By way of explanation, Ducky says to Gibbs, “When I was working with Stephen to design our rings,” he gently touches his own wedding ring, “he asked how I had heard of him, I mentioned Penny is Timothy’s grandmother.” Gibbs nods, as Ducky says, “Stephen Richards, Leroy Jethro Gibbs.”

“Not your son then. Penny’s?”

Gibbs shakes his head, that’s territory he doesn’t want to get into. “Tim’s dad.” That’s true enough, keeps the relationships straight, and if Stephen wonders about Gibbs and McGee, he doesn’t ask.

Stephen takes Ducky’s hand, checking his work, and nods, satisfied. “I take it your plan went smoothly?”

Ducky smiles. “It did.”

“Wonderful, and did she enjoy Istanbul?”

“Yes! It was a lovely trip.”

“Istanbul? That’s where you went?” Gibbs asks.

“That is where we began and ended our trip. We made it to several port cities on the Black Sea.”

Gibbs shakes his head at that. After more than six months of mystery on where they’d gone… None of them had guessed there.

“And how is Tim?”

“Flourishing!”

“Wonderful. I saw him back in the spring when he was looking for a present for Abby to celebrate Kelly’s birthday.”

“And she loved it!”

“Splendid!” Gibbs is starting to feel uncomfortable with how excited and happy everyone is. He drifts off to go look at the rings while Ducky and Stephen gossip about everyone they know, and possibly the history of the Black Sea, along with how rings are made, and likely a few other things. He zones the gentle burr of the two of them chattering away out.

He’d been thinking about this for a few days now, trying to get a handle on what sort of ring he should get Abbi. His first flush of inspiration was something with red gold and emeralds. Red and green, like her hair and eyes.

But that was just the first flash, and those colors mean more to him than to her. How she looks is an accident, one he quite appreciates, but not who she is.

Plus, though he saw some things he liked, none of them were jumping up and down yelling, PICK ME! I’M THE RING. (He’s starting to get some sympathy for Tim taking so long to find Abby’s ring. Though he does not share Tim’s patience with shopping for months on end.)

The thing that got him off of emeralds and red gold was a pearl. White pearl, wrapped in white gold, little white diamonds around it. He likes the idea of that, but it doesn’t look sturdy. It looks like the kind of ring where one wrong move and the pearl would be last seen skittering away.

He hopes that Abbi never has to fight again, but if she does, he doesn’t want some large, bulky, fragile thing on her hand.

He also doesn’t want a men’s style class-ring type thing either. Yes, that’ll put a dent in a guy if she needs it to, but… He wants something more elegant than that.

But he likes pearls. He likes the ties between her and the water. Likes the idea of the ocean on her hand. He likes the idea of this being something that comes from something alive.

So, he’s drifting along, looking at the already made pearl rings, and they all look so fragile. He’d be afraid of holding her hand if she was wearing one of those, for fear of accidentally whacking her hand wrong and breaking the damn thing.

“What are you thinking, Jethro?” Ducky asks, popping up from nowhere, with Stephen hovering on the other side of the counter.

The other part of doing this with someone else, let alone getting it designed, means having to put, into words, what he’s thinking about for this. Which isn’t exactly something he’s loving.

“Can you cut a pearl?”

Stephen looks appalled at that. “Yes, but… Why would you want to?”

“She works with her hands. Wears gloves a lot. Can’t have this bulky stone sticking out of the ring.” Gibbs is looking at the pearl rings in front of him. “Cut it in half, set it, and it wouldn’t stick out so much.”
Stephen is doing a good job of not visibly wincing. “Perhaps a smaller pearl? When you cut them… they never quite reflect the light properly after that. Which for a low grade pearl or paste jewelry isn’t an issue, but for a ring, especially… an engagement ring?” Gibbs looks up and nods. “I would assume you’d want the main stone to be as beautiful as possible. Why are you thinking a pearl?”

“She was a Marine, works for the Coast Guard now, her life’s tied to the ocean. Wanted to touch on that.” Ducky looks very pleased with that answer.

“And she works with her hands, and you want something strong and sturdy and beautiful?”

“Yes.”

“Colors?”

Gibbs shrugs. “I like red gold. She’s got green eyes.”

“Small hands?” Stephen asks.

“Not for a woman. She’s tall, 5’ 10’.”

He nods at that, too. “Do you want an engagement ring wedding ring combination, say a piece in two parts? She gets the first part when you propose and the second part when you get married?”

Gibbs isn’t sure what Stephen’s talking about on that, so he takes a few steps and grabs one of the traditional diamond engagement rings. “This band” and he twists the ring, and the band with the diamond solitaire splits off from the band with the tiny diamonds all over it, “Is the engagement ring. This band is the wedding ring.”

Yeah, this is way more complicated than it was when he did it last.

“Don’t know. Probably two rings. What are you thinking?”

This with a pearl.

“Mother of pearl…” Stephen’s sketching, fast and sloppy right now, but Gibbs can see the idea he’s working. There is a pearl, a smallish one, in the middle, and on each side of it is a band of gold with a mother of pearl inlay. It’s thick enough so the pearl doesn’t stick out, but small enough, thin enough that it doesn’t look like a class ring. Stephen leaves the sketch for a moment to go find a diamond ring. It’s the same basic idea, but there’s a diamond instead of a pearl, and prongs keeping it in place instead of the hovering the pearl is doing in his sketch.

"Like this, with a pearl."

Gibbs likes how it looks, but it’s just a pearl stuck between the bands of stone and metal. He’s not seeing anything to keep it in place. “Will it stay put in that?”

“Yes. Between the glue and the tension mounting that pearl isn’t going anywhere.”
“How do you size something like that?” Off the top of his head he doesn’t know Abbi’s ring size. That would have been good information to bring with him for something like this. He can estimate based on the memory of how her fingers feel between his, but…

“The inlay won’t go all the way around. Just down the sides, the bottom will be solid gold, platinum, titanium, whatever you pick. Otherwise the tension mounting wouldn’t work properly, either.” Stephen grabs a different ring, this one with a diamond between the band. “This part,” he touches the band, “is basically a spring. It holds the gem in place by wanting to snap shut. Add a touch of epoxy, and you’ve got a solid ring that’s never going to lose it’s stone.”

Gibbs sees that.

“Here…” Stephen head off, and comes back a moment later. “Don’t have too many of these. This is all the examples of mother of pearl I’ve got in stock right now.”

Gibbs’ ring

Gibbs looks at them, and immediately knows he’s found his wedding ring. They’re wood, beautiful, polished, burnished wood, with a mother of pearl inlay all around.

And he knows something else. The one he wears, the ring he hopes he’s buried with, and the one he’s going to put on her finger, is a ring he’s going to make.

He thinks for a second longer, about how Abbi would probably like some sort of engagement ring, and how wood does tension, too. He’s starting at the wood and mother of pearl rings in front of him. He can make one of them. Need to get a mini-lathe, and he’d certainly have to study up and practice, but that’s just a matter of time.

He can’t make the ring that’s sketched out in front of him. But he bets Abbi would like it. Really like it. And he can make a wood band that would fit into it, or around it, so that when it’s done, it’s a white pearl, held by… white gold probably, and silvery-purple-green watery mother of pearl, all cool and ocean, wrapped in some sort of golden-red, warm-living wood. It would be thick by the time it was done, but all of the girls, besides Penny, who’s just got the one ring, have two, and they take up a decent block of space on their ring fingers.

“Can you make that?” Gibbs taps the sketch.

“Of course. All we have to do is figure out what you want it made out of. Would you like to look at loose pearls?”

Gibbs nods.

Gibbs is squinting at a collection of pearls (Which all more or less look the same to him. Really, it’s time to get to the eye doctor; his glasses can’t be strong enough.) when his phone buzzes.

Lunch? From Tim.

Sure. Duck’s with me, too.

Cool. Swing by the house?

We’re not home.

You want to come to me, or should I come to you?

Wrapping something up here. How about “What’s a good place to eat around here? Tim wants to meet us for lunch.”

“Beverly’s is two streets over. It’s a very nice little lunch spot,” Stephen says.

Gibbs nods and flashes Beverly’s? Forty minutes.

I’ll see you there.

Gibbs tucks his phone back into his pocket and goes back to squinting at the pearls. That one, little guy, about the size of a small pea, is a very pretty, luminous, just barely tinged with blue sort of white.

“This one.”

Stephen picks it up, staring at it, and starts sketching some more, making little humming noises as he does it. “Go look at the rings, find one with a metal you like.”

So Gibbs does that.

“What has you two out here?” Tim asks as he slides into the booth next to Gibbs and across from Ducky, noticing there’s a glass of iced tea waiting for him. He takes a quick sip. “Thanks. Hot out there.” Only a few days of August left, but they’re making up for it by being as fierce as possible.

Ducky raises an eyebrow at Jethro, asking if Timothy is going to be let in on their adventure.

Gibbs is still thinking about it when Tim says, “I mean, what’s even out here…” Then his eyes narrow slightly, he sees Ducky grinning and looks at Gibbs. “Oh! You buy it premade or are you designing one?”

“Stephen asked me to tell you hello if I could do so without blowing our cover,” Ducky says.

“Well, tell him hello back when you go in to pick it up.”

“Designing.” Gibbs says, still feeling a little winded. He’s using his O2 right now. They were able to park next to Stephen’s. It’s right next to the handicapped spaces. They weren’t able to park nearly as close, even with the handicapped sticker, for Beverly’s. The resulting walk’s left him feeling a bit like a fish out of water.

He’s also feeling bad about the times he’s sent Tim into places that triggered his asthma.

Tim’s grinning at him, very pleased look on his face, and then it jolts up about a million watts. “So, wait, does this mean you’re heading to Montana to have a chat with her dad?”

Ducky seems to enjoy that idea, too.

Gibbs does not groan at that, but right now especially, Montana might as well be on the moon. And he’s never so much as said hello to Abbi’s dad. He’s heard of him, and seen pictures, and he assumes that at some point Abbi will likely mention that she’s moving in with him, but…

“Rhgh.” Is the closest approximation of the sound that comes out of Gibbs at this idea.

Tim gently nudges Gibbs with his shoulder. Very gently. “Come on, you’ve got lots of practice at this, right?”

Gibbs glares at him.

“No? Really?”

“Not since ’79.”

“Shannon’s dad is the last time you did this?”

“Eloped with Hannah, partly because her parents didn’t like me. Her dad would have said no if I’d asked, and he would have been right. Diane and Bill weren’t talking, so I didn’t have to talk with him. Stephanie’s dad was dead, and I never met her mom.”

Tim exhales, very surprised while shaking his head. “I wouldn’t have guessed that.”

“You do seem to have more of a reputation for maintaining traditions than that, Jethro.”

Gibbs shrugs. “Not much I could have done on two of them.”

“What are you going to do with this one?” Tim asks.

Gibbs thinks about it for a moment, but unlike the twenty-year-old Lance Corporal he was once upon a time, getting ready to ask his nineteen-year-old girlfriend to marry him, he cannot possibly make himself imagine doing that again. “Abbi and I are both too damn old for me to be asking permission. Especially since he’s not paying her bills or part of her everyday life. Almost feel like… some sort of slap to her.”

“But you want to do something to introduce yourself to her family and show that you’re an honorable man of good intentions.” It’s not a question as Ducky says it.
“Yeah. Something. When I talked to Shannon’s dad, Jack said to me that it was important, part of showing you’re worth being part of his family and his daughter’s life.”

Tim and Ducky nod at that.

“At least I’d met John a few times first. Wasn’t asking him cold.”

“Not like you aren’t use to just walking up to people and talking to them,” Tim says.

Gibbs shrugs, that’s not untrue, but that’s Special Agent Leroy Jethro Gibbs and he can’t imagine pulling that on Abbi’s Dad.

“She’s moving in next weekend, maybe the next time she calls home, you could pick up the phone and say hello,” Tim adds.

Gibbs sighs at that, too. And then nods. Granted, talking on the phone to strangers is also something he’d rather have his toenails ripped out than do, but that’s probably how to do this. And by the time he’s got the ring done, he’ll have a better idea of what he wants to do with letting her family know they’re doing more than shacking up.

The waitress heads over with their lunch, which Tim is pleased to see, apparently Gibbs ordered lunch for him, too, which is fine because that means things go smoothly, less waiting around. Plus after more than a decade of stakeouts, late nights, and meals together, Jethro can reliably figure out what Tim wants off a menu.

Grilled chicken salad with spinach, strawberries, and walnuts is a fine summer lunch for him. Nice and cool.

When the waitress leaves, Gibbs says to him, “So, you’re getting me up to date on the details?”

“Oh, yeah. Okay, so… Tony and Ziva don’t know yet. The girls are telling Ziva tomorrow, and we’ve got a lunch date with Tony, so if the cases agree with us, we’ll let him know then. Leon knows—“

Gibbs looks shocked at that.

“It’s in the regs. Same reason why Abby told him we were dating.”

Ducky is looking… interested, not amused or worried, but very curious. “And how did Director Vance take your revelation?”

“He laughed, poured himself a drink, slammed most of it back, stood there, silently, not looking at us for a minute, and by then I’d gotten it together enough to say we were telling him so that he knew, but we didn’t expect him to do anything with it. Just so it couldn’t bite him in the ass unaware. He nodded again, sighed some more, asked if the vacation time we’d asked for was a honeymoon, and then said congratulations, dryly, without smiling.

Gibbs and Ducky look at each other and Tim. All three of them have that, well, that could have been a whole lot worse, look on their faces.

Tim shrugs. “I have no idea how that really went. We told him we weren’t going to be ‘out’ at work, and that he’d never see anything different from what he already knew. He said as long as it stayed that way, we wouldn’t have any problems. I don’t think he knows how it went, either, at least, not when we left. We wiped that dryly amused look he usually has clean off his face. But he knows, and we’ve done our due diligence, so, that’s out of the way.
“We’re telling Sarah, and Abby’s going to tell Luca at some point, but that’s it. Breena’s family…”
Tim shakes his head. “We’re not telling them. And if they ever ask about it——"

“You don’t want ‘em asking, don’t get caught,” Gibbs says.

“Not that way. Won’t be taking any risks on that. But… Some of Jimmy’s kids may have green eyes.”

Gibbs and Ducky look surprised at that.

“And if they get asking about that, it’s part of avoiding another trisomy child. They’re welcome to believe that Abby and I may be providing some extra genetic material to help them have healthy children. Which is kind of true and entirely misleading.”

Gibbs and Ducky slowly nod at that, both of them still staring at Tim, who’s starting to eat his salad. “This is good.”

Gibbs rubs his face for a moment, accidentally yanking the O2 tube off of his face, mentally cursing at forgetting it was there, and then, after tucking it back into place, he says, “Tim, are you sure going that far’s a good idea?”

Tim’s first response is a rather snarky one about how Gibbs didn’t sit him down to have a chat about this when he and Abby decided it was time to have a baby. But, he stops that, and backs up. Unlike his relationship with Abby, a lot of what’s going on with him and Jimmy and Breena isn’t public, and Gibbs doesn’t get to see how it works, only hears about it after the fact. And the fact he’s been hearing most about is if the four of them can juggle the sexual dynamics of this and not end up shooting themselves in their collective ass.

“Yeah. We’re not just fooling around. We’re not bored and horny and just spicing things up. It’s real, and…” Tim sighs. “That’s why you make babies, right? You know, when you do it on purpose. Because you love these people and you want your love of them to live. So, yeah. It’s a good idea. We’re good with it. And if I’m ever lucky enough to have a son with curly brown hair, and Ed’s tactless enough to ask… we’ll set fire to that bridge when we come to it.”

Gibbs and Ducky keep looking at Tim, and then at each other, and he can feel them thinking something to each other, but they aren’t saying it out loud, so…

“Just say it.”

“It doesn’t matter, Timothy. Just something your grandmother and I have been wondering about.”

“Then you’re in luck, I’m feeling talky, ask away,” Tim says dryly, not really wanting to answer anything and everything about them, but wanting to know what Ducky’s wondering.

Ducky looks infinitely more comfortable with speculating about this than asking it. He licks his lips, and says, “We understand how you and Abby, and you and Breena, and Breena and Abby, and Jimmy and both of the girls works.” Ducky pauses on that, sipping his tea. “How do you and Jimmy work?”

“Is Penny wondering if I’m bi?”

“Not precisely. Just trying to understand how this works.”

Tim shrugs. He’s also a little fuzzy on how he and Jimmy work. They just do. “Co-husbands? We’re not lovers, and no matter how many puppy dog eyes the girls give us, I don’t think we ever will be.
We aren’t friends anymore, either. It’s well past that. And beyond that, I don’t have a good word for it.” One more shrug. “He’s the guy I share a bed, two women, and as of right now, four kids with. You’re the walking encyclopedia, what’s the word for that?”

Ducky smiles at Tim’s answer. “I believe the word for that is husband.”

And in a moment Tim had literally, never, ever thought would apply to himself, he says, “Then you can tell Penny he’s my husband, and whichever one of you was betting in that direction owes me half the winnings.”

Ducky smiles dryly. “We do not bet.”

“Oh huh.” Tim doesn’t believe that for a second, though he’s more than willing to believe the stakes may be which one of them is the better profiler. “And, on the things you aren’t betting on… You don’t think telling Tony will go well, any suggestions for that? Both Jimmy and I ended up verbally tripping over our feet trying to tell Vance.” Tim shakes his head and takes a drink. “It feels great. You know, with us. Light and happy and good, but… trying to start that conversation cold, especially with someone you think might not take it well… Not fun. You’ve told many, many people things they don’t want to hear, any suggestions?”

Ducky thinks about it for a moment. He has told far too many people things they did not want to hear. “Be direct. Don’t dance around it, and don’t be coy. Give him as long as he needs to respond. Keep yourself in line and don’t get angry or upset. You’re not in an argument. This is a fact. You are telling him about it. It’s existence is non-negotiable, and he has no say in that matter. Likewise you are not defending yourself, or your loves, to him. If he gets mean or attacks you, back off from him. You don’t have to take any abuse from him, but attacking back is a bad plan for long term family harmony.” Ducky smiles at Tim, and reaches across the table to pat his uncast hand. “Most of all, you are not doing anything wrong, the rest of your family is fine with this and supports you in it, and he will, too, once he gets past his own personal baggage with this, which we will help him with.”

Ducky looks Tim over. “Tony’s occasionally been a stand in for the Admiral, taken some harder shots than were necessary because you were hitting him, too.” Tim’s never thought of it that way, but that does put a lot of the rougher bits of the two of them, especially the ones where he’s been the aggressor, into a perspective he hadn’t seen but makes a lot of sense. “That’s going to come back at you with this, with you and Jimmy playing the role of Senior. Let it roll off of you as much as you can. None of this, not really, is about you or Jimmy and your relationship with each other and the girls. It’s about Tony and Senior, and he will, eventually, get the pieces back into place, and he will get to okay with this.”

Gibbs adds one last bit to this, “You four are not on your own, and you do not have to close ranks and just take it. I’m sure he’ll be in my basement soon, and I’ve got your backs.”

And that feels really good to Tim. Then something hits him. Something he should have asked before they got onto him. “Hey… What’s it look like? I know you’ve got a sketch on you somewhere.”

Gibbs pulls out his phone and brings up the sketch. Tim stares at it and nods slowly. “Can’t wait to see it.”

Gibbs looks proud at that.

“Can I tell? Obviously not Abbi, but…”

Gibbs thinks about that, too. “Yeah, after they have their lunch date tomorrow.”

Tim smiles at that, too. He’s not sure how well Abby and Breena will do on secret keeping if all five of them are together for one of their happy-girl lunches.

Tim doesn’t press for a time frame for when Gibbs might be moving to the next step. Mostly because he knows how ‘custom made’ does not always mean ‘shows up the day you expect it to.’ He does happily chew the next bite of his salad, because he’s very much looking forward to being at Gibbs’ last wedding.

“What did ‘not precisely’ mean?” Jethro asks after Tim’s headed back to work and Ducky is driving him home.

“Penny doesn’t wonder if Timothy is bisexual. She wonders if, given his family background, if that’s not a sexuality he can access or express. She wonders if there’s too much emotional trauma for him to be able to touch whatever level of sexual interest in Jimmy that he may have, and thus his psyche keeps it safely walled away from any level of conscious thought.”

Gibbs isn’t feeling that. He’s known guys who were in the closet, and Tim doesn’t act like they did. But if it is so deep down that he can’t touch it, then he also wouldn’t act like the guys who were in the closet, would he?

“She worried about it biting him?”

“With a different foursome, possibly. With this one? No. Jimmy seems sufficiently flexible and loves Timothy enough to roll with anything that comes his way. I’m sure that if the two of them can share children…” Duck looks at Jethro, and they both know exactly how big of a deal that is for most guys. Wife swapping is one thing, some guys get off on that, but raising another man’s kid, as your own, while he’s around… that’s an entirely different level. “…there’s enough love and respect to come to some form of common, mutually beneficial space in regards to sex.”

Gibbs inclines his head at that. “You two think of things that look like they may be rocks ahead, let me know, too. Too much on the line to go crashing into them blind.”

Ducky nods. “Unless doing so would violate some previous commitment to silence, we will. Right now, the biggest issue we’re seeing starts tomorrow. Even if a case derails Timothy and Jimmy from talking to Tony, it won’t stop Breena from talking to Ziva, and from there…”

Gibbs sighs at that. In all the talking with Tim and Jimmy about this, they kept focusing on making sure the four of them could work it out. The wider world hadn’t really hit Jethro, but, now that he’s thinking about it, this is going to hit Tony hard, and unfortunately he’s not seeing any solution beyond a lot of time.

Only way to prove that you can do what you say you’re doing is to do it. And for Jimmy, Breena, Tim, and Abby, that means keeping this going day after day. And that’s the only thing that’s going to set the part of Tony who’ll see this as every godawful bad relationship decision he lived through as a kid.

Gibbs just hopes Tony thaws out before they’re celebrating their tenth anniversary, let alone working on his house.
“You know, McGee’s got an office, with doors, and nice cushy chairs, and no dead bodies. Why on earth are we having lunch here?”

Jimmy shrugs. “My turn to buy.” That’s true, and he did buy, and it’s also covers the fact that usually if they’re getting lunch the three of them, they do eat in Tim’s office, because Tim’s office is all of the things Tony just mentioned.

It’s also really public, requires you to walk through an entire department filled with people to get to the elevators, and people pop into Tim’s office all the time. So it’s not ideally suited for a private conversation that might get “intense.”

Plus, in Autopsy, right now, they’ve only got two guests, both of whom are currently awaiting transport to the funeral homes that will handle their remains. It’s slow enough that Jimmy’s given Allan a provisional day off. (“Stay close enough to come back if we get a call out, otherwise, day’s yours.”) So, there is absolutely no shot of anyone just wandering down here to chat.

Or, put this way, no matter how “intense” things get, no one down here is going to complain about it.

Tim unpacks their lunches while Jimmy hunts up a third chair. Usually there are only two people down here, so it takes him a moment, but when he’s back, Tim’s got everyone’s food out and sitting neatly on his desk.

Jimmy gets settled and is lifting his tuna wrap to his lips as Tim says, “Come on, we haven’t seen them, yet!”

Tony’s grinning. He knows exactly what they haven’t seen yet. So he pulls out his phone and shows off his own, personal, grainy white shrimp-looking ultrasound shots.

“And there he is!” Tony’s beaming at the picture. “Dave DiNozzo.”

“You’re sounding awfully sure about that,” Jimmy says, looking at the tiny blob of person whose existence has all three men grinning.

“I’m feeling it. Ziva’s not so sure.”

“We’ll find out soon enough which one of you has the better baby radar. Due date still late April?” Jimmy asks.

“Doc thinks April 22.”

“Well, whoever he is, is everything checking out right?” Tim asks.

“According to the Doc, he’s exactly the right shape and size, heart’s beating the way it should, placenta’s in the right place, and other than that one second where the Ultra-Sound Tech thought it would be funny to joke about there maybe being twins, it went smooth.”

“Didn’t think the idea of twins was funny?” Jimmy asks with an eyebrow high.

Tony looks pretty horrified at the idea, and Tim and Jimmy are very amused at the idea of Tony with twins. “Yeah, I’m not keen on signing up for that. If it happens it happens, but… I’d like to sleep again eventually, you know?”

Tim and Jimmy both nod. They both know how hard one at a time is, two… Yikes!

They’re all chewing quietly for a moment, and Tony looks up at them, squinting a bit. Both Tim and Jimmy are looking… off. He expects more, ‘Yay! Babies!’ out of those two, and they’re just looking at each other and eating. “What’s going on?”

“We have good news,” Tim starts again.

Tony grins. He told Ziva after they were heading home from Gibbs’ that the computer stuff was crap. “Oh, I so knew that computer stuff was BS! Nice save with the middle name bit there, Palmer. So, Gibbs’ secret? Not telling because Ducky was hovering around?”

Jimmy shakes his head.

Tim adds, “This is about us, and Abby and Breena, we’re, the four of us, together.”

Tony stares at Jimmy and Tim, and squints his eyes even further. Obviously Tim is attempting to communicate something, but he’ll be damned if he can figure out what. Well, more like he will be damned rather than figure out what, because there’s a pretty obvious interpretation of those words, but that’s just not happening, so he’s got to be missing something.

Both of the Wonder Twins are staring at him, waiting for him to respond, which, unfortunately, lends credence to the interpretation of those words that he refuses to even admit could possibly be happening.

Apparently, enough time goes by without him saying anything that Jimmy gently says, “Tony, you okay?”

Tony rubs the back of his head and finally says, “Together… how?”

“Married,” Jimmy says. “The four of us. To each other. Or as close as we can get without a lot of trouble from the outside world.”

Tony blinks at that, chewing his lip, nodding gently because, there’s no possible way for him to misunderstand that. “The four of you?”

They both nod.

He looks at Tim and Jimmy, licks his lips again, and says, “With each other?”

More nodding.

“And the girls?”

“Yeah, Tony, all four of us. Like a couple, but a quadruple,” Tim says.

Tony nods some more, not sure what this feeling that’s starting to scream in his head is, something between wanting to slap both of them so hard upside the back of the head that their ears ring for a week and throwing up. He is certain that he doesn’t like it, at all.

He swallows again, staring at both of them, who are just sitting there, watching him, looking concerned, and nervous, and like he’s the one with the problem because he’s the one freaking out, instead of both of them being massive adulterous perverts.
Adulterous perverts who are waiting for him to respond, and, apparently, approve of this. Insane adulterous perverts. Tony feels his sarcasm snap into place, walling him off from the feelings bouncing around on the inside, the wrecked, sad, sick to his stomach, betrayed, hurt, angry tumult of way too much everything right now.

He bites his lip one last time, pushes back from the desk, putting a few more feet of space between him and Tim and Jimmy, and starts to let the sarcasm and anger out. “I’m sorry, but… you know. I kind of remember your weddings, in that I was at both of them. And…” he laughs but it’s not a remotely happy sound, “maybe I’m just fucking insane,” and there’s a manic gleam of a grin on his face, “but I kind of remember you,” he’s looking at Tim, “repeating the words when the priest went over the forsaking all others bit, and I really remember you talking about your love for Abby being your bedrock, and maybe I zoned out, but I don’t remember anything about fucking other people on your list of options. But I do remember you asking me to stand up there, with you, and help you make vows you’ve broken.” His eyes skip over to Jimmy. “And you, with your fifteen hours of butterfly kisses and unicorn farts vows of testicle shrinking sappiness, where the fuck do you get off going back on that? Either of you? You stood there in front of all of us and you vowed on your lives, on your honor, on all of our love for each other, that you’d do the job for the rest of your lives. Where the fuck do either of you get off on skipping out on that, let alone looking at me like I’m supposed to be cool with both of you fucking over each other, your wives, and your kids!”

They look at each other, and Tim takes over on responding. “Tony, that’s not—“ “Stop!” Tony can feel his anger surging through him, tingling his fingers and making him want to fight. “Don’t give me justifications for this crap. Don’t pretend you’ve got some secret magic that makes you bulletproof. I’ve already heard every justification on Earth for ‘I got horny and couldn’t keep it in my pants.’ I’ve already heard every justification on Earth for ‘I got horny and couldn’t keep it in my pants.’ I invented two thirds of them! I don’t need you two parroting them back at me.”

“Tony, that’s not what’s going on,” Jimmy says.

Tony stands up, tossing his lunch in the trash. “Uh huh. Sure. Keep telling yourself how you’re goddamned special snowflakes, and it’s all going to work out perfect and happy. Keep telling yourself that when you’ve got lawyers coming out your asses and custody battles and kids who don’t want to talk to you because you’re the assholes who couldn’t play by the rules. Don’t sit there, staring at me, asking me to approve of you wrecking all of our lives and ripping our family to shreds. Don’t stand there and put my home in jeopardy so you can get your rocks off.” That’s too close to the truth, to the fear of divorce writ large across his whole family, of the house they’re building ripped apart and his loves no longer loves, and Tony can’t even think about that, let alone speak the words, so he turns away from them and stalks out of the morgue.

Tim looks at Jimmy and sighs. Jimmy rolls his eyes a bit. “Yeah, that went well.”

Tim nods slowly. “Good thing we didn’t do that in the diner.”

“Ya think?”

“Think the girls are having better luck with Ziva?”

“It’d be pretty difficult for her to take it worse than that.”
Tim nods at that, too, and takes a bite of his sandwich.

Ducky said give him time. So, they’re giving him time. They both want to get up and follow him, talk more, but he probably does need time to think and process and both of them standing around is unlikely to help.

But not jumping in isn’t easy.

Jimmy puts his wrap down after a minute and says, “‘Testicle shrinking sappiness?’ They weren’t really that bad, were they?”

Tim shrugs. If he’d been paying better attention, he might actually know the answer to that. “Like you said, Breena loved them, and that’s all that mattered.” Then he picks up his phone and begins texting Abby with how talking to Tony went.

To say telling Ziva goes better is a massive understatement. Granted it pretty much couldn’t have gone worse. Of course, the whole crew didn’t manage to make it, Abbi’s in a meeting with Leon right now, working on getting more boots on the ground for her, and Penny’s had ‘something come up’ which was disappointing, but time with just the three of them is good, too.

It’s not that they mind having Abbi and Penny there, too, but sometimes it’s nice to just have the three of them. Like in the old days.

After much cooing and rejoicing over baby DiNozzo-David, (who Ziva is convinced is a girl. She’s thinking that Tali Miriam DiNozzo is cooking away in there, and both Abby and Breena think naming her after her sister and mother is awesome.) Abby and Breena get around to the second reason for their lunch.

“So,” Abby says, taking a quick sip of her decaf chai, “do you remember, couple years ago, when you asked if the four of us were sleeping together?”

Ziva nods. She’s smiling, and the expression on her face could be best described as, took you long enough.

“‘It’s gone a bit past that,” Breena says. “This weekend, we basically got married.” That gets a big hug from Ziva. She’s pleased to see that if they were going to take that step, that they’d cement it, get it thoroughly planned out and make sure they could do it for real.

And for a moment, as she’s talking with Abby and Breena who are both happy and excited about this, she’s happy and excited, too. It’s been obvious that they’ve been moving in this direction for years now, an inch at a time. It’s also been obvious that they’ve been keeping their thoughts on this very close in, waiting until they knew what they were doing to take it wider, which Ziva appreciates. She’s a lot better with ‘this is what’s going to happen’ as opposed to ‘this might happen.’

Granted, given what happened at the beach, she assumed they’d jumped over the edge then, but she wasn’t entirely sure, and since they didn’t say anything, she wanted them to have the space they needed to figure it out and tell her about it when they were ready. She’d also been thinking, until Tim got hurt, that they were just thinking about this as extra-curricular sex. Close and frisky friendship.
Given what Abby and Breena are saying, that’s not what’s going on.

Which Ziva finds relieving. She’s thinking this is going to go much more smoothly if everyone involved is serious about it.

And they are. And that feels good. They’re so happy; they’re just glowing with it, and that glow’s contagious. Sort of like how yesterday, after getting into CGIS and showing Abbi the sonogram shots, both of them were walking around with grins on their faces.

And for a moment, this is wonderful. This is rich, and happy, and fully splendid.

For a moment.

Because as she’s enjoying this, and getting details about what’s been involved in inching closer to this, and how Tim almost getting killed was one game changer, and how once they found that they could touch each other, and PT/massage night sounds pretty sweet to Ziva, things cascaded pretty quickly from there, it’s hitting her that they are telling her on her own.

And it’s hitting her that if ‘this weekend’ means Saturday night, that this is what Ducky didn’t want them talking about at the diner, and why, exactly, telling them at the diner would be a bad idea all hits along with the fact that Tony’s got a lunch date with the guys, and she’s very rapidly going to have an extremely upset husband on her hands.

Abby and Breena are talking about how ridiculously hot it is when Jimmy and Tim touch each other and how they’re hoping they can get them comfortable enough to do more of that, because massage night is melt you panties hot, but they trail off on that as they notice Ziva looking less than thrilled.

“Ziva?” Breena asks.

“They are telling, Tony, correct?”

Abby nods. “Yeah. They’re having lunch today, too.”

Ziva winces. “That is not going to go…” Abby’s cell buzzes. “…well.”

She’s reading it, and also winces. “Uh. Yeah. That’s an understatement. He’s stormed off, and they aren’t sure what to do about it. Right now they’re letting him cool down. Tim’s thinking he’ll try again in a half hour or so.”

Autopsy is a secure area. It takes up around a third of the first floor, and the only way to get into it is from the loading bay out back, or through the elevator to the main hall. And although the Evidence Lock Up is on the same floor, the only way to go from Autopsy to Evidence is to go up (or down) a floor, and get into the secure elevator, or to go out the back doors, though the loading bay, logging yourself out with your ID card, and then walk over to the next bay, and log in with your ID card, thus opening the drive in door to Evidence.

This matters right now because there is no way out of Autopsy without letting the people inside of Autopsy know you are coming or going.

And Tim and Jimmy have not heard the sound of the elevator doors opening, nor have they heard the loud, grinding groan of the loading bay doors, which means that Tony has to be stalking about the hallway, pouting in one of the storage closets, or kicking the hell out of the Morgue Ambulance.

They’ve finished lunch, and gotten confirmation from Abby that Ziva’s very happy for them (and nervous for Tony) and now, if they aren’t going to be talking to Tony, there’s stuff they could both be doing.

But for Tim that requires leaving Autopsy, and probably walking past Tony to do it.

Jimmy wads up the paper that had wrapped his lunch and tosses it into his trash can. “So… do we go to him?”

Tim shrugs. “Ducky suggested letting him have time to cool off and process. I took that to mean we wait for him.”

“I’ve got everything I need to do my job down here. You want to wait?”

“I’ll give it—“

They hear the doors swoop open and Tony storms back in, not looking very calm. “So, how does this happen? I mean, you two just wake up one morning and go, ‘Hey, I know, let’s completely destroy our whole family in search of some new pussy?’”

There’s a lot of angry in there, and some pretty deep hurt. Jimmy notices the hurt, and Tim feels the angry.

“Tony, that’s not what’s going on.” Jimmy says, while Tim works on keeping his own angry in check.

“Of course it is! Happy guys, well-married, content guys, guys who love their wives, don’t go out fucking other women. That’s like happy-marriage 101, you stick with your own wife. What I don’t get is what happened. You two…” Tony’s voice breaks on that. Enough of the hurt is coming through that Tim can get it now. Tony’s biting his lip and pulling himself back into control. “You look like you’ve got the dream. You look happy, and…” Tony sounds so crushed. “The idea that it’s a lie…”

“Tony…” Tim says it gently. “That’s not. It’s not a lie.”

“Then you’re lying to yourselves!” spits out of Tony, lots of venom in that. “Tell me about the other happy, in love guys who are fucking other women. Oh right, you can’t because that’s not how it works!” Tony kicks the wall and turns back to them. “You’re supposed to be the smart ones. You’re the ones who don’t think with your dicks. You’re the ones who are supposed to be able to figure out that what you’ve got is worth more than any snatch ever born…” He starts to trail off on that, and Tim looks like he’s about to jump in, but Tony shakes his head and says, “You’re the ones who meant it when you said ‘for as long as we both shall live’ and if you two can’t do it…”

Tony turns away from them.

Tim and Jimmy are staring at each other, neither having any idea that Tony hurt this deep on this issue. Tim’s wondering how many stepmoms he had to go through before he got so jaded he couldn’t be hurt anymore. Then he wonders if he actually ever got there, or if he just hit the point where he stopped allowing himself to get to know them so he couldn’t get hurt.

Jimmy’s a few steps ahead of Tim on this, or maybe Tim’s in Tony’s past and Jimmy is in Tony’s present. “Tony. We’re not bored, we aren’t horny, this isn’t a violation of our vows; it’s an Tony snorts at that.

“No. Stop that.” Jimmy’s using his gentle talking Molly down from frantic voice. “You’ve been around the block too many times to have a definition of marriage so simplistic that monogamous sex is the be all and end all. We are married. ‘Til they put me in the ground, Breena and I are married. Tim and Abby are married. ‘Til their last breaths, they are married. That’s not stopping or changing or anything. We’re not swapping. We aren’t fooling around. We’re not bored—”

Tony turns to Jimmy, eyes hot. “If you say ‘we’re in love,’ I’ll lay you out and take the asshole penalty for it. You are not children, and you are not innocent. You’ve been around the damn block too many times to pretend ‘we’re in love’ are magic words that make everything work out. Between the three of us we’ve cleaned up too many dead bodies where ‘we’re in love’ didn’t do the job, so don’t even try that shit on me.”

Tim and Jimmy stare at Tony and sigh.

“That’s the answer, Tony,” Tim says, trying to focus on Tony sad and scared and not how angry this is making him. Right now, he wants to jump in and lay Tony on the floor for shitting all over this, and right now he’s very thankful for the heads up from Ducky because this could have been a clusterfuck of epic proportions, even for them. “We’re in love. And we’re not stupid, and we’re not innocent, and we didn’t just swig a few bottles of wine and jump into it one night. It’s not an accident, or a fluke, or however else you want to label it so you don’t have to see it for what it is. It’s love and respect and care of joy and sex and pleasure and, all of it. It’s everything we love about our own marriages multiplied and shared.”

Tony rolls his eyes. “Yeah, you’re fucking Breena because you respect her. I’ve seen Breena, respect isn’t what’s getting your dick hard. I respect Breena, and you’ll notice, I’m not fucking her!”

Now Jimmy’s having a harder time keeping himself from getting angry, he’s not liking the flavor of Tony’s tone right now. He’s heading away from hurt and concerned and into flat out mean. “You saying he doesn’t respect her?”

“If you guys could even find respect on a map, you’d be keeping your own dicks in your own wives and not fucking around with each other. How could you be so goddamn fucking stupid? This is going to kill everything!” Tony’s looking down and rubbing his forehead, like he’s got a bad headache. He looks up at them again, “God, I hope you’ve got a good escape plan because Gibbs is going to rip your nuts off and stuff them down your throats and then set fire to your corpses.”

“I started telling him about it the week after you,” he’s looking at Tony, “got married. Got his advice then. Both Jimmy and I, together and on our own, and the girls have talked to him about this. Like we said, this wasn’t just a wake up and jump in thing. Literally years of thinking and testing and… falling in love… and more thinking’s gone into getting to this point. You’re right, we are the smart ones, so we weren’t stupid about how this happened.”

Tony’s staring at them, then he turns on his heel, and this time they hear the sound of the elevator opening.

They both wait for a few moments, wondering if Tony’s going to turn around and storm back in, but as one minute flees into the next, they start to relax.
Tim pulls out his phone and sends Gibbs a text. Tony’s headed your way. NOT HAPPY.

A minute later he gets, You two manage to keep your cool?

Yeah. “By my fingernails,” Tim mutters out loud. He can feel himself shaking right now, a lot of what he pushed down to stay calm is starting to come up. Jimmy’s staring at him, wondering what that’s about, Tim looks at his phone, and he reads over his shoulder, nods, and then rests his hand on Tim’s shoulder, comforting, and though Jimmy’s not baseline calm, he’s calmer than Tim is, so it helps. He’s really flipped out. Tim texts.

Jimmy squeezes his shoulder. Telegraphing, he’s not the only one to Tim. Tim rests his cheek on Jimmy’s hand for a moment, letting himself get back to calm. Then he decides to give Gibbs a quick play by play, so he’s got a good idea of what’s headed his way.

Once he’s done that, he gets, Got it. Ziva take it okay?

Abby says so.

Get back to work. I’ve got him when he gets here.

Gibbs closes his laptop (he’d been looking at mini-lathes and reading up on how to make wooden wedding rings) when he hears the sound of a car driving very fast, stopping very fast in front of his house.

“So, where is it?” Tony says as he walks into Gibbs’ house less than a minute later. Mona hops up to greet him, but Tony glares at her, so she gives him a little growly bark and retreats over to Gibbs side, ready to hop up if Tony starts trouble.

This not being anything Gibbs was expecting for a first line, he doesn’t have an answer to it. So…

“What’s what?” he asks while patting Mona.

“The industrial strength hallucinogens they’ve got you on so that you know and approve of this shit. ‘Cause right now, I’m not sure if I’ve got to get you off of them or ask for some for myself.”

“Tony.”

“Stop it! I’ve been called ‘Tony’ in that patronizing tone seventeen times in the last hour. Every single sentence they aimed at me started with ‘Tony.’” Tony slips into a viciously accurate version of Tim’s ‘patient’ voice and drops out of it as he finishes his name. “You are the Dad! It is your job to see where the problems are, and then keep them from jumping into them. You’re the one who’s supposed to say, ‘Bad fucking plan! Stop.’ You’re the one who’s supposed to know the sunshine and roses and ‘we’re all in love’ crap is crap, and that it’s balls thinking and not brains, and when they can’t get the big heads in charge, it’s your job to slap them upside the heads until they do. What the fuck happened that you fall down on that job? So, what, they’re drugging you? You’re ready for the old folks’ home? Explain this to me, how you’d voluntarily let them set our entire family on fire, and you’d sit there and cheer them on!”

“Sit down.”
Tony shakes his head. He’s too upset to be still and needs to move to burn some of this off. He’s pacing around the living room and more than anything right now, he wishes Gibbs was in good enough shape to go a few literal rounds with him, because having something to do with his body would help with this horrible, sick, unsettled, jittery mess in his head and stomach and skin.

“The first time Tim said anything to me, it was something like this, ‘I know I’ve got everything I’ve ever wanted, and a bit more on top of that, and I don’t want to be the idiot who screwed that up because I got greedy for more.’ He talked about how he wanted advice from someone who could think about it with his brain and not his balls.”

“And then you say, ‘Don’t get greedy. Stop looking at your best friend’s girl.’ That’s what not thinking about this with your balls looks like.”

Gibbs nods, because Tony’s right, to an extent. “If he’d just been talking about him, that’s what I would have said. If he’d just been talking about him, he never would have brought it up. The man’s not blind; he’s been horny. He knows how to deal with that. But by the point he’s talking to me about it, the girls were already interested in playing if the guys could do it, and they were starting to put out feelers to see if the guys could.”

Tony doesn’t say anything to that, and Gibbs wonders if he’s internalizing anything about the girls with this, beyond seeing them as the objects the guys are lusting over.

“The way I heard it, Ziva got Breena thinking about it, she asked Abby, both of them decided they guys would never be up for it, so they shelved it, but as they got to be better friends and closer, they decided it might be an option and put it into play. More than a year after that, they started to move on it.”

Tony doesn’t say anything to that, either. He does finally sit down.

“They’re not your dad. This isn’t about never being satisfied with what you have and always chasing the next big score.”

Tony laughs bitterly. “It’d almost be better if it was. They’ve got themselves convinced that this is fine. That they’re so in love and it’s all going to work out and they’ll be happy forever and…” He rubs his eyes. “After the first couple times, Dad stopped expecting it to work.”

“He did or you did?”

Tony shrugs. He stopped expecting it to work after the second one. Of course, he was also nineteen when he met the third one, and she was very pretty and younger than he was. Not by much, only three weeks, but… He didn’t go to that wedding. Didn’t talk to his dad for close to two years after that.

“They’re gonna make it.”

“You don’t know it. You, of all people, should know how bad this sucks. You and Fornell, you really okay? All these years later, you really okay. And even if you are, now, how were you back then? You think them all falling apart for a decade so they can then snipe about how stupid this was is a good plan?”

Gibbs licks his lips. “Diane asked me about that—“

“Good, God, she knows? What’d they do, take out an ad in the paper?”

“No. Just us, Leon, Tim’s sister and Abby’s brother and that’s where this ends.”
“Then…”

“The four of them had gotten together for lunch, back when you had Tim and I on punishment duty dealing with Diane and Fornell to break up that one case.”

Tony nods, he remembers that.

“Diane and I had lunch, were talking about… about a lot of stuff. Saw them heading in. Jimmy kissed Breena bye, Abby linked arms with the guys, they headed in. Diane asked if they were messing around.”

“They weren’t back then, right?”

“Just thinking about it. Probably not too hard. Kelly was brand new. She was saying she hoped they were smarter than we were. I said they were. Got thinking about it, what could have happened if Fornell and I could have shared. Still would have been a mess. Might have worked out better for Diane, but… Can’t build anything good on a rotten foundation, and we were rotten. I was rotten. Your dad, rotten. Tim and Abby and Jimmy and Breena, not rotten. They’ve got a solid foundation, and when you’ve got that, you can build whatever you like.”

Tony doesn’t know a whole lot about architecture, but he’s fairly sure that’s not true. “Uh huh. Build me a pyramid pointy side down. Doesn’t matter how good the foundation is if you’ve got a shape that can’t stand on its own. They’ll keep it going for a while. Anyone can balance anything for a little bit, and then it’s going to fall and…” Tony’s back up, pacing around Gibbs living room. “Two people is hard enough. You’ve got to balance you and someone else, and add kids to that, and…”

Tony’s looking at the pictures on Gibbs’ mantle. The girls and all of them together and happy. “They had the fairy tale, you know? Happily ever after and all the trimmings. The poster boys for how the book’s supposed to end after you ride off into the sunset. And now… Now it’s gone.”

“Nothing’s gone, Tony.”

Tony snorts at that. “Give it time.”

Gibbs gets up and walks over to him, putting his hand on Tony’s shoulder. “You ever trust my gut?”

Tony nods.

“Then trust it. They’re going to make it.”

“How can you feel that?”

“Just do.”

“Says the guy with three ex-wives. You’re not exactly the authority of on lasting marriages.”

Gibbs shrugs, that’s a fair shot. “Didn’t expect them to last.” That’s true, too. “Got married for a lot of reasons, love like they’ve got, or like you and Ziva, wasn’t one of them. They’ve spent more time figuring out if they could do this than I was married to Diane and Stephanie combined.”

Tony rolls his eyes. “It’s supposed to be you and someone else, forever. Just you two. Forsaking all others. That’s the promise, right? Not you and her and your best friend and his wife.”

Gibbs shrugs. Ducky’d probably have something about how that version of it’s been practiced somewhere else for hundreds of years, but if so, Gibbs doesn’t know about it.
Tony turns away from the pictures and looks at Gibbs. “If they couldn’t do it… If those two boy scouts with their perfect marriages and happily ever after all over the place with gorgeous women who adore them and gobs and gobs of sex, if they couldn’t stay on the path, how the fuck am I?” Tony sounds so defeated as he says that, and Gibbs sighs, wrapping his good arm around him.

The bourbon’s in the basement, and right now Gibbs really wants it. He doesn’t want to screw up the flow of the conversation by gasping away for the second half of it. “Go get a bottle.”

Tony shrugs, and then heads down to the basement.

While he heads off, Gibbs remembers a very frank, and explicit bit of man to man conversation with Tony before he married Ziva. Remembering that makes this make a whole lot more sense.

Tony’s a sex addict. That’s how he described it to Gibbs. That’s his drug of choice. Gibbs would head to his basement and drink himself stupid while working on the boat. Tony’d hit a club, grab a drink, find a girl, and fuck the demons away. That’s how those lingering ‘you’re not good enough’ voices shut up. That’s how he filled the hole of mommy died, and daddy didn’t love me, and Wendy left, and my Boss thinks I’m barely competent, and my partner thinks I’m a twit, and all the rest of it.

And that’s part of what terrified him about trying to make a functional marriage last. Because like with any other addict, he’s always going to be an addict. The voices quiet down, but they never go silent. It’s just a matter of not giving in to the impulse to do something stupid and hurt himself and everyone around him with it.

Ziva knows that about him. Gibbs imagines, given how the girls talk, that they know that about Tony, too. He’s not sure if Tim or Jimmy do, or if they’ve put it together, or if they just think he was a hornball back in the day.

Tony’s back a few seconds later, but he detours into the kitchen to grab some glasses and then sits on the sofa next to Gibbs, two shots in his glass, about a tablespoon for Gibbs. Gibbs appreciates that. He hadn’t remembered that alcohol and painkillers don’t mix. (More like he hadn’t remembered that he’s on painkillers, so he can’t drink. As this is occurring to him, he’s thinking that he’s on way better stuff than when he ripped up his knee, because at no point during healing up from that did he feel this normal. He’s sore, but… not angry or loopy.)

Tony slugs some of his back, and Gibbs takes a taste, then Tony says, “We were all in the same boat, you know? If I start getting edgy and bored, well, they’re there, too, paddling along with me. Anything they can do, I can do, too, right?” Tony looks away and takes another drink. Then he snorts, a very unhappy smiling lifting the corners of his lips as he shakes his head. “But, turns out, they couldn’t. Tim didn’t even make it two full years before he was hopping another girl.” He shakes his head again, staring at the wedding picture. “Forsaking all others. I don’t know anyone who’s done it.”

Gibbs eyes narrow at that on reflex and Tony snorts at that, too. “Don’t you look insulted. I was there for Stephanie, remember?”

Gibbs shrugs at that. “Not the one I was thinking about. If Shannon had lived, I would have been a one woman man. One. And I would have done it happily.”

Tony rolls his eyes. “We had this chat when I hired Bishop.”

Gibbs nods. He remembers. “You fucking her?”

“No!”
“Want to?”
Tony’s looking seriously disturbed by that. “NO!”
“Anyone else catching your fancy? Got a thing for Breena, too?”
“Gibbs!”
“Hot little girl at the diner, the new one, Stacy, she lightin’ a fire for you?”
Tony looks a little embarrassed. “I… I mean, I noticed her, but…”
“And you’re extra charming to her, ‘cause you want her to smile at you, but that’s it, because you love your wife and at the end of the day that’s what matters. You getting bored with Ziva? Gotten to the point where you’re making excuses, staying up late surfing the web for new girls online and jerking off with them rather than have sex with her?”
“God, no!”
Gibbs stares at him, that’s what a bad marriage looks like clear on his face, and then he finishes his tablespoon of bourbon. “Then it doesn’t matter what the hell those other two are doing. Your boat isn’t in any trouble. You’re paddling along just fine, and if there’s rapids ahead, we’re still going to grab ahold and steer you right.”
“How are they going to steer me when they’ve already crashed?”
“How about you wait for them to actually crash before you declare it a disaster?”
“They already crashed! Why do none of you get this? Fucking someone who isn’t your wife is crashing. Breaking that promise is crashing!”
“So, what, it’s all over?”
“Planes crash in the air, it takes a little while for the people on the ground to start getting hit with the wreckage. Just because you aren’t getting hurt now doesn’t mean the wreckage is going to magically just hover up there. One day what happened is really going to hit them and it’s going to hurt them and… And they’re gonna hurt each other, and us.” He looks so hurt, bone deep hurt at this. “And why the fuck would you tell them to go ahead with this?”
Gibbs licks his lips. “Same reason I told you not to date Ziva if you couldn’t marry her instead of saying don’t date her. The exact same reason, said almost the exact same thing, if it works, we’re going to be happy for you, if it doesn’t, you’ll rip us apart, so don’t do it if you can’t make it work. You and Ziva are making it work. I think they’re gonna make it work, too.”
Tony rolls his eyes at that.
“Don’t do that. If anyone can do—“
“NO ONE can do this. More than half of us can’t do it with one person. No one can manage two.”
“Three.”
“You think that makes it better? That makes it worse.”
Gibbs shakes his head. “Three’s the only way this can possibly work. They’re not swinging. They aren’t swapping. It’s not two bored guys getting their rocks off with a friendly, available woman.
That doesn’t work. That’s your pointy side down pyramid, impossible shape where everyone gets jealous and angry. It’s all four of them, together, and that’s a stable shape.”

Tony’s looking snarky about that, and then his expression shifts and he starts to look horrified. “Wait, all four of them?”

Gibbs is wondering what the hell Tim and Jimmy said to Tony, but he says, “Yeah. All four. It’s not just Jimmy and Abby and Tim and Breena, it goes all four ways.”

Tony blinks, hard. And then swallows, harder. “So, Tim and Jimmy are… With each other?”

“They’re not having sex, but yeah, they are.”

That appears to be the moment where Tony’s brain explodes. He sits there, silent, staring into the distance for a few minutes and then says, “So they’re what, gay in addition to insane?”

“I don’t think it works that way. Like I said, no sex. But…” Gibbs feels weird saying this, but, if there’s a way to pull Tony out of this, maybe this is it, “Lot of love. Maybe even romantic. I don’t know. Not sure they do, either. But yesterday Tim was calling Jimmy his husband, so, yeah, all four ways. Tim’s not…” as far as Gibbs knows, but he doesn’t, not really, “fucking his best friend’s wife. He, and Abby, and Jimmy, are fucking their wife. Bounce ‘em around however you like, but… that’s how it works. I think. Didn’t want to get too deep into the details. Ziva has ‘em by now, if you want them.”

“God.” Tony sounds horrified and disgusted. Though Gibbs can’t tell if it’s worse or better than when he came in here.

“You took a long time figuring yourself out, and then figuring you and Ziva out before you jumped in, but when you jumped, you knew you could do it. They’re not any different.”

Tony snorts at that, too. Drinking deep. “This what marriage looks like to you, Jethro? Really? We’re moving Abbi in this weekend, gonna have a chat with her about the whole monogamy thing being optional?”

“It’s not. Not for us.”

“Duck and Penny, they adding a third?”

“Don’t think so.”

Tony sprawls back in the soft, eyes closed, head resting on the back, glass in his hand on the armrest. “Because it’s not optional. Because that’s the thing, you build this relationship, you and one other person, and… It’s not a club. It’s you putting your life, your honor, your name, your home, and your heart in someone else’s hands. You do it for the rest of your life. You and them and no one else. That’s marriage. That’s the job. So, don’t tell me they’re not any different. Don’t tell me that whatever the hell they’re doing with the four of them is in any way comparable to what Ziva and I have, or what you and Shannon had. Don’t try to sell me that bowl of shit and call it soup.”

Right now Gibbs would give a year of his wages for Rachel. Or Ducky. Or anyone who knows what the hell to do with this. He’s in so deep over his head, he’s not sure if he can find the sun again. Finally, after a long minute of flailing around, he comes up with, “What makes it shit?”

Tony’s staring at him like he cannot begin to believe that Gibbs would ask him that.

“I’m serious. You’re not that religious. I know you don’t think there’s a literal old guy with a white beard watching everyone and smacking anyone who doesn’t do it exactly the way it’s written in the book. You don’t know that it can’t work. Abby claims to know people who’ve done this for decades; I’m sure Duck does, too. So, someone’s done it. You think they’re in love now and they won’t be next week? Come on, you know all four of them, they don’t work that way. So, where’s the shit?”

Tony either doesn’t have an answer for that, or it’s so blazingly self-evident to him that he can’t articulate it. Either way, he doesn’t say anything, just sits there, watching Gibbs, until his phone buzzes. Gibbs doesn’t reach for it, until Tony says, “Go, look. Which one of the WonderTwins is checking up on me?”

Gibbs looks and shakes his head. “Your wife. Says she’s called and texted you and you’re not responding.”

Tony closes his eyes and sighs. He turned the ringer off on his phone because he didn’t want either of the WonderTwins calling him.

“She wants to know if you’re okay?”

He can hear Gibbs texting.

“What are you telling her?”

“No.”

“But she is, right?”

“Maybe you could talk with her about it?”

Tony glares at that. “Telling me to leave?”

“No. Telling you that you’ll do better talking to her about how she feels than talking to me about how she feels.”

Tony shrugs at that. Gibbs isn’t wrong. “Don’t think it matters, all of you seem to be gung ho on getting ringside seats for seeing how badly this can explode.”

“None of us think it’s going to explode.”

“Then you’ve all gone insane!”

Gibbs rubs his own forehead. He knows he’s not talking to anything other than Tony’s fear right now. What he doesn’t know is how to break him out of it. It’d be one thing if Tony could shoot this, but he can’t. He dithers for another minute, trying to think of any edge where he can get into this.

“Thousand bucks. Ten years from now, when we’re celebrating their anniversary, you owe me a thousand bucks. If they don’t make it, Abbi and I’ll watch the kids, and you and Ziva have a good long weekend.”

“You want to bet on this?”

“Never had a problem making bets I’m gonna win. Don’t recall you ever having a problem with it. So, a grand? Five? How high do I have to make it for you to get worried about losing?”

Now Tony looks annoyed, instead of sad, angry, and afraid. Gibbs hopes that’s a step in the right direction. “I’m not betting on this.”
“Why not? If you’re sure they’re going to set us on fire, you might as well get a consolation prize, right?”

“I’m not going to celebrate them falling apart.”

“No. You win, this is a ticket for you to get away from it for a few days, spend some time tucked into your own marriage, with your own wife, and no drama. It’s your out.”

“The only out I want is not getting into this damn mess in the first place.”

“Not an option. So… grand? Two? What’s it going to be?”

“I’m not betting on this, Gibbs!”

“Then what are you going to do, sulk? They’re happy and playing, and you’re… moping? Next weekend, we’re all moving Abbi, you going to cut them out, not talk to them? You close on that house; you going to tell them they can’t help you make it your home? With me down, we can’t get it done in time without them. They weren’t planning on telling Senior, so you going to out them because you’re feeling off? What’s the plan, Tony?”

Tony shakes his head. “Going back to work. That’s the plan. It’s two on a Tuesday. I’ve got stuff to do.”

Gibbs nods. “Then go do it.”

Tim gets a text that says, I may have made it worse, from Gibbs. Know I didn’t make it better.

Tim looks at that and stares at the ceiling for a moment. Great.

He’s heading back to work.

Even better. Jimmy’s been called out. I’m still here. So’s Abby.

Don’t think he’s going to talk to Abby about this.

I’m shocked. Tim figures Gibbs knows him well enough to read the sarcasm on it with a winky smiley face. What the hell did we tap into on him? This can’t be… I don’t know what this is, but it’s not just this isn’t how to play the game. And it doesn’t feel like just whatever happened with Senior.

It’s not.

That’s not helpful.

I know, but if he hasn’t told you, I’m not spilling his secrets.

Gibbs! Trying to prevent a massive meltdown here, mine and his.

Like I said, I don’t know if I made it any better. So, trying the same stuff I did isn’t going to help. He’s worried about it blowing up.

Tim rolls his eyes. I know that.
Yeah. Hoping Ziva’s got him.

Then I’ll hope that, too.

You okay?

Tim sighs. I’ve had better days, you know. But yeah, holding up okay. Mostly just pissed that he can’t take his head out of his ass and see who’s in front of him, and not the ghosts in his head.

Tim figures that Gibbs nods at that.

Going to do my own work. I’ll keep you updated if he decides to come visit again.

There are a lot of texts on Tony’s phone. Most of them from Ziva. (One from Bishop asking where he went. He answers that one fast.)

She’s happy, too.

That’s a kick in the balls.

He can read between the lines of her where are you? Give me a call. Tony, you okay? Texts that she’s just fine. She’s not upset. There’s nothing about the girls having gone insane and everything being upside down and inside out. All of her concern is for him.

Which means she thinks he’s the problem, and not the four twits who are going out of their way to fuck everything sideways.

He flicks to her contact and sends back. I’m okay. Dinner? Usual time?

Yes. Or take the afternoon off and talk to me?

Abbi needs you. Bishop’s about to send out the Mounties to find me. We’ve got work. This’ll hold. All of that’s true, but it’s not what’s really going on. He’s not sure what he’s going to do when he gets back to the Navy Yard. Right now he figures the odds are even between actually work, or go yell at Tim and Jimmy some more.

Okay. No working late tonight. Anything less than a dead body gets booted to tomorrow. Pops up on his phone.

Gotcha. See you at 6:30. I’ll bring home pizza.

Good. Tali wants pineapple and black olives on my half.

He smiles at that while wincing at the combo of pineapple and black olive. You mean Dave wants pineapple and black olive.

;)
When Tony gets back to the Navy Yard, he keeps eyeballing the elevator, but decides not to do it. He does have a job. Bishop’s putting together a web of new leads. Draga’s working up a plan for who to talk to on this. All goes well, and the day after tomorrow they can start pulling people in to try and nail down what happened on the USS Banton out of Rio ten months ago.

“Equipment malfunction” is the official cause for why they completely lost all communications and navigation functions.

And, as of yet, no one’s been able to disprove that. But Tony’s got his hands in the CIA’s database, and NSA’s, plus his own, and they’re on the case.

So, they might as well be on the damn case.

Working the case is a good thing. He’s been able to get into those files, see the ones Bishop’s flagged, caught a few she missed, and yeah… there’s something going on there. Only the one case involves the US Navy, but in the last ten years ships all over the world have had the same “malfunction.” So have several planes. And a few troop convoy.

All over the world. All different militaries. CIA thinks it’s hinky, but they haven’t put much together on it. Too far under the radar to be worth the effort for a real investigation.

And it’s possible they are just ‘malfunctions.’ SNAFU exists for a reason, after all. But, since he knows McGee could actually make that malfunction happen, Tony’s wary of the official story on this one.

He gets home feeling better. Okay, maybe not better, those four. His skin starts crawling as soon as he thinks of it. So, more settled maybe. Or just not thinking about it.

But he’s walking into their place, large pizza box in his hands, knowing he can’t just let this lie.

Okay, he can. If he tells Ziva to drop it, she will.

And then on Thursday when they meet with their counselor, she’ll bring it up there, because it’s bugging him, and that’ll bug her, and that’s their game plan these days. They’ll let the other one have a free pass until the next appointment, but it’ll come up then.

So, there’s no way to get out of this.

He sighs and hears, “Tony?”

“Pizza Delivery!”

Ziva darts in from the living room. She can’t have been home long. She’s still in her work clothing, though she’s kicked off her shoes and taken her hair down.

He gets a quick kiss and she steals the pizza box from him. “I love you.”

He smiles at that. “Dave’s insistent about his pizza, huh?”

“Tali’s insistent, yes. I have been thinking about this for hours now.” She opens the lid, inhales deeply, and sighs. “Mmmm…” She and the pizza are rapidly heading to their dining table, so Tony stows his gun and badge, tosses his phone and wallet on the little table they live on, kicks off his shoes, hangs up his jacket, and is pulling off his tie as he follows her and the food.

She’s halfway through the first piece when he sits down.

“Easy there. Don’t choke the little dude!”

Ziva’s grinning at him and chewing. “Sooooo good!”

He shakes his head and kisses her. This this is a marriage. Just them and this easy, comfortable, secure, uplifting, making each other better love. This moment here, and the one before it and the one after and all the ones in between.

Ziva’s watching him. “You are looking sad.”

He picks up a slice of his own pizza. (Onions, pepper, and mushroom. Once upon a time there would have been sausage and pepperoni, too, but, they aren’t kosher. On the upside, his cholesterol count is down.) “And you are not.”

“No. It’s been a good day. I got to show off Tali, share good news with my friends, and, and this one Abbi’s loving, I was able to clear her head of HR, so she’s got someone in charge of hiring again, and someone else vetting the rest of her HR Department. So, yes, for me it’s been a very good day. But it has not for you, has it?”

“No.” He can be more open with her than with anyone, even Gibbs, so the hurt and vulnerable and all the rest of it is plain on his face. “How can you be okay with this? You remember how this works. You saw your dad walk out of your family. You saw your mother crushed by it.” He’s talking about her, but he’s remembering his own mother, and the first of the step-moms.

His mom cried a lot. How much of that was her marriage to his dad, how much was whatever was going on in her head, how much was life and the world in general, he doesn’t know. He was eight when she died. He knows they didn’t live in the city. He knows that his dad lived and worked there during the week, and on the weekends he came home to their home in the Hamptons. He knows some weekends he didn’t come home.

Some weekends they yelled at each other, a lot.

He was ten when his dad married Leslie. She was warm, and pleasant, and looked a lot like his mom. She was kind and gentle. She was quiet. There was no yelling. And there was no craziness. He was still in school most of the year, but when he was home he liked being with her. She wasn’t his mom, and she didn’t try to pretend to be his mom, (never asked him to call her Mom, stuff like that) but she was willing to be his friend. She liked movies, too. (In fact, though he doesn’t talk about this much, she’s the one who really got the movies kick going for him. He was too young to really remember the movies with his mom. Mostly he remembers being with her and going to the movies. Popcorn and soda and the trip into the city. With Leslie, he remembers actually watching movies.)

He was thirteen when she started crying all the time and his Dad kept working late and going away on business trips.

And he was fourteen when she moved out.

And he was still fourteen when his Dad married Sandra. He didn’t like her. She did want to be called Mom and tried too hard, and… and she wasn’t his mom and she wasn’t Leslie, so he froze her out. But he still heard the crying, and the fights, and he still felt off, unsettled, unhappy when she packed up and left when he was seventeen.
Not that he would have said that. He was busy setting the record for most military schools flunked out of in one year. But, because he managed to get himself tossed out in less than six weeks each time, he spent a lot more of that year at home than the previous ones. So he got to see a lot more of what a train wreck of a marriage looks like.

He was almost nineteen when his Dad called about Amanda. He met her once, found she was younger than he was, and then he lost the invitation to the wedding and his Dad’s number for the next two years.

Ziva can see him thinking about his past and gives him a moment with it before saying, “I can be okay with this because it is not what happened to my parents, or yours, or your father and all of your stepmothers.”

“Are you really going to defend adultery to me?”

“No. But I do not think this qualifies.”

He snorts at that. “I might not be you with your nine languages or McWordsmith with all of his books, but I think I remember the definition of adultery. It’s not a complicated concept.”

Ziva shrugs.

“No like sleeping with his protégée did anything good for your parents’ marriage, and it certainly never made anything better for any of my dad’s. Love, honor, cherish, forsake. We’ve got that written on our wall, and I remember that being part of their weddings, too, because that’s the non-negotiable part. If you’re not doing that, you’re fucking it up.”

She touches his hand gently.

“That’s what this whole marriage thing is about, it’s you and me, not you and me and our buddies. This,” he gestures to cover them, and then lightly strokes her belly, “is just us. No one else. It’s exclusive and sacred and… and… and you don’t break that because you can’t come back from it. The cracks are always there. And… And Gibbs knows that. He’s got the divorces to prove it. How he’s going along with this shit–”

Ziva kisses him.

“Why are you doing that?”

“Because you are upset.”

“Why aren’t you? They’re our best friends and we love them and they’re… they’re hurting themselves and their kids and our family and… How can you be calm about this? How do we ever get the fantasy of all of us together at the house, kiddies having happy Chanukah and Christmas if they aren’t talking to each other because they fucked it up by fucking each other?”

“Because I do not think they are fucking things up. I think they are happy, with each other, and this is happiness growing.” Ziva thinks about this for a moment, noticing something that might be a bigger, or at least more immediate problem than if the McPalmers can keep McPalming. “If they are okay, is this a problem for you?”

“First off, they won’t be ‘okay!’ That’s just… It won’t happen.”

“Why not?”
“Because no one is okay with this. There is not a guy on earth who can watch another man fuck his wife and not feel some sort of tiny sliver of ‘I’m going to kill him.’ Maybe right now they’re so horny and turned on they can’t feel that, but it’s there, and eventually they’ll stop thinking with their dicks and they will feel it, and it will kill everything. Back at his bachelor party, I watched Tim get ready to hit Jimmy for joking about it, so… No! They aren’t going to be okay with this. Maybe right now they’re having enough fun it’s all right, but it won’t stay that way. It’s like jumping out of an airplane without a chute, those first few seconds are great, but sooner or later you hit the ground and it hurts!”

Ziva kisses him again. “You do not want to see them hurt, right?”

He nods at that. There are probably some other squirrelly things in his head, too, but that’s the heart of this.

“Right now, they are not hurting. Right now they are happy and stable,” he doesn’t look like he buys that, but she keeps going on, “and in love, and all sorts of good things, but they are going to be very hurt if you go out of your way to make this into a problem. They are going to be hurt if you back away from them. And they are going to be hurt if you are mean about this.”

He bites his lip.

“Say it.” Too many hours of not saying things that needed to be said, and too many feelings left buried between them have never done them any good. Part of why they are working so well right now is that they do say these things, even if they think they’re too silly or too revealing.

“I’m protecting myself. I can control this. I get to break it on my terms, because it’s going to crush me when they fall apart. Next to you and,” his hand touches her stomach, “they’re almost everyone in the world who matters to me, and when they break, it’s going to hit all of us.”

She can feel his fear in those words. Ziva puts down her pizza, and puts down his, and then snuggles into his lap. “For all of us, all of our weddings, we were there not just to party… Okay, maybe not Palmer’s, we were there to party, but for ours and McGees, and Ducky’s, and whenever Gibbs and Abbi get married, part of being there was promising that we’d help each other be married. We wanted this life, and we were there, vowing to help each other get it. Keep your vow. Help them have this life they want, and help to secure your own happiness with it.”

There’s a lot of defeat in his eyes right now, and she’s sure he’s thinking something along the lines of what’s the point of keeping my vows if they didn’t keep theirs? but he’s also not arguing it. He’s just sitting there, arms around her, mouth pressed into her shoulder, holding her tight.

Chapter End Notes

Okay... So, a million years ago, back when I started this McPalmer idea, my original plan was everyone else in the family would be instantly cool with it, because... Well, why the hell not? It's love, lots and lots of love, and that's awesome, right? Everyone's cool with that, right? I'd do it slow, an inch at a time, and by the time they were ready to 'come out' everyone else would be cool because they'd have been seeing how all four of them were perfect together.

So, anyway, fast forward a year, and I'm writing two versions of this story because apparently a decent chunk of people are not just automatically cool with this, even with dearly loved characters where the groundwork's been set up properly and all the rest of it, they just think this is icky.

So, given that that is true, I needed to work that into the story somehow, too. I write humans, not angels, and a lot of humans do not like this idea at all. So, how to try to do this in a respectful and real sort of way. Anyway, very limited cast of characters for this, and Leon's just too damn removed (and honestly has too much power) for him to be a useful foil, likewise Ed is too easy to brush off, so...

So, insert Tony. I have my own read on why people get upset about things like polyamory. It's... um... probably less charitable than it could be. (Though given some of the PMs I got about how disgusting it would be for Tim to love Jimmy, maybe not.) So, I'm not sure if I did a good job with Tony here, trying to make his reaction real, in character, respectful of the POV that thinks marriage is just two people and any other combination doesn't fly, and do it without too much of my own self coming through.

I hope this chapter worked. I'm afraid it doesn't. If Tony's coming off too wooden, it's because I'm trying to portray something I just don't and can't understand. (I got a lot of comments and PMs about why McPalmer was wrong, icky, wouldn't work, gross, evil, un-Christian, and on and on. The 'wouldn't work and people will get hurt' struck me as the only legitimate one of those concerns for any of my characters to have. I'm doing my best with it.)

Got one more chapter on this, Tony and Tim and really talking. Then back to Shards to get that updated.

Happy Monday, everyone!
Marriage, Sex, Love

Lunch? A one word text from Tim on his phone.

Tony’s glaring at it.

It’s morning. He knows he’s got to deal with at least one of the WonderTwins sooner or later (though he’d prefer a big helping of later on this) and right now, as he should be getting ready to do work, you know, his job, saving lives and making the world safer and hunting down terrorists and killers, and instead he’s getting ready to deal with McHornball and his evil twin, Too Damn Stupid to Breathe and Chew Gum At Once.

To say he resents the hell out of having to deal with this is an understatement by about six orders of magnitude.

Bishop’s squinting over at him. “Bad news?”

He waves it off. “Something I’ve got to deal with.” He picks up his phone and replies with Now.

Where? Comes back.

You’re the one with the office. Just close the damn blinds.

Done. Whenever you’re ready.

“How about never?” Tony mutters as he pockets his phone and heads to the elevator. He looks over his shoulder and sees both Bishop and Draga staring at him in wonder. He turns on his heel and heads back.

“If I’d seen Gibbs do this, our team would have been all over it. We’d have wheedled and poked and found out what was going on. This is personal, not work. None of your business. Either or both of you try to get into this and your butts never touch those chairs again.” He stares both of them down. They nod. “Good.”

He turns again, and Bishop quietly asks, “Are you okay?”

“No.”

Draga looks at her and then him. “Are you going to be okay?”

Tony rolls his eyes. “Everyone says I will. And I can and will be able to do our job just fine, so… Back to work.”

Bishop’s giving him the one more question look.

“Bishop?”

“Your baby is okay, right?”

Tony sighs. “Dave is okay. Ziva is okay. No one is hurt. No one is sick. I’m glad you two are concerned, but this is none of your business, and it better stay that way, got me?”

They nod again. Tony points to their computers. “When I get back I want a full on plan of attack, who we’re going after first, what we expect to get from him, where we’re going next. Might be a while, so if you’ve got it done before I’m up here, send me an email and get moving on step one.”

“On it!” Draga says, turning to face his keyboard as Bishop hops over to sit on his desk.

---

As the elevator descends, Tony wonders if doing this with Tim is a good plan. They’re really good at pushing each other’s buttons and he can see this breaking out into a real fight too easily.

Of course, if that happens, it’ll hurt, physically, but he’ll be able to work some of this crap off, and Tim’s usually okay once he blows off his own fight. Meanwhile, Jimmy’s just, vicious, when he’s unhappy, so…

Okay, yeah, Tim.

Then Tony groans, if whatever the hell Gibbs is saying about Tim and Jimmy is right, then if he takes a swing at Tim to work this off, he’s going to end up with Jimmy on his back, and…

God, when the fuck did that happen? Though he supposes that sheds some light on what the hell Tim was doing with Jimmy during that mountain of Jeanne flavored shit. Tim was, ugh, this feels like two hundred shades of icky, defending his man.

He shakes his head. Don’t go there.

Last night was a long night. He did get to sleep eventually. And most of the stuff in his head is worried about them, all of them, as a family, and the pain he knows is coming. There’s a healthy side of feeling extremely frustrated that people who ought to know better, I’m looking at you, Gibbs, are all up in this insane fantasy, leaving him out on his own with this. Okay, sure, the girls fall for the romance of it. And Penny’s probably tickled pink at this idea, any weird sex thing is cool with her. Plus she’s got so much guilt about Tim’s childhood, she’ll go along with anything he’s interested in because she’s feeling like she’s got to be extra supportive now to make up for then. If anything ever bothered Ducky that didn’t involve people getting killed, Tony’s never seen it. Great. They’re all yay, this is fine.

But Gibbs? Gibbs should have his back on this. Gibbs is supposed to be immune to the KoolAid, not serving it up with them.

There’s disappointment. Tim and Jimmy are supposed to be better than this. Okay, yeah, he rags on them about being Boy Scouts, but he’s just teasing. He needs some Boy Scouts in his life. He needs honorable men in his life, and losing that feels like a knife to the guts.

Part of it is disgust. It’s Tim and Jimmy. (Urghlk!) He can at least understand the appeal of Breena and Abby. They are both beautiful, warm, funny, clever, and women. And they have all been married/monogamous for a long time, so, okay, maybe they are bored and this is a way to spice things up that’s ‘safe.’ But Tim and Jimmy. He winces at that, a whole lot of images he really doesn’t like dancing around in his head.

And he’s not stupid, he understands sharing a woman with a buddy. (He’s never done it. Never had a buddy he could have done that with. But he gets the basic idea.) But… you don’t do that with a woman you love or respect. You stop doing things like that when you’ve got a woman you love and respect. That’s you and a friend blowing off some steam. That’s not something you do with your wife. Not if you mean it about her being the love of your life.
Tony realizes the elevator has stopped the doors have opened and are closing as he jumps out. Time to face the firing squad.

Tim does have his blinds drawn, as well as Private Meeting: text if you need me on the whiteboard next to his door. He’s got coffee for both of them, though they’re also both decaf. He’s thinking that maybe Tony doesn’t need any stimulants to go with this.

He’s taking a moment to get himself as calm as he can because he doubts Tony’s going to be in a good place. He’s not arguing. He’s not defending. He’s trying to help his friend get used to a major shift in their reality.

And it doesn’t matter what he’s trying to do, because his door is opening, and Tony’s heading in. So now it’s all about what he is doing.

“Hey.”

Tony nods, sitting down in one of the chairs in front of Tim’s desk. Tim circles around his desk and joins him, handing over the coffees. They both drink for a moment, waiting for the other one to talk.

Finally Tony breaks the silence. “So, no shit, no… anger… no… whatever. How does this happen? Everyone else is all, ‘This is great, it’s gonna be so cool’” he’s got his sarcasm amped to the max on that, but manages to pull it back, before he says, “but I can’t see it, so, what are they seeing that I’m not?”

Tim bites back his own sarcasm and doesn’t respond with reality. He thinks through where this has gone and how it started and all the rest of it, trying to see what Tony’s not seeing, why he’s not automatically on board with it. He’s trying to figure out how Tony can see how good they are together in the rest of their lives, and not make the jump to them being good with more.

Lay the groundwork. Build it up. Show him. “How does it ever work?” Tim says. “Slowly. You’re friends, and you enjoy each other. Having them around makes you happy. Okay, that gets us to losing Jon. And they were hurting so bad, and we didn’t want them to hurt, and you feel it, that part of yourself that dies with them when they die. You know that, right? Feel it for Ziva if no one else?”

“I feel that for all of you. And yet I’m managing to not sleep with you.”

Tim flashes him a quick, I thought we were trying to just talk look, and Tony nods, reining it in.

“And there’s putting your literal body on the line try and make that better. That’s me and Jimmy beating it out when it got dark. I did it for him when he was in the dark, and he’s done it for me when I’ve been there. So, that’s what, the heterosexual guy equivalent of comfort sex?”

“In whatever Bizarro-world you two live in, sure,” Tony says, sipping his coffee. “Is this decaf?”

Tim nods. “Figured we were tense enough without extra chemical help.”

Tony half shrugs. Tim’s not wrong, but too much caffeine makes him edgy and lack of it makes him crabby.

Tim starts talking again. “There’s good times, talking and dinners. And nervous times, waiting in the Doc’s office for them when they got the Nuchal Fold test for Anna. And scary times, like when Jimmy came and pulled us out of the previa panic. And, and a lot of stupid stuff, one conversation at a time, one good day, one bad day, the same way you fell in love with Ziva, and I with Abby, and Jimmy with Breena, just with more people. And the sex is there, because Breena’s beautiful and so is Abby, and neither Jimmy nor I are blind so, it’s there, but, it was just… flirty and not real. Nice scenery. Appreciating the view. I know you know how that works.”

Tony nods at that. He does. He’s been quite happy to “appreciate the view” of Abbi and Abby and Breena on numerous occasions, especially when they’re all dressed up pretty, and at the beach was a lot of nice view as well.

“But that’s all it was. People you love who love you back and you’re friendly and close and it’s good. And the girls get talking, and suddenly it’s maybe more than that. Maybe, if Jimmy and I could handle it, maybe there’ll be a chance for some ‘hands on’ view appreciating. And Abby and Jimmy have always been close and the girls just clicked too, but, I mean, you know Abby likes girls, too, right?”

Tony nods. He kind of remembers Tim mentioning that. It never really hit him, but yeah he knows, sort of the same way he knows that Abby does stuff with chemicals that gets them answers. It happens, but he doesn't have the details.

“So, we’re friends, and we love each other, and we’re attracted to each other, and Abby and Breena decide to play around a bit to wind Jimmy and I up and holy shit it does that just fine. Those Valentine’s videos were so hot they melted our phones, okay?” Tim stops on that for a second, remembering Tony talking about bored. “And it’s not that we’re bored in our own marriages. That’s not what’s going on. I am not bored with Abby. She’s not bored with me. If I had to only be with one person for the rest of my life, she’s it, and I’d be happy there. I… just, don’t have to. Being happy with Breena doesn’t mean I’m less happy with Abby, and I wasn’t eyeballing Breena because I felt like I was missing out on something with Abby.”

Tony’s not buying it. BULLSHIT is loud and clear on his face.

Tim tries to keep plowing on. “When Breena and I were talking about this, long before any touching or anything else happened, she was talking about how if this was going to happen it had to be about love. And how one love makes your other loves stronger… How if anything ever happened it would have to come from our love for each other, not be in spite of it.”

Tony’s still got BULLSHIT aimed at him.

Tim changes tracks. “Um… You do something you love with Ziva and it’s good, right?”

“Sure.” Tony sounds tentative, not sure what he’s agreeing to.

“Like, basketball games are more fun with her because you love her and you love them, and you wrap it all up and it’s good, right?”

That gets a tentative nod out of Tony.

“Same for movies and for the books she likes and all the rest of that, right? Sharing the things you love with people you love is awesome?”

“Yeah. I get it.”

Tim’s staring at him, intensely, looking very earnest. “Do you? Because that’s where this starts and that’s how it gets here. One thing at a time. Saturday at the Farmer’s Market, and laying around relaxing while the girls nap, and sharing a bottle of wine, and all of that, one step at a time. And it’s good because we love it and they love it, and we get to love it together, which makes us love each other more and…

“And… taking care of each other. Abby’s having a rough time after Kelly and they were there, had our backs, knew what to do, carried us through. And us being there for them after Jon. And Jimmy heading to California after the Stennis while Breena took care of Kelly. Big things like that. Little things like,” he touches his wrist cuff, “Breena found a place that sold them, and Abby and Jimmy picked it out, because they knew I loved the old one, and it was destroyed.”

“What Jimmy’s doing with Gibbs.”

Tim didn’t know that Tony knew about that, but… “Yeah. He’s training to kill the Admiral, learning how to snipe. How to do it for real. I mean, you and I have some marksman skills, but he’s got Gibbs teaching him how to do it from a mile away. He’s putting his whole life on the line for me. What is that if it’s not love?”

“Just because you love each other doesn’t mean you have to be sleeping together.” Tony gestures between the two of them. “We love each other, and I really don’t want to hear it if you’re interested in sleeping with me.”

Tim winces at that idea.

“Eloquently put,” Tony says, dryly.

“I don’t love you the same way I love them. And I don’t love Gibbs the way I love them. So I’m not interested in sharing a bed with you guys, or since I’m straight and you’re guys, say Ziva, who is female and hot and beautiful, and someone I love, but I have no interest in having sex with. And, hell, I don’t want to fuck Jimmy either. ’cause I’m still a straight guy, but I want him to be there with us, because it’s better when he’s there. Does that make sense?”

Tony shrugs. No, not really, not to him. He can’t wrap his mind around feeling that way about more than one person, but he can see Tim’s genuinely feeling this.

“Do we love each other?” Tim asks.

Tony nods. Yeah, now they do. He knows that. He just doesn’t think it’s enough.

“If you accept that we do love each other, why shouldn’t we be sleeping together?”

And for a second there, Tim thinks he’s getting through, thinks he’s making some headway and that Tony’s buying it, but that second ends when Tony snaps, “Because it’s a fairy tale, Tim! And no one gets the happily ever after, and you and Palmer are idiots to even try.”

Tim’s shaking his head. “Just…” He glares at Tony, trying to unjumble the thoughts in his head.
“No! I’m getting the goddamn fairy tale, and Abby and Jimmy and Breena are getting it with me.
And why the fuck shouldn’t we? We’ve worked hard for this. We didn’t just wake up one morning, ‘Hey, let’s get naked and fuck!’ It took years to get here, and yes, once it actually got rolling it moved pretty quick, but that’s because this is right. This is who and where we’re supposed to be,
and…

“And I don’t care about the fact that you are scared. It’s not that we’re not going to make it, because we are, it’s you can’t see through your fear. I am not your Dad. Jimmy isn’t, either. That shot about sleeping with Breena because I respect her, fuck yes! I respect her. I adore her. I love her, and because of all of that she is drop dead sexy to me. So is Abby, and both of them together is over-the-moon incredible, and I get to have that, both of them, and Jimmy and all of us together and free and happy, and… No. You don’t get to shit on that because you don’t understand it," Tim’s voice is getting higher and faster as he gets more excited.

“Then how about I shit on it because I don’t approve?” Tony spits out.

“Why wouldn’t you? Do you think I’m lying about this?” Tim’s staring at Tony, eyes hot, angry and earnest.

“No. I know you aren’t lying to me. I think you’re lying to yourself. I think you are wrong about how this will work. I think your dick is driving the bus right now, and it’s telling you any lie it can to get what it wants, but sooner or later your brain will kick back in and you’ll see what a mess this is and it’s going to hurt you, all four of you and your kids, so bad. It’s a fairy tale, Tim! NO ONE gets the fairy tale; they’re fiction. This doesn’t happen in the real world. Horny and stupid and bored happens in the real world. Those bodies we used to clean up together. That happens in the real world. Happy, stable, loving foursomes, they don’t exist.”

“Yes, they do!” Tim shoots back. "And you’re living right next to one, and raising your kids with one, so get used to it.”

“No. No, I am not setting myself or my family up for that. My nine-year-old isn’t going to be asking why Uncle Jimmy and Aunt Breena and Uncle Tim and Aunt Abby aren’t talking to each other anymore unless they’re yelling. I went through ten lifetimes of that, and I am not putting my kids through it.”

“Yeah, well, I’m not putting your kids through that, either, because it’s not going to happen! You can stick Happily Ever After on my tombstone if you want, because we are going to make it!”

Tony pulls himself back. His voice drops in speed and intensity. “Tim, you’re being unreasonable.”

Tim’s eyebrows shoot so high up they’re in danger of bonking into the moon. “I’m…” his mouth opens and closes. “Wait…” He pauses, nothing coming out. He’s with it enough to see how Tony just pulled himself out of fight mode, so he takes a second to try and do it for himself.

Tony takes that pause and presses on. “Reasonable people don’t risk everything they love for sex. Reasonable people realize they’ve got all the good anyone ever gets so they sit there, happy and content, and they stay with that. Reasonable people don’t intentionally torpedo their own marriages.”

“God, did you hear anything I said?”

“I heard it. And one day, you’re going to come down off your high and realize how stupid this is.”

That’s not hitting Tim right at all. “How can you possibly be this narrow-minded? We’ve talked about this, and back then, when you thought it was just me and Abby hooking up with some girl, you were cool with it. You’ve had threesomes. Nameless, unloving, jerking off with a few girls at once threesomes, so what is going on here?”

Tony looks startled. “When the hell did we talk about this before?”

“Remember, we were talking about kids bugging you and you were talking about looking at other women, checking out the waitress, and I mentioned even Abby checked out the waitress if she was hot enough, and you asked if we’d ever had a threesome, and back then you were cool about it.”

Tony pauses and thinks about it for a few seconds, and says, “You weren’t married then.”
“Of course I was married then.”

Tony thinks a little longer. “No. It was before Molly was born. You guys weren’t even engaged then.”

“Doesn’t mean I wasn’t married.”

Tony’s staring at Tim like he’s insane. “No, Tim, not being married is the definition of not being married. It’s an either or thing, either you’re married or you’re not, and you and Abby weren’t married then.”

Tim knows he and Tony don’t always see eye to eye on things, especially on love and sex, but he never realized they were this far apart.

“It wasn’t the wedding that made us married, Tony. Wasn’t the rings or the vows. Not to say I didn’t like it, or it wasn’t nice, but… that’s what it was, something fun and nice and a good day with each other and all of our friends. Married isn’t making a promise, it’s living the promise day in and day out, so… if a promise starts it, that promise happened well before you and I had that conversation.”

Tony looks a little annoyed by that, and seems to think it isn’t exactly on point. “Either way, fucking Jimmy and Breena happened way the hell after it. So you were married! And I’ve never had a threesome when I was married. And I’ve really never had one with another guy. And I sure as hell didn’t do it after I stood up in front of everyone on Earth who mattered to me and God and promised to spend the rest of my life having sex with only one woman. I was your best man. I was at Jimmy’s wedding. Both of you stood up for me at mine. This whole marriage thing is just one other person, right? It’s supposed to be sacred. You draw the line in the sand, and you pledge your life and your honor to not ever crossing it.”

Tim sort of shrugs at that. He doesn’t feel any less married than he did last week. If anything he’s way more married than ever before. He, thinks about it more, and… if they were just fooling around, he’d be willing to concede that Tony’s got a point. But they aren’t fooling around, and they aren’t fooling around because married is his bedrock, and he’s not willing to risk that for sex, even awesome sex.

Something else hits with that, that fight could have gone very wrong. There was a better than average chance of him never walking again. A little extra pressure, a slightly different position, and that would have been the end of his spine, and his sex life as he knew it. When that hits, something else does, too. It wouldn’t have mattered. Even if he'd ended up on a vent and all he could have added to this was his voice, they still would have gotten here.

He shifts from there, thinking about Breena, and how, technically they haven’t had sex, yet, and how it doesn’t matter, because it’s not the sex that builds this, it’s not the sex that defines it (though he’s very much looking forward to all of the flavors and colors of sex that are coming) it’s the love, and it’s living that love. And he knows, right now, in a way he didn’t before, that if he and Breena never cross that line, he’ll still be okay with this. He’ll sleep next to her and cuddle her and help her and Jimmy and Abby raise their babies, and that will be fine.

Because the sex is the icing on the cake, not the cake, and the cake is not the meal. And, yes, the icing is delicious, and yes, he loves the icing, but he wants the whole meal. It’s all of this together that nourishes him and fills the hollow places and lets him grow to be the man he wants to be.

He tunes back in and hears Tony say, “Or how about this: you and Jimmy were the only guys I knew who were doing monogamy forever and succeeding at it. You’re my role models for what a functional marriage looks like, ’cause I sure as hell didn’t have one growing up. Besides you two, I don’t have any close relationships with anyone who made it work. What I had was a guy who screwed up seven marriages chasing other women, never satisfied with what he had. And another guy who screwed up three more trying to get the woman he lost back.”

Tim looks at Tony and says, “It’s not about sex. Not what’s between me and Breena and Jimmy and Abby, not what’s going on with you and us, none of this is about sex.”

Tony’s looking startled at that. That’s nowhere he expected Tim to take this.

“We could do all of this emotional stuff, but not have sex. We were having a good time with that. Just loving and watching and talking but not touching. If we go back to that, are you going to be okay with this?”

He’s looking even more startled, now.

“No fucking around, no getting our rocks off, my dick stays in Abby, Jimmy’s stays in Breena, but we still love each other, and we still sleep together, and we take care of each other, and we raise our babies together, and we share a bed and a home, but no sex, is that cool with you?”

Tony’s not sure what to say to that.

“That was the last six weeks. Since I got back from California, really. All the love, none of the touch, the sex was turning each other on by sight and voice, watching each other, but no touching. A big neon ‘don’t cross’ line. If we stay on the no touching side of the line, is that okay, Tony?”

Tony doesn’t like this question at all. He’s either got to come down on the side of ‘don’t love each other,’ or say that sex matters more than all the rest of it, so he still doesn’t say anything.

Tim’s got ideas whirling around fast and sloppy, so he hopes this makes as much sense to Tony as it does in his head. “Adultery is the symptom, not the disease. Whatever’s gone wrong in that marriage has led to secrets and lies and broken promises. But that’s not happening here. You have an affair, the time, energy, attention, and love you’d be spending on your family goes somewhere else. You’re taking yourself away from your home and your marriage. And worse than that, you’re keeping secrets and lying to them to do that. And most of the guys we see do that, are doing it because there’s something wrong, either with them or with the relationship, whatever, something is missing and they’re hunting for it elsewhere.”

“Everything you ever needed to know about my dad or Gibbs’ affairs.”

Tim nods along. He doesn’t have the ins and outs of all of Gibbs’ marital adventures, but that conversation about trying to get with Abby while he was married to Stephanie covered the bases just fine for him.

“Okay, so we’re good on that, right? When you run from your own marriage, you’re cheating.”

Tony nods along with that.

“Okay. The guy locked in his office having IM sex with someone who isn’t his wife, even if he and his internet girl never meet in real life, he’s cheating, right?”

Tony doesn’t look like he believes Tim would say that. “You’re going to pass judgment on cheating?”

“You going to tell me it’s not?” Meanwhile Tim thinks this is astonishingly self-evident and feels like Tony’s intentionally missing the point.
“Most guys don’t think it’s cheating.”

“Do you? You find out Ziva’s got an online boyfriend, that gonna piss you off?”

“Yes.”

“You got an online fuck buddy; you don’t think that’s cheating? ‘Cause if you don’t, Gibbs, Jimmy, and I are going to have a conversation with you and we will bring the baseball bats.”

Tony just stares at him for a second. “Are you really going to lecture me about adultery? You’re going to get all protective of Ziva, to me? Four days ago your dick was in Jimmy, and you’ve got the nerve to suggest that online sex is inappropriate?”

Tim’s not sure why Tony’s so hung up on the sleeping with Jimmy part of this. He can’t tell if Tony’s trying to piss him off, get them really fighting, or if he’s just not getting what’s going on. So, beyond a token, keep the facts straight, he’s going to skim over that. “Really, not fucking Jimmy, but beside that, yes. Because if you’ve got an online fuck buddy, Ziva doesn’t know about her, and that’s not cool at all. That’s those idiots claiming it’s not really cheating if it’s oral, or they’re away from home, or whatever lie they tell themselves to make it okay. Your wife doesn’t know about it, you’re cheating. So, online fuck buddy, do you think that’s cheating?”

“Yeah, it is.”

“Okay, how about porn. I know what’s on your computer. Is that cheating?”

Tony looks uncomfortable. “Don’t even try that. I know what you’ve got on yours, too.”

“Not anymore, you don’t. And even if you did, it’s not about getting off on a woman who isn’t your wife. At least, not to me, but if you’re going to draw the line that high, we need to have a chat about what’s on your hard drive and in your video collection.

“It’s about the context. You chose to fuck those pictures instead of her, you’re cheating. You play with pictures of her or someone else when she’s not an option, that’s fine. But if you’re taking yourself away from sex with her so you can spank it on your own with someone else in your head, you’re cheating. Can we agree on that?”

Tony doesn’t want to agree with that, because he can see where Tim’s going, but he doesn’t disagree, either. That was one of the biggest shifts from single to in a relationship. Yes, there was a lot more sex, but it required another person so it wasn’t whenever he just felt like it. A quick jerk to blow off some steam at the end of the day became less appealing when he knew Ziva was going to get home in an hour or so. And since he’s not seventeen, that meant rearranging things so he could have sex with her, which meant not having the quick jerk after work.

So, finally, he nods at Tim, because he’s right.

“Okay, so, if you’re doing that, the only skin in that game is yours. But you’re still cheating, because skin and bodies don’t matter. Not for this. Trust matters, love matters, intimacy, time, and joy and commitment matters; that’s your marriage. At least, that’s mine, and I hope that’s yours. Skin and naked and bodies is just part of how you do it. So, either you’re in that space, where you’re together with your love, keeping your life centered on her life and joys, and if you are, then everything you do with her is in bounds. Porn can be a lot of fun, with her, right?”

Tony nods, yeah there has been some fun like that.

“Well, if watching porn together is okay..."
Tony knows where Tim is going but he shakes his head so Tim shifts, getting back to the heart of this. "If you love her and you're right with her, it's all right. Or you're not right with her. And if you're not, even if you are staying monogamous, you’re cheating. That guy who hides from his wife, stays up until after she goes to bed, jerks off in the shower, and hasn’t said a word to her about anything other than the kids in months is cheating. Because sex isn’t the issue, it’s just the way the issue is expressed.

“Either the relationship works or it’s broken, and if it’s broken it doesn’t matter how it’s broken, and if it works, then all of it works.

“And we work. Abby and I work as a twosome. Jimmy and Breena work as a twosome. All four of us work together, too. We play with each other and nothing’s being taken away from our marriage. No lies. No secrets. We’re all loving each other together, building on our individual relationships and adding even more good to them and enriching the four of us together at the same time. You do something you and Ziva love together, and it’s good, right? You feel closer to each other?"

Tony nods. They’ve been over this.

Tim’s taking it a level more explicit. “So, it works for movies, and it works for sex, too. Abby and I making love to Breena together. We love sex. It’s fun with just each other, and it’s fun with someone else in the middle, too. The girls doing me, and Jimmy getting off on watching it. Him and I pleasing Abby. Him and I playing with Breena. The girls doing each other and letting us watch. All four of us at once and on and on… That’s it. It’s sex, but it’s not about sex because…” Tim’s got to slow down and put it together, he feels like he can almost grab what’s in his mind right now, and fortunately Tony lets him get it, rather than listen to him stutter for a minute to just fill the void.

“Okay, when Abby and I got together it was sex that led into love. First time I saw her, first time I wanted her, it was about bodies. It was about how hot she was and what I wanted to do with and to her because of it. My dick was on board with the plan long before I knew anything about her. But that’s not how it worked with Jimmy and Breena because I was already more than content with all the sex any man ever needs when we got to know them. So with them we fell in love, and that got us to a place where sex could be part of it. That got us past jealous and territorial and the world’ll end if your hand touches his dick and all the rest of that shit. It’s absolutely fucking awesome to be on the other side of that, Tony.”

Tony squints a little, not entirely looking sure about that.

“Look, honestly, I’ve had a ton of sex. Wild, kinky, come so hard you black out, leather, ropes, in public, in private, doing and being done to sex. If you can imagine it, and it doesn’t involve inflicting pain or humiliation, I’ve probably done it. And trust me, I’ve done stuff you can’t imagine, too. And this weekend, which didn’t involve any of that, was amazing. For all four of us. And it’s not like Jimmy or Breena or Abby were timid virgins, either. And so were the weekends before that, the ones where we didn’t cross the line.

“And we could have been doing this for years, but Jimmy and I couldn’t get over ourselves. And yeah, that’s not easy to do. You kiss Abby; I’ll punch you into next week, and when you land Jimmy’ll kick your ass, and you know we’ve been practicing enough to do it. So it’s not like this whole, hey, 'let’s share' thing comes naturally to either of us.” Tim shakes his head. Really didn’t come easy, but nothing that’s really worth it comes easy.

“But… oh fuck… It was so worth it. I can’t love Abby more. There’s just no way. She’s my life and heart and soul. But I could love Jimmy and Breena more, and I do, because there is the extra bond that comes with pleasure and literally sharing your naked self with someone else.
“So, you want to know how I can let him fuck Abby? Because she was smiling when they did it. Because he was, too. Same thing for me and Breena.”

Tony shakes his head, eyes rolling. “You really believe that?”

“Yes! It’s love and sex and pleasure and joy. It’s waking up wrapped in people who adore you.”

“It’s waking up with another guy’s boner poking you in the ass.”

Tim shrugs at that; he was the one doing the poking. And sure, that had been disconcerting, but he’s sure as hell not letting Tony know that. Plus, he’s not sure if he’d find it disconcerting now, especially not after this marathon with Tony.

Tony’s eyes squint as he notices the shrug. “Oh God, you did wake up like that, didn’t you?”

He knows, hopes, he will get to the point of what Abby was talking about, where, sure he’s not fucking Jimmy, but he’s there and skin and touch and bodies is just all okay, no big deal. Where if he wakes up with Jimmy spooning him it’s not an issue. So, he answers from there. “It happens. If you’ve got four people in a bed, two of them will be in the middle and they will have people snuggled against them on both sides. It’s a really excellent way to wake up, warm and close and… It feels good all over. It makes you feel good all over. And that’s why we’re doing this.”

They just stare at each other for a long minute before Tim sighs asks, “So, what happens now. I can see you aren’t convinced or relieved or… anything really.”

Tony shakes his head. He’s not. They’re all floating along on big fluffy clouds of sex and love and… And they can’t see the real world because they’re too high on pleasure right now. “I can’t lose you guys.”

“We’re not going anywhere, you know? We get this is a big deal and we know you’re not going to be instantly okay with it, but… we hope you’ll get there.”

Tony’s not looking thrilled at that, so Tim pokes a little further. “You can’t lose us? What’s that mean to you?”

“It means… It means you’re my friends, and I love you, and I want you in my life, and you’re scaring the shit out of me. It means being the man Ziva wants me to be and being strong and useful and still standing up for that unspoken deal we’ve all got about trying to keep our marriages working. It means on Saturday morning we’ll load up Abbi’s stuff and get her moved into Gibbs place, and Friday night we’ll have dinner together, and I’ll pray you guys know what you’re doing and dread that you don’t. I won’t mention it. I won’t be an asshole about it. But you are freaking me out.”

“I’m sorry you’re freaked out. We’re not trying to freak you out.”

“Molly isn’t trying to freak you out when she breaks loose and tries to run into traffic, either. Doesn’t mean you want to watch it, or that it’s a good idea.”

Tim can feel that tight, choking sensation that goes with the idea of Molly doing that. He hates that feels. Helpless, out of control, everything that matters spinning away from you.

“Tony, I really am sorry this is distressing to you. We’re not going to be ‘out’ in the wider world. This is for home and family only, so… Would it be easier if you don’t see it? Keep it behind closed doors at our homes, and… we were talking about setting up our wing of the house with one bedroom for the four of us, it doesn’t have to be that way. You don’t flip out; we don’t rub it in your face. That’s… detente, right?”
“One room?”

“Yeah. Take out that hallway. Big play place for the kids, and some sort of nursery, and bathroom for them. Depending on where the supports need to be we might make that one really big open space. If we need some walls, might make it two or three spaces. We’ve got that bigger dorm area upstairs for when they’re older and want a lot of buddies sleeping over. Ten years or so, that space might be some sort of lounge area for all of us, or bedrooms for them. On the other side, a big bedroom with lots of space for us, bathroom. We can’t be too open about this, not in the rest of the world, because the kids will take crap on it, but at the house… It’s private. And a space for us is good… Even if the kids talk about it, and someone else asks, we’ve got the answer set, ‘Yeah, we’ve got a place by the river. Grandparents wanted us to have a place we could all spend time together on the weekends and holidays, but there’s five couples and kids, so bedrooms are at a premium. We get on well, so we share a room when we’re there. That’s what Mommy and Daddy and Aunt Breena and Uncle Jimmy sleep together means.’ But we don’t have to share a room,” Tim shrugs. He’s not willing to burn his joy to keep Tony comfortable, he is willing to prune it some. “You’d be in and out of our space, so… we can build it so you don’t have to see it. Have two bedrooms, keep you from seeing anything you don’t want to.”

Tony looks tired, and sad. “No… Build your home how you like. I don’t have to go in there if I don’t like it. And… Yeah, I don’t want to see you slobbering on Breena. But I don’t want to see you slobbering on Abby, either. Like we always do, keep it G rated and… It’s not fine, but… Shit… One room?”

Tim’s nodding. “Yeah. I mean, we’re with it enough that we know we really can’t live together, not when the kids are still kids. That’d make things difficult for them. So we’re getting all the on our own time we could possibly want. But it’s really not just fucking around, not just something to spice up weekends, either. It’s adding Jon and Molly and Anna and Jimmy and Breena to that calf tattoo. This is something I’m going to live for the rest of my life, and I’ll burn it into my skin, and build a home to protect it, and… it’s a marriage, Tony. Like Ducky said, I hope, one day, not too far from now, we’ll all be able to celebrate it.”

Tony doesn’t look like he’s ever going to get to ‘celebrate,’ and Tim’s really not sure if he’s buying the marriage bit, either, but he isn’t arguing.

Tim shrugs. “Tolerate’s good enough for now. If it takes a while for you to trust it, it takes a while. We’ve got time. August, 2036, you can dance at our twentieth anniversary.”

Tony sighs, puts his coffee cup down, and stands up. “Shabbos is at our place this Friday, tell Palmer.”

“We’ll be there.”

“Okay.”
“Good morning, Tim.” Dr. Kent says as he closes the door to the examination room behind him.

“Doc.”

Dr. Kent looks around seeing that, yes, it is just Tim in his office today. “Where’s your dad?”

“He’s had some excitement of his own.” Tim sighs.

Kent looks concerned. “Is he okay?”

“Eventually.” Given how okay Gibbs is in his heart right now, Tim almost has a hard time remembering that his body’s taken a hell of a beating. Almost. The O2 canister he’s lugging around and the tube in his nose is a bucket of cold water on the fantasy that he’s okay.

Kent knows that Tim’s a cop of some sort. He knows Gibbs is a retired LEO, so instead of asking for details he says, “Can you talk about it?”

A little incline of Tim’s head means, sort of. “You see any of that stuff about the Coast Guard?”

“That mess? It’s on ZNN all the time. I catch little bits of the coverage when I can. Love that pretty redhead. Those twits who keep hassling her with stupid questions get chewed up and spit out.”

“She’s his soon-to-be finance.”

Kent looks amazed. “Good on, Jethro! Give him my congratulations.”

“I will. Anyway, we were part of that op. He got hurt, and for the time being, isn’t driving.”

“If I can help…"

“I’ve got you on speed dial. But the only bones he’s got broken are ribs, so all they’re doing is taping them up.” Which is factually accurate without being particularly true.

“Pretty much all you can do with them. Speaking of broken bones.” Kent pulls up the latest of Tim’s films on his computer. Then he takes the wrist cast off. “You’re done with one of these. We’ve got a brace for when you get tired and achy.” Which they did with his shoulder, too. “But wear it as little as you can stand. Just like with everything else, the more you move the better you’ll heal up and the more functionality you’ll have.”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Jimmy… Dr. Palmer’s got me working with my hand as much as I can.”

“That’s the plan.” Kent looks around again. Just Tim sitting on the examination table, go bag next to him. “How much are you using your crutch?”

“Not much. Sometimes if I move around a lot during the day, I’ll need it. Or the night before a bad thunderstorm, I ache all over when that happens. Most of the time if I’m hurting that bad, I try to not move around too much.”

Kent nods at that. “Pain meds?”

“Tylenol or Aleve. Still on it all the time, but I’m down to over-the-counter stuff.”
“That’ll keep getting better, and same with everything else, the more you move…”

“The less I’ll need. Yeah. I know the song.”

“You do. Well, I’m sure you’d have rather never met me…”

Tim doesn’t want to go that far; he likes Dr. Kent. “Under different circumstances would have been good.”

“Yeah.” Kent feels that way about a lot of the people he meets. “Anyway, you’re done. We’ll set a follow up for six months on, just to make sure everything is good, but from here on out, you’re in the hands of the PT guys.”

Tim exhales long and slow at that, and then packs the brace, (he’s not going to wear it now) saying, “Thanks.”

“You’re welcome. Keep working at it the way you’ve been, and you’ll be all ready to dance at your dad’s wedding.”

“I intend to.”

Shabbos. First time with all of them together since the big “coming out.” First time either of the guys have talked to Tony, who’s been “busy” since Wednesday.

Tim’s a bit nervous. Most of life is a matter of following a series of scripts, and right now he doesn’t have one, so he’s not sure where to thread the needle between getting to see his sweeties for the first time in a week (He’s texted Breena and Jimmy, but hasn’t seen her in person since Sunday, or him since they talked to Tony.) and acting like nothing’s changed so Tony doesn’t get too flipped out.

Abby’s happily humming away in the car next to him, very much looking forward to tonight, too. She’s looking him up and down as he’s driving, eyeing him all over like he’s especially yummy.

They went home from work to get Kelly, but besides grabbing stuff for the sleeping over at Jimmy and Breena’s, they just ran in and out. He’s in work clothes, jeans and his red button down with his sleeves rolled up. Looks a lot like he usually does, finally minus a cast. Which is nice, and he does smell good, (After all, he is looking forward to tonight, so he’s got a bit of the metaphorical something black and lacy on.) but… there are looks that say, I love you and appreciate you looking nice, and there’s your gonna get so laid tonight, and this is a whole lot more of the latter than the former.

“Feeling good?” he asks Abby.

“Oh yeah. Been looking forward to this all week.”

He smiles at that. “Yeah, me, too.”

She grins at that. She knows exactly what he’s been looking forward to. She’s been looking forward to it, too. “Can’t wait to see Breena riding you.”

Tim closes his eyes for a second and licks his lips, swallowing hard. “Yeah.” He’s been thinking about that, a lot, too. Judging by some of the texts he’s gotten from Breena, she is, too.
“Had this image in my head all week, you sitting on the side of the bed, Breena riding you, back to front, I’m kneeling in front of her, going down on her, while Jimmy does me from behind.”

Tim groans, blood flooding his groin at that image, as he pulls into the parking garage under Tony and Ziva’s apartment building. “You just love giving me erections in inappropriate situations, don’t you?”

Abby smiles brightly at him, slips her hand over to give him a quick squeeze, and says, “Of course!” She kisses his cheek. “Also, I could see you worrying. You’re not worried anymore.”

Tim parks, smiles wryly at her, she’s absolutely not wrong about that, and then he turns and kisses her.

Any questions as to what level of hellos and physical affection are appropriate are answered quickly by the addition of Senior to the mix. He and Delphine have been coming to Shabbos, especially at Tony’s place, a lot more often of late.

So, maybe he hugs Breena a tad longer and closer than normal, but he kisses her cheek, not her lips, and all in all it just looks like their usual, ‘Hey, haven’t seen you in a few days,’ hello.

From there, dinner flows the way it usually does. Little girls get a quick feed and put to bed, (though in the next few weeks sunset will slip back to before their bedtime and they’ll get to fully join the party again.) grownups participate in the blessing, sing the prayers, wash up, and join in welcoming the day of rest.

“You’re looking better, Tim,” Senior says, noticing that he’s grabbing the platter with the salmon on it with two hands, neither of which is in a cast. “Any word on the guy who hit you?”

Tim shakes his head. “As best as we know, he’s still out there, driving away.” His eyes narrow, and the anger on his face is genuine. He’s holding the platter while Abby gets fish for both of them. He can’t hold and grab at the same time. “Almost three full months later, and I’m finally out of all of the casts. Still can’t bend my wrist at all,” Tim gently twitches his right wrist, but that’s as far as it’s going to go.

“We’ve got a date for that later tonight,” Jimmy says.

Tim nods at Jimmy’ who’s across the table from him. “But, thanks to my miracle worker over there, everything else moves, and my physical therapist and ortho think I’m setting records for healing up. Speaking of whom…” Tim looks to Gibbs, who’s got the foot of the table, “Kent says hello and congratulations.”

Gibbs is looking at him curiously.

Tim smiles at Abbi. “He’s really impressed with the ‘pretty redhead’ who keeps showing up on ZNN and chewing out the idiots who pester her with stupid questions. I told him you were moving in together. Hence, congratulations.”

Gibbs smiles gently at that, looking very proud. Abbi rolls her eyes. “Would have let them keep running the place into the ground if I’d known how much time I was going to have to spend talking to idiots.”
“Well, you’ve got at least one fan out there, cheering you on,” Tim says.

“Great.” Abbi’s not in a good mood.

“More trouble?” Breena asks.

Abbi looks to Ziva who looks at Senior and Delphine. They freely talk shop among the all cop group. Little less free with the Senior DiNozzos in tow.

“Nah.” She rubs her eyes. “Just getting all of the moving stuff set. Getting everything boxed up and ready to go, along with all the rest of it, lot of late nights.” Tim reads people well enough to know moving isn’t helping with whatever’s going on, but it’s not the issue.

“Sorry. Didn’t love doing that the last time we moved, either,” Breena says.

“At least, I’ve got lots of help this time. Do we have a plan for tomorrow?” Abbi asks.

“Duck and I were working on that,” Gibbs says.

“We were thinking that having three groups, one at Jethro’s, packing up things to get rid of, and helping to unpack and arrange your things, one group at your place, loading things up, and one group driving things from place to place, would make for the smoothest relocation.”

“Let me guess, I’m on driving duty?” Tim says.

“It would seem to be a natural fit given your current limitations,” Ducky says gently. “Perhaps Anthony would go with you, and help get things into and out of Jimmy’s van. There are several loads of things going to Goodwill or the dump from Jethro’s so an extra set of hands would be a good plan.”

Tony nods. “I can do that. Catch up on what McCybercrime’s been up to.”

Tim rolls his eyes a bit. “It’s a riveting story. Code, code, more code, oh, look, more code. And then, on top of that, database testing and streamlining.”

“So, I’m catching up on missed sleep?” Tony asks.

Tim sighs. It’s been a really quiet week for him at work. “Unless you’ve got better stories.”

“I actually do…” And from there Tony starts getting them up to date, in a somewhat vague and mostly BS (entertaining BS) sort of way, as to what they’ve been doing on with their mystery ship malfunctions.

“Do you know what’s going on with Abbi?” Tim asks Abby as they drive to Jimmy’s.

Abby shakes her head. “If anyone knows, it’s Gibbs or Ziva.”

“Yep. Hope she’s okay.”

“Me, too. I’m sure we’ll hear more tomorrow.”
Tim inclines his head. “So… are we out to Senior and Delphine?”

“Thought that was a no, you rethinking?”

“If they’re going to be over a lot… Not sure if that’s asking for drama we don’t need. But, he helps out on the house some, might notice the layout, and if he’s going to be a regular at Shabbos…”

Abby shrugs. “Set fire to it when we come to it?”

“Okay. Along those lines Sarah and I have a gaming date set for Tuesday night. Probably tell her then.”

Abby nods. “At least that one’s going to go well.”

“Yeah. I think so.”

Veteran parents do a good job of transferring sleeping baby girls from cars to cribs. Tim’s on opening and shutting doors as the other three carry the girls up, and in a few minutes, they’re all tucked in and snoozing away.

From there they settle into Friday night PT/playtime.

Get ready for bed, strip out of work clothes, settle into Jimmy and Breena’s room, lights low (but not dark), a bottle of wine (and some, though he is down to half as much as he needed when they started on his shoulder, Percocet for Tim), Breena puts on quiet music, not much beat or lyrics, just some background melody, that’s a script they’re all having a very easy time slipping into.

Jimmy’s sitting back against the headboard, on Tim’s right. Tim’s facing him, sitting cross-legged, his right hand in Jimmy’s lap. Jimmy sips his drink, hands the wineglass to Breena, who’s on his right, lying down on her left, facing them, her leg draped over Jimmy’s. He takes Tim’s right hand in his, gently touching all over, getting a feel for his wrist.

“How’s this?” Jimmy asks as he starts gently trying to bend Tim’s wrist.

“Bad.” Jimmy applies a little more pressure. “Ow!”

“Just checking.” He starts bending from side to side, and Tim’s wrist doesn’t want to do that, either. “Can you circle it?”

Tim rolls his eyes and tries. His wrist moves a little. “You’re going to have more luck getting me flying than getting it moving easily.”

“Yeah, well, getting you flying is easy. All I’ve got to do is give you the other half of the Percocet, and you’ll be flying.”

Tim inclines his head, agreeing at that.

Breena’s watching Jimmy place Tim’s arm on his lap and oiling up his hands. “Does being ‘done’ feel good?"

Tim shrugs. "Not going to miss the casts if that’s what you mean."

Breena shakes her head. It’s not.

“I don’t know. Not sure if I can get to ‘done’ with him out there.” He thinks about that for a few more seconds. “‘Done’ is when a few sailors and a chaplain show up on Penny’s doorstep to convey their regrets.”

“February,” Abby says.

“Maybe,” Breena adds.

Jimmy’s expression tightens a little, but he doesn’t say anything about it.

“Jimmy?” Abby asks.

He shakes his head. Breena sits up and places her hand on his shoulder. “Hey…”

Jimmy’s focusing on Tim’s arm, working his fingers along the tight, stuck muscles of his forearm and wrist.

Tim looks at Abby and Breena, wishing he could hold three way eye contact. Abby nods at him, she knows where he’s going, and Breena smiles a little, so he nudges Jimmy’s face up to look at him, “I want this more than I want revenge. I want revenge, too, but…” He kisses each of the girls and for half a second feels like he should kiss Jimmy, too, but isn’t sure about that, so he strokes Jimmy’s face with his fingertips, “this is better.”

“And if Jarvis doesn’t do it? You going to be okay with never getting ‘done?’” Jimmy asks him, still staring him in the eyes.

“We’ll find out. And if I’m not, we’ll take care of it.”

Jimmy nods, curtly, blinks, and then goes back to working on Tim’s arm. For a few seconds there’s a lot of quiet tension there, problems that won’t magically go away, and aren’t going to get better anytime soon.

Tim’s thinking of something to get them out of this space, which is much grimmer than he’d like them to be, and a thought hits. He smiles. “So… I think I can talk about this now. When I had lunch with Gibbs and Ducky, they were down on Providence.” That doesn’t mean much to the other three of them. “Two streets away from Stephen’s.”
Abby lights up; she knows what’s going on.

“Stephen’s is where we got our wedding rings made, Ducky, too. Not sure when it’ll be done, but Jethro’s got Abbi’s ring on order.” That gets Jimmy and Breena smiling.

“So, maybe when we’ve got all of her stuff moved…” Breena trails off.

“No way. Not that fast. Even if he’d grabbed something already made, it wouldn’t be sized up in time. But… yeah… soon. We were talking about him heading out west to have a chat with her dad.” That gets some chuckling.

“Is he going to?” Breena asks.

“Talk to him, at some point, yes. Not asking permission, but, you know, introduce himself, show he’s a stand-up guy. Stuff like that. Probably try talking on the phone or skype first.”

“Bet that was something he never thought he was going to have to do again,” Jimmy says.

“Yeah. Hey, if it’s a disaster, at least he can ask you for ideas on how to deal with troublesome father-in-laws,” Tim replies.

Jimmy shakes his head a bit. “I’ll run a seminar on how to manage the guy who doesn’t want you anywhere near his daughter.”

“Oh, stop it,” Abby says, patting Jimmy’s knee. “They’ll be fine. Did you see a sketch?”

“I did. It’s some sort of silver-colored metal, a pearl, and a swoopy-looking inlay.”

The girls think about that and look at each other, nodding, approving of Jethro’s pick.

Jimmy’s stroking his hands down Tim’s right arm, thumbs pressing deeply into muscles that haven’t moved in weeks. It’s a long, slow, stretching burn, but he lifts his pressure a bit as he comes to Tim’s hand, and then lightly traces his fingers down Tim’s right ring finger. “So, are we doing rings, or something?”

“Tim and I are definitely doing some ‘or something’ and I’d like a ring or cuff, something we all keep on our skin.”

“Rings would be very visible,” Breena adds.

“That’s the point. Even if they don’t know what they’re seeing, I want other people to see this. Something to mark it.” Abby holds up her left hand. “Don’t really have room for another ring on this finger.” Between her engagement ring and wedding ring, most of the space on her left ring finger is taken. She picks up Breena’s hand and kisses her palm. “You don’t have a lot of room, either.” More than Abby does, both of her rings are thin, but she’s got less than half of the space between her knuckles free. “Or is visible a problem?”

Breena shrugs. “Depends on how visible and to whom. Add another band to this finger, and people will ask me about it.”

“Present from your husband?”

Jimmy smiles wryly at that. “True and misleading.” He’s still holding Tim’s hand. “Or put it on any other finger and it’s just something pretty. That’d work for the four of us. If we’re all wearing a matching ring on the same finger that means one thing to anyone who sees it. Same ring, as long as it’s kind of non-descript, on different fingers, and the only people it’ll mean anything to is us.”

Abby jumps on that. “Couldn’t really do one on my ring finger, either, but… anywhere else… And Tim’s the kind of guy who’d probably go for a thumb ring.”

Tim shakes his head. “Never liked the way that feels.”

“You’ve only done leather ones on your thumb, metal’s different.”

He raises an eyebrow at Abby. That’s true, he’s done the thumb ring for clubbing, and it is leather, but he can’t imagine a metal one would be that different. “I’ll borrow one of yours and try for a day or two.”

She nods at that, with as much smaller than normal his right hand is, she probably does have a few rings that’ll fit his thumb.

Tim looks at his wrist cuff. “You know, they don’t have to match. You three got me this, and… That’s all I’d want from a ring, too. Something you guys got together and made/found for me.” He taps the cuff. “This could be mine, or a ring if you wanted, but, all I need is that it’s from you.”

The other three of them think about that, and he sees them start to nod. That would cover making sure there was a mark of this, but that wasn’t so obvious as to cause trouble.

“What were you thinking of for ‘or something’?” Jimmy asks Abby.

She grins up at him. “You’ll get to find out when we’re on our own weekend after next.”

“A mystery!” Breena adds. “Are we going to like it?”

“I think so.”

“Speaking of mysteries, where are we going?” Tim asks.

Abby and Breena shake their heads. “You’ll find out when we get there,” Abby says. “Beyond that, you don’t need to know.”

“Might make it easier to pack,” Jimmy adds.

“What makes you think you’re going to need anything you don’t come already equipped with,” Breena says with a sexy smile while drawing her hand up the inside of his thigh.

“Yeah,” Abby adds, kissing Jimmy’s knee, stroking Tim’s leg, “maybe our plan is to just keep you two naked and in bed all weekend long.”

Tim laughs at that. “Planning on getting a lot of sleep then?” He glances at Jimmy. “Even tag teaming, I don’t think we can go all weekend long.”

“Speak for yourself. I’m up for it. You get tired, I’ll spell you.”

Tim gently thwacks Jimmy’s shoulder for that. “Please. I didn’t just meet you. You go for an hour and you’re ready for a nap.”

Jimmy grins back at him, then at the girls. “Time’s relative, right? We can fit a weekend into an hour.” He lets go of Tim’s hand and kisses each girl. “And I can pack a hell of a lot of loving into an hour.”
“Really?” Abby’s grinning up at him, then glances at the clock, it’s edging toward late, and they’ve got a lot of work to do tomorrow. “Want to put that to the test, Breena?”

“Yes,” and she kisses Abby and Jimmy, “but not tonight. Got some unfinished business with Tim.”

Tim feels those words flush through him, all hot and slithery and good all over. “Yeah,” he breathes. Oral, anal, vaginal, hand job, it may all be sex, and he loves all of it, but that doesn’t mean he doesn’t have a preference, and that preference is something he’s been looking forward to all week. “Ovulation week done?”

Breena crawls over Jimmy, spending a moment in his lap, giving him a warm kiss, and then over to Tim, settling herself in his lap. “As of Tuesday.”

He licks his lips, feeling his focus narrowing down. He knows Jimmy and Abby are still here, but they’re slipping into the background, and the very warm, gorgeous, sexy, yummy woman on his lap is getting all of his attention. “You know, I do make house calls.”

Her fingers thread through his hair, and then wrap around the back of his neck as he scoots back a bit, so he’s sitting against the headboard next to Jimmy. “I wanted you thinking about it, fantasizing about it, not remembering it. Come on, you know this, right? Jimmy’s told you. I like letting anticipation build.”

His lips whisper next to hers, but not touching, yet. “Been anticipating all week.”

“And you are getting off so easy,” Jimmy adds, petting his hand down Breena’s back as Abby scoots over to him.

Tim turns to him, nudging his shoulder with his own. “You gonna tell me you haven’t been looking forward to seeing this?”

“No. Been looking forward to it, too. But compared to waiting years, a week, not so bad.”

“Time’s relative, right?” Tim says to Jimmy, smirking at him.

Breena pulls his face back to her. “Less him, more me. You two can make out later.”

“Errr…” Tim says. Jimmy’s not looking very thrilled with that idea, either.

“Oh please, just because you two don’t touch when you do it, doesn’t mean this,” she points between them, “isn’t making out.”

“Uh…” Jimmy says, not really wanting to think too hard on that.

She sticks out her tongue at both of them, and then pulls Tim close for a soft, wet kiss. He sighs at that, and, after a few seconds of slippery tongues and stroking lips says, “This is making out.”

“Uh huh.” Her hands slip through his hair again, and he sighs again, nails on his scalp does feel really good. His hands (as well as he can with the right) curl around her tush, making sure she’s nice and snug against him.

This is good. He’s sitting against their headboard, comfortable, and Breena’s in his lap, rocking gently against him as they kiss and pet. Her hair and skin and touches are soft, slow. This time, they’re taking their time, less of the frenzied, ‘Gotta get it all in at once’ of last weekend.

He’s slowly meandering down her body, having gone from lips to throat and now to kissing her collarbone, dragging lips across her shoulder, as his hand closes on her breast and she jerks, not in a good way.

Tim pulls his hand back, fast, looking at her, worried. “Not good?”

She looks down at her nipple, and gently touches six, small, rectangular bruises. “Normally it’d be fine. Anna’s discovered her teeth and is on her final ‘no biting mom’ warning.”

“Ow!” Abby says in sympathy. (Jimmy’s looking a little disconcerted that she’s not paying attention to him… but… that’s what happens when you’ve got four people in the bed.)

Breena nods. “Yeah. She does it again tomorrow, and that’s the end of nursing for her.”

“Poor baby,” Abby says. Breena looks irked at that. “You, not her.”

“Oh.” Now she’s looking un-irked.

Abby gently trails her finger down Breena’s breast, and both of the guys are staring at that, all attention on them. Abby, who, like what Breena’s doing with Tim, is in Jimmy’s lap, straddling him, facing him, leans over a bit, cupping her hand around Breena’s neck, and kisses her soft and wet while very, very lightly stroking over her breast.

The guys had started out a foot or so apart, but they are rapidly inching closer to give the girls better access to each other. Watching them play is amazing, seeing it from inches away with them in their laps…

Tim’s mouth goes dry. That’s… God… Every drop of blood in his body is galloping to his dick. Abby’s still lightly stroking Breena’s breast, and she seems to be okay with that, so Tim joins in, following Abby’s lead, using the same sort of ghosting touch, and then slipping down Abby’s hand and arm, too.

Abby’s hand tangles in Breena’s hair, and Breena tightens her grip on Tim’s neck, pulling him up a bit. He’s kissing her nipple while Abby strokes it, and Jimmy’s kissing Abby’s shoulder, stroking Breena’s thigh.

Abby takes a second to stroke his lips with her finger, so he gives her a quick kiss and a tiny nibble, then returns his tongue to Breena’s breast. That gets a soft moan out of Breena, or maybe it’s what Jimmy’s doing. Tim can feel Jimmy’s hand lightly brushing his thigh as he’s stroking up Breena’s thigh.

Breena breaks the kiss with Abby, petting her, nibbling her lip, then inching forward to kiss Jimmy. By now, the guys are as close to each other as they can get, so the girls are able to hug and pet easily. That also means it’s easy for each girl to kiss the guy whose lap she’s not sitting on.

Watching Jimmy and Breena kiss is almost as good as watching the girls kiss. Soft and loving touches. Jimmy’s lips on her, while Tim’s hand gently strokes her breast, and then she’s back to him, more kissing and more rocking against him, and he’s awash in all of this, all of her.

Her body, soft and wet in his lap, the feel of her pussy against his legs. Her lips and breasts and tummy and legs and skin and all of it on his. Warm, and soft, and flush with joy and pleasure.

He’s so ready for this, hard and eager, as she raises up a little, shifting his dick slightly, and begins to ease down on him.

A soft ‘ohhhhh,’ slips out of him at that. He’s watching her face, seeing her experience this, feeling it himself.

It’s different. Duh. Of course sex with Breena is different. She’s not Abby, or any of his other partners. She’s the only woman he’s ever had sex with who’s had a baby vaginally, too.

So, she’s is looser, but like Jimmy said, it’s not bad, just different. Good different. Soft and wet and slippery, but not quite as snug, which is helping him focus on heat and slide more than grip. And making him feel pretty secure about not getting off too fast. He figures he’s good for as long as they both want to go.

And then Breena squeezes around him, and he inhales hard. Whatever those exercises are, she must be religious about them because that was very tight and intense and if Breena can ripple like that, this is going to be VERY interesting.

He’s realizing that he’s got to feel different to her, too. He and Jimmy have fairly similar builds, but they’re not identical by any stretch of the imagination. Though, according to Abby, there’s mostly just a sensation of fullness and stretch and friction, so maybe they do feel a whole lot alike.

He’s at least done this with someone other than Abby before, but Breena doesn’t have a list of other guys to compare to, there’s just him and Jimmy. That hits him pretty hard, just the two of them. The stupid, possessive part of him is insanely pleased by that. He kisses her gently, and pulls back, eyes on hers, smiling at her. “It’s different, right?”

She laughs a little. “Yeah.”

“Good?”

She gently kisses the tip of his nose. “Yeah. You?”

She squeezes him again as she asks and a low exhaled, “Fuck…” slips out of his mouth followed by, “Yeah.”

Breena slides all the way down him, sighing as she gets settled. He can tell she’s thinking about something and wonders what, remembering the first time she and Jimmy did it? Just feeling this? He doesn’t know her face well enough to have much idea.

He does know that she’s watching him, eyes on his, and so beautiful. He licks his lips and kisses her again, and again, feeling her on him and getting used to the sensation of being in another body.

She starts with an almost tentative slide, up down in long strokes, getting a feel for him and how he’ll make her feel. He loves that, actually he’s good with all of it, but long and slow is a great way to start. Her pulling almost all the way off and then squeezing around his tip is even better.

It’s a little strange to not know where to put his hands. With Abby he doesn’t even have to think about it. They’ve got this down, and he just knows what to do.

Time to learn.

His hand finds her breast again, and again he’s touching slow and gentle, making sure not to get those tiny, sore bruises. Then he smiles, remembering… Fingers are replaced by tongue and lips, still soft and very gentle, and from there he moves to eyelashes fluttering over her skin, and she makes a slightly surprised sound at that.

He looks up at her, “Okay?”
“Tickly.” She pulls his head up and meets his lips for a hard, wet kiss to go with a deep grind on his lap. He groans at that, and she does, too.

That’s good. Deep and slow. Really good.

He sucks her lip, soft at first, and she seems to like that. Little harder, and she moans. Little harder yet with a tiny nibble and he feels her shudder all over. That’s going onto the things he’s doing again list.

She keeps petting his hair, playing with it, tugging on it a bit, so he tries that, too. Running his fingers through her hair, rubbing over her scalp, and then fistig his hand in her hair, leading her movement by the hold he’s got on her hair. That gets a very pleased moan, too.

She likes it when Jimmy takes charge. She doesn’t love being in charge, though she’ll do it. He remembers talking about that. He knows she likes it when he leads when they dance.

So, lead the dance.

He pats the underside of her thigh, letting go of her hair. “Up. On your knees, facing the headboard, hands on the top.”

Breena looks pleased by that, happy and curious, wondering what’s coming next.

He scrambles around her, getting into position behind her while she kisses Abby and Jimmy. (It hits him that this is good on another level, too. They can all easily see and play with each other.)

He kneels behind her, her back against his chest and for a moment he’s just kneeling behind her, hands roaming over her front to stroke breast and lightly play with her pubic hair, as he kisses her neck and throat. Then he nudges her legs a little further apart with his knee. “Give me a hand?”

She does, getting him in place as he slides forward hard and sweet. They both groan at that. He sets a fast pace, slipping in and out, pulling her hips back against him with each stroke. Not much he can do with his right hand, but he can hold it in place so she’s got something to rub against. That’s working better. Breena’s sounding a lot happier with this. He knows it’s feeling good to him.

He wishes there was a mirror in front of them. He can’t see her face as well as he’d like, not going this fast or deep in this position. But he can see the way Jimmy’s watching her, and the way Abby’s turned in his lap, so she can watch them, too. God, that looks good.

Abby and Jimmy are kissing. Lots of wet tongue and lips, and Jimmy’s hands on Abby’s breast as she rocks in his lap, lifting up and down. He can see the way Jimmy’s dick slipping into Abby’s pussy, feeling Breena slipping up and down on him, and fuck, that’s every shade of good there ever was.

They’re holding here, matching each other, stroke for stroke, as close to all four of them having sex with all of each other as they can get. So many sensations and memories all blending together. The girls are pacing each other, keeping all four of them together. He can see Abby’s breast jiggle with each thrust, and feel Breena’s in his hand. He can see the flush on Abby’s chest and throat, and feel the heat on Breena’s skin.

It’s intoxicating. Almost too much sensation, almost too easy to get lost in it. And he loves it. Wants more of it.

He’s kissing Breena’s neck, biting gently, watching Abby and Jimmy, as he whispers to her. “Hold up.”
Breena does, wondering again what he’s thinking. He scoots back from her for a moment. Missing the heat and slip of her body, but wanting all four of them together. Tim shifts over, so he’s straddling Jimmy’s knees, leaving a few inches between him and Abby. He kisses her quickly, smiling at her, and she’s smiling back, she knows where he’s taking this, and then crooks his finger at Breena.

A hot smile spreads all over her face as she scoots over, facing Abby, finding her place between them.

From there it really is all four of them. He can kiss both of the girls and Jimmy can, too. The girls can kiss each other, too.

There, four of them moving together, all touching and kissing, that’s the sweet spot, all of them together. That’s where the build really starts.

Details go fleeing away, replaced by sensations of rising pleasure and skin on skin. The taste of Breena, and Abby, and Breena again on his lips. The feel of Jimmy’s fingers under his as he’s guiding his touch, helping him rub Abby off. Little circles for Abby; Breena dragging up and down over his fingers, and hot, sweat and cum slick skin sliding against more skin. Abby’s breast in his hand and Breena’s shoulder under his lips. More hands on him: fingernails, must be Breena, that small callus on a thumb, Abby, larger palm, Jimmy. Sounds: he’s talking, he knows that, because that’s who he is. When he feels this good, he can’t keep it in, it has to spill out in hot, sexy, dirty words. Breena and Abby are moaning in some sort of sex harmony, voices high and low and singing every favorite song and melody he’s ever had. Jimmy’s groaning with each breath, a low exhale of breath and vibration, hard to hear over the other three of them, but for a second Tim’s got his hand on Abby’s back, palm at the top of her cross, back of his hand on Jimmy’s chest, so he can feel the sound coming out of him.

Pleasure looking to crest, but not yet. The girls are keeping them here, in this moment of rocking in and out and up and down slick and glide and so many kisses, so much skin, heat rising off of all four of them.

Breaking point, rushing, falling apart, rippling scorch of twitching pleasure.

He doesn’t know who gets off first. He doesn’t care, either. He knows he doesn’t close his eyes, can’t. He has to see them all, has to be in and with them in this moment. He knows, as his body goes tight and sparking with pleasure that his lips are on Breena’s shoulder, his left hand cupping Abby’s cheek, and his right holding Jimmy’s left hand.

By the time he’s back to himself, all the rest of them seem to be, too. They’re lazily kissing each other, and he’s wishing there was an easy way to lay around and kiss all three of them, but there isn’t.

Eventually, Abby and Breena get up and grab tissues and head to the bathroom. By that point, they’re not in between him and Jimmy, so he could easily kiss him, but he doesn’t. He does lift up and shift over a bit. Jimmy slides down, laying on his back instead of sitting up.

Jimmy’s looking awfully sleepy, content and completely spent, and Tim’s feeling that, too. He’s also wanting to snuggle in close, because cuddling feels good, because after that much body heat being on his own is chilly, because if you do something that intense with someone, you should keep petting and snuggling them after, not just leave them on their own. So, he lays down on his side and hugs Jimmy, arm across his chest, head on his shoulder.

Jimmy’s eyes don’t open as he turns his head and kisses Tim. Soft, easy kiss, just two sets of lips brushing each other. It’s not erotic. (Granted, right now, both girls could come join them, ready for round two, promising to be part of any fantasy he’s ever had, no matter how kinky, and he’d just arrange them around him for snuggling and sleep. Tim is utterly fucked out right now and not actually capable of erotic sensation.) Then Jimmy sighs softly and turns his head back toward the ceiling. A second after that, the girls are back, Abby’s snuggling into Tim’s back, so he rolls over into their usual spooning position, and Breena’s got Jimmy’s other side, settling into her own usual sleeping-on-her-side-snuggled-up-against-him position.

Tim scoots back an inch, so his back is against Jimmy’s side, and from there, surrounded by his loves, lips on Abby’s shoulder, he falls asleep.
Another Saturday. This time there’s no lazing about in bed. Tim and Breena get the little girls moving while Abby and Jimmy get the first showers.

Molly and Kelly are in their high chairs, munching away on their Cheerios while Tim’s on making up quick eggs for the adults and Molly. (Kelly’s refusing to eat eggs this week.)

Breena’s holding Anna with one arm and grabbing a bottle and formula with the other.

“Not too optimistic about her not chomping on you, are you?”

Breena shakes her head. “I think it feels good to her, and she’s just too little to get the idea that it doesn’t feel good to me.”

Tim nods at that. Kelly usually looks shocked when she’s gnawing on someone’s finger and they object to it.

Breena gets everything set, and then sits down, opening her shirt and saying to Anna, “Okay, we did this yesterday and the day before, this is the last warning. No biting me. If you bite me, we aren’t going to be nursing anymore.”

Anna looks like she’s listening intently, staring up at Breena, and she very eagerly latches on. For a minute, it looks like things are going well. Tim can see Breena’s shoulders relax, and then, “OW! NO! Do not bite me!” followed by attempting to remove Anna from her breast.

“You okay?” He takes the eggs off the heat and heads over to grab Anna, sitting down with her, giving her the bottle.

Breena’s looking at her poor, chewed nipple. “I’ll live.” She bops Anna on the nose with her index finger. “You’re done. No more nursing.”

Anna does not appear to be bothered by that. She’s enthusiastically chewing the hell out of the bottle nipple while slopping away.

“You got her?”

Tim nods, and Breena, gingerly rubbing her nipple, takes over on getting breakfast out for the four adults.

By the time Abby and Jimmy are down, Anna’s done, and Tim’s looking at a shredded bottle nipple. “You’re working on some new teeth, aren’t you?”

Anna grins at him.

Four parents and three kids is way easier than two parents and two kids or two parents and one kid. They’re still moving quickly, but he and Breena are able to grab a fast shower and get themselves dressed and ready for the day, and when they’re done with that, they find all three babies are also all cleaned up from breakfast, dressed, and ready to go.

Tim, the girls, and Jimmy’s van are all going to Gibb’s house. Abby, Breena, Jimmy, and Tim’s Highlander are all going to Abbi’s.

When he gets there, he finds a load of stuff on the front porch, as well as Tony, Ducky, Gibbs, and Fornell inside, drinking coffee, ready to get going.

Tim heads in, putting Kelly on the floor, Molly walking next to him, (one more trip to get Anna) and says hello to everyone. The girls are in the dining room, with a collection of small toys and Mona, for the moment they seem pretty content.

“So, what are we doing?” he asks while getting coffee for himself, taking two long swallows before he feels the caffeine and sadly tosses the rest of the cup.

Fornell stares at him, confusion on his face.

Tim shrugs. “If she’s got to cut out the caffeine, least I can do is skip it, too.”

Fornell continues staring at him, looking like he’s not sure what to do with that, and then says, “We’re loading up the van with as many of these dime store rejects that Jethro’s been collecting over the years and then you and DiNozzo are getting them out of the house.”

“We take them to the…” Gibbs glares at Tony as he’s about to say dump, so he shifts to, “Goodwill. Drop them off, then over to Abbi’s to pick up more stuff and bring it back here. While we’re out, they entertain babies and stick more stuff on the porch for us.”

“How much of it are you getting rid of?” Tim asks Gibbs.

“If I didn’t build it, it’s not staying.”

Tim looks around the living room, dining room, and kitchen. “So... the table by the door is the only thing you’re keeping from down here?”

“That lamp.” Tim notices that the lamp on the table next to the sofa appears to be a piece of wood. “And the books.”

Tim eyes the sofa. “I don’t know. That’s a good sofa. Comfy.”

Gibbs looks surprised to see anyone standing up for his sofa. “You want it, it’s yours.”

Tim opens and closes his mouth, trying to imagine what Abby would do to him if he brought it home. He shakes his head.

“You ever crash on it, Duck?” Tony asks, looking at the sofa, with its sad, worn plaid fabric and dated lines, remembering many good night.

“No Anthony, that sofa’s never been a bed for me.”

“Only one of us that’s true for,” Gibbs says.
“Didn’t you sleep on that thing for ten years straight?” Tobias asks.

“Something like that. Unless one of you needed it. I’d roll out a sleeping bag and kip upstairs if that happened.”

“Wait.” Tony stares at Jethro. “That’s why there was always a pillow and sheets on it when I crashed here? I thought you were just being a really nice host.”

“I was. You got to sleep on my bed.”

“If I’d known that, I’d have brought better beer.”

Gibbs shrugs. “Make it up to me at dinner tonight.”

“I’ll make it up for you at dinner in a week or two when you can really drink it.”

Gibbs eyes narrow, annoyed, but not at Tony, forgetting he’s on pain meds is bothersome to him.

“Pile of stuff to move isn’t getting any smaller. Let’s get loading,” Fornell says. “McGee, can you lift anything?”

“If it’s smaller than Kelly, and I can do it one-handed, yes.”

Fornell looks his daughter over. She’s sitting on the floor stacking blocks, while Mona stands next to her, making sure she’s okay. “Twenty pounds?”

“Basically.” Tim thinks about what’s on the porch. “I can probably get some of those little tables.”

Fornell nods at that. “Come on, DiNozzo, we’ve got dressers to move.”

“And off we go!” Tony says, slamming the trunk door on Jimmy’s van.

This run is to Goodwill, getting rid of things Jethro doesn’t need anymore. (There was some muttering from Tony that even Goodwill probably didn’t need furniture that was originally purchased from Goodwill fifteen years ago, but they know Gibbs wouldn’t be thrilled with just throwing out stuff that can still be used. They are, however, quietly tossing his TV, no one, even Goodwill shoppers, want that.)

This time, because there are light things like bedside tables and lamps Tim gets to be on the crew of people lugging things around.

And while physically doing it doesn’t feel good. (He knows he’s going to be aching tonight and tomorrow) being able to do it feels great.

“Good to see you really moving around again,” Tony says as they put a few miles between them and Gibbs’ place.

Tim nods, sincerely.

“Bet that feels good.”
“You have no idea.”

“I blew my knee out in college and killed what might have been a pro-basketball career.”

Tim winces. “Or you do.”

“Yeah, I do.” Tony looks over at Tim. “Still, you’re bouncing back faster than I expected.”

“Jimmy’s really good at PT.”

Tony squints at that. He’d been trying to stay away from the elephant in the van, but given that Ducky more or less shoved them into a van with just each other for, probably four hours today, he’s guessing this was set up to get them talking about it, so he says, “Is that where… this… started?”

Tim shakes his head. “Nah. Been moving in that direction for a long time. Getting hurt got us talking about it, not just thinking. This…” Tim holds up his right hand, “is just part of what showed us we could touch each other and not all freak out about it.”

“Oh.”

They drive a few more miles. It feels, different… He and Tony were never great at just alone and quiet. They got good at it because it was a habit they needed to work together and survive, but over the last almost nine months, they’ve fallen out of practice at just being alone together.

These days, most of the time they’re together, everyone else is with them, or they’re talking about work, or they’re working on something, like the house.

None of which is true right now.

“So, they’ll be what… three months apart?” Tony says.

Tim latches onto that, glad to get out of a not wildly comfortable silence. “January 28th, that’s what we’re hoping for. And you guys… end of April, right?”

Tony holds up crossed fingers. “See if we can get Palmer to start on one soon, and all three of us have one in one year.”

Tim shakes his head. It’s not impossible, but he’s not thinking there’ll be a 2017 Palmer. “Hoping for another boy, but not trying again until Anna’s a year old.” Tim’s intentionally being vague on who might be hoping and who’s trying. He’s thinking right now isn’t a great time to get into the exact DNA cocktail of the next Palmer. And, honestly, if the next Palmer does look like Jimmy, Tony probably doesn’t know there was a possibility of him not looking like Jimmy. Unless he outright asks, in which case… Tim’s not sure; he’ll figure that out if it happens.

Tony either fills in Tim’s blanks with his own information, or just doesn’t notice the lack of pronouns. “That’s December… Could still do it.”

Tim grins at that. “If we get the time, want to get that blue room Gibbs was talking about fixed up? Get it set for Sean and Dave, and maybe Don?”

Tony’s smiling at that idea. “Might want to have a chat with the Misses first, make sure she’s cool with us turning her extra room into another nursery.”

Tim shakes his head in wonder. “We’re really doing this. We’re moving his girlfriend in.”
“We’re moving our step-mom in.”

Tim rolls his eyes a little as he breaks for a red light. “I refuse to call a woman who is a year older than me any variation of Mom.”

Tony laughs. “You get used to it.” Then he really looks at Tim. “It’s really trippy when she’s younger than you are.”

“I don’t want to get used to it. I’m good with Abbi.” Tim says, completely missing that Abbi’s eight years younger than Tony.

“She’s probably good with Abbi, too.” Tony reaches over and gently slaps the back of Tim’s head. “Can you imagine the Gibbs’… Borinslap we’ll get if we call her Mom.”

Tim laughs at that, too, taking his foot off the break and heading forward. “Yeah, he wouldn’t do it, not anymore, but she would.”

“What’re Kelly and Sean going to call her?”

“I’m going to leave that to her. If mom feels weird, Gran or something like that’s going to be downright bizarre. How about Dave, is he going to be Pop for your kids?”

“Yeah. Or something like that. Ziva may have some pet name for him. Might be Pop to your kids and Saba to mine.”

“Saba?” Tim’s sure that’s something from Ziva’s past, but he doesn’t know what specifically.

“Hebrew for Grandpa.”

Tim nods. “And Uncle Jethro to Jimmy’s… This is getting complicated.”

“Yeah,” Tony says as Tim pulls them up to Goodwill, and they start to unload. Once the van is empty, and they’re heading toward Borin’s place, Tony smiles, cocky and pleased with himself. “‘She Who Will Not Be The Fourth.’ That’s what we’re calling her.”

Tim chuckles at that. “That’s worse than all ninety-seven versions of Probie.”

Tony looks pleased. “And that’s why we’re gonna use it.”

“Not where they can hear it.”

Tony laughs at that, too.

They grab some coffee between Goodwill and Borin’s place. After all, if he’s going to be driving all over the place, it’d be nice to have something to go with that.

Tony’s eyeing his cup.

“What’s the point?”

Tim doesn’t look away from the road. He does shrug. “Which point?”
“Decaf coffee?”

Tim shrugs at that, too. “Habit. Tastes good. Still has milk in it, that’s good for me, right?”

“Just something to do with your hands?”

“Yeah. Ever watch someone quit smoking? A lot of them like having something to chew on/hold.”

Tony thinks about that. “Think Vance smoked?”

That’s never occurred to Tim. “That might explain the thing with the toothpicks.”

“That’s never occurred to Tim. “That might explain the thing with the toothpicks.”

“Haven’t seen him chewing on one for years.”

To Borin’s they go. No parking near her place, so they’re going to be schlepping things quite a way.

Nothing to be done for it. Parking spaces are first-come first-served and nine on a Saturday means lots of people home and sleeping in.

But not them. Tim finally finds a spot only two blocks away, and they head over.

Like with Gibbs’ place there’s a load of stuff on the front steps. (Less stuff, because Borin has a front step and not a full porch.) Given how far away the van is, and the short space between it and the car behind it, they’re not going to be grabbing anything big.

As they head in, Tony says, “If any of you see a space open up near the house, grab it.”

“Already on it,” Breena says, carrying a box to the front step and pausing to kiss Tim en route. Just a quick peck, nothing deep or erotic, but it is on the lips and not the cheek. It, and the little pat on the butt he gives her, is actually very similar to the kiss and hug Abby gets fewer than thirty seconds later as they find her in Abbi’s living room wrapping up pictures and putting them in boxes. (As per Tony’s request, there has been no slobbering on either of the girls.)

Tim heads deeper into the house, saying hello to Ziva and Abbi, both are in the kitchen boxing up Abbi’s cooking tools, and both of whom get a quick hug. “Light stuff for this round, we’re not parked anywhere near here.”

They nod. “How’d the first run go?” Abbi asks.

“Jethro is now one dresser, six lights, two side tables, a television, and three kitchen chairs lighter, and Goodwill is wondering if they can dress them up and sell them as being ‘vintage’ and ‘retro.’”

Abbi smiles at that. “Good luck with that. Those chairs…” she shakes her head. “There’s a reason he always eats on the sofa.”

Tim nods. “Yeah, I think those kitchen chairs are made of 1979’s best grade of artificial vinyl.”

Ziva chuckles. “And how is he doing with no heavy lifting?”

“Frustrated. Not too bad yet, but I have a feeling it’ll get worse. Fornell and Ducky are with him, so he’s not going too stir-crazy with just him and piles of babies.”
“Good.” Abbi’s looking okay with that.

“So, last night… You guys okay?” Tim asks.

“Long story. We can get into the details at dinner,” Abbi replies.

“Fornell’ll be there.”

“Not a problem. He’s in on this, too,” Abbi finishes, strapping a long strip of tape over her box. She lifts it tentatively. “About ten pounds, you good on this?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Plates?”

“Yep. Not that I use more than two or three at a time very often, but I’ve got decent ones.”

“Then I’ll be careful with them.”

Abbi smiles at that, and then she and Ziva go back to boxing up more stuff.

Tim finds Jimmy and Tony heading toward the house as he’s going back to the van. “You have a dolly or something like that at your place?” Tim asks, pausing. This would be easier if they could just load things up and roll.

“Nope. Got a wheelbarrow,” Jimmy says.

“Big enough to be worth losing the time and the space to get it here?”

Jimmy thinks and then shakes his head. “No. We could get maybe two boxes in it.”

“Okay,” and Tim heads to the van to add his box to it.

It takes them about twenty minutes to get the van all loaded up, one fairly light bookcase, and a whole lot of boxes, and off they go again.

“What?” Tim can feel Tony watching him. He’s not saying anything, but there’s a sort of tension wafting off of him.

Tony shakes his head, so, in the spirit of everyone getting along, Tim chooses to ignore the TENSE pouring off of Tony.

This lasts until the next stop sign.

“Not that I’ll think you’ll try… but last week you knew Breena was Jimmy’s wife—“

Tim’s eyes narrow. “Is. Not was. She is Jimmy’s wife.”

Tony continues along without stopping for that, “Ziva’s off limits.”

Tim’s eyes are in danger of falling out of his head he’s rolling them so hard, and he’s sure he’s got his absolute prize, ‘You’ve got to be kidding me,’ bitch face in place.

Tony shrugs. “Just, you know, there were rules last week, and… That’s still one of them.”
Tim sighs. “I have never, ever, in more than ten years, made a serious pass at Ziva. I’m not about to start now. I know you two are exclusive.”

“Yeah, that whole ‘being married thing’ usually hints at that, doesn’t it?” Tony’s looking at him meaningfully as he lets that trail off.

Tim glares at him, but there’s no heat in it. He supposes they have opened themselves up to a level of this by breaking the traditional lines. “It’s just the four of us.”

“But it could be more, right? That’s your ‘as long as we’re all good with it and doing it together lovey-dovey crap,’ right? Beyond everyone agrees ahead of time, you guys don’t have rules anymore, do you?”

Tim has to think about that. He licks his lips and ponders. His kneejerk reaction is, of course they’ve got rules, everyone has rules but… Actually, if he meant that about as long as they’re all good with it stuff, then they really don’t.

“Given who we are, I don’t think there’ll ever be anyone else. But, yes, the only hard rules are we all have to agree to it, and whatever it is needs to be brought up well in advance of actually happening so we’ve all got time to think about it and make sure we’re really good with it.”

“So, Abby says, ‘Hey, let’s go hit up that new kink club on 63rd—’ “

Tim hadn’t heard about that and responds with, “There’s a new kink club on 63rd?“

This time Tony’s eyes narrow. “Come join me and the point, McGee. She could suggest you all going out to do whatever, with other people, or objects, or whatever, and as long as you all mull it over and decide it tingles your dangly bits, then it’d be good, right?”

Tim rubs his lips together. He’s not loving Tony’s tone, but it’s not a bad question, and he can feel that Tony’s actually working on trying to figure out what’s going on here, so… “Okay, yes, if we all agreed to it, but… I don’t see any circumstance where other people are going to be welcome to join the party. I don’t think you’d be able to get all four of us to agree to that. Hell, Tony, you couldn’t get Jimmy and I into a strip club for my bachelor party, what do you think we’re going to do with the girls?”

Tony looks at him, and Tim can feel the dry that’s going to go with his voice before he starts speaking. “Last week I had an answer to what I thought you might do with them. But I was wrong about that, so I don’t want to speculate too hard on what you might actually do with them.”

Tim doesn’t have a response to that.

Another mile goes by, and Tony says, “I still can’t wrap my head around this. Strip club is off limits.
Breena’s not.”

Tim rubs his eyes. “Okay. Strip club was never ‘off limits.’ We never had a rule or anything. And if we’d gone, Abby would have probably thought it was funny or hot. Not like I was going to get in trouble for going. I didn’t want to do it. Jimmy didn’t want to do it. I’ve got really great sex at home, with people I adore, and it’s not like I’m not a fan of naked women dancing around, but… it would have been empty, and I’m not so hard up that empty sex is worth it.

“I’ve got awesome sex at home. Jimmy does, too. We’ve still got awesome sex, just more of it. What I don’t get is, you also have awesome sex at home, so why were you trying to take us to a strip club?”
Tony didn’t expect that to come back on him, so he’s got to think about it. “Because we’re guys, on our own, doing guy things, as a send off for you getting married, which was supposed to mean just one woman for the rest of your life… and we like naked women.”

“Well, yeah, but… I mean… naked Ziva at home. Naked nameless woman on stage. You love Ziva. You get to touch Ziva. Nameless woman on stage… Yeah, she’s beautiful but… I don’t know. Just makes me feel… lonely and frustrated.”

“I don’t stop loving Ziva or not get to touch her if I’m at a club.”

“Well, yeah, but…”

“Sometimes it’s good to come home revved up.”

“I get that, too, just… What’s at home does a better job of revving my engines than what’s on stage. I get that the woman on stage is hot, and… I like what I see, but… I want the whole package, I want to look and touch and talk. I want my brains and balls taken care of, and that’s just not happening in a strip club. Don’t you want that, too?”

“Yeah. I’m married.” Tony taps his wedding ring. “I bought the cow, even though I was swimming in free milk. At the end of the day, I want that. But… I like variety, you know? And I like… I like the way they treat you. I know you’re paying for it, but… It’s a nice fantasy to get lost in. You’re handsome and fascinating and brilliant and they’re all beautiful and they all love you and you’re walking sex and they all want a taste. I like that.”

Tim nods. He likes that, too. Just… he wants it for real. And since he has it for real, he’s not interested in the fantasy version of it, and he’s really not interested in paying for the fantasy of it.

“But, you have that.”

“I know!” Tim can see it very clearly that Tony does, absolutely know that. “I like a lot of it. I like it from a lot of girls.”

Tim’s getting a better sense of what Tony meant when he said he was a sex addict all those months ago.

“Would you go to one now? Gibbs’ll be asking Abbi soon enough. You know we’re taking him out. Assume for a moment that Jimmy and I are game for whatever you want to do, where’re we going for his bachelor party?”

Tony’s looking irked. “How did we get from you sleeping with Breena to here?”

“You’re the one who started it. No strip clubs and yes Breena makes sense to me. Breena’s about love and affection and the stuff you claim you like about going to a strip club, but it’s real. So, you’re married now, you’ve got Ziva at home, are strip clubs okay?”

“Like you, we don’t have a rule about it. She knew that’s what I was planning for your bachelor party and she thought it was okay. But, no. It’s not okay. I’m married now. So, the idea is that she’s the one, the only one, who scratches that itch.”

“Okay.” Tim gets that. Then he doesn’t. “But, you still look at porn, right? And there’s no way in hell I’m buying the idea you stopped jerking off.”

Tony opens and closes his mouth. Then he nods, quickly. Yes, he still has some porn, not as much, and he doesn’t look at it nearly as often as he used to, but his favorites are still on his hard drive.
“What’s the difference?”

Tony looks frustrated. “I don’t know! One’s okay, the other isn’t. You do, too!”

Tim shrugs. “Not a lot. Usually if I’m on my own these days, I’m in the shower in the morning, not exactly a great place to watch. Last time I was on my own, and not in a rush, I was looking at shots of us. Last time I was playing with porn, it was both of us together. So, it’s not off the menu, and it’s not that I can’t have it, but, say I’m called off to handle a job in Dubai or something, I’m a lot more likely to pick shots of the two or four of us, which hit all my buttons and have great memories attached to them, than I am to grab porn.” Tim thinks about that; it feels right. “When we were in Vegas one of the shows we saw was pretty risqué. Not a strip club, but as close as I’ve ever been to one, you know, not for work. That was fine. It was a lot of fun, and yeah, getting ‘revved up’ with her was a blast. But we went together. You and Ziva, going to a strip club together, that okay?”

Tony’s biting his lip, and looking very relieved to see that they are ten feet away from Gibbs’ driveway. “Saved by bell,” he says under his breath.

At no point in time did Gibbs ever think that he’d find not being the guy lugging the heavy stuff around frustrating. In fact, one of his pet kicks of being the Boss was making Tim and Tony and Ziva do hard, heavy, dirty, or smelly work.

But, as he’s watching Tony and Fornell and Ducky lug his stuff to the van, and Tim, who could barely move this time two months ago, carrying light stuff, he’s feeling horrendously useless.

It’s not true. Someone’s got to watch little girls. And it’s not like he minds being on baby duty. But, especially right now, while Kelly an Anna are down for their morning nap, and Molly wants to be helping the grownups carry stuff. (She’s got a collection of pillows she’s taking to the van.) He just feels useless.

He’s putting books he hasn’t read in more than five years in boxes. If it’s been that long, he doesn’t need them any longer. Supposedly, the up and down of reaching for a book and tossing it in a box is supposed to be good for him, but…

He’s so done with healing up. He wants to be healed. Not… stuck in this fragile limbo from where playing a rough game of toss (or putting books in boxes) can leave him out of breath.

He tries a deep breath, supposedly the more he pushes his lungs the sooner the hurt one will expand, the sooner he’ll get some (but not all, all’s no longer physically possible) of his wind back. It hurts. A lot.

He feels a hand on his shoulder, along with a gentle squeeze. “It’ll get better,” Tim says.

“Yeah.”

Tim nods at him, knowing how much it sucks to be the one on light duty. “Jimmy’s been researching. Once your ribs are healed up, he’ll have stuff for you to do.”

Gibbs nods at that.
Gibbs’ to Goodwill to Abbi’s to Gibbs’ to Goodwill to Abbi’s…

Tim’s not even entirely sure which leg of the trip he’s on when he says to Tony, “If there’s ever a next time, we’re pooling our money and just hiring a damn mover!”

Tony nods. “It’s entirely possible that’s the best idea you’ve ever had.”

Tim’s limping by the time he’s helping to lug the last of the things from Abbi’s house. His ankle and foot have not been enjoying this much walking around, let alone going up and down steps, and they are calling out, in no uncertain terms, for Tim to stop doing this.

In that he’s carrying his last box, he’s not about to stop until he gets it into the van. Then back to the house to say goodbye to everyone, and then over to Gibbs for unpacking and dinner and then back to Jimmy and Breena’s where, unless the magic-second-wind-fairy comes to visit, he’s not going to be good for much beyond warm, snuggly body heat.

Tony and Jimmy are at the van, trying to get Abbi’s kitchen chairs in there with moderate success.

Tim leans against his car and eyes the set up. “Yeah. You’re going to hate it, though. Everything comes out, one chair goes in on its side, the other three you arrange so the legs straddle the chair that’s lying on its side, then the rest of it goes next to the chairs or on the seats.”

Tim looks at the Highlander behind him. “Or you can just stick the chair in the backseat and have more people ride to Gibbs’ place in Abbi’s car.”

“That’s the best idea you’ve ever had,” Tony says grabbing the chair as Jimmy clicks the remote to Tim’s car, popping the lock.

“Uh huh,” Tim slowly starts to stand up, gingerly trying to not put much weight on his foot.

Jimmy takes two steps over to him, and without saying anything, wraps his arm around Tim’s torso, and helps him to the passenger side of his van. “How bad are you hurting?”

“I’ll live. When I get to Gibbs’ I’ll steal one of his pain pills.”

Jimmy’s not looking thrilled by that as he gets Tim settled in the car. “Let me see.”
“It’s my foot. It hurts. Just looks like a foot.”

“Uh huh.” Jimmy’s not buying that.

“You really want to be looking at my nasty, sweaty feet?” This isn’t the hardest he’s worked during a day by a long stretch, but even with that, his feet aren’t exactly shower fresh right now.

“Aren’t you the one who pointed out how I’m elbow deep in dead bodies all day?”

“Yeah, and you’re the one who told me you do that with gloves.”

Jimmy snorts a quick laugh. “Get that shoe off, Twinkle Toes. I want to know if you’ve just worked too hard or if you reinjured it.”

Tim toes off his sneaker and tugs off the sock, somewhat appalled to see how puffy his foot looks, and how many little sock fuzzies are glued to it. “See.”

Jimmy nods, holding Tim’s ankle gently. “Little swollen. Ice when you get to Gibbs, and get it up on any furniture you can lay out on. The idea is to end up with less scar tissue, not more of it.”

“Okay.”

Jimmy gently squeezes Tim’s calf, and Tim gives him a quick smile before he goes back to getting his foot in his shoe.

“Tony, I’m putting you in charge of making sure that idiot doesn’t hurt himself again. You get him to Gibbs’, help him in, and then hand him over to Ducky.”

Tony nods and salutes Jimmy.

“I was going to say goodbye to everyone,” Tim adds.

Jimmy shakes his head. “You’re going to sit on your ass, and in an hour when they’re all at Gibbs’ place you can see them again.”

“Yes, Doctor,” Tim says, a bit of playful sarcasm in his voice.

Jimmy nods, looking satisfied.

Two minutes later, he and Tony are on the road again. Tony’s got his eyes glued to the road as he says, “So… um…”

“Tony?”

“Yeah, so… what do you guys do?”

Tim looks at him, Really? on his face, and shakes his head lightly. “Among other things, tell our wives we were right about you. Breena didn’t think you’d ask. As for the rest of it, none of you fucking business!”
Tony’s got his okay, yeah I walked into that, but give me an inch, okay? look on his face. “Not… like that… okay, yes like that, but… not… just like that. Like…”

“You channeling a surfer dude on purpose?”

“No.” Tony’s looking irked and he pulls himself back into shape. “Like, four of you, that’s a lot of people in one bed.”

Tim shrugs. He’s got the sense that this isn’t precisely what Tony’s curious about, but it’s on the way to getting there.

“And you guys might be skinny, but you’re not tiny, so…”

“So both of our bedrooms exist in three dimensional space and none of us are lacking in imagination. It works.”

“What about you and Jimmy?” Yeah, that’s what he wants to know.

Tim glances away from traffic and notices that Tony’s lightly blushing. “Gotta be a little more specific than that.”

“You’re straight.”

“Yes.” Tim nods. “He is, too.”

“So… When we talked about it a million years ago, another guy was a deal breaker for you.”

Tim nods again. “And if he’s not Jimmy, another guy is a deal breaker.”

“But… shouldn’t Jimmy be one. I mean… he’s still a guy. Another guy looking at you, right there… next to you… naked…” Tony licks his lips, looking uncomfortable, resolutely not looking Tim in the face. “He’s… right there, right?”

In that this was his default position a year ago, Tim’s trying to not get bothered by this, but right now, seeing it coming from Tony, he’s having a really easy time understanding why Abby thinks he and Jimmy are being silly when they get weird about getting too intimate with each other. “This would be really creepy if he wasn’t part of it. It doesn’t work if we aren’t all part of it. Haven’t you done something like this? You said something about your frat buddies watching…”

Tony rolls his eyes. “When I was blind drunk. The only reason I know I’ve done it is they taped the photos to my door. I don’t remember doing it.”

“Oh.”

“And, from everything I could see in those photos, I was the only naked guy in the room. But even if there were a few other guys also naked and fucking away, it’s not the same. I’m assuming you guys are… you know… making love?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. And yeah, it’s usually all four of us, and it’s close and warm and… Yeah, he’s there. I’m there. And yes, there’s a lot of watching. And no, it’s not weird. Being watched is kind of a kick, you know? And watching is good, too.”

Tony looks curious. “Usually?”

“Yeah. We still have three kids. Someone’s got to be on baby watch in the morning. So, two of us get to sleep in, the other two get the babies, and if he’s baby wrangling, then I’m on my own with Breena. But other than someone stepping out to grab a kid when a kids needs to be grabbed, we’re all together for this.”

Tony thinks about that, then asks, “You kiss him?”

“What are we, fifteen-year-old girls?”

Tony shoots him a I’m not just being a twit look. “I’m trying to figure out how this works, who goes where, and all the rest of it. So, yeah, call me a fifteen year old girl if you want, but…”

Tim gets that. Tony’s reboxing everyone, rearranging them so they all “fit” again. “Yeah, couple times.” Last night alone. Maybe. He’s a little fuzzy on exactly how that went, and he hasn’t spent any real time thinking about it, yet. “How do you seal wedding vows?” That’s safer and something he very clearly remembers.

“Oh. Vows?”

“Really wasn’t kidding about it being a marriage. We can’t…” Tim stops. “I almost said ‘do it for real,’ but that’s crap. The paper isn’t what makes it real. Ducky and Penny are just as married as you and I. We can’t get the paper, and we can’t live together yet, but… It’s real. Everyone who can know about this without risking our kids, does. Maybe one day we’ll have the party, and I know there’ll be rings sooner or later.”

Tony nods at that. “Gibbs said you called Jimmy your husband.”

“Yeah. That’s how this works. He’s not just my buddy I share girls with.”

Tony thinks about that for a long minute. “How was it?”

“How was what?” Tim hopes Tony’s not asking him how sharing the girls with Jimmy was.

“How was what?” Tim hopes Tony’s not asking him how sharing the girls with Jimmy was.

“Kissing Jimmy.”

Tim closes his eyes, inhales deep, and lets it out slow. He’s not sure if that’s a better question or not. He’s also not even sure how to go about answering that. “Quick. It’s not gross or anything, but kissing the girls is a lot more fun.” Tim can feel that’s not enough. He licks his lips, trying to put it into words. “Kind of like getting a hug, or holding hands, it’s warm and feels nice, but not sexy…”

Tony looks away from traffic to Tim for a second, like he’s trying to lay him open with his eyes. “Do you guys cuddle?”

Tim shoots his bitch face back at Tony, and he backs off. Another silent moment passes where Tony works on fitting this together. “What did you vow?”

“’Until my last breath…’ Same vow I made Abby. I remade it to her. Made it to her the first time at Jimmy and Breena’s wedding.” The writer in Tim wonders if that qualifies as irony or foreshadowing. “That’s… that’s how I’ve got it in my head, you know? That’s the one that covers everything else. The one I made myself, to myself at first, and then to her, and to our kids, and now to them and their kids. Literally, nothing’s broken, just expanded.”

Tony thinks about that, too. Then asks, “He do another thirty minute sermon of goo?”

“Whatever was in his head stayed there. Jimmy’s were silent, kissed to all three of us.” Tim’s wondering if they ragged on Jimmy about his vows so much that he just didn’t say anything. Now he’s wishing they hadn’t; he would have liked to have known what Jimmy was thinking. He reminds himself to ask about that tonight.

“Do the girls… with each other?”

Tim bites his lip and mentally sighs. Then he says, “Tony, I’m really glad you’re working with this, and trying to understand, but… It’s our marriage. I don’t want to talk too specifically about what we do in bed. It’s private. And I know Jimmy doesn’t like talking too much either. You wanna ask the girls, I’m sure they’ll leave you swimming in TMI. But, I’m not… All you need to know is that emotionally it works in every direction, and sexually is none of your business.”

Tony thinks about that for a few more breaths, and then says, “But you’re straight.”

“Yep.”

“So, what do you and Jimmy do? How do you work?”

“We don’t have sex with each other.”

“Okay. Yeah, you keep saying that, but… You say it works all four way emotionally. If you love him, really love him… Doesn’t that make you… gay… bi or something? And… if you do love him, and you’re kissing and snuggling him, why wouldn’t you want to have sex with him?”

Tim shrugs. Tony’s hitting another question he’s been working on for himself. “I do love him. I don’t want to have sex with him. And from everything I can tell, I’m not bi. He’s not, either. If either of us leaned in that direction, I’m sure we’d know by now. And I don’t know how or why that works, I just know that that’s what’s going on in my head.”

Tony nods, quickly, and Tim’s not sure what he’s doing with that, but he seems satisfied with it.

“You okay?”

Tony shrugs. “We’re building a home today. Jethro and Abbi’s. Just gonna be them, maybe a kid, I guess. Not impossible, right?”

Tim shakes his head. “Gibbs says no on that. Not going to happen. He sounded really certain about it, too.”

“Oh. Then just them. You guys did it for Ziva and I. We did it for you and Abby. You and Jimmy got Penny and Ducky set. That’s what we’ve been doing these last few years, moving our home out of the Navy Yard and into actual homes, with loves and people and children, not just unending work.” Tony shakes his head. “Don’t fuck it up, Tim. Your four go, and it’ll break all of our homes.”

Tim nods. “We know.”

Tony snorts a little. “It’d be easier to buy if you were fucking Jimmy, too.”

Tim doesn’t get that. “Why?”

“Spent some time googling this.” That completely stuns Tim. “Read up. Some guys get off on seeing their wife with someone else. Okay, great. Apparently it’s pretty common, another guy with your woman revs you up because now you’ve got something to prove. Faster recovery time, get back in there faster. Sperm competition or something like that, and apparently that’s why our dicks are shaped the way they are, push the other guy’s cum out. Great.” Tim’s wondering where the hell online Tony ended up. “But there’s only so long that’s going to keep you hot. It’ll fade away. You’ll get bored and… And if it was all four of you, with each other, there’d be more to tie you together.”
“Uh…” Tim’s not entirely sure what to do with that. On probably several levels, Tony’s right. But…
“I’m as attached to Jimmy as it’s possible for a straight guy to be.”

“Be more if you were his lover, too.”

Tim tries rolling that around in his head. “I don’t think so. I don’t know, and don’t expect I ever will, but… Just like him not being there would be creepy… having sex with him would be… I don’t know… Imagining the girls gets me revved up. Imagining Jimmy… it’s not a turn off, it doesn’t make me feel bad, but it doesn’t do anything for me, either. It’s kissing your best friend. It’s not bad. Lips are lips, they feel good, and Jimmy knows what he’s doing with them, he’s a good kisser, it’s a pleasant sensation, but it doesn’t get me hard.”

“That sounds like more than quick.”

Tim shrugs at that, too. “Tony, I’m sitting here, in a car, with you, telling you that there’s a guy I consider myself married to. How much more than that do you need?”

Tony sighs. “I don’t know. Enough time goes by…” He shakes his head a little. “Sooner or later enough time will go by, and I’ll trust it. But I can’t, not now.”

Tim nods. “We’ll still be together when you get there.”

Tony looks away from traffic to Tim. “You better be!”
Once Tony and Tim head off, for Gibb’s part of the group, there’s not a ton of stuff to do. They’ve already got the next load out on the porch, and they don’t yet know what’s going to be coming back from Abbi’s place, so they can’t anticipate too far on getting things moved out of the way.

So, for a moment, Gibbs, Fornell, and Ducky stand around in his living room, staring at the sofa, which hasn’t gone, yet, and where the coffee table used to be, but isn’t any longer, then Fornell heads into the dining room, and grabs the fishbowl.

It’s been sitting on that little table the entire time he’s known Gibbs and he’s never seen a drop of water in that bowl, let alone a fish.

“You ever have a fish in this?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Kelly did.”

Molly looks up from playing tug the ball with Mona, (Mona’s letting Kelly win, because at three times her size there’s no shot of Kelly wrestling away a tennis ball from her unless she wants to lose the tennis ball.) and says, “Fish?” She knows what fish are, they’ve got three of them at her daycare. She’s looking from the bowl to Kelly to the bowl again, very curious about the idea that Kelly gets to have fish, and as of yet, she has not been allowed to have any fish.

Jethro shakes his head at Molly and slowly heads over to sit next to her. He pulls Kelly into his lap and kisses her head, and then gives Anna and Molly kisses, too. “A long time ago, my little girl, her name was Kelly, too, and you’re,” Kelly gets a little hug, “named after her, lived here, and in that bowl she used to have two goldfish. One was bright orange and white, and his name was Flame, and the other one was orange all over, and her name was Pumpkin.

“She was in second grade, and her school had a fall carnival. And there was a big table covered with lots of little bowls, just like that one, but tiny,” Gibbs takes Molly’s hands in his and cups them into a little bowl. “And in each one there was a goldfish. And for a dime, anyone who wanted to could take a ping pong ball…” That doesn’t mean anything to Molly, and Kelly and Anna are just listening to his voice. He’s completely lost them because they don’t know what “dime,” “fish,” “school,” “fall” or “carnival” means. He looks around and doesn’t see anything even remotely like a ping pong ball, so he picks up Kelly’s hand, and says to Molly, “A little white ball, about this size, but very light, it would float on the water, not make a splash. Anyone who paid a dime got two ping pong balls, and they got to throw them at the bowls, and if the ping pong ball landed in one of the bowls, they got to keep the fish.”

“Kelly got fish?” Molly’s eyes are wide.

Gibbs nods. “Kelly won one fish, and I won one for her. Kelly’s mama went three times, but her ping pong balls kept bouncing off the rims of the bowls, so she didn’t win any fish.”

Molly’s staring at the bowl, eyes slightly squinted, like she’s thinking hard about something. Finally she says, “New fish?”

Gibbs looks at the bowl, which is sitting on the kitchen table, which he’s not keeping. “Yeah, we can get some new fish.” The bowl is dusty and dingy. “How about we put it in the dishwasher, get it all cleaned up, and when I can drive again, you and I’ll go and get some fish as a welcome home
Molly looks satisfied at that idea. She nods in approval and says, “Good.”

Fornell takes the fish bowl to the dishwasher and sets it on the bottom rack. Then he grabs the table it had been sitting on, and lugs it outside to the front porch.

An hour later, as the girls are having their morning snack, and as Fornell’s eyeing Gibbs’ walls while thinking about where they’re going to put Abbi’s TV. (Still at Abbi’s house, but apparently it’s a 23 inch flat screen, so it’s got to go somewhere, and the corner Gibbs kept his TV in isn’t going to work.) Ducky quietly asks Gibbs, “The fish outlived them, didn’t they?”

Gibbs nods. “Yeah. We were in California when they died, and… I ended up driving back here. Had to come back for FLETC. Just me, and the pictures, and those two damn fish in that bowl, buckled up in the front seat. After the second time, no one asked me why I brought two goldfish to FLETC.”

Gibbs sighs, and cuts that short as he feels his ribs catch on the exhale. “Got in more than a few stupid fights with different exes about why I wouldn’t get rid of that damn bowl.”

Ducky nods at that. Then he smiles. “It’s good to see you bringing life back into your home.”

“Thanks, Duck.”

Gibbs can’t carry the girls, so Fornell’s got Anna and Ducky has Kelly, but he can hold Molly’s hand as she heads up the stairs to “their” room.

(Molly is proudly proclaiming that she doesn’t need a morning nap anymore. But she’s coming along to listen to stories because she likes stories with “Uncle Jetro.”)

Ducky’s done many a morning nap, with all three of the girls, so he knows what he’s doing, too. The routine of get girls fed, cleaned up, snuggled, and settled down is old hat to both him and Jethro.

Fornell, on the other hand, hasn’t done this in fourteen years. (Emily stopped napping at almost four.) Plus, he’s not exactly heartbroken to avoid diaper duty. So, he’s entertaining Molly, both of them are going through Jethro’s collection of books for little girls, picking out which stories they’re going to do while Gibbs and Ducky are on clean up duty.

Gibbs didn’t keep Kelly’s books, or with the exception of a few of them that he made, her toys. He just… couldn’t. His girls were gone, and he was alone, in on-base housing, in a house filled with stuff that somehow the rest of the world expected him to deal with.

He didn’t do anything with any of the stuff before Hernandez because he wasn’t expecting there to be an after, and once there was…

He got back from Hernandez, talked with Mike about what came next, spent one night in their home in California, and then got out of there. Just him, the photos, and the fish. (He had their bed shipped home.)

Mike called Goodwill for him, and they came and took everything else.
When he got back to their home, here, he didn’t go into Kelly’s room for almost two years. It was mostly empty. (So was the whole house.) They’d packed and moved the furniture and most of her things when they went to California, but her baby stuff was still here, and some of her toddler stuff, too. Little bits and pieces Shannon wanted to keep to remember with.

They got boxed up, barely looked at, and shoved into the attic before the first time Hannah got to see his place.

So, the books Fornell and Molly are going through aren’t old. They’re in good shape, and they don’t have that well-loved read before naptime seventeen million naps in a row feel to them. But a lot of them are stories he knows by heart. The whole Madeline collection is in there, along with Goodnight Moon, a lot of Doctor Seuss, Harold and the Purple Crayon, and every one of the Boynton books he could find. For when they’re older, there are Berenstain Bears, and Little House on the Prairie.

Fornell’s smiling as he sees a book, his own memories of a little girl with bright red hair snuggling in for pre-nap stories vibrant in his mind, pointing it out to Molly. “You like this one?”

She nods, Not the Hippopotamus is just fine. She grabs Moo, Baa, La La La, too, taking them over to Jethro, who is just wrapping up diaper time with Kelly.

“Good picks.” He lays Kelly on the mattress on the floor that’s doing duty as a baby nap spot, and waits a few seconds for Ducky to get done with Anna. He does, settling her down to nap, too.

Molly scrambles into Gibbs’ lap, (she’s the only one who really cares about the pictures, Anna and Kelly are just listening to his voice) and opens up Moo, Baa, La La La.

!Moo Baa La La La

“‘The cow says mooo…” he reads, exaggerating the Moo, feeling Fornell smiling and chuckling a little at this. “The sheep says baa…” Molly ‘baaas’ along with him. “Three singing pigs say…” he reads along, letting his voice trail off.

Molly shouts out, “La la la!”

“No, no, you say…” He keeps reading along, with Molly adding, “The pigs say OINK all day and night!”

They read Moo, Baa, La La La and Not the Hippopotamus, and then she scampers off to grab Madeline, so they read that one, too, and by then Kelly and Anna are basically asleep, so they both get soft kisses, as the men and Molly head out to let them snooze.

Fornell’s gently shaking his head as the walk down the hall. “I’d forgotten how much fun this age is.”

Gibbs smiles, nodding. “In small doses. Wouldn’t want to do it full time.”

Fornell shakes his head at that. “No! Done with that. But a few afternoons…”

“Don’t get jonesing for grandbabies too hard.”
Fornell holds up his hands, he doesn’t want to get within ten feet of that. Not with an eighteen-year-old daughter. “I’ll borrow yours if I need a fix.”

Ducky, who’s been watching this exchange, holding Molly’s hand as they go down the steps, say, “Excellent plan.”

Gibbs’ things slowly leach out of his home. Abbi’s things start flowing in. Some changes are noticeable almost immediately. New sofa. New TV. New dining table. Some are less so. He’s unpacking her plates, and putting them in his cupboards.

It hits him that if he’s actually eating dinner with someone else on a regular basis. He’ll end up using plates again. Not that he never did before, but… Some weeks it took the whole week to get enough dishes into his dishwasher to make it worth turning on.

It also hits him that he’ll probably be actually eating a whole lot more. He’s way better about it than he used to be. He’s drinking a hell of a lot fewer meals these days. (Which is not the same thing as saying he eats three meals a day seven days a week.) But, he can easily see himself actually being the guy who makes (or at least buys) food, pretty much every night, and then sits down and eats it with someone.

It’s been a long time since he’s had any sort of little domestic fantasies ready to act on, but right this second he’s thinking he needs to wheedle Fornell’s Nona’s recipe for pasta puttenesca out of him, so he can make it for Abbi.

“Penny!” Fornell calls out as she heads in as the day’s wearing late.

“Wow!” She looks around with wide eyes, staring at the new lay out. “If I was just dropping something off, I’d think I was in the wrong place.” She moves around the living and dining rooms, whistling quietly.

Gibbs isn’t a TV guy. He’ll watch games, but usually if he’s watching TV it’s because it’s keeping him company while he eats, or something to listen to while ironing. All his TV needed to do was hook into a (speaking of things that didn’t go to Goodwill) VHS so he could play the Westerns he liked, and provide him with news and Wizards and Redskins games.

He’s only got two channels he watches, ZNN and ESPN.

So, because he’s not a TV guy, his living room centered on his sofa and coffee table and fireplace. It still does, sort of.

Except now it’s Abbi’s sofa, which has soft, almost plush, light blue fabric with big, overstuffed cushions and lots of room for them and six or seven buddies. Tony and Fornell (mostly, with a slight assist from Tim and Ducky) wrestled it and the equally oversized chair (“That’s not a chair; that’s a loveseat with identity issues,” Tony said as they dragged it in.) into the living room, and set them so the back was to the entry way.
It’s set so the chair is in front of the bookcase closest to the dining room (now home to Abbi’s TV and some books), and the sofa is facing the fireplace.

So, now, there’s plenty of room for snuggling down to watch something on TV, or just zone out in front of the fire. (Mona’s already appropriated half of the chair. She’s curled into a ball with her head on Molly’s leg, as Molly and both babies watch Little Bear.)

Penny heads into the dining room, which seats just as many people as it did before, but the table and chairs look like they were made sometime in the last ten years. And, unlike the previous occupants of this space these chairs are wood. Penny doesn’t know what sort, but they’re light blonde seats with white legs and backs. The table matches those colors, light blonde top, white legs.

There’s even, and she’s wondering if this is from Abbi’s place, or if Gibbs is showing off his nesting skills, a small vase on the table. Penny stares at it a moment longer, it’s almost perfectly spherical, clear glass, with a collection of little glass beads in green and gold and blue on the bottom. Must be Abbi’s.

“Where are the rest of them?” she asks Fornell.

“Last I saw, they were upstairs. The last load had Abbi’s clothes and shower stuff and… I’m not messing with that.”

Penny looks around and sees that Fornell’s apparently splitting his attention between watching little girls and getting the table set for dinner. (Maybe he’s the one who decided to put the vase there.)

“Looks like you’re ready for me?”

“Depends, you’ve got the food, right?”

“In the car. Give me a hand?”

“Certainly.” He stops pulling glasses out of a cabinet and says to Mona, “We’ll be in and out. Keep an eye on the girls.” Mona flashes him her You’re kidding, right? I haven’t let them out of my sight all day look. Fornell nods at her and pats her head.

“You ever feel like that dog talks to you?” he asks as they go to her car.

Penny nods as she opens the door to her car. “She does seem to be an unusually intelligent dog.”

“Yeah. Ohhh… That smells good!”

“Yes! We’ve got a very good curry shop near campus.” She hands him the first box which has six quart containers in it. “I got all their greatest hits and enough naan to shingle the house.”

“Which we need. DiNozzo alone’s going put away at least half of it, and Palmer’ll get a third and maybe the rest of us can get the rest.”

Penny laughs at that. “So you’re saying you’ve been working hard today?”

“You don’t even want to guess.”

She smiles.

“So, how’d you get out of this?” he asks, lifting the first of the boxes filled with lots of dinner.

“Fundraising. I spent today working on setting up a fundraising campaign for a woman who’s working on setting up a series of women’s shelters in Afghanistan and Pakistan.”

Fornell perks up at that. “Really? That’s… interesting.”

Penny eyes him calmly. Gibbs has already told her and Ducky that in a year or so Fornell’s likely to be their next conspirator.

“Yes, it is. If she gets the funding she needs, she’ll be ready to start building in a year.”

“Huh. When we get inside, talk to me about where to send some money.”

Penny smiles at that, too.

It’s about half an hour later when Tony and Tim get back with the last load of stuff.

And while it’s true that Jimmy instructed Tony to make sure Tim got into Ducky’s hands, when they got in Ducky was busy working on hanging a seascape painting that Abbi had had hanging in her living room. So he decides that leaving Tim to the tender mercies of his (as soon as she noticed him limping) glaring Grandma would work just as well for putting the fear of the older generation into him.

“Timothy!”

“I’m fine, Penny,” he limps over to the sofa, deciding that Jimmy’s instructions about getting horizontal as soon as possible make a lot of sense.

“Yeah, you look it. I left the Saaru out in the car, how about you trot out and grab it.”

He hits the sofa with a groan and shakes his head.

“Yeah, you’re fine. You’ve been out of that cast less than two days.”

“It’s not my wrist that’s bugging me.”

“That, he’s properly babied,” Tony says, coming in with a box.

“Speaking of babies…” He begs Penny with his eyes for a moment and she fetches Kelly for him, plopping her in his lap. “Hi!”

“Daddy!”

She gets a big hug, snuggling into him, and he kisses the top of her head, which is lying on his chest right under his chin. “You have a good day?”

Emphatic nodding answers that as she pushes up, laying on his chest, staring him in the eyes, elbows on his sternum. “Nuggets!”

“Pop made you chicken nuggets for lunch?”

“Yes!”

“Were they yummy?”
“Yes!” Her eyes are wide as she says that. Right now she’s on a massive chicken nugget kick and would happily eat nothing but chicken nuggets if allowed.

He’s watching her, feeling her on his chest, toes just at the top of his jeans, face to face with him, noticing how her eyes are starting to slip from blue to green, and how right now she’s putting him in mind of happy Abby very much. He smiles at her, giving her another kiss.

That’s about when Molly notices that he’s come in. (Little Bear is like heroin for Molly. When it’s on, she’s oblivious to the rest of the world.) She scampers off of the chair, rushing over to him, climbing up onto the sofa and plopping herself onto his lap with an audible, “Ughf!” from Tim as her knee hits him in a less than pleasant spot.

“Uncle Tim!”

He gets his breath back and says, “Hi.”

She crawls up for hugs and kisses, too. “Uncle Jetro’s gonna get me fish!”

Tim smirks at that, thinking that maybe Jethro doesn’t need to be babysitting when he’s on painkillers, and that part of there being three adults around was to prevent the grandpa squad from making silly promises to little girls, but… obviously Fornell and Ducky didn’t step in and stop this, so…

“How many fish?”

“Many!”

By that point both Gibbs and Ducky are down again. “Two,” Gibbs says. “And they’re going to live with me.”

That makes a lot more sense to Tim. “What kind of fish?”

Molly looks confused by that idea. She’s under the impression that goldfish are the only sorts of fish around.

“Goldfish,” Gibbs adds.

Tim nods and says to Molly, “You need to ask Uncle Tony about goldfish. He’s got a few, and he takes really good care of them.”

Molly thinks about that, and then bounds off the sofa to go find Tony.

For the most part, dinner is a fairly quiet affair. Everyone (besides the babies and Penny) is tired. It’s been a long day of lugging things all over the place, and even Gibbs, who didn’t lift much of anything, was moving around a lot more than he’s been recently.

Add in very good food, and for a few moments the only sounds are chewing and “Can you pass the…” comments as everyone refuels.

Eventually though, blood sugar levels start to creep back up, and sitting down for a bit starts to take the edge off of tired, and real conversation starts to flow.
“So, ready to build?” Fornell asks Penny.

She nods a bit. “One of the biggest issues is getting spaces set up that are safe. If she can get enough money, she’s looking to set up women’s shelters with several schools, take advantage of one already fortified area, up the security, upgrade the physical plant of the schools, and add shelters to them.”

“Most bang for the security buck,” Tony adds.

“Yes. And if it works well in Afghanistan and Pakistan, she’s hoping to expand into Africa.”

“Provide shelter from Boko Haram?” Tim asks.

“That’s the basic idea. Afghanistan is hostile. Nigeria is deadly. If they can swing it in Afghanistan, get the fortifications well enough set, they’ll try to expand.”

“Sounds awesome,” Breena says between bites of Korma. “And you’re…?”

“Working on setting up a fundraising campaign. Money makes the world go around, and I know folks who know folks, plus, I’ve been filling out and helping to fill out grants since the ‘50s, if anyone knows how to spew out effective bureaucrat speak, it’s me.”

“Hours of going through potential donor organizations,” Ducky leads.

“Yes, and more hours of finding other organizations to partner with. Clean water people for example. Great if you have a school and shelter, not so great if they all drop over from dysentery. Sustainable, local, micro agriculture. You’ve got to feed everyone in the shelter and the school, and every acre of cropland, assuming the ground is even good enough to grow anything on, is another acre you have to defend. So, I’m working on getting Samira a collection of friendly groups who do things like squeeze every drop of useful food and water out of an area, and then work on how to waste as little as possible.”

“Sounds like a massive undertaking,” Jimmy says.

“It will be. But… It’s not a short scale project, but… five, ten years, with any luck they’ll have gotten a few of these up and running and ready to go.”

“Amen to that,” Abby says. “So, beyond writing checks, how do we help?”

“Right now, it’s all about writing checks.” Penny looks at Ziva. “That is, unless you know some Farsi and Pashtun fluent people who are familiar with the border region between Afghanistan and Pakistan who are connected to local NGOs and looking to make a difference…”

Ziva shakes her head. “Not connected to local NGOs, and the people I know are… working along different paths to make a difference.”

Penny nods. “I bet they are.”

Ziva nods, too. They see her glance at Abbi, who nods quickly. “You’ve been wondering about what is going on at CGIS?”

The rest of them nod. Brushing it off last night didn’t go unnoticed. Gibbs and Tony know what’s up, but the rest of them don’t.

“We’re getting anonymous notes telling us to keep looking. That this is just the tip of the iceberg,” Abbi says.
There’s a moment of silence while the table considers the idea of system wide corruption for an entire federal agency as the “tip of the iceberg.”

“Can you trace them?” Fornell asks.

“And already working on it,” Abbi replies. “We’re on whose sent them, but they’re actual letters, sent through the USPS. We know what zip code they’re sent from. But, unless we luck out and there’s something distinctive about this, there’s just no way to tell who sent it.”

“No prints, no DNA, and 20020 is the most densely populated zip code in DC,” Ziva adds.

“And we don’t know if this is some conspiracy theory crank who’s taking advantage of the situation, or a credible source who won’t go on record trying to get more attention to this.”

“Anything besides ‘tip of the iceberg?’” Fornell asks.

“Told us to keep eyes on the budgets, and a list of four bank accounts,” Abbi replies.

“Which you need a warrant to get into, which isn’t going to happen based on an anonymous letter that just appeared from the ethers,” Penny adds.

“Exactly. Right now they’ll let me go through basically anything that CGIS runs or owns, so we’re running those account numbers against our own, but if ‘tip of the iceberg’ means anything, it likely means those numbers won’t match any of ours.”

“Might be someone you’ve done business with. Are you guys set to run that down?” Tim asks.

Abbi shakes her head. “That would have been tricky before Brandis fried my computer system. Now…”

“You’ve got the backups, right?” Jimmy says.

“Yeah, but every computer I’ve been able to scrounge up is working on something else right now. I don’t have enough tools, or people I trust, to run this,” Abbi turns to Fornell. But you do, is clear on her face.

He nods. “Did you guys know that unlike the rest of us, the IRS runs on a guilty until proven innocent standard of justice, and that it’s entirely legal for them to audit any account, at any time, for any reason?” Fornell smiles. “You know, Jethro, since you’re retired and have all this free time, maybe you should be the go between for the three of us. Make sure we’re all in the loop.”

Gibbs glares at Fornell. It’s worse than he was thinking, instead of the yearly all three of them together, it’ll be all FOUR. Then another horrifying thought hits him, Abbi and Diane like no-nonsense, take charge, grab a problem and take it on headfirst people.

He grimaces. It’s entirely possible his soon-to-be fiancée and ex-wife might end up friends by doing this.

The rest of the table seems to be aware of this, too. He can feel the unvoiced giggles and sniggers. He feels a hand pat his shoulder, Penny’s, along with the words. “You have been complaining about being bored.”

Abbi smiles at him, looking amused by how stricken he seems at this idea, then she looks to Fornell. “The letter’s in evidence, but I’ve got the account numbers in my bag. They’re all yours.”
“Great. Emily’s got her first lacrosse game of the season tomorrow. I’ll talk to Diane then. Jethro can get us all set up to go over it soon.”

Gibbs’ forehead hits his palm as he slowly shakes his head.

It’s not late. At all. In fact, it’s only a little past eight.

But it feels late. Jethro’s tired, and given how little he actually did today, annoyed to be tired. So, he’s resting (and annoyed to be resting) on the oversized chair, Mona’s head on his lap, reading (not really) while Abbi efficiently rearranges everything in his… their kitchen.

He’d like to be helping her, but when he tried to do that, she glared at the O2 tube he’s using, and then looked at the chair in the living room, so he went and sat down and began to amuse himself.

It’s really comfortable. And, unlike his sofa, the back is high enough that he can rest his head against it while he reads, and next thing he knows he’s a bit less tired, and it is genuinely late because apparently he’s drifted off for a three hour nap.

He blinks, sleepily, and sees Abbi, sitting in front of the fire, staring at it. She’s in quarter profile, most of her face towards the flames. She’s lit from behind, glowing from the fire.

She’d probably scoff if he said she looked angelic, gold and red and lit up with a halo.

“Beautiful.” He stretches a little, and hears another rumble of thunder, probably what woke him up in the first place.

She looks away from the fire to him, sees he’s really awake, and stands up to sit with him. Mona’s not thrilled about being shoved out of the way, but Gibbs is still too sore to have anyone pressed to his right side.

She snuggles in, and he rests his lips on her shoulder. “Feeling like home, yet?”

She shrugs. Everything is upside down and backwards, and she’s still not sure where a good three quarters of her stuff is, so, no it’s not home, not yet. “It will.”

He smirks at that. He’s not sure where most of his stuff is anymore, either, and he was here while they rearranged everything. Ducky and Fornell are champion unpackers.

“You?” she asks.

He kisses her, feeling her against him, smelling her skin, watching the flames flicker over her skin and eyes. “Yeah. It’s home.”

She smiles, and then gently kisses him. “Good.”
Tim lands on his stomach, in Jimmy’s bed, with a groan. “What is going on? There is no possible way I hurt myself this bad helping out moving.” Even his nose, which until today he’d forgotten had broken, is hurting. He moans again, sounding very pitiful. He’s hurt bad enough to feel comfortable whining about it, but not so bad that he feels like he needs more narcotics than the one he stole from Jethro after dinner.

Jimmy pets his shoulder while kicking off his shoes, and both of the girls give him quick kisses. Abby sits next to him, gently stroking his hair. “While you were driving all over the place did you catch the weather?”

“Thunderstorms late tonight and all day tomorrow, yeah, so?”

Abby gives him a sympathetic smile while gently petting his hair again. “First hurricane of the season is supposed to go crashing into South Carolina tomorrow. We’re getting thunder and rain up here. You’re hurting all over because the front that goes with that storm is coming into town.”

A supremely undignified whine goes with that news. That storm front is supposed to be in play for the next two days.

Abby kisses him again. “You want to trade weeks with me, get your massage this week, and I’ll take a later one?”

Tim winces. Right now he’s hurting badly enough he doesn’t really want to be touched. Maybe held, but any kind of real pressure or friction sounds bad to him. “Think I’ll just lie here and watch them pet you.”

Abby nods at that and then helps him sit up. “Come on, let’s get you undressed.”

Tim’s thinking the literal definition of heaven may be having a space where people will baby you when you’re feeling bad.

He’s hurting badly enough that he’s not feeling sexy at all. He is feeling very pampered and cosseted when the girls help him undress and Jimmy tosses a light blanket over him while they go about their own getting ready for bed routine.

And he’s loving watching Jimmy and Breena take care of Abby, who is also feeling a bit on the sore and achy side. Sean’s not huge, not yet, but he’s more than big enough to make any sort of long day feel even longer, and today was a long day.

It’s a very content moment. He’s watching Jimmy and Breena work on Abby. Jimmy’s got her head in his lap and is gently rubbing circles on her scalp, Breena’s got one of her feet, pressing her knuckles into her heel, and Abby’s purring, eyes closed, blissed-out, holding Tim’s hand.
He’s feeling very happy right now, sore, God, sore, but so well loved. (He wonders vaguely how much of this is real, and how much of it is the pain meds, but, honestly, after a few tenths of a second’s thought, he decides he doesn’t care. This is good, he doesn’t need to examine it too closely.)

His index finger slips over Abby’s hand, her skin soft and warm under his touch, and after another inch of motion he touches her wedding ring.

“When we were making our promises, what were you thinking, Jimmy?”

Jimmy isn’t paying attention to Tim. He’s feeling Abby’s hair in his lap, her scalp under his fingers, and he’s watching the way she’s making tiny little purrs each time he presses the tips of his fingers into the base of her skull, and he’s watching the way Breena’s kneeling at her feet and gently rubbing them, fingers long and smooth stroking up and down on Abby’s feet and ankles. (Tim’s current lack of interest in sex is not, in any way, shape, or form, contagious. Jimmy’s VERY interested in sex tonight. So, he’s paying as little attention as he possibly can to the guy just lying next to them.)

But, finally, the fact that Tim’s talking to him filters through the beautiful women in front of him, so he says, “Huh? What’s got you thinking of that?”

“Tony was asking about us.”

“Warming up to us, asking?” Breena asks.

Tim nods. “Maybe. We started off with him reminding me that Ziva’s off limits, and fortunately it got better from there.”

Abby turns her head to look at him, realize that all that does is give her a great view of Jimmy’s knee and thigh, so she returns her head to neutral and says, “He really said that?”

“Yes, he did. Mostly he was asking about us, but that was part of it, too.”

The girls laugh at that. “Marking his territory?” Breena asks.

“Yes,” Tim says dryly.

“And that got you wondering about me?” Jimmy asks, looking at Tim, lightly stroking Abby’s face. He’s very clearly trying to figure out how on earth Tim could have gotten from ‘Hands off Ziva’ to ‘What was Jimmy thinking?’

“Not the Ziva bit. We were in the car for like, four hours, so lots of talking, but he asked what we vowed each other, and... What were you thinking?”

Jimmy shrugs a little at that, and then kisses Abby. He crooks his finger at Breena, who leans up, palms on either side of Abby’s ribs, planking over her, and kisses him. She smiles at him, and kisses Abby before settling back onto her heels. “Just feeling it.”

Tim thinks for a good second about propping himself up on his elbow, so he can see everyone’s faces better, and then comes to the conclusion that that would require moving, and moving would involve pain, and that would be monumentally stupid, so he just asks, “No words? I... But... Okay...” He’s not sure how to get into this, but knows he wants to, finally he gets his thoughts organized. “I know we ragged on you a lot about your vows to Breena and... And if you didn’t say anything because of that, I’m sorry about it. Don’t want you feeling like you can’t be silly or goofy or sappy or whatever with us...” Of course, he’s never seen either of the girls give him any trouble with that, so he amends it to, “with me.”

Jimmy reaches over and gently pets Tim’s face. Then he shakes his head. “Big. I said that. It feels big, and words are tiny, little things, and…” Jimmy’s looking at Breena, and she already knows this, maybe not spelled out, but she gets it, can’t not get it, not after all these years. “And the first time, I stuck every word I could think of together to try and come up with something big enough to go with how it felt. Didn’t do the job, wouldn’t have, even if Ducky hadn’t gotten me to pare it down from the original forty-five minutes.” He shrugs at that, too. “Call it older and wiser. Not embarrassed, just more aware.” He touches Tim and Abby, fingers lightly stroking over skin. Then he lifts his eyes to Breena. “There aren’t words for this, for what we have, what binds us to each other and our children. They’re all too small, too shallow, so… no words. Just a kiss, and the rest of my life living up to the joy this brings me.”

Tim blinks hard at that, feeling his eyes tear, (damn painkillers, and if it’s not because of them, he’s not touching that with a ten foot pole) he swallows hard, and squeezes Jimmy’s knee. Jimmy’s hand closes over his, and squeezes back.

Rainy day.

They wake up to the feel of Molly burrowing under the covers with them and the sound of absolutely pouring down rain.

Tim groans a bit at the idea of getting up. He didn’t sleep well. Too sore to get into deep sleep, and too much thunder made sure he’d jerk awake and have a hard time drifting off again. He thinks he got about six or seven half hour long naps interspersed with wakeful periods spent snuggling with Abby or Breena. (Abby’s in front of him; Breena’s at his back.)

He’s less sore now, and he’s not sure if that means the weather front has passed on enough to give all of his injuries a break, or if he’s had enough rest time since working yesterday, or what, but less sore is not the same thing as feeling good.

Molly’s chattering with Breena, (he thinks, could be Jimmy, probably not him) urging them up and out of bed. Tim feels lips on his forehead, and hears Breena say, “Okay, pregnant and achy, you two sleep in, we’ve got the girls.”

Jimmy doesn’t sound thrilled about that, but Tim doesn’t mind at all. He snuggles in a bit closer to Abby (who, from the feel of it, didn’t wake up at all) and drifts back to sleep.

Rain, rain, rain. It’s pattering against the roof, hard, pouring down from the sound of it. Tim doesn’t care, he’s feeling a lot less sleepy, not very achy, and very happily cocooned with a soft, snuggly woman under nubby, warm blankets.

His hand wanders to her belly, resting there, feeling her skin warm and stretched over their son. No movement, not yet. Little guy’s only seventeen weeks along, so he’s probably moving around all over the place in there, just not big enough to feel yet, but soon. By the end of the month they should be able to feel him.
Tim smiles, imagining Kelly and Molly with their hands pressed to Abby’s belly feeling Sean kicking and squirming about in there. He thinks Molly’s old enough to really get it, not sure about Kelly, and Anna absolutely won’t care at all.

“Feels like signs of life.”

He’s not sure if Abby’s talking about him or Sean. “Did I wake you?”

She sighs, stretching a bit, rubbing against him. “Nah, been up for a few minutes. Wasn’t sure if this was sleep snuggling or if you were up.”

“Do I do this in my sleep?”

“Snuggle close, cuddle me, pet Sean or Kelly?”

He nods, kissing her neck.

“Yeah, you do. You usually sleep with your hand between my breasts, when I’m pregnant, it’ll keep drifting down to my belly when you’re sleeping,” she rolls over as she says that, and he kisses her lips, then sits up and kisses her belly, lingering for a moment with his lips just below her navel.

She gently strokes his ear, neck, and shoulder and then says, “We should probably go down and help baby wrangle.”

He nods. “Yep. Get up, brush teeth, and then give them some off time.”

“Yeah.” Abby glances at the clock, and at Tim, who’s naked under those blankets, and is sitting next to her, cross-legged, blanket draped over him closely enough she can see that the part of him that checked out for last night’s festivities has woken up and would likely want some attention. She grins at him. “But they probably wouldn’t mind if we lingered up here for ten more minutes.”

Tim grins back as she’s getting up to hit the head. A minute later, she’s back in bed, under the covers with him. A second after that, she’s straddling his hips and kissing him. He scoots up a little, back against the headboard, his hands finding their usual spots.

Sweet kisses, soft motions, fast, soft gasps. It’s just ten good minutes, with each other. There’s something of a kick at doing this in Jimmy and Breena’s bed, while everyone else is awake, but mostly it’s a quick way to celebrate a morning where they both got to sleep in, with each other.

When they’re done, softly petting and snuggling in the afterglow, Tim says, “Think we’re going to breakfast this morning?”

Abby looks over her shoulder, finding the clock. “Would have left already. I think we’re just having a quiet rainy day at home.”

He kisses her, soft and wet, holding her face between his hands. “I like that.”

“Me, too.”

And that’s what it is. A quiet, rainy day at home. They don’t go out to breakfast, and they don’t go to church, or supper with the Slaters after.
When Kelly and Anna go down for morning nap, Jimmy and Breena catch a nap, too. They play with Molly, quiet, rainy day games of reading stories and watching some TV.

Tim sits on the sofa with Molly in his lap, both of them watching the Muppets, giggling at the vast wodge of silliness and singing along with Elton John to Crocodile Rock while Abby lays on the sofa with her head on Tim’s thigh, dozing.

Babies wake up, Jimmy and Breena keep snoozing. Tim and Abby and Molly go get them, and take Kelly and Anna downstairs for more rainy day playing.

It’s warm rain, so at one point when Molly and Kelly are getting a bit rammy, Abby grabs them and they go outside to splash in the puddles. Tim’s not thinking any of him wants to go play in the rain, but he gets video of Molly jumping in puddles while Abby holds Kelly’s hands and they bounce in them, too. Anna helps him get the video (which is how he ends up with shots of the blinds, and the curtains, and a tiny little hand, and his own nose, before he got his phone away from her) and they went back to playing with blocks.

Lunch isn’t fancy. Tim’s thinking it’s a good day for comfort food, and since Breena and Jimmy have bacon, cheddar, and bread, he makes bacon grilled cheese sandwiches while Abby gets tomato soup ready.

She cuts the crispy golden sandwiches into little triangles for the girls (Molly and Kelly decide they approve, scarfing them down) as the smell of food gets Jimmy and Breena moving.

“Good dreams?” Tim asks as they come and sit down. Abby sets soup in front of Jimmy, and one of the sandwiches in front of Breena.

Jimmy’s yawning, wide, and says, “Yeah.” He rubs his eyes. “Been way too long since we’ve done that.”

Breena pets his hand gently. “Weekend after next. All four of us can sleep in together for three mornings in a row.”

Abby sighs. “God, that sounds like heaven.”

Breena takes a bite of the sandwich. “This is good. Yours?” she asks Abby.

She shakes her head. “Tim’s.”

He inclines his head a bit. “Gran used to make these. Spent a few summers up at her place, and she’d make them on rainy summer days when we’d be stuck inside.” He takes a bite of his, smiling. “Not sure if she’d ever heard the term ‘low fat’ but every now and again…”

Jimmy looks at them, and then steals one of the little bites of sandwich from Kelly who shrieks at that, until she gets another piece back from Tim.

“I can make you one if you want one, just, didn’t think you would,” Tim says. Jimmy’s generally on an as few carbs as possible diet, and Tim doesn’t remember the last time he saw him eat an actual sandwich. Even when they do burgers, Jimmy eats his with a fork and knife and no bun.
Jimmy shakes his head, chewing thoughtfully. “No. Not a whole one. Just wanted a taste. Not quite the same. We’d be home for the summer, and mom would make us grilled cheese. Big glass of milk or Cherry Kool Aid, apple slices, Chips-a-hoy,” Tim smiles, remembering those, “bolt it down, and then out to play at the park.”

“You and Clark and your buddies?” Abby asks, taking a bite of hers.

Jimmy shakes his head. “Not Clark, even then we didn’t spend a lot of time together. Small apartment, shared a room, when we had a chance, we were on our own. I had my group of friends and he had his.”

Breena’s looking at the sandwich in front of her, dipping one corner in the soup, and eating it like that. “White bread, butter the sides, Velveeta in the middle, fry it up crispy. We did this, too.”

“I think everyone who grew up in the US did this. I bet Penny has stories of this,” Abby adds.

Tim shrugs. He doesn’t know that. Obviously at some time, Penny was a little kid, and home base for them was Boston, so… “No idea. Good question for next Shabbos. I know she was born in the ‘30s. So, she was a kid right before and during World War II. I can remember Gran and Pop talking about the past, but Penny was always more about the present and future.”

Breena smiles at that. “We really should ask her. I’m trying to image her, a little girl during the depression, all those older brothers and sisters… I bet she got told a lot about what she could and couldn’t do, and she just told them all to go to hell and did what she wanted to.”

Tim smiles back. “I’m sure there was some of that, but she also grew up Navy, and… I didn’t know my great grandfather, but I know Navy households, and no matter what Dad is in the actual Navy, he’s the Captain of his house. Her dad was an active combat battleship Captain, so I’m sure his house was run tight.”

“So, no lip from the eight-year-old who thinks having to wear skirts is stupid?” Jimmy asks.

“Can’t imagine it happened more than once. There weren’t a lot of rules at her place when I was little, but you didn’t set a toe out of line past them under penalty of a fate worse than death.”

“What would happen?” Abby asks, looking very curious.

“I have no idea. Too damn scared by just the idea to ever find out.”

“What kind of rules?” Jimmy asks.

Tim shrugs. “Normal stuff. You could make a mess, but you had to clean it up when you were done. They didn’t live in a house that had to be treated like a museum. No talking back. Any adult made a decision and that was that. If you wanted to run around, go outside. Pretty much the same sort of stuff we’ve got going on.” Tim thinks about it more. “Actually, I have no idea what she would have done if I’d broken the rules, I remember The Admiral telling me that I was going to behave, no matter what, so… I behaved.” Tim finishes up his sandwich and stands up, stretching out his shoulder and leg. “Anyone want another?”

“Me!” Molly says, sounding very certain about this.

Tim eyes Breena and she nods, quickly saying, “Half.”

So, Tim makes another grilled cheese and bacon sandwich.
Lunch wraps up, with an hour left until naptime, so there’s more playing with babies. Tim’s thinking about working on his hand rehab, while eyeing Jimmy’s X-box.

“Would you mind if I uploaded a game?”

Jimmy shrugs, he’s standing next to his sofa, Molly in front of him, holding his hands, working on climbing him and doing a flip. So far she’s doing okay on the climbing but hasn’t managed the flip.

So, Tim gets poking around and uploads Minecraft. For real rehabbing purposes he should probably be playing something that needs faster controls, but this requires the use of both left and right hands, it’s simple and bright enough that little girls might like it, and even if they don’t, he doesn’t have to worry about them hearing/seeing something they shouldn’t, which would be likely true if he got Jimmy playing Call of Duty with him.

“Minecraft?” Abby asks, plopping Kelly in his lap.

“How many controls do you have?” Tim asks.

“Just the two, why?” Jimmy says, drifting closer to the TV.

“You can get up to four people playing.”

“Are the graphics supposed to look like that?” Breena asks looking at the very square world of Minecraft.

“Yep,” Tim says, switching it into creative and picking a bunch of ores/woods/rocks in every color for his inventory. Then he carefully holds the controls in front of Kelly, putting her hand on the directional control, saying, “You pick where they go, and I’ll put the blocks down.”

Kelly didn’t seem to get that, until Tim started laying down lines of lapis, and then Kelly got the idea that she could basically scribble and draw and build with this, sort of. About half the time the screen was whipping around wildly, and half the time she was very carefully moving the control around to a new place for her daddy to stick blocks.

(And after a few minutes, Tim took her left hand in his and ‘helped’ her find places to put the blocks.)

Molly and Jimmy get in on that, too. So, while Anna works on her tummy time, the four grown-ups, and two very small girls, build a somewhat lopsided house, an extremely non-standard tower (six sides on the bottom, four in the middle, three on the top), and (once Tim showed it to her, Molly decided she really liked the TNT blocks) blew up three quarters of the map.

Tim would tell you that was a lot more fun than most of his other PT assignments.

It’s still raining come nap time. Tapering off some. Just a long, steady background drone to go with the very quiet vibe of a house full of sleeping babies.

Sleeping babies means playtime for adults, and they take advantage of it.
Something about a rainy day makes everyone feel sleepy and lazy, so playtime is sleepy and lazy, too. Soft, gentle touches as rain patters down. Slow caresses and cuddling bodies in the dull gray light of storm-filtered sun.

They’re quiet, dozing and petting in the afterglow, when Jimmy says, “My mom would call a day like this a ‘beautiful rainy day.’”

Breena, whose head is on his thigh, her legs across Tim and Abby’s hips, giggles a little at that idea. “Don’t think this is what she was envisioning.”

Jimmy’s hand strokes her hair. “God, I hope not. Still…”

Abby might be asleep. Her eyes are closed, and she’s breathing easily. Tim’s behind her. He props himself up on his elbow (tentatively, but it doesn’t yell at him, so he stays there), then he kisses Abby’s ear, and squeezes Breena’s knee. “It’s a beautiful rainy day, at home, with our family.”

Eventually, Molly comes in and finds them in bed, Abby asleep, the other three resting and petting and cuddling, talking quietly to each other about not much of anything. Molly’s a little confused by that. She’s looking intently at them, wondering why the grown-ups are in bed this time of day.

“She’s a beautiful rainy day, at home, with our family. And he’s a beautiful rainy day, too.”

“Sometime when we get grumpy, it’s because we haven’t had our naps,” Breena says to Molly, who has heard, “Nap time Little Miss Grumpy,” aimed at her more than a few times.

Breena and Tim are also pulling themselves out, Tim more carefully than Breena because his arm had been on pillow duty for Abby. “Aunt Abby’s still napping.”

Abby yawns and makes a content sound. “I’m awake.” She pulls Molly into a hug, and then puts her hands on her belly. “Your little cousin Sean’s in here, and he’s getting a nap.”

Molly’s eyes narrow. Abby knows that look, it’s the one she gets when she doesn’t necessarily believe something but doesn’t know how to express that.

“He’s a tiny, tiny little baby right now, and he sleeps almost all the time in there.”

Molly pokes Abby’s tummy. “Wake up!”

Abby nods. “A few more months and he’ll be awake and kicking, and you’ll get to feel him moving around in there. Maybe you’ll get to see it.”

“See it?”

“Yeah. When babies are on the inside, they move around, and sometimes you can see them moving around. Did you know your Mommy has video of you and Anna moving around when you were still inside her tummy?"

Molly’s very intrigued by that, and home movie watching eats up the time between nap and dinner.

But even beautiful rainy days end.

It’s been a long time since Tim’s regretted leaving somewhere. It happens, but it’s rare.

But right now, as they’re finally venturing out, putting Kelly in her car seat and getting ready to go home, he doesn’t want to leave Jimmy and Breena.

He wants to put girls to bed and lay around with Jimmy and Breena and Abby. They probably wouldn’t have sex again, at least he’s not feeling any urge in that direction, but maybe they’d watch a movie or play Call of Duty, or just sit around and be in the same room and do their own somethings.

They’d be home, that’s what they’d be.

And right now, as he’s kissing Breena and the girls goodbye, he’s intensely feeling the bittersweet of this arrangement, how their home is split in two, and how much he’s looking forward to the day when it won’t be split any longer.

Until then, he’ll cherish his beautiful rainy days.
Tim sets his earphone/microphone headset in place. “You here?” he asks his sister as he settles in front of his computer.

“Just about,” Sarah’s voice comes back. “Two more minutes.”

“Not a problem.”

He waits, sips the iced-tea he poured before heading into his office, and adjusts and readjusts his keyboard. Not like there’s any place he can put it that’ll be easier on his hand, but… He’s waiting and stuff like this tends to go with waiting.

She’d asked, a while ago, what, if anything, she could do to help with him getting healed back up, and here it is: Halo. He’s not nearly nimble enough with his right hand to play with anyone who wants to win, but, she’s willing to play with him, and Jimmy’s prescribed gaming time, so…

“And back,” he hears through his headset. She’s at her place, at her gaming computer, getting ready to go.

“Great.”

“Just had a few details to nail down before hitting send on that email.”

Tim nods. “Know all about that.”

“Yeah, I bet you do. So…”

He sees her pop up on his screen. “I’ve got you. On your six. Okay, let’s go.” And off they go.

What he really wants to do is cheat. He can customize his keyboard so that just about everything is set for his left hand. That’s how he starts with every game. He gets it, resets it for the fact he’s a lefty, and goes from there.

But, as annoying getting killed (and worse, Sarah getting killed because he’s not fast enough to cover her properly) is, he’s not rekeying the game. His right hand has to keep working, or he’s never going to get it fully back.

“You’re getting better,” Sarah says as he’s able to get in there at the last second and blast a ton of aliens off of her.

“Not as good as I was.”

“Nope.” He can hear the smile in her voice. “But you’ll get there, and in the meantime, I’ll save your ass.”

“Yeah, thanks. Nothing I love more than being the damsel…” He sees the explosion on the far side of his screen. She’s fragged something that had him in sight. “Thanks. Case in point.”

“No problem. So, down the hall, then to the left?”

“Yeah.” He likes that plan. “I’m moving up, you cover me?”

“Got you.”
He can only go for half an hour before his hand really starts to ache. They get to a save point and he says, “Okay, and that’s it for me. I’ve got to bow out.”

“Better than last time. Jimmy’s really helping with this, isn’t he?”

“Yeah. A lot.” Tim knows that Abby asked Sarah to watch Kelly for a long weekend and that she agreed, but he also knows that she didn’t tell Sarah what they were doing on that long weekend or what’s going on with the four of them. He glances at the clock, it’s a bit before 8:30.

“So, what’s he doing? Some sort of PT magic? Glenn ripped up his shoulder two years ago, and he didn’t bounce back nearly this fast.”

There’s an opening. “You want to get a drink or dessert and talk face to face?”

He can feel her expression, kind of puzzled, PT isn’t a face to face conversation. “Do I? I’m already in my jammies.”

“You live in your jammies.”

He can imagine the look on her face as she says, “Like you wouldn’t if you were a full-time writer?”

Tim looks at himself, in the flannel drawstring pants and t-shirt he changed into as soon as they got home. “Good point. How about I’ll bring the drinks to you.”

“Tim…” He can feel her wariness.

“Nothing bad. Just want to chat face to face, not over the line.”

“Okay…”

“You going out?” Abby asks as Tim emerges from his office.

“Yeah. Going to have a talk with Sarah.”

Abby nods, smiling at that. She’s sitting on the sofa, reading, keeping up to date on the latest in mass spectrometer calibrations. “Not a phone conversation?”

“Apparently not. I started to try and… Nope, gotta do it face to face.” He heads upstairs, and is down a few minutes later. “You have any sterile swabs?”

The look Abby flashes him could best be described as, of course. “Sounds like you’ve got some things to ask her, too.”

Tim nods at that, too.

“I keep a few in my purse.”

“Great.” He heads into the kitchen, finds Abby’s purse, digs around for a moment, and finds her zip lock baggy that has gloves, scissors, swabs, two evidence bags, a tiny little black light, and an ounce squirt bottle of luminol. “You really are prepared for everything, aren’t you?”
“Like you don’t have all of that in the glove compartment.”

Tim shrugs. She’s right about that. And, though he’s changed most of what’s in his go bag these days, he does have basic tools in there.

“So, you going to ask for DNA?” Abby asks.

“Maybe. Want to be ready if I do. I am curious. And… she took all the same basic science classes I did, so she’s got to have noticed the brown eyes, too. Maybe she’d like to know.”

“Maybe.” Abby shrugs. Given the McGee brains and propensity for secrets, Abby thinks it’s possible that Sarah already does know. “Of course, for all you know, she’s already checked it out.
Or talked to your mom or The Admiral about it.”

Tim inclines his head. That strikes him as a solid possibility. “Maybe. Lots to cover.” He leans down and kisses Abby. “Don’t wait up.”

“I won’t.” She smiles up at him. “Wake me up nice tomorrow morning?”

He kisses her again, softer, slower, promising a good morning. “You know it.”

It’s been a while since he did this. Best he can recall, the last time he dropped by Sarah’s place, bearing milkshakes, it was her senior year, and she was having a hard time with her senior project (write a novel) so he showed up with piles of sugary caffeine for both of them, and then they read through and beat her final draft into shape.

That final draft was good enough that she was able to sell it. She’s been writing since, and, though he’s read many a draft of hers (and vice versa) this sort of head over to pow wow’s been pretty rare.

She moved to New York after graduation, which made confabbing in person more difficult, and it’s not exactly like he’s had the sort of schedule where he was just rolling in piles of free time.

But, he’s thinking, they should do stuff like this more often. And, at least when it’s at his place, she should have a standing invite to Shabbos. Penny’s already there, might as well have her and Glenn come, too.

At least, assuming this conversation goes the way he hopes it does.

It has to. Okay, maybe not the stuff about the Admiral, but about him and Abby and Jimmy and Breena, that’s got to go right.

He hopes.

“You know, it’s really hard to trust in the idea that this is just a happy little get together when you show up with shakes,” Sarah says as she opens the door, looking at him holding the cups.

Tim stretches out the cup containing a chocolate strawberry malt with whipped cream on top. “Really, nothing bad, just want to talk.”

She raises an eyebrow at him, but takes the drink, leading them into the apartment she shares with Glenn. “You’re in your jammies, too.” She eyes his t-shirt and flannel pants.

“Don’t see much reason to stay in my work clothing when I get home. Especially with a one-year-old, who is not the tidiest person on earth, in the mix.” Tim eyes a suspicious stain on his pants, which he hopes is part of Kelly’s dinner.

Sarah sees him do it, smiles, and takes a sip of her shake, as he gets himself settled on the sofa next to her, with his. (Strawberry banana smoothie. Scale’s creeping up again, and he’s still not set to really exercise… so… sigh, last of anything like this for a while.)

“So… what’s up?”

He smiles at her. “Lot of things.” He holds up his right hand. “No more cast.”

She nods, looking at his hand, taking it, gently, in hers and checking it over. Too small, too thin, more scars than he’d like, but at least it’s not in a cast any longer. “Somehow I’m doubting you’re here to tell me that.” She doesn’t squeeze his hand but does stroke the back of it.

“Yeah. I’m not. Okay….”

She’s watching him carefully, and says, bit of sarcasm in her voice, “Yeah, this feels like good news.”

“It is… just…” Like with telling Vance or Tony, this feels really odd to just whip out. “hard to get into cold. Okay, you and Glenn have Kelly weekend after next.”

“Yes. Abby said she wanted to make sure you two got some together time before Sean joins the party.”

“And that’s true, but… not just Abby and I. You remember Jimmy and Breena?”

Sarah nods. They’ve met a few times. She likes them. Tim’s talked about them, and how Jimmy’s been working on his hand and shoulder. She knows they’re dear friends. She was there to see Jimmy and Breena stand up with Abby at their wedding, and watched them stand up with them again at Kelly’s baptism.

“We’re way more than just friends. It’s our, the four of us, honeymoon.”

Sarah stares at him, takes a sip of her drink, looks him over top to bottom, and then nods. Then she laughs. This doesn’t feel like Leon laughing. He doesn’t get any sense of laugh or curse, more this is just funny.

His eyebrow raises up.

“You ask me to babysit for your honeymoon, and I don’t get invited to the wedding?” she says, mock appalled.

He licks his lip and then says, “It was private.”

“Oh, I’ll bet.” She giggles and elbows him, letting him know she’s got an awfully good idea of how that wedding went.

He rolls his eyes a bit and then laughs, too.

“So, you’re what, bi?” she asks, very curious, once she stops giggling. “I mean, I knew about Abby, I’ve seen her check girls our, but… I’ve never seen you check a guy out.”

“Because I don’t.”

“Oh, swapping?” she says, still curious, but no condemnation at all.

“No. It’s… I love them. They love us. But Jimmy and I don’t want to have sex with each other.”

Sarah takes that calm as can be. “But you love him?”

“Yeah.” This doesn’t feel like talking with Tony, at all. She’s curious and reboxing, too, but the there’s no sense of disgust or discomfort, just… relabeling.

She’s leaning in toward him, intensely watching him as she asks, “Really love him, not he’s just a very dear friend who loves your wife and you love his?”

He can feel she’s going somewhere with this, but he’s not sure where. “Yeah. I love him. I love Breena, too. I love Abby, and all of our kids.”

“I know that… Okay, assume that… That part is easy to put together. Jimmy’s the fuzzy bit.”

Tim nods, sees how she’s working on resetting things.

“Yeah. I love him. I’ve got two wives and a husband. It’s all of us together emotionally and not quite as much physically.”

Sarah nods at that and says, “Heterosexual biromantic.”

Tim squints. “I don’t know what that means.” Yes, he can sort of figure it out based on context, but he wants more than just his idea of what she might be trying to convey.

She smiles at him. “Sexual preference and romantic preference don’t always match up. They usually do, but not always. You want to have sex with women, you fall in love with anyone.” She pauses for a second and adds, “Okay, maybe not anyone, technically that’s panromantic, and bi just means any two genders.”

Tim blinks. “Okay, I know you and Penny and Abby are up on this, but I’m still from the land of ‘there only are two genders.’”

Sarah’s about to get into that, the shakes her head, now doesn’t strike her as an apt time for an intense conversation about sexuality, preference, and gender.

“You watch BBC Sherlock, right?”

“Yeah.”

“Watson loves Sherlock, they live together, work together, enjoy each other, would die for each other, but he doesn’t want to have sex with him.”

Tim nods, that matches his view of the character.
“He loves Mary, too and wants to have sex with her.”

Tim’s still nodding.

“Heterosexual biromantic. Just like House and Wilson, or Kirk and Spock…”

“Frodo and Sam?” he says.

“Sure. Though I think they played up the romantic bit for those two in the movie more than in the books. Hell, for all I, or anyone else knows, Frodo might be gay, but we know Sam at the very least had a wife and kids.”

“Dean and Castiel?”

Sarah shakes her head. “Eh… Not buying that one until the last episode is out and nothing happens. Dean’s a little too flirty with his eyes for me to be completely comfortable putting him in the straight camp. But, you get the idea. Harry and Ron.”

“Harry and Ron?”

“It wasn’t Ginny who got taken during the TriWizard Tournament. It wasn’t Ginny who went on the Horcrux hunt.”

Tim holds up his hands. “I’ll suggest you’ve read more fan fic than I have, without arguing that you’re wrong.”

She laughs at that.

Tim leans over and kisses Sarah’s cheek. “Thanks.”

“Feeling happier with a tidy, little label?”

He sighs, rolling his eyes a little at that. “Yeah. It’s stupid, but…”

“No, it’s not. Even people who claim to not like labels go out of their way to find them. Besides, how can you know something if you can’t find words to describe it, and how can you share it with anyone else if you can’t explain it to yourself?”

And this is why Tim loves having a writer for a sister.

“So who knows?” Sarah’s watching him with a lot of interest, wondering how much drama this is causing. “Penny and Ducky, of course. Gibbs? Is he on the warpath? Did Penny have to smack him again?”

Tim wasn’t aware that Sarah knew about that less-than-shining moment in their personal history.

“Penny tell you about that?”

“Yeah, that you and he were just about to smother Abby you were so scared.”

“Ah…” Well, that’s actually a pretty accurate description of what was happening, so it’s not like he can quibble about it. “And no, Gibbs did not require smacking. We started talking about it a long time ago, and he’s been supportive.”

Sarah looks significantly more shocked by that than the idea that her brother’s part of a foursome.

“Wow! I would have thought he’d be all ‘Mess around on my girl and I’ll cut your balls off’ with a side of Marine induce homophobia.”

“He’s not like that, at all. And if I was messing around on his girl, he would cut my balls off. That’s part of the deal. We hold each other accountable. But, that’s not what’s going on.”

“Sure. I know that.” And this is why Tim loves having a sister who writes and edits what he thinks are oddball paranormal romances is worth its weight in gold. After all those popular love triangles where the fans fight tooth and nail over who really loves whom, her brand just let all three of them get together with each other. That seems to make fans happy. “I didn’t think he’d be able to parse it.”

“Tony’s having a tough time with it, but I think he’s going to come around. The rest of the crew’s seen the four of us together enough to know we’re okay.”

“Good. And, you are okay, right?”

“Yeah, we are. We… It’s good, Sarah.”

“You’re not…” she’s thinking, getting ready to pick her words carefully.

“What?”

“Sending Dad a big FUCK YOU, with this.”

That stops Tim cold for a second. It’s a thought that’s been nowhere near his mind. Finally he says, “It’s not that I don’t want to do that. I do. And there are a lot of different ways I’d like to do that. But I’m not so pissed at him as to kill my marriage, and my family, and my relationship with my best friends for a symbolic gesture he’ll never see.”

She nods. “So, congratulations.”

“Thanks.”

“What happens now?”

So he starts filling her in on the details. That’s about ten minutes of back and forth, covering everything, and then she says, “So… Okay, you don’t want to tell Mom, I get that, but… Look, you want a wedding invite with a plus three, that’s no problem for me. Wedding’s going to be huge, two more isn’t a problem. A lot of my writers are coming, and you guys wouldn’t be the only poly family there.”

He supposes this shouldn’t be in any way shocking to him. He’s seen the stuff she writes and publishes, so… okay, his mysteries were all based on his real life, so… other writers have to do that, too, right? Still, the idea of not being the only ones seems… almost odd. Kind of reassuring, but, still, odd. Then another thought hits.

“Isn’t Glenn’s family full of really traditional people?”

“Yeah.” Sarah’s eyes roll. “It’ll be interesting. They’re already starting to get fussy about you giving me away instead of Dad, and they’ve been moping about the lack of a church since they found out, but… Not their wedding. They can come or not as they see fit, and if they’re going to make a scene, they can leave.”

Tim sighs at that. “How can you possibly be this calm?”

Sarah smiles. “Maybe I am, maybe I’m not, but I’ll be damned if they ever see anything but that calm.”

“Ah.” Tim nods. The Admiral’s Daughter. He looks at her eyes. Or not. “A plus three would be great, but… between Mom being there, and Sean’ll still be very little. We’re going to be tired and tense, and I don’t need more drama on top of that.”

Sarah smiles. “I get that. I’m inviting them anyway. Because you’re going to be tired, and it’s going to be tense, and having people who love and support you nearby, even if they’re not being physically demonstrative, is a good thing. Just because they’re there, doesn’t mean you’ve got to be tongue kissing Jimmy after the toast.”

“We really don’t do that!”

“Uh huh.” Just like Penny, she’s giving Tim the give it time look.

“Penny shot me that same look. I’m not bi!”

“And, I don’t think you are. I don’t think you’re ever going to be. At least, I don’t think it’s a switch that turns on and off. I think, at least this is how the people I know who are involved in this work, is that you’ll probably never prefer him sexually to the girls, but you can’t spend that much time and that much intimacy with someone else and not have it expand past strict heterosexual lines. Something happy happens, you kiss the girls, you’re not going to suddenly pull back and just pat him. Especially not after years of this. Seriously, how much time can you spend naked in bed with someone else and never touch them? It’s just not going to happen like that.”

That also makes a ton of sense to Tim and seems to be matching more of what happens with the two of them with the cuddling stuff. “Okay. Yeah. I get that. Still not happening at your wedding.”

“And it doesn’t need to. But feeling like you’ve got a support team in place is a good thing, right?”

Tim nods.

“And, you know, your family is always welcome with mine. We’ve got enough crap in our collective family closet, we don’t make more of it for each other, right?”

“Yeah, it is. No matter what, we’re family, and so are those we love.”

Sarah nods along with that.

“You really mean that?”

“Yes, I really mean it.”

“Might end up with a niece or nephew you’ve got no DNA in common with.”

Sarah shrugs, supremely unconcerned by that, but also looking very slightly confused. “If you’re good with it, and Abby’s good with it, and Jimmy and Breena are, too, I don’t see any reason why I’d fuss. Any child you slap a McGee on is my niece or nephew.”

Tim nods at her. “Yeah.” He squeezes her hand. That feels very good. “We were talking about it, and how maybe some of my McGees might have hazel eyes or curly brown hair…” He stares at her, willing her to bring it up, but she just waits. “You’ve got brown eyes.”

Sarah nods, slightly confused moving to moderately confused. “Yep. All my life.”

“None of the rest of us do.”
“I’ve got a cleft chin, too.” She gently touches the slight dimple in question while staring at Tim, still confused. “Dad says I look a lot like my mother.”

Now Sarah’s looking completely confused. “You didn’t know that? You were there, right? When I was born?”

“Yeah, I was there. Mom was pregnant. Then she went to the hospital, Gran stayed with me for two days, and then you and Mom and Pop came home.”

Now Sarah’s looking less confused. “No one ever told you…”

“Told me what? I was figuring Mom had a…” he pauses and looks at her, “friend… What version do you have?”

Sarah snorts at that. “Please, if Mom had had a friend that resulted in a kid who looked like me, he’d have divorced her before I could walk!” Tim nods, that’s part of why this is confusing to him. Sarah continues on with, “Mom miscarried a lot.”

“Penny told me that, but I was too young to remember it.”

“They really wanted another baby. Dad had a junior officer who found herself pregnant, and rather than her resigning her commission, she took a six month long ‘top secret assignment,’ and I ended up with you guys.”

Tim’s staring at his sister with eyes wide and mouth open. Finally, he gets thinking again. “Do you know her?”

Sarah shakes her head. “No. I don’t know her name or anything. I kind of feel like it’d almost be a slap to Mom to find out, you know?”

“Uh… shit… yeah. Good God… Gran and Pop went along with this…”

Sarah shrugs. “No idea.”

“They must have. Pop brought you two ‘home from the hospital.’ Penny doesn’t know.”

“Dad said they told as few people as possible. My birth certificate has Mom’s name on it, if I had to guess she delivered using Mom’s name and… Next thing you know Mom’s got me, and she’s got another baby, and you’ve got a sister and…”

“And that’s insane. Mom was pregnant!”

“You ever see her tummy?”

“Okay. No… And she didn’t nurse you… And I didn’t get to go to the hospital to see you and her there, but…” Tim sits there looking shocked. Finally he says, “So, what, you just asked him one day?”

“Yeah. Five years ago? Something like that. I asked if I was adopted. He blustered some, and finally gave me the story.”

Tim’s blinking, slowly. “Wow. Uh…” He swallows hard, lots of feeling swirling around him right now, but uppermost of them is even more rage aimed at The Admiral. “Not that… shit… I love you, and you’re my sister, and… but fuck, I want to go slap him even more now for putting Mom through that.”

Now Sarah’s looking confused. “Putting Mom through…”

“He’s your Dad, right? He wouldn’t do that out of the goodness of his heart.”

“Uh… not according to the story I got. He was her commanding officer. She was Catholic. An abortion wasn’t an option. He was on a research ship then, she was very good at her job, something with computers, and he didn’t want to lose her. Not like they let single moms ship out in the mid-’80s. They worked something out where everyone was happy. You don’t think… I mean… Would Mom have gone along with that? Or Gran or Pop?”

“I’m sure they got the same story you did, but… Would they have believed it? Do you believe it?”

Sarah shrugs again. She’s fairly sure their father is gay, and that their mom is the only woman he’s ever had sex with, but that’s not the conclusion Tim’s coming to, and whether John is or is not gay, is probably not anything they need to get into.

Tim reaches into his pocket and pulls out the swab. “I was thinking… wrong apparently… that we had the same Mom, and… you know, if you wanted to do a DNA test.”

Sarah shrugs at that.

“I can find her. Assuming The Admiral wasn’t lying about her being in the Navy. As long as she was still there after ’91 when they started building the service database. I’ve got access, wouldn’t take more than a few minutes.”

Sarah shakes her head. “I know you’re not loving her right now, but… Mom’s my mom. And we’re both not loving him now, but he’s our dad.”

“Great.” Tim tucks the swab back, thinking. “How many other half-brothers and sisters do you think we’ve got?”

Sarah raises an eyebrow at him. “Do you really want to know?”

“Eh… In a kind of sick fascination sort of way. Not like I want to go find them and start inviting them to Sunday dinner.”

Sarah shrugs. “I don’t think we need to know. Honestly, I don’t want to. Part of not doing the 23 & Me thing. I mean… Before you, all the guys in our family are sailors. They were all on active duty and away from home for years at a time. How many half-siblings, half-aunts-and-uncles, second cousins, and on and on do we really want to find out about?”

Tim winces. “You think Nelson…”

Sarah shakes her head vehemently. “Not touching that. But, he and Penny didn’t get married until after World War II, who knows what he got up to when he was out there? Pop had the same basic story. Single guy on the other side of the world for years on end. I don’t know, and I don’t need to.”

Tim sighs. “Good point.”

They sit there silently for a few minutes and then Sarah grins at him. “So, got anything fun planned for your second honeymoon?”

Tim arches an eyebrow at her and says, very dryly, “Yes.”
“Gonna tell me about it?” she says with a grin, then sips her shake.

“No. Just like I’m not asking about what you and Glenn have planned for yours.”

She laughs at that. “How about where?”

Tim shrugs. “The girls are surprising us. We’ve got to stay close enough so if something goes wrong we can get back to work in a few hours, but… That’s anywhere from Philly to Norfolk.”

“Cool.”

“How about you guys? How’s wedding planning going? Mom and…” he flails around for Glenn’s mom’s name, he knows she’s mentioned it, but he’s not bringing it up, “Glenn’s mom, driving you buggy?”

Sarah looks at him, kind of tentatively. “Do you really want to know? I mean, about Mom?”

He opens and closes his mouth and licks his lips. “Uh… Yeah.” He rubs his fingers over his right hand, feeling the scars and the spots where the bones protrude under too thin skin. “One thing Ducky said to me, a long time ago, was no matter what happens with me and Mom, that getting to the point where I can be useful and supportive of your relationship with your Mom is a good thing. So… sure, how’s it going?”

“Really well. Uh… she’s wishing we’d do it later, so there’s no shot of snow or ice.”

“Your wedding’s in late March. I know she’s been in Texas for a while, but…”

“She’s got this weird idea that there’ll be some sort of freak blizzard or something, and if we wait until April or May…”

Tim nods. “Visions of spring flowers in her mind as well?”

“Probably. She approves of you giving me away.”

He smiles at that.

“And she’s glad Dad won’t be there. She’s…” Tim starts shaking his head, that’s too much him and Mom, and he doesn’t have the distance he needs for that. Sarah changes tracks. “She’s trying to get me to go for a ‘normal’ wedding dress.”

“Abby says the one you’ve picked is beautiful.”

“Yeah. I think so, too. But she wants something more ‘formal,’ less ‘hippie.’”

Tim inclines his head at that. He hasn’t seen the dress. But he knows this is not going to be a tux and tails event. “Yeah, well, not her wedding. She got to pick her dress both times, you get to pick yours. She giving you any flack about not doing it in a church?”

“Nah. She’s okay with doing it all at the hotel. Dorthy’s,” Glenn’s mom, “flipping out about the lack of church, and they’re both not thrilled about the Quaker ceremony; they wish we had a Justice of the Peace or something.”

Tim rolls his eyes a little. “Someone to say some magic words?”

“Something like that,” she says dryly.
He wraps his arm around her and gives her a little squeeze. “The only words that matter are in you and him. The rest of it’s just ceremony for the sake of ceremony.”

“I know! They’re both worried it’s not really real if it doesn’t get overseen by someone else.”

Tim rolls his eyes a bit. “Mom give Penny any crap on that?”

Sarah shrugs, and then laughs at the idea of what would happen to anyone who tries to give Penny crap about anything. “If she did, I haven’t heard about it. No officiant, that’s how Duck and Penny did it, right?”

“Just swooped in, he asked, she said yes, ‘look, rings!,’ and off to wherever their honeymoon was they went. Ten minutes, beginning to end, and all the rest of us stood there like dorks while our wives looked at us and more or less made sure we all knew we were never, ever going to be that cool.”

Sarah laughs at that, too. “It’s good to have goals.”

Tim nods. “Yep. Give me another forty years, and I’ll be the little old guy with the fedora and tattoos rocking my ladies’ worlds.”

“One on each arm, right?”

Tim likes that image. “You know it.”

She shoves him gently and takes another sip of her milkshake. “So, you really want to hear more about wedding planning?”

He wiggles his hand a bit, indicating, sort of. He’s not interested in flower arranging or napkin colors. “This, I don’t get, if there’s no Minister or Justice of the Peace, who am I giving you away to? How’s that work?”

“Okay, so, here’s how we’re going to do this…”

Brother and Sister
Penny and Ducky are driving home from more ‘fundraising’ when Ducky sees… whoever it is. Someone. Big someone. Standing on their front step. It's full dark, and their porch light is above and behind the man, so all he can see is the shadow of someone tall, leaning against their front door.

Someone they are not expecting. Someone who has not called first.

Whoever it is, sends all of Ducky's red alert sensors into overdrive. "You know, my dear, I was just thinking that we could use a treat."

Penny's not really paying attention to that. She's looking at her phone, sending a text to Madeline Lefrendu, a French NGO expert who’s been working on keeping a school going outside of Kuchlak for the last two years. She says something like, "Mmmm…" while Ducky whips them through their parking lot, looking for a car that's out of place, but not seeing one.

There's a small café a few blocks from their home, which is where they usually go if they're hunting for a "treat." They make excellent coffee, wonderful pastries, an absolutely to die for chai latte, and they’re open ‘til midnight. They probably have a late night snack there at least twice a week.

Which is why he's driving right past it, into the parking lot of the "garish" and "vulgar" TGIMcFunsters two streets over, where they have not only never eaten, but Ducky wouldn't ever voluntarily enter unless it was to pick up a body.

Penny notices that they are in the wrong place when they've stopped, and Ducky is dialing, very quickly, on his cell phone.

She's looking at him with a lot of curiosity in her eyes.

"I saw a man standing on our front step who I didn't recognize. I've had too many ghosts pop up to just walk into a situation like that."

Penny nods at that. "Why didn't you say anything?"

The real reason was that Ducky didn't want any shot of Penny deciding she needed to charge on in and take care of matters herself. The answer he comes up with is, "If they had a directional microphone on our car, I didn't want there to be any chance of them deciding to follow us, or to have whoever it is run away."

She doesn't look like she completely believes that, but it's not completely implausible, so she doesn't argue.

"Anthony!" Ducky's eyes light up as Tony picks up the phone. "We have something of a situation at our home…” Ducky rapidly fills Tony in on what's going on.

“T've got it Ducky," Tony says, rapidly swinging through a fast u-turn as soon as he can. “You and Penny sit tight, and I’ll check it out. If you don’t hear from me in twenty minutes, give Zi… Gi… Borin a call and send in the cavalry, okay?” He stutters over his choices, but, if it’s going to be a fight he doesn’t want Ziva in it, not any more. Jethro shouldn’t be in it. Tim’s not on the lineup any more, and even if he was, he’s still too hurt, and he doesn’t have the kind of relationship with Draga or Bishop where he calls them up after hours to do favors for his family.

“Certainly, Anthony.”

“I’ll let you know what I find.”

Ten minutes later, he’s less than a mile from Penny and Ducky's place. Their home is a condo, in a block of condos. Ten total, in a rectangle five long, two wide. Parking lots on the east and west sides, roads to more parking and other blocks north and south. Their home is in the middle of their block. Ducky would have preferred a corner lot, but none of them were open, and he did like the amenities and neighborhood, so he was willing to accept neighbors on three sides. After all, it wasn't (when he bought) like he was home much.

Tony eyes it and comes up with a plan. He circles around once, and sees whoever it is that’s made Ducky nervous. There is certainly a big guy standing around in his doorway, lounging about, reading something on his phone from the looks of it. Light from his phone reflected on his face shows Tony he’s older, and even lounging his posture looks military. Tony’s not getting any sort of danger vibe, but he’s also just driving by.

He circles the block of condos, and then parks just out of sight before he starts trekking toward the guy.

It doesn't take long to close in on the mystery man on Penny's door. He seems mildly surprised to see someone he doesn’t know coming up on him, staring at him intently. Once he realizes that Tony’s not just walking by, he’s straightening up, reaching for the gun that he likely normally wears, but isn't today.

Tony sees that, and the posture, and says, "Special Agent Tony DiNozzo," showing his badge. "What are you doing lurking here?"

The man realizes he's not wearing his usual piece, and that he must have looked suspicious to someone. He makes sure his hands are visible and that he's projecting nothing threatening. He's probably in his mid-fifties, posture's too straight and still for a civilian, hair's too long for a Marine. He's wearing jeans, a Hawaiian shirt, and sandals. He's rumpled and has a go bag at his feet. He's been traveling.

He smiles at Tony, tilts his head, looking slightly irked as one eyebrow raises and he sighs a bit, pulling his ID out, shaking his head slightly. The resemblance is... not uncanny, but it’s very strong. Tony knows, roughly, who this has to be. He's one of two guys, but he don't know which one.

"Captain Michael McGee." He says with an Australian accent as he shows them his ID. "I was hoping to pay a visit to my mom. Now, why is Special Agent Tony DiNozzo about to shoot me for trying to do that?" Mike stares at him for a moment, and then who Tony is clicks. "You're Ducky's family, right?"

"Yeah." Tony says as he grabs his phone to text Ducky. "He saw you loitering, drove on, and called me to check you out."

Mike nods, approving.
"Wanna tell me why you didn't call first? Duck's old, but his instincts are still sharp, and there's no way he's ever bringing Penny home if there's someone he doesn't recognize sitting on the front stoop."

Michael sighs again, licking his lip. "Long story short," he holds up his phone, "this damn thing is only good for games right now. I'm not really supposed to be here, was supposed to go straight to Norfolk, but we stopped at Andrews. I'm here for the night, thought I'd stop by. Just got in about an hour ago. No one was home, so I settled in to wait."

They hear the purr of Ducky's Morgan, and a minute later Penny's hugging Mike.

Ducky nods to Tony. "Thank you for checking it out for me."

"No problem, Duck," Tony says. "A lot of our cases wouldn't be cases if more people had the good sense not to walk into strangers waiting around for them."

Ducky nods, and sees his wife and her son, hugging each other, and then gently gets them heading inside.

Michael McGee, once in the light, looks exhausted. And he's got the story to go with it. "So, I'm in charge of an evac exercise," he says once Penny has him sitting on their sofa, asking why he's here.

Ducky's busying himself making tea, mostly staying out of the way, once he's got water on and tea in cups, he'll come out and sit next to Penny, but for right this second he's looking through the doorway that separates their kitchen/dining area from the living room.

"She's told you I run security for the US Consulate in Canberra?" Mike asks Ducky.

Ducky nods. He's never met Michael or Thomas, Penny's two younger boys. He's talked to them on the phone and exchanged emails, but no face to face time. He is, however, feeling a bit silly that he didn't recognize Michael from the pictures he's seen.

"So, I'm in charge of the evac, and all's going great, which should be a hint that the shit's about to hit the fan. I've got my guys and our full diplomatic team moving, into the heilos, and the Ambassador is way less than thrilled about this, because I'm making him skip all of his appointments, running it like an actual evac."

Penny nods along. Technically she's not cleared for any of this, but all of the McGee boys grew up in a house where Dad wasn't afraid to talk to Mom about anything. And if The Admiral kept Mom in the loop, they've got no problems with it, too.

"We're in the air, full delegation and all of my security guys, when I find out the carrier we're supposed to be landing on isn't there. I'm the asshole in the air with fifty guys and three helicopters and nowhere to land, the Ambassador's on my ass like a wet Speedo because he's missing a meeting with the Prime Minister, and there's nothing but the deep blue below us.

"I finally get it sorted, get us down, back at the Embassy, and it turns out some maniac thought this would be a just spiffy cyber security attack, and now I'm here, because I've got to go all the way to Norfolk to talk to the asshole in charge of this fiasco."

Penny's not sure if she should laugh or cry. Part of this is just genuinely funny. Part of it is that she can't think about Tim's test without thinking about how the first one went.
“Or, you just could have called me.”

“Mom?”

Ducky looks at Michael as he's pouring water into his tea pot to let the tea steep. He listens to Penny describe Tim’s test, though his focus is on Michael.

Ducky's well aware of the fact that it is extremely unlikely that he will be alive to see what Timothy looks like in his fifties. It's not impossible, but given he will be ninety-five the year Timothy turns fifty, he’s doesn’t expect to see it. However, he's guessing that Michael McGee is a pretty good preview of things to come.

Not a carbon copy, of course, but they share the same long face. Michael has Penny's eyes, blue, and Timothy has his mother's green eyes, but the shape is similar, apparently the slight droop to his right eye will become more pronounced as time goes by, as will the smile lines around his eyes and lips. Michael's hair is mostly gray now, but it was probably the same sort of brown that goes dark blond with the addition of time in the sun. He definitely has the same hair shape, the high forehead and retracted hairline at the temples, though these days Timothy wears his hair longer than Michael is, but when he was wearing it shorter, it was almost identical to the look Michael has.

All in all, assuming he takes after his Uncle, the years will settle lightly on Timothy McGee.

The tea has steeped, and it's time to head out there.

Ducky hands over cups of tea, and gets settled next to Penny, holding her hand. Right now is fairly easy and pleasant, but he knows the storm is coming. He can feel the edge Penny’s on, and he’s not sure how far into it she’s going to let Michael go.

“So, Timmy won a Distinguished Civilian Service Award for that test?” Mike finally asks as Penny gets done with the details of the test.

“Yes. It was in the latest Stars and Stripes.”

“God. John’s got to be over-the-moon. Last we talked about Tim, got to be… five years ago now, he was bitching about Tim writing novels and pissing his talents away. You heard they made him retire, right? He’s gonna be bloody next time I see him.”

“Are you intending to see him soon?” Ducky enquires politely. Mike hasn’t yet noticed how quiet Penny’s gone.

“I’m supposed to head back through Pearl, last I heard he was there, thought I’d look him up.”

“Ah.”

By that point Mike is noticing that something is up. Both Penny and Ducky are acting like they’re afraid of what to say next. “Mom? Something wrong with John? I saw that he was ‘retiring for his health’ but… That’s bull, right? That’s drones are getting bad press so they’re putting him away quietly, right?”

Ducky looks at Penny, she nods, asking him to tell the tale, and he’s willing. Easier out of his mouth than hers, and starts at the beginning. “This is classified. Our family knows, but… It's a long story.” Michael nods, he knows all about classified ops that don't go quite the way you expect, and he's not at all surprised that Penny got the real dirt. He should have called her first, Penny’s always got the real dirt.
Ducky sighs, taking a sip of his tea. He's not sure how deep into this Penny wants to go, how much she wants her boys knowing about each other, so, if she wants to, he'll let her fill in details, but he'll give the basics. "In early May, The Third Carrier group was selected for a Cybertest. Like yours, it was completely blind, and very real. A 'cyber attack' crippled its communications and make it look like it was attacking itself. It didn't actually happen, but anyone who couldn't see the outside of the ship thought the fleet was firing on itself."

Michael's nodding at that. He can imagine how insane that would be. "Tim’s first attack, right?"

"Exactly. The Third Carrier Group as a whole, and the Stennis in specific failed the test."

Michael winces. It happens. Just happened to him in a massive way. He shakes his head. "John always was a son-of-a-bitch when things didn't go his way. What'd he do? Stroke out screaming at the guy who didn't realize it was a test? They’d bench him for that."

Ducky and Penny look at each other, and then Penny closes her eyes, slowly, opens them, and bites her lip in a move that looks so much like Timothy it makes Ducky's heart ache.

"No, Michael, he didn't. Penny, do you want me to tell all of it?"

She hasn't said the words, not to him, not to herself, but saying it is part of accepting it's real, and sitting in front of her is one of the few people who has a high enough clearance to even hear the real story.

Penny shakes her head, and Mike can see she's tortured by this. "Mom, you don't… I can read the report."

"It isn't in the report. It's not in any of the reports." She swallows hard. "I'll tell it. Tim ran the first test, hands on, on the Stennis. It was an undercover op, and John didn’t know he was even on board until the test was going."

She doesn’t say anything for a few seconds, so Mike tries to fill in some of the blanks. "So, Tim runs the test, John fails it, goes into one of his screaming fits and has a heart attack? They give him a send off for that? Half he failed, half he’s not well enough to handle the stress of the job?" That's plausible to him, but doesn't feel quite right. That doesn't match the level of pain radiating off of his Mom.

Penny licks her lips, rolling them against each other, steeling herself to tell the story. And Michael can see that whatever is happening here, it's a million times worse than anything he's imagining.

"Tim ran the test. It was a great test. He was very proud of it because it did exactly what it was supposed to do."

"And he got to tweak his old man's nose?" Mike understands that. He certainly enjoyed the few times he got to poke Nelson with a good idea the old man didn't love. Nothing feels better than winning a little competition with the old man.

Penny nods at that, tears in her eyes. "Yeah. That was part of it." She wipes her eyes and takes a quick drink of her tea. Then she stands up, heads into the kitchen, both Michael and Ducky watching. She comes back with a bottle of whiskey and three tumblers. "This isn't a tea story."

Michael goes pale. Ten million times worse. It's not that Penny can't put it away with the best of them; it's that she prefers to drink for celebrations and happy things. If she's drinking to numb herself, then whatever she's about to say is worse than anything he's seen since… actually no, she wasn't drinking when Nelson died. Last time he saw her get news and have to drink to take the edge off, they'd just heard that James had already been buried at sea, and they didn't get any say in it or get to say goodbye.

She pours for all three of them, and socks hers back, fast. Ducky and Michael take decent swallows, but don’t try to down an entire two shots worth in one go.

"The Stennis failed, badly." Penny says as soon as the burn in her throat clears. "It didn't almost pass or get close or anything along those lines. Tim tipped the whole group into complete chaos. If it had been a real attack the entire group would have been crippled and destroyed itself."

She takes another sip. "It was a classified OP."

She’s already said that, but Mike knows that if his Mom’s repeating this it’s really important.

“The only people on board who knew what was going on were Tim, SecNav, his secretary, John and his secretary. Tim had skyped home, talking to us, happy, really pleased with how the test was going.”

"Sounds like he should have been." Michael says. "SecNav was happy? Obviously, you don’t get a Distinguished Civilian Service award for okay work."

Penny and Ducky nod. "The test did everything it was supposed to. They've identified a collection of weaknesses that need to be strengthened. They know about holes they didn't use to. They're getting new communications protocols in effect. It was a goldmine of good information, and because it didn't look like a Navy run test, John's men didn't act like it was a Navy run test, so they got a much better idea of how the Group would have responded to a real attack. And the plan for how to run it was good enough, they’re using it on other branches, other ships, to assess them, too."

"Great." And if there wasn’t this horrible foreboding that’s getting worse and worse with each word where Penny’s not telling him why his brother has retired, Mike would be genuinely pleased. Sounds like whatever it is Tim's been up to, he’s got some real computer skills under his belt. "So…"

"So, Tim's in his stateroom… And it's a classified OP.” Third time she’s said that, Mike’s getting chills. “The only two people on board who knows why he's on the ship and that he had anything to do with the attack is John and Lt. Mane,” she looks at Mike, who nods, he’s met Mane, knows who he was. “Everyone else thinks he’s a Captain with the Irish Navy on a fact finding trip, and then…” Penny takes a deep breath and finishes the sentence in a fast whisper, "then they arrest him for espionage, for planning the attack, and while he was in the brig four men who thought the attack was real and that their loved ones were missing after the Borealis was blown up, almost beat him to death.’"

"What?" Mike's stunned by that. That's just… He can’t believe he heard that.

Penny’s nodding. "John sent men in to kill Tim because of the test." She's full on crying now. Words that tore her heart to pieces finally said for the first time.

Ducky’s holding her and gently rubbing her back. He takes over the story from there. Filling in details, trying to answer the million questions he can see, as of yet unvoiced, on Mike’s face.

"Timothy was able to hold his own against four sailors until Secretary Jarvis got the fight stopped. He was severely injured, and likely would have died if that fight had gone on much longer. He was supposed to die. As a computer specialist, they didn’t expect that he’d have much in the way of self-defense skills. They figured that four on one they’d easily overpower and beat him to death. Though it couldn’t be proven, we are certain John ordered it."

Michael feels sick to his stomach at that. He can't believe that. He knew John didn't get along with Tim, but annoyed and disappointed and order a murder are not even in the same hemisphere.

"Come on… you can't… No! Okay, sure, he didn't like Tim. That's not a secret. He thought he was wasting his life, but… killing him? No."

Ducky nods solemnly, and Penny's skin is the color of ash as she cries.

"No one but John could have put that plan into play. His secretary handled all of the details, took responsibility it, and then killed himself before he could be questioned about it," says Ducky.

Michael winces. "Oh, shit."

Ducky nods again. "Exactly. I take it you'd met Lt. Mane?"

Mike wants to be sick. "Yes. He wouldn't hit the head without express permission, let alone try to kill someone. Is Tim…" Michael doesn't know what the polite question is here. Tim could be anywhere from mending and pretty much better to comatose.

"He's healing. He will eventually regain all of his facilities. He just got out of the last cast last week, but the most optimistic version of when his right hand will be fully working again is Christmastime."

"God." Michael looks like he's smelling something fetid, and he takes a deep drink.

"While Timothy was in the hospital, the investigation into what had happened began. Shortly after it began, all the arrows were pointing to John."

"Then Mane offs himself and the trail ends?"

"Yes."

Penny nods again. "The investigation had to end there. Mane admitted it. Everyone else involved took their orders from Mane. There were no direct links between John and Mane, and no physical evidence."

Mike sighs. That's an awful story, but with no proof, that's also not enough to take an Admiral down. "So… how'd he end up retiring?"

"Tim got home, beaten… God, Mike, you've never… They're telling people he got t-boned by a truck and no one's doubted that for a second. Sarah looked at him, made a decision, called John and told him that if he didn't resign that second, she'd go public with child abuse allegations."

Mike's staring at her like he's just seen someone get hit with a truck.

"Oh, God, Mom." Michael switches seats, so he's on Penny's other side. He's hugging her, and she's crying.

Ducky's hand is also on her back, and after a second he takes Michael's in his and gives it a quick squeeze. "It has been a hard few months here, and no one is talking about this for… obvious reasons."

Michael nods at that, and is giving Ducky the we're going to have a longer talk about this later when my mom's not here, right? look.

Ducky nods at that, too.
It's fairly early when Ducky wakes. Nothing new about that. He never needed a whole lot of sleep, and ever since he hit fifty not a whole lot has meant about four and a half hours a night.

Michael McGee, who camped out in their library, appears to also be an early riser, or his body is acclimated to a different time zone and this is just when he's up. Either way, when Ducky heads into the kitchen to get himself a glass of juice and start the morning tea, he sees Michael standing in front of their fireplace, looking at the photos.

"Morning," Michael says.

"Good morning. I was going to make some tea, would you like that, or coffee or…"

"Whatever is fine."

Ducky nods at that, getting the water going. "We usually have breakfast out."

Michael, nods, staring at the family crest that's over the fireplace, along with the pictures. "Feel like telling me who's who?"

Ducky comes over. "I assume you know about half of these?"

Michael nods. He knows, roughly, who most of the characters, at least their parents, are on one side the mantle. Namely the pictures of Penny, her brothers and sisters, her children, their wives and kids, and grandkids. Sans one, there's no shot of John on the mantle. Ducky's side has shots of places he loves and old friends, and one of his mother.

In the middle is the Gibbs clan, candid shots, wedding shots.

The group shot from Tony and Ziva's wedding is out of date, but it's the most recent one with all of them in it, so Ducky picks that one up and explains who is who.

Michael shakes his head when he Ducky gets to pointing out Tim and Abby. "Even after last night… Still have the image of a fourteen-year-old in my head."

"Is that the last time you saw Timothy?"

"Something like that. I don't know how old he actually was. Old enough that he was tall and gangly with bad skin, young enough he wasn't shaving yet. I only saw Tim… God, five times? My home base is Perth, or was until we moved to Canberra. My wife's family is back in Perth, and John and Tori and Tim were stationed there for six months when Tim was a baby, so I saw them then. But all he was doing at that point was drooling and chewing on things. I was still single, and hanging out with my brother, his wife, and a baby wasn't exactly my idea of fun."

Ducky nods along with that. Michael would have been in his early twenties when Timothy was a baby. He knows that when he was a young man, family obligations involving infants wasn't his idea of fun, either.

"Can you tell me about John? I, obviously, know your mother quite well, and I've known Timothy for most of his adult life. We started working together when he was twenty-four. I've seen John once, but never truly met him."

"You want to know more about John?" Michael's surprised by that. "I'd imagine you'd have him firmly categorized as a monster and not want to touch it beyond that."

"Indeed. John has deeply damaged two people I care very much for, and those wounds have sent ripples across all the other people I love and will continue to do so for a very long time." Michael sees a flash of anger and steel in Ducky's eyes. "However, I spent more than thirty years as a medical examiner. In addition to my MD, I have a degree in forensic psychology. Perhaps it is perverse, but I have and always had an interest in monsters and their acts. And though I spent half of my career among the dead, half was among the living, offering what healing I could. These days Jimmy handles the care of our physical bodies, but I would seek to aid in the healing of minds and hearts, so, any insights you can offer into John can help me with the trauma he's wrought on my loves."

Michael nods at that. They hear the tea kettle whistle, and Ducky leads them to the kitchen. A small, tidy space of light greens and rich browns. He gestures to the table, and Michael sits and Ducky gets the tea ready.

Once seated, Michael says, "I don't want to be that guy who says, 'Bob was never the same after 'Nam,' but, John went, and he really was never the same after 'Nam. He wasn't in James' unit. Hell, he wasn't within a hundred miles of him, but when James died something about John cracked. After, he could be fun, but there was a very sharp, very brittle, very… reserved aspect to him.” Mike licks his lips, and Ducky wonders briefly if this is a learned stress response or something coded into the Langston DNA. He doesn't know which, but he's now seen three generations of the same family do it, and wonders if he'll ever see it from Kelly. "He was a high achiever before, but after, everything always had to be perfect or better than perfect. I was a Plebe when it happened, so it's not like I was on the grapevine or got any scuttlebutt, but John was there, and years later John hinted that James fucked up, and it got him, and everyone else on his boat, killed. I don't know if that's true or not, but when John went he was smart and bright but, you know, human. People were allowed to make mistakes around him. He could forgive that. And when he got back, that was gone.

"We'd see each other every year or two, swap letters now and again. But we didn't spend a lot of time with each other, and even less time with each other's kids." Michael looks Ducky over, tea cup between his hands, trying to peel away fifty years with his eyes. "You served, right? Not a soldier, but…"

"I was a soldier in Korea, Medical Corpsman, then back to Scotland for University. Royal Medical Corps after that, tours in Vietnam, Africa, Afghanistan, and my last active duty assignment as a combat surgeon was in the Falklands. So, yes, I have served, and I am well aware of men who went to Vietnam and were, indeed, never the same." Ducky smiles gently and takes a sip of his tea. "None of us were, not really. Though some of us stayed closer to the original version, and some of us did a better job of reattaching ourselves to life outside the jungles when we got home."

Michael nods at that. "Okay. You know how the basics work. You don't have much downtime, and the downtime you have your buddies get first dibs on. Then your wife and kids, unless they're actually around, then that switches. After that comes everyone else. John was part of everyone else. Couple letters a year and a standing date for a drink anytime we were both in the South Pacific and had some free time.

"We'd get that drink, bullshit about the job and what we were doing, talk about our families some. With Tim, I was hearing about how he was so smart and talented and good at math, then I was hearing about Tim giving him trouble, not really applying himself, then he was wrapping up high school and getting ready for Annapolis, and then I didn't hear anything else about him for… I don't know, six years, and he's suddenly a cop. For a few years, I'd ask, but John would just glare. So I stopped asking. Things blew up with Tori, and I knew not to ask about that. Eventually the only talking about family was me telling him about mine and updates on Sarah."

"And you and Penny didn't talk about John's family?"
"Not much. You know Mom, she's never in the same place for more than ten minutes at a time. Hard to get on the phone, especially before cells were common. So, if I was talking to her, I wanted to talk about her. I'd get her up to date on my kids, and we'd talk about her latest adventures and what she was up to. I'd ask about John sometimes, but… I mean, his kids were people I didn't know and honestly couldn't have picked out of a lineup. That's the same kind of relationship he has with my kids." Michael shakes his head.

Michael's tapping his finger on the rim of his tea cup. He swallows, and looks up at Ducky. "John and Tim not getting along isn't new, is it?"

Ducky shakes his head. "No. It's not. And hiding what was going on isn't new, either."

Mike snorts quietly and shakes his head. "John does lots of hiding."

Ducky looks at him curiously.

Mike shrugs. "That's part of what you're asking about, right? He made it to Admiral, so obviously Timmy wasn't walking around with black eyes as a kid. He had to have a public persona, right? And that persona was perfect in every way."

Ducky nods at him. "Exactly. For a long time all any of us, besides Timothy and his mother, knew was that he and his father didn't get along."

Michael swallows a gulp of tea. "I never got the sense that you ever saw who was really there. Not after 'Nam, at least. He was guarded before, always careful, hiding something, but the walls went up and the image of 'John' was all you could get after."

"What do you think he was hiding?"

Mike shakes his head. "Lot of things. How he really felt about people. That’s pretty common, for everyone really, but especially when he was younger and lower ranks or a plebe, he never let it out. Can't be letting the higher ups know you think they're assholes." Mike gives Ducky a meaningful look. "And, you know, how he felt about people."

"Male people?"

Mike shrugs. "As a kid he always had a girlfriend or two. He got married, and still had a girlfriend or two. Divorced, didn’t seem to change anything. Last we talked, he had one in Tokyo and another in San Fran. And has two kids."

Ducky's look keeps asking if John is gay or bisexual.

Mike shrugs. "I didn't even know it was a thing until after I'd been at Annapolis for a while. But, you go out drinking with a guy enough times, and you pick up who he's looking at, and for John it usually isn't the pretty girls. Of course, you basically have to get a pitcher of beer into him before he starts looking at anyone, and especially as he got older, it got harder and harder to get a pitcher of beer into him. Haven’t seen him have more than two scotches in forever, and we haven’t gone to the kind of bar where you look at pretty girls, or boys, since the ‘80s. So, I don't know if he ever got past looking."

"Careful, precise, meticulous."

"Yeah. Always. Ramped up a million notches after the war. When Dad hit Admiral, John decided he had to, too. And he had to do it younger than Dad did. And he did, by close to six months. Which, since Dad went up during a hot war, and John went up in a luke-warm one should tell you
"Everything you need to know about him."

"Did John and your father get along?"

"Well enough. Dad was strict, but he was fun. He always had great stories to tell about whatever he'd been up to." Michael smiles at that memory. "Not around enough, and we all wanted lots of attention when he'd get on land. Whoever had the most interesting, highest awards, stuff like that, got the most petting from Dad. And John made sure to get a lot of petting. Kids and parents fight, that's just how it is, but I only remember one or two real fights between them. Most of the time they got on fine. But there was always a I'm going to prove I'm better vibe from John."

"And he was?"

"Ye…” Ducky can see Michael slotting the new information he has about John into his picture of him, so he doesn't finish saying 'yes.' "Dad never tried to kill any of us. Better's not the right word. John’s probably smarter. He’s definitely more dedicated to the Navy." Michael thinks about that. "Mom and Dad are/were brilliant. I think John’s more like Mom. You know how hard she had to work to get where she did. You know it wasn't enough to be a genius, she had to be three times as good as everyone around, and everyone around was already Mensa-level smart. Mom doesn't take shit from anyone on anything, and John’s just like that.

"I remember one time we met up, and there were a few other guys from his command, and they were ragging on him for what he put the sailors through, and he slugged back his drink and said, 'If I can do it, they can, too.' And that was the thing with John, he never asked you to do anything he couldn't, but he never ran into anything, on a ship, he couldn't do. And if he could do it, and you couldn't, obviously you were a blithering incompetent."

"Do you like him?" Ducky's curious as to how people who aren't Timothy or Sarah or Penny see John.

"Yeah. Or… I mean, I don't want to spend every minute of the day with him, but spend a night every year or so, down some beer and BS, sure? He’s smart and funny. Oh man, wicked sense of humor, and he can really dance, so especially when we were younger, before I was married, he was a ton of fun to go out with." Mike shrugs at that. "Bad husband material. Good for a drinking buddy or wingman."

"He gets stuff done when it needs to be done, no matter what. He's the guy who'll roll up his sleeves and get into the engine of the ship when it isn't working and no one knows what’s wrong, even after he had his stripes, and his stars. And you couldn't pick a better guy to have at your back if you were in a sticky situation. We were in Manila and got into a fight with six jarheads. All of 'em were the size of tanks and just as stupid and John just put them down." Michael slices his hand across the air like a blade scything through grass. "They didn't know what the fuck they'd run into.” Mike smiles a little at the memories. “He’s my big brother.” Then Mike’s looking far away, distressed. “And apparently he’s not a good man.

Ducky nods, solemnly. "No. He is not a good man. He is an appalling father."

Mike almost shrugs, but realizes that could be read as quibbling with Ducky’s conclusion, as opposed to indicating he wasn’t there and didn’t know. "When Tim was a kid, John used to talk about him, so excited about how smart he was and all the great things he was going to do. Then he was a teenager and turned into a little snot, but a little snot on track for Annapolis, so I'd hear about that. John was worried, but I talked to Tori occasionally, and the kid had straight As, so John was just on one of his everything has to be better than perfect kicks. I poked him once about how Tom and I managed to make it into Annapolis without perfect 4.0s and Tim would do it, too, but that didn't help much. And then he stopped talking about them. Tim, Torri, those were things John couldn't do, so he wouldn't say much about them. Just glare and change the subject if you asked.

"I saw Tim at Dad's funeral, and he was just this quiet little guy. I didn't pay a lot of attention to him, because..." Michael doesn't need to finish that sentence. Ducky understands how a ten-year-old you haven't seen in a decade would be a very minor aspect of your father's funeral.

"Saw him again at fourteenish. We were up for Christmas with Mom and so were Tori and Tim and Sarah, and he was a little snot! I know little snots, helped raise three of them. They're supposed to be snots at fourteen. That's how you know you've got a fourteen-year-old, they go from cute and fun into little snots. Beth, my oldest daughter, has her own fourteen-year-old and we've been talking about how they all turn into snots. Beth's convinced she was never a little snot, and Darla and I laughed so hard at that we almost broke something." Mike can see this isn't a diversion Ducky needs. He waves it away.

"Back to Tim. John was telling me about trying to get Tim straightened out, might not get into Annapolis, and what a waste that'd be, but... He didn't look like he needed much straightening out to me. Sure, he was a sarcastic little bastard, never quite over the line, but there was always that edge. You could tell he was smarter than you were and laughing at you behind his polite exterior. We were only together for three days, but he'd say things, and you'd nod along thinking it was okay, and then an hour later you'd really think about what he said and kick yourself in the ass for going along with it. He was just a sarcastic little snot with an innocent delivery that let him say a lot of things that he couldn't have gotten away with if he hadn't been so cute."

Ducky nods; he can well imagine fourteen-year-old Tim being a handful, especially if he was feeling safe, which with his father away and in his grandmother's home he likely was. Ducky thinks for a moment about what Michael just said. "You never actually saw John and Timothy together, did you?"

"Not after Tim was walking. How bad did it get?"

"He tried to murder Timothy." But Ducky knows that isn't what Michael is asking. "As long as it didn't leave marks or happen in public, anything was fair game."

"Fuck." Michael's looking down at his tea. "Still can't believe it. I mean... He can be cruel, and has a reputation for being an absolute bastard. If you can't do the job perfect, you did not want to be under his command because he'd tear you down, but... murder?"

"You think he wasn't capable of killing?"

"No. I know he can kill. Just, he's always so controlled. He'll be screaming his head off, chewing some sailor to dust, but you can see it in his eyes, the fire never gets that high. Part of not seeing the real John. The screaming... I always thought it was an act. Done because it made an impression and if you were on the receiving side of it, you never wanted to be there again."

"Timothy’s said something like that, too. However, at least some of the screaming aimed at him, was, in fact, real. And, as you said, real or not, you never wanted to be there again, and Timothy was there, quite a lot."

"John always said he was so smart."

Ducky understands that to mean if Tim was the only thing John valued, why was John yelling? "He is. Best-selling novelist. Running the NCIS Cybercrime Division, meaning he's the number four man at a federal agency, before forty. He's a wizard with a computer. The one thing he isn't, is a sailor."
Michael sighs.

"He got into Annapolis and turned them down."

Michael sucks in a quick breath at that. John never mentioned it, and that would piss him off enough he'd want to kill. He assumed Tim, somehow, even with a great-grandfather, grandfather, father, and three uncles who were all grads, fucked up his application so badly that Annapolis wouldn't take him. Having seen Tim at fourteen, Tom figured that most likely he'd failed the physical. "That's when John stopped talking about him, beyond the one quick, he's a cop now, update I managed to get out of him, years later."

"I'd imagine so."

They hear Penny heading in at that point. She grabs herself a glass of orange juice, before heading over to the table that Michael and Ducky are sitting at. She ruffles Michael's hair as she sits down.

“So, what happens now? He’s in Pearl and…” Mike asks.

“Nothing.” Ducky says, looking at Penny, making the decision to keep Mike out of whatever the rest of the family may do.

“Sarah played the last card of the game,” Penny says. She’s looking better from last night, not less distressed, but more in charge of herself.

“So… He was he doing it to Sarah, too?” Mike’s shaking his head at that, not able to believe it. “He kept talking about her and how proud he was and… Long after he’d only stare you down if you brought up Tim or Tori, he’d go on and on about Sarah.

“No. From everything we know, John and Sarah always were fine with each other,” Ducky says.

"John and Sarah were… okay?" How did that work? is clear on Michael's face.

"As okay as you can be with the man who tries to kill your brother," Penny says, looking grim.

Ducky adds, "In the last few weeks I've been reading up more on this, and apparently a very common pattern with domestic abuse is that the abuser has one target. He's not random and doesn't spread his abuse all over the place. Part of that is that whoever the target is satisfies a need other people do not. Part of it is that it's significantly easier to continue to abuse if no one knows you are doing it. Only one victim allows for that."

“And when he went full bore on Tim, Sarah lied to take him out of the game?”

Penny nods.

Mike sighs, and sips his tea. “God.”

“What are you going to do?” Penny asks her son.

He shrugs uselessly. “I’m supposed to be in Norfolk for lunch, finally get briefed on this test I’m not supposed to know about. From there… I was going to hop the fastest transport to Pearl, visit him a bit, and home, but…”

“It’s Friday,” Penny says. “If you come back up here after, we have a weekly family Shabbos—“

“You’re Jewish now?” Mike asks dryly. Too many things on top of each other, so this hits him and he starts to laugh.
Ducky smiles, understanding that laugh is mostly a matter of burning off too many feelings. “Part of the clan is, and a weekly dinner suits all of us. If you want to come back here after your meeting, you’re welcome to join in. Timothy and Abigail have claimed dinner at their house this week. Rumor has it Sarah and Glenn will be coming, too.”

“Tim would likely want to hear how his test is doing now that it’s being released into the wider world.”

Mike sighs, nodding. “I’d imagine. Let me see how the transportation works, and if I can, I’ll swing by for supper.”

“Good,” Ducky says.

Mike rubs his face and eyes the clock. “I’ve got to get moving if I’m going to make Norfolk in time.”

“Top of the stairs, on the left, there’s a bathroom with a shower,” Penny tells him as he’s standing to get ready to go.

Once he’s upstairs, Ducky lays his hand on hers, “How are you doing?”

She shrugs. “I really don’t know.”

Ducky reaches over and kisses her. “I’d fix it if I could.”

She nods. “I know.”
Devil's Hexagon

“So, how long were you two married?” Abbi asks as she and Gibbs get dressed and ready for the ‘friendly breakfast’ Diane, actually Draga, called them for last night.

Gibbs shrugs. He doesn’t know off the top of his head and has to think. “Two and a half years, first meeting to signing the divorce papers.”

“Fast.”

He shrugs at that, too.

“And you and Fornell?”

He looks up from shoving things out of the way in the closet. He’s used to having it all to himself, and suddenly there’s all this other stuff in there. They’re both still working out the kinks of sharing a home. “You asking how long Fornell and I were married?”

She smirks. “After we struck out with the perfect woman, DiNozzo was joking about how no one could compete with Fornell.”

He glares a bit at his mental image of Tony, and goes back to flipping through hangers looking for his green golf shirt. “Met Fornell in ’93. First joint case I worked with the FBI. Franks had worked with him before, liked him. Thought he was too by-the-book, but if he could loosen up and trust himself, he’d be a great agent.”

“Why do I have the feeling that’s not the way Mike Franks said it?”

Gibbs smiles at that, finds his shirt, grabs the first pair of pants he sees, and retreats from the closet. He sees Abbi’s well ahead of him on dressing, just wrapping up on buttoning her shirt.

“’Keep an eye on that one, Probie. He ever gets that stick out his ass and stop second-guessin’ himself, he’ll be good.’”

Diane smiles at that approximation of Mike Franks, and says, “And you said something like, ‘Don’t waste good.’”

“Something like that. Probably just thought it.” Back then he really was a functional mute. He pretty much only talked when he absolutely had to.

“What do you think she has?” Abbi asks, getting back to the reason for this meeting. Because the reason on the email, Diane and Draga just wanted to have a fun little breakfast with him and Abbi, and Fornell and Wendy sure as hell isn’t it.

“Something that’s got her flags up enough that we’re not doing this at work. Something that has her concerned enough that she had Draga email us about it from his work account.”

He sees the look Abbi’s flashing him.

“No, she’s solid. Diane doesn’t scare easy. If her danger sense is flashing, something’s up.”

Abbi zips up her boot, and looks at Gibbs, who is tucking his belt into the loops. “I’m ready. Just waiting on you, old man.”
He glares at her. No heat in it, this is just banter, and it’s part of his expected response. Taking two steps over, kissing her soundly, and then saying, “Your old man,” catchers her by surprise.

She nods, kisses him back, and says, “And don’t you forget it.”

He gives her a quick salute before saying, “Yes, Ma’am.”

She laughs at that, stepping away. “Get moving.”

Occasionally, Gibbs wonders what it was he did to piss God off so badly.

It’s not a real wonder. Not like the screaming at the universe when his girls died. This is more a matter of complaining about things that irk or annoy him. Occasionally, get him full on mad.

He guesses this qualifies as irked. He’s not angry, but he’s not, by any stretch, planning on enjoying this. It’d be one thing if it was just him, Fornell, and Diane. That’d be irksome, too, but private irksome, all their own baggage away from everyone else.

This is public irksome with all of their current significant others. Though he has the sense that Draga’s more a friend with benefits than a partner. Or Fornell, okay Wendy, has that sense and passed said sense along.

He and Abbi get to the diner second, after Fornell and Wendy, and after plates of scrambled eggs, oatmeal, and bacon (his) and a whole wheat bagel, fruit cup, and sausage (hers) were on the table, waiting for them. As they’re saying ‘Hi,’ Gibbs wonders how much of this is Diane showing off that of the three of them, she’s got the youngest, hottest SO. Probably not much, but he’s sure she’s enjoying that as she and Draga head in. (He’s mildly irked at the idea that Diane has an even younger redhead than he does, but that’s not the sort of thought that’s ever getting out of the deep recesses of his mind. He’s also somewhat irked at the idea that Diane has shifted from his ex-wife to one of the people he considers an equal he’s competing with to prove who’s the better man.)

Diane takes one look at Gibbs (who is using his O2 tube right now. He’d rather not, but he’s been feeling out of breath for the last few days. Tim said something about ‘welcome to ragweed season.’ When he mentioned it, his doctor took one look at the puffy eyes, listened to his chest, and agreed. Healing up from all of this has apparently knocked his immune system for enough of a loop that this year, he’s got allergies.) and says, “Oh, my God! Tobias! You said he was ‘injured,’ not! Good Lord, Jethro, what happened!” Diane’s horrified to see the O2 tube. “Are you…”

“I’ll live,” he says, drily, also giving Fornell a look, because he could have headed this fussing off by just telling her what happened. Fornell shrugs. He’d rather Gibbs get fussed at than get fussed at himself.

Diane very carefully leans in and kisses his cheek, before scooting in and sitting down next to Wendy. Wendy gets a one-armed hug, and Diane and Abbi nod at each other. “You all know Eric?” Diane asks.

Wendy and Fornell do, because he’s around enough that he’s part of their life, too. At least tangentially, in the sense that he’s the guy sporadically dating Fornell’s daughter’s mother. But Abbi and Eric haven’t met. They’ve heard of each other, but no face to face time. “Abbi Borin,” she says offering her hand.
“Eric Draga, you’re the one who stole my partner.”

“Thought Bishop was yours.”

“She’s more like my math-geek little sister.”

“Ah.” That matches some of what Abbi’s heard about Bishop from the rest of the crew. “Well, I needed her more than you guys did.”

“Yeah, I know.” Draga sighs. Both he and Tony are missing having Ziva around. They might both prefer their pregnant partner not be in the field, but no insult to Bishop, she’s as Probie as it gets and the only fix for that is time. Still, it’s really nice to go into an unknown and know the person at your back battle tested and rock solid. “This whole thing’s got us scattered all over the place. Say hi when you see her?”

“No problem. After this, I’m back to my office. DiNozzo’s working her way through my accounting department.”

“How’s that going?” Diane asks.

Abbi glares.

“That good?” Wendy asks.

“That’s the polite version of how it’s going. In addition to screwing everyone in every direction they could, we also weren’t paying our suppliers regularly. We ran all of our accounts at ninety-days past due, didn’t keep any records for a third of them, and now, if we want nifty things like electricity in the Great Lakes office, let alone freaking paperclips or the damn papers to clip together, I’ve got to find money to pay for them, yesterday, because they’re getting cut off tomorrow.”

The rest of the table winces at that. Gibbs gently strokes Abbi’s back. Diane sees it and smiles a little.

“So, what happened?” Diane asks Gibbs, “Tobias said you had some excitement on your end, not… you got hit by a truck.”

“I don’t look that bad!”

Fornell and Diane eye him. They’ve both seen him looking a hell of a lot better than he does now.

“You try getting shot in the lung! See how you look after that,” he fires off to Fornell.

Wrong thing to say. “You got shot???” Diane hits him with. (He catches Draga whisper to Wendy, “Are these three always so much fun?” Wendy nods.)

“It happens. I’m alive. They had to cut a chunk of my lung out, and rebuild a few ribs.” Abbi catches Diane’s eye, along with Wendy’s and all three of the women are well aware of the fact that this is Gibbs downplaying the hell out of this.

Diane flashes a look back to Abbi, letting her know she’s well aware of what Jethro’s doing. She’s heard this song (or versions of it) more than once before. “What did you get shot with, a harpoon?”

Gibbs nods, and Fornell says, “Bullet wasn’t much smaller than one.”

“And,” she gestures to the tube.
“With any luck I won’t need it much longer. Got a follow up appointment with the lung doc next Friday.”

Diane makes an annoyed sound, looks to Abbi, making sure that’s true, and Abbi nods as Elaine heads over with an egg white omelet and fruit cup for her, as well as turkey sausage and scrambled eggs for Draga. “Thanks, Elaine.”

“No problem, Hun. Diet Coke or full strength today?” she asks as she puts a Red Bull in front of Draga.

“Full strength, I’m going to need the sugar.”

Elaine raises an eyebrow.

“This one,” she looks at Abbi, “and her co-conspirators” another glance at Jethro and Tobias, “are keeping me up at night.”

“You keep talkin,’ I’ll keep the food coming.”

That gets thanks from everyone at the table.

Diane nods at that. “Your pen pal is the real deal. Anything you get from him, move on. He’s insanely connected, has at least some conscience, but doesn’t want to burn his own career/put himself in danger.”

“Hence all the cloak and dagger?” Wendy asks. This is the first time she’s been invited to a briefing like this, and she knows that she’s here because this isn’t supposed to be about work. She also knows that the reason they got here first is that Tobias made sure to scout the diner, make sure no one could lay a directional mic on them (he taped a small ‘massager’ to the window when they got here and scanned for bugs, all clean.)

“Yeah. Let me start where you guys leave off. You,” she looks to Abbi, “give Tobias your pen pal’s account numbers. He shuffles them over to me. I’m mid-case, so two days go by before I can do anything with them. That’s yesterday. I’ve been getting the second-hand version of what’s up, along with the ZNN updates, so I know this is going to be hot. Before I get into it, I memorize the numbers. Which was good, because less than five minutes into the second one, I’ve got John Koskinen in my office asking where the hell I got those numbers, confiscating the paper they’re on, and taking me off the case.”

Not everyone looks properly impressed.

“John’s the head of the IRS.”

Now they do.

“So, you… what?” Wendy asks.

“I look cute, give him my account numbers, ask, nicely, what I’ve gotten into. He doesn’t say anything, just tries to look intimidating while glaring at me.”

“Ew.” Wendy says.

“Pfft. Honey, there’s not a sixty-year-old guy with white hair and a bad attitude who can glare me into submission on Earth. I trained with the best,” Jethro looks pleased at that, “and Koskinen doesn’t have half of Leroy’s attitude when he’s in a good mood.” Jethro puts down his coffee (decaf) and looks appalled at that. “And the day I take stupid orders from some old guy who thinks he can pull the wool over my eyes,” she looks to Fornell, who squirms, embarrassed, “is the day you need to bury me, because I’ve died.”

Abbi’s smiling along at this, looking very pleased with Diane right now.

“So, I look cute, and play ball, all ‘yes, sir,’ ‘no, sir,’ ‘no problem, sir,’ ‘anonymous tip, sir.’ And he heads off thinking he’s blown me off the path. Now, because I actually know how to use a computer, and because I’ve got a few friends in IT, I get a heads up an hour later that my computer’s being watched. Fortunately, we,” she strokes Draga’s hand, “already had a lunch date on the books, so I get him to get all of you together for our breakfast of ghosts of ex-lovers past.”

Draga adds in, “We’re at lunch, and Diane asks me if the guy following her really is a tail. I check, and keep checking, and he is. So, I get back to work, and get DiNozzo into this. He calls in Vance and McGee, and we’re back into this case that won’t die, right now, just as support and security.”

Fornell’s looking worried. “Emily?”

Draga nods. He and Fornell are never going to be BFFs, but they both get, in their bones and guts, the feeling of wondering if your child is in danger. In fact, the way Draga treats Emily, a lot like an over-protective big brother, is the only reason Fornell can stand having him around. “When she’s not with you, or with her mom and me, Bishop’s keeping an eye on her. We haven’t seen anyone watching her, and we are watching.”

Fornell relaxes at that. He’s not happy, but all of Emily’s life there’s been the shadow of his job, so he doesn’t feel like he can complain about it if Diane’s throws some shade.

“So, does this mean you’re out of this now?” Abbi asks.

Diane scoffs. “No. Just means I have to be sneakier about it. I can’t work the case when I’m at work, but McGee’s set me up with a secure account through the NCIS system and is keeping an eye on my home system, keeping it secure. Hence the,” she takes a sip of her soda, “full strength soda. No rest for the wicked. Here’s what I’ve got so far. The first account, it’s showed up in several other high-stakes corruption cases. It’s a small but very well-funded bank out of… actually I’m not sure. I don’t think it’s on land.”

All of them are staring at her.

“These days there’s no need for a physical bank, not if all you’re doing is moving numbers around from point A to B.”

They’re still staring at her.

“Okay. Cash isn’t real. The paper has no value in and of itself. People with big money have no use for cash, it’s just bulky and annoying, that’s part of making people we don’t like out of the electronic system, cash just weighs them down.” Diane can see she’s losing them. She refocuses to the idea at hand. “Cash is an IOU that represents a claim on some future service or good. Once you get that down, all a bank is is a way to keep track of who owes whom what. And that’s all this is, a huge collection of very well-endowed IOUs shifting debts around. Best I can tell, this one is floating around on someone’s yacht. I don’t know who runs it. I do know that some very highly-placed and well-off people have had dealings with it. That account number popped up in five very ‘sensitive’ audits. The sort where the people involved are very connected, twenty-five tax lawyers are involved, and in the end everyone agrees nothing illegal happened, but the person being audited ends up paying a huge ‘penalty’ usually for ‘late filing’ without having to admit any wrongdoing.”

Abbi’s lip curls. That sounds a whole lot like the mess she’s in. “You think Koskinen’s in on this?”

“I think I’m bouncing those account numbers back to Tobias along with the idea that it’s time to look at my higher ups as well as yours,” Diane says to Abbi. Then to Tobias, “Leon’s agreed that if you take any flack from your higher ups, NCIS will take point on this, though they don’t have the accounting manpower for it, so they might have to borrow some people. Apparently they’re small enough, or play straight enough, that they aren’t involved with any of this.”

“What about the other accounts?” Gibbs asks.

“As for the other three… One’s linked to ISIS. The other two, we do know who’s running them, but unlike the floating account, they’re buried behind banking secrecy laws, located in non-extradition countries, and pretty much, unless Jethro’s willing to take command of a unit of Marines to kidnap the board of directors for both banks, we’re not getting any information out of them. We’ve tried. The entire board of the one is on the no-fly list and if they set foot in the US, we’re grabbing them, but so far, they haven’t left Seychelles.” Diane looks at Fornell. “Have your forensic accountants been able to get those missing quarters for CGIS back?”

“I’ll ask.”

“As soon as they do, shoot them to me.”

Fornell looks at her curiously.

“In a roundabout sort of way. Say, thumb drive to Jethro when you get together to do whatever it is you two do, then he drops by NCIS for a chat with Leon or something, and it ends up in Draga’s hand, from there I can get it. I know my work computer is being watched, so assume anything you don’t hear face to face from me or Draga is being watched, too.”

“McGee says our phones are clean, and his guys messed with them—“

“But I’m not trusting that,” Diane adds.

Abbi shakes her head. “Trust McGee on that. The only reason we’re here right now is because when his guys fix up a phone, it’s fixed. Also, he’s not kidding about don’t turn them off.”

Wendy hasn’t heard this part, and for that matter Fornell hasn’t either. They’re both looking expectantly at Abbi and Gibbs.

“He wires them with a tiny bomb. Kill the power and three seconds later they blow. That’s how we got out of the basement,” Gibbs says.

“MacGuyvered them into small shape charges and blew the hinges on the door,” Abbi adds, filling in the details.

Fornell’s looking impressed, like he’s going to have a chat with McGee soon. “That’s how you got out?”

“Yeah. What’d you think?” Gibbs says.

“Electronic lock. I assumed it died with everything else when the EMP went,” Fornell says. Then he looks at Diane. “This bit them. I don’t know if you’ve got it yet, but, over the last two years and next five, every Federal office is setting up a security system that will completely lock the building down and kill all of the electronics in it. The idea is if someone breaks in and hacks the joint, they can’t get anything out. But if you’re inside when it happens, you’re sitting around in the dark, no way out, waiting for my guys to show up and save the day.”

“Not doing anything with this at work. Not doing it at home unless I’ve got someone,” she looks at Draga, “watching my back.”

“Good,” Fornell says. “So, step two, official step two, is back in my court?”

Diane nods at Fornell. “You guys handle the public corruption cases.”

“Sounds like it’s time to set up a new ‘Untouchables,’” Wendy adds, looking very pleased at the idea of her own personal G-man running the thing.

Fornell’s arm is around her shoulders. “Too much attention if I do that, but that’s the play. I can’t run this on my own.”

“I have it straight from Director Vance, for both of you,” Draga says, looking to Fornell and Abbi, “That whatever backup you need, you’ve got from us. DiNozzo and I are points of contact.”

“I’ve got a favor to ask, you, Jethro, but… Can you drive?”

He nods. “As of yesterday. Why?”

“Feel like tailing my tail?”

Gibbs nods. “You run the plates?”

Draga looks mildly annoyed at that. “Even Bishop knows to do that. It’s an IRS motor pool car.”

“I don’t know who’s in the car. But I want to find out.”

“You want pictures and prints?” Gibbs asks.

Diane nods. “He can’t be in there twenty-four seven.”

Gibbs, Fornell, and Draga all shoot each other a look.

“Oh, gross!” Diane says.

“Guys can spend a lot of time in a car,” Draga says.

Fornell’s nodding. “You get to know your partner real well after a long surveillance job.”

“DiNozzo had McGee and I watching this one building for twenty-six hours,” Draga adds.

“Pikers,” Abbi says.

Fornell and Draga are looking surprised at that. So’s Diane and Wendy for that matter.

“Please, you don’t need a dick to go on long surveillance missions. Just a water bottle, a knife, and a partner you trust to look the other way.”

Gibbs nods at that. “Sounds like you might want to teach Bishop that trick.”

“I’m sure Ziva did.”
Gibbs inclines his head. That’s a good point.

Diane gets them back on track. “Okay, before we got on that way too much information tangent, I had a point. He’s got to get out of the car sooner or later, if for nothing else than for someone to give him a break. I need to know who he is. Once I do, I can find out who he’s talking to.”

“Probably Koskinen,” Draga adds.

“Probably, but I want to know for sure. And once we know who he is, you guys do your magic and bug his phone and read his emails, right?”

Gibbs, Fornell, and Abbi nod, that’s a good play. “What’s he driving?” Gibbs asks.

“Blue Nissan Leaf. How’s your distance vision?”

Jethro’s look makes it clear that it’s more than good enough. Then he remembers he’s wearing glasses all the time now.

Diane says, “When we’re heading off, look down Kendal,” the street they’re on, “three blocks down, parked on the left side.”

“I’m on him.” Then he remembers he drove them here. “Abbi.”

“Feel like giving me a ride?” she says to Diane. Gibbs feels his teeth gritting at the idea of the two of them and Draga together for an hour, unsupervised.

“Not a problem.” Diane’s grinning, loving the idea of plenty of time with Abbi on her own, possibly just because it’s bugging Gibbs. “My offices aren’t very far from yours.”

Gibbs pops his last bit of bacon into his mouth, and then kisses Abbi. “Give me five minutes head start.”

Abbi nods at that. “Be careful.”

He smiles. “You, too.”

She nods, squeezes his hand, and he lays money for both of their breakfasts on the table, and heads out.

“Why’s he going now?” Diane asks. She’s got good instincts, but she’s not a field agent.

“If your tail is good, he’s got the idea that one of us might decide to follow. If he sees us break apart in the parking lot, us pulling out, and him waiting around, he’ll keep looking back to see what Jethro does. This way, he’s already in position when we go. Maybe your tail notices him, but I’m sure that when he stops somewhere, Jethro will make sure to swap out cars. If we’re really lucky, your tail will go investigate Jethro’s car while he’s moving to another one, and whoever brings the other one, McGee or DiNozzo, will get your prints and pictures.”

“And if he doesn’t notice?”

“Gibbs’ll take care of it. He knows what he’s doing. Your guy might get picked up for a busted tail light or something. We’ll know who’s in that car by the end of the day,” Fornell says. He’s also got an empty plate in front of him. “So, guess it’s time to head off and get a team up and ready for this.”

“People you know personally,” Draga adds.
Fornell nods. “Been with the Bureau since ’80. I know everyone.”

“People you trust, then.”

Fornell smiles. “That’s the trick, right?”

Which leaves Diane, Draga, and Abbi, to wrap up and head off. They give Gibbs the full five minutes and then to the car they go.

It’s Draga’s car, so he’s driving.

It’s not a terribly uncomfortable silence as Draga, Diane, and Abbi head toward CGIS HQ. But it’s not easy, either. The weight of a lot of questions that aren’t getting asked fill the car.

Finally, Draga says, looking from Diane to Abbi, “So, he’s got a type, huh?”

This results in Abbi and Diane looking at each other and breaking out laughing.

Draga’s very glad to see that went over the way he hoped it would. “Can’t say I blame him, I’m fond of a sassy redhead with a badge who doesn’t take any crap, either.”

“Five tall, slender redheads with long hair and tomboy tendencies. Yeah, he’s got a type,” Diane adds.

“Five?” Draga says.

“I’m number three, she’s five.”

Abbi thinks about that for a moment. The perfect woman hunt had revealed a lot about Gibbs. Ziva and Tony had gotten into a pretty intense “discussion” of whether or not said “perfect” woman had to have red hair. Ziva didn’t think so, pointing out Mann, and Tony did, pointing out how Gibbs was dating Mann and still couldn’t take his eyes of Director Shepard. Which then got them taking about what they thought but didn’t know happened with Shepard. “I think I’m six. But I also think there’s almost twenty years between me and five.”

Diane’s curious. “Who’s five?”

Abbi’s curious, too. “Did you know Jenny Shepard?”

Now Diane’s looking annoyed. “That son of a bitch! Oh…” There’s a lot of fire in Diane’s eyes right now. “I never saw her. He mentioned he had a new Probie when Mike left. ‘Shepard.’ No first name. I didn’t know she was a her until two minutes ago.”

Abbi winces. Gibbs is in trouble next time those two run into each other.

“So, they were…” Diane asks.

“Tony and Ziva thought so. Something about Paris. But… that’s way after you, right?”

Diane nods, looking a little easier at that. Gibbs never got to Paris during their time together. At least, not that she knew of. Not like he told her much about what he was doing.
“I thought DiNozzo was kidding when he said Gibbs falls for any redhead in his path,” Draga says dryly, shaking his head.

Abbi’s tiny, little warning voice, the one that remembers that Gibbs has been divorced three times, and more importantly remembers that Gibbs got three other women thinking things were going so well they agreed to marry him, perks back up at this. And hell, she’s got one of the previous redheads in her custody for the next hour, so…

“He’s different now, right?”

Diane nods and snorts a bit. “Yeah. Tobias and I have talked about it. He’s happy now, and that makes a huge difference. All that you’ve got to be happy in yourself BS. It’s not. A marriage is like a picnic basket you pack for yourself, you can’t get anything out of it you don’t bring. You can compliment each other, or rip each other down, but if you don’t have that love or joy or whatever it is you need inside yourself, someone else can’t give it to you. When we were married, neither of us was happy, so we couldn’t make each other happy.”

“Instead you made each other miserable?”

Diane half smiles. “We had a talent for it. We were good at anything hot. Fighting, teasing…”

“Sex,” Abbi fills in, not entirely sure she wants to know this about Gibbs’ ex, but more information is good. Draga also doesn’t look like he’s sure he wants to know this.

“Yeah. Both of us burned hot all the time back then, and we burned each other out. Someone has to know when to pull back, and neither of us did. Great when it was going good, horrible when it was bad, and we didn’t have any in-betweens. There’s a difference, too, he’s got middle gears now, speeds between full out and collapse.”

“You, too?”

“I always had a few, more now, but back then we’d just keep egging each other on. Not a lot of gentleness or affection between us. This morning, you’re talking about work, you’re frustrated, he listens and pets you affectionately. You want to guess how many affectionate pets I got in the six months we were married and on the same continent?”

“Single digits?”

Diane shakes her head. “That would have been an improvement.”

“And Fornell?” Draga’s the one who asks, but Abbi’s interested, too.

“We weren’t married yet. Weren’t engaged yet. Leroy’d cancelled four dates in a row on me, ‘big case,’ he finally makes one and brings this guy with him. ‘Working dinner.’” She rolls her eyes. “Mr. Romance in action.”

“Which one?” Draga asks her.

Given how it worked out, Abbi thinks that’s a good question, too.

Diane flashes him a look, and then says, “That’s fair. Really, both of them. Honorable guy code, Tobias can’t make a play on Leroy’s girl. Especially not when he’s sitting there. But we liked each other. And Leroy can’t let Tobias be better at he is than anything, so when Tobias is around, Leroy actually is Mr. Romance. I’ve got two amazing guys paying a lot of attention to me. That was great. Like I said, when it was good it was really good. One working dinner turns into several more. They got me interested in going from straight accounting to law enforcement, encouraged it, even. Then working dinners turned into just spending time together for kicks.”

Abbi’s nodding at that, she can imagine it. Jethro and Tobias play off each other well, and both of them one-upping each other as possible suitors would be a lot of fun.

Until it ended.

“How’d it fall apart?”

Diane shrugs. “We got married. Leroy lost interest. Getting me was a lot more interesting than having me. Tobias didn’t have me, but he went undercover for four months. So, just me and Leroy. He’s buried in his work, ignoring me. Tobias is gone, no word, no idea if he’s alive or dead. By the time Tobias got back, Leroy and I were barely talking. Turns out he’d already accepted Agent Afloat, but hadn’t told me, yet. And since Tobias was ‘Leroy’s friend’ he couldn’t just drop by without Jethro around, and Jethro was barely ever around anymore. His last night in town, we had a massive fight, ended up burning hot in a lot of different directions. I thought I got through to him, actually found Leroy under all the walls of Gibbs. He heads off. A week goes by, nothing, no call, no letters, nothing. Two weeks. Still nothing.

“Week three, I’m nervous, lonely, getting nothing but silence from Jethro, so I call up Tobias, and we have dinner and it was nice. Lunch a few days later, still nice. He’s telling me not to worry, that it’s hard to communicate on a ship, probably get a letter the next day, stuff like that. We have dinner again, and again it’s good, and… And two weeks later the rabbit dies and we’re all beyond screwed.

“I tell Jethro first. Send him a letter. Then I find out he can make calls off a battleship, he just wasn’t calling me. The first person he calls is Tobias, because, and he didn’t mention this to me, because, you know, I was only his wife, so why would he mention it to me?” it’s clear that Diane is still pissed about this. “He’d had a vasectomy back in the ‘80s and wanted to talk to a ‘friend’ about what had happened. Tobias is on the phone with me about ten seconds after he gets off with Jethro in a blind panic, because he’s not only horrified at what he’s done to Jethro by sleeping with me, but he’s about to throw up because his ‘this is a terrible mistake’ ‘we can’t ever do this again’ ‘pretend it didn’t happen’ speech I got the morning after just flew out the window.

“Two weeks later, I’ve got divorce papers in my mailbox. Week after that I was Diane Fornell and was living with Tobias. Emily showed up eight months later, and when she was a year old, I filed for divorce again. It took ten years, but we eventually got to the point where we’re all pretty much okay with each other.”

Draga whistles low and slow while shaking his head. “Sounds like a train wreck.”

“It was. Find that informative?” Diane asks Abbi.

Abbi nods. “Oh yeah.” She’s got at least half a dozen points where she and Gibbs aren’t following the same patterns, so his comment about making all new mistakes with her seems to be honest.

“So, why do you call him Leroy?” Abbi asks. No one calls him Leroy.

Diane laughs. “First time we met. He sees me at the bar, buys a drink, sidles up, all big blue eyes and silent charm. I told him to back off, that I didn’t like cops.” Draga laughs. “I didn’t like cops then. He just smiles at me. ‘Drink’s free. Might as well enjoy it.’ So I did, and didn’t say anything. He doesn’t, either, just sitting close, drinking his own bourbon, looking at me in the mirror behind the bar. Finally, I asked his name. ‘Leroy Jethro Gibbs, you can call me Jethro,’ and he smiled again, offering his hand. So I shook it and said, ‘Hello, Leroy.’ Been doing it ever since. Us in a nutshell. Always stepping over each other’s lines just to see the other one push back.”

Diane’s looking at her, and has an expression that could be best called uncertain. Abbi finds that interesting, because she doesn’t get the sense that Diane’s ever really uncertain. Then she sees Diane blink, and it goes away. “You know about Shannon and Kelly, right?”

Abbi nods. “Yes. I’ve seen pictures of them, too. Knew about the vasectomy, and why, also.”

Diane looks a bit surprised at that. She still doesn’t know why. She supposes she doesn’t need to know, either. “Good. I found out about them by going through his stuff. I never heard him speak their names.” She thinks about that. “Actually, I don’t think I ever have. Talked to him a little about it years later, he went mute, just staring at me. When we were married, he had a picture of her in his wallet, their wedding picture. The ring was in his sock drawer with his medals. He was never married to me.”

Abbi nods at that, too. She’s not sure about the picture, if it’s not in his wallet, she’s sure he’s got a version of it on his phone, but that doesn’t bother her. There are pictures of her and the rest of the family in there, too. She knows the ring is with Shannon and Kelly.

Diane’s looking her over. “Question is, is he ever going to be married to you?”

Abbi nods again. “Yeah.”

Diane smiles at that.
Gibbs is waiting, four blocks behind the Blue Nissan Leaf, wondering where this is going to go next.

“Keep digging until you can’t dig anymore.” That’s Tim’s rule 70, or something like that. He takes his phone out. You guys have bugs right? He sends off to Tim and Tony.

Of course. Shows up from Tony a minute later. Need one?

Wouldn’t mind. You in the office all on your own today?

I am right now. Draga’s supposed to show up sooner or later. Bishop’s pretending to be a transfer student at Emily’s school. Something to be said for her looking fifteen.

Gibbs smiles at that. Change her fashion a bit, and Bishop probably could pass for a high school senior. Later. He’s giving Abbi a lift to CGIS HQ, then he’s got Diane.

What are you up to? Shouldn’t you be home? Pops up from Tim.

I’m tailing Diane’s tail. Even I’m healthy enough to drive.

Okay. He can feel the ‘don’t exert yourself too hard’ that’s coming from Tim.

I’m fine.

Uh huh. From Tony. What do you want a bug for?

Easier to tail someone if he can’t make me.

Good point. He’s going to CGIS HQ? Tony asks.

He should be.

Then make sure he catches you. I’ll get his car.

They don’t have an ID on him. Hoping for prints and photos.

Just get him out of the car. I’ve got the rest. Tony sends.

How are you going to get him out? Tim asks.

He’s tailing my girlfriend. I’ll go be a jerk about it.

With your oxygen tank? Tim adds. Maybe right now isn’t the best moment to play up the Alpha Male routine. No bodies in autopsy, right?

He’s free, he’s not walking wounded like Gibbs and I, he’s not the guy who had to t-bone a perp with a car to handle himself any more, and unlike the rest of us, he doesn’t exactly look like a cop.

What am I going to do? Pops up from Jimmy a second later.

He’s moving. Gibbs adds, shifting his car into drive, waiting a few more breaths, and pulling into traffic. A second later he’s got a three way Skype call up. Jimmy and Tony are on one screen. Tim’s on another, and he’s on the third.

“What have you two volunteered me for?” Jimmy asks.

“Trying to ID the driver of the IRS motor pool car who’s tailing Diane,” Tim fills in.

Jimmy sighs, looking from the image of Tim to Gibbs. “Don’t you guys have like, photo recognition software or something to do that? I get you’re both a little bored with life in the office, but that doesn’t mean you need to send me out to get killed.”

Tony’s looking irked, and Tim and Gibbs are both mildly chagrinned. Tony nods. “Keep a subtle eye on him. I’ll get to HQ and grab pics.” He pokes Jimmy. “He should be in the IRS employee database. Tim?”

“Yeah, I’ll make sure Abby’s got access to it to check.”

It’s boring. Whoever’s driving doesn’t expect Diane to have noticed him, and he’s not being subtle at all. He’s just trailing along. Plain as day, really visible, might as well have a sign above his head saying, “LOOK I’M FOLLOWING YOU!”

That gets Gibbs eyes open. After all, there are two ways to follow someone, so they never see you, or so they see nothing but you.

He knows Tony’s moving into place to get shots of the driver. He calls again. “He’s way too obvious about this.”

“Think there’s another tail somewhere?” Tony asks, immediately getting where Gibbs is going with this.

“Keep an eye out for one.”

“Got it. Give Tim a call. He can get the street cameras and see if anyone else is keeping track of you guys.”

Gibbs nods, a moment later he’s got Tim on the phone, explaining what he and Tony are thinking.

“I’m on it. If I find someone, want me to mess with them?”

“Just shoot it over to Fornell.”

“On it, Boss.”

Gibbs smiles a little, feels good to hear that again.

Completely uneventful drive. Mr. Leaf, as Gibbs has taken to thinking of him, does a very standard no messing around job of tailing Diane. Straight to CGIS HQ. Diane and Draga linger for a moment after dropping Abbi off.

Gibbs takes that moment to look around, but he can’t see Tony anywhere. No hint of him.

But, a few seconds after he pulls away from CGIS HQ, following Mr. Leaf, who is following Diane and Draga, Tony calls. “Got him. Abby’s got the photo, as well as Fornell, now it’s just who pulls it up faster.”

“Thanks, Tony.”

“No problem. I’m heading back. Once Draga’s in, we’ll give his car another one over. Make sure no one’s keeping an eye on him.”

“He’s on Diane, right?”

“As much as he can be without giving away that he’s not just being her boyfriend. Fornell tells me he’s getting someone into her place and his, checking throughout, seeing if anyone’s got eyes on them.”

Gibbs shakes his head at that. He wouldn’t want to be going through their homes. He supposes there are some perks to being retired. “McGee’s checking the traffic camera footage.”

“I’ll go see what he’s got. You go home and rest.”

“I get enough of that from him and Jimmy, don’t need it from you, too.”

Tony laughs. “Your redhead is safe at work. Diane’s got her own redhead watching her back. Fornell’s has Bishop watching her. They’re all good. Unless you want to go wrangle more warrants, there’s nothing to do.”

Gibbs thinks about that. “I can get warrants.”

“You want to get warrants?” Tony can count the number of times Gibbs didn’t flog that off onto one of the three of them on one hand.

“What else am I going to do? Go shoot the breeze with Bleach for a bit, get you paper to cover those accounts.”

“Have fun.”

“Bet you didn’t think retirement was going to be this exciting,” Bleach says as Gibbs heads into his chambers.

“I was thinking more boat-building and less getting shot.”

Bleach smiles at that. “Was glad to hear you were going to pull through. We’re too damn old to be getting shot at anymore.”

Gibbs inclines his head. “Not going to argue about that.”
“So, what’s got you over here? Not my pretty face.”

“Some of your pretty paperwork. You saw how deep Abbi’s fun went?”

“Yeah. Been catching it on ZNN.”

“Tip of the iceberg. Abbi got an anonymous tip…” Gibbs gets Bleach up to date.

“Something corrupt at the IRS, color me shocked,” Bleach says in complete deadpan. “I can write you warrants for those account numbers, for Diane’s Boss, too, if you want. How about you guys don’t get locked into a building and shot at this time?”

Gibbs rolls his eyes. “Part of the job, you know?”

Bleach looks at where his legs used to be. “Yeah, I know. Here’s something else I know, the CGIS mess is getting a lot of attention, and the higher ups don’t want that, not right now. Not with the convention over and everyone gearing up for the election.”

Gibbs grits his teeth, he heard all about that shit with John McGee. He doesn’t want Bleach singing him another verse of it.

“They really don’t want more crap with the IRS, not with all the shit that came out about them not following the rules about keeping track of stuff, and really not with what came out once they found the stuff they weren’t keeping track of. They were able to palm that off as a few bad apples. So, I am going to make a suggestion to you. Take these,” he touches the warrants he’s filling out, “go in quiet, find your information, and then have your director have a chat with the other higher ups. My guess is you’ll get a hell of a lot more cooperation and people quietly falling on swords if you offer to handle this off the books.”

“You think anything’ll get better if it’s handled quietly?”

Bleach shrugs. “I think an offer of handling things quietly is going to go a long way towards making sure you guys stay alive.”

Gibbs eyes narrow at that. He knows it’s not a threat, this is someone who’s played the game a long time giving him a rational assessment of what’s at stake. Then another thought hits him. “Did you send those numbers?”

Bleach shakes his head. “I’ve seen two of them pop up on other cases. Drug trafficking and terrorism, but I’m not your letter writer.”

That settles on Gibbs’ gut just fine. Bleach isn’t BSing him.

“One other bit of advice, if you’re going up against the IRS, get your money out of the banks before you move. As soon as they notice you’re trouble, your assets freeze, and no bank is going to fight them, because if they do, their assets freeze. I’ve seen them go so far as to get CPS to take people’s kids.”

Money… That’s not too scary for Gibbs. Kids…

“Grandkids?”

“Never seen it, but… They’ve rigged the game so basically everyone is breaking at least one of their laws, and unlike you and I, they get to accuse first and make the case second. First thing that happens is you’re in trouble, and they grab every bit of leverage against you they can, then they go through your taxes with a fine tooth comb, then they find something…”

“Get ready to hole up and hide while this one’s going down.”

Bleach nods. “Or offer to do it quiet-like.”

Gibb has never been a huge fan of quiet-like. “You gonna back us if we don’t go quiet?”

Bleach smiles. “I didn’t leave half of me in the desert so people back here could build up their own untouchable, unaccountable fiefdoms. Go find your windmills, and I’ll help you tilt at them.”

Gibbs smiles back at him. “Gonna be a hell of a ride.”

“That’s why we’re here, right? We loved the ride.”

Gibbs nods.

“Let’s get you some warrants.”

Gibbs has an idea as he’s heading toward his bank. Actually, he has several, but one trumps all the others.

If Diane is right about cash not really mattering, and if the IRS works the way his guys do, then… Then they don’t have someone show up at your bank and pull the cash out of your account. They send some sort of electronic document to someone, and that someone clicks a button, and suddenly you’ve got no money.

But…

If he knew someone who was handy with a computer, and say, someone who knew how the IRS sent those notices out. Then… maybe it would be possible to set it up so the IRS just thought they’d frozen the accounts without actually freezing them.

So, instead of pulling out all of his money, he cashes a check for a grand, makes a crack about losing a bet to the teller, and then drives like an idiot, stopping at green lights, turning from the wrong lane, swerving around, (proving that if anyone is tailing him, they’re very good at it) before heading to NCIS.

He heads over to Leon’s office, and instead of just barging in, waits patiently for him to have a few minutes free. (His secretary is staring at him in wonder. To the best of her knowledge the only time Gibbs had ever waited to go in was when Leon locked the door from the inside. Granted part of it is trying to look like he’s just stopping by to visit, part of it is the driving all over the place actually is more tiring than he expected and having a few minutes to just sit and rest are good.)

“Jethro?” Leon looks a bit surprised to see him sitting there as he’s seeing someone (Older, important looking man, not military, Gibbs doesn’t know him) out.

“Got a minute?”
“Was going to get a cup of coffee. I wouldn’t mind company.”

Gibbs nods at that, stands up, pulls on the O2 tube, and then Leon says, “Or maybe,“ he looks to his secretary, and she smiles, nodding at his office, “coffee could come to us?”

Gibbs inclines his head, not wanting to be thankful for that, but he is.

Leon ushers him into his office, toward the sofa. “Sit down before I end up with both McGees and Palmer in here barking at me for letting you over exert-yourself.”

Leon looks him over more carefully. Gibbs is looking a little gray, and not just his hair. His lips are not nearly pink enough and his skin is looking grayish. Gibbs sees it. “I’m fine.”

“Your color doesn’t get better in two minutes and Dr. Palmer will be up here.”

He turns on the O2. “Let me get my breath. Done more today than in the last two weeks.”

“And it’s not even noon,” Leon says.

“Boring two weeks.”

“They’re supposed to be boring when you’re healing. So, what sort of mischief are you up to?”

Gibbs hands over a thumb drive. “Figured you’d be in a good place to get these to the people who need them. Warrants.”

“Good.”

“The judge who gave them to me gave me a heads up. Go against the IRS at your own risk.”

Leon nods, he understands the warning.

“I’m going to sit here a bit, catch my breath, and then go visit Tim. Might be that risk can be minimized.”

“I don’t want to know what you’re going to ask him to do, do I?”

“I’d really doubt it.”

Leon laughs at that.

Jethro takes Leon’s warning about not looking good seriously. Because he knows if he does go wandering down looking like he’s anything other than in the prime of health (or as close as he can get) a McGee or Palmer (depending on who is the least busy right now) will nag him until he allows one of them to drive him home, and then leave him stranded there because they’ll take their own car.

So, he spends more than a few minutes in Leon’s office, waiting until he is feeling as good as he gets right now, and then begins a much slower than he’d like mosey toward the elevator.

Feels good to be in that elevator again. He flicks it off, just to flick it off, smirks at that, and then heads all the way down to Tim’s basement.
“Hey!” Tim says, hopping (and that actually looked pretty close to a real hop) up when he noticed Gibbs standing in his doorway. “Abby call you in?”

“Not yet. I’m giving her a bit longer to work the facial recognition.”

“Okay. So…” He’s closing the door behind Gibbs, and sitting in the chair next to the one Gibbs is in.

“I got warrants for everything.”

“Bleach came through?”

“Exactly. He had a concern. The IRS plays dirty. Freeze your assets if you go up against them.”

Tim thinks about that. “Not just them. We’ve done it, too.”

“How?”

One of Tim’s jobs on Gibbs’ team was to handle any and all of the financial matters. That isn’t exactly what he trained for, but it is close, and mostly just required the ability to deal with numbers and computers. He’s not a wizard with a financial statement, but he is better with one than he is with, say, a major mass spectrometer.

“You get a court order, and then send it to the bank. If everything’s in order, they freeze the assets and let you know know if anyone tries to access them.”

“Yeah. How?”

Tim squints at Gibbs.

“Fax a form? Email? Is there a screen on their website? Do you call someone?”

Gibbs has never shown the least interest in how Tim actually does this stuff, so he’s quite surprised to be asked this. “Why?”

“Because if we’re going up against the IRS we either need to pull enough cash out of our funds to hold out for as long as our money might be gone, or, I need to know if you can make sure the IRS can’t do it to us.”

Tim starts to think. “When I was doing it, it was usually a call followed by faxing over the court order. Then they’d double check, make sure the order was legit, and then the bank freezes stuff.”

“So you can’t magic that away with your computer?”

Tim shakes his head. “I can have Leon try a pre-emptive strike on our banks. Letting them know that they need to be on the lookout for an IRS strike, and that they have to pretend to comply, but not actually do it. I can guarantee you that’s not going to work well. No bank manager anywhere is going to take our word over the IRS. I can move our money, get it wired somewhere the IRS can’t touch. I’m sure Senior can loan us an account number or two, and I can bury how the money got there, but our banks will be required to report that we’re moving money around if we suddenly start major transfers.”

“Think Diane can run a pre-emptive strike? Say she’s with IRS IA, something like that…”

Tim thinks about that. “Worth a shot. Not sure if she’ll have any more luck than Leon will. Without a court order… Bleach could do one…” Tim glances at the clock. “Looks like you’ve got a lunch date to make.”

Gibbs nods. “It does.” He stands up.

Tim does, too, reaching for his wallet. “Does your card have a limit?”

Gibbs nods.

Tim thinks for a second, and pulls his main credit card. “Buy prepaid credit cards with it. Three thousand for me, two for you—“

“I don’t—“

“Just buy them. Abby and I’ll sleep better knowing you’ve got liquid money and it’s not just a huge wad of cash. Get Jimmy and Tony’s cards, too. If Diane can’t pull it off, let me know, I’ll start shuffling money around.”

“Okay.”

“Wha’d’ya got for me Abbs?”

“Oh my God! Gibbs!” She’s about to bound into him for a hug when she sees how tired he’s looking, and tones it down to an enthusiastic but gentle hug. “I’d forgotten how much I missed that.”

He smiles at that. “No Caf-Pow.”

“Couldn’t drink it even if you brought it.” Her fingers rest on Sean for a moment. “I think he’s napping.”

“Starting to feel him move?” his hand finds her belly, too.

“Nah, just getting a snooze-y vibe.”

Gibbs smiles at that, and then looks up at the screen as the techs around them watch on in amazement. “So…”

Abby shakes her head. “You know how it goes. I thinned the field as much as I could, but the IRS has like a gazillion employees. What I can tell you is the first thinning I did was limiting it down to just the DC offices. No dice. This guy is not one of their regulars. Beyond that…”

Gibbs sighs. “Waiting.”

“Waiting.”

“Get lunch with me?” Gibbs says to Diane as he leans against her door, looking her up and down, eyes hot on her. He intentionally did not bring his O2 with him for this and has been nice and smiley to everyone he’s walked (slowly) past.

She looks up, stunned to see him in her office. “Leroy?”

He does that little charming smile of his. “Lunch?” he asks, voice low, mostly so he doesn’t need a lot of air for it, but two of the ladies in the hall see/hear it and he knows from how they’re looking at him that they’re reading it as sexy.

They look jealous of Diane. He’s glad to know he’s still got it.

“Um… Sure.” Diane doesn’t look like she can believe he’s doing this. She rolls her eyes a bit as she gets up out of her chair.

He heads in to her office, takes her jacket off the hook, and holds it open for her. “Looking pretty today.”

“Are you flirting?”

He smiles again, hand gently on her low back, leading her out. She notices how many people are strolling around the hall, and understands exactly what he’s doing. Then he leans in and says, voice low, “You’re liking it, right?”

Diane smiles back at him, and kisses his cheek. “Lovely.”

He takes her hand as they head out of the office.

“That was cute, Leroy,” Diane says as soon as she’s in his car.

He slumps into his seat and hooks up the O2. Even walking slowly, he’s feeling it. He hates this, but once he’s done with lunch with her and Fornell, he’s got to go get a nap or something. For a few seconds he just breathes, and then says, “Figured you’ve got a pretty steady stream of ‘friends’ who like to take you to lunch.”

She smirks. “More than a few, not sure it counts as a ‘steady stream.’ Got something interesting for me?”

He nods. Then takes another minute to just breathe.

“Should I be driving?”

“I’m fine.”

“Oh yeah, you look it.”

“First day working since I got hurt. It’s slow.”

She just stares at him.

“I’m slow. I’ll get us there. Fornell’s waiting.”
“All three of us?”

Gibbs nods, saving his air as he puts the car into drive. He can sense there’s something Diane wants to pick at, but she’s not getting into it.

“What?”

She shakes her head. “When you can breathe and talk at the same time.”

“Not about this mess?”

She shakes her head. “No.”

“Abbi?”

Now Diane looks exasperated. “Do you actually want to talk to me?”

“Can feel you gnawing on something. Worried.”

“Fine. How’d that probie of yours, Shepard, turn out?”

That takes Gibbs back. Now he’s wondering what the hell they got into on that car ride that’s got her thinking about Jen. But, obviously, it’s not about Abbi, so… “Dead. Eight years now.”

“Oh.” That takes a lot of wind out of Diane’s sails. “Sorry. Must have been hard.”

He nods. “Been a long time.”

“Were you there?”

He shakes his head. “Was my Boss by then, told me not to go, told Tony and Ziva to back off, ended up in a Mexican standoff. Duck tells me that was faster and cleaner than what would have happened if whatever was wrong ran it’s course, but…” He shakes his head again. “Haven’t thought about that in a while.”

That string of pronoun free sentences puts the wind back in Diane’s sails. “So, are you so used to lying to me you physically can’t tell me the truth about her, or are you looking to stay out of trouble?”

Now he’s looking confused. “Not lying.” Everything he said had been true.

“No pronouns! Ever. You can imagine how surprised I was to find out your little Probie was another tall, thin redhead!”

He opens and closes his mouth. He knows it was intentional back when they were married. He didn’t noticed he’d done it again. “Everything with her happened after we were divorced.”

“You were thinking about it from day one!” Diane says, pointedly. “That’s why she was only Probie or Shepard. You knew I’d jump on you if you mentioned another woman you were interested in.”

He shrugs. That’s true. “What’s got you on Jen?”

“Oh, she’s got a first name.”

Now he flashes her his we haven’t been married for almost twenty years look.
“And there’s good reason for that!”

He rolls his eyes. Should have kept quiet.

“You don’t pull that shit on Abbi!”

Oh, come on! is clear on his face.

“Don’t give me that look. That woman is way better than you deserve, so don’t you fuck around with her. None of your keeping secrets crap.”

“I’m not keeping secrets with her.”

“Good.”

He supposes he should say he’s sorry for all the lies he told her, but that seems like way too little way too damn late. “Should have told you Jen’s name.” That’s a bit more relevant.

Diane nods.

“Breakfast and lunch?” Tobias says when Gibbs and Diane meet him.

“Don’t get too used to it,” Gibbs says. “Got a few things. We clear?”

Fornell nods. He picked the place, all communications on it going from him to Gibbs. Only way someone watching Diane could have caught it was to follow them, and Gibbs didn’t see any tails. (And once again, he drove like a flaming idiot. Diane was getting ready to light into him about her needing to be driving when he finally explained something he was doing. Then she nodded and shut up about it.) “On my end. Yours?”

Gibbs nods. “Unless they’re invisible.”

“No one’s that good,” Fornell says.

“We haven’t found out who’s following you, yet,” Gibbs says. Though, on the way here, her tail wasn’t there.

Fornell shakes his head. “Zip for us. Abby’s telling you the same thing, I’d bet, the computers only go so fast and there are lots of IRS employees.”

Gibbs nods. He shows Diane the pictures Tony got. “Know him?”

She shakes her head.

“Abby says the first run through they limited it to DC IRS employees, he’s not one of them.”

“Stolen plates?” Diane asks.
“Not reported. My guys got into your motor pool requisitions, and the car that plate is supposed to be attached to never moved. Haven’t been able to get in to check the actual car, yet. Supposedly we’ll be able to do that this evening. So… Sending a message?”

“We’re watching you, but we won’t get caught?” Diane asks.

“Maybe,” Fornell says. He takes a sip of his drink while Diane and Gibbs order, quickly. A moment later, they’ve got drinks, too. Once the waitress has left, Fornell asks, “So, what do you have?”

“Talked to Bleach… Pet judge.” Gibbs can see both of them have no idea who or what Bleach is. “He reminded me that IRS doesn’t play fair, and that if we want to stay flush, we need to protect our money. Talked to Tim, he was hoping that if you got a court order, you could make sure our bank accounts stay safe.”

Diane thinks about it. “Probably. Can you get me a court order?”

“I can get a don’t mess with these accounts, no matter what, type of order. Can you make sure they follow it?”

“Depends on the bank. Tell me you guys are mostly with the Federal Credit Union, and we’re golden. Devon Chander, the President, and I go way back,” Diane says.

“We’ve all got at least a checking account there. McGee can get our money moved. Tobias?”

Fornel nods. “I can shift it around.”

Gibbs has his phone out and is writing a text to Bleach, letting Diane read off of his screen as he does it. “You and Murray’ll get it sorted out.” Diane takes Gibbs phone out of his hands and starts to text on her own. Faster and easier if she talks directly to the man who’ll be giving her what she needs to get this done.

“Tim suggested buying some prepaid credit cards, too.”

Fornell understands that. Almost as good as cash, and if you don’t want to tip your bank off, better.

They eat quietly, and quickly, business pretty much done, but as they’re wrapping up, Gibbs’ phone buzzes. It’s a text from Abby. No match. Don’t know who your trail is, but he doesn’t work for the IRS. Running wider search. If he’s in a database, we’ll find him.

Gibbs is beyond frustrated when he gets home. First off he’s exhausted. It’s been six hours since he got up and he literally cannot go any more. Once upon a time, literally cannot go any more meant it was day three or four of a case, not six fucking hours.

Second of all, they screwed the pooch. Tony only got pictures of the tail because they all assumed he worked for the IRS. No prints. No DNA. And nothing is slower than unfiltered facial recognition software. The only good thing is that it’s a clear shot of the driver’s face. No glasses, beard, hat, nothing in the way.

Third of all, he crashes onto the sofa, but it’s Abbi’s sofa, so it doesn’t feel right, and pain goes shooting through his ribs and chest and arm because none of those parts of him want him crashing into anything, even a sofa.

Mona’s pleased to see him. She pads over, nose on his shoulder, nuzzling him gently.

And even with all of that, he’s asleep in less than two minutes.

“This can’t be right.”

“Diane?” Eric asks. It’s after hours, later than she wants to be working, but the job calls, so she’s doing it. At NCIS HQ. At Ziva’s desk, using the secure system McGee set up for her.

“There’s nothing here.”

He pulls up his chair and sits next to her. “Did you type the number in right?”

She glares at him, and types again. Nothing. Not a trace. There’s not a single case attached to that account number. Yesterday it was raising red flags all over, today it’s gone.

She tries the second, third, and fourth numbers, same thing.

They’re all gone.

She searches for any scrap of information of any case related to those numbers. They’re gone, too. Completely. Nothing at all.

Vance is hovering behind her shoulder before she’s even finished with the last of the account numbers.

She looks up at him. “They’re gone. Everything… The routing number for the bank that goes with the two of them, gone.”

Vance doesn’t immediately get that.

“Director, if the routing number doesn’t attach to anything anymore, that means in less than twenty-four hours two banks we’ve spent years trying to take down just vanished.”

Now Vance gets it.

Diane rubs her head, and finds a pad of paper, and writes down three names. The only members of that one Board that were all on the no-fly list she can remember. “They used to be on the no fly list, IRS most wanted, FBI was hunting for them on money laundering, the DEA wanted them for that, too.”

Vance slides over to Draga’s desk as he begins typing in names. None of them come up. There are no matching files, no flags on them, there’s no proof any of them ever existed. No birth records, no tax records, no passports or credit cards or anything.

By now Leon’s pulling out his phone. He’s calling in his own favors.

It takes three days for DiNozzo, Draga, Bishop, and Fornell to go through everything Vance pulled, all the communication logs of the top ten people at the IRS. Their work lines, personal lines, those email accounts no one is supposed to know about. He thinks he got them all, and there wasn’t a single bit of communication to anyone out of the usual about anything untoward.

Four days in, there’s no match on the driver, and given how thoroughly everything else vanished, they aren’t holding out any hope for finding him.

Somehow, in less than thirty hours, everything on those accounts vanished.

So did Diane’s tail. It was almost like, as soon as he got made, and the people working with her were focused on finding him, his job was done, so he buggered off. When they checked, the license plate was exactly where it was supposed to be, on an IRS motor pool car.

Everyone involved with the case got the message loud and clear. You will never prove anything about this.

But that didn’t mean any of them liked it.
Heading back up to DC from his meeting with Admiral Finnegan, the guy in charge of these tests, has Mike impressed.

And distressed.

Impressed: apparently Tim McGee is the real deal. Finnegan refers to him as ‘Tim’ and lit up talking about what ‘Tim’s’ been doing. Though he’s not hands-on with the test any longer, he is getting bi-weekly updates as to what they’re doing, and is continuing to send off good suggestions for shaking the tests up further. (And yes, it was specifically one of his suggestions that ended up with Mike in a car driving north from Norfolk, thinking about all of this. Though it’s true that Tim had no idea he’d end up scooping Mike into his net.)

Distressed: apparently the only reason he got this level of access to talk to someone about what was going on was to prevent him from grousing about it with his brother and getting that version of the story.

Had he been Captain Anyone Else, getting on the horn and yelling about what the fuck had just happened would have resulted in a cold shoulder and some comments about how in the future it’d be a good idea to make sure that orders that appear in his email, no matter who they appear to be from, get double checked.

(It was somewhat satisfying to find out that he was not, exactly, the target of the test. Commandant Jenner, Mike’s Boss, who is in charge of security for consulates all over the world, had his system hacked. Tim’s addition to the test was to not just break into Jenner’s system, but to make in abundantly clear what could happen if said system was hacked. Thus, US Embassies all over the world ended up running “evacuation exercises.”)

But he’s not Captain Anyone Else. He’s Captain Michael McGee. His brother screwed a whole rescue shelter full of pooches on the first test, and, apparently, everyone with a high enough clearance knows about it. Add in his nephew designed the test he got caught in, and he gets a bit more hand-holding than Captain Anyone Else would have.

Finnegan referred to what happened with the first test as “unfortunate,” and that said, “misfortune” had required that all following tests would have to be done from remote locations. Though that level of “misfortune” would be unlikely to happen again, a witch hunt snapping up the person who is supposed to be monitoring the fallout from the test wouldn’t be impossible.

Finnegan was extremely diplomatic about the whole thing, making it sound like some sort of bizarre accident occurred in which no one was responsible, but Mike grew up swimming in Navy-politics-speak water. It’s his second language. He knows the codes, and he knows that anyone who gets to his level, let alone Finnegan’s, knows that if it happens on your command, it’s your fault.

So, in a very polite sort of way, he gets that no one who knows what actually happened buys the idea that Mane just snapped. They know what happened; they know who ordered it; they just can’t prove it.
He supposes, on the ride home, that it’s comforting to think that his Mom didn’t just go bonkers on this. That she isn’t overreacting.

It’s distressing as hell to think that he never caught wind of it. Okay, sure, he and John didn’t exactly live in each other’s pockets, but still… Not a single clue. If his own brother was pulling shit like this, what has Mike missed about the people around him?

He’s grabbing a bite in Richmond, and decides to see if he can get Tom, his younger brother, on the phone. It’s a beyond long shot, and he’s not even sure what he’d say to him, but… He wants to talk to someone else who knows John.

He hits Tom’s contact number, which doesn’t actually get Tom.

The thing about Tom McGee is this, he’s either right in front of you, in which case you know where he is, or he’s not, and you don’t, and you don’t try to find out, either.

It’s possible he’s at home, in Kyoto, with his wife and kids. It’s not likely.

Commander Tom McGee runs a Navy Seal team. (Probably. He became a SEAL in the ’83. They have no reason to think he stopped being a SEAL.) Mike’s not even sure of what exactly Tom’s rank is, let alone what precisely he does. He thinks, given that Tom’s home is in Japan, that whatever it is he does, he does it somewhere in North East Asia, but that’s an educated guess. Even John doesn’t know what Tom does. “Compartmentalized,” was all John would say about that when they get talking about Tom. (Hell, even Mom, who knows everything, doesn’t know where Tom goes when he does whatever it is he does.)

No luck. The voice on the other end of the phone says, “Commander McGee is in the field now. Would you like to leave a message?”

“Sure. Tell him Mike called, give me a call back when he’s got a minute. Any idea when that minute might be?”

“I’m sorry, I couldn’t say,” the voice says, patient and polite.

Mike nods. “Of course. Thanks.”

“No problem, sir.”

Mike heads back to the car he’s borrowing from the Navy motor pool. He’s been debating showing up for Shabbos and meeting the rest of the family, or heading straight home, or heading home with a stop in Pearl to see John.

Right now he half wants to find John, grab him by the throat, and make him explain how this could have happened. Half of him wants to head on home and see his family. He checks in with Andrews. That makes up his mind for him, no transport going anywhere remotely near home until midnight.

Time to meet the rest of the family, then.

After the week they’ve had, getting to Shabbos feels immensely good.
The weather’s cooperating, beautiful early September, skies blue, air warm, frogs and crickets singing away as the sun slips down. Tim had invited Sarah and Glenn along for Shabbos, so it’s at their place this week.

He’s got Kelly on his hip while he lights the torches on their porch. She’s trying to reach for the flames. “Pretty!”

“They are pretty.” Tim tucks his lighter into his kilt pocket, holds her very securely against his chest, and carefully holds her hand out so it’s near, but not touching, the flame. “Hot! No touching!”

Kelly’s looking startled by how hot the fire is. She’s nodding her head, and he steps back so her palm’s not getting toasted.

“Some pretty things we don’t touch.”

“No touch!”

“Good girl.” He smiles at her, takes a few steps over, pulls his lighter out, begins to light the next torch, and she immediately leans into it, trying to grab the flames. Once more he steps back. “No touching.”

She’s still leaning toward the flame as she says to him, “No touch.”

He sighs, putting her on the porch, kissing the top of her head. “You are your mother’s daughter.”

Kelly looks up at him, not getting that at all, and then stands up on wobbly little feet, and begins to toddle over toward the table to see what mischief she can get into there.

“So, there’s just nothing?” Breena’s asking Abby as they’re laying plates on the table and Abby picks up Kelly (who’s trying to yank the tablecloth off the table).

“No grabbing,” Abby says to Kelly, then to Breena, “Nothing. Single most frustrating case we’ve ever run.”

Breena looks at Tim who’s lighting the grill. “Nothing?”

Tim glares in her direction. “Nothing. I’ve been through their data up and down, nothing. I can’t even see where they messed with their stuff to get to nothing. Abbi’s guys were morons. These guys aren’t.”

Jimmy heads out of the kitchen, platter with salmon fillets on it in his hands. “Even Leon’s pissed. Apparently whoever wrote that note expected Abbi and Gibbs to go in guns blazing again, grab everything before anyone knew they were on the trail, and it didn’t happen. So, now the trail is gone. We get another note, it’s going straight through CGIS or NCIS, no one else lays hands on it.”

Tim’s nodding. “Once again, unlike Abbi’s idiots, everything on this was electronic. From what we can tell there aren’t any paper files to even look for, let alone find.”

“What about those numbers with CGIS? That’s why Abbi got the note, right? There’s still something with that…” Breena leads.
“Her forensic accountant’s best guess is that killing entire quarters of data was to make sure that whatever happened with those accounts vanished. They’re slowly recovering some of the data, but what do you want to bet that there’ll be nothing about those numbers in it?” Tim says.

Breena nods. “How’s Gibbs doing with this?”

They hear a car pull up, and another. “Might find out in a second,” Abby says.

“Hello!” Penny’s voice calling out.

“We’re in the back,” Breena replies.

A second later, they see Penny and Ducky, who they expect, along with a tall, somewhat older fellow, who’s triggering some faint memories for Tim, and looks uncannily familiar to Abby and Breena, who keep staring between him and Tim with wide eyes, but none of them know who he is.

Tim’s still eyeing him, knowing he’s got to know this guy… and then… “Uncle Mike?”

Mike McGee grins at him. “Mom said you’d have room for an extra.”

They do the usual hugs and hellos with Penny and Ducky. Tim and Jimmy shake his Uncle’s hand, while Breena and Abby go for hugs, and then introduce each of the girls, who get appropriate petting and all three of them are declared to be the most darling little girls in the history of little girls. Molly beams at that. It doesn’t mean anything to Kelly or Anna.

Tim’s still staring at him. “Aren’t you in… Japan?”

“That’s Tom’s base. I’m out of Australia.”

“You’re a far flung group, aren’t you?” Jimmy says.

“Dad used to say McGees were like sunshine on the ocean, scattered all over the waves, but leading to one central point.”

“What’s the central point?” Abby asks.

Mike looks around. “Here, I guess. The US. We scattered in the service of this country, so…” he shrugs a bit. Australia is home for him, and has been for a long time. But serving the US is how he got there.

“What brings you here?” Tim asks. He thinks he saw his Uncle… has to be more than twenty years ago.

“Believe it or not, you do. Indirectly, at least.”

Now Tim’s looking at him curiously.

“Penny says it’s okay to talk shop here.”

Tim shrugs at that. “Sarah and Glenn will be here.” He’s indirectly asking his grandmother, who appears to know this story, if it’s okay for them to hear it.

Penny nods. “Should be fine. Sarah knows the rules, and I think Glenn understands, too.”

“Then if you don’t mind, I’ll save the story for dinner.” Mike says with a smile, “I’ve been told it’s a good one.”
If Mike McGee was at all flustered to see his nephew in a kilt sporting a wide array of body art in addition to nail polish, he didn’t show it. Likewise, Abby’s tattoos didn’t seem to bug him. Of course, unlike John, who, as best as Tim could remember, didn’t own clothing that wasn’t a uniform, Mike, off duty, is in a pair of beat-up khakis, flip flops, and a Hawaiian shirt that all but made Tony drool.

They spent several happy minutes reminiscing about Magnum PI. (Apparently, also unlike The Admiral, Mike has interests outside of the Navy, and once upon a time Magnum was one of them.) Mike asking if Tony had ever gotten out to Honolulu, Tony talking about how he’d only been there twice and for less than a day each time. (Tim sees Ziva’s eyes light at that, and wonders if they’re going to try and grab a few days off at Christmas or something. Go see the big island before traveling any real distance is off the menu.)

Mike had spent all of ’88 and ’92 out of Pearl and loves Hawaii. He loves Australia more, because that’s where home is, his wife and kids, and these days, grandkids are there, but when he gets down time, he and Darla make a bee line for Hawaii.

Mike surfs, something else Tim would have never guessed. For all that they’re a Navy family, he’s never seen much proof of his family playing in the ocean. It’s all business, or at least it was in his branch. Tony body surfs, never had the time or lived in a good place to get on a board, so as Jimmy’s flipping salmon fillets on the grill, and Gibbs and Ducky put little girls down to sleep, Mike’s telling him about how Nelson first got to Hawaii in June of ’41. He learned to surf there, and taught his boys how to, too.

“Granted, the Atlantic’s not great surfing territory, but if all you’ve got is a long weekend and one board, it’s a good place to teach some little boys the basics.”

Penny smiles at that memory. “I remember that. You were… seven maybe. I think that board was twice the size of you. He got you and Tom out past the breakers, was holding the board, and you two were both standing on it. I’ve still got a picture of that. Then he let go and you zigged and Tom zagged, and the board took the wave in and both of you got a bath,” she says, chuckling, shaking her head. “That was a good weekend. Couldn’t get you boys out of the water. All si… we all came home with salt and sun blond hair and burned pink.”

“Yeah, Mom. You let us each have bottles of Coke. I remember that.” Mike looks at Tim and Abby who are listening carefully. “That was a big deal. We weren’t allowed to have it very often because it’d wreck our teeth.”

“I wasn’t wrong about that, was I?”

Mike opens and closes his mouth, holding out his hands. “Yes, Mom.” He rolls his eyes a bit, and she gently whacks his shoulder. “You had this big cooler, filled with ice, and Buds for you and Dad, and Cokes for us.”

“That’s right. You and Tom were asleep on your feet by the time we got you back to the motel. Little place, about half a mile from the beach. Didn’t think that we’d need to carry Tom, on top of everything else, back at the end of the day.”

“I remember Dad carrying Tom, and John had that cooler, looking like he was the king of useful
Penny wonders if the mention of John will make everything go tense, but it doesn’t. Mike doesn’t seem to recognize that John’s persona non-gratia here, probably because he hasn’t fully shifted his own idea of who John is.

And a second after that, it doesn’t matter. “God, sorry we’re late!” Sarah calls out as she and Glenn head around the corner of the house to the porch. “The beltway was completely… Uncle Mike? What are you doing here?”

Tim’s stunned that Sarah recognizes Mike. Best he remembers they last saw each other when she was six years old. She kisses and hugs him, then introduces him to Glenn.

“That’s a long story,” Mike says. “I’ll get into it soon. So… can I tell my girls you’ll be around again soon?”

Sarah shrugs. “Don’t have a publishing company paying my advances anymore. Right now, every dollar that’s not paying the rent is going back into the business.” The rest of them are staring at her. She knows Tim gets it, but isn’t sure about the rest of them. “Your advance is supposed to pay for any publicity you want to do. So, every book I’d set aside ten thousand dollars and go on tour somewhere. If someone’s willing to help you with travel expenses,” that’s a somewhat indirect way of saying that if she asked nicely, the Admiral didn’t have any problem with hooking her up with a Navy transport, assuming, of course, there was room. He wouldn’t boot a sailor for her, but if someone was heading that way and had an extra seat… (He never thought about the fact that there was always a free seat on any transport Admiral McGee asked for.) “It’s not too hard to get to Australia and New Zealand, and since most authors won’t go there, because it’s way out of the way and really expensive, you get a lot of happy fans and good will by going. Last three books I made sure to swing down. Aunt Darla, Susan, and Heather,” Mike’s wife, second daughter, and oldest niece, “are all fans, so I crashed with them when I was down there.”

“Oh.” Tim says.

“You write, too, right?” Mike asks.

Tim nods. “But I don’t tour. My day job’s demanding.”

Jimmy pulls the last of the salmon fillets off the grill. “Food’s ready. Show’s all yours, Penny.”

Traditionally, the oldest woman of the house runs Shabbos. So, at the DiNozzo house, that’s Ziva. Likewise, when they’ve done Shabbos at Gibbs’ house, she’s run things, too. Though, possibly Abbi will be taking that job over. At the Palmer house, Breena’s in charge.

And here, at the McGee house, it bounces between Abby and Penny.

So, tonight, Mike is having the rather surreal experience of watching his Catholic Mom light the candles and sing the prayers.

Actually, this whole thing has been surreal.

Yes, last night and this morning, he saw pictures of this whole group together. And in those pictures they were all dressed up for a wedding. So, he has a collection of images, one of which is labeled ‘Tim.’

He has a much more concrete image of a young teen, pudgy, bad skin, floppy blond hair, cute baby smile, innocent eyes, and twice his body weight in quiet sarcasm bursting out at every opportunity. That’s the real image of ‘Tim’ in his mind.

So, though he had seen a picture, he had built a mental image much more akin to a younger version of John than the guy standing in front of him. For that matter, the first second he was looking at the McGee family on the porch, he honestly wasn’t certain which of the two guys was Tim. Okay, it was unlikely he’d developed dark curly hair and glasses, but the idea that John’s son would have tattoos, black nail polish, or a kilt was something that he couldn’t fathom. Jimmy, physical disparities aside, in jeans and a t-shirt, and manning the grill (who does that at someone else’s house?) more readily fit his image of ‘Tim.’

But, Mom’s long face, Dad’s lips and sandy hair, he can see both of his parents in Tim, (and he can see both girls and Jimmy staring between the two of them, so Ducky’s comment about the two of them looking similar must be true, but Mike really doesn’t see it. He knows what he looked like at 35, and he’s fairly sure the guy in the kilt isn’t it.) so he reworks his idea of who Tim’s supposed to be, and rolls with it.

The prayers have been said, the bread broken, the wine sipped, it’s dinner time. It’s probably last week that they’ll do this after the girls go to bed until summer, so if there was going to be a dinner that didn’t have constant interruptions of the conversation to it, this was a good one.

“Okay, we’re all here and sitting down, what’s got you on this side of the world?” Sarah asks her uncle.

He smiles a little, and shakes his head a bit, then licks his lips, looking chagrined, and says, “Your brother’s really good at his job, that’s what.”

Tim looks pleased. “Glad to hear, but… I still don’t know how I summoned you here.”

“You will.” Mike rubs his eyes and takes a sip of his wine. “Monday morning, just like every other morning, I head in, I check my email. There’s a note from Commandant Jenner in my inbox. Orders for an on the fly evac test,” Tim covers his mouth and starts to laugh quietly. Mike looks at him and nods. He knows why Mike is here now, and the punchline of the story, “and that as of 08:30, i.e. twenty-six minutes from when I’d sat down, I’ve got to have the entire diplomatic corps in the air. It went on from there, where I was supposed to drop everyone off, stuff like that, but I’m not really reading because I’ve got to get everyone moving.

“A standard Evac takes three hours. And that’s supposed to be moving fast. I’m not even sure I can get the heilos fueled up and ready in twenty-six minutes. So, that’s call one. Gotta get 47 people in the air. Twenty-four minutes left. I’ve got my guys running all over the place, grabbing people and things, because if we’re evac-ing, we’re supposed to grab all of the sensitive materials, too.” Mike glares at Tim, no heat in it, but there’s a definite, you did not make my day vibe to it. Tim shrugs.

“The Ambassador, he’s got a meeting with the Prime Minister. He’s not at the consulate, so I’ve got to, personally, when I’m supposed to be running all the rest of this, get my ass over to the residence, grab him, and drag him out of a meeting they’d had on the books for weeks. While booting the Prime Minister out and into the hands of his security people. But, it’s an evac, so, really, I should be grabbing him and his guys, but they don’t want to budge. You can guess how well that went over, right?”

The rest of the table is grimacing in commiseration.

“Finally I hit the ‘I’m done’ point, and tell Abbott’s guys that they can come with us or get the hell out, but if they weren’t out of the Embassy in five minutes, I’d have them booted out. They decide to go.

“So, now I’ve got two minutes to go, I’m in the air, along with the Ambassador, and two of the other three helios have lifted off, but number four is on the ground because no one can find Tinkerbelle, the Ambassador’s wife’s daughter’s pet Chihuahua.” Now Mike is glaring at the universe in general, because that yappy, beige-colored rat almost killed him on this.

“I’m on the radio with a wailing six-year-old begging for her pet, her mom demanding loudly that they are not going anywhere without said pet, when I lucked out and Lt. Sandi had the brains to lie and say that Tinkerbelle was on her chopper, and that got the little girl and mom calmed down enough that we got them in the air.”

Nods all around, that doesn’t sound fun, but he did manage to pull off the impossible.

“The aircraft carrier that I’m supposed to be plopping everyone on is supposed to be about an hour and a half off, so once we’re in the air, I settle down and start taking stock. We got everyone, besides Tinkerbelle, out. We got almost all of the sensitive information out, too, and had the mock up version of the detonators in place. If that was a real evac, we’re supposed to blow up anything we can’t carry.”

“Sounds like you’ve got a good team,” Gibbs says.

Mike nods. “The best. Since Benghazi, I’ve run a lot of drills. Not like Canberra’s a hotbed of danger, but that’s why we need to be on alert. We’re the perfect ‘soft’ target.”

The rest of the table nods at that, too. They’ve know all about that sort of issue.

“I’m taking stock, getting status reports, making sure we got out clean, and as that’s happening, I’m watching the horizon. Eventually, I can see the ocean. Almost done, get us down, more fuel, then back we go, and I and my team get gold stars for going above and beyond. I go back to what I’m doing, but after a few more minutes I’m noticing my pilots aren’t sounding happy. Another minute and one of them is yelling at me,” The actual yell was, “Where the fuck is the goddamned fucking aircraft carrier?” but Mike’s thinking this is likely a polite group, so that gets edited, “because there are no aircraft carriers in view, and no one is responding to the radio calls.”

Tim’s still silently laughing, his shoulders shaking at this story as everyone else is still staring around, not quiet seeing the connection, yet.

“They’re trying to get anyone on the radio, and I’m calling Jenner, because that email said where the meet up was supposed to be. This would be, thousands of feet in the air, over the Pacific ocean, when I find out that Jenner has absolutely no idea what I’m talking about, that he did not, in fact, order any sort of evac and that I was clearly insane for having done so.”

Mike looks at Tim, who is doing his best to not break into full out laughing, as everyone else is still staring around, not quiet seeing the connection, yet.

“It turns out, because over the course of that day, as early morning hit in time zone after time zone, that Jenner got a lot of those calls, because someone hacked his system, and made it send out fake orders. And when I got here, to talk to Admiral Finnegan about said hack, it turns out that his team had picked Jenner’s command for the hack, and had figured out how to get into it, and that a certain person who was cced on that test, thought that was a great target and a great attack, and then suggested a tweak that’d be really funny.”

At this point they’re all looking at Tim, who is full out laughing at this. Tim finally pulls it together and says, “I had no idea I’d catch you on this. And it wasn’t just for laughs. Especially on the older guys, a…” he thinks for a moment, “tangible lesson in why this matters is important. Jenner was already known for being pretty lax in his security. This showed him where the holes were, and how badly they could be exploited. The fact that you and fourteen other embassies were scrambling about was just icing on the cake.”

“You made fourteen embassies evacuate?” Breena asks Tim.

He shrugs a bit. “That was the idea. I haven’t gotten the official report back, but from what I can tell, only six of them pulled it off. That joke turned out to be really informative, too. Two called to make sure the orders were real, but they were some of the last ones tested. We’re not sure, but they might have gotten a heads up from embassies in earlier time zones. One didn’t notice the email, period. Their guy in charge just never opened it. Six of you guys got in the air in less than an hour. The other five were still on the ground when they ran out of time. Not fun, but we learned a lot.”

Mike inclines his head at that. Just because it wasn’t a good time, doesn’t mean it wasn’t a good test.

“Does the Ambassador still want your head on a stick?” Tony asks.

“Not mine. Not anymore.” Mike looks at Tim. “Yours on the other hand…”

Tim nods. “Eh… Wouldn’t be the first time I pissed someone off. Guys ranked higher than he is like what I’m doing.”

“Yes. Admiral Finnegan says ‘Hello.’”

Tim nods at that.

“You’ve got another Uncle, right?” Jimmy asks.

Tim nods at that.

“Going to go three for three? Catch all of them?” Jimmy’s got a wicked little glint in his eye at that idea, and several of the others smirk at that.

Mike shakes his head. “No. Don’t mess with Tom. Someone messes with his command, and people die. Mess with me, and I’m annoyed. But Tom doesn’t go out unless someone’s life is on the line.”

“Yeah, we’re not doing that. The idea of these tests is to show where the holes are, not get people killed. Trying to save lives, not end them. Uncle Tom’s… he’s a SEAL right?” Tim replies.

“Best we know,” Penny answers. “He’s not allowed to talk about what he does.”

“Even Lynn doesn’t know,” Mike says.

“His wife,” Penny fills in.

“That’s got to be hard,” Sarah says. The rest of the table looks around at each other. They’ve certainly all had missions and jobs they weren’t supposed to talk about. And in most cases they’ve pulled that off, but… They can usually talk to each other.
“It is hard,” Penny says.

“Part of the job,” Breena adds.

Sarah looks at Glenn and he looks back at her. It’s really clear both of them prefer a life where they can tell the other one what they do.

Tim looks around the table and thinks about the last time one of them had a job they wouldn’t talk about. Off the top of his head, he can’t remember it. Sure, they’ll shut up if someone “outside” this trusted crew shows up, but inside, everything is a safe topic.

“What have you guys been up to this week?” Glenn asks.

He sees heads shaking all along the table. “Speaking of things we can’t talk about,” Abbi fills in.

“Seriously, though, if you feel like someone has eyes on you, get somewhere public and give one of us a call,” Tony adds. He’s mostly talking to Breena, but he wouldn’t put it past whoever ran this thing to get eyes on Tim’s extended family.

Breena nods, she already knows the drill.

This has Glenn and Sarah looking alarmed, though, they aren’t used to this sort of thing.

Ziva says, “It’s a long shot’s long shot, but… This last one was creepy, in a way we do not normally see. No bodies strung up, not gory, but…” she looks at Tony, “‘The willies,’ yes?”

“Major willies,” Tony says, shaking his head. Sarah and Glenn are not looking relieved. “‘X-File-style major conspiracy willies’, not ‘we had to go find someone’s liver in the bathtub willies.’”

That’s when Mike’s eyes go wide. Penny and Ducky had given him a primer on who everyone around him was, but that was a lot of names, a lot of details, and he doesn’t have any of them very firmly connected to any sort of backstory. However, ‘Abbi Borin, current head of CGIS’ finally connects into what he’s been seeing on the news along with conspiracy and he says, “Wait… That blow up with the Coast Guard… was that you guys?”

More nodding.

“And I’m in charge of cleaning up the mess,” Abbi says.

“And it’s a real mess?” Mike asks.

The look she gives him makes it clear that this is a bigger mess than any mess he’s ever imagined seeing.

“That bad?”

“Worse.”

Mike winces. “Sorry.”

Abby shrugs. “We’re cleaning it up. But one domino tips over and knocks over six more, and… we’re keeping our eyes open over here.”

“Sounds like it.”
It’s not too late, but Shabbos is winding down. (Gibbs and Abbi have already headed off, and Glenn and Sarah are moving in that direction, too.) Mike checks his phone (still works as a clock) and sees that he’s got to get moving soon if he’s going to get to Andrews in time.

He says his goodbyes to everyone, and… Jimmy, the one who was cooking at the grill, making him wonder who’s house he was at, says, “I’ll walk you out.”

It’s, at most, one hundred feet to his car, but Mike gets that Jimmy wants to say something to him, so… “Okay.”

So they walk. Ninety-six feet. Almost twenty-five steps. Mike waits for whatever it is Jimmy’s going to say to him. It feels odd. Out of place for a guy who wants to chat with his buddy’s uncle. (Actually that whole scenario feels odd to him.) The last time he felt like this Darla’s Dad wanted to have a chat with him, but this isn’t quite that. There’s almost a protective lover feel to this, which Mike just doesn’t know what to do with.

Once they get to his car, Jimmy quietly says, “On your way home, you’re going to see John, right?”

“I was… but… I don’t know.”

Jimmy nods. “He’s your brother, and you’ve got family memories, and good times, and I’m sure Ducky and Penny told you what happened, but it doesn’t feel real, does it. Doesn’t get you in the guts?”

Mike nods.

Jimmy pulls out his phone. There’s exactly one picture (at least that any of them have, he’s sure the medical files and the police report have a lot more) of Tim beaten to a pulp. Ziva and Tony had pulled together extremely low key 1st birthday party for Kelly a bit after they got back. Probably a month after the attack, maybe three weeks. Jimmy doesn’t remember exactly anymore.

Close enough in time that Tim couldn’t hold Kelly without help, far enough away that most of the bruises were fading.

“This is weeks later.”

Tim’s sitting on the sofa, leg stretched on a pillow, in its cast, arm in the sling, nose still swollen from the break, yellow-green bruises ring his eyes, the scar through his eyebrow scarlet. Abby’s next to him, holding Kelly, helping her open a stuffed black cow.

Mike stares at it in a sort of horrified fascination. He’s understanding what Penny meant by ‘telling people he was in a car accident.’ Mike’s never seen someone that badly beaten up. “He’s healed up well,” Mike finally says.

Jimmy nods at that. Tim has healed up amazingly well. But he’s not done, yet.

“He’s still on pain medication. Nothing prescription, unless a storm is coming in, but first thing every morning, it’s so routine I’m not even sure if he knows he’s doing it, he grabs his pills and swallows them.” It doesn’t occur to Jimmy until much, much later that it might seem odd to Mike that Jimmy knows what Tim does first thing in the morning.
One of the easiest ways to tell if Tim and Abby have an easy morning is if Tim’s got the scar through his eyebrow covered. About three quarters of the time, he does. Little brown eyeliner, a few seconds of smudging it in, and it blends in… okay. The bit that goes above and below his eyebrow needs to fade more before it’ll be invisible.

Today was not an easy morning, so the scar’s visible, shiny and pink. Tim rolled up his sleeves when he got home, like he usually does, so the scars on his hand and wrist are visible today, too. He’s home and chilling out, wearing his kilt, that means bare feet, and though he can, mostly, walk around fine without a crutch now, but his left foot still bears the marks of being crushed under someone’s boot.

Jimmy’s voice is very low as he says, “Every time I look at my… Tim, I see scars. Scars that weren’t there when he left. Scars he shouldn’t have. If you go see John, tell him Jimmy Palmer says ‘Hi.’”

“Will that mean anything to him?”

“Eventually.” Jimmy’s eyes are diamond cold and diamond hard.

Mike nods slowly, realizes that’s a promise, and feels a shiver that’s completely unrelated to the ambient temperature slip down his spine. He’s got no idea what the hell Jimmy and Tim are to each other. That’s not true; he’s got a very good idea, but he’s convinced he’s wrong about that because both of them look perfectly happy with their wives, too. And the girls are happy with each other, so, he’s got to be reading the vibe he’s getting off of Jimmy wrong, but, whatever it is that’s going on, Mike’s certain that John pissed off the wrong group of people.

Big time.

Jimmy gives him a quick wave as he pulls out, and Mike’s last view of Tim’s home involves a man with the coldest smile he’s ever seen looking like he’s imagining a particularly satisfying murder.

Driving to Andrews, Mike decides he doesn’t need to see John.

He does send him a note. Quick email. He feels sick to his stomach when he imagines what happened to Tim and how it worked out, but that doesn’t mean he wants his brother murdered.

John,

Got back east. Saw Mom and Tim. Don’t ever go back. Stay as far away as you can and watch your back.

Mike

He doesn’t expect to get a response from that, and true to form, John doesn’t send one.
Teething

Soooo tired! It’s a text from Breena on his, and Abby’s and Jimmy’s phone.

I hear that. Kelly’s teething. Tim texts back.

Anna, too. Pops up from Jimmy a second later. Woke up every forty-five minutes last night.

His phone buzzes an instant later from Abby Wince. Kelly wasn’t that bad. Every two hours.

Yuck! From Breena.

Tim’s staring at this, and something’s occurring in his sleep deprived mind. Everyone post a number from one to ten.

Tim? Jimmy writes back.

It’ll make sense in a minute.

Four From Breena.

Seven from Abby.

To ten, or can I pick ten? Jimmy asks.

Doesn’t matter at all. Tim replies.

Okay. Breena, you’ve got the short straw. How about you and Molly have a nice, quiet night at your house, and the other three of us will go to mine with the screaming babies and take care of them. Tomorrow, the three of us will draw straws or pick numbers or whatever it is you pick, and whoever wins that gets Molly and a quiet night, and the other three take care of babies, and we’ll do that until teething is over.

Tim’s cracked cases and put away killers to less applause than this idea, which guarantees at least one night of uninterrupted sleep for each adult for the duration of screaming, unhappy babies.

There’s a line from the Godfather, at least, it’s in the book. Tim’s not sure if it’s in the movie. He’s seen the movie, but likes the book a lot better. Ziva agrees with him on that. Tony, of course, thinks the movie is a matter of sheer genius and was directly downloaded by God into Coppola’s head and from there onto the screen.

Needless to say, many pleasant hours have been spent with the three of them amiably arguing about this.

The reason he’s thinking about this, as he cuddles and rocks a very fussy little girl who’s trying to chew through her frozen teething ring, is that there’s a line (in the book at least) about how life is so hard that a man needs two fathers to look out for him. Hence, the Godfather.
He’s thinking, as said fussy little girl whines and complains about her very sore gums, that parenting is so hard you also need co-parents, which is also part of the Godfather concept. Right now, his child’s godfather is walking his own daughter (who is also in an intensely bad mood with her own sore little gums) around the nursery and quietly singing to all four of them.

“Ohhh… Teething, huh?” Heather says when she comes in the next morning and finds a house full of adult zombies and unhappy babies. Then, after a very quick count, showing there are several more people in said house than normal, she says, “Teething sleep over?” looking very confused.

Abby nods, tiredly. “Three kids between the four of us… Wait, have you met Jimmy?”

“Not really.” She’s seen pictures of Jimmy, and has heard mention of him, but hasn’t met him, yet. “I’m Heather.” She extends her hand, and Jimmy shakes.

“Hi. Jimmy Palmer. This is Anna. They decided to double team us with the teething. So, one of us, last night it was Breena, gets to sleep all the way through the night with my oldest daughter, and the other three of us round-robin waking up with crabby babies.”

Tim’s petting a hot mug of decaf, not really drinking it, because it’s not going to do much, so he’s mostly just smelling it and pretending it has caffeine in it. “Tonight Breena’s on teething baby watch, and one of the rest of us gets to go to his house and sleep all night long.”

Heather nods at that. “Sounds like a really good plan.” She picks up Kelly, who is drooling intensely and giving everyone the I’m killing all of you in your sleep look. “Yes, this is an unhappy baby. Orajel not doing the job?”

The three adults laugh hollowly. “It’s good for about ten minutes,” Abby says.

“Ah.” Heather looks at the clock. She knows what time the McGees usually leave for work, and it’s a few minutes after that. They look… fairly ready to go, dressed and whatnot, but they’re moving slowly.

Jimmy catches her looking at the clock. “Yeah, we’ve got to get moving. Okay. Come on, little girl,” he picks up Anna, who is also giving everyone her Once Kelly’s done killing you all, I’m going to set fire to the corpses look, “time for daycare for you.” He’s tired enough that he just walks over and kisses both Abby and Tim (on the lips), and then heads off.

Tim and Abby are tired enough that they don’t notice anything odd about that, either.

Heather, who is not remotely tired, watches that with high eyebrows, but doesn’t say anything.

It’s a little past nine when Tim (and Abby and Jimmy) get a text from Breena. It’s a link with one comment attached, Post your results.

Tim clicks the link, a random number generator. It’s already set for 1 to 250. He clicks the button and gets 247.

So he posts it, along with, Good night?

Yeah, but I know you guys didn’t have one, so I don’t want to boast.

Tim nods at that. Right now he’d rather not hear about how Molly went to sleep after one story and Breena tucked herself in and got to sleep for twelve straight hours or whatever it is that happened.

A minute later 198 comes from Abby.

And a few minutes after that, 11 comes from Jimmy along with Let me guess, high number wins?

Sorry, love, yeah. Tim, you’ve got Molly tonight.

Tim looks up at the ceiling and says, “Thank you!”

Okay, Molly’s a little confused with the rotating parents thing. She expects certain things to happen every night, among them at least one of her parents show up, they eat dinner, and then she, along with her sister, get tubbies and go to bed.

And, yes, she does love the one on one time with an adult, and one on one time with Uncle Tim is cool, too. And, especially given how grumpy her sister is right now, tubby time on her own is fine, but she’s still finding this new arrangement unsettling.

So, in proper toddler fashion she’s ricocheting between over-the-moon-pleased and everything-in-the-world-is-about-to-fall-apart crying.

Tim, who’s not setting any records for patient endurance handles this in the tried and tested method of any parent who’s an inch from ripping his hair out by more or less giving Molly whatever she wants to keep her calm.

Thus, they’re in Jimmy and Breena’s living room, watching the Muppets, eating chicken nuggets and apple juice (he didn’t bother with making anything else for him), followed by a very fast tubby time, an extra-long story time, and when she wandered out of bed fifteen minutes after he put her in there, complaining about her room being scary, he used the last of his second wind to find one of Jimmy’s water pistols, fill it with water, say some magic words, explaining how this special water killed monsters on contact and made any space completely safe. Then he put her back in bed, sprayed down her room, and put the (now empty, he didn’t put much water in it) gun on her night stand.

“Anything scary comes out, you shoot it.”

Molly nods at that, eyes wide. Tim tucks her back in, sings one more lullaby (or tries, he’s a quarter of the way through ‘Goodnight Sweetheart’ when she tells him to stop. Apparently when Daddy and Ducky and Uncle Tony really can sing, Uncle Tim with his less-than-dulcet tones isn’t welcome to the party,) and then finally, she settles down, and he gets to go crash.

If he had been less sleepy, being all alone in Jimmy and Breena’s bed might have felt weird, but all he really has time to do is think mmmm… soft, comfortable, no crying babies and he’s asleep.
“I take it the teething party is still going strong?” Heather asks as she heads in on Wednesday. This time only two of the three members of the party look dead on their feet. “You must be Breena,” Heather says to the blonde who is just tired as opposed to exhausted.

Breena nods. “Hi. Yeah.”

“Those little toothies are being stubborn, aren’t they?” Heather says to Kelly, picking her up out of Jimmy’s hands.

There’s a hollow laugh that comes out of all three of the adults as Kelly continues gnawing on a particularly well-chewed teething ring.

“On the upside, this one,” Breena bounces Anna a little, who is also in a pretty bad mood, “has one through, but there are two more little white lines under her gums.”

“Ohhh…” Heather, gently pets Anna’s shoulder. “Poor little girl.”

Abby, dark circles under her eyes, kisses Anna and Kelly, saying, “‘Bout time for us to head off.”

“Yeah. Okay,” Jimmy says, standing up from the kitchen table. That’s the first thing she’s heard out of Jimmy this morning, and as he’s about to kiss Abby goodbye, Heather notices that Breena, who she thinks is Jimmy’s wife, they’ve got matching wedding rings, lays her hand on Jimmy’s arm, stopping him. He blinks, looks at Heather, and says, “Oh. Okay. I’ll help you get the girls in the car,” he says to Breena, followed by, “Then work?” to Abby.

Abby nods back, noticing what Breena just did. She hugs Breena and Anna together, and pats Jimmy’s shoulder. “Not that I don’t love you two, but I’m really hoping not to see you tonight.”

Breena gets that. Abby and Jimmy both have black circles under their eyes, because they’re both on night three of no sleep. “Tim and I can probably take the girls and let both of you guys crash tonight.”

“Please,” Jimmy says.

“I’m seconding that,” Abby adds.

“Okay. We can do that,” Breena says. “You’ll let him know?”

“Molly get off to daycare, okay?” Jimmy asks Tim about an hour later, when he’s in Tim’s office.

Tim, who’s looking a hell of a lot more human this morning, says, “Yeah. Amanda…” he’s not sure if that’s the lady who runs the place’s name, and Jimmy nods, letting him know he’s got it right, “seemed to think that grabbing some buddies and swapping kids if you’ve got a bunch of miserable babies is a great idea.”
Jimmy half-smiles and rubs his eyes, he’s on his second (diet) Caf-Pow of the day, and if he’s whipping out the Caf-Pow, he’s dead on his feet.

“She’s got… two little girls. Think they’re three and seven now. One of them’s with her, the other is in school.”

“She had the look of someone who’d been there and done it.” Tim says, staring at Jimmy who’s way past been there and done that.

Jimmy seems to be thinking along the same guidelines. “Breena volunteered you and her for teething duty, and we’re sleeping tonight.”

Tim nods at that. “Fine by me.” Two parents is the minimum for two cranky babies. With three they were round-robining wake up cries so each one only had to get two out of three cries. One out of three? He’s honestly not sure, which is all anyone needs to know about how tired he is, and that Jimmy and Abby are a step past that.

The more Tim thinks about it, the more he’s thinking two on two makes more sense, everyone is probably better off with one full night off and one night on, than two nights on and one night off.

Jimmy rubs his eyes. “I think I screwed up yesterday.”

Tim shoots him the curious look.

“Did I kiss both of you yesterday morning? In front of Heather? I almost did this morning, but Breena was with it and touched my arm, so…”

Tim winces a little, thinking back. “Yeah, I think you did.”

Both Tim and Jimmy know the rest. If Jimmy had done it both mornings, then he’s just an unusually close friend who’s very affectionate. But with Breena stopping him the one morning, that draws attention to the idea that this is something the outside world isn’t supposed to see.

“She say anything about it?” Jimmy asks.

Tim doesn’t reply with ‘when would she have?’ because he knows Jimmy’s tired enough that he’s not putting together the fact that Tim hasn’t been back to his home since the first kiss happened, so there was no time for him to talk with Heather. He just says, “Not to me.”

“Great.”

“We’ll set fire to that when we come to it. Tonight, you and Abby go to your place, sing Molly a lullaby she likes. Apparently, I don’t measure up; she told me to stop singing.”

Jimmy chuckles a little at that.

“And then both of you get a good long sleep.”

Jimmy gulps down more Caf-Pow. “That sound so good.”

“Yeah, and this sounds better, Friday morning we hand the kids over and head to wherever the girls are taking us and for the whole weekend we can do whatever we want.”

Jimmy sighs, sounding exceedingly happy at that idea. He takes one more sip of the Caf-Pow and tosses the empty cup next to Tim’s wastebasket, as he’s picking it back up and putting it in the trash can he says, “How does Abby do this? I don’t feel less tired. I’m comatose and jittery.”
“I think you need the sugar, too. There’s nothing in the diet version your body can turn into energy.”

Jimmy nods, and heads back toward Autopsy.

On the way home, Tim tries to think through the tactics of this. Heather’s seen a somewhat unusual display of affection. And then she saw another display that got cut short.

Soo… what makes what Jimmy did stand out more… Doing it regularly or having it be a one-time, exhausted, hidden thing…

Another thought hits him, if, after watching Jimmy smooch both of them, Heather had been curious, she could have headed upstairs and noticed that their guest room is in pristine shape. And while it’s true that Abby does make the bed every morning, it’s also true that the guest room looks like it’s a museum piece, their bedroom looks like a place where people actually sleep.

Likewise, there’s literally nothing in the second upstairs bathroom to indicate anyone over the age of 3 has used it in months. But, if he’s remembering right, there are four toothbrushes and three sorts of toothpaste in his bathroom right now, along with two men’s razors, two different men’s shaving creams, and four (though two of them are small) different sets of soap and shampoo/conditioner in the shower.

Of course, even if she hadn’t been curious, she cleans their house, including the bathrooms, so it’s entirely possible that she’s noticed a slight influx of stuff that accompanied Jimmy and Breena sleeping over more often. (Just like if anyone poked around in Jimmy and Breena’s place they’d notice Tim and Abby are keeping things there now, too.)

And, if he’d been thinking about it, it would have hit him that he’s found a two pairs of Jimmy’s underwear in his underwear drawer, and that Heather’s the one who washed them, so… Okay, actually, he and Jimmy are close enough in size that she probably thinks he’s expanding away from just boxers. Maybe… Or maybe, having seen said kiss, and Jimmy, she’s realized that he didn’t suddenly add two pairs of knit boxer briefs to his wardrobe.

Or not.

And, of course, no matter what subtle hints she may or may not have noticed, when the larger bed they ordered shows up in four weeks, she is going to notice that.

God… He just doesn’t know what she’s really seen or figured out.

He sighs. No shame. Act like something out of the ordinary happened, and people take note. Be bold as brass and this is how it is, and they ask a lot fewer questions.

At least, he hopes that’s how this’ll work.

When Tim gets home, he finds that Breena and Anna beat him there. So, they, along with Kelly and Heather, are in the kitchen, chatting.
“Hey.” He’s tired enough that he doesn’t want to cook, and he doubts Breena does, either, so he’s got a bag of Chipotle in hand as he heads in. He takes Kelly from Heather, and for the first time in days, Kelly’s smiling at him.

“Daddy!” He gives her a big, wet kiss on the cheek.

“Hey, baby.” And another kiss. “Tooth finally through?” he asks Heather, while hugging his daughter and heading over to Breena to give her a quick (and much less big or wet) kiss. She looks a little started to see him do that in front of Heather, but she trusts that he’s awake enough that he knows what he’s doing, so she doesn’t try to stop him as he leans in. Anna gets a big, wet, smacking kiss, too, normally that’ll make her giggle, but she’s just glaring at everything right now.

Heather watches that, and he catches her eye with a never seen a guy kiss his friend sort of look. She shrugs a little and replies with, “Not sure if it’s through, she didn’t want me poking around and checking, but she went down at two for her afternoon nap and slept straight through, so it might just be that she’s less tired, either way, she’s been in a way better mood this afternoon.”

“Good girl.”

“’Potle?” Kelly asks, looking at the bag on the table.

“Yes. I’ve got you rice and carnitas,” Tim grins at his daughter.

“’NITAS!” (She likes them almost as much as chicken nuggets.)

He smiles at Heather, cuddling his daughter. “Looks like my sunshine is back.”

Heather smiles back, stroking Kelly’s head. “Yes she is. Regular time tomorrow?”

“That’s the plan. We’ve told you my sister is going to be picking her up Friday night, right?”

Heather nods. “Yeah. Abby said you two were out of town for the weekend?”

“Yep.”

“Just make sure to email me a picture or something ahead of time.”

That makes Tim happy. “No problem.”

Heather waves at them, and she gives Anna a little pet, “Hope you’re feeling better soon.” Anna’s not looking too positive on that. “Breena,” she nods to Breena, warm and friendly, and heads off.

Breena looks at Tim and as soon as she hears Heather’s car pulling out on the driveway, she walks over to Tim and gives him a proper hello kiss. Then she mimics the quick lip to lip kiss he gave her. “So what was that about? Thought we weren’t going to be ‘out.’”

“The first morning, when it was Jimmy, Abby, and I, we’re all exhausted, and Jimmy kissed both of us goodbye before heading out. Apparently you stopped him this morning, and he thinks Heather noticed it, so…”

Breena nods. “Damage control.”

“Yeah.” She’s sitting at the table, Anna in her lap, and he’s laying out dinner for the three of them.
“I’m so used to her, the fact that there’s this outside person who is in my house ten hours a day five days a week, who cleans and washes our laundry didn’t occur to me. I’ve got no idea what she’s picked up on.”

Breena pulls the diaper bag toward her, rooting around for Anna’s bottle. “So… should I be sleeping in the guest room tonight?”

Tim shakes his head. “No. I’m thinking we just act like this is our normal life, nothing we’re ashamed of, and…”

“Hope for the best?”

“Yeah. There’s a non-disclosure clause in her contract, and I don’t think I’m famous enough for the scoop to be worth breaking that contract.”

Breena smirks at that. “No one’s paying top dollar for Thom Gemcity’s dirty little secrets?”

Tim hasn’t seen a shot of himself in his kilt, eyeliner, or nail polish, let alone beaten to a pulp in any of the gossip mags, both of which he assumes would pay something for that kind of shot. “Doesn’t look like it.”

Tim’s tired, but not completely wiped out by the time they’ve got dinner done and little girls put to bed. Breena’s looking a step beyond that, but not exhausted.

“So, you want down time, or just go straight to bed?” he asks.

“Normally, I’d want some more downtime, but the last two nights her longest sleeping stretch has been this first one, so I’m going to bed.”

“Fine by me.”

“You going to stay up?”

“I’m checking my email, making sure nothing’s blown up in the last two hours, and then sleeping sounds good to me.” Just because he’s tired doesn’t mean work stopped, and especially with a vacation coming up, he’s trying to stay on top of everything.

Nothing did blow up, so it’s a few minutes before eight as he’s tossing his clothing in the hampers, watching Breena get settled for the night. He slips into bed next to her, and realizes this is the first time the two of them are attempting to sleep together, settle in for the night and sleep.

They’re sort of scooting around, looking for something that works. Tim sleeps on his side normally, and usually he’s very happy to have a woman in front of him to snuggle into. Breena usually sleeps on her stomach, her chin on Jimmy’s shoulder, her arm across his chest.

So, Tim’s looking for his spooning partner, and Breena’s looking for the body she uses as a pillow.

“How’d you do this last night?” he asks.

“Jimmy was in the middle, I was in my usual spot, and Abby was on her side, back against his side, on the other. What did you three do?”

“He was on his back, Abby on her side, leg over his, arm across his shoulders, and I was spooning
Breena sits up, and begins rearranging pillows. She sticks one next to her, and one on Tim’s far side. “This one’s Jimmy. That one’s Abby, and you and I back to side.”

Tim nods, spoons the “Abby” pillow, feels Breena warm at his back, decides that this will work, and thankfully, falls asleep quickly.

Which is good, because Anna’s longest sleep is three hours.

He’s eyeing the non-decaf coffee the next morning, feeling like death warmed over. Breena’s not exactly looking perky, either. Last night was better. Kelly slept through, and Anna only woke up three times.

“I feel like I used to be able to do this longer and bounce back faster,” Tim says, not making himself a cup of coffee.

Breena nods. “You know, I can remember, back in college doing four back to back all-nighters, not getting more than two hours of sleep a day, and then crashing.”

Tim shuffles over to the fridge. “Eggs?”

“Sure.”

“Eggs!” At least one of them is feeling good. Even with a fussy, unhappy, wailing nursery-mate, Kelly slept through the night.

He gets cooking while Breena wrangles breakfast for Anna. As he’s doing it a horrifying thought comes to mind. “Are we going to be able to go if she’s this uncomfortable?”

Breena’s eyes go wide, and she also looks wrecked. Part of what’s keeping them all going is the idea that come tomorrow morning they’re heading off for alone time, with lots of sleep and no small, crying babies. But, it’s not exactly fair, or kind, to plop said crying baby in Ducky and Penny’s laps and skip off into the sunset. Beyond kind and fair to the adult babysitters, they also aren’t the kind of people who can leave an unhappy baby without Mom and Dad around.

“Oh…” Breena looks crushed, because the right answer is no, they aren’t going to give Anna in this bad of a mood to Ducky and Penny.

“Let’s hope that last wake up, 2:00 to 3:15, “was that tooth popping its way through.” Anna had been VERY unhappy through that last one, and finally, after lots of gnawing and crying and being walked around, where Tim or Breena walked her until one of them was ready to drop, and then handed her off to the other, until finally, she didn’t wake up screeching when Tim put her in the crib. From there, all three of them dropped, and no one moved until Kelly started chirping at her usual wake up time. “Maybe you two’ll get the first night on your own…”

Tim’s shaking his head at that. An idea hits, he still doesn’t know where they’re going, but… “Can we take her with us? Penny and Ducky can take Molly, Sarah’ll take Kelly, and we’ll keep Anna…”

“We could…” Breena’s looking at Anna, who’s not very happy right now, but doesn’t seem to be in as bloody of a mood as she had been. With any luck she’s just tired and not in pain. “Kind of defeats the purpose…”
“Us just going on our own does, too.”

Breena nods, tired. “Don’t have to decide until tomorrow morning.” The plan is, instead of heading off tonight and grabbing every possible second together, that they’d wrap up work, go home, with their girls, have a usual night, then tomorrow, Kelly would have a normal day with Heather, Anna and Molly would do their usual daycare routines, and at the end of the day, they’d head off to their respective babysitters. Abby, Tim, Jimmy, and Breena would head off to wherever it is after the girls get settled in with their normal daytime routines, and then home again Monday a bit after noon.

Not exactly a lavish amount of time on their own, but realistically, that’s as much as they can possibly grab. It’s not fair to little girls to run off any longer if they don’t absolutely have to.

“Tell me you’ve got good news,” Abby says as Tim heads into the lab an hour later.

He kisses her. “You’re looking perkier.”

“I love sleep. I don’t know how I did so many years without it.” He’s feeling the same way.

“The good news is that Kelly slept through the night,” he’s aware of the other techs in the lab, so he doesn’t give her an update on Anna, because he doesn’t know if they know the four of them have been playing musical babies. Then he realizes that’s stupid, because he’s already telling her about something she would know if she’d been home.

“And Anna?” she asks, taking the issue out of his hands.

“Only three times, but the last one was a killer, she was yelling for a full hour.”

“Oh, poor baby.” Tim’s about to go off on poor Tim and poor Breena, but the part of his brain that isn’t exhausted reminds him that while they’re annoyed, they aren’t the ones in physical pain and that Anna and Kelly aren’t screaming at them for kicks.

“Are you guys sure she doesn’t have an ear infection or something?” Corwin asks. “When my girls were little they’d start teething and like clockwork, they’d get an ear infection, the tooth would poke through, no problems, but they’d still be yelling about the ears.”

Tim sighs. “I think Jimmy’s checked, but we’ll mention it to him.”

Corwin nods. “This swapping thing is cool. My sister’s kids are less than a month younger than both of mine, and I wish we’d had the brains to do that. Instead of just two of us dead on our feet, we had what felt like months of all four of us dragging along.”

“Hopefully we’re near the end. Anna crashed after that last one and doesn’t seem like she’s in such a bad mood.”

“One more night of sleepover?” Corwin asks them.

Tim thinks it’s really weird to have him checking into this but… “Haven’t made our plans, yet.”

Corwin nods, watches them for a second, and then heads into the auxiliary room to mess around with something.

Tim quietly says, “If Anna’s not really better that might put a wrench in the weekend.”
Abby nods looking resigned. “Breena’s already texted me. Right now the tentative plan is you and Jimmy with Anna, and Breena and I’ll take Kelly and Molly.”

Tim’s a bit confused on that set up, and it shows on his face.

Abby answers the unspoken question. “If we can go, it’d be nice for the people who know where we’re going to be awake enough to drive safely, right?”

Tim nods at that, it makes sense.

“Likewise, you want the people who are packing alert enough to remember everything, right?”

Tim nods at that.

“Molly and Kelly’ll be at our place, and you and Jimmy and Anna’ll be at theirs.”

“Okay.”

“So,” Tim asks as he heads into Jimmy’s house.

Jimmy’s already changed out of his work clothing and is sitting on the living room floor with Anna, who is knocking over the blocks he’s piled up, and is smiling at him.

Tim sighs, sitting next to them, setting the bag of food on the floor, kissing Anna’s head. “You’re looking happier.”

“If you pry her mouth open you can see three brand new teeth.”

Tim stacks up three blocks. “I’ll take your Daddy’s word for it. You don’t want me messing around with your mouth, right?”

Anna looks at him, somewhat perplexed and then giggles as she whacks the blocks to the other side of the room. Jimmy and Tim look at them, not really interested in getting up and walking all the way (nine feet) to the far side of the room to fetch them. Unlike a certain little girl, they did not get multiple naps today.

Dinner and bedtime go smoothly. Anna’s pooped, too, so with a very quiet, very low key night she drifts off nice and easy.

Which means it’s 7:30, and Tim and Jimmy are on their own.

They’re tired. Yes, Jimmy’s in better shape than Tim because he got to sleep last night, but one night of sleep out of four doesn’t make for a well-rested person. Tim’s in the same boat, but a bit further back because he didn’t get a full night last night.

“Crash or do you want some down time?” Jimmy asks.

Tim’s standing in the middle of the hall outside of Anna’s room staring into space. He blinks, brain slowly moving again, and says, “Uh…”
Jimmy wraps an arm around his shoulder and points him toward bed. “Brush your teeth and crash. I need a bit more downtime before I can sleep.”

Tim nods slowly and heads to bed.

He wakes up a little when Jimmy comes to bed (maybe two hours later, he’s turning in early, too) just enough to scoot over a bit from the middle of the bed, and roll a little so he’s spooning Jimmy’s side.

It’s possible Jimmy muttered something about, “You’ll snuggle anything with a pulse, won’t you?” But Tim isn’t awake enough to notice. Likewise, he doesn’t much notice getting his forehead kissed.

He does notice (hours later when his bladder, but not, thank you God, Anna, wakes him up) that it feels okay to stumble three quarters asleep back to bed, flop into it, scoot forward and rest his chin on Jimmy’s shoulder, arm across his chest.

He’s not Abby, or Breena, but… it’s still good.
EPIC

Chapter Notes

Winchester, VA is real. I've never been there, but it looks like an awesome little vacation spot. The restaurant they're at is 50/50 Taphouse, and the ice cream comes from Red Fox Creamery.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Friday morning. Texts sent between the Palmer and McGee homes show that all little girls have slept through the night and appear to be in good order.

So, with a sense that at any minute they may be rushing back to DC, they head off on their honeymoon.

Breena’s driving. Jimmy’s in the front seat, next to her, and Tim and Abby are both dozing in the back seat.

“How long until we get there?” Jimmy asks, wondering what the girls could have possibly come up with. The whole back of his van is filled with stuff.

They’ve been on the road for almost an hour. Breena glances at her phone’s GPS. “Probably another hour.”

“We’re not going camping, are we?” He and Tim didn’t pack, but that doesn’t mean he didn’t notice two inflatable mattresses in the back.

Breena smiles.

“There aren’t any tents back there.” He’d also noticed that when he was filling up the gas tank.

“Then I guess we aren’t camping,” Breena says. “Besides, do you really think either Abby or I would set up a romantic weekend somewhere with no showers or bathrooms?”

In that no showers or bathrooms is basically Abby’s idea of hell, and that she has not, ever, to his knowledge, voluntarily camped anywhere, that makes a lot of sense.

“Get a nap,” she says to Jimmy. “We’ll be there soon enough.”

So he settles back to snooze.

He wakes up when he feels the car stop and the engine turn off. Opening his eyes, feeling pretty out of it, Jimmy’s wondering where the hell they are. He’s not seeing anything that looks like a place they may be staying.

In fact, they appear to be on the main street of some little town in… He’s not sure, given they were heading west and the clock tells him an hour’s gone by, they’ve got to be in Virginia or Maryland, but…

He’s looking around, stretching a bit. Behind him Abby and Tim are doing basically the same thing.

“Everyone feeling all nice and refreshed?” Breena asks her groggy passengers.

Jimmy hears some yawning from the backseat, along with Tim saying, “I don’t see a hotel.”

“Because there isn’t one.”

Though Jimmy does notice there’s a small shop next to them with pictures of cabins in the windows and a sign that says LakeFront Rentals.

“Okay, out you two go,” Breena says to Jimmy and Tim. “We’re going to grab the keys, and get everything set. You’ve got a grocery list on your phone, and there’s supposed to be a store two blocks over. We’ll pick you up in an hour or so.”

“All right…” Jimmy says, getting out of the car, Tim following.

“Uh, two blocks in which direction?” Tim’s staring around. “This is basically Stillwater.” He checks his watch. “There’s no way we’re in Pennsylvania, but…”

Jimmy nods, looking around more, this does look a lot like Gibbs’ hometown. Slow traffic, small shops, brick sidewalks with trees every twenty feet.

Breena checks her phone, and then points to a cross road. “Take a left. Two blocks down.”

So Jimmy and Tim head off in search of groceries, wondering where the hell the girls have taken them.

---

Tim cheats. As soon as they turn the corner, he takes his phone out and uses it to find out where they are. “Winchester, Virginia.”

Jimmy’s looking around. It really is a rather pretty little town. And they appear to be in the middle of some sort of historic district. A brick street lined with stores right off a sidewalk, and more small trees. It’s got a very Normal Rockwell feel to it.

Further down there are old churches, more “modern” looking streets, but the stores with non-chain names continue to line those streets.

They do, finally, locate a grocery store. Tim shakes his head a bit as they head in. “This place would give Gibbs déjà vu.”

“Jack’s store?” Jimmy asks, looking around at the tiny local grocery.

“Looked a lot like this. So, what’s on the list?”

Jimmy’s looking through his phone and finds the note Breena left him. “Three days of staples. Some goodies. Looks like wherever they got has a kitchen.”
“Wherever they got” is a cabin. It’s way the hell off the beaten path, one small street after another, and another, and then a dirt track, leading to a small square of logs with a porch on the back and side. There’s no shot of them making too much noise and disturbing any neighbors. That’s intentional, something they were looking for when they decided on going somewhere together. It’s one thing if you’re a loud couple in a hotel. A loud foursome seemed liked it might be asking for trouble they don’t want.

Abby gets out of the van and stretches a bit, then heads to the back porch. Breena follows her, both of them standing, leaning against the railing, looking out. “Exactly like the website said,” Abby says, happily, looking at a small pond nestled between a copse of trees.

Breena looks to their left, seeing the back of the cabin, and the reason they got this particular cabin, the solarium.

It’s a fairly small room, ten by ten, tops, with glass walls and ceiling, just a pleasant space off the living room to look out over the lake and see the stars. Right now, as they’re heading in, it’s got some chairs and a sofa in there.

It won’t for long.

The inflatable mattresses are for that room. Sleep with a view of the moon and stars, but not have to deal with mosquitos? Sounded perfect to both of them.

Before they start moving furniture around, Abby and Breena poke around a bit. It’s exactly what the website said it would be. Small. Can’t be more than 800 square feet. One bedroom, one bathroom, kitchen, living room/solarium. And rustic, wood walls, wood floors, mostly wood furniture, only conspicuously modern thing in sight is the entertainment center. (The kitchen’s newish… Not more than ten years, and has all of the basics.)

The bedroom is at least half of the cabin, with a nicely large and springy mattress on the bed. They’ll probably put that to good use, too. Bathroom has all the amenities. The other half of the cabin is one large space, kitchen gear on one end, a breakfast bar separating it from the living space, and the solarium on the far end. A porch wraps around half of the cabin, stairs leading down to a small path that heads to the lake. There’s a grill, comfy-looking porch furniture, and a hot tub on the porch.

There’s a TV, Wi-Fi, a dock for a smart phone so you can play music, a stone fireplace in the wall between the bedroom and living room, so you can see the fire from both sides, and enough cooking gear to make a decent meal.

All in all, everything they could need.

Okay, not everything but Abby and Breena packed carefully to take care of that. All that’s left is bringing all of it in. So they do.

Breena eyes the solarium, it’s one step down from the main living room, so while she can Abby can grab the furniture and move it out of there, she knows Tim will want to Gibbs smack her if she has four months pregnant Abby lifting half of a sofa. So she starts shoving the sofa to the far edge of the solarium, and Abby grabs the first of the inflatable mattresses.

“What are we starting with?” Abby asks. They’ve been talking about what’s on the menu for this weekend for the whole time they’ve been planning it.

Breena gets the sofa flush against the glass wall, and grabs the first of the chairs while thinking. “Fantasy play or rainbow party… Mmmm…”

“Sheets’ll be a mess after the rainbow party.”

Breena shrugs. They brought two sets of extra sheets, for a damn good reason. The one thing this place doesn’t have is a washer or dryer.

“Will it be a problem if the sheets get stained?”

Abby rolls out an inflatable mattress, shaking her head no. “I got some black ones, specifically for this. Won’t matter if the lip tar sits on them for a while.” She plugs in the pump and flicks it on. A whirring sound fills the cabin as she gives Breena a hand shoving the other chair out of the way.

Breena’s looking around, there’s only one small floor lamp in here. She supposes that makes sense, too much light in here and all you can see is reflections of who’s in the room. But, one light means it’s not great for getting pictures or seeing what you’re doing at night, so…

“Rainbow party first. Take advantage of the light.”

Abby smiles up at her, turning off the pump. “Test it out, see if it’s firm enough?”

Breena flops onto the mattress and sighs. “It’s good. You get the other one set, and I’ll go find the sheets.”

They find the guys wandering around the old town, carrying several bags. Apparently the grocery store was very basic, (Milk, eggs, butter, sure, they had that, steaks, wine, not so much.) so they’d had to hunt down a butcher and wine shop, to get the “meat” and “drinks” that Breena had put on their list.

Breena’s peeking into the bag from the butcher shop, seeing white paper wrapped packages, as Tim opens the door to the trunk, and asks, “So what kind of meat did you get me?”

Jimmy looks tickled by that question, quickly glances around, shifts one step over so his back is to the rest of the parking lot, and then he puts Breena’s hand on his crotch and says, “I brought all the meat you need with me.”

This resulted in a massive giggle attack from the girls, and Tim dryly saying, “Yep, everything in that bag is for me,” as soon as they calmed down, which set them giggling again.

Finally, they managed to get everything into the car, and Tim asks, “So, now what?”
“Lunch!” Abby says, emphatic. She’s hit the part of her pregnancy where she’ll eat anything that isn’t nailed down, and it’s been a while since breakfast.

So, in search of lunch they go.

They aren’t hurting for options. And, if they don’t feel like cooking, this neighborhood will be happy to take care of them for breakfast, lunch, dinner, dessert and snacks.

They pass a creamery, and Abby’s looking at it longingly… “Mmmm... Dessert.”

“Real food first,” Jimmy adds. He’s getting hungry, and it’s unlikely a place that just does ice cream has much for him.

“Sushi?” Tim asks as they pass a sushi bar.

Breena shakes her head, and it occurs to him they brought a cooler along. A cooler that now has their groceries in it, but was empty when they opened it up. Which means there was likely something in it when they headed this way, something no longer in it. Something that is probably sitting in a refrigerator, perhaps waiting for them for later today.

And, given that little head shake, it might be something of a sushi nature.

He approves.

They walk another fifty feet, just easing along, looking at stores and restaurants, enjoying the brilliant September blue sky, when the scent of delectable grilled beef wafts toward them.

“Burgers!” Abby says. “Oh yes. That! We are having that.” She turns so she’s facing the other three, and takes Tim and Breena by the hands, and begins pulling them toward that scent. “Come on, Jimmy!”

Fifty burgers on the menu and fifty beers on tap. Tim’s not much of a beer guy, but he’s perfectly happy with this situation.

Plus, Pear Cider, oh yes, that’s just lovely. (Breena’s Orange Ginger Beer is excellent, too. He’s going to be investigating what’s involved with laying hands on these for future grilling dates at his place.)

They settle in, get drinks, and get to talking and relaxing.

They get a text from Heather during lunch. For a second, they all tense, wondering if this is the ‘come on back’ note, but it’s not. It’s a thirty second clip of video of Kelly blissfully gnawing away on a kosher dill pickle while sitting in the baby seat on the grocery cart.

New teeth in action. Tim chuckles at that, showing it to the other three, and then texts back.

You got her a pickle?
We were getting groceries, and she saw it and wanted it. Didn’t think she’d go for it, but she’s loving it.

Breena eyes Jimmy’s pickle spear on Tim’s plate. Tim didn’t precisely steal it. Jimmy thinks they’re gross, so he wasn’t heartbroken to give it away.

Tim has already eaten his with great enjoyment, and had been telling them about Abby feeding him the deep fat fried ones while starting in on Jimmy’s. (Cue Jimmy wincing.)

“Your daughter.” Breena says, watching the clip with a smile.

Tim smiles. “Let’s see if she gets my love of games.”

“And words,” Abby adds. “I’d love to see another poet in the family.”

“She’ll write the songs, and Molly will sing them,” Breena says.

“Punk rock goth and the princess in concert,” Jimmy says with a laugh. It’s too early for Kelly to have clothing preferences, but Molly does, and Molly loves all that is pink, fluffy, and sparkly.

“I think Kelly’s going to be into fluffy and pink, too. Look at the way she watches Molly,” Breena says.

“Is that because she likes the outfits, or because she likes Molly?” Tim asks.

“Both, I think. Anna’s going to be the wildcard,” Abby says.

“How can you tell?” Jimmy asks.

“I just can. Call it Goth-dar. Give her fourteen years and she’ll have purple hair and a taste for plaid skirts.”

“Lord have mercy,” Jimmy says with a sigh.

Abby looks affronted. “No Goth kids for you?”

“No. I’m fine with that. It’s all the punk-ass, death fetish, mopey Goth boys I’m going to have to look out for. I was a teen boy, I remember them, and the Goth ones… Jimmy rolls his eyes. “Be nice to have a kid who smiles at least on occasion in my house.”

Abby inclines her head. The death fetish guys certainly covered a lot of the other Goths she knew in high school and college. “Some goths like geeks,” Abby says, smiling at Tim.

“Yeah, well, if a fifteen-year-old version of me shows up to date your daughter, you should still keep an eye on him.”

“Really?” Breena raises an eyebrow. “I would have thought any girl with you was perfectly safe.”

“I wasn’t going to do anything she didn’t want to do. Never did. Anything her father didn’t want me to do is likely to have been a different story,” Tim says with a smile. “Same for you, right?”

Jimmy nods. “Never pissed a girl off by going too far, or even trying. Would have pissed off several dads if we’d gotten caught.”

Tim looks a little sheepish. “And, um…” he licks his lips, “especially back then, part of the allure of Goth girls was the idea that they might have… broad views of what they’d like to do.”
Abby slaps him on the shoulder. “Are you saying Goth girls are easy?”

“I did not, in fact, say that.” He smiles at her, eyes sparkling and trailing over her. She’s not particularly Goth today. She’s got on a cute blue sundress, though the tats, boots, and wrist cuff do edge it that way. He gives her a quick kiss, and takes a sip of his drink, feeling just happy and fun and mellow all over. “I said that Goth girls have a reputation for being kinky.”

Now she’s just staring a mixture of amused and appalled on her face. “Is that… Were you thinking that when we went on our first date?”

Tim’s silently laughing and shaking his head. “No comment.” He licks his lips, smiling, and then says, “But given how our second date went, if I had been thinking something like that, I wouldn’t have been wrong.”

Abby opens and closes her mouth, mock appalled at him. She’s playing with him, both of them enjoying this. “I can’t believe you went there.”

“Only way I got there was you saying, ‘yes.’” He’s looking downright cocky as he says that. “Actually, if I’m remembering right, you were the one asking, and I was the one saying ‘yes.’” He’s full on grinning at that, and kisses her again, then steals one of her fries, popping it in his mouth. “These are good!” (He intentionally did not order fries, a burger with apple bacon compote and cheddar cheese is more than enough food for lunch.)

“And what were you saying ‘yes’ to on your second date?” Breena asks, nibbling her own burger, a combo of burger, sautéed onions, mushrooms, and peppers, plus provolone cheese.

Tim looks around the restaurant, it’s fairly busy, and no one appears to be paying attention to them. They’re in the back, corner booth, so it’s not like a lot of people can see them, but he keeps his voice low, and scoots a bit closer to Breena as he says, “She was in my lap, legs around my waist, and we were kissing,” his eyes flick to Abby, and she nods, that’s how she remembers it, too, “and I was wearing a button down, jeans, belt, jacket. Standard, casual second date in cool weather wear. I’d driven up, and she was showing me around DC. We did the Smithsonian, right?”

Abby nods. “Air and Space museum. You got talking about jet packs and went on for like an hour.”

“It wasn’t that long.”

Abby raises an eyebrow at him and then winks. “You’re just lucky that I like jet packs, too.”

“Anyway, bumming around DC went well. We’re back at her place. Jacket came off when we got there. She was playing with the top button on my shirt, and asked if I was okay with this.”

“And you said, ‘Yes.’” Abby adds.

“Because I really really was. You undid the button, kissed my clavicle, and then your hands slid down my chest to my belt, and you tugged on the tongue a bit, and said, ‘How about this?’”

Abby’s nodding. She hadn’t been sure how much experience Tim had, and had underestimated how old he was by a few years, too. (He was really excited about the jet packs, and that let her see the kid that wasn’t too far under the surface. It also made her think he was twenty-one or two instead of a month shy of twenty-five.) She wanted to make extra sure that if she was jumping a virgin on his second date that he knew what he was agreeing to. “And you pulled me even closer, kissed me harder, and said something like, ‘God, please, yes!’”

Tim nods. “That sounds right.”
Jimmy’s voice has dropped too, as he says, “ Doesn’t sound kinky, yet.”

“It wasn’t, then,” Abby says, happily chewing a bite of her burger (Swiss and remoulade). She swallows and then says, “I got his shirt off, and he was looking adorable, but nervous and tense, so I asked about the tattoo on his arm.”

“And we spent like twenty minutes talking about the code on it.”

“Ummm… That’s your definition of kinky?” Jimmy adds, bite of his burger (pineapple, sriracha, grilled red peppers) on his fork, en route to his lips.

Tim glares at him a bit, and Abby says, “You don’t talk code in bed?”

Jimmy glances around the restaurant. No one’s watching, so he leans across Breena and Tim, pulls Abby close to meet him, and kisses her soundly. “As you well know, no I don’t.”

Tim watches them kissing pretty much in his lap, his hand on Abby’s shoulder, and then says, when they break apart, “I wasn’t, either. We were in your living room on the floor. My back was against the sofa. You didn’t even have a bed then.”

“I had a bed!”

“Yeah, your ‘box sofa bed.’ Putting a custom mattress into a coffin doesn’t make it a bed.”

Abby giggles at that.

“So, that’s the kink? First time you two did it was in a coffin?” Breena asks.

Tim thinks about that for a second, realizing that, yes, that probably counts as kinky, too. “That, too.”

Abby’s grinning widely. “I can still remember the look on your face when Gibbs asked if you slept in the coffin.”

“Gibbs asked?” Jimmy says.

Tim shakes his head. “Long story. And for the record, I knew it was a coffin. Not when we were getting into it, because you had the room pitch black, but I woke up in it the next morning, so the secret was kind of out. If you wanted to call it a box sofa bed, fine by me. No way in hell I was going to argue about that. I was giving you that look because apparently you told everyone else it was a coffin.”

“Uh huh.” Abby does not appear to be buying that. “You looked really stunned at the idea that it was a coffin.”

“I was looking stunned at the idea that Gibbs knew you slept in one.”

“Okay, this is cute and all, but I’d like to know what you meant by, ‘too,’” Breena cuts in, shutting down squabbling over whether or not Tim knew it was a coffin ahead of time.

“Too…” Tim says with a quick glance at Abby, and a little smile lighting his face. “Okay. She gets me out of my shirt, and we get talking about the tattoo, and some of hers, as well, and I start to relax.”

Abby squeezes his hand. “We were making out again. I was showing off my back tattoos, and I asked him what he wanted to do. Which pretty much stopped you dead.”
Tim looks mildly irked as he takes a sip of his cider. It had stopped him because her question had confused the hell out of him. “I was kneeling behind you in my shorts tracing your cross with my tongue, I thought it was pretty obvious what I wanted to do. Threw me for a loop getting asked, not like I was going to say, ‘Let’s knit.’”

Breena and Jimmy laugh at that.

“Uh huh.” That’s not precisely how Abby remembers it. “So, I manage to get across that yes, I know what he wants to do, and I’m asking about how. And he starts blushing scarlet. It was so cute.”

Tim and Jimmy share a look about how that’s very much not a situation when a man wants to be thought of as cute, but neither of the girls mind.

“I didn’t think he’d answer. Figured that with as hard as he was blushing, he’d just look away and then kiss me or something. And I was half right, you did look away—“

“Was checking to see if there was anything handy that’d fit the bill. Nope.”

“And then you stuttered your way through asking if I had any rope or cord.”

Tim doesn’t remember himself stuttering, but he probably did. Just saying it was a thousand times more bold than he’d ever imagined being, managing to do it smoothly was probably way too much to ask of Pre-Probie McGee.

“And you told me you had some ribbons you used for tying your hair, and asked if they’d work. And I said yes, so off you went to get them—“

Abby smiles at that memory. “And I found out that all those years as a Boy Scout paid off big time.”

“You tied her up the first time you got together?” Jimmy hadn’t heard that bit before.

Tim nods. Abby does, too. “Tied me up, helped me stand, showed me he could do more with those pouty little lips than talk, and then coffin-time.”

Tim smiles, those are good memories. He kisses her again. “Fourteen years ago in… November?”

Abby nods. “Yep.” Then she looks to Jimmy and Breena. “Haven’t heard about your first time.”

Jimmy and Breena look at each other, smiling, and then look at the almost empty lunch dishes.

“Over ice cream?” Breena asks.

“Oh yeah. Ice cream, stroll around a bit, then back to…” Abby doesn’t fill in where they’re going, but both girls share a pleased look.

“You’re really good at that.” Breena says as Tim licks his cone. They found the creamery again easily, and spent several pleasant minutes debating what to get. (Tim had spent a few minutes debating if he should get anything period. Lunch was probably enough food. Abby saw him staring at the strawberry ice cream and quietly said to him, ‘Trust me, you’ll work it off before dinner.’ So he ordered it.)

“Good at what?” he asks, still licking, running his tongue around the base of the scoop of ice cream, making sure to get any possible drips, as they stroll down the pedestrian mall.
“That,” she says, pointedly watching him eat his ice cream.

Tim rolls his eyes, but Jimmy wraps an arm around his neck and says, “We were going to wait until later to tell you.”

Tim gets the joke, and ups the ante, elbowing him. “Shhh…”

“No, we should tell them,” Jimmy’s looking mock serious and takes a quick lick of Tim’s cone. (Jimmy didn’t get anything. They didn’t have any sugar free options and he didn’t want to mess with his blood sugar today.)

The girls know he’s fooling with them, but they’re enjoying it. “You saying you two got some practice in last night?” Abby asks.

“Well, it’s been a while, you know?” Tim says. “The only action I’d seen since Sunday was my right hand.” Maybe the girls got some loving in without them, but he knows that every night since Sunday he’s been hitting the pillow to sleep.

“Aren’t you a lefty?” Jimmy says, eyeing Tim holding the cone in his left hand.

“Yeah. I was tired and multitasking. Shower, soaping up, right hand PT, blow off a little steam, all at once.”

Both Abby and Breena think that’s hilarious.

Breena watches Tim take another lick of his cone. “So…”

“It was so hot! Tim’s a natural.” Jimmy says. “I got video.”

They still know he has to be kidding, but both girls would really like to see that video.

“I told him that’d you’d be pissed if you didn’t see it. Told him we should wait, but, he’s whiny when he’s horny.” Tim kisses Breena. Abby notices that this time he doesn’t check the crowd before doing it. A big part of why they came way the hell out here was that no one here knows them. “I don’t know how you put up with him.”

Breena giggles at that.

“Whiny?” Jimmy sounds horrified by that. They’re just two anonymous couples walking down a street, goofing off, messing around. So far no one’s looking at them, and Jimmy would like to keep it that way, so his voice drops a few decibels as he says, “I’ll have you know that I’m a freaking saint when it comes to putting up with blue balls.”

“It was worth it,” Breena says, kissing him.

“Not saying it wasn’t, but, Lord Tim, you have no idea.”

Tim kisses Abby, and she lightly licks some of the ice cream off his lip, then offers him a spoonful of her double chocolate cherry. When he pulls back he says, “You know, I’m not heartbroken about that, either. Of the things I don’t have an idea of, I’m fine with that one.”

Jimmy pokes him this time. “Asshole.”

Tim smiles brightly at him, and then at Abby. “Thank you.”

Abby shrugs. “I don’t think I could go two years of just petting.”
Breena looks slightly irked by that. “It’s not like I made him hand carve the great pyramid out of granite for me. I mean, people used to not have sex before they got married all the time.”

The other three all glance at each other, and Jimmy says, “Ducky would challenge that assertion. Apparently, for everywhere they’ve kept records in the western world, before birth control was easy to get, something like fifty percent of all babies were born six to nine months after the wedding. Ducky says there’s a reason why Cupid is a baby.” Breena rolls her eyes, and Jimmy kisses her again. “And I will say, for as frustrating as it was, and for as many nights as I went home rock hard or jerked off in my car so I could focus well enough on the road so I could drive—“

Breena’s eyes are wide. She hadn’t known about that. “You did that?”

Breena smiles at that, looking a little sheepish, and says, “Oh. Yeah. I remember. First time a guy got me off, and I… kind of freaked out because I didn’t intend to let it go that far, but it felt so good, and I knew what I was about to do, because you were so pretty, and so hard, and making such wonderful sounds, and I wanted it, and I didn’t really want to do it, so… I sort of sprinted out of the car.”

“Yeah.” It’s pretty clear by the look on his face, and the gentle kiss Jimmy lays on her lips, that while he really would have preferred she stay, he doesn’t begrudge her leaving. “And even with all of that, I will tell you that it was worth it, and that I wouldn’t change a day of it.”

Breena arches her eyebrow. “I’d change a few days of it.”

Jimmy knows what she’s talking about. “Okay, yeah, I’d change the hell out of the Harper Deering shit. But, not one minute of the part that was in your hands or mine.” He strokes her hair and shoulder gently. “And I’ll admit, you made an amazing pitcher of lemonade out of what we got dealt.”

She smiles again. “Wanted to make good on my promise.”

“And you did.”

“Promise?” Tim asks.

“I told him when we got engaged that I was going to blow his mind…”

Jimmy smiles. “My wedding present, and she did. Just about killed me, but… God…” He looks to Breena, making sure she’s good with him sharing this story, and she nods.

“It was about six weeks before we got married. Breena got a copy of The Joy of Sex, and decided we should read it together. Speaking of nights I didn’t make it all the way home…”

“I wanted to know what you liked.”

“So, we went through it, every page.” Jimmy runs his hand through his hair.

“And had a very frank conversation, about everything sex.”

“Because you were serious about waiting. No Clinton-esque definitions of sex here. Clothing stayed on, hands stayed on top of it. Part of why beach day was so intense. That was the first time I’d ever seen you in anything smaller than shorts and a t-shirt. First time I got to touch a lot of your skin.”

“So, we talked about everything. What I thought I was going to like. What he knew he liked. All of it.”

“Even the shoes, which I was really hoping wasn’t going to send you running away.”

Breena shrugs at that. “Might have if you’d lied about it, but, you didn’t. So… we talked, and after I did a lot of reading. I was getting ready for our honeymoon, had lingerie and toys and lubes and everything picked out. I was already on birth control, so no need for condoms. Everything was set.”

Jimmy sighs. “And then it wasn’t. The original plan was to shift the ceremony to the morning, and we’d at least have the day and the night. That was the idea.”

“We got a few pictures on the beach. Fast. Ducky wandered off as we got some with our parents, and…”

“And he got the call…” Jimmy’s teeth grit. “And our honeymoon was off and…”

“Yeah, anyway. Happy day, not thinking about that.”

Jimmy nods, pulling himself away from those memories. “So, we’re home. I’m working flat out. Shortest shift I pulled that week was fourteen hours. You guys did your ‘Oh, we got him, yay!’ dance, filled out the paperwork, and were done in two days.”

“Or so we thought.” Abby says.

“True.” It hadn’t been quite that cut and dried for them. It really wasn’t cut and dried for Jimmy. “I had 287 partial remains that had to be identified, put with the right person, and then sent home. On my own. Each piece had to be catalogued, and had its own paperwork to fill out. While getting the morgue functional again. Not too much bomb damage, but a lot of stuff got covered in dust and dirt and needed to be cleaned.” He shakes his head. “Lot of work.”

“So, the first week of married life was me in our apartment, mostly alone, with this guy who’d occasionally show up, flop into bed, crash, and then leave before I woke up.”

“I don’t think we saw each other, awake and in person, for more than ten minutes at a time for that first week,” Jimmy says. “Finally, I’ve got my stuff wrapped up, and send off the last report, and then Leon pokes his head down to the morgue and tells me that I’ve got five days of my honeymoon left, and I should go take them. So, I send a text home telling Breena that once the day is done, because I still had some paperwork to cover, that I’d be home and home for more than ten minutes.”

Jimmy smiles at the next memory.

“Which was something I’d been waiting for.”

“And a minute later I get this quadruple x rated email with a list on it that was so hot my computer melted into a puddle and then melted through my desk. All the things she most wants to do, along with the question, ‘How many do you think we can do in five days?’” Jimmy smiles at that memory, too. That was a great list. He still has it. “And it killed me. Literally. Dead on the floor. Everything you’ve ever wanted, at home, waiting for you, and you’re too damn tired to do anything about it.”

“Since we weren’t actually seeing each other, and because I really wanted to get honeymooning, I didn’t really get how tired he was.” Breena notices a bench, and nods at it. So they drift over, sitting down. She’s in Jimmy’s lap, head on his shoulder. Tim and Abby next to them, Tim’s arm around Abby’s shoulder. “He got home, looked at me, ’cause I’m dressed up and ready to go, and started
Jimmy looked a little sheepish. “I knew I couldn’t do it. It’s our first real night together, and all I’ve got energy for is sleeping. I figured that if I even tried, I’d be done in ten seconds, and I didn’t want that to be her first time, or our first time with each other. I mean… I wanted it to be perfect.” He’s watching Breena with intense tenderness in his eyes. “And perfect already got blown to shit, so amazing’s a good second place, and that wasn’t going to happen that night. I would have been lucky to pull off disappointing that night. I couldn’t stand the idea of that, but you were so eager and… So, yeah, finally get to our honeymoon, and I’m exhausted and crying, and she’s horrified because I’m breaking down and she thinks it’s her fault.”

“You weren’t kidding about traumatic, were you?” Tim asks. He remembers Jimmy describing their first few weeks together as traumatic.

“No,” Jimmy says, voice flat. “We finally get enough talking to get across the idea that I’m just completely fried, and that in a day or two I’d be all over her and everything on that list, but right at that moment I barely had enough energy to breathe, so sex was out.”

“And then he dropped and slept for thirty hours, only getting up to eat and pee and back to sleep again. I was pretty worried at first, but Ducky told me it was okay as long as he kept eating.”

“I finally wake up not feeling like a train wreck, get a shower and a shave and notice that I’m home alone, so I send off a text and find out that she’s working, but if I was up for it, she’s be interested in trying this whole married thing out once she got home.

“So, I had a few hours to go over that list, get the apartment cleaned up, make dinner, and when she got home, I was ready to play and she was, too.”

Breena smiles at him, gently kissing him, holding his hand in hers. “And it was perfect. Not what we were expecting, but…”

Jimmy nods, remembering that night and the morning that followed. “Yeah. It was. Worth every second of the wait and a hundred years more on top.” He looks away from Breena for a second, to Tim and Abby, and then back to Breena, “What’s the line? ‘No one writes songs about the ones that come easy?’”

Abby smiles at that, knowing what he’s referencing. “‘Spanning years and continents. Lives ruined, bloodshed. EPIC.’”

“If the quote fits…” Jimmy says.

Breena looks at the three of them. “So, are we EPIC?”

Abby squeezes her knee, kisses Jimmy, and then kisses Tim. “You know it, baby.”

Chapter End Notes

Jimmy and Abby are apparently fans of Veronica Mars, they're quoting Logan.
Rainbow Party

“You sure we’re not camping?” Jimmy says, as they turn off the tiny, but paved, road onto an even tinier dirt one.

“Is this place even on the GPS?” Tim asks.

“It’s on the GPS, and we’ve got functional WiFi. Anyone needs us, they can get us. We’re secluded, not vanished,” Abby replies.

They bump, slowly, down the dirt road for another minute, and finally come to a small clearing in the woods. And in the clearing there’s a small cabin.

Jimmy and Tim look at it. “Oh.” Tim says, nodding.

Jimmy smiles. “Looks good. Kind of wondering if there’s a witch or if Little Red Riding Hood’s going to show up.”

“Axe murders and harbingers,” Tim adds.

“We’re not that far into the woods,” Breena says, turning off the car. “Grab the cooler, and let’s get in.”

The guys get a few minutes to look around while Breena and Abby unpack the cooler.

Tim approves of the little nest they built in the solarium, and he spies the bag the lip tars live in on top of four plates sitting on the sofa, so he’s got a hint as to what Abby and Breena have planned for this afternoon.

He looks over to Abby, who’s in the kitchen with Breena, and says, “So, did you just bring everything with you?”

Abby looks up and smiles at him. “Not everything."

Breena adds, “But more than enough for three and a half days.”

Abby nods. “More than enough for a week.”

Jimmy returns from the bedroom, carrying the mirror. It had been over the dresser in the bedroom, not any more. He plops it onto the sofa.

“You’re really getting into being able to watch, aren’t you?” Tim asks him as Jimmy points him toward the mattresses. Tim gets to where he assumes they’ll mostly be, and checks the view. “Left about three inches.”

Jimmy nods and scoots the mirror over a little. “We all like it, and… Wait…” Jimmy seems to be noticing that if they can all see out, then that means anyone else can see in. “We’re far enough away from everyone else that no one’s going to just wander by, right?” After all, there’s a reason why they do stuff like this behind closed doors. And sure, maybe getting caught is a kick, but… He’s not sure if that’s a kick when it’s all four of them at once.

Actually, no. It’s not. That’s the difference between naughty and actual danger. Get walked in on in a club with his wife, no big deal. Maybe get smacked on the wrist and look a little sheepish. Get walked in on mid-orgy, and that might have repercussions. (It also occurs to him that he’s apparently getting old, because the version of him that had sex on every horizontal and most of the vertical surfaces at the Navy Yard wouldn’t have blinked at this. Or, another thought hits him, he supposes it’s possible that he’s learned something from his experiences with Lee.)

Breena strolls from the kitchen to the mattresses, slipping off her shoes, and snuggling in next to Tim. “According to Google Earth, the closest house to us is six miles away. There’s a hunting camp three miles east, but nothing is in season for another month and a half. People do camp out here, but we’re on marked private property. It’s not impossible, just like it’s not impossible that one of our neighbors at home might decide to come over at a bad moment, but it’s as unlikely as it’s possible to be.”

“This is as far away from the rest of the world as we could get, and still have all the necessities,” Abby says, sitting on the step down to the solarium. Tim kisses Breena and then scoots over to help her with her boots. She can still get them herself, but, like before, he likes her legs and she’s pregnant enough it’s starting to get awkward, so why not help? “But if this is uncomfortable, there’s a perfectly functional bedroom over there, with solid walls, and shades on the windows. Moving’s not a problem.”

Jimmy looks at the mattresses all laid out, then looks out at a lake and miles and miles and miles of trees, he thinks about what went into this, and decides that he’s being silly.

“We’re good here.” He looks down at the little makeup bag, the pack of baby wipes, and the plates on the sofa next to the mirror. “What’s that?” He knows the girls brought toys, and he’s had more than enough sex to have a clue what the baby wipes might be for, but the plates are throwing him for a loop. He’s sure they’ve got snacks, but they’ve just eaten, so… he’s not immediately seeing what might be in that bag or going on the plates.

Abby grins up at him, flexing her toes in Tim’s hands as he gently kisses her knees. “You remember when we were talking about rings ‘or something?’”

Jimmy nods, the idea that they’d get each other something to mark this, and that Abby had something besides a piece of jewelry she was interested in. He crawls into the center of the mattress, kissing both girls.

Abby lifts her leg and strokes her foot over Tim’s leg, and then scoots down to join the rest of them on the mattresses. Right now, they’re all mostly dressed, and lounging about, sitting or lying, just resting and being comfortable.

“When we were on our honeymoon,” she touches Tim’s lips on her throat, “we traded permanent kisses. I was hoping to add two more kisses, if you’d be game for that.”

Breena’s smiling at that. She’s never seen lipstick on Jimmy, and isn’t sure if he’ll be game for this, but hopes he’ll go for it. “How do you see this working?” she asks, knowing she’s setting up the show and tell part of the afternoon.

Abby crawls over to the sofa, over Tim and Jimmy, stopping for kisses on the way, and then dumps a huge collection of tiny tubes out of the bag. “I brought all of our lip tars. We’ve got every color you can imagine, and they’re liquid, so it’s really easy to mix colors or paint them on however you like.”
She grabs one of the pink ones, and squirts a tiny bit on the plate, showing off that each one of them will have their own plate for color mixing. “I was hoping to collect a whole lot of kisses, and give a bunch of them, too.” She air kisses at them. “The two best prints, I’ll get pictures of them, and after Sean’s on the outside, I’ll get them tattooed on.”

Jimmy’s looking intrigued by that, eyeing the colors, and heads closer to Abby. “So, you’re going to mix up some color for me, and I can kiss you, here—” He’s touching Abby’s throat, just below her ear, on the spider web side.

Tim butts in, “No.”

Jimmy looks away from Abby, staring at Tim, confused. “No? What, is her neck yours and yours only?”

Abby’s looking really amused at the idea that Tim might have dibs on certain parts of her. She and Jimmy settle back down on the mattresses, facing the other two.

“No!” Tim rolls his eyes a bit. Abby is his, but not like that. “It’s her neck. The reason you’re not going to put a kiss there is the exact same reason why my lip print isn’t already there. It’ll look like a snack the spider’s got sitting on the web waiting for her next meal.”

Jimmy’s eyes go a little wider at that, and as he looks at the web, and thinks about what his lip print likely looks like, and how from a few feet away, especially if it’s a bright color, it would likely look kind of caterpillarish, he says, “Oh.”

Breena laughs. “So, besides not on your spider web, or any of the other tattoos?” Abby nods. “Everywhere else is open?”

“No! Not everywhere else. It takes about a month for one to heal all the way up. So, there are some places I’d prefer weren’t out of commission for a month. And, since neither of you have lips that look anything like Tim’s, it can’t be visible when I’m dressed for work or church. Any skin you can’t see now is fair game.” She’s still got her sundress on, along with a collar, one wrist cuff, and socks that go to her knees. Both Jimmy and Breena are looking all over Abby. “And, of course, for just lipstick, you can put them anywhere you like.”

Breena shifts her gaze to Tim. “We adding some to you, too? Is that your ‘or something,’ also?”

Tim smiles. “Wasn’t what I was thinking. Not permanently, at least. With the lip tars, oh yeah, I want a full rainbow from you and Abby.”

Abby smiles. “And we both know where you want it.”

He half-smiles in response; Abby’s not wrong about where he wants it. “I’m easy to please on that. Do you want to add a kiss to me permanently?”

“Maybe…” Breena’s kind of liking the idea of marking Tim. “What were you thinking?” Breena asks him.

He stands up and shucks off his jeans and socks, then stretches his leg out, over Jimmy’s, foot resting on Breena’s hip. They’ve all got a good view of the dragon and Kelly’s band. He touches the bit of skin next to the dragon’s top most wing. “Molly’s band goes here.” He touches Kelly’s. “Kelly.” His fingers move two inches below where Molly’s would be. “One here, for Jon.” His fingers slip down, to just above Kelly’s, “Anna’s goes here.” Back to the top. “Sean’s. That leaves a few inches for any other children we have. Maybe Donny Palmer goes down here.” He taps above where Anna’s knot will go. “When we’re done with babies, two four strand knots, one at the top and one at the bottom, wrapping all the way around my leg, for the four of us.”

Jimmy whistles low at that, what Tim’s talking about will cover most of his calf.

Breena’s nodding. “Our family.”

Tim nods back to her. “Yeah. All of us, worn on my skin.” He’s got on a t-shirt, so he raises the sleeve a bit to show the band he and Abby share. “I was telling her that when hands that love you touch you, it should leave a mark. It should change you. That’s the change I want to make. Is that… You guys good with all the kids on me?” They haven’t specifically talked about the kids they already have, but Tim knows he’s thinking of all of them as ‘theirs’ and sure some of them are his and some are Jimmy’s for the sake of the outside world, but in his head at least, they’re theirs.

“Yeah,” Breena says softly, her fingers drift to the tiny diamond solitaire she wears around her throat. “Thanks for remembering….”

Tim nods, and looks to Jimmy who nods back at him. Jimmy looks away for a second, blinks hard, and then makes himself smile, pulls his shirt off, and says, “So… rainbow party?”

The thing Tim didn’t think of when he suggested a rainbow party to Abby is that he, still, thinks he looks like a massive dork when he’s wearing lipstick.

And sure, for playing, he likes the result of all those pretty kisses on Abby’s skin. (And hers on his.) But he doesn’t like how he looks with it on. (Actually, he doesn’t like how he thinks he looks with it on. He still hasn’t looked at himself when he’s doing this.)

But, and this is the part that’s biting him in the ass, as both Jimmy and Breena are enthusiastically getting into this, it’s that Jimmy and Breena are, by default, also going to see him with lipstick on.

On the upside, if he looks as stupid as he thinks he does, Breena probably won’t mention it, and Jimmy doesn’t have anyone to pull into teasing him about it. He’s wearing it, too, and Tony’ll completely flip out at the idea that this is the sort of thing they get up to when they’re on their own.

Still, he’s warily eyeing the colors as Abby’s putting tiny dabs of them on the plate.

“You weren’t kidding about every color, were you?” Breena’s asking, playing with one of the tubes.

“Nope. All of them. We might have gone a little crazy on them when we decided we liked this.”

Breena laughs. “Come here, babe,” she’s patting the spot on the mattress right in front of her, and Jimmy’s scooting over. She laughs at that, too, giving Jimmy a quick kiss. “Other babe.”

“Oh, me?” Tim starts to head over. “You need different nicknames for us.”

Breena inclines her head in agreement, but right this second she’s not feeling much need to wrack her brain for new terms of endearment. “Close your eyes.”

Jimmy’s looking amused, as Abby’s getting him settled and gently brushing the primer on his lips.

“Why?” Tim asks, feeling a little nervous, wondering what the hell she’s going to put on him that he can’t see while she does it.

“Because watching makes you uncomfortable.”
“Oh.” She’s not wrong. So his eyes shut, and he can hear her messing around and humming a bit, followed by the slightly wet, ticklish sensation of having his lips painted. “Open up.”

Tim does, letting her mess around with him.

“Ohhh… Good pick,” Abby says.

“Can I pick my color?” Jimmy asks, “Or are we just the toys you’re playing with today?”

Abby lets off a diabolical laugh. “Mental note, toy night is going on the list.”

Tim can feel Breena nodding at that. He can imagine her smile.

“Yes.” Abby says to Jimmy. “Though I was thinking of mixing a few together for you.”

“Mixing them how?”

“Let me do it, kiss it on me, and if you don’t like how it looks, we’ll do any colors you like.”

Tim hears Jimmy say, “Okay.” He’s trying not to squirm as Breena’s gently putting on… It feels like a lot.

“Lighter hand, love.” Abby says to her.

“We want a bunch of prints, right? Enough for both of us, not just you.”

“Oh!”

More dabbing at his lips. It didn’t take nearly this long when Abby did it. He’d like to ask, but she’s putting more stuff on his lips so…

“How much are these?” Breena asks.

“Eighteen dollars. They’ll last pretty much forever. For just casual wear, you only need a tiny bit.”

“That’s what I’m thinking. Better texture than what I use at work. Might have to invest in some of these.”

Tim finds that a little off-putting, he’d rather not be thinking about Breena’s clients right now, but, he’s still not saying anything because she’s lightly flicking the brush over his lips and humming again. He’s got the sense that if his eyes were open, he’d see her critically looking at what she’s done.

He’s about to open his eyes, but then the brush flicks out and there are a few more light flicks.

“Okay, all done. You want to see?”

He’s done, so he opens his eyes. And, okay, yes, he looks. He’s right.
He looks dumb as hell with lipstick. Eyeliner is fine. Tattoos are good. The kilt rocks. This looks stupid. Fortunately, he gets something he likes out of this.

It’s dark, metallic blue. Shiny cobalt. Not a bad color on him, if it was a shirt or something, hell, eyeliner even. DUMB on his lips. But the girls seem to approve.

He’s about to rub his lips together, because seeing that’s made him very aware of them, and Breena immediately whacks him lightly on the shoulder. “No you don’t!”

He’s not sure if he can talk without messing it up, but he tries anyway. “Okay. Shall I do you?”

Breena lights up at that. “Do me how. My lips?” She lightly touches her bottom lip. “Or are you going to decorate me?” She gestures to all of her naked skin.

Tim-whistles a low breath, remembering, vividly why he likes this. So many good options with that. He knows that eventually these will dry, and once they dry they don’t budge, so…

“Decorations first, then you’re going to sit in my lap, and I’ll paint your lips, and you’ll decorate Jimmy and I.”

She grins at that.

His eyes slip all over her, and he laughs a little. She arches an eyebrow, as Abby says to Jimmy, “All done.”

Tim answers Breena’s look. “Virgin territory. Miles and miles of untouched skin.” Then, as he’s checking out what Abby did to Jimmy, he carefully lays a kiss on Breena’s shoulder. The kiss on her skin is blue, bold and vibrant. He glances over and sees the kiss Jimmy’s putting on Abby’s inner knee in dark green and oaky brown, looks like she decided to match his eyes.

He doesn’t think lipstick looks as dumb on Jimmy as it does on him, but it’s not something he’d ever suggest Jimmy should do for a going out look.

Tim does like the look of Jimmy’s lips on Abby’s skin though. And as he lays another kiss on Breena’s throat, matching the one on Abby, he really likes how his lips look on her. Yep, Abby, Breena, either and both of them, this hits that little possessive kink just perfect. He’s idly wondering if Breena might be game for a tattoo, as he decides where Abby needs another kiss.

Tim slips over a bit, laying his next kiss on Abby’s breast. Lifting it gently and leaving a blue mark on the underside along with a deep, gently biting kiss. Then back to Breena. Enough of the tar came off on the first three kisses that this one should leave a really nice print.

“Where?”

Jimmy’s also over with her, so for the moment she’s a bit distracted as he’s marking her inner thigh. Right where her thigh and pelvis meet. She gently taps the other thigh, and Tim smiles. He waits for Jimmy to pull back, and then lifts her leg, gently nuzzling from her knee to her pelvis, and finishes with a wet kiss to match Jimmy’s.

As he’s doing that, he feels lips on the small of his back, and he’s not sure if they’re Abby’s or Jimmy’s, and right now, he doesn’t care.

Tim scoots up an inch, and over an inch, gently nosing Breena’s pubic hair. “Next time you shave, my lip print goes here.”

“Sunday. All four of us slick and smooth and bare.”

That sounds awesome to Tim.

Jimmy groans at that idea, and Tim looks over to see his kiss print on Abby’s mound, one slightly higher and to the right on her hip, another one next to his on her breast. Breena pulls away from Tim for a second, and kisses Jimmy, deep, on the lips, and then says to him, “Wanna see it? Me riding you, your dick slipping in and out of me, with Tim’s lips right on my pussy.” Jimmy groans at that, too, and gently pushes her back onto the bed, trailing fainter and fainter kisses from her throat to her pussy.

Abby’s not wearing any lip tar yet, so she glances to Tim, and then snuggles into his lap.

“One sec.” He’s got something he wants to do before his lips dry. He gently lowers her onto her back and lays a kiss right above her belly button. Good one, clear edges, and then grabs a brush gets a bit more tar on it, and writes his name right under it. He gets a picture, too. Her tummy, gently swollen with Sean, his lips and name just above her belly button.

Abby’s staring at that, looking amused, and he kisses her lips, leaving faint traces of blue, while saying, “Just signing my work.”

Abby giggles at that, and Breena does, too. (Jimmy’s busy, and guessing by the sound Breena makes, he does something to make sure she’s paying attention to him.) Jimmy’s maybe missing something of the spirit of this, in that he’s kissing Breena over and over in the same place, but she’s having a very good time with it, so… Maybe he’s got the idea just right.

Tim grabs a baby wipe and wipes the blue lip tar off the brush. Then he starts up on Abby’s lips. He’s not as good with the brushes or the colors, but he thinks he does a passable job of mixing and then painting her lips blow job red. (He’s a tad distracted by her in his lap, all warm and soft and gently rocking against him.)

But, after a bit, her lips are done, and Abby’s ready to get kissing.

Abby kisses Tim. First print on his collarbone. Then, after one last warm, rocking moment on his lap, she kisses his cheek, and pats him gently so he kneels up, and closes her lips around the tip of his dick. He’s not full hard, yet, they’re just getting started, but that’s certainly helping things in that direction. “That’s where you want them, right?”

He smiles. “I like them all over, but…” he looks down at the first of the rings of color on his penis, “Yeah, you know it!”

Abby winks and then flips around and gently kisses Breena’s breast, leaving her lips in scarlet on Breena’s nipple.

Next one’s on her ribs, and Tim’s not sure if he wants to just watch, or if he should jump in. He settles for at least another second of watching as Abby gently licks Breena’s lips, and then shifts over to leave a bright red print on the nape of Jimmy’s neck, then one just below it between his shoulder blades.

He takes Breena’s hand in his, and kisses her wrist, one last, light somewhat smeary blue kiss, as she’s arching against Jimmy, hand clenched in his hair. (And yes, she’s tugging on his hair, and Jimmy’s moaning, maybe at that, maybe at what he’s doing to Breena. Tim’s not sure which, but either way, they’re both having a good time.)

He pulls back, knowing he’s got to put more of the lipstick on if he’s going to leave more kiss prints. Abby’s looking busy, trailing kisses down Jimmy’s back, and he thinks she needs some kisses on her back, too, so he grabs a brush and the plate with all the colors and heads to the mirror.

Not difficult to pick his second color. He might think black’s the only acceptable color on him (at least in the sense of not looking like a total twit) but for the sake of how it’ll look on Abby and Breena, he snags the brush, and mixes the silver along with a little green, thinking that looks good, and is different enough from the green Jimmy’s wearing right now, to make it easy to see whose lips are whose.

A minute of taking off the remains of the blue, another minute of putting the new silvery-green on, and he’s ready to go.

He looks at Breena and Abby. God, so many good options. Miles and miles of beautiful skin, all begging for a little color.

Breena looks done for the moment. She’s relaxing, purring, Jimmy’s head resting on her thigh, as she gently pets his hair. Abby’s kissing her way down Jimmy’s back. Tim finds the red lip print on his right ass cheek especially amusing. Then his eyes slip away from Jimmy’s ass (kind of boring to him) to Abby’s (much more fun) which is nicely high in the air as she’s kissing the back of Jimmy’s knee.

Yep, that definitely needs some kiss marks.

Tim’s lying on his back, left arm extended over his head, Abby kissing up his leg while Breena’s got his arm.

He thinks he’s purring.

He’s not a cat guy, (lifelong cat allergies means he sees them as fuzzy annoyances at best) but right now he’s feeling awfully feline, all stretched-out, naked, spotted with glorious color, beautiful women petting him.

Breena gets to his wrist, looking at the one kiss mark that won’t wash off when they’re done.

“What if I want to put a kiss on you that won’t wash off?”

Tim tilts his head toward her. (His wrist is above his head, so he’s looking up and backwards.) “I told Abby a long time ago that I’d proudly wear any mark she wanted to put on me.” Breena leans down and kisses him, planting a candy pink kiss on his lips. “Same goes for you.”

Breena’s eyeing his wrist. “And you don’t have your heart set on another ring or something like that?”
“I’m fine with the cuff, or a ring, or… It just has to be something from the three of you that I wear on my skin. Beyond that, it doesn’t matter.”

“What are you thinking?” Abby’s asking, looking up from the trail of kisses she’s painting up Tim’s thigh.

Breena scoots over, next to Jimmy, who’s adding another color to his lips. She spends a few seconds looking at the already mixed colors, and then takes the periwinkle blue that matches her eyes and paints her lips with it.

“The cuff covers from here to here?” She touches just below Tim’s palm to two and a half inches lower.

“Yep.”

“Okay.” Breena takes his wrist in her hand, and lays a kiss on his wrist. Between hers and Abby’s it look almost like he’s got a 7 on his wrist. He’s a little puzzled at the placement, until he gets where she’s going with this.

Jimmy gets it about the same time Tim does, and he looks at Tim, raising an eyebrow.

“Go kiss that off on the girls.” Jimmy’s got a dark red on right now, and it’s too close to Abby’s blow job red to work on his wrist.

“You want my kiss?” Jimmy asks.

Tim almost shrugs at that. Jimmy’s lips tattooed to his skin was never on his list of dearest hopes, but he likes the symbolism, likes the closed triangle. He’s looking at two thirds of his loves, and… it’s just not done without Jimmy.

“Not done without you. Unless it makes you feel weird.”

“Nah.” Abby’s closer to him right now than Breena is, so he pulls her close and kisses her ear lobe. Then puts another one on her shoulder, giving her angel a kiss halo. One more right above the cuff tattoo on her arm, and then over to Breena. He lays a dark red kiss on her ankle, another on her shin, and one on her knee cap before the tar has mostly wiped off.

Back to the colors he goes, spending a moment thinking, and another moment mixing. Like Breena, he decides to match his eye color. So, deep greeny-brown. Tim would call it ‘cool moss’ which is probably just him being poetic, but if there’s ever a time to be poetic, describing your lovers’ kiss colors is probably it.

Tim sits up and holds out his wrist to Jimmy, who takes it in his hand and gently presses his kiss to close the triangle.

Tim takes a moment to look at it, all three sets of lips on his wrist, and nods. He likes it. It feels… right, and done, and he likes the idea of it hiding under his cuff. Likes the idea of carrying their love on his skin everywhere he goes.

He looks at his dragon, and touches it gently. “This is who I want to be.” More than that, it’s his love for them, worn on his skin. He looks at but doesn’t touch the lip prints. Jimmy’s is still wet and he doesn’t want them to smear. This is their love for him. “And this is what lets me be him.”
Rainbow party is, forgiving the pun, a brilliant idea. Everyone’s covered with pretty splotches of color. Tim’s got reds and pinks and coral and blues and greens and purples all over him. Kisses on hands and feet and everything in between. Both he and Jimmy are sporting rainbow covered erections, and the four of them have taken about three million pictures to go with this.

Breena’s still looking Abby over. She’s covered in kiss marks, his lips, Jimmy’s, and Breena’s but so far, Breena hasn’t found a place she wants to leave her forever kiss.

And then she does. Tim sees the way she lights up with it, and then springs over to the plate with all the colors on it. She’s carefully mixing as she says, “Tim’s is black; I want my lips to be lip colored.” After a few seconds, she’s got her color mixed up, and applied onto her lips, then she kneels on the bed behind Abby, gathering her hair in her hand, and gently, carefully, kisses the nape of Abby’s neck. “Right there. Between your hair and the collars you like, no one will see it unless you want them to. But it’s still close and sensual and romantic.”

Tim grabs his phone and takes several pictures. Making sure to get the color as true to life as possible, as well as good, close-up detail of the kiss.

Abby takes the camera from him. “Yeah. I like that.” She turns and kisses Breena. Not trading marks, this is just lips on lips and happiness slipping from one body to another.

“How about it, Jimmy, which one of yours is going to be forever?” Abby’s looking over the kisses, some green and brown, some blues, some purples, a few in black, and a few more in dark red, that are all from Jimmy.

Jimmy’s also looking, thinking. He looks up at Tim, and then back to Abby, “When you’re touched by hands that love you, it should leave a mark, huh?”

Tim nods. “That’s what I was thinking.”

“He’ll cover our lips with his wrist cuff. You wear one most of the time, how about always?”

Abby nods. “I can do that. You thinking about my wrist?”

“Forearm, really, but you’ve already got tatts all over them.” Jimmy lays his palm along the inside of her forearm, the bottom of his palm just about at the bottom of hers. “This is the first place we touched.”

She smiles at that. “When you glued your hands to my arms.”

“Who knew what that’d turn into?” Jimmy reaches over and grabs a baby wipe. He wipes off Abby’s arm, removing several kisses, and after her skin is dry, he lifts her wrist to his lips, kissing along the faint blue shadow of her radial artery. “There.”

Abby smiles at it, and then kisses him, holding her arm carefully to let that print dry properly. Tim gets a shot of it, nodding, liking the placement and symbolism.

Jimmy’s looking over his skin, and then stands up to check his back in the mirror. He’s looking at the kisses, gently touching the now dry blow job red kiss between his shoulder blades, while thinking about the idea of forever. “So, how bad does getting one of these hurt?”

“How bad does getting one of these hurt?”

“Not the end of the world or anything, but it stings,” Abby says. “Why?”

“How bad does getting one of these hurt?”

“No.” Abby’s shaking her head. “There’s no reason for you to do that.”

Jimmy’s looking irked at that. They’ve got them all over their skin, why not him? “How about liking the idea? Sounds like reason to me.”

“Jimmy, you react badly to henna,” Abby says.

“And Sharpies…” Breena adds.

“You tried that?” Tim asks.

Breena’s nodding, pulling Jimmy back to bed. “I did a little design on his calf, and the next day the whole thing was swollen and red for days. You and ink don’t get along. So, let’s not inject it into your skin and see what sorts of new, fun allergies you’ve got.”

“Fine.” Jimmy’s not looking thrilled, but he doesn’t want to argue. Not right now. Not with pretty and naked people all around him. (Though Tim’s making a mental note that Jimmy’s got first dibs on the shower when they’re done.)

It looks like a Crayola factory exploded. Or… that holiday in India, with the dye, Ducky would know what it’s called, it looks like that.

There’s four sweaty, smeary, spent people on what were once black sheets that are now very much not black sheets.

Apparently, if you get sweaty, and apply some silicon based lube that gets smeared to other places, along with natural lube, and saliva, you come up with a cocktail lip tars cannot withstand. Most of those nice, defined, brilliant kisses have bled into the most conspicuous camouflage pattern in existence.

And Tim wouldn’t have it any other way.

He’s spooned up behind Abby, her body still soft and wet on his. He lightly kisses the smear that was once Breena’s lips on the nape of her neck. She purrs a little, shifting, and he slips wetly from her, coaxing one last, soft twitch from her body.

He can feel an arm slipping against his back. Jimmy’s, he’s guessing by the hair. He’s not rubbing Tim’s back, not as his main focus, (probably). Tim’s not quite feeling energetic enough to look up, but he thinks Breena’s on top of Jimmy (she was before he and Abby rolled to their side to finish up with a slow and lazy spoon), and he’s gently stroking her back, and just rubbing Tim’s as a side bonus.

Tim drags his arm down Abby’s side, resting his hand on her tummy, holding her close as he scoots back an inch to get closer to Jimmy and Breena.

Breena kisses his shoulder, and he feels her hair on his back and shoulder, so he guesses she’s snuggled her head in against Jimmy’s shoulder, back of her head to his back.

For a few more heartbeats they rest there, tired and happy. Then his phone buzzes. He doesn’t want to get up, but… But it could be… God, what time is it? Sun’s low, so it’s got to be past six. So, Sarah maybe, or work or… He sits up slow, kissing both girls, and tries to remember where the hell his pants ended up.

Eventually he sees them in the corner of the solarium, and reaches for them with pink/purple/green/blue hands, digging his phone out of his pocket.

It’s a text from his sister. We’re doing just fine. Under that is a shot of Kelly sitting on one side of a nicely set table with Sarah on the other. Looks like dinner’s in full swing, for them.

He flops back to the center of the bed, showing off the shot. “Looks like they’re getting on okay without us.”

Abby looks at the picture, and takes the phone from Tim. Abby here. Awww!

You guys having a good time? ;)

Yes!

Then I’ll let you get back to it.

Thanks.

Jimmy’s still laying on his back, but Breena’s starting to get up, too. She gently pokes him. “Come on, shower time.” Tim glances at her, and yes, both of them are thinking that getting the pigments off of Jimmy is a good plan. Yes, they’re designed for skin wear, but… just in case.

“Then feeding the pregnant lady!” Abby adds.

“Shower big enough for the four of us?” Tim asks. Now that he’s not all post-orgasmic glow-y, he’s starting to feel a bit sticky and gross.

“Nope.” Breena’s pulling Jimmy up, and he’s making less than happy noises about that. He looks like he wants to sleep, but finally he lurches up. “Fifteen minutes, then it’s your turn.”

Tim nods, and Abby looks around. “Come on, phase two. Won’t take us more than a minute.”

Breena grins at them, herding Jimmy toward the bathroom.

Tim glances at her, covered in her own rainbow of smeary splotches, hair spiky and sweaty, eyes glowing at him. “You’ve got a phase two?”

“Oh yeah.” She’s smiling brilliantly. “And you’re going to love it.”

“Really?” If phase two involves anything beyond a shower and sleep, he’s not sure how useful he’ll be for it.

“Yep. Come on, let’s get the sheets off and clean sheets on.”

That sounds like a step toward sleeping. “Okay.”

Half an hour later they’re on phase two, and Abby is right, he loves it. They’re all showered and dried off, naked and comfortable. (All four of them hitting more of a second wind once they got up and moving around again.)

They put clean sheets on the mattresses, as well as blankets and pillows. There’s sushi and lettuce rolls, cold dumplings, sake and tea. There’s feeding each other, bits of dinner nibbled from each other’s fingers, as they lay around.

And then, from there, there’s falling asleep watching the stars come out above and the last of the summer fireflies flitting among the trees.
One of the things that happens when you sleep with three other people is getting woken up. Just how it is. Only two of you can be on the outside, so if one of you on the inside wants to get out of bed, you’ve kind of got to scoot over at least one other person.

Tim thinks that if/when they get to the point where they all sleep together most nights, it’ll be the sort of thing that he’ll get used to. And, in his bed or Jimmy’s he’s almost to the point where he just sort of notices it and falls back to sleep a minute later.

Just like how, back when they were first together, Abby getting into and out of bed would wake him up a bit, but now he’s so used to it that it doesn’t touch his sleep.

New bed, different room, and bedmates he’s not entirely used to, so, when bright and god awful early Jimmy hops out of bed, Tim’s eyes pop open, too.

“Go back to sleep,” Jimmy says quietly as he tucks Tim back in. (He’s a little fuzzy on how he ended up on the edge of the bed with Jimmy next to him… bathroom run, he remembers, he put himself next to Jimmy when he got back rather than try to wriggle into the spot he left.)

Tim scoots into the warm patch Jimmy had been in, cuddling Breena from one side while Abby’s got her on the other, and tries to fall back to sleep.

Tries being the operative word. It’s really bright in here. All glass walls sounds really cool, and looks really cool, until it’s 6:30 in the morning and the sun’s shining right in your face.

He gets up, and heads into the rest of the house, thinking a little coffee, maybe snooze some on the sofa (in the living room where, thank God, it’s kind of dark) sounds like a good plan. Maybe find Jimmy, or read or something.

He’s actually a lot less tired than he expects to be. Probably because they slept a lot yesterday, and technically didn’t stay up all that late, either.

Jimmy’s not in the living room or kitchen. Probably outside. Sunrise on the porch. That sounds good to Tim.

He’s feeling a little chilly. Naked, a few minutes post dawn, just left a nice, warm bed… He grabs the blanket off the back of the sofa, wraps it around himself and heads into the kitchen.

He can smell coffee, so Jimmy must have been through here not too long ago. Once his cup is full, he heads out to the back porch.

Still no Jimmy. Bedroom? He might have decided it was too bright and wanted better sleep. Tim decides he’s happy where he is. It’s cool enough he can see the steam rising off his coffee. He takes a deep swallow, enjoying the warmth on his hands and lips, the bitter/milky/sweet on his tongue, and clean pine-y air around him.
Maybe they’ll get a shot to do this next year, too.

He likes the idea of them having this time, a weekend a year, that’s just theirs.

Contemplating that, he heads to the porch railing, placing his coffee cup on it, and leaning his forearms against it. For a second, he notices that doesn’t hurt, at all, so he tentatively leans more of his weight into his arms, the sort of casual positioning he never would have given a first, let alone, second thought to this time last year. It works. His arm and shoulder don’t yell at him for doing that. So he settles in, leaning against the rail, watching the forest around them and lake below.

It’s when his eyes meander to the lake that he finds Jimmy.

Tim is intellectually aware of the idea that Jimmy does yoga. Really does it. Seriously practices and is good at it. But, at least lately, he hasn’t seen Jimmy do much out of the usual. Like he and Abby used to, (Tim’s not doing much of anything more challenging than standing on one foot and some twists these days, and Abby’s grabbing every extra minute of sleep she can, so right now there’s no morning yoga at the McGee house.) Jimmy’s got a morning routine, and while it’s certainly challenging in the sense of involves poses Tim’s not sure he could get into even when he was working at it, Jimmy never really looks like he’s pushing himself at it.

He’s pushing himself this morning.

On several levels. First off: he’s on sand: soft, cool, shifting under his weight, sand. Not a nice firm floor. Second of all: no mirrors, so he can’t really see himself. (Tim needs to keep checking the mirrors, otherwise he’ll get lost/end up sore when he pushes his joints too far.) Third: he’s going for intense poses. Tim’s hit the edges of some of what Jimmy’s doing, so he’s got an idea of how much strength and flexibility it takes to get into bird in a basket, (more than he has now) let alone balance (more than he ever did, he’s toppled over every time he’s tried it.) But right now, Jimmy’s starting with something that looks like bird in a basket, planting both palms in the sand, crouching down, knees on his elbows, raising onto his toes, and then shifting all of his weight onto his hands, lifting his feet off the sand. (This is where, without fail, Tim lands on the floor, sometimes head first.) But, he’s not stopping there.

Tim’s watching it, and he’s still not sure what the hell Jimmy’s doing, but somehow he’s… God, it looks like planking, body braced on his arms, torso and legs straight out, but… and this is the part that’s amazing to Tim, his feet aren’t touching the ground. Or his knees. Just hands.

He does something, pulls his legs around a bit, and now he’s got one thigh on his elbow, and the other leg extending straight out behind him. Tim thinks that one’s called side firefly or something like that. It’s the sort of thing he’s seen pictures of and immediately assumed that the use of wires or some sort of XF team was involved.

But Jimmy’s actually doing it, hovering into gravity, and more importantly balance, defying poses, and holding them for several long slow breaths before unfolding himself back into down facing dog and from there back into mountain.
For a moment, Tim’s watching and just thinking about how beautiful it is.

Jimmy’s slipped into warrior, bathed in orangy-pink sunrise, and it’s beautiful.

For another moment, he’s calm, watching, enjoying, feeling the satisfaction that comes with seeing someone do something they’re insanely good at.

And that’s good.

And then it starts to fade away, anger creeping in. Tim should be able to do that, too. Okay, not that. He wouldn’t be that good, or strong, or flexible, but if that fucker and his minions hadn’t stolen his body from him for months, he’d be able to be there, on that little bit of beach, with Jimmy, doing his own morning workout.

He spent years working on this, okay, not a lifetime, not yet, but he’s pretty much back to step one, and he resents the hell out of that. The most complicated thing he’s doing now is standing on his tip toes, on both feet, slowly building up his ankle/arch strength. He can’t even stay in tree for more than a few breaths on his left foot, not yet. (His balance is still off, and that pisses him off, too.) And he hasn’t been brave enough to try anything involving his arms. Even the idea of attempting to extend his right arm enough for something as basic as down facing dog, let alone putting that much weight on it, makes him want to wince.

He’ll get it back. Everyone says that. Do the work and get it back.

Great, he doesn’t want to get ‘back’ he wants to be forward.

He sees Jimmy standing, relaxed, dusting the sand off his skin, then putting on some shorts and his glasses, which is when it hits Tim that Jimmy’s naked. He guesses it didn’t stand out before because that was just how that was supposed to be. Out and about in the sunrise with no one else around, of course you’d be naked, right?

Or maybe he’s just used to Jimmy naked, so it’s not remarkable to him, not anymore.

He doesn’t know. He does know he’s trying to shove anger out of the way. Well, trying to be aware of it, and why he’s feeling it, accepting that it’s real, and letting it go. That’s what Wolf’s suggested he try to do with it, though Tim’s a bit fuzzy on the difference between letting it go and pushing it out of his mind.

Either way, he’s fairly calm by the time Jimmy’s up with him.

“Enjoy the show?” Jimmy says once he’s on the porch.

“Will you take it wrong if I say yes?”

“What’s the wrong way?” Jimmy looks interested in that idea.

“I don’t know.” Probably something along the lines of enjoying it the way Breena or Abby would, which, he didn’t, but he’s not sure if making that distinction is really necessary, or, given why they’re here, warranted.

Jimmy runs his fingers through his hair. Close up, Tim can see he’s flushed pink and sweaty. He takes a drink of his coffee and flops bonelessly onto one of the chaises. “That felt good.”

“Looked like it.”
“Been… at least a year since I had the chance to do that. It’d freak the neighbors out if I headed out at sunrise to do a proper sun salutation. Bob’d be over less than ten minutes later, bitching about how he’s got three teenage daughters and what the hell did I think I was doing!”

Tim nods. He’s met Bob. Kind of uptight and stuffy, but also the kind of guy who will lend you a trimmer if you need to borrow one. Tim tries to think back to what Jimmy might have done a year ago that gave him a shot at this, but he doesn’t remember. Kelly was brand new a year ago, and he’s a bit fuzzy about what was happening outside the tight circle of his own home/job then.

Jimmy sees him thinking, trying to place it, and adds, “Moonrise last time, but that’s good, too.”

“Where?”

“Last… late summer, early fall, not sure, we got down to Ed and Jeannie’s. The girls were asleep. Just me and the sand. Dark enough no one else was going to fuss.” Jimmy closes his eyes and is quiet for a few seconds. “Probably as close as I ever get to how church is supposed to feel.”

“Reverence?”

“Something like that. Peaceful and connected, definitely.” He opens his eyes and looks more carefully at Tim, catching something, he’s not sure what, exactly, in his voice. “You okay?”

Tim shrugs. “Would have liked to have joined you.”

Jimmy looks a little surprised at that. Not that he’d want to join in, but that he wouldn’t join in if he wanted to. “You want a formal invite or something?”

Tim looks at his right arm, and Jimmy says, “Oh.”

Tim nods. He raises his right arm, a hell of a lot higher than he could have this time last month, but he can’t get it straight up, arm along his ear, yet. “Not quite there, yet. Pissed about not being there. Pissed at having to go back to square one.”

Jimmy nods. “Yeah.” They’re quiet for a moment, looking at the lake. Tim leaning against the rail. Jimmy resting on the chaise. Then Jimmy says, “It doesn’t have to be about your body. There are entire disciplines devoted to thought or breath. Last I checked, your lungs work fine.”

Tim turns to Jimmy, back against the rail. “Not my brain?”

Jimmy smirks. “That’s always been the question, right?”

Tim smiles at him.

“Go play. Get some sand between your toes. Splash around some. I’ve seen you sleep, so I know for a fact you can pull off corpse pose, kiss that blanket goodbye and feel the ground on your back.”

“You gonna watch?”

“You going to take it wrong if I do?”

“No.” Tim drapes the blanket over the railing, feeling the slight chill at the air, and a vague naughty thrill at walking around balls out naked in the sunshine. He’s never been naked outside in daylight, and it does make him feel good, the same way peeking at his presents used to.

The ground is prickly on his feet, and he’s realizing that Jimmy walked down with flip flops, in addition to shorts. So, two steps onto his journey, he’s turning around, heading back up to the porch, and stealing Jimmy’s flip flops, not like he needs them for laying on the porch. They’re a bit small, Jimmy wears a ten and a half, he wears an eleven, but do what they need to do.

Once he gets down to the lake, he kicks off the flip flops, turns, sees Jimmy watching, and waves, and then feels kind of… Stuck and silly.

The sand’s cool and pleasant between his toes. It feels good. But, he’s not exactly feeling any desire to lay down on it. He stares at gently swaying leaves above his head, and then water rippling against the sand below his toes. That’s more appealing to him.

Tim takes a few steps, finds that the air may be cool, fall is starting to take a hold of it, but the water isn’t. Summer still flows through the lake, days and nights of sun and heat soaking in and warming the water.

This feels a lot better than sand.

He wades out and then jumps for it. He’s been swimming at least three times a week since he got hurt. It’s not precisely the sort of weight bearing exercise he needs to get himself fully back to functional, but it is a way for him to really move and build up strength so he can get to the kind of exercise he needs to get himself back.

He’s not elegant in the water. Can’t be, not without full range of motion in his right arm or left leg. But it does feel good. He swims half way out, looks around, decides that if he wants to get back on his own, now’s a good time to turn back, so he does.

It’s a longer run than he does in the pool, cooler and deeper, too. So when his feet touch sand and stone, he’s feeling pretty tired. He kicks his feet up, leveling out on his back, and lets the water support him.

Tim’s not sure how long he rests there, floating on his back, feeling small waves lapping at his skin. He doesn’t think, beyond the fact that he gets out before he sunburns that it matters.

And maybe it’s not church, or reverence, or any connection to much beside his body, but it does feel good, in a quiet, settled sort of way. So there’s that.

Eventually, he hears Abby calling his name. He lifts his head out of the water, and sees her waving him in. “Breakfast!”

He’s in favor of that.

When he gets in, he can smell more coffee, along with the turkey sausage they got, eggs, and he can see Abby and Breena have small bowls of berries and cream on the table for them.

All of that looks really good.

Abby looks at him, steps closer, about to wrap her arms around him, then she squints a bit, and says… “Ummm… shower?”

He’s still wet all over, so he’s not feeling much need to get wetter. He’s not getting why he’s untouchable or why he needs to wash off right away.
Jimmy glances over at him (now wearing his glasses) and chokes off a quick laugh.

“What?”

“You’ve got algae in your hair. And…”

Breena’s looking at his shoulders. He twists a bit and notices that, yes, he’s got a faint greenish stain all along his back.

“Ahh. There better be some berries left for me when I get back.”

“We won’t start without you. But shower fast!” Abby replies.

“So, do we have plans for today?” Jimmy asks as he chews the last bite of his sausage.

The girls grin at him. Yes, it’s very clear from the looks on their faces that there are indeed plans for today.

Breena hops up. There’s a pen and a small pad of paper next to the phone in the kitchen. She rips a page off the pad, writes something on it quickly, and rips it in four.

“I know we’ve all been thinking about this for years, so…” She hands each of them a piece of paper.

“Favorite, hottest fantasy time. Everything you want is on the table. Tell us what you’ve been dreaming of. Then we get to play in order of the numbers.”

Everyone looks pretty enthusiastic about this game. Tim glances at his and sees the one on it. He grins. There is something he’s been thinking of for a while now. “Who’s got two? I’ve got one, but I’m not sure we’re equipped for what I want to do. Let me check, and while I do, we’ll listen to two,” he says getting off his stool at the breakfast bar.

“Me,” Breena says.

Tim grins. He wants to hear what Breena’s been dreaming of, too. “Or maybe I’ll check, tell you guys, and then settle down and listen. Don’t want to miss any of yours. Are we just talking first?”

“Yeah,” Breena says.

“Okay, back in a bit.”

They watch him wander from the breakfast bar to the bedroom, and can hear him puttering around in there. A minute later they hear, “Abby, where’s the toy bag?”

“Left night stand. What are you looking for?”

“I’ll tell you in a second.” They hear him rummaging around. “Good, you brought everything.”

“So, what’s with all the build up?” Jimmy asks when he rejoins them.

“It takes props, and if we didn’t have them…”
“And do we have them?” Abby asks. She knows what they brought, and sure, not all of the toys came along, but enough of them did that if they aren’t equipped for this, it means Tim’s about to go off on one of his pretty far off the reservations kinks.

“Sort of. We’ve got the props, but there’s nothing really good to tie me to.”

Abby smiles, wide and dirty; she knows where this is going.

Breena looks really intrigued. “Come on... Details!”

“Okay. Jimmy, you’re not really in this.”

“You’re not in mine, either.”

The look they give each other perfectly understands that they both want time with the girls on their own, and that, for those purposes, the other guy is superfluous to the mix.

Abby and Breena just look from one to the other, not exactly rolling their eyes, but they aren’t in any way surprised by this, and both of the guys can tell that they think this is sort of silly.

Tim’s about to just get into it, but… he thinks a bit more, and decides that it’s always a good idea to give everyone an out. “Breena, if you don’t want to go along with this, I will completely understand. It takes a really long time, like, at least an hour, and…”

“Are you blushing?” she asks Tim.

“Probably…” He feels silly about that, but she’s already mentioned not being wildly enthusiastic about part of this, so, yeah, he’s blushing, and really hoping she’s game for it. “If we do this, I’ll be leaking the whole time, and I’ll cum like a geyser, and have no control over where it ends up.” Now even Jimmy looks intrigued. He’s generally in favor of things that result in cumming like a geyser. “I’d love it if you’d tie me up. Abby behind me, doing me with the strap-on, while you suck me, both of you keeping me right at the edge of getting off until I can’t take it anymore. The problem is, I’m not seeing anything that’ll work well for the tying. The doorway between the bathroom and bedroom is tall enough and wide enough for me to grab easily, but I’ll still have to hold my own weight.”

“Is it just so you’ve got something to collapse into, or do you need the restraints?” Jimmy asks, moving into problem solving mode.

“Both. I can hold myself still for a good long time, but I want them to take me past that point.” He shifts focus from Jimmy to the girls. “I want you two to go until I hit the point where if my hands are free I will jerk myself off, and take me past that. I want you two to keep me on edge until I can’t talk, think, hell, until I’ve hit the point where I’m having trouble coordinating well enough to breathe. Abby knows she can get me off so hard, I’ll black out, and I want you two to do that to me.

“At home we’ve got that hook sunk into a joist.” He sees Jimmy and Breena think for a moment, wondering where the hook is. They haven’t played with it, yet. “Most of the time there’s a hanging plant that lives on it.” He sees the lights go on for them. They’ve noticed the fern, which is the only plant the McGees have in their home. “We’ve got wrist cuffs with small metal rings on them, and we can tie them into that hook. But there’s nothing here like that. The bed is fine for tying me down,” The headboard and foot board both have slats, but they’re also both low. “but not fine for tied with access to both my front and back, and I know I can’t hold my leg up long enough to work this on my side.”

Jimmy looks at him and at both of the girls. “Hold up for a minute.” He also heads off, poking around for a moment, probably going over the same spaces Tim was, and finding that both the closet and shower have options, the clothing bar and shower head will work as something to tie a man to, but neither of them are strong enough to hold Tim in place. The porch railing, assuming Tim’s on the ground below the porch, is strong enough but there wouldn’t be any room behind him for Abby. Trees all over the place, but… This doesn’t look like a scene where you’d want to be wrong about how strong a branch is.

Jimmy heads back in, sees the other three watching him, curious.

“If you want to lean into one of the door jams, once you’re not in control anymore, I can hold you in place, keep you from collapsing at the end.”

Tim’s looking at him, eyes wide. Pleased but surprised by the offer.

“I mean, not if it’s weird. Just, that’ll solve the tied problem.”

Tim’s nodding slowly. “Ummm… yeah, it would.”

Breena stands up, taking Tim and Jimmy’s hands.

“I thought we were just talking,” Tim says.

“Changed my mind. This we have to do, right now!”

Jimmy kisses her, a knowing smile on his face. “You just want to see me get my hands on Tim.”

She kisses him back, while her hands trail down Tim’s chest. “Of course.”

Tim smiles at all three of them, liking this idea quite a bit. “Okay, I’m fine with now, but give me like ten minutes to get ready.”

Jimmy raises an eyebrow. Tim shrugs while heading toward the bathroom. If there’s one thing being the parents of small children does, it makes you very matter of fact about what your body does with the food after it’s done with it. So Tim says, “Gotta clean up, inside and out, otherwise this is way too damn messy and nothing I want to do with a pregnant woman.”

Jimmy and Breena nod at that, seeming to think it makes sense, and also getting a pretty good idea of what all Tim might have meant by props.

“Jimmy, pants on. Don’t want you rubbing off on Abby,” Breena says a few minutes later when they’re all in the bedroom.

Jimmy looks askance at that. “I wouldn’t…”

The look Breena gives him has him putting on his jeans. He’s zipping up when he says, “You do know, that of the three of you, Tim is the one I’m least interested in watching get fucked?”

“Love you, too, Jimmy,” Tim says over his shoulder as he’s fastening the strap on dildo on Abby.

Jimmy sees that Abby has platform black boots on, which he loves, and the strap on, which he didn’t think would be particularly appealing, but when he sees her turn toward him, smiling, smallish fake dick jutting from her pelvis, he feels his mouth go dry and decides that Breena is right, pants are a good idea.

“I’m thinking the door between the bedroom and the living room,” Abby says, taking charge.
“Breena, you go on the living room side. Definitely get a pillow and maybe a chair, so you can sit or kneel comfortably. Tim isn’t kidding about this taking a long time.”

“How about bedroom into bathroom?” Tim asks. “If Jimmy’s holding me, he’ll be behind me, and if he wants to be able to see what Breena’s doing, the mirrors in the bathroom will give him a better view.”

“Good point,” Jimmy adds, because yes, he does want to see her do Tim. He wants to see as much of this as he can. Just because Tim’s the one he’s least interested in, doesn’t mean he doesn’t intend to enjoy every second of this, especially watching his favorite women all happy and naked and playing with his man.

Abby kisses Tim’s neck. “You want your collar for this?”

He thinks about it. “Yeah.” He’s keeping his cuff on, too. He wants all of his marks of ownership on him as he does this.

“Why the collar?” Jimmy asks.

“Helps get me in the right headspace for this. Easier to just let everything go and be in the moment and my body when I’m wearing it.”

“Okay,” Abby says. “Breena, grab whatever you like, and let’s get going.”

Breena grabs two pillows, and then sits comfortably on the bathroom floor. Tim stands in front of her, and gently pets her face, and then crouches down to kiss her sweetly.

“Thank you. I won’t be with it enough to say it after, so thank you.”

Then he stands. The doorway is wide enough so it’s easy for him to rest his left forearm flush against the door jam, a bit above the level of his shoulders, hand easily curled around it. He does something similar with his right, but with his arm down, hip level. He spreads his legs, sides of his feet snug against the door jam as well. He rolls his neck and shoulders, seeming to settle in and get comfortable.

Abby wraps her arm around his waist, and he turns to kiss her over his shoulder. Then he bows his head, and she secures his collar around his neck.

“All yours, Abby.”

“What’s your safeword?”

“Abigail. Same thing it’s always been.”

“Yeah, just reminding them. He says my name, everything stops. Stop, step away, and find out what’s wrong. He says no, stop, anything along those lines, keep going. But Abigail stops the game dead. Got it?”

Breena nods, eyes wide. They’ve been over this before, but the idea that Tim might be saying ‘no’ or ‘stop’ is a little unsettling.
Jimmy’s feeling a little nervous at that, too. “Abby, what are you going to do to him?”

“Make him come so hard he blackouts. Sometimes there’s some begging to get off sooner involved, or some ‘please don’t push me this far.’ It’s okay. It’s part of the game. He says my name, and I’ll finish him in less than ten seconds. If he sounds like he’s past that, forgotten his safeword, I’ll stop and check, make sure we’re still playing.”

Tim’s nodding along at that, and adds, “Part of the game is being able to just lay back, let it happen, and put myself entirely in her, and this time, Breena’s, hands. Let them take care of me. And yeah, I might babble. I know I talk when I’m having a good time, but especially for a game like this, I’m usually not really aware of what I’m saying.” Tim smiles at all three of them. “Ready to go?”

Abby pets him gently and says, “Yes. Breena, while I’m getting him ready, you can do whatever you like to him, but once we’ve gotten him wound up, you can’t touch his dick.”

“Okay.” She kisses Tim’s hip, her hands on his thighs, looking up at him. “You said you wanted me to suck you. What do you want sucked?”

That’s a good question, lots of happy ideas go with that. That, and the visual of her kneeling at his feet flushes through him, making Tim feel especially fine and sexy. “Balls, tongue on my perineum, and while Abby might be calling the shots, I’d really like your mouth on my dick.”

Breena smiles, standing up. “Oh, it’ll get there.”

It’s not until Abby’s standing behind Tim that Jimmy realizes the boots are there for a practical reason, not just to make every drop of blood in his body go rushing to his erection.

In the boots, Abby’s exactly tall enough to fuck Tim easily.

Anal sex just isn’t something he and Breena do much of. They tried once, it wasn’t particularly fun for Breena, and since Molly was born, even the idea makes her cringe. So, he’s aware of how the general premise works, but the details are a bit fuzzy. He knows Tim and Abby were doing it at the beach, but he didn’t have much of a view of what was going on. Tim was talking. Abby was doing something with her fingers, but the rest of her body was in the way, and he was so into the story he was having a very difficult time pulling out what was really happening and what he was listening to.

This time, with the mirrors, and the fact that he’s sitting on the edge of the dresser, behind and to the right of Tim and Abby, he’s got a great view of what they’re doing.

It’s not a huge dildo. Smaller than both of the guys. But that makes sense, if it’s just about prostate stimulation it doesn’t need to be particularly long or thick.

He’s expecting her to lube it up, and then while Tim and Breena are making out, to just slide into him.

But she doesn’t.

There’s a lot of petting, kissing, stroking all over Tim’s back, hips, and butt. A lot of gentle kneading. A lot of massage. Jimmy can certainly see how that would feel good, and be quite relaxing. Add that to what Breena’s doing to the front of him, (more kissing, and petting, and stroking) and Jimmy’s not having any difficulty figuring out why Tim likes this.

Eventually Abby decides Tim’s ready for more, and Jimmy’s not sure what she’s picking up on, but whatever it is, she starts with her fingers, and while he’s in a pretty good position to watch, that part isn’t particularly interesting to him, beyond a general awareness of the fact that she’s not going nearly as fast as he had expected. Tim’s comments about slow and lots of lube are becoming more concrete for Jimmy. (He’s also realizing that Abby’s boots are high enough for her to tuck the lube bottle into the top, thus keeping it handy, and warm. It’s clear they’ve done this before.)

He tucks what he’s seeing away on the list of things to make it more comfortable if he and Breena ever try again, and goes back to watching the rest of the action. Breena’s got Tim’s dick in her mouth, and that’s pulling his attention away from what Abby’s doing. She’s teasing him, just sucking the tip, and then stands up to kiss him sloppy and deep.

But the way Tim groans, and sort of shudders all over, not the way a man reacts to a kiss, even a really good one, draws his eyes back to what Abby’s doing.

One finger, slow, rotating motion, Tim’s kissing Breena hard as she pulls his dick, and Jimmy’s thinking that he’s never seen Tim look like this before. He’s seen Tim get off, seen him fuck both their wives, but this is… different.

Some of it is the submission aspect. He seems deeper in than he was before. Some of it has to be what Abby’s doing to him, because he’ll be kissing along, looking like he’s having a good time, and then she’ll shift a bit and he’ll sort of shiver all over and groan again.

The next time he does it, Jimmy watches a bit more carefully, and sees the tiny drop of precum slip out of Tim’s dick when he shudders. Yep, definitely prostate play.

Put it all together, and Tim’s gone. He’s just a ball of pleasure with some skin on it.

And they haven’t even gotten to the main event, yet.

Though, judging by the way Abby’s rubbing the dildo between Tim’s butt cheeks, they’re getting close.

“Abby, stop thrusting.” Abby looks over Tim’s shoulder at Breena, curious, but she stills her hips.

Tim groans. He doesn’t want Abby to stop. He’s really enjoying what she’s doing. He thrusts back a bit, and Breena says, “Don’t move, Tim,” as she takes a hold of his hips, and then very carefully, without letting her tongue actually touch his skin, licks the drop of pre-cum off of him.

Tim’s teeth grit and a whimper slips from between them as he watches her do it, heat and moist breath washing over the hypersensitive head of his cock, the bead of pre-cum stretching between his dick and the tip of her tongue. He’s been dripping for a few minutes, at least. Abby’s been setting a slow, steady pace, rocking into him, petting his chest and nipples, kissing his neck and shoulders and lips, while Breena’s been lapping at and sucking his balls, driving him insane.

Then Breena leans back on her feet, stands up, kisses Abby over Tim’s shoulder, letting him watch
Abby suck the pre-cum off her tongue, and then kneels back down and licks a long, wide stripe up Tim’s leg. “Okay. I’ll let you know when to pause again.” She goes back to gently sucking on his balls.

Jimmy bites his lip and closes his eyes, that is the single hottest thing he has ever seen. And that’s when it hits him that watching this and not getting off is going to kill him.

Jimmy notices that Abby adds more lube every five or six minutes.

“How does it dry out fast?”

“No. But I don’t want to hurt him, so keeping everything really slick is a good idea.”

“Used to do this to myself,” Tim says, “and it hurt. Took a while to figure out that adding more lube before it dries out is a really good plan.”

Marathon sex isn’t one of Jimmy’s specialties. Lots of quick rounds is more his thing, but still he’s got pretty good control. Damn good control. At least, he thought he did. But he has never seen anything like this. They’ve been at it for at least forty minutes, and they haven’t broken Tim yet. He’s still holding himself up, still following Abby’s directions, and enjoying it.

“God, Tim, how are you doing this?”

Tim says something like, “Nrmh.”

Abby pets his hair, kissing his neck, rocking easily against him.

“It’s called subspace, Jimmy. Tim doesn’t do this a lot, but when he does, he gets into it. He knows that if he lets me take charge, I’ll make it so worth his while. Right, baby?” she says, shifting her rhythm a little, adding a slight grind that makes Tim gasp and his fingers clench on the door frame.

A bit later, when Tim’s left hand pulls away from the door jam, Jimmy grabs him and starts to hold him in place. It’s an odd position, because he’s right behind Abby, feeling her thrusting into Tim, and he’s got to reach around her to hold his arms.

And Tim is strong. Even with his right arm not up to full strength he’s making Jimmy work as he’s pulling hard against Jimmy’s grasp.

Abby sees it, and whispers to him gently, “Just relax baby, just relax. You can do this, you know you can, and it’ll be so good when get you off. So, so good.” She gently pets his hair and neck, stroking her hands down his chest.

Breena pulls back from licking between his legs and kisses lightly over his hips and stomach. Then stands up and kisses his lips. “Still good?”

Tim nods, curtly. He’s good, wants to be better, but he’s good here.

“Tim?” Abby’s voice.

The frantic rocking of his hips stutters to a stop. He slowly turns his head toward her. His pupils are blown wide, he’s pink all over, and he looks like he’s in a trance. Jimmy’s seen Tim pretty far gone, but this is… really impressive.

She kisses his cheek. “You need some help, baby?”

He nods, whimpering slightly.

“Can you hold your own weight for a moment?”

He nods again. He’s been pretty quiet for the last few minutes. According to Abby that means he’s in his head and body, entirely inside how what they’re doing feels. Not babbling is the step beyond babbling. She’s not sure if he knows he gets here when she’s really playing him.

“Jimmy, let him go for a bit. There’s a cockring in our toy bag, go get it.”

He’s back thirty seconds later and hands it to Breena.

“You know what to do with that?” Abby asks.

“Goes around his balls and cock.”

“Yes.”

Tim feels Jimmy’s hands return to his wrist and elbow, and it’s almost grounding. It certainly gets him through the desire to come as Breena slips the soft silicon ring around him.

“Better?” Abby asks, slowly stroking into him.

He doesn’t answer with words, but his head drops forward, mouth open, and a long groan spills from his lips.

Jimmy had never thought watching another guy get fucked would turn him on. At all. He was wrong about that. (And rather pleased to see he was wrong.) Watching another guy come on his wife. He’d been sure that was on the list of things to drive him insane and want to kill list. He was wrong about that, too. Tim’s inching towards his climax and it’s making him so hard he’s afraid he’s going to pass
Breena was right, pants were a good idea, because otherwise he would have lost it, rubbing up against Abby’s ass, a long time ago.

And they were a terrible idea because they’re way too tight and wet and uncomfortable, and right now he really wants to be naked and rubbing off on Abby’s ass. (Or better yet, he doesn’t think that harness blocks access to her vagina. He could be fucking her into Tim… No… Stop thinking about that.)

He honestly cannot believe Tim has taken this for so long. Jimmy’s not the one getting fucked. He’s not even getting touched, and he’s about to explode.

Tim’s struggling against him now, weakly, he’s so far gone that he can’t put up too much of a fight, but he’s tugging at Jimmy’s hands, trying to touch himself, trying to get off, and Abby sees it.

She’s cooing softly at him, “Just a little more, baby. You know you can take it. Gonna make you come so hard… Just a little more.”

Just a little more and Jimmy’s going to come in his pants.

Somehow she gets the idea to Breena to take the cock ring off. He’s not sure how, because she didn’t say anything, but he almost feels it when Breena does. He certainly hears the way Tim yells when she does it.

Breena’s got him deep in her mouth, hands and lips working Tim in tandem, and Abby switches from long strokes to a short, fast thrusts, getting his prostate over and over, if Jimmy had to guess.

He feels it when Tim comes. Feels the way his arms try to pull in tight, the way his knees go out under him. And it’s a good thing he’s expecting it, because Tim really does collapse. He and Abby hold him up as his whole body shakes and spasms.

Jimmy watches, over Tim’s shoulder, as Breena swallows, and swallows again, and still more dribbles from between her lips, and she swallows again. Her eyes meet his, and she grins at him, at least, as much of a grin as she can with Tim’s cock, still pulsing, in her mouth. Jimmy closes his eyes, and starts frantically thinking about Gibbs naked because he can feel the tingles about to start and he is not going to cum in his pants like a teenager.

Tim is still shaking when they get him into bed two minutes later. Still dribbling a little. And Jimmy’s watching, fascinated. He’s never seen, heard, or dreamed about a male orgasm lasting that long. Tim’s cock has gone limp, all of him is limp, Abby wasn’t exaggerating about the come so hard you black out thing, if Tim’s even remotely conscious right now, Jimmy’d be amazed, but every few seconds another tiny drop of cum slips out of him.

Abby’s curled around Tim, whispering something, petting his hair and arms and chest.

Jimmy looks at Breena, daintly wiping off her lips and chin, and he pulls her close, kissing her hard, and he can taste Tim on her, and he has to get those pants off right now.

She’s on the same page, stripping them off of him. Well, pushing them down, neither of them have the patience to try and get them over his feet. Then she’s got him on his back on the floor, riding him, hard and fast and deep and neither of them lasts for more than a minute, because that was just too fucking hot not to get off to.

Tim comes back to himself slowly and easily. Not entirely sure if this is waking up or just getting all of his brain functioning again.

Didn’t matter. This is great. Everything around him is just softly glowing shades of marvelous.

There’s a warm girl pressed into both of his sides, and that’s whatever comes beyond marvelous.

“I love you.” He means both of them as he says it, and then kisses the shoulder closest to his lips, Abby probably. Then rolls a little and kisses the girl on the other side, yep, Breena.

He hears Jimmy say, (and this is when it occurred to him that he hadn’t actually opened his eyes, yet) “Hey, I helped, too!”

“Jimmy, I’ve got enough oxytocin coursing through me that if you get in reach, I’ll kiss you, too.”

“I’m fine over here.” He thinks ‘over here’ is the far side of Breena, but he’s not curious enough to open his eyes.

“Thought so.”

“How are you feeling?” Abby asks.

“Amazing.” His eyes finally laze open, and he gives all of them an extremely satisfied, if somewhat dopy, grin. “How long did we go?”

“One hour and eight minutes.”

He sighs, very pleased. “Thank you, all three of you.”

About an hour later, when Tim is moving again, Jimmy says to him, “You win. Standing next to you, I look vanilla.”

Tim smiles. “Breena, you had two, right?”

“Yeah.”

“Do I do anything in your fantasy?”

Breena looks him up and down. “Yes.”

“Who had three?”

Abby holds up her hand.

Tim looks down at his extremely limp dick. “Jimmy, you’re up next; I’m totally fucked out.”
Abby shakes her head. “Uh uh. Nope. Pregnant lady here, must be fed regularly. Showers and lunch and maybe naptime is next. Then Jimmy.”

When they get to the restaurant, Jimmy notices that Tim sits very carefully, very gently. He quietly says to him. “When we get back, ice yourself down. It'll help with the pain and any swelling or bruising.”

Tim nods. “Probably a good idea. It doesn’t hurt while I’m doing it, but after the endorphins wear off…”

“Yeah. But you’re okay, right?”

“Just sore. Abby knows what she’s doing. But this is part of why you don’t want to do this with someone who doesn’t know what they’re doing. More than sore is a real possibility.” Tim looks a little chagrinned and says in an even quieter voice, “Honestly, right now, my shoulder hurts worse than my ass. Abby’s,” the girls are in the restroom confabbing about something right now, “smart enough to make sure she doesn’t hurt me. I’m not smart enough to not suggest bondage games when I’ve got a shoulder that still doesn’t have full strength or range of motion.”

“Wrist?” Jimmy asks. He’d been intentionally holding Tim’s right arm at the elbow.

“Achy. More Aleve. Ice. Rest some. I’ll be okay.” He shrugs a little, and winces a little, he shoulder didn’t enjoy that. “Probably a good thing I can’t get it up six times a day anymore. Enforced rest time means I won’t do something stupid for the next six hours or so.”

Jimmy smirks. “Joys of getting older.”

“Yay!” Tim says sarcastically. “God, we’re gonna be fun in ten years.”

Jimmy raises an eyebrow and then dryly says, “They make pills for that.”

Tim chuckles, little, wry smile in his eyes. “And lucky for us we know someone who can write prescriptions.”

“Exactly,” Jimmy says, as he takes a sip of his water.

“Speaking of that…”

“Prescriptions?” Jimmy’s not sure where Tim’s going. Well, he might. He supposes a script for Viagra or Cialis or something could be arranged as a party drug for them, but… He’s not really feeling like they need it. It’s normal to not be hot, hard, or ready for a few hours after a really good orgasm, especially if you happen to be a middle-aged guy. Jimmy’s thinking he’ll be ready for action again by the time lunch is done. Yes, that was a nice orgasm this morning, but most of the build up for that was in his head. Tim’s a different story, if he’s not ready until tomorrow, as a medical practitioner, Jimmy wouldn’t consider it anything to worry about.

“More, you being a doctor, and supposed to know better, what’s with you jonesing for a tattoo? That’s supposed to be bad for you, right?”
Jimmy shrugs, looking annoyed. Yeah, it’s not a great plan. His body has a harder time fighting off infections than Joe No Diabetes, so it’s a bad plan for him to sign up for a wound he doesn’t need. But… if he got a tattoo he’d be really careful about taking care of it properly, and likely wouldn’t get an infection in the first place. He rolls his eyes. “Wasn’t talking about getting a whole leg done.” His knee brushes Tim’s as he says that.

“I know. Still…”

Jimmy shrugs again. He knows he’s been overruled on this. “Wanted to do something big, something important.”

Tim smiles at that; he fully understands that desire. “I get that. But we’re never going to be cool with something that might hurt you, though.”

“Yeah.” Jimmy sighs. “I know. Just wish it was different.”

“Yep.”

It’s a lovely September day. The sun is shining. And, the Farmer’s Market is full swing, so, post-lunch they decide today is a fine day to mosey around the pedestrian mall and get to know Winchester, VA.

They’re browsing along the stalls when Breena sees it. White gold, broad, same shape as the wedding rings Abby and Tim share and one of the same metals, the exact same metal as the ones she and Jimmy share.

She tugs Tim along with her, picks it off of the black velvet tray it’s on, and slips it onto Tim’s ring finger while waving Abby over.

It looks pretty good there. “For me?” Tim’s asking, looking at it. It’s a bit loose, but that could be fixed. Looks nice on him.

Breena shakes her head, nodding toward Jimmy’s who’s messing around with the blown-glass orbs two stalls down. “Checking the size on you. If it fits you, it’ll likely fit him.”

“Little loose on me,” Tim says.

Breena’s looking at it on Tim. “Then it should fit him just right. His fingers are a little wider than yours.”

He’ll trust her on that, he’s never measured and isn’t feeling any need to.

Abby says, “We doing a wedding band for him?”

Tim likes the idea of that. “It’s not like it is with you girls, no one really cares how many rings we’ve got on our ring fingers.” And, in his experience, no one looks nearly as closely at his hand or Jimmy’s, either. At least, if anyone’s checking to see if they’re married, he hasn’t noticed.
Breena jerks a little when she feels Jimmy’s hands circling her wrists and his chin on her shoulder. He’s standing right behind her and looks at the ring on Tim’s hand for a moment. “I like it.”

The guy who sells the rings is looking at the four of them with interest, but not commenting. Tim takes it off his hand, and is about to give it to Jimmy, lay it in his palm, and then stops half-way through that, and takes Jimmy’s hand from Breena’s wrist, slipping the ring onto his finger. “Feel good?”

Jimmy rubs it with his thumb and shifts it between his pinky and middle fingers. “Yeah.” He kisses Breena, and gives Tim and Abby a you’re getting kissed soon look. “Feels like it belongs there.”

Abby beams up at him, her fingers trailing over his hand. “Good.” She turns to the guy selling them. “I don’t think we need a box,” she says as she hands him her credit card.

They’ve almost finished the circuit back to the car when Abby spies something interesting. She nudes Tim’s shoulder, nodding at the café they’re walking past.

He sees the sign she did. “Poetry Slam. 5-7 Sunday.”

“Any interest?” Abby asks him.

He shakes his head. “I haven’t done that in a decade.”

Breena perks up at this. “Haven’t done what?”

“A poetry slam.” He looks to Abby. “Besides, even if I did feel like it, I don’t have anything ready to go.”

She gives him a you’re going to try that one on me? look. “I’ve got at least five of your poems on my phone.”
“Wait,” Jimmy says. “Can we back up? I’m still working on the idea of Tim at a poetry slam. You used to get up on stage and read poems?”

Tim looks at Jimmy and rolls his eyes a bit, taking minor offense at the hit to his professionalism. “No. Read.” He makes a sound like ha. “I did get up on stage and perform them, but no, not read. That’s like… lip synching instead of singing.”

Jimmy’s not sure he buys that, but he doesn’t argue.

“How’d you stop?” Breena asks.

“Just did. Wasn’t writing much poetry. Got busy with other things. Decided I liked kicking back at a jazz club more.” He shrugs. “Decided I was a much better novelist than poet and spent more time on that. Lots of reasons.”

“You’re a great poet!” Abby says.

“Only if you’re you. There’s a tiny audience of people who love my work, and you’re it.”

“I’d love it, too!” Breena says, certain, though she hasn’t actually read any of his poetry. Abby’s kept that for herself.

“And one day, I’ll write some for you, and yes, you’ll love it, because it’s for you. But… I know great poetry, and what I do isn’t it.” He feels a little silly about this, but decides that it’s true. “I write great love letters, and most of them are blank verse. But rhythm, meter, imagery, nah. I get moments of good, but as poetry, most of it’s just okay.”

“We could go listen,” Abby says.

He does like that, but he’s fairly sure the rest of this group, none of whom he’s never seen reading a poem, or having any interest in listening to them, would find it boring. So, he glances back at the café, they’re well past it now, and says, “There has got to be something all of us want to do with tomorrow evening. Gotta be a place around here to dance, right? And if not, we’ve got music back at the cabin.”

“You’re voting for dancing tomorrow?” Breena asks.

“Unless you and Abby have other plans. What was that you said about toy night?” he asks with a little wicked grin.

Abby wraps her arm around his neck. “Dancing could be warm up for that.”

“Sounds like you’re starting to perk up again,” Breena adds. “Maybe my turn next?”

Tim thinks about it, does a mental check for how sore he is, and where, and shakes his head a bit. “Probably Jimmy. Unless you’re looking for me to be a hell of a lot less active than I expect.” Then he looks to Jimmy. “I mean…”

Jimmy nods. “If Abby’s serious about a post lunch nap, yes, I’ll be up for serious playing this afternoon.”

Abby grins, and Breena does, too, looking Jimmy up and down, eyes promising good things to come.

Abby licks her lips. “Then let’s get home and napping.”
“So Jimmy, what’s yours?” Abby asks.

Tim thinks Abby’s the only one who actually slept. He’s not entirely sure about that. There was a bit of time where he was dreaming or imagining intensely, but he’s not sure which. He was aware of the bed and Jimmy and Breena and Abby, so probably not asleep, but he was seeing some vivid images of flying behind his eyelids.

But now, an hour after getting back to the cabin, and tossing off clothing, and snuggling into the bed in the bedroom (after all, they might as well use it at least once, right?) everyone’s awake and sitting on the mattress, getting ready for round two of the fantasy game.

Jimmy smiles a little. He didn’t sleep. He did spend his rest hour between Abby and Breena thinking about exactly what he wants to do.

“Before Tim went, it was a combination of both of you running me, and watching you girls sixty-nine, and then slipping into Breena from behind while you went down on her, and helping her lick you off, while Tim watched. But now…”

Abby and Breena are both grinning widely at Jimmy.

“I mean, I know I can’t do that, not that long. I just can’t.” But holy shit, watching that almost blew his load, having it done to him… Oh yeah.

“I couldn’t at first, either,” Tim adds. He thinks about it… “What…Twenty minutes the first time you decided you were going to edge me?” he asks Abby. He’d done himself longer than that, but keeping yourself on edge is a very different game from letting someone else keep you on edge.

Abby nods. “Something like that.” (Correct answer, eleven minutes. But Abby knows that if they treat Jimmy right, he’ll lose track of time, too.)

“Anyway…” Jimmy cuts in. “I’ve never come that hard, and it looked really intense, and I’d like to see how close to that I can get.”

“Then Breena should be in charge because she knows your body better.”

Breena nods at that. She’s never tried to see how long she could keep Jimmy at just about to get off, but she certainly does know how to keep him from getting off if she wants him going longer. She also knows that half of how they kept Tim a hair away from climaxing is something she and Jimmy have never done.

“So, how much of what we did to Tim do you want us to do to you?” Breena asks.

Abby knows what she’s asking Jimmy. “It’s all about keeping you just about to get off, anal doesn’t have to be part of it if that’s not your thing.”

“Not the strap on.” He’s not sure if that’ll ever be anything he wants. He does know today’s not the day he finds out.

Abby shakes her head. “Not for your first time anyway. Fingers?”
Jimmy looks intrigued. “Yes?”

“You don’t sound sure about that,” Breena says.

“I’m not.” He glances away from Breena and Abby to Tim. “Yeah, it looked like you had a really good time, but…” Tim knows how to read the look on Jimmy’s face, there’s a lot of conditioning, for lack of a better word, that a guy has to break through before thinking, ‘Okay, this might be fun,’ let alone do anything about that thought, and he’s not broken through it, yet. Jimmy looks back to Abby. “Look, it’s not off limits, just don’t surprise me with it, either.”

Breena kisses him while Abby says, “Not a problem.” Then she gets up, finds their toy box, and tosses Jimmy a Fleet enema. “You know what to do with one of those?”

He’s not thrilled about that, but yeah, he knows what to do. “Errr… yes. Medical residency. Nothing the nurses like better than a new crop of residents to do the dirty work.”

Abby grins at him. “Good, then get to it. You might be iffy on fingers, but trust me, you’ll like tongue.”

Jimmy’s eyes go very wide at that. That was very much not something they did to Tim.

“So, off you go.” Abby wiggles her fingers at the bathroom. “Get cleaned up. Get really cleaned up. It’ll be worth your while.”

---

Jimmy’s having a really good time. He’s in the middle of the bed with both of the girls playing with him, as Tim lounges in an armchair, watching.

Tim knew he was going to like watching this, because, what’s not to like? It’s Jimmy and Breena and Abby all doing things he loves, with each other.

He didn’t realize how intense it would be to watch this. It’s not just Jimmy having a good time. It’s Jimmy having this good time, for the first time, and as intense as it is for Jimmy, for Tim there’s a lot of memories and experiences and just heaps of awesome attached to this, plus, watching Abby and Breena literally melt Jimmy’s brain.

Tim can see how much Jimmy likes this in his closed eyes, and the tension in his face. He can hear it in the way he’s gasping with every breath. Jimmy’s hands are telling the good time story; they’re clenched on the headboard, knuckles white. His head’s thrown back, his toes are curled, and his thighs are trembling they’re so tight. Everything about Jimmy right now is all but singing about how much enjoyment he’s getting out of this.

And sure, Tim can’t see Jimmy’s dick. It’s deep in Abby’s mouth. (And Jimmy seems really pleased to have it there.) But he can see Jimmy’s balls, or at least sort of, Breena’s mouth and hands are blocking some of the view, but from what he can see they’re pulled up tight against Jimmy, which is usually a very good sign of an about to be very happy guy.

Of course, being a guy in bed with two women blowing you at once is also, usually, a sign of a very happy guy.
In fact, Tim’s actually getting a little concerned, because part of the idea is to spin Jimmy out, and Jimmy looks really close to getting off. He’s thrusting harder as his head comes off the pillow, and Tim knows that if he’s doing that, it’s because he’s a hair away from getting off.

Then both girls stop, and Jimmy groans with frustration, teeth gritting, head slamming back into the pillow as his hips hit the bed. They retreat and start petting his arms and legs, Breena straddling Jimmy’s mouth, letting him know that it’s time for him to do something besides just lie there and enjoy.

Tim should have known they wouldn’t push him over accidentally.

Oh, God, yes! YESYESYESYESYES!

Jimmy likes tongue. He might not have been sure about that in the first place but by all means this is bloody fucking amazing and fucking yes they are doing this again, they are doing this a whole lot, and as soon as he gets the chance to he’s doing it to Breena because he can’t wait…

Oh God! Okay, God, yes, FUCK!, he can wait, he can definitely wait because as long as Abby’s still lapping at him he’s not going anywhere, but once this is done and he stops twitching he’s laying Breena out and Abby’s showing him exactly what she’s doing and they are going to do it to Breena.

And, OH GOD, he arches up into that touch, pushing his hips up, looking for more pressure, more pleasure, and God, he might be babbling the way Tim was, he’s got no idea, he just wants more of this, wants it all over, wants it to never end and...

Shit! What!?

Okay, that’s a finger, did he agree to that? Shit… Babbling has consequences apparently. He’s not sure if he likes that, but, GOD, licking!, again, and HOLY FUCK!, Breena’s got his ball in her mouth and Abby’s doing something with her tongue and her finger and his brain’s about two strokes away from completely melting and then, HOLY FUCK, how many hands do they have? He doesn’t know what’s rubbing the head of his cock, but right now he doesn’t care, at all, it could be Tim sucking him, hell, it could be Gibbs sucking him, and he’d be cool with it as long as it didn’t stop.

Then, oh God, no, no, no, no, no, don’t stop that, please! He really liked that, go back to doing that, please, and OH FUCK, nothing is touching his dick anymore, and he thinks Abby did something with her finger, and he thinks he’s lost it, thinks he’s come, because he feels the pulse, but… Okay… just one so, apparently not, but okay, SHIT, whatever the fuck that is, prostate? Gotta be… YES… feels almost exactly like the pulsing part of cumming and if, OH GOD, yes, she can do that as much as she likes, and pussy, oh yes, pussy on his face again, okay focus on that, it’s Breena, he knows by the smell and the taste, and soft, tickly wisps of pubic hair, GOD, pussy, he loves pussy, and FUCK, another pulse, and… and…. wait, no, no, no go back to doing that, don’t take the fingers away, no…. The finger is awesome, bring the finger back!

Tongue again. Oh God! He’s got no idea of how Breena’s getting the idea to Abby, but what he’s doing to her, Abby’s doing back to him. Sort of. Wait. Two tongues. One’s on the tip of his dick, lightly licking, the others on his ass, and…. He slips two fingers into Breena and strokes her g-spot… Oh, yes, please! fingers come back for him, and he feels that pulse again.

Breena’s matching his tongue, licking the tip of his dick like a clit, and Abby’s using her fingers the way he’s using his on Breena, and God, they’re fucking him the way he’s fucking her and oh oh oh oh he’s not going to make it through this, every single nerve in his body is going to sizzle and burst into an epic climax and

NOOOOOOOO don’t stop! NONONONONONONO! Get back there and do it! NOOOOOOOOOOO!

Breena’s cuddling him, kissing him gently and right now he does not want to be kissed. Abby’s petting his thighs, and the last place he wants to be petted right now is his thighs.

“Jimmy, you still know your safeword?” He’s not sure which of them asks.

That slowly wanders through the crying with tension and disappointed haze of don’t fucking stop, nooooooo, and he flails around for a moment, thinking, not sure if he does and even more not sure if he wants this to stop and have them get him off now or spin him out further.

Finally he gets it together enough to say, “No, but don’t stop. God, don’t stop!”

“Don’t stop: get you off right now, or don’t stop: spin me harder and longer?” Abby asks.

“Harder, longer!” He gasps. “Don’t fucking stop fucking me!”

He sees them both grin at them and then, oh god yes, more tongues, Abby’s licking up and Breena’s licking down and holy shit, oh god, one of them has his balls again and the other is slowly slipping a finger into him again and God nothing has ever, ever felt like this.

Tim’s dick is awake again. Hard as he got off this morning he didn’t think it’d be showing any life until dinner, and possibly later than that.

But this show… Hell, this would wake the dead. (Guys all over western VA are getting hard ons just from the psychic punch of this much sex. That idea makes Tim grin. He doesn’t think any of the other three want to hear his little mental joke, though.)

Even with mirrors, even with the fact that he likes to watch, Tim’s still never really seen what it looks like when he’s this deep into sex. Because when it’s happening, he’s into it. He’s watching Abby or Breena or watching his dick slip into her, he’s not watching himself.

But he’s watching Jimmy, and the girls, but mostly Jimmy, because Jimmy’s teetering on the best orgasm of his life. He’s a hair’s breadth from coming and cumming all over, every muscle tight, every nerve begging for release, as two women he adores fuck him out of his mind.

Jimmy’s gone. Eyes closed, head back, gasping with each breath, whole body flushed, whimpering softly each time Breena slowly eases down him, and judging by the way Abby’s arm is moving she’s pulling her finger almost all the way out and slipping all the way back in the same speed Breena is. Guessing by how Jimmy jerks each time Breena gets all the way down, Abby’s probably giving his prostate a little rub, then they both slowly move off of him. Breena slowly eases all the way up, almost off of him, and then all the way back down, and God, if Tim watches another second of this he’s going to get off from just watching.

(Okay, not just watching. Apparently his hand’s wandered into his lap without any conscious though on his part. He lets go of himself, feeling like getting himself off to this would be missing the point.)

Abby’s kneeling between Jimmy’s legs. She gasps softly when she feels him behind her. Must have forgotten he was there, which is fine, with what they’re doing, they should be paying attention to Jimmy.

But he can’t not touch. Can’t just sit there and watch anymore, so he slips his legs between hers, kneeling behind her, and pulls her back a bit, slipping into her, hissing as he’s surrounded by glorious, hot, wet, dripping wet, sopping wet, pussy.

He grits his teeth at the sensation, so, so good, and says, quietly to her, “When you slide into him, you rock forward, when you pull out, you rock back. Do both of us at the same time, same speed.”

She looks over her shoulder, grins at him, and keeps the pace, and when she slips all the way forward, into Jimmy, she pulses her pussy around his tip, and when she slips all the way back onto him, she does something else to Jimmy, but Tim doesn’t know what. He does hear the added, breathy, ripped out of him “Fuck!” from Jimmy every time she does it.

Tim’s not going to last long, can’t take too much of this, even though it is slow and so wet and slick. Jimmy’s cursing now, full out stream of half-spoken, half-cried, all-pleasure profanity filling the air between gasps and moans. They’re tipping him over, into a long, slow full-body orgasm, the kind that feels like it eats you alive, and Jimmy’s crying, begging, words gone, keening with pleasure as Breena keeps up the slow steady pace, and Abby sinks into him, easing his way out of his mind and into sparkling neurons and flaming synapses. Tim sees the rolling twitch begin in Jimmy’s hips and thighs. He feels the way Jimmy’s legs jerk around them, and all three of them hear him shout out FUCK!, ripping the sheets from the bed as the first spasm hits him hard as a car going ninety before he jerks, hard, again, and again, and once more, groaning each time, then falls limp and silent and twitching, and seeing that, hearing it, feeling Abby on him and Jimmy’s legs twitching next to him sets Tim off, too.

A few minutes later, when he’s fully back in his head again, it occurs to Tim that he’s not feeling any soft twitching from Abby, and for that matter, he sure as hell didn’t do anything that might have resulted in an orgasm for anyone other than him when he was the focus, either.

He’s kneeling, butt on feet, Abby in his lap, leaning against him.

Jimmy’s still crashed out on the bed, somewhere between asleep and unconscious. Breena’s got him, cuddling and petting him gently.

Tim kisses Abby’s throat, and she turns her face to his with a smile. He knows that look, she’s not done. Close, he can feel that, but not done.

His fingers slip down her sides, caressing over breasts and hips, before settling between her legs.

She sighs, very happy at that, and happier still as he starts a quick, circling stroke.

Maybe it takes a minute, probably less, before she’s tight and panting, before he feels her muscles clench on his softening dick and hears her moaning.

He holds her close as she comes down, and for as good as a slow, edged orgasm can be, there’s something to be said for fast one when you’ve been turned on for hours.
He nibbles her ear. “So, what are we doing for you tomorrow?”

She smiles at him. “We’ll see what I’ve got a taste for then.”

He kisses her gently. “And let me guess, right now, you’ve got a taste for dinner.”

She holds his hand over her belly. “Little boy wants to eat!”

One more kiss. “Go run a shower. I’ll join you in a minute.”

Abby gets up, kissing Breena and Jimmy as she heads out of bed. Tim looks at Breena, “You good?”

She smiles at him, nods, still gently petting Jimmy’s chest. “Took care of myself.”

He kisses her. “Okay.” And then strokes Jimmy’s face, smiling at him, remembering how good everything feels after waking up from that sort of orgasm, and then heads to the shower with Abby.

Jimmy wakes up feeling amazing. Everything is good. He’s one big, glowy, mushy, ball of euphoric love right now. Breena’s in his arms, he can smell steaks cooking on charcoal, and everything is perfect.

“You and Abby are the most amazing women on the planet,” he says quietly to Breena.

“Hey!” She rolls onto her stomach, resting on her elbows, facing him. “You’re up.”

He smiles, feeling goofy. “I’m awake. Not sure if up is happening anytime soon.” He giggles at his own joke, and Breena smiles.

“Well, how about moving, shower, and eating?”

He nods. “I’m in favor of all of those things.” He sits up, stomach rumbling. “Yeah, really in favor.” He kisses her again, hands finding her skin. He wants to get up and get moving, but he doesn’t want to stop touching, either.

She takes his hands, and pulls them to the bathroom for a shower.

Steaks on the porch with lots of salad, and very cold cider, charcoal fire slowly winding down, sun easing it’s way behind the trees is perfect.

Dragging one of the mattresses into the living room, popping up lots of popcorn, salty and buttery and crisp, while all snuggled together, munching away, watching Star Wars: The Force Awakens, is amazing.
And once again, sleeping tangled together, stars slowly vanishing from the sky, covered by rain clouds, and fat drops of soft rain pattering on the glass, is just the proverbial icing on the cake.
They wake up to the sound of rain on glass. Steady pattering. Soft, gray light leaving everything blue and cool.

Tim thinks it’s later than when he woke yesterday, but there’s no clock in the solarium, and the sun isn’t obliging him by being visible. It’s late enough he feels good. Early enough that he’s sure it’s still morning. Beyond that, it doesn’t matter.

Slow, easy breakfast starts the day. Nothing big or complicated. Fruit, eggs, the left over steak from last night. Easy does it.

Next up, checking in to see how the girls are.

Correct answer: just fine, or as Penny put it, “Compared to four boys under the age of six, this is a breeze. Don’t worry and have fun!”

Sarah’s looking a bit more frazzled, but wasn’t requesting immediate back up. She did ask if Tim thought Gibbs would be up for playing with little girls. Tim told her that until they put Gibbs in the ground, he’d be in favor of playing with little girls.

Then he calls Gibbs, tells him Sarah and Kelly might be over today, and to give them a ring if Sarah’s in over her head and needs them to come home early.

He can’t see Gibbs, but Tim can feel the look he’s getting over the phone, the hell will freeze over before we cut your honeymoon short look. But, true to form Gibbs says, “If there’s a problem, I’ll call.”

“But there won’t be any problems, will there?” Tim says, calling Gibbs’ lie.

“Nope. Not so beat up I can’t help watch a fifteen-month-old.”

“She’s with Sarah because we didn’t want you stressing yourself.”

“Oh huh.” Gibbs hadn’t been thrilled about that, too. “Sarah and Abbi can do the lifting, and I can still read stories and make goofy faces.”

“Okay. How’s everything else going?”

“Fine. Penny and Duck are coming over this afternoon. Gonna have little girls running around anyway, might as well have the whole set.”

“Then give Sarah a call. I’m sure she’d like the invite.”

Checking in with the family gives way to checking in with the rest of the world, but, fortunately, as of now, nothing at NCIS has blown up. All of Tim’s cases are happily simmering along with their various Minions. Abby takes a few minutes to check over the lab’s cases, but they seem to be swimming along without her. Slower than normal, but still faster than before the paperwork software got tossed into the mix. Jimmy finds that Dr. Allan is still enjoying his weekend, and has not been called in for a dead body. Breena doesn’t call in. She knows her father would have absolutely no issues at all with giving her a call if something out of the ordinary showed up that needed her help. The fact that he hasn’t indicates that everything is bopping along exactly the way it is usually does. Right now, the funeral home is closed for Sunday, her family’s at church, and getting ready for supper.

All fed, and the world at large taken care of, it’s time to play.

“So, Breena what’s yours?” Abby asks.

Breena eyes both of the guys, remembering what she’d said during the rainbow party, and how Tim’s a bit fuzzier than she generally prefers. (Really should have gotten him trimmed down long before yesterday.)

Her hands steeple together, fingers flicking pad to pad, and she does her best evil villain grin at both of them, then says, “You two are both in need of a shave.”

Tim rubs his chin a bit, and yes, he’s a little raspy. He knows that’s not precisely what she’s talking about, though. “And where, exactly, do you want us shaved?”

Jimmy adds in. “I think we need to let her do it. That way she’ll get exactly what she wants.”

Breena grins. “You trust me?”

Tim and Jimmy nod, though Tim adds, “Just remember, it itches like crazy when it comes back in, so, plan for tomorrow accordingly.”

“Oh, I have!” Part of what she packed is the lotion that makes hair grow in softer and slower. It’s not a miracle potion, but it should push itchy and squirming off until tomorrow afternoon. When they’re back at their respective homes. “And I’m thinking, that we’re going to get you all trimmed up, and then shaved bare, and then you’ll get to watch Abby do me.”

Both guys whimper at that, and Abby’s looking exceptionally happy with that idea. Breena has a much easier time playing with Abby than the guys do with each other, but that doesn’t change the fact that she’s straight and prefers playing with the boys. It’s also true that she knows Abby genuinely likes playing with her, the same way Tim and Jimmy do, so she tries to work that in, too.

Abby’s sitting closest to Breena right now, and she kisses Breena’s shoulder. She grins, very wide, very sexy, and very pleased. She glances outside, overcast, but the rain has stopped. This is six or seven kinks she’s in favor of all wrapped up together, and she’s going to have a blast with it. “You know, the shower in here isn’t very big, and there isn’t a bath tub, so I’m thinking we start in the bathroom, do all the trimming and rinsing off in there, and then, if the hot tub looks clean enough (they haven’t taken the cover off of it to see) wrap up in there. That way I can sit you on the edge, spread your legs wide, gently take every hair off your body, and then kiss my work to make sure it’s perfectly soft and smooth.”

Given the potential for that show, the guys are now willing to scrub out the hot tub with their toothbrushes. It does not matter what has to be done, that hot tub is going to be clean enough for surgery, let alone fooling around.

Jimmy’s springing up, heading toward the porch, and Tim’s only a few inches behind him.
Abby looks at Breena, and both of them start to giggle.

The hot tub is empty. Both of the guys are surprised by that. They figured it’d be the kind of thing you kept water in all the time, and just dumped more chlorine in if it looked murky. It’s not. It’s a lot more like a large bathtub. Which suits them both just fine.

It’s clean, dry, a few spiders, but the guys get them cleaned out before there’s any shot of Breena seeing them and freaking out, or Abby seeing them and deciding that the hot tub is the spiders’ natural habitat and that they cannot be disturbed.

Nothing is getting in the way of this morning’s plans.

They get the water going, figuring that it’s going to be a while before the tub’s even close to full, and head back in again.

If there’s anything about this cabin they don’t love, it’s the bathroom. It’s a perfectly functional space. Kind of small, but if you intend to use it for what it’s designed for, washing up, getting rid of used food, it’s just fine.

It’s got a stall shower that’s comfortable for two people, tight for three, and four’s just not happening. There’s one sink, and sharing one sink with one other person is something they’re all used to. (Tim and Abby’s bathroom only has one sink, and the apartment Jimmy and Breena had before they got the house only had one, too.) But, one sink for four people means that at any given time, two people are not brushing their teeth.

There’s one electric plug, right next to the sink. On the opposite side of the bathroom from the shower stall.

So, it’s functional. Assuming you didn’t have any particularly kinky plans in mind. Like, say, using electric trimmers in the shower stall.

Brreena’s eyeing the cord, which is stretched all the way across the bathroom, and leaving her a foot shy of the shower. She and Abby had debated the one with the cord (hers) or the battery one (Abby’s) and decided that since they’d likely be doing all of them at once, the battery trimmers would end up pooping out well before the job was done.

Which is true. But right now Breena’s wishing they’d picked Abby’s trimmers and just brought a few more batteries. (After all, it’s not like they didn’t bring anything else that ran on batteries, or for that matter, a bunch of extra batteries.)

Nothing to be done for it now. Lucky for her, this party is inventive, and in that they’re miles from anyone else, not particularly inhibited.

“There’s a plug on the porch. Spread one of the black sheets out, stand out there, buzz, buzz, buzz, and then back in here to rinse off,” Jimmy says.

“Or spread it out in here,” Tim adds.

“Don’t want to go out?” Jimmy asks.
“I’ve got mental images of little clouds of hair blowing all over the place. In here, it’s not going anywhere but straight down.”

Jimmy inclines his head. That sounds like a legitimate critique of his plan.

Abby heads out, finds the laundry bag, and grabs one of the black (ish) sheets. She hands it over to Tim, who spreads it out all over the floor, and then, standing in front of the sink, says, “Lady’s choice. Who goes first?”

Breena grins. “I’m thinking you are. I’ve already seen him completely naked.”

Tim smiles back at her. “How do you want me?”

“Ohhh… Good question.” Given the layout and everyone wanting to watch, she takes Tim by the hips and scoots him a few inches over so his butt’s against the edge of the sink.

He spreads his legs a bit further apart. “Good?”

“So far.” She clicks on the trimmers, and gently scoots his dick to the side. “Try not to wiggle.”

“Honey, you’ve got trimmers in one hand and my dick in another, trust me, I’m not going anywhere.”

The other three laugh at that, and Breena gets to trimming.

It’s pleasant. The trimmers have quite a bit more oomph than the battery powered ones he and Abby have, and they’re vibrating gently. Add that to her hand on his dick, and he’s enjoying this quiet a bit.

In fact, he’s actually a little pouty when she gets done a lot faster than he expected. She’s just trimmed down his pubes, and just the front of him. He was thinking bare when she mentioned shaving.

“That’s it?”

Breena’s not looking very sure about what else she might trim. “Uh, yeah. What else?”

Tim gestures to the rest of himself.

Breena shakes her head. “Other than your face, nope.” She looks at Abby. “If I want to make love to someone who feels like a woman, I’ll make love to a woman.” Then she stands up and wraps an arm around Abby, dragging her smooth leg along Abby’s, and kissing her. “Oh, look, a woman! I like soft and slick and smooth, but I still want you two to feel like men.” She steps over, and drags her toes up Tim’s leg, which isn’t as fuzzy as Jimmy’s but is by no means hairless. Then she traces her fingers over his chest hairs. “So, into the shower with you. Rinse off, get your face, and by the time you’re done, I’ll have Jimmy buzzed down and you can swap.”

So into the shower he goes.

He’s almost done with his face when Jimmy slips in behind him, gently nudging him to budge over and share the water.

“Going kind of slow?”
Tim shrugs, finishing up. He’s hoping to have his face buried deep into at least one pussy today, (and two’s better) so he’s making sure that he’s smooth as he gets.

When he steps out, he takes a moment to notice that Abby or Breena have cleaned up the drop cloth between trims. (Which he appreciates. He doesn’t much like the idea of lots of little bits of hair all over his wet feet.) He takes another moment to appreciate the fact that Abby’s buzzing all of the hair off of Breena. And, as much as he’s liking what he’s seeing, Abby grins at him, and then says, “Maybe checking on the hot tub? Don’t want to flood the porch.”

Tim nods, heads out, sees that the water is six inches from the top, so he turns it off, and goes back in.

When he gets back in, Abby’s got Breena facing the sink, one knee on the edge, and is kneeling beneath her, and very carefully trimming everything, front to back.

Tim just stands there and watches. Breena’s curls are very light brown, and she keeps them fairly short to begin with, but now they’re almost gone, and he’s got a great view of luscious, moist, pink pussy on display.

His dick would applaud if it could, but it can’t, so it salutes by standing at attention.

He’d like to hop on over and offer to help, but first of all this is very much a one person job, and secondly, he doesn’t want to encroach on Abby’s good time. He knows what turned on Abby looks like, and if she had a dick, it would also be happily saluting away, too.

Jimmy steps out of the shower, all wet, his face smooth, takes one look at the two of them, sees two pinkish blurs in what is likely a very suggestive position, and says, “Damn it, where the hell are my glasses?” before heading into the bedroom to find them, because he certainly wants to watch this, too.

Unfortunately, that worked just about as well as not getting his glasses because as soon as he stepped back into the nice, hot, steamy bathroom with his cool, room temperature glasses, they fogged right up.

Abby was done long before he could see through the glass.

“Let me get a quick rinse off. Abby, can I put you in charge of getting everyone out and shaving cream?”

Abby smiles. “With pleasure.” She takes Tim by the hand and pulls him close. “Hmm… I remember reading about how to do this well…” She looks around finds two towels, handing one to each guy, and grabs their shaving creams.

“Okay, out we go!”

“Hot towel shave?” Jimmy asks with a smirk, following her to the hot tub.

“Only the best for my loves. Hey, razors… wanna grab them, and new blades?”

Jimmy nods, heading back into the bathroom.

Tim and Abby head out to the hot tub. He climbs in, testing the water, it’s good and warm but not too hot (can’t put a pregnant woman in too hot of water), and then holds her hands as she climbs in.
Abby smiles at him as he does it. She’s fairly sure that right now, especially on a wet surface, he couldn’t catch her if she slipped, but he’s not about to give up on trying.
Abby eyes the towels and decides they don’t need them, at least not now. “I’m thinking, for right now, in the water is fine.”

“Not much point of a hot towel if there’s a hundred gallons of hot water.”

She nods at that, and Tim sits down. A second later, he pulls her into his lap, and kisses her. “Hey, beautiful.”

She smiles at that, and kisses him back. “Back at ya, baby.”

And for a moment they sit there, close, holding one another, enjoying weightlessness and warm water. Then Jimmy and Breena (along with three razors) come to join them.

Another few moments of relaxing and splashing around, along with the idea that maybe more of this later tonight or tomorrow would be a good plan goes by, followed by working out the mechanics of how best to do this.

Finally, Tim’s sitting on the edge of the tub, legs wide, feet on the little bench that circles the tub. Breena’s kneeling in the tub, water about shoulder high on her, exactly the right height to take every hair of Tim’s privates.

“You use this blade on your face?” she asks as she lifts the razor.

Tim nods.

“You want to put a new blade on Tim’s razor?”

The blades are next to Jimmy, so he nods, flicking off the old one, and slotting a new one in, while Abby squirts a decent sized dollop of Tim’s shaving cream between her hands and rubs it around.

“It doesn’t foam,” Tim says to her. There’s not much reason to rub it around.

“I know. Just feels good and smells good.”

Tim inclines his head at that, and Abby gently rubs the shaving cream all over him. That feels excellent. By the time she’s done, and he’s completely covered, Breena’s got a pretty good handle on his razor, how it feels and works, and is ready to go.

And like when he did it with Abby, it’s just so sensual and dangerous. The shaving cream does smell good, and it’s nicely slick. The blade skimming over his skin is smooth and cool (especially compared to how warm the water was). Breena’s holding his dick to the side, slowly scraping the blade in toward the base of his penis, and that feels great.

Add in the danger kick on top of that.

This is amazing.

And it gets better as she moves to his balls, gently holding them, slipping the blade over them, so soft and slick and so dangerous and it’s this amazing chemical cocktail of endorphins from pleasure and all of his fight or flight reflexes firing and it feels really good.

He doesn’t grow much hair on his dick, just a few at the base, so taking them off is only a few second more, and then he’s done. And again, like last time, it’s so soft, and so smooth, and so sensitive. His own fingers feel amazing, and Breena laying a gentle kiss on him, nuzzling him with nose and lips to ‘make sure she got everything’ is even better.
When she’s done, Breena hands him over to Abby, who ‘checks her work,’ and ‘makes sure she paid attention to detail’ which he doesn’t mind at all, while watching her shave Jimmy, which looks better than anything involving a naked man has any right to look to him.

Jimmy’s having a great time with that, too, and he takes longer than Tim because he’s both hairier and said hair is coarser, however, he doesn’t seem to mind in the least that Breena’s spending extra time playing with his balls and dick.

But, eventually, they’re both done, soft and smooth and hairless. And hard. Very hard. And very interested in doing something with all the new, soft, smooth hairless skin.

Abby’s looking at all three of them, eyes sparkling, then says to Breena, “Ready for your turn?”

“Oh yeah!”

“Tim, sit on her left, Jimmy on her right.” They’re not sure exactly what the plan is yet, but sit next to Breena is an instruction they’re happy to obey.

Breena hops up to the edge of the hot tub, and the guys scoot a little closer to her.

Abby’s in the water, in front of Breena, but she scoots over a bit, kisses the tip of each of their dicks, then looks up at the guys. “No getting off you two. This is for Breena.”

She goes back to kneeling in front of Breena, weightless in the water, and then gently puts each palm on the inside of Breena’s knees and slowly parts her legs, draping one leg over Tim’s thigh and the other over Jimmy’s.

Abby kisses up the inside of her thigh, leaving a light, teasing kiss on what’s left of her muff before looking up at Breena and saying, “Such a pretty little pussy. Can’t wait to make it sing.”

Tim bites his lip, and Jimmy moans.

Breena smiles, wide, happy, and sexy at her.

Abby grabs Breena’s shaving cream, and adds a little to her hands. Like Tim’s, it doesn’t foam. It’s unscented and feels very slick between her fingers. She takes her time massaging it all over Breena’s pussy, rubbing it in with lots of little circles.

Then she rinses her hands, and grabs Breena’s razor.

The first swipe of the blade is slow, gentle, straight down the middle of her mons. Sliding down and inward, slipping off a fine layer of shaving cream and tiny hairs. It’s followed by another, and another, all in line with the grain of the hair.

Abby rinses off the blade between each swipe, and once all the shaving cream, and from the looks of it, all the hairs, are off of Breena’s mons, she grabs the towel, wets it, and gently wipes Breena off. Then she takes another squirt of the shaving cream, applies another layer, begins again. This time against the grain.

Breena’s biting her lip as Abby does it, and trying very hard not to move, but this feels awesome, and her hips want to rock in response to it.

Abby’s grinning up at her as she finishes the last swipe against the grain. “Jimmy, how about you give her a little pet, make sure I’ve done a good job?”
Jimmy swallows hard, and then lightly traces his fingers over Breena’s mons, they both moan softly at that. “Good job!” Jimmy says. Then he kisses Breena, his fingers still gently petting her, and Breena groans at that.

After a few more seconds, Jimmy feels a light whack on his fingers.

“Oh, right. Not done yet,” he says pulling them back.

“Not even close. Still have to get your lips.” Abby grabs the shaving cream again. “And I think that’s probably going to take a lot of careful attention.”

And she’s right. It’s careful precision work. But Abby’s more than up to the task. And by the time she’s done, Breena’s completely bare from top to bottom, every hair carefully whisked away.

And all four of them are extremely turned on.

Abby cups the water in her hands, letting it gently trickle over Breena’s pussy, a soft wet stream of fat, slow drips up and down her lips. It takes her a good two minutes to get all of the last bits of shaving cream rinsed off, one drop at a time, Breena squirming with each drop and both of the guys watching, eyes riveted to Breena, dicks rock hard.

“Now to see if I missed anything,” Abby says as soon as she’s done. Her lips land, softly, so softly, on Breena’s mound, and then ghostly gently down. Abby makes an, mmmm sound while doing it, and Tim’s not sure if she’s moaning at how yummy Breena is, or adding a little vibration to what she’s doing. Either way, watching this is so hot, he’s afraid he’s going to pass out.

Another pass, from top to where her lips meet, and one more, getting the whole delta with soft stroking kisses. Then up, against the grain. When Abby finishes that, she looks up at Breena, who’s starting to flush, and says, “Perfect, just like silk.” She looks up at the guys, as she says, “You can’t wait to rub your dicks against it, can you?”

“No!” Tim and Jimmy manage to say in just about perfect chorus.

“Good. But right now,” and again she kisses Breena’s mons, “she’s all mine.” She kisses Breena’s belly, and noses her way down, gently taking her left labia majora between her own lips, and sucking it. Plump little sucks all the way down. Her face is too deep for Jimmy and Tim to really see what she does next, but they hear Breena inhale suddenly and jerk, and then Abby looks up at her, grinning wickedly, “Jimmy said he wanted us to do that to you. You like it?”

Breena pulls Abby up for a lip to lip kiss, deep and sloppy, wet with lots of tongue and lips sliding pink and plump all over each other before letting her go and saying, “Yes.”

“Good. I’ll teach him all my tricks on you.” Another wet, lip to lip, kiss, broken when Jimmy pulls Breena away from Abby to kiss her, followed by a kiss for Abby. Tim got a hand on each of the girls’ breasts, and is kissing Breena’s shoulder when Abby pulls back, looks at both of the guys, and says, “This is for Breena. Right now, unless one of us asks for something, you two are just watching and furniture.”

They return their hands to themselves, and settle back down to watch.

Abby kneels down again, too. She’s not in any hurry. One tiny lick, another, and another. Just fine little flicks of her tongue all along Breena’s lips. Little tastes to just say hi. Then longer ones, all the way up and all the way down. She brings her teeth into play, grazing them over newly bare skin, and Breena moans and shivers.
That makes Abby smile, in her mind at least, her lips are busy laying fine little sucking kisses all over the pussy in front of her.

More kisses, and more licking. Breena’s hands have found Abby’s hair, and she’s trying to get Abby quit teasing. She’s still focusing on the outer lips, not having closed in to the more sensitive inner ones.

Abby knows what that sort of tugging means when Breena does it to Jimmy, so she shifts a little, running the tip of her tongue from the bottom of one lip to the hood of Breena’s clit.

Breena whimpers, so close to where she wants it, not quite there, yet.

Abby’s licking gently over the hood, keeping her tongue focused on the sides, not quite landing on Breena’s clit. She pulls very lightly with her teeth, and Breena gasps, no one’s ever tried that on her and it feels really intense, but in a good way, then more licking, still gentle, almost too gentle. Small, frustrated, panting noises are slipping from her throat.

“Tim?” Abby asks between licks.

“Yes!” He’s ready willing and able to do anything, at all, Abby might want right now.

“Finger, right here.” She uses the pad of his index finger to slip the hood of Breena’s clit back.

Breena whimpers again, and Jimmy does, too.

“You’re so pretty, like this Breena, all pink and open.” Abby sucks two of her fingers, and starts to slip them between Breena’s lips, just nudging her vagina, in for a second, just a hint of stretch, a heartbeat of friction, and then gone.

Breena’s hips are thrashing in response, she wants more friction and a lot less teasing.

“Should I do this?” Abby thrusts in two fingers fast while closing her lips over Breena’s clit and sucking. Breena practically bucks off the side of the hot tub. Jimmy and Tim have her, so she can’t fall off.

Abby backs off one last time. “I think you liked that.” And again, she’s right on Breena’s clit, lots of up and down licks, as her fingers slip inside one, two, three, stroking and curling up, pressing her gspot, as she licks hard and fast, making Breena keen in pleasure. Breena grabs Abby’s hair, grinding into her mouth, coming hard, shaking from head to toe.

Abby looks a little sheepish when she pulls back a few moments later. “Hmmm… that might have been part of my fantasy.”

Breena gives her a lazy kiss. “You know, I’m fine with sharing fantasy time with you.” Then she looks at her two hard, leaking, flushed boys, and says, “Give me a few minutes, and we’ll get to you.”

And with herculean control, and the fact that there’s not all that much else to do right now, they decide to hop into the hot tub, and spend about ten minutes soaking.

Neither of them is inches from getting off by the time Breena looks ready for round two, but they’re both primed to be ready in an instant.

Breena looks both of the guys over, and then says, “Both of you at once.”
Tim’s eyebrows jerk up at that. That sounds more like a fantasy that he or Jimmy would (do) have, but if she’s asking for it, then he’s completely game. Jimmy looks like he’s really into that idea, too, and Tim’s guessing they’re both wondering who gets the blow job and who gets vaginal sex, or if they’ll swap, or if after watching/doing him and Jimmy she’s thinking trying anal sounds fun. (Tim licks his lips at that idea. They haven’t done that with Abby, yet, either, and he’s been looking forward to it.)

Jimmy’s apparently also got a head full of ideas as to what ‘both at once means’ and he’s also looking very enthusiastic about this idea when Breena says, “I’ve given birth three times, and I’m in good shape, do my kegels every day, kept everything as tight as possible, but I’d still like to feel some stretch.”

And the light goes on for the guys. That’s not what either of them had been thinking by both at once.

“Oh.” Jimmy says, eyes wide, looking really uncomfortable.

“Yeah,” Breena says back to him, nodding.

“Both at once.” Tim’s nodding, too, a very similar expression to the one Jimmy’s wearing on his face.

“Yeah.”

“Am I doing anything?” Abby asks.

“I’d really like you to get pictures.” Breena and Abby look really happy about the idea of pictures of this.

Tim and Jimmy are both trying to squirm without being too obvious about it. Having sex with Breena is cool. Both of them having sex with Breena at the same time is cool. Both of them having vaginal sex with Breena at the same time more or less requires them to have sex with each other, as well… and that’s… not cool. Tim’s thinking the emotional sensation going through him right now may be terror. It’s not quite seeing a big black dog staring him down, but it’s on that spectrum.

Breena notices that neither guy is looking nearly as enthusiastic as he was two minutes ago. She glances at Abby, who shrugs. They’d talked about this, not sure if they could get the guys to do it. Though both of them came to the conclusion that if they could get the guys to try it, they’d probably like it.

Still, respect means allowing them to back out, so Breena say, “Look if it’s too gay, if it crosses your lines, it’s not a problem. Abby can sub in with the strap on for one or both of you if you’d rather take turns… but… I’d like to be wrapped up in both of you and feel both of you inside me at the same time. I want my two best guys together.”

Tim and Jimmy look at each other again. Neither sure what exactly the other means by his look, both of them kind of floundering around with the fact that this is really uncomfortable and way too sexy and Breena’s looking really expectantly at them, and she did each of their fantasies with no problems, and they’d still have their dicks rubbing up against each other and that’s squirmy in a bad way, and both of their wives masturbating to pictures of them doing it is squirmy in a very good way and this is just…

Finally Jimmy says, licking his lips, looking like he’s not sure if he can make himself do this, but if he has more information he might be able to. “How do you see this working?”

Breena smiles. Good. If she can get one of them through his panic, the other will follow, and this’ll be awesome. “I’m thinking Tim sitting on the sofa, legs wide. I’d straddle him. You in front. Neither of you moving much. I want to be able to control the speed and angle.”

“Okay,” Tim says. That makes a lot of sense to him; this would probably be pretty ouchy if you did it wrong. Jimmy doesn’t look sold on the idea, and he’s not, either, but… He can’t not try. But he also doesn’t think it’s fair to act like this is completely cool if it’s not. (In this Tim is grossly underestimating how little of a poker face he or Jimmy is wearing right now.) “Look, honestly, I don’t know if I can keep an erection if I’ve got Jimmy’s dick and balls rubbing against mine. I just don’t know. But I’ll try.” Because no matter how scary this is, he’d rather shoot himself in the head than flat out turn Breena down. “And maybe… Maybe we could sort of ease into it. You on me, him doing oral, see if that turns us off, and go from there.”

Jimmy thinks about that for a second. He can do that… Probably… Not like he hasn’t seen Tim’s dick before. Though seeing it and practically licking it aren’t exactly the same thing. “Seems fair. ‘Cause honestly, I don’t know, either. But if having your dick an inch from my nose doesn’t kill my hard on, I can probably keep it up.”

They’re both looking at each other with a somewhat tentative peace. Then something hits Tim. Something about how in the fantasy version where it’s him, and Abby, and Breena doing this, and what happens with the tongue of whichever girl is on oral.

“Just, don’t lick me, okay.”

Jimmy blushes. “Wasn’t planning on it.”

“You do realize I will be moving around, right?” Breena says dryly. (This had sounded like such a better plan when she and Abby were talking it through. Now she’s wondering if backing out is a good plan, half thinking she’s pushing them too far, half thinking they’ll feel guilty as hell if she does back out. She glances quickly at Abby, who gives her a quick, keep going nod.)

“Um… yeah. Okay, I will not intentionally lick you.”

“Err…”

Both guys are watching each other, warily, looking ready to bolt to opposite sides of the state, so they don’t see the look Abby flashes Breena, the one where both of them are completely aware of Jimmy kissing her seconds after Tim came in her mouth, where they’re both aware of the fact that if they slip out of the middle of the bed at night (which they’ve intentionally done both nights just to see how it’d work) that they’ll just snuggle into each other like it’s no big deal, or how watching the other guy get off turns both of them on so hard they practically cum in their pants, and that this level of being uncomfortable strikes both of them as ridiculously silly.

Abby steps in, taking charge of the situation. “Tim, just get on the sofa.”

Having someone else tell him what to do helps, so, after a bit of cleaning up and drying off, Tim does.

Once he’s on the sofa, Abby leaves the living room and comes back with a pillowcase. She ties it around his eyes. “Jimmy and I’ll go down on Breena at the same time. And if you end up with a tongue rubbing against you, you won’t know whose it is. Better?”

He feels pretty silly about this, but, well, “Actually, yes.”

“Jimmy, I’d offer you a blindfold as well, but I think you need to see what you’re doing so we don’t keep bonking heads.”
“Yeah.”

“So, we good on this?”

Tim nods.

Jimmy says, “For the moment.”

Abby looks at both of the guys, then catches Breena’s eye. “Neither of you two are ready to go.” Those dicks that looked ready to climax with the faintest touch twenty minutes ago are awfully limp right now. “So, how about a game? Tim you’re already blindfolded, so it’ll be your job to figure out who is touching you. Jimmy, your job is to sit back, relax, and watch.”

“I don’t get touched?” That doesn’t sound like much of a game to Jimmy.

“Whichever of us isn’t touching Tim’ll be in your lap, getting you ready.”

“I like this game.” Tim smiles a little, it’s not as bright as the rest of the smiles this weekend, but he’s trying.

Jimmy does, too, and like Tim’s he’s not precisely gung ho about this, but he’s trying, too. “Me too.”

Tim does like that game. Granted, it’d be a hell of a lot more difficult if he didn’t know every inch of Abby’s body, how she smells, the way her footfalls sound when she walks, so, she hasn’t even touched him yet and he knows it’s her, but it’s still fun.

He knows when the girls swap out, too. One second he’s kissing Abby, and the next it’s Breena, but that’s good too.

Breena in his lap is good. Her breasts under his hands is good. The feel of her so so soft skin under his fingers and wrapped around his dick is awesome. And the mental image he has of holding her lips apart, deep inside her, with Abby licking her pussy is doing some very good things for him.

The rather warm, broad, and muscly shoulder under his thigh, which is very much NOT ABBY (because he can feel Abby’s narrower, softer shoulder against his other thigh) is somewhat distracting, and not necessarily in a way he wants to (or is proud of) being distracted.

Similarly, he can feel Abby’s long, silky hair against his right thigh (which is awesome, almost feels like sex and a blow job at once), and Jimmy’s much shorter, rougher, and springier hair on his left (which is just… weird).

And yes, they both shaved, but Tim’s really sure that the chin that just bumped his testicles isn’t Abby’s. Even smooth shaved, Jimmy’s face doesn’t feel like Abby’s.

So… he’s not sure if he likes this. It feels good, but… it’s…

He’s not sure.

Breena’s breathing fast and hard, then shuddering and moaning as she climaxes. That’s excellent. He’s always going to be good with that. And apparently having all three of them doing everything they can to turn her on works a treat for her, so that’s good, too.

And a little quiet time, letting her relax as the rest of them hold and pet her, that’s nice. Tim likes that.
Then he feels Abby back off, and his body starts to tense a bit, knowing what’s coming next. Jimmy’s shifting up, and…

It takes a bit of scooting around, getting set, but they get it figured out and…

The feel of Jimmy slipping into Breena next to him is just… honestly… weird. Okay, yeah, it feels good. It’s extra stimulation on a part of him that is always in favor of more stimulation. And yes, Breena isn’t as tight as Abby, but this takes care of that and then some. Everything is extremely snug in a very good way right now.

Objectively, it’s an exceptionally pleasant sensation. The part of his brain that’s just feeling it really likes it. Of course the part of his brain that just feels things has no objections to rubbing his dick against or in anything that might feel good. That’s the part of his brain that watched American Pie when he was nineteen and thought, you know, that would probably feel pretty good… And that’s precisely why that part of his brain is not in charge of deciding who and what he has sex with.

That part of his brain is stupid, so it’s not allowed to give orders.

Soft, hot, wet and snug are always good. Friction from two directions at once is just amazing and nothing he’s ever experienced before. Pressure, stroking over that little spot just below the head of his penis, while something soft and hot and wet and snug is wrapped around it is beyond amazing. And something soft and smooth gently rubbing against his balls is awesome, too.

And if he could just get over the fact that a good half of what he’s feeling is Jimmy, this would be some of the best sex of his life.

But it is Jimmy. So he’s a mile from coming and fucking with his eyes closed, which he hasn’t done since before Abby, hell, probably hasn’t done in the last decade, because he loves to watch.

And it’s just silly. So damn silly. It’s just skin. Skin that feels awfully good. But it's Jimmy’s skin, and for some reason that matters.

He’s sure that part of the reason Jimmy’s moving is that if he stays still, he’ll go soft. The plan was they’d stay pretty still and Breena would move. And if it was just this-feels-so-awesome-I-can’t-not-move, then Jimmy wouldn’t be silent. He’s not quiet when he’s enjoying himself, and he’s dead silent now.

And Breena did both of them, went in on their kinkiest fantasies, spent more than an hour on her knees driving him insane, and that can’t have been comfortable to do it for that long, and the idea of disappointing her feels awful, feels cold and sick and nasty in his stomach and chest, and he’s pretty sure Jimmy’s feeling something like that, too.

It’s not like she asked him to blow Jimmy. Not like they’re fucking each other. They’re fucking her, together, and if it feels good, so what? It should feel good. They’re making her happy (or they would be if they could get their heads out of their asses), and that should feel good. It should feel excellent.

It’s just skin.

Jimmy’s skin.

Jimmy’s dick, Jimmy’s balls, Jimmy rubbing against him. And it feels great. Which is actually a really squirmy thought.

It feels great, it’s smooth and wet and exactly the right sort of friction, and…
And they’re fucking each other. That’s just what this is, and pretending it’s not isn’t doing anyone any favors. He’s going soft. A huge pile of panic at that idea is cresting over him, along with a lot of shame, and...

He’s makes himself pull out of that spiral. Makes his mind back away from the fear. You are not going to disappoint her. You are better than this.

Long, slow, calming breath. It’s just skin! Get the fuck over yourself, open your eyes, and do right by the beautiful woman on your cock. Take the lead on this, and Jimmy will follow you. This shouldn’t be scary. It’s just sex. You’ve mastered everything you’ve ever put your mind to, and this… This feels good. It’s supposed to feel good!

It feels fucking excellent, so enjoy it. Man up, get over the fact that it’s Jimmy, and do what you need to do! It’s just skin.

Tim takes his blindfold off, and sits up straight, so his chest is against Breena’s back. Jimmy’s kissing Breena, his eyes closed, and a significantly less-than-blissed-out expression on his face.

Tim slides his hands off Breena’s hips, lightly strokes them over her neck and shoulder, lifting her hair out of the way, and kissing her throat and ear. “It’s about to get better.”

Breena makes a very pleased sound when he says that, and relaxes into his chest.

He hooks his feet around the back of Jimmy’s thighs, pulling him in close, and then wraps his arms around both of them. Jimmy squeaks with surprise when he does it, breaks the kiss and chokes out, “Tim?”

He curls his hand around the back of Jimmy’s neck, making sure Jimmy’s looking him in the eye. If he has to Dom Jimmy to make this work, then that’s what he’ll do. They can sort that out between them when Breena’s not, literally, between them. Though, he’s hoping just talking and pointing the way’ll get the job done. “This is some god-awful lame fucking from both of us. It’s just sex, and we’re good at sex. This,” and he thrust as much as he can, rubbing up against Breena and Jimmy, “feels awesome, and it’s supposed to. The only reason both of us aren’t inches from coming is in our heads, not our dicks. I’m better than this,” he gently squeezes the back of Jimmy’s neck, “and you are too, so let’s get over ourselves, enjoy it, and make your wife come so hard she sees stars.”

Breena laughs, delighted, turns, and kisses him. “I’m in favor of that.”

He doesn’t know if it’s his pep talk, like maybe once it’s okay to admit this feels good, something shifts, or Breena’s laugh, which makes everything better, or the way Abby’s smiling at them, like she’s never been more proud, or just plain, basic male competition, Jimmy’s not about to be out-fucked by Tim, but whichever it is (or all together) seems to snap Jimmy out of his headspace into something sexier, because he smiles and kisses Breena. For a moment, they share her. Jimmy kissing, then Tim, then Jimmy again, passing her lips back and forth as Tim pets her hair and Jimmy strokes her arms and shoulders.

“Good.” Tim rolls his hips against hers, and yeah, that feels all sorts of good. “You like that?”

“Yeah.”

“Both of us deep inside you, spreading you wide open?” he murmurs against her throat.

“Yeah.” She almost breathes the word, then moans as his fingers find her nipples.

“Tell us how it feels.”
“Full… Oh…” Jimmy lowers his head to lick, his tongue on the tip of her nipple while Tim’s fingers circle appears to be something Breena is in favor of. “Tight, really tight.” She rises higher on them and slides, slowly, back down, hissing. “Intense. Sort of like the first time. It almost hurts, but it doesn’t hurt, and the stretch is fantastic.”

Those words make Jimmy moan, he grabs her by the back of her neck and kisses her deeply. Tim gets in on it, nibbling gently down her neck, leaving small, pink suck marks along her shoulder. Breena’s moaning at that, one hand tight in Jimmy’s hair, the other twined with Tim’s.

She breaks the kiss, slides all the way up, almost slipping off of them, and strokes down again. “It’s like this full, hot rush, silk on electric steel. And I want to go fast.” She thrusts quickly on them. “Feels so good it makes it hard to see. And I want to go slow.” She eases up and down again. “Draw it out, feel each ridge and vein, pull the pleasure out of each nerve slipping along hot skin.”

Tim’s head falls against her shoulder. “Fuck baby, you’re good with words.”

He spreads his legs a little wider, forcing Breena to spread a little wider too, and then leans back a few degrees, pulling her with him. “Good angle?”

“God, yeah. Jimmy’s getting me exactly right.” He feels Jimmy thrust a little faster and, yeah, Jimmy’s getting him just right, too. “Tell me how it feels to you.”

Tim pitches his voice lower, lips brushing Breena’s ear as he says, “Amazing. Your perfect pussy’s wrapped all tight around me, rubbing soft and wet on me. And he’s smooth and hard, and each stroke gets me in just the right spot. That little sensitive bit just below the tip. And you’re moving different speeds, and fuck… that’s… no words for that. It’s so good.”

“Good.” She pulls Jimmy in for a kiss and asks against his lips. “You like hearing this? Like how good this feels for me and Tim.”

Jimmy kisses her harder and squeezes Tim’s knee.

Tim glances away, sees Abby getting shots of them. He’s not sure if it’s video or stills. He gently nudges Breena’s face toward Abby, and Jimmy strokes his fingers through her hair as she looks. “Want her to get some really dirty ones?”

“Yes. Both of you deep inside me.”

Jimmy groans at that, thrusting hard and grinding against Breena, pelvis to pelvis, getting her clit with his body, and rubbing his balls against Tim’s. That makes Tim groan, too.

Tim sees Abby come closer, then kneel behind Jimmy, between his legs. He feels her kiss his knee, and knows exactly what she’s photographing. He gasps when she cups his balls and Jimmy’s, rubbing them against each other and tugging on them a little. Jimmy bites his lip and grunts.

“Abby,” Tim’s voice is a little choked, trying to keep control of himself, “I don’t think Breena wants me getting off, yet.”

“Not yet.” Breena adds. He feels Abby let go.

She sits next to them, stroking Tim and Jimmy’s shoulders. “Then you don’t want me to kiss her? You look so pretty right now, Breena.” Abby’s dead right about that. She’s flushed pink, and a little sweaty, and glowing with love and pleasure. “I really want to kiss you.”

She leans in and just gently slips her lips over Breena’s. A few seconds of soft, wet, smooching before she pulls back.

Jimmy groans at that. Tim closes his eyes, inhaling fast enough he whistles.

Abby grins and moves away, returning to just filming them.

Tim’s fingers find Breena’s clit and begin to stroke.

Breena grabs his wrist. “Not like that, Tim. Just a little more, little longer, and just you two in me’ll do it. And I want you two to come with me. Want to feel both of you hold me tight, thrust in hard, cocks pulsing. Want to hear you groan and moan as my body goes tight on you.” Jimmy’s kissing her throat, while Tim’s fingers move back to her nipples. “God, that’s good. Just a bit longer.”

Jimmy’s thrusting faster. Tim can feel him sliding against his cock and balls, along with Breena’s rise and fall at a slightly different speed, and since he’s the one on the sofa he can’t manage too much movement, but he can cant his hips a little, add some extra pressure and a little up and down. It’s really not going to take much more of this to get him off.

Breena squeezes a little tighter, moves faster. Tim can feel himself getting ready to crest, and hopes they are, too. “God, Jimmy, tell me you’re close.”

Tim decides that Jimmy’s answering grunt is a yes.

Breena arches against them, kissing Jimmy, moving even faster. Jimmy’s groaning, and Tim’s babbling, a long string of “Fuck baby, so damn good, oh God, just like that, fuck!” and other variations on that theme. Then the world narrows down to glorious hot, wet, pulsing tingles and their bodies against his, Breena keening with pleasure, and Jimmy groaning.

And eventually there’s the feel of his arms around them, and Jimmy’s arms around him, Breena’s shoulder under his lips, her back on his chest, her hair against his face, and soft, very wet, gently twitching orgasmic aftershocks.

He hears Breena say, “You get all that?”

“Oh yeah. I’m sending you the video now,” Abby answers. Then soft weight next to him on the sofa, and the sounds of kissing. Abby must have been kissing Jimmy and Breena, and eventually she gets to him and whispers, “That was the hottest thing I’ve ever seen you do. Almost got off just watching. All I had to do was squeeze my legs together.”

He grins at that.

“My turn!” Abby says, happily when Tim and Breena and Jimmy are all starting to show signs of life again.

All three of them give her a are you kidding? look. They’re still on the sofa. Though Tim’s scooted back from the edge. He’s got his arm around Jimmy, who’s sitting next to him, with Breena in his lap, legs over Tim’s, both of them still cuddling her, and completely fucked out.

Abby smiles at them. She knows that her best shot at getting to see this is striking while the proverbial iron is hot, or at least so blissed out it’s really open to suggestion. “If Breena hadn’t gone first, I wouldn’t have even thought of this, but… I was watching, and there was one thing, and if you” it’s clear from the way she’s looking at Tim and Jimmy that they’re ‘you,’ “had done it I would have gotten off just from watching, not even touching myself, just seeing it would have done it, and I’m not that revved up now, but I still really want it… And it’s probably too far, but if you’ll do it, as soon as you’re all rested up, I’ll do anything both of you want, anything.” And it’s clear from how she’s saying anything that everything they were thinking for ‘both at once’ just jumped right back on the menu.

Jimmy and Tim both look at each other and sort of sigh. Not that they don’t like the idea of what’s on offer, but… They’re wary of what this request might be. Then they look from Abby, who is very excited, to Breena, who has figured out what Abby’s likely to want, because it’s the same thing she was hoping to see, too and is also glowing with anticipation on this, and sigh again.

“What is it?” Tim asks, sounding a little nervous, wondering what she could possibly want now.

“I want to see you and Jimmy kiss, really kiss. And then I want you to tell me how it feels.”

So, he just leans over and does it. Before his brain can get involved and decide it’s weird or squirmy. As he’s doing it, he realizes this is the first time he’s really kissing Jimmy. Beside the wedding vow kiss, this is the only time he’s initiated a kiss for them, and for both of them, this is the first kiss that’s not just a quick, affectionate rub of lips on lips. It hits him that Jimmy has an easier time with kissing, and that he seems to have an easier time with hugs and cuddles.

But, no matter how it works for them, they’re kissing. Really kissing. Lips soft and wet and sliding gently over each other. Little licks and nips and sucks to add to it. Like with the sex, it’s objectively pleasant. Jimmy’s a really good kisser. He gets why the girls go all soft and melty when he does that. His technique is different, slower, shallower, more lips, less tongue. He takes his time getting to know the lay of the land, so to speak, and then seems to repeat whatever gets the best reaction. It’s not the way Tim usually kisses, but, yeah, it’s nice.

Tim guesses they do it for about a minute, maybe two. At least, it feels long enough to qualify as a real kiss, not just a quick peck, but not quite long enough to get to full on making out. Long enough that both girls are making extremely excited and happy sounds, so apparently it’s working just fine for getting them both off.

When he pulls back, they both wipe their mouths off. Tim nods a little at Jimmy. “You are a good kisser.”

Jimmy smirks.

Abby’s beaming at them, and he very quickly finds her in his lap as Breena scoots over a bit, to be more fully in Jimmy’s. “Well…”

Tim kind of shrugs. “It’s nice… Soft, wet, kind of rough.” Jimmy looks surprised by that, so Tim clarifies, rubbing his chin, “Not forceful.” He touches Jimmy’s chin, feels smooth to his fingers, not as smooth to his lips. “He’s got good technique, really pays attention, and tastes nice. I see why both of you really love it.”

Breena and Abby are loving that, then Abby understands Tim’s last sentence. “But you don’t?” Abby asks, looking confused.

He looks at Jimmy in a sort of no offense way and sees Jimmy gets it and isn’t offended at all. “No.”

“But it feels good, right?” Breena questions, also looking confused by Tim’s answer.

Tim kisses Abby, soft and slow and wet, actually trying to mimic some of Jimmy’s technique, and yeah, being on the doing side of that is awfully nice, too. “Yeah, it feels good! Lips and tongue rubbing against mine, of course it feels good! But doing that with you or Breena feels fantastic. It’s like—"

"Tofu when you want steak." Jimmy adds.

Tim looks at him and lights up. "Perfect! You want steak. You crave steak. You dream about steak. At any given time when you aren’t thinking about something else, you’re fantasizing about sinking your teeth into a piece of steak. Large portions of your life have been spent hunting for steak, and now that you’ve got regular steak in your diet, you’re an extremely happy carnivore. Steak is delicious, makes your mouth water, and there are two beautiful, perfectly cooked, savory, succulent steaks in front of you," Tim says all of that with great enthusiasm, and then quickly shifts to the kind of tone one would use to describe drying paint to say, "and a plate of tofu." He pats Jimmy on the cheek, then the enthusiasm in his voice slips back up a few notches but not to the level he used to describe steak as he says, "And look, it’s not like tofu is poison or gross or anything. And this particular tofu is great tofu. It’s tasty tofu. It’s the only tofu you’d ever consent to have on your plate, let alone eat. But it’s still tofu, and you still want steak."

Jimmy's nodding along and adds, "And there’s nothing bad or wrong about tofu. It’s perfectly fine. Lots of people love tofu and more power to them. And like Tim said, it’s tasty. It’s great tofu."

"Never." Tim shakes his head. "No matter how good the tofu looks, in fact, even if the tofu is wearing a steak costume and steak perfume, neither of us has ever thought, ‘Mmmm, I want some of that.’ No matter how hungry we get, and trust me, I’ve been awfully damn hungry in the past, I’ve been literally starving in the past, I’ve never thought ‘Mmmm… tofu!’ Best we ever get is, ‘Yes, that’s some nice looking tofu. God, I want a steak!’"

Jimmy's still nodding along with this, agreeing completely. "So, yes, the tofu is tasty. Yes, we’ll eat it if asked—"

"Though both of us would really prefer you didn’t ask us to…” Tim eyes both of the girls as he says this, "eat the tofu. I mean, yeah,” and Tim sighs, realizing what he’s about to say, and sounding a bit whiny as he continues, "I’ll do it if you ask, but, especially compared to you two, I’ll be bad at it, and I don’t think Jimmy’d enjoy it,” Jimmy’s about to give himself whiplash he’s shaking his head so vigorously at the idea of this is something he wants no part of, “and I know I wouldn’t enjoy it, either.”

By this point, both Abby and Breena are laughing so hard their skin’s flushed pink and they both have tears streaming down their cheeks.

“Okay, it’s great that you two find this so entertaining," Jimmy says dryly when they calm down. “Just… Look, we’re guys. We’re straight guys. And we love you insanely so if you want it, we’ll put on a show for you, and it’s not… painful or anything, certainly more pleasant than say, shoveling the driveway—"

"’Bout on par with watching a chick flick?" Tim asks.

Jimmy thinks about that and nods. “Depends on the flick, but probably a little better than that. This isn’t boring.”

“True. And like the chick flick, sure parts of this are fun—“

Breena grins. “Did you just admit that you like parts of the chick flicks?”
“No,” Jimmy says quickly. “But I think he did. Anyway, it’s not anything either of us is ever going to want. At no point am I ever going to wake up and think, ‘Gosh, I’m here with two beautiful women, nah, I want to fuck Tim.’”

“Yeah, that’s just not going to happen. Want to fuck you.” And he kisses Abby. “Want to fuck you.” He leans over and kisses Breena. “Don’t want to fuck you.” He pats Jimmy on the cheek. “So yeah, his dick rubbing against mine felt great. Yes, he’s a good kisser. Yes, watching you two do him is insanely hot. And yeah, hearing you two moaning over us kissing is really hot, too. But even with all of that, if it’s just the two of us, at no point are we ever going to say, ‘Let’s fuck.’”

“We’d have to be on the deserted island, just the two of us, for months, before either of us might think of fucking the other one.”

Tim’s thinking it’d have to be an awfully long time on that island, but, okay, maybe not impossible. He’d probably get bored enough with just his hands that eventually Jimmy’d start to look good. Granted, he thinks the most likely result is they’d take care of themselves for sex, and help each other with cuddles and sensual touch. “And at this point the only reason it would cross either of our minds after months on this hypothetical island alone is because we’ve already done it. Me and Tony on a desert island and the world will end before we decide to have sex with each other.”

“You are such guys,” Breena says, shaking her head.

“Yeah, we are.” Tim replies.

“Rumor has it, that’s part of why you like us.” Jimmy adds.

Tim takes over. “So… anyway… Look, nothing’s off limits. We love you, and we’ll do what we can to make you happy, but be nice to us. Okay?”

“Nothing?” Abby asks, a diabolically wicked look on her face.

Since Tim said it the first time, she has to be asking Jimmy, he sighs and nods. “Nothing. You want to see something special sometime, and yeah, we’ll do it, just be nice about it.”

“Like when you Domme. You know where the lines are. You know you can push them a little. And you know that if you do it too often or without the proper set up--and for anything along the lines of eating the tofu proper set up probably involves lots of alcohol and both of us so turned on we can’t see straight…” Jimmy’s giving him the there’s not enough alcohol in the world look. “It makes subbing stop being fun.”

Jimmy adds, “And just remember, steak and tofu is always going to be a whole lot more fun for both of us than straight tofu.”

Tim grins and kisses Breena. “Tofu wrapped in steak was really good. Anytime you want that, I’ll do that again, happily.”

“Yeah. Steak with a little tofu sauce wasn’t bad either.”

“I knew that was your tongue!”

Jimmy smirks. “Yes, it was, but that’s tofu with steak juice. Which also wasn’t bad, but wasn’t what I was talking about. Right after your turn, when you were out of it, I was with Breena and could taste you on her, and that, after watching that hour of them fucking you, was really intense.”

“Oh. Gotcha. That was good?”
“Uh, yeah… You gonna tell me you didn’t nail Abby to the wall the second she and Breena were done with me?”

“No. I was actually fucking her before you were done.”

“You kiss her?”

“Yeah.”

“Well…”

“You really were gone, weren’t you? Breena was riding you, and Abby was rubbing.”

“Oh.” Jimmy looks at the girls and they smile. “You switched?”

“Yep,” Abby says with a grin. “Half way through, my jaw was getting tired.”

Breena nods. “And after that marathon with Tim, mine wasn’t up to much, either.”

“Oh.”

“So, no, I haven’t tasted your cum on her.”

“Yet.” Abby adds. “And for the record, anytime you two kiss each other, that’s melt my panties, tingles through my nipples and clit, pussy dripping down my thigh, masturbate to it for the next month hot.”

Breena grins and strokes her fingers down Jimmy’s throat. “Yeah, you two might look at each other like tofu, but both of you with each other is that perfect medium rare steak with the loaded baked potato, crisp green asparagus spears, with the hollandaise, and chocolate mousse for dessert.”

“With the cherry on top,” Abby adds.

“And whipped cream.”

“And a little salted caramel.”

“Oh…” Breena’s looking very happy at that idea. “We should really have some of that tonight.”

“Yeah, we should.” Abby’s also completely on board with this idea.

“Are we still talking about sex?” Jimmy asks.

“No, I think we’ve moved onto lunch,” Abby answers. “We haven’t eaten in four hours; I’m hungry!”
Book V: Timothy McGee

Tim’s in a really good mood as he’s googling away. He’d gotten the first shower, so he’s the one in charge of locating someplace that has both chocolate mousse and steaks. (And if such a place does not exist, he’s in charge of the shopping expedition to get steaks, caramel sauce, chocolate, and cream.)

He’s feeling light, almost bubbly, which doesn’t hit him as particularly weird, he’s usually in a really good mood after really good sex.

He’s humming quietly as he’s flicking thought local restaurant menus, searching for the illusive dessert, then as he’s looking, it hits him that Abby’s found the song he’s singing in his head, putting it up on her phone, and is standing behind him with her hands resting on his shoulder, before kissing him gently on the back of the neck. (She hasn’t gotten a shower, yet, so she’s not rubbing up against him, too much.)

He squeezes her hand and shows her a menu. “This fit the bill?”

She takes his phone and starts flicking through. He turns his face a little to nuzzle her belly. “Hey, little boy.”

She pets his hair while looking, nodding. “Oh yeah! That looks perfect.”

He smiles up at her and gets a little kiss. “Can we keep you to one dessert?”

“Probably not!” She grins back at him. “Little boy likes sugar.”

“Can’t imagine where he gets that from.” Breena and Jimmy step out of the bathroom. “Breena!” Abby hops over with the phone. “How about this?”

Breena also looks over the menu, Abby flipping the screen while she towels off her hair. “Perfect!” Abby kisses Breena’s shoulder, and pets Jimmy as she heads into the bathroom. “Ten minutes, and I’ll be ready to go.”

He catches Breena and Abby giving each other a little look, and a little smile, but doesn’t think much about it. Probably because he’s in a really good mood.

The van’s parked, and they’re strolling toward the restaurant. He’s a step behind Jimmy and Breena, arm around Abby, just being really happy with himself and the universe.
Abby gives him a little extra squeeze, and kisses him. “Happy?”

“Yeah, really.”

She smiles at him. “Good. Happy’s the plan.”

He kisses her. They take a few more steps, coming abreast of Jimmy and Breena. Jimmy’s on his right, Abby on his left, and a few steps into this, the idea of happy being something Abby was working on really hits.

Because he is really happy right now. Really. Like, stupidly happy. All is right with the world, everything is excellent, no cares, no black clouds, the universe is perfect, happy.

Which gets him thinking, because there’s his usual I-got-excellently-laid good mood, which is wonderful, and there’s this, which is deeper. Hell, this might be past happy and into… peace?

Okay, obviously his brain is trying to send him a message… Happy, calm, peaceful, loved, cherished, all those good feelings are there to make him try to do or get something good for him. Positive reinforcement for doing the right thing.

Sex is good for me. Sex with people I loves is good for me. Sex with lots of people I love appears to be good for me, too. Okay, yep, been over that… He wasn’t feeling this good yesterday. (Which is not to say yesterday wasn’t awesome, too, but…)

What’s different?

They get into the restaurant, and he’s still pondering.

“You okay?” Breena asks, noticing that a quarter of the party isn’t all there.

“Yeah. I’m good, just thinking.”

Lots of people is closer to whatever this is… He lets those thoughts drop away while the hostess gets them seated. It’s a steakhouse, and apparently lunch isn’t their real busy time, or they’re late enough to have missed the rush. Not deserted, but they’re four of the maybe fifteen people in there.

He doesn’t usually have alcohol with lunch, but he also doesn’t usually have steak for lunch, either. Looks like this is going to be their main meal for the day, and the girls seem to be set on ordering half the dessert cart, so, might as well go wild. Not like he’s driving them back.

He orders a scotch neat to go with his medium rare New York strip steak. Talk of asparagus reminded him that he really likes it and hasn’t had any for a while, so some of that’s going to end up on his plate, too.

As the rest of them order, the idea of feeling really good pops back up. Doing things you love makes you feel good. Okay, yep, I got that, brain. Known that for a while. Maybe a little more specific on the epiphany front?

His eyes travel from Breena (sitting across from him) to Jimmy (diagonally across) to Abby (next to him) and then back to Jimmy.

Sex with people you love makes you feel great. Yep, got that, too. More specific?

The little more specific epiphany almost makes him feel dizzy when it hits. His eyes jerk back to Jimmy. Sex with a man you love makes you feel great. Tim swallows hard, not noticing the other three all glancing at each other, wondering if he’s okay.

He can’t believe it took this long for that to hit. Sex with a guy. The ultimate evil, nasty, awful, disgusting put you beyond the pale, thing you cannot ever do. The thing that makes you stop being a person and start being a fag. THE forbidden act.

Years of conditioning, years of insults, of degradation, of fear and all of that shit the Admiral heaped on him. Years he thought he’d broken through. Ideas he’d tried to disregard and not let touch him anymore. But they were always still there, under and behind everything else, still stewing away in there.

He can feel it. Right now, inside himself, they’ve let go. They’re finally, really, broken. He’s not just ignoring them, or rebelling against them, or pushing them aside and trying not to let them effect who he is and what he does.

They’re dead.

“Tim?” Abby’s gently stroking his face.

He can tell by the tone of her voice that she’s concerned. He smiles at her, and Jimmy and Breena. “I’m good,” he smiles again, deep and genuine, “really good, just processing something.”

“Okay. Gonna let us in on it?”

“Eventually.” He looks around. It’s pretty quiet in the restaurant, but they’re still sitting at a four top in the middle of it. “Later, back at the cabin.”

He had sex with a man, and the world didn’t end. It didn’t change. He didn’t become dirty or unworthy or awful because of it. He isn’t stained or bad or… or anything because of it. His loves didn’t stop loving him. He didn’t stop loving himself.

He thinks about how careful he’s been to make sure that everyone he’s talked about with this knew that he wasn’t fucking Jimmy. Even with Tony, and his ‘it’s all sex’ thing, he made it clear that he didn’t desire Jimmy in any sort of way. Part of that’s just a matter of factual truth, he’s not bi, Jimmy is not sexually desirable to him. But that wasn’t all of it. Not by a mile.

Part of it was making sure everyone around him knew he isn’t like that. He’s not one of them. He’s not a fag. Daddy’s evil, little mind worm was still in there, still nibbling around his brain, still shaping the map of his understanding of himself and his world, spreading its poison.

And now that little fucker is dead.

And Tim feels excellent!

He stands up. Screw later back at the cabin. He loves these people, and he’s not afraid. He kisses Abby, deep and wet, hot and happy, and again for Breena, and once more for Jimmy, who’s looking really surprised but doesn’t wave him off, so Tim goes for it, and when he sits back down, he doesn’t bother to look around and see if everyone else is staring at them.

“I take it we’re celebrating?” Breena says, looking amused.

“Fuck, YES! He’s dead, his hold on me, the poison in my head…” Tim’s in the middle of the conversation from his own mind and none of the rest of them are on the same page. They’re not entirely sure who he is, though they’ve all got a fairly accurate guess. What they don’t know is why Tim’s thinking that.
Tim backs up to get them up to speed. “Gay was the worst thing you could be,” Tim says quietly. “The worst. Evil and unwholesome, sick, corrupted, awful. Every kind of awful there is, all wrapped up in one idea. He’d hit me with it all the time. Calling me…” they are in a restaurant, so he edits his words… “bad things, but that was always what the bad thing boiled down to. And, I didn’t want to be him, or live those hates. But that idea, it was still there. Still under the edges in the back. Gay is bad. It’s evil.” His voice drops another few decibels. “It’s why I was unloveable. Why I could never be good enough. ‘Stop being such a little fag.’” He just mouths the last word in deference to the other people here.

“You all know I can shove things aside and ignore them. I’m the world record holder for ignoring things I don’t want to deal with. I shoved it aside, and stuffed it away, and never acted on it, intentionally refused to let that be how I treated other people, but it was always there.” Tim smiles at them, brilliant. “And now it’s not. That last little voice of his in my head is dead.” He stares at them again, tempted to get up and kiss everyone again, but… they are in a restaurant, and just because he’s feeling balls out all over the place right now doesn’t mean everyone else is. “Thank you.”

Abby’s got her arm around him, and her lips on his shoulder. He can feel two feet rubbing his leg under the table.

It’s a really good lunch.

When the main courses come, Jimmy looks at four plates of steaks, lifts his glass, and says, wicked grin on his lips, “Here’s to a long life filled with all the steak we can eat.”

The other three clinked their glasses with his while giggling madly.

The desserts are better.

The restaurant did have chocolate mousse. They did have salted caramel sauce. They didn’t have them together, so a little rearranging is done, and the white chocolate, salted-caramel blondie donates its sauce to the chocolate mousse, and…

MMMMMMMM…

Yeah, happy people.

Tim’s licking the last little bit of the salted caramel sauce off of his spoon when the girls decide it’s bathroom time. He’s not sure why they go together, but… it doesn’t matter. They want chatting time without him and Jimmy, well, he wants to talk to Jimmy on his own, too.

So, once they’re out of earshot, he switches around, taking Breena’s seat, and quietly says to Jimmy. “Thanks. I know that wasn’t your favorite thing ever, so, thanks. It… helped. I mean, I never… A million years would go by before I’d think that up, but… I bet Abby knew or guessed, and I’m sure she talked it through with Breena, and…”

Jimmy nods, gently touching Tim’s hand. “No problem.”

“Really? You looked pretty freaked out.”

Jimmy raises an eyebrow at that. Okay, yeah, that wasn’t the smoothest moment of his life, but he’s not thinking he was ‘freaked out.’

“Uh… I was concerned for you. And worried that Breena and Abby had backed us into something they couldn’t get out of with everyone’s honor and dignity intact, but…”

“Uh huh.” Tim’s not entirely buying that. It’s… as well as he can tell, mostly true, but that’s not the whole story.

Jimmy sees he knows what’s up. “Okay, really, about thirty percent the sex, and the other seventy was you looking like you were going to swallow your tongue and pass out. You know, we say, ‘Yeah, it’s fine, just not my thing.’ But then it’s right there in your face,” Jimmy’s eyes drop to Tim’s crotch, then back to his eyes, “literally. That’s a pretty intense put up or shut up moment.”

Tim nods at that.

“But, really, it was fine, just not my thing. Come on, you think that five second pep talk would have done it if I was freaking out over the sex?”

Tim’s eyes narrow slightly. He had thought that was a good pep talk. Though, he thinks for a second how well it would have worked on him without all the stuff that went before it… Jimmy may have a point.

“You quietly flipping out was not my thing. When…” Jimmy’s volume is so low he’s all but thinking the words to Tim, “she was riding you, and me going down on her, everyone looked like they were having fun, so that was okay.”

Tim nods. “I liked that. Feeling you there was weird, but all in all, it was fine.”

“Yeah. That’s about as stressed out as I got about the sex the whole time. I didn’t know, going into it, that that’s how it’d work out. I think I was more worried about freaking out than actually being freaked out, but… yeah, tofu instead of steak, nothing to sweat.” Jimmy shakes his head a bit. “And for the first little bit, when we were… he tries to think about how to describe it, ‘getting all set?’”

Tim nods, he knows which bit Jimmy’s talking about. That moment of just feeling it. “It seemed like you were fine, but then you weren’t fine, and we could feel you not being fine, and your eyes were covered, so you missed the three of us trying to figure out how to get out of that without you feeling like you’d let us down. We had just long enough to all glance at each other, what now all over our faces, and then Breena and I can feel you… perk up, she pulls me close, we’re kissing, and you’re okay. But… maybe for five seconds, that was kind of tense and worrisome.”

“Five seconds?”

Jimmy shrugs. “Three maybe? Did it feel that long to you?”

“Longer.”

“Oh. Real time, less than half a minute went by between getting set and you taking the blindfold off.”

“Huh.”

Jimmy’s looking him over carefully, then puts his arm around Tim, everyone else looking at them (because some of the other diners have been curious about what’s going on at their table) be damned. “You’re happy where you are now. You okay with how you got there?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Scared the hell out of me, you know, but… But that’s the fear he beat into me.
God, it’s like my arm or shoulder or leg… All that damn scar tissue, from him, and having you guys break it down hurt, really hurt, but I needed it. And… you know, I don’t think I ever would have said, ‘Hey, go spend a few hours torturing me, I’m sure it’ll be good,’ on my own, but you knew it was part of getting better, and I trusted you to do right by me, so… Yeah. We’re good. I’ll be curious to see how much of this Breena and Abby had planned ahead of time, but… We’re good.”

Jimmy kisses him. Fast, gentle, just a little peck. “You’re really ready to heal now, aren’t you?”

Tim smiles at him, so much love in his heart, he looks over and sees both of the girls heading back to them. A moment later, Abby’s sitting on his other side, arm around him, too, and Breena’s across from them, holding his hand.

Tim nods. “Yeah, I am.”

To the surprise of absolutely no one, they had no problem getting their check in about nine seconds. Apparently the wait staff, who were in no way rude, had no problem seeing them out of the restaurant quickly.

Still, it’s a pretty day, and none of them mind a circuitous meander back toward the van, poking about and seeing if anything interesting is nearby.

The official reason for poking around is looking for some place to go dancing, but apparently Sunday night isn’t a big clubbing night in small town western-Virginia.

They found one joint, but it’s a Country Western place, and though Gibbs might have done okay, and Abby is ready to jump in, the other three veto the idea in favor of dancing at the cabin, where they’ll be in charge of the music, and the dress code can be as relaxed as they like.

“Dress code?” Tim asks as they head into the van. They’ve been more or less naked the whole time they’ve been at the cabin.

“Was thinking I might want to take some clothing off of you guys. Possibly while dancing,” Abby says.

“Don’t get greedy,” Breena says. “You had your turn. They’re up, remember?”

“Oh, right! That kiss was so hot, it’s worth at least a few whatever-you-two-wants,” Abby says with a smile, buckling in.

Tim and Jimmy glance at each other. They do not yet have a plan for ‘whatever they want.’ Then Tim says, “I like having my clothing taken off, possibly while dancing. We’d get to return the favor, right?”

Abby and Breena nod. “Whatever you want,” Abby says. She looks them up and down while Breena shifts the van into reverse. “What do you want?”

Tim looks at Jimmy, eyebrow high. Jimmy appears to be thinking. Abby smiles, “Whatever it is, it won’t be right when we get home. I’m thinking of a nap, and maybe some splashing around in the lake. But dinner and after… Is that enough time for you two to figure it out?”
Jimmy glances at Tim, and they nod.

“Great.”

Naptime and splashing around time is fun. They drag the chaises down next to the lake. Abby snoozes in the shade, and the other three get in some swimming, or at least just floating around. And after an hour or so, Tim’s arm and leg are feeling tired, so he heads over to join Abby on the chaise.

He dries off a bit, and then spoons up behind her. She snuggles in close with him, and his hand falls to her belly. He’s about three quarters asleep himself when he feels the light fluttering under his palm. Very fast, almost the sensation of a finger very lightly striking his palm once or twice. Then it’s gone. He lifts up a little to look at Abby’s face, see if she noticed.

She’s smiling, but asleep. Maybe having happy dreams of a certain little boy.

He kisses her ear, and throat, and settles back down. A second later that little flutter is back. “Hi, Sean,” he whispers.

He’s not sure how long he dozes. Can’t be too long, because he’s feeling pretty good when he wakes up, and naps longer than an hour usually leave him feeling unplugged.

Abby’s gently trying to extricate herself from him when he wakes up. “Stay a minute?” His eyes are still closed.

“Sure. Was trying not to wake you up.”

“It’s okay.” He holds her close for a moment, smelling her hair and skin, feeling her belly warm (and right now, still) under his fingers. “How much of this morning did you and Breena plan out?”

“We’d talked about it. When we were planning the weekend we talked about what we wanted to do, so we could pack well, and rainbow party was my thing, and she mentioned anything on the table fantasy play, which sounded good to me.”

“Did you know us together was hers?”

Abby nods. “Yeah. We talked about that, too. If she should even ask. We knew it’d be kind of squirm for you… I figured she should be able to ask. You and Jimmy can both say no. I mean, that’s… how we play right? We’re not afraid to say what we want or need. And we trust each other to say no to the things that are deal breakers.”

“I’d hope so. Was it just about her feeling comfortable enough to ask?”

“Some.” Abby’s starting to get an idea of what he’s really asking. “You want to know how I’d thought it’d go?”

“Something like that. I mean, beyond hot.”

“Yeah.” She lifts his hand to her mouth and kisses his palm. “Way hotter than I thought it was going to be, though. But, beyond hot, I thought… Okay, remember fried pickles? And you’re staring at me like I’m completely insane, and how on earth would anyone be stupid enough to fry a pickle?”

Tim kisses the back of her neck again. “I remember being unenthusiastic about the idea of fried pickles. And then even less interested after fried okra, which you told me was awesome, too.”
She nods, and then rolls over to face him, draping her leg over his hip. She smiles at him and giggles, the water looks fairly clear, but there’s a few algae patches, and once again he’s got some interesting green smears on him. Then she delicately plucks a bit of dried algae out of his eyebrow. “Yeah, but you liked fried things and you like pickles so… I thought if you put them together, you’d like them. And, if I hadn’t poked you about it, you wouldn’t have eaten them, they’ve have sat in the basket on the table, and I would have eaten them, but you wouldn’t have. So, I poked, and you did, and you really liked them… So… It was kind of like that. You like sex with Breena. You like watching Jimmy and Breena have sex. I thought if we put sex with Breena along with watching Jimmy and Breena have sex, you’d have a good time with that.” She kisses him. “Was feeling pretty stupid in the restaurant, because that’s when it hit me why that was something you wouldn’t have asked for. Why you weren’t putting that together on your own. I probably would have told Breena not to ask if I’d realized what was going on there.”

“Then I’m glad you didn’t.”

Abby shrugs. “Should have, though.”

Tim shrugs, too. “If I’m just getting it now, then I don’t think you need to get it before I do.”

She kisses him. “So, I don’t actually know you better than you know yourself?”

“Good to keep some mystery, right?”

She kisses him again. “But you are good?”

“Yeah.” There’s a lot of peace in his eyes as he’s holding her. “Good in a way I couldn’t have gotten to on my own.”

Abby’s eyes light up. “You feel that?” Her belly is pressed to his.

He smiles back at her. “Yeah. He was doing it earlier, too, when you were sleeping.”

“Breena, Jimmy, come here!” Abby calls out.

And a moment later, Jimmy and Breena join them. Abby’s got Tim in front of her, and Breena spooned up behind, which is all the people you can possibly get on that lounge. Jimmy’s kneeling behind Breena. Both of them have their hands resting on Abby’s tummy, and all four of them feel Sean kicking around.

A minute later, he settles back down, and all four of them are smiling like crazy at it.
More swimming (and in Tim’s case floating) rounds out the afternoon. Abby joins them, remembering why time immersed in water, especially cool water, feels awesome when pregnant. Hips and back, knees and feet are all happy with some weightless time, and cool makes everything feel better.

All of them with a bit of green algae in their hair and on their skin is somewhat less than fun, but it’s not hurting anything.

“How about you two get first dibs on the shower?” Breena says to Tim and Jimmy when they get out. “You’ve got stuff to talk about, right?”

And in that they haven’t yet talked about ‘whatever you want’ is, that sounds like a decent plan.

“Just don’t use up all the hot water!” Abby calls out, laughing.

Tim doesn’t get the joke until he’s on the porch, remembers that they filled the hot tub while getting showers, and comes to the conclusion that there’s an industrial-sized water heater tucked under this cabin somewhere.

“So, what do we want?” Jimmy asks while leaning into the shower, turning it on.

“Got a few ideas. Dancing and clothing on, that part’s pretty set. Is there anything you really want?” Tim’s surprised to see Jimmy actually looking a little shy. “What?”

“Does Abby actually really like anal, or is it just something you like and she’s cool with?”

Tim smiles a little, stepping in, letting the water stream down him, rinsing off some of the algae, then he steps back so Jimmy’s got water access.

“Yeah, she really likes it. I mean, you can’t just hop on her and shove it in, but… Pretend it’s your ass, treat it accordingly, and yes, she likes it.”

“It hurt Breena when we tried.”

Tim nods. “Everyone’s built different, and I was terrified of hurting her the first time, too. But, she really likes it, and…” Tim’s thinking through the contents of the toy bag, and yes, they did bring them. “If you want to stretch her out really slow and gentle, they brought the glass dilators.”

“The what?” Jimmy knows what both of those words mean, but he’s a little fuzzy on the idea of what exactly that is in terms of the toy box.

“Anal plugs. In different sizes. If you use fingers you’ve got a three step ramp up.” Tim makes a fist, and sticks one finger in.
“I’ve got a medical degree, I don’t need hand puppets to grasp the concept,” Jimmy says dryly.

“Okay, with them, it’s six steps. Starts smaller than your pinky and works up to about dick sized.” Tim thinks some more. “They’re comfortable—“

“You know that firsthand?” Jimmy asks, reaching for his shampoo.

“Yes. The only toys I haven’t used myself are the butterfly and the strap on, and I haven’t used them because I’m not built for the one and the other is redundant. The only ones she hasn’t used are the fleshlight and the cockrings, for the same reason.”

Jimmy thinks about that, rubbing the shampoo into his hair, and then gets Tim back on the track he was on. “Okay. So… they’re comfortable…”

“Yeah.” Tim notices that Jimmy doesn’t really need the water right this second, so he puts his hands on Jimmy’s shoulders and scoots them around so he’s in the water. “One or two dances per size… that’s at least half an hour of stretching out and teasing. Slow and easy. Shouldn’t hurt at all. Hasn’t when I’ve done it.”

That’s reassuring. He’s thinking about how it felt when the girls were doing him. “Were they only using one finger on me?”

“Looked like that to me, but I wasn’t in a great position to watch the end.”

“Felt… weird… it didn’t hurt, but… weird, almost… intrusive… at first.”

Tim nods, he knows the sensation. “Takes your body a bit to decide it likes it.”

Jimmy nods again at that as Tim rubs his fingers through his hair. He’s been getting more soap on his hair and skin than it really likes this weekend (for good reason) but he’s hoping he can just rise the algae off.

“You did like it, right? You looked like you liked it.”

Jimmy’s eyes go wide as he nods hard. “God, yes. Once they got into it. YES. Just, trying to think through doing it to someone else. Abby’s not exactly built for a lot of what I liked about it.”

Tim nods. “That’s why she did it to me months before I did it to her. Why she had to put it on the table. ‘Cause I wasn’t going to suggest it.”

Now Jimmy’s looking a little confused. “You like it, too right?”

“Oh yeah, but. I hadn’t ever done it with anyone else before her, and like you said, kind of intrusive, and since she doesn’t have a prostate… She had to ask, because I didn’t like the in-out part of it enough to suggest being on the doing side.”

Jimmy squints at him a bit, and moves Tim out of the water so he can rise the shampoo out of his hair. One of these days he’ll get the whole story on that, because, okay, yes the in out bit wasn’t his favorite part, but he wouldn’t say no to that, either. “So, you think she’d be happy with anal.”

Tim looks at Jimmy dryly. “Well, it’s true that I just met her, and we’ve never had sex before, so I’m guessing here, but I’d say she’d be okay with it.”

Jimmy whacks Tim in the chest with the back of his hand. “Smartass. Use some soap, all you’re doing is moving the algae around.”
“Great.” Tim reaches for his shampoo. “Hair’s going to feel like straw after this.”

“You pay attention to how your hair feels?”

“Not really, but Abby does. Sometimes she’ll be petting my hair and then say, ‘Conditioner next time.’ I can feel that’s coming up soon.”

Jimmy inclines his head at that. “So, we know what I want to do…”

“Think Breena wants to watch or play?”

“Probably both. Watch then play?”

“Hmmmm…”

“Hmmmm…?”

Tim’s got the start of a plan in place. “They both like it when we take charge. I’m thinking we run the show. Into the shower they go, and we lay out the clothing, and we take them to dinner, order for them, and we tease and play with them, and home we go for dancing and more teasing, and eventually, I’m on my back, and Abby slips onto me, you take out the last of the plugs and slip into her, and Breena rides my face and we all have a very good time.”

Jimmy smiles at that. He had a blast when he was on his back with Breena and Abby riding him, and that as a foursome sounds even better. And then he’s got another idea to add to it. “I run Abby and you run Breena?”

Tim nods, wide grin on his face. “Yeah, I like that.”

“And I’m thinking part of dancing and teasing should involve them playing with each other.”

That grin gets even wider. “I think you’re onto something there. I know we brought our butterfly, I’m thinking that might make dinner more interesting for Breena.” Tim finishes rinsing his hair. “Clean enough?”

“You’ll do.”

“Good.”

They step out, and Jimmy has one other idea. He taps the ring they got for him. “How loose was this on you? Any danger of falling off?”

“No. Maybe half a size too big. Why?”

Jimmy takes them off, and puts the one he just got back on. “If we’re going to play with them while we’re out, might not hurt to look like we’re each with the right girl. Assuming I’ll be able to get yours off when we’re done, that is.”

That’s a good point, and also a nice way to go about showing each of the ladies who’s in charge of them tonight. “Let’s get out of the shower and cooled off. My fingers always plump up when I’m warm, yours probably do, too, so I’m not sure you could get it on right now, but if you can before we go…”

“Okay.”

They quickly dry off, and head out, finding the girls on the porch, leaning against the side of the hot tub, looking at Abby’s phone.

Abby stretches her hand out. “Look what Penny sent us!”

Tim takes the phone and holds it so Jimmy can see, too. It’s a picture of Gibbs and Ducky crashed out on the sofa, heads back on the back rest, eyes closed, dead asleep. Anna’s snuggled onto Ducky’s chest, his hand on her back (even asleep, he’s got a good hold on her). Kelly is on her side, head pillowed on Gibbs’ leg, and Molly is right next to her, pointed the other direction, head on Ducky’s leg. The girls are all asleep, too.

He reads the text: Naptime! We went to the park and did some running (walking) around, followed by out for lunch, ice cream, and home. Abbi turned on Little Bear so the girls could have some quiet time before taking them upstairs to nap. Next thing we knew, there’s snoring coming from the living room.

As you can see, everything is fine, and we’re holding down the fort with ease! See you tomorrow afternoon.

Both of the guys, in a manly, restrained sort of way, cooed at that. And Abby and Breena enjoyed it.

Then Tim and Jimmy burst out into full on raucous laughter at the picture that followed it, which is Sarah crouching behind Gibbs, making bunny ears, and flashing a goofy smile at the camera. Thought you’d like this. —S.

We do. Tim texts back.

Once Tim sends back a quick ‘thanks for the pictures, glad to see everything is okay’ text to everyone, he looks at both ladies, who are also sporting some nifty algae stains and says, “We do have a plan for tonight. It’s for both of you. First off, shower time. Both of you get cleaned up. Abby, get really cleaned up. Take at least twenty minutes. When you get out we’ll have laid out clothing and toys for you.”

Tim doesn’t have a “Dom voice” though he does say that quietly and with a slightly deeper intonation than usual. He does have “Dom posture” where he straightens up a bit more, keeps eye contact a bit longer and more intense, and stands with his legs a bit wider apart. Granted, he doesn’t have Tony’s wide shoulders, but he’s not a tiny guy, and when he’s in charge, he plays that up.

He lets himself take up more space when he’s in charge, and both of the girls feel the shift and respond favorably to it. They go scampering into the shower, and Jimmy looks at him, raises an eyebrow and says, “So, is that your best Gibbs impression?”

Tim glares at him silently until Jimmy leans back a little, unconsciously putting more space between him and Tim. Then he says, “That’s my best Gibbs impression.”

Jimmy laughs. “Come on, let’s get things laid out.”

---

The girls might have packed more stuff than the settlers took to start new lives on new continents, but they did not, by any stretch, bring along their entire wardrobe.

In fact, if anything, they skimped on clothing (which they rightly assumed wouldn’t be that big of a deal this weekend) in favor of room for extra sheets, towels, and toys. (All of which have been used happily by this crew.)

So, it’s not so much a matter of putting together outfits designed to appeal to every kink they have, so much as making sure that both girls are appropriately covered for going out.

“Breena okay with going out without a bra?” Tim’s never seen her do it, so he’s asking.

Jimmy’s looking through the suitcase, checking to see what Abby’s brought. He shakes his head at Tim. “Not comfortable. Too jiggly. Abby won’t go without one now, right?” Because about half of the time when she’s off duty, and not pregnant or nursing, she doesn’t wear one.

“Yeah. Same thing.” At two cup sizes bigger than normal, Abby’s not a fan anything that involves a lot of walking around without a bra. When she’s nursing, which got her to three cup sizes bigger than usual, she was even sleeping in one.

Tim hunts around and finds one of Breena’s bras. He holds it under the dress he’s eyeing, and at least in the light of the bedroom, it’s not visible through the fabric. It’s a light pink sundress, made of several layers of soft, floaty pink stuff that are fairly transparent on their own, but with all the layers, it’s opaque. The bra is medium green. It’ll work… well enough.

He glances over, and sees that Jimmy has Abby’s boots sitting on the bed, next to a black, square-necked dress with little red cherries all over it. Tim approves. He likes that dress, a lot, and likes it even more now. That one’s all soft cotton and kind of stretchy. This is probably the last week she can wear it and still be ‘dressed,’ she’s just about spilling out of the top, and an extra curvy tummy and bottom mean it’s a bit shorter than usual.

He’s got the pink sundress for Breena, her tan sandals, bra, and the butterfly. He figures that should count as properly dressed for going out.

“The plugs you were talking about, can you sit wearing one of them?” Jimmy asks, holding a pair of Abby’s panties, apparently debating if she’s wearing them or not.

Tim nods.

“Okay, hand ‘em over.”

Tim smiles, and goes to find them, handing them over. For a moment, Jimmy’s just looking at them, touching, getting a feel. Then he lays the smallest one on Abby’s dress. He’s got a small bottle of lube and the two next sizes up in his palm, and then seems to realize he can’t tuck them into a pocket if he’s not wearing pants.

Tim’s also noting the clock, and that they need to get dressed if they’re going to be ready when the girls come out.

Jeans, easy enough. Tim’s thinking about his kilt but decides that since he doesn’t wear any sort of underwear with it, and if part of tonight’s game is taking his clothing off, that it’d be a good plan to wear enough clothing to make taking it off fun. So, jeans, boxers, he pokes around some more, and finds that he does have a button down. Abby brought his dark red one. He puts that on, rolling up his sleeves, not buttoning the top two buttons. He doesn’t have a belt… So untucked. Shoes… Mmmm… Okay, they only brought the boots he wears with his kilt and his flip flops. So, flip flops it is. He takes a quick glance at himself, and decides he’s done.

Jimmy’s got jeans, too. Of course, from the looks of it, all they packed him was a pair of jeans. He had cargo shorts on when they drove out, and… yeah, two bottoms for a four day trip, makes sense.
Jimmy grabs a t-shirt, and spends a few seconds eyeing the flannel shirt that Breena brought for him on the off chance it got a little cool. They are going out, there will be air conditioning… He puts it on.

Jimmy’s slipping his toys into the inside his pocket when Tim says, “Careful, don’t want lube spilling in there.”

“I know how to close the bottle.”

“Great. Go grab a ziplock baggie, too.”

Jimmy looks curious, not immediately seeing why he’d need a baggie.

“If you’re going to put a new one in, you’ve got to take the old one out.”

Jimmy nods, realizing he probably should have thought of that, and heads to the kitchen.

A minute later he’s back, and they hear the water stop in the bathroom. Tim glances around one more time, and then grabs the collars. “Both of them?”

Jimmy takes one from him. “Yeah.” They can hear the girls talking to each other. “Rings?”

Tim nods, slipping his off, handing it over, watching to see if it’ll fit Jimmy. Jimmy tries it on tentatively, but it doesn’t give him any problems. It’s snug, not cutting off circulation, and goes over the largest part of his ring finger readily enough. Tim slips Jimmy’s ring on, and it’s a little loose, but not terrible. It’s not going to go skittering off, never to be seen again, if he moves his hand too fast.

And, just as he has it on his hand, the girls come out.

Jimmy’s looking them both over, they’re wrapped in towels and looking pretty happy with each other and the world in general. They also appear to approve of what Tim and Jimmy are wearing. Jimmy says to them, “At least for the first bit of tonight, each of us has one of you. Can you figure out who goes with whom?”

The girls look them over, sure there has to be a clue.

Abby decides that Jimmy’s got her, but not for the right reason. She’s just running the odds based on what they like and who’s likely to be fantasizing about what.

Breena’s grabs her a second before she starts to move, still sure there has to be a visible clue, but nothing about what the guys are obviously wearing is saying who goes with whom to her. She takes another minute, looking more closely, catches the black glint on Jimmy’s ring finger, and then nods to Abby, who sees it, then gives both of the boys a very clever look before heading over to Jimmy.

Tim crooks his index finger at Breena, and she all but springs toward him. She’s about a foot in front of him, and it’s really hitting him how tiny she is. She’s got so much personality that she seems larger, but right now, standing right in front of him, staring up at him, he’s very aware of the fact that the top of her head just comes up to his chin.

He’s looking down at her, eye contact first, and then looking all over her body. He tugs gently on the towel and it falls to the floor, then his fingers ghost gently over her shoulders and arms.

“You like it when I take charge, right?”

“Yes!”
“Good. Wear my collar tonight? Put yourself in my hands for our mutual pleasure. Let me make all the decisions and tell you what to do and drive you out of your mind with wanting before getting you off so hard your knees buckle and lights dance behind your eyes.”

“Yes!” She’s glowing at the idea, eyes and skin bright with it.

“Good. Safewords are ‘no’ and ‘stop?’”

She nods again.

“Anything you don’t like, anything too far, you don’t want to do it, any questions or comments or… whatever… just say the word, and we break play. Or call me Timothy, and I’ll stop dead. Otherwise, game on, and I’m calling the shots.”

She smiles up at him. “Excellent.”

Tim steps over to the bed, where her clothing is laid out, and takes the collar that’s resting on the mattress next to Breena’s outfit in hand. He kneels at her feet, one foot and one knee on the floor, and then pats his thigh. “Foot here.”

Breena complies, looking at him curiously. “It won’t look right with the rest of your outfit if it’s around your neck, so…” he wraps the black leather around her thigh, and buckles it tight. Like his ring on Jimmy, it’s a little snug, but he’s not cutting off circulation to her foot, and it’s extremely unlikely to fall off.

“Good? Not too tight?”

Breena puts her leg down and takes a few steps. It’s a little lower on her thigh than she’d normally wear a garter, but it feels secure, and her dress comes to just above her knee, so it’ll be covered. “It works. Feels a little odd, but I’ve worn garters before.”

“Little less ruffly than the ones you usually go for?”

“Yes. All the other ones are lace.”

Tim likes that idea, too. One of these days, he’s going to see her in a frilly lace garter, a smile, and nothing else. “Not today. I want you to get dressed, except for the butterfly. I’ll put that on, and keep hold of the remote. You can wear any makeup you like on your eyes, but no foundation, no lipstick unless it’s one of the lip tars. Don’t want to taste or feel makeup when I’m kissing you. Brush out your hair, but don’t dry it, don’t straighten it. I like the way it looks when you just let it air dry.”

“Frizzy?” Breena’s not entirely sure that Tim has a clue as to what her hair does if she doesn’t straighten it.

“Soft and wavy. If you put stuff in it to make it softer, that’s fine, too. I pick your perfume.” Tim sits down on the armchair in the bedroom. “Bring me the perfumes and get ready where I can watch.”
of this he’s done before is tying Breena up and playing with her, which is a lot of fun, but not this sort of “in charge.”

Abby’s standing still, watching him, patiently waiting to see where he’ll take her. He gets the sense that she knows he’s not entirely sure what he’s doing, but she’s happy to let him feel it out and play around with it.

Tim’s behind him, having staked out the armchair for his territory, so Jimmy can hear what he’s doing, but not see it, so… Okay… Yeah… Huh… Being completely in charge is actually kind of daunting. Now what…

He pulls Abby closer to him, touching is good and kissing is good, and he’ll figure it out from there. That sounds like a decent first step.

Abby melts against him, so she’s on board for kissing and touching, too.

Breena feels very naked. She’s been sans clothing pretty much twenty hours a day this weekend, but right now, doing the sorts of things she usually does on her own, in private, with Tim’s eyes glued to her, she’s not just nude, she’s naked.

It’s not bad. Very different. Intimacy of a flavor she’s not familiar with. Yes, Jimmy’s seen her get ready for a night out, but… he’s never watched to get off on it. He’s never told her how to do her hair or what makeup to put on.

So, she’s brushing out her hair, feeling like she’s been laid bare, excited by it, and almost nervous, a tinge of being unsure if she can do this right.

Tim’s not smiling. He’s sitting in that chair, all spread out, thumb lightly stroking over his dick through his jeans, watching her like he’s going to eat her alive and enjoy every taste.

Abby had mentioned that sometimes she can get an almost dangerous edge out of Tim, and Breena hadn’t really believed it was possible, she can see and feel it from him right now, and it’s delicious.

Jimmy breaks his kiss with Abby and sits on the side of the bed, legs stretched out in front of him, her straddling them. He pulls her towel off, wanting to look as well as feel.

Eighteen weeks along, this is definitely his favorite part of pregnancy. She’s all soft and round and curvy, but not so far along she can’t have a good time. His fingers trace over full, lush breasts. They’re more sensitive than normal, and Abby purrs at that touch. Jimmy’s looking up at her, smiling, as he rubs his thumbs over her nipples.

“Good?”

“Oh, yeah.”

He slips his hands down, petting over her belly, and then places his hands on her hips. He folds his legs in, so they’re close to the bed, no longer between hers, and then turns her around. For a few seconds he just looks at her, eyes tracing her back and butt, devouring black ink and supple pregnant curves, and then he lays a kiss on each cheek.
“Want to play with this tonight.”

Abby looks over her shoulder, brilliant, gleaming smile aimed at him. “I like that idea.”

“Haven’t done a whole lot of this in the past.”

Her smile goes soft, kind. “You start going left when you need to go right, I’ll let you know.”

He understands that as a general, I’ll let you know if it isn’t working comment as opposed to a specific sort of instruction.

“Good. For all of this, right?” He means running things as well as playing with anal.

Abby quickly turns around and kisses him. “Always.” Then she turns back around, wiggling in a ‘come and get it’ sort of manner.

And that’s all the invitation Jimmy needs.

----------

Breena had brought two perfumes. One, Tim hasn’t smelled before. It’s okay, but he doesn’t know what it’s like on her skin. So, he puts the lid back on and rests it on the bedside table. The other is the one with the cute, innocent name, (Butterflies, Flowers and Jewels Attending) but he thinks of it as “Freshly Debauched Virgin.” Granted, that’s on Breena’s skin. In the bottle it’s pink and innocent and does make him think of butterflies, flowers, and spring time.

She’s got her hair brushed through, makeup done, bra and collar on. Tim nods at her to come closer, and she does, standing in front of him as he sits on the chair, legs spread out in front of him, taking up the whole space. For a moment he just looks her up and down, eyes lingering, slowly caressing each inch of her skin, and then he points to the floor between his feet. “Kneel.”

He sees her shiver a little at that, and a faint flush touches her cheeks. Tim smiles, enjoying it.

She’s staring up at him from the floor, on her knees, wondering what he’s going to ask for next.

Tim lifts the perfume bottle, placing his finger over the opening, and flips it, letting the cool liquid touch his fingertip. Then flips it again, transferring the bottle to his other hand, as he lightly strokes his wet finger along Breena’s collarbone and down to between her breasts.

He flips the bottle against his finger again. “Wrist.” She holds out her arm and he strokes the scent up her arm.

“Stand.” So she does, and he traces a fine line of perfume up her thigh.

He smiles up at her, then says, “Pick out a lip tar for me, then put it on.”

“Any color?”

“Any color you like. I know you said you didn’t like anything hard enough to mark, no bites or hickies, but how about wearing my kiss tonight?”

Breena smiles at him. She’s fine with that.

A minute later, she’s back with a dark red color that matches Tim’s shirt fairly well. Assuming this kiss is anywhere anyone else can see it, they’ll have no trouble putting two and two together and coming up with four.

“In my lap, and put it on me. Lightly, just enough for one kiss this time.”

She nods and gets to it. “Where are you going to put it?”

Tim doesn’t answer. She’s painting his lips so he can’t really talk. The amused glint in his eyes seem to say, That’s the question now, isn’t it?

When she gets done, he lifts her breast, nuzzling over the soft, lacy material of her bra, coaxing her nipple to harden, carefully making sure his lips don’t touch her bra. He lifts his eyes to hers, grins at her, and then lays the kiss right on the top of the swell of her breast. It’s not even remotely subtle, and will be visible to everyone even when she’s got her dress on.

“Let it dry, and then into the dress.”

Breena nods, waiting to see if he’s going to tell her to do anything else. “Up you get. Relax, enjoy what they’re up to. I’m going to wash this off before it sets.”

What “they’re up to” is Jimmy kissing slow and easy down Abby’s spine. He’s got one hand on her breast, the other gently stroking her pussy, as his lips ease their way down to her butt.

He’s enjoying that, and Abby really is. She’s making some extremely happy noises.

He’s thinking he’s going to stay with this for a while, then spend at least a little while exploring her ass, which he hasn’t done much of. Then… getting dressed… no… not entirely dressed, not yet. He’s got a mental image of her in her boots, leaning over the bed, butt in the air, while he’s sitting between her legs, licking her pussy as he slides the first of the plugs in.

Oh, yeah, they are definitely doing that.

When Tim’s out of the bathroom, he watches Breena watch Jimmy and Abby. She’s still naked save for her collar and bra, his kiss not fully dried, yet.

She looks like she’s enjoying the show.

Abby and Jimmy do, too, though he can see Jimmy’s not entirely sure what he’s doing. But Abby’s being gentle with him, and they’re both having fun.

Tim heads back to the armchair, taking Breena by the hand on the way there, and sits down with her in his lap. “This is cozy.”

She snuggles in closer. “Yep. Gonna keep me naked on your lap all night?”

Tim strokes her cheek. “Petting you all night, hand feeding you little nibbles of food. Have you ride my cock slow and easy while I’m saying, hot, dirty, sexy things to you, and we watch them fuck? Would you like that?”
Breena’s eyes shut for a second at that idea and a little shiver races through her. “Wouldn’t mind.”

“What if I have something more ambitious in mind?” His eyes are warm at that.

She smiles back. “I like ambitious. Are you going to tell me about it, or is it a surprise?”

He kisses her, wet and slow, all his own technique, wanting her to know, feel, even with her eyes closed that it’s him, not Jimmy. His hand curls in her hair, holding her head snug as he stares into her eyes, and then he quietly says against her lips, “Eventually, we’ll get you dressed, and they’ll get dressed, and we’re going out. You’ll be walking around in that pretty little dress with my kiss on your chest, my collar on your thigh, and the butterfly between your legs, never knowing when it’s going to buzz. It’ll just look like we’re two couples out for a fun date night, and maybe I’m just whispering something sweet in your ear, but I promise it’ll be red hot smut. I’ll be standing next to you, lips a breath from your ear, whispering the hottest fucking words you’ve ever heard while making your pussy throb. Then I’ll smile and point out what’s on the dessert menu. And we’re going to do stuff like that, all night long. We’ll come back here and dance, and you’ll peel me out of my clothing. You’ll wrap your hands and breasts and pussy around my dick before the dance is done. And you and Abby’ll get to dance and play with each other. I know at least one of those dances will be just for Jimmy and I to watch, just to see how hard you can make us by dancing with each other. And when we’re both so hard we’re about to pass out from watching, we’re going to end tonight with my face buried between your legs, while you kiss Abby, pet her breasts, and Jimmy and I do her together. How’s that for ambition?”

Breena’s eyes ease shut, and then open slowly as she inhales and exhales, deep. “I like it when you’re ambitious.”

Tim smiles. “Good.” His hand slips between her legs, touching her gently, coming back slick. He licks that finger off. “Delicious.” Then he does it again, this time rubbing her scent on his throat and wrists. “Turned on you, all the cologne I need.” He smiles at her. “Maybe that’ll get your other husband kissing me, and maybe, if you’re really, really good, and you do everything right, I’ll let you and Abby watch him lick your cum off my skin.”

Breena’s staring at him like she can’t believe he’s doing this. She’s heard about this. She remembers him running the story but… Holy Shit! Abby wasn’t kidding at all about how you get a very different Tim when he slips into Dom mode.

He’s watching her, looking amused, and then lightly taps her chest just below the kiss mark.

“All dry?”

Breena nods, gently stroking her finger over the kiss mark. It doesn’t smudge.

“Good.”

She starts to get up to put on her dress, but Tim tightens his hold on her. “Changed my mind, no dress, yet,” he whispers in her ear. “Go get the butterfly.”

He lets her go, and she crosses the room, grabbing it. She’s never used one of these before. Vibrators, sure. They’ve got a few of them. Brought them along, too. She tends to like a bit more force and a little less focus when it comes to vibrators. These little guys are okay, they vibrate nicely. But, like she told Tim when he was going down on her, she likes some stretch to go with her clit work, and butterflies, bullets, those thin little wand type things don’t do that.
Somehow though, given that this is designed to keep the butterfly right on her clt, and allows for complete access to her pussy, she’s thinking that stretch is something she’s going to have some of, too.

Of course, given how Tim’s looking at her, she’s wondering if that’s going to be part of the tease, keep her on edge and practically begging for a dick or fingers or something while he keeps nudging a little vibration here or there on her clt while driving her crazy with those words.

That’s the other thing that’s getting to her. God, those words. Hell, they practically feel better than the touch. She’s seriously wondering if he can just talk her off. She can half imagine that. Naked, hands tied above her head, all stretched out, him teasing her with just the tip of one finger, slipping it up and down, over and over, on her clt while he sits there and talks her off.

Abby really likes this. Jimmy’s kneading and licking her butt, which feels amazing, Tim’s got red hot smut pouring out of his mouth, which is going straight to her pussy. She catches sight of Breena in that cute little bra, with the collar on her thigh and Tim’s lips in blood red on her chest, as she comes over to grab the butterfly, and this is almost too much of a good thing.

She’s not sure if there’s a special part of heaven reserved for bisexuals, but she figures that if there is, it’s a whole lot like this.

Jimmy’s fingers stop kneading and move to the front of her, finding her clt and taking her higher than the proverbial kite.

God! This is so good! And while for Jimmy and Tim that would be more of an expression of sincere appreciation, for Abby, that’s a prayer of thanksgiving.

Apparently Abby likes rimming just as much as he did. She’s hot and wet and squirming and making some extremely happy noises while Jimmy licks her.

He’s rippling his fingers on her butt, kneading the muscles, and thinking about where to take this.

When they were playing with him, the idea was to keep him at almost getting off, but not get him over the line until he was past begging for it. Which makes a certain amount of sense because he can only get off so many times.

But Abby’s not a guy. Really not a guy.

Jimmy lets go of her butt, slips his left index and middle finger into her pussy, looking for her g-spot while his right finds her clt.

Tonight, Abby’s getting off, a lot. Tim might specialize in marathon sex; Jimmy’s thing is lots and lots of orgasms, his specialty is speed, and he’s going to show her exactly how he plays that game.

He hears Abby moaning, loud, as her body starts to go tight around his hand. Perfect. He’d grin but his mouth is busy.
Breena brings the butterfly over to Tim, placing it in the hand he’s holding out for it.

“Have you ever worn one of these before?”

Breena shakes her head.

“Okay. You step into it, sort of like panties.” It does have straps that are sort of like the leg holes for panties, though he’s certain the thing they most closely resemble, a jock strap, is something that Breena’s never worn. He holds them open, and low to the floor, so she can step into them. Once they’re around her feet, he tugs them up her leg, carefully over the collar, and then makes sure the butterfly is right on her clit, before he fastens the second set of straps, the ones that go around her waist.

“Comfy?”

It feels a little odd, but it’s not uncomfortable. “Different. But it’s not pinching or anything.”

Tim nods. The straps are vinyl, means they won’t stain, and they’re easy to clean, but they probably aren’t the softest material either.

He looks around, they’ve got tissues. “Want me to wrap the straps?”

Breena shakes her head. “I think this’ll be fine.”

“Okay, if it gets annoying, let me know. I’m going to frustrate the hell out of you, but I don’t want you ending up with blisters on your hips.”

She smiles at that. “One sort of annoyed is fine another isn’t?”

“Exactly.” He pulls her closer, kissing her lips. “I want you quivering with anticipation, begging me to get you off. Not thinking about how the straps are rubbing you wrong.”

“I’ll let you know.”

“Good. That goes for anything else tonight, too. Too cool, got a stone in your sandal, hungry, thirsty, whatever. Don’t want anything distracting you away from this.”

Breena chuckles. “I will tell you if anything is distracting me from being a quivering bundle of need for you.”

Tim smiles at that, enjoying that she’s keeping some of her humor in place. “Perfect.” He cups his dick through his jeans. “That’s all you need to be focused on tonight.”

She rolls her eyes at him a little before saying, “Yes, sir.”

They hear Abby moaning behind her, and Breena sees Tim’s eyes slip over to see what’s going on on the other side of the room.

“Can I be focused on that, too?” Breena asks him.

“Yes,” he says, not taking his eyes away from Abby getting off as Jimmy licks her. “Now get the remote and give it to me.”

Breena takes a minute to get it, watching Abby coming down, breathing hard and fast as Jimmy cuddles her in his lap. Then she returns to Tim, who shifts focus away from Abby and Jimmy to her.
He looks Breena over, and takes the butterfly remote from her.

He’s already remembering why jeans are not the ideal choice for this sort of game. His dick is feeling sorely confined right now, and it would rather like a bit more space, and something warm and wet wrapped around it.

He flicks the butterfly into its lowest setting, and sees Breena jerk a little at that. “Feel good?”

“Yeah. Just a surprise.”

Tim grins, wicked. Then he stands up. “Take me out of my pants.”

“Enjoy the show?” Breena asks Tim as she does it. Unbuttoning and zipping him, then carefully shoving his pants and boxers down.

“I really did.”

Jimmy’s still holding Abby, petting her in his lap, but he does flash a thumbs up to Tim without turning away from Abby. Tim smiles at that, too.

Tim turns Breena so she’s facing the chair, back to him, and begins slowly kissing her ear lobe, then her neck, and then her shoulder.

“I enjoyed that a lot. Sweetest music on earth is the sound of a woman coming.” His fingers trail up the inside of her thigh, gently nudging her to spread her legs.

Once she’s in the position he wants, he knots his hand in her hair, pulling her back to his chest, thrusting into her hard and sure. “And you’re gonna sing for me tonight, gonna coax every note you know out of those sweet lips of yours, but not yet. Don’t come.”

Tim kisses her, deep and hard, lots of tongue matching his slow deep thrusts, and then he suddenly lets go of her hair, pulls most of the way out, and placing his hand on her back, between her shoulder blades, he gently pushes he down, so her hands are on the back of the arm chair.

“Leg up.” His fingers slip over the inside of her thigh, guiding it to the arm of the chair.

She’s wide open, just the tip of his dick inside her, butterfly nestled between her lips. Tim grabs his phone from his pocket and takes a quick picture of that, and then starts thrusting again, fast, deep, working himself up, and soon, off.

______________________________

Jimmy’s watching Tim, who has Breena in front of the chair, palms on the back of it, one leg up on the arm, other holding her up, as he’s slipping into her from behind again and again, from the sound of it, ramping up the vibrator fairly quickly.

He glances at Abby, who’s enjoying the show quite a bit, and he gets that, it’s hot to watch, but…

Okay… so, they’re supposed to be at this all night, and, at the rate Tim’s going, they aren’t going to make it to dinner, so…

Abby looks back to Jimmy and can see that he’s not sure what Tim’s doing. Well, he knows what Tim’s doing. He’s not blind or stupid. He doesn’t get why.
“James.” She breaks play with her safeword.

That make Jimmy feel alarmed. They’re snuggling on the bed. He can’t imagine he’s doing anything that bugs her.

But, he’s not doing anything to annoy her. Abby smiles. “Quick break to explain,” she says quietly. “You look confused, so…”

Jimmy nods. Right now Tim’s at, ‘Captain, I’m giving her all I’ve got’ speed fucking, which looks really counterintuitive to Jimmy. It’d be one thing if Tim could get off six times a night, or if they had a bottle of little blue pills for back up, but Jimmy knows for a fact that he can’t and they don’t, so…

“He’s planning on running her hard tonight. Which is a lot of fun. But, if you’re not careful, or if you don’t know someone inside and out, it’s really easy to push things just a little too far, and ruin a really good orgasm.”

“Uh…” This is still not helping Jimmy figure out what’s going on.

“Ever play with yourself, stringing yourself out, and then just touch again a little too soon, and boom! Soft, lame, not worth the build-up orgasm?”

Jimmy nods. No, he hasn’t done that to himself, but Breena has, back when they were still learning each other and she, trying to get him to last longer, slowed down at the exact wrong time to slow down, and then sped up too quick and… He knows. Tiny tingle, three little squirts, and done. Disappointing.

“Okay. He really gets off on running things. Hits him hard.”

Jimmy can see that. He looks like he’s having a really good time right now, and Breena appears to be enjoying it, too.

“But, the more turned on you are, the more difficult it is to pay really close attention to your partner, read what her body is telling you, and act on it appropriately. Also, the more turned on you are, the easier it is to just give into it and get off before you’ve gotten where you’re hoping to go.”

And the light goes on for Jimmy. “Refractory period.”

“Exactly. He’ll have way more control for playing her if he gets off now. She’s not going to get off. He is. He’ll keep her keyed up as long as she can stand, but given what all we’ve done today, and what we’re going to do, this should buy him a few hours of good focus.” She kisses Jimmy. “Anytime you want to break play and ask a question, feel free. We know you haven’t really done this before, not like this, at least.”

Jimmy nods, watching Abby, thinking some more.

God, this feels good. Tim’s moving, fast and deep, pulling her hips back to him with each stroke, feeling Breena all wet and silky and buzzing against his skin.

This is awesome! He couldn’t move all that much when they were on the sofa, and really being able to move feels amazing. His whole body can get into it.
She’s starting to tighten against him, so he’s got to get done soon, because he’s intentionally trying to not get her off. Tim moves a little faster, a bit deeper, feeling his thighs go tight, as his fingers clench against Breena’s hips, and he pulls her tight on him as he thrusts deep, pumping into her.

She whimpers and says, “Fuck!” quietly, but sincerely, when he stops.

“No coming, baby. Not yet,” he says, still breathing fast, clicking off the vibrator, leaving her hanging.

He can feel her clenching on him, trying to get just a hint more friction, so he gives her a gentle swat on the butt, and says, “None of that. If you want, and if Jimmy lets her, Abby can tell you what happens to bad girls who try to cheat and get off too soon, and I guarantee you, you won’t like it.”

Tim pulls back, intentionally not reaching for a tissue as he does it, watching his cum slip down the inside of her leg. “So pretty. Turn around, kneel, lick me clean, and tuck me back in.”

Breena does turn around, staring at Tim like she can’t believe he just said that to her. He sees the look. “No or stop ends the game, otherwise…”

Her hand slips to wipe some of his cum off her leg, but he shakes his head. “Don’t remember telling you to do that.”

Once again, her eyes go wide, but she kneels, and takes his dick in her hand, gently licking him off, and tucking him back into his pants, and then waits. He smiles at that. “You can zip me up, too.”

She just zips the zipper.

“Button’s good, too.”

So she buttons the button.

Tim smiles at her. “Stand up, please.” He glances over, and Jimmy and Abby look like they’re relaxing right now.

“Can I borrow Abby for a moment?” he asks Jimmy.

“Depends. I’m pretty comfy with her right here right now. What do you want her to do?”

“Lick my cum off of Breena’s leg.”

Tim can see that Abby likes that idea, and Jimmy’s looking like he’ll enjoy watching that, too. Jimmy lets go of Abby. “Off you go. Have fun with it.”

Abby’s grinning. “Oh, I will.” A second later, standing in front of Breena, Abby asks, “What can I lick?”

Tim stands behind Breena. “Spread your legs, love.” Breena does, and he drags his index finger along the crease between pelvis and leg. “Any cum below here, lick it off, above, leave it.”

Abby kneels in front of Breena, eyes up on Tim, grinning at him, and then she looks down to Breena, grinning at her, before saying, “Yes, sir.”

Tim’s eyes slip shut at that. He still loves hearing it.

And then he’s loving watching it. Abby’s soft, wet lips on Breena’s pretty, pretty leg. That’s so good.
Jimmy would have to admit that Tim had a hell of a good idea with that. Abby licking up Breena’s leg is insanely hot.

He’s watching his two favorite women, mostly naked, Breena’s in her bra, Abby’s still naked, playing with each other, feeling how hard that’s making him, how much he wants to just grab both of them and fuck until he’s cumming his brains out, and it’s occurring to him that Tim had another good idea, too.

What he’s not sure of is if he gets off now, if he’ll be up for much of anything later. Yeah, eventually, he’ll be up for something, but he’s not sure when eventually will be. One hour, two? Four? He’s already gotten off once today, and it’s been a long time since he’s gone for three in one day.

But if he doesn’t get off now, he’s also not sure if he’ll hit the ‘this hurts’ point before they’re really into the fun part of tonight. He knows all about blue balls from his two years of dating Breena, and they aren’t exactly his idea of fun.

Another thought wipes all of that out of his mind for a moment. Abby’s on all fours, licking the inside of Breena’s ankle, butt high in the air, and he’s got a raging hard on and the smallest of the plugs on the bed next to him.

The image of slipping his dick into her, and then settling the lubed plug in place… Oh god… His brain and body really like that idea, and he’s halfway across the room before he’s even aware of the fact that he’s moved.

Okay, technically, Abby doesn’t need to start at Breena’s ankle. Tim, especially when he doesn’t spend an hour getting worked up, isn’t Peter North. He doesn’t exactly cum gallons. (Abby would say, if you asked her to estimate, that 5 to 10 ml is his usual range, and that if she really goes to town on him, like yesterday, they can get that up to 20 ish. That’s impressive but not setting any records.)

And, on a second shot, that’ll be even lighter, so, it’s not like there’s enough to actually get all the way from Breena’s pussy to her foot. From what she can see, the lowest drip’s gotten to the inside of Breena’s knee.

But, this is permission to lick Breena, who will probably enjoy it, and she knows both of the guys will like the show, and it’s Breena’s skin in her mouth and on her tongue, so… it’s all good.

And, nope, neither of the guys complain at all about the fact that there is not, in fact, any cum on that part of Breena’s leg as her lips land on the inside of Breena’s ankle. And, looking up, eyes on Breena’s as she’s lightly sucking that little sensitive spot right above her ankle bone, Breena whimpers, so yeah, sounds like she’s enjoying this, too.

Abby’s eyes drop, and she focuses on the soft skin in front of her, drinking in the scent of turned on Breena, and perfume, and Tim’s cum. She’s making her own little moaning sounds at this, and then, a second later, her own little whimper, too. She hadn’t been paying attention to Jimmy, but right now she’s all full of him, gloriously full, as he’s rocking in and out of her… mmmm… yeah, he’s hitting everything just right. She had just enough time to cool down after the last orgasm that she knows she’ll get off easy this time, assuming he’s going to let her.

Apparently he decided Tim was on the right track with getting off early in the game. This doesn’t feel like he’s messing around or drawing her out with this.

She kisses a little higher and hears a quick buzz. Tim’s taking care of Breena, probably playing with her breasts, too.

Abby’s lips find the first trace of Tim’s cum, and she starts to lap it off Breena. Sounds like that’s doing good things for Jimmy, she hears him gasp behind her, and Tim’s telling Breena to watch. Something about her pretty little tongue on Breena’s silky legs. And how much better it’s going to look on her pussy later tonight.

Abby hears that and catches Tim’s eyes, he nods a little at her, knowing she wants that, too.

Then she’s the one gasping. Cool lube and cold glass slipping slowly into her while Jimmy’s stroking in and out.

“Fuck!” slips out of her mouth. “God, Jimmy! Fuck! Just like that.”

He gets the plug set. She thinks it’s the smallest one. There’s just a little stretch, but a little stretch is all she needs, especially right now with Breena’s leg in her mouth, Tim’s cum on her tongue, Jimmy’s dick in her pussy, and his fingers on her clit. She feels like she’s starting to tingle all over as she works her way up Breena’s leg, and as her nose is brushing Breena’s pussy (she’s following Tim’s orders exactly, her tongue isn’t going above the line her drew, that doesn’t mean her nose isn’t gently nudging Breena) Jimmy thrusts just a bit harder, breathing harshly behind her, and both of them drop over the edge into glorious, happy tingles.

With Jimmy sitting on the floor, Abby in his lap, both of them coming down, Tim flicks off the butterfly, and Breena moans, still frustrated.

Tim smiles at her. “Remember yesterday, all those times Abby told me that when I got off it’d be so amazing?”

Breena nods, curtly. She wants to be fucking, not thinking about fucking.

He kisses her ear. “It’s going to be even better for you.” Then he steps away, finds a towel and gently blots off her leg.

“Comfy?”

For a second he can see Breena’s not sure if she should answer honestly. She’s really wet. Turned on, Tim’s cum. She’s not sure if she can sit down without leaving a wet spot.

“Always an honest answer. Can’t do this well without good feedback.”

“Kind of squelchy.”

He very gently blots her pussy, too. Careful to make sure she’s still damp, but not sopping.
“Better?”

“Yes.”

“Good. Gonna keep you wet all night, and all night you’ll be feeling all slick and slippery, knowing that’s you and me all mixed together.” Suddenly, all the perfume she’s wearing makes a whole lot more sense to Breena. Tim smells like sex, her sex, but not from more than a few inches away. But it’s got to be noticeable on her from more than a few feet away, or would be if she didn’t have all that perfume on.

“You really think these things through, don’t you?”

Tim smiles at her. “I certainly try to.” He thinks again about what they’re going to do, and what color her dress is, and how, unlike Abby’s mostly black wardrobe, a wet spot will be very obvious on her light pink dress. “Go pick out some panties, too.”

She sees him get what she was concerned about. “Do they go over or under the butterfly?”

“Over. Pick any pair you like out, and put your dress on. Once those two are moving again. We’re going out.”

There are a few things Tim’s thinking as Jimmy’s driving the four of them into town.

First off, at least according to Abby, when girls talk about wanting sex so bad they ache, it’s more a metaphorical, mental frustration based ache. (Though when a person doesn’t know what he/she’s doing it’s possible that ache is a matter of being rubbed raw/too much pressure/etc…) But, for the most part, women are not equipped to get blue balls.

Because, of course, if he says he’s so hard he aches, he means he’s in literal pain. There can be a god-awful mental frustration aspect, too. But if he’s talking about aching, it means he’s been hard for so long, and everything is so swollen, that it really does feel like the day or two after getting a kick to the nuts.

Getting off usually takes care of said ache, but it’s entirely possible to be sore for a day or so after.

It’s his understanding that most women do not understand that if you get to the point where you’re rock hard and leaking, that not getting off really does ache and not strictly in the ‘I’m so turned on I can’t see straight’ sort of way.

Which is why they often find the concept of blue balls amusing instead of appalling.

And, that’s why the ones who really know what they’re doing, understand that ache can be used, like any pain, to kick the endorphins up even higher and produce a better orgasm.

He’s thinking this because there’s something else he knows, and that’s only an absolute bastard edges someone for too long the first time.

And there may be a lot of things that are true about Tim McGee, but that’s not one of them. He’s perfectly happy to have Breena thinking he’s going to spin her out all night. But he’s not going to do it. Mental ache, physical ache, pain is pain, and he wants to find the exact right line for Breena where she really is so turned on she can’t see straight, where she’s aching to get off, and he wants to use that to take her to the stars.
Where to eat? Jimmy’s thinking that as he’s driving around. It’s not so much a matter of what food, though something sensual and tasty would certainly be nice, it’s more that he knows for a fact that they are not going to be in any way, shape, or form appropriate for a casual family dining sort of place.

Jimmy The Dad can pretty easily imagine not being thrilled if the people in the booth next to him were getting their wives off between the courses. Jimmy The Dad can really imagine not being thrilled if he was out with say his ten and eight year old kids and the couples in the next booth are making sexy noises and whatnot.

So, Jimmy The Lover has already crossed off anywhere Jimmy The Dad might take his family for a nice Sunday dinner.

That leaves the really high end places and dives. They’re in the wrong part of town for a dive. He assumes there have to be some around here somewhere, but he’s not precisely sure how to google that. Least nice restaurant in Winchester? Place where no one will blink if you get your wife off between the courses? And, for that matter, he’s not sure he wants to eat there. He does want a decent dinner out of this. (Which is a good hint that getting off did a fine job of allowing him to think about things besides getting off. Jimmy The Lover with a hard-on is way less concerned about those sorts of things.)

Finally, he sees a parking spot and just pulls in. They’ll wander around until some place jumps out as appropriate.

As they’re walking toward the pedestrian mall, Tim, whose arm is firmly around Breena, says to him, “I’m thinking somewhere small enough to have single occupant bathrooms.”

“Got a taste for anything in specific?” Jimmy asks.

Tim grins, does something, though Jimmy’s not sure what, he can see both of Tim’s hands and the vibrator’s remote isn’t in them, but Breena jerks a little, and blushes. “Probably,” he replies.

A few more steps, Breena’s still looking pretty flushed, and Tim says, “Seafood? Might be a good night to get messy eating clams.”

Abby giggles at that. Jimmy pokes him, appalled that he’d come up with a joke that bad.

Tim generally prefers his pants on the looser end of the spectrum. He does own and has worn skinny jeans, but they really aren’t his thing.

Still, even loose jeans get fairly snug around the thigh, and if you happen to flex your leg a certain way, while walking, that can cause said jeans to get quite snug, especially over the bottom of the pocket area.

Which he found out when he flexed his thigh while stepping forward and accidentally turned the butterfly on. He wasn’t intending to do it, but having realized he could…

The control on the butterfly works two ways. Click it on, click it off, and twist it to increase or lower the force. He’s got it on the lowest setting, just a nice little hum, and every few steps he’s turning it
This is torture. Breena knows they’re walking around, she knows they’re in search of some sort of food, but she doesn’t care. She feels like she’s walking around in a daze, her pussy commanding all of her focus, as everything else falls away.

She’s wet. So wet and so slick and so turned on.

She feels full, and ripe, and open, and begging, pleading, begging for something, fingers, dick, dildo, anything, to fill her up.

Her whole body is aching to get off. At any moment, she’ll feel a little buzz, just enough to get her close again, just enough so that she can just see the start of her release, and then Tim stops.

“You’re looking a little flushed, love. I think you got some sun while we were swimming. Abby, do you have some sunblock?” Tim says, grinning, stopping them in the middle of the pedestrian area.

And of course Abby does.

So she’s standing there, as Tim’s gently rubbing sunblock into her arms and shoulders, his fingers making deep circles into her muscles that feel delicious, and lighter, set her skin dancing touches to her hands and neck.

“Okay, good, think I got it all.” He kisses below her ear and quietly adds, “Back at the house, we’ve got massage oil. When we get home I’ll lay you down, open the bottle, slowly drip it a drop at a time all up your legs, then over your mound, and onto your clit. Drop,” he hits her with a quick buzz, and then off, “by drop,” another fast buzz, “by drop.” He stops the butterfly. “I’ll rub it all up and down your legs, and over your mound, between your lips,” he hits the butterfly again, “until you’re glistening all over, smooth and slippery as oiled silk and you’re begging me to fuck you.”

“Oh, please.” It comes out of her as a whimper.

Tim smiles, then turns off the butterfly.

Tim’s thinking they’re getting close to the edge between turned on and wanting, and cruel for no damn reason. He wants to dance Breena on that line, not cross it.

“How about the sushi place we were looking at the first time we were here?” Tim says. To him that’s sounding like a good plan, it’s about a quarter mile away, enough of a walk to give him one more shot at teasing Breena, plus it looked small enough to have the sort of bathroom where he’ll be able to get some alone time with her and get her off.

Then decent dinner, more teasing, back home dancing…

Sounds good to him.

They’re ambling along in that direction, happy with the decision, and Tim notices the benches in the middle of the mall. He edges them in that direction. He’s been keeping his arm around Breena, keeping her right next to him, controlling her walking speed and where she’s going, partly just to show her he can, and partly because she’s not, by any stretch, really aware of what’s around her right now.

He gets her seated on the bench, and then puts his foot on the seat, bending over, “tying his shoe.” (Would look a lot more convincing if he wasn’t wearing a flip flop. Jimmy and Abby are very amused by this.) It’s really just an excuse to have his mouth next to Breena’s ear.

“What would you do if I told you to head to the back of this bench, stand behind it, bend over, put your palms on the seat, and raise your dress?”

She shudders at that idea, eyes glazed. She even shifts a little at those words, like she might do it.

“We’re just talking.” He touches her face, gentle stroke of fingers along her cheek, and a little kiss, and then turns on the vibrator. “I’m not getting us arrested. But I’m thinking about it. I’m thinking about peeling those soaking wet panties off of you. I’m thinking about your ass and pussy high in the air, all wet and gleaming, smelling like sex and that perfume and my cum. Thinking about standing behind you, and fucking you right here, in the daylight, where everyone can see you flush red and scream my name as you get off on my cock.”

Tim stands up, clicking off the vibrator, and takes Breena’s hands, pulling her up, keeping her close as they continue their walk down to the restaurant.

Sunday night, a bit after seven, the sushi place is busy but not packed. Fifteen minute wait for a four top, not too bad. They head to the bar to wait.

Sometimes, there are benefits to being a lefty. Tim leans, left side against the bar, and makes sure Breen’s right in front of him, chest to his back. His right arm is around her waist. His lips are on her shoulder, and he nudges her left leg, letting her know to rest it on the bar rail.

So, from any distance away, they’re just two very cuddly people on a date. And, even up close, the drape of her skirt, and the position of their bodies is hiding the fact that he’s stroking his fingers up and down the back of her thigh.

“You driving home, or am I?” he asks Jimmy.

“I’ll have a taste of whatever you get, but I’m good with driving,” Jimmy answers.

“Good.” They’ve got an impressive looking sake collection, and better yet, a tasting selection. He orders the tasting selection, knowing it’ll be there in a few seconds, and given the way this group drinks, that six shot-glass-sized cups of sake should do them all just fine.

His fingers have reached Breena panties when the sake is placed in front of them. Little tray, tiny glasses. He uses his right hand, reaching around her, to snag one and take a sip. “Yummy.” He holds it for Breena, offering her a sip, too, as he slips her panties to the side and thrusts three fingers into her.

He times it right, and it looks like she’s blissfully enjoying the sake at her lips.

“Good, baby?”

“Yes,” she sighs, rocking a little against him.
He can feel the restless motion of her hips, the way she’s trying to get more from him. He’s fairly sure that if he turns on the butterfly, she’ll come right here, at the bar, on his fingers, but… Nope. Not yet, not like this.

He gives her another sip, and thrust, and then places the drink back on the tray while removing his fingers and rubbing most of her cum off on her thigh. He kisses her ear. “Mens room. Take the panties and butterfly off. Wait for me. Don’t get off.”

Jimmy and Abby watch Breena almost stumble off. They both look at Tim, who’s looking very cocky and extremely pleased with himself right now.

He takes a little drop of one of the sakes with his left index finger, and hold it out for Abby. “Taste?”

Abby smiles at him, and licks the drop off his finger. You’re evil. She signs to him.

Think Jimmy’ll lick it off my finger, too?

Not here.

Want to see him do it later?

Abby smiles at him.

“Do I get to get in on that?” Jimmy asks.

Abby turns to him, and kisses his lips. “Eventually.”

Tim takes one of the small cups, rubs his index and middle finger around the rim, and then passes it to Jimmy. “Think you’ll like this one.”

Jimmy’s eyes go wide as he lifts the cup to his lips and the scent hits his nose. He hadn’t realized Tim had gotten that far already.

Tim grins, shoots back what’s left of the first cup. “Back in a bit.”

——-

No one in the hall to the bathrooms. Excellent. He figures he’s got at most two minutes. He also figures he won’t need that long. Not with the way Breena was gripping his fingers.

He’s almost wishing he hadn’t gotten off back at the cabin, because he would have really liked to have had an erection right now, hard and fast up against the wall sounds quite appealing, but he’s not sure how well he would have focused if both he and Breena were that turned on while getting here. Not sure if he could have handled the bar as smoothly.

He raps gently on the door and hears Breena’s voice say, “Occupied.”

Tim slips in. “We’ve got two minutes,” he says, locking the door.

It’s a really nice bathroom, small, but clean and smells nice. He takes hold of her and kisses her hard and deep, feeling Breena clinging to him, and grinding against his leg. He pulls back, hands on her hips and backs her to the sink, butt against it.

“Where are your panties?”
She nods at her purse. He grabs it, finds them on the top, and hands them back to her. “No noise. If you can’t muffle yourself, bite on them.”

He sinks to his knees, flips her skirt up, spends a few seconds slipping his fingers up and down over her soaked pussy before thrusting them in, fast and sure, stretching her and curling into her g-spot. Then he glances up at her. “Get off as hard as you can.” He lowers his mouth to her pussy and begins to feast.

She almost does as soon as he says it. Just permission is almost enough. But not quite.

Tim’s kneeling between her legs, face buried in her pussy, licking and sucking like his life depends on it, like if he doesn’t get her off in the next minute the world will literally end.

His fingers are moving hard and fast and thick and delicious, all spread wide and twisting to get her right on the inside and his tongue and lips and more tongue on the outside and fuck! It’s all too much, she can feel the orgasm barreling down on her, and she’s not in control, can’t make herself keep quiet, she wants to scream at how hard this is coming, at how her whole body is bowstring tight, begging, not really believing he won’t pull back again and leave her hanging, and it’s just more and more and more, wet, slick lips and tongue up and down and in and out and deep and thrust and she is biting her panties, trying to keep the sounds that want to spill out inside.

His fingers keep coaxing her, getting her closer and his tongue is relentless, and then everything pulls a hair tighter as her whole body tingles all over, fingernails, hair, toes, ears, eyes, pussy, everything is singing, sparkling, flaring as tingles turn into a wave of clenching muscles from toes to ears and her whole body shakes with the spasms as she gets off almost crying at how good it feels.

A minute later (maybe) she’s feeling like Jello, completely relaxed, totally calm, and sitting on the floor of the bathroom in Tim’s lap as he gently holds her and kisses her shoulder.

She spits out the panties. “Bleck.”

He laughs at that. “Good?”

“Oh, fuck! Yeah, I’m good.”

He cuddles her closer, stroking her shoulder and arms. “Normally, I’d be all in favor of giving you all the cool down time you like, but…” He gently pats her thigh. “Let’s get you up and cleaned off.”

He’s careful with that, too. Quick. He gives her a fast wash off with damp paper towels, before getting his own face, neck, and hands. But thorough. “Okay, back to the others I’ll follow in a bit.”

She gives him a quick kiss. “See you in a few minutes.”

“We can seat you more quickly if you’d like one of the Japanese-style tables,” the hostess says a moment later as Abby and Jimmy wait at the bar.

“You mean, on the floor and sitting on pillows?” Abby says.
The hostess nods brightly, then glances at Abby, not sure if offering that to a pregnant woman is a good idea, but Abby’s all over it. She’s not so far along getting up and down is difficult, not yet.

Jimmy nods at the hostess. “That’d be great.” A minute after that, he catches the bartender’s eye and taps one of the tasting glasses. “We’re going to want two bottles of this.” The sake in the cup is cold. “One cold for now. We’ll take the other home.” Jimmy likes what’s in that cup, even without Breena’s special seasoning, so some of it is going home with them so he can drink it, too.

He’s thinking of painting it on Abby and licking it off. Yeah, that’s got lots of good feelings attached to it.

Another thought hits him as they continue to wait. “Can you sit comfortably cross-legged?”

Abby smiles. “Probably end up more side-saddle, but I’ll be fine. I like feeling it.”

“All comfy?”

“Yeah, just keeping my attention nicely focused.”

Jimmy thinks about that, and about how long they’ll likely be here. He grabs the next bigger one, the baggie, and the little bottle of lube and discretely palms them into Abby’s purse.

She sees him do it, and smiles. “I think I’m going to check on Breena. Make sure she didn’t fall in. She was looking a little distracted, didn’t you think?”

Jimmy snorts a quick laugh and shakes his head. “Don’t make me wait all on my own for too long.”

Abby kisses him, wet and soft. “No problem, love.”

When Breena heads back to the bar, Jimmy’s the only one there. He watches her come up to him, smiling, and then kisses her cheek. “You’re looking like you had a good time.”

She’s feeling all soft and floaty and happy, and is really quite close to just snuggling into him until he taps “his” wedding ring against the bar, and she remembers they’re out in public and who she’s with tonight.

So, she smiles at him, and decides now would be a great time to take a taste of each of the sakes.

“Abby’ll be back soon.” There’s only one place Abby could be, and if Breena was just there, then…

“Yep. Hostess says our table should be ready shortly.”

“Wonderful.”

“It’s one of the low ones, sitting on pillows on the floor.”

Breena smiles, all sorts of ideas at that. “Even better.”

Tim wanders back a moment later, also looking like he had a very good time, though he’s a few steps shy of his full on just-got-laid-cocky.
Eventually the Hostess returns, and eventually they head over to a low table on the floor, pillows all around.

Maybe it’s just happy circumstance, or perhaps the hostess can look at them and have a clue that tucking them away from the rest of the crowd is a good plan, but these on the floor tables are all tucked into little, almost private, nooks located several steps above the main dining floor. Japanese style paper walls block them from the rest of the guests on three sides.

Jimmy eyes the set up. The pillows are arranged so each couple is facing the other, sides to the open restaurant.

He’s nodding, looking it over, assuring the hostess that this is fine, and before Abby can get seated, he kneels down and rearranges the pillows.

Doesn’t take Tim more than a glance to figure out what Jimmy’s doing and why. Only question is, who’s going to be facing the crowd?

Once they’re done, it’s still both couples next to each other, but instead of side on to the open restaurant, it’s Jimmy and Abby back to it, and Tim and Breena facing it.

Or, put more specifically, the only thing anyone from the rest of the crowd can see of the four of them, unless standing right next to them, is Jimmy and Abby’s backs, and Tim and Breena’s faces.

Whatever they may be doing with their hands, or any other parts of their bodies, is shielded by the paper walls and Abby and Jimmy’s backs.

Jimmy lets Abby get seated, and then sits next to her, mostly facing her, one leg behind her, foot on the floor, knee bent, so she can use his leg as something of a backrest, other leg mostly tucked in against him. Tim and Breena settle in on the other side, for right now, just cross legged, hip to hip.

Tim’s hand is on Breena’s back, gently stroking up and down as they look over the menu.

This is delicious.

Breena’s buzzed. She’s got all of her happy orgasm chemicals flooding through her, just enough alcohol to feel good, Tim’s hand feeding her little bites of yummy fish while gently petting her and saying ridiculously hot things.

Across the table, Abby’s cheeks are flushed (looks a little like she’s got an alcohol flush, but Breena knows the cup of sake in front of Abby is untouched) and Breena knows what Jimmy’s doing to her each time his hand drops under the table.

In fact, there have been a few times where Jimmy’s been so indiscreet as to let both Breena and Tim see a flash of what he’s doing with Abby. Granted said flashes only happen when there’s no one else nearby, and no chance of anyone else stepping by so maybe indiscreet isn’t the right word, but it’s certainly a hot tease.
Breena knows exactly how it feels to be sitting snuggled in close with Jimmy, his hand between her legs, both of them trying to look like nothing’s going on, as he rubs her off in public.

Of course, they usually do that when clubbing, but…

The restaurant is fairly loud. As long as they speak quietly, they won’t attract attention.

Tim’s fingers are tracing down the back of her neck, as he offers her a little bit of seared tuna with bitter orange wasabi sauce.

She chews, thinking. Abby’s leaning in closer against Jimmy, and given how they’re sitting, she can see his hand busy under her skirt. Tim liked it when she got talking. Jimmy likes it when she reads/tells him stories.

“Would you like to hear a story?” she asks after she swallows

Tim nuzzles along her neck and ear. “I’d love to hear you tell a story.” His eyes flick to the far side of the room, and back to Jimmy with a tiny nod. Jimmy quickly stops what he’s doing to Abby. She pouts at that. That’s their game, he’s playing with her, and Tim’s keeping eyes on the room, letting him know when someone comes too close.

Anytime someone gets within ten feet of the table, they’re acting with proper (if very affectionate) decorum.

Tim nods to Jimmy again, the patron heading to the bathroom is out of sight, and they see his hand vanish below the line of sight of the table, followed by a quickly moving lump under Abby’s skirt.

“Watching you blush got me thinking about the first time we did that,” Breena says.

Tim picks another bit of fish for her, offering it to her on his chopsticks. “This sounds like it’ll be a good story.”

“It is.” Breena’s smiling, and Jimmy is, too. “We’re on our honeymoon, so… That’s almost six months after we got married. And like this honeymoon, we didn’t get out of the hotel room all that much.”

“Less than this one.”

“True. We had room service. We took advantage of it. But we did make it out one day. Like with tonight, I wanted to go dancing, and there was a nice little club a few blocks down. So, we put some clothing on and head out. Pretty night, and the club was loud, boisterous, lots of drunk partiers, and even louder live music.”

Jimmy’s smiling at that memory.

“Loud, crowded, no air conditioning, lots and lots of people all dancing hard. Not as well lit as this place is.” Though the lights here aren’t daytime bright, they aren’t sitting in the dark, either.

Abby’s trying to grind into Jimmy’s fingers, but he’s slowing down a little to match Breena’s story. Then Tim gives him another little nod, and Jimmy stops dead again. Abby all but growls. Jimmy lightly tugs the sleeve of her dress down, kisses her shoulder, and puts it back into place. Then he looks at the food in front of them. “Maybe we could listen and eat?”

Abby’s eyes narrow, but she takes a bite of her dinner.
Jimmy picks up one of his rolls with his fingers, eats it, licking his fingers clean, and grins at them. “Yummy.” Then he looks at Breena. “So, we’re in the club.”

“And it’s hot, and we’ve been dancing hard.”

“Is dancing or hard the operative word?” Abby asks, squirming a bit on her pillow as she takes another bite of her clam roll. Yeah, it was a bad joke on Tim’s part, but, it really did sound good to her.

“By that point, hard is the operative word. We were getting a drink. Third or fourth mojito of the night for me, and it’s so crowded at the bar that he’s pressed right up behind me.”

“That bar could have been deserted and I would have been right up behind you.”

“But it wasn’t. It was packed. I feel his arm move, and I’m thinking he’s going to order another drink for himself, but he doesn’t. Instead of waving at the bartender, I feel his fingers on the inside of my thigh. Sort of what you were doing, Tim, but not quite. I wasn’t wearing panties, or anything else under that skirt, so he’s getting right to it.” She smiles at Jimmy, and reaches across the table to lightly stroke the backs of his fingers. “Those long fingers of yours put to good use.”

Jimmy grins at that. “Should I be using them again?”

“I think Abby would like that.”

“Yes, Abby would like that!” Abby says.

Jimmy grins at her, looks to Tim, who nods, no one’s paying them any attention, so his hand finds her pussy again and Abby whimpers quietly with pleasure.

“We’d never done anything like that before. He’d mentioned liking doing it in public, but… Hadn’t happened, yet. So, I was surprised, but he’s right behind me, and so hard against my low back, and his fingers are dancing on my skin, slipping between my lips, rubbing all over me. Up and down,” she’s got direct eye contact with Jimmy right now, and she can’t see what exactly he’s doing to Abby, but she’s sure he’s matching his movements to her words. “And it was just so naughty. Standing there with strangers all around us, none of them paying attention, and none of them know he’s got his fingers inside of me while his thumb is driving me crazy.

“I’m sipping my drink, trying not to look like I’m about to come as he’s slipping over me faster and faster. I’m bopping along to the music a little, trying to look like I’m dancing, not fucking my husband in front of a hundred other people.

“He nudges me forward, which doesn’t make any sense, I’m already belly to the bar, then I get what he’s trying to get me to do, stand on the bar rail. That didn’t make much sense to me, either, but he’s got my pussy in his hand, and he’s kissing my neck, I’m doing whatever he wants.

“Bar rail is a few inches up. Once I figure that out, I know where he’s taking us.”

Abby straightens up a little, body getting tighter, chopsticks clenched between her fingers, eyes almost closed.

“He puts his glass down next to my elbow, and for a second all I can feel is his fingers still sliding over and over and over on me.” She’s sliding over those words, almost caressing them with her voice. “Then there’s a bit of a jostling sensation.” Breena takes a sip of her sake, lips stroking the edge of her cup, tongue gently licking the rim. “And then there’s this hot, hard, smooth, thrust.”
Breena bites her lip at that memory, and Abby’s breathing faster, harder. Jimmy’s alternating between watching the woman he’s getting off and the one telling the story. Tim’s listening, eyeing the room, keeping watch, though his left hand finds Breena’s knee and starts to make lazy circles on it.

“All that wet, slippery, stretch. The music is pounding, and so’s Jimmy, rocking back and forth, keeping time with the beat, keeping me spread open around him as he’s sliding in and out again and again and faster and faster,” she’s using her voice to match the rhythm of Jimmy’s hand, and the shared memory of a song neither of them know the name of. “They hit a drum solo, and the music’s just throbbing and so am I, pussy, nipples, clit, everything pulsing with my heart and the music.”

Breena’s eyeing Abby, who looks so close. Her eyes are completely shut, and she’s panting quietly.

“Then he steps just a bit closer, shifts the angle just a little bit, and hits right there.” Jimmy does something, and Abby yips a little, shuddering all over, and he holds her closer, letting her ride the wave.

A minute later, Abby takes a deep breath, opens her eyes, and grins at everyone. Breena grins, too. Then she finishes the story with, “Yep, that did it for me, too.”

Tim checks the crowd again, takes a sip of his sake, kisses Breena, and slides his hand up the inside of her leg. He gets to her pussy, and lightly strokes his fingers over her.

“Telling that story got you all wet again.”

Breena nods, wondering where he’ll take this.

His hand returns to her knee, and he gently squeezes it. “Get up, grab your purse, back to the restroom, and put the butterfly back on. Stay in there for three minutes. While you’re in there, I want you fingering yourself, thinking about dancing between Jimmy and I tonight while we take turns with you. Don’t come.”

“We’re taking turns?” Jimmy asks when Breena heads off.

Tim shrugs, sipping his drink. “We could.”

Abby’s cuddling Jimmy, still relaxing. “I’d like watching that.”

Jimmy kisses her, stroking her hair. “I’m not shocked. Is there anything you don’t want to see?”

Abby giggles. “Nothing’s springing to mind.”

Tim smiles at her. “You good with it?” he asks Jimmy.

Jimmy nods. “Yeah.”

Tim’s got another thought as they wait for Breena to get back. They’re probably out of the game right now, just planning, but he wants to make sure. “James…”

Jimmy’s eyebrows shoot up, once again he’s wondering what he could possibly be doing wrong. He’s eating dinner for God’s sake. Then he remembers again that they also use this as a general way to just break play and check in. “I’ll get used to this eventually. What?”
“You don’t want me running you, I got that, how about asking her to do stuff to you?”

Jimmy thinks about that… That’s far enough removed that it should be okay. “I think that’s okay. I’ll stop you if it gets weird.”

“Okay.”

“What are you thinking?” Abby asks.

Tim looks to Jimmy. “Does she get to find out?”

Jimmy strokes Abby’s back. “Yes, she’s been making me happy tonight.”

Tim smiles at both of them. “I like to watch. You like to be watched. Not sure exactly what, probably won’t know until it happens, but I think that could be fun.”

Jimmy inclines his head. He can, and happily will, go with that.

When Breena gets back, she’s looking very pink and excited. Tim smiles at her, kisses her as she sits down, and then says, “You told a very nice story, would you like to hear one in return?”

Everyone else at the table looks pleased with that, leaning in, getting ready to listen to something juicy. He gives all of them a wicked grin, then says, “The Dragon Knights date back to the days before the calendars were kept.”

Jimmy reaches across the table and gives him a gentle whack to the arm as he says, “You son of a bitch.”

Tim grins at him. “No adventures of Daegan, Gabe, Katie, and Breeanne?”

“Breeanne?” Breena says, staring at Tim. She knew he was bad with names. She’s read all of the Tibbs books, but… Breeanne?

“You don’t like that?”

Breena just looks at him.

“I’ll keep looking.”

“Good plan.”

Turns out the Dragon Knight story is sexy. Jimmy’s not sure where Tim even keeps all this smut inside him, but he does know that if he had that many dirty stories in his head nothing would ever get done around the morgue.

Okay, one thing would get done around the morgue, but that’s not what they pay him for.

On the upside (hehehe, he likes thinking about it like that) apparently a third round is not going to be a problem tonight. He’s actually springing into action readily enough that he’s starting to think that he possibly could pull off four.
And though the taste of the sake he had earlier was really yummy, he’s sure that if he drinks, four isn’t going to be an option for him, at all, but… Maybe…

God, it’d suck to be wrong on that.

But if he’s not wrong… He and Abby could get a quick one off in the mens room, and then…

Dancing, naked, Tim wants to watch… He likes to get watched…

That’d probably be enough.

Tim’s getting to the “climax” of the story, and they’re awfully close to the end of dinner, too. Breena’s cheeks are pink again, and even through her bra, he can see her nipples are hard. She’s liking this just fine. Abby’s right next to him, practically in his lap, rubbing up against him like an especially affectionate cat.

And he’s got an erection, lube, another dilator, and a willing partner.

The idea of grabbing Abby’s hand and heading off to the mens room is hitting him really hard right now. He can see her, back against the wall, leg over his hip, butt in his hands as they go at it fast.

But… He doesn’t know how fast Tim’s looking to take things tonight. How much dancing? How much teasing? And he also doesn’t know how fast Tim can take things tonight.

He’s had… ten, twelve (?) of those little cups of sake, (he and Breena have put a good dent into that bottle of sake) but that’s… about two and a half glasses of wine. Tim’s loose and flirty and sexy. Not that he’s particularly inhibited with the three of them, but whatever inhibitions he’s got left are likely gone. He definitely shouldn’t drive, but he’s not about to pass out.

Still doesn’t tell Jimmy if he’ll be ready to nail the girls the second they’re in the cabin, or if he’ll need more time to get up and ready again.

There are probably several different ways Jimmy could go about finding this out. He could break into the story and just ask. He could ask Breena to do a little “research” for him and report back.

Or he could do what he actually does, which is carefully make sure that Abby’s on her pillow and won’t topple over if he moves, and then slips over to sit next to Tim (thus getting a somewhat curious look from Tim) before giving him a discrete little grope (extremely curious and shocked look from Tim, very amused/aroused looks from the girls) and then heading back over to Abby.

“Jimmy?” Tim asks when he’s back on his side of the table.

“Go on, finish the story,” Jimmy says with a bright little smile. Tim’s not nailing anyone to anything anytime soon. Alcohol, multiple previous orgasms, and middle age do not appear to be hastening Tim’s round three.

Tim spends a second just looking at him, obviously he knows what Jimmy was trying to find out, he’s just not sure why he would want to know, but then he shakes his head and then goes back to the story.

___________________________________________________________

And then he does. Tim finishes the story, and he’s got three very turned on people all around him. Breena’s squirming on her pillow. Abby’s got her please, please, please fuck me now look on her face, and as Jimmy’s hopping up and giving Abby a hand, Tim’s got a very good idea of why Jimmy’s hand was on his dick two minutes ago.

Jimmy and Abby are heading off to the restroom, and it’s occurring to Tim that maybe tonight wasn’t the best night ever to have... He looks at the empty tasting cups, and the less than half full bottle, that much wine.

Now he’s wondering if Jimmy decided that nothing’s happening with him when they get home, so might as well get off now, or if he thinks he can get to four.

“Can he get off four times in one day?” Tim asks Breena.

Breena shrugs. She knows that once upon a time, he could. She doesn’t know about now. “We haven’t since before Molly was born, but... First anniversary weekend, we did it eleven times in two days.”

“That beats our record.”

Breena smiles at that. “I don’t think it’s a competition.”

Tim kisses Breena. “Guys and dicks, baby, it’s always a competition, even when it isn’t.”

Breena smiles at him, stroking his face, and then her hand slips down his cheek, throat, and chest, ending where Jimmy’s had been. “Well then, think you can do it four times in one day?”

Tim knows the answer to that, at least for right now. “Not today. But next Friday into Saturday, assuming we’re not building a house and little girls nap well, we can find out.”

Breena laughs at that.

---

Jimmy and Abby come swaggering back about thirty seconds later.

Tim stares at them, shakes his head. That really couldn’t have been more than two minutes, including getting to the restroom and back time, then he says to Jimmy, “I don’t know if I should be impressed or pity you.”

“You’ve said that before.”

Tim watches Jimmy give Abby a hand sitting down before sitting down himself. “I’m thinking it again. Might just start calling you, Zippy.” Then he looks to Breena. “Is that one a good name?”

She gives Tim a little shove. “Only if I get to call you Glacial.”

Tim leans over, kisses her deep and wet and hits the control on the butterfly. “Glaciers always get where they’re going, sooner or later.”

Jimmy takes the teasing with a smile, and Abby says, huge grin on her face, “Impressed.”

Tim’s eyebrows raise a bit. “You think I should have him show me what he did that got you off that fast?”

Abby nods, arm around Jimmy. “Anytime you want to show off your tricks, I’ll be happy to be demonstrated on.”
Jimmy’s driving them home. “How about you set the playlist?” he says to Tim as they’re pulling out.

“I was planning on slipping three fingers into Breena and running the butterfly, but, I can do the playlist.”

“Like fuck you are.” Tim wasn’t kidding about frustrated. She’s almost ready to just take matters into her own hands and get herself off. Why Tim needed someone holding his hands yesterday is making much more sense to her now.

Tim smiles at her. “Eager? I didn’t say you’d get off.” He flicks on the butterfly. “But, I suppose… Abby can you do the playlist?” He hands his phone over to Abby, and she gets to looking for music. “Stuff all four of us want to dance to, please?”

Then he turns, as much as he can belted in, toward Breena. His fingers curl around the inside of her knee, a gentle tug, spreading her legs apart.

“I can smell it, you know.” His fingers trace up the inside of her thigh as he flips up the skirt of her dress with his other hand. “How turned on you are.” Abby flips down the passenger mirror so she can watch what they’re up to without having to try to twist around. “That scent hits me so hard.” The tips of his fingers trace over her lips. “Hits me right in the balls.” He thrusts into her, hard. “Makes me want to strip you naked and watch you ride my cock.” His fingers start to slip in and out. “Makes me want to watch you come.” He’d have to unbuckle to kiss her, so he can’t do that (though he’s three quarters of the way out of the seat before he notices that.) “Makes me want to lick my name onto your skin, while my dick’s deep inside of you and you’re clenching and moaning on me.”

Breena moans, rocking against him.

“There you go baby. Makes me want to make you feel so good…” He’s still talking, telling Breena about how beautiful she is, and how much he loves hearing her, but he’s also thinking about what comes next, about getting home and what they’re still hoping to do. Thinking about how difficult it is to enjoy anything besides sex when you’re so keyed up you’re almost insane with it.

Thinking about how, if they’re going to slow down, dance, tease, play, they should all be starting out at about the same level.

He glances up, they’re near an intersection. “Jimmy, drive slow, catch the yellow and red.”

He turns up the vibrator, but unhooks the straps from Breena’s hips.

As soon as he feels Jimmy slowing the van down, he unbucks and all but jumps over to Breena, unbuckling her, pulling her hips to the edge of the seat, tossing the butterfly to the side, and going at her, hard, with lips and tongue and fingers.

“Come for me, baby. Let me hear you sing.”

And Breena does.
Jimmy waits for them to get buckled in again, which does involve the guy behind him laying on his horn when the light changes to green.

He glances back, sees Breena slumped in her seat, eyes closed, breathing slowing down, fine sheen of sweat glistening on her skin. Tim’s back in his seat, too, holding her hand, looking very pleased with himself.

“And you want to call me, Zippy?” Jimmy says back.

Tim glances at him. “I’m not the one who got off in less than forty-five seconds.”

The rest of the drive is quiet. They’re mostly relaxing and listening to music. And finally, they get back to the cabin.

Jimmy worms off Tim’s ring, and they swap back. “Changing up the game?” Abby asks.

Tim nods. “Yeah, I think we’re all playing, equal, now.” Tim kisses his first wife, and his second. “You two said something about dancing and naked…”

Abby steps next to Tim, pulling his phone out of his pocket, and heads over to the sound system, hips swaying with each step, already a little dance sort of rhythm in her step. She gets his phone set up with the speakers and her playlist starts.

Once it’s on, she holds her hand out to Tim. “Come here, baby.”

“Always.”

Abby picked a good selection of music. Not too slow, not too fast. This is good warm up stuff.

Tim loves the fact that out here, in private, they really can dance, all four of them, as close and hot, or fast and light as they want.

Here, now, it’s standing up making love to music. It’s a slow seduction of easy touches, light caresses, and clothing falling away one piece at a time.

Jimmy’s lost the flannel shirt and jeans. He’s down to his t-shirt and boxer-briefs. Tim’s shirt is completely open, but still on his arms and shoulders.

The girls still have their dresses on, though the collars are gone, and so is Breena’s bra.

Deep beat, enough bass and drums to keep everyone moving, not so fast as to be exhausting. Tim’s got his hands on Abby’s hips, his lips on her shoulder and neck, and she’s dancing back to his front. Jimmy’s in front of her, arms around her and Tim, kissing Abby’s lips. She’s got one arm wrapped around Tim’s neck, her other one is on Jimmy’s shoulder.

Faster beat, lighter sound, higher notes. All four of them this time, just light, teasing touches as the music slips through them. Breena tugs gently on Tim’s sleeve, kissing along his collar bone, and he’s down to just his jeans and boxers.

Soft, romantic music. Woman’s voice. Not really a dance beat, more a sway with someone you love beat. Breena’s in Abby’s arms, head on her shoulder as Abby holds her close, fingers stroking down her back. She flicks open the hook and eye on Breena’s dress, dragging the zipper down.

There’s an idea Jimmy’s intrigued with. He’s been thinking about it for a bit now. Since the girls started dancing with each other.

He and Tim aren’t really dancing. They’re more just standing around, watching. He glances over and sees that, yes, this has gotten Tim’s dick awake again, and a bit more of it, and his own dick will wake up, too.

They’re kissing now. Slow and wet, and Abby’s gently slipping the straps of Breena’s dress down, so all Breena has to do is step back, the dress will fall to the floor, and she’ll be naked save for her cute little sandals.

Jimmy knows how watching this feels to him. He knows that Breena likes playing with Abby well enough, but a huge part of the kick is the way he and Tim are watching her right now.

And he knows he likes to be watched. Another minute and it’ll be a new song.

He quietly says to Tim, “We really like this, right?”

Tim’s nodding vigorously at that.

“Turn about fair play?”

Tim looks away from the girls to Jimmy, but he’s still staring at them. Breena’s got her hand on Abby’s butt, under Abby’s dress, so Tim’s eyes go jumping back to that.

It takes him a second to get back to thinking about what Jimmy just asked. He doesn’t see why it wouldn’t be, but... Maybe later he and Jimmy need to have a chat with each other about what kind of lines they have with each other’s bodies, but that’s for later, right now Tim just wants to get back to playing. “Right now? Later?”

“Next song. Let’s get them ready to jump us.”

Tim would have to admit that sounded good to him. And, a moment later, the song does shift, and Breena steps back from Abby, her dress falling to the ground. She takes a step toward the guys, wondering who (or both) she’s dancing with next.

“Since you’ve both been so good this evening, you get a special treat,” Tim says.

“Very special.” Jimmy hooks his index finger in Tim’s belt loop and pulls him closer. He looks Tim up and down, eyes hot, fingers of his other hand resting on Tim’s chest.

It feels odd to Tim, because it’s erotic, but… almost erotic at a distance. What Jimmy is doing to him feels fine, but isn’t turning him on. It’s a show, and that’s interesting. He knows he likes the kick that goes with performing, open Mic night and his Tim the MIT Beaver days certainly fed into that. So, this feels a lot more like the excitement that goes with that, than anything he’s got in his mind as sex.

He glances at the girls, who are not moving at all, staring at them, barely breathing, as if any sudden move might spook them, and both of them have that, I can’t believe I’m getting to see this, please, please, please let it be true look on their faces.

And that feels amazing. He knows he likes making an audience happy, and this is his favorite sort of happy from his favorite audience. That’s really good.

“No touching yourselves. That includes your little leg trick, Abby.”

And Jimmy leans over and kisses Tim. Really kisses him, holds onto him, wraps one arm around his waist, cups his face in his hand, and goes to town on him, while Tim wraps a leg around Jimmy’s, twines his hand in Jimmy’s hair, and kisses back for all his worth.

The girls are whimpering. He can hear little moans, too. That’s erotic. That’s making him feel like sex on legs. He can feel the vibe of so turned on I don’t know what to do with myself pulsing off of them, and that’s hitting him, hard.

He sucks Jimmy’s lip, wet and plump between his own, and grinds into him a little. The unmistakable sound of Abby getting off ends that kiss rather abruptly, as both guys pull apart in stupefied shock.

“Did you just come?” Jimmy asks, staring at a pink and flushed Abby in amazement.

Abby nods. “You don’t even want to know how long I’ve been wanting to see that.”

Tim arches an eyebrow.

“Since Jimmy’s first day at NCIS.”

“Wow!” Jimmy says, pleased and then, thinking back, “Really?” He remembers what both of them looked like back then, and, more importantly who they were… yeah… not exactly the poster boys for smoking-hot, kinky sex. Hell, he thinks back more carefully, he’s not sure if they qualified as the poster boys for tame, missionary position, lights-off sex.

She steps closer and runs her hand over Tim’s shoulder. “We were dating then, and you showed up, and for that whole first day I was fantasizing about both of you together with me.”

Breena joins them and points his head away from Abby, back to Tim and says, “Get back to that for a few more minutes and I’ll get off, too.”

“Wait.” Tim holds his hands up because Jimmy’s about to dive right in. “Were you touching yourself?”
Abby grins. “You know we’re both better than that. You said no touching ourselves, so no touching ourselves.” Tim has the sense that there might be some sort of loophole he missed in there, but he’s not able to find it.

Still, this is too easy. “Really, first base with him, and you’re climaxing? This isn’t… I don’t know, you’re not trying to sell us on it? We get you like it, but… This isn’t some sort of positive reinforcement thing? This is real?”

Abby looks from Tim to Jimmy, and then scoots her hand into Tim’s jeans, giving him a nice, warm squeeze, and he rocks into her hand, enjoying it. “What’ll happen to you if Breena and I make out slow and deep and you don’t try to keep yourself in check? Come on, you’ve gotten off twice already and had a ton of wine.” Another gentle squeeze. “You think we don’t know what’s getting you up right now?”

Okay, yeah, that’s a good point. Watching them’s not going to get him off, because watching can’t get him off, but… It’ll drive him crazy.

Jimmy’s less interested in analyzing why this works, and much more interested in working it. He hooks his arm around Tim’s neck and drags him back into the kiss, and yes, about five minutes later Breena’s sounding awfully happy, too.

There’s more dancing, and more kissing, and hands and fingers and tongues and lips and arms and legs all touching and stroking each other. There’s clothing slipping off, one piece at a time.

There are moments Tim remembers very clearly, exquisite images that burn into his mind, like Abby and Breena kissing each other around his dick. He will never, ever forget that. Soft hair in each of his hands and beautiful women with wet soft tongues lapping all over him, and each other. He remembers Breena riding him, and Abby licking her off, Jimmy behind her, all of them moving slow and easy, and because with the lights on and the sun down, the solarium turns into a huge mirror, he could see everything from every angle.

Dancing with Breena and Jimmy while Abby filmed it. Slow, lazy music. She’d face him for a few beats, both of them rocking together, her breasts in his hands as the beat set their tempo. Then she slipped off him, turning, facing Jimmy, kissing him as they take a few slow beats with a few slow thrusts, and turning back again.

He can remember the music getting a little faster, and kissing Jimmy over her shoulder as the three of them grind together. And how, toward the end of that song, he honestly wasn’t sure which one of them was fucking her, just that it was wet and slippery and she was coming between them, all pink and beautiful.

He remembers watching Jimmy slip the last of the dilators into Abby, her gorgeous body all spread open, getting ready for them.

And better than that, he remembers the feel of her lips on his, her hands in his hair, his hands on her breasts as Breena knelt and explored her pussy with fingers and tongue.

There’s a sound, Abby’s voice crying out as Breena’s soft little tongue licked her pussy. He’s never going to forget that, though he’ll probably try to limit remembering it to places where it’s appropriate to have a hard on.
He’s on his back, kissing… God, by that point he wasn’t entirely sure, probably Breena because he can remember Abby saying she was ready, and then straddling him, slipping down his dick. He knows he groaned at that, feeling her all smooth and wet and hot and perfect on him.

The kiss breaks, and he opens his eyes. Yep, Breena. Abby leans forward against him, and he remembers what she’s getting ready for. He’s kissing her, eager to get to what happens next, happy to stay in this moment of almost there.

The first time he fantasized about being the guy at the bottom of the pile, Jimmy wasn’t in the fantasy, beyond the fact that thinking about it with Jimmy as the guy at the bottom of the pile is what set the idea in his mind.

The second time was really fuzzy. He was hurting, and on a lot of meds, and not feeling very sexy, so Jimmy was the guy on the bottom of the pile, and he was mostly just watching, getting off (mentally at least) on how much fun everyone looked like they were having.

This time, he’s on the bottom of the pile, having an absolute blast.

He’s kissing Abby, and she’s kneeling over him, leaning as far forward as she can, wiggling a little in an invitation to Jimmy. Tim glances to the side, catching the sight in the mirror glass of the solarium, and Jimmy is behind Abby, right now just looking at her and petting her butt.

He can see Breena’s kneeling next to him, slicking him up, making sure he’s all ready, too. Probably making sure she’s got a good view of this, too.

And this time, the feel of Jimmy slipping in, because once again, he can feel it, is amazing. It’s not as intense, because it’s not skin on skin, but there’s still a very distinct sensation of motion and pressure, and that’s still all sorts of awesome.

Once he’s set, and Abby’s comfortable, she raises up, and Breena straddles his face. And, God, this is just… No words for how good this is. They’re all falling short.

This is full body, full brain, full heart sex.

This is transcendent sex. He’s hit it a few times before with Abby. And he’s here again now, where bodies are so suffused with pleasure they almost fall away, and there’s just glorious pulsing love and bliss.

It’s that moment when sex shifts, and it’s not about getting off. Though that happens. Possibly twice, he knows he got off once, but didn’t feel like stopping when that happened, so he didn’t, and later there was this… moment… (he's got no idea how long it actually lasted) of… joy, (that's probably the best word he'll find for it,) all over joy, and by then orgasms almost seemed beside the point, by then it was all about communion of bodies and minds and souls, and it’s all wrapped up in exquisite sensations that never seem to end.

Though, of course, they do. Because everything does.

But for a few heartbeats they, and this feeling, and all of the love and history and joy that binds them, is eternal.

And that's all the heaven Tim will ever need.
It’s still dark when pain pulls Tim out of his sleep.

He doesn’t want to move. He likes where he is. He’s very, very happy with Abby in front of him and… Warm bodies behind. He can feel smooth legs against his back, breathing against his calf, soft hair on his foot, and stubble on his heel.

Breena and Jimmy are cuddling each other, and apparently his lower half.

So, he doesn’t want to move, at all. He wants to be right here, in the middle, warm and snug, and… not comfortable, at all. He can feel all of the leftover shit from his fight, each break, all of the dislocated joints, he’s just aching all over.

So he drags himself out of bed, hoping he’s not waking everyone up, and goes in search of the little bottle of Aleve that’s his bestest buddy these days.

It lasts for twelve hours. Last thing he does before brushing his teeth is take two of them. Then he makes sure the bottle’s on his bedside table and he’s got fresh water in the glass. First thing he does waking up is take two more.

Down from last week’s three and three. But he’s not pain meds free, not even close.

He’s staggering toward the bathroom. (His left foot is sending him irate messages about not wanting to support his weight.) They didn’t brush teeth last night. So, no meds, since yesterday morning, probably getting onto 20 hours now, and he’s hurting.

Sometimes he forgets how hurt he was. Sometimes he feels normal. There are even, on occasion, moments where he thinks he’s better, healed, all he needs to do is keep regaining strength. He grabs the bottle and shakes out three of the pills. His right hand shrieks at that, because he’s asking it to hold something.

He’s not all healed. It’s not just a matter of more working on it.

He swallows the pills.

Still got miles to go.

He hits the bed, and snuggles in close to Abby’s back. Miles to go, and miles already covered, he reminds himself. He kisses her shoulder and wraps around her. His last thought before drifting off again is that he’s got the right team for getting to the end of this journey.

There’s light slanting in on them the second time he wakes up.

He’s sore this time, too, but this is good sore. This is rode hard and put away wet sore. This is completely fucked out on every level you can be fucked out, sore. And, he supposes, on a universal scale, pain is pain is pain, but he feels like he earned this, in a very enjoyable way, and he’s happy to have it.

He’s on the outside now. Abby’s in his arms, and he’s got one hand flat on Breena’s hip. Jimmy’s on her other side, out of reach.

He sighs a little, burrowing in closer to Abby, enjoying her skin against his.

He closes his eyes and dozes, not really awake or asleep, just floating in bed with his loves.

The third time he wakes up, it really is morning. Everyone else is moving around a bit, too. He can hear birds, and the light’s no longer slanting in, it’s beating down on them, full on daylight bright.

It’s Monday morning. They’ve got to get the keys back to the rental place by noon. And they’ve got to clean everything up, get packed. Eating would be good.

He’s not sure what time it is, but he doesn’t care. They’re all starting to shift around, moving toward today, and the end of this weekend.

“Let’s just stay, just… another minute or two.”

He feels Breena’s hand find his and give him a little squeeze, and Jimmy pats his hip.

From where he is, his visual world has narrowed down to the curve of Abby’s shoulder, her neck, the edge of the spider web tattoo, her hair, and sunlight bright on all of it.

There’s a small bruise on her shoulder, love bite, and he gently lays his lips on it. Given where it is, he’s thinking that it’s from Jimmy.

His right arm is under her neck, and from what he can feel, Breena’s calf is in his palm. He strokes his thumb over her shin bone, and extending his fingers slightly rubs the back of them against some bit of Jimmy’s leg. He can’t see what part of his leg, and only knows it’s Jimmy’s leg by the feel of the hair.

A smooth, and small, foot, gently rubs his knuckles.

His left hand rests on Abby’s belly for a few seconds, then he reaches forward, stroking Breena’s side. He tries to touch Jimmy, but he’s out of range. And then he’s not, both of them scoot a little closer, and Tim’s able to wrap his hand around Jimmy’s side.

He feels a kiss to his calf, stubbly, must be Jimmy, and then a warm hand on the back of his knee.

And for a moment, they lay there, holding each other, putting off the real world a few seconds longer.

But, the real world doesn’t go away.

As the least talented cook of the crew, Tim’s on cleaning up. First job, open windows and doors. The cabin has a very distinct aroma right now, and it’s probably not something the people who rent it out want greeting the next guests.

Packing things up to go home is likely easier than packing to head off. He’s got two piles: McGee Laundry and Palmer Laundry. Each one of them will get a bag of things to immediately toss into the washing machine upon getting home.

Jimmy takes over on getting the mattresses rolled up after he’s got the air out of them. From there it’s just packing everything they don’t need for shower time/getting dressed and stuffing it into the van.

Like most of the rest of the weekend, they aren’t dressed for breakfast. Tim approves of that, and of the various nips and bruises they’re all wearing.

If the idea is that when hands that love you touch you, they should leave a mark, they’re all marked.

Abby’s got a few bites on her neck and shoulder, little, dark pink finger marks that’ll be gone by tonight on her hip. Tim knows the finger marks are his, and that Breena’s got matching ones on her other hip. He’d had his left hand on Breena and his right on Abby, and he’d clenched his fingers hard when he got off.

He hasn’t looked at himself too carefully, but he can feel the scrapes on his back and thigh (Breena’s nails, probably), and he can see the hickey on his chest (Abby, definitely).

Jimmy’s got a dozen bites all up and down his thighs and a few on his chest. Sometime last night Abby and Breena remembered he likes that. Tim can see the image of one of them biting while the other rode him, and switching, and Jimmy with his head back, eyes closed, whimpering and cursing at how good that felt to him.

And they all have pinker, slightly swollen lips, from many, many, many kisses, hard and soft and every pressure in between.

Quiet ride home. They aren’t tired, not the way they were on the ride out, this is more… content.

It’s the space between leaving something adored, and going back to something treasured. They want their girls and their jobs and friends and lives, and they want that break from the rest of life, where they could just play with each other.

“Uh…” Tim says as they turn into his neighborhood.

“Uh?” Jimmy asks. He’s driving, wondering what they could have left behind.

“Not like that. Just… if the last week wasn’t a hint, all four of us coming home, and that pile of laundry is sure as hell going to spell everything out for Heather.”

“Yeah.” Abby nods, so…”Trust and hope for the best?”

“Or I can pull a quick u-turn, take us back to our place, and you can grab your car and transfer “everything into it,” Jimmy adds. “You’ve got to get your car sooner or later, so…”

“Was hoping you’d drive it to work tomorrow and I’d give you a lift home,” Tim says.

Jimmy nods at that. “Decide quick, your street is next.”

“Trust,” Abby says it. “We give this woman our child every day.”

Tim nods. “Okay.”

Heather looks up from her book when Tim, Abby, Jimmy, and Breena, all lugging stuff, head in.

“Hey! Good vacation?” She sounds genuine on that.

“Yeah! It really was. She’s napping, isn’t she?” Tim asks.

“Just went down, like fifteen minutes ago. You want a hand?”

Jimmy shakes his head, dropping one of the bags right in front of the washing machine. “That’s all of their stuff.”

They stand around for a moment, because there’s not much reason for Jimmy and Breena to still be there, but Heather’s also there, and this was a lot easier when they were all sort of exhausted and fried and not really thinking. Then Abby steps to Breena and hugs and kisses her, and then Jimmy. “See you tomorrow!”

Jimmy nods, “Yeah.” He hugs and kisses Tim, and Breena does likewise.

They walk Jimmy and Breena to their car, no hugs or kisses out here on the street, though Abby squeezes Jimmy’s hand where it’s resting on the open window of his van.

“Back to the grind tomorrow,” she says.

Jimmy and Breena nod. She glances back at the house. “Think there’ll be any problems?”

Abby shakes her head. “Nah.”

They spend another moment, just standing/sitting there, because once Jimmy and Breena pull out of the driveway the weekend is really over, and none of them want that. But, just standing there is silly, so Jimmy sets his key in the ignition, and off they go.

When they get in Heather, who does their laundry as part of her job, is poking at the laundry pile, starting to sort things.

“Oh, God, no! Don’t worry about… We’ve got that,” Tim’s saying fast.
Heather straightens up. “Look, I’m not going to turn down you guys doing the wash, but… you pay me to do this.” She looks from Tim to Abby, and then says, “And, I’m not so sheltered that I don’t have a pretty good idea what you four were up to, so…”

Abby’s shooing her away from the laundry, as Tim’s chucking it into the machine. “There’s knowing and then there’s knowing.”

“And you don’t need quite that much detail,” Abby finishes.

Heather shrugs. “However you like. But… You’re the people who asked me to strip your bed and wash your sheets every Monday and Thursday, in addition to the rest of your laundry… So…”

“You’re looking for a gentle way to tell us we’re being silly?” Tim asks, as he joins them in the kitchen.

She nods a bit. “Not saying I don’t mind skipping the messy stuff, but you guys don’t have a lot of secrets from me. Only difference between now and last week is that I’ve got faces to go with the new toiletries in the bathroom, and a sinking suspicion that those jockey shorts aren’t actually yours,” she says to Tim, who nods.

Tim and Abby glance at each other. “Yeah, well, you know, that’s fine, but the outside world that’s a secret,” Tim says.

Heather looks non-plussed and grabs the cup of coffee she’d been working on. She glances around the McGee’s kitchen with want me to get you something? on her face. She sees them both shake their heads and says, “Everything about you guys is a secret for me. Not that anyone’s asking, but I wouldn’t talk about what sort of coffee you like, let alone anything else. The only thing we ever talk about, and only to the Agency, is if it’s a safe job or not.”

Tim and Abby are both looking at her curiously.

“Safe how?” Tim asks.

“Any sort. Everything from Dad thinks that sleeping with him is part of the job to there’s a Meth lab in the basement. Shady business stuff. Crime stuff. Even Mafia people need nannies.”

“So, we’re what? No big deal?” Tim asks.

Heather shrugs again. “Compared to some of my previous jobs…” She laughs a little. "This is a great job. I love Kelly. Neither of you are annoying to me, and you’re not angry with each other and using me or Kelly as a pawn to hurt one another. And you both know where the line between my job and not my job is.” She looks at Tim. “My first job, I was on my own, no agency, and I got to deal with the fun of ‘Is my self-respect worth more than being able to pay my rent this month.’ Followed by the joy of ‘get fired by Dad for telling Mom he’s cheating on her,’ or ‘get fired by Mom for not telling her Dad’s cheating on her.’

“So, look, I think people belong in pairs instead of quads, but you four want to play musical spouses, more power to you. Not like swinging’s uncommon around here. And compared to some of my past jobs, this isn’t even a blip on the radar.”

Well, that was a whole lot Tim and Abby didn’t know about the life of the professional nanny. Or, apparently, this area. Now they’re wondering about their neighbors.

“You didn’t know that?” Now Heather’s looking curious.
“Uh… No.” Tim says.

“It’s not like owning a Prius or shopping at Whole Foods, but, this kind of area, at least one family per neighborhood’s doing it. You know what key parties are?”

Tim and Abby both nod, glancing at each other, and then back to Heather.

Heather just looks at them.

Tim and Abby nod at each other again. It’s fairly clear neither of them really wants to know more about what sort of antics the neighbors might be getting up to.

“Okay, then,” Abby says. “We’re both home for the rest of the day, so, if you want to take off early…”

Heather thinks about that. “Actually, yeah. I’ve got some errands of my own I wouldn’t mind getting done.”

When Heather heads off, Tim turns on the washing machine, and then both he and Abby creep up to Kelly’s nursery.

She’s sleeping. Thumb in her mouth, laying on her tummy, eyes closed.

“Missed you.” Tim mouths to her. Abby very gently lays her hand on Kelly’s back as Tim kisses her hair. Then they creep back out. When she wakes up will be soon enough for hugs and kisses and playing.

Laundry is washing. Tim grabs the mattresses and tucks them back into the basement. Abby puts the sex toys back. Okay, unpacking’s done.

Monday afternoon. Probably two hours until Kelly wakes up. They’re standing around their bedroom. Abby’s eyeing the bed, debating a nap. She’s not really tired, but she’s also not feeling much desire to do anything else right now.

Tim’s also stuck in a sort of… ‘Now what?’ kind of place.

Abby lays down, so he does, too, wrapping around her, kissing her gently.

“Feels a little empty, doesn’t it?” Abby says.

“Yeah.” He thinks about that for a second. “Not that here with you isn’t—“

“Tim…“

“Yeah?”

“I get it. I love being here with you. And I love being with them. And best of all, I love being with you and them.”
He nods at that. Abby’s holding his hand in hers, rubbing her finger over his cuff. That makes an idea hit. “Two hours until she’s up?”

“Probably.”

“Monday afternoon. I bet Sam’s got an open slot. If he can take me, you mind if I get the kiss marks done?”

Abby shakes her head. “Kind of want to go with you.”

“Get your own kiss marks?”

“Yeah.”

“Then all the more reason for me to go on my own. No need to tempt you. Not with Sean along for the ride.”

Abby nods. “Yeah. I know they say it’s safe…”

“Yeah. I know. Let’s not test it.” He kisses her again. “So…”

“Yeah, give Sam a call. Come back with some pretty new kisses.”

“So, what are we doing today?” Sam asks.

“Today,” Tim fishes out his phone and shows Sam the shots of the kisses on his wrist.

Sam nods. He doesn’t talk a whole lot, just looks at the pictures and nods some more. Tim appreciates not having to explain who those kisses belong to or how they ended up on his wrist. Though, as he thinks about that, he kind of wants to, too.

But all Sam says is, “These the colors you want?”

“Yeah. Also want to talk to you some about adding more bands to my leg cuff.” Sam knows that the finished version of that dragon will cover his whole calf.

“How many?”

“Four. Not today. Not all at once. And I’d like to have room for more of them when they’re done. But, I want four more knots, like Kelly’s but different colors and different patterns.”

Sam nods at that, too. He knows what the Dragon means, and he’s not blind, so he can see Tim’s got several new scars from the last time he saw him. He knows the history behind Tim’s tattoos, and knows he doesn’t get them just for kicks.

He knows something has changed, something major, but Sam doesn’t ask, because Sam’s not the guy who asks.

He’s the guy who finds a sheet of paper and starts working on the transfer for the kisses. He sketches for a few seconds and then says, “The two new ones cover a lot of the old one. Want me to overlap them so each one covers one corner of the other?” He shows Tim the sketch, and how Jimmy’s kiss goes over the right corner of Abby’s and under the right corner of Breena’s, and how Breena’s left is under Abby’s left.

They loop together, each one supporting the others.

Tim nods. “Yeah, I like that.”

An hour later, Tim’s driving home, his wrist very sore. Instead of his usual cuff, he’s got a cuff of soft cotton gauze and surgical tape.

At a red light he’s stopped. His wrist is throbbing away with his pulse, letting him know that it really doesn’t like this whole tattooing thing much.

He tells it to shut up. He does.

Both hands on the wheel. His left is wearing the gauze cuff. On his right, he can see the scars from the fight, both in the shape of his hand which isn’t quite what it used to be, and also the literal scars on his wrist and hand from where they had to cut him open to put his carpals back in place.

His body is marked.

The scars… the marks of lives he didn’t want touching his. Those are pain and anger and rage beaten into his flesh. The cost of being the man he wanted to be.

He glances at himself in the rearview mirror. The white hairs, not a lot of them, but they’re there, and the wrinkles starting around his eyes and forehead, that’s time. That’s days passed and his life lived, and… he may not love them, but he’s earned them.

But the tattoos, they’re his. They’re his choices. The people he’s collected and brought into his life. They’re the marks of his loves, and the marks of the man he wanted to become. Every important change in his life has been marked with ink.

And if those marks sting… becoming the man he wants to be isn’t easy, either.

What’d Breena say? “They don’t write songs about the ones that come easy?”

He flips his wrist over. Not just the symbol of his loves, but of being the man who could have those loves. It didn’t come easy, but it’s been worth it.

When he gets home, Abby’s dozing, and Kelly still is, too. But she won’t be for long. So he heads to her room, sits down on the rocking chair, gently easing back and forth, and waits for her to wake up.
She does a few minutes later, and he picks her up, snuggling her close. She’s still drowsy, happy to cuddle and rest on him.

He holds her close, hogging the baby snuggles, rocking her back and forth, feeling fine wisps of baby silk hair on his chin, and the warmth of a sleepy person on his chest and in his arms.

Eventually, she wakes up some more, and he gets her cleaned up, and off to go snuggle with Abby they go.

“Look who’s up!”

Abby’s stretches a little, blinking, looking almost surprised. He’s guessing she slept a lot deeper than she expected. “Kelly!”

“MAMA!” Kelly’s reaching out for Abby’s so he puts her on the bed and wraps around both of them, getting lots of hugs and kisses in.

“You get it done?” Abby asks as she’s holding Kelly, lips pressed to the top of her head, hugging her close.

Tim takes off the bandage, showing it to her.

Kelly looks, but really doesn’t care, she just wants Mama and Daddy cuddles, and Mama and Daddy are happy to provide them.
All jobs have rhythms and flows, things that happen every day. “The Routine” for lack of a better term.

Breena’s ready for today to not be “The Routine.” Mostly because she was out Friday and Monday, both of which she normally works, which means there might be more than a bit of overtime waiting for her.

Her customers don’t much care one way or another when she manages to get to them. Their next of kin do, quite a bit.

She knows they’ve got a viewing at ten, another at noon, one at twelve thirty, and then two at three. And then the Mrs. Meyer’s, the 10:00, has a second viewing at 5:00, and one other person at 6:00. That’s a packed day for them. Usually she’s got her part of it done by 1:00, but she’s fairly sure she’s going to be getting people dressed and made up all day today.

She’s running the day in her mind as she pulls into her usual spot. Her mom’s car is next to hers; it’s unusual but not unheard of for Jeannie to get in before she does. Big day today, so she’s probably making sure everything is ready to run smooth.

Door’s unlocked, so she just heads on in and gets to work. Mrs. Meyers is waiting; time to get her ready to go.

Both of her parents head down. “Good weekend?” Jeannie asks.

Breena’s nodding as she rolls Mrs. Meyers to the table. “Yeah, it really was. Dad, you gonna give me a hand?”

“Sure, honey.”

She expects a certain level of “What did you do?” “Where did you go?” etc… etc… But her parents aren’t really talking, and she’s paying attention to Mrs. Meyers. She and Ed going through the motions, a well-oiled machine at work. They do this probably a thousand times a year; they’ve got it down.

Eventually, as she’s getting her makeup palette out, she notices that her Mom is still down with them, and her parents keep glancing at each other, like they’re expecting something.

Breena starts to feel a little cold, unsure of what’s going on. There’s just no shot at all that they know what was up this weekend. They just don’t. She’s supposes it’s possible that someone saw them, recognized them, caught what they were up to in the Sushi place, then immediately called her parents to tell on them, but… No. That’s a plot to a soap opera, not real life.

She looks up at her mom and dad. “Okay, what’s going on? You’re both staring, and this isn’t so interesting as to have you down here, Mom.”

Jeannie shakes her head. “She didn’t see it.”

“So much for the great surprise.” Ed’s looking a little put out.

“You can only see it for a second if you come in the back,” Jeannie says.
“Which I do every morning. What’s up?”

“Go look at the front of the building,” Jeannie says.

Breena’s tempted to say, “Right now?” Today’s a busy day, and gawking at the building doesn’t strike her as a good use of time, but both of her parents are doing a bad job of not smiling, so there’s something out there they want her to see.

“Okay.” The front of Slater’s is at ground level, so is the back. However, the back entrance goes into the basement, where she works, and the front, which is one floor up, (her grandfather intentionally bought land that had a hill on it) goes into the foyer, and branches off into two viewing rooms, a show room, and Jeannie’s office.

So, up the steps, through the building, and to the front she goes. She can’t see it from the inside so, whatever it is is on the front of the building. Out the door, and onto the small grassy courtyard with the weeping willows and stone benches. (Always a good plan to have a place where people can stand or sit comfortably outside.) From there she can see the front easily, and seeing it, her jaw drops.

She’s blinking hard when her parents join her.

“Do you like it?” Jeannie asks.

“I… I didn’t… Yes! God, yes! But… Dad?” It’s rare that something, especially a kind something, completely floors Breena, but right now, she’s completely floored.

He smiles and shrugs a bit. “It’s more than half yours now, so your name should be on the front.”

Breena blinks again, staring up at the sign. When she left on Thursday it had said Slaters’ Funeral Home. Today it reads, Palmer & Slater’s Funeral Home.

She hugs both of them. “You planned this for when I was away?”

Her mom smiles. “That was just luck. New ad copy, stationary, all of it’s been ordered. We’ll use up the old stuff.” Breena nods at that, never waste anything you’ve already paid for. “But, in the next year, everything will have your name on it.”

Ed kisses her. “And in five years or so, when you’ve finished buying us out, it’ll just be Palmer’s.”

“Good morning Dr. Palmer,” Allan says as he steps into the Morgue.

“Morning, Dr. Allan,” Jimmy replies, sitting at the desk, looking over the work of the long weekend.

“You look like you’re in a sunshiny mood. Must have been a very good vacation.”

Jimmy nods, and then glances at the work in front of him. “Yes, it was. However, I’m ‘sunshiny,’ as you put it, because everything is up to date and in perfect order, and I’m extremely pleased to see I could go on vacation for a long weekend and come back to find you’ve held down the fort admirably.”
“Thank you.” Allan nods, taking that as his due. Then he inclines his head slightly, pointing out the mitigating factor. “Granted, without any guests, it’s not that difficult of a job.”

Jimmy inclines his head, looking at his very clear desk. There are only three folders on it right now. Once upon a time, there would have been at least fifty, and a ream of loose paper, too. The paperwork alone used to fill each no-guest day, but, that’s not part of the load now, so Dr. Allan is likely correct about it not being a terribly difficult job.

“I noticed that Director and Mrs. McGee were also out on vacation. Was that just happenstance, or did you go together?” Allan asks, hanging up his jacket and unpacking the coffees he’s brought for both of them.

Jimmy nod. “Thank you,” taking the coffee, using drinking some as an excuse not to answer. He’s feeling a little wary with this line of questioning, because he knows Allan sees a lot more than he’d like him to. (He’s already noticed the new ring, but hasn’t mentioned it, though Jimmy’s guessing a ‘yet’ should go at the end of that sentence.) Still, no shame. And keep your answers short and don’t blather! “We did go together. Abby and Breena wanted to do something nice for us, before Sean’s on the outside and lounging around at the lake time vanishes.”

“Ah.” Allan sits down, sipping his own coffee. “But Agents DiNozzo didn’t go?”

“No, they didn’t.”

Allan looks perplexed by that. “I thought the six of you tended to stick together.”

Shit. Okay, why didn’t Tony and Ziva go? “We do. But CGIS is keeping Ziva busy and close to home. Gibbs and Agent Borin didn’t go with us, either, though they usually come along, too.”

“And Doctors Mallard and Langston…”

“Someone had to stay home and take care of babies. If you ever have children, you’ll rapidly learn that you love time with them, and that you adore time without them.”

Allan nods at that. “My parents used to basically skip out of the house the one weekend a season my grandparents would watch us.”

“Exactly.”

Allan’s eyeing the ring, and looks like he’s about to ask, but is cut short when Jimmy’s phone rings. He grabs it. “Uh huh… Okay… Yes, we’ll be there in an hour.”

“A guest?”

Jimmy’s pulling up Google maps, finding out where they’re going. “Unfortunately.”

“Then I’ll get the van ready to go.”

“Thank you, Dr. Allan.”
“New ring, Dr. Palmer?” Allan asks a few seconds into the drive.

“Yes.” His thumb slips over it. “Belated wedding present.”

Allan nods, thinking. “So, a romantic weekend?”

Jimmy snorts a bit at that. “As much as possible with four people.” He’s actually quite pleased with that answer.

Allan nods, and Jimmy sees that Allan does not appear to be at all mislead by that answer.

“How’s it look, Jimmy?” Tony asks a minute after he and Allan see the bodies.

Jimmy sighs, surveilling the scene. They’re right in front of the door to a small apartment. He’s not even sure if he can set foot into the apartment. Right now, he, Allan, and Tony are all hovering in the hallway, leading to that door, looking in, while Bishop and Draga are inside, hugging the walls.

“Like a bloody mess.”

Allan nods, quiet, debating the best path to even try and get to the bodies without disturbing the scene. “Dr. Allan, we’re going to need…” Jimmy’s not sure, he sees three heads… “Let’s say all four of the body bags. We’ll sort them out later.” He looks at Tony, questions all over his face.

“Neighbors called this morning. Heard a fight,” Tony’s delivery is beyond dry and verging on Saharan.

“A fight?” Jimmy stares at the butchery in front of him. “There are three heads in there,” he does a quick count, “And I can see seven hands from here.” And he can only see the foyer and living room. God knows what’s in the rest of this mess. “There are apartments on all sides, and they heard ‘a fight?’”

Tony nods. “Yeah.” That ‘yeah’ covers a whole lot of territory.

“Boss?”

“Yeah, Draga?”

Draga’s about three feet along the wall to the left. Just past the door, taking pictures and blood spatter samples. “This isn’t blood. I think it’s,” He’s got a red smear on his glove fingertip. He takes a tentative sniff, and then licks, wincing while he does it, “This is corn syrup.”

Jimmy looks at his feet, and then crouches down. He touches the pool of blood six inches in front of his booties. “This is not corn syrup. Given coagulation and oxidation levels, this has been sitting here for at least six hours. When did you get the call?”

“LEO’s were here two hours ago. They opened the door, saw the mess, noticed the apartment was leased to the Navy, and called us,” Tony replies, checking his notes.

“Leased to the Navy?” Bishop asks. She’s four feet in, also getting pictures of the scene and spatter samples. She doesn’t look willing to take a lick or sniff to see if her spatters are real blood.

“Yeah.” Tony nods. “Once we’re done processing, that’s your first job. Find out who is supposed to be in here.”

“Okay, I’ve got the bags.” Allan says, three more bags tucked under his arm.

“Wonderful.” Jimmy takes the bags, stacking them on the gurney. “I also want you to grab the blood testing kits. I want to make sure this is human.”

Allan looks confused. Draga points to the bit of wall next to him. “Spatter here is corn syrup.”

Allan glances at the floor. “But that’s definitely blood. And…” he inhales, they all know that scent, blood and feces and urine, “there’s at least one dead person—“

“One dead thing,” Jimmy corrects. “None of us have gotten close enough to make sure those really are bodies.”

“Smells like recent death.”

“You are correct Dr. Allan, but all mammals loose their bowels when they die. We don’t know how staged this is, yet.”

Allan nods at him, understanding that, since some of this is staged, Jimmy’s hoping this mess isn’t all made of people. “As you say, Doctor. I’ll get the test kits.”

Tony and Jimmy look at each other. Tony’s not allowed to mess with the bodies, including any pieces of the bodies, until Jimmy’s done with them. Jimmy’s got to get to the bodies without messing up Tony’s crime scene. As of this point, no one’s been able to get more than four feet into the foyer.

“Block it into a grid, take test samples of everything for Abby, collect all the… parts as we go along, and when we’ve got the apartment done, back we all go?” Tony says.

Jimmy nods. “I think that’s how this’ll go. Let’s get to it.”

“You heard the Doc,” Tony says to Bishop and Draga.

____________________________________

Emails, emails, emails… One thing never ends, every day there are more emails. Tim’s hacking his way through them when his phone buzzes.

“McGee.”

“Got a few minutes to spare?”

“Sure, Leon. Right now or in a bit?”

“The sooner the better. I have Lester Hue in my office, and he’d like to talk to you.”

Tim nods, no ideas at all as to whom Lester Hue might be. “Okay… Um…”

“The man in charge of making sure all Navy Veterans get their pension benefits.”
Tim doesn’t know what’s up, but if this guy’s asking for him, it’s got to be big. “I’ll be up in five.”

Lester’s a civilian. Tim gets that in a flash. He’s a small, precise, tidy, middle-aged black man in a good, but not particularly fashionable, suit. Call central casting and ask for an accountant, and Lester’ll show up and rock the part.

And, as Tim’s figuring that out about Lester, Lester is eyeing him, deciding if Tim looks like the computer guy he needs. Tim’s not sure how much he looks the part, but he’s not getting any sense from Lester that he disapproves, so they get down to it.

“Lester is here to report something that might be a crime,” Leon starts the ball rolling.

“Might be?” Tim asks.

“Might be,” Lester says with a sigh. “You have to understand, we handle millions of payments every month. Every retired sailor or their surviving spouses get money from us every two weeks.”

Tim nods, he grasps the scale of this.

“Normally, this sort of thing doesn’t get up to my level. Normally we just fix it at the individual level and that’s that.”

Okay, that’s great and all, but… “Let’s start with what ‘it’ is,” Tim says.

“Little fees. But, we’re not pulling them out. The banks swear they aren’t doing it. Every round of payments, we’re seeing about a hundred thousand tiny little fees charged to our Vets. They’re all less than two bucks. The only reason we even know about it is that they keep getting the wrong guys. A lot of these older retirees still go through their finances with a fine tooth comb, and if a buck fifty three is missing, they call us up and fuss about it.

“So, every month, we get a few thousand calls from different Vets fussing about the missing money. We put it back, and that’s that.

“We’ve been ‘putting back’ enough money over the last year that it’s starting to make some of the accounts skew, which is how some of my guys decided to see how many people were getting hit with these ‘fees’ and when the number got into the hundreds of thousands, this got up to me, and now I’m here with you.”

Tim nods, and glances to Leon. “Okay. So… why are you not sure if this is a crime?”

Hue shrugs. “It’s possible it’s just some sort of screw up. They happen. Something wrong in the code or something.” He stares directly at Tim. Tim knows there’s a message there, but not entirely sure what. “It’s all automated. But, it doesn’t happen to the same Vets over and over. One bunch of guys will get hit one pay period, then a new bunch next one. We know it’s been going on for at least a year. So, probably, someone’s skimming.”

Tim nods at that, too. That’s a headache, still… figure out where those fees are going and that should be the end of the headache and the answer to what sort of problem this is. “So… You might want the Forensic Accountants in on this. Don’t get me wrong, I can hack this, but they’re the guys who are better at tracking where the money’s going.”
Leon and Hue glance at each other. There’s a lot of weight in that glance.

“Our own accountants tell me that they need help, computer help, getting the guy who’s taking it.” Hue looks at Leon, and then to Tim. “And Leon tells me that you’re the guy for that.”

Tim thinks for a second, knowing there’s a few extra layers of conversation going on that he’s not part of. Then he thinks for another second, it’s September. A few thousand guys call, they get a few bucks put back each, call it ten thousand a month, nine months… That’s not even a rounding error. No one noticed this because the accounts weren’t balancing, not for something as big as the Navy Pension fund.

“You handle, what, hundreds of millions of dollars a month?” Tim asks.

“More,” Hue replies, staring him dead in the eyes.

“And you’re thinking…”

“From what we can tell, we’re losing about a million a month on this.”

This is getting brought up now, to him, for a reason. And Tim can think of one reason why this might be in his lap. He glances at Leon. Leon doesn’t nod, but his look is loud and clear.

“I’m the guy for this job.”

When Hue leaves, Tim says to Leon, “We’re keeping this in house this time, right?”

Leon nods. “You, me, give Borin a heads up and check her accounts for it, too. There’s got to be at least twenty or thirty thousand retired Coast Guard out there. Talk to her in person, when you see her next. Don’t go out of your way to see her. Voice to voice, in private, and only in the course of regular events. Nothing gets written down, texted, tweeted, or whatever on this.”

Tim nods. “You think this is part of CGIS’s mystery accounts?”

Leon nods back. “When those accounts vanished, both Director Borin and Ms. Anderson.” It takes Tim a second to remember that’s the name Diane is using now, “asked me to put out some discrete feelers. I set out some extremely discrete feelers. Less than two weeks later, this ends up in our lap. It’s part of the puzzle, or it’ll lead us in that direction.”

“Okay. Leon… Million a month, that’s big money for us, but…”

Leon knows how big his operating budget is, and he knows exactly how little a million a month buys. “I know. Whatever this is, it’s intentionally small to keep people from noticing it.”

Tim’s phone buzzes and he checks it. Text from Breena with a picture. That’ll hold for later.

“You need to get that?” Leon asks.

“Not now, family stuff. Do you know Hue personally?”

“No.” Leon’s eyeing Tim’s wrist cuff, or, more specifically, the little bit of visible bandage below it, but he doesn’t ask, so Tim doesn’t volunteer.
“Can I ask who you put those feelers out to?”

“Yes,” Leon’s eyes flick away from the cuff to Tim’s eyes, “but I’m not answering.”

“All right. Let me get on it.”

“McGee, given how small this is, it strikes me as entirely possible that this isn’t the target, but that this will have hints of what the real target is.”

Tim sighs. “Plans within plans within plans.”

“Exactly.”

“You picked an excellent day not to be on vacation!” Corwin says to Abby as Bishop and Allan wheel in the first two carts of evidence.

Abby and the other techs stare at it. “Is that all of it?”

Bishop laughs dryly. “Tony, Draga, and Dr. Palmer are still back there collecting more of it.”

Allan nods. “We ran out of room in the van. That’s why we’re back. I’ve got to get the first three body bags taken care of, and bring more bags back.”

Abby winces. “How bad is it?”

Bishop shrugs, trying to look cool. Not only has she never seen anything this bad, she’s never imagined it. Her words are somewhat upbeat, her voice isn’t. “The only upside is that, at least some of it is fake.”

“Two of the hands and one of the heads were mock ups,” Allan adds. “Unfortunately, one of the heads and three hands weren’t.”

“One of the heads?” Corwin asks.

Allan nods. “We’re not sure about the third one, yet.”

“How can you not be sure?” Corwin asks.

“We know it’s a head. It’s… older than the others. Not a lot of muscle or skin still on it, so it may not be human. It’s hard to tell. We’re not sure what’s going on with it.”

“Some days I hate people,” Abby says.

Bishop nods. “It gets worse. Draga found that some of the ‘blood’ is corn syrup.”

“And I found that some of it isn’t human.”

“But some of it is?” Abby asks.

“Yes,” Allan replies.
“Okay,” she’s staring at the sealed evidence bags, snapping on her gloves. “Let’s get to it.”

“So, how’d the weekend go?” Tony asks Jimmy as they’re moving their way through the bedroom.

Jimmy knows part of this is trying to think about anything beyond what they’re doing right now. Part of it is probably curiosity. Part of it is trying to be a good friend and finding out how the weekend went.

Tony’s doing okay at all three of them, but he’s not giving off a wildly enthusiastic vibe on how the weekend went.

Jimmy puts a lump of… he thinks it’s a spleen, but, given the size, not a human spleen (Please not a human spleen! If this is a human spleen it came out of a baby, and this case is already more fucked than anything he’s worked on since the meat puzzle, and he doesn’t want it to go there.) into a small bag, while Draga makes sure that he’s got pictures of where everything was.

“Really good. We had a blast.”

Tony inclines his head. “That’s… great.”

“Yeah, it was. Winchester’s a cool little town.” Jimmy’s very aware of Draga listening to them. “Neat little shops, good restaurants.”

“Laid around, ate everything that didn’t move, shopped?” Tony asked.

“Add in floating around in the lake and sleeping late, and yeah, that’s our weekend.” Jimmy’s not sure if Draga knows who went on the trip, so he’s being careful with what he mentions. “How about you guys? Abbi still running Ziva ragged?”

“They added three new people to the ‘to be indicted’ list.”

“Splendid.” Jimmy’s happy to hear about that. Faster they get this cleaned up, the happier they’ll be.

“Oh yeah. We were all at Gibbs’ place Sunday afternoon—“

“Penny sent some pictures,” Jimmy adds.

“Gibbs and Ducky unconscious on the sofa?”

“Yep.”

“Why were they unconscious on the sofa?” Draga asks, pausing in his picture taking.

“Got run ragged by three baby girls.” Jimmy starts to move for his phone and then thinks twice on that. He’s got to take his gloves off to get to his phone and now’s not the time. “When we break for lunch, I’ll show you the shot.”

“Okay.”

“That was about ten minutes before we got there. I caught the tail end of Sarah goofing on Gibbs and Penny getting pictures of it. Those McGee women are troublemakers.”
“And you would know, right?” Jimmy says dryly.

“I would know.” Tony’s eyes light up. “I wrote the book on troublemaking. We’re going to have to keep an eye on Kelly; she’s going to be a handful when she grows up.”

Jimmy laughs. “I certainly hope so. So,” he turns to Tony’s who’s measuring another blood pool as Draga shoots it, “you’re at Gibbs place?”

“Yeah… Shit… Jimmy, hold open the bag. That’s a finger, right?”

Jimmy nods. “Looks like a distal phalange.” Draga and Tony aren’t sure what that is. “Little joint of your finger. Every one of those assholes who pulled this on Ducky the first time are still in jail, right?”

Tony shakes his head. “They’re supposed to be. Anyway, at Gibbs’ place. The Bossman’s getting his forty winks in with the girls, so Abbi, Ziva, and I get some chatting time, and the good news is they made some real headway, and the better news is their union’s backing down on requiring them to keep everyone on staff until after they’ve been convicted. Abbi’s finally getting to fire some people, which means she’s able to start hiring new people, so some of those holes in her line are going to get filled in the not too distant future.”

“Which means you get your wife back, right?” Jimmy asks.

“God, I hope so! Every minute she’s not working, she’s asleep. I think we’ve spent less than an hour awake and together since Sunday night.”

Draga laughs at that. “Welcome to life with a pregnant woman.”

Jimmy nods along. “At least she’s not throwing up on everything all the time.”

“There is that.”

Draga looks between the two men. He’s got a should I ask look on his face. But after a second, he plunges ahead. “Speaking of Ziva, and Ziva working… um… Are we going to get another team member soon?”

Tony sighs. They almost don’t need a fourth member. With as little paperwork as they’re doing, three people gets the job done. Almost. Three people just isn’t a good team size, which they all learned when it was just him, Kate, and Gibbs. The problem is, you want someone at your back. He hates sending anyone, including himself, out completely on their own. Which means they get half as much out in the field time as when they had four members, or they get just as much, but he’s got someone on solo.

Tony notices something in the upper right corner of the square he’s working on. “Got a shell casing.” That’s not an answer, but that’s all he’s got, now.

When it comes down to it, if he hires someone else, it’s done. Ziva can’t come back.

“We don’t have anyone who looks shot,” Jimmy adds.

Draga nods. “Blade wounds all over the place. No bullets.”

“Well, I’ve got a shell casing; .45 from the looks of it.” He tucks it into another bag, and Draga shoots where it was. “When we wrap this one, I’ll send word to HR, see who’s in the potential talent pool.”
Draga nods. “Good.”

Tim gets the text from Abby a little after five.

I’ve got to work late.

He sees that and thinks shit. He writes back quick, Me, too. My office?

As soon as Abby shuts the door she says, “I’ve got at least one murder victim and parts of two dead guys.”

Tim tries to parse that, sighs, and then says, “This is another one of those cases where you and Jimmy and Tony will tell me the details, and I’ll start googling places to live in New Zealand?” Especially since Kelly’s been born, when they get really bad cases Tim’s been thinking that maybe they don’t need to live in such a crazy world.

Abby sits down in his lap, resting her head against his. “This is the case that’d make you start thinking of volunteering to colonize Mars.”

“Shit.”

“What do you have?” Abby asks.

“On it’s surface, accounting.”

She doesn’t look impressed, but she knows that he’s telling her that what he’s doing isn’t what it seems. “Deep down?”

“It’s probably linked to the case.”

Abby’s eyes light up at that. “And you’re the only one working it, aren’t you?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Just me and,” he pats his computer.

“Can you take it home?” Abby asks.

Tim nods, thinking through that. “Might be better off that I do. One of us needs to get Jimmy home.”

“Probably me. I don’t think he and Allan have gotten all the pieces back, yet.”

“Yuglhk.” Tim winces. He knows they got called out this morning, and it’s almost normal quitting time.

Abby nods. “I’ll send him a text. We’ll see if he’s going home on time with you, or late with me.”
“From what Abby was saying, I was sure you’d be working late,” Tim says as he heads into Autopsy.

Jimmy shakes his head as Allan tucks the last bag into a drawer. “They’re still going to be processing the scene tomorrow, so it’s not like they’ll need anything I can give them for at least another day. Plus, and I know this from unfortunate experience, meat puzzles work a hell of a lot better if you’re rested.”

“What did you guys walk into?” Tim asks.

Jimmy shakes his head. “I don’t know. I don’t want to know.”

Allan strips off his coveralls and tosses them into the hamper where soiled scrubs and coveralls go. “But we are going to know.”

Jimmy nods. He’s also out of his coveralls and eyeing his shirt. He’s not sure what that stain is, but something seeped through the coveralls, and he doesn’t want to bring that home. He’s unbuttoning. Not like this would be the first night he’s come home in scrubs.

Allan adds, “It looks like in an effort to hide the real crime, they staged at least two others and maybe committed three more,” he glances at himself, but all of his clothing looks tidy enough he doesn’t want to toss it in with the rest of the potential biohazard laundry. “So, bright and early tomorrow, Dr. Palmer?”

Jimmy nods at Allan, heading to where the scrubs live to grab a shirt. “Get a good night’s sleep. We’re going to need our A game.”

“Then I shall bring it. Good night!” Allan nods to both Tim and Jimmy.

“Night, Sam,” Tim says.

Jimmy waves, and Allan heads out.

“Tell me you had a better day than I did,” Jimmy says as he pulls on a top and heads over to where Tim’s lounging against the side of his desk.

“I won the coin toss for who got to go home tonight?”

Jimmy’s going home, too, so… “That doesn’t sound much better.”

“There’s no mysterious goo on my clothing.”

“That does. So…” Jimmy sits down and starts exiting out of his programs.

“Navy retirees getting screwed out of their pensions a buck or two at a time.”

Jimmy stares at him, confused. “Uh…”

“Hundreds of thousands of them each pay period.”
The light goes on. “Oh!”

“This one was sent directly to me, by Leon,” Tim looks at Jimmy long and hard, “because I’m the right guy for the job.”

This time Jimmy’s “Oh!” covers a lot more angles. Tim sees all the programs have shut down, so reaches over to flick off the computer monitor. Jimmy eyes his wrist. “You…” That’s the start of a question, because Jimmy recognizes a bandage when he sees one, and then he remembers why Tim would have a bandage there. “Oh. Gonna show it off?”

Tim pulls up his sleeve. “I was going to. Believe it or not, I forgot about it. Lots of accounting crap in my head right now.” He unsnaps the wrist cuff.

“Trust me, compared to what’s behind my eyelids when I close them…”

“How bad was it?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “God, Tim, it was a fucking horror show.” Jimmy rubs his eyes. “I think, maybe, one victim, two dead people from God knows where, and maybe two chimpanzees.”

Tim rubs Jimmy’s shoulders for a moment, nothing to say to that. Then because Jimmy asked to see, and he really looks like he needs to get his head out of the case, Tim unwraps the white cotton gauze from his wrist. “Ta da!”

“Oh… That looks really good.” Jimmy’s holding Tim’s hand, eyeing the new ink, looking at it like it’s fascinating. Maybe he’s genuinely this interested, or maybe he’s forcing it to blot out some of the day. “I like the way they all sort of interconnect.”

Tim nods at that, too. “Yeah, Sam, the tattoo artist, pointed out that the way it was covered too much of Abby’s lips so—“

They hear the door slide open again, and Allan heads back in. “Ah…” He smiles at them, sees Jimmy sitting in his chair, Tim half sitting on his desk with his hand in Jimmy’s, gauze bandage open, and immediately changes direction. “Are you okay, Director McGee?”

Jimmy’s rapidly rewrapping Tim’s wrist. He doesn’t think that Allan got to see what was on it. But he’s sure that if he does see, he will be able to figure out whose lips are on Tim’s wrist.

“Fine, Sam. And you really can call me Tim or McGee. Just a stupid accident. Hot pad wasn’t as long as I thought it was, and I kissed my wrist with the oven rack.”

“Oh. That hurts.”

Tim nods at him. Jimmy finishes re-taping the bandage, and Tim carefully puts the wrist cuff back on.

Allan’s looking thoughtful. “It might heal up faster without the cuff. Better air circulation.”

“Yeah, he’s mentioned that.” Tim nods to Jimmy, because that’s the sort of thing Jimmy likely would say. And then he stands up. “But it’s like my wedding ring, I never take it off.”

Allan hears that, looks from Tim to Jimmy, nods slowly, still looking at both men, and then says, “I forgot my lunchbox.” He heads into the back office, and soon as he’s out, Tim’s kicking himself, because if he never takes the damn cuff off, he wouldn’t have a fucking burn on his wrist.
Jimmy’s silently giving him a you should have shut up while you were ahead look.

Tim nods at him.

Allan comes back a moment later with his lunch box. “Wouldn’t want to forget this.”

Tim and Jimmy shake their heads.

“Good night, this time I mean it.”

“Good night, Dr. Allan.”

As the door slides shut, Jimmy glances at Tim. “He knows something is up. Likely wants to find out what.”

“What sort of something?”

Jimmy shrugs. “Expecting to find us making out? I don’t really know. I don’t think he does, either. But he’s never forgotten that lunch box before, and he was eyeing the ring, and asking about how the weekend went.”

“Sounds normal to me. Half of my guys asked about the new cuff when they noticed it.”

Jimmy flicks off the lights, as they head to the door. “Didn’t feel like casual interest. He’s trying to figure us, or at least me, out.”

The elevator door opens, they step in, and then shuts. “Yeah, well, he’s going to be sorely disappointed if he’s hoping to find us in a compromising position…” Tim thinks about that. “With each other…” He thinks for another second. “Here…”

Jimmy laughs as Tim adds more conditions to that statement. Tim smiles; he was hoping that would help pull Jimmy out of the dark of today’s case.

“Uh…” Tim says when Jimmy finishes laughing, “Kind of on that topic, like with the girls, you don’t… have to ask. You want to play with me, that’s fine.”

Jimmy laughs a little at that. “Want to play with you?”

Tim flashes Jimmy his get over yourself look.

Jimmy laughs again. “No, I get it. And back at you. If we’re serious about this whole marriage thing, then, that’s how it works, right? We give each other free access to our bodies, but everyone has the chance to back out of anything whenever they want for whatever reason?”

“Yeah.”

The elevator doors open, and Tim and Jimmy head toward Tim’s car. Jimmy hands over his key. “This’ll help.”

“Thanks.”

Once they’re both in, Jimmy asks, “Any issues with Heather?”

Tim shakes his head. “Apparently, since we don’t have a meth lab in the basement, we’re not in her top ten weird couples.”
Jimmy’s eyes go wide.

“That’s kind of how Abby and I responded to that, too. And, we learned that apparently key parties are popular in our area, too.”

Jimmy thinks for a moment. “What’s a key party?”

“All the guys put their keys in a bowl, the ladies fish them out, that’s who you’re with that night.”

“Uh…” Jimmy looks disturbed. “Either you’ve got to have a lot of friends or very low standards.”

Tim shrugs. “Both? Maybe you’ve got lots of really interesting, attractive friends?”

Jimmy thinks about it. “I have the feeling that’s the sort of thing that sounds better than it actually is, or you’ve got to be under twenty-five to enjoy.”

Tim glances left and right, making sure he’s not about to get splatted by oncoming traffic, and pulls out of the Navy Yard. “I think under twenty-five and low standards are synonyms. I’m fairly sure they were for me.”

Jimmy smiles at that. “Weren’t you twenty-four the first time you and Abby dated?”

Tim whacks him gently in the shoulder. “Hush, you.”

“Hey, did you see Breena’s text?” He changes the subject, moving them both into happier things.

“Yes! Who thought Ed could be considerate?”

“I know, right. Bet it was all Jeannie…”
Humpty-Dumpty

Tim’s still up, still messing with his computer, when Abby gets home.

“In here,” he says quietly, letting her know he’s in his office, on the off shot the jazz and sound of him clicking away on his keyboard didn’t tip her off.

“One minute,” she says, and he hears her kicking off her shoes, the sound of her feet moving through the house… bathroom stop and more to eat if he has to guess, and after a few minutes, he doesn’t have to guess because she’s in front of him, kissing him gently, holding an apple with two bites taken out of it.

He pushes back from his desk and pats his lap, a second later she’s sitting with him, head resting back on his shoulder, munching the apple as he nuzzles her neck and shoulder.

“Solve the case?” he asks her.

Abby laughs, bitterly. “Only thing I know is that this is a hell of a mess. We’ve got, at last count, six human DNA profiles, and three chimpanzees.”

“God.” That’s an epic mess. “You’re checking it against research labs and hospitals, right?”

“Yeah. That many parts of different bodies… We’re running it against the missing person databases as well as every lab that works with human and or chimpanzee tissue.”

“And let me guess, that only narrows it down to two hundred labs in the tri state area?”

“Expanded a bit larger than that, after all North Carolina has the research triangle, and we’ve got New York and Boston close enough to be possibilities, too. How about you?”

Tim looks at his computer. “Two options. One, the money went somewhere, but I can’t figure out where. Or two: the money isn’t going anywhere and this is an easy way for the Navy to save a few million a year.”

“Isn’t going anywhere?”

“I can’t see where the ‘fees’ go. You pull money out, and it’s got to go somewhere, right? But there’s no obvious transferring of money from one account to another. Like… Okay, they’ve got an account they pay everyone from, and from that account some money goes to the people who are getting paid, and some gets transferred to the account they pay the taxes out of, and some of it goes to pay for benefits, and some gets transferred for 401ks and so on. The money moves around and goes to different places. But, these fees, I can’t see where they’re going. It looks like an accounting trick that lets the money stay with the Navy.”

“Didn’t you say the Navy guy was swearing it wasn’t them?” Abby asks, chewing.

Tim thinks back, but he’s not certain. “I think that’s what he said to me. I know he said the banks were saying they weren’t doing it, and from everything I can see, that’s true. The amount hitting the banks is already missing the ‘fee.’”

“So, does that mean you’ve got to get even deeper into the Navy’s system and see what they’re buying with that money that they shouldn’t be?”
“Maybe. He said they needed computer help, not a forensic accountant, but… To me, this looks like call Diane up and ask her to come play with my computer.”

“Lovely,” Abby says dryly, looking at her computer.

“Yeah. I have a feeling Leon and I are going to spend some time bouncing around some strategy on this one tomorrow.”

“Meanwhile, Jimmy and Allan and I are going to spend the day using DNA and a 3-d scanner to put the puzzle back together.”

“And Tony and Draga and Bishop will start running down leads.”

“Yeah. Busy day for all of us.” She takes another bite of her apple. “You able to come to bed soon?”

“A few minutes. There’s one other hunch I want to play, see if I can weed anything out with a bit of code and luck.”

“Good luck then.”

“Thanks.”

“So, what’s the hunch?” Abby asks a few minutes later, leaning against the sink, rubbing cocoa butter into her belly, hoping it’ll help with the tight, itchy feeling, while Tim brushes his teeth.

“Hue, the guy in charge of the pension fund mentioned that it might be a glitch. He said it was all automated, so, if I’m right about the money not going anywhere, maybe, somewhere, buried in the code, is something to make sure that these little glitches happen.”

Abby thinks about that, nodding, as Tim spits and rinses off his brush. “How much money are we talking about?”

“Ten, maybe twenty million a year on the pension. If it’s written into active duty pay, too, that’d be more.” He gently pets her belly.

“Might want to check our pay, too.”

Tim knows she means them personally and NCIS in general.

It occurs to Tim that he hasn’t looked at his pay closely since… 2008? Whenever it was his mutual fund crashed and he had a lot of expensive bills coming due and only one paycheck in his bank account. That wasn’t fun at all. Back then a penny out of place would have gotten him yelling, but, ever since… Not really. His pay goes into his bank account automatically, and as long as it’s somewhere in the neighborhood of where it’s supposed to be, he’s not paying any attention.

Hell would freeze over before he’d notice an errant dollar and a half fee. “Yeah. If I can find how this is happening, I’ll start looking for it elsewhere.”
They’re in bed, snuggling in, petting. He very much doubts that there’s going to be any sex tonight. It’s late, Abby’s looking ready to drift off, and given how this weekend went, he’s not exactly climbing the walls horny right now.

One last thought hits him. “You and Palmer and Allan tomorrow?”

“Yeah. I’m best with the 3-d scanner.” Meaning she’s the only one who’s used it before. She sighs a little, scooting back against him, curling into his body.

He kisses the back of her neck. “Allan’s suspicious of us.”

“Mmmm?”

Tim kisses her again. She’s too sleepy for this. “Tomorrow.”

“Mmmm.” That mmm goes with a slow nod and even breathing.

A few minutes later, Tim’s asleep, too.

Morning is busy. It always is. That’s just how they go. But, for a minute, between getting Kelly dressed and putting his own clothing on, Tim heads into the bathroom (where Abby’s in the shower) and says to her, “Allan’s getting curious about us.”

“Curious how?” he hears from behind their black and green striped shower curtain.

“Jimmy’s not sure. He knows something is up, but not what. If he asks, I burned my wrist on the oven.”

Abby pulls back the shower curtain, sees Tim brushing his hair with one hand, holding Kelly with the other. “You did what?”

Tim catches her eye in the mirror. “He caught the tail end of me showing Jimmy the new tattoo. Jimmy got it wrapped again before Allan saw what it was, and I told him I didn’t have a long enough hot pad and burned it on the oven rack.”

Abby looks like that makes sense to her, and ducks back into the water, closing the curtain.

“Then I got kind of stupid and doubled down. He mentioned that it’d probably heal better if I took the cuff off, better air circulation, and I told him that Jimmy’d already said that, but the cuff was like a wedding ring, and I pretty much never took it off.”

Abby groans, immediately seeing the problem with that.

“Yeah. My foot was so deep in my mouth I was kicking myself in the ass. I know. He just stared at us, and then headed off.”

“Wonderful.”
“Yeah. Nothing to do for it now.” He puts Kelly on the floor (she’s decided she wants some crawling time) and grabs his toothbrush. “So, what are you doing with the 3-d scanner?”

“Last time they did this, they had to put everyone together based on how the puzzle pieces looked. This time we’re going to match them into puzzles by DNA, and then use the scanner to put them together virtually. Won’t have to lay everyone out to see where the missing bits are.”

“Cool.”

“Yep. So, while the rest of the team is running samples to get all of the bits grouped, Jimmy, Allan, and I are going to get Humpty-Dumpty, and all the king’s horses and men, virtually back together again.” Abby turns the water off.

“And let me guess, you’re forecasting overtime again tonight?”

“Unless the magic Cause of Death Fairy shows up to give us a hand, or I’m about to walk into the lab and be greeted with IDs for everyone, I’m thinking more overtime.” She steps out of the shower, grabs her towel and kisses Tim.

Tim nods. “Maybe I’ll see if Gibbs and Borin feel like keeping me company tonight.”

Abby gets what he’s telling her. “I think they’d like that, a whole lot.”

“Yeah.”

“Did you know,” Jimmy asks, looking at the collection of body parts in front of them, spread out over four tables. (And that’s not all of them. There are still three orange bags filled with smaller bags, filled with unidentified parts, in the freezer.) “That it does not actually say, anywhere in the original rhyme, that Humpty Dumpty was an egg? He was illustrated that way, and the idea stuck.”

“Fascinating, Doctor.” Allan says, as he’s collecting small samples and labeling each piece they come from.

Abby looks up at Jimmy, and then back at Allan, trying not to laugh. She can’t wait to tell Ducky how closely his protégée and his new hire are clinging to the past. Jimmy sees it, smiles at her, and rolls his eyes a little. The old patterns are familiar and comfortable to him, so he tends to slide into them without thinking about it.

“So, how does this work?” He’s eyeballing the scanner she rolled in five minutes ago.

“I’ve never used it for body parts before, but the manual claims you can do it. When I’ve done it with other broken things,” she grabs a small plastic stand, “you affix the broken thing to the top of the stand,” she adds a little blob of the putty that holds whatever the broken thing is to the stand, grabs a chunk of bone, and smushes it gently to the tiny blob, “then you put this here,” she sets it on the scanner. “Flick the switch,” which she does, and a moment later there’s a little beep, “take it off, stick it on the table for DNA profile 2, and onto the next one.”

Jimmy picks up a small piece of some sort of very red tissue. It’s about the size of his last two joints on his index finger. It’s a muscle. What muscle? No way to tell.

“And what do we do with these?” he asks, holding it over the tip of his finger, where it’s just hanging. “This can’t be a good way to scan this.”
“Supposedly, and I’ve never used this feature before, so we’ll see if it really works, we take the little stand, stick it on,” and she does. “Then it goes into this cylinder.” Abby places a smooth, very clear, glass cylinder onto the scanner, and then affixes the stand to the bottom of it. “Jimmy, I need a gallon of water.”

He goes to the sink and fills up a jug.

“Pour it in, gently.”

He does, and in a moment the piece of muscle is floating at the top of the stand, suspended by the water, in the shape it’s supposed to be.

“No…” she flicks the button, “the glass and water are supposed to have the same refractive value, and the computer is supposed to remove that frequency, giving us the shape in the glass, but…” They hear the machine beep, and as best as they can tell a 3D version of the muscle bit is up on the screen, looking exactly like the one in the cylinder.

“It works!” Jimmy’s nodding, impressed.

“Looks like it.” Abby grins. “Let’s get scanning.”

Once in his office, Tim checks the hunch he had the night before. There’s only a few ways to do what he thinks might be going on. Only a few phrases that will create those fees, without actually moving the money anywhere.

The tricky point isn’t finding them, a simple search function and enough time will do it. The problem is that bit of code could be anywhere. For all he knows, it might be hiding in the Navy’s intra-office secure communications system, or it could be with accounts payable, or maybe with the launch codes. Write it up properly, and you can stick a bit of code like that anywhere.

So, the trick isn’t finding it, sooner or later, he’ll find it. The trick is searching it out without letting everyone on earth know he’s doing it. And, assuming whoever did this is anywhere in the range of as good at this as he is, that little bit of code will be booby trapped to scream as soon as someone finds it.

Get in clean, find it, and then out clean. That’s the trick.

Last night, he’d had the idea, set the worm to search, had his finger hovering over the enter key, ready to execute, and then decided that maybe, just possibly, running the damn thing through the Navy’s code would be too much of a red flag.

At least, if he was running something like this, he’d have his systems set to raise red flags as soon as it detected something like the search he wants to run.

So, he can’t just hop onto the Navy system and go looking around for it.

But, if this is wider spread than just the Navy, if it’s connected to the case, then maybe he can go search it out in his own code, first, without letting everyone on earth know what’s up.

First step of that, though, is making sure their code really is secure. He thinks it’s secure. He’s done everything he can to make sure it is, but he’s a pro, and he knows he’s not infallible. There are literally hundreds of millions of bits of code floating around NCIS, and some nasty little worm could be hiding in any of it.

So, first thing on the docket, grabbing everyone who is not currently on an active case, and getting them checking into NCIS’s own code.

He sets an all hands on deck alarm, and within a few minutes has forty Minions, worldwide, plugged into his skype feed.

“First off, nothing’s on fire. If you’re on another hot case, feel free to log out. But if you’re free, I want you on this.” He hears some murmuring and loses 25 Minions.

“Okay, for the rest of you, as you know, CGIS has been having some fun lately. As you likely also know, I’ve been working with Director Borin on that case, helping her clean up her own house. Doing so has made it abundantly clear to me how easy it would be for anyone to piggy back onto our system and take advantage of it.

“So, today and tomorrow, we’re going on a snipe hunt. Hopefully, like the mythical snipe, what we’re looking for doesn’t exist, but it might, and if it does, we’re going to find it. I want us to go through all the code we can, in as many different ways as we can think of, looking for backdoors, spies, any bit of code that leaks our information or gives someone access that shouldn’t be there.

“Now, I know for a fact that there is at least one backdoor, because I put it there. Which means all of you should find at least one. Let’s see if there’s more. I don’t care how you do it, any technique that doesn’t break the system is fine with me. But let’s get searching.”

Tim checks his monitor, and he’s got fifteen excited looking Minions ready and willing to do battle.

Manner, his only Minion in DC not working on something else right now, is leaning against his door, looking disgruntled. Once Tim’s turned off his Skype chat, Manner says, “You put a backdoor into our own system?”

“Yes, of course.” To Tim it’s blatantly obvious that there might be a day he needs to get into their system without anyone noticing. And, as soon as they all find his backdoor, he’ll shut it down and stick a new one in there. Manner does not appear to agree with his tactics on this.

“Someone else could find and exploit it.”

“You’re right, but it hasn’t happened.”

“How can you possibly know that?”

“Go find it, and you’ll see. Or better yet, go find someone else’s backdoor that we don’t know about. If the NSA is watching our work, I want to know.”

Manner nods, slowly and wanders back to his seat.

Tim picks up his phone. A few rings later he hears, “Vance.”

Tim appreciates having Leon’s direct number. This is so much easier than going through his secretary. “I was wondering if you’d like to have lunch with me so we can go over some staffing issues. If my projections are right, the paperwork software means you’ll soon have more people than you need.”

Tim can feel Vance nodding, understanding that staffing levels is the absolute last thing Tim wants to talk about, but that’s a good topic for one Department Director to his Boss.
“I have a lunch date already, but maybe you could swing by my office around two?”

“That’ll work.”

They’ve practically got an assembly line going. Allan is going through all of the pieces. He takes small samples of them, making sure they’re all labeled and prepped for DNA testing. When he’s got fifty of them (as many as the scanner can run at once) he heads back to the lab, offering them new samples, and collecting as much information as they’ve gathered.

Meanwhile Jimmy’s sorting parts that have been identified, putting them with the body they belong to, and making sure Abby’s got a steady collection of bits to scan. (He’s keeping her in bones for right now. Might as well get the easy, and less messy, parts out of the way.)

Abby’s scanning, returning each piece as she’s done with them.

And the computers are building bodies, one piece at a time.

They’re chatting, mostly Jimmy and Abby, just everyday things, how the girls are doing, this weekend’s plans (if they’re going to get a weekend). Jimmy suggests that if Tim and Kelly are going to be on their own tonight, maybe they’d like to keep Breena, Molly, and Anna company, and Abby thinks he’d go for that. (And when she texts Tim about it, she suggest that maybe they’d invite Gibbs and Borin to Breena’s for dinner. Tim jumps on that.)

Allan’s fairly quiet. He’s doing his work, listening, adding an occasional word.

But, as they hit a lull in the conversation, he decides to jump in. “Mrs. McGee, may I ask you about tattoos?”

“Sure, Sam. And, please, call me Abby. Even Ducky used my first name down here.”

Allan’s eyes flick over to Jimmy, and he nods. “Abby’s the exception to every rule.”

“So, what do you want to know? Thinking about getting some ink of your own? I know a great artist not too far from here. He’s expensive, but if you’re going to wear it on your skin every day for the rest of your life, you want it done right.”

“That makes a lot of sense. I was wondering how long they take to heal up.”

“About a month all told. Some people heal up faster, some slower. Basically, you get it done, wear your bandage for a few hours, then give everything a gentle wash. First few days it’ll seep plasma and ink, so that’s kind of gross. You’ll want to keep something clean, soft, and absorbent on it. Wash it gently at least twice a day until it’s healed up. After a few days it’ll peel like a sunburn. Worst part of that is you can’t pick at it, if you do it messes with the detail. Keep washing it. Pretty much, it’s like having an open wound, for a few weeks, so, treat it like you would a bad abrasion.”

Allan nods.

“So, thinking of something for you?”

“Possibly.” Though Jimmy would categorize the look on his face as meaning, no. “Not sure I want ‘seeping plasma and ink’ to describe anything I’ve ever gone through, though.”

Abby nods. “That’s why a lot of people get them before they know that.”
“Kind of like having a baby,” Jimmy adds. “There are a lot of details Breena would have rather known before she got into it.”

“Yes. Little things people who have done it forget to mention or don’t want to because it’s off-putting.” Abby’s eyes narrow. That didn’t happen to her because she and Breena had a no-BS-here’s-what-happens conversation ahead of time. Breena, unfortunately got blindsided on some of the icky stuff though. She gets back on track. “However, if there’s something that means something to you. Something you want to mark you for life… This is it. It’ll never wash off. It may fade, but it won’t vanish. Supposedly you can ‘get them removed’ but only black and dark blue really vanish. The other colors just fade.” She intentionally does not glance at Jimmy as she says that.

Jimmy’s thinking about what she’s saying, and coming up with something he’s never wondered before. “Why the spider web?”

Abby smiles. “I got the job here. To celebrate, I got that one. I’m the spider, and all of those guys out there, the ones who do stuff like…” she looks at the body parts around them, “are the flies, and I’m going to catch them.”

Jimmy grins at her, he likes that a lot. Allan appears pleased by that, too.

“Allan nods, thinking about that. He’s heard that Tim has tattoos, but he hasn’t seen any of them. “Does Director McGee have your lips on him?”

Abby grins. “Somewhere. And if you want to see something really beautiful, have him show you the design on his arm or leg. That’s going to be stunning when it’s done. Or go find Eric and ask to see his back. He’s got an awesome tribal design across his shoulders.”

Allan thinks about that, too. “But you don’t have one, do you Dr. Palmer?”

“My skin is ink free, Dr. Allan.”

Abby’s still grinning, and he can see she’s thinking about the henna debacle, so Jimmy gives her a quick, no telling look. She flashes him a little mope, but doesn’t say anything. Allan just looks between them, knowing he’s being kept out of something, but not what.

“I’m not sure if it’s just this group, or something about the rays of orange light emanating from the bullpen, but while the American population at large only has a twenty-five percent tattoo rate, for this group the number is much higher.”

“The rays of orange light?” Abby scoffs. “Please, they see how cool they are on me, and suddenly everyone wants one.” She winks at Jimmy while putting another bit of bone on the scanner.

“Or it could be that.” He smiles back, setting another piece of bone on the tray next to her.

“Got any news?” Tony asks Jimmy when he comes down.
“Actually,” Jimmy turns to Tony, while stripping off his gloves and grabbing the clicker for the big screen. “We do.”

“Still no I.D.s,” Abby says.

“True, so we’re calling them by letter.” Jimmy clicks up the first image. It’s about ten pieces of bone, three of which have been fitted together to form a rib. “This is Mr. A.”

“You know he’s a Mister?” Tony asks, taking notes.

“According to the DNA, he’s XY. What he may have looked like, or considered himself to be is anyone’s guess. But he’s genetically male. On the upside, none of the blood we found at the scene—”

“That we’ve checked,” Abby adds.

“That we’ve checked, is his. They’re running the scanner full tilt on this case. Likewise, all of the tissue samples indicate they were cut post-mortem. Whatever happened to A, he was disassembled after he died.”

“There’s some comfort for Mr. A,” Tony says, looking up from his notes.

Jimmy clicks to the next shot, and then pulls up another one. Both are collections of bones that as of yet, do not go together. “Miss B and Mr. C are in the same boat. Whatever happened to them, happened after they stopped breathing, and none of the blood is theirs.”

“B and C have heads,” Tony notes.

“Yes, and we’re working on C’s facial reconstruction.” Abby tells him. Back in the lab they’ve scanned in his skull and the computer is trying to figure out what C looked liked. B’s face is intact. “We’ve got B running in facial recognition databases.”

“Good.”

Jimmy clicks again. This time they’ve got a torso, a hand, three fingers, a selection of bones, and with one more click, Jimmy brings up the blood spatter map. “This is Mr. D. No cause of death yet, but I can tell you that D likely died in that room.”

“And his wounds?”

“The ones I’ve found are post-mortem. Someone took him apart in there, hence the large pool of blood in front of the door and through the living room, and there’s spatter on the walls, so at some point his heart was pumping while he was injured.”

“And guessing by the spatter, and the lack of neck, we’re think he had his throat slit, though given how high the spatter is, it’s not impossible that the wound was to his brachial or femoral artery,” Abby adds.

“There’s still a lot of spatter on that map,” Tony says.

“Yes. About half of it is colored corn syrup. Another third is from D. The rest, which account for an additional two DNA profiles, has traces of anti-coagulation chemicals in it, so—“ Abby says.

“I’m looking for someone who robbed a blood bank,” Tony says.

“At the very least. Corwin tells me we’re still checking with every lab we can find for one that’s had a robbery,” Abby replies.
“And the chimps?” Tony asks.

“Checking zoos, too.” Abby’s eyes narrow, looking furious, but then she makes herself calm down. No one, not the dead people in front of her, or the chimps they’ve got in the freezers, or any of the live people surrounding her, are better off if she goes on a raging tear. “On the upside, if you want to call it that, it does look like the chimps were dead before they were taken apart, too.”

“The real upside is that this would have taken a lot of time, a lot of effort, and more importantly a lot of space, to set up,” Jimmy says. “They had to get all of this stuff up there, and if I remember the hallway right, they had to go through it carrying all of this, to do it.”

Tony smiles. “Already ahead of you on that. Apparently that apartment had a new fridge and stove delivered to it two days ago. Bishop and Draga are tracking down the delivery company.”

Tim heads into Leon’s office. Leon sees him, and stands up. “So, you wanted to talk about how your paperwork software’s effecting staffing levels?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Been thinking about that some.”

“Me too.” Leon looks around his office. “Been in here all day. Don’t remember the last time I felt sunshine on my skin.” It’s cool and overcast outside. But they both know Leon’s saying the words for the sake of giving them an out. “Let’s get some coffee and talk outside.”

“Sounds great.”

Once they have their coffees, and are outside, sitting on a bench well away from everyone else, Leon says, “Staffing levels?”

“We’ll have to deal with it sooner or later,” Tim says with a shrug.

“I’ll have to deal with it. Now, tell me what’s really going on.”

So, Tim does, explaining what he’s seeing, and where he’s going to start looking. He wraps up with, “The thing is, assume I do find that the Navy, or… whoever is using this as a way to pad their budget or something. What can we do with it?”

Leon looks at him curiously.

“If it’s in there, I’ll find it. But… given what happened with those accounts, I can guarantee you that I will not be able to find who put that code into there. And, without a full audit, I’m absolutely sure we’ll never know where that money went.”

Leon nods, grimly. “Clever plan, the budget and books show a certain amount of money paid out. And all of that money leaves the bank, but not all of it goes where the budget says it does. With millions of accounts receiving money, how do you find the one—“

“Likely more, a lot more,”

Once he hears that, Leon knows how he would do it. “Fake sailors or dead ones. Skim a few bucks off millions of accounts, bunch those payments back into pension or wage sized payouts, send them out to hundreds of accounts that belong to dead men, collect the money. It’d take time—“
Tim sees the scam, too. Elegant, easy, just take a computer, some access, and balls. “Not any more. Automate it. It’d take seconds. Thousands of accounts get money dropped in them every month, then they all transfer that money into a new account. Unless you know the new account, you’ll never catch it. You can’t catch it. We’d need…” Tim rubs his eyes. “We’d need authorization to check every account we’re paying out to, and then see what they’re doing with their money, and then if we find an account or two a lot of people are paying into, more authorization to make sure that final account is a problem. No judge anywhere, ever, is going to give us a warrant for this.”

“And if anyone ever notices, it’ll be like those IRS refunds that go to people who don’t actually exist. Blame it on third party scammers…”

“You still talking to Diane?” Tim asks.

“Officially I don’t have any reason to. However, if the updates I’m getting on Agent DiNozzo’s case are correct, the FBI might be called in.”

Tim nods. That’d be a way to get a heads up to Diane without raising too many flags. Then he thinks about the case. “Um… Why the FBI?”

“They’re in charge of cases involving exotic and possibly trafficked animals.”

Tim laughs. “Well, thank heavens for chimpanzees, then.”

He and Leon both look at each other again, briefly wondering exactly how staged the whole case is. Tim shakes his head. No way they’re getting their strings pulled from that far away. He hopes.

“I think I’m going to check in with Tony. See how he’s doing, maybe suggest a call to Fornell.”

“Sounds like a plan. You’ll let me know what your snipe hunt finds.”

“And of course. We’ll give it to the end of business tomorrow. If they haven’t found anything by then, we’re clean or we’re not going to find whatever it is.”

“I hope you don’t find anything?” Leon’s not sure if that’s the right thing to hope for here.

Tim nods; he knows. “I hope we’re clean.”

“‘What do you mean ‘I don’t need to know who was supposed to be in that apartment?’ We’ve got parts of six people and two chimps in there. Jesus himself could have booked it, and I get to know. No… NO! Don’t hang up on me!” Tony slaps down his phone and mutters, “Asshole.”

Tim leans against what used to be his desk and is now Draga’s. “I take it this is going well.”

Tony makes an angry snorting noise while rolling his eyes. “Bishop and Draga should be back soon, hopefully with the guy who delivered the boxes of body parts.”

Tim nods. “That’ll be fun.”

“You know it. So, what’s got you here? Don’t tell me you’re in on this one, too.”

“Best I know, no, I’m not. But, I was just talking to Vance, and he remembered that the FBI handles cases involving possibly trafficked exotic animals.”
Tony raises an eyebrow. “What would get you talking about that?”

“Directors gossip. We were talking staffing levels.” Tony knows Tim more than well enough to know Tim’s answering for the benefit of everyone around them. The real story probably involves his own case.

“Uh huh. Well, I’ll take that under advisement.”

“Please do. Who knows, maybe whoever you’re chewing out,” Tim moves closer to look at Tony’s computer, hand on the back of Tony’s chair, other hand discretely tucking a note that says, Diane, on the outside, and gets her up to date on the inside, under his mouse, “will give the FBI a bit more cooperation.”

Tony sees the note and knows what he’s being asked to do. “Can’t give ‘em less. I’ve got to go talk to Vance, see if he can shake free some information for me. If he can’t, I’ll see what Fornell can do.”

“Sounds like a plan.”

“Agent DiNozzo,” Leon says, standing behind the partition wall next to Tony’s desk. “Have a minute?”

“If you’ve got a hold of who was supposed to be in that apartment,” Tony says, standing up, “I’ve got all day.”

“All day will not be necessary. Draga, Bishop, you’ve got the rest of the day off.”

It’s not quite 4:00, a bit more than an hour before usual quitting time. They both look startled, but they know they’re being dismissed so Vance can talk with Tony alone.

As soon as they’re out of the way, Tony looks at Vance. “How bad is this?”

Vance shakes his head. “Bad.”

Tony sees who they’re meeting as he and Vance walk into a bar less than half an hour from work. Only one man in the room is wearing a naval uniform. Hell, besides the bartender, he’s the only person, period, in the bar.

Tony doesn’t recognize the man behind the uniform, and the uniform appears to be intentionally bereft of identifying markers.

He’s not supposed to recognize him. He glances at Vance, but can’t read his expression. “Know him?”

“Not him specifically. I know why he’s here.”

“Calling us off.”

“Yes.”

They sit down across from Nameless Sailor, who does not introduce himself. He does wave for the bartender, who comes over with two drinks, scotch by the smell, deposits them in front of Vance and Tony and then heads to the back. Leaving them completely alone in an empty bar.

Tony’s carrying. He always is, and under the table he flicks off the small leather strap that makes sure his gun can’t just be grabbed out of his holster, and unlatches his safety. This sort of set up is making his danger sense scream. He shifts a bit in his seat so he can see the back room in front of him, and the front door in the mirrors behind the bar. He’s ready for anything.

At least, he thought he was. “As of five today, you’ll hand this case over to Metro PD,” Nameless Sailor says in lieu of hello.

Tony stares at him, and then says, “Nope. Not just on your say so.”

A moment later he’s got a folder and three thumb drives sliding across the table to him. “You’ll find the victim, Dr. Daniel Quinten, was a virologist, a civilian. You’ll find that all of the other bodies found with him were from his lab. Apparently his testing procedures annoyed the wrong people. And you will find that the Navy has no jurisdiction in this case, so you will hand it over.”

Nameless Sailor taps the top folder. Vance opens it, eyes scanning the order from Jarvis to let this case go to Metro.

Tony’s not going with it. This order burns. “And the location? Who was supposed to be in that apartment?”

“That is still classified, Agent DiNozzo.”

“Metro will ask.”

“And they will get the same answer you have.” Nameless Sailor nods, takes a sip of his drink, and leaves.

Tony and Vance look at each other. The order from Jarvis looks legit. Under it is several pages of information about this case. The short version of everything Metro will need to arrest a collection of animal right’s activists for the murder. Tony guesses that the thumb drives have the long version, as well as all of the evidence.

According to what they’ve got here, Quinten was murdered because his area of specialty involved infecting chimpanzees with HIV and then testing new antiviral medications on them.

“This stinks,” Leon says.

Tony nods. “So, we handing it over?”

“Yes.” When given this level of direct order by his boss, Vance will obey. But that doesn’t mean he’ll let it drop. “But we keep copies of everything. And I want to know who Daniel Quinten really is. Animal rights activists don’t murder people trying to cure HIV.”

Tony nods. “I’ll call Sacz.”

“Your pal at Metro?”

“Pal might be a stretch, but we’ve worked together in the past. He knows his head from a hole in the ground. He might not solve it, but it won’t be because he’s not competent to do it.”

Leon nods again. “Okay. Let McGee know you can’t get to Diane.”
“I will.”

Vance picks up his drink and shoots it back. “I hate days like this.”

Tony, who really would have liked to have joined him in that drink, but is driving them back to work, agrees. “Me, too.”

Given that everyone at NCIS is able to head home at their usual time, the quiet little dinner where Tim gets a shot to talk to Borin doesn’t happen.

The larger, pissed off, teeth gritting, ‘I hate politics’ dinner involving the whole clan, bitching loudly about this case, does.

Tony’s expounding about how deep in the shit he thinks handing this off is, when Penny says to him, “Daniel Quinten?”

The way she says it immediately gets Tony’s attention. “Yes.”

“Tall fellow, dark hair, blue eyes?”

Jimmy shrugs. “We don’t have enough parts of him to tell. The parts we do have matched the DNA profile they gave us. Why?”

“I know him through John’s Hopkins. We’re not close or anything, but he’s a psychiatrist, not a virologist. He studies the effects of anti-anxiety meds on people with PTSD.”

Jimmy thinks for a moment, and he can see Abby’s getting there, too. “Blue eyes?” she asks.

“Yeah, really blue. Like Jethro’s. They’re very pretty,” Penny replies.

“So… is he… brown skinned? We assumed he was Black or Hispanic,” Jimmy says, tentatively.

Penny’s not buying that, at all. “Quinten? If he’s black anything, he’s Black Irish.” Besides Ducky, no one else in the group knows what that means. “Most Irish people have light brown, blonde, or red hair and light eyes. Some have black hair and blue eyes. Hence, Black Irish.”

Tony does not like hearing that, at all. His danger sense is yelling again. “Penny, do you have his number?”

“Sure. You want to check on him?”

“What better way to hide a body than to spoon feed us a falsified ID?” Tony takes Penny’s phone from her and hits the contact button.

“Hello? Doctor Langston?”

“No, not today. Though she gave me your number. Is this Daniel Quinten?”

“Yes. Who is this?” The voice on the other line sounds nervous.

“Special Agent Tony DiNozzo. Naval Criminal Investigative Service. Are you at the hospital?”

“Yes, why?” Nervous has slipped to horrified.
“Ditch everything but your cash. Including your phone. Walk, run, or take a cab, but don’t drive to the nearest Baltimore PD precinct house. Get there, ask for Jeffry Renold. He’s a Captain, and he will be there by the time you get there. Do not give anyone your name. Ask him for a password. He’ll say Penny, and he will keep you safe until we can get you into protective custody. Move, fast. I’ll explain as soon as I can. It’ll take two hours to get to you, so get to the nearest PD precinct, and get safe.”

“But…” Horrified is on the verge of panic.

“Move, now. Fast. I know this is scary, but you have to pull it together and get yourself to the closest PD precinct house. We’ll talk when I’ve got you somewhere safe. I am leaving to get to you now. Move, toss out your phone and move.”

While he’s talking, Tim’s already texting Bishop and Draga, letting them know they’ve got to get moving. As soon as Tony hears dial tone, he tosses Penny’s phone back to her, and grabs his own. “Jeff, yeah, you’ve got to get your ass to the PD precinct house closest to John Hopkins hospital, and you’ve got to do it right away.”

“Tony DiNozzo?” They haven’t talked in two years.

“Yes. Please, Jeff. I’ve got a ‘murder victim’ that’s still walking around, and my guess is he won’t be for long because the people who fed me that ID don’t want me to find out who’s really in my morgue.”

That gets Jeff moving. Tony can feel the shift across the miles and hear it in his voice. “Okay, Tony.”

They go over the set up Tony told Quinten as Tony’s pulling on his jacket, kissing Ziva, and heading out. Tim and Ziva start to follow, and Tony shakes his head, covering the phone with his hand. “Sit down. You’re not in the transport people business anymore. But if you” he looks to Tim, “want to help, you can find out who fixed that DNA profile for me.”

“I can do that.”

Tony nods, and he’s out of there.

Dinner hits the skids after that. Mostly fast eating and faster clean up. They all want to know what’s going on with Tony’s mystery.

To the point that Tim had almost forgotten why he wanted to talk to Borin in the first place.

He’s handing her a rinsed dish, and she’s putting it in the dishwasher, when he says to her, “Got a lead of my own. Navy pension big wig just noticed that there are tons of little ‘fees’ getting pulled from the pension pay outs. Fees that shouldn’t be there. Fees that the banks aren’t pulling. My guys and I are going to check this all over my side of it, then we’re going to check it Navy-wide, but…”

Abbi’s looking at him, dish in hand forgotten. “I get it.”
“You have someone you trust to run your numbers?”

Abbi smiles. “Let me guess, you’ve got someone in mind?”

“Someone I don’t have a good excuse to go see, but…”

“You’re thinking that I need some girl-time with Diane?”

“Wouldn’t hurt.”

Abbi slots the dish into the dishwasher. “You know, one of the positions I was able to rehire for is my pension administrator. Maybe we need to have a chat.”

“Yeah, and Leon’s thinking that it might be a good idea to make sure that everyone collecting a Coast Guard pension is still breathing.”

Abbi smiles, she’s… well, her new pension guy, is going to be on top of that.
“We’re driving to Baltimore at 8:30 on a Wednesday night because…” Draga asks as Bishop pulls the armored van out of the NCIS lot.

“The smartass answer is that we’re cops, and we don’t have off time.” But, in that Tony knows he hasn’t given them the real reason, he keeps talking, “The real reason is that the ‘ID’ the Navy gave us was a pile of prime bullshit, and that the real guy with the name, address, work address, and the rest of it, is still sitting his ass in Baltimore, and we are going to get him before anyone else does.”

“Sounds like a plan. So, who did we have in our morgue?” Bishop asks.

“No idea.” That reminds Tony. He grabs his phone and calls Sacz. “Hey Ron, you still at your desk?”

Sacz scoffs. “You just dumped a murder with body parts or blood from six guys in my lap, of course I’m still at my desk.”

“Get to your morgue and make sure those bodies are all accounted for, specifically the one we’ve got IDed as Quinten.”

“Sure.” Sacz voice says that he thinks Tony’s on overkill, but he’ll do it because both times they’ve worked together Tony’s far out hunches have been right. “Are you expecting it to get up and walk away?”

“Let’s put it this way, I’m en route to Baltimore, where Daniel Quinten is, as of thirty minutes ago, alive and talking to me.”

That gets Sacz’s attention. “I’m on it. I’ll give you a call.”

“Thanks.”

Tony sees the name on his caller ID and answers it on speaker. “Are you psychic or something?” Sacz asks as soon as he hears the line pick up.

“Oh God. What happened?”

“According to the drivers, they delivered seven bags from your morgue. Four bags of body parts sorted according to DNA. The unidentified pieces were in two other bags. The chimps were in another bag. According to my ME, they’ve got seven bags of random, unlabeled, unsorted body parts. The drivers say those aren’t the bags they delivered. My chain of evidence shows my drivers signing in the bags at 17:45. Since we’ve got a four month long backlog, no one even looked at those bags until I asked.”

Tony’s ready to spit he’s so mad. “And let me guess, you’ve got no footage of anyone messing with those bags.”
“Right.” Sacz isn’t sounding happy, either. “I’ve got no footage period. We don’t keep cameras on the morgue or deep freeze.”

“And your deep freeze doesn’t have a key code lock or anything like that on it, either?”

“No. Upgrading our security has been on hold for the last three years. You know, budget cuts.” There’s a lot of bitterness in Sacz’s voice as he says that. “Once you get into the morgue, you can do pretty much whatever you want. I’ve got my guys checking to see who might have gotten in, and what they may have done. My ME didn’t see anyone out of the ordinary, but it’s night shift, so the cleaning crew is in now, taking care of the bays they use during the day. And they all have access to the deep freeze.”

“Fuck!” Tony rubs his eyes. “Okay. You talk to your guys. I’m on the way to Baltimore, gotta grab Quinten. Be at least another hour there, transfer time, two hours back, then talking with him. You find out what happened and get me samples of those parts. We’ll meet up again for breakfast. We kept copies of our findings, so we’ll find out if you’ve even got any of the body parts we gave you.”

“Okay. I’ll bring the extra strength coffee and bear claws.”

“And I’ll bring the ‘dead scientist.’”

Bishop and Draga have been quietly listening to that conversation. As soon as Tony hangs up they both glance at him.

“Bad enough having one case just vanish. Be worse to lose two in a row,” Draga says.

“I know. And we’re not losing it. I don’t care what SecNav wants on this, we’re not just letting it vanish.” Tony rubs his eyes again. “Okay, I’m catching a nap. It’s gonna be a long night. You get one, too, Draga. On the ride back, you get sleep time, Bishop.”

The feel of the van eating the miles has Tony just about asleep when a thought hits, jerking him out of his near cat nap. He sits up, rubs his eyes, stretches bit, and then grabs his phone.

“Vance,” he hears after two rings.

“Director Vance, I’m on my way to Baltimore to pick up Daniel Quinten.”

There’s a moment of silence, and Tony can imagine the look on Vance’s face.

“The Daniel Quinten?”

“Same name, birth date, address, and place of employment, different job, different race.” Tony can feel Leon nodding, slotting information into place.

“I have a call to make.”

Tony’s turn to nod. “I’d imagine you do. Keep me in the loop?”

“You, too.”
Pretty blue eyes isn’t the only thing Daniel Quinten has in common with Gibbs. Hair that’s more white than black is also part of the package.

Tony’s thinking that Penny hasn’t actually seen Quinten in a while.

Beyond that, the resemblance ends. Quinten is rail thin, nervous (though given the call he just got, Tony would be concerned if he wasn’t nervous), twitchy, and likely only in his mid-forties.

Tony’s not sure if he’s the kind of man who jumps at shadows, or the kind of man, having been told the shadows are out to get him, is jumpy.

Tony doesn’t say much as he pulls Quinten out of the 32nd Precinct building, wearing a vest, and into their van. He’s not wasting any time, and not relaxing until he’s got Quinten at the Navy Yard.

Quinten’s frustrated. He’s terrified and no one, including these grim looking people in NCIS gear, are answering any of his questions. But finally, as Draga pulls the van out, and Bishop tries to catch a nap in the front seat, and he and Tony are in the back, behind armored walls, Tony feels safe enough to get talking.

Quinten’s been trying many versions of what’s going on, why am I here, tell me what’s happening, with no luck, so as he sees Tony relaxing a hair, he asks, “How do you know Penny?”

Tony smiles a little. That’s not a bad way to try and get some information about Quinten and maybe calm him down some.

“Family matriarch.”

Quinten looks puzzled by that answer. Like he’s checking a mental list and can’t figure out where Tony goes on it. “You aren’t one of her sons?”

Tony's slightly miffed at the idea that Quinten thinks he looks old enough to be one of Penny's sons, but, bad light, nervous person... He’s trying not to take it personally. “No. Her grandson is my best friend, and she’s married to my adopted grandfather.”

“Penny married?” Quinten looks pleased by that, and a little surprised. “Must be a hell of a man.”

“Ducky is that. You two haven’t spoken or seen each other recently, have you?”

“We speak every few years. When she has a student who needs the kind of help I provide, she refers him or her to me.”

“What kind of help do you provide?”

“I work with adolescents and young adults who have been traumatized in some way and are dealing with anxiety as a result.”

Nothing about that is screaming reason for bloody murder to Tony. “Isn’t that the sort of thing any shrink can do?”

“On one level, yes. Anyone who’s properly trained can handle the talking part of the issue. I work more with the pharmaceutical level. Anyone who’s had serious mental health issues can tell you that the right meds are a lifesaver and the wrong meds make you feel worse than dead. The people she sends me are looking for the right meds.”
“Okay. Still… Isn’t that mostly trial and error?”

“Mostly. For the average doctor, yes. I’ve been working on creating profiles based on the subject’s chemical baseline, so that we can do a better job of figuring out, the first time, what kind of medication, and how much, and how often, the subject needs. It’s intense, it takes a lot of testing, but, my hope is, that by the time I’ve got a working base test, we’ll be able to use the technology that diabetics use to constantly monitor their blood sugar along with those pods that add insulin as needed, to keep my subjects chemically where they’re supposed to be. And once we’ve got those chemical levels right, talk therapy does worlds of wonder.”

Tony files that away. It sounds wonderful, but he’s not, on any level, seeing why that would get this man killed, why they’d pretend he was a virologist, or why he’d be doing anything at a Navy apartment.

“Do you test on animals?” Might as well touch on the 'official reason' why he's supposed to be dead.

“Humans. All of the drugs I’m using are already FDA approved. When we get to the point where we start working with new delivery methods, we may work with animals, but that’s years off.”

“Do you have a lab?”

“A small one. We run numerous blood tests every day.”

“But not the kind of set up where you’d have pint sized bags of blood?”

Quinten’s looking disturbed by this. “No. Why?”

“Do you do anything with HIV or viruses?”

“HIV, no. In order to get a good baseline, everyone I work with needs six weeks without any medication at all. Most of my patients start with a three month, if not longer, weaning off period, then six weeks cold turkey, before I get to start working with them. I can’t do that for an HIV+ patient. Besides mental issues, everyone I work with has to be healthy.”

“Great.”

“Agent DiNozzo, please, what is going on? I’ve been beyond accommodating to you.”

“You have. Have you ever been to apartment 44A in the Ronscon Building in DC?”

Quinten’s face shuts down. Tony’s spent a lifetime dealing with good liars, and Quinten isn’t one. His eyes visibly go blank and all the life in his face drains away.

“I can’t say.”

“Were you supposed to be there on Monday or Tuesday?”

“I can’t say.”

Tony sighs. “This would be much easier if you would. See, as of this afternoon, I’ve been told that…” Tony grabs his phone and gets the main shot of the crime scene up, then he zooms in so that one of the torsos is visible. He hands it to Quinten. “This is you.”

Quinten blanches, looking at the mess. “Oh God.” Tony knows that look and scrambles fast, finding a plastic baggie. Quinten grabs it and throws up. When he’s done, he manages to gasp out, “I was supposed to be there.”
“Who were you supposed to be meeting?”

“Captain Trevor Boylt. He’s Navy Psy Ops.”

“Can you describe Captain Boylt?” Tony asks.

Quinten’s still staring at the mess, zooming out, flicking through the pictures. He tears his eyes away. “Um… Yeah, sure. Six feet, maybe. Taller than I am, but not too much. Black and gray hair. Brown eyes. African American and Asian. Said his mom and dad met in Vietnam.” Tony doesn’t need to look up front. He knows that Draga’s making sure Bishop texts the lab, telling them to check the DNA profiles, hoping they catch a break and that everything about Captain Boylt hasn’t yet vanished.

“And what were you meeting about?”

“I can’t.” Quinten opens and closes his eyes. “I’ve signed a million forms from the Navy saying that on pain of treason, I can’t say. If I tell anyone, they’ll execute me.”

Tony’s eyes jerk up. That’s a new one on him. Sixteen years working Navy cases and no one’s ever tried that on him.

“I’ve got the paperwork. I made copies. I can show you. But, I can’t say what I was doing. Who did this to Trevor?”

“If we knew what you were doing and why you were there, we’d have a much better idea of that,” Tony says gently.

“I can’t.” Quinten is about to cry. “I’ve seen those crime shows and the whole, ‘it’s worth my life,’ and I’m sure you’ve heard it all before, but… It is. I can’t say.”

“Can you give me a hint?”

Tears are seeping down Quinten’s face. “Captain Trevor Boylt. Naval Psy Ops. Can I make a call?”

“Who?”

“I can’t say. But if I get permission, I will.”

Tony hands over his phone. It takes Quinten three tries to get the number in right, but eventually he does, and Tony hears half of a conversation where Quinten explains what’s going on. Another minute, where Quinten is listening, followed by him handing Tony the phone.

“Agent DiNozzo?”

The voice doesn’t identify itself, but Tony recognizes it. Just about everyone knows the voice of the President.

“Yes, sir.”

“In a moment, I will be texting you an address. You are to take Dr. Quinten to it. The Secret Service will be waiting. They will pick him up and provide for his safety. You are to forget this case ever crossed your path, destroy any evidence that you have that goes with it, and never touch it again. Are we clear?”

Tony’s biting his lip so hard it’s about to bleed. “Crystal, sir. May I get those orders in writing?”
The phone hangs up, and a moment later there’s an address on his screen.

Tony taps Draga, who pulls the van over. He tells Quinten what his orders are. “If we take you there, you’ll never be seen again. The Secret Service will make sure you vanish.” He glances at Draga and Bishop, they both know there are more than one way to make someone vanish. “Is what you’re doing for them worth keeping you alive? Because if it isn’t…”

Quinten takes a deep breath, looks at the address, and says, “Take me.”

At 00:43, in the middle of nowhere Maryland, in front of cow pasture, an armored van meets an armored car. The people in the van hand a man over to the suit-clad, sunglasses-at-night-wearing, unidentifiable men in the armored car.

At 00:44 Bishop runs the car’s plates. They don’t exist.

At 00:48 she runs the phone number Quinten called. It’s no longer in service.

At 00:50, Tony says that they’re getting home, going to bed, resting, and then, in the morning, after he has followed the President’s instructions, they are dropping this case. The look on his face makes it clear absolutely nothing of the sort is going to happen.

Bishop and Draga nod. They’re beyond tired of this shit, and they are going to solve this case.
A Series of Meals

Retirement sucks. Retired and injured sucks worse. Not only is Gibbs stuck on the sidelines while everyone else is scattering to do something useful for this case (and he’s sure these cases are in fact “this case.” He’s sure a lot of these things are connected. It’s like walking through a spider web. He can’t see the web, but he can feel it’s there, brushing all over his skin, and knows they’re in it.) he can’t even help from the sidelines.

All the gut on earth isn’t useful when you’ve got nothing beyond this doesn’t feel right, and you’ve got nothing you can use to try and figure out why it’s wrong. Not like he can go along and help Tony chat with this Quinten guy.

So, as they’re heading home, from dinner, he’s all but gritting his teeth at not being able to help.

“Jethro,” Abbi says.

“I know. I’m trying.”

She shakes her head. “I don’t think you do. I’m feeling it coming off of you, I’m feeling it, too, there’s a big picture here, a really big picture. So damn big that we have no idea what we’re into.”

“Yeah.” He glares out the window. “And I’m useless on this.”

“Not necessarily. If Tim’s sure his system is safe, you can use it to get into mine, and Diane’s. Tony would give you his key to the NSA and CIA. You’ve got hours and hours of free time and access to almost everyone’s information. Fornell would let you in. That’s all of us that matter. Add in an internet connection and… Find us the big picture. We can’t take down the monster if we don’t know what it is.”

Gibbs finds that idea simultaneously horrifying and exciting. He hates computer work. Yes, he’s better than he used to be, but hours in front of a computer is only preferable to his next appointment with the pulmonologist, who will tell him that lungs take a long time to heal and that he needs to rest.

But, God, it’s casework. Real casework. Casework everyone he loves is tied to.

“I think you’re going to get called into an emergency meeting tomorrow, and I’ll have Tim give me a lift to Dr. Kent.”

Abbi smiles at him. “You know, I think that’s a very good idea.”

When Tony gets home, what he wants to do is storm around the apartment in a funk, and maybe break things. Then once he’s done that, what he wants to do is get into this. Get deep into this. But, if this case is as sensitive as he thinks it is, and if he wants to be able to keep working on it, he and his team are going to have to play a role, and that’s the role of good little boys and girl who do what they’re told.

He slumps into his favorite arm chair, and stares at the ceiling for a while.

He’s been called off the case by the President. He’s been told to destroy evidence, which is illegal, by the President. He was a kid when Watergate happened, but he loves movies and there are more than enough of them out there that that bit of history is firmly entrenched in his mind.

And the narrative always works the same, the guy who asks for the cover-up is the bad guy. The guy who shines light on what’s going on is the good guy.

That’s how it always works on his cases, too. No one who’s meant any good has ever asked them to drop a case. Give it to someone else, sure. He’s played that roll of the die, and he’ll do it again. Put it on ice because there’s a bigger case going down, and eventually they’ll add in their bits, sure. He’s run that play, too.

But they’ve never just dropped one. Not without being read into something. Not without a damn good reason and a promise that, eventually, they’ll get their guy.

They don’t just let a case walk.

He stares at the ceiling. When it comes down to it, it’s a matter of trust. If Leon asked, without any explanation, to kill a case, he would. He’d hate it, but he’d do it. Leon’s earned that. He’d do it for Tim or Jimmy, too. Jarvis doesn’t have that sort of trust. Obama, a man he’s never met, never spoken to before today, can’t.

Rule… He doesn’t know. Call it 99. Never trust someone who asks for what he hasn’t earned.

It’s very late when it hits Tony that once again, he’s got a call to make.

This time the phone goes to voicemail. “Call me back. It’s not good.”

Five minutes later Tony gets a call from Vance, whose voice is groggy with sleep.

“How ‘not good,’ Agent DiNozzo?”

“We had him. He claimed that on pain of treason he couldn’t tell us what he was doing. He made a call. He explained what was going on. Then he handed me the phone and the President told me to forget the case existed and to burn all the evidence. He told me to hand Quinten over to the Secret Service. I asked if I could get those orders in writing, and he hung up. Then I got the address, asked Quinten if he really wanted to go, if he was sure they wouldn’t kill him, and he told us to give him up.”

There’s a long silence on the other side of the phone.

“And are you going to ‘forget about the case and destroy the evidence?’” Vance asks, voice tight.

Tony can hear several levels of question there. “How about we have breakfast tomorrow? We can coordinate the disposal plan?”

He can feel Vance’s nod, and knows that Vance understands what he’s saying.

“Been a while since I’ve had banana pancakes,” Vance says, naming their meet without having to spell it out. Precious little protection in the age of electronics, but better than nothing.

“I’m going to need some of them tomorrow, too. Nine? Gotta start up bright and early tomorrow.”
Tim would have to admit, that of all the things he could be doing this morning, chauffer service isn’t really on the top of his list. He’d also have to admit, that until he knows his system is clean, he’s not going to be running anything particularly interesting, so, he might as well be on chauffer service, and let the people doing the interesting things do interesting things.

He pulls up at Gibbs’ place and sees Jethro sitting on his porch, waiting for him.

Been a while since he’s seen Gibbs that eager for anything, so obviously the text he got about needing a ride isn’t the whole story.

Tim leans over, opening the passenger door, seeing the look on Gibbs face. He knows that look. That’s Gibbs on the hunt for a hot case. Yeah, he’s not doing this because Gibbs needs a ride.

“You’ve found something?” Tim asks as Gibbs gets in.

“Nope, but I’m gonna.” Then Gibbs starts explaining what Abbi thought of.

Tim sighs. That’s... One more sigh, and Gibbs is watching him. “Well, it’s an idea.” He’s thinking Abbi and Gibbs might be underestimating exactly how difficult it is to use the computer to look for things like this, but... “Let me make sure the system is safe. Tomorrow at the earliest, maybe Friday, might be next week depending on what I find. But, if I can get you on so everyone can’t see what you’re doing, I’ll get you hooked in and you can chase leads down rabbit holes until you know where they all go.”

Gibbs nods. If he was still the Boss, Tim would know that look means Do it yesterday. But he’s not the Boss anymore, so he says, “Good.”

“You know what you can do between now and then?”

Gibbs gives him a curious look.

“Get online and learn everything you can about how to use Python to create database searches.”

“Tim?” Gibbs is starting to look worried.

“Our systems aren’t Google, Jethro, you don’t just type in a word and have it pop up in a million places.”

Gibbs looks grim. “Great.”

Tim tries to figure out a way to make him feel better about this. “How long did it take you to learn Japanese?”

“Never got great, but could talk in six weeks.”

“Trust me, this one will still be here in six weeks, and probably ten weeks, and likely next year. Even if we ‘solve’ these, they won’t really be put to bed. You’ve got time, so add a new language to your portfolio.”
Gibbs sighs, but looks resigned. “I ever tell you about the case where I went in as a computer tech?”

Tim’s eyebrow shoots up. “Really?” he laughs a little. “Uh…” He licks his lips thinking of how desperate they had to be for a tech to send Gibbs in. “Did you…”

“I made it work! Only had three weeks of prep time for that. Spent all three of them buried in books in and in front of my computer, Mike mocking me every step of the way. Is the C++ I learned going to come in handy for this?”

Tim doesn’t wince. He swallows and says, “Only in the sense that you’re not getting into this completely cold.” Tim thinks some more. “Probably like going into sniping when you’re entire background is in martial arts. You’ll use the same discipline and mindsets, but new tools.”

Gibbs nods. That’s a concrete example he understands. “Am I going to need to learn how to program?”

Tim shrugs. “You’ll do better at this if you do. But, if you learn how to download search templates online, you’ll be able to at least get some answers.”

“Okay. Reading up.”

“Yep, reading up. Lots of reading up. While we’re waiting for Kent, I’ll make up a reading list for you.”

“You know, when I said I hoped I’d see you again…” Dr. Kent says as he walks into his exam room, this time finding Tim sitting on the visitor’s chair and Gibbs on the exam table. “This isn’t what I meant.”

Tim shrugs. Gibbs shakes his head. “How fast and what can I do to make it faster?”

Kent throws up Gibbs’ x-rays on the plasma sitting on Kent’s desk. “If the hurt arm and missing ribs were on opposite sides, you could start working your arm today. It’s just a chipped humerus. And from the looks of things it’s healing up fine.”

A quick gesture vanishes the shot of Gibbs’ arm. And his ribs fill up the screen. “Here’s the problem. These bright white sections here are still a mesh of plastic with a bit of soft bone knitting throughout. I know you don’t want to hear it, but until November 1st, I want you babying that arm, and your chest, and your shoulder.

“By then the bones should have calcified enough for you to start putting more weight on it.”

Gibbs glares. “You’re right, I didn’t want to hear that.”

Kent sighs at him. “I know. If you can get a hold of that extra bone vibrating disk that Tim didn’t think I knew about…” Tim jerks his attention away from the ribs to Dr. Kent, who smiles smugly, “Thought so.”

Tim shakes his head at him and goes back to checking out the mesh in Gibbs’ ribs. He’d worked on the idea of something like that when he was at John’s Hopkins, and how they ended up actually doing it is interesting to him.

“Anyway, if you can get one, you can try it on your ribs, and it might speed things up. Or, you might end up with bones that are too stiff and thick and that will make it harder to breathe.”

“Duck sent it back,” Gibbs says. He probably would be willing to try, but the damn thing is in Japan again.

“Then November 1st. Don’t want you carrying anything heavier than five pounds on that side until November. And that does not mean go get a four and a half pound dumbbell and start doing straight arm lifts, either.”

“Any exercises, at all?”

“Until October, none at all. From there, we’ll re-x-ray, send your results to Dr. Palmer, and he can figure something out for you. I don’t know what he does, but he got Tim up and moving a lot faster than I expected. With any luck he’ll use his magic on you.”

Gibbs glances at Tim, not saying anything. Then he licks his lips and says, “Jimmy’s magic works better on Tim.”

Tim does a really good job of not giggling at that.

Tony feels groggy and drugged. He figures he got about an hour of sleep. Between getting in late and turning everything over in his head, he didn’t sleep well.

There’s a note from Ziva on the table. Lunch?

He takes his phone out, and sends her a text. Lunch sounds great. Miss seeing you every day.

Me, too. You get the guy?

Ziva knows what that means. Carlo’s? 1:00.

See you there.

“Did you put him through the ringer, or did he put you through one?” Ron Sacz asks as Tony sits down across from him at a Beltway Donuts halfway between their respective offices.

Tony takes the coffee he pushes to him, drinking deep and long. “We’re off it.

“What?”

“Check your morgue. It’s all gone. Mine is, too. All of our data is wiped. Quinten is gone.”

“How do you lose? Wait…” Sacz is calling up his Morgue. “Yeah. Hey Bob, what do you have on
“We can’t tie him to any crime. Couldn’t charge him. Couldn’t hold him. Just because he has the same name as an ID we’d been given wasn’t enough. He wouldn’t talk, so he walked and vanished.”

“You had eyes on him?”

“Of course we—“

Sacz holds up his hand. “No. What do you mean there’s no case? I was working it until three in the morning. I told Myrton to make sure there was a guard on those bags. No, I don’t have the number wrong. Seven bags of evidence. From NCIS. Body parts. Signed in last night. They’ve already been fucked with once, and I made sure someone was watching them. Yeah, go check again.” Sacz looks back to Tony, pissed.

“We had eyes on him. Good eyes. We gave him cab fare to get home. Had a guy in a ‘cab’ ready to ‘pick him up.’ He decides to take the train. Heads off to the restroom just as they pull out of DC. Never comes back to his seat. Searched the whole train. Not on it. We’ve got people looking along the line.”

“He jumped off?” Sacz can’t believe that.

“Or was thrown.”

Sacz shifts attention to the voice on the other end of his phone. “Uh huh? No. NO! That is the wrong fucking answer! You do not tell me it’s all gone! You do not fucking tell me all of my evidence just vanished. I do not want to hear any shit about a fire alarm at five in the morning. I will be there in half an hour and whoever’s in charge is going to be handing in his resignation in thirty-five minutes.” Sacz hits the off button on his phone, hard. “You’re right. It’s gone.”

“That’s why they sent it to you in the first place. I’m sure they had someone on the inside who was supposed to make this go away. If we find anything, I’ll keep you in the loop.”

Sacz nods. “Back at you. I’ve got to go chew someone a new asshole.”

Tony waves him off. Part one of playing the role of the good little agent is done. He checks his watch, he’s got to get across town in an hour for his next meeting.

__________

Tim heads in feeling pretty good. Assuming they really get their system safe, he can get Gibbs working. Yeah, it’ll take forever, but it’s still something for Gibbs to do, and once he gets the hang of it, he probably will be good at it.

He’s gotten a text from Abbi telling him that her new Pension Officer is completely behind her plan of going through and making sure that everyone getting a check is indeed breathing. He’s, as Abbi said, enthusiastic about this job.

He sits down, flicks on his computer, and sees Manner lurking.

“News?”
“Yeah, Boss.” Manner’s got his laptop out, and sets it on Tim’s desk. Tim’s wondering how bad it’s got to be that Manner’s calling him Boss.

Manner drags a chair over and sits next to him. “Three so far. Brand and Ngyn found two last night. Sallena out of the Tel Aviv office found the third.”

Tim doesn’t have to tell Manner to pull them up, he already is. Tim’s eyes flick over the screen. Two of them are elegant, subtle, and infuriating. One’s in their intranet, hijacking their mail server, providing access to everyone’s communications. The other’s lurking in Vance’s calendar software. Nasty little bastards hiding in the code. Number three is pissing him off for an entirely different reason. “Who was using Kazaa?”

Manner shakes his head. “Accounts payable processor, left seven years ago. From what we can tell, that one’s been in our system for the last nine years.” He points to the top two. “Didn’t find why you think you’d know if someone found your backdoor.”

“Because neither of them is mine.” Tim smiles a little at that. Manner almost rolls his eyes. Save me from cocksure geniuses is clear on his face. Tim smiles at that, too. “The Kazaa one isn’t, either. Did you shut them down?”

“No, the girls are backtracking them. They’ve got Brand on it, too. They went home at usual quitting time for them, and I sent Brand home when her hands started to shake from all the caffeine in her system and told her she couldn’t come back for ten hours. I expect she’ll be here at exactly 6:00 and ready to go.”

“Good. Anything we find, we backtrack before shutting it down. Once we know who’s spying, then we decide what to do about it.”

“Okay. So… um… Where’s yours?”

Tim shakes his head. His is hiding in the firewall he built, but he wants to see if they can find it.

“Keep hunting.” Tim’s eyeing the one that’s been lurking in their intranet. He hasn’t met that code before, but he’s got an idea what kind of person wrote it. In fact, he’s got a clue as to specifically what man wrote it. “I’m going after this.”

“Enjoy, Boss.”

Tim nods. “You, too.”

---

Tony’s next meet up is at the diner. Apparently he’s going to be eating, a lot, today.

Draga and Vance are already waiting for him. Draga looks uncomfortable. Vance looks angry.

“Bishop?” Tony asks as he sits down, sucking down more coffee.

“Any minute now,” Draga replies.

“Now you three look like you’re getting ready for a hanging or a funeral,” Ellen says as she comes over, more coffee for everyone.
“Little of both, Ellen,” Tony says.

“Then I won’t ask. Ya’ll just talking, or you want real food, too?”

Vance nods. “Haven’t had breakfast, yet. French toast and bacon if you’ve got it?”

“If I’ve got it?” Ellen smiles at him. “Hon, you name it; I got it. Tony?”

“Just coffee. My first breakfast date fed me.”

Bishop makes it in a few seconds later, also looking grim. She sees Leon and her eyes go wide. “Sir!” she says as she sits down, next to him.

“Relax Ellie,” her first name trips over Leon’s lips, but his smile is warm. “You, too, Eric. We’re just four co-workers having a nice breakfast this morning, right?”

“Uh, yes, S—Leon.” Ellie says, her voice tripping over his name, too.

He smiles again. “Excellent.” For a moment, they all sit there, not sure what to say, because they couldn’t be less four co-workers just having a nice breakfast on a Thursday morning if they tried.

Finally Tony says, lightly, after taking a sip of his coffee, “Ron, you know Ron, Leon, he works for Metro,”

Leon nods.

“He tells me that Metro is following orders perfectly.”

“Really?” Leon asks, voice cold.

“To the letter. They’ve been able to get rid of everything. Got a bit of help they didn’t expect on that. Ron was… very pleased by these developments.”

Bishop’s eyes narrow, and Draga clutches his cup as Vance says, “I see.”

“And once I get into the office, I’ll have a chat with Jimmy and Abby about making sure that anything we might have accidently kept is destroyed as well.”

“Good, glad to hear that. I’m supposed to have lunch with Clayt, and I’m sure he’ll be happy to hear what we’re doing.”

“I’m sure,” Tony says dryly. Then he looks at each of them, carefully, giving them his full attention for a few seconds. “I think it’s been too long since we’ve worked a real murder. Maybe it’s time we give terror plots a break. Not too long. Maybe a month or two. No later than picking it back up again for the New Year. Just long enough to clear our heads, long enough to find a replacement for Ziva. Once we’ve got him, we’ll swing back into action on the terror cases. After all, wouldn’t want to bring someone new in the middle of something sensitive.”

“You sure it’ll be a him?” Ellie doesn’t sound comfortable asking, but if they are just four co-workers having a chat… And if she wants to make sure it sounds like she’s not getting the message…

“Seven out of ten applicants are, Ms… Ellie,” Vance replies.
“Closer to fifty fifty at FLETC. At least, when I was there…”

“FLETC trains a lot of people for a lot of things,” Vance replies. And, for whatever reason, y chromosomes tend to go along with taking that FLETC certification and applying to NCIS.

Ellen comes by, plates piled high. Ellie’s eyes go wide as she sets hers in front of her. Ellen’s eyes go wide as she sees Ellie. “Now, I didn’t expect you to be such a tiny little thing when I put this together. I won’t be insulted if you don’t eat it all.”

Draga grins, looking at a plate filled with eggs over easy, bacon, chicken fried steak, home fries and biscuits on it. “She just looks little. There’s a lumberjack’s stomach in there.”

Ellie stares at the plate, then looks up to Ellen. “Did they tell you I love chicken fried steak?”

“Nah.” Ellen brushes that off. She gets to the counter and calls out the order to her husband, and that’s just what came out of her mouth. “Just had a feelin’. You all good on drinks?”

They nod, and Ellen heads off. For a moment, there’s just the sound of eating, (Ellie’s purring a little. She hasn’t had chicken fried steak this good outside of Oklahoma City.) then Tony says, “You know, in all the rush last night, I don’t think I remembered to tell you how we found out that Daniel was alive and kicking. I don’t think you’ve met her yet,” he says to Ellie, “but do you,” he means Draga and Leon, “know Penny?”

Both Draga and Vance nod, they remember Tim’s grandmother.

“McGee’s grandmother. Apparently she used to work with Quinten.” Tony says to Ellie. “One thought I had last night, is that she’s an incredible woman. Done everything, for everyone, and probably knows everything…”

The light is going on for Vance. He’s remembering the case Penny was involved in. Draga and Bishop weren’t there for it, so they don’t get this, and are looking lost.

Tony sees him light up, sees him get it.

“Yes, fascinating woman, Tony.” Vance looks to Bishop and Draga, “She’s a…”

“Bio-medical Engineering Professor, now,” Tony supplies. “But she’s done it all. During Vietnam she worked on several projects for the military.”

“In many ways,’ Tony says. “She mentors a lot of young women these days. Maybe you and her should have a chat? She’s a numbers wonk, too, and I bet she’d love the sort of stuff you were doing for the NSA.”

Bishop doesn’t have the whole picture, but she’s got the basic idea down: Penny knows Quinten, Penny used to do top secret stuff for the military, find out if Penny knows what sort of top secret stuff Quinten might have done.

“If you’d arrange an introduction, I’d love to have a chat.”
Prisoner transfers take time, but apparently when you’ve got the word “Director” next to your name, they take a lot less time than when you’ve got “Agent.”

Tim’s sitting in interrogation across from Ajay Khan a lot faster than he expected to.

Khan doesn’t appear to recognize him, but, of course, they never saw each other, just talked over the line, and he hasn’t opened his mouth, yet.

Tim pushes his tablet across the table to Khan. “This one is yours right?”

Khan’s fingers stroke over the device with the same level of adoration Tim uses when he touches Abby. Then he glances at the screen, then to Tim, bored. “My lawyer’s on the way, and there’s no way I’m saying anything to anyone without him here.”

Tim stands up, grabs the tablet, sees Khan flinch when it leaves his grasp, and walks out.

The breakfast party gets back to NCIS at the same time. They take the same elevator, and a second into the ride Leon hits the emergency stop.

“Okay, quick and clear. At lunch I’m meeting with Jarvis, if he doesn’t have good answers for me, we are solving this case. If he does, we’ll let it go. And it’s entirely likely that if the answers are secret enough, I will not tell you what they are and you’ll have to trust me. If he doesn’t have answers, Ms. Bishop you will find out exactly how Penny knows Quinten, as back up reading I want you to look at The Annex Project and the Tellas Research Institute. Draga, if I cannot get answers, your son is going to have some sort of issue and you will request leave. You will take that leave and go visit Quinten’s apartment. You will snoop, and you will not get caught, understand?”

“Find that paperwork he talked about,” Tony adds.

“Paperwork?” Vance asks.

“According to him he kept copies of the stuff that said it was treason for him to talk.”

Vance nods. “DiNozzo, you are going to make sure that evidence ‘vanishes’ somewhere we can retrieve it again.”

Tony nods back at that. “Quinten threw up in the van. Sounds awful, but I’ve still got it. I’m thinking Abby’s going to tell me if it matches the ‘profile’ we were given.”

“Good.”

“And as soon as McGee tells me that I can do it safely, I’m running everything I can find on Trevor Boylt out of Psy Ops.”

“Sounds good, too. Get up, do your work, and by one I’ll know what we’re doing.”
When Vance gets into his office, he follows his usual routine of getting coffee, sitting down, and then opening his email. His eyes scan over the names in his inbox, and he sees one from McGee.

Short little thing.

Anytime you’ve got free, have coffee with me.

Leon looks at the mug in his hand. Then he grabs his phone, wondering how the hell all of this is coming together now.

“McGee,” he hears after two rings.

“I’m free.”

“Lucky day then. My date won’t chat without her chaperon. Want some more sun?”

“Sure.”

And thus, fewer than twenty-four hours later, Tim and Vance are once again on the bench, having yet another coffee.

“Found three,” Tim says as Vance sits down.

“Three?”

“Three, and there are at least four, but they haven’t found mine, yet. One looks like BS, little worm left over from some twit downloading a game or music nine years ago. The second one is sitting in your calendar software, happily telling someone everything you write down.

Vance winces, and a second later fire flows through him. His kids keep their schedules on that calendar, too. So does Lara. That’s how they manage to get to see each other and get everything done. If they ever find who did this, he’s boiling that son of a bitch alive.

“We’re finding out, and as soon as we know who’s doing it, we’ll let you know, and you can decide to kill it or feed it crap. In the meantime,” Tim shuffles around a bit in the bag he had hiding under the bench, and then hands Vance a paper day planner. “Utterly unhackable.”

“And the third?”

Tim smiles grimly. “My date who’s still waiting for her chaperon.”

“Do I want to know?”

“Oh, I think you’ll find this very interesting. It’s new. Been in our system for about two years.”

Vance isn’t seeing how that’s interesting.
“And I’ll bet ten grand that Ajay Khan wrote it.”

Vance has to think for a moment, but only a moment, before he sees why this would be so interesting. “Uh huh.”

“Yeah. So how does a man in a federal prison, who as part of the conditions of his imprisonment has no access to a computer, stick a worm into our intranet?”

Leon purses his lips and then takes a sip of his coffee. He has an idea, and he’ll be interested to see what McGee comes up with on this. “That is interesting. Copy cat?” He doesn’t think it is, but, get the obvious out of the way, first.

“Could be, but I’m not feeling it. Why borrow the style of someone who can very easily prove he didn’t do it?” Tim pauses for a second, sees Vance about to ask, and answers his question, “No. He didn’t write it before he went in. It’s his style, his handwriting for lack of a better comparison, but he’s using some new phrases. They may not let him have a computer, but I’d bet he’s still keeping as up to date as he can with journals and magazines.”

Vance nods. “And what does this mean for us getting a secure computer system in place?”

“Not today. Not tomorrow. If we don’t find anything else, and we’re fast and lucky on the tracing back, Monday.” Tim sips his coffee. He’s not sure how much of talking to Vance Tony’s handling, or even how it worked out, but, “Have you talked to Tony?”

Vance nods. “Secure computers, McGee, as fast as you can get them.”

“I can have all of us set with new burner phones in an hour. How much more processing do you want?”

“Start with the phones. Secure communications is a good start.” Left unspoken is the idea that this is only a start.

“Since my ‘security sweep’ has found bugs in our code, now is probably a really good time to have the security guys sweep the whole building for listening devices.”

“I have a feeling that’ll be happening soon.”

“You’ve got that program where retirees can come in and work on cold cases, right?”

Vance nods.

“Good. Gibbs and I were talking about that. He’s going to take some time to brush up on his paperwork skills and then he’ll start coming in. He’s going a little stir crazy at home, nothing to do but heal up. So, I’ll probably end up tucking him in one of my cubicles and letting him work from there.”

Leon nods at that, too, smiling. “I’ll have to head down to see that.”

“I’m sure the pictures will get spread across the office pretty quick.” Tim checks his watch. “Khan’s lawyer is here by now. Time to see if I can get him to dance.”

“Let me know how it goes.”

Tim stands up, shoots of a lazy salute, and says, “On it, Boss.”
“Hey Abby,” Tony says as he heads into the lab. “Can we talk?”

Abby knows this is getting into risky territory. Between handing “everything” over to Metro yesterday and Tony skittering off after dinner for Quinten, and the dark cloud hovering over Tony’s head right now, she knows something very not good is up.

Actually the last time she felt this level of not good, she was running the bullet they pulled out of Hernandez and coming to a rather unwelcome conclusion about why he wasn’t breathing any longer.

So, serious look on her face, and characteristic spring in her step missing, she takes Tony into the ballistics lab for a “conference.” “How bad is it?” she asks when the door shuts.

Tony rolls his eyes, sighs, and rests, back against the door. “I need you to do two things.”

Abby nods.

“First off, make sure those samples that didn’t make it to Metro are safe. I know we’ve got them labeled with a different case, but… Now would be a really good time for them to go into the cold case deep freeze and get lost.”

Abby nods. “Retrievable lost?”

“Yeah, same with all of the result copies you’ve got. Find a home for them, and tell me about it Friday night.”

“Okay. I can do that. I have a feeling I’ll stay in for lunch when Zelaz heads off.”

“Good plan.”

“What’s number two?”

“Can you get DNA out of vomit?”

“Maybe. Depends on how fresh it is and how it’s been kept? The acid does a number on the DNA. Why, got some puke for me?”

Tony nods. “From about midnight. It’s in my freezer at home. Quinten lost it when I showed him the pictures. I want to know if his DNA matches the profile that matched the Dead Quinten.”

Abby likes that. “Ooh. Good question. Better question, I’ve still got Dead Quinten on a thumb drive, let’s see if he matches up with Live Quinten.”

“He shouldn’t.”

“You’re right, he shouldn’t, but if he does, that means something’s gone very hinkey. Oh, speaking of hinkey, last night, you had Ellie call Corwin, he’s been looking into Captain Trevor Boylt, trying to run him against out Dead Quinten. No dice. Boylt doesn’t exist.”

Tony shakes his head. “Yeah, thought that was a long shot. That’s probably the first thing they scrapped as soon as they knew this was in trouble.”
Abby smiles again. “Yeah. I thought of that as soon as I got in. So I did a different search. Did you know there are only six Naval Officers with a background in psychology or psychiatry who are a combination of African American and Vietnamese?”

“No.”

“And did you know only three of them had a father who was stationed in Vietnam?”

“Nope.”

Abby’s smiling. “And that one of them, Lt. Commander William Frakes, lived in Manassas, and died four days ago in a ‘car accident?’”

Tony lurches forward and kisses Abby. “I love you. And if you ever get tired of that hus— those three twits, I’m all yours!”

Abby laughs at that, giving Tony a gentle shove. “Find a way to get me your puke sample, and I’ll see what else I can find.”

“We still on for lunch?” Tony asks Ziva, making the first call of the day he’s looking forward to.

“Yes! Please! I’m starving and miss seeing you.”

“Me too. Can you swing by the apartment and grab something for me? It’s a little bag in the freezer. Uh… Don’t look inside. Just pack it in ice and bring it along?”

“I do not want to know what’s in the bag, do I?”

“Depends, Little D giving you any tummy issues today?”

“I am hungry, tired, and queezy.”

“Don’t look in the bag.”

“I will not look in the bag.” They’re quiet for a moment, not really wanting to hang up yet, not having much reason to stay on, either. “Okay. I’m going. See you in half an hour?”

“Yes!”

Tim heads back into interrogation.

Khan’s lawyer starts up before Tim’s even sitting down. “As per the terms of his conviction my client has not done any computer work in four years.”

Tim glances from Khan to his lawyer and back again. Then he laughs. “Okay. So, here’s the line. Either he’s suborning perjury for you, or you’re lying to him. Want me to leave for a few minutes so you can figure out which one you want me to add to the charges?"

The lawyer looks shocked, and Khan looks impressed. He knows who Tim is, now. “You’re the one I talked to over the phone last time.”

Tim smiles.

“Still working for Silent Sam and MovieBoy?”

“I’m all on my own now. So, what do you have to say about that bit of code?”

Khan shrugs. “You know I’m a mercenary. Make it worth my while, and I’ll sing you every song you ever wanted to hear.”

Tim checks his notes. “You’re in for ten years, right?”

Khan nods.

“Up for parole if you behave. Condition of your parole and release is monitoring to make sure you never use a computer again?”

Khan nods at that, too.

“I can get that shifted.”

Khan’s eyes light up, and he leans forward. “Better currency than cash.”

Tim inclines his head, agreeing. “We’ll be monitoring you, provide you with the computer.”

Khan smiles, and Tim knows that expression means, You’ll try.

Tim smiles back. I’ll succeed.

Khan shakes his head, almost like he’s looking forward to it. “A year from now, when I’m up for parole, we’ve got a date. They feed me problems. I solve them. They’ve got me doing it on paper, so I don’t get to see where my work goes, and there’s no shot of me… exploring on my own, but, for a month off my sentence and two grand per job, I solve whatever problems they give me.”

“And this one?” Tim lays his tablet down and flicks the screen saver off, showing Khan the same bit of code. And once again Khan lovingly… no… lustfully strokes the tablet.

“Three years ago.” Khan smiles. “I liked that one. It’s elegant.”

Tim nods. “It is. So elegant that I knew at a glance who wrote it.”

Khan inclines his head, taking the compliment. Then his eyebrows furrow slightly. If Tim’s this good at this, he’s got to know him. “Why don’t I know who you are?”

Tim smiles. “You do, or did. You’d recognize my work if you saw it.” Tim’s not famous among law enforcement for his… less visible work… but there are people who know about hacking Mossad and the CIA. He knows Khan is one of them. “Just don’t know my face.”

“Interesting.” Khan’s watching him, wondering, trying to put the face and voice to code.

“You have the same handler each time?” Tim asks. He’s going to be paying a visit to whoever runs this, soon.
“All four years. Should see Harvey again in December. He shows up once a season. He’s always got interesting problems for me.”

Tim smiles, dryly. “Wonderful. Let me guess, Harvey isn’t his real name, and you’ve got no idea which branch of the government he works for.”

Khan smiles back. “It could be his real name, and he might actually work for the CIA, but… If he did, he’s misbehaving.”

Tim nods. “What are you working on now?”

Khan leans back in his seat. “Come visit me, and I’ll show you my notes.”

Tim shakes his head, curt and fast. It’s probably been a long time since Khan got to play like this, and he’s enjoying it. “You have nothing but time. I don’t. How about you tell me what you’re working on, and save my some of mine?”

“Why would I want to do that?”

“Because I want you to imagine something. You’re out on parole. You’re in whatever little shack they let you live in. You’ve got some dead-end, minimum wage job, making subs at a sandwich shop or something, best you can find with that big, red FELON on your applications. But at the end of the day, you go home to that shack there’s you, and there’s the computer system I let you have. It’s beautiful. You’ve got a fifty inch plasma screen monitor, an Oculus, VIOS Quantum T4,” Khan’s eyes go wide at that, and he licks his lips, “and inside your sexy black computer case, sitting there, where the sixteen cores should be, is a Radio Shack 8088 processor older than you are.”

Khan looks pained at the idea of Tim pulling that sort of shit on him. He whimpers softly before saying, “You are Satan.”

Tim smiles. “The nicer you are to me, and the better the inside of that computer’s going to look.”

Khan glares. “I’ve got the code for Norton Anti-virus. I’ve got the code for Norton. You know, the company, how to get into their development system. I very much doubt Norton approves or knows what I’m doing. Harvey’s got me hacking into them, got to get into and out of them, clean, and then add a worm to the finished product. Anyone who buys a system with it already on it, or downloads it will end up with spyware on their system. Most people, most of the time, it just sits there doing nothing. Get on the wrong chat room, order the wrong product, work with the wrong people, get paid the wrong way, and it lights up, letting Harvey & Co. know what’s up.”

“Okay… That’s…” Tim’s staring at Khan. “Pros don’t use Norton, or a system that’d have it already installed.”

“Yep.” Khan smiles. “Won’t get you or me. Won’t catch any of the boogie men out there. It will catch disgruntled morons with a hard on for crypto-currency and conspiracy theories.”

“So, you’re going after…” Tim thinks through who that’d be. “That wouldn’t even be domestic cyber terrorism. That’s…”

Khan supplies, “The useful idiots. It gets them before they get paranoid. By the time they’re serious about going off the grid, they’re already on the radar.”

Tim sighs, rubbing his forehead. He nods his head. And, like Khan, he knows that “Harvey” isn’t CIA. Not by a long shot. But he knows who is looking to keep an eye on disgruntled Americans. “Harvey gives you all the jobs?”
“Yes.”

“That bit of code.” Tim taps the tablet. “Did he tell you where it was supposed to be used?”

Khan smiles. “Nope. But you all use the same intranet. You all upgrade at the same time. I didn’t even have to add a hack to get it in. Just had to write the code and they just plopped it right on it with the next upgrade. From what Harvey tells me, and from the fact you’re the only one who’s asked to visit, you’re the only one’s who’s found it.”

Tim nods. “Thank you.”

“What’s the inside of that computer look like now?” Khan asks eagerly.

“It’s got at least two cores. Might have four if Harvey’s who you’re suggesting he is.”

“Solid state drive?”

Tim laughs and stands up. “See you in a year.”

Tony slides into the booth, next to, as opposed to across from, Ziva. His arm wraps around her and they kiss. For a moment, they just hold on, reveling in quiet, gentle, awake touch.

Then Tony breaks the kiss. “Hi.” His fingers head to her belly. “Hello to you. You being nice to Mommy?”

Ziva rests her head on Tony’s shoulder. “He is being a little booger today. I want to eat everything I see and throw up, at the same time.”

“How does that even work?”

She rolls her eyes and takes a nibble of the saltines that started going everywhere with her on Friday. “Tell me what’s going on on your end.”

So he does, quietly, sitting in a restaurant, arm wrapped over her shoulder. He’s quick about it. Carlo’s is busy right now, and loud, so he’s not too worried, but sooner done, the less chance of being overheard.

“Leon’s got a lunch date with Jarvis, hopefully get us something good. How about you?”

“Abbi told me that she’s got Gibbs thinking about doing some computer work.”

Tony almost spit his drink out at that. “What?”

“He can’t pound pavement, or interrogate witnesses, but just like the rest of us he knows this is big. Once McGee gets the system secure…”

“Does Abbi have any idea how bad Gibbs is with a computer?”

Ziva holds up her hands in a no idea gesture as their waitress brings the food. Tony sees a huge, gorgeous grilled-chicken sandwich, crispy fries, and some very healthy looking salad. He then sees the waitress put the salad in front of him. His eyebrow rises as Ziva takes an ecstatic bite of the sandwich.

“I’m supposed to have lots of fat and calories. Your cholesterol is high.”

His eyes narrow, but he grabs a fork and takes a bite.

“So, other than making us laugh so hard we wet our pants when Gibbs takes out his gun and murders the computer about ten minutes into this, what is Gibbs on a computer supposed to accomplish?”

“Among other things, Abbi knows that a lot of people outside CGIS had to look the other way. I think the first thing she’s going have him do is figure out who got paid off outside of CGIS.”

“And I know we all want to know what happened with those accounts.”

“Yes. I suppose this could be coincidence…”

“But we don’t believe in coincidence.”

Ziva nods. “Too much all at once. Abbi thinks… well, wonders. You know,” her voice drops lower, “how Jarvis basically said that whatever McGee wanted, he could have, as long as he shut up until the election was over.”

Tony nods.

“She wonders if all of this sort of stuff coming to a head now is about making sure some sort of ugly news pops up before November. Wonders if everyone is getting little trails along these lines, hoping something will stick.”

Tony sighs. “The infamous October Surprise.”

“Yes. She thinks that there is likely someone or someones high enough placed to pull the strings to try and get this sort of news out now. She figures that something nasty is going to come out about Bush soon, and this…”

“Is supposed to come to a head in a few weeks and blow up so spectacularly that whatever it is that pops up about Bush looks minor by comparison,” Tony says.

“Or shoots Bush and Clinton both so badly that whoever is running Green or Libertarian stands a chance. Or, gives Warren or Paul a decent shot at winning a write in campaign,” Ziva adds.

“Abbi’s thinking that?” That sounds… a lot more politically aware than anyone in their family tends to be.

“Penny’s thinking that, but she got talking to Abbi about it.”

“Ahhh… That’s…” A whole lot bigger than anything they normally run into. “Do you think this crap was going on in ’12 and we were just too low on the totem pole to find out?”

Ziva shrugs. “That’s a question for Penny.” She chews another bite of her grilled chicken. “Or Leon. He’d know. Penny is speculating.”
For Leon, lunch is at Jarvis’ house.

He’s not in a good mood going into this. That little sheet of paper with the call off your dogs crap yesterday was a slap. And not a Gibbs slap, but a slap in the face.

Jarvis is a politician, he covers his own ass first, but he generally tries to not burn bridges until he’s sure he can no longer use them.

Which means this is either coming from way above Jarvis, and if DiNozzo’s right about who’s voice he heard, that would fit. Or it’s coming from below him, and someone’s about to have his ass handed to him.

Jarvis is waiting for Leon, sitting at the table on his patio, overlooking a lush backyard. Drinks, plates laden with BLTs, a bowl filled with chips, another with strawberries waits for them.

Jarvis stands up, pulling out Leon’s chair, gesturing for him to sit. “Leon.”

Leon shakes his head, sitting down. “You thought that bullshit order would work? Come on, Clayt, we’ve known each other too long and well for that.”

Clayton Jarvis smiles and shakes his head. “I told them it wouldn’t work. Told them you needed to be read in. They told me to make you go away.” Jarvis smiles very briefly. And Vance knows that Jarvis intentionally “handled it” so that Vance would be here, demanding answers, and then he’d be “forced” to give them.

How Jarvis got as high as he did isn’t a mystery.

“So…”

“I can’t give you the details. Everything needs to vanish on this.”

“Clayt…” Leon won’t take that. Not on this one. If he’s going to let his people risk their jobs, lives, and families by doing something illegal, he wants chapter and verse on why they’re doing it.

He also knows that he and Jarvis are dancing. He’s ‘wearing down’ Jarvis for someone, but he doesn’t know who they’re dancing for.

“Look, I’ve got orders on this.”

Leon nods. He thinks for a second. They’re here, at Jarvis’ house, they should be alone, but who knows if anyone is ever really alone these days. “We were soldiers once.”

Clayt nods, looking approving. He’ll say the things he has to say, but his face is showing that Leon’s saying the right things, too.

“You know what happens when soldiers start blindly following orders. Our parents put a lot of people in jail for ‘just following orders.’”

Jarvis nods. “My father was one of them. Still…”

“You know what we’ve been asked to do, destroy evidence. Make everything vanish. That’s not good, Clayt.”

“I know. I still have my orders and they come from the President.”
“We didn’t take an Oath to protect or serve him.”

Clayton nods again, again smiling at Leon. Who’s watching, who’s listening? Now he’s starting to wonder if this is some sort of bigger trap. If, after the mess at CGIS, they’re running shit like this at different agencies to see who actually obeys the law and who doesn’t.

“You’ve taken the President’s orders before,” Jarvis says.

Leon glances around. He knows exactly which orders Jarvis is talking about. Deering. A US Citizen, on US soil, executed without trial, on the order of the President. An order so illegal they have never spoken about it and all of the official paperwork shows that Gibbs killed him in self-defense.

“Clayt, I don’t think you understand how I, or NCIS, works. We don’t do ‘orders,’ not the way you’re talking about. You gave me an order, and I listened to it, and smiled, and so did Gibbs, both of us giving you our best looking respectfully at the Lieutenant expression, then, when you were gone, we sent Gibbs in to capture Deering. He was so sure he’d be able to do it, by talking alone, he didn’t even bring his gun.” Jarvis knows this is complete bullshit, but whoever may be listening wouldn’t. “He overestimated the sympathy he thought Deering held for him, and had to fight him off with his knife. No matter how it worked out, I can tell you that there was no shot at all of us following that order. Obama himself could have come in and given that order, and we would not have followed it.”

Jarvis nods again, still smiling. Leon’s sure that whatever is watching or listening to them is behind Jarvis. He looks around, eyes skirting over the backyard. There’s an acre of grass, a playset that’s a bit too young for Jarvis’s now tween-aged kids, and beyond that bushes and trees. Leon doesn’t see anything in the woods, but if it had been done properly, he wouldn’t.

“So you are saying, that without additional information, you cannot possibly acquiesce to what you’ve been asked to do?” Jarvis says.

Vance shakes his head. “Last time a President requested evidence be destroyed, that didn’t work out well for anyone.”

“So, read you in?”

“I can’t help you until I know this is legal.”

“And let me guess,” Jarvis says, dryly amused, more of what Leon thinks of as ‘real Jarvis’ as opposed to ‘politician Jarvis’ coming out, “if you aren’t satisfied, we’ve got trouble because you won’t let this go?”

Leon smiles. “Make sure I’m satisfied.”

Jarvis leans back in his chair and sips his iced-tea. “We know who did it. We have them in custody. We know why. We know who the intended targets are and were. This case is completely closed.”

Leon blinks. “And instead of telling us this…”

Jarvis inclines his head. “Benghazi was embarrassing enough. What they left at the scene would have been worse. It was ‘sanitized’ twenty hours before you got in contact with me to find out who was supposed to be in that room. And, until you talked to me about it, I didn’t know what was going on. As soon as you called me, and I started making noise, I got read in.”

“And who, precisely, would this have been embarrassing to?” Though Leon knows who Benghazi was embarrassing to, so he’s got a good idea.
Jarvis shakes his head.

“Who is Daniel Quinten?”

Another head shake.

“Is he still alive?”

Jarvis looks curious about that. “Why wouldn’t he be?”

“The Secret Service has him.”

Now Jarvis looks nervous. “Shit,” he says softly. “When did that happen?”

Leon gets Jarvis up to date, and Jarvis looks more and more upset as he hears about what’s happened with Quinten. When he gets done telling about the Secret Service Men in Black, Leon once again he asks, “Who is Daniel Quinten?”

Jarvis mouths a few extremely rude phrases. “A psychiatrist. He works with people who suffer from PTSD. He does a lot of research into the chemical imbalances of a PTSD mind, especially in young adults and adolescents.”

Leon’s nodding.

“In his day job, he works at coming up with better ways to manage the issue. His biggest breakthrough in how to manage these issues is in understanding the exact, base chemical imbalances for each person with PTSD. From there, he’s working on finding ways to cure it.”

“Which is very important for our soldiers returning from traumatic adventures abroad.”

“Yes. With the help of the Army and the VA, we are bankrolling a lot of his official research exactly for that purpose. But, his baseline tests have another purpose. Brain chemistry is delicate. Mess with it in certain ways and you can cripple a man.”

Leon’s eyes go wide. “Was he… weaponizing PTSD?”

“Not… weaponized. You know there are still ‘assets’ all over the world, and some of them are less than perfectly willing to talk. Torture doesn’t do much. They just say whatever they can to get us to stop. And, it makes us look bad.

“Depression, fear, that’s a different story… They treat them well, give them good food, keep them comfy, and mess with their neurochemistry, and then they talk. The more the asset talks, the more they back off on the chemicals, the better the asset feels.”

Leon blinks slowly. That’s… He swallows. “Just talk to me, tell me how you’re feeling, it’ll help. Everything is confidential. You’re safe… blah, blah, blah…”

Jarvis half shrugs. “It works. It’s cleaner than anything else we’ve tried. No one’s complaining about loud music, messing with their sleep, or waterboarding. Outsiders can come in and ‘investigate’, they can show them everything, and other than the fact that the assets are depressed and anxious, which is perfectly normal for men in their condition, there’s nothing wrong with them, and they make sure the assets are getting top shelf care. It’s a PR win and an information gathering win.”

“Quinten was the real target?”

Jarvis nods. “From what we can tell, they think they got him. Chatter indicates they believe he’s dead."

“And this act of war, murder the scientist and…”

“And if the scene had been found by anyone else first, they would have found a lot of evidence of us using extremely illegal interrogation techniques, in addition to a formal declaration of war between us and... It doesn’t matter. They can’t fight a real war, not here, but it would have been an impressive PR win for them, nightmare for us.”

Leon’s eyes close again and he takes a deep drink of his previously untouched iced tea. They never got all of the Benghazi guys, and if he’s reading Jarvis’ unsaid words correctly, the same group is claiming credit all over again. Which, six weeks from the election, would be the end of Hillary.

“Why are you worried about the Secret Service having him?”

Jarvis inclines his head a bit. “They protect their own. The President... The Ex-Presidents… and his family. Some of them are still very close to the Clintons. If a man will take a bullet for you, he’ll likely put one in someone for you, too.”

“And the men who killed Trevor Boylt? Is there actually a Tervor Boylt?”

“Not by that name. Quinten never knew precisely who he was dealing with.”

That triggers a question for Leon. He thinks for a second and realizes Jarvis stopped saying ‘we’ and started saying ‘they’ when he began talking about the interrogation side of Quinten’s work. “Was he dealing with us?” They Navy does interrogation. They soften up assets. They fund research. They are not, by any extent, one of the major players on that game.

“He was for his official research. He thought he was for his ‘unofficial’ research.”

“That’s why you weren’t brought in until I called you.”

Jarvis smiles slightly. “And why I have ‘orders’ to follow, too.”

“Do I get to know who he was working for?”

“If I knew, I’d tell you. But we can both guess, can’t we?”

“Not a huge list.”

Jarvis shakes his head. “Just two.” He takes another drink. “What can I tell the President?”

“About what I’m going to do?”

“Yes.”

Leon steeples his fingers in front of his face, thinking of how to phrase this. “I only met President Reagan once. He gave a short talk at Annapolis while I was there. I didn’t love a lot of his politics, but there was one thing he said that I’ve always thought made a lot of sense. ‘Trust, but verify.’ When I’m sure the dead man in a Naval apartment has been given as much justice as he can get, I’ll back off.”

Jarvis nods, takes out his phone, sends a text. “I told them that, too. DiNozzo’s going to get a folder soon. We don’t know who was in that room. Don’t know who ‘Captain Trevor Boylt’ really was. But, one thing we do know is who’s on the camera going in and out when the actual murder occurred. And we know the men who killed him are… detained.”
Footage gets Leon’s attention. “We have footage of--”

“Like I said, ‘sanitized.’ You don’t have this footage. But DiNozzo will by this afternoon. Call me when you’ve gone through it.”

Leon nods in agreement. He’s tempted to mention the rest of what’s going on, but if there is someone listening, now isn’t the time, so he reaches for his sandwich and takes a bite. After a few chews he says, “This is good.”

“Thanks,” Leon eats a chip. "It's all in the mayonnaise..." and gets talking about his wife’s mayonnaise-making technique.
“You want to tell me about the deal Khan and ‘Harvey’ have?” Tim asks Khan’s lawyer as he sees him out.

The Lawyer shakes his head. “I don’t know about it.”

“You expect me to believe that Mr. Mercenary in there ran a deal like that without going through you?”

“I’ve been Mr. Khan’s counsel for the last six months. This deal pre-dates me, and I am unaware of its details.”

Tim shakes his head. “Lovely. Why are you new?”

“My predecessor had a heart attack and retired.”

That sounds like a perfectly good reason to get a new lawyer to Tim. “I’ll have our legal department write up the details for his parole. He will get a computer. It will work, and we will monitor everything he does on it. If he behaves, he’ll keep it. If he more than behaves, he’ll get upgrades.”

“Sounds like you might want to cultivate a working relationship?” The Lawyer looks interested in that angle.

“Rule Number Five.” The Lawyer just stares. Tim shakes his head, brushing the comment off. “Let’s see how this works out. But, I’m aware of how difficult it is for people with specialized skills to find work using those skills after time in prison. Might be better to keep the dog on a leash and toss it treats than have it get free and start chewing on the neighbors.”

The Lawyer raises an eyebrow at that. “You have a way with words, Mr. McGee.”

“Thank you. Do you think you have a copy of that deal?”

“I should. I’ll check my files, and if you get a subpoena or if Mr. Khan allows you to see it…”

Tim nods, he knows the routine. “If I need the subpoena, let me know, I’ll get it.”

“Girl talk, huh?” Diane says as she sits down across from Abbi at Elaine’s. That’s the official reason for this chat.

Abbi smirks a little. “We can gossip and braid each other’s hair if you like.”

They both hold an almost serious face for a second and then start laughing, the image of a girly sleepover party hitting them hard with its ridiculous silliness.

“Lord, something big must be up. Is it time to start investing in shotguns and canned goods?” Elaine asks, bringing Diane a Coke and Abbi a black coffee.

“Not quite, yet. I need to talk to an accountant, and look, an accountant,” Abbi says.
Diane tips her head. “For the time being.”

Abbi raises an eyebrow and Elaine’s listening, too. “I’ve been given a promotion. My own auditing department. Got the whole upper-mid west under my command. All I have to do is be willing to relocate to Bismarck, North Dakota.”

“Now that’s just flat out wrong!” Elaine says. “You sit tight, I’ll be back in a sec. We’re taking care of you.”

Diane nods. “Yes. And if I’m not willing to relocate… Times are tough, budgets are tight, we’re overstaffed here in DC. You know the spiel.”

Abbi smiles grimly. She knows the spiel. “Got anything in your office you love?”

Diane shrugs. “Not too much. Nothing I couldn’t send someone in to get for me.”

“Good. Grab your phone and tell your boss what he can stick and where he can stick it. We’ve been wondering how to get you working on this and hiding it. Screw that. I need every good auditor I can get for my legit jobs, and we need someone to run the money for the bigger case on the sly. As of now, you’re working for CGIS.”

Diane starts to laugh at that. She’s still laughing when Elaine’s back with two slices of double chocolate mocha cake with espresso sauce and a scoop of coffee ice cream.

Abbi looks at the desserts and nods. “That’s perfect, Elaine, thanks.”

Diane’s laughter trails off to soft chuckles as she takes a bite of the cake. “It is perfect. This is exactly what I need right now.”

“And what’s got you so happy all of a sudden?” Elaine asks.

“I’m imagining the look on Leroy’s face when she tells him she’s hired me.”

Abbi and Elaine laugh at that, too.

“Trust but verify, huh?” Tony says to Vance.

“That’s the idea.”

They’re sitting in Vance’s office. Tony looks at the manila folder in Vance’s desk. It’s thin, really thin, and has two thumb drives taped to the outside. “Then we’ll do some verifying. You think he was giving you good intel?”

“I think I was being tested, and I think he was telling me what he’s been told. Or what he’s been told to tell me.”

Tony inclines his head. “I’ve got two new, interesting thoughts for you. First of all, Abby found Captain William Frakes, who died a few days ago, he fit the basic description of the infamous ‘Boylt.’”

Leon nods. “Probably not the guy. But dig deeper into him, too. See if there’s a body to even run a match with.” He thinks for a moment as Tony makes a note. “I’d be really interested in seeing how many operatives Homeland Security and CIA have who match that basic description.”

“I’ll get her on it. Also, Penny’s got an idea floating around. Namely, this is the different sides trying to make sure that crap comes out now, right before the election, and skews the results.”

Leon finds himself reaching for the toothpicks he no longer keeps in his desk. Right now he wants to literally and figuratively chew on that idea.

“Did this kind of stuff happen in ’12?” Tony asks.

Leon shakes his head. “But it wouldn’t have. That one wasn’t even close. We knew how it was going to come down by September.” He thinks some more. “And no matter who wins this one, the current power structure is going to change. Bush won’t keep many of Obama’s crew, and Hillary won’t keep most of them. They’ve got their own teams. They’ll only hold onto people who pull out all the stops for getting them elected, or who know where so many bodies are buried that they can screw them to hard if they get fired.” Leon thinks about that some more. Now he wants one of the cigarettes he replaced with toothpicks. “That would explain a lot of what I’m seeing from Jarvis.”

“He doesn’t want to retire, does he?”

“Can’t imagine he does. One of these days, I should sit down and talk to Penny. I have a feeling that would be a fascinating conversation.” He thinks some more. “In 2008 no one knew enough about me to make trying any play like this with NCIS a good plan.” Then he starts to wonder about Shepard’s death. May of 2008, just as primary season was heating up. He wonders if that was part of a plan to make her and Aviles and by extension, Bush, look bad. From everything he’s seen of her record, The Frog stuff would embarrass the hell out of NCIS if it came to light. But she got into a shootout, and a possibly embarrassing leader hand-picked by the then SecNav to be one of the few women heading a Federal Military Agency, thus polishing the rather lackluster Republican feminist credentials, vanished, and her record with her. “Eight years later they know who I, and my people, are. I think we’re getting played.”

Tony inclines his head. “Thirty-six. Question is, was all the stuff with CGIS part of the game? Were they moving so far behind the scenes that they sprang that audit on Abbi to put something like this in motion, or are they taking advantage of a crisis?”

Leon blows out a frustrated breath. “I don’t know. I’m not even sure who’d be that far back and well-connected to do things like this.”

“I bet Jarvis does.”

Leon nods, slowly. “I bet Jarvis is one.”

“Harvey Wallbanger!” Tim mutters to himself, staring at the visitor’s log FCI Cumberland sent over for Khan. Bad enough the visits are unsupervised and unrecorded, but this fucker didn’t even bother to come up with a believable cover name.

No wonder Khan’s so amused by him.

He gets the warden on the line, fast. “You let ‘Harvey Wallbanger’ come and visit, unsupervised, one of the most dangerous cyber felons you have?"

“Excuse me?” The Warden isn’t so much not on the same page as Tim, as not in the same book. In fact, given how stupefied he sounds at this question, it’s entirely possible he was watching TV.

“Get the visitor’s log your people just sent me up on your computer. Ajay Khan. Apparently your crew has allowed ‘Harvey Wallbanger’ to visit him for five hours at a go, once every season.”

There’s an embarrassed silence on the other line along with the sound of clicking, followed by quiet cursing.

“I want everything you have on Harvey, starting with how he set foot into your building and got this sort of access and ending with the fingerprints and photos you’re supposed to take of all visitors.”

“I have to che—“

“And if you so much as hint that I can’t have this information, tomorrow, on the front page of The Drudge Report will be an in depth story, with documentation, about how your prison allows convicted cybercriminals to hack into US Government operating systems and plant worms in them.”

“Ten minutes.”

“That’s exactly what I want to hear. Thank you.” Tim hangs up.

“Good lunch, Tony?” Abby asks as he heads down to her lab.

“Yeah. Nice to actually see Ziva when she’s awake.”

Abby smiles. “I know how that works.”

Tony glances around, not seeing anyone else. “I’ve got a present for you.”

“Good.” Abby holds out her hand, taking the baggie, and heading over to grab a pipette and a vial. She’s handling the puke while she says, “I put my devious conspiracy hat on, and another thought hit me, so I decided to try something.”

“What?” Tony’s wincing. The contents of that bag weren’t exactly nice to begin with, and freezing and thawing didn’t improve things.

“Okay. So, they gave us this profile, and I ran it, and it matched Dead Quint.”

“Okay.” He’s following along so far.

“But we couldn’t find Dead Quint on any other database.”

Tony nods. “Still with you.”

Abby grins, enjoying where her devious hat took her, and that it paid off. “What I got wondering is, what if the profile they sent us was a dummy?”

Tony squints at her.
“What if you set up a profile that was designed to automatically match whatever sample you set it against? It'll all digital data. They sent us an electronic copy of ‘Quinten’s’ DNA, not a sample that I could independently run. They know how our systems work, put the data in, and run it, and if it matches, woo hoo party time, and if it doesn’t, go find more samples. But, no one looks at the base data. It’s not like we’re running gels off of it. What they sent us was just numbers of code on a thumb drive, and there’s a lot of different things you can put on a thumb drive.”

Tony’s still squinting at her, but he’s starting to think he gets this. “So… you’re thinking they sent you…”

Abby pulls him to the plasma, and throws up four screen grabs. They’re each the little chart that pops up when there’s a DNA match. “A profile that would match anyone. I ran it against me. Match. I ran it against Tim. Match. I ran it against Zelaz. Match. There in the bottom corner, that’s ‘Dead Quint.’ They’ve run this play before.”

Tony nods. And sighs. “Let me get you up to date on what’s going on with Vance, and what Jarvis says happened.” So Tony does.

Abby listens, not asking too many questions, just absorbing right now. Then she nods her head. “Well, we’ve verified this part of it was complete BS. I’m going to get onto “Boylt” who is apparently not Captain Frakes…”

“But I’ll see if I can get a sample of some sort just to make sure.”

Abby nods at that. “Thorough, good. Speaking of thorough, I didn’t have time to try anyone who was outside of the military, but… Two groups… He’s thinking Homeland and CIA?”

“Yeah.”

“I’m going to check every employee they’ve got on the list. See if I can get a collection of possibilities.”

Tony’s not feeling like that’ll do much. “Probably won’t hit anything. This guy’s likely been wiped out of the system completely.”

Abby nods along with that. “Probably, but not certainly. I’m also going to widen my DNA search to look for parents, siblings, and kids. They think they can hide him, but not from me! McGee and I found Ari, and we will find ‘Boylt!’”

Tony nods at that. “Good.”

“Who’s still in your accounting department?” Diane asks Abbi as they dig into the cake.

“No one above the rank of payment processor, and I’d have gotten rid of all of them but I need someone to pay the bills.”

“All of them?”

“If they worked in my accounting department it means they were either in on it, or so bad at their job they didn’t notice us hemorrhaging money right and left. I mean… how do you not notice every single bill you’re paying is past due?”

Diane shakes he head. “That’s Federal standard. None of us pay our bills on time. Medicare and Medicaid are so bad, they got a legal exemption so all they have to do is tell you they got the bill within ninety days.”

“Please tell me you’re kidding me,” Abbi says.

“Nope. So, what do you want me doing?”

Abbi thinks. “I haven’t hired anyone on the accounting side because I’ve got the GAO— “

Diane laughs.

“What?”

“You know how combat troops respond to National Guard troops?”

“Yeah…” Diane’s slowly nodding. “Weekend warriors playing at being soldiers.” Though she’s known some fine National Guardsmen, she also knows that it’s a really bad idea for them to get talking about how tough their job is if they’re in a room of Iraq or Afghanistan vets.

“That’s how the IRS sees the GAO, and the CBO is even worse. They’re told ahead of time what result they’re going to get.”

Diane looks at her curiously.

“It’s complicated. Just leave it at this, if you tailor the questions correctly and then specify exactly what information you can use to get your answer, you will always get the answer you set out to find. That’s how the GAO works.”

“That’s not how you work?”

Diane wiggles her fingers. She knows from the outside that it might look that way. “As an institution, we… they work on the premise of ‘You are guilty of something, and we will catch you at it.’ We know we’re the Grand Inquisitors of the modern age, and we’re not shy about it. But we don’t set out with a plan for why you’re guilty, and, we do, on occasion, actually run into people who aren’t guilty, so we let them go.”

“So, the GAO showed up either to make sure everyone knew we were screwing the pooch, or to cover up the rumors of it?”

“And they were going to make sure to only look at whatever would prove whatever position they took. No matter what you had sent it, they would have come up with the correct answer.”

Abbi squints a bit, wondering what answer they were supposed to get. Doesn’t matter now. “And if I set you free on my books and all of the higher ups in my accounting department…”

Diane looks smugly pleased and confident. She takes a satisfied sip of her cola. “They’ll hate me. They’ll fear me. The ones that you’ve got in jail won’t leave. The ones who aren’t in jail better run, because by the time I’m done, you’ll have what you need to indict them. And if, by some miracle or grand accident someone in there was just too damn stupid to be in on it, I’ll let him go.”

“Excellent. And in your free time.” Both Diane and Abbi smile at the idea of ‘free time’ “I’ll give you a badge, access to a secure system, and free range to find out who’s screwing the pooch in the IRS.”

Diane looks very pleased with that. Then another though hits her. “I’ll be curious to see the jurisdictional issues on that.”

“If Leon and I can’t cover that, we’ll square it with Fornell, who does have jurisdiction, and if he can’t get it, I’m sure I know someone who can get this all over the internet, and do it clean.”

Diane smiles. “Anything else you want before I start rampaging around your system?”

“Here’s an idea McGee and I have bounced around. Apparently the Navy’s noticed that it’s got money, little fees, getting sucked out of payments to retired vets. They just, as best as he can tell, vanish. He and Leon are thinking that instead of the money leaving those pay outs, it never went into it, and instead it’s getting skimmed off, maybe into fraudulent payments to vets who don’t exist or aren’t breathing anymore. If they’re playing it at the Navy, they may be doing it at the Coast Guard, too. So, I’ve got my new pension guy checking to see that all of our payments are going to people who are breathing and qualify for them.

“If he finds ones that aren’t, I want to know where that money goes. Don’t freeze it or stop it, not until we’ve got the whole scope. But we’re thinking that, if you were skimming money off, you’d bounce it into account A, and there are thousands of account As so they’re pretty much untraceable, and then from there, you reconsolidate into account B.”

Diane smiles. “Oh, yeah. I know that scam. Sophisticated people actually bop it into account Q or R.” She sips her coke, finger tapping the edge of the glass… “I haven’t run this at the IRS, not personally, but we’ve done versions of this. None of us have ever thought to see if the scam comes from the inside. But, I do know, every year we get a few ‘Forty-million in refund checks sent to one post office box’ stories. And we still haven’t caught the guys who do it.” She takes another sip. “That’s where we’ll start, checks. Let’s see how many of the damn things you’re sending to the same place, or are being deposited into the same accounts. You sure you don’t want me to put a stop to them as soon as I see them? Killing those checks has saved the IRS a lot of money over the years.”

“Not yet. We’re not going to move on this until we’re ready to take the whole thing out. You know what a hydra is?”

Diane smiles slowly. “I have a teenage daughter who’s into all things geek.” She’s a little irked by that, but it’s what Emily likes, so she tries to be supportive of it. And, granted, some bits of it, like going to watch Captain American movies, are easier to support than others. “Yes, I know what a hydra is. And if you lean over and whisper Hail Hydra to me, I’m sprinting out of here.”

Now Abbi looks confused and Diane waves it off. “Obviously Chucky doesn’t have you over for family movie night.”

Confused slips to irked, from context she knows who Chucky has to be, but she’s not sure why. “Chucky?”

“McGee.”

Abbi’s still looking confused.

“Sterling was missing, I called in Leroy and Tobias, I snapped at Leroy, called him ‘Woodchuck’ and a few minutes later was calling McGee, ‘Chucky,’ you know, the little woodchuck, and that one stuck. Back to your allusion.”
Abbi shakes her head with a small laugh, little woodchuck, okay, yeah, she kind of likes that. Then she takes a sip of her coffee, looks Diane straight in the eye, and says, “With this case, I’m done cutting off heads. We’re not going to strike until we can stab the fucker in the heart and kill it.”

Diane grins, wide, happy, open smile. “Oh, I’m going to like working for you.”

Tony, Draga, Vance, and Bishop are in MTAC, watching the un-edited footage of the hallway outside of the apartment they found “Boylt” in. It’s hard to tell exactly who is who, the footage isn’t great and the angle could be better, but they’re all pretty sure that the guy they’re watching walk down the hall, in a Navy uniform, is “Boylt.”

He heads to the apartment, unlocks it and heads in.

In the original version of this footage, the version they saw the first time, when they were trying to figure out who went in and out, the man who walked in was not wearing a uniform, or, for that matter, African American. But, a man, white, middle aged, did walk in, and in this version, he’s nowhere to be seen.

They fast forward, an hour of nothing on the screen. Then two more men walk down the hall, and then stop at the door. One knocks. There’s a pause. Then Boylt starts to open the door, but from the look of it, realizes this isn’t who’s supposed to be there. He tries to shut the door. The first man, who knocked, shoves the door back, hard, catching Boylt in the head with it, while the second one… Tony thinks it’s a Taser in his hand, zaps Boylt, who drops like a sack of wet oatmeal.

They shove the door open, grab Boylt, drag him in, and shut the door. A few seconds later, they see a neighbor look out, but not seeing anything, he goes back into his place.

Another two hours of nothing. And then, both men walk out of the apartment and stroll out of the building.

None of that was on the version they’d seen before.

There’s nothing else involving that apartment for ten more hours. It’s the next morning when a new man goes to the apartment, puts the key in the lock, and heads in. Also, not on the official version. He doesn’t leave, but an hour after that, a man goes in. He picks the lock, and enters.

That part they had seen before. Apparently he was the first wave of “sanitizing” the situation.

The visitor with the key leaves. Also edited out of the official copy.

The lock picker waits, and waits. Eight more hours go by, and then the delivery people come in. They lug in three huge boxes. When this is happening the door is wide open, and though they can’t see much of the apartment at that time, the little bit they can see looks fine.

“They really were delivery guys,” Bishop adds. “No idea anything was up.”

Draga’s nodding. “And,” he points to the man on the screen, the lock picker, who signed his delivery so badly they have no idea what his name may have been, “He matches the description they gave of who they were delivering to.”

They see the delivery guys lugging out the old fridge, dishwasher, and stove, and then the door closes and stays closed.
Hours later they see the lock picker, in a new outfit, very carefully step out of the apartment. Once again the angle isn’t great, but they can see the blood puddle on the floor and the door smearing through it as it opens and closes.

He leaves, and three hours later Tony and Jimmy are staring into the apartment trying to figure out what to do next.

“What’s on the next one?” Leon asks. They’ve got two video clips.

The second one is… Grim. Tony thinks that the guy they’re looking at is the one with the Taser. It’s hard to tell for sure. But he’s got a similar build, and he’s singing like a blue jay about killing ‘Quinten.’

“That explains why Jarvis thought they thought they got Quinten. That’s not chatter, that’s a confession,” Vance says.

“Uhhh…” Bishop says, thinking.

Draga licks his lips. “This feel wrong to anyone else?”

All three heads nod. This feels like watching a cop show on TV. Real confessions have a feel to them. Actors playing a confession feel different. This feels faked.

“Let’s start with who takes out a hit on a man without knowing something as basic as what he looks like,” Tony says.

“Abby’s got to get eyes on the two digital files, see which one is altered,” Draga says.

Bishop nods. “Yeah. Also, um… where did the body parts go? The delivery guys. The ones we were certain were delivery guys… They picked up the old stuff. We’re still missing a lot of ‘Boylt’ so… It had to go out with the stuff they removed right?”

Everyone’s nodding at that, too.

“So, umm… what kind of delivery company doesn’t start yelling when they notice a pair of arms and legs in the fridge?” Bishop says.

“The kind that immediately junks the old stuff?” Draga asks.

Tony’s shaking his head. “No, it was fairly new, and there’s no way they wouldn’t scavenge out the useful parts. At least, if they were a real company, that’s what they’d do. If we were getting played by another layer of the ‘sanitation crew’ they’d have just tossed the stuff.”

“We printed the door, didn’t get any matches, and I’m not seeing anything on the feed where it got wiped off. Not on the outside,” Draga says. “Sir, could you… um… request that we get to take our own fingerprints from,” he gestures to the man on the screen.

Vance stares at the screen, where everything is just too perfect. “I can make that request. What do you want to bet that we’ve already traded these two for ‘higher value assets’ so we ‘no longer have access to them.’”
Tim’s staring at the document in front of him. It’s Khan’s copy of the deal he’s got. According to this, “Harvey Wallbanger” of the “CIA” had entered into an agreement with Ajay Khan for freelance work in exchange for money and a reduction in sentence.

According to the follow-up paperwork, Kenneth Jalbray, the judge who sentenced Khan, agreed to this set up, gave it his seal of approval, and sent the prison the okay to bend his ‘no computer work of any kind’ ruling.

And according to what the prison sent him, it just went along, all hunkey-dorey on the idea that this unknown, unnamed, unaffiliated dude from… God alone knew where, could just walk on in and do business with Khan.

He’s sitting slumped over, with his forehead pressed to the top of his desk, not sure if he wants to scream or cry, when a quiet knock gets his attention. It’s Manner.

“Bad news?”

Tim straightens up and rubs his eyes. “I’ve had worse. What do you have?”

“We’ve found two more.” He closes the door behind him, and sits on the corner of Tim’s desk, laying his tablet in between them. “That one,” he points to the bit of code on the top, “is yours.”

Tim nods. It is.

“And you’re right, it anyone uses it, it’ll let you know.”

Tim smiles at that, too. “What’s this one?”

“Don’t know yet.” Manner’s fingers hover over the code. It’s… diamond in the rough material. The work of someone with really great ideas but no discipline. Tim wouldn’t have had the idea for this on his own, but seeing it, he can refine it down, make it into something beautiful. “Teeny bopper out of who knows where.”

Tim nods at that. “It does look young.”

“Let me guess, if I can find who wrote it, you want to give him a job offer?”

Tim raises an eyebrow. “Let’s see who it is first, but…” he looks back down… “Tell me you don’t want to know who came up with that.”

Manner rolls his eyes. “He’s sixteen, hasn’t left his bedroom in two weeks, probably smells like it, too, and thinks dick jokes are the funniest thing ever. No, I don’t want to meet him. In ten years, when he’s potty trained and knows how to wash properly, then I’ll want to meet him.”

Tim laughs at that. “We all started somewhere.”

“One baby is enough. Don’t need a department full of them.”

Tim glances at his screen. “Our baby did a good job. She’s the one who found the intranet worm.”

Manner nods, grudgingly. “Yeah, she did.”

“Wanna guess who she just outed? I know you know him.”
Manner looks like he’s in pain at this idea. “Who?”

“Ajay Khan.”

Manner is pale. He started off having lost the melanin lottery and works underground all day. Tim didn’t think it would even be possible for Manner to go paler, but he does at the mention of that name. “He’s in prison! He’s…” Manner’s eyelid is twitching. Tim’s seen him pissed but, he’s so angry he’s about to stroke out. “That’s the fucker that got Jim killed. What… How… I… No. NO! He is not writing code again. He is…”

“Working for the CIA supposedly. I’ve got it.”

Manner’s breathing hard and fast.

“Steve, calm down. I know how it feels when the knife in your back twists. I’ve got this. Go work or go home, but calm yourself down.”

Manner nods, stiffly, and turns and exits, fast.

Tim sighs; he’d forgotten that Khan wasn’t just an annoyance with a computer. He rubs his temples. He’s already made the one deal, but any chance of working with him on any other level is shot to shit. ‘Don’t waste good…’ He’s good. Really good. And it’s better to keep the mercenary in your pocket than at your throat, but… No one who was here in ’12 would ever work with him, or trust Tim, if he hired Khan for anything.

He sighs again, and then looks back at the agreement in his hand. Given what Khan’s current project is supposed to do, he’s got an idea of who’s running it, and it sure as hell isn’t he CIA. He pulls his phone out of his pocket. “Hey, Bishop. Can you talk?”

“McGee wants to talk.” Bishop says to Tony, covering her phone.

“No problem. Go talk, and while you’re at it, get him to take you to see Penny.”

“Sure? I could be…”

“Go, do. Talk to her. Talk to McGee. Draga and I are going to go through this with a fine tooth comb and see if we can find any independent confirmation of anything we’ve been given.”

Bishop puts her phone back to her ear. “I’ve got time to talk. And a request from Tony that you take me to meet your grandmother.”

Tim’s eyebrows shoot up on his end of the phone. He shakes his head for a second and then says, “Go get a car. I’ll give her a call.”

It occurs to Tim as he’s heading to the motor pool and texting his grandmother, that he should probably get his butt upstairs and find out what’s going on a tad more often than he’s been doing lately.

Then he remembers they went after Quinten last night, not six days ago, and that maybe it’s excusable that he hasn’t gotten the details, yet.

Bishop’s leaning against the side of the black Mercury, waiting for him.

She tosses him the keys, which because she’s tossing them a bit high to his right side, he misses, and has to crouch down to grab after they clink against the concrete.

“Oh, God, sorry McGee. I forgot.”

“That that side isn’t working so hot, or that I’m a lefty,” he says from the ground.

She’s wincing as he straightens up with the keys. “I didn’t know the one and forgot the other.”

Tim nods, keys in hand, and she quickly opens the driver’s side door for him. “I can get my own doors. I’m, mostly, all healed up. Just regaining speed and strength now.”

“Oh, God, sorry McGee. I forgot.”

“Okay.” She gets in on her side and there’s a quiet moment as they pull out.

“So… What did you want to talk about?” Bishop asks. She’s seen Tim around, talked to him a few times, and he’s pulled her down to work on a few cases, but they’ve never really worked together, let alone spent any time alone with each other.

“All the stuff you’re not supposed to say about your old job.”

Bishop looks uncomfortable. “Uh… Most of it’s classified.”

“Get ready to declassify. I’m not asking as a co-worker, I’m asking as the Director of Cybercrime for NCIS pursuing an active investigation into an attack on our system, and if you like, I will get a court order to cover you.”

She nods. “Just make sure you get it before you act on anything I tell you. I’d prefer not to go to prison.”

He hands Bishop his cell phone. “Hit Gibbs’ number and put it on speaker.”

Bishop does, and a moment later they hear, “You got something to add to my reading list?”

Tim smiles at that. “Nah. Need a favor.”

Gibbs sounds interested as he says, “What’s up?”

“Can you get Bleach to write a subpoena to cover everything Eleanor Bishop might tell me about her time at the NSA.”

Tim can feel Gibbs nodding, and starting to wonder what happened in the five hours since he’s seen Tim.

“I’ll ask.”

“Thanks, Jethro. Gonna need it dated yesterday.”

“I’d bet. I’ll see him as soon as I can.”
“Yes. Thanks. If you need a ride, I can drive…” Tim thinks about when it is, and how long this conversation with Penny should go, “round about dinnertime. You, me, Kelly, maybe Abby if she’s free, we could get supper with Bleach and Mrs. Bleach.”

“Nah. I think Duck’s free, maybe we’ll be old, retired guys together.”

“Sounds like a plan. Let me know when you’ve got it.”

“Will do.” And then they’ve got a dial tone.

“Can he do that?” Bishop asks. “I mean, Bleach is a judge, right?”

Tim nods. “Old Marine buddy of Jethro and Abbi’s.”

“Abby was in the Marines?” Bishop looks stunned by that idea.

Tim laughs for a second realizing which Abby Bishop’s thinking of. “No. Jethro’s Abbi, Director Borin…” Bishop knows who that is. “Bleach was one of her instructors and he came up with Jethro.”

“Oh.” Bishop looks like the world makes sense again. “So, I mean… he can give me a piece of paper to let me talk.”

Tim shakes his head. “If what I think is happening is happening, by the time we’re done with this, no one will care if you talked.”

Bishop’s looking disturbed by that. “Okay. What do you think is happening?”

“As part of letting you guys really do your jobs, I’m making sure our systems are clean.” He turns left when the GPS sends him on a traffic avoiding detour. “We’re not clean. Not by a long shot. One of the worms hiding in our code was written by someone I knew.”

“Who?”

Tim shakes his head, annoyed at this whole thing. “Ajay Khan. He’s got a distinct style, and should be out of the business because he’s a convicted cyber-felon.”

“He hacked us? I thought… How’d he get through the firewall?”

“Good questions.” Tim smiles, not a happy gesture. “Here’s a better one, how’d he do it from his cell? Without any computer access? Neat trick, right?”

That is a neat trick, but that’s not immediately making Bishop understand why Tim wants to talk to her about the NSA. “Wait, why are you talking to me about this?”

“Because I talked to him. And he’s got a buddy. This buddy’s showed up during visiting hours, and offered him money and time off his sentence if he did computer work, on paper, for him. This buddy got a judge to sign off on Khan’s work. This buddy is calling himself Harvey Wallbanger and claims to work for the CIA. And from what Khan tells me, this buddy is the guy who had access to all of the Federal Intranet Servers’ code, and he just plopped Khan’s code into it, and when we all updated, he got through my firewall because we intentionally downloaded the software that he’d just slotted that worm into, and now someone, who claims to be the CIA has access to all of our electronic communications.”

Bishop thinks about that for a moment. “Okay. I mean… Yeah, I wouldn’t put that past the CIA,
“But you’d assume they wouldn’t just swagger in with that bad of a fake name and say it’s them?”

“Yeah. They’re spooks for a reason. They don’t exist. That’d be hidden behind six shell corporations and coming from outside the US.”

Tim nods, satisfied with Bishops analysis of the situation. “Now, let me tell you about Harvey’s current job for Khan. He’s building a way in and out of Norton Anti-Virus, so he can put a little spy bot in there that’ll go after people who are interested in things like cryptocurrency, and government conspiracy theories.”

Now Bishop looks concerned. “Yeah. Not the CIA. Not exclusively. I suppose it’s possible Harvey works for whoever gives him a job. He might be an off-the-books talent broker. They do exist, and agencies use them to get things/skills they’re not supposed to have. But… That plan… Yeah, that was one of NSAs.”

She’s looking embarrassed. “Stuff like that is part of why Jake and I left. It was a working paper when I was there. The thing about working papers is, we’re allowed to come up with any ideas we like. They don’t have to be legal, because a paper is just that, a paper. It’s just an idea. It’s all about seeing what might be good or what might work. Jake saw it, and shot it down, sent it back with the ‘yeah, we’d get good info, but this is illegal’ note. So, it wasn’t supposed to ever, you know, exist.”

“What was the paper about?”

“An idea for a joint job with the IRS. Take something almost everyone has, an operating system say, in the paper the idea was to get it shoved into Windows, and stick a little tracker in there. It would look for hints as to who was trying to avoid paying taxes, hide money. It would also look for anyone who might be a home grown security issue. The idea was that if they found the right combination of interests the NSA would flag the person for the IRS, and then they’d show up as a ‘random audit’ and from there… Freeze assets, keep eyes on them, take their kids, stick them in jail, whatever.”

“Get a list of people who might cause problems and keep eyes on them without a warrant and without them having broken any laws. Then jump the second they break a law.”

Bishop nods, looking even more disturbed. “That’s the first level. What happens when a bunch of delicately-balanced, paranoid-types find out they’re being spied on?”

Tim winces, realizing where this goes next. “Oh, that’s gonna get nasty.”

“A bunch of good scapegoats, ugly cases of whack-jobs acting out… Lot of media attention. Lots of ‘we’ve got to do something,’ makes sure that different laws the people who wrote this were in favor of get passed. We… NSA gets more power and funding so it can do a better job ‘cracking down on extremists with guns.’”

Tim purses his lips in annoyance. “This sounds like every one of those ‘false flag’ stories you see those morons put out when there’s a mass shooting.”

“I know.” Bishop shakes her head. She hates sounding like the conspiracy nuts. “Like I said, working paper. Look at the world around you, figure out how to take advantage of it. Best of my knowledge, right now, false flags are few, far between, and usually the brain child of some twit with more ambition than sense, and we put down as soon as someone notices them. But a lot of people already believe in them, and if you can push them in the right direction… NSA’s working papers explore everything, but between Snowden, and it looking like they were getting ready to do more than explore, Jake and I left. NSA was getting too close to too many edges.”

“So, the few bad apples made you jump out of the basket?”

Bishop shakes her head, tapping her finger against the armrest. “It’s not… It’s not just a few bad apples… I mean… Okay. Let me back up. I’m not saying everyone, or even one in ten is actively causing trouble. It’s just… Say one percent really are bad apples. At the NSA, that translates to about 500 people. So, that’s 500 people who are willing to do whatever they can to gain power; doesn’t matter as long as they come up on top. Almost another twenty percent are true believers. It’s not that they want bad things to happen, but they just don’t care about means because they’re all about the ends. That 10,000 people who are willing to do anything to make sure there’s never another 9/11. And then there ones who want to make sure the apples all look nice and shiny no matter how rotten they may be because they’d rather chew tinfoil rather than let anyone see there are bad apples. Let’s call that another 500 actively covering, hiding, and rearranging the apples to make sure the bad ones never see the light of day. Then there’s the people who are just apathetic and clocking in until they get their thirty years in. We both know that’s way more than ten percent.

“Next thing you know your basket stinks and is filled with worms trying to eat you alive. If you’re smart you get out before the worms get you. So, we had a long chat, about who we were and what we could do, and what we wanted to do. Why we got into it in the first place. Jake joined a group that specializes in watchdogging the Feds. He files FOIA requests all day on behalf of people who feel like they’re being kept in the dark. I’m here. The worms are busy chewing on the people we used to work for.”

“That’s grim,” Tim says.

“That’s the real world.”

He sighs. “Do you remember who wrote the paper?”

“No, but Jake might. Only reason I remember it was he got home that night and just about rolled his eyes out of his head he was so frustrated that that paper even got to him. According to him it should have been blatantly obvious to anyone reading it that it wasn’t legal. But he’s not going to tell you, or me, who wrote it without a properly written subpoena. He takes the agreements we signed a lot more seriously than I do.”

“Then ask him if he remembers, and if he does, have him draft up a version of whatever it is that would salve his conscious about telling, and I’ll see if I can get Bleach to stick his name on it.”

Bishop nods and begins texting. Tim stares at the traffic ahead and check the GPS on his phone. He sighs at that, too. “I think we could get out and walk to American faster than I’ll drive it.”

Bishop looks up. “How far?”

“Three miles there, three back.”

“Find a park-- Wait, can you do that?”

Tim shakes his head. “I’m not up for a six mile walk yet. If we’re still inching along when we’re within a mile, I’ll find somewhere to park and we’ll walk the rest.”
When Bishop gets done texting Jake, she looks up at Tim and says, “He does remember, and the subpoena he wants will hit your inbox by morning.”

“Tell him thanks.”

More rapid texting, then she looks back up from the phone. “He says, ‘no problem.’”

Once she’s tucked her phone back into her jacket pocket, Tim asks, “So, not that I mind visiting Penny, but… What are you thinking with this? You’re not planning on interrogating her, are you? ‘Cause, that’s not a good plan.”

Bishop shakes her head. “What do you know about what we’re doing?”

“Last night we’re having dinner, Penny mentions that she knows a Daniel Quinten, and that he doesn’t look anything like the guy you’ve got in the morgue, or work the same job, and Tony jumps up and gets moving. You’ve got him in protective custody, right?”

Bishop’s head thuds back against the headrest. “It’s a good thing we’ve got lots of traffic.” She then gets Tim up to date on their case.

By the time she’s done, Tim’s biting his lip and nodding. “And you want to talk to Penny to try and get confirmation on anything, maybe see if she knows anything about what Quinten was doing ‘off the books’?”

Bishop’s shaking her head, watching the street roll by, they’re getting closer to the American University campus, and anywhere Tim can stick the car, they’re parking. “Right now, I’d settle for was Quinten the kind of guy who’d even take that sort of off the books work.”

Tim nods. “Okay.” That seems like a decent starting point. “Um… don’t be coy with the details. We treat Penny like she’s read in on anything we touch. She was married to an Admiral, all her sons went high in the Navy, and none of them were ever shy about telling her what was up. We haven’t shifted that trend. Everything that happens, she, Ducky, and Gibbs are in on.”

“Older and wiser minds looking at the issues?”

Tim shrugs a bit. “That’s part of it. Also, it’s hard to have family dinners and not talk shop.”

“Family dinners at your place must be a hoot,” Bishop says dryly.

Tim smiles, a little wryly. “We love them.”

“Family dinners at my parent’s place is heavy on the football and light on the intrigue.”

Tim laughs a little. “Baseball. Tony follows the Yankees and they’re doing well. Jethro’s Pirates have a shot, so he’s poking Tony with that. And a month ago they were both ribbing Jimmy about the Nationals. And come February, it’s all basketball all the time. Google DiNozzo, Ohio State, Basketball. He doesn’t crow about it so much now, but back in the day he was a pretty hot college ball star.”

“Tony?” Bishop doesn’t look like she believes the idea that Tony could have been good at basketball.

Tim nods. “I’ve watched March Madness, he’s played in it.”

Bishop’s eyebrows jump high. “Huh.”
Tim spies a spot and pulls in, a good three quarters of a mile from Penny’s building. “Okay, let’s go see Penny.”

“Why ‘Penny?’” Bishop asks as the climb the stairs to her office on the fourth floor.

Tim’s breathing hard, and remembering why his foot does not want to be doing too much of this, yet. “It’s her name.”

“Okay.” Bishop stops at the top of the steps, letting Tim rest. “Should you still have crutches?”

“No. I’m fine.”

Yeah, you look it is very clear on her face.

“Won’t get better if I don’t do stuff like this.” He appreciates getting to stop and stand still, though. “My whole life she’s been Penny. None of us call her ‘Grandma’ or anything like that. Molly and Kelly call her Penny, too, and so will all the other babies.”

“Do they call Gibbs… Jethro?”

“Nope. He’s Pop. At least, for my kids. He’s Uncle Jethro to Jimmy’s. He’ll be Pop or whatever Ziva likes to Tony’s.” Tim tentatively rests a bit of weight onto his right foot. It’s holding up okay. Bishop sees it and starts to head down the hall. He follows and then, because he’s the one who knows where they’re going, takes the lead.

He knocks on the dark wood door with the frosted glass window that says LANGSTON on it. No answer.

“She said she might run late and to just head in.” Tim opens the door and gestures for Ellie to head in.

He happily sits down in one of Penny’s visitor chairs, and Bishop hovers around, looking at what Penny’s filled her workspace with.

It’s a small office, a good half of which is filled with her desk and visitor’s chairs. The wall in front of the desk is covered in bookshelves filled with journals and small souvenirs from her trips. The wall behind her computer has pictures of places she’s been, and their family. The wall to the left has the window, and a collection of different awards and diplomas Penny’s gathered over the years. The wall to the right has the door.

Bishop drifts over to look at the pictures. “God, she’s been everywhere and knows everyone, doesn’t she?”

Tim nods.

“Is that President Kennedy?”

“Probably. They were family friends. He served under my grandfather for a few months during World War II, and they were all part of the same Irish-immigrants-who-did-well-for-themselves-out-of-Boston community.”
“Wow. That’s Nelson Mandela!”

Tim nods again. “Yep. Jane Fonda and John Lennon are probably on that wall somewhere, or if they aren’t, it’s because those pictures are in storage.” Bishop steps over a bit. “Oh my God, is this your wedding?”

Tim can’t see the picture because Bishop’s directly in front of it. “Am I wearing a mourning suit in that shot?”

Bishop giggles a little. “Yeah. It’s you and her and Abby, all in Victorian clothing.”

“Yep, that’s my wedding. Look around some, you’ll find Tony and Ziva’s, too. I think Jimmy managed to grab a fast shot of Ducky proposing, too.”

“Oh, I see it.” Bishop smiles, looking at the shot of Ducky slipping a ring onto Penny’s finger. “She’s got shots of all you guys here, doesn’t she?”

“Only one I’m missing is Sean’s ultrasound,” Penny says, sweeping in, kissing Tim’s cheek, and gesturing for him not to get up.

He squeezes her hand. “Twenty week visit is next month. We’ll have good ones, soon.”

“Wonderful.” Penny extends her hand, “And you’re Ellie?”

Bishop takes it. “I am Ellie.”

Penny stands next to her. “A long life summed up in a few images.” She picks up one that’s framed. “This is my favorite one so far. This is Jethro’s house, and it’s last year’s Christmas party.” Tim hasn’t seen the photo in question, but he knows what has to be in it. Their whole family, or as close as they could have gotten in December. Penny passes the shot over to him when Bishop’s done with it. She must have taken it from the dining room. Near the mantle, Ducky, Gibbs, and Senior are talking. Molly’s riding Gibb’s shoulders. He, Abby, Jimmy, and Breena are all on the sofa. He’s got Kelly in his arms, and Breena’s nursing Anna, leaning against Jimmy, looking pooped. (Actually they both look exhausted, but that’s not exactly uncommon for parents of a two week old baby.) Ziva’s leaning over, behind the sofa, stroking Anna’s cheek. Tony’s got his hand gently resting on Ziva’s back, but he’s looking at Senior, saying something to the group at the fireplace.

“Only one we’re missing is Abbi,” he says, handing it back to Penny.

Penny nods. “Next Christmas. At the house. All of us.”

Tim smiles. “Next Christmas.” He hands the shot back.

“So, I assume you’re here on business, rather than Tim’s taking you down memory lane and tattling on Tony,” Penny says as she gestures to the other visitor’s chair for Bishop.

Bishop nods. “Yeah. Though I can’t wait to tell Draga about the pictures. Just, to be accurate, are you wearing a kilt in that shot?” she asks Tim.

“It’s been known to happen. He’s already seen me in one.”

Bishop looks surprised. Though, Tim doesn’t know if she’s surprised about the kilt or the fact that Draga knows and hasn’t told her, yet.

“We didn’t have our usual Fourth of July party this year. Next year, I’m sure we will, and Christmas for that matter, and you and Jake will be invited.”

“I can’t wait to see that.”

“It’ll be fun. But, back to business. Bishop would like to know more about Daniel Quinten.”

Penny’s eyes get that look. Tim knows what she’s asking him without saying, and he nods slightly, letting her know that he would appreciate it if she would skip the BS and just start talking. Penny actually looks a bit surprised by that, like she didn’t expect Tim to want to know. Which makes him wonder what the hell he just walked into.

And then, as soon as Bishop asks, “So, how do, did you know Quinten? Were you close?” he finds out why.

Penny smiles. “We were close, a long time ago, and remained friendly after.”

“How close?” Bishop blushes a little. “I’m not being prurient, I need to know if you knew him well enough to have an idea of what sort of man he was.”

“In the late-nineties I was a professor at St. John’s College. My specialty is bio-medical-engineering, but I thought it would be fun to do a few years with the Great Books program, so I was teaching Biology as understood by Mendel and others of his ilk. In the late-nineties Daniel was a medical student at John’s Hopkins…” Tim’s eyes start to go wide, “we’d met at a talk I was giving, hit it off, and would see each other a few times a month.”

Now his eyes are very wide. “We used to see each other a few times a month during the late-nineties when I was an undergrad at John Hopkins.”

Penny shrugs a bit. “Lunch with you, dinner with him.”

Tim winces. “God, tell me he was in his forties…”

Penny raises an eyebrow at him, daring him to be insulted.

“Thirties?” Tim says, still slightly wincing.

Penny shakes her head. “Hush up, you. You’ve never blinked at Gibbs and Abbi.”

“Abbi’s older than I am, not even twenty years younger than Gibbs. She’s a real adult. He was young enough to be your grandson.”

“But he wasn’t my grandson.”

“Oh God.”

“Timothy,” Penny gives him a long look, “just remember what they say about people in glass houses.”

Tim’s eyes go wide again, but from a completely different direction, as he gets the reaction he’s having to this information is exactly the kind of thing he doesn’t want aimed at him for what he’s doing with Jimmy and Breena. He shuts up, fast, nodding.

Bishop in the meantime has been watching this conversation with great interest and is now intensely wondering if Tim had his own Mrs. Robinson or something in his past.

“To answer your question and horrify my grandson, yes, I knew Daniel, quite well. And we remained friends, and then colleagues as things cooled down between us. I’d seen him last around 2005, and we’d talk every year or so, since.”

“Good. We’re… having some troubles getting Dr. Quinten nailed down. Let me tell you what we know…” And with that Bishop starts to fill Penny in.

It doesn’t take long to get to the point where Penny’s shaking her head. As soon as Bishop starts explain using what his baseline tests had down about how to nudge brain chemistry to induce anxiety and depression, Penny says, “No, no, no, NO! That’s not Daniel. He’d help anyone who needed it with PTSD. He’d beg, borrow, or steal to get the funding he needed to make sure the people he saw got treated. That’s why I’d send my students to him. He’d treat first and worry about payment later. And he published everything he came up with. He was a firm believer in the idea that if the government paid for you work, everyone got to benefit from it, but there’s no possible way he’d turn it around.”

“No even to get intel to save lives and stop attacks? End up with fewer people with PTSD?” Bishop asks.

“No. Never! His father came back from Desert Storm broken from it. And in ’93 he killed himself. There is no way he’d use that as a weapon or interrogation technique. It just wouldn’t happen. Ever. At all.”

Bishop and Tim look at each other, and then to Penny. “I think you need to find out who your mystery man is,” Penny says.

Bishop nods. “Yeah. I’m thinking that there might be a really obvious reason why they were so painfully far off about who they ended up killing.”

Tim nods. “Quinten was never really the target.”

“We never found out why he didn’t make that meet.” Bishop grabs her phone and shows Penny a picture. “I don’t suppose you recognize him?”

It’s a bad picture, from a bad angle. But it’s the only shot they’ve got of “Trevor Boylt” until they get the facial reconstruction done.

Penny takes Bishop’s phone and shakes her head. “No. But the kind of man who can do what you’re talking about, that’s an awfully small club. I’d start looking at Daniel’s co-authors on different papers, and then start asking them. It’s certain that one of them at least went to school with this man.” Penny hands the phone back. “Where’s Quinten now? Not with you obviously, or you’d be talking to him.”

“He said he couldn’t say what he was doing on pain of treason, and when the President ordered it, he surrendered himself to the Secret Service. When we last saw him, a bit before 1:00 this morning, he was vanishing into an armored car.”

Penny shuts her eyes and licks her lips, taking a deep breath. “I assume you wouldn’t appreciate it if I made a call about him.”

“If you make a call, someone will know we’re not following orders to forget this case ever existed,” Bishop says. “It’ll happen sooner or later, but the longer we can work in secret the better.”

Penny nods and swallows, hard. “And by now, whatever is going to happen to Daniel has happened to him.”
Bishop smiles weakly. “Probably. Tony asked him if he was sure they’d keep him alive. He thought they would.”

“I hope he’s right.” Penny swallows again. “Let me know when I can make that call. I’ve got a friend who will let me know if he’s okay.”

Tim stands up, and kisses Penny’s cheek. “As soon as this one’s out in the open or put to bed, I’ll let you know.”

Penny nods, then glances at her clock. She sighs. “Class in ten. Got to get across campus.” She stands up too, offering Bishop her hand. “Ellie, lovely meeting you. Friday, Tim?”

“I think so. We’ll see if work cooperates.”

Penny nods, hugs him, and the three of them leave.
Who Has Access

Leads… Almost too many leads. Bishop’s putting ideas and thoughts together as Tim drives them back from meeting Penny. She’s also, with the help of her phone, tracking down Quinten’s background.

“Looks like Penny’s right about Quinten’s dad. Air Force pilot. Shot down and captured, held prisoner for three months, came home with severe PTSD, spent the next two years in and out of VA hospitals and institutions. Two involuntary holds before he killed himself.”

Tim winces at that.

Bishop nods. “Undergrad at University of Pennsylvania, MD at Johns Hopkins, post doc work at Harvard and the Sorbonne, and then back to Johns Hopkins. He’s got a list of publications on PTSD, depression, and anxiety in adolescents and young adults the length of my arm. He hasn’t published anything new in the last three years, though.”

“His new job keeping him busy?”

That’s a possibility, but Bishop sees something that strikes her as more likely. “He also got tenure and may have decided to relax some.”

Tim nods at that, too.

Bishop’s tapping the arm rest, and then grabs her go bag and starts to rifle through it. “I need to think, and to think I need food.” She pulls out a bag of honey roasted peanuts. “You want one?”

Tim shakes his head. “I’m fine.”

“Maybe you could put me on speed dial?” Bleach says as he rolls back into his quarters. Gibbs and Ducky were waiting for him outside of his court room when his session adjourned.

“Might save time,” Gibbs replies. “Murray Harland, this is Donald Mallard, another of my old friends.”

Bleach, nods at Ducky, offering his hand. “And let me guess, Don, you’re up to your eyebrows in this case?”

Ducky smiles and nods. “Feel free to call me Ducky, everyone does, and I retired a few months ago, so I’m only into this up to my elbows. Though today, I’ve been called upon to render assistance as a chauffeur.”

Bleach looks amused by all of this. “Ducky Mallard?”

Ducky nods. “Yes.”

Bleach shakes his head. That’s a hell of a nickname. He looks to Gibbs. “And they still don’t want you driving yet?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Still on pain meds.”

“Don’t see the O2 canister, this time.”

“Getting better in leaps and bounds,” Gibbs says dryly. It’s sitting in the car. Only reason it’s not with him is he doesn’t have a badge anymore and neither he nor Ducky wanted to deal with the hassle that would be have been involved in getting oxygen into a court house.

Bleach smiles wryly. “Oh, I’m sure. He ever tell you about the time he pulled a four mile hike on a broken foot?”

Ducky glances at Gibbs. “No. Though, and I’m sure this will amaze you, I am in no way surprised to hear it.”

“Wasn’t like I had a lot of options. When you land wrong on your foot four miles from camp, you’ve still got to get back.”

“Of course.” Ducky says. “And let me guess, not only do you have to get back, but you have to do it without any sort of crutch, or leaning on anyone else?”

Bleach chuckles at that, then shakes his head, realizing what he’s just learned about Grave versus Gibbs. “You turned into a real hard ass, didn’t you?”

Gibbs shrugs a little.

“He let the medic tape and splint his foot, and yes, he was willing to lean on several of us, but he didn’t slow his pace down.”

Ducky shakes his head gently at that story. And if Bleach is realizing more about where Gibbs ended up, Ducky is getting a better idea of where he started.

“So, besides old times, what brings you in?” Bleach asks.

“Need more help.”

“Of course. And what do you need help with this time?”

“Tim’s pumping an ex-NSA data-wonk for classified information.”

Bleach sighs. “Don’t suppose you can give me anything more specific about what your boy’s up to?”

Gibbs shrugs again. “He’s talking to Ellie Bishop, asking about the stuff she used to do, and she’s gonna need some cover for telling him about it.”

“Do you even know what the case is about?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “I know it’s involved with the rest of this crap. I know she was at the NSA. I know Tim runs cybercrime, so if he’s asking it’s got something to do with computers.”

“And you know he’s trying to make sure that the NCIS computer systems are clean,” Ducky adds.

“Thanks, Duck. And I know he’s working on making sure that no one’s hacked a door into a system that shouldn’t have a door in it.”
“I think they call them, ‘back doors,’ Grave.”

Ducky raises an eyebrow at the nickname. Bleach sees it. “Back in the day, he was Grave. What are they calling you now?”

“Mostly Gibbs or Jethro.”

“Occasionally Pop or Uncle Jethro.”

Bleach nods at that. “I met the sweetie calling him, Pop.” Bleach thinks for a moment, staring at his keyboard. “Call your boy, I’m going to need something more specific to go on. I can’t give him a spill your guts about everything subpoena.”

Gibbs nods and grabs his phone.

“I need something more specific than everything Bishop knows about everything from her days at NSA,” Gibbs says when Ellie hits the call button on Tim’s phone.

“Okay.” Tim looks at Ellie. “How about everything Eleanor Bishop knows about… What was it called?” Tim asks Ellie.

“NSA/IRS joint spyware operation, working paper.”

“What she said,” Tim adds. “Or, if you want to wait until morning Jake’s going to send me a very legal looking version of the subpoena he wants, and if it covers both of them, all the better.”

They hear a bit of conversation in the background followed by Gibbs saying, “Who’s Jake?”

“Mr. Bishop,” Tim replies.

“Mr. Malloy,” Bishop says.

“Oh, sorry,” Tim tells her. “Anyway, he ran point on legal for that paper, and remembers who wrote it, but won’t tell me without jumping through the right hoops.”

“He’s a lawyer, so he knows what those hoops are,” Ellie adds.

They hear a bit of shuffling, then Bleach’s voice. “How about, instead of all of this going through third parties, you have him send me exactly what he needs, and I write it up and send it back to him. Then you guys can all have breakfast and get it sorted out?”

Tim nods. He can feel Gibbs doing it, too.

“Will do… Mr…”

“Harland.” Tim offers. “Your Honor works, too.”

“Murray’s fine,” Bleach adds.

“Thank you, Murray. Tim has your address?” Tim nods. “I’ll make sure it gets to you as soon as possible,” Bishop says.

“Wonderful. Go get them!” And then they’ve got dead air.

When Tim sits down at his desk he’s got a lot of emails waiting for him. He’s about to start opening them and reading when he remembers Khan’s worm.

So he takes his phone, which is not on the NCIS intranet, and starts pulling up his emails like that. Not a great protection, but he needs to read what’s he’s got, and he’s legally not allowed to use a different system for his communications.

He thinks about that for a moment and then writes a quick note to himself to find out who was behind that law.

Then he opens up the one he’s most interested in. It’s from Warden Harrison and has the header, “Harvey.”

Pictures, contact information, finger prints, when he visited, who he’s visited (not just Khan), how often. Everything we’ve got on Harvey is in here.

Tim fires off a quick Thank You! and then, grabbing his phone, stands up and decides now would be a great time to visit the Lab.

No matter what’s in there, he knows he wants to make sure those fingerprints get run against their own data. See where else they may have shown up.

So, phone in his pocket, he heads toward Abby, and gets stopped two feet from his door.

“You’re back!” Brand is looking really excited.

“I’m back, Brand. What do you need?”

She’s grinning from ear to ear and grabs his hand, pulling him over to the corner of the room where she, Ngyn, and Howard tend to camp out and work things together.

“We found who put the worm in Director Vance’s calendar, and you will never, ever believe it!”

She’s all but bouncing up and down with this. Ngyn’s looking pretty embarrassed to have him hovering around, and Howard just smiles at him.

“Aren’t you supposed to still be home for another two hours?”

“Can’t, couldn’t, too many ideas!”

“Good ones,” Howard chimes in with.

Well, Tim’s not about to call off anyone who’s still coming up with good ideas and bouncy and happy on the job. Not like he didn’t marry an older, Goth version of this level of enthusiasm. “Well, what do you have?” (He almost says, “Wha’d’ya got?” but stops before it comes out because that’s just too Gibbs.)
“Mossad,” Ngyn says quietly, blushing.

“We checked six times!” Howard says. “Couldn’t believe where our tracks kept coming back to. And, not just Mossad, but…”

“It’s their Director’s private computer!” Brand cuts in with a very excited stage whisper.

Tim tries to keep his face straight. “How long has it been there?”

“Oh, God, like a really long time. Years,” Brand says.

“Why, does that mean something to you?” Howard asks.

Tim nods, and smiles. “Yeah. What’s good for the goose is good for the gander. Just kill it. Don’t tell anyone else about it. I’ll let Leon know you found it.”

“Boss?” Howard asks.

Tim shrugs a little. “Sometimes you end up with tit for tat. Just kill it and then write up how they got into the system, and kill that if it’s still possible.”

“On it, Boss!” Howard says.

“Great! I’m off to the Lab, let me know if something else jumps up.”

They wave as he heads off.

He’s texting Leon as he heads to the Lab, making sure he knows what’s up with the worm in his calendar. Tim’s pleased to see who put that there, because of all the people who could have hacked Leon’s calendar, Eli David, and apparently Orli… no she’s been out for a while, he’s not sure who’s in charge of Mossad, now, having that access is annoying but not horrific.

And it’s not like he didn’t do it to them, first.

But, because he’s been texting with Leon, he doesn’t get to open that folder on his email until he’s actually in the lab, standing next to Abby.

“Tim?”

“I know. Believe it or not, I’ve actually got work for you.”

“Really?” She’s giving him her, I don’t believe it look.

“Really.” He gets her up to date on “Harvey Wallbanger” (that involves sniggering from Zelaz and Corwin, both of whom think that’s the worst cover name they’ve ever heard.) “Anyway, I’m supposed to have a picture of him, and fingerprints in here, and I was hoping you could run them for me.”

Abby’s grinning, and both Zelaz and Corwin look interested, too.

Tim hooks his phone into the plasma, and opens his email, and then he and Abby just stare at the picture of “Harvey.”

“Holy, Hell!” she says in a whisper.

Tim’s feeling flabbergasted. He knows it’s got to be a coincidence, but… “Shit!” He blinks.
Zelaz and Corwin aren’t in on it, so they don’t have a clue. “You guys know him?” Corwin asks.

“No… No. Um… Okay, remember when I said Bishop thought he might be some sort of deal maker or talent broker?” Tim says. “You know, the guy who sets up the deals behind the scenes that no one’s supposed to know about?"

“Yeah,” Zelaz replies.

“Okay, this is stupid, but… He looks exactly like the guy who plays the demon who makes all the deals on Supernatural,” Abby says.

“There’s no way… I mean…” Tim’s looking at Abby. He knows it can’t be anything other than a coincidence, Crowley is fictional, but… For a second, he’s almost starting to wonder about all the fourth wall breaking that show does. “It’s just startling, that’s all. That’s my mental image of making a deal with the Devil up on that screen. Okay, let’s run some prints and find out who this guy is and what he’s done before I get him in interrogation and start chatting with him.”

Abby glances at the clock. They’ve got an hour until regular quitting time, and that’s not going to get her much. It’s enough time to get her data into the system and set up the search.

“Regular quitting time for you tonight?” Abby asks him.

“I can’t talk to him sooner than tomorrow anyway, so… Good by me. Tony keeping you late?”

“We’ve got stuff started with that, and Benedict’s going to finish later tonight,” Corwin replies.

“Only so fast the computers can go.”

“Then I’ll wrap up tonight, too, and we’ll hit it fresh tomorrow.” Tim kisses Abby, and heads back to his office. One worm killed. One worm identified. He’s got to check in on the Kazaa one (hopefully dead) and see how they’re doing on backtracking the one probably written by the kid.

“So, tell me you guys got interesting stuff while McGee and I talked to his grandma.”

Tony shakes his head. “Penny hooking up with a med student when she was in her sixties trumps anything we’ve gotten.”

Vance is glaring at his phone. “No response to my request to find out where our ‘murderers’ are.”

Draga shrugs. “We do have prints from the door, as of yet, they have not connected to anything. And the ‘delivery company’ we visited, I called them back, they are open, they do exist, but the day before yesterday they got a call from the gas company and were shut down. They just opened again this morning.”

“So, I guess the only question is, are we printing everything tonight, or tomorrow?” Bishop asks.

“Neither. You are printing one thing, the business card you were handed when you went over to chat with the delivery guys yesterday. After that, I want both of you heading to your computers, and hunting down everyone Quinten’s ever authored a paper with, and then I want everyone they’ve ever authored a paper with. I want pictures of all of the men who are even remotely similar looking to ‘Boylt,’ and by the time you’ve got that, the facial reconstruction should be done, so we’ll do a comparison search. Penny’s idea about who ended up dead in that apartment is a good one. There can’t be a lot of people who can do this sort of work, so we’re going to find him.” As soon as Tony’s done saying that, Bishop and Draga get up, and head off.

Tony looks at Vance. “Now what?”

Vance shakes his head slowly. “Feels like a good night to go for a drive.”

As he’s heading back into his Dungeon, Tim takes a detour to the back corner. His… not girls... but Minions doesn’t exactly specify who he’s thinking about. Brand, Howard, and Ngyn are working together, not really talking, but fingers are moving fast and they’re in the zone.

He sort of hates to break into it, but if he is going to pull the King of Hell… Or whoever “Harvey Wallbanger” really is in to chat tomorrow, he wants to know who he works for.

“Ladies…”

“Yes, Charlie?” Howard says with a smile. Brand doesn’t get the joke, and Ngyn looks appalled that she’d make it.

“I’m not calling you Angels,” Tim says, getting the reference, and after looking at them for a second, and noticing that Brand’s changed her hair to red, so he does have a blonde, redhead, and Asian brunette in front of him, decides it’s not a bad comparison. He looks for another second and then shakes his head. He’s not that fun of a Boss. Back on topic. “The intranet one. I’m hoping to chat with the guy who ordered it tomorrow, so I want to know where it’s sending intel.”

“Shouldn’t you know that if you know who ordered it?” Brand asks.

He supposes that makes sense. “Ordered it in the sense of walked into a store and asked for a copy. I don’t know for sure who dreamed it up and decided they wanted it, and I don’t know who he gave the copy to after he got it.”

All three of the ladies are looking at him now, very curious.

“If I ever can, I’ll explain, until then, I need to know where the intel is going.”

“Then we’ll find it,” Howard says.

“Good. Let me know as soon as you do.”

“No problem, Boss,” Brand says.

“Thought you might be here,” Leon says to Jarvis as he steps closer to a bench near the Vietnam memorial. In the early nineties they worked together for the first time, and this was their meeting place.
Jarvis shrugs at him. “Same. So, I take it you’re verifying full tilt?”

Leon looks around, then glances to Jarvis, who smiles, nods, and pats the spot on the bench next to him.

“Who were we dancing for before?”

“I’m legitimately not sure. But when I was heading home, I noticed the work van in my neighbors’ driveway, and since they’re out of town for the next ten days, I knew someone was watching.” Jarvis smiles his deadly viper smile, and Vance knows that Jarvis will find out who they were dancing for, and it won’t go well for him.

“And here?”

“Here, I’m off the grid. Unless they tailed my car, and then followed me for a two mile walk,” without me noticing is left unspoken, “or trailed you, we’re in the clear.”

“No tails on me, and I’ve had my clothing scanned today. Plus, my phone is in my car.”

“Good.”

Vance leans in a bit closer to Jarvis. He pulls a toothpick out of his pocket and starts to chew on it. He’d like to say this is just about how chewing on something like a toothpick makes it harder to read lips and guess what he’s saying from far away. And that is legitimately part of it, but part of it is also bad cases do make him want to chew on something, so he’s chewing. “So, now, really, tell me what this bullshit is.”

“Honestly, I don’t know.” Jarvis’ voice is mild, but Vance knows he’s furious. “Every detail I’ve gotten is crap. Weaponized PTSD? Come on. That’s science fiction. That’s bad science fiction. That’s bad science fiction written by a guy who thinks I don’t have access to the unredacted Navy budgets, or that I’d be too damn lazy to check them.”

“Quinten did work with PTSD.”

Jarvis nods. “And he did something with the Navy, probably involving PTSD research, we were paying for that. A lot. And I can’t find where he wrote up a grant for it. And I can’t find any results for whatever he was doing. But we were paying him. He was working with someone he thought was named Trevor Boylt, but there is no Trevor Boylt anywhere in our records. I’m sure of those two things. Beyond that…”

“We know his father served in the Air Force during Desert Storm. We know he was shot down, captured, rescued, suffered from severe PTSD, and killed himself within two years of returning. Now, how about you tell me what you know? Like, who’s feeding you science fiction about weaponized PTSD?”

“You’re not going to like it.”

“You think I like any of this?”

Jarvis nods. “I’m getting it from President. Who has told me in no uncertain terms to back the fuck off on this one because it’s beyond handled.”

“According to DiNozzo, Quinten had a direct line to the President. Middle of the night the Secret Service shows up, grabs him, and Barak tells DiNozzo to back the fuck off and destroy everything on this.”
“He’s way off the reservation on this one. Even he can’t pull this sort of thing. Not… Not without someone watching his back. It ever gets out…” The Jarvis stops. He thinks about something for a minute. “Quinten works with people with severe anxiety and depression?”

“Yeah. Adolescents, young adults, soldiers back from…” Leon lets that trail off because he can see that Jarvis already has a conclusion in mind. “What?”

“There’s no proof he worked with soldiers. We paid him to, but… No case files. No studies. No records of him at any VA Hospital…” Jarvis is still thinking. “Your kids’ pediatrician, she’s got a direct line to you, right? Probably one of the only people who can give you a call without going through your secretary.”

And the mystery unravels for Vance, too. Obama’s girls. It was in their information on Quinten, and Bishop reported Penny talking about it, Quinten works with adolescents and young adults. Specialized care for young people with depression or anxiety. “They’re in the public, people watching all the time, if one of them was really depressed or…”

Jarvis nods again. “They can’t be seen going to visit a psychiatrist. They can’t be ‘on medication;’ it’d look bad. They can’t go through regular channels because that’ll end up in the medical database, and sooner or later someone will break it. They’ve got to be perfect, happy, little princesses for the press. If one of them needed help… There would have to be someone who handled the meetings and making sure they all got set right, but out of sight.”

“Like at an apartment owned by the Navy. And he’d get them the best care possible. The guy who hand tailors the medications to match the patient. So, if Boylt was their handler…”

Jarvis shakes his head. “Pediatrician. He’d be their primary care doctor. The guy who makes sure all of this works together. Makes sure there aren’t any bad side effects. Makes sure it’s working.”

Vance chews his toothpick a bit more. “Does that mean the girls… girl was supposed to be there? Do you think one of them was the target, and they just took who they could get?”

“I don’t know. But that’d explain why the Secret Service is involved, and why I can’t get any good chain of evidence on the people they grabbed. I can’t even find out who they grabbed, let alone where they are. Whatever the blackest black site you can think of, they’re in the one under it, probably dying slow and hard.”

Vance is reaching for the phone that isn’t in his pocket. “Would he tell you? If you flat out asked him, would he tell you?”

“I don’t know. A lot of people act like being on anti-depressants is one step away from the looney-bin.”

Vance shakes his head as he pats his jacket pocket. “Give me your phone.” Jarvis does, unlocking it, and Vance stares at it, realizing he doesn’t know Palmer’s number. He does know DiNozzo’s.

“Sir?” Tony sounds very wary when he answers.

“It’s me, DiNozzo.”

“Good. You’re with him, so what’s going on?”

“A hunch. Go down to Dr. Palmer, and have him get into the Federal Medical Database. I want to know who Malia and Sasha Obama’s physician is, and if he’s gone missing.”
“Okay. Uh… That’s a hell of a hunch if you don’t mind me saying so.”

“It is, but as Clayt pointed out, your pediatrician is one of the few people who have direct access to you, no matter how powerful you are. And he is one of the few people you will take a call from in the middle of the night. And as everyone has told us, Quinten works with adolescents and young adults. But he wouldn’t be working on his own, the girls’ regular doctor would have to be involved, too.”

And with that piece in place Tony absolutely knows how this works. “I’m on it.”

“Thank you.”

---

“Hey Jimmy,” Tony says as he heads in.

Jimmy looks up from his computer and Dr. Allan glances up from the journal he’s reading. Right now, with no clients, they’re having a very quiet day.

“Tony? Uh…”

“I know, you don’t have anything for me. Ever since Metro stole everything. I need to ask you for a favor.”

“Sure.”

“Can you find out who the Obama daughters’ pediatrician is?”

Jimmy’s back is to Allan, so he can’t see him roll his eyes and glance, pointedly, in Allan’s direction before saying, “Yes, it’s physically possible, anyone with access to the Federal Medical Database can do it, but it’s completely illegal for a doctor to access information on someone who isn’t his patient. And,” he stands up, opens a drawer, looks at the nothing there, “look, no patients.”

Tony gets the message Jimmy is sending, namely ask me when I’m alone. “Ah. Of course. I’ll just… check missing persons.”

Jimmy nods at Tony. “Good plan. Let me know if you find who you’re looking for.”

---

A few seconds after Tony heads out, Allan says to Jimmy, “You’re going to check, aren’t you?”

“That would be completely illegal and a violation of privacy.”

“Uh huh.” Allan’s not buying it. “Just keep in mind, if they are in the system, their account will be flagged in a way that any physician who touches it will set off an alarm and the Secret Service or the like will be at your door in about ten minutes.”
“Uh…”

“No, I don’t know that for certain or anything, but you know just as well as I do that all you have to do is put your ID in and everyone’s information is in there. Security nightmare. So, either they aren’t in there, or you will get prosecuted for it. That’s the only way to keep people like them safe.”

“I’ll keep that in mind, Dr. Allan.”

“No problem.” Sam smiles quickly. “I might want to run my department one day, but not tomorrow.”

---

“Hey Abbs!” Tony says as he heads into the Lab.

“Tony! You’re early. We don’t quite have anything for you, yet.”

“What’s quite?”

“We’ve found Boylt’s sister.”

Tony grins.

“Don’t know who he is, yet, but,” Abby gestures and Zelaz throws an image up on the plasma. “Meet Major Selena Young. She’s a Navy Chaplain. According to her CV she has three brothers.”

“Is one of them a doctor?”

“Actually, yes.” Abby and Zelaz stare at Tony. “Okay, you’re freaking me out, how are you pulling a Gibbs on this one?”

“Leon had a hunch. And, you finding this now means I don’t need Palmer to commit a felony for me. Get me everything on Dr. Young.”

---

“Jimmy?” Tony says into his cell as he’s heading up to the bullpen. Ready to call Bishop and Draga off of their hunt.

“Yeah.”

“Missing persons was a great idea. No need to mess with the computer.”

“Good. Dr. Allan suggested that if you want something like that in the future, you need to get Tim and I together for it.”

“I’ll keep that in mind.”
Tony then hits the contact button for Jarvis’ phone. After a few rings he hears Jarvis’ voice. “It’s Tony DiNozzo, sir, I’d like to speak to Director Vance.”

After another second, he hears, “DiNozzo?”

“No luck on the database, but another search panned out. Navy Chaplain Selena Young is our mystery man’s sister. She has a brother who is a Doctor. Abby’s gathering up the intel and if you’d like we’ll hold show and tell for you.”

“Put the condensed version on my desk. Clayt and I are still talking.”

“Will do,” and with that Tony hangs up.

“So, he’ll run down our possible missing doctor,” Jarvis says when Vance hands his phone back.

“That’s the idea. Someone has to oversee the girls’ care, keep track of everything.”

Jarvis nods at that. For a moment, he and Vance just look at the polished black expanse of names gleaming in front of them.

“What do you know about what’s going on with the Coast Guard?” Leon asks.

“Not my problem, not my mess, and I’m happy to keep it that way.”

Leon nods.

“We’ve been tipped off, a few times now, in ways that suggest it’s not just the Coast Guard.”

Jarvis nods at that, too. “Someone sees rot in the foundation, and they tend to want to get people looking at the other supports, too.”

“That’s a very politic way of putting it.”

Jarvis inclines his head. “I’m a politician.”

“Uh huh. I’ve got convicted cyber felons sticking worms in my intranet.”

“That’s unfortunate. You may have to work on your security.”

“That’s all you’ve got to say.”

Clayt smiles, just a little. “It’s all I can say.”

“Thought we were done dancing.”

“You’re the one whistling the new tune, Leon.”

“Ah…” Leon licks his lips and thinks. “What are your plans for next year?”

Jarvis smiles at that. That’s a good way to tack around this. “I serve at the President’s pleasure. The President who is pleased with me leaves at the end of January. I’ll stick around a bit longer than that, I have things scheduled into March, and it’s my job to make sure the handover is nice and smooth, point my replacement in the direction of the coffee machine and make sure he doesn’t trip over the skeletons hidden in the closet, and then I get to rest on my laurels and enjoy my ‘well deserved’ retirement.”

“So, by…”

“April, I’ll be out. By May, I’ll be on a half dozen boards, collecting money for looking pretty and making contacts. Then in two years, enough time will have gone by, and I’ll begin my lobbying career. In 2020, when Michelle starts getting serious about running, I’ll be ready to help her get moving. I’ll take those contacts and the people I’ve lobbied for and start building PACs. And in 2024, when she wins, she’ll have a spot for me.”

“You sound awfully sure of that.”

Jarvis smiles a little. “We live in a world of political dynasties. This is the one I’m tied to. I may be off by four, maybe even eight years, but it’ll happen.”

“Nothing new under the sun.”

“Not at all, Leon, not at all. The mess with CGIS, and your intranet, and what I’m sure you’ll find if you dig deep enough…” Jarvis licks his lips. “Power is eternal. It doesn’t go away. It doesn’t get less concentrated. It just moves around, from one set of hands to the next. And it does whatever it needs to do to keep itself safe. In that sense, it’s almost alive.

“But the thing about power, is that in order to stay alive it has to give enough people, enough ‘freedom’ for lack of a better word, to make sure that they don’t go about trying to topple it. The Romans did it with bread and circuses, and we’ve got our own forms. And as long as enough people get good enough service, power gets to keep doing what it wants to do.

“Every now and again, different gadflies think things would be better if power were to really change hands. They’re wrong. That’s where chaos comes in. But they know the first step in getting there is making sure that the people who normally don’t think about power, who just do their own thing in their own way and never notice the top of the pyramid, start thinking about it.”

“And that’s what you think is happening with CGIS?”

Jarvis shrugs a bit. “Ever see the Wizard of Oz?”

Leon nods.

“Some people think it’s a good idea to pull back the curtain and let you see what’s behind the pretty buildings and troops in nifty uniforms. Some people think we’d all be better off if we knew Oz was just a conman living off the image of his own mystique.”

“You disagree?”

Jarvis smiles again, icy cold. “I’m a realist. I know the sort of people who tend to think they’d do better with power than those who already have it. They fit into two camps, the ones who make Stalin look like puppies and kittens playing in the sun, and the ones who mean well but would have the Chinese Army rolling through California in about twenty minutes. I’m fond of neither or those scenarios.

“We do what we need to to keep most of us not having to think about the wider world, and we are “Uh huh.” Leon doesn’t look sold on that, but he’s saved having to comment one way or another by Jarvis’ phone ringing. He hears a second of conversation, and then Jarvis hands the phone over.

Vance listens, to Tony, and then looks at Jarvis after he hangs up. “They did a familial match and found his sister. Our dead man is Dr. Young.”

“And what are you going to do with a missing doctor?” Jarvis asks, intense.

“If he’s not Navy, there’s, officially, nothing I can do. Depending on what ‘officially’ happened to him, it’s likely there’ll be nothing I can do.”

Jarvis smiles a bit. “You know what I’m asking.”

“I’m not pulling back the curtain. Not today, and not on this one.”

Jarvis inclines his head. “After November, I may have some comments for you about who’s watching your computer systems.”

“I’m not shocked.”

“And I may know something about what’s happening with CGIS, and the IRS, too.”

Vance raises an eyebrow, he hasn’t mentioned the IRS or the missing account numbers.

Jarvis nods, curtly, and then stands up.

When Tony gets up to the bullpen, Abby’s already waiting for him, with the clicker.

“Say Hello to Dr. Derek Young.” Abby’s got a very good, full face, looking right at the camera and smiling shot of Dr. Young, from, apparently, his obituary, up on the plasma. “He was killed in a car accident late Tuesday night. He’s a celebrated pediatrician. Works with the families of senators and congressmen.”

Both Bishop and Draga are reading up, fast, looking for interesting information.

“Ohhh… I’ve got something. Six years ago he made a lot of waves when he stopped taking any sort of insurance at all. He made a lot of noise about not loving the ACA or insurance paperwork, and how it was a doctor’s duty to make sure that he saw patients at all income levels, and that they could all afford his care. Then he rebranded himself, set himself up as a boutique clinic, and for every paying client, promised that he’d see three patients who couldn’t pay.”

“He live up to that?” Tony asks.

“Uhhh…” Draga’s holding up a finger… “Checking his financials…. Umm…. Yeah. Looks like it. If you could pay the… God… six thousand a year, per kid, you got unlimited access for your kid, and three other kids from below poverty line families got unlimited access, too. Tests, basic prescriptions, he made house calls, all of it covered. He wasn’t starving, but he was making less than all better off that way.”
I am. Everything else was going back into his practice to treat kids who couldn’t pay. From what I’m seeing, it looks like he was closer to five kids who couldn’t pay for every one that could.”

Bishop adds. “Metro report says they found him thirty hours after the accident, car off the road, decapitation, head not found, burned. They think he lost control of the car, or was sideswiped, but the car was too destroyed to tell, and it rained between when he would have gone off the road and when they found him.”

“Oh huh.” Tony says. “And let me guess, they’ve got some big tire tracks?”

Draga knows where that’s going. “Nope, but what do you want to bet that if I get the feed from every video camera near where he was found, there’ll be a Dilegen’s Delivery truck passing by.”

“Not much. When’s the funeral?”

“This morning. No viewing. There will be an ash scattering ceremony tomorrow at noon.” Abby reads off the obit.

“Of course they cremated him,” Tony says. He looks over at the clock. It’s five minutes to normal quitting time. “Go home. I’m going to write this up for Vance, and then we’ll see what, if anything, we can do about this tomorrow.”

Because he’s not a lawyer, and because of coming up in Gibbs’ team, which treats lawyers like something to be banished with garlic and holy water, Tim doesn’t generally spend a whole lot of time on matters of law.

And, as he’s reading through a heaping mound of legal BS, he’s remembering why he doesn’t do this.

As best he can tell, and he’s fairly sure that he’s not supposed to be able to tell, after all, as a reasonably intelligent guy who WRITES for pay, he feels like he should be able to READ anything he sets his eyes on, but this looks like gobbledygook to him… but, as best as he can tell, a bunch of important people (ie, the guys who made this damn law in the first place) got caught using communications outside the proper channels (which was already against an older law) and then destroying those communications when they were inconvenient (against yet another law), so Congress decided that a spiffy new law, making sure that all electronic communications would not only be kept until the sun exploded and melted the storage sites, but that anyone who worked for any sort of Federal agency HAD to use the system they gave them for said communications under penalty of… blah, blah, blah, would fix the problem.

He assumes this means that the people who wrote this law just started doing a better job of hiding their non-fed email accounts.

However, and he thinks the may have found an interesting bit hiding in the depths of this damn thing, there is an authorization for the Feds to “monitor” said communications whenever they feel like it.

He cannot see who is supposed to do said monitoring, nor can he see who paid for it. But that does match the timeline of when Khan got called in to create said system, and it dovetails nicely with that little bit code popping up in their system.
He’s sitting back, staring at his screen, rubbing his eyes, and wondering if it’s possible that, besides him, the only person who read that section is the guy who wrote it. He’s also thinking, as he prints out a screen shot, that if Jake Bi—Malloy works as a watchdog, maybe this will be interesting to him. (And maybe tomorrow’s breakfast meet will be useful for more than just him.)

As he’s sitting back, eyes closed, hearing his printer spitting out info for Jake, he gets the sense of someone in there with him. He’s not sure if he’s catching her scent, or just knows it’s her, but he can feel Abby nearby.

“Hey.”

“Almost done?” Abby asks, heading in, closing the door, and sitting against his desk.

He sits up, eyes opening, staring at her. “Yeah. I’m done for today. You?”

“We found out who ‘Boylt’ is. So for right now, we’re done.”

He gently squeezes her knee as he stands up and kisses her. “Good. Want to say hi to Jimmy and then home?”

“Yeah.”
For not the first time since Ziva ended up at the Coast Guard, Tony’s the first one home. He’s only half paying attention as he sorts through their mail, thinking about what they might like to have for dinner.

He tosses the non-junk mail onto the kitchen counter and looks into their fridge. Whole lot of nothing he wants to make for dinner in there.

He pokes into the freezer, and there’s even more nothing he wants to eat.

He pulls out his phone. Anything you want for dinner? He leans against the counter, and picks up the non-junk mail. Two bills, he can deal with them later, and… oh… the final copies of their settlement with the bank. Closing is week after next.

He rips that open, and starts looking through. Page one, everything looks good. Page two, yep, there’s the right interest rate, and there right address, and the right amount of money to be borrowed. Looking good. He can’t believe this is real.

It still feels way too good to be true, but he’s holding it in his hands, so… Maybe it’s real. Maybe… He starts to relax into the idea that he might actually get this house.

His phone buzzes. Already got it. Home in twenty.

Awesome! See you then.

Page three, the bottom of the settlement. Monthly payment. He stares at it for a moment. $7,237.94. That can’t be right. There’s no possible way that’s right. The decimal point is in the wrong place. That’s… seven thousand dollars a month, not seven hundred.

There’s a quick chill of fear, but he stuffs it down. This has got to be a typo.

Don’t panic. Be an adult and check the numbers.

He goes to one of those ‘calculate your mortgage payment’ sites and punches his numbers in, $758. Exactly what he’s expecting to have to pay.

So, obviously, this is just a typo. He grabs a pen and crosses it out and puts the right number in.

He keeps flipping through. A typo on every damn page of the document.

Shit! Not a fucking typo.

He rubs his eyes and goes through the itemized list on page five, and finds the little line that says Escrow. That’s got a number north of six thousand dollars on it. Escrow? That’s sending a faint, niggling memory through him. There’s a little go see page 42 for more explanation mark on it, so off he goes to page 42 and that little chill of fear he felt earlier turns into outright panic.

Escrow. That’s his monthly payment to make sure that when the property taxes and homeowners insurance is due, that it’s sitting there in the bank waiting to be paid. And, while it’s true that he is getting the house for 300,000, it’s also true that its assessed value is 7.2 million dollars and between his insurance and taxes, he will have to escrow 72,000 dollars a year to cover that.

Or, about ten percent more than his yearly take home pay.
All of the air in his body goes pouring out in one long, strangled gasp. He knew it. Too damn good to be true. It’s always too damn good to be true with Dad. God. He’s got to get this called off, and they’ve lost months on finding a real place, and SHIT!

He must have yelled in frustration because Ziva pounces into their kitchen, gun drawn, ready to kill whatever’s making him make that noise. It takes her a second to pull out of battle response, and it takes him a minute to explain what’s going on.

He’s staring at her, and at the paper he apparently dropped on the floor, and back to her. She’s been planning this place, getting ideas ready, and… Nothing. He can’t get it for her. He just… can’t.

“You forgot?” Tony’s all but yelling at his dad on the phone. “How could you forget property taxes?”

He can feel the look on Senior’s face as he says, “Well, Junior, I… you see… When you’ve got a complicated intersection of business and personal expenses you use your personal property tax to offset income from another area. The property tax rate is always lower than the income tax, so, since you’ve got to pay on it one way or another, this shelters some of your inco—”

“All of my income, and then some. It’s more in taxes then I make in a year! How’s that supposed to work, Dad?”

Senior sighs. “It doesn’t. I’m sorry.”

“God, now we’ve got to call the bank, call the whole thing off. Ziva’s pissed. We’ve lost months of house hunting and… Dad! Why is it always like this with you?”

“What do you mean call it off?” Senior sounds stupefied.

“Call it off. I can’t pay for it. We can’t live there.”

“Whoa. Hold up on that. I’ll be there in half an hour. Don’t back out of it until we talk.”

“I don’t want to talk. I want to kick myself for even beginning to think this could have been real!”

“It is real, just… Not like that. This is the deal of your life, Junior, don’t throw it away. I’ll be there in half an hour.”

Tony’s glaring at the world at large and Ziva’s cleaning her guns when they hear the knock on their door.

“I can just leave him sitting out there,” Tony says to her.

Ziva’s not usually nearly as hard on Senior as Tony is. There are several reasons for this, but they boil down to the fact that she grew up with Eli David, and compared to him, Senior’s just a harmless screw up.
So, she’s pissed at him, but she’s pissed the way she assumes she will be when Little D breaks something. The kind of annoyance one gets at a misbehaving toddler.

Tony’s pissed at him the way he’s always pissed at him. A lifetime of hope and disappointment and more hope and more disappointment. He feels like he should know by now not to ever place any hope in that man.

But the kid inside Tony still wants to believe his Daddy is a good man.

“Open it,” Ziva finally says. “He will say his say and then we will send him on his way.”

So Tony gets up, stomps to the door, flings it open and does a double take.

“Ed?”

Of all the people who could possibly be standing in front of his door, Ed Slater was not on the list.

“Your dad called, said you’d want to talk to someone who knows something about real estate, and that he wasn’t the guy you wanted to listen to.”

Ziva’s standing next to Tony, also stunned by this. “Ed?” She’s pulling Tony out of the doorway, so Ed can come in.

Ed does come in, and Ziva leads him to their living room. She and Tony sharing what the hell glances with each other as they do so.

“You got the closing paperwork?” Ed asks.

“Uh… Yeah.” Tony goes to get it.

While he’s in the kitchen, Ziva sits down with Ed. “Senior called you?”

“Yeah. He explained what had happened, and he thought you wouldn’t take anything he had to say about this seriously, but you might listen to me. I think he would have called Breena, but he didn’t have her number. So, I’m here. What’s going on with the deal? He said it was a mess.”

Tony laughs grimly. “A mess.” Another dry, bitter laugh. “He sets us up with a dream house. A dream house we can pay for. A dream house that I’ve been saying for months is too good to be true, that he keeps saying, it’s real, it’s real, don’t worry, it’s real. I finally start to relax a little, start to hope that maybe it’s real, and we get the closing paperwork today, and yeah, it’s too damn good to be true. We can’t make the escrow.”

Ed glances at the papers in Tony’s hand. “May I?”

Tony shakes his head listlessly. “Sure. Don’t know what you can do about it.”

Ed takes his glasses out and starts to read through. He nods a few times. Chews his lip for a second as he looks something over. At one point he flips around a bit, checking the paperwork over, and then says, “If you won’t buy this, I will. And if I buy it, I’ll clear six million on it. You’ve got a shorter time frame than I would, so for you, let’s say four to five million is reasonable, and six is possible. The question is, do you want to put four million dollars in your bank account, or do you want to throw this away because your Dad isn’t the guy you want him to be?”

Tony and Ziva stare at each other, and Tony’s shoulder slump as he says, “Okay, I don’t think I was being clear here. We cannot make the payments and eat.”
Ed waves that off. “Yes, you can. First off, escrow isn’t mandatory. You are not required by law to prepay your taxes and home owner’s insurance. They may not want to loan you the money if you don’t do it, but I don’t think they’ll back out. The collateral is too good on this one.”

“We still have to pay it sooner or later,” Ziva adds. “Even if we do not pay now, those taxes come due in January.”

“Nope. You aren’t. The next owner is. You’re going to opt out of the escrow, you’re going to hire people to fix the windows and floors as fast as possible, and then slap some paint on the place. You are closing on October 1st according to this, and November 1st this house is going on the market at 5.5 million dollars. Taxes are due January 1st. That gives you two months to sell this. Any price above 300,000 makes you money, but given where it is and the fact that you’re going to make it livable, don’t take anything below 4.5 million. All decked out, it’s worth at least 7 million so you should have no problem selling the place, and with any luck you’ll get a bidding war going and clear six million.”

Tony and Ziva stare at Ed as he rattles those numbers off.

“That easy?” Tony says.

Ed shrugs. “Yes. I mean, look, if you don’t trust me, talk to Breena, and hell, if she can’t convince you to take the deal, I’ll buy back some of her shares so that she’s got the liquid cash to buy this place from you. Then she can flip it, and use that money to finish buying up Slater’s. This is a pile of cash just waiting for you to pick it up. You’d be insane not to.”

“And what happens if we can’t pay the property taxes in January?” Ziva asks.

Ed looks at her like that’s a silly question. “Nothing. They write you an irate letter and your credit takes a hit. You’ve got to skip something along the lines of two years of tax payments before anyone does anything, and if you can’t sell this place in two years, for more than you’re paying for it, you don’t need to worry about the taxes because that means the economy of the whole eastern seaboard has crashed. Really, this is money on the ground just waiting for you to pick it up.” Ed shifts the closing documents a bit, flipping through them, finding the pictures of the place in the end and looking at them. “Okay, I can look at this and see what Senior’s doing. It’s clever. It’s a good way to make sure you two don’t get hit with a huge tax bill, and it lets him pass on a lot of wealth without anyone really noticing.”

“What do you mean ‘don’t get hit with a huge tax bill?’ Six thousand a month is a huge tax bill!” Tony says.

Ed looks around. “Can I get a drink?”

“Yes.” Ziva gets up. “Water, coffee…”

“Water’s fine.”

Tony gets the sense he’s stalling, deciding if he should say what he’s thinking.

“Just say it.”

Ziva’s back with the water, and Ed drinks it down. “Your dad is in his eighties, right?”

Tony nods. “Yeah.”

“Estate planning. If you’ve got a big enough estate to make planning worthwhile, you know the estate tax is more than 50%. By the time the state and Feds get their hands on your money, there’s not a whole lot of it left. It’s the highest tax bracket in the US, and any possible way to shift your money out of your estate saves it.

“So, he buys this place, full price, and his buddies run the value down, and pass ownership around, because you don’t want to get hit with gift taxes. If he sells it directly to you, that causes trouble. So he doesn’t sell directly to you. You’ll pay capital gains when you sell, but that’s better than estate taxes. He’s probably losing a quarter of the value, trying to get this money to you, but that’s better than the half he’d lose if he did it through his will.”

Tony and Ziva are staring at each other, and at Ed.

“So, you think this is… his will?” Ziva asks.

“There’s a reason why we make sure all the branches of Slater’s have been sold to our kids before we die. Estate taxes kill small fortunes. Those taxes are based on wealth not income. So, you tally up what you’re worth, and you send half of it to the government. If your wealth is in land or a business, when you die, you’re screwed. You’ve got to liquidate to pay the taxes. If you want your kids to get it, you’ve got to get creative. He’s getting creative.”

Tony looks at Ziva, and looks at Ed, and then at the closing documents. “Thanks, Ed.”

“You going to take it?”

“I think we need to talk more,” Ziva says.

Ed nods at that. “If you don’t, I’m serious, I will take this deal, or I’ll make sure Breena’s in position to do it. God knows her husband’s never bringing home that kind of money on his own.”

Tony and Ziva wince; this visit had been going well. “Well, neither am I.” Tony says. “Daddy’s got to bail me out to get that kind of money to us.”

And that pretty much kills the conversation dead. They look around for a moment, very uncomfortable, and then Ed stands up. “Anyway. Let me know.”

Tony sees him to the door. “We will.”

Money from your parents is tricky when your relationship with them is tricky.

When Eli died, Ziva closed out his estate, and though she was his only beneficiary, she didn’t keep his money. Between the lies he told, the way he died, the fact that Jackie died with him, the fact that if he hadn’t died she would have had to arrest him for murder… Because of all it, she closed everything out, sold it all, and then gave it away.

It wouldn’t have felt right to keep it, or anything else, besides memories and photos, of his.

Of course, it occurs to her, giving it all away was probably made easier by the fact that it wasn’t a ton of money. When all was said and done, it was about two years of her salary, which would have been nice, but that’s all. She had a job she loved, no one depending on her, and no plans that required that kind of money. She didn’t need it, and it wasn’t enough to make a major change in her life with.
It didn’t take more than a second to write two checks. One to an Israeli peace organization, and one (anonymous) to a Palestinian one. And then she, and Eli, were done.

She looks at Tony as he comes back to the sofa, sitting next to her, wrapping his arm around her. Then both of them look to the paper in front of them.

That’s not just nice money. That’s not a few nice vacations or a down-payment on a house.

And they’re not single and carefree.

Little D’s growing in leaps and bounds. Today she pulled on a pair of slacks and then took them off again when they didn’t button over her tummy. Come April, s/he’ll be on the outside with a lot of needs. And right in front of them is all the money they could possibly want to do basically anything they want for the rest of their (and D’s) life.

She knows Tony’s thinking hard. He’s not talking, at all, and that’s usually a good sign of thinking Tony.

After another minute, he says, “I told Kate once that I missed being rich all the time.”

She nods.

He laughs a little. “And there it is. Not rich, like my family was rich, but that’s you at home, and a decent home to be in, and good schools, and college. That’s money for three or four kids, not just one or two.”

“That’s not having to get another job after you retire.”

He nods. “And a vacation or two a year. That’s you going back to school, if you want. And the really good cameras you keep eyeballing. Invest it… hell, even at one percent, even at the low end, that’s forty grand a year to live on.”

“Take the deal, sell the house, buy a different one outright. Put the rest in savings…” She looks around at their apartment. The apartment they love. It’s small for full family gatherings but they’ve got the house for that, and it is big enough for a nursery. “We wouldn’t have to move right away. We could stay here, turn the den into a nursery. You’d be closer to work, less time commuting.”

“And… if that money just sat in the bank, that’d be like having your income.”

She nods. If they cleared four million on the house and then parked it in a mutual fund or something (She makes a mental note to have a chat with Breena about this. She’s never really had the sort of money where anything beyond 401K and a checking account was necessary.) that would be like having her income, without her working.

“And if we had my income, we could stay here. Maybe move a few floors up to one of the bigger apartments if we have more than one child.”

He nods a little at that. The three bedroom apartments two floors up are awesome. And it would be easier, and more convenient, and… and it wouldn’t matter that this isn’t the greatest school district on earth, because they’d have the money for private schools. That sounds really good. Except, of course, it requires him to take this deal.

“Do you want it?” he asks.

“I want what it could buy, but not badly enough to make it worth it if it makes you feel dirty.”
He shrugs. “Ed’s right. This isn’t the kind of money I’ll ever be able to bring home on my own. Not at NCIS. Not at my level. It’d take Leon 12 years to make that sort of money, and I’m nowhere in the running to take Leon’s job.”

She nods. That’s true.

“I want you to have the things or… if not things, then the life, you want. But… I wanted to get it for you myself.”

Ziva shrugs at that. “Do you think life with Senior isn’t earning this? And do you think he’d do this if you’d turned into one of your cousins, a pretty grafter?”

“Petty grifter,” he says without thinking about it.

She shakes her head. “Pretty.” She strokes his cheek, and he smiles a little.

“I don’t want to end up raising my cousins.”

“That’s not going to happen.”

“Money makes things weird.”

“If it stays in the bank, we’ll have the sort of money we would have had it I’d kept working. Maybe a bit more. Probably not more than if both of us were leading a team. That isn’t the sort of money that sent you and your cousins to Europe for spring break.”

He nods at that. “We take this, we don’t… we don’t become rich. This is a home, school, medical bills if that’s ever an issue.”

She nods at that. “I’m fine with that. This is… us buying time to be a family, to focus on each other, our home, and our children.”

“Okay.” He takes a deep breath. “Let’s see if they’ll let us not do the escrow.”

Her eyes light up. “Okay!”
Thursday Night: Gibbs & Vance

The last time Gibbs was this relieved to see the clock hit 5:00, it was a paperwork day and he had a date he was really looking forward to.

He gave himself until 5:00. That’s when he gets to shift from working on learning how to use the computer to doing something he’s not completely hopeless at. (Cooking.)

So, at 4:53, 4:56, 4:58, 4:59, 4:59:15, 4:59:46, and 4:59:59, Gibbs’ eyes kept darting away from the computer to the clock, and finally he’s able to get up, close the computer, and say goodbye to it for the night.

He’s, as he gets up and stretches some, feeling his ribs and shoulder ache as he does that, coming to the conclusion that he needs whatever level of how-to-do-this-computer-crap that comes before the Programming for Half-Wits (or whatever it’s called) that Tim hooked him up with. The stuff he’s reading means nothing to him, at all.

He’s thinking that if Ducky’s got the time, tomorrow they’re going to the bookstore and he’s pretending that he needs a how to program book for his six-year-old grandchild, because Tim’s idea of 101 is still too damn far ahead of him.

“Enough of that.” Mona looks at him curiously, wondering what she’s supposed to stop doing. He pats her. “Not you. What do you think? Chicken on the grill, take a quick walk while it heats up?”

She looks really pleased at that idea.

Gibbs eyes the fireplace and sighs a little as he takes one log, and starts to get the fire set. One log at a time is slow, but better than no logs. So, a log at a time, he sets his fire up, gets it burning, and then to the kitchen where he grabs the chicken, sprinkles on one of those seasoning blends that Abbi likes, and then gets some potatoes and onions chopped up along with frozen veggies and another of those blends all mixed up with a little butter and tossed in a foil packet, and dinner’s ready for the coals.

“Let’s go.” Mona hops up and follows him out of his place.

It takes an hour for the fire to really get going properly, so he’s thinking that a fifty minute walk will get him back in time to get everything cooking properly. His goal is that by the time there’s snow on the ground that he’ll be able to at least jog to the end of the block. Right now, he’s walking. Right now, an hour will get him all the way around his block twice.

There was a time, and he’s not thinking of when he was on active duty, when an hour meant he could easily do a six mile run. “Next year,” he says to Mona. This time, next year, he will be running again.

He wonders if this time, next year, he’ll be married again. Engagement ring should be ready in another two weeks. After that… He’s thinking that Abbi’s birthday is in November. At least right now he feels like he can wait to surprise her with an excellent birthday treat. He lifts his right arm, feeling the ache and burn in his back, noting how, less than two hundred feet from his porch his breath is starting to speed up, and he thinks that buying himself some more healing time before attempting a romantic treat is probably a good idea, too.
Leon hears what he usually hears when he gets home these days. Not much of anything. On one level, he misses coming home to loud. He misses the constant hum of a house with kids (his and their buddies) in it. But, his kids are almost grown-ups. Three more years and there will be no more children in his house. They’ll be off at college. And the silence he’s feeling all through his house, it won’t be a case of kids are off doing after school stuff. (Kayla’s got… gymnastics right now, and Jared’s on… yearbook, he thinks.) It’ll be the silence of an almost empty house.

Just him and Lara. He sighs a little at that idea, not ready to really deal with it.

On the other hand… Right now quiet appeals to him a whole lot. It’s been a long day, and he’s still got to decide what, if anything, he can or should do about Dr. Young.

Legally, the case is Metro’s. They handed it over. Legally, he is not required to share anything he learns about any case that’s not actually his. He is not required to let Metro know what he’s found out.

Legally, he doesn’t have to do anything on this.

Morally… Dr. Young is still very dead. His family likely doesn’t have any real answers… Or maybe they do. He’s got no idea of what level of in the loop they are. Hell, for all he knows the Secret Service may have personally delivered Young’s family the heads of his killers. Talk about revenge.

He’s thinking about that when his phone rings. He checks, sees the number is blocked, and almost puts it back in his pocket and then… No. He shakes his head, given everything going on, he answers, “Hello?”

“Director Vance?”

“Yes…” He feels a chill down his spine. He knows the voice. He’s even met the man a few times. Not often, but, at least once a year, he sees the President for something. “Sir.”

“I understand your agent did not do a particularly good job of forgetting the case or destroying evidence.”

He takes a deep breath, getting ready to stand his ground. “We don’t do that, sir. Not even for you.”

“How about for my daughter?”

Leon exhales, slowly. “Is the case closed? Do you… have the guys?”

“We do. It’s done.”

“Send me the fingerprints. Let me see that the men you’ve got are the ones who took out Dr. Young.”

“And what will you do with those prints.”

“Make sure you’ve got the right guys. My duty is to Dr. Young. If you’ve got his killers, then… Yes, we’ll bury it. If you don’t… I can’t just let it drop.”

“Check your mail in the morning.” And then the line goes dead.
“I hired Diane today.” Abbi says as Gibbs takes a bite out of his chicken leg. They’re sitting in front of the fire, munching on dinner, enjoying a quiet moment.

For a second, Gibbs stops everything. He’s not chewing and possibly not breathing. There’s a heartbeat of everything going blank and then he blinks slowly.

Abbi smirks a little, and nibbles her chicken wing.

“What?” he asks when his brain starts moving again.

“She said she couldn’t wait to see the face you’d make at that news. She wasn’t wrong. That was a doozy. Hiring her a problem?”

Gibbs assumes that sensation going through him is a full body wince. He puts his chicken leg down. “Uhhhh…”

“The IRS gave her an option, relocate to Bismarck, North Dakota, or enjoy her unemployment benefits.”

He sighs. Hell, in that situation, he’d hire Diane. “Five.”

“I don’t have them all memorized, Jethro.”

“Don’t waste good.”

Abbi nods at that. “And I’m not. She’s going to scare the shit out of my accounting department.”

Gibbs smiles a little at that. “Oh, she’ll do that, all right.”

“And I won’t have to sneak her in anymore.”

“Nope.”

“So, what’s that look?”

He shakes his head. He’s not sure he could put it into words if he tried.

Abbi’s got a pretty good idea that poking any further on this is a bad plan, so she says, “How’s getting you in front of a computer going?”

Now Gibbs is glaring, but not at her. He’s eyeing the computer that’s sitting on the coffee table. “I have to learn how to program.”

“You have to learn how to program?” She heard him; she’s just not believing it.

“Tim tells me it’s not Google. I can’t just type in a search.”

“Oh. Sorry. I didn’t mean to get your hopes up.” Gibbs is still glaring at the computer and Abbi realizes what that look is. “You’re going to learn how to do it.”

Gibbs stops looking at the computer. “We’re not breaking this today or tomorrow, are we?”

Abbi shakes her head. “We may put this little bit to bed right now, but the big thing? No. This case will take years to get all the ins and outs. Just the CGIS corruption charges will take years to get all the way through.”

“Tim pretty much said that, too. That I’d have more than enough time to get the hang of it. So, before going to visit Bleach, I learned what Python is.”

“What is it?”

He glares at the computer again. “A shit ton of work.”

Abbi grins at that. “Well, we wouldn’t want you to get bored, right.”

He rolls his eyes a bit at that and then takes a bite of his chicken. “If I shoot that thing, it’s not my fault.”

She laughs at that.

“I know that look,” Lara says to Leon as they’re cleaning up the table. That used to be one of the Jared’s job, but with the mountains of homework he has, household chores have taken a back seat.

Leon sighs a bit, and nods. He knows that look, too.

“Gonna tell me about it?”

He shakes his head, and Lara doesn’t fuss. There are times, a lot of them, when he’d like to tell Lara about his job. There are times when he’d like to bring co-workers home. There are times when everything would go a lot more smoothly if he didn’t have a twenty-foot-high concrete wall between his work life and home life.

And none of that matters worth a shit, because Jackie died for his work, so these days his work doesn’t come home. Lara’s never met most of the men he works with. She doesn’t know Jarvis or Morrow or anyone else along those lines. She’s been to the Navy Yard fewer than half a dozen times in the last four years, and two of them were about her getting hired in the first place. With the exception of Gibbs family activities (which he has in his own mind as “safe”) she’s never been allowed near his work life.

He knows it bugs her. And he knows that she knows that it’s the step too far, that he can’t take that wall down.

So he shrugs a bit. “It’ll pass.”

She raises an eyebrow and hands him a rinsed dish. “So you keep saying. Doesn’t seem to be passing.”

He sighs again. “I know.”
Abbi’s on the sofa, her computer in lap, reading through a series of reports. Gibbs is also on the sofa, next to her, his computer on his lap. He’s not reading right now, he’s thinking.

The last time he learned something completely from scratch it was Japanese. And at least with that he had a pretty good idea of what he was trying to learn. He knew the things he wanted to say, because they were in his head, in English, just waiting to flip into Japanese.

He thinks that Python is giving him so much trouble because he doesn’t know what he’s trying to do. He can’t say, to the computer, ‘show me the big picture,’ if he doesn’t even know what that picture might be or how he’d go about finding it.

So, he’s thinking. What am I looking for?

Answers aren’t stampeding into place as he’s sitting there. He’s gently stroking Abbi’s knee as he thinks, and then, as answers aren’t miraculously forming, his phone rings.

He lunges forward with a minimum of grace, and grabs the phone off the coffee table.

Abbi glances at him. “Fornell,” he says, answering her unasked question.

“Tobias?” he asks as he picks up.

“World’s not about to end,” Fornell could hear the levels of question in his voice when he asked.

“So… just checking in?”

“Sort of. We’ve got to give the caterer the final count tomorrow, and I was wondering if you knew if McGee and Abby are coming?”

It takes Gibbs a minute to realize Tobias is asking about his wedding, and, apparently Tim and Abby are invited.

“They haven’t said anything about it.” He thinks. “They’d say. Abby would have asked about what presents to get. He’d be teasing me non-stop about the best man speech if he thought he was going to see it. I don’t think they got an invitation.”

“Speaking of that…”

“Yeah, I know. Still got two weeks.”

Fornell laughs a bit. “Uh huh. You got more than the first word?”

Gibbs glares. That’s not terribly effective over the phone. “It’ll be ready. You just be ready to go out on the 30th after the rehearsal dinner.” He’s had a much easier time figuring out what to do for a bachelor party than what to do for his best man’s speech.

“You’ve got nothing, do you?”

Another glare.

Fornell is still laughing. “I’ll call McGee. Have fun writing.”

“Thanks,” Gibbs says dryly.
Abbi looks at him as he sets the phone down, and stares at his computer. She raises an eyebrow at him.

“I might have found the only thing on earth that’ll make learning Python look fun.”

She smiles and kisses him.

Bedtime. Leon lays in the dark, next to Lara, thinking about a lot of things.

The Young case, and the bigger case, and the men behind the curtains Jarvis talks about. Leon was a sailor first, and a cop second, and then, finally a politician. He’s better at it than he ever thought he’d be, but he never liked it.

And he knows that’s why he’s never going to go any higher than where he is now. Morrow moved from NCIS to Homeland. Jarvis left active service after Leon did and climbed a hell of a lot faster. Because they liked playing in the mud.

Leon rolls to his side and rests his hand on Lara’s hip.

When he became the Assistant Director of NCIS he got clearance to see all the ops. He remembers the case Gibbs quit on, the Cape Fear, and how it “officially” had some sort of tragic gas leak and blew up, killing all on board and most of a freighter full of Marines who were refueling/restocking.

He wasn’t sheltered or naïve. He knew the higher ups played fast and loose with the truth. But, he didn’t think it was that bad.

And he had spent several nights, like this one, thinking, debating if he should stick around, keep working this job, or if an honorable man leave when asked to support lies.

He stayed. He figured that he might not love, or like, what’s above him, but the people below him, the victims, need someone who will do the job and do it well. Someone to protect them. (Though those poor bastards on the Cape Fear and that freighter didn’t have anyone looking out for them. He tries not to think about that too hard.)

He thinks about the finger prints that are coming his way. If they match up, if they are the hands that touched that door, then he’ll let it go.

He thinks about “Harvey” and about the bits and pieces coming out of McGee’s department. He thinks about CGIS, and the vanishing account numbers.

He knows, if he was getting a call from the top of the heap about a murder, what is going to happen if he gets too deep into the rest of this. Because the bigger case, that’s way bigger, way more… troublesome, for those in charge than a few dead bodies.

He feels the breath catch in his chest for a moment. A good man with a good team can change the world. He’s got the good team. He’s got the best damn team he could possibly want for this kind of a job. If anyone can break this, it’s him and his team. All he needs to do is be the good man.

He exhales, long and deep. Tomorrow morning he and Lara have to have a very long talk.
Good men can change the world. And good men die trying.

And Leon’s going to be a good man.
Thursday Night: McGee & Palmer

The door to Autopsy slides open and Tim and Abby head in. Jimmy’s at his desk, finishing up the last of the day’s notes. “Almost done,” he says without looking up. Tim leans against Jimmy’s desk, as Abby looks around.

“Allan still here?” Abby asks.

“Left ten minutes ago,” Jimmy says not looking up from his monitor.

A second later, as he’s still typing, Abby’s kissing the back of his neck. Jimmy’s fingers stop moving over the keyboard, and he drops his head a bit so she can get to more of the back of his neck. He sighs as she nibbles his ear lobe. Then he quietly says, “I love that, but unlike Tim, I’m not used to working distracted, so give me a minute and let me get done, and then you can have my full attention.”

Abby kisses the back of his neck one more time, and then pulls back, heading over to snuggle with Tim. And, after a moment, where Jimmy’s typing fast, he stops, looks up, stands up, steps over to Abby, pulling her close for a proper hug and kiss.

She’s between him and Tim. She’s leaning against Tim, butt against his lap, and his hands are on her hips. As she’s kissing Jimmy, his hands find Tim’s and gives him a gentle squeeze.

After, she looks up at him, grinning. “Hi.” One more kiss, wet and soft. “That one’s for Breena, along with the message that Friday can’t get here soon enough.”

“Amen on that.” Jimmy kisses her again, holding her close for another second before rubbing his hands up Tim’s arms, his right arm closing around the back of Tim’s neck. He shifts over a bit, pulling Tim a little closer, and after a quick, closed-mouth, affectionate but not sexy kiss, he says, “How’s your day doing?”

Tim squeezes both of them and says, “Long. Lots going on, lots more tomorrow. Think Breena wants to just meet up at our place or yours and we can…” He sighs a bit. He wanted to come in and say hi, and now, having said hi, he doesn’t want to just turn around and say goodbye. “…just be married people at the end of a long day?”

Jimmy nods, and Abby’s smiling, all three of them liking that idea. “She’s already home with my girls. How about you give me a lift to your place, and she can meet us there. If we bring the food, I bet she’d be okay with that.”

Tim hugs both of them, pulling out his phone, ready to order food. “Find out if she’s up for it, and I’m on food. You driving, Abby?”

Abby nods. “I’m driving.”
alcohol and pretending Brand is three years older than she actually is. It’s amazing how well an NCIS ID works for getting into a bar. After all, who’s ever heard of an under 21 Federal Agent?) are working hard.

They’ve found they like that. Synch their schedules together, and tackle whatever comes up. They don’t always work the same projects, but they do bounce ideas off each other when they get stuck. And when they can, when they luck out and find something their own specialties all mesh well together on, they pounce on it like a cat on a mouse.

They are, as Brand puts it, kicking ass and taking names all over the Cyberworld. One case at a time.

And this job, the intranet worm. This one is working for all of them.

They know who wrote it. Not personally. None of them have met him, of course. And Ngyn didn’t know Jim, she was actually hired to replace him, but she knows she’s in a dead man’s seat, and that Khan’s the one who blew his cover, so she’s not fond of Khan by any extent. But they also all respect the code they’re seeing, and to greater and lesser extents the man who wrote it. (Brand is, after having seen Khan for a few seconds as he was leaving, vehemently not admitting to having something of a bad boy computer genius crush on the man. She will also, vehemently not admit that a different crush on a different bad boy computer genius had something to do with taking down Anonymous. Her vehement non-admissions cause Howard and Ngyn, who have both been there, to look at each other and smile.)

The code is beautiful. It’s not so much that he hacked a door providing full access into any system that door was in. Any hole can be a door, and any blunt instrument can punch one into a wall. A gaping hole left by a wrecking ball isn’t elegant. It isn’t subtle. And anyone looking at the wall can see the hole and go about fixing it. Khan’s code is more along the lines of a teleporter. Anyone with the coordinates could patch them in, hop in, grab what they wanted, and hop back out, with only a moment of shimmer to let anyone know what had happened.

Brand keeps poking it, going at different angles, but… “I don’t think we can backtrack this.”

Ngyn, who is, indeed, quite shy, but who has also warmed up quite a bit to her two teammates who not only get what she wants to do, but never look at her like she’s some sort of freak for coming up with off-the-wall ideas, and no matter how off-the-wall the code she’s showing off is, have never just shut her down, says, “I know. We’ve got to catch someone using it.”

Howard grins. “How about…” And she starts writing the code on the whiteboard they commandeered for their own use.

“Oooh…” Brand’s grinning, too. “Oh yeah. And, let’s tweak this here.” She adds a few key phrases.

“How do we want them to be able to come back at us again?” Ngyn asks.

“What are you thinking?” Howard says.

“I’m thinking that we can add a few lines, so that when anyone uses this port to get in, we tag them, and then infect them with a worm of our own.”

“How nasty should it be?” Brand’s eyes light up. “I’ve got some really nasty tricks I’ve been dying to pull.”

Ngyn, as the mama hen/resident adult (she’s 32, Howard is 24, Brand 18) shakes her head. “Let’s just tag and monitor. We’ll run it by McGee before we add teeth.”
And with that, they get coding.

Tim, Abby, and Jimmy beat Breena and the girls back to their place. Not by much though. Heather’s still getting them up to date when Breena gets in.

They say their hellos and goodbyes and settle in for a quiet night.

Like any night involving feeding and bathing small children, step one is get out of work clothing. At work they’ve got coveralls and jackets, lab coats and scrubs. Here… Tim tosses the white button down he had on into the hamper… here they’ve got spills and stains and little people who make big messes. Followed by a lot of wet and sudsy when it’s time to get the mess off those little people.

Breena’s the only one of them who gets to work in clothing that won’t be any worse for the wear if it’s covered in baby goo. She’s sitting on the bed, in her mom uniform of jeans and a t-shirt, cuddling Anna, while Kelly and Molly play on the floor, watching the other three change. “So, how about, instead of go bags,” because even Jimmy has a bag with extra clothing in it, “we just keep some stuff at each other’s places.”

“That makes a lot of sense,” Abby says. “Couple changes of laying around clothing, and at least one ‘work’ outfit.” She flops onto the bed next to Breena, sighing. “I don’t want to put anything on.”

“Stay naked. Who’s gonna see?” Breena says.

“Delivery guy is coming sooner or later,” Tim adds, pulling a t-shirt over his head. “But it’s not like you’ve got to get the door.”

“I’m fine with naked dinner once food shows up,” Jimmy says with a smile. He’s digging in the bag Breena brought and smiles when he sees his fleece jammy pants. They’re old, soft, worn, and feel like a warm, fuzzy hug. He loves them, and they’re one of the reasons he looks forward to cool weather every year. “Thank you!”

“Thought it was just cool enough that you’d want them instead of shorts.”

He grins at her, pulling them on.

Abby sits up slowly. “After the delivery guy shows up.” Tim tosses her a pair of her own pajama pants and a loose t-shirt. “Might want to wait outside for a bit. Suck up some early evening air.”

“It is nice out there,” Breena says. “How about we take little girls out for some quality time on the grass, and you two get their dinner ready?”

Abby stands up, pulling on her clothing, and grabs Kelly.

“We can do that,” Jimmy says.
“Gotcha!” Brand says.

“That’s lighting up like a Christmas tree!” Howard adds.

“What are they after?” Ngyn asks.

“Right now, Vance’s email,” Brand replies.

“Come on honey, take our worm home and tell us who you are,” Howard coaxes as their hacker picks his way through Vance’s email.

Brand points at the screen. “You see this?”

They nod. Whoever it is, is going through their collection of fingerprints, taking everything downloaded from the last four days.

“Oh, we’ve got to get this bastard!” Howard and Brand stare at Ngyn, even at her wildest (which isn’t very wild) they’ve never heard language like that come out of her, before.

---

“Molly!” Breena’s using her “firm” voice as Molly tries to get away with picking up the peas and dropping them on the floor instead of eating them, while complaining about the fact that Anna doesn’t have to eat peas.

“Maaaaaammmmmmmaaaaaa, I don’t like peeeeeeaaaaas!”

“Rule seventeen!” Jimmy adds.

“I don’t like rule seventeen!”

“Do you need to go straight to bed?” Breena adds.

Molly, moping, puts a pea in her mouth and chews, looking like she’s heading off to face the firing squad.

“What’s rule seventeen?” Tim asks.

“Same as all the other ones,” Breena says. “No fussing. The numbers don’t mean anything to her, so, the running joke for us is that we’ve got twenty-five rules at our house and twenty-four of them are ‘No fussing.’”

“What’s the other one?” Abby asks.

“Molly?” Breena asks her daughter. “What’s rule number one?”

“No biting.”

“Good girl.” Breena takes two of the ten peas off the plate. “Now eat the rest.”

They hear the bell ring, and Tim gets up, heading off to get their food. A minute later, he’s back with it. He turns the oven on warm and puts the food in.

Abby eyes the clock. “One more hour, then dinner for us?”
“That’s…” Brand says, quickly checking the address. Their little worm has done its job. It went home with the information their hacker took, and now it’s letting them know where home is.

“A private house. At least, it’s supposed to be,” Howard finishes.

“We’ve got to tell him,” Ngyn says, reaching for her phone.

Howard grabs her arm. “Not like that. Who knows if our phones are safe?”

“I know where he lives,” Brand says. “Come on.”

Ngyn shakes her head. Yes, working with Brand and Howard is helping get her out of her shell, but she’s still not relishing the idea of going to McGee’s house. “I’ll keep eyes on this, and see if I can find out more about this house. You go tell him.”

Brand and Howard pop up, ready to head to McGee’s house.

“You decent?” Abby calls up.

“What?” The girls are making a lot of noise and he and Jimmy are trying to talk. Mostly he heard her voice.

“Got company. You decent?” comes up a bit louder this time. And this time he’s on the landing near the bathroom door, so he can hear a little better.

Without really thinking, Tim says, “Enough.” Like he always does for tubby time, his shirt is off, and he’s down to just his kilt. He’s got Kelly in his arms, trying to get her dried off, while heading toward the nursery to get pjs for all three girls. Molly and Kelly did a good job of making sure that both he and Jimmy need to get dried off, too, so his hair is wet, and some of it’s in his eyes. (Jimmy had made, as he was heading out to get said pjs, a comment about Tim looking like a kilt-wearing-drowned-rat. Tim responded with a rude gesture and was about to add to it when Abby called up.)

Molly’s working on getting herself dried off (with some lackluster results, the only dry parts are the parts she can see, her back is still soaked), and Jimmy’s leaning over the side of the tub, dribbling water over Anna, getting her rinsed off.

Basically, it’s tubby-time 101. Wet, soapy, and not very dressed. And when he yelled down his answer, he was assuming that the person downstairs and coming up was a person who’d already seen him in a bathing suit (and possibly less.)

Really, as he thinks about it, and grabs the PJs, he’s expecting Vance to come up. Because if it was part of the family, Abby wouldn’t have asked. If it was, say, Gibbs, she’d know he’s welcome up, so she would have just sent him up. And if it was a stranger, she’d have called him down, giving him time to get fully dressed and the girls out of sight.
But Vance is family adjacent, and Tim’s pretty sure that Vance has been here before, and since he knows about what’s up with the McPalmer (or whatever they are) family he wouldn’t be shocked by him and Jimmy on tubby-time.

He’s not expecting Howard and Brand to pop up his steps, and they certainly aren’t expecting him in a kilt and nothing else with a small, wet person on his chest and three onesies in his hand.

Tim’s a few steps outside of the bathroom, so he yanks the door shut, fast. Jimmy’s just as dressed as he is, in his PJ pants and nothing else, and Molly and Anna are completely naked.

“Uh. Hi,” he says, dropping the onesies and making sure the towel covers Kelly.

Howard’s grinning at him. “Bet you’re wishing you hadn’t said to let you know as soon as we found something.”

Brand’s just staring at him, eyes wide and skittering over his skin from one tattoo to the next.

He raises an eyebrow at Howard, while stepping into Kelly’s room. “Hot enough you didn’t want to use a phone?”

She nods. Now he’s interested and much less concerned about not being very dressed. “Kelly, this is Catherine and Kristin. Do you remember Kristin?” Kelly ducks her head into the crook of his neck. “She’s feeling shy,” he says to Howard and Brand. “They’ve got some good information for me. You okay with Mommy and Uncle Jimmy taking care of bedtime?” he says to Kelly.

Kelly’s not thrilled at that, but she’s sleepy enough it’ll fly. Besides, tubby is the fun part, and she’s already gotten lots of splashing in with Dad, so she’ll let him go. Tim grabs a diaper.

Abby’s already standing in the doorway, holding the onesies he dropped. “Want me to get that?”

“Yeah. Molly and Anna need jammies, too.”

She kisses him while taking Kelly from him. “I’ve got it.”

“Okay.” Kelly gets a gentle kiss on the top of her head. “Goodnight, baby.”

“Night Daddy.” He turns to Howard and Brand. “Office is at the bottom of the stairs, on the left. Get in there. Turn on the computers. I’ll be down in a minute.”

They nod and head down.

“Was that Dr. Palmer?” Brand says under her breath to Howard as soon as they’re in Tim’s office.

Howard is nodding and trying not to giggle. “Palmer’s ripped.” She’s being quiet, but not silent.

“Shhh… his wife.” Brand’s gesturing toward the door.

“So’s McGee.”

“Oh my god! Did you see…” Brand just mouths it. And Howard is nodding. It’s not the first time they’ve speculated about what’s under McGee’s traditional button down and jeans. The little flashes they’ve seen of something a lot less buttoned up, the cuff and nail polish, the kilt when he was hurt, hint in interesting directions the Angels have been happy to muse about (once again, like the name, Angels, said speculation has also involved alcohol). Brand doesn’t add any voice as she says, “So many tattoos.” She’d heard that he had some, but not that many. “Were those lips on his wrist?”

Howard’s nodding. “Yeah. Three of them!”

“Wouldn’t mind getting my lips on him, too.”

Howard giggles for a second and says, “Shhh… His wife,” and points to the floor above them. “Cool dragon.” That seems like a safer topic.

Brand nods, too. “Kilt?”

“Yeah. One time, before you were here, before I was here, he came in wearing that, black nail polish, and eyeliner.”

Brand takes a moment to appreciate that image. “Came into work, like that!”

“I know! That’s what Ngyn says. Way I heard it, it was right after he started, physical plant was dicking around with us, and he showed up all Gothed out and stared Dave from Physical Plant down!”

“Hehehehe.” Brand likes that idea. “Why do you think he and Dr. Palmer are washing babies?”

“Because babies get awfully smelly if you don’t wash them?” Howard spent years of her life as a babysitter, and is very much not getting what Brand is asking.

“No, not why are they washing them. Like… why are they washing them?”

“Men wash babies, too.”

Brand looks frustrated and decides that she’s not getting this idea across, especially not at the almost zero volume she and Catherine have been having this conversation at. But, as Howard said, there are three lips on McGee’s wrist, and he’s home, washing babies with one of three other people. She’ll see about getting into it later when they can really talk.

Howard’s got both computers on, and Brand drifts over to the typewriter. “What’s this?”

“Typewriter.”

“I know what it is, why do you think he’s got one?”

Tim’s dried off, pulled on a t-shirt, put his wrist cuff back on, and is almost all the way down the steps when he hears somewhat frantic whispering coming from his office.

He sees Breena, who’s leaning against the wall in the hallway, looking really amused, and he pauses, listening.

He supposes this is karma coming back for all the hours of gossiping about Gibbs. That said, it does feel odd to have them gossiping about him. Breena steps up to him, giving him a quick kiss and a pat on the tush before saying, very quietly, “Sounds like there’s a bit of crushing on teacher going on in there.”

“Oh, God.” He rolls his eyes a little. “Serious?”

She shakes her head and pats him again, this time under the kilt. “They’ve noticed you’re pretty under your clothing.”

He glances down the stairs. They’re both in the office, so he gives Breena a quick kiss, and then heads in. On the bottom step he catches Brand’s voice, “Why do you think he’s got one?”

“Same reason anyone else has one. I type with it.”

Howard and Brand jerk like they’ve been electrocuted when he says that. Tim smirks a bit as he sees them glancing at each other guilty embarrassment all over their faces.

“So, what’s so hot you can’t call about it?”

“We started going after that worm,” Howard begins.

“And about a minute into it found out that we couldn’t backtrack it,” Brand adds.

“Not the way it works. You’ve got to get it while it’s working, because when it’s done, it’s done,” Howard says.

Tim nods. If he was going to build something like that, that’s how he’d do it.

“So we got it,” Brand says.

“Going through Vance’s emails, and our finger print database. It grabbed a copy of every print we’ve put into the machine in the last four days,” Howard says.

“Ngyn modified it. She had us add a little twist, so when someone used it to access our system, they’d get the information they took, along with a little present from us,” Brand explains.

“And now you can backtrack,” Tim says with a smile. “So, is that the hot part?”

“That’s the warm part. It’s going back to a private home. Given who made that worm, Ngyn was thinking that looked really suspicious,” Howard says.

Tim’s nodding slowly. “Yeah, that’s hinkey as hell. Any shot they found the worm you added?”

Brand and Howard both shake their heads. “It’s not impossible,” Brand adds, “but you’ve got to know it’s coming and look for it.”

“And Ngyn hasn’t called to let us know that the alarm on it buzzed.”

“Perfect. Got the address?”

“Yes!” Brand hands a piece of paper over. “Do you want us to kill the door, or leave it in play?”

“Leave it open, and keep your return worm in play. Just because we’ve got one address doesn’t mean this is the only person using that entrance.”

Howard smiles, too. “According to Brand she’s got some very nasty surprises still in her toolbox. Want us to add one of them?”

Tim looks at Brand. “How nasty?”

“Anything from turn every electronic item you own that’s ever come in contact with your computer into a brick, to outing every detail of your life on the internet.”

“Your brick option. Can it be backtracked to us?” Tim’s got some ideas for that.

“Nope.” She smiles. Shutting everything down is annoying, but the nasty bit is in what she says next. “Brick. Solid and dead. If you get it running again, everything is gone.”

Tim thinks about that for a second. He’s seeing some really fun options for that. If the worm they’ve got works the way he hopes it does… “How much of their system can you pull?”

Brand knows where he’s going. “If you want it, I can have their entire system cloned onto ours, with identifying information, then turn everything into a brick, and they’ll never know what hit them.”

Tim grins, very, very happy. “Do it. Give me their entire system and then wipe it clean. Tomorrow I’m going to have a chat with a lawyer and then a judge, and I’ll get a warrant for the physical place and all the records on that place, who owns it, everything.”

Howard and Brand look very pleased by this. “On it, Boss,” Brand says. Howard nods with a grin, and they head off to NCIS to wreak havoc on the computers at 458 West Samber St.

“You have to leave?” Abby asks as Brand and Howard head out.

Tim sees that they’ve got the food laid out on a sheet on the living room floor. Several pillows around the sheet, a few low lights, all of the blinds drawn. Co-ed naked dinner time is up soon.

“Thank all that’s good and holy, NO.” He waits a few beats, makes sure he hears the car pull out, and then pulls his t-shirt and kilt off before sitting down cross-legged and starting to open cartons of food that smells yummy.

“So other than peeking at you and Jimmy and doing a bad job of not gawping, what was all that about?” Breena asks as she strips out of her t-shirt and jeans.

“Gawping?” Jimmy’s already naked and sitting down, adding food to plates.

“Yeah, the blonde…”

“Howard.” Tim adds.

“Was very impressed by you.” Breena says with a smile, petting Jimmy’s hair as she sits next to him.

Abby finishes stripping off and lies down on her side, propping her head on Tim’s thigh. “And Brand?”
“Seems to prefer Tim. They got really quiet after the first few words. But I could hear the giggles and I’ve giggled that giggle often enough to know what it means.”

Tim looks up down at Abby, stroking her neck and shoulder. “And that’s why we’re not adopting any baby hackers. I do not need to be encouraging the teenager with the crush on me.”

“So, other than eye candy, which I don’t imagine they came all the way out here for,” Jimmy says as he hands Breena the first plate, “what’s up?”

Tim sighs a bit, and takes a deep drink of the ice tea in front of him. “How much of… Nothing. You know nothing because this all happened today. I swear, today’s been at least three weeks long. Okay. To the beginning. Today started with me working on getting a secure computer system up and running so we can do our work without whoever it is figuring out we’re doing it.”

“Oh, and we know that you’ve found some traps hiding in there,” Abby adds, taking a plate from Jimmy, and grabbing chopsticks for her and Tim.

“Yeah, several worms hiding in the apple. Anyway, one of the worms looks like something I’ve seen before. So, I look into it, and yes, Ajay Khan…” and he tells the story of his adventures for the day. Abby’s heard some of it, because she’s helping to hunt down “Harvey.” Breena never heard the first Khan story, so they had to backtrack and cover who Khan was and why Tim knows him.

“Okay, so you’ve got Khan hacking systems for Satan from inside his jail cell?” Breena says, wrapping it up nicely.

Abby laughs at that, she’s perking up with food and rest. “Not exactly Satan, the King of Hell.”

“Big difference,” Breena says dryly.

“It is on the show,” Tim adds. “Anyway, tomorrow we find out who ‘Harvey’ is.”

“So at least find out that we can’t find out,” Abby adds. “With the way things are going, what do you want to bet I can’t find him in the system.

Tim sighs. “You better be able to. He’s got to be approved to have access to prisoners. But if you can’t get him, I’ve got the name of the judge who okayed this, so… Either way, we’re digging.”

“Back up, you said you were reading something about the guys who made the law that basically said you had to use the system with the worm in it?” Jimmy asks as he eats the last bite of his beef and veggie stir-fry.

“Yeah. I found something in there that said they could monitor us, but not who they are.”

“And you think this worm might be ‘they’?” Breena says.

“Yeah. Plans within plans within plans. Tomorrow, at dinner, I’m passing off what I’ve found to Abbi. And Diane when I see her next. And I’ve got to see Bleach, get warrants from him to ransack that house. Actually get out in the field.”

That has the other three all staring at him, not happy.

Tim puts his chopsticks down and holds out his hands in a defensive gesture. “I won’t go on my own and won’t be breaking down any doors. I’m sure Tony, Draga, and Bishop will be willing to do that. But me and mine need to go in and pull all the tech out.”
“Long day,” Abby says, rubbing his thigh, kissing him.

“Yeah. I know I’ll make it to Shabbos, if for no other reason than to talk to Abbi, but might be burning the midnight, midday, and midweekend oil.”

“I’ll keep your place on the bed warm,” Jimmy says with a cocky smile.

Tim laughs a little at that, and then grabs the last bite of his dinner (lemon chicken with broccoli.)

“Speaking of beds,” Abby says, “just got word that the bigger one should be here next week Wednesday, and we’ll all have enough room to spread out, here.”

There’s general rejoicing at that, which gets cut short when Tim’s phone rings.

“At least they called first.” He gets up, thinking that he’s going to have to go in, but sees Fornell on the caller ID. “Fornell? You guys catch something interesting?”

“Not exactly. Wendy’s getting the guest count for the wedding ready, and we haven’t gotten an RSVP from you.”

Tim spends a moment just staring into space, wondering how on earth he and Abby got invited to Fornell’s wedding, and then says, “Uh… I’m sorry, we didn’t get an invitation.”

“Jethro thought that was the story. I’ve emailed you the details. It’s the first. Starts at four. Here in town.”

“Oh, uh… let me talk to Abby.”

He feels Fornell smile. Then he puts his hand over the microphone. “That’s Fornell. We’re invited to his wedding, which is two weeks from Saturday. You want to go?”

Abby glances at Breena, who nods. “We’ve got her.”

“One condition on the babysitting, I want video of Jethro’s best man speech,” Jimmy adds.

Abby nods. “I’m up for a wedding. Up for seeing Gibbs give his speech even more.”

Tim had forgotten that and he starts to laugh a little. Then he grabs the phone. “Abby and I will be there, happily.” Then another thought hits Tim. “You busy tomorrow night?”

“I don’t know, why?”

“Shabbos is at Jimmy’s house. Starts at sunset. You and Wendy should really come.”

“Celebrate the Sabbath with you?” You got something you need to get to me? Is clear subtext to Fornell’s question.

“Yeah. You really should.” Yeah, get your ass there, it’ll be worth your while.

“Okay. I’ll check with Wendy, but I think we’ll be there.”

“Good. You know the way?”

“Jethro will help if I can’t find it.”

“Good. Okay, see you tomorrow.” Tim hears Fornell hang up, and then puts his phone down and Brand cracks her knuckles, smiles, a deeply satisfied and mean little smirk, and starts to type. Ngyn’s completely downloaded everything that was on the computer monitoring them. She and Howard are going through it right now, looking to see if anything suggests who’s watching and what they’re doing.

Brand’s on destruction. Happily on destruction. She’s grinning and humming a little bit as she sets her trap.

As anyone who works with a computer knows, magnets kill them. That’s the only way to truly kill the information on a computer. However, as anyone who’s got a wicked imagination, an off the charts understanding of how a computer works, and how to program, and more than a bit of electrical engineering knows, if you fuck with a computer badly enough, you can tell it to make it’s own tiny EMP, and that’ll fry the little bastard so dead all you can do with it is melt it down to reclaim the minerals used in making it.

And Brand’s doing that. With a grin. While bopping along to Taylor Swift. She’s humming Bad Blood as her fingers fly over her keyboard.

This is so perfect. She can’t believe she gets paid to do this. Her friends are just getting into the college groove, complaining about books and dorm food and she’s killing someone spying on a branch of Federal Law Enforcement. And when they get done, maybe they’ll hit a bar and go dancing.

Life is awesome!

---

Co-ed naked dinner time turned into co-ed naked TV time. Which is warm and close and snuggly. Not particularly sexy or erotic, they’re really watching TV, but it is close and sensual.

TV time leads to bedtime, and bedtime to sex time. There are a lot of flavors of sex. And right now, Tim’s looking for physical closeness. He’s not horny, not in the gotta-get-laid-and-off sense. (Jerkng-off wouldn’t take care of what he’s looking for right now, and it usually works just fine for plain-vanilla-horny.) He does want to be wrapped in the people he loves. He wants touch and soft words and affection. And sex is his favorite way of getting that.

So, there’s nothing particularly fast or frantic about the sex. Slow, lots of kissing and petting. He’s mostly with Abby, and Jimmy’s mostly with Breena, though they’re all kissing each other.

Holding Breena’s hand while he makes love with Abby, able to feel Jimmy’s hip against the backs of his fingers, slow and easy and quiet, that’s meeting every need he has right now, and a few he wasn’t aware of.

He’s smiling at that, enjoying the breath and heat of these people he holds dear.
Tomorrow there’ll be mysteries and conspiracies and crime, but right now, life is sweet.
Getting Deeper

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Tim’s a bit sore and stiff (and not in the good way) when he wakes up. A bed big enough for all four of them can’t come soon enough. Sleeping on the floor so they can all stay together is for the birds.

He rubs his eyes, feels around on the floor until he finds where he put his pain meds, and swallows them down.

A quick glance at the clock shows him that they’ve got about ten minutes until little girls start to chirp.

He closes his eyes, snuggles in against Abby, and scoots both of them back a little which puts his back against Jimmy’s side, and closes his eyes to drift for a bit.

He’s very surprised to wake up again. Tim didn’t think he’d fall back to sleep, but he did, and jerks awake when he feels Abby getting up. It’s his morning for stretching out, PT, shower and the like, while she gets Kelly. So he rubs his eyes again, and starts working the kinks out.

Apparently Breena’s giving her hand on baby wrangling this morning, because Jimmy’s taking an extra moment to just lay around and rest. But after a minute, he opens his eyes and sits up. “Morning.”

Tim nods at him, working on stretching his arm and shoulder.

He watches as Jimmy gets up, rolls up the blankets and pillows, putting them back on their bed, and get started on his usual morning yoga routine.

And for as much as Tim was thinking he’d like to join in at the lake, but his arm wouldn’t let him, it’s occurring to him that right now, as Jimmy’s doing his normal routine, that he doesn’t need his arms for a lot of this. And if he were to ask, Jimmy could probably find alternatives for him.

So, as Jimmy starts his day in tree pose, Tim joins in.

Jimmy flashes him a quick smile and says, “Remember, you just do what you can as well as you can. You’re not competing with me, just with what you did yesterday.”

“Which was nothing.”

“Congrats, you’ve already won. Don’t hurt yourself.”

Tim nods. Before he got hurt he could get into tree with his foot up against his thigh. He tries to do that, he wobbles, a lot, and comes to the conclusion that falling down is going to hurt a lot more than he’d like, so it’s back down to just above his ankle. He sighs. That’s where he started when he and Abby began this, almost two years ago.

“Back to square one.”
Jimmy opens his eyes and glances at what Tim’s doing. “That’s because you’re on the foot they broke. Your right will be better.”

Tim sighs at that, too. “We’ll see.”

And they did. He’s slower and a lot more wobbly, and nowhere near as strong, even on his left arm and right foot (because he hasn’t done much with them since June) but he’s not completely back to square one on the uninjured limbs. He was pleased to see he could do at least a version of down dog, and most of the warrior sequence still works because he can extend his arms all the way in front of him, and because he started working on his twists to help with the broken ribs, he’s got almost his full range on that.

It certainly wasn’t elegant or controlled or flexible or strong, but it was better than nothing, and as much as he missed where he had been, he is happy to be moving again.

“So, if they were giggling over you and Tim washing the girls, what do you think they’d do with this?” Breena asks when they come down for breakfast.

Apparently she got a shot of him and Jimmy, both in down dog, (he’s doing it one-handed, his right he’s got extended as far as it will go, about six inches away from his ear. It looks awkward as hell, jutting out toward the side) from behind.

Jimmy snorts a quick laugh. “God… Yeah, burn that shot.”

Tim glances over his shoulder, sees it, and winces. He doesn’t usually look at himself when he’s exercising. It’s one thing to check your form in the mirrors, it’s another thing all together to see your naked self, fresh from waking up, stubbly, hair all over the place, balls swinging in the breeze, flushed from working harder than you have in months, doing a yoga pose, badly, with another guy who’s just as rumpled as you are, but is at least doing it right.

Tim shakes his head. “Please, burn that.”

“It’s cute!” Abby adds.

He shakes his head again. “You want it for your own viewing, fine, but that’s not an angle I want to see myself or him from.”

The ladies laugh at that, and then hand over little girls. Food has been made, but not yet fed to small people, so he and Jimmy are on feeding babies. As Tim’s getting the eggs cut into tiny pieces for all three girls, and Breena and Abby are heading upstairs, Jimmy’s not doing much besides looking thoughtful.

Tim tosses the bottle toward him, with a “Heads up,” and he does manage to catch it without letting it hit the floor, but it’s clear he’s not thinking about feeding babies.

“What?” Tim asks.

“Real pictures. Tomorrow, have Abby get real shots of where you are. We’ll get them every Saturday morning. I think that’ll be good. You’ll be able to see what you’re doing instead of just going based on a vague idea.”
“Charting my progress?”

“Something like that. You won’t feel so stalled out if you can see yourself getting deeper and easier into the poses.”

Tim nods, that makes a certain amount of sense.

“And, you know, if you want to come back to bootcamp, assuming that we get a rainy weekend soon, Ziva’s not fighting anymore. I’m sure you two could find things to do. Get you back to working out on some level.”

Tim inclines his head. He has been missing that, though he’s wary about going back to the gym and watching Jimmy and Tony and Collin pound on each other.

“Or don’t. If it’s too soon, it’s too soon.” Jimmy seems to get why he’s not leaping at that opportunity.

He inclines his head at that, too. “I don’t know. We’ll see how it goes. And even if it does rain, most of the inside of the house is ripped out, so the next few together days, rain or shine, may be planning out where the walls go and working more on sketching that out.”

“Yes.” Jimmy notices that Tim’s put food for the girls in front of them, and appears to be making something for him, but isn’t cooking for himself. “You not eating?”

“Got a breakfast date with Bishop and her husband. Then I’ll be seeing if I can get some time with Bleach. Then work.”

“Ah.”

“Yeah. You’re riding in with Abby this morning.”

Jimmy smiles. “At least it’s not Gibbs or Ziva!”

Tim chuckles a bit at that while blending up Jimmy’s morning green smoothie.

Leon’s not sure how to start the conversation. If they’d had a normal courtship. If he’d met Lara after a divorce… Or if he hadn’t been her Boss… (Technically, he still is. That’s… complicated. He pays the nanny service, and they pay her, but since they aren’t married, he’s not going to suggest she look after his kids for free.) If any host of things had been different, this would be different. But it’s not.

Once the kids are on the bus and off to school, she’s eyeing him. He’s usually the first one out, and today he’s just sitting in the kitchen, looking tense.

“You got some bad news?” Lara asks.

He opens his mouth, thinks for a second, shuts it, thinks for a second more, and then says, “I don’t know. I don’t tell you about work… I know it’s not fair, or right, but…”

“But it cost you too much in the past. I know.”

“I’m glad you do. I don’t want you thinking that’s about you.” He’s seen guys who got involved with someone “below” them and got embarrassed about that. Didn’t want to admit they’d fallen for the nanny or housekeeper or whomever… That’s not the case here, and he wants her to know that.

She smiles gently at him. “I know it’s not. But, something big is going on, isn’t it?”

He shrugs a bit. “Probably.” He takes a deep breath, and then starts to fill her in. He starts with CGIS, then moves to the missing IRS account numbers, touches on the worm in his systems, and wraps with Dr. Young.

She whistles softly at that. “That’s a lot to have on one plate.”

He nods. “Yeah. And, it’s probably going to get worse. I’ve got people in almost every agency that matters. I can see bits and pieces of this. The cop in me knows this is big, and it’s bad, and I can let it lie. I can brush it under the rug and pretend it’s not real. But it is real, and I don’t think this is one bunch of bad apples and another mystery, and that it’s not all connected to something bigger behind the scenes.”

“And you’re afraid that if you dig into this, something bad is going to happen?” Lara asks, looking concerned.

“Yeah.” He takes a deep breath at that. He is afraid. He’s been afraid since Jackie died, very protective of his home and family, but this is a different flavor of fear, one he hasn’t felt in a while.
He’s afraid that he might be the target, and he’s not properly prepared to make that as easy as possible for the people he leaves behind. “I’m afraid they might try to take me out of the picture, or go after you or the kids to keep me quiet. It’s easy to be a white knight when you’ve got nothing to lose.” He looks at her quietly, and his eyes flick to the pictures of the kids on his mantle. “And I’m afraid this isn’t fair to you or them. They’ve already…”

She puts her hand on Leon’s. “If you got drafted, you’d go fight, right?”

“If I get drafted, now, the US Navy’s in awfully sad shape,” he says dryly.

She flashes him a, you get my point look.

“If they dug my old Navy number up, I’d go. Oldest damn Lieutenant Commander ever, but I’d go.”

“And Kayla’s headed for Annapolis.”

He nods.

She squeezes his hand. “This isn’t any different. You signed up to be the White Knight, so go be the White Knight.”

He nods again. Then he takes a breath. “Marry me.”

She arches an eyebrow at him and sits back in her chair. “Well, that was the least romantic proposal ever.”

He looks a little sheepish. “I’ll knock your socks off later.” He smiles a little. She knows he can do romantic when he puts his mind to it. “But right now, if you’ll go to the courthouse with me this morning, I’d like to have this done as soon as possible. You’d have my pension and the house, my money, next of kin. The kids will go to you. And if they try to destroy me rather than kill me, you won’t have to testify against me, and—“

“Leon.” He stops talking. “No one’s killing you today, right?”
He can’t tell if she thinks he’s being overly cautious or if she’s trying to figure out if he’s giving her the sugar-coated version. “Probably not, but… I’ve got people running things, and I don’t know what those things are going to find.”

“You really think they’ll… Who’s they?”

“I don’t know, yet. But I do know ‘they’ prefer it that way and won’t look kindly on me trying to find out.”

“You think ‘they’ll’ kill you?” She’s staring to sound nervous.

“Jethro’s got a five inch hole in his back. The man Borin replaced ‘died in a car accident.’ When my ME got a hold of him, he found the bullets. Might just be the Coast Guard. I hope it’s just the Coast Guard. But… it feels bad. Feels tense and nervous.”

“Okay.”

He’s starting to see fear in her eyes. She’s finally starting to feel what’s been keeping him tense and nervous.

“Maybe I’m being too sensitive on this, but I want you and the kids to have all the protection you can get, so, if this isn’t anything you want, not long term, you can divorce me when we’re in the clear—“

“Hush, you.” She squares her shoulders and squeezes his hand. “Let me go get changed. I’m not getting married in jeans and a t-shirt.”

When Tim gets to the Elaine’s, Jake and Bishop are sitting there, waiting for him.

Tim can see, perfectly well, that Jake is wearing jeans, sneakers, and a sweater, but somehow, seeing it, Tim’s mental image of Jake is wearing a suit. A very stiff, very formal, pristine, good suit.

Maybe it’s the glasses, or the posture, or the well-kept light brown hair, (or possibly the pancake in front of him cut into very precise little squares) but Jake Bish—Malloy, is a suit kind of guy. Actually, as he’s offering his hand and Bishop’s introducing them, he gets the sense that Jake Malloy is the kind of guy who looks like he belongs in a suit even when he’s sleeping.

He also, as Tim sits down, slides a thumb drive over to him. “Judge Harland sent me a subpoena that covered everything. I think what you’re looking for will be on that.”

“Thanks.” Tim takes a folded piece of paper out of his pocket. “I saw this while I was reading up, and… I thought it might be interesting to you. Bishop’s mentioned that you do government watchdog stuff, and… I’d never heard of this.” He passes over the copy of the law allowing someone to watch everything he does at work.

Jake looks at the page Tim printed out for him. He nods. “Ah, that.” It’s clear by the look on his face and tone of voice that, yes, he does know about this already.

“Is that… legal?” Tim asks.

Jake looks dryly amused by that. “Of course it’s legal. That’s a law you are handing me.”
Tim rolls his eyes a bit. “Not exactly what I meant.”

“I’m sure, but it touches on what I mean. You are a government employee, working for the government, on a government computer, you have no right to, nor expectation of, privacy in that circumstance. That aspect of this law cannot be challenged. On the bigger scale of what I mean, everything you are about to get into will be legal. I’m sure that if what you’ve got your hands on is a version of the working paper I turned down, that between then and now, implementing that paper became legal.”

“I’m not following…” Tim’s fairly sure the whole warrant thing is pretty much ironclad.

“Any law Congress passes is legal until a court torpedoes it. Congress isn’t supposed to pass laws that are blatantly unconstitutional, but that doesn’t mean it can’t. And if it does, those laws must be followed until someone with standing fights said law and wins. If the State really wants that law, they will keep fighting it up the chain of courts. A bad law isn’t really dead until the Supreme Court says so. Should the law in question be buried in say, an appropriations bill that no one has read all the way through, and should the implementation of said law be done quietly, without people noticing it, and should the Supreme Court decline to take the case when it comes up, then said law will remain legal, even though it may be blatantly un-constitutional.”

Tim’s not sure if Jake is the most jaded person he’s ever met, or the most realistic. Either way, he’s starting to get a bad feeling about everything they’re getting into. He’s an officer of the law, and if this is legal, he’s not sure, what, if anything, he can do about it.

As Tim thinks about what Jake said, he notices the word, aspect which means this isn’t ironclad. “My people tell me that information is being collected from my systems and sent to a private home, and I can’t find anywhere in that law that says who is watching.”

Jake smiles a little at that. “That’s the part of the law that we are… exploring. So far our FOIA requests have all been returned with, ‘We don’t know anything about this. Not our job.’ No government agencies are admitting that they’re the ones in charge of supervising everyone. Which means our requests are useless. We’ve wanted to move on taking a case on this, but as of this point we don’t have standing.”

Tim squints at him.

“I can’t sue unless I can do it in the name of someone who’s being effected by the law. And, as I’m sure you’ve noticed that code is buried deep, and I don’t think anyone else has even noticed it, yet. On my side of it, in addition to not knowing who was monitoring, we had no idea how they were doing the monitoring.”

“I thought you just said this is legal. What standing would we have?”

“It is. You can’t sue for breach of privacy. I think we can make a case based on neither of us knowing who is watching. Since the law doesn’t specify who is watching, when someone gets upset about you not complying with the law, we’ll counter sue saying they don’t have any authorization to take the information they’re taking.”

That sounds like a mess to Tim. He rubs his eyes and glances at Bishop. She’s not looking to happy about this either. He wonders what they were like before they got this disillusioned. Then he sighs and says, “According to Khan, the version of this they’re using on private citizens has to be hacked into Norton. They don’t have permission to put it there.”

Jake aims the driest smile Tim’s ever seen at him, and takes a very measured, precise sip of his coffee.
before saying, “Again, trust me, if this is happening, and if the person Khan is working for actually works for some branch of the US Government, what he is doing will be legal. But, if Norton catches them at it, then they will have standing for quite a bit more than breach of privacy, and letting the world know they were hacked by the US Government would be frightfully embarrassing, legal or not.”

Tim thinks about that. In that Khan’s behind both of these, it’s one case. In that only one of them is hitting him, it’s two. Treat it like two cases. Right now the thing with Norton isn’t in his ballpark, other than he knows about it, and he should probably see about giving them a heads up. He doesn’t think he knows anyone with them, but he’s got to know someone who knows someone.

Onto the stuff that he’s actually investigating. “So, Murray writes me up the warrant I need to ransack the house my data went to. Within a few hours some Man In Black type shows up and tells me to hand everything over. I tell him to pound sand because there’s nothing that says he can take that information back.”

“And then he and his crew arrest you for breaking whatever law,” Tim winces, that didn’t work out so well for him last time. Though, given his position, and the legal beagles that NCIS has at hand, he figures that worst comes to worst they’ll make him take a leave of absence and sit around at home. Where, if push comes to shove, he and Jethro will keep on investigating this. “And then we know where to aim the case. Then I know where to aim the FIOA requests, and if they don’t comply, I can sue. And once they put you in jail, I can sue in your name because the law doesn’t specify who is supposed to be doing the watching, and with any luck we can get it to the Supreme Court and make them require future laws to specify who does what.”

Tim sighs. Lawyers. “So, you’re saying the best you can do is make sure they have to tell us who is watching?”

Jake nods, looking angry and tired. Tim’s got a sense that he likely was one of Bishop’s true believers and these days, he’s lost what he believed in.

“Okay. Here’s the next question. Since I do not actually know who dumped this monitoring software into my system, can I just delete it?”

Jake thinks about that. “To the best of your knowledge a cyberhacker was hired to put this worm into your system. You don’t know who hired him, or how it got there…”

“The guy who hired him used a false name, bad one, and claims to be from an agency I’m sure he’s not from, but if he is, he’s got no jurisdiction on us. This looks hinkey as hell.”

Jake inclines his head. “You do not, in fact, know that this worm is the result of the law you just handed me, because the law does not specify how it will work, so I’d say, yes, as Director of Cybercrime for NCIS it’s well within the scope of your job to kill any breaches of security you see, and to then aggressively go after them.”

Tim smiles at that. He can and will do that, and when the Men in Black show up… Well, he’s kind of looking forward to that. He imagines Vance will enjoy it, too.

Elaine comes over, with a western omelet for him, along with a decaf coffee. “Thanks, Elaine.”

“No problem. You two good?”

Jake and Bishop nod.

She pats Tim’s hand. “Gibbs’ redheads were here yesterday. They got talkin’ shop, too. Abbi hired the accountant.”

Tim’s eyes go wide, and he laughs. “Oh God!” He sniggers a bit more. “Oh, I can’t wait to talk to him about that.” Another quick laugh as Bishop and Jake stare at him. He gestures to them in an I’ll explain in a second sort of way. “I got an invite to Fornell’s wedding. Video of Jethro giving the best man speech will be in your mailbox within a day or two after.”

Elaine giggles a bit at that, too. He gets another pat along with, “Good boy. Can’t wait to see that.”

“Don’t I know it!” Tim’s eyes light with pleasure at that idea. He can’t even begin to imagine what Jethro’s going to do with this.

Elaine heads off, and Tim turns his attention back to Bishop and Jake. “Sorry for the gossip. Jethro’s current… they aren’t engaged yet, but I’d put better than even odds on it happening before the year ends. Anyway, Abbi, Jethro’s love, just hired Diane, his ex-wife, to work for her at CGIS, cleaning up the mess she inherited.”

Bishop giggles a bit at that. “They get along?”

“I haven’t really seen them together, but they’ve both have that got-to-work-the-case-until-it’s-done, bulldog-with-a-bone, tenacity. Diane’s pickier and more abrasive. Abbi’s a lot more like Gibbs, quiet until it’s time to not be quiet, and then she quietly kills you. They’re really intense women.”

As Tim’s saying that, he notices that Bishop’s enjoying the idea of Gibbs, who she kind of knows, in a round-about seen-him-a-few-times sort of way, with the tangled loves, but Jake’s thinking about something else.

“You know CGIS Director Borin?” Jake asks.

Tim inclines his head in a yes sort of way. “She’s pretty much my step-mom.”

Jake nods at that. Bishop nudges him, giving him, the go ahead and say it, look. “Ellie’s mentioned some of what’s going on over there. The little bits and pieces she gets from Agent DiNozzo. Do you know if she wants legal help?”

Tim shrugs. “She had to fire just about everyone she had on staff. I don’t know exactly who or what she needs, but I’ve got her phone and email, and I know that right now, anyone who looks like they know what they’re doing and don’t have any ties to CGIS are welcome to come help her clean up the place. FOIA requests getting boring?”

Jake inclines his head a bit. “We file them. They shuffle us around. Many never get any sort of useful answer. The ones that do, we write up a press release, and within a week no one remembers what we’ve found. Add in the fact that so much of what we’re digging up is legal and so much of it we do not have standing to do anything about, and, yes, it’s frustrating.”

“Jake would like to see his work actually put bad guys away.”

Jake nods. He thought, when he signed up the NSA, that he’d be prosecuting terrorists. He ended up being put in charge of coming up with ways the NSA could do whatever it wanted, no matter what the law actually said. He signed up with the Open Government Project in the hopes that his work would help bring light to what was going on, and make things change. He’s seen frightfully little of that in the last two years. He’s applied for Internal Affairs at several different government branches and half a dozen police forces, but hasn’t gotten any nibbles. Helping with a major corruption case sounds like something he can do, and he hopes that CGIS might want him.
“Abbi’s certainly in the putting-bad-guys-away field.” Tim takes the paper with the law on it back from Jake, and then writes Abbi’s contact information on it. “Not that I’ve ever worked for NSA or Homeland or any of the rest of the alphabet soup, but one reason I think we do a good job, and why CGIS is going to do a good job, is that they’re run by people who were cops and remember what the job really is.”

Jake smiles a little. “Good.”

Bishop looks like she’s just about done her breakfast. “Tony expecting you in first thing?” Tim asks her.

“Soon.”

“Okay. You guys on an active case right now?”

She looks at him like where have you been? “Dr. Young?”

“Oh, right. Sorry. You guys won’t be up to serving a warrant will you?”

“Unless the case is magically solved when I get in.”

Tim nods and holds his hand up. “Got it. I’ll see who’s up.” He looks to Jake and Bishop. “I’ve got the address where all the information is going. By now my guys should have the information out of those computers and it’s about time for us to get moving on laying hands on them.”

---

“We’re going to need a witness, right?” Lara asks as she comes down the stairs.

Leon nods, and smiles at her. It is a white dress. Cute little sundress. “I was going to ask you. I was going to do it right. Didn’t want to do it like this, but…”

She gives him that cut the bull look.

“I was. Just, didn’t want to rush anything.”

“Uh huh.”

“Kind of hoping to hit a quiet stretch at work, and find a time to take enough time off to do it really special. You were talking about how you’d never been to St. Croix, and how you wanted to go, and I was thinking that we’d go, and I’d ask on the beach.”

That gets a smile out of Lara. “Then, how about, when this is done, and you’ve slain your dragon, you take me to St. Croix, and we have a real wedding, on that beach.”

He pulls her close, into a deep kiss. “I will happily do that.”
“You know,” Bleach says, as he wheels himself into chambers, “it’s not that I mind seeing all of you all the time, but if anyone ever decides to challenge any of this, you’ll have a better time fighting it off if every warrant you have isn’t from one judge.”

Tim sighs. “Probably a good point. This one’s really straightforward, though.”

Bleach laughs at that, pushing his glasses onto his face, and reading Tim’s paperwork. He’s nodding as he looks over everything. Then he looks up at Tim. “You’re right, this does look straightforward. Why are you here?”

“Because the advantage of one judge I trust for everything is that I’m not worried about my moves being broadcast to people I don’t want to know them.”

Bleach looks over the page again, reaching for his warrant papers. “I can see that.”

Tim taps his warrant request. “It gets worse. We didn’t just notice that worm. I talked to the guy who wrote it, and they dumped it into the federal operating system. It’s probably watching your computers, too.”

That gets Bleach’s interest.

“Unless someone else has noticed it and quietly disposed of it, it’s watching everyone’s systems.”

Bleach’s eyes narrow slightly.

“The lawyer I asked you to send that subpoena to says that it’s probably legal.”

Bleach has the look of someone ready to storm the ramparts. “We’ll see about that. Might have to have a chat with Mr. Malloy.”

“What are you thinking?”

Bleach shakes his head and starts filling in the blanks on the warrant. Once he’s done, he says, “Any more of these you’re going to need?”

“Maybe. Depends if the next link is willing to talk to me or not. I’ll find a different judge for that one.”

Bleach nods. “Conspiracies work best when you don’t look like you’re doing anything outside of your normal routine.”

Tim inclines his head. “I’ll keep that in mind.”

Lara and Vance are in the car, when she says, “What are we telling the kids?”

“I was hoping to not say anything about it, yet. There was a conversation I was planning on having with them before heading to St. Croix, and I’d still like to have that conversation with them.”

“I think they’ll be okay with it.”
“I do, too. Not like we’re hiding what we’re doing.”

She nods at that. They’d already had one conversation, all four of them, about the shift in relationship from nanny to girlfriend. Another one is probably in order though.

“So, witness?” she says.

“Only one guy I can think of who’s up right now, not at work, and can take a secret to the grave.”

“Gibbs?”

Leon nods. “Is that okay?”

“Not my dream wedding, but it’ll do.”

“This is just taking care of paperwork… or buying insurance. Dream wedding’s still coming up.”

She smiles at that. “That’s a good way to think about it.”

---

Tim’s got the warrant in hand, a thumb drive to read through, and plans in his head as he’s walking into the Dungeon. As he gets closer to the lounge area, he hears music. It’s not very loud, but, it’s really raunchy.

He then sees the cause of the music. Brand, laying on the sofa, eyes closed, but not sleeping. She’s resting and bopping (gently) along with said music.

“What are you listening to?” Tim asks Brand.

“Outkast.” She opens her eyes and is looking up at him like he’s a million years old, and right now he’s feeling that old, too. The idea that he might have to have a conversation with one of the Minions on appropriate work music had never occurred to him.

“Earbuds. I don’t care how smutty your music is, but if anyone else can hear it, you can get hit with a sexual harassment suit, so, earbuds.”

Brand’s eyes go wide. “Wait, you… understood that?” She’s starting to blush hard and scrambling to turn the music off.

“I’m not deaf. No profanity or sexually explicit anything played out loud.”

“Oh God… I didn’t…”

Tim tries not to roll his eyes too far. He supposes if your ears aren’t sharp you might not be able to understand, as in figure out the words, but they lyrics aren’t in code and they aren’t subtle. Not like that line about ‘left her throat warm in the dorm room’ is about knitting scarves. “Brand, no one in this office is so inexperienced or sheltered as to not get what that song was about.”

She nods, looking mortified.

“So, I don’t see Howard or Ngyn…”
“We’re done. I stuck around to hand you this.” She gives him three thumb drives. “Everything on their system. By now it’s a brick. No one trailed our attack back to us.”

“Great. When was the last time you slept?”

“Caught a nap at 4:00 when we wrapped.”

“Go home, go to sleep.”

“Yes, Boss.” She stands up and slings her bag over her shoulder. “Um, Boss…”

“Yeah.”

“Whose lips are on your wrist?”

Tim licks his lips for a second, thinking of how to deal with that, and then he decides that channeling Gibbs’ look of doom would do the job. After all, it always got him and Tony to shut up.

It works on Brand, too. She quails a bit, and then nods, and heads off.

There are some things Vance never expected to see. Gibbs, on his sofa, in sweatpants and a t-shirt, big black dog next to him, working on a computer is one of them.

“What’s going on?” Vance asks as Gibbs looks up at him, and then Lara, and back to Vance.

“Am I interrupting?” Vance asks as Gibbs looks up at him, and then Lara, and back to Vance.

“Yeah.”

“Yeah.”

Lara smiles at him, a bit wry, a bit happy, and a bit looking forward to seeing him react to this. “As long as I don’t have to give a speech, I’m fine with it. Let me get dressed, and we’ll go.”

And with that, Lara and Leon had the witness for their wedding.

There’s one thing Tim didn’t mention about Brand’s music choice, and that’s most of the guys he knows can’t listen to a song about oral sex without thinking about it. (Okay, he can’t, and he’s sure Jimmy can’t, and he’s not sure about anyone else, but for this purpose he and Jimmy constitute everyone.) And today is not a day to be thinking about sex. He’s got more than enough to do without images of “Lick you like a lizard,” “I do suck lips until hips jerk,” let alone anything along the lines of ‘throat warming’ (yeah, he’s not cool or anything, but he’s fairly sure what all of that means) dancing through his mind.
 Didn’t do that last night.

Should have done that last night.

Definitely will do that tonight.

He heads into his office, not really paying attention to his work. Tonight’s a long time off. And he does have to head into the lab to get Abby’s report on “Harvey.” If he times it right, say aims for lunch, he could be there when no one else is. Just him and Abby, and there could certainly be some ‘throat warming’ and ‘lip sucking’ involved.

He enjoys the fantasy of that for a few seconds when it hits him that these days the Lab is never empty. One LabRat or another is always wandering in… So, lab’s out.

He puts Jake’s thumb drive into his computer, still not thinking about work.

Autopsy’s quiet right now. No dead body. Slip in there, use the back room, Jimmy could keep watch, make sure no one walked in.

Ohhh… better. Jimmy could play, too. Wait for Allan to head off. All three of them… Mmmm… Yeah, he’s really liking that idea.

The information on Jake’s thumb drive isn’t coming up. Because he hasn’t actually turned the computer on. Focus. He’s been focusing. On work. Tim rubs his eyes and hits the power button on his computer.

His computer doesn’t boot up fast. So he goes back to thinking about the three of them in the morgue. It’d have to be fast. What’s a three way quickie? He’s got more than enough experience with two, but three… Oh… The image of Jimmy doing Abby from behind while he goes down on her and strokes himself off fills his mind. Yeah, that’d do it. Better, record it and send it to Breena!

He can imagine her opening that shot up, seeing what’s on it, and having hours to wait until they get to her place for Shabbos tonight. The part of him that remembers Valentine’s Day is thinking that’s a splendid plan. An evil little grin spreads across his face.

His computer beeps, pulling him out of lusty revenge. Probably a good thing. He’s half hard and doesn’t need to be sporting wood if any of the Minions come walking in.

Another though hits and sex starts to fade from his mind and work begins to fill it. He’s got this warrant he needs someone to run for him. Time to call down to dispatch and see who’s up for warrant serving.

He lifts his phone to his ear, clicking on the icon for Jake’s thumb drive. He’s not really paying attention to the phone as his eyes scan the page. Just a few lines. Apparently it was a joint paper between three of the NSA CyberAnalysts. Jason Rey, Yasmin Amin, and Darcy Lovvy came up with this gem.

He’s about to start googling them when Dispatch picks up. He explains what he needs, and they tell him to get the warrant to Dornie. He remembers that Dornie does have his own team now, not a MCRT, just a run-of-the-mill lesser crime team, and yes, they tend to handle warrants for non-field teams.

He looks around the office. Manner and Connon are in. He grabs them. “Want to go on a field trip?”

Manner doesn’t look enthusiastic, but Connon is interested. Tim shows them the warrant. “Agent Dornaget has to get this, and then serve it, and I want you two hanging back and removing everything once his people have secured the scene. Can you do that?"

Now Connon’s looking unsure and Manner’s excited. But they both nod.

“Good. Bring me all sorts of goodies back.”

Once they’re in the car, Gibbs is willing to get deeper into what’s going on. He’s got two theories for what’s going on, and either the rabbit died (not very likely) or things are heating up again (very likely) and Vance is making sure Rule 44 comes into play.

“I take it this isn’t just a swept off your feet moment.”

“No,” Vance says, getting Gibbs up to date.

Gibbs listens and nods. “Rule 44?”

“Rule 44?” Lara asks. “How many rules do you have?”

“Whole bunch. That one’s about making sure you protect your family. And just so you know, anything ever feels off, you ever don’t feel safe at home, my place is…” he was about to say always open, but he does lock the door sometimes, now, and likely should do so more often than he does. “You and the kids are always welcome at my home. I’m usually around.” He looks at his right arm, which he can’t do much with because of his shoulder and ribs. “I can shoot straight left or right, and Mona’ll go after anyone I tell her to.”

Lara’s starting to look really worried. “How bad do you think this will be?”

Jethro shrugs and then smiles a little, thinking that Lara probably doesn’t know his history, but he knows she knows Leon’s. “Hope doesn’t stop bullets. No matter what, we protect our own.”

Tim flashes Abby a quick text. Anything on Harvey, yet?

Not yet. You check the contact information he had on his form?

That’s a good idea. He hadn’t bothered to because it was such a fake name, but due diligence. He should check with the CIA to see if Harvey Wallbanger worked there.

On it. Thanks. Lunch date?

I hope so.

“Do you Leon Vance, take this woman to be your lawfully wedded wife, to have and to hold, from this day forward, ‘til death do you part?”

“I do.”

It feels very different this time. He’s not jittery or nervous or so besotted with love and lust. He’s not looking at a woman and seeing only a future filled with joy and hope.

And he’s really hoping this isn’t a huge mistake. He hopes, prays that this is him being scared of the dark, and that this isn’t necessary. On that level, he hopes he’s making a mistake.

At the same time, he hopes that he’s not wrecking this for Lara. She’s never married, and though they haven’t talked about it, he knows she’s got an idea of what her wedding would be like, and this is much more utilitarian than she would have liked.

Hell, he doesn’t even have a ring.

But she says her vows, and that feels good. She says I do and it hits him in his heart. He feels this and her, and this might not be the start he wanted for a life with her, but it’s what they have, and he’s going to do everything he can to make sure this isn’t a mistake.

And this afternoon, he’s getting her a ring.

Tim’s feeling devious. If he were going to give someone that bad of credentials, credentials that are all but screaming I’m fake! he’d also make sure that anyone who checked those credentials would raise a red flag.

In fact, the more he thinks about it, the more he’s thinking that searching for Harvey is likely a way to tip his hand, let whoever’s screwing with him know he knows they’re onto him.

He grabs his phone. Kill the search for Harvey’s prints.

??? Comes back from Abby.

I’d betting those prints are flagged. You look for them, and someone gets a heads up.

So what are you thinking?

Giving Diane a call. Khan gets paid. Let’s track the money and find him like that. And while she’s on it, I’m getting into whatever these guys stole from us.

:) Go get ‘em!
No rice tossed over the bride, no honeymoon. Gibbs treats them to a nice breakfast out. The coffee is good, the French toast is better, and they do split a cupcake.

And then it’s back to work. This is supposed to be secret. It’s not supposed to tip anyone off. So, a regular day at the office, just in a bit late.

“Director Vance, a courier dropped this off for you,” his secretary says as she hands him a box.

He’s expecting a package, but he didn’t think it would be this big. It’s almost shoebox sized, which is too big for a thumb drive or a collection of prints.

He takes it from his secretary. It’s way too heavy for fingerprints, too. “You sign for it?”

She shakes her head. “Got here before I did. Front desk signed for it.”

“Okay.” He steps into his office, and with a feeling of foreboding opens the box. He blinks and bites his lip, an exhaled “Fuck” slipping over his lips as he sees what’s inside. Then he rubs his face and stops worrying that his danger sense may have been on overdrive and he’s acting too fast in marrying Lara.

He picks up his phone, still staring at the two hands sitting in a box on his desk, and makes a call. “Dr. Palmer, I need you up here.”

Jimmy gets up a few minutes later, and as soon as he steps into the office, he can smell what’s up. Human meat that’s not kept on ice has a particular smell, and he knows it well.

He is, however, worried about why he’s smelling it up here. “Director?”

“I was told that I’d get confirmation that the man who killed Dr. Young had been ‘taken care of.’” Leon gestures to the box on his desk and Jimmy looks in, nodding at it.

“And that’s your confirmation.”

“I’d imagine so. Or it’s a very unsubtle message to stop asking, and possibly both. I need you to get prints and for Mrs. McGee to run them, quietly.”

Jimmy gently takes the box. “I can do that. Should I ask who told you they’d be sending confirmation?”

Leon looks away from the hands to Jimmy. “I think you’re significantly better off if you don’t know that.”

Jimmy nods again, looking at the hands. At a glance he can see they were taken off with a scalpel and bone saw. Whoever did this knew what they were doing. It’s a surgical amputation quality job. “I’ll take care of Mr. Doe’s hands.”

“Thank you. Also, if you could tell me if Mr. Doe was alive when he lost his hands…”

“I’ll double check with histology slides, but I’m not seeing any signs of swelling or trauma at a glance. I’d wager he was dead.”

“Thank you, Doctor.”

Jimmy picks up the box with the hands in it, tucking the flap closed. “No problem.”
Tim sends Diane the information from his personal account (not on the NCIS servers) to hers. It’s possible someone could be going after it, but he’s hoping not. Between his own hyper-vigilance on his own system, and Draga keeping an eye on Diane’s, if someone’s watching, they’re really good at their job.

Then he kills the worm in his own system. It’s nasty. It’s in there, and in there good. Specially set so that if you just cut it out, you’ll crash the whole system. He’s nodding at Khan, giving him props for that. Someone might notice the first level and kill it, and then kill the whole system, and have to have the thing “reloaded,” with, likely, another worm just like this one hiding somewhere else.

But, eventually, he’s got their system as clean as he can get it. (Assuming his guys, who are still looking, don’t bring him any other new worms.)

By the time he’s done, he sees Manner and Connon rolling several computers and stacks of evidence toward him.

He pulls out his earbuds (his own music is much less raunchy, and thus more conductive to him actually getting some work done) and says, “I take it your trip was a success.”

Manner nods, looking pleased. Connon’s looking really excited, and Tim thinks he’s never been in the field before.

“Any people?”

Connon shakes his head. “Place is a foreclosure…”

Dornie heads into Tim’s office, wheeling in another handcart with three more computers on it, and glances around. “Nice.”

Dornie had heard the first part, so he adds his own confirmation with a bit of extra information he got on his background search. “Sounds like Connon’s got it right. Foreclosed house. Only had electricity because the bank’s still trying to sell it. No water. No internet,” Dornaget adds. It took him forever to get a team, and now that he’s got one, he’s making sure everything they send him on gets done perfectly. It might take ten more years, but eventually he will build an MCRT for himself.

“Satellite service,” Connon adds, filling in how the computers were working.

“Didn’t look like anyone spent any time in there,” Dornie says.

“How so?” Tim asks.

“Whole place covered in dust. Even the computers.”

“Only things we knew had been touched was a pack of thumbdrives, and the slot where the thumbdrive goes.” Manner adds. “Looks like this was a dead end. Information goes to the computer there. They periodically pull the info off. No way to know what happens with it after that.”

Tim nods. Manner’s got it right. He can’t track information that gets downloaded and physically carried from place to place. Only hope now is that the legal beagles show up to fight over what he’s “Prints?” Tim asks.

Dornie shakes his head. “Everything was clean. No fibers. No hairs. The next door neighbors never saw anything. Whole neighborhood is blind, deaf, and dumb. You’d think there’d be a nosy neighbor keeping watch somewhere, but everyone we talked to saw nothing.”

“Back yard is wooded, and from the looks of it, you could walk in from there at night and the neighbors wouldn’t see you,” Connon says.

“Didn’t notice a car sitting around?” Tim asks.

Dornie shakes his head. “Strip mall half a mile away. Park there, walk through the woods, no one would see or suspect. I’m getting the security tapes from the mall, but figuring out the difference between a shopper and our guys’ll be tricky.”

“Lovely. Well, let’s see what the computers tell us. Connon, can you put a job up on the system? I want whoever our best hardware guy is, here, by tomorrow at the latest.”

“I’ll send up the batsignal.”

“Thanks.”

Connon and Manner turn, but Tim eyes Manner, who decides to stay, as Tim says, “Thanks, Dornie.”

“No problem. Let me know if you need our team for follow up.”

“I will.”

Dornie heads off.

“Manner, you looked like you liked the idea of a field trip.”

“I like the idea of getting who hired Khan to put this worm in place.”

“Good. C’mere.” Tim scoots over a bit and shows Manner what he’s been doing. “You up to that?”

Manner’s eyes skim over Tim’s screen. “Yeah. I can disable that.”

“Wonderful. I’m writing you up a note, calling Director Borin, and sending you over to CGIS. You’re going to clean up their system.”

Manner smiles. “With pleasure. Let me get my stuff.”

Tim nods at that, and as Manner’s almost out of the door, he says, “Steve. Director Borin needs all the help she can get. If you feel like you and her are a good fit, and if she does, it won’t bug me if you want to be there. Right now she needs guys who play by the rules, and she needs them to root out the guys who didn’t. And I can’t think of a better person than you to suggest to her for that. So, pay attention when you’re there, and if you like it…”

“You offloading me you can grab another sixteen-year-old wunderkind with lousy taste in music?”

Tim gives him a wry look. Apparently Manner had been close enough to hear Brand’s serenade. “Only if you think you’ll do better there. I’m not booting you out. I am offering you something that might be a better match with what you want to do.”

Manner nods at that. “I’ll pay attention and think about it.”

“That’s fine.”

Jimmy heads into the lab, the box, now without its contents, in his gloved hands.

Corwin sees it, and looks up at him. “Want me to take that, Dr. Palmer?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “Not this time. I’ve got instructions to give this to Abby.”

Corwin rolls his eyes a little, annoyed that it’s been more than a year and he and Zelaz and Benedict still haven’t broken into the little club of Team Gibbs. As Corwin’s doing that, it hits Jimmy that lines like that worked a hell of a lot better when he didn’t run his own department.

He’s about to apologize, but decides not to, he’s not sorry to not risk Corwin getting into some information he really shouldn’t have, and heads into the computer annex to find Abby.

“Hey.”

Abby looks up and sees the box in his hands. “Oooo… presents?”

“The best kind.” He kicks the door shut behind him, possibly the first time the door between where the computers are and the main lab’s been shut (Zelaz, hearing it shut, hadn’t even noticed there was a door there.) “It’s from Leon. He got this, with two hands in it, this morning. Supposedly they’re proof that Dr. Young’s killer has been dealt with.”

“Great.” Abby is not sounding enthusiastic about that.

“Allan’s getting prints, and he’ll bring them down soon. As for this, pull out all the stops on it.”

Abby nods, taking the box carefully. “No evidence bag.”

Jimmy nods. “He didn’t say anything about if we were doing this on the books or not. I’ve got the hands logged as John Doe.”

“Male?”

“Or a very large, hairy, woman. I can get you a blood sample and you can find out for sure.”

Abby nods. Not impossible, but most likely male. Proof’ll be in the testing.

“He was pretty clear about how we’re not supposed to know who dropped this off.”

Abby raises an eyebrow. “So why are we finding out?”

“So the thing we don’t know can’t bite us.”

She nods at that. “Okay.”
Tim stares at his computer. He’s got Diane hunting down where the money that paid for Khan came from. He’s got Manner taking the worm out of CGIS. He still hasn’t started looking into the people who invented the monitoring system for the NSA… He’s got three thumb drives of information he’s not supposed to have that might get stolen from him any moment.

Copies. Make copies of the thumb drives. All right. Over to his fishbowl of blanks thumb drives he goes.

When he was a field agent he bought batteries in bulk and carried them around so everything would always work. Now he buys thumb drives in bulk and keeps them in his office the way other people keep candy bowls. At any given time, he’s got one Minion or another wandering in to grab one when their own personal stashes come up short.

It’s actually a good way to keep track of who’s on what. They come in, he chats with them while they grab a new one, and he gets to touch base with them in a way that doesn’t seem overbearing.

He gets up and grabs nine of them. Lots of copies. He gets to it, popping thumb drives in. Then he waits.

He’s looking at all the computer equipment in front of him, and the thumb drives in his hand then back to the computers in front of him. He does a quick count, there’s six computers stuffed into his office right now. That’s a ton of computers for just three thumb drives of evidence. He’s got the sense that when his hardware guys get in here, they’re going to find a lot of stuff.

First step, first set of copies is done. He pulls them out, and then spends several minutes messing with his computer, erasing every trace of the fact that he made those copies.

Then he pockets them and sets the computer to start on the second set.

It is just about lunch time, so he heads over to the lab. He sees Zelaz working on scanning pieces of something into the computer. Obviously whatever it was is necessary for a case, but at a glance Tim can’t tell what it was.

“She’s with the computers.” Zelaz says, nodding at… a door?

When they’d get a door there? Tim blinks and says thanks to Zelaz before knocking and hearing, “Come in.”

“When’d you get a door?”

“The day they opened the computer annex.”

“It’s been there the whole time?”

Abby nods.

“Huh.” Granted they got the computer annex right before Kelly was born, so he had been a tad distracted. “So, what’s so secret?”

“How about I tell you over lunch?”
“Sounds great.” Tim eyes the computers and the tables, and the fact that Abby appears to be dusting for prints, taking samples of ink, and from the looks of it running the box for touch DNA, in the computer lab. “You’re in deep, aren’t you?”

“Not so deep I can’t eat.” She pets her belly. “Little boy’s been asking for lunch for a while now.”

“Then let’s get him and you fed.” Tim notices that they’d moved some of Abby’s art to the far wall. He’d actually noticed that the first time he was in here. Right now what he’s really noticing is a decent hiding place for thumb drives. “You have any tape?”

Abby gives him an of course I have tape, we’re in my lab look.

“Silly question. Where is the tape?”

She points to a shelf as she’s packing up her evidence, and he does see a tape dispenser next to a stapler.

“You didn’t see me do this, right?”

She turns to face the door. “I’m blind. You going to tell me what I’m not seeing?”

“Right after you tell me what you’re working on,” he replies as he tapes the thumb drives to the back of her broken spine picture. “All right.” He sets the tape back onto the shelf. “Want to see if Jimmy’s up for lunch, too.” Tim remembers, for a moment, his earlier hopes for lunch, but right now he’s too far into work mode to suggest it.

“Sure, I think he can add some to what I’m working on.”

Tim steps next to Abby and kisses her. “Hi.”

She kisses back and smiles. “Hi, back.” Then she gently pokes him out of the computer annex, and locks the door behind her.

“What if I need something in there?” Zelaz asks.

“You don’t. Not for the next hour,” Abby replies.

“I don’t like mysteries.”

“Zelaz,” Tim says, “When we all shut up like this, it means it’s need-to-know, and you don’t. Not trying to bug you, but that’s how this works.”

“Come on, when you were working in Norfolk you had cases that just you worked. Nothing different here,” Abby adds.

“Other than when I worked in Norfolk, they weren’t keeping me out of anything.”

“And when I go on maternity leave again, you will have access to whatever you like. Don’t pick the lock. I’ll know if you do.”

Zelaz nods, not looking pleased with all of this mystery he’s not part of.
They head up to Autopsy, and see Jimmy standing back, in his scrubs, watching Dr. Allan work on fingerprints.

“Just because they do it perfect in one shot on TV doesn’t mean you don’t have to practice,” Jimmy says.

Allan looks up at Tim and Abby. “I’d just rather they were attached to arms, and those arms attached to a person. Feels really odd and… floppy, to hold just a hand.”

Jimmy nods at that, looking away from Allan’s attempts to get good prints from John Doe’s hands. “You two hoping for lunch?”

“If you’re free,” Tim says. “Looks like you might not be.”

Allan shakes his head. “In med school I was in the ER when a man came in with his hand cut off. He had it in a cooler of ice. I took care of getting it ready for reattachment. I’ll get this down. Just make sure I’ve got a lot of blanks.”

Abby steps over and sees several smeary print cards. “I find it easier to press the card to the hand. Flip it over so it’s on its back, and then press the card to the finger. Only thing you’ve got to hold is the print card.”

Allan looks like a light just went on over his head. “I will try that. Have a good lunch.”

“When have you ever printed a hand on its own?” Jimmy asks Abby as they’re in the elevator, and then gives her and Tim hello kisses before she gets a chance to answer.

“Hello, to you, too,” she says with a smile. “We better hope they don’t ever get cameras in here.”

That gets nods from both of the guys. “As for the prints. Never. Not like that. But I do know how floppy a body part that’s out of rigor can be, so the less it has to move, the better, right?”

Tim looks at both of them, and then licks his lips. “Uh… why do you have a pair of hands just sitting in the morgue?”

Jimmy shakes his head. “You know that case they’re working upstairs, Dr. Young?”

“Yeah,” Tim says, not liking this direction at all.

“We’re checking to make sure that’s the guy who killed him,” Jimmy says. “Vance called me up…” the elevator opens and they head to Jimmy’s car, not finishing that sentence until they’re all in and buckled up, “he told me that he’d gotten word that he’d get confirmation that the guy who killed Young was taken care of, and then he got a box with two hands in it on his desk this morning.”

“Shit! Who gave him confirmation?” Tim says.

“Won’t say. But we know who we think the real target was, right?” Jimmy’s feeling cagy, like he doesn’t want to say out loud who he suspects could get a guy’s hands cut off for killing his pediatrician and threatening his daughter.

Tim exhales, loud. “Hell, compared to that, my day’s been boring as hell.” He’s in the backseat, so he leans forward and strokes the back of Abby’s neck. “What you’re doing… Is that the box the hands came in?”

Abby nods. “Yeah. No blood trace inside the box.”

Jimmy’s nodding at that, too. “From what I can tell the guy was dead when they were taken off. I’ll get the histology report back soon, but, it looks like it.”

“Prints on the outside?” Tim asks.

“Yeah, but I’m going to bet they won’t match anyone, or if they do, it’ll be a courier or something.” Abby leans her head back, turning her cheek into Tim’s touch. “So, tell us about boring as hell…”

And Tim does.

Ten minutes. That’s how much lunch they get before Tim’s phone buzzes. He’s literally lifting his glass to his lips, iced-coffee, cold, sweet, and beckoning him, when he feels his pocket start to vibrate.

Diane’s number on his screen. “Chucky?”

If she’s going to call him Chucky… “Wha’d’ya’got?”

She laughs a little. “You channeling Leroy on purpose?”

“Not the answer I’m looking for, love.” He’d called her that the last time she called him Chucky. He sees Jimmy and Abby staring at him, and signs D-I-A-N-E to Abby.

“Fine. Timothy. I’ve got a news you don’t want to hear.”

“Wonderful.” He sighs. “How bad?”

“Money orders, bought ten or twenty at a time, for smallish amounts of money, never more than five hundred dollars, paid for with cash, and as far as I can tell not only never purchased at the same place twice, but never within twenty miles of each other.”

Tim groans. “You’re right, I didn’t want to hear that. That’s completely untraceable.”

“Given the times they’re bought, it’s also not the same person doing the buying.”

“Huh?”

“Buy one set in California, buy the next set in Florida two hours later.”

“Fuck!” he says it very quietly.

“Timothy, I didn’t know you knew that word.” He can feel her smiling at him.

“I know lots of them. I’m a writer. Any bright side, at all?”
“Not on this one. It looks like whoever it is buys a bunch of wire transfers, and then mails one of them, with a stamp and envelope, to Khan’s bank. They deposit it.”

“I suppose I could try to get the envelope…”

“You can try, last payment was more than a month ago, and they mail deposits to different branches.”

Tim groans again. “This is literally painful. You say they buy them in bunches?”

“Yes. Usually ten to twenty, though one time they got three and one time fifty. So, Khan’s not the only one getting paid. I’ve already sent you the account numbers where the money is going. Whoever does this does not want to be found, but doesn’t care if we know who’s getting paid.”

Tim’s rubbing his forehead. “Thanks.”

“No problem. That was more interesting than anything I’d done with the IRS in years.”

“Glad to hear it. How’s CGIS going?”

“You heard?”

“Small world.”

“I’m having a good time. Got my desk set up, and got your request. This afternoon I’m getting into the books.”

“Have fun!”

“I will.” There’s the savage joy of a hunter let loose on a reserve teaming with game in Diane’s voice.

Tim hangs up his phone. “Money trail is dead.” He explains what Jimmy and Abby got to listen to half of.

“Sounds like you two have a project for this afternoon,” Jimmy says.

Tim inclines his head a bit, not quite agreeing. Abby gets what he’s thinking and says, “Wallbanger’s a trap. We can go looking through AFIS again, see if we can find a flag.”

Tim nods a bit. Last time they did that, they at least had a clue as to who might have set a flag, and used that to locate the flags. This time. He’s not even sure where he’d start. He supposes they could go through every flag… No… That would be useless because he’d still have to have someone or something sight match the prints that have flags on them to the prints he’s got for Wallbanger. By hand that’d take decades. “That’ll be the last ditch effort. I’ve got one more indirect route. A judge signed off on that order. Go get him, see what he’s got to say about it.”

Back in his office. Tim’s now got original thumb drives. He’s got copy thumb drives. He’s got confirmation that his two best hardware Minions are coming in, one from Okinawa, and one from Alameda. Assuming he’s still got custody of the computers from the house, they’ll be able to get into it early on Sunday.

He debates grabbing more thumb drives and quickly turning everything on and stripping everything out of them, but he knows if he was the one who set this system up, it’d have some sort of whammy attached to anyone who didn’t have the right codes to get into it.

So, for right now, he’ll punt that to his hardware guys.

He’s got three NSA analysts he still hasn’t looked at. Then something hits him. He grabs his phone and hits one button. “Tony, you guys still on Dr. Young?”

Tony sounds annoyed. “Not exactly. I got a heads up from Vance that it’s probably dead.”

“Great. I need help.”

“What kind of help can I do for you?”

“I need everything you can find out on three NSA analysts. Starting with anything Bishop remembers about them, and then everything they’re working on now, all of it. And then I need you to condense it down, into a maybe five minute presentation.”

“You’re on super double overtime, aren’t you?”

“Just about. Why did I think running a department was a good idea?”

Tony laughs at him. “And now you see the wisdom of the team leader route. I’ll send Draga down to grab what you’ve got.”

“Thanks.”

---

Okay, so thumb drives… or the Judge… Thumb drives. Pretend you don’t have back ups of back ups and act like this is somewhat urgent.

Tim pops the first of the thumb drives into his computer and starts to get into it.

Abby heads up to Vance’s office. “They match. Those hands left the prints on the door at Dr. Young’s crime scene. Obviously, we don’t know who did what when the doors closed, but those prints were on the door, and on Dr. Young.”

Leon nods. “Okay. The hands?”

“Jimmy says they were taken off post mortem, so…”

Leon nods at that, too. “No way to bring this man to any form of justice. Not now.”

Abby shakes her head. “No, not now. I’m running the DNA. We’ll see if we can get a name to go with the prints.”

“Keep me in the loop.”
“I’ve got another loop you might want to be in, too.”

Leon leans forward, and realizes that with the extended McGee-Palmer clan, and them all working together, he does have multiple ways to get information around his office without necessarily looking like he’s meeting with the wrong person. It occurs to him that he should be thinking about how to take advantage of that.

“Tell me about the other loop.”

Abby lets him know what is going on with Wallbanger, with Tim’s conversation with Jake Malloy, her eyes narrow as she goes over the arresting Tim part, and Leon’s eyes narrow on that one, too. He breaks in as she’s talking about Tim getting busted, “You know we’ll keep custody of him. No matter what.”

“Yeah, well, his last adventure was supposed to be ‘safe,’ too, so I’m not feeling very trusting.”

Leon nods, given what he did this morning, he understands. “I wouldn’t, either.”

Abby shakes her head. “Apparently the whole idea on this is to get him in trouble and then you guys battle it out with the lawyers.”

Leon shakes his head. “That’s how a lawyer would deal with this. At this level, the head of whatever it is calls me, and then we have a pissing match, pulling in our biggest guns. If his biggest gun trumps Sec Def, then he gets to have his information back. If he doesn’t, then I get to keep it. No one’ll be tossing Tim anywhere. And there won’t be any case, because these things are designed to not produce cases.”

Abby’s eyes narrow again. “I’m not sure if that’s reassuring or not. It is for Tim, because I don’t want him going anywhere, especially not a jail cell, but that’s a really awful way to do things.”

“I know. But for things like this, that’s how it works.”

“Then get Sec Def on your speed dial.”

Tim’s been on the thumb drive for five minutes when Draga heads down. And it’s just then, as Draga’s in his office, waiting for the names of the NSA analysts, that another thought hits Tim. It’s hit before, but sometimes it takes a while to really get these things.

He does not, personally, have to investigate all of this stuff. And Bleach’s bit about spreading things out a little comes back to mind, too.

“Got one more thing,” Tim says, twisting to the side and digging through his active case filing drawer. (Usually it’s empty or pretty close, he doesn’t do a lot with actual paper now.) But there it is, the agreement that Khan got. “I also need to know why this Judge agreed to this, and who he thinks he signed Khan up to work with.”

Draga looks over the document. It’s pretty straightforward. It covers that Khan will be allowed to do computer work, it covers how much he gets paid, it covers the time off his sentence. It doesn’t cover who he’s working for.

“Okay. We’re on it.”

“Thanks.”

“What do you have?”

“Everything they stole out of the NCIS system, and possibly, another job for you guys on Tuesday.”

“Do I want to know?”

“Looks like whoever was using this picked up their information on Tuesdays at about 9:45. Dornie’s checking the security feeds from nearby, so I’ll get him on looking for someone around that time, too.”

“And you want us waiting to grab him?”

“That’s the idea. Information goes into one of those computers, but it all went off on thumb drives. Someone’s got to be there to get it.”

When he gets to five o’clock, Tim’s almost surprised. He’s had custody of the computers and the information on them for a full work day, and so far, nothing has happened.

He killed the worm this morning, and the Men in Black didn’t show up.

He’s been through, at a glance, because that’s all he’s had time for, what sorts of things they were taking out of his system, and… none of it’s really interesting. They’re just keeping an eye on things. As of right now, he can’t see the pattern. Okay, Jethro, get working on your Python and tell me what I’m missing. He pockets one of the sets of thumb drives. They’re going to Gibbs.

He stands up and stretches. Right now he’s delegated everything away. He’s… done for today.

He grabs his phone, as he locks his office, with the computer equipment in it, and heads toward the Lab. “Hey Tony, how’s the pile of crap I dumped on you going?”

“Just spiffy. I’ve got Bishop running through everything, and Draga’s hunting down your judge.”

“Hunting how?”

“He’s retired now.”

“How long has he been retired?”

He hears Tony ask Draga. Then says, “Three years”

Tim licks his lips. “Don’t bother. Everyone’s done for tonight.”

“McGee?”

“That deal is two-and-a-half years old.” He can imagine the look on Tony’s face. “Shabbos at Breena’s. I need fresh eyes and a place to lay everything out.”
“Campfire time.”

“In the living room, after we eat. I already got word to Fornell, and told Breena he and Wendy were coming, but… let’s get everyone there. Vance, Diane, everyone.”

“Yeah. Okay. We’ll be there.”

Chapter End Notes

The song Brand is listening to is Outkast's So Fresh So Clean. Sean Murray is an Outkast fan and posted a quote from said song a few weeks ago on twitter, and I just couldn't resist. ; )
As Tim’s standing in front of the elevator, a thought hits him. He turns around, heads to the back of the Dungeon, and finds the whiteboards and markers he bought when he first got control of the department, back before he had the plasmas.

There’s so much going on here, especially when they add in Fornell and Abbi’s cases, there’s no way to keep them straight without writing everything down.

He does one last thing before getting into the elevator up to Abby. He fires off a text to Manner. You find the worm in CGIS’s system?

A minute later he gets back. Oh yeah, and about six others. I’ll have reports for you and Borin soon.

Good.

Breena sighs a little. The usual party of ten adults and three kids just became sixteen adults (assuming she’s counting right) and three kids.

Right now she doesn’t have room for a sit down meal, and she’s got almost twice as many people as she’s got food for. Well, time to get the lead out and make this work.

It’s nice out, hot right now, it’ll cool down as the sun sets, so dinner outside. Food on the table…
sheets on the ground, picnic style, everyone can sit down, babies can roam around, she’s grabbing plates and silverware, getting things set up for a buffet style, because that’s the thing she can handle right now.

(Little girls are both sleeping, and she is not dragging them out of bed to get more food.)

She’s getting the plates stacked when she gets the first call. “Hey,” she says, phone tucked between her ear and shoulder as she’s laying plates on the patio table.

“We’re bringing grilled chicken and salad,” Ziva says.

“Thank you! I was trying to figure out how to feed nineteen people with ten people’s worth of food.”

“We sent half the invitations out, and told everyone to bring something. You do not need to get the girls up and out to the grocery store.”

“Again, thanks. So, how bad is this?” She’s been getting very vague updates, because no one wants to put anything into a text. So, no details, but she knows something’s brewing, has to be, if everyone is coming to her place tonight.

“Bad enough we’ve got everyone coming.”

That’s not terribly helpful, but if Ziva doesn’t want to talk specifics over the phone, Breena’s not pressing. “Okay. I’ll be ready to host the war room.”
“Hopefully we will not need that,” but Ziva doesn’t feel hopeful, for all the people she’s investigated to clear, or not clear, she’s getting the sense that a lot of people had to look the other way for CGIS to get as bad as it did. The guy who wrote that note with the account numbers was likely right, CGIS is the tip of the iceberg.

“Better to plan than hope.”

Breena can feel Ziva smile in agreement with that. “Exactly. We will be there in about an hour and half.”

“Okay.”

It’s stupid. At least, that’s how Vance feels about this as he and Lara head toward Jimmy’s place, but he’s scared.

It’s not the same. Not the same place. Not the same people. Nowhere near the same threat level. But he’s scared.

He hasn’t attended a Sabbath dinner since Jackie died, and hasn’t felt any need to change that pattern.

But the meet up is at a Shabbos. And as a way to get everyone together goes, it makes sense. Just Friday dinner at a friend’s house. All the family invited. (Though he didn’t think twice about not bringing his kids. They’re not going anywhere near any of this.)

Lara glances over at him as he’s driving with his teeth gritted and a fine sheen of sweat on his brow. She gently strokes the back of his hand. “We can show up late.”

His eyes narrow and he’s giving the road a death glare. “No. I’ll be okay. It’s not the same.”

“No, it’s not, but it feels like it, doesn’t it?”

“Yeah.”

Tim, Abby, and Kelly are the first ones to Breena’s. (Besides Jimmy, but he headed directly home.) They’ve got their girl, clothing to stash at the Palmers’, and more food. They find Jimmy and Breena on the back porch, getting things set up. Molly’s playing in the grass, and Kelly’s sitting on her blanket in the shade, watching them.

Abby’s hugging Breena, and Tim puts Kelly down to go toddle around with her cousins in the grass before kissing Breena and hugging Jimmy, and gesturing with his bag of stuff that he’s going to tuck upstairs before anyone else shows up and wonders why they’ve got several days of clothing with them.

He gets back down just in time to hear Abby say to Breena, “Ziva told me she was bringing more ‘dinner stuff’ so we went a little crazy on the sweets.”

Tim kisses both of his ladies again, just happy to do it while he can. They’ll be on best behavior tonight, with so many of people who are outside their quadruple around.

Jimmy pulls several boxes from the bakery that did their wedding cupcakes out of the bag they were in. “What did you get?”

“Pretty much every cookie that wasn’t on hold for someone else, and they had little berry tarts the baker said were Parve, so we kind of got all of them, too,” Abby replies with a smile. “Given what we’re doing tonight, I figure everyone’ll be going light on the alcohol, so we might as well have lots of sugar.”

“And coffee,” Gibbs says as he and Abbi join them on the back porch.

More hugs and kisses follow, as they unpack bags of good, strong, coffee, and plates of fruits, veggies, nuts, and olives that Abbi thought to bring.

“Campfire goes better with snacks,” Abbi says, heading inside to stuff some of the nibbles they brought into the fridge.

“Think we’re going to really have Shabbos?” Tony asks Ziva as they head toward Breena’s backyard, (driveway’s already full, so they’re parked on the street) carrying grocery bags full of grilled chicken, extra challahs, and salad goodies.

“We are. If there was ever a time we’d want the Lord’s blessing, now seems like a good one.” And Ziva knows that the men in their crew may be less than terribly faithful, ranging from Tony and Gibbs’ sort of vague, hands-off relationships with a God they believe in but don’t engage with in any sort of formal way to Tim and Jimmy’s agnosticism bordering on atheism, the women, or at least her, Breena, and Abby, do believe.

Shabbos is as much about real living humans, and the comfort of family, friends, and the faith in the Lord, as it is about honoring that Lord. And Ziva’s going to make sure they pull as much comfort and faith out of this as they can.

For her, this is as much about mentally gearing up for a big investigation, as it is about sitting down to plan everything out.

Yesterday, Bishop was investigating a very hinkey murder. Today, her husband’s involved in this case, and they’re both heading to Dr. Palmer’s house for, nominally, a Sabbath dinner, and actually a planning meeting for whatever it is Tony and the rest of the crew have been whispering about for... weeks really.

She’s nervous and intrigued. She can tell Jake is, too. Because, for him, yesterday he was filing FOIA requests, and today he’s talked to Judge Harland twice, Director Borin once, and from the looks of it, he’s busy for the foreseeable future.

She’s redone her hair three times, not sure how one goes about doing this sort of thing. Part of her, the part that’s becoming a cop, thinks that the Shabbos part of this is just a cover, and that it only needs to be paid lip service. Part of her, the part that’s an analyst, has noticed that Shabbos is a big deal to Ziva and Tony, and that they go out of their way to make sure they get to it.

Jake’s already in his suit, and looking quite happy about it. The Open Government Project is ‘casual’ and he’s never really happy about going to work in jeans and a button down, and even that is pushing the dress code several degrees past the rest of his colleagues.

“Sauvignon Blanc or Merlot?” he asks, holding out two bottles of wine as she brushes out her hair again.

“No idea. Tony said bring food and drinks. I think there’ll be close to twenty of us.”

“Twenty? How big is this?” Given how many people he’s talked to today, and the conversations they’ve had, he knows this is big, but he hadn’t thought they had this many people in on it.

“I’ve got just as much information about the big picture as you do.”

“Wonderful.” He heads back to their kitchen and grabs all four bottles of wine they own. He calls out, “What kind of food did you want to bring?”

Bishop gives up on her hair. It looks nice down, and then she pulls on a light beige sun dress and grabs a sweater. It’ll get a little cool later tonight. “Ummm… I don’t know. What’s kosher?”

Jake shrugs. Oklahoma, where they both grew up and went to school isn’t exactly filled with Jewish people. He doesn’t know any Jewish people well enough to have ever been invited to a Shabbos before, and Ellie’s only slightly more in the know from watching Tony. “Veggies always are, I think.”

“Couple kinds of hummus and lots of veggies to dip in it?”

Jake nods. “That should work. Maybe some pasta salad or three bean salad?”

“I think we’re hitting Whole Foods and just grabbing what looks good.”

He nods. They do that for dinner, a lot. Perk of living within walking distance of a Whole Foods.

“Do you really have to bring a gun?” Diane asks Draga. “It’s dinner. A religious dinner.”

Diane likes cops. She likes men who can take charge and who have an air of controlled danger. She doesn’t like guns. She’s never really liked guns. To her, guns have an air of uncontrolled danger, and she doesn’t like that. To say this has proven irksome in the past (and present) is something of an understatement.

Draga looks up from his shoulder holster and ankle holster. He’s been debating it which one to wear. “A religious dinner where as soon as the dishes are cleared away we’ll be planning something big. Besides, I’m not going to be the only one armed.” He puts the shoulder holster down. He doesn’t really want to wear a jacket tonight. Just the ankle one will do. It’s not a huge gun. Just a little piece on an ankle holster under a pair of light cotton trousers. He knows for a fact that Ziva’s basically always wearing something similar.
Diane rolls her eyes while she buckles a sandal. “Leroy makes love with a gun on. Tobias isn’t willing to be more than five steps away from one. Doesn’t mean you need to be them.”

Draga’s eyebrows shoot up, he’s not entirely sure if she’s kidding or not.

She waves it off. She is kidding, but not by much. And she sighs, he’s got a point. She thinks every adult male in this group, with the possible exception of Ducky and Jimmy, will be armed.

Eric pulls on a light blue button down and begins to roll up the sleeves. “If scuttlebutt is right, the last time there was a Shabbos planning dinner, two people died.”

Now Diane is staring at Draga in horror. She hasn’t heard that story.

“Vance’s house. He and Ziva’s dad, who was head of Mossad, they’re talking about something important, rogue Mossad agent who thought Eli David had been around too long sprayed down the house with bullets. Vance’s wife and Eli died. Everyone who can legally carry one will have a gun at this thing.”

“What the hell are we getting into?”

He looks at her and shakes his head. “We got a box with two hands in it today, delivered to us, probably from the President. I don’t know what we’re onto. I don’t know if it all connects, but whatever it is, it’s nasty, and we’re not taking chances.”

“A box with hands in it?”

“Yeah.” Draga nods and begins to button his shirt. “Just hands. No body. Just hands.”

Diane shudders a bit. Numbers are so much tidier.

Hey, baby,” Fornell says as Wendy picks him up. “Thanks for putting up with the last minute dinner change.”

She gives him the side eye while allowing her cheek to be kissed. “It took weeks to get those reservations…”

“I know.” And he does. He was the one who spent weeks on the phone trying to get them. “And I will get them again.”

“You better.”

“I will.” He looks in the back seat and sees a box that smells awesome. “Penne and sausage?”

She nods. “Turkey sausage, grilled peppers and onions. No cheese. The text from Tony said it was a meat night.”

“You’re beautiful.”

“Yes, I am.” She pulls up to the edge of the FBI parking lot, and pauses, waiting for the light to shift. “This is big, isn’t it?”
Fornell nods. “Yeah, I think so. Wouldn’t have broken the date otherwise.”

She nods at that, too. This is how at least one of three of their dates go. And this is why they’re both looking forward to May, when Fornell hits retirement. She looks at him again. “I don’t care if the world is literally ending, you are showing up next week.”

Fornell smiles at her, and kisses her hand. He knows Jimmy’s story, and he knows who he is and the mistakes he made in his first marriage. No matter what, he’s not missing his wedding. “If I’m not there on Saturday, it means I’m in the ground.”

“You damn well better not be.”

He smiles at her again.

“Tobias…”

He shakes his head. “Jethro’d be on my ass 24-7 if he was feeling it, and he’s not. I’ll be okay.”

Wendy sighs, and pulls into traffic as the light shifts. “You’ve got a very odd understanding of the best man’s job.”

“It’s his job to make sure I get there. He’ll make sure I get there.” Tobias is trying to keep this light, because he doesn’t want Wendy worried, but at the same time, he’s also not feeling any firing of his danger sense. This is big, but… He’s not feeling threatened. He knows Jethro isn’t, either. If he was, Jethro would be on his ass, but he’s not, so…

They’re going to get out of this fine. Everyone else, who knows, but right now, Fornell is sure he’s good.

Wendy’s much less convinced. “Yeah, well don’t be sticking him back in the hospital, either.”

“Yes, ma’am.”

Penny leads the Sabbath this week. Ziva finds it somewhat amusing that Tim’s eighty-four-year-old, Catholic grandmother took to this celebration, but she hopped right in like a duck to water. (Or, for that matter, like Duck to Penny.)

When Ziva asked her about it, she had said, “There are very few things I take on faith, but one of them is that God listens to us, no matter which set of traditions we use to address Her.” Then she gave Ziva a brief smile, cocky little thing, put her mind of a very satisfied Tim, “Besides, when would I ever turn down a ritual where the oldest broad in the group gets to run things?”

Ziva had laughed at that.

And in addition to the traditional prayers and blessings, Penny asks Hashem to offer them patience, wisdom, and clarity of purpose.

All of which Ziva finds very appropriate.
Dinner is dinner. Just a bunch of coworkers and friends out on the grass, laying about, eating (Jake looking pretty flustered at this not being a suit and tie kind of night), and for the most part, enjoying themselves. There’s some talking about what’s going on at work, but that’s fairly casual, and just getting everyone up to date. Tony keeps them amused with his latest adventures in home buying. (And also gets a list of decent, fast contractors who’ll get the place salable in a month.) Ducky provides tales of his week working on their house and the glorious joy that is researching electrical codes and figuring out what they’re going to have to do to get the place up to code. (Correct answer, rewire the whole damn thing from the ground up. He’s looking at Tim as he says this, and Tim knows that he’s the one nominally in charge of this endeavor.) Penny tells them about the group she’s working with that’s building shelters in Afghanistan and how they’re getting closer to being ready to break ground on the first one.

All of the adults help herd Molly and Kelly, who consider this an adventure in food. They’re wandering around, looking at everyone’s meals, and, pretty much, grazing from plate to plate as adults give them little bits and pieces of what they’ve got. Anna’s sitting either on Breena’s or Abby’s lap doing a very good job of sitting up straight and perfect, and watching all these new people around her.

The “outside” crew starts off a little stiff, but they start adding bits and pieces of conversation here and there. It takes half an hour or so, but when Jake starts to loosen up (about the time they get him out of his jacket and wingtips) they get a really good story out of him about the summer he worked construction in college, and how the building inspector changed his take on the electrical code three times over the course of the place they were working on.

Should anyone look into Jimmy’s backyard, they’d see a relaxed picnic, lit by flickering torches and fairy lights (never let it be said that Breena can’t put together an excellent party for too many people on not nearly enough notice) filled with people getting up and down to get themselves more food.

A very alert person might notice that this group is imbibing mostly iced-tea, iced-coffee, soda, and water. That very alert person might notice that no one’s had more than two glasses of wine. That person might notice that everyone looks relaxed but that no one actually is relaxed. And said person might notice that conversation topics appear to have a lot of unspoken context, bits and pieces of stories that appear to be left out (like how Jake’s building contractor was waiting for a bribe to show up), but are understood by everyone sitting or reclining on the grass with their supper.

Eventually babies get washed off and go to bed. Eventually plates are piled up. Eventually they move inside to the living room, which is tight quarters for everyone, but there’s no fear of anyone overhearing.

Eventually more snacks, and non-iced coffee are laid out. Eventually Tim gets both whiteboards up, and everyone gathers around.

Planning time.

Tim’s not sure how he ended up running this thing. Probably because he’s the one with the dry erase markers, standing in front of the whiteboards. “I’m thinking we start with laying out everything we know. I know I’m so deep in the woods I can’t see anything but individual trees, and I can’t imagine you guys are any better off right now. So, let’s pull back.”

He starts writing. “Here’s what I’ve got…”

Leon gets visit from Hue about improper Navy Pension fees.

I try to figure out what’s causing those fees.

Decide to make sure NCIS computers are clean before going after those fees.

End up hip deep in shit.

Thus begins operation Kill the Hydra. (He comes up with that off the cuff, but likes it.) Diane and Abbi share a quick look at each other with that one, but he misses it as he’s writing on the board.

Found four worms in the NCIS system. Two aren’t a big deal. One is probably not an issue. One is courtesy of Ajay Khan. That worm is also in the CGIS system, and likely every other system because it’s sitting in the Federal intranet server.

“Who’s Khan?” Fornell asks.

“Cybercriminal. Been in prison since we took him down in ’12,” Tony says, patting Ziva’s knee.

That triggers Fornell’s memory. “He was on the most wanted list for three years, right?”

Tim nods as he writes, The deal that lets Khan do this sort of work was set by ‘Harvey Wallbanger,’ (Several giggles shoot through the room at that. Tim’s pleased to see he’s not the only one who thought that was a god-awful cover name.) supposedly of the CIA. ‘Harvey’ is asking Khan to do some really illegal sounding things.

Deal was okayed by the judge who put Khan away, six months after he retired. Draga hops up, taking the marker from McGee and adds, Judge is off the grid, too. Pension stuff is being sent to a mailbox in Cacaos. He hands the marker back to McGee, hoping that’s not the only useful thing he’s got to add to this tonight.

Following the worm found a foreclosed house, with a bunch of computers in it, at least one of which was pulling information out of NCIS. That one’s dead. Don’t know what’s on the others, yet. My hardware specialists get in on Sunday, and we’ll break into them, then.

“Assuming you still have them,” Jake adds.

Tim nods. “No men in black, yet.”

Jakes eyes narrow slightly. “Interesting.”

Tim nods at that, too. Not sure what the lack of Men in Black means, but they can get to that later, he stares at the whiteboard and Bishop asks, “You going to mention the NSA stuff?”

He taps the marker against the whiteboard. His list is in a straight column, all nice and tidy. He draws an arrow away from Khan and then writes. Possible NSA connection. One of Khan’s jobs is hacking a worm in Norton computer security to keep track of what Norton users are doing.

“I have Norton on my computer at home,” Wendy says.

“You and almost everyone else. Even people who don’t use it usually have it preloaded onto their computers,” Tim replies.
“One of his jobs?” Breena asks.

“Yeah, we never got into what else he’s been up to.”

“Might be worth finding out,” Jake says.

Tim writes down McGee—What’s Khan been doing? Then he hands the marker over to Bishop.

“Okay, add your stuff.”

She hands it over to Jake, who gets up and begins his own list. 2012, it comes out that several gov. agencies had asked different software programs to give them back doors into their data.

Rey, Amin, and Darcy wrote up a working paper suggesting that ‘asking’ was a waste of time, and it made the gov. look bad to some people, so it would be a much more effective use of resources to get hackers to put the doors in without permission. Idea is to do this along with the IRS and use the data they get to find tax and security targets.

“That looks better?” Gibbs asks.

“It does if you don’t get caught,” Penny replies.

Jake writes. The paper hit my desk, and I sent back a politely-worded version of NO WAY IN HELL.

Supposedly that killed that project. Ellie stands up, taking the marker from him, as he gently touches her shoulder, she begins to add her own information.

Rey and Amin are still analysts at the NSA. What they’re working on is currently classified, and neither of them have published anything since 2011. They are being paid way more than their official status says they should.

Lovvy is currently at the IRS, working in their Tax Fraud division as an Analyst.

“Nope. Not unless there’s been a name change,” Diane adds, standing up, crossing out Tax Fraud division as an Analyst.

“You sure?” Tobias asks, “There have to be—“

Diane’s glare shuts him up. “There are a lot of people who investigate tax fraud, and I don’t know all of them. The Analysts… not a lot of them. The title is quiet, so as not to attract attention, but those are the guys who spend time trying to think of ways people can screw over the IRS big time. They’re sophisticated tax criminals working for the IRS so the IRS knows what to look for. There’s ten of them; Lovvy’s not one of them.”

“Like actually convicted, tax criminals?” Tim asks, thinking this might tie into Khan. Might be the sort of job Wallbanger brokers for guys who are done “paying their debt to society.” He gets up and adds Who is Wallbanger? To the second whiteboard.

“Don’t think so, but that’s not the sort of thing you’d ask,” Diane replies, looking at what Tim’s writing, but not wanting to get distracted from where she is, she ignores it.

“Might be the wrong title,” Ziva says.

That gets some nodding, so Bishop puts a question mark next to Lovvy’s name. And, with a nod from Tim draws a dotted line to Khan with another question mark. Then she looks to Diane, “So, how do we find out what she actually does, without letting everyone know we’re looking into her?”
Tim quietly heads back to the sofa. He’d been sitting on the floor, in front of Abby, but getting up and down off the floor isn’t working well for him. Jimmy, who was between Abby and Breena, quickly gets up and takes his place on the floor, nodding at the sofa. Tim gently squeezes his shoulder when he sits down.

“My codes stopped working before I hung up on my Boss with the news I was done. Chucky, the computer slicing and dicing is your job, right?”

Tim thinks about that for a second, while a third of the group tries to figure out why she called him Chucky. “Yes, Peaches.” She smirks at the nickname coming back at her, and the same people who were wondering about Chucky, are wondering about him calling her ‘Peaches.’ “Easy way is for you to head back to the office, go play sweethearts with someone in HR, and get a hold of one of their computers for a few minutes, and from there I can talk you through it.”

Diane smiles. “I’ve got buddies in HR, and I still have to hand in my badge and whatnot. You busy tomorrow around lunch time?”

Tim looks to Abby, Jimmy, and Breena, they nod. “Unless we move on this tomorrow…” He glances around to the rest of the group, and none of them look certain. “I did get some advice earlier today, and that’s if you don’t want to tip people off that you’re working on something big, you keep as close to your usual routine as possible.” That gets nodding from the rest of the group. He looks back to Diane, “I’m probably sketching out wiring plans, so, sure. Question is, would you be there on the weekend?”

“Probably, you up and quit without giving notice, and you probably don’t go back during regular hours,” Diane says. “Plus my friend works on the weekends.”

Investigate Lovvy—Diane goes on the board in Ellie’s handwriting. Ellie spends another minute looking at the board. That’s pretty much all she’s got, on this, for now. She hands the marker over to Diane.

Diane draws another line off of Khan and ends that line with an arrow pointing toward Wallbanger. Under it she writes, Paid in untraceable money orders. Money orders being bought from all over the US. Not the only one being paid.

“I think you’re also on finding out who’s getting paid,” Leon says, feeling a little odd to not be just ordering people around, but for this operation, he’s not the General. At least, not until he’s got the information all his spies are bringing in.

Diane nods a bit. “Already started.”

Abbi’s looking curiously at her. “Really?”

Diane nods. “I asked for two computers for a reason. I had your books on the one, and was running accounts on the other. I’ve got some names, but I don’t know who they are. That’s Tobias and DiNozzo’s job, right? Hunt them down?”

Both of them nod.

“I’ll keep shooting them to you as I get them,” Diane says. Then she writes on the board. Investigate account holders Tobias and Tony.

“What do you have on my books?” Abbi asks.

Diane steps over to the second whiteboard. “We’re gonna need more room, I think.”
“I’ll take pictures and erase as needed,” Wendy replies, not feeling very useful for this group. She feels like she’s just being a lump on the sofa right now. Breena smiles at her a little, and gives her hand a squeeze. Lara catches her eye, the same sort of look on her face. All part of being the spouse of the cop.

Under Wallbanger Diane writes CGIS. She stops for a second, not sure how strong the language should get, but she’s pretty sure she won’t insult anyone too horribly with this.

Finances are FUBAR.

Abbi chuckles a little at that, approving of the language. “I take it you rubbed off at least a little,” she says to Gibbs, who just shrugs.

“I knew that one before I met him.”

“What’s FUBAR?” Lara asks.

“Fuc—“ Leon starts.

She elbows him gently. “No. I know what it means, literally. What’s it mean financially?” She’s also feeling very outside of this, but if she’s going to be sitting here for this, she’s going to listen, and learn, and look, and try to be useful.

“It means if I had an entire team of auditors we’d still be digging up crap three years from now. More concretely, if there was a way for CGIS to get screwed, it got screwed.” Diane taps the marker against the board a few times. “Here’s what I found on just the first day, CGIS was officially audited in 2013 as well, and that time, everything came up roses.”

“That’s when I got booted up because my Boss left in a hurry.” Jimmy stands up, takes the marker and adds in Swissin, murdered, listed COD, blunt force trauma. Real COD... Shot in neck? Smoke inhalation? Actual blunt force trauma?

Everyone’s staring at Jimmy, as he sits back down on the floor in front of Breena. “He left. And then, a year later, he ‘got into a car accident.’ His ‘pals’ at CGIS investigated it, and told his widow he died in a car accident. According to the police report he drove his car off a bridge into a small ravine, the car caught fire, and he died. The bullet in his spine may have had something to do with why he drove the car off the bridge. Or not. It’s entirely possible he was dead before the car got near the ravine. No skid marks on the road. And no body for me to investigate more closely.”

“No body, then...” Jake starts to ask.

“How do I know? Their ME was so sure no one would ever look, he put the real x-rays, with the visible bullets, into Swissin’s file.”

“I talked to the widow,” Fornell adds. Clean up on Swissin is part of what the FBI’s been handling on the CGIS corruption case. “After Swissin died, Brandis, who had been his Boss, and supposed friend, came and took everything he had that had anything to do with CGIS, including his computer. We have no idea what he might have been looking at or found between him quitting and dying.”

“Okay... This is really disturbing, but... how does this tie into that?” Lara asks, pointing to the first board with Tim’s stuff.

“It might not,” Abbi replies. “But at the very least, finding the CGIS stuff out leads to us getting the next bit.”
“It might connect in, too,” Diane says. “There’s no shot that the books were in any better shape in 2013 than they are now.”

Abbi stands up. CGIS books, entire quarters of data were missing.

Tim gets up again, (this time much easier than from the floor. He flashes Jimmy a thank you smile) taking the marker from Abbi. He erases missing and puts in deleted. Last missing quarter was Q1 ’16 first was Q2 ’11. Then he hands the marker back to Abbi.

“You weren’t able to find out when they were deleted?” Diane asks.

He shakes his head. “We’re still not entirely sure exactly which one did it, but he got the metadata in addition to the records.” Tim gestures for the marker. Fornell, who deleted the quarters.

“Already working on that, McGee. None of them claim to have a clue about that.”

Abbi shakes her head, taking the marker back from Tim as he sits back down. “And that’s only the five years I was supposed to come up with. I have no idea what was going on before ’11.”

“Okay. That’s…” Diane’s got a hot look in her eye. A lot of people are going down on this one, and she’s enjoying the idea of taking them out. “The biggest reason we know this isn’t just a fluke, or some sort of inside job is that CGIS passed the first audit.” GAO passed us first time Abbi writes. “And, we know someone, somewhere, put them up for audit again. Most groups won’t see an audit more than once every twenty years. Some, small ones, like CGIS or NCIS won’t ever see one. Two GAO audits in less than five years is unheard of.” Diane looks at Vance. “I think you’re the one with the clout to find out who and what and why on this.”

Vance nods. “I don’t know anyone there, but I certainly know the people who will get them talking if they balk.”

Vance—Who passed CGIS first time, who set them up to be audited the second?

After that, Abbi writes, CGIS, my computer had both the Federal Worm, and a keystroke logger.

“Your higher ups weren’t getting their intel from the worm,” Gibbs says.

“Probably not. But… This has been niggling at me for a while. How did Severs know to put the firebomb in the archives? There was nothing about what I was doing on my system. But he had to know…” Abbi’s looking at Tim and Leon.

Leon nods. “Yeah, whoever uses the worm could have gotten it from us.”

“Info from the worm is a dead drop. Every weeks, same day, same time. 9:45 on Monday,” Tim says.

“They wouldn’t have had enough information to get the whole idea, but they would have known we were getting close,” Abbi replies.

“Yeah,” Tim says. “And they would have known we planned to go in on Tuesday night.”

Fornell adds, “According to Severs, he was called in by Brandis for a test of their security systems. Yes, the bomb had real explosives, so the dogs could find it, but it wasn’t supposed to have a functional detonator.”

Abbi and Jethro are both giving Fornell the he really tried that line of bullshit look.
“He’s claiming he just tucked it in there, and someone else must have wired it. When we showed him the video of the door to the records, and no one else going in or out, he shut up and lawyered up.”

Abbi writes down, Fornell—Break Severs. Then she writes, Borin—Track all of Brandis’ communications. Find out how he knew to call in Severs.

She tosses the marker to Fornell. “What do you have?”

Fornell shakes his head a bit, as he stands up. “Right now, they’ve all gone silent. When we first started grabbing them, they were fingerling you. Saying it was your conspiracy and they were just in on it. We shut that down fast. We know they were using CGIS as their own personal slush fund. Contracts were given to friends and family. People who got paid off correctly looked the other way for a lot of things. We’re fighting a jurisdiction war with the DEA over several of your men. We’re calling it on public corruption charges, they’re calling it on pay offs from the Colombians charges. Evidence went missing, and a lot of it was being sold out of the country.”

“Being sold, like, how…” Lara asks.

“Coast Guard grabs a smuggling ship. It keeps it in evidence until the case is done. Once the case is done the drugs are supposed to be destroyed, the guns were supposed to be destroyed, and the ship was supposed to be auctioned off. They’d auction off the guns and drugs, and then one of the higher ups or his buddies would decide he liked the boat and it’d head off to his place.”

Fornell’s twiddling the marker. “The thing I’m not seeing right now, not in my investigations, is anything outside of the Coast Guard. If it passed the first audit, it might have done it just by paying off the auditor. Getting set up again might have been an auditor looking for another pay out.” He writes Greedy? Next to the GAO audit line.

“Whether it connects directly or not, it did lead to the next bit,” Abbi says, taking the marker back from Fornell.

Missing Account Numbers. “I get sent a nice little note, on paper, untraceable, with a few account numbers on it. The note said CGIS was the tip of the iceberg, but I can’t investigate those numbers without a warrant, and I’m not getting one based on ‘I got a note that said I should look at them.’”

Fornell adds, “So I remind her that the IRS doesn’t need probable cause, it’s allowed to go snooping into anyone’s accounts for any reason, and their standard is guilty until proven innocent.”

Diane takes over from there, “Which is when I get the accounts, and everything gets creepy. Within minutes of looking those up, I’ve got my Boss, not my supervisor, but the head of the IRS in my office telling me to leave those numbers alone.”

Abbi writes Fornell—Investigate Koskinen.

“Already was. Very quietly. Right after the accounts vanished, Leon pulled…”

“Everything we could get out of the IRS,” Leon adds. “Private emails, public records, everything.”

“And we spent three days on it,” Bishop says. “And nothing. They never talked to each other about those accounts, no one ordered them to vanish, but vanish they did.”

Fornell takes it again. “He’s the kind of guy who if he’s doing something wrong, my guys aren’t likely to find it. He’s careful, meticulous, organized. If he’s crooked, he a crooked accountant.”
Diane nods, “He came up from the forensic accounting department. He knows ways to hide money none of us have ever dreamed of.”

“Wonderful,” Fornell says dryly.

“We got the account numbers, and within a day, everything vanished on that. Every case, every mention, all the guys attached to those cases, EVERYTHING, vanished,” Diane says.

“What about the guy tailing you?” Fornell asks.

“Someone was tailing you?” Lara asks Diane.

Diane nods. “Yeah. They got a picture of him, but…”

“We’re still running the facial recognition. And facial recognition is slow. I used Tim’s technique to figure out a range of when he was born, so we could narrow down the field some, but without any other way to limit it, this will take a long time,” Abby says.

“Cross reference with blue Leafs?” Draga asks. He was there; he remembers what the tail was driving.

Abby opens and closes her mouth. She hadn’t tried that. They’d all assumed the driver wouldn’t be crazy enough to steal a license plate off and IRS car, and then stick it on his own car.

Draga sees that and says, “I know it’s a long shot, but I’m on it. See if any Leafs were stolen on that date range… might be able to pull a print or something…”

Diane still has the marker, she writes down Eric—investigate Leaf.

Tony stands up, and takes the marker from Diane. “That gets us to our latest case, Dr. Young. We think this one is…’ he looks to Leon, “done?”

Leon nods. “Probably. And besides timing, it probably doesn’t hook into the rest of these.”

“Do you have news of Quinten?” Penny asks.

“He’s missing. He’s likely going to stay that way. He was treating one of the President’s daughters, someone got wind of that, and tried to attack him, her, and her pediatrician. Our dead man was her pediatrician.” Everyone winces at that. They’re all, more or less, used to terrible things, but the idea that someone would really go up against the President’s daughter and her doctors makes them all feel awful.

“That sounds vague,” Penny says, because Leon’s answer doesn’t do anything to help her feel like her friend is okay.

Tony nods. “It is. From what we can piece together, as long as he’s needed to treat whichever girl, he’s going to be deep underground.”

“We have, gruesome, confirmation that the person who attacked Dr. Young, the pediatrician, is dead,” Jimmy says.

“And beyond that, I think it’s safe to say the Secret Service is handling it,” Leon says. “Though I will follow up on that.”

“If the worm is on the Federal intranet, could that be how whoever it was found out when and where to go to go after one of the girls?” Ducky asks.
Everyone looks around. There’s a connection. Tim shrugs. “Could be. I don’t think any of us know if the President uses the same system we do.”

“Though, even if he doesn’t, if this sort of worm could be placed into our system, it could be placed into his,” Ducky adds.

That’s a disturbing thought.

Ducky nods and then says, “So, it would seem to me, that like any other crime where we have too many variables and not enough facts, the question we must first answer, that will allow everything else to fall into place, is…” Ducky stands up, glances at Wendy, who nods, she’s got the board photographed, and then he stands up, takes the marker from Tony, erases and puts in, Who benefits?

“Obviously this isn’t just for kicks and giggles. So, who gets what out of this?” Penny says, and then begins to answer her own question. “The money has to come from somewhere. Someone is paying for this, trying to keep this secret and off the books. Your vanishing account numbers,” she says to Diane, “what sort of confirmation did you have as to who they actually belonged to?”

Diane shrugs a bit. “We had them flagged. We knew which country the money was in in a few cases. The floating one…” The light goes on for Diane. “The floating one got linked to a lot of big money tax evasion cases.”

“The floating one worked with Bitcoin and the like, too, right?” Jake asks. “The NSA was very interested in that account, too, because we weren’t fans of ways to get money moving around the official channels.”

Diane nods.

“I didn’t say this, and none of you heard it, either,” Jake says. “Another of our working papers, and to the best of my knowledge this one didn’t get shot down as immediately illegal, involved the US stealing Bitcoins and then using them for off-the-books operations.”

That’s triggering a memory for Tim. “Didn’t a ton of them get stolen a while back?”

“Twice. And they still don’t know who did it,” Abby says.

“And that didn’t get shot down immediately because…” Jimmy asks. Theft sounds awfully illegal to him. Actually, all of this sounds awfully illegal to him.

“US law holds the Feds can take any form of counterfeit currency and ‘destroy’ it,” Jake says.

“Bitcoin isn’t claiming to be US dollars,” Abby says.

“I know. But using that counterfeit law, and bending it until it screamed, the Feds took $60,000 in silver ‘dollars’ from a man in South Carolina, even though he was minting it himself and wasn’t claiming it was any sort of US currency. The Federal Government does not take kindly to competing currencies it cannot control or tax. Bitcoin, being electronic, and often run entirely outside the US banking system, is a nightmare for them.”

Ducky’s nodding. “By stealing them, the government makes them look less safe. Fewer people find them attractive, less competition with the dollar. But, some people will still want an invisible currency, no matter how unsafe. Having a large quantity of said currency allows them to do business with those people.”

Tim adds in, “And those cases are still unsolved, so… Abby?” he’s not as up to how Bitcoins work as he could be.

“Yeah, I think... You drop them onto someone else, you can frame them for the theft... or make it look like the person who stole them is hiring whoever... I’m not entirely sure, but yeah, I think you can do that with them.”

“Or, more pedestrianly, you can just use them to hire people,” Penny adds. “And if you have a floating bank that moves money from currency to currency...”

“Do you still remember those account numbers?” Draga asks Diane.

“Of course.” She’s a little irked at the idea that she might have forgotten. “Don’t see how it’ll help, they don’t connect to anything, anymore.”

“That’s wrong.” Tobias says, and Diane starts to bristle. “Not, you’re wrong. Entire banks vanishing that fast. Every case attached to them. All the people who were involved. That’s wrong. That just doesn’t happen.”

“It did. I didn’t type in the numbers wrong. Not five times in a row, and not for each account.”

Gibbs might not know anything about computers, but he does know something about a conspiracy, and he knows controlling information is key. “Type them in, where?”

“Ziva’s desk. I got onto the computer at NCIS, used its shielded service to get into the Federal Banking Data—“

They all feel it as soon as she says that.

“Federal Banking?” Lara asks.

Diane’s shaking her head as she begins to add more details. “Federal Banking Database. It’d be almost impossible to track finances without it. It’s voluntary for the banks. If you’ve got names, social security numbers, account numbers, routing numbers... You punch them in, and they tell you if someone has an account with any given bank. You can’t see anything from there, other than the existence of an account, and there are a ton of banks that either aren’t on there at all, or like my mystery numbers are on there only as targets for criminal investigations. But, for most cases if you have a name, address, SS number blah, blah, blah, and you need to know where he banked, who he had credit cards with, and so on and so forth, that’s how you’d do it,” Diane says. “And let me guess, it’s got another worm in it, and so did the IRS, and as soon as I got into it, they pulled those numbers off of the database.”

Tim nods at them, that’s something that would take hours, unlike killing a whole bank, which would take months.

“You used your login, right?” he asks Diane.

“Yeah.”

“So, it’s possible they just blocked you,” Leon says.

Diane nods at that, too.

Leon stands up, and takes the marker from Ducky. Recheck missing account numbers, secure computer. He then underlines Who benefits? “I’ve been getting some hints that this is about making sure things blow open before the election. I know nothing like this happened in ’12, at least, not anywhere I could see. Diane?"

She shakes her head. “Too low on the food chain to get anything along those lines.”

“Fornell?”

He thinks for a moment. “Yeah, we did see an uptick on corruption cases summer and fall of ’12. Happens before every election. And yes, we do have instructions to make sure things get handled ‘quietly.’ Nothing this big, though. At least, not that went through me.”

“Borin?”

“Still in the field. My cases were all routine.”

Penny’s looking at the whiteboard, and then looking at her phone, scanning the pictures, and shaking her head. “No. Not… not like this.”

“Dr. Langston?” Leon asks.

“Elections means new people every four or eight years. This is… this is a longer term game. We’ve…” she looks to Ducky, “talked about how little difference there really is between the main parties now. That most of the ‘differences’ are about posturing and making sure their bases show up and vote. And yes, some power shifts, individuals move up or down, but the system stays the same.”

“There’s always the question of is there something behind the system,” Ducky says.

“Like a shadow government?” Leon asks. He’s thinking of floating that idea past Jarvis at some point.

“Possible, but not what we were talking about.” Ducky says, “More along the lines of how so much is run behind the scenes. Take that law Jake has talked about. In all likelihood, some congressional aid thought it would be a good idea, he got it tucked in there, and he and several other unknown, unnamed bureaucrats, are using it to do their own thing. They’re unelected, low enough positions they will not be tossed out no matter who wins, assuming that whoever wins isn’t in favor of radically shifting what our government thinks is worth governing. Say, our Nameless Bureaucrat decides that being able to see everyone’s computer is a wonderful idea, so he does it. If he’s in the right place, he can sweep off money, shift funds around, and as the person who writes the regulations that implement laws, he gets to decide how things will actually be done.”

Leon thinks about that, nodding. “We get cash. We get a lot of cash. Drug busts, murders, thefts. When it’s released, we turn most of it over to the Feds, but who knows what they do with it. One guy in that program… That’s someone who could do a lot.”

“If that’s what’s going on, that would be a great thing,” Diane says.

Everyone looks at her, curious.

“Cash. If they’re working with cash, it’d be great for us. It’s big, heavy, takes up lots of space, and you’ve got to do something with it. There’ll be literal, physical evidence to deal with if they are using cash. The best thing that could possibly happen with this is them raking off cash.”

_Bishop, Draga where does the actual money go?_ Leon writes.

Once he finishes that, Breena says, “So, we’re either looking for a massive conspiracy involving tons of high-ranking people, or we’re looking for Herb, the Junior Assistant Secretary of Who Knows What, who has plans for saving the US from his idea of perdition?"

Tim’s also flipping through the pictures of the boards. “Both… or… I think they’re one and the same. We’re not looking for high ranking in the sense of the President, but… Like Koskinen. For the sake of this discussion guys like Koskinen count as ‘Herb.’”

Ducky and Penny nod. “Koskinen would be a fine example of a ‘Herb,’” Ducky says. “Someone with power who is unlikely to be effected by who wins elections. Someone who can plan and run a long game.”

“That’s exactly who Brandis was. High enough to have power, low enough that it didn’t matter who was in charge, he’d still be around and able to bite us.”

“Then let’s bite back and bite harder,” Fornell says with a smile.

“I’m all in favor of biting back, and biting harder,” Tony says, “but, how about we don’t automatically decide this is internal.” He glances to Bishop and Draga. “Especially if that worm is how the hit on the Obama girls was set… Everything you’re describing here would be a foreign government or terror group’s wet dream. And, especially since we can’t, at least now, prove that Khan actually is working for the US Government…”

“And even if he is, we can’t prove that the guy who’s running this isn’t in the pay of someone else,” Ducky adds. He circles Who Benefits? “Jethro, Penny, Breena, Wendy, Lara, how would you feel about doing a lot more reading? Back in the day, most of a spy’s job was paying attention to the news. Seeing who was doing what. If we can see signs of the information that’s being accessed being used…”

Tim’s eyes light up. “Last year, remember they were talking about China hacking our system, compromising 18 million Federal Employees.”

“Exactly. Who is doing things like that?” Ducky says, while writing China on the board. Tim stands up and gestures for the marker, and then adds. McGee, investigate China hack. How did they get in?

“So, we’re saying our suspect list has been narrowed down to basically everyone on Earth?” Jimmy says dryly.

Tim’s looking over the boards, seeing what’s in his head, and adds, “I think we can cross off anyone who doesn’t have a computer.”

“Spiffy, three billion off the list, three billion left to clear,” Tony says.

Vance shakes his head. “I was talking to Jarvis about this. He was saying power was immortal. It moves and shifts. We can’t kill the Hydra because what we’re fighting isn’t just one thing. There’s no body, only heads and more heads. Say the CGIS thing was entirely internal. Say Khan is one program running amok. Say Herb is the guy who doesn’t want Diane to get those account numbers because they’re his private playground. This doesn’t have to be a conspiracy. Like McGee just said, there are more than eighteen million government employees. This could just be sheer, perverse human cussedness.”

“But, it could be I can’t get those account numbers because they have nothing to do with any sort of ‘international money laundering’ and they’re the slush fund for a massive conspiracy that makes sure that guys like Khan get paid,” Diane says.

Penny speaks up, “I don’t think that’s an either/or condition. Both of those ideas can simultaneously be true. Just because part of this may be individual actors doesn’t mean the rest of it isn’t a conspiracy, or several conspiracies, and Jarvis is right, power, and the quest for it, will not go away, nor will it roll over and play dead just because we’d like it to.” She shakes her head. “The hydra cannot be killed because people abusing power is as old as people and power. All we can do it take off different heads. We clean up the mess we can see, and we trail that back to the next mess. That’s all we can do, and shooting for more than that is the road to heartache.

She looks at the boards in front of them. “We do what we can with what we have. And we have a lot. But at the end of the day, evil will still be there. Corruption will still hide in the dark corners. That’s never going to change. Our job it to shine as much light as we can over as much of the area around us as is possible. And if that means taking this down one man at a time, then we take it down one man at a time.

“Right now, we’ve got a few men, and it is time to grill them until they break. The rest of the supposition can wait for next week, when we can get back together and cover what we’ve learned. Let’s get this broken down as basic as we can, and we’ll go from there.”

“Not next week,” Fornell says. “We’re, he points to him, Wendy, Gibbs, Abbi, Tim and Abby, busy.”

“You hope,” Jimmy says, quietly. Wendy look startled at that, and Fornell glares at him.

“I can take care of that.” Tim says. “Next few days, we’ll all have new, clean cell phones. Use them just to talk to each other. That’ll keep us in the loop, without looking like we’re doing anything outside of our normal routines. Few weeks, we can have a… ‘Halloween party’ and talk in person again.”

“Halloween party’s at your house?” Jimmy asks Tim.

Abby nods, grinning. “Oh yeah. Halloween’s at our house. Wear costumes. It’ll be fun.”

That gets some quiet nodding. And then Tim grabs a pad of paper, a pen, and his phone, and starts to write down who is on what.

Diane: Who’s getting paid?
Fornell: Break Severn. Who was Borin’s boss talking to?
Abbi: CGIS worms. Who’s watching?
Gibbs: General intel. Get those python skills up.
Tim: Khan, what has he done? What’s on those other computers? Who is Wallbanger? As he writes that down, a thought hits. “Diane, do you know this guy?” He pulls up the picture of Wallbanger on his phone and hands it over.

“Sure,” she gives the phone back, wondering why he’d think this was useful. “He’s on that show Emily likes, the one with the brothers and the angel and demon. He’s the demon right?”

Tim blinks slowly and then looks at the picture again, shaking his head. “This can’t literally be Mark Sheppard, right?”

“Uh…” Diane’s looking at him.
“That’s supposed to be ‘Harvey’ the guy who sets up the deals and is paying Khan.”

She shakes her head. “That’s a British actor. Where’d you get the picture?”

“Everyone who visits an inmate at a Federal prison has to have his ID scanned and fingerprints entered into the database. That’s the picture of Wallbanger on file.”

Several of the others are looking over Tim’s shoulder. Fornell’s shaking his head, too. “Nope, that’s the guy on the show. Emily loves him.”

“Has a poster of him and the angel in her room,” Wendy adds.

“Okay, great.” Tim adds another job for himself. Find out who the hell okayed ‘Wallbanger.’

Draga’s looking over his shoulder. “You hack. We can do that.” Tim deletes and continues on with the list.

Abby: General Intel

Jimmy: General Intel

Breena: General intel

Ducky: General intel

Penny: General intel

Draga: Who okayed Wallbanger. Trap for the house. Follow the money.

“I’m laying a trap?”

“Sorry. This is what I meant about forgetting things. The information goes to that house. It gets put onto thumb drives and picked up every Monday night at 9:45.” Tim looks at Tony. “I was hoping to steal your team and have you grab whoever picks up the drives.”

Tony nods. “We can do that. And we can get your prison guys who okayed Wallbanger.”

Bishop: Trap for the house. Wallbanger. Follow the money.

Jake: Liaise with Harland. Find out about the judge who okayed the Khan deal. Track down who really wrote that law. Be on speed dial and ready to defend us if we get arrested. Jake smiles when he sees Tim write that.

Ziva: CGIS investigation. Help Borin/Fornell break people.

Vance GAO. Follow the audits. Who benefits?

Tim looks up from his list, at the people standing around him. “That cover it?”

A lot of heads bob up and down.

“And we’re going in slow and casual. Under the radar. We all keep doing our real jobs, too,” Fornell adds.
“No one moves until we’ve got solid cases. We might not get the whole thing in one sweep, but when we bring a case, no one is getting away,” Abbi adds. “Maybe we can’t kill the Hydra, but we can make sure that we seal off the neck when we cut the head off.”

“Amen,” Penny says.
It’s late, really late, and finally it’s just Tim, Abby, Jimmy, and Breena, together, naked, in bed, ready to drift off. They all would have liked something more energetic than just snuggling, but it’s late enough, and little girls get up early enough, and there’s more than enough on their collective plates, that any loving beyond going-to-sleep-snuggles is getting rescheduled for tomorrow. (Which they are looking forward to.)

They’re arranging themselves in the bed, Tim with Abby curled up in front of him and Breena at his back, when he hears Jimmy say, “So, what happened with Hue and the Navy Pension stuff?”

Tim sighs a little. “I still haven’t secured my own system enough to even look for it.” He thinks about that for a second. “I’ll run the search tomorrow. We’ve got every worm we could find out of my system now, might as well run it before they get a new worm into play.”

“Probably should give everyone more of a heads up on that than you got to tonight,” Abby says, quietly, starting to sound sleepy.

“I’ll make sure it’s the first text I send on the new phones.”

He feels Breena shift a bit, kiss the back of his neck, and say, “Sleeping time now. Lots to do tomorrow.”

He reaches behind himself, pats her butt, and closes his eyes.

And much, much too soon later, he wakes to the feel of achy bones and a little girl trying to squirm between him and her mom.

Morning goes like mornings usually do, eating, getting girls up and dressed, and, for Tim, there’s an extra job.

He shanghaies Jimmy into it, and they take the girls, too. Might as well get them out of the house. That’s a good way to eat up the time between breakfast and morning nap and give Abby and Breena a bit of a break.

Since what Tim does to cell phones has spread around NCIS, Cybercrime has been getting a pretty steady stream of requests for ‘modified’ phones. In fact, for the agents who are afloat or abroad, the single most popular thing to do if they get to the DC main branch is head down and have whichever Minion is handy with a soldering iron go to work.

These days, it happens often enough that Tim just keeps a batch of the modified ones lurking around waiting for whoever wants one next. (There’s a row of cellphones, plugged in, sitting on the back of the work bench with a huge DO NOT UNPLUG/DO NOT TURN OFF sign next to them.)

So, with Molly walking next to Jimmy, holding his hand, and Anna in the snuggli on his chest, and with Kelly in her stroller, the five of them head down to Cybercrime to grab some cell phones.
Tim doesn’t go for the already fixed up ones. Someone will have to replace them if he goes for them. He doesn’t go for the ten shiny new smart phones waiting to get fixed up. They’ll get noticed if they go missing, too. He does start stuffing flip phones into the little storage shelf under Kelly’s stroller while telling the girls that this is where he works.

Jimmy’s eyeing them, shocked to see Tim grabbing them. “The best 2008 had to offer?”

“2006. They call, text, and take pictures. That’s all I need them to do.”

Jimmy nods a bit at that, but still isn’t getting picking those phones.

“If I take twenty smartphones, I’ll clean us out and have to order ten new ones as well. Someone will notice that. These little burner phones, we go through them like thumb drives. I’ve got a standing order for 300 new ones a quarter.”

Jimmy looks appalled by that. “What the hell do you do with them that fast?”

“Me, not much. We just spiff them up, increase the battery power and the range of the GPS. Field agents… They do a lot with them. They’re pretty much standard undercover gear.”

“Oh.”

“I always had two or three in my go bag, and I’m sure you’d find at least four of them on Tony’s team at any time. Say you need to track someone and don’t have bug handy, just drop it in the backseat of a car or into a purse or…”

Jimmy starts to nod. “I get you.”

Jimmy snags one for himself, tucking it into his pocket. Tim looks at him curiously and decides that Jimmy’s going to put it somewhere into his gear. If they go missing again, having an extra GPS on them is a good plan.

“Yeah. They’re just easy and handy to have around,” Tim says, approving of the idea of a cell buried in Jimmy’s bag or something like that.

“Taking the girls out?” Manner asks, appearing from behind Jimmy, eyeing the stack of phones.

“Hi, Steve. Yeah.” Tim pets Kelly’s hair. “You know mine. Baby girl here,” he gently strokes Anna’s cheek, “Is Anna Palmer, and big girl over there,” Molly’s trying to get away from Jimmy to go explore on her own, “is Molly Palmer. Jimmy, have you met Steve?”

“Seen you around,” Jimmy says.

“The same here.”

“Okay, Jimmy Palmer, Stephen Manner. Steve’s helping Abbi out at CGIS.” Tim hands Manner one of the phones.

Manner looks at it, licks his lips, and nods. “I was afraid that one was a new hire.” He gestures at Molly.

“Give her ten years, and she might be,” Tim says with a smile, scooping Molly up. “What do you think, you wanna work here with me, Daddy, and Aunt Abby when you grow up?”

She grins at him, and lifted up, can see the TVs and sofas. “TV!”
“Yes, but not now. Maybe when your sister and cousin go down for their morning nap,” Tim says. Then he shift out of Dad-mode and into Boss-mode. “I take it you’re not here just because you were missing the joint?”

Manner shakes his head. “Kind of hoping you’d be here. Wasn’t sure how to get you directly otherwise.” He glances at Jimmy and Tim nods, then he holds up the phone. “Apparently, now I know.”

“Yeah, I’ll be setting up a secure system. Anyone on it is someone you can talk to face to face as well. What did you find?”

“Several things. First off, that worm doesn’t send information just to one place. At least the one in the CGIS system doesn’t. Unlike the girls, I left my back trace open, and I’ve followed it back to drops, probably like the one you got,” he points to the computers sitting in Tim’s office, “there. Five of them, so far. All over the world. There’s one as far away as Argentina.” Manner shakes his head. “McGee, it’s a perfect redundant system. Pulls the same info over and over and deposits it all over the place.”

Tim groans. That’s why no one is running in to grab the computers he’s got. The same information is sitting on other computers all over the world. “Fucking Hydra,” he mouths, not attracting Molly’s attention away from studying the Caf-Pow machine.

Manner looks confused. “Like Captain America? What?”

“No…” Though Tim’s starting to wonder if maybe yes, not in a real sort of way, but… Enough of that. “Just, every time we cut off one head, we find more.”

“Oh, yes.” That makes sense to Manner. “Here’s what I was thinking, and I’ll run it by Director Borin when I see her, right now, we’ve got the mirror system in place here. If I can pull it off, and if I can borrow a few hands, we’re going to build a mirror system for CGIS, and then we’ll shift the worm to the mirror system, leave it running, and back trace what happens.”

A wide smile spreads over Tim’s face. “That’s beautiful, Steve. Who were you planning on grabbing?”

He looks annoyed, and grudgingly says, “I want Brand. Baby issues aside, she doesn’t seem to need sleep, and she codes clean and fast. I need Connon and Soth, too. I’d take Howard, but I know you like to keep her around.”

Tim nods. He does like having Howard around, she runs things well, and he knows if he’s off on something she’ll keep them going the way he wants them going. “Send out the call, I’m good with it.”

“Howard?”

“You can have her as a set of second eyes when you give Brand back.”

Manner nods at that. It’s not ideal, but it works. “Shouldn’t I ask Director Borin?”

“Don’t worry about it. She’s coming over to my place this afternoon, I’ll square it with her. Just get it up and working.”

“On it, Boss.”

“Good.”
As Manner walks back to his desk, Jimmy says to him, “Baby issues?”

“He’s uncomfortable with the fact that Brand is eighteen. He prefers his hackers with multiple advanced degrees and at least thirty years behind them.”

“Ah, and the mirror system?”

“One of the defenses we have up here. If you try to hack us from the outside, you’ll end up in a mirrored version of our system. The case numbers are all the same, but what’s in them is gibberish. Randomly generated numbers and letters that we then encrypted.”

Jimmy laughs a little at that, watching Manner do something on his computer, likely sending out the call for help, he says quietly, “That’s the one who wanted to run the place?”

“Yeah. He’s still got a bit too much bureaucrat, but he’s slowly getting back to being a cop.” Tim sounds proud as he, also quietly, says that.

“All your doing?”

“I really don’t think so. I’m just giving him enough boot to the head to remind him how to do it for himself.”

“Ahhh… And you’re foisting him off on Abbi?”

Tim makes sure Manner has his ear buds in. He does, but Tim keeps his voice barely above a breath as he says, “He’s not my choice for a second-in-command. But he’d be damn good at getting her cyber-systems in order, and likely better than they ever were.”

“If last night was anything to go by, that’s not exactly going to take a genius to do.”

Tim nods a bit at that. Jimmy’s got a point.

Jimmy eyes the mound of cell phone boxes under Kelly’s stroller. “That all we need? You going after Hue?”

“I’ll do that from home, so I can keep an eye on it while we work on the floor plan. Still want to hit the lab.”

“Okay, then.”

And thus, they shuffle out.

They’re heading to the lab because of something Tim remembered while they ate breakfast. Faces that look identical to the human eye are not identical to a computer.

So, he gets the shot of “Wallbanger” up and fed into the facial recognition software, and then he takes the same shot, feeds it into Google, and pulls the most similar picture of Mark Sheppard from the internet and loads that in.
Zelaz is watching him do it, while chatting with Jimmy and Molly.

After a minute, the computer finishes up measuring everything. It beeps and tells him that not only do those faces match, they’re a 100% match. Which is, unless you are looking at two copies of the same picture, impossible.

Tim’s very annoyed at that. Some asshole at FCI Cumberland decided that it’d be a spiffy idea to scan in a fake driver’s license which had a picture of an actor stolen off the internet and photoshopped onto a Virginia driver’s license background.

Only question is, was that asshole stupid, or well-paid, or both?

Jimmy can see Tim glaring at the computer, so can Zelaz.

“That’s a match, why is that a bad thing?” Zelaz asks.

“That’s an actor. There’s absolutely no shot this guy is the person we’re looking for. That means someone okayed a guy holding this ID. So that someone is stupid or in on it.” He turns toward Jimmy. “You want to get the girls into the car? I’ve got one more job to do.”

“Take long?”

“Nah. I’m going to call the prison and make sure Khan’s sitting in interrogation the minute I get in on Monday morning. And I’m also going to make sure I get all the visitor logs for when Wallbanger’s showed up. I want to know who’s been letting him in.”

“Sure.”

And five minutes later, when Jimmy’s got the girls in their seats, Tim rejoins him, slipping into the passenger seat. “All set. Khan and his lawyer will be waiting on Monday morning. I have a feeling we’re going to have a lot to talk about.”

Jimmy nods at that, pulling the car out. “Yeah, sounds like it.”

“With any luck I can get a sketch artist to get a real mock-up of Wallbanger.”

“There’s a step. So, you don’t want to hunt by his job or prints, how are you going to find him?”

Tim’s leaning his head against the headrest, eyes closed, seeing how best to do this. “Job, I guess. Have to figure out a way to get into the CIA and go at it sideways.”

“Great.”

“Yeah. My guess is, not only will I not find Wallbanger there, but that there’ll be something in the system set to go off if anyone looks for him.”

“And that’s your sideways?”

Tim lifts his head and opens his eyes. “I hope so. Since I know what the flags are attached to, at least, I hope that it’s flagged, I’ll look for the flags and see if I can follow them to something interesting.”
“And if it’s not flagged?”

Tim shrugs. “If those redundant computers are anything to go by, it’s entirely likely they’ll have a cover ID that goes nowhere.” Tim’s glaring at his mental image of the computers.

“You don’t look happy at all.”

“We’ve got two shots to find out who those computers belong to. Either someone shows up and fusses over us having them, or we catch whoever’s been going to get the data out of them.”

“And so far no one is fussing, and you’re thinking no one is going to show up.”

Tim nods a little at that. “Not so much as to not have Tony and Bishop and Draga waiting, but... I’m not feeling it. Why risk it? The one thing we know is these guys do not want to be found out. If we’re lucky, they don’t know we were there, they show up for their information, and Tony grabs them. If we’re not, and I’m betting we’re not, given how carefully the rest of this has been set, they’ve got eyes on the building that we didn’t see, and they do know we grabbed their computers, so they don’t show up. Right now, while we’re working on finding them, they’re probably grabbing an abandoned house with good cover somewhere, and setting up more computers to drop intel onto.”

Jimmy inclines his head at that. It sounds reasonable. “You’ve cut their access to NCIS, and soon they’ll only get junk from CGIS. I can’t imagine Fornell’s guys are going to leave that in place at the FBI.”

“And if I’m lucky, that’ll force them to show their hand, make another play to re-establish contact, let me see who they are.”

“And if you’re not?”

“They’ll just vanish.” Tim sighs at that. “So many of the cases we close, we close them because whoever it was just couldn’t stop while they were ahead. If these guys are smart enough to just vanish, I don’t know if I’ll ever find them.”

“You’ll find them.”

Tim smiles weakly at that. “You mind me just spitballing at you?”

“Go for it.” Jimmy lightly touches the back of Tim’s hand. “Not like I’m the one who’s going to find the little bit of intel that breaks this open, might as well be a good sounding board.”

“You don’t know that.”

Jimmy looks over at Tim, glancing away from traffic. “I’m awfully sure this one isn’t going to hinge on some bit of evidence in how they kill someone. So, spitball away.”

“Okay. What if Wallbanger, or whoever, is selling information? Say he finds people who are in prison for doing... whatever. They’re good at what they did. He somehow convinces the prison to let him in, and then he gets these guys doing their thing. For all we know those other guys who are getting paid are also all computer criminals. So, they do their thing, like Khan provides a window into every Federal operating system, and then he sells access to whomever, and they set up their own collection points.”

Jimmy goes with that. “So, the guys in Argentina may be buying CGIS stuff, because they’re smuggling things into the country, and they may just have one data stream, CGIS, or they may also have, like, what FAA, DEA, or whatever?”
“Sure. If I was going to smuggle things I’d want something like that. And the house we found with our computer in it, that might be a spot for someone who’s watching local LEOs, or they may have a bunch of military stuff in there, or… whatever.”

“How about the code, I mean… can you use the door to find out where the information is going?”

Tim shakes his head. “Doesn’t work that way. Khan built a door, and he built a key, and he built a trap that’ll kill your system if you try to take the door out. Wallbanger or whoever sells the key, and that’s the system you have to track to get to where the information is going.” Tim’s eyes go wide. “He built a TRAP!”

“Tim?”

Tim’s looking very excited as he says, “The system will crash if you try to take his worm out! When the system crashes, your IT guys re-load it! Probably with another version of the worm on it. The IT guy isn’t going to stick a version with the exact same worm in it…” No that doesn’t feel right to Tim. The IT guy would have to be in on it, that’s too many people in on this… “No. He does, and it keeps crashing, because you keep taking the worm out, so he calls in the developer, and he fixes it. He’s the guy that’ll shove a version with a new worm in it into our system.”

Jimmy smiles at him, see you’ll figure it out on his face. “You’re going to visit the developer?”

Tim’s looking pretty happy. “Yeah. Someone in IT has to know where we get our system from. Right after I have a chat with Khan. I need to know what Wallbanger looks like, because someone gets that code into the system, and it’s not Mark Sheppard. And once I have a sketch of Wallbanger, I can go find out where we get our system from and see if he works there.”

Jimmy smiles a bit. “That’d be a perfect example of a ‘Herb-type’ guy. Say he’s a programmer at wherever makes the system. It’s not Microsoft, is it?”

Tim shakes his head. “Not now, at least. Might have been back in the day. Now we’ve got someone who just makes a system for us.”

“So, either Wallbanger’s got his own plans for how he wants things to go, or he’s found a way to make a ton of money. So, he dummies up court orders, or convinces a judge or two to work with him, he gets his back door built, and then he starts selling keys to whoever wants one.”

“Oh… That’d…” Tim shakes his head a bit. That’d be an almost perfect crime.

“Maybe he got really good with the first few jobs he tried, so he’s keeping up with it. He meets new people who want new things, like the Norton job. Say he didn’t know how to quit when he was ahead.”

“Probably didn’t see any reason to. Especially if he’s selling to people like the NSA.” Tim’s nodding; he can see that. “Bishop… I think it was Bishop… was talking about how there are talent brokers. They work with the government or cops or whoever, and find them people to do the jobs they don’t want their regular staff to handle.”

“So, he’s doing that. Might explain the variety of jobs he’s working. Maybe he’s selling info and talent to anyone with the money to pay him?”

“No great conspiracy then. Just another guy in a good place with his own little kingdom of gold.”

Jimmy nods at that, passing a slow moving Beetle in front of them. “Question is, how much of what this ‘talent broker’ is doing is legal?”
“Yeah.” Tim sighs. “If he’s got some judges on payroll, it’s possible he’s connected enough to get that language into a law, make sure he’s got cover for what he does tucked away somewhere. If he’s selling to the government, he may be relying on the idea that someone will give him a get out of jail free card. If he’s just forging everything, he may be hoping that no one really checks the papers he hands them.”

“Or some combination thereof.” Jimmy thinks for a few seconds, eyes scanning the road as he exits off of I-495. “You want an even scarier thought on that?”

“Sure.”

“Yes, there’s a paper copy of the law lurking about somewhere, but best I can remember, there’s only one, and as soon as they’re passed, they’re stored and handled electronically. What’s to say he even bothered shoving those clauses in before the law got passed? For all we know, part of what he’s selling is not just information, but a quick hack job into whatever law it is, adding a few lines to make whatever it is he’s doing legal.”

Tim slowly closes his eyes and then opens them. “You’re right, that’s scary. Remind me to make sure I have Jake check to see if that’s even possible.”

“So, text one. Hue. Text two, ask Jake if laws can be hacked.”

“Yep.” They’re still three miles from Tim’s place. “All while we’re working on figuring out how to wire the house. Gonna be a busy afternoon.”

When they get home, it’s time to put Anna and Kelly down for naptime. That means quiet play time for Molly, which means some quality time with the Muppets and Little Bear.

She’s happy with that. Jimmy, Abby, and Breena are at the dining room table, getting the stack of phones all set to talk to each other, programing in phone numbers and names and all the rest of it, boring, simple work that has to be done.

Tim gets his computer up and running, and goes to find the search he crafted to hunt down Hue’s missing fees. He had thought of a few ways to go about automating something like that. A system to randomly deduct a small amount from someone’s paycheck from time to time can be built several ways.

He tells his computer to execute the search. Then he settles down and begins to think about how, if Khan were hired to do it, how he’d write the code. It takes him another hour, but Tim comes up with what he considers a fairly good approximation of what Khan would do, and adds that to his search, too.

And now all he’s got left on that is waiting. Eventually he’ll know if NCIS is donating funds to where ever. And if it is, he’ll track that, and if it’s not, he’ll have a chat with Jarvis, Admiral Finnegan, and whoever does the Navy’s finances about ransacking the Navy’s computers to see if it’s coded in there.

When he heads back into the dining room, where there’s a stack of cell phones, all identical except for the names that Abby’s put on them in glitter paint, (Tim smirks at the idea of Gibbs and Borin with black flip phones with their names in sparkly pink paint and Abby’s distinctive handwriting on the backs.) Tim says, “So, I’ve hit the point where I’m not sure if I’d consider finding a program in NCIS’s system that’s stealing our money to be a good thing or not.”

Abby looks up at him, from where she’s sitting on the sofa with Molly. Jimmy and Breena, who are looking for the house plans that Ducky gave all of them last night, look over to him, too.

“Good thing because you’d be able to track it in house?” Abby says.

“Yeah. I got access to the Navy’s communication systems for the test. They didn’t give me free reign of every computer system they’ve got. So, I’ve got to hack it or ask for permission, and both of those techniques will likely tip off someone I’d rather not tip off.”

“You don’t think you can get in clean?” Breena asks as Tim sits next to Abby and Molly scoots into his lap for cuddles.

“When I ran the test, I got talking with Admiral Finnegan, and we agreed to snipe each other’s teams for practice. He didn’t get into mine, so he asked if his people could get the code so they could build their own version of it. Now he’s got what me and my best people came up with to defend my system, and he’s worked it over to make it even better. Hacking the Navy would be a nightmare right now.”

“What about Hue? Think he can just let you use his system?” Breena asks.

Tim nods, and then shakes his head. “I’ve got way too many things going on right now. That should have been obvious.”

Abby pets him gently. “That’s why we work in teams.”

Tim rubs his eyes. “Yeah. Okay. So, what else is up?”

“Jimmy said something about sending a text to Jake,” Abby says.

Tim nods at that, remembering, and pulls his phone out of his trousers. A minute later, he’d finished his text and sent it off.

While Tim’s been texting, Jimmy found what he was looking for. He heads into the dining room, pushes the phones all to the far side of the table and unrolls the house plans that Ducky made sure they all went home with last night. “I carefully hid it in your office to keep it safe, and forgot where it was.”

Tim nods. He’s done that more than a few times before.

He kisses Molly, and sets her on the sofa as he and Abby head over to the table. They all spend a moment looking at the plans for their part of the house.

The thing about a wiring job is that if you don’t know where the walls are going to be, you can’t do a very good job of wiring your home. So, supposedly, what they are doing this afternoon, in addition to dealing with Hydra (which is how Tim’s thinking of the Case From Hell) they’re sitting down, planning out where all the walls go, and then it’s his job to figure out how to make sure every room has power and cable and wifi and all of those good things.

He thinks that while he’s doing that, Gibbs is on HVAC and plumbing.
So, walls. Right now their section is to the right of the kitchen. It’s a hallway with two bedrooms on each side, and at the end another bedroom with the hexagonal-shaped glassed in room off of it.

At one end of their space, they’ve got a glassed in sitting room. On the other end, the kitchen backs up against one of the bedrooms. The outside walls and windows aren’t changing either. Between the two bedrooms on each side of the hallway there are bathrooms, and there’s a powder room right off of the bedroom next to the glass sitting room.

They effectively have a forty foot long, thirty foot wide rectangle with a twelve foot, glass addition on the far end.

Right now, in front of them is three layers of design. One, has the full lay out for the house as they bought it. One has the current lay out as it is now. They’d taken down all the drywall, and all of the non-weight bearing walls. It’s down to studs and plywood, and that’s what’s on that sketch. The third is, with the exception of the outside walls and windows, blank. It’s just an empty space.

Supposedly everyone is coming over after lunch, with their own sections sketched in. Walls set, bathrooms in place, and all the rest of that, and then, this afternoon, they’re going to put them all together into one big blue print with all of the plumbing and electric and whatnot all in place.

The goal is that tomorrow, as Tim’s got his computer guys breaking into the computers he’s got custody of, that Ducky and Penny will be able to take the finished plans to an architect friend who will look them over and make sure the building will stand and won’t burn down.

That’s the goal, at least.

Which means, for the four of them, they’ve pushed deciding if they’re going to have one room or two as far back as they possibly can.

Jimmy’s got the sketch with the supporting walls and the one that’s blank unrolled on the table.

Apparently the long hallway down the middle wasn’t just an aesthetic choice. At least one (and better off, both) of those two walls needs to stay in place to keep the two floors above them up.

Breena traces her fingers over the walls that need to stay in place. “One bedroom or two?”

Abby leaves for a moment and comes back with a stack of printer paper. She draws a quick and dirty version of the space they’ve got. Tim thinks that’s a good idea, whatever they come up with will be easier to see if they draw it out.

But they can’t draw anything until they answer Breena’s question.

“One,” Jimmy says. “Two would be just to look good, and… for two to work as cover, we’d have to actually sleep in both of them. Little girls get up, they come in to cuddle, they find all of us in one bed. That blows two bedrooms right out of the water, unless we’re willing to split up at night.” No one likes that. Maybe if it were just about sex, that’d be a workable answer, but sex is the icing on the cake at the end of the meal. And they want the whole meal.

“Unless we’re willing to keep them out of our room…s. This is our space, you don’t get to come in. If we did that, and had two rooms, there’d be no shot of ending up with a six-year-old telling her grandparents how Mom and Uncle Tim had slept in together last weekend,” Abby says. But she’s not looking happy at that, and no one else is, either.

Abby shakes her head, killing her own idea. “Okay, that plan is out. We’re not cutting off morning cuddle time.”
“I think that if we get a talkative six-year-old, we’re good with telling the outside world that yes, we share a room at our weekend vacation place by the river, after all, there are ten adults in the group and a bunch of kids. That’ll imply it’s just about tight quarters,” Tim says.

“And as long as said little girl doesn’t mention the naked part of sleeping in…” Breena shrugs some. “I suppose we could start wearing pajamas…” The four of them all look at each other, that’s a more workable compromise than saying goodbye to cuddle time or not sleeping together after sex.

“Act like you think this is totally normal and completely innocent, and that takes the wind out of a lot of gossip…” Abby’s feeling her way through that, testing to see if those words feel right. They do.

“As Gibbs told us, No shame!” Jimmy adds.

Tim thinks that works, but he’s not sold on one room, not yet. He likes the idea of it, but he’s still worried about how it’ll look. Why… Something’s niggleing in the back of his head, and he really needs it to come to the front now. So he starts talking, hoping it’ll hop out eventually, “If we have two rooms, even if we don’t split up to sleep…” He’s staring at the blueprints, shaking his head.

“Eventually they’ll get old enough they’ll want to bring friends along. If we don’t want them constantly bitching about being away from home every weekend, they’re going to be bringing buddies…” Yep, that’s definitely part of it. The kids will want the outside world to come join them here. “Hell, sooner than that, we’re talking about having the yearly Christmas party out there, so people will see that the place is big enough we’re not hurting for space. Plus, we’re the ones with the rooms on the ground floor. If there’s a party, people’ll be putting coats and stuff in our space. If we have two rooms… that goes a long way toward looking right. And once the kids get older, they aren’t going to be running in for morning cuddles. By the time we’ve got four tweens, they won’t be bursting in, they likely won’t remember cuddle time all that well, I mean, I don’t remember cuddle time with my parents,” no one stops Tim to mention that he may not remember it because it probably didn’t happen, “but they and their buddies will gossip if we’ve just got one room.”

That seems to make a certain amount of sense to the rest of this group.

He grabs the first piece of paper. On the left side of the hallway he fills in two thirds of the rectangle with one space. In the middle of that space he marks out a smaller rectangle and writes bathroom on it. “Bathroom in between. No access to the bath from the outside, but both of our rooms open onto it. We can decorate each room to our own tastes,” Tim would have to admit that trying to find a halfway space between the bright, cool, airy style that Breena prefers, with its pastel colors and tons of light, and Abby’s dark, vivid, gothic style, heavy on the drapes, jewel tones, black, and curlicues seemed like a Sisyphean task. Getting a compromise between Abby’s style, and his utilitarian chic was enough of an issue, melding it into Breena’s… “And, we can set each room for different styles of play.”
That gets an intrigued look from the other three. They like the idea of building different places for different sorts of playing.

“Say, our room is kind of dark, with lots of candles and mirrors and soft textures, big, low bed, drapes around it, lots of pillows, a cross between gothic colors and harem styling…” He can see the other three getting into this, and he’s coming up with something both he and Abby will be happy with. “All those pillows you got for that Valentine’s dinner at the Lab that are sitting in our attic now. That room could be their home.” Abby’s nodding along with that, getting some concrete ideas for designing around vivid scarlet and royal purple satin pillows. Tim looks over to Breena and Jimmy. “And your room is bright and airy, with say, a few plants on hooks, and some carefully chosen furniture at a few different heights…”

He can see them nodding. Then he draws two dots along the same line as the wall for the other third of the left side of the hallway. “Those are columns. TV, sofas, family entertainment section goes here. For when we want to do movie night with each other and our kids. There’s a few windows on the wall that’d make TV watching annoying… So he draws one more line, blocking off the wall with the windows, and says, “Powder room and laundry over here?”

That works for them. With as many little kids as they’ve got, and with what they hope to do in those rooms, they do end up with a lot of laundry to wash.

He draws two more dots in front of the hexagonal room. “More column supports. This gets some comfy chairs and more pillows.”

“Stargazing and reading?” Breena asks with a smile.

“Sounds good to me. Bedtime story pit for little guys?” Jimmy says.

“Come on, bedtime stories are going to happen in Gibbs’ section of the house,” Abby says. “You know he’s going to have some sort of nook in there just for reading to and snuggling with grandkids.”

Tim would have to admit that he can see that. “With a fireplace, and probably a really big rocking chair.”

He goes back to the edge of the rectangle that’s closest to the kitchen, and sketches another rectangle parallel to their rooms. He dashes another line down the middle of that, turning that space into two long rectangles, and adds two doors facing their rooms. “Nursery and bigger kids rooms.”

“How about bathroom?” Abby says.

Tim nods, erases a few walls, makes the rooms smaller and adds one more rectangle along the far wall.

They’re left with the far side of their area being wide and open, lots of space for grown-ups to lounge around and little guys to run and yell and make messes and play.

“Do we like this?” Tim asks, especially Jimmy because he was in favor of one room. He nods. This will work. Though he’s thinking, that in twenty years, when they aren’t swimming in babies, they might do some rearranging.

As they’re starting to add things like closets and doors to the sketch, Tim gets a text back from Jake. He doesn’t know Jake well enough to imagine the expression on his face, but he’s sure that Jake’s pissed off. It’s not supposed to be possible, but the tax code alone is 70,000 pages long. One physical copy gets printed out and sent to the National Archives. A searchable, electronic text is then sent put online and added to the databases we all work off of. People can request physical copies, but they’re all printed off the same electronic document the one copy in the Archives was printed from. Get into that electronic copy, and God alone knows what you could do.

Tim sighs at that. How would you get into it?

Anyone who’s ever worked for a Congressman or Senator has open access to the program they write laws on.

So, what... A few thousand people?

Ten thousand-ish. And, depending on how security conscious the Congressman is, any of his previous staff. And anyone who can come up with the right password.

Tim looks up at his ceiling and quietly says, “Fuck!” Then he starts typing. You and your buddies at the Open Government Project have a list of things you were sure should have been illegal, but weren’t?

A few.

Make a list. Go looking for everything you can find. Hopefully in this case the metadata isn’t missing.

McGee?

If we’re lucky, we get into the electronic copies, and we can see when certain bits were added. If we’re really lucky we’ll know who added them.

How about we have breakfast Friday morning? I’ll have a list for you.

Thanks.

The afternoon feels really surreal to Tim. He’s bouncing between conversations along the lines of convincing Gibbs that it doesn’t matter if he never intends to watch TV in his and Abbi’s section of the house, it’s still got to be wired for cable because that’s where the third router has to go if the third floor is going to have any sort of decent wifi.

Followed up by Gibbs explaining to them that, yes, that set up they designed for their space is lovely, but if they were to rearrange the kids’ rooms a bit they could actually take advantage of where the current water hook ups are as opposed to having to move them all over by twenty inches.

And, the less that’s said about attempting to get wiring in place for ceiling fans and recessed lighting for Tony and Ziva, the better. They’ve got the room that backs up against the roof on the second floor. And while it’s true that they ripped out the drywall for the walls, they hadn’t taken down the ceilings and floors, so getting that wired requires ripping out the ceiling, too. Granted, when it’s done, it’s going to look awesome. So awesome that Tim and Abby are going to do it in their room, along with color changing LED lights, as well.

Which of course led to the conversation about LEDs cost what? and Don’t worry about it, you’ll be dead before we have to get a replacement.

But that led to the decision that all of the common rooms would have recessed lighting along the ceiling line, because after all, those shots Ziva’s showing them do look really cool, and none of them want to be messing around with lightbulbs, and Tim and Abby looking forward to getting the smart bulb system up and set so that when you walk into the room it just lights up on its own. (And Gibbs is getting ready to install switches because he does not even begin to believe that’s going to work, and he refuses to be stumbling around in the dark in his own home because his lunatic kids are surgically attached to their smartphones.)

And through all of this, there are bits and pieces of conversation along the lines of, “Yeah, I’ve got my computer searching through the NCIS systems looking for a program designed to steal little bits of money out of our paychecks.”

“I have never noticed any errant fees on my check,” Ducky adds.

“And you look carefully enough you’d notice a dollar fifty ‘transfer fee?” Jimmy asks.

“Always, Dr. Palmer.”

Ducky’s looking at Jimmy like he can’t imagine how someone wouldn’t notice that, and Jimmy’s looking at Ducky like he can’t believe someone has so much free time that they would go over every pay check in detail to see exactly how much money went where.

Penny smiles and breaks in with, “Ducky still balances a check book every month. My finances have never been in better shape.”

This causes the younger generation to look at him in awe, because none of them even have a check register to balance, let alone would even think of doing so.

“You’re all doing a splendid job of attempting to make me feel ancient. None the less, I can say with absolute certainty, in over twenty years, there have been no mystery fees from my pay. My guess is none of you can do that.”

And that’s true, they can’t because they don’t.

So, Abbi tweaks Gibbs a bit about wanting a bath with a separate shower, and he gently snarks back at her about how much is she going to want that when they’re laying pipe for the tenth consecutive day, followed by a somewhat scandalous comment about Gibbs being too damn old to be “laying pipe” for ten hours in a row, let alone days, and minutes might be more his speed from Tony, which results in some giggles and Gibbs almost head slapping Tony.

Tim’s not commenting much about that. He’s listening, and enjoying that Abbi’s fully part of the planning for their section. (And Tim is very firmly convinced that that part of the house is their section, but it still makes him happy to see that Abbi’s on board with this, too.)

That part is good, and warm, and fun and friendly, even if trying to get everything wired up is making Tim’s eyes want to fall out of his head. He rubs them, and is coming to the conclusion that in his copious spare time he probably does have to visit the eye doctor again and hunt down a pair of glasses.

“Where are we putting the generator?” Gibbs asks. “Don’t want us getting caught that far out if the power goes.”

Tim nods, that’s a good point. The rest of the crew is scattered around his downstairs sketching away on their own bits of the house, so he’s got room at the dining room table to roll out the blueprints for the basement. He spends a moment looking at it, squinting, and rubbing his eyes more. He mutters something about the font on this being eight point, before tapping the spot under what’ll be his and Abby’s room (the part farthest from the hot water heaters, and least likely to get wet if there’s a problem with them) “We’ll put the batteries here.”

“Batteries?” Gibbs doesn’t look even remotely convinced by that.

“Yeah. I’m not sticking a gas generator in my house. Too expensive, too loud, too… everything. Hell, I don’t want gas fumes in the place. Tesla batteries. You stick them somewhere out of the way, they charge off the house current, and if you lose power, they take over. Plop as many as you want onto your grid and you’re good to go.”

“And when you’re on day three of no power?” Gibbs asks, very much planning on buying a gas generator that will be in the boat house, ready to save the day when needed.

“When will we ever be out there for three days of no power?” Tim asks back.

Gibbs eyes narrow a little, that’s not a bad point. They aren’t going to live there full time.

“If you’re worried, we can stick some solar panels on the roof and put a few of the batteries on that. No matter what, the fridge and heat’ll keep running. Speaking of which, what is this?” Tim taps something that Gibbs has labeled as ‘furnace’ is the basement.

“Heat.”

“I can see that. What are we burning?”

Gibbs is giving Tim the isn’t it obvious look.

Tim shakes his head.

“We’ve got six acres of trees. Wood.”

Tim shakes his head. That’s what he was afraid of when he saw “furnace” on the plan. “Not if you want me out there for more than a few hours at a time. Fire in the fireplace, fine. Heat the whole house with it, and I’m going to need a ventilator.”

That perks up Breena. “Natural gas. We want that. It’s dirt cheap and makes for really nice cooking. And… You’re okay with that, right?”

Tim nods. “Yeah. We’ve got gas, and you do, too. It’s fine. Wood smoke isn’t my friend in large quantities. And maybe they’re better now, but the year we lived in a house with oil heat was the worst year for my lungs.”

Penny’s just about to add that that year was also frightfully cold, and that wasn’t doing him any favors, either, when Tim’s computer makes a chirping noise, and that derails his part of this conversation. “Gotta check on that.” He puts his pencil down and goes into his office. Abbi and Tony follow along with him.

“What is it?”

He’s reading, fast… “Not what I was expecting…” He’d told the computer to go looking for certain programs, and he told it to give him anything similar to the terms he put in. This is… “It’s a random number generator.”

“Is that good or bad?” Tony asks.

Tim shrugs, looking perplexed. “I don’t know. Hue thought the accounts were being chosen at random, so one of the things I sent the computer to look for was…” He glances at Tony and Abbi and edits himself; they don’t care and aren’t interested in what, precisely, he went looking for, “I told it to look for anything that would pick things at random. One way to do that is to randomly generate numbers and then go after anything that matches those numbers.”

“Is that what’s going on?” Abbi asks.

“Not sure. This is just a generator. I can’t see what it’s generating for or why it’s there.”

“Where is it?” Abbi asks.

Tim smiles up at him. “Where do you think?”

“Federal intranet?” Tony says.

Tim nods. “Yeah. But, now I know it’s there, so I can now hunt for anything that references it.”

“Why didn’t your guys’ worm hunt find this?” Tony asks.

“It’s not a worm.” Tim’s already starting to type, but he pulls back for a second, realizing that’s a smartass answer, and that he’s not being asked that because Tony’s trying to waste his time. He’s asking because he doesn’t know the difference. “Worms are programs that get into your software and then allow other people to get in, or take information out. There are tens of millions of lines of code in here, so we didn’t just read through, looking for it. We searched out any terms we could think of that would allow someone to get in or take information out, and that’s how we found them. We didn’t find this, because this is a random number generator and it’s not even remotely like any sort of worm.”

“Now I find out what this does. And then I go back and try to convince that man of yours that more than one electrical plug in a room isn’t an extravagance.” Tim sighs at that. If this house had been entirely up to Gibbs, it’d be one room, with a fireplace, dirt floor, maybe a lantern, and possibly a cistern somewhere to hold rainwater for the occasional shower and drinking. Tim can just see it, camping with a roof and some walls to keep the rain off.

Abbi smiles dryly. “How about I convince, and you find the next piece of the puzzle.”

Tim nods and gets coding.

It’s a random number generator. That much he can see. And its job is to generate a number that is three digits, a space, two digits, a space, and then four digits. He stares at it for a second and then knows what he’s looking at. Social security numbers. And it’s just sitting there, lurking about, in the section of code that lets them change the layout on their desktops.

He looks at it for another moment, and gets moving. Two plans of attack. First off he knows it’s there, so he sets up a search for anything that references it. Second of all he modifies his search for how the fees get chosen. He begins looking for something that takes social security numbers and then accesses accounts based on those numbers.

It occurs to him, as he’s looking at that, that all told there are 18 million federal employees, and more retirees, and if this thing is hooked into Social Security payouts… It probably is easier to generate social security numbers and see if they match someone than it is to try and pick them out at random.

He thinks about that more… There’s no central database of bank account numbers they pay into. He could go to HR, and get bank account numbers, but he’d have to get them by searching people. He couldn’t do it by account number. But every single federal employee and all the retirees and of course everyone getting a Social Security payout, is identified by their social security number.

He nods at that. It’s a good way to do it. Quiet, stealthy… The only question is, is that how they’re picking people?

An hour later, when he rejoins the group, Tim asks, “Ducky, do you have a social security number?”

Ducky looks up from the final sketch of the third floor, where Tony is drafting in the walls. “Since 1994, why do you ask?”

“Just curious about it. I think they’re using social security numbers to find something. Maybe that’s how they pick out which accounts to go after. If you didn’t have one, that would be a reason for never seeing a mysterious fee.”

“I have had legal dual citizenship in the United Kingdom and the United States since 1994.”

“Okay.”

“And how’s the search going?” Abby asks, laying a hand on his shoulder as he looks down at the house plans, which are coming along.

He rubs his eyes. “Slow. But I know there’s a number generator in there, and given what it’s coming up with, it’s creating random social security numbers. Hopefully soon, we’ll find out if that’s how it’s picking accounts.”

“And you’re hoping to teach him how to do this?” Tony asks, looking at Gibbs.

Both Gibbs and Tim shake their heads.

“You’ve got to know how to really code to come up with search terms for something like this,” Tim says, taking a sip of Abby’s lemonade. “Thanks.” He gives her a quick kiss. “But, once you’ve got those codes to search, you’re just telling the computer to go through the code and find them. The searching is the easy part. That’s not what you’re going to do,” he says to Gibbs, “if you’ve got the CGIS crime database—“

“We still don’t have one,” Abbi adds, looking annoyed. “Manner just about wet his pants when he saw how bad of shape we were in.”

“Oh, right. He’s fixing that. I told him that you’d be cool with it.”

“Do I want to know how or why?”
Tim shakes his head and gets back to what he was saying about what Gibbs is going to be learning to do. “Okay, say you’ve got the IRS database and you want to know…” He looks at Gibbs.

Gibbs licks his lips. He wants to be looking for the bigger picture, but he’s not even sure where that starts. Might as well take a stab at it. “The bitcoin thing you guys were talking about last night. Say I wanted everything that had something to do with that, and say… tax evasion, and… any case that hinted someone like Brandis was involved in something along those lines, and then the cases he didn’t solve but should have…”

Tim shakes his head, that’s a hell of a complicated search. “Yeah, not a keyword search. If I wanted to do that, I’d have to pull all of the cases that matched the basic points, bitcoin, tax evasion, the people you’re looking for, cases they ran, cases they didn’t solve, stuff like that. So that’s at least five databases. Then I’d build a program to cross reference them. Then that program would find as many points of commonality as you like. And that’s when you start looking for leads.”

Gibbs sighs… That’s… “Yeah. That’s the goal, but…”

“But it’s a lot of quiet, picky work that no one notices, and they just expect you to pop out answers in an hour even though you’ve barely got one database set?” Tim says with a mean, little smile.

Gibbs nods a bit.

“Karma’s a bitch, Gibbs,” Jimmy says, patting him on the back, smiling widely at him.

Gibbs blows out an exasperated breath.

“He’ll get it. Just takes time and effort,” Tim adds. “Hell, I suppose we could get you, and Breena, and Lara, and Wendy working on it, too. The internet is basically one big database. Teach all of you how to use it to really search…”

“You mean in my spare time, when I’m not watching kids, making up dead people, running my business, building a house, and occasionally eating and sleeping?” Breena says.

“Or not,” Tim replies.

“I think I’m on coming up with ideas to search. Making up dead people does give you time to think. Gibbs, you’ll be searching them.”

He smiles a little at that. “What do you want to search?”

“If you can get into it, I want to know how often GAO audits fail. I want to know, what, exactly they audit. Like, every quarter at Slaters we get all of the branches together and we go over our books. Not just a quick P/L statement, we go through everything. Keeps each other honest and our profit margins looking good. So, who’s looking, what are they looking at, are they really even looking? Abbi, were you supposed to just fill out some forms and everyone pats each other’s backs, or do they really look at your numbers?”

Abbi shrugs. “Brandis was pretty clear about I was supposed to just let it go. Stall. Kick it down the road and it’d go away. My auditor was sure I was supposed to give her everything.”

“You had a brand new go-getter, right?” Tim says, remembering something about Abbi talking about this audit making her career.

“Yeah, maybe two years since she got her CPA.”
Breena inclines her head at that, quickly snagging Molly, who’s trying to pull the plans off the table. “Your plans are on the floor, baby. Go draw me your playroom, okay?” Molly grabs a few markers and heads back to the big pieces of paper on the kitchen floor. “So, neither of you knew the rules of the game you were playing. I’d think if you could look into the audit numbers, see who has audits that pass and fail, who always passes people, that that might be a hint as to where you’ve got troubles.”

Gibbs nods at that, that would be a good thing to get into.

“Speaking of play rooms…” Jimmy says, and the conversation turns back to the house.

Tim shakes his head a little, surreal.

---

Soon doesn’t happen. His computer isn’t finding what that number generator attaches to. Which means it’s buried deep (millions of lines of code and one PC searching, that’s a search that isn’t going to be fast) or he hasn’t come up with the right terms (in which case there’s nothing for his PC to find).

He’s not terribly worried. Tomorrow he’s going in, and he’ll put his computers at work on it. That will speed things up. And he’ll get his coders on it, too, and that will widen the search net.

They’ll find why that generator is there, and what it’s doing.

They spend the rest of the afternoon getting plans into place. Tim puts in where plugs are going to go, figures out how to make sure that every room has light and cable and internet. He makes sure ceiling fans can be set and run, and that walls where they think TVs will go will have cable outlets.

It’s a good afternoon, and by the time it’s done, the plans are done, too.

Next week is Fornell’s wedding, and Tony and Ziva’s closing, so they won’t be doing any building then, but the week after, October 8th and 9th, they’ll all get together and start making their house into a functional home. The hope is that by the end of the month, all of the hardware will be installed, the walls will be up, and all they’ll have left to do is decorate.

Done in time for Christmas will be tight, but it’s possible.
Dinner is fun. Granted, dinner is often fun when it’s the seven of them. But with the sketches of their section of the house lying around, and talking about what sorts of things they’re hoping to have there (Abby and Breena get talking about the shower, how it’ll be glass, four feet wide, seven feet long, with multiple showerheads hanging down from above, and maybe some sort of bench sort of thing built in along the wall side… for example.) is even more fun.

Toward the end of the getting the sketches done, Ducky had given them all their budgets for fixing up their sections of the house, so to say they’ll get to have a lot of fun is an understatement. (In fact, Tim’s wishing he had mentioned that earlier, because he would have made sure they had more bathroom space. They will be getting a beyond awesome shower, but, if he’d known his budget, a beyond awesome tub would have been nice, too.)

So, they’re having fun, laughing, joking, dreaming about which bits of the house will look like what, as they feed little girls, and get them all washed up and ready for bed.

“Does it feel weird to either of you?” Abby asks Tim and Jimmy as the four of them put the inflatable mattresses on the floor, getting a sleeping and play place ready for tonight.

“Which part?” Breena asks, because today didn’t feel weird at all, to her.

“Well, you know, this is probably the biggest case any of us have ever worked…” Abby finishes tucking in her corner of the sheets, gets up off the floor, and starts grabbing the pillows from their bed, tossing them onto the mattresses as Jimmy and Breena tuck in the rest of the sheets, and Tim rubs his hand. “And today, instead of Gibbs storming around NCIS barking at us, we were here, working on the case and our home. Felt trippy.”

Tim nods at her, working on the sore muscles of his right hand. He hasn’t done anything with a pencil or pen in a long time, and sketching involved keeping the paper he was working on still, with his right hand, all spread out, or even less comfortable, sketching along a straight edge, which he also had to keep steady and still with his right hand. And right now, it’s not happy with him for that. He can really feel he stretched everything out a lot further than it wanted to go.

“Family first,” Jimmy says. He looks down, they’ve got all the sheets on, so he sits down in the middle of the mattress, and pulls Tim with him. “Here, let me.” He takes Tim’s right hand in his and starts working on his forearm. Tim winces a bit. He hadn’t realized it was even really involved with what he was doing today, but now that Jimmy’s working it, he can really feel what he did. Jimmy nods briefly at him, and lightens his touch some. “Gibbs said that to me, once. I think we’re finally living it.”

“Today felt surreal to me. Showerheads to conspiracies to Python to playrooms,” Tim says, relaxing, sitting back against the wall, consciously trying to make his right arm go soft and supple as Jimmy works it.

Jimmy’s eyeing his forearm, looking like that’s not exactly what the problem is.
“Scoot.”

Tim pouts at him a bit, he was comfy, but he scoots forward. “Where do you want me?”

“Depends…” He places his hand on Tim between his spine and right shoulder blade, and presses in a bit, when Tim jerks and whimpers, Jimmy nods toward the middle of the mattress. “Face down. You were leaning into that arm to keep everything steady while you were drawing.”

Tim pulls off his t-shirt, and decides he’s got no need for pants, either. His boxers follow a few seconds later, and he stretches out, naked, in the middle of the mattress. “You couldn’t have mentioned that to me while I was doing it?”

Jimmy straddles his hips. “Since you were doing it, I figured it didn’t hurt.”

Tim glances up at Jimmy, looking slightly irked. “Well, it didn’t. Not while I was doing it.”

He puts his head back down, and Breena gently pets his hair. He closes his eyes and purrs a bit. He hears footfalls, and knows they’re Abby’s, and the click of plastic, probably the bottle of massage oil, and then warm, firm hands (Jimmy’s) slick and sliding slowly, with good deep pressure, up and down his back.

Tim sighs. “I love you.”

He feels the mattress shift a bit, Abby settling in next to him, and she asks, “You singular or plural?”

“Always plural, but right that second I was thinking Jimmy.”

He gets a quick hair tousle from Jimmy, and then another long, stretching stroke from the base of his spine to where it meets up with his skull. “You love anyone rubbing on you.”

Tim smiles at Jimmy. “Guilty.” Then he looks to Abby. “You know what feels really weird to me?”

She cocks her head a bit.

“Gibbs taking the backseat. I mean, I know we’ve seen him do it. ‘Your case, your lead’ and all. But… I almost expect him to be hopping up and asking for updates. ‘M’Gee?’” He does a fairly decent version of how Gibbs says Tim’s name when they’re working. “It felt a little odd when my computer let me know about the number generator, and Abbi and Tony went in with me, but he didn’t.”

“Think he’s okay?” Breena asks.

They all think about that for a few seconds. Gibbs didn’t seem particularly off or in a bad mood or anything, so… “Yeah, he was okay,” Abby says. “I think, for right now, he’s shifting priorities. Like, he knows he can’t help you,” she strokes Tim’s cheek, “right now, so he’s working on learning something useful for that. He’s wounded and healing, so he can’t go out investigating with Tony, so he offered to get the contractors and make sure they do a good job on their place, make sure it’s ready to flip as soon as possible, which frees up Tony and Ziva to do more investigating. Same thing with Abbi, he’s not in a place to go out and help her in the field, so he’s making sure that she can focus on her work.”

Breena smiles wryly. “He’s being a wife, taking care of the home front.”

“He probably thinks of it as being a REMF,” Tim says.
Breena and Jimmy look confused on that one. Abby smirks and nods; that probably is how Gibbs thinks of it.

Tim reads their confusion to mean they haven’t run into that term before. “Rear-echelon motherfucker. That’s what the Marines call them. The guys who do everything from making sure that everyone eats, to having enough bullets, to planning out strategy, to building the things you shoot the bullets out of.”

“Okay.” Jimmy nods slowly, pressing his thumb into the muscles right along Tim’s shoulder blade. Tim sighs at that, it’s tender, but good tender, and Jimmy’s getting close to, but not on whatever the problem is. “How do you know that one and I don’t?”

“Because I’ve been cussed out by grieving Marines who didn’t appreciate being ‘palmed off’ on the REMF. Especially when I was heavier, they’d see me, see the computer, and assume I was back of the line and get annoyed. They wanted Gibbs or Tony or Ziva. Someone who looked like a front line person. Meanwhile, the ones you see don’t talk.”

Jimmy inclines his head, that’s fair enough. And the ones he sees that do talk usually have nothing to say about his job.

“Either way,” Breena says, “he’s shifting focus. And things like today, where he can do something useful, for the home front and get to listen in on and add occasional bits of advice on the current case is probably a really good thing for him.”

“More of that tomorrow, right?” Tim asks. “Not for me.” Tomorrow his hardware guys get in and he’ll be working with them. And he’d gotten a call from Diane today saying that she’d be heading in tomorrow, so that’s when they’d go looking for Lovvy in the IRS computers. “But you all are going to the lumber yard to start ordering two by fours and stuff like that, right?”

“Ordering, lugging, and maybe starting to do some framing. Depends on how fast Penny’s architect friend gets done with looking over the plans,” Breena says. “I think he’s planning on going along on that visit, see about hiring the guy for Tony and Ziva’s place. He wants someone who knows what he’s doing to get everything sketched out fast and clean.”

That sounds like a good day to Tim. He sighs and then twitches a bit. Jimmy’s got his thumb digging into something really tender under his shoulder blade, and that’s shooting pain through his whole arm and chest. He’s definitely on the problem now, not just near it.

“Once you’ve broken into those computers, I’ll be in to start going through them. If there’s even a hint of some sort of physical evidence in any of them…” Abby’s sounding gleeful at the chance to go head to head against someone who thinks they’re the best and brightest. “I will search it out, find it, and identify it. By the time I’m done with this, we’ll know who put those motherboards together.”

Tim smiles at her and squeezes her ankle, which is resting near his left hand.

“I assume we’ve got Kelly?” Breena asks Abby.

“Kind of hoping that, but I can wait for Gibbs or Ducky or Penny to be free.”

“We’ve got her, just nailing down the details.”

“And assuming we’re home in time to eat, we’re bringing dinner,” Tim says.

“Think you will be?” Breena asks.
Tim would shrug but he’s got Jimmy leaning into his shoulders, so he says, “No idea. It’d be nice.” His phone starts ringing and for a second all four of them tense up, wondering what’s going on now.

Jimmy gets off of Tim, and he scrambles up, grabbing it, and saying to them. “Patil, my hardware specialist from Okinawa.” Arya, his hardware specialist in Alameda got in late this afternoon.

Tim picks up and they hear, “McGee… Okay, good… Nah… You’ve been on a plane for twenty-eight hours. Sleep, eat, try to get onto East Coast time. I want your A game tomorrow. Eight o’clock at the Navy Yard… Sounds good… Yeah… They still make them… I’ll bring the donuts.”

Breena, Abby, and Jimmy watch Tim hang up his phone, tossing it back onto his bedside table, then turning back to them, sitting down between Abby and Breena, facing Jimmy. “And now they’re both here. Patil’s just landed and wanted to know if I needed him at the Navy Yard right this second.”

Breena slides her leg up Tim’s. “And amazingly enough you don’t think he needs to get there right this second.”

Tim leans toward her and kisses Breena, his hand drifting down her back. “Yeah, for some reason I want him to be well-rested before getting started on this.”

“Him well-rested, or you?” Abby asks.

Tim smiles a little. Talk about changes. If I was running this à la Gibbs, I’d be at the Navy Yard with Arya, working our asses off, and expect Patil to get there as fast as possible and hit the ground running. But he’s not Gibbs, and he doesn’t want to be Gibbs. Not like that, for several reasons. “Even if I didn’t have anything more interesting than that search running in the background and Call of Duty, I’d want us all going after this awake and alert. I don’t know what we’re going to find, but I don’t want him or Arya messing it up because of jetlag.” He pets Abby, and kisses Breena again, smiling widely at them. “But I do have something… someone… ones more interesting to do than Call of Duty, so…” He grins up at them, feel pleased with himself.

“Wanna do some ‘pipe laying’ of your own?” Jimmy asks with a smirk.

“Oh, my God, I can’t believe Tony actually said that!” Abby adds with a giggle. “That was the worst dirty joke I’d ever heard.”

“Yeah. I think that’s the dirtiest thing I’ve ever heard Tony say,” Breena says.

Tim shakes his head. “He made a crack to Abbi about swinging both ways when she mentioned batting lefty in softball.”

Abby’s eyes light up, “And he also mentioned the thing about her and Gibbs trading head slaps and how, in the right circumstances, that could be romantic.”

“When did he say that?” Breena’s somewhere between titillated and horrified.

“He told Ziva that when we were all looking for the perfect woman for Gibbs,” Tim says. Ziva told him, he told Abby, and on and on it went. Gossip is fun.

“What are the right circumstances?” Jimmy asks.

The other three stare at him, and he blushed a bit. “Okay, right, yeah, I should have realized that. Sounds like a way to get bitten, though.”

“Okay, you’re taking that too literally.” Breena scoots over to Jimmy’s lap and kisses him. He kisses back, soft, wet, happy, and then gently nips her lower lip. “Of course, sometimes biting can be fun.”

After a moment of that, Breena breaks the kiss with Jimmy and then kisses Tim. When she breaks the kiss with him, she pets both of the guys and says, “So… there’s something I’ve been thinking about for a few days now,” that gets all sets of ears perked up and all sets of eyes watching Breena, “and I’m pretty sure Abby won’t be up for it much longer, and it’s my fertile week, so this would be fun, and neither of you’d need a condom,” now all attention is riveted to her, “but I’ve never done it before, so I might be kind of clumsy at it, and…” All three of them are hanging on every word, waiting to see what she’s been thinking about. “And I was thinking, imagining…”

“God, woman, just tell us,” Jimmy knows she’s spinning out her description to work them up.

Breena grins at him, complete wicked saucy joy on her face. “Am I taking too long?”

He gently kisses her and then nips her bottom lip again, giving her a pat on the ass. “Yes. Spill it.”

“Oh, okay. Maybe I’d like to ‘lay some pipe.’” That gets Tim and Abby staring at Breena, very interested, and Jimmy’s looking curious, but a bit less enthusiastic, because he’s not sure who’s going to be the pipe. “Tim and Abby in the middle. You and him are doing her, same time, and I do him with the strap on. You get the control on the vibrator on me.”

Jimmy’s eyes are sparkling at pleasure with that, and he’s got a very wide smile on his face. Tim’s eyes slide shut and he groans with pleasure. Abby’s beaming with joy at that idea. “Oh, yes! We are so doing that.”

Breena leans over, and kisses Abby, tongues and lips caressing over each other, wet and pink. When she pulls back she says, “Go get ready.”

Abby bounces up to the bathroom, shedding clothing as she goes.

“Okay, where is this going to work best?” Breena asks.

Tim eyes their room, and then says, “You okay with not moving much?” to Jimmy.

“So in the position you were in when we did Breena?” Jimmy asks.

“Eh!” Breena shakes her head while smiling at them. “I was doing you. You two mostly just sat there.”

“That’s not how I remember it,” Jimmy says with a smirk. “So, you thinking the armchair?”

Tim nods. “Bed would be better for my knees,” better for Abby, too, he can get that little up thrust thing with his legs in addition to the motion of his hips, “but I’m not sure how well I’d do holding her legs right now.” He, or Jimmy, would need to hold her legs, otherwise that position’s a great ab workout for Abby, which is not all that great for getting off when you aren’t pregnant, and just downright painful when you are. And yes, he’s healing, and getting stronger, but given what Breena intends to do to him, he’s not sure how stable he’ll be.

“Yeah, don’t need to strain yourself on this.” Jimmy says, pretty well able to imagine how on the side of the bed would work. “Pillows for your knees should do it.”

Tim feels Breena’s hand slip over his butt. “You’re almost a foot taller than I am, on your knees will work better for me than standing, but all of us lying on our sides was how I imagined it. Slow, easy, shallow, just feeling it.”
Tim glances at Jimmy, and he looks back to Breena. That sounds a hell of a lot easier than what he was thinking. “I like on our sides.”

“So, how does this work?” Breena asks when Tim gets out of the bathroom. She’s kneeling in the middle of the bed, strap-on in front of her, while Abby’s getting the lube. “I mean… Do I just wear it the whole time, or have it next to the bed and put it on later or…”

Tim shrugs. He’s got no idea how it feels when it’s on. He’s, for fairly obvious reasons, never worn it. And, usually, when Abby’s wearing it, she’s got him tied up and so wound up that he’s not really too aware of what’s going on.

He glances at Abby, who says, “I think it tends to flow better if you’re already wearing it. Start with the straps looser, and tighten them when you get going,” Abby says. “If you keep it a little loose, then just like a real dick, it’ll press up or to the side.” Abby sits next to her, putting the lube in the middle of the bed. “Once you’re ready to use it, make sure it’s tight. You’ll have more control and it’ll feel better for both of you if it’s snug to your pelvis when you’re fucking.”

So, Breena shimmies into it, and Abby helps her get it set, loosely.

From there they slip into their usual (if they can be said to have a usual) four-way making out. Kisses slipping from one to the other, hands and lips, arms and legs stroking and petting. Tim’s focusing more on Breena, and Jimmy’s more with Abby tonight, but it’s not exclusive. All four of them play with each other.

A few minutes into it, Jimmy remembers that he’s got a bottle of massage oil right next to the mattresses, and he’s not seeing any reason why all of them slick and slippery would be a bad thing, and Tim would have to admit that he thinks that’s a splendid idea, too. Women he loves, naked and gleaming in low-golden light, their silk smooth skin gliding against his is something he’s always going to be in favor of.

Eventually they settle into place, Abby in front of him, belly to belly, his arm under her neck, holding her close, kissing her deep and slow. He slips in, both of them sighing at the feel of it, stretch and slick and tight and wet. They settle into a very slow stroke, barely moving, mostly enjoying the feel of stretch and squeeze. He’s petting Abby, lazy circles on her nipples as Jimmy’s behind her, kissing her back and neck, rubbing her butt, gently working a finger into her. And Breena’s behind him, all soft and warm, and kissing his neck and shoulders as her fingers ghost over his ass, teasing him, slipping closer and closer to where he wants them, but not quite there, yet. He tries pushing his butt at her a few times, but that doesn’t speed her up.

He turns to her, kissing her lips, sucking her tongue, and quietly says, “This feels good, but you can go faster if you want. I’m pretty relaxed, very turned on, and have done this before.”

Breena gives him a little nip on the shoulder. “What if I don’t want to go faster?”

Tim licks her lip, and Abby gives him a lovely squeeze. “Ungh…” he sighs at that, and turns back to kiss Abby before turning back to Breena. “I may get done before you’ve gotten to see how you like being on the laying side of the equation. Abby’s wrapped around my dick. Jimmy’s knuckles keep brushing my balls. And you and her are kissing me.”
Abby grins at both of them. “So, you’re saying this is testing your control?” And she gives him a quick thrust.

Breena slips a finger into him just as Abby says testing and Tim shivers all over, a soft little gasp slipping out of his mouth.

He doesn’t answer for a moment because he can’t. His brain just melted. Finally he finds it again, and groans. Then he nips Abby’s lip. “Next time I’m in charge, you aren’t getting off for an hour.”

“Oh NO!” she says, grinning. “Can we schedule that for next weekend?”

Ideas for Fornell’s wedding go flowing through him, along with all the physical sensations and he moans again. “Oh yeah!”

Breena starts slipping her finger in and out of Tim, and lays a sucking kiss where his ear and neck meet. “Gosh, I wouldn’t know anything about being teased out of my mind for hours, would I?”

Tim smiles at her, and Abby. “You saying this is…” a soft pant slips from between his teeth as she moves onto her second finger, “revenge?”

“Revenge is sweet, no?”

“I’m…” Abby groans, loud and low, as Jimmy slips into her, and Tim does, too. Abby’s body is slick and wet and tight and feels amazing, and he can feel Jimmy moving through her, which is a whole other sort of amazing. Like a soft wave of pressure sliding all along the underside of his dick. And right now, as Jimmy’s slipping Abby’s leg off of Tim’s hip and over his, the feeling wrapped around his dick is perfect. So tight and snug and wet and and rippling and hot and his dick literally cannot be happier than it is right now.

He can feel Breena jostling around a bit behind him, pulling the straps on the strap-on tight, getting it set. He hears the cap on the lube bottle clicking open, and feels her moving a bit, then the clicking sound again and…

“Oh God,” slips out of Tim once Breena slips into him. He swallows, hard, rocking back into Breena, which means he’s moving in Abby, too, and that feels exquisite.

Breena’s not quite in the right spot, so right now all he’s feeling is his body sliding between two points, deeper into Abby, less penetration from Breena, back towards Breena, less Abby. It’s all slick and slippery and he’s got the feeling of sliding into and being slid into all at once and that’s physically amazing, and mentally… trippy.

Usually with anal he’s giving or receiving, not both at the same time, and right now he’s very aware of the feeling of sex from both sides, at once. He’s almost outside of himself, trying to figure out how this feels.

“Good?” Breena asks him.

“Uhnf… Yeah… Uh….” It’s good, but she’s still not quite getting it. “It’s good. Aim toward my balls, that’ll be better.”

Breena shifts her stroke a bit, more forward, less up. Slow, tentative, she doesn’t want to just jab on in and pound him, which Tim appreciates. Linguistic choices aside, prostates, at least his, do not appreciate getting nailed in any sort of literal sense. Stroked, rubbed, and pressed are all good, pounded, not so much. (At least, not unless he’s right about to cum, and yes, this is amazing, but he’s not there, yet.) So, she eases in with more of a forward thrust than an up thrust, and that time she gets
She gives his prostate a little sliding nudge as Abby’s all wrapped around him in front, both of them sliding onto him at once. “Oh, fuck, God…” he’s already starting to pant his words.

“You like it?” Jimmy asks. Like usual, he’s not talking much, but he’s been happily working on turning Abby into a molten puddle of erotic goo, and making sure to watch everything, too.

Tim whimpers a little. Like? This is a million times past like. “Mhrnmn…” comes out of his mouth.

Prostate and oral was great. That was his all-out fantasy. He loves it with oral sex. It’s every sort of awesome ever with oral sex.

And it’s even better like this. Tim loves oral. It’s wonderful. It feels amazing. But pussy is better. No, he can’t tell you why, it just is.

And this, this slow easy glide, which is the only reason he didn’t get off in the first ten seconds, pussy gripping soft and wet and silky on the one side and full sparking cumming pulse on the other, and the feeling of fucking and getting fucked, and warm women and soft breasts and hair and skin all around him, and this is just… “Fuck, fuck, fuckfuckfuckfuck!”

Abby’s grinning at him between kisses, soft wet lips on his and then on Jimmy’s and, God, he can feel Jimmy moving through Abby, too. So soft, wet, friction, pressure and Breena behind him, every time she slips over his prostate he gets that little jolt-pulse and just… “Ohhhh…” shudders out of him in a soft, deep sigh.

He’s just feeling it, riding the wave of building pleasure, not moving very much, letting them move through him.

Feels huge. He knows the wave that’s building is a tsunami. Every bit of him that can feel physical pleasure is feeling it, and Breena’s stroking his hair, whispering in his ear how sexy he is and how much she likes doing this, how beautiful he is right now, falling apart as she’s stroking him into Abby. And Abby and Jimmy are necking, so he can see that. And all around him he’s hearing, smelling, feeling sex.

Everything that possibly can turn him on, is turning him on. But he’s still in control, still keeping pace with the other three when Jimmy hits the remote on the vibrator Breena’s wearing, and all of a sudden, the strap-on is buzzing, too.

Not a ton. But the vibrator is just under the harness on the strap-on, so he’s getting just a faint little buzz to go with everything else, and that, a gentle but firm, buzzing nudge to his prostate while Abby’s sucking his lip, and Jimmy’s fucking her fast and smooth, which means he’s also feeling Jimmy rubbing his dick fast and smooth through Abby… It makes Tim shudder all over. He just… can’t… too much all over at once, every single erogenous zone he has is in play, its favorite sort of play, and he groans, hard, as he starts to shake and twitch with the force of a tsunami-sized orgasm crashing through him.

Fortunately Abby knows what to do with this, because he’s well past giving out useful advice as he’s coming down.

“Pull out, Breena. Prostates get really sensitive post climax.”

When he gets his head back together, he’s feeling pretty sheepish. That was a hell of a lot faster than he would have liked. Felt awesome, but that was the sexual equivalent of a freight train. It wasn’t going to stop or slow down and all he could do was ride it.

Which was great for him. He’s all tingly and glowy and feeling awesome. But everyone else is not He’s (probably) a better lover after he gets off.

It’s easier to focus on the girls. He’s paying very close attention to what his lips and right hand are doing to Breena, and what his left hand is doing for Abby. He’s aware of all of the little grunts and gasps and purrs as he tries to melt both of their minds with immense pleasure.

And, while, on a pure technical level, he thinks he’s doing a better job than when he’s on the other side of his orgasm, he’s also thinking that, unless it’s a domination game, it’s a hell of a lot more fun to get there with them.

Though there is something to be said for being with it enough to get two women off at the same time. Twice. If he had a brag book, that’d go in it.

And if he was looking a bit cocky as he walked into work Sunday morning, donuts and lots of coffee in hand, he figures he earned it. (Though Jimmy would claim that Tim wasn’t exactly there all by himself, so he shouldn’t be taking all the credit, and just possibly ‘Zippy’ might not have covered himself in glory, and… They had a good time snarking about their respective ‘skills’ while getting the babies up and ready and letting their wives sleep in a bit.)
Bright and early, with donuts and coffee in his hands, Tim heads into the Dungeon. He’s in a damn good mood and ready to crack this case! Or at least get a lot more in the way of puzzle pieces.

He’s never met Patil or Arya in person, though they’ve talked via skype before.

What he does know is that they’re the two who are his best hardware people.

He’s good. He’s inventive and talented and good. They’re better. If Khan’s laptop had ended up with either of them, they would have gotten into it without killing it.

Which means Tim’s very happy to see them standing in front of the big screen TV, looking around at how much he’s changed things, ready to get to work.

Handshakes, greetings, passing out the donuts, and then rolling the computers out of his office and plopping them onto the conference table start the morning. (Patil’s only been in Okinawa for a year. Before that he was out of Boston, and wanted to know if they still made maple glazed bacon donuts. Apparently that’s something you can’t get in Japan. Tim was happy to grab a bunch of them, as well as several less exotic flavors. Snacks often seem to make this sort of work go better.)

Tim’s hand is resting on the top of the last computer he put up on the table. “We’ve got to get into them, find out what they were doing, what information they were pulling, and do it without damaging any possible physical evidence, because if there’s a way we can find out who was using these machines, we need to do it.”

“All right,” Patil’s munching away, looking pleased by the donut, and dubious as to why Tim would have called him in for that.

“One of them is completely dead,” Tim adds. Since they were all off when they were brought in, he’s not sure which one Brand killed.

“One?” Arya asks. (He’s looking less dubious than Patil, and also less jet lagged. Granted, he only had ten hours of travel, most of which were spent waiting in one airport or another. The run from Alameda to DC isn’t nearly as punishing as the trip from Japan.)

“Maybe more.” Tim explains Brand’s mini-EMP. Both of his Minons look impressed by that. “But they were off when I got them, so I don’t know which one got fried.”

“Lovely,” Arya says dryly, eyeing the computers. “You know anything about them?”

“I know I’ve got a mirrored version of the one Brand fried.”

“Any nasty little tricks on there?” Patil asks, pulling the case closest to him nearer.

Tim shakes his head. “I was too busy finding out what was on it. That’s what I’m going to be getting into while you guys make sure they don’t explode when we try to open them.”
Patil looks up from the case, now understanding why he’s here instead of back at home. “So, you think they may be literally booby-trapped?”

Tim nods. “I wouldn’t be shocked. I wouldn’t be shocked if they’re just sterile. I can see from the cases that they were built, not bought pre-assembled, so I want all of the data on them, and then I want my forensics people to go through every single wire and make sure that there’s not a drop of blood or a partial print, or anything in there that’ll tell us who built these.”

Patil and Arya stare at different cases, and then start to collect their tools. First job for something like this is scoping, carefully, the insides and seeing if there’s something lurking around in there that shouldn’t be.

Once they’re working, Tim gets onto his first job. As of this morning, his computer had yet to find anything to do with that random number generator.

Tim’s sure it’s not just there for kicks. Okay, it could be there for kicks. Could be a test of concept or something that’s been lurking in the code for eons. But… He’s not feeling it.

And now that he’s not home, now that he’s got the power of all of Cybercrime behind him, he’s going to break this. He gets his search running again. Something works with that bit of code, and he is going to find it.

Arya and Patil are scoping away, checking things out as Howard and Ngyn show up. He hands each one a set of thumb drives and gestures to the donuts and coffee. “Brunch is on me. If there’s something else you want, order it, and I’ll reimburse you.”

The ladies nod, and he spends a moment introducing them to Patil and Arya. Ngyn goes quiet and tries to hide in plain sight, and Howard gets chatting with them asking which branches they’re from and their CVs.

Once they’re all acting friendly(ish) Tim drags the ladies off and says, “So, we know, basically what’s on these. I’ve got intel suggesting that the other computers have information from places other than NCIS. Right now, we still don’t have how they’re accessing the door that’s built into the Federal Intranet, so I want that, and I want to find any little traps hiding in there that’ll kill us if we try to get into the other computers cold.”

Ngyn nods and Howard says, “So pull everything from the log in screen to their encryption keys to…”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Better to not trip the trap in the first place. Get me all of the access documentation you can find. I’ll go looking for traps.”

And with that, they’ve all got their jobs, and get to work.
On the upside, literally booby-trapped isn’t in the cards.

And, after two hours he’s got four coded traps marked. Ngyn’s got the key isolated. And Howard’s got the three levels of authentication necessary to get into the computer cracked.

So, it’s slightly before noon when they start trying to power up and get into the data on those computers.

That goes… fairly smoothly. On computer one and two, they get in and start downloading, smooth as silk. On three they trip something… and that something tries to blow the computer, but Arya and Patil and Ngyn are able to put a stop to that before the entire system’s trash.

Which means several more hours of combing through the data they have to try and see what they may have tripped.

His eyes hurt. His head hurts. And Tim knows that a big chunk of the problem is that he’s been coding all morning and is now staring at the micro-processors in the third computer, as Patil and Arya explain the tiny, little acid switch that is lurking in there and how, yeah, most of the computer is safe and will work, but whatever was on that little bit of silicon there is fucked.

Tim nods at them, and tells them to keep at it, and then pulls his phone and sends to Jimmy, Who’s your obstetrician?

Tim? Jimmy sends back. Tim knows who their OB is. He’s met her.

Tim stares at his phone for a moment, wondering what Jimmy’s unclear on. Then he sees it. Shit, autocorrect. Optician. Eyes are going buggy and my head hurts.

Get up, walk around, and do something other than stare at a screen for hours at a time. I’ll make an appointment for you.

Thanks.

He gets up, and decides now would be a fine time to go for a quick walk. Maybe get everyone some more snacks, and... sure, he’d just be listening in, won’t need his eyes for Diane’s job. He hits the contact button and waits.

“Anderson,” she’s sounding a little distracted as she answers.

“Hey, Peaches.”

“Chucky. You’re early. I’m just pulling into the parking garage.”

“Just making sure we’re on.”

“Why wouldn’t we be?”

He shrugs at that. “Give me a call when you’re in.”

“Not a problem.”
“Hey,” a thought hits Tim as he’s putting his phone down.

“What?”

“If you can, grab a computer that belongs to someone who’s in the office today.”

He’s not sure if she immediately sees where he’s going with that, but he doesn’t hear any question in her voice when she says, “If I can.”

His phone buzzes again as he’s heading toward Chen’s. Everyone thought some Chinese food would be good for grazing and refueling brains. “McGee.”

“Hey, Chucky. I’m in. Couldn’t get a computer that had someone at it, but I did get one.”

“Great. So, what are you seeing?” He sees a spot and starts pulling in.

“A ridiculously easy system. No hacking needed. Log in, put in a name, and hit search.”

“Yeah, that doesn’t sound like something you need my help for.” He waits for a second.

“Got it.”

“You do?” That’s almost anticlimactic it was so easy. Doesn’t sound like they’re hiding Lovvy particularly well if you can just look her up with an HR search.

“Like I said, easy.”

“So…”

“Lovvy’s officially on the list as a Strategic Analyst, level A-8.”

“Okay, what does that mean?”

“Means she’s doing something… what’s Abby’s word, hinkey?”

“Yeah. Why?” A-8 doesn’t mean anything to him. It’s not a job level at NCIS, but just because they don’t have it doesn’t mean no one else does.

Diane’s sounding testy. “No such thing as an A-8 ranking. Whatever A-8 is, that’s a clue.”

“Can you find the other A-8s?”

“Uh… Yeah… Here…” His phone buzzes in his hand. “I just sent you a screen shot of all of them. Okay, I’ve got to get out of here. This was just supposed to be me checking the terms of my contract in regards to separating without notice.”

“Thanks. We’ll see what we can find on the A-8s.”

“No problem.”

Tim glances at the shot after he turns off his car, nods briefly, only ten names. Whatever it is A-8s do, there aren’t a lot of them, and then he sends the shot over to Tony. Got more names for you to Tim’s eyeing the box of boxes of Chinese food in front of him, wondering if he can actually carry this (He went a bit overboard on getting snacks, but he feels like if he’s going to drag people in on their off day, let alone their off day two or four thousand miles away from home, that he’s going to make them feel well taken care of.) when his phone buzzes again.

Doesn’t exist how? I mean, we’re looking at a shot of them from IRS HR.

According to Diane A-8 isn’t an official IRS job level.

There’s another minute, while Tim gets the box balanced on his left forearm, with his right keeping it steady, and begins to head out to his car before his phone buzzes again. Once he’s in the car, food settled on the seat next to him, he pulls his phone out.

Are the other guys Diane’s criminals for the greater good?

Didn’t think to ask. But she didn’t say. Might have to talk directly to her.

Think she’s any good with a claw hammer? For a second that doesn’t make any sense to Tim, then he remembers what Jimmy had said about getting to the house and maybe doing some framing today.

You guys framing already?

Getting the drywall off the ceiling so we can get the wiring up right.

Okay, yeah, I remember. Uh... she was just at the IRS, probably not dressed to get messy, but sure, see if you can trade drywall removal for intel.

Gibbs is glaring at me. Apparently Diane and manual labor do not mix.

Tim’s staring at the phone, right now Gibbs and manual labor aren’t supposed to mix. Do you have him working? With drywall? What the hell made Jimmy think that was okay?

He’s not working, we’re still at the lumber yard, where Gibbs is inspecting each and every single piece of wood we’re going to put into the house, Tim can feel that Tony’s thinking Gibbs is on overkill right now, but he supposes that a piece of wood is a piece of wood to him and Tony, that they aren’t all the same to Gibbs, drywall removal is what we’re doing when we get done with this, and he’s going to be going with Penny and Ducky to see the architect then.

Now he’s glaring at his mental image of you being the mama hen.

His lungs’ll thank me. But, if he’s feeling like doing something useful while you get into those guys’ private lives, he can google them and see what their public personas are like. See if they know each other, if they know anyone else interesting. Might be a good time for him to get to know all about the fun that is social media.

Now he looks horrified. Tim can feel Tony giggling at that. How are things on your end?

Chugging along. Gotta get back at it.
Abby comes in a bit after two, with snacks for them, and kisses for him. (Which Tim appreciates. He’s been enjoying today. He likes doing this sort of work with people who are good at it, but he’s been missing doing it with her.)

“How’s it going?” she asks, looking at a long conference table littered with bits of snacks, and more bits of computers, with two guys, at the far end, both wearing versions of Tim’s magnifying glasses, poking around in another computer.

He wiggles his hand to indicate so-so.

“Any goodies for me?”

That gets a smile out of him. He knows she’s itching to get these into the lab and find that flake of skin or tiny smudge of a print or weird speck of pollen that’ll tell them where these computers came from and who put them together.

Tim looks over to Patil, who nods, and then he touches the computer at the end of the table. “This one’s completely dead. Brand’s pulse killed it beyond resurrection, which means there’s nothing in here for us. You can take it apart on the atomic level if you want to.”

Abby grins, lifting the computer, getting ready to take it back to the lab only to have Tim take it right back out of her arms.

She’s giving him her Tim? look.

His eyes drop to her belly.

She looks back at his arm and foot, just as pointedly, and then takes the computer back. “It weighs less than Molly, and I haven’t seen you pulling her out of my grasp.”

He rolls his eyes a bit. “Fine.”

She smiles brightly at him. “But, if you’d like to feel like the big, strong husband, you can open some doors for me. And there’s a spider in the lab that Zelaz doesn’t like you can rehome outside.”

He can feel Howard and Ngyn smirking behind his back.

He kisses Abby again, smiles wryly at her, pats her on the tush, and says, “Message received loud and clear. Let me know what you find?”

She smiles at him again. “As soon as I know, you’ll know.”

“Thank you.” As Abby steps away, with the computer, and before he turns around, Tim says, “Less smirking and more working,” to Ngyn and Howard.

“Yes, Boss,” Howard responds.

“Boss…” Ngyn says.

He steps over to where she’s sitting, at her own desk, looking over her shoulder.
“I know who this is, now.”

He nods at that, part of the problem of trying to figure out whose information they’ve got is that a lot of the internal data assumes that you know who you’re dealing with. He knows none of their internal forms have anything that says NCIS on them. After all, if you’re an NCIS employee, working for NCIS, with NCIS computers, in an NCIS office, you generally do not need to be told that you’re working with NCIS. Which means they’ve been looking for emails, because all of them have the same basic format, name@organization.gov. Then they’ve been trying to figure out which emails were being sent out, and which ones were being sent in.

“Who do you have?”

Ngyn touches the computer she’s combing through. “This one is Homeland.”

Tim nods at that. “Okay, who wants access to NCIS and Homeland Security…”

“Anyone interested in terrorism?” Arya says, looking up from attempting to disconnect the version of the trap they tripped on computer three from computer four.

“Maybe. Let’s see who else they’ve got.” He feels like there’s something there. Some sort of little niggly NCIS Homeland Security thing, and then it occurs to him.

He pulls out his phone and texts Leon. What’s Tom Morrow up to now?

He’s checking on the random number generator search when his phone buzzes. Nothing. Died last month. Why?

One of the computers we got had our intel on it. Next one we’ve cracked is Homeland’s. You know anyone you trust over there?

Not anymore.

Suspicious death?

No one thought so. He lived for the job, and then didn’t have the job anymore. Eighteen months later, he’s got a bad headache one day, takes a few aspirin, goes to lie down, and never gets back up again. Supposedly a stroke. Want me to see if I can get his medical records to Palmer?

If you can do it without freaking out his widow, yeah.

I’ll see what I can do.

Another thought hits him. You still at CGIS? Tim fires off to Manner.

Yeah, why?

Any of the computers pulling CGIS data local?

Not close enough.

What are you thinking? Surveillance?
That was the idea.

Borin’s beat you to it. She’s got her team heading up to keep a discreet eye on the place. From what I can tell they grab their info every morning at 9:05.

That makes Tim happy. Great. Answers.

That’s the hope.

Find any more?

Up to eleven now.

Tim sighs. Wonderful. Keep at it.

On it, Boss.

When it rains it pours. His computer is beeping at him, letting him know he’s got something that’s finally connected to the random number generator. Howard’s also chirping at him, and Patil’s trying to get eye contact.

The computer can wait. He gets up from his desk and heads into the main room.

“Howard?”

“This one’s NSA.”

Shit. He thinks but doesn’t say it. Okay, he can cross them off the potential suspect list for who’s running this. They wouldn’t be pulling their own data. “Good work. Patil?”

“This one’s safe to power on.”

“Great!” Tim’s really curious to see what might be hiding on that little bit of processor they fried on computer three. He glances at the clock, a bit after four. “Five o’clock, I want to know what was so important it had its very own kill switch.”

“On it, Boss,” Howard says, as Patil and Arya open the case to computer five.

He heads back to his own computer, kills the alarm, sends out a text to the entire group, letting them know that NSA is one of the groups being watched, and then gets into his search. He’s nodding as he reads. Social security numbers. He’s found a bit of code hiding in the HR scheduling system that checks those numbers against employee ID numbers. And, like every other Federal office, the employee ID is the person’s social security number. Nothing in there about what it does if the number matches, but now he knows what the next piece of code is. He feeds it in, and tells his computer to go looking for it.

Then he moves into a less direct, but hopefully more illuminating, search.

Time to break into the meta-data. “Ngyn?”

“Boss?”
“I’m gonna need more eyes for this, come on over.” She does, and he pulls another desk chair over to his computer. “We’re going to compile the metadata by date.”

She nods. “You’ll end up with a list of what changes happened when.”

“Yeah. Likely going to be a lot of patching and updates, but hiding in there’ll be what we want.”

Ngyn nods. “Let’s do it.”

At 5:00, Howard pokes her head in.

He looks up at her, hoping for more good news, and she shakes her head. “Haven’t been able to isolate it, yet. But I can tell you that’s the computer keeping eyes on the FBI.”

“Okay.” He glances at the clock. “One more hour, then we all break. Ten hours on is long enough.”

Ngyn looks up from the metadata in front of them, curious.

“No one’s dying over this, not today, so we take the time to do it right. I’d rather we all have fresh eyes and be able to see what we’re doing than spend six hours staring at the answer, unable to see it because we’re fried.”

He stands up and heads out to where Patil and Arya are still working on computer five. “How’s it going?”

Arya nods at him. “No acid traps. We’re almost ready to turn this one on.”

“Great. Get it up and running, help out with finding out whose data it is, and then you’re off. If you want military transport, you can kick around DC until I can get it for you, or if you want civilian transport, set it up, and we’ll reimburse you.”

Patil and Arya glance at each other, and then to Tim. “We’ll set it up on our own.”

Tim smiles at them, hoping they’d take that option. “Good. Thank you!”

“No problem, Boss,” Patil says.

At six o’clock, Howard, Patil, and Arya come in. They’re looking… off. Like they’ve found something, but it’s making the mess bigger rather than smaller.

“Last computer is Baltimore PD,” Howard says.

And now Tim and Ngyn have the same looks on their faces.

“Baltimore?” Tim asks.

“Yeah,” Patil nods his head.
He rubs his eyes. Wallbanger’s selling more than just a door into the Federal servers.

“And the extra-protected chip?”

“Still no idea. Nothing I’m doing is using it. I’ll keep looking.”

“Tomorrow… Or earlier, but I want you off for at least six before you get into it.” Tim looks at Ngyn. They’ve both been staring at metadata, looking for any interesting patterns. So far all they’ve learned is that the guys who made the Federal System are B or C level programmers. They’re constantly patching. If the Federal Intranet Servers were a road, they’d be that high traffic road that moseys along at ten miles an hour because it’s so rutted and full of potholes and construction that no one can even see the original road anymore.

Of course, depending on how many worms are lurking in it, that may have something to do with things constantly needing to be patched. Or, because it’s shit programming to begin with, and being patched every ten damn minutes, that’s all the cover Wallbanger or whoever needs to drop whatever worms he likes into it.

That makes sense to Tim, and fits with what Khan said to him about not needing to hack his door into the code.

But at this point, they’re only three months back in time, and haven’t found anything that isn’t a legitimate patch. Tim rubs his eyes again, wondering when Jimmy’s got him seeing the eye doc, and realizing that unless Jimmy’s optician is very customer service oriented, he doesn’t have Sunday hours, so there’s no appointment for him, yet.

“Come one, we’re done for now. Pack it up. Get rest. Look at something that isn’t a computer screen. It’ll still be waiting for us tomorrow.”

He saves his own work, on his machine and onto two thumb drives. One he hands to Ngyn, one he keeps for himself. “I’ve got interrogation first thing tomorrow, and with any luck it’ll take a while, but when I finally get down here, I’ll want reports.”

“Got it,” Howard says. Ngyn nods.

“Patil, Arya, it was great working with you.” He remembers how much that mattered to him when Gibbs told him he’d been a useful part of the team back when he was brand new. “And, don’t take this the wrong way, but I hope I don’t have to drag you across the country or globe anytime soon.”

Patil smiles at that and Arya chuckles.

“No offense back, but I’d prefer not to spend two days on a plane for one day of work anytime soon, either,” Patil says.

“None taken. Thanks.”

Tim can feel the annoyance pouring out of the lab before he even sets foot into it. The music is loud, angry, and he assumes that Abby’s on her own in there. She doesn’t play her music like that now that she’s got lab mates.
“Hey,” he says tentatively, hoping this is case annoyed as opposed to pregnant annoyed. Case annoyed he may be able to help with. Hormonal surges, he’s not so useful with.

“McGee!” Case annoyed, she never calls him that unless they’re talking work anymore.

He comes closer, and pulls her into a close hug. She allows herself to be hugged for a moment, but there’s a lot of jittery energy pouring off of her right now, and she doesn’t want to be still for too long.

“How bad is it?” he asks, pulling back as she turns, fast, back to the table where she’s been working.

“It’s…” She’s glaring at a million pieces of computer scattered all over the long metal table they work on. “It’s inhuman, McGee!”

He raises an eyebrow.

“It’s custom made. All of the parts are things you can get off of Tiger Direct or similar sources. But it’s clean. Clean room clean. There’re no prints. No hairs. No fibers. No blood. There’s barely any dust.”

“Dornie said there was dust all over the place the computers were in. That’s part of how they knew they’d been there for a long time.”

Abby looks at the case. “You see any dust on that?”

Tim sees a black case coated with pink print powder. “Uh… no.”

“There’s a filter on the intake fan. I’ve got Major Mass Spec on it, looking for anything to give us an idea of where this might have come from.”

“Or at least let us know how long the filter’s been in place.” He thinks for a second. “Filter’s not standard on any computer.”

“They knew they were going to be running it somewhere dusty. Didn’t want that getting on the inside.” She glares at the table again, and then turns to Tim and hugs him long and hard. “I’m sorry.”

He pets her back. “Why would you be sorry?”

“I didn’t find anything. I’m supposed to find something, and this, this is nothing! There’s not even a bit of snagged latex from a glove.”

He kisses her forehead.

“Five hours. Five hours with a set up like this and I should be able to tell you where the guy who built it lives, his blood type, how high his cholesterol is, and what he had for lunch yesterday.”

Major Mass Spec beeps then. Abby sighs slightly. “Let’s see how much more nothing we’ve got.” They both head to her computer, and Tim pulls over her stool. Her back’s not generally happy with too much standing right now. She gets settled, and he stands behind her, hands on her low back, holding her gently, as both of them stare at the report.

And then the smile starts to spread over her face.

“What?” He’s still trying to figure out what the hell he’s looking at. Pollens. He can see that, but they don’t mean anything to him.
“That computer went for trip. Look, pine, so it was hear in early spring, ragweed, so it’s here now, but no oak. None. It wasn’t here in April.”

Tim kisses her. He’s got no idea, at all, what that might mean, but it’s something.

“Is that useful?” she asks.

“Sooner or later it will be. Come on, let’s get some food and get home before Jimmy and Breena assume we’re here all night.”

Kelly’s already down when they get home, so they both creep upstairs to where she’s snoozing with her cousins, and all three little girls get gentle kisses and petting, before they head down again.

Tim shakes his head a bit once he’s in the kitchen with Jimmy and Breena, “I hate doing that.”

Jimmy nods at him, getting it. “Don’t like not seeing her all day.”

“Yeah.”

Abby pets his shoulder. “You got time with her in the morning.”

He shrugs a bit. “Better than nothing, but…”

Breena gives him a quick kiss, before herding him and Abby toward the table where she’s got the dinner they brought home waiting. “But you want to do the job, and you want to be home, and it doesn’t balance nicely, does it?”

He shakes his head a little. “Nope.” Then he looks at Jimmy and Abby as he sits down. “But at least our long days won’t match quite so much, now. At least one of us, usually, will get home.”

“Which is nice,” Breena says, and Tim wonders how many nights she’s done on her own. More than she probably would have liked. Not as many a Shannon Gibbs did.

He’s telling them about the job, about what he’s found, and Abby’s adding her own bits to it, but he’s not really paying too much attention to that. He’s thinking about how he’s here, at Jimmy and Breena’s place, eating dinner, talking with them about the case. And that’s not new, or odd, or anything. That’s his pattern, how he deals with cases.

But he’s remembering talking with Diane all those years ago, and how she was complaining about how neither Jethro nor Tobias would tell her about active cases. They were fine with talking about old ones, bragging on saving the day and solving the case, but the current ones, they’d go silent.

He can’t imagine that. He knows he’s had cases where he wasn’t supposed to say anything, but his whole life was wrapped in people who were in on those cases. He sees how Breena’s listening in, keeping track of details, seeing things they aren’t, thinking, and he knows that this isn’t new for her. Jimmy’s been talking about his job the whole way through.

Because so much of who they are is this job, and there’s just no shot of making it work if they keep that part silent. They can’t shove it away and not let it touch their home. It’d be like chopping off three quarters of his body before walking in the door.

Breena keeps watching them as Abby’s talking about the filter and the pollen, and then she says, “Did you find any pollens that aren’t from here?”
Abby thinks about that, and Tim tries to remember, but he can’t. No oak, he remembers that, but… And, for that matter, he’s not in tune enough with the local plants to know what’s local and what isn’t.

But Abby is. “No…” she’s starting to see what Breena’s already got. “No, everything was local to where they found the computer.” She starts to smile and looks at Tim. “How far back does your data go?”

He thinks for a second. “June. That’s as far back as we got off that computer.”

“June’s too late for pine,” Breena says. “We’re always cleaning the pollen off the benches outside the funeral home in the spring, but by May that’s done. I don’t think your computer moved. I think it turned off.”

“What were we doing this spring, and again later in the summer, but not in the mid-spring?” Jimmy asks.

“I don’t know. But I bet Tony’s going to find out.”

“Did we transfer someone to Baltimore…” Abby says.

“Maybe.” Tim smiles. “Or worked a case with them. Or… something. Once, I’ve got the data collected on all of those computers, I’m going to show Jethro what it is I actually do with datasets.”

“And once I’ve got all of those filters, we’ll know when those computers were spinning, and build a time frame,” Abby’s grinning.

Tim takes a sip of his cider. He can’t imagine keeping them out of this. They’re better, he’s better, with them.
Playing Catch Up

Tim gets in bright and early on Monday, ready to start kicking ass and taking names.

He strolls in, checks with Chuck, who’s at the front desk, wondering if Khan’s lawyer is here yet, but no, he’s not. Tim figures that makes sense, he’s not due, technically, for another twenty minutes.

Still, if he was early, Tim would have liked to grab some coffee with the man, get all the details on Khan’s deal with Wallbanger now that Mr. Chase has had the chance to really go through it.

Oh well.

To his office. Twenty minutes is enough time to get a quick sit rep from How… nope, she’s with Manner today. From Ngyn, and see if she’s gotten Brand into the hunt, and then check on his computer and see how the search for what happens to those social security numbers is going.

Then he’ll find Chase, they’ll meet up with Khan in interrogation, the two of them will dance, he’ll promise more goodies for the set up Khan will get, and then he’ll get all the goods on Wallbanger.

Tim’s smiling as he heads down to the basement.

He’s a bit surprised to see Howard, Ngyn, and Arya still down there, all hunched around one of the computers, talking quietly.

So, he heads over for the update. “I’m betting this is good.”

Howard and Arya are grinning. Ngyn’s expression is cryptic, she’s pleased with something, but like with the Baltimore part, it’s a bigger mess than it solves.

“Oh, it’s good all right,” Arya says. “I kept thinking about the switch, feeling like I was missing something. So, I’m in Dulles, getting ready to get on the plane and decide that I’ve got to check again. It’s two in the morning, and both of them are still working, so I grab the computer and get looking more carefully. See, the thing we knew is that this was directly attached into the power feed in a really odd sort of way.”

“Odd how?” Tim asks.

“The computers have a back-up power supply. The power goes down, they keep working, but this thing isn’t attached to that. It’s just all by its lonesome on the main power supply. And that got me thinking, why would it be on the main power supply, but not the back-up?”

Howard takes over. “So he asks us if we can think of anything that would be attached into the main power supply, but not the back-up, and we think, bounce ideas around, and finally as we’re crashing into the brick wall, Ngyn has the eureka moment…” She pauses, sees if Ngyn will speak for herself, but she just sits there quietly, so Howard finishes, ‘she decided it had to be some sort of monitoring piece, something to keep track of how the system turns on and off, so we get looking, and we find it…”

This time Ngyn speaks. “If you put the correct sequence in before shutting down, that little switch does nothing. If you don’t, the next time you turn the computer on, it sends a little SOS and then erases the code and kills the sender. That’s why it’s acid, if you didn’t have the case open, you’d never know it had sent or that it was equipped to do it.”
“And once it’s done, it just looks like a little bit of slag in the computer, a blob of solder or something,” Arya says.

Now all three of them are smiling. And Tim, seeing those smiles, is smiling, too. “That’s slick code hunting. You know where the SOS went, don’t you?”

“Back tracing it now, but we should know in…” Howard says as the searching computer beeps.

All four of them are waiting with baited breath, looking eagerly at where the little dot ended up, and then Tim says, quietly, “Damn it.”

There’s got to be something hiding in there that’s screwing the response. It back traced to them. Ngyn and Howard are already on it, searching for more hints in the code.

“Okay, that was good work, and I’m glad you know what that switch does.” They’re all looking pretty sad about the lack of payout on the eureka. “And even if we don’t find where it goes now, we know something else, three of these computers were important enough to the people using them to have those little switches, and two of them weren’t. So… what’s so important about Homeland, Baltimore, and NSA, but less important about NCIS and FBI?”

They’re nodding, and getting to it. Tim heads into his office and sits down. He turns on his computer, no joy on the search front, not yet. He rolls his eyes, but, without a mega system, like Amazon’s cloud in his hands, he can’t make this go any faster.

He checks his email, doing his usual morning scanning of subjects, seeing what’s on fire and what can be punted to later in the day. He’s quickly labeling them with now and later and delete when he sees something in the delete pile.

It’s a notice that the system will be down for an hour from 2:00AM to 3:00AM for an update. Shit! In less than twenty-four hours, everything they’ve found is going to vanish in a new version of the Federal Intranet Server.

He steps out of his office, “Ngyn,” he gestures to his office. She comes in. “Remember when I told you that one of these days you were going to have to lead a team?”

She’s not looking thrilled at this, but she nods.

“Today’s the day.” He points her to the email, and she sighs, understanding what it means. “I’ve got to talk to Khan, can’t push that off any later, grab whoever you want, whoever you need, as many of them as you like. Unless taking them off the case means someone’ll die, they’re yours. You’re going to lead the attack on the old system. By 2:00, I want everything off of it. All of its secrets need to be out in the open, and more importantly, I need to know how they knew it was time to push an update and take us back to square one.”

“On it, Boss. Manner’s team?”

“Pull ‘em off. Make sure they’re not facing an update, too, but pull them off. Anyone you want, get them on this.”

“Okay.”

Tim notices the rings around her eyes and remembers Arya’s comment about them working on it at 2:00. “How much sleep are you working on, right now?”
“Three hours.”

“This is why I tell you guys to take breaks. You get them together, you get them working, and then you and Howard get naps.”

Ngyn’s not happy about that, but she also knows she’s starting to feel fried. “At least four hours off.”

His phone buzzes; Khan’s lawyer is here. “Good. I’ve got to talk to Khan.”

“Go get him, Boss.”

He flashes off a quick salute and heads up to interrogation.

Tim’s sitting there, waiting, with Khan’s lawyer, Seth Chase. And waiting. And waiting. They’re pretty much just staring at each other. He’s told Tim everything he knows about Wallbanger (nothing), Khan’s deal with him, which appears to be legal, though Chase is worried about the fact that it was signed by a judge who wasn’t on the bench any longer. He’s not sure how that’ll effect things, but he did know that Khan’s parole hearing had been set for 2019 and now it was set for 2017, so it looked like the agreement was holding up.

Finally, when they’re at half an hour late, Tim calls the prison. After some ‘round about he gets the person who handles prison transfers.

“I’m Tim McGee, Director of Cybercrime for NCIS, and I’m waiting for Ajay Khan, he’s supposed to be here.”

“I’ll check the dispatch, sir.”

“Thank you.” He spends a moment listening to muzak, tapping his fingers, as the lawyer looks nervous. Tim’s eyes narrow slightly at that. What are you hiding? “Mr. Chase?”

“Ever feel like someone just walked over your grave?”

Tim shakes his head. “But I know a few people who have.”

“Something’s wrong about this.”

“Director McGee?” Tim already knows this is trouble, that’s not the same voice he was talking to before.

“Yes, this is Tim McGee. Who is this?”

“Adam Prynne, I run all transfers into and out of FCI Cumberland.”

Not only is it a different voice, it’s a nervous voice. “And you’re about to tell me something I don’t want to hear.”

“Yes, sir. According to our logs, Khan was transferred into your custody yesterday. I’m assuming you do not, in fact, have him.”

Tim’s whole face clenches in anger. “No, I do not have him.”

“Ah.” That’s the sound of a man who’s pissed, and scared, and hoping a minimum of the shit will stick to him. “I’m looking at a piece of paper with your name on it, accepting personal custody of Khan, yesterday.”

Tim nods, teeth gritted. “And were you on shift yesterday?”

“Yes, but not when Khan was transferred. We have the transfer documents. They’re…” His voice trips on that, Tim knows that something’s wrong, but not what, about what’s coming next. “All in order. Someone, claiming to be you, showed up and took custody of Khan.”

Tim nods again, and Chase is staring at him, alarmed. “I want everything, including the video of who picked Khan up.”

“Uh… I’d be okay with giving that to you, but… the last guy claiming to be you had ID and everything. Can you prove that you’re you?”

Tim’s about to crack a tooth he’s clenching his jaw so hard. “I will be in front of you, in person, with my ID in less than an hour. At which point, you will hand over everything that goes with Khan being transferred, and whoever processed him better be sitting in a chair waiting for me to chat with him.” His voice has gone very quiet as he says that, and he must be looking pretty scary because Chase, who none of this is directed at, is moving away from him. He shuts off his phone, explains, quickly, as he’s walking (fast) to his car.

Chase nods a few times, and says, “It’s a kidnapping, not a prison break. Khan had nothing to do with this.”

Tim rolls his eyes, of course Chase has Khan’s back on this. But, push come to shove, he thinks it’s likely that Chase is right about this. Tim nods. “We’ll see where and how we find him, but, yes, from everything we’ve run on this case, I very much doubt that Khan planned this.”

“Good. He’s been cooperative the whole time…”

“Cut it, Chase, I’m part of the team that caught him in the first place. I know exactly what we had to do to get him to cooperate. We’ll find him. We’ll find out what’s happened. If we’re lucky, he’s still alive.”

“Director McGee?”

“He was my only link to Wallbanger. If we’re lucky, Wallbanger got him out of jail and paid him to vanish. If not, he’s going to vanish in a much more permanent way. Now, I need you to get out of my way so I can go find him.”

Chase swallows hard and nods. “Let me know…”

“As soon as we find him, I will.” Tim punches the button for the elevator. Time to get in the car.

He gets Tony on his phone as he’s pulling out of the parking lot. “Khan’s in the wind. I need you to get a BOLO for him.”

“McGee?”

“Someone, using my name and credentials, got him out of prison yesterday.”

“I’m on it.”

“Thanks.”
He’s been on the road for half an hour when he gets a call from Tony. “I’ve got the BOLO out.”
“Good.”
“And I’ve got more crap you don’t want to hear.”
Tim’s eyes narrow. “Lay it on me.”
“You know how Diane gave Fornell and I each half of the accounts that went with who was getting paid?”
“Yeah, tracking them down is one of your jobs.”
“On Sunday, I had Draga and Bishop running the accounts. So far, three quarters of them are prisoners, and the other quarter look like they’re family or friends of prisoners. I haven’t checked in with Fornell, but I doubt he’s finding out anything else.”
“Great.” Tim’s not surprised at that, at all. As big as this looks, Wallbanger would have needed a lot of talent, and where better to find it, dirt cheap, than sitting in prison.
“It gets better. When you called, I played the hunch, grabbed five of the prisoners at random, and got them checking. Everyone we’ve looked into has been transferred in the last three days.”
“SHIT! He’s cleaning them up. Anyone who can identify him is gone.”
“Looks like it. Where are you?”
“Heading to FCI Cumberland. Going to have a chat with Mr. Prynne, the guy who runs the transfer department.”
“Keep me in the loop. We’re gonna run the rest of them down, and I’m going to get Fornell up to date, and then we’re also going to talk with several prisons. This stinks.”
There’s a quiet moment while they both just glare at the universe in general and Wallbanger in particular.
“How’s he ahead of us on this?” Tony finally asks. “How did he know to clean up his organization right now?”
Tim thinks about it, and then he sees it. “Diane. We didn’t tell her about the worm until after she got those account numbers. I bet she used the Federal Bank Account Database to get Khan’s information, and his account is flagged, and they’re cleaning up anyone who got paid in a batch with him.”
“Probably. God…” Tony sounds so frustrated, and Tim’s feeling it. “How do we do this when every tool we use is bugged? I mean… Shit! We put out a BOLO! What do you bet that’s flagged and tagged, too?”
Tim winces again. “I’m working on it. When I get back, IT and I are going to have a chat about updating our servers and how it’s not going to happen.”
Everything about FCI Cumberland is slow. Federal Prisons aren’t generally speedy places, but right now everything is being checked and double checked and triple checked. Tim’s not sure if he’s getting to jump through extra hoops to make it look like they’re really on the ball and it’s just some quirk of fate they lost a prisoner, or, with the cow lost, they’re making sure the barn is locked up tight.

Either way, it’s not impressing him favorably.

But finally, he’s inside, and sitting in front of Adam Prynne. He’s tall, fidgety, maybe because he’s neck deep in shit right now, or maybe he’s a nervous kind of guy in general. Either way, he keeps flicking the corner of Khan’s paperwork with his index finger over and over.

Tim gets the paperwork away from him, and gives it a quick one over. Part of it looks fine. The court order putting Khan into NCIS protective custody is letter perfect. The forms that get filled out at the prison, are, to put it mildly, not. There are a lot of empty blanks, and the scanned image of the ID in question is terrible. Grainy, smeared, black and white. He can’t make out the picture, let alone read the name on the image of the ID.

And there’s one other glaring omission from this situation. “I do not see the man who gave Khan up,” Tim says, very quietly, putting the paperwork back down.

“Uh, no, Sir.” Prynne is looking at Tim, who isn’t exactly a ball of cute cuddly kindness right now, and everything about him is responding to Tim with borderline pants-wetting terror. “Justin’s not on today, and he’s not answering his phone.”

“Uh huh.” Tim grabs his phone and gets Howard on the line. “I need you to ping a phone number for me, and I need you to get Draga and Bishop to that location and grabbing the person holding that phone.”

“No problem, Boss. Give me the number.”

Tim looks up at Prynne. “Justin Matt, two t’s,” then he rattles off the digits. Tim repeats them.

“Okay, I’ve got them… Uh… No luck. Phone’s off.”

“Of course it is. Ping it every hour and have Bishop get a… No. Have Bishop go out and check Justin Matt’s home.”

“Got it.”

Tim hangs up, and watches Prynne, eyes hard and cold, saying nothing for a long minute, silence stretching between them painfully. Finally Tim says, “Tell me about Matt.”

Prynne tries to smile but he just bares his teeth. “I… I don’t really know him. We’ve never worked the same shift. I wave hi to him when I’m coming on and he’s going off.”

Tim eyes Prynne, wondering if he’s in on this. Prynne reads it off his gaze and flinches. He starts babbling about how he’s been here for twenty years and he’s never lost a prisoner. Tim keeps watching him, eyes very cold, not hushing him, offering no comfort, letting all the scared pour out of him.
By the end of it, he’s fairly sure that Prynne really is horrified to have lost someone from his watch. Tim nods slightly and then says, “Video.”

A few things are very clear from watching said video. The man who picked Khan, and apparently two others, up is not him. In that he’s short and round, he bears no resemblance to Tim at all. It’s also clear that he knows where the cameras are. There’s not a single clear or even half shot of his face. The best they get is a second of quarter profile.

One other thing is very clear, Khan knows this man isn’t Tim, and he’s not comfortable about going with him. Khan sees him, pulls up short, the man nods at him, gesturing toward the door, and the two other men with them, and then Khan turns to face the camera, mouths… something… the video quality isn’t good enough for Tim to make it out, but he’s sure Abby will clean it up for him, and then Khan follows Not McGee and the two others out.

“Who are they?” Tim asks Prynne, who’s looking sick. He gets the sense that Prynne hasn’t seen this yet, and is just realizing that he’s got two more missing prisoners.

“Heath Lenter and Sam Jentyl. And before you ask, yes, I’ll get their paperwork.”

“Why are they here?” Sam sounds vaguely familiar to Tim, but he knows he’s not anyone he’s met through NCIS.

“Heath is a money launderer, and Sam’s here for the same reason Khan is. Good with a computer.”

“Not good enough,” Tim replies. “Let me see the paperwork.”

Prynne’s back with it five minutes later, handing it over. Tim does a good job at rolling his eyes. Wallbanger walked in here, provided paperwork for three men, with three different IDs, and Justin Matt just rolled with it. He calls Bishop before he’s done looking over the paper work.

“Bishop.”

“Charges?” Bishop asks.

“We’ll start with kidnapping and sort it out after you’ve got him.”

“I’m on it.”

“Good. You on your own?”

“Tony’s with me.”

“Eyes open. I don’t know what you’re going to walk into when you get to this guy’s place.”

“Got it. I’ll call when we have him.”

“Okay.”
Tim sends Abby the video from the prison, along with instructions to find out whoever the hell that is, along with the fact that right now he doesn’t care if that image is flagged and he sets off every red flag that’s ever waved.

They are getting a name, and an address, and all the rest of it on this guy.

“Any other video?” Tim asks.

“Just this,” Prynne says. It’s video of them leaving, and like with the video from the inside, there’s no clear shots.

“When I drove up, I had to scan my driver’s license.”

“Yes, and the station took a snapshot of your license plate.” Tim stares at Prynne, who hops up, saying, nervously, “Getting it.”

He sends that over to Draga, adding to the pile of crap he’s got to deal with, before really looking at the picture on the fake driver’s license. It’s not Mark Sheppard, but beyond that, he can’t really tell. It looks like someone took a picture, printed it out on an old black and white inkjet printer, smeared it, and then stuffed it into a driver’s license.

No human being seeing this would be okay with it.

But the scanner at the gate just snaps a picture and reads the chip, making sure it’s a legal driver’s license.

Tim sighs, there’s something. If it’s a fake, it’s a good fake. More likely, it’s a real license, but modified. He supposes it’s possible the picture on it really was melted and smeared. He pulls out his own license. Standard VA Driver’s License, all plastic, picture printed opaque on one side and translucent on the other. He checks his next to the image, and decides that, yeah, if you were to heat up a license hot enough, you probably could mess with the plastic enough to get that effect.

He sends the license information to Abby, too, asking her to run them.

He gets a text back from her as he’s sitting down in his car, ready to head back. Looks like you’ve had a busy morning.

Wallbanger’s cleaning up shop. Khan and two others just walked out of prison yesterday.

Ohhh… That sucks. I do have something to help perk you up though.

Please. I need all the perking I can get.

: ) Borrow a quiet corner of the Morgue and get some “perking” in with lunch?

He smiles a bit at that. : ) I REALLY wish. Working through lunch, and probably dinner.
Okay, I’ll quit flirting and give you the goods. Khan turns to the camera and says, ‘Watch the code.’

Tim feels two pieces slipping together, and looks up at the roof of his car, offering thanks to whatever’s watching.

That means something to you?

Yeah. Means that Khan’s afraid. He knows he’s alive as long as he’s valuable, and he’s only valuable when he’s coding. He’s going to lead me to Wallbanger, and save his own life doing it.

How?

Intranet Server Update tomorrow morning.

He can feel Abby get it.

Okay. I’m on the license.

Thanks. Back in an hour or so. Need to go talk to IT and figure out how they knew it was update time.

“McGee!” Kevin looks really pleased to see Tim. Tim’s happy to see him, too. Good to work with someone he’s on good terms with for this. Though, he’ll admit, he’d forgotten that Kevin got booted up to head of IT two years ago. “What are you doing up here? Don’t you have a thirty part conspiracy or something to chase down?”

“Believe it or not, this is part of it.”

“Okay,” Kevin’s got a lot of not on his face right now. “What can I do?”

“The update. I need it, but I need you to keep us on the old system.”

Kevin’s staring at him like he’s asked for the impossible. “Out of my hands, Tim, it does it automatically. I can’t keep us on the old one. As for getting the new one, you and everyone else’ll have it come 3:00 AM.”

“Fuck.”

“Tim?” Kevin looks appalled. That’s much rougher language than the situation, according to him, warrants.

“It’s part of that thirty part conspiracy.”

“The intranet?” Now Kevin look astounded, like he can’t possibly believe that could be part of it.

Tim nods. “Long story. How do updates happen? Are we on a schedule or…”

Kevin shrugs a bit. “They happen when they happen. I get the heads up from the developer, and then I shoot you guys the ‘system will be down’ email.”
“And, let me guess, the only way to stop it is to take us entirely off line.”

“Yeah.” Kevin nods, sadly. “Kill our communications, destroy our ability to figure out what’s going on, and as soon as we’re online again, it’ll go through.”

“And we can’t revert back to the previous version, can we?”

He shrugs at that, too. “It might be possible, but I don’t have the power to do it. I know they’ve rolled back broken updates in the past before, but they do that at the developer, not here. It’s not Microsoft; you can’t go into the system and uninstall updates. Part of why it takes an hour is every time we get a new system, they wipe the old one.”

Tim sighs, and nods. “Who’s the developer?”

“Dynamic Infrastructure Services. I’ve got contact information for our case worker. You want it?”

“I want everything you’ve got on them.”

Kevin’s beaming up at him, looking really happy to be useful. “No problem, McGee. It’ll be in your inbox before you get back to your desk.”

When Ngyn takes care of a problem, she takes care of it. There are 100 techs worldwide working on dissecting the Federal Intranet Server now. Which is great, except for the fact that come 3:00 he’s going to want them all combing through the new version, finding Khan.

But if he pulls them off the old version, he’ll never find out all the secrets buried in there.

Ngyn’s sacked out on a sofa. Howard’s napping on one of the bean bag chairs. Good, they’re getting some rest.

He checks his watch 12:02. He’s got a bit under fifteen hours…

Tim sits down at his computer and sends out the modified call. Anyone on Ngyn’s team within four hours of quitting time (about half of them) are off, resting for the next ten hours. The other half are going to be off in four hours. Whatever they can’t find in the next four hours is lost.

What comes next matters more. At 03:00 he’s going to have 100 sets of fresh eyes, ready to burn through the code, find Khan, and with any luck, Wallbanger and his whole operation, too.

He glances at the contact information Kevin gave him. Something’s… niggling at him. Some little off detail.

After a second it hits, the alarm bounced back to NCSI. What if that’s real, not just another layer of defense in the system?

He hops up and heads into the work area.

“Back to NCIS… The trail led back to NCIS. You guys got anything on that, at all?”

Five heads have turned toward him, and Brand is very clearly giving him an and exactly how many things do you want us doing at once? look.
He nods and backs off, heading to his own computer and examining the lead back to NCIS. What if it’s not a mirror in the code…

He gets his phone and calls Fornell. “Hey. What did your guys do with the worm in the intranet?”

“McGee?” Fornell sounds testy, but that’s how he pretty much always sounds on the job. Unless he’s being dryly amused, but best Tim can tell, only Gibbs and Vance get to see dryly amused at work.

“Yes. I’m running here and need a quick sit rep.”

“I’ll check. Hold on.”

Tim holds, and a minute later Fornell is back. “They used the information you gave them and killed it. Took out the alarm, too, so it wouldn’t kill the system.”

“All right. What am I looking for that’s so important you’re pulling me away from three dead prisoners?”

That stops Tim short. “Wait, dead?”

“Dead, McGee. Three of the ones on my list have been ‘transferred’ into nowhere and three are dead. All of ‘cardiac arrest’ all in the last two days.”

“Shit, he’s cleaning up. He’s really cleaning up. Who’s dead?”

“All prison officials who had ended up on the inside for taking bribes.”

“Same prison?”

“Nope. We’re working it.”

“And the missing ones?”

“Two drug traffickers and one money launderer.”

“I don’t suppose the rest of your group is accounted for?”

Fornell barks a fast, humorless laugh.

Tim gets him up with his side of it. “He’s pulled Khan, another launderer and another tech guy out, too. According to Tony, he’s gotten more, as well. They’re not all local, are they?”

“No, from the time stamps, he’s started in California on Thursday afternoon and has been moving east. He’s got his own plane, only way he can be doing it that fast. We’re hunting for it.”

Tim nods at that. “Better than the timestamps telling us it’s ten or twenty guys pulling them out.”

“Email’s up, what do you want me to check?”

“Are you guys getting a system update tomorrow morning?”

Fornell pauses, and Tim can feel the wave of pissed off aimed at him. “McGee, what the HELL? A system update? I’ve got dead men, missing prisoners, dangerous people walking free and you want to know about a system update? You are wasting my TIME!"

“No, I’m not. He’s watching everything we do through our electronic systems. Once that update goes through, all the worms come back. If you’re getting an update, your ability to use your own system without tipping him off has a clock running down on it. And if you aren’t getting an update, my team, all 100 plus of them worldwide, are heading to your offices to work on your computers.”

That mollifies Fornell. “Okay. Ummm… No. I didn’t get an update message.”

“Thanks. Tony realized he may be watching the BOLO lists. And, right now, I know exactly one judge who will issue a warrant without putting it in the electronic system. You want his name?”

“I’ve got my own who’ll do that.”

“Good, use him. Assume that if you’ve got to use a computer for it, he’s watching. We’re thinking he knew it was time to clean up his operation because he was watching the Federal Bank Account Database, and as soon as someone investigated one of his pets, Khan in this case, he knew it was time to run.”

“Shit.” Fornell says it softly. “Diane tipped him when she went looking for who was paying Khan.”

“Yeah. So he’s had three and a half almost four full days to work ahead of us.”

“Lovely.” Tim can feel Fornell about to start growling. “You got any good news?”

“Last I heard, Abbi had people in place to grab one of the computer dens, hopefully with the users, up in Boston.”

“I’ll take that.”

“Did your guys do any back tracing on the worm?” Tim asks.

“Would you like to talk to them?” Fornell doesn’t actually know what they’ve done, and he wants to be on his job, not playing pass the message around between McGee and Tech.

“Yes, but not right now. One of the computers we grabbed was for your system. I doubt it was the only one.”

“Wonderful. Send it to us?”

“As soon as we’re done with it, I’ll get you it, and all the reports on it.”

“Good? Anything else?”

“Not right now.” And Tim hears a dial tone.

His next call is to Abbi. Since all of his team is back in his office right now, he can’t just ask Manner what’s going on.

“Hey, Abbi.”
“McGee, you’re not sounding happy.”

“No. I’m not. Got a quick question, did you get an email saying there was going to be an update to your server tomorrow morning?”

“I’ll check.” And like with Fornell a minute goes by without any words. “No.”

“Good.”

“Should I ask?”

“Not sure I’ve got the time to burn to explain it all. I hope this is a major clue.”

“All right.”

“Good luck in Boston.”

“Thanks, Omagi’s got this. I’ll give you a call as soon as we’ve got them.”

“Great!” Thank God that someone has a lead on this.

Fornell says FBI’s killed the worm. CGIS kept it running to trace it. Neither of them have gotten the update email. The tracker led back to NCIS…

One more piece of data.

He’s on his phone again. “Hey, Kev.”

“Yeah, Tim…”

“Updates, are they across the whole Federal system, or just one agency at a time?”

He can feel Kevin shrugging at that. “Supposed to be the whole system. Why?”

“We’re the only one getting an update.”

“Huh? I checked with my friend at Dynamics, and supposedly they’re pushing a new security update. Everyone should be getting it.”

Tim feels cold. “You have a friend at Dynamics?”

“Yeah, we talk all the time, why?”

“What do you talk about, Kevin?” Tim’s voice drops, and he’s standing up, heading toward IT.

Kevin’s sounding worried. “I don’t know. All sorts of stuff, work stuff, baseball, improv. We just talk.”

“I’ll be at your desk in two minutes. Don’t move!”
Kevin’s not pale by nature. His complexion is fairly dark in most circumstances, but as Tim is leaning over his desk, waves of threat radiating off of him, he’s gone awfully white. He’s almost as pale as Tim is.

“McGee, you’re scaring me.”

Tim’s eyes are hard as he’s looking directly at Kevin. “Good.”

“What is going on?”

“I want you to tell me everything about what is going on with Dynamics.”

Kevin’s looking at Tim like he’s insane, and behind that Tim can see Kevin’s nervous. “They make our server. The guy who handles our account is friendly. Clem. I gave you his contact information. When I became head of IT he came to introduce himself, we hit it off, and…”

“And…” Tim know’s Kevin’s hiding something. He leans in even further, his face inches from Kevin’s. “And what, Kevin?”

Kevin licks his lips. “He offered me a deal. You know the code. They’re low bid contractors and they… well, they suck at their jobs. The damn code breaks all the time. So,” Kevin sighs, “a lot of agencies modify it some. Make it work better. And…” he licks his lips looking really uncomfortable, “he offered me a few thousand dollars to show him every patch we make. So, I wrote some code, anytime someone here modifies the code, it passes on to him, and a day later there’s another three grand in my bank account.”

Tim, and he’s proud of this, does not pick Kevin up by his throat, nor does he growl at Kevin. Kevin, apparently, understands the look on Tim’s face, because he shrinks back even further in his chair. He’s looking like he’d like to be behind the chair, with it between him and Tim right now.

Tim swallows, hard. Then he says, voice quiet, gentle, coaxing, “And, just possibly, did you get a little note about some monitoring software in our code not working, say yesterday, and then pass that message onto him?”

Kevin winces. “Uh… not our software. But, yeah.”

Tim nods. “Not our software… Uh huh, and who’s software suddenly stopped working?”

“I don’t know. It’s part of the Federal System, I know that, but… Look, his guys don’t know what they’re doing, a lot of tech guys don’t. They do their Microsoft training, get certified, and show up on time often enough to get promoted. So, when he finds an IT head who knows what he’s doing, he’s hires them. He’s got IT managers at a few different offices helping him out.”

“Uh huh.” Tim can feel his heart racing. “Who else?”

“I… I… don’t know all of them. But, me. Ted Cox over at NASA, Jeffery Robinson at IAEA, Kaitlyn Rose at ICE. We’re the ones out of DC. We all get together for lunch every other month or so, talk about what’s working in the system, what’s not, what could be better. We’re… we’re field testers for Dynamics.” Kevin tries to smile a little, but it comes off scared and sick. “But you’re going to tell me we aren’t, aren’t you?”

Tim’s eyes are a bit wild as he says, “Oh, you’re field testers all right. And spies. And leaks. And….” He’s visibly not cursing Kevin out. “As of right now, you are on suspension. Get up, get away from that computer, and come with me.”

“Wait, can you even…”

“Director McGee. I can fire you if I want to, and I probably will. Your contract is just like mine; you are not allowed to be moonlighting with other firms. Not without express permission from Vance. Do you have express permission to be ‘field testing?’”

“Uh…” Kevin looks ready to cry. “No. I… He wouldn’t go for it. I knew. If I got permission, I’d have to do it for free, and… My uncle is sick. I’m paying his medical bills, and…”

“And I don’t want to hear it.” Tim grabs Kevin by the hand, and yanks him up from his desk, taking him up to Abby’s lab are. “Plasma,” he barks out.

“Kevin?” Abby asks.

“Guess who’s been ‘field testing’ and ‘consulting’ for Dynamics?”

“Oh, Kevin,” Abby looks disappointed and Kevin cringes. She pulls the quarter profile shot of ‘Harvey Wallbanger’ up. “Is this your contact?”

“Uh, yeah. That’s Clem Rogers. I have all of his contact information.”

Tim turns to Kevin. “You talked to him today.”

“Uh, yeah. Just a bit ago.”

He points to Abby, who is getting ready to start pinging, as Kevin gives her the number. She looks up and shakes her head. “Gone.”

“Of course it’s gone. Because he’s busy breaking criminals out of prison and killing people. And he’s doing that because you’re the guy who let him know that we figured out how he was watching us.”

“Watching us?” Kevin sits down, hard, on the stool Abby usually uses.

“Did you actually bother to check any of the code you sent him?” Tim asks.

“Uh. No. I automated it. It’d just give me a heads up that it happened, and then I’d get paid.”

“One of the changes I made that you sent him, was rooting out a door that opened up the entire Federal Intranet Server to anyone who had a key. That little note about someone’s software not working… That was a heads up that we’d shut some of the computers that were pulling information out of the servers of Homeland, the NSA, the FBI, us and Baltimore PD down. You’re the one who told him how we were tracking him, and I can promise you that new version of the Intranet has everything we pulled off of it, right back in there, hiding somewhere new.”

Kevin looks sick.

Tim shoves a pad of paper into his hands. “I want everything you know about Clem. Everywhere you’ve ever been with him. And I want everything on all of your other ‘field testers.’ And I want it YESTERDAY.”

Then he takes Abby by the hand and pulls her into the computer annex. Once he’s in there, he starts quietly cursing up a storm. She takes a moment to gently rub his back, and then sets up the facial ID scanner again, this time popping the quarter image up against the Dynamic Infrastructure Systems employee database.

By the time he’s winding down, she’s done the search.

She doesn’t need to shake her head. He doesn’t hear the telltale beep of success.

“He’s not on staff,” she says.

“At least, he’s not in the database.”

“God.” Tim’s rubbing his eyes. “He’s got to be associated with them somehow.”

Abby thinks about it, rubbing his back again. “Umm… If they’re like us, cafeteria and janitorial are hired out.”

He nods. “Okay, right. Or he’s hacked the damn thing from the outside.”

“Start with Janitorial. Easier to check up on.”

“Yeah. Okay. What the hell do I do with him?” he nods toward Kevin.

“He’s fired, that’s for sure. Arrested?”

“I’m not sure if what he did was illegal. Companies ask for feedback from users all the time. I’ve got to get him somewhere safe.”

“Tim?”

His mouth opens, and then he remembers that he hasn’t given Abby the full update on what Wallbanger’s been doing with his crew. “According to Fornell, three of Wallbanger’s crew just mysteriously died of ‘cardiac arrest.’ It looks like he’s kidnapped a bunch more. I’ve got to get word out to the rest of the field testers, too. Get them scooped up into protective custody.” He grabs his phone again. “Dorney, you on a murder?”

“No.”

“Kidnapping?”

“Car theft.”

“Great, it can wait. Here’s what I need you to do.”

A minute later, Dorney’s in the lab, taking Kevin in hand. As he’s about to leave, Tim says, “Dorney, no reports on this. Nothing goes on our system, nothing gets written down. You do everything in person, and if you don’t know who the person is, you don’t say anything. On this one, you’re reporting to Tony, Vance, or me, and no one else, got it?”

Dorney nods. “Got it. We’ll round them up, get them secure, and then get them writing everything down.”

“Good. On paper. I’ll give you a phone you can get pictures with, and that’s the way you’ll get information to me.”

“Okay.”

“If someone shows up with a court order, even if it’s signed by the Supreme Court, don’t follow it.
Unless it’s me, Vance, or Tony, you keep custody of these guys.”

“Okay, got it.” Both Dorney and Kevin are looking disturbed by this.

Tim heads back down to his office. “Sit rep.”

His Minions, who are tech guys and not cops or ex-military, all stare at him, wondering what he wants.

“Situation report.” The light flashes on and they skitter forward. Brand setting up the plasma so the worldwide team can report in, too.

Sit rep takes close to an hour. On the upside, he now knows exactly how the random number generator works and what it was doing. And he also has the satisfaction of knowing that the account it was paying into is frozen colder than Antarctica in July.

He knows about the worm, the trap, the other worm, the backup worm, the backup trap, and the employee data breach that was collecting all of their personal information and giving it to God alone knew who. (It’s occurring to him that China probably just bought access to the hack, and didn’t bother to hack their own way in.)

The downside is he’s halfway through that when he gets the call from Tony. “We’re back.”

“Excellent! Is Matt in interrogation?”

“Jimmy’s got him.”

“FUCK!”

Tim wonders what it says about him that he finds the smell of autopsy calming.

Probably that he’s been in this business too damn long.

Of course, he also finds the smell of the lab calming, so it probably means that the mix of disinfectant, dead people, and too much air conditioning, has been linked in his mind to Jimmy, and he finds Jimmy calming.

He hopes that’s what it is. But he heads in there, and sees Jimmy and Tony standing next to a table with a body on it, and he’s feeling himself get angry. That little burst of calm from the first whiff of the place doesn’t last long.

Matt’s laying there, dead, very, very dead. A perfect circle of a small caliber bullet hole in the middle of his forehead. Tim’s glad he can’t see the back of his head.

“I take it you’ve got cause of death?” Tim asks.
Jimmy nods. “I suppose there could be a surprise hiding in there, and Dr. Allan and I will check, but…”

Tony takes over. “When we got there the Local LEOs were already on the scene. Neighbors saw a delivery van pull up. Few minutes later it pulls away. A bit after that, maybe a half hour or so, they notice the front door is still open and head over, thinking Matt forgot to shut it. They find him lying in the doorway.”

“Anything?” Tim asks.

“According to the neighbor, ‘It looked like a Fed Ex van, but it wasn’t,’” Tony says.

“So, you’re looking for a… white van with a blue and red logo?” Tim asks.

“Yeah. I pulled Ziva back from Abbi. She’s still running traffic cameras looking for the van.”

“Have you talked to Fornell?”

“Not since this morning, why?”

“He’s been hunting down his half of the account numbers, and three of them are dead.”

Tony’s looking pissed, now, too. “My next step is going up to visit Draga and see what he’s up to with that.”

“Fornell says that Clem—“

“Clem?”

Tim smiles an angry smile, backs up, and gets them up to date on the fun they’re having with Kevin.

“So, wait, Kevin, IT Kevin, harmless little improv meister, Kevin, is the leak?”

“Yeah, Tony. I’ve got him in protective custody now with Dorney, and when he’s done, I’m going to get to fire him. I’ve got to talk to legal and see if I need to arrest him, too. Only upside of this is that I’ve got a name. And maybe, a lead on who that name belongs to. Gotta find out who does Dynamics janitorial and cafeteria services.”

“That’s just asking questions, right?” Jimmy asks, checking his watch. It’s a bit before 17:00.

“Just taking a photo and asking around,” Tim answers.

“And at 03:00 you’re whole team is going full bore on the new code?”

“That’s the plan,” Tim says.

“Then take the advice you gave to Howard and Ngyn, go home, sleep, and come back at 02:00. If Ziva’s over here, I’m sure she can go ask a few questions,” Jimmy says while looking at Tony.

Tony nods. “Or Draga. He’s got to be close to getting to the end of the guys on our half of the list. Go, rest, get your tech game ready to go. Tomorrow’s going to be a big deal.”

Tim doesn’t exactly like that, but… Neither Jimmy nor Tony is wrong. He rubs his eyes. “You’ll give Abby a lift home?”

“No problem. Get some sleep. Oh, I got the appointment made for you, Wednesday morning, 8:00, “Thanks. Okay. Sleeping. Then more code. You still going to be here when I get back?” Tim asks Tony.

“Draga and I have a date at your computer den. Seeing if the buyer shows up.”

Tim shakes his head. “Nope. Part of what Kevin leaked was the heads up that that system isn’t in play any longer.”

“Great. In that case, I really hope not to be here when you get back, but if you find Khan you’ll want feet on the ground to grab him, right?”

“Yeah.”

“Then I’ll keep Ziva and Bishop running intel, and Draga and I’ll head home, too. Catch our own 40 winks before being ready to run.” Tony turns to Jimmy, “Full report on my desk when I’m back?”

“Have I ever let you down?”

Tony smiles and nods, heading out. Tim spends an awkward moment wanting to hug Jimmy goodbye, but doesn’t, and he too turns and leaves. As he’s heading down to grab his stuff, he remembers who hasn’t gotten an update yet.

He sends off a text to Vance. We’re breaking early. 02:00 everything heats up.

This have something to do with the Intranet Service Update that begins at 02:00?

Yes.

And would this also have something to do with you pulling Mr. Hussein out of his desk and spiriting him away into protective custody?

Yes.

And are you going to give me a full report than that?

Depends, how tired do you want me to be at 02:00?

I’ll wait.

I’m sure there’ll be a full campfire at 02:00, you’re more than welcome to be there.

I will.

Good.
Sleeping from six to one is technically Tim’s usual seven (ish) hours of sleep. But, in that they didn’t happen at his usual time, Tim’s feeling awfully out of it when his alarm starts chirping, getting him out of bed.

A quick, and fairly cool, shower pulls his eyes the rest of the way open.

Kisses for Abby (sleeping) and Kelly (also sleeping) see him out the door.

Time to earn his pay.

He heads into the bullpen, a collection of snacks and drinks ready for everyone. He’s not surprised to see Abbi, Gibbs, Fornell, and Vance here, in addition to Ziva, Bishop, and Draga.

“Someone forget to tell Diane the party was on?”

Fornell shakes his head. “Wendy’s bachelorette party tonight, so she’s out.” He glances to Draga and Gibbs. “Diane drew the short straw for who has Emily tonight.”

“Ah.” Tim supposes that’s how his family would handle it if someone needed to watch the kids during a hot case and Breena was busy.

“What’s that?” Tony asks, looking at the box of goodies in Tim’s hands.

“The one on the far right is yours. Three espresso shots in milk, five tablespoons of sugar.”

Tony smiles, grabbing it. “Liquid sleep. I trained you well, didn’t I?”

Tim raises an eyebrow at that, and once everyone else has grabbed some sort of midnight breakfast, they start talking.

Tony pulls up a now full face shot of the man who’s been vexing them. “Meet Roger Clemens. He used to be a night janitor at Hellerson’s Maintenance.”

“Used to be?” Tim asks.

“Quit the day Khan’s bank account was accessed,” Draga replies.

“More importantly, janitor?” Fornell asks.

“According to his CV he was a very talented hacker at CalTech, top of all of his classes, full scholarship case. He got caught with an ounce of pot on him when he was a freshman, wouldn’t roll over on who sold it to him, so instead of a slap on the wrist he did three years for possession with intent to distribute,” Draga replies.

“And with a drug conviction he’s pretty much shut out of any legitimate tech job.” Tim knows how that works.
“It gets better.” Tony says, in a voice that makes it completely clear that by better he means worse.
“Five years ago, the cop who busted him went down for corruption. Looks like he was making his cases against the big guys by planting drugs on kids. He’d get them to ‘roll’ on ‘their dealer,’ whoever was on the top of his hit list, and then he’d go make the bust. Clemens didn’t follow the script. Even after being told over and over, ‘I know you got the drugs from Emilio Juarenez’ he didn’t roll, because he didn’t get any drugs from anyone.”

Everyone’s wincing at that.

“He get his record cleaned up?” Fornell asks.

“Not that we can see,” Ziva replies. “He’s had no interactions of any sort, beyond checking in with his parole officer while he was on parole, since he’s been out. Not even a traffic ticket.”

“And the cop?” Tim asks, feeling cold.

Tony nods. “Had a convenient heart attack Thursday evening, in his jail cell.”

There’s a moment of silence, and then Ziva gets them back onto how Clemens got into everything. “Hellerson’s has contracts with Dynamic Infrastructure Services, and the Capitol building, and a few dozen Federal Office buildings, and every major bank in the greater DC area.”

Tim’s already feeling his head start to ache, and he’s only been looking at the screen for two minutes. “So, you’re saying he had unsupervised access to pretty much every single building where anyone who mattered worked?” And, what Tim really means, is that he had unsupervised access to the computers of anyone who mattered.

“Yes, McGee, and it gets better from there. Using a dozen aliases, he’s gotten himself onto the verified visitor list for every Federal Office building in DC and four dozen others across the country.”

“It’s almost like I can just walk into anywhere I want to.” Everyone turns to face the voice and sees Roger Clemens, short, round, a bit slubby, something of a Michael Moore vibe about him, grinning like he’s in the middle of the best joke in the world. “I assume you’d like to arrest me.”

Tim and Vance win interrogation rights. Tim’s at the table, across from Clemens. Leon’s lurking in the corner, watching carefully.

Tim can feel the rest of them, watching from behind the mirror.

“You look very amused, Mr. Clemens.” Seems like a good opening gambit. The man’s been grinning like the Joker on ecstasy the whole time he’s been in here. “Want to let me in on the joke?”

He’s grinning at Tim, still, in a brilliantly good mood. “Oh, I am. I’m curious, what exactly do you intend to charge me with?”

“I’m starting with murder and kidnapping, and figured the rest could come up as needed.”

Clemens is still smiling, wide and bold. “You can’t prosecute me for anything. But, by all means, waste my time, I make two thousand dollars a minute, just sitting here, breathing.”
Tim’s feeling hip deep in bullshit right now, and he really wants to wipe that smile off of Clemens’ face. “Do you want to tell me why I can’t prosecute you for murder? Are you innocent or something?”

“Hell no!” More smiling. This is getting really annoying. “I shot Matt, and had Florence, Sammie, Johnson, and Elspeth poisoned, and there’s eleven more prison guards sitting in morgues that you and FBI guy haven’t found yet.” He sounds almost orgasmic at that. He calms down a little, still smiling. “Though I think springing my associates from prison is really stretching the definition of kidnapping. Not like I held a gun to their heads.” He punctuates that with a small giggle.

“Uh huh.” Tim’s nodding slowly, wondering what sort of insane this guys is, and then he remembers talking with Jimmy and the appointment he’s got with Jake on Friday, and a trickle of cold drips down his back.

Clemens sees it and smiles, then says to Vance, “Oh, he gets it, now. This one is clever. You don’t look nearly scared enough, so I don’t think you do.” He turns back to Tim. “You found at least some of it, didn’t you?”

Tim’s cagy. “Found the authorization for you to stick that worm in the Federal Intranet.”

Clemens giggles again.

Tim’s starting to feel sick. “You worked in the Capitol building for ten years.”

Clemens nods, still grinning. God, does he have any other expressions? “Yes, I did. Did you know that no one reads laws all the way through before they’re passed? They literally can’t. Not on the long ones, even at ten seconds a page they’re way too long to read before they go up to a vote. And the little ones, the only people who read them are the ones who write them. Once you’ve read a few of them, you know where the filler is, where the bits no one checks are, and then, add a line or paragraph or three after the first draft is done and before it goes to a vote and no one will ever notice.”

Tim winces, that was Jimmy’s worst case scenario on this.

Clemens keeps talking. “Yeah, I was really expecting someone to notice something. I mean, I wrote into a bill that covered regulations for soap manufacture of all stupid things, that my home was a sovereign country, and granted myself and everyone who’s ever set foot in it, diplomatic status, and no one noticed. That worm,” he laughs, “guess what, not only is it legal, not only can I sell everything I get out of it, but because no one reads the damn laws before they pass them, Congress passed, the Senate passed, and the President signed off on the fact that anyone who bought my information can never be prosecuted. And, oh man, I’ve got some excellent clients.” Clemens stands up, still grinning, and starts to wave at Tim. “Bye, bye.”

Tim’s up a second later, hand on Clemens’ shoulder, shoving him back down. He beat Leon to it by maybe a tenth of a second.

“Sit down! I can hold God Himself for twenty-four hours, and you aren’t moving a second before that’s done.”

Clemens shrugs. “2:48 Wednesday morning, I’m out of here.”

As soon as he and Vance are out of there, Tim says, “I’ve still got to find where he’s got everyone holed up. Can you get Jake Malloy and Murray Harland here and reading? If what he’s saying is true…”
Vance nods, looking like he could chew through a steel toothpick right now. “Go. Find them. I’m on it.”

At 03:00 the systems go back up, and Tim is in the Dungeon, ready to roll.

He’s got 112, bright-eyed (okay, maybe not bright-eyed, but at least not exhausted) techs all over the world linked in and ready to break this wide open.

“I know Ajay Khan is on no one’s favorite person list, but somewhere, hiding in this update is a message from him to us. We’ve got to find that, because if we do, we get to grab 50 felons, put them back in jail, and nail the guy who set this whole thing up. So, have at it.”

He sees them nodding and getting into to.

“All idea what the message will look like?” One tech, Tim doesn’t recognize him by sight, asks over Skype.

Tim shrugs. “He likes music, so… notes? Song lyrics? Something that Roger Clemens, the guy who’s got him and the others, who isn’t a bad hacker himself, wouldn’t notice. We’re going to have to take the whole thing apart to find this.”

And they get to it.

Tim’s got the code open on one screen, and his search function on the other. It’s time to break this motherfucker.

He starts with easy searches, McGee, NCIS, Wallbanger and as he expects, they don’t turn up anything. The next set is more complicated. He doesn’t know where they might be, but he knows that longitude and latitude coordinates have a certain format, so he sets a search for anything that matches that format. That one will take a while, too many variables for that to be a fast search. GPS coordinates have a different format, so he puts that in, too. Street, drive, circle, any road name he can think of goes in there, as well as all state names and abbreviations.

That’s the easy stuff. From there he starts getting into the hard stuff.

Two hours into it, Tim’s got to take a break. He’s got as many searches running as he can think of, and right now he’s just spinning his wheels, coming up with the same things over and over again.

Might as well let his searches do their thing. The coordinate searches aren’t done, so, let them work.

He heads upstairs to see how the rest of the case is going.

Tim’s never seen such distressed looking people in his life. Okay, no he has. He’s never seen such disillusioned people in his life. They’ve taken the conference room, and everyone, even Vance, is sitting in front of a computer or a pile of books, looking through everything.
He sits down next to Bleach, who’s got his laptop open. Jake’s buried under a pile of massive books. Both of them look like they’ve been sucker punched right after watching a horrific traffic accident.

“We can’t get him, can we?” Tim asks.

Jake shakes his head. “Not anytime soon. He declared himself, legally, a diplomat, thus granting himself immunity from everything, including the equal protection under the law statutes.”

Bishop nods, slowly. “He owns five floors of an apartment building DC that became its own country in 2010. He got it through both houses of Congress and the President signed it. That’s likely where all of his felons are holed up, in a sovereign territory that we can’t go into without his permission.”

Okay, that’s not a problem for Tim. “They’ll have to come out sooner or later. We stick people around it—”

Bleach is shaking his head. “The Senate ratified the treaty giving them full trade rights with the US. We can’t block the borders.”

Tim can’t believe that got through without anyone noticing. “How did… I mean… Where?”

“Part of it’s in the ACA, part’s in the tax code, a lot of it is in different appropriation bills. The defense budget’s got a bunch of it. Those bills were so big, so long…” Jake’s staring off into the distance looking wrecked by this, like his last hope just died. “The only way anyone found anything in it was to do a word search. No one read straight through, and he wrote his bits in German, so they wouldn’t pop up on any word searches, at all.”

“And some of it is tucked into little bills that could have been read through, but no one did because the only people who cared were the ones writing it. Did you know Federal law mandates the way gas canisters are built?” Harland asks.

Tim shakes his head; he didn’t know that.

“You and everyone else. But they do. And apparently between Congressman Smithers writing that bill, and it hitting the floor, Clemens added a line about how all of his clients will also be granted total immunity for anything they ever do.” Bleach sounds ready to go and personally storm Clemensland or whatever the hell it is, and destroy every inch of it, and then tie Clemens, still alive, to the rubble and set fire to the whole thing. He might be edging sixty and in a wheelchair, but right now Bleach is a Marine ready to go and show the world that you do not mess with a Marine. (And he’s got two other Marines, also mirroring that expression.)

“So, even if I do storm…” Tim can feel Jimmy, and Breena, and Abby glaring at him on that idea. He’s not a field agent anymore, for a reason. “What is it called?”

“Clementine.” Vance’s voice is steeped in scorn.

“So, even if Tony and Fornell and Abbi storm Clementine, grab everyone in it, we can’t do anything to or with them?”

Fornell and Tony and Ziva and Bishop and Draga and Abbi all look extremely ready to strap on the body armor and take out Clementine. And, even with the mental images of his loves glaring at him, Tim’s more than ready to join in. Gibbs looks ready to, too, so he glares at Gibbs a bit. Gibbs, knowing what Tim’s thinking, gives him the stink eye back. Tony and Ziva are doing their own version of that same non-verbal exchange.

“Exactly. Upon setting foot in Clementine, you become a citizen, and all citizens are granted full diplomatic immunity in perpetuity,” Bleach adds. Then he says with a grim smile. “Kind of makes me want to visit, just to… take care of this, you know?”

And with that Tim knows Bleach has already decided how this is going to end. He can see the look on Vance’s face, and that same look on Abbi’s. Clemens fate is decided, now they’re just working out the details.

“Is there… I mean, there’s got to be some way to reverse this, right?” Tim asks.

“We can go to war with Clementine, which would mean storming a building filled with civilians below, and the apartments visiting foreign high muckety-mucks stay in, in the middle of downtown DC, and having to admit what happened,” Bleach says. “You got anything, Jake?”

He shakes his head. And then he pulls his armor of sarcasm back into place, and says, “A newfound respect for those people who want to make a law that no law can be longer than 50 pages, and that any congressman or senator who votes on a law he hasn’t personally read needs to be impeached.”

Bleach’s eyes narrow. He’s thinking about something. “Besides us, who know about this?”

Tim shrugs. “Clemens, that’s obvious. Probably everyone in those five floors. Maybe their lawyers. Maybe his lawyer? Does he have a lawyer?”

“Didn’t see payments to one in his records,” Draga says.

“He is probably not fond of them, not after what happened to him,” Ziva adds.

“What? Did his defense attorney screw him, too?” Tim asks.

“Public defender, met with him twice, told him to plea out, and then pretty much capitulated as quickly as possible during the trial. Testimony was done in one day, and an hour later, Clemens was convicted,” Tony replies.

Bleach nods. He’s seen a lot of versions of that over the years. Public defenders who have too many clients, and don’t want to go to court because it takes time. He spends another moment thinking some more. “Leon, Abbi, we’re gonna have a chat, everyone else say goodbye.”

Leon’s nodding, he’s fine with this. Abbi is, too. Everyone else is fine with what they think is about to happen, too, but they’re less fine with leaving. No one has moved.

“Off you go. Anyone asks we spent the night working on… the mystery bank accounts.”

“Talking about what my team’s got,” Abbi adds, standing up. She gently touches Bleach’s shoulder, “You really set for this?”

He winks at her. Jethro’s not moving, either. “Leon’s got my six, I’ve got his, we’ve both got Abbi’s and she’s got ours. Now, the rest of you are going to protect your own by getting out of here.”

They start to shuffle out, and Bleach thinks of something. “McGee, you’re the one who’s never met a system you couldn’t get into and out of clean, right?”

Tim nods, hearing the door shut behind him.

“He made sure every law he wrote to shield himself or his associates mentioned him by name. That’s the word search you’re going to use. Jake’s going to show you what needs to be edited.”

Tim can do that. “Okay. I can erase everything, but I’ll bet you good money the lawyers have hard copies of everything.”

Bleach says, “Don’t worry about it. As soon as the twenty-four is done, I want you to escort Clemens out of the building. Back exit. Near the handicap spaces.”

Tim’s feeling cold. The look on Bleach’s face is very dangerous. Reckless dangerous. The kind of dangerous that might result in collateral damage.

“Uh… I have a wife and kid and a baby on the way.”

Bleach smiles. The kind of smile that looks like a blade drawn across a neck. “No harm is going to come to you. Just don’t stand behind him.”

“And, we’re not going to arrest him after I shift the laws because…”

Harland shakes his head. “Because I can guarantee you we didn’t find every law he buried in there. He’s got another get out of jail card in there, probably more than one, and if he pulls it in open court, especially in a way where everyone gets to see him do it, tomorrow everyone else will be hacking every law on the books.”

“God… Okay.” Tim stands up, and then sits back down, swallowing hard, looking at the door Jethro just walked out of. “You’re not calling Jethro, are you?”

“Need to know, Tim, and you don’t,” Vance says.

“Okay.”

“And, try to look surprised,” Bleach adds.

“If someone is shooting at me, I look surprised.”

“Good.”

As soon as he’s out, he sees that Tony, Bishop, Draga, and Fornell are getting geared up and ready to go. “Storming Clementine?” Tim asks.

“Yeah.”

“How about you wait a few minutes on that. Jake’s going to show me which databases need to be edited, and if you guys hold on long enough, you’ll be recapturing a bunch of felons, not invading a sovereign territory.”

Jake shakes his head a bit. “This will take more than a few minutes.”

“And require more than five people,” Abbi adds, rejoining them. Apparently that bit of conference didn’t take long.

“I’ve got two teams getting ready to meet us,” Fornell adds.

“I’ve got two more in the area I can pull in,” Abbi says.
“Do you think you’ll need that much firepower?” Jake asks. The husband in him is perfectly happy with Bishop in the middle of as many armed guys as possible. The lawyer, the civilian, is worried about this turning into a massive bloodbath if they bring that many people in.

“If we’re lucky, they’ll happily come with us, all of them flashing their ‘Citizen of Clementine’ badges or whatever, ready to see us wet ourselves when they tell us they’ve got immunity. If not, we’re going to want at least a one to one ratio of men to fugitives,” Tony replies.

Tim can see Jake’s worried. “Come on, we can do this in MTAC, and from there you can keep eyes on everyone. Ziva can show you how it all works.”

Jake nods nervously, squeezes Bishop’s hand, and Tim leads him up. He looks over his shoulder and sees Gibbs saying goodbye to Abbi, a much less restrained show of affection as he kisses her, holding her face in his hands, staring at her, willing her to come home. Ziva and Tony are saying something quietly to each other, further aside, and he doesn’t have a good enough view of their faces to tell what. And then he and Jake are up the stairs.

Time to get working.

“So, what are you going to do?” Jake asks as he sets Tim up with the law library all the other electronic searches come from.

“Pray that you’re right that this is the base document they print all of the laws off of. We’re going to get screwed pretty fast if they just grab an older book that’s already got the laws in them.”

Jake shakes his head. “No one does it that way anymore. Back in the old days, part of how you showed off how good your practice was, was all of those law books, but now?” Jake shrugs. “No one prints them out anymore. Ink and paper is expensive and you’d need a warehouse just to keep up to date with one field of law.”

Jake logs him in, and then says, “Okay, here’s what I’d do with it.” He goes to the search feature, which, Tim would admit is nicely designed. You can widen or narrow your search however you like, break it down by state, by type of law, by year passed. You can keyword search, phrase search, or search by bill name or number. Jake types in “Roger T. Clemens”, and 72 responses pop up.

“Now, what do you do with it?”

Tim says, “Watch.”

Ziva heads in, and she gets Jake set with a headset so he can hear. No microphone for him, she doesn’t want him distracting anyone by trying to talk to Bishop. “We’ll have visual from Tony, Bishop, and Draga, and audio from Tony.”

Jake’s lips go tight. “How long before they get there?”
Another hour, at least. Probably an hour after that before they’re ready to go in.”

Gibbs and Vance head in, also settling in to wait.

It’s not complicated work. There are basically no defenses on this system, because apparently they didn’t think anyone would ever try anything with it.

Tim sighs. This can’t get out. It’d be like those horror movies… He doesn’t remember which ones. The ones where everything is suddenly legal, so everyone goes out and steals and kills everyone, all came true.

But, he also knows that this has to go somewhere. Someone’s got to secure this. Secure it a hell of a lot better than it is now. The proverbial barn door is wide open, someone’s already stolen the cows, and now they’re putting the cows back, but it’d be a damn good idea to get a lock for the fucking barn before the next guy decides he wants some free milk and burgers.

Tim finishes deleting, and then he pushes the changes he’s made through. Next step metadata. None of these changes ever happened. If someone does actually have a copy of the law printed off earlier, and they decide to check, the data will show that those phrases never existed.

When he’s done, he lets Tony know. “And you’re no longer starting a war.”

“Wonderful.”

“When are you going in?”

“Another hour? We’re still waiting for one of Fornell’s teams to get here and get in place. Then we’re quietly evacuating the first four floors and the ten floors on top. If there’s something nasty in there, we’re not going to get a hell of a lot of civilians killed.”

“Anyone make you?” Vance asks.

“We’re staging a mile away. No one’s seen us yet. The evac will be interesting, though.”

“Yeah. Good luck,” Tim says.

“Thanks.”

While Tim’s been working, Vance has been texting. Less than a minute after Tim’s done talking with Tony, Jarvis walks in.

The two of them talk quietly in the corner, very quietly. Tim can’t make it out, and the half of the conversation he can lip read is making it very clear that he’s going to be in much better shape if he doesn’t know what’s going on.

He turns his eyes back to the big screen, where they’re just starting to get eyes up.

When Vance and Jarvis sit down, Tim moves over to join them, and quietly says, “Who do we need to talk to to make sure this doesn’t happen again?”

“I’ve got it, Tim,” Jarvis replies.

“Got it how? I don’t want to be doing this again.”

Jarvis nods. “Both houses of Congress will be meeting in two hours. The bill will be on the President’s desk by lunchtime. By dinner, we’ll have coders in place, working on securing these systems.”

“Good.”

And after that, all that’s left is waiting.

The evacuation is messy. No one wants to leave, and the most effective way to do it is a fire alarm, but that’ll tip off the floors they don’t want leaving. So, they spend two hours watching agents knock on doors, tell people they need to get out of the building, fast.

And of course, there’s grumbling, but generally when guys in full body armor with automatic weapons tell you to get out of a building, you go.

Watching a raid is very different from being in one.

Watching is tense and nervous and you can’t really tell what’s going on because everything is loud and confusing and a jumble of images as people move their heads and bodies around.

Being in a raid is nervous and tense, too, but it’s focused. It’s hyper awareness of only what’s immediately in front of you, your job, and your team.

Tim would rather be in the raid than watch the raid. But this isn’t the first one he’s watched, and it won’t be the last. He falls into his usual position, on the com, keeping everyone together pointing out who is seeing what.

As raids go, it’s quick and easy.

And ten minutes later, he’s got Tony talking to them again, watching men and women holding up their hands, clutching folders of paperwork.

“You got it?” Tim asks.

“Yeah, we do.” Tony reports. “They’re all explaining how they’re sovereign citizens of Clementine and we can’t touch them, but they’re also all going quietly. My guess is they’re expecting to lawyer up, whip out their new legal status, and walk right out.”

“If you can grab them all easily with that, do it. We can wait until after they’re out to disabuse them of that notion,” Leon says.

“So... we going with the conman story line?” Tony asks.
“That’s what I’d go with. Heavy on the, ‘Do you really think someone could just hack into the legal code?’ He’s got a few dozen good hackers in there, and it’d be nice if they didn’t all, immediately after getting out, start trying it themselves,” Tim says. As much for Jarvis’ benefit as Tony’s.

Jarvis gets the message and nods.

Tony scoffs. “Even if you build brick walls around the laws, they’re gonna try. Once they’ve got the idea…”

Tim sighs. Jarvis nods again, and get up, without saying anything, and leaves. For another hour, Tim watches them grab guys, cuff them, put them in vans, and say over, and over, and over, that as soon as they were processed, they could call their lawyers, or a lawyer would be found for them.

Then he notices something. Or rather, the lack of someone. “Did you guys grab Ajay Khan?”

Tony replies. “I didn’t see him. But lots of guys. Let me check the list.” They see Tony’s view scoot through people and search out Borin. She hands over her list, and he and Tim read it at the same time. No Khan. Over to Fornell, same thing.

“We didn’t process him, FBI didn’t, and CGIS didn’t either.”

“You guys got everyone, right?”

“We thought we did.” Tony raises his voice, “Bishop, Draga, grab ten more guys and do a full search. We’re missing Khan.”

They see Bishop and Draga head off, and with one eye on their feed, as they clear room after room, floor after floor, he and Tony talk.

“You ever find his message in the code?” Tony asks.

“Not yet. They’re still looking.”

“Why, we’ve got them?”

Tim sighs. “Yeah, good point.”

Bishop comes up to them, shaking her head. “Not here.”

“Okay, thanks. I’ll go get a BOLO on the lookout for him. He’s in the wind again.” Tim puts his earphones down, and nods to the rest of them. Gibbs stands up, heading out with him.

“I can get the BOLO, go deal with your guys.”

Tim nods. “Thanks. We still don’t know who was buying his information. Tomorrow or later today, sometime soon, we’re going to sit down with those five computers, and I’ll show you how I find leads. Then you’re going to do it.”

Gibbs mouth opens and closes. Everything he’s tried so far on his attempts at programming has died horribly.

“It’s easier to learn hands on. Abby’ll help, too. You’ll do better with the problem in front of you.” Tim hits the elevator button, and in they go.
When he’s back in the dungeon, he sees that his crew hasn’t found it yet. They’re looking, hard. But no joy yet.

The ones in the office see the look on his face, and he nods, then heads to his office and gets his computer up and ready.

“We’ve got him.” Tim’s about to say, how they got him, but it occurs to him that right now, something very bad is about to happen to Clemens, and it would be a good thing to not have 112 people know he just walked right in and gave himself up.

Plus, he really doesn’t want to tempt any of his white knights to go dark side. They don’t need to know how easy it was to do this.

More than a hundred versions of what the hell? hit Tim all at once.

“The guys upstairs found a block of apartments he was renting. All of the prisoners were in there.”

“Clemens?” Howard asks.

“Not sure yet. Got some guys we’ve got to ID.”

“Khan?” Manner asks.

“In the wind, just set the BOLO for him. All of you, thanks. If you want to keep looking, you can, but I think we’ve found what we’re looking for. As of now, any of you who want off are welcome to take it. Once you’re back on, we’re dissecting this version of the code and taking all of the little nasty bits out of it.”

There’s some grumbling about the guys upstairs hogging all of the glory, but eventually most of his guys head off, some shift their searches to what other surprises are hiding in their intranet, and some of them go back to their regular cases.

Within an hour NCIS DC Cybercrime looks the way it usually does at 07:00, except of course, Tim’s not usually sitting in there at that hour.

Tim stares at his computer and tries one last thing. When they were talking before, Khan didn’t know who he was, he didn’t recognize him from his earlier adventure with NCIS, but eventually that fell into place. But he and Khan go further back than that. Khan hacked MIT when he was a student there, a senior if Tim remembers correctly. Tim was in the first year of his master’s program. The hack had happened first semester, but no one had been able to track it. He and a few other students got together to go after that hack as an extra credit seminar second semester.

He led that team. Khan was expelled less than four weeks away from graduation.

It’s beyond a long shot, that Khan knows that now, but… If he’d wanted to find out… He could have.

Beaver. That was a very long shot. Didn’t do it. Okay, not whimsical…

He runs one last search MIT
And a minute later, it pops up. MIT 030809000408070700106040 TIM. It’s in there 5000 times.
The numbers are… Tim stares, and sees it. GPS coordinates, with a zero between each real number.
No spaces, no periods, no directions, but they were in there.

Watch the code. Yep. That was definitely a message just for him.

Where did you go? he asks his mental image of Khan.
When Abby and Jimmy get in at eight, Tim’s already been on six of his usual nine hours.

He heads to the Lab first, wanting to see Abby, just to see her, and also to get the update on what she did yesterday.

“Hey.”

“Hello you.” She smiles at him, linking her arm in his, and pulling him into the computer annex where Gibbs is sitting next to the long table, with all five of the captured computers. Tim gets a quick and bright kiss, and then she pats the chair at her desk, where he obligingly sits down and she plops herself in his lap. “Okay, this is good, didn’t get enough of it yesterday.”

His head rests on her shoulder for a moment, and he just holds on. “Nope, not enough. Waiting for Abbi?” he asks Gibbs.

Yes, he is, but he’s trying to not get weird about it, she’s back at her office, processing people, not in danger anymore, so he’s down here. “You said we’d…” he looks at the computers.

Tim nods. “Yeah. I’ll admit I was intending for both of us to get some sleep between now and then, but, sure.”

“He tells me you’ve volunteered me to help, too.”

“You mind?” Tim asks his wife.

“No!” She looks at him like he’s being a twit. “Why would I mind?” Then she grins at Gibbs. “This’ll be fun!”

Gibbs shakes his head.

She waves that off. “Eh… You’ll love it.”

“So, can we get started?” Gibbs asks. He’s looking doubtful about love, but he knows Abbi’s not going home anytime soon, so he’s got hours to kill, and it’s work on computers or work on his best man speech, so, bring on the computers.

“Yes. All yesterday I’ve been dissecting and resecting and reassembling these puppies. They’re still clean. Clean room clean. Mr. Clean, clean.” Gibbs looks like he’s about to chime in with a ‘get to the point Abs,’ but he doesn’t, and Tim, who’s enjoying her sitting in his lap, talking, doesn’t speed her up. “But all of the filters show slightly different spans of time in use. See, local pollens only happen at certain times. So, with a little google work, and a quick drive around the neighborhood you got these in, I was able to get a timeline that’s accurate to… call it plus or minus three days of when each computer was running.”

Tim kisses her, and Gibbs adds the “Great work, Abbs.”

She waves Gibbs to join them on the side of the desk where he can see the monitor on her computer. “Here’s what we know. The NSA and Homeland computers have been on since the last week of October last year. The NCIS computer was on in late March and April, off the end of April through July, and then on again from July to now. The FBI computer’s tricky. It’s been on the last three weeks, and… I think, but can’t be sure, because it’s not pollen, but it’s in the NSA and Homeland computers, too… There are traces of wood smoke, and the house next door has a fireplace. Now, it’s not in the NCIS’s computer’s filter, so the smoke stopped smoking by March, so that’d go with using it for heat. So, I’m giving you an educated guess that the FBI computer was on in the winter, but not the fall or spring, because it’s got no pollen from those times.”

“And Baltimore?” Tim asks.

“Turned on in April, and has been on since.”

Gibbs sighs. There’s a reason why he hired Tim, and that was to have someone else to go through all of this stuff and tell him how they all fit together.

At least he’s not sitting in front of thousands of paper files, having to look through them by hand and write notes. That’s how he and Mike Franks did this the last time he personally had to deal with this sort of a situation.

“You got thumb drives?” Tim asks Abby.

“Of course.”

He gently pats her on the hip, and she gets up, pointing out where they live in the annex. He grabs five of them, and begins powering on the computers. He gestures to Gibbs, and he joins him. Tim hold ups the thumb drive.

“You know how to get everything from here,” he pats the Baltimore computer, “onto this?”

Gibbs rolls his eyes a bit, but nods. He can use a thumb drive.

Tim smiles at him. “That’s step one. Pull it all off, and then we’re going to build a matrix. Once we’ve got five matrices, we’ll start cross referencing.”

“How long will this take?” Gibbs asks.

Tim shrugs. “I’ll show you how to build the first one, and then I’m off to see Jimmy, and then home again. I’ve got at least one more upside down day.”

“I thought you got them?” Abby says.

Tim sighs and shakes his head, glancing at the open door. Corwin’s in there, running samples in Major Mass Spec. Abby and Gibbs nod. “Yeah, we did. But my Japan team is on something hot, and they need me tonight,” Tim says, and then he starts signing, explaining what he’ll really be doing tonight.

“So, when I set something like this up, I start with the smallest group first,” Tim says, grabbing the FBI thumb drive. “These only had information from the most recent turn on to now, right?” he asks Abby.

“Yeah.” She and Gibbs see what he’s doing, running the tutorial, so that Corwin’s got something to listen to, while he keeps signing.

Jarvis showed up while we were in MTAC. Couldn’t see all of it, but he’s going to ‘handle’ things. You get a better view? He signs to Gibbs.

Gibbs shakes his head.

Abbi will get you up to date when she’s home. Abby adds.
“So what we want to do is go through this one, and find out what sort of information’s on it. Then, we’ll build the matrices for the other computers and see what all five have in common,” Tim says.

“And if they don’t have something in common?” Gibbs asks.

“If they don’t, I’ll handle the search myself, because that’s going to be coding that took me years to learn.”

What’s your part? Abby asks.

Gotta walk Clemens out. When his 24 is done.

Cover story? Gibbs asks.

Probably going to make him feel like he won. He’ll gloat. I’ll glare. Then out he goes.

“First step, get your computer on.” Tim flicks on one of the auxiliary computers. “Next step, get comfy. Mess with the chair and the screen, make sure you’re feeling okay. Last thing we need is you getting a bad back or neck from this.”

Gibbs doesn’t look impressed by that, but he does go and start adjusting.

So, early night, early morning again for you? Abby asks Tim.

Yeah, probably head home in an hour or so. Sleep all day. Back here again by midnight. Still have to go through the entire new intranet. And then there’s handling Dynamics. And Hellersons. And I’ve got to get Kevin and Co. handled.

When Gibbs is sitting on the chair, Tim pops the thumb drive in. “Okay. Date search.” He starts typing, showing Gibbs how he’s telling the computer to pull anything with a date code and compile it, by date into a neat little file. “This is your first matrix, we’ll cross reference dates on all five servers, and use that to build a timeline.”

And, like Abby said, everything on the computer right now comes from this summer. In that data are casefiles, emails, forensic reports, and a decent spattering of paperwork.

“What next?” Tim asks Gibbs.

Gibbs spends a minute staring at the list in front of him, as Tim’s busy saving it into matrix one. “Email addresses?”

“Good. Okay, go find them, just like I did dates, but put in something unique to an email.”

Gibbs has to think for a minute on that, and then starts typing, he puts @ in instead of a date stamp, sees Tim approve, and hits enter. A minute later he’s got a huge list of email addresses.

“Okay, let’s sort them alphabetical, and then save this. Next?”

“Case numbers.” Gibbs is starting to sound a lot more sure of himself, and a bit happier about this.

“Got him, Abby?” Tim asks. He’s thinking he’s going to go visit Jimmy, get something to eat, and then go talk with Leon about Kevin, Dynamics, and Hellersons.

Abby smiles, and kisses both of them. “Yeah.” She’s got her hands on Gibbs’ shoulders as he slowly typing his search in. “If you’d been born twenty-five years later, you’d be a natural at this.”
“So, I hear you managed to get all but one of them, without a single bullet being fired,” Jimmy says as Tim heads in.

Tim glances around, he doesn’t see Allan.

“Allan?”

“No active cases right now. We’ve got Mr. Matt handled for the time being. So, he’s on call today.”

“Tonight. You’re going to be on call tonight.”

“Tim?”

Tim explains to Jimmy what’s going to happen to Clemens, and how sometime around 03:00 he’s going to be getting the ‘come back to work’ call.

“So, might be a good plan to grab a nap down here?” Jimmy asks, looking at the cold steel table, and thinking about how it was a lot more tempting when he was five years younger.

“If you can swing it without anyone noticing. If you go home…”

“I got it.” Jimmy nods. “You okay?”

Tim raises an eyebrow; he’s been not thinking much about this, intentionally. “I really hope whoever does it is a good shot. Don’t want to die for this, and I’ve spent more than enough time in a hospital bed for three lifetimes, I don’t want to go back.”

Jimmy sighs at that. He hadn’t been thinking in that direction, but that’s very real, too. “And let me guess, you can’t wear a vest because you can’t know about what’s going to happen.”

Tim nods. “Yeah.”

“Shit.”

“Uh huh. Bleach is promising I’ll be okay.”

Another sigh from Jimmy, who’s feeling a lot less settled than he was five minutes ago. “Does Abby know?”

“That Clemens is about to die? Yes. That I’m walking him out? Yes. That not ever sniper is Gibbs, and they don’t all have perfect hit scores… That didn’t seem to hit her, and I didn’t feel like sharing my concerns about that with the pregnant lady. Gibbs was with her when we were talking about it, and he was looking comfortable, so… either his gut’s not firing, or he’s the one shooting. I don’t know. He says he doesn’t know what’s going to happen…”

“But he’d flat out lie about that if he needed to, even to us.”

Tim nods.
“What about… killing Clemens? You okay with that? Can’t we just dump him in Gitmo or something?”

“I caught a few seconds of Jarvis and Vance talking while we were in MTAC. Jarvis is going to ‘handle’ the wet works. If they’re pulling him in on this, Gitmo’s already been taken off the list, by the President.”

“That’s what happened to Deering, right?” Jimmy says, eyes narrowed.

“Best I’ve been able to find out, yeah. Jarvis showed up with authorization from the President, and Gibbs took care of it. This time Jarvis is handling it again, so for all I know he had a chat with Gibbs once I got back to my office. Or maybe he’s bringing in someone else.”

“Think he’s going to do it himself?”

Tim raises a hand indicating he’s got no clue. “Or he could be doing it himself. However it works out, I’ve got to walk this guy into a sniper’s crosshairs and pray he’s a decent shot.”

Jimmy squeezes his shoulder and gives him a hug. “You’re going to be okay.”

Tim snorts a bit. “Don’t put it past Jarvis to hurt someone to sell a story.”

“I don’t, but by now, he’s got to know how dead he’d be if something happens to you on this case.”

Tim inclines his head at that. Jarvis being ultra-extra-dead if he gets hurt doesn’t help him.

“Where are you taking him?”

“Out the back, to the handicapped entrance.”

Jimmy thinks about that. “Who suggested that? Jethro?”

“Bleach.”

Jimmy’s nodding, seeing it in his head. (Of all of them, he probably spends the most time in the back lot, because that’s where the loading bay for Autopsy is.) “That’s a good spot. Decent vantages from three different rooftops. Minimal wind because the buildings provide shielding. If you were fast, you’d be able to get down the south building and out the rear exit before anyone could get the property shut down. Bleach knows what he’s doing.”

Tim’s got one eyebrow very high. “Bleach knows?”

Jimmy shrugs. “Since he got hurt, we haven’t been doing any hands on shooting, but every few days he’ll send me an address, and I scout it on my way to work. Show him where I should be, how to get in and out, and what sort of rifle and bullets to use.”

Tim nods at that. “Oh.”

Jimmy inclines his head a bit. “Guess we’ll get to see if Jarvis can deliver on his promise.”

“Yeah.”
Tim heads up to Leon next.

“McGee,” he says, as Tim’s heading in, waiting for what comes next.

“Housekeeping. Beyond firing Kevin, and explaining to NASA, IAEA, and wherever the other one was from what they were up to, what do you want me to do with our leaks?”

“According to legal, they didn’t, technically, do anything illegal.” Leon looks annoyed by that. “If they had been reporting back to ‘Rogers’ about anything other than the software he was ‘selling them’ they’d have broken the law, but…”

“Clemens knew what he was doing inside and out. Hell, for all we know, he might be the guy who wrote that exception into the law.”

Leon sighs, his eyes narrowing. “If they’d done it for free, we wouldn’t have been able to fire them, either.”

Tim shakes his head. “So, greed has one upside?”

Leon nods. “I’m getting regs written that specify that without express permission of at least two directors, that all employees cannot talk to any outside vendors about how we use their equipment.”

“Thanks.” Tim thinks for a moment. “And we’re both granting each other permission to talk to outside vendors about equipment we might need or want in the future.”

Leon flashes Tim a tight smile. “Go get Dorney back to work.”

Tim nods. “Hellersons? Dynamics?”

Leon shakes his head. “As of right now, Roger Clemens is an outside informant, voluntarily helping us with an investigation. No charges have been brought against him, nor had he done, or is even suspected of doing, anything illegal.”

“Ah.” Tim has to admire the level of verbal hair splitting that’s going on in that sentence. Every bit of it is factually true, and completely misleading. “And, later?”

“I have a feeling he’ll be done helping us around 10:30 tonight.”

“Earlier than I expected.”

“Suspects can be held for 24 hours without charges. People who come in and voluntarily help us leave when they’ve given us all they can give.”

“Ah.” Tim nods, feeling his lips tighten. “And, I’ll just, walk him out…”

Leon nods. “Yep. I wouldn’t walk him all the way to his car, if I were you.”

He nods again, wondering what, exactly he’s being told here. Something about the location of where it’s going to go down, probably. Tim sighs, loudly, not really liking this. “No problem. Just to the back door, and then he’s on his own.”

“Exactly.”

“And, I suppose quietly going through every other employee at Hellerson’s would be a good plan, make sure none of the other janitors own their own little micro-countries?”
Leon nods again.

“Okay. I’m on it. I’ll give Dorney a call, and then be back around nine.”

“Good plan.”

Dorney’s got them in a safe house that’s actually on the way to Tim’s house, so he tells Dorney to let the others go, but to sit tight with Kevin and wait for him.

Once he’s there, he sends Dorney out to wait on the porch, and sits down at the kitchen table with Kevin. Small kitchen, hasn’t been decorated since the 80s. The Formica is starting to fray and warp, but safe houses don’t have to be posh, they just have to hold people somewhere away from the people hunting them.

Kevin looks scared. “What happens now? Are you going to arrest me?”

Tim shakes his head. “It’s not illegal to be a victim of fraud.” How fucking dumb could you possibly be! Tim wants to yell. He takes a deep breath. “Your employment with NCIS is over. You will not be allowed back into the building to get your things. I’ll make sure they get mailed to you. You will not be getting a severance package. You will not be getting hired by any other Federal office, ever. Right now, if I were you, I’d be thinking of setting up a consulting firm, or something where no one will check with us for references.”

Kevin’s nodding, looking very sad, but also like he expected this.

“I need your ID and your key card.”

Kevin nods again, and hands them over. “My car’s in the parking lot.”

“Dorney will drive you to it, and escort you from the premises.”

“Okay.” Kevin sighs again. “Anything else?”

“Yeah.” Tim shuffles around in his go bag and finds what he printed up. “Non-disclosure agreement. All of this is part of an ongoing investigation. If you talk about ‘Clem’ and your deal with him or ‘Dynamics,’ we will come and arrest you. Anyone asks, you were fired for taking kickbacks.”

Kevin winces, but that’s true enough. He reads through the agreement, signs one copy for Tim, and keeps another for himself.

Tim nods and stands up.

“I’m sorry.”

Tim shakes his head. “I am too, but it doesn’t matter. Be smarter next time, Kev.”

Kevin nods as Tim heads out.
Being home in the middle of a work day feels weird to Tim, but, in that it’s time with his daughter, who is actually awake, he’ll take it. They both spend an hour in the backyard, her working on her walking, him working on his stooping and grabbing a wobbly toddler.

By the end of the hour, she’s ready for her nap, and he’s thinking he might as well try to sleep again. Got to be back around 9… that means leave 8:30, might be nice to eat before getting there, probably should get a shower and shave…

Yep, bedtime soon.

He’s hoping his body will go along with that.

It takes him a while to get settled. There’s something to be said for not needing to know. In fact, right now, he’d much rather not know about any of this. It’d be easier to sleep if he was just going to walk into work, do his thing, and then be told that they’re releasing Clemens. He’d be pissed about it, but he wouldn’t know what’s going to happen next.

Doesn’t matter. In a bit less than eleven hours, he’s got a show to put on. Gotta get ready to do it.

Being home when Abby gets in feels weird, so does getting a shower before dinner, and heading off after.

More weird, and less fun, is knowing he’s up all night, Abby’s sleeping, and he’s got no quality snuggle time until tomorrow night. (Though Abby reminded him the new bed is coming sometime tomorrow, so snuggle time will be all four of them. He is looking forward to that.)

He feels off, and probably because he hasn’t been touched enough lately.

It occurs to him as he sits down at his desk and starts checking the financials of the Hellerson employees, that four years ago, he could go months without more than a hug from Abby or a headslap from Gibbs. Entire weeks would go by and literally no one would touch him.

He’s fairly sure he’d start to go bonkers after a few days if no one was touching him, now.

“You again?” Clemens asks. He’s not looking so smiley now. In fact, his skin is a bit gray, and he’s looking a little sweaty.

At the time, Tim doesn’t think anything of that. He sees it, but doesn’t really notice it.

“Me again.” Tim sighs. “You are free to go.”

That gets a grin. “Told you!” Clemens says in a sing song voice.

Tim rolls his eyes. “Yes, you did.” He unlocks Clemens cell door. “Come on.”
They head over to booking, where Tim stands next to Clemens as he examines everything he came in with. His cell phone, his apple watch, his shoes, everything are in fine shape. Then Ruth hands over three empty pill bottles.

“Where are my meds?”

She answers in a precise voice, void of animus, “All medications are destroyed. We don’t know what’s in them, so we don’t vouch for them.”

Clemens looks alarmed. He’s been taking ‘his’ medication all day. “What have you been giving me?”

With the same dispassionate voice, Ruth replies, “We have a medical doctor on staff. I’m sure he wrote you a prescription for whatever it is you had in those bottles.”

Tim realizes what’s going on, and for a second he feels relieved. No change of him getting hurt by this. He’s finally really noticing what he’s seeing with Clemens grayish skin and sweaty brow.

Ruth nods and hands over an envelope. “This’ll get you through the night.”

Tim checks the envelope. Jimmy isn’t the prescribing physician. No one on staff at NCIS is. Tim doesn’t know what the pills are, but Clemens, even in a good mood, isn’t a perfect specimen of vibrant health.

Clemens glares at Ruth, but grabs the envelope, rips it open, shakes two pills out, and looks around for a drink. “Can I get some water?”

Tim takes the envelope, tucking it into his pocket, and says, “I’ll walk you to the fountain.”

Clemens is getting bitchy about this. “I’m going to sue you guys for the cost of those pills.”

Tim scoffs, pointing out the water fountain in the hallway. “Cry me a river, fuckhead, you make two thousand dollars a minute robbing me and putting my family in danger.”

That gets Clemens attention, and not in a good way. “And how is your family?” he asks, smile, cruel smile, back in place.

“Lovely,” Tim says, eyes narrowed. Clemens looked way too happy to ask that question, and that makes Tim feel cold. Clemens knows something, and he doesn’t, but it’s his job to act like he knows whatever it is.

Clemens smiles and then finishes taking his pills. “Now where?”

“Out, and after that, you can go to hell for all I care.”

“Oh, you’ll care.” Yeah, that sounds creepier than Tim’s comfortable with.

They walk a few more steps, and Clemens is sounding a little out of breath. Tim slows down slightly. “ Might want to work on your cardio some.”

Clemens doesn’t respond.

The rest of the walk down the hall is silent. When they get to the door, Tim holds it open, and Clemens looks at him like he’s been kicked. “My car’s in the front lot.”

“Sucks to be you.” Tim points to the far end of the back lot, and now he knows why he’s still taking Clemens out the back way, and it’s not for the roof top vantages. The Navy Yard is not level. The back lot is about twenty five feet lower than the front lot. That’s intentional. Morgue, evidence, and the garage all have road access from the back, but visitors to the front can park and walk in on one level. “Down the lot, up the two flights of stairs, turn left, follow the sidewalk around the building, and there you are. Just three or four thousand feet out of your way.”

Clemens glares at him, but heads out the door, and starts puffing his way down the lot.

Tim lets the door shut behind him. He doesn’t watch to see if Clemens makes it to his car. He doesn’t linger at all. He immediately heads back toward his office. There’s a lot of work that still needs to be done clearing other Hellerson’s employees, and it’s time to do it.

An hour and a half later, he along with everyone else, hears the alarm that calls for anyone in the building with CPR training to get to the back lot.

He’s got CPR training, along with Brand. So, they head to the back lot, and at the top of the steps, lying in his own mess, is Clemens.

Tim’s not allowed to call time of death, but he more than knows when CPR is futile. He takes charge of the scene, points out how when they loose their bowels, they’re past saving, and then he calls Jimmy.

“How?” Jimmy asks. “I was just getting ready to go to bed.”

“Sorry to drag you out. Looks like Clemens had a heart attack trying to walk up the back stairs.”

Jimmy sounds pleased as he says, “Oh. I’ll be there shortly.”

“I’ll secure the scene.”

“See you soon.”

Jimmy and Allan stand at the top of the stairs, gurney beside them, looking down at Mr. Clemens.

“And now I understand why you told me to get to know the weight room,” Allan says.

Jimmy nods. “Tim, we’re going to need help. He’s got to be at least 350.”

Tim’s not looking happy about that. Among other things, he’s not wearing gloves or coveralls. “Let me…”

Jimmy nods, and Tim heads into Autopsy, grabbing one of the sets of coveralls, and gloves. He’s back a few minutes later.

Jimmy’s standing near Clemens head, and then steps to his middle. “Okay, Tim, you get the shoulders. Allan, feet. I’ve got his hips. Lifting with legs, not backs.” They all get into position, and Tim gets a firm grip on his shoulders. “One, two, three, up!”
Tim’s glad he didn’t drop the top third of Clemens. As it is, his arm and back are yelling at him for trying this, and his foot isn’t very happy, either.

It’s after he’s on the gurney, that Jimmy notices Tim wincing and holding his right arm. “Shit. I forgot.” Jimmy steps over, stripping off his gloves, and gesturing for Tim to get out of his coveralls.

Tim does, rolling his eyes a bit, as Jimmy checks his arm, hand, and wrist.

“Say something next time.”

Tim shrugs at that, and winces a bit, his shoulder isn’t happy with that.

“Are you hurt or just sore?” Jimmy asks as his fingers gently palpate Tim’s shoulder.

Tim almost shrugs, but stops in time. “I’ll find out soon.”

“Get back to your office and sit down. I’ll be there with ice packs soon.”

“I can get my own ice.”

“Yes, I know, but I want you on your ass, not walking around. Rest, Ice, Compression, Elevation. We miss the first one if you’re off looking for your own ice.”

“Yes, mom.”

Jimmy glares a bit at Tim, and Tim smirks at him.

Allan watches.

Jarvis is sitting in his office when Tim limps in. Tim shuts his door, deciding that anything Jarvis wants to say to him doesn’t need to be overheard by Connon or Brand.

He’s looking calm, and cool. Relaxed, his tie is loose and the top button of his shirt is undone. It’s possible he’s just stopping by after a casual dinner, or something like that.

Tim doesn’t think that’s likely though.

“Clayton?”

“Tim. I take it everything is handled on this end?”

Sit rep. Sure, he can do that. “Just about. Ajay Khan is still in the wind. We’re not sure what we’re going to do with Dynamic Infrastructure—“

“Already handled. We will not be renewing their contract to provide us with computer services.”

“Ah.” Tim wonders if the next guys will be any better.

“We’ll keep them in play for the next eight months, so each agency can back trace the various worms and find out who is using them.”

Tim nods, that makes a certain level of sense.
Jarvis stands up.

“Any chance anyone will notice that Jimmy didn’t prescribe those pills?”

Jarvis shakes his head. “Hearts are tricky little things. Sometimes a rhythm just goes a little wonky. Try to do something too strenuous when it’s already having a hard time, and that’s the end of you. Dr. Palmer will find all the signs of a fatal ventricle arrhythmia. A fairly common end for middle aged men who are that overweight.”

Tim nods at that, too. Jarvis looks at him, smiles briefly, letting Tim know there’s another man who’s likely going to have a very similar end soon, and then turns toward the door before saying, “Anything else, McGee?”

“The bill you say passed, how good are those defenses?”

“Good enough.”

Tim scoffs. He’s seen who Clemens recruited from prison. “According to Abbi and Fornell, a good third of those guys we just put back in prison are hackers. They’ve all got the idea now. At least some of them will try. I’d rest easier if something had gone through about making sure laws actually got read.”

Jarvis smiles his viper smile. “70,000 page long bills are a feature, not a bug, Tim. They are intentionally designed to be unreadable. That way, when certain issues arise, they can be quietly amended without the messy work of repealing bills or taking laws all the way through the Supreme Court.”

Tim winces.

Jarvis inclines his head. “Clemens isn’t the first man to notice that design feature. He is the first one who wasn’t somehow attached to Congress or the Senate. It’s a job perk, McGee. Benefit you and yours, and make a deal flow more smoothly. There’s a reason why the line item veto has died every time it’s been brought up. Every President knows that this is how the game is played; he’d like the ability to kill the other side’s perks. They will not give him the power to strike their teams perks. And he won’t go public with it and give up the power for his side to write their own perks in.”

Tim shakes his head, feeling… like he wants to be disgusted and shocked, but isn’t. After the last few months, he’s got no faith in the idea that anyone he doesn’t personally know isn’t screwing everyone else right left and all over the place. But, there’s still more than 500 people and all of their staffs. Someone should have said something, right? “I’d figure someone would have made a fuss over that.”

Jarvis turns back to him, looking a bit exasperated at how innocent Tim’s being. “It’s not in the ‘Welcome to Congress’ handbook. The only people let in on this are either around long enough to be trusted, or test the theory out on their own and find it works. Either way, they don’t talk.”

“So, you’re saying that if anyone tries the exact same ploy that Clemens used, literally walk into the building and log in as a congressman, and they’ll be able to do the same thing.”

Jarvis smiles a bit. “They’re going to have a much more difficult time walking in, and a much more difficult time getting in from the outside.”

Tim sighs. “That’s something, I suppose.”

“The vetting process for anyone who works in a Federal office building just got a lot more
“So, only the politically well connected will be able to screw the system with impunity?”

Jarvis nods, smiles, and heads out.

Tim wonders why Jarvis tells him things like that. He’s not sure if Jarvis is hoping he’s the man who might do something about it, or if he’s trying to turn him into a politician, the kind of man who looks the other way when it happens.

“Was that Jarvis I saw heading out?” Jimmy asks a minute later, standing there with a collection of ice packs.

“Yeah. He was checking in to see if everything was done.”

Jimmy points to Tim’s chair, and gets his arm propped up at his desk, putting ice packs on his wrist, arm, and shoulder. “Better?”

“Probably.”

Tim nods at the door, and Jimmy heads over to shut it. When he comes back, Tim says quietly, “Do you think it hurt?”

“Tim?”

“Supposedly you’ll find out he had ventricle fibrillations that killed him. Does that hurt?”

Jimmy shrugs. “Not sure. Some people report it feel like a worm jumping around in their chest. Some say it feels like a sledge hammer to the chest. Or a bad cramp to the chest and arm.”

Tim nods. He wonders how it’ll feel to the Admiral. Jimmy’s not quite following for a second, and then he is.

Tim’s got the blinds on his windows closed. Jimmy steps closer, kneeling in front of Tim, his hand on Tim’s left, finger gently tracing over his palm. “Do bullets hurt?”

“Only if you don’t do the job right. Kate didn’t hurt. She was gone before she hit the ground.” He squeezes Jimmy’s hand in his. “If it’s up to you, aim for the head.”

“You want him to go fast?”

“I don’t want there to be any shot of him getting back up again.”

Jimmy nods. Tim squeezes his hand, and gives him a quick kiss. Jimmy nods and stands up. “Better get back, before Allan starts wondering if I got lost.”

Tim smirks at that.

“You sticking around?”

“Yeah. It should look like I was here for more than seeing Clemens off. So, I’ll go through my stuff, head home early.”

“Don’t forget the eye doc.”

“Thanks. Maybe next time you see me, I’ll have glasses.”

Jimmy smiles at that, shaking his head, unlike Tim he knows that the magic glasses fairy does not produce them in minutes, and heads off.

It’s not been an exhaustive search. Thorough enough to know that as of right now, everyone at Hellerson’s looks okay. No one’s paying for a mortgage that costs more than his entire paycheck, for example.

Tim stretches and gets up, foot and hand twinging as he shifts. Yeah, moving literal dead weight wasn’t a great plan.

He’s been trying to be careful about not going straight through, hours on end, staring at his computer. Try to ease the eye strain a little. So, time to get up, move around some, and decide if he’s going to just power on through, or try to get home, grab a nap, and then head to the eye doc.

He ambles over to the snack station, looking at the cookies, thinking about them for a moment and then shaking his head and getting himself another decaf coffee.

It’s almost two, so he decides to go check in with Jimmy, see if he’s got Clemens wrapped up.

Another slow mosey, and he’s in Autopsy. “Director McGee?” Allan asks as he heads in. Tim notices that he and Jimmy are wearing extra protective garb, and Tim decides to stay back.

“Just wanted to check in and see how it’s going. Everything okay?”

“About like usual, just heavier,” Jimmy replies. “Got a question for you, did anyone attempt CPR on Clemens?”

Tim shakes his head. “He’d already wet himself when we got there. Skin was cool. Wasn’t breathing. I said he was dead and began securing the space.”

“Good,” Allan replies.

“Good why?” Tim asks.

“I got the list of medications he was on. Assuming he was taking it properly, it shouldn’t have been a problem, but Clemens was HIV positive,” Jimmy adds.

Tim winces, and wonders if that’s why a sniper didn’t get called in. Then he wonders how Jarvis could have known something like that. He decides he doesn’t need to know. Probably another ‘perk of the job.’

“Once the lab runs his blood, we’ll know if he was managing his condition well,” Allan says.
“And if you guys have to keep up the hazmat routine?” Tim asks.

“Exactly.” Jimmy says. “The anti-retroviral treatments are good enough that, if he was using them properly, he shouldn’t have any of the virus in his bloodstream.”

“Cause of death?”

“Same as with the viral load, waiting on the lab to run his blood, and right now, no one is on,” Jimmy reports.

“Really? I thought Abby made sure someone was always on.”

“Zelaz called out sick. So, bright and early, I’ve got goodies waiting for Abby.”

“She’ll be thrilled. Want me to take them up?”

“Uh… Don’t you have work to do?” Jimmy asks.

Tim smiles a little. He’s not feeling smiley right now, but it’s not a deadpan line, either. “My doctor told me I should let my eyes rest and not spend hours and hours staring at the screen. I’m taking his advice and getting a break.”

Jimmy nods to Allan, who grabs the test tubes, places them in the evidence bag, and signs them over to Tim.

From there, Tim heads to the lab, and as promised, it’s silent. Technically, he’s not supposed to have a key to it, but he does. He unlocks and lets himself in. Quiet, dim, the glow of many indicator lights and the fridge and freezer make sure the lab isn’t completely dark.

And even if it was, he’s spent more than enough time in here to navigate by feel alone.

He deposits the blood, signs off on them, and gets ready to head back to his office. Somehow he doesn’t start moving immediately. He stands there, in the cool, dim light, thinking of a lot of good, and some bad, memories down here.

Then he takes two steps over to what used to be ‘his’ lab computer. The black hearts are gone from the keyboard, and the mouse is on the wrong side. (Everyone up here is a righty, now.) His fingers ghost over the keyboard, but it’s not the same. Not on his own. Not in this space that’s larger and filled with physical reminders (he’s looking at a shot of Corwin’s kids) that this isn’t “their” space anymore.

Tim sighs. He flicks on the computer, and checks Khan’s BOLO. Nothing. That’s his next big job. Once the intranet is secure, it’s time to hunt him down again. Only took him four months the first time, three years the second, and God alone knows this time.

He turns off, logs out, and locks up.
Tim heads back to his office, sipping his coffee, walking past the sofa… That’s an option, set level two of his background checking of the Hellerson’s employees into action, go crash on the sofa, nap until he’s got to get up for the appointment, and hope that he’s awake enough to actually see what that new bed can do tonight.

That’s sounding like a decent plan. He’s feeling rather pleased with it as he turns into the doorway of his office and hears, “This is a nice setup.”

Tim jerks and rubs his eyes again. Of all the places they could find Khan, sitting behind his desk, at his computer, at 03:30 in the morning, wasn’t on the list. (He makes a mental note to extend BOLOS to the security staff at Federal buildings.)

Tim sits down in the visitor’s chair of his own office, and says, “They’ll let just anyone in here, won’t they?”

Khan shrugs. “I’m not afraid to admit that when I see a good trick, I use it. And Harvey had some great tricks.” He keeps looking at Tim, and Tim’s fairly sure he’s been studying his office to get to know him better, too. “You were right; I do know you.”

Tim nods. “Yeah. Saw that in your message. How’d you find out?”

“Harvey told me how much of the system you’d killed, and told me to make it work again.” Khan smiles a bit. “I did, and a little googling besides. It’s on your CV that you’re a Beaver, class of ’01.”

“You would have been 2000, right?”

Khan nods. “Until a group of assholes in the Forensic Computing department found me. It’s also in your CV that you’ve got a degree in Forensic Computing. And a commendation from MIT for leading the team that caught me.”

Tim smiles.

“So, we’ve been dancing our whole careers?”

Tim smiles a little more at that.

“Guess what, Tim, dance stops here.”

Tim’s amused. “Think so, Ajay?”

Khan smiles, leans forward, and slides a thumb drive toward Tim. “Yeah, I do.”

Tim stares at it for a second, and then Khan stands up to let him access his computer. He grabs Deep Six, and heads over to the chair Tim just vacated. He pulls the other one across from it, and slouches down, feet up in front of him, and gets ready to start reading.

“Comfy?”

“Yeah. So, you’re a bestselling novelist, too? Think I’ll like this?” He holds up the book.

Tim inclines his head. “A lot of people do.” He touches the thumb drive with his index finger. “I take it you think this’ll take a while?”

“It’s three gigs of data. The highlights alone should take an hour. Though, once you get to the first one, you’ll be busy for a bit. No problem. I can wait.”
Tim plugs it in, glances up at Khan, who of course, encrypted whatever this is. He smiles briefly at Tim and then gets reading, and Tim goes to breaking into the thumb drive.

Only takes ten minutes. Khan’s annoying him, not trying to keep him out, and once he’s in, and reading the first bit, he feels his breath catch. “Shit.” Now he knows, at least, he thinks he knows what Clemens was really asking when he asked how Tim’s family was.

Khan looks up, his voice sounding mock disappointed. “Exactly. It’s distressingly true that there really is no honor among thieves. So, bomb squad, is that your first call?”

Tim’s nodding as he pulls his phone. Fornell’s got the best guys for that, so he gets the ring. “All five floors were wired to blow.”

“McGee?” Fornell sounds mired in sleep, and Tim doesn’t blame him, but he need Fornell awake, fast.

“I’m staring at the blueprints for Clemens’ building, and he’s got all of the main ventilation shafts stuffed with shape charges.”

That does the trick. Fornell’s awake now. “Shit! I’m on it.”

“Good. Is everyone still evacced out?”

“No, we let them in again this morning. SHIT! I’m supposed to be off today!”

Tim can sympathize. It’s Wednesday. The wedding is Saturday. Tobias probably does have a ton of stuff completely unrelated to crime and nastiness that he’s supposed to be doing right now. “Yeah, I know. Talk to Jimmy about it; he’ll commiserate. We’ll do everything we can to get you to your wedding.”

That gets Khan’s attention. “Who’s getting married, not Silent Sam? Movieboy? Him and the Hot Israeli, right?”

Tim glares at Khan.

“Yeah, yeah, yeah. Wendy’s a saint for putting up with me,” Fornell gripes.

“Yes, she is. But you know how fate works, it wants to see Jethro give a speech more than screwing your wedding.”

Fornell laughs a bit, but it’s grim sounding. “I’ll let you know what we find.” Then there’s just a dial tone in Tim’s ear.

Tim looks over to Khan. “I take it that was supposed to go off while the building was full of cops?”

Khan smiles at him. “What, no thank you for saving your life?”

Tim shakes his head. “Not in the field any longer. I watched the raid from here. But thank you very much for saving your own life.”

Khan smiles at that, too. “Saving your buddies, then. The moment he left, I left, too. The rest of those twits were happily buying the BS about being bulletproof. Not me. Someone looks at me like that, and I know there’s trouble. And I found it. And I took care of it.”

“Then why didn’t you stay?” Tim asks. “Didn’t want to show off your brand new Citizen of Clementine badge?”
Khan shakes his head. “You’re not letting anyone walk. The lawyers will wet their pants laughing at those laws. That’s why I got out before you guys got in. As for the bomb, sure, I thought I had it disabled, but I wasn’t going to bet my own skin on the idea that I didn’t miss anything.” Left unsaid is how, if the bombs had gone off, Khan would have never turned up again. He’d have just vanished, and they would assume he was dead. He’s here now, because he was good enough to kill the trigger. He’s here now, because he wants something.

“The only thing Harvey hated more than cops was other criminals. Prison fucked him up, big time,” Khan adds.

“Tends to happen when you go down for something you didn’t do.”

“That’s not the half of it.”

Tim looks disturbed. “Khan?”

“Just keep reading.” This time the smile on Khan’s face is hard. He doesn’t enjoy that bit of the story.

This thing, if it ever got out, is a nightmare. It details everything. The whole plan, how Clemens did it, step by step instructions for anyone else who wanted to it, along with a good dozen other things they didn’t catch him at. (Like, for example, how when he got the message from Kevin that Tim had pulled the worm out of the NCIS code, he’d just strolled on in in his Janitor’s uniform, with his spiffy ID, swept some floors, cleaned everything up, and plopped a bug… Tim gets up, slips his finger under his door, and there it is, tiny little bug, grabbing everything that happened in his office and the Dungeon. And there’s supposedly three more lurking around the office.)

It’s the perfect recipe for how to break down the system. It’s Fight Club, but done by someone who actually knew how a computer and the legal system works.

And then it got worse. Maybe not worse. Worse from a PR standard.

Clemens funded his work through money laundering, selling data, and smuggling. He even listed all of his accounts and clients which, given they’d erased his immunity laws, made things easier to deal with. Tim’ll be forwarding that on, and a very large group of people are going to be spending a decent chunk of time in prison, very soon.

But the hundreds of millions of dollars stolen from the government, all of that he’d given to charities. A lot of HIV/AIDS stuff, but also post-prison rehab charities, sentencing reform crusades, cancer centers, four separate scholarships for doctor and nurse training, hospitals all over the world. Tim rubs his eyes at that. There’s a fifteen page long list of names of people on Indiegogo and the like who’s medical bills he paid for. He sighs, there are thousands of people who owed their life to the money Clemens stole.

And then it gets worse. There’s the twenty page rant, with back up documentation, of how he was wrongfully arrested, how he was abused in prison, by the guards and other prisoners, (why the guards died in prison or were shot isn’t a mystery to Tim, not anymore) how he went in a nineteen-year-old virgin and left HIV positive.

“Awful story,” Khan says when Tim’s looking away from the screen, staring at his wall. “Anyway, as I mentioned before about honor and thieves, those bombs, and his manifesto were supposed to go off at the same time. If you keep reading, you’ll see the bits where he’s talking about how ‘they’ll kill me to keep me quiet.’ I’ll admit, I thought he was crazy with that. But, boom, down he goes on the back stairs. I waited an hour to see if anyone would come before calling the front desk and telling them there was a body on the back steps. He had you dead to rights.”

Tim keeps his face blank, though he wonders where Khan was that he saw Clemens go down.

“I did some digging in a few online law libraries today. Looks like some bits of the law that were there yesterday have all vanished. Like those laws never existed. I bet the rest of the guys sitting in his apartments were really surprised to see that.” Khan smirks. “Aren’t you one of the white hats? Aren’t you supposed to obey the law, not rewrite the damn thing to suit yourself, let alone kill inconvenient people? How are you going to sleep tonight, Tim?” Khan’s enjoying this way too much.

“Naked, in a huge bed, with two beautiful women wrapped around me,” Tim says, deadpan.

Khan laughs, and then smirks, sure it’s a joke. “Well, good for you. Beautiful women will cure most of what ails you, and right now, you’re looking a little mopy. I hope to find a few myself, soon.”

Tim’s tired of this. “What do you want?”

“A lot of things, but from you, I’ll settle for one. NCIS, in its raid on whatever it is you’re claiming those apartments were, found Ajay Khan dead. I certainly would have been if I hadn’t decided to do a bit of snooping on Wallbanger’s computer.”

“Speaking of honor and thieves.”

Khan shakes his head. “Mercenary, not a thief. I deliver what I’m paid for.”

“So what got you snooping?”

“Like I said, mercenary. Mercenaries, when they get too expensive, are expendable. So, when Wallbanger shows up claiming to be you, slinging his BS about having changed the law, I know I’ve gone from the useful side of the equation to the too expensive side. Which means, I shut up, do what I’m told, gratefully, and look for how to save my own ass.”

Tim smirks at that. Khan certainly read that situation correctly. “And you want a deal with me?”

“No” Khan shakes his head. “That would indicate we’re negotiating. I’m telling you what you’re going to give me.”

Tim’s eyes narrow. “You think after what happened to Jim Hunt I’ll give you anything?”

Khan taps the book in his hand. “Interesting things, words. You’re not a bad writer, especially for a tech guy. Most of us can’t build a sentence to save our lives, you know?”

Tim’s not amused.

“What happened to Jim Hunt.’ Passive construction. Not, what I did to Jim Hunt, because you know I didn’t do anything, personally, to him.”

“You killed MTAC when he was in the field.”

Khan waves that off. “And they killed him, I know. I also know that I was in prison for a lot of things, but murder, attempted murder, accessory to murder, manslaughter, and all of those variations aren’t on the list. And you know why. I can see it in how you’re watching me. Your man got sent where he didn’t belong, without the backup he needed. He wasn’t trained for that job, he didn’t know how to do it properly, and a power surge, an EMP, hell, if the guys he was working with had thought to bring a jammer, he was screwed. I just happened to hack you guys at the wrong time for him. And the only reason I could hack you guys was that your C-team had written your defenses. His death isn’t on me.”

There’s enough truth to that statement that it burns. Jenner didn’t make sure his guys were ready for field ops, and Hunt didn’t have the backup he needed to get in and out clean. He didn’t have the personality to lie his way out, either. And as for the C-team crack. Well, Hunt wasn’t even in the ground before Tim started rewriting the security wall around NCIS.

“Still not seeing why I give you anything. You just watched what happened to Clemens, so you know I’m not quite the sweet-innocent white-hat you thought I was. I can stick you in a hole, and we’ll keep ‘looking for you’ forever.” And right now, that’s sounding really appealing to Tim.

Khan smiles at that, too. “And I’m not stupid. Like I said, I’m a mercenary, I know exactly how much I’m worth. I’m worth the information on that drive. If I don’t access that information every six hours, and tell it to go to sleep for another six, every single news organization with an email account will get it. And right now, with Wallbanger barely cold in your morgue, that’ll be a hell of a story.”

Tim eyes close and he inhales deep. He knows when someone’s got him by the balls, and Khan’s got him. He’s been here, with Tim, for three hours, and god knows how long before that. He’s got to go soon, or this gets out.

“If I let you go, what happens?”

Khan smiles. “I’m gone. Like I said, we’re done. No more dancing for us. I’m getting the hell out of anywhere you’ve got jurisdiction.”

“I’ve got jurisdiction worldwide.”

“Uh huh.” Khan’s not impressed. “Yeah, there’s a huge US Navy presence in Paraguay. But, maybe I’ll aim for somewhere a bit more upscale. Switzerland is nice. Bit cold, but I’ll live. Not hard to find landlocked countries.”

“Navy and Marines.”

Khan rolls his eyes. “You worry about getting me out of here in time. I’ll worry about finding a place for myself.”

“I’ll figure out how you’re doing it, block your ability to get that information out,” Tim says.

“Oh yeah, I know. You can do it. Hell, if he’d been paying attention and not cackling about destroying the system, Wallbanger could have done it. But not in time.” Now Khan’s smiling, and if Clemens had had a glint of madness in his eyes, Khan is cold and sure of himself. He knows he’s got Tim, too. “See, unlike last time, even if you do hold a gun to my head on this one, I’m not going to tell. You can’t hurt me enough to get it out of me, not in time, and if you kill me, it goes live. You are well and truly fucked, Tim.”

Tim glares at him. That matches his own assessment of the situation much too closely for comfort. “I let you walk out of here, how do I know you’ll be the honorable thief and not go back on your word?”

“Mercenary, not thief. And not stupid either. I’ve been caught twice. You were behind both of them. I know retirement time when I see it. And lucky for me, Wallbanger wasn’t nearly careful enough in protecting his own computer systems, so my nest egg just got a hell of a lot bigger.” Khan looks happy about that. “I head out of here, and for six weeks I’ll keep running my six hour clock. And then after six weeks, all of this information ends up nice and safe in your lap.”

“Why six weeks?”

“In six weeks, I’ll be so far beyond gone, no one will ever find me again.”

“Yeah, and a year from now, all of this will come spilling out.”

“You don’t get it. A year from now, it won’t matter. Today this comes out, and it’ll ruin you, your buddies, and break the entire system. Wallbanger’s just as dead as he said he would be. He’s got proof of what he did and how he did it out there, and your defenses aren’t ready. Every news organization in the US will be out there, and you’ll be testifying in front of Congress before you can blink, while every hacker on earth worth his salt will come up against you. And you and I both know you can’t build your defenses fast enough to win the battle.

“A month from now, it’ll be an unnerving footnote to a creepy case, but almost no one will notice.

“A year from now it’s a conspiracy theorist’s wet dream, but that’s all it is. Clock’s ticking down, Tim, am I walking out, or not?”

Tim shakes his head. “I’ll walk you out.”

Khan shakes his head, too. “The last guy you walked out is in your morgue. I only want to end up there on a report.”

Tim inclines his head, and lets Khan go.

So much for getting a nap before going to the eye doctor’s. Tim’s awake now. He scrolls up to the beginning of the list of Clemens clients, and starts taking notes. He’s not sure who’s getting this report. Leon, Jarvis… Fornell and Abbi… head of the CIA should know… er… He’s not certain, but he thinks the fourth name down is the Assistant Director of the CIA.

He recognizes some of the clients. Fornell’s going to be having a great time with this. He’s been hunting out Mafia moles for decades, and finding out that they gave up having men on the inside and have opted for software will make his job easier. Every drug cartel is on the list. More governments than he’d like to admit, friendly and hostile alike. Abbi’s ex-boss is on the list. Well, that also explains more of how their data got out.

He flashes a text to Diane, not expecting a response anytime soon. He knows she’s mentioned the name of her boss at the IRS, and he thinks he’s looking at his name, but he’s not sure about that.

He’s ten minutes into that when he has to stop.

He wonders if he’s got that look that Jake had. That punched in the guts seeing how bad it really is look. He’s not a child, and he’s not innocent, but he can’t feel like this was any sort of a win. Maybe tomorrow he will. Maybe some sleep and distance will help. But, as he thinks about this, thinks about Tony’s case with the pediatrician, thinks about what Abbi got into, why Bishop left NSA…
There are no rules. The law is, apparently, designed not to apply to certain people. He’s got a gray, disillusioned feeling, fairly sure that anyone on this list on the “right” side of the law is going to walk. Going to claim they were running a sting, or pull out a warrant showing they had a right to use this information to keep tabs on each other, or something.

He’s not sure what’s worse, that they’re on the list, or that Jarvis just told him that they’re supposed to be able to get on lists like this and get away clean. Hell, Jarvis probably has fifty guys right now busily re-writing laws right and left, making sure that all the right guys have the right protections in place.

He closes his eyes and rubs his temples.

He’s never been a huge ‘Law’ guy. Can’t work with Gibbs and be a stickler for “The Law.” You’ll burn out the first week where he’s cutting corners and skipping the protections that the accused get.

But he had believed in justice, and trying to be the man who works for that. Is anything they did today, yesterday justice?

He’s not sure. The prison guards that Clemens killed, they were all crooked. All on the take. Three of them had personally assaulted him. Tim knows all about wanting to kill the man who hurts you. Knows all about being powerless for no good reason, left to the mercy of people who didn’t want any good for you.

The cop Clemens killed framed him and put him away to make a bust. He didn’t care about law either. His gut said that someone was guilty, and he didn’t care who he had to crush to get his conviction.

It’s not comfortable looking too long into the dark mirror. Seeing versions of yourself, your co-workers, unconstrained by… he’s not sure. Inherent goodness? He laughs at that a little. Maybe. Maybe not. Gibbs didn’t used to care if he went home or not at the end of the day. That’s probably why he never framed anyone, he’s just kill them, and if it came back on him, it came back on him, and that was that.

Thin thread to base a moral code on.

Tim knows there’s more than that, but he wonders what he would have done if Gibbs hadn’t had that code. Tony had to leave Baltimore, because he had the guts to turn in his co-workers who were crooked. Tim’s not sure how he would have behaved if Gibbs had been truly ruthless.

No, he does know. Twenty-four-year-old desperate for approval McGee, he knows. He still knows. “Isn’t that illegal?” “Technically I’m not doing this and you aren’t seeing me do it.” How many variations of that has he said over the years?

How far would he have gone?

And now… Khan may not have killed Jim personally, but he’s not just a bundle of sunshine and puppies. He’s a dangerous man with dangerous skills. Dangerous man who saved his friend, his stepmom, and he supposes, in this family he’s collected, Fornell’s that crotchety uncle who shows up at family gatherings from time to time.

At least, he’s claiming to have saved… Tim glances at the thumb drive and grabs his phone.

“Fornell?”

“Kind of busy here, McGee.”
“So it really is wired to blow?”

“Wait, you didn’t make sure it was a real threat before dragging me out of bed?”

Tim rubs his eyes again. “Reliable source, just overthinking it.”

“Go to sleep, McGee.”

“Yeah, I should.”

Maybe he’s not a white hat. More than enough gray’s rubbed off on him over the years, but he’s not completely ruthless, either.

He thinks about how Jarvis would have handled Khan’s threat. And he thinks about how he will. Jarvis would have eyes on Khan, find where he’s gone, figure out when and how he’s telling that information not to get out, and then have him quietly killed.

Tim minimizes the window with Clemens’ manifesto on it, and gets to work.

He’s still feeling pretty gray as he makes one last stop before heading off to get his eyes checked. Up the stairs, and another flight of stairs, and one more, and then the elevator. He’s not back to all stairs all the time, but three flights is better than he was four months ago.

Leon’s just getting in as he’s getting ready to go. Tim hands the flash drive over to Leon. “Destroy it after you read it.”

Leon raises an eyebrow at him.

“Clemens wasn’t just a criminal. He had a whole manifesto right here.”

“What’s in it?” Leon asks.

“Among other things, him saying that ‘they’ll kill him’ because a man like him is ‘too dangerous to exist.’” Leon winces at that, well aware of where Clemens is and how he got there. Tim nods and continues, “It’s got the whole scheme, along with proof, of everything he’d done, and how anyone else with a computer and balls could do it, and two dozen other things, as well.”

“Shit.”

Tim nods. “We… I guess ‘lucked out’ is the best way to put it. I had to make a deal with a small devil to make sure this didn’t hit every media outlet with an internet connection.”

“That small devil, Ajay Khan?”

“Yeah. Jimmy’s doctoring the paperwork as we speak. I’ve got his prints, face, and DNA flagged. He gets on anyone’s radar and they go searching for him, they’ll come up blank, and we’ll grab him.”

“Think he’ll stay quiet?”

Tim shrugs. The ruthless man assumes the answer is no, and destroys the target. That’s not who Tim wants to be. “I think in six weeks, I should start to quietly go hunting for him.”

“What happens in six weeks?”

“We get the original data file with all of that on it.”

“Does he know you’re going to hunt him?” Leon asks.

“I imagine he hopes I won’t, but expects I will.”

“Are you going to find him?” Leon’s understanding there’s more to this than he knows.

“Yes.”

“And then what?”

Tim shrugs again. “That building was wired to blow, and he was out of it when it would have gone up. He could have just let it go, let the manifesto go live, too. Burn us all. Kill Tony and Fornell and Abbi. If the manifesto went live while Clemens was in custody, we’d have had to go to trial, had to find something to try him with, had to deal with the whole mess in public…” Tim sighs. “Is that worth a pass?”

Leon shrugs. “I won’t order you to recapture him.”

“Thanks, Leon.”
Time Keeps Moving

Chapter Notes

And we're backtracking to Gibbs starting to use the computer for Tim.

The computer thing isn’t as bad as it could be.

Yes, it’s slow. Gibbs rolls his eyes and continues carefully typing. He’s slow. Fact of the matter is, he’s a bad typist. He just never really learned how to type, not the way Tim or Abby or Jimmy does with nine fingers and looking at something other than the keyboard.

He needs to see the keys, and he uses about four fingers, and he’s slow.

He’s got really nice penmanship. When he was coming up, all paperwork got filled out by hand, and it had to be legible or it was useless. So, unlike his kids who can type a million words a minute, he has neat, legible, functional cursive and printing skills. His signature is made up of actual legible letters, not just a wiggly sprawl.

And none of that matters anymore because nothing is done with a pen.

Hell, these days even Tony can type.

That said, it is really, absurdly, satisfying to see the little lists all pop up after he asks for them. And it’s nicely challenging to think up new queries. (At least, it’s better than staring at his pad of paper at home, staring at his pen, trying to think of his best man’s speech.) Tomorrow, or whenever, they’ll start putting the searches together. Today he’s looking through and finding the data from each computer.

“Tomorrow, say I’ve got all the dates done, then what?” he asks Abby, who’s writing up her own report. Gibbs would have to admit, he kind of misses the music. With the other techs working down here, now, there’s no more ear blasting music. Abby’s got earbuds in, and he can catch a faint hint of what she’s listening to, but it’s not the chest pounding thud that makes him feel at home down here.

“We put them in order, which’ll give us a timeline, and we’ll start to see overlap, which will be good. It should also give us some hints as to what we don’t have. Once you’ve got what’s going on in the winter on the NSA and Homeland computers, that should be a hint as to what we’re missing on the FBI computer.”

Gibbs nods at that. “I’m pulling names off of the case files right now. When I move onto the NSA and Homeland computers, I’ll add them in, see what comes up?”

“Yep. Detectives, suspects, and on and on…” Abby shrugs a bit. “For all we know this might be about one informant or something.”

Gibbs looks at the computer. Problem with a computer is that it doesn’t know what’s hiding in there, so it can’t show him by trying to hide it. His “gut,” all those years of honing a razor sharp BS detector, is useless for this. Still, he’s leaning toward ‘or something’ rather than ‘informant.’

“You might want to do the email search before looking for names. Find cases where they’re talking to each other, and then go looking through casefiles for names,” Abby suggest.

Gibbs writes that down, it’s not a bad suggestion.

Then he turns on the next computer, grabs a new thumb drive, and begins building a new matrix.

Fornell’s done. He’s known it for a while. (That’s when he filed the paperwork for his retirement.) But he’s really feeling it today.

Today, he should be having a great day. He, DiNozzo, and Borin just led a raid that re-captured fifty felons without even having to break a sweat. No one died. No one got hurt. Right now, while they all think everything they’ve done is legal, they’re happily singing away about what they were doing for, “Collins,” “Wallbanger,” “Beam,” “Daniels,” “Walker,” apparently Clemens went to the local ABC store and just grabbed the name of any alcohol that was even vaguely appropriate, and made up some IDs for himself.

Fornell’s sitting back, just keeping an eye on… Hell, he’s not even sure who’s doing this interview. Anyone even remotely competent is up here right now, happily working on their interrogation techniques as these sad sacks with their Clementine Citizehships (and in some cases their lawyers) are patting themselves on the back with how incredibly clever they all are.

The only reason Fornell’s hanging around is that every single time they’ve handed over a computer with a link to the internet and told them to go find the laws in question, it’s been really, really fun to see the guys’ faces go bone white and their eyes bug out of their heads as they realize they’re going back to prison.

This one’s a money launderer. The technical aspects of what he’s explaining are beyond Fornell. (Though he supposes Diane would appreciate this.) He’s been offered a lawyer, but hasn’t taken one, sure he’s bulletproof. But, in that he’s offering a very detailed account of moving money between the man he called “Johnny Walker,” who “worked for the CIA,” and two Colombian drug cartels, and he’s got account numbers, off-shore shell corporations, tax havens in three countries, Fornell’s feeling like this is time well spent.

Or he would be. He should be. But he’s not, not really. He wants to be home, with his soon to be wife, spending time with her, getting ready for their wedding, and then (he smiles at the thought) their honeymoon.

And that’s true because he’s done. He’s paid all the dues he or anyone should have to pay. He’s earned his right to sleep soundly at night, knowing he’s made the world a better place, and now, he’s done.

When this interrogation wraps up, with… he checks the file, Jeff Heller, requesting a few hundred lawyers while sputtering about how he checked and those laws were right there yesterday, Fornell heads out.

He pulls his phone out of his pocket. “Hey.”

“Hi!” Wendy’s voice is gentle and warm on the other line, a little surprised to hear him right now in the middle of the day.

“I can’t wait to get home.”

“Good, because I’d like to see you soon. Don’t like waking up to an empty bed.”

“I know. Didn’t want to leave, either.”

“Home for dinner?”

“Earlier. It’s almost noon, I’ve been on thirteen hours. None of these guys need me hovering over their shoulders. They’re not even breaking the suspects, just poking them gently and everything comes spewing out.”

Wendy laughs at that. “I haven’t had lunch yet. Meet me at Red’s?”

“That sounds great.”

Fornell hangs up, packs up his stuff, and heads to his car. There was a time when he never left a case until it was done. He’s sleep and eat at his desk, grab a fast shower in the gym, and back he’d go. Now, he’s perking up, moving faster, spring going back into his step as he gets closer to home and further from work.

His official retirement day is May 1st. That’s a hair over seven months. He’s got close to three months of vacation time, too. He’d been thinking about holding them until after he retires and cashing them out, but…

He’s got money, not tons but enough. He wants time at home, with his wife. Tomorrow, he and HR are going to have a little chat about rearranging things some.

He’s been up since… Gibbs checks the clock, yeah, he’s been on for the last 30 hours straight. Gibbs is tired. His typing speed has gone from slow to glacial and error filled. The third time he sets a search and nothing happens, because he didn’t actually hit the enter key, he’s done.

Abby must have noticed him growling at the computer (and his fingers) because he feels her hands on his shoulders.

“Come on, let’s get you home.”

He growls at that, too. She’s not going to let him drive himself home, not this tired and with pain meds in his system, so someone else has to stop working to get him from point A to point B.

He narrows his eyes and shakes his head a bit.

“Don’t worry, I’m not quitting because you are. Leon’s been on since 1:00. He’s heading home to crash before tonight, too. I sent him a text asking if he’d give you a lift.”

Gibbs sighs and nods at that. “Okay.” He saves his work. Twice. (Just making sure he got it right the first time. Plus he wouldn’t put it past that infernal machine to eat his work for kicks.) And then gets up, gets hugged by Abby, and heads off in search of Leon.
He keeps eyeing Leon as they drive back to his place. Whatever it is that’s going to happen to Clemens, he’s not in on. Just like Tim, he saw Jarvis show up, but last time that happened, Vance picked him as the guy to take care of the problem.

And he’s not that guy anymore.

Too old, too tired, too wounded. He doesn’t even want to think too hard about how much it would hurt to try and lie on his stomach propped up on his elbows right now. His back screams at just the idea of it. He’d do it if he had to, but he doesn’t.

Leon’s used to all of Jethro’s flavors of quiet, and this one doesn’t feel good.

“You okay?”

Gibbs shrugs. “Tim gonna be okay?” He caught Tim mentioning he was going to walk Clemens out, and wondered about that, but Tim seemed okay, and he didn’t want to upset Abby… He’s not feeling anything on it, but checking is always good.

Leon nods. “Yeah. Jarvis has this. He’s doing a bit of research, and then he’ll take care of it. It won’t splash back on us, and McGee’ll be fine. I’m not risking the guy who broke this open just to take out one bad guy.”

“You sure?”

Leon nods.

Gibbs nods back.

They drive a few more miles. “Makes you feel old, doesn’t it?” Leon asks. “Makes me feel old. Hijacked the law.” Leon shakes his head. “He got them passed. Nothing he did was illegal.”

“Gives you a headache just thinking about it.”

Leon nods. “Murder rate’s down. Theft, assault, all of the old usals, besides rape, are all down. Now it’s terrorism and computers. I keep saying I’m staying on for another ten years, but I’m not sure how useful I’m even going to be for another five.”

Gibbs nods at that. They’ll always need someone like him for dealing with the old crimes, but… you can’t intimidate a computer. You can’t trick it. You can’t ask it a leading question. You have to speak its language and know how to read what it’s telling you and then ask exactly the right question, or you get nothing.

“Given what we’re getting into, I’m not even sure if I want to be here for another five.” Leon shakes his head. “No. Pretend I didn’t say that. That’s tired talking. The fight’s not done, and we keep going until it is.”

“Fight’s never going to be done.”

Leon smiles a bit at that.

When Gibbs gets home, he sees a box waiting for him on the front porch. He smiles at that. He’s been waiting for it. The world might change, and his place in it may shift, but some things hold true.

Wood is wood is wood. The feel of it under his hands, shaping to his will, that’s real.

It’s his mini-lathe.

He picks it up, heads inside, pats Mona on the head, takes the lathe down to the basement, and rips into it while Mona watches from her doggie bed in the corner.

It doesn’t take long to set it up, takes even less time for him to grab a small piece of scrap, set it in place, and turn it onto the lowest setting, just to get a feel for it.

He sighs with pleasure, this is sweet. It’s got a nice steady motion, and he just kisses the wood with the tip of his chisel, and the wood begins to spiral off in beautiful swirls.

He took a pottery class with Kelly once. Some sort of kids’ art thing. Both of them sitting at the wheel, working together to make a vase for Shannon. It was pretty droopy and lopsided, but they had fun with it. Doing it, he could see how that was something he could have gotten into. Steady motions, hands touching gently, shaping something real out of the ideas in your head. He liked it a lot. He didn’t like how expensive it was to set up a proper studio, and when it came down to it, he’s more a wood man than a clay man.

But this is almost like the best of both of those arts.

He’s not a lathe master, or even close, yet. But when he turns it off, he’s got a nicely swoopy chunk of wood. Might make a decent… He’s not sure. It’s too wide and short for a fork handle. Maybe a drawer pull? Eh… It’s not supposed to be functional in and of itself. It was just a test of concept.

He’s feeling a bit more centered as he heads up to bed. Tired. Very tired. But he knows that the side of the bed that he’s not sleeping on, the one with the pillow he’s snuggling into, has a lot to do with being able to get himself settled so quickly.

He smiles a bit at that, and hopes she’ll want to have dinner tonight. But maybe she’ll just crash. Either way, few more hours, he’ll wrap around her, and sooner or later, he’ll get to hear how her half of this job’s gone.

He slept through dinner. Abbi got home at some point, but he didn’t wake up for it. He really doesn’t bounce back from all day on, no rest time the way he used to.

He grousing about that as they get a shower, and she smiles, (looking tired herself) and pokes him gently, and then says, “No coffee. You haven’t had any caffeine in a month.”

That makes him feel a little better about not being able to run the way he used to.

Then it makes him feel really good about how long he did go. Last time he did thirty hours on without help… He’s never done thirty hours on without help. Even in the Marines they had little ‘pick me up’ pills (he prefers not to think about what might have been in them) to keep them going when they absolutely had to.

“You going in again today?” Abbi asks while they’re dressing.
“Hope so. Go beat on the computers some more.”

She smiling at that.

“What?” He thinks he knows what that smile is, but he wants to hear her say it.

“Even on a computer, you look really happy to be working a case.”

He nods. “Yeah, it feels good.”

“You get done with those, how about you come into work with me and start looking through everything my conspirators were working on. God knows how many cases we need to reopen.”

Gibbs nods at that. “How did the raid on the computers in Boston go?”

“Good.” She tucks her blouse in. “You want breakfast here or at the diner?”

“Diner.”

Gibbs waits, not sure if she’s keeping what she found close, or just switching gears to start working on her hair.

“They had eyes on us, the TSA, the FAA, and Amtrak.”

“What were they smuggling?”

“Both of them claim not to know. They just ‘pull thumb drives out, put new ones in, and then leave them in a locker at the local bus station.”

Gibbs isn’t buying that, at all. “TSA and Amtrak… that sounds like people.”

She nods. “People who can travel openly, but aren’t supposed to. Might be drug mules, but that’s really sophisticated. And Boston’s not a hub for that.”

“Boston harbor to… rail and sky?”

“Some combination of that. I’ve got Manner breaking into the computers.”

“Didn’t Tim pull in his own A-team for that?”

“Manner is my A-team.” They both look a bit unsettled by that. “In his spare time, I’ve got him eyeing the rest of my techs, seeing who’s actually up for the job. From the looks of it, I don’t have anyone who is competent and uncorrupted on staff. Meanwhile Omagi’s sitting on the bus stop, waiting for someone to grab some thumb drives, and then he’s going to follow him back to wherever the thumb drives go next.”

“I’ve got asking one more computer to spew out lists, and then gotta get McGee back, or ask Abby, what I do next with all the lists.”

“Compare them, right?”

“Yeah, but I need to know how to make them do that. Once I’ve got the phrase, I can keep punching it in over and over with different questions.”

Abbi nods.
“First up, email addresses. Let’s see who’s talking to who about what.”

Abbi smiles, that sounds like a good search to her.

By that point they’re both dressed and ready, so diner, breakfast, and off to work.

Tim’s heading out as Jethro’s heading in. And, even from the far side of the parking lot, he can see the black cloud hovering over Tim, so he detours and meets him a few feet from his car.

“You okay?”

Tim shakes his head a bit. “Not great.” He rubs his eyes. He’s been doing that a lot recently, and he looks really tired. “And I’m about to be late for my eye doctor’s appointment. Leon can get you up to date. He knows what’s going on, or if you feel like waiting around, I’ll be back when I can.”

“Want me to give you a lift?”

Tim thinks about that for a second and says, “Sure.” Tim’s being very quiet as he sets up the GPS, and Gibbs starts driving him toward the eye doc.

“Glasses?”

Tim nods. “Jimmy’s guy. Eyes keep going buggy and my head hurts a lot.”

Gibbs remembers those days. Probably about when he got to this age that his close up vision started to go.

Another mile of driving, Tim being quiet.

“How bad is it?” Gibbs asks.

He sighs. “On the surface, it’s everything we could possibly want. It’s fucking Christmas, all wrapped up in a nice and tidy bow.”

Gibbs waits. Tim’s still quiet.

If Tim’s this quiet, he’s got to get it right in his head before he can talk about it, so Gibbs tracks toward problems he can help with. “You eat anything?”

Tim shakes his head. Gibbs nods. “After the doc, we’ll get you fed. Maybe you’ll want to talk then.”

Tim shrugs. Maybe. Maybe by then he’ll have a better idea of why this is hitting him so hard.

Or maybe, after a very quiet appointment, and a more quiet breakfast, Tim’ll still be sitting there, looking gloomy, not really talking. Gibbs gets the actual facts out of him. He learns about Khan’s midnight visit, and how this really is Christmas. Once Tim’s got that information spread to the people who need it, it’s all down to the sweep up. Like what Abbi’s doing.

All over the place.

At every major agency, and with people from all over the world.

Gibbs feels a momentary pang of annoyance when Tim tells him what was on that drive. Not just because Clemens case was handled so badly, but also because it means there’s no reason for him to go back to NCIS and keep going through the computers.

Then Tim suggests that he help with going through the data that Khan dropped on them and that perks Gibbs up. He can do that. One pile of bad guys or another, he can deal. And maybe, if he’s got the base document, he can get a better feel for what he’ll find in Abbi’s mess.

The first hour back in the Lab, Gibbs spends just playing with Khan’s data set. He starts by looking for guys who bought information and laws, and makes a list of them to go over carefully. There’s not a lot of overlap on that, and the ones he does tend to find are people who seem to be keeping an eye on regulatory issues. (Everyone who bought information on the EPA was also buying laws, for example.)

He recognizes some of the names (there is a Scott Benoit on the list, and he’s really hoping that’s not Jeanne’s brother.) but most of the law buyers are ‘legitimate’ business/lobbyist/politicians. He’s guessing that the ones looking for modifications of import regulations are likely importing more than just legal goods, but… Okay, sure, it’s possible that Xavier Jimenez got the amount of Spanish Iberico Jamon de Bellota (Gibbs has to look up what the hell that is, ham apparently) that could be imported into the US doubled so he could sneak something else in, but from what he can tell Iberico Jamon is actually more expensive per ounce than cocaine, so maybe he just wanted to bring in more ham.

There’s a distressing number of… to Gibbs’ mind… godawful stupid crap in this. He shakes his head, (he’s spending almost as much time googling the law exemptions people were buying as he is pulling information out of the data) apparently if he tried to sell any of the little wood toys he makes for the girls, he’d have to get some sort of massive anti-lead testing done, it’d likely run him several hundreds of thousands of dollars, and he’d have to do it every few years. Apparently buying Clemens’ services was a hell of a lot less expensive than that, because four little toy makers banded together and got themselves an exemption.

He sighs and decides to get out of checking out who bought what laws. He keeps reading this, and he’s going to start thinking Clemens might have been the good guy.

Lucky for him, that’s just about the time Tim heads in, still not looking too happy. He spends a few minutes cuddling with Abby, head on her shoulder, petting Sean, and then hands Gibbs a piece of paper with twenty names on it. He signs to Gibbs, Government employees buying the FBI feed. Look into it?

Gibbs smiles. This is good work.

He’s feeling pretty good when he wraps up for the night. He’s tempted to stay on all night, but Abby pokes him out of the lab as she heads off, reminding him that he’s got some stuff he’s got to do at home, and maybe he should get on it.
And she’s right. It’s Wednesday, he’s put it off almost as long as he possibly can.

So, he drives home and gets to work on his best man toast.

The fact of the matter is that Gibbs has been dreading Fornell’s wedding. And no, not because it’ll be the ghost of exes past from hell, with him, Fornell and Diane all in the same room with dates (bride in Fornell’s case.) The case from hell means they’re already doing that on a somewhat more regular basis than he’d like.

And not because he doesn’t wish Fornell well and want all the happiness of a good marriage for him.

It’s that public speaking is only slightly lower on his fun things to do list than get shot. (He rubs his shoulder gently and sighs. Maybe on par with getting shot. Depends where the shot is and how he ended up with it.)

At least, when you get shot, no one expects you to get up and talk about it.

And they especially don’t expect you to be glib and charming about it, let alone funny.

He’s not having nightmares about this, but he’s also still got three nights to go.

Three nights… two technically. He’s taking Fornell, his brothers, and Wendy’s sons out for a bachelor party on Friday night. That’s not nearly as much time as he’d like. Especially if this is going to be good.

He’s thinking about that as he heads into the house. Abbi’s car isn’t in the driveway. With any luck she’ll be home… He gets a text from Abbi, Omagi’s got the next link on her case, so she’s flying up to Boston tonight. So much for home soon. He’s on his own for the evening.

He’s on the back porch, tossing the tennis ball for Mona with his right hand (working on building up his strength and range of motion) with a blank pad of paper on his lap, and a completely blank brain in his head. He’s got nothing to say about this.

What do you say at the second wedding of the guy who’s first wedding was to your pregnant barely ex-wife?

You say nothing about that, because even Tony doesn’t have the delivery to make that into a wedding appropriate joke.

This should be easy. On one level it is, he remembers Abby, Tim, and Tony’s speeches. It’d be easy enough to cobble something out of that: remember first time Fornell and Wendy met, talk about him being soppy about it, another comment about falling in love, wish them well, done.

There is a boilerplate version of this, and he can do that. He’s actually somewhat afraid that that is what he’s going to end up doing.

Hell, just standing up and talking for three minutes or so, about anything, will put him well past everyone’s expectations for this. But, even with expectations so low they’re in danger of melting from the heat of the earth’s core, he’d still like to do something genuinely good.
After two hours of playing fetch with Mona, and not writing a speech, he jots down the boilerplate version. He looks at it, sighs, and folds it up, tucking it into his wallet. If nothing else comes up, he’s got something.

A boring something.

Mona lays her head on his lap, and he pets her ears.

Maybe food and lathe time will help.

It does. Some. Wood under his fingers always helps. Getting to play with the different speeds, seeing how pressure, blade shape, wood type all work helps. Realizing that at this speed, with a lathe, sandpaper becomes a cutting tool is fun.

By the time he’s done with that he’s feeling like he’s got a plan in place. He hopes it works. Worst comes to worst Fornell’s disappointed and doesn’t pick him for his best man for his next wedding. Gibbs smirks at that. Unless Fornell and Wendy renew their vows at some point, there’s not going to be a ‘next wedding.’

The thing he didn’t notice is that the lathe is loud. Okay, he noticed it. Hard not to notice it. He’s right next to it and it more growls than purrs. He didn’t get why that might matter. When he finishes up, there’s a message on his phone. It’s the jeweler. Abbi’s ring is done and ready to be picked up.

“You’re looking better today.” Stephen says to Gibbs as he heads in.

Gibbs nods. He’s not feeling very chatty, but Stephen likes to talk, so he mentions that he’s healing up slow and sure. And he is. He can’t wait to start really moving around again, but he can drive himself around now, so that’s a start. And he doesn’t need the O2 tank unless he tries to go too far or too fast.

“So, you want to see it?”

No, I’m here twenty miles out of my way just to blather on first thing in the morning.

Stephen nods, smiles, and gets the drift of Gibbs’ facial expression.

A moment later Gibbs is holding a small, black velvet box. He flicks open the lid and his breath catches. There’s a slithery warmth that slips through him as he sees it sitting there, pearl almost glowing against the velvet, the mother of pearl simultaneously looking like water and smoke. He touches the stone, almost expecting it to be warm, but of course, it’s not. He feels himself smiling, and looks up at Stephen and says, “That’s beautiful.”

Stephen inclines his head. “That’s what I do.”

Gibbs nods and grabs his credit card.

When he gets out, he realizes he’s got a significantly more interesting speech to plan than Fornell’s Best Man’s toast.
Occasionally I have a ‘soundtrack’ to what I'm writing. If any of you are interested in hearing the music that goes along with this bit, go find "Hot Gates" by Mumford and Sons. It's especially relevant for the bit that begins with, "I told Jarvis..."

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Tim’s tired and fried and just… not in a good place, when he leaves Leon. This one’s hitting him on several levels, and he just doesn’t like it, at all.

He doesn’t like Khan out there. Given how many of his friends and loves would have died if Khan hadn’t killed those bombs, he doesn’t like Khan in jail. He doesn’t like Khan, and all the shit Khan’s got him thinking about, period.

He doesn’t like Clemens. Nothing about that case is good.

He doesn’t like Jarvis coming in and… and he’s not even sure entirely what that was. Is he being dared to do something about this? Is he... being tested? They know he’ll shut up and take one for the team if a case can’t be made and the price is right. Is he pushing further, harder, seeing what Tim’ll do? Seeing how far Tim’ll go for the team?

Bigger question, besides Jarvis, who the hell is even on “this team?” More important question than who, does Tim even want to be on a team that does shit like this?

All of that’s whirling around his head as he leaves the Navy Yard, and, walks right into Gibbs, who he hadn’t noticed was lurking around.

So, between that, and the bad mood, and how tired he is, he does let Gibbs drive him to the eye doctor’s.

On the upside, he’s mostly just got eyestrain. His vision really isn’t that bad. His distance vision is still fine. His midrange vision is still okay. But up close… Yep, it’s glasses time.

Apparently if you start spending ten to fourteen hours a day looking at a screen, especially, say, after fourteen years of a job that frequently involved hours and hours and hours of not looking at a screen, your eyes cope for a while, and then they start yelling at you.

The eye doc suggests that not reading or working on a computer for a few days might be a good idea. Instead of cursing, Tim laughs bitterly.

“Not an option?” Dr. Reynolds asks.

He laughs again. “I’m the Director of Cybercrime for a Federal Agency.”

Reynolds nods a bit. “So, you’ll want rush delivery on the glasses.”
Tim nods.

“Look, they’ll help, but just like any other strain, if you don’t rest, you’re not going to heal up.”

Tim sighs, feeling like he’s been hearing that a lot.

It’s while he’s looking through the frames that it occurs to him that Jimmy’s got Harry Potter glasses. (Okay, technically, he and Abby noticed that a while ago, and they have a quiet running joke about how Harry James Potter decided he was done with Britain, done with being famous, hopped the pond, and found a quiet life out of the limelight after the war was over. He’s personally counting the days for Molly to get interested in Harry Potter so he can tell her that her Daddy is actually Harry Potter. Then he’ll point out the glasses and the pickled frog green eyes, and tell her he’s got the wand hidden at work, and that’s how he gets the bodies to tell him what happened.) And, (and this is a new thought) Gibbs has the Dumbledore half-moon specs, as well.

He’s smirking about that, glancing over at Gibbs, who is wearing his glasses right now as he reads on his phone, his sparkly blue eyes and silver hair putting Tim in mind of possible Halloween costumes, and he wonders exactly how many tranquilizers he’ll have to slip Gibbs for him to get an especially awesome Halloween for the kids in about eight years.

Tim rubs his eyes again. He’s hit the point where he’s tired enough he’s getting silly. Though silly is preferable to feeling in a funk, so he’ll take it.

And he manages to hold it as he tries on different frames, feeling… They don’t look bad or anything, but… He’s not a glasses guy. That was the only line between him and the complete and utter nerds when he was a kid. At least he didn’t have glasses.

He’s got them… getting them, now.

For a moment, he thinks of the scene in Major League where Wild Thing (or whatever the character’s name was) gets the ones with the really big black frames and the little skull in the middle. He smirks at that, too. Abby’d be pleased by something like that.

Yeah, really too damn silly if he’s thinking along those lines.

Okay. Getting serious. Not thin round frames because he’s not getting the same damn glasses Jimmy has. (Plus, he thinks they look stupid on him.)
So he pokes around some more, trying different options. Finally he settles on two of them, both are somewhat square shaped. He gets one for home, thicker, black plastic frames, so if one of the various small people in his life grab a hold of them they won’t be instantly destroyed. (This is part of the reason why Jimmy wears contacts at home. Molly mangled two pairs before he decided that popping his contacts in as soon as he got home was a good plan.) For work, he’s got lighter ones. Thin frames, light silvery-blue, but round cornered squared off lenses.

Rhomboïd. That’s the word for the shape he’s looking at. He shakes his head again, gonna be a long day. He probably should get a nap, but he’s got to get back onto the sleeping at night schedule. Maybe he’ll get an hour off this afternoon.

The clerk eyes the frames when he brings them up, tells him they’re good choices, gets him measured for them, asks if he wants the lenses to go dark if he’s outside, and he decides why not on that. He reads outside sometimes. And then she tells him that they’ll be ready for pick up in three to six week, and that little bit of decent mood he was able to grab a hold of vanishes because another month of rubbing his eyes and feeling like they’re going to fall out of his head isn’t making him happy.

“Three to six weeks? Dr. Reynolds said something about express—“

“Yes, sir. That is the express service.”

Tim blinks slowly. “There’s got to be a faster way to do this.”

She shrugs at him. “They’re custom made lenses. Designed for the frames you’ve picked out, and your personal eyes, and with the anti-glare coating, the scratch resistant coating, and the light sensitive glass.” Then she points to the far wall. “Traditional reading glasses, feel free to try some and see if a pair works for you.”

Tim stalks over, quietly grumbling about this being a massive racket and that there has to be a faster way to do this, and didn’t they used to have places in malls that did glasses in twenty four hours, and how the hell does Jimmy put up with this crap, when a hand lands on his shoulder and he gets the sense he may be grumbling a bit louder than he intends to as Gibbs gives him a gentle squeeze.

Tim grabs the first pair that has a tag that matched his prescription, not caring what they look like, and heads back. A minute later, he’s signing a credit card receipt, and hoping that his eyes are going “Gonna tell me about it?” Gibbs asks as they’re sitting in the diner, Tim getting some breakfast, Gibbs having coffee. (Apparently this is his second time here today.)

Tim’s already been over the basics. What happened. How. Why. So he shakes his head. This one’s gnawing at him, but he can’t touch what exactly is getting to him. Maybe it’s just having his schedule upside down and not enough snuggle time. So, instead of trying to talk about it more, he shakes his head.

Elaine sees he’s in a funk, too, and she’s extra gentle with him. He smiles a bit at her, enjoying the pampering (and the scrambled eggs, turkey sausage, and strawberries.)

“What happened. How. Why.” Gibbs having coffee. (Apparently this is his second time here today.)

Tim’s already been over the basics. What happened. How. Why. So he shakes his head. This one’s gnawing at him, but he can’t touch what exactly is getting to him. Maybe it’s just having his schedule upside down and not enough snuggle time. So, instead of trying to talk about it more, he shakes his head.

Elaine sees he’s in a funk, too, and she’s extra gentle with him. He smiles a bit at her, enjoying the pampering (and the scrambled eggs, turkey sausage, and strawberries.)

“Home or NCIS?” Gibbs asks as they go back to his car.

“NCIS.”

“Sure?” Gibbs is giving him the, you need a nap look.

“Need to be able to sleep tonight, too. And I’ve got… God… Probably two full gigs of people buying Clemens services. You remember the name of Diane’s old Boss?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Head of the IRS.”

“I’ll google it. I think his name was on there.”

Gibbs winces at that, but it matches the rest of the news out of the IRS in the last few years, so he’s not surprised. “Gonna talk to her?”

“I texted early this morning. Haven’t heard back yet. I’ll try again when I’m back in there.”

Gibbs nods. Then another idea hits. “That’s just like the other stuff you had me doing, right?”

“Yeah. Put the data in a computer, ask it questions. So, you can sort by name, or by office, or date…”

Gibbs looks at him. Tim nods. “Yeah, I can give you a copy of who was buying what. What do you want to do with it?”

“Start finding the conspiracies. They wanted that information for a reason, why?”

“He’s also got a list of different laws he modified for people. That should help, too.”

Gibbs nods. He’s got some ideas going. Then something else hits him. “Any for us?”

Tim rubs his eyes again. “Uh… Not that I saw, but I’ve only been able to give it a quick glance.”

He’s fairly sure that Gibbs doesn’t have any idea how big a gig is. “Who are you thinking?”

“Jen, Grenouille…”

“Out of the picture now.” And Tim’s hoping they were both dead long before Clemens got this fully up and going, but he’s not sure yet how far back this list goes.
“I know, but…”

Tim nods. “Might explain how Trent Kort… Actually, the CIA had people on his list. I bet NSA does, too. They’re probably legally.” Tim’s got his sarcasm amped on legally, but drops it and reins himself in, “using it to keep an eye on the rest of us.”

Gibbs nods a bit. He can see at least three legitimate reasons why you’d do something like that. (All involving cover IDs and or selling the appearance of being a double agent. Sometimes you work with the bad guys to catch other bad guys or to make yourself look like one.) And he can think of more than a few illegitimate reasons for it, too.

Tim nods at that, and finishes up his breakfast.

---

Exceptionalism forgives everything. Tim’s thinking that as he’s sitting at his desk, looking at the raw data in front of him. Right now he’s sorting people into groups by who will have jurisdiction over them. So, for example, his first search, people buying information on the FBI, turned up close to 300 names.

From what he can tell about 280 of them are out and out criminals. At least, 280 of them are not in the Federal Employee Database.

The other 20…

It’s possible the other 20 think the FBI is up to something hinky and they’re keeping an eye on it, without going through official channels, because official channels make things messy, start turf wars, and alert whoever you’re looking into that you’re looking into it. It’s possible they’re just good guys doing their jobs and hoping to catch the bad apples and…

Tim’s not feeling able to swallow that bullshit.

Not today.

But… hell, he’s done this. Literally. He has personally sat his ass down, hacked friendly government agencies that he thought had information they needed and wouldn’t share or someone at that agency wasn’t playing for Team Good Guys anymore.

He sighs at that. What would Gibbs have done if he couldn’t have done this for him? Found someone else. He never would have gotten here if he couldn’t have done this sort of work. Some other guy who could have done this would have spent years getting teased by Tony and told to do the impossible by Gibbs.

It feels deeply surreal and unsettling to suddenly understand where Manner and his love of The Law comes from.

He stands up and stretches, easing the aches in his shoulder and arm, blinking a little, noticing his eyes and head don’t hurt (as much). These might not be custom glasses, but they appear to be helping.

He forwards 280 of the names directly to Fornell. The other 20 he adds to a different list. This one written with pen, on paper. This is the list that’ll be handed directly to different people and checked into quietly.
Tim makes a copy of that list and goes over to the Lab, where Gibbs is working on the computers, and Abby’s running trace. A quick hug and some petting perks him up a little, and handing over that list to Gibbs, seeing him smile as he’s got a mystery to get into. That feels good.

But it doesn’t shake the deeply unsettled feeling as he goes back to his desk to see who’s buying information on the CIA.

“Someone didn’t get his nap today,” Jimmy says when Tim’s glaring at everything and snaps at Abby as they’re laying out dinner.

That gets the glaring aimed at Jimmy, for a second, then it reminds Tim to quit being an asshole. It’s not any of their faults that he’s bummed out. “Sorry.” He shakes his head, steps closer to Abby, sees if he’s forgiven, her eyes narrow a bit but she nods, and he kisses her. “Really long day.”

“Jimmy had one, too.” Abby says, pointedly. Tim’s not the only one who was at NCIS all night.

“Jimmy got his nap,” Jimmy adds, sweeping in to defend Tim.

Breena hops on Abby’s side. “Shouldn’t you be all celebratory today? Bad guy’s been picked up. Yay! Not grumpy bear with a thorn in his paw.” (Abby nods along. She knows he’s off, has felt it from the few times he’s hopped into the lab, but there’s off, and then there’s making snide comments about why the hell the fork has to go on the left side of his plate, he’s a goddamn lefty for God’s sake, and it’s annoying as hell to reach across his food to put the knife in the hand that cuts.) The idea of arguing with two unhappy wives, who are both ganging up against you (especially when you’re being an ass), hits Tim as a potential downside of their foursome.

“Jimmy didn’t have quite the long day I did. But, yes, I’m sorry.” Complete capitulation looks like the wisest course if this isn’t going to blow up. (He picks up the fork and moves it to the right side of the plate himself. He’d really just been grumping along for the sake of being grumpy. Not like the fork hasn’t been on the left side for every single other meal he’s ever eaten that involved sitting down at a table with set places.) “That was snide and snippy and uncalled for.”

Abby nods, liking that better than the kiss. “So, what was your long day? You’ve been off since this morning, but…” But he hasn’t said what’s up, because he didn’t want to talk, or even sign, about it at work. She knows at least some of what Gibbs was doing, because she was helping him work on compiling searches, but, other than seeing the little gray cloud hovering over Tim all day, she hasn’t been able to get into it deeper.

But now they’re home, and getting ready to have dinner, and, now’s the time. So, as they eat, he tells them all about Clemens, and about the deal with Khan, and all of Jarvis’ crap, and… And by the time he’s done, none of them are looking very chirpy, either.

“I’m not stupid. I know it’s not all good guys and bad guys and that one team’s on the right side and another’s on the wrong one and all, but…”

Abby’s stroking his shoulder, and Breena says, “You feel like you just pulled back the curtain and got to see the face of the Great and Powerful Oz?”

Tim shrugs a bit, that’s part of it. That’s definitely it with Jarvis. But he also pretty much already knew that part, so…

His mouth starts moving and words start coming out before his brain is fully engaged. Kind of like free writing. Free talking. “Or, like the scene in Empire Strikes Back where Luke sees his own face in Vader’s mask…” The other three are looking at Tim, really startled by that idea. “What Clemens did… That’s the Dark side version of Gibbs, or… me…” He looks at Jimmy. “Us. What we’re talking about doing with the Admiral…” That’s the connection his brain was fighting hard against making, and when he says it out loud, he starts to feel a little better. But, having made the connection, he’s got to deal with it now.

“He didn’t just go against the people who screwed him over,” Breena says. None of the rest of them are comfortable with the connection Tim’s drawing, either.

“That’s why it’s Dark side. Everyone who might be responsible, and anyone like them… He went to take out the whole system that hurt him. But, even if he had just gone after the people who hurt him. Say he killed the men who raped him. They gave him HIV. Back when he got that news it was a death sentence.”

Tim glances at Abby and Jimmy, each one having a part of this puzzle. Jimmy nods, stroking Abby’s hand. “Abby got the blood work back to us. He took his med properly and had his viral load controlled. No discernable levels of HIV in his blood, now.”

“Good.” No shot of anyone coming in contact with a stray virus and running into trouble. Not a likely issue, but still, good to know. “But in ’98 or whenever it was, they basically told him he’d been raped and slowly murdered for a crime he didn’t commit. Not that it’d be better if he had been selling drugs, but…” Maybe a little less free talking, he’s going off on tangents. “If anyone had the right to revenge, he did, but if he did take them out, we’d still hunt him down and put him in prison, again. Why do we get a pass for that, and not him?”

“We don’t, Tim,” Breena says. “And it is different, for Gibbs, for us… You know what the Admiral did. If you could arrest him, try him, toss him in jail, it’d be enough, wouldn’t it?”

Tim nods. But he notices that Jimmy doesn’t, vehemently doesn’t, and Abby’s not looking cool with that either.

“And Hernandez.” Abby may not be sold on just trying the Admiral, but she’s very invested in not being Clemens, and, more importantly, Gibbs not being Clemens. “I went over that whole case when I matched the bullet. His family was paying off everyone. Mexico was never going to extradite him. As long as he stayed on the far side of the border, he would never see justice for what he did. Bodnar…” The revenge they all helped with. “You think he took out Eli without the backing of powerful people in Israel? Hell, Orli might have been behind it. If we hadn’t grabbed him, he would have just vanished, never to be seen again. We’re different because we take this step when the system fails.” Abby says it before she realizes that Clemens is basically the poster child for the system failing, but she does see it as soon as she says it, so she starts adding onto that idea. “He didn’t try to get his record cleared. He didn’t sue the state for wrongful imprisonment. He didn’t lay charges against the men who abused him. He got out and decided to tear everyone and everything down, and that is not the Dark side version of you or us!”

That helps some. He scoots closer to Abby, lets her hold onto him, and pet him. That helps more. But he’s not convinced.

“And Jarvis? Why are we working so hard to protect something like that?” Tim asks, still feeling gray. Lighter gray, but still gray.

That’s something they don’t have much of an answer to. After a moment Breena says, “That’s a good question. I mean… If justice matters… If it’s not just about who’s on what team and making sure power stays in the “right” hands, should we be just sitting here, knowing what we do?”
“No.” Jimmy replies. “But, we’re low on options for fixing it.” He eyes Tim. “You kind of killed the proof of that, and if you resurrect it, those guys you grabbed get eternal get out of jail free cards. The stuff Jarvis was talking about, those laws got passed, they’re completely legal. Not like we can arrest senators for sticking some sort of get out of jail free passes for themselves and their buddies into different legislation that passed. And if you start deleting right and left… you don’t know what got sneaked in and what got put in intentionally… so, if you and Jake get into the database and start cutting chunks out, you have gone to the… okay not the Dark side, but that’s probably further on the vigilante path than any of us are comfortable with. So, what do we do? The press would want more than just your story…”

That starts to perk Tim up. “Maybe I can find proof.” He stands up and goes to his phone.

After a minute Jake, who’s also sounding pretty gray, answers, “Malloy.”

“Jake, we’re still on for Friday.”

“McGee?”

“Breakfast, you and me on Friday, we’ve still got stuff to talk about. Any little bits of laws that don’t look like they belong, keep looking for them.”

“Why? You’ve got the guy.”

“Jake, I’ve got a guy. Apparently, it’s not a one man show. 7:00 at the Diner?”

“Fine.”

He explains what he’s thinking with Jake, why they’re going to get together Friday morning, but the image of Luke’s (or maybe his own) face in Vader’s mask won’t leave him.

So, he’s not exactly a bubbling cauldron of fun that evening. And it’s okay. He and Jimmy are tired. So they’re mostly just having a quiet night. Dinner, clean up, trying out the new bed.

That’s nice. It’s huge. There’s room for all of them. As they’re putting sheets and pillows on, Tim grumbles a bit about how they got a new custom made bed almost as fast as he’s going to get new glasses and Jimmy chuckles a bit about welcome to the tribe. Tim snarks about he was fairly sure that once upon a time they had those places with the 24 hour service, and Jimmy nods, tells him they still exist, and as long as he doesn’t mind glasses that are, kind of, in the neighborhood of your actual prescription, going to one of those places is great, but when Jimmy made the appointment, he assumed that Tim wanted glasses that would actually match the eyes in his personal head.

Tim rolls his eyes a bit, and then flops onto the bed once they’ve got it made. Nicely firm and springy, room for everyone to spread out, yes, this was a good investment. “You sound like Tony talking about suits.”

He feels Abby settling in next to him, as Jimmy says, “Unlike glasses, you don’t get headaches and eyestrain from a suit that doesn’t quite fit you right.”

“Oooo…” Breena’s on Tim’s other side now, also laying out. “When we get a new mattress…”

Tim feels Jimmy joining them on the bed, and also hears a long sigh. “Yep. And we’ll make sure they make both of the beds for the house.”
Quite nights often involve reading or watching TV. Since they’re all taking advantage of the new bed that means reading. Tim and Abby intentionally do not have a TV in their bedroom, and hope to keep it that way. (Plus, it’s not like they don’t have a wide array of computer options if they want to watch something in bed.)

Tim could be reading. Not like he doesn’t have literally millions more bites of information to go through. Or a stack of reports (because it’s not like all the rest of the crime they deal with vanished when they got working on this job.) He even, technically, has some fiction he might get into. Latest Game of Thrones is out, and rumor has it John Snow isn’t quite as dead as he seemed. He could be writing some. There are some faint stirrings of story ideas for Gabe and Skye in the back of his head.

What he actually does is lie down, make a few pleased noises, close his eyes (might as well attempt to follow the doctor’s instructions), and ends up dozing. He’s not quite full on asleep. He’s aware of the people around him, hearing them talk a bit, low music, the sound of Breena’s fingernail clicking against her phone as she’s reading, the feel of Abby’s hand resting on his shoulder. Just the various soft sounds and sensations people quietly spending a night in.

He keeps seeing Luke’s face in Vader’s mask, and he stops skittering away from it. He makes himself deal with that image. His dreams are vivid and intense, sad but not scary.

Clemens bent his whole life into a mission of revenge. No friends, no family, no life outside of destroying what made him hurt. Tim can feel that. Can feel the seduction of it, how… rich and golden and satisfying it would be. But he’s already made the decision that’s not him.

As he’s dreaming, he can see the marks on his body, on his mind, all the ways his father tried to shape him, the mold he tried to push Tim into (symbolized by struggling with a Naval Uniform that doesn’t fit), and as he dreams he can see that what he’s asking Jarvis for… what Jimmy’s training for… That’s The Admiral still shaping, still controlling his life. (He doesn’t need a uniform that fits, he needs to get out of it all together.)

If he’s going to be free of the man, he can’t still be shaping their future.

It’s very dark when Tim wakes up, images of the knife he always carries slitting the uniform off of him still fresh in his mind.

Clock says it’s a bit before five.

He gets up slow and easy, not wanting to wake his bedmates. They all get kisses as he pulls on jeans and a t-shirt, and then, leaving a note on the dresser, he heads out. With any luck, he’ll be back in time for breakfast.

As Tim’s driving, he knows there’s two sides of this. One of them is going to be a hell of a lot easier to get into that the other, so that’s where he’s going to start. He finds himself standing on the front steps of a very nice house in an extremely expensive neighborhood in Arlington.

He’s not surprised to see in the pre-dawn murk that the lights are on downstairs.

He knocks, and after a moment, Jarvis comes to the door. “What changed, Clayt?”
If Jarvis is surprised to see Tim on his front step at 5:30 in the morning, he doesn’t show it. He’s also, unlike Tim, dressed for work. Tim’s starting to suspect that Jarvis might be some sort of machine. He’s cold enough for it, and, from what Tim can see, he functions on about two hours of sleep a day.

“Come in, Tim.” He steps out of the doorway, and ushers Tim into his home. “You remember Lt. James?”

Tim nods as James hops up from the sofa to greet him, about to shake his hand and then pulling back at the last second, remembering how bad his right hand was the last time he saw it and not sure if Tim’s up for that. Tim nods and offers his hand, getting an enthusiastic shake. “Oh, man, you’re looking so much better than you were the last time I saw you.”

Jarvis walks over to his coffee table and begins flipping over pieces of paper. Intel Tim’s not allowed to see.

“Amazing what four months, great surgeons, a better ortho, cutting-edge medical technology, and an amazingly good physical therapist can do.”

James is looking him over, blocking his view of whatever Jarvis hasn’t flipped over yet, saying, “Yeah. I’ll say.” He glances back, sees that Jarvis has everything covered, and says to Jarvis, “We’ll be meeting Mr. Biden at seven. How about I go on ahead and make sure everything’s set?”

Tim knows that he’s being told, subtly that his time with Jarvis is limited, but that he’s got enough respect to get to see him alone. Tim nods to James, letting him know he’s got the message, and then James scoops all of the papers up, tucks them into a large folder, and heads off. Once he leaves, Jarvis says, “What are you referring to?”

Start with the easy stuff, the politics. “When the Admiral attacked me, you made it very clear that no one wanted any light shed on that. That for political purposes it had to stay quiet. This time… I got the sense you were basically daring me to do something about this.”

“Are you going to?” Jarvis is looking interested, and, Tim’s not sure, but he thinks there’s pleasure in that look, too.

“Good question. What changed?”

Jarvis shrugs a bit. “You want some coffee?” he asks as he stands up, picking up his own cup, and leading Tim deeper into his home to the kitchen.

“Only if you have decaf.”

Jarvis shakes his head. “Not much purpose for that.”

“Yeah, I hear that a lot.”

“Then why drink it?”

Tim’s not interested in small talk right now. “Are you going to tell me, or are you going to flog polite generalizations off on me? I’ll just head off and stop wasting your time and mine if you’re not interested in talking.”

Jarvis smiles at that. “Politics shifts with the times. When you were hurt, Hillary was ahead, but not certain to win the nomination. Sanders still had a mathematical possibility of winning, and the states he was polling better in were still up to vote. Bill made your father an Admiral. He’s been a Clinton partisan for more than twenty years now. Sanders already had the entire hardcore anti-war base, and an edge with the social liberals. If Clinton were made to look bad by being associated with a child abuser, that could have put Sanders over the top.”

“You were defending your man… woman?” Jarvis stops at the counter in a very tidy, very modern looking kitchen. He pours himself another cup of coffee, and settles in, back against the counter, to chat.

Jarvis nods. But Tim gets the sense that’s not the whole situation. He has a vague memory of something along the lines of the Obamas and Clintons not loving each other, and Jarvis is, if anything, Obama’s man… so… He’s still missing something here.

“She won the nomination. She hasn’t been in the Senate for a while, but she would have voted on at least some of Clemens’ ‘laws.’”

Again, that cold, dangerous smile. “And she’s connected enough that she knows, and has used, the perks of her office. It would be terribly damaging to her if some of the things she’s written into several obscure laws were to come out.”

“And again, I’m getting the sense that you’re daring me to do something about it.”

“Will you?” Jarvis’ finger taps the edge of his coffee cup as he asks.

“You’re willing to sweep me almost getting killed under the rug to protect her. Now you want to yank the rug out from under her, what’s changed?”

Jarvis inclines his head. “Nothing, not really. A miscalculation on my part of what each party values, and how the game is played.”

Tim just looks at him, the idea that Jarvis doesn’t necessarily know what’s going on, is shocking to him. Jarvis looks back, expecting Tim to put together on his own.

After a moment of not putting it together, Tim says, “Yeah, well, I don’t play this game, and I’m not doing anything until I know who the hell I’m helping. Why are you shifting around?”

Jarvis sips his coffee. “Hillary wants to provide the world with an image of diversity. She does not want her cabinet to look like an old boys club. I am, unfortunately, the definition of an ‘Old Boy.’
Jeb wants to provide the world with an image of going across the aisle and building coalitions for the good of the country.”

“If she wins, you’re out of a job, and if he does, you aren’t?”

Jarvis lifts a hand, indicating that this wasn’t something he had expected. “That does appear to be the way this has worked out. She’s ahead in the polls. She will most likely win if something big doesn’t pop up.”

And now Tim’s fairly sure why the Naval Pension System noticed this and asked for Leon and by extension, him, specifically.

“And Bush was a Governor, so he won’t be touched by this, at all.”

Jarvis nods, curtly. “Not this at least. I’m sure if someone were to go through the Florida legal system with the same level of scrutiny, they’d find just as much creative lawmaking as you’ve found in the Federal system.”
Tim snorts at that. It’s not comforting, at all. “So, if I do anything about this, I secure your job?”

Jarvis smiles a bit.

“Are you even remotely interested in the good of the country?”

“At this point in time, I’m lucky to be in a situation where the good of the country and my personal interests align. That’s not always the case. And before you ask for more clarification, I’m in it for the good of the Navy. That’s my job, and I’m good at it.”

Tim nods. He knows the next question is a longshot, but he’s still not quite ready to get to the personal reason he’s here. “Those account numbers Abbi got?” Unspoken context, did you send them?

“I know what they are and where they lead, but I didn’t send them.”

“Who did?”

Jarvis shakes his head. Tim can see he genuinely doesn’t know, but he probably has suspicions. “The man who wants to see everything burn.”

“What are they?”

Jarvis shakes his head at that, too. “Do I look like the man who wants to see everything burn?”

“No.”

Jarvis inclines his head. “Whoever in your little cabal is in charge of them better watch his back.”

“We don’t have them anymore. Once we couldn’t get into them, we lost them.”

Tim doesn’t think he flubbed the lie, but Jarvis doesn’t look like he believes that at all. “Is that all?”

Tim shakes his head. Now or never. “No.” He takes a deep breath, not entirely happy to let it go, but he doesn’t want to be Clemens, doesn’t want to be any more like him than he already is. “Don’t go visit the Admiral.”

That surprises Jarvis. “Are you sure?”

Tim sighs, no he’s not. But at the same time, he doesn’t like where revenge can lead. He might not be a pristinely sparkling Paladin clad in white armor and holy goodness, but… “Yeah. I’m alive, and that’s all I need.”

“And the rest of the deal?”

“That stands. I want the increase and I don’t want to see any budget cuts for NCIS.”

Again Jarvis flashes that smile. “Then you better think twice or three times about doing anything with what you know about how the law works, because that’s how organizations are exempted from across the board budget cuts. And that’s how they get their budgets increased without extra scrutiny.”

Tim shakes his head at that. “And is that how guys like me become Director, making the right decision on a job like this?”

“One of them. The Director of any Federal Agency has one job, no matter what, protect and serve that agency. Have you thought about that more?"

“Yes.”

“And…”

“Let’s see if you’re in position to even do anything in ten years, when it’ll matter.”

“As long as I’m on this side of the grass, I’ll be in position to help.”

Tim does get home before everyone else heads to work. He gets home before they’re even all up. Abby’s getting a lay in this morning, so she’s still asleep, Jimmy’s in the shower, and Breena’s corralling little girls.

“You okay?” she asks him.

Tim nods at her. “Better than last night.”

“You look it. Going to tell us what’s up?”

“Yes. You guys set to sleep over again tonight?”

“Oh yeah, no problems on that.”

“Good.” He kisses Breena and looks around. She’s getting cereal and breakfast into little girls, so he starts making breakfast for the four of them. “Last night, you mentioned trying the Admiral…”

She nods, scooping cereal into Anna’s mouth. “Yeah. You said something about that, right? That more than anything else you need him humiliated, and how everything he’s done coming out would do that better than anything else.”

He inclines his head, not remembering it, but that certainly sounds like him. That’s what would make him happy about this, if happy’s an option. “I’m not sure that’s what Jimmy or Abby need.”

Breena nods. “You’ve got him dead to rights on that. I’m less sure on Abby. She’s cooling down as time goes by.”

“And he’s doing a better job of keeping it under the surface.”

“Yeah. Why?” She nods to Molly, and Tim heads over, pouring her more milk and Cheerios.

“I asked Jarvis not to visit the Admiral.”

“Tim!” Breena’s looking really proud of him right now.

He rolls his eyes a little as he goes back to the stove and cracks eggs. “I…” he shakes his head. “Tonight. I can get into that more tonight. But…”

“But you’re afraid how they’re going to take it?”
“Yeah. It was really clear when I was driving to Jarvis…” But she doesn’t know what’s clear to him. “I’m alive, you know? He didn’t end me. And, one thing Gibbs said is you don’t do this if you can still look at yourself in the mirror, and we can. It’s not him or us, but on the way home…” He shrugs again, pouring the eggs into the pan, and swirling them around a bit. “It’s not just me. And what I need isn’t all of this.”

They hear the water in the pipes above stop. Jimmy’s out of the shower, and he’ll be down soon. Breena looks up. “When he went off on Tony, you guys were talking about getting him into counseling this fall.”

Tim nods. “It’s fall.”

“Yeah. He’s coping. And he’s putting one foot in front of the other, but that anger is still there. John’s given him something to focus it on, but his focus is on learning how and then destroying John. I’m not sure what would happen if Jarvis did it. I’m not sure he knows, either.”

“Okay.”

“I’ve talked to Gibbs some about this.” Tim hadn’t known that. “I don’t think he thinks Jimmy’ll ever take the shot. Pretty much he’s giving Jimmy something to do to eat up time, help him feel useful and get him further and further away from it, hook him more into the world now and let the anger have less of a hold on him.”

“You got that out of Gibbs?”

Breena smiles a bit. “I’m filling in a lot of the blanks he left in the conversation.”

“Ah. So, he’s working on getting Jimmy to a place where he can deal with this without killing something?”

“Maybe,” she shrugs a bit. “If John has to die to deal with it, he’ll have been fine with that, too. But he’s not sure that killing John is a good thing for Jimmy.”

That sounds like Gibbs to Tim. They hear footfalls on the steps, and a few seconds later, Jimmy’s sitting at the table, dressed, ready for work, hair and skin still damp, and looking fairly content. “That’s an awesome mattress.”

Tim’s nodding at that. “Even as many hours of sleep short as I am right now, that felt great.”

They talk about the new bed, and about Breena and Jimmy joining them in it again tonight, and eventually Abby’s down, too, and the morning really starts.

What changed...

Tim’s got that hopping around in his head as he continues digging through the information they’ve got. He’s filling up casefiles to send to, literally, everyone in the alphabet soup. (He’s had to google some of the agencies he’s sending reports to, because he didn’t know who the hell they were by their initials.)

He’s seriously wondering if Clemens had a website or something. Pesky government problems? Call R. Clemens and watch them vanish!
He shakes his head and focuses back on the work.

What changed…

Nothing. It’s all been there, lurking behind the edges of his mind, swirling around.

Hell, he even said it to Gibbs and Abby after he had that talk with his mom. No one’s the villain in their own story. Everyone’s got a reason. Everyone ‘does the right thing’ as long as they’re the ones telling the story.

He doesn’t believe in black and white, this is moral, this isn’t, we never, ever cross this line. (Okay, he does, but not when it comes to killing people.) He believes context matters, that almost nothing is always evil.

He doesn’t begrudge Gibbs Hernandez’s death. Same situation, he’d hope he’d be the kind of man to do the same thing.

But it’s not the same situation. He’s still alive. He’s better than he ever was. Every rule the Admiral tried to beat into him, he’s broken, and he’s thrived by doing it. The hold John had over him, the nasty, little, second-guessing, is-this-good-enough, should-I-do-this, can-I-do-this, voices are all dead.

He doesn’t need to kill the Admiral to destroy him. Just by going through his day, being himself, he already has.

Though, he’ll admit, if the shot to ever take him down by showing the rest of the world what a heaping pile of shit The Admiral is ever comes his way, he’s going to jump on it with both feet.

“I told Jarvis not to visit The Admiral.” Tim says when they’re all settled into bed again. This feels like a bed conversation, a naked, at home, everyone close and touching, all walls down sort of conversation to him, so he held onto it until bedtime. (Though he did suggest early bedtime.)

Breena’s smiling at him, and she’s sitting next to Jimmy, already petting his back, because he is not taking this well, at all. He’s looking like he just got sucker punched.

Abby’s less than thrilled, too, but not that badly off. Tim glances between the two of them, not sure who to start with, and Breena gives him an I’ve got Jimmy, you get Abby, then we’ll swap sort of look, and he wants to kiss her.

Tim takes a second touching both of them, his hands on Jimmy’s and Abby’s, petting gently, his eyes on Abby. “I don’t need it. I’m here and alive and in one piece and…” He kisses her, deep and sweet while squeezing Jimmy’s hand. “He didn’t break me. He didn’t make me into him… He spent my whole life trying to beat me into a shape, a person, he wanted me to be, and he couldn’t do it. And every second spent on him now… that’s time wasted. That’s life, our lives, wasted, on him, and he doesn’t get another second of my life.”
That doesn’t exactly sell Abby on the idea, but she’s not as invested in literal revenge as Jimmy is. She’s willing to keep listening. “When I got home, you were reclaiming me, remember that? Touching me, holding me, making me yours again.”

Abby nods at that.

“I am. And more than that, I’m my own. He’s got no more hold on me. Not anymore.” He lets go of Jimmy and touches her belly. “I’m done with the past. Really done with it. Everything I need in this world is in this house, and this is where I want to be, where I want to live. Here, now, with you,” he gives both Jimmy and Breena a quick glance to make sure that they know that you is plural, “and our kids. Not… nervously watching the news, wondering if today’s the day he ends. Not feeling like I’m holding my breath, waiting for him to fall.” He shakes his head at her. “No. Not for me. Not anymore. Can you be okay with that?”

Abby’s eyes close. “Yes.” She can be okay with that because she knows that’s where they need to go. That’s… where freedom and love lie, but at the same time… “But I want him to hurt. I want every second of pain he gave you back on him.”

Tim smiles a little at that, nods a little, feeling her anger and his own. “God, baby. So do I.” He squeezes Jimmy’s hand, too, making sure he knows this is for both of them, “and if he ends up in our laps somehow, all bets are off. If Burley ever makes a case against him for anything, we’ll prosecute it to the ends of the earth, but… unless he’s actually here, he doesn’t get another second of my life, and I don’t want him to have any more seconds of yours. I don’t want to be, and I don’t want you, or you,” another quick pet to Jimmy, “to end up being any version of Clemens.”

Abby nods, slowly, at that, but that’s part of who Abby is, she burns white hot for a while, but eventually cools. And she is cooling. And she wants that future more than the past. And above and beyond all of this, she can feel the shift in Tim right now, and he really is ready to let the whole thing go. So as much as she’d like to spend months coming up with inventive ways to kill John, and then trying all of them out on him, she wants that peace for Tim, more.

That’s not who or where Jimmy is. Jimmy glows along, subtle, looking cool to the touch, and then you pick him up and see that black, cool exterior is just a molecule thin layer over a molten core. And while Abby’s ready to be swayed on this, Jimmy’s not.

He’s angry, hot and dangerous. Jimmy never got to hit back at the fate that hurt him worse than anything else, and Tim’s seeing, right now, how much of that he shifted onto the idea of destroying John, how taking out the man who never loved his son became a proxy for getting to hit the fate that robbed him of his son. “He deserves it!”

“I know.” Tim shifts over a bit, so he’s got all his focus on Jimmy, holding both of his hands. “And if… if somehow he ends up in front of me or you, we’ll do something, but… We’re the good guys. We don’t do crap like this. Not… now. Not like this. I’m alive.” He puts Jimmy’s hand on his chest, making sure he’s feeling his heart beating. “I’m whole and unbroken, and…” he kisses Jimmy this time, real kiss, deep with an edge of frantic, trying to push what he’s feeling into his touch “and I can do that,” he says as he pulls back, “and it’s okay. We’re okay. I’m alive, Jimmy. I’m me. Not the little clone of him he wanted. He couldn’t turn me into the man he wanted me to be, and he couldn’t kill me when I refused to be that guy. I won, Jimmy. And he’s got to live with that.”

Jimmy’s finger traces over the scar across Tim’s eyebrow. “Tell me how unbroken you are when I see that every time I look at you.”

“Tell me how broken I’m going to be if this goes wrong and something happens to us? Jarvis killing him isn’t going to be enough, right? I see the way you look when we’ve talked about Jarvis keeping his promise. Jarvis doesn’t scratch the itch. It has to be you, and… I’ll be okay if he lives to be 130 and drops over dead of a heart attack wandering around on the beach in Hawaii. But I won’t be okay if you take him out and get caught. And I won’t be okay if you take him out and it goes off without a hitch, and you still aren’t fine, after.”

“Will I be okay if I don’t do it?” Jimmy’s voice makes it clear that he’s thinking the answer is no.

Breena’s got her arm wrapped around him, stroking his back. “Yeah, you will. You’ve got too damn much to lose to not be okay.”

Jimmy’s not looking convinced by that. Tim’s still kneeling in front of him. “We talked after you went off on Tony, about talking to someone, Wolf maybe, or… she’s probably already aware of most of our family secrets since she was seeing Jethro, Rachel. It’s probably time.”

Breena gently adds, “You know most of this isn’t about John or Tim.”

He glares at her, but she gives him her not putting up with any bullshit look.

“Enough of it is.”

Breena shakes her head a bit. She shifts, so she’s in front of Jimmy, and Tim’s on the side, petting him gently, while Abby’s got him on the other side.

Some of this is John, absolutely. But she saw how he went off on Tony and got a very good idea of how that knot of sick anger inside of Jimmy isn’t under control the way it should be. It’s like a furnace that has a few ways of letting off pressure, and so far it’s managing, but any little thing might make it explode.

She knows what he did with Tony, the combination of how Tony used Jeanne the same way Lee had used him, and how Tony may have missed his son’s whole life mixing together and pouring rocket fuel on the fire in Jimmy’s heart. He blew up, let off enough steam to keep going, and then Tim right on the heels of Tony meant that Jimmy didn’t have to deal with what’s actually making him so angry.

She knows that what’s going on with the Admiral is an extension of that. Jimmy didn’t get to have his son. He never saw his boy smile or laugh, never felt little fingers clench around his, didn’t hold him for more than a few minutes, never heard a coo or giggle or felt his breath on his neck, and John had all of that, and pissed it away, and then tried to kill it on top of that.

Breena’s stroking Jimmy’s face. When they lost Jon, he was the strong one. She collapsed under it, and he kept her going. Carried her when she couldn’t walk. He cried, and mourned, and didn’t do the stoic thing, but… He didn’t deal with it either. Not his anger. He got control of his fear, but the anger, that’s been there the whole time. Even fighting it out just lets him manage it, it didn’t help him accept or put it into any sort of context.

She kisses Jimmy. “The Admiral’s dead. You’ve splattered him, broke him into a million tiny pieces. Then what? It doesn’t take Tim’s scars away. It won’t make him any happier or better than he is now. It won’t bring Jon back. It won’t let you be the dad you wanted to be for him, and you’ll still be angry. You’ll keep it tucked deep, simmering away, looking pretty damn normal, and then go bugfuck insane on Tony again or Allan or whoever hits one of your buttons by accident.” Breena smiles at him, but it’s a sad smile. “I remember who you were before we lost Jon. No one else may know you well enough to still see the difference, but I do.”

Jimmy’s biting his lip, trying to keep anger and sadness in check. “Of course I’m different, you can’t… You are, too!”

“I know. But I remember the man who wasn’t so angry he had to leave bruises on his best friends as a ‘weekly workout.’ When we got married, the idea that you’d have to spend hours a week working on how to kill someone to keep the nasty bits in your own head in check would have horrified you. When we took out Bodnar, and we saw the body… It did horrify you, and me, too.” That’s something they’ve never spoken about in front of anyone else. But, when it was done, Tim brought them a van filled with a body, clothing, upholstery, and a few weapons, all of which ended up burned.

“You said you approved!” He means of the fighting, and the planning.

“I do! Because it helps. Because it does keep the nasty bits toned down, and whatever you need to work it out, I approve of, but... but you’re still angry. You keep it so tucked down it’s hard to see, and then you explode. You stalled out on angry, not moving forward anymore. I know doctors make lousy patients, but it’s time.”

Jimmy’s got tears in his eyes. He’s staring at her, trying to get away from this, but he knows she can see what he doesn’t want to face, and she knows it, too. “I don’t want to get past it! Not being angry is like saying he didn’t matter.”

Breena kisses Jimmy again.

“I know it’s stupid, but…”

“I know, baby, I know.” She’s petting his face and hair, and he’s crying.

“Sometimes a day or two will pass and I don’t think about him at all.”

Breena nods. It happens to her, too, and she feels awful and relieved and more awful for being relieved. “I know. At the grocery store, someone asked how many children I had, and I said two. I know.”

Jimmy’s shaking slightly, tears still streaming down his face. “I can’t get him back, and I can’t change it,” he glances at Tim, wiping his eyes, “but I can do something about John. I can’t make my own pain go away, and I can’t kill yours,” he strokes Breena’s face, “but I can hurt the guy who hurt you.” He squeezes Tim’s hand. “I don’t have to be useless and powerless and just take it. Not with John.”

Tim blinks slowly at that. He doesn’t know what to do with that, but Abby does. “None of us are powerless.” She glances at Tim, getting, she thinks, where he wants to go with this. Getting where she wants them, too. “Yeah, we can’t bend the world to our will, and fate’s still going to kick our asses, that’s out of our control. How we react isn’t. It’s not about pain, not anymore, not for him, and not for me, and hopefully, not for you, soon. We’re out of the pain business. We’re building joy, and love, and our home.”

Those words help, and now Tim knows what to say, “I don’t need you to hurt him. You hurting him doesn’t make me better. I need you to be here with me, and our girls. I need your joy and your peace and your love. That makes me better, makes all of us better.”

Jimmy’s not quite buying that. “You still want him to hurt.”

And Tim nods. “Yeah, I do. I probably always will. But I don’t need it. Do you need it? If it’s just the Admiral, and if you need this, then I’m game. If we’ve got to kill someone to get you right in your head, I can’t think of a better candidate, but after, are you still going to need this? Are you going to have to find something else to hurt?”

Jimmy swallows, hard. His head drops to Breena’s shoulder. Tim’s gently rubbing his shoulder, and Abby’s hugging him from the side.

“You still have Rachel’s number?” comes out of Jimmy after a long time of quietly crying.

“Yeah. You want me to make the call?”

Jimmy nods.

“I thought the idea was that we’d kill the Hydra, not breed some new ones,” Jake says as he sits across from Tim at the diner.

Tim shrugs a bit. “I have some thoughts on that.”

“Hopefully something less disturbing than we’re going to” Jake’s voice drops, “murder” and back up to normal again, “an inconvenient man.”

“He was somewhat more than inconvenient.”

Jake shrugs at that, too. “We’re not supposed to kill US Citizens without trial.”

“Nothing on the books about Clementinians, or whatever he was.”

Elaine hustles over, placing a decaf pumpkin spice coffee in front of Tim. “Now, this is a party that looks like it needs some cheering up. I know what Tim wants. What’s your pleasure, Mr. Malloy?”

Jake looks like he’s unlikely to be happy about much again. He sighs. “Uh… Carrot cake? Do you have that?”

Elaine smiles at him. “You want it as a muffin or waffles?”

“Does the muffin have frosting?”

“Of course!”

“Muffin.”

“Okay, Hun, I’ve got ya.”

They sit quietly, as Tim sips his drink, surprised to see it’s not his usual decaf with two sugars, but this is pretty tasty, too. First decently cool day this year, maybe Eliane’s feeling fallish.

“So, what’s your idea?” Jake asks.

“I’ve gotten confirmation that those laws are intentionally that long. For the express purpose of hiding things in them. Mostly it’s about taking care of things the rest of us aren’t supposed to know about it, or hiding a deal to get a vote on something else. But it’s also a perk of the job, fit little treats in for you and yours, keep the donations flowing, that sort of thing. Not something Joe Citizen can do for himself.”

Jake slumps a little further into his seat.

“And the only reason they can keep doing that is because no one is willing to talk about it. According to my source, not even everyone in Congress and the Senate knows about this. If you look like the kind of person who’ll spill this information, you don’t get it.”

“And I’m supposed to do what with this, go to the press? They’ll…” Tim sees Jake’s eyes start to light up. This isn’t some piddly little FOIA violation. Depending on what he can find, this is the October Surprise of Doom. If he can find enough of it, this is every incumbent on the board voting for something the public doesn’t want.

Tim nods. “Three weeks. That’s how long I figure we’ve got. That puts us at a week before the election. You find the bits that stink. Some of them have been added after the laws were passed to keep them working smoothly. You find the stinkers, and I’ll get the metadata to prove they’re hinky and who added them.”

Jake’s looking really pleased by this idea. “Who do you know to make sure this gets out?”

Tim smiles a bit. “Pull out your phone and google Dr. Penny Langston.”

“Your grandmother?”

“Knows EVERYONE. Including Tom Brokaw and Diane Sawyer, they may not be big names in media now, but they’ll know where to go with this. Hell, I think she might know Matt Drudge, too. Literally, everyone.” Tim smiles a bit, harder, more devious. “If it was one of my stories, the young, handsome hot shot attorney, with his beautiful, blonde, cop wife, who got this information out would then see about getting into politics. How old are you?”

Jake starts to slowly perk up, seeing the angles. “Thirty-four.”

Tim nods. “Yeah, he’d write up, and get some co-sponsors for a bill limiting the length of laws, and talking about killing special privilege and things like that.”

“And while doing that, he’d find a neighborhood where the incumbent is dirty as hell, and then he’d run for Congress.”

Tim nods. “Yeah. And he’d keep his eyes open and make sure that when something hinky’s happening, that it gets spread far and wide.”

By the time Elaine’s back with breakfast, Jake is smiling, and Tim’s feeling quite a bit better about his place in the world, and the state of the world in general.

“Thanks for seeing me on short notice,” Jimmy says to Rachel on Friday morning.

She smiles at him. “No problem. Call it the Gibbs Friends and Family Plan. So what brings you to my sofa, Dr. Palmer…”
“It’s a really long story.”

Rachel smiles again. “I’ve got time.”

“I know what I need to do, but doing it…” He lets that trail off.

“If doing what you need to do was simple, everyone would do it, and I’d be an accountant. Come on, if you know where to go, you know where it begins, so tell me the story.”

Jimmy swallows hard, and then says, “Okay… um… On the 8th it’ll be a year and ten months since my son was stillborn…”

Chapter End Notes

I know the last few chapters I’ve been taking a lot of shots at the Democrats. It’s not anything personal to them, they happen to be in charge. In my personal convictions I fully believe that all politicians are assholes, but I recognize the last few chapters have likely sounded fairly partisan in a way I’d prefer not to be.

As soon as some Republicans get themselves elected, I’ll paint them as bad guys, too.
“Don’t your boys know anyone else at the FBI?” Fornell asks Gibbs, exasperated, as Tim sends him yet another pile of names.

“Just because they send it to you, doesn’t mean you have to respond.”

Fornell rolls his eyes. “I know. I was supposed to be off all week and now…”

“You’ve worked straight through the week, got out an hour early today, ended up late at your own wedding rehearsal, and are seriously debating skipping the bachelor party?”

Fornell nods.

Gibbs nods back, been there, done that on his face. (Yes, he was an hour late to his wedding with Stephanie, which was an impressive feat of almost-husbandly-not-giving-a-shit, seeing as they eloped.) “Don’t.”

“I won’t.” Fornell nods. He might be done, but when he’s staring at a list of people hacking the IAEA from inside the US (they told Tim to send that to the FBI, they don’t have their own investigators for that sort of thing) he feels like he should be doing something about it. “I’m off. I’m off until the week after next.” He forwards the list to Ron Sacks, his one-time partner, along with McGee’s contact information.

“And when you get in, introduce Tim and Tony to whoever’s any good at his job. Time they got some of their own contacts.”

The minister pokes his head into the room where Gibbs, Tobias, Wendy’s sons, Trevor and Dave, and Tobias’ brother Alton are all standing around, going through the motions of getting ready for tomorrow. “This is the part where you’d all come out.”

So they shuffle out and head down to the chapel to go through the getting married dress rehearsal.

As wedding duty goes, Gibbs is thinking he preferred how Ducky and Leon’s weddings went. Stand there, say nothing, sign the paper, take bride and groom out to lunch/brunch, and done. Then came giving away the brides. All he had to do for those weddings was stand there, look pretty, walk a bit, in Abby’s wedding say, ‘Her brothers and I do,” and he was done.

He’s got a bit more on this plate this time. Best-manning requires a person to actually do things. Though some of the job is fairly easy. For example, he’s certain that Tobias isn’t going to run off. He’s not going to have to talk him down off a metaphorical ledge. Which he did have to do the first time he was a best man, and the groom had a major case of cold feet, but by that point the rabbit was dead, and in 1978, you married your pregnant girlfriend or her Drill Sergeant Daddy literally killed you, even if you were completely unsuited for each other and ended up divorced by ’83.

Not an issue this time.
Nope, this time, he’s got rehearsal duty (done), bachelor party duty (starting when the limo shows up, none of them are driving anywhere tonight), providing the groom with a place to sleep (in about five hours), getting him to the church on time (t-minus 20 hours from now), and then, during dinner, standing up and looking like he knows what the hell he’s doing as he gives a speech in front of (sigh) more than a hundred people.

He’s glaring at Fornell, who’s kissing Wendy goodnight, getting ready for the bachelor party part of the night.

“Something wrong?” Dave, Wendy’s youngest son, asks him.

Gibbs shakes his head. The limo pulls up, and he nods to it, getting this crew on the road for part two of the festivities.

Gibbs hasn’t hosted a bachelor party since he was in his twenties. Not that he’s got anything against them, but his buddies when he was young got married young, and once he lost Shannon and Kelly, he tended to avoid the kind of guy who was likely to get married.

Out of the guys he was close to in his thirties, Fornell’s the only one who got married, and for obvious reasons Gibbs was not at that bachelor party. (Actually, Gibbs does not know if Fornell had a bachelor party when he married Diane. He’s never asked, and doesn’t expect he ever will. Some things he just doesn’t need to know.)

But, back when he did host a few of them, they had a pretty standard format. Hit the bar, get really drunk, go watch some strippers, get drunker, roll on home, groom in tow, in the early hours of the morning.

Namely, back when he was young and stupid, he hosted the kind of bachelor party other young and stupid guys liked. He remembers they were fun, but is somewhat fuzzy on what exactly happened at most of them.

The thing about hitting the point where young and stupid are long past, and in fact, middle aged (unless you intend to live to be 114-120, which neither he nor Fornell expect to do) is also in the rearview mirror, is that certain options are out for a bachelor party.

Like, for example, even if half of your wedding party wasn’t the Bride’s sons, going out to a strip club looking to get drunk and ogle the girls just looks flat out creepy to everyone around once you hit a certain age. (That age being one that Fornell and Gibbs passed about ten years ago.)

And, granted, if they had had Pryde in the mix, or Franks, because neither of them have/had ever met a party they didn’t like, and they are/were both good at dragging Gibbs and Fornell along for the ride, they may have gone out dancing or something, but… They aren’t there, and Gibbs isn’t about to even try given how his lung is doing.

So, quiet bachelor party.

And lucky for him, Fornell loves pool. He’s good at it, too. Really good at it. Thus, Tobias, Alton, Gibbs, Trevor, and Dave are going out to shoot some pool, drink some very good drinks, and have a (tame) good time, with each other.
And, Gibbs would have to admit, that he and Fornell are intending to really enjoy hustling several groups of puffed up college guys who are vastly too young and stupid to know they’re getting played. First time it happened, they were both undercover. Spent close to three months working slowly into a group that was kidnapping girls and using connections with the Navy to get them out of the country. They played a lot of pool in several dingy bars, slowly building up a reputation as guys who were good in a tight situation.

Highlight of that case (besides the end, busting the guys and rescuing fourteen girls not much older than Emily is now) was hustling a lot of stupid kids out slumming on daddy’s money.

Gibbs is okay at pool. Not bad, but not great. And worse now that he’s missing a good chunk of his latissimus dorsi, which apparently is one of the muscles you use to pull your arm back when getting ready to shoot. Still good enough to run the con.

So, he plays the ‘expert.’ He quietly runs the table, quietly killing the ‘drunk’ Fornell, who flails around with his cue, missing easy shots, drinking a lot (three quarters of the time he’s not really swallowing) and after a few games, Gibbs “gives up” because “it’s no fun taking money from a drunk” and heads back to the bar to get himself another drink.

Trevor, Dave, and Alton are at the bar, watching this, wondering what happens next. Gibbs settles in next to them, smirk on his face, as Fornell asks if anyone else will play him, after all he’s got money and he wants to play, and with the sight of a few twenties flapping around two idiot twenty-two year olds hop up, eager to take the old man’s cash.

Fornell doesn’t suddenly sober up. That’d be too easy. He loses the first game, and Alton’s starting to get worried, but Gibbs puts his hand on Alton’s shoulder, stopping him from interfering.

“He’s just setting them up. If they don’t get greedy, they’ll get out of this fine.”

“They’re going to clobber him.”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Not that sort of place.” They did this, several times in the sort of place where a sore loser would beat the shit out of you. Giving as good as they got was part of how they made a reputation for ‘being useful in a tight situation.’ ‘I’ve got my badge, and he’s got his. They aren’t stupid or drunk enough to take a swing at two cops.”

“You better be right. Mom’ll be pissed if he’s got a black eye or split lip in the wedding pictures.”

Gibbs smiles at Trevor. He supposes that, yes, getting the Groom home, in one piece, not bleeding, is also part of his job as Best Man. So far, he’s managed it for every wedding he’s done this for, and doesn’t expect that streak to end tonight.

Fornell offers to buy all of them a drink. He’s getting married tomorrow, looking happy and flush and drunk, and the college students go for it. They’re toasting him and wishing him good luck. One of the students suggests another game, and Fornell takes them up, losing that one, too.

“This is a game, right?” Alton asks Gibbs, starting to worry that Tobias isn’t playing.

Gibbs nods. “Look at his drink.” Fornell’s been sipping on it all night, but the level’s the same.

Fornell “knocks over” his glass with the weighted end of his cue, and calls for another round, taking a new full glass and having a sip of that, too. When he pays for that round, the college students see that he’s got a few hundreds in his wallet to go with the twenties.

They huddle together for a moment, and then one of them says, “How about we play for some real money. You win, you buy that bride of yours something really nice.”

Fornell thinks about it, smiles, bleary, and says, “How nice?”

“We’ve got a grand between us.”

Tobias smiles wide, and says, “Let me check with the bank,” and gestures to Alton, who’s looking alarmed. The college students all grin, as Tobias walks over. “What do you have on you?”

“I’m not giving you money to gamble away!”

Gibbs smiles then, stepping in. “Here, they need it more than I do.” Handing the money he “won” from Fornell back to him, and saluting the college students with his drink. They grin back at him.

Fornell heads back, dopey smile on his face. Gibbs is in tow, leaning against one of the unused tables. “Can’t wait to see this,” he says.

Fornell nods, sloppily racks the balls. Then he laughs. “Almost forgot.” He hands his money, and Gibbs’, back to Gibbs. “Hold onto it for us?”

Gibbs nods.

The college kids hand over their grand, too. Third party makes sure no one can back out. They think that they’re making sure they get paid, and that Fornell can’t just refuse to hand it over. Gibbs smiles at them, too.

Once Gibbs has the cash, Fornell looks up at them, his smiles sharp and dangerous, and then he steps away, allowing the designated college student, Gibbs thinks his name is Thad (he looks like a Thad), to break. It’s a good break. Thad’s not a bad player. He’s better than Gibbs is. They’re playing eight ball, and Thad broke and ran his first four balls before he misses a shot.

Fornell’s better. He smiles at Thad, lines up, and proceeds to run every striped ball on the table, then, after a few seconds of checking the angles, he calls the eight ball, and pockets it in one perfect, solid thock of the ivory cue against black eight.

He takes the money from Gibbs, still smiling, and says, “Thanks, boys. Wendy will like your wedding present.”

They just stare at him, completely stunned. Fornell, Gibbs, Alton, and the boys are walking out, looking for the next bar, before the college students have even moved from their spots.

“This is what you do for fun?” Dave whispers to Fornell as they’re walking back.

Tobias grins, a thousand stories of many, many good times in mind. “Lately.”

“That sounds like a story,” Trevor adds.

Tobias nods. Then he gestures to Gibbs. “And like I told his boys, maybe, one day, a long time from now, you’ll both be old enough to hear them.”

Jeremy shakes his head, and Trevor gives him a gentle shove as they head off in search of the next group of rubes.
Last stop is Gibbs’ place. Alton, Trevor, and Dave have been returned to their respective homes/hotel rooms, and now it’s just the two of them in the back.

Fornell hands the bottle over to Jethro, who takes it and puts it back in the little bar. (He didn’t expect the limo to do more than drive them around, but apparently limos have gotten a hell of a lot more upscale than the last time he was in one. Or maybe muttering the magic words bachelor party conjured a car with a full bar. He’s not sure. It’s good bourbon, though. He wishes he could have had more than one of them.)

“You’re done?” Neither of them are looking to be hung over tomorrow, so they haven’t been pounding the drinks back, but best Fornell can tell Gibbs has only had three (one was wine with dinner, two was a collection of sips of different drinks at different bars, and three was just now, on the way home).

“Still on pain meds.”

Fornell nods. “Oh.”

For a few miles they ride comfortably together, quiet. “When are we doing this for you?”

Gibbs shrugs. “Got the ring on Thursday.”

Fornell smiles. “Know what you’re going to do with it, yet?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Thinking.”

“Not tomorrow.”

Gibbs flashes him his I’m not an idiot look.

“Got some ideas?”

Gibbs nods at that. He does have some ideas. Depending on how Sunday goes, if, for example they get together for breakfast and then supper at the Slaters, Gibbs may corral Breena, Ziva, and Abby and ask for some suggestions to round out the somewhat nebulous plan that’s starting to form in his head.

“She gonna be home when we get there?”

Gibbs sighs. “Hope so. Hope I’m not going stag tomorrow, but…”

Fornell nods at that, too. Abbi’s even busier than he is. Fornell’s got a, not unlimited, but close enough that it doesn’t make too much difference, pool of people to delegate the stuff McGee’s sending him. Abbi’s got… her team, maybe ten other guys she trusts, and a crop of newbies. She’s hiring as fast as she can, but right now her new guys are either fresh-out-of-FLETC-green, or flooding in from other agencies and not used to CGIS ways, yet. Either way, she doesn’t know them, not yet. They don’t know each other, not yet. She’s doing a lot of the work herself.

“McGee sending her little presents, too?”

Gibbs nods. “Forty-eight names. Probably smuggling. She got back from Boston and grabbing two of them this morning, then right back to work.”

Fornell nods at that. “You couldn’t pay me enough to take her job.”
Abbi is home when they get in. She’s on the armchair, reading something, probably work-related, on her laptop while Mona sits next to her, head resting on her thigh.

“Hey.” Gibbs heads in, leans over the back of the chair to kiss her, as he pats Mona’s head. Abbi’s hand reaches up, wrapping around the back of his neck, gently stroking the short hairs at the back of his neck.

“Neither of you two look like you’ve been to a bachelor party. Shouldn’t you smell like cheap booze and cheaper perfume?”

Gibbs smiles at her. “You want us to go out and get drunk and laid?”

She smiles back, laughs quietly, and pats his cheek. “I’m good with this.”

He nods.

Fornell smiles, watching his friend, finally, really at home.
Date Night

Chapter Notes

First one of two wedding chapters. Everything that's going on would have been too much stuff for one chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

“Aww… Look at you two all pretty!” Breena says to Tim and Abby. They’re at Jimmy and Breena’s, slept over Friday night, and now, as little girls are all settled down for afternoon naps, they’re getting dressed and ready to go to Fornell’s wedding.

“You’ve seen it before,” Abby replies, smiling though, she enjoys the compliment. They’re basically wearing exactly the same outfits they wore to Tony and Ziva’s wedding. Apparently Wendy wanted a black and white wedding. Tony and Ziva got awfully close on that, too. So, Tim’s in his black tux again, and her bridesmaid’s dress is ivory, but that’s close enough to white, and, just like with Ziva’s wedding, she’s about twenty weeks pregnant, so it fits over Sean’s bump nicely.

Really, the only difference is that Abby’s hair is blond now (and up in a pretty French twist) and Tim doesn’t have a boutonniere pinned to his jacket.

“So, how did you get invited to this thing?” Jimmy asks. He’s not feeling any particular loss at not going to Fornell and Wendy’s wedding.

“They came to ours, and I think Emily pouted a little at them,” Abby says, making sure her stockings are straight. (They’re white lace, with a seam up the back. Tim approves, so does Jimmy.)

“Just make sure you get video of Jethro’s speech. I can’t wait to hear this,” Breena says with a grin.

“I think all of us can’t wait to hear this. It’ll hit your inbox as soon as he’s done,” Tim says, pulling on his jacket.

“You’re good with Kelly all night?” Abby asks.

Come on! is a pretty good approximation of Breena’s look. “Go. Have fun. Enjoy that hotel room you’ve got. Soon enough romantic evening out followed by sleeping through the night isn’t going to be an option, so take advantage of it.”

Abby nods at that, fingers stroking over Sean. He’s getting bigger in leaps and bounds, and comfortable sleeping is probably limited to the next month.

Tim’s got her wrap, black satin with little white skulls, maybe not completely wedding appropriate, but it’s very Abby, and black and white. He drapes it over her shoulders. “You two want to do this next week? Go out, do something fun, just you two, and we’ll have the girls?”

Jimmy nods at that, plans already starting to form in his head. “Yeah. Been a while since we’ve had date night with just us.”

“Got some ideas?” Breena asks, smiling at him. Also aware that it’s been… Got to be getting onto six months now, since the last time they went out on their own.
He kisses her, arm around her shoulders, and then pulls Abby close for a kiss, too. “Have fun.”

“I intend to.” Jimmy and Breena both get goodbye kisses from her, and then Tim, and then it’s time to head off, for another wedding.

“Did he actually talk to Rachel?” Abby asks Tim as they head toward Gibbs and Abbi’s place. They’re picking her up (Gibbs has been part of the getting ready for the wedding stuff since this morning) and taking her to the wedding. She’ll go home with Gibbs.

“I think so,” Tim replies. “He seems okay.”

“He’s good at seeming okay.” Abby’s got a good point on that.

“I think, most of the time, he is okay.”

Abby nods at that. Most of the time, Jimmy probably is okay. Kind of like how Tim did a decade of ‘okay’ because nothing rubbed up against any of his hot buttons. But once something did, he was very much not okay, and didn’t have any good tools for dealing with not okay on his own.

And given how Jimmy’s dealing with his own not okay, getting some real coping mechanisms in place is a good plan. Whether this will result in that is yet to be seen. He went, that’s enough for now.

“How about you? Still think this is a good decision?” Abby asks.

Tim shrugs a bit as he glances left, turning into Gibbs’ subdivision. “I don’t know.” He shakes his head a bit. It seemed like a good idea at the time. He’s starting to have some second thoughts now. More and more he is feeling like he’s letting the Admiral off the hook. Then he feels like it’s the right thing to do. Then he wants revenge in many glorious shades of bleeding pain. He hopes he did the right thing. “Water under the bridge now. I don’t think I can go back on it.”

Abby strokes the back of his hand, fingers lingering on the thin, straight scars from where they had to cut his hand open so they could screw the bones back together. They’re dark pink now, better than the bloody red they were before, but still years to go before they fully fade to match his skin tone. She supposes that’s one good thing about being as pale as Tim, eventually, the scars really will blend in, only visible as a slightly different texture of skin. (At least, that’s what Jethro’s bites did, she assumes these won’t do anything different.)

She shakes her head, making herself stop thinking about that, and get back to what they’re talking about. “No. I don’t think you can, either. But we could probably arrange for something he likes to eat or drink to get laced with something nasty. Not kill him or anything, that’d be too obvious, but… explosive diarrhea for a few months is an option.”

Tim smiles, and then shakes his head again. He loves that idea. It’s a terrible idea. He groans quietly. Why does being a good man suck so much?

“How do you think Gibbs’ll do with it?” Abby asks.
Tim shrugs at that, too. He’s not sure how to start that conversation with Gibbs, but supposedly tomorrow afternoon they’re heading over to Tony’s place to check everything out and see what exactly they want the contractor to do, so he figures he’ll get some one on one time then.

“You okay?” he asks Abby. Speaking of one on one time, he’s got hours of it with her now, so might as well take advantage.

Abby takes a deep breath, and thinks for a few more seconds. “It’s frustrating and freeing. I want to be done with him, too, and this helps with that. More importantly, I want you to be done with him, really done, not just pushing it into the background, ignoring it, and hoping it doesn’t jump up and bite you again, and this is probably the right way to do that.” She smiles, half sad, half angry. “And I want him to pay for everything he’s done for you, and… It feels like he’s getting away with it, and that’s frustrating.”

“Yeah.” Tim nods, that sums it up nicely.

They pull into Abbi’s driveway, and Tim changes the subject. “How long do you think it’ll take before I start thinking of this as Abbi’s place?”

“Hopefully not long.” Abby unbuckles her seatbelt. “Let’s go get her.”

---

Tim knocks. Abbi and Gibbs still have the open door policy, but Tim still (like always) knocks. He hears a bark, scrambling claws on hardwood floors, and the sound of Abbi calling down, “Come in.”

“Hey, Mona,” Abby pats her, but stays back. Like most big dogs, Mona sheds like crazy, and right now, in an ivory dress, she doesn’t need a bunch of black hair all over her outfit.

Mona’s a bit confused at not getting her usual love fest from Abbi. Normally she kneels down for some nuzzling and patting and cuddles, but Tim kneels down and pets her more, which he doesn’t usually do. Save for his shirt, he’s in all black, so he’s putting himself between Mona and Abbi’s dress, earning some good husband points. He and Mona have a wary (on his side) relationship, but she appears to be enjoying the attention, and he’s doing his best not to get licked.

A minute later, he hears footsteps on the stairs, and Abby lets out a perfect wolf whistle. He looks up and, damn… “I’ll second that,” he says to Abbi.

It’s a formal black and white wedding, and right now, Abbi’s in white. It’s a strapless sheath dress. Her hair is softly waving down her back in a 1940s ish sort of curl, and she’s got a string of black pearls around her throat and wrist, and two dangling from her earlobes.

Abbi smiles at that and rolls her eyes a bit. Tim gets a little shove when she’s down to the foyer floor. “You two clean up good, too.”

“Tim inclines his head, and Abby smiles.

Abbi pats Mona, once she’s got her coat on. “Don’t wait up. We’re not coming home until late.”

“You’re not staying?” Tim asks.
Abbi shakes her head. “Neither of us realized how far away it was until after all the rooms had booked.” (It wasn’t until this morning, as she was heading out to wrap up some more work, and Gibbs was checking the GPS to see where the hell the reception actually was, that they realized it’s way the hell out in the middle of Virginia. Two minutes on the phone found that every room at the house where they’re holding the reception is now booked.)

“Share with us?” Abby offers.

Abbi’s shaking her head at that before Abby’s done with it. “Not barging in on your romantic night. We’ll be fine. Two hour drive isn’t the end of the world.”

“Might feel like it after a long wedding,” Tim says. No, he doesn’t want to share a room with one bed with Gibbs and Abbi, but he’s also pretty sure about what you do when your family realizes they’re way away from home and don’t have a place to stay.

“We’ll be fine, McGee.”

“Okay. But you can change your mind.”

Abbi shakes her head, and they walk to Abby’s car.

It feels a little bizarre to get to the church and find Gibbs in his own, very black, tux, waiting to escort everyone in. Tim’s not sure why. It wasn’t weird at Senior’s wedding when Tony was ushering, but for some reason this strikes him as odd.

Maybe it’s proof that Gibbs has a life outside of them? That doesn’t feel right.

Maybe it’s the image of Gibbs as the groom? Probably closer. Of course, that’s also probably closer to happening for real, too.

Whatever it is, they head into the church, congratulate Fornell, say hi to Gibbs, and he walks them to a pew on the ‘Groom’s Side.’

Once the girls are seated, Tim, under his breath, says, “White dress, black tux, Minister’s over in the corner… You getting some ideas?” He gives Gibbs a gentle nudge and a shit-eating grin.

For a second, Gibbs looks tempted to glare, but he doesn’t. He smiles and says, just as quietly, “Maybe.”

Tim’s about to give him a good, congratulatory slap on the back, but he pulls it the second before he makes contact. Two reasons, A: his shoulder isn’t up for it, and B: neither is Gibbs’ back.

“Does that mean the ring’s done?”

Gibbs nods again, looking pleased with himself. He’s probably got something to show off tomorrow at Tony’s, too.

Tim’s grinning from ear to ear. “Bet she’d look awfully pretty with a pearl ring to go with the necklace and dress.”
“Not here. Not taking anything away from them.” Gibbs nods back toward Fornell. Tim gets the idea that Gibbs has cast enough of a shadow on Fornell’s previous wedding, no need to do it at this one. “Plenty of time coming up.”

Tim nods and sits down next to his wife, as Gibbs heads back to escort more guests.

“Do you, Tobias Carmine Fornell take Wendy Beth Eccles to be your lawfully wedded wife…”

Tim’s holding Abby’s hand as they watch the exchange. It occurs to him, as he’s sitting there, that, with the exception of Glenn and Sarah, and Gibbs and Abbi, this is it for them and weddings. Probably, within a year, definitely two, everyone they know well enough to get invited to a wedding for, will be married.

It’s a strange realization; this part of their lives is almost over.

He’ll give Sarah away, and they’ll stand up with Gibbs, and then… that’s it. Next up is the kids (hopefully in not less than twenty years).

He strokes her wrist, and she glances away from the vows to him. He kisses her. Only three weddings left to celebrate properly… Nope, this one, and Gibbs’. Sean’ll be maybe two months old at Sarah’s wedding, so that’s not going to be a good wedding for sneaking off for a quickie. Got to get two weddings worth of celebrating into this one.

Abby’s wondering why he’s watching her as closely as he is. He smiles, kisses her once more, and very quietly whispers, “Not a quickie this time,” into her ear.

Really? she signs back.

He grins at her, fingers moving, not perfect yet, but better than the last few times he’s singed something to her. You game for cutting out early?

Abby kisses him back, grins, and settles so her head is on his shoulder. His arm wraps around her as they listen to the rest of the vows.

“I understand the point of destination weddings, but I don’t get this,” Abby says as they’re getting back into the car.

Pregnant bladder means somewhat more frequent than normal pit stops when traveling, and with the reception two hours away from the wedding, a pit stop is needed.

“Driving everyone to the middle of nowhere doesn’t strike you as a good wedding plan?” Abbi says as she buckles back in. She’s also riding with them for this part. Gibbs has been snagged, along with the rest of the wedding party, for at least an hour of photos at the church. Sooner or later they’ll get down here for the reception. Everyone else is driving down, enjoying a cocktail hour, and then, when the wedding party gets to the house, it’ll be dinner and dancing time.
Tim’s mildly amused at the idea of Fornell dancing. He can’t remember if he did at their wedding. Granted, he also wasn’t paying much attention to anything other than Abby that day. Fornell would have needed to be pirouetting around the dance floor in a neon pink tutu before Tim would have really noticed him. He smiles at that mental image.

“No just for a reception. It’d be one thing if we spent the day or weekend out here, but just for one party?” Abby says, still thinking about their conversation, and drawing his attention back to it.

Tim remembers something Diane had mentioned, how Fornell prefers not to be parted from his cash. “Might be a way to keep costs down. Everyone can come to the church, but only people who are really dedicated to this come all the way out here?” he asks as he pulls the car out the gas station parking lot.

The girls think about that.

“Pretty sneaky if it is,” is Abby’s conclusion.

“How did you two get this dedicated to Fornell’s wedding?” Abbi asks.

“Jimmy and Breena offered to take Kelly and pretty much told us to go,” Tim replies.

“And we haven’t met a wedding we didn’t want to celebrate,” Abby adds.

Abbi smirks at that, rolling her eyes a bit. “So I’ve heard.”

Abby grins brightly, and Tim says, “That’s the kind of thing you and Gibbs gossip about?”

Abbi glances at him like he’s being silly. “I was at Senior’s wedding, remember?”

“Right. If memory serves, you got some celebrating in, too,” Abby says with a grin.

Abbi smiles at that.
An hour later, they pull to the end of a long, tree-lined driveway into a parking area in front of an…
Okay, Tim’s not sure what the hell this is. It looks like a medieval British manor house. It’s all stone walls and arches and leaded glass windows. (There’s even a few gargoyles.) It doesn’t look new, at all. But… no one who lived in the US when this would have been built was building things like this. So, to say he’s mildly confused to see this stone behemoth sitting in front of them is an accurate assessment of his views on the subject.

Abby, however, is not confused. She takes one look at the house, inhales sharply, and says to Tim, “I want one!”

He chuckles and shakes his head a bit. “Then you better hope the next book sells a lot better than the last five did.”

Both Abbies laugh at that. They get out of the car, and Abby links her arm in his. He looks to the other Abbi, and offers her his arm, too. She gracefully takes it.

Tim would have to admit, as they’re walking in, that it is something of a kick to be escorting two beautiful women to an event like this. Everyone’s all dressed up and swanky, there’s the buzz of voices around them, pleasant soft jazz in the background, and several waiters are walking around with yummy looking food and drinks. It almost feels like a scene from a movie. Stick an Evil Russian in the corner, hand Tim a martini, and they’re ready to play James Bond.

Tony would really like this. Senior would be even happier.

He kisses his Abby as they get to the cocktail reception and then leaves the girls to head back to the car, grab their bag, and get them checked in for the night.

While he’s waiting at the front desk for the clerk to get his key, he gets the story on this place. It is a medieval British manor. Apparently, back in the 1920’s someone with way too much money and not nearly enough hobbies bought the place, and had it shipped back, block by block, and then reassembled it here.

Unfortunately, he didn’t have long to enjoy it. Construction finished in May of 1929, and the market crashed in October.

He killed himself in November when he couldn’t cover the margin call.

Supposedly, the house is haunted. Though Tim’s not noticing any sense of creepiness. Granted, the places that have triggered his creepy sensors generally involved people who were still alive and interested in doing terrible things.

Tim’s heading up to their room, debating mentioning this to Abby. Might make for an entertaining ghost story. Might make for a night of ‘cleansing’ the place, and him looking for a store that sells sage way the hell out here.

He’ll play that by ear.

He opens the door to their room and smiles. Abby’s going to love this part. The door is wood with cast iron hinges. The key is iron, old fashioned, longer than his finger, slides in and turns with an audible thunk.

It’s a small room. Dark brown hard wood floors. Half timbered walls. Stone fireplace. (That’s been retrofitted for gas. Tim flicks a discretely located switch and flames jump up on the artistically arranged ceramic logs.) LED candles are in sconces on the walls. The furniture, a four posted canopy bed, a dresser, and a wardrobe (there’s no closet) are also dark wood. Gibbs would probably know what it is, but all Tim can say about it is that it’s dark brown.

He tosses their bag onto the bed, and sits down on it. Feels good. Nicely springy, and the maroon comforter feels like it’ll be warm enough.

No bedside tables, that’s annoying, but they’ll cope. Tim opens his bag, fishes around for a moment, finds the massage oil (never let it be said that if sex was on the menu, Timothy McGee didn’t have a plan) and tucks it under the pillows. It’ll be ready for when they get back here.

He checks the bathroom. Tiny, functional. Nothing special or interesting. One side of the door is as close to the 1400s as anyone wants to get, and the other side is every bathroom in every motel they’ve ever stayed in on a job. He puts their toothbrushes and toothpastes by the sink, tucks the shampoo and soaps into the shower, and nods.

It’s clean, the towels are soft, and there are enough of them. That’s all he needs.

His bag goes into the wardrobe. Nothing they’re intending to wear tomorrow needs to be hung up, and he’s not quite so tidy as to unpack the one outfit each that they’ve got in there.

He tucks the key into his pocket, and heads down to find the ladies.

The cocktail hour is pleasant enough. They’re in a “small” ballroom, being serenaded by some sort of low-key cocktail lounge music. Everyone and thing looks marvelously elegant. People sipping drinks and nibbling on… Tim eyes someone eating what he thinks is some sort of little toast with smoked salmon, crème fraiche, and a little dab of caviar on top. He’s got to find whoever’s handing them out.

He does, snagging three of them on a little cocktail plate, (as well as a few shrimp and some sort of pastry thing) and then sees the girls over by the fireplace.

For a moment, he enjoys the view. His Abby in ivory, all sort and curvy, pregnantly-glowy, sipping what is likely a cherry cola (that’s her go-to ‘normal’ non-alcoholic drink), talking to Gibbs’ Abby, tall and slender and poised in black and white. She’s sipping something cloudy and white in a martini glass, and looks so posh she really should be in a 1940’s film noir classic. (He discretely snaps a photo of them, and then Abbi by herself, and sends it to Tony with Femme fatale as the tag line.)

Once he gets there, Abby hands him… he’s not sure. It’s not his normal out and about cocktail scotch. This is brown, but too dark. Smells like booze, coffee, and a bit sweet. He takes a sip. Coffee flavored, bit creamy, sweet, it’s nice. She happily takes the nibbles he’s brought over.

Tim holds up his drink, with a question in his eye.

“Black Russian. Figured you’d like it.”

Tim nods at that. It is yummy.

“Part of the black/white wedding theme,” Abbi adds. She glances at her drink. “This thing’s a White Cloud.”

He’s never had one of them before, either. “Any good?”

Abbi offers him her glass. “Take a sip and tell me.”

That one’s good, too. Chocolate, cream, and… pineapple? Not a combo he’d have come up with on his own, but it’s not bad at all. He’s feeling pretty pleased with himself about not needing to drive anywhere tonight.

Abby starts excitedly telling him the ghost story that goes with the building. Apparently, there are placards in each room explaining their historical significance, as well as different bits about the various owners. (She doesn’t think the place is haunted. Or if it was, it’s not anymore.)

The three of them stick together. They know that Diane and Eric are supposed to be here somewhere, but he doesn’t see them.

“What making her work late?” Tim teases Abbi.

She shrugs, sipping her drink. “I took off for this, didn’t think I could keep her away.”

“What even to save Gibbs and Fornell?” Abby asks with a smile.

Abbi rolls her eyes. “I don’t get why you’re so terrified of her. Yeah, she’s intense, but…” compared to, pretty much the entire Marine Corp, Diane’s not all that impressive.

“She made Tim cry the—“
“No, she did not!” Tim looks alarmed.

“That’s not how Tony tells it,” Abby’s voice is light and teasing as she sips her cola.

“Yeah, well, you know what Tony’s full of. I just said I didn’t ever want to be alone with her after that first time, and Gibbs, in his gentle and encouraging sort of way dropped her at my house and made me babysit her all night.”

Abbi laughs at that. “She ended up at your place?”

“Fornell and Gibbs were fussing about who she should stay with, coming up with worse and worse reasons for it not being them.”

“Fornell claimed he had toxic black mold,” Tim adds, remembering him and Gibbs scrambling around for anything that might get them out of this.

“And then Tim opened his mouth, reminded them they were in the room with one other guy with a gun, who they could boss around. Both of them smiled like they were seeing the sun for the first time. She ended up sleeping on his sofa, spooned up against him,” Abby chimes in with a grin.

Abbi’s eyes go wide, and she looks at Tim. “You slept with Diane!”

“While she was married!” Abby’s having way too much fun with this.

Abbi looks like she’s planning to enjoy it, too. “Okay, back to the beginning! I haven’t heard this story.”

Tim slumps a little and glares at both of them.

Eventually, the wedding party shows up, and everyone is escorted to a large tent off the back of the house. Inside, around a dance floor, there are tables covered in black table cloths. White china, napkins, and flowers accent the tables. At one end of the dance floor, there’s a long table for the wedding party, and all the rest of them are at small, round tables, seating six or eight.
To the right of the head table, is a smaller table with a huge white cake that looks like it’s draped in black lace, surrounded by white roses.

Tim glances at it, nudges Abby, and says, “If we hadn’t gone for cupcakes?”

She nods, and they drift over to look at it more closely. If they had had a cake, it probably would have looked a lot like that. “Red flowers?”

He nods. Add some more roses to that, and that would have done perfectly for them.

On both the left and the right, the tent opens to the gardens beyond. The timing of dinner begins to make more sense. The sun’s finally down, and outside there are shadowy shapes of trees and hedges, all covered in millions of sparkling fairy lights.

Tim kisses Abby, happy to be here with her, surrounded by so many beautiful things.

Abbi’s searching the tables, looking for theirs, and she finds it, waving them over. Tim sees two more redheads at the table, and he smiles. Of course…

“Is this Fornell’s idea of a joke, or Wendy’s?” Tim asks as he kisses Diane’s cheek and greets Eric as they all settle in for dinner.

“I think they decided we were better off all tucked into one corner on our own,” Abbi replies.

“Not entirely on our own,” Eric says, looking at the name tags on their table. “Who’s Ron Sacks?”

“I am,” Ron says, showing up as Eric says his name. He offers his hand. “Is this the law enforcement table?”

“Ron Sacks.” His voice is wary as he says that. He knows who Diane is, and can’t believe she’s here tonight. He’s fairly sure she doesn’t know who he is. And there’s no reason why she should. She and Fornell were divorced when they partnered up. “I was Tobias’ partner for a few years. I know…” he’s squinting at Tim, like he kind of knows who he’s talking to, but isn’t entirely sure. “You’re NCIS, right?”

Tim nods. “Tim McGee. You tried to put my partner in prison about ten years ago. I’m the one sending you and Fornell lists of names of people who need to be investigated.”

Ron nods. “You’re the one keeping me in overtime.”

“Me, too.” Draga adds. “NCIS, also. I’m on DiNozzo’s team, and we’re also running down guys on that list. You know everyone else?”

Ron glances at Abby, looking carefully. “You had black hair the last time I saw you.”

“Yes, I did. And a different name. Abby McGee now. And just to make things interesting, she’s Abbi, too.”

“Abbi Borin,” Borin offers her hand. “CGIS.”

Ron’s eyes light up. He’s finally able to place Abbi, who looks familiar to him. “I knew I knew you. I’ve been seeing you on the news. You’re the one who broke the mess there.”

“I had some help,” she says dryly, looking at the people around her, and then glancing at Gibbs.
“Wait, are you here with Gibbs?”

She nods at that, too.

Ron looks over to Gibbs, who is up at the head table with the rest of the wedding party. “Wow. Okay. He’s retired now, right?”

“Why are you thinking that?” Abby asks.

“DiNozzo’s got his own team. And all of his emails say Director of Cybercrime on them. Don’t see half of his team wandering off if he’s still there.”

Ron’s not wrong about that. “He retired in January,” Abbi says.

“And they needed crowbars to pry him out of his desk?” Ron asks.

Tim nods. “Just about.”

Since they’re all working, more or less, the same job, conversation flows fairly well.

Eric, Diane, and Abbi think the story of FBI V. NCIS is funny. They have a good time talking about Chip, and Abby doesn’t mind a story where she’s the one who saves the day at the end.

They’ve also all got bits of the same massive case, and listening to Draga and Sacks getting into grabbing these guys and pumping them for information is interesting.

Tim and Abbi both glance at each other as they’re talking, a shared sense of feeling out of place by not being in the field any longer. Not all that long ago, those interrogation stories would have involved them, too.

Dinner is good. Fairly standard wedding fare, prime rib or chicken, or the vegetarian lasagna. Tim’s a bit surprised that there isn’t more of an Italian pasta-oriented meal, since that seems to be something Fornell really likes, but as Diane points out, trying to eat something with red sauce when you’re in a white dress is a disaster waiting to happen.

Abbi laughs at that, and nods, and goes into a story about how something always happens when she’s in a nice dress. Only time she’s gotten dressed up, really dressed up in the last five years that didn’t involve getting bled on/dirty was DiNozzo Sr.’s wedding.

Ron’s got a few stories of good evenings out that didn’t happen. (Tim wonders if that’s part of him being single.) Abby trumps all of them with Jimmy and Breena’s wedding story, and the table agrees that they win the most distressing work-screwing-your-personal-life award.

Dinner wraps with the first dance. Fornell does dance, well, for that matter, and he’s holding his bride and grinning like everything in the universe is perfect. Abby coos a bit at that, and Tim holds her closer, remembering how that felt.
The second dance opens the floor, and Tim and Abby head out eagerly.

The music is pretty tame. Mostly instrumentals that Tim doesn’t recognize. There’s enough beat to dance to, and it’s not so loud you can’t talk. Really, that’s all he needs from wedding music.

He’s got his hands on the small of her back, and she’s got her arms around his shoulders as they sway to a soft, gentle beat.

“Another month, and it’ll be two years for us.”

He nods at that. “Three weeks and it’ll be four years.”

She kisses him gently. “Good four years.”

“Oh yeah.” His hand drifts to her belly. “Nothing I could have ever guessed, but everything I ever wanted.”

She’s looking into his eyes as she says softly, “Exactly.”

Dancing breaks for cake cutting and dessert.

Fornell and Wendy go through the traditional motions, turning a big dessert into a smaller one, and feeding each other little bites of what appears to be chocolate cake.

Once they’re done, everyone sits down, ready for (at least for Tim and Abby) the main event. Tim’s got his phone out, Gibbs in focus, and is recording away.

They watch as the wedding coordinator heads over to Gibbs, hands him a microphone (which Gibbs immediately puts down) and then starts clinking a spoon on a glass, getting everyone’s attention.

Gibbs closes his eyes, takes what looks like a deep breath, lets it out slow, and then stands up. (Microphone still on the table, forgotten.) He looks over to their table, his eyes finding Abbi, Tim, and Abby, and all three of them are thinking you’ve got this! thoughts at him.

He takes one more breath, squares his shoulders, and then kisses Wendy on the cheek. It’s hard to hear what he’s saying, but Tim thinks he says, “For making my friend happier than he’s ever been.” Then Gibbs steps over, gives Fornell a firm whack up the back of the head, and says, “For waiting two years to ask her out.” The whole room is silent for a heartbeat, shocked, and then Emily starts laughing like that’s the funniest thing in the history of funny things, which gets Fornell laughing, followed by everyone else.

When everyone quiets down, he hugs both of them, and lifts his glass. “For both of you, a long life filled with the love of each other and the joy that love brings you.” Then he kisses Wendy again, hugs Fornell, and sits back down.

The video Tim sends out ends with Gibbs looking fairly pleased with himself, surrounded by the sound of him and Abbi giggling while Abby says, “Oh, my god! That’s a perfect Gibbs best man’s speech!”
Dinner might have been pretty much standard wedding food. Okay, not spectacular. Everything was more or less cooked the way it was supposed to be and put in front of the right person. (They watched the waiter break out into a sweat at Diane’s extremely specific order, but he got it right, earning many thanks.)

Dessert is spectacular. Tim’s not sure what he’d call this cake. Black velvet? It’s chocolate, really, really intense chocolate, and probably had some sort of extra food coloring added because it’s midnight in a cave black. The filling is black cherries and probably brandy. (Tim knows it’s got alcohol in it, and that said alcohol isn’t scotch or tequila, beyond that… Eventually a waiter identifies it as spiced rum.) It’s dark and sweet and a little spicy, a little sour, and all wrapped in this rich cloud of white chocolate buttercream.

He valiantly offers to eat Abby’s cherries. It’s probably not enough alcohol to worry about, but she’s not interested in taking any risks, and he knows she loves cherries, so if they sit there on her plate, gently calling to her, she might eat one. (At least, that’s the way he attempts to convince her to let him eat her cherries. She raises an eyebrow at him, spears one on her fork, lets him eat it, and goes back to finishing her dessert. Draga makes a crack about getting shot down. Tim chews his cherry, smirks, and points out he got one more than Eric did.)

More dancing. It’s really not late. Not even nine, yet. But he can feel Abby’s slowing down.

“She tired?” he asks as she’s leaning a bit more heavily against him than normal.

She shakes her head. “Just pregnant. My feet are done.”

He grins at her. “Then let’s get out of here. We’ve got a room, massage oil, and hours and hours of free time. Let me see if I can make those feet happy.”

She grins back. “Sounds like heaven!”

They say goodnight to everyone, resulting in some smirking from Gibbs and Abbi, and a collection of sympathetic looks from the people who think they’re cutting out early just because of pregnant tiredness.

Tim leans against the doorway as Abby gives the room a one over. He was right; she loves it. She flops onto the bed with a sigh, and he kicks off his shoes, slips off his jacket, and then turns on the fireplace and the candles while turning off the overhead lights.

The room goes dim, lit with flickering golds and warm oranges.
She’s lying on her side, then props herself up on one arm, watching him as he slowly unbuttons his vest.

“Show time?” she asks.

“You want a show?” he smiles a bit, loosening his tie, very deliberately. His long fingers coaxing fabric through the knot.

“Always,” she grins up at him.

“Mmmm…” his eyes spark with wicked pleasure as he pulls his tie from his collar and drapes the black silk over the foot of the bed. “Might want that, later.”

Her eyes are equally alight as she says, “Oooohhh! Yeah, we might.”

He steps closer to the bed, trails his finger down her left leg, and then cups his hand gently around her ankle, slipping her shoe off. She shifts from reclining on her hip to her butt, her weight on one hand to both of them, and lifts her right foot, up, and he repeats the gesture, then lifting her leg to kiss her ankle before gently putting her leg back on the bed.

He’s leaning over her once he’s got her foot back on the bed, so she tugs on his vest, and he slips that off, too. Taking a few steps back to the dresser, he lays it on his jacket. (He quickly shucks off his socks, too. There’s no good way to get them off for this sort of game.) Then he turns back to Abby, who’s now sitting on the bed.

“White button down, black dress slacks…” She’s looking him up and down as he heads back to the bed. Tim pops the first button on his shirt, standing in front of her, keeping up eye contact.

Abby licks her lips and follows the view of his hands as they unbutton each successive button on his shirt. Her eyes trace over his skin, reveling in the dichotomy of pale gold light and gray shadow.

He offers her his wrist, and she undoes the button, and again, on the right side.

“On or off?” he knows she likes him a little undressed, and is fine with either option.

“Off.”

He leans in a little closer, and she pushes the shirt off his shoulders, letting it fall to the floor. Her hands trace across his shoulders and down his arms. This time four years ago, they were, save for the code tattoo and Jethro’s bites, unmarked.

Four years has changed him, inside and out, and it shows on his skin, and the wrinkles around his eyes when he smiles, and the few gray hairs threading through the dark brown.

Abby kisses the cuff tattoo, and the scar on the inside of his bicep. She kisses the scars on his wrist and hand, and carefully takes the cuff off his left wrist, and kisses the tattoos there. She lifts his left hand to her lips, and kisses his wedding band, and the scars from sparring with Jimmy on his knuckles, before looking up and smiling at him. “You’re so beautiful.”

He smiles back at her, voice dry as he says, “Even all marked up?”

“Yeah.” She pulls back as he kneels in front of the bed, and the kisses the scar through his eyebrow, and gently strokes her fingers through his hair, looking into his eyes, smiling a little, and says, “Mine.” She kisses him again, fingertips on his chest, feeling smooth skin and silk fine hairs under the pads of her fingers. “And yours, always yours.”
“This breath to my last.” The vow that’s shaped his life these last four years. It’s grown, changed, but that bedrock is still there. He leans forward and kisses her, one hand on her neck, the other resting gently over their son.

The fingers on her neck trace down to the top of her dress, finding the hook and eye, and slipping it open. A few seconds after that, he’s got the zipper between his fingers and is pulling it down.

Abby shifts a bit, so he can pull the dress over her head easily, and he does, and like with his jacket and vest, he carefully lays it on the dresser. Part of it is about taking care of nice clothing, part of it is enjoying walking around and letting her really look at him.

And she is watching. The flex of his shoulders as he carefully smooths the silk of her dress against the dresser, the press of his butt and thighs against his slacks as he steps, the slight jut of his dick against his fly, as watching her, feeling this moment, starts to wake it up.

He’s watching, too. Abby’s halfway between sitting and kneeling on the bed. Most of her weight on one hip, with her legs curled close to her. Her arms are raised as she’s taking the pins out of her hair, letting it loose.

He smiles, and gets a shot of that. Her arms up, breasts high, cupped by white lace, belly round and smooth, legs also caressed by white lace. “I should blow that up. Hang it in my office. Motivational pin-up poster.”

Abby giggles. “And, would you find that motivating to actually work?”

“Only if my job responsibilities radically change. I’d find it motivating to get home.”

She smiles at that. “You and Jimmy need a man cave. You can put it up there.”

He laughs at that, and then sits behind her on the bed. “Want some help?”

“Sure.”

Her hair is long enough now that it does things like twists okay, but okay means she still needs a decent number of pins to keep it in place. He’s kissing her neck and shoulder as he finds the bobby pins and slips them out.

When he tries to run his fingers through her hair, they snag.

“I think you missed a few.”

“May have been distracted.” He pulls the last two out, and then runs his fingers, successfully, through her hair. It’s a bit poof-y and wild, but he likes that look. He loves the way her hair feels, soft and silky between his fingers. And he really loves the pleased moan that eases out of her as he begins to gently rub her scalp. “So, what’s sore from lugging Sean around?”

She smiles, wry look on her face. “What isn’t?”

He kisses her, then says with a grin, “Then I guess I’ll just have to rub you all over to make it all better.”

“I think you will.”

He sighs, teasing her with, “What a way to spend a night.”

She gently nips his bottom lip. “You know you love it.”
He kisses her shoulder, and looks up at her. “You know it, baby. Feet to head, head to feet?”

“Feet are pretty sore.”

“Feet then.” He moves away from her, grabbing the massage oil from under the pillow, and then piling them all at the head of the bed. “Sit back and relax.”

Normally, she’d just lie on her back for something like this, but on her back isn’t comfortable for more than a few minutes right now. Lounging reclined works, too, and gives him more room at the foot of the bed.

He settles himself at her feet, between her legs, and then traces his fingers up her calf, light whispers of a touch, before shifting a bit to kiss her belly, hip, and thigh. Just little kisses. Hello kisses. Then his fingers find the edge of her stocking, slip under, and slowly peel it off her leg.

Abby makes a pleased, “Mmmmm” sound at that. Tim echoes it, enjoying unwrapping his wife, noticing that Breena must have done her toes, because she’s got a pedicure: white base with silver French tips.

He tosses the stocking behind him when he’s got it off, and uncaps the oil, drizzling a teaspoon or so in his hand, and he’s ready to go. He rubs it between his palms and fingers, warming it, before he firmly cups her heel and ankle in his hands. For a moment, he just holds, then he sweeps his hand down her foot, over her toes, before shifting direction, and sweeping all the way up to the back of her knee.

Several more long strokes has her whole lower leg slick and glistening in the soft gold light. He kneads down her leg, back to her foot, and begins in earnest.

He cups her ankle in his right hand, and takes her big toe in his left. Soft little motions, holding and squeezing, gently circling each toe, milking them. She’s purring before he gets to her pinkie toe. He worms his fingers between them, flexing them back and forth, working all the little kinks out.

Each toe gets a soft, little kiss on the tip, and then he moves onto her foot. Warming strokes, both of his whole hands rubbing up and down the length of her foot, circling over her ankle, up and down, over and over. He worms his fingers between her toes again, getting a firm grip, and this time rotates her foot at the ankle, loosening it up, giving everything a little shake.

Then knuckles, pressing into the arch of her foot, rippling against the sore muscle, making small, focused circles, stripping up and back along the tendons, over and over until Abby’s gone from purring to full on moaning.

“I think the last time you made that sound, Jimmy and I were getting you off.”

“Then maybe you need to do this more often.”

He slips his finger tips to her ankle and begins to circle it with firm pressure, making little circles with the pads of his fingers, while his whole hands move in bigger circles around the bones.

She moans again, loud.

“Maybe I do.”

“If it gets me more foot rubs like this, I’ll moan you the whole Hallelujah Chorus.”

Tim tries moaning the first few bars, but they both end up giggling too hard to keep that up for more than a moment.

She moans again. “It’s really good.”

“Yeah. I guessed.” He’s looking forward to the next time he gets a massage that isn’t designed to break down scar tissue or increase flexibility. One of these days, they’ll rub on him just to make him feel good. He’s intending to enjoy it.

He starts on the top of her foot, mostly just stroking up and down. Not a lot of muscle there, so he’s not trying anything firm or deep, just petting.

“And those shoes are cute, but pregnant feet do not like cute shoes. Pregnant feet like flip flops and slippers and boots that are a size too wide with lots of arch support.”

He kisses the top of her foot. “Then we’ll not ask pregnant feet to get into anything other than flip flops, and slippers, and too big boots.”

She smirks at that, and then moans again as his hands slip from her feet to her calf, getting a nice, tight grip and slowly sliding up to her knee.

“Pregnant calves really appreciate that, too.”

“How about this?” He starts circling both thumbs (though his right is less likely to make a circle and more likely to do a somewhat jerky back and forth) in her calf while the rest of his hand rests on the top of her leg, slipping down.

“Pregnant calves love that.”

“And this?” The top of his hands stay where they were, but instead of circling them, he tries twiddling his thumbs against her calf as he slides back up. (His right thumb cooperates better with that, too.)

Another very happy sigh.

They continue like that, warm strokes, quite conversation. Calf became thigh, and apparently pregnant thighs get sore, too. And pregnant thighs very much appreciate being carefully rubbed from knee to hip, hands stroking up and down, ripping against tight muscles.

From thigh, he slips off her panties, and bra, and has her scoot down a bit, lying her side. He’s snug up behind her (Still wearing his trousers, there’s going to be a hell of a dry cleaning bill for this, but he doesn’t care.) stroking her hip, digging his finger into the tense, sore muscles there, soothing them with smooth, slick pressure. Hip leads to buttock, can’t skip that. It’s round and smooth in his hands, and he’s making sure to keep his pressure deep and firm. Her leg ends up on his hip (better access… sure, that’s it.) He’s rubbing his thumbs across the fleshy bit of her buttock, then stroking from there down the back of her leg, and back up again, edging closer and closer to her pussy with each stroke.

Abby’s making very pleased sounds, and rubbing up against him in what he considers and exceptionally pleasant and distracting sort of way.

Eventually, he nips her ear and says. “If you want me to get to your left, tone that down.”

She thinks about it for a moment, wiggles against him once more, and then goes still. He thinks about it, too. If he keeps working on her butt, he’s not going to get to her left side anytime soon, so he goes to her belly. Very soft, very gentle. Much more petting than massage. He can feel Sean squirming around, so maybe he likes belly rubs. Abby certainly seems to. She’s making happy sounds, but has kept herself fairly still while he’s doing it.

Eventually, belly becomes ribs and chest. He tries to stick to her ribs and pecs, but there’s a lovely white and pink breast right there, under his hand, and it’s also all soft and warm and slick, and he can’t not play with it. Abby’s enjoying it, too, arching into his touch, rubbing against him. When her hand slips between them to find his fly, that wakes Tim up enough that he notices that what he’s doing doesn’t qualify as a massage anymore. At least, not the sort that’s legal.

Her hand is squeezing him through his trousers, stroking, and he’s moaning, too.

“Finish the massage or go with this?” he asks, sounding a little breathless.

“Oh, god, this!”

He nods, kissing her neck and shoulder, helping her with his trousers, getting them shoved down a bit and his dick free. A little more shifting, and Abby scooting back a few more inches, one sweet thrust, and he’s groaning along with her, both of them reveling in that first, slick push.

His right arm is under her neck, and her right hand finds his, twining fingers with his, tightening them on him as they start a slow, lazy rhythm.

Her leg is draped over his hip, her left hand on his butt, giving him a squeeze as his left heads for her breast again, rubbing and gently circling her nipple as they rock together.

She twists as much as she can, so they can kiss as well as make love, and their lips find each other, tongues mirroring the slow, easy pace of their hips.

It’s kindling sex. Small sparks slowly joining together growing hotter and brighter. Embers glowing red and gold, sparking to flames with a shift of the hips or a quick squeeze/suck. Small flames licking along fingers and toes, growing wider, hotter, creeping up legs and arms, then racing, bonfire high as they course from nipples to thrusting, wet, ecstatic pulses.

Tim’s so content and satisfied when they’re done, he doesn’t want to pull back long enough to kick off his pants. But eventually Abby gets up to use the bathroom, so he does, not worrying about making sure they don’t get wrinkled.

A moment later she’s back, flicking off the candles, but leaving the fireplace on. She snuggles into him, and he burrows under the blankets with her, wrapping around her, kissing the back of her neck.

A minute later breathing slows, steadies, and they shift into dreams.

Chapter End Notes

Thanks to Pornell Fangirl for Fornell's middle name! (She mostly writes Fornell/Jimmy and it's lovely!)
“Come on! Let’s GO!”

“Wedding’s not for three hours, Tobias. Sit back down.”

Fornell is not sitting down. He’s buzzing around Gibbs’ living room, enough nervous energy pouring off of him to make Mona jumpy.

Fornell paces across the floor again. The game they’re supposed to be watching is just a blur in the background, and if he doesn’t quit this soon, Mona is going to start chasing him, thinking this is a game of tag or something. Gibbs pulls himself up from the sofa, grabs Fornell by the hand, and takes him into the basement.

“I’m not sanding anything.”

“Wasn’t going to ask you to,” Gibbs replies. (And he wasn’t planning on sanding anything himself, either. Right now, he’s got to wear a face mask to sand anything, which he hates.) He heads over to his collection of jars filled with screws, grabs one, unscrews the lid, and then very gently pours out the screws. Also in there, is a small ring box. “Here. Take a look.”

“Is that…”

“Yeah.” He hands the box over to Fornell, who opens it and then looks at the ring approvingly.

“Nice job.”

“Thanks.” He tucks the ring back into the jar, and then carefully pours the screws back over it. He jiggles it a few times, making sure the screws are settled around the box, and puts it back.

Fornell watches. “What are you going to do if she decides she needs a screw?”

Gibbs laughs. “Give her one.”

Fornell gives him a gentle shove. Then he checks his watch. “Well, that ate up three minutes. Now what?”

“Best hotel in DC? Not the Adam’s House.”

That has Fornell interested. “Best how?”

Gibbs starts to explain his plan, and Fornell nods, offering advice. That takes more than three minutes.

Mona’s staring up at Abbi. Gibbs and Fornell left three hours ago and Abbi only just got back. She wants to snuggle and play.

Abbi shakes her head. “Nope.”
More doggy staring, big brown eyes shouting, play with me.

“If you come up, you’ll shed all over me.”

“Stay down here. Let me know when McGee and Abby get here, okay.”

Abbi nods and heads up the stairs to go get ready for Fornell’s wedding. On the way to the shower, she walks past her dress. Her white dress. She wonders if part of why Wendy picked a black and white wedding was to get everyone else thinking weddings, too. Either remembering their own, or pondering how they may go.

Abbi flicks on the shower, thinking about her dress. It’s not old, exactly, or very new, either. She bought it for an undercover op four years ago. They were supposed to be a wedding on a cruise. Good enough cover. It made sure the guys smuggling untaxed rum in from Haiti thought they had a reason to want several cases. (The rum-runners were small fish in a much bigger op. But domino one’s got to fall before domino two can.)

She was the only girl on the team, so she got to play the bride. (Her suggestion that Henry would look great in a white dress didn’t go over too well.) Several moments of looking at the lace and sparkle encrusted, poofy monstrosities that CGIS had on hand for her made her decide that she had to get her own dress.

The, what the hell, not like I’m ever going to get to do this for real, moment meant she got a real wedding dress, one she liked, one that looked amazing on her, and kept it. It’s a sheath dress, strapless, sweetheart neckline, fine white silk that flows like molten pearl down her skin.

Omagi saw her in it at the start of the op (he was playing the minister) and said quietly to her, “I really hope you get to wear this for real one day.”

She’s not sure if today counts as ‘for real’ and for that matter, she’s not sure if she’d wear this ‘for real.’ She’s certainly aware of the fact that she and Gibbs are moving towards a marriage, and likely a wedding, at some point, but she’s still very nebulous on the concept of what a Borin-Gibbs wedding would look like.

As she’s washing her hair, she’s thinking that part of not having any concrete ideas on the subject (since it’s not like being vague or nebulous about anything is part of her usual personality) is a way of making sure she’s not too disappointed if it doesn’t happen.
“The Camaro?” Diane says, sounding a little annoyed when Eric leads her to his car.

“We’re taking Emily home, and she loves it,” Eric replies.

Diane nods at that, and sighs a little. That’s a good reason for the car, and it’s not like there’s anything wrong with the Camaro. Sometimes, though, she wonders what the hell she’s doing with Eric. It’s not that he isn’t a great boyfriend, because he is. He’s gorgeous (and ripped), and sweet, and kind, and cooks, and as good of a dad as his ex will let him be, and Emily loves him (and Kevin), and it’s not that Diane doesn’t like him, because she does, but God, he’s just so damn young.

She’s looking at part of being so damn young. It’s a blood red, hand rebuilt, customized, modified, ’68 Camaro. Eric drag races with it. Off-road. He shouldn’t. He’s a cop after all, and it’s illegal as hell. But, he loves it, loves what he does with it, and according to him, there is nothing now that he’s not flying anymore, like getting six guys together on a long stretch of beach out in the middle of nowhere and opening his baby up.

And she is beautiful, in an almost menacing sort of way. She’s beautiful the way a sword or a gun can be beautiful. According to him, on pavement she’ll break 200 (and no, Diane does not want to know how he knows that) and on sand she’ll get to 120 (she really doesn’t want to know how he knows that).

He doesn’t usually drive her on pavement. Doesn’t usually drive her period. Most of the time she sits in his garage, and he pets her with his polishing cloths and tinkers under her hood. (Diane sighs at that. Jethro has his boats. Fornell’s got his car, too. Sterling loved model trains. What does it say about her that she’s not happy with a guy unless he’s got some sort of thing to spend hours tinkering with?)

Since her tires and suspension and torque are all specialized for driving on sand or gravel, she’s not as good on pavement as the kinds of cars the urban drifters go for. But, for a nice, sedate drive home from a wedding, the Camaro’ll do just dandy. For impressing a teen girl who idolizes him, it’s even better. Diane knows that Emily will light up seeing her. She loves the idea that Eric’s got this big, fast, dangerous car that he spends his downtime on. She’s even, on a few occasions, headed over to Eric’s to mess around with the Camaro, too. (In fact, if she wasn’t seriously grossed out by the idea that he dates her mom, Diane’s pretty sure Emily would have a crush on Eric. But the idea that he sleeps with Diane did a good job of killing any interest Emily might have had in him. So, now he’s the awesome big brother and Kevin’s the awesome little brother she always wanted and never had.)

And then Eric opens the door to the Camaro for her, handing her in, and Diane would have to admit that showing up at her ex-husband’s wedding in a goddamn sexy car, with a six foot two, two-hundred and twenty pounds of sculpted muscle Federal Agent, who’s more than twenty years younger than she is, and filling out his tux in all the right ways, is a kick.

Though she does wonder when she became the lady with the trophy boyfriend.

And she wonders if he’s really a trophy boyfriend. He’s not here just because he looks good. (Though that never hurts.) And especially after Sterling, a guy who can hold a decent conversation, isn’t hiding anything from her, puts away terrorists and killers for a living, and can do push-ups with her sitting on his back (and she really enjoyed how she knows that), plus doesn’t need heart meds or Viagra, is a treat.

She wonders what Eric gets out of this. He seems happy. But she knows he can do ‘better.’ At least, he can do younger, and prettier, and certainly kinder, definitely easier-going.

Diane sighs. They’ve probably got a conversation coming up.
The tuxes are very black. Boutonnieres are white calla lilies. Fornell’s pacing around the foyer to the chapel, with a determined and excited stride. Gibbs is sitting, watching him. Alton’s leaning against the doorway, looking pretty relaxed. Trevor and Dave are off with Team Bride, getting ready to give their mom away.

T-minus one hour. Probably at least half an hour before anyone’s even going to be showing up. Even the minister isn’t here, yet.

Fornell makes a fast turn, and goes back into the chapel. It’s all set. Pews are looking pew-like. White roses and calla lilies are all over the place. They’re all tied with black ribbons. At the front of the chapel, there’s a forest of white pillar candles, all of which are also tied with black satin ribbons at the base.

Gibbs grabs Fornell’s hand as he’s about to head in there and start fiddling with something. He looks up at Fornell and shakes his head. “You’ll just mess it up.”

“How can I mess up lighting candles?”

“By doing it an hour before they need to be lit,” Alton says. He’s two years younger than Fornell, looks like him, except for the fact that unlike Fornell, he’s still got a full head of hair, and unlike Fornell, he’s got a desk job running analytics for a health insurance company, so he’s a lot rounder than Tobias. He shakes his head. “Kind of wish we still smoked.”

Fornell sighs at that. “Then we’d all be in the back puffing away.”

“Remember your first wedding, you, me, the minister…” Alton shakes his head. “God, it was so cold. We were out there on the front stoop, puffing away. Diane caught the smoke on you and spent the first half of the reception bitching you out for smoking, baby on the way…” He looks over at Gibbs, who is listening quietly and intently. “You ever meet Diane?”

Gibbs gives Tobias a look, and quietly says, “Yeah, we’ve met.”

“Then you know how she can get when she’s pissed. ‘Smoking! Don’t you care anything about our baby! Don’t you want to be here when she’s a grown up!’ and on and on… She’s a piece of work! And pregnant on top of that. Yikes!” Alton shudders.

“She’s a bit calmer now,” Tobias adds.

“Be hard not to be. Can’t believe you invited her.”

“She invited me to hers,” Fornell adds.

“Yeah, but you didn’t go,” Alton replies.

“You were going to,” Gibbs says.

“Yeah, well, my wingman dropped out,” Fornell shoots back at him.

Alton looks at both of them, realizing that Gibbs was the wingman in question. “You were both invited? How do you know Diane?” Alton asks Gibbs.

Gibbs glances between them. He’s not sure how much Alton knows about the situation with Diane.

Apparently, Alton knows enough. He looks from Gibbs to Fornell and back. “Oh. Wait. You’re… Oh, shit, I’m sorry.”

Gibbs shakes his head at that. “You’re not the one who got her pregnant.”

“How are you two even still speaking with each other? Let alone her…”

“Long story,” Fornell says.

Alton smiles. “We’ve got an hour. Have at it.”

Tobias elbows his brother, seeing what he’s doing, getting his mind off of the impending wedding and talking about something else. Instead of giving him the backstory he says, “She’s working for his fiancée now.”

Gibbs rolls his eyes at that one. “With. Diane doesn’t work ‘for’ anyone.”

“Is she really coming?” Tobias asks. “McGee’s got to be sending her piles of goodies, too.”

Gibbs nods at that. Since they don’t actually know anyone at the IRS anymore, and since the IRS looks shady as hell right now, Tim’s been sending all of his IRS stuff to Tobias (because FBI has jurisdiction over public corruption cases) and Diane (because she knows the ins and outs of everything IRS.)

“You know she’s coming. Someone’s got to take Emily home tonight,” Alton adds.

“I can hope, right?”

“Maybe she’ll back out last minute, like you did with her wedding,” Gibbs says.

Fornell shakes his head. “I was bringing you to her wedding. She’s bringing Flyboy. No shot in hell she’ll pass that up.”

“Who’s Flyboy?” Alton asks.

“You’ll see.” He nudges Gibbs. “Those two are running a competition for who’s got the hottest redhead, and she’s winning.”

Gibbs shakes his head. “I’m winning.”

Fornell laughs at that.

While it’s true that Gibbs is doing a better job of not looking nervous than Fornell is, it’s also true that he feels nervous.

Which he hates.

On several levels. First off, it feels bad. He’s not sure how Tim survived what looked like feeling like this for years at a time. He’s sure that if he felt like this for more than a few hours a year, he’d be drunk non-stop to kill it.

Second of all, it’s stupid. He’s going to give a speech. A (very) short speech. Worst comes to worst, he looks like a moron doing it. Not like it’ll be the first time he’s looked stupid. Won’t be the last, either. And on top of that, almost everyone at this thing doesn’t know him. And really, when it comes down to it, if he completely bombs it, he knows Tim won’t send the video around. It’s one thing to poke fun at him, it’s another to humiliate him, and Tim won’t be part of the latter.

So… he’s not in the greatest mood ever as they finally get the go ahead from the Minister to start lighting the candles. He takes as deep a breath as he can, tries to make himself relax, and debates making Fornell be his best man, because he hates public speaking just as much as Gibbs does.

With a somewhat mean smile on his face, Gibbs pulls the lighter he always carries (Sub-rule 9A: Always carry a lighter. 9B: Coffee grounds. 9C: Water. 9D First aid kit. Rule Nine in all its variations has kept him alive and functional in a whole slew of situations.) out of his pocket and tries to imagine Fornell having to give his best man’s speech.

That helps calm the gnawing in his gut, but it doesn’t kill it by any stretch of the imagination.

Go time in ten minutes.

Diane and Eric come in, and Alton understands why Diane wouldn’t pass this up. Eric’s in a classic tux, but he’s swapped out the white shirt for a black one, and contrasted it with a white tie and vest. Alton might not spend much time considering male beauty, but he knows arm candy when he sees it, and Eric’s arm candy.

Diane’s in black, too. Halter top dress, with the neck and bodice covered in intricate sparkly black swirls, and a flood of matte black silk flowing down to her ankles. Her hair is up in a bun, and she smiles at both of her ex-husbands before kissing cheeks and offering congratulations.

“You ready for this?” she asks Jethro.

He rolls his eyes a little, feeling more nervous as she watches him.

She sees it, squeezes his hand. “Just like that case. Pretend someone’s holding a gun on me, and do the job.”

He smirks, but, that actually might help. Just another case. Mission: Get Fornell Married. He can cope with that.

“Emily with the bridal party?” she asks Tobias.

Fornell nods. “I bet she’d like it if you went in to say hello.”

“We will.” She squeezes Tobias’ hands again, and heads back to the room where Team Bride is hiding. As Gibbs watches her leave, he feels off. This is… like a new flavor of nervous, and he doesn’t like that, either.

Once they’re gone, Alton says quietly to Tobias, “Flyboy?” distracting Gibbs from whatever it is he’s sensing.

“Experimental pilot for the Navy, now he’s an NCIS agent,” Fornell adds.

“So, he worked for you?” Alton asks Gibbs.

“Only for about five minutes.”

Five minutes later, the McGees and Abbi come in, and Alton does shake his head. Both of those two managed to pull redheads way out of their leagues. As Gibbs is escorting his lady and kids to their seats on the Groom’s side, he quietly says to Fornell, “No disrespect to Wendy, but where the hell did those two find them?”

Fornell shrugs. “As long as you don’t mind never seeing your love, you can find some really pretty federal agents.”

Alton thinks about that. “You’ve got the better deal.”

Fornell nods. “I agree.”

Gibbs would have to admit that he is feeling awfully proud to be escorting Abbi down the aisle in a white dress, while he’s wearing a black tux.

He remembered that Wendy had a certain glow in her eyes when she mentioned this thing was going to be a black and white wedding, and he’s thinking he’s feeling what she was glowing about.

He kisses her one more time before she sits down, and Tim lets Abby go in first, before whispering to him, “White dress, black tux, Minister’s in the corner… You getting some ideas?”

Yeah. He is. And thinking about them makes that nervous feeling go away, really go away, for the first time all day.

“To love, honor, and cherish…” the minister says, voice low and soothing.

Abbi hasn’t been to a lot of weddings lately. Actually, she hasn’t been to a lot of them, period. After Liam died, she skipped out on any weddings she was invited to for five years.

Her sister got married, and as the maid of honor she couldn’t get out of that one.

Omagi was her partner, right hand, number one man for so long, there was no way she could skip out on his wedding. (Especially since she sort of introduced him to his wife. Not like she set them up or anything, but Lucy was one of her neighbors, and Omagi met her a few times heading to and from Abbi’s house, and after a few “chance” meetings, he asked if she was single, and the rest is history.)

Similar stories for the other two men on her team.

But once they were all married, she was fairly sure she was done with weddings. Sure enough to buy the dress for the op, and then, after, keep it. Because that was close enough. Because she didn’t get to do it when she should have. Because… a lot of because, but when the op ended, she had it cleaned, petted it a little, very carefully put it in a nice bag, and stuck it in the back of her closet.

Then he shows up.

She’s watching Gibbs, standing up there, looking happy and proud for his friend, and looking… pretty good. She can see the difference in how he’s standing since he got shot. She sees him cradling his right forearm in his left hand, taking some of the strain off his shoulder and back. She sees the fact that his color’s still a bit too pale. She’s not sure how many others would notice what he’s doing, but she does. It’s been less than two months, so the fact that he’s even standing up is a miracle, let alone without oxygen. Apparently that’s the core, indestructible Gibbsness, of Gibbs.

But he’s not quite looking like himself again. And she’s got the sense that she’s not going to fully relax until he does.

He catches her eye and smiles back to her. That’s him. The bit of him most of the rest of the world didn’t see for all those years. The Jethro that hid under angry, hurt, sad, stern, do the job and nothing else Gibbs for all those years.

‘Black tux, white dress…’ McGee isn’t nearly as quiet as he thinks he is. She is thinking about it. About standing up there, and holding his hands and saying the words.

For the first time in a lot of years, that’s sounding like something that may actually happen.

“I do,” Fornell says, and Abbi’s looking at Gibbs, who’s looking back at her, and smiling.

“From this day forward, until one of you lays the other to rest…”

Gibbs is watching Abbi.

He’s feel very settled right now. He has been since he took the bullet for her. This is where he’s supposed to be, who he’s supposed to be with, and this is what he should be doing.

This is the path, and the partner he wants for that path. From now until his last breath, he’ll travel it with her. He smiles at her, and she smiles back.

He almost is tempted to grab the minister and ask if they can make it a double. He mentally shakes his head. Not tonight. Not here. He can’t really imagine Abbi going all out on wedding planning, but if she wants to, she should have the chance. Not like he doesn’t have the money to splurge some if she wants to. (Actually, once she sells her house, if she wants to go hog wild on it, he’ll go along for the ride.)

“I do,” Fornell says. And Wendy starts her vows.
Gibbs thinks about vows. (Much more important to him than whatever party surrounds them.) He’s said these words too many times. Repeated them with no real love or joy, because he was trying to grab what he had the first time he said them, and that was gone.

He smiles at Abbi again, and knows these aren’t the vows he’ll do again. He already made that promise and lived it, and this time, he needs to start over, fresh, new words, new promises.

He glances over to Tim, who’s got his arm around Abby, lips on her temple as they both listen to Wendy repeat the words. He thinks about Ducky, and comes to the conclusion that he probably will need some help from a ghost writer or two to get it all out and down right, but one way or another, he will get it out, and right.

The downside of being the best man, is that there’s this beautiful person, in a fabulous dress, who he really, really wants to spend time with, and he doesn’t get to spend that time with her.

Gibbs gets to kiss Abbi again in the receiving line, and then there’s a few seconds where they and the McGee’s linger around during some of the photos. But that’s pretty much it until they get to the reception.

Gibbs sighs a bit as Abbi waves goodbye. She’s going with Tim and Abby to the reception cocktail hour, while Gibbs gets to stand around and have his picture taken sixty-million times.

Could be worse. Fornell could be having a bad time. But he’s not. He’s… whatever the old guy version of glowing is.

Hell, as he’s standing there, arm around Wendy, other arm around Emily, getting shots of the three of them (and later shots of him and Wendy and her boys, and then all six of them together with the daughter-in-laws, and grandkids) he’s grinning so wide it doesn’t look like all that smile can even fit on his face.

Gibbs settles back with Alton, trying to focus on Abbi and seeing her again, willing that nervous feeling to go away, waiting for the next shot they’ll be in.

“Wow!” Eric says as he and Diane pull out of the long, tree-lined drive to the parking lot in front of the reception location.

Diane nods. She’s been a bit annoyed about going this far out of their way, but… This is absolutely beautiful. Wendy had told her the place was worth the drive, and Diane had nodded a bit, not really believing it, but Wendy was right. The main house is a stone, high middle ages, English, manor house. It’s all stone arches, and gothic beauty. What it’s doing on the banks of the James River in the middle of Virginia, she’s got no idea, but…

Hell, put everyone in ‘30s style garb, kill off one of the guests, and this has all the makings of a BBC mystery. (Including a collection of detectives who just happen to be at the party, ready and willing to solve the mystery. She spends a moment wondering which one of them would end up top dogging, and comes to the conclusion that Chucky and Eric aren’t going to win. And that, on his wedding, Leroy would probably let Tobias take the lead.)
Once Eric parks, they head into the house. Everyone who is staying overnight will stay there. They aren’t staying the night, so they go on through the house, pausing to read the small write up on the history of the house, and how it doesn’t just look like a high middle ages manor, how it actually is one, and that back in the 1920s when the original owner was especially flush, he had the whole thing taken apart, shipped over from England, and rebuilt, stone by stone, in Virginia.

Diane looks up from that and says, “Because, who doesn’t need their very own Gothic English Manor?”

Eric nods. “I can’t actually imagine having so much money you’d do something like that.”

Diane smiles a bit. “Oh, I can imagine it, just, probably wouldn’t decide to move a mansion.”

Eric grins a bit. “And what would you do with a fortune?”

“You look fabulous.”

Diane nods, smiling, taking that compliment. Like with everything else in her life, she’s very particular about her clothing, and she’s got ninja level shopping skills to get the stuff she wants. She looks great in this dress, but she’d still like it better if it really was Chanel.

They head through the manor, down a long hallway, and find the ballroom. “It’s hard to believe that people actually lived like this.” Even if she did win the lotto and end up with ninety zillion dollars, Diane can’t see having her own, personal, ballroom.

Three steps from the door, Diane’s phone buzzes. She digs it out of her purse. “Anderson.”

“Hey, Diane, remember those account you wanted me watching?”

She rolls her eyes. She asked Jared to watch two accounts, the day before yesterday. Not like she’d forget. She mouths case to Eric, who nods at her, understanding how this works. He’s got his cell on, too, and really hopes DiNozzo doesn’t call, but he wouldn’t bet on it.

“Yes. What’s going on?”

“The one that ends with 01286, it just closed.”

Diane smiles. “Interesting. You keeping watch?”

“Of course! Money’s flowing all over the place, and we’re tracing all of it, tracking all the account numbers, banks, all of it.”

Diane grins wide and happy. “Shoot the details to my email, okay?”

“No problem.” Jared sounds very pleased with himself. “You need anything else?”

“No, Jared, I’m good. Thank you.” She hangs up.

“Jared?” Draga asks, he’s more than mildly interested in who Jared might be.

“Old friend. Got our CPAs together a million years ago. He’s with Bank of America now, in their fraud department.”

Eric nods at that. He knows that Diane has a lot of friends, and they all seem to be male. This one sounds like he’s at arm’s length though. “And he’s doing you a favor?”

She nods. They’re out, in public, and now isn’t the time to get talking about what she’s been doing this week, on her official cases, and her unofficial ones.

“Favor work out well?”

She smiles at that. “Oh yeah. I’ll tell you about it on the way home.” Her phone beeps, letting her know she’s got the email. She quickly forwards it to Borin, DiNozzo and Fornell, and then backs it up to her cloud storage. “All set.”

He nods at that.

Once they’re all in the limo heading toward the reception, that nervous feeling spikes. Gibbs goes over the speech again in his head. It’s maybe fifty words. There’s no reason at all to feel like this.

But he does.

“You okay?” Fornell asks, starting to wonder if he really is asking Gibbs for too much. Okay, Gibbs not being big on speaking at all, let alone public speaking is a running joke, but there’s making someone a bit uncomfortable for your own enjoyment, and then there’s sadism, and Fornell’s starting to wonder if he’s crossed the line. “Alton can do the speech.”

Gibbs shakes his head. “I’ve got it.”

“You sure?”

“Yeah.”

Though she wouldn’t say it out loud, the fact that Gibbs, Fornell, and McGee apparently, all find/found Diane terrifying is vastly amusing to Abbi. She catches a quick glimpse of her as she’s entering the ballroom, all in black with Eric on her arm, and gives her a nod, while smiling as Abby and Tim give somewhat different versions of the time Diane slept over at his place.

What she also finds amusing is that none of the three of them find/found her terrifying. She’s just as hard, just as tough, just as willing to bite the heads off of people who don’t do their job properly as Diane is, but, apparently if you wrap that iron core in a pretty blouse, a nice skirt, modest heels, discrete makeup, and floral perfume, they all get really disconcerted.

She supposes it’s possible that Diane has really mellowed over the years. But, she can’t imagine she mellowed that much, because even Gibbs on a self-destructive spiral wouldn’t marry an outright Harpy.

And it’s likely true that she and Diane have a very different relationship than anything Fornell or Gibbs had with her. They’re professionals. And, though Abbi may be in charge, she’s under no illusions about being Diane’s Boss. She’s lucky enough to be in a situation where she just points out the big problem and gives Diane a pat in that direction. Diane takes care of everything else (including deciding what bits of the problems go first, and pointing out new problems) on her own. As she’s thinking about that, she realizes that’s exactly what Vance did with Gibbs, and what Robinson does with Fornell.

She shakes her head a bit. They’re terrified because Diane is a mirror. Same work style, same tenacity, and though it would horrify them, same pickiness. (She can imagine Gibbs having a very quiet fit about that, but she’s heard the stories of reports booted for not being just right, and god save the guy who tries to give Jethro a 3/16ths screw instead of a 1/8th screw, let alone if that screw is the wrong kind of metal. And, yes, she’s heard the complaining about getting Diane the wrong drink, but Gibbs isn’t exactly a monument to chill if someone gets his coffee wrong.) She’s just a younger and prettier and louder version of Gibbs and Fornell. No wonder they’re scared.

Three of a kind.

She’s mentally chuckling at that as they head over to the ballroom to go find their dinner table.

Gibbs looks over at the table he should be sitting at. Not that he minds being up here with the wedding party, but he can see his family sitting there, talking with Diane and Eric and Sacks. They look like they’re having a good time. A good time he wants to be part of. He’s far enough away, that even with his glasses, he can’t read lips well enough to see what they’re talking about, but everyone just laughed really hard, so it must have been funny.

He’s having an okay time. Emily’s on one side (he’s been her escort tonight) and Tobias is on the other. But Tobias is sort of pre-occupied (understandably), and Emily’s not exactly great for keeping up conversation he finds fascinating.

Plus, dinner means he’s getting closer and closer to his part of this. Once they finish eating, they’ve got the first few dances, then cake cutting, and then… He makes himself not think about that, and continue to eat his prime rib, while watching Abbi laugh about something Draga just said.

Dancing. Finally Gibbs is done lurking about with the wedding party and can spend some time with Abbi.

He’s a bit fuzzy on why the ballroom was used for cocktails, and the doors leading from it to the outside are opened up to a tent, with a dance floor in there, but he doesn’t mind.

It’s fairly warm inside the house, and the cool October air is pleasant for being out and dancing.

It takes him a few seconds to find Abbi, who’s standing on the side of the dancefloor, watching the rest of the crew take advantage of the music. “Hi.”

Abbi smiles back at him. “Hello.”

He glances at the dance floor.

“You really up for it?” She doesn’t want him out of breath for his speech, and she knows he didn’t bring his O2 with him.
The music is slow and easy; Fornell’s ninety-six-year-old father-in-law is dancing to this.

Gibbs holds out his hand, and she takes it, following him onto the floor. He pulls her closer, hand finding her low back, and he gives her a lingering kiss. “As long as I’m breathing, I’m up for dancing with you.”

She smiles at that. For a few dances, they sway slow and close, and he’s so happy to be holding her.

And then the MC announces the cutting of the cake, which means it’s almost go time for him.

Cake is cut, and served; the Champagne is sparkling in the flute glasses; it’s time for him to do his thing.

The wedding coordinator lets Gibbs know he’s up, handing him a microphone.

Gibbs takes as deep of a breath as he can, and then stands up, mustering every ounce of no shame he has. There’s got to be a hundred people watching him, and this is the sort of thing he usually runs screaming away from. (Okay, walks deliberately, silently, away from. If he’s running and screaming, he’s going toward whatever it is.)

Nothing to be done for it. There are three sets of eyes watching him, urging him on, hoping he’s going to do great. Two sets that are very amused, wondering what he’s going to do. And one, Diane’s, he can’t entirely read. She’s not hoping he flubs it, but she’s not exactly wishing him well, either.

Another quick breath.

Okay. Get up and do it!

He takes a quick step to the side, and gently kisses Wendy on the cheek. Then he says, “For making my friend happier than he’s ever been.” Then one more step to the side, and he gently slaps Fornell up the back of the head, and says, “For waiting two years to ask her out.” Everyone laughs at that. (Especially Emily, apparently that’s the funniest thing she’s seen all year.) When it quiets down, he raises his glass, says, “For both of you, a long life filled with the love of each other and the joy that love brings you,” takes a sip, waits for everyone else to drink to them, and then hugs Fornell, and then Wendy, and sits down again.

There’s a second when everyone wonders if he’s going to say anything more, but he shakes his head and smiles, and the dessert rolls on.

All in all, Gibbs is pretty proud of how he did.
Diane’s phone rings again, and she heads out of the tent, away from the noise of dancing people, to be able to hear the call properly.

“Got an update for you.”

“Great, Jared.”

“Money trail stopped in Barbados. From there it was turned into cash and picked up.”

“Fuck,” Diane says it softly. “They were already there, waiting for it, right?”

“Yeah. But it’s not all black cloud. I’ve got some silver lining for you. I know one of the guys at that bank, and was able to get a picture of who picked the cash up. No name, they don’t work that way, not there, but I’ve got the picture, and because they don’t use names or account numbers for IDs I’ve got fingerprints and a retinal scan.”

That is a hell of a silver lining. “Jared, I love you.”

“I’ve got better news, too.”

“What could be better?”

“The account that ends with 0948, it’s bleeding money, in small drips, to three hundred US accounts. I’ve got all of them.”

Diane smiles wide and happy. “You’re right, that’s better.”

“I’m sending you the information—“

“Not me.” She knows she’s not in position to do anything with this right now. She’d need a court order, and she’s not the person who gets them. “Her name is Ellie Bishop. I’ll send you her email. She’ll be able to get the warrants necessary to make sure those accounts can keep accepting money, but not send any out.”

“One way freeze, that’s sneaky.” Jared sounds impressed.

“Thanks. Do we know who owns those accounts?”

“What do you think?” Code for don’t ask stupid questions.

“Ghosts and shell corporations?”

“Ghosts of shell corporations. You’ll get them, I know you will.”

“Oh, yes I will!” Diane’s grinning as she says that.

———

“You okay?” Abbi asks. This is the second time she’s caught Jethro scanning the dance floor.

He shakes his head a bit. “I… feels off.” He should be done with nervous. The speech is over. He did his job. People laughed. He’s gotten texts from Ducky and Jimmy congratulating him for a good job, and even Tony sent him a back-handed compliment, along with a subtle dig about if Fornell’s wedding present covered the Asshole Fee for the head slap.

But he’s not feeling better. That… feeling is still there, tugging at his gut. And the more he’s feeling it, the more it feels like danger, and the less it feels like nervous.

Something’s up, but he doesn’t know what.

And then he does. Diane comes in from the garden, smiling her predator smile, and he knows it’s something about her. She’s got something, and it’s about to bite her.

That gets Abbi’s attention. She’s notices Gibbs watching Diane. Very intensely watching Diane, and she can feel this isn’t my ex-looks amazing and I’m wondering if I made a mistake sort of looking. (Though Diane cleans up good. Draga’s been looking awfully pleased with himself tonight.)

“Your gut’s firing, isn’t it?”

“Yeah. God, all day. Was thinking it was the speech, but… Don’t know what or why, but it’s got to be her. Can’t shake it, and… It’s vague. Feels like something is coming, but…” He shakes his head.

“Let’s start with the perimeter.” She’s got no problem with giving everything a once over. She wraps his arm around hers, and they head out of the dance tent to take a stroll around the Manor.

They don’t see anyone out of place, and they’re looking. They keep an eye on Diane, seeing her take a few more calls, but, besides them (and Draga) no one’s watching her.

Gibbs is shaking his head, annoyed. He can feel something’s up. But it’s not up here.

“Do you want us to grab McGee, get another set of eyes on this?” Abbi asks.

There was a time, when, without a second thought, Gibbs would have easily grabbed Tim away from whatever he’s doing with Abby right now (and, no, Gibbs is not about to imagine it clearly enough to get an idea beyond ‘whatever’) but… “No. I don’t see it. You don’t see it. He’s sure as hell not going to see it if we grab him now.”

“Draga? Fornell?”

“Not Fornell. Like Tim, he’s… distracted.” And right now, as Fornell is drinking with Wendy in his lap, he’s looking very distracted.

“Eric then.”

That annoys Gibbs on principal. Not because Eric isn’t a good guy, but because, if he sees something that Gibbs doesn’t, that means that he really does need to go and get stronger glasses. But, he nods at Abbi, because she’s right, another set of eyes is a good plan, and the thing Eric doesn’t see is the thing that doesn’t exist. Eric sees, and remembers, everything.

He’ll notice if something’s out of place from earlier today.

Time to bite the bullet and talk to Eric and Diane.
“You’re working,” Gibbs says to Diane, ushering her off the dancefloor, into the inside hallway, away from any windows or clear line of sight.

She shrugs a bit. “I can multi-task. Why, you have a problem with doing some work during what should be personal time?”

He glares at her, remembering too many arguments about that in the past. He notices that Abbi’s pulled Eric aside and they’re rapidly striding off to check the perimeter. “Tell me what you’ve got.”

“Now?”

“Yes, now! Something’s up.”

“How can you possibly know that?”

It’s true he hasn’t taken any calls, and neither has Abbi. “I just—”

“Oh, right, the gut!” Diane flashes him a massive eye roll. “The infamous gut that kept you at work for three straight weeks where nothing, at all, happened. The gut that had you missing dinners and getting up early and leaving late and…” (It’s possible that Gibbs may have, occasionally, blamed cutting out on Diane on having a ‘gut feeling’ that something was up. He was right. Just, the something in that case was his desire to get away from her for a few hours.)

“Diane…”

“Leroy,” his teeth grit. She’s got the most patronizing voice ever to pronounce words when she wants to, and she’s using it on him, now. “Take a page out of Chucky’s book, relax, go find your sweetie, have a nice dance, and then have a drink or six. Calm down. I’ve already gotten DiNozzo and Bishop up to date with what I’ve got, and they’re running it down. Now, you,” she gestures off to the dance floor, “go be the best man. We’re at a wedding, for God’s sake, Leroy, nothing is going to happen.”

He glares at her again, painfully annoyed when she’s being all, right, and stuff. If she’s already got DiNozzo and Bishop on it, then he probably doesn’t need to do anything… Probably… He glares at her again, and begins to step away, before she adds, “And you do not say a word of this to Tobias! It’s his wedding, give him one night off!”

Now he’s giving her his stop being a twit look. Even he has the sense not to interrupt his friend’s wedding for anything short of a full scale invasion, and whatever this is, it’s not coming here, not now.

Diane nods, looks around, notices that Abbi and Eric are missing, and glares at Gibbs again.

“Double checking,” he says.

“Wonderful.” There’s a lot of sarcasm in her voice, and a lot of it is based on the idea that if they’ve told Eric they’re concerned he’s going to go all hyper-protective-alpha-male. “I’m not some damsel you have to run in and save.”

“I don’t—“

“Don’t give me that! You’re ready to run me off into protective custody right now.”
She’s not exactly wrong about that.

“Don’t want you to get hurt.”

“I’m an accountant, Leroy. People don’t shoot at me.”

He rolls his eyes, thinking about Sterling, who wasn’t exactly on the top of the dangerous guy list, either.

“No, not like that! I’ve already got what I was looking for. Shooting me now is useless. Damage is done. It’s not… cost effective. If you want to stay hidden, you take someone like me out before I find what I’ve found.”

“Locking Abbi and I into a building and trying to kill us wasn’t cost effective, either.”

She snorts, an inelegant sound of supreme scorn. “You were dealing with twits. They wouldn’t have gotten caught in the first place if they’d known what they were doing. The guys who are running this money, they aren’t twits.”

“Then they’ll go after you and make sure they don’t get caught.”

“Leroy!”

Draga and Abbi come back, see both of them looking at each other, very tense, and do their best to hide.

Gibbs is looking at both of them, silently pleading for a lifeline.

Unfortunately, they don’t have one. Eric shakes his head. “If something’s up, I can’t see it.”

“You feel it?”

Eric shrugs. “Not before she mentioned anything, but now I’m feeling jumpy.”

Gibbs groans. A spooked agent isn’t particularly useful.

Diane’s not really looking pleased with Eric, either. “He’s not infallible. I know you work with people who think he can walk on water, but he really can’t.”

Now Gibbs looks insulted. Not on his own behalf. (He’s more than well aware of the fact that he’s not infallible. His gut didn’t yell nearly hard enough going into CGIS.) But that’s a slap to his team. He earned his rep with his team.

“Infallable or not, caution’s a good plan,” Abbi adds. Calming things down a bit. “We can follow you home, make sure you get there safe,” Abbi adds.

“I do not need you two babysitting me. We’re fine! I’ve already got my very own Federal Agent keeping watch over me.”

Gibbs stares at her for another second, and breaks through that wall of silence, his usual mode of dealing with annoyed Diane. “Emily’ll be in the car, too. Just… Let us follow you home, okay?”

“Fine!” She’s all but rolling her eyes at this. “What exactly do you think you’ll be able to do from the car behind us?”

That’s a better point than Gibbs or Abbi likes. Abbi says, sighing, “With any luck, if they’re watching closely, they’ll see our tail and back off. You’ll get home safe and sound, and we’ll catch sight of them.”

“If there’s a them,” Diane says pointedly.

“If we’re wrong, we burn some extra gas. No harm, no foul,” Abbi adds.

“If you’re wrong, you’ve freaked out Emily for no good reason.” They all glance over at the girl, who is dancing with her newest step-brother, and blissfully unaware of the tense conversation in the corner.

“We’ll stay far enough behind she won’t notice,” Gibbs says.

“Fine. When she’s done, we’ll head off.”

Abbi nods. “We’ll say our goodbyes, and be waiting for you to pull out.”

Gibbs is glaring at the road. His gut is really firing, and Diane was absolutely right, they’re too far behind to be good for anything. Only upside is they’re a visible tail and at one in the morning, out here in the middle of nowhere, they’re a really obvious tail. Only a complete moron would attempt to do something right now.

He’s driving, and Abbi’s going through her email, reading the updates Diane and DiNozzo have been sending her.

“It’s good stuff,” Abbi says.

“How good?”

“Payoffs ending up in three Supreme Court Justices’ accounts good.” Gibbs winces at that. Not that, at this point, he thinks there really are good guys anymore, but he had kind of hoped. “DiNozzo’s got Corwin running the DNA profile, no links yet, but we’ll know who that one account goes to, soon.”

“If he’s in the system.”

“If not, we can flag him. He’s also checking all flight and boating plans. Guy who takes 500 million out of a bank isn’t travelling commercial, and he’s not going fast. Tony’s got a team in place, searching. We’re a few hours behind, but if he didn’t get off the island immediately, there’s a good shot of grabbing him.”

Gibbs nods at that. That much money, even in gold, is going to take up a lot of space.

“Cash or coin?”

“Combination of both, and gems, according to Diane’s friend.”

Gibbs sees the flashers up ahead, and tenses up. This connected also means that what looks like an accident might not be one. They drive up, and… Okay, no… that’s two completely wrecked cars, a fire truck putting an engine out, and an ambulance with lights flashing. It’s a real accident.
Like Draga and Diane, they make the u-turn. Apparently Draga’s got a GPS or something that’ll reroute him.

That makes Gibbs tense up, too. Probably nothing good coming that way, either. Abbi’s feeling it, too, she’s already on the phone with Diane.

The cop waves to Gibbs, stopping him. Gibbs doesn’t want to stop. He also doesn’t have a badge he can just press to his window and keep going anymore, either. He rolls to a stop, keeping eyes on Eric and Diane, seeing them getting further away. If he can’t see their car anymore, he’s going to get moving, no matter what. He figures the fastest way to deal with this is to have Abbi flash her badge, and get going again.

“Excuse me, sir, did you know--”

“Doesn’t matter.” He nods to Abbi.

She flashes her badge. “On protection duty. Let us go, now!”

“Yes, Ma’am,” the cop steps back, fast, and Gibbs gets going. They’re on the job again. About a half mile behind.

Draga doesn’t like this intersection. Four roads come together here, as well as a train track. He hates intersections like this, and is annoyed that his GPS sent them this way when a car accident took them off of 301. He likes this one even less because the flashers for the train are going and the guard rail is down. Who knows how long they’ll have to sit on their asses here, waiting for the train to pass?

Only good thing is that it’s late enough there aren’t many cars on the road. Makes it easy to see who’s around, where they’re coming from, and what they’re doing. Two tiny headlights way back are Gibbs and Abbi, catching up.

If he hadn’t gotten the warning from Gibbs and Abbi he wouldn’t have been watching for it. But he did, so he’s alert, and he sees it. The car that just turned onto their street, coming up behind him, is speeding up.

He’s got maybe a second to get ready for it, so he does. Fifteen feet between him and the rail, and probably another twenty feet between it and the tracks. It’ll be tight, but he can do it. Good thing he’s not in his sedan. Tonight all the work he’s put into the engine on this baby is going to pay off.

He doesn’t take his foot off the break, but he cranks the steering wheel hard right. Diane looks alarmed, but he doesn’t have the time, or focus, to deal with her right now.

He glances back, car is still coming up on him, too damn fast, it’s got some real power behind it to accelerate that fast, and now it’s not just warning flashers going in front of him, the train is screaming past, too.

One last glance back, car’s less than five feet away, and it still hasn’t slowed down. Draga stomps the gas the second the car kisses his bumper and his car jerks forward, turning hard right, slamming through the warning railing, and skidding, but compared to the fighters he used to fly this thing is a piece of cake, he’s got control as his car goes leaping off the road, bouncing over the uneven ground next to the train track, without hitting the train.

He hears shrieking, and he’s not sure if it’s him, Diane, or Emily, probably all three.

The car behind him, which likely expected to hit his car and slow down while slamming on the breaks hits nothing and goes hurtling straight into the train, and from there into a million pieces and a huge fiery ball of flaming gasoline.

By the time Draga’s got his own car stopped, he’s shaking, Diane has gone white and silent, Emily is crying, and the only sound they can hear is the screeching halt of the train’s brakes.

He leaps out of the car, adrenaline still pumping, feeling the ground vibrating from the train slowing down, and screams at the bits of flaming wreckage that are still falling to the ground and tinkling off the slowing train, “FUCK YOU, MOTHERFUCKER! You picked the wrong damn flyboy to try that on, ASSHOLE. I flew experimental planes at six times the speed of sound and you thought you could get the jump on me? YOU FUCKING ASSHOLE, ROAST IN HELL YOU TURTLE FUCKING CUMRAG!”

They’re maybe a quarter mile behind Draga and Diane, when Gibbs sees it. “There.”

Abbi nods, that’s a car moving way too fast, and from the looks of it, going to ram Draga and Diane. They both know exactly how this is supposed to work, and there’s nothing they can do about it. Not really.

Gibbs is grabbing for the gun he’s not wearing. Diane’s got her phone to her mouth, already calling it in, ripping at the latch to the glove compartment. Her Sig’s in there.

By the time she’s got it, it’s too late, shooting out the tires won’t help; the car’s going to hit. Gibbs can see it in his head. He’s braced for it, and then he sees Draga jerk his car out of the way, speeding through the divider, keeping his car next to but not touching the train as the chase car barrels right into it.

Gibbs actually yells, a mixture of triumph, joy, and good for you, aimed at Draga, as he floors it to get to Draga’s car.

He screeches to a halt a few feet away from Draga, and she and Gibbs leap out of the car and are treated to a truly virtuoso performance of profane invective aimed at the man who tried to run them into the train.

“Turtle fucker?” Gibbs asks as he stands next to Draga, who is still raging at the wreckage, before going silent, sitting down, hard, knees going out. Gibbs puts his hand on Draga’s shoulder, kneeling next to him, and quietly saying, “You got ‘em out safe.”

Draga’s breathing hard, and nods his head, he knows he did the job, but he’s still got way too many fight or flight chemicals running through him. “Last time I felt like this I landed, got drunk, stayed drunk, and fucked anyone who’d let me for three days.”
Gibbs nods at him, still keeping physical contact. He knows how being that close to dying and then pulling life out of the jaws of death feels.

“Nothing that exciting up for you. Abbi’s going to secure the scene,” she’s on her phone again, barking orders at her guys, and he knows she’ll be calling in NCIS in a minute, “and I’m going to get the four of you back to NCIS. Debriefing, statements, and protective custody, that’s what’s coming up next.”

Draga grins at him, manic grin, and then says, “I like how we handled it in the Navy better.”

Gibbs nods, pulling him up. “I bet you did.” He gently squeezes Draga’s shoulders. “You did good.”

Draga nods. “I know. He picked the wrong guy to even try that trick on.” He’s looking at the wreckage and the now stopped train. “YOU HEAR THAT! I drag race for fun, ASSHOLE. This car has five hundred horses under the hood! You don’t get to ram me into a TRAIN. I run YOU into the TRAIN.”

“He’s dead, Eric,” Gibbs says quietly. “He knows. Come on, let’s get the girls.”

Diane’s holding onto Emily, who is still crying, and Diane’s still not saying anything. She sees Gibbs handle Eric and nods a bit at him, she’s got her hands full with Emily, and her own stuff, adding Draga to the mix is too much. He nods back to her, and then steps next to her and wraps his arms around her and Emily.

“Don’t say ‘I told you so,’” Diane says, eyes dry, voice brittle.

“Wouldn’t dream of it,” he says, lips near her ear. “You okay?” he asks Emily.

“He tried to drive us into a train!” her voice is shaking and panicked.

“Yeah,” Gibbs says quietly. “Eric saw him and did exactly the right thing.”

“He was trying to kill us.”

“Yes,” Gibbs says. “And that’s why we’re going to the Navy Yard, where a whole lot of guys with guns are going to make sure nothing happens to you.”

Abbi nods at him. “I’ve got my team coming. I called Palmer, and he’s on the way, with DiNozzo, too.”

“Are you going to call my dad?” Emily asks, eyes wide. “Don’t call Dad. Let him have his wedding night.”

“Shhh…” Diane says. “We’ll call him in the morning. There’s nothing here that the rest of us can’t handle.”
Tony wakes up feeling good. Several reasons for this, but the primary one is it’s been (by conservative estimate) fifty million years since he and Ziva got to sleep in, together.

It feels so good. She’s warm and soft in his arms, and they’ve got nothing to do (okay, there are lots of things they could be doing, but right now, they are off duty, until Monday) until 1:00 when they’re closing on the house.

Thinking about that makes him feel electric. The house. The big, expensive albatross he’s intentionally wrapping around his own neck in the hope that this means a better life for his... today he’s thinking that little person growing inside Ziva is a boy… son.

He exhales, feeling the nervous tension of this decision. He’s not committed to it until they sign the papers. He glances at his clock. Two and a half more hours of backing out time.

His fingers find Ziva’s belly, soft and round now. She can still wear her regular clothing, sort of. Nothing with a firm waistband. Maternity jeans (borrowed from Breena) are waiting for her. She’s a bit annoyed at needing them so soon. Abby made it to 14 weeks without changing her clothes. Breena made it to 17. He’s pointed out that Breena was constantly throwing up, and that might have had something to do with not gaining any weight, and that if she wanted to wear skirts all the time like Abby did, she could probably stretch the time of non-maternity clothing a few weeks further by moving her waistband up. Ziva growled at him, so he retreated, and returned with ice cream, which she’s been craving non-stop for the last two weeks. (This may have something to do with needing maternity jeans now. She simultaneously smiled and glowered at him for that.) He, on the other hand, is not annoyed. He’s looking forward to Little Mr. Bump getting big enough for everyone else to see, too.

On a visceral level, he’s understanding that proud, cocky, look at me and what I did, attitude that Palmer and McGee get when they’re out with their wives when they’re visibly pregnant. He’s looking forward to strutting around with Ziva when she’s in full on baby bump mode, too.

He gently pokes Ziva. If they’re going to get up, and eat, and get to the bank in time for the closing, they’ve got to get moving.

She grunts a bit, and burrows closer to him, further under the covers. Supposedly all sleep all the time will end soon, but… But nothing, they’re both working full out, and she’s growing their kid, to boot. She should be tired. He kisses her hair, stroking his hand down her back. “Come on, babe, time to get up.”

“Mmmm…” Her eyes don’t open.

“Yeah, I know.” He gives her a gentle jiggle. “Shower, food, signing papers until our fingers fall off.”

“Mmmm…” She stretches, wiggles, blinks a few times. “Compared to paperwork days, it cannot be that bad.”

“You’ve got a point there.”
She sits up, and he strokes her back again, eyes traveling across her body under the ultra comfy, worn and washed so often it’s getting sheer, white cotton nighty she’s got on. That hand meanders from her back to her front, slipping over her breast. She smiles at him. “I thought you said we had to get moving.”

He stretches up, and kisses her. “I’m intending to do some moving. Maybe in the shower… Multitask?”

She laughs, kisses him again, and kicks off the blankets. “Let me pee first.”

“As you wish.”

---

He’s stretching out his fingers as they walk out of the bank. “Mental note, don’t ever let our paperwork guys talk to their paperwork guys.”

She’s nodding, feeling shell shocked. She thought she knew all about paperwork. She’s a cop at a federal agency, until McGee got hold of the problem, her paperwork had paperwork. She was wrong. Between the two of them, in two and a half hours, they filled out and signed four vertical inches of paperwork; that’s a record for even them.

Beyond feeling like his butt is numb from sitting on that hard chair for so long, Tony’s not sure what’s going on. They just bought a house; that should feel like something, right?

“So, do we celebrate?” he asks her.

“Go see the house?” She’s got the keys in her pocket. They are now, officially, the owners of 1458 Bryce Street.

“We could do that.” But he’s not feeling very enthusiastic. Probably because it’s not really theirs. It’s a stop gap to getting to theirs. “Or, we could get some ice cream, and then go look at some houses we might actually live in one day.”

Ziva smiles, but it’s not aimed at him. Tony follows her gaze and catches the good suit and white hair. He nods, and Senior walks over to them.

“You did it?” he asks, sounding unsure of himself.

“We did it.” Ziva replies, giving him a hug. But he’s not watching her, he’s eyeing Tony, seeing how he’ll respond to his presence.

Tony nods a bit. “Yeah, Dad, we did it. Not sure what happens next, but we did it.”

Senior smiles at him. “Great things happen next. I heard something about ice cream, and I think my grandbaby needs some.” He holds out his hand, and Ziva nods, giving him permission. He pets her belly, and grins up at both of them. “I know you aren’t finding out, but that really feels like Third to me.”

Tony shakes his head, but wraps an arm around his dad. “Dave. If he’s a he, that’s Dave DiNozzo.”

Senior lights up. “I like that! Does Dave have a middle name?”
“Jethro. David,” Ziva pronounces it in the American fashion, long a, short i, “Jethro DiNozzo.”

Senior smiles at that. “And if he’s a she?”

“Miriam Tali DiNozzo.”

“Yes, and Tali was my sister. It’s a common Jewish tradition to name children for lost loves. I am named after my mother’s mother and my grandfather’s little sister.”

“What’s your middle name?” Senior asks, realizing he doesn’t know that.

“Danuta. My grandfather’s family was from Poland.”

Senior sighs. He’s old enough, and remembers well enough, to know what happened to Ziva’s grandfather’s family if they were Polish Jews. He can still remember being fifteen, in a movie theatre, and seeing the footage of the liberation of Auschwitz. Obviously her grandfather survived, but the likelihood of any of the rest of them surviving was minimal.

Ziva’s got a far away look in her eyes as she says, “Saba was one of the very few Jews who got out of Warsaw. His mother and sister were taken to a camp in the first sweep. He and his brothers tried to join the resistance outside of the city, but the Polish fighters they found didn’t want the help of Jews, and tried to trade them to the Nazis for their hostages. By the time he got to Cyprus, it was just him.” Ziva shakes her head at that, gently touching her child, knowing that the one thing her grandfather had wanted more than anything else was a world where his children would grow up at peace. She’s glad he didn’t live long enough to see how the David family ended. “When he got to Israel, he found several others who had survived Warsaw, and helped to form the Kibbutz my father was born on, Lohamei HaGeta’ot, The Ghetto Fighters.” No one really knows what to say about that. She smiles sadly. “I am sorry. I’ve been thinking about that a lot, lately. Ice cream sounds wonderful.”

Tony squeezes her hand, and the three of them head off in search of some double mint chip.

“So, besides the house, what are you working on right now?” Senior asks as they sit around a tiny table in a small ice cream shop.

“Can’t really say, Dad.” That’s Tony’s standard answer, but, as he thinks about it more, what they’re working on, and what they’re finding, and who’s sitting in front of him, it hits him that he might not be able to really say, but he might be able to get something useful out of his dad. So, he takes a bite of his ice cream (mocha chip) and asks, “Say there was a law you didn’t want to follow, what do you do?”

“Junior…” Senior’s looking alarmed. “Look, I’m sorry about the taxes on the house. I really didn’t ___“

“Not why I’m asking, not directly. What we’re working on is a huge mess, the heart of which is a guy who basically fixes laws for people. So…”
Senior lights up and smiles. “I know about them. Don’t usually work with them, too shady, too expensive, and no tax benefits.”

“No tax benefits?” Of all the reasons not to get involved with a guy like Clemens…

But Senior’s all over it, talking fast and happy. “Okay, say I represent some people who want to build a high rise on a particular piece of property. Say that property is zoned for buildings under ten stories. There are a few ways to do this. You can go to the zoning commission and ask them to revoke the zoning ordinance. That’s a dead end. They’ll take your money, let you file your permits, ask you to do studies of every possible impact imaginable, hold hearings, on and on. Six years later, you’re still not zoned properly, you’re paying taxes on the property and not earning any money on it. Then, when the commission finally finds, they find against you. Bad plan, unless, of course, you’re trying to lose money, which you may be. But, assuming you want to make money, that’s not the way to do it. If you want to make money, you’ve set up your corporation, and you find out who’s on the zoning commission, and then you donate to their pet charities—“

“Why are you donating to their charities?” Ziva asks. She followed along pretty well on the first bit, but that leap doesn’t make sense to her.

“Because they’ll be on the board of those charities, board members get paid a fee, and that fee will be a percentage of the donations they bring in. More money in, the more money out. Direct bribes are for amateurs, clumsy ones, at that. That charity makes everyone look good, and buys lots of good press for whatever it is you and they want to do. Plus, said charity will be a proper 501C, so those donations will be tax deductible for you. Once you’ve done that, the commission will find a loophole allowing you to do whatever it is you’re looking to do. That’s how I’d get around a law I didn’t like.”

“Is that legal?” Tony asks.

Senior smiles, takes a bite of his rum raisin, and says, “My lawyers and accountants will swear by it. The Commissioner’s lawyers and accountants will swear by it, too. So will the charity. Granted, that route is a bit risky. There isn’t always a loophole available, so don’t try that technique unless you know the loophole you want to use before you start slinging money around. If there’s no loophole to worm through, you move into illegal territory, and that’s the kind of stuff I try to avoid.”

“Why are you paying if the loophole is already there?” Tony asks.

“Because, usually, the loophole is so subtle that it’d take half a dozen lawyers and ten years of litigation to work it out, and since you don’t want to end up having to do that, you pay, and they don’t sic the regulators on you, and then you don’t have to prove you’ve got the loophole.”

Tony and Ziva aren’t thrilled by that, but it does match their understanding of how the world works.

“How would you get a loophole if there isn’t one?” Ziva asks.

Senior winces a little. “Usually, there’s a loophole.” He sees both of them watching him, waiting for more. “That’ll depend on how big of a mess you intend to make. If what you’re going to do is visible, but popular, you get a lobbyist. He’ll then go and spread money around, shift some votes, and get the law you want passed. If your lobbyist is good, he rounds up a lot of good PR for what you want, and by the time it’s up for a vote, your pet Congressmen look like heroes for saving the day. If it’s visible but not popular, then you’ll want a fixer, but that tends to be messy and very expensive. Say you want to skirt EPA regulations, build on a wetland or something, that’s fixer territory, and that’s so damn expensive I stay away from any deal that might need that. If what you’re looking for is little, like, say you want to save five hundred grand by building your hallways half an inch smaller than code, that’s pretty much the same as what I mentioned before, go find the pet charities, it just costs more.

“Of course, there’s always the cheap route of paying off the building inspector. Good for a deal you’re not going to stick with. You build whatever it is, bribe the inspector, and then sell it. Next guy down the line is left sitting on the problem because as soon as the deal is done, the corporation that ran it liquidates and closes. I tend not to like those deals, either, because the guy who will take a bribe from you is the kind of guy who’ll come back looking for more, later.” Senior’s eyes light up. “Have you found a fixer?”

Tony glances at Ziva, and she nods. “Yeah. Do you know Roger Clemens?”

“Not the baseball player? I know him, but…” Senior’s looking horrified.

“Not the baseball player, Dad. He went by at least fifty different names. Short guy, round, kind of schlubby.”

Senior shakes his head. “I know guys who know guys who know fixers. And, I employ lawyers who take advantage of the laws that get fixed, because once the fix is in, anyone who finds it can use it. But I don’t know any fixers personally. Too much risk for my tastes.”

“How do your lawyers find them?” Ziva asks.

Senior shakes his head. “I don’t know. But every few months, they shift all of our money around, rearrange our holdings and which states we incorporate out of and all the rest of it. Keeping my taxable income in negative numbers is their job, and they’re very good at it.”

“Well, how did you find the lawyers?” Tony asks.

“Harvard. Stanford. Friends of friends. They hire each other and provide services for many guys in my situation.”

Tony sighs. “It would really screw things over for you and Delphine if I were to ask who your lawyers were and subpoenaed their records.”

Senior smiles. “Give me three days’ notice before doing it, and it won’t. You think they’re doing something illegal?”

“I think they may know how to find other people doing something illegal, beyond that…” Tony’s genuinely not sure. No, he is sure. If they’re hooked into whatever it is, their own asses are beyond covered. They’ve probably got whole books of laws letting them do whatever they’re up to, and then even more laws saying they don’t have to talk to it to guys like him.

Senior nods. “Hold off until Wednesday morning, and they’re all yours.”

Tony sighs at that, too, but, honestly given the number of people they’re running down right now, it’s not like he could go much faster than that. “I can do that. Send me their contact numbers on Tuesday so I can get the warrants.”

“Ohay!” And right that second, Senior’s looking so happy at finally finding something he can do that’s useful for his son.
They decide to go to the house on the way home. It’s theirs, they might as well go check it out.

Tony peels back the CAUTION tape, and Ziva heads in. “This isn’t how I was planning on taking you into our first house.” He tacks the tape back up, and closes the door.

“And what were you thinking?” she asks, looking away from scorched walls and the hole in the floor.

He takes two steps forward, and scoops her up in his arms. “I’d been thinking something like this. And, I’d been kind of hoping I wouldn’t have to worry about the floor collapsing under our feet.”

“Soon enough. Another year or two…”

“Yeah.”

“A back porch, Shabbos under the stars, you and Dave playing catch in the grass.”

“Maybe with his little sister, Miri?”

She smiles at that, and then her eyes start to tear up. She looks embarrassed that this is getting to her like that; she’s not supposed to cry about stupid stuff. He smiles a bit, kisses her, and snuggles her close as she starts to cry happy tears.

All in all, it’s been an almost perfect day. Sure, he would have preferred a bit less paperwork, and it really would have been nice to be buying a house to actually live in, but as they’re making dinner together, it’s been a good day. Which is usually the sign of something about to go sideways.

And there it is, in his email. A nice little note from Diane, who’s off with Draga, at a wedding, having fun on her off day, expecting him to track down leads on his off day.

He looks more carefully and sighs. Unlike Senior’s hint, this really is something they need to move on.

One of those accounts they were sitting on just emptied out, and all five hundred million dollars in there just went on walk about all over the world, ending up dead ending in Barbados where it’s about to vanish.

“One whole day, is that too much to ask?” he says to Ziva.

She sighs, looking at the email. “Apparently. When this is put to sleep, we are taking a vacation. You, me, somewhere warm and sunny, and our cellphones are staying in DC.”

“Amen!” He rubs his eyes. “Okay. Ummm… Who do we know in Barbados? I’ve got to get them on the ground. We’ve got a picture and retinal scan, so… Zelaz’s on…” he’s sending the email to his on duty Lab tech, hoping to get an ID asap, “and Barbados has to have a harbor master and flight controllers…”

He’s messing with his phone, grabbing intel and moving it around. She turns off the burner, tosses the food in the fridge, and grabs the keys. This’ll go better at work, and she’s the one who’ll get them there, fast.

“What’d’ya got?”

Bishop snaps to attention, handing over a piece of paper. “Contact information of anyone in Barbados who may be of help, and our Puerto Rico team on a plane heading there as fast as can be.”

“Perfect.”

“And why am I sending them to Barbados as fast as possible?”

Ziva fills her in, and she asks, “So, do I need to call Eric in?”

Ziva shakes her head. “I am here, and can handle the research he would do.”

“He’s with Diane. Might as well make sure someone’s watching her back while she’s got all of this going on.”

Bishop nods at that. After all, right now, this is running numbers and planning the op. All execution is going to happen somewhere else, so it’s not like they need Eric right now. At least someone might as well get a weekend, right?

Tony’s got his phone to his ear, and is heading up toward MTAC. This’ll be easier to coordinate from the com center. He trusts the ladies to get him more leads, more numbers, more everything, and bring them to him while he’s getting his boots on the ground ready to start kicking ass and taking name.

“So, we’re going to Barbados with the instructions of try to catch the guy who took the money out of the bank, if he’s still there?” Joe Seth, NCIS San Juan, asks Tony, sounding very unimpressed by this order. (Tony’s got voice communication but not visual. Not surprising seeing he’s talking to him over his cell as he’s flying toward Barbados.)

“If Vance wants to read you in on why we’re grabbing this guy, that’s up to him. I’m telling you that fifty-seven minutes ago he took five hundred million dollars in cash, coin, and gems out of a bank account that we are extremely interested in.”

In the dim light of MTAC, Tony’s pacing around, feeling a buzz of almost nervous energy. He’s ready to be done with this, and hopefully today’s the day they hammer the last nail into this coffin. Warm beach, sunshine, rubbing coconut scented tanning oil on Ziva and (for him) drinking rum-based concoctions between naps in the sun are up if the can ever finish this damn case, so they are FINISHING this case.
“Wonderful. Guy got a name?”

“I’m sure he does. We don’t have it. His picture and retinal scan are in your inbox. Also, he’s the guy with, according to the bank footage, a blue Range Rover filled with boxes of money. No we don’t have plates. You’ll touch down in sixty-three minutes. Besides you, I’ve got the ports and airports shut down, but not for long.” And that was a stressful conversation. But he got it done. Amazing what charm and a bit of looking the other way can get done. “If we’re lucky, we can grab him before he’s unloaded and in the air.”

“Do we know anything about where he went?” Seth asks.

“Range Rover was pointed east, and didn’t show up again in any of the footage from the bank.” Getting footage from the bank wasn’t fun, either. After two dead ends with the bank, he called downstairs, found Tim’s cyberbaby, and asked her to hack it. Five minutes later, Brand had him into the bank’s security footage. “We’re running everything we can find on this money, where it went, who it belonged to, and if we can connect it to anyone in Barbados, we’ll give you the heads up. Photo recognition is running, once we’ve got an ID, this’ll be even easier.”

“And as long as this guy doesn’t have a private helicopter, small boat, or a good place to hide out until the ports open, we’re all set.”

Tony rolls his eyes. All of those are valid points. “Yeah, thanks for that. Look, we don’t care if we get the actual cash, the guy is the important thing. So, if you were to get locals to help, and suggest that as long as most of the cash ends up in evidence, you’ll look the other way if some of it goes missing. Have at it. Get everyone you run into interested in catching this guy, and make sure they know that we’ll make bringing him worth more than looking the other way.”

Joe smirks at that. “That how you get the ports closed?”

“Yeah. Five hundred million dollar scavenger hunt. Customs is suddenly very motivated to find this guy and his money. I told them he had about four hundred and fifty million on him. No one’s getting out of official channels until they’ve been well searched.”

“Uh huh.” Seth chuckles a bit. “You gonna look the other way if I get a little too fond of that cash, too.”

“Don’t let me catch you at it. Let me know when you’re on the ground, I’ll give you the update.”

“Okay.”

Tony calls down to the lab. The sooner he’s got an ID the better. “Zelaz?”

“Nothing interesting yet. Facial recognition is running. Retinal scan is running.” Tony can see the computer zipping away through faces in the background.

“Good, anything else?”

Zelaz shakes his head. “Not really. Not yet.”
“I’m fine with you narrowing the search to people born in the US, and if that comes up dry, expanding it. We think these guys are already in our system, somewhere. Federal Employee Database is a good place to try, too.”

“On it, Boss.”

“Boss!” Bishop’s voice pipes up as she rushes down to where he’s sitting in MTAC.

“Yeah, Bishop.”

“Just got another email from Jared Reener.”

“What else does Mr. Reener have for us?”

“One of the other accounts is emptying. It’s spilling cash into a lot of other accounts.”

“What’s a lot?” Tony’s feeling tense at this. Lot more work, split focus, but… this has to be something, no way two of their four accounts start moving all at once.

“As of right now, over 300. Diane wants us to get the court orders to freeze those accounts. Let them keep accepting money, but not let any of it out.”

Tony nods, thinking about it. “That’ll take forever.” They need a separate court order for each account, and without anything else… Putting money into an account, especially when you don’t know anything about the donor of said money, other than an anonymous source told you to check it out, means that you’ve got to have a very lax, and friendly, judge to get it done. He’s not sure that even Bleach would go that far for them. And it’s still going to take six hours because you need him to fill out the paperwork for each account.

“I know…. Um…” She’s looking very uncomfortable. “When I was with NSA, they used to have a program for vague intel that had to move fast. As long as you applied for a mass warrant before you started moving, you were okay. They’d offer you a provisional warrant, which was basically a key to get you whatever you wanted, as long as you promised not to use what you found if the warrant application didn’t go through. And… um… you could… pretty much grab people, listen to their stuff, and freeze their money with it.”

Tony nods. That’d be just perfect. “Explain it to Leon. If we can use it, do it. I don’t want that money shifting out of those accounts before we can track them down.”

Bishop nods. “Ziva’s already finding out who owns them.”

“Good.”

Tony hears knocking at the MTAC door. One of the techs goes and answers it, bringing Zelaz to him. He’s looking awfully out of place up here, and it hits Tony that’s he’s likely never been up here before.

“You’ve got an ID?”

Zelas smiles, and hands him a print out, and then heads out of the room.

Tony unfolds the print out, his eyes skimming over the picture to the ID and information under it.

“Shit.” He mutters. He figures Leon is still talking to Bishop, so he starts going through his contact list, hoping he knows someone who’s got an in with the US Diplomatic Corps.

“And we’re on the ground.” Tony hears as soon as he clicks on his phone.

“Great. I’ve got an ID for you, but you’re not going to like it. At least, I don’t like it.”

“What?” Seth sounds tense. This job is already a needle in a haystack, and he doesn’t want to hear about worse.

“Fredrico Ellanza.”

“Should I know that name?” Seth sounds curious. Tony doesn’t blame him, either, if the ID hadn’t included a title he wouldn’t have known who it was.

“US Ambassador to Uruguay.”

Seth winces. Tony nods. “Find him, take custody of him. He doesn’t have immunity from us, but it’s awfully likely everyone else just got a lot less interested in helping us grab him.”

“Now we see how good money is at motivating people.”

“Yeah. I’m working on getting his status revoked. Once that happens, everyone can pile on.”

Tony’s finished his contact list. No one he knows is high enough up in the US Diplomatic Corps to be useful on this. Time to call Leon, who is, hopefully, off the phone with Bishop by now.

He hits Leon’s contact button, and a moment later hears, “So much for a quiet Saturday at home. I just got off the phone with Agent Bishop.”

“Good. Can we swing it?” Tony really hopes so, once those accounts freeze, they can take their time going through them. Right now, they’re racing against the owners of those accounts moving the money before they can find out where it goes next.
“Technically the NSA isn’t allowed to do that, either. Or, it shouldn’t be.” Leon thinks about what Clemens did. “At least, as best as anyone knows…”

“Yeah. One day I’ll brief you a bit on a chat I had with my dad about that. So…”

“I told Bishop to explain it to our lead counsel. If he can make it work, we’ll do it. What do you have for me?”

“A crooked Ambassador.”

“One of ours?”

“Yes, but not on US soil.”

Leon makes a disgusted noise. Crooked Ambassador somewhere other than the US has no rules. He can do whatever the hell he wants and he’s got full protection.

“Can you get his status revoked?”

Leon sounds a bit tired as he says, “Shoot me your intel. I’ll see what I can do.”

Jarvis sounds amused as he answers the phone. “I take it things are heating up?”

“When aren’t they?” Leon replies.

“What do you need?”

“Information about ambassadors. Our ambassadors. I’ve got a dirty one.”

“Are you sure about that, Leon?” Jarvis knows that ambassadors often get sent to handle “off the books” jobs. Said jobs either look dirty, or are dirty, but are dirty on the side of the angels, or at least the US Government, and having a bunch of NCIS agents busting in and messing things up would cause problems.

“Remember those account numbers we got sent by our anonymous letter writer?”

“Yeah.” Now Jarvis doesn’t sound amused. “Which one?”

Leon rattles off the number and ends with, “he just took 500 million out of it in cash, gems, and gold.”

That makes Jarvis nervous, because he knows that account number. “Leon, what are your people doing?”

“Right now finding him, then grabbing him, why?”

“Call your people off of him. Eyes on him is fine, but don’t grab him, and don’t get caught.”

“Clayton?”
“Pull your guys back! I’ll call you when I can.”

“Clayton!”

Then there’s just the sound of a dial tone.

“Pull them back?” Tony’s not happy with that.

Leon isn’t, either. He does not appreciate being flogged off without an explanation, though Jarvis has enough trust built up over the years that he’s fairly sure that Jarvis is checking something big. “That’s what Jarvis said! And that was not a request. You can keep eyes on him, but not engage. I’m coming in. What answer did Bishop get from Counsel?”

“According to her, Yientz’s eyes lit up like a kid on Christmas, he spent ten minutes looking things up, smiled all over, and told them to get moving.”

“There’s something at least.”

Tony nods. He’s not going to say what’s in the first email Ziva’s sent him about who owns those accounts. “Get here soon.”

“Half an hour out.”

“We’ve got eyes on him,” Seth says, reporting in.

“Hang back. You can keep watch, but not intercept.”

Tony can feel the frustration rolling off of Seth. That’s not the sort of order he’s ever wanted to hear, and, honestly, he doesn’t like giving it, either.

“Not gonna have eyes on him all the much longer if I hold back.”

“Yeah. I’m sure. Always works that way. Order’s from way above my pay grade. We can watch but not grab. What’s he doing?”

“Standing on a beach, with two other guys, and a blue Range Rover, loading heavy looking boxes onto an extra-long Saturn.”

Tony thinks about that, and remembers that Saturdays aren’t just cars, they’re inflatable boats with a motor on the back, too. “Customs on his tail?”

“Nope. Embassy has its own private beach and he’s taking advantage of it.”
A beach doesn’t sound like great cover to Tony. “How far away are you?”

“Far enough. He’s not worried. Just strolling around with two other guys casually loading things up.”

“A Saturn. How big is that?”

“Twenty feet long? Seven feet wide? The engine is small, not a huge gas tank. He’s heading for a different island, or there’s a boat or water plane out here he’s going to. This can’t have a range of more than fifty miles.”

“How can you get someone on the water?” Tony doesn’t want Ellanza sailing off into the sunset never to be seen again.

“I can try.” Seth doesn’t sound enthusiastic about it. Or maybe about being micromanaged like this.

“Do it.”

“I’ve got a three person team. I send one onto the water, and we get the go ahead to grab him now, it’s just gonna be me and Gonzales.”

Tony slumps a bit; that’s a good point. “Two guys with him?”

“Yeah. Big ones, with guns. Big guns for that matter.”

“Embassy guards?”

“Not wearing the uniform if they are. I’d say they’re mercenaries, the tats look right, but I’m not close enough to see for sure. Those could be gang or cartel markers, too.”

Tony’s not going to send them in a guy short on that. “Hold in place, keep eyes on him as best you can. They get onto the water, follow at a distance.”

Leon’s pulling into the Navy Yard parking lot when his phone rings again.

“Grab him.” Jarvis’s voice.

“Call you back in a sec.” And a second later he’s got Tony on his phone as he’s parking. “Make the call, grab him. I’ll be in there with you in less than five minutes, hopefully with more intel.”

“On it.”

Tony has voice communications, and now that he’s patched into the Embassy’s security cameras, he’s got visual now, too.

“Grab him.”

“On it.” For the first time Seth is sounding pleased by one of Tony’s orders.

For a good two minutes, he’s got nothing to see. Just Ellanza, standing on the sand, watching as his guys load the boats. They’re going slow, taking their time, messing around, (no sound, but Tony’s guessing they’re bitching about the boxes being heavy).

All he can hear is heavy breathing as Seth moves his men into place.

One more minute passes, and he hears “Drop it!” and sees one of the guys drop a box. The Ambassador, looks up, startled, jerks, reaches for something, “Don’t even try it! United States Naval Criminal Investigative Services, you do not have immunity from us! Hands up where we can see them!” He stops and holds his hands up. Guy number two leaps for the Saturn, tries to get it shoved into the water, but stops when a bullet smacks into the inflatable edge of the boat, sending air streaming out of it.

A second after that, Tony sees the NCIS team coming into view. They’re cuffing, and talking about rights, and then grabbing other Embassy security to help them get the boxes out of the rapidly sinking Saturn.

“Good job,” Tony says. “Now, get them and the money on a plane to DC.”

“What was the hold up, Clayt?” Leon asks as he moves through the parking garage, heading toward his office.

“That account. It’s a black op slush fund. If that money was authorized to go out, you could have been blowing a hostage deal, or a payment to make sure that a friendly despot stays friendly, or made sure that different undercover agents stay undercover.”

NCIS has a slush fund, like that, too. It’s got fifty-thousand dollars in it. “Lot of money for a slush fund. Let alone an undercover op.”

“The whole thing isn’t supposed to move at once. Ten million here, twenty million there, that’ll sell you as an arms or drug dealer. That’ll buy the kid of an Ambassador back. Despots cost more, but rarely more than a hundred million.”

Leon nods at that. “But this wasn’t an authorized op?”

“No! And outside of the security services, no one is supposed to know that account even exists. It’ll be very interesting to see who told Mr. Diplomat about it.”

“Another one of the accounts heated up tonight, too.”

“Interesting. Which one?”

Leon’s heading through security as he says, “Let me get to my office, and I’ll tell you. Or maybe you could just tell me what they are and save me the time of having to call back and ask later.”

He hears Jarvis sigh. “Two of them, I don’t know. They’re protected. I know that. That’s why no one is ever able to catch them. Who runs them and why… I don’t know, and the President isn’t telling. The fourth one is a campaign finance law dodge.”

“How does that work?”

“Both teams use it as a way to make sure that incumbents stay incumbents. Donors put money in.
Politicians take money out. No limits on the donations or the withdrawals. You’ve got to have been in the system for at least ten years and made the right friends, or running for reelection as President to even know about it, and you’ve got to have a challenger who might actually win to use it. But, if you do, you get a card, and any spending you don’t want the world to see, you pay for with that card.”

“Attack ads?” Leon asks.

“Nothing that visible. Rumors, memes, positive news coverage, digging up dirt on your opponent, inventing dirt when you can’t find any, stuff like that.”

“Wonderful,” Leon says dryly. “Why do you know about it?”

“Daddy was a Senator, remember? Though back in his day it was a checkbook.”

Jarvis’ father had died back in ’84. “How long has this account been around?”

“Since there have been politicians who wanted the benefits of dirty politics without visibly getting their hands dirty, and since there have been men with money who wanted those politicians to do dirty things for them.”

“Of course. Who runs it?”

“That is a question that’s intentionally never asked, and never answered. Pay your dues, vote the way you’re supposed to vote, stay in long enough, the card shows up at your house one day.”

Leon can imagine that one day that checkbook had showed up at Jarvis’ house. “And let me guess, how you donate to it is also kept secret?”

“I’d imagine so. The big bundlers probably know, same with the big Lobbyists, but… I don’t. Dad didn’t. Card only works during election season, which is pretty much all the time now, but back in the day it was only good from June to November. Use it for the wrong sort of thing, say buy a boat or something, and you will lose your next election, and likely get indicted for something.”

“I’m in my office. Let me find out the status on our Ambassador and call you back.”

“Never mind. I’ll be there soon. No matter what the other account is, you’re going to want someone high enough on the food chain to deal with it.”

“Yeah. And that would be…”

“If needs be, the President himself.”
Tony hates waiting.

Four hours before Ellanza’s in DC.

And with each additional name Bishop and Ziva dig out from behind shell corporations, charities, and PO boxes, Tony knows that they’re going to need something way beyond what they’ve got.

Leon’s watching him, wondering what he’s thinking. They’re in Leon’s office, because with names like these... Tony doesn’t want the wrong person to hear these names.

He shakes his head. You don’t accuse a Supreme Court Justice, let alone three of them, of anything without... honestly, you just don’t do it. You get your proof together, and they quietly look at it and resign. You never go to court with something like this.

Tony shakes his head. “Right now, this is a dead end.”

Leon raises an eyebrow.

“Payments. All we have are payments. To corporations and charities that claim to have important people on their boards. We don’t know who is paying or why or why now. We don’t know if they pay their board members, can’t know that until we can really get into their financials, and right now we’re still figuring out who the hell they are. We do anything with these right now, and once we get there, they’ll all immediately have a case of ‘accepting money isn’t illegal.’”

Leon nods.

“Worse, with a list like this… It’s possible this is some sort of sting. Something designed to embarrass people, make them look like they’re taking bribes.”

Leon inclines his head, that’s possible, too. “You think there’s any shot this is a coincidence?”

Tony shakes his head. “Rule 8.”

Leon nods.

“Something’s got them spooked. Whoever this is, is liquidating. Why?”

Leon shakes his head.

Tony jumps up, grabs his cell, and calls Diane’s friend, Jared, the guy who’s keeping eyes on all of this. His phone goes to voicemail. Tony sighs. It’s 9:30, 8:30 in Chicago, where Jared is, he’s probably left for the day, passed this off to whomever he’s got keeping an eye on it.

Tony’s pacing around. No one knows who’s behind these numbers. Not precisely. They know who’s getting the money. As of ten minutes ago, the six accounts that Ziva and Bishop had broken had 43 congressmen, senators, judges, and governors listed as directors or board members.

Add in a different account and one Ambassador...

The Ambassador makes sense. If you want to move money and have it go easily, slap a diplomatic tag on it, and off it goes to wherever. As long as you keep it out of the home country of whomever is moving it, you’re all set.

Tony stands up. “I’m going to get into Ellanza’s history. See who he was talking to.”

Leon nods. “Jarvis will be here soon. We’ll find out what this account is.”
Okay.

Ellanza’s email account is a mess. It’s disorganized, sloppy, public, private, everything all in one place, and to make matters worse, three quarters of it are in Spanish.

He looks up at Ziva, who’s working away on her computer, hunting down another mystery account, though this one is linked to something called “The Greater Delaware Valley Public-Private Drug Free Partnership” (He’d made a crack about their parties being awfully dull.) and seeing who’s actually involved in said “partnership.”

“Trade with me?” he asks Ziva. He can speak Spanish, but he’s not great at it. She’s better.

Ziva looks up. “What are you looking at?”

“At least six thousand emails, more than a hundred of them in the last twenty-four hours, and most of them are in Spanish.”

Ziva nods, stands up, stretches, and heads over to switch computers with him. He pets her belly a little as she sits down, and she kisses his hand as he pulls away to go work on hers.

On her screen, Tony sees that Ziva had been googling the partnership, seeing who’s involved, and given his Dad’s earlier comments about using things like this as a way to pay people off, he’s thinking double checking everyone on the list makes sense.

So, that’s what he does. Takes each name, googles it, and makes a note as to who they are. Bishop’s keeping a running total of who they’re finding, and with each new name there should be a pattern emerging, but other than the fact that they’re all powerful and connected, Tony’s not finding it, not yet.

His own search of the Partnership gives him twenty five names. One ex-Governor, three Pennsylvania State Senators, one current Governor, two ex-PA congressmen, one active PA congressman, three ex-PA senators, one current one, and several other businessmen who were the ‘private’ half of the partnership.

He shoots the names to Bishop, and keeps looking to see if he can find out what the “Partnership” actually does. It’s a charity. He can see that. The website talks about anti-drug outreach and protecting vulnerable children and all that stuff, but… He’s not seeing what they actually do.

There’s lots of information about how to donate.

And, if you donate enough money one of the big names on the board will come and speak to your group or school about why drugs are bad… But… they don’t appear to be running rehabs services, or midnight basketball games, or any of the other stuff that people who are trying to cut down on the amount of drug use actually do. (At least, in Tony’s experience of more than twenty years as a cop, old dudes in suits talking to elementary schools is a remarkably ineffective way to cut down on drug use.)

Tony looks up at Ziva and Bishop. “You’ve got names. What do these corporations and charities and clubs do?”
Ziva gives him an arch look. “Do you want to know who is getting paid, or do you want to know what they are doing with the money? We cannot get you both at the same time.”

He rolls his eyes a bit. With a list this big… “Okay. Bishop. Keep finding out who these accounts belong to. Both of you, shoot me the organizations you’ve found, I want to see what they do.”

“And find out who Ellanza was talking to on top of that,” Ziva adds.

“Yep. Get ready to interrogate him.” Tony checks his watch. “He should be on the ground in three hours.”

“Well Clayt?” Leon asks as Jarvis looks at the account number in question, and the money dribbling out of it.

Clayton shakes his head. He doesn’t know the one that’s bleeding money. And anyone he’s asked about, even people who have a lot to lose by pissing him off, haven’t been willing to say what it is. “It’s not the finance law skirting one. That’s…” he taps one of the other numbers on the list they had gotten from the anonymous pen pal.

Leon remembers what Diane said about that one. “That one’s in a bank out of Seychelles. Everyone involved with it is in a non-extradition country, and if they ever move, we’ll grab them.”

“But they all live in a tropical paradise and have enough money to bring anything they want in, so they aren’t going to move,” Clayton says, dryly.

Leon nods. “According to Diane Anderson, this one” Leon taps the floating account, “is an account on a computer on a boat somewhere.”

Clayton nods. “That’s my understanding, too. No cash. No hard assets. We’re not entirely sure there are even people. There’s no board of directors listed, for example. From everything we can tell, it’s just a computer keeping track of numbers and shifting them around.”

Leon taps the fourth number. “And this one’s the now empty slush fund. Who runs that fund?”

Jarvis shakes his head. “Like I said, black ops. No one ‘runs’ it.”

“You mean no one admits to running it. Then how do you get access to it?”

“Have a big enough problem and know someone high enough up to know about it. When I was in the Clandestine Services we had an undercover op start to go bad. I was able to make contact with my handler one last time, but the people I was supposed to be buying the weapons from were getting suspicious because I was awfully short on cash. Within a day, I had the account number, and the money to get out of the situation.”

“And that’s why you know it?” Leon hasn’t heard too many clandestine services stories, but the ones he has heard have made him very glad to have not been in them.

“That and the fact that my handler told me to forget it and write up the report to show that I’d used the money the Navy was supposed to give me, but didn’t, to do the job. For some reason, telling me to forget something or look the other way just burns it into my memory.” Jarvis gives him a tight, little smile.

“Why didn’t they give you the money?”

Jarvis looks annoyed at the answer to this. “They gave me half of it as real bills and half counterfeit. Some dingbat thought it would be a good way to save money, and a better way to track where the money went.” His eyes narrow at the memory. “If I could tell they were bad, my buyer could, too. I was stuck, needed ten million more dollars than I had, but I lucked out that Chaffin knew someone who knew someone and got me out of bind, otherwise I would have been too damn dead to ever meet you.”

Leon nods. “Chaffin?”

“Been dead ten years.”

“Of course.” He would have had to been or Clayton would have never mentioned him by name. “Who did you call to find out if that was a legitimate job or not?”

Jarvis shakes his head. “Can’t say.”

“Clayton.” Leon’s giving him the no bullshit between us look.

Jarvis shakes his head again. “I can’t. It’s not a security clearance thing, or a you aren’t read in thing, either. It’s a I don’t want a good contact getting screwed thing.”

Leon nods at that, too. Understanding that said contact is not supposed to know what that account is doing, and any attention on him/her would bring trouble. “Ellanza’s coming in. We’ll find out how he found out, soon.”

“I’d like to watch that interrogation.”

“I’m fine with that.”

“Bishop,” Tony says.

“Yeah.”

“Am I going crazy or are all of these corporations/charities/shells, claiming to be some sort of anti-drug warriors?”

“You are crazy,” Ziva says, “but not about that.”

“Ziva?”

“I remember that about the ones I was going through. One drug treatment center, two charities, and three corporations that had something to do with drugs.”

“Everything I’m finding with a descriptive name leans in that direction,” Bishop says. “Like, okay. Jemson Inc. that’s not helpful, but Clermark Pharmaceuticals, Drug Free Tomorrow, Partnership for Clean Kids, those are all really drug related.”

Tony rubs his eyes. “So, who pays a ton of money from an illicit account to… help keep drugs \textit{illegal}? That doesn’t make any sense.”

“Maybe they aren’t trying to keep drugs illegal? Maybe it’s some sort of money laundering thing?” Bishop asks.

“Like your father was telling us,” Ziva adds.

“Maybe… Got to be easier ways to launder… How much is it by now, Bishop?”

“Three quarters of a billion dollars into four hundred and six accounts.”

Tony’s eyes narrow, and he gets into the next account. There’s a pattern here; he can feel it; he just can’t see it.

“Okay, thanks, Seth. See you in half an hour.” Tony hangs up his phone. “Seth, Ellanza, and his two ‘body guards’ are on the ground and en route to us. You ready to grill him?”

Ziva smiles. “I have some ideas. I haven’t found any direct references to the money, but I have found an invitation to a ‘party’ at ‘Cattlewash’ beach today at seven AM.”

“Probably where they set up the plan. Who sent that?” Tony asks.

“Still checking. I have an email address, but no concrete ID, yet. Though the computer the email was sent from is in Peru.”

Peru. That’s niggling in Tony’s head. Tingling his gut. “Bishop, what’s the biggest cocaine producer on Earth right now?”

“Colombia. Has been for the last two years.”

“Number two?”

“Bolivia,” Ziva answers.

“Not what I’m looking for.”

“Peru’s number three,” Bishop replies, rapidly googling.

“That is.” He’s staring at the list of corporations, charities, and people on his screen, all drug related in one way or another. The money is moving, fast. Pouring into those accounts in bit and drips, all random numbers, but all smaller than the amount that triggers the money laundering flags. More of it’s heading to an Ambassador…

Tony pulls up a map, and Uruguay is exactly where he thinks it is. The other side of South America from where the cocaine producers are. Hell, it’s just about as conveniently located to Peru as Texas is to him right now.

“Ellanza have any connections to Peru?”
“Not that I can see. He was born in Miami. His parents were Cuban refugees. He went to college, got a degree in…” Ziva’s eyes are scanning around on Ellanza’s CV, and she finds it and smiles. “He got his degree in pharmaceutical engineering.”

“What’s that?” Tony asks. He knows what biomedical engineering is because of McBrains and McGrandma, but this one is new on him.

“The guys who make the devices that get medicine into bodies. They design things like insulin pumps and the inserts that slowly release hormones, stuff like that,” Bishop adds.

“After college, he worked for a collection of drug manufacturers, did well, and then…” She’s still scanning the page. “Car accident in ’95. Lost a hand from the looks of it.”

“That would make mad scientist-ing difficult.”

Bishop nods in agreement with Tony.

Ziva continues, “Then he shifts from research to lobbying. He spent a lot of time testifying as an expert for the FDA… Consulted with Medicare on coverage options. Worked closely with the Administration on the ACA… Between consulting deals, he registered as a fundraiser. Started a pharmaceutical-based PAC. And was named the Ambassador to Uruguay in late ’15.”

“Hasn’t been there long,” Tony says.

“No. And then yesterday, he gets an email requesting his attendance at the ‘beach party.’ Only email from that address. He did not respond to it.”

Tony asks, “Would you travel a thousand miles for a ‘party’ if you got invited by someone you haven’t talked to before?”

Bishop shakes her head.

“Phone records?”

Ziva shakes her head. “No numbers from Peru. I am still tracking down people he was talking to. Though if I was running something like this, I’d have someone on the ground to make contact, get things set, and just send the final detail. That way the man on the ground can’t tell where the meet is, and the meet email gets lost amid all the other details in his inbox.”

“Say, like a bodyguard who’s not on detail with the Embassy?” Bishop asks.

Ziva nods. “Neither of the men with him are on staff at the Embassy.”

“Not as security,” Tony adds. He’s got his phone and is calling his agent, “Hey Seth.”

“Yeah…”

“Don’t let on what you’re telling me, just yeses and nos. Now that you’re close enough to see, are those cartel tattoos?”

“Yes.”

“Colombian?”

“No.”
“Bolivian?”

“Nope.”

“How about Peru?”

“Bingo.”

“Does our Ambassador look particularly nervous?”

“Yes.”

“About them?”

“Nope.”

“Okay, thanks. Twenty minutes?”

“Yes.”

Tony bounds up the stairs. He knows Jarvis is here, and that he’s talking to Leon, but he hasn’t gotten an update, yet. With Ellenza twenty minutes out, he’s also done waiting patiently. (Though he does knock before opening the door.)

“Almost show time,” Tony says, poking his head through the door.

Jarvis and Leon nod. “Are you handling the interrogation?” Leon asks.

“Ziva is.”

Jarvis smiles. “May I join her?”

Tony’s flatfooted by that, but he nods anyway. “I suppose I should get you updated.”

“That would be good, Agent DiNozzo,” Leon says with a small smile.

So, Tony starts talking, and as he talks, Jarvis smiles wider. He doesn’t like Jarvis much to begin with and that smile is part of it. That smile bodes ill for anyone caught in it. When he gets to the Peru connection, Jarvis nods, looking satisfied.

“That’s the piece.”

“Clayt?”

Jarvis inclines his head. “We lost a SEAL team in Peru six months ago. Official story is they were KIA in Pakistan.”

“But they were in Peru?” Tony asks, feeling a little stupid at that, but he wants to make sure he’s hearing this right.
“Exactly. It’s considered bad manners to send armed forces into friendly countries without their permission on orders to kill their citizens and burn their fields.”

Tony nods. “So they were in ‘Pakistan.’”

Jarvis nods. “Since they were completely off the grid, their commander would have had access to that account.”

“Which account?” Tony asks. Too many bank accounts floating around right now.

“The one Ellanza just cleaned out,” Jarvis says.

“So, is our SEAL alive and turning traitor, or gave it up before he died?” Leon asks.

“We know for a fact all six of them were KIA.”

“How good of a fact?” Tony asks.

“Their heads were delivered to the US Embassy in Lima. DNA confirmed who they were.”

Vance is looking angry. “And I didn’t know about this because?”

Jarvis aims a cold look at Leon. “Because you don’t get notified every time a Sailor gets killed in action. Officially they were beheaded by insurgents in Pakistan.”

Tony rubs his temples and sighs. “Okay. They got captured by the people they were trying to kill, and they returned the favor.”

“The Bathenada family. They’re running cocaine, heroin, and synthetic mushrooms out of Peru. It’s a smaller cartel, they tend to shy away from the big boys in Colombia and Bolivia, preferring to let them fight it out with each other.”

“Are you sure about that?” Tony asks.

“Why?” Jarvis responds.

“Our second account. It’s pouring money into anti-drug crusades. Could they be big enough, or well enough connected to be trying this as a way to cut down the competition?”

Jarvis looks unsettled by that. “Who’s getting paid off?”

“Directly, no one. Indirectly, senators, congressmen, judges, and on and on. Why?”

“All through anti-drug organizations?” Tony can see that Jarvis has something with this, too.

“Almost. Some of them are pharmaceutical companies.”

Leon’s watching Jarvis, who has something, big, clicking in his head. “What is it, Clayt?”

“Not sure, yet. Let me make a few calls. We’re not going to interrogation until I get done.” Then Jarvis leaves Vance’s office.

Tony shakes his head, and Vance nods a bit.
It feels like a very long time before Jarvis is back. But then he is, and he’s not looking happy.

“According to DEA, there’s always been a rumor that the Bathenada’s were up to more than it looked like. Nothing ever got pinned to them, because they kept a small profile. But, the theory was that they tended to pit the Colombians and Bolivians against each other, making sure to keep the chaos up, and limit the supply of drugs going into secondary and tertiary markets, keeping prices up.

“According to Commander Allison, who sent those SEALs in, the reason for going in against the Bathenada’s now, was that they were one of the primary buyers of poppy seeds. They’ve always run a smaller, higher tech operation, so the idea that they were using their contacts in Pakistan and Afghanistan to get good seeds and plants and then breed them with each other was plausible. The idea was to go in and destroy their greenhouses. Help to cut off the money going to the warlords in Afghanistan and Pakistan.”

Tony and Vance nod at that, it makes a certain amount of sense. Waste of time and life if you ask Vance, but he’s certainly seen dumber operations over the years.

“For the South American producers, the US and the pipeline up Central America to the US is the primary market for cocaine and heroin. That’s where the big money is, so lots of drugs go flowing up. Europe is the secondary market. Harder to get to, longer travel time, less drugs get in, so they cost more per ounce. Australia, New Zealand, Canada, tertiary markets. Not enough of their own population involved in trafficking to have to fight for territory, not a lot of demand, but for people who want drugs, the prices are very high.”

Tony’s still nodding along. He gets this. “So, they what, monopolize the Australian market?”

Jarvis nods. “Something like that. And if they can produce a higher grade of heroin, they can move more ‘drug’ in less space, cutting costs further.”

“Makes sense, what does this have to do with the anti-drug groups?” Tony asks. “Are they the ones behind that account?”

“We don’t know for sure. Money, cash money, goes into that account. That’s part of never being able to get too deep into that account, because all of the money that goes into it is cash. No back trail. We do know that it’s going out and being very charitable, encouraging people to not soften their stance on drugs. And…” Jarvis looks slightly embarrassed. “We know that the harder we come down on drug trafficking the higher the profits are for the cartels.”

This is counter-intuitive to both Tony and Vance, who are just staring at Leon. “They make their money by providing a product you can’t just go to the grocery store and buy. Like every other business they don’t like competition. And right now, they’ve got competition that would completely decimate them, but they’re legally barred from getting into the market.”

Leon and Tony still aren’t quite getting it.

“All of the major pharmaceutical companies run on thinner margins than they’d like. All of them could add illegal drugs to their catalogues overnight. They’re all capable of doing it, and they’ve got distribution chains all set up, and the customers that spend big money on drugs would much rather go to their local drug store and buy cocaine, with a guaranteed purity and quality control, than the current model of hoping their connection won’t turn them in to the Feds. It’s just like Prohibition and the Mob. The Mob didn’t want alcohol legal, because it put them out of business. No one in their right mind goes heading off to a dangerous part of town to buy something they hope is their drug of choice, when they can just go to the corner store and pick it up easy as you like.”

“So, you’re saying the cartels are pushing for anti-drug legislation?” Tony asks, feeling kicked in the guts. He spent years working vice, busting dealers and the like. The idea that he was making life better for the cartels hurts.

“We know that they do, through shells and dummies and friends in the US, donate to the hardliners on keeping drugs illegal. So far, from what we’ve been able to see, they don’t donate a lot, but they do it.”

“Why does a cartel that doesn’t deal much in the US lobby here?” Leon asks.

“If the money is coming from the Bathenadas, and we don’t know that it is, I’d think they’d do it because when our drug laws get stiffer, we lean on all of our buddies to stiffen theirs, too. Every industrialized nation on earth has a pharmaceutical industry. Recreational drugs are so easy to make that high school drop outs in West Virginia can do it. It would take most of those companies less than a month to switch production over.”

“Or it’s a move right out of the Godfather,” Tony says.

Jarvis raises an eyebrow.

“The ‘neutral party,’ in this case the small player, gets everyone together, lumps their money in one place, or maybe grabs a lot more of it and gets ready to start laying it all over the place, for the benefit of everyone…”

“That would work. They all benefit when the big pharmaceutical companies stay out of the market. A lot of legalize pot on the federal level people are up for election this year. Pot goes legal, the ceiling doesn’t fall in, that’ll move the push for other drugs. If they get in, the cartels are going to end up hurting because they won’t be able to shift their distribution model into the legal market fast or easy.”

Leon nods slowly. “And with all the laws on the books right now against importing legal drugs…”

“Right. Now, because there’s no legal route to get those drugs, bringing in illegal ones makes lots of money. Once you can buy them legally at the local CVS, importing them illegally is a lot of risk for very little reward. Like black market cigarettes, you can only make a profit on them in states where the taxes are too high,” Jarvis replies.

Tony rubs his eyes. “So, our theory is that the cartels are paying the drug warriors to keep drugs illegal. Maybe, if we’re seeing what we think we’re seeing, one of the cartels has grabbed our own money, maybe trying to get it into the account that’s paying everyone else off. Do we think that people who are on the boards of these organizations have any clue as to who is bankrolling them?”

“We can hope not, right?” Leon says.

Jarvis shrugs. “At least some of them don’t.”

“Last question,” Tony asks, ”why now?”

Before Leon or Jarvis get a chance to speculate on that, Tony gets a call, from Abbi, explaining what just happened to Diane and Draga.
Today is (eek!) the last day of summer camp for the kiddos. Two solid weeks of Little Dude and Littler Dude at home, and then school begins. Next chapter's a big one, too, so it might be a while before it pops up. (Or perhaps the writing muses will fly with me and the free-time fairy shall be kind. I can dream right?)
"Wait! Back up. What just happened to Diane and Draga?" Tony asks Abbi, his mind spinning.

Abbi explains, starting with Gibbs’ gut feeling and ending with Draga jerking his car out of the way and the chase car hurtling into the train and exploding.

Tony keeps nodding, relaying bits and pieces to Jarvis and Leon.

“Jethro’s bringing them to you. I’ve got my team securing the scene, though I’m calling Jimmy in for the body. Joint investigation?”

“Fine by me,” Tony says. “Wanna hear what I’ve got on my end of Diane’s mysterious account numbers?”

“Sure, bring it on. Nothing I like more in the middle of the night than a massive conspiracy.”

Tony smiles grimly. “It’s a good one.” Then he gets to telling his side of the tale.

“I think we have a change of plans,” Tony says as everyone shuffles into the conference room. Once Jarvis and Leon are seated, and Bishop’s got her computer open, ready to take notes, and Ziva is watching him, he starts up. First off, he explains all of the drama going on with Diane and Draga, then he goes into the possible cartel connection.

While he’s doing that, Seth calls in, saying he’s got the bodyguards in holding and Ellanza in interrogation. Tony tells him to come join them.

“Bishop, catch a ride with Dr. Palmer and go to the scene, work with Abbi’s guys. Ziva you and Jarvis are taking the first swing at Ellanza, after debriefing Seth, learning more about the trip up, and confirming who his bodyguards work for. I’m going to keep researching who is getting paid while digging into the major cartels, and once Diane and Draga get here, more debriefing followed by a long chat with Diane about what she’s getting into. Vance, if you could talk to anyone you know in Colombia or Bolivia, let alone Peru, and find out what they’ve got to say about this…”

Everyone is nodding, though Ziva is curious about the idea of working with Jarvis on interrogation.

As they’re driving to the Navy Yard, Diane is thinking one thing. (Actually, she’s got a lot of things buzzing around in her head, but she doesn’t like any of them, so she is focusing on one thing.)

People don’t take players like her out of the game after they’ve found what they’re looking for. As she said to Jethro, it’s not cost effective. Once she’s found whatever it is, the cat is out of the goddamned bag. Once that happens, it’s damage control time.
It’d be one thing if she was the only person who could do what she does, or use the information she has, but she’s not. Any decent accountant with a computer connection, like Jared, could do what they just did.

Plus, both her and Jared have saved everything they’ve found to the cloud. It can’t be deleted, can’t be destroyed. This data is out there, for everyone to see, forever. It’s not like she’s a witness with one piece of evidence no one else can access. So, moving now, that’s just stupid.

No. The guy she’s playing against, the mind on the other side of the blind chess game they’re playing, the guy who can plan a freaking train crash, he doesn’t move after the cat’s out of the bag. He goes before. He’s playing defense, not offense.

Two of four accounts are moving.

Two… aren’t/weren’t.

Something big is about to happen or is currently happening, she hasn’t found it, yet, and someone doesn’t want her seeing it. Someone, really doesn’t want her to see it.

Another thought hits her cold as ice down her back. She’s not the one directly looking, not right now. When she’s at work, she’s looking, but she kicked it over to Jared because she was going to be out for the weekend.

“Leroy,” he’s keeping a close eye on the road, watching all of the other traffic while Eric drives. After that display of car handling, Jethro didn’t think he could insist on driving.

“Mmm?” His eyes don’t leave the street.

“I’ve had a friend at Bank of America using his own connections to get me this information. Is he going to be okay?”

“Shit,” Gibbs says it softly, but Emily hears it, and her hand tightens in her mother’s grasp. Gibbs grabs his cell phone, and has Tony up in a minute. Then he tosses the phone back to Diane.

“Tony, have you tried to get a hold of Jared?” Diane asks.

“Few hours ago, he didn’t pick up his phone.”

“I had him running all the searches for me, and if they knew I was looking, they probably knew he was doing it for me.”

Tony’s not sounding happy as he says, “I’ll get someone on him.”

So much for running down cartel connections.

Tony goes through his contact list, looking for who they’ve got in the Great Lakes Office. A minute later, he’s got a name. A few rings after that, he says, “Hi, is this Zoe McClellan?”

“Yes… and this is?”

“Agent Tony DiNozzo. I’m at the DC branch, and I need someone to check in on a local where you
He hears some under the breath grumbling, probably because it’s 1:00 on a Sunday where she is.

“I know, not what you want to get out of bed for. It’s a big case, and we need to have him brought into protective custody, and shipped to us.”

“Okay. I’m up. Send me a name and address, and I’ll go get him for you.”

“Thanks.”

“Who is he and why do we want him?”

“An accountant, and we want him because someone just tried to kill the person he was doing research for.”

Now McClellan’s voice sounds awake. “Person okay?”

“Yeah. By a hair. I’ve called Jared, the accountant, twice in the last five hours. Didn’t get him the first time, figured he might have just been out. Second time, after the attack Diane, he’s still not answering his phone, and my gut’s not happy.”

“Gut?” She sounds amused by that. “I worked a job once with a guy who told me to trust my gut.”

Tony nods, wondering if she ever worked with Gibbs. “Yep. Me, too. You’ll go check?”

Zoe sounds more awake as she says, “I’m putting my boots on as we speak.”

“Thanks. Let me know what you find.”

“No problem.”

Ringing phone. That slowly filters through Tim’s mind. There’s not supposed to be a ringing phone this late at night. This is supposed to be romantic evening in the country date night. Tim grumbles, fumbles around, grabs the phone, sees Jimmy’s name on the contact, and jerks awake, hoping everyone is okay.

“Sorry to get you up, but we’ve got a case.”

Tim curses quietly, but at least this isn’t a baby girl is spiking a fever/spewing Technicolor fluids all over the place call. “Why are you calling me about a case in the middle of the night?” There was a time where Jimmy would have called Tim in in the middle of the night. Any case where Dispatch got Ducky before Gibbs involved Team Morgue getting Team Investigation out of bed. But, in that he’s not part of Team Investigation any longer…

“I’m not. I’m calling Abby; you picked up her phone.”

“Ulgh.” Tim rubs his eyes. “So, you don’t actually need me?”

“Get her up to DC and let her nap on the ride up so she’s ready to work. Home with Breena and babies after?”
He stretches a bit and pokes Abby gently. “We’re on our way. What sort of case?”

“I don’t have all the details, but the quick version is some idiot tried to ram Draga and Diane into a train. Draga saw it, jerked his car out of the way, and the idiot drove into a moving train at full speed.”

Tim winces. That’s going to be beyond nasty. “And suddenly I’m very glad to not to be in the field.”

“Thanks.”

“Sorry,” He winces for Jimmy. Yes, Jimmy’s used to every flavor of death ever, but that doesn’t mean he enjoys having to use a shovel to pick up all the pieces. “Probably three hours before she’s there.”

“Draga’s car’ll be getting there sooner, that’s the first bit of evidence to get in.”

“Okay.”

“Mmmm…” Abby finally moves a bit, possibly because Tim just turned the light on.

“That a sound of life from Abby?”

“Mmm?” Her eyes haven’t opened yet, but that’s definitely a why are the lights on kind of question.

“Yep.”

“Give her a kiss from me. See you at work… Who knows when? This’ll take hours to get all of the body parts collected.”

Jimmy hangs up the phone as Dr. Allan shuts the doors to the back of the van. A moment later, he’s sitting next to Jimmy, looking nervous. That’s somewhat new. Allan’s not a nervous by nature sort of fellow, and though he does look nervous when he’s about to do something he’s never tried before, Jimmy hasn’t seen him look like this about going to a crime scene for months.

“Dr. Palmer?”

“Yes, Dr. Allan?”

“How bad is this going to be?”

Jimmy sighs and nods, swallows hard. Train wreck, literally. That’s worth being nervous for. “I’ve done one train accident before. It was bad. This will be… not as bad, but only because this was one car with presumably one person versus a train, and the last time I did this it was a full troop transport versus a train.”

“Oh, God.” Allan’s looking nauseous at that.

“Yeah.” That one stayed with Jimmy for a long time after. “We had help from the Norfolk and Baltimore and New York MEs, and it still took us three days to get all of the pieces. This won’t be that bad.”
“But it’ll just be us.”

“True.” Jimmy puts his key into the ignition, and jerks a little when Bishop taps on the glass.

He rolls the window down.

“Room for one more?”

“Always,” Allan says, looking pleased to see someone else who hasn’t done this before. He scoots over while she goes around the van and gets in, next to them.

Abbi’s five ten. She is not, by any stretch of the imagination, a small woman. She’s still, though, on average, an inch smaller than Joe Average American Man.

Joe Railroader, who’s real name is something like Broder, is standing in front of her, looking deeply unimpressed by the idea of a cop in a fancy dress that he’s got to look down at, as he’s explaining how he’s got to move the damn train, crime scene or not, because it’s blocking both of the roads that cross at this intersection as well as the damn rail. And that, if she wants to process it for evidence, she can to that down at the Richmond train yard.

“You are not moving this train!” Abbi says, voice soft and low.

“I’ve got to, Ma’am. Got three trains behind me, and they all gotta get through.”

“Re-route them.” By the time three plus trains go through here, everything scattered around this scene will be lost or crushed.

“I can’t do that.”

“Then get on your radio, and get the person who can. If you move this train, I will arrest you!”

“No, you won’t. My union rep…”

Her look at him could freeze water, and he finally sees past the makeup and dress and sees her staring at him, cold and angry. “Will do absolutely nothing for you. This is a direct and legal order from a person with a gun. That train stays right here until every scrap of evidence has been collected from it.”

He slouches off, grabs his radio, and starts talking.

For right now, she’s on her own. At least two hours before the rest of the crew is here. The local LEO’s are still messing around with the other accident, but they tell her that she’ll have additional man power here, soon.

She starts setting up flares, gets the flashers that Gibbs has in his car going, and uses the two emergency signs he’s got to block two of the four roads off.

Then it’s just her, a flashlight, and a bored looking conductor.
“This your normal route?” she asks him.

“Not saying anything without my union rep.”

She wants to roll her eyes. This guy couldn’t be less helpful if he tried. “You’re not under arrest, you can’t refuse to answer questions or ask for counsel.”

Joe Railroader’s eyes narrow. “Not saying anything without him.”

“Do you want me to arrest you for obstructing justice?”

“If you arrest me, then I have the right to say nothing until my Union rep shows up.”

Abbi grits her teeth, shakes her head, and then goes to photograph the wreckage.

Ellanza’s not looking too worried as he sits in interrogation. Not looking too comfortable, either. If Ziva had to characterize that look, she’d call it the look of someone who’s in trouble, but knows exactly how bad it is, and doesn’t think it’s that bad. She puts him in mind of how she looks when she gets pulled over for speeding.

“What does this look right to you?” she asks Jarvis.

Jarvis is eyeing him up and down, and shakes his head slightly. “He’s sure his lie is going to hold. Which means it’s probably true, or at least confirmable…” Jarvis turns to Seth. “The men on the plane with him… tell me about the tattoos.”

“I can do you one better.” He pulls out his phone and shows Jarvis a picture.

Jarvis looks, nodding. It’s a black cross, each arm equally long, with curled ends. A crescent moon in yellow above. “That’s the Bathenada crest.”

“So, why him…” Ziva asks, looking at Ellanza.

“That’s going to be our first question. Agent Seth, once we get the answer out of him, you’re going to check it, carefully, and bring us more information.”

“Yes, sir.” Seth’s looking a little overwhelmed at getting orders directly from the Secretary of the Navy.

“And once we have the answer to that, I want you and your men to wring every drop of information you can out of Mr. Ellanza’s body guards.”

Seth smiles, looking like he intends to enjoy that.

Jarvis is smiling, too. “Ready, Agent DiNozzo?”

Ziva smiles back at them. This is so much more satisfying than running down numbers. “Lead the way.”
Before entering interrogation, Jarvis takes off his suit jacket. He musses his hair a little, loosens his tie, unbuttons his sleeves and rolls them up.

Ziva watches, getting in idea of what he’s doing. He’s making himself look tired and annoyed. Like he’s been drug out of bed late on Saturday night and wants nothing more than to get back there. She nods, holds up one finger, and heads over to the canteen to grab an extra-large cup of coffee.

When she hands it to him, he smiles, takes a deep swigs, winces a little (2:00 on Sunday, the coffee’s been sitting for a long time), and then he takes his glasses off, rubs his eyes, hard, making them look a little bloodshot, and puts them back on, very slightly askew.

Ziva nods, approving. This is going to be fun.

Leon’s in MTAC talking to NCIS Cartagena, the Colombian and Bolivian Ambassadors, and the DEA. (He called for the Peruvian Ambassador as well, but he’s ‘in a meeting’ and ‘cannot be interrupted.’ (Diplomatic speak for fuck off, we’ll get back to you when we feel like it.) He’s explaining what they’ve got over here, and is asking for intel.

And he’s getting it.

Namely, yes, they all know about the Bathenadas. But, they’re tiny players. (Not “tiny” the DEA points out, cash rich, but not major players by any stretch, they’ve got, at most, 5% of the market.)

Colombia and Bolivia’s Ambassadors are agreeing that things have been heating up between their own Cartels. Not across the borders, Peru’s between Colombia and Bolivia, after all, but each country has their own problems with cartels, and it does look like they’re simultaneously in situations where the different families are continuing to squabble for control.

“What does ‘squabbling for control’ mean?” Leon asks.

“The usual stuff,” Tomas Medin, Ambassador to Bolivia says. “Shoot up each other’s supply lines, burn things down, most of it happens far away from the cities, so we’re getting second and third hand accounts. More violence than normal, not enough to call it a war.”

“Only a war when it spills into the cities,” Sarah Olpin, Ambassador to Colombia says. “Doesn’t matter how many people get killed in the jungles, that’s just the cost of doing business. When it happens where people can see it, that’s when it’s a war.”

Daniel Traig, the DEA’s cartel specialist, nods. “We try not to get too involved when they’re just killing each other. When collateral damage gets too high, that’s when we start paying attention. Right now collateral damage is at a minimum.”

They all see a woman walk into the view of the NCIS Cartagena, whisper something to Ken Harris, who nods, and then opens his window, turning the camera on his computer. For a second, they all watch the camera spin dizzily, and when it focuses again, they can see black night lit by flames.

“Just got word that that’s the docks. Supposedly ones favored by the Allajanco Cartel for moving cocaine out by sea. I think things are about to blow up.”
For a moment, they watch the flames, and then the Bolivian Ambassador gets a discrete word whispered in his ear. His face goes tense, and he nods. “Gentlemen, lady, I’ve got to get moving. Our third biggest airport was just bombed.”

And with that, they begin scrambling. The DEA promises to keep Vance in the loop, but he’s feeling awfully sure that he’s going to be the low man on the totem pole when it comes updates.

---

Ziva walks in first. She’s sure she’s going to be the “reasonable” one. Jarvis is going to play the fried/annoyed/get it done as fast as possible cop.

“Are you comfortable, Mr. Ellanza?” she asks, handing him a bottle of water.

Jarvis snorts at that. “I was comfortable. This asshole doesn’t deserve comfortable. Your thirty room mansion not big enough for you? You need a gold plated Lamborghini or something?”

Ziva rolls her eyes. “If you wanted comfortable, you shouldn’t have been cop, Clayt,” Ziva fires at him. “Mr. Ellanza?”

“I’m fine, thank you.” His English does have a slight accent to it, one that puts her in mind of south Florida.

“Start at the beginning,” Jarvis snaps out.

“I was born in Miami in 1967.” Ellanza’s back is up. He’s answering Jarvis with the same attitude he’s getting from him.

“Don’t be a jerk.”

“Don’t be a jerk, yourself,” Ziva says to Jarvis, “Honey, remember?” She turns to Ellanza, “You know why we picked you up?”

He nods. “I have a clue. I’d like to speak to counsel.”

“As is fully your right.” Clayton looks annoyed, and mutters something about shooting all the lawyers. Ziva hands over her phone. “Call whomever you like.”

Ellanza does, and as the phone rings, and then connects, he shuts it off. The cool and collected façade falls, and he says, “We’re really in the US!”

“Where else would you be? You drove past the Washington Monument to get here.” Clayton sounds annoyed by this, but Ziva knows they’re about to get to the ‘cover lie’ the one that’ll hold up, and she’s eager.

Ellanza’s looking scared. “They test you! That’s how this works. They take your family, and then they tell you what to do, and if you don’t do it… They test you. Humphry never saw his wife again. He thought he was safe, he thought… But he wasn’t. It was a test.”

“Who tests you?” Ziva asks, gently.

“The Bathenadas. They have Claire! I got a call two days ago.”
“And Claire is…” Ziva leads.

“My wife! They have Claire!” Ellanza is extremely agitated now, face starting to flush.

Ziva doesn’t look behind her, but she’s sure that Seth is on it.

“So, start from the beginning, tell us what happened so we can find her,” Ziva’s voice is gentle.

“There’s no time for this. The beginning is two days ago, and it’ll take too long to explain. They have Claire! You need to get talking to the Peruvians! Someone’s got to go get her.” His eyes are tearing up, he’s looking truly distraught.

Jarvis isn’t impressed. “Cut the shit. If they ‘have Claire,’ she’s dead. You’re five hours behind schedule on delivering the cash, your ‘guards’ haven’t checked in, the boat you were loading the money onto had a less than fifty mile range, so whoever was supposed to get that money has let his higher ups know you didn’t do what you were supposed to do. If Claire is someone you actually care about, right now you better be hoping that you’re ‘they’ve got Claire’ is a cover story, because if they actually have Claire, the game’s over. So, start from the beginning,” Jarvis says, cold and sure.

Ellanza’s sobbing, and Ziva’s actually getting a bit worried that Jarvis may be taking his bad cop routine a bit too far.

“Clayt…”

“We’ve seen this before, Ziva. These assholes claim they’re acting under duress. So, we ignore what’s in front of us, go off on the wild goose chase looking for the poor lost wife or child, finally find them, half the time they’re dead, and the other half the asshole stashes them away to provide himself with a shield.” Jarvis nudges Ellanza, “So, either she’s already dead, in which case moving faster doesn’t matter, or you hid her away yourself, in which case it really doesn’t matter. So, start at the beginning. How did the Bathenadas make contact?”

Ellanza’s glaring at Jarvis through his tears, and if eyes could kill, Jarvis would be turning slowly on a spit over a low fire, cooking alive. Both Ziva and Clayt see it, Ellanza is mad, but part of that mad is that Jarvis just nailed exactly what happened to Claire.

“Clayt!” Ziva stands up, grabs Clayt by the arm, and jerks him out of the room. Once out she says, “I assume I am going back there alone?”

Clayton smiles. “With tissues or a handkerchief I’d imagine.”

Ziva nods. “Let’s see what Seth has.”

They go back into observation, where Seth is on the phone and frantically going through his computers.

“Claire Syth married Ellanza in ’98. According to both people I talked to, they have a happy marriage. According to Embassy security, she ‘went to visit her mother’ five days ago. She did tell people before she was last seen that that was the plan. That’s not just how her husband explained her disappearance. Her mother has been dead since 2014. She used the Embassy’s private Jet to go to Miami, got off the jet, a limo was waiting for her on the tarmac, she and her security entered the limo, and haven’t been seen since. The jet returned exactly when and how it was supposed to. No missing persons reports have been made. Her security guy has called in and is telling his contacts that everything is fine.

“So, a planned exit,” Ziva says.
Seth nods. “Her phone records are quiet. I don’t know what she’s doing there, but it’s not involving the use of her home phone or cell. And she didn’t answer when I called.”

Jarvis nods at that. “Have someone check their family home, see if she’s actually there or not.”

“I’ve done background on her security. No good information, yet. James Pasder. Been with the Embassy since ’06. He’s got good but not amazing reviews. He’s also got a wife in Ohio and mistress in Montevideo, so he might be the kind of guy who’d be blackmail-able to look the other way, or he might not. Haven’t found anything on his financials. We’re looking.”

“Good,” Jarvis says. “Five to one, she’s at home, laying low.”

Ziva nods in agreement.

“You ever feel like you’re looking at something so complicated, that you’ll never, ever figure it all out?” Tony say to Leon as he sits on the corner of his desk.

Leon nods slowly. “All the damn time. You want to go first?”

“Sure.” Tony rests his fingers on his keyboard. “Diane’s accountant friend isn’t answering his phone. He left his office a bit before eight last night, and hasn’t gotten home, yet. I’ve got Agent McClellan hunting him down. Between updates on that, I’ve been getting into the history of the cartels in Colombia, Bolivia, and Peru.”

“Is that the complicated part?” Leon asks.

Tony nods. “Five main players out of Colombia, four out of Bolivia, and one out of Peru.”

“The Peruvian one is the Bathenadas, right?”

“Yeah.” Tony sighs. “That’s the simple one. They got into the drug trade almost accidentally. Peru’s between Bolivia and Colombia, so, for a while, they provided security for shipments moving across the country. Then they decided that they could make a hell of a lot more money by taking those shipments and selling them themselves. Then they decided that stealing drug shipments was expensive and got a lot of people killed, so they stopped that, and began growing their own.”

“And the complicated part…”

“Colombia and Bolivia. Factions, more factions, side factions, families rising and falling. Things got really frisky in the early 2000’s when everything in Afghanistan and Pakistan heated up, messing with the heroin trade, add in local politics stirring things up with a side of the CIA and DEA poking their heads in to prop up different factions at different times, and you’ve got a HUGE mess. Things were fairly quiet for most of the last eighteen months, but have been heating up in the last six weeks.”

“I’ve got something on the present day of the cartels of Colombia and Bolivia.”

Tony nods, “Sure, give me present day.”

Vance checks his phone again. “As of two minutes ago, full-on drug war’s broken out in Bolivia and Colombia. Any way you can move drugs around, planes, boats, trains, trucks are on fire. Fields are burning, too. We’re looking at concentrated, coordinated attacks, and from the intel that’s getting to me, everyone is getting hit.”

Tony nods. “Okay, so they’ve gone to war. That’s a massive supply disruption. The Bathenadas are in place to swoop in and take up the slack…”

Leon nods along with that. “Money’s moving around, too. The DEA says that the accounts we’re seeing moving aren’t the only ones. Drug money and suspected drug money is flying around the world, fast right now.”

“So, we’re…” Tony leads. This is well outside of their jurisdiction.

Leon nods. “Sitting on the sidelines as South America burns.”

“Are we going to be able to hold onto Ellanza?” Tony asks.

“Probably, but only because everyone else in the drug world is busy putting out fires somewhere else, and they know we won’t lose him,” Leon replies. “Sooner or later they’ll want to grill him, but probably not until they’ve got everything calmed back down.”

“And if we can connect him to the attack on Diane and Draga…” Tony says.

“Then we, or Ms. Borin, will be able to keep hold of him. Attempted murder still trumps drug smuggling. Do we have anything to link him to that attack?”

“Besides timing and our intense disbelief in coincidences?” Tony shakes his head. “Ziva and Jarvis have him, they’ll get it out.”

Ziva does head back into interrogation, this time by herself, with a box of tissues, and another bottle of water.

“I am sorry for my partner. He can be very rough,” she says, handing over the tissues.

Ellanza wipes his eyes. “Is he right?”

“If the Bathenadas are who you claim they are, then yes, he is. As soon as they knew that money was out of their hands, Claire would have been killed.”

Ellanza whimpers.

“I am so sorry.” She gently strokes the back of his hand. “Please, help us make the case against them. Tell me what happened.”

“But…” He’s looking up at her, tears in his eyes. “You’ve got to at least look, right? You’ve got to go find her! She might… I mean… This is a waste of time! You need to find her.”

Ziva catches it. She’s not even sure what it is, but it’s there. He’s stalling them.

She pats the back of his hand and nods. “Okay. I’ll talk to my boss, see if we can get another team on this, looking for your wife. You said we needed to talk to Peru?”
“That’s where they’re based.”

“And you know she’s in Peru?”

“The call said as soon as she got the money, they’d drop her off at the Lima Embassy.”

“All right. You stay calm. I’ll see what I can do, and then we’ll talk.” And once again, Ziva gets up and leaves Mr. Ellanza alone in interrogation.

Tony’s at his desk, talking with Vance, when she and Jarvis walk over to them. “He’s stalling. There’s something he’s waiting for,” she says.

“What sort of something?” Vance asks.

Ziva shakes her head.

Tony thinks about it for a moment, and then his eyes go wide. “No. They wouldn’t try that, not here…” He knows it happens. It happened once when he was in Philly and once again in Baltimore, but… you’d have to be insane to try it in a Federal building, let alone one where no one’s on the take. Though… given what just happened with Kevin, no one being on the take might be an optimistic assessment of the situation.

“Tony?”

“When I worked Vice… It happened a few times, and only with the really big players. Of course these guys are the really big players, or, at least they want to be…”

“DiNozzo…” Jarvis says.

“It was always plan B. You never know if Plan A’s going to go right, so Plan B. They’d keep trackers in the money or drugs or weapons or whatever it was. If a shipment didn’t go the way it was supposed to, they’d use the trackers, find them, and then grab whatever it was. Philly and Baltimore didn’t exactly have the kind of security we do, and there was usually a guy or two on the payroll anyway. So, occasionally things would go missing.”

“So, we need to be in evidence, right now?” Ziva says.

“We need to be in evidence, right now! And Vance, we need all hands on deck level security. He might be stalling because he’s expecting a rescue.”

And with that, they get moving.

Finally, Local LEOs. Finally, Abbi’s got flashing lights, and signs letting people know to go around. Finally, her crime scene isn’t in danger of some twit trying to drive through it.

“Well, this has certainly been an exciting night,” Sgt. Paul Lane of the Spotsylvania County PD says to her.
“Two accidents in one night a big deal for you guys?” That’s likely what she drives through going home from work.

“Two accidents like this is. First one was weird. Looks like the SUV swerved right into oncoming traffic. He hit the other driver head on.”

Abbi shakes her head at that. “Hence the ambulance?”

“Yeah.” Lane looks upset. “They don’t think the other driver’s going to make it. The SUV driver, apparently, swerves, crashes, gets out of his car. I don’t know how; the front of that SUV was totaled. But he texts 911, lets them know there’s been an accident, and then he runs off. That’s what took us so long to get to you. We spent two hours trying to find the driver before giving up until we’ve got daylight. He can’t have gone too far. He’s on foot, his phone is in the car, and… no blood, but there’s no way he’s not hurt. The windshield is crushed, something went into it, so he’s got to have a concussion or internal bleeding or something.”

“You run the plates yet?”

He nods. “Yeah. Delaware plates. Reported stolen a year ago. Got the phone in evidence, too. My tech’s looking into it, figuring out who it belongs to.”

Zelaz looks tired as he’s staring at six boxes filled with cash, one with gold bullion, and one small bag filled with gems. Three more sealed evidence bags, holding the personal possessions of the men they have in custody sit on top of the cash boxes.

“If we’re lucky,” he says after Tony explains what they’re looking for, “then it’s a continuous transmitter, and all I’ve got to do is sweep for bugs, and we’ll find it.” He sweeps, and nothing beeps. “Or it’s an intermittent transmitter, and we’ve just got to wait.” Zelaz flicks the switch at the top of his bug sweeper and sets it on top of the money.

“How many of those things do you have?” Tony asks Zelaz.

“Six.”

“RFID?” Tony asks Zelaz.

He nods. “If it sends messages, I can find it with this.”

Tony picks one of them up, thinking. “Just press the button and it lights up?”

“Yep.”

“Range?”

“About six feet.”

Tony looks at the bags of evidence. Ellanza is still in his street clothing. His ‘guards’ are in NCIS jumpsuits. He hands one of the bug sweepers to Ziva. “You keep talking to him, see if he’s got the tracker on him. We’ll keep watch on this and see if we’ve got to batten down the hatches.”

Seth runs up to them. “Mrs. Ellanza, she’s in Miami. She’s healing up from plastic surgery. She got “You going to do a cavity search while you’re at it?” Diane says to the guards outside of the NCIS south gate as they do an extremely thorough search of Eric’s car and everyone in it.

“There’s been a threat,” he says, patting Jethro down.

“Yeah, I know, Jarhead, we’re the ones who were threatened,” her voice is sharp, and she does not want this cretin’s hands on her daughter.

Draga shakes his head at her, and for once, she actually takes some heed. She sighs and says, “I’m sorry, long night.”

Gibbs nods at the guard as he’s wrapping up his pat down. “What’s up, Bryce?”

“Can’t say. But you are not the target. What’s going on with you?”

“Getting us in to debrief, and the car into evidence,” Draga replies. Then he looks at Emily. “She’s seventeen, was almost killed tonight, you gotta do this?”

Bryce nods. “Quick and gentle. Nothing personal to you, Miss.”

Emily nods back. “I can handle it.”

Diane glares. “Hands don’t linger.”

Bryce rolls his eyes and does a very professional job. Once he’s done, and they’ve all passed the check, he says, “Sorry, Eric, can’t let you do that. Nothing’s going into or out of evidence. You can park it in front of the lock-up.”

Gibbs and Eric nod, if security is this tight, something big happened, and they aren’t part of it.

Yet.

“Does this feel like every worst nightmare you ever had in high school algebra?” Jimmy asks.

Allan blinks slowly at Jimmy as they’re walking down the road, toward the stopped train. Bishop’s already talking to Abbi, because she didn’t have to grab anything from the van. But Jimmy and Allan have the gurney, body bags, and assorted instruments of dealing with dead people.

“You know, a train moving east at forty-five miles an hour, a car moving south at fifty miles an hour, where do they intersect…”

Allan thinks about it for a second. “Can’t solve the problem given that information.”

“Probably why I hated that class.”

Allan’s staring at the train, aware of the fact that Jimmy’s trying to make this a bit easier, trying to help him build the calluses he needs to be able to do this job, but all he can see are burn marks on the side of the train, and think about how it had to feel to go hurtling into it.

“We actually are going to have to do a version of that problem,” Jimmy says.

Allan looks away from the train toward Jimmy.

“Debris field. It’ll give us an idea of where, and how far down the road, we need to be looking. The tracks are rock and gravel, and without that, we’ll be picking up random bits of metal from passing trains and cars and everything else for weeks.”

Allan nods. Then he rubs his eyes. “Um… Let me get a pad of paper. I was good at physics in school.”

“Okay. I’ll see if I can find out what kind of car it was, how fast it was going, and how fast the train was going.”

Allan nods, and Jimmy continues toward Abbi, to grab information for him, while starting to get a sense of the scene.

“Abbi.”

“Jimmy.” They’re working, so they don’t give each other their usual greeting hug.

“So much for a romantic night out.”

She nods, and looks down at her pretty white dress. Her now ragged, ripped, and stained gray and singed dress. Clomping through flaming wreckage in a floor length dress is a bad plan, for the dress. “So much for my pretty white dress, too. You got a change for me?”

“Yeah. I stopped by your place and grabbed your go bag. Do we need to bag up the dress for evidence?”

“No.” She shakes her head. “Anything interesting is,” she points the train, where Bishop is photographing, as Omagi tags bits of the car, and the local LEOs tape the whole area off.

Jimmy glances at the train. “We’re going to need the make, model, and how fast it was going to get a good idea of where all the pieces will be.”

Abbi thinks. “Ummm… We kept pace for a few seconds at close to 85 miles an hour. It was… a Taurus or something like that.”
“Mid-sized sedan?”

“Yeah.”

“Train speed?”

“The engineer won’t say. I’d estimate 45 or 50.”

“Won’t say?”

“Won’t talk without his Union Rep, who is apparently walking down from Philadelphia or something, because he’s not here yet.”

“Okay. That’s a start.” He hands her the bag, and the keys to the van. “You can change in there.”

“Thanks.”

Tim’s pulling up to the south entrance to the Navy Yard. The one he uses, on average, 500 times a year. The last time he saw them being this attentive to security, he was coming in the morning after Deering blew the place up.

It’s five in the morning, and he’s behind at least six cars and a DEA van. Six cars and a van that aren’t moving.

He shakes his head. Abby’s napping next to him, so he pulls back before he gets boxed in, turns the car, and heads to the main entrance. He’s going to drop her off.

He gives her a gentle poke. “Hey, time to start waking up.”

Abby blinks a few times, not looking happy about that. “Rhgm.”

“Yeah. I know. There’ll be food and a case in there, all things you like.”

She nods, looking more alert. A good case is a thing of joy. She rubs her eyes and stretches a bit.

“Why are we over here?”

“Long line. Security’s on high.”

“Someone takes a swat at one of us; that tends to happen.”

Tim nods at that. “Give me a call when you get in.” He stops the car a good hundred feet from the front gate.

She kisses him, and he wraps his arm around her, kissing back. “You going to Breena’s?” she asks.

“Yeah. That’s the plan. If I’m lucky, I’ll grab an hour’s nap before the girls are up.”

“Good luck.” Abby opens the door and heads off.
To play stupid, or not to play stupid. That’s what Ziva’s debating as the heads back to Ellanza.

If she tells Ellanza what she knows, he’ll either clam up or start telling her what’s really going on. With the Bathenadas, at least. He probably won’t let on that he’s expecting something. If she doesn’t tell, if she plays along with the idea of hunting for Claire, he’ll probably tell her a pretty close to but not exactly true version of how he ended up with the Bathenadas trying to get him moving money around.

There’s a reason they picked him. And not just because he’s got diplomatic clearance. They’d use their own diplomats (who according to Leon still aren’t returning calls) who they’ve got better, closer, more personal leverage against if it was about diplomatic clearance.

She’s feeling like understanding why Ellanza was chosen will break the rest of this open.

Then another thought hits Ziva… Play stupid, act like she believes what he’s telling her, but hit him with something he doesn’t expect. She smiles gently to herself, touching her belly. It occurs to her that this is probably one of the last times she’ll interrogate someone face to face (most of what she’s doing at CGIS is with a computer), and she’s intending to enjoy it.

She steps into interrogation. “Mr. Ellanza.”

“Agent DiNozzo! My wife?” He’s so tense, on edge, looking worried. It’s acting. Good acting, but still, acting. Fear, nerves, tension, sadness, they all have, for want of a better word, a smell, and he may look scared and nervous, but he doesn’t smell of it.

Ziva nods, looking distraught. She sits next to Ellanza, patting his hand gently, and quietly says, “We were able to track her down.” She sees the flicker of doubt in his eyes. This is too fast, and that’s not the answer he expects. “I’m so sorry. Both her and her guard were found in your Miami home. The Miami PD thinks the time of death was about six hours ago.” His eyes go very wide at that, and he’s shaking his head, this time the distress is genuine. Now the scent of fear is pouring off of him.

“No! That wasn’t supposed to happen!”

“Tell me what was supposed to happen, Mr. Ellanza.”

“There’s a code. They don’t…” He’s stunned, wheels in his head spinning. “They… not the women or children.”

“Honor among thieves?”

She sees Ellanza’s face go hard, and suddenly she knows she’s got a very willing conversationalist on her hands. He swallows hard, takes a deep drink of his bottle of water, and then says, “In the next ten minutes, someone is going to take the money out of your evidence lock up. They’re going to request custody of me and my men. You’d best not let them have me.”

Ziva nods. “I can arrange that. Then we’ll talk?”

“Then we’ll talk.”

Ziva springs up and runs to MTAC. “Tony!” Tony’s with Vance, and right now, they’re watching the security feeds around the Navy Yard.

Tony turns to her. “You have details?”
“Yes. He’s expecting a rescue.”

Leon nods, and Jarvis does, too, pointing to the south gate. “And I know who’s going to do it. You haven’t gotten a call from the DEA, have you?” Leon asks dryly.

Tony and Jarvis shake their heads. “No one’s requested a prisoner or evidence transfer from me,” Tony says.

Vance nods. He’s got his phone and is calling down to the south gate. “Where are you parked?” he asks the three of them.

“South lot,” Tony says. He can see his car in the feed right now.

“East,” Jarvis replies.

Tony knows what Vance is thinking. “Mr. Secretary, I’m going to need your keys.”

Tony’s heading to his desk, wishing he had a few more hands around. And, because apparently today wishes are horses, the elevator bings, and in walks Draga, Gibbs, Emily and Diane.

Tony smiles. “Gibbs, Draga, with me.”

“What? Just like that?” Diane says.

“Been a big night, Peaches, we’ll get to you in a bit.” Tony digs through his desk, finds his backup gun, and hands it to Gibbs. He kisses Emily’s cheek. “Looking lovely, Ms. Fornell. Ziva, you got them?”

Ziva nods. She’d rather get the DEA van that likely isn’t legitimate, but that’s just asking for an argument.

Gibbs grins as he takes the gun. Eric’s looking pretty happy at the chance to blow off some of his own nervous tension by shooting at things, too.

Gibbs falls into step next to Draga, as Tony rapidly fills them in on the plan. “We’re grabbing Jarvis’ car, and making sure that van can’t just reverse out of there. Vance is getting other teams into place. When they roll up to security, if they don’t quietly file on out, we’re going to light them up.”

Out here, on the road, it’s almost dawn. The far eastern horizon is almost starting to pink up. Not that anyone here at the crime scene is admiring the dawn.

Or for that matter, looking at anything other than the ground or the train.

Allan and Palmer have been at this for ten solid minutes now, and… Even to Allan, who’s never done this before, this doesn’t seem right. “Dr. Palmer, are you noticing something?”
Jimmy nods. He’s sitting in a wreckage field of what is likely millions of pieces of debris. In fact, though he doesn’t know this for sure, but he’s betting there was a small bomb or something inside the car, because there should be larger pieces around, but so far, the biggest thing he’s seen are the tires. Even the engine, which is designed not to shatter when it’s rammed at high speed into something, is in chunks.

What he and Dr. Allan are not seeing is body parts.

None of them. No bone, no blood, no skin, nothing.

And while it’s true that everyone in Jimmy’s line of work has heard of situations where bodies are “blown to bits,” it’s also true that when that happens there are still bits. Yes, this is gross, but, even Cole, who was kneeling right over a bomb when it went off, left some remains. (Jimmy found six toes, charred bones, and blood ash, from where his blood burned against the metal of the car he was in.)

Sure, whatever it was likely wouldn’t be identifiable, not easily, but something around them should be wet, something should squish. Bodies, even bodies in explosions, just don’t vanish.

They’re both standing next to the train, where the car crashed into it, staring at dented metal covered in scorch marks. There’s a quarter mile long trail of glass and metal, and from what they’ve been seeing, not a single drop of blood.

“Dr. Palmer, I don’t think the car’s driver was in the car.”

Jimmy’s nodding. “Go look at the road.”

“What am I looking for?”

“Skid marks.” Jimmy walks with him, and after a few minutes they’re back to the road. Jimmy’s not a crime scene tech, nor is he a car guy, but because he’s the ME, and because he handles all deaths investigated by NCIS, he’s seen a lot of car accidents.

There’s one path of heavy rubber on the road, short but intense. The kind of mark a car makes when it goes from zero to fast in not nearly enough time. “Draga’s car.” Jimmy points out. There are no other paths. “The ramming car didn’t try to stop. If a person had been in it, they’d have tried to ram the first car into the train, and use their brakes and the force of hitting a stopped car to stop themselves.”

Allan’s nodding. “You’d have your foot already on the brake, ready to hit it the second you made impact. At least, if you were a person, that’s what you’d do. If you were a… remote control?” he doesn’t sound sure about that, but it fits what they’re seeing, “you’d run right through, because that would help to destroy the evidence of what you did, and make sure everyone in the car you rammed died.”

“I think you’re right, Dr. Allan.”

“What is going on here!” Diane demands of Ziva. “Someone tries to kill us, tries to ram us into a train, and you’re all off playing—“ “Diane,” Ziva has an arm around Diane, and one around Emily, and is shuffling them toward the conference room. “The accounts you were watching… They’re the opening salvo in a full-on drug war. Colombia and Boliva are on fire right now. Right now, we have the man who picked up the cash in custody, and we believe someone is about to come and try and rescue him and the money.” Ziva flicks on ZNN, and there is coverage of buildings that are literally burning in Bolivia.

“Holy mother of God,” Diane whispers.

Ziva nods at her. “Stay here. I’m going to grab you a computer. If you want to keep looking at those accounts, figure out what’s happening, that would be good. If you and Emily just want to crash, that’s okay, too. But right now, everyone who can shoot is making sure that money and the suspect don’t leave this building.”

Emily looks up, eyes alight. “I can shoot.”

Ziva smiles gently at her. “Get a badge to go with that, and you can join in. Say, in six years?”

Tony’s feeling electric as he’s grabbing Jarvis’ car. Doing stuff like this on no sleep is a bad plan, but for some reason the guys in that DEA van didn’t call ahead and offer to let them all get naps.

Gibbs is strapping on his vest, and checking Tony’s gun. It’s not one he’s used before, but it’s the same make and model as his usual piece.

Draga’s also strapping in. He’s got his own holster and own gun that he’s getting set with. “So, what’s the plan?”

“Out of view, Vance is making sure we’ve got the road blocked off. We’re going to drive out of the east lot, go around the Navy Yard, and we’re the only ones who’ll be let back in through the south. Then we pull up behind the van, make sure it can’t back out, and make sure if anyone tries to jump out of the back, they’ll get a surprise. Jackets on over the vests.”

“Easy enough plan,” Gibbs says, pulling his tux jacket back on.

“And if they try to run?” Draga says.

“You make sure they don’t.” He tosses Jethro the keys. “If more than two of them try to run, Palmer ‘em.”

Gibbs doesn’t look happy at that, but he’s in no condition to run down a suspect on foot. He slips into the front seat, and adjusts it into place. He puts his gun on his lap, holding it. No, he’s normally not in favor of driving with a loaded gun in his lap, but he may want to shoot it fast, and he’s not going more than two miles. (Especially with his right arm in sub-prime condition, he doesn’t want to be wrestling with pulling a gun out of a shoulder holster, sitting down, buckled in.)

Tony’s in the front seat next to him. Draga’s in the back. They pull out, and Jethro circles them around the Navy Yard, and then through the barricade. Right now, they’re idling behind the “DEA” van. One car in front of it, and them behind.

“Think it’s bulletproof?” Tony asks, looking at the van.
“If it’s real, it is. Is it real?”

Tony shrugs. “Ellanza, the guy we grabbed with the money, made one call. Cell phone number. Burner phone. No owner of record, but it’s a Kansas number.”

“How long ago?” Gibbs asks.

“Less than an hour.” Tony replies. “It’s probably real. Easier to have a crooked DEA agent or two on staff than it is make something like this up in an hour.”

That makes a distressing amount of sense to Tony. These guys might actually be legit DEA agents, acting on what they assume are legitimate orders. Or they may be cartel guys in a DEA van. Or some combination thereof. He sighs.

They see the car in front of the DEA van get waved in. Tony notices a few people going to their cars in a casual sort of way. He recognizes most of them. Pretty much every other agent or security guy who was in the building and wearing non-uniform clothing. He knows they’re going to wait for that car to get well away from the crosshairs before moving on the van.

It’s rolling along slowly, looking for a parking space. Up ahead… Up ahead he can’t see anything. The back of the van is in front of him. Gibbs can see Bryce talking to whoever’s in that van right now. He casually rolls his window down, so they can listen.

“I’m going to need you to step out of the van, sir.”

“Why?”

Bryce snorts. “Come on, you’ve been in this line long enough to see. Everyone’s getting searched. Some asshole tried to kill two agents. Out you get.”

“I’m here for a prisoner transfer.” The voice out of the van sounds annoyed.

“Great. Get out, let me search your van, and then you can take your paperwork in and get your prisoner.”

Tony sees the car finally park, and he notices that more of those “people” just wandering around the lot are moving closer. One of them is right next to the parked car, and from the looks of it, probably telling the people inside to get down and stay that way.

Bryce looks like he’s doing a good job of being a bored agent. The driver, and the man with him, step out, allowing him to frisk them.

“We good?” One of them, probably the driver, says.

“Gotta check the van.”

“Oh, come on! That’ll take forever.”

“You think I don’t know. I’m supposed to be going home now, not looking through your stuff. Come ‘round back, let’s see what’s in there.”

“Fine.” The first man leads Bryce to the back. Tony’s watching carefully, but trying to appear like he’s not. Just another bored guy in line.

Gibbs shifts his gun so it’s not visible from the outside of the car. Eric scoots over a bit, hand on the door handle, ready to leap if need be.
Tony tenses as he sees Mr. DEA gesture to the door, indicating Bryce should open it. “Open it up.”

He knows it’s going to happen a half-heartbeat before it does, just long enough to start wincing, and moving. The door flings open, catching Bryce in the forehead, and he staggers back. Gibbs and Tony already have guns drawn and pointed at the three guys in the back. That’s enough to stop two of them, but number three goes running.

Draga’s on him, tearing after him, gun… forgotten from the looks of it. It’s not drawn.

The guy from the van is fast. Eric, who’s had a hell of a night of way too much adrenaline is faster. DEA man doesn’t manage to get more than a hundred feet before Eric tackles him to the ground, then leaps up, foot in the small of the man’s back, gun pointed at his head.

Once the guys in the van are dealt with, (all of whom are protesting that they’re DEA agents, on a prison transfer, goddamit, what the hell is wrong with these NCIS assholes trying to grab them) Tony heads over to Draga.

“Very James Bond, Mr. Draga,” Tony says with bad Scottish accent.

Draga nods. He supposes there is something very James Bond about standing over a guy with your foot in the small of his back, holding a gun on him, while wearing a tux.

When Ziva gets the word that they’ve got the “DEA Agents,” (Half of them have checked out as actually working for the DEA, the other half haven’t.) she gets ready to visit with Ellanza again.

This time she brings a drink for her, too. She’s tired. She woke up tired, and, checking her watch, twenty straight hours on, with no caffeine, while pregnant, is killing her. As soon as she’s done, she’s curling up in a ball behind her desk and sleeping for at least ten hours.

She rubs her eyes, takes a quick gulp of her double chocolate smoothie (if she can’t have sleep, or caffeine, she’ll make up her energy deficit with sugar and fat) and heads into interrogation.

This time, Ellanza is genuinely upset. His eyes are red, his shoulders slumped, and waves of weary resignation are pouring off of him.

He looks, listlessly, at her as she comes in and sits across from him.

“I take it I’m staying here for a while?”

She nods. “Who did you call?”

“No idea. It’s my get out of jail free card. Dial the number, hang up, within two hours, you’re free. I’ve never had to use it before.”

“And the story about your wife?”

“Like your partner said. BS designed to keep you busy.” His eyes tear up. “At least, it was supposed to be. They’re businessmen. They’re supposed to be businessmen. They don’t… That’s why we picked them.”
“Who is we, Mr. Ellanza?”

Ellanza shakes his head, annoyed. “Pick a drug company, any drug company. That’s we.”

“You are working for… Pfizer?”

“Among others.”

Ziva wasn’t expecting that. She was expecting, given where the money was going, and what Tony and Vance and Jarvis were saying, him to be working against the drug companies. He sees her confusion.

“Marijuana will be completely legal in the US in probably five years. As soon as the states see how lucrative it is, decriminalization is going to follow hard on its heels for the rest of the drugs. Everyone wants every penny they can get.”

Ziva nods; she understands that.

“The people I work for want to get in on that. Pot is easy. High school dropouts can grow pot. The tobacco companies are already getting ready to move in that direction. They’ve got the land, the processing equipment, the distribution networks, the only reason they aren’t moving in on it yet is the fear the Feds will knock on their door and confiscate their entire companies. Once it’s completely legal, they’ll roll, and you’ll have pot cigarettes right next to the tobacco ones, and every flavor of pot vape you can think of, just waiting for buyers.

“We want to get into something like that, too.”

“But with harder drugs?” Ziva supplies.

“No such thing as ‘hard drugs’ not for us. We can set the dosage so that any given product can produce anything from a nice glow to inducing a coma. We’ve already got some feelers in the heroin trade. Have to to make opiates. We wanted to get in with the cocaine market, too. Margins are small enough right now, so we want something that takes no research, takes minimal production efforts, and we can roll out over-the-counter as a party drug.”

“But you need raw materials for that.”

He nods.

“So, you and the Bathenadas…”

“Form a partnership. For ten years, we work as hard as we can to keep drugs illegal, and use our influence to keep the US and its neighbors actively suppressing the drug trade in Bolivia, Colombia, Afghanistan, and Pakistan.”

“But not Peru?”

He nods.

“You use the power of the government to suppress the Bathenadas competition?”

“Yes. As those years go by, the cartels in other countries will decide it’s too expensive to keep supplying drugs, they’ll sell out. The Bathenadas, they’ll buy up fields, recruit talent, and get ready for a production boom. Buy low, sell high, right? They’ve got their own labs and greenhouses working on new strains of coca and poppy plants. They’re coming up with new concoctions, looking for higher highs without the lows, minimizing side effects. When it’s time to move, they’ll be sitting on millions of hectares of land in the exact right climate for production, with new seeds and plants ready to go.”

“Business will boom.”

“Exactly. And in ten years or so, when the US does decriminalize, we’ll buy them out for a king’s ransom, and then use our distribution network to get ready-to-go products to the market. Everyone, except Claire,” his voice catches, “wins.”

“And the money you were moving?”

“Eddie, one of my guards, told me that we needed to take a trip soon. I got the location in an email, and off we went. We do little jobs like that all the time.”

“Five hundred million dollars is a ‘little job?’” Ziva doesn’t believe that.

“That’s what it was?”

She does, however, believe that Ellanza doesn’t know what he was moving. She gets the sense that when they say move something, his only response is where. “Yes.”

He nods. “Big job, then. But not the biggest I’ve run. Federal elections are multi-billion dollar affairs. Fundraising at the level I did it… Usually a fifty-million dollar buy in.”

“There are laws against that.”

Ellanza smiles, but it’s a grim smile. “There are laws against a lot of things. Money buys power, and there’s no way that people who want power are going to agree not to use their money to get it. People who have power want money, it’s a perfect circle of mutual support.” He smiles again, bitter. “How do you think I got to become an Ambassador? Once you get to the top levels, everyone knows what’s going on, and they’re all fine with it.”

“Uh huh…” Ziva watches Ellanza staring at the wall behind her. “Where was the money supposed to go?”

He shakes his head. “No idea. I grab whatever it is, stick diplomatic tags on it, put it on a boat or a plane or whatever and off it goes. I don’t know what I move. I don’t know where it goes. I don’t know that I’m moving it more than a day or two in advance. Most of what I do is people. I make sure the right people meet at the right times to discuss the right things. And once those meetings take place, I help them make sure whatever they discussed gets taken care of.”

“You are a facilitator.”

He nods. “I don’t want or need the details.”

“What did you get out of it?”

“Tell me about your other jobs… Whens and where and what you think you were moving.”

And for the next hour Ellanza does. By the time he’s wrapping up, he and Ziva are exhausted. He’s emotionally broken, and she’s just to-the-bone tired.
She stands up. “All of this has been recorded. One of the other Agents will take you back to holding. I suggest, when you get to your cell, you ask for a phone and call your wife.”

Ellanza’s eyes go wide. “That’s a horrible joke.”

“She is at home, healing up from her eye job, and fine, Mr. Ellanza.”

“You lied!” He lunges at her. Fortunately, even tired, Ziva’s got moves, she twists a bit, keeping the table between them, and shoves it back, hard, catching him in the stomach with it. That knocks the wind out of him, and he falls back to the floor, gasping, trying to catch his breath.

“Yes. I did.” She stands up, heads out of observation, and finds Tony waiting for her, with another smoothie, and a warm kiss to the forehead.

Tony’s tired. Ziva’s on her side, curled into a little ball behind her desk, grabbing a snooze. Draga looks ready to crash as he’s gulping down his Red Bull-protein smoothie combo. Gibbs is leaning, heavily, against what used to be his desk.

Tony makes the executive decision. Nothing else is happening today.

“Quitting time. Jethro, we’ll give you a ride home. Draga, grab Diane and take her home. Tomorrow’s soon enough to deal with the rest of it.”

Draga pulls himself up, rubs his eyes, and nods.

When he walks into the conference room, he finds Emily, like Ziva, curled into a little ball, asleep on the floor. Diane is not sleepy, nor does she look calm or quiet. She’s got a pot of coffee next to her, a lap top open, and she’s working.

“Come on, let’s go home. Get some rest, get on it fresh tomorrow.”

She looks up from her computer and shakes her head. “Get DiNozzo in here.”

“Look, I don’t care what fire you’ve found that needs to be put out right now, we can’t do it. We’re all fried. You are, too. Rest, we need rest.”

She glares at him.

“Fine,” he snaps out and goes to get Tony. “She won’t leave without talking to you.”

Tony shakes his head. He’s done. He’s going home, burrowing under the covers with his wife, and not moving until Monday morning. Fussing with Diane is the last thing he wants to do. “Why?”

“I didn’t ask. I don’t want to know. Just, deal with it so I can get us out of here.”

Tony nods. He and Draga head into the conference room. “We’ve got it, Diane. Followed the money trail, figured it out, all the rest of it. We can go home and crash.”

Diane shakes her head. “No, you don’t. And you don’t have it figured out because I don’t have it “figured out.”

“Come on. No such thing as a coincidence. We’ve got the guys in holding. Go home, rest, we’ll go over it with fresh eyes and find the connections.”

“It’s not a coincidence, Skippy. I’m the connection. I’ve got four accounts, and I’m moving on them all at the same time. Just because two them started acting up doesn’t mean no one noticed eyes on the other two.”

“So, you’re making this happen?” Tony rubs his eyes. He’s so tired.

“It’s them making sure I don’t find whatever it is. I know you’ve got safe houses. I know you offer protective custody. I want it, for me and Emily, until I find what’s going on.”

Tony nods. He’s tired. “Fine. We can do that. Just like you, none of us have slept all night. Let’s get you and Emily tucked somewhere safe. We’ll all get some rest, and then come at tomorrow morning.”

“Fine. I’m going to need a great computer.”

Tony flashes her a quick smile. “I know someone with a great computer, and a gun, and he got at least some sleep last night.”

Diane’s eyes go wide. “Chucky?”

“Not like you haven’t slept at his place before.”

She narrows his eyes. “They tried to kill me. They arranged for my car to be driven into a train. You don’t just pull that off on the fly. I haven’t found what they’re trying to protect, not yet. So, this isn’t going to be the last shot at me. I want somewhere safe, somewhere I haven’t been before, somewhere they can’t track just by looking at my associates, I want it for me, Emily, and Eric, with real, awake, armed guards. Not some half-exhausted tech guy with a gun, and certainly not one with a baby in his house. They had no problem with the idea of taking out Eric and Emily to get to me, they’ll have no problem with going after McGee’s family, too. Now, get me the protection I need!”

“Diane…” He’s sure she’s overreacting.

“Has Leroy told you he’s feeling calm? How about Abbi, is she here telling you she’s solved the case? Better yet, you want me to drag his ass in here and tell him you’re stonewalling me on protection? You want him volunteering to sleep on my doorstep?”

“No.” And Diane does have a point on that. She says she’s not feeling secure, and Jethro will sleep on her damn doorstep, and likely call Fornell, as well.

“Jared?”

Shit. He’s so tired he’s forgetting leads. He checks his phone and sees he’s missed two texts from McClellan. He reads the one that says Jared was found, dead, run off the side of the road by another car. “Still looking for him.” Tony lies. “Okay, I get it. Protective custody, real protective custody, full-on safe house with guards, for you and Emily and Eric.”

“Thank you.”
While Tony’s on hold, getting it set up, he asks Gibbs, “Anyone tell Fornell what happened?”

Gibbs shakes his head. “Not yet.”

“Keep it that way. Jared, her accountant friend, got run off the road last night. He’s dead. I haven’t told her that, yet. That'll wait for Monday. I’m getting her and Emily moved into protective custody. If anyone’s watching her that closely, they’re watching Fornell, too.”

Gibbs nods. If Tobias does what he’s supposed to be doing, going on his honeymoon, enjoying his new wife, they’ll just keep watching, seeing if he gets spooked. If he starts doing something unusual, like not going on his honeymoon, they’ll follow, and go right to Diane.

“What do you need me to do?”

“Right now. Same thing I need me to do, and Ziva to do, and all the rest of us. Sleep. Monday morning, you’re going after Ellanza’s statement with a fine tooth comb, as well as everything else we’ve got. We got those four accounts for a reason. We’re going to find it.”
Day of "Rest"

Jimmy and Allan spend another hour on the scene, checking, double checking, looking all around, but... They aren’t seeing anything that looks even remotely like a body/parts of a body.

Jimmy nods to Allan, who starts to pack their stuff up, and then he heads over to Abbi. “No body.”

She’s looking concerned at that. “I watched the crash. There’s no chance at all the driver got out.”

Jimmy nods. “We’re not thinking he did. Dr. Allan suggested that this is a driverless car.”

Abbi rubs her eyes and checks her watch. She’s been up for twenty-six straight hours now and this twist means this isn’t going to be any sort of open and shut case. Jimmy sees her do it. He nods to her team. “Omagi’s got the scene. I’m taking you and Bishop back to NCIS and from there, home. Something’s really wrong about this case, and we’re not going to find it, exhausted.”

Abbi nods at that, unhappy that he’s right, but he is right. Then she remembers something. “One minute.” She grabs her phone and gets Sergeant Lane. “You said you couldn’t find the driver of the car that crashed?”

“Yes. No trace of him. Not a drop of blood or anything.”

“How about extra electronics that look out of place?”

“I’ll ask my tech guy.” She waits for several minutes, watching Omagi handle the scene, collecting evidence, bagging it all up. Saunder (Omagi’s number two) is interrogating the train’s Engineer (with his Union Rep). Everything’s in hand. Finally, Lane’s back. “Yeah. My techs are telling me that there’s a bunch of stuff that doesn’t look like it belongs in a car.”

Abbi’s holding the phone and nodding. “I know this is your case, but I think that accident was a decoy, designed to make sure that my accident happened. Would you be willing to box everything up and ship it to NCIS care of Abby McGee?”

“Just hand the case over to you?” He doesn’t sound pleased by that.

“Yes, please.”

“I’ve got a grieving family that I’ve promised answers to.”

“Driver didn’t make it?”

“No. He didn’t.” Lane’s angry. Abbi doesn’t blame him.

“Damn it! Look, we’ve got amazing people, a beyond state of the art lab, and we’re sitting on why this happened. That accident in part of a much bigger case. I’ll share the case if you want, but it’d go faster and easier if we just take it.”

Lane doesn’t say anything, and Abbi’s got the sense he’s listening to someone.

“Tech guy says I should pass it on. Say’s McGee’s amazing, has some really impressive publications to her name.”

“She does.”
“Okay. I want updates as soon as you’ve got them. You can’t just start up on this and sweep it under the rug.”

“Two of the three people they tried to kill in my crash are Federal Agents. One of them is my agent. The third is a kid. Trust me, if there’s anything that doesn’t get swept under the rug, it’s the attempted murder of one of my people. Everything I get’ll have you CCed on it.”

“Thanks.”

When she’s done with the details, she nods to Jimmy. “Okay. Now I can go home.”

“Got some DNA for me?” Abby asks when she answers Jimmy’s call.

“Sorry Abby, no DNA for you. No body for me. We’re thinking remote control car. And given how it blew up, maybe some sort of explosive.”

Jimmy can feel Abby nodding, smiling. “That'll be fun. I’ve been playing with Eric’s car, not too much on this, but what I’ve got is interesting.”

“Good interesting?”

“I think so. You give Tony a call?”

“Already did. He’s cutting out to get some rest. I’m saving him a few minutes by giving you the heads up. Today, you’re reporting to Abbi’s Team Leader, Omagi. He’s got this part of it.”

“Good to know. You coming back here?”

“Only to drop off Bishop and make sure you’ve got all the cherry smoothie you can drink. Then home and babies until tomorrow.”

“All right. See you in a bit?”

“More like two hours.”

She makes a little kissing noise into the phone.

“Back at ya’,” he says, instead of returning the kiss. If Abby’s with Eric’s car, she’s likely on her own in the evidence lock up. He’s not. He’s in the van with Allan, Bishop, and Abbi, and all three of them know he’s not talking to Breena.

Tim gets back to Breena’s place just as the sun starts peeking over the tree line.

Probably an hour before the girls are up. He walks in, and briefly debates making some breakfast, so that it’s hot and ready for everyone as soon as they’re up, but grabbing an extra hour of sleep wins. He’s thinking he’s gotten maybe three hours.

Four’s better than three. And if he clocks some more sack time during morning nap, he’ll be just about at his normal sleep level by lunchtime.

That sounds like a good plan to him, so he quietly toes off his shoes while slipping out of his clothing, and snuggles up next to Breena. She doesn’t wake up, but she does cuddle in closer to him. He wonders, for a few seconds, if she’s going to be surprised when she wakes up with him and not Jimmy, but only for a few seconds, and then he’s asleep.

“This is protective custody?” Diane asks archly as they get out of one of the NCIS sedans in front of a dilapidated-looking row house, complete with graffiti, iron bars on the doors and windows, and the first floor windows are boarded up, in a neighborhood that would consider a five points on the Richter scale earthquake urban renewal.

Draga nods at her. “It’ll be nicer inside.”

“It better be.” She’s got her arm around Emily as she says that, walking swiftly behind Agent Conner, who’s in charge of her protection detail.

Inside is nicer, but that’s not exactly nice. It’s clean. Not the spotless, surgical quality clean she keeps her own home, but on par with a decent hotel. The furniture is IKEA’s greatest hits, probably bought en masse, and on sale.

She doesn’t like it, but for a few days, or, please God, no, weeks, it’ll do.

She doesn’t want to let Emily out of her sight, but she’s dead on her feet, and it’s time to sleep. So, the first bedroom they come to, she gives to Emily, who heads in, and even though she’s seventeen, even though she’s a senior in high school, Diane tucks her under the covers and kisses her forehead before she falls asleep.

The next bedroom isn’t much bigger, but it’s got a bed with clean sheets on it, and that’s all she really needs right now. “Why a row house?” she asks Eric as she strips out of her dress.

“We own the houses on the left and right, too. Makes sure that you can only get in and out from the front. Back door is sealed shut. Row house cuts line of sight. They can only watch you from the front and back.” He touches the window. (This room has an actual window.) “Bulletproof glass. No line of sight at all downstairs, but we can see out from up here. Lousy neighborhood is intentional. Anyone comes in the wrong sort of car, or happens to be the wrong race, and they’ll stick out. Can’t run the ‘drive on up in a utility van’ ruse here, because the utilities don’t come here. Just like we don’t blend here, the people likely to come for you won’t blend in, either.”

Diane nods. “Okay. Sleeping.” She rubs her eyes, she’s tired, very tired, but she doesn’t think she’ll sleep.

Eric takes her hand. “Come on.” He gently pulls her onto the bed. “Resting. They’ll all still be out there tomorrow.”

She nods, her head falling back on the pillow, and eventually sleep comes.
Abby’s double checking Draga’s car when Jimmy finds her. “I think you and Dr. Allan are on to something.”

He hands over an extra-large cherry smoothie, (her current, preferred, not Caf-Pow drink. The flavor is… similar, and it’s got things like calcium, protein, and vitamins, all of which are lacking from Caf-Pow) and she walks him to the rear of Eric’s car.

Jimmy follows, watching the evidence lock up. It’s barely 07:00 on a Sunday, so he thinks they’re the only two in there, but he’s not sure, and he wouldn’t put it past someone to come wandering in. Abby smiles at him while sipping the smoothie, then she slowly licks the straw and her lips and winks at him.

He smiles back. He’s tired, but not dead, so he appreciates the little show she just gave him.

“Behold,” with a gloved hand she gently strokes her fingers over Eric’s bumper, getting them focused on the case and not sex. It’s dented and busted, but not as bad as it should be. “This tells us several things, among them that if you ever want someone to drive a getaway car for you, you want Eric.”

Jimmy nods at that. He’s fairly sure that in the same situation, he would have hit the brakes and gotten splattered into the oncoming train.

Abby taps the dents. “Whatever hit Eric’s car, was a car.”

“Abbi thought it was a Taurus or something like that.”

“That works. Anything else, and his trunk would be damaged. Now, usually, if there’s a person driving the vehicle that’s going to do something like this, they drive something as close to the size of a tank as possible. A big rig, an RV, at the very least it’ll be a truck or SUV, and then, instead of ramming,” she puts the drink down and slams her fist into her palm, “they use the heavier weight of their car to push the second car into the way of the train.” Then she touches her palm with her fist, and pushes it forward. “That way, they don’t risk running into the train themselves.”

“So, what kind of person does this with a car?” Jimmy asks, knowing where she’s going.

“The kind of person who not only isn’t in the car, but doesn’t want what they were driving to be found in one piece. There’s evidence in that car, and it’s going to be good.” She smiles at him, and gulps the smoothie.

For Tony, Sunday is spent between half-remembered dreams, and deep black sleep. At one point he gets up to pee, drink, and crash back into his bed. He knows there was a time when he could do two or even three straight days on, and he supposes he could do it again, if he had to.

But right now, as he’s remembering that he forgot about Jared, he’s wondering how many of those two or three day on cases would have been solved just as fast, if not faster, if they had taken breaks and gotten sleep every night.

It’s occurring to him, that a big chunk of working straight through every case was because Gibbs couldn’t stop not because it was a somehow better way of solving cases.
Breena would have to admit to being somewhat startled when Molly crawls into bed, waking her up, and finding that the body behind her is Tim and not Jimmy.

Obviously, something happened last night. Something she slept through. But that’s standard for them. Jimmy doesn’t wake her up if he’s got to go in the middle of the night. He did, when they were first married, but after Molly was born, sleep became so precious that even five minutes lost to, “Gotta go,” were a problem.

Tim’s blinking his eyes, hair sticking up in thirty directions, looking like he wants nothing more than to just go back to sleep, but he sits up, slowly, and grabs Molly into a big hug as she’s crawling over Breena to get between them for cuddles.

“Where’s Daddy?” she asks him, snuggling into his arms.

“Good question,” Breena says.

And Tim begins to explain, giving her as much as of the story as he has as, between the two of them, they get little girls up and fed and ready for the day.

Daddy gets home a bit after the girls have finished breakfast and Tim and Breena have cleaned up the kitchen.

“Shouldn’t you be wrist deep in a dead body?” Tim asks him.

Jimmy nods, going to the fridge and grabbing himself three eggs, a few mushrooms, an onion, a bit of ham, and the cheddar cheese. (Apparently, he’s making himself an omelet.) “I should, but the dead body didn’t deign to show up.”

Tim blinks at that, looking curiously from him to Breena, as Breena says, “How did you get called in for a case if there was no body? Isn’t a body the way they know you need to be called in?”

“Abbi and Gibbs watched the car go crashing into the train. They expected there to be someone driving the car.”

“No one was driving the car?” Breena asks, sounding very doubtful.

Jimmy grabs the egg pan, and puts it on the stove, then starts chopping onion. “Obviously, someone was making it go, but no one was in the car. So, no body. We drove for five hours, spent two searching, and… nothing.” Jimmy’s sounding crabby at that.

Breena pets his back. “I think you need food and sleep.”

He nods, looking tired. “You two have the girls?”

“We’re good,” Tim says. “Planning on heading out to play in the grass some. Maybe get to the farmer’s market if we’re feeling energetic. You think we’re seeing Abby anytime soon?”

Jimmy laughs, hollowly. “She’s planning on taking that car apart to the molecular level to find out who built and drove it.”
Abby and Omagi haven’t met in person before, but they’ve both heard about the other.

So, Abby’s ready to report in as close to a no nonsense way as she can, and he’s got a large Caf-Pow in hand. (Which Abby takes one look at, pets a little, and sips some to be polite, her eyes closing in reverence as the flavor of artificial cherry and gallons of sugary caffeine explodes on her tongue.)

“God, I’ve missed that!”

Which is when Omagi puts together pregnant and no caffeine. “Sorry. Borin’s told me that everyone brings you treats and that’s you’re preferred treat.”

“Don’t be sorry. I love Caf-Pow,” she pets the cup again, “just on hiatus right now.” She pats Sean. “Little boy here doesn’t do caffeinated well.”

Omagi nods. “So…”

“Right, to the point…” Borin’s laughed about her reputation for being no nonsense, and told them that compared to Omagi, she’s a take-the-scenic-route-and-wing-it kind of gal. Abby gets him up to date with what she’s found on Eric’s car, adding, “Abbi said she thought the car was a Taurus, and she was right. Not only does the paint match Ford’s catalog, but Jimmy gave me the license plate number, and…”

“And it’s a stolen car,” Omagi says, voice flat.

“Yes. Stolen six months ago. How did you know?”

“The evidence coming in right now is from our crash, and another one that happened an hour before, which resulted in everyone rerouting so they had to go across the train tracks.”

Abby smiles a bit. “Interesting. An hour before would be right around the time everyone left the wedding.”

Omagi nods. “You were at the wedding, too, right?”

“Oh yeah. We cut out early and were already asleep by the time they headed off, but I was there.”

“Borin really dances?”

Abby laughs. “Here.” She grabs her phone and shows Omagi video of Borin and Gibbs dancing with each other.

He smiles at that, very small, brief smile, nods, and then says, “Okay, case work. You’re going to get both wrecks. Each one featuring a stolen car that drove itself.”

“And you want to know who was really driving them.”

“Yeah.”

Abby smiles. “I do, too. And… If you’ve got anyone who feels like another four hours of driving time, you might want to check out Havilan Plantation, and see if you can find out how whoever drove the cars knew when Diane and Draga left.”

Omagi nods. “Half my team is still down there, pulling more bits and pieces out of the train tracks. We can send them down to check out the plantation.”
There are things Abby likes more than a big pile of evidence with a fabulous mystery to go with it, but not a whole lot of them. (And most of the things on that list involve naked people, and really aren’t appropriate for work, which doesn’t mean they haven’t happened at work… well, not all of it’s happened at work… but, it probably could… hmmm… that’s distracting… big old pile of evidence!)

So, first off, the target: presumably Diane, maybe Eric, but everyone seems to think it was Diane, and Gibbs gut said Diane, so that’s good enough for her.

Second of all, how to track the target? She’s got the write up saying that Gibbs, Abbi, and Draga checked and didn’t find any eyes on them. That’s not 100% certain, but it’s close enough that she’s not thinking someone in the building was pretending to be a waiter or something. Whatever it was that let whoever was driving know it was time to drive, wasn’t visible.

Omagi’s sending his guys down to scout the building, so that leaves her with Eric’s car. A bug on the car, something to send a signal… That’d be a great way to track something like this. Not only would it send a signal letting whoever was driving know they were on the move, but, it would also let them know where.

In fact, second only to getting into whoever’s phone was giving them GPS directions home, that’s the best way to know how they were going.

Abby takes a tiny sip of the Caf-Pow Omagi gave her, and then, sadly, dumps the rest down the sink in the back of the evidence lock up. Then she heads over to Diane and Eric’s cell phones. A few minutes of poking around shows that Eric’s phone was the one giving them directions home, and that those directions did reroute them to the train tracks when their original route was blocked with the car accident. It also shows her that Eric’s phone (this is his official phone, not the safe one Tim gave him) is unbugged, and unmodified in any way she can see.

A few more minutes of googling, messing around on her own phone and on Diane’s shows Abby that every major GPS would reroute a driver from the path Draga and Diane were on to the route that goes across the train track, assuming the original route was blocked off anywhere along a two mile path. Any nearer or further down the road, and the new route wouldn’t intersect with the train.

Abby’s staring at what she’s found, tapping her fingers on her work bench. “So, was the train a lucky coincidence, or planned?”

Eric’s car doesn’t answer her. She glares at it, and then pets it a little. “Sorry, Baby. I shouldn’t take it out on you.”

More map time. If the train hadn’t been crossing then and there… Abby smiles when she sees it. Five miles further up the road, there’s a bridge. By flipping onto Google Earth she can see it’s a small, one lane, rickety looking thing. It’s crossing a deepish, probably thirty feet, gorge.

If the train hadn’t been coming, then whoever was driving the crash car could have gotten ahead of Draga and Diane, and then caused a head on crash on that bridge, probably sending them into the gorge. But, the train was in the right place at the right time.

Probably. She makes a mental note to check the train schedule at some point, make sure the train was where it was supposed to be, when it was supposed to be, and all the rest of that.

“Still doesn’t tell me how they knew you were moving.” Abby pats Eric’s baby. “I promise this won’t hurt, but I gotta look.”

Baby’s not pleased by that.

“I know. I don’t like having doctors poke at me, either, but sometimes it’s got to happen. I promise I’ll be gentle.” And from there Abby starts going over Baby with a fine tooth comb.

______________________________

It’s dinnertime when Eric, Emily, and Diane get up and start moving around again.

“We need clothes,” Diane says. Eric had a go bag, so he’s not in his tux anymore. He’s in his usual work jeans and button down. But Emily and Diane are wearing NCIS sweats.

“Okay. I’ll swing by your place and pick stuff up.”

“I want to go—“ Diane’s saying.

Eric’s shaking his head. “Nope. You wanted protective custody. This is it. Stay put. Order us some dinner, with the phone we gave you last night, don’t pay for it. I’ll pick it up and be back in two hours.”

“Two hours?”

“Gotta get Bishop. I’m not walking into what may be a trap on my own just to get you clean socks.”

Diane slumps a bit, the reality of being stuck in this tiny row house in a neighborhood where urban blight would be an improvement really hitting her. “My computer. I need that more than clean socks.”

“Use the one we got from the Navy Yard.”

“Mine has…”

